But who shall dwell in these vast bodies, Earths, Worlds, [5542]if they be inhabited? rationall creatures? as Kepler demands, or have they souls to be saved? or do they inhabit a better part of the world than we do? Are we or they Lords of the world? And how are all things made for man? Difficile est nodum hunc expedire, eò quod nondum omnia quæ huc pertinent explorata habemus: 'tis hard to determine: this only he proves, that we are in præcipuo mundi sinu, in the best place, best world, neerest the heart of the Sun.	But who is to dwell in these vast bodies, earths, worlds, "if they are inhabited? Rational creatures?" as Kepler asks. "Or have they souls to be saved? Or do they inhabit a better part of the world than we do? Are we or they lords of the world? And how are all things made for man?" "It is difficult to untie this knot, because we have not yet explored everything that bears on it": it is hard to determine. This alone he proves: that we are "in the foremost recess of the world," in the best place, the best world, nearest the heart of the sun.[5543]

[5541] Editor. Burton paraphrases Tycho rather than providing a precise locator. "Insensible" here means too small to perceive, not lacking consciousness. Kepler's discussion also mentions Tycho's inference from the size of the celestial globes; Tycho's letters themselves remain uncollated.

[5542] Burton. Printed page 255, q: "Quid igitur inquies, si sint in cælo plures globi, similes nostræ telluris, an cum illis certabimus quis meliorem mundi plagam teneat? Si nobiliores illorum globi, nos non sumus creaturarum rationalium nobilissimi: quomodo igitur omnia propter hominem? quomodo nos domini operum Dei? Kepler fol. 29." What then, you will say, if there are several globes in heaven like our earth: shall we contend with them over who occupies the better region of the world? If their globes are nobler, we are not the noblest of rational creatures. How, then, are all things for man? How are we lords of God's works? Kepler, folio 29.

[5543] Editor. The margin and body ask related but not identical questions. The body adds souls requiring salvation; the Latin margin concerns rank, purpose and humanity's place in creation. Both are preserved independently. "Foremost recess" closely renders præcipuo mundi sinu; Burton supplies his own more expansive English explanation after it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5544]Thomas Campanella, a Calabrian Monk, in his second book de sensu rerum, cap. 4. subscribes to this of Keplerus; that they are inhabited he certainly supposeth, but with what kind of creatures he cannot say, he labours to prove it by all means: and that there are infinite worlds, having made an Apologie for Galileus, and dedicates this tenet of his to Cardinall Cajetanus.	Tommaso Campanella, a Calabrian monk, agrees with this view of Kepler's in book 2, chapter 4 of On the Sense of Things. He certainly supposes that they are inhabited, though he cannot say by what kind of creatures, and labours to prove it by every means; also that there are infinite worlds. He has written a Defence of Galileo and dedicates this doctrine of his to Cardinal Caetani.[5545]
Others freely speak, mutter, and would perswade the world (as [5546]Marinus Marcennus complains) that our modern Divines are too severe and rigid against Mathematicians; ignorant and peevish, in not admitting their true demonstrations and certain observations, that they tyrannize over art, science, and all philosophy, in suppressing their labours (saith Pomponatius) forbidding them to write, to speak a truth, all to maintain their superstition, and for their profits sake.	Others speak freely, mutter, and would persuade the world, as Marin Mersenne complains, that our modern theologians are too severe and rigid towards mathematicians; ignorant and perverse in refusing their true demonstrations and certain observations. They tyrannize over art, science, and all philosophy by suppressing their work, says Pomponazzi, forbidding them to write or speak a truth, all to maintain their superstition and for their own profit.[5547]

[5544] Burton. Printed page 255, r: "Francofort. quarto 1620. ibid. 4o. 1622." Frankfurt, quarto, 1620; in the same place, quarto, 1622.

[5545] Editor. Campanella's De sensu rerum and Apologia pro Galileo are distinct works; the margin gives Frankfurt dates of 1620 and 1622. The claims about inhabited and infinite worlds and the precise dedication have not yet been checked against those editions. The modernized personal names do not resolve that bibliographical uncertainty.

[5546] Burton. Printed page 255, second *: "Præfat. in Comment. in Genesin. Modo suadent Theologos, summâ ignoratione versari, veras scientias admittere nolle, & tyrannidem exercere, ut eos falsis dogmatibus, superstitionibus, & religione Catholicâ detineant." Preface to the Commentary on Genesis. Now they persuade people that theologians live in utter ignorance, refuse to admit true sciences, and exercise tyranny in order to keep them bound by false doctrines, superstitions, and the Catholic religion.

[5547] Editor. Divines are theologians; mathematicians here include astronomers. Mersenne is reporting, and complaining about, accusations made against theologians. The quotation is not presented as Mersenne's own endorsement. Pomponatius is Pietro Pomponazzi. The precise preface and the transition to his reported complaint await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As for those places of Scripture which oppugne it, they will have spoken ad captum vulgi, and if rightly understood, and favorably interpreted, not at all against it: and as Otho Casman Astrol. cap. 1. part. 1. notes, many great Divines, besides Porphyrius, Proclus, Simplicius, and those Heathen Philosophers, doctrinâ & ætate venerandi, Mosis Genesin mundanam popularis nescio cujus ruditatis, quæ longa absit à verâ Philosophorum eruditione, insimulant:	As for the passages of Scripture that oppose it, they maintain that these speak "according to the understanding of ordinary people" and, if rightly understood and favourably interpreted, are not against it at all. As Otto Casmann notes in part 1, chapter 1 of his Astronomy, many great theologians, as well as Porphyry, Proclus, Simplicius, and those pagan philosophers "venerable for learning and antiquity, accuse Moses' account of the world's creation of some ill-defined popular crudity, far removed from the true learning of philosophers."[5548]
For Moses makes mention but of two Planets, ☉ and ☾, no 4. elements &c. Reade more in him, in [5549]Grossius and Iunius.	For Moses mentions only two planets, the sun and the moon, and no four elements, and so on. Read more in him, in Grossius, and in Junius.[555o]

[5548] Editor. Oppugne means oppose. Ad captum vulgi invokes language accommodated to ordinary understanding. The long Latin allegation is attributed by Burton to the critics he reports. The difficult "popularis nescio cujus ruditatis" is kept close as "some ill-defined popular crudity," rather than recast as an editorial judgment on Genesis.

[5549] Burton. Printed page 255, s: "Theat. Biblico." Biblical Theatre.

[555o] Editor. The symbols denote the sun and moon, counted as planets in the older astronomical usage. The four elements are earth, water, air and fire. This is a reported argument about the purpose and language of Genesis, not a claim that modern planetary astronomy counts only those two bodies. Grossius's Theatrum biblicum and the Junius reference remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 255–256 But to proceed, these and such like insolent and bold attempts, prodigious Paradoxes, inferences must needs follow, if it once be granted which Rotman, Kepler, Gilbert, Diggeus, Origanus, Galilæus, and others maintain of the earths motion, that it is a Planet, and shines as the Moon doth, which containes in it [5551]both land and Sea as the Moon doth: for so they find by their glasses that the Maculæ in facie Lunæ, the brighter parts are Earth, the duskier Sea, which Thales, Plutarch, and Pythagoras formerly taught: and manifestly discern Hills and Dales, and such like concavities, if we may subscribe to and believe Galilies observations.	But to proceed: these and similar audacious, bold ventures, astonishing paradoxes and inferences, must necessarily follow once we grant what Rothmann, Kepler, Gilbert, Digges, Origanus, Galileo, and others maintain about the earth's motion—that it is a planet and shines as the moon does, containing both land and sea as the moon does. For so they find through their telescopes: of the markings on the moon's face, the brighter parts are land, the darker sea, as Thales, Plutarch, and Pythagoras formerly taught. They plainly discern hills and valleys and similar hollows, if we may accept and believe Galileo's observations.[5552]
Source page 256 But to avoid these Paradoxes of the earths motion (which the Church of Rome hath lately [5553]condemned as hereticall, as appears by Blancanus and Fromundus writings) our latter Mathematicians have rolled all the stones that may be stirred: and to solve all apparances and objections, have invented new hypotheses, and fabricated new systems of the World, out of their own Dedalean heads.	But to avoid these paradoxes of the earth's motion—which the Church of Rome has lately condemned as heretical, as appears from the writings of Blancanus and Fromondus—our more recent mathematicians have turned over every stone that can be moved. To explain all appearances and answer all objections, they have invented new hypotheses and fabricated new systems of the world from their own Daedalian heads.[5554]

[5551] Burton. Printed page 255, †: "His argumentis planè satisfecisti, quod maculas in Lunâ esse maria, lucidas partes esse terram. Kepler. fol. 16." By these arguments you have fully established that the spots on the moon are seas and its bright parts land. Kepler, folio 16.

[5552] Editor. The lunar "seas" are dark regions, not bodies of liquid water. Burton reports the early land-and-sea interpretation alongside telescopic evidence of uneven terrain. Insolent here means unusually bold or audacious. The Kepler margin is translated as printed; its exact folio remains to be collated.

[5553] Burton. Printed page 256, t: "Anno 1616." In the year 1616.

[5554] Editor. Daedalus was the ingenious craftsman of Greek myth; "Daedalian heads" means ingeniously contriving minds. The margin identifies 1616, not Galileo's later trial. Burton compresses ecclesiastical judgments about the stationary sun and moving earth into his phrase "condemned as heretical"; it is retained as his formulation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Fracastorius will have the earth stand still, as before; and to avoid that supposition of Eccentricks and Epicycles, he hath coined 72. Homocentricks, to solve all apparances. Nicholas Ramerus will have the earth the Center of the World, but moveable; and the eighth sphere immoveable, the five upper Planets to move above the Sun, the Sun and Moon about the earth.	Fracastoro would have the earth stand still as before; to avoid the supposition of eccentrics and epicycles, he has devised seventy-two concentric spheres to explain all appearances. Nicolaus Reimers would have the earth at the centre of the world but movable, the eighth sphere immovable, the five upper planets moving above the sun, and the sun and moon around the earth.[5555]
Of which Orbes, Tycho Brahe puts the earth the Center immoveable, the stars immoveable, the rest with Ramerus, the Planets without Orbes to wander in the Aire, keep time and distance, true motion, according to that vertue which God hath given them.	In this arrangement of spheres, Tycho Brahe makes the earth the immovable centre and the stars immovable; for the rest he agrees with Reimers. The planets wander through the air without spheres, keeping their times and distances and their proper motion, according to the power God has given them.[5556]

[5555] Editor. Homocentric spheres share a centre. Reimers is Nicolaus Reimers Ursus. “The five upper planets” is Burton’s wording, carried into both columns; it should not be confused with the usual three planets above the sun in a geocentric ordering. The individual systems and count of seventy-two require full source collation.

[5556] Editor. The statement that Tycho leaves the stars immovable sits awkwardly with the daily celestial motion of his system. It is retained as Burton prints it. His brief comparison with Reimers is not treated as a complete account of either model.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5557]Helisæus Ræslin censureth both, with Copernicus (whose Hypothesis de terræ motu, Philippus Lansbergius hath lately vindicated, and demonstrated with solid arguments in a just volume, Iansonius Cæsius hath illustrated in a sphere.)[5558] The said Iohannes Lansbergius, 1633. hath since defended his assertion against all the cavills and calumnies of Fromundus his Anti-Aristarchus, Baptista Morinus, and Petrus Bartholinus: Fromundus, 1634. hath written against him again, F. Rosseus of Aberdine, &c. (sound Drummes and Trumpets)	Helisaeus Roeslin criticizes both, together with Copernicus, whose hypothesis "on the earth's motion" Philippus Lansbergen has lately vindicated and demonstrated with solid arguments in a substantial volume, and Janssonius Caesius has illustrated with a sphere. The said Johannes Lansbergen has since, in 1633, defended his assertion against all the objections and slanders of Fromondus's Anti-Aristarchus, Jean-Baptiste Morin, and Petrus Bartholinus. Fromondus wrote against him again in 1634; F. Ross of Aberdeen, and so on—sound drums and trumpets![5559]
whilest Ræslin (I say) censures all, and Ptolomæus himself as unsufficient: one offends against naturall Philosophy, another against Optick principles, a third against Mathematicall, as not answering to Astronomicall observations: one puts a great space betwixt Saturnus Orbe and the eighth sphere, another too narrow. In his own hypothesis he makes the earth as before, the universall Center, the Sun to the five upper Planets, to the eighth sphere he ascribes diurnall motion, Eccentricks, and Epicycles to the seven Planets, which hath been formerly exploded; and so	Meanwhile Roeslin, I say, criticizes them all, and Ptolemy himself, as inadequate. One offends against natural philosophy, another against optical principles, a third against mathematical ones, by failing to correspond to astronomical observations. One sets a great space between Saturn's sphere and the eighth sphere; another makes it too narrow. In his own hypothesis he makes the earth the universal centre as before, and the sun the centre for the five upper planets. He assigns daily motion to the eighth sphere, and eccentrics and epicycles to the seven planets—devices previously rejected. And so, [5557] Burton. Printed page 256, u: "In Hypothes. de mundo, Edit. 1597." In the Hypothesis on the World, published in 1597.

[5558] Burton. Printed page 256, unnumbered margin: "Lugduni 1633." Leiden or Lyon, 1633; the abbreviated place-name requires bibliographical resolution. Printed beside the Lansbergen discussion.

[5559] Editor. The source changes from Philippus to "the said Iohannes" Lansbergius; the distinction is preserved, not silently collapsed. Iansonius Cæsius, the Ross initial, and the precise 1633–1634 polemical references remain unresolved. "A just volume" means a full-sized or substantial book. The military aside turns the scholarly quarrel into a noisy battle.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Dum vitant stulti vitia in contraria currunt,	While fools avoid one fault, they run into its opposite,
as a Tinker stops one hole and makes two, he corrects them, and doth worse himself: reformes some, and marres all.	As a tinker stops one hole and makes two, he corrects them and does worse himself: reforms some things and spoils everything.[5560]
In the mean time, the World is tossed in a blanket amongst them, they hoyse the earth up and down like a ball, make it stand and goe at their pleasures: One saith the Sun stands, another he moves; a third comes in, taking them all at rebound, and lest there should any paradox be wanting, he [5561]findes certain spots and clouds in the Sun, by the help of glasses, which multiply (saith Keplerus) a thing seen a thousand times bigger in plano, and makes it come 32. times neerer to the eye of the beholder: but see the demonstration of this glass in [5562]Tarde, by means of which, the Sun must turn round upon his own Center, or they about the Sun.	Meanwhile the world is tossed in a blanket among them. They hoist the earth up and down like a ball, making it stand still or move as they please. One says the sun stands still; another, that it moves. A third comes in and catches them all on the rebound. And lest any paradox should be missing, he discovers certain spots and clouds in the sun with the help of telescopes, which, Kepler says, make an object appear a thousand times larger in area and bring it thirty-two times nearer to the observer's eye. But see Tarde's explanation of this instrument: its evidence requires either the sun to turn about its own centre or the spots to move around the sun.[5563]

[5560] Editor. The verse is Horace, Satires I.2.24, translated afresh. Exploded means rejected or discredited. The tinker repairs metal utensils; the proverb accuses Roeslin of making more defects than he repairs. The concluding sentence supplies a natural stopping point before Burton's blanket-tossing image.

[5561] Burton. Printed page 256, x: "Jo. Fabritius de maculis in sole Witeb. 1611." Johannes Fabricius, On Spots in the Sun, Wittenberg, 1611.

[5562] Burton. Printed page 256, *: "In Burboniis syderibus." In The Bourbon Stars.

[5563] Editor. The blanket-tossing and ball game continue the preceding satire of rival cosmologies. Glasses means telescopes; in plano measures apparent area, not length. A linear enlargement of about 32 gives roughly a thousandfold area. Fabricius is Johannes Fabricius; Tarde is Jean Tarde. The magnification and historical observations remain Burton's reports.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 256–257 Fabritius puts onely three, and those in the Sun: Apelles 15. and those without the Sun, floating like the Cyanean Isles in the Euxine Sea. [5564]Tarde the Frenchman hath observed 33. and those neither spots nor clouds, as Galileus Epist. ad Velserum supposeth, but Planets Concentrick with the Sun, and not far from him with regular motions.	Fabricius allows only three, and places them in the sun; Apelles fifteen, and outside the sun, floating like the Cyanean Islands in the Black Sea. Tarde the Frenchman has observed thirty-three, and takes them to be neither spots nor clouds, as Galileo supposes in his Letter to Welser, but planets moving regularly in orbits centred on the sun and not far from it.[5565]
Source page 257 [5566]Christopher Shemer a German Suisser Jesuit, Vrsicâ Rosâ divides them in maculas & faculas, and will have them to be fixed in Solis superficie: and to absolve their periodicall and regular motion in 27. or 28. dayes, holding withall the rotation of the Sun upon his Center; and are all so confident, that they have made skemes and tables of their motions.	Christopher Shemer, a German Swiss Jesuit, divides them in his Ursica Rosa into “spots and bright patches.” He maintains that they are fixed “on the sun’s surface” and complete their regular periodic motion in twenty-seven or twenty-eight days, also holding that the sun rotates about its centre. They are all so confident that they have drawn diagrams and tables of these movements.[5567]

[5564] Burton. Printed page 257, y: “Lib. de Burboniis syd. Stellæ sunt erraticæ, quæ propriis orbibus feruntur, non longè à Sole disjunctis, sed juxta Solem.” Book on the Bourbon stars. They are wandering stars carried in their own orbits, not far removed from the sun, but close to it.

[5565] Editor. Apelles was Christoph Scheiner’s pseudonym; the following Shemer is the same astronomer under another form of his name. The Cyanean rocks, or Symplegades, were the legendary clashing rocks at the entrance to the Black Sea. Burton contrasts solar-surface explanations with the theory that the marks were bodies orbiting the sun. See the Galileo Project’s sunspot account.

[5566] Burton. Printed page 257, first *: “Braccini fol. 1630. lib. 4. cap. 52, 55, 59. &c.” Bracciano, folio, 1630, book 4, chapters 52, 55, 59, and so forth.

[5567] Editor. The source prints Shemer and Vrsicâ Rosâ. Christoph Scheiner’s work is Rosa Ursina sive Sol, published at Bracciano, 1626–1630. His later view placed the spots on the rotating sun, unlike his earlier Apelles letters. Burton’s “German Suisser” description is retained, not silently corrected. Maculae are dark spots; faculae, bright areas. The particular chapter citations remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The [5568]Hollander in his dissertatiunculâ cum Apelle censures all; and thus they disagree amongst themselves, old and new, irreconcileable in their opinions; thus Aristarchus, thus Hipparchus, thus Ptolomæus, thus Albateginus, thus Alfraganus, thus Ticho, thus Ramerus, thus Ræslinus, thus Fracastorius, thus Copernicus and his adherents, thus Clavius and Maginus, &c. with their followers, vary and determine of these celestiall orbs and bodies;	The Dutchman, in his Little Discussion with Apelles, criticizes them all. Thus they disagree among themselves, old and new, irreconcilable in their opinions. Thus Aristarchus, Hipparchus, Ptolemy, al-Battani, al-Farghani, Tycho, Reimers, Roeslin, Fracastoro, Copernicus and his adherents, Clavius, Magini, and the rest, with their followers, differ and pronounce upon these celestial spheres and bodies.[5569]
and so whilest these men contend about the Sun and Moon, like the Philosophers in Lucian, it is to be feared, the Sun and Moon will hide themselves, and be as much offended as [5570]shee was with those, and send another message to Jupiter, by some new fangled Icaromenippus, to make an end of all those curious Controversies, and scatter them abroad.	And so, while these men dispute about the sun and moon like the philosophers in Lucian, we may fear that the sun and moon will hide themselves, as offended as the moon was with those philosophers, and send another message to Jupiter through some newly contrived Icaromenippus, to put an end to all these prying controversies and scatter the disputants abroad.[5571]

[5568] Burton. Printed page 257, z: “Lugdun. Bat. An. 1612.” Leiden, in the year 1612.

[5569] Editor. The anonymous Batavi dissertatiuncula, on solar spots displayed by Apelles, is catalogued at Leiden in 1612. Burton’s “Dutchman” is not securely identified here. The rapid list brings together ancient, Arabic, and recent European astronomers; it summarizes controversy rather than establishing that all held equivalent positions.

[5570] Burton. Printed page 257, second *: “Ne se subducant, & relictâ statione decessum parent, ut curiositatis finem faciant.” Lest they withdraw and, abandoning their station, prepare to depart, to put an end to prying curiosity.

[5571] Editor. In Lucian’s Icaromenippus the personified moon complains of philosophers’ speculations and asks Menippus to carry her complaint to Zeus. Icaromenippus combines Icarus with Menippus, the winged traveller; Burton imagines a new version of him. “Curious” here means inquisitive or prying.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But why should the Sun and Moon be angry, or take exceptions at Mathematicians and Philosophers? when as the like measure is offered unto God himself, by a company of Theologasters: they are not contented to see the Sun and Moon, measure their site and biggest distance in a glass, calculate their motions, or visit the Moon in a Poeticall fiction, or a dream, as he saith, [5572]Audax facinus & memorabile nunc incipiam, neque hoc sæculo usurpatum prius, quid in Lunæ regno hâc nocte gestum sit exponam, & quo nemo unquam nisi somniando pervenit, but he and Menippus:	But why should the sun and moon be angry or take offence at mathematicians and philosophers, when God himself receives the same treatment from a company of petty theologians? They are not content to observe the sun and moon, measure their positions and greatest distance through a telescope, calculate their movements, or visit the moon in a poetic fiction or a dream, as one writer says: "I shall now undertake a bold and memorable feat, not attempted before in this age: I shall tell what happened last night in the moon's kingdom, where no one has ever arrived except in a dream"—apart from himself and Menippus.[5573]
or as [5574]Peter Cuneus, Bonâ fide agam, nihil eorum quæ scripturus sum, verum esse scitote, &c. quæ nec facta, nec futura sunt, dicam, [5575]stili tantum & ingenii causâ, not in jest, but in good earnest these gyganiticall Cyclopes will transcend spheres, heaven, stars, into that Empyrean heaven, soare higher yet, and see what God himself doth.	Or, as Peter Cunaeus says, "I shall deal honestly: know that nothing I am about to write is true, and so forth. I shall tell of things that have neither happened nor will happen," "merely to exercise my style and wit." But these gigantic Cyclopes, quite seriously and without jesting, will pass beyond spheres, heaven, and stars into the Empyrean heaven, soar higher still, and see what God himself does.[5576]

[5572] Burton. Printed page 257, r: "Hercules tuam fidem Satyra Menip. edit. 1608." Hercules, I Appeal to Your Protection: a Menippean satire, edition of 1608.

[5573] Editor. Theologasters is contemptuous: pretenders to theology. The margin identifies Daniel Heinsius's Hercules tuam fidem, a Menippean satire recorded in the French union catalogue in a 1608 edition. The quotation and its exact place in that edition remain uncollated. Burton breaks from the Latin into the comic exception, "but he and Menippus."

[5574] Burton. Printed page 257, s: "Sardi venales Satyr. Menip. An. 1612." Sardinians for Sale: a Menippean satire, 1612.

[5575] Burton. Printed page 257, t: "Puteani Coëmus sic incipit, or as Lipsius Satyre in a dreame." Puteanus's Coëmus begins thus; or as in Lipsius's satire in a dream. The printed title is retained here; Comus is intended.

[5576] Editor. Cuneus is Petrus Cunaeus; Burton names Sardi venales in the margin. Puteanus is Erycius Puteanus, whose title Comus is printed here as Coëmus; Lipsius is Justus Lipsius. The precise quoted editions remain uncollated. The Empyrean is the highest heaven in traditional Christian cosmology; the Cyclopes, giants of classical myth, suggest the grotesque scale of these theological ambitions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Jewish Thalmudists take upon them to determine how God spends his whole time, sometimes playing with Leviathan, sometime over-seeing the world, &c. like Lucians Jupiter, that spent much of the year in painting butter-flies wings, and seeing who offered sacrifice; telling the houres when it should rain, how much snow should fall in such a place, which way the winde should stand in Greece, which way in Africk.	The Jewish Talmudists take it upon themselves to determine how God spends all his time: sometimes playing with Leviathan, sometimes overseeing the world, and so forth. Like Lucian's Jupiter, who spent much of the year painting butterflies' wings and seeing who offered sacrifice; fixing the hours when it should rain, how much snow should fall in a particular place, which way the wind should blow in Greece, and which way in Africa.[5577]
In the Turks Alcoran, Mahomet is taken up to heaven, upon a Pegasus sent a purpose from him, as he lay in bed with his wife, and after some conference with God is set on ground again. The Pagans paint him and mangle him after a thousand fashions; our Hereticks, Schismaticks, and some Schoolmen, come not far behind:	In the Turks' Koran, Muhammad is carried up to heaven on a Pegasus sent specially by God, as he lay in bed with his wife, and after some conversation with God is set down on earth again. The pagans depict God and distort him in a thousand ways; our heretics, schismatics, and some scholastics are not far behind.[5578]

[5577] Editor. Compare Babylonian Talmud, Avodah Zarah 3b, which describes periods of divine study, judgment, sustenance, and play with Leviathan. Burton's hostile summary treats this interpretive narrative as presumptuous literal knowledge. Lucian's Icaromenippus also satirizes the gods' administration of weather; the exact butterfly allusion remains unlocated.

[5578] Editor. This is Burton's polemical account of Muhammad's night journey and ascent, not an accurate description of what the Qur'an narrates. Qur'an 17:1 mentions the night journey; the mount al-Buraq and the ascent are elaborated in hadith, including Sahih Muslim 162a. Pegasus is Burton's classical analogy. This hadith does not support his detail about lying with a wife. The sequence attacks several religions and Christian schools in Burton's own voice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 257–258 some paint him in the habit of an old man, and make Maps of heaven, number the Angels, tell their severall [5579]names, offices: some deny God and his providence, some take his office out of his hand, will [5580]binde and loose in heaven, release, pardon, forgive, and be quarter-master with him;	Some portray him in the guise of an old man, draw maps of heaven, count the angels, and give their various names and offices. Some deny God and his providence; some take his office out of his hands, presuming to bind and loose in heaven, release, pardon, forgive, and share his command.[5581]

[5579] Burton. Printed page 257, u: “Tritemius l. de 7. secundis.” Trithemius, book On the Seven Secondary Intelligences.

[5580] Burton. Printed page 257, x: “They have fetched Trajanus soul out of hell, and canonize for Saints whom they list.” They have fetched Trajan’s soul out of hell and canonize as saints whomever they please.

[5581] Editor. Bind and loose echoes Matthew 16:19 and 18:18. Quarter-master here means a partner in authority, not merely a military supply officer. Trithemius’s title concerns seven governing secondary intelligences. The Trajan story is a medieval legend of the emperor’s deliverance through Gregory’s prayers; Burton uses it in anti-Catholic polemic. Exact intermediary sources remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 258 some call his Godhead in question, his power, and attributes, his mercy, justice, providence: they will know with [5582]Cecilius, why good and bad are punished together, war, fires, plagues infest all alike, why wicked men flourish, good are poor, in prison, sick, and ill at ease. Why doth he suffer so much mischief and evill to be done, if he be [5583]able to help? why doth he not assist good, or resist bad, reform our wills, if he be not the author of sin, and let such enormities be committed, unworthy of his knowledge, wisdome, government, mercy, and providence, why lets he all things be done by fortune and chance?	Some question his divinity, his power and attributes, his mercy, justice, and providence. Like Caecilius, they insist on knowing why good and bad are punished together, why war, fires, and plagues attack all alike, why wicked people prosper while the good are poor, imprisoned, sick, and miserable. Why does he allow so much mischief and evil if he can prevent it? Why does he not help the good, oppose the bad, or reform our wills, if he is not the author of sin? Why allow such enormities, unworthy of his knowledge, wisdom, government, mercy, and providence? Why let everything happen by fortune and chance?[5584]
Others as prodigiously enquire after his omnipotency, an possit plures similes creare deos? an ex scarabæo deum? &c. & quo demum ruetis sacrificuli? Some, by visions and revelations, take upon them to be familiar with God, and to be of privie counsell with him; they will tell how many, and who shall be saved, when the world shall come to an end, what year, what moneth, and whatsoever else God hath reserved unto himself, and to his Angels.	Others make equally monstrous inquiries into his omnipotence: “Can he create several gods like himself? Can he make a god out of a beetle?” and so forth. “Where will you rush to at last, you paltry priests?” Some, through visions and revelations, claim intimacy with God and membership of his privy council. They will tell how many people will be saved and who they are; when the world will end, in what year and month; and everything else that God has reserved to himself and his angels.[5585]

[5582] Burton. Printed page 258, first †: “In Minutius, sine delectu tempestates tangunt loca sacra & profana, bonorum & malorum fata juxta, nullo ordine res fiunt, soluta legibus fortuna dominatur.” In Minucius: storms strike sacred and profane places without distinction; good and bad meet the same fate; events follow no order; fortune reigns, unbound by laws.

[5583] Burton. Printed page 258, first *: “Vel malus vel impotens, qui peccatum permittit, &c. unde hæc superstitio?” Either evil or powerless is he who permits sin, and so forth. Where does this superstition come from?

[5584] Editor. Caecilius is the pagan speaker in Minucius Felix’s Octavius 5. Direct comparison with the Latin confirms a composite paraphrase: lightning strikes sacred and profane places, shipwrecks and fires confound innocent and guilty, and fortune seems ungoverned. Burton substitutes and compresses wording across the passage. This is Caecilius’s challenge within a dialogue, not the work’s final judgment on providence.

[5585] Editor. Sacrificuli is a sneering diminutive for priests. The questions test the limits of divine omnipotence. Burton then turns to claims of private revelation and prediction of the end of the world; these are targets of his satire, not revelations endorsed by the edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some again curious phantasticks, will know more than this, and enquire with [5586]Epicurus, what God did before the World was made? was he idle? Where did he bide? What did he make the world of? why did he then make it, and not before? If he made it new, or to have an end, how is he unchangeable, infinite? &c. Some will dispute, cavill, and object, as Iulian did of old, whom Cyrill confutes, as Simon Magus is fained to do, in that [5587]dialogue betwixt him and Peter: and Ammonius the Philosopher, in that dialogicall disputation with Zacharias the Christian.	Other prying fantasists insist on knowing still more, asking with Epicurus what God did before the world was made. Was he idle? Where did he live? What did he make the world from? Why make it then, and not earlier? If he made it anew, or intended it to end, how is he unchangeable and infinite? And so forth. Some will argue, quibble, and object, as Julian did long ago, whom Cyril refutes; as Simon Magus is represented as doing in that dialogue between himself and Peter; and as the philosopher Ammonius does in his dialogue and disputation with Zacharias the Christian.[5588]
If God be infinitely and only good, why should he alter or destroy the world? if he confound that which is good, how shall himself continue good? If he pull it down because evill, how shall he be free from the evill that made it evill? &c. with many such absurd and brainsick questions, intricacies, froth of humane wit, and excrements of curiosity, &c. which, as our Saviour told his inquisitive Disciples, are not fit for them to know.	If God is infinitely and exclusively good, why should he change or destroy the world? If he destroys what is good, how can he himself remain good? If he tears it down because it is evil, how can he be free of the evil, having made it evil? And so forth, with many such absurd, deranged questions and intricacies: the froth of human wit and the excrement of curiosity. These are things which, as our Saviour told his inquisitive disciples, it is not for them to know.[5589]

[5586] Burton. Printed page 258, second †: “Quid fecit Deus ante mundum creatum? ubi vixit otiosus à suo subjecto, &c.” What did God do before the world was created? Where did he live, idle and apart from the object of his activity, and so forth?

[5587] Burton. Printed page 258, second *: “Lib. 3. recog. Pet. cap. 3. Peter answers by the simile of an egge-shell, which is cunningly made, yet of necessity to be broken; so is the world, &c. that the excellent state of heaven might be made manifest.” Book 3 of the Recognitions of Peter, chapter 3. Peter answers with the comparison of an eggshell, skilfully made yet necessarily broken; so with the world, so that heaven’s excellent condition may be revealed. The abbreviated locator has not been reconciled with a specific edition.

[5588] Editor. Julian is the emperor opposed by Cyril of Alexandria. The Simon–Peter exchange is located in the Clementine Recognitions III.27–28, compared in Thomas Smith’s translation: Simon questions the destruction of a good creation, and Peter answers with the eggshell that must break for the chick to emerge. Burton’s chapter 3 remains as printed; his edition is unidentified. Zacharias’s Ammonius is a dialogue about creation. The Julian, Epicurus and Zacharias passages still require direct collation.

[5589] Editor. Compare Acts 1:7, where the disciples are told that the times and seasons are not theirs to know. Burton widens the warning into a rebuke of speculative theology. His violent “excrements of curiosity” is retained in the modern English.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But hoo! I am now gone quite out of sight, I am almost giddy with roving about: I could have ranged farther yet; but I am an infant, and not [5590]able to dive into these profundities, or sound these depths; not able to understand, much less to discuss. I leave the contemplation of these things to stronger wits, that have better ability, and happier leisure to wade into such Philosophicall mysteries: for put case I were as able as willing, yet what can one man do?	But ho! I have now gone quite out of sight. I am almost dizzy from roaming about. I could have ranged farther still, but I am an infant, unable to dive into these profundities or sound these depths; unable to understand, much less discuss them. I leave the contemplation of these matters to stronger minds, with greater ability and more fortunate leisure to wade into such philosophical mysteries. For even supposing I were as able as I am willing, what can one man do?[5591]
I will conclude with [5592]Scaliger, Nequaquam nos homines sumus, sed partes hominis, ex omnibus aliquid fieri potest, idque non magnum; ex singulis ferè nihil. Besides (as Nazianzen hath it) Deus latere nos multa voluit: and with Seneca, cap. 35. de Cometis, Quid miramur tam rara mundi spectacula non teneri certis legibus, nondum intelligi? multæ sunt gentes quæ tantum de facie sciunt cœlum, veniet tempus fortasse, quo ista quæ nunc latent in lucem dies extrahat longioris ævi diligentia, una ætas non sufficit, posteri, &c.	I shall conclude with Scaliger: “We are by no means whole human beings, but parts of one. Something can be made from us all together, and not very much at that; from each of us separately, almost nothing.” Besides, as Nazianzen puts it, “God has willed that many things should remain hidden from us.” And with Seneca, chapter 35, On Comets: “Why are we surprised that such rare spectacles of the world have not been brought under fixed laws and are not yet understood? Many peoples know the sky only by its outward appearance. Perhaps a time will come when the passage of days, through the patient work of a longer age, brings to light what is now hidden. One age is not enough; posterity,” and so forth.[5593]

[5590] Burton. Printed page 258, y: “Ut me pluma levat, sic grave mergit onus.” As a feather lifts me, so a heavy burden sinks me.

[5591] Editor. Ho! calls a halt; sound means measure depth. The feather-and-burden line is Alciato’s emblem Paupertatem summis ingeniis obesse, ne provehantur, compared in the Lyon 1550 edition, p. 132. Its speaker has talent to fly but is held down by poverty. Burton adapts that emblem to the limits of his speculative flight and the need for greater ability and leisure. The comparison identifies the verse, not his immediate edition or intermediary.

[5592] Burton. Printed page 258, z: “Exercit. 184.” Exercise 184.

[5593] Editor. Scaliger is Julius Caesar Scaliger; Nazianzen is Gregory of Nazianzus. Their precise passages remain uncollated. Seneca, Natural Questions VII.25.3–5, discusses comets and knowledge accumulated over generations. Burton generalizes the rare spectacle, compresses separate sentences and adds fortasse, “perhaps,” to Seneca’s confident prediction that knowledge will advance. His chapter 35 and wording are retained; the note identifies the passage in the consulted Latin without asserting his edition’s numbering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 258–259 when God sees his time, he will reveal these mysteries to mortall men, and shew that to some few at last, which he hath concealed so long. For I am of [5594]his mind, that Columbus did not finde out America by chance, but God directed him at that time to discover it: it was contingent to him, but necessary to God; he reveals and conceals to whom, and when he will. And which [5595]one said of History and Records of former times, God in his providence to check our presumptuous inquisition, wraps up all things in uncertainty, bars us from long antiquity, and bounds our search within the compass of some few ages:	When God sees fit, he will reveal these mysteries to mortal men and at last show a few what he has concealed so long. For I share the view that Columbus did not discover America by chance: God directed him to discover it at that time. To Columbus it was contingent, but to God necessary. He reveals and conceals to whom he will and when he will. And as one writer said of history and the records of former times, "God, in his providence, checks our presumptuous inquiry by wrapping everything in uncertainty, shutting us out from remote antiquity, and confining our search to the span of a few ages."[5596]
Source page 259 Many good things are lost, which our predecessors made use of, as Pancirola will better enform you; many new things are daily invented, to the publike good; so kingdomes, men, and knowledge ebbe and flow, are hid and revealed, and when you have all done, as the Preacher concluded, Nihil est sub sole novum. But my melancholy Spaniels quest, my game is sprung, and I must suddenly come down and follow.	Many good things once used by our predecessors have been lost, as Panciroli will explain more fully; many new things are invented daily for the public good. So kingdoms, people, and knowledge ebb and flow, are hidden and revealed; and when all is done, as the Preacher concluded, "There is nothing new under the sun." But my melancholy spaniels give tongue, my quarry has been flushed, and I must come down at once and follow.[5597]

[5594] Burton. Printed page 258, third *: "Laet. descript. occid. Indiæ." De Laet, Description of the West Indies.

[5595] Burton. Printed page 258, third †: "Daniel principio historiæ." Daniel, at the beginning of his history.

[5596] Editor. De Laet is Johannes de Laet; Daniel is Samuel Daniel, named for the opening of his history. These passages have not been collated against the editions Burton used. Contingent means not necessary from the human perspective. "Discover America" preserves Burton's European and providential framing; it does not imply that the inhabited Americas were previously unknown to their peoples.

[5597] Editor. Guido Panciroli wrote on things known to antiquity and subsequently lost, and on later inventions. The Preacher is Ecclesiastes; the quotation corresponds to 1:9. Quest means give tongue on a scent, and sprung means flushed from cover. The spaniels call Burton back from his airy digression to the pursuit of melancholy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Iason Pratensis, in his book de morbis capitis, and chapter of Melancholy, hath these words out of Galen, [5598]Let them come to me to know what meat and drink they shall use, and besides that, I will teach them what temper of ambient Aire they shall make choice of, what wind, what countries they shall chuse, and what avoid.	Jason Pratensis, in his book On Diseases of the Head, in the chapter on melancholy, gives these words from Galen: "Let them come to me to learn what food and drink they should use. Besides that, I shall teach them what quality of surrounding air to choose, which winds and countries to seek, and which to avoid."[5599]
Out of which lines of his, thus much we may gather, that to this cure of melancholy, amongst other things, the rectification of Aire is necessarily required. This is performed, either in reforming Naturall or Artificiall Aire. Naturall, is that which is in our election to chuse or avoid: and 'tis either generall, to Countries, Provinces; particular, to Cities, Towns, Villages, or private houses. What harm those extremities of heat or cold do in this malady, I have formerly shewed: the medium must needs be good, where the Aire is temperate, serene, quiet, free from bogs, fens, mists, all manner of putrefaction, contagious and filthy noisom smels.	From these lines we may gather that, among other things, improving the air is necessary to this cure of melancholy. This is done by correcting either natural or artificial air. Natural air is what we have the power to choose or avoid: either broadly, in countries and provinces, or particularly, in cities, towns, villages, or private houses. I have already shown the harm that extremes of heat and cold do in this illness. The mean must therefore be good: air that is temperate, clear, calm, and free of bogs, fens, mists, all kinds of decay, and infectious, filthy, offensive smells.[5600]

[5598] Burton. Printed page 259, a: "Veniant ad me audituri, quo esculento, quo item poculento uti debeant, & præter alimentum ipsum, potumque; ventos ipsos docebo, item aëris ambientis temperiem, insuper regiones quas eligere, quas vitare ex usu sit." Let them come to hear from me what food and drink they should use; besides food and drink themselves, I shall teach them about the winds, the temper of the surrounding air, and the regions it is beneficial to choose or avoid.

[5599] Editor. Jason Pratensis is the Latin name used by the physician Jan van der Velde. Burton cites Galen through him; the immediate passage in De morbis capitis and its Galenic antecedent remain to be collated. The English quotation belongs to Burton's body text, while the Latin version is preserved and separately translated in his note.

[5600] Editor. "Rectification" is correction or improvement. Natural air is the air of a chosen place; artificial air is air altered by human arrangements. Burton's claims belong to historical humoral medicine and environmental theory. Noisome means harmful or offensive, especially to smell; medium is the temperate mean between extremes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Egyptians by all Geographers are [5601]commended to be hilares, a conceited and merry Nation: which I can ascribe to no other cause than the serenity of their Aire. They that live in the Orchades are registred by [5602]Hector Boethius and [5603]Cardan, to be fair of complexion, long-lived, most healthfull, free from all manner of infirmities of body and mind, by reason of a sharp purifying Aire, which comes from the Sea. The Bœotians in Greece were dull and heavy, crassi Bœoti, by reason of a foggy Aire in which they lived,	All geographers praise the Egyptians as "cheerful," a witty and merry nation: I can attribute this to no cause but the clarity of their air. Hector Boece and Cardano record that those who live in the Orkneys are fair in complexion, long-lived, exceptionally healthy, and free from every kind of bodily and mental infirmity because of the sharp, purifying air that comes from the sea. The Boeotians in Greece were dull and sluggish—"thick-witted Boeotians"—because of the foggy air in which they lived,[5604]
([5605]Bœotum in crasso jurares aere natum)	(You would swear he was a Boeotian born in thick air.)[5606]
Attica most acute, pleasant, and refined. The Clime changeth not so much customes, manners, wits (as Aristotle Polit. lib. 6. cap. 4. Vegetius, Plato, Bodine method. hist. cap. 5. hath proved at large) as constitutions of their bodies, and temperature it self. In all particular Provinces we see it confirmed by experience, as the Aire is, so are the inhabitants, dull, heavy, witty, subtile, neat, cleanly, clownish, sick, and sound.	The people of Attica were exceptionally quick-witted, agreeable, and refined. Climate changes customs, manners, and minds less than it changes bodily constitutions and temperament itself, as Aristotle in Politics VI.4, Vegetius, Plato, and Bodin in Method of History, chapter 5, have demonstrated at length. In every province experience confirms it: as the air is, so are the inhabitants—dull, sluggish, witty, subtle, neat, clean, rustic, sick, or healthy.[5607]

[5601] Burton. Printed page 259, b: "Leo Afer, Maginus, &c." Leo Africanus, Magini, and others.

[5602] Burton. Printed page 259, c: "Lib. 1. Scot. hist." Scottish History, book 1.

[5603] Burton. Printed page 259, d: "Lib. 1. de rer. var." On the Variety of Things, book 1. Its printed d is displaced onto the preceding line in the outer margin; attached here to Cardan, the corresponding body anchor.

[5604] Editor. Conceited here means witty or ingenious. Hector Boethius is Hector Boece, author of a history of Scotland; Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. The flattering and disparaging regional characterizations are Burton's inherited generalizations, not established differences in national intelligence or health.

[5605] Burton. Printed page 259, *: "Horat." Horace.

[5606] Editor. Horace, Epistles II.1.244. The verse makes a proverbial insult about Boeotian dullness; Burton recruits it as evidence for the influence of air. The Latin is translated afresh.

[5607] Editor. Temperature means temperament or bodily constitution, not simply a thermometer reading. Attica is the region around Athens. The cited Aristotle VI.4, Vegetius, Plato, and Bodin references are retained; their exact relevance and editions remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In [5608]Perigort in France the Aire is subtle, healthfull, seldome any plague or contagious disease, but hilly and barren: the men sound, nimble, and lusty; but in some parts of Quienne full of moores and marishes, the people dull, heavy, and subject to many infirmities. Who sees not a great difference betwixt Surry, Sussex, and Rumny Marsh, the Wolds in Lincolnshire, and the Fens.	In Périgord in France the air is fine and healthy, with scarcely any plague or contagious disease, though the land is hilly and barren; the people are healthy, nimble, and vigorous. But in parts of Guyenne, full of moors and marshes, the people are dull, sluggish, and subject to many infirmities. Who fails to see a great difference between Surrey, Sussex, and Romney Marsh, or between the Lincolnshire Wolds and the Fens?[5609]
Source page 259–260 He therefore that loves his health, if his ability will give him leave, must often shift places, and make choice of such as are wholesome, pleasant, and convenient: there is nothing better than change of Aire in this Malady, and generally for health, to wander up and down, as those [5610]Tartari Zamolhenses, that live in hords, and take opportunity of times, places, seasons.	Anyone who values his health, therefore, must change places often, if his means allow, choosing places that are wholesome, pleasant, and suitable. Nothing is better for this illness, and for health in general, than a change of air: moving from place to place like those Zamolhense Tartars who live in hordes and take advantage of times, places, and seasons.[5611]

[5608] Burton. Printed page 259, †: “Maginus.” Magini.

[5609] Editor. Périgord and Guyenne are historical regions of southwestern France; Romney Marsh, the Lincolnshire Wolds, and the Fens supply English contrasts in terrain. Lusty means vigorous. Burton’s disease and character claims remain part of his historical environmental argument.

[5610] Burton. Printed page 260, e: “Haitonus de Tartaris.” Hayton, On the Tartars.

[5611] Editor. Haitonus is Hayton. Tartari Zamolhenses may refer to Tartars beyond the Volga; that identification and the precise Hayton passage remain unconfirmed. The unfamiliar group name is retained in the modern text. Hordes refers to mobile encampments or communities. Burton explicitly makes the ability to travel depend on the patient’s means.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 260 The Kings of Persia had their Summer and Winter houses; in Winter at Sardis, in Summer at Susa; now at Persepolis, then at Pasargada. Cyrus lived seven cold months at Babylon, three at Susa, two at Ecbatana, saith [5612]Xenophon, and had by that means a perpetuall Spring. The great Turk sojourns sometimes at Constantinople, sometimes at Adrianople, &c. The Kings of Spain have their Escuriall in heat of Summer, [5613]Madritte for an wholesome seat, Villadolite a pleasant site, &c. variety of secessus, as all Princes and great men have, and their severall progresses to this purpose.	The kings of Persia had summer and winter houses: at Sardis in winter, at Susa in summer; now at Persepolis, then at Pasargadae. Cyrus spent seven cold months at Babylon, three at Susa, and two at Ecbatana, Xenophon says, and so enjoyed a perpetual spring. The Great Turk stays sometimes at Constantinople, sometimes at Adrianople, and so forth. The kings of Spain have the Escorial in summer's heat, Madrid as a healthy residence, Valladolid as a pleasant site, and so on: a variety of retreats, as all princes and great men have, with their several journeys between them for this purpose.[5614]

[5612] Burton. Printed page 260, *: "Cyropæd. li. 8. perpetuum inde ver." Cyropaedia, book 8: hence a perpetual spring.

[5613] Burton. Printed page 260, f: "The Aire so clear, it never breeds the plague." The air is so clear that it never breeds plague. This is Burton's historical assertion.

[5614] Editor. Xenophon, Cyropaedia VIII.6.22, supports the seven/three/two-month sequence and perpetual-spring comparison. The preceding Sardis/Susa distribution is preserved without harmonizing it. Great Turk means the Ottoman sultan; Constantinople and Adrianople are Istanbul and Edirne. Progresses are journeys by a ruler with a retinue; secessus means retreats.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Lucullus the Roman had his house at Rome, at Baiæ, &c. [5615]When Cn. Pompeius, Marcus Cicero (saith Plutarch) and many Noble men in the Summer came to see him, at supper Pompeius jested with him, that it was an elegant and pleasant village, full of windows, galleries, and all offices fit for a Summer house: but in his judgement very unfit for Winter: Lucullus made answer, that the Lord of the house had wit like a Crane, that changeth her country with the season; he had other houses furnished, and built for that purpose, all out as commodious as this.	The Roman Lucullus had houses at Rome, Baiae, and elsewhere. When Gnaeus Pompeius, Marcus Cicero, and many noblemen visited him in summer, Plutarch says, Pompeius joked over supper that it was an elegant, pleasant villa, full of windows, galleries, and every service room suitable for a summer house, but, in his judgment, quite unsuitable for winter. Lucullus replied that the master of the house had the wit of a crane, which changes its country with the season: he had other houses furnished and built for that purpose, every bit as comfortable as this one.[5616]
So Tully had his Tusculane, Plinius his Lauretan Village; & every Gentleman of any fashion in our times hath the like. The [5617]Bishop of Exeter had 14. severall houses all furnished, in times past. In Italy, though they bide in Cities in Winter, which is more Gentle-man-like, all the Summer they come abroad to their country-houses, to recreate themselves.	So Cicero had his Tusculan villa and Pliny his Laurentine villa, and every gentleman of any standing in our day has something similar. In former times the bishop of Exeter had fourteen separate houses, all furnished. In Italy, although people stay in the cities in winter, as befits a gentleman, they spend the summer at their country houses, refreshing themselves.[5618]

[5615] Burton. Printed page 260, g: “Leander Albertus in Campania, è Plutarcho vitâ Luculli. Cùm Cn. Pompeius, Marcus Cicero, multique nobiles viri L. Lucullum æstivo tempore convenissent, Pompeius inter cœnandum familiariter jocatus est, eam villam imprimis sibi sumptuosam, & elegantem videri, fenestris, porticibus, &c.” Leandro Alberti, in his account of Campania, from Plutarch’s Life of Lucullus. When Gnaeus Pompeius, Marcus Cicero, and many noblemen visited Lucius Lucullus in summer, Pompeius joked familiarly over dinner that the villa seemed to him particularly sumptuous and elegant, with its windows, porticoes, and so forth.

[5616] Editor. Compare Plutarch, Lucullus 39.4: Pompey criticizes a residence designed for summer, and Lucullus answers with cranes and storks. Burton’s longer dinner scene comes through Leandro Alberti, as his note states; that intermediary has not been collated. Village here means villa or country residence; offices are service rooms, and all out means fully or every bit.

[5617] Burton. Printed page 260, h: “Godwin vita Io. Voysye al. Harman.” Godwin, life of John Voysey, otherwise Harman. The spacing of the printed name and abbreviation is uncertain; the identification is John Vesey, also known as Harman.

[5618] Editor. Tully is Cicero; Tusculane is his villa at Tusculum. Pliny’s Lauretan Village is his Laurentine villa. Godwin’s reference names John Vesey, also called Harman, bishop of Exeter; the claimed fourteen furnished houses has not been checked against Godwin’s text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Our Gentry in England live most part in the country (except it be some few Castles) building still in bottoms (saith [5619]Jovius) or neer woods, corona arborum virentium; you shall know a village by a tuft of trees at or about it, to avoid those strong winds wherewith the Island is infested, and cold Winter blasts.	Our gentry in England live mainly in the country —apart from a few castles—always building in hollows, Jovius says, or near woods, "a crown of green trees." You may recognize a village by a clump of trees in or around it, planted to shelter it from the strong winds that afflict the island and from cold winter blasts.[5620]
Some discommend moted houses, as unwholesome; so Camden saith of [5621]Ew-elme, that it was therefore unfrequented, ob stagni vicini halitus, and all such places as be neer lakes or rivers. But I am of opinion, that these inconveniences will be mitigated, or easily corrected by good fires, as [5622]one reports of Venice, that graveolentia and fog of the moors, is sufficiently qualified by those innumerable smoaks. Nay more, [5623]Thomas Philol. Ravennas a great Physician contends, that the Venetians are generally longer lived than any City in Europe, and live many of them 120. yeers.	Some condemn moated houses as unhealthy. Camden says of Ewelme that it was little frequented for this reason, "because of the vapours from the neighbouring pool"; the same objection applies to all places near lakes or rivers. But I think these disadvantages can be reduced or easily corrected by good fires. As one writer reports of Venice, the "foul smell" and fog of the marshes are sufficiently tempered by its innumerable plumes of smoke. Indeed, the eminent physician Thomas Philologus of Ravenna maintains that Venetians generally live longer than the inhabitants of any city in Europe, many reaching 120 years.[5624]

[5619] Burton. Printed page 260, i: "Descript. Brit." Description of Britain.

[5620] Editor. Jovius is Paolo Giovio. Bottoms are low-lying hollows; still means habitually or continually. The source's awkward exception concerning castles is preserved without supplying an unstated explanation. Corona arborum virentium evokes a surrounding ring of green trees.

[5621] Burton. Printed page 260, k: "In Oxfordshire." In Oxfordshire.

[5622] Burton. Printed page 260, l: "Leander Albertus." Leandro Alberti.

[5623] Burton. Printed page 260, m: "Cap. 21. de vit. hom. prorog." Chapter 21, On Prolonging Human Life.

[5624] Editor. Thomas Philologus of Ravenna is Tommaso Giannotti Rangoni, cited for a work on prolonging life. Camden's Ewelme passage and the two Italian authorities remain uncollated. The claims that smoke corrects marsh air and that Venetians often reach 120 belong to the historical account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But it is not water simply that so much offends, as the slime and noisome smels that accompany such overflowed places, which is but at some few seasons after a floud, and is sufficiently recompenced with sweet smels and aspects in Summer. Ver pinget vario gemmantia prata colore, and many other commodities of pleasure and profit;	But it is not water itself that does so much harm as the slime and offensive smells that accompany flooded places. These occur only at certain times after a flood, and are amply compensated by sweet smells and lovely views in summer. "Spring will paint the meadows, studded with flowers, in varied colours," with many other advantages of pleasure and profit.[5625]
or else may be corrected by the site, if it be somewhat remote from the water, as Lindly, [5626]Orton super montem, [5627]Drayton, or a little more elevated, though neerer, as [5628]Cawcut, as [5629]Amington, [5630]Polesworth, [5631]Weddington (to insist in such places best to me known, upon the river of Anker in Warwickshire, [5632]Swarston, and [5633]Drakely upon Trent.) Or howsoever they be unseasonable in Winter, or at some times, they have their good use in Summer.	Or the difficulty may be corrected by the site, if it lies some distance from the water, as at Lindley, Orton-on-the-Hill, and Drayton; or a little higher, though nearer to it, as at Caldecote, Amington, Polesworth, and Weddington—to dwell on places best known to me, on the River Anker in Warwickshire—and Swarkestone and Drakelow on the Trent. However unsuitable they may be in winter or at certain times, they serve well in summer.[5634]

[5625] Editor. Aspects means views. The source of the uncredited Latin verse has not been established; it is translated from Burton's wording. Gemmantia suggests meadows studded or jewelled with flowers, and pinget is future: "will paint."

[5626] Burton. Printed page 260, n: "The possession of Robert Bradshaw, Esq." The property of Robert Bradshaw, esquire.

[5627] Burton. Printed page 260, o: "Of George Purefey, Esq." The property of George Purefoy, esquire.

[5628] Burton. Printed page 260, p: "The possession of William Purefey Esq." The property of William Purefoy, esquire.

[5629] Burton. Printed page 260, q: "The seat of Sir John Reppington Kt." The residence of Sir John Reppington, knight.

[5630] Burton. Printed page 260, r: "Sir Henry Goodieres lately deceased." The property of Sir Henry Goodere, recently deceased.

[5631] Burton. Printed page 260, s: "The dwelling house of Hum. Adderly, Esq." The dwelling house of Humphrey Adderley, esquire.

[5632] Burton. Printed page 260, t: "Sir John Harpars lately deceased." The property of Sir John Harpur, recently deceased.

[5633] Burton. Printed page 260, u: "Sir George Greselies Kt." The property of Sir George Gresley, knight.

[5634] Editor. Modern place-name forms are supplied for Lindly, Orton super montem, Cawcut, Swarston, and Drakely. The list turns from general authorities to Burton's familiar Midlands landscape. His eight marginal ownership notices are preserved as historical statements; their dates and property histories remain unverified. The sentence resumes with the two Trent sites after its Anker parenthesis; modern punctuation makes that arrangement clearer.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 260–261 If so be that their means be so slender, as they may not admit of any such variety, but must determine once for all, and make one house serve each season, I know no men that have given better rules in this behalf, than our husbandry writers. [5635]Cato and Columella prescribe a good house to stand by a navigable river, good high-waies, neer some City and in a good soile, but that is more for commodity than health.	If their means are too limited to allow such variety, and they must decide once for all and make one house serve every season, I know no writers who have given better rules on this subject than those who write on husbandry. Cato and Columella advise that a good house should stand beside a navigable river and good roads, near a city and on good soil; but that serves convenience more than health.[5636]

[5635] Burton. Printed page 261, x: “Lib. 1. cap. 2.” Book 1, chapter 2.

[5636] Editor. Husbandry is the management of land and farming. Cato and Columella are Roman agricultural writers. The margin’s single Book 1, chapter 2 is retained without assigning the locator independently to both authors. Commodity here means practical advantage or convenience. The following scan page has no visible printed number; 261 is supplied from its position after 260.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 261 The best soile commonly yeelds the worst aire, a dry sandy plat is fittest to build upon, and such as is rather hilly than plain, full of Downes, a Cotswold country, as being most commodious for hawking, hunting, wood, waters, and all manner of pleasures.	The best soil commonly produces the worst air. A dry, sandy plot is best for building, preferably hilly rather than level, full of downs—a Cotswold landscape—since it offers the greatest advantages for hawking, hunting, woods, waters, and every kind of pleasure.[5637]
Perigort in France is barren, yet by reason of the excellency of the aire, and such pleasures that it affords, much inhabited by the Nobility; as Noremberg in Germany, Toledo in Spain. Our country-man Tusser will tell us so much, that the fieldone is for profit, the woodland for pleasure and health, the one commonly a deep clay, therefore noisome in Winter, and subject to bad high-waies: the other a dry land.	Périgord in France is barren, yet because of its excellent air and the pleasures it offers, many of the nobility live there, as at Nuremberg in Germany and Toledo in Spain. Our countryman Tusser will tell us as much: open-field country is for profit, woodland for pleasure and health. The former commonly has deep clay, and is therefore unhealthy in winter and liable to bad roads; the latter is dry land.[5638]

[5637] Editor. Plat means plot; downs are open uplands. Burton begins a new paragraph on the choice of a permanent residence. His comparison of fertile soil with unhealthy air belongs to the environmental medicine of the passage, while the Cotswolds provide a landscape ideal tied to country recreations.

[5638] Editor. Fieldone, also fielden, means open agricultural country, contrasted with woodland. Noisome means unhealthy or offensive. Tusser is Thomas Tusser, the English writer on husbandry; the exact passage remains uncollated. Périgord and Nuremberg modernize Burton's place names. Page 261 is supplied: the scan has no visible number on this page.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Provision may be had elsewhere, and our Towns are generally bigger in the woodland than the fieldone, more frequent and populous, and Gentlemen more delight to dwell in such places. Sutton Coldfield in Warwickshire (where I was once a Grammar Schollar) may be a sufficient witness, which stands, as Camden notes, loco ingrato & sterili, but in an excellent aire, and full of all manner of pleasures. [5639]Wadley in Barkshire is situate in a vale, though not so fertill a soil as some vales afford, yet a most commodious site, wholsome, in a delicious aire, a rich and pleasant seat.	Provisions can be obtained elsewhere, and our towns are generally larger in woodland than in open-field country, more numerous and populous; gentlemen take more pleasure in living in such places. Sutton Coldfield in Warwickshire, where I was once a grammar-school pupil, may be sufficient evidence. As Camden notes, it stands "in an unpromising and barren place," but enjoys excellent air and every kind of pleasure. Wadley in Berkshire lies in a valley. Though its soil is less fertile than that of some valleys, its situation is most convenient and healthy, with delightful air: a rich and pleasant residence.[5640]
So Segrave in Leicestershire (which Town [5641]I am now bound to remember) is sited in a Champion, at the edge of the Wolds, and more barren than the villages about it, yet no place likely yeelds a better aire. And he that built that fair house [5642]Wollerton in Nottinghamshire, is much to be commended, (though the tract be sandy and barren about it) for making choice of such a place.	So Seagrave in Leicestershire, a town I am now obliged to remember, stands in open country at the edge of the Wolds and is more barren than the surrounding villages; yet scarcely any place is likely to offer better air. And the builder of that fine house, Wollaton in Nottinghamshire, deserves much praise for choosing such a site, though the surrounding land is sandy and barren.[5643]

[5639] Burton. Printed page 261, y: "The seat of G Purefey Esq." The residence of G. Purefoy, esquire.

[5640] Editor. Frequent here means numerous or closely occurring. Grammar scholar means a pupil learning Latin at a grammar school. Burton's recollection of Sutton Coldfield and the marginal ownership notice are part of his personal geography. Camden's precise passage and the Wadley ownership history remain to be collated; no modern assessment of the district's health or fertility is implied.

[5641] Burton. Printed page 261, first *: "For I am now Incumbent of that Rectory, presented thereto by my right honorable Patron the Lord Berkly." For I am now the holder of that rectory, presented to it by my right honourable patron, Lord Berkeley.

[5642] Burton. Printed page 261, z: "Sir Francis Willoughby." Sir Francis Willoughby.

[5643] Editor. Champion means open, relatively level country; wolds are uplands. Segrave and Wollerton are modernized as Seagrave and Wollaton. The rectory note explains Burton's obligation to remember Seagrave: an incumbent holds the church living, while presentation is a patron's nomination to it. The note names Lord Berkeley, without a forename; no further identification is supplied here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Constantine lib. 2. cap. de agricult. praiseth mountaines, hilly, steep places, above the rest by the Sea side, and such as look toward the [5644]North upon some great river, as [5645]Farmack in Darbyshire on the Trent, environed with hills, open only to the North, like Mount Edgemond in Cornwall, which Mr. [5646]Carew so much admires for an excellent seat: Such as is the generall site of Bohemia: serenat Boreas, the North wind clarifies,	Constantine, in book 2 of his work on agriculture, praises mountains, hilly and steep places, especially those beside the sea, and sites facing north over some great river: such as Foremark in Derbyshire on the Trent, surrounded by hills and open only to the north; or Mount Edgcumbe in Cornwall, which Mr Carew so much admires as an excellent residence. Such, too, is the general situation of Bohemia: "Boreas clears the sky"; the north wind makes the air clear.[5647]

[5644] Burton. Printed page 261, a: "Montani & maritimi salubriores, acclives, & ad Boream vergentes." Mountain and seaside sites are healthier, sloping and facing north.

[5645] Burton. Printed page 261, b: "The dwelling of Sir To. Burdet Knight Baronet." The dwelling of Sir Thomas Burdett, knight and baronet.

[5646] Burton. Printed page 261, c: "In his Survay of Cornwall, book 2." In his Survey of Cornwall, book 2.

[5647] Editor. Constantine refers to the agricultural compilation Geoponica associated with Constantine VII Porphyrogenitus; see the CNRS manuscript catalogue. The precise book 2 passage remains uncollated. Farmack and Mount Edgemond are rendered Foremark and Mount Edgcumbe. Boreas is the north wind. Burton first quotes the Latin and then glosses it; both are represented in the modern text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5648]but neer lakes or marishes, in holes, obscure places, or to the South and West he utterly disproves, those winds are unwholsome, putrifying, and make men subject to diseases. The best building for health, according to him, is in [5649]high places, and in an excellent prospect, like that of Cuddeston in Oxfordshire (which place I must honoris ergo mention) is lately and fairly [5650]built in a good aire, good prospect, good soile, both for profit and pleasure, not so easily to be matched.	But he utterly disapproves of sites near lakes or marshes, in hollows or dark places, or facing south and west: those winds are unhealthy, cause putrefaction, and make people liable to disease. According to him, the healthiest building stands on high ground with an excellent view, like the house at Cuddesdon in Oxfordshire, which I must mention as a mark of honour. It has lately been handsomely built, with good air, a good view, and good soil, for both profit and pleasure: a combination not easily matched.[5651]

[5648] Burton. Printed page 261, d: “Prope paludes stagna, & loca concava, vel ad Austrum, vel ad Occidentem inclinata, domus sunt morbosæ.” Houses near marshes, pools, and hollow places, or facing south or west, are unhealthy.

[5649] Burton. Printed page 261, e: “Oportet igitur ad sanitatem domus in altioribus ædificare, & ad speculationem” For health, therefore, houses should be built on higher ground and with a view.

[5650] Burton. Printed page 261, second *: “By John Bancroft Dr. of Divinity my quondam tutor in Christ-church Oxon, now the Right Reverend Lord Bishop Oxon, who built this house for himself and his successors.” By John Bancroft, Doctor of Divinity, formerly my tutor at Christ Church, Oxford, now the Right Reverend Bishop of Oxford, who built this house for himself and his successors.

[5651] Editor. Honoris ergo means as a mark of honour. The marginal note identifies the house’s builder as John Bancroft, Burton’s former tutor and bishop of Oxford. Cuddeston is modern Cuddesdon. “Now” and “lately” belong to Burton’s account and need not describe the date of the posthumous 1651 printing. The building and patronage chronology requires later collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
P. Crescentius, in his lib. 1. de Agric. cap. 5. is very copious in this subject, how a house should be wholsomely sited, in a good coast, good aire, wind, &c. Varro de re rust. lib. 1. cap. 12. [5652]forbids lakes and rivers, marish and manured grounds, they cause a bad aire, gros diseases, hard to be cured: [5653]if it be so that he cannot help it, better, as he adviseth, sell thy house and land, than lose thine health.	Pietro de' Crescenzi, in book 1, chapter 5 of his work on agriculture, discusses this subject at great length: how a house should be placed for health, with a good exposure, good air, favourable winds, and so forth. Varro, On Agriculture, book 1, chapter 12, forbids sites by lakes and rivers, on marshy and cultivated land: they cause bad air and severe diseases, difficult to cure. If the situation cannot be remedied, he advises, it is better to sell your house and land than lose your health.[5654]
Source page 261–262 He that respects not this in chusing of his seat, or building his house, is mente captus, mad, [5655]Cato saith, and his dwelling next to Hell it self, according to Columella: he commends in conclusion, the middle of an hill, upon a descent. Baptista Porta Villæ, lib. 1. cap. 22. censures Varro, Cato, Columella, and those ancient Rusticks, approving many things, disallowing some, and will by all means have the front of an house stand to the South, which how it may be good in Italy and hotter climes, I know not, in our Northern countries I am sure it is best:	Anyone who disregards this when choosing a residence or building a house is "out of his mind"—mad, Cato says—and his dwelling is next door to hell itself, according to Columella. In conclusion, he recommends a site halfway down a hillside. Giambattista della Porta, in Villa, book 1, chapter 22, assesses Varro, Cato, Columella, and those ancient writers on farming. He approves much, rejects some things, and insists that the front of a house should face south. How this can be good in Italy and hotter climates I do not know; in our northern countries I am sure it is best.[5656]

[5652] Burton. Printed page 261, f: "Hyeme erit vehementer frigida, & æstate non salubris: paludes enim faciunt crassum aerem, & difficiles morbos." In winter it will be intensely cold, and in summer unhealthy; for marshes produce thick air and diseases difficult to treat.

[5653] Burton. Printed page 261, g: "Vendas quot assibus possis, & si nequeas, relinquas," Sell it for as many pennies as you can get; if you cannot, abandon it.

[5654] Editor. Coast means exposure or orientation; manured can mean cultivated. Varro, On Agriculture I.12.1–3, warns against facing a riverside house towards the river and against marshy sites; this is narrower than Burton's general prohibition. Fundanius asks about an inherited unhealthy estate. Agrius replies that he should sell or abandon it; Scrofa then gives precautions concerning wind, height and sunshine. Burton compresses these speakers into Varro's advice.

[5655] Burton. Printed page 261, h: "Lib. 1. cap. 2. in Orco habita." Book 1, chapter 2: dwell in the underworld. The imperative habita is retained as printed; Burton's body text gives a different grammatical construction.

[5656] Editor. Rusticks means agricultural writers; censures means evaluates. Columella I.3 reports Cato's warning against land lacking healthfulness or fertility, then describes having to settle accounts with Orcus, the underworld. Burton's dwelling beside hell and imperative in Orco habita are adaptations, not that passage's wording. The margin's I.2 is retained. Hillside siting follows in I.4; della Porta's chapter remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 262 Stephanus a Frenchman, prædio rustic. lib. 1. cap. 4. subscribes to this, approving especially the descent of an hill South or South-East, with trees to the North, so that it be well watered; a condition in all sites which must not be omitted, as Herbastein inculcates, lib. 1.	Stephanus, a Frenchman, agrees in On the Country Estate, book 1, chapter 4. He particularly recommends a south-facing or south-east-facing hillside, with trees to the north, provided it is well supplied with water: a requirement that must never be neglected in choosing any site, as Herbastein repeatedly insists in book 1.[5657]
Iulius Cæsar Claudinus a Physician, consult. 24. for a Nobleman in Poland, melancholy given, adviseth him to dwell in a house inclining to the [5658]East, and [5659]by all means to provide the aire be cleer and sweet; which Montanus, consil. 229. counselleth the Earle of Montfort his patient, to inhabit a pleasant house, and in a good aire. If it be so the naturall site may not be altered of our City, Town, Village, yet by artificiall means it may be helped.	The physician Julius Caesar Claudinus, in consultation 24 for a Polish nobleman inclined to melancholy, advises him to live in an east-facing house and take every care that the air is clear and sweet. Montanus gives the same counsel to his patient the Earl of Montfort in consultation 229: to inhabit a pleasant house with good air. If the natural situation of our city, town, or village cannot be changed, it can still be improved by human ingenuity.[5660]

[5657] Editor. Stephanus is Charles Estienne, cited for his work on the country estate. “So that” here means provided that. Herbastein is retained as printed: the identity and the abbreviated book reference have not been securely established. The advice about water is Burton’s reported requirement for a healthy site.

[5658] Burton. Printed page 262, i: “Aurora musis amica, Vitruv.” Dawn is a friend to the Muses. Vitruvius.

[5659] Burton. Printed page 262, k: “Ædes Orientem spectantes vir nobilissimus inhabitet, & curet ut sit aer clarus, lucidus, odoriferus. Eligat habitationem optimo aere jucundam.” Let the most noble gentleman inhabit an east-facing house and see that the air is clear, bright, and fragrant. Let him choose a dwelling made pleasant by excellent air.

[5660] Editor. Claudinus is Giulio Cesare Claudini; Montanus is Giovanni Battista da Monte. A consilium or consultation is a written medical opinion or case discussion. The east-facing recommendation is reinforced by the marginal proverb about dawn and the Muses. The precise consultation texts and the attribution of that proverb to Vitruvius remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In hot countries therefore thy make the streets of their Cities very narrow, all over Spain, Africk, Italy, Greece, and many Cities of France, in Languedock especially, and Provence, those Southern parts: Monpelier, the habitation and University of Physicians, is so built, with high houses, narrow streets, to divert the Suns scalding rayes, which Tacitus commends, lib. 15. Annal. as most agreeing to their health, [5661]because the height of buildings, and narrowness of streets, keep away the Sun beams.	In hot countries, therefore, they make city streets very narrow, throughout Spain, Africa, Italy, and Greece, and in many French cities, especially in the southern regions of Languedoc and Provence. Montpellier, the home and university of physicians, is built this way, with tall houses and narrow streets to keep off the sun's scalding rays. Tacitus, in book 15 of the Annals, recommends this as best for their health, because tall buildings and narrow streets keep out the sunbeams.[5662]
Some Cities use Galleries, or arched Cloysters towards the street, as Damascus, Bologna, Padua, Berna in Switzerland, Westchester with us, as well to avoid tempests, as the Suns scorching heat. They build on high hills in hot countries, for more aire; or to the sea side, as Baiæ, Naples, &c. In our Northern coasts we are opposite, we commend straight, broad, open, fair streets, as most befitting and agreeing to our clime.	Some cities have galleries or covered arcades along the street, as at Damascus, Bologna, Padua, Bern in Switzerland, and Chester in our own country, to shelter people both from storms and from the sun's scorching heat. In hot countries they build on high hills for more air, or beside the sea, as at Baiae and Naples. In our northern regions we do the opposite: we favour straight, broad, open, handsome streets, as best suited to our climate.[5663]

[5661] Burton. Printed page 262, l: "Quoniam angustiæ itinerum, & altitudo tectorum, non perinde Solis calorem admittit." Because narrow streets and tall buildings do not admit the sun's heat to the same extent.

[5662] Editor. The printed thy make is rendered they make. Tacitus, Annals XV.43, first describes Nero's wider streets, lower buildings and porticoes as useful improvements that also beautified Rome. He then reports critics who preferred the shade of the old narrow streets. Burton turns that reported objection into Tacitus's recommendation. The body preserves his attribution, while the note distinguishes the historian's framing from the opinion he records.

[5663] Editor. Galleries and cloisters here are covered passages or arcades. Westchester means Chester; Berna is Bern. Coasts means regions, rather than only seashores. Burton's contrast concerns the different aims of building in hot and cold climates.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We build in bottomes for warmth: and that site of Mitylene in the Iland of Lesbos, in the Ægean Sea, which Vitruvius so much discommends, magnificently built with fair houses, sed imprudenter positam, unadvisedly sited, because it lay along to the South, and when the South wind blew, the people were all sick, would make an excellent site in our Northern climes.	We build in low-lying places for warmth. And the situation of Mytilene on the island of Lesbos in the Aegean Sea, which Vitruvius so strongly condemns—magnificently built with fine houses, "but unwisely placed," ill-sited because it faced south and its people all fell sick when the south wind blew—would be excellent in our northern climates.[5664]
Of the artificiall site of houses I have sufficiently discoursed: if the of the dwelling may not be altered, yet there is much in choice of such a chamber or room, in opportune opening and shutting of windowes, excluding forrain aire and winds, and walking abroad at convenient times. [5665]Crato a German commends East and South site (disallowing cold aire and Northern winds in this case, rainy weather and misty dayes) free from putrefaction, fens, bogs, and muckhills. If the aire be such, open no windowes, come not abroad.	I have said enough about the planned situation of houses. If the site of the dwelling cannot be changed, much still depends on choosing a suitable chamber or room, opening and closing windows at the right time, keeping out outside air and winds, and walking outdoors at suitable hours. Crato, a German, recommends an eastern or southern exposure, free from putrefaction, fens, bogs, and dungheaps. In this case he disapproves of cold air, north winds, rainy weather, and misty days. If the air is of that kind, open no windows and do not go outside.[5666]

[5664] Editor. Compare Vitruvius, On Architecture I.6.1: Mytilene is criticized for exposure to unhealthy winds, particularly the south wind. Burton adapts that example to argue that a situation considered bad in the Mediterranean could suit northern Europe. Bottoms are low-lying hollows. His Latin phrase and English gloss are both retained in translation.

[5665] Burton. Printed page 262, m: "Consil. 21. li. 2. Frigidus aer, nubilosus, densus, vitandus, æquè ac venti septentrionales, &c." Consultation 21, book 2. Cold, cloudy, dense air must be avoided, just as north winds must, and so forth.

[5666] Editor. The source reads "if the of the dwelling": the modern text supplies site to repair the omission. Forrain means external or coming from outside. The final "such" is understood as referring to the adverse air just listed. Crato's consultation remains uncollated. These instructions belong to Burton's historical environmental regimen.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Montanus will have his patient not to [5667]stir at all, if the wind be big or tempestuous, as most part in March it is with us; or in cloudy, louring dark dayes, as in November, which we commonly call the black moneth, or stormy, let the wind stand how it will, consil. 27. and 30. he must not [5668]open a casement in bad weather, or in a boisterous season, consil. 299. he especially forbids us to open windows to a South wind.	Montanus will not allow his patient to go out at all when the wind is strong or tempestuous, as it usually is with us in March; nor on cloudy, lowering, dark days, as in November, which we commonly call the black month; nor in stormy weather, whatever the direction of the wind. In consultations 27 and 30, the patient must not open a casement in bad weather or a stormy season; in consultation 299, Montanus particularly forbids opening windows to a south wind.[5669]
Source page 262–263 The best site for chamber windows in my judgement are North, East, South, and which is the worst, West. Levinus Lemnius lib. 3. cap. 3. de occult. nat. mir. attributes so much to aire, and rectifying of wind and windowes, that he holds it alone sufficient to make a man sick or well; to alter body and minde. [5670]A cleer aire cheares up the spirits, exhilarates the minde; a thick, black, misty, tempestuous, contracts, overthrows. Great heed is therefore to be taken at what times we walke, how we place our windows, lights, and houses, how we let in or exclude this ambient aire.	In my judgment, the best directions for bedroom windows are north, east, south, and, worst of all, west. Levinus Lemnius, in book 3, chapter 3 of The Hidden Wonders of Nature, attributes so much to air and the proper arrangement of draughts and windows that he considers this alone enough to make a person sick or well, to change both body and mind. Clear air cheers the spirits and brightens the mind; thick, dark, misty, stormy air constricts and overwhelms them. We must therefore take great care over when we walk, how we position our windows, openings for light, and houses, and how we admit or exclude the surrounding air.[5671]

[5667] Burton. Printed page 262, n: “Consil. 24.” Consultation 24.

[5668] Burton. Printed page 262, o: “Fenestram non aperiat.” Let him not open the window.

[5669] Editor. Louring means lowering or gloomy; a casement is a window that opens on hinges. The source’s margin cites consultation 24, while the body also names 27, 30, and 299. All are retained without harmonization. Stir here is understood as venturing outdoors in the context of windows, winds, and walks.

[5670] Burton. Printed page 263, first *: “Discutit Sol horrorem crassi spiritus, mentem exhilarat, non enim tam corpora, quam & animi mutationem inde subeunt, pro cæli & ventorum ratione, & sani aliter affecti sunt cælo nubilo, aliter sereno. De naturâ ventorum, see Pliny li. 2. cap. 26, 27, 28. Strabo li. 7. &c.” The sun dispels the gloom of the thick spirit and cheers the mind: not only bodies but minds too undergo change according to the condition of the sky and winds; even healthy people are affected differently by a cloudy sky and a clear one. On the nature of winds, see Pliny, book 2, chapters 26–28; Strabo, book 7; and others.

[5671] Editor. Lights means openings that admit daylight. Spirits belongs to the physiological vocabulary of fine bodily substances linking bodily functions with mental states; the marginal crassus spiritus is a thick or sluggish spirit. Burton’s northern-first ranking is preserved even though other authorities in the passage prefer different exposures. Lemnius’s chapter and the appended Pliny/Strabo references await full collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 263 The Egyptians, to avoid immoderate heat, make their windows on the top of the house like chimnies, with two tunnells to draw a through aire. In Spain they commonly make great opposite windows without glass, still shutting those which are next to the Sun: So likewise in Turkey and Italy (Venice excepted, which brags of her stately glased Palaces) they use paper windows to like purpose; and lye sub dio, in the top of their flat-roofed houses, so sleeping under the canopy of heaven.	To avoid excessive heat, the Egyptians place their windows on top of the house like chimneys, with two shafts to draw a through-draught. In Spain they commonly make large, unglazed windows opposite one another, always closing those facing the sun. Similarly, in Turkey and Italy—except Venice, which boasts of its stately glazed palaces—they use paper windows for the same purpose, and lie "in the open air" on top of their flat-roofed houses, sleeping beneath the canopy of heaven.[5672]
In some parts of [5673]Italy they have Windmills, to draw a cooling aire out of hollow caves, and disperse the same through all the chambers of their Palaces, to refresh them; as at Costoza the house of Cæsareo Trento, a Gentleman of Vicenza, and elsewhere. Many excellent means are invented to correct nature by art.	In some parts of Italy they have windmills to draw cool air from hollow caves and distribute it through all the rooms of their palaces to refresh them: for example, at Costozza, in the house of Cesareo Trento, a gentleman of Vicenza, and elsewhere. Many excellent devices have been invented to improve nature through art.[5674]

[5672] Editor. Sub dio means under the open sky. Tunnells here are shafts or ducts; a through aire is a through-draught. Paper windows are windows covered with paper in place of glass. These regional practices are presented as Burton reports them, without claiming that all buildings in the named countries followed the same design.

[5673] Burton. Printed page 263, first †: "Fines Morison part. 1. c. 4." Fynes Moryson, part 1, chapter 4.

[5674] Editor. Costoza is rendered Costozza. Burton attributes this example to Fynes Moryson. His word Windmills is retained; the mechanism and the exact passage in Moryson have not been independently collated. Art means human skill and contrivance, here applied to ventilation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If none of these courses help, the best way is to make artificiall aire, which howsoever is profitable and good, still to be made hot and moist, and to be seasoned with sweet perfumes, [5675]pleasant and lightsome as may be; to have Roses, Violets, and sweet smelling flowers ever in their windows, Posies in their hand.	If none of these methods helps, the best course is to make artificial air, which is beneficial in any event: it should always be made warm and moist, scented with sweet perfumes, and kept as pleasant and bright as possible. Let them always have roses, violets, and sweet-smelling flowers at their windows, and posies in their hands.[5676]
Laurentius commends water-Lillies, a vessell of warm water to evaporate in the room, which will make a more delightsome perfume, if there be added, Orange flowers, pils of Citrons, Rosemary, Cloves, Bayes, Rose-water, Rose-vineger, Belzoin, Ladanum, Styrax, and such like Gums, which make a pleasant and acceptable perfume. [5677]Bessardus Bisantinus prefers the smoak of Juniper to melancholy persons, which is in great request with us at Oxford, to sweeten our chambers.	Laurentius recommends water lilies and a vessel of warm water to evaporate in the room. Its scent will be more delightful if orange blossom, citron peel, rosemary, cloves, bay leaves, rosewater, rose vinegar, benzoin, labdanum, storax, and similar gums are added, producing a pleasant and agreeable perfume. Bessardus Bisantinus recommends juniper smoke for melancholy people; it is much in demand among us at Oxford for sweetening our rooms.[5678]

[5675] Burton. Printed page 263, p: “Altemarus cap. 7. Bruel. Aer sit lucidus, bene olens, humidus. Montaltus idem ca. 26. Olfactus rerum suavium. Laurentius c. 8.” Altemarus, chapter 7. Bruel: let the air be bright, sweet-smelling, and moist. Montalto says the same, chapter 26. The smelling of pleasant things. Laurentius, chapter 8.

[5676] Editor. Artificial air means air modified by human arrangements. Lightsome means bright or well lit; posies are small bunches of flowers. Warmth, moisture, fragrance, and light form a single regimen within Burton’s historical medicine. The source’s Altemarus is retained in the marginal note rather than silently normalized to Altomarus.

[5677] Burton. Printed page 263, second *: “Ant. Philos. cap. de melanc.” Ant. Philos., chapter on melancholy. The abbreviated title is not expanded here without a secure identification.

[5678] Editor. Pils means peels, not medicinal pills. Belzoin is benzoin; Ladanum is labdanum, an aromatic resin, not laudanum, the opium preparation; Styrax is storax. Prefers here means recommends. Laurentius is André du Laurens. Bessardus Bisantinus and the abbreviated marginal title Ant. Philos. remain insufficiently identified for a confident expansion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5679]Guianerius prescribes the aire to be moistned with water, and sweet herbs boiled in it, vine and sallow-leaves, &c. [5680]to besprinkle the ground and posts with Rose-water, Rose-vineger, which Avicenna much approves. Of colours it is good to behold green, red, yellow and white, and by all means to have light enough, with windows in the day, wax candles in the night, neat chambers, good fires in winter, merry companions; for though melancholy persons love to be darke and alone, yet darkness is a great encreaser of the humour.	Guianerius prescribes moistening the air with water in which fragrant herbs, vine and willow leaves, and the like have been boiled, and sprinkling the floor and posts with rosewater and rose vinegar, a practice Avicenna strongly approves. Among colours, green, red, yellow, and white are good to look at. Above all, there should be enough light, from windows by day and wax candles by night; tidy rooms, good fires in winter, and cheerful companions. For although melancholy people like to be alone in the dark, darkness greatly increases the humour.[5681]
Although our ordinary aire be good by nature or art, yet it is not amiss, as I have said, still to alter it: no better Physick for a melancholy man then change of aire and variety of places, to travel abroad and see fashions. [5682]Leo Afer speakes of many of his countrymen so cured, without all other Physick: amongst the Negroes, there is such an excellent aire, that if any of them be sick elsewhere, and brought thither, he is instantly recovered, of which he was often an eye-witness.	Although our usual air is good, whether by nature or human art, it is still useful, as I have said, to change it regularly. There is no better medicine for a melancholy person than a change of air and a variety of places: travelling abroad and seeing different customs. Leo Africanus speaks of many of his countrymen cured in this way without any other medicine. Among the Black Africans, he says, the air is so excellent that anyone who falls sick elsewhere and is brought there recovers immediately, something he often witnessed himself.[5683]

[5679] Burton. Printed page 263, e: “Tract. 15. c. 9. ex redolentibus herbis & foliis vitis viniferæ, salicis, &c.” Treatise 15, chapter 9: with fragrant herbs and leaves of the wine-bearing vine, willow, and so forth.

[5680] Burton. Printed page 263, f: “Pavimentum aceto & aqua rosacea irrorare, Laurent. c. 8.” Sprinkle the floor with vinegar and rosewater. Laurentius, chapter 8.

[5681] Editor. Sallow is a willow; ground here is the floor. The source’s posts are retained. Guianerius is Antonio Guaineri; Avicenna is Ibn Sina. Humour here refers to the melancholic humour, black bile, within the inherited medical theory. The cited recipes and passages remain uncollated against their separate editions.

[5682] Burton. Printed page 263, g: “Lib. 1. cap. de morb. Afrorum. In Nigritarum regione tanta aeris temperies, ut si quis alibi morbosus eò advehatur, optimæ statim sanitati restituatur, quod multis accidisse, ipse meis oculis vidi.” Book 1, chapter on the diseases of Africans. In the country of the Black Africans the air is so temperate that if anyone ill elsewhere is brought there, he is immediately restored to excellent health; I have seen this happen to many with my own eyes. The note continues at the foot of the page.

[5683] Editor. Physick means medicine or treatment; fashions means customs or ways of life. Leo Afer is Leo Africanus. The modern text renders the historical racial terms Negroes and Nigritarum as Black Africans. The passage does not name a modern national territory. Its assertion of immediate recovery is Leo’s reported claim, not a verified medical result; the precise source passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 263–264 [5684]Lipsius, Zwinger, and some other, adde as much of ordinary travell. No man, saith Lipsius in an epistle to Phil. Lanoius, a noble friend of his, now ready to make a voyage, [5685]can be such a stock or stone, whom that pleasant speculation of countries, cities, towns, rivers, will not affect. [5686]Seneca the Philosopher was infinitely taken with the sight of Scipio Africanus house, near Liternum, to view those old buildings, Cisterns, Baths, Tombs, &c.	Lipsius, Zwinger, and others say as much of ordinary travel. No one, says Lipsius in a letter to his noble friend Philip Lannoy, who was preparing for a journey, can be such a block of wood or stone that the delightful sight of countries, cities, towns, and rivers fails to move him. The philosopher Seneca was immensely pleased to see Scipio Africanus's house near Liternum and to inspect its old buildings, cisterns, baths, tombs, and so forth.[5687]

[5684] Burton. Printed page 263, h: "Lib. de peregrinat." Book on travel. Printed at the foot of the page.

[5685] Burton. Printed page 263, i: "Epist. 2. cen. 1. Nec quisquam tam lapis aut frutex, quem non titillat amœna illa, variaque spectio locorum, urbium, gentium, &c." Letter 2, first hundred. Nor is anyone so much a stone or a shrub that he is not stirred by that pleasant and varied view of places, cities, peoples, and so forth. Printed across the foot of the page.

[5686] Burton. Printed page 263, second †: "Epist. 86." Letter 86. Printed at the foot of the page.

[5687] Editor. Lipsius is Justus Lipsius; Zwinger is Theodor Zwinger. A stock is a block of wood, and speculation here is looking or observing. Lipsius's Latin names peoples where Burton's English lists towns and rivers; both versions are preserved in their respective places. Seneca, Letter 86.1–4, describes his visit to Scipio's villa, burial-place, reservoir, and bath. The travel treatises and Lipsius letter still require edition-level collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 264 And how was [5688]Tully pleased with the sight of Athens, to behold those ancient and fair buildings, with a remembrance of their worthy inhabitants. Paulus Æmilius, that renowned Roman Captain, after he had conquered Perseus, the last king of Macedonia, and now made an end of his tedious wars, though he had been long absent from Rome, and much there desired, about the beginning of Autumn (as [5689]Livy describes it) made a pleasant peregrination all over Greece, accompanied with his son Scipio, and Athenæus the brother of King Eumenes, leaving the charge of his army with Sulpitius Gallus.	And how Cicero delighted in the sight of Athens, looking at its ancient and beautiful buildings while remembering their distinguished inhabitants! Paulus Aemilius, the renowned Roman commander, after conquering Perseus, the last king of Macedonia, and ending his long wars, made a pleasant tour throughout Greece at the beginning of autumn, as Livy describes. He had been long absent from Rome and was much missed there, yet he travelled with his son Scipio and Athenaeus, King Eumenes's brother, leaving his army in the charge of Sulpicius Gallus.[5690]

[5688] Burton. Printed page 264, first *: "2. lib. de legibus." On the Laws, book 2.

[5689] Burton. Printed page 264, second *: "Lib. 45." Book 45.

[5690] Editor. Tully is Cicero, but Atticus speaks in On the Laws II.2.4: Athens delights him more through memories of great men than through its buildings and art. Livy XLV.27–28 supports Aemilius's autumn tour, companions and delegation of command. His route includes Lebadea, Chalcis, Corinth and Olympia, omitted in Burton's summary; Megara, Burton's Megaris, is not named there. Burton's selection and sequence remain unchanged. These comparisons do not identify his intermediary or edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
By Thessaly he went to Delphos, thence to Megaris, Aulis, Athens, Argos, Lacedæmon, Megalopolis, &c. He took great content, exceeding delight in that his voyage, as who doth not that shall attempt the like, though his travell be ad jactationem magis quam ad usum reipub. (as [5691]one well observes) to crack, gaze, see fine sights and fashions, spend time, rather then for his own or publike good? (as it is to many gallants that travel out their best daies, together with their means, manners, honesty, religion) yet it availeth howsoever.	He went through Thessaly to Delphi, then to Megaris, Aulis, Athens, Argos, Sparta, Megalopolis, and elsewhere. He took great satisfaction and immense delight in his journey—as who would not, on attempting the same? Even if a person travels "more for boasting than for the public good," as one writer aptly observes—to brag, gaze about, see fine sights and customs, and pass the time rather than benefit himself or the public, as many fashionable young men do, travelling away their best years along with their means, manners, integrity, and religion—it is still of some use.[5692]
For peregrination charms our senses with such unspeakable and sweet variety, [5693]that some count him unhappy that never travelled, a kinde of prisoner, and pity his case, that from his cradle to his old age beholds the same still; still, still the same, the same. Insomuch that [5694]Rhasis cont. lib. 1. Tract. 2. doth not only commend, but enjoyn travell, and such variety of objects to a melancholy man, and to lye in diverse Innes, to be drawn into severall companies: Montaltus cap. 36. and many Neotericks are of the same minde.	For travel charms our senses with such inexpressibly sweet variety that some think a person who has never travelled unfortunate, a kind of prisoner. They pity someone who, from cradle to old age, sees always the same things: always, always the same, the same. So much so that Rhazes, in his Continens, book 1, treatise 2, not only recommends travel and varied sights for a melancholy person but prescribes them, along with staying at different inns and being drawn into different company. Montalto, chapter 36, and many recent writers share this view.[5695]

[5691] Burton. Printed page 264, †: "Keckerman præfat. polit." Keckermann, preface to his Politics.

[5692] Editor. Peregrination means travel; crack means boast. Gallants are fashionable young gentlemen; honesty means moral integrity or honourable conduct. Burton's catalogue suggests that travel can squander money, character, and religion even while it supplies pleasurable variety. The Latin dictum is freshly translated; the exact Keckermann preface remains uncollated.

[5693] Burton. Printed page 264, third *: "Fines Morison c. 3. part. 1." Fynes Moryson, chapter 3, part 1.

[5694] Burton. Printed page 264, k: "Mutatio de loco in locum, Itinera et voiagia longa & indeterminata, & hospitare in diversis diversoriis." Change from place to place, long journeys and voyages without fixed limits, and lodging in different inns.

[5695] Editor. Rhasis is Rhazes, or al-Razi; Continens is the Latin title of his medical compilation. Neotericks are recent or modern authors relative to Burton's time. Lye means lodge or stay. The repetition "still, still the same, the same" is deliberate and preserved. Rhazes, Montalto, and the Moryson reference await edition-level collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Celsus adviseth him therefore that will continue his health, to have varium vitæ genus, diversity of callings, occupations, to be busied about, [5696]sometimes to live in the city, sometimes in the countrey; now to study or work, to be intent, then again to hawk or hunt, swim, run, ride, or exercise himself. A good prospect alone will ease melancholy, as Gomesius contends, lib. 2. c. 7. de Sale.	Celsus therefore advises anyone wishing to preserve his health to have "a varied way of life": different pursuits and occupations to keep him busy; sometimes living in the city, sometimes in the country; now concentrating on study or work, then hawking or hunting, swimming, running, riding, or taking other exercise. A good view alone will relieve melancholy, as Gomesius argues in On Salt, book 2, chapter 7.[5697]
The citizens of [5698]Barcino, saith he, otherwise penned in, Melancholy, and stirring little abroad, are much delighted with that pleasant prospect their city hath into the sea, which like that of old Athens besides Ægina Salamina, and many pleasant Ilands, had all the variety of delicious objects:	The citizens of Barcelona, he says, otherwise confined, melancholy, and seldom venturing out, take great pleasure in their city's beautiful view over the sea. Like that of ancient Athens, with Aegina, Salamis, and many delightful islands, it offers every variety of pleasing sight.[5699]

[5696] Burton. Printed page 264, l: "Modò ruri esse, modò in urbe, sæpius in agro venari, &c." Now to be in the country, now in the city, more often to hunt in the fields, and so forth.

[5697] Editor. Celsus, On Medicine I.1.1, recommends a varied life, alternating town and country, activity and rest. Burton expands the examples rather than translating continuously. Gomesius is Bernardino Gómez Miedes, whose Commentariorum de sale is recorded in the University of Granada's catalogue. The particular prospect passage and chapter numbering remain uncollated.

[5698] Burton. Printed page 264, m: "In Catalonia in Spain." In Catalonia, Spain.

[5699] Editor. Barcino is Barcelona. Aegina and Salamis belong to the comparison with Athens, not to Barcelona's coastal geography. Modern punctuation makes the analogy clearer without adding a geographical claim. The description of citizens as confined and melancholy remains the reported author's characterization.

Original text 1651	Modern English
so are those Neapolitanes, and inhabitants of Genua, to see the ships, boats, and passengers go by, out of their windows, their whole cities being sited on the side of an hill, like Pera by Constantinople, so that each house almost, hath a free prospect to the sea, as some part of London to the Thames: or to have a free prospect all over the city at once, as at Granado in Spain, and Fez in Africk, the river running betwixt two declining hils, the steepness causeth each house almost, as well to oversee, as to be overseen of the rest.	So do the people of Naples and Genoa delight in watching ships, boats, and travellers pass beneath their windows. Their entire cities stand on hillsides, like Pera beside Constantinople, so that almost every house has an unobstructed sea view, as part of London overlooks the Thames. Or they enjoy a clear view of the whole city at once, as at Granada in Spain and Fez in Africa, where the river runs between two sloping hills: the steepness lets almost every house both overlook the others and be seen by them.[5700]
Every country is full of such [5701]delightsome prospects, as well within land, as by sea, as Hermon and [5702]Rama in Palestina, Colalto in Italy, the top of Tagetus or Acrocorinthus, that old decayed castle in Corinth, from which Peloponesus, Greece, the Ionian and Ægean seas were semel & simul at one view to be taken.	Every country is full of such delightful views, inland as well as by the sea: Hermon and Ramah in Palestine, Collalto in Italy, the summit of Taygetus, or Acrocorinth, that old ruined citadel at Corinth, from which the Peloponnese, Greece, and the Ionian and Aegean seas could be taken in "at once and together," in a single view.[5703]

[5700] Editor. A free prospect is an unobstructed view. Passengers means travellers or passers-by. Genua and Granado are Genoa and Granada; Constantinople is Istanbul, with Pera on the opposite side of the Golden Horn from the historic city. Burton's sweeping descriptions of these cities and their views are retained as reported.

[5701] Burton. Printed page 264, n: "Laudaturque domus longos quæ prospicit agros." And the house is praised that overlooks far-reaching fields.

[5702] Burton. Printed page 264, fourth *: "Many towns there are of that name, saith Adricomius, all high-sited." There are many towns of that name, says Adricomius, all standing on high ground.

[5703] Editor. Tagetus is Taygetus; Acrocorinthus is Acrocorinth. The marginal verse is Horace, Epistles I.10.23. In the surrounding lines, praise of a house overlooking fields helps show nature's attraction even within cultivated luxury; Burton uses it to praise a view. Adricomius is Christian van Adrichem. The precise Ramah and Collalto sites and the extent of the panoramas remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 264–265 In Egypt the square top of the great Pyramis 300. yards in height, and so the Sultans Palace in Grand Cairo, the country being plain, hath a marvellous fair prospect as well over Nilus, as that great city, five Italian miles long, and two broad, by the river side: from mount Sion in Jerusalem the holy land is of all sides to be seen: such high places are infinite:	In Egypt, the square top of the Great Pyramid, three hundred yards high, and likewise the sultan's palace in Cairo, have wonderfully fine views across the level country, both over the Nile and over that great city beside the river, five Italian miles long and two wide. From Mount Zion in Jerusalem, the Holy Land can be seen on every side. Such high places are countless.[5704]
Source page 265 with us those of the best note are Glassenbury Tower, Bever castle, Rodway Grange, [5705]Walsby in Lincolnshire, where I lately received a real kindness, by the munificence of the right honourable my noble Lady and patroness, the Lady Frances Countess Dowager of Exeter: And two amongst the rest, which I may not omit for vicinities sake, Oldbury in the confines of Warwickshire, where I have often looked about me with great delight, at the foot of which hill [5706]I was born:	Among the best-known in our country are Glastonbury Tower, Belvoir Castle, Rodway Grange, and Walesby in Lincolnshire, where I recently received a substantial kindness through the generosity of my noble lady and patroness, the Right Honourable Lady Frances, Dowager Countess of Exeter. Two others I must not omit because they lie close to home: Oldbury on the borders of Warwickshire, where I have often looked about me with great delight, and at the foot of whose hill I was born;[5707]

[5704] Editor. The pyramid's three-hundred-yard height and Cairo's dimensions are Burton's reported figures, retained without correction; this block does not establish their accuracy. Italian miles were historical units, not automatically equivalent to modern English miles. His panoramic claims are part of the catalogue of elevated viewpoints.

[5705] Burton. Printed page 265, †: "Lately resigned for some speciall reasons." Recently resigned for certain particular reasons.

[5706] Burton. Printed page 265, o: "At Lindley in Leicestershire, the possession and dwelling place of Ralph Burton Esquire, my late deceased father." At Lindley in Leicestershire, the property and home of Ralph Burton, esquire, my recently deceased father.

[5707] Editor. Walsby is rendered Walesby. The reference to receiving a substantial kindness is supplemented by Burton's note that he later resigned; the church living is understood from the context of his patroness's benefaction. The exact appointment and resignation dates remain to be checked. Lindley is explicitly identified in his next note as his birthplace and his father's home.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And Hanbury in Staffordshire, contiguous to which is Falde a pleasant Village, and an ancient patrimony belonging to our family, now in the possession of mine elder brother William Burton Esquire. [5708]Barclay the Scot commends that of Greenwich tower for one of the best prospects in Europe, to see London on the one side, the Thames, ships, and pleasant meadows on the other. There be those that say as much and more of St. Marks steeple in Venice.	and Hanbury in Staffordshire, beside which lies Fauld, a pleasant village and an ancient inheritance of our family, now in the possession of my elder brother, William Burton, esquire. Barclay the Scot praises the view from Greenwich Tower as one of the best in Europe, with London on one side, and the Thames, ships, and pleasant meadows on the other. Some say as much and more of St Mark's bell tower in Venice.[5709]
Yet these are at too great a distance; some are especially affected with such objects as be near, to see passengers go by in some great Rode way, or boats in a river, in subjectum forum despicere, to oversee a Fair, a Market place, or out of a pleasant window into some through-fare street to behold a continuall concourse, a promiscuous rout, coming and going, or a multitude of spectators at a Theater, a Maske or some such like shew.	Yet these sights are too far away for some people, who are particularly moved by nearby objects: watching travellers pass on a great highway, or boats on a river; "looking down into the marketplace below," overlooking a fair or market; looking from a pleasant window onto a busy street to see a continuous gathering, a mingled crowd coming and going; or watching a multitude of spectators at a theatre, a masque, or some similar entertainment.[5710]

[5708] Burton. Printed page 265, p: "In Icon animorum." In Icon Animorum, or Portrait of Minds.

[5709] Editor. Patrimony means inherited family property. Falde is rendered Fauld. The notice about William Burton belongs to the author's own family history. Barclay is John Barclay, cited for Icon Animorum. The property history and the particular Greenwich passage remain uncollated. St Mark's steeple is its bell tower, or campanile.

[5710] Editor. Promiscuous means mingled or miscellaneous; rout is a crowd. A masque is an elaborate staged entertainment combining music, dance, costume, and spectacle. Burton turns from distant panoramas to nearby human movement. Both the Latin phrase about looking down into a marketplace and Burton's English elaboration are represented.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But I rove: the sum is this, that variety of actions, objects, aire, places, are excellent good in this infirmity and all others, good for man, good for beast. [5711]Constantine the Emperour lib. 18. cap. 13. ex Leontio, holds it an only cure for rotten sheep, and any manner of sicke cattel.	But I wander. The sum of it is this: variety in activities, sights, air, and places is exceedingly good for this illness and all others, good for human beings and good for animals. The Emperor Constantine, in book 18, chapter 13, quoting Leontius, considers it a sovereign cure for sheep suffering from rot and for every kind of sick livestock.[5712]
Lælius à fonte Ægubinus that great Doctor, at the latter end of many of his consultations (as commonly he doth set down what success his Physick had) in melancholy most especially approves of this above all other remedies whatsoever, as appears consult. 69. consult. 229. &c. [5713]Many other things helped, but change of aire was that which wrought the cure, and did most good.	Laelius a Fonte of Gubbio, that great physician, particularly recommends this above every other remedy for melancholy at the end of many of his consultations, where he usually records the success of his treatment, as in consultations 69 and 229, and elsewhere. Many other things helped, but the change of air brought about the cure and did the most good.[5714]

[5711] Burton. Printed page 265, q: "Ægrotantes oves in alium locum transportandæ sunt, ut alium aerem & aquam participantes, coalescant & corroborentur." Sick sheep should be moved to another place, so that, sharing in different air and water, they may recover and grow strong.

[5712] Editor. An only cure is understood here as a singularly effective or sovereign remedy, rather than a claim that no alternative exists. Cattel can mean livestock generally. Rotten sheep are sheep afflicted with rot. Geoponica XVIII.13, attributed to Leontius, prescribes moving sick sheep to different air and water; Burton extends the example to other livestock.

[5713] Burton. Printed page 265, r: "Alia utilia, sed ex mutatione aeris potissimum curatus." Other things were useful, but he was cured chiefly through a change of air.

[5714] Editor. Ægubinus means of Gubbio; the German Digital Library authority record identifies Laelius a Fonte with that birthplace. His precise consultations and their outcomes have not been collated. Burton closes Member 3 by returning from his catalogue of views to change of air as a remedy. Member 4, on exercise of body and mind, begins next.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Memb. 4. Exercise rectified of Body and minde.	Member 4 Exercise of body and mind regulated
To that great inconvenience, which comes on the one side by immoderate and unseasonable exercise, too much solitariness and idleness on the other, must be opposed as an Antidote, a moderate and seasonable use of it, and that both of body and minde, as a most materiall circumstance, much conducing to this cure, and to the generall preservation of our health. The heavens themselves run continually round, the Sun riseth and sets, the Moon increaseth and decreaseth, Stars and Planets keep their constant motions, the aire is still tossed by the winds, the waters eb and flow to their conservation no doubt, to teach us that we should ever be in action.	The great harm caused on one side by excessive or ill-timed exercise, and on the other by too much solitude and idleness, must be countered with an antidote: moderate exercise at suitable times, of both body and mind. This is a most important consideration, contributing greatly to the cure and to the general preservation of our health. The heavens themselves revolve continually; the sun rises and sets; the moon waxes and wanes; stars and planets maintain their constant motions; the air is always stirred by winds; waters ebb and flow, no doubt for their preservation, teaching us that we should always be active.[5715]
For which cause Hierom prescribes Rusticus the Monk, that he be alwayes occupied about some business or other, [5716]that the Devill do not finde him idle. [5717]Seneca would have a man do something, though it be to no purpose. [5718]Xenophon wisheth one rather to play at tables, dice, or make a jester of himself (though he might be far better employed) then do nothing.	For this reason Jerome instructs Rusticus the monk to be occupied with some task or other at all times, so that the devil does not find him idle. Seneca would have a person do something, even to no purpose. Xenophon would rather have someone play backgammon or dice, or make a fool of himself, though he could be much better employed, than do nothing.[5719]

[5715] Editor. "Exercise" here includes mental occupation and useful work as well as bodily movement. Burton presents moderation as the remedy for both excessive exertion and inactivity. His moving heavens belong to the cosmology of his period.

[5716] Burton. Printed page 265, s: "Ne te dæmon otiosum inveniat." Lest the devil find you idle.

[5717] Burton. Printed page 265, †: "Præstat aliud agere quam nihil." It is better to do something than nothing.

[5718] Burton. Printed page 265, *: "Lib. 3. de dictis Socratis, Qui tesseris & risui excitando vacant, aliquid faciunt, et si liceret his meliora agere." Book 3 of the sayings of Socrates: those who occupy themselves with dice and raising a laugh do something, even though they could do better things.

[5719] Editor. Jerome, Letter 125.11 to Rusticus, urges continual useful work. The exact Senecan locus remains unidentified. Xenophon, Memorabilia 3.9.9, reports Socrates distinguishing leisure from better employment; it does not straightforwardly recommend gambling or buffoonery. "Tables" denotes backgammon or a related board game.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 265–266 The [5720]Ægyptians of old, and many flourishing Commonwealths since, have enjoyned labour and exercise to all sorts of men, to be of some vocation and calling, and to give an account of their time, to prevent those grievous mischiefes that come by idleness; for as fodder, whip and burthen belong to the asse: so meat, correction and worke unto the servant, Ecclus 33. 23. The Turks injoyn all men whatsoever, of what degree, to be of some trade or other, the grand Signior himself is not excluded.	The ancient Egyptians, and many flourishing states since, have required people of every kind to work and exercise, to follow some occupation or calling, and to account for their time, in order to prevent the grievous evils caused by idleness. "For as fodder, whip, and load belong to the donkey, so food, discipline, and work belong to the servant": Ecclesiasticus 33:23. The Turks require everyone, whatever their rank, to practise some trade; even the sultan himself is not exempt.[5721]
Source page 266 [5722]In our memory (saith Sabellicus) Mahomet the Turke, he that conquered Greece, at that very time when he heard Embassadors of other Princes, did either carve or cut wooden spoones, or frame something upon a table. [5723]This present Sultan makes notches for bows. The Jews are most severe in this examination of time. All wel-governed Places, Towns, Families, and every discreet person will be a law unto himself.	"Within living memory," says Sabellicus, "Mehmed the Turk, who conquered Greece, would carve or cut wooden spoons, or fashion something on a table, at the very time he was hearing the ambassadors of other princes." The present sultan makes notches for bows. The Jews are most rigorous in this scrutiny of how time is spent. All well-governed places, towns, and households observe such discipline, and every sensible person will be a law to himself.[5724]

[5720] Burton. Printed page 265, t: "Amasis compelled every man once a year to tell how he lived." Already English; "how he lived" means how he earned his livelihood.

[5721] Editor. Herodotus 2.177 reports Amasis's annual declaration of livelihood. Ecclesiasticus is also called Sirach; the quoted verse is 33:24 in the Authorized Version's numbering, 33:25 in some others. Burton's 33:23 is retained. The biblical "servant" belongs to a passage about slavery. "Grand Signior" is the Ottoman sultan.

[5722] Burton. Printed page 266, u: "Nostra memoria Mahometes Othomannus qui Græciæ imperium subvertit, cum oratorum postulata audiret externarum gentium, cochlearia lignea assiduè cælabat, aut aliquid in tabula affingebat." In our time Mehmed the Ottoman, who overthrew the Greek empire, continually carved wooden spoons or fashioned something on a board while hearing the requests of ambassadors from foreign nations.

[5723] Burton. Printed page 266, x: "Sands fol. 37. of his voyage to Jerusalem." George Sandys, account of his journey to Jerusalem, page or folio 37; Burton supplies this locator.

[5724] Editor. The conqueror is Mehmed II. "In our memory" belongs to the quoted historian Sabellicus, not to Burton's own lifetime. "This present Sultan" is likewise a source-dependent expression: the Sandys reference does not establish a ruler contemporary with the printing of 1651. The individual anecdote and locator remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But amongst us the badge of gentry is idleness: to be of no calling, not to labour, for that's derogatory to their birth, to be a meer spectator, a drone, fruges consumere natus, to have no necessary employment to busie himself about in Church and commonwealth (some few governers exempted) but to rise to eat, &c. to spend his dayes in hawking, hunting, &c. and suchlike disports and recreations ([5725]which our Casuists tax) are the sole exercise almost and ordinary actions of our Nobility, and in which they are too immoderate.	But among us the badge of gentility is idleness: to have no calling, to do no work, since that would demean their birth; to be a mere spectator, a drone, "born to consume the fruits of the earth"; to have no necessary employment in Church or state, apart from a few who govern, but merely to get up and eat, and so forth. Spending their days in hawking, hunting, and similar sports and recreations, which our writers on cases of conscience condemn, is almost the sole exercise and ordinary occupation of our nobility, and they pursue it far too immoderately.[5726]
And thence it comes to pass that in City and country so many grievances of body and mind, and this ferall disease of melancholy so frequently rageth, and now domineers almost all over Europe amongst our great ones. They know not how to spend their times (disports excepted, which are all their business) what to do, or otherwise how to bestow themselves: like our modern Frenchmen that had rather lose a pound of blood in a single combate, then a drop of sweat in any honest labour.	Hence it happens that, in city and country, so many afflictions of body and mind, and this deadly disease of melancholy, rage so frequently; melancholy now holds sway among the great almost throughout Europe. They do not know how to spend their time, except in sports, which are their whole business; what to do, or how else to occupy themselves. They resemble the Frenchmen of our own day, who would rather lose a pound of blood in a duel than a drop of sweat in honest work.[5727]

[5725] Burton. Printed page 266, †: "Perkins cases of conscience. l. 3. c. 4. q. 3." William Perkins, Cases of Conscience, book 3, chapter 4, question 3; locator retained.

[5726] Editor. "Fruges consumere natus" recalls Horace's phrase about being born to consume the earth's fruits, Epistles 1.2.27. Casuists considered particular cases of moral obligation. Burton's objection concerns aristocratic refusal of useful work and excessive sport, not recreation in itself. Perkins's exact passage remains to be checked.

[5727] Editor. "Ferall" means deadly or calamitous, not untamed; "domineers" means rules or holds sway. The French duellist is a polemical social type in Burton's argument, not a measured claim about a national population.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Every man almost hath something or other to employ himself about, some vocation, some trade, but they do all by ministers and servants, ad otia duntaxat se natos existimant, imò ad sui ipsius plerumque & aliorum perniciem, [5728]as one freely taxeth such kinde of men, they are all for pastimes, 'tis all their study, all their invention tends to this alone to drive away time, as if they were born some of them to no other ends.	Almost everyone has something to occupy him, some calling or trade, but these people do everything through agents and servants. "They think themselves born only for leisure—indeed, often for their own ruin and that of others," as one writer freely rebukes such men. They are wholly devoted to pastimes; these occupy all their attention. All their ingenuity is directed solely to passing the time, as if some of them had been born for no other purpose.[5729]
Therefore to correct and avoid these errors and inconveniences, our Divines, Physicians, and Politicians, so much labour, and so seriously exhort; And for this disease in particular, [5730]there can be no better cure then continuall business, as Rhasis holds, to have some employment or other, which may set their minde aworke, and distract their cogitations. Riches may not easily be had without labour and industry, nor learning without study, neither can our health be preserved without bodily exercise.	To correct and prevent these errors and harmful consequences, our theologians, physicians, and writers on government therefore work so hard and exhort us so earnestly. For this disease in particular, Rhazes holds that there can be no better cure than continual occupation: some employment that sets the mind to work and diverts its thoughts. Wealth is not easily gained without labour and industry, nor learning without study; neither can our health be preserved without bodily exercise.[5731]

[5728] Burton. Printed page 266, *: "Luscinius Grunnio." Luscinius, Grunnius; the reference is abbreviated.

[5729] Editor. "Ministers" means agents or attendants. Luscinius is Ottmar Nachtgall; the abbreviated Grunnio reference is retained, but its precise edition and passage remain unresolved. The Latin shifts awkwardly from plural subjects to a singular reflexive; the translation gives its intelligible sense.

[5730] Burton. Printed page 266, y: "Non est cura melior quam injungere iis necessaria & opportuna; operum administratio illis magnum sanitatis incrementum, & quæ repleant animos eorum, et incutiant iis diversas cogitationes. Cont. 1. tract. 9." There is no better treatment than to assign them necessary and suitable tasks; undertaking work greatly improves their health, and these tasks should fill their minds and stir different thoughts in them. Continens, book 1, treatise 9.

[5731] Editor. Rhasis is Rhazes, or al-Razi. "Distract" here means divert the thoughts to other things. The citation to Continens 1, treatise 9 has not been collated against a particular Latin edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If it be of the body, Guianerius allowes that exercise which is gentle, [5732]and still after those ordinary frictions, which must be used every morning. Montaltus cap. 26. and Jason Pratensis use almost the same words, highly commending exercise if it be moderate; a wonderfull help so used, Crato calls it, and a great means to preserve our health, as adding strength to the whole body, increasing naturall heat, by means of which, the nutriment is well concocted in the stomack, liver and veines, few or no crudities left, is happily distributed over all the body.	For bodily exercise, Guianerius approves gentle movement, always after the customary rubbing of the body, which must be done every morning. Montalto, chapter 26, and Jason Pratensis use almost the same words, highly praising exercise provided it is moderate. Crato calls it a wonderful help when used in this way, and a powerful means of preserving health: it strengthens the whole body and increases its natural heat, by which nourishment is properly digested in the stomach, liver, and veins, leaving little or no undigested matter, and is successfully distributed throughout the body.[5733]
Source page 266–267 Besides, it expells excrements by sweat, and other insensible vapours; in so much, that [5734]Galen prefers Exercise before all Physick, Rectification of diet, or any regiment in what kinde soever; 'tis Natures Physician. [5735]Fulgentius out of Gordonius de conserv. vit. hom. lib. 1. cap. 7. tearmes exercise, a spur of a dull sleepy nature, the comforter of the members, cure of infirmity, death of diseases, destruction of all mischiefes and vices.	Besides, exercise expels waste through sweat and other imperceptible vapours; so much so that Galen prefers it to all medicine, regulation of diet, or any other regimen whatsoever. It is nature's physician. Fulgentius, drawing on Gordonius, On the Preservation of Human Life, book 1, chapter 7, calls exercise a spur to a dull and sleepy constitution, a comfort to the limbs, a cure for infirmity, the death of diseases, and the destruction of all evils and vices.[5736]

[5732] Burton. Printed page 266, z: "Ante exercitium, leves toto corpore fricationes conveniunt. Ad hunc morbum exercitationes, quum rectè & suo tempore fiunt, mirificè conducunt, & sanitatem tuentur; &c." Before exercise, light rubbing over the whole body is suitable. For this disease, exercises performed properly and at the right time are wonderfully beneficial and preserve health, and so forth.

[5733] Editor. "Frictions" are rubbings of the body. Guianerius, Montalto, Jason Pratensis, and Crato are medical authorities cited throughout this partition. "Concoction," "natural heat," and "crudities" belong to the historical physiology in which food undergoes successive preparation and distribution; the modern wording preserves that model.

[5734] Burton. Printed page 266, a: "Lib. 1. de San. tuend." Book 1 of On the Preservation of Health.

[5735] Burton. Printed page 267, b: "Exercitium naturæ dormientis stimulatio, membrorum solatium, morborum medela, fuga vitiorum, medicina languorum, destructio omnium malorum, Crato" Exercise is a stimulus to a sleeping constitution, a comfort to the limbs, a remedy for diseases, a banishment of faults, a medicine for weakness, and the destruction of all evils. Crato. The marginal attribution differs from the chain of names in the body.

[5736] Editor. Burton's body attributes the formula through Fulgentius and Gordonius, while the margin ends with Crato. This difference is preserved rather than silently harmonized. "Excrements" here includes bodily waste more broadly than faeces. The Fulgentius reference and the precise medical sources remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 267 The fittest time for exercise, is a little before dinner, a little before supper, [5737]or at any time when the body is empty. Montanus consil. 31. prescribes it every morning to his patient, and that as [5738]Calenus addes, after he hath done his ordinary needs, rubbed his body, washed his hands and face, combed his head, and gargarized. What kinde of exercise he should use, Galen tells us, lib. 2. & 3. de sanit. tuend. and in what measure, [5739]till the body be ready to sweat, and roused up; ad ruborem, some say, non ad sudorum, lest it should dry the body too much;	The most suitable time for exercise is shortly before dinner or supper, or at any time when the body is empty. Montanus, in consultation 31, prescribes it for his patient every morning; and, as Calenus adds, after he has relieved himself, rubbed his body, washed his hands and face, combed his hair, and gargled. Galen tells us what kind of exercise to take, in books 2 and 3 of On the Preservation of Health, and how much: until the body is stimulated and on the point of sweating. Some say "until flushed, not until sweating," lest the body become too dry.[5740]

[5737] Burton. Printed page 267, c: "Alimentis in ventriculo probè concoctis." When the food in the stomach has been thoroughly digested.

[5738] Burton. Printed page 267, d: "Iejuno ventre vesica et alvo ab excrementis purgato, fricatis membris, lotis manibus & oculis, &c. lib. de atra bile." With the stomach empty, bladder and bowels cleared of waste, limbs rubbed, hands and eyes washed, and so forth. Book on black bile. The printed Latin agreement is irregular; "eyes" differs from "face" in the body.

[5739] Burton. Printed page 267, e: "Quousque corpus universum intumescat, et floridum appareat, sudoreque; &c." Until the whole body swells and looks flushed, and with sweat … and so forth. Burton's Latin is abbreviated and breaks off after sudoreque.

[5740] Editor. Dinner ordinarily denotes the midday meal. The margin qualifies "empty" as after food has been digested. Calenus is the Prosper Calenus whom Burton also cites in Block 071; the precise passage remains uncollated. The source has the irregular form "non ad sudorum," rendered by the evident sense "not until sweating." The Latin in the last marginal note also breaks off.

Original text 1651	Modern English
others injoyn those wholesome businesses, as to dig so long in his garden, to hold the plough, and the like: Some prescribe frequent and violent labour and exercises, as sawing every day, so long together, (epid. 6. Hippocrates confounds them) but that is in some cases, to some peculiar men; [5741]the most forbid, and by no means will have it go farther then a beginning sweat, as being [5742]perilous if it exceed.	Others prescribe healthy occupations, such as digging in the garden for a set time, guiding the plough, and the like. Some prescribe frequent and strenuous labour and exercises, such as sawing for a certain time each day. Hippocrates, in Epidemics 6, confutes them; but such exercise applies only in certain cases, to particular people. Most authorities prohibit it, and will on no account allow exercise to go beyond the onset of sweating, since exceeding that point is dangerous.[5743]
Of these labours, exercises and recreations, which are likewise included, some properly belong to the body, some to the mind, some more easie, some hard, some with delight, some without, some within doors, some naturall, some are artificiall. Amongst bodily exercises, Galen commends ludum parvæ pilæ, to play at ball, be it with the hand or racket, in Tennis-courts, or otherwise, it exerciseth each part of the body, and doth much good, so that they sweat not too much.	Of these labours and exercises, including recreations, some belong properly to the body, some to the mind; some are easier, some harder; some pleasurable, some not; some take place indoors; some are natural, some devised by art. Among bodily exercises, Galen recommends “the small-ball game”: playing ball with the hand or a racket, on a tennis court or elsewhere. It exercises every part of the body and does much good, provided the players do not sweat too much.[5744]

[5741] Burton. Printed page 267, f: “Omnino sudorem vitent. cap. 7. lib. 1. Valescus de Tar.” Let them avoid sweating altogether. Valescus de Taranta, book 1, chapter 7.

[5742] Burton. Printed page 267, g: “Exercitium si excedat, valde periculosum. Salust. Salvianus de remed. lib. 2. cap. 1.” If exercise exceeds the proper measure, it is very dangerous. Sallustius Salvianus, On Remedies, book 2, chapter 1. The marginal g has no clearly visible matching body letter; attached here to its corresponding warning.

[5743] Editor. “Peculiar men” means particular individuals. “Confounds” is taken as confutes or refutes; Burton then limits strenuous exercise to exceptional cases. He supplies only book 6 of Hippocrates’ Epidemics, so the precise passage and force of this appeal remain unresolved. The disagreement among medical authorities is preserved.

[5744] Editor. Galen wrote a separate treatise On Exercise with a Small Ball. Burton extends the reference into the ball games and racket tennis of his own period; the wording does not establish that Galen described modern tennis. The treatise’s identity is confirmed by the National Diet Library catalogue.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It was in great request of old amongst the Greeks, Romanes, Barbarians, mentioned by Homer, Herodotus, and Plinius. Some write, that Aganella a fair maid of Corcyra, was the inventor of it, for she presented the first ball that ever was made, to Nausica the daughter of king Alcinous, and taught her how to use it.	It was much in demand in ancient times among Greeks, Romans, and other peoples, and is mentioned by Homer, Herodotus, and Pliny. Some write that Aganella, a beautiful maiden of Corcyra, invented it: she presented the first ball ever made to Nausicaa, daughter of King Alcinous, and taught her how to use it.[5745]
The ordinary sports which are used abroad, are Hawking, Hunting, [5746]hilares venandi labores, one calls them, because they recreate body and minde, [5747]another, the [5748]best exercise that is, by which alone many have been [5749]freed from all ferall diseases. Hegesippus lib. 1. cap. 37. relates of Herod, that he was eased of a grievous melancholy by that means. Plato 7. de leg. highly magnifies it, dividing it into three parts, * by Land, Water, Ayre.	The usual outdoor sports are hawking and hunting: “the cheerful labours of the chase,” as one writer calls them, because they refresh body and mind. Another calls hunting the best exercise there is, through which alone many have been freed from all deadly diseases. Hegesippus, in book 1, chapter 37, relates that Herod was relieved of severe melancholy by this means. Plato, in book 7 of the Laws, praises hunting highly, dividing it into three kinds: on land, in water, and in the air.[5750]

[5745] Editor. Athenaeus, Deipnosophistae 1.14d, reports that Agallis of Corcyra attributed the invention of ball-playing to Nausicaa. Burton’s account makes “Aganella” the inventor and teacher instead. The original and modernization preserve his version; Corcyra is Corfu. No independent source for his altered anecdote has been established.

[5746] Burton. Printed page 267, h: “Camden in Staffordshire.” Camden, account of Staffordshire.

[5747] Burton. Printed page 267, i: “Fridevallius lib. 1. cap. 2. optima omnium exercitationum multi ab hac solummodo morbis liberati.” Fridevallius, book 1, chapter 2: the best of all exercises; many have been freed from diseases by this alone.

[5748] Burton. Printed page 267, k: “Iosephus Quercetanus dialect. polit. sect. 2. cap. 11. Inter omnia exercitia præstantiæ laudem meretur.” Josephus Quercetanus, dialect. polit., section 2, chapter 11: among all exercises it deserves praise for pre-eminence. The abbreviated work title is retained without a conjectural expansion.

[5749] Burton. Printed page 267, l: “Chyron in monte Pelio, præceptor heroum eos a morbis animi venationibus et puris cibis tuebatur. M. Tyrius.” Chiron, the heroes’ teacher on Mount Pelion, protected them from diseases of the mind through hunting and pure food. Maximus of Tyre. The note continues at the foot of the source page.

[5750] Editor. Plato, Laws VII.823b–824a, distinguishes several kinds of hunting and recommends strenuous land hunting while disparaging fishing and bird-catching; Burton’s praise is broader. Pseudo-Hegesippus I.37 ends with Herod, distressed after Mariamne’s death and physically ill, retiring to woodland on medical advice and recovering bodily health and mental composure through hunting. This is checked in Wade Blocker’s English translation, not Burton’s Latin edition. It supports the reported episode, not a clinical claim. The unmatched asterisk after three parts remains visible.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Xenophon in Cyropæd. graces it with a great name, Deorum munus, the gift of the Gods, a Princely sport, which they have ever used, saith Langius, epist. 59. lib. 2. as well for health as pleasure, and do at this day, it being the sole almost and ordinary sport of our Noblemen in Europe, and elsewhere all over the World. Bohemus de mor. gent. lib. 3. cap. 12. stiles it therefore studium nobilium, communiter venantur, quod sibi solis licere contendunt, 'tis all their study, their exercise, ordinary business, all their talk:	Xenophon, in the Education of Cyrus, honours it with a great name: "the gift of the gods"—the gift of the gods, a princely sport, which rulers have always practised for health as well as pleasure, says Langius in book 2, letter 59, and still do today. It is almost the sole and usual sport of our noblemen in Europe and elsewhere throughout the world. Boemus, On the Customs of Peoples, book 3, chapter 12, therefore calls it "the pursuit of nobles: they commonly hunt, and maintain that they alone are entitled to do so." It is their whole study, exercise, ordinary business, and conversation.[5751]
and indeed some dote too much after it, they can do nothing else, discourse of naught else. Paulus Jovius descr. Brit. doth in some sort tax our [5752]English Nobility for it, for living in the country so much, and too frequent use of it, as if they had no other means but Hawking and Hunting to approve themselves Gentlemen with.	Indeed, some are excessively infatuated with it: they can do nothing else and talk of nothing else. Paolo Giovio, in his Description of Britain, somewhat rebukes our English nobility for this: for living so much in the country and indulging so frequently in it, as though they had no means other than hawking and hunting to prove themselves gentlemen.[5753]

[5751] Editor. The divine origin of hunting and its gift to Chiron occur in Xenophon's On Hunting 1.1, not in the Cyropaedia as Burton cites. Boemus's Latin and Burton's additional English amplification are both retained. Langius and Boemus's particular passages remain to be collated.

[5752] Burton. Printed page 267, m: "Nobilitas omnis fere urbes fastidit, castellis, & liberiore cœlo gaudet, generisque dignitatem una maxime venatione, & falconum aucupiis tuetur." Almost all the nobility dislike cities, delight in castles and the freer open air, and maintain the dignity of their birth chiefly through hunting and falconry. Printed at the foot of the source page.

[5753] Editor. "Approve" here means demonstrate or establish. The Latin margin more neutrally describes a nobility that prefers castles and open air and maintains its standing by the chase; Burton's body gives the observation a sharper satirical edge.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 268 Hawking comes neer to Hunting, the one in the aire, as the other on the Earth, a sport as much affected as the other, by some preferred. [5754]It was never heard of amongst the Romans, invented some 1200 years since, and first mentioned by Firmicus lib. 5. cap. 8. The Greeke Emperours began it, and now nothing so frequent: he is no body, that in the season hath not a Hawke on his fist. A great Art, and many [5755]books written of it.	Hawking is close to hunting, the one taking place in the air, the other on earth; a sport as much loved as hunting, and preferred by some. It was unheard of among the Romans, invented some twelve hundred years ago, and first mentioned by Firmicus in book 5, chapter 8. The Greek emperors began it, and now nothing is more common: anyone without a hawk on his fist in the season is a nobody. It is an elaborate art, about which many books have been written.[5756]
It is a wonder to hear [5757]what is related of the Turkes Officers in this behalf, how many thousand men are imployed about it, how many Hawks of all sorts, how much revenewes consumed on that only disport, how much time is spent at Adrianople alone every year to that purpose. The [5758]Persian Kings hawk after Butterflies with sparrows, made to that use, and stares; lesser Hawks for lesser games they have, and bigger for the rest, that they may produce their sport to all seasons.	The accounts of the Turkish officials employed for this purpose are astonishing: how many thousands of men are engaged in it, how many hawks of every kind, how much revenue is spent on that sport alone, and how much time is devoted to it each year at Adrianople alone. The Persian kings hunt butterflies with sparrows and starlings trained for that purpose. They have smaller hawks for smaller game and larger ones for the rest, so that they can prolong their sport through every season.[5759]

[5754] Burton. Printed page 268, n: “Ios. Scaliger comment. in Cir. in fol. 344. Salmuth 23 de Nov. repert. com. in Pancirol.” Joseph Scaliger, commentary on Cir., at page or folio 344; Salmuth, commentary on Panciroli, On New Discoveries, 23. Burton’s abbreviated locators are retained.

[5755] Burton. Printed page 268, †: “Demetrius Constantinop. de re accipitraria, liber a P. Gillio latinè redditus. Ælius. epist. Aquilæ Symachi & Theodotionis ad Ptolomeum, &c.” Demetrius of Constantinople, On Falconry, a book translated into Latin by Pierre Gilles. Ælius; letter of Aquila, Symmachus, and Theodotion to Ptolemy, and so forth. No body dagger is visible; the note is placed at “books written of it.” The latter bibliographical string remains unresolved.

[5756] Editor. “Hawking” is hunting with trained birds of prey. Burton’s twelve hundred years is relative to his historical setting, not to the present reader. His account of the sport’s origin and first literary notice is retained as his claim, not certified here. The dagger bibliography lacks a visible body anchor and contains an unresolved sequence of names.

[5757] Burton. Printed page 268, o: “Lonicerus, Gesnerus, Jovius.” Lonicerus, Gesner, Giovio; Burton provides no particular work or passage.

[5758] Burton. Printed page 268, p: “S. Antony Sherlies relations.” Sir Anthony Sherley’s accounts.

[5759] Editor. Adrianople is Edirne. “Stares” means starlings; “produce” means prolong. Burton’s numbers and reports of royal bird training are left as reports from his named travel authorities. These anecdotes have not been independently verified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Muscovian Emperours reclaime Eagles to fly at Hindes, Foxes, &c. and such a one was sent for a present to [5760]Queen Elizabeth: some reclaime Ravens, Castrils, Pies, &c. and man them for their pleasures.	The emperors of Muscovy train eagles to pursue hinds, foxes, and the like; one such eagle was sent as a present to Queen Elizabeth. Some people tame ravens, kestrels, magpies, and so forth, and accustom them to handling for their amusement.[5761]
Fowling is more troublesome, but all out as delightsome to some sorts of men, be it with guns, lime, nets, glades, ginnes, strings, baits, pitfalls, pipes, calls, stalking-horses, setting-dogs, coy-ducks, &c. or otherwise. Some much delight to take Larks with day-nets, small birds with chaffe-nets, plovers, partridge, herons, snite, &c.	Fowling takes more trouble, but gives some people every bit as much pleasure, whether they use guns, birdlime, nets, clearings, traps, strings, baits, pitfalls, pipes, birdcalls, stalking horses, setting dogs, decoy ducks, or other means. Some greatly enjoy taking larks with day nets, small birds with chaff nets, and plovers, partridges, herons, snipe, and so on.[5762]
Henry the third, king of Castile (as Mariana the Jesuite reports of him lib. 3. cap. 7.) was much affected [5763]with catching of Quailes, and many Gentlemen take a singular pleasure at morning and evening to go abroad with their Quaile-pipes, and will take any pains to satisfie their delight in that kinde. The [5764]Italians have gardens fitted to such use, with nets, bushes, glades, sparing no cost or industry, and are very much affected with the sport.	Henry III, king of Castile, as Mariana the Jesuit reports in book 3, chapter 7, was very fond of catching quails. Many gentlemen take particular pleasure in going out morning and evening with their quail pipes, and will go to any trouble to gratify this taste. The Italians have gardens equipped for the purpose, with nets, bushes, and clearings; they spare neither expense nor effort, and are passionately fond of the sport.[5765]

[5760] Burton. Printed page 268, q: “Hacluit.” Hakluyt; no particular passage is supplied.

[5761] Editor. “Reclaim” and “man” are terms for taming and accustoming a bird to human handling; “castrils” are kestrels and “pies” magpies. “Hinds” are female deer. Burton’s reference to Hakluyt does not identify a particular voyage or passage, so the gift to Elizabeth remains uncollated.

[5762] Editor. Birdlime is adhesive used to catch birds; gins are traps, and glades are openings used in taking birds. Stalking horses conceal an approaching fowler; setting dogs locate game and crouch or point, and coy-ducks are decoys. “Snite” means snipe. The precise construction of the day and chaff nets is not specified by Burton.

[5763] Burton. Printed page 268, r: “Coturnicum aucupio.” In catching quails.

[5764] Burton. Printed page 268, s: “Fines Morison part 3. c. 8.” Fynes Moryson, part 3, chapter 8; locator retained.

[5765] Editor. Quail pipes imitate a bird’s call. The Henry III anecdote and Mariana’s printed book 3, chapter 7 reference need further collation; the number is not silently corrected. Moryson’s citation is likewise retained as supplied.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tycho Brahe that great Astronomer, in the Chorography of his Isle of Huena, & castle of Uraniburge, puts down his nets, and manner of catching small birds as an ornament, and a recreation, wherein he himself was sometimes imployed.	Tycho Brahe, the great astronomer, in his geographical description of his island of Hven and castle of Uraniborg, describes his nets and way of catching small birds as an attractive feature and a recreation in which he sometimes took part himself.[5766]
Fishing is a kinde of hunting by water, be it with nets, weeles, baits, angling or otherwise, and yeelds all out as much pleasure to some men, as dogs, or hawks; [5767]When they draw their fish upon the bank, saith Nic. Henselius Silesiographiæ, cap. 3. speaking of that extraordinary delight his Countrymen took in fishing, and in making of pooles. James Dubravius that Moravian, in his book de pisc. telleth, how travelling by the high-way side in Silesia, he found a Nobleman [5768]booted up to the groines, wading himself, pulling the nets, and labouring as much as any fisherman of them all:	Fishing is a kind of hunting in water, whether with nets, basket traps, baits, a rod and line, or other means. It gives some people every bit as much pleasure as dogs or hawks: “when they draw their fish onto the bank,” says Nicholas Hensel in chapter 3 of his Description of Silesia, speaking of his countrymen’s extraordinary delight in fishing and making ponds. James Dubravius, the Moravian, relates in his book On Fish that, travelling along a highway in Silesia, he found a nobleman wearing boots up to his groin, wading, hauling nets, and working as hard as any of the fishermen.[5769]

[5766] Editor. Hven, also written Ven, is the island associated with Tycho Brahe’s Uraniborg. “Chorography” is the description of a particular region or place. The specific bird-netting passage has not yet been collated against Brahe’s account.

[5767] Burton. Printed page 268, t: “Non majorem voluptatem animo capiunt, quàm qui feras insectantur, aut missis canibus, comprehendunt, quum retia trahentes, squamosas pecudes in ripas adducunt.” Those who pursue wild beasts or catch them by loosing hounds take no greater pleasure than these men do when, hauling their nets, they draw the scaly herds onto the banks.

[5768] Burton. Printed page 268, u: “More piscatorum cruribus ocreatus.” Wearing boots on his legs in the manner of fishermen.

[5769] Editor. “Weeles” are basket fish-traps. Burton’s “James Dubravius” is retained; the fishpond writer is generally known as Jan or Johannes Dubravius. Exact identification of Henselius’s cited text and comparison with the Dubravius anecdote remain pending.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and when some belike objected to him the baseness of his office, he excused himself, [5770]that if other men might hunt Hares, why should not he hunt Carpes? Many Gentlemen in like sort with us, will wade up to the Arm-holes, upon such occasions, and voluntarily undertake that to satisfie their pleasure, which a poor man for a good stipend would scarce be hired to undergo.	When someone apparently objected that his occupation was beneath him, he defended himself: if other men might hunt hares, why should he not hunt carp? In the same way, many gentlemen in our country will wade up to their armpits on such occasions, freely undertaking for their own pleasure what a poor man could scarcely be hired to do for a good wage.[5771]
Source page 268–269 Plutarch in his book de soler. animal. speaks against all fishing, [5772]as a filthy, base, illiberall imployment, having neither wit nor perspicacity in it, nor worth the labour. But he that shall consider the variety of Baits, for all seasons, and pretty devices which our Anglers have invented, peculiar lines, false flies, severall sleights, &c. will say, that it deserves like commendation, requires as much study, and perspicacity as the rest, and is to be preferred before many of them.	Plutarch, in his book On the Intelligence of Animals, speaks against all fishing as a filthy, low, ungentlemanly occupation, involving neither ingenuity nor discernment, and not worth the trouble. But anyone who considers the variety of baits for every season and the ingenious devices our anglers have invented—special lines, artificial flies, various techniques, and so forth—will say that it deserves equal praise, requires as much study and discernment as the other sports, and should be preferred to many of them.[5773]

[5770] Burton. Printed page 268, x: “Si principibus venatio leporis non sit inhonesta, nescio quomodo piscatio cyprinorum videri debeat pudenda.” If hunting hares is not dishonourable for princes, I do not see why fishing for carp should seem shameful.

[5771] Editor. The gentleman defends fishing as a social equal of hunting. “Arm-holes” means armpits. Burton’s contrast turns on willingly accepting as recreation the same discomfort one might refuse as paid labour.

[5772] Burton. Printed page 268, y: “Omnino turpis piscatio, nullo studio digna, illiberalitatis credita est, quod nullum habet ingenium, nullam perspicaciam.” Fishing is altogether low, worthy of no effort, and considered ungentlemanly, because it involves no ingenuity or discernment. The Latin is Burton’s quoted formulation.

[5773] Editor. The dismissal of fishing occurs in Aristotimus’s speech defending land animals in Plutarch’s Whether Land or Sea Animals Are Cleverer, chapter 9. It is a position in a dialogue, not simply the author’s unqualified verdict. Burton answers it by stressing anglers’ skill and ingenuity. “Illiberal” means unworthy of a gentleman, rather than politically intolerant.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 269 Because hawking and hunting are very laborious, much riding, and many dangers accompany them; but this is still and quiet: and if so be the angler catch no Fish, yet he hath a wholesome walk to the Brook side, pleasant shade, by the sweet silver streams; he hath good aire, and sweet smels of fine fresh meadow flowers, he hears the melodious harmony of Birds, he sees the Swans, Herons, Ducks, Water-horns, Cootes, &c. and many other fowle, with their brood, which he thinketh better then the noise of hounds, or blast of horns, and all the sport that they can make.	For hawking and hunting are very strenuous, involving much riding and many dangers; fishing is still and quiet. Even if the angler catches no fish, he has a healthy walk to the brookside, pleasant shade beside the lovely silver streams, good air, and the sweet scents of fresh meadow flowers. He hears the birds' melodious harmony and sees swans, herons, ducks, moorhens, coots, and many other birds with their young. He thinks this better than the noise of hounds, the blast of horns, and all the sport they can provide.[5774]
Many other sports and recreations there be, much in use, as Ringing, bowling, shooting, which Askam commends in a just volume, and hath in former times been injoyned by Statue, as a defensive exercise, and an [5775]honour to our Land, as well may witness our victories in France. Keel-pins, tronks, coits, pitching bars, hurling, wrestling, leaping, running, fencing, mustring, swimming, wasters, foiles, foot-ball, balown, quintan, &c. and many such, which are the common recreations of the country folks.	There are many other sports and recreations in common use, such as bell-ringing, bowls, and archery, which Ascham recommends in a whole volume. In former times archery was required by statute as an exercise for defence and an honour to our country, as our victories in France may well testify. Skittles, trunks, quoits, throwing bars, hurling, wrestling, jumping, running, fencing, military drill, swimming, practice swords, foils, football, balloon ball, quintain, and many similar pastimes are the usual recreations of country people.[5776]

[5774] Editor. The scan prints "Water-horns"; the context suggests water-hens, rendered here as moorhens, but this remains an editorial inference. Burton makes the walk, scents, birdsong, and sights valuable even when the angler catches nothing.

[5775] Burton. Printed page 269, z: "Præcipua hinc Anglis gloria, crebræ victoriæ partæ. Jovius." From this the English have gained especial glory and frequent victories. Giovio.

[5776] Editor. Ascham's book is Toxophilus, The School of Shooting, 1545, on archery; "just volume" means a full volume. "Statue" is retained on the left and understood as statute. Keel-pins are skittles; trunks is an old ball-through-holes game; wasters are practice swords. Balloon ball uses a large inflated ball, and quintain involves striking a target. These names do not imply identical modern rules.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Riding of great horses, running at rings, tilts and turnaments, horse-races, wilde-goose chases, which are the disports of greater men, and good in themselves, though many Gentlemen by that means gallop quite out of their fortunes.	Riding great horses, tilting at rings, jousts and tournaments, horse races, and wild-goose chases are the sports of men of higher rank, and good in themselves, though many gentlemen by these means gallop right out of their fortunes.[5777]

[5777] Editor. Great horses are large trained riding or war horses; running at rings is a mounted exercise in taking a suspended ring with a lance. A wild-goose chase here is an equestrian pursuit following a leader's course. Burton closes with a financial pun: the expense can consume a gentleman's estate.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But the most pleasant of all outward pastimes, is that of [5778]Areteus, deambulatio per amœna loca, to make a pretty progress, a merry journey now and then with some good companions, to visit friends, see Cities, Castles, Towns,	But the pleasantest of all outdoor pastimes is the one Aretaeus recommends, "walking through delightful places": making a little tour, a cheerful journey now and then with good companions, to visit friends and see cities, castles, and towns.[5779]
[5780]Visere sæpe amnes nitidos, peramœnaque Tempe, Et placidas summis sectari in montibus auras.	Often to visit clear rivers and lovely Tempe, And seek gentle breezes on the mountain heights.[5781]
To see the pleasant fields, the Crystall fountains, And take the gentle aire amongst the mountains.	To see the pleasant fields and crystal springs, And breathe the gentle air among the mountains.

[5778] Burton. Printed page 269, a: "cap. 7." Chapter 7; the reference is to Aretaeus in the body.

[5779] Editor. "Progress" means a tour or journey. Aretaeus is the ancient medical writer; Burton supplies only "chapter 7," and the exact source of this Latin phrase has not been established. The movement from strenuous sports to walking introduces quieter forms of recreation.

[5780] Burton. Printed page 269, b: "Fracastorius." Girolamo Fracastoro; Burton gives no work or line numbers.

[5781] Editor. Fracastorius is Girolamo Fracastoro. Tempe is the celebrated Thessalian valley, here an image of a delightful landscape. The first couplet is freshly translated from Burton's Latin; the following couplet separately modernizes Burton's freer English verse. The exact Fracastoro locus remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5782]To walk amongst Orchards, Gardens, Bowers, Mounts and Arbours, artificiall Wildernesses, green thickets, Arches, Groves, Lawns, Rivulets, Fountains and such like pleasant places, like that Antiochian Daphne, Brooks, Pooles, Fishponds, betwixt wood and water, in a fair meadow, by a river side, [5783]ubi variæ avium cantationes, florum colores, pratorum frutices, &c. to disport in some pleasant plain, park, run up a steep hill sometimes, or sit in a shady seat, must needs be a delectable recreation.	To walk among orchards, gardens, bowers, raised mounds and arbours, planted wildernesses, green thickets, arches, groves, lawns, little streams, fountains, and other delightful places, like Daphne near Antioch; among brooks, pools, and fishponds, between wood and water, in a fine meadow beside a river, "where there are varied birdsongs, colours of flowers, and shrubs in the meadows," and so forth; to amuse oneself in some pleasant open ground or park, sometimes run up a steep hill, or sit in a shady place: all this must be delightful recreation.[5784]
Hortus principis & domus ad delectationem facta, cum sylvâ, monte & piscinâ, vulgò La montagna: The Princes garden at Ferrara, [5785]Schottus highly magnifies, with the groves, mountains, ponds, for a delectable prospect, he was much affected with it; A Persian Paradise, or pleasant park, could not be more delectable in his sight. S. Bernard in the description of his Monastery, is almost ravished with the pleasures of it.	"The prince's garden and a house built for pleasure, with a wood, a mound, and a fishpond, commonly called La Montagna": Schottus highly praises the prince's garden at Ferrara, with its groves, hills, and ponds, for its delightful view; it pleased him greatly. To his eyes, a Persian paradise, or pleasure park, could not be more delightful. St Bernard, in the description of his monastery, is almost enraptured by its pleasures.[5786]

[5782] Burton. Printed page 269, c: "Ambulationes subdiales, quas hortenses auræ ministrant, sub fornice viridi, pampinis virentibus concameratæ." Walks in the open air, supplied by garden breezes, vaulted beneath a green arch of flourishing vine leaves. The Latin construction is compressed.

[5783] Burton. Printed page 269, *: "Theophylact." Theophylact; no work or passage is specified.

[5784] Editor. "Artificiall Wildernesses" are deliberately planted garden areas; "mounts" are raised features. Daphne was the pleasure resort associated with Antioch. "Pratorum frutices" is retained and translated literally as shrubs in the meadows; Burton's abbreviated Theophylact reference does not establish a precise passage.

[5785] Burton. Printed page 269, †: "Itinerat. Ital." Italian Itinerary.

[5786] Editor. The Latin describes a pleasure garden and house called La Montagna. Its translation is kept separately from Burton's English expansion, which repeats and elaborates it. The exact Schottus itinerary and the attribution of the monastic description to St Bernard remain to be collated; the printed attribution is not treated as proof of authorship.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 269–270 A sick [5787]man (saith he) sits upon a green bank, and when the dog-star parcheth the Plains, dries up rivers, he lies in a shadie bowre, Fronde sub arborea ferventia temperat astra, and feeds his eyes with variety of objects, hearbs, trees, to comfort his misery, he receives many delightsome smels, and fils his ears with that sweet and various harmony of Birdes: Good God (saith he) what a company of pleasures hast thou made for man?	A sick man, he says, sits on a grassy bank; and when the Dog Star scorches the plains and dries up rivers, he lies in a shady bower: "beneath a tree's foliage he tempers the burning stars." He feeds his eyes on varied sights, herbs and trees, to console him in his misery; he receives many delightful scents, and fills his ears with the sweet and varied harmony of birds. "Good God," he says, "what a multitude of pleasures you have made for mankind!"[5788]

[5787] Burton. Printed page 269, d: "Sedet ægrotus cespite viridi, & cum inclementia Canicularis terras excoquit, & siccat flumina, ipse securus sedet sub arborea fronde, & ad doloris sui solatium, naribus suis gramineas redolet species, pascit oculos herbarum amœna viriditas, aures suavi modulamine demulcet pictarum concentus avium, &c. Deus bone, quanta pauperibus procuras solatia!" The sick man sits on green turf; when the fierce Dog Days bake the land and dry up the rivers, he sits safely beneath the foliage of a tree. To soothe his pain he breathes fragrant plants; the lovely greenness of the herbs feeds his eyes, and the chorus of colourful birds caresses his ears with sweet melody, and so forth. Good God, what comforts you provide for the poor! The body paraphrase ends "for man"; the margin says "for the poor."

[5788] Editor. The Dog Star, Sirius, evokes the oppressive heat of the dog days. The short Latin phrase embedded in Burton's English is translated separately. The marginal Latin ends with comforts for "the poor," whereas the body says "man"; both readings are retained. Burton's source attribution requires further bibliographical checking.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 270 He that should be admitted on a sudden to the sight of such a Palace as that of Escuriall in Spain, or to that which the Moores built at Granado, Fountenblewe in France, the Turkes gardens in his Seraglio, wherein all manner of Birds and beasts are kept for pleasure; Wolves, Bears, Lynces, Tygers, Lyons, Elephants, &c. or upon the banks of that Thracian Bosphorus: the Popes Belvedere in Rome [5789]as pleasing as those Horti pensiles in Babylon, or that Indian Kings delightsome garden in [5790]Ælian; or [5791]those famous gardens of the Lord Cantelow in France, could not choose, though he were never so ill apaid, but be much recreated for the time; or many of our Noblemens gardens at home.	Anyone suddenly admitted to see such a palace as the Escorial in Spain, or the one the Moors built at Granada, Fontainebleau in France, or the Turkish sultan's gardens in his seraglio, where all kinds of birds and beasts are kept for pleasure—wolves, bears, lynxes, tigers, lions, elephants, and so on—or the gardens on the banks of the Thracian Bosporus; the pope's Belvedere in Rome, as delightful as the hanging gardens of Babylon; the Indian king's delightful garden in Aelian; those famous gardens of Lord Cantelow in France; or many of our noblemen's gardens at home: however unhappy he might be, he could not help being greatly refreshed for a time.[5792]

[5789] Burton. Printed page 270, †: "Diod. Siculus, lib. 2." Diodorus Siculus, book 2; the reference concerns the hanging gardens.

[5790] Burton. Printed page 270, *: "Lib. 13. de animal. cap. 13." On Animals, book 13, chapter 13; the printed chapter number is retained.

[5791] Burton. Printed page 270, e: "Petr. Gillius. Paul. Hentzerus Itenerar. Italiæ. 1617. Iod. Sincerus Itenerar. Galliæ 1617. Simp. lib. 1. quæst 4." Petrus Gillius; Paul Hentzner, Italian itinerary, 1617; Jodocus Sincerus, French itinerary, 1617; Simp., book 1, question 4. The compressed bibliography is transcribed without assigning each item to a particular garden.

[5792] Editor. "Ill apaid" means dissatisfied or unhappy. The opening continues the garden paragraph from Block 078. Burton mingles real palaces with literary descriptions; his "Lord Cantelow" and the exact allocation of the travel references remain unresolved. Aelian's royal Indian park appears in On Animals 13.18, rather than the printed 13.13. The repeated marginal daggers and asterisks are identified separately here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To take a boat in a pleasant evening, and with musick [5793]to row upon the waters, which Plutarch so much applaudes, Elian admires upon the river Pineus: in those Thessalian fields, beset with green Bayes, where Birds so sweetly sing that passengers enchanted as it were with their heavenly musick, omnium laborum & curarum obliviscantur, forget forthwith all labours, care and grief: or in a Gundilo through the grand Canale in Venice, to see those goodly Palaces, must needs refresh and give content to a melancholy dull spirit.	To take a boat on a pleasant evening and row upon the water with music, as Plutarch so warmly praises and Aelian admires on the river Peneus, among those Thessalian fields bordered with green laurels, where birds sing so sweetly that travellers, as though enchanted by their heavenly music, "forget all labours and cares"—at once forgetting every labour, care, and grief—or to travel by gondola along the Grand Canal in Venice to see those splendid palaces, must surely refresh and bring contentment to a dull, melancholy spirit.[5794]
Or to see the inner rooms of a fair-built and sumptuous edifice, as that of the Persian Kings so much renowned by Diodorus and Curtius, in which all was almost beaten gold, [5795]chaires, stooles, thrones, tabernacles, and pillars of gold, plane trees, and vines of gold, grapes of precious stones, all the other ornaments of pure gold,	Or to see the inner rooms of a finely built, sumptuous building, such as the Persian kings' palace so celebrated by Diodorus and Curtius, where almost everything was beaten gold: chairs, stools, thrones, canopies, and pillars of gold; plane trees and vines of gold; grapes made of precious stones; all the other ornaments of pure gold—[5796]

[5793] Burton. Printed page 270, f: "Iucundissima deambulatio juxta mare, & navigatio prope terram. In utraque fluminis ripa." A most pleasant walk beside the sea, and sailing close to land. On either bank of the river. The latter fragment continues the margin.

[5794] Editor. Bay trees are laurels; "Gundilo" is gondola. Both the fresh translation of the Latin and Burton's additional English gloss are retained. His precise Plutarch passage, Aelian river description and compressed "Simp." reference remain to be collated; the marginal fragments are not expanded into an invented continuous quotation.

[5795] Burton. Printed page 270, †: "Aurei panes, aurea obsonia, vis Margaritarum aceto subacta, &c." Golden loaves, golden dishes of food, a mass of pearls dissolved in vinegar, and so forth.

[5796] Editor. "Tabernacles" here are tent-like or canopied structures. Burton's inventory of Persian magnificence is preserved; the exact passages in Diodorus and Curtius and the marginal pearl anecdote remain uncollated. The quantities in the following margin are source claims, not independently verified figures.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5797]Fulget gemma floris, & jaspide fulva supellex, Strata micant Tyrio——	Jewels glitter on the couches, and furnishings glow with jasper; Coverings gleam with Tyrian purple …[5798]
With sweet odours and perfumes, generous wines, opiparous fare, &c. besides the gallantest young men, the fairest [5799]Virgins, puellæ scitulæ ministrantes, the rarest beauties the world could afford, and those set out with costly and curious attires, ad stuporem usque; spectantium, with exquisite musick, as in [5800]Trimaltions house, in every chamber, sweet voices ever sounding day and night, incomparabilis luxus, all delights and pleasures in each kinde which to please the senses could possibly be devised or had, convivæ coronati, delitiis ebrii, &c.	With sweet scents and perfumes, fine wines, sumptuous food, and so forth; besides the handsomest young men and most beautiful maidens, “pretty girls serving,” the rarest beauties the world could supply, dressed in costly and elaborate clothes “to the astonishment of the spectators”; with exquisite music, as in Trimalchio’s house, sweet voices sounding in every room throughout the day and night: “incomparable luxury,” every delight and pleasure of every kind that could possibly be devised or obtained to please the senses, “guests crowned with garlands, drunk with delights,” and so forth.[5801]
Telemachus in Homer is brought in as one ravished almost, at the sight of that magnificent Palace, and rich furniture of Menelaus, when he beheld	In Homer, Telemachus is presented as almost enraptured by the sight of Menelaus’s magnificent palace and rich furnishings, when he beheld

[5797] Burton. Printed page 270, *: “Lucan.” Lucan; the quotation is from his Civil War.

[5798] Editor. Lucan, Civil War 10.122–123, describes Cleopatra’s banquet. The scan prints floris where the compared Latin text reads toris, “on couches”; the modern rendering follows that sense while preserving floris on the left. The quotation breaks off after Tyrio, “Tyrian”; “purple” supplies the implied dye. Burton applies an Egyptian description within his Persian catalogue.

[5799] Burton. Printed page 270, †: “300 pellices, pocillatores & pincernæ innumeri, pueri loti purpura induti &c. ex omnium pulchritudine delecti.” Three hundred concubines, innumerable cupbearers and wine-stewards, washed boys dressed in purple, and so forth, chosen for their beauty from among all.

[5800] Burton. Printed page 270, *: “Ubi omnia cantu strepunt.” Where everything resounds with song.

[5801] Editor. “Generous” wine is excellent or full-bodied; “opiparous” food is sumptuous. Trimalchio is the extravagant host in Petronius’s Satyricon; Burton prints “Trimaltions.” “Ad stuporem usque; spectantium” is translated as a continuous phrase despite the printed punctuation. The passage draws pleasure from luxurious display without resolving its tension with Burton’s earlier criticism of excess.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5802]Æris fulgorem & resonantia tecta corusco Auro, atque electro nitido, sectoque elephanto, Argentoque simul. Talis Jovis ardua sedes, Aulaque cœlicolûm stellans splendescit Olympo.	The gleam of bronze, and echoing halls bright with flashing Gold, shining electrum, carved ivory, And silver too. Such is Jove's lofty dwelling: The gods' starry palace shines on Olympus.[5803]
Such glittering of gold and brightest brass to shine, Cleer amber, silver pure, and Ivory so fine: Jupiters lofty palace where the Gods do dwell, Was even such a one, and did it not excell.	Such glittering gold and shining brass, Clear amber, pure silver, and fine ivory: Jupiter's lofty palace, where the gods dwell, Was just like this, and did not surpass it.
Source page 270–271 It will laxare animos, refresh the soule of man to see fair-built cities, streets, Theaters, Temples, Obelisks, &c. The Temple of Jerusalem was so fairly built of white marble, with so many pyramids covered with gold; tectumque; templi fulvo coruscans auro, nimio suo fulgore obcæcabat oculos itinerantium, was so glorious, and so glistered afar off, that the spectators might not well abide the sight of it. But the inner parts were all so curiously set out with Cedar, Gold, Jewels, &c. as he said of Cleopatras palace in Egypt,	It will "relax the mind," refresh the human soul, to see finely built cities, streets, theatres, temples, obelisks, and the like. The Temple in Jerusalem was so beautifully built of white marble, with so many gold-covered pyramids —"and the temple's roof, flashing with yellow gold, blinded travellers' eyes with its overpowering brilliance"—that it was glorious and glittered so brightly from afar that spectators could scarcely bear to look at it. Its interior was all so elaborately adorned with cedar, gold, jewels, and so forth, as the poet said of Cleopatra's palace in Egypt:[5804]

[5802] Burton. Printed page 270, *: "Odyss. δ." Odyssey, book 4; the Greek letter delta designates the fourth book.

[5803] Editor. The scene is Odyssey 4.71–75: Telemachus speaks to Peisistratus about Menelaus's splendour. The Latin intermediary is not identified. Electrum can denote amber or a gold-silver alloy; Burton's separate English verse chooses amber. Both his English rendering and a fresh translation of the Latin are retained, with their differing formulations of the comparison to Jupiter's palace.

[5804] Editor. Pyramids here means pointed architectural features, not Egyptian pyramids. Josephus, Jewish War V.5.6, describes a gold-plated exterior dazzling viewers in the sunrise, white surfaces and sharp roof-spikes against birds. Whiston's translation supplies a close parallel, but does not establish the Latin wording, Burton's immediate source, or his interpretation of the roof ornaments. His later marginal Josephus citation belongs to another paragraph and has not been moved here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 271 ——[5805]Crassumque; trabes absconderat aurum,	… And thick gold had hidden the beams.[5806]
That the beholders were amazed. What so pleasant as to see some Pageant or sight go by, as at Coronations, Weddings, and such like solemnities, to see an Embassador or a Prince met, received, entertained with Masks, Shewes, Fireworks, &c.	So that the beholders were astonished. What is so pleasant as seeing a pageant or procession go by, as at coronations, weddings, and similar ceremonies, or seeing an ambassador or prince welcomed, received, and entertained with masques, shows, fireworks, and so forth?[5807]
To see two Kings fight in single combat, as Porus and Alexander; Canutus and Edmond Ironside; Scanderbeg and Ferat Bassa the Turke; when not honour alone but life it self is at stake, as the [5808]Poet of Hector,	To see two kings fight in single combat, like Porus and Alexander, Cnut and Edmund Ironside, or Skanderbeg and Ferat Pasha the Turk, when not honour alone but life itself is at stake, as the poet says of Hector:[5809]
——nec enim pro tergore Tauri, Pro bove nec Certamen erat, quæ præmia Cursus Esse solent, sed pro magni vitâque; animâque; ——Hectoris.	… For the contest was not for a bull's hide, Nor for an ox, the customary prizes of a race, But for great Hector's very life and soul.[5810]

[5805] Burton. Printed page 271, †: "Lucan l. 8." Lucan, book 8; the printed number is retained, though the line occurs in book 10.

[5806] Editor. The line is Lucan, Civil War 10.113, in the description of Cleopatra's palace, not book 8 as the printed margin says. The comparison has been made against the Latin text. This short quotation interrupts a single continuing sentence.

[5807] Editor. Masques are elaborate court entertainments combining performance, costume, music and dance. "Solemnities" here means ceremonial festivities, not necessarily sombre occasions.

[5808] Burton. Printed page 271, †: "Iliad. 10." Iliad, book 10; the printed number is retained, though the episode is in book 22.

[5809] Editor. The purported royal duels are preserved as Burton's examples; their historicity and the Ferat Pasha identification have not been established here. The transition treats mortal combat as a spectacle, a disturbing extension of the discussion of recreation.

[5810] Editor. The passage corresponds to Iliad 22.159–161, when Achilles pursues Hector. The margin's book 10 is erroneous. Burton quotes a Latin rendering rather than Homer's Greek; the modern version translates that Latin, including its separate "life and soul."

Original text 1651	Modern English
To behold a battle fought, like that of Crescy, or Agencourt, or Poictiers, quâ nescio (saith Frossard) an vetustas ullam proferre possit clariorem. To see one of Cæsars triumphs in old Rome revived, or the like.	To watch a battle fought like Crécy, Agincourt, or Poitiers, "than which I do not know," says Froissart, "whether antiquity can produce any more famous." To see one of Caesar's triumphs in ancient Rome revived, or something similar.[5811]
To bee present at an Interview, [5812]as that famous of Henry the 8th, and Francis the first, so much renowned all over Europe; ubi tanto apparatu (saith Hubertus Vellius) tamque triumphali pompâ ambo reges cum eorum conjugibus coiere, ut nulla unquam ætas tam celebria festa viderit aut audierit, no age ever saw the like.	To attend a meeting of sovereigns, like the famous meeting between Henry VIII and Francis I, celebrated throughout Europe, "where the two kings and their wives met with such magnificent preparations," says Hubertus Vellius, "and such triumphant splendour that no age had ever seen or heard of such celebrated festivities": no age ever saw the like.[5813]
So infinitely pleasant are such shews, to the sight of which often times they will come hundreths of miles, give any mony for a place, and remember many years after with singular delight. Bodine, when he was Embassador in England, said he saw the Noblemen go in their Robes to the Parliament house, summâ cum jucunditate vidimus, he was much affected with the sight of it.	Such shows are so immensely enjoyable that people will often come hundreds of miles to see them, pay any price for a place, and remember them many years later with exceptional delight. Bodin, when he was an ambassador in England, said that he saw the noblemen going in their robes to Parliament: "we saw it with the greatest pleasure." The sight moved him deeply.[5814]

[5811] Editor. Crécy, Agincourt and Poitiers are the battles named. Froissart's exact passage and Burton's Latin intermediary remain uncollated; the compressed attribution should not be read as a verified Froissart account of every battle in the list.

[5812] Burton. Printed page 271, g: "Betwixt Ardes and Guines, 1519." Between Ardres and Guînes, 1519. Burton's date is retained; see the editorial note.

[5813] Editor. The meeting is the Field of Cloth of Gold in June 1520, between Ardres and Guînes; the margin prints 1519. The date is checked against Historic Royal Palaces' account. Hubertus Vellius's precise wording and edition remain uncollated. Burton's final English gloss is retained after the Latin is translated.

[5814] Editor. Jean Bodin is meant. Burton's description of his diplomatic role and the exact source of the anecdote remain uncollated. "We saw it with the greatest pleasure" translates the Latin separately from Burton's English amplification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Pomponius Columna, saith Jovius in his life, saw 13. Frenchmen, and so many Italians, once fight for a whole Army: Quod jucundissimum spectaculum in vita dicit suâ, the pleasantest sight that ever he saw in his life. Who would not have been affected with such a spectacle?	Pompeo Colonna, says Giovio in his life of him, once saw thirteen Frenchmen and as many Italians fight on behalf of a whole army: "he calls it the most delightful spectacle of his life," the pleasantest sight he had ever seen. Who would not have been moved by such a spectacle?[5815]
Or that single combat of [5816]Breute the Frenchman, and Anthony Schets a Dutchman before the walls of Sylvaducis in Brabant, Anno 1600. They were 22. Horse on the one side, as many on the other, which like Livies Horatii, Torquati and Corvini fought for their own glory and countries honour, in the sight and view of their whole City and Army.	Or the single combat between Breute the Frenchman and Anthony Schets, a Netherlander, before the walls of 's-Hertogenbosch in Brabant in 1600. There were twenty-two horsemen on each side, who, like Livy's Horatii, Torquati, and Corvini, fought for their own glory and their country's honour in full view of their city and army.[5817]

[5815] Editor. Jovius is Paolo Giovio; Pomponius Columna is Pompeo Colonna. Burton's thirteen-a-side combat and the particular biographical passage remain to be collated. The quoted Latin and Burton's near-repetition in English are both retained.

[5816] Burton. Printed page 271, †: "Swertius in delitiis, fol. 487. veteri Horatiorum exemplo, virtute et successu admirabili, cæsis hostibus 17. in conspectu patriæ, &c." Swertius, in Delights, page or folio 487: after the ancient example of the Horatii, with admirable courage and success, seventeen enemies killed in sight of their homeland, and so forth.

[5817] Editor. "Dutchman" can mean a Netherlander, and Sylvaducis is 's-Hertogenbosch. Burton calls the event "single combat" but immediately describes twenty-two riders on each side. That inconsistency, the year 1600 and the margin's seventeen slain are retained rather than harmonized. Swertius's exact account remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5818]When Julius Cæsar warred about the banks of Rhene, there came a Barbarian Prince to see him, and the Roman Arme, and when he had beheld Cæsar a good while, [5819]I see the Gods now (saith he) which before I heard of, nec feliciorem ullam vitæ meæ aut optavi, aut sensi diem: It was the happiest day that ever he had in his life. Such a sight alone were able of it self to drive away melancholy; if not for ever, yet it must needs expell it for a time.	When Julius Caesar was campaigning along the banks of the Rhine, a barbarian prince came to see him and the Roman army. After gazing at Caesar for a long time, he said, "Now I see the gods of whom I had only heard before; nor have I ever hoped for or experienced a happier day in my life." It was the happiest day he had ever known. Such a sight alone could drive away melancholy; if not for ever, it must at least dispel it for a time.[5820]
Radzivilius was much taken with the Bassas palace in Cairo, and amongst many other objects which that place afforded, with that solemnity of Cutting the bankes of Nilus, by Imbram Bassa when it overflowed; besides two or three hundred guilded Gallies on the water, he saw two millions of men gathered together on the land with Turbants as white as snow; And was a goodly sight.	Radziwiłł was much taken with the pasha's palace in Cairo and, among the many other sights the place offered, with Ibrahim Pasha's ceremony of cutting the banks of the Nile when it flooded. Besides two or three hundred gilded galleys on the water, he saw two million men gathered on land with turbans as white as snow. It was a splendid sight.[5821]

[5818] Burton. Printed page 271, h: "Paterculus vol. post." Paterculus, latter volume; that is, book 2 of Velleius Paterculus's history.

[5819] Burton. Printed page 271, i: "Quos antea audivi, inquit, hodie vidi deos." Today, he said, I have seen the gods of whom I had previously heard.

[5820] Editor. Velleius Paterculus 2.106–107 places this encounter during Tiberius Caesar's campaign at the Elbe, not Julius Caesar's at the Rhine. The visitor is an elderly barbarian whose dress indicates distinction; "prince" is Burton's description. His Latin quotation and separate English summary remain visible. The correction is confined to this note.

[5821] Editor. Radziwiłł's account is presented as a traveller's report. The figures for gilded galleys and spectators, the exact passage, and the circumstances of the Nile ceremony have not been independently established here. "Bassa" means pasha; "guilded" means gilded.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 271–272 The very reading of feasts, triumphs, interviews, nuptials, tilts, turnaments, combats, and monomachies, is most acceptable and pleasant. [5822]Franciscus Modius hath made a large collection of such solemnities in two great Tomes, which who so will may peruse.	Even reading about feasts, triumphs, royal meetings, weddings, jousts, tournaments, combats, and single duels is most welcome and enjoyable. Franciscus Modius has made a large collection of such ceremonies in two great volumes, which anyone who wishes may read.[5823]
Source page 272 The inspection alone of those curious Iconographies of Temples and Palaces, as that of the Lateran Church in Albertus Durer, that of the Temple of Jerusalem in [5824]Josephus, Adricomius, and Villalpandus: that of the Escuriall in Guadas, of Diana at Ephesus in Pliny, Nero's golden palace in Rome, [5825]Justinians in Constantinople, that Peruvian Ingo's in [5826]Cusco, ut non ab hominibus, sed à dæmoniis constructum videatur; S. Marks in Venice by Ignatius, with many such:	Simply looking at those elaborate plans and depictions of temples and palaces—the Lateran church in Albrecht Dürer; the Temple in Jerusalem in Josephus, Adrichomius, and Villalpando; the Escorial in Guadas; the Temple of Diana at Ephesus in Pliny; Nero's Golden Palace in Rome; Justinian's in Constantinople; the Peruvian Inca's in Cusco, "so that it seems to have been built by demons, not by human beings"; St Mark's in Venice, as described by Ignatius; and many others—[5827]

[5822] Burton. Printed page 272, †: "Pandectæ Triumph. fol." Pandects of Triumphs, folio; the title is abbreviated and no page number is supplied.

[5823] Editor. "Interviews" are meetings, particularly of rulers; "monomachies" are single combats. Modius's abbreviated collection title and its two-volume description are retained; the edition and exact contents remain to be checked.

[5824] Burton. Printed page 272, *: "Lib 6. cap: 14. de bello Jud." The Jewish War, book 6, chapter 14; Burton's locator is retained.

[5825] Burton. Printed page 272, †: "Procopius." Procopius; no work or chapter is specified.

[5826] Burton. Printed page 272, *: "Laet. lib. 10. Amer. descript." Laet, Description of America, book 10; abbreviated reference.

[5827] Editor. "Iconographies" here are architectural plans or depictions. Burton's references are highly compressed: Dürer, Guadas, Ignatius, and the stated works have not all been securely matched to particular images or editions. The Josephus locator is retained without claiming a chapter-number reconciliation; Procopius's work is unspecified. The claim about demons belongs to the quoted description, not the editor.

Original text 1651	Modern English
priscorum artificum opera (saith that [5828]interpreter of Pausanias) the rare workmanship of those ancient Greeks, in Theaters, Obelisks, Temples, Statues, gold, silver, Ivory, marble images, non minore fermè quum leguntur, quam quum cernuntur, animum delectatione complent, affect one as much by reading almost, as by sight.	"the works of ancient craftsmen," as that translator of Pausanias says, the extraordinary workmanship of the ancient Greeks in theatres, obelisks, temples, statues, and images of gold, silver, ivory, and marble, "fill the mind with almost as much delight when read about as when seen": they move us almost as much through reading as through sight.[5829]
The Country hath his recreations, the City his severall Gymnicks and exercises, May-games, feasts, wakes, and merry meetings to solace themselves; the very being in the country; that life it self is a sufficient recreation to some men, to injoy such pleasures, as those old Patriarks did. Dioclesian the Emperour was so much affected with it, that he gave over his scepter, and turned gardiner. Constantine wrote 20. books of husbandry. Lysander, when Embassadours came to see him, bragged of nothing more, then of his Orchard, hi sunt ordines mei. What shall I say of Cincinnatus, Cato, Tully, and many such? how have they been pleased with it, to prune, plant, inoculate and graft, to shew so many severall kindes of Pears, Apples, Plums, Peaches, &c.	The countryside has its recreations, and the city its various sports and exercises, May festivities, feasts, wakes, and cheerful gatherings for enjoyment. Simply being in the country, living that life and enjoying its pleasures as the ancient patriarchs did, is recreation enough for some people. The emperor Diocletian was so fond of it that he gave up his sceptre and became a gardener. Constantine wrote twenty books on agriculture. When ambassadors came to see Lysander, he boasted of nothing more than his orchard: "these are my rows." What shall I say of Cincinnatus, Cato, Cicero, and many others? How they delighted in pruning, planting, budding, and grafting, and in displaying so many kinds of pears, apples, plums, peaches, and so forth![5830]

[5828] Burton. Printed page 272, †: "Romulus Amasæus præfat. Pausan." Romolo Amaseo, preface to Pausanias; a reference to the translator's preface.

[5829] Editor. Romulus Amasaeus is Romolo Amaseo, named in Burton's margin as translator of Pausanias. His precise prefatory passage remains uncollated. Burton's English paraphrase of the ancient workmanship and his final English gloss are retained alongside the translated Latin.

[5830] Editor. The anonymous Epitome de Caesaribus 39.5–6 reports Diocletian's retirement and refusal to return to power, invoking vegetables grown by his own hands at Salona. It does not say that gardening caused his abdication. Constantine VII is associated with the twenty-book agricultural compilation Geoponica, not securely its personal author. In Cicero, On Old Age 17.59, Cyrus shows his planted estate to Lysander; Burton instead makes Lysander the owner. These distinctions are explained without changing his account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5831]Nunc captare feras laqueo, nunc fallere visco, Atque etiam magnos canibus circundare saltus, Insidias avibus moliri, incendere vepres.	Now to catch wild beasts in a snare, now to trick them with birdlime, And even surround the great woodland glades with dogs, Lay traps for birds, and set the thorn bushes alight.[5832]
Sometimes with traps deceive, with line and string To catch wild Birds and Beasts, encompassing The grove with dogs, and out of bushes firing.	Sometimes trick them with traps, with line and string Catch wild birds and beasts, surround The grove with dogs, and drive them from bushes with fire.
——& nidos avium scrutari, &c.	… And search out birds' nests, and so forth.
Jucundus in his preface to Cato, Varro, Columella, &c. put out by him, confesseth of himself, that he was mightily delighted with these husbandry studies, and took extraordinary pleasure in them: if the Theorick or speculation can so much affect, what shall the place and exercise it self, the practick part do? The same confession I find in Herbastein, Porta, Camerarius, and many others, which have written of that subject.	Giocondo, in his preface to the works of Cato, Varro, Columella, and others that he edited, admits that he was immensely delighted by these agricultural studies and took extraordinary pleasure in them. If theory or contemplation can move us so much, what must the place and the activity itself, the practical part, do? I find the same admission in Herberstein, Porta, Camerarius, and many others who have written on the subject.[5833]

[5831] Burton. Printed page 272, k: "Virg. 1. Geor." Virgil, Georgics, book 1.

[5832] Editor. Burton combines and adapts material from Georgics 1.139–140 and 1.271. The first two lines rework Virgil's account of the invention of trapping and hunting; the third comes from permitted holiday work. Birdlime is adhesive used to catch birds. His following English version and the additional Latin fragment about nests are retained separately; the nest fragment's exact source is unresolved.

[5833] Editor. "Theorick" and "speculation" mean theoretical study or contemplation, opposed here to practice. Jucundus is Giocondo, the editor named by Burton. The prefatory passage and the references to Herberstein, Porta and Camerarius remain uncollated; "Herbastein" is preserved on the left.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If my testimony were ought worth, I could say as much of my self; I am verè Saturnus; No man ever took more delight in Springs, Woods, Groves, Gardens, Walks, Fishponds, Rivers, &c. But	If my testimony were worth anything, I could say as much of myself: I am "truly Saturn." No one ever took greater delight in springs, woods, groves, gardens, walks, fishponds, rivers, and the like. But—[5834]
Tantalus à labris sitiens fugientia captat Flumina; And so do I; Velle licet, potiri non licet.	Thirsty Tantalus reaches for the waters fleeing From his lips; And so do I. I may desire them, but I may not possess them.[5835]
Source page 272–273 Every Palace, every City almost hath his peculiar Walkes, Cloysters, Tarraces, Groves, Theaters, Pageants, Games, and severall recreations; every country, some professed Gymnicks, to exhilarate their minds, & exercise their bodys. The [5836]Greeks had their Olympian, Pythian, Istmian, Nemean games, in honour of Neptune, Jupiter, Apollo; Athens hers: Some for Honour, Garlands, Crowns; for [5837]beauty, dancing, running leaping, like our silver games.	Almost every palace and every city has its own walks, cloisters, terraces, groves, theatres, pageants, games, and other recreations; every country has established sports to cheer people's minds and exercise their bodies. The Greeks had their Olympic, Pythian, Isthmian, and Nemean games in honour of Neptune, Jupiter, and Apollo; Athens had its own. Some competed for honour, garlands, or crowns, in beauty, dancing, running, and leaping, like our games for silver prizes.[5838]

[5834] Editor. Saturn evokes agriculture as well as the planetary temperament associated with melancholy. The allusion suits both Burton's love of gardens and his recurring self-portrait. "Springs" may mean water sources or young woodland; the context does not settle the sense, so the word is retained.

[5835] Editor. The Tantalus lines are Horace, Satires 1.1.68–69: water recedes when the thirsty figure tries to drink. Burton turns the image into his own frustrated desire for these pleasures. "And so do I" and the final Latin maxim are distinct parts of his comment, not additional lines by Horace; the maxim's source remains unresolved.

[5836] Burton. Printed page 272, l: "Boterus lib. 3. polit. cap 1." Botero, Politics, book 3, chapter 1; Burton's abbreviated title and locator are retained.

[5837] Burton. Printed page 273, m: "See Athenæus dipnoso." See Athenaeus, Deipnosophistae, or The Learned Banqueters; no precise locator is supplied.

[5838] Editor. "Gymnicks" are organized athletic exercises; "silver games" appears to mean contests for silver prizes. The list of gods is not a one-to-one pairing with the preceding list of festivals. The exact Botero and Athenaeus passages remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 273 The [5839]Romanes had their feasts, as the Athenians, and Lacedæmonians had their publike banquets, in Pritanæo, Panatheneis, Thesperiis, Phiditiis, Playes, Naumachies, places for Sea fights, [5840]Theaters, Amphitheaters able to contain 70000 men, wherein they had severall delightsome shews to exhilarate the people; [5841]Gladiators, cumbats of men with themselves, with wild beasts, and wild beasts one with another, like our bull-baitings, or bear-baitings (in which many countrymen and Citizens amongst us so much delight and so frequently use) dancers on ropes, Juglers, Wrestlers, Comedies, Tragedies, publikely exhibited at the Emperours and Cities Charge, and that with incredible cost and magnificence.	The Romans had their feasts, as the Athenians and Spartans had their public banquets in the Prytaneum, at the Panathenaea, Thesperia, and Phiditia; plays; naumachiae, places for naval battles; theatres; and amphitheatres capable of holding seventy thousand people. There they presented various entertaining spectacles to cheer the people: gladiators; fights between men, between men and wild beasts, and between beasts themselves, like our bull-baiting and bear-baiting, which many country people and townspeople among us enjoy so much and so often attend; rope-dancers, jugglers, wrestlers, comedies, and tragedies, publicly presented at the emperor's and the city's expense, with incredible cost and magnificence.[5842]

[5839] Burton. Printed page 273, n: "Ludi votivi, sacri, ludicri, Megalenses, Cereales, Florales, Martiales, &c. Rosinus, 5. 12." Votive, sacred, and recreational games; the Megalensian, Cerealian, Floralian, and martial games, and so forth. Rosinus, book 5, chapter 12.

[5840] Burton. Printed page 273, o: "See Lipsius Amphitheatrum Rosinus lib. 5. Meursius de ludis Græcorum." See Lipsius, The Amphitheatre; Rosinus, book 5; and Meursius, On the Games of the Greeks.

[5841] Burton. Printed page 273, p: "1500 Men at once, Tigers, Lions, Elephants, Horses, Dogs, Beares, &c." Already English: fifteen hundred men at once, with tigers, lions, elephants, horses, dogs, bears, and so forth.

[5842] Editor. The passage compresses civic dining places, festivals and communal meals into one list. The uncertain printed "Thesperiis" is retained in the modern form Thesperia rather than silently replaced. "Naumachies" are staged naval combats and their venues. The seventy-thousand capacity and fifteen-hundred combatants are Burton's reported figures. Rosinus, Lipsius and Meursius are cited as authorities, but their exact passages have not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In the Low Countries (as [5843]Meteran relates) before these wars, they had many solemn feasts, Playes, Challenges, Artillery Gardens, Colledges of Rimers, Rhetoricians, Poets: and to this day, such places are curiously maintained in Amsterdam, as appears by that description of Isaacus Pontanus rerum Amstelod. lib. 2. cap. 25. So likewise not long since at Friburg in Germany, as is evident by that relation of [5844]Neander, they had Ludos septennales, solemn Playes every seven years, which Bocerus one of their own Poets hath elegantly described:	In the Low Countries, as Van Meteren relates, before these wars they had many ceremonial feasts, plays, challenges, grounds for shooting practice, and associations of versifiers, rhetoricians, and poets. Such institutions are still carefully maintained in Amsterdam, as appears from Isaac Pontanus's description in his History of Amsterdam, book 2, chapter 25. Likewise, not long ago at Friburg in Germany, as Neander's account shows, they had "seven-year games," ceremonial performances every seven years, which Bocerus, one of their own poets, elegantly described:[5845]
At nunc magnifico spectacula structa paratu Quid memorem, veteri non concessura Quirino, Ludorum pompa. &c.	But why should I now recount the spectacles mounted with magnificent preparations, The splendour of games that would not yield To ancient Quirinus? And so forth.[5846]
In Italy they have solemn Declamations of certain select young Gentlemen in Florence (like those Reciters in old Rome) and publick Theaters in most of their Cities, for Stage-players and others, to exercise and recreate themselves.	In Italy they have formal declamations by selected young gentlemen in Florence, like those reciters in ancient Rome, and public theatres in most of their cities, where actors and others can practise and enjoy themselves.

[5843] Burton. Printed page 273, q: "Lib. ult et l. 1. ad finem. Consuetudine non minus laudabili, quam veteri contubernia Rhetorum Rythmorum in urbibus et municipiis, certisque diebus exercebant se sagittarii, gladiatores, &c. Alia ingenii, animique exercitia, quorum præcipuum studium, principem populum tragœdiis, comœdiis, fabulis scenicis, aliisque id genus ludis recreare," Last book and the end of book 1. By a custom as praiseworthy as it was ancient, associations of rhetoricians and versifiers in cities and towns; on appointed days archers, swordsmen, and others practised. Other exercises of talent and mind, whose chief purpose was to entertain the prince and the people with tragedies, comedies, stage plays, and other games of that kind. The printed Latin is compressed and syntactically incomplete.

[5844] Burton. Printed page 273, r: "Orbis terræ descript. part. 3." Description of the World, part 3.

[5845] Editor. The Low Countries' "wars" are left in Burton's historical frame. "Artillery Gardens" are grounds for weapons practice; the "colleges" are associations, not modern universities. The long Van Meteren margin supplies the civic and dramatic setting, but its Latin is compressed. The exact Pontanus passage, the identification of Friburg and the Neander/Bocerus festival account remain unresolved.

[5846] Editor. Quirinus is the name of the deified Romulus, here evoking ancient Rome. The Latin compares the modern festivities with Roman magnificence. Burton's source and the verse's wider context have not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All seasons almost, all places have their severall pastimes; some in Sommer, some in Winter; some abroad, some within; some of the body, some of the minde; and divers men have divers recreations, and exercises.	Almost every season and every place has its own pastimes: some in summer, some in winter; some outdoors, some indoors; some for the body, some for the mind. Different people have different recreations and exercises.
Domitian the Emperour was much delighted with catching flies; Augustus to play with nuts amongst children; [5847]Alexander Severus was often pleased to play with whelps and young Pigs. [5848]Adrian was so wholy enamoured with dogs and horses, that he bestowed monuments and tombes of them, and buried them in graves.	The emperor Domitian took great delight in catching flies; Augustus in playing games with nuts among children; Alexander Severus was often pleased to play with puppies and piglets. Hadrian was so thoroughly devoted to dogs and horses that he gave them monuments and tombs and buried them in graves.[5849]

[5847] Burton. Printed page 273, s: “Lampridius.” Lampridius, the name under which the Life of Alexander Severus in the Historia Augusta is transmitted.

[5848] Burton. Printed page 273, t: “Spartian.” Spartianus, the name under which the Life of Hadrian in the Historia Augusta is transmitted.

[5849] Editor. Suetonius, Domitian 3, reports catching flies and piercing them with a sharpened stylus; Burton omits the piercing. Augustus 83 describes games with small children, including nuts, for mental relaxation. Both Latin passages have been compared. The Historia Augusta, Hadrian 20.12, reports tombs for horses and dogs; Alexander Severus 41.5 describes watching puppies play with piglets, not necessarily playing with them himself. Those biographies are transmitted under the names Spartianus and Lampridius.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In fowle weather, or when they can use no other convenient sports, by reason of the time, as we do Cock-fighting to avoide idleness I think, (though some be more seriously taken with it, spend much time, cost and charges, and are too solicitous about it) [5850]Severus used Partridges and Quailes, as many Frenchmen do still, and to keep Birds in cages, with which he was much pleased, when at any time he had leasure from publike cares and business. He had (saith Lampridius) tame Pheasants, Ducks, Partridges, Peacocks, and some 20000 Ringdoves and Pigeons.	In bad weather, or when the season prevents other suitable sports, we use cock-fighting, I suppose to avoid idleness, though some take it more seriously, spend much time and money on it, and become too absorbed in it. Severus used partridges and quails, as many Frenchmen still do, and kept caged birds, which pleased him greatly whenever he had leisure from public cares and business. He had, says Lampridius, tame pheasants, ducks, partridges, peacocks, and some twenty thousand ringdoves and pigeons.[5851]
Busbequius the Emperors Orator, when he lay in Constantinople, & could not stir much abroad, kept for his recreation, busying himself to see them fed, almost all manner of strange birds and Beasts; this was something, though not to exercise his body, yet to refresh his minde. Conradus Gesner, at Zurick in Switzerland, kept so likewise for his pleasure, a great company of wilde beasts, and (as he saith) took great delight to see them eat their meat.	Busbecq, the emperor's ambassador, while staying in Constantinople and unable to go out much, kept almost every kind of exotic bird and beast for recreation, occupying himself by watching them being fed. This served some purpose: though it did not exercise his body, it refreshed his mind. Conrad Gesner at Zurich in Switzerland likewise kept many wild animals for his pleasure and, as he says, greatly enjoyed watching them eat their food.[5852]

[5850] Burton. Printed page 273, u: "Delectatus lusis catulorum, porcellorum, ut perdices inter se pugnarent, aut ut aves parvulæ sursum & deorsum volitarent, his maxime delectatus, ut solitudines publicas sublevaret." Delighted by the play of puppies and piglets, by partridges fighting one another, or by little birds flying up and down; he took particular delight in these things to relieve his public solitude. The scan reads solitudines; the corresponding source describes relief from public cares.

[5851] Editor. The same Life of Alexander Severus 41.5–7 describes partridge fights, birds flying, aviaries and twenty thousand doves. Burton adds quails in his body text. The margin reads solitudines publicas, literally "public solitudes," where the sense of the source is relief from public cares; that form is retained and flagged. "Severus" here continues to mean Alexander Severus.

[5852] Editor. "Orator" means ambassador: Busbecq represents the emperor at Constantinople. "Meat" means food generally. The exact Busbecq and Gesner passages remain uncollated; the point of Burton's distinction is mental refreshment without bodily exertion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 273–274 Turkie Gentlewomen, that are perpetuall prisones, still mewed up according to the custome of the place, have little else besides their houshold business, or to play with their children to drive away time, but to dally with their cats, which they have in delitiis, as many of our Ladies and Gentlewomen use Monkies and little Dogs.	Turkish gentlewomen, who are perpetual prisoners, always shut away according to the country's custom, have little besides household business or playing with their children to pass the time, except to play with their cats, which they keep "as favourites," just as many of our ladies and gentlewomen keep monkeys and little dogs.[5853]
Source page 274 The ordinary recreations which we have in Winter, and in most solitary times busie our minds with, are Cardes, Tables and Dice, Shovelboard, Chesse-play, the Philosophers game, small trunks, shuttle-cock, balliards, musick, masks, singing, dancing, ulegames, frolicks, jests, riddles, catches, purposes, questions and commands, [5854]merry tales of errant Kings, Queens, Lovers, Lords, Ladies, Giants, Dwarfes, Theeves, Cheaters, Witches, Fayries, Goblins, Friers, &c.	Our usual winter recreations, with which we occupy our minds in our most solitary hours, are cards, backgammon, dice, shove-board, chess, the Philosophers' Game, small trunks, shuttlecock, billiards, music, masques, singing, dancing, Christmas games, frolics, jokes, riddles, catches, games of purposes, questions and commands, and merry tales of wandering kings, queens, lovers, lords, ladies, giants, dwarfs, thieves, swindlers, witches, fairies, goblins, friars, and so forth.[5855]

[5853] Editor. The printed "prisones" is retained on the left and rendered "prisoners." The sweeping portrayal of Turkish women is Burton's culturally situated assertion, not an independently established account of all Ottoman households. "Mewed up" means confined; the Latin means pets or favourites.

[5854] Burton. Printed page 274, x: "Brumales læte ut possit producere noctes." So that he may pleasantly prolong the winter nights.

[5855] Editor. "Tables" is a backgammon-related game; shovelboard is an early form of shove-board. The Philosophers' Game is rithmomachia, a numerical board game, identified through the Folger catalogue. "Ulegames" means Yule or Christmas games. "Catches" may include rounds or verbal tricks; "purposes" and "questions and commands" are social word games. Their detailed rules and the exact form of "small trunks" remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
such as the old woman told Psyche in [5856]Apuleius, Bocace Novels, and the rest, quarum auditione pueri delectantur, senes narratione, which some delight to hear, some to tell; all are well pleased with.	Such are the stories the old woman told Psyche in Apuleius, Boccaccio's tales, and the rest, "which children enjoy hearing and old people telling": some delight in hearing them, others in telling them; everyone is pleased with them.[5857]
Amaranthus the Philosopher, met Hermocles, Diophantus and Philolaus his companions, one day busily discoursing about Epicurus and Democritus Tenents, very solicitous which was most probable and came nearest to truth: To put them out of that surly controversie, and to refresh their spirits, he told them a pleasant tale of Stratocles the Physitians wedding, and of all the particulars, the company, the chear, the musick, &c. for he was new come from it; with which relation they were so much delighted, that Philolaus wished a blessing to his heart, and many a good wedding, [5858]many such merry meetings might he be at, to please himself with the sight, and others with the narration of it.	One day the philosopher Amaranthus met his companions Hermocles, Diophantus, and Philolaus busily discussing the doctrines of Epicurus and Democritus, anxiously debating which was more plausible and nearer the truth. To draw them away from that ill-tempered controversy and refresh their spirits, he told them an amusing story about the physician Stratocles's wedding, which he had just attended, with all its details: the company, food, music, and so forth. They were so delighted by his account that Philolaus blessed his heart and wished him many a good wedding and many such cheerful gatherings, so that he might please himself by seeing them and others by telling them about it.[5859]

[5856] Burton. Printed page 274, †: "Miles. 4." Milesian tales, book 4; a reference to Apuleius's Metamorphoses, also known as The Golden Ass.

[5857] Editor. In Apuleius, Metamorphoses 4.27–28, the old woman tells the story of Cupid and Psyche to a captive young woman; Psyche is the subject, not the listener. The frame is checked in Adlington's historical translation. Boccaccio's tales are named without particular titles. Burton's Latin and its less age-specific English gloss are both retained.

[5858] Burton. Printed page 274, †: "O dii similibus sæpe conviviis date ut ipse videndo delectetur, & postmodum narrando delectet. Theod. prodromus Amorum dial. interpret. Gilberto Gaulmino." O gods, grant that he may often delight himself by seeing such banquets, and afterwards delight others by telling of them. Theodore Prodromus, dialogue of loves, translated by Gilbert Gaulmin. The title is abbreviated.

[5859] Editor. The margin attributes the scene to a dialogue by Theodore Prodromus in Gilbert Gaulmin's translation. It is a literary example of storytelling's restorative effect; the precise edition and dialogue passage remain uncollated. "Tenents" means doctrines; "chear" means the food or entertainment provided.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Newes are generally welcome to all our ears, avidè audimus, aures enim hominum novitate lætantur ([5860]as Pliny observes) we long after rumour to hear and listen to it, [5861]densum humeris bibit aure vulgus.	News is generally welcome to all our ears: "we listen eagerly, for people's ears delight in novelty," as Pliny observes. We crave reports, eager to hear and listen to them: "the crowd, packed shoulder to shoulder, drinks it in with its ears."[5862]
We are most part too inquisitive and apt to hearken after newes, which Cæsar in his [5863]Commentaries observes of the old Gaules, they would be enquiring of every Carrier and passenger what they had heard or seen, what newes abroad?	Most of us are too inquisitive and eager for news. Caesar remarks in his Commentaries that the ancient Gauls would question every carrier and traveller about what they had heard or seen, and what news there was from abroad:[5864]
——quid toto fiat in orbe, Quid Seres, quid Thraces agant, secreta novercæ, Et pueri, quis amet, &c.	… What is happening throughout the world, What the Chinese and Thracians are doing, the secrets of a stepmother And her boy, who is in love, and so forth.[5865]

[5860] Burton. Printed page 274, *: "Epist. lib. 8. Ruffino." Letters, book 8, to Rufinus.

[5861] Burton. Printed page 274, †: "Hor." Horace; the line is from Odes 2.13.

[5862] Editor. Pliny, Letters 8.18.12 to Rufinus, says that people's ears delight in novelty, then adds that examples teach us how to live. Horace, Odes 2.13.29–32, describes the dead listening to poetry in the underworld; Burton reuses its crowded audience as an image for news-hunger. Both passages have been compared with the Latin.

[5863] Burton. Printed page 274, *: "Lib 4 Gallicæ consuetudinis est ut viatores etiam invitos consistere cogant, & quid quisque eorum audierit aut cognôrit de quâ re quærunt." Book 4. It is the custom of the Gauls to compel travellers to stop even against their will, and to ask what each has heard or learned about any matter.

[5864] Editor. Caesar, Gallic War 4.5.2–3, describes questioning travellers and merchants, then criticizes decisions made on unreliable rumours. Burton preserves the appetite for information while abbreviating that political warning. The marginal Latin is a shortened form of Caesar's account.

[5865] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.402–404, describes a woman versed in foreign affairs and sexual gossip. Burton excerpts it to illustrate general curiosity. Seres conventionally designates the distant silk-producing people of the East, rendered here as Chinese. The secrets of the stepmother and boy carry the sexual insinuation of the original passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as at an ordinary with us, bakehouse or barbers shop. When that great Gonsalva was upon some displeasure confined by king Ferdinand, to the City of Loxa in Andalusia, the onely comfort (saith [5866]Jovius) he had to ease his melancholy thoughts, was to hear newes, and to listen after those ordinary occurrents, which were brought him cum primis, by letters or otherwise out of the remotest parts of Europe.	Just as at a public dining-house, bakery, or barber's shop among us. When the great Gonzalo, having incurred King Ferdinand's displeasure, was confined to the city of Loja in Andalusia, his only comfort for easing his melancholy thoughts, says Giovio, was to hear news and follow everyday events, reports of which were brought to him "among the first," by letter or otherwise, from the remotest parts of Europe.[5867]
Some mens whole delight is, to take Tobacco, and drink all day long in a Tavern or Alehouse, to discourse, sing, jest, roare, talk of a Cock and Bull over a pot, &c. Or when three or four good companions meet, tell old stories by the fire side, or in the Sun, as old folks usually do, [5868]quæ aprici meminere senes; remembring afresh and with pleasure ancient matters, and such like accidents, which happened in their younger yeares: Others best pastime is to game, nothing to them so pleasant.	Some people's entire delight is to smoke tobacco and drink all day in a tavern or alehouse, talking, singing, joking, shouting, and telling cock-and-bull stories over a drink. Or, when three or four good companions meet, they tell old stories by the fireside or in the sunshine, as old people generally do, "things old men remember as they sit in the sun," recalling with fresh pleasure old affairs and events that happened in their younger days. Other people's favourite pastime is gambling; nothing pleases them so much.[5869]
Hic Veneri indulget, hunc decoquit alea——	One indulges in love; another is ruined by dice …[5870]

[5866] Burton. Printed page 274, *: "Vitæ ejus lib. ult." Last book of his life; Giovio's biography of Gonzalo is meant.

[5867] Editor. An "ordinary" is a public dining-house. Gonsalva is Gonzalo Fernández de Córdoba; Loxa is Loja. Burton's account of confinement, Giovio's precise passage, and the priority implied by cum primis remain to be collated; the latter is rendered "among the first," not given a more definite historical claim.

[5868] Burton. Printed page 274, †: "Juven." Juvenal; the attribution is retained, though the phrase recalls Persius.

[5869] Editor. The marginal attribution is Juvenal, but the sun-warmed old men recall Persius, Satire 5.179, where they are to remember public games. Burton adapts that phrase to reminiscence. "Cock and Bull" is idle or fanciful talk, not an identified tale. His catalogue now turns toward the dangers of gambling.

[5870] Editor. An adaptation of Persius, Satire 5.58–59: the compared text has one man devoted to the sports-ground, another ruined by dice, another wasting away in love. Burton compresses and rearranges these alternatives. Decoquit conveys being ruined or bankrupted. The discussion next turns to objections to games.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 274–275 Many too nicely take exceptions at Cardes, [5871]Tables, and Dice, and such mixt lusorious lots, whom Gataker well confutes. Which though they be honest recreations in themselves, yet may justly be otherwise excepted at, as they are often abused, and forbidden as things most pernicious; insanam rem & damnosam, [5872]Lemnius calls it. For most part in these kind of disports 'tis not art or skill, but subtilty, cunnycatching, knavery, chance and fortune carries all away: 'tis ambulatoria pecunia,	Many people object too scrupulously to cards, backgammon, dice, and other games combining skill and chance; Gataker refutes them well. Although these are innocent recreations in themselves, there may nevertheless be good grounds for objecting to them when they are abused, as they often are, and for forbidding them as most harmful things. Lemnius calls gaming "a mad and ruinous business." For in most pastimes of this kind, it is not art or skill that carries everything off, but cunning, swindling, dishonesty, chance, and luck: it is "money on the move"—[5873]
Source page 275 ——puncto mobilis horæ Permutat dominos, & cedit in altera jura.	… In a moment of the shifting hour It changes owners and passes under another's rights.[5874]

[5871] Burton. Printed page 274, y: "They account them unlawfull because sortilegious." Already English: they consider these games unlawful because they involve drawing lots, associated here with divination.

[5872] Burton. Printed page 275, z: "Instit. c. 44. In his ludis plerumque non ars aut peritia viget, sed fraus, fallacia, dolus, astutia, casus, fortuna, temeritas locum habent, non ratio, consilium, sapientia. &c." Institutions, chapter 44. In these games, for the most part, art or skill does not prevail; fraud, deception, trickery, cunning, chance, fortune, and rashness have their place, not reason, judgement, or wisdom, and so forth. The work title is abbreviated.

[5873] Editor. "Nicely" means too scrupulously; "tables" denotes backgammon or a related game. Lusorious lots are chance procedures used in games, distinguished from divination. Burton invokes Thomas Gataker's defence of recreational lots; the Folger catalogue records his 1623 Just Defence and its relation to Of the Nature and Use of Lots. "Cunnycatching" is swindling. Lemnius's abbreviated chapter reference remains uncollated.

[5874] Editor. Horace, Epistles 2.2.172–175, compressed and grammatically adjusted. Horace lists entreaty, purchase, force and death as ways property changes hands; Burton applies the image to gambling money. The omitted middle line is not supplied in either column.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They labour most part not to pass their time in honest disport, but for filthy lucre, and covetousness of money. In fœdissimum lucrum & avaritiam hominum convertitur, as Daneus observes. Fons fraudum & maleficiorum, 'tis the fountain of cosenage and villany. [5875]A thing so common all over Europe at this day, and so generally abused, that many men are utterly undone by it, their means spent, patrimonies consumed, they and their posterity beggered; besides swearing, wrangling, drinking, loss of time, and such inconveniences, which are ordinary concomitants:	For the most part, they strive not to pass the time in innocent recreation, but for filthy profit and from greed for money. "It is turned to the foulest gain and human avarice," as Daneau observes. "The source of frauds and crimes": it is the fountain of cheating and villainy. Gaming is now so common throughout Europe, and so widely abused, that many people are utterly ruined by it: their resources spent, their inheritances consumed, themselves and their descendants reduced to poverty. Besides these come swearing, quarrelling, drinking, wasted time, and the other troubles that usually accompany it.[5876]
[5877]For when once they have got a haunt of such companies, and habit of gaming, they can hardly be drawn from it, but as an itch it will tickle them, and as it is with whoremasters, once entered, they cannot easily leave it off; Vexat mentes insana cupido, they are mad upon their sport.	For once they have become accustomed to such company and acquired the habit of gambling, they can scarcely be drawn away from it. It keeps teasing them like an itch; as with men who frequent prostitutes, once they begin, they cannot easily stop. "A mad desire torments their minds": they are crazed about their pastime.[5878]

[5875] Burton. Printed page 275, a: "Abusus tam frequens hodie in Europa ut plerique crebro harum usu patrimonium profundant, exhaustisque facultatibus, ad inopiam redigantur." The abuse is now so frequent in Europe that many people squander their inheritance through habitual use of these games and, their resources exhausted, are reduced to poverty.

[5876] Editor. "Daneus" is Lambert Daneau. "Cosenage" means cheating; "patrimony" is inherited property. The Latin and Burton's following English explanation are both retained. The exact Daneau work and the sources of the two adjoining marginal passages remain to be collated.

[5877] Burton. Printed page 275, b: "Ubi semel prurigo ista animum occupat ægre discuti potest, solicitantibus undique ejusdem farinæ hominibus, damnosas illas voluptates repetunt, quod & scortatoribus insitum, &c." Once that itch possesses the mind, it can scarcely be shaken off. Urged on from every side by people of the same stamp, they return to those ruinous pleasures, a disposition also ingrained in frequenters of prostitutes, and so forth.

[5878] Editor. "Haunt" means habitual resort to company, not a ghost. The itch metaphor describes persistent craving. The Latin sentence is translated separately from Burton's English restatement; its precise source is unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And in conclusion (which Charles the seventh that good French King published in an edict against gamesters) undè piæ & hilaris vitæ suffugium sibi suisque liberis, totique familiæ, &c. That which was once their livelihood, should have maintained wife, Children, family, is now spent and gone; mœror & egestas, &c. sorrow and beggery succeeds.	In the end—as Charles VII, that good French king, declared in an edict against gamblers —"from which came the support of a dutiful and cheerful life for themselves, their children, and their whole household," and so forth: what was once their livelihood, which should have maintained wife, children, and family, is now spent and gone. "Grief and want," and so forth: sorrow and poverty follow.[5879]
So good things may be abused, and that which was first invented to [5880]refresh mens weary spirits, when they come from other labours and studies to exhilarate the minde, to entertain time and company, tedious otherwise in those long solitary winter nights, and keep them from worse matters, an honest exercise is contrarily perverted.	Good things can thus be abused. What was first devised to refresh people's weary spirits after other labours and studies, to cheer the mind, to pass the time and entertain company—which would otherwise grow tedious on those long, lonely winter nights—and to keep people from worse things, is turned against its purpose: an innocent recreation is perverted.

[5879] Editor. The quoted edict is attributed to Charles VII of France. Burton's Latin is a fragment, with its antecedent and continuation omitted; the translation leaves that incompleteness visible. The edict and its exact wording have not been independently located, and Burton's attribution is retained without authentication.

[5880] Burton. Printed page 275, c: "Instituitur ipsa exercitatio, non lucri, sed valetudinis et oblectamenti ratione, & quo animus defatigatus respiret, novasque vires ad subeundos labores denuo concipiat." The exercise itself is instituted for health and enjoyment, not profit, so that the tired mind may breathe again and gather new strength for undertaking its labours afresh.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Chesse-play, is a good and witty exercise of the minde, for some kinde of men, and fit for such melancholy, Rhasis holds, as are idle, and have extravagant impertinent thoughts, or troubled with cares; nothing better to distract their mind, and alter their meditations: [5881]invented (some say) by the generall of an army in a famine, to keep souldiers from mutiny:	Chess is a good and ingenious exercise of the mind for certain people, and, Rhazes holds, suits those melancholy people who are idle, whose thoughts wander into irrelevant matters, or who are troubled by cares. Nothing better diverts their minds and changes the course of their thinking. Some say it was invented by an army commander during a famine, to keep his soldiers from mutiny.[5882]
but if it proceed from over much study, in such a case it may do more harm then good; it is a game too troublesome for some mens braines, too full of anxiety, all out as bad as study; besides, it is a testy cholerick game, and very offensive to him that loseth the Mate.	But if melancholy comes from too much study, chess may do more harm than good. For some people's brains it is too taxing, too full of anxiety, every bit as bad as study. Besides, it is an irritable, anger-provoking game, deeply vexing to the player who is checkmated.[5883]

[5881] Burton. Printed page 275, †: "Latrunculorum ludus inventus est à duce, ut cum miles intolerabili fame laboraret, altero die edens altero ludens, famis oblivisceretur. Bellonius. See more of this game in Daniel Souters Palamedes, vel de variis ludis l. 3." The game of pieces was invented by a commander so that, when a soldier suffered unbearable hunger, he might forget it by eating one day and playing the next. Bellonius. See more in Daniel Souter's Palamedes, or On Various Games, book 3. The reference continues along the page foot.

[5882] Editor. "Rhasis" is Rhazes; "impertinent" means irrelevant, not impolite. The anonymous commander and famine story is transmitted as an origin legend, not established chess history. Latrunculi literally names a game of pieces or little soldiers; identifying every ancient use with modern chess would be unsafe. Bellonius and Souter are Burton's cited authorities, not independent confirmation here.

[5883] Editor. "It" means melancholy: the proposed recreation depends on its cause. "Cholerick" means anger-provoking here, with the background association of choler and anger. "Loseth the Mate" refers to being defeated by checkmate. This preserves Burton's distinction between mental diversion and further exhausting concentration.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5884]William the conqueror in his younger years, playing at chesse with the prince of France (Dauphine was not annexed to that crown in those days) losing a Mate, knocked the Chesse-board about his pate, which was a cause afterward of much enmity betwixt them. For some such reason it is belike, that Patritius in his 3. book Tit. 12. de reg instit. forbids his prince to play at chesse: hawking and hunting, riding, &c. he will allow; and this to other men, but by no means to him.	In his youth, William the Conqueror, playing chess with the prince of France—Dauphiné had not yet been annexed to that crown—was checkmated and struck the prince about the head with the chessboard. This later caused much hostility between them. It is probably for some such reason that Patrizi, in book 3, title 12 of On the Education of a King, forbids his prince to play chess. He allows hawking, hunting, riding, and so forth; and he allows chess to other men, but on no account to the prince.[5885]
Source page 275–276 In Muscovy, where they live in Stoves and hot houses all winter long, come seldome or little abroad, it is again very necessary, and therefore in those parts (saith [5886]Herbastein) much used. At Fessa in Africk, where the like inconvenience of keeping within doors is through heat, it is very laudable; and (as [5887]Leo Afer relates) as much frequented.	In Muscovy, where people live in heated rooms and houses all winter and seldom go outdoors, chess is, on the other hand, very necessary; hence, says Herberstein, it is much played there. At Fez in Africa, where heat similarly obliges people to stay indoors, it is highly commendable and, according to Leo Africanus, just as widely played.[5888]

[5884] Burton. Printed page 275, d: “D. Hayward in vita ejus.” D. Hayward, in his life; a reference to Hayward’s account of William the Conqueror.

[5885] Editor. Burton cites Hayward for the chessboard story, but no page. The anecdote and the precise Patrizi passage remain uncollated. His parenthesis refers to Dauphiné, the territory associated with the later French royal title Dauphin; it is retained as Burton’s historical explanation. “Pate” means head.

[5886] Burton. Printed page 275, e: “Moscovit. commentarium.” Commentary on Muscovy; abbreviated reference to Herberstein.

[5887] Burton. Printed page 276, f: “Inter cives Fessanos latrunculorum ludus est usitatissimus lib. 3. de Africâ.” Among the citizens of Fez, the game of pieces is very widely played. On Africa, book 3.

[5888] Editor. “Stoves” means heated rooms, not that people lived inside cooking appliances. “Fessa” is Fez; “Leo Afer” is Leo Africanus. The Muscovite and North African accounts are Burton’s reported examples. Their precise passages and editions have not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 276 A sport fit for idle Gentlewomen, Souldiers in Garrison, and Courtiers that have nought but love matters to busie themselves about, but not altogether so convenient for such as are Students. The like I may say of Cl. Bruxers Philosophy game, D. Fulkes Metromachia and his Ouronomachia, with the rest of those intricate Astrologicall and Geometricall fictions, for such especially as are mathematically given; and the rest of those curious games.	It is a suitable pastime for gentlewomen with nothing to do, soldiers in garrison, and courtiers who have nothing but love affairs to occupy them, though not altogether so suitable for students. I may say the same of Cl. Bruxer's Philosophers' Game, Dr Fulke's Metromachia and his Ouronomachia, and the other intricate astrological and geometrical inventions, especially for those with mathematical interests, along with the rest of those elaborate games.[5889]
Dancing, Singing, Masking, Mumming, Stage-plaies, howsoever they be heavily censured by some severe Catoes, yet if opportunely and soberly used, may justly be approved. Melius est fodere, quam saltare, saith Austin: but what is that if they delight in it? [5890]Nemo saltat sobrius. But in what kinde of dance?	Dancing, singing, masques, mumming, and stage plays, however harshly some stern Catos condemn them, may rightly be approved when enjoyed at a proper time and in moderation. "It is better to dig than to dance," says Augustine; but what does that matter if people enjoy dancing? "No one dances sober." But what kind of dance are we talking about?[5891]

[5889] Editor. Cl. Bruxer remains as printed pending secure identification. Folger records identify Fulke's Metromachia as a geometrical game and Ouranomachia as the Astrologers' Game; Burton prints Ouronomachia. In the latter's introduction, compared in the Utah State Latin Lab translation of the 1571 publication, Fulke says he follows an unnamed earlier writer, supplying lost portions and adding rules. Thus publication under his name does not mean invention of the whole game. Burton's editions and the exact Metromachia authorship history remain unverified.

[5890] Burton. Printed page 276, g: "Tullius." Tullius: Marcus Tullius Cicero.

[5891] Editor. Catos are proverbial stern moral judges; masques and mumming involve performance or disguise. Augustine, Expositions of the Psalms 32, exposition II, sermon 1, section 6, says digging all day would be better than dancing all day, while condemning misuse of Sabbath leisure. Burton abridges that particular comparison into a general maxim. Cicero, For Murena 13, says almost no one dances sober unless mad, while defending Murena against dissipation. Burton shortens both authorities in challenging blanket disapproval of dance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I know these sports have many oppugners, whose volumes writ against them; when as all they say (if duly considered) is but ignoratio Elenchi; and some again, because they are now old and wayward, past themselves, cavel at all such youthful sports in others, as he did in the comedy; they think them, illico nasci senes, &c.	I know these pastimes have many opponents, with volumes written against them, though everything they say, properly considered, merely misses the point. Others, now old, stubborn, and past such pleasures themselves, find fault with every youthful pastime in other people, like the man in the comedy: they expect them "to be born old men at once," and so forth.[5892]
Some out of preposterous zeal object many times triviall arguments, and because of some abuse, will quite take away the good use, as if they should forbid wine, because it makes men drunk: but in my judgement they are too stern: there is a time for all things, a time to mourne, a time to dance. Eccles. 3. 4. a time to embrace, a time not to embrace, (vers. 5) and nothing better then that a man should rejoyce in his own works. vers. 22.	Some, in their misguided zeal, frequently raise trivial objections and would abolish a thing's good use because it is sometimes abused—as though they should forbid wine because it makes people drunk. In my judgement, they are too stern. There is a time for everything: "a time to mourn, a time to dance," Ecclesiastes 3:4; "a time to embrace, a time not to embrace," verse 5; and "nothing better than that a person should rejoice in their own works," verse 22.[5893]
for my part, I will subscribe to the kings declaration, and was ever of that mind, those May-games, Wakes, and Whitson-ales, &c. if they be not at unseasonable hours, may justly be permitted. Let them freely feast, sing and dance, have their poppet-playes, hobby-horses, tabers, crouds, bag-pipes, &c. play at ball, and barley-breaks, and what sports and recreations they like best.	For my part, I support the king's declaration, and have always thought that May festivities, parish wakes, Whitsun ales, and the like may rightly be permitted, provided they take place at suitable hours. Let people feast, sing, and dance freely; let them have their puppet plays, hobby-horses, tabors, fiddles, bagpipes, and so forth; let them play ball, barley-break, and whatever sports and recreations they like best.[5894]

[5892] Editor. Ignoratio elenchi is the logical fault of missing the point at issue. The comic phrase recalls Terence, The Self-Tormentor 213–216: the young Clitipho complains that fathers expect boys to become old men at once. Burton's loose "as he did" is retained in sense without assigning his pronoun a more definite speaker. "Past themselves" here means past the age or appetite for these pleasures.

[5893] Editor. The references are Ecclesiastes 3:4, 5 and 22, with "a time for all things" recalling 3:1. Burton combines and abbreviates the wording. The modern text follows his quotation rather than replacing it with a different Bible version.

[5894] Editor. The royal declaration is the Book of Sports: James I's 1618 proclamation, reissued by Charles I in 1633, as recorded in the Eton catalogue. Whitsun ales were communal festivities at Whitsuntide; wakes were parish festivals. Hobby-horses were costumed festival figures, tabors small drums, and "crouds" bowed instruments. Barley-break was a chasing game. Burton's approval is qualified by the timing and moderation of the recreation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In Franconia a province of Germany (saith [5895]Aubanus Bohemus) the old folks after evening prayer, went to the ale-house, the younger sort to dance: and to say truth with [5896]Salisburiensis, satius fuerat sic otiari, quam turpius occupari, better do so then worse, as without question otherwise (such is the corruption of mans nature) many of them will do.	In Franconia, a province of Germany, says Johannes Boemus, the old people went to the alehouse after evening prayer, and the young went dancing. To speak truly with John of Salisbury, "it would have been better to be idle in this way than to be more shamefully employed"—better this than something worse, which many would undoubtedly otherwise do, such is the corruption of human nature.[5897]
For that cause, Playes, Masks, Jesters, Gladiators, Tumblers, Juglers, &c. and all that crew is admitted and winked at: [5898]Tota jocularium scena procedit, & ideo spectacula admissa sunt, & infinita tyrocinia vanitatum, ut his occupentur, qui perniciosius otiari solent: that they might be busied about such toyes, that would otherwise perniciously be idle.	For that reason, plays, masques, jesters, gladiators, acrobats, jugglers, and all that crew are admitted and tolerated: "The whole stage of entertainers comes forward; spectacles and countless schools of frivolity are therefore admitted, so that people who usually spend their leisure more harmfully may be occupied by them"—so that those who would otherwise be harmfully idle may busy themselves with such trifles.[5899]

[5895] Burton. Printed page 276, h: "De mor. gent." On the Customs of Peoples; abbreviated title.

[5896] Burton. Printed page 276, i: "Polycrat. l. 1. cap. 8." Policraticus, book 1, chapter 8.

[5897] Editor. Aubanus Bohemus is Johannes Boemus; his passage remains uncollated. John of Salisbury's Policraticus I.8, compared in Keats-Rohan's 1987 critical-edition thesis, p. 81, prefers idleness to disgraceful occupation. Burton adds sic and changes turpiter, disgracefully, to turpius, more disgracefully, applying the sentence to tolerating recreation as a lesser evil. His Latin and separate English gloss are retained; they do not reproduce John's original argument. Burton's intermediary and edition remain unidentified.

[5898] Burton. Printed page 276, k: "Idem Sarisburiensis." The same John of Salisbury.

[5899] Editor. Tyrocinia means apprenticeships or training schools; winked at means knowingly tolerated. In Policraticus I.8, John says spectacles occupy those unable to endure idleness, to their greater harm. Burton rearranges the surrounding phrases and makes the spectacles occupy people who would otherwise be more harmfully idle: the moral comparison is reversed. The printed quotation and its English explanation remain unchanged. John's subsequent allowance for moderate amusement does not remove this difference in the quoted passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So that as [5900]Tacitus said of the Astrologers in Rome, we may say of them, genus hominum est quod in civitate nostra & vitabitur semper & retinebitur, they are a deboshed company most part, still spoken against, as well they deserve some of them (for I relish and distinguish them as fidlers, and musicians) and yet ever retained.	Thus we may say of them what Tacitus said of the astrologers in Rome: "They are a class of people who will always be shunned in our state and always retained." Most are a dissolute company, continually condemned—as some of them thoroughly deserve, for I judge and distinguish between them as between mere fiddlers and musicians—and yet always kept on.[5901]
Evil is not to be done I confess that good may come of it: but this is evil per accidens, and in a qualified sense, to avoide a greater inconvenience, may justly be tolerated.	I admit that evil must not be done so that good may come of it. But this is evil only incidentally and in a qualified sense, and may rightly be tolerated to avoid a greater harm.[5902]
Source page 276–277 S. Thomas Moore in his Utopian Commonwealth, [5903]as he will have none idle, so will he have no man labour over hard, to be toiled out like an horse, 'tis more then slavish infelicity, the life of most of our hired servants, and tradesmen elsewhere (excepting his Utopians) but half the day allotted for work, and half for honest recreation, or whatsoever imployment they shall think fit themselves.	Sir Thomas More, in his Utopian commonwealth, will have no one idle, but neither will he have anyone labour too hard, worn out like a horse—a misery worse than slavery, the life of most of our hired servants and tradespeople elsewhere, apart from his Utopians. Half the day is allotted to work, and half to innocent recreation or whatever occupation people themselves think suitable.[5904]

[5900] Burton. Printed page 276, †: "Hist. lib. 1." Histories, book 1.

[5901] Editor. Tacitus, Histories 1.22, has vetabitur, "will be prohibited," whereas Burton prints vitabitur, "will be avoided." That substantive reading is retained on the left and translated "shunned" on the right. Tacitus describes astrologers as a group repeatedly banned yet retained; Burton applies the remark to entertainers. "Relish" here concerns judgement or discrimination, and the contrast between fiddlers and musicians is Burton's hierarchy of esteem.

[5902] Editor. An allusion to Romans 3:8, followed by a qualification: per accidens means incidentally or through associated circumstances, rather than in the activity's essence. Burton's claim is that toleration can prevent a greater harm.

[5903] Burton. Printed page 276, l: "Nemo desidet otiosus, ita nemo asinino more ad seram noctem laborat; nam ea plusquam servilis ærumna, quæ opificum vita est, exceptis Utopiensibus, qui diem in 24 horas dividunt, sex duntaxat operi deputant, reliquum à somno & cibo cujusque arbitrio permittitur." No one sits idle, but neither does anyone toil like an ass until late at night; for the life of craftsmen is a misery worse than slavery, except among the Utopians, who divide the day into twenty-four hours and assign only six to work. What remains apart from sleep and food is left to each person's discretion.

[5904] Editor. "S." here is Sir, the title of Thomas More. In Utopia, book 2, the account of trades allows six working hours out of twenty-four and leaves remaining time, apart from meals and sleep, to suitable pursuits. Burton's margin preserves six hours; his body loosely says half the day. Both are retained, without silently making them numerically identical. The primary-text comparison used Burnet's historical translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 277 If one half-day in a week were allowed to our houshold servants for their merry meetings, by their hard masters, or in a year some feasts, like those Roman Saturnals, I think they would labour harder all the rest of their time, and both parties be better pleased: but this needs not (you will say) for some of them do nought but loyter all the week long.	If their harsh masters allowed our household servants one half-day a week for cheerful gatherings, or some annual feasts like the Roman Saturnalia, I think they would work harder the rest of the time, and both parties would be better pleased. But this is unnecessary, you will say, because some of them do nothing but loiter all week.[5905]
This which I aim at, is for such as are fracti animis, troubled in mind, to ease them, over-toiled on the one part, to refresh; over idle on the other, to keep themselves busied. And to this purpose, as any labour or imployment will serve to the one, any honest recreation will conduce to the other, so that it be moderate and sparing, as the use of meat and drink; not to spend all their life in gaming, playing, and pastimes, as too many gentlemen do; but to revive our bodies and recreate our souls with honest sports:	What I am aiming at is relief for those who are "broken in spirit," troubled in mind: to refresh the overworked on the one hand, and to keep the excessively idle occupied on the other. For this purpose, as any labour or occupation will serve one group, any innocent recreation will help the other, provided it is moderate and sparing, like food and drink. The aim is not to spend a whole life gambling, playing, and pursuing amusement, as too many gentlemen do, but to revive our bodies and refresh our souls with innocent pastimes.[5906] of which as there be divers sorts, and peculiar to severall callings, ages, sexes, conditions, so there be proper for severall seasons, and those of distinct natures, to fit that variety of humors which is amongst them, that if one will not, another may: some in Summer, some in Winter, some gentle, some more violent, some for the mind alone, some for the body and mind:	Just as there are different sorts suited to different occupations, ages, sexes, and conditions, so there are recreations appropriate to different seasons and of different kinds, to suit the variety of temperaments among people: if one will not serve, another may. Some are for summer, some for winter; some gentle, some more vigorous; some for the mind alone, others for both body and mind.

[5905] Editor. The Saturnalia were Roman festivities associated with Saturn and a temporary relaxation of ordinary social relations. Burton turns the literary example into a proposal for servants' leisure, then supplies an imagined master's objection. "Hard" describes harsh masters, not industrious ones.

[5906] Editor. Fracti animis means broken or worn down in spirit; Burton immediately glosses it as troubled in mind. The two groups are the overworked and the excessively idle, whose needs differ. "Meat" means food generally.

Original text 1651	Modern English
(as to some it is both business, and a pleasant recreation to oversee workmen of all sorts, Husbandry, Catle, Horse, &c. To build, plot, project, to make models, cast up accompts, &c.) some without, some within doors: new, old, &c. as the season serveth, and as men are inclined.	For some people, supervising workmen of all kinds, farming, cattle, horses, and so forth is both business and pleasant recreation; so too are building, planning, devising projects, making models, adding up accounts, and the like. Some pastimes are outdoors, some indoors; some new, some old, according to the season and people's inclinations.
It is reported of Philippus Bonus, that good Duke of Burgundy (by Lodovicus Vives, in Epist. and Pont. [5907]Heuter in his history) that the said Duke, at the marriage of Elionara, sister to the king of Portugal at Burges in Flanders, which was solemnized in the deep of winter, when as by reason of unseasonable weather he could neither hawk nor hunt, and was now tyred with cards, dice, &c. and such other domesticall sports, or to see Ladies dance, with some of his courtiers, he would in the evening walk disguised all about the Town.	It is related of Philip the Good, that good duke of Burgundy—by Juan Luis Vives in a letter, and by Pontus Heuterus in his history—that at the marriage of Elionara, sister of the king of Portugal, at Bruges in Flanders, celebrated in the depth of winter, the duke could neither hawk nor hunt because of the unsuitable weather. Tired by then of cards, dice, other indoor pastimes, and watching ladies dance, he would walk disguised through the town in the evenings with some of his courtiers.[5908]
It so fortuned, as he was walking late one night, he found a country-fellow dead drunk, snoring on a Bulk; he caused his followers to bring him to his Palace, and there stripping him of his old cloaths, and attiring him after the Court fashion, when he waked, he and they were all ready to attend upon his excellency, perswading him he was some great Duke.	One night, while walking late, he happened upon a countryman dead drunk, snoring on a bench. He had his followers carry the man to his palace, strip off his old clothes, and dress him in court fashion. When he awoke, the duke and his companions stood ready to wait upon "his excellency," persuading him that he was a great duke.[5909]

[5907] Burton. Printed page 277, †: "Rerum Burgund. lib. 4." Burgundian History, book 4; the title is abbreviated.

[5908] Editor. Philip the Good is the duke of Burgundy; Burges is Bruges. Burton prints Elionara and calls her the Portuguese king's sister. The Met's account of Philip's marriage diplomacy identifies his prospective Portuguese wife as Isabella. Elionara is therefore retained as a difficulty rather than silently replaced. The anecdote's chronology, Vives's letter and Heuterus's book 4 have not been fully collated.

[5909] Editor. A "bulk" is a projecting bench or platform, often in front of a shop. The story turns on a staged change of social identity; Burton does not identify the countryman by name.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The poor fellow admiring how he came there, was served in state all the day long, after supper he saw them dance, heard musick, and the rest of those Court-like pleasures: but late at night, when he was well tipled, and again fast asleep, they put on his old robes, and so conveighed him to the place where they first found him.[5910]	The poor fellow, wondering how he had come there, was waited on in state all day. After supper he watched dancing, heard music, and enjoyed the other pleasures of court. Late at night, however, once he was thoroughly drunk and fast asleep again, they dressed him in his old clothes and carried him back to the place where they had found him.
Now the fellow had not made them so good sport the day before, as he did when he returned to himself; all the jest was, to see how he looked upon it. In conclusion, after some little admiration, the poor man told his friends he had seen a vision, constantly believed it, would not otherwise be perswaded, and so the jest ended.[5911]	The fellow had not amused them so much the day before as he did when he came to himself. The whole joke was to see how he would take it. After some initial amazement, the poor man told his friends that he had seen a vision. He firmly believed it and would not be persuaded otherwise; and so the joke ended.[5912]

[5910] Burton. Printed page 277, †: "Jussit hominem deferri ad palatium & lecto ducali collocari, &c. mirari homo ubi se eo loci videt." He ordered the man to be carried to the palace and placed in the ducal bed, and so forth. The man marvels when he sees himself in that place.

[5911] Burton. Printed page 277, m: "Quid interest, inquit Lodovicus Vives, (epist. ad Francisc. Barducem) inter diem illius & nostros aliquot annos? nihil penitus, nisi quod &c." What difference is there, asks Juan Luis Vives, in a letter to Franciscus Barducem, between that man's day and some years of our lives? None at all, except that, and so forth. The recipient's printed name is retained without a secure modern identification.

[5912] Editor. "Admiration" means amazement. The Vives marginal quotation asks how this one-day deception differs from years of ordinary life, giving the joke a philosophical application. Its final nisi quod, "except that," trails off in Burton's citation; no missing conclusion has been invented.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 277–278 [5913]Antiochus Epiphanes would often disguise himself, steal from his Court, and go into Merchants, Goldsmiths, and other tradesmens shops, sit and talk with them, and sometimes ride, or walk alone, and fall aboord with any Tinker, Clowne, Serving man, Carrier, or whomsoever he met first. Sometimes he did ex insperato give a poor fellow money, to see how he would look, or on set purpose, lose his purse as he went, to watch who found it, and withall how he would be affected, and with such objects he was much delighted.	Antiochus Epiphanes would often disguise himself, slip away from court, and enter the shops of merchants, goldsmiths, and other tradesmen, sitting and talking with them. Sometimes he rode or walked alone and struck up a conversation with any tinker, countryman, servant, carrier, or whoever he happened to meet first. Sometimes he gave a poor fellow money "unexpectedly," to see his reaction, or deliberately dropped his purse as he went, watching to see who found it and how the finder responded. Such sights greatly delighted him.[5914]
Source page 278 Many such tricks are ordinarily put in practice by great men, to exhilarate themselves and others, all which are harmless jests, and have their good uses.	Great men commonly practise many such tricks to cheer themselves and others; all of them are harmless jokes and have their good uses.[5915]
But amongst those exercises, or recreations of the minde within doors, there is none so generall, so aptly to be applyed to all sorts of men, so fit and proper to expell Idleness and Melancholy, as that of Study: Studia senectutem oblectant, adolescentiam alunt, secundas res ornant, adversis perfugium & solatium præbent, domi delectant, &c. finde the rest in Tully pro Archia Poëta.	But among indoor exercises or recreations of the mind, none is so universal, so well suited to every kind of person, so fit and proper to drive away idleness and melancholy, as study. "Studies delight old age, nourish youth, adorn prosperity, offer refuge and consolation in adversity, and give pleasure at home," and so forth: find the rest in Cicero's speech For the Poet Archias.[5916]

[5913] Burton. Printed page 277, n: "Hen Stephan. præfat. Herodoti." Henri Estienne, preface to Herodotus; no edition is specified.

[5914] Editor. The margin names Henri Estienne's preface to Herodotus. The ruler is Antiochus Epiphanes; the exact preface and the whole sequence of anecdotes remain uncollated. "Fall aboard" means accost or begin talking to someone. Ex insperato means unexpectedly, as a surprise to the recipient.

[5915] Editor. "Harmless" is Burton's own judgement about the preceding tricks, including the treatment of the drunken countryman; the modern text preserves it as part of his argument.

[5916] Editor. Cicero, For Archias 16. Burton reverses the order of youth and old age and stops before Cicero's further examples of study accompanying travel and rural life. The translation follows Burton's Latin sequence and does not add the omitted continuation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What so full of content, as to read, walk, and see Mappes, Pictures, Statues, Jewels, Marbles, which some so much magnifie, as those that Phidias made of old so exquisite and pleasing to be beheld, that as [5917]Chrysostome thinketh, if any man be sickly, troubled in minde, or that cannot sleep for griefe, and shall but stand over against one of Phidias Images, he will forget all care or whatsoever else may molest him in an instant?	What gives more contentment than reading, walking, and looking at maps, pictures, statues, jewels, and marbles, which some praise so highly? The works Phidias made long ago were so exquisite and pleasing to behold that, as Chrysostom thinks, anyone who is ill, troubled in mind, or unable to sleep for grief need only stand before one of Phidias's statues to forget every care and whatever else troubles him in an instant.[5918]
There be those as much taken with Michael Angelo's, Raphael de Vrbino's, Francesco Francia's pieces, and many of those Italian and Dutch painters, which were excellent in their ages; and esteem of it as a most pleasing sight, to view those neat Architectures, Devices, Scutchions, coats of armes, read such bookes, to peruse old Coynes of severall sorts in a fair Gallery, artificiall works, perspective glasses, old reliques, Roman Antiquities, variety of colours.	Others are equally captivated by the works of Michelangelo, Raphael of Urbino, Francesco Francia, and the many Italian and Dutch painters who excelled in their time. They find it wonderfully pleasing to look at elegant architecture, decorative designs, escutcheons and coats of arms; to read books about such things; and to examine old coins of various kinds in a fine gallery, works of craftsmanship, optical glasses, ancient relics, Roman antiquities, and a variety of colours.[5919]

[5917] Burton. Printed page 278, †: "Orat. 12 siquis animo fuerit afflictus aut æger, nec somnum admittens, is mihi videtur è regione stans talis Imaginis, oblivisci omnium posse, quæ humanæ vitæ atrocia & difficilia accidere solent." Oration 12. If anyone is distressed or sick in mind, unable to sleep, I think that, standing before such an image, he could forget all the dreadful and difficult things that commonly happen in human life.

[5918] Editor. The reference is Dio Chrysostom, Oration 12.51, not John Chrysostom. Dio describes the consoling effect of Phidias's statue of Zeus at Olympia; Burton broadens the example to a statue by Phidias. The passage was compared in Cohoon's translation. Burton's claim about relief from distress remains a literary illustration.

[5919] Editor. "Scutchions" are escutcheons or heraldic shields; "artificiall" means produced by art or skill. "Perspective glasses" is rendered broadly as optical glasses, since a particular instrument cannot be securely selected from the phrase. "Dutch" can have a broader geographical range in early modern usage than the modern Netherlands alone.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A good picture is falsa veritas, & muta poesis: and though (as [5920]Vives saith) artificialia delectant, sed mox fastidimus, artificiall toyes please but for a time; yet who is he that will not be moved with them for the present?	A good picture is "a counterfeit truth and silent poetry." And though, as Vives says, "things made by art delight us, but soon we tire of them"—artificial curiosities please only for a time—who will not be moved by them while that pleasure lasts?[5921]
When Achilles was tormented and sad for the loss of his dear friend Patroclus, his mother Thetis brought him a most elaborate and curious Buckler made by Vulcan, in which were engraven Sun, Moon, Stars, Planets, Sea, Land, men fighting, running, riding, women scolding; hils, dales, towns, castles, brooks, rivers, trees, &c. with many pretty landskips, and perspective pieces: with sight of which he was infinitely delighted, and much eased of his grief.	When Achilles was tormented and saddened by the loss of his dear friend Patroclus, his mother Thetis brought him a most elaborate and finely wrought shield made by Vulcan. On it were engraved the sun, moon, stars, planets, sea, and land; men fighting, running, and riding; women scolding; hills, valleys, towns, castles, brooks, rivers, trees, and so forth, with many beautiful landscapes and scenes in perspective. The sight delighted him immensely and greatly relieved his grief.[5922]
[5923]Continuo eo spectaculo captus delenito mœrore Oblectabatur, in manibus tenens dei splendida dona.	At once, captivated by the sight, with sorrow soothed, He took delight, holding the god's splendid gifts in his hands.[5924]

[5920] Burton. Printed page 278, o: "3. De anima." On the Soul, book 3.

[5921] Editor. Falsa veritas means false or counterfeit truth, preserving the paradox of convincing representation. Muta poesis, silent poetry, recalls the saying attributed to Simonides in Plutarch, On the Fame of the Athenians 3, 346F–347A, where painting and poetry represent the same subjects by different means. This is a classical parallel, checked in Babbitt's translation, not an identified Latin intermediary for Burton. The paired formula and Vives's On the Soul III passage remain uncollated. Burton's own English paraphrase follows the Latin.

[5922] Editor. The shield is described in Iliad 18; Achilles receives the divine armour at the opening of book 19. Vulcan is the Roman name for Hephaestus. Burton's picturesque inventory is his own compressed retelling, not a literal inventory supplied by the modern editor.

[5923] Burton. Printed page 278, *: "Iliad. 19." Iliad, book 19.

[5924] Editor. Compare Iliad 19.16–23: Achilles delights in the divine armour, but his anger also grows and his eyes blaze. Burton's Latin explicitly presents sorrow as soothed, and his prose stresses consolation. That shift is retained. The comparison used Buckley's historical translation; Burton's Latin intermediary remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Who will not be affected so in like case, or to see those wel furnished Cloisters and Galleries of the Roman Cardinals, so richly stored with all modern Pictures, old Statues and Antiquities? Cum se——spectando recreet simul & legendo, to see their pictures alone and read the description, as [5925]Boisardus well addes, whom will it not affect? which Bozius, Pomponius Lætus, Marlianus, Schottus, Cavelerius, Ligorius, &c. and he himself hath well performed of late.	Who would not be moved in the same way, or by seeing the well-furnished cloisters and galleries of the Roman cardinals, so richly stocked with modern paintings, ancient statues, and antiquities? "Since one refreshes oneself by looking and reading together": who would not be moved simply by seeing their pictures and reading the descriptions, as Boissard aptly adds? Bozius, Pomponius Laetus, Marlianus, Schottus, Cavalieri, Ligorio, and others, including Boissard himself, have lately done this well.[5926]
Source page 278–279 Or in some Princes Cabinets, like that of the great Dukes in Florence, of Fælix Platerus in Basil, or Noblemens houses to see such variety of attires, faces, so many, so rare, and such exquisite peeces, of men, birds, beasts, &c. to see those excellent landskips, Dutch-works, and curious cuts of Sadlier of Prage, Albertus Durer, Goltzius, Vrintes, &c. such pleasant peeces of perspective, Indian Pictures made of feathers, China works, frames, Thaumaturgicall motions, exotick toyes, &c.	Or, in princely cabinets of curiosities, such as the grand duke's at Florence, in Felix Platter's at Basel, or in noblemen's houses, to see so many varied costumes and faces, so many rare and exquisite representations of people, birds, beasts, and the like; to see the excellent landscapes, Dutch works, and intricate engravings of Sadeler of Prague, Albrecht Dürer, Goltzius, Vrints, and others; such delightful scenes in perspective, Indian feather pictures, Chinese wares, frames, marvellous moving devices, foreign curiosities, and so forth.[5927]

[5925] Burton. Printed page 278, †: "Topogr. Rom. Part. 1." Topography of Rome, part 1.

[5926] Editor. "Boisardus" is Jean-Jacques Boissard; the marginal reference is to his Roman topography. The passage joins the pleasures of seeing objects with reading their descriptions. The individual works intended by the compressed list of antiquaries, and Burton's exact Latin quotation, remain to be collated.

[5927] Editor. "Cabinets" are collections or rooms of curiosities; "cuts" are engravings. Felix Platter is named in connection with Basel. "Thaumaturgicall motions" denotes marvellous moving contrivances, rendered broadly without identifying a mechanism. The particular Sadeler, Goltzius and Vrints works, and the origin of the feather pictures, are not specified securely enough to identify individual objects.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 279 Who is he that is now wholly overcome with idleness, or otherwise involved in a Labyrinth of worldly cares, troubles, and discontents, that will not be much lightned in his mind by reading of some inticing story, true or fained, whereas in a glass he shall observe what our fore-fathers have done, the beginnings, ruins, fals, periods of Common-wealths, private mens actions displayed to the life &c.? [5928]Plutarch therefore calls them, secundas mensas & bellaria, the second course and junkets, because they were usually read at Noblemens Feasts.	Who, though wholly overcome by idleness or entangled in a labyrinth of worldly cares, troubles, and discontents, would not find the mind greatly lightened by reading some enticing story, true or invented? There, as in a mirror, one sees what our ancestors did: the beginnings, ruins, falls, and endings of commonwealths, and private people's actions vividly displayed. Plutarch therefore calls such stories "second courses and sweetmeats"—the second course and delicacies—because they were usually read at noblemen's feasts.[5929]
Who is not earnestly affected with a passionate speech, well penned, an elegant Poem, or some pleasant bewitching discourse, like that of [5930]Heliodorus, ubi oblectatio quædam placidè fluit, cum hilaritate conjuncta: Julian the Apostate was so taken with an Oration of Libanius the Sophister, that as he confesseth, he could not be quiet till he had read it all out. Legi orationem tuam magnâ ex parte, hesternâ die ante prandium, pransus vero sine ullâ intermissione totam absolvi. O argumenta! O compositionem!	Who is not deeply moved by a passionate, well-written speech, an elegant poem, or some delightful, enchanting narrative like that of Heliodorus, "where a certain pleasure flows gently, joined with cheerfulness"? Julian the Apostate was so captivated by a speech of Libanius the sophist that, as he admits, he could not rest until he had read it all. "I read the greater part of your speech yesterday before my meal; after eating, I finished the whole without any interruption. What arguments! What composition!"[5931]

[5928] Burton. Printed page 279, †: "Quod heroum conviviis legi solitæ." Because they were customarily read at the banquets of heroes or great men.

[5929] Editor. "Fained" means invented or fictional; "glass" means mirror; "periods" means endings. "Junkets" here are delicacies, not excursions. The exact Plutarch passage is unresolved. The marginal Latin uses heroum, heroes or great men, while the body refers to noblemen; both are preserved in their respective places.

[5930] Burton. Printed page 279, *: "Melancthon de Heliodoro." Melanchthon on Heliodorus; no work or page is given.

[5931] Editor. Heliodorus exemplifies absorbing narrative; Melanchthon's comment remains unlocated. Julian's passage is Letter 53 to Libanius in Wright's 1923 edition, responding to the speech For Aristophanes. Julian describes reading most of it before a meal and the rest afterwards, then praises its argument and style at length. Burton condenses the praise; his Latin intermediary is unidentified. Apostate and Sophister are Burton's descriptions; sophist means a teacher and practitioner of rhetoric.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I may say the same of this or that pleasing Tract, which will draw his attention along with it. To most kind of men it is an extraordinary delight to study. For what a world of books offers it self, in all subjects, arts, and sciences, to the sweet content and capacity of the Reader?	I may say the same of one delightful treatise or another, which carries the reader's attention along with it. For most kinds of people, study is an extraordinary pleasure. What a world of books presents itself, on every subject, art, and science, to suit the reader's capacity and give sweet contentment!
In Arithmetick, Geometry, Perspective, Optick, Astronomy, Architecture, Sculpturâ, Picturâ, of which so many and such elaborate Treatises are of late written: In Mechanicks and their mysteries, Military matters, Navigation, [5932]riding of horses, [5933]fencing, swimming, gardening, planting, great tomes of husbandry, Cookery, Faulconry, Hunting, Fishing, Fowling, &c. with exquisite pictures of all sports, games, and what not?	There are arithmetic, geometry, perspective, optics, astronomy, architecture, sculpture, and painting, on which so many elaborate treatises have lately appeared; mechanics and its secrets; military affairs, navigation, horsemanship, fencing, swimming, gardening, and planting; great volumes on agriculture, cookery, falconry, hunting, fishing, catching birds, and so forth, with exquisite pictures of every sport and game—what is there not?[5934]
In Musick, Metaphysicks, Naturall and Morall Philosophy, Philologie, in Policy, Heraldry, Genealogy, Chronology, &c. they afford great Tomes; or those studies of [5935]Antiquity, &c. & [5936]quid subtilius Arithmeticis inventionibus, quid jucundius Musicis rationibus, quid divinius Astronomicis, quid rectius Geometricis demonstrationibus? What so sure, what so pleasant?	Music, metaphysics, natural and moral philosophy, philology, politics, heraldry, genealogy, chronology, and the like supply great volumes; so do studies of antiquity. And "what is more subtle than arithmetical discoveries, more delightful than musical principles, more divine than astronomical ones, more exact than geometrical demonstrations?" What is so certain, what so pleasant?[5937]

[5932] Burton. Printed page 279, †: "Pluvines." Pluvinel; a reference to the writer on horsemanship.

[5933] Burton. Printed page 279, *: "Thibault." Thibault; a reference to the writer on fencing.

[5934] Editor. "Optick" is optics; sculptura and pictura are sculpture and painting. Pluvines points to Pluvinel on horsemanship and Thibault to the fencing author. No particular edition is supplied; their specific books and Burton's spelling remain part of the bibliographical work still to be completed.

[5935] Burton. Printed page 279, †: "As in travelling the rest go forward and look before them an Antiquary alone looks round about him, seeing things past, &c. hath a compleat Horizon, Janus Bifrons." Already English: while other travellers go forward and look ahead, the antiquary alone looks all around, seeing things past, with a complete horizon: two-faced Janus.

[5936] Burton. Printed page 279, *: "Cardan." Cardano; no work or location is specified.

[5937] Editor. "Policy" means political or governmental study; philology is the study of language and texts. Janus Bifrons is two-faced Janus, looking in two directions: an image for the antiquary's wider view of time. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. His exact source for the fourfold praise of arithmetic, music, astronomy and geometry is unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He that shall but see that Geometricall tower of Garezenda at Bologne in Italy, the steeple and clock at Strasborough, will admire the effects of art, or that Engine of Archimedes to remove the earth it self if he had but a place to fasten his instrument: Archimedes Coclea, and rare devices to corrivate waters, musick instruments, and trisyllable Ecchoes again, again, and again repeated, with miriades of such.	Anyone who merely sees the geometrical tower of Garisenda at Bologna in Italy, or the spire and clock at Strasbourg, will admire what art can accomplish; or Archimedes's device for moving the earth itself, if only he had somewhere to fix his instrument; Archimedes's screw, ingenious devices for bringing streams together, musical instruments, and three-syllable echoes repeated again, again, and again, with countless other examples.[5938]
What vast Tomes are extant in Law, Physick and Divinity, for profit, pleasure, practice, speculation, in verse or prose, &c. their names alone are the subject of whole volumes, we have thousands of Authors of all sorts, many great Libraries full well furnished, like so many dishes of meat, served out for severall palates; and he is a very block that is affected with none of them.	What immense volumes exist in law, medicine, and theology, for profit, pleasure, practice, and contemplation, in verse or prose! Their titles alone fill whole volumes. We have thousands of authors of every kind and many great, well-stocked libraries, like so many dishes of food served for different tastes; anyone moved by none of them is a complete blockhead.[5939]
Some take an infinite delight to study the very languages wherein these books are written, Hebrew, Greek, Syriack, Chalde, Arabick, &c.	Some take immense delight in studying the very languages in which these books are written: Hebrew, Greek, Syriac, Chaldean, Arabic, and so forth.[5940]

[5938] Editor. Garezenda is the Garisenda tower at Bologna, identified through Bologna's official visitor information. Its leaning form supplies the architectural marvel. Archimedes's earth-moving device evokes the leverage boast; coclea is a screw, and "corrivate" means bring streams together. Burton's exact sources for the devices, Strasbourg clock and repeated echoes have not been collated.

[5939] Editor. "Physick" means medicine and "divinity" theology; "speculation" means theoretical contemplation. A "block" is a blockhead, a person unresponsive to the intellectual feast. The discussion proceeds to the delight of learning languages and then to maps.

[5940] Editor. "Chalde" is the older designation for Chaldean or Biblical Aramaic. The sentence continues the preceding catalogue of studies; it begins no new source paragraph.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 279–280 Methinks it would well please any man to look upon a Geographical Map, [5941]suavi animum delectatione allicere, ob incredibilem rerum varietatem & jucunditatem, & ad pleniorem sui cognitionem excitare, Chorographical, Topographical delineations, to behold as it were, all the remote Provinces, Towns, Cities of the world, and never to go forth of the limits of his study, to measure by the Scale and compasse, their extent, distance, examine their site.	I think anyone would take pleasure in looking at a geographical map: "to draw the mind with sweet delight through the astonishing variety and charm of things, and awaken it to a fuller knowledge of them." Regional and local depictions allow him, as it were, to behold all the distant provinces, towns, and cities of the world without ever leaving his study, measuring their extent and distance with a scale and compasses, and examining their situation.[5942]
Source page 280 Charles the great as Platina writes, had three faire silver tables, in one of which superficies was a large map of Constantinople, in the second Rome neatly engraved, in the third an exquisite description of the whole world, and much delight he took in them. What greater pleasure can there now be, then to view those elaborate Maps of Ortelius, [5943]Mercator, Hondius, &c. To peruse those books of Cities, put out by Braunus, and Hogenbergius?	Charlemagne, as Platina writes, had three beautiful silver tables. On the surface of one was a large map of Constantinople; on the second, a finely engraved Rome; on the third, an exquisite representation of the whole world. He took great delight in them. What greater pleasure can there be today than viewing those elaborate maps by Ortelius, Mercator, Hondius, and others, or examining the books of cities published by Braun and Hogenberg?[5944]

[5941] Burton. Printed page 279, *: "Hondius præfat. Mercatoris." Hondius, preface to Mercator; Burton does not identify the edition.

[5942] Editor. Chorography describes regions; topography describes particular places. "Compasse" here is the instrument used to measure distances on a map. The Latin's sui is rendered in context as fuller knowledge of the things depicted. The particular Hondius preface and its wording have not yet been collated.

[5943] Burton. Printed page 280, p: "Atlas Geog." Geographical Atlas.

[5944] Editor. "Charles the great" is Charlemagne. Burton attributes the silver tables to Platina; this particular passage has not been collated. Braun and Hogenberg's city books are the Civitates orbis terrarum, represented in the Library of Congress catalogue. The maps make distant places available to an armchair traveller.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To read those exquisite descriptions of Maginus, Munster, Herrera, Læt, Merula, Boterus, Leander, Albertus, Camden, Leo, Afer, Adricomius, Nic. Gerbelius, &c? Those famous expeditions of Christoph. Columbus, Americus Vesputius, Marcus Polus the Venetian, Lod. Vertomannus, Aloysius Cadamustus, &c?	Or to read those exquisite descriptions by Maginus, Münster, Herrera, Laet, Merula, Botero, Leander Albertus, Camden, Leo Africanus, Adricomius, Nicholas Gerbelius, and others? Those famous expeditions of Christopher Columbus, Amerigo Vespucci, Marco Polo the Venetian, Lod. Vertomannus, Aloysius Cadamustus, and the rest?[5945]
Those accurate diaries of Portugals, Hollanders, of Bartison, Oliver à Nort, &c. Hacluits voyages, Pet. Martyrs Decades, Benzo, Lerius, Linschotens relations, those Hodeporicons of Jod. a Meggen, Brocard the Monke, Bredenbachius, Jo. Dublinius, Sands, &c. to Jerusalem, Egypt, and other remote places of the world? those pleasant Itineraries of Paulus Hentzerus, Iodocus Sincerus, Dux Polonus, &c. to read Bellonius observations, P. Gillius his survayes; those parts of America, set out, and curiously cut in pictures, by Fratres a Bry.	Those careful journals of Portuguese and Dutch travellers, of Bartison, Oliver à Nort, and others? Hakluyt's voyages, Peter Martyr's Decades, the accounts of Benzo, Lerius, and Linschoten; the travel narratives of Jod. a Meggen, Brocard the monk, Bredenbachius, Jo. Dublinius, Sandys, and others, to Jerusalem, Egypt, and other distant parts of the world? The delightful itineraries of Paulus Hentzerus, Iodocus Sincerus, Dux Polonus, and others? Or to read Bellonius's observations and P. Gillius's surveys; to see those parts of America represented in finely engraved pictures by the de Bry brothers?[5946]
To see a well cut Herbal, Hearbs, Trees, Flowers, Plants, all Vegetals expressed in their proper colours to the life, as that of Matthiolus upon Dioscorides, Delacampius, Lobel, Bauhinus, and that last voluminous and mighty Herbal of Beslar of Noremberge, wherein almost every Plant is to his own bignesse.	Or to see a well-engraved herbal: herbs, trees, flowers, plants—all vegetation—depicted true to life in their natural colours, as in Matthiolus's work on Dioscorides, or those of Delacampius, Lobel, and Bauhinus, and that recent, enormous herbal by Besler of Nuremberg, in which almost every plant is shown at its actual size?[5947]

[5945] Editor. Burton's commas divide "Leander, Albertus" and "Leo, Afer": the modern text joins these as the author-names Leander Albertus and Leo Africanus. The remaining abbreviated or Latinized names are retained where the exact cited editions are not established. This catalogue should not be read as a fully resolved bibliography.

[5946] Editor. "Hodeporicons" are travel accounts; "curiously cut" means carefully or skilfully engraved. "Fratres a Bry" means the de Bry brothers; the Smithsonian catalogue documents engravings from the family's America series. Several abbreviated names here, especially Bartison and Jo. Dublinius, require further bibliographical identification; they have not been silently replaced by guesses.

[5947] Editor. An herbal describes plants and their properties. Beslar is Basilius Besler, whose Hortus Eystettensis appeared in 1613, as recorded by the Biodiversity Heritage Library. The claim that almost every plant is life-size is Burton's description. "Last" means recent or latest, not final.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To see Birds, Beasts, and Fishes of the Sea, Spiders, Gnats, Serpents, Flies, &c. all Creatures set out by the same Art, and truly expressed in lively colours, with an exact description of their natures, vertues, qualities, &c. as hath been accurately performed by Ælian, Gesner, Ulysses Aldrovandus, Bellonius, Rondoletius, Hippolytus Salvianus, &c. [5948]Arcana cœli, naturæ secreta, ordinem universi scire majoris felicitatis & dulcedinis est, quam cogitatione quis assequi possit, aut mortalis sperare.	Or to see birds, beasts, sea fish, spiders, gnats, serpents, flies, and all other creatures depicted by the same art, faithfully represented in vivid colours, with an exact account of their natures, powers, qualities, and so forth, as Aelian, Gesner, Ulisse Aldrovandi, Bellonius, Rondoletius, Hippolytus Salvianus, and others have carefully done? "To know the mysteries of heaven, the secrets of nature, and the order of the universe brings greater happiness and sweetness than anyone can grasp in thought, or any mortal hope for."[5949]
What more pleasing studies can there be then the Mathematicks, Theorick, or Practick parts? As to survay land, make maps, models, dials, &c. with which I was ever much delighted my self. Talis est Mathematum pulchritudo (saith [5950]Plutarch) ut his indignum sit divitiarum phaleras istas & bullas, & puellaria spectacula comparari; such is the excellency of these studies, that all those ornaments and childish bubbles of wealth, are not worthy to be compared to them:	What studies can be more pleasing than mathematics, whether theoretical or practical? Surveying land, making maps, models, sundials, and the like have always greatly delighted me. "Such is the beauty of mathematics," says Plutarch, "that it is unworthy to compare with it those trappings and baubles of wealth, those girlish displays." Such is the excellence of these studies that all those ornaments and childish bubbles of wealth are unworthy of comparison with them.[5951]

[5948] Burton. Printed page 280, *: "Cardan." Cardano; no work or location is specified.

[5949] Editor. "Vertues" are characteristic powers or properties, including medicinal ones. Burton groups ancient and more recent natural historians under a shared praise of accurate representation; this does not establish that each supplied the same kind of colour illustrations. The Cardano quotation has no locator and remains uncollated.

[5950] Burton. Printed page 280, q: "Lib. de cupid. divitiarum." Book On the Love of Wealth.

[5951] Editor. The contrast between mathematical beauty and the display of wealth occurs in Plutarch, On the Love of Wealth 10, 528A. Burton's Latin is followed by his own English restatement; both are retained. His remark about surveying and sundials is an autobiographical aside.

Original text 1651	Modern English
crede mihi ([5952]saith one) extingi dulce erit Mathematicarum artium studio, I could even live and die with such meditations, and take more delight, true content of mind in them, then thou hast in all thy wealth and sport, how rich soever thou art. And as [5953]Cardan well seconds me, Honorificum magis est & gloriosum hæc intelligere, quam provinciis præesse, formosum aut ditem juvenem esse.	"Believe me," says one writer, "it will be sweet to die in the study of the mathematical arts." I could live and die with such reflections, and find more delight and true contentment of mind in them than you find in all your wealth and amusements, however rich you may be. And Cardano aptly supports me: "It is more honourable and glorious to understand these things than to govern provinces, or to be a handsome or wealthy young man."[5954]
The like pleasure there is in all other studies, to such as are truly addicted to them, [5955]ea suavitas (one holds) ut cum quis ea degustaverit, quasi poculis Circeis captus, non possit unquam ab illis avelli; the like sweetnesse, which as Circes cup bewitcheth a student, he cannot leave off, as well may witnesse those many laborious hours, dayes and nights, spent in the voluminous Treatises written by them; the same content.	All other studies give a similar pleasure to those truly devoted to them: "such sweetness," one writer holds, "that once someone has tasted them, as though enchanted by Circe's cups, he can never be torn away." The same sweetness bewitches a student like Circe's cup, so that he cannot stop. The many laborious hours, days, and nights spent on the vast treatises they write bear witness to that same contentment.[5956]

[5952] Burton. Printed page 280, r: "Leon Diggs præfat. ad perpet. prognost. Plus capio voluptatis, &c." Leonard Digges, preface to the Perpetual Prognostication. "I take more pleasure," and so forth.

[5953] Burton. Printed page 280, †: "In Hipperchen. divis. 3." In Hipperchen, division 3; Burton's abbreviated title is retained.

[5954] Editor. The margin identifies Leonard Digges's Prognostication; Folger records a 1556 edition. Its preface and the exact Latin quotation remain to be collated. Burton's unusual abbreviated Cardano title "Hipperchen" is preserved rather than expanded without verification.

[5955] Burton. Printed page 280, †: "Cardan. præfat. rerum variet." Cardano, preface to On the Variety of Things.

[5956] Editor. Circe is the enchantress of the Odyssey. "Addicted" here means devoted to a study. Burton first quotes the Latin comparison, then repeats it in English; the modern text preserves both layers. The specific Cardano preface remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5957]Julius Scaliger was so much affected with Poetry, that he brake out into a pathetical protestation, he had rather be the Author of 12 verses in Lucan, or such an ode in [5958]Horace, then Emperour of Germany.	Julius Caesar Scaliger was so moved by poetry that he burst into a passionate declaration: he would rather have written twelve verses in Lucan, or a certain ode of Horace, than be emperor of Germany.[5959]
Source page 280–281 [5960]Nicholas Gerbelius that good old man, was so much ravished with a few Greek Authors restored to light, with hope and desire of enjoying the rest, that he exclaims forthwith, Arabibus atque Indis omnibus erimus ditiores; we shall be richer then all the Arabick or Indian Princes; of such [5961]esteem they were with him, incomparable worth and value.	Nicholas Gerbelius, that good old man, was so transported by a few Greek authors restored to the light, and by the hope and desire of enjoying the rest, that he immediately exclaimed, "We shall be richer than all the Arabs and Indians." We shall be richer than all the Arabian or Indian princes: so highly did he prize them, as things of incomparable worth and value.[5962]

[5957] Burton. Printed page 280, t: "Poetices lib." Book of Poetics; Burton supplies no number.

[5958] Burton. Printed page 280, †: "Lib. 3. Ode 9. Donec gratus eram tibi, &c." Book 3, Ode 9. "As long as I was pleasing to you," and so forth.

[5959] Editor. "Pathetical" means impassioned. Julius Caesar Scaliger is the Renaissance scholar, not the Roman dictator. The marginal incipit identifies Horace, Odes 3.9, a dialogue of renewed affection. Burton does not identify the twelve lines of Lucan or the precise location in Scaliger.

[5960] Burton. Printed page 280, †: "De Pelopones. lib. 6. de scrip. Græc." On the Peloponnese, book 6, on Greek writers; Burton's abbreviated locator is retained.

[5961] Burton. Printed page 281, *: "Quos si integros haberemus, Dii boni, quas opes, quos thesauros teneremus." "If we possessed them complete, good gods, what riches, what treasures we would hold!"

[5962] Editor. The Latin promises greater wealth than that of all Arabs and Indians; Burton's English adds "Princes." Both statements are preserved. The marginal wish for complete Greek texts explains the metaphorical wealth of recovered learning. Gerbelius's exact passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 281 Seneca prefers Zeno and Chrysippus, two doting Stoicks (he was so much enamored on their works) before any Prince or General of an Army; and Orontius the Mathematician so far admires Archimedes, that he cals him, Divinum & homine majorem, a petty God, more then a man; and well he might, for ought I see, if you respect fame or worth.	Seneca prefers Zeno and Chrysippus, two doting Stoics—he was so enamoured of their works—to any prince or army commander. And Orontius the mathematician so admires Archimedes that he calls him "divine and greater than a human being": a little god, more than a man. So he well might, as far as I can see, if fame or worth is the measure.[5963]
Pindarus of Thebes is as much renowned for his Poems, as Epaminondas, Pelopidas, Hercules or Bacchus, his fellow citizens for their warlike actions; & si famam respicias, non pauciores Aristotelis quam Alexandri meminerunt (as Cardan notes) Aristotle is more known then Alexander; for we have a bare relation of Alexanders deeds, but Aristotle totus vivit in monumentis, is whole in his works: yet I stand not upon this; the delight is it, which I aim at, so great pleasure, such sweet content there is in study.	Pindar of Thebes is as renowned for his poems as his fellow citizens Epaminondas, Pelopidas, Hercules, or Bacchus are for their warlike deeds. "And if you consider fame, no fewer people remember Aristotle than Alexander," as Cardano observes. Aristotle is better known than Alexander: we have only an account of Alexander's deeds, but Aristotle "lives entire in his writings"—he is wholly present in his works. Yet I do not insist on this. Delight is what I am aiming at: such great pleasure, such sweet contentment lies in study.[5964]

[5963] Editor. Seneca, On Leisure 6.4, says that Zeno and Chrysippus achieved more than if they had commanded armies, held office or made laws for one city: their teaching benefits all humanity and posterity. Burton condenses this into a ranking of scholars above rulers. Doting is Burton's disparaging word, not Seneca's. The Orontius passage remains unlocated; the Latin and Burton's stronger petty God gloss are both retained.

[5964] Editor. Burton combines historical Theban leaders with the mythic Hercules and Bacchus. The Latin says that no fewer people remember Aristotle; his English strengthens this to Aristotle being better known. "Monumentis" here means the writings in which the author survives. The Cardano passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5965]King James 1605, when he came to see our University of Oxford, and amongst other Ædifices, now went to view that famous Library, renewed by S. Thomas Bodley, in imitation of Alexander, at his departure brake out into that noble speech, If I were not a King, I would be an University man; [5966]And if it were so that I must be a Prisoner, if I might have my wish, I would desire to have no other prison then that Library, and to be chained together with so many good Authors, et mortuis magistris.	When King James visited our University of Oxford in 1605, and, among its other buildings, went to see that famous library restored by Sir Thomas Bodley, he imitated Alexander and, on leaving, burst into this noble declaration: "If I were not a king, I would be a university man. And if I had to be a prisoner, if I could have my wish, I would ask for no other prison than that library, and to be chained together with so many good authors," and with "dead teachers."[5967]
So sweet is the delight of study, the more learning they have (as he that hath a Dropsie, the more he drinks the thirstier he is) the more they covet to learn, and the last day is prioris discipulus; harsh at first learning is, radices amaræ, but fructus dulces, according to that of Isocrates, pleasant at last; the longer they live, the more they are enamoured with the Muses.	So sweet is the pleasure of study that the more learning people possess, the more they desire to learn—like someone with dropsy, who grows thirstier the more he drinks. The latest day is "the pupil of the one before." Learning is harsh at first: "bitter roots," but "sweet fruits," according to Isocrates—pleasant in the end. The longer they live, the more they fall in love with the Muses.[5968]

[5965] Burton. Printed page 281, u: "Isaack Wake musæ regnantes." Isaac Wake, The Reigning Muses; see the editorial note on his account of James's visit.

[5966] Burton. Printed page 281, x: "Si unquam mihi in fatis sit, ut captivus ducar, si mihi daretur optio, hoc cuperem carcere concludi, his catenis illigari, cum hisce captivis concatenatis ætatem agere." "If ever it is my fate to be led away a captive, and I were given a choice, I would wish to be shut in this prison, bound with these chains, and spend my life with these fellow captives chained together."

[5967] Editor. Oxford's account of James's 1605 visit reproduces the library-as-prison remark, and Folger identifies Isaac Wake's Rex platonicus as an account of that visit. The margin calls it Musæ regnantes. Chained books make the prison image a material joke as well as a tribute to learning. "S." is Sir. The allusion to Alexander is not explained by Burton and remains unresolved.

[5968] Editor. Dropsy is the older term for swelling associated with fluid accumulation; the thirst comparison belongs to historical medical imagery. The latest-day phrase abbreviates a maxim in the collection transmitted as Publilius Syrus's Sentences, under D: each later day is the earlier day's pupil. Libanius, Preliminary Exercises, Anecdote 3, attributes the bitter-root and sweet-fruit saying to Isocrates; Diogenes Laertius 5.18 attributes a parallel to Aristotle. Both traditions exist. Libanius is compared in Gibson's translation, p. 65; Burton's intermediary remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Heinsius the keeper of the Library at Leiden in Holland, was mewed up in it all the year long; and that which to thy thinking should have bred a loathing, caused in him a greater liking. [5969]I no sooner (saith he) come into the Library, but I bolt the door to me, excluding lust, ambition, avarice, and all such vices, whose nurse is idleness the mother of ignorance, and Melancholy her self, and in the very lap of eternity, amongst so many divine souls, I take my seat, with so lofty a spirit and sweet content, that I pity all our great ones, and rich men that know not this happinesse.	Heinsius, keeper of the library at Leiden in Holland, was shut up in it all year long. What you might think would have bred disgust only increased his delight. "No sooner," he says, "do I enter the library than I bolt the door behind me, shutting out lust, ambition, greed, and all such vices, whose nurse is idleness, the mother of ignorance—and Melancholy herself. In the very lap of eternity, among so many divine souls, I take my seat with such an elevated spirit and such sweet contentment that I pity all our great and wealthy people who do not know this happiness."[5970]
I am not ignorant in the mean time (notwithstanding this which I have said) how barbarously and basely for the most part our ruder gentry esteem of Libraries and books, how they neglect and contemn so great a treasure, so inestimable a benefit, as Æsops Cock did the Jewel he found in the dunghill; and all through error, ignorance and want of education.	Meanwhile, despite what I have said, I know how barbarously and meanly most of our less cultivated gentry regard libraries and books: how they neglect and despise so great a treasure, so priceless a benefit, as Aesop's cock did the jewel he found in the dungheap—all through error, ignorance, and lack of education.[5971]

[5969] Burton. Printed page 281, y: "Epist. Primiero. Plerunque in qua simulac pedem posui, foribus pessulum obdo, ambitionem autem, amorem, libidinem, etc. excludo, quorum parens est ignavia, imperitia nutrix, & in ipso æternitatis gremio, inter tot illustres animas sedem mihi sumo, cum ingenti quidem animo, ut subinde magnatum me misereat, qui felicitatem hanc ignorant." Letter to Primierus. "Usually, as soon as I set foot in it, I bolt the doors, shutting out ambition, love, lust, and so forth, whose parent is idleness and whose nurse is ignorance; and in eternity's very lap, among so many illustrious souls, I take my seat with such elevation of mind that I often pity the great, who do not know this happiness."

[5970] Editor. "Mewed up" means confined. The body and Latin margin differ: the Latin makes idleness the parent and ignorance the nurse of the vices, whereas Burton's English rearranges these roles and explicitly adds Melancholy. Both versions are retained. The full letter and the identity behind "Primiero" remain to be collated.

[5971] Editor. In the fable, a cock finds a precious stone but prefers useful food. Burton applies it polemically to the gentry's failure to value books. "Ruder" means less educated or cultivated, not simply impolite.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And 'tis a wonder withall to observe how much they will vainly cast away in unnecessary expences, quot modis pereant (saith [5972]Erasmus) magnatibus pecuniæ, quantum absumat alea, scorta, compotationes, profectiones non necessariæ, pompæ, bella quæsita, ambitio, colax, morio, ludio, &c. what in hawkes, hounds, law-suits, vain buildings, gurmundizing, drinking, sports, playes, pastimes, &c.	It is astonishing, too, to see how much they squander on needless expenses. "In how many ways," says Erasmus, "does the money of the great disappear! How much is consumed by gambling, prostitutes, drinking parties, unnecessary journeys, displays of splendour, wars deliberately sought, ambition, the flatterer, the fool, the player," and so on! What sums go on hawks, hounds, lawsuits, vain buildings, gluttony, drinking, sports, plays, pastimes, and the rest![5973]
Source page 281–282 If a well minded man to the Muses would sue to some of them for an exhibition, to the farther maintenance or inlargement of such a work, be it College, Lecture, Library, or whatsoever else may tend to the advancement of learning, they are so unwilling, so averse, they had rather see these which are already, with such cost and care erected, utterly ruined, demolished or otherwise employed; for they repine many and grudge at such gifts and revenews so bestowed:	If someone well disposed towards the Muses were to ask some of them for financial support towards maintaining or enlarging such a work—a college, lectureship, library, or anything else that might advance learning—they are so unwilling, so opposed, that they would rather see the institutions already built at such expense and with such care utterly ruined, demolished, or put to other uses. Many of them resent and grudge the gifts and revenues devoted to such purposes.[5974]

[5972] Burton. Printed page 281, *: "Chil. 2. Cent. 1. adag. 1." Second thousand, first hundred, first adage; a reference to Erasmus's Adages.

[5973] Editor. Erasmus's sequence names kinds of expenditure and people who consume a patron's money. Colax is a flatterer, morio a fool or jester, and ludio a player or entertainer. The locator is retained; the exact Adages text has not yet been collated.

[5974] Editor. An "exhibition" is financial maintenance or a stipend; a "Lecture" may be an endowed teaching post. "They repine many" is the source's awkward word order, rendered as many of them resent. Burton criticizes the diversion or destruction of foundations for learning.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 282 and therefore it were in vain, as Erasmus well notes, vel ab his, vel à negotiatoribus, qui se Mammonæ dediderunt, improbum fortasse tale officium exigere, to solicite or ask any thing of such men that are likely damn'd to riches; to this purpose. For my part I pity these men, stultos jubeo esse libenter, let them go as they are, in the catalogue of Ignoramus.	It would therefore be in vain, as Erasmus aptly observes, "to demand such a service either from these men or from merchants who have devoted themselves to Mammon—perhaps an unreasonable demand." To solicit or ask anything for this purpose from men so likely damned to riches! For my part, I pity them: "I gladly bid them remain fools." Let them go as they are, in the catalogue of ignoramuses.[5975]
How much on the other side, are all we bound that are schollers, to those Munificent Ptolomies, bountifull Mæcenates, heroicall Patrons, divine spirits, —— [5976]qui nobis hæc otia fecerunt, namque erit ille mihi semper Deus —— that have provided for us so many well furnished Libraries as well in our publick Academies in most Cities, as in our private Colleges?	How deeply, on the other hand, are all of us scholars indebted to those munificent Ptolemies, generous Maecenases, heroic patrons, and divine spirits—"who have provided this leisure for us; for he will always be a god to me"—who have furnished us with so many well-stocked libraries, both in the public academies of most cities and in our individual colleges?[5977]

[5975] Editor. Mammon personifies wealth; compare Matthew 6:24. Burton's phrase "damn'd to riches" carries an intentionally harsh religious judgement. The Latin calls the request perhaps improper or unreasonable. "Ignoramus" is taken here in its ordinary sense of an ignorant person; no specific dramatic allusion is assumed.

[5976] Burton. Printed page 282, *: "Virg. eclog. 1." Virgil, Eclogue 1.

[5977] Editor. Ptolemies and Maecenases are exemplary royal and private patrons of learning. Burton adapts Virgil, Eclogue 1.6–7: his first clause is plural, but the following "he" remains singular. The shift is retained in translation. "Private Colleges" contrasts individual collegiate foundations with public academies, not a modern funding category.

Original text 1651	Modern English
How shall I remember [5978]S. Thomas Bodley, amongst the rest, [5979]Otho Nicholson, and the right reverend John Williams Lord Bishop of Lincolne (with many other pious acts) who besides that at S. Johns College in Cambridge, that in Westminster, is now likewise in Fieri with a library at Lincolne (a noble president for all Corporate towns and cities to imitate) O quam te memorem (vir illustrissime) quibus elogiis? But to my taske again.	How shall I commemorate, among the others, Sir Thomas Bodley, Otho Nicholson, and the Right Reverend John Williams, Lord Bishop of Lincoln? Besides his many other pious works, and the libraries at St John's College, Cambridge, and at Westminster, he now also has a library at Lincoln in progress—a noble example for all incorporated towns and cities to follow. "How shall I commemorate you, most illustrious man, and with what praises?" But back to my task.[5980]

[5978] Burton. Printed page 282, †: "Founder of our publike library in Oxon." Already English: founder of our public library at Oxford.

[5979] Burton. Printed page 282, *: "Ours in Christ church Oxon." Already English: ours at Christ Church, Oxford.

[5980] Editor. St John's College records Williams's library benefaction, built in 1623–1628. Westminster Abbey records his provision of bookcases and about 2,000 books in 1623. The Oxford institutions document Bodley and Nicholson as benefactors. In fieri means in the making; president means precedent. The praise adapts Aeneid 1.327 from a maiden to an illustrious man. Burton's now is retained; the Lincoln project and the date at which this sentence entered his text remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whosoever he is therefore that is overrun with solitariness, or carried away with pleasing melancholy, and vain conceits, and for want of imployment knows not how to spend his time, or crucified with worldly cares, I can prescribe him no better remedy then this of study, to compose himself to the learning of some art or science.	Whoever is overwhelmed by solitude, carried away by pleasurable melancholy and idle fancies, at a loss how to spend his time for lack of employment, or tormented by worldly cares—I can prescribe no better remedy for him than study: to settle himself to learning some art or science.[5981]
Provided alwayes that his malady proceed not from overmuch study; for in such cases he addes fuell to the fire, and nothing can be more pernicious; let him take heed he do not overstretch his wits, and make a Skeleton of himself; or such Inamoratoes as read nothing but play-books, Idle Poems, Jests, Amadis de Gaul, the Knight of the Sun, the seven Champions, Palmerin de Oliva, Huon of Burdeaux, &c. Such many times prove in the end as mad as Don Quixot.	Always provided that his illness does not arise from excessive study: in that case he adds fuel to the fire, and nothing could be more harmful. Let him take care not to overstrain his mind and turn himself into a skeleton; or to become one of those lovesick readers who read nothing but plays, idle poems, jests, Amadis of Gaul, The Knight of the Sun, The Seven Champions, Palmerin de Oliva, Huon of Bordeaux, and the like. Such people often end up as mad as Don Quixote.[5982]
Study is only prescribed to those that are otherwise idle, troubled in minde, or carried headlong with vain thoughts and imaginations, to distract their cogitations (although variety of study, or some serious subject would do the former no harm) and divert their continuall meditations another way. Nothing in this case better then study; semper aliquid memoriter ediscant, saith Piso, let them learn something without book, transcribe, translate, &c.	Study is prescribed only for those who are otherwise idle, troubled in mind, or swept away by empty thoughts and imaginings, to draw their thoughts elsewhere and turn their continual reflections in another direction—although a change of study, or a serious subject, would do the former readers no harm. Nothing is better than study in such a case: “Let them always learn something by heart,” says Piso. Let them memorize something, copy it out, translate it, and so forth.[5983]

[5981] Editor. This paragraph resumes Burton’s practical argument after the digression on libraries and patrons. “Compose himself” means settle or apply himself. His account of melancholy and its treatment is retained as a historical argument.

[5982] Editor. The list consists of romances and other popular reading. “Inamoratoes” are people absorbed in love. Don Quixote supplies the example of a reader whose devotion to chivalric romances distorts his judgement. Burton’s syntactically loose transition is clarified without removing his distinction between kinds of reading.

[5983] Editor. “Distract” and “divert” here mean redirect attention. “Without book” means from memory. The parenthesis appears chiefly to qualify the preceding readers of romances: a different or more serious subject may help them. It does not cancel the warning against excessive study. Piso’s exact passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Read the Scriptures, which Hyperius lib. 1. de quotid. script. lec. fol. 77. holds available of it self, [5984]the mind is erected thereby from all worldly cares, and hath much quiet and tranquillity. For as [5985]Austin well hath it, 'tis scientia scientiarum, omni melle dulcior, omni pane suavior, omni vino hilarior: 'Tis the best Nepenthe, surest cordiall, sweetest alterative, present diverter:	Read the Scriptures. Hyperius, in book 1 of On the Daily Reading of Scripture, folio 77, holds this beneficial in itself: the mind is thereby lifted above all worldly cares and enjoys great peace and tranquillity. For, as Augustine aptly puts it, it is "the knowledge of knowledges, sweeter than any honey, more pleasing than any bread, more cheering than any wine." It is the best nepenthe, the surest restorative, the sweetest medicine for changing one's condition, an immediate diversion.[5986]
For neither as [5987]Chrysostome well adds, those boughs and leaves of trees, which are plashed for cattle to stand under, in the heat of the day, in summer, so much refresh them with their acceptable shade, as the reading of the scripture doth recreate, & comfort a distressed soul, in sorrow and affliction.	For, as Chrysostom aptly adds, branches and leaves woven together for cattle to stand beneath in the summer heat do not refresh them with their welcome shade as much as reading Scripture refreshes and comforts a distressed soul in sorrow and affliction.[5988]

[5984] Burton. Printed page 282, z: "Animus levatur inde à curis multa quiete & tranquillitate fruens." "The mind is thereby lifted away from cares, enjoying great peace and tranquillity."

[5985] Burton. Printed page 282, *: "Ser. 38. ad Fratres Erem." Sermon 38 to the Hermit Brothers; cited by Burton under Augustine's name.

[5986] Editor. Nepenthe is the legendary grief-dispelling drug; a cordial restores strength, and an alterative changes the body's condition without an obvious evacuation in historical medicine. "Present" means immediate. The sermon collection cited under Augustine's name requires an authorship check; no claim that the particular sermon is authentically Augustine's is made here.

[5987] Burton. Printed page 282, †: "Hom. 4. de pœnitentia. Nam neque arborum comæ pro pecorum tuguriis factæ, meridie per æstatem optabilem exhibentes umbram oves ita reficiunt, ac scripturarum lectio afflictas angore animas solatur & recreat." Homily 4, On Repentance. "For not even the leafy branches of trees made into shelters for cattle, offering welcome shade at midday in summer, refresh the sheep as much as reading Scripture consoles and renews souls afflicted by distress."

[5988] Editor. "Plashed" describes branches interwoven to form a shelter. The contrast gives a physical image for the comfort of reading. The Latin marginal quotation is retained in full, including its shift from cattle to sheep; its precise homily text remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 282–283 Paul bids Pray continually, quod cibus corpori, lectio animæ facit, saith Seneca, as meat is to the body, such is reading to the soul. [5989]To be at leasure without books is another hell, & to be buried alive.	Paul says, “Pray continually.” “What food does for the body, reading does for the soul,” says Seneca: reading is to the soul what food is to the body. Leisure without books is another hell, and burial alive.[5990]
Source page 283 [5991]Cardan cals a library the physick of the soul; [5992]Divine authours fortifie the mind, make men bold & constant; & (as Hyperius adds) godly conference will not permit the mind to be tortured with absurd cogitations. Rhasis injoynes continuall conference to such melancholy men, perpetuall discourse of some history, tale, poem, news, &c. alternos sermones edere ac bibere, æque jucundum quam cibus, sive potus, which feeds the minde as meat and drink doth the body and pleaseth as much:	Cardano calls a library medicine for the soul. Religious authors strengthen the mind, making people courageous and steadfast; and, as Hyperius adds, godly conversation will not allow the mind to be tormented by absurd thoughts. Rhazes prescribes continual conversation for such melancholy people: ongoing talk about some history, tale, poem, news, and the like. “To eat and drink one another’s talk is as pleasant as food or drink”: it nourishes the mind as food and drink nourish the body, and pleases it as much.[5993]

[5989] Burton. Printed page 283, a: “Otium sine literis mors est, & vivi hominis sepultura, Seneca.” “Leisure without learning is death and the burial of a living person.” Seneca.

[5990] Editor. Paul’s instruction is 1 Thessalonians 5:17. Seneca, Moral Letters 82.3, calls leisure without learning death and burial alive; Burton intensifies death to another hell. The preceding food-and-reading maxim is not located verbatim. Letters 2.2–4 compares sustained reading with nourishment and warns that rapidly changing books resembles food that does not nourish. This is a thematic parallel, not proof of the maxim’s source.

[5991] Burton. Printed page 283, b: “Cap. 99. l. 57. de rer. var.” Chapter 99, book 57, On the Variety of Things. The printed book number is problematic; see the editorial note.

[5992] Burton. Printed page 283, c: “Fortem reddunt animum & constantem; & pium colloquium non permittit animum absurda cogitatione torqueri.” “They make the mind strong and steadfast; and pious conversation does not allow the mind to be tortured by absurd thought.”

[5993] Editor. “Conference” means conversation, not a formal meeting. The margin prints “l. 57.” for Cardano’s book number, an anomalous reading retained pending verification rather than silently changed. The food metaphor concerns the nourishment supplied by exchanging speech. Rhazes is the physician al-Razi; his cited instruction remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And therefore the said Rhasis not without good cause would have some body still talke seriously, or dispute with them, and sometimes [5994]to cavil and wrangle (so that it break not out to a violent perturbation) for such altercation is like stirring of a dead fire to make it burn afresh, it whets a dull spirit, and will not suffer the minde to be drowned in those profound cogitations, which melancholy men are commonly troubled with.	For this reason Rhazes, with good cause, would have someone always talk seriously or debate with them, and sometimes even quibble and argue—provided it does not erupt into violent agitation. Such disputation is like stirring a dying fire to make it burn afresh: it sharpens a sluggish mind and will not let it drown in those deep thoughts that commonly trouble melancholy people.[5995]
[5996]Ferdinand and Alphonsus kings of Arragon and Sicily, were both cured by reading the history, one of Curtius, the other of Livy, when no prescribed physick would take place. [5997]Camerarius relates as much of Lawrence Medices. Heathen Philosophers are so full of divine precepts in this kinde, that as some think they alone are able to settle a distressed mind.	Ferdinand and Alfonso, kings of Aragon and Sicily, were both cured by reading history—one Curtius, the other Livy—when no prescribed medicine would work. Camerarius reports the same of Lorenzo de' Medici. Pagan philosophers are so full of divine precepts of this kind that some believe they alone can calm a distressed mind.[5998]

[5994] Burton. Printed page 283, d: "Altercationibus utantur, quæ non permittunt animum submergi profundis cogitationibus, de quibus otiose cogitat & tristatur in iis." "Let them engage in arguments, which do not allow the mind to be submerged in the deep thoughts on which it broods in idleness and finds cause for sadness."

[5995] Editor. Burton's recommendation is conditional: animated disagreement is to interrupt brooding, but must stop short of violent agitation. "Whets" means sharpens or rouses. The historical prescription is not expanded into a modern therapeutic recommendation.

[5996] Burton. Printed page 283, e: "Bodin. præfat. ad meth. hist." Bodin, preface to the Method for the Easy Comprehension of History.

[5997] Burton. Printed page 283, f: "Operum subcis. cap. 15." Leisure Hours, chapter 15; Burton's abbreviated title is retained.

[5998] Editor. These cures are reported anecdotes, not established clinical findings. Burton supplies the two kings' names and two historians without securely identifying the individual rulers or matching each to a book. Camerarius's anecdote about Lorenzo de' Medici likewise remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[5999]Sunt verba & voces, quibus hunc lenire dolorem, &c. Epictetus, Plutarch, and Seneca; qualis ille, quæ tela, saith Lipsius, adversus omnes animi casus administrat, & ipsam mortem, quomodo vitia eripit, infert virtutes? when I read Seneca, [6000]me thinks I am beyond all humane fortunes, on the top of an hill above mortalitie.	"There are words and sayings by which to soothe this pain," and so forth: Epictetus, Plutarch, and Seneca. "What a man he is! What weapons," says Lipsius, "he supplies against every misfortune of the mind and against death itself! How he tears out vices and implants virtues!" When I read Seneca, I feel beyond all human fortunes, on a mountain summit above mortality.[6001]
Plutarch saith as much of Homer, for which cause belike Niceratus in Xenophon, was made by his parents to con Homers Iliads and Odysses without book, ut in virum bonum evaderet, as well to make him a good and honest man, as to avoid idleness. If this comfort may be got by Philosophy, what shall be had from Divinity? What shall *Austin, Cyprian, Gregory, Bernard*s divine meditations afford us?	Plutarch says as much of Homer. This is probably why, in Xenophon, Niceratus's parents made him learn Homer's Iliad and Odyssey by heart: "so that he might become a good man," both to make him good and upright and to keep him from idleness. If philosophy can provide such comfort, what may we gain from theology? What will the religious meditations of Augustine, Cyprian, Gregory, and Bernard give us?[6002]
Qui quid sit pulchrum, quid turpe, quid utile, quid non, Plenius & melius Chrysippo & Crantore dicunt.	They tell us what is noble, what shameful, what useful, what not, More fully and better than Chrysippus and Crantor.[6003]

[5999] Burton. Printed page 283, g: "Hor." Horace.

[6000] Burton. Printed page 283, h: "Fatendum est cacumine Olympi constitutus supra ventos & procellas, & omnes res humanas." "One must confess oneself placed on the summit of Olympus, above winds and storms and all human affairs."

[6001] Editor. The first quotation abbreviates Horace, Epistles 1.1.34–35, which promises words to relieve mental pain. The source here gives lenire without completing the construction with possis. Lipsius's praise of Seneca is retained, but its exact location remains unresolved. The Latin margin expands the mountain image to Olympus, above storms and human affairs.

[6002] Editor. Xenophon, Symposium 3.5, has Niceratus say that his father made him memorize Homer to become a good man. Burton broadens this to "parents" and adds the avoidance of idleness; these differences remain visible. "Divinity" is theology. The cited church writers are Augustine, Cyprian, Gregory and Bernard; Burton does not specify works here.

[6003] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.2.3–4, originally says that Homer teaches these distinctions better than the philosophers Chrysippus and Crantor. Burton changes singular dicit to plural dicunt and applies the lines to religious writers. His plural is preserved in both columns.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nay what shall the Scripture it self? Which is like an Apothecaries shop, wherein are all remedies for all infirmities of minde, purgatives, cordials, alteratives, corroboratives, lenitives, &c. [6004]Every disease of the soul, saith Austin, hath a peculiar medicine in the Scripture; this onely is required, that the sick man take the potion which God hath already tempered.	Indeed, what will Scripture itself give us? It is like an apothecary's shop containing remedies for every illness of the mind: purgatives, restoratives, medicines that alter its condition, strengthening remedies, soothing remedies, and so forth. "Every disease of the soul," says Augustine, "has its particular medicine in Scripture. All that is required is for the sick person to take the draught God has already prepared."[6005]
[6006]Gregory cals it a glass wherein we may see all our infirmities, ignitum colloquium, Psalm. 119. 140. [6007]Origen a Charme. And therefore Hierome prescribes Rusticus the Monke, [6008]continually to read the scripture, and to meditate on that which he hath read; for as mastication is to meat, so is meditation on that which we read.	Gregory calls it a mirror in which we may see all our infirmities; "speech tried by fire," Psalm 119:140; Origen calls it a charm. And so Jerome directs Rusticus the monk continually to read Scripture and reflect on what he has read: for meditation is to what we read as chewing is to food.[6009]

[6004] Burton. Printed page 283, i: "In Ps. 36. omnis morbus animi in Scriptura habet medicinam; tantum opus est ut qui sit æger, non recuset potionem quam Deus temperavit." On Psalm 36. "Every disease of the soul has its medicine in Scripture; all that is needed is for the sick person not to refuse the draught God has prepared."

[6005] Editor. The apothecary's shop extends the medical metaphor: purgatives evacuate, cordials revive, alteratives change bodily condition, corroboratives strengthen, and lenitives soothe. The Augustine quotation and its Psalm 36 locator remain uncollated; older Latin psalm numbering can differ from modern English numbering. Burton's claim is translated as his theological assertion.

[6006] Burton. Printed page 283, k: "In moral. speculum quo nos intueri possimus." In the Morals: "a mirror in which we may look at ourselves."

[6007] Burton. Printed page 283, l: "Hom. 28. Ut incantatione virus fugatur, ita lectione malum." Homily 28. "As poison is driven away by an incantation, so evil by reading."

[6008] Burton. Printed page 283, m: "Iterum atque iterum moneo, ut animam sacræ scripturæ lectione occupes. Masticat divinum pabulum meditatio." "Again and again I urge you to occupy your soul with the reading of sacred Scripture. Meditation chews the divine food." The note continues from the outer margin along the foot of the page.

[6009] Editor. "Ignitum colloquium" evokes Psalm 119:140, where God's word is thoroughly tried or refined; "speech tried by fire" preserves that image. Gregory's mirror, Origen's charm and Jerome's chewing metaphor each describe a use of Scripture. Burton's specific patristic quotations and locators need fuller collation. The complete Jerome marginal note includes its continuation at the foot of the scan. Burton proceeds to prescribed intellectual tasks, including memory and mathematics.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I would for these causes wish him that is melancholy, to use both humane and divine authors, voluntarily to impose some task upon himself, to divert his melancholy thoughts: To study the art of memory, Cosmus Rosselius, Pet. Ravennas, Scenkelius detectus, or practice Brachygraphy, &c. that will ask a great deal of attention: or let him demonstrate a proposition in Euclide in his five last books, extract a square root, or studie Algebra:	For these reasons I would advise a melancholy person to use both secular and religious authors, and voluntarily set himself a task to turn aside his melancholy thoughts: to study the art of memory—Cosmus Rosselius, Petrus Ravennas, Scenkelius Detected—or practise shorthand, and the like, which will demand close attention. Or let him demonstrate a proposition from the last five books of Euclid, extract a square root, or study algebra.[6010]
Source page 283–284 Then which as [6011]Clavius holds, in all humane disciplines nothing can be more excellent and pleasant, so abstruse and recondite, so bewitching, so miraculous, so ravishing, so easie withall and full of delight, omnem humanum captum superare videtur.	As Clavius holds, nothing in all human learning can be more excellent or pleasing: so profound and hidden, so enchanting, so marvellous, so captivating, yet so easy and full of delight, that "it seems to surpass all human understanding."[6012]

[6010] Editor. "Humane" means secular or humanistic, contrasted with religious writing; "brachygraphy" is shorthand. The memory references retain Burton's forms pending exact identification and edition checks; Scenkelius detectus is presented as a title, literally Scenkelius Exposed. Clavius's Euclid circulated as fifteen books, so Burton's "five last" should not automatically be mapped onto the last five of a modern thirteen-book edition.

[6011] Burton. Printed page 283, *: "Ad 2. definit. 2. elem. In disciplinis humanis nihil præstantius reperitur: quippe miracula quædam numerorum eruit tam abstrusa & recondita, tanta nihilominus facilitate & voluptate, ut &c." On definition 2 of book 2 of the Elements. "Nothing more excellent is found in human disciplines, for it brings to light certain marvels of numbers so abstruse and hidden, yet with such ease and pleasure that," and so forth. This note is printed across the foot of the page.

[6012] Editor. Christopher Clavius was an editor and commentator on Euclid; the Deutsche Digitale Bibliothek records a fifteen-book edition. Burton's marginal Latin breaks off at ut &c.; the concluding phrase in the body is therefore preserved without being inserted into the incomplete note. His exact commentary passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 284 By this means you may define ex ungue leonem, as the diverbe is, by his thumb alone the bigness of Hercules, or the true dimensions of the great [6013]Colossus, Solomons temple, and Domitians Amphitheater out of a little part.	By this means you can determine "the lion from its claw," as the proverb goes: Hercules' size from his thumb alone, or the true dimensions of the great Colossus, Solomon's Temple, and Domitian's amphitheatre from one small part.[6014]
By this art you may contemplate the variation of the 23 letters, which may be so infinitely varied, that the words complicated and deduced thence will not be contained within the compass of the firmament; ten words may be varied 40320 severall wayes:	By this art you can contemplate the permutations of the twenty-three letters, which can be varied so endlessly that the words combined and derived from them would not fit within the compass of the heavens. Ten words can be arranged in 40,320 different ways.[6015]
by this art you may examine how many men may stand one by another, in the whole superficies of the earth, some say 148456800000000 assignando singulis passum quadratum, how many men, supposing all the world as habitable as France, as fruitfull and so long lived, may be born in 60000 years, and so may you demonstrate with [6016]Archimedes how many Sands the mass of the whole world might contain if all sandy, if you did but first know how much a small cube as big as a Mustard-seed might hold, with infinite such.	By this art you can examine how many people could stand side by side over the entire surface of the earth—some say 148,456,800,000,000, "allowing each a square pace"; how many could be born in 60,000 years, supposing the whole world as habitable as France, as fertile and its people as long-lived. And, with Archimedes, you can demonstrate how many grains of sand the entire bulk of the world might contain if it were all sand, provided you first knew how many a small cube the size of a mustard seed could hold —and countless other such questions.[6017]

[6013] Burton. Printed page 284, †: "Which contained 1080000 weight of brass." Already English: which contained 1,080,000 weight of brass. Burton does not specify a unit here.

[6014] Editor. The proverb ex ungue leonem means inferring the whole from a part. Burton gives Hercules' thumb as another example. "Diverbe" means proverb or saying. The Colossus is the giant statue at Rhodes; neither the weight unit nor the calculations behind these architectural examples is supplied here, and none is silently added.

[6015] Editor. Twenty-three letters reflects the Latin alphabet's older grouping of letter forms. The printed "ten" and "40320" are preserved: 40,320 is the number of arrangements of eight distinct items, whereas ten distinct items have 3,628,800 arrangements. The error is flagged here rather than silently repaired in the modern text.

[6016] Burton. Printed page 284, *: "Vide Clavium in com. de Sacrobosco." See Clavius in his commentary on Sacrobosco.

[6017] Editor. These enormous numerical claims are Burton's reported calculations, not verified estimates. A square pace is a historical area measure; no conversion is imposed. Archimedes' Sand-Reckoner does estimate the sand a cosmic volume could contain, but uses a poppy seed, not Burton's mustard-seed cube. The number and the 60,000-year supposition are retained. The discussion next turns to astronomy and mechanical inventions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But in all nature what is there so stupend as to examine and calculate the motion of the planets, their magnitudes, apogeums, perigeums, excentricities, how far distant from the earth; the bigness, thickness, compass of the Firmament, each star, with her diameters and circumference, apparent area, superficies, by those curious helps of glasses, astrolabes, sextants, quadrants, of which Tycho Brahe in his mechanicks, opticks ([6018]divine opticks) Arithmetick, Geometry, and such like arts and instruments?	But in all nature, what is so astonishing as examining and calculating the motions of the planets, their sizes, apogees, perigees, eccentricities, and distances from the earth; the size, thickness, and extent of the firmament; each star, with its diameters, circumference, apparent area, and surface—using those ingenious aids, glasses, astrolabes, sextants, and quadrants, which Tycho Brahe discusses in his work on instruments; optics—divine optics!—arithmetic, geometry, and similar arts and instruments?[6019]
What so intricate and pleasing, withall as to peruse and practise Heron Alexandrinus works, de spiritalibus, de machinis bellicis, de machinâ se movente, Iordani Nemorarii de ponderibus proposit. 13. that pleasant tract of Machometes Bragdedinus de superficierum divisionibus, Apollonius Conicks, or Commandinus labours in that kinde, de centro gravitatis, with many such Geometrical Theorems, and Problems?	What is so intricate and at the same time so delightful as studying and putting into practice the works of Hero of Alexandria on pneumatics, war machines, and self-moving machinery; proposition 13 of Jordanus Nemorarius's On Weights; that delightful treatise by Machometes Bragdedinus, On the Division of Surfaces; Apollonius's Conics; or Commandinus's work in this field, On the Centre of Gravity, with many similar geometrical theorems and problems?[6020]

[6018] Burton. Printed page 284, dagger: "Distantias cœlorum sola Optica dijudicat." Optics alone determines the distances of the heavens.

[6019] Editor. Apogee and perigee are the most distant and nearest points of a body's orbit relative to the earth; eccentricity concerns departure from a centred or circular arrangement. "Firmament" retains Burton's celestial framework. Glasses here includes optical lenses and mirrors; these sextants and quadrants are historical astronomical instruments. The reference to Tycho's mechanics concerns his instruments, not a modern textbook of mechanics.

[6020] Editor. The catalogue juxtaposes pneumatics, mechanics, the geometry of conic sections, and centres of gravity. Latin titles are translated in the modern column. The printed names Machometes Bragdedinus and Iordani Nemorarii are retained on the left; the precise editions and proposition numbering await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Those rare instruments and mechanical inventions of Iac. Bessonus, and Cardan to this purpose, with many such experiments intimated long since by Roger Bacon in his Tract de [6021]Secretis artis & naturæ, as to make a chariot to move sine animali, diving boats, to walk on the water by art and to fly in the air, to make several cranes and pullies, quibus homo trahat ad se mille homines, lift up and remove great weights, Mils to move themselves, Architas Dove, Albertus Brasen head, and such Thaumaturgical works.	Those remarkable instruments and mechanical inventions of Jacques Besson and Cardano for such purposes, with many similar experiments suggested long ago by Roger Bacon in his treatise On the Secrets of Art and Nature: making a carriage move without an animal; diving boats; walking on water by artifice and flying through the air; making various cranes and pulleys "by which one man may draw a thousand men towards himself"; lifting and moving great weights; mills that move themselves; Archytas's dove, Albertus's brass head, and other such wonder-working devices.[6022]
But especially to do strange miracles by glasses, of which Proclus and Bacon writ of old, burning glasses, multiplying glasses, perspectives, ut unus homo appareat exercitus, to see afar off, to represent solid bodies, by Cylinders and Concaves, to walk in the air, ut veraciter videant (saith Bacon) aurum & argentum & quicquid aliud volunt, & quum veniant ad locum visionis, nihil inveniant, which glasses are much perfected of late by Baptista Porta and Galilæus, and much more is promised by Maginus and Midorgius, to be performed in this kinde.	But above all, performing extraordinary wonders with glasses, of which Proclus and Bacon wrote long ago: burning glasses, multiplying glasses, perspective instruments, "so that one man appears an army"; seeing far away; representing solid bodies by cylindrical and concave surfaces; walking in the air; "so that they really see," says Bacon, "gold and silver and whatever else they wish, and when they come to the place where the image appeared, find nothing." These glasses have lately been greatly improved by Giambattista della Porta and Galileo, and Maginus and Midorgius promise much more to be accomplished in this field.[6023]

[6021] Burton. Printed page 284, dagger: "Cap. 4. & 5." Chapters 4 and 5; the reference is to Bacon's treatise named in the body.

[6022] Editor. "Art" means human skill or contrivance; "thaumaturgical" means wonder-working. The dove and brass head are famous mechanical or magical marvels reported in older literature. Burton's list does not establish that every device was constructed or worked as claimed. The exact Bacon, Besson, and Cardano passages remain to be collated.

[6023] Editor. Burning glasses concentrate light; multiplying glasses produce repeated images. "Perspectives" is a broad historical term for optical devices. Cylindrical and concave reflecting surfaces belong to this catalogue of illusions. Burton's promises, including apparent airborne walking and visible but absent gold, remain his reported claims. Midorgius is retained without a speculative identification in the body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Otocousticons some speak of to intend hearing as the other do sight; Marcellus Vrencken an Hollander in his epistle to Burgravius, makes mention of a friend of his that is about an instrument, quo videbit quæ in altero Horizonte sint.	Some speak of hearing instruments to strengthen hearing as the others do sight. Marcellus Vrencken, a Dutchman, mentions in his letter to Burgravius a friend who is working on an instrument "with which he will see what lies on the other horizon."[6024]
Source page 284–285 But our Alchymists me thinks, and Rosie-Cross men afford most rarities, and are fuller of experiments: they can make gold, separate and alter metals, extract oyls, salts, lees, and do more strange works then Geber, Lullius, Bacon, or any of those Ancients.	But our alchemists and Rosicrucians, I think, offer the greatest marvels and are richest in experiments: they can make gold, separate and transform metals, extract oils, salts, and residues, and perform more extraordinary works than Geber, Lullius, Bacon, or any of those earlier masters.[6025]
Source page 285 Crollius hath made after his master Paracelsus, aurum fulminans, or aurum volatile, which shall imitate thunder and lightning, and crack lowder then any gunpowder; Cornelius Drible a perpetual motion, inextinguible lights, linum non ardens, with many such feats; see his book de naturâ elementorum, besides hail, wind, snow, thunder, lightning, &c. those strange fire-works, divilish petards and such like warlike machinations derived hence, of which read Tartalea and others.	Following his master Paracelsus, Crollius has made "fulminating gold," or "volatile gold," which will imitate thunder and lightning and explode more loudly than any gunpowder. Cornelius Drebbel has made a perpetual-motion device, inextinguishable lights, cloth that will not burn, and many similar wonders; see his book On the Nature of the Elements. Besides hail, wind, snow, thunder, lightning, and so forth, there are those extraordinary fireworks, devilish petards, and similar engines of war derived from these arts, about which you may read Tartaglia and others.[6026]

[6024] Editor. "Otocousticons" means hearing aids or instruments; "intend" means strengthen or intensify. The promised view of the "other horizon" remains a quotation, not an assertion about a successfully demonstrated instrument. Vrencken's letter and the unnamed inventor remain uncollated.

[6025] Editor. "Rosie-Cross men" means Rosicrucians. "Experiments" here ranges over trials, demonstrations, and reported marvels; the confident catalogue soon gives way to explicit scepticism. "Ancients" is comparative: the named authorities include medieval writers, not only classical antiquity. "Lees" means sediment or residue.

[6026] Editor. Aurum fulminans is fulminating or explosive gold; aurum volatile is volatile gold. Linum non ardens literally means non-burning linen or flax. A petard was an explosive device used in siege warfare. Burton's claims for perpetual motion and artificial weather are retained as historical reports, without asserting their achievement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ernestus Burgravius a disciple of Paracelsus hath published a discourse, in which he specifies a lamp to be made of mans blood, Lucerna vitæ & mortis index, so he terms it, which Chymically prepared 40 dayes and afterward kept in a glasse, shall shew all the accidents of this life, si lampas hic clarus, tunc homo hilaris & sanus corpore & animo; si nebulosus & depressus, male afficitur, & sic pro statu hominis variatur, unde sumptus sanguis; and which is most wonderful, it dies with the party, cum homine perit, & evanescit, the lamp and the man whence the blood was taken, are extinguished together.	Ernestus Burgravius, a disciple of Paracelsus, has published a discourse describing a lamp to be made from human blood. He calls it "a lamp that indicates life and death." Chemically prepared for forty days and afterwards kept in a glass vessel, it will reveal all the changes in that person's life: "If this lamp is bright, the man is cheerful and healthy in body and mind; if cloudy and dim, he is unwell; and so it varies with the condition of the man from whom the blood was taken." Most wonderful of all, it dies with the person: "It perishes and vanishes with the man." The lamp and the man whose blood supplied it are extinguished together.[6027]
The same Author hath another Tract of Mumia (all out as vain and prodigious as the first) by which he will cure most diseases, and transfer them from a man to a beast, by drawing blood from one, and applying it to the other, vel in plantam derivare, and an Alexipharmacum, of which Roger Bacon of old in his Tract. de retardanda senectute, to make a man young again, live three or foure hundred years. Besides Panaceas, Martial Amulets, unguentum armarium, balsomes, strange extracts, elixars, and such like magico-magnetical cures.	The same author has another treatise on Mumia, every bit as fanciful and monstrous as the first. By its means he will cure most diseases and transfer them from a man to an animal, drawing blood from one and applying it to the other, "or divert the disease into a plant." There is also an antidote of the kind Roger Bacon wrote about long ago in his treatise On Delaying Old Age, to make a man young again and let him live three or four hundred years. Besides these are universal remedies, martial amulets, weapon-salve, balsams, extraordinary extracts, elixirs, and similar magical and magnetic cures.[6028]

[6027] Editor. "Accidents" means changes or occurrences, not merely mishaps. The lamp purports to track its donor's bodily and mental state. The following paragraph calls such claims vain and prodigious. The printed masculine clarus and nebulosus accompany lampas, ordinarily feminine; the sense is translated without silently repairing the Latin.

[6028] Editor. Mumia is an alchemical and medical term involving bodily substance or its supposed power; it is not safely reduced here to a single ingredient. Alexipharmacum means an antidote or protective remedy. Weapon-salve was supposed to act through a connection between a wound and the weapon. "Magnetical" includes imagined sympathetic action. These are historical claims, not present-day treatments.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now what so pleasing can there be as the speculation of these things, to read and examine such experiments, or if a man be more mathematically given, to calculate, or peruse Napiers Logarithmes, or those tables of artificial [6029]Sines and Tangents, not long since set out by mine old Collegiate, good friend, and late fellow-Student of Christ-Church in Oxford, [6030]M. Edmund Gunter, which will perform that by addition and subtraction only, which heretofore Regiomontanus Tables did by multiplication and division, or those elaborate conclusions of his [6031]Sector, Quadrant and Crosse-staffe.	Now what could be more delightful than contemplating these things, reading about and examining such experiments? Or, if a man is more mathematically inclined, calculating or studying Napier's Logarithms, or those tables of logarithmic sines and tangents recently published by my old college companion, good friend, and former fellow Student of Christ Church, Oxford, Mr Edmund Gunter? With addition and subtraction alone they accomplish what Regiomontanus's tables formerly did by multiplication and division. Or he might study the elaborate practical results obtainable with Gunter's sector, quadrant, and cross-staff.[6032]

[6029] Burton. Printed page 285, dagger: "Printed at London, Anno 1620." Publication notice for the tables.

[6030] Burton. Printed page 285, asterisk: "Late Astronomy-reader at Gresham Colledge." Former lecturer in astronomy at Gresham College.

[6031] Burton. Printed page 285, dagger: "Printed at London by William Iones 1623." Publication notice; date retained as printed.

[6032] Editor. "Artificial" sines and tangents are logarithmic tables. "Student" at Christ Church can denote a member of its foundation. Westminster School's catalogue confirms Gunter's 1620 Canon Triangulorum and a collected edition in 1624; Oxford's History of Science Museum records the Sector and Crosse-Staffe in 1624. Burton's marginal 1623 is retained as a bibliographical discrepancy needing edition-level collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or let him that is melancholy calculate Spherical Triangles, square a Circle, cast a Nativity, which howsoever some taxe, I say with [6033]Garceus, dabimus hoc petulantibus ingeniis, we will in some cases allow: or let him make an Ephemerides, read Suisset the Calculators works, Scaliger de emendatione temporum, and Petavius his adversary, till he understand them, peruse subtile Scotus and Suarez Metaphysicks, or school Divinity, Occam, Thomas, Entisberus, Durand, &c.	Or let the melancholy man calculate spherical triangles, square a circle, or cast a birth horoscope. However some may condemn the last, I say with Garceus, "We shall concede this to adventurous minds": we will allow it in some cases. Or let him compile an ephemeris, read the works of Suisset the Calculator, Scaliger's On the Correction of Chronology and his opponent Petavius until he understands them; examine subtle Scotus and Suárez's metaphysics, or scholastic theology—Ockham, Thomas, Entisberus, Durand, and the rest.[6034]
If those other do not affect him, and his means be great, to imploy his purse and fill his head, he may go find the Philosophers-stone; he may apply his mind I say to Heraldry, Antiquity, invent Impresses, Emblems; make Epithalamiums, Epitaphs, Elegies, Epigrams, Palindroma Epigrammata, Anagrams, Chronograms, Acrosticks, upon his friends names; or write a Comment on Martianus Capella, Tertullian de pallio, the Nubian Geography, or upon Ælia Lælia Crispis, as many idle fellowes have assayed;	If these other subjects do not engage him, and his means are ample, he may go in search of the philosopher's stone, to occupy his purse and fill his head. He may, I say, turn his mind to heraldry or antiquities; devise mottoes and emblems; compose wedding poems, epitaphs, elegies, epigrams, palindromic epigrams, anagrams, chronograms, and acrostics upon his friends' names. Or he may write a commentary on Martianus Capella, Tertullian's On the Mantle, the Nubian Geography, or Ælia Lælia Crispis, as many idle fellows have attempted.[6035]

[6033] Burton. Printed page 285, asterisk: "Præfat. Meth. Astrol." Preface to the astrological method; Burton's abbreviated locator retained.

[6034] Editor. A nativity is a horoscope for the time of birth; an ephemeris tabulates celestial positions. Burton permits astrology here as an absorbing exercise, with qualifications. Suisset is Richard Swineshead, the medieval Calculator. Scotus, Ockham, and Thomas belong to scholastic philosophy and theology. Entisberus and the exact works in the catalogue remain to be checked. Petulantibus can carry a sharper sense of waywardness than Burton's permissive English gloss.

[6035] Editor. An impresa is a symbolic device with a motto; a chronogram encodes a date in its numeral letters; an acrostic uses initial letters to form another text. Epithalamiums are wedding poems. The philosopher's stone was sought for alchemical transformation. The particular commentaries and the enigmatic Ælia Lælia Crispis inscription remain uncollated; the modern column retains their identifying titles.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 285–286 and rather then do nothing, vary a [6036]verse a thousand wayes with Putean, so torturing his wits, or as Rainnerius of Luneburge, [6037]2150 times in his Proteus Poeticus, or Scaliger, Chrysolithus, Cleppisius, and others have in like sort done.	And rather than do nothing, let him rearrange a verse a thousand ways with Putean, tormenting his wits in this fashion; or 2,150 times, like Rainnerius of Lüneburg in his Poetic Proteus, or as Scaliger, Chrysolithus, Cleppisius, and others have similarly done.[6038]
Source page 286 If such voluntary tasks, pleasure and delight, or crabbednesse of these studies, will not divert their idle thoughts, and alienate their imaginations, they must be compelled, saith Christophorus à Vega, cogi debent, l. 5. c. 14. upon some mulct, if they perform it not, quod ex officio incumbat, loss of credit or disgrace, such as are our publike University exercises.	If such voluntary tasks—the pleasure and delight, or the difficulty, of these studies—will not divert their idle thoughts and turn their imaginations elsewhere, they must be compelled, says Christophorus à Vega: "They ought to be compelled," book 5, chapter 14. Let some penalty attach to failure to perform a task "that falls to them as a duty": loss of reputation or disgrace, as with our public university exercises.[6039]
For, as he that playes for nothing, will not heed his game; no more will voluntary imployment so thoroughly affect a Student, except he be very intent of himself, and take an extraordinary delight in the study, about which he is conversant. It should be of that nature his business, which volens nolens he must necessarily undergo, and without great loss, mulct, shame, or hinderance he may not omit.	For just as a man playing for no stakes will pay little attention to his game, so voluntary work will not fully absorb a student unless he is deeply intent of his own accord and takes extraordinary pleasure in his subject. His business should be such that, willing or unwilling, he must undertake it, and cannot neglect it without great loss, a penalty, shame, or disadvantage.

[6036] Burton. Printed page 285, n: "Tot tibi sunt dotes virgo, quot sydera cœlo." Maiden, you have as many gifts as there are stars in the sky.

[6037] Burton. Printed page 285, asterisk: "Da pie Christe urbi bona sit pax tempore nostro." Grant, gracious Christ, that the city may have good peace in our time.

[6038] Editor. These are exercises in rearranging a verse's words. Both sample lines are preserved and translated in Burton notes. The first marginal marker is printed n. The exact counts and the identities or editions behind Putean, Rainnerius, Chrysolithus, and Cleppisius need bibliographical collation; no fresh mathematical guarantee is implied.

[6039] Editor. "Crabbedness" means difficulty or intricacy; "mulct" means a fine or penalty. "Alienate" here means turn attention away. Burton invokes formal university exercises as an example of obligations enforced by consequences; this coercive historical prescription is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now for women, instead of laborious studies, they have curious needle-works, Cut-works, spinning, bone-lace, and many pretty devices of their own making, to adorn their houses, Cushions, Carpets, Chaires, Stools, (for she eats not the bread of idlenesse, Prov. 31. 27. quæsivit lanam & linum) confections, conserves, distillations, &c. which they shew to strangers.	Now, for women, instead of laborious studies, there are elaborate needlework, cutwork, spinning, bobbin lace, and many pretty things of their own making to adorn their houses, cushions, carpets, chairs, and stools—"for she does not eat the bread of idleness," Proverbs 31:27; "she sought wool and flax"—as well as confections, preserves, distilled preparations, and so forth, which they show to visitors.[6040]
[6041]Ipsa comes præsesque operis venientibus ultro Hospitibus monstrare solet, non segniter horas Contestata suas, sed nec sibi deperiisse.	She herself, partner and overseer of the work, freely shows it To visiting guests, bearing witness that her hours Have neither passed in idleness nor been lost to her.[6042]
Which to her guests she shews, with all her pelfe, Thus far my maids, but this I did my self.	She shows it to her guests, with all her treasures: "My maids did this much; but this I did myself."
This they have to busie themselves about, houshold offices, &c. [6043]neat gardens, full of exotick, versicolour, diversly varied, sweet smelling flowers, and plants in all kinds, which they are most ambitious to get, curious to preserve and keep, proud to possess, and much many times brag of.	These things occupy them, along with household duties and the like: neat gardens full of exotic, many-coloured, richly varied, sweet-smelling flowers and plants of every kind, which they are eager to acquire, meticulous in preserving and tending, proud to possess, and often boast of.

[6040] Editor. The division between men's scholarship and women's household work is Burton's. Cutwork is openwork embroidery; bone-lace is bobbin lace. Distillations can be domestic, culinary, or medicinal preparations. Burton's English quotation corresponds to Proverbs 31:27, while the Latin about wool and flax belongs to 31:13; both are retained.

[6041] Burton. Printed page 286, dagger: "Chalonerus Lib. 9. de Rep. Angel." Chaloner, book 9, on the English commonwealth; the printed Angel. is retained.

[6042] Editor. The Latin describes the mistress displaying work as evidence of time well spent. Burton's separate English couplet adds the division between her servants' work and her own; it is therefore retained separately. Pelf means possessions or riches, with a potentially disparaging flavour. The abbreviated præsesq; form is expanded to præsesque; the marginal Angel. is retained pending collation of Chaloner's poem.

[6043] Burton. Printed page 286, asterisk: "Hortus Coronarius, medicus & culinarius, &c." A flower garden, a medicinal garden, and a kitchen garden, and so forth.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Their merry meetings and frequent visitations, mutual invitations in good Towns, I voluntarily omit, which are so much in use; gossipping among the meaner sort, &c. old folks have their beads; an excellent invention to keep them from idleness, that are by nature melancholy, and past all affairs, to say so many Paternosters, Avimaries, Creeds, if it were not prophane and superstitious.	I deliberately pass over their cheerful gatherings, frequent visits, and mutual invitations, so common in prosperous towns; the gossiping of the lower ranks, and so forth. Old people have their prayer beads: an excellent invention for keeping those who are naturally melancholy and past all business from idleness, by saying so many Our Fathers, Hail Marys, and Creeds—if it were not profane and superstitious.[6044]
In a word, body and mind must be exercised, not one, but both, and that in a mediocrity: otherwise it will cause a great inconvenience. If the body be overtired, it tires the mind. The mind oppresseth the body, as with Students oftentimes fals out, who (as [6045]Plutarch observes) have no care of the body, but compell that which is mortal, to do as much as that which is immortal: that which is earthly, as that which is etherial.	In a word, body and mind must both be exercised, and in moderation; otherwise great harm will follow. If the body is overtired, it tires the mind. The mind burdens the body, as often happens with students who, as Plutarch observes, take no care of the body but compel what is mortal to do as much as what is immortal, what is earthly as much as what is heavenly.[6046]

[6044] Editor. "Gossiping" can include social gatherings and visiting, beyond malicious talk. "Meaner sort" denotes lower social rank. The prayer beads cue repeated Catholic devotions. Burton's approval of their occupation-giving function is checked by his Protestant objection that the practice is superstitious; both sides of the sentence are preserved.

[6045] Burton. Printed page 286, o: "Tom. 1. de sanit. tuend. Qui rationem corporis non habent, sed cogunt mortalem immortali, terrestrem etheriæ æqualem præstare industriam: Cæterum ut Camelo usu venit, quod ei bos prædixerat, cum eidem servirent domino & parte oneris levare illum Camelus recusasset, paulo post & ipsius cutem, & totum onus cogetur gestare (quod mortuo bove impletum) Ita animo quoque contingit, dum defatigato corpori, &c." Volume 1, On Preserving Health. Those who take no account of the body, but force the mortal to match the immortal in exertion, the earthly to match the heavenly. Yet, as happened to the camel, as the ox had foretold when both served the same master and the camel refused to relieve him of part of the burden, he would soon be forced to carry both the ox's hide and the whole load—which came true when the ox died. So it also happens to the mind, while to the exhausted body, and so forth. The printed Latin ends incompletely; the body supplies the fuller sense.

[6046] Editor. "Mediocrity" means moderation. Plutarch's Advice about Keeping Well 27, 137C–E, compares the mortal body and immortal soul and warns scholars against neglecting the former. The long Latin margin continues across the foot of the scanned page and is retained in full, including its unfinished ending.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But as the Oxe tyred, told the Camel, (both serving one master) that refused to carry some part of his burden, before it were long, he should be compelled to carry all his pack, and skin to boot (which by and by, the Oxe being dead, fell out) the body may say to the soul, that will give him no respite, or remission: a little after, an Ague, Vertigo, Consumption, seiseth on them both; all his study is omitted, and they must be compelled to be sick together: He that tenders his own good estate, and health, must let them draw with equal yoke, both alike, [6047]that so they may happily enjoy their wished health.	But the weary ox told the camel—both serving one master—who refused to carry some of his burden that before long he would be compelled to carry the whole pack and the ox's hide into the bargain. And so it soon happened, when the ox died. The body may say the same to the soul that will give it no respite or relief: before long, a fever, vertigo, or wasting illness seizes them both; all study is abandoned, and they must be sick together. Whoever values his own welfare and health must let body and mind pull evenly under an equal yoke, so that they may happily enjoy the health they desire.[6048]

[6047] Burton. Printed page 286, p: "Ut pulchram illam & amabilem sanitatem præstemus." So that we may maintain that beautiful and lovely health.

[6048] Editor. The ox-and-camel fable and the advice about an evenly matched team occur in the same Plutarch passage. "Consumption" is a wasting illness here and should not automatically be narrowed to modern tuberculosis. Burton's English expansion and the shorter final Latin margin are both preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 287 Memb. 5. Waking and terrible dreams rectified.	Member 5. Sleeplessness and frightening dreams remedied.
As waking that hurts, by all means must be avoided, so sleep which so much helps, by like waies, [6049]must be procured, by nature or art, inward or outward medicines, and be protracted longer then ordinary, if it may be, as being an especiall help.	Just as harmful wakefulness must by every means be avoided, so sleep, which helps so much, must likewise be brought about: by natural or artificial means, by internal or external medicines, and prolonged beyond the usual time if possible, since it is an especially valuable aid.[6050]
It moystens and fattens the body, concocts, and helps digestion (as we see in Dormice, and those Alpine Mice that sleep all Winter) which Gesner speaks of, when they are so found sleeping under the snow in the dead of Winter, as fat as butter. It expels cares, pacifies the minde, refresheth the weary limbs after long work;	It moistens and fattens the body, processes food, and helps digestion—as we see in dormice and those Alpine mice Gesner describes, which sleep all winter and are found asleep under the snow in midwinter, as fat as butter. It drives out cares, calms the mind, and refreshes weary limbs after long work.[6051]
[6052]Somne quies rerum, placidissime somne deorum, Pax animi, quem cura fugit, qui corpora duris Fessa ministeriis mulces reparasque labori.	Sleep, rest of all things, Sleep, gentlest of the gods, Peace of the mind, whom care flees, who soothe bodies Wearied by hard service and restore them for work.[6053]

[6049] Burton. Printed page 287, q: “Interdicendæ Vigiliæ, somni paulo longiores conciliandi. Altomarus cap. 7. Somnus supra modum prodest, quovis modo conciliandus, Piso.” Wakefulness must be forbidden and somewhat longer sleep induced. Altomare, chapter 7. Sleep is extraordinarily beneficial and should be induced by every means: Piso.

[6050] Editor. “Waking” means wakefulness or sleeplessness in this section. “Art” covers deliberate intervention. The advice that follows belongs to Burton’s early modern medical framework; translating it closely does not convert it into current guidance on insomnia, medicines, alcohol, or sleep posture.

[6051] Editor. “Concoction” is the processing of food by bodily heat in historical physiology. Sleep’s supposed moistening effect belongs to that framework. The “Alpine mice” are left as Burton’s description rather than silently replaced with a modern zoological identification; the precise Gesner passage remains uncollated.

[6052] Burton. Printed page 287, r: “Ovid.” Ovid; the passage is identified in the editorial note.

[6053] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 11.623–625. The Latin says that care flees Sleep and that tired bodies are restored for work. Burton’s English verse instead says Sleep crucifies cares, and is preserved as a separate rendering. No attempt is made to force the two versions into agreement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sleep rest of things, O pleasing Deity, Peace of the Soul, which cares dost crucifie, Weary bodies refresh and mollifie.	Sleep, rest of all things, O delightful deity, Peace of the soul, who put cares to death, Refresh and soothe weary bodies.
The chiefe thing in all Physick [6054]Paracelsus calls it, omnia arcana gemmarum superans & metallorum. The fittest time is [6055]two or three hours after supper, when as the meat is now setled at the bottome of the stomach, and 'tis good to lie on the right side first, because at that site the liver doth rest under the stomach, not molesting any way, but heating him as a fire doth a kettle, that is put to it. After the first sleep, 'tis not amiss to lie on the left side, that the meat may be better descend: and sometimes again on the belly, but never on the back.	Paracelsus calls sleep the chief thing in all medicine, "surpassing all the secret virtues of gems and metals." The best time is two or three hours after supper, when food has settled at the bottom of the stomach. It is good to lie first on the right side, because in that position the liver rests beneath the stomach, causing no disturbance but heating it as a fire heats a kettle set beside it. After the first sleep, it is well to lie on the left side so that the food may descend more easily; and sometimes on the belly again, but never on the back.[6056]
Seven or eight hours is a competent time for a melancholy man to rest, as Crato thinks; but as some do, to lie in bed and not sleep, a day, or half a day together, to give assent to pleasing conceits and vain imaginations, is many wayes pernicious. To procure this sweet moistning sleep, 'tis best to take away the occasions (if it be possible) that hinder, and then to use such inward or outward remedies, which may cause it.	Seven or eight hours is a sufficient time for a melancholy man to rest, Crato thinks. But to lie in bed without sleeping for a day or half a day together, as some do, indulging pleasant fancies and empty imaginings, is harmful in many ways. To obtain this sweet, moistening sleep, it is best to remove, if possible, whatever prevents it, and then use internal or external remedies that may bring it about.[6057]

[6054] Burton. Printed page 287, asterisk: "In Hippoc. Aphorism." On the Aphorisms of Hippocrates; Burton's attribution to Paracelsus is retained.

[6055] Burton. Printed page 287, s: "Crato cons. 21. lib. 2. duabus aut tribus horis post cœnam, quum jam cibus ad fundum ventriculi resederit, primum super latere dextro quiescendum, quod in tali decubitu jecur sub ventriculo quiescat, non gravans sed cibum calfaciens, perinde ac ignis lebetem qui illi admovetur; post primum somnum quiescendum latere sinistro &c." Crato, consultation 21, book 2. Two or three hours after supper, when food has settled at the bottom of the stomach, one should first rest on the right side, because in that position the liver rests beneath the stomach, not weighing it down but warming the food, just as fire heats a cauldron brought near it; after the first sleep one should rest on the left side, and so forth.

[6056] Editor. "Physick" means medicine; arcana are hidden powers or remedies. The liver-as-fire explanation of digestion is historical physiology. The printed "that the meat may be better descend" is retained on the left and rendered according to its clear sense. Crato's entire marginal explanation is preserved. The particular Paracelsus attribution remains uncollated.

[6057] Editor. "Competent" means sufficient or suitable. Burton contrasts sleep with prolonged wakeful daydreaming in bed. The hours and prescriptions are the advice he reports from Crato; no modern clinical recommendation is being added.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Constat hodie (saith Boissardus in his Tract de magiâ cap. 4.) multos ita fascinari ut noctes integras exigant insomnes, summâ inquietudine animorum & corporum; many cannot sleep for witches and fascinations, which are too familiar in some places; they call it, dare alicui malam noctem.	"It is well established today," says Boissardus in his treatise On Magic, chapter 4, "that many are so bewitched that they pass whole nights without sleep, in extreme unrest of mind and body." Many cannot sleep because of witches and enchantments, which are all too common in some places; they call it "giving someone a bad night."[6058]
But the ordinary causes are heat and dryness, which must first be removed; [6059]a hot and dry brain never sleeps well: grief, fears, cares, expectations, anxieties, great business, [6060]In aurem utramque otiose ut dormias, and all violent perturbations of the mind must in some sort be qualified, before we can hope for any good repose.	But the ordinary causes are heat and dryness, which must first be removed: a hot, dry brain never sleeps well. Grief, fears, cares, expectations, anxieties, pressing business—"so that you may sleep at ease on either ear"—and all violent disturbances of the mind must be eased to some degree before we can hope for good rest.[6061]

[6058] Editor. "Fascination" here means bewitchment. The Latin gives a reported explanation of sleeplessness through magic, followed by Burton's English restatement. The next sentence turns to what he calls ordinary causes. Boissard's exact passage remains to be collated.

[6059] Burton. Printed page 287, t: "Sæpius accidit melancholicis, ut nimium exsiccato cerebro vigiliis attenuentur. Ficinus. lib. 1. cap. 29." It often happens that melancholy people, their brains excessively dried, are weakened by sleeplessness. Ficino, book 1, chapter 29.

[6060] Burton. Printed page 287, dagger: "Ter." Terence; Burton's abbreviated attribution.

[6061] Editor. The phrase is adapted from Terence, The Self-Tormentor 342, where Syrus promises to remove Clitipho's fear. The consulted Latin reads utramvis, either ear, where Burton prints utramque, both ears; the idiom means sleeping without worry. Burton's wording is retained. Heat, dryness and the desiccated brain belong to his physiological model, alongside emotional and practical obstacles to rest.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He that sleeps in the day time, or is in suspense or fear, any way troubled in minde, or goes to bed upon a full [6062]stomack, may never hope for quiet rest in the night; nec enim meritoria somnos admittunt, as the [6063]Poet saith; Innes and such like troublesome places are not for sleep; one calls Ostler, another Tapster, one cryes and shouts, another sings, whoupes, hollows,	A man who sleeps during the day, lives in uncertainty or fear, is in any way troubled in mind, or goes to bed on a full stomach can never hope for quiet rest at night. “For lodgings do not admit sleep,” as the poet says. Inns and similar noisy places are no places to sleep: one calls for the stable-hand, another for the bartender; one cries and shouts, another sings, whoops, and bellows.[6064]
—— [6065]absentem cantat amicam, Multa prolutus vappâ nauta atque viator.	——The boatman and the traveller, drenched in sour wine, Sing of their absent sweethearts.[6066]
Source page 288 Who not accustomed to such noyses can sleep amongst them? He that will intend to take his rest must go to bed animo securo, quieto & libero, with a [6067]secure and composed minde, in a quiet place: omnia noctis erunt placidâ composta quiete: and if that will not serve, or may not be obtained, to seek then such means as are requisite.	Who, unless accustomed to such noises, can sleep among them? Anyone intending to rest must go to bed “with a mind at ease, quiet and free”—with a secure and composed mind, in a quiet place: “All things of the night will be settled in peaceful rest.” If that does not suffice, or cannot be obtained, he must seek whatever further means are needed.[6068]

[6062] Burton. Printed page 287, u: “Ut sis nocte levis, sit tibi cœna brevis.” To feel light at night, let your supper be slight.

[6063] Burton. Printed page 287, x: “Juven. Sat. 3.” Juvenal, Satire 3.

[6064] Editor. The Latin adapts Juvenal, Satire 3.234–235, where noisy rented lodgings prevent sleep. Burton prints somnos, whereas the consulted Latin text has somnum in a differently framed question. His inn scene develops the complaint into recognisable English calls for stable and drinking-room servants.

[6065] Burton. Printed page 287, dagger: “Hor. Ser. lib. 1 Sat. 5.” Horace, Satires, book 1, satire 5.

[6066] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.5.15–16. Vappa is sour or spoiled wine; the boatman and traveller sing about absent lovers. The modern lines slightly reorder the syntax to make both singers clear. Burton excerpts the verse, omitting the continuation certatim, “in competition.”

[6067] Burton. Printed page 288, y: “Sepositis curis omnibus, quantum fieri potest, una cum vestibus, &c. Kyrkst.” Laying aside all cares, as far as possible, along with one’s clothes, and so forth. Kyrkst., Burton’s abbreviated reference.

[6068] Editor. Seneca, Moral Letters 56.6, quotes the night-rest verse with erant, were, where Burton prints erunt, will be. Seneca immediately argues that only reason can establish true tranquillity and that a quiet night does not remove anxiety. Burton’s tense and application are retained. This locates a classical occurrence, not his immediate intermediary or the verse’s ultimate origin. Kyrkst. remains unexpanded pending secure identification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To lye in clean linnen and sweet; before he goes to bed, or in bed to hear [6069]sweet Musick, which Ficinus commends lib. 1. cap. 24. or as Iobertus med. pract. lib. 3. cap. 10. [6070]to read some pleasant Author till he be asleep, to have a bason of water still dropping by his bed side, or to lie near that pleasant murmure, lene sonantis aquæ, Some floud-gates, arches, falls of water, like London Bridge, or some continuate noise which may benumme the senses, lenis motus, silentium & tenebræ, tum & ipsa voluntas somnos faciunt:	He should lie in clean, sweet-smelling linen; before going to bed, or in bed, hear sweet music, which Ficino recommends in book 1, chapter 24. Or, as Joubert says in Medical Practice, book 3, chapter 10, he should read some pleasant author until he falls asleep, or have water continually dripping into a basin beside his bed. He might lie near the pleasant murmur "of gently sounding water": sluices, arches, waterfalls, as at London Bridge, or some continuous noise that may numb the senses. "Gentle motion, silence and darkness, and even the will itself, bring sleep."[6071]
as a gentle noyse to some procures sleep, so, which Bernardinus Tilesius lib. de somno well observes, silence, in a darke roome, and the will it self, is most available to others. Piso commends frictions, Andrew Borde a good draught of strong drink before one goes to bed; I say, a nutmeg and ale, or a good draught of muscadine, with a tost and nutmeg, or a posset of the same, which many use in a morning, but me thinks for such as have dry brains, are much more proper at night;	As a gentle noise brings sleep to some, so, as Bernardino Telesio rightly observes in his book On Sleep, silence in a dark room, and the will itself, are most effective for others. Piso recommends rubbing the body; Andrew Boorde, a good draught of strong drink before bed. I suggest a nutmeg and ale, or a good draught of muscadine with toast and nutmeg, or a posset made from it. Many take these in the morning, but I think them much more suitable at night for those with dry brains.[6072]

[6069] Burton. Printed page 288, z: "Ad horam somni aures suavibus cantibus & sonis delinire." At the hour of sleep, soothe the ears with sweet songs and sounds.

[6070] Burton. Printed page 288, a: "Lectio jucunda, aut sermo, ad quem attentior animus convertitur, aut aqua ab alto in subjectam pelvim delabatur, &c. Ovid." Pleasant reading, or conversation to which the mind turns attentively; or let water fall from a height into a basin placed beneath, and so forth. Ovid. The final attribution is retained where it stands in the margin.

[6071] Editor. London Bridge supplies an example of water sounding through or below arches. "Still dropping" means continually dripping. Joubert's name is printed Iobertus. The marginal Ovid. stands at the end of the reading-and-water note, but its precise relation to the body's quotations is unclear and is not reassigned without collation.

[6072] Editor. "Frictions" means rubbing or massage. Muscadine is a sweet wine; a posset is a milk-based drink, commonly curdled with wine or ale. "Available" means effective. The alcoholic preparations and nutmeg belong to Burton's historical prescriptions; no dosage or modern endorsement is added.

Original text 1651	Modern English
some prescribe a [6073]sup of vineger as they go to bed, a spoonfull saith [6074]Ætius Tetrabib. lib. 2. ser. 2. cap. 10. lib. 6. cap. 10. Ægineta lib. 3. cap. 14. Piso, a little after meat, because it rarifies melancholy, and procures an appetite to sleep. Donat. ab Altomar. cap. 7. and Mercurialis approve of it, if the malady proceed from the [6075]Spleen. Salust. Salvian. lib. 2. cap. 1. de remed. Hercules de Saxoniâ in Pan. Ælianus Montaltus de morb. capitis, cap. 28. de Melan. are altogether against it. Lod. Mercatus de inter. Morb. cau. lib. 1. cap. 17. in some cases doth allow it.	Some prescribe a sip of vinegar at bedtime—a spoonful, says Aëtius, Tetrabiblos, book 2, section 2, chapter 10; book 6, chapter 10. Paul of Aegina, book 3, chapter 14, and Piso recommend it a little after food, "because it thins the melancholic humour and creates a desire for sleep." Donato Antonio Altomare, chapter 7, and Mercurialis approve it if the disorder proceeds from the spleen. Sallustius Salvianus, On Remedies, book 2, chapter 1; Hercules de Saxonia, in Pan.; and Aelianus Montalto, On Diseases of the Head, chapter 28, on melancholy, oppose it altogether. Luis Mercado, On the Causes of Internal Diseases, book 1, chapter 17, allows it in some cases.[6076]

[6073] Burton. Printed page 288, b: "Aceti sorbitio" A sip of vinegar.

[6074] Burton. Printed page 288, c: "Attenuat melancholiam, & ad conciliandum somnum juvat." It thins the melancholic humour and helps to induce sleep.

[6075] Burton. Printed page 288, d: "Quod lieni acetum conveniat." Because vinegar agrees with the spleen.

[6076] Editor. "Melancholy" in the vinegar debate refers to the supposed melancholic humour, whose thickness or thinness is at issue. Burton records disagreement rather than one unanimous treatment. His overlapping Aëtius locators and the abbreviation in Pan. remain as printed pending source collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6077]Rhasis seems to deliberate of it, though Simeon commend it in sawce (peradventure) he makes a question of it: as for baths, fomentations, oyls, potions, simples or compounds, inwardly taken to this purpose, [6078]I shall speak of them elsewhere. If in the midst of the night when they lie awake, which is usuall to toss and tumble, and not sleep, [6079]Ranzovius would have them, if it be in warme weather, to rise and walk three or four turnes (till they be cold) about the chamber, and then go to bed again.	Rhazes seems undecided about it: though Simeon recommends it in sauce, perhaps, he still questions it. As for baths, warm applications, oils, potions, and single or compound medicines taken internally for this purpose, I shall discuss them elsewhere. If people lie awake in the middle of the night, as they commonly do, tossing and turning without sleep, Rantzau would have them, in warm weather, rise and walk three or four times around the room until they are cool, then go to bed again.[6080]
Against fearfull and troublesome dreams, Incubus and such inconveniences, wherewith melancholy men are molested, the best remedy is to eat a light supper, and of such meats as are easie of digestion, no Hare, Venison, Beef, &c. not to lye on his back, not to meditate or think in the day time of any terrible objects, or especially talke of them before he goes to bed.	Against frightening and troublesome dreams, the nightmare, and similar troubles that afflict melancholy people, the best remedy is a light supper of easily digested foods, without hare, venison, beef, and the like; not lying on the back; not dwelling during the day on anything terrifying; and especially not talking of such things before bed.[6081]

[6077] Burton. Printed page 288, e: “Cont. 1. tract. 9 meditandum de aceto.” Continens, book 1, treatise 9: consideration must be given to vinegar. The abbreviated locator is retained.

[6078] Burton. Printed page 288, f: “Sect. 5. memb. 1. Subsect. 6.” Section 5, Member 1, Subsection 6, within this partition.

[6079] Burton. Printed page 288, g: “Lib. de sanit. tuenda.” Book on preserving health.

[6080] Editor. The Rhazes sentence is hesitant and its placement of “peradventure” is awkward; that uncertainty is retained. “Simples” are single medicinal substances; compounds combine ingredients. The two references to Section 5, Member 1, Subsection 6 direct the reader ahead within the Second Partition. The walking instruction is a historical recommendation.

[6081] Editor. Incubus here names the oppressive nightmare experience, within a tradition that could personify it as a being pressing on the sleeper. It is not silently replaced with a modern diagnosis. “Meats” means foods. Burton links diet, posture, and the day’s alarming thoughts to disturbed dreams.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For as he said in Lucian after such conference, Hecates somniare mihi videor, I can think of nothing but Hobgoblins: and as Tully notes, [6082]for the most part our speeches in the day time, cause our phantasy to work upon the like in our sleep; which Ennius writes of Homer:	For, as the speaker in Lucian said after such conversation, "I seem to dream of Hecates": I can think of nothing but hobgoblins. And, as Cicero observes, our daytime conversations generally cause our imagination to work on similar things in sleep; so Ennius writes of Homer.[6083]
Et canis in somnis leporis vestigia latrat:	And in its dreams a dog barks at a hare's tracks.[6084]
As a dog dreams of an Hare, so do men, on such subjects they thought on last.	As a dog dreams of a hare, so do men dream of the subjects they last thought about.
[6085]Somnia quæ mentes ludunt volitantibus umbris, Nec delubra deûm, nec ab æthere numina mittunt, Sed sibi quisque facit, &c.	Dreams that mock our minds with flitting shadows Are sent neither by the gods' shrines nor by powers from heaven; Each person makes them for himself, and so forth.[6086]

[6082] Burton. Printed page 288, h: "In Som. Scip. fit enim fere ut cogitationes nostræ & sermones pariant aliquid in somno, quale de Homero scribit Ennius, de quo videlicet sæpissime vigilans solebat cogitare & loqui." In the Dream of Scipio. For our thoughts and conversations commonly produce something in sleep, as Ennius writes of Homer, about whom he used to think and speak very often while awake.

[6083] Editor. Tully is Cicero. The marginal passage follows the Dream of Scipio, Republic 6.10: Ennius's waking thoughts of Homer shape his dream. Lucian, The Lover of Lies 39, has Tychiades leave a gathering of storytellers with monsters, spirits and Hecates seeming to pass before his eyes. This comparison uses the Fowlers' translation. Burton's Latin intermediary is unidentified; his separate hobgoblins gloss is preserved.

[6084] Editor. This line also appears in the dream poem transmitted among Petronius's fragments, alongside the verses quoted immediately below. Burton's preceding sentence about Ennius and Homer refers to Cicero's example; it should not be taken as a secure attribution of this dog-and-hare verse to Ennius.

[6085] Burton. Printed page 288, i: "Aristæ hist." The history of Aristeas. The printed marker is attached to the verse, though the reference fits the following Ptolemy anecdote; see the editorial note.

[6086] Editor. These lines occur in the poem beginning Somnia quae mentes, transmitted as Petronius fragment 30; the consulted Latin text has non where Burton prints Nec. Burton's i-marker points to Aristæ hist., which fits the following Ptolemy story from the Letter of Aristeas, rather than this poem. The printed anchor is preserved and the apparent displacement recorded.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 289 For that cause when Ptolomy King of Egypt had posed the 70 interpreters in order, and asked the nineteenth man, what would make one sleep quietly in the night, he told him, [6087]the best way was to have divine and celestiall meditations, and to use honest actions in the day time.	For this reason, when Ptolemy, king of Egypt, had questioned the seventy translators in order, and asked the nineteenth what would make a man sleep quietly at night, he answered that the best way was to contemplate divine and heavenly things and perform upright actions during the day.[6088]
[6089]Lod. Vives wonders how Schoolmen could sleep quietly, and were not terrified in the night, or walke in the darke, they had such monstrous questions, and thought of such terrible matters all day long. They had neede amongst the rest to sacrifice to God Morpheus, whom [6090]Philostratus paints in a white and black coat, with a horn and Ivory box full of dreams, of the same colours, to signifie good and bad.	Luis Vives wonders how the scholastics could sleep quietly, without being terrified at night, or walk in the dark, since they entertained such monstrous questions and thought about such dreadful matters all day. Among other precautions, they needed to sacrifice to the god Morpheus, whom Philostratus depicts in a black-and-white coat, with a box of horn and ivory full of dreams of the same colours, signifying good and bad.[6091]

[6087] Burton. Printed page 289, k: “Optimum de cœlestibus & honestis meditari, & ea facere.” It is best to contemplate heavenly and honourable things, and to do them.

[6088] Editor. The Letter of Aristeas 213–216 recounts the question about untroubled sleep and the answer favouring divine contemplation and good actions. It belongs to the account of translators of Jewish scripture at Ptolemy’s court. Burton’s “seventy” and “nineteenth” are retained; his numbering of this question has not been independently established.

[6089] Burton. Printed page 289, l: “Lib. 3. de causis corr. art. tam mira monstra quæstionum sæpe nascuntur inter eos, ut mirer eos interdum in somnis non terreri, aut de illis in tenebris audere verba facere, adeo res sunt monstrosæ.” Book 3, On the Causes of the Corruption of the Arts. Such extraordinary monstrosities of questions often arise among them that I wonder they are not sometimes terrified in their sleep, or that they dare speak of them in the dark, so monstrous are these matters.

[6090] Burton. Printed page 289, m: “Icon. lib. 1.” Images, book 1; the note is printed in the footer.

[6091] Editor. “Schoolmen” are scholastic theologians and philosophers. Burton extends Vives’s joke into the imagery of Morpheus, dreams, and contrasting colours. Philostratus, Images 1.27, depicts a dream-god wearing white over black, interpreted there as day and night, and carrying a horn associated with truthful dreams. Burton instead gives good and bad dreams, and a horn-and-ivory box; those differences are retained. The particular Vives passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If you will know how to interpret them, read Artemidorus, Sambucus and Cardan; but how to help them, [6092]I must refer you to a more convenient place.	If you want to know how to interpret them, read Artemidorus, Sambucus, and Cardano. But for their relief, I must refer you to a more suitable place.[6093]

[6092] Burton. Printed page 289, n: "Sect. 5. Memb. 1. Subs. 6." Section 5, Member 1, Subsection 6, within this partition; printed in the footer.

[6093] Editor. Artemidorus, Sambucus, and Cardano are named as resources for interpreting dreams. Burton distinguishes interpretation from treatment, postponing the latter to Section 5, Member 1, Subsection 6. This closes Member 5. Member 6 begins next with disturbances of mind and the relief of confiding in a friend.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Memb. 6. Subsect. 1. Perturbations of the minde rectified. From himself, by resisting to the utmost, confessing his grief to a friend, &c.	Member 6 Subsection 1 Disturbances of the mind corrected Through the sufferer's own efforts in resisting as strongly as possible and confiding his grief to a friend and so forth
Whosoever he is that shall hope to cure this malady in himself or any other, must first rectifie these passions and perturbations of the minde: the chiefest cure consists in them. A quiet mind is that voluptas, or Summum bonum of Epicurus, non dolere, curis vacare, animo tranquillo esse, not to grieve, but to want cares, and have a quiet soul, is the only pleasure of the World, as Seneca truly recites his opinion, not that of eating and drinking, which injurious Aristotle maliciously puts upon him, and for which he is still mistaken, male audit & vapulat, slandred without a cause, and lashed by all posterity.	Anyone who hopes to cure this illness in himself or another must first correct these passions and disturbances of the mind: the principal cure lies in dealing with them. A quiet mind is the "pleasure," or "highest good," of Epicurus: "to be free from pain, free from cares, tranquil in mind." Not to grieve, but to have no cares and a peaceful soul, is the world's only pleasure, as Seneca accurately reports his opinion. It is not the pleasure of eating and drinking, which unjust Aristotle maliciously attributes to him, and for which he is still misunderstood: "ill spoken of and beaten," slandered without cause and scourged by all posterity.[6094]

[6094] Editor. Burton defends Epicurean pleasure as freedom from pain and disturbance. Seneca, On the Happy Life 12.4–13.2, defends Epicurus's restrained teaching against people who use its name to excuse excess; Letters 66.45–48 discusses bodily and mental peace. These are close parallels, not a verified single source for Burton's Latin. His accusation against Aristotle is chronologically problematic: Aristotle died in 322 BCE, when Epicurus was about nineteen. The charge is preserved, but its basis remains unidentified. Burton's historical treatment claims are not present-day clinical instructions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6095]Fear and Sorrow therefore are especially to be avoided, and the minde to be mitigated with mirth, constancy, good hope; vain terror, bad objects are to be removed, & all such persons in whose companies they be not well pleased. Gualter Bruel. Fernelius consil. 43. Mercurialis consil. 6. Piso, Iacchinus cap. 15. in 9. Rhasis, Capivaccius, Hildisheim, &c. all inculcate this as an especiall means of their cure, that their [6096]minds be quietly pacified, vain conceits diverted, if it be possible, with terrors cares, [6097]fixed studies, cogitations, and whatsoever it is that shall any way molest or trouble the Soul, because that otherwise there is no good to be done:	Fear and sorrow, therefore, must especially be avoided, and the mind soothed with cheerfulness, steadfastness, and good hope. Groundless terrors and distressing sights must be removed, as must anyone whose company displeases them. Walter Bruele, Fernel in consultation 43, Mercurialis in consultation 6, Piso, Iacchinus in chapter 15 on book 9 of Rhazes, Capivaccius, Hildesheim, and others all insist on this as a principal means of cure: their minds must be gently calmed and, if possible, diverted from empty fancies, terrors, cares, obsessive studies and thoughts, and whatever else may distress or trouble the soul. Otherwise nothing can be done.[6098]

[6095] Burton. Printed page 289, o: “Animi perturbationes summè fugiendæ, metus potissimum & tristitia; eorumque loco animus demulcendus hilaritate, animi constantia, bona spe; removendi terrores, & eorum consortium quos non probant.” “Disturbances of mind must be most carefully avoided, especially fear and sorrow; in their place the mind must be soothed with cheerfulness, steadfastness and good hope. Terrors must be removed, and the company of those whom they dislike.”

[6096] Burton. Printed page 289, p: “Phantasiæ eorum placidè subvertendæ, terrores ab animo removendi.” “Their imaginings must be gently overturned, and terrors removed from the mind.”

[6097] Burton. Printed page 289, q: “Ab omni fixa cogitatione quovis modo avertantur.” “Let them be diverted by any means from every fixed thought.”

[6098] Editor. Passions and perturbations are emotional states or disturbances, not simply strong enthusiasms. Conceits means mental notions or imaginings. The awkward printed phrase with terrors cares is read as extending the list of things from which the mind must be diverted. The physicians’ abbreviated references are preserved; their individual passages have not all been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6099]The bodies mischiefs, as Plato proves, proceed from the soul: and if the mind be not first satisfied, the body can never be cured. Alcibiades raves (saith [6100]Maximus Tyrius) and is sick, his furious desires carry him from Lyceus to the pleading place, thence to the Sea, so into Sicily, thence to Lacedæmon, thence to Persia, thence to Samos, then again to Athens; Critias tyrannizeth over all the city; Sardanapalus is love-sick: these men are ill-affected all, and can never be cured, till their minds be otherwise qualified.	The body's troubles, as Plato demonstrates, proceed from the soul; and unless the mind is first set at ease, the body can never be cured. Alcibiades raves, says Maximus of Tyre, and is sick: his furious desires carry him from the Lyceum to the place of public debate, then to sea, on to Sicily, then to Sparta, Persia, Samos, and back to Athens. Critias tyrannizes over the whole city; Sardanapalus is lovesick. All these men are in a disordered state and can never be cured until their minds are differently disposed.[6101]
Source page 289–290 Crato therefore in that often cited Counsell of his for a Noble man his Patient, when he had sufficiently informed him in diet, air, exercise, Venus, sleep, concludes with these as matters of greatest moment, Quod reliquum est, animæ accidentia corrigantur, from which alone proceeds Melancholy; they are the fountain, the subject, the hinges whereon it turns, and must necessarily be reformed.	Crato, therefore, in that often-cited consultation for his noble patient, after sufficiently instructing him about diet, air, exercise, sexual activity, and sleep, concludes with these matters as the most important: "For the rest, let the affections of the soul be corrected." From these alone melancholy proceeds; they are its source, its underlying matter, the hinges on which it turns, and must necessarily be put right.[6102]

[6099] Burton. Printed page 289, r: "Cuncta mala corporis ab animo procedunt, quæ nisi curentur, corpus curari minime potest, Charmid." "All the body's ills proceed from the soul; unless these are cured, the body cannot possibly be cured." Charmides.

[6100] Burton. Printed page 289, asterisk, continued across the page foot: "Disputat. An morbi graviores corporis an animi. Renoldo interpret. ut parum absit à furore, rapitur à Lyceo in concionem, à concione ad mare, à mari in Siciliam, &c." "Discourse: Whether diseases of the body or of the mind are more serious. In Renoldus's translation: so that he is not far from madness, he is swept from the Lyceum to the assembly, from the assembly to the sea, from the sea to Sicily, and so forth."

[6101] Editor. In Plato's Charmides, Socrates recounts a Thracian healer's doctrine that the soul must be treated before the body, through healing words; Burton presents this as Plato's proof. Maximus supplies political and erotic examples of disordered desire: Alcibiades, the Athenian statesman; Critias, a tyrant at Athens; and the legendary Assyrian king Sardanapalus. The exact Maximus discourse and the edition of the Latin translation remain to be established.

[6102] Editor. Venus denotes sexual activity. Accidentia here means affections or changes experienced by the soul. Subject is the underlying matter or seat of a condition, not a topic of discussion. Crato's formulation places mental disturbance at the centre of the disorder.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 290 [6103]For anger stirs choler, heats the blood and vital spirits; Sorrow on the other side refrigerates the body, and extinguisheth natural heat, overthrows appetite, hinders concoction, dries up the temperature, and perverts the understanding: Fear dissolves the spirits, infects the heart, attenuates the soul: and for these causes all passions and perturbations must to the uttermost of our power, and most seriously be removed.	For anger stirs up bile and heats the blood and vital spirits. Sorrow, on the other hand, cools the body, extinguishes its natural heat, destroys appetite, hinders digestion, dries out the bodily constitution, and distorts the understanding. Fear disperses the spirits, taints the heart, and weakens the soul. For these reasons we must make every serious effort within our power to remove all such passions and disturbances.[6104]
Ælianus Montaltus attributes so much to them, [6105]that he holds the rectification of them alone to be sufficient to the cure of Melancholy in most patients. Many are fully cured when they have seen or heard, &c. enjoy their desires, or be secured and satisfied in their minds: Galen the common master of them all, from whose fountain they fetch water, brags lib. 1. de san. tuend. that he for his part hath cured divers of this infirmity, solum animis ad rectum institutis, by right setling alone of their minds.	Aelianus Montalto attributes so much importance to these emotions that he considers their correction alone enough to cure melancholy in most patients. Many are fully cured when they have seen or heard something, and so forth, attained what they desire, or been reassured and satisfied in their minds. Galen, the common master of them all, from whose fountain they draw their water, boasts in book 1 of On the Preservation of Health that he himself has cured several people of this illness “solely by putting their minds on the right course”—by rightly settling their minds alone.[6106]

[6103] Burton. Printed page 290, s: “Ira bilem movet, sanguinem adurit, vitales spiritus accendit, mœstitia universum corpus infrigidat, calorum innatum extinguit, appetitum destruit, concoctionem impedit, corpus exsiccat, intellectum pervertit. Quamobrem hæc omnia prorsus vitanda sunt, & pro virili fugienda.” “Anger stirs bile, scorches the blood, and kindles the vital spirits; sorrow chills the whole body, extinguishes its innate heat, destroys appetite, impedes digestion, dries the body, and distorts understanding. Therefore all these things must be wholly avoided and shunned with all one’s strength.” The printed calorum is retained; expected Latin is calorem.

[6104] Editor. This account belongs to humoral physiology. Choler is yellow bile; concoction is digestion; temperature is the constitution or balance of the body, not a thermometer reading. Vital spirits were conceived as subtle bodily agents of life and activity.

[6105] Burton. Printed page 290, t: “De mel. c. 26. ex illis solum remedium; multi ex visis, auditis, &c. sanati sunt.” “On Melancholy, chapter 26. The remedy lies in these alone; many have been cured through things seen, heard, and so forth.”

[6106] Editor. The claim of cure by setting the mind right is explicitly attributed to Montalto and Galen. Burton does not specify what the patients saw or heard. His incomplete list is retained rather than supplied with invented examples; the precise Galenic passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yea but you will here infer, that this is excellent good indeed if it could be done; but how shall it be effected, by whom, what art, what means? hic labor, hoc opus est. 'Tis a natural infirmity, a most powerful adversary, all men are subject to passions, and Melancholy above all others, as being distempered by their innate humors, abundance of choler adust, weakness of parts, outward occurrences; and how shall they be avoided?	Yes, but you will object here that this would indeed be excellent if it could be done. But how is it to be achieved, by whom, through what skill, by what means? "Here is the labour, here the task." This is a natural infirmity, a most powerful adversary. Everyone is subject to passions, and melancholy people above all others, disordered as they are by their inborn humours, an excess of burnt bile, weakness of the organs, and external events. How are such passions to be avoided?[6107]
the wisest men, greatest Philosophers of most excellent wit, reason, judgement, divine spirits, cannot moderate themselves in this behalf; such as are sound in body and mind, Stoicks, Heroes, Homers Gods, all are passionate, and furiously carryed sometimes; and how shall we that are already crased, fracti animis, sick in body, sick in mind, resist? we cannot perform it. You may advise and give good precepts, as who cannot? But, how shall they be put in practice?	The wisest men, the greatest philosophers, with outstanding intelligence, reason, and judgement —divine spirits—cannot control themselves in this respect. People sound in body and mind, Stoics, heroes, Homer's gods: all are subject to passions and sometimes swept furiously away. How, then, can we resist, already impaired as we are, "broken in spirit," sick in body and sick in mind? We cannot do it. You may offer advice and sound precepts—who cannot? But how are they to be put into practice?[6108]
I may not deny but our passions are violent, and tyrannize of us, yet there be means to curb them; though they be head-strong, they may be tamed, they may be qualified, if he himself or his friends, will but use their honest endevors, or make use of such ordinary helps as are commonly prescribed.	I cannot deny that our passions are violent and tyrannize over us. Yet there are ways to curb them. Though headstrong, they may be tamed and moderated if the sufferer himself or his friends will make an earnest effort, or use the ordinary kinds of help commonly prescribed.

[6107] Editor. The Latin adapts Virgil, Aeneid 6.129: hoc opus, hic labor est, reversing the two phrases. There the task is returning from the underworld. Choler adust is bile thought to have been burnt or overheated, thereby acquiring harmful properties.

[6108] Editor. Crased means impaired or damaged; fracti animis means broken in spirit. Burton lets a sufferer challenge the feasibility of the advice before answering. The references to Stoics and Homer's gods broaden the objection: even supposedly exemplary beings are overcome by emotion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He himself (I say); from the Patient himself the first and chiefest remedy must be had: for if he be averse, peevish, waspish, give way wholly to his passions, will not seek to be helped, or be ruled by his friends, how is it possible he should be cured? But if he be willing at last, gentle, tractable, and desire his own good, no doubt but he may magnam morbi deponere partem, be eased at least, if not cured.	He himself, I say: the first and principal remedy must come from the patient. If he is unwilling, obstinate, irritable, yields wholly to his passions, refuses to seek help or to be guided by his friends, how can he possibly be cured? But if at last he is willing, gentle, receptive, and desires his own good, then undoubtedly he may "lay aside a great part of the illness"—at least find relief, if not a cure.[6109]
He himself must do his utmost indeavour to resist and withstand the beginnings. Principiis obsta, Give not water passage, no not a little; Eccles. 25. 27. If they open a little, they will make a greater breach at length.	He must make every effort to resist and withstand the beginnings. "Resist at the outset." "Give water no passage, not even a little," Ecclesiasticus 25:27. If a small opening is allowed, in time it will become a larger breach.[6110]

[6109] Editor. Peevish here has the stronger sense of perverse or obstinate; waspish means irritable. Burton's insistence on willing cooperation is part of his moral account of illness. His phrase may be eased at least, if not cured distinguishes relief from complete recovery.

[6110] Editor. Principiis obsta, resist at the outset, occurs in Ovid, Remedies for Love 91. Eccles. here means Ecclesiasticus, also called Sirach, not Ecclesiastes, which has no chapter 25. Burton applies the image of a small watercourse becoming a breach to the beginnings of distress. The water image appears at 25:25 in the King James Version; Burton's printed 25:27 is retained. Verse numbering varies between versions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 290–291 Whatsoever it is that runneth in his mind, vain conceit, be it pleasing or displeasing, which so much affects or troubleth him, [6111]by all possible means he must withstand it; expel those vain, false, frivolous imaginations, absurd conceits, fained fears and sorrowes: from which, saith Piso, this disease primarily proceeds, and takes his first occasion or beginning, by doing something or other that shall be opposite unto them, thinking of something else, perswading by reason, or howsoever to make a sudden alteration of them.	Whatever runs through his mind—some empty fancy, pleasing or displeasing, that so deeply affects or troubles him—he must resist it by every possible means. He must drive out those empty, false, frivolous imaginings, absurd notions, and imagined fears and sorrows from which, says Piso, this disease chiefly proceeds and takes its first occasion or beginning: by doing something contrary to them, thinking of something else, reasoning with himself, or in any way bringing about a sudden change in them.[6112]

[6111] Burton. Printed page 290, u: “Pro viribus annitendum in prædictis, tum in aliis, à quibus malum velut a primariâ causâ occasionem nactum est; imaginationes absurdæ falsæque, et mœstitia quæcunque subierit propulsetur, aut aliud agendo, aut ratione persuadendo earum mutationem subito facere.” “Every effort must be made concerning the matters mentioned, and also the others from which the illness took its occasion as from a primary cause. Let absurd and false imaginings, and whatever sorrow has arisen, be driven away: by doing something else or persuading through reason, bring about a sudden change in them.” The shifts of number and construction in the Latin are retained.

[6112] Editor. Fained fears are fears Burton judges imaginary, not necessarily fears knowingly pretended. The translation retains his account of distraction, contrary action and reasoning without recasting it as a modern therapeutic method.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 291 Though he have hitherto run in a full career, and precipitated himself, following his passions, given reins to his appetite, let him now stop upon a sudden, curb himself in; and as [6113]Lemnius adviseth, strive against with all his power, to the utmost of his endeavour, and not cherish those fond imaginations, which so covertly creep into his mind, most pleasing and amiable at first, but bitter as gall at last, and so head-strong, that by no reason, art, counsel, or perswasion they may be shaken off.	Though he has so far charged ahead at full gallop and rushed headlong, following his passions and giving his desires free rein, let him now stop abruptly and rein himself in. As Lemnius advises, he should resist with all his strength and effort, and should not cherish those foolish imaginings that creep so secretly into his mind: delightful and attractive at first, but bitter as gall in the end, and so headstrong that no reasoning, skill, counsel, or persuasion can shake them off.[6114]
Though he be far gone, and habituated unto such phantastical imaginations, yet as [6115]Tully, and Plutarch advise, let him oppose, fortifie, or prepare himself against them, by premeditation, reason, or as we do by a crooked staffe, bend himself another way.	Even if he is far gone and accustomed to such fantastic imaginings, let him, as Cicero and Plutarch advise, resist them and strengthen or prepare himself against them through forethought and reason; or, as we do with a crooked stick, bend himself in the opposite direction.[6116]

[6113] Burton. Printed page 291, x: "Lib. 2. c. 16. de occult. nat. Quisquis huic malo obnoxius est, acriter obsistat, & summâ curâ obluctetur, nec ullo modo foveat imaginationes tacite obrepentes animo, blandas ab initio & amabiles, sed quæ adeo convalescunt, ut nullâ ratione excuti queant." "On the Hidden Things of Nature, book 2, chapter 16. Whoever is subject to this illness should resist keenly and struggle against it with the greatest care; he must in no way foster the imaginings that quietly steal into the mind, charming and attractive at first, but growing so strong that no reasoning can dislodge them."

[6114] Editor. Career originally denotes a full-speed course or gallop; the reins, curb and headstrong imaginings continue the riding metaphor. Gall is bitter bile. Lemnius's cited work is De occultis naturae miraculis; the exact passage has not been collated against its early editions.

[6115] Burton. Printed page 291, y: "3. Tusc. ad Apollonium." Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, book 3; Plutarch, Consolation to Apollonius. The compressed margin supplies one locator for each author named in the body.

[6116] Editor. Tully is Marcus Tullius Cicero. Burton's compressed margin refers to Cicero's Tusculan Disputations, book 3, and the Consolation to Apollonius transmitted among Plutarch's works. The crooked-stick image makes deliberate counter-habituation the remedy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6117]Tu tamen interea effugito quæ tristia mentem Solicitant, procul esse jube curasque, metumque Pallentem, ultrices iras, sint omnia læta.	Meanwhile, flee whatever sadly troubles the mind; Command cares, pale fear, and vengeful anger To stay far away; let everything be joyful.[6118]
In the mean time expel them from thy mind, Pale fears, sad cares, and griefs which do it grind, Revengeful anger, pain and discontent, Let all thy soule be set on merriment.	Meanwhile drive them from your mind: Pale fears, sad cares, and grinding griefs, Vengeful anger, pain, and discontent; Let your whole soul turn to merriment.[6119]
Curas tolle graves, irasci crede profanum.	Cast off heavy cares; regard anger as a sin.[6120]
If it be idleness hath caused this infirmity, or that he perceive himself given to solitariness, to walk alone, and please his mind with fond imaginations, let him by all means avoid it; 'tis a bosome enemy, 'tis delightsome melancholy a friend in shew, but a secret devil, a sweet poyson, it will in the end be his undoing; let him go presently, task or set himself a work, get some good company.	If idleness has caused this illness, or he notices that he is inclined to solitude, to walking alone and delighting his mind with foolish imaginings, let him avoid it by every means. It is an intimate enemy, a delightful melancholy, a friend in appearance but a secret devil, a sweet poison; in the end it will ruin him. Let him go at once, give himself a task or set himself to work, and find some good company.[6121]

[6117] Burton. Printed page 291, z: "Fracastorius." Girolamo Fracastoro. No work or line reference is supplied.

[6118] Editor. Burton attributes these three Latin lines to Fracastoro without naming a work. Their translation is kept separate from Burton's four-line English adaptation immediately below. The exact source and line numbering remain unverified.

[6119] Editor. This is Burton's own English rendering, independently modernized. Its added pain and discontent and its concluding emphasis on the soul are retained; the Latin and English versions are not merged.

[6120] Editor. This further Latin maxim is separately displayed in the source. Profanum is rendered as a sin in its moral and religious sense. Burton supplies no attribution here; none is asserted in this draft.

[6121] Editor. Bosom enemy means an intimate or inward enemy. The friend, devil and sweet-poison images preserve Burton's ambivalence about pleasurable solitude: the attraction is part of the danger he describes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If he proceed, as a Gnat flies about a candle, so long till at length he burn his body, so in the end he will undo himself: if it be any harsh object, ill company, let him presently go from it. If by his own default through ill diet, bad aire, want of exercise, &c. let him now begin to reform himself. It would be a perfect remedy against all corruption, if as [6122]Roger Bacon hath it, we could but moderate our selves in those six non-natural things.	If he continues, like a gnat flying around a candle until at last it burns its body, he will in the end destroy himself. If some distressing sight or bad company is the cause, let him leave it immediately. If it is his own fault, through poor diet, bad air, lack of exercise, and so forth, let him now begin to reform his habits. It would be a perfect remedy against all bodily decay if, as Roger Bacon puts it, we could only govern ourselves moderately in those six non-natural things.[6123]
[6124]If it be any disgrace, abuse, temporal loss, calumny, death of friends, imprisonment, banishment, be not troubled with it, do not fear, be not angry, grieve not at it, but with all courage sustain it. (Gordonius lib. 1. c. 1. de conser. vit.) Tu contra audentior ito.	If it is disgrace, mistreatment, worldly loss, slander, the death of friends, imprisonment, or banishment, do not be troubled by it; do not fear, be angry, or grieve over it, but bear it with all your courage. So says Bernard of Gordon, On the Preservation of Life, book 1, chapter 1. "Go forward all the more boldly against it."[6125]

[6122] Burton. Printed page 291, a: "Epist. de secretis artis & naturæ cap. 7. de retard. sen. Remedium esset contra corruptionem propriam, si quilibet exerceret regimen sanitatis, quod consistit in rebus sex non naturalibus." "Letter on the Secrets of Art and Nature, chapter 7; On Delaying Old Age. It would be a remedy against one's bodily decay if everyone practised a regimen of health, consisting in the six non-natural things."

[6123] Editor. The six non-naturals are the traditional factors managed in a regimen: air; food and drink; exercise and rest; sleep and waking; evacuation and retention; and the passions. Non-natural does not mean unnatural or supernatural. Corruption here is bodily decay. The Bacon references are retained without claiming complete bibliographical collation.

[6124] Burton. Printed page 291, b: "Pro aliquo vituperio non indigneris, nec pro amissione alicujus rei, pro morte alicujus, nec pro carcere, nec pro exilio, nec pro aliâ re, nec irascaris, nec timeas, nec doleas, sed cum summâ præsentiâ hæc sustineas." "Do not be indignant at any reproach, nor at the loss of anything, anyone's death, imprisonment, exile, or anything else. Do not be angry, afraid, or sorrowful, but bear these things with the greatest presence of mind."

[6125] Editor. Temporal means worldly or belonging to this life. The final Latin phrase adapts Virgil, Aeneid 6.95, where the Sibyl urges Aeneas to meet adversity more boldly. The separate citation of Bernard of Gordon belongs to the preceding advice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6126]If it be sickness, ill success, or any adversity that hath caused it, oppose an invincible courage, fortifie thy self by Gods word, or otherwise, mala bonis persuadenda, set prosperity against adversity, as we refresh our eyes by seeing some pleasant meadow, fountain, picture, or the like: recreate thy mind by some contrary object, with some more pleasing meditation divert thy thoughts.	If sickness, failure, or some other adversity has caused it, meet it with invincible courage. Strengthen yourself through God's word, or otherwise: "Evils must be argued away by good things." Set prosperity against adversity. As we refresh our eyes by looking at a pleasant meadow, fountain, picture, or the like, so refresh your mind with something of an opposite character, and divert your thoughts with some more pleasing meditation.[6127]
Source page 291–292 Yea, but you infer again, facile consilium damus aliis, we can easily give counsel to others; every man, as the saying is, can tame a shrew but he that hath her; si hic esses, aliter sentires; if you were in our misery, you would find it otherwise, 'tis not so easily performed. We know this to be true, we should moderate ourselves, but we are furiously carryed, we cannot make use of such precepts, we are overcome, sick, malè sani, distempered and habituated in these courses, we can make no resistance: you may as well bid him that is diseased, not to feel pain, as a melancholy man not to fear, not to be sad: 'tis within his blood, his brains, his whole temperature, it cannot be removed.	Yes, but you object again: "We readily give advice to others." As the saying goes, every man can tame a shrew except the man who has her. "If you were here, you would think differently." If you were in our misery, you would find it otherwise: it is not so easily done. We know it is true that we should control ourselves, but we are swept furiously away. We cannot apply such precepts. We are overcome, sick, "unsound in mind," disordered and accustomed to these ways; we cannot resist. You might as well tell a sick person not to feel pain as tell a melancholy person not to fear or feel sad. It is in his blood, his brain, his whole constitution; it cannot be removed.[6128]

[6126] Burton. Printed page 291, c: "Quod si incommoda adversitatis infortunia hoc malum invexerint, his infractum animum opponas, Dei verbo ejusque fiducia te suffulcias, &c. Lemnius lib. 1. c. 16." "But if the troubles and misfortunes of adversity have brought on this illness, oppose to them an unbroken spirit; support yourself by God's word and trust in him, and so forth." Lemnius, book 1, chapter 16. The book number differs from the earlier Lemnius marginal citation; both are retained.

[6127] Editor. The compressed Latin mala bonis persuadenda is rendered according to its argumentative setting: countering distressing things with good ones. Object means something presented to attention, including a sight or a subject of thought. Burton's nearby Lemnius margins give different book numbers; that discrepancy is retained.

[6128] Editor. The shrew proverb uses a hostile conventional image of a quarrelsome woman; it is retained as Burton's illustration of advice being easier than experience. The sufferer's answer again insists on bodily constitution and entrenched habit, challenging the preceding imperatives.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 292 But he may chuse whether he will give way too far unto it, he may in some sort correct himself. A philosopher was bitten with a mad dog, and as the nature of that disease is to abhor all waters, and liquid things, and to think still they see the picture of a dog before them: He went for all this, reluctante se, to the Bath, and seeing there (as he thought) in the water the picture of a dog, with reason overcame this conceit, quid cani cum balneo? what should a dog do in a Bath? a meer conceit.	But he can choose whether to yield too far to it; he can correct himself to some degree. A philosopher was bitten by a mad dog. The nature of that disease is to make people shrink from all water and liquids and continually imagine that they see a dog before them. Despite this he went to the bath, "struggling against himself," and, seeing there what he thought was the image of a dog in the water, overcame the notion by reason: "What has a dog to do with a bath?" What would a dog be doing in a bath? A mere fancy.[6129]
Thou thinkest thou hearest and seest devils, black men, &c. 'tis not so, 'tis thy corrupt phantasie, settle thine imagination, thou art well. Thou thinkest thou hast a great nose, thou art sick, every man observes thee, laughs thee to scorn; perswade thy self 'tis no such matter: this is fear only, and vain suspicion.	You think you hear and see devils, black men, and so forth. It is not so: it is your disordered imagination. Settle your imagination, and you are well. You think you have an enormous nose, that you are ill, that everyone watches you and mocks you. Persuade yourself that it is nothing of the kind: this is only fear and groundless suspicion.[6130]
Thou art discontent, thou art sad and heavy; but why? upon what ground? consider of it: thou art jealous, timorous, suspicious; for what cause? examine it throughly, thou shalt find none at all, or such as is to be contemned, such as thou wilt surely deride, and contemn in thy self, when it is past. Rule thy self then with reason, satisfie thy self, accustom thy self, wean thy self from such fond conceits, vain fears, strong imaginations, restless thoughts.	You are discontented, sad, and heavy-hearted; but why, on what grounds? Consider it. You are jealous, fearful, suspicious: for what reason? Examine it thoroughly, and you will find none at all, or one that deserves to be dismissed—one that you will surely laugh at and despise in yourself once it is past. Govern yourself, then, by reason; reassure yourself, train yourself, wean yourself from such foolish notions, empty fears, powerful imaginings, and restless thoughts.

[6129] Editor. Burton tells this as an anecdote of reasoning against a frightening appearance; he does not name the philosopher or give a source here. The mad-dog illness is described through aversion to water, but the story is not evidence that reason can cure such an infection. Its provenance remains unresolved.

[6130] Editor. Phantasie is the faculty that forms and retains mental images. The printed black men is retained as part of the described frightening appearances; its exact intended referent is uncertain. The claim that settling imagination makes the sufferer well remains Burton's assertion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thou mayest do it; Est in nobis assuescere (as Plutarch saith) we may frame our selves as we will. As he that useth an upright shooe, may correct the obliquity, or crookedness by wearing it on the other side; we may overcome passions if we will. Quicquid sibi imperavit animus obtinuit (as Seneca saith) [6131]nulli tam feri affectus, ut non disciplinâ perdomentur, whatsoever the Will desires, she may command: no such cruel affections, but by discipline they may be tamed;	You can do it. “It lies in our power to form habits,” as Plutarch says: we may shape ourselves as we will. Just as a man wearing a straight shoe can correct its slant or crookedness by wearing it on the other side, so we can overcome our passions if we will. “Whatever the mind has commanded itself, it has achieved,” as Seneca says; “no passions are so fierce that discipline cannot master them.” Whatever the will desires, it may command; no emotions are so savage that discipline cannot tame them.[6132]
voluntarily thou wilt not do this or that, which thou oughtest to do, or refrain, &c. but when thou art lashed like a dull Jade, thou wilt reform it; fear of a whip will make thee do, or not do. Do that voluntarily then which thou canst do, and must do by compulsion: thou maist refrain if thou wilt, and master thine affections.	You will not voluntarily do this or that which you ought to do, or refrain from what you ought to avoid; but when whipped like a sluggish nag, you will change your behaviour. Fear of the whip will make you act or refrain. Do voluntarily, then, what you can do and must do under compulsion: you can restrain yourself if you will, and master your emotions.[6133]

[6131] Burton. Printed page 292, d: “Lib. 2. de irâ.” Seneca, On Anger, book 2.

[6132] Editor. The shoe comparison concerns correcting a slant through contrary wear; upright is rendered straight, without importing a modern corrective shoe. The Seneca passages are On Anger 2.12.3–4. Burton abbreviates their wording and then supplies his own English explanation, retained separately. The particular Plutarch source for habit remains uncollated.

[6133] Editor. Jade is a worn-out or inferior horse; here dull means sluggish. Burton’s analogy explicitly invokes whipping and compulsion. The translation retains this coercive element rather than softening it into encouragement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6134]As in a city, (saith Melancthon) they do by stubborn rebellious rogues, that will not submit themselves to political judgement, compell them by force; so must we do by our affections. If the heart will not lay aside those vicious motions, and the phantasie those fond imaginations, we have another form of government to enforce and restrain our outward members, that they be not led by our passions.	As a city deals with stubborn rebels who refuse to submit to civil authority, says Melanchthon, compelling them by force, so must we deal with our emotions. If the heart will not abandon those vicious impulses, or the imagination those foolish fancies, we have another form of government to control and restrain our bodily members, so that they are not led by our passions.[6135]
If appetite will not obey, let the moving faculty over-rule her, let her resist and compel her to do otherwise. In an ague the appetite would drink; sore eyes that itch, would be rubbed; but reason saith no, and therefore the moving faculty will not do it. Our phantasie would intrude a thousand fears, suspicions, Chimera's upon us, but we have reason to resist, yet we let it be overborn by our appetite;	If appetite will not obey, let the faculty of movement overrule it, resist it, and compel it to act otherwise. In a fever, appetite wants to drink; sore, itching eyes want to be rubbed. But reason says no, and therefore the faculty of movement does not act. Our imagination would force a thousand fears, suspicions, and chimeras upon us, but we have reason with which to resist; yet we allow it to be overpowered by appetite.[6136]

[6134] Burton. Printed page 292, e: "Cap. 3. de affect. anim. Ut in civitatibus contumaces qui non cedunt politico imperio vi coercendi sunt; ita Deus nobis indidit alteram imperii formam; si cor non deponit vitiosum affectum, membra foras coercenda sunt, ne ruant in quod affectus impellat; et locomotiva, quæ herili imperio obtemperat, alteri resistat." "Chapter 3, on the emotions of the soul. Just as in cities the obstinate who will not yield to civil authority must be restrained by force, so God has implanted in us another form of rule. If the heart does not put aside its vicious emotion, the outward members must be restrained, lest they rush towards what the emotion urges; and the locomotive faculty, which obeys a master's command, must resist the other faculty."

[6135] Editor. Philip Melanchthon's account compares control of the emotions to civil government. Political judgement is the authority of the community, not an opinion about politics. The marginal Latin includes God's provision of a second form of rule, a detail not repeated in Burton's English paraphrase.

[6136] Editor. The moving or locomotive faculty is the power that directs bodily movement. Appetite means desire or impulse. Chimeras are fantastic or impossible mental constructions. The examples of fever and sore eyes illustrate Burton's historical account of faculties and voluntary restraint.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6137]Imagination enforceth spirits which by an admirable league of nature compel the nerves to obey, and they our several limbs: we give too much way to our passions. And as to him that is sick of an ague, all things are distastful and unpleasant, non ex cibi vitio, saith Plutarch, not in the meat, but in our taste: so many things are offensive to us, not of themselves, but out of our corrupt judgement, jealousie, suspicion and the like; we pull these mischiefs upon our own heads.	Imagination drives the spirits, which, through a wonderful natural alliance, compel the nerves to obey, and the nerves our several limbs: we give our passions too much freedom. To someone sick with a fever, everything tastes bad and unpleasant, "through no fault of the food," as Plutarch says: the fault is in our taste. In the same way, many things offend us not in themselves but because of our disordered judgement, jealousy, suspicion, and the like. We bring these troubles upon our own heads.[6138]

[6137] Burton. Printed page 292, f: "Imaginatio impellit spiritus, et inde nervi moventur, &c. & obtemperant imaginationi & appetitui mirabili fœdere, ad exequendum quod jubent." "Imagination drives the spirits, and thence the nerves are moved, and so forth; through a wonderful alliance they obey imagination and appetite, carrying out their commands."

[6138] Editor. The spirits here are physiological agents imagined to transmit impulses through the body, not supernatural beings. Meat means food generally. The illness-and-taste comparison shifts the fault from the perceived thing to the perceiver's judgement; the exact Plutarch passage remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 292–293 If then our judgement be so depraved, our reason over-ruled, Will precipitated, that we cannot seek our own good, or moderate our selves, as in this disease commonly it is, the best way for ease is to impart our misery to some friend, not to smother it up in our own breast: alitur vitium crescitque tegendo, &c. and that which was most offensive to us, a cause of fear and grief, quod nunc te coquit, another hell; for [6139]strangulat inclusus dolor atque exæstuat intus, grief concealed strangles the soul;	If, then, our judgement is so disordered, our reason overruled, and our will swept headlong that we cannot seek our own good or control ourselves—as commonly happens in this disease—the best way to find relief is to share our misery with a friend, instead of smothering it within our own breast. "The evil is nourished and grows by being concealed," and so forth. That which most tormented us, a cause of fear and grief, "what now burns you," becomes another hell; for "grief shut within chokes us and seethes inside": concealed grief strangles the soul.[6140]
Source page 293 but when as we shall but impart it to some discreet, trusty, loving friend, it is [6141]instantly removed, by his counsel happily, wisdome, perswasion, advice, his good means, which we could not otherwise apply unto our selves. A friends counsel is a charm, like mandrake wine, curas sopit;	But once we share it with a discreet, trustworthy, loving friend, it is immediately removed—perhaps through his counsel, wisdom, persuasion, advice, or helpful measures that we could not otherwise apply to ourselves. A friend's counsel is a charm, like mandrake wine: "it lulls cares to sleep."[6142]

[6139] Burton. Printed page 293, g: "Ovid Trist. lib. 5." Ovid, Tristia, book 5.

[6140] Editor. The first phrase adapts Virgil, Georgics 3.454, on a concealed ulcer: vivitque, lives, becomes Burton's crescitque, grows. The intervening quod nunc te coquit echoes the opening verses quoted in Cicero, On Old Age 1.1, where the text has quae nunc te coquit. Burton changes the relative pronoun and embeds the fragment in his own sentence. The final quotation is Ovid, Tristia 5.1.63, on unexpressed grief. The printed forms are retained; the immediate intermediaries remain unidentified.

[6141] Burton. Printed page 293, h: "Participes inde calamitatis nostræ sunt, & velut exoneratâ in eos sarcinâ onere levamur. Arist. Eth. lib. 9." "They thereby share our misfortune, and, as though the load had been transferred to them, we are relieved of its weight." Aristotle, Ethics, book 9.

[6142] Editor. Happily here means perhaps or by good fortune. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 9.11, discusses the relief afforded by friends in adversity, including the image of sharing a burden; Burton's Latin is a paraphrase. Mandrake wine supplies a traditional image of sedation. It is not offered here as a recipe.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and as a [6143]Bull that is tyed to a fig tree, becomes gentle on a sudden (which some, saith [6144]Plutarch, interpret of good words) so is a savage, obdurate heart mollified by faire speeches. All adversity finds ease in complaining (as [6145]Isidore holds) and 'tis a solace to relate it,	And as a bull tied to a fig tree suddenly becomes gentle—which some, says Plutarch, interpret as an image of kind words—so a savage, hardened heart is softened by gentle speech. All adversity finds relief in lament, as Isidore holds, and telling it brings consolation.[6146]
[6147]Ἀγαθὴ ἡ παραίφασις ἐστὶν ἑταίρου.	Good is the consolation of a friend.[6148]
Friends confabulations are comfortable at all times, as fire in winter, shade in summer, quale sopor fessis in gramine, meat and drink to him that is hungry or athirst; Democritus Collyrium is not so soveraign to the eyes as this is to the heart; good words are cheerful and powerful of themselves, but much more from friends, as so many props, mutually sustaining each other like Ivie and a wal, which [6149]Camerarius hath well illustrated in an Embleme.	Conversation with friends is comforting at all times: like fire in winter, shade in summer, "like sleep on the grass to the weary," food and drink to the hungry or thirsty. Democritus's eye-salve is less effective for the eyes than this is for the heart. Good words are cheering and powerful in themselves, but far more so from friends, who are so many supports, mutually sustaining one another like ivy and a wall, as Camerarius has aptly illustrated in an emblem.[6150]

[6143] Burton. Printed page 293, dagger: "Camerarius Embl. 26. Cen. 2." Camerarius, Emblems, second century, emblem 26. Here a century means a collection of one hundred emblems.

[6144] Burton. Printed page 293, asterisk: "Sympos. lib. 6. cap. 10." Plutarch, Table Talk, book 6, question 10.

[6145] Burton. Printed page 293, dagger: "Epist. 8. lib. 3. Adversa fortuna habet in querelis levamentum; & malorum relatio, &c." "Letters, book 3, letter 8. Adverse fortune finds relief in complaints; and the relating of troubles, and so forth." Burton names Isidore in the body; the identification and exact passage remain uncollated.

[6146] Editor. The bull and fig-tree story is cited through Camerarius's emblem collection and Plutarch's Table Talk 6.10. Burton reads the supposed natural effect allegorically as the effect of gentle speech. The precise Camerarius image and the Isidore letter have not been independently collated for this block.

[6147] Burton. Printed page 293, asterisk: "Alloquium chari juvat, & solamen amici." "The conversation of a dear companion, and a friend's consolation, bring help." This Latin gloss accompanies the Greek line.

[6148] Editor. The line adapts a Homeric saying found at Iliad 11.793 and 15.404. Burton prints the article ἡ where the Homeric wording has δὲ, but keeps the sense that a companion's encouragement is good. Greek accents and ligatures have been normalized. His accompanying Latin gloss is preserved in a separate Burton note.

[6149] Burton. Printed page 293, dagger: "Emblem. 54. cent. 1." Camerarius, Emblems, first century, emblem 54.

[6150] Editor. The Latin phrase is Virgil, Eclogue 5.46, where a song is compared to sleep on the grass for the weary. Collyrium means an eye preparation; the precise preparation attributed to Democritus is not identified here. The ivy-and-wall emblem is cited separately from the bull-and-fig-tree emblem.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Lenit animum simplex vel sæpè narratio, the simple narration many times easeth our distressed mind, and in the midst of greatest extremities; so divers have been relieved, by [6151]exonerating themselves to a faithful friend: he sees that which we cannot see for passion and discontent, he pacifies our minds, he will ease our pain, asswage our anger; quanta inde voluptas, quanta securitas, Chrysostome adds, what pleasure, what security by that means! [6152]Nothing so available, or that so much refresheth the soul of man.	"Even a simple telling often soothes the mind": merely relating our troubles often eases our distressed mind, even amid the greatest hardships. Many have thus found relief by unburdening themselves to a faithful friend. He sees what passion and discontent prevent us from seeing; he calms our minds, eases our pain, and soothes our anger. "What pleasure comes from this, what freedom from care!" Chrysostom adds: what pleasure, what security it brings! Nothing is so effective or so refreshes the human soul.[6153]

[6151] Burton. Printed page 293, i: "As David did to Jonathan, 1 Sam. 20." As David did to Jonathan, 1 Samuel 20.

[6152] Burton. Printed page 293, dagger: "Seneca Epist. 67." Seneca, Letter 67. The number is retained; the precise correspondence of Burton's claim to this letter remains unconfirmed.

[6153] Editor. Exonerating means unburdening. The Chrysostom phrase and preceding Latin maxim remain unlocated. Seneca, Letter 67.2, describes letters as making an absent friend seem present, but the consulted Letter 67 does not contain Burton's attached superlative claim about refreshment. On Tranquillity of Mind 7.1, cited by Burton shortly afterwards, is a closer parallel. The printed Letter 67 is retained: the comparison does not establish a corrected number or the cause of the discrepancy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tully, as I remember, in an Epistle to his dear friend Atticus, much condoles the defect of such a friend. [6154]I live here (saith he) in a great citie, where I have a multitude of acquaintance, but not a man of all that companie, with whom I dare familiarly breath, or freely jest. Wherefore I expect thee, I desire thee, I send for thee; for there be many things which trouble and molest me, which had I but thee in presence, I could quickly disburden my self of in a walking discourse. The like peradventure may he and he say with that old man in the Comedy,	Cicero, as I remember, deeply laments the lack of such a friend in a letter to his dear Atticus. "I live here," he says, "in a great city, where I have a multitude of acquaintances, but among them all not one man with whom I dare breathe freely in confidence or joke without restraint. Therefore I await you, long for you, send for you. Many things trouble and distress me; if only you were here, I could quickly unburden myself of them in a conversation as we walked." This man or that might perhaps say the same, with the old man in the comedy:[6155]
Nemo est meorum amicorum hodie, Apud quem expromere occulta mea audeam.	Among my friends today there is no one To whom I dare disclose my secrets.[6156]
and much inconvenience may both he and he suffer in the mean time by it. He or he, or whosoever then labours of this malady, by all means let him get some trusty friend, [6157]Semper habens Pylademque aliquem qui curet Orestem, a Pylades, to whom freely and securely he may open himself.	And this man or that may meanwhile suffer much distress from it. Let him, then—whoever suffers from this illness—by every means find a trustworthy friend, "always having some Pylades to care for Orestes": a Pylades to whom he may open himself freely and safely.[6158]

[6154] Burton. Printed page 293, asterisk: "Hic in civitate magnâ & turbâ magnâ neminem reperire possumus quocum suspirare familiariter aut jocari liberè possimus. Quare te expectamus, te desideramus, te arcessimus. Multa sunt enim quæ me solicitant & angunt, quæ mihi videor aures tuas nactus, unius ambulationis sermone exhaurire posse." "Here in this great city and great crowd we can find no one with whom we may sigh in confidence or joke freely. Therefore we await you, long for you, summon you. Many things trouble and distress me; with your ear to listen, I think I could empty them out in the conversation of a single walk."

[6155] Editor. Cicero, Letters to Atticus 1.18.1, supplies the comparison: public acquaintances offer no one with whom he can joke freely or sigh in confidence. Burton condenses and rearranges the Latin, then paraphrases it in English. Both versions remain represented in their respective places. He and he means this person or that person.

[6156] Editor. Adapted from Terence, The Self-Tormentor 574–575, spoken by Chremes to his son Clitipho. Burton omits the name Clitipho and omnia, all, among other adjustments. His two-line version is translated as it stands.

[6157] Burton. Printed page 293, k: "Ovid." Ovid; the allusion is to Remedies for Love, line 589.

[6158] Editor. Pylades is the exemplary loyal companion of Orestes. Ovid, Remedies for Love 589, advises keeping such a companion; Burton adapts Semper habe Pyladen aliquem qui curet Oresten to the printed Semper habens Pylademque aliquem qui curet Orestem. The altered form, including the expanded que abbreviation, is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For as in all other occurrences, so it is in this, Si quis in cælum ascendisset, &c. as he said in [6159]Tully, If a man had gone to heaven, seen the beauty of the skies, stars errant, fixed, &c. insuavis erit admiratio, it will do him no pleasure, except he have some body to impart what he hath seen.	For it is the same here as in every other circumstance. “If someone had ascended to heaven,” and so forth, as the speaker in Cicero says: if a man had gone to heaven, seen the beauty of the skies, the wandering and fixed stars, and so on, “his wonder will be without delight.” It will give him no pleasure unless he has someone with whom to share what he has seen.[6160]
Source page 293–294 It is the best thing in the world, as [6161]Seneca therefore adviseth in such a case, to get a trusty friend, to whom we may freely and sincerely pour out our secrets; nothing so delighteth and easeth the minde, as when we have a prepared bosome, to which our secrets may descend, of whose conscience we are assured as our own, whose speech may ease our succourless estate, counsell relieve, mirth expell our mourning, and whose very sight may be acceptable unto us.	It is the best thing in the world, as Seneca therefore advises in such a case, to find a trustworthy friend to whom we may freely and sincerely pour out our secrets. Nothing so delights and eases the mind as having a receptive heart into which our secrets may descend, someone whose integrity we trust as our own, whose speech may ease our helpless condition, whose counsel may relieve us, whose cheerfulness may dispel our mourning, and whose very presence may please us.[6162]

[6159] Burton. Printed page 293, dagger: “De amicitia.” Cicero, On Friendship.

[6160] Editor. Cicero, On Friendship 88, reports this saying of Archytas: even the spectacle of the heavens would lack delight without someone to hear of it. Burton expands the description. Wandering stars are planets; fixed stars are those regarded as maintaining their relative positions.

[6161] Burton. Printed page 294, l, continued across the page foot: “De tranquil. c. 7. Optimum est amicum fidelem nancisci in quem secreta nostra infundamus; nihil æquè oblectat animum, quam ubi sint præparata pectora, in quæ tutò secreta descendant, quorum conscientia æque ac tua: quorum sermo solitudinem leniat, sententia consilium expediat, hilaritas tristitiam dissipet, conspectusque ipse delectet.” “On Tranquillity, chapter 7. It is best to find a faithful friend into whom we may pour our secrets. Nothing equally delights the mind as having receptive hearts into which secrets may safely descend, whose integrity is like your own; whose conversation relieves solitude, whose judgement makes counsel clear, whose cheerfulness dispels sadness, and whose very sight delights.”

[6162] Editor. Seneca, On Tranquillity of Mind 7, praises faithful friendship. Burton’s Latin paraphrase differs from the received text, notably giving solitudinem, solitude, where the consulted text has sollicitudinem, anxiety. His English also develops the thought independently. Both versions are retained, without harmonization.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 294 It was the counsell which that politick [6163]Commineus gave to all princes, and others distressed in mind, by occasion of Charles Duke of Burgundy, that was much perplexed, first to pray to God, and lay himself open to him, and then to some speciall friend, whom we hold most dear, to tell all our grievances to him; nothing so forcible to strengthen, recreate and heal the wounded soul of a miserable man.	This was the counsel that the politically shrewd Commynes gave to all princes and others distressed in mind, prompted by Charles, Duke of Burgundy, who was deeply troubled: first pray to God and lay oneself open to him, then to some particular friend whom we hold most dear, telling him all our troubles. Nothing is so powerful in strengthening, refreshing, and healing the wounded soul of a miserable man.[6164]

[6163] Burton. Printed page 294, m, continued across the page foot: “Comment. l. 7. Ad Deum confugiamus, & peccatis veniam precemur, inde ad amicos, & cui plurimum tribuimus, nos patefaciamus totos, & animi vulnus quo affligimur: nihil ad reficiendum animum efficacius.” “Memoirs, book 7. Let us take refuge in God and pray for forgiveness of sins; then turn to friends, and to the one we esteem most, reveal ourselves wholly and the wound of mind that afflicts us. Nothing is more effective for restoring the spirit.”

[6164] Editor. Politick means versed in political affairs or shrewd. Commineus is Philippe de Commynes; Charles is Charles the Bold, Duke of Burgundy. Burton’s margin cites book 7 of the memoirs. The exact edition, numbering and Latin translation behind the passage remain to be collated. This concludes Member 6, Subsection 1.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsect. 2. Help from friends by counsell, comfort, fair and foul means, witty devices, satisfaction, alteration of his course of life, removing objects, &c.	Subsection 2 Help from friends through counsel and comfort gentle and harsh methods ingenious devices reassurance changes in the way of life and removal of troubling objects and so forth
When the Patient of himself is not able to resist, or overcome these heart-eating passions, his friends or physician must be ready to supply that which is wanting. Suæ erit humanitatis & sapientiæ (which [6165]Tully injoyneth in like case) siquid erratum, curare, aut improvisum, suâ diligentiâ corrigere. They must all joyn; nec satis medico, saith [6166]Hippocrates, suum fecisse officium, nisi suum quoque ægrotus, suum astantes, &c.	When the patient cannot by himself resist or overcome these passions that eat away at the heart, his friends or physician must be ready to supply what he lacks. “It will be the part of their humanity and wisdom”—as Cicero directs in a similar case—“to attend to any error, or by their diligence correct anything unforeseen.” They must all work together. As Hippocrates says, “It is not enough for the physician to have done his duty unless the patient and those attending him also do theirs,” and so forth.[6167]
First they must especially beware, a melancholy discontented person (be it in what kinde of melancholy soever) never be left alone or idle: but as Physicians prescribe physick, cum custodiâ, let them not be left unto themselves, but with some company or other, lest by that means they aggravate and increase their disease; non oportet ægros hujusmodi esse solos vel inter ignotos, vel inter eos quos non amant aut negligunt, as Rod. à Fonseca Tom. 1. consul. 35. prescribes.	First, they must take special care that a melancholy, discontented person, whatever the kind of melancholy, is never left alone or idle. As physicians prescribe medicine “under supervision,” so let such patients have company rather than be left to themselves, lest their illness thereby grow worse: “Patients of this kind should not be alone, or among strangers, or among people they do not love or do not care about,” as Rodrigo da Fonseca prescribes in volume 1, consultation 35.[6168]

[6165] Burton. Printed page 294, asterisk: “Ep. Q. frat.” Cicero, Letters to his brother Quintus. The marginal citation gives no book or letter number.

[6166] Burton. Printed page 294, asterisk: “Aphor. prim.” Hippocrates, first Aphorism.

[6167] Editor. Hippocrates, Aphorisms 1.1, calls for cooperation between physician, patient, attendants and surrounding circumstances. Burton abbreviates this in Latin. The preceding Cicero phrase adapts Letters to Quintus 1.1.3, where Cicero asks his brother to correct an error through his wisdom, humanity and diligence. Throughout this subsection, medical assertions and directions represent Burton and his historical authorities.

[6168] Editor. Physick can mean medicine or medical treatment; cum custodia means with watchful care or supervision. The final Latin clause concerns people the patients do not love or regard, rather than unambiguously people who neglect the patients. The source is Fonseca’s medical consultations; the exact passage has not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Lugentes custodire solemus (saith [6169]Seneca) ne solitudine male utantur; we watch a sorrowfull person, lest he abuse his solitariness, and so should we do a melancholy man; set him about some business, exercise or recreation, which may divert his thoughts, and still keep him otherwise intent; for his phantasie is so restless, operative and quick, that if it be not in perpetuall action, ever employed, it will work upon it self, melancholize, and be carried away instantly, with some fear, jealousie, discontent, suspicion, some vain conceit or other.	"We are accustomed to watch over those who mourn," says Seneca, "lest they make harmful use of solitude." We watch a sorrowful person lest he misuse his isolation, and we should do the same for a melancholy man. Give him some business, exercise, or recreation to divert his thoughts and keep his attention elsewhere. His imagination is so restless, active, and swift that, unless it is continually occupied, it will work upon itself, sink into melancholy, and instantly be swept away by some fear, jealousy, discontent, suspicion, or empty notion.[6170]
Source page 294–295 If his weakness be such, that he cannot discern what is amiss, correct or satisfie, it behoves them by counsel, comfort, or perswasion, by fair or foul means, to alienate his mind, by some artificial invention, or some contrary perswasion, to remove all objects, causes, companies, occasions, as may any wayes molest him, to humour him, please him, divert him, and if it be possible, by altering his course of life, to give him security and satisfaction. If he conceal his grievances, and will not be known of them, [6171]They must observe by his looks, gestures, motions, phantasie, what it is that offends, and then to apply remedies unto him: many are instantly cured, when their minds are satisfied.	If his weakness prevents him from recognizing what is wrong, correcting it, or finding reassurance, they must turn his mind elsewhere through counsel, comfort, or persuasion, by gentle or harsh means, by some ingenious device or an opposing argument. They must remove any objects, causes, company, or circumstances that distress him, accommodate his wishes, please and distract him, and, if possible, give him security and reassurance by changing his way of life. If he conceals his troubles and refuses to acknowledge them, they must discover what distresses him by observing his expression, gestures, movements, and imagination, and then apply remedies. Many are cured at once when their minds are put at ease.[6172]

[6169] Burton. Printed page 294, asterisk: "Epist. 10." Seneca, Letter 10.

[6170] Editor. Seneca, Letters 10.2. Burton changes the singular person who mourns and fears into mourners in the plural and omits the reference to fear. His separate English paraphrase is retained after the translated Latin. Phantasie means imagination; melancholize here describes its turning inward into melancholy.

[6171] Burton. Printed page 295, n: "Observando motus, gestus, manus, pedes, oculos, phantasiam. Piso." "By observing movements, gestures, hands, feet, eyes, and imagination." Piso.

[6172] Editor. Alienate his mind here means divert his attention, not estrange him from others. Artificial invention is a deliberately devised contrivance. Fair or foul means spans gentle and harsh methods; later examples make that range explicit. Satisfaction usually means reassurance or resolution of a troubling belief. Will not be known of them means will not acknowledge them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 295 [6173]Alexander makes mention of a woman, that by reason of her husbands long absence in travel, was exceeding peevish and melancholy, but when she heard her husband was returned, beyond all expectation, at the first sight of him, she was freed from all fear, without help of any other physick restored to her former health.	Alexander mentions a woman who, because her husband had long been away travelling, was exceedingly irritable and melancholy. But when she heard that he had returned, contrary to all expectation, the first sight of him freed her from every fear and restored her former health without any other medicine.[6174]
Trincavellius consil. 12. lib. 1. hath such a story of a Venetian, that being much troubled with melancholy, [6175]and ready to dye for grief, when he heard his wife was brought to bed of a son, instantly recovered. As Alexander concludes, [6176]If our imaginations be not inveterate, by this art they may be cured, especially, if they proceed from such a cause.	Trincavelli, in book 1, consultation 12, tells a similar story of a Venetian who was deeply afflicted with melancholy and ready to die of grief: when he heard that his wife had given birth to a son, he immediately recovered. As Alexander concludes, if our disordered imaginings have not become deeply rooted, they may be cured by this method, especially when they arise from such a cause.[6177]

[6173] Burton. Printed page 295, o: “Mulier melancholia correpta ex longa viri peregrinatione, et iracundè omnibus respondens, quum maritus domum reversus, præter spem, &c.” “A woman afflicted with melancholy through her husband’s long travels, and answering everyone angrily, when her husband returned home unexpectedly,” and so forth. The abbreviated Latin is left unfinished, as printed.

[6174] Editor. Alexander is Alexander of Tralles, also called Trallianus below. Peevish here means irritable or ill-tempered. The margin supplies a Latin summary of the anecdote, including the detail that the woman answered people angrily; it does not supply a complete sentence.

[6175] Burton. Printed page 295, p: “Præ dolore moriturus, quum nunciatum esset uxorem peperisse filium, subitò recuperavit.” “On the point of dying from grief, when told that his wife had borne a son, he suddenly recovered.”

[6176] Burton. Printed page 295, q: “Nisi affectus longo tempore infestaverit, tali artificio imaginationes curare oportet, præsertim ubi malum ab his velut à primaria causa occasionem habuerit.” “Unless the disorder has troubled him for a long time, the imaginings should be treated by such a method, especially where the illness has taken its occasion from them as from a primary cause.”

[6177] Editor. Inveterate means long-established or deeply rooted. Trincavellius is Vittore Trincavelli. These are reported cases within Burton’s argument; their descriptions do not independently establish the mechanism or durability of a cure.

Original text 1651	Modern English
No better way to satisfy, then to remove the object, cause, occasion, if by any art or means possible we may finde it out. If he grieve, stand in fear, be in suspicion, suspence, or any way molested, secure him, Solvitur malum, give him satisfaction, the cure is ended; alter his course of life, there needs no other Physick.	There is no better way to reassure him than to remove the object, cause, or occasion of his trouble, if we can discover it by any possible skill or means. If he grieves, fears, suspects, waits in uncertainty, or is distressed in any way, make him feel secure: "the trouble is resolved." Give him reassurance and the cure is complete; change his way of life and no other medicine is needed.[6178]
If the party be sad, or otherwise affected, consider (saith [6179]saith Trallianus) the manner of it, all circumstances, and forthwith make a sudden alteration, by removing the occasions, avoid all terrible objects, heard or seen, [6180]monstrous and prodigious aspects, tales of devils, spirits, ghosts, tragicall stories; to such as are in fear they strike a great impression, renew many times, & recal such Chimera's and terrible fictions into their minds.	If the person is sad or otherwise troubled, consider, says Trallianus, the nature of the trouble and all its circumstances, and immediately bring about a sudden change by removing its occasions. Avoid everything frightening to hear or see: monstrous and unnatural sights, tales of devils, spirits, and ghosts, and tragic stories. These make a powerful impression on fearful people, often renewing and recalling such chimeras and terrifying inventions to their minds.[6181]

[6178] Editor. Secure him means make him feel safe or reassured. Burton's assertion that no further medicine is needed is categorical; the modernization preserves it as his claim rather than adding qualifications to his text.

[6179] Burton. Printed page 295, r: "Lib. 1. cap. 16. Si ex tristitia aut alio affectu cœperit, speciem considera, aut aliud quid eorum, quæ subitam alterationem facere possunt." "Book 1, chapter 16. If it began from sadness or another emotion, consider its particular kind, or some other thing among those capable of producing a sudden change."

[6180] Burton. Printed page 295, s: "Evitandi monstrifici aspectus &c." "Monstrous sights must be avoided," and so forth.

[6181] Editor. The source prints saith twice; both occurrences remain on the original side, with the accidental repetition removed in the modern version. Chimera originally names a composite mythological monster; here the plural denotes fearful creations of the imagination. Prodigious means abnormal or portentous, not merely very large.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6182]Make not so much as mention of them in private talk, or a dumb shew tending to that purpose: such things (saith Galateus) are offensive to their imaginations. And to those that are now in sorrow, [6183]Seneca forbids all sad companions, and such as lament; a groaning companion is an enemy to quietness.	Do not even mention them in private conversation or make a gesture suggesting them: such things, says Galateus, distress their imaginations. For those who are already sorrowful, Seneca forbids gloomy companions and people who lament: a groaning companion is an enemy to peace of mind.[6184]

[6182] Burton. Printed page 295, t: "Neque enim tam actio, aut recordatio rerum hujusmodi displicet, sed iis vel gestus alterius Imaginationi adumbrare, vehementer molestum. Galat. de mor. cap. 7." "For it is not merely the act or recollection of such things that displeases them; even to suggest them to their imagination by another person's gesture is intensely distressing." Galateus, On Manners, chapter 7. The compressed construction is retained.

[6183] Burton. Printed page 295, u, continued across the page foot: "Tranquil. Præcipue vitentur tristes, & omnia deplorantes; tranquillitati inimicus est comes perturbatus, omnia gemens." "On Tranquillity. Above all, avoid gloomy people who lament everything; an agitated companion who groans about everything is an enemy to tranquillity."

[6184] Editor. Dumb shew means a silent gesture or acted representation. The online transcription of Giovanni della Casa's Galateus, translated into Latin by Nathan Chytraeus, p. 5, warns against suggesting disgusting things by speech or gesture in company. Burton adapts this rule of manners to a distressed patient. His Latin is compressed and altered. The cited chapter 7 and his immediate edition remain unverified. Seneca's advice about habitually lamenting companions occurs in On Tranquillity of Mind 7.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6185]Or if there be any such party, at whose presence the Patient is not well pleased, he must be removed: gentle speeches, and fair means must first be tryed; no harsh language used, or uncomfortable words; and not expel, as some do, one madness with another; he that so doth, is madder then the Patient himself: all things must be quietly composed; eversa non evertenda, sed erigenda, things down must not be dejected, but reared, as Crato counceleth; [6186]he must be quietly and gently used, and we should not do any thing against his mind, but by little and little effect it.	If anyone is present whom the patient dislikes, that person must be removed. Gentle words and mild methods must be tried first; use no harsh language or discouraging words. Do not, as some do, drive out one madness with another: anyone who does so is madder than the patient himself. Everything must be settled calmly: "what has been thrown down must not be overthrown, but raised up"—things already down must be lifted, not cast down further, as Crato advises. The patient must be treated calmly and gently; we should accomplish things gradually instead of acting against his wishes.[6187]
As an horse that starts at a drum or trumpet, and will not endure the shooting of a peece, may be so manned by art, and animated, that he cannot only endure, but is much more generous at the hearing of such things, much more couragious then before, and much delighteth in it: they must not be reformed ex abrupto, but by all art and insinuation, made to such companies, aspects, objects, they could not formerly away with.	A horse that shies at a drum or trumpet and cannot endure gunfire may be so skilfully trained and encouraged that it not only tolerates these sounds but becomes more spirited and courageous on hearing them, and takes great pleasure in them. In the same way, these people must not be changed "all at once"; through every skilful and gradual approach, they must be accustomed to company, sights, and objects they formerly could not bear.[6188]

[6185] Burton. Printed page 295, x, at the page foot: "Illorum quoque hominum, à quorum consortio abhorrent, præsentia amovenda; nec sermonibus ingratis obtundendi; siquis insaniam ab insania sic curari æstimet, & protervè utitur, magis quam æger insanit. Crato consil. 184. Scoltzii." "The presence of people whose company they abhor must also be removed; nor must they be harassed with unwelcome words. If anyone thinks madness can thus be cured by madness, and behaves aggressively, he is madder than the patient." Crato, consultation 184 in Scholz's collection.

[6186] Burton. Printed page 295, y, at the page foot: "Molliter ac suaviter æger tractetur; nec ad ea alligatur quæ non curat." "Let the patient be treated gently and agreeably; nor is he to be tied to things he does not care for." The change of grammatical construction in alligatur is retained.

[6187] Editor. Crato is the physician Johannes Crato von Krafftheim; Scoltzii refers to a collection associated with Lorenz Scholz. The printed citation is consultation 184. Burton's Latin maxim and his English expansion have both been retained. Used means treated.

[6188] Editor. Manned means trained or made manageable; generous, applied to a horse, means spirited. A peece is a firearm. Insinuation here suggests gradual, skilful introduction. The comparison is Burton's analogy between habituation in animals and people, without a modern clinical label added.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 295–292 [296] Many at first cannot endure the sight of a green wound, a sick man, which afterward become good Chyrurgians, bold Empericks: A horse starts at a rotten post afar off, which coming neer, he quietly passeth. 'Tis much in the manner of making such kind of persons, be they never so averse from company, bashful, solitary, timorous, they may be made at last with those Roman Matrons, to desire nothing more then in a publike shew, to see a full company of gladiators breath out their last.	Many who at first cannot bear the sight of a fresh wound or a sick person later become good surgeons and confident practitioners. A horse shies at a rotten post in the distance, yet passes it calmly when it comes nearer. Much depends on how such people are trained: however averse to company, bashful, solitary, or fearful they may be, they may eventually, like those Roman matrons, desire nothing more than to see an entire company of gladiators breathe their last in a public show.[6189]
Source page 292 [296] If they may not otherwise be accustomed to brook such distastful and displeasing objects, the best way then is generally to avoid them. Montanus consil. 229. to the Earl of Montfort a Courtier, and his Melancholy Patient, adviseth him to leave the Court, by reason of those continual discontents, crosses, abuses, [6190]cares, suspicions, emulations, ambition, anger, jealousie, which that place afforded, and which surely caused him to be so melancholy at the first: Maxima quæque domus servis est plena superbis;	If they cannot otherwise become accustomed to bearing such distasteful and unpleasant things, the best course is generally to avoid them. In consultation 229, Montanus advises the Earl of Montfort, a courtier and his melancholy patient, to leave court because of its continual discontents, setbacks, insults, cares, suspicions, rivalries, ambition, anger, and jealousy—the very things that had surely made him melancholy in the first place. "Every great house is full of arrogant servants."[6191]

[6189] Editor. A green wound is a fresh wound; empiricks are practitioners whose work rests on experience rather than learned medical theory. Burton's reference to Roman matrons and gladiators illustrates acquired tolerance through a morally disturbing example. No precise source for this allusion is given. The next scan, PDF 404, is printed 292 in error between pages 295 and 297; it is recorded here as 292 [296], not silently renumbered.

[6190] Burton. Printed page 292 [296], z: "Ob suspiciones curas, æmulationem, ambitionem, iras, &c. quas locus ille ministrat, & quæ fecissent melancholicum." "Because of the suspicions, cares, rivalry, ambition, anger, and so forth, which that place supplies and which had made him melancholy."

[6191] Editor. The Latin line is Juvenal, Satire 5.66, set in a description of humiliating treatment at a rich patron's dinner. The consulted Latin text brackets this line; it is retained as Burton quotes it. Quæq; is expanded to quæque. Montanus is Giovanni Battista da Monte; the cited consultation has not been collated in its original edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A company of scoffers and proud Jacks, are commonly conversant and attendant in such places, & able to make any man that is of a soft quiet disposition (as many times they do) ex stulto insanum, if once they humor him, a very Idiot, or stark mad. A thing too much practised in all common societies, and they have no better sport then to make themselves merry by abusing some silly fellow, or to take advantage of another mans weakness.	A crowd of scoffers and arrogant fellows commonly frequent and attend such places. Once they begin playing upon a gentle, quiet man's peculiarities, they can turn him "from a fool into a madman"—as they often do—make him an utter simpleton or drive him completely mad. This is all too common in social groups: they can find no better amusement than to entertain themselves by tormenting some simple fellow or taking advantage of another man's weakness.[6192]
In such cases as in a plague, the best remedy is citò, longè, tardè: (for to such a party, especially if he be apprehensive, there can be no greater misery) to get him quickly gone far enough off, and not to be over-hasty in his return. If he be so stupid, that he do not apprehend it, his friends should take some order, & by their discretion supply that which is wanting in him, as in all other cases they ought to do.	In such cases, as in a plague, the best remedy is "quickly, far away, slowly": get him away quickly, send him far enough off, and do not let him hurry back. For such a person, especially if he is sensitive to what is happening, there can be no greater misery. If he is too uncomprehending to recognize it, his friends should arrange matters and use their judgement to supply what he lacks, as they should in every other case.[6193]

[6192] Editor. Proud Jacks means arrogant or insolent fellows. Humor him in this hostile setting means play upon his disposition or peculiarities. Silly means simple or unsuspecting. The harsh language and the argument that sustained mockery can aggravate mental suffering belong to Burton's text.

[6193] Editor. The three Latin adverbs compress a rule of flight: leave quickly, go far away, return slowly. Burton applies this plague formula to escape from destructive company. Apprehensive here means aware or sensitive, not simply anxious; stupid suggests dullness of perception.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If they see a man Melancholy given, solitary, averse from company, please himself with such private and vain meditations, though he delight in it, they ought by all means to seek to divert him, to dehort him, to tell him of the event and danger that may come of it. If they see a man idle, that by reason of his means otherwise, will betake himself to no course of life, they ought seriously to admonish him, he makes a noose to intangle himself, his want of imployment will be his undoing.	If they see a man inclined to melancholy, solitary and averse to company, pleasing himself with these private, empty meditations, they should try by every means to divert and discourage him, however much he enjoys them, and tell him what consequences and dangers may follow. If they see an idle man who, because he has an independent income, will take up no occupation, they should seriously warn him that he is making a noose to ensnare himself: his lack of employment will be his undoing.[6194]
If he have sustained any great losse, suffered a repulse, disgrace, &c. if it be possible, relieve him. If he desire ought, let him be satisfied; If in suspence, fear, suspicion, let him be secured: and if it may conveniently be, give him his hearts content; for the body cannot be cured till the mind be satisfied. [6195]Socrates in Plato would prescribe no Physick for Charmides head-ach, till first he had eased his troublesome mind; body and soul must be cured together, as head and eyes.	If he has sustained a great loss, suffered rejection or disgrace, or the like, relieve him if possible. If he wants something, satisfy him; if he is in uncertainty, fear, or suspicion, reassure him. Where it can reasonably be done, give him his heart's desire, for the body cannot be cured until the mind is at ease. In Plato, Socrates would prescribe no medicine for Charmides' headache until he had first eased his troubled mind: body and soul must be cured together, just as head and eyes must.[6196]
[6197]Oculum non curabis sine toto capite, Nec caput sine toto corpore, Nec totum corpus sine animâ;	You will not cure the eye without the whole head, Nor the head without the whole body, Nor the whole body without the soul.

[6194] Editor. Dehort means dissuade or discourage. Means otherwise refers to resources that allow someone to live without an occupation. Course of life here means an occupation or regular way of living; the noose is Burton's image for self-entanglement through idleness.

[6195] Burton. Printed page 292 [296], dagger: "Nisi prius animum turbatissimum curasset; oculi sine capite, nec corpus sine anima curari potest." "Unless he had first treated the deeply troubled mind; the eyes cannot be cured without the head, nor the body without the soul." The irregular number agreement is retained.

[6196] Editor. In Plato's Charmides, Socrates recounts the teaching of a Thracian healer: the soul must receive treatment before the head and body can properly be treated. Burton condenses this into the encounter with Charmides. His ensuing three Latin lines are an adaptation marked from the Greek, not Greek text; their displayed form is preserved.

[6197] Burton. Printed page 292 [296], asterisk: "E græco." "From the Greek." This note identifies the language behind the displayed Latin adaptation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If that may not be hoped or expected, yet ease him with comfort, chearful speeches, fair promises, and good words, perswade him, advise him. Many, saith [6198]Galen, have been cured by good counsel and perswasion alone. Heaviness of the heart of man doth bring it down, but a good word rejoyceth it, Pro. 12. 25. and there Is he that speaketh words like the pricking of a sword, but the tongue of a wise man is health, Ver. 18.	If that cannot be hoped for or expected, still give him relief through comfort, cheerful conversation, encouraging promises, and kind words; persuade and advise him. Many, says Galen, have been cured by good counsel and persuasion alone. "Heaviness in a person's heart brings it down, but a good word gladdens it," Proverbs 12:25. And there is one "whose words stab like a sword, but the tongue of a wise person brings healing," verse 18.[6199]
Source page 292 [296]–297 Oratio, namque saucii animi est remedium, a gentle speech is the true cure of a wounded soul, as [6200]Plutarch contends out of Æschylus and Euripides: if it be wisely administred, it easeth grief and pain, as divers remedies do many other diseases: 'Tis incantationis instar, a charm, Æstuantis animi refrigerium, that true Nepenthe of Homer, which was no Indian plant or fained medicine, which Epidamna Thonis wife sent Helena for a token, as Macrobius 7. Saturnal. Goropius Hermat. lib. 9. Greg. Nanzianzen and others suppose, but opportunity of speech:	"Speech is a remedy for the wounded mind": gentle words are the true cure of a wounded soul, as Plutarch argues from Aeschylus and Euripides. Wisely administered, they ease grief and pain, just as different remedies relieve other diseases. They are "like an incantation," a charm, "refreshment for an agitated mind"—Homer's true nepenthe. As Macrobius in book 7 of the Saturnalia, Goropius in book 9 of the Hermathena, Gregory Nazianzen, and others interpret it, this was no Indian plant or imaginary medicine sent by Epidamna, Thonis' wife, to Helen as a gift, but speech suited to the occasion.[6201]

[6198] Burton. Printed page 292 [296], a: "Et nos non paucos sanavimus, animi motibus ad debitum revocatis lib. 1. de sanit. tuend." "And we have cured not a few by bringing the movements of the mind back to their proper condition." Book 1, On Preserving Health.

[6199] Editor. The biblical references are Proverbs 12:25 and 12:18. Burton uses the two contrasting images of speech that wounds and speech that heals. Galen's marginal quotation is attributed to book 1 of On Preserving Health; the exact Latin edition and passage remain uncollated.

[6200] Burton. Printed page 292 [296], b: "Consol. ad Apollonium. Si quis sapienter et suo tempore adhibeat, Remedia morbis diversis diversa sunt; dolentem sermo benignus sublevat." "Consolation to Apollonius. If one applies it wisely and at the proper time. Different diseases have different remedies; kindly speech relieves the sufferer."

[6201] Editor. Consolation to Apollonius 2, transmitted among Plutarch's Moralia, juxtaposes lines attributed to Aeschylus and Euripides about timely consoling speech; its authorship is disputed. In Odyssey 4, Helen actually puts a grief-banishing drug into wine, a gift from Polydamna, wife of Thon, in Egypt. Burton prints Epidamna. Macrobius, Saturnalia 7.1.18–19, expressly interprets the drug as a well-timed story, supporting the reading of Burton's as … suppose as an appeal to that interpretation. The Goropius and Gregory passages remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 297 for Helena's boule, Medea's unction, Venus Girdle, Circes Cup, cannot so inchant, so forcibly move or alter as it doth. A letter sent or read will do as much; multum allevor quum tuas literas lego, I am much eased, as [6202]Tully writ to Pomponius Atticus, when I read thy letters,	For Helen's bowl, Medea's ointment, Venus's girdle, and Circe's cup cannot enchant, move, or transform so powerfully. A letter sent or read can do as much: "I find great relief when I read your letters"—I am much eased, as Cicero wrote to Pomponius Atticus, when I read your letters.[6203]
and as Iulianus the Apostate once signified to Maximus the Philosopher; as Alexander slept with Homers works, so do I with thine Epistles, tanquam Pæoniis medicamentis, easque assiduè tanquam recentes & novas iteramus; scribe ergo, & assiduè scribe, or else come thy self; amicus ad amicum venies.	And as Julian the Apostate once told Maximus the philosopher: just as Alexander slept with Homer's works, so I sleep with your letters, "as with healing medicines, and read them continually as though they were fresh and new. Write, then, and keep on writing"—or else come yourself: "you will come as a friend to a friend."[6204]

[6202] Burton. Printed page 297, dagger: "Lib. 12. Epist." Book 12 of the letters; the body identifies the recipient as Atticus.

[6203] Editor. Boule means bowl. The objects associated with Helen, Medea, Venus and Circe are legendary instruments of enchantment or alteration. Cicero, Letters to Atticus 12.39.2, says correspondence relieves him and reading Atticus's letters still more. Burton compresses that thought into his Latin phrase, then supplies his own English gloss; both remain represented.

[6204] Editor. The comparison with Alexander and Homer is in Julian's letter to Maximus, numbered 12 in Wilmer Cave Wright's edition. Burton renders it through Latin and English. Pæoniis invokes healing associated with Paeon, a divine healer. The concluding friend-to-friend formula is retained, but its exact correspondence to this letter's closing words remains unconfirmed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Assuredly a wise and well spoken man may do what he will in such a case; a good Orator alone, as [6205]Tully holds, can alter affections by power of his eloquence, comfort such as are afflicted, erect such as are depressed, expel and mitigate fear, lust, anger, &c. And how powerfull is the charm of a discreet and dear friend? Ille regit dictis animos & temperat iras. What may not he effect?	Surely a wise and eloquent person can accomplish whatever he wishes in such a case. A good orator alone, as Cicero maintains, can change emotions through the power of eloquence: comfort the afflicted, raise up the downcast, banish and moderate fear, desire, anger, and so forth. And how powerful is the charm of a prudent, dear friend! "He rules their minds with words and calms their anger." What can he not accomplish?[6206]
As [6207]Chremes told Menedemus, Fear not, conceal it not O friend, but tell me what it is that troubles thee, and I shall surely help thee by comfort, counsel, or in the matter it self. [6208]Arnoldus lib. 1. breviar. cap. 18. speaks of an Usurer in his time, that upon a loss much melancholy and discontent was so cured.	As Chremes told Menedemus: "Do not fear or hide it, my friend; tell me what troubles you, and I will surely help through comfort, counsel, or practical action." Arnoldus, in book 1, chapter 18 of the Breviary, speaks of a moneylender in his time who had become deeply melancholy and discontented after a loss, and was cured in this way.[6209]

[6205] Burton. Printed page 297, c: "De nat. deorum consolatur afflictus, deducit perterritos à timore, cupiditates inprimit, & iracundias comprimit." "On the Nature of the Gods: it consoles the afflicted, leads the terrified away from fear, restrains desires, and suppresses anger." Afflictus and inprimit are retained as printed; the translation gives the apparent sense of the compressed quotation.

[6206] Editor. Affections are emotional states; lust can mean desire more broadly than sexual appetite. Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods 2.148, describes the consoling and restraining power of speech. Burton abbreviates and alters its Latin wording. His final Latin sentence adapts Virgil, Aeneid 1.153: the consulted text ends with et pectora mulcet, and soothes their hearts, rather than Burton's et temperat iras, and calms their anger.

[6207] Burton. Printed page 297, d: "Heauton. Act. 1. Scen. 1. Ne metue, ne verere, crede inquam mihi, aut consolando, aut consilio, aut re juvero." "The Self-Tormentor, act 1, scene 1. Do not fear, do not be ashamed; trust me, I say. I will help with consolation, counsel, or action." Burton's adapted wording is retained.

[6208] Burton. Printed page 297, e: "Novi fœneratorem avarum apud meos sic curatum, qui multam pecuniam amiserat." "I knew a greedy moneylender among my own people who was cured in this way after losing a great deal of money."

[6209] Editor. Terence, The Self-Tormentor 84–86, has Chremes offer Menedemus consolation, counsel or practical help. Burton's marginal Ne metue differs from the consulted text's Ne retice, do not keep silent; his English paraphrase includes both fear and concealment. Arnoldus is named as author of the medical Breviary; the precise edition and attribution of this passage remain to be verified. Usurer denotes a moneylender, with a disapproving implication here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As imagination, fear, grief, cause such passions, so conceipts alone, rectified by good hope, counsel, &c. are able again to help: and 'tis incredible how much they can do in such a case, as [6210]Trincavellius illustrates by an example of a Patient of his;	Just as imagination, fear, and grief cause such passions, so thoughts alone, set right by good hope, counsel, and the like, can in turn bring relief. It is incredible how much they can accomplish in such a case, as Trincavelli illustrates through one of his patients.[6211]
Porphyrius the Philosopher (in Plotinus life, written by him) relates, that being in a discontented humor through unsufferable anguish of mind, he was going to make away himself: but meeting by chance his Master Plotinus, who perceiving by his distracted looks all was not wel, urged him to confess his grief: which when he had heard, he used such comfortable speeches, that he redeemed him è faucibus Erebi, pacified his unquiet mind, insomuch that he was easily reconciled to himself, and much abashed to think afterwards, that he should ever entertain so vile a motion.	The philosopher Porphyry relates, in his Life of Plotinus, that, distressed by unbearable mental anguish, he was about to take his own life. But he happened to meet his teacher Plotinus, who saw from his distracted expression that something was wrong and urged him to disclose his grief. After hearing it, Plotinus spoke with such comfort that he rescued him "from the jaws of the underworld" and calmed his troubled mind. He was readily reconciled to himself and afterwards felt deeply ashamed that he had ever entertained so base an impulse.[6212]

[6210] Burton. Printed page 297, f: "Lib. 1. consil. 12. Incredibile dictu quantum juvent." "Book 1, consultation 12. It is incredible to say how much they help."

[6211] Editor. Conceipts means thoughts or mental notions. The marginal citation repeats Trincavelli, book 1, consultation 12, already used for the Venetian's recovery after news of his son's birth. Burton does not provide further detail about the patient in this second reference.

[6212] Editor. Porphyry, Life of Plotinus 11, says Plotinus came unexpectedly to his house, identified his wish to die as arising from melancholy rather than reason, and advised him to leave Rome; Porphyry went to Sicily and recovered his desire to live. Burton turns this into a chance meeting and an immediate consolatory exchange, omitting the journey. His closing moral judgement is Burton's. Erebus names the darkness of the underworld.

Original text 1651	Modern English
By all means therefore, fair promises, good words, gentle perswasions are to be used, not to be too rigorous at first, [6213]or to insult over them, not to deride, neglect or contemn, but rather, as Lemnius exhorteth, to pity, and by all plausible means to seek to reduce them:	Therefore, encouraging promises, kind words, and gentle persuasion must be used by every means. Do not be too severe at first, or browbeat them, mock them, neglect them, or treat them with contempt; instead, as Lemnius urges, pity them and try by every agreeable means to bring them back to health.[6214]
but if satisfaction may not be had, mild courses, promises, comfortable speeches, and good counsel will not take place; then as Christopherus à Vega determines, lib. 3. cap. 14. de Mel. to handle them more roughly, to threaten and chide, saith [6215]Altomarus, terrifie sometimes, or as Salvianus will have them, to be lashed and whipped, [6216]as we do by a starting horse, that is affrighted without a cause, or as [6217]Rhasis adviseth, one while to speak fair and flatter, another while to terrifie and chide, as they shall see cause.	But if reassurance cannot be achieved, and mild methods, promises, comforting words, and good counsel have no effect, then, as Cristóbal de Vega determines in book 3, chapter 14, on melancholy, treat them more roughly. Threaten and scold them, says Altomari; sometimes frighten them. Or, as Salviani would have it, lash and whip them, as we do a shying horse frightened without a cause. Or follow Rhazes' advice: at one time speak gently and flatter them, at another frighten and scold them, as circumstances seem to require.[6218]

[6213] Burton. Printed page 297, g: "Nemo istiusmodi conditionis hominibus insultet, aut in illos sit severior, verum miseriæ potius indolescat, vicemque deploret. lib. 2. cap. 16." "Let no one insult people in this condition or be too harsh with them; rather let him grieve at their misery and lament their plight." Book 2, chapter 16.

[6214] Editor. Insult over means treat arrogantly or browbeat. Plausible means pleasing or acceptable, not merely believable; reduce means bring back or restore. Lemnius's cited Latin emphasizes compassion rather than harshness.

[6215] Burton. Printed page 297, h: "Cap. 7. Idem Piso Laurentius cap. 8." "Chapter 7. Piso says the same; Laurentius, chapter 8."

[6216] Burton. Printed page 297, i: "Quod timet nihil est, ubi cogitur & videt." "What it fears is nothing, when it is forced forward and sees." The note accompanies the analogy of the frightened horse.

[6217] Burton. Printed page 297, k: "Una vice blandiantur, una vice iisdem terrorem incutiant." "At one time let them coax them; at another let them strike fear into the same people."

[6218] Editor. The appeal to gentleness gives way here to threats and physical punishment attributed to medical authorities. The transition is retained without softening it. These are historical prescriptions, not directions for present-day treatment. Altomarus is Donato Antonio Altomari; Salvianus is Salviano Salviani; Rhasis is Rhazes, or al-Razi.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 297–298 When none of these precedent remedies will avail, it will not be amiss, which Savanarola and Ælian Montaltus so much commend, clavum clavo pellere, [6219]to drive out one passion with another, or by some contrary passion, as they do bleeding at nose by letting blood in the arm, to expel one fear with another, one grief with another. [6220]Christopherus à Vega accounts it rational Physick, non alienum à ratione:	When none of these preceding remedies works, it will be worth doing what Savonarola and Eliano Montalto so highly recommend: "drive out one nail with another"—drive out one passion by another, or by its opposite, as they treat a nosebleed by drawing blood from the arm. Expel one fear with another, one grief with another. Cristóbal de Vega considers this rational medicine, "not contrary to reason."[6221]
Source page 298 and Lemnius much approves it, to use an hard wedge to an hard knot, to drive out one disease with another, to pull out a tooth, or wound him, to geld him saith [6222]Platerus, as they did Epileptical Patients of old, because it quite alters the temperature, that the pain of the one may mitigate the grief of the other; [6223]and I knew one that was so cured of a quartan ague, by the sudden comming of his enemies upon him.	Lemnius strongly approves of "using a hard wedge for a hard knot": driving out one disease with another, pulling out a tooth, wounding the patient, or castrating him, as Platter says was done to people with epilepsy in ancient times, because it completely alters the bodily constitution. Thus the pain of one may lessen the suffering caused by the other. "And I knew someone whose quartan fever was cured in this way, when his enemies suddenly came upon him."[6224]

[6219] Burton. Printed page 297, l: "Si vero fuerit ex novo malo audito, vel ex animi accidente, aut de amissione mercium, aut morte amici, introducantur nova contraria his quæ ipsum ad gaudia moveant; de hoc semper niti debemus, &c." "But if it arose from hearing of a new misfortune, or from an emotional disturbance, or the loss of goods, or a friend's death, let new things contrary to these be introduced to move him to joy; this is what we must always strive for," and so forth.

[6220] Burton. Printed page 297, m: "Lib. 3. cap. 14." Book 3, chapter 14.

[6221] Editor. Clavum clavo pellere is the proverb of driving out one nail with another. The margin gives examples of replacing sorrow with joyful news; the body also extends the idea to competing fears and pains. Bleeding in the arm to stop a nosebleed belongs to the historical practice of therapeutic bloodletting.

[6222] Burton. Printed page 298, dagger: "Cap. 3. Castratio olim à veteribus usa in morbis desperatis, &c." "Chapter 3. Castration was formerly used by the ancients in desperate diseases," and so forth.

[6223] Burton. Printed page 298, n: "Lib. 1. cap. 5. sic morbum morbo, ut clavum clavo, retundimus, & malo nodo, malum cuneum adhibemus. Novi ego qui ex subito hostium incursu, & inopinato timore quartanam depulerat." "Book 1, chapter 5. Thus we beat back disease with disease, as nail with nail, and apply a hard wedge to a hard knot. I knew someone who had driven away a quartan fever through a sudden enemy attack and an unexpected fright."

[6224] Editor. Geld means castrate; temperature means the bodily constitution or humoral balance. Platerus is Felix Platter. Quartan ague denotes a recurrent fever with attacks every fourth day by inclusive counting, or roughly every 72 hours. The proposed bodily injuries and the reported cure by fright are retained as historical claims, not endorsed therapies.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If we may believe [6225]Pliny, whom Scaliger cals mendaciorum patrem, the father of lies, Q. Fabius Maximus that renowned Consul of Rome, in a battle fought with the King of the Allobroges, at the river Isaurus was so rid of a quartan ague. Valesius in his controversies, holds this an excellent remedy, and if it be discreetly used in this malady, better then any Physick.	If we may believe Pliny, whom Scaliger calls "the father of falsehoods," the father of lies, Quintus Fabius Maximus, that renowned Roman consul, was freed from a quartan fever in this way during a battle with the king of the Allobroges at the river Isaurus. Valesius, in his Controversies, considers this an excellent remedy and, if judiciously used for this illness, better than any medicine.[6226]

[6225] Burton. Printed page 298, o: "Lib. 7. cap. 50. In acie pugnans febre quartana liberatus est." "Book 7, chapter 50. While fighting in battle he was freed from a quartan fever."

[6226] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 7.50, section 166, reports Fabius's recovery during battle with the Allobroges and Arverni at the river Isara. Burton gives Isaurus and describes a king of the Allobroges; those forms remain in the text. His qualification if we may believe Pliny is part of the report. The precise Scaliger and Valesius references remain unresolved; the Latin epithet and Burton's English gloss are both represented.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sometimes again by some [6227]fained lye, strange newes, witty device, artificial invention, it is not amiss to deceive them. [6228]As they hate those, saith Alexander, that neglect or deride, so they will give ear to such as will sooth them up. If they say they have swallowed frogs, or a snake, by all means grant it, and tell them you can easily cure it: 'tis an ordinary thing.	At other times it is worth deceiving them with a fabricated story, startling news, an ingenious device, or a contrivance. As they hate those who neglect or mock them, says Alexander, so they will listen to those who agree with them. If they say they have swallowed frogs or a snake, by all means agree, and tell them that you can easily cure it: it is an ordinary occurrence.[6229]
Philodotus the Physician cured a melancholy King, that thought his head was off, by putting a leaden cap thereon: the waight made him perceive it, and freed him of his fond imagination. A woman in the said Alexander, swallowed a Serpent as she thought; he gave her a vomit, and conveyed a Serpent, such as she conceived, into the bason; upon the sight of it she was amended.	The physician Philodotus cured a melancholy king who thought his head had been cut off by putting a lead cap on it: the weight made him feel his head and freed him from his foolish imagining. A woman described by the same Alexander thought she had swallowed a serpent. He gave her an emetic and secretly placed a serpent of the kind she imagined in the basin; on seeing it, she recovered.[6230]
The pleasantest dotage that ever I read, saith [6231]Laurentius, was of a Gentleman at Senes in Italy, who was afraid to piss, least all the Town should be drowned; the Physicians caused the bels to be rung backward, and told him the town was on fire, whereupon he made water and was immediately cured.	The most amusing delusion I ever read of, says Laurentius, concerned a gentleman at Siena in Italy who was afraid to urinate lest he flood the whole town. The physicians had the bells rung backwards and told him that the town was on fire; he then passed water and was immediately cured.[6232]

[6227] Burton. Printed page 298, p: "Iacchinus c. 15. in 9. Rhasis Mont. cap. 26." Iacchinus, chapter 15 on book 9 of Rhazes; Montalto, chapter 26. The abbreviated references remain to be fully collated.

[6228] Burton. Printed page 298, q: "Lib. 1. cap. 16. aversantur eos qui eorum affectus rident, contemnunt. Si ranas & viperas comedisse se putant, concedere debemus, & spem de cura facere." "Book 1, chapter 16. They shun those who laugh at or despise their afflictions. If they think they have eaten frogs and vipers, we must agree and give them hope of a cure."

[6229] Editor. Fained lye means an invented falsehood; witty means ingenious, and artificial means devised by art or skill. Sooth them up means agree with or indulge what they say. Burton presents deliberate deception as a treatment in the cases that follow; this is an aspect of his historical argument.

[6230] Editor. A vomit here means an emetic, a substance intended to provoke vomiting. Conveyed means secretly introduced or placed. The stories are preserved as Burton reports them; they have not been independently established as clinical events.

[6231] Burton. Printed page 298, r: "Cap. 8. de mel." Chapter 8, on melancholy.

[6232] Editor. Senes is Siena. Dotage here means a disordered belief or delusion, rather than necessarily old age. Bells rung backward signal an alarm in the story. Pleasantest preserves Laurentius's amusement at the anecdote; the translation does not recast the patient as the editor's object of ridicule.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Another supposed his nose so big that he should dash it against the wall if he stirred; his Physician took a great peece of flesh, and holding it in his hand, pinched him by the nose, making him believe that flesh was cut from it.	Another imagined that his nose was so large that he would strike it against the wall if he moved. His physician took a large piece of flesh, held it in his hand, and pinched the patient's nose, making him believe that the flesh had been cut from it.[6233]
Forestus obs. lib. 1. had a melancholy Patient, who thought he was dead, [6234]he put a fellow in a chest, like a dead man by his beds side, and made him reare himself a little, and eat: the melancholy man asked the counterfeit, whether dead men use to eat meat? he told him yea; whereupon he did eat likewise and was cured.	Forestus, in book 1 of his Observations, had a melancholy patient who thought he was dead. He placed a man in a chest beside the patient's bed, as though he were a corpse, and had him raise himself a little and eat. The melancholy man asked the pretended corpse whether dead people were accustomed to eating food. He said yes; the patient then ate too and was cured.[6235]
Lemnius lib. 2. cap. 6. de 4. complex. hath many such instances, and Iovianus Pontanus lib. 4. cap. 2. of Wisd. of the like: but amongst the rest I find one most memorable, registred in the [6236]French Chronicles, of an Advocate of Paris before mentioned, who beleeved verily he was dead, &c. I read a multitude of examples, of melancholy men cured by such artificial inventions.	Lemnius, in book 2, chapter 6 of On the Four Complexions, gives many such examples, as does Giovanni Pontano in book 4, chapter 2 of On Wisdom. Among the rest I find one especially memorable, recorded in the French Chronicles, concerning the Paris advocate mentioned earlier, who firmly believed that he was dead, and so forth. I have read a multitude of examples of melancholy people cured by such ingenious contrivances.[6237]

[6233] Editor. The physician creates apparent physical evidence to match the patient's belief, a pattern continued in the next story. Burton supplies no separate source for the oversized-nose anecdote in this paragraph.

[6234] Burton. Printed page 298, s: "Cistam posuit ex Medicorum consilio projectum, in quem alium se mortuum fingentem posuit; hic in cista jacens &c." "A chest was placed on the physicians' advice, with another man in it pretending to be dead; he, lying in the chest," and so forth. This gives the apparent sense; the printed Latin has disordered syntax and agreement, including projectum and in quem.

[6235] Editor. Forestus is Pieter van Foreest. Meat here means food generally, and counterfeit means the person pretending to be dead. The chest functions as a staged coffin. The marginal Latin is syntactically irregular and is translated for its apparent meaning, without silently emending the transcription.

[6236] Burton. Printed page 298, t: "Serres. 1550." Serres, 1550. The precise chronicle entry and the function of the number remain to be verified.

[6237] Editor. Complexions are bodily constitutions in humoral medicine. Iovianus Pontanus is Giovanni Pontano. The chronicle citation is Serres. 1550, with no fuller locator; its edition and the meaning of the number remain unresolved. The reference to an advocate mentioned earlier is retained; its precise antecedent has not been established. This concludes Member 6, Subsection 2; Subsection 3 begins Musick a remedy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsect. 3. Musick a remedy.	Subsection 3 Music as a remedy
Source page 298–299 Many and sundry are the means, which Philosophers and Physicians have prescribed to exhilarate a sorrowfull heart, to divert those fixed and intent cares and meditations, which in this malady so much offend; but in my judgment none so present, none so powerfull, none so apposite as a cup of strong drink, mirth, musick, and merry company. Ecclus 40. 20. Wine and musick rejoyce the heart.	Philosophers and physicians have prescribed many different means of cheering a sorrowful heart and diverting those fixed, absorbing cares and thoughts that cause so much distress in this illness. But in my judgement none works so promptly, none is so powerful or so suitable, as a cup of strong drink, cheerfulness, music, and lively company. Ecclesiasticus 40:20: "Wine and music gladden the heart."[6238]
Source page 299 [6239]Rhasis cont. 9. Tract. 15. Altomarus cap. 7. Ælianus Montaltus c. 26. Ficinus. Bened. Victor. Faventinus are almost immoderate in the commendation of it; a most forcible medicine [6240]Iacchinus calls it: Iason Pratensis, a most admirable thing, and worthy of consideration, that can so mollifie the minde, and stay those tempestuous affections of it. Musica est mentis medicina mæstæ, a roaring-meg against Melancholy, to rear and revive the languishing soul,	Rhazes, in the Continens, book 9, treatise 15; Altomari, chapter 7; Eliano Montalto, chapter 26; Ficino; and Benedetto Vittori of Faenza are almost excessive in their praise of it. Iacchinus calls it a most powerful medicine; Jason Pratensis calls it a most wonderful thing, deserving consideration, that can so soften the mind and quiet its stormy emotions. "Music is medicine for the sorrowful mind": a roaring cannon against melancholy, to raise and revive the languishing soul.[6241]

[6238] Editor. Ecclesiasticus, also called Sirach, is the wisdom book included in the 1611 Bible's Apocrypha. Burton quotes only the first part of 40:20, which goes on to prefer the love of wisdom. "Present" means immediately effective. The remedies throughout are Burton's historical claims.

[6239] Burton. Printed page 299, u: "In 9. Rhasis. Magnam vim habet musica." In book 9 of Rhazes: music has great power.

[6240] Burton. Printed page 299, x: "Cap. de Maniâ. Admiranda profectò res est, & digna expensione, quod sonorum concinnitas mentem emolliat, sistatque procellosas ipsius affectiones." Chapter on mania. It is truly wonderful and worth considering that harmony of sounds softens the mind and checks its stormy emotions.

[6241] Editor. "Roaring-meg" is a name for a large cannon: Burton imagines music attacking melancholy. The Latin maxim is freshly translated here. The abbreviated medical references are retained; their individual passages have not all been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6242]affecting not onely the ears, but the very arteries, the vital and animal spirits, it erects the minde, and makes it nimble. Lemnius instit. cap. 44.	It affects not only the ears but the arteries themselves, and the vital and animal spirits; it lifts the mind and makes it alert. Lemnius, Institutes, chapter 44.[6243]
This it will effect in the most dull, severe and sorrowfull souls, [6244]expell grife with mirth, and if there bee any clowdes, dust or dreggs of cares yet lurking in our thoughts, most powerfully it wipes them all away, Salisbur. polit. lib. 1. cap. 6 and that which is more, it will perform all this in an instant: [6245]Chear up the countenance, expell austerity, bring in hilarity (Girald. Camb. cap. 12. Topog. Hiber.) informe our manners, mitigate anger; Athenæus (Dipnosophist. lib. 14. cap. 10.) calleth it an infinite treasure to such as are endowed with it: Dulcisonum reficit tristia corda melos, Eobanus Hessus.	It does this even for the dullest, sternest, and most sorrowful souls: it drives out grief with mirth, and if any clouds, dust, or dregs of care still lurk in our thoughts, it sweeps them all away with great power—John of Salisbury, Policraticus, book 1, chapter 6. Moreover, it does all this instantly: cheers the face, banishes severity, brings in gladness—Gerald of Wales, Topography of Ireland, chapter 12—shapes our conduct, and softens anger. Athenaeus, in the Deipnosophists, book 14, chapter 10, calls it an inexhaustible treasure to those who possess it. “Sweet-sounding music restores sorrowful hearts”—Eobanus Hessus.[6246]

[6242] Burton. Printed page 299, y: “Languens animus inde erigitur & reviviscit, nec tam aures afficit, sed & sonitu per arterias undique diffuso, spiritus tum vitales tum animales excitat, mentem reddens agilem, &c.” The languishing mind is thereby raised and revived. It affects not only the ears: as sound spreads everywhere through the arteries, it rouses both vital and animal spirits, making the mind alert, and so forth.

[6243] Editor. “Vital” and “animal” spirits are subtle bodily agents in the physiology Burton inherits: associated respectively with life and bodily heat, and with sensation and movement. They are not ghosts. Music is said to act physically through them.

[6244] Burton. Printed page 299, z: “Musica venustate suâ mentes severiores capit, &c.” Music captivates even sterner minds by its charm, and so forth.

[6245] Burton. Printed page 299, a: “Animos tristes subitò exhilarat, nubilos vultus serenat, austeritatem reponit, jucunditatem exponit, barbariemque facit deponere gentes, mores instituit, iracundiam mitigat.” It suddenly cheers sorrowful minds, clears clouded faces, puts aside severity, brings forth gladness, makes peoples abandon barbarity, shapes conduct, and softens anger.

[6246] Editor. John of Salisbury, Policraticus 1.6, describes music clearing sadness and the dust, turbulence and clouds of thought; compare Keats-Rohan’s critical-edition thesis, p. 74. Burton condenses this passage. The following Gerald of Wales, Athenaeus and Eobanus Hessus references remain uncollated. Burton’s English glosses remain distinct from the marginal Latin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many other properties [6247]Cassiodorus epist. 4. reckons up of this our divine Musick, not only to expell the greatest griefs, but it doth extenuate fears and furies, appeaseth cruelty, abateth heaviness, and to such as are watchfull it causeth quiet rest; it takes away spleen and hatred, bee it instrumentall, vocall, with strings, winde, [6248]Quæ à spiritus, sine manuum dexteritate gubernetur, &c. it cures all irksomness and heaviness of the Soul.	Cassiodorus, letter 4, lists many other powers of this divine music of ours. It not only dispels the greatest griefs but lessens fears and fits of rage, calms cruelty, lightens sorrow, and gives peaceful rest to the sleepless; it removes ill will and hatred. Whether instrumental or vocal, played on strings or wind instruments—"governed by breath, without dexterity of the hands," and so forth—it cures all the soul's weariness and heaviness.[6249]
[6250]Labouring men that sing to their work, can tell as much, and so can souldiers when they go to fight, whom terror of death cannot so much affright, as the sound of trumpet, drum, fife, and such like musick animates; metus enim mortis, as [6251]Censorinus enformeth us, musica depellitur.	Labourers who sing at their work can testify to this, as can soldiers going into battle: the fear of death cannot frighten them as much as the trumpet, drum, fife, and similar music give them courage. For, as Censorinus tells us, "the fear of death is driven away by music."[6252]
It makes a childe quiet, the nurses song, and many times the sound of a trumpet on a sudden, bells ringing, a carremans whistle, a boy singing some ballad tune early in the street, alters, revives, recreates a restless patient that cannot sleep in the night, &c.	A nurse's song quiets a child. Often a sudden trumpet call, ringing bells, a carter's whistle, or a boy singing a ballad tune early in the street changes, revives, and refreshes a restless patient who cannot sleep at night, and so forth.[6253]

[6247] Burton. Printed page 299, b: "Cythara tristitiam jucundat, timidos furores attenuat, cruentum sævitiam blandè reficit, languorem, &c." The lyre makes sadness cheerful, lessens fearful frenzies, gently relieves bloody cruelty, languor, and so forth. The last clause is abbreviated; cruentum sævitiam is grammatically irregular as printed.

[6248] Burton. Printed page 299, c: "Pet. Aretine." Pietro Aretino; no work or passage is specified.

[6249] Editor. Cassiodorus, Variae 2.40.3, supplies the catalogue of music's effects; Burton prints epist. 4. The consulted Latin has tumidos furores and cruentam saevitiam, against timidos and cruentum in Burton's margin. These forms are retained. Watchfull means sleepless; spleen means ill will. The separate Quæ à spiritus is grammatically irregular; governed by breath gives its apparent sense. The immediate editions and cause of these differences remain unestablished.

[6250] Burton. Printed page 299, d: "Castilio de aulic. lib. 1. fol. 27." Castiglione, The Courtier, book 1, folio 27.

[6251] Burton. Printed page 299, †: "Lib. de Natali cap. 12." On the Birthday, chapter 12.

[6252] Editor. Censorinus, On the Birthday 12.3, specifically says that a military trumpet dispels fear of death: classico, rather than Burton's broader musica. The substitution suits Burton's general argument. Castilio is Baldassare Castiglione, author of The Courtier.

[6253] Editor. A "carre man" or carter drives a cart. "Recreate" means refresh or restore. Burton moves from learned authority to ordinary sounds heard by a wakeful patient; the suggestion belongs to his account, not to a modern prescription.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In a word, it is so powerfull a thing that it ravisheth the soul, regina sensuum, the Queen of the senses, by sweet pleasure (which is an happy cure) and corporall tunes pacifie our incorporeall soul, sine ore loquens, dominatum in animam exercet, and carries it beyond it self, helps, elevates, extends it.	In a word, music is so powerful that it transports the soul. This "sovereign of the senses," the queen of the senses, does so through sweet pleasure—a happy cure—and physical tunes soothe our immaterial soul: "speaking without a mouth, it exercises dominion over the soul," carrying it beyond itself, aiding, raising, and enlarging it.[6254]
Scaliger exercit. 302. gives a reason of these effects, [6255]because the spirits about the heart take in that trembling and dancing air into the body, are moved together, and stirred up with it, or else the minde as some suppose, harmonically composed, is roused up at the tunes of musick. And 'tis not onely men that are so affected, but almost all other creatures.	Scaliger, in exercise 302, explains these effects: the spirits around the heart draw that trembling, dancing air into the body and are moved and stirred along with it. Or else, as some suppose, the mind is itself composed in harmony and is awakened by musical tunes. Nor are human beings alone affected in this way: almost all other creatures are too.[6256]

[6254] Editor. Cassiodorus, Variae 2.40.3–4, calls music queen of the senses and describes its bodily action on the immaterial soul. The letter, written for Theodoric to Boethius, requests a musician for the Frankish king. Burton's Latin and his separate English gloss are both represented. Corporall and incorporeall contrast physical sound with an immaterial soul; ravish here means transport or carry away.

[6255] Burton. Printed page 299, e: "Quod spiritus qui in corde agitant tremulum & subsaltantem recipiunt aerem in pectus, & inde excitantur, à spiritu musculi moventur, &c." Because the spirits active in the heart receive trembling, dancing air into the chest and are stirred by it; the muscles are moved by the spirit, and so forth. Includes the footer continuation.

[6256] Editor. Julius Caesar Scaliger's explanation belongs to spirit physiology. The alternative invokes a mind constituted harmonically, so that music answers its own structure. Both are presented as explanations current among Burton's authorities, not as established acoustic or physiological findings.

Original text 1651	Modern English
You know the tale of Hercules Gallus, Orpheus, and Amphion felices animas Ovid cals them, that could saxa movere sono testudinis, &c. make stocks and stones, as well as beasts, and other animals dance after their pipes: the dog and hare, wolf and lamb; vicinumque lupo præbuit agna latus; clamosus graculus, stridula cornix, & Iovis aquila, as Philostratus describes it in his images, stood all gaping upon Orpheus;	You know the tale of the Gallic Hercules, Orpheus, and Amphion—"fortunate souls," Ovid calls them—who could "move stones with the sound of the lyre," and so forth: make logs and stones, as well as beasts and other animals, dance after their pipes. Dog and hare, wolf and lamb —"the lamb offered her flank beside the wolf"— and "the noisy jackdaw, the shrill crow, and Jupiter's eagle," as Philostratus describes them in his Images, all stood gazing open-mouthed at Orpheus.[6257]
and [6258]trees pulled up by the roots, came to hear him, Et comitem quercum pinus amica trahit.	And trees, uprooted, came to hear him: "The friendly pine draws the oak along as her companion."[6259]

[6257] Editor. The phrase about moving stones is Horace, Art of Poetry 395, on Amphion. The lamb beside the wolf is Claudian, Rape of Proserpina, book 2 preface, line 22. Philostratus the Younger's Images 6 describes Orpheus's animal audience. Burton's "fortunate souls" attribution to Ovid remains unlocated.

[6258] Burton. Printed page 299, †: "Arbores radicibus avulsæ &c." Trees torn up by their roots, and so forth. Printed across the page foot.

[6259] Editor. Claudian, Rape of Proserpina, book 2 preface, line 26. The image makes trees companions in a procession towards Orpheus. Burton combines several poetic accounts of music's power; the preceding marginal fragment also concerns uprooted trees.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 299–300 Arion made fishes follow him, which, as common experience evinceth, [6260]are much affected with musick. All singing birds are much pleased with it, especially Nightingales, if we may beleeve Calcagninus; and Bees amongst the rest, though they be flying away, when they hear any tingling sound, will tarry behinde. [6261]Hearts, Hindes, Horses, Dogs, Bears, are exceedingly delighted with it. Scal. exerc. 302. Elephants Agrippa addes lib. 2. cap. 24. and in Lydia in the midst of a lake there be certain floating Ilands, (if ye will beleeve it) that after musick will dance.	Arion made fish follow him; common experience shows that they are strongly affected by music. All songbirds take great pleasure in it, especially nightingales, if we may believe Calcagnini. Bees, too, though flying away, will stay behind when they hear a tinkling sound. Stags, hinds, horses, dogs, and bears take extraordinary delight in it—Scaliger, exercise 302. Agrippa adds elephants, in book 2, chapter 24. And in Lydia, in the middle of a lake, there are certain floating islands which, if you will believe it, dance to music.[6262]

[6260] Burton. Printed page 300, f: “M. Carew of Anthony in descript. Cornwal saith of Whales, that they will come and shew themselves dancing at the sound of a trumpet, fol. 35. 1. & fol. 154. 2. book.” Mr Carew of Antony, in his description of Cornwall, says that whales will come and show themselves dancing at a trumpet’s sound. Burton gives folio 35 in book 1 and folio 154 in book 2.

[6261] Burton. Printed page 300, g: “De cervo, equo, cane, urso idem compertum; musicâ afficiuntur.” The same has been found of the stag, horse, dog, and bear: they are affected by music.

[6262] Editor. “Hearts” here means harts or stags. Arion is the legendary musician saved by a dolphin. Calcagninus is Celio Calcagnini; Agrippa is Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa. Burton himself qualifies the floating-island story. The natural-history reports and Carew’s folio references await separate collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 300 But to leave all declamatory speeches in praise [6263]of divine Musick, I will confine my self to my proper subject: besides that excellent power it hath to expell many other diseases, it is a soveraigne remedy against [6264]Despair and Melancholy, and will drive away the divel himself. Canus a Rhodian Fidler in [6265]Philostratus, when Apollonius was inquisitive to know what he could do with his pipe, told him, That he would make a melancholy man merry, and him that was merry much merrier then before, a lover more inamoured, a religious man more devout.	But leaving these rhetorical praises of divine music, I will keep to my proper subject. Besides its remarkable power to drive out many other diseases, it is a supreme remedy for despair and melancholy, and will drive away the devil himself. In Philostratus, Canus, a Rhodian musician, was asked by Apollonius what he could do with his pipe. He replied that he could make a melancholy man cheerful, a cheerful man much more cheerful, a lover more enamoured, and a religious man more devout.[6266]

[6263] Burton. Printed page 300, h: “Numen inest numeris.” There is divine power in rhythms.

[6264] Burton. Printed page 300, i: “Sæpe graves morbos modulatum carmen abegit, Et desperatis conciliavit opem.” Often a tuneful song has driven away grave illnesses and brought help to those beyond hope.

[6265] Burton. Printed page 300, k: “Lib. 5. cap. 7. Mærentibus mærorem adimam, lætantem vero seipso reddam hilariorem, amantem calidiorem, religiosum divino numine correptum, & ad Deos colendos paratiorem.” Book 5, chapter 7. I shall take sorrow from mourners, make the cheerful person still more cheerful, the lover more ardent, and the religious person possessed by divine inspiration and readier to worship the gods.

[6266] Editor. The conversation occurs in Philostratus, Life of Apollonius of Tyana 5.21 in the consulted text, rather than the margin’s 5.7. Canus plays a pipe; Burton’s “Fidler” is used loosely for a musician. The account stresses different effects upon different listeners.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ismenias the Theban, [6267]Chiron the Centaure is said to have cured this and many other diseases by musick alone: as now they do those, saith [6268]Bodine, that are troubled with S. Vitus Bedlam dance. [6269]Timotheus the Musician compelled Alexander to skip up and down, and leave his dinner (like the tale of the Frier and the Boy) whom Austin de civ. Dei. lib. 17. cap. 14. so much commends for it.	Ismenias the Theban and Chiron the centaur are said to have cured this and many other diseases by music alone, just as, Bodin says, people now treat those afflicted by the mad dance of Saint Vitus. Timotheus the musician made Alexander leap about and leave his dinner, like the tale of the Friar and the Boy; Augustine, in The City of God, book 17, chapter 14, praises him greatly for it.[6270]
Who hath not heard how Davids harmony drove away the evill spirits from king Saul, 1. Sam. 16. and Elisha when he was much troubled by importunate kings, called for a Minstrel, and when he played, the hand of the Lord came upon him, 2. King 3.	Who has not heard how David's music drove the evil spirits away from King Saul, in 1 Samuel 16? And when Elisha was greatly troubled by insistent kings, he called for a musician; when the musician played, the hand of the Lord came upon him, in 2 Kings 3.[6271]
Censorinus de natali cap. 12 reportes how Asclepiades the Physician helped many frantike persons by this means, phreneticorum mentes morbo turbatas—Iason Pratensis cap. de Maniâ hath many examples how Clinias and Empedocles cured some desperately melancholy, & some mad by this our Musick.	Censorinus, On the Birthday, chapter 12, reports how the physician Asclepiades helped many people suffering from frenzy by this means: "the minds of the delirious, disturbed by illness." Jason Pratensis, in his chapter on mania, gives many examples of Clinias and Empedocles curing some who were desperately melancholy and others who were mad through this music of ours.[6272]

[6267] Burton. Printed page 300, l: "Natalis Comes Myth. lib. 4. cap. 12." Natale Conti, Mythology, book 4, chapter 12.

[6268] Burton. Printed page 300, m: "Lib. 5 de rep. Curat Musica furorem Sancti Viti." Book 5, On the Commonwealth. Music cures the frenzy of Saint Vitus.

[6269] Burton. Printed page 300, n: "Exilire è convivio. Cardan, subtil. lib. 13." To leap up from the banquet. Cardano, On Subtlety, book 13.

[6270] Editor. Saint Vitus's dance here names a historical dancing disorder; it should not be assigned a single modern diagnosis. The Friar and the Boy is a tale of compelled dancing. Augustine, City of God 17.14, discusses David and musical harmony, not Timotheus; Burton's apparent link is misleading.

[6271] Editor. The biblical passages are 1 Samuel 16:14–23, especially verse 23, and 2 Kings 3:13–15. The first recounts Saul's relief when David plays; the second connects the musician's playing with Elisha's prophetic inspiration.

[6272] Editor. Censorinus, On the Birthday 12.4, reports Asclepiades restoring disturbed minds through harmonious sound. "Frantike" and phreneticus belong to historical descriptions of frenzy and delirium; they are not precise equivalents of a single present-day condition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Which because it hath such excellent vertues, belike [6273]Homer brings in Phemius playing, and the Muses singing at the banquet of the gods. Aristotle Polit. l. 8. c. 5, Plato 2, de legibus, highly approve it, and so do all Politicians. The Greeks, Romanes, have graced Musick, and made it one of the liberall sciences, though it be now become mercenary.	Because music has such excellent powers, presumably, Homer introduces Phemius playing and the Muses singing at the gods' banquet. Aristotle, Politics, book 8, chapter 5, and Plato, Laws, book 2, highly approve of it, as do all writers on government. The Greeks and Romans honoured music and made it one of the liberal sciences, though it has now become a trade for hire.[6274]
All civill Commonwealths allow it: Cneius Manlius (as [6275]Livius relates) A° ab urb. cond. 567. brought first out of Asia to Rome singing wenches, players, jesters, and all kinde of musick to their feasts. Your Princes, Emperours, and persons of any quality, maintain it in their Courts; No mirth without musick.	All civilized commonwealths permit it. Gnaeus Manlius, as Livy relates, first brought singing women, performers, jesters, and every kind of music from Asia to Roman feasts in the year 567 from the founding of the city. Princes, emperors, and people of rank maintain it at their courts: no merriment without music.[6276]

[6273] Burton. Printed page 300, o: "Iliad. 1." Iliad, book 1.

[6274] Editor. Burton appears to conflate Homeric scenes. Iliad 1:601–604 has Apollo's lyre and the Muses at the gods' feast; Phemius is the singer in Odysseus's household in Odyssey 1. "Politicians" here means writers or thinkers about government. "Mercenary" means practised for pay.

[6275] Burton. Printed page 300, *: "Libro 9. cap. 1. Psaltrias, Sambucistriasque, & convivialia ludorum oblectamenta addita epulis ex Asiâ invexit in urbem." Book 9, chapter 1. He brought women playing stringed instruments and sambucas, and entertainments added to banquets, from Asia into the city.

[6276] Editor. Livy 39.6.7–9 describes imported luxury and musicians at Roman banquets after Manlius's Asian campaign; the margin's book 9, chapter 1 is erroneous. The date 567 from Rome's founding conventionally corresponds to 187 BCE. Burton adapts a morally critical account into his praise of music.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sr Thomas Moore in his absolute Utopian Common-wealth, allowes musick as an appendix to every meal, and that throughout, to all sorts. Epictetus cals mensam mutam præsepe, a table without musick a manger; for the concent of Musicians at a banquet, is a carbuncle set in gold; and as the signet of an Emerald well trimmed with gold, so is the melody of Musick in a pleasant banquet. Ecclus 32. v 5, 6.	In his ideal commonwealth of Utopia, Sir Thomas More allows music as an accompaniment to every meal, universally, for all ranks. Epictetus calls "a silent table a manger"—a table without music is a feeding trough. For "the harmony of musicians at a banquet is a carbuncle set in gold; and as an emerald signet richly mounted in gold, so is the melody of music at a pleasant banquet," Ecclesiasticus 32:5–6.[6277]
[6278]Lewes the eleventh when he invited Edward the fourth to come to Paris, told him that as a principall part of his entertainment, he should hear sweet voices of children, Ionicke and Lydian tunes, exquisite Musick, he should have a —— and the Cardinal of Burbon to be his confessor, which he used as a most plausible argument: as to a sensuall man indeed it is.	When Louis XI invited Edward IV to Paris, he told him that a principal part of his entertainment would be children's sweet voices, Ionian and Lydian tunes, and exquisite music; he should have a —— and the Cardinal of Bourbon as his confessor. Louis used this as a highly attractive inducement, as indeed it is to a sensual man.[6279]

[6277] Editor. A "carbuncle" is a red gemstone; "concent" is concord or harmony, not consent. Burton compares music with jewels through Sirach 32:5–6. His claims about More's arrangements and the saying attributed to Epictetus have not yet been checked against their complete texts.

[6278] Burton. Printed page 300, p: "Comineus." Philippe de Commynes.

[6279] Editor. Louis XI of France and Edward IV of England are meant. Ionian and Lydian are ancient musical modes. The dash after "a" is present in the 1651 text; no missing word has been supplied. Commynes is Burton's named authority, but the precise passage remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 300–301 [6280]Lucian in his book de saltatione is not ashamed to confess that he took infinite delight in singing, dancing, musick, womens company, and such like pleasures; and if thou (saith he) didst but hear them play and dance, I know thou wouldst be so well pleased with the object, that thou wouldst dance for company thy self, without doubt thou wilt bee taken with it.	Lucian, in his book On Dancing, is not ashamed to admit that he took immense delight in singing, dancing, music, women's company, and similar pleasures. If you only heard them play and dance, he says, I know the spectacle would please you so much that you would dance along yourself; without doubt it would captivate you.[6281]
Source page 301 So Scaliger ingenuously confesseth, exercit. 274. [6282]I am beyond all measure affected with musick, I do most willingly behold them dance, I am mightily detained and allured with that grace and comeliness of fair women, I am well pleased to bee idle amongst them. And what young man is not? As it is acceptable and conducing to most, so especially to a melancholy man.	Scaliger likewise candidly confesses, in exercise 274: "Music affects me beyond all measure. I gladly watch them dance; the grace and beauty of lovely women hold and attract me powerfully, and I am happy to pass my time idly among them." And what young man is not? As this is agreeable and beneficial to most people, it is especially so to a melancholy man.[6283]

[6280] Burton. Printed page 300, †: "Ista libenter & magnâ cum voluptate spectare soleo. Et scio te illecebris hisce captum iri & insuper tripudiaturum, haud dubiè demulcebere." I regularly watch these things gladly and with great pleasure. I know that you will be captivated by these attractions and will dance besides; you will undoubtedly be charmed. Includes the footer continuation.

[6281] Editor. Lucian's On Dancing is a dialogue. Burton treats its advocacy of performance as a personal admission by Lucian; the claim about women's company should therefore be read as Burton's characterization. His extended Latin and English versions are both preserved; exact verbal correspondence remains unverified.

[6282] Burton. Printed page 301, q: "In musicis supra omnem fidem capior & oblector; choreas libentissimè aspicio, pulchrarum fœminarum venustate detineor, otiari inter has solutus curis possim." Music captivates and delights me beyond belief; I watch dances most gladly and am held by beautiful women's charm. I could pass my leisure among them, freed from cares.

[6283] Editor. "Ingenuously" means candidly; "conducing" means beneficial. Burton's English expands the Latin profession of enjoyment into a more intimate, conversational voice, then adds his own rhetorical question. Both versions are retained rather than collapsed into one quotation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Provided alwaies, his disease proceed not originally from it, that he bee not some light Inamarato, some idle phantastick, who capers in conceit all the day long, and thinks of nothing else, but how to make Jigs, Sonnets, Madrigals, in commendation of his Mistress. In such cases Musick is most pernicious, as a spur to a free horse will make him run himself blinde, or break his wind; Incitamentum enim amoris musica, for Musick enchants, as Menander holds, it will make such melancholy persons mad, & the sound of those Jigs, and Horn-pipes will not bee removed out of the ears a week after.	Always provided that music was not the original cause of his illness: he must not be some flighty lover, some idle fantasist who dances in imagination all day and thinks only of composing jigs, sonnets, and madrigals in praise of his mistress. In such cases music is most harmful. Like a spur applied to a willing horse, it will make him run himself blind or ruin his wind. "For music is a stimulus to love"; music enchants, as Menander maintains. It will drive such melancholy people mad, and the sound of those jigs and hornpipes will stay in their ears for a week afterwards.[6284]
[6285]Plato for this reason forbids Musick and wine to all young men, because they are most part amorous, ne ignis addatur igni, lest one fire increase another. Many men are melancholy by hearing Musick, but it is a pleasing melancholy that it causeth; and therefore to such as are discontent, in wo, fear, sorrow, or dejected, it is a most present remedy; it expels cares, alters their grieved minds, and easeth in an instant.	For this reason Plato forbids music and wine to all young men, because most of them are amorous, "lest fire be added to fire"—lest one fire increase another. Many people become melancholy through hearing music, but the melancholy it causes is pleasant. Therefore, for those who are discontented, distressed, afraid, sorrowful, or dejected, it is a remedy of immediate effect: it drives out cares, changes their grieving minds, and brings relief at once.[6286]

[6284] Editor. Inamarato means an enamoured man. A "free horse" is willing and eager, so needs no spur; "break his wind" means impair his breathing through overexertion. Jigs and hornpipes are lively dance tunes. Music may feed the fixation that Burton is trying to relieve.

[6285] Burton. Printed page 301, *: "3. De legibus." Laws, book 3.

[6286] Editor. Plato, Laws 2, 666a, prohibits wine for those under eighteen and then regulates it by age, using the image of adding fire to fire. It does not support Burton's blanket prohibition of music for all young men. Burton's margin names book 3; his assertion is retained and distinguished from the source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Otherwise, saith [6287]Plutarch, Musica magis dementat quam vinum; Musick makes some men mad as a tygre; like Astolphos horn in Ariosto: or Mercuries golden wand in Homer, that made some wake, others sleep, it hath divers effects: and [6288]Theophrastus right well prophesied, that diseases were either procured by Musick, or mitigated.	Otherwise, as Plutarch says, “music drives people out of their senses more than wine.” Music makes some people as wild as a tiger. Like Astolfo’s horn in Ariosto, or Mercury’s golden wand in Homer, which wakes some and sends others to sleep, it has different effects. Theophrastus rightly foretold that illnesses could either be brought on by music or relieved by it.[6289]

[6287] Burton. Printed page 301, r: “Sympos. quæst. 5. Musica multos magis dementat quam vinum.” Table Talk, question 5. Music drives many people out of their senses more than wine.

[6288] Burton. Printed page 301, s: “Animi morbi ve a musicâ curantur vel inferuntur.” Illnesses of the mind are either cured or brought on by music. The first ve is printed without the expected final l of vel.

[6289] Editor. Plutarch, Table Talk 7.5.1, describes music intoxicating listeners more than wine when they indulge without restraint: guests leap up to dance at Callistratus’s supper. Burton compresses this qualified scene into a maxim. The Latin intermediary and Theophrastus formulation remain unlocated. Astolfo’s horn in Ariosto’s Orlando Furioso puts hearers to flight; Homer’s Hermes, Burton’s Mercury, can close or awaken eyes with his wand (Odyssey 24:1–4).

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsect. 4. Mirth and merry company, fair objects, remedies.	Subsection 4 Cheerfulness, merry company, and pleasing sights as remedies
Mirth and merry company may not be separated from Musick, both concerning and necessarily required in this business. [6290]Mirth (saith Vives) purgeth the blood, confirmes health, causeth a fresh, pleasing, and fine colour, prorogues life, whets the wit, makes the body yong, lively and fit for any manner of imployment.	Cheerfulness and lively company cannot be separated from music: both are relevant and necessary to this undertaking. Cheerfulness, says Vives, cleanses the blood, strengthens health, gives a fresh, pleasing, clear complexion, prolongs life, sharpens the mind, and keeps the body young, vigorous, and fit for any kind of work.[6291]
The merrier heart, the longer life; A merry heart is the life of the flesh, Prov. 14. 30. Gladness prolongs his dayes, Ecclus 30. 22. and this is one of the three Salernitan Doctors, D. Merryman, D. Diet, D. Quiet, [6292]which cures all diseases——Mens hilaris, requies, moderata diæta.	The merrier the heart, the longer the life. "A merry heart is the life of the flesh," Proverbs 14:30. "Gladness prolongs his days," Ecclesiasticus 30:22. This is one of the three Salernitan doctors: Doctor Merryman, Doctor Diet, and Doctor Quiet, who cure every disease —"a cheerful mind, rest, and a moderate diet."[6293]

[6290] Burton. Printed page 301, t: "Lib. 3 de animâ. Lætitia purgat sanguinem, valetudinem conservat, colorem inducit florentem, nitidum, gratum." On the Soul, book 3. Gladness cleanses the blood, preserves health, and gives a flourishing, clear, pleasing complexion.

[6291] Editor. Vives is Juan Luis Vives, author of On the Soul and Life. "Mirth" ranges from inward cheerfulness to social merriment. The heading's "fair objects" means pleasing things or people presented to the senses; it is not restricted to physical objects.

[6292] Burton. Printed page 301, u: "Spiritus temperat, calorem excitat, naturalem virtutem corroborat, juvenile corpus diu servat, vitam prorogat, ingenium acuit, & hominem negotiis quibuslibet aptiorem reddit. Schola Salern." It regulates the spirits, rouses heat, strengthens natural power, keeps the body young for a long time, prolongs life, sharpens the intellect, and makes a person fitter for any business. School of Salerno. Includes the footer continuation.

[6293] Editor. Proverbs 14:30 in the 1611 Bible has a "sound heart," not Burton's "merry heart." Sirach 30:22 does connect gladness with long life. The three doctors personify the Salernitan regimen: cheerfulness, moderate food and drink, and rest. Burton's categorical "all diseases" is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 301–302 [6294]Gomesius præfat. lib. 3. de sal. gen. is a great magnifyer of honest mirth, by which (saith he) we cure many passions of the minde, in our selves, and in our friends: which [6295]Galateus assignes for a cause why we love merry companions: and well they deserve it, being that as [6296]Magninus holds, a merry companion is better then any musick, and as the saying is, comes jucundus in via pro vehiculo, as a wagon to him that is wearied on the way.	Gomesius, in the preface to book 3 of On Genial Salt, greatly praises wholesome merriment, through which, he says, we cure many disturbances of the mind in ourselves and our friends. Galateus gives this as a reason why we love cheerful companions. They well deserve that love: as Magninus maintains, a cheerful companion is better than any music. As the saying goes, “a pleasant companion on the road serves as a carriage”—a wagon for the traveller weary on the way.[6297]

[6294] Burton. Printed page 301, x: “Dum contumeliâ vacant & festivâ lenitate mordent, mediocres animi ægritudines sanari solent &c.” Provided they contain no insult and their sting is pleasantly gentle, moderate troubles of the mind are commonly cured, and so forth. Printed across the page foot.

[6295] Burton. Printed page 301, y: “De mor. fol. 57. Amamus ideo eos qui sunt faceti & jucundi.” On Manners, folio 57. For this reason we love those who are witty and pleasant. Printed across the page foot.

[6296] Burton. Printed page 302, z: “Regim. sanit. part. 2. Nota, quod amicus bonus, & dilectus socius, narrationibus suis jucundis superat omnem melodiam.” Regimen of Health, part 2. Note that a good friend and beloved companion surpasses every melody with his pleasant stories.

[6297] Editor. Gomesius is Bernardino Gómez Miedes; de sal. gen. refers to genial or witty “salt,” in his work on salt. The precise preface citation remains uncollated. Galateus evokes the courtesy tradition of Giovanni della Casa’s Galateo; the cited folio is unresolved. The carriage image is proverbial.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 302 Jucunda confabulatio, sales, joci, pleasant discourse, jests, conceits, merry tales, melliti verborum globuli, as Petronius, [6298]Pliny, [6299]Spondanus, [6300]Cœlius, and many good Authors plead, are that sole Nepenthes of Homer, Helenas boule, Venus girdle so renowned of old [6301]to expell grief and care, to cause mirth and gladness of heart, if they be rightly understood, or seasonably applied. In a word,	"Pleasant conversation, wit, jokes"—agreeable talk, jests, clever sayings, merry stories, "honeyed little balls of words," as Petronius, Pliny, Spondanus, Caelius, and many good authors argue—are Homer's one true nepenthe, Helen's bowl, and Venus's girdle, so renowned in antiquity for dispelling grief and care and bringing mirth and gladness to the heart, if properly understood or applied at the right moment. In a word,[6302]
[6303]Amor, voluptas, Venus, gaudium, Iocus, ludus, sermo suavis, suaviatio,	Love, pleasure, Venus, joy, Jesting, play, sweet conversation, kissing,[6304]

[6298] Burton. Printed page 302, a: "Lib. 21. cap. 27." Book 21, chapter 27.

[6299] Burton. Printed page 302, b: "Comment. in 4 Odyss." Commentary on Odyssey, book 4.

[6300] Burton. Printed page 302, c: "Lib. 26 c. 15." Book 26, chapter 15.

[6301] Burton. Printed page 302, †: "Homericum illud Nepenthes quod mærorem tollit, & euthimiam, & hilaritatem parit." That Homeric nepenthe which removes sorrow and produces contentment and cheerfulness.

[6302] Editor. Nepenthe is Helen's grief-banishing drug in Odyssey 4; Burton interprets it as timely, pleasant talk. Venus's girdle evokes the power of attraction in Iliad 14. "Honeyed little balls of words" recalls Petronius, Satyrica 1, where the phrase criticizes affected rhetoric. Burton turns it to a favourable use.

[6303] Burton. Printed page 302, *: "Plaut. Bacch." Plautus, The Bacchis Sisters.

[6304] Editor. The displayed lines adapt Plautus, Bacchides 115–116: Burton omits Venustas ("charm") and divides Suavisaviatio ("sweet kissing") into "sweet conversation, kissing." Both his wording and its line division are retained. The following catalogue extends diversion across all the senses; Mesue's attribution still requires collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
are the true Nepenthes. For these causes our physicians generally prescribe this as a principal engine, to batter the walls of melancholy, a chief antidote, and a sufficient cure of it self. By all means (saith [6305]Mesue) procure mirth to these men in such things as are heard, seen, tasted, or smelled, or any way perceived, and let them have all enticements, and fair promises, the sight of excellent beauties, attires, ornaments, delightsome passages, to distract their minds from fear and sorrow, and such things on which they are so fixed and intent.	are the true nepenthe. For these reasons our physicians generally prescribe this as a principal siege engine for battering down melancholy's walls, a chief antidote and a sufficient cure in itself. By every means, says Mesue, bring these people pleasure through things heard, seen, tasted, smelled, or otherwise perceived. Give them every attraction and encouraging promise, the sight of outstanding beauty, fine clothes and ornaments, and delightful experiences, to draw their minds away from fear and sorrow and the things that so absorb their attention.
[6306]Let them use hunting, sports, playes, jests, merry company, as Rhasis prescribes, which will not let the minde be molested, a cup of good drinke now and then, hear musick, and have such companions with whom they are especially delighted; [6307]merry tales or toyes, drinking, singing, dancing, and whatsoever else may procure mirth: and by no means, saith Guianerius, suffer them to be alone.	Let them enjoy hunting, games, entertainments, jokes, and lively company, as Rhazes prescribes, to keep the mind from distress; a cup of good drink now and then; music; and companions whose company especially delights them. Let them have amusing stories or diversions, drinking, singing, dancing, and whatever else may bring cheerfulness. By no means, says Guaineri, allow them to be alone.[6308]

[6305] Burton. Printed page 302, d: "De ægritud. capitis. Omni modo generet lætitiam in iis, de iis quæ audiuntur & videntur, aut odorantur, aut gustantur, aut quocunque modo sentiri possunt, & aspectu formarum multi decoris & ornatus, & negotiatione jucundâ, & blandientibus ludis, & promissis distrahantur eorum animi, de re aliquâ quam timent & dolent." On Diseases of the Head. By every means produce gladness in them through things heard, seen, smelled, tasted, or otherwise perceived. Through the sight of richly beautiful and adorned forms, pleasant occupation, soothing games, and promises, let their minds be diverted from whatever they fear and grieve over.

[6306] Burton. Printed page 302, e: "Utantur venationibus ludis, jocis, amicorum consortiis, quæ non sinant animum turbari, vino & cantu & loci mutatione, & biberiâ, & gaudio, ex quibus præcipue delectantur." Let them use hunting, games, jokes, friends' company that prevents mental disturbance, wine, song, change of place, drinking, and merriment—those things which particularly delight them.

[6307] Burton. Printed page 302, f: "Piso ex fabulis & ludis quærenda delectatio. His versetur qui maxime grati sunt, cantus & choreæ ad lætitiam prosunt." Piso: pleasure should be sought in stories and games. Let the patient associate with those who please him most; songs and dances promote gladness. Printed across the page foot.

[6308] Editor. "Playes" and "toyes" can mean amusements or diversions, not only stage drama and children's toys. "Guianerius" is Antonio Guaineri. The marginal recommendations include change of place and pleasant company as well as the drink and entertainment emphasized in the body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Benedictus Victorius Faventinus, in his Empericks, accompts it an especial remedy against melancholy, [6309]to hear and see singing, dancing, maskers, mummers, to converse with such merry fellows, and fair maids. For the beauty of a woman cheareth the countenance, Ecclus 36. 22.	Benedetto Vittori of Faenza, in his Empirics, considers it a particular remedy against melancholy to hear and see singing, dancing, masked performers and mummers, and to spend time with such cheerful fellows and beautiful young women. "For a woman's beauty cheers the face," Ecclesiasticus 36:22.[6310]
[6311]Beauty alone is a soveraign remedy against fear, grief, and all melancholy fits; a charm, as Peter de la Seine and many other writers affirme, a banquet it self; he gives instance in discontented Menelaus that was so often freed by Helenas fair face: & [6312]Tully, 3. Tusc. cites Epicurus as a chief patron of this Tenent. To expell grief, and procure pleasance, sweet smells, good diet, touch, taste, embracing, singing, dancing, sports, playes, and above the rest, exquisite beauties, quibus oculi jucunde moventur & animi, are most powerfull means, obvia forma, to meet, or see a fair maid pass by, or to be in company with her.	Beauty alone is a supreme remedy for fear, grief, and every fit of melancholy: a charm, as Pierre de La Seine and many other writers affirm, a banquet in itself. He gives the example of the discontented Menelaus, so often relieved by Helen's beautiful face. Cicero, in Tusculan Disputations, book 3, cites Epicurus as a leading advocate of this view. Sweet scents, good food, touch, taste, embraces, singing, dancing, games, entertainments, and above all exquisite beauties, "by which the eyes and minds are pleasantly moved," are powerful means of banishing grief and giving pleasure: "beauty encountered"—meeting or seeing a beautiful young woman pass by, or being in her company.[6313]

[6309] Burton. Printed page 302, g: "Præcipue valet ad expellendam melancholiam stare in cantibus, ludis, & sonis, & habitare cum familiaribus, & præcipue cum puellis jucundis." It is especially effective in driving away melancholy to take part in songs, games, and music, and to live among familiar companions, especially pleasant young women. Printed across the page foot.

[6310] Editor. "Maskers" and "mummers" are performers in disguise. The quoted praise of a woman's beauty is Sirach 36:22 in the numbering Burton uses. His account assumes a male patient and treats attractive women as therapeutic company; that perspective remains visible in the translation.

[6311] Burton. Printed page 302, †: "Par. 5. de avocamentis lib. de absolvendo luctu." Part 5, on diversions, in the book On Bringing Mourning to an End.

[6312] Burton. Printed page 302, h: "Corporum complexus, cantus, ludi, formæ, &c." Bodily embraces, songs, games, beauties, and so forth.

[6313] Editor. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 3.41–44, presents and criticizes sensory pleasure as Epicurus's remedy for grief. Burton's paragraph foregrounds the proposed remedies before returning to Cicero's criticism. Pierre de La Seine's cited work concerns ending mourning; its exact passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He found it by experience, and made good use of it in his own person, if Plutarch bely him not; for he rekons up the names of some more elegant pieces, [6314]Leontia, Boedina, Hedeia, Nicedia, that were frequently seen in Epicurus garden, and very familiar in his house. Neither did he try it himself alone, but if we may give credit to [6315]Atheneus, he practised it upon others.	He discovered this through experience and made good use of it himself, if Plutarch does not misrepresent him. Plutarch lists some particularly elegant beauties—Leontia, Boedina, Hedeia, and Nicedia—who were often seen in Epicurus's garden and were familiar visitors in his house. Nor did he try it only on himself: if we may believe Athenaeus, he used it on others.[6316]
Source page 302–303 For when a sad and sick Patient was brought unto him to be cured, he laid him on a down bed, crowned him with a garland of sweet-smelling flowers, in a fair perfumed closet delicately set out, and after a potion or two of good drink, which he administred, he brought in a beautifull yong [6317]wench that could play upon a Lute, sing and dance, &c.	For when a sorrowful, sick patient was brought to him for treatment, he laid him on a down-filled bed and crowned him with a garland of fragrant flowers, in a handsome, perfumed chamber beautifully furnished. After giving him a draught or two of good drink, he brought in a beautiful young woman who could play the lute, sing, and dance, and so forth.[6318]

[6314] Burton. Printed page 302, i: "Circa hortos Epicuri frequentes." Often to be found around Epicurus's gardens.

[6315] Burton. Printed page 302, †: "Dypnosoph. lib. 10. Coronavit florido serto incendens odores, in culcitrâ plumeâ collocavit dulciculam potiunculam propinans psaltriam adduxit, &c." Deipnosophists, book 10. He crowned him with a flowery garland, burned perfumes, laid him on a feather mattress, offered him a pleasant little drink, and brought in a woman playing a stringed instrument, and so forth.

[6316] Editor. Elegant pieces is Burton's objectifying description. Plutarch's That It Is Impossible to Live Pleasantly According to Epicurus, section 16, lists the women in a polemic against bodily pleasure. The English comparison gives Leontion, Boidion, Hedia and Nicedion; Burton's Leontia, Boedina, Hedieia and Nicedia are retained. This locates the hostile literary report, without independently establishing its claims or identifying Burton's Latin intermediary.

[6317] Burton. Printed page 302, *: "Ut reclinatâ suaviter in lectum puellâ &c." With the girl reclining comfortably on the bed, and so forth. Burton leaves the phrase incomplete.

[6318] Editor. The scene is Burton's report under an Athenaeus book 10 citation; its precise source has not been securely located. A "closet" is a private chamber. "Potion" here is a draught of drink. The margin adds the girl reclining on the bed, a detail absent from the English body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 303 Tully 3. Tusc. scoffes at Epicurus for this his prophane physik (as well he deserved) and yet Phavorinus and Stobeus highly approve of it; most of our looser Physicians in some cases, to such parties especially, allow of this;	Cicero, in Tusculan Disputations, book 3, mocks Epicurus for this profane medicine, as he well deserved; yet Favorinus and Stobaeus highly approve of it. Most of our more permissive physicians allow it in certain cases, especially for patients of this kind.[6319]
and all of them will have a melancholy, sad, and discontented person, make frequent use of honest sports, companies, and recreations, & incitandos ad Venerem, as [6320]Rodericus à Fonseca, will, aspectu & contactu pulcherrimarum fæminarum, to be drawn to such consorts, whether they will or no. Not to be an auditor only, or a spectator, but sometimes an actor himself. Dulce est in disipere in loco, to play the fool now and then, is not amiss, there is a time for all things.	All of them would have a melancholy, sorrowful, discontented person regularly take part in wholesome games, company, and recreation—and, as Rodrigo da Fonseca would have it, "be encouraged towards sexual pleasure by the sight and touch of the most beautiful women": drawn into such company whether willing or not. He should sometimes participate himself, instead of merely listening or watching. "It is sweet to act foolishly at the proper time"—to play the fool now and then is no bad thing; there is a time for everything.[6321]

[6319] Editor. Burton endorses Cicero's moral objection while acknowledging permissive medical opinion. Favorinus and Stobaeus are named as approving authorities without specific references here. Those attributions remain unverified; the translation preserves Burton's disagreement instead of reconciling it.

[6320] Burton. Printed page 303, *: "Tom. 2. consult. 85." Volume 2, consultation 85.

[6321] Editor. "Venus" signifies sexual pleasure. The pressure implied by "whether they will or no" is in Burton's text. Horace, Odes 4.12.28, has dulce est desipere in loco; Burton prints an extra in and the spelling disipere. The modern column translates the intended maxim while retaining his separate English gloss.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Grave Socrates would be merry by fits, sing, dance, and take his liquor too, or else Theodoret belies him; so would old Cato, [6322]Tully by his own confession, and the rest. Xenophon in his Sympos. brings in Socrates as a principal Actor, no man merrier then himself, and sometimes he would [6323]ride a cock-horse with his Children,	The solemn Socrates would sometimes make merry, sing, dance, and take a drink too, unless Theodoret misrepresents him. So would old Cato, Cicero by his own confession, and the rest. In his Symposium, Xenophon makes Socrates a leading participant, with no one merrier than he; sometimes he would ride a hobbyhorse with his children,[6324]
——equitare in arundine longâ,	—riding astride a long reed,
(Though Alcibiates scoffed at him for it) and well he might; for now and then (saith Plutarch) the most vertuous, honest and gravest men will use feasts, jests, and toyes, as we do sauce to our meats.	although Alcibiades mocked him for it. Socrates was well entitled to do so: now and then, says Plutarch, even the most virtuous, upright, and serious men enjoy feasts, jokes, and diversions, as we use sauce with our food.[6325]
So did Scipio and Lælius,	So did Scipio and Laelius:

[6322] Burton. Printed page 303, †: “Epist. fam. lib. 7. 22. epist. Heri demum bene potus, seroque redieram.” Letters to Friends, book 7, letter 22. Yesterday I had returned at last, well supplied with drink and late.

[6323] Burton. Printed page 303, e: “Valer. Max. cap. 8. lib. 8. Interpositâ arundine cruribus suis, cum filiis ludens, ab Alcibiade risus est.” Valerius Maximus, book 8, chapter 8. Playing with his sons with a reed between his legs, he was laughed at by Alcibiades.

[6324] Editor. Cicero, Letters to Friends 7.22, admits returning home late after drinking; Burton’s margin loosely recasts the wording. Valerius Maximus 8.8, foreign example 1, supplies Socrates astride a reed with his children. “Cock-horse” here means an improvised hobbyhorse, not a real horse.

[6325] Editor. The reed-riding fragment is from Horace, Satires 2.3.248, where childish play enters an argument about folly. “Alcibiates” is the source’s spelling for Alcibiades. “And well he might” is taken to defend Socrates’s recreation. The closing sauce comparison qualifies leisure as an occasional accompaniment to serious life.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6326]Qui ubi se à vulgo & scenâ in secreta remôrant, Virtus Scipiadæ & mitis sapientia Læli, Nugari cum illo, & discincti ludere, donec Decoqueretur olus, soliti ——	When Scipio's valour and Laelius's gentle wisdom Withdrew from the crowd and public stage into privacy, They would joke and play with him, their belts loosened, While the vegetables cooked.[6327]
Valorous Scipio and gentle Lælius, Removed from the scene and rout so clamorous, Were wont to recreate themselves their robes laid by, Whilst supper by the cook was making ready.	Brave Scipio and gentle Laelius, Away from public life and the noisy crowd, Would amuse themselves, their robes laid aside, While the cook prepared their supper.[6328]
Machiavel in the 8 book of his Florentine history, gives this note of Cosmus Medices, the wisest and gravest man of his time in Italy, that he would [6329]now and then play the most egregious fool in his carriage, and was so much given to jesters, players, and childish sports, to make himself merry, that he that should but consider his gravity on the one part, his folly and lightness on the other, would surely say, there were two distinct persons in him.	In book 8 of his Florentine History, Machiavelli makes this observation about Cosimo de' Medici, the wisest and most serious man of his time in Italy: he would sometimes behave like the most outrageous fool, and so enjoyed jesters, actors, and childish games to amuse himself that anyone considering his seriousness on the one hand and his foolishness and frivolity on the other would certainly say that he contained two distinct people.[6330]

[6326] Burton. Printed page 303, asterisk: "Hor." Horace; Satires 2.1.71–74. See the editorial note on the altered opening.

[6327] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.1.71–74, describes Scipio Aemilianus and Laelius relaxing with the satirist Lucilius, the "him" in the verse. The comparison text begins quin, whereas 1651 prints Qui; olus represents the vegetable dish often printed holus. Burton's reading is retained.

[6328] Editor. These four lines are Burton's own English version, retained separately from the fresh translation of his Latin quotation. His version omits Lucilius and converts loosened belts into discarded robes.

[6329] Burton. Printed page 303, f: "Hominibus facetis, & ludis puerilibus ultra modum deditus adeo ut sicui in eo tam gravitatem, quam levitatem considerare liberet, duas personas distinctas in eo esse diceret." He was excessively devoted to witty men and childish games, so that anyone choosing to consider both his seriousness and his frivolity would say that there were two distinct persons in him.

[6330] Editor. The concluding portrait in Machiavelli's Florentine Histories 8.36 concerns Lorenzo de' Medici, not Cosimo. Burton's mistaken name remains in both columns; the discrepancy is recorded here rather than silently corrected.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now methinks he did well in it, though [6331]Salisburiensis be of opinion, that Magistrates, Senators, and grave men, should not descend to lighter sports, ne respub. ludere videatur: But as Themistocles, still keep a stern and constant carriage.	I think he was right to do so, although John of Salisbury holds that magistrates, senators, and serious men should not lower themselves to frivolous amusements, "lest the commonwealth itself seem to be playing," but should always maintain a stern, steady bearing, like Themistocles.[6332]
I commend Cosmus Medices, and Castruccius Castrucanus, then whom Italy never knew a worthier Captain, another Alexander, if [6333]Machiavel do not deceive us in his life: when a friend of his reprehended him for dancing beside his dignity (belike at some cushion dance) he told him again, qui sapit interdiu, vix unquam noctu desipit, he that is wise in the day, may dote a little in the night.	I approve of Cosimo de' Medici, and of Castruccio Castracani. Italy had never known a worthier commander—another Alexander, if Machiavelli's account of his life does not deceive us. When a friend rebuked him for dancing beneath his dignity, perhaps at some cushion dance, he replied, "A man who is wise by day hardly ever loses his wits at night": he who is wise in the daytime may be a little foolish at night.[6334]

[6331] Burton. Printed page 303, g: "De nugis curial. lib. 1. cap. 4. Magistratus & viri graves, à ludis levioribus arcendi." On the Trifles of Courtiers, book 1, chapter 4: magistrates and serious men should be kept from frivolous games. The body reference is printed h, although the corresponding margin is g.

[6332] Editor. Salisburiensis is John of Salisbury. Policraticus 1.4, in Keats-Rohan's critical-edition thesis, p. 68, attributes to Themistocles the warning that magistrates should avoid games lest the commonwealth seem to play. The passage then allows limited relaxation to young officeholders free from greater duties. Burton abridges it. The 1651 body uses h for this citation, but its corresponding margin is labelled g; both are retained.

[6333] Burton. Printed page 303, h: "Machiavel vita ejus. Ab amico reprehensus, quod præter dignitatem tripudiis operam daret, respondet, &c." Machiavelli, his Life: rebuked by a friend for engaging in dancing beneath his dignity, he replies, etc.

[6334] Editor. Castruccio Castracani is the subject of Machiavelli's Life of Castruccio Castracani of Lucca. Its closing anecdotes include this rebuke for dancing. Burton's English gloss grants a liberty to be foolish that is not quite the assertion of his Latin. A cushion dance was a social dance involving the presentation of a cushion and usually a kiss; Burton's parenthesis is his own conjecture.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Paulus Jovius relates as much of Pope Leo Decimus, that he was a grave discreet stay'd man, yet sometimes most free, and too open in his sports. And 'tis not altogether [6335]unfit or mis-beseeming the gravity of such a man, if that Decorum of time, place, and such circumstances be observed. [6336]Misce stultitiam consiliis brevem; and as [6337]he said in an Epigram to his wife, I would have every man say to himself, or to his friend,	Paolo Giovio says much the same of Pope Leo X: he was a serious, prudent, steady man, yet sometimes very free, and too unrestrained, in his amusements. Nor is this entirely unsuitable or unbecoming to such a man's dignity, provided he observes what is proper to the time, place, and circumstances. "Mix a little brief foolishness into your deliberations." And as the poet said in an epigram to his wife, I would have every man say to himself, or to his friend:[6338]
Source page 304 Moll, once in pleasant company by chance, I wisht that you for company would dance: Which you refus'd, and said, your years require, Now, Matron like, both manners and attire. Well Moll, if needs you will be matron-like, Then trust to this, I will thee matron like: Yet so to you my love may never lesson, As you for Church, house, bed, observe this lesson:	Moll, once, when we happened to be in pleasant company, I asked you to dance along with the others. You refused, saying that your years now called For a matron's manners and dress. Well, Moll, if you insist on being matronly, Be sure of this: I shall love you as a matron. And my love for you will never lessen If, in church, at home, and in bed, you follow this lesson:[6339]

[6335] Burton. Printed page 303, dagger: "There is a time for all things, to weep, laugh, mourn, dance, Eccles. 3. 4." Burton's English marginal note; Ecclesiastes 3:4.

[6336] Burton. Printed page 303, i: "Hor." Horace, Odes 4.12.27.

[6337] Burton. Printed page 303, k: "Sir John Harrington, Epigr. 50." Sir John Harington, Epigram 50; Burton spells the surname Harrington. The precise edition and numbering remain to be collated.

[6338] Editor. Horace, Odes 4.12.27; the next line appears in Block 085. Folger's Catalogue of English Literary Manuscripts places Harington's poem in the 1618 edition, book IV, no. 45, and records a later manuscript copy labelled Epigram the 50th. This helps explain the numbering problem but does not identify Burton's edition; the witnesses remain uncollated. All twenty lines are displayed in three aligned groups.

[6339] Editor. Moll is a familiar form of Mary. "Matron-like" describes a respectable married woman; "I will thee matron like" plays on like as a verb, meaning to like or love her as a matron. "Lesson" in line 7 is the printed spelling of lessen, echoed by lesson in line 8.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sit in the Church as solemn as a Saint, No deed, word, thought, your due devotion taint: Vaile if you will your head, your soul reveal To him that only wounded soules can heal: Be in my house as busie as a Bee, Having a sting for every one but me; Buzzing in every corner, gath'ring hony: Let nothing waste, that costs or yieldeth mony.	Sit in church as solemnly as a saint; Let no deed, word, or thought stain your proper devotion. Veil your head if you wish, but reveal your soul To him alone who can heal wounded souls. In my house be as busy as a bee, With a sting for everyone but me, Buzzing in every corner, gathering honey; Waste nothing that costs or brings in money.
[6340]And when thou seest my heart to mirth incline, Thy tongue, wit, blood, warm with good cheere and wine: Then of sweet sports let no occasion scape, But be as wanton, toying as an Ape.	And when you see my heart turn towards pleasure, Your tongue, wit, and blood warmed by good food and wine, Let no chance of sweet sport pass you by, But be as frisky and playful as an ape.[6341]

[6340] Burton. Printed page 304, dagger: "Lucretia toto sis licet usque die, Thaida nocte volo." Be Lucretia all day long if you please; at night I want Thais. Adapted from Martial; see the editorial note.

[6341] Editor. The poem contrasts devotion, household management, and sexual play within marriage. Burton's marginal Latin adapts Martial 11.104.21–22: the comparison text names Lais (Laida), whereas Burton prints Thais (Thaida). Lucretia exemplifies chastity; Thais and Lais are names associated with courtesans. Both the poem and its note retain the husband's expectations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Those old [6342]Greeks had their Lubentiam Deam, goddess of Pleasance: and the Lacedemonians instructed from Lycurgus, did Deo Risui sacrificare, after their wars especially, and in times of peace, which was used in Thessaly, as it appears by that of [6343]Apuleius, who was made an instrument of their laughter himself: [6344]Because laughter and merriment was to season their labours and modester life. [6345]Risus enim divum atque hominum est æterna voluptas.	The ancient Greeks had their Lubentia, goddess of pleasure; and the Spartans, taught by Lycurgus, "sacrificed to the god of Laughter," especially after their wars and in peacetime. The same custom existed in Thessaly, as appears from Apuleius, who was himself made the means of their amusement: laughter and merriment were to season their labour and their otherwise sober life. "For laughter is the everlasting pleasure of gods and human beings."[6346]
Princes use jesters, players, and have those masters of revels in their courts. The Romans at every supper (for they had no solemn dinner) used Musick Gladiators, Jesters, &c. as [6347]Suetonius relates of Tiberius, Dion of Commodus, and so did the Greeks. Besides Musick, in Xenophons Sympos. Philippus ridendi artifex, Philip, a Jester, was brought to make sport.	Princes employ jesters and actors, and have masters of revels at their courts. The Romans used music, gladiators, jesters, and the like at every supper—for they had no formal midday dinner—as Suetonius relates of Tiberius and Dio of Commodus; and so did the Greeks. Besides music, Xenophon's Symposium introduces "Philip, a master of making people laugh": Philip, a jester, was brought in to entertain them.[6348]

[6342] Burton. Printed page 304, l: "Lil. Giraldus hist. deor. Syntag. 1." Lilio Gregorio Giraldi, History of the Gods, treatise 1.

[6343] Burton. Printed page 304, m: "Lib. 2 de aur. as." Book 2 of The Golden Ass, by Apuleius.

[6344] Burton. Printed page 304, n: "Eo quod risus esset laboris & modesti victus condimentum." Because laughter was the seasoning of labour and sober living.

[6345] Burton. Printed page 304, o: "Calcag. epig." Calcagnini, epigram; exact poem not yet located.

[6346] Editor. Apuleius, Metamorphoses or The Golden Ass 2.31 and 3.1–11, stages a festival of Laughter and a mock trial of Lucius. Burton identifies the author with his fictional narrator; the episode is not autobiographical evidence for Apuleius. Giraldi's account of Lubentia and the precise Calcagnini epigram remain to be collated.

[6347] Burton. Printed page 304, asterisk: "Cap. 61. In deliciis habuit scurras & adulatores." Chapter 61: he took pleasure in jesters and flatterers. The body names Suetonius's Tiberius; the wording has not been verified at this reference.

[6348] Editor. A master of revels supervised court entertainments; solemn dinner means a formal midday meal. Suetonius, Tiberius 61, does place a dwarf among entertainers at a crowded banquet: his question about Paconius leads to an order for punishment. This supports the presence of entertainers at a meal, not Burton's universal claim about Roman suppers. The marginal sentence remains unlocated. Philip the jester appears in Xenophon's Symposium 1.11–16.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Paulus Jovius in the eleventh book of his history, hath a pretty digression of our English customes, which howsoever some may misconstrue, I for my part, will interprete to the best. [6349]The whole nation beyond all other mortall men, is most given to banqueting and feasts; for they prolong them many houres together, with dainty cheere, exquisite musick, and facete jesters, and afterwards they fall a dancing and courting their mistresses, till it be late in the night.	In book 11 of his History, Paolo Giovio has a pleasing digression on our English customs. However others may misconstrue it, I shall take it in the best sense: the whole nation, beyond all other people, is devoted to banquets and feasts. They prolong them for many hours, with delicate food, exquisite music, and witty jesters; afterwards they dance and court their sweethearts until late into the night.
Volateran gives the same testimony of this Island, commending our jovial manner of entertainment, and good mirth, and methinks he saith well, there is no harm in it, long may they use it, and all such modest sports. Ctesias reports of a Persian king, that had 150 maids attending at his table, to play, sing and dance by turns; and [6350]Lil. Geraldus of an Ægyptian prince, that kept nine Virgins still to wait upon him, and those of most excellent feature, and sweet voices, which afterward gave occasion to the Greeks of that fiction of the nine Muses.	Volaterranus gives the same account of this island, praising our cheerful hospitality and good humour. I think he speaks well: there is no harm in it. Long may they practise it, and all such decent amusements. Ctesias reports that a Persian king had 150 young women attend his table, taking turns to play music, sing, and dance; and Lilio Giraldi tells of an Egyptian prince who always kept nine virgins in attendance, women of exceptional beauty and sweet voices. These later gave the Greeks the idea for their story of the nine Muses.[6351]

[6349] Burton. Printed page 304, asterisk: “Universa gens supra mortales cæteros conviviorum studiosissima. Ea enim per varias & exquisitas dapes, interpolatis musicis & joculatoribus, in multas sæpius horas extrahunt, ac subinde productis choreis & amoribus fæminarum indulgent, &c.” The whole nation is more devoted to feasting than all other people. They often prolong their banquets for many hours with varied, exquisite dishes, interspersed with music and jesters; then, when dancing is introduced, they indulge in dances and the love of women, etc.

[6350] Burton. Printed page 304, p: “Syntag. de Musis.” Giraldi, treatise On the Muses.

[6351] Editor. Volaterranus is Raffaele Maffei of Volterra; Lil. Geraldus is Lilio Gregorio Giraldi. “Feature” means beauty of form. Burton presents Giraldi’s nine attendants as a human origin for the Muses; this is an antiquarian explanation, not an established account of the myth’s origin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 304–305 The King of Æthiopia in Africk, most of our Asiatick Princes have done so and do; those Sophies, Mogors, Turkes, &c. solace themselves after supper amongst their Queens and Concubines, quas jucundioris oblectamenti causâ ([6352]saith mine author) coram rege psallere & saltare consueverant; taking great pleasure to see and hear them sing and dance.	The king of Ethiopia in Africa and most Asian princes have done, and still do, the same. Those shahs, Mughal emperors, Turks, and others take their pleasure after supper among their queens and concubines, "whom, for greater enjoyment," my author says, "they customarily had sing and dance before the king": taking great pleasure in seeing and hearing them sing and dance.[6353]

[6352] Burton. Printed page 304, dagger: "Athenæus lib. 12 & 14. assiduis mulierum vocibus, cantuque symphoniæ Palatium Persarum regis totum personabat. Jovius hist. lib. 18." Athenaeus, books 12 and 14: the entire palace of the Persian king resounded with the constant voices of women and the music of an ensemble. Giovio, History, book 18.

[6353] Editor. "Sophies" refers to Persian shahs; "Mogors" to Mughal rulers. "Our Asiatick Princes" means the Asian princes of Burton's world, not rulers under English authority. Burton's Latin sentence has an awkward construction; the rendering follows its intended sense, then preserves his separate English explanation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 305 This and many such means, to exhilarate the heart of men, have been still practised in all ages, as knowing there is no better thing to the preservation of mans life. What shall I say then, but to every melancholy man,	This and many similar ways of cheering the human heart have been practised in every age, in the knowledge that nothing better preserves life. What, then, should I say to every melancholy person, except:
[6354]Utere convivis, non tristibus utere amicis, Quos nugæ & risus, & joca salsa juvant.	Enjoy companions at table; choose friends who are not gloomy, Who take delight in trifles, laughter, and sparkling jokes.
Feast often, and use friends not still so sad, Whose jests and merriments may make thee glad.	Feast often, and keep friends who are not always sad, Whose jokes and merriment can make you glad.[6355]
Use honest and chast sports, scenicall shews, playes, games;	Enjoy wholesome, chaste amusements, theatrical shows, plays, and games:
[6356]Accedant juvenumque Chori, mistæque puellæ.	Let bands of young men join in, with young women among them.

[6354] Burton. Printed page 305, q: “Eobanus Hessus.” The humanist poet Eobanus Hessus; the exact work remains to be collated.

[6355] Editor. Burton’s English couplet follows the Latin couplet and is retained as a separate passage. In the Latin, convivis refers to companions at a meal; Burton renders this as an instruction to feast often.

[6356] Burton. Printed page 305, r: “Fracastorius.” Girolamo Fracastoro; the exact poem remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as Marsilius Ficinus concludes an Epistle to Bernard Canisianus, & some other of his friends, will I this Tract to all good Students, [6357]Live merrily O my friends, free from cares, perplexity, anguish, grief of mind, live merrily, lætitiæ cœlum vos creavit: [6358]Again and again I request you to be merry, if any thing trouble your hearts, or vex your souls, neglect and contemn it, [6359]let it passe.	As Marsilio Ficino concludes a letter to Bernard Canisianus and some other friends, so I shall conclude this discussion for all good students: "Live cheerfully, my friends, free from care, perplexity, anguish, and distress; live cheerfully. Heaven made you for joy." Again and again I ask you to be cheerful. If anything troubles your hearts or torments your souls, disregard and despise it; let it pass.[6360]
And this I enjoyn you, not as a [6361]Divine alone, but as a Physician, [6362]for without this mirth, which is the life and quintessence of Physick, medicines, and whatsoever is used and applyed to prolong the life of man, is dull, dead, and of no force. Dum fata sinunt, vivite læti (Seneca) I say be merry.	I urge this on you not only as a theologian but as a physician: without this cheerfulness, which is the life and very essence of medicine, drugs and everything used to prolong human life are dull, dead, and powerless. "While the Fates allow, live happily"—Seneca. Be cheerful, I say.[6363]

[6357] Burton. Printed page 305, s: "Vivite ergo læti, O amici, procul ab angustia, vivite læti." Live cheerfully, then, my friends; far from distress, live cheerfully.

[6358] Burton. Printed page 305, t: "Iterum precor & obtestor, vivite læti: illud quod cor urit, negligite." Again I beg and implore you: live cheerfully; disregard whatever burns your heart.

[6359] Burton. Printed page 305, u: "Lætus in præsens animus quod ultra oderit curare. Hor." Let the mind, happy in the present, refuse to worry about what lies beyond. Horace, Odes 2.16.25–26.

[6360] Editor. The letters are attributed to Marsilio Ficino. "Heaven made you for joy" renders the Latin inserted into Burton's English paraphrase. The margin also inserts Horace, Odes 2.16.25–26, on a mind content with the present. The precise Ficino letter and form of its addressee's name remain to be collated.

[6361] Burton. Printed page 305, dagger: "He was both Sacerdos & Medicus." He was both priest and physician. This marginal comment explains Ficino's two capacities; its reference is placed beside his claim to speak as both.

[6362] Burton. Printed page 305, x: "Hæc autem non tam ut Sacerdos, amici, mando vobis, quam ut medicus: nam absque hac una tanquam medicinarum vita, medicinæ omnes ad vitam producendam adhibitæ moriuntur: vivite læti." I prescribe this to you, my friends, not so much as a priest as a physician: without this one thing, which is the life of medicines, all medicines employed to prolong life die. Live cheerfully.

[6363] Editor. "Quintessence" means the concentrated essence or animating principle. Ficino's description makes cheerfulness the life of medicine. The Senecan line is from Hercules Furens 177 in the Dickinson text; it is numbered 178 in some editions. Burton's conclusion follows his translated quotation and is not a modern medical recommendation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6364]Nec lusibus virentem Viduemus hanc juventam.	Let us not deprive this flourishing youth Of its amusements.[6365]
It was Tiresias the Prophets councel to [6366]Menippus, that travelled all the world over, even down to hell it self to seek content, and his last farewell to Menippus, to be merry. [6367]Contemn the world (saith he) and count that is in it vanity and toyes, this only covet all thy life long; be not curious, or over solicitous in any thing, but with a wel composed and contented estate to enjoy thy self, and above all things to be merry.	This was the prophet Tiresias's advice to Menippus, who travelled throughout the world, even down to hell itself, seeking contentment; and his final farewell to Menippus was to be cheerful. "Despise the world," he says, "and count what is in it as vanity and trifles. Seek only this throughout your life: do not pry too closely or worry too much about anything, but enjoy yourself in a composed, contented state, and above all be cheerful."[6368]
Si Numerus uti censet sine amore jocisque, Nil est jucundum, vivas in amore jocisque.	If, as Numerus thinks, nothing is pleasant without love and laughter, Live amid love and laughter.[6369]

[6364] Burton. Printed page 305, asterisk: "Loebeus Anacreon." An Anacreontic rendering attributed here to Loebeus; exact author form, poem, and edition remain unverified.

[6365] Editor. The two Latin lines urge that youth should not be deprived of play. The 1651 margin reads Loebeus Anacreon; its precise bibliographical identification remains open.

[6366] Burton. Printed page 305, y: "Lucian. Necyomantia. Tom. 2." Lucian, Necyomancy, volume 2; the dialogue is also called Menippus.

[6367] Burton. Printed page 305, z: "Omnia mundana nugas æstima. Hoc solum tota vita persequere, ut præsentibus bene compositis, minime curiosus, aut ulla in re solicitus, quam plurimum potes vitam hilarem traducas." Count all worldly things as trifles. Pursue this alone throughout life: with present affairs well ordered, neither inquisitive nor anxious about anything, pass your life as cheerfully as you can.

[6368] Editor. Burton refers to Lucian's Menippus, also called Necyomancy: a satirical descent to the underworld in search of guidance about life. The advice is spoken by the dead seer Tiresias. The quoted Latin and Burton's English rendering await comparison with the particular edition he used.

[6369] Editor. The couplet comes from Horace, Epistles 1.6.64–65, where the name is Mimnermus, the Greek elegiac poet. The 1651 page clearly prints Numerus. That reading remains in both columns, with the identification supplied here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nothing better, (to conclude with Solomon, Eccles. 3. 22.) then that a man should rejoyce in his affairs. 'Tis the same advice which every Physician in this case rings to his Patient, as Capivaccius to his, [6370]avoid over much study and perturbations of the minde, and as much as in thee lies, live at hearts ease: Prosper Calenus to that melancholy Cardinal Cæsius, [6371]amidst thy serious studies and business, use jests and conceits, playes and toyes, and whatsoever else may recreate thy mind. Nothing better then mirth and merry company in this malady. [6372]It begins with sorrow (saith Montanus) it must be expelled with hilarity.	To conclude with Solomon, Ecclesiastes 3:22, nothing is better than that a person should take pleasure in his own affairs. Every physician repeats the same advice to his patient in this case. Capivaccius tells his to avoid excessive study and disturbances of mind, and, as far as he can, to live with an easy heart. Prospero Calano tells the melancholy Cardinal Cesi: amid your serious studies and business, enjoy jokes and witty fancies, games and diversions, and whatever else may refresh your mind. Nothing is better for this illness than cheerfulness and cheerful company. "It begins with sorrow," says Montanus; "it must be driven out by joy."[6373]

[6370] Burton. Printed page 305, a, including footer continuation: "Hildesheim spicel. 2. de Mania fol. 161. Studia literarum & animi perturbationes fugiat, & quantum potest jucundè vivat." Hildesheim, Spicilegium 2, On Mania, folio 161: let him avoid literary studies and disturbances of mind, and live as pleasantly as he can.

[6371] Burton. Printed page 305, b, at foot of page: "Lib. de atra bile. Gravioribus curis ludos & facetias aliquando interpone, jocos, & quæ solent animum relaxare." On Black Bile: sometimes interrupt your weightier cares with games, pleasantries, jokes, and whatever usually relaxes the mind.

[6372] Burton. Printed page 305, c, at foot of page: "Consil. 30. mala valetudo aucta & contracta est tristitia, ac propterea exhilaratione animi removenda." Consultation 30: the illness has been intensified and brought on by sadness, and must therefore be removed by cheering the mind.

[6373] Editor. The biblical reference is Ecclesiastes, not Ecclesiasticus. The physicians named are Girolamo Capivacci, Prospero Calano, and Giovanni Battista da Monte, Latinized as Capivaccius, Prosper Calenus, and Montanus. The medical passages and the precise Cardinal Cesi intended remain for bibliographical collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 305–306 But see the mischief; many men knowing that merry company is the only medicine against Melancholy, will therefore neglect their business, and in another extreme, spend all their dayes among good fellowes in a Tavern or an Ale-house, and know not otherwise how to bestow their time but in drinking; Malt-worms, men-fishes, or water-snakes, [6374]Qui bibunt solum ranarum more, nihil comedentes, like so many frogs in a puddle. 'Tis their sole exercise to eat, and drink;	But look at the harm that follows. Many men, knowing that cheerful company is the only medicine against melancholy, therefore neglect their business and fall into the opposite extreme: they spend all their days among drinking companions in a tavern or alehouse, and know no other use for their time than drinking. Ale-soakers, human fish, or water-snakes, "who only drink, like frogs, and eat nothing"—like so many frogs in a puddle! Their sole occupation is eating and drinking.[6375]
Source page 306 to sacrifice to Volupia, Rumina, Edulica, Potina, Mellona, is all their religion. They wish for Philoxenus neck, Jupiters trinoctium, and that the Sun would stand still as in Joshuas time, to satisfie their lust, that they might dies noctesque pergræcari & bibere. Flourishing wits, and men of good parts, good fashion, and good worth, basely prostitute themselves to every rogues company, to take Tobacco and drink, to roare and sing scurrile songs in base places.	Their whole religion is sacrifice to Volupia, Rumina, Edulica, Potina, and Mellona. They wish for Philoxenus's neck, Jupiter's threefold night, and for the sun to stand still as it did in Joshua's time, to satisfy their appetites, so that they might "revel like Greeks and drink day and night." Men of brilliant wit, talent, standing, and worth debase themselves in any scoundrel's company, smoking tobacco and drinking, roaring and singing filthy songs in sordid places.[6376]

[6374] Burton. Printed page 305, asterisk, at foot of page: "Athen. dypnosoph. lib. 1." Athenaeus, Deipnosophists, book 1. The numeral is 1 in the footer; the earlier right-margin fragment is repeated there as part of the complete reference.

[6375] Editor. "Malt-worms" is a derisive term for heavy drinkers. Burton first likens them to frogs that drink without eating, then says their sole occupation is eating and drinking; the rhetorical inconsistency is retained. The Athenaeus book number is 1 in the full footer reference.

[6376] Editor. The named deities associate religion with pleasure, nursing, eating, drinking, and honey. Philoxenus was said to wish for a crane's long neck to prolong the pleasure of swallowing; Athenaeus, Deipnosophists book 1, reports the story. Jupiter's trinoctium is the mythic night prolonged to three nights for his union with Alcmena. Joshua 10:12–14 supplies the arrested sun. Pergræcari, literally to live like a Greek, means to revel or carouse.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6377]Invenies aliquem cum percussore jacentem, Permistum nautis, aut furibus, aut fugitivis.	You will find someone reclining beside a cut-throat, Mixed in with sailors, thieves, or runaways.[6378]
Which Thomas Erastus objects to Paracelsus, that he would lye drinking all day long with Car-men and Tapsters in a Brothel-house, is too frequent amongst us, with men of better note: like Timocreon of Rhodes, multa bibens, & multa vorans, &c.	Thomas Erastus's charge against Paracelsus—that he would lie drinking all day in a brothel with carters and tapsters—is all too common among us, even among men of higher standing: like Timocreon of Rhodes, "drinking much and devouring much," and so on.[6379]
They drown their wits, seeth their brains in Ale, consume their fortunes, lose their time, weaken their temperatures, contract filthy diseases, rheumes, dropsies, calentures, tremor, get swoln juglars, pimpled red faces, sore eyes, &c. heat their livers, alter their complexions, spoil their stomacks, overthrow their bodies; for drink drowns more then the sea and all the rivers that fall into it, (meer Funges and Casks) confound their souls, suppress reason, go from Scylla to Charybdis, and use that which is an help, to their undoing.	They drown their wits, boil their brains in ale, consume their fortunes, waste their time, weaken their constitutions, contract filthy diseases, catarrhs, dropsies, fevers, and tremors; they develop swollen jugular veins, red pimply faces, sore eyes, and the like; they overheat their livers, upset their bodily balance, spoil their stomachs, and ruin their bodies. For drink drowns more people than the sea and all the rivers flowing into it. Mere blockheads and barrels, they confound their souls, suppress reason, pass from Scylla to Charybdis, and turn a remedy into their ruin.[6380]

[6377] Burton. Printed page 306, d: "Juven. sat. 8." Juvenal, Satire 8.173–174; Burton's text differs from the comparison text.

[6378] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 8.173–174, satirizes a high-born man in low company. The comparison text has aliquo ("some cut-throat") rather than Burton's aliquem ("someone"), and uses "and" where Burton prints "or." The translation follows Burton's form. "Runaways" here evokes fugitive slaves.

[6379] Editor. Erastus's accusation against Paracelsus is reported polemically; Burton does not establish it as fact. Car-men are cart-drivers, and tapsters serve drink. The Latin fragment characterizes Timocreon as a glutton; its precise source and wording are not fully collated here.

[6380] Editor. Temperatures and complexions refer to bodily constitutions or humoral balance. Rheums are watery discharges or catarrhs; dropsy is swelling attributed to retained fluid; calentures are fevers; juglars means jugular veins. Funges means soft-headed fools, from a word for mushrooms; Murray's dictionary specifically cites this passage. Burton couples the insult with drink-filled barrels. Scylla and Charybdis are the opposed sea dangers of classical myth: escaping one danger only to enter another.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6381]Quid refert morbo an ferro pereamve ruinâ?	What does it matter whether I perish by disease, the sword, or a falling ruin?[6382]
[6383]When the black Prince went to set the exil'd king of Castile into his kingdome, there was a terrible battel fought betwixt the English and the Spanish: at last the Spanish fled, the English followed them to the river side, where some drowned themselves to avoid their enemies, the rest were killed. Now tell me what difference is between drowning and killing? As good be melancholy still, as drunken beasts and beggars.	When the Black Prince went to restore the exiled king of Castile to his kingdom, a terrible battle was fought between the English and the Spanish. At last the Spanish fled, and the English pursued them to the river, where some drowned themselves to escape their enemies and the rest were killed. Now tell me the difference between drowning and being killed. One might as well remain melancholy as become a drunken beast and a beggar.[6384]

[6381] Burton. Printed page 306, e: "Hor." Horace; an altered version of Satires 2.3.157.

[6382] Editor. Compare Horace, Satires 2.3.157: the standard text asks whether one perishes by disease or by theft and robbery. Burton substitutes sword and ruin. His wording is retained and translated, without reconstructing Horace's line in the original column.

[6383] Burton. Printed page 306, dagger: "Froissard. hist. lib. 1. Hispani cum Anglorum vires ferre non possent, in fugam se dederunt, &c. Præcipites in fluvium se dederunt, ne in hostium manus venirent." Froissart, History, book 1: unable to withstand the English forces, the Spaniards took to flight, etc. They threw themselves headlong into the river to avoid falling into enemy hands.

[6384] Editor. The Black Prince is Edward of Woodstock; the king is Pedro of Castile. Burton evokes the rout at Nájera in 1367, using the river deaths as an analogy for replacing melancholy with ruinous drinking. His exact Froissart text and Latin intermediary remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Company a sole comfort, and an only remedy to all kind of discontent, is their sole misery and cause of perdition. As Hermione lamented in Euripides, malæ mulieres me fecerunt malam, Evil company marr'd her, may they justly complain, bad companions have been their bane. For, [6385]malus malum vult ut sit sui similis; one drunkard in a company, one thief, one whoremaster, will by his good will, make all the rest as bad as himself,	Company, the one comfort and remedy for every kind of discontent, becomes their very misery and the cause of their destruction. As Hermione lamented in Euripides, "Bad women made me bad"—evil company ruined her—so they may rightly complain that bad companions have been their undoing. For "a bad man wants another to be bad, so that he may be like himself." One drunkard in a company, one thief, one whoremonger, would gladly make all the others as bad as himself.[6386]
—— [6387]Et si Nocturnos jures te formidare vapores,	Even if You swear you dread the night-time fumes of wine,[6388]
be of what complexion you will, inclination, love or hate, be it good or bad, if you come amongst them, you must do as they do; yea, [6389]though it be to the prejudice of your health, you must drink venenum pro vino. And so like Grass-hoppers, whilst they sing over their cups all Summer, they starve in Winter; and for a little vain merriment, shall find a sorrowfull reckoning in the end.	whatever your constitution, inclination, loves or hates, whether good or bad, if you join them you must do as they do. Even at the cost of your health, you must drink "poison in place of wine." And so, like grasshoppers singing over their cups all summer, they starve in winter; for a little empty merriment they will face a sorrowful reckoning in the end.[6390]

[6385] Burton. Printed page 306, f: "Ter." Terence. The related saying is actually in Plautus's Trinummus; see the editorial note.

[6386] Editor. Burton cites Hermione's lament in Euripides and paraphrases it in Latin, then English. His next maxim is labelled Terence in the margin, but compare Plautus, Trinummus 285: a bad man wants a good man to become bad like himself. Burton abbreviates that wording, leaving the object implicit; the modern rendering supplies "another" to make the intended sense readable.

[6387] Burton. Printed page 306, g: "Hor." Horace, Epistles 1.18.92–93; compare the different reading explained in the editorial note.

[6388] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.18.92–93, describes drinkers' dislike of someone who refuses a cup. The comparison text reads tepores, "heats," where Burton prints vapores, "fumes"; his introductory Et si also alters the connection. The fumes are the feared effects of drinking during the night, not simply outdoor night air.

[6389] Burton. Printed page 306, h: "Ἢ πῖθι ἢ ἄπιθι." Either drink or leave. Greek accents and spacing normalized.

[6390] Editor. The Greek margin gives the drinking-party ultimatum "Drink or leave." The grasshopper image recalls the fable in which a creature that sings through summer has nothing to eat in winter. The warning closes Subsection 4 and Section 2 of the Second Partition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 307 SECT. 3. MEMB. 1. SUBSECT. 1. A Consolatory Digression containing the Remedies of all manner of discontents.	Section 3 Member 1. Subsection 1 A digression on consolation, containing remedies for every kind of discontent
Because in the precedent Section, I have made mention of good counsel, comfortable speeches, perswasion, how necessarily they are required to the cure of a discontented or troubled mind, how present a remedy they yield, and many times a sole sufficient cure of themselves; I have thought fit in this following Section, a little to digress, (if at least it be to digress in this subject) to collect and glean a few remedies, and comfortable speeches out of our best Orators, Philosophers, Divines, and fathers of the Church, tending to this purpose.	In the preceding section I mentioned good advice, consoling words, and persuasion: how necessary they are in treating a discontented or troubled mind, how promptly they bring relief, and how often they provide a sufficient cure by themselves. I have therefore thought it fitting to digress a little in this next section—if this can be called a digression from my subject—and gather a few remedies and consoling words from our best orators, philosophers, theologians, and Fathers of the Church for this purpose.
I confess, many have copiously written of this subject, Plato, Seneca, Plutarch, Xenophon, Epictetus, Theophrastus, Xenecrates, Crantor, Lucian, Boethius: and some of late, Sadoletus, Cardan, Budæus, Stella, Petrarch, Erasmus, besides Austin, Cyprian, Bernard, &c. And they so well, that as Hierome in like case said si nostrum areret ingenium, de illorum posset fontibus irrigari, if our barren wits were dryed up, they might be copiously irrigated from those well-springs:	I admit that many have written extensively on this subject: Plato, Seneca, Plutarch, Xenophon, Epictetus, Theophrastus, Xenocrates, Crantor, Lucian, Boethius; and, more recently, Sadoleto, Cardano, Budé, Stella, Petrarch, and Erasmus, besides Augustine, Cyprian, Bernard, and others. They have written so well that, as Jerome said in a similar case, “if our intelligence ran dry, it could be watered from their springs”: if our barren minds dried up, those wells could irrigate them abundantly.[6391]

[6391] Editor. Austin is Augustine; Hierome is Jerome. Letter 60.5 to Heliodorus, consoling him for Nepotian’s death, names earlier philosophical consolers and imagines their springs watering the writer’s own dry intellect. The passage is compared here in English translation. Burton reuses the image for his anthology and adds his own English gloss. His Latin intermediary and the identity of Stella remain unestablished.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And I shall but actum agere; yet because these tracts are not so obvious and common, I will Epitomize, and briefly insert some of their divine precepts, reducing their voluminous and vast Treatises to my small scale; for it were otherwise impossible to bring so great vessels into so little a creek.	I shall merely "do what has already been done." Yet because these works are not readily available or widely known, I shall summarize them and briefly include some of their excellent teachings, reducing their vast, many-volume treatises to my small scale. Otherwise it would be impossible to bring such large ships into so small a creek.
And although (as [6392]Cardan said of his book de consol.) I know before hand, this tract of mine many will contemn and reject; they that are fortunate, happy, and in flourishing estate, have no need of such consolatory speeches; they that are miserable and unhappy, think them unsufficient to ease their grieved minds, and comfort their misery: Yet I will go on;	And although, as Cardano said of his book On Consolation, I know beforehand that many will despise and reject this work of mine—the fortunate, happy, and prosperous have no need of such consoling words, while the miserable and unhappy think them insufficient to ease their troubled minds or relieve their misery—I shall still go on.[6393]
for this must needs do some good to such as are happy, to bring them to a moderation, and make them reflect and know themselves, by seeing the inconstancy of humane felicity, others misery: and to such as are distressed, if they will but attend and consider of this, it cannot choose but give some content and comfort.	It must surely do some good to the happy, bringing them to moderation and making them reflect and understand themselves by seeing how unstable human happiness is, and how others suffer. To the distressed, if they will only attend to and consider it, it cannot fail to bring some contentment and comfort.

[6392] Burton. Printed page 307, i: "Lib. de lib. propriis. Hos libros scio multos spernere, nam felices his se non indigere putant, infelices ad solationem miseriæ non sufficere. Et tamen felicibus moderationem, dum inconstantiam humanæ felicitatis docent, præstant; infelices si omnia rectè æstimare velint, felices reddere possunt." On His Own Books: I know that many despise these books, for the fortunate think they do not need them, and the unfortunate think them insufficient to console their misery. Yet they bring moderation to the fortunate by teaching the instability of human happiness; they can make the unfortunate happy if they are willing to assess everything rightly.

[6393] Editor. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. Burton's body refers to On Consolation, while the margin cites On His Own Books as the place where Cardano discusses it. The distinction is retained; the exact passage remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6394]'Tis true, no medicine can cure all diseases; some affections of the mind are altogether incurable; yet these helps of Art, Physick and Philosophy must not be contemned. Arrianus and Plotinus are stiffe in the contrary opinion, that such precepts can do little good. Boethius himself cannot comfort in some cases: they will reject such speeches like bread of stones, Insana stultæ mentis hæc solatia.	It is true that no medicine can cure every disease, and some disorders of the mind are altogether incurable; yet these aids of skill, medicine, and philosophy should not be despised. Arrian and Plotinus firmly hold the opposite view, that such precepts can do little good. In some cases even Boethius cannot console: people will reject such words as bread made of stones. "These are the senseless consolations of a foolish mind."[6395]
Words adde no courage, (which [6396]Catiline once said to his souldiers) a Captains oration doth not make a coward a valiant man: And as Job [6397]feelingly said to his friends, you are but miserable comforters all. 'Tis to no purpose in that vulgar phrase to use a company of obsolete sentences, and familiar sayings:	As Catiline once told his soldiers, "Words add no courage; a captain's speech does not turn a coward into a brave man." And as Job said so feelingly to his friends, "You are all miserable comforters." It is useless to offer a string of worn-out maxims and familiar sayings in commonplace language.[6398]

[6394] Burton. Printed page 307, k: "Nullum medicamentum omnes sanare potest; sunt affectus animi qui prorsus sunt insanabiles; non tamen artis opus sperni debet, aut medicinæ, aut philosophiæ." No medicine can cure everyone; some disorders of the mind are wholly incurable. Yet the work of skill, whether medicine or philosophy, should not be scorned.

[6395] Editor. "Affections" here means disorders or troubled states of mind. The assessments of Arrian and Plotinus are Burton's; their precise references have not been located. "Bread of stones" suggests nourishment that cannot nourish, with a possible echo of Matthew 7:9. No secure source has been established for Insana stultæ mentis hæc solatia.

[6396] Burton. Printed page 307, asterisk: "Salust. Verba virtutem non addunt, nec imperatoris oratio facit è timido fortem." Sallust: words do not add courage, nor does a commander's speech make a brave man out of a coward.

[6397] Burton. Printed page 307, dagger: "Job cap. 16." Job, chapter 16; specifically verse 2.

[6398] Editor. Sallust, The Conspiracy of Catiline 58.1, opens Catiline's speech to his soldiers with this doubt about exhortation. Burton compresses the sentence. Job 16:2 supplies the complaint about miserable comforters. "Obsolete sentences" means worn-out maxims, not grammatical sentences that have become obsolete.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 307–308 As [6399]Plinius Secundus being now sorrowful and heavy for the departure of his dear friend Cornelius Rufus a Roman Senator, wrote to his fellow Tiro in like case, adhibe solatia, sed nova aliqua, sed fortia, quæ audierim nunquam, legerim nunquam: nam quæ audivi, quæ legi omnia, tanto dolore superantur, either say something that I never read nor heard of before, or else hold thy peace.	Thus Pliny the Younger, grieving and heavy-hearted at the death of his dear friend Cornelius Rufus, a Roman senator, wrote to his friend Tiro in a similar case: “Bring me consolation, but something new and strong, something I have never heard or read before; for everything I have heard and read is overwhelmed by such grief.” Either say something I have never read or heard before, or hold your tongue.[6400]
Source page 308 Most men will here except, trivial consolations, ordinary speeches, and known perswasions in this behalf will be of small force; what can any man say that hath not been said? To what end are such parænetical discourses? you may as soon remove mount Caucasus, as alter some mens affections. Yet sure I think they cannot choose but do some good, comfort and ease a little, though it be the same again, I will say it, and upon that hope I will adventure.	Most people will object here that trivial consolations, ordinary speeches, and familiar arguments can have little effect in such a case. What can anyone say that has not already been said? What use are such exhortations? You might as easily move Mount Caucasus as change some people’s feelings. Yet I am sure they must do some good, and bring a little comfort and relief. Even if it is the same thing again, I shall say it, and venture on in that hope.

[6399] Burton. Printed page 307, dagger: “Epist. 13. lib. 1.” Letters, book 1, letter 13. The passage is in Pliny’s letter 1.12.13; Burton gives a different letter number.

[6400] Editor. Pliny, Letters 1.12.13, to Calestrius Tiro, mourns Corellius Rufus; Burton prints Cornelius and cites letter 13. His Latin also shortens and alters Pliny’s wording, including fortia for magna. His English “or else hold thy peace” is an additional gloss; it does not translate a phrase in the quoted Latin. Both are retained separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6401]Non meus hic sermo, 'tis not my speech this, but of Seneca, Plutarch, Epictetus, Austin, Bernard, Christ and his Apostles. If I make nothing, as [6402]Mountaigne said in like case, I will mar nothing; 'tis not my doctrine but by study, I hope I shall do nobody wrong to speak what I think, and deserve not blame in imparting my mind. If it be not for thy ease, it may for mine own; so Tully, Cardan, and Boethius wrote de consol. as well to help themselves, as others; be it as it may, I will essay.	"This is not my own speech": these words are not mine, but Seneca's, Plutarch's, Epictetus's, Augustine's, Bernard's, Christ's, and his Apostles'. If I make nothing, as Montaigne said in a similar case, I shall spoil nothing. This teaching is mine only through study. I hope I wrong no one by saying what I think, and deserve no blame for sharing my thoughts. If it does not ease your mind, it may ease my own. Cicero, Cardano, and Boethius likewise wrote on consolation to help themselves as well as others. Be that as it may, I shall make the attempt.[6403]
Discontents and grievances are either generall or particular; generall are wars, plagues, dearths, famine, fires, inundations, unseasonable weather, Epidemical diseases which afflict whole Kingdoms, Territories, Cities: or peculiar to private men, [6404]as cares, crosses, losses, death of friends, poverty, want, sickness, orbities, injuries, abuses, &c. Generally all discontent, [6405]homines quatimur fortunæ salo. No condition free, quisque suos patimur manes.	Discontents and grievances are either general or particular. General ones include wars, plagues, shortages, famine, fires, floods, unseasonable weather, and epidemic diseases that afflict whole kingdoms, territories, and cities. Others belong to individuals: cares, setbacks, losses, the death of friends, poverty, want, sickness, bereavements, injuries, abuses, and so on. Everyone, in general, is discontented: "We human beings are tossed on Fortune's sea." No condition is exempt: "Each of us suffers his own torments."[6406]

[6401] Burton. Printed page 308, l: "Hor." Horace, Satires 2.2.2; Burton abbreviates and alters the phrase.

[6402] Burton. Printed page 308, m: "Lib. 2. Essays cap. 6." Montaigne, Essays, book 2, chapter 6, Of Exercise or On Practice.

[6403] Editor. Non meus hic sermo adapts Horace, Satires 2.2.2, which begins nec meus hic sermo est. Montaigne, Essays 2.6, presents his writing as personal study that may benefit others. The 1651 text reads "but by study," not "but my study"; the translation follows that printed construction. "Essay" means try or attempt, and also resonates with Montaigne's title. Burton ends by acknowledging that writing consolation may console its writer.

[6404] Burton. Printed page 308, n: "Alium paupertas, alium orbitas, hunc morbi, illum timor, alium injuriæ, huic insidiæ, illum uxor, filii distrahunt, Cardan." Poverty distracts one, bereavement another; illness troubles this man, fear that one; injuries trouble another, plots this one, a wife and children that one. Cardano.

[6405] Burton. Printed page 308, o: "Boethius, l. 1. met. 5." Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy, book 1, poem 5.

[6406] Editor. "Orbities" means bereavements, especially the loss of children. The first Latin quotation is Boethius, Consolation 1, poem 5, line 45; the second is Virgil, Aeneid 6.743. "Manes" literally denotes the spirits of the dead; here it refers to the punishment or purgation each soul must undergo.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Even in the midst of our mirth and jollity, there is some grudging, some complaint; as [6407]he saith, our whole life is a Glucupicron, a bitter sweet passion, hony and gall mixt together, we are all miserable and discontent, who can deny it? If all, and that it be a common calamity, an inevitable necessity, all distressed, then as Cardan infers, [6408]who art thou that hopest to go free? Why dost thou not grieve, thou art a mortall man, and not governor of the world?	Even amid our merriment and good cheer there is some murmuring, some complaint. As he says, our whole life is a "sweet-bitter" experience, honey and gall mixed together. We are all miserable and discontented: who can deny it? If everyone suffers, if this is a common calamity and an unavoidable necessity, then, as Cardano concludes, "Who are you to hope to escape? Why not grieve that you are mortal and not the ruler of the world?"[6409]
Ferre quam sortem patiuntur omnes, Nemo recuset, [6410]If it be common to all, why should one man be more disquieted then another? If thou alone wert distressed, it were indeed more irksome, and less to be indured; but when the calamity is common, comfort thy self with this, thou hast more fellows, Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris, 'tis not thy sole case, and why shouldst thou be so impatient?	"Let no one refuse to bear the lot that everyone suffers." If it is common to all, why should one person be more troubled than another? If you alone were distressed, it would indeed be more burdensome and harder to endure. But when the calamity is shared, take comfort in this: you have companions. "It comforts the miserable to have companions in their sorrow." Yours is not the only case; why, then, should you be so impatient?

[6407] Burton. Printed page 308, p: "Apuleius 4. florid. Nihil homini tam prosperè datum divinitus, quin ei admixtum sit aliquid difficultatis, in amplissimâ quâque lætitiâ subest quædam querimonia, conjugatione quâdam mellis & fellis." Apuleius, Florida 4: no divine gift brings a person such good fortune that some difficulty is not mixed with it; beneath every great joy lies some complaint, a mingling of honey and gall.

[6408] Burton. Printed page 308, q: "Si omnes premantur, quis tu es qui solus evadere cupis ab eâ lege quæ neminem præterit? cur te non mortalem factum & universi orbis regem fieri non doles?" If everyone is oppressed, who are you to wish alone to escape a law that passes no one by? Why do you not grieve at being made mortal and not becoming king of the whole world?

[6409] Editor. "Glucupicron" represents Greek for sweet-bitter. Apuleius, Florida 18, likewise describes joy mixed with complaint and honey with gall; Burton cites an older book division, "4. florid." Cardano's question is deliberately ironic: demanding exemption from suffering is like demanding exemption from mortality itself.

[6410] Burton. Printed page 308, r: "Puteanus ep. 75. Neque cuiquam præcipue dolendum eo quod accidit universis." Puteanus, letter 75: no one should grieve especially over what happens to everyone.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6411]I, but alas we are more miserable then others, what shall we do? Besides private miseries, we live in perpetuall fear, and danger of common enemies; we have Bellona's whips, and pittifull out-cryes, for Epithalamiums; for pleasant musick, that fearfull noise of Ordnance, Drums, and warlike Trumpets still sounding in our eares; instead of nuptiall Torches, we have firing of Towns, and Cities, for triumphs, lamentations; for joy, teares.	Yes, but alas, we are more miserable than others: what shall we do? Besides our private miseries, we live in constant fear and danger from our common enemies. Instead of wedding songs we have Bellona's whips and pitiful cries; instead of pleasant music, the terrible noise of cannon, drums, and military trumpets sounding continually in our ears. Instead of wedding torches we have towns and cities on fire; instead of triumphs, lamentations; instead of joy, tears.[6412]
[6413]So it is, and so it was, and ever will be. He that refuseth to see and hear, to suffer this, is not fit to live in this world, and knows not the common condition of all men, to whom so long as they live, with a reciprocall course, joyes and sorrows are annexed, and succeed one another. It is inevitable, it may not be avoided, and why then shouldst thou be so much troubled? Grave nihil est homini quod fert necessitas, as [6414]Tully deems out of an old Poet, that which is necessary, cannot be grievous.	So it is, so it was, and so it always will be. Whoever refuses to see, hear, and endure this is unfit to live in the world and does not understand the common human condition: throughout our lives, joys and sorrows are linked and succeed one another in turn. It is inevitable; it cannot be avoided. Why, then, should you be so troubled? "Nothing that necessity brings is burdensome to a human being," as Cicero judges, quoting an old poet: what is necessary cannot be grievous.[6415]

[6411] Burton. Printed page 308, s: "Lorchan. Gallobelgicus lib. 3. Anno 1598. de Belgis. Sed eheu inquis euge quid agemus? ubi pro Epithalamio Bellonæ flagellum, pro musicâ harmoniâ terribilium lituorum & tubarum audias clangorem, pro tædis nuptialibus, villarum, pagorum, urbium videas incendia; ubi pro jubilo lamenta, pro risu fletus aërem complent." Lorchan, Gallobelgicus, book 3, on the Belgians in 1598: "But alas," you say, "well then, what shall we do?" Instead of a wedding song there is Bellona's scourge; instead of musical harmony you hear the clangour of terrible horns and trumpets; instead of wedding torches you see houses, villages, and cities burning. Lamentation instead of rejoicing, weeping instead of laughter fills the air. The note continues across the foot of the page.

[6412] Editor. Bellona is the Roman goddess of war; "epithalamiums" are wedding songs. Burton's margin locates the lament in a narrative of the Low Countries under 1598. Its wedding imagery turns celebration into war and mourning. The abbreviated Lorchan reference still requires bibliographical collation.

[6413] Burton. Printed page 308, t: "Ita est profecto, & quisquis hæc videre abnuis, huic seculi parum aptus es, aut potius nostrorum omnium conditionem ignoras, quibus reciproco quodam nexu læta tristibus, tristia lætis invicem succedunt." Indeed it is so; whoever you are who refuse to see these things, you are ill suited to this age—or rather you do not know the condition of us all, for whom, in a reciprocal connection, joys follow sorrows and sorrows joys. The printed huic seculi is retained.

[6414] Burton. Printed page 308, u: "In Tusc. è vetere poetâ." In the Tusculan Disputations, from an ancient poet.

[6415] Editor. Burton offers necessity as consolation. Compare the close parallel in the Consolation to Apollonius attributed to Plutarch, section 16: Amphiaraus consoles Archemorus's mother with verses from Euripides' Hypsipyle, ending that what necessity brings need not be grievous. This locates a parallel in English translation, not Burton's Latin wording or the marginal attribution to Cicero's Tusculan Disputations, which remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 308–309 If it be so, then comfort thy self in this, [6416]That whether thou wilt or no, it must be indured: make a vertue of necessity, and conform thy self to undergo it. [6417]Si longa est, levis est; si gravis est, brevis est. If it be long, 'tis light; if grievous, it cannot last. It will away, dies dolorem minuit, and if nought else, yet time will wear it out. custome will ease it; [6418]oblivion is a common medicine for all losses, injuries, griefes, and detriments whatsoever,	If so, take comfort in this: whether you wish it or not, it must be endured. Make a virtue of necessity and reconcile yourself to bearing it. "If it is long, it is light; if it is severe, it is brief." If it lasts, it is light; if grievous, it cannot last. It will pass: "Time lessens grief." If nothing else helps, time will wear it away; habit will ease it. Forgetfulness is a universal medicine for losses, injuries, griefs, and harms of every kind.[6419]
Source page 309 [6420]and when they are once past, this commodity comes of infelicity, it makes the rest of our life sweeter unto us: [6421]Atque hæc olim meminisse juvabit, the privation and want of a thing many times makes it more pleasant and delightsome then before it was. We must not think the happiest of us all to escape here without some misfortunes,	Once they have passed, misfortune brings this benefit: it makes the rest of our life sweeter. "One day it will be pleasant to remember even these things." Being deprived of something, and missing it, often makes it more pleasant and delightful than it was before. We must not expect even the happiest among us to pass through this life without some misfortunes:[6422]

[6416] Burton. Printed page 309, x: "Cardan lib. 1. de consol. Est consolationis genus non leve, quod à necessitate fit; sive feras, sive non feras, ferendum est tamen." Cardano, On Consolation, book 1: no slight consolation comes from necessity; whether you bear it willingly or not, it must still be borne.

[6417] Burton. Printed page 309, y: "Seneca." Seneca.

[6418] Burton. Printed page 309, z: "Omni dolori tempus est medicina; ipsum luctum extinguit, injurias delet, omnis mali oblivionem adfert." Time is medicine for every grief: it extinguishes mourning itself, effaces injuries, and brings forgetfulness of every evil.

[6419] Editor. The maxim about pain is attributed here to Seneca; compare Letter 78.7, which argues that pain is either bearable or brief. Burton's formula is not a literal quotation of that passage. Both the fresh Latin rendering and Burton's own English gloss are represented.

[6420] Burton. Printed page 309, a: "Habet hoc quoque commodi omnis infelicitas, suaviorem vitam cum abierit relinquit." Every misfortune has this advantage too: when it departs, it leaves life sweeter.

[6421] Burton. Printed page 309, b: "Virg." Virgil.

[6422] Editor. Compare Virgil, Aeneid 1.203. Burton's Atque hæc, "and these things," replaces Virgil's forsan et haec, "perhaps even these things." His more certain wording remains in the original and is reflected in the translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [6423]Usque adeo nulla est sincera voluptas, Solicitumque aliquid lætis intervenit. ——	So true it is that no pleasure is unmixed: Something troubling intrudes upon our joys.[6424]
Heaven and earth are much unlike; [6425]Those heavenly bodies indeed are freely carried in their orbes without any impediment or interruption, to continue their course for innumerable ages, and make their conversions: but men are urged with many difficulties, and have divers hindrances, oppositions, still crossing, interrupting their endeavours and desires, and no mortall man is free from this law of nature. We must not therefore hope to have all things answer our own expectation, to have a continuance of good success and fortunes, Fortuna nunquam perpetuò est bona.	Heaven and earth are very different. The heavenly bodies travel freely in their spheres, without hindrance or interruption, continuing their courses and revolutions for countless ages. Human beings, however, are beset by difficulties, with obstacles and opposition continually crossing and interrupting their efforts and desires; no mortal is exempt from this law of nature. We must therefore not expect everything to meet our expectations, or our success and good fortune to continue unbroken: "Fortune is never favourable forever."[6426]

[6423] Burton. Printed page 309, c: "Ovid." Ovid.

[6424] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 7.453–454, in the account of Aegeus's joy at recognizing Theseus, before war interrupts the celebration. Burton's two lines are kept as verse.

[6425] Burton. Printed page 309, d: "Lorchan. Sunt namque, infra superis, humana terrenis longe disparia. Etenim beatæ mentes feruntur liberè, & sine ullo impedimento, stellæ, æthereique orbes cursus & conversiones suas jam sæculis innumerabilibus constantissimè conficiunt: verum homines magnis angustiis. Neque hâc naturæ lege est quisquam mortalium solutus." Lorchan: things below differ greatly from things above, human things from earthly things. Blessed spirits move freely and without any hindrance; the stars and heavenly spheres have completed their courses and revolutions with perfect constancy for countless ages. Human beings, however, are in great straits; no mortal is released from this law of nature. The difficult opening, including human things versus earthly things, follows the printed wording.

[6426] Editor. The contrast assumes the orderly celestial spheres of older cosmology. Burton opposes their uninterrupted revolutions to human uncertainty; the marginal Latin's opening is textually awkward and has not been silently repaired.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as Minutius Fœlix the Roman Consul told that insulting Coriolanus, drunk with his good fortunes, look not for that success thou hast hitherto had; [6427]It never yet happened to any man since the beginning of the world, nor ever will, to have all things according to his desire, or to whom fortune was never opposite and adverse. Even so it fell out to him as he foretold.	As Minutius Felix, the Roman consul, told the arrogant Coriolanus, drunk on his good fortune: do not expect the success you have enjoyed so far to continue. Never since the beginning of the world has anyone had everything go as he wished, with Fortune never opposing him; nor will anyone ever do so. And things happened to him just as he had been warned.[6428]
And so to others, even to that happiness of Augustus; Though he were Jupiters Almoner, Pluto's Treasurer, Neptunes Admiral, it could not secure him. Such was Alcibiades fortune, Narsetes, that great Gonsalvus, & most famous mens, that as [6429]Jovius concludes, it is almost fatall to great princes, through their own default or otherwise circumvented with envy and malice, to lose their honours, and die contumeliously. 'Tis so, still hath been, and ever will be, Nihil est ab omni parte beatum,	The same befell others, even the fortunate Augustus. Had he been Jupiter's distributor of gifts, Pluto's treasurer, and Neptune's admiral, it could not have made him safe. Such was the fortune of Alcibiades, Narses, the great Gonzalo, and most famous men. As Giovio concludes, it is almost the destiny of great princes, whether through their own fault or because envy and malice ensnare them, to lose their honours and die in disgrace. So it is, always has been, and always will be: "Nothing is happy in every respect."[6430]
There's no perfection is so absolute, That some impurity doth not pollute.	No perfection is so complete That some impurity does not taint it.

[6427] Burton. Printed page 309, e: "Dionysius Halicar. lib. 8. non enim unquam contigit, nec post homines natos invenies quenquam, cui omnia ex animi sententia successerint, ita ut nulla in re fortuna sit ei adversata." Dionysius of Halicarnassus, book 8: it has never happened, nor since human beings first existed will you find anyone, that everything has gone as he wished and Fortune has opposed him in nothing. The final word continues at the foot of the page.

[6428] Editor. Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Roman Antiquities 8.27, gives the warning in an embassy to Coriolanus. The speaker is Minucius, identified earlier as Marcus Minucius, a former consul. Burton's added Felix appears to conflate him with another name; it is retained rather than silently removed.

[6429] Burton. Printed page 309, asterisk: "Vit. Gonsalvi lib. ult. ut ducibus fatale sit clarissimis à culpa sua, secus circumveniri cum malitia & invidia, imminutaque dignitate per contumeliam mori." Life of Gonzalo, final book: it seems the fate of the most illustrious commanders, through their own fault or otherwise, to be ensnared by malice and envy and, with their dignity diminished, to die in disgrace.

[6430] Editor. Jupiter, Pluto, and Neptune supply imaginary offices of boundless power and wealth. "Gonsalvus" is Gonzalo Fernández de Córdoba; "Jovius" is Paolo Giovio. The concluding Latin is Horace, Odes 2.16.27–28. Burton's separate English couplet follows its fresh translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whatsoever is under the Moon is subject to corruption, alteration; and so long as thou livest upon earth look not for other. [6431]Thou shalt not here finde peaceable and chearfull dayes, quiet times, but rather cloudes, storms, calumnies, such is our fate. And as those errant planets in their distinct orbes have their severall motions, sometimes direct, stationary, Retrograde, in Apogæo, Perigæo, orientall, occidentall, combust, ferall, free, and as our Astrologers will, have their fortitudes & debilities, by reason of those good and bad irradiations, conferred to each others site in the heavens, in their terms, houses, case, detriments, &c. So we rise and fall in this world, ebbe and flow, in and out, reared and dejected, lead a troublesome life, subject to many accidents and casualties of fortunes, variety of passions, infirmities as well from our selves as others.	Everything beneath the moon is subject to decay and change; as long as you live on earth, expect nothing else. You will not find peaceful, cheerful days and quiet times here, but rather clouds, storms, and slander: such is our fate. Those wandering planets in their separate spheres have their various motions: sometimes direct, stationary, or retrograde; at apogee or perigee; eastern or western; combust, feral, or free. According to our astrologers, they have their strengths and weaknesses, arising from favourable or unfavourable rays in relation to one another's positions in the heavens—in their terms, houses, condition, detriments, and so on. In the same way we rise and fall in this world, ebb and flow, come in and go out, are raised up and cast down. We lead troubled lives, subject to many accidents and turns of fortune, to changing passions and weaknesses arising both from ourselves and from others.[6432]

[6431] Burton. Printed page 309, f: "In terris purum illum ætherem non invenies, & ventos serenos; nimbos potius, procellas, calumnias. Lips. cent. misc. ep. 8." On earth you will not find that pure air and those clear winds, but rather clouds, storms, and slanders. Lipsius, Miscellaneous Century, letter 8.

[6432] Editor. "Under the Moon" denotes the changeable terrestrial realm. Direct, stationary, and retrograde describe apparent planetary motion; apogee and perigee are greatest and least distance from Earth in the model used here. Oriental and occidental describe a planet's relation to the Sun; combust means obscured by proximity to it, and feral means lacking an aspect to another planet. Terms and houses are astrological divisions; detriment is an unfavourable placement. Printed "case" is rendered in the general sense "condition"; its precise astrological force remains uncertain. These technical terms form Burton's analogy with fluctuating human fortunes, rather than an astronomical explanation of them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 310 Yea, but thou thinkest thou art more miserable then the rest, other men are happy in respect of thee, their miseries are but flea-bitings to thine, thou alone art unhappy, none so bad as thy self. Yet if as Socrates said, [6433]All the men in the world should come and bring their grievances together, of body, minde, fortune, sores, ulcers, madness, epilepsies, agues, and all those common calamities of beggery, want, servitude, imprisonment, and lay them on a heap to be equally divided, wouldst thou share alike, and take thy portion, or be as thou art? Without question thou wouldst be as thou art. If some Jupiter should say, to give us all content,	Yes, but you think you are more miserable than everyone else. Other people are happy compared with you; their troubles are mere flea-bites beside yours. You alone are unhappy; no one is as badly off. Yet suppose, as Socrates said, everyone in the world brought their troubles together—troubles of body, mind, and fortune; sores, ulcers, madness, epilepsy, fevers, and the common calamities of poverty, want, servitude, and imprisonment—and laid them in a heap to be divided equally. Would you take an equal share, or stay as you are? Without question you would stay as you are. Suppose some Jupiter said, to satisfy us all:[6434]
[6435]Iam faciam quod vultis; eris tu qui modo miles, Mercator; tu consultus modo rusticus; hinc vos, Vos hinc mutatis discedite partibus; eia Quid statis? nolunt.	"I shall now do what you want: you who were a soldier Shall be a merchant; you, just now a lawyer, a farmer. Exchange your roles and go, you this way, you that! Come, why are you standing still?" They refuse.[6436]
Well be't so then; you master souldier Shall be a merchant; your sir Lawyer A country Gentleman; go you to this, That side you: why stand ye? It's well as 'tis.	Well, let it be so then: you, Master Soldier, Shall be a merchant; you, Sir Lawyer, A country gentleman. You go this way, You that: why stand still? Things are well as they are.

[6433] Burton. Printed page 310, g: "Si omnes homines sua mala suasque curas in unum cumulum conferrent, æquis divisuri portionibus, &c." If everyone brought his misfortunes and cares into one heap, to divide them into equal portions, etc.

[6434] Editor. The shared heap of troubles is a consolatory anecdote attributed to Socrates; compare the treatment of common suffering in Plutarch's Consolation to Apollonius. The precise wording and transmission of Burton's anecdote remain for collation. "Agues" are fevers, especially recurring fevers.

[6435] Burton. Printed page 310, h: "Hor. ser. lib. 1." Horace, Satires, book 1.

[6436] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.1.16–19. The speakers complain of their lives but refuse a god's offer to exchange occupations. The 1651 text has nolunt, "they refuse," where the consulted Latin has nolint. Burton's English verse gives "country Gentleman" for rusticus, here freshly rendered "farmer." Both versions are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6437]Every man knowes his own, but not others defects and miseries; and 'tis the nature of all men still to reflect upon themselves, their own misfortunes, not to examine or consider other mens, not to confer themselves with others: To recount their miseries, but not their good gifts, fortunes, benefits, which they have, to ruminate on their adversity, but not once to think on their prosperity, not what they have, but what they want: to look still on them that go before, but not on those infinite numbers that come after.	Everyone knows his own failings and miseries, but not those of others. It is human nature to dwell continually on ourselves and our own misfortunes, without examining or considering other people's, or comparing ourselves with them. We count our miseries, but not the gifts, good fortune, and benefits we possess; brood on adversity, but never think of prosperity; consider what we lack, not what we have; and look continually at those ahead of us, but not at the countless people behind us.
[6438]Whereas many a man would think himself in heaven, a petty Prince, if he had but the lest part of that fortune which thou so much repinest at, abhorrest and accountest a most vile and wretched estate. How many thousands want that which thou hast: how many myriades of poor slaves, captives, of such as work day and night in cole-pits, tin mines, with sore toil to maintain a poor living, of such as labour in body and minde, live in extreme anguish, and pain, all which thou art free from? O fortunatos nimium bona si sua norint: Thou art most happy if thou couldst be content, and acknowledge thy happiness;	Many a person would think himself in heaven, a little prince, if he possessed even the smallest part of the fortune you so resent, abhor, and consider utterly wretched. How many thousands lack what you have! How many tens of thousands of poor slaves and captives, people working day and night in coal pits and tin mines, toiling painfully for a poor living, labouring in body and mind, live in extreme anguish and pain—from all of which you are free! "How fortunate they are, if only they knew their blessings!" You are very happy, if only you could be content and acknowledge your happiness.[6439]

[6437] Burton. Printed page 310, i: "Quod unusquisque propria mala novit, aliorum nesciat, in causa est, ut se inter alios miserum putet. Cardan. lib. 3. de consol. Plutarch de consol. ad Apollonium." Everyone knows his own troubles but is ignorant of others'; that is why he thinks himself miserable among them. Cardano, On Consolation, book 3; Plutarch, Consolation to Apollonius.

[6438] Burton. Printed page 310, k: "Quam multos putas qui se cœlo proximos putarent, totidem regulos, si de fortunæ tuæ reliquiis pars iis minima contingat. Boeth de consol. lib. 2. pros. 4." How many do you suppose would think themselves close to heaven, so many little kings, if even the smallest part of the remains of your fortune fell to them? Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy, book 2, prose 4.

[6439] Editor. The Boethian comparison is Consolation 2, prose 4. Burton's marginal wording adds the image of "little kings." The Latin exclamation is adapted from Virgil, Georgics 2.458, which originally praises the life of farmers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Rem carendo, non fruendo cognoscimus, when thou shalt hereafter come to want, that which thou now loathest, abhorrest, and art weary of, and tired with, when 'tis past thou wilt say thou wert most happy: and after a little misse, wish with all thine heart, thou hadst the same content again, mightst lead but such a life, a world for such a life: the remembrance of it is pleasant.	"We learn a thing's worth by lacking it, not by enjoying it." When you later lack what you now loathe, abhor, and find wearisome, once it has gone you will say how happy you were. After missing it even briefly, you will wish with all your heart to have the same contentment again, to lead just such a life. You would give the world for such a life; even remembering it is pleasant.
Be silent then, [6440]rest satisfied, desine, intuensque in aliorum infortunia solare mentem, comfort thy self with other mens misfortunes, and as the moldiwarpe in Æsope told the fox, complaining for want of a tail, and the rest of his companions, tacete, quando me oculis captum videtis; you complain of toies, but I am blinde, be quiet. I say to thee be thou satisfied.	Be silent, then, and remain content: "Stop, and comfort your mind by looking at other people's misfortunes." Console yourself with others' troubles. As Aesop's mole told the fox, who complained of having no tail, and his other companions, "Be quiet, when you see that I have lost my sight." You complain of trifles, but I am blind: be quiet. I say to you: be content.[6441]
It is [6442]recorded of the hares, that with a generall consent they went to drown themselves, out of a feeling of their misery; but when they saw a company of frogs more fearfull then they were, they began to take courage, & comfort again. Confer thine estate with others. Similes aliorum respice casus, mitius ista feres. Be content and rest satisfied, for thou art well in respect of others;	The story tells how the hares, conscious of their misery, all agreed to go and drown themselves. But when they saw a group of frogs more frightened than themselves, they began to recover their courage and comfort. Compare your situation with others': "Look at similar misfortunes in others, and you will bear your own more calmly." Be content and satisfied, for you are well off compared with others.[6443]

[6440] Burton. Printed page 310, l: "Hesiod. Esto quod es; quod sunt alii, sine quemlibet esse; Quod non es, nolis; quod potes esse, velis." Hesiod: be what you are; let everyone else be what he is. Do not wish to be what you are not; wish to be what you can be.

[6441] Editor. "Moldiwarpe" means mole. Burton's story treats the mole as blind and adds it to an animal fable about dissatisfaction. The marginal verses attributed to Hesiod have not yet been traced to a specific passage; the attribution remains Burton's.

[6442] Burton. Printed page 310, m: "Æsopi fab." Aesop's fables.

[6443] Editor. This is the traditional fable of the Hares and the Frogs: the hares' panic frightens the frogs, showing them creatures more fearful still. Burton uses the story to illustrate consolation by comparison. The following Latin maxim is translated without assigning an unverified author.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 310–311 be thankfull for that thou hast, that God hath done for thee, he hath not made thee a monster, a beast, a base creature, as he might, but a man, a Christian, such a man; consider aright of it, thou art full well as thou art.	Be thankful for what you have and what God has done for you. He has not made you a monster, a beast, or a lowly creature, as he might have done, but a human being, a Christian, the person you are. Consider it properly: you are very well as you are.
Source page 311 [6444]Quicquid vult habere nemo potest, no man can have what he will, Illud potest nolle quod non habet, he may chuse whether he will desire that which he hath not: Thy lot is falne, make the best of it. [6445]If we should all sleep at all times, (as Endymion is said to have done) who then were happier then his fellow? Our life is but short, a very dream, and while we look about [6446]Immortalitas adest, eternity is at hand:	"No one can have whatever he wants": no one can have everything he wishes. "He can choose not to want what he does not have": he can decide whether to desire what he lacks. Your lot has fallen; make the best of it. If we all slept all the time, as Endymion is said to have done, who would be happier than anyone else? Our life is short, a mere dream; while we look around, "immortality is upon us"—eternity is at hand.[6447]

[6444] Burton. Printed page 311, n: "Seneca." Seneca.

[6445] Burton. Printed page 311, o: "Si dormirent semper omnes, nullus alio felicior esset. Card." If everyone slept forever, no one would be happier than anyone else. Cardano.

[6446] Burton. Printed page 311, p: "Seneca de ira." Seneca, On Anger.

[6447] Editor. Seneca, Letter 123.3, supplies the maxim about wanting and having. Endymion is the mythical perpetual sleeper. On Anger 3.43.5 ends iam mortalitas aderit, "mortality will soon be upon us," in an appeal to abandon anger because life is short. Burton prints Immortalitas adest, "immortality is upon us," and glosses it as eternity. Both columns preserve this different wording; its immediate textual source remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6448]Our life is a pilgrimage on earth, which wise men passe with great alacrity. If thou be in woe, sorrow, want, distresse, in pain, or sicknesse, think of that of our Apostle, God chastiseth them whom he loveth: They that sowe in tears, shall reap in joy, Psal. 126. 6. As the fornace proveth the potters vessell, so doth temptation trie mens thoughts, Eccl. 25. 5. 'tis for [6449]thy good, Periisses nisi periisses: Hadst thou not been so visited, thou hadst been utterly undone; as gold in the fire, so men are tried in adversity.	Our life is a pilgrimage on earth, which wise people travel with great cheerfulness. If you are in distress, sorrow, want, pain, or sickness, remember our Apostle's words: God disciplines those he loves. "Those who sow in tears shall reap in joy," Psalm 126:6. "As the furnace tests the potter's vessel, so trials test people's thoughts," Ecclesiasticus 25:5. It is for your good: "You would have perished had you not perished." Had you not suffered such an affliction, you would have been utterly ruined. As gold is tested in fire, so people are tested in adversity.[6450]
Tribulatio ditat: And which Camerarius hath well shadowed in an Embleme of a thresher and corn,	"Affliction enriches." Camerarius has aptly represented this in an emblem of a thresher and grain:[6451]

[6448] Burton. Printed page 311, q: "Plato, Axiocho. An ignoras vitam hanc peregrinationem, &c. quam sapientes cum gaudio percurrunt." Plato, Axiochus: do you not know that this life is a pilgrimage, etc., which wise people travel with joy?

[6449] Burton. Printed page 311, r: "Sic expedit; medicus non dat quod patiens vult, sed quod ipse bonum scit." This is beneficial: a physician gives not what the patient wants, but what he himself knows to be good.

[6450] Editor. The Apostle's saying recalls Hebrews 12:6. The sowing-and-reaping words occur at Psalm 126:5 in standard modern English numbering; Burton prints 126.6. The furnace comparison is Ecclesiasticus, or Sirach, 27:5 in the King James numbering; the 1651 text prints Eccl.25.5. Both printed references remain in the two columns, with the discrepancies recorded here.

[6451] Editor. Camerarius, first century, emblem LXXXIV, has the motto Tribulatio ditat, "Affliction enriches," a threshing scene and the quoted Latin distich. The picture and verses turn the separation of grain from chaff into purification through suffering. Burton's Latin and his separate English couplet are both represented. The facing commentary also supplies parallels for the following patristic quotations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Si tritura absit paleis sunt abdita grana, Nos crux mundanis separat à paleis:	Without threshing, the grain lies hidden in the chaff; The cross separates us from the world's chaff.
As threshing separates from straw the corn, By crosses from the worlds chaffe are we born.	As threshing separates the grain from straw, Afflictions carry us from the world's chaff.
'Tis the very same which [6452]Chrysostome comments, hom. 2. in 3. Mat. Corn is not separated but by threshing, nor men from worldly impediments but by tribulation. 'Tis that which [6453]Cyprian ingeminates, Ser. 4. de immort. 'Tis that which [6454]Hierom, which all the Fathers inculcate, so we are catechised for eternity. 'Tis that which the proverb insinuates, Nocumentum documentum: 'Tis that which all the world rings into our ears.	Chrysostom says the very same thing in his second homily on Matthew 3: grain is separated only by threshing, and people from worldly hindrances only by affliction. This is what Cyprian repeats in his fourth sermon, On Immortality; what Jerome and all the Fathers impress upon us: in this way we are instructed for eternity. The proverb implies the same: "A hurt is a lesson." It is what the whole world keeps ringing in our ears.[6455]

[6452] Burton. Printed page 311, asterisk: "Frumentum non egreditur nisi trituratum, &c." Grain does not come out unless it is threshed, etc.

[6453] Burton. Printed page 311, dagger: "Non est pœna damnantis sed flagellum corrigentis." It is not the punishment of one who condemns, but the scourge of one who corrects.

[6454] Burton. Printed page 311, asterisk: "Ad hæreditatem æternam sic erudimur." In this way we are instructed for an eternal inheritance.

[6455] Editor. "Ingeminates" means repeats insistently; "catechised" means instructed in doctrine. Camerarius's commentary on emblem LXXXIV cites Chrysostom, homily II on Matthew III, and Cyprian, sermon IV De mortalitate. It assigns the correction-not-condemnation words to Augustine on John and follows them with the eternal-inheritance question. Burton places those words beside Cyprian and Jerome. These are comparisons with Camerarius, not independent verification of each Father. The printed de immort., rendered "On Immortality," remains unchanged.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Deus unicum habet filium sine peccato, nullum sine flagello: God, saith [6456]Austin, hath one son without sin, none without correction. [6457]An expert sea-man is tried in a tempest, a runner in a race, a Captain in a battle, a valiant man in adversity, a Christian in tentation & misery. Basil. hom. 8. We are sent as so many souldiers into this world, to strive with it, the flesh, the devil; our life is a warfare, and who knows it not?	"God has one son without sin, none without the scourge": God, says Augustine, has one son without sin, none without correction. A skilled sailor is tested in a storm, a runner in a race, a commander in battle, a brave man in adversity, and a Christian in temptation and misery—Basil, homily 8. We are sent into this world as soldiers, to struggle against the world, the flesh, and the devil. Our life is warfare: who does not know it?[6458]
[6459]Non est ad astra mollis è terris via: [6460]and therefore peradventure this world here is made troublesome unto us, that, as Gregory notes, we should not be delighted by the way, and forget whither we are going.	"There is no easy road from earth to the stars." Perhaps, therefore, this world has been made troublesome for us so that, as Gregory observes, we should not be delighted with the journey and forget where we are going.[6461]
[6462]Ite nunc fortes, ubi celsa magni Ducit exempli via, cur inertes Terga nudatis? superata tellus Sydera donat.	Go now, brave souls, where the lofty path Of a great example leads. Why turn your backs In cowardly flight? Earth, once overcome, Grants you the stars.[6463]

[6456] Burton. Printed page 311, s: "Confess. 6." Confessions 6, as printed; the precise reference remains unverified.

[6457] Burton. Printed page 311, t: "Nauclerum tempestas, athletam stadium, ducem pugna, magnanimum calamitas, Christianum vero tentatio probat & examinat." A storm tests and examines a shipmaster, the stadium an athlete, battle a commander, calamity a courageous man, and temptation a Christian.

[6458] Editor. "Austin" is Augustine; his unique sinless son is Christ. Compare Sermon 46.11: if God scourges his sinless only Son, will he leave his sinful adopted child uncorrected? This is a close Latin parallel, not Burton's exact formulation; the margin's Confess.6 remains unverified. "Tentation" means temptation or trial. The soldier, athlete and sailor present adversity as a test of character; the Basil reference remains uncollated.

[6459] Burton. Printed page 311, dagger: "Sen. Herc. fur." Seneca, Hercules Furens.

[6460] Burton. Printed page 311, u: "Ideo Deus asperè fecit iter, ne dum delectantur in via, obliviscantur eorum quæ sunt in patriâ." God therefore made the journey difficult, lest people delight in the road and forget what awaits them in their homeland.

[6461] Editor. Seneca, Hercules Furens 437. Burton draws a Christian application from a classical image of the difficult ascent to the stars. His attribution of the accompanying journey image to Gregory remains for precise source identification.

[6462] Burton. Printed page 311, v: "Boethius l. 5. met. ult." Boethius, book 5, final poem, as printed. The body marker is x; the corresponding margin is v.

[6463] Editor. Boethius, Consolation 4, poem 7, lines 32–35, following the labours of Hercules. The printed margin says book 5, final poem, and its letter v differs from the body's x. The Latin asks why the cowardly expose their backs by fleeing; overcoming earth brings the stars.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Go on then merrily to heaven. If the way be troublesome, and you in misery, in many grievances: on the other side you have many pleasant sports, objects, sweet smels, delightsome tastes, musick, meats, herbs, flowers, &c. to recreate your senses.	Go cheerfully on, then, towards heaven. If the way is troublesome and you suffer misery and many grievances, you also have pleasant amusements and sights, sweet smells, delightful tastes, music, food, herbs, flowers, and much else to refresh your senses.
Or put case thou art now forsaken of the world, dejected, contemned, yet comfort thy self, as it was said to Agar in the wildernesse, [6464]God sees thee, he takes notice of thee: There is a God above that can vindicate thy cause, that can relieve thee.	Or suppose the world has now forsaken, cast down, and despised you. Still, take comfort in what was said to Hagar in the wilderness: God sees you; he takes notice of you. There is a God above who can vindicate your cause and bring you relief.[6465]
Source page 311–312 And surely [6466]Seneca thinks he takes delight in seeing thee. The gods are well pleased when they see great men contending with adversity, as we are to see men fight, or a man with a beast. But these are toyes in respect; [6467]Behold, saith he, a spectacle worthy of God: A good man contented with his estate. A tyrant is the best sacrifice to Jupiter, as the ancients held, and his best object a contented minde.	Indeed, Seneca thinks that he takes pleasure in watching you. The gods are pleased to see great men contending with adversity, just as we enjoy watching men fight, or a man fight a beast. But those are trifles by comparison. “Behold,” he says, “a spectacle worthy of God: a good man content with his condition.” The ancients held that a tyrant was the best sacrifice to Jupiter; the finest sight for him is a contented mind.[6468]

[6464] Burton. Printed page 311, y: “Boeth. pro. ult. Manet spectator cunctorum desuper præscius deus, bonis præmia, malis supplicia dispensans.” Boethius, final prose section: above all things God remains their all-knowing spectator, dispensing rewards to the good and punishments to the wicked.

[6465] Editor. Hagar is Burton’s Agar; the wilderness episode is Genesis 16:7–13, where she names the God who sees her. The margin instead quotes Boethius, Consolation 5, prose 6, on God as the all-knowing spectator. The note therefore supports the theme of divine observation rather than supplying the biblical reference.

[6466] Burton. Printed page 311, asterisk: “Lib. de provid. voluptatem capiunt dii siquando magnos viros colluctantes cum calamitate vident.” On Providence: the gods take pleasure whenever they see great men wrestling with calamity.

[6467] Burton. Printed page 311, dagger: “Ecce spectaculum Deo dignum. Vir fortis mala fortuna compositus.” Behold a spectacle worthy of God: a brave man matched against ill fortune.

[6468] Editor. Seneca, On Providence 2.7–9, describes a courageous man matched against bad fortune; Burton recasts the contest as contentment. The sacrifice saying occurs in Hercules Furens 922–924: Hercules declares an unjust king the richest victim for Jupiter, after killing Lycus. This dramatic speech supplies a literary source, not independent evidence for a universal ancient custom. Burton’s immediate intermediary remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 312 For thy part then rest satisfied, cast all thy care on him, thy burden on him, rely on him, [6469]trust on him, and he shall nourish thee, care for thee, give thee thine hearts desire: say with David, God is our hope and strength, in troubles ready to be found, Psal. 46. 1. for they that trust in the Lord shall be as mount Sion, which cannot be removed, Psal. 124. 1, 2. as the mountains are about Jerusalem, so is the Lord about his people, from henceforth and for ever.	For your part, then, remain content. Cast all your care and your burden upon him; rely on him, trust him, and he will sustain you, care for you, and give you your heart's desire. Say with David, "God is our hope and strength, ready to be found in trouble," Psalm 46:1. For those who trust in the Lord shall be like Mount Zion, which cannot be moved, Psalm 124:1–2; as the mountains surround Jerusalem, so the Lord surrounds his people, now and forever.[6470]

[6469] Burton. Printed page 312, z: "1 Pet. 5. 7. Psal. 55. 22." 1 Peter 5:7; Psalm 55:22.

[6470] Editor. The final lines correspond to Psalm 125:1–2 in standard modern English numbering, or 124 in the Greek and Latin tradition. Burton prints 124.1,2; the number is retained. His preceding phrases also draw on 1 Peter 5:7, Psalm 55:22, Psalm 37:4, and Psalm 46:1.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 2. Deformity of body, sicknesse, basenesse of birth, peculiar discontents.	MEMBER 2 Bodily deformity, sickness, low birth, and particular discontents
Particular discontents and grievances, are either of body, minde, or fortune, which as they wound the soul of man, produce this melancholy, and many great inconveniences, by that antitode of good counsell and perswasion may be eased or expelled.	Particular discontents and grievances concern the body, the mind, or one's circumstances. By wounding the human soul, they produce melancholy and many serious troubles; the antidote of good counsel and persuasion may ease or remove them.[6471]
Deformities and imperfections of our bodies, as lamenesse, crookednesse, deafnesse, blindnesse, be they innate or accidentall, torture many men: yet this may comfort them, that those imperfections of the body do not a whit blemish the soul, or hinder the operations of it, but rather help and much increase it. Thou art lame of body, deformed to the eye, yet this hinders not but that thou maist be a good, a wise, upright, honest man.	Bodily deformities and impairments—lameness, curvature, deafness, blindness, whether present from birth or acquired—torment many people. Yet this may comfort them: these bodily impairments do not blemish the soul in the least or hinder its workings, but rather help and greatly strengthen it. Your body may be lame and look deformed, yet this does not prevent you from being good, wise, upright, and honourable.[6472]
[6473]Seldome, saith Plutarch, honesty and beauty dwell together, and oftentimes under a thread-bare coat lies an excellent understanding, sæpe sub attritâ latitat sapientia veste.	"Honour and beauty seldom dwell together," says Plutarch, and an excellent understanding often lies beneath a threadbare coat: "Wisdom often hides beneath worn clothing."

[6471] Editor. The 1651 page prints "antitode"; the modern column gives the intended "antidote." Member 2 begins here, with its original heading, though the discussion of low birth belongs to a later portion.

[6472] Editor. Burton argues that bodily impairment does not diminish moral or intellectual worth. His stronger claim that it enhances the soul, and his later claims of compensating abilities, belong to his consolatory reasoning. His descriptions of bodies and appearances retain the assumptions and vocabulary of his time.

[6473] Burton. Printed page 312, a: "Raro sub eodem lare honestas & forma habitant." Integrity and beauty seldom dwell under the same roof.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6474]Cornelius Mussus that famous preacher in Italy, when he came first into the pulpit in Venice, was so much contemned by reason of his outside, a little, lean, poore, dejected person, [6475]they were all ready to leave the church, but when they heard his voice they did admire him, and happy was that Senator could injoy his company, or invite him first to his house.	When Cornelio Musso, the famous Italian preacher, first entered the pulpit in Venice, his appearance—a small, thin, poor, downcast figure—so lowered him in his listeners' esteem that they were all ready to leave the church. But when they heard him speak, they marvelled at him; the senator who could enjoy his company or be first to invite him home counted himself fortunate.[6476]
A silly fellow to look to, may have more wit, learning, honesty, then he that struts it out Ampullis jactans, &c. grandia gradiens, and is admired in the worlds opinion: Vilis sæpe cadus nobile nectar habet, The best wine comes out of an old vessell.	A man who looks insignificant may have more intelligence, learning, and integrity than someone who struts about "flaunting bombast," and "taking grand strides," and wins the world's admiration. "A humble jar often holds noble nectar": the best wine comes from an old vessel.[6477]

[6474] Burton. Printed page 312, asterisk: "Josephus Mussus vita ejus." Giuseppe Musso, his Life.

[6475] Burton. Printed page 312, dagger: "Homuncio brevis, macilentus, umbra hominis, &c. Ad stuporem ejus eruditionem & eloquentiam admirati sunt." A short, thin little man, a shadow of a man, etc. They marvelled in amazement at his learning and eloquence.

[6476] Editor. Cornelius Mussus is the Italian preacher Cornelio Musso. Burton cites a life by Josephus Mussus, here rendered Giuseppe Musso. The anecdote's details have been preserved, but the particular biographical passage remains uncollated.

[6477] Editor. "Silly" here means insignificant or unimpressive in appearance. "Ampullis" evokes swelling, inflated language. The Latin image is a lowly jar containing fine wine; Burton's separate English gloss changes "lowly" to "old," and both senses are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
How many deformed princes, kings, emperours could I reckon up, philosophers, orators? Hannibal had one eye, Appius Claudus, Timoleon, blinde, Muleasses king of Tunis, John king of Bohemia, and Tiresias the prophet. [6478]The night hath his pleasure; and for the losse of that one sense such men are commonly recompensed in the rest, they have excellent memories, other good parts, musick, and many recreations; much happines, great wisdom, as Tully well discourseth in his [6479]Tusculan questions: Homer was blinde, yet who (saith he) made more accurate, lively, or better descriptions, with both his eyes?	How many princes, kings, emperors, philosophers, and orators with bodily deformities could I name? Hannibal had one eye; Appius Claudus and Timoleon were blind, as were Muleasses, king of Tunis, John, king of Bohemia, and the prophet Tiresias. "Night has its pleasures." For the loss of that one sense, such people are commonly compensated in the others: they have excellent memories and other abilities, music and many recreations, much happiness and great wisdom, as Cicero explains so well in his Tusculan Disputations. Homer was blind, yet who, he asks, ever produced more accurate, vivid, or better descriptions with both eyes?[6480]
Democritus was blinde, yet as Laertius writes of him, he saw more then all Greece besides, as [6481]Plato concludes, Tum sane mentis oculus acute incipit cernere, quum primùm corporis oculus deflorescit, when our bodily eyes are at worst, generally the eyes of our soul see best. Some Philosophers and Divines have evirated themselves, and put out their eyes voluntarily the better to contemplate.	Democritus was blind, yet, as Laertius writes of him, he saw more than all the rest of Greece. As Plato concludes, "The mind's eye begins to see keenly as soon as the bodily eye loses its bloom": when our bodily eyes are at their worst, the eyes of our soul generally see best. Some philosophers and theologians have castrated themselves or deliberately put out their eyes to contemplate better.[6482]

[6478] Burton. Printed page 312, b: "Nox habet suas voluptates." Night has its pleasures.

[6479] Burton. Printed page 312, dagger: "Lib. 5. ad finem, cæcus potest esse sapiens & beatus, &c." Book 5, near the end: a blind person can be wise and happy, etc.

[6480] Editor. Burton's Appius Claudus denotes the Roman statesman usually named Appius Claudius Caecus. His list mixes historical and legendary examples; Tiresias is the mythical seer. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 5.113–115, discusses blindness, including Homer's descriptive power. Burton's further biographical particulars remain to be collated.

[6481] Burton. Printed page 312, c: "In Convivio lib. 25." In the Symposium, book 25, as printed; this is not the work's usual division.

[6482] Editor. Plato, Symposium 219a, contrasts the eye of the mind with declining bodily sight. The 1651 margin prints In Convivio lib.25, not a usual modern reference for this dialogue. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 5.114, also discusses Democritus's intellectual vision; Burton here names Laertius. "Evirated" means castrated. His claims of voluntary mutilation are reported as his historical exempla, without identifying unspecified individuals.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 312–313 Angelus Politianus had a tetter in his nose continually running, fulsome in company, yet no man so eloquent and pleasing in his works. Æsope was crooked, Socrates pur-blinde, long-legged, hairy; Democritus withered, Seneca lean and harsh, ugly to behold, yet shew me so many flourishing wits, such divine spirits: Horace a little blear-eyed contemptible fellow, yet who so Sententious and wise? Marcilius Ficinus, Faber Stapulensis, a couple of dwarfes, [6483]Melancthon a short hard favoured man, parvus erat, sed magnus erat, &c. yet of incomparable parts all three.	Angelo Poliziano had a skin eruption in his nose that continually discharged and made his company offensive; yet no one was more eloquent or pleasing in his works. Aesop was crooked; Socrates short-sighted, long-legged, and hairy; Democritus shrivelled; Seneca thin, rough-featured, and ugly to look at. Yet show me as many brilliant minds, such inspired spirits! Horace was a little, bleary-eyed, contemptible fellow, yet who was more full of wise sayings? Marsilio Ficino and Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples were a pair of dwarfs; Melanchthon was short and ill-favoured—"he was small, but he was great," and so on—yet all three possessed incomparable abilities.[6484]
Source page 313 [6485]Ignatius Loiola the founder of the Jesuits, by reason of an hurt he received in his leg, at the siege of Pampelona the chief town of Navarre in Spaine, unfit for wars and lesse serviceable at court, upon that accident betook himself to his beads, and by those means got more honour then ever he should have done with the use of his limbs, and propernes of person: [6486]Vulnus non penetrat animum, a wound hurts not the soul.	Ignatius Loyola, the founder of the Jesuits, was wounded in the leg at the siege of Pamplona, the chief town of Navarre in Spain. Unfit for war and less useful at court, he turned after that accident to his prayer beads. By doing so he gained more honour than he ever would have gained through the use of his limbs and his handsome appearance. "A wound does not penetrate the soul": a wound does not hurt the soul.[6487]

[6483] Burton. Printed page 312, asterisk: "Joachimus Camerarius vit. ejus." Joachim Camerarius, his Life.

[6484] Editor. "Tetter" is an old term for a skin eruption, without a precise modern diagnosis; "fulsome" means offensive or repulsive, and "hard favoured" means ill-favoured in appearance. The names are Angelo Poliziano, Marsilio Ficino, Jacques Lefèvre d'Étaples, and Philipp Melanchthon. "Parts" means abilities; "all three" refers to Ficino, Lefèvre, and Melanchthon. The biographical descriptions and Camerarius reference await detailed collation.

[6485] Burton. Printed page 313, dagger: "Riber. vit. ejus." Ribera, his Life; the abbreviated attribution is retained for further identification.

[6486] Burton. Printed page 313, d: "Macrobius." Macrobius; no work or passage is specified.

[6487] Editor. "Betook himself to his beads" means turning to prayer or devotional life; "propernes of person" means handsome appearance. The Latin maxim and Burton's English gloss are both retained in modern form. The abbreviated Ribera and Macrobius references have not yet been securely located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Galba the emperour was crook backed, Epictetus lame; that great Alexander a little man of stature; [6488]Augustus Cæsar of the same pitch: Agesilaus despicabili formâ; Boccharis a most deformed prince as ever Egypt had, yet as [6489]Diodorus Siculus records of him, in wisdome and knowledge far beyond his predecessours.	The emperor Galba had a crooked back; Epictetus was lame; Alexander the Great was small in stature; Augustus Caesar was of the same height. Agesilaus had an unimpressive appearance. Boccharis was as misshapen a prince as Egypt ever had, yet, as Diodorus Siculus records, he far surpassed his predecessors in wisdom and knowledge.[6490]
A. Dom. 1306. [6491]Vladislaus Cubitalis that pigmy king of Poland reigned and fought more victorious battels, then any of his long-shanked predecessours. Nullam virtus respuit staturam, Vertue refuseth no stature; and commonly your great vast bodies, & fine features, are sottish, dull, and leaden spirits.	In AD 1306 Vladislaus Cubitalis, that tiny king of Poland, reigned and fought more victorious battles than any of his long-legged predecessors. "Virtue rejects no stature": virtue refuses no stature. Commonly, those great hulking bodies and fine features house foolish, dull, leaden spirits.[6492]
What's in them? [6493]Quid nisi pondus iners stolidaque ferocia mentis, What in Osus and Ephialtes (Neptunes sons in Homer) nine akers long?	What is in them? "What but sluggish bulk and the fierceness of a foolish mind?" What was in Osus and Ephialtes, Neptune's sons in Homer, nine acres tall?[6494]

[6488] Burton. Printed page 313, asterisk: "Sueton, c. 7. 9." Suetonius, chapter 7.9, as printed; compare Augustus 79.

[6489] Burton. Printed page 313, dagger: "Lib. 1. Corpore exili & despecto, sed ingenio & prudentia longe ante se reges cæteros præveniens." Book 1: slight and unimpressive in body, but in intelligence and practical wisdom far surpassing the other kings before him.

[6490] Editor. "Pitch" means height. Suetonius, Augustus 79, calls Augustus short, though proportionate; he does not there equate his height with Alexander's. Diodorus 1.65.1 contrasts Bocchoris's unimpressive appearance with exceptional sagacity. The comparison supports Burton's contrast, without establishing his stronger physical description or the whole catalogue. Agesilaus's Latin description means unattractive in appearance. These are received examples, not independently verified medical diagnoses.

[6491] Burton. Printed page 313, e: "Alexander Gaguinus hist. Poloniæ. Corpore parvus eram, cubito vix altior uno, Sed tamen in parvo corpore magnus eram." Alexander Guagnini, History of Poland: I was small in body, scarcely taller than a single cubit; yet in that small body I was great.

[6492] Editor. Vladislaus Cubitalis is the king's Latin name, literally Vladislaus the Cubit-high; the margin plays on small stature and greatness. The date 1306 and the claim about his victories are retained as printed. The next sentence turns from defending short stature to a sweeping attack on large bodies.

[6493] Burton. Printed page 313, asterisk: "Ovid." Ovid; compare Halieutica 59.

[6494] Editor. The Ovidian line occurs in Halieutica 59, describing a bear. Burton applies it to large-bodied people; his stolidaque differs from the consulted stolidæque. Osus is the form printed for the giant generally called Otus; the extraordinary measure "nine acres" is also retained rather than silently corrected.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6495]Qui ut magnus Orion, Cum pedes incedit, medii per maxima Nerei Stagna, viam findens humero supereminet undas,	Who, like great Orion, When he walks through the deepest waters of Nereus, Cleaving a path, towers shoulder-high above the waves,[6496]
What in Maximinus, Ajax, Caligula, and the rest of those great Zanzummins, or giganticall Anakims, heavie, vast, barbarous lubbers?	What was in Maximinus, Ajax, Caligula, and the rest of those great Zanzummins or gigantic Anakims, heavy, enormous, uncouth louts?[6497]
—— si membra tibi dant grandia Parcæ, Mentis eges?	If the Fates give you enormous limbs, Do you lack intelligence?
Their body, saith [6498]Lemnius, is a burden to them, and their spirits not so lively, nor they so erect and merry: Non est in magno corpore mica salis: a little diamond is more worth then a rocky mountain:	Their body, says Lemnius, is a burden to them; their spirits are less lively, and they are less alert and cheerful. “There is not a grain of wit in that great body.” A little diamond is worth more than a rocky mountain.[6499]

[6495] Burton. Printed page 313, asterisk: “Virg. Ænei. 10.” Virgil, Aeneid 10.

[6496] Editor. Compare Virgil, Aeneid 10.763–765, the comparison of Mezentius to Orion. Burton prints Qui ut for Virgil’s quam and findens for scindens. Nereus, a sea-god, stands for the sea. The three displayed lines follow Burton’s text and lineation.

[6497] Editor. The Zanzummins and Anakims are biblical giant peoples. Burton combines them with classical figures to ridicule impressive bulk without corresponding intelligence. “Lubbers” means clumsy or uncouth louts; the following verse invokes the Fates who allot human lives.

[6498] Burton. Printed page 313, f: “Lib. 2. cap. 20. oneri est illis corporis moles, & spiritus minus vividi.” Book 2, chapter 20: their bodily bulk is a burden to them, and their spirits are less lively.

[6499] Editor. Compare Catullus 86.4, which denies a grain of charm or wit to a large body. Burton adapts that line to intelligence. “Spirits” here belongs to early modern accounts of bodily and mental animation; “erect” means alert or vigorous.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Which made Alexander Aphrodiseus positively conclude, The lesser, the wiser, because the soul was more contracted in such a body. [6500]Let Bodine in his 5. c. method. hist. plead the rest: the lesser they are, as in Asia, Greece, they have generally the finest wits.	This made Alexander of Aphrodisias conclude positively: the smaller the person, the wiser, because the soul is more concentrated in such a body. Let Bodin, in chapter 5 of his Method of History, argue the rest. The smaller people are, as in Asia and Greece, the finer their minds generally are.[6501]
And for bodily stature which some so much admire, and goodly presence, 'tis true, to say the best of them, great men are proper, and tall, I grant, —— caput inter nubila condunt; but belli pusilli, little men are pretty;	As for the stature and imposing appearance that some admire so much, it is true, to say the best of them, that large men are handsome and tall, I grant it: "they hide their heads among the clouds." But "pretty are the little": little men are pretty.[6502]
Sed si bellus homo est Cotta, pusillus homo est.	But if a man is pretty, Cotta, he is a little man.[6503]

[6500] Burton. Printed page 313, dagger: "Corpore breves prudentiores quum coarctata sit anima. Ingenio pollet cui vim natura negavit." Those short in body are wiser, since the soul is compressed. He excels in intelligence to whom nature denied strength.

[6501] Editor. Alexander of Aphrodisias was an interpreter of Aristotle; Bodin's work is his Method for the Easy Comprehension of History. The compression of the soul and the geographical generalization are arguments reported by Burton. Neither is silently recast as a modern explanation of intelligence.

[6502] Editor. The cloud-reaching head adapts Virgil, Aeneid 10.767, continuing the Orion passage. "Proper" means handsome or well formed. Burton sets greatness of size against the prettiness of smallness before borrowing Martial's play on a "pretty" and a "little" man.

[6503] Editor. Compare Martial 1.9.2: sed qui bellus homo est, Cotta, pusillus homo est. Burton prints si, "if," for qui, "who." Cotta is addressed by name; the line plays on being physically small and being an insignificant, over-refined man.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sickness, diseases, trouble many, but without a cause; [6504]It may be 'tis for the good of their souls: Pars fati fuit, the flesh rebels against the spirit: that which hurts the one, must needs help the other. Sicknesse is the mother of modesty, putteth us in minde of our mortality; and when we are in the full career of worldly pomp and jollity, she pulleth us by the ear, and maketh us know our selves.	Sickness and disease trouble many people, but without cause: perhaps they are for the good of their souls. "It was part of fate." The flesh rebels against the spirit; what hurts one must help the other. Sickness is the mother of humility: it reminds us of our mortality, and when we are racing headlong through worldly pomp and merriment, it pulls us by the ear and makes us know ourselves.[6505]
[6506]Pliny calls it, the sum of philosophy, If we could but perform that in our health, which we promise in our sicknesse. Quum infirmi sumus, optimi sumus; for what sick man (as [6507]Secundus expostulates with Rufus) was ever lascivious, covetous, or ambitious? he envies no man, admires no man, flatters no man, despiseth no man, listens not after lyes and tales, &c.	Pliny calls it the sum of philosophy, if only we could do when healthy what we promise when sick. "When we are ill, we are at our best." For what sick man, as Secundus asks Rufus, was ever lustful, greedy, or ambitious? He envies no one, admires no one, flatters no one, despises no one, and does not listen for lies and gossip, and so on.[6508]

[6504] Burton. Printed page 313, g: "Multis ad salutem animæ profuit corporis ægritudo, Petrarch." For many, bodily illness has benefited the soul's salvation. Petrarch.

[6505] Editor. This is Burton's spiritual interpretation of illness. His assertion that injury to the body must benefit the spirit belongs to that consolatory argument. "Modesty" here means humility or restraint. The Latin means "it was part of fate"; its precise source is unresolved.

[6506] Burton. Printed page 313, h: "Lib. 7. Summa est totius Philosophiæ, si tales &c." Book 7: the sum of all philosophy is that we should be such people, etc.

[6507] Burton. Printed page 313, dagger: "Plinius epist. 7. lib. Quem infirmum libido solicitat, aut avaritia, aut honores? nemini invidet, neminem miratur, neminem despicit, sermone maligno non alitur." Pliny, Letters, book 7: what sick man is troubled by lust, greed, or honours? He envies no one, admires no one, despises no one, and does not feed on malicious talk.

[6508] Editor. The passage is Pliny the Younger, Letters 7.26, addressed to Maximus, not Rufus. Rufus is the recipient of the preceding letter, 7.25. "Secundus" is Pliny's name, not a second author. Burton's wording and additional clause about flattery remain in the text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 313–314 And were it not for such gentle remembrances, men would have no moderation of themselves, they would be worse then tigers, wolves, and lions: who should keep them in awe? princes, masters, parents, magistrates, judges, friends, enemies, fair or foul meanes cannot contain us; but a little sicknes (as [6509]Chrysostome observes) will correct and amend us. And therefore with good discretion, [6510]Jovianus Pontanus caused this short sentence to be engraven on his tombe in Naples: Labour, sorrow, grief, sicknesse, want and woe, to serve proud masters, bear that superstitious yoke, and bury your dearest friends, &c. are the sawces of our life.	Without such gentle reminders, people would exercise no restraint: they would be worse than tigers, wolves, and lions. Who could keep them in check? Princes, masters, parents, magistrates, judges, friends, enemies, fair means or foul cannot restrain us; but a little sickness, as Chrysostom observes, will correct and reform us. With good judgment, therefore, Giovanni Pontano had this short sentence engraved on his tomb in Naples: labour, sorrow, grief, sickness, want and woe; serving proud masters, bearing that yoke of superstition, and burying your dearest friends, and so on, are the seasonings of our life.[6511]

[6509] Burton. Printed page 313, dagger: “Non terret princeps, magister, parens, Judex; at ægritudo superveniens, omnia correxit.” Prince, master, parent, and judge do not frighten him; but illness, when it arrives, has corrected everything.

[6510] Burton. Printed page 313, asterisk: “Nat. Chytræus Europ. deliciis. Labor, dolor, ægritudo, luctus, servire superbis dominis, jugum ferre superstitionis, quos habet charos sepelire, &c. condimenta vitæ sunt.” Nathan Chytraeus, Delights of Europe: toil, pain, illness, mourning, serving proud masters, bearing the yoke of superstition, burying those one holds dear, etc., are the seasonings of life. This note continues along the foot of printed page 313.

[6511] Editor. “Sawces” means seasonings. D’Engenio’s Napoli sacra, p. 69, prints the troubles-of-life inscription under Pietro Compare’s tomb, with Pontano named as its dedicator, and separately records Pontano’s own epitaph above it. This early account challenges Burton’s “his tombe.” Both columns preserve Burton’s claim; Chytraeus’s exact version remains uncollated. The whole marginal note, continuing across the foot of printed page 313, is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 314 If thy disease be continuate and painfull to thee, it will not surely last: and a light affliction, which is but for a moment, causeth unto us a far more excellent and eternall weight of glory, 2 Cor. 4. 17. bear it with patience: women endure much sorrow in childbed, and yet they will not contain; and those that are barren, wish for this pain: be couragious, [6512]there is as much valour to be shewed in thy bed, as in an army, or at a sea fight: aut vincetur, aut vincet, thou shalt be rid at last.	If your disease is prolonged and painful, it surely will not last forever. “A light affliction, which lasts only a moment, brings us a far more excellent and eternal weight of glory” (2 Corinthians 4:17). Bear it patiently. Women endure great pain in childbirth, yet will not abstain; and those unable to bear children wish for that pain. Be courageous: as much valour can be shown in your bed as in an army or a sea battle. “It will either be conquered or conquer”: you will be free of it at last.[6513]
In the mean time, let it take his course, thy minde is not any way disabled. Bilihaldus Pirkimerus, Senator to Charles the fifth, ruled all Germany, lying most part of his days sick of the gout upon his bed. The more violent thy torture is, the lesse it will continue: and though it be severe and hideous for the time, comfort thy self as martyrs do, with honour and immortality.	Meanwhile, let it take its course: your mind is in no way disabled. Willibald Pirckheimer, councillor to Charles V, governed all Germany while spending most of his days in bed with gout. The more violent your torment, the shorter it will last; and though it is severe and terrible for the moment, comfort yourself as martyrs do, with honour and immortality.[6514]

[6512] Burton. Printed page 314, i: “Non tam mari quàm prælio virtus, etiam lecto exhibetur: vincetur aut vincet; aut tu febrem relinques, aut ipsa te. Seneca.” Courage is displayed not so much at sea as in battle, and also in bed: it will be conquered or conquer; either you will leave the fever or it will leave you. Seneca. The awkward comparative follows the printed wording.

[6513] Editor. “Contain” means abstain from sexual relations. Burton’s claim about women’s wishes is retained as his generalization. The final alternative is grim: illness will end through recovery or death. The margin makes this explicit by saying that either the patient leaves the fever or the fever leaves the patient.

[6514] Editor. “Senator” is rendered councillor. The sweeping statement that Pirckheimer ruled all Germany is retained as Burton’s claim and requires historical collation. The assertion that more intense pain lasts less time is part of the consolatory tradition, not a reliable medical rule.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6515]That famous philosopher Epicurus, being in as miserable pain of stone and colick, as a man might endure, solaced himself with a conceit of immortality: the joy of his soul for his rare inventions, repelled the pain of his bodily torments.	The famous philosopher Epicurus, suffering as wretched a pain from stones and colic as a man could endure, comforted himself with a thought of immortality: his soul's joy in his remarkable discoveries drove back the pain of his bodily torments.[6516]
Basenesse of birth is a great disparagement to some men, especially if they be wealthy, bear office, & come to promotion in a common-wealth; then (as [6517]he observes) if their birth be not answerable to their calling, and to their fellowes, they are much abashed and ashamed of themselves. Some scorn their own father & mother, deny brothers & sisters, with the rest of their kindred & friends, & will not suffer them to come near them, when they are in their pomp, accounting it a scandall to their greatnes, to have such beggarly beginnings.	Low birth is a great disgrace in some people's eyes, especially if they are wealthy, hold office, and rise in public life. Then, as he observes, if their birth does not match their position and that of their colleagues, they are deeply embarrassed and ashamed of themselves. Some scorn their own father and mother, disown brothers and sisters along with their other relatives and friends, and will not let them come near while they are displaying their grandeur. They think such beggarly beginnings disgrace their greatness.[6518]

[6515] Burton. Printed page 314, dagger: "Tullius lib. 7. fam. ep. Vesicæ morbo laborans, & urinæ mittendæ difficultate tantâ, ut vix incrementum caperet; repellebat hæc omnia animi gaudium ob memoriam inventorum." Cicero, Familiar Letters, book 7: suffering from a disease of the bladder and such difficulty passing urine that it could scarcely increase, he repelled all this through joy of mind in remembering his discoveries.

[6516] Editor. Compare Cicero, On Ends 2.96: Epicurus describes joy in remembering his philosophical discoveries as a counterweight to severe bodily pain. That passage does not make an afterlife the source of his comfort. Burton's "conceit of immortality" may concern enduring fame; its sense and his Familiar Letters citation remain to be collated.

[6517] Burton. Printed page 314, k: "Boeth. lib. 2. pr. 4. Huic sensus exuberat, sed est pudori degener sanguis." Boethius, book 2, prose 4: this man abounds in understanding, but his low-born blood is a source of shame.

[6518] Editor. "Baseness of birth" means low social origin; "calling" means office or position. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 2, prose 4, contrasts abundant wealth with shame at low birth. Burton's margin instead has "understanding," a wording retained here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Simon in Lucian, having now got a little wealth, changed his name from Simon to Simonides, for that there were so many beggars of his kin, and set the house on fire where he was born, because no body should point at it. Others buy titles, coats of armes, and by all means screw themselves into ancient families, falsifying pedegrees, usurping scutchions, and all because they would not seem to be base.	Simon in Lucian, after acquiring a little wealth, changed his name from Simon to Simonides because so many of his relatives were beggars, and burned down the house where he was born so that no one could point it out. Others buy titles and coats of arms and force their way into ancient families by every means: falsifying pedigrees, appropriating armorial shields, all because they do not want to appear low-born.[6519]
The reason is, for that this gentility is so much admired by a company of out-sides, and such honour attributed unto it, as amongst [6520]Germans, Frenchmen, and Venetians, the gentry scorn the commonalty, and will not suffer them to match with them; they depresse, & make them as so many asses, to carry burdens.	The reason is that a company of people who are all outward show so admire this gentility and give it such honour. Among Germans, Frenchmen, and Venetians, the gentry scorn the common people and will not allow them to marry into their families. They keep them down and use them like so many asses to carry burdens.
In our ordinary talk and fallings out, the most opprobrious and scurrile name we can fasten upon a man, or first give, is to call him base rogue, beggarly rascall, and the like: Whereas in my judgement, this ought of all other grievances to trouble men least. Of all vanities and fopperies, to brag of gentility is the greatest; for what is it they crack so much of, and challenge such superiority, as if they were demi-gods? Birth?	In everyday talk and quarrels, the most insulting and abusive name we can attach to a man, or the first we give him, is “low-born rogue,” “beggarly rascal,” and the like. Yet in my judgment this should trouble people least of all their grievances. Of all vanities and follies, boasting of gentle birth is the greatest. What do they brag so much about, claiming such superiority as if they were demigods? Birth?

[6519] Editor. Lucian’s The Cock describes Simon’s enrichment, rejection of his earlier name, and contempt for old acquaintances. The house-burning detail has not been located in the consulted version. “Scutchions” are escutcheons or armorial shields; Burton attacks fabricated ancestry as well as purchased titles.

[6520] Burton. Printed page 314, l: “Gaspar Ens polit. thes.” Caspar Ens, Political Treasury.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tantane vos generis tenuit fiducia vestri?	Has confidence in your ancestry made you so bold?[6521]
Source page 314–315 It is non ens, a mear flash, a ceremony, a toy, a thing of nought. Consider the beginning, present estate, progresse, ending of gentry, and then tell me what it is. [6522]Oppression, fraud, cosening, usury, knavery, baudery, murther and tyranny, are the beginning of many ancient families; [6523]One hath been a bloud-sucker, a parricide, the death of many a silly soul in some unjust quarrels, seditions, made many an orphan and poor widow, and for that he is made a Lord or an Earl, and his posterity gentlemen for ever after. Another hath been a bawd, a pander to some great men, a parasite, a slave, [6524]prostituted himself, his wife, daughter, to some lascivious prince, and for that he is exalted.	It is a nonentity, a mere flash, a ceremony, a trifle, a thing of nothing. Consider the beginnings, present condition, progress, and end of the gentry, and then tell me what it is. Oppression, fraud, swindling, usury, knavery, pimping, murder, and tyranny are the beginnings of many ancient families. One man has been a bloodsucker, a murderer of his own kin, the death of many a helpless soul in unjust quarrels and rebellions; he has made many an orphan and poor widow, and for that he is made a lord or an earl, and his descendants gentlemen forever after. Another has been a bawd, a pimp to some great man, a parasite, a slave; he has prostituted himself, his wife, or his daughter to some lustful prince, and for that he is raised to high rank.[6525]

[6521] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 1.132: Neptune rebukes the winds for presuming on their ancestry. Burton redirects the line against people who boast of noble birth. “Crack” in the preceding prose means boast.

[6522] Burton. Printed page 314, m: “Alii pro pecunia emunt nobilitatem, alii illam lenocinio, alii veneficiis, alii parricidiis; multis perditio nobilitate conciliat, plerisque adulatione, detractione, calumniis, etc. Agrip. de vanit. scien.” Some buy nobility with money, others obtain it by pimping, others by sorcery, others by murdering their kin; for many, wickedness procures nobility, and for most, flattery, detraction, and slander, etc. Agrippa, On the Vanity of the Sciences. The irregular Latin in the middle of the sentence is retained.

[6523] Burton. Printed page 314, n: “Ex homicidio sæpe orta nobilitas et strenua carnificina.” Nobility has often sprung from homicide and vigorous butchery.

[6524] Burton. Printed page 314, o: “Plures ob prostitutas filias, uxores, nobiles facti; multos venationes, rapinæ, cædes, præstigia, &c.” Many have been made nobles for prostituting their daughters and wives; hunting, robbery, slaughter, tricks, and so on have raised many others.

[6525] Editor. “Non ens” means a nonentity, something without real existence. “Parricide” can mean the killing of a parent or other close relative; “silly” here means helpless. Burton’s assault connects noble pedigrees with violence, exploitation, sexual procurement, and royal favour.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 315 Tiberius preferred many to honours in his time, because they were famous whore-masters and sturdy drinkers; many come into this parchment row (so [6526]one cals it) by flattery or cosening; search your old families, and you shall scarce find of a multitude (as Æneas Sylvius observes) qui sceleratum non habent ortum, that have not a wicked beginning:	Tiberius advanced many to honours in his time because they were notorious whoremongers and heavy drinkers. Many enter this parchment roll, as one writer calls it, through flattery or swindling. Search your ancient families, and out of a multitude you will scarcely find any, as Aeneas Sylvius observes, “who do not have a criminal origin”: whose beginnings were not wicked.[6527]
Aut qui vi & dolo eo fastigii non ascendunt, as that plebian in [6528]Machiavel in a set oration proved to his fellows, that do not rise by knavery, force, foolery, villany, or such indirect means. They are commonly able that are wealthy; vertue and riches seldome settle on one man: who then sees not the base beginning of nobility? spoiles enrich one, usury another, treason a third, witchcraft a fourth, flattery a fift, lying, stealing, bearing false witnesse a sixth, adultery the seventh, &c.	“Or who do not climb to that height by violence and deceit,” as the commoner in Machiavelli proved to his fellows in a formal speech: who do not rise by knavery, force, foolery, villainy, or such crooked means. Those who are wealthy are commonly powerful; virtue and riches seldom settle in the same person. Who, then, fails to see the base beginnings of nobility? Plunder enriches one man, usury another, treason a third, witchcraft a fourth, flattery a fifth, lying, stealing, and false witness a sixth, adultery a seventh, and so on.[6529]

[6526] Burton. Printed page 315, dagger: “Sat. Menip.” Menippean Satire; the particular work remains to be identified.

[6527] Editor. “Parchment row” evokes a documentary roll of names or pedigrees. The marginal Sat. Menip. does not securely identify the work. Aeneas Sylvius is Enea Silvio Piccolomini, later Pope Pius II; his observations on court life recur below.

[6528] Burton. Printed page 315, p: “Cum enim hos dici nobiles videmus, qui divitiis abundant, divitiæ vero raro virtutis sunt comites, quis non videt ortum nobilitatis degenerem? hunc usuræ ditârunt, illum spolia, proditiones; hic veneficiis ditatus, ille adulationibus, huic adulteria lucrum præbent, nonnullis mendacia, quidam ex conjuge quæstum faciunt, plerisque ex natis, &c. Florent. hist. lib. 3.” Since we see those called noble who abound in riches, and riches seldom accompany virtue, who does not see the ignoble origin of nobility? Usury enriched this man; plunder and treason, that one; this one grew rich through sorcery, that one through flattery. Adultery brings one profit, lies bring it to some; some make money from their wives, and many from their children, etc. Florentine History, book 3.

[6529] Editor. Compare Machiavelli, Florentine Histories 3.13, where an unnamed speaker urges the insurgent workers onward and says that great wealth and power are obtained through force or fraud. Burton’s extended list is not a verbatim rendering of the consulted speech. “Able” here means powerful or well provided with means.

Original text 1651	Modern English
One makes a fool of himself to make his Lord merry, another dandles my yong master, bestowes a little nag on him, a third marries a crackt piece, &c. Now may it please your good worship, your lordship, who was the first founder of your family? The Poet answers,	One makes a fool of himself to amuse his lord; another pampers my young master and gives him a little horse; a third marries a woman with a damaged sexual reputation, and so on. Now, if it please your worship, your lordship, who first founded your family? The poet answers:[6530]
[6531]Aut Pastor fuit, aut illud quod dicere nolo.	He was either a shepherd, or something I prefer not to name.[6532]
Are he or you the better gentleman? If he, then we have traced him to his form. If you, what is it of which thou boastest so much? That thou art his son. It may be his heir, his reputed son, and yet indeed a priest or a serving man may be the true father of him; but we will not controvert that now; married women are all honest; thou art his sons sons son, begotten & born infra quatuor maria, &c.	Was he the better gentleman, or are you? If he was, then we have tracked him to his lair. If you are, what are you boasting so much about? That you are his son. Perhaps you are his heir, his supposed son, and yet a priest or a servant may in fact have been the boy's real father. But we will not dispute that now: married women are all chaste. You are his son's son's son, conceived and born "within the four seas," and so on.[6533]

[6530] Editor. "Dandles" means pampers or indulges. "A crackt piece" is a derogatory sexual description of a woman, treated like a damaged coin. Burton is listing compromises by which dependants seek advancement; the language is his.

[6531] Burton. Printed page 315, q: "Juven." Juvenal; Satires 8.275.

[6532] Editor. Juvenal, Satires 8.275, closes a satire on pedigree by tracing the first ancestor to a shepherd or an occupation the speaker declines to name. Burton preserves the insinuation rather than spelling it out.

[6533] Editor. A "form" is a hare's resting place: tracking an ancestor back to his form exposes his beginnings. "Within the four seas" is a traditional expression for within the realm; the legal-sounding phrase sharpens Burton's joke about doubtful paternity. His assurance about married women is sarcastic.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thy great great great grandfather was a rich citizen, & then in all likelihood a usurer, a lawyer, & then a —— a courtier, & then a —— a country gentleman, and then he scraped it out of sheep, &c. And you are the heir of all his vertues, fortunes, titles; so then, what is your gentry, but as Hierom saith, Opes antiquæ, inveteratæ divitiæ, ancient wealth? that is the definition of gentility. The father goes often to the divel, to make his son a gentleman.	Your great-great-great-grandfather was a rich citizen, and therefore most likely a usurer; a lawyer, and therefore a—; a courtier, and therefore a—; a country gentleman, and then he scraped his wealth together from sheep, and so on. And you are heir to all his virtues, fortunes, and titles. What, then, is your gentility but, as Jerome says, "old possessions, long-established riches": ancient wealth? That is the definition of gentility. The father often goes to the devil to make his son a gentleman.[6534]
For the present, what is it? It began (saith [6535]Agrippa) with strong impiety, with tyranny, oppression, &c. and so it is maintained: wealth began it (no matter how got) wealth continueth and increaseth it. Those Roman knights were so called, if they could dispend per annum so much. [6536]In the kingdome of Naples and France, he that buyes such lands, buyes the honour, title, barony together with it; and they that can dispend so much amongst us, must be called to bear office, to be knights, or fine for it; as one observes, [6537]nobiliorem ex censu judicant, our Nobles are measured by their means.	What is it at present? It began, says Agrippa, with vigorous wickedness, tyranny, oppression, and so on; and so it is maintained. Wealth began it, no matter how acquired; wealth sustains and increases it. Those Roman knights received that designation if they could spend so much a year. In the kingdom of Naples and in France, whoever buys certain lands buys the honour, title, and barony with them. Among us, those able to spend a certain amount must be called to hold office, receive knighthood, or pay a fine for refusing it. As one writer observes, "they judge nobility by a man's assessed wealth": our nobles are measured by their means.[6538]

[6534] Editor. The two unfinished insults are printed dashes and remain unfinished. "Scraped it out of sheep" points to wealth accumulated through sheep farming. The attribution of the definition of nobility to Jerome is retained pending identification of the exact passage.

[6535] Burton. Printed page 315, r: "Robusta improbitas à tyrannide incepta, &c." Vigorous wickedness, begun in tyranny, etc.

[6536] Burton. Printed page 315, s: "Gaspar Ens thesauro polit." Caspar Ens, Political Treasury.

[6537] Burton. Printed page 315, asterisk: "Gresserus Itinerar. fol. 266." Gresser, Itinerary, folio 266; the abbreviated reference remains uncollated. The body's marker is t, while this margin uses an asterisk.

[6538] Editor. "Dispend" means spend or have the means to spend. Burton connects social rank with property and compulsory public obligations. His account of Roman knights in terms of annual expenditure is preserved, rather than silently converted into a historically different property qualification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And what now is the object of honor? What maintaines our gentry but wealth? [6539]Nobilitas sine re projectâ vilior algâ, Without means gentry is naught worth, nothing so contemptible and base. [6540]Disputare de nobilitate generis, sine divitiis, est disputare de nobilitate stercoris, saith Nevisanus the lawyer, to dispute of gentry without wealth, is (saving your reverence) to discusse the originall of a mard. So that it is wealth alone that denominates, money which maintaines it, gives esse to it, for which every man may have it.	And what is honoured now? What sustains our gentry but wealth? "Nobility without property is worth less than washed-up seaweed." Without means, gentility is worth nothing; nothing is so contemptible and base. "To argue about noble birth without riches is to argue about the nobility of dung," says the lawyer Nevisanus. To discuss gentility without wealth is, begging your pardon, to discuss the pedigree of a turd. Wealth alone gives the title; money maintains it and gives it existence; anyone can have it for money.[6541]
And what is their ordinary exercise? [6542]sit to eat, drink, lie down to sleep, and rise to play: wherein lies their worth and sufficiency? in a few coats of armes, eagles, lions, serpents, bears, tygers, dogs, crosses, bends, fesses, &c. and such like babies, which they commonly set up in their galleries, porches, windowes, on boles, platters, coches, in tombs, churches, mens sleeves, &c.	And how do they usually occupy themselves? They sit down to eat and drink, lie down to sleep, and rise to play. Where are their worth and ability? In a few coats of arms: eagles, lions, serpents, bears, tigers, dogs, crosses, diagonal bands, horizontal bands, and similar baubles, which they commonly display in their galleries, porches, windows, on bowls, platters, coaches, in tombs, churches, on people's sleeves, and so on.[6543]

[6539] Burton. Printed page 315, t: "Hor." Horace; compare Satires 2.5.8.

[6540] Burton. Printed page 315, u: "Syl. nup. lib. 4. num. 111." The Nuptial Forest, book 4, number 111; Giovanni Nevizzano's Silva nuptialis.

[6541] Editor. The Horatian comparison adapts Satires 2.5.8, where birth and virtue without wealth are worth less than seaweed. Nevisanus is Giovanni Nevizzano, author of the Silva nuptialis. "Mard" is an obsolete word for dung or a turd; the modern version preserves the deliberate coarseness.

[6542] Burton. Printed page 315, dagger: "Exod. 32." Exodus 32; compare verse 6.

[6543] Editor. Exodus 32:6 says the people sat down to eat and drink and rose to play; Burton adds lying down to sleep. Bends and fesses are diagonal and horizontal bands on heraldic shields. "Babies" here means trifles or baubles, not infants.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 315–316 [6544]If he can hawk and hunt, ride an horse, play at cards and dice, swagger, drink, swear, take tobacco with a grace, sing, dance, wear his clothes in fashion, court and please his mistris, talk big fustian, [6545]insult, scorn, strut, contemn others, and use a little mimical and apish complement above the rest, he is a compleat, (Egregiam verò laudem) a well qualified gentleman; these are most of their imployments, this their greatest commendation.	If he can hawk and hunt, ride a horse, play cards and dice, swagger, drink, swear, smoke tobacco gracefully, sing, dance, dress fashionably, court and please his mistress, spout grandiose nonsense, behave arrogantly, sneer, strut, despise others, and perform a little more theatrical, apish courtesy than the rest, he is an accomplished, well-qualified gentleman —"splendid praise indeed!" These are their chief occupations, this their highest recommendation.[6546]

[6544] Burton. Printed page 315, x: "Omnium nobilium sufficientia in eo probatur, si venatica noverint, si aleam, si corporis vires ingentibus poculis commonstrent, si naturæ robur numerosâ venere probent, &c." The ability of all nobles is demonstrated if they know hunting and dice, show their bodily strength by enormous drinking bouts, and prove their natural vigour through frequent sexual activity, etc.

[6545] Burton. Printed page 316, y: "Difficile est, ut non sit superbus dives, Austin. ser. 24." It is difficult for a rich man not to be proud. Augustine, sermon 24.

[6546] Editor. "Fustian" means inflated, pretentious language; "complement" means ceremonious courtesy. The sarcastic Latin "splendid praise indeed" recalls Virgil, Aeneid 4.93. The accomplishments are presented as showy substitutes for the capacity to govern.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 316 What is gentry, this parchment nobility then, but as [6547]Agrippa defines it, a sanctuary of knavery and naughtines, a cloke for wickednesse and execrable vices, of pride, fraud, contempt, boasting, oppression, dissimulation, lust, gluttony, malice, fornication, adultery, ignorance, impiety? A nobleman therefore in some likelihood, as he concludes, is an Atheist, an oppressor, an Epicure, a [6548]gull, a disard, an illiterate idiot, an outside, a gloworm, a proud fool, an arrant asse, Ventris & inguinis mancipium, a slave to his lust and belly, solaque libidine fortis.	What, then, is gentility, this parchment nobility, but what Agrippa defines: a refuge for knavery and wickedness, a cloak for evil and detestable vices—pride, fraud, contempt, boasting, oppression, deceit, lust, gluttony, malice, fornication, adultery, ignorance, and impiety? A nobleman, then, is likely, as he concludes, to be an atheist, an oppressor, a sensualist, a dupe, a fool, an ignorant idiot, a mere exterior, a glow-worm, a proud fool, an absolute ass, "a slave to his belly and groin": a slave to his lust and belly, "strong only in lust."[6549]
And as Salvianus observed of his Countrymen the Aquitanes in France, sicut titulis primi fuere, sic & vitiis; & Cabinet du Roy, their own writer distinctly of the rest; The Nobles of Berry are most part leachers, they of Tourraine theeves, they of Narbone covetous, they of Guyenne coyners, they of Province Atheists, they of Rhemes superstitious, they of Lions treacherous, of Normandy proud, of Picardy insolent, &c. we may generally conclude, The greater men, the more vicious.	As Salvian observed of his fellow-countrymen, the Aquitanians in France, "as they were foremost in titles, so also in vices." And the Cabinet du Roy, their own writer, distinguishes the others: the nobles of Berry are mostly lechers; those of Touraine, thieves; those of Narbonne, greedy; those of Guyenne, counterfeiters; those of Provence, atheists; those of Reims, superstitious; those of Lyon, treacherous; of Normandy, proud; of Picardy, insolent, and so on. We may conclude generally: the greater the men, the more vicious.[6550]

[6547] Burton. Printed page 316, z: "Nobilitas nihil aliud nisi improbitas, furor, rapina, latrocinium, homicidium, luxus, venatio, violentia, &c." Nobility is nothing but wickedness, madness, robbery, brigandage, homicide, luxury, hunting, violence, etc.

[6548] Burton. Printed page 316, dagger: "The fool took away my lord in the mask, 'twas apposite." The fool took away my lord in the masque: it was fitting. The particular performance or anecdote, and the precise sense of "took away," are not identified.

[6549] Editor. "Epicure" here means sensualist, not simply a follower of Epicurus. A "gull" is a dupe; a "disard" a fool; an "outside" a person of mere outward show. The glow-worm image continues the contrast between display and worth. The masque anecdote in the margin remains unidentified, and its "took away" is retained.

[6550] Editor. "Coyners" means counterfeiters; Province, Rhemes, and Lions are Provence, Reims, and Lyon. Burton quotes a hostile catalogue of regional stereotypes, then generalizes it into an attack on rank. These accusations are not adopted as descriptions of the populations named. The Cabinet du Roy reference awaits identification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In fine, as [6551]Æneas Sylvius addes, they are most part miserable, sottish and filthy fellows, like the walls of their houses, fair without, foul within. What dost thou vaunt of now? [6552]What dost thou gape and wonder at? admire him for his brave apparell, horses, dogs, fine houses, manors, orchards, gardens, walks? Why? a fool may be possessor of this as well as he, and he that accounts him a better man, a Nobleman for having of it, he is a fool himself. Now go and brag of thy gentility.	Finally, as Aeneas Sylvius adds, they are mostly miserable, foolish, filthy fellows, like the walls of their houses: fine outside, foul within. What do you boast about now? What are you gaping and marvelling at? Do you admire him for his fine clothes, horses, dogs, handsome houses, manors, orchards, gardens, and walks? Why? A fool can own all this as well as he; whoever thinks him a better man, a nobleman, because he has it is himself a fool. Now go and boast of your gentle birth.
This is it belike, which makes the [6553]Turkes at this day scorn nobility, and all those huffing bumbast titles, which so much elevate their poles: except it be such as have got it at first, maintain it by some supereminent quality, or excellent worth.	Presumably this is what makes the Turks today scorn nobility and all those blustering, inflated titles that so swell people's heads—unless those who first acquired the honour sustain it by some outstanding quality or exceptional worth.[6554]

[6551] Burton. Printed page 316, dagger: "De miser. curial. Miseri sunt, inepti sunt, turpes sunt, multi ut parietes ædium suarum speciosi." On the Misery of Courtiers: they are miserable, foolish, and foul; many are handsome like the walls of their own houses.

[6552] Burton. Printed page 316, a: "Miraris aureas vestes, equos, canes, ordinem famulorum, lautas mensas, ædes, villas, prædia, piscinas, sylvas, &c. hæc omnia stultus assequi potest. Pandalus noster lenocinio nobilitatus est, Æneas Sylvius." You admire golden clothes, horses, dogs, the ranks of servants, sumptuous tables, houses, villas, estates, fishponds, woods, etc.; a fool can acquire all these. Our Pandalus was ennobled through pimping. Aeneas Sylvius.

[6553] Burton. Printed page 316, b: "Bellonius observ. lib. 2." Pierre Belon, Observations, book 2.

[6554] Editor. "Poles" means heads; inflated titles puff up their holders. Burton's exception allows honour earned and sustained by personal merit. The contrast with Turkish practice is his historical comparison, cited to Pierre Belon; the precise passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And for this cause, the Ragusian Commonwealth, Switzers, and the united Provinces, in all their Aristocracies, or Democratical Monarchies, (if I may so call them) exclude all these degrees of hereditary honours, & will admit of none to bear office, but such as are learned, like those Athenian Areopagites, wise, discreet, & well brought up. The [6555]Chinenses observe the same customes, no man amongst them noble by birth; out of their Philosophers and Doctors they choose Magistrates; their politick Nobles are taken from such as be moraliter nobiles, vertuous noble, nobilitas ut olim ab officio, non à naturâ, as in Israel of old and their office was to defend and govern their Country in war and peace, not to hawk, hunt, eat, drink, game alone, as too many do.	For this reason the republic of Ragusa, the Swiss, and the United Provinces, in all their aristocracies or democratic monarchies, if I may call them that, exclude these degrees of hereditary honour. They allow only the learned, wise, discerning, and well-educated to hold office, like the Athenian Areopagites. The Chinese follow the same customs: no one among them is noble by birth. They choose magistrates from their philosophers and doctors; their civic nobles are drawn from those who are "morally noble," noble in virtue. "Nobility, as formerly, comes from office, not from nature," as in ancient Israel. Their office was to defend and govern their country in war and peace, not merely to hawk, hunt, eat, drink, and gamble, as too many do.[6556]
Their Loysii, Manderini, literati, licentiati, and such as have raised themselves by their worth, are their noblemen only, thought fit to govern a state; and why then should any that is otherwise of worth, be ashamed of his birth? why should not he be as much respected that leaves a noble posterity, as he that hath had noble ancesters? nay why not more? for plures solem orientem, we adore the sun rising most part; and how much better is it to say, Ego meis majoribus virtute præluxi, to boast himself of his vertues, then of his birth?	Their Loysii, mandarins, scholars, licentiates, and those who have risen through their own merit are their only noblemen, the people thought fit to govern a state. Why, then, should anyone who has worth in other respects be ashamed of his birth? Why should a man who leaves noble descendants not be respected as much as one who had noble ancestors? Indeed, why not more? For "more people worship the rising sun": we mostly adore the sun as it rises. How much better to say, "In virtue I outshone my ancestors," and boast of one's virtues rather than one's birth![6557]

[6555] Burton. Printed page 316, c: "Mat. Riccius lib. 1. cap. 3. Ad regendam remp. soli doctores, aut licentiati, adsciscuntur, &c." Matteo Ricci, book 1, chapter 3: only doctors or licentiates are selected to govern the commonwealth, etc.

[6556] Editor. Areopagites are members of the Athenian council of the Areopagus. "Politick" here means civic or belonging to government. Burton's comparison groups different constitutions under his own phrase "democratic monarchies"; it should not be read as a precise account of their institutions. The Ricci reference concerns the recruitment of learned officials.

[6557] Editor. Literati and licentiati denote scholars and holders of academic qualifications; Loysii is retained pending identification of Burton's form. The passage argues that founding a worthy family deserves at least as much honour as inheriting one. His fragment about the rising sun is expanded only to express its implied act of worship.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cathesbeius Sultan of Ægypt and Syria, was by his condition a slave, but for worth, valour and manhood second to no King, and for that cause (as [6558]Jovius writes) elected Emperour of the Mameluches. That poor Spanish Pizarro for his valour made by Charles the fifth Marquesse of Anatillo; The Turkie Bassa's are all such.	Cathesbeius, Sultan of Egypt and Syria, was a slave by condition, but second to no king in worth, valour, and courage; for that reason, as Giovio writes, he was elected emperor of the Mamluks. That poor Spaniard Pizarro was made Marquis of Anatillo by Charles V for his valour. The Turkish pashas are all such men.[6559]
Source page 316–317 Pertinax, Philippus Arabs, Maximinus, Probus, Aurelius, &c. from common souldiers, became Emperours. Cato, Cincinnatus, &c. Consuls. Pius secundus, Sixtus quintus, Johan. secundus, Nicholas quintus, &c. Popes. Socrates, Virgil, Horace, libertino patre natus. [6560]The Kings of Denmark fetch their pedegree, as some say, from one Ulfo, that was the son of a bear. [6561]E tenui casa sæpe vir magnus exit, many a worthy man comes out of a poor cottage.	Pertinax, Philip the Arab, Maximinus, Probus, Aurelius, and others rose from common soldiers to emperors. Cato, Cincinnatus, and others became consuls; Pius II, Sixtus V, John II, Nicholas V, and others, popes. Socrates, Virgil, Horace—"born of a freedman father." The kings of Denmark, some say, trace their pedigree to one Ulfo, the son of a bear. "A great man often comes from a humble cottage": many a worthy man comes out of a poor cottage.[6562]

[6558] Burton. Printed page 316, dagger: "Lib. 1. hist. conditione servus, cæterum acer bello, & animi magnitudine maximorum regum nemini secundus: ob hæc à Mameluchis in regem electus." History, book 1: a slave by condition, but fierce in war and second to none of the greatest kings in greatness of spirit; for these qualities the Mamluks elected him king.

[6559] Editor. Cathesbeius and Anatillo are the names printed in 1651 and are retained pending a precise check of the Giovio passage and Pizarro's title. "Bassa" is pasha, an Ottoman title. Burton uses these examples to argue for advancement from humble or enslaved origins, not to provide complete biographies.

[6560] Burton. Printed page 317, d: "Olaus Magnus lib. 18. Saxo Grammaticus, à quo rex Steno & cætera Danorum regum stemmata." Olaus Magnus, book 18; Saxo Grammaticus: from whom King Steno and the remaining lines of Danish kings descend.

[6561] Burton. Printed page 317, dagger: "Seneca de Contro. Philos. epist." Seneca, "de Contro. Philos. epist.," as printed; the abbreviated citation is unclear. Compare Letter 66.3.

[6562] Editor. The catalogue compresses distinct and sometimes questionable origin stories; Aurelius and John II remain as printed. "Born of a freedman father" echoes Horace, Satires 1.6. The Danish bear ancestry is explicitly reported as hearsay. Seneca, Letter 66.3, gives the cottage comparison in different wording.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 317 Hercules, Romulus, Alexander, (by Olympia's confession) Themistocles, Jugurtha, king Arthur, William the Conquerour, Homer, Demosthenes, P. Lumbard, P. Comestor, Bartholus, Adrian the fourth Pope, &c. bastards; and almost in every kingdom, the most ancient families have bin at first Princes bastards; their worthiest captains, best wits, great scholars, bravest spirits in all our Annals, have been base. [6563]Cardan in his subtilties, gives a reason why they are most part better able then others, in body and mind, and so per consequens, more fortunate.	Hercules, Romulus, Alexander—by Olympias's confession—Themistocles, Jugurtha, King Arthur, William the Conqueror, Homer, Demosthenes, Peter Lombard, Peter Comestor, Bartolus, Pope Adrian IV, and others were born outside marriage. In almost every kingdom, the oldest families began with princes' illegitimate children. Our annals' worthiest commanders, finest minds, great scholars, and boldest spirits have been of low birth. In his Subtleties, Cardano gives a reason why they are usually more capable than others in body and mind, and consequently more fortunate.[6564]

[6563] Burton. Printed page 317, dagger: "Corpore sunt & animo fortiores Spurii, plerumque ob amoris vehementiam, seminis crass. &c." Children born outside marriage are stronger in body and mind, generally because of the intensity of love, the thickness of the seed, etc. The final word is abbreviated in the source.

[6564] Editor. "Base" moves between low rank and birth outside marriage. The catalogue includes legendary as well as historical figures; Burton's parentage claims require individual checking. Cardano's marginal explanation belongs to early modern theories of generation and does not establish the abilities of children born outside marriage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Castruccius Castrucanus a poor child, found in the field, exposed to misery, became prince of Luke and Senes in Italy, a most compleat souldier, and a worthy captain; Machiavel compares him to Scipio or Alexander. And 'tis a wonderfull thing ([6565]saith he) to him that shall consider of it, that all those, or the greatest part of them, that have done the bravest exploits here upon earth, and excelled the rest of the nobles of their time, have been still born in some abject, obscure place, or of base and obscure abject parents.	Castruccio Castracani, a poor child found in a field and exposed to misery, became prince of Lucca and Siena in Italy, a thoroughly accomplished soldier and a worthy commander. Machiavelli compares him to Scipio or Alexander. It is a wonderful thing, he says, for anyone who considers it, that all those, or most of them, who have performed the greatest exploits on earth and surpassed the other great men of their time have invariably been born in some lowly, obscure place, or to poor, obscure, lowly parents.[6566]
A most memorable observation, [6567]Scaliger accompts it, & non prætereundum, maximorum virorum plerosque, patres ignoratos, matres impudicas fuisse. I could recite a great catalogue of them, every kingdome, every province will yeeld innumerable examples: and why then should baseness of birth be objected to any man?	Scaliger considers it a most memorable observation: "Nor should we pass over the fact that most of the greatest men had unknown fathers and unchaste mothers." I could list a vast catalogue of them: every kingdom, every province will supply countless examples. Why, then, should anyone have his low birth held against him?[6568]

[6565] Burton. Printed page 317, e: "Vita Castruccii. Nec præter rationem mirum videri debet, si quis rem considerare velit, omnes eos vel saltem maximam partem, qui in hoc terrarum orbe res præstantiores aggressi sunt, atque inter cæteros ævi sui heroas excelluerunt, aut obscuro, aut abjecto loco editos, & prognatos fuisse abjectis parentibus. Eorum ego Catalogum infinitum recensere possem." Life of Castruccio: it should reasonably seem remarkable, if anyone considers it, that all those, or at least most of those, who have undertaken outstanding deeds in this world and excelled among the other heroes of their age were born in an obscure or lowly place and descended from lowly parents. I could recount an endless catalogue of them.

[6566] Editor. Compare the opening of Machiavelli's Life of Castruccio Castracani, which supplies the account of obscure origins and the foundling narrative. Burton's Luke and Senes are rendered Lucca and Siena. His account is retained as a literary exemplum; its claims about parentage and dominion are not independently confirmed here.

[6567] Burton. Printed page 317, asterisk: "Exercit. 265." Scaliger, Exercises 265.

[6568] Editor. The transition from the Latin statement to "I could recite" is not clearly delimited in the print. The preceding Machiavelli marginal note itself ends with an equivalent claim about an endless catalogue. Scaliger's Exercises 265 remains to be collated before attributing each clause more precisely.

Original text 1651	Modern English
who thinks worse of Tully for being Arpinas, an upstart? Or Agathocles that Sicilian king for being a potters son? Iphicrates and Marius were meanly born. What wise man thinks better of any person for his nobility? as he said in [6569]Machiavel, omnes eodem patre nati, Adams sons, conceived all and born in sin, &c. We are by nature all as one, all alike, if you see us naked; let us wear theirs and they our clothes, and what's the difference?	Who thinks worse of Cicero for being a man from Arpinum, an upstart? Or of Agathocles, that Sicilian king, for being a potter's son? Iphicrates and Marius were of humble birth. What wise man thinks better of anyone because of his noble ancestry? As the speaker in Machiavelli said, "All born of the same father": sons of Adam, all conceived and born in sin, and so on. By nature we are all one, all alike, if you see us naked. Let us wear their clothes and them ours, and what is the difference?[6570]
To speak truth as [6571]Bale did of P. Schalichius, I more esteem thy worth, learning, honesty, then thy nobility; honour thee more that thou art a writer, a Doctor of divinity, then Earl of the Hunnes, Baron of Skradine, or hast title to such and such provinces, &c.	To speak the truth, as Bale did of P. Schalichius: I value your merit, learning, and integrity more than your nobility. I honour you more for being a writer and a doctor of divinity than for being Earl of the Huns, Baron of Skradine, or having a claim to this or that province, and so on.[6572]

[6569] Burton. Printed page 317, dagger: "Flor. hist. l. 3. Quod si nudos nos conspici contingat, omnium una eademque erit facies; nam si ipsi nostras, nos eorum vestes induamus, nos, &c." Florentine History, book 3: if we happen to be seen naked, everyone will look alike; for if they put on our clothes and we theirs, we, etc. The quotation breaks off as printed.

[6570] Editor. Tully is Marcus Tullius Cicero; Arpinas means a man of Arpinum. Burton resumes his catalogue of humble origins. The equality-and-clothing argument occurs in the unnamed insurgent's speech in Machiavelli's Florentine Histories 3.13; it is a character's speech, not an unqualified statement of the historian's own position.

[6571] Burton. Printed page 317, asterisk: "Ut merito dicam, quod simpliciter sentiam, Paulum Schalichium scriptorem, & doctorem, pluris facio quam Comitem Hunnorum, & Baronem Skradinum; Encyclopædiam tuam, & orbem disciplinarum omnibus provinciis antefero. Balæus epist. nuncupat. ad 5. cent. ultimam script. Brit." To say with reason what I frankly think: I value Paul Schalichius the writer and doctor more than the Count of the Huns and Baron of Skradin; I prefer your Encyclopaedia and the whole circle of disciplines to all provinces. Bale, dedicatory letter to the fifth and last century of British writers. The note continues across the foot of the page.

[6572] Editor. John Bale's praise contrasts Paul Schalichius's learning with his claimed titles. Both the titles and the abbreviated bibliographical reference are retained pending collation. "Honesty" means integrity; "century" in the margin denotes a group of a hundred writers, not a hundred years.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thou art more fortunate and great (so [6573]Jovius writes to Cosmus Medices then Duke of Florence) for thy vertues, then for thy lovely wife, and happy children, friends, fortunes, or great dutchy of Tuscany. So I accompt thee; and who doth not so indeed? [6574]Abdolominus was a gardner, and yet by Alexander for his vertues, made king of Syria.	You are more fortunate and greater for your virtues, so Giovio writes to Cosimo de' Medici, then Duke of Florence, than for your lovely wife and fortunate children, your friends, your wealth, or your great duchy of Tuscany. That is how I judge you; and who, indeed, does not? Abdolominus was a gardener, yet Alexander made him king of Syria for his virtues.[6575]
How much better is it to be born of mean parentage, & to excell in worth, to be morally noble, which is preferred before that naturall nobility, by divines, philosophers, and [6576]politicians, to be learned, honest, discreet, well qualified, to be fit for any manner of imploiment, in country and common-wealth, war and peace, then to be Degeneres Neoptolemi, as many brave nobles are, only wise because rich, otherwise idiots, illiterate, unfit for any manner of service?	How much better to be born of humble parents and excel in merit: to be morally noble, which theologians, philosophers, and political writers prefer to nobility by birth; to be learned, honest, judicious, and capable, fit for any employment in one's country and commonwealth, in war and peace; than to be "degenerate Neoptolemuses," as so many splendid nobles are, accounted wise only because they are rich, but otherwise fools, illiterate, and unfit for any service?[6577]

[6573] Burton. Printed page 317, dagger: "Præfat. hist. lib. 1. virtute tua major, quam aut Hetrusci imperii fortuna, aut numerosa & decora prolis fœlicitate beatior evadas." Preface to History, book 1: may you become greater through your virtue, and happier than through either the fortune of Tuscan rule or the happiness of a numerous and distinguished offspring.

[6574] Burton. Printed page 317, dagger: "Curtius." Quintus Curtius Rufus; compare History of Alexander 4.1.15–26.

[6575] Editor. Jovius is Paolo Giovio; Cosmus Medices is Cosimo de' Medici. Burton's formulation of the Tuscan title remains as printed. Curtius 4.1.15–26 tells of Abdalonymus's appointment at Sidon and also gives him royal ancestry, a qualification omitted here. Burton prints Abdolominus and calls his kingdom Syria.

[6576] Burton. Printed page 317, dagger: "Bodine de rep. lib. 3. cap. 8." Jean Bodin, On the Commonwealth, book 3, chapter 8.

[6577] Editor. Neoptolemus is a heroic name used here as an ironic type of the unworthy heir. "Brave" means splendid or showy, not necessarily courageous; "politicians" means writers on government. Moral nobility denotes worth acquired through character and conduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 317–318 [6578]Udalricus Earl of Cilia upbraided John Huniades with the baseness of his birth, but he replied, in te Ciliensis Comitatus turpiter extinguitur, in me gloriose Bistricensis exoritur, thine Earldome is consumed with riot, mine begins with honor and renown.	Ulrich, Earl of Cilia, reproached John Hunyadi with his low birth, but Hunyadi replied, “In you the earldom of Cilia dies shamefully; in me that of Bistritz rises gloriously”: your earldom is consumed by dissipation; mine begins with honour and renown.[6579]
Source page 318 Thou hast had so many noble ancestors; what is that to thee? Vix ea nostra voco, [6580]when thou art a disard thy self: quod prodest Pontice longo stemmate censeri? &c.	You have had so many noble ancestors: what is that to you? “I can scarcely call those things our own,” when you yourself are a fool. “What good is it, Ponticus, to be reckoned by a long pedigree?” And so on.[6581]

[6578] Burton. Printed page 317, dagger: “Æneas Silvius. lib. 2. cap. 29.” Aeneas Sylvius, book 2, chapter 29; the work is not specified here.

[6579] Editor. The reply contrasts inherited rank brought to a disgraceful end with a new earldom founded honourably. Cilia and Bistricensis are rendered Cilia and Bistritz; the exact source and historical circumstances of the Hunyadi anecdote remain to be collated. Burton’s Latin and separate English gloss are both retained.

[6580] Burton. Printed page 318, g: “If children be proud, haughty, foolish, they defile the nobility of their kindred, Eccl. 22.8.” If children are proud, haughty, and foolish, they disgrace the nobility of their family. Ecclesiasticus 22:8, as printed; compare 22:10 in the King James Version.

[6581] Editor. “Disard” means fool. Vix ea nostra voco comes from Ovid, Metamorphoses 13.140–141, where ancestry and deeds not done by oneself scarcely count as one’s own. The question adapts Juvenal 8.1–2: Burton prints quod and stemmate where the consulted text has quid and sanguine.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I conclude, hast thou a sound body, and a good soul, good bringing up? art thou vertuous, honest, learned, well qualified, religious, are thy conditions good? thou art a true nobleman, perfectly noble, although born of Thersites, —— dum modo tu sis —— Æacidæ similis, non natus, sed factus, noble κατ' ἐξοχήν; [6582]for neither sword, nor fire, nor water, nor sickness, nor outward violence, nor the divel himself can take thy good parts from thee.	I conclude: have you a sound body and a good soul, a good upbringing? Are you virtuous, honest, learned, capable, religious, and of good character? Then you are a true nobleman, perfectly noble, though born of Thersites, "provided that you yourself resemble the descendant of Aeacus": not born noble, but made so, noble in the fullest sense. For neither sword, fire, water, sickness, outward violence, nor the devil himself can take your good qualities from you.[6583]
Be not ashamed of thy birth then, thou art a gentleman all the world over, and shalt be honoured, when as he, strip him of his fine clothes, [6584]dispossess him of his wealth, is a funge (which [6585]Polynices in his banishment found true by experience, Gentry was not esteemed) like a piece of coin in another countrey, that no man will take, and shall be contemned.	Do not be ashamed of your birth, then: you are a gentleman throughout the world and will be honoured. As for him, strip him of his fine clothes and deprive him of his wealth, and he is a mere mushroom—as Polynices discovered in exile, when his gentility counted for nothing—like a foreign coin that no one will accept; he will be despised.[6586]

[6582] Burton. Printed page 318, dagger: "Cujus possessio nec furto eripi, nec incendio absumi, nec aquarum voragine absorberi, vel vi morbi destrui potest." Possession of it cannot be snatched away by theft, consumed by fire, swallowed by a whirlpool, or destroyed by the force of disease.

[6583] Editor. The Thersites comparison adapts Juvenal 8.269–271: better a contemptible father and an Achilles-like son than the reverse. The descendant of Aeacus is Achilles. The Greek means pre-eminently or in the fullest sense. "Conditions" means character; Burton's claim that inner worth cannot be lost is consolatory argument.

[6584] Burton. Printed page 318, y: "Send them both to some strange place naked ad ignotos, as Aristippus said, you shall see the difference. Bacons Essayes." Send them both naked to an unfamiliar place, among strangers, as Aristippus said, and you will see the difference. Bacon's Essays. The marginal marker is y, although the body has h.

[6585] Burton. Printed page 318, asterisk: "Familiæ splendor nihil opis attulit, &c." The splendour of his family brought no help, etc.

[6586] Editor. "Funge" means a fungus or mushroom, here a worthless person; the foreign coin makes rank depend on local recognition. In Euripides' Phoenician Women, Polynices tells Jocasta that noble birth did not feed him in exile. Diogenes Laertius, Life of Aristippus, likewise records the test of sending a wise and an unwise man naked among strangers. These comparisons are in English translation. Bacon's Apophthegms 255 supplies another parallel; Burton's Essays reference and immediate intermediaries remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Once more, though thou be a Barbarian, born at Tontonteac, a villain, a slave, a Saldanian Negro, or a rude Virginian in Dasamonquepeuc, he a French monseur, a Spanish don, a senior of Italy, I care not how descended, of what family, of what order, baron, count, prince, if thou be well qualified, and he not, but a degenerate Neoptolemus, I tell thee in a word, thou art a man, and he is a beast.	Once again, though you are a barbarian born at Tontonteac, a serf, a slave, a Black African from Saldania, or an uncultivated Virginian at Dasamonquepeuc, and he a French monsieur, a Spanish don, or an Italian signor—I do not care what his ancestry, family, or rank may be, baron, count, or prince—if you have good qualities and he has none, but is a degenerate Neoptolemus, I tell you in a word: you are a man, and he is a beast.[6587]

[6587] Editor. Burton's comparison draws on racial and colonial hierarchies while arguing that character outweighs both ancestry and geographical origin. "Villain" here is rendered serf, a person of low or dependent status; "senior" means signor. The travel names Tontonteac, Saldania, and Dasamonquepeuc are retained for later geographical collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Let no terra filius, or upstart, insult at this which I have said, no worthy Gentleman take offence. I speak it not to detract from such as are well deserving, truely vertuous and noble: I do much respect and honour true Gentry and Nobility; I was born of worshipful parents my self, in an ancient family, but I am a younger brother, it concernes me not:	Let no son of the soil or upstart crow over what I have said, and no worthy gentleman take offence. I do not say it to disparage those who deserve well and are truly virtuous and noble. I greatly respect and honour true gentry and nobility. I myself was born to parents of good standing, in an old family, but I am a younger brother: it does not concern me.[6588]
or had I been some great heir, richly endowed, so minded as I am, I should not have been elevated at all, but so esteemed of it, as of all other humane happiness, honours, &c. they have their period, are brittle and unconstant.	Even had I been some great heir, richly endowed, with my present outlook I should not have been puffed up at all. I should have valued it like every other human happiness, honours, and so on: they come to an end; they are fragile and unstable.

[6588] Editor. Terræ filius, "son of the earth," denotes someone of obscure birth; the source prints terra filius. "Insult" means exult or triumph over others. "Worshipful" denotes social respectability. Burton's declaration that he is a younger brother distances him from the principal family inheritance without denying his attachment to gentility.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As [6589]he said of that great river Danubius, it riseth from a small fountain, a little brook at first, sometimes broad, sometimes narrow, now slow, then swift, increased at last to an incredible greatness, by the confluence of 60 navigable rivers, it vanisheth in conclusion, loseth his name, and is suddenly swallowed up of the Euxine sea: I may say of our greatest families, they were mean at first, augmented by rich marriages, purchases, offices, they continue for some ages, with some little alteration of circumstances, fortunes, places, &c. by some prodigal son, for some default, or for want of issue, they are defaced in an instant, and their memory blotted outs.	As the writer said of that great river, the Danube: it rises from a small spring, at first a little brook, sometimes broad, sometimes narrow, now slow, then swift; at last, swollen to an incredible size by the meeting of sixty navigable rivers, it vanishes, loses its name, and is suddenly swallowed by the Black Sea. I may say the same of our greatest families. Humble at first, enlarged by rich marriages, purchases, and offices, they last for a few ages, with small changes in circumstances, fortunes, places, and so on. Then, through some prodigal son, some failure, or the lack of an heir, they are effaced in an instant and their memory blotted out.[6590]
So much in the mean time I do attribute to Gentility, that if he be well descended of worshipful or noble parentage, he will express it in his conditions.	Meanwhile I grant this much to good birth: if a man descends from parents of honourable or noble standing, he will show it in his character.
—— nec enim feroces Progenerant aquilæ columbas.	For fierce eagles Do not breed doves.[6591]

[6589] Burton. Printed page 318, i: “Fluvius hic illustris, humanarum rerum imago, quæ parvis ductæ sub initiis, in immensum crescunt, & subito evanescunt. Exilis hic primo fluvius, in admirandam magnitudinem excrescit, tandemque in mari Euxino evanescit. I. Stuckius peregr. mar. Euxini.” This famous river is an image of human affairs, which, springing from small beginnings, grow enormously and suddenly disappear. A slender river at first, it grows to a wonderful size and finally disappears in the Black Sea. I. Stuckius, Journey to the Black Sea; the abbreviated reference remains uncollated.

[6590] Editor. The Danube’s disappearance into the Euxine, or Black Sea, becomes an image of the extinction of great families. The count of sixty navigable tributaries and the Stuckius attribution are retained as Burton’s source-based claims. “Issue” means descendants; the source’s “blotted outs” is retained in the original column.

[6591] Editor. Horace, Odes 4.4.31–32. Burton adapts the wording: the consulted text says fierce eagles do not beget an unwarlike dove. This hereditary image qualifies his preceding insistence that noble character can arise independently of ancestry.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 318–319 And although the nobility of our times be much like our coins, more in number and value, but less in waight and goodnes, with finer stamps, cuts, or outsides, then of old: yet if he retain those ancient characters of true Gentry, he will be more affable, courteous, gently disposed, of fairer carriage, better temper, or a more magnanimous, heroicall & generous spirit, then that vulgus hominum, those ordinary boores & pesants, qui adeo improbi, agrestes, & inculti plerumque sunt, ne dicam malitiosi, ut nemini ullum humanitatis officium præstent, ne ipsi Deo si advenerit, as [6592]one observes of them, a rude brutish, uncivil, wilde, a currish generation, cruel and malicious, uncapable of discipline, and such as have scarce common sense.	Although the nobility of our times much resemble our coins—greater in number and nominal value, but less in weight and quality, with finer stamps, engravings, or surfaces than of old—if a man retains those ancient marks of true gentility, he will be more affable, courteous, and kindly, better behaved and tempered, or of a more magnanimous, heroic, and generous spirit than the common mass of men, those ordinary boors and peasants, "who are generally so wicked, rustic, and uncultivated, not to say malicious, that they would show no one any kindness, not even God himself if he came," as one writer observes of them: a rude, brutish, uncivil, wild, snarling breed, cruel and malicious, incapable of instruction, and scarcely possessed of common sense.[6593]
Source page 319 And it may be generally spoken of all, which [6594]Lemnius the Physitian said of his travel into England, the common people were silly, sullen, dogged clowns, sed mitior nobilitas, ad omne humanitatis officium paratissima, the gentlemen were courteous and civil.	And what the physician Lemnius said of his travels in England may be said generally of everyone: the common people were foolish, sullen, surly clowns, "but the gentry were gentler, most ready for every act of kindness"; the gentlemen were courteous and civil.[6595]

[6592] Burton. Printed page 319, k: "Sabinus in 6. Ovid. Met. fab. 4." Sabinus on Ovid's Metamorphoses, book 6, fable 4.

[6593] Editor. Burton now repeats a hostile generalization about peasants. The Latin is translated separately from his English expansion. Sabinus's reference points to commentary on Ovid, Metamorphoses 6; its precise wording remains uncollated. The contrast between nominal value and metal content continues the preceding coin imagery.

[6594] Burton. Printed page 319, l: "Lib. 1. de 4. complexionibus." Book 1, On the Four Complexions; the reference is to Lemnius.

[6595] Editor. Lemnius's observations are reported through Burton, not independently established as descriptions of English society. "Silly" here means foolish; "dogged" means surly or obstinate. The Latin says the gentry are gentler and ready to perform acts of kindness; Burton's English gloss follows it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If it so fall out (as often it doth) that such pesants are preferred by reason of their wealth, chance, errour, &c. or otherwise, yet as the cat in the fable, when she was turned to a fair maid, would play with mice; a cur will be a cur, a clown will be a clown, he will likely savor of the stock whence he came, and that innate rusticity can hardly be shaken off.	If such peasants happen to be advanced, as they often are, through their wealth, chance, mistake, or otherwise, still, like the cat in the fable who played with mice after being changed into a beautiful maiden, a cur will be a cur and a clown will be a clown. He will probably betray the stock he came from, and that inborn rusticity can scarcely be shaken off.[6596]
[6597]Licet superbus ambulet pecuniâ, Fortuna non mutat genus.	Though he struts proudly in his wealth, Fortune does not change his birth.[6598]
And though by their education, such men may be better qualified, and more refined; yet there be many symptomes, by which they may likely be descryed, an affected phantastical carriage, a tailor-like spruceness, a peculiar garb in all their proceedings; choicer then ordinary in his diet, and as [6599]Hierome well describes such a one to his Nepotian; An upstart born in a base cottage that scarce at first had course bread to fill his hungry guts, must now feed on kickshoes and made dishes, will have all variety of flesh and fish, the best oysters, &c.	Although education may make such men more capable and refined, there are many signs by which they can probably be detected: an affected, fanciful manner, a tailor's fussy smartness, a peculiar style in everything they do; more particular than others about their food. As Jerome aptly describes such a man to Nepotian: an upstart born in a lowly cottage, who at first scarcely had coarse bread to fill his hungry guts, must now feed on fancy delicacies and elaborate dishes, and have every variety of meat and fish, the finest oysters, and so on.[6600]

[6596] Editor. The transformed cat is a fable about the persistence of nature despite a change of appearance or station. Burton applies it to social origin. "Preferred" means promoted or advanced, and "savour of" means show traces of. The argument sits uneasily beside his defence of merit regardless of birth.

[6597] Burton. Printed page 319, asterisk: "Hor. ep. Od. 2." Horace, "ep. Od. 2," as printed; the lines are in Epodes 4.5–6.

[6598] Editor. Horace, Epodes 4.5–6, rather than the printed marginal citation. Burton changes ambules, "you walk," to ambulet, "he walks." The modern version follows his third-person wording. Fortune here includes acquired wealth and elevated social position.

[6599] Burton. Printed page 319, asterisk: "Lib. 2. ep. 15. Natus sordido tuguriolo & paupere domo, qui vix milio rugientem ventrem &c." Book 2, letter 15: born in a squalid little cottage and a poor house, who could scarcely [fill] his rumbling belly with millet, etc. Compare Jerome, Letter 52.6 in modern numbering.

[6600] Editor. Jerome, Letter 52.6 to Nepotian, attacks clerical luxury through the example of a poor-born man who becomes a connoisseur of costly food. Burton broadens the application to social climbers. "Kickshoes" are fancy delicacies; "made dishes" are elaborately prepared dishes. The older letter numbering is retained in the margin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A beggers brat will be commonly more scornful, imperious, insulting, insolent, then another man of his rank: [6601]Nothing so intolerable as a fortunate fool, as Tully found long since out of his experience;	A beggar's brat will commonly be more scornful, domineering, arrogant, and insolent than another man of his rank. Nothing is so intolerable as a prosperous fool, as Cicero discovered long ago from experience.[6602]
Asperius nihil est humili cum surgit in altum,	Nothing is harsher than a lowly man when he rises high,[6603]
set a begger on horseback, and he will ride a gallop a gallop, &c.	Set a beggar on horseback, and he will go galloping, galloping, and so on.
[6604]—— desævit in omnes Dum se posse putat, nec bellua sævior ulla est, Quam servi rabies in libera colla furentis;	He rages against everyone While he thinks he has the power; no beast is fiercer Than a slave's fury raging against freeborn necks.[6605]
he forgets what he was, domineers, &c. and many such other symptomes he hath, by which you may know him from a true Gentleman. Many errours and obliquities are on both sides, noble, ignoble, factis, natis; yet still in all callings, as some degenerate, some are well deserving, and most worthy of their honours.	He forgets what he was, bullies others, and so on; and he has many other such signs by which you may distinguish him from a true gentleman. There are many errors and faults on both sides, noble and lowborn, among those made noble and those born so. Yet in every calling, as some degenerate, others deserve well and are most worthy of their honours.[6606]

[6601] Burton. Printed page 319, dagger: "Nihil fortunato insipiente intolerabilius." Nothing is more intolerable than a prosperous fool.

[6602] Editor. Compare Cicero, On Friendship 54, where good fortune makes fools intolerable. Burton compresses the maxim. "Fortunate" means prosperous or favoured by fortune, rather than necessarily happy; "insulting" here includes boastful or overbearing conduct.

[6603] Editor. Claudian, Against Eutropius 1.181. The line means that no one is harsher than a lowly person raised to power; humili is the term of comparison. Burton follows it with the English proverb about putting a beggar on horseback.

[6604] Burton. Printed page 319, m: "Claud. l. 9 in Eutrop." Claudian, "book 9, Against Eutropius," as printed; compare Against Eutropius 1.181–184.

[6605] Editor. The continuation adapts Claudian, Against Eutropius 1.182–184. Burton has Dum se posse putat, "while he thinks he has power," for ut se posse putent, "so they think he has power"; sævior for taetrior; and colla, "necks," for terga, "backs." These substantive variants remain in both columns.

[6606] Editor. "Obliquities" are faults or deviations from right conduct. Factis, natis distinguishes those made noble from those born noble. After the attack on upstarts, Burton acknowledges failings and merit on both sides of the social divide.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as Busbequius said of Solyman the magnificent, he was tanto dignus imperio, worthy of that great Empire: Many meanly descended, are most worthy of their honour, politicè nobiles, and well deserve it. Many of our Nobility so born (which one said of Hephæstion, Ptolemeus, Seleucus, Antigonus, &c. and the rest of Alexanders followers, they were all worthy to be Monarchs and Generals of Armies) deserve to be Princes.	As Busbequius said of Suleiman the Magnificent, he was "worthy of so great an empire": worthy of that great empire. Many people of humble descent are most worthy of their honours, noble in public standing, and fully deserve them. Many of our hereditary nobles deserve to be princes, as someone said of Hephaestion, Ptolemy, Seleucus, Antigonus, and the rest of Alexander's followers: they were all worthy to be monarchs and generals of armies.[6607]
And I am so far forth of [6608]Sesellius his mind, that they ought to be preferred (if capable) before others, As being nobly born, ingenuously brought up, and from their infancy trained to all manner of civility. For learning and vertue in a Noble-man is more eminent, and as a Jewel set in gold, is more precious, and much to be respected, such a man deserves better then others, and is as great an honour to his family as his Noble family to him.	And I agree with Sesellius this far: if they are capable, they ought to be preferred to others, as people nobly born, liberally brought up, and trained from infancy in every form of civil conduct. For learning and virtue stand out more in a nobleman and, like a jewel set in gold, are more precious and worthy of regard. Such a man deserves more than others and does his family as much honour as his noble family does him.[6609]

[6607] Editor. Busbequius is the writer on Ottoman affairs cited for Suleiman. Politicè nobiles means noble in a civic or public sense, rather than necessarily by inherited descent. The exact Busbequius passage and the unnamed authority on Alexander's followers remain to be identified.

[6608] Burton. Printed page 319, asterisk: "Lib. 1. de Rep. Gal. Quoniam & commodiore utuntur conditione, & honestiore loco nati, jam inde à parvulis ad morum civilitatem educati sunt, & assuefacti." Book 1, On the French Commonwealth: because they enjoy a more favourable condition and, born into a more honourable station, have from their earliest childhood been educated and accustomed to civilized conduct.

[6609] Editor. Sesellius is the name used for Claude de Seyssel; the margin cites his work on the French monarchy. "Ingenuously" means with the education appropriate to a freeborn gentleman. The condition "if capable" matters: Burton's preference for noble birth is not wholly unconditional.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In a word, many Noblemen are an ornament to their order: many poor mens sons are singularly well endowed, most eminent, and well deserving for their worth, wisdome, learning, vertue, valour, integrity; excellent members & pillers of a Common-wealth. And therefore to conclude that which first I intended, to be base by birth, meanly born, is no such disparagement. Et sic demonstratur, quod erat demonstrandum.	In a word, many noblemen adorn their order; many poor men's sons are exceptionally gifted, outstanding, and deserving through their merit, wisdom, learning, virtue, courage, and integrity: excellent members and pillars of a commonwealth. And therefore, to conclude what I first set out to show, being of low birth, humbly born, is no such disgrace. And thus what was to be demonstrated has been demonstrated.[6610]

[6610] Editor. The Latin closes the argument with the formula "what was to be demonstrated," familiar from formal proofs. Member 2 ends here. Burton's conclusion retains the tension between inherited social advantage and the worth of poor men's sons.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 320 MEMB. 3. Against poverty and want, with such other adversities.	Member 3 Against poverty and want and other such adversities
One of the greatest miseries that can befal a man, in the worlds esteem, is poverty or want, which makes men steal, bear false witness, swear, forswear, contend, murder and rebel, which breaketh sleep, & causeth death it self. οὐδὲν πενίας βαρύτερόν ἐστι φορτίον, no burden (saith [6611]Menander) so intolerable as poverty: it makes men desperate, it erects and dejects, census honores, census amicitias; mony makes, but poverty mars, &c. and all this in the worlds esteem:	One of the greatest miseries that can befall a man, in the world's estimation, is poverty or want. It makes men steal, bear false witness, swear, perjure themselves, quarrel, murder, and rebel; it breaks their sleep and causes death itself. "No burden is heavier than poverty": no burden, says Menander, is so intolerable as poverty. It makes men desperate; it raises and casts down. "Wealth brings honours, wealth brings friendships": money makes, but poverty mars, and so on—and all this in the world's estimation.[6612]
yet if considered aright, it is a great blessing in it self, an happy estate, and yields no such cause of discontent, or that men should therefore account themselves vile, hated of God, forsaken, miserable, unfortunate. Christ himself was poor, born in a manger, and had not a house to hide his head in all his life, [6613]lest any man should make poverty a judgement of God, or an odious estate.	Yet rightly considered, poverty is a great blessing in itself, a happy condition. It gives no such cause for discontent, or for people to reckon themselves worthless, hated by God, abandoned, miserable, or unfortunate. Christ himself was poor, born in a manger, and had no house to shelter his head throughout his life, lest anyone regard poverty as a judgement of God or a hateful condition.[6614]

[6611] Burton. Printed page 320, n: "Nullum paupertate gravius onus." No burden is heavier than poverty.

[6612] Editor. The Greek maxim attributed to Menander means "No burden is heavier than poverty"; its exact textual source remains uncollated. The Latin fragment recalls Ovid, Fasti 1.217–218. Burton repeatedly qualifies this account of poverty as the world's judgement before reversing it in the next paragraph.

[6613] Burton. Printed page 320, o: "Ne quis iræ divinæ judicium putaret, aut paupertas exosa foret. Gualt. in cap. 2. ver. 18. Lucæ." Lest anyone think it a judgement of divine wrath, or poverty become hateful. Gualther on Luke, chapter 2, verse 18, as printed; the precise commentary passage remains uncollated.

[6614] Editor. Burton is making a Christian consolatory argument about poverty, drawing on Christ's birth and lack of a settled home. The original's sweeping formulation is preserved. The marginal Gualther reference, including the printed Luke 2:18, needs comparison with the commentary.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as he was himself, so he informed his Apostles and Disciples, they were all poor, Prophets poor, Apostles poor (Act. 3. Silver and gold have I none) As sorrowing (saith Paul) and yet alway rejoycing, as having nothing, and yet possessing all things, 1 Cor. 6.10.	And as he was himself, so he shaped his apostles and disciples: they were all poor, prophets poor, apostles poor—"Silver and gold have I none," Acts 3. "As sorrowing," says Paul, "and yet always rejoicing; as having nothing, and yet possessing all things," 1 Corinthians 6:10.[6615]
Your great Philosophers have been voluntarily poor, not only Christians, but many others. Crates Thebanus was adored for a god in Athens, [6616]a noble man by birth, many servants he had, an honourable attendance, much wealth, many Manors, fine apparel; but when he saw this, that all the wealth of the world was but brittle, uncertain, and no whit availing to live well, he flung his burden into the sea, and renounced his estate.	Great philosophers have chosen poverty, not only Christians but many others. Crates of Thebes was revered as a god in Athens. Noble by birth, he had many servants, a distinguished retinue, great wealth, many estates, and fine clothes. But when he saw that all the world's wealth was fragile, uncertain, and of no help in living well, he flung his burden into the sea and renounced his property.[6617]

[6615] Editor. "Informed" means formed or instructed. The first quotation is Acts 3:6. The second is 2 Corinthians 6:10, although Burton prints 1 Corinthians; his citation is retained in the modern column and corrected here.

[6616] Burton. Printed page 320, p: "Inter proceres Thebanos numeratus, lectum habuit genus, frequens famulitium, domus amplas, &c. Apuleius Florid. l. 4." Counted among the foremost Thebans, he had distinguished ancestry, a numerous household of servants, spacious houses, etc. Apuleius, Florida, book 4; compare section 22. The body's marker resembles q, while the margin is p.

[6617] Editor. Apuleius, Florida 22, describes Crates's former wealth and the reverence paid to him at Athens. The consulted passage breaks off after declaring wealth useless for living well; it does not contain the act of throwing his possessions into the sea. That added tradition remains to be traced.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Those Curii and Fabritii will be ever renowned for contempt of these fopperies, wherewith the world is so much affected. Amongst Christians I could reckon up many Kings and Queens, that have forsaken their crowns and fortunes, and wilfully abdicated themselves from these so much esteemed toyes, [6618]many that have refused honours, titles, and all this vain pomp and happiness, which others so ambitiously seek, and carefully study to compass and attain.	Those Curii and Fabricii will always be renowned for despising these foolish trifles with which the world is so taken. Among Christians I could list many kings and queens who have abandoned their crowns and fortunes, and willingly relinquished these highly prized toys; many who have refused honours, titles, and all this empty pomp and happiness, which others seek so ambitiously and scheme so anxiously to obtain.[6619]
Riches I deny not are Gods good gifts, and blessings, and honor est in honorante, honours are from God; both rewards of vertue, and fit to be sought after, sued for, and may well be possessed; yet no such great happiness in having, or misery in wanting of them.	I do not deny that riches are God's good gifts and blessings, and "honour lies in the one who confers it": honours come from God. Both are rewards of virtue, fit to be sought and petitioned for, and may rightly be possessed. Yet there is no such great happiness in having them, or misery in lacking them.[6620]
Dantur quidem bonis, saith Austin, ne quis mala æstimet: malis autem ne quis nimis bona, good men have wealth that we should not think it evil; and bad men that they should not rely on or hold it so good; as the rain fals on both sorts, so are riches given to good and bad, sed bonis in bonum, but they are good only to the godly.	"They are given to the good," says Augustine, "so that no one should think them evil; and to the bad, so that no one should think them too good." Good men have wealth so that we should not think it evil, and bad men so that they should not rely on it or esteem it so highly. As rain falls on both sorts, riches are given to good and bad, "but to the good for good": they are good only to the godly.[6621]

[6618] Burton. Printed page 320, q: "P. Blesensis ep. 72. & 232. oblatos respui honores ex onere metiens; motus ambitiosos rogatus non ivi, &c." Peter of Blois, letters 72 and 232: I rejected the honours offered to me, judging them by their burden; "ambitious impulses … when invited I did not go," etc. The final Latin is irregular and its wording and references require collation.

[6619] Editor. The Curii and Fabricii are exemplary Roman names invoked for austere conduct. "Fopperies" and "toys" belittle wealth and honours; "wilfully" means deliberately or willingly. The Peter of Blois quotation is retained, including its awkward final clause, pending comparison with the cited letters.

[6620] Editor. Honor est in honorante means honour resides in the person who gives it. Burton joins this maxim to the claim that honours come from God. His concession is that wealth and rank can be legitimate goods, while their possession does not guarantee happiness.

[6621] Editor. Compare Augustine, Sermon 105/A.1: riches are given to good people so they will not be thought evil, and to bad people so they will not be thought a great good. Burton's Latin and his separate English explanation are both preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But [6622]conferre both estates, for natural parts they are not unlike; and a beggars child, as [6623]Cardan well observes, is no whit inferior to a Princes, most part better; and for those accidents of fortune, it will easily appear there is no such odds, no such extraordinary happiness in the one, or misery in the other.	But compare the two conditions: in natural abilities they are not unlike. A beggar's child, as Cardano aptly observes, is in no way inferior to a prince's, and is usually better. As for those accidents of fortune, it will readily appear that there is no such great difference, no extraordinary happiness in one condition or misery in the other.[6624]

[6622] Burton. Printed page 320, r: "Sudat pauper foras in opere, dives in cogitatione; hic os aperit oscitatione, ille ructatione; gravius ille fastidio, quam hic inedia cruciatur. Ber. ser." The poor man sweats outside at work, the rich man in thought; the former opens his mouth in yawning, the latter in belching; the rich man is more severely tormented by surfeit than the poor man by hunger. Bernard, sermon; no number is supplied.

[6623] Burton. Printed page 320, dagger: "In Hyperchen. Natura æqua est, puerosque videmus mendicorum nulla ex parte regum filiis dissimiles, plerumque saniores." In Hyperchen, as abbreviated: nature is equal, and we see beggars' children in no respect unlike kings' sons, and generally healthier. The work title remains unresolved.

[6624] Editor. "Confer" means compare; "parts" means abilities or endowments; "accidents" are outward circumstances rather than inherent qualities. The Cardano margin says beggars' children are generally healthier, while Burton's body says generally better. The difference is retained; the abbreviated title remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 320–321 He is rich, wealthy, fat, what gets he by it? pride, insolency, lust, ambition, cares, feares, suspicion, trouble, anger, emulation, and many filthy diseases of body and minde. He hath indeed variety of dishes, better fare, sweet wine, pleasant sawce, dainty musick, gay clothes, Lords it bravely out, &c. and all that which Micillus admired in [6625]Lucian, but with them he hath the gout, dropsies, apoplexies, palsies, stone, pox, rheumes, chatarres, crudities, oppilations, [6626]Melancholy, &c. lust enters in, anger, ambition, according to [6627]Chrysostome, the sequel of riches is pride, riot, intemperance, arrogancy, fury, and all irrational courses.	He is rich, wealthy, fat: what does he gain by it? Pride, insolence, lust, ambition, cares, fears, suspicion, trouble, anger, rivalry, and many foul diseases of body and mind. He certainly has a variety of dishes, better food, sweet wine, pleasant sauces, exquisite music, splendid clothes, and struts about magnificently as a lord, with all that Micillus admired in Lucian. But along with these he has gout, dropsy, apoplexy, palsy, stones, the pox, rheums, catarrhs, indigestion, obstructions, melancholy, and so on. Lust enters, anger, ambition; according to Chrysostom, the consequences of riches are pride, dissipation, excess, arrogance, fury, and every irrational course.[6628]
Source page 321 [6629]—— turpi fregerunt sæcula luxu Divitiæ molles ——	Softening riches have broken the age With shameful luxury.[6630]

[6625] Burton. Printed page 320, s: “Gallo Tom. 2.” The Cock, volume 2; Lucian’s dialogue.

[6626] Burton. Printed page 320, dagger: “Et è contubernio fœdi atque olidi ventris mors tandem educit. Seneca ep. 103.” And death finally leads [us] out of companionship with a foul and stinking belly. Seneca, letter 103, as printed; compare Letter 102.27.

[6627] Burton. Printed page 321, asterisk: “Divitiarum sequela, luxus, intemperies, arrogantia, superbia, furor injustus, omnisque irrationalis motus.” The consequences of riches: luxury, excess, arrogance, pride, unjust rage, and every irrational impulse.

[6628] Editor. These are Burton’s traditional disease categories and moral associations. “Crasie” below means infirm. Lucian’s The Cock features Micillus, usually called Micyllus. The Seneca marginal quotation adapts Letter 102.27, not the printed 103: there the soul’s departure is compared with release from the body, not a diagnosis of melancholy.

[6629] Burton. Printed page 321, dagger: “Juven. Sat. 6.” Juvenal, Satire 6; compare lines 299–300.

[6630] Editor. Juvenal, Satires 6.299–300, on the destructive effects of luxury. Molles suggests softness or enervation. The modern lines give a fresh translation of Burton’s quotation and preserve its two-line display.

Original text 1651	Modern English
with their variety of dishes, many such maladies of body and mind get in, which the poor man knowes not of. As Saturn in [6631]Lucian, answered the discontented commonalty, (which because of their neglected Saturnal feasts in Rome, made a grievous complaint and exclamation against rich men) that they were much mistaken in supposing such happiness in riches;	With their variety of dishes, many such maladies of body and mind slip in, of which the poor man knows nothing. As Saturn in Lucian answered the discontented common people, who complained bitterly and cried out against the rich because their Saturnalian feasts in Rome had been neglected: they were much mistaken in supposing riches brought such happiness.[6632]
[6633]you see the best (said he) but you know not their several gripings and discontents: they are like painted wals, fair without, rotten within: diseased, filthy, crasie, full of intemperances effects; [6634]And who can reckon half? if you but knew their fears, cares, anguish of mind and vexation, to which they are subject, you would hereafter renounce all riches.	You see the best of it, he said, but you do not know their various pains and discontents. They are like painted walls, fine outside and rotten within: diseased, filthy, infirm, full of the effects of excess. And who can reckon half of them? If you only knew the fears, cares, mental anguish, and vexation to which they are subject, you would renounce all riches from then on.
[6635]O si pateant pectora divitum, Quantos intus sublimis agit Fortuna metus? Brutia Coro Pulsante fretum mitior unda est.	Oh, if the hearts of the rich lay open, What fears does lofty Fortune stir within? The Bruttian sea, when the northwest wind Beats upon it, has gentler waves.[6636]
O that their breasts were but conspicuous, How full of fear within, how furious? The narrow Seas are not so boisterous.	Oh, if only their hearts could be seen, How full of fear within, how furious! The narrow seas are not so stormy.

[6631] Burton. Printed page 321, u: “Saturn. Epist.” Saturnalian Letters, by Lucian.

[6632] Editor. Lucian’s Saturnalian Letters 25–30 supplies Saturn’s consolatory reply to the poor, describing the anxieties, illness, and dependence of the rich. Burton compresses and adapts the dialogue. His wall image is retained; the consulted translation instead compares wealthy people to theatrical costumes, splendid outside and wretched within.

[6633] Burton. Printed page 321, x: “Vos quidem divites putatis felices, sed nescitis eorum miserias.” You indeed think the rich happy, but you do not know their miseries.

[6634] Burton. Printed page 321, y: “Et quota pars hæc eorum quæ istos discruciant? si nossetis metus & curas, quibus obnoxii sunt, planè fugiendas vobis divitias existimaretis.” And how small a part is this of what torments them? If you knew the fears and cares to which they are subject, you would certainly consider riches something to avoid.

[6635] Burton. Printed page 321, dagger: “Seneca in in Herc. Oeteo.” Seneca, in Hercules Oetaeus. The repeated “in” is printed in the margin; compare lines 648–651.

[6636] Editor. Hercules Oetaeus 648–651, transmitted among Seneca’s tragedies with disputed authorship. Burton prints divitum for ditum and mitior for the consulted lenior. Corus is the northwest wind; the Bruttian sea is off southern Italy. Burton’s three-line English rendering follows the fresh translation as a separate verse unit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yea, but he hath the world at will that is rich, the good things of the earth: suave est de magno tollere acervo, he is a happy man, [6637]adored like a God, a Prince, every man seeks to him, applauds, honours, admires him.	Yes, but the rich man has the world at his command, the good things of the earth: "It is pleasant to draw from a great heap." He is a happy man, revered like a god or a prince; everyone courts him, applauds, honours, and admires him.[6638]
He hath honours indeed, abundance of all things: but (as I said) withal [6639]pride, lust, anger, faction, emulation, fears, cares, suspicion enter with his wealth; for his intemperance he hath aches, crudities, gowts, and as fruits of his idleness, and fulness, lust, surfeiting and drunkenness, all manner of diseases: pecuniis augetur improbitas, the wealthier, the more dishonest.	He has honours indeed, and an abundance of everything; but, as I said, pride, lust, anger, faction, rivalry, fears, cares, and suspicion enter with his wealth. For his excesses he has aches, indigestion, and gout; and as the fruits of his idleness, overindulgence, lust, gluttony, and drunkenness, every kind of disease. "Wickedness increases with money": the wealthier, the more dishonest.[6640]
[6641]He is exposed to hatred, envy, peril and treason, fear of death, of degradation, &c. 'tis lubrica statio & proxima præcipitio, and the higher he climbs, the greater is his fall.	He is exposed to hatred, envy, danger, and treachery, to fear of death, of losing his rank, and so on. It is "a slippery station on the edge of a precipice"; the higher he climbs, the greater his fall.
[6642]—— celsæ graviora casu Decidunt turres, feriuntque summos Fulgura montes,	Tall towers fall with a heavier crash, And lightning strikes The highest mountains.[6643]

[6637] Burton. Printed page 321, z: "Et diis similes stulta cogitatio facit." And foolish thinking makes them like gods.

[6638] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.1.51: it is pleasant to draw from a large stockpile. Burton prints de where the consulted text has ex. The apparent advantage of wealth is voiced as an objection before the catalogue of its accompanying troubles resumes.

[6639] Burton. Printed page 321, a: "Flamma simul libidinis ingreditur; ira, furor & superbia, divitiarum sequela. Chrys." At the same time the flame of lust enters; anger, rage, and pride are the consequences of riches. Chrysostom.

[6640] Editor. The passage links luxury with moral and bodily disorders within Burton's consolatory argument. "Crudities" means imperfect digestion or undigested matter; "emulation" means rivalry. The Chrysostom passages are quoted without an exact work or section and remain to be collated.

[6641] Burton. Printed page 321, b: "Omnium oculis, odio, insidiis expositus, semper solicitus, fortunæ ludibrium." Exposed to everyone's eyes, hatred, and plots, always anxious, the plaything of fortune.

[6642] Burton. Printed page 321, c: "Hor. 2. l. od. 10." Horace, Odes, book 2, ode 10; compare lines 10–12.

[6643] Editor. Horace, Odes 2.10.10–12. Burton prints the irregular graviora for graviore; the modern rendering gives the clear comparative sense, "with a heavier crash." The Latin has lightning striking high mountains; Burton's following English gloss transfers the lightning to towers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
the lightning commonly sets on fire the highest towers; [6644]in the more eminent place he is, the more subject to fall.	Lightning commonly sets the highest towers on fire; the more exalted his position, the more liable he is to fall.
Rumpitur innumeris arbos uberrima pomis, Et subito nimiæ præcipitantur opes.	The most fruitful tree breaks under its countless apples, And excessive wealth suddenly comes crashing down.[6645]
As a tree that is heavy laden with fruit, breaks her own boughs, with their own greatness they ruine themselves: which Joachimus Camerarius hath elegantly expressed in his 13. Embleme, cent. 1. Inopem se copia fecit. Their means is their misery, though they do apply themselves to the times, to lye, dissemble, collogue and flatter their leiges, obey, second his will and commands, as much as may be, yet too frequently they miscarry, they fat themselves like so many hogs, as [6646]Æneas Sylvius observes, that when they are full fed, they may be devoured by their princes, as Seneca by Nero was served, Sejanus by Tiberius, and Haman by Ahasuerus:	As a tree heavily laden with fruit breaks its own boughs, they ruin themselves by their own greatness. Joachim Camerarius has elegantly expressed this in emblem 13 of his first century: "Its abundance made it poor." Their means are their misery. Though they adapt themselves to the times, lie, dissemble, cajole and flatter their sovereign, obeying and supporting his will and commands as far as possible, all too often they come to grief. They fatten themselves like so many hogs, as Aeneas Sylvius observes, so that, once well fed, they may be devoured by their princes, as Nero dealt with Seneca, Tiberius with Sejanus, and Ahasuerus with Haman.[6647]

[6644] Burton. Printed page 321, d: "Quid me felicem toties jactastis amici? Qui cecidit, stabili non fuit ille loco. Boeth." Why have you so often proclaimed me happy, my friends? The man who fell was not in a stable place. Boethius; compare Consolation of Philosophy 1, metre 1.21–22. Burton's second line differs from the consulted text.

[6645] Editor. Direct inspection of Camerarius's first century, emblem XIII, confirms this couplet beneath the fruit tree and its fallen branches. The wording agrees with Burton apart from spelling and punctuation. Excessive abundance causes collapse; Burton's separate prose gloss follows. This comparison verifies the consulted printed witness, without identifying Burton's particular copy or edition.

[6646] Burton. Printed page 321, asterisk: "Ut postquam impinguati fuerint, devorentur." So that after they have been fattened they may be devoured.

[6647] Editor. "Century" means a hundred emblems. The inspected Camerarius image reads Me copia perdit, "Abundance destroys me"; Burton instead prints Inopem se copia fecit, "Its abundance made it poor." His wording remains unchanged. "Collogue" means cajole or flatter. The three favourites exemplify dependence on a ruler; the Aeneas Sylvius fattening image remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I resolve with Gregory, potestas culminis, est tempestas mentis; & quo dignitas altior, casus gravior, honour is a tempest, the higher they are elevated, the more grievously depressed.	I conclude with Gregory: “Power at the summit is a tempest of the mind; and the higher the dignity, the heavier the fall.” Honour is a tempest: the higher they are raised, the more grievously they are cast down.[6648]
Source page 321–322 For the rest of his prerogatives which wealth affords, as he hath more, his expences are the greater. When goods increase, they are increased that eat them; and what good cometh to the owners, but the beholding thereof with the eyes? Eccles. 4.10.	As for the other advantages his wealth affords, the more he has, the greater his expenses. “When goods increase, so do those who consume them; and what benefit do their owners receive except the sight of them?” Ecclesiastes 4:10.[6649]
Source page 322 [6650]Millia frumenti tua triverit area centum, Non tuus hinc capiet venter plus quam meus ——	Your threshing floor may have threshed a hundred thousand measures of grain; Your stomach will take no more from it than mine.[6651]

[6648] Editor. Gregory the Great, Pastoral Rule 1.9, asks what the power of high office is but a tempest of the mind. Burton recasts the question as a maxim and joins it to a further sentence about the greater fall from higher rank; that added clause remains to be located.

[6649] Editor. Burton’s Ecclesiastes 4:10 corresponds to 5:11 in the King James Version. His numbering is retained in the modern text; the later reference to verse 12 similarly points to the harmful riches of 5:13. “Prerogatives” means advantages or privileges.

[6650] Burton. Printed page 322, asterisk: “Hor.” Horace; the grain quotation.

[6651] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.1.45–46. Burton prints hinc and quam where the consulted text has hoc and ac. A vast harvest cannot enlarge its owner’s stomach. The unit “measures” is supplied in the modern rendering to make the elliptical number intelligible.

Original text 1651	Modern English
an evil sickness Salomon cals it, and reserved to them for an evil, 12. verse. They that will be rich fall into many fears and temptations, into many foolish and noisome lusts, which drown men in perdition. 1 Tim. 6.9. gold and silver hath destroyed many, Ecclus 8.2. divitiæ sæculi sunt laquei diaboli: so writes Bernard; Worldly wealth is the devils bait; and as the Moon when she is fuller of light is still farthest from the Sun, the more wealth they have, the farther they are commonly from God.	Solomon calls it "a grievous sickness," wealth "kept by its owners to their harm," verse 12. "Those who want to be rich fall into many fears and temptations, into many foolish and harmful desires, which drown men in destruction." 1 Timothy 6:9. "Gold and silver have destroyed many," Ecclesiasticus 8:2. "The riches of this world are the devil's snares," writes Bernard: worldly wealth is the devil's bait. And just as the moon is always farthest from the sun when it is fullest of light, the more wealth people have, the farther they commonly are from God.[6652]
(If I had said this of my self, rich men would have pulled me a pieces; but hear who saith, and who seconds it, an Apostle) therefore St James bids them weep and howle for the miseries that shall come upon them; their gold shall rust and canker, and eat their flesh as fire, James 5.1,2,3.	If I had said this on my own authority, rich men would have torn me to pieces. But listen to who says it, and who supports it: an apostle. Saint James therefore tells them to "weep and howl for the miseries that will come upon them"; their gold will rust and corrode, and eat their flesh like fire, James 5:1–3.

[6652] Editor. The scriptural citations are adapted, not exact transcriptions. "Noisome" means harmful, and "lusts" means desires more broadly than sexual desire. The Bernard maxim's precise source remains unlocated. The moon comparison is Burton's moral analogy, not an explanation of physical distance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I may then boldly conclude with [6653]Theodoret, quotiescunque divitiis affluentem &c. As often as you shall see a man abounding in wealth, qui gemmis bibit & Serrano dormit in ostro, and naught withal, I beseech you call him not happy, but esteem him unfortunate, because he hath many occasions offered to live unjustly: on the other side, a poor man is not miserable, if he be good, but therefore happy, that those evil occasions are taken from him.	I may then confidently conclude with Theodoret, "Whenever you see someone abounding in riches," and so on: whenever you see a man overflowing with wealth, "who drinks from jewelled cups and sleeps in Tyrian purple," yet is wicked, I beg you not to call him happy. Reckon him unfortunate, because he has so many opportunities to live unjustly. Conversely, a poor man is not miserable if he is good, but happy precisely because those opportunities for wrongdoing have been taken from him.[6654]
[6655]Nor possidentem multa vocaveris Rectè beatum; rectius occupat Nomen beati, qui deorum Muneribus sapienter uti, Duramque callet pauperiem pati, Pejusque letho flagitium timet.	You cannot rightly call a man happy for owning much; More rightly does he bear The name of happy who knows How to use the gods' gifts wisely, How to endure harsh poverty, And fears disgrace more than death.[6656]
He is not happy that is rich, And hath the world at will, But he that wisely can Gods gifts Possess and use them still: That suffers and with patience Abides hard poverty, And chuseth rather for to dye; Then do such villany.	The happy man is not the rich man Who has the world at his command, But the man who can wisely possess And always use God's gifts; Who suffers and patiently Endures harsh poverty, And chooses death rather Than commit such wickedness.

[6653] Burton. Printed page 322, e: "cap. 6. de curat. græc. affect. cap. de providentia; quotiescunque divitiis affluentem hominem videmus, eumque pessimum, ne quæso hunc beatissimum putemus, sed infelicem censeamus, &c." Chapter 6 of the Cure of Greek Maladies, the chapter on providence: whenever we see a man abounding in riches, and thoroughly wicked, let us not, I beg you, think him most happy, but reckon him unfortunate, and so on.

[6654] Editor. The Theodoret reference requires collation against the cited chapter on providence. Within the quotation Burton inserts an adaptation of Virgil, Georgics 2.506: his gemmis bibit and Serrano dormit replace gemma bibat and Sarrano dormiat. "Naught" means morally bad; "occasions" are opportunities or inducements.

[6655] Burton. Printed page 322, f: "Hor. l. 2. od. 9." Horace, book 2, ode 9; the printed reference is retained.

[6656] Editor. Horace, Odes 4.9.45–50, not the printed book 2, ode 9. The scan reads Nor for Latin Non, an apparent printing error retained in the original column; the modern rendering follows the clear negative sense. Burton's separate English verse follows, with "God" singular where the Latin has "gods."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Wherein now consists his happiness? what priviledges hath he more then other men? Or rather what miseries, what cares and discontents hath he not more then other men?	Where, then, does his happiness lie? What advantages does he have over other men? Or rather, what miseries, cares, and discontents does he not have in greater measure than others?
[6657]Non enim gazæ, neque consularis Summovet lictor miseros tumultus Mentis, & curas laqueata circum Tecta volantes.	For neither treasures nor a consul's Lictor can drive away the mind's Miserable turmoil, or the cares that fly Around panelled ceilings.[6658]
Nor treasures, nor majors officers remove The miserable tumults of the mind: Or cares that lie about, or flye above Their high-roofed houses, with huge beams combind.	Neither treasures nor a mayor's officers remove The mind's miserable turmoil, Or the cares that lie about or fly above Their lofty houses, joined with massive beams.
Source page 322–323 'Tis not his wealth can vindicate him, let him have Jobs inventory, sint Crœsi & Crassi licet, non hos Pactolus aureas undas agens, eripat unquam è miseriis, Crœsus or rich Crassus cannot now command health, or get himself a stomack.	His wealth cannot rescue him, even if his possessions rival Job's: "Let them be Croesuses and Crassuses; not even Pactolus, rolling its golden waters, could ever snatch them from misery." Croesus or wealthy Crassus cannot command health or buy himself an appetite.[6659]

[6657] Burton. Printed page 322, g: "Hor. lib. 2." Horace, book 2.

[6658] Editor. Horace, Odes 2.16.9–12. A lictor was an attendant of a Roman magistrate; Burton's English verse substitutes a mayor's officers. Laqueata tecta are panelled or coffered ceilings. Both the fresh translation and his distinct English rendering are retained.

[6659] Editor. "Vindicate" means rescue or set free, and "stomack" means appetite. Job's inventory evokes his great possessions. Croesus and Crassus are proverbial rich men; Pactolus is the river associated with gold. The precise source of this Latin sentence remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 323 [6660]His Worship, as Apuleius describes him, in all his plenty and great provision, is forbidden to eat, or else hath no appetite, (sick in bed, can take no rest, sore grieved with some chronick disease, contracted with full dyet and ease, or troubled in mind) when as in the mean time, all his houshold are merry, and the poorest servant that he keeps, doth continually feast.	His Worship, as Apuleius describes him, amid all his abundance and plentiful supplies, is forbidden to eat, or else has no appetite. He lies sick in bed, unable to rest, grievously afflicted by some chronic disease brought on by rich food and ease, or troubled in mind. Meanwhile, his whole household is merry, and even his poorest servant continually feasts.[6661]
'Tis Bracteata felicitas, as [6662]Seneca terms it, tin-foyl'd happiness, infelix felicitas, an unhappy kind of happiness, if it be happiness at all. His gold, guard, clattering of harness, and fortifications against outward enemies, cannot free him from inward fears and cares.	It is "happiness plated with thin metal," as Seneca calls it: happiness covered in tinfoil, "unhappy happiness," an unhappy kind of happiness, if it is happiness at all. His gold, his guards, the clatter of armour, and his fortifications against external enemies cannot free him from inward fears and cares.[6663]
Reveraque metus hominum, curæque sequaces Nec metuunt fremitus armorum, aut ferrea tela, Audacterque inter reges, regumque potentes Versantur, neque fulgorem reverentur ab auro.	For human fears and the cares that dog us Fear neither the clash of arms nor iron weapons; They move boldly among kings and those powerful among kings, And feel no awe before the gleam of gold.[6664]

[6660] Burton. Printed page 323, h: "Florid. lib. 4. Dives ille cibo interdicitur, & in omni copia sua cibum non accipit, cum interea totum ejus servitium hilare sit, atque epuletur." Florida, book 4: that rich man is forbidden food and eats nothing amid all his abundance, while his whole household of servants is merry and feasts.

[6661] Editor. Compare the final passage of Apuleius's Florida, on a rich man unable to eat while his servants feast. Burton expands it with illness, sleeplessness, and dietary explanation. "His Worship" is a respectful social title used pointedly here.

[6662] Burton. Printed page 323, i: "Epist. 115." Seneca, Letter 115.

[6663] Editor. Seneca, Letter 115.9: the outwardly splendid have bratteata felicitas, happiness overlaid with a thin metal covering. Burton's Bracteata spelling and his "tin-foyl'd" gloss are retained separately. "Harness" means armour.

[6664] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 2.48–51. Burton prints fremitus for sonitus, aut ferrea for nec fera, and regumque for rerumque. The last change makes the phrase concern power among kings rather than power over affairs; the translation follows Burton. His own English verse follows as a separate unit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Indeed men still attending fears and cares, Nor armours clashing, nor fierce weapons fears: With Kings converse they boldly, and Kings Peers, Fearing no flashing that from gold appeares.	Indeed, the fears and cares that always attend men Fear neither clashing armour nor fierce weapons. They boldly keep company with kings and their peers, Unafraid of any glittering gold.
Look how many servants he hath, and so many enemies he suspects; for liberty he entertains ambition; his pleasures are no pleasures; & that which is worst, he cannot be private or enjoy himself as other men do, his state is a servitude.	Count his servants, and you count the enemies he suspects. In place of freedom he harbours ambition. His pleasures are no pleasures; and worst of all, he cannot live privately or enjoy his own company as other men do: his high position is a form of slavery.[6665]
[6666]A country man may travel from kingdome to kingdome, province to province, city to city, and glut his eyes with delightful objects, hawk, hunt, and use those ordinary disports, without any notice taken, all which a Prince or a great man cannot do. He keeps in for state, ne majestatis dignitas evilescat, as our China kings, of Bornay, and Tartarian Chams, those aurea mancipia, are said to do, seldome or never seen abroad, ut major sit hominum erga se observantia, which the [6667]Persian Kings so precisely observed of old.	A countryman may travel from kingdom to kingdom, province to province, and city to city, feast his eyes on delightful sights, hawk, hunt, and enjoy these ordinary recreations without attracting notice. A prince or great man can do none of this. He stays indoors to preserve his dignity, "lest the honour of majesty be cheapened," as the kings of China and Borneo and the Tartar khans—those "golden slaves"—are said to do. They are seldom or never seen abroad, "so that people may hold them in greater reverence," a practice the ancient Persian kings observed so scrupulously.[6668]

[6665] Editor. Compare Seneca, Letter 47.5, and Macrobius, Saturnalia 1.11.13, for the proverb equating servants with enemies. Both authors add that masters make them enemies. Burton's "state" here is rank and its accompanying ceremonial obligations.

[6666] Burton. Printed page 323, k: "Hor. & mihi curto Ire licet mulo vel si libet usque Tarentum." Horace: and I may ride on a dock-tailed mule, all the way to Tarentum if I wish.

[6667] Burton. Printed page 323, asterisk: "Brissonius." Brisson; the precise passage remains to be collated.

[6668] Editor. The marginal Horace quotation adapts Satires 1.6.104–105. "Bornay" denotes Borneo, and "Chams" are khans. Burton reports generalizations about Asian rulers; the Brisson source and their historical application remain uncollated. Aurea mancipia means enslaved people whose condition is gilded by luxury.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A poor man takes more delight in an ordinary meals meat, which he hath but seldom, then they do with all their exotick dainties and continual Viands; Quippe voluptatem commendat rarior usus, 'tis the rarity and necessity that makes a thing acceptable and pleasant. Darius put to flight by Alexander, drank puddle water to quench his thirst, and it was pleasanter he swore then any wine or Mede.	A poor man takes more pleasure in an ordinary meal, which he seldom has, than they do in all their foreign delicacies and constant supplies of food. "Infrequent use makes pleasure more welcome": rarity and need make a thing agreeable and pleasant. Darius, put to flight by Alexander, drank muddy water to quench his thirst and swore that it tasted better than any wine or mead.[6669]
All excess as [6670]Epictetus argues, will cause a dislike; Sweet will be sour; which made that temperate Epicurus sometimes voluntarily fast. But they being alwayes accustomed to the same dishes, (which are nastily dressed by slovenly cooks, that [6671]after their obscenities, never wash their bawdy hands) be they fish, flesh, compounded, made dishes, or whatsoever else, are therefore cloyed; Nectar self grows loathsome to them, they are weary of all their fine palaces, they are to them but as so many prisons.	Every excess, as Epictetus argues, produces disgust: sweetness turns sour. That is why the temperate Epicurus sometimes fasted voluntarily. But the rich, always accustomed to the same dishes—filthily prepared by slovenly cooks who never wash their foul hands after their dirty acts—grow sick of them, whether fish, meat, elaborate mixed dishes, or anything else. Nectar itself becomes loathsome to them; they tire of all their splendid palaces, which become so many prisons.[6672]

[6669] Editor. Compare Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 5.97, where Darius enjoys muddy water during his flight because he is truly thirsty. Burton's version adds the explicit comparison with wine and mead. "Meat" commonly means food, not just animal flesh.

[6670] Burton. Printed page 323, asterisk: "Si modum excesseris, suavissima fiunt molesta." If you exceed moderation, the sweetest things become disagreeable.

[6671] Burton. Printed page 323, l: "Et in cupediis gulæ, coquus & pueri illotis manibus ab exoneratione ventris omnia tractant, &c. Cardan. l. 8. cap. 46 de rerum varietate." And in preparing delicacies for the palate, the cook and the boys handle everything with hands unwashed after emptying their bowels, and so on. Cardano, On the Variety of Things, book 8, chapter 46.

[6672] Editor. The body's deliberately coarse account of cooks is preserved; Cardano's marginal Latin specifically refers to unwashed hands after defecation. The exact Epictetus maxim, Epicurus fasting example, and Cardano passage remain to be collated. "Made dishes" are elaborately prepared dishes; nectar is the gods' drink.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A poor man drinks in a wooden dish, and eats his meat in wooden spoons, wooden platters, earthen vessels, and such homely stuffe: the other in gold, silver, and precious stones; but with what success? in auro bibitur venenum, fear of poyson in the one, security in the other.	A poor man drinks from a wooden bowl and eats his food with wooden spoons, from wooden platters, earthenware vessels, and other humble utensils. The rich man uses gold, silver, and precious stones. But with what result? "Poison is drunk from gold": fear of poison in the one case, safety in the other.[6673]
A poor man is able to write, to speak his mind, to do his own business himself; locuples mittit parasitum saith [6674]Philostratus, a rich man imployes a parasite, and as the Major of a City, speaks by the Town-clark, or by M[r] Recorder, when he cannot express himself.	A poor man can write, speak his mind, and conduct his business himself. "The rich man sends a parasite," says Philostratus: he employs a hanger-on and, like a city's mayor, speaks through the town clerk or the Recorder when he cannot express himself.[6675]
Source page 323–324 [6676]Nonius the Senator hath a purple coat as stiffe with jewels, as his mind is full of vices; rings on his fingers worth 20000 sestercies, and as [6677]Perox the Persian King, an union in his eare worth 100[l] weight of gold:	Nonius the senator has a purple coat as stiff with jewels as his mind is full of vices, rings on his fingers worth twenty thousand sesterces, and, like Perox the Persian king, a pearl in his ear worth a hundred pounds' weight of gold.[6678]

[6673] Editor. The Latin contrasts precious drinking vessels with the risk of poison. "Security" here means safety. Burton's opposition between the rich man's danger and the poor man's peace is part of the consolatory argument, not an impartial account of either condition.

[6674] Burton. Printed page 323, asterisk: "Epist." Letters; the precise Philostratus letter remains unidentified.

[6675] Editor. A "parasite" is a dependent hanger-on or flatterer who lives at another's expense. The Recorder is a civic legal officer. The Philostratus letter is not numbered in Burton's margin and remains to be identified.

[6676] Burton. Printed page 323, dagger: "Plin. lib. 57. cap. 6." Pliny, book 57, chapter 6, as printed.

[6677] Burton. Printed page 323, asterisk: "Zonaras 3. annal." Zonaras, Annals, 3, as printed.

[6678] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 37.81–82, describes Nonius's opal ring, valued there at two million sesterces, not Burton's twenty thousand. The margin prints book 57, although Pliny's work has 37 books. Burton's figures and moral portrait are retained. "Union" means a large pearl; the Perox/Zonaras anecdote requires collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 324 [6679]Cleopatra hath whole boars and sheep served up to her table at once, drinks Jewels dissolved 40000 sestercies in value; but to what end?	Cleopatra has whole boars and sheep brought to her table at once and drinks dissolved jewels worth forty thousand sesterces. But to what purpose?[6680]
[6681]Num tibi cum fauces urit sitis, aurea quæris Pocula? ——	When thirst burns your throat, do you ask For golden cups?[6682]
Doth a man that is a dry desire to drink in gold? Doth not a cloth suite become him as well, and keep him as warm, as all their silks, satins, damasks, taffaties and tissues? Is not home-spun cloth as great a preservative against cold, as a coat of Tartar Lambs wooll, died in grain, or a gown of Giants beards?	Does a thirsty man long to drink from gold? Does a woollen suit not become him as well and keep him as warm as all their silks, satins, damasks, taffetas, and cloth of gold or silver? Is homespun cloth not as good a protection against the cold as a coat of Tartar lamb's wool dyed deep scarlet, or a gown made from giants' beards?[6683]
Nero, saith [6684]Sueton, never put on one garment twice, and thou hast scarce one to put on; What's the difference? one's sick, the other sound: such is the whole tenor of their lives, and that which is the consummation & upshot of all, death it self makes the greatest difference.	Nero, says Suetonius, never wore a garment twice, while you scarcely have one to put on. What is the difference? One is sick, the other healthy. Such is the whole course of their lives; and death itself, the conclusion and outcome of it all, makes the greatest difference.[6685]

[6679] Burton. Printed page 324, dagger: "Plutarch. vit. ejus" Plutarch, his or her life, as printed; compare the Life of Antony.

[6680] Editor. Plutarch, Antony 28.2–4, describes eight boars roasting because the meal's timing was uncertain; they were not all to be served at once. Pliny, Natural History 9.119–121, tells how Cleopatra dissolved one pearl in vinegar and drank it; the umpire stopped her from destroying the second. His wager is ten million sesterces. This English comparison locates the pearl story but does not explain Burton's forty-thousand figure or authenticate the event.

[6681] Burton. Printed page 324, asterisk: "Hor. Ser. lib. 1. Sat. 2." Horace, Satires, book 1, satire 2.

[6682] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.2.114–115. The following English question is Burton's own gloss and is also retained.

[6683] Editor. "A dry" means thirsty; "cloth" here denotes woollen fabric, while "tissues" are rich fabrics woven with precious metal. "Died in grain" refers to a deep, fast red dye. Tartar lamb's wool and the gown of giants' beards carry exotic or fabulous associations; their particular sources remain uncollated.

[6684] Burton. Printed page 324, dagger: "Cap. 30. nullam vestem bis induit." Chapter 30: he never put on any garment twice.

[6685] Editor. Suetonius, Nero 30.3, supplies the statement that Nero never wore a garment twice. The ensuing hen and falcon comparison reverses earthly and final conditions: humble fare leads to the lord's table, luxury to the dungheap.

Original text 1651	Modern English
One like an hen feeds on the dunghil all his daies, but is served up at last to his Lords table; the other as a Falcon is fed with partridge and pigeons, and carried on his masters fist, but when he dyes is flung to the muckhil, and there lies.	One, like a hen, feeds on the dunghill all his days, but is finally served at his lord's table. The other, like a falcon, is fed partridges and pigeons and carried on his master's fist, but when he dies he is thrown on the muckheap and left there.
The rich man lives like Dives jovially here on earth, temulentus divitiis, make the best of it; and boasts himself in the multitude of his riches, Psal. 49.6,11. he thinks his house called after his own name, shall continue for ever; but he perisheth like a beast, ver. 20. his way utters his folly, ver. 13. male parta, male dilabuntur; like sheep they lye in the grave, 14. Puncto descendunt ad infernum. They spend their dayes in wealth, and go suddenly down to hell, Job 21.13.	The rich man lives merrily here on earth like Dives, "drunk with riches"—make the most of it—and "boasts of the abundance of his wealth," Psalm 49:6, 11. He thinks his house, called by his own name, will last for ever; but "he perishes like a beast," verse 20; "his way reveals his folly," verse 13. "Ill-gotten goods come to an ill end"; "like sheep they lie in the grave," verse 14. "In a moment they descend to hell": "They spend their days in wealth and suddenly go down to hell," Job 21:13.[6686]
For all Physicians and medicines inforcing nature, a sowning wife, families complaints, friends tears, Dirges, Masses, nænia's, funerals, for all Orations, counterfeit hired acclamations, Elogiums, Epitaphs, herses, heralds, black mourners, solemnities, obelisks, and Mausolean tombs, if he have them at least, [6687]he like a hog, goes to hell with a guilty conscience (propter hos dilatavit infernus os suum) and a poor mans curse:	Despite physicians and medicines straining to sustain nature, a swooning wife, his family's lamentations, his friends' tears, dirges, masses, funeral songs, and obsequies; despite speeches, insincere hired applause, eulogies, epitaphs, funeral biers, heralds, mourners in black, ceremonies, obelisks, and monumental tombs—if he even has them—he goes to hell like a hog, with a guilty conscience and a poor man's curse: "Because of these men, hell has enlarged its mouth."[6688]

[6686] Editor. Dives is the conventional name for the rich man in Luke 16:19–31; the Latin word itself means rich. Burton combines that parable with Psalm 49 and Job 21:13. His language presents wealth through intoxication, folly, and judgement, without qualifying every statement about rich people.

[6687] Burton. Printed page 324, m: "Ad generum Cereris sine cæde & sanguine pauci Descendunt reges, & sicca morte tyranni." Few kings descend to Ceres's son-in-law without slaughter and bloodshed, and few tyrants die a bloodless death.

[6688] Editor. "Sowning" means swooning. Næniae are funeral laments; "herses" can denote funeral structures or biers, rather than modern motor vehicles. "Mausolean" evokes grand tombs. The Latin adapts Isaiah 5:14. The marginal verse is Juvenal, Satire 10.112–113, with sanguine for vulnere; Ceres's son-in-law is Pluto, ruler of the underworld.

Original text 1651	Modern English
his memory stinks like the snuffe of a candle when it is put out; scurril libels, and infamous obloquies accompany him. When as poor Lazarus is Dei sacrarium, the Temple of God, lives and dies in true devotion, hath no more attendants, but his own innocency, the heaven a tomb, desires to be dissolved, buried in his mothers lap, and hath a company of [6689]Angels ready to convey his soul into Abrahams bosom, he leaves an everlasting and a sweet memory behind him.	His memory stinks like a candle's burnt wick when it is put out; scurrilous lampoons and disgraceful accusations follow him. Poor Lazarus, meanwhile, is "God's sanctuary," the temple of God. He lives and dies in true devotion, attended only by his innocence, with the sky for his tomb. He longs to depart this life and be buried in his mother's lap, and a company of angels stands ready to carry his soul into Abraham's bosom. He leaves an enduring and sweet memory behind.[6690]
Crassus and Sylla are indeed still recorded, but not so much for their wealth, as for their victories: Crœsus for his end, Solomon for his wisdome. In a word, [6691]to get wealth is a great trouble, anxiety to keep, grief to lose it.	Crassus and Sulla are indeed still remembered, but more for their victories than their wealth; Croesus for his end, Solomon for his wisdom. In a word, acquiring wealth is a great trouble, keeping it an anxiety, and losing it a grief.[6692]
[6693]Quid dignum stolidis mentibus imprecer? Opes, honores ambiant: Et cum falsa gravi mole paraverint, Tum vera cognoscant bona.	What fitting curse shall I call down on foolish minds? Let them pursue wealth and honours; And when, at immense cost, they have obtained false goods, Then let them learn what the true goods are.[6694]

[6689] Burton. Printed page 324, n: "God shall deliver his soule from the power of the grave, Psal. 49.15." God will deliver his soul from the power of the grave, Psalm 49:15.

[6690] Editor. Lazarus and Abraham's bosom refer to Luke 16. "His mother's lap" is the earth; the wish to be "dissolved" evokes departure from bodily life. Burton opposes the rich man's elaborate funeral to the poor man's innocence and heavenly reception.

[6691] Burton. Printed page 324, asterisk: "Contempl. Idiot. Cap. 37. divitiarum acquisitio magni laboris, possessio magni timoris, amissio magni doloris." The Contemplation of the Unlearned Man, chapter 37: acquiring riches entails great labour, possessing them great fear, and losing them great sorrow.

[6692] Editor. "Recorded" means remembered in historical writing. Burton's summary of Crassus, Sulla, Croesus, and Solomon is rhetorical and selective. The Contemplatio Idiotae reference is retained as printed; its authorship, edition, and chapter wording require collation.

[6693] Burton. Printed page 324, dagger: "Boethius de consol. phil. l. 3." Boethius, The Consolation of Philosophy, book 3.

[6694] Editor. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 3, metre 8.19–22. The wish is an ironic curse: let foolish people acquire the false goods they seek and then discover the true ones. Gravi mole conveys burdensome effort or cost, not false weights and measures.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But consider all those other unknown, concealed happinesses, which a poor man hath (I call them unknown, because they be not acknowledged in the worlds esteem, or so taken) O fortunatos nimium bona si sua norint: happy they are in the mean time if they would take notice of it, make use, or apply it to themselves. A poor man wise is better then a foolish king, Eccl. 2.13.	But consider all the other unrecognised, hidden blessings a poor man possesses. I call them unrecognised because the world does not acknowledge or regard them as blessings. "Oh, how fortunate they are, if only they knew their own good fortune!" Happy they are already, if only they would recognise it, make use of it, or apply it to themselves. "A wise poor man is better than a foolish king," Ecclesiastes 2:13.[6695]
[6696]Poverty is the way to heaven, [6697]the mistress of philosophy, [6698]the mother of religion, vertue, sobriety, sister of innocency, and an upright mind. How many such encomiums might I adde out of the Fathers, Philosophers, Orators?	Poverty is the road to heaven, the teacher of philosophy, the mother of religion, virtue, and sobriety, the sister of innocence and an upright mind. How many such praises could I add from the Church Fathers, philosophers, and orators?[6699]

[6695] Editor. The exclamation adapts Virgil, Georgics 2.458, omitting its next word, agricolas, "farmers." Burton applies it to the poor. His Ecclesiastes 2:13 should be compared with 4:13, where the wise poor person is a child and the foolish king is old; those distinctions are absent from his wording.

[6696] Burton. Printed page 324, o: "Austin in Ps. 76. omnis Philosophiæ magistra, ad cælum via." Augustine on Psalm 76: the teacher of all philosophy, the road to heaven.

[6697] Burton. Printed page 324, p: "Bonæ mentis soror paupertas" Poverty is the sister of a sound mind.

[6698] Burton. Printed page 324, q: "Pædagoga pietatis sobria, pia mater, cultu simplex, habitu secura, consilio benesuada. Apul." A sober tutor of piety, a devoted mother, simple in manner of life, secure in bearing, persuasive in good counsel. Apuleius.

[6699] Editor. "Mistress" means teacher. The marginal sayings do not follow Burton's English list exactly. Apuleius, Apology 18.2, supplies cultu simplex, habitu secura, consilio benesuada, but not the whole composite quotation. The "sister of a sound mind" maxim occurs in Petronius, Satyricon 84, in the speech of the poor poet Eumolpus: Burton extracts a general maxim from fictional dialogue. The Augustine attribution and immediate intermediaries remain unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 324–325 It troubles many that are poor, they accompt of it as a great plague, curse, a sign of Gods hatred, ipsum scelus, damn'd villany it self, a disgrace, shame and reproach; but to whom, or why? [6700]If fortune hath envyed me wealth, thieves have robbed me, my father have not left me such revenues as others have, that I am a younger brother, basely born,	Many poor people are troubled by their poverty. They regard it as a great affliction, a curse, a sign of God's hatred, "wickedness itself," damned villainy itself, a disgrace, a shame, and a reproach. But a reproach to whom, or why? If fortune has begrudged me wealth, thieves have robbed me, or my father has not left me the income others inherit; if I am a younger brother, of humble birth—[6701]
Source page 325 —— cui sine luce genus, surdumque parentum —— nomen,	Whose lineage has no lustre, whose parents' name is unheard—[6702]
of mean parentage, a dirt-daubers son, am I therefore to be blamed? an Eagle, a Bull, a Lion is not rejected for his poverty, and why should a man? 'Tis [6703]fortunæ telum, non culpa, fortunes fault not mine.	Of humble parentage, the son of a mud-plasterer, am I therefore to blame? An eagle, bull, or lion is not rejected for its poverty: why should a man be? It is "fortune's blow, not a fault": fortune's fault, not mine.[6704]

[6700] Burton. Printed page 325, r; body dagger: "Cardan. Opprobrium non est paupertas: quod latro eripit, aut pater non reliquit, cur mihi vitio daretur, si fortuna divitias invidit? non aquilæ, non &c." Cardano: poverty is no disgrace. Why should it be held against me if a robber takes something away, or my father did not leave it to me, if fortune begrudged me riches? Not to an eagle, not, and so on.

[6701] Editor. "Plague" means an affliction, while ipsum scelus means wickedness itself. Burton voices the shame attached to poverty before challenging it. A younger brother might lack the principal inheritance; the passage does not assume that all poverty has one cause.

[6702] Editor. Silius Italicus, Punica 8.246–247, describes obscure ancestry with illi sine luce genus, surdumque parentum nomen. Burton adapts illi to cui and uses the fragment in a defence against shame over low birth.

[6703] Burton. Printed page 325, asterisk: "Tully." Cicero; the exact passage remains unlocated.

[6704] Editor. A "dirt-dauber" works with mud or plaster. Fortunæ telum literally means fortune's weapon or blow; culpa is fault or blame. Burton's ensuing "fortune's fault, not mine" is his separate gloss. The exact Ciceronian source remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Good Sir, I am a servant (to use [6705]Seneca's words) howsoever your poor friend; a servant, and yet your chamberfellow, and if you consider better of it, your fellow servant. I am thy drudge in the worlds eyes, yet in Gods sight peradventure thy better, my soule is more precious, and I dearer unto him.	Good sir, I am a servant—to use Seneca's words—but still your humble friend; a servant, yet your companion under the same roof, and, if you think more carefully, your fellow servant. In the world's eyes I am your drudge, but perhaps in God's sight I am your better: my soul is more precious, and I am dearer to him.[6706]
Etiam servi diis curæ sunt, as Evangelus at large proves in †Macrobius, the meanest servant is most precious in his sight.	"Even slaves are objects of the gods' care," as Evangelus proves at length in Macrobius: the humblest servant is most precious in his sight.[6707]
Thou art an Epicure, I am a good Christian: Thou art many parasanges before me in means, favour, wealth, honour, Claudius his Narcissus, Nero's Massa, Domitians Parthenius, a favourite, a golden slave; thou coverest thy floors with marble, thy roofs with gold, thy wals with statues, fine pictures, curious hangings, &c. what of all this? calcas opes, &c. whats all this to true happiness?	You are an Epicure; I am a good Christian. You are many leagues ahead of me in means, favour, wealth, and honour: a Narcissus to Claudius, a Massa to Nero, a Parthenius to Domitian, a favourite, a golden slave. You cover your floors with marble, your ceilings with gold, your walls with statues, fine pictures, exquisite tapestries, and so on. What of it all? "You tread upon riches," and so forth: what does any of this have to do with true happiness?[6708]

[6705] Burton. Printed page 325, dagger: "Epist. 74. servus sumne homo; servus sum, immo contubernalis; servus sum, at humilis amicus, immo conservus si cogitaveris" Letter 74. The first clause is typographically difficult, provisionally read sumne. The intended series is: I am a slave, but a human being; a slave, indeed a companion under the same roof; a slave, but a humble friend, indeed a fellow slave if you reflect.

[6706] Editor. The argument adapts Seneca, Letter 47.1, rather than the margin's 74, changing Seneca's statements about slaves into the servant's first-person appeal. The first marginal clause is unclear in the scan and provisionally transcribed sumne; its intended human-equality claim is clear from the cited parallel. "Servant" overlaps with the ancient condition of slavery.

[6707] Editor. Macrobius, Saturnalia 1.11.1–14: Praetextatus defends slaves' humanity and divine care against Evangelus's objection. Burton assigns the defence to Evangelus instead. The dagger before Macrobius has no separately identifiable marginal entry and is retained; the later Letters 66 and 90 entry belongs with Seneca.

[6708] Editor. "Epicure" here means a pleasure-seeker, not a neutral label for Epicurus's philosophy. A parasang is an ancient distance measure; "many leagues" preserves the comparison without imposing a precise conversion. The named imperial favourites, especially "Nero's Massa," require historical collation. "Curious" means exquisitely wrought.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I live and breath under that glorious heaven, that August Capitol of nature, enjoy the brightness of stars, that cleer light of Sun and Moon, those infinite creatures, plants, birds, beasts, fishes, herbs, all that sea and land affords, far surpassing all that art and opulentia can give.	I live and breathe beneath that glorious sky, nature's majestic Capitol. I enjoy the brightness of the stars, the clear light of sun and moon, the countless creatures, plants, birds, beasts, fish, and herbs: everything sea and land provide, far surpassing all that art and wealth can give.
I am free, and which [6709]Seneca said of Rome, culmen liberos texit, sub marmore et auro postea servitus habitavit, thou hast Amaltheæ cornu, plenty, pleasure, the world at will, I am despicable and poor; but a word overshot, a blow in choler, a game at tables, a loss at sea, a sudden fire, the Princes dislike, a little sickness, &c. may make us equal in an instant;	I am free; and, as Seneca said of Rome, "A roof sheltered free men; afterwards slavery lived beneath marble and gold." You possess Amalthea's horn: abundance, pleasure, the world at your command. I am despised and poor. But a rash word, a blow struck in anger, a game of tables, a loss at sea, a sudden fire, the ruler's displeasure, a brief illness, and so on, may make us equals in an instant.[6710]
howsoever take thy time, triumph and insult a while, cinis æquat, as [6711]Alphonsus said, death will equalize us all at last. I live sparingly, in the mean time, am clad homely, fare hardly; is this a reproach? am I the worse for it? am I contemptible for it? am I to be reprehended?	Meanwhile, enjoy your moment; triumph and lord it over me for a while. "Ashes make us equal," as Alfonso said: death will make us all equal at last. In the meantime I live frugally, dress plainly, and eat poor food. Is that a disgrace? Am I the worse for it? Does it make me contemptible? Am I to be blamed?[6712]

[6709] Burton. Printed page 325, dagger at Seneca: "Epist. 66. & 90." Letters 66 and 90.

[6710] Editor. Compare Seneca, Letter 90.10: culmus, "straw," sheltered free men, while slavery lives beneath marble and gold. Burton prints culmen, "roof," adds postea, and changes habitat to habitavit; the modern rendering follows him. Amalthea's horn is the horn of plenty. "Tables" is a board game of the backgammon family.

[6711] Burton. Printed page 325, asterisk: "Panormitan. rebus gestis Alph." Panormita, on the deeds of Alfonso.

[6712] Editor. "Insult" means triumph or exult over someone, not merely speak abusively. Cinis æquat means ashes make equal. The attribution to Alfonso through Panormita remains to be checked against the cited work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A learned man in [6713]Nevissanus was taken down for sitting amongst Gentlemen, but he replyed, my nobility is about the head, yours declines to the taile, and they were silent. Let them mock, scoffe and revile, 'tis not thy scorn, but his that made thee so; He that mocketh the poor, reproacheth him that made him, Prov. 11.5. and he that rejoyceth at affliction, shall not be unpunished.	A learned man in Nevizzano was rebuked for sitting among gentlemen, but replied, "My nobility is about my head; yours descends towards the tail." They fell silent. Let them mock, sneer, and abuse you: their scorn falls on the one who made you as you are. "Whoever mocks the poor reproaches their maker," Proverbs 11:5, "and whoever rejoices at affliction will not go unpunished."[6714]
For the rest, the poorer thou art, the happier thou art, ditior est, at non melior, saith [6715]Epictetus, he is richer, not better then thou art, not so free from lust, envy, hatred, ambition.	For the rest, the poorer you are, the happier you are. "He is richer, but not better," says Epictetus: richer than you, not better, nor so free from lust, envy, hatred, and ambition.[6716]

[6713] Burton. Printed page 325, s: "Lib. 4. num. 218. quidam deprehensus quod sederet loco nobilium, mea nobilitas, ait, est circa caput, vestra declinat ad caudam." Book 4, number 218: a man rebuked for sitting among the nobility said, My nobility is about my head; yours slopes down towards the tail.

[6714] Editor. The head-and-tail reply contrasts intellectual worth with inherited status. The Nevizzano anecdote needs collation. The scriptural quotation is Proverbs 17:5, not the printed 11:5; Burton's reference is retained in the modern column and corrected here.

[6715] Burton. Printed page 325, t: "Tanto beatior es, quanto collectior." You are happier the more inwardly composed you are.

[6716] Editor. Compare Epictetus, Enchiridion 44: greater wealth does not establish that a person is better. Burton extends the point into his claim about poverty and freedom from passions. The marginal collectior means more composed or collected within oneself; it does not literally mean poorer.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Beatus ille qui procul negotiis Paterna rura bobus exercet suis.	Happy the man who, far from business, Ploughs his ancestral fields with his own oxen.[6717]
Happy he, in that he is [6718]freed from the tumults of the world, he seeks no honours, gapes after no preferment, flatters not, envies not, temporizeth not, but lives privately, and well contented with his estate;	Happy because he is free from the world's turmoil: he seeks no honours, hungers for no advancement, neither flatters nor envies nor trims his conduct to the times, but lives privately, well content with his condition.[6719]
Nec spes corde avidas, nec curam pascit inanem, Securus quo fata cadant.	He nourishes neither greedy hopes nor empty care in his heart, Untroubled by how the fates may fall.[6720]

[6717] Editor. Horace, Epodes 2.1 and 3, with the intervening line omitted. In the full poem the praise of rural life is eventually revealed as the speech of a moneylender who returns to lending. Burton extracts it as consolation; the omitted line is not silently supplied.

[6718] Burton. Printed page 325, u: "Non amoribus inservit, non appetit honores, & qualitercunque relictus satis habet, hominem se esse meminit, invidet nemini, neminem despicit, neminem miratur; sermonibus malignis non attendit aut alitur. Plinius." He does not serve his passions or seek honours; however he is left, he has enough; he remembers he is human, envies no one, despises no one, admires no one, and neither attends to nor feeds on malicious talk. Pliny.

[6719] Editor. The Pliny margin adapts Letters 7.26.2, a description of conduct during illness, here transferred to the contented poor man. Burton's qualitercunque relictus differs from Pliny's quantulumcumque, ut relicturus. "Temporize" means accommodate oneself opportunistically to prevailing circumstances.

[6720] Editor. Poliziano, Rusticus 24–25. Burton prints Nec twice where the consulted text has Non and substitutes fata, "fates," for sceptra, "sceptres." The modern translation follows his wording; the political context of the original helps explain the following paragraph.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 325–326 He is not troubled with state matters, whether kingdomes thrive better by succession or election; whether Monarchies should be mixt, temperate, or absolute; the house of Ottomons and Austria is all one to him; he enquires not after Colonies or new discoveries; whether Peter were at Rome, or Constantines donation be of force; what comets or new stars signifie, whether the earth stand or move, there be a new world in the Moon, or infinite worlds, &c. He is not touched with fear of invasions, factions, or emulations;	He is untroubled by affairs of state: whether kingdoms prosper better through hereditary succession or election; whether monarchies should be mixed, limited, or absolute. The Ottoman and Austrian houses are all the same to him. He does not inquire about colonies or new discoveries; whether Peter was in Rome, or Constantine's Donation has legal force; what comets or new stars signify; whether the earth stands still or moves; whether there is a new world in the moon, or infinitely many worlds, and so on. He is untouched by fear of invasions, factions, or rivalries.[6721]
Source page 326 [6722]Felix ille animi, divisque simillimus ipsis, Quem non mordaci resplendens gloria fuco Solicitat, non fastosi mala gaudia luxus, Sed tacitos sinit ire dies, & paupere cultu [6723]Exigit innocuæ tranquilla silentia vitæ.	Happy in spirit, and most like the gods themselves, Is he whom glory, glittering in corrosive paint, does not entice, Nor the evil pleasures of arrogant luxury; He lets his days pass quietly and, living simply, Spends an innocent life in tranquil silence.[6724]
An happy Soule, and like to God himself, Whom not vain glory macerates or strife, Or wicked joyes of that proud swelling pelfe, But leads a still, poor and contented life.	A happy soul, like God himself, Worn down neither by vain glory nor by strife, Nor by the wicked pleasures of that proud, swollen wealth, But leading a quiet, poor, contented life.

[6721] Editor. "Mixt" and "temperate" distinguish mixed or limited forms of monarchy from absolute rule. The Ottoman and Austrian houses are rival dynastic powers. Peter's presence at Rome and Constantine's Donation are controversies about ecclesiastical authority. Burton includes contemporary cosmological questions in the catalogue of worries the contented man escapes.

[6722] Burton. Printed page 326, x: "Politianus in Rustico." Poliziano, in Rusticus.

[6723] Burton. Printed page 326, y: "Gyges regno Lydiæ inflatus sciscitatum misit Apollinem an quis mortalium se felicior esset. Aglaum Arcadum pauperimum Apollo prætulit, qui terminos agri sui nunquam excesserat, rure suo contentus. Val. lib. 1. c. 7." Gyges, puffed up by his kingdom of Lydia, sent to ask Apollo whether any mortal was happier than he. Apollo preferred Aglaus, the poorest of the Arcadians, who had never passed beyond the bounds of his land and was content with his farm. Valerius, book 1, chapter 7, as printed.

[6724] Editor. Poliziano, Rusticus 17–21. Burton prints mordaci, "biting" or "corrosive," for mendaci, "deceptive"; the modern version retains that difficult image. His separate English rendering replaces the plural gods with God and adds "strife." The Gyges story is in Valerius Maximus 7.1.2, not the printed 1.7.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A secure, quiet, blissful state he hath, if he could acknowledge it.	He enjoys a safe, quiet, blissful condition, if only he could recognise it.
But here is the misery, that he will not take notice of it; he repines at rich mens wealth, brave hangings, dainty fare, as [6725]Simonides objecteth to Hieron, he hath all the pleasures of the world, [6726]in lectis eburneis dormit, vinum phialis bibit, optimis unguentis delibuitur, he knows not the affliction of Joseph, stretching himself on ivory beds, and singing to the sound of the viol.	But here is the misery: he refuses to recognise it. He envies the rich their wealth, splendid tapestries, and delicate food. As Simonides puts it to Hiero, the rich man has all the pleasures of the world: "He sleeps on ivory beds, drinks wine from bowls, and anoints himself with the finest ointments"; he knows nothing of Joseph's affliction, stretching himself on ivory beds and singing to the sound of the viol.[6727]
And it troubles him that he hath not the like; there is a difference (he grumbles) between Laplolly and Phesants, to tumble i'th' straw and lye in a down-bed, betwixt wine and water, a cottage and a palace.	It troubles him that he has nothing like it. There is a difference, he grumbles, between thin porridge and pheasants, between tossing in straw and lying on a down mattress, between wine and water, a cottage and a palace.[6728]

[6725] Burton. Printed page 326, z: "Hor. hæc est Vita solutorum miserâ ambitione, gravique." Horace: this is the life of those released from wretched, oppressive ambition.

[6726] Burton. Printed page 326, dagger: "Amos 6." Amos, chapter 6.

[6727] Editor. Compare Xenophon, Hiero 1: Simonides supposes rulers enjoy greater pleasures, but Hiero argues that their pains are greater and their pleasures fewer. This is a literary dialogue, compared here in English translation. The z note actually quotes Horace, Satires 1.6.128–129, on freedom from ambition. The following luxury images adapt Amos 6:4–6: ivory beds, wine, ointments, music and indifference to Joseph's affliction.

[6728] Editor. "Laplolly," a form of loblolly, is thin porridge or gruel. "Brave" means splendid, and "repine" means fret or complain enviously. The sequence gives concrete voice to objections against Burton's praise of poverty.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He hates nature (as [6729]Pliny characterizeth him) that she hath made him lower then a God, and is angry with the Gods that any man goes before him, and although he hath received much, yet (as [6730]Seneca followes it) he thinks it an injury that he hath no more, and is so far from giving thanks for his Tribuneship, that he complains he is not Pretor, neither doth that please him, except he may be Consul.	He hates nature, as Pliny describes him, for making him lower than a god, and is angry with the gods that anyone ranks above him. Although he has received much, as Seneca continues, he thinks himself wronged because he has not received more. Far from giving thanks for his tribuneship, he complains that he is not a praetor; nor does that satisfy him unless he can become consul.[6731]
Why is he not a Prince, why not a Monarch, why not an Emperour? Why should one man have so much more then his fellowes, one have all, another nothing? Why should one man be a slave or drudge to another? One surfeit, another starve, one live at ease, another labour, without any hope of better fortune? Thus they grumble, mutter, and repine: Not considering that inconstancy of humane affairs, judicially conferring one condition with another, or well weighing their own present estate.	Why is he not a prince, a monarch, an emperor? Why should one man have so much more than his fellows, one have everything and another nothing? Why should one man be another's slave or drudge? Why should one gorge himself and another starve, one live at ease and another labour without any hope of better fortune? So they grumble, mutter, and complain, without considering the instability of human affairs, judiciously comparing one condition with another, or properly weighing their own present circumstances.[6732]

[6729] Burton. Printed page 326, asterisk: "Præfat. lib. 7. Odit naturam quod infra deos sit; irascitur diis quod quis ibi antecedat." Preface to book 7: he hates nature because he is beneath the gods; he is angry with the gods because anyone ranks above him there.

[6730] Burton. Printed page 326, dagger: "De ira cap. 31, lib. 3. Etsi multum acceperit, injuriam putat plura non accepisse; non agit pro tribunatu gratias, sed queritur quod non sit ad prætoram perductus; neque hæc grata, si desit consulatus." On Anger, book 3, chapter 31: even if he has received much, he thinks it an injury not to have received more; he gives no thanks for the tribuneship, but complains that he has not been advanced to the praetorship, nor is that welcome if the consulship is lacking.

[6731] Editor. Tribune, praetor, and consul are Roman public offices, here forming a ladder of unsatisfied ambition. Seneca, On Anger 3.31.1–2, supplies the complaint that receiving much still seems insufficient and the progression from praetor to consul. Burton adapts it, adding the tribuneship. The exact Pliny formulation remains unlocated in the consulted opening of Natural History 7.

[6732] Editor. "Judicially conferring" means judiciously comparing; "estate" means one's condition or circumstances. Burton answers the complaints by invoking the instability of fortune, which becomes the following discussion's subject. His account of poverty remains a consolatory argument, including its tensions and sweeping judgements.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What they are now, thou mayst shortly be; and what thou art they shall likely be. Expect a little, confer future and times past with the present, see the event, and comfort thy self with it. It is as well to be discerned in Common-wealths, Cities, Families, as in private mens estates.	What they are now, you may soon become; and what you are, they may well become. Wait a little; compare the future and the past with the present, consider the outcome, and take comfort from it. This can be seen as clearly in commonwealths, cities, and families as in the circumstances of private individuals.
Italy was once Lord of the world, Rome the Queen of Cities, vaunted her self of two [6733]myriades of inhabitants; now that all-commanding country is possessed by petty Princes, [6734]Rome a small Village in respect. Greece of old the seat of civility, mother of sciences and humanity, now forlorn, the nurse of barbarism, a den of theeves. Germany then, saith Tacitus, was incult and horrid, now full of magnificent Cities: Athens, Corinth, Carthage, how flourishing Cities, now buried in their own ruines! Corvorum, ferarum, aprorum & bestiarum lustra, like so many wildernesses, a receptacle of wild beasts.	Italy was once lord of the world, Rome the queen of cities, boasting of twenty thousand inhabitants; now that once all-commanding country is held by petty princes, and Rome is a small village by comparison. Greece, once the home of civilized life and mother of learning and the humanities, is now desolate, the nurse of barbarism, a den of thieves. Germany, then uncultivated and forbidding, according to Tacitus, is now full of magnificent cities. Athens, Corinth, Carthage—what flourishing cities they were, now buried in their own ruins! "Haunts of ravens, wild animals, boars, and beasts," like so many wildernesses, a refuge for wild creatures.[6735]
Source page 326–327 Venice a poor fisher-town; Paris, London, small Cottages in Cæsars time, now most noble Emporiums. Valois, Plantagenet and Scaliger how fortunate families, how likely to continue? now quite extinguished and rooted out.	Venice was a poor fishing town; Paris and London were little clusters of cottages in Caesar's time, and are now splendid centres of trade. Valois, Plantagenet, and Scaliger—what fortunate families, how likely to endure! Now utterly extinguished and uprooted.[6736]

[6733] Burton. Printed page 326, †: "Lips. admir." Lipsius, Admiranda; the precise passage and population figure remain to be collated.

[6734] Burton. Printed page 326, *: "Of some 90000. inhabitants now." Burton's estimate of the contemporary population of Rome.

[6735] Editor. A myriad is ten thousand: the printed two myriades therefore means 20,000, although Burton's margin gives modern Rome 90,000 inhabitants. This conspicuous inconsistency is preserved, not silently repaired to a larger ancient population. The descriptions of Greece and ruined cities are Burton's sweeping historical rhetoric, not independently established conditions of every place named. Incult means uncultivated; humanity here means humane learning.

[6736] Editor. Emporiums are commercial centres. Valois and Plantagenet are royal dynasties; Scaliger refers to the ruling della Scala family of Verona. Burton's claim that they were entirely extinguished is rhetorical and has not been verified as a statement about every descendant. His compressed accounts of the cities' beginnings likewise need historical collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 327 He stands aloft to day, full of favour, wealth, honour, and prosperity, in the top of fortunes wheele: to morrow in prison, worse then nothing, his son's a begger. Thou art a poor servile drudge, Fæx populi, a very slave, thy son may come to be a Prince, with Maximinus, Agathocles, &c. a Senator, a Generall of an Army;	Today he stands on high, full of favour, wealth, honour, and prosperity, at the top of Fortune's wheel; tomorrow he is in prison, worse than ruined, his son a beggar. You are a poor, servile drudge, "the dregs of the people," an outright slave; your son may become a prince, like Maximinus or Agathocles, a senator, or an army's commander.[6737]
Thou standest bare to him now, workest for him, drudgest for him and his, takest an almes of him: stay but a little, and his next heire peradventure shall consume all with riot, be degraded, thou exalted, and he shall beg of thee. Thou shalt be his most honorable Patron, he thy devout servant, his posterity shall run, ride, and do as much for thine, as it was with [6738]Frisgobald and Cromwel, it may be for thee.	Now you stand bareheaded before him, work for him, drudge for him and his family, and accept his charity. Wait a little: perhaps his next heir will squander everything in dissipation and sink in rank while you rise, and he will beg from you. You will be his most honoured patron, he your devoted servant; his descendants will run and ride on errands for yours, and do as much for them. What happened with Frisgobald and Cromwell may happen for you.[6739]
Citizens devour countrey Gentlemen, and settle in their seats; after two or three descents, they consume all in riot, it returnes to the City again.	City men swallow up country gentlemen and settle on their estates; after two or three generations their descendants squander everything in dissipation, and it returns to the city again.

[6737] Editor. Fortune's wheel represents the instability of worldly rank. Maximinus and Agathocles are examples of rulers traditionally represented as rising from humble origins; the details and Burton's immediate sources remain for collation. Worse then nothing means reduced below his former standing, not literal nonexistence.

[6738] Burton. Printed page 327, a: "Reade the story at large in John Fox his Acts and Monuments." John Foxe, Acts and Monuments; see the editorial qualification.

[6739] Editor. "Standest bare" means standing bareheaded in deference; "riot," extravagant dissipation; "descents," generations. Foxe tells of Thomas Cromwell repaying Francis Frescobald's former help in Florence after the merchant's fortunes reverse. Foxe expressly introduces the story as taken from Bandello's Italian account printed in 1554. This comparison uses the Ex-classics transcription, volume 7, pp. 109–112; Burton's particular Foxe edition and the events' historical accuracy remain unverified. His spelling Frisgobald is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [6740]Novus incola venit, Nam propriæ telluris herum natura neque illum, Nec me, nec quenquam statuit; nos expulit ille, Illum aut nequities, aut vafri inscitia juris.	A new occupant comes; For nature has made neither him, Nor me, nor anyone the permanent owner of the soil. He drove us out; Vice, or ignorance of crafty law, will drive him out in turn.[6741]
A Lawyer buyes out his poor Client, after a while his Clients posterity buy out him and his; so things go round, ebbe and flow.	A lawyer buys out his poor client; after a while the client's descendants buy him and his family out. So things go round, ebb and flow.
Nunc ager Umbreni, sub nomine nuper Ofelli Dictus erat, nulli proprius, sed cedit in usum Nunc mihi, nunc aliis; ——	Now Umbrenus's land, it was lately called Ofellus's; It belongs permanently to no one, but passes for use Now to me, now to others.[6742]

[6740] Burton. Printed page 327, †: "Hor: Sat. 2. Ser. lib. 2." Horace, Satires 2.2; lines 128–131, with the syntax continuing beyond Burton's excerpt.

[6741] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.2.128–131. Nature grants no permanent ownership; one occupant displaces another. Burton stops before the verb in the next line that completes the last clause. The translation supplies its plainly intended sense, will drive him out. The short opening fragment, set beside the other lines in the scan, is displayed here as the first line of the extract.

[6742] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.2.133–135. Burton prints erat (was), cedit (passes), and aliis (others), where the consulted text has erit (will be), cedet (will pass), and alii (another). The translation follows Burton's reading. Proprius contrasts permanent possession with temporary use.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as he said then, ager cujus, quot habes Dominos? So say I of land, houses, moveables and mony, mine to day, his anon, whose to morrow? In fine (as [6743]Machiavel observes) vertue and prosperity beget rest; rest idlenes; idlenes riot; riot destruction: From which we come again to good lawes; good lawes engender vertuous actions; vertue, glorie, and prosperity; and 'tis no dishonour then (as [6744]Guicciardine adds) for a flourishing man, City, or State to come to ruine, nor infelicitie to be subject to the law of nature.	As he said then, "Whose land are you? How many masters do you have?" So I say of land, houses, movable possessions, and money: mine today, his a moment later—whose tomorrow? In the end, as Machiavelli observes, virtue and prosperity produce repose; repose, idleness; idleness, dissipation; dissipation, destruction. From this we return to good laws; good laws produce virtuous actions; virtue, glory and prosperity. It is therefore no dishonour, as Guicciardini adds, for a flourishing man, city, or state to fall into ruin, nor a misfortune to be subject to nature's law.[6745]
Ergo terrena calcanda, sitienda cœlestia, therefore (I say) scorn this transitory state, look up to Heaven, think not what others are, but what thou art: [6746]Quâ parte locatus es in re: and what thou shalt be, what thou mayst be.	"Therefore earthly things must be trampled underfoot, heavenly things thirsted for." Scorn, I say, this passing earthly condition; look up to heaven. Think about what you are, rather than what others are: "What place you hold in the scheme of things"; what you will be, what you may be.[6747]

[6743] Burton. Printed page 327, *: "5 Florent. hist. virtus quietem parat, quies otium, otium porro luxum generat, luxus interitum, à quo iterum ad saluberimas &c." Machiavelli, Florentine Histories, book 5. "Virtue produces repose, repose idleness; idleness in turn generates luxury, luxury destruction, from which once more to the most salutary …" The abbreviated final clause supplies no noun; Burton's main text develops the cycle.

[6744] Burton. Printed page 327, †: "Guicciard. in H ponest: nulla infelicitas subjectum esse legi naturæ &c." "No misfortune to be subject to nature's law," and so on. The compressed title after in is provisionally transcribed; its reading and identification remain unresolved.

[6745] Editor. The cycle is in Machiavelli's Florentine Histories 5.1; Burton gives a compressed moral formulation. The following Guicciardini citation and the proverbial question to the field remain unlocated. Neither is silently assigned a conjectural work or author.

[6746] Burton. Printed page 327, *: "Persius." Persius, Satires 3.72.

[6747] Editor. Persius, Satires 3.72, asks what place a person has in human affairs. Burton embeds the pagan ethical question within a Christian appeal to turn from worldly status toward heaven.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Do (I say) as Christ himself did, when he lived here on earth, imitate him as much as in thee lies. How many great Cæsars, mighty Monarches, Tetrarches, Dynastes, Princes lived in his dayes, in what plentie, what delicacie, how bravely attended, what a deal of gold and silver, what treasure, how many sumptuous palaces had they, what Provinces, & Cities, ample territories, fields, rivers, fountains, parkes, forrests, lawnes, woods, celles, &c?	Do, I say, as Christ himself did when he lived here on earth; imitate him as far as you can. How many great Caesars, mighty monarchs, tetrarchs, potentates, and princes lived in his day! What abundance, what luxury, what splendid retinues! How much gold and silver, what treasures, how many magnificent palaces they had! What provinces and cities, vast territories, fields, rivers, fountains, parks, forests, glades, woods, chambers, and so on![6748]
Yet Christ had none of all this, he would have none of this, he voluntarily rejected all this, he could not be ignorant, he could not erre in his choice, he contemned all this, he chose that which was safer, better and more certaine, and lesse to be repented, a mean estate, even povertie it self; and why dost thou then doubt to follow him, to imitate him and his Apostles, to imitate all good men? So doe thou tread in his divine steps, and thou shalt not erre eternally, as too many worldlings doe, that runne on in their owne dissolute courses, to their confusion and ruine, thou shalt not doe amisse.	Yet Christ had none of this; he wanted none of it, voluntarily rejected it all. He could not be ignorant, could not make a mistaken choice. He despised it all and chose what was safer, better, more certain, and less likely to be regretted: a humble condition, poverty itself. Why, then, do you hesitate to follow him, to imitate him and his apostles, to imitate all good men? Follow in his divine footsteps, and you will not go eternally astray, as too many worldly men do, persisting in their dissolute ways to their own destruction and ruin. You will not go wrong.

[6748] Editor. Tetrarchs are rulers of a territorial division; dynastes are potentates. Bravely means splendidly, delicacie luxurious living, and lawnes open grassy spaces or glades. Celles is rendered chambers; its precise intended sense within this catalogue remains uncertain.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 327–328 Whatsoever thy fortune is, be contented with it, trust in him, relie on him, refer thy selfe wholly to him. For know this, in conclusion, Non est volentis nec currentis, sed miserentis Dei, 'tis not as men, but as God will. The Lord maketh poor and maketh rich, bringeth low, and exalteth. (1 Sam. 2. ver. 7.8.) he lifteth the poor from the dust, and raiseth the begger from the dunghill, to set them amongst Princes, and make them inherit the seat of glory; 'tis all as he pleaseth, how, and when, and whom; he that appoints the end (though to us unknown) appoints the meanes likewise subordinate to the end.	Whatever your fortune, be content with it. Trust in him, rely on him, place yourself wholly in his hands. Know this, in conclusion: "It depends neither on the one who wills nor on the one who runs, but on God who shows mercy." It is as God wills, not as men will. "The Lord makes poor and makes rich, brings low and raises up" (1 Samuel 2:7–8); "he lifts the poor from the dust and raises the beggar from the dunghill, to set them among princes and let them inherit the seat of glory." Everything is as he pleases—the manner, the time, and the person. He who appoints the end, though unknown to us, also appoints the means that serve it.[6749]
Source page 328 Yea but their present estate crucifies and torments most mortall men, they have no such forecast, to see what may be, what shall likely be, but what is, though not wherefore, or from whom, hoc anget, their present misfortunes grinde their soules, and an envious eye which they cast upon other mens prosperities, Vicinumque pecus grandius uber habet, how rich, how fortunate, how happy is he?	Yes, but their present circumstances crucify and torment most mortals. They have no such foresight to consider what may happen or is likely to happen; they see only what is, without considering why or from whom it comes. "This will torment them": their present misfortunes grind down their souls, as does the envious eye they cast on other men's prosperity. "The neighbour's cattle have a larger udder." How rich, how fortunate, how happy he is![6750]

[6749] Editor. The Latin is Romans 9:16. Burton's separate English sentence is a compressed application, followed by 1 Samuel 2:7–8. Both are retained. The concluding distinction between ends and subordinate means is Burton's providential argument.

[6750] Editor. Hoc anget is printed with e and literally means this will distress; the usual present angit would mean this distresses. Ovid, Art of Love 1.350, supplies the neighbouring cattle: an image of thinking someone else's possessions better. Burton transfers it from Ovid's erotic context to envy of wealth.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But in the mean time he doth not consider the others miseries, his infirmities of body and minde, that accompany his estate, but still reflects upon his own false conceived woes and wants, whereas if the matter were duely examined, [6751]he is in no distresse at all, he hath no cause to complain.	Meanwhile he does not consider the other man's miseries, the infirmities of body and mind that accompany his position. He keeps dwelling on his own imagined troubles and wants, whereas, if the matter were properly examined, he is in no distress at all and has no cause to complain.[6752]
—— [6753]tolle querelas, Pauper enim non est cui rerum suppetit usus.	Put away your complaints: The man who has what he needs to use is not poor.
he is not poore, he is not in need. [6754]Nature is content with bread and water; and he that can rest satisfied with that, may contend with Jupiter himselfe for happinesse. In that golden age, [6755]somnos dedit umbra salubres, potum quoque lubricus amnis, the trees gave wholsome shade to sleep under, and the clear rivers drink.	He is not poor; he is not in need. Nature is content with bread and water, and whoever can rest satisfied with those may rival Jupiter himself in happiness. In that golden age, "the shade gave healthful sleep, and the gliding stream gave drink": the trees gave wholesome shade to sleep beneath, and the clear rivers supplied drink.[6756]

[6751] Burton. Printed page 328, b: "Omnes divites qui cœlo et terra frui possunt." "All are rich who can enjoy heaven and earth."

[6752] Editor. The claim that the sufferer has no real distress belongs to Burton's consolatory argument. In the ensuing discussion he raises the opposing case of those who truly lack the means to live. The present paragraph should be read as one voice in that continuing exchange.

[6753] Burton. Printed page 328, c: "Hor. lib. 1. epist. 12." Horace, Epistles 1.12.3–4.

[6754] Burton. Printed page 328, d: "Seneca epist. 15. panem & aquam natura desiderat, & hæc qui habet, ipso cum Jove de felicitate contendat. Cibus simplex famem sedat, vestis tenuis frigus arcet. Senec. epist. 8." "Nature desires bread and water; whoever has these may compete in happiness with Jupiter himself. Simple food appeases hunger; thin clothing keeps out the cold." The first reference is printed 15; compare Letters 25.4. The second paraphrases 8.5.

[6755] Burton. Printed page 328, †: "Boethius." The golden-age passage in The Consolation of Philosophy; exact wording remains for collation.

[6756] Editor. Seneca's bread-and-water maxim is Letters 25.4, not the printed 15; the clothing and food saying adapts 8.5. The golden age is an imagined age of natural simplicity. Boethius is named in the margin; exact collation of Burton's quotation remains pending.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Israelites drank water in the wildernesse; Sampson, David, Saul, Abrahams servant when he went for Isaacs wife, the Samaritan woman, and how many besides might I reckon up, Ægypt, Palestina, whole countries in the [6757]Indies, that drink pure water all their lives. [6758]The Persian kings themselves drank no other drink then the water of Chaospis, that runs by Susa, which was carried in bottles after them, whithersoever they went.	The Israelites drank water in the wilderness; so did Samson, David, Saul, Abraham's servant when he went to find Isaac a wife, and the Samaritan woman. How many others I could list! Egypt, Palestine, whole countries in the Indies, where people drink plain water all their lives. The Persian kings themselves drank nothing but water from the Choaspes, which flows past Susa; it was carried after them in bottles wherever they went.[6759]
Jacob desired no more of God, but bread to eat, and clothes to put on in his journey. Gen. 28.20. Bene est cui deus obtulit Parca quod satis est manu; bread is enough [6760]to strengthen the heart. And if you study Philosophy aright, saith [6761]Maudarensis, whatsoever is beyond this moderation, is not usefull, but troublesome.	Jacob asked God for nothing more than bread to eat and clothes to wear on his journey, Genesis 28:20. "Well is it with the man to whom God has offered enough with a sparing hand." Bread is enough "to strengthen the heart." And if you study philosophy rightly, says Maudarensis, whatever exceeds this measure is a burden rather than a benefit.[6762]

[6757] Burton. Printed page 328, *: "Muffæus & alii." "Muffaeus and others." The printed name is retained; identification, probably Maffei, remains to be confirmed.

[6758] Burton. Printed page 328, †: "Brissonius." Barnabé Brisson; the precise passage remains to be located.

[6759] Editor. The list alludes to biblical water-drinking episodes, including Genesis 24, Exodus 17, Judges 15, 2 Samuel 23 and John 4; the precise Saul reference is not established here. Chaospis is Burton's spelling of Choaspes. The regional generalization about exclusive water drinking is retained as his claim; neither it nor Brisson's precise wording has been independently verified.

[6760] Burton. Printed page 328, e: "Psal. 84." Psalm 84 as printed; the words about bread strengthening the heart correspond to Psalm 104:15.

[6761] Burton. Printed page 328, f: "Si rectè philosophemini, quicquid aptam moderationem supergreditur, oneri potius quàm usui est." "If you philosophize rightly, whatever exceeds a fitting measure is more burden than use." Adapted from Apuleius, Apology 19.4.

[6762] Editor. The verse is Horace, Odes 3.16.43–44. The bread phrase is Psalm 104:15, although the margin says 84. Maudarensis designates Apuleius of Madauros; compare Apology 19.4, where an excess above a fitting measure becomes a burden rather than a use.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6763]Agellius out of Euripides, accounts bread and water enough to satisfie nature, of which there is no surfeit, the rest is not a feast, but ryot. [6764]S. Hierome esteemes him rich, that hath bread to eat, and a potent man that is not compelled to be a slave: hunger is not ambitious, so that it have to eat, and thirst doth not prefer a cup of gold.	Gellius, quoting Euripides, reckons bread and water enough to satisfy nature: there is no surfeit of these; everything else is extravagance, not a feast. Saint Jerome considers a man rich if he has bread to eat, and powerful if he is not forced to be a slave. Hunger has no ambition, provided it has food, and thirst does not prefer a golden cup.[6765]
It was no Epicurean Speech of an Epicure, He that is not satisfied with a little, will never have enough: And very good counsell of him in the [6766]Poet, O my sonne, Mediocritie of meanes agrees best with men; too much is pernicious.	It was no indulgent saying for an Epicurean: "He who is not satisfied with a little will never have enough." And the speaker in the poet gives excellent advice: "My son, moderate means suit men best; too much is ruinous."[6767]

[6763] Burton. Printed page 328, g: "Lib. 7.16. Cereris munus & aquæ poculum mortales quærunt habere, & quorum saties nunquam est; luxus autem sunt cætera, non epulæ." "Mortals seek the gift of Ceres and a cup of water, of which there is never satiety; all the rest is luxury, not a feast." Ceres' gift is grain or bread. The consulted Gellius text places the discussion at 6.16; the printed reference 7.16 is retained.

[6764] Burton. Printed page 328, h: "Satis est dives qui pane non indiget; nimium potens qui servire non cogitur. Ambitiosa non est fames, &c." "He is rich enough who does not lack bread; exceedingly powerful who is not compelled to serve. Hunger is not ambitious," and so on. Burton attributes this to Jerome; the exact source is unlocated.

[6765] Editor. Agellius is Aulus Gellius. Attic Nights 6.16.7 quotes Euripides in Greek on the sufficiency of grain and water; Burton's margin gives a Latin rendering, not Gellius's Latin prose. His 7.16 remains as printed. The immediate Latin version and the reason for the different book number remain unidentified. Jerome's exact passage is also unlocated.

[6766] Burton. Printed page 328, †: "Euripides Menalip. O fili, mediocres divitiæ hominibus conveniunt, nimia vero moles perniciosa" "Euripides, Melanippe. O son, moderate wealth suits men; an excessive mass of it is ruinous." The abbreviated play title is retained as printed; the fragment remains to be collated.

[6767] Editor. Burton plays on Epicure: it can mean a follower of Epicurus or a person devoted to sensual indulgence. The maxim commends sufficiency rather than indulgence. The second saying is attributed in the margin to Euripides' Melanippe; its exact fragment is not yet established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Divitiæ grandes homini sunt vivere parcè, Æquo animo, ——	Great riches for a man consist in living frugally, With an untroubled mind.[6768]
And if thou canst be content, thou hast abundance, nihil est, nihil deest, thou hast little, thou wantest nothing. 'Tis all one to be hanged in a chain of gold, or in a rope; to be filled with dainties or courser meat.	If you can be content, you have abundance: "There is nothing; nothing is lacking." You have little and lack nothing. It is all the same whether you are hanged with a golden chain or a rope, whether you fill yourself with delicacies or coarse food.
[6769]Si ventri bene, si lateri, pedibusque tuis, nil Divitiæ poterunt regales addere majus.	If your belly, your side, and your feet are well, A king's riches can add nothing greater.[6770]
If belly, sides and feet be well at ease, A princes treasure can thee no more please.	If belly, sides, and feet are comfortable, A prince's treasure can give you no greater pleasure.
Source page 328–329 Socrates in a Fair, seeing so many things bought and sold, such a multitude of people convented to that purpose, exclaimed forthwith, O ye gods, what a sight of things doe not I want? 'Tis thy want alone that keepes thee in health of body and minde, and that which thou persecutest and abhorrest as a ferall plague, is thy physician and [6771]chiefest friend, which makes thee a good man, an healthfull, a sound, a vertuous, an honest and happy man.	Socrates, seeing so many things bought and sold at a fair, and such a multitude gathered for that purpose, immediately exclaimed, "O gods, what a host of things I do not need!" Your lack of possessions alone keeps you healthy in body and mind. What you persecute and abhor as a deadly plague is your physician and dearest friend, making you a good man—healthy, sound, virtuous, upright, and happy.[6772]

[6768] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things, book 5: the phrase commends frugal living with an even mind. The closing continuation of the Latin sentence is not quoted by Burton. The following nihil est, nihil deest is literally there is nothing, nothing is lacking; Burton's own gloss softens nothing to little.

[6769] Burton. Printed page 328, i: "Hor." Horace, Epistles 1.12.5–6.

[6770] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.12.5–6. Burton omits est after lateri but leaves the sense clear. His following English couplet substitutes a prince's treasure and the language of pleasure for the Latin's royal riches and greater addition; both versions are preserved.

[6771] Burton. Printed page 329, k: "O noctes cœnæque deûm." "O nights and dinners of the gods!" Compare Horace, Satires 2.6.65. The marginal position beside chiefest friend is retained.

[6772] Editor. Convented means assembled; want means lack or need, while ferall means deadly. The saying reverses the usual assumption that desirable goods must be needed. The Socratic anecdote and Burton's immediate intermediary remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 329 For when Vertue came from heaven (as the Poet faines) rich men kicked her up, wicked men abhorr'd her, courtiers scoffed at her, citizens hated her, [6773]and that she was thrust out of doors in every place, she came at last to her sister Poverty, where she had found good entertainment. Poverty and Vertue dwell together.	For when Virtue came down from heaven, as the poet imagines, rich men kicked her about, wicked men abhorred her, courtiers mocked her, and city men hated her. Driven out of doors everywhere, she came at last to her sister Poverty, where she found a kindly welcome. Poverty and Virtue dwell together.[6774]
—— [6775]O vitæ tuta facultas Pauperis, angustique lares, ô munera nondum Intellecta deûm.	O safe resources of a poor man's life, And narrow home! O gifts of the gods Not yet understood![6776]
how happy art thou if thou couldst be content. Godlinesse is great gain, if a man can be content with that which he hath, 1 Tim. 6.6. And all true happinesse is in a mean estate. I have a little wealth, as he said, [6777]sed quas animus magnas facit, a kingdom in conceit:	How happy you are, if only you could be content! "Godliness is great gain, if a man can be content with what he has," 1 Timothy 6:6. All true happiness lies in a moderate condition. I have a little wealth, as he said, "but the mind makes it great": a kingdom in my estimation.[6778]

[6773] Burton. Printed page 329, *: "Per mille fraudes doctosque dolos ejicitur, apud sociam paupertatem ejusque cultores divertens in eorum sinu et tutela deliciatur." "Driven out by a thousand deceptions and elaborate tricks, she turns aside to her companion Poverty and its devotees, delighting in their embrace and protection." No author is named.

[6774] Editor. Virtue and Poverty are personified as sisters. Kicked her up is retained in the original and rendered kicked her about; Burton pictures violent rejection, not elevation. The unnamed poet and the source of the Latin marginal account remain unidentified.

[6775] Burton. Printed page 329, l: "Lucan." Lucan, Civil War 5.527–529.

[6776] Editor. Lucan, Civil War 5.527–529, describing the poor boatman Amyclas, whose hut offers no spoils to civil war. Lares means household gods and, by extension, home. The contrast between a narrow dwelling and security is central to Burton's argument.

[6777] Burton. Printed page 329, m: "Lip. miscell. ep. 40." Justus Lipsius, Miscellaneous Letters, letter 40; the edition and exact passage remain to be established.

[6778] Editor. Burton paraphrases 1 Timothy 6:6. Mean estate means a moderate or humble condition, not a morally mean one. Conceit here means estimation or imagination. The Lipsius quotation is not yet collated against a specified edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [6779]nil amplius opto Maiâ nate, nisi ut propria hæc mihi munera faxis;	I wish for nothing more, Son of Maia, except that you make these gifts securely mine.[6780]
I have enough and desire no more.	I have enough and want no more.
[6781]Dii bene fecerunt inopis me quodque pusilli Fecerunt animi ——	The gods did well in making me Of a poor and humble spirit.[6782]
'tis very well, and to my content. [6783]Vestem & fortunam concinnam potius quàm laxam probo, let my fortune and my garments be both alike, fit for me. And which [6784]Sebastian Foscarinus sometime Duke of Venice, caused to be engraven on his Tomb in Saint Markes Church, Hear, O ye Venetians, and I will tell you which is the best thing in the world: To contemne it. I will engrave it in my heart, it shall be my whole studie to contemne it.	It is very well, and I am content. "I approve of clothes and fortune that fit, rather than hang loose." Let my fortune and my clothes alike fit me. Sebastian Foscarinus, formerly Duke of Venice, had this engraved on his tomb in Saint Mark's Church: "Listen, Venetians, and I will tell you the best thing in the world: to despise it." I will engrave that in my heart; despising the world will be my whole concern.[6785]

[6779] Burton. Printed page 329, n: "Sat. 6. lib. 2." Horace, Satires 2.6.4–5.

[6780] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.6.4–5. Son of Maia is Mercury. The consulted Latin reads oro (pray) where Burton has opto (wish); the translation follows Burton. Propria asks that the gifts remain securely the speaker's.

[6781] Burton. Printed page 329, †: "Hor. Sat. 4." Horace, Satires 1.4.17–18.

[6782] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.4.17–18. Burton's second Fecerunt differs from the consulted finxerunt (formed). In context Horace speaks of modest poetic capacity, contrasting his small spirit with another poet's copious production; Burton reuses the words as an expression of contentment.

[6783] Burton. Printed page 329, *: "Apuleius." Compare Apuleius, Apology 19.2–3.

[6784] Burton. Printed page 329, †: "Chytreus in Europæ deliciis. Accipite cives Veneti quod est optimum in rebus humanis; res humanas contemnere." Chytraeus, Deliciae Europae. "Learn, citizens of Venice, what is best in human affairs: to despise human affairs." The inscription and its attribution remain to be checked.

[6785] Editor. The clothing comparison adapts Apuleius, Apology 19.2–3: fortune should fit like a tunic, rather than trail so far as to trip its wearer. Burton changes the wording. The purported Foscarinus tomb inscription is mediated through Chytraeus; the person's identification, ducal title, location and exact text remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Let them take wealth, Stercora stercus amet, so that I may have security; bene qui latuit, bene vixit; though I live obscure, [6786]yet I live clean and honest; and when as the lofty oke is blown down, the silly reed may stand. Let them take glory, for that's their misery; let them take honour, so that I may have hearts ease.	Let them take wealth—"let dung love dung"—provided I may have peace of mind. "He who has lived in obscurity has lived well." Though I live unknown, I live cleanly and honestly; when the lofty oak is blown down, the frail reed may stand. Let them take glory, for that is their misery; let them take honour, provided I may have peace at heart.[6787]
Duc me o Jupiter & tu fatum, [6788]&c. Lead me, O God, whither thou wilt, I am ready to follow; command, I will obey. I doe not envie at their wealth, titles, offices;	"Lead me, O Jupiter, and you, Fate," and so on. Lead me, O God, wherever you will; I am ready to follow. Command, and I will obey. I do not envy their wealth, titles, or offices.[6789]
Stet quicunque volet potens Aulæ culmine lubrico, Me dulcis saturet quies,	Let whoever wishes stand powerful On the slippery summit of the court; Let sweet repose satisfy me.[6790]

[6786] Burton. Printed page 329, o: "Vah, vivere etiam nunc lubet, as Demea said, Adelph. Act. 4. Quam multis non egeo, quam multa non desidero, ut Socrates in pompa, ille in nundinis." "Ah, even now it is a pleasure to live," as Demea said in The Brothers, act 4. "How many things I do not need, how many I do not desire"; like Socrates at a procession, the other at a market. Burton's compressed juxtaposition and ambiguous ille ("the other/he") are retained; the Terence attribution and anecdote require collation.

[6787] Editor. The dung image is deliberately coarse. Bene qui latuit, bene vixit is Ovid, Tristia 3.4.25. The margin's Demea saying comes from Terence, Adelphoe 445, in act 3 scene 3: seeing the honourable Hegio makes Demea glad to be alive. Burton prints act 4 and applies the words to contentment. "Silly" means frail; the oak and reed recall the fable of yielding to a storm. The adjacent Socrates saying remains uncollated.

[6788] Burton. Printed page 329, *: "Epictetus 77. cap. quo sum destinatus, & sequar alacriter." Epictetus, chapter 77 as printed: "where I am appointed to go, and I shall follow gladly." The quotation continues the appeal to Jupiter and Fate; chapter numbering requires edition-specific collation.

[6789] Editor. The appeal to Jupiter and Fate is the Stoic prayer attributed to Cleanthes and preserved by Epictetus (Handbook 53 in common modern numbering, 52 in the consulted Carter version). Burton's marginal 77 requires collation with his edition. His English gloss substitutes the single Christian God for Jupiter and Fate; both layers are kept.

[6790] Editor. Seneca, Thyestes 391–393, from a choral meditation on kingship and freedom from desire. Aulæ is the royal court; its summit is slippery because power is precarious.

Original text 1651	Modern English
let me live quiet and at ease. [6791]Erimus fortasse (as he comforted himself) quando illi non erunt, when they are dead and gone, and all their pomp vanished, our memory may flourish:	Let me live quietly and at ease. "Perhaps we shall still be when they are no more," as he comforted himself: when they are dead and gone and all their splendour has vanished, our memory may flourish.[6792]
—— [6793]dant perennes Stemmata non peritura Musæ.	The everlasting Muses bestow Pedigrees that will not perish.[6794]
Let him be my Lord, Patron, Baron, Earl, and possesse so many goodly Castles, 'tis well for me [6795]that I have a poor house, and a little wood, and a Well by it, &c.	Let him be my lord, patron, baron, earl, and possess all those splendid castles. It is enough for me to have a humble house, a little wood, and a well beside it, and so on.[6796]
His me consolor victurum suavius, ac si Quæstor avus pater atque meus, patruusque fuissent.	I comfort myself that I shall live more pleasantly this way Than if my grandfather, father, and uncle had been quaestors.[6797]

[6791] Burton. Printed page 329, p: "Puteanus ep. 62." Erycius Puteanus, letter 62; precise collection and wording remain uncollated.

[6792] Editor. Erimus fortasse quando illi non erunt is literally perhaps we shall be when they will not be. Burton explains this as survival in memory. The translation preserves the Latin's tentative phrasing; Puteanus's exact source remains uncollated.

[6793] Burton. Printed page 329, †: "Marullus" Marullus; precise poem remains unlocated.

[6794] Editor. The Muses confer enduring distinction through poetry. Stemmata literally means pedigrees or genealogical honours; its figurative force contrasts literary remembrance with inherited rank. The attribution to Marullus has not yet been traced to a specific poem.

[6795] Burton. Printed page 329, q: "Hoc erit in votis; modus agri non ita parvus, Hortus ubi & tecto vicinus jugis aquæ fons, et paulum sylvæ, &c. Hor. Sat. 6. lib. 2. Ser." "This will be among my wishes: a piece of land not so small, with a garden and a spring of flowing water near the house, and a little woodland," and so on. Horace, Satires 2.6.1–3; Burton's erit and parvus differ substantively from the consulted text.

[6796] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.6.1–3, begins Hoc erat in votis, modus agri non ita magnus: this was my wish, a piece of land not so large. Burton's marginal erit (will be) and non ita parvus (not so small) change tense and reverse the size adjective. Both readings are preserved in his note and its translation; the main paragraph itself still praises modest possessions.

[6797] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.6.130–131. A quaestor was a Roman magistrate with financial responsibilities. Burton prints plural fuissent where the consulted text has fuisset. His English gloss omits the grandfather and domesticates the office as Lord Treasurer or Lord Mayor; it remains alongside the fresh Latin translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I live I thank God as merrily as he, and triumph as much in this my mean estate, as if my father and uncle had been Lord Treasurer, or my Lord Major. He feeds of many dishes, I of one; [6798]qui Christum curat, non multum curat quam de preciosis cibis stercus conficiat; what care I of what stuffe my excrements be made?	I live as merrily as he does, thank God, and rejoice in my humble condition as much as if my father and uncle had been Lord Treasurer or Lord Mayor. He eats many dishes; I eat one. "He who cares for Christ cares little how costly the food is from which he makes his excrement." What do I care what my excrement is made from?[6799]
Source page 329–330 [6800]He that lives according to nature, cannot be poor, and he that exceeds can never have enough, totus non sufficit orbis, the whole world cannot give him content. A small thing that the righteous hath, is better then the riches of the ungodly, Psal. 37.19. and better is a poor morsell with quietnesse, then abundance with strife, Prov. 17.7.	He who lives according to nature cannot be poor, and he who goes beyond it can never have enough: "The whole world is not sufficient." The entire world cannot satisfy him. "The little that the righteous man has is better than the riches of the ungodly," Psalm 37:19; and "a poor morsel with quiet is better than abundance with strife," Proverbs 17:7.[6801]
Source page 330 Be content then, enjoy thy self, and as [6802]Chrysostome adviseth, be not angry for what thou hast not, but give God hearty thanks for what thou hast received.	Be content, then; enjoy your life. As Chrysostom advises, do not be angry about what you lack, but give God heartfelt thanks for what you have received.

[6798] Burton. Printed page 329, r: "Hieronym." Jerome; the precise source of the following Latin saying remains unlocated.

[6799] Editor. The Latin and Burton's English gloss deliberately reduce luxurious dining to its bodily end. Jerome is named without a work; the attribution remains uncollated. Feeds of means eats from or eats.

[6800] Burton. Printed page 329, s: "Seneca consl. ad Albium c. 11. qui continet se intra naturæ limites, paupertatem non sentit; qui excedit, eum in opibus paupertas sequitur." "He who keeps himself within nature's limits does not feel poverty; he who exceeds them is pursued by poverty amid riches." Compare Seneca, Consolation to Helvia 11.4. The printed title ad Albium is retained.

[6801] Editor. The marginal Latin adapts Seneca, Consolation to Helvia 11.4; the printed title ad Albium differs from that identification. Burton's Psalm 37:19 corresponds to 37:16, and Proverbs 17:7 to 17:1. The original references remain visible rather than being silently corrected. The whole-world phrase is a familiar classical expression; its immediate source here remains unlocated.

[6802] Burton. Printed page 330, *: "Hom. 12. pro his quæ accepisti gratias age, noli indignare pro his quæ non accepisti." Homily 12: "Give thanks for what you have received; do not be angry about what you have not received." The collection is not specified here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6803]Si dat oluscula Mensa minuscula pace referta, Ne pete grandia, Lautaque prandia lite repleta.	If a little table Offers humble greens And is full of peace, Do not seek grand And sumptuous dinners Filled with strife.[6804]
But what wantest thou, to expostulate the matter? or what hast thou not better then a rich man? [6805]Health, competent wealth, children, securitie, sleep, friends, libertie, diet, apparell, and what not, or at least maist have (the means being so obvious, easie, and well known) for as he inculcated to himself,	But to reason the matter out, what do you lack? What do you not have in better measure than a rich man—health, sufficient means, children, security, sleep, friends, freedom, food, clothes, and everything else? Or at least you may have them, since the means are so readily available, easy, and well known. For, as he impressed upon himself:
[6806]Vitam quæ faciunt beatiorem, Jucundissime Martialis, hæc sunt; Res non parta labore, sed relicta, Lis nunquam, &c.	These are the things that make life happier, My dearest Martial: Wealth acquired by inheritance, not toil; No lawsuits, and so on.[6807]
I say again thou hast, or at least maist have it, if thou wilt thy self, and that which I am sure he wants, a merry heart.	I repeat: you have it, or at least may have it if you choose—and something I am sure he lacks, a cheerful heart.

[6803] Burton. Printed page 330, †: “Nat. Chytreus deliciis Europ. Gustonii in ædibus Hubianis in cœnaculo è regione mensæ.” Nathan Chytraeus, Deliciae Europae: “At Gustonium, in the Hubian house, in the dining room opposite the table.” The place and household names are provisionally retained; identification and inscription collation remain pending.

[6804] Editor. The rhyming Latin inscription contrasts a tiny, peaceful meal of vegetables with splendid dinners full of contention. Burton cites Chytraeus’s record of its position in a dining room. The translation follows the six short printed lines without forcing an English rhyme.

[6805] Burton. Printed page 330, t: “Quid non habet melius pauper quà dives? vitam, valetudinem, cibum, somnum, libertatem, &c. Card.” “What does a poor man not have better than a rich man? Life, health, food, sleep, freedom,” and so on. Cardano; the precise passage is unlocated. Quà is retained as printed.

[6806] Burton. Printed page 330, †: “Martial. l. 10 epig. 47. read it cut thy self in the author.” Martial, Epigrams 10.47. The scan reads cut; out is evidently intended. Burton invites the reader to consult the whole poem.

[6807] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 10.47.1–3 and the opening of line 5; Burton omits the line about an agreeable farm and a lasting hearth, and changes faciant to faciunt. The poem addresses Julius Martialis, although Burton introduces it as something impressed upon himself. The quotation remains excerpted rather than being silently completed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Passing by a village in the territorie of Millan, saith [6808]S. Austin, I saw a poor begger that had got belike his belly full of meat, jesting and merry; I sighed and said to some of my friends that were then with me, what a deal of trouble, madnesse, pain and grief do we sustain and exaggerate unto our selves, to get that secure happinesse which this poor begger hath prevented us of, and which we peradventure shall never have? For that which he hath now attained with the begging of some small pieces of silver, a temporall happinesse, and present hearts ease, I cannot compasse with all my carefull windings, and running in and out.	"Passing a village in the territory of Milan," says Saint Augustine, "I saw a poor beggar who had apparently filled his belly with food, joking and merry. I sighed and said to some friends with me: how much trouble, madness, pain, and grief we endure and heap upon ourselves to gain that carefree happiness which this poor beggar has reached before us, and which we may never attain! What he has now achieved by begging a few small silver coins—temporary happiness and present peace of heart—I cannot obtain with all my anxious twists and turns, my running here and there."[6809]
[6810]And surely the begger was very merry, but I was heavy: he was secure, but I timorous. And if any man should ask me now, whether I had rather be merry, or still so solicitous and sad, I should say, Merry. If he should ask me again, whether I had rather be as I am, or as this beggar was, I should sure choose to be as I am, tortured still with cares and fears; but out of peevishnesse and not out of truth.	"Certainly the beggar was very merry, while I was sad; he was at ease, while I was afraid. If anyone asked me now whether I would rather be merry or remain so anxious and sad, I would answer, 'Merry.' If he asked again whether I would rather be as I am or as this beggar was, I would certainly choose to be as I am, still tortured by cares and fears—but from perversity, not from truth."

[6808] Burton. Printed page 330, u: "Confess. lib. 6. Transiens per vicum quendam Mediolanensem, animadverti pauperem quendam mendicum, jam credo saturum, jocantem atque ridentem, et ingemui & locutus sum cum amicis qui mecum erant, &c." Confessions, book 6: "Passing through a certain street in Milan, I noticed a poor beggar, already full, I believe, joking and laughing; I groaned and spoke with the friends who were with me," and so on. Compare 6.6.9.

[6809] Editor. Augustine, Confessions 6.6.9–10. Vicus Mediolanensis is a street in Milan, not a village in its territory; Burton's English rendering is preserved. Augustine goes on to identify the beggar's merriment with drunkenness and to distinguish it from true joy. Burton omits that qualification. Prevented us means reached it before us, not prevented us from having it; careful means anxious.

[6810] Burton. Printed page 330, x: "Et certe ille lætabatur, ego anxius; securus ille, ego trepidus. Et si percontaretur me quispiam an exultare mallem, an metuere, responderem, exultare: & si rursus interrogaret an ego talis essem, an qualis nunc sum, me ipsis curis confectum eligerem; sed perversitate, non veritate." "Certainly he rejoiced, while I was anxious; he was at ease, while I was fearful. If anyone asked whether I would rather rejoice or fear, I would answer, rejoice. And if he asked again whether I were like him or as I am now, I would choose myself, worn out by these very cares—but from perversity, not truth." Burton's Latin abbreviates and alters Augustine's fuller question; its compressed syntax is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That which S. Austin said of himself here in this place, I may truly say to thee; thou discontented wretch, thou covetous niggard, thou churl, thou ambitious and swelling toad, 'tis not want but peevishnesse which is the cause of thy woes; settle thine affection, thou hast enough.	What Saint Augustine says of himself here, I may truly say to you: you discontented wretch, you greedy miser, you churl, you ambitious, puffed-up toad! Your troubles come from perversity, not want. Bring your desires to rest: you have enough.[6811]
[6812]Denique sit finis quærendi, quoque habeas plus, Pauperiem metuas minus, & finire laborem Incipias; parto, quod avebas, utere.	At last put an end to acquiring; the more you have, The less you should fear poverty, and begin To end your toil: use what you longed for, now acquired.[6813]

[6811] Editor. Peevishness here means perverse or wilful discontent. Affection means the direction of one's desires and passions. The invective is Burton's direct address, not a continuation of Augustine's quotation.

[6812] Burton. Printed page 330, y: "Hor." Horace, Satires 1.1.92–94, adapted.

[6813] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.1.92–94, adapted. Burton's quoque (understood here as the more) differs from cumque (and since), and utere (use) replaces the continuation in Horace. The modern version renders Burton's exhortation, while recording the altered text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Make an end of scraping, purchasing this Manor, this field, that house, for this and that child; thou hast enough for thy self and them;	Stop scraping together money, buying this manor, this field, that house, for one child and another. You have enough for yourself and them.
—— [6814]Quod petis hic est, Est Ulubris, animus si te non deficit æquus,	What you seek is here; It is at Ulubrae, if an even mind does not fail you.[6815]
'Tis at hand, at home already, which thou so earnestly seekest. But	What you seek so earnestly is at hand, already at home. But—
—— O si angulus ille Proximus accedat, qui nunc denormat agellum,	If only that neighbouring corner could be added, Which now spoils the shape of my little farm![6816]
Source page 331 O that I had but that one nook of ground, that field there, that pasture,	If only I had that one corner of land, that field over there, that pasture!
O si venam argenti fors quis mihi monstret ——	If only someone might show me a vein of silver![6817]

[6814] Burton. Printed page 330, †: "Hor. ep. lib. 1." Horace, Epistles 1.11.29–30.

[6815] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.11.29–30. Ulubrae was a small Italian town, an example of an unremarkable place where a balanced mind may still find happiness. Burton follows the quotation with his own application to contentment at home.

[6816] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.6.8–9. The coveted neighbouring plot makes the existing small farm irregular in shape; denormat therefore means spoils its outline. The speaker's wish exposes the persistence of acquisitive desire.

[6817] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.6.10 has urnam argenti, a pot of silver, and fors quae, a chance that. Burton prints venam, a vein, and quis, someone. The fresh translation follows his printed Latin, while his following English pot of mony is also retained; the inconsistency remains visible.

Original text 1651	Modern English
O that I could but finde a pot of mony now, to purchase, &c. to build me a new house, to marry my daughter, place my son, &c. [6818]O if I might but live a while longer to see all things setled, some two or three year, I would pay my debts, make all my reckonings even; but they are come and past, and thou hast more businesse then before. O madnesse to think to settle that in thine old age when thou hast more, which in thy youth thou canst not now compose having but a little.	If only I could find a pot of money now, to buy property, build a new house, marry off my daughter, find my son a position, and so on! If only I could live a little longer to see everything settled—two or three years—I would pay my debts and balance all my accounts. But those years have come and gone, and you have more business than before. What madness to think you can settle things in old age, when you have more, if you cannot put them in order now, in youth, with only a little![6819]
[6820]Pyrrhus would first conquer Africk, and then Asia, & tum suaviter agere, and then live merrily and take his ease: but when Cyneas the Orator told him he might do that already, id jam posse fieri, rested satisfied, condemning his own folly. Si parva licet componere magnis, thou maist do the like, and therefore be composed in thy fortune.	Pyrrhus intended first to conquer Africa, then Asia, "and then live pleasantly"—then live merrily and take his ease. But when Cineas the orator told him that he could do so already, "that it could be done now," he rested content, condemning his own folly. "If small things may be compared with great," you may do the same; so be at peace with your fortune.[6821]

[6818] Burton. Printed page 331, z: "O si nunc morerer, inquit, quanta et qualia mihi imperfecta manerent: sed si mensibus decem vel octo supervixero, omnia redigam ad libellum, ab omni debito creditoque me explicabo; prætereunt interim menses decem, & octo, & cum illis anni, et adhuc restant plura quam prius; quid igitur speras. O insane, finem quem rebus tuis non inveneras in juventâ, in senecta impositurum? O dementiam, quum ob curas et negotia tuo judicio sis infelix, quid putas futurum quum plura supererint? Cardan, lib. 8. cap. 40. de rer. var." "If I were to die now, he says, how many unfinished things, and of what importance, would remain! But if I live another ten or eight months, I shall put everything in order in my account book and disentangle myself from every debt and credit. Meanwhile ten and eight months pass, and years with them, yet more remains than before. What, then, do you hope? Madman, will you put an end in old age to affairs you could not settle in youth? What madness: when cares and business make you unhappy in your own judgement, what do you think will happen when still more remains?" Cardano, On the Variety of Things 8.40; precise text remains to be collated.

[6819] Editor. Place my son means establish him in a position or livelihood. The long Cardano margin gives eight or ten months and then years; Burton's English application gives two or three years. Both forms are retained. The Latin account-book phrase is translated in its financial context; exact collation with On the Variety of Things remains pending.

[6820] Burton. Printed page 331, †: "Plutarch." Compare Life of Pyrrhus 14; Burton changes the account substantially.

[6821] Editor. Plutarch, Life of Pyrrhus 14, describes a projected sequence through Italy, Sicily, Libya/Carthage, Macedonia and Greece, not Burton's Africa then Asia. Crucially, Pyrrhus is troubled by Cineas's reasoning but does not abandon his ambition; Burton makes him rest satisfied. Both changes are preserved and identified. Si parva licet componere magnis means if small things may be compared with great; the wording is a familiar Virgilian formula.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thou hast enough; he that is wet in a bath, can be no more wet if he be flung into Tiber, or into the Ocean it self; and if thou hadst all the world, or a solid masse of gold as big as the world, thou canst not have more then enough; enjoy thy self at length, and that which thou hast; the minde is all; be content, thou art not poor, but rich, and so much the richer, as [6822]Censorinus well writ to Cerellius, quanto pauciora optas, non quo plura possides, in wishing less, not having more.	You have enough. A man wet in a bath can be no wetter if thrown into the Tiber, or into the ocean itself. If you possessed the whole world, or a solid mass of gold as large as the world, you could not have more than enough. At last enjoy your life and what you have. The mind is everything. Be content: you are rich, not poor, and richer, as Censorinus aptly wrote to Cerellius, "the fewer things you wish for, not the more you possess"—by wanting less, not having more.[6823]
I say then Non adjice opes, sed minue cupiditates ('tis [6824]Epicurus advice) adde no more wealth, but diminish thy desires; and as [6825]Chrysostome well seconds him, Si vis ditari, contemne divitias; that's true plenty, not to have, but not to want riches, non habere, sed non indigere, vera abundantia; 'tis more glory to contemne, then to possesse; & nihil egere, est deorum.	I say, then, "Do not add riches; reduce your desires"—Epicurus's advice. Add no more wealth, but diminish your wants. Chrysostom aptly supports him: "If you want to become rich, despise riches." True abundance consists in not needing wealth, rather than having it: "Not possessing, but not needing, is true abundance." There is more glory in despising riches than in possessing them; "and to need nothing belongs to the gods."[6826]

[6822] Burton. Printed page 331, *: "Lib. de natali. cap. 1." Censorinus, On the Birthday, chapter 1.

[6823] Editor. Censorinus, On the Birthday 1, addresses Quintus Caerellius (Burton's Cerellius) and locates wealth in wanting less. Burton abbreviates the wording. The bath analogy argues that sufficiency cannot be exceeded in kind; it is part of the consolation, not a measurement of material resources.

[6824] Burton. Printed page 331, *: "Apud Stobæum ser. 17." "In Stobaeus, discourse 17." The collection and historical numbering remain to be collated.

[6825] Burton. Printed page 331, *: "Hom. 12. in 2 Cor. 6." Chrysostom, Homily 12 on 2 Corinthians 6, as printed; precise location remains uncollated.

[6826] Editor. The Epicurus maxim is attributed through Stobaeus; the Chrysostom reference remains to be checked in its historical numbering. The closing nihil egere est deorum also appears in Censorinus, On the Birthday 1, which attributes the thought to Xenophon's Socrates. Its point is divine freedom from need.

Original text 1651	Modern English
How many deaf, dumb, halt, lame, blinde, miserable persons could I reckon up that are poor, and withall distressed, in imprisonment, banishment, gally-slaves, condemned to the mines, quarries, to gives, in dungeons, perpetuall thraldome, then all which thou art richer, thou art more happy, to whom thou art able to give an almes, a Lord, in respect, a petty prince: [6827]be contented then I say, repine and mutter no more; for thou art not poor indeed but in opinion.	How many people could I list who are deaf, unable to speak, limping, lame, blind, or miserable—poor and afflicted as well? People imprisoned or banished, galley slaves, people condemned to mines, quarries, shackles, dungeons, lifelong bondage. You are richer and happier than all of them; you can give them charity. Compared with them, you are a lord, a minor prince. Be content, then, I say; grumble and mutter no more, for you are poor in your own estimation, not in fact.[6828]
Yea, but this is very good counsell, and rightly applied to such as have it, and will not use it, that have a competency, that are able to work and get their living by the sweat of their browes, by their trade, that have something yet; he that hath birds, may catch birds; but what shall we do that are slaves by nature, impotent, and unable to help our selves, meer beggers, that languish and pine away, that have no means at all, no hope of means, no trust of delivery, or of better successe?	Yes, but this is very good advice, rightly addressed to those who have resources and will not use them: those who have enough, who can work and earn their living by the sweat of their brows, by their trade, who still have something. Someone who has birds can catch birds. But what are we to do—we who are slaves by nature, powerless and unable to help ourselves, outright beggars wasting and pining away, with no means at all, no hope of getting any, no prospect of deliverance or a better outcome?[6829]

[6827] Burton. Printed page 331, a: “Non in paupertate, sed in paupere (Senec.) non re sed opinione labores.” “The trouble lies not in poverty but in the poor man (Seneca); you suffer not from the thing itself but from your opinion.” The Latin is compressed, and no work is named; compare the general argument of Consolation to Helvia 12.1.

[6828] Editor. Halt and lame overlap as terms for impaired mobility; gives are gyves or shackles. Burton compares his addressee with people suffering both poverty and further deprivation. The next paragraph immediately tests the consolation with an objection from people who genuinely cannot support themselves.

[6829] Editor. Competency means enough to live on; impotent means powerless or physically incapable. Birds serve as decoys: obtaining more already requires some resources. “Slaves by nature” is the speaker’s inherited social language. Burton now gives real deprivation a sustained voice after the preceding argument that poverty may lie in opinion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as those old Britans complained to their Lords and Masters the Romans oppressed by the Picts, mare ad Barbaros, Barbari ad mare, the Barbarians drove them to the sea, the sea drove them back to the Barbarians; our present misery compels us to cry out and howl, to make our moan to rich men; they turn us back with a scornfull answer to our misfortune again, and will take no pity of us;	Like the ancient Britons, oppressed by the Picts, who complained to their lords and masters, the Romans: "The sea drives us to the barbarians; the barbarians to the sea." The barbarians drove them to the sea, and the sea drove them back to the barbarians. Our present misery forces us to cry out and howl, to appeal to the rich; they send us back to our misfortune with a scornful answer and take no pity on us.[6830]
Source page 331–332 they commonly overlooke their poor friends in adversity, if they chance to meet them, they voluntarily forget and will take no notice of them; they will not, they cannot help us. Insteed of comfort they threaten us, miscall, scoffe at us, to aggravate our misery, give us bad language, or if they do give good words, what's that to relieve us? According to that of Thales, Facile est alios monere; who cannot give good counsell? 'tis cheap, it costs them nothing.	They commonly overlook their poor friends in adversity. If they happen to meet them, they deliberately forget them and refuse to acknowledge them. They will not help us; they cannot. Instead of comforting us, they threaten, abuse and mock us, adding to our misery with insults. Or if they do offer kind words, what relief is that? As Thales said, "It is easy to advise others." Who cannot give good advice? It is cheap; it costs them nothing.[6831]

[6830] Editor. Compare Gildas, The Ruin of Britain 20, the Britons' appeal to the Roman official Agitius, usually identified as Aetius. Burton's compressed Latin begins with the sea, whereas his English and Gildas begin with the barbarians. Both orders are retained.

[6831] Editor. Thales was one of the traditional Seven Sages of Greece. Burton supplies no source for this maxim; its precise intermediary remains unlocated. Voluntarily forget means deliberately fail to recognize; miscall means abuse with insulting names.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 332 It is an easie matter when ones belly is full to declame against fasting, Qui satur est pleno laudat jejunia ventre; Doth the wild Asse bray when he hath grasse, or loweth the Oxe when he hath fodder? Job 6.5. [6832]Neque enim populo Romano quidquam potest esse lætius, No man living so jocond, so merry as the people of Rome when they had plenty; but when they came to want, to be hunger-starved, neither shame, nor lawes, nor armes, nor Magistrates could keep them in obedience.	It is easy, with a full belly, to declaim against fasting: "The well-fed man praises fasting on a full stomach." "Does the wild ass bray when he has grass, or the ox low when he has fodder?" Job 6:5. "For nothing can be more cheerful than the Roman people." No one alive was so cheerful, so merry, as the people of Rome when they had plenty. But when they fell into want and were starved with hunger, neither shame, nor laws, nor arms, nor magistrates could keep them obedient.[6833]

[6832] Burton. Printed page 332, asterisk: "Vopiscus Aureliano, sed si populus famelicus inedia laboret, nec arma, leges, pudor, magistratus, coercere valent." Vopiscus, Aurelian: "But if the famished people suffer from lack of food, neither arms, laws, shame nor magistrates can restrain them."

[6833] Editor. Burton prints "declame against fasting," but his Latin means "praises fasting." The contradiction is retained. Job 6:5 supports the protest that a cry of distress presupposes want. The Roman-people sentence appears in Historia Augusta, Aurelian 47.4; the extended warning in Burton's margin has not been confirmed there.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Seneca pleadeth hard for poverty, and so did those lazie Philosophers: but in the mean time [6834]he was rich, they had wherewithall to maintain themselves; but doth any poor man extoll it? There are those (saith [6835]Bernard) that approve of a mean estate, but on that condition they never want themselves; and some again are meek so long as they may say or do what they list; but if occasion be offered, how far are they from all patience? I would to God (as he said) [6836]No man should commend povertie, but he that is poor, or he that so much admires it, would relieve, help, or ease others.	Seneca argues strongly for poverty, and so did those lazy philosophers. Yet he was rich, and they had enough to support themselves. Does any poor man praise it? "Some people," says Bernard, "approve of a humble condition, on condition that they themselves never go without. Others are meek so long as they may say or do whatever they please; but when put to the test, how far they are from patience!" I wish to God, as someone said, that no one would praise poverty unless he were poor himself; or that whoever admires it so much would relieve, help or ease the burden of others.[6837]
[6838]Nunc si nos audis, atque es divinus Apollo, Dic mihi, qui nummos non habet, unde petat:	Now, if you hear us and are divine, Apollo, Tell me where someone without money can get it.[6839]
Now if thou hear'st us, and art a good man, Tell him that wants, to get means, if you can.	Now, if you hear us and are a good man, Tell someone in need how to get a living, if you can.
But no man hears us, we are most miserably dejected, the skumme of the world,	But no one hears us. We are utterly cast down, the scum of the world:

[6834] Burton. Printed page 332, b: "One of the richest men in Rome." Burton's comment on Seneca.

[6835] Burton. Printed page 332, dagger: "Serm. Quidam sunt qui pauperes esse volunt ita ut nihil illis desit, sic commendant ut nullam patiantur inopiam; sunt & alii mites, quandiu dicitur & agitur ad eorum arbitrium, &c." Sermon: "Some wish to be poor provided they lack nothing; they praise poverty on condition that they suffer no want. Others are mild so long as things are said and done as they wish, and so on."

[6836] Burton. Printed page 332, asterisk: "Nemo paupertatem commendaret nisi pauper." "No one should praise poverty unless he is poor." The margin supplies no author.

[6837] Editor. Bernard is Bernard of Clairvaux, as conventionally understood here; "Serm." does not identify a particular sermon. Burton's speaker objects to praising poverty from a position of security and asks its admirers to provide practical help. The precise Bernard passage and the anonymous following maxim await collation.

[6838] Burton. Printed page 332, dagger: "Petronius Catalec." Petronius, Catalecta, a collection of shorter or miscellaneous poems.

[6839] Editor. Petronius, fragment 34.5–6 in the consulted collection. Apollo is addressed as divine and able to answer an appeal for money. Burton's separate English couplet changes "divine Apollo" into "a good man." Both the fresh translation of the Latin and the modernized English couplet are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6840]Vix habet in nobis jam nova plaga locum,	There is scarcely room on us now for another blow.[6841]
We can get no relief, no comfort, no succour,	We can get no relief, no comfort, no help:
[6842]Et nihil inveni quod mihi ferret opem.	And I found nothing that could bring me help.[6843]
We have tried all means, yet finde no remedy: No man living can express the anguish and bitternesse of our souls, but we that endure it; we are distressed, forsaken, in torture of body and mind, in another hell: and what shall we do?	We have tried every means and found no remedy. No one alive can express the anguish and bitterness of our souls except those of us who endure it. We are afflicted and abandoned, tormented in body and mind, in another hell. What are we to do?
When [6844]Crassus the Roman Consul warred against the Parthians, after an unlucky battell fought, he fled away in the night, and left four thousand men sore sick and wounded in his tents, to the furie of the enemie, which when the poor men perceived, clamoribus & ululatibus omnia compleverunt, they made lamentable moan, and roared down right, as lowd as Homers Mars when he was hurt, which the noise of a 10000 men could not drown, and all for fear of present death.	When Crassus, the Roman consul, fought the Parthians, he fled by night after a disastrous battle, leaving four thousand severely sick and wounded men in his camp to face the enemy's fury. When the poor men realized this, "they filled everything with cries and howls." They lamented miserably and roared aloud, as loudly as Homer's Mars when wounded—a roar that ten thousand men could not drown out—all from fear of imminent death.[6845]

[6840] Burton. Printed page 332, asterisk: "Ovid." Ovid; see the editorial note for the passage.

[6841] Editor. Ovid, Letters from the Black Sea 2.7.42: the body is imagined as already covered with Fortune's wounds. Burton omits the source's connective -que in vixque, without changing the central image.

[6842] Burton. Printed page 332, dagger: "Ovid." Ovid; see the editorial note for the passage.

[6843] Editor. Ovid, Letters from the Black Sea 2.7.46, continuing the same account of repeated misfortune. Burton separates the two lines and applies the individual exile's lament to the collective voice of the destitute.

[6844] Burton. Printed page 332, asterisk: "Plutarch. vit. Crassi." Plutarch, Life of Crassus.

[6845] Editor. Plutarch, Crassus 27.5–28.1, describes the wounded men's cries during the withdrawal and the killing of four thousand men left in camp. The comparison with Mars is Burton's addition from Homer, Iliad 5.859–863: Ares cries as loudly as nine or ten thousand warriors. Burton makes their combined noise unable to drown his cry.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But our estate is farre more tragicall and miserable, much more to be deplored, and far greater cause have we to lament; the devil and the world persecute us, all good fortune hath forsaken us, we are left to the rage of beggery, cold, hunger, thirst, nastiness, sickness, irksomeness, to continue all torment, labour and pain, to derision and contempt, bitter enemies all, and far worse then any death; Death alone we desire, death we seek, yet cannot have it, and what shall we do?	But our condition is far more tragic and miserable, far more pitiable; we have much greater cause to lament. The devil and the world persecute us; all good fortune has forsaken us. We are left at the mercy of beggary, cold, hunger, thirst, filth, sickness and weariness, to endure continual torment, toil and pain, mockery and contempt—all bitter enemies, far worse than any death. Death alone is what we desire; death we seek, yet cannot have. What are we to do?
Quod male fers, assuesce; feres bene —— accustome thy self to it, and it will be tolerable at last. Yea but I may not, I cannot. In me consumpsit vires fortuna nocendo, I am in the extremitie of humane adversitie; and as a shadow leaves the bodie when the Sun is gone, I am now left and lost, and quite forsaken of the world.	"What you bear badly, grow used to; you will bear it well." Accustom yourself to it, and eventually it will become tolerable. "Yes, but I cannot; it is beyond me. Fortune has exhausted her strength in harming me. I am at the utmost limit of human adversity. As a shadow leaves the body when the sun is gone, so I am now abandoned, lost, utterly forsaken by the world."[6846]
Source page 332–333 Qui jacet in terra, non habet unde cadat; Comfort thy self with this yet, thou art at the worst, and before it be long it will either overcome thee or thou it. If it be violent, it cannot endure, aut solvetur, aut solvet: Let the devil himself and all the plagues of Egypt come upon thee at once,	"Someone lying on the ground has nowhere left to fall." Take comfort in this, at least: you are at the worst, and before long either it will overcome you or you will overcome it. If it is violent, it cannot last: "Either it will break up, or it will break you." Let the devil himself and all the plagues of Egypt fall on you at once:
Source page 333 Ne tu cede malis, sed contra audentior ito,	Do not yield to adversity; meet it with greater courage.[6847]
be of good courage; Misery is vertues whetstone.	Be courageous: misery is virtue's whetstone.

[6846] Editor. The first maxim is Ovid, Art of Love 2.647, originally advice about becoming accustomed to a lover's perceived defects. The Fortune line and "Who lies on the ground has nowhere to fall," below, also occur together in Thomas Kyd's The Spanish Tragedy, Act 1, in the Portuguese viceroy's lament. Their earlier sources and Burton's route to them remain unestablished. Changes of speaker are made explicit in the modern punctuation.

[6847] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 6.95. The consulted text begins tu ne rather than Burton's ne tu. Burton omits the next line's qualification, "as far as your Fortune allows you." His following counsel expands the verse into a general exhortation to endurance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [6848]serpens, sitis, ardor, arenæ, Dulcia virtuti,	Serpents, thirst, heat and sands Are sweet to courage.[6849]

[6848] Burton. Printed page 333, asterisk: “Lucan. lib. 9.” Lucan, book 9.

[6849] Editor. Lucan, Civil War 9.402–404, Cato’s address before the desert crossing. The consulted text has ardor harenae, “the heat of the sand”; Burton’s punctuation and arenæ treat heat and sands as separate hardships, as his English gloss confirms.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as Cato told his souldiers marching in the desarts of Lybia, Thirst, heat, sands, serpents, were pleasant to a valiant man; honourable enterprises are accompanied with dangers and dammages, as experience evinceth; they will make the rest of thy life rellish the better.	As Cato told his soldiers marching through the deserts of Libya, thirst, heat, sands and serpents were pleasant to a brave man. Honourable undertakings bring dangers and losses, as experience proves; they will make the rest of your life taste sweeter.
But put case they continue; thou art not so poor as thou wast born, and as some hold, much better to be pitied then envied. But be it so thou hast lost all, poor thou art, dejected, in pain of body, grief of mind, thine enemies insult over thee, thou art as bad as Job; yet tell me (saith Chrysostome) was Job or the devil the greater conquerour? surely Job; The [6850]devil had his goods, he sate on the muck-hil and kept his good name; he lost his children, health, friends, but he kept his innocency; he lost his mony, but he kept his confidence in God, which was better then any treasure.	But suppose they continue. You are not as poor as when you were born; and, as some maintain, it is much better to be pitied than envied. Suppose, then, that you have lost everything: you are poor, cast down, in bodily pain and mental anguish; your enemies gloat over you; you are as badly off as Job. Yet tell me, says Chrysostom, who was the greater victor, Job or the devil? Surely Job. The devil had his goods; Job sat on the dunghill and kept his good name. He lost his children, health and friends, but kept his innocence. He lost his money, but kept his trust in God, which was better than any treasure.[6851]
Do thou then as Job did, triumph as Job did, [6852]and be not molested as every fool is. Sed qua ratione potero? How shall this be done? Chrysostome answers, facilè si cœlum cogitaveris, with great facility, if thou shalt but meditate on heaven.	Do as Job did, then; triumph as Job did, and do not let yourself be disturbed as every fool does. “But how shall I be able to?” How is this to be done? Chrysostom answers, “Easily, if you think of heaven”: very easily, if you will only meditate on heaven.[6853]

[6850] Burton. Printed page 333, dagger: “An quum super fimo sedit Job, an cum omnia abstulit diabolus, &c. pecuniis privatus fiduciam deo habuit, omni thesauro preciosiorem.” “Was it when Job sat on the dunghill, or when the devil took everything, and so on? Deprived of money, he had trust in God, more precious than every treasure.” This compressed excerpt belongs to the question of victory in the body.

[6851] Editor. The Book of Job supplies the central example of loss without surrendering righteousness. Compare Chrysostom, On the Statues 5.1–2, on Job’s dunghill and his victory over the devil. The exact Latin wording in Burton’s marginal excerpt still needs collation with his edition of Chrysostom.

[6852] Burton. Printed page 333, asterisk: “Hæc videntes sponte philosophemini, nec insipientum affectibus agitemur.” “Seeing these things, practise philosophy willingly, and let us not be driven by the passions of fools.” The printed Latin moves from a plural command to a first-person exhortation.

[6853] Editor. Philosophize in the margin means practise reasoned self-command, not merely speculate. Burton’s appeal combines classical constancy with Christian expectation of heaven. The precise source of the question and answer remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6854]Hanna wept sore, and troubled in mind, could not eat; but, why weepest thou, said Elkanah her husband, and why eatest thou not? why is thine heart troubled? am not I better to thee then ten sons? and she was quiet. Thou art here [6855]vexed in this world; but say to thy self, Why art thou troubled, O my soule? Is not God better to thee then all temporalities, and momentany pleasures of the world? be then pacified.	Hannah wept bitterly and, troubled in mind, could not eat. “But why are you weeping?” said Elkanah, her husband. “Why do you not eat? Why is your heart troubled? Am I not better to you than ten sons?” And she was quiet. You are troubled here in this world; but say to yourself, “Why are you troubled, my soul?” Is God not better to you than all worldly possessions and the world’s fleeting pleasures? Then be at peace.[6856]

[6854] Burton. Printed page 333, asterisk: “1 Sam. 1.8.” 1 Samuel 1:8.

[6855] Burton. Printed page 333, c: “James 1.2. My brethren, count it an exceeding joy, when you fall into divers temptations.” Here temptations means trials or tests, as well as temptations in the narrower modern sense.

[6856] Editor. 1 Samuel 1:8 records Elkanah’s questions. Hannah’s renewed eating and changed expression are reported later, in 1:18, after her prayer and Eli’s response; Burton compresses the sequence. “Why are you troubled, my soul?” recalls Psalms 42–43. Temporalities are worldly possessions or advantages.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And though thou beest now peradventure in extreme want, [6857]it may be 'tis for thy further good, to try thy patience, as it did Jobs, and exercise thee in this life: trust in God, and rely upon him, and thou shalt be [6858]crowned in the end. What's this life to eternity? The world hath forsaken thee, thy friends and fortunes all are gone: yet know this, that the very hairs of thine head are numbred, that God is a spectator of all thy miseries, he sees thy wrongs, woes, and wants, [6859]'Tis his good will and pleasure it should be so, and he knows better what is for thy good then thou thy self.	Though you may now be in extreme want, perhaps it is for your further good: to test your patience, as Job's was tested, and train you in this life. Trust in God and rely on him, and you will be crowned in the end. What is this life beside eternity? The world has forsaken you; your friends and fortunes are all gone. Yet know this: the very hairs of your head are numbered. God witnesses all your miseries; he sees your injuries, sorrows and needs. It is his good will and pleasure that things should be so, and he knows better than you do yourself what is good for you.[6860]
His providence is over all, at all times he hath set a guard of angels over us, and keeps us as the apple of his eye, Ps. 17.8. Some he doth exalt, prefer, blesse with worldly riches, honours, offices and preferments, as so many glistering stars he makes to shine above the rest: some he doth miraculously protect from theeves, incursions, sword, fire, and all violent mischances,	His providence watches over everything at all times. He has set a guard of angels over us and keeps us as the apple of his eye, Psalm 17:8. Some he raises up, advances and blesses with worldly riches, honours, offices and promotions, making them shine above the rest like glittering stars. Some he miraculously protects from thieves, raids, sword, fire and every violent calamity.[6861]

[6857] Burton. Printed page 333, d: "Afflictio dat intellectum; quos Deus diligit castigat. Deus optimum quemque aut mala valetudine aut luctu afficit. Seneca." "Affliction gives understanding; God chastens those he loves. God afflicts the best men with ill health or grief." Seneca.

[6858] Burton. Printed page 333, e: "Quam sordet mihi terra quum cœlum intueor!" "How mean the earth seems to me when I look at heaven!" No author is specified here.

[6859] Burton. Printed page 333, asterisk: "Senec. de providentia cap. 2. Diis ita visum, dii melius norunt quid sit in commodum meum." Seneca, On Providence, chapter 2: "So it has seemed good to the gods; the gods know better what is to my advantage."

[6860] Editor. The margin combines scriptural-sounding maxims with Seneca. Compare Hebrews 12:6 and Seneca, On Providence 4.8, which asks why God afflicts the best with illness, grief or other troubles. The separate citation to On Providence 2 supports the general discipline-of-adversity theme, but its exact quoted wording has not been located. The numbered hairs recall Matthew 10:30 and Luke 12:7.

[6861] Editor. Psalm 17:8 supplies the apple-of-the-eye image; the guard of angels recalls Psalm 91:11. Burton combines these promises rather than quoting one continuous biblical passage. Prefer and preferments concern advancement, office and patronage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and as the [6862]Poet fains of that Lycian Pandarus, Lycaons son, when he shot at Menelaus the Græcian with a strong arm, and deadly arrow, Pallas, as a good mother keeps flies from her childs face asleep, turned by the shaft, and made it hit on the buckle of his girdle; so some he solicitously defends, others he exposeth to danger, poverty, sickness, want, misery, he chastiseth and corrects, as to him seems best, in his deep, unsearchable and secret judgement, and all for our good.	As the poet tells of the Lycian Pandarus, Lycaon's son: when he shot a deadly arrow with a strong arm at Menelaus the Greek, Pallas turned the shaft aside—as a good mother keeps flies from her sleeping child's face—and made it strike his belt's buckle. In this way God carefully defends some; others he exposes to danger, poverty, sickness, want and misery. He chastens and corrects them as seems best to his profound, unfathomable and hidden judgement, all for our good.[6863]
Source page 333–334 [6864]The tyrant took the city (saith Chrysostome) God did not hinder it; led them away captives, so God would have it; he bound them, God yielded to it: flung them into the furnace, God permitted it: heat the Oven hotter, it was granted: and when the Tyrant had done his worst, God shewed his power, and the Childrens patience, he freed them: so can he thee, and can [6865]help in an instant, when it seems to him good.	"The tyrant took the city," says Chrysostom; "God did not prevent it. He led them away captive: God allowed it. He bound them: God consented. He threw them into the furnace: God permitted it. He heated the oven hotter: it was granted. And when the tyrant had done his worst, God revealed his power and the young men's patience, and set them free." He can do the same for you, and can help in an instant whenever he sees fit.[6866]

[6862] Burton. Printed page 333, dagger: "Hom. Iliad. 4." Homer, Iliad 4.

[6863] Editor. Homer, Iliad 4.127–140: Athena diverts Pandarus's arrow toward the meeting of Menelaus's belt-clasps and armour. The arrow still penetrates and wounds him; the divine intervention prevents a fatal wound. Burton compresses the episode. Pallas is Athena; Mars in the earlier comparison is Ares.

[6864] Burton. Printed page 333, dagger: "Hom. 9. voluit urbem tyrannus evertere, & Deus non prohibuit; voluit captivos ducere, non impedivit; voluit ligare, concessit, &c." Homily 9: "The tyrant wished to overthrow the city, and God did not prevent him; he wished to lead them captive, and God did not stop him; he wished to bind them, and God consented, and so on." Chrysostom is named in the body; the sermon collection is not specified.

[6865] Burton. Printed page 334, f: "Psal. 113. De terra inopem, de stercore erigit pauperem." Psalm 113: "[He raises] the needy from the earth, lifts the poor from the dunghill." Compare verse 7; the opening phrase is abbreviated.

[6866] Editor. The tyrant is Nebuchadnezzar; the "children" are the three Hebrew youths in Daniel 3. Chrysostom's On the Statues 6.11 repeats the sequence: city destroyed, captives taken, bonds, furnace, fiercer heat, then divine rescue. This comparison is in English translation. Burton's "Hom. 9" and his Latin wording still require an identified edition. The Psalm 113 margin begins the next printed page and belongs to this sentence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 334 [6867]Rejoyce not against me, O my enemy; for though I fall, I shall rise: when I sit in darkness, the Lord shall lighten me. Remember all those Martyrs what they have endured, the utmost that humane rage and fury could invent, with what [6868]patience they have born, with what willingness embraced it. Though he kill me, saith Job, I will trust in him. Justus [6869]inexpugnabilis, as Chrysostome holds, a just man is impregnable, and not to be overcome. The gout may hurt his hands, lameness his feet, convulsions may torture his joynts, but not rectam mentem, his soule is free.	"Do not rejoice over me, my enemy. Though I fall, I shall rise; when I sit in darkness, the Lord will give me light." Remember all that the martyrs endured, the worst that human rage and fury could invent: how patiently they bore it, how willingly they embraced it. "Though he kill me," says Job, "I will trust in him." "The righteous man is impregnable," as Chrysostom maintains: he cannot be overcome. Gout may hurt his hands, lameness his feet; convulsions may torture his joints, but not "an upright mind." His soul is free.[6870]
—— [6871]nempe pecus, rem, Lectos, argentum tollas licet; in manicis & Compedibus sævo teneas custode ——	Cattle, property, Beds and silver—you may take them away; You may hold me in handcuffs and fetters under a cruel guard.[6872]

[6867] Burton. Printed page 334, g: "Micah. 8.7." The chapter and verse are printed in this order; the quotation is Micah 7:8.

[6868] Burton. Printed page 334, h: "Preme, preme, ego cum Pindaro, [Greek, provisionally: ἀβάπτιστος εἰμὶ ὡς φελλὸς ὑπὲρ ἅλμας], immersibilis sum sicut suber super maris septum. Lipsius." "Press me down, press me down; I say with Pindar, 'I am unsinkable, like cork above the brine'—I am unsinkable like cork above a net in the sea." Lipsius. The small Greek type is imperfectly printed; its reading is provisional. Pindar's Pythian 2.79–80 has a fuller phrase, including ἕρκος, net or barrier; the Latin here retains that image.

[6869] Burton. Printed page 334, i: "Hic ure, hic seca, ut in æternum parcas, Austin. Diis fruitur iratis, superat & crescit malis. Mutium ignis, Fabricium paupertas, Regulum tormenta, Socratem venenum superare non potuit." "Burn here, cut here, so that you may spare me for eternity." Augustine. "He benefits from the gods even in their anger; he overcomes and grows through adversity. Fire could not overcome Mucius, poverty Fabricius, tortures Regulus, or poison Socrates." These are examples of constancy; the complete note is one marginal container.

[6870] Editor. Micah 7:8 is printed as 8.7; "Though he kill me" is Job 13:15. Gloss-e calls the Hic ure prayer pseudo-Augustinian, comparing Augustine's medical metaphor in Psalm 6.3, not the exact prayer. The compound margin illustrates endurance, not bodily invulnerability. Its immediate sources, Lipsius's passage and the marked provisional Greek remain unresolved.

[6871] Burton. Printed page 334, dagger: "Hor. epist. 18. lib. 1." Horace, Epistles 1.18, as printed. The lines are from 1.16.75–77.

[6872] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.16.75–77, not 1.18 as the margin states. The original is an exchange between a virtuous man and a ruler threatening confiscation and imprisonment. Burton condenses the threat into teneas, "you may hold," and omits te sub before custode. The modern text follows Burton's wording.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6873]Take away his mony, his treasure is in heaven; banish him his country, he is an inhabitant of that heavenly Jerusalem; cast him into bands, his conscience is free; kill his body, it shall rise again; he fights with a shadow that contends with an upright man: He will not be moved.	Take away his money: his treasure is in heaven. Banish him from his country: he is a citizen of the heavenly Jerusalem. Put him in chains: his conscience is free. Kill his body: it will rise again. Whoever fights an upright man fights a shadow. He will not be shaken.[6874]
—— si fractus illabatur orbis, Impavidum ferient ruinæ,	If the shattered world should fall, Its ruins will strike him unafraid.[6875]
Though heaven it self should fall on his head, he will not be offended. He is impenetrable, as an anvile hard, as constant as Job.	Though heaven itself should fall on his head, he will not be shaken. He is impenetrable, hard as an anvil, as steadfast as Job.
[6876]Ipse deus simulatque volet me solvet opinor.	God himself, as soon as he wishes, will release me, I believe.[6877]

[6873] Burton. Printed page 334, dagger: “Hom. 5. Auferet pecunias? at habet in cœlis: patria dejiciet? at in cœlestem civitatem mittet: vincula injiciet? at habet solutam conscientiam: corpus interficiet, at iterum resurget; cum umbra pugnat qui cum justo pugnat.” Homily 5: “Will he take his money? He has it in heaven. Will he cast him out of his homeland? He will send him to the heavenly city. Will he put him in chains? His conscience remains free. Will he kill his body? It will rise again. Whoever fights the righteous fights a shadow.” Chrysostom is the author understood from the surrounding passage.

[6874] Editor. Chrysostom, On the Statues 5.3, closely supplies this sequence of confiscation, exile, chains, death and the opponent who fights a shadow. Burton makes the heavenly city explicitly Jerusalem. Bands means bonds or fetters.

[6875] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.3.7–8, on the steadfast just man. Burton’s following English gloss replaces the falling world with heaven falling on his head; both layers remain.

[6876] Burton. Printed page 334, dagger: “Leonides.” Leonides. This entry follows the Homily 5 note. Its exact intended attachment is uncertain: the body’s next dagger marks Ipse deus, but a later epigram concerns Epictetus. The entry is retained at that next marked anchor rather than silently reassigned.

[6877] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.16.78, but altered. The consulted text has “as soon as I wish,” whereas Burton prints volet, “he wishes,” and moves opinor, “I think,” into the verse. Horace’s next line explains release as death; Burton applies the line to providential deliverance. The nearby marginal “Leonides” is not a secure attribution of this Horatian line.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Be thou such a one, let thy misery be what it will, what it can, with patience endure it; thou mayst be restored as he was. Terris proscriptus, ad cœlum propera; ab hominibus desertus, ad deum fuge. The poor shall not alwayes be forgotten, the patient abiding of the meek shall not perish for ever, Psal. 10.18. ver. 9. The Lord will be a refuge of the oppressed, & a defence in the time of trouble.	Be such a person yourself. Whatever your misery is, however great it may be, endure it patiently; you may be restored as Job was. "Banished from earth, hasten to heaven; deserted by men, flee to God." "The poor will not always be forgotten; the patient waiting of the meek will not perish for ever," Psalm 10:18. Verse 9: "The Lord will be a refuge for the oppressed, a defence in times of trouble."[6878]
Servus Epictetus, mutilati corporis, Irus Pauper: at hæc inter charus erat superis,	Epictetus was a slave, his body maimed, Poor as Irus; yet amid these hardships the gods loved him.[6879]
Lame was Epictetus, and poor Irus, Yet to them both God was propitious:	Epictetus was lame, and Irus poor, Yet God was kind to them both.

[6878] Editor. Both quotations correspond to Psalm 9 in common modern English numbering: verses 18 and 9 respectively. Burton prints "Psal. 10.18. ver. 9." The Latin transition urges turning from earthly exile to heaven; it is not part of those psalm verses.

[6879] Editor. The Latin describes one man: Epictetus, enslaved, physically impaired and as poor as Irus, the proverbial beggar. Burton's English makes Epictetus and Irus two recipients of divine favour. Compare Greek Anthology 7.676, the epigram quoted in Oldfather's introduction to Epictetus. Its precise relationship to the nearby marginal attribution "Leonides" requires further collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Lodovicus Vertomannus that famous traveller, indured much misery, yet surely saith Scaliger, he was vir deo charus, in that he did escape so many dangers, God especially protected him, he was dear unto him: Modo in egestate, tribulatione, convalle deplorationis &c. Thou art now in the vale of misery, in poverty, in agony, [6880]in temptation; rest, eternity, happiness, immortality shall be thy reward, as Chrysostome pleads, if thou trust in God, and keep thine innocency. Non si malè nunc, & olim sic erit semper; a good houre may come upon a sudden; [6881]expect a little.	Ludovico di Varthema, the famous traveller, endured much misery. Yet surely, says Scaliger, he was "a man dear to God," since he escaped so many dangers. God protected him especially; he was dear to him. "Now in want, affliction, the valley of lamentation, and so on." You are now in the valley of misery, in poverty, agony and temptation; rest, eternity, happiness and immortality will be your reward, as Chrysostom argues, if you trust in God and preserve your innocence. "If things are bad now, they will not always be so in future." A favourable hour may come suddenly; wait a little.[6882]
Yea, but this expectation is it which tortures me in the mean time; [6883]futura expectans præsentibus angor, whilest the grass grows the horse starves; [6884]Despair not, but hope well,	"Yes, but this waiting is what tortures me meanwhile. While I await the future, the present torments me. While the grass grows, the horse starves." Do not despair; keep hoping for better.[6885]

[6880] Burton. Printed page 334, asterisk: "Modo in pressura, in tentationibus, erit postea bonum tuum requies, æternitas, immortalitas." "Now you are under pressure and in trials; afterwards your good will be rest, eternity and immortality."

[6881] Burton. Printed page 334, k: "Dabit Deus his quoque finem." "God will bring these things too to an end." Virgil, Aeneid 1.199.

[6882] Editor. Vertomannus is the traveller Ludovico di Varthema. Burton's Scaliger quotation and the precise Chrysostom excerpt remain unlocated. The line Non si malè nunc adapts Horace, Odes 2.10.17–18, adding semper, "always"; the margin Dabit Deus is from Virgil, Aeneid 1.199. These different sources support the appeal to wait.

[6883] Burton. Printed page 334, l: "Seneca." Seneca. The exact source of futura expectans præsentibus angor has not yet been located.

[6884] Burton. Printed page 334, m: "Nemo desperet meliora lapsus." "Let no one who has fallen despair of better things." Compare Seneca, Thyestes 616, where the consulted text has lapsis, "when fortunes have fallen," rather than Burton's lapsus, "one who has fallen."

[6885] Editor. The proverb makes the objection concrete: promised future relief does not meet present hunger. Burton attributes the Latin complaint to Seneca without a work reference. The marginal reply resembles Thyestes 616; the different reading is recorded in the Burton note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6886]Spera Batte, tibi melius lux Crastina ducet; Dum spiras spera ——	Hope, Battus: tomorrow's light will bring you something better. While you breathe, hope.[6887]
Chear up, I say, be not dismayd; Spes alit agricolas; he that sowes in teares, shall reap in joy, Psal. 126.7.	Take heart, I say; do not be dismayed. "Hope sustains farmers." "Whoever sows in tears will reap in joy," Psalm 126:7.[6888]
Si fortune me tormente, Esperance me contente.	If fortune torments me, Hope consoles me.[6889]
Source page 335 hope refresheth, as much as misery depresseth; hard beginnings have many times prosperous events, and that may happen at last which never was yet. A desire accomplished delights the soul, Prov. 13.19.	Hope refreshes as much as misery weighs down. Hard beginnings often have happy outcomes, and something that has never happened yet may happen at last. "A fulfilled desire delights the soul," Proverbs 13:19.
[6890]Grata superveniet quæ non sperabitur hora.	The hour you do not expect will arrive as a welcome surprise.[6891]
Which makes m' enjoye my joys long wish'd at last, Welcome that houre shall come when hope is past:	It lets me enjoy at last the joys I have long wished for; Welcome is the hour that comes when hope has passed.

[6886] Burton. Printed page 334, dagger: "Theocritus." Theocritus; the address to Battus corresponds to Idyll 4.41. Burton quotes a Latin rendering of the Greek.

[6887] Editor. The address to Battus and the counsel to hope while alive correspond to Theocritus, Idyll 4.41–43. Burton condenses the latter into the Latin proverb Dum spiras spera, "While you breathe, hope." His particular Latin wording and its translator remain untraced.

[6888] Editor. "Hope sustains farmers" is the opening of Tibullus 2.6.21. The psalm quotation is Psalm 126:5 in common English numbering; Burton prints verse 7, although that psalm has six verses.

[6889] Editor. A French rhyming maxim: fortune torments, hope consoles. Burton supplies no author. Its verse form is retained without forcing a new rhyme.

[6890] Burton. Printed page 335, asterisk: "Ovid." Ovid, as printed; the verse is Horace, Epistles 1.4.14.

[6891] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.4.14, despite the margin's attribution to Ovid. In context, Horace urges treating each day as the last; an additional, unexpected hour then becomes welcome. Burton's English couplet instead stresses the eventual enjoyment of long-desired joys.

Original text 1651	Modern English
a louring morning may turne to a fair afternoone,	A gloomy morning may turn into a fine afternoon:
[6892]Nube solet pulsâ candidus ire dies.	When the cloud is driven away, a bright day often follows.[6893]
the hope that is defer'd, is the fainting of the heart, but when the desire commeth, it is a tree of life, Prov. 13.12. [6894]suavissimum est voti compos fieri. Many men are both wretched and miserable at first, but afterwards most happy; and oftentimes it so falls out, as [6895]Machiavel relates of Cosmos Medices, that fortunate and renowned Citizen of Europe, that all his youth was full of perplexity, danger and misery till forty yeares were past, and then upon a sudden the Sun of his honour brake out as through a cloud. Hunniades was fetched out of prison, and Henry the third of Portugall out of a poor Monastery, to be crowned kings.	"Deferred hope makes the heart faint, but when desire is fulfilled it is a tree of life," Proverbs 13:12. "It is most sweet to obtain one's wish." Many people are wretched and miserable at first, but afterwards very happy. It often happens as Machiavelli relates of Cosimo de' Medici, that fortunate and renowned citizen of Europe: all his youth was full of anxiety, danger and misery until forty years had passed; then suddenly the sun of his honour broke out as through a cloud. Hunyadi was brought from prison, and Henry the Third of Portugal from a poor monastery, to be crowned kings.[6896]
Multa cadunt inter calicem supremaque labra,	Much can happen between the cup and the edge of the lips.[6897]

[6892] Burton. Printed page 335, dagger: "Ovid." Ovid, Tristia 2.142.

[6893] Editor. Ovid, Tristia 2.142. In its original setting, the clearing weather supports hope that imperial anger may soften. Burton uses it after his own morning-and-afternoon comparison.

[6894] Burton. Printed page 335, n: "Thales." Thales. No work or intermediary is supplied; the exact attribution remains to be collated.

[6895] Burton. Printed page 335, o: "Lib. 7. Flor. hist. Omnium felicissimus, & locupletissimus, &c. incarceratus sæpe adolescentiam periculo mortis habuit, solicitudinis & discriminis plenam, &c." Florentine History, book 7: "Most fortunate and wealthiest of all, and so on; imprisoned, he often spent his youth in danger of death, full of anxiety and peril, and so on." Burton's compressed Latin summary is retained separately from the English account.

[6896] Editor. Machiavelli's Florentine History, book 7, describes Cosimo de' Medici's anxieties before forty and later good fortune. The identities and details of the following two royal anecdotes need further historical collation. "Henry the third of Portugall" is retained as printed; the apparent intended figure is Cardinal Henry of Portugal, not a king conventionally styled Henry III.

[6897] Editor. A form of the proverb "many a slip between cup and lip." Burton uses its uncertainty hopefully: events can change before the outcome is settled. The exact Latin source is not given.

Original text 1651	Modern English
beyond all hope and expectation many things fall out, and who knows what may happen? Nondum omnium dierum Soles occiderunt, as Philippus said, All the Sunnes are not yet set, a day may come to make amends for all. Though my father and mother forsake me, yet the Lord will gather mee up, Psal. 27.10. Waite patiently on the Lord, and hope in him, Psal. 37.7. Bee strong, hope and trust in the Lord, and he will comfort thee, and give thee thine hearts desire, Psal. 27. vers. 14.	Many things happen beyond all hope and expectation; who knows what may happen? "The suns of all our days have not yet set," as Philip said. Not all the suns have set; a day may come to make amends for everything. "Though my father and mother forsake me, the Lord will take me in," Psalm 27:10. "Wait patiently for the Lord and hope in him," Psalm 37:7. "Be strong, hope and trust in the Lord, and he will comfort you and give you your heart's desire," Psalm 27:14.[6898]

[6898] Editor. Philippus is Philip; Burton does not identify him further or give a source for the saying. Psalm 27:14 urges waiting and courage; "give you your heart's desire" recalls Psalm 37:4. The modern text preserves Burton's composite quotation and printed references.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sperate & vosmet rebus servate secundis.	Keep hoping, and preserve yourselves for better times.[6899]
Fret not thy self because thou art poor, contemned, or not so well for the present as thou wouldest be, not respected as thou oughtest to be, by birth, place, worth; or that which is a double corrosive, thou hast been happy, honourable and rich, art now distressed and poor, a scorn of men, a burden to the world, irksome to thy self and others, thou hast lost all:	Do not fret because you are poor, despised, or not as well off at present as you would wish; because you do not receive the respect your birth, position or worth deserves. Or, what eats away at you doubly, because you were once happy, honoured and rich, but are now afflicted and poor, an object of scorn, a burden to the world, wearisome to yourself and others, having lost everything:
Miserum est fuisse felicem, and as Boethius cals it, Infelicissimum genus infortunii; this made Timon halfe mad with melancholy, to think of his former fortunes and present misfortunes; this alone makes many miserable wretches discontent. I confess it is a great misery to have been happy, the quintessence of infelicity, to have been honourable and rich, but yet easily to be endured:	"It is misery to have been happy," and, as Boethius calls it, "the unhappiest kind of misfortune." Thinking of his former fortune and present misfortunes made Timon half mad with melancholy. This alone makes many miserable people discontented. I admit that having been happy is a great misery—the very essence of unhappiness, having once been honoured and rich—yet it can readily be endured.[6900]

[6899] Editor. Adapted from Virgil, Aeneid 1.207. The consulted text begins Durate, "endure," while Burton substitutes Sperate, "hope." The rest urges preservation for more favourable circumstances.

[6900] Editor. Compare Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 2, prose 4: recollection of former happiness intensifies present adversity. Timon is the traditional Athenian misanthrope, associated with ruined fortune and hatred of humanity; Burton gives no precise source for this account. Corrosive means something that eats away at the sufferer.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6901]Security succeeds, and to a judicious man a far better estate. The loss of thy goods and money is no loss; [6902]thou hast lost them, they would otherwise have lost thee. If thy mony be gone, [6903]thou art so much the lighter, and as Saint Hierome perswades Rusticus the Monke, to forsake all and follow Christ: Gold and silver are too heavy metals for him to carry that seeks heaven.	Freedom from anxiety follows, and, for a discerning man, a far better condition. Losing your goods and money is no loss: you have lost them; otherwise they would have ruined you. If your money is gone, you are that much lighter. As Saint Jerome urges the monk Rusticus to leave everything and follow Christ: gold and silver are too heavy for someone seeking heaven to carry.[6904]
[6905]Vel nos in mare proximum, Gemmas & lapides, aurum & inutile, Summi materiam mali Mittamus, scelerum si bene pœnitet.	Or let us throw into the nearest sea Gems and jewels, and useless gold, The material of the greatest evil, If we truly repent of our sins.[6906]

[6901] Burton. Printed page 335, p: “Lætior successit securitas quæ simul cum divitiis cohabitare nescit. Camden.” “A happier freedom from anxiety followed, which cannot dwell together with riches.” Camden; the work and passage are not specified.

[6902] Burton. Printed page 335, q: “Pecuniam perdidisti, fortassis illa te perderet manens. Seneca.” “You have lost your money; perhaps, had it stayed, it would have ruined you.” Seneca; exact location still to be established.

[6903] Burton. Printed page 335, r: “Expeditior es ob pecuniarum jacturam. Fortuna opes auferre non animum potest. Seneca.” “You are less encumbered through the loss of money. Fortune can take away wealth, but not the mind.” Seneca; exact location still to be established.

[6904] Editor. “Security” means freedom from care; fortassis means “perhaps,” weaker than Burton’s assertion. Manipulus florum, Amissio h/l source sheets, link these sayings to Pseudo-Seneca, De remediis fortuitorum 11.1–3. Burton’s intermediary, Camden, the fortune-and-mind maxim and Jerome’s heavy-metals phrase remain unlocated; the latter was not found in Letter 125.

[6905] Burton. Printed page 335, dagger: “Hor.” Horace; compare Odes 3.24.47–50.

[6906] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.24.47–50. Burton prints nos where the consulted text has non; his resulting exhortation is translated as printed. He also has materiam for materiem. The preceding omitted lines mention another destination, the Capitol, so this excerpt is detached from a longer argument about wealth and public morality.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 335–336 Zeno the Philosopher lost all his goods by shipwrack, [6907]he might like of it, fortune had done him a good turne: Opes à me, animum auferre non potest: She can take away my means, but not my minde. He set her at defiance ever after, for she could not rob him that had naught to lose: for he was able to contemn more then they could possess or desire.	Zeno the philosopher lost all his goods in a shipwreck; he could welcome it, for Fortune had done him a good turn. “She can take my wealth from me, but not my mind.” Ever afterwards he defied her: she could not rob someone who had nothing to lose. He could despise more than others could possess or desire.[6908]
Source page 336 Alexander sent an hundred talents of gold to Phocion of Athens for a present, because he heard he was a good man: but Phocion returned his talents back again with a permitte me in posterum virum bonum esse, to be a good man still; let me be as I am:	Alexander sent a hundred talents of gold as a gift to Phocion of Athens because he had heard that he was a good man. But Phocion sent the talents back with the reply, “Allow me to remain a good man in future.” Let me remain good; leave me as I am.[6909]
Non mi aurum posco, nec mi precium ——	I ask for no gold for myself, no payment.[6910]
That Theban Crates flung of his own accord his money into the Sea, abite nummi, ego vos mergam, ne mergar à vobis, I had rather drown you, then you should drown me. Can Stoicks and Epicures thus contemn wealth, and shall not we that are Christians?	Crates of Thebes threw his money into the sea of his own accord: “Away, coins! I will drown you, so that you do not drown me.” I would rather drown you than have you drown me. Can Stoics and Epicureans despise wealth like this, while we Christians cannot?[6911]

[6907] Burton. Printed page 335, s: “Jubet me posthac fortuna expeditius Philosophari.” “Fortune bids me henceforth practise philosophy with fewer encumbrances.” The speaker in the body is Zeno; no source is named in this margin.

[6908] Editor. Zeno is the Stoic philosopher. The shipwreck exemplum makes loss an opportunity for an unencumbered philosophical life. Burton’s exact anecdote and formulation still require source collation. Fortune is personified as a woman.

[6909] Editor. Plutarch, Phocion 18.1–3, relates Alexander’s gift of one hundred talents and Phocion’s refusal in order to remain, and be thought, honourable. Burton specifies gold, which the consulted account does not specify. A talent is an ancient weight and large monetary unit; no modern monetary equivalent is imposed.

[6910] Editor. Compare the verse attributed to Ennius and quoted by Cicero, On Duties 1.38, in which Pyrrhus refuses ransom for prisoners. Burton applies the sentiment after Phocion’s refusal of a gift. His Non at the opening differs from Nec in the consulted Cicero text; his line stops before dederitis.

[6911] Editor. Crates was a Cynic philosopher of Thebes. The wider labels “Stoicks and Epicures” are Burton’s own grouping; they are retained. The money-drowning anecdote and its route into Burton remain to be collated, rather than treated as independently verified history.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It was mascula vox & præclara, a generous speech of Cotta in [6912]Sallust, Many miseries have happened unto me at home, and in the wars abroad, of which by the help of God some I have endured, some I have repelled, and by mine own valour overcome: courage was never wanting to my designes, nor industry to my intents; prosperity or adversity could never alter my disposition.	It was "a manly and splendid utterance," a noble speech by Cotta in Sallust: "Many miseries have befallen me at home and in wars abroad. With God's help I have endured some, repelled others, and overcome them by my own courage. My undertakings never lacked spirit, nor my purposes effort; prosperity or adversity could never change my character."[6913]
A wise mans minde as Seneca holds, [6914]is like the state of the world above the moon, ever serene. Come then what can come, befall what may befall, infractum invictumque [6915]animum opponas: Rebus angustis animosus atque fortis appare. (Hor. Od. 11. lib. 2.)	A wise man's mind, as Seneca maintains, is like the region of the universe above the moon, always serene. Let whatever can come, come; let whatever may happen, happen: "Set against it a spirit unbroken and unconquered. In adversity show yourself spirited and brave." (Horace, Odes 2.11.)[6916]
Hope and Patience are two soveraigne remedies for all, the surest reposals, the softest cushions to lean on in adversity;	Hope and patience are two supreme remedies for everything, the surest places of rest, the softest cushions to lean on in adversity:

[6912] Burton. Printed page 336, dagger: "In frag. Quirites, multa mihi pericula domi, militiæ multa adversa fuere, quorum alia toleravi, alia deorum auxilio repuli & virtute mea: nunquam animus negotio defuit, nec decretis labor; nullæ res nec prosperæ nec adversæ ingenium mutabant." In the fragments: "Citizens, I have faced many dangers at home and many adversities on campaign. Some I endured, others I repelled with the gods' help and my own courage. My undertakings never lacked spirit, nor my decisions effort; no circumstances, prosperous or adverse, changed my character." The body names Sallust.

[6913] Editor. Sallust, Histories, fragment known as the Speech of Cotta, opening. Burton's margin compresses the Latin; his English changes the gods' help to God's help. He ends before Cotta says that in his present troubles everything, including Fortune, has deserted him—a qualification important to the source speech's context.

[6914] Burton. Printed page 336, asterisk: "Qualis mundi status supra lunam semper serenus." "Like the condition of the universe above the moon, always serene." The body attributes this to Seneca; compare Letters 59.16.

[6915] Burton. Printed page 336, t: "Bona mens nullum tristioris fortunæ recipit incursum, Val. lib. 4. c. 1. Qui nil potest sperare, desperet nihil." "An upright mind admits no assault from harsher fortune." Valerius Maximus, book 4, chapter 1. "Whoever can hope for nothing should despair of nothing." Both maxims form one marginal container; the second has no separate attribution here.

[6916] Editor. The image uses the traditional division between the changeable region below the moon and the serene heavens above it. Compare Seneca, Letters 59.16. Both maxims in the Valerius margin remain to be collated. The final Horace quotation is Odes 2.10.21–22, not 2.11 as Burton prints.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6917]Durum sed levius fit patientiâ, Quicquid corrigere est nefas.	Hard though it is, patience makes lighter Whatever we are not permitted to change.[6918]
If it cannot be helped, or amended, [6919]make the best of it; [6920]necessitati qui se accommodat, sapit, he is wise that suits himself to the time. As at a game at tables, so do by all such inevitable accidents.	If it cannot be helped or put right, make the best of it. "Whoever accommodates himself to necessity is wise": a wise man adapts himself to the times. Treat all such unavoidable events as you would a game of backgammon.[6921]
[6922]Ita vita est hominum quasi cum ludas tesseris, Si illud quod est maxime opus jactu non cadit, Illud quod cecidit forte, id arte ut corrigas;	Human life is like a game of dice: If the throw you most need does not fall, Use skill to improve what chance has thrown.[6923]

[6917] Burton. Printed page 336, u: "Hor." Horace; see the editorial note on the verse.

[6918] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.24.19–20. Patientia is endurance or patience; nefas makes the inability to change events a limit imposed by divine order.

[6919] Burton. Printed page 336, x: "Æquam memento rebus in arduis servare mentem. lib. 2. Od. 3." "Remember to keep an even mind in difficult circumstances." Horace, Odes 2.3.

[6920] Burton. Printed page 336, dagger: "Epict. c. 18." Epictetus, chapter 18, as cited by Burton; the exact location remains to be collated.

[6921] Editor. "Tables" is an ancestor of backgammon; the Horace margin quotes Odes 2.3.1–2. The necessity maxim corresponds to the Euripides quotation in the Enchiridion's closing sayings (numbered 52 in the consulted Carter transcription). This locates the thought in English translation; Burton's Latin version and printed chapter 18 remain unreconciled.

[6922] Burton. Printed page 336, y: "Ter. Adel. act. 4. Sc. 7." Terence, The Brothers, act 4, scene 7.

[6923] Editor. Terence, The Brothers, act 4, scene 7: Micio compares unavoidable events to dice throws. Burton adjusts the wording slightly. The point is skill in responding to a result one cannot choose.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If thou canst not fling what thou wouldest, play thy cast as well as thou canst. Every thing saith [6924]Epictetus hath two handles, the one to be held by, the other not: 'tis in our choice to take and leave whether we will (all which Simplicius his Commentator, hath illustrated by many examples) and 'tis in our own power, as they say, to make or mar our selves.	If you cannot throw what you wish, play your throw as well as you can. Everything, says Epictetus, has two handles: one by which it can be held, the other by which it cannot. We may choose what to take and what to leave. His commentator Simplicius has illustrated all this with many examples. It lies within our power, as the saying goes, to make or mar ourselves.[6925]
Conforme thy self then to thy present fortune, and cut thy coat according to thy cloth, [6926]Ut quimus (quod aiunt) quando quod volumus non licet. Be contented with thy losse, state and calling whatsoever it is, and rest as well satisfied with thy present condition in this life:	Adapt yourself, then, to your present circumstances, and cut your coat according to your cloth: "As we can, as they say, when we cannot do as we wish." Be content with your loss, whatever your condition and calling may be, and rest satisfied with your present lot in life.[6927]
Esto quod es; quod sunt alii, sine quemlibet esse; Quod non es, nolis; quod potes esse, velis.	Be what you are; let everyone else be what they are. Do not wish to be what you are not; wish to be what you can.[6928]
Be as thou art; and as they are, so let Others be still; what is and may be covet.	Be as you are, and let others Remain as they are; desire what is and what may be.

[6924] Burton. Printed page 336, asterisk: "Unaquæque res duas habet ansas, alteram quæ teneri, alteram quæ non potest, in manu nostra quam volumus accipere." "Everything has two handles, one that can be held and one that cannot; it lies in our power to take whichever we wish."

[6925] Editor. Epictetus, Enchiridion 43, distinguishes a handle by which an event can be borne from one by which it cannot. His example is responding to a brother's wrongdoing through the bond of kinship. Burton develops this into the language of choosing and self-management. Simplicius wrote a commentary on the Enchiridion.

[6926] Burton. Printed page 336, z: "Ter. And. Act. 4. sc. 6." Terence, The Woman of Andros, act 4, scene 6.

[6927] Editor. Terence, The Woman of Andros 805, spoken by Mysis: circumstances permit doing what one can, rather than what one wishes. Burton's wording is a slight adaptation.

[6928] Editor. The Latin couplet is left unattributed by Burton; its precise source remains unlocated. His following English couplet is a separate, freer version, and is therefore retained as well as the fresh translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 336–337 And as he that is [6929]invited to a feast, eats what is set before him, and looks for no other, enjoy that thou hast, and aske no more of God then what he thinks fit to bestow upon thee. Non cuivis contingit adire Corinthum, we may not be all Gentlemen, all Cato's, or Lælii, as Tully telleth us, all honourable, illustrious and serene, all rich; but because mortall men want many things, [6930]Therefore, saith Theodoret, hath God diversly distributed his gifts, wealth to one, skill to another, that rich men might encourage and set poor men a work, poor men might learn severall trades to the common good.	As someone invited to a feast eats what is set before him and looks for nothing else, enjoy what you have and ask no more of God than he thinks fit to give you. "Not everyone gets to go to Corinth." We cannot all be gentlemen, all Catos or Laeliuses, as Cicero tells us; all honourable, illustrious and serene; all rich. Mortal people need many things. Therefore, says Theodoret, God has distributed his gifts differently: wealth to one, skill to another, so that the rich might encourage and employ the poor, and the poor might learn different trades for the common good.[6931]
Source page 337 As a peece of Arras is composed of severall parcels, some wrought of silke, some of gold, silver, crewell of divers colours, all to serve for the exornation of the whole: Musick is made of divers discords and keyes, a totall summ of many smal numbers: so is a Common-wealth of severall inequal trades and callings.	As a tapestry is made of different parts, some worked in silk, some in gold or silver, some in worsted yarn of different colours, all contributing to the beauty of the whole; as music is made of different discords and keys, and a total of many small numbers: so a commonwealth is made of different, unequal trades and callings.[6932]

[6929] Burton. Printed page 336, asterisk: "Epictetus. Invitatus ad convivium, quæ apponuntur comedas, non quæris ultra; in mundo multa rogitas quæ dii negant." "Epictetus. Invited to a dinner, you eat what is set before you and ask for nothing further; in the world you keep asking for many things the gods refuse."

[6930] Burton. Printed page 336, a: "Cap. 6. de providentia. Mortales cum sint rerum omnium indigi, ideo deus aliis divitias, aliis paupertatem distribuit, ut qui opibus pollent, materiam subministrent; qui vero inopes, exercitatas artibus manus admoveant." "On Providence, chapter 6. Since mortals need everything, God has assigned riches to some and poverty to others, so that those with wealth may supply the materials, while the poor put to work hands practised in crafts." This margin continues across the foot of the page.

[6931] Editor. Compare Epictetus, Enchiridion 15, for life as a dinner party; the wording in Burton's margin is not that passage verbatim. The Corinth proverb is Horace, Epistles 1.17.36. "Illustrious" and "serene" evoke titles of rank. The exact Cicero passage about Cato and Laelius and the wording of Theodoret's sixth discourse On Providence remain to be collated.

[6932] Editor. Arras is tapestry, named after a centre of its manufacture; crewel is worsted yarn used for embroidery. Burton makes the woven design an analogy for an unequal but interdependent society.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6933]If all should be Crœsi and Darii, all idle, all in fortunes equall, who should till the land? As [6934]Menenius Agrippa well satisfied the tumultuous rout of Rome, in his elegant Apologue of the belly and the rest of the members: Who should build houses, make our severall stuffs for raiments? We should all be starved for company, as Poverty declared at large in Aristophanes Plutus, and sue at last to be as we were at first.	If everyone were a Croesus or a Darius, all idle and equally wealthy, who would till the land? Menenius Agrippa answered Rome's unruly crowd well with his elegant fable of the belly and the other parts of the body. Who would build houses or make the different fabrics for our clothes? We should all starve together, as Poverty explains at length in Aristophanes' Wealth, and end by begging to return to our former condition.[6935]
And therefore God hath appointed this inequality of States, orders and degrees, a subordination, as in all other things. The earth yields nourishment to vegetals, sensible creatures feed on vegetals, both are substitutes to reasonable souls, and men are subject amongst themselves, and all to higher powers, so God would have it.	God has therefore appointed this inequality of stations, orders and ranks, a hierarchy like that in everything else. The earth nourishes plants; creatures with senses feed on plants; both serve rational souls. People are subject to one another, and all to higher powers: so God would have it.[6936]

[6933] Burton. Printed page 337, b: "Si sint omnes æquales, necesse est ut omnes fame pereant; quis aratro terram sulcaret, quis sementem faceret, quis plantas sereret, quis vinum exprimeret?" "If all were equal, all would necessarily starve. Who would furrow the earth with a plough, sow the seed, plant the plants, or press the wine?"

[6934] Burton. Printed page 337, c: "Liv. l. 1." Livy, book 1, as printed; the story is in book 2.32.

[6935] Editor. Croesus and Darius stand for immense royal wealth. Menenius's fable is in Livy 2.32, although Burton's margin says book 1: the body's parts discover that the apparently idle belly also supports them. Poverty's argument that universal wealth would destroy the incentive to work occurs in Aristophanes' Wealth (Plutus). Burton combines these arguments to defend social inequality.

[6936] Editor. "Vegetals" are plants; "sensible" creatures possess sensation; "reasonable souls" are rational human beings. Burton uses a traditional hierarchy of living things to support his theological account of human ranks.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All things then being rightly examined and duly considered as they ought, there is no such cause of so generall discontent, 'tis not in the matter it self, but in our minde, as we moderate our passions and esteem of things. Nihil aliud necessarium ut sis miser (saith [6937]Cardan) quam ut te miserum credas, Let thy fortune be what it will, 'tis thy minde alone that makes thee poor or rich, miserable or happy.	When everything is rightly examined and duly considered, then, there is no such cause for widespread discontent. It lies not in the thing itself but in our minds, in how we govern our passions and judge things. "Nothing else is needed to make you miserable," says Cardano, "but that you believe yourself miserable." Whatever your fortune may be, your mind alone makes you poor or rich, miserable or happy.[6938]
Vidi ego (saith divine Seneca) in villa hilari & amœna mæstos, & mediâ solitudine occupatos; non locus sed animus facit ad tranquillitatem. I have seen men miserably dejected in a pleasant Village, and some again, well occupied and at good ease in a solitary desart. 'Tis the mind, not the place causeth tranquillity, and that gives true content.	"I have seen," says the divine Seneca, "sad people in a cheerful and pleasant villa, and busy people in the midst of solitude. It is the mind, not the place, that makes for tranquillity." I have seen people miserably cast down in a pleasant village, and others well occupied and at ease in a lonely wilderness. It is the mind, not the place, that brings tranquillity and true contentment.[6939]
I will yet add a word or two for a Corollary. Many rich men, I dare boldly say it, that lye on down-beds, with delicacies pampered every day, in their well furnished houses, live at less hearts ease, with more anguish, more bodily pain, and through their intemperance more bitter hours, then many a prisoner or gally-slave; [6940]Mæcenas in plumâ, æque vigilat ac Regulus in dolio:	I will add a word or two by way of conclusion. Many rich people—I dare say it boldly—lie on feather beds, pampered daily with delicacies in well-furnished houses, yet live with less peace of heart, more anguish, more bodily pain, and, through their excesses, more bitter hours than many prisoners or galley slaves. "Maecenas lies as wakeful on feathers as Regulus in a barrel."[6941]

[6937] Burton. Printed page 337, d: "Lib. 3. de cons." Cardano, On Consolation, book 3, as cited.

[6938] Editor. Girolamo Cardano is cited as Cardan. The sentence is translated as Burton prints it; its exact location in On Consolation, book 3, remains to be verified. The claim concerns the sufferer's judgement of circumstances within Burton's consolatory argument.

[6939] Editor. Seneca, Letter 55.8, describes people in solitude who seem busy or preoccupied, rather than necessarily content. Burton changes occupatis similes to occupatos and makes their ease explicit in his English gloss. Villa means a country house or estate; his separate gloss says "Village." Both stages of his rendering are retained.

[6940] Burton. Printed page 337, dagger: "Seneca." Seneca; compare On Providence 3.10.

[6941] Editor. Compare Seneca, On Providence 3.9–10, contrasting Maecenas's anxious luxury with Regulus's endurance of torture. Seneca has in cruce, on an instrument of torture; Burton substitutes in dolio, in a barrel, reflecting another form of the Regulus story. The comparison continues into the next unit: the rich can suffer more than the abandoned Arctic voyagers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
those poor starved Hollanders whom [6942]Bartison their Captain left in Nova Zembla, An. 1596. or those [6943]eight miserable Englishmen that were lately left behind, to winter in a stove in Greenland in 77. deg. of lat. 1630. so pitifully forsaken and forced to shift for themselves in a vast dark and desart place, to strive and struggle with hunger, cold, desperation, and death it self.	They live with less ease even than those poor starving Dutchmen whom their captain, Bartison, left in Novaya Zemlya in 1596; or those eight unfortunate Englishmen lately left behind to spend the winter in a heated shelter in Greenland, at latitude 77 degrees, in 1630: pitifully abandoned and forced to fend for themselves in a vast, dark, desolate place, struggling against hunger, cold, despair and death itself.[6944]
'Tis a patient and quiet minde (I say it again and again) gives true peace and content. So doth for all other things, they are as old [6945]Chremes told us, as we use them.	A patient, quiet mind—I say it again and again—gives true peace and contentment. So it is with everything else: things are, as old Chremes told us, what our use makes of them.
Parentes, patriam, amicos, genus, cognatos, divitias, Hæc perinde sunt ac illius animus qui ea possidet; Qui uti scit, ei bona; qui utitur non recte, mala.	Parents, homeland, friends, birth, relatives and wealth: These take their character from the mind of their possessor. For one who knows how to use them, they are good; for one who misuses them, bad.[6946]

[6942] Burton. Printed page 337, dagger: "Vide Isaacum Pontanum descript. Amsterdam. lib. 2. c. 22." "See Isaac Pontanus, Description of Amsterdam, book 2, chapter 22."

[6943] Burton. Printed page 337, asterisk: "Vide Ed. Pelhams book edit. 1630." "See Edward Pelham's book, published 1630." The account was published in 1631; 1630 is the year the overwintering began.

[6944] Editor. "Greenland" here refers to Spitsbergen: Edward Pellham's God's Power and Providence describes eight men left there during the winter of 1630–31 and was published in 1631, not the marginal date 1630. A "stove" can mean a heated room or shelter. Burton's earlier Novaya Zemlya account, the identity of "Bartison," and Pontanus's exact wording remain to be collated; abandonment by a captain should not be accepted from this allusion alone.

[6945] Burton. Printed page 337, e: "Heautontim. Act. 1. Sc. 2." Terence, The Self-Tormentor, act 1, scene 2.

[6946] Editor. Terence, The Self-Tormentor 194–196, spoken by Chremes. Burton condenses the wording and omits incolumem, "safe," after homeland. His ensuing prose expands the thought into an account of interpretation and disposition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Parents, friends, fortunes, country, birth, alliance, &c. ebbe and flow with our conceit; please or displease, as we accept and construe them, or apply them to our selves. Faber quisque fortunæ suæ, and in some sort I may truly say, prosperity and adversity are in our own hands. Nemo læditur nisi à seipso, and which Seneca confirms out of his judgement and experience, [6947]Every mans minde is stronger then fortune, and leads him to what side he will: a cause to himself each one is, of his good or bad life.	Parents, friends, fortune, country, birth, family connections and the rest ebb and flow with our judgement. They please or displease us according to how we receive and interpret them, or apply them to ourselves. "Everyone is the maker of his own fortune." In a sense, I may truly say that prosperity and adversity are in our own hands. "No one is harmed except by himself." Seneca confirms from his own judgement and experience that everyone's mind is stronger than fortune and leads him whichever way he wishes: each person is himself the cause of his good or bad life.[6948]
Source page 337–338 But will we, or nill we, make the worst of it, and suppose a man in the greatest extremity, 'tis a fortune which some indefinitely prefer before prosperity; of two extremes it is the best. Luxuriant animi rebus plerumque secundis, men in [6949]prosperity forget God and themselves, they are besotted with their wealth, as birds with henbane:	But, willing or unwilling, let us put the worst case and suppose a person in the greatest distress. Some prefer that condition to prosperity without qualification; of the two extremes, it is the better. "People's minds commonly grow wanton in prosperity." In prosperity people forget God and themselves; their wealth stupefies them as henbane does birds.[6950]

[6947] Burton. Printed page 337, dagger: "Epist. 98. Omni fortuna valentior ipse animus, in utramq. partem res suas ducit, beatæq. ac miseræ vitæ sibi causa est." "Letter 98. The mind itself is stronger than any fortune; it directs its affairs either way and is itself the cause of a happy or unhappy life."

[6948] Editor. The first two maxims mean that one makes one's fortune and that harm comes from oneself; Burton gives no precise sources here. Seneca's quoted argument is in Letter 98.2. "Conceit" in this passage means judgement or understanding, not vanity.

[6949] Burton. Printed page 338, f: "Fortuna quem nimium fovet stultum facit. Pub. Mimus." "Fortune makes a fool of anyone she favours too much." Attributed to Publilius Syrus, the writer of mimes.

[6950] Editor. The verse is Ovid, Art of Love 2.437. Burton transfers an observation about lovers to prosperity generally. Henbane supplies an image of stupefaction; "will we, or nill we" means whether we wish it or not.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 338 [6951]miserable if fortune forsake them, but more miserable if she tarry and overwhelm them: for when they come to be in great place, rich, they that were most temperate, sober and discreet in their private fortunes, as Nero, Otho, Vitellius, Heliogabalus (optimi imperatores nisi imperassent) degenerate on a sudden into brute beasts, so prodigious in lust, such tyrannicall oppressors, &c. they cannot moderate themselves, they become monsters, odious, harpies, what not?	They are miserable if Fortune deserts them, but more miserable if she stays and overwhelms them. For when they rise to high office and wealth, those who were most temperate, sober and prudent in private life—such as Nero, Otho, Vitellius and Elagabalus, "excellent emperors, had they never ruled"—suddenly degenerate into brute beasts: monstrous in lust, tyrannical oppressors, and so on. They cannot govern themselves; they become monsters, hateful creatures, harpies—what do they not become?[6952]
cum triumphos, opes, honores adepti sunt, ad voluptatem & otium deinceps se convertunt: 'twas [6953]Cato's note, they cannot contain. For that cause belike,	"Once they have gained triumphs, wealth and honours, they turn thereafter to pleasure and idleness." That was Cato's observation: they cannot restrain themselves. For that reason, perhaps:[6954]

[6951] Burton. Printed page 338, asterisk: "Seneca de beat. vit. cap. 14. miseri si deserantur ab ea, miseriores si obruantur." "Seneca, On the Happy Life, chapter 14: unhappy if they are deserted by her, unhappier if overwhelmed."

[6952] Editor. Seneca, On the Happy Life 14.1, speaks of being deserted or overwhelmed by pleasure; Burton applies the phrase to Fortune. The emperor maxim recalls Tacitus's judgement of Galba in Histories 1.49, but Burton makes it plural and applies it to different rulers. His claim about all four men's temperate private lives is rhetorical and is not verified here. Harpies are mythological predatory creatures.

[6953] Burton. Printed page 338, dagger: "Plutarch. vit. ejus." "Plutarch, his life": the Life of Cato the Elder.

[6954] Editor. Plutarch's Life of Cato the Elder contrasts Cato's continuing public work with others who retreat into pleasure after receiving high honours. Burton presents this narrative observation as Cato's own remark.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[6955]Eutrapilus cuicunque nocere volebat, Vestimenta dabat pretiosa: beatus enim jam, Cum pulchris tunicis sumet nova consilia & spes, Dormiet in lucem scorto, postponet honestum Officium ——	Whenever Eutrapelus wished to harm someone, He gave him expensive clothes. For now he is rich: With fine tunics he will take on new plans and hopes, Sleep into daylight, and for a prostitute neglect His honourable duty.[6956]
Eutrapilus when he would hurt a knave, Gave him gay clothes and wealth to make him brave: Because now rich he would quite change his minde, Keep whores, fly out, set honesty behinde.	When Eutrapelus wished to harm a rogue, He gave him fine clothes and wealth to make him grand. For, rich now, he would change his mind completely, Keep prostitutes, run wild and put honesty last.
On the other side, in adversity many mutter and repine, despair, &c. both bad I confess,	On the other hand, in adversity many grumble, complain and despair, and so on. Both conditions are bad, I admit:
—— [6957]ut calceus olim Si pede major erit, subvertet: si minor, uret.	As with a shoe: If it is too big for the foot, it trips you; if too small, it chafes.[6958]

[6955] Burton. Printed page 338, asterisk: “Hor. epist. l. 1. ep. 18.” Horace, Epistles, book 1, letter 18.

[6956] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.18.31–35. Eutrapelus undermines a man through luxurious gifts. The Latin puts a prostitute ahead of honourable duty; Burton’s printed punctuation places the comma after scorto. The modern rendering follows the sentence’s grammatical construction. His English verse adds wealth and calls the recipient a knave; “brave” here means splendidly dressed.

[6957] Burton. Printed page 338, g: “Hor.” Horace; Epistles 1.10.42–43.

[6958] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.10.42–43. A person whose circumstances do not fit is compared to someone wearing the wrong size of shoe.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As a shoo too big or too little, one pincheth, the other sets the foot awry, sed è malis minimum. If Adversity hath killed his thousand, prosperity hath killed his ten thousand: therefore Adversity is to be preferred; [6959]hæc fræno indiget, illa solatio: illa fallit, hæc instruit: The one deceives, the other instructs; the one miserably happy, the other happily miserable: and therefore many Philosophers have voluntarily sought adversity, and so much commend it in their precepts.	Like a shoe too big or too small: one pinches, the other turns the foot awry. “But choose the least of evils.” If adversity has killed its thousand, prosperity has killed its ten thousand. Adversity is therefore to be preferred. “The one needs a bridle, the other consolation; the one deceives, the other instructs.” One is miserably happy, the other happily miserable. Many philosophers have therefore sought adversity of their own accord and praise it so highly in their teachings.[6960]
Demetrius in Seneca esteemed it a great infelicity, that in his life time he had no misfortune, miserum cui nihil unquam accidisset adversi. Adversity then is not so heavily to be taken, & we ought not in such cases so much to macerate our selves: there is no such odds in poverty and riches.	Demetrius, in Seneca, thought it a great misfortune that he had met no misfortune in his lifetime: “Unhappy is the man to whom nothing adverse has ever happened.” Adversity, then, should not be taken so heavily; in such circumstances we ought not to wear ourselves away so much. There is no such great difference between poverty and riches.[6961]

[6959] Burton. Printed page 338, h: “Boeth. 2.” Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy, book 2.

[6960] Editor. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 2, prose 8, argues that prosperous fortune deceives while adversity teaches. The preceding “bridle/consolation” phrase is not located in that passage; its wording is retained without assigning both pronouns a fixed antecedent. The thousand and ten thousand adapt the song about Saul and David in 1 Samuel 18:7.

[6961] Editor. Seneca, On Providence 3.3, attributes to Demetrius a general judgement that the person who never suffers adversity is unfortunate. Burton recasts this as a statement about Demetrius’s own life. His wording is preserved here. “Macerate” means wear down or torment; “odds” means difference or disparity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To conclude in [6962]Hieroms words, I will ask our magnificoes that build with marble, and bestow a whole Manor on a thred, what difference betwixt them and Paul the Ermite, that bare old man: they drink in jewels, he in his hand: he is poor and goes to heaven, they are rich and go to hell.	To conclude in Jerome's words: I will ask our grandees, who build with marble and spend an entire estate on a thread, what difference there is between them and Paul the Hermit, that destitute old man. They drink from jewelled cups; he drinks from his hand. He is poor and goes to heaven; they are rich and go to hell.[6963]

[6962] Burton. Printed page 338, i: "Epist. lib. 3. vit. Paul. Eremit. Libet eos nunc interrogare qui domus marmoribus vestiunt, qui uno filo villarum ponunt precia, huic seni modo quid unquam defuit? vos gemma bibitis, ille concavis manibus naturæ satisfecit; ille pauper paradisum capit, vos avaros gehenna suscipiet." "Letters, book 3, Life of Paul the Hermit. I wish now to ask those who clothe their houses in marble and put the price of estates into a single thread: what did this old man ever lack? You drink from a jewel; he satisfied nature with his cupped hands. That poor man gains paradise; hell will receive you greedy people."

[6963] Editor. Jerome, Life of Paul the First Hermit 17, attacks luxury by contrasting costly homes and clothes with the hermit's few needs. The marginal Latin condemns the avaricious; Burton's English more broadly says "rich." The thread represents expensive clothing. His wording and emphasis are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 4. Against servitude, loss of liberty, imprisonment, banishment.	MEMBER 4 Against servitude, loss of liberty, imprisonment and banishment
Source page 338–339 Servitude, loss of liberty, imprisonment, are no such miseries as they are held to be: we are slaves and servants the best of us all: as we do reverence our masters, so do our masters their superiours: Gentlemen serve Nobles, and Nobles subordinate to Kings, Omne sub regno graviore regnum, Princes themselves are Gods servants, Reges in ipsos imperium est Jovis. They are subject to their own lawes, and as the Kings of China, endure more then slavish imprisonment, to maintain their state and greatness, they never come abroad.	Servitude, loss of liberty and imprisonment are not the miseries they are thought to be. Even the best of us are slaves and servants. As we honour our masters, so our masters honour their superiors. Gentlemen serve nobles, and nobles are subordinate to kings. “Every kingdom lies beneath a weightier rule.” Princes themselves are God’s servants: “Over kings themselves Jupiter holds power.” They are subject to their own laws, and, like the kings of China, endure confinement worse than slavery to maintain their dignity and greatness: they never go out.[6964]
Source page 339 Alexander was a slave to fear, Cæsar of pride, Vespasian to his mony, (nihil enim refert, rerum sis servus an hominum.) Heliogabalus to his gut, and so of the rest. Lovers are slaves to their mistresses, rich men to their gold, Courtiers generally to lust and ambition, and all slaves to our affections, as Evangelus well discourseth in [6965]Macrobius, and [6966]Seneca the Philosopher, assiduam servitutem extremam & ineluctabilem he calls it, a continuall slavery, to be so captivated by vices; and who is free?	Alexander was a slave to fear, Caesar to pride, Vespasian to his money—“for it makes no difference whether you are a slave to things or to people”—and Elagabalus to his belly; and so with the rest. Lovers are slaves to their mistresses, rich people to their gold, courtiers generally to lust and ambition; we are all slaves to our passions. Evangelus discusses this well in Macrobius, as does Seneca the philosopher, who calls it “unceasing, utter and inescapable slavery”: this continual bondage to vice. Who, then, is free?[6967]

[6964] Editor. The first Latin phrase is from Seneca’s Thyestes; the second is Horace, Odes 3.1.6. Both place rulers beneath a higher power. Burton’s statement that Chinese rulers never go out is part of his argument about the restraints of kingship; its historical basis has not been established here.

[6965] Burton. Printed page 339, dagger: “Saturn. 1.11. Alius libidini servit, alius ambitioni, omnes spei, omnes timori.” “Saturnalia 1.11. One serves lust, another ambition; all serve hope, all fear.”

[6966] Burton. Printed page 339, asterisk: “Nat. lib. 3.” Seneca, Natural Questions, book 3.

[6967] Editor. Macrobius, Saturnalia 1.11.8, places the argument in Praetextatus’s reply to Evangelus, not in Evangelus’s own speech. Burton’s margin omits slavery to avarice from the list. Seneca, Natural Questions 3, preface 16–17, describes escape from bondage to oneself; Burton adapts the wording. Here “affections” means passions or desires.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Why then dost thou repine? Satis est potens, Hierom saith, qui servire non cogitur. Thou carriest no burdens, thou art no prisoner, no drudge, and thousands want that liberty, those pleasures which thou hast. Thou art not sick, and what wouldst thou have?	Why, then, do you complain? "He is powerful enough," says Jerome, "who is not forced to serve." You carry no burdens; you are no prisoner or drudge; thousands lack the freedom and pleasures you have. You are not ill: what more would you have?[6968]
But nitimur in vetitum, we must all eat of the forbidden fruit. Were we enjoyned to go to such and such places, we would not willingly go: but being barred of our liberty, this alone torments our wandring soul that we may not go. A citizen of ours, saith [6969]Cardan, was 60 years of age, and had never been forth of the wals of the city Milan; the Prince hearing of it, commanded him not to stir out: being now forbidden that which all his life he had neglected, he earnestly desired, and being denied, dolore confectus mortem obiit, he dyed for grief.	But "we strive for what is forbidden": we must all eat the forbidden fruit. If we were ordered to go to particular places, we would not willingly go; yet once our freedom is barred, the mere fact that we may not go torments our wandering souls. A citizen of ours, says Cardano, was sixty years old and had never gone beyond Milan's city walls. Hearing of this, the prince ordered him not to go out. Now forbidden what he had neglected all his life, he longed for it intensely; when refused, "overcome by grief, he died." He died of grief.[6970]
What I have said of servitude, I say again of imprisonment. We are all prisoners. [6971]What is our life but a prison? We are all imprisoned in an Iland. The world it self to some men is a prison, our narrow seas as so many ditches, and when they have compassed the Globe of the earth, they would fain go see what is done in the Moon.	What I have said of servitude I say again of imprisonment. We are all prisoners. What is our life but a prison? We are all imprisoned on an island. To some, the world itself is a prison, our narrow seas so many ditches; once they have travelled round the globe, they would gladly go and see what is happening on the moon.[6972]

[6968] Editor. The maxim attributed to Jerome has not yet been located. "Satis est potens" means sufficiently powerful or independent; the following examples make freedom from compulsory service the immediate point.

[6969] Burton. Printed page 339, k: "Consol. l. 5." "Consolation, book 5," as printed. This reference and the Milan anecdote remain to be collated; the numeral is not silently changed.

[6970] Editor. The phrase about the forbidden is Ovid, Amores 3.4.17. Burton combines it with the biblical forbidden fruit. The Milan anecdote and the marginal reference "Consol. l. 5." remain unverified; no correction to the reference has been silently made.

[6971] Burton. Printed page 339, l: "O generose, quid est vita nisi carcer animi?" "Noble man, what is life but the prison of the soul?" No author is named here.

[6972] Editor. The island is Britain, with its surrounding seas imagined as prison ditches. The anonymous marginal maxim calls bodily life the soul's prison. Burton enlarges the metaphor from the island to the globe and then to desire for the moon.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In [6973]Muscovy and many other northern parts, all over Scandia they are imprisoned half the year in stoves, they dare not peep out for cold. At [6974]Aden in Arabia they are penned in all day long with that other extreme of heat, and keep their markets in the night. What is a ship but a prison? And so many cities are but as so many hives of Bees, Ant-hils; but that which thou abhorrest, many seek:	In Muscovy and many other northern regions, throughout Scandinavia, people are imprisoned for half the year in heated rooms, not daring to peep outside because of the cold. At Aden in Arabia they are shut indoors all day by the opposite extreme, heat, and hold their markets at night. What is a ship but a prison? Many cities are merely beehives or anthills. Yet what you abhor, many seek.[6975]
Women keep in all winter, and most part of summer to preserve their beauties; some for love of study: Demosthenes shaved his beard because he would cut off all occasion from going abroad: how many Monks and Friers, Anchorites, abandon the world? Monachus in urbe, piscis in arido. Art in prison? Make right use of it and mortifie thy self; [6976]Where may a man contemplate better then in solitariness, or study more then in quietness?	Women stay indoors all winter and for most of the summer to preserve their beauty; others do so from love of study. Demosthenes shaved his beard to remove every occasion for going out. How many monks, friars and hermits abandon the world? “A monk in a city is a fish on dry land.” Are you in prison? Make proper use of it and discipline your worldly desires. Where can someone contemplate better than in solitude, or study better than in quiet?[6977]

[6973] Burton. Printed page 339, m: “Herbastein.” Sigismund von Herberstein; Burton gives an abbreviated form of his name without a location.

[6974] Burton. Printed page 339, n: “Vertomannus navig. l. 2. c. 4. Commercia in nundinis noctu hora secunda, ob nimios qui sæviunt interdiu æstus exercent.” “Varthema, Travels, book 2, chapter 4. They conduct trade in the markets at the second hour of the night because of the excessive heat that rages during the day.”

[6975] Editor. Muscovy means Russia, and Scandia the Scandinavian north. “Stoves” here means heated rooms. Herberstein’s northern description and Varthema’s account of Aden’s night markets remain to be checked at the cited locations; the statements are Burton’s geographical examples, not independently confirmed general rules.

[6976] Burton. Printed page 339, o: “Ubi verior contemplatio quam in solitudine? ubi studium solidius quam in quiete?” “Where is contemplation more genuine than in solitude? Where is study more substantial than in quiet?”

[6977] Editor. Plutarch, Demosthenes 7.6, says he shaved one side of his head; Burton says beard. An anchorite is a religious recluse; “mortify” means discipline bodily appetites. Compare Athanasius, Life of Antony 85: monks lingering away from their retreat resemble fish on dry land. This English comparison locates the image, not Burton’s exact Latin. The anonymous solitude questions remain unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many worthy men have been imprisoned all their lives, and it hath been occasion of great honour and glory to them, much publick good by their excellent meditation. [6978]Ptolomæus King of Egypt, cum viribus attenuatis infirma valetudine laboraret, miro discendi studio affectus, &c. Now being taken with a grievous infirmity of body that he could not stir abroad, became Strato's scholler, fell hard to his book, and gave himself wholly to contemplation, and upon that occasion (as mine author adds) pulcherrimum regiæ opulentiæ monumentum, &c. to his great honour built that renowned Library at Alexandria, wherein were 40000 volumes.	Many worthy men have been imprisoned all their lives, and it has brought them great honour and glory, and much public benefit through their excellent reflections. Ptolemy, king of Egypt, "when his strength was weakened and he suffered from ill health, was seized with a remarkable eagerness to learn, and so on." Stricken with such bodily weakness that he could not go out, he became Strato's pupil, devoted himself to his books and gave himself wholly to contemplation. As a result, my author adds, he built "a most splendid monument to royal wealth": to his great honour, that renowned library at Alexandria containing forty thousand volumes.[6979]
Source page 339–327 [misprint for 340] Severinus Boethius never writ so elegantly as in prison, Paul so devoutly, for most of his Epistles were dictated in his bands: Joseph, saith [6980]Austin, got more credit in prison, then when he distributed corn, and was Lord of Pharoah's house. It brings many a lewd riotous fellow home, many wandring rogues it settles, that would otherwise have been like raving Tygers, ruined themselves and others.	Severinus Boethius never wrote so elegantly as in prison, nor Paul so devoutly, for most of his letters were dictated in chains. Joseph, says Augustine, gained more honour in prison than when he distributed grain and ruled Pharaoh's household. Prison brings many a dissolute, riotous fellow to his senses; it settles many wandering rogues who would otherwise have raged like tigers, ruining themselves and others.[6981]

[6978] Burton. Printed page 339, asterisk: "Alex. ab Alex. gen. dier. lib. 1. cap. 2." Alessandro Alessandri, Genial Days, apparently book 1, chapter 2. The book numeral is heavily inked and the reading remains provisional.

[6979] Editor. Burton cites Alessandro Alessandri's Genial Days, apparently book 1, chapter 2; the heavily inked book numeral is uncertain. The story linking the king's illness, Strato's teaching and the library's foundation, including the number forty thousand, has not been independently verified. The king is not assigned a dynastic number in the translation.

[6980] Burton. Printed page 339, p: "In Ps. 76. non ita laudatur Joseph cum frumenta distribueret, ac quum carcerem habitaret." "On Psalm 76: Joseph is not praised so much when he distributed grain as when he lived in prison."

[6981] Editor. Boethius wrote the Consolation of Philosophy in confinement. Burton overstates Paul's prison correspondence: the traditional group is Ephesians, Philippians, Colossians and Philemon, not most of the letters attributed to him. The specific Joseph comparison has not been located in the consulted exposition of Psalm 76 (77 in modern numbering). His claim about imprisonment's reforming effects is retained as his argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 327 [misprint for 340] Banishment is no grievance at all. Omne solum forti patria, &c. & patria est ubicunque bene est, That's a mans Country where he is well at ease. Many travel for pleasure to that City, saith Seneca, to which thou art banished, and what a part of the Citizens are strangers born in other places? [6982]Incolentibus patria, 'tis their Country that are born in it, and they would think themselves banished to go to the place which thou leavest, and from which thou art so loth to depart.	Banishment is no hardship at all. "Every land is a homeland to the brave," and so on; and "one's homeland is wherever one fares well." A person's country is where he lives at ease. Many travel for pleasure, says Seneca, to the very city to which you are banished; and how large a share of its citizens are strangers born elsewhere? "A homeland to its inhabitants": it is the country of those born there, and they would think themselves banished if they had to go to the place you are leaving so reluctantly.[6983]
'Tis no disparagement to be a stranger, or so irksome to be an exile. [6984]The rain is a stranger to the earth, rivers to the sea, Jupiter in Egypt, the Sun to us all. The Soul is an alien to the body, a Nightingale to the ayre, a Swallow in an house, and Ganymede in heaven, an Elephant at Rome, a Phœnix in India; and such things commonly please us best, which are most strange and come farthest off.	It is no disgrace to be a stranger, nor so burdensome to be an exile. Rain is a stranger to the earth, rivers to the sea, Jupiter in Egypt, and the sun to us all. The soul is an alien in the body, a nightingale in the air, a swallow in a house, Ganymede in heaven, an elephant at Rome, a phoenix in India. The things that are most unfamiliar and come from farthest away usually please us best.[6985]

[6982] Burton. Printed page 327 [misprint for 340], q: "Boethius." Boethius; compare Consolation of Philosophy 2, prose 4.

[6983] Editor. The first maxim is Ovid, Fasti 1.493; the second is proverbial and requires closer source collation. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 2, prose 4, calls a place of exile a homeland to those who inhabit it. Burton's English narrows "inhabitants" to people born there. His Seneca allusion remains to be precisely located. This leaf is printed 327, a misnumbering of the page expected as 340.

[6984] Burton. Printed page 327 [misprint for 340], dagger: "Philostratus in deliciis. Peregrini sunt imbres in terra & fluvii in mari. Jupiter apud Ægyptos, sol apud omnes; hospes anima in corpore, luscinia aeri, hirundo in domo, Ganymedes cœlo, &c." "Philostratus, in the Delights. Rain is foreign to the earth and rivers to the sea; Jupiter among the Egyptians, the sun among everyone; the soul is a guest in the body, a nightingale in the air, a swallow in a house, Ganymede in heaven, and so on." The exact work and passage remain unidentified.

[6985] Editor. Burton attributes the catalogue to "Philostratus in deliciis," an exact reference not yet identified. Its mixture of natural phenomena, animals and mythology makes foreignness universal. Ganymede is the mortal youth taken to heaven to serve as cupbearer; the phoenix is the legendary bird of renewal.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Those old Hebrews esteemed the whole world Gentiles; the Greeks held all Barbarians but themselves; our modern Italians account of us as dull Transalpines by way of reproach, they scorn thee and thy country which thou so much admirest. 'Tis a childish humour to hone after home, to be discontent at that which others seek; to prefer as base Islanders and Norwegians do, their own ragged Iland before Italy or Greece, the Gardens of the world.	The ancient Hebrews counted the whole world as Gentiles; the Greeks considered everyone but themselves barbarians. Our modern Italians disparage us as dull people from beyond the Alps: they scorn you and the country you admire so much. It is a childish whim to pine for home, to resent what others seek; to prefer, as lowly Icelanders and Norwegians do, their own rugged island to Italy or Greece, the gardens of the world.[6986]
There is a base nation in the North, saith [6987]Pliny, called Chauci, that live amongst rocks and sands by the seaside, feed on fish, drink water: and yet these base people account themselves slaves in respect, when they come to Rome. Ita est profectò (as he concludes) multis fortuna parcit in pœnam, So it is, Fortune favors some to live at home, to their further punishment; 'tis want of judgement.	There is a lowly nation in the north, says Pliny, called the Chauci. They live among rocks and sands by the sea, eat fish and drink water; yet these lowly people consider themselves slaves by comparison when they come to Rome. "So indeed it is," he concludes: "Fortune spares many only to punish them." So it is: Fortune favours some by letting them live at home, to their greater punishment. It is a failure of judgement.[6988]
All places are distant from heaven alike, the Sun shines happily as warm in one city as in another, and to a wise man there is no difference of climes: friends are everywhere to him that behaves himself well, and a Prophet is not esteemed in his own country.	All places are equally distant from heaven; the sun may shine as warmly in one city as in another; to a wise man climates make no difference. Whoever conducts himself well finds friends everywhere, and a prophet is not honoured in his own country.[6989]

[6986] Editor. "Transalpine" means from beyond the Alps, viewed from Italy. "Hone" means pine or long for. "Islanders" is read here as Icelanders; this identification remains provisional. Burton's disparaging national labels and his loose grouping of Norway with an island are preserved rather than endorsed or geographically repaired.

[6987] Burton. Printed page 327 [misprint for 340], asterisk: "Lib. 16. cap. 1. Nullam frugem habent, potus ex imbre: Et hæ gentes si vincantur, &c." "Book 16, chapter 1. They have no crops; their drink comes from rain. And these peoples, if they are conquered, etc." Pliny, Natural History.

[6988] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 16.1.2–4, describes the Chauci's tidal settlements and rainwater supply. His point is that they would call Roman conquest enslavement. Burton changes this into their coming to Rome and also replaces the tidal landscape with rocks and sands. The differences are retained in the translation.

[6989] Editor. The equality of places before heaven is a consolatory commonplace. The final saying recalls Luke 4:24 and related Gospel passages. "Happily" here means perhaps or by chance, rather than joyfully.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Alexander, Cæsar, Trajan, Adrian, were as so many land-leapers, now in the East, now in the West, little at home, and Polus Venetus, Lod. Vertomannus, Pinzonus, Cadamustus, Columbus, Americus Vesputius, Vascus Gama, Drake, Candish, Oliver a Nort, Schoutien, got all their honour by voluntary expeditions.	Alexander, Caesar, Trajan and Hadrian were so many wanderers, now in the East, now in the West, seldom at home. Marco Polo, Ludovico di Varthema, Pinzón, Cadamosto, Columbus, Amerigo Vespucci, Vasco da Gama, Drake, Cavendish, Olivier van Noort and Schouten won all their honour through journeys undertaken voluntarily.[6990]
But you say such mens travel is voluntary; we are compelled, and as malefactors must depart: yet know this of [6991]Plato to be true; ultori Deo summa cura peregrinus est, God hath an especiall care of strangers, and when he wants friends and allies, he shall deserve better and find more favour with God and men. Besides the pleasure of peregrination, variety of objects will make amends, and so many nobles, Tully, Aristides, Themistocles, Theseus, Codrus, &c. as have been banished, will give sufficient credit unto it. Read Pet. Alcionius his two books of this subject.	But you say that such men travel voluntarily, whereas we are compelled to leave as wrongdoers. Yet know that Plato's saying is true: "The stranger is the particular concern of God the avenger." God takes special care of strangers; when a man lacks friends and allies, he will deserve better and find greater favour with God and people. Besides the pleasure of travel, the variety of things to see will compensate for exile. So many distinguished men have been banished —Cicero, Aristides, Themistocles, Theseus, Codrus and others—that they will lend it sufficient honour. Read Pietro Alcionio's two books on this subject.[6992]

[6990] Editor. "Land-leapers" means wanderers. Several names are modernized: Polus Venetus is Marco Polo, Vertomannus is Varthema, Cadamustus is Cadamosto, Candish is Thomas Cavendish, and Oliver a Nort is Olivier van Noort. "Pinzonus" is left without a first name because the precise member of the Pinzón family is uncertain; Schoutien is rendered Schouten.

[6991] Burton. Printed page 327 [misprint for 340], asterisk: "Lib. 5. de legibus. Cumq. cognatis careat & amicis, majorem apud deos & apud homines misericordiam meretur." "Laws, book 5. Since he lacks relatives and friends, he deserves greater compassion from gods and people."

[6992] Editor. Plato, Laws 5, explains why the stranger without kin or friends has a special claim to divine and human protection; Burton gives the argument a Christian phrasing. The exile examples, especially Codrus, still need individual collation. Pietro Alcionio's two-book dialogue is Medices legatus de exsilio, published at Venice in 1522.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 327 [340] MEMB. 5. Against sorrow for death of friends or otherwise, vain fear, &c.	MEMBER 5 Against sorrow over the death of friends or other causes, groundless fear, and so on.
Source page 327 [340]–341 Death and departure of friends are things generally grievous, [6993]Omnium quæ in humana vita contingunt, luctus atque mors sunt acerbissima, the most austere and bitter accidents that can happen to a man in this life, in æternum valedicere, to part for ever, to forsake the world and all our friends, 'tis ultimum terribilium, the last and the greatest terrour, most irkesome and troublesome unto us. [6994]Homo toties moritur, quoties amittit suos.	Death and the departure of friends are generally grievous things. "Of everything that happens in human life, bereavement and death are the bitterest": the harshest and most bitter events that can befall anyone in this life. "To say farewell for ever," to part for ever, to leave the world and all our friends: this is "the ultimate terror," the last and greatest terror, most distressing and troubling to us. "A person dies as often as he loses those dear to him."[6995]
Source page 341 And though we hope for a better life, eternall happiness, after these painfull and miserable daies, yet we cannot compose our selves willingly to dye; the remembrance of it is most grievous unto us, especially to such who are fortunate and rich: they start at the name of death, as an horse at a rotten post. Say what you can of that other world, with [6996]Metezuma that Indian Prince, Bonum est esse hic, they had rather be here.	Although we hope for a better life, eternal happiness after these painful and miserable days, we cannot bring ourselves to die willingly. The thought of it is most grievous to us, especially to the fortunate and rich: they shy at the name of death like a horse at a rotten post. Say what you will about that other world: with Montezuma, that Indian prince, they say, "It is good to be here," and would rather stay here.[6997]

[6993] Burton. Printed page 327 [340], r: "Cardan. de consol. lib. 2." Girolamo Cardano, On Consolation, book 2. Exact passage remains to be collated.

[6994] Burton. Printed page 341, dagger: "Seneca." The maxim is transmitted among the Sentences of Publilius Syrus; see the editorial note.

[6995] Editor. The section begins on a page misnumbered 327, in the position of 340. Cardano's opening Latin is translated as well as Burton's English gloss. The last maxim occurs under H in the Sentences of Publilius Syrus, although Burton's margin assigns it to Seneca.

[6996] Burton. Printed page 341, s: "Benzo." Girolamo Benzoni. Burton gives no work or chapter here; the anecdote remains to be located.

[6997] Editor. Metezuma is Burton's spelling of Montezuma. His source label Benzo points to Girolamo Benzoni, but the anecdote has not yet been independently located. The Latin echoes Matthew 17:4, "it is good for us to be here"; Burton applies it ironically to attachment to earthly life.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nay many generous spirits, and grave staid men otherwise, are so tender in this, that at the loss of a dear friend they will cry out, roare, and tear their hair, lamenting some months after, houling O Hone, as those Irish women, and [6998]Greeks at their graves, commit many undecent actions, and almost go besides themselves. My dear father, my sweet husband, mine only brother's dead, to whom shall I make my moan? O me miserum!	Indeed, many noble spirits, people otherwise grave and composed, are so sensitive in this matter that, when they lose a dear friend, they cry out, roar and tear their hair, lamenting for months afterwards. They howl "O hone," like those Irish women and Greeks at their graves, behave in many unseemly ways, and almost lose their minds. "My dear father, my sweet husband, my only brother is dead: to whom can I cry out? Oh, wretched me!"[6999]
Quis dabit in lachrymas fontem, &c.	Who will give a fountain for tears, and so on?[7000]
What shall I do?	What shall I do?
[7001]Sed totum hoc studium luctu fraterna mihi mors Abstulit, hei misero frater adempte mihi!	But my brother's death has taken all this pursuit from me in grief. Alas, my brother, taken from wretched me![7002]
My brothers death my study hath undone, Woe's me, alas my brother he is gone!	My brother's death has put an end to my study. Woe is me! Alas, my brother is gone!
Mezentius would not live after his son:	Mezentius would not live after his son:

[6998] Burton. Printed page 341, t: "Summo mane ululatum oriuntur, pectora percutientes, &c. miserabile spectaculum exhibentes. Ortelius in Græcia." "At first light they begin a wailing, beating their breasts, and so on, presenting a pitiable spectacle." Abraham Ortelius, under Greece. The printed oriuntur is retained.

[6999] Editor. Generous here means noble in spirit. O hone is a cry of lamentation. Burton compares Irish and Greek mourning customs through the cultural judgements of his own account; the Ortelius reference still needs exact collation.

[7000] Editor. An abbreviated lament echoing Jeremiah 9:1, which asks for a head of waters and eyes as a fountain of tears. Burton prints an incomplete Latin phrase rather than the full biblical wording.

[7001] Burton. Printed page 341, u: "Catullus." Poem 68.19–20; Burton prints hei where the consulted text has o.

[7002] Editor. Catullus 68.19–20. Studium refers to his former pursuits, including love and poetry; Burton's separate English couplet narrows it to study. Both the Latin quotation and his gloss are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7003]Nunc vivo, nec adhuc homines lucemque relinquo, Sed linquam ——	Yet I live, and still do not leave humankind and the light; But I will leave them.[7004]
And Pompey's wife cryed out at the news of her husbands death,	And Pompey's wife cried out at the news of her husband's death:
[7005]Turpe mori post te solo non posse dolore,	It is shameful that, after you, I cannot die of grief alone.[7006]
Violenta luctu & nescia tolerandi, as [7007]Tacitus of Agrippina, not able to moderate her passions. So when she heard her son was slain, she abruptly broke off her work, changed countenance and colour, tore her hair, and fell a roaring down right,	"Violent in grief and unable to endure it," as Tacitus says of Agrippina: unable to govern her emotions. So, when she heard that her son had been killed, she abruptly broke off her work, her expression and colour changed, she tore her hair, and burst into howling:[7008]
—— subitus miseræ color ossa reliquit, Excussi manibus radii, revolutaque pensa: Evolat infelix & fœmineo ululatu Scissa comam ——	Suddenly the colour left her wretched frame; The shuttles fell from her hands, her work unravelled. The unhappy woman rushes out, with a woman's wailing, Her hair torn.[7009]
Another would needs run upon the swords point after Euryalus departure,	Another was determined to rush onto the sword's point after Euryalus's death:

[7003] Burton. Printed page 341, x: "Virgil." Aeneid 10.855–856.

[7004] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 10.855–856. Mezentius speaks after the death of his son Lausus. Burton has nec where the consulted text reads neque; the meaning is unchanged.

[7005] Burton. Printed page 341, y: "Lucan." Civil War 9.108.

[7006] Editor. Lucan, Civil War 9.108. The speaker is Cornelia, Pompey's widow. Her imagined death from grief is part of the poem's lament.

[7007] Burton. Printed page 341, dagger: "3 Annal." Tacitus, Annals 3.1. The next verse describes Euryalus's mother in Virgil.

[7008] Editor. Tacitus, Annals 3.1, supplies the exact phrase: Agrippina, Germanicus's wife, pauses at Corcyra while returning with his ashes. Burton then passes to a different bereaved woman: the following verses concern Euryalus's mother in Aeneid 9.475–478. His transition does not name her; the two women must not be identified with one another.

[7009] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 9.475–478. The consulted text has calor, "warmth," where Burton prints color, "colour." The modernization follows Burton's reading; Virgil describes the mother's body suddenly going cold. Radii are weaving implements, rendered "shuttles"; the passage depicts her work falling from her hands.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7010]Figite me, si qua est pietas, in me omnia tela Conjicite ô Rutili; ——	Pierce me, if there is any mercy; hurl all your weapons At me, O Rutulians.[7011]
O let me dye, some good man or other make an end of me. How did Achilles take on for Patroclus departure? A black cloud of sorrows overshadowed him, saith Homer. Jacob rent his clothes, put sack-cloth about his loines, sorrowed for his son a long season, and could not be comforted, but would needs go down into the grave unto his son, Gen. 37. 37.	Oh, let me die; let some good man put an end to me. How Achilles raged over Patroclus's death! A black cloud of sorrow overshadowed him, says Homer. Jacob tore his clothes, put sackcloth around his waist, mourned his son for a long time, and could not be comforted. He insisted that he would go down to his son in the grave: Genesis 37:37.[7012]

[7010] Burton. Printed page 341, z: "Virg. Æn. 10." Virgil, Aeneid, book 10, as printed. The lines actually belong to 9.493–494.

[7011] Editor. Aeneid 9.493–494, spoken by the same mother of Euryalus, not a new speaker. Burton's "Another" and his book-10 citation are retained. Rutili is a printed variant for Rutuli, the Rutulians.

[7012] Editor. Achilles' darkness of grief is in Iliad 18.22. Jacob's mourning for Joseph is Genesis 37:34–35; the printed 37:37 is erroneous, since that chapter ends at verse 36.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 341–342 Many years after, the remembrance of such friends, of such accidents, is most grievous unto us, to see or hear of it, though it concern not our selves but others. Scaliger saith of himself, that he never read Socrates death, in Plato's Phædon, but he wept: [7013]Austin shed tears when he red the destruction of Troy. But howsoever this passion of sorrow be violent, bitter, and seizeth familiarly on wise, valiant, discreet men, yet it may surely be withstood, it may be diverted. For what is there in this life, that it should be so dear unto us? or that we should so much deplore the departure of a friend? The greatest pleasures are common society, to enjoy one anothers presence, feasting, hawking, hunting, brooks, woods, hils, musick, dancing, &c. all this is but vanity and losse of time, as I have sufficiently declared.	Many years afterwards, the memory of such friends and such events remains most grievous to us. Even seeing or hearing of them is painful, though they concern others rather than ourselves. Scaliger says that he never read of Socrates' death in Plato's Phaedo without weeping. Augustine shed tears when he read of the destruction of Troy. Yet, however violent and bitter this sorrow may be, and however commonly it seizes the wise, courageous and prudent, it can surely be resisted and turned aside. For what is there in this life that should make it so dear to us, or make us lament a friend's departure so much? Its greatest pleasures are companionship, enjoying one another's presence, feasting, hawking, hunting, streams, woods, hills, music, dancing and the rest. All this is merely vanity and wasted time, as I have sufficiently explained.[7014]
Source page 342 —— [7015]dum bibimus, dum serta, unguenta, puellas Poscimus, obrepit non intellecta senectus.	While we drink, while we call for garlands, perfumes and girls, Old age creeps upon us unnoticed.[7016]
Whilst we drink, prank our selves, with wenches dally, Old age upon's at unawares doth sally.	While we drink, dress ourselves up and dally with women, Old age attacks us unawares.

[7013] Burton. Printed page 341, a: "Confess. l. 1." Augustine, Confessions, book 1; compare 1.13.

[7014] Editor. Scaliger is not identified further here, and the anecdote remains to be traced. Confessions 1.13 specifically recalls Augustine weeping for Dido's death in the Aeneid; Burton broadens this to the destruction of Troy. Hawking means hunting with trained birds of prey.

[7015] Burton. Printed page 342, dagger: "Juvenalis." Juvenal, Satire 9.128–129.

[7016] Editor. Juvenal 9.128–129. Prank means dress or adorn oneself; Burton's following English couplet is a separate paraphrase of the Latin, and is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As Alchymists spend that small modicum they have to get gold, and never finde it, we lose and neglect eternity, for a little momentany pleasure which we cannot enjoy, nor shall ever attain to in this life. We abhor death, pain, and grief, all, and yet we will do nothing of that which should vindicate us from, but rather voluntarily thrust our selves upon it. [7017]The lascivious prefers his whore before his life, or good estate; an angry man his revenge; a parasite his gut; ambitious, honours; covetous, wealth; a thief his booty; a souldier his spoyle; we abhor diseases, and yet we pull them upon us.	As alchemists spend what little they have in pursuit of gold and never find it, we lose and neglect eternity for a little momentary pleasure which we cannot enjoy and will never attain in this life. We abhor death, pain and grief, yet do nothing that would free us from them; instead, we willingly thrust ourselves upon them. The lustful man prefers his prostitute to his life or well-being; the angry man, his revenge; the parasite, his belly; the ambitious, honours; the covetous, wealth; the thief, his booty; the soldier, his spoils. We abhor diseases, yet bring them upon ourselves.[7018]
We are never better or freer from cares then when we sleep, and yet, which we so much avoid and lament, death is but a perpetuall sleep, and why should it as [7019]Epicurus argues, so much affright us? When we are, death is not: but when death is, then we are not: our life is tedious and troublesome unto him that lives best; [7020]'tis a misery to be born, a pain to live, a trouble to dye; death makes an end of our miseries, and yet we cannot consider of it;	We are never better or freer from cares than when we sleep. Yet death, which we so greatly shun and lament, is only a perpetual sleep. Why, as Epicurus argues, should it frighten us so much? "When we exist, death is absent; but when death is present, we no longer exist." Life is tedious and troublesome even for the person who lives best. "It is misery to be born, pain to live, anguish to die." Death ends our miseries, yet we cannot bear to think about it.[7021]

[7017] Burton. Printed page 342, b: "Amator scortum vitæ præponit, iracundus vindictam, parasitus gulam, ambitiosus honores, avarus opes, miles rapinam, fur prædam; morbos odimus & accersimus. Card." "The lover puts his prostitute before life; the angry man, revenge; the parasite, gluttony; the ambitious, honours; the miser, riches; the soldier, plunder; the thief, booty. We hate diseases and summon them." Cardano, without a precise locator.

[7018] Editor. Vindicate here means rescue or free. A parasite is a dependent hanger-on who seeks food and advantage. Burton's list is a moral catalogue of desires placed above life and well-being; the Cardano passage remains to be located.

[7019] Burton. Printed page 342, asterisk: "Seneca; quum nos sumus mors non adest; cum vero mors adest, tum nos non sumus." "When we exist, death is absent; when death is present, we no longer exist." Burton's margin names Seneca, his body Epicurus; compare Epicurus, Letter to Menoeceus 125.

[7020] Burton. Printed page 342, dagger: "Bernard. c. 3. med. nasci miserum, vivere pœna, angustia mori." "To be born is misery, to live is pain, to die is anguish." Meditations attributed to Bernard, chapter 3. Attribution and precise recension await collation.

[7021] Editor. Epicurus, Letter to Menoeceus 124–125, argues from the absence of sensation; Burton adds perpetual sleep. The Viridarium project's comparison sheet locates the birth–life–death saying in the uncertainly attributed Meditations, chapter 3 (PL 184, col. 490), with miseria rather than Burton's miserum. This supports the passage, not secure Bernard authorship. The Seneca margin remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
a little before [7022]Socrates drank his potion of Cicuta, he bid the Citizens of Athens cheerfully farewell, and concluded his speech with this short sentence, My time is now come to be gone, I to my death, you to live on; but which of these is best, God alone knows.	A little before Socrates drank his draught of hemlock, he cheerfully said farewell to the citizens of Athens and ended his speech with this short sentence: "My time has now come to depart: I to my death, you to live on. Which of these is better, God alone knows."[7023]
For there is no pleasure here but sorrow is annexed to it, repentance follows it. [7024]If I feed liberally, I am likely sick or surfeit; If I live sparingly, my hunger and thirst is not allayed: I am well neither full nor fasting; If I live honest, I burn in lust; If I take my pleasure, I tire and starve my self, and do injury to my body and soul. [7025]Of so small a quantity of mirth, how much sorrow? after so little pleasure, how great misery? 'Tis both waies troublesome to me, to rise and go to bed, to eat and provide my meat; cares and contentions attend me all day long, fears and suspicions all my life. I am discontented, and why should I desire so much to live? But an happy death will make an end of all our woes and miseries,	For there is no pleasure here without sorrow attached to it and regret following it. "If I eat freely, I am likely to fall ill or overeat; if I live sparingly, my hunger and thirst remain unsatisfied. I am well neither full nor fasting. If I live chastely, I burn with desire." If I indulge myself, I exhaust and waste myself, harming both body and soul. "From so little merriment, how much sorrow! After so little pleasure, how great the misery!" Both sides trouble me: getting up and going to bed, eating and providing my food. Cares and quarrels attend me all day long, fears and suspicions all my life. I am discontented: why should I be so eager to live? But a happy death will end all our woes and miseries.[7026]
Omnibus una meis certa medela malis;	The one sure remedy for all my troubles.[7027]

[7022] Burton. Printed page 342, asterisk: "Plato Apol. Socratis. Sed jam hora est hinc abire, &c." Plato, Apology of Socrates: "But now it is time to depart from here," and so on. Compare 42a.

[7023] Editor. These are the closing words of Plato's Apology, 42a, after Socrates' trial. Burton moves them to shortly before the drinking of hemlock, the event narrated at the end of the Phaedo. Cicuta is hemlock.

[7024] Burton. Printed page 342, c: "Comedi ad satietatem, gravitas me offendit; parcius edi, non est expletum desiderium; venereas delicias sequor, hinc morbus, lassitudo, &c." "I ate to satiety: heaviness troubled me. I ate more sparingly: my desire was not satisfied. I pursue sexual pleasures: from this come illness, exhaustion, and so on." No separate author is printed in this container.

[7025] Burton. Printed page 342, dagger: "Bern. c. 3. med. de tantilla lætitia, quanta tristitia; post tantam voluptatem quam gravis miseria?" "From so little joy, how much sorrow; after so much pleasure, how grievous the misery!" Meditations attributed to Bernard, chapter 3. The margin's tantam means "so much"; Burton's body says "so little".

[7026] Editor. Honest here means sexually chaste; starve carries the sense of wasting or wearing down the body. The text sets ascetic dissatisfaction against the consequences of indulgence. Burton's "so little pleasure" differs from the margin's tantam voluptatem, "so much pleasure".

[7027] Editor. An unattributed verse about death as a remedy. Its exact source has not yet been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Why shouldst not thou then say with old Simeon since thou art so well affected, Lord, now let thy servant depart in peace: or with Paul, I desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ? Beata mors quæ ad beatam vitam aditum aperit, 'tis a blessed houre that leads us to a [7028]blessed life; and blessed are they that dye in the Lord.	Why, then, since you are so well disposed, should you not say with old Simeon, "Lord, now let your servant depart in peace"; or with Paul, "I desire to depart and be with Christ"? "Blessed is the death that opens the way to a blessed life": it is a blessed hour that leads us to a blessed life, and blessed are those who die in the Lord.[7029]
But life is sweet, and death is not so terrible in it self as the concomitants of it, a loathsome disease, pain, horrour, &c. and many times the manner of it, to be hanged, to be broken on the wheel, to be burned alive. [7030]Servetus the heretick, that suffered in Geneva, when he was brought to the stake, and saw the executioner come with fire in his hand, homo viso igne tam horrendum exclamavit, ut universum populum perterrefecerit, roared so loud, that he terrified the people. An old Stoick would have scorned this. It troubles some to be unburied, or so:	But life is sweet, and death is less terrible in itself than the things that accompany it: a loathsome disease, pain, horror and the rest, and often the manner of it—hanging, being broken on the wheel, being burned alive. Servetus the heretic, who suffered at Geneva, was brought to the stake and saw the executioner approaching with fire in his hand: "At the sight of the fire, the man cried out so terribly that he terrified the whole crowd." He roared so loudly that he frightened the people. An ancient Stoic would have scorned this. Some are troubled by the thought of being left unburied, or something of the kind:[7031]

[7028] Burton. Printed page 342, d: "Est enim mors piorum felix transitus de labore ad refrigerium, de expectatione ad præmium, de agone ad bravium." "For the death of the godly is a happy passage from labour to rest, from expectation to reward, from the contest to the prize." No author is specified here.

[7029] Editor. Luke 2:29; Philippians 1:23; Revelation 14:13. Dissolved means departing this life. The Latin says "blessed death"; Burton's following gloss says "blessed hour". Both are preserved.

[7030] Burton. Printed page 342, dagger: "Vaticanus vita ejus." "Vaticanus, his life." This abbreviated citation remains to be identified precisely; see the editorial note.

[7031] Editor. Michael Servetus was executed by burning at Geneva in 1553. Heretic is Burton's designation. Vaticanus is the name used for the answering voice in Sebastian Castellio's Contra libellum Calvini, but Burton's abbreviated "his life" and this exact report require collation. His claim about how a Stoic would respond is his own comparison.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 343 —— * non te optima mater Condet humi, patriove onerabit membra sepulchro; Alitibus linquere feris, & gurgite mersum Unda feret, piscesque impasti vulnera lambent:	Your loving mother will not lay you in the earth Or place your limbs in your ancestral tomb. You will be left to wild birds, and, drowned in the depths, The waves will carry you; hungry fish will lick your wounds.[7032]
Thy gentle parents shall not bury thee, Amongst thine Ancestors entomb'd to be, But feral fowle thy carcass shall devoure, Or drowned corps hungry fish maws shall scoure.	Your loving parents will not bury you To lie entombed among your ancestors. Wild birds will devour your carcass, Or hungry fishes' maws will strip your drowned corpse.
As Socrates told Crito, it concerns me not what is done with me when I am dead; Facilis jactura sepulchri: I care not so long as I feel it not; let them set mine head on the pike of Tenariffa, and my quarters in the foure parts of the world, —— pascam licet in cruce corvos, let Wolves or Bears devoure me;	As Socrates told Crito, I am not concerned with what is done to me when I am dead. "The loss of a grave is easily borne." I do not care, so long as I cannot feel it. Let them set my head on the peak of Tenerife and my quartered limbs in the four corners of the world; "let me feed the crows upon a cross"; let wolves or bears devour me.[7033]

[7032] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 10.557–560, Aeneas threatening Tarquitus's unburied body. Burton prints an asterisk without a corresponding marginal container on this page. He has "and" where the consulted Latin has "or"; his own English gloss restores "or" and changes "mother" to "parents". The modernization keeps these differences.

[7033] Editor. Plato, Phaedo 115c–e, distinguishes Socrates from his corpse. Burton expands the example: Facilis jactura sepulchri is Anchises's phrase in Aeneid 2.646; the crows echo Horace, Epistles 1.16.48, with his negative second-person statement recast as a first-person concession. Tenerife's peak is Mount Teide; quarters are the four parts of a dismembered body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [7034]Cœlo tegitur qui non habet urnam,	The sky covers the man who has no burial urn.[7035]
The Canopy of heaven covers him that hath no tomb. So likewise for our friends, why should their departure so much trouble us? They are better as we hope, and for what then doest thou lament, as those do whom Paul taxed in his time, 1 Thes. 4. 13. that have no hope? 'Tis fit there should be some solemnity.	The canopy of heaven covers the man who has no tomb. So too with our friends: why should their departure trouble us so much? They are better off, as we hope. Why, then, do you lament like those Paul reproached in his time, who "have no hope"—1 Thessalonians 4:13? It is fitting that there should be some solemn observance.[7036]
[7037]Sed sepelire decet defunctum, pectore forti, Constantes, unumque diem fletui indulgentes.	But we should bury the dead, with steadfast hearts, Standing firm and allowing a single day for weeping.[7038]
Jobs friends said not a word to him the first seven daies, but let sorrow and discontent take their course, themselves sitting sad and silent by him. When Jupiter himself wept for Sarpedon, what else did the poet insinuate, but that some sorrow is good.	Job's friends said nothing to him for the first seven days. They let sorrow and distress take their course, sitting sad and silent beside him. When Jupiter himself wept for Sarpedon, what else was the poet suggesting but that some sorrow is good?[7039]

[7034] Burton. Printed page 343, e: "Luc." Lucan, Civil War 7.819.

[7035] Editor. Lucan, Civil War 7.819, on the unburied dead after battle. Burton repeats its sense in English immediately afterwards.

[7036] Editor. Paul's comparison is with those who have no hope of resurrection. Burton uses it to support limited mourning rather than the complete suppression of sorrow.

[7037] Burton. Printed page 343, dagger: "Il. 9. Homer." Homer, Iliad 9, as printed. Compare Iliad 19.228–229, rather than book 9.

[7038] Editor. Compare Iliad 19.228–229, in Odysseus's counsel that survivors should bury the fallen and return to necessary activity. The printed marginal book number is 9, apparently omitting the initial 1.

[7039] Editor. Job 2:13 describes seven days and nights of silent companionship. In Iliad 16.459–461, Zeus sends drops of blood to earth in honour of his doomed son Sarpedon; Burton describes this as weeping. Jupiter is the Roman name used here for Zeus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7040]Quis matrem nisi mentis inops in funere nati Flere vetat? ——	Who but someone out of his mind forbids a mother To weep at her child's funeral?[7041]
who can blame a tender mother if she weep for her children? Beside as [7042]Plutarch holds, 'tis not in our power not to lament. Indolentia non cuivis contingit, it takes away mercy and pitty, not to be sad; 'tis a natural passion to weep for our friends, an irresistible passion to lament and grieve. I know not how (saith Seneca) but sometimes 'tis good to be miserable in misery: and for the most part all grief evacuates it self by teares,	Who can blame a loving mother for weeping over her children? Besides, as Plutarch maintains, we cannot help lamenting. "Freedom from grief is not given to everyone." To feel no sorrow is to lose mercy and pity. Weeping for our friends is a natural emotion; lamenting and grieving are irresistible impulses. "I do not know how," says Seneca, "but sometimes it is good to be miserable in misery; and, for the most part, all grief discharges itself in tears."[7043]
—— [7044]est quædam flere voluptas, Expletur lachrymis egeriturque dolor:	There is a certain pleasure in weeping: Grief finds satisfaction in tears and is poured away.[7045]

[7040] Burton. Printed page 343, asterisk: "Ovid." Remedies for Love 127–128.

[7041] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 127–128. The surrounding passage argues that consolation must wait until violent grief has had its first course. Burton prints vetat rather than the consulted text's vetet.

[7042] Burton. Printed page 343, dagger: "Consol. ad Apolon. non est libertate nostra positum non dolere, misericordiam abolet, &c." Consolation to Apollonius: "It is not within our free choice to feel no grief; it abolishes compassion," and so on. Compare section 3.

[7043] Editor. Consolation to Apollonius 3, transmitted among Plutarch's works, rejects callous insensibility as both impossible and destructive of affection. Indolentia means absence of pain or grief, not laziness. The subsequent sentence assigned to Seneca remains to be located precisely.

[7044] Burton. Printed page 343, f: "Ovid. 4 Trist." Ovid, Tristia, book 4; the lines are 4.3.37–38.

[7045] Editor. Ovid, Tristia 4.3.37–38. Ovid, still alive in exile, addresses his wife: the grief is separation rather than death. Burton carries the lines into his consolation for bereavement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
yet after a dayes mourning or two, comfort thy self for thy heaviness, Eccles. 38. 17. [7046]Non decet defunctum ignavo questu prosequi: 'twas Germanicus advice of old, that we should not dwell too long upon our passions, to be desperately sad, immoderate grievers, to let them tyrannize, there's indolentiæ ars, a medium to be kept:	Yet, "after a day or two of mourning, take comfort for your sorrow"—Ecclesiasticus 38:17. "It is not fitting to attend the dead with helpless lamentation." Germanicus advised long ago that we should not dwell too long on our emotions, becoming desperately sad and immoderate in grief, letting them rule us. There is "an art of freedom from grief," a middle course to keep.[7047]
we do not (saith [7048]Austin) forbid men to grieve, but to grieve overmuch. I forbid not a man to be angry, but I ask for what cause he is so: Not to be sad, but why is he sad? Not to fear, but wherefore is he afraid? I require a moderation as well as a just reason.	We do not, says Augustine, forbid people to grieve, but to grieve excessively. "I do not forbid a man to be angry, but ask what makes him so; not to be sad, but why he is sad; not to fear, but what he is afraid of." I require moderation as well as a just cause.[7049]

[7046] Burton. Printed page 343, dagger: "Tacitus lib. 4." Tacitus, book 4, as printed. Germanicus's words are in Annals 2.71.

[7047] Editor. Eccles. here abbreviates Ecclesiasticus, or Sirach, not Ecclesiastes. The Germanicus quotation adapts Tacitus, Annals 2.71, where the dying general asks his friends to remember and carry out his wishes rather than merely lament; the margin's book 4 is incorrect.

[7048] Burton. Printed page 343, asterisk: "Lib. 9 cap. 9. de civitate Dei. Non quæro cum irascatur sed cur, non utrum sit tristis sed unde, non utrum timeat sed quid timeat." City of God 9.9, as printed: "I ask not when he is angry but why; not whether he is sad but from what cause; not whether he fears but what he fears." The relevant passage is 9.5; Burton's wording is adapted.

[7049] Editor. Augustine, City of God 9.5, rather than the margin's 9.9. The original argument judges emotions by their objects and purposes. Burton turns it into a rule for moderate grieving.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7050]The Romans and most civil Commonwealths have set a time to such solemnities, they must not mourn after a set day, or if in a family a child be born, a daughter or son married, some state or honour be conferred, a brother be redeemed from his bands, a friend from his enemies, or the like, they must lament no more. And 'tis fit it should be so; to what end is all their funeral pomp, complaints and tears?	The Romans and most civilised commonwealths have set a limit to such observances. People must not mourn beyond a fixed day; or, if a child is born in the family, a daughter or son marries, an office or honour is conferred, a brother is freed from captivity, a friend is rescued from his enemies, or something similar happens, they must lament no longer. And rightly so: what purpose is served by all their funeral ceremony, lamentations and tears?[7051]
Source page 343–344 When Socrates was dying, his friends Apollodorus and Crito with some others, were weeping by him, which he perceiving, asked them what they meant: [7052]for that very cause he put all the women out of the room, upon which words of his they were abashed, and ceased from their tears.	When Socrates was dying, his friends Apollodorus and Crito, with some others, wept beside him. Seeing this, he asked what they meant by it: that was the very reason he had sent all the women out of the room. At these words they were ashamed and stopped crying.[7053]

[7050] Burton. Printed page 343, dagger: "Festus verbo minuitur. Luctui dies indicebatur cum liberi nascerentur, cum frater abit, amicus ab hospite captivus domum redeat, puella desponsaretur." Festus, under minuitur: "A limit to mourning was appointed when children were born, when a brother departs, a captive friend returns home from a host, or a girl was betrothed." The awkward printed frater abit and ab hospite are retained and translated literally; Burton's body instead speaks of release from captivity and enemies. The Festus entry requires collation.

[7051] Editor. Civil commonwealths means societies Burton regards as civilised. State here means office or status; bands are bonds or captivity. Burton's body expands the abbreviated Latin list; the Festus entry and its transmission remain to be collated.

[7052] Burton. Printed page 343, g: "Ob hanc causam mulieres ablegaram ne talia facerent; nos hæc audientes erubuimus & destitimus a lachrymis." "For this reason I had sent away the women, so that they would not do such things. Hearing this, we blushed and stopped weeping." Compare Plato, Phaedo 117d–e.

[7053] Editor. Plato, Phaedo 117c–e. The narrator describes his own tears, Crito's withdrawal and Apollodorus's loud grief before Socrates urges composure. Burton condenses the scene and retains its gendered contrast.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 344 Lodovicus Cortesius, a rich Lawyer of Padua (as [7054]Bernardinus Scardeonius relates) commanded by his last will, & a great mulct if otherwise to his heir, that no funeral should be kept for him, no man should lament: But as at a wedding musick and minstrels to be provided; and instead of black mourners he took order, [7055]that twelve virgins clad in green should carry him to the Church. His will and testament was accordingly performed, and he buried in S. Sophies Church.	Lodovico Cortesio, a wealthy lawyer of Padua, as Bernardino Scardeone relates, directed in his will, with a heavy penalty on his heir for disobedience, that no funeral observances should be held for him and no one should lament. Instead, there should be music and musicians as at a wedding; in place of mourners in black, he arranged for twelve maidens dressed in green to carry him to church. His will was duly carried out, and he was buried in St Sophia's Church.[7056]

[7054] Burton. Printed page 344, dagger: "Lib. 1. class. 8. de claris Jurisconsultis Patavinis." Bernardino Scardeone, book 1, class 8, on distinguished Paduan jurists. The printed book numeral is 1; the anecdote remains to be collated in Scardeone.

[7055] Burton. Printed page 344, asterisk: "12. Innuptæ puellæ amictæ viridibus pannis, &c." "Twelve unmarried girls dressed in green garments," and so on.

[7056] Editor. Mulct means a monetary penalty. Burton cites Scardeone for this unusual Paduan funeral; its details, including the twelve green-clad bearers and burial at Santa Sofia, remain to be checked directly in that work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7057]Tully was much grieved for his daughter Tulliola's death at first, until such time that he had confirmed his mind with some Philosophical precepts; [7058]then he began to triumph over fortune and grief, and for her reception into heaven to be much more joyed then before he was troubled for her loss. If an heathen man could so fortifie himself from Philosophy, what shall a Christian from Divinity? Why doest thou so macerate thy self? 'Tis an inevitable chance, the first statute in Magna Charta, an everlasting Act of Parliament, all must [7059]die.	At first Cicero grieved deeply over the death of his daughter Tulliola, until he had strengthened his mind with philosophical teachings. Then he began to triumph over fortune and grief, and to feel far more joy at her reception into heaven than he had previously felt distress at losing her. If a pagan could fortify himself so well through philosophy, what may a Christian do through theology? Why do you torment yourself so? It is an inevitable event, the first statute in Magna Carta, an everlasting Act of Parliament: everyone must die.[7060]
[7061]Constat æternâ positumque lege est, Ut constet genitum nihil.	It is fixed and laid down by eternal law That nothing born shall endure.[7062]

[7057] Burton. Printed page 344, h: "Lib. de consol." Book On Consolation. The attribution to Cicero requires caution; see the editorial note.

[7058] Burton. Printed page 344, i: "Præceptis philosophiæ confirmatus adversus omnem fortunæ vim, & te consecratâ in cœlumque receptâ, tantâ affectus lætitiâ sum ac voluptate, quantam animo capere possum, ac exultare plane mihi videor, victorque de omni dolore & fortuna triumphare." "Strengthened by philosophy's teachings against every assault of fortune, and with you consecrated and received into heaven, I am filled with as much joy and delight as my mind can hold. I seem truly to exult and, victorious, to triumph over all grief and fortune." The quotation's exact source text remains to be collated.

[7059] Burton. Printed page 344, dagger: "Ut lignum uri natum, arista secari, sic homines mori." "As wood is born to be burned and an ear of grain to be cut, so human beings are born to die." No author is named.

[7060] Editor. Tully is Marcus Tullius Cicero; Tulliola is an affectionate form of his daughter Tullia's name. His genuine Consolatio survives only in fragments. A purported complete Consolatio published in 1583 and associated with Carlo Sigonio is spurious; Burton's extended quotation needs collation against it before being assigned to Cicero. Magna Carta and the Act of Parliament are metaphors for an unalterable law of mortality.

[7061] Burton. Printed page 344, k: "Boeth. lib. 2. met. 3." Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy, book 2, metre 3.

[7062] Editor. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 2, metre 3. Burton's constet in the second line means endure or remain stable; the following argument makes mortality universal.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It cannot be revoked, we are all mortal, and these all-commanding gods and princes die like men: [7063]—— involvit humile pariter & celsum caput, æquatque summis infima. O weak condition of humane estate, Sylvius exclaims: [7064]Ladislaus King of Bohemia 18 yeeres of age, in the flower of his youth, so potent, rich, fortunate and happy, in the midst of all his friends, amongst so many [7065]Physicians, now ready to be [7066]married, in 36 houres sickned and died.	It cannot be repealed. We are all mortal, and these all-commanding gods and princes die like other men: "Death envelops the lowly and the exalted head alike, and makes the lowest equal to the highest." "Oh, the frailty of the human condition!" Sylvius exclaims. Ladislaus, king of Bohemia, eighteen years old and in the flower of youth, so powerful, rich, fortunate and happy, surrounded by all his friends and so many physicians, about to be married, fell ill and died within thirty-six hours.[7067]
We must so be gone sooner or later all, and as Calliopeius in the Comedy took his leave of his Spectators and Auditors,	So all of us must leave sooner or later. As Calliopeius in the comedy took leave of his spectators and listeners:
Vos valete & plaudite, Calliopeius recensui.	Farewell, and applaud. I, Calliopeius, have revised the text.[7068]

[7063] Burton. Printed page 344, dagger: "Boeth." Consolation of Philosophy 2, metre 7; Burton excerpts the levelling action of death.

[7064] Burton. Printed page 344, l: "Nic. Hensel. Breslagr. fol. 47." Nicolaus Hensel, Breslagraphia, folio 47, as abbreviated. Burton introduces the account as Sylvius's; the relation between these references awaits collation.

[7065] Burton. Printed page 344, m: "Twenty then present." Burton specifies twenty physicians.

[7066] Burton. Printed page 344, n: "To Magdalen the daughter of Charles the seventh of France." Burton identifies the intended bride.

[7067] Editor. The levelling of high and low comes from Boethius, Consolation 2, metre 7; "die like men" also echoes Psalm 82:7. Sylvius is Aeneas Silvius Piccolomini. Burton's age, thirty-six-hour illness, twenty physicians and intended marriage are retained as his reported details; the cited Hensel account and their historical precision remain to be collated.

[7068] Editor. Calliopeius recensui is a form of the subscription Calliopius recensui found after Terence's plays, conventionally understood as a statement of textual revision. Burton treats Calliopeius as a departing performer. The translation gives the conventional sense of the subscription while preserving his theatrical frame; the history and interpretation of the subscription are debated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
must we bid the world farewel, (Exit Calliopeius) and having now plaid our parts, for ever be gone. Tombs and monuments have the like fate, data sunt ipsis quoque fata sepulchris, kingdomes, provinces, towns and cities have their periods, and are consumed.[7069]	So must we bid the world farewell—"Exit Calliopeius"—and, having played our parts, depart for ever. Tombs and monuments share that fate: "Even tombs themselves have been assigned their doom." Kingdoms, provinces, towns and cities have their allotted terms, and perish.[7070]
In those flourishing times of Troy, Mycenæ was the fairest city in Greece, Græciæ cunctæ imperitabat, but it alas, and that [7071]Assyrian Ninive are quite overthrown: The like fate hath that Egyptian and Bœotian Thebes, Delos, commune Græciæ conciliabulum, the common councel-house of Greece; [7072]and Babylon the greatest city that ever the sun shone on, hath now nothing but walls, and rubbish left.	When Troy flourished, Mycenae was the finest city in Greece and "ruled over all Greece." But alas, it and Assyrian Nineveh have been utterly overthrown. The same fate has befallen Thebes in Egypt and Thebes in Boeotia, and Delos, "the common meeting-place of Greece," the common council-house of Greece. Babylon, the greatest city the sun ever shone upon, has nothing left now but walls and rubble.[7073]
[7074]Quid Pandioniæ restat nisi nomen Athenæ?	What remains of Pandion's Athens but its name?[7075]

[7069] Burton. Printed page 344, unmarked: "Obeunt noctesque diesque, &c." "Nights and days perish," and so on. A separate unmarked marginal quotation, here attached to the universal-decay passage. Compare Statius, Silvae 2.1.210, continued in the body on printed page 345.

[7070] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 10.146: even burial monuments perish. Periods means appointed limits or terms, not historical eras. The adjacent unmarked marginal fragment, "Nights and days perish," is from Statius, Silvae 2.1.210.

[7071] Burton. Printed page 344, asterisk: "Assyriorum regio funditus deleta." "The land of the Assyrians utterly destroyed."

[7072] Burton. Printed page 344, dagger: "Omnium quot unquam Sol aspexit urbium maxima." "The greatest of all the cities the sun has ever looked upon."

[7073] Editor. Thebes in Egypt and Thebes in Boeotia are distinct cities. Burton's catalogue describes ruin and loss of former greatness, not a reliable inventory of places with no surviving inhabitants. His source labels and sweeping statements are retained.

[7074] Burton. Printed page 344, asterisk: "Ovid." Metamorphoses 15.430.

[7075] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 15.430. Pandion is a legendary king of Athens. Burton prints singular restat and Athenæ where the consulted Latin has restant and Athenae; the sense is unchanged.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thus [7076]Pausanias complained in his times. And where is Troy it self now, Persepolis, Carthage, Cizicum, Sparta, Argos, and all those Grecian cities? Syracuse and Agrigentum, the fairest towns in Sicily, which had sometimes 700000 inhabitants, are now decayed: the names of Hieron, Empedocles, &c. of those mighty numbers of people, only left. One Anacharsis is remembred amongst the Scythians; the world it self must have an end; And every part of it.	So Pausanias lamented in his day. And where now are Troy itself, Persepolis, Carthage, Cyzicus, Sparta, Argos and all those Greek cities? Syracuse and Agrigentum, the finest cities in Sicily, which once had seven hundred thousand inhabitants, are now decayed. Of those vast populations, only names such as Hiero and Empedocles remain. Among the Scythians, a single Anacharsis is remembered. The world itself must come to an end, and every part of it.[7077]
Source page 344–345 Cæteræ igitur urbes sunt mortales, as Peter [7078]Gillius concludes of Constantinople, hæc sane quamdiu erunt homines, futura mihi videtur immortalis; but 'tis not so: nor site, nor strength, nor Sea nor land can vindicate a city, but it and all must vanish at last. And as to a traveller great mountains seem plains afar off, at last are not discerned at all; cities, men, monuments decay. —— nec solidis prodest sua machina terris, the names are only left, those at length forgotten, and are involved in perpetual night.	"Other cities, then, are mortal," as Pierre Gilles concludes of Constantinople, "but this one seems to me destined for immortality, for as long as human beings exist." Yet it is not so. Neither situation nor strength, neither sea nor land, can protect a city: it and everything else must finally vanish. As great mountains seem flat to a traveller far away, and at last disappear from view altogether, so cities, people and monuments decay. "Nor does the solid earth gain protection from its own structure." Only names remain; in time these too are forgotten and wrapped in everlasting night.[7079]

[7076] Burton. Printed page 344, dagger: "Arcad. lib. 8." Pausanias, Arcadia, book 8. Compare Description of Greece 8.33; detailed wording remains to be collated.

[7077] Editor. Pausanias's reflection on the decline of cities is in Description of Greece 8.33. Hieron is Hiero; Empedocles is the philosopher associated with Agrigentum, modern Agrigento. Anacharsis is the traditionally wise Scythian. Burton's population figure and the scope of "which" are left as printed, pending closer source collation.

[7078] Burton. Printed page 344, dagger: "Præfat. Topogr. Constantinop." Pierre Gilles, preface to the Topography of Constantinople. Exact Latin edition remains to be collated.

[7079] Editor. Pierre Gilles, Latinised as Petrus Gyllius or Gillius, wrote on Constantinople's topography. Burton rejects the city's asserted permanence. The verse is Statius, Silvae 2.1.211; the marginal quotation on page 344 gives words from the preceding line. Here machina denotes the earth's vast structure.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 345 [7080]Returning out of Asia, when I sailed from Ægina toward Megara, I began (saith Servius Sulpitius in a consolatory Epistle of his to Tully) to view the country round about. Ægina was behind me, Megara before, Pyræus on the right hand, Corinth on the left, what flourishing towns heretofore, now prostrate and overwhelmed before mine eyes? I began to think with my self, Alas, why are we men so much disquieted with the departure of a friend, whose life is much shorter? [7081]When so many goodly cities lye buried before us. Remember O Servius thou art a man; and with that I was much confirmed, and corrected my self.	"Returning from Asia, as I sailed from Aegina towards Megara," says Servius Sulpicius in a letter of consolation to Cicero, "I began to look at the surrounding country. Aegina lay behind me, Megara ahead, Piraeus on the right and Corinth on the left. What flourishing cities they once were, now lying ruined and overwhelmed before my eyes! I began to think: alas, why are we so disturbed by the death of a friend, whose life is much shorter, when so many splendid cities lie buried before us? Remember, Servius, that you are human. This thought greatly strengthened me, and I corrected myself."[7082]
Correct then likewise, & comfort thy self in this, that we must necessarily dye, and all dye, that we shall rise again: as Tully held; Jucundiorque multo congressus noster futurus, quam insuavis & acerbus digressus. Our second meeting shall be much more pleasant, then our departure was grievous.	Correct yourself likewise, then, and take comfort in this: we must die, all of us must die, and we shall rise again, as Cicero believed. "Our reunion will be far more joyful than our parting was painful and bitter." Our second meeting will be much more pleasant than our departure was grievous.[7083]
I but he was my most dear and loving friend, my sole friend,	"Yes, but he was my dearest and most loving friend, my only friend."

[7080] Burton. Printed page 345, o: "Epist. Tull. lib. 3." Cicero's Letters, book 3, as printed. The passage is Servius Sulpicius Rufus's letter to Cicero, Ad familiares 4.5.4.

[7081] Burton. Printed page 345, p: "Quum tot oppidorum cadavera ante oculos projecta jacent." "When the corpses of so many cities lie thrown down before our eyes."

[7082] Editor. Servius Sulpicius Rufus to Cicero, Ad familiares 4.5.4, consoling him after Tullia's death. The printed book-3 reference differs from the standard location. Burton abridges the letter and turns its reflection on human mortality into the death of a friend; the margin retains the striking image of cities as corpses.

[7083] Editor. Burton joins Christian resurrection to a hope of reunion attributed to Cicero. The exact source of this final Latin sentence has not yet been securely located; it must not be taken as independent proof that Cicero held the Christian doctrine of resurrection.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7084]Quis desiderio sit pudor aut modus Tam chari capitis?	What shame or limit can there be in grieving For someone so dear?[7085]
— And who can blame my woe?	And who can blame my sorrow?
Thou mayst be ashamed, I say with [7086]Seneca, to confess it, in such a [7087]tempest as this to have but one anchor, go seek another: and for his part thou dost him great injury to desire his longer life.	You may well be ashamed to admit it, I say with Seneca: to have only one anchor in such a storm as this! Go and find another. As for him, you do him a great wrong by wishing that he had lived longer.[7088]
[7089]Wilt thou have him crazed and sickly still, like a tired traveller that comes weary to his Inne, begin his journey afresh, or to be freed from his miseries? thou hast more need rejoyce that he is gone.	Would you have him remain frail and sickly, like a tired traveller who reaches his inn exhausted only to begin his journey again? Or would you have him freed from his miseries? You have more reason to rejoice that he is gone.
Another complains of a most sweet wife, a young wife, Nondum sustulerat flavum Proserpina crinem, such a wife as no mortal man ever had, so good a wife, but she is now dead and gone, lethæoque jacet condita sarcophago.	Another laments a most delightful wife, a young wife—"Proserpina had not yet taken away the golden lock"—a wife such as no mortal man ever had, so good a wife; but she is now dead and gone, "and lies buried in the tomb of oblivion."[7090]

[7084] Burton. Printed page 345, dagger: "Hor. lib. 1. Od. 24." Horace, Odes 1.24.

[7085] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.24.1–2, mourning Quintilius. Burton's following English line is his separate gloss; both it and a fresh translation of the Latin are retained.

[7086] Burton. Printed page 345, q: "De remed. fortuit." On Remedies for the Accidents of Fortune, attributed to Seneca.

[7087] Burton. Printed page 345, r: "Erubesce tanta tempestate quod ad unam anchoram stabas." Be ashamed that in so great a storm you relied on one anchor.

[7088] Editor. De remediis fortuitorum is pseudo-Senecan. The Manipulus project's transcription of Haase (1895), 15.2, has the single-anchor rebuke; 16.1 has the claim that a man who found or made a good wife can do so again. Burton compresses both. His precise edition and the intervening illness passage remain unidentified. The harsh consolation is retained as his argument.

[7089] Burton. Printed page 345, s: "Vis ægrum, & morbidum, sitibundum — gaude potius quod his malis liberatus sit." Do you want him ill, sickly, thirsting? Rejoice instead that he has been freed from these evils.

[7090] Editor. The golden lock recalls Virgil, Aeneid 4.698–699: Proserpina has not yet taken the lock that consigns the dying Dido to the underworld. Burton compresses and changes the wording. Lethaeo evokes Lethe, the river of forgetfulness; the exact source of the tomb phrase remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I reply to him in Seneca's words, if such a woman at least ever was to be had, [7091]He did either so find or make her; if he found her, he may as happily find another; if he made her, as Critobulus in Xenophon did by his, he may as good cheap inform another, & bona tam sequitur, quam bona prima fuit; he need not dispair, so long as the same master is to be had.	I answer him in Seneca's words, if such a woman was ever to be found: he either found her so or made her so. If he found her, he may be just as fortunate in finding another. If he made her so, as Critobulus in Xenophon did with his wife, he can just as easily teach another; "and one as good follows as the first was good." He need not despair while the same teacher is still available.[7092]
But was she good? Had she been so tryed peradventure as that Ephesian widow in Petronius, by some swaggering souldier, she might not have held out. Many a man would have been willingly rid of his: before thou wast bound, now thou art free; [7093]and 'tis but a folly to love thy fetters though they be of gold.	But was she good? Had some swaggering soldier perhaps put her to the test, like the Ephesian widow in Petronius, she might not have stood firm. Many a man would gladly have been rid of his wife. Before, you were bound; now you are free. It is foolish to love your fetters even if they are gold.[7094]

[7091] Burton. Printed page 345, t: "Uxorem bonam aut invenisti, aut sic fecisti; si inveneris, aliam habere te posse ex hoc intelligamus: si feceris, bene speres, salvus est artifex." You either found a good wife or made her so. If you found her, let us infer from this that you can have another; if you made her so, have good hope: the craftsman is still safe.

[7092] Editor. Inform means teach or shape; as good cheap means just as readily. The scan reads master, not matter. Xenophon's Oeconomicus 7–10 has Ischomachus describe educating his wife; Critobulus is an interlocutor elsewhere in the dialogue. The Latin adapts Ovid, Ars amatoria 3.66, replacing Nec (nor) with & (and): Ovid says a later hour is not as good as the first; Burton turns this into reassurance about a later wife.

[7093] Burton. Printed page 345, u: "Stulti est compedes licet aureas amare." It is a fool's part to love fetters, even golden ones.

[7094] Editor. In Petronius, Satyricon 111–112, the Ephesian widow becomes a soldier's lover at her husband's tomb. Burton uses this to attack the mourner's idealisation. The golden-fetters maxim occurs in Pseudo-Seneca, De remediis 16.2, bracketed in the consulted Haase transcription; Burton omits suas and uses licet for quamvis. The disparagement belongs to the historical argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Come into a third place, you shall have an aged father sighing for a sonne, a pretty childe;	Go somewhere else, and you will find an aged father sighing for a son, a lovely child:
[7095]Impube pectus quale vel impia Molliret Thracum pectora.	A tender child's breast, such as would soften even The pitiless hearts of Thracians.[7096]
—— He now lyes asleep, Would make an impious Thracian weep.	He who now lies asleep Would make a pitiless Thracian weep.
Or some fine daughter that dyed young, Nondum experta novi gaudia prima tori. Or a forlorn son for his deceased father. But why? Prior exiit, prior intravit, he came first, and he must go first. [7097]Tu frustra pius, heu, &c. What wouldst thou have the laws of nature altered, and him to live alwayes? Julius Cæsar, Augustus, Alcibiades, Galen, Aristotle, lost their fathers young. And why on the other side shouldst thou so heavily take the death of thy little son?	Or a beautiful daughter who died young, "before experiencing the first pleasures of a new marriage bed." Or a forlorn son grieving for his dead father. But why? "He went out first; he came in first": he came first, and must go first. "Alas, your devotion is in vain," and so on. Would you have the laws of nature changed, and have him live for ever? Julius Caesar, Augustus, Alcibiades, Galen and Aristotle lost their fathers when young. And, on the other hand, why should you take the death of your little son so heavily?[7098]
Source page 346 [7099]Num quia nec fato, merita nec morte peribat, Sed miser ante diem ——	Is it because he was dying neither by fate nor by a deserved death, But wretchedly before his day?[7100]

[7095] Burton. Printed page 345, dagger: "Hor." Horace.

[7096] Editor. Horace, Epodes 5.13–14, describes a boy threatened by witches. Burton changes impube corpus, quale posset impia / mollire into impube pectus, quale vel impia / molliret. His English gloss adds sleep, absent from the Latin. The Thracian is a conventional ancient image of savagery.

[7097] Burton. Printed page 345, asterisk: "Hor. lib. 1. Od. 24." Horace, Odes 1.24.

[7098] Editor. The untried marriage bed signifies death before marriage; the exact verse source is unlocated. Tu frustra pius, heu recalls Horace, Odes 1.24.11: affection cannot restore the dead. The list of early paternal losses remains Burton's historical claim, pending individual collation.

[7099] Burton. Printed page 346, asterisk: "Virg. 4. Æn." Virgil, Aeneid 4.

[7100] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.696–697, originally describes Dido. Burton changes nam to num, "because" to "is it because?", and feminine misera to masculine miser, applying the lines to a son. These changes are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
he died before his time perhaps, not yet come to the solstice of his age, yet, was he not mortal? Hear that divine [7101]Epictetus, If thou covet thy wife, friends, children should live alwayes, thou art a fool.	Perhaps he died before his time, before reaching the prime of life; yet was he not mortal? Hear that divine Epictetus: "If you wish your wife, friends and children to live for ever, you are a fool."[7102]
He was a fine child indeed, dignus Apollineis lachrymis, a sweet, a loving, a fair, a witty child, of great hope, another Eteoneus, whom Pindarus the Poet, and Aristides the Rhetorician so much lament; but who can tell whether he would have been an honest man? He might have proved a thief, a rogue, a spendthrift, a disobedient son, vexed and galled thee more then all the world beside, he might have wrangled with thee and disagreed, or with his brothers, as Eteocles and Polynices, and broke thy heart;	He was a fine child indeed, "worthy of Apollo's tears": a sweet, loving, beautiful, intelligent child of great promise, another Eteoneus, whom the poet Pindar and the orator Aristides so deeply lament. But who can tell whether he would have become an upright man? He might have turned out a thief, a scoundrel, a spendthrift or a disobedient son, and have vexed and hurt you more than all the rest of the world. He might have quarrelled with you, or with his brothers like Eteocles and Polynices, and broken your heart.[7103]

[7101] Burton. Printed page 346, asterisk: "Cap. 19. Si id studes ut uxor, amici, liberi perpetuo vivant, stultus es." Chapter 19: If you aim to have your wife, friends and children live for ever, you are a fool.

[7102] Editor. Epictetus, Enchiridion 14 in the consulted numbering, rather than Burton's chapter 19. Solstice of his age means the height or prime of life. Divine here praises the philosopher's wisdom.

[7103] Editor. Honest means morally upright; witty means intelligent. Eteoneus was the subject of Aelius Aristides' funeral oration 31 (11 in another numbering). Aristides invokes Pindar as an imagined model for lamentation; Burton's wording misleadingly makes Pindar himself mourn this much later youth (see the UCL study of Aristides and lyric quotation). Eteocles and Polynices exemplify ruinous conflict between brothers. The Apollo phrase remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
he is now gone to eternity as another Ganymede in the [7104]flower of his youth, as if he had risen, saith [7105]Plutarch, from the midst of a feast, before he was drunk, the longer he had lived, the worse he would have been, & quo vita longior (Ambrose thinks) culpa numerosior, more sinful, more to answer he would have had.	Now he has passed into eternity like another Ganymede in the flower of youth, as though, says Plutarch, he had risen midway through a feast before becoming drunk. The longer he had lived, the worse he would have become; "and the longer the life," Ambrose thinks, "the more numerous the sins": he would have been more sinful, with more to answer for.[7106]
If he was naught, thou mayst be glad he is gone; if good, be glad thou hadst such a son. Or art thou sure he was good? It may be he was an hypocrite as many are, and howsoever he spake thee fair, peradventure he prayed amongst the rest that Icaro Menippus heard at Jupiters whispering place in Lucian, for his fathers death, because he now kept him short, he was to inherit much goods, and many fair Manors after his decease.	If he was bad, you may be glad that he is gone; if good, be glad that you had such a son. Or are you certain that he was good? Perhaps he was a hypocrite, as many are; however pleasantly he spoke to you, perhaps he prayed with the others whom Icaromenippus heard at Jupiter's whispering place in Lucian, asking for his father's death because his father kept him short of money, and he would inherit much property and many fine estates when he died.[7107]

[7104] Burton. Printed page 346, x: "Deus quos diligit juvenes rapit, Menan." God takes away young those whom he loves. Menander.

[7105] Burton. Printed page 346, y: "Consol. ad Apol. Apollonius filius tuus in flore decessit, ante nos ad æternitatem digressus, tanquam è convivio abiens, priusquam in errorem aliquem è temulentiâ incideret, quales in longâ senectâ accidere solent." Consolation to Apollonius: Your son Apollonius died in his prime, departing before us into eternity, as though leaving a feast before falling through drunkenness into some error of the kind that commonly occurs in prolonged old age.

[7106] Editor. Ganymede is the youth taken to the gods. The Consolation to Apollonius 34 (119E–120B), transmitted among Plutarch's Moralia, includes both Menander's saying about dying young and the image of leaving a feast before old age's errors. This comparison uses the English translation; Burton's Latin intermediary and the Ambrose quotation remain unlocated.

[7107] Editor. Lucian, Icaromenippus 25, imagines Zeus listening to prayers, including a son's wish for his father's speedy death. Icaromenippus is the flying Menippus of the dialogue; Jupiter is the Roman name Burton uses for Zeus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or put case he was very good, suppose the best, may not thy dead son expostulate with thee, as he did in the same [7108]Lucian, Why dost thou lament my death, or call me miserable that am much more happy then thy self? what misfortune is befaln me? Is it because I am not bald, crooked, old, rotten, as thou art? What have I lost, some of your good chear, gay cloths, musick, singing, dancing, kissing, merry meetings, thalami lubentias, &c. is that it?	Or suppose he was very good: grant the best case. May not your dead son remonstrate with you, as the son does in the same Lucian? "Why do you lament my death, or call me miserable when I am much happier than you? What misfortune has befallen me? Is it because I am not bald, bent, old and decayed, as you are? What have I lost? Some of your good food, fine clothes, music, singing, dancing, kissing, merry gatherings and pleasures of the marriage bed—is that it?"[7109]
Is it not much better not to hunger at all then to eat: not to thirst then to drink to satisfie thirst: not to be cold then to put on cloths to drive away cold? You had more need rejoyce that I am freed from diseases, agues, cares, anxieties, livor, love, covetousness, hatred, envy, malice, that I fear no more thieves, tyrants, enemies as you do.	"Is it not much better never to be hungry than to eat; never to be thirsty than to drink to quench thirst; never to be cold than to put on clothes to drive away the cold? You have more reason to rejoice that I am free from diseases, fevers, cares, anxieties, spite, love, greed, hatred, envy and malice, and no longer fear thieves, tyrants and enemies as you do."
[7110]Id cinerem & manes credis curare sepultos?	Do you think the ashes and buried spirits care about that?[7111]

[7108] Burton. Printed page 346, z: "Tom. 1. Tract. de luctu. Quid me mortuum miserum vocas, qui te sum multo felicior? aut quid acerbi mihi putas contigisse? an quia non sum malus senex, ut tu facie rugosus, incurvus, &c. O demens, quid tibi videtur in vita boni? nimirum amicitias, cœnas, &c. Longe melius non esurire quam edere; non sitire, &c. Gaude potius quod morbos & febres effugerim, angorem animi, &c. Ejulatus quid prodest, quid lachrymæ, &c." Volume 1, treatise On Mourning: Why call me wretched now that I am dead, when I am much happier than you? What bitter misfortune do you think has happened to me? Is it because I am not a bad old man, wrinkled in the face and bent like you, and so on? Fool, what seems good to you in life? Friendships and dinners, no doubt, and so on. Far better not to be hungry than to eat, not to be thirsty, and so on. Rejoice instead that I have escaped diseases and fevers, anguish of mind, and so on. What use are wailing and tears, and so on?

[7109] Editor. Lucian, On Mourning 16–18, gives an imagined dead son's answer to his father. Burton expands and paraphrases the satire; the Latin margin and body are not word-for-word equivalents. The margin's malus senex, "bad old man", is retained as printed. The large marginal container belongs to this passage and is preserved in a single footnote.

[7110] Burton. Printed page 346, dagger: "Virgil." Virgil.

[7111] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.34, spoken by Anna as she encourages the widowed Dido to love again. Burton prints & ("and") where the consulted text has aut ("or"). Manes are the spirits of the dead.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Do they concern us at all, think you, when we are once dead? Condole not others then overmuch, wish not or fear thine death.	Do such things concern us at all, do you think, once we are dead? Do not, then, mourn others excessively; neither wish for nor fear your own death.
[7112]Summum nec optes diem nec metuas;	Neither wish for your last day nor fear it.[7113]
'tis to no purpose.	It serves no purpose.
Excessi è vitæ ærumnis facilisque lubensque, Ne pejora ipsa morte dehinc videam,	I left life's troubles readily and willingly, So that I should not henceforth see things worse than death itself.
I left this irksome life with all mine heart, Lest worse then death should happen to my part.	I left this burdensome life with all my heart, Lest something worse than death should fall to my lot.
Source page 346–347 [7114]Cardinal Brundusinus caused this Epitaph in Rome to be inscribed on his tomb, to shew his willingness to dye, and taxe those that were so loth to depart. Weep and howl no more then, 'tis to small purpose; and as Tully adviseth us in the like case, Non quos amisimus sed quantum lugere par sit cogitemus: Think what we do, not whom we have lost. So David did, 2 Sam. 22. While the child was yet alive, I fasted and wept, but being now dead, why should I fast? Can I bring him again? I shall go to him, but he cannot return to me.	Cardinal Brundusinus had this epitaph inscribed on his tomb in Rome, to show his willingness to die and to rebuke those so reluctant to depart. Weep and howl no more, then: it serves little purpose. As Cicero advises in a similar case, "Let us consider not whom we have lost, but how much mourning is fitting": consider what we are doing, not whom we have lost. David did so, in 2 Samuel 22: "While the child was still alive, I fasted and wept; but now that he is dead, why should I fast? Can I bring him back? I shall go to him, but he cannot return to me."[7115]

[7112] Burton. Printed page 346, asterisk: "Hor." Horace. The verse is Martial's; see the editorial note.

[7113] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 10.47.13, not Horace as the margin says. Burton reverses the order of "fear" and "wish for"; the meaning remains the same.

[7114] Burton. Printed page 346, dagger: "Chytreus deliciis Europæ." Chytraeus, Deliciae Europae.

[7115] Editor. Brundusinus means "of Brindisi"; the cardinal and Chytraeus inscription remain to be identified securely. The exact Cicero wording also remains unlocated. Burton's 2 Sam. 22 is a citation error: David's speech is 2 Samuel 12:22–23. The original reference remains in both columns; the correction is recorded here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 347 He that doth otherwise is an intemperate, a weak, a silly, and undiscreet man. Though Aristotle deny any part of intemperance to be conversant about sorrow, I am of [7116]Seneca's mind, he that is wise is temperate, and he that is temperate is constant, free from passion, and he that is such a one, is without sorrow: as all wise men should be.	Anyone who acts otherwise is uncontrolled, weak, foolish and lacking in judgement. Although Aristotle denies that intemperance has anything to do with sorrow, I agree with Seneca: whoever is wise is temperate; whoever is temperate is steadfast and free from passion; and such a person is without sorrow, as all wise people should be.[7117]
The [7118]Thracians wept still when a child was born, feasted and made mirth when any man was buried: and so should we rather be glad for such as die well, that they are so happily freed from the miseries of this life. When Eteoneus that noble young Greek was so generally lamented by his friends, Pindarus the Poet faines some god saying, Silete homines, non enim miser est, &c. be quiet good folks, this young man is not so miserable as you think; he is neither gone to Styx nor Acheron, sed gloriosus & senii expers heros, he lives for ever in the Elisian fields. He now enjoyes that happiness, which your great Kings so earnestly seek, and wears that garland for which ye contend.	The Thracians always wept when a child was born, and feasted and rejoiced when anyone was buried. So we too should be glad for those who die well, since they have been so happily freed from this life's miseries. When that noble young Greek Eteoneus was universally lamented by his friends, the poet Pindar imagines a god saying, "Be silent, mortals, for he is not unhappy," and so on: quiet, good people; this young man is not as miserable as you think. He has gone neither to Styx nor to Acheron; "but a glorious hero, untouched by old age," he lives for ever in the Elysian fields. He now enjoys the happiness your great kings seek so earnestly, and wears the garland for which you compete.[7119]

[7116] Burton. Printed page 347, asterisk: "Epist. 85." Seneca, Letter 85.

[7117] Editor. Seneca, Letter 85.2, sets out the Stoic chain from wisdom through temperance and steadfastness to happiness. The following discussion considers a Peripatetic objection: whether freedom from sorrow means complete immunity or only moderation. Burton adopts the stricter formulation. His Aristotle reference is not supplied with a work or passage.

[7118] Burton. Printed page 347, a: "Sardus de mor. gen." Sardus, On the Customs of Peoples.

[7119] Editor. Sardus's exact passage remains uncollated. Styx and Acheron are rivers of the underworld; the Elysian fields are the dwelling of the blessed dead. Burton again attaches Pindar to Eteoneus (see the earlier note); the precise source of this imagined divine speech remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If our present weakness is such, we cannot moderate our passions in this behalf, we must divert them by all means, by doing something else, thinking of another subject. The Italians most part sleep away care and grief, if it unseasonably seise upon them, Danes, Dutchmen, Polanders and Bohemians drink it down, our country men go to playes: doe something or other, let it not transpose thee, or by [7120]premeditation make such accidents familiar, as Ulysses that wept for his dog, but not for his wife, quòd paratus esset animo obfirmato, (Plut. de anim. tranq.) accustome thy self, and harden before hand by seeing other mens calamities, and applying them to thy present estate: Prævisum est levius quod fuit ante malum.	If our present weakness prevents us from moderating our emotions in this matter, we must use every means to turn them aside: do something else, think about another subject. Italians mostly sleep away care and grief if it seizes them at an inconvenient time; Danes, Dutchmen, Poles and Bohemians drink it down; our countrymen go to plays. Do something, whatever it may be; do not let grief unhinge you. Or make such misfortunes familiar by thinking of them beforehand, like Ulysses, who wept for his dog but not for his wife, "because he was prepared, his mind made firm" (Plutarch, On Tranquillity of Mind). Accustom and harden yourself beforehand by seeing others' calamities and applying them to your own situation: "An evil is lighter when it has been foreseen."[7121]

[7120] Burton. Printed page 347, b: "Præmeditatione facilem reddere quemque casum. Plutarchus consolatione ad Apollonium. Assuefacere nos casibus debemus. Tull. lib. 3. Tusculan. quæst." Make every misfortune easier by considering it beforehand. Plutarch, Consolation to Apollonius. We ought to accustom ourselves to misfortunes. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, book 3.

[7121] Editor. Plutarch, On Tranquillity of Mind 16 (475D–E), contrasts Odysseus's unexpected encounter with his dog and his prepared composure beside his living, weeping wife. Burton is not saying that the wife had died. The national drinking and sleeping habits are his generalisations. Transpose means disturb or unhinge; premeditation means mentally preparing for a possible misfortune.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I will conclude with [7122]Epictetus, If thou lovest a pot, remember 'tis but a pot thou lovest, and thou wilt not be troubled when 'tis broken: If thou lovest a son or wife, remember they were mortall, and thou wilt not be so impatient. And for false fears and all other fortuite inconveniences, mischances, calamities, to resist and prepare our selves, not to faint is best; [7123]Stultum est timere quod vitari non potest, 'tis a folly to fear that which cannot be avoided, or to be discouraged at all.	I shall conclude with Epictetus: "If you love a pot, remember that it is only a pot you love, and you will not be troubled when it breaks. If you love a son or wife, remember that they are mortal, and you will not be so unable to bear the loss." As for groundless fears and all other accidental troubles, misfortunes and calamities, our best course is to resist and prepare ourselves, without losing heart. "It is foolish to fear what cannot be avoided": foolish to fear the inevitable, or to be discouraged at all.[7124]
[7125]Nam quisquis trepidus pavet vel optat, Abjecit clypeum, locoque motus Nectit quâ valeat trahi catenam.	For whoever trembles with fear or desire Has thrown away his shield and, driven from his ground, Forges the chain by which he can be dragged away.[7126]
For he that so faints or fears, and yeelds to his passion, flings away his own weapons, makes a cord to bind himself, and puls a beam upon his own head.	For whoever thus loses heart or gives way to fear, surrendering to his passion, throws away his own weapons, makes a cord to bind himself, and pulls a beam down upon his own head.

[7122] Burton. Printed page 347, dagger: "Cap. 8. Si ollam diligas, memento, te ollam diligere, non perturbaberis eâ confractâ; si filium aut uxorem, memento hominem à te diligi, &c." Chapter 8: If you love a pot, remember that you love a pot; you will not be troubled when it is broken. If a son or wife, remember that it is a human being you love, and so on.

[7123] Burton. Printed page 347, asterisk: "Seneca." Seneca.

[7124] Editor. The pot, wife and child are from Epictetus, Enchiridion 3 in the consulted numbering, not chapter 8. Impatient means unable to endure. The following maxim is assigned only to Seneca; its precise source is unlocated.

[7125] Burton. Printed page 347, c: "Boeth. lib. 1. pros. 4." Boethius, book 1, prose 4. The quotation is from metre 4.

[7126] Editor. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 1, metre 4.15–18, rather than prose 4 as the margin states. Burton begins Nam instead of At and omits the intervening line explaining the loss of self-command. His following prose adds the falling beam image.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 6. Against Envie, Livor, Emulation, Hatred, Ambition, Self-love, and all other affections.	MEMBER 6 Against envy, spite, rivalry, hatred, ambition, Self-love and all other passions.
Source page 347–348 Against those other [7127]passions & affections, there is no better remedy, then as Mariners when they go to Sea, provide all things necessary to resist a tempest; to furnish our selves with Philosophicall & Divine precepts, other mens examples, [7128]Periculum ex aliis facere, sibi quod ex usu siet: To balance our hearts with love, charity, meekness, patience, and counterpoise those irregular motions of envie, livor, spleen, hatred, with their opposite vertues, as we bend a crooked staffe another way, to oppose [7129]sufferance to labour, patience to reproach, bounty to covetousness, fortitude to pusillanimity, meekness to anger, humility to pride, to examine our selves for what cause we are so much disquieted, on what ground, what occasion, is it just or fained?	Against those other passions and emotions, there is no better remedy than to equip ourselves as sailors do when they put to sea, providing everything needed to withstand a storm: furnish ourselves with philosophical and religious precepts and other people's examples, "learning from others' experience what may be useful to ourselves." Balance our hearts with love, charity, gentleness and patience. Counter those unruly impulses of envy, spite, ill temper and hatred with their opposite virtues, as we bend a crooked stick the other way. Set endurance against hardship, patience against abuse, generosity against greed, courage against faint-heartedness, gentleness against anger and humility against pride. Examine why we are so disturbed: on what grounds, on what occasion? Is the cause real or imagined?[7130]

[7127] Burton. Printed page 347, d: "Qui invidiam ferre non potest, ferre contemptum cogitur." Whoever cannot bear envy is forced to bear contempt.

[7128] Burton. Printed page 347, dagger: "Ter. Heautont." Terence, Heauton Timorumenos (The Self-Tormentor).

[7129] Burton. Printed page 348, dagger: "Epictetus c. 14. Si labor objectus fuerit tolerantiæ, convicium patientiæ, &c. si ita consueveris, vitiis non obtemperabis." Epictetus, chapter 14: If hardship presents itself, [turn to] endurance; abuse, to patience, and so on. If you form this habit, you will not yield to vices. The compressed Latin is retained.

[7130] Editor. Livor is envious spite; emulation here is competitive jealousy; spleen is ill temper. The Terence maxim is adapted from Heauton Timorumenos 210. The counsel to meet hardship with endurance and abuse with patience is Epictetus, Enchiridion 10 in the consulted numbering, rather than chapter 14. The heading begins Member 6; the page's running head anticipates it above the end of Member 5.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 348 And then either to pacifie our selves by reason, to divert by some other object, contrary passion, or premeditation, [7131]Meditari secum oportet quo pacto adversam ærumnam ferat, Pericla, damna, exilia peregrè rediens semper cogitet, Aut filii peccatum, aut uxoris mortem, aut morbum filiæ, communia esse hæc: fieri posse, ut ne quid animo sit novum.	Then either calm ourselves by reason, or turn our minds to some other object, an opposite emotion, or reflection beforehand: "A man ought to consider how he will bear adversity. Returning from abroad, he should always keep in mind dangers, losses, exile, a son's misconduct, a wife's death or a daughter's illness: these are common things and can happen, so that nothing may take his mind by surprise."[7132]
To make them familiar, even all kinde of calamities, that when they happen, they may be lesse troublesome unto us. In secundis meditare, quo pacto feras adversa; or out of mature judgement to avoid the effect, or disannull the cause, as they do that are troubled with toothach, pull them quite out.	Make them familiar—all kinds of calamities—so that when they happen they may trouble us less. "In prosperity, consider how you will bear adversity." Or, after mature deliberation, avoid the effect or remove the cause, as people with toothache do by pulling the teeth right out.
[7133]Ut vivat castor, sibi testes amputat ipse; Tu quoque siqua nocent, abjice, tutus eris.	To save its life, the beaver cuts off its own testicles; You too: cast off whatever harms you, and you will be safe.[7134]
The Beaver bites off's stones to save the rest: Do thou the like with that thou art opprest.	The beaver bites off its testicles to save the rest: Do the same with whatever weighs you down.

[7131] Burton. Printed page 348, dagger: "Ter Phor." Terence, Phormio.

[7132] Editor. Terence, Phormio 241–246: Demipho urges anticipating common misfortunes. Burton abbreviates the speech and alters its syntax, but retains its practical point. The next sentence summarises the omitted opening about preparation in prosperity.

[7133] Burton. Printed page 348, dagger: "Alciat. Embl." Alciato, Emblems.

[7134] Editor. Alciato's beaver emblem, Aere quandoque salutem redimendam, has six Latin lines in the 1531 text (emblem 84), not Burton's distich. Both use the fable of sacrificing the testicles to escape hunters. Burton's exact two-line source remains unidentified. This is an emblematic story, not reliable animal behaviour; "stones" means testicles.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or as they that play at wasters, exercise themselves by a few cudgels how to avoid an enemies blows: let us arm our selves against all such violent incursions, which may invade our minds. A little experience and practice will inure us to it; vetula vulpes, as the proverb saith, laqueo haud capitur, an old Fox is not so easily taken in a snare: an old souldier in the world me thinks should not be disquieted, but ready to receive all fortunes, encounters, and with that resolute Captain, come what may come, to make answer,	Or, as people fencing with wooden swords learn through a few blows of the cudgel how to avoid an enemy's strokes, let us arm ourselves against every violent assault that may invade our minds. A little experience and practice will accustom us to it. "An old fox," as the proverb says, "is not caught in a snare": an old fox is not so easily trapped. An old soldier in the world should, I think, remain untroubled, ready to meet every turn of fortune and every encounter, and answer with that resolute commander, come what may:[7135]
—— [7136]non ulla laborum O virgo nova mi facies inopinaque surgit, Omnia percepi atque animo mecum ante peregi.	No new and unexpected form of hardship Rises before me, maiden; I have foreseen it all and gone through it beforehand in my mind.[7137]
No labour comes at unwares to me, For I have long before cast what may be.	No hardship takes me unawares, For I have long considered what may come.
— non hoc primum mea pectora vulnus Senserunt, graviora tuli ——	This is not the first wound my breast Has felt; I have borne worse.[7138]

[7135] Editor. Wasters are wooden practice swords. Cudgels here are blows received in practice. Burton treats forethought and experience as training for the mind; the commander introduced next is Aeneas.

[7136] Burton. Printed page 348, asterisk: "Virg. Æn." Virgil, Aeneid.

[7137] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 6.103–105: Aeneas answers the Sibyl. Burton's inopinaque and percepi differ from the consulted text's inopinave and praecepi. The modern rendering follows Burton's sense of having already grasped and rehearsed the hardships.

[7138] Editor. Compare Octavia 651–652 in the consulted Latin text, a play transmitted among Seneca's tragedies. Octavia tells her supporters that this is not her first wound and she has borne worse. Burton moves mea before pectora and rearranges the verse division. The comparison identifies the passage, not his immediate edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Commonwealth of [7139]Venice, in their Armory have this inscription, Happy is that citie which in time of peace thinks of war, a fit Motto for every mans private house; happy is the man that provides for a future assault. But many times we complain, repine and mutter without a cause, we give way to passions, we may resist, and will not.	The Republic of Venice has this inscription in its armoury: "Happy is the city that thinks of war in time of peace"—a fitting motto for everyone's home. Happy is the man who prepares for a future assault. Yet we often complain, fret and grumble without cause; we give way to emotions that we could resist, but will not.[7140]
Socrates was bad by nature, envious, as he confessed to Zopirus the Physiognomer, accusing him of it, froward and lascivious: but as he was Socrates, he did correct and amend himself. Thou art malicious, envious, covetous, impatient, no doubt, & lascivious, yet as thou art a Christian correct & moderate thy self.	Socrates was bad by nature: envious, as he admitted when Zopyrus the reader of faces accused him of it, ill-tempered and lustful. Yet, being Socrates, he corrected and reformed himself. You are malicious, envious, greedy, impatient and, no doubt, lustful; yet, being a Christian, correct and govern yourself.[7141]

[7139] Burton. Printed page 348, dagger: "Nat. Chytreus deliciis Europæ. Felix civitas quæ tempore pacis de bello cogitat." Nathan Chytraeus, Deliciae Europae: Happy is the city that thinks of war in time of peace.

[7140] Editor. Burton attributes the Venetian inscription to Nathan Chytraeus's Deliciae Europae. The inscription's exact location and wording in that collection remain to be checked.

[7141] Editor. A physiognomer claimed to read character from bodily features. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 4.80, tells how Zopyrus alleged many faults in Socrates, who admitted the tendencies but said reason had overcome them. Cicero does not there enumerate Socrates's particular faults. Burton's intermediary and specific list remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis something I confesse, and able to move any man, to see himself contemned, obscure, neglected, disgraced, undervalued, [7142]left behind, some cannot endure it, no not constant Lipsius, a man discreet otherwise, yet too weak and passionate in this, as his words expresse, [7143]collegas olim, quos ego sine fremitu non intueor, nuper terræ filios, nunc Mæcenates & Agrippas habeo, — summo jam monte potitos.	I admit it is something, and enough to stir anyone, to find himself despised, obscure, neglected, disgraced, undervalued and left behind. Some cannot bear it—not even steadfast Lipsius, otherwise a judicious man, yet too weak and emotional in this matter, as his words show: "I have former colleagues whom I cannot look at without growling: lately nobodies, now Maecenases and Agrippas, already masters of the highest peak."[7144]
Source page 348–349 But he was much too blame for it; to a wise staid man this is nothing; we cannot all be honoured and rich, all Cæsars; if we will be content, our present state is good, and in some mens opinion to be preferred. Let them go on, get wealth, offices, titles, honours, preferments, and what they will themselves, by chance, fraud, imposture, simony, and indirect means, as too many do, by bibery, flattery, and parasiticall insinuation, by impudence, and time-serving, let them climb up to advancement in despite of vertue, let them go before, crosse me on every side, [7145]me non offendunt modo non in oculos incurrant, as he said, correcting his former errour, they do not offend me, so long as they run not into mine eyes.	But he was much to blame for it. To a wise, composed man it means nothing. We cannot all be honoured and rich, all Caesars. If we are willing to be content, our present condition is good, and in some people's opinion preferable. Let them go on: acquire wealth, offices, titles, honours, advancement and whatever else they wish, through chance, fraud, imposture, simony and crooked methods, as too many do—through bribery, flattery, parasitic ingratiation, shamelessness and servility to the times. Let them climb to advancement in defiance of virtue; let them go ahead and cross my path on every side. "They do not offend me, provided they do not run into my eyes," as he said, correcting his earlier error: they do not offend me so long as they do not thrust themselves into my sight.[7146]

[7142] Burton. Printed page 348, d: "Occupet extremum scabies; mihi turpe relinqui est. Hor." Let the last catch the itch; it is shameful for me to be left behind. Horace.

[7143] Burton. Printed page 348, e: "Lipsius epist. quæst. l. 1. ep. 7." Lipsius, Epistolicae quaestiones, book 1, letter 7; precise edition and location require collation.

[7144] Editor. Justus Lipsius is pointedly called constant, "steadfast", while displaying resentment at others' success. Terrae filii, literally "sons of the earth", means men of no distinguished origin. Maecenas and Agrippa stand for powerful, favoured grandees. Burton gives two slightly different forms of the Lipsius reference; both are preserved pending collation. The Horace marginal fragment is Ars poetica 417, where the fear of being left behind belongs to a pretender to poetic skill.

[7145] Burton. Printed page 349, f: "Lipsius epist. lib. 1. epist. 7." Lipsius, Letters, book 1, letter 7; precise edition and location require collation.

[7146] Editor. Simony is buying or selling ecclesiastical office or benefits. Bibery is retained from the source and rendered bribery. Lipsius's "run into my eyes" is an exaggerated expression for obtruding themselves upon his notice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 349 I am inglorious and poor, composita paupertate, but I live secure and quiet: they are dignified, have great means, pompe and state, they are glorious; but what have they with it? [7147]Envie, trouble, anxiety, as much labour to maintain their place with credit, as to get it at first. I am contended with my fortunes, spectator è longinquo, and love Neptunum procul à terra spectare furentem: he is ambitious, and not satisfied with his: [7148]but what gets he by it? to have all his life laid open, his reproaches seen; not one of a thousand but he hath done more worthy of dispraise and animadversion, then commendation; no better means to help this then to be private.	I am obscure and poor, "in settled poverty," but I live safely and quietly. They have rank, great resources, pomp and state: they are glorious. But what comes with it? Envy, trouble and anxiety; as much work to maintain their position creditably as to gain it in the first place. I am content with my fortunes, "a spectator from afar," and like "to watch Neptune raging far away from the land." The ambitious man is dissatisfied with his lot; but what does he gain? His whole life laid open and his disgrace exposed. Not one in a thousand has done more deserving praise than blame and censure; the best remedy is to remain a private person.[7149]
Let them run, ride, strive as so many fishes for a crum, scrape, climb, catch, snach, cozen, collogue, temporize and fleire, take all amongst them, wealth, honour, [7150]and get what they can, it offends me not;	Let them run, ride, scramble like so many fish for a crumb, scrape, climb, grab, snatch, cheat, flatter, bend with the times and smirk. Let them take everything among them—wealth, honour—and get what they can. It does not trouble me.[7151]

[7147] Burton. Printed page 349, g: "Gloria comitem habet invidiam, pari onere premitur retinendo ac acquirendo." Glory has envy as its companion; one is weighed down as heavily in retaining it as in acquiring it.

[7148] Burton. Printed page 349, h: "Quid aliud ambitiosus sibi parat quam ut probra ejus pateant? nemo vivens qui non habet in vitâ plura vituperatione quam laude digna; his malis non melius occurritur, quam si bene latueris." What else does an ambitious man secure for himself than the exposure of his disgrace? No living person has not done more in life deserving blame than praise. There is no better way to meet these evils than to remain well out of sight.

[7149] Editor. Printed contended is rendered content. Neptune personifies the sea; the image contrasts the spectator's safe position with another's ambition. The exact source of the Neptune phrase and of the unassigned Latin margins on fame and exposure remains unlocated.

[7150] Burton. Printed page 349, i: "Et omnes fama per urbes garrula laudet." And let chattering Fame praise them through all the cities.

[7151] Editor. Cozen means cheat; collogue, ingratiate oneself by flattery; temporize, adapt opportunistically to circumstances; fleire, smirk. The marginal line about Fame comes from Seneca, Hercules Furens 193–194, whose continuation is quoted next.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [7152]me mea tellus Lare secreto tutoque tegat,	Let my own land shelter me In a secluded, safe home.[7153]
I am well pleased with my fortunes,	I am well pleased with my fortunes:
—— [7154]Vivo & regno simul ista relinquens.	I live and reign, leaving those things behind.[7155]
I have learned in what state soever I am therewith to be contented, Philip. 1. 11. Come what can come, I am prepared, Nave ferar magna an parva, ferar unus & idem. I am the same.	"I have learned to be content in whatever state I am": Philippians 1:11. Come what may, I am prepared: "Whether I travel in a great ship or a small one, I shall travel as one and the same man." I am unchanged.[7156]
I was once so mad to bussell abroad, and seek about for preferment, tyre my self, and trouble all my friends, sed nihil labor tantus profecit; nam dum alios amicorum mors avocat, aliis ignotus sum, his invisus, alii largè promittunt, intercedunt illi mecum soliciti, hi vanâ spe lactant; dum alios ambio, hos capto, illis innotesco, ætas perit, anni defluunt, amici fatigantur, ego deseror, & jam, mundi tæsus, humanæque satur infidelitatis acquiesco.	I was once foolish enough to bustle abroad, seek advancement everywhere, exhaust myself and trouble all my friends. "But all that labour achieved nothing. For while death calls away some of my friends, to others I am unknown, to others unwelcome. Some promise generously; others anxiously intercede with me; others feed me empty hopes. While I solicit some, court others and make myself known to others, my life slips away, the years flow past, my friends grow weary, I am abandoned; and now, tired of the world and sated with human faithlessness, I settle down."[7157]

[7152] Burton. Printed page 349, k: "Sen. Her. fur." Seneca, Hercules Furens.

[7153] Editor. Seneca, Hercules Furens 196–197, the chorus preferring a quiet home to worldly glory. Lar, the household deity or hearth, stands for home.

[7154] Burton. Printed page 349, l: "Hor." Horace.

[7155] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.10.8, on relief from city life. Burton prints relinquens in place of the consulted reliqui; the rendering retains his participial phrasing while making the sense clear.

[7156] Editor. The biblical words are Philippians 4:11, not Burton's printed 1:11. The ship image is Horace, Epistles 2.2.200. Both express contentment independent of material circumstances.

[7157] Editor. Burton turns from general advice to his own frustrated search for advancement. His Latin is translated in full. The printed intercedunt illi mecum, literally "those men intercede with me", is awkward in context; it is retained rather than silently changed to "for me". A specific borrowed source for this Latin passage has not been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And so I say still; although I may not deny, but that I have had some [7158]bountifull patrons, and noble benefactors, ne sim interim ingratus, and I do thankfully acknowledge it, I have received some kindness, quod Deus illis beneficium rependat, si non pro votis, fortasse pro meritis, more peradventure then I deserve, though not to my desire; more of them then I did expect, yet not of others to my desert; neither am I ambitious or covetous, all this while, or a Suffenus to my self: what I have said, without prejudice or alteration shall stand.	And I still say so, although I cannot deny that I have had generous patrons and noble benefactors —"lest I meanwhile prove ungrateful"—and I thankfully acknowledge it. I have received some kindness—"may God repay them for that benefit"—"if not according to my wishes, perhaps according to my merits": perhaps more than I deserve, though less than I desire; more from them than I expected, yet less from others than I deserved. All this while I am neither ambitious nor greedy, nor a Suffenus in my own estimation. What I have said shall stand, without qualification or alteration.[7159]
And now as a mired horse that struggles at first with all his might and main to get out, but when he sees no remedy, that his beating will not serve, lies still, I have laboured in vain, rest satisfied, and if I may usurpe that of [7160]Prudentius,	And now, like a horse stuck in the mud, which at first struggles with all its strength to get out but lies still when it sees there is no remedy and its flailing will do no good, I have laboured in vain and rest content; and, if I may borrow those words of Prudentius:[7161]
Inveni portum, spes & fortuna valete, Nil mihi vobiscum, ludite nunc alios.	I have found harbour; hope and fortune, farewell. I have nothing more to do with you; make sport of others now.
Mine haven's found, fortune and hope adieu, Mock others now, for I have done with you.	My haven is found; fortune and hope, farewell. Mock others now, for I have done with you.

[7158] Burton. Printed page 349, dagger: "The right honourable Lady Francis Countesse Dowager of Exeter. The Lord Berkley." Burton names two patrons. Original spellings are retained.

[7159] Editor. Suffenus, in Catullus 22, is a writer delighted by his own bad verse, and here signifies self-flattery. Burton acknowledges patrons yet continues to weigh what he received against what he wanted or deserved. The margin names Lady Francis, dowager Countess of Exeter, and Lord Berkley; fuller biographical identification is deferred.

[7160] Burton. Printed page 349, dagger: "Distichon ejus in militem Christianum è Græco. Engraven on the tomb of Fr. Puccius the Florentine in Rome. Chytreus in deliciis." His couplet on a Christian soldier, from the Greek. Inscribed on the tomb of Fr. Puccius, the Florentine, in Rome. Chytraeus, Deliciae Europae. The attribution and inscription report require collation.

[7161] Editor. Usurpe here means appropriate or borrow. Burton attributes the couplet to Prudentius and supplies a Greek derivation and a tomb inscription in the margin. Its transmission and attribution require further collation: this draft does not certify it as a work of Prudentius. Both the fresh translation and Burton's English couplet are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 350 MEMB. 7. Against Repulse, Abuses, Injuries, Contempts, Disgraces, Contumelies, Slanders, Scoffes, &c.	MEMBER 7 Against rejection, abuse, injuries, contempt, disgrace, Insults, slander, mockery and the like.
[7162]I May not yet conclude, think to appease passions, or quiet the minde till such time as I have likewise removed some other of their more eminent and ordinary causes, which produce so grievous tortures and discontents: to divert all I cannot hope; to point alone at some few of the chiefest, is that which I aime at.	I cannot yet conclude, or think of calming the passions or quieting the mind, until I have also removed some of their other more prominent and common causes, which produce such grievous torment and discontent. I cannot hope to turn them all aside; my aim is only to point out a few of the chief ones.[7163]
Repulse and disgrace are two main causes of discontent, but to an understanding man not so hardly to be taken. Cæsar himself hath been denied, [7164]and when two stand equall in fortune, birth, and all other qualities alike, one of necessitie must lose. Why shouldst thou take it so grievously? It hath been a familiar thing for thee thy self to deny others. If every man might have what he would, we should all be deified, Emperours, Kings, Princes: if whatsoever vain hope suggests, unsatiable appetite affects, our preposterous judgement thinks fit were granted, we should have another Chaos in an instant, a meer confusion.	Rejection and disgrace are two chief causes of discontent, but a sensible person need not take them so hard. Caesar himself has been refused; and when two candidates are equal in fortune, birth and every other qualification, one must necessarily lose. Why should you take it so grievously? You yourself have often refused others. If everyone could have whatever he wanted, we should all be gods, emperors, kings and princes. If everything that vain hope suggests, insatiable appetite desires or our perverse judgement approves were granted, we should instantly have another Chaos: utter confusion.[7165]

[7162] Burton. Printed page 350, unmarked rubric: “Repulse.” Rejection. This marginal subject label is retained as a note.

[7163] Editor. Repulse here means rejection, particularly failure to obtain an appointment. The unmarked marginal subject label is included. Member 7 continues beyond this block.

[7164] Burton. Printed page 350, m: “Pæderatus in 300 Lacedæmoniorum numerum non electus risit, gratulari se dicens civitatem habere 300 cives se meliores.” Paederatus, not elected among the three hundred Spartans, smiled, saying that he congratulated the city on possessing three hundred citizens better than himself.

[7165] Editor. Plutarch, Lycurgus 25.4, relates that Paedaretus welcomed rejection from the three hundred as evidence that his city had three hundred better men. This locates the anecdote in English translation, not Burton’s Latin intermediary or the form Pæderatus. The unspecified rejection of Caesar remains unlocated. Chaos is the formless confusion preceding an ordered cosmos.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is some satisfaction to him that is repelled, that dignities, honours, offices, are not alwayes given by desert or worth, but for love, affinitie, friendship, affection, [7166]great mens letters, or as commonly they are bought and sold. [7167]Honours in court are bestowed not according to mens vertues and good conditions (as an old courtier observes) but as every man hath means, or more potent friends, so he is preferred.	It offers some consolation to the rejected man that dignities, honours and offices are not always awarded for merit or worth, but through love, family connections, friendship, partiality or letters from powerful men; or, as commonly happens, they are bought and sold. As an old courtier observes, honours at court are bestowed according to a man's wealth or powerful friends, rather than his virtues and good character.[7168]
With us in France ([7169]for so their own countrey man relates) most part the matter is carried by favour and grace; he that can get a great man to be his mediatour, runns away with all the preferment. Indignissimus plerumque præfertur, Vatinius Catoni, illaudatus laudatissimo;	"Among us in France"—so their own countryman reports—"matters are mostly settled by favour and patronage; whoever can secure a powerful man as his intermediary carries off all the advancement." "The least worthy is generally preferred: Vatinius before Cato, the unpraised before the most highly praised."[7170]
— servi dominantur; aselli Ornantur phaleris, dephalerantur equi.	Slaves rule; asses Are decked with trappings, while horses are stripped of theirs.[7171]

[7166] Burton. Printed page 350, n: "Kissing goes by favour." A proverb: favours are bestowed through personal preference.

[7167] Burton. Printed page 350, asterisk: "Æneas Syl. de miser. curial. Dantur honores in curiis non secundum honores & virtutes, sed ut quisque ditior est atque potentior, eò magis honoratur." Aeneas Sylvius, On the Miseries of Courtiers. Honours at court are given not according to honours and virtues, but the richer and more powerful a man is, the more he is honoured.

[7168] Editor. Affinitie includes family connection by marriage. Great men's letters are recommendations. Aeneas Sylvius is Enea Silvio Piccolomini, later Pope Pius II. The margin actually repeats honores, "honours", where the body paraphrases virtues and character; this reading is preserved.

[7169] Burton. Printed page 350, dagger: "Sesellius lib. 2 de repub. Gallorum. Favore apud nos & gratia plerumque res agitur; & qui commodum aliquem nacti sunt intercessorem, editum fere habent ad omnes præfecturas." Seyssel, On the French Commonwealth, book 2. Among us, matters are mostly managed by favour and influence; those who obtain a suitable intermediary generally have access to every office.

[7170] Editor. Sesellius is Claude de Seyssel. Vatinius and Cato represent the unworthy favourite and the meritorious rival; exact historical and textual intermediaries remain uncollated. The margin's editum is retained, with the sense of access supplied by context.

[7171] Editor. The trappings are ornamental harness or decorations. The image reverses merit: asses receive distinctions stripped from horses. No separate source is given for these lines, and none is asserted here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
An illiterate fool sits in a mans seat, and the common people hold him learned, grave and wise: One professeth ([7172]Cardan well notes) for a thousand Crowns, but he deserves not ten, when as he that deserves a thousand cannot get ten. Solarium non dat multis salem. As good horses draw in carts, as Coaches.	An ignorant fool occupies another man's seat, and the common people consider him learned, dignified and wise. As Cardan rightly observes, one man holds a professorship for a thousand crowns although he does not deserve ten, while another who deserves a thousand cannot obtain ten. "The salary does not provide many with even their salt." Horses just as good as those drawing coaches pull carts.[7173]
And oftentimes, which Machiavel seconds, [7174]Principes non sunt qui ob insignem virtutem principatu digni sunt, he that is most worthy wants imployment; he that hath skill to be a pilot wants a ship; and he that could govern a Commonwealth, a world it self, a King in conceit, wants means to exercise his worth, hath not a poor office to manage.	Often, as Machiavelli confirms, "those whose outstanding virtue makes them worthy to rule are not rulers." The worthiest man lacks employment; the skilled pilot lacks a ship; and the man who could govern a commonwealth, a whole world—a king in his own imagination—lacks the means to exercise his abilities and has not even a minor office to administer.[7175]

[7172] Burton. Printed page 350, asterisk: "Imperitus periti munus occupat, & sic apud vulgus habetur. Ille profitetur mille coronatis, cum nec decem mereatur; alius è diverso mille dignus, vix decem consequi potest." An unskilled man occupies a skilled man's office and is regarded as skilled by the crowd. One holds a professorship for a thousand crowns, though he does not deserve ten; another, by contrast, deserving a thousand, can scarcely obtain ten.

[7173] Editor. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. Professeth refers to paid teaching. Solarium is retained as printed, although the context requires a salary: the salt image emphasizes inadequate pay. The second mille in the margin is damaged in the scan; the reading agrees with the body's thousand-versus-ten comparison.

[7174] Burton. Printed page 350, dagger: "Epist. dedic. disput. Zeubbco Bondemontio, & Cosmo Rucelaio." Dedicatory letter to the Discourses, addressed to Buondelmonti and Cosimo Rucellai; Zeubbco is a tentative reading of the difficult printed first name.

[7175] Editor. The Italian dedication of Machiavelli's Discourses names Zanobi Buondelmonti and Cosimo Rucellai and contrasts actual princes with men who deserve to be princes. Burton's Latin wording is not the Italian text; its intermediary remains unidentified. The difficult marginal first name is preserved. Burton then concedes the applicant's possible self-deception.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And yet all this while he is a better man that is fit to reign, etsi careat regno, though he want a kingdome, [7176]then he that hath one, and knows not how to rule it: a Lion serves not alwayes his keeper, but oftentimes the keeper the Lion, and as [7177]Polydore Virgil hath it, multi reges ut pupilli ob inscitiam non regunt sed reguntur. Hieron of Syracuse was a brave King, but wanted a Kingdom; Perseus of Macedon had nothing of a King but the bare name and title, for he could not govern it: so great places are often ill bestowed, worthy persons unrespected.	Yet the man fit to reign, "even though he lacks a kingdom," is a better man than one who possesses a kingdom but does not know how to rule it. A lion does not always serve his keeper; often the keeper serves the lion. As Polydore Vergil puts it, "many kings, like wards, do not govern but are governed because of their ignorance." Hiero of Syracuse was a fine king but lacked a kingdom; Perseus of Macedon had nothing of a king except the bare name and title, for he could not govern his kingdom. Thus great positions are often badly bestowed and worthy people disregarded.[7178]
Many times too the servants have more means then the masters whom they serve, which [7179]Epictetus counts an eye-sore and inconvenient. But who can help it?	Often, too, servants have greater resources than the masters they serve, which Epictetus considers an eyesore and a disadvantage. But who can help it?[7180]
Source page 350–351 It is an ordinary thing in these dayes to see a base impudent asse, illiterate, unworthy, unsufficient, to be preferred before his betters, because he can put himself forward, because he looks big, can bussle in the world, hath a fair outside, can temporize, collogue, insinuate, or hath good store of friends and mony, whereas a more discreet, modest, and better deserving man shall lie hid or have a repulse.	Nowadays it is common to see a base, shameless ass—ignorant, unworthy and incompetent—advanced before his betters because he can push himself forward, look important, bustle about in the world, make an impressive appearance, adapt to the times, flatter and ingratiate himself, or command plenty of friends and money; meanwhile a more judicious, modest and deserving man remains obscure or is rejected.

[7176] Burton. Printed page 350, dagger: "Quum is qui regnat, & regnandi sit imperitus." Than the man who reigns and is unskilled in ruling.

[7177] Burton. Printed page 350, asterisk: "Lib. 22. hist." Book 22 of the History; the body attributes this to Polydore Vergil.

[7178] Editor. A pupillus is a ward under guardianship. Machiavelli's dedication also contrasts Hiero, while still a private citizen, with Perseus as king: fitness to rule is distinct from possessing a kingdom. Burton compresses this contrast. The Polydore Vergil reference and Burton's immediate Latin source remain uncollated.

[7179] Burton. Printed page 350, dagger: "Ministri locupletiores sunt iis quibus ministratur." Servants are richer than those whom they serve.

[7180] Editor. The wording about wealthy servants is attributed to Epictetus without a work or section. Its precise location has not been established. Means denotes income or resources, rather than merit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 351 'Twas so of old, and ever will be, and which Tiresias advised Ulysses in the [7181]Poet,	It was so in the past and always will be; and the advice Tiresias gave Ulysses in the poet[7182]
—— Accipe quâ ratione queas ditescere, &c.	Listen to how you can grow rich, and so on,
is still in use; lie, flatter and dissemble: If not, as he concludes, — Ergo pauper eris, then go like a begger as thou art. Erasmus, Melancthon, Lipsius, Budæus, Cardan, liv'd and died poor. Gesner was a silly old man, baculo innixus, amongst all those huffing Cardinals, swelling Bishops that flourished in his time, and rode on foot-clothes.	is still followed: lie, flatter and dissemble. Otherwise, as he concludes, "then you will be poor": go about like the beggar you are. Erasmus, Melanchthon, Lipsius, Budé and Cardan lived and died poor. Gesner was a poor old man, "leaning on a staff," among all those swaggering cardinals and pompous bishops who flourished in his time and rode on richly caparisoned horses.[7183]
It is not honesty, learning, worth, wisdom, that prefers men. The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, but as the wise man said, [7184]Chance, and sometimes a ridiculous chance. [7185]Casus plerumque ridiculus multos elevavit.	Honesty, learning, worth and wisdom do not secure advancement. "The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong," but, as the wise man said, chance—and sometimes a ridiculous chance. "An often ridiculous accident has raised many men."[7186]

[7181] Burton. Printed page 351, dagger: "Hor. lib. 2. Sat. 5." Horace, Satires, book 2, satire 5.

[7182] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.5.10 and 19–20. Tiresias instructs Ulysses in courting the wealthy in hopes of inheriting from them. The second fragment, ergo pauper eris, occurs shortly after the first, not at the satire's conclusion.

[7183] Editor. Silly here means poor or pitiable, not intellectually foolish. Foot-clothes are rich coverings for a horse. Burton's sweeping account of these scholars' poverty is part of his polemic; their individual financial histories and the identification of Gesner require separate checking.

[7184] Burton. Printed page 351, o: "Solomon Eccles. 9.11." Ecclesiastes 9:11, traditionally ascribed to Solomon.

[7185] Burton. Printed page 351, asterisk: "Sat. Menip." Menippean Satire; exact work and location remain to be identified.

[7186] Editor. Ecclesiastes 9:11 supplies the contrast between ability and success. Sat. Menip. is too abbreviated to assign the following Latin maxim to a particular author or edition confidently.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis fortunes doings, as they say, which made Brutus now dying exclaim, O misera virtus, ergo nihil quam verba eras, atqui ego te tanquam rem exercebam, sed tu serviebas fortunæ. Beleeve it hereafter O my friends! Vertue serves fortune.	It is Fortune's doing, as they say. This made the dying Brutus exclaim, "O wretched virtue! So you were nothing but words, yet I practised you as though you were something real; but you were Fortune's servant." Believe it from now on, my friends: virtue serves Fortune.[7187]
Yet be not discouraged (O my well deserving spirits) with this which I have said, it may be otherwise, though seldom I confesse, yet sometimes it is. But to your farther content, Ile tell you a [7188]tale. In Moronia pia, or Moronia felix, I know not whether, nor how long since, nor in what Cathedrall Church, a fat Prebend fell void. The carcasse scarce cold, many suitors were up in an instant. The first had rich friends, a good purse, and he was resolved to out-bid any man before he would lose it, every man supposed he should carry it.	Yet do not be discouraged, you deserving spirits, by what I have said. Things may happen otherwise: seldom, I admit, but sometimes they do. For your further consolation, I shall tell you a tale. In Pious Moronia, or Happy Moronia—I do not know which, how long ago, or in which cathedral—a lucrative prebend became vacant. The corpse was scarcely cold before many applicants sprang up. The first had rich friends and a full purse; he was determined to outbid anyone rather than lose the post, and everyone supposed he would win it.[7189]
The second was my Lord Bishops Chaplain (in whose gift it was) and he thought it his due to have it. The third was nobly born, and he meant to get it by his great parents, patrons, and allies. The fourth stood upon his worth, he had newly found out strange mysteries in Chymistry, and other rare inventions which he would detect to the publike good.	The second was chaplain to my lord bishop, who had the right to appoint to it, and considered the post his due. The third was nobly born and intended to obtain it through his powerful relatives, patrons and connections. The fourth rested his claim on merit: he had recently discovered remarkable secrets in alchemy and other rare inventions which he would reveal for the public good.[7190]

[7187] Editor. The dying Brutus's denunciation of virtue is retained as Burton reports it. His Latin intermediary and the exact ancient source require collation; this draft does not certify the speech as historical.

[7188] Burton. Printed page 351, dagger: "Tale quid est apud Valent. Andream Apolog. manip. 5. apol. 39." Something similar occurs in Valentin Andreae, Apologues, collection 5, apologue 39.

[7189] Editor. The imaginary names mean Pious Moronia and Happy Moronia; their resemblance to the Greek word for folly suits the satire. A prebend is an endowed cathedral position or its income. Burton gives a parallel in Johann Valentin Andreae rather than identifying a real vacancy.

[7190] Editor. Chymistry includes what would now be called alchemy as well as chemical experiment. Detect here means reveal. Parents can include more general relatives or kindred; allies are family or social connections.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The fifth was a painfull preacher, and he was commended by the whole parish where he dwelt, he had all their hands to his Certificate. The sixth was the prebendaries son lately deceased, his father died in debt (for it, as they say) left a wife and many poor children. The seventh stood upon fair promises, which to him and his noble friends had been formerly made for the next place in his Lordships gift.	The fifth was a hardworking preacher, recommended by his whole parish, whose signatures he had on his testimonial. The sixth was the son of the recently deceased prebendary; his father had died in debt—for the post, they said—leaving a wife and many poor children. The seventh relied on generous promises formerly made to him and his noble friends that he would receive the next vacancy in his lordship's gift.[7191]
The eight pretended great losses, and what he had suffered for the Church, what pains he had taken at home and abroad, and besides he brought noble mens letters. The ninth had married a kinswoman, and he sent his wife to sue for him. The tenth was a forrain Doctor, a late convert, and wanted means. The eleventh would exchange for another, he did not like the formers site, could not agree with his neighbours and fellows upon any termes, he would be gone.	The eighth pleaded great losses and sufferings for the Church, and the labour he had undertaken at home and abroad; besides, he brought letters from noblemen. The ninth had married a kinswoman and sent his wife to petition for him. The tenth was a foreign doctor, recently converted, who lacked an income. The eleventh wanted an exchange: he disliked the location of his present post, could not get along with his neighbours and colleagues on any terms, and wanted to leave.[7192]
Source page 351–352 The twelfth and last was (a suitor in conceit) a right honest, civil, sober man, an excellent scholar, and such a one as lived private in the Universitie, but he had neither means nor mony to compasse it; besides he hated all such courses, he could not speak for himself, neither had he any friends to solicite his cause, and therefore made no suit, could not expect, neither did he hope for, or look after it.	The twelfth and last was an applicant only in his imagination: a thoroughly honest, courteous, sober man, an excellent scholar who lived privately at the university. He had neither influence nor money to obtain the post; besides, he detested all such methods. He could not speak for himself and had no friends to advance his case. He therefore made no application, could expect nothing, and neither hoped for nor pursued it.[7193]

[7191] Editor. Painfull means diligent or hardworking. Hands are signatures. The sixth claimant's father, not the son, has died. The parenthetical debt "for it" hints at the cost of obtaining the post without establishing the circumstances.

[7192] Editor. Pretended means put forward as a claim, without necessarily implying a lie. Kinswoman leaves the relationship unstated; the patron's connection is implied rather than supplied in the text. Doctor is an academic title, not necessarily a physician.

[7193] Editor. In conceit means in imagination. Compasse means bring about or secure. The twelfth candidate does not formally apply, allowing the tale to imagine merit recognized without money or influence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 352 The good Bishop amongst a jury of competitors thus perplexed, and not yet resolved what to do, or on whom to bestow it, at the last, of his own accord, meer motion, and bountifull nature, gave it freely to the University student, altogether unknown to him but by fame; and to be brief, the Academical Scholar had the Prebend sent him for a present.	The good bishop, perplexed among this jury of competitors and still undecided what to do or whom to appoint, finally acted entirely on his own initiative and from his generous nature: he freely gave it to the university scholar, whom he knew only by reputation. To be brief, the academic had the prebend sent to him as a gift.
The newes was no sooner published abroad, but all good students rejoyced, and were much cheered up with it, though some would not beleeve it; others as men amazed, said it was a miracle; but one amongst the rest, thanked God for it, and said, Nunc juvat tandem studiosum esse, & Deo integro corde servire.	No sooner did the news spread than all good scholars rejoiced and took great encouragement from it. Some would not believe it; others, astonished, called it a miracle. One among them thanked God and said, "Now at last it is a joy to be a scholar and to serve God with an undivided heart."[7194]
You have heard my tale: but alas it is but a tale, a meer fiction, 'twas never so, never like to be, and so let it rest. Well, be it so then, they have wealth and honour, fortune and preferment, every man (there's no remedy) must scamble as he may, and shift as he can; yet Cardan comforted himself with this, [7195]the star Fomahant would make him immortall, and that [7196]after his decease his Books should be found in Ladies studies.	You have heard my tale. Alas, it is only a tale, pure fiction: it never happened, never is likely to happen, and there let it rest. Well, let it be so, then: they have wealth and honour, fortune and advancement; everyone must scramble as best he may and fend for himself as best he can—there is no help for it. Yet Cardan comforted himself with the thought that the star Fomahant would make him immortal, and that after his death his books would be found in ladies' studies.[7197]

[7194] Editor. The jury is a group of twelve claimants. The Latin expresses relief that scholarship and wholehearted service to God could at last be rewarded. Burton immediately withdraws this hopeful ending as fiction.

[7195] Burton. Printed page 352, o: "Stella Fomahant immortalitatem dabit." The star Fomahant will confer immortality.

[7196] Burton. Printed page 352, dagger: "Lib. de lib. propriis." Book On His Own Books; Cardan is named in the body.

[7197] Editor. Scamble means scramble or struggle for a share; shift means fend for oneself. Cardan's consolation invokes astrological fame and survival through books. Fomahant is retained as printed; the precise passages in his writings remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7198]Dignum laude virum Musa vetat mori.	The Muse forbids a man worthy of praise to die.[7199]
But why shouldst thou take thy neglect, thy Canvas so to heart? It may be thou art not fit; but as a [7200]child that puts on his fathers shoes, hat, headpiece, brestplate, breeches, or holds his spear, but is neither able to weild the one, or wear the other; so wouldst thou doe by such an office, place, or Magistracy: thou art unfit. And what is dignity to an unworthy man, but (as [7201]Salvianus holds) a gold ring in a swines snowt? Thou art a brute.	But why should you take being neglected and tossed aside so much to heart? Perhaps you are unfit. Like a child putting on his father's shoes, hat, helmet, breastplate and breeches, or holding his spear, although unable to wield the weapon or wear the clothes, you would be out of your depth in such an office, position or magistracy. You are unfit. As Salvian says, what is dignity in an unworthy man but a gold ring in a pig's snout? You are a brute.[7202]
Like a bad actor (so [7203]Plutarch compares such men) in a Tragœdy, diadema fert, at vox non auditur: Thou wouldst play a Kings part, but actest a Clowne, speakest like an Asse. [7204]Magna petis Phaeton & quæ non viribus istis &c. as James and John the sons of Zebedy did ask they knew not what; nescis temerarie nescis; thou dost, as another Suffenus, overween thy self: thou art wise in thine own conceit, but in other more mature judgement altogether unfit to manage such a businesse.	Like a bad actor in a tragedy—Plutarch's comparison for such men—"he wears a diadem, but his voice cannot be heard." You would play a king, but act a clown and speak like an ass. "You ask great things, Phaethon, beyond those powers of yours," and so on: like James and John, Zebedee's sons, you ask for what you do not understand. "You do not know, rash one, you do not know." Like another Suffenus, you overrate yourself: wise in your own estimation, but in another, more mature judgement wholly unfit to manage such affairs.[7205]

[7198] Burton. Printed page 352, asterisk: "Hor." Horace.

[7199] Editor. Horace, Odes 4.8.28. Poetry gives the praiseworthy person a form of immortality by preserving his reputation.

[7200] Burton. Printed page 352, dagger: "Qui induit thoracem aut galeam, &c." Who puts on a breastplate or helmet, and so on.

[7201] Burton. Printed page 352, asterisk: "Lib. 4. de guber. Dei. Quid est dignitas indigno nisi circulus aureus in naribus suis." On the Government of God, book 4. What is dignity in an unworthy man but a golden ring in a pig's nostrils?

[7202] Editor. Canvas here suggests rough handling or a rebuff. Headpiece is a helmet. The pig and gold-ring image recalls Proverbs 11:22; Burton applies it to unworthy office-holders through Salvian, whose precise Latin passage remains uncollated.

[7203] Burton. Printed page 352, p: "In Lysandro." In the Life of Lysander; the body attributes the comparison to Plutarch.

[7204] Burton. Printed page 352, q: "Ovid. Met." Ovid, Metamorphoses.

[7205] Editor. Phaethon's demand to drive the Sun's chariot is rebuked in Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.54–55; Burton gives non where the consulted text has nec. James and John seek precedence in Mark 10:35–40. Suffenus, from Catullus 22, exemplifies self-satisfaction. The Plutarch comparison and nescis temerarie nescis remain unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or be it thou art more deserving then any of thy rank, God in his providence hath reserved thee for some other fortunes, sic superis visum. Thou art humble as thou art, it may be; hadst thou been preferred, thou wouldst have forgotten God and thy self, insulted over others, contemned thy friends, [7206]been a block, a tyrant, or a demi-god, sequiturque superbia formam: [7207]Therefore, saith Chrysostome, good men do not alwayes finde grace and favour, lest they should be puffed up with turgent titles, grow insolent and proud.	Or suppose you are more deserving than anyone of your rank: God in his providence has reserved you for a different fortune; "so the powers above have decreed." Perhaps you are humble as you are. Had you been promoted, you might have forgotten God and yourself, lorded it over others, despised your friends, and become a blockhead, a tyrant or a demigod: "pride follows beauty." Therefore, says Chrysostom, good men do not always find favour, lest inflated titles puff them up and make them insolent and proud.[7208]
Injuries, abuses, are very offensive, and so much the more in that they think veterem ferendo invitant novam, by taking one they provoke another: but it is an erroneous opinion: for if that were true, there would be no end of abusing each other; lis litem generat; 'tis much better with patience to bear, or quietly to put it up. If an Asse kick me, saith Socrates, shall I strike him again? and when [7209]his wife Xantippe stroke and misused him, to some friends that would have had him strike her again, he replied that he would not make them sport, or that they should stand by and say Eia Socrates, eia Xantippe, as we do when dogs fight, animate them the more by clapping of hands.	Injuries and abuse are deeply offensive, all the more because people think that "by bearing an old injury they invite a new one": that accepting one provokes another. But this is a mistaken opinion, for if it were true there would be no end to our abusing one another. "One quarrel breeds another." It is far better to bear it patiently or quietly put up with it. "If an ass kicks me," says Socrates, "shall I strike it back?" And when his wife Xanthippe struck and ill-treated him, he told friends who wanted him to hit her back that he would not provide them with entertainment, letting them stand by crying, "Go on, Socrates! Go on, Xanthippe!" as we clap our hands to encourage fighting dogs.[7210]

[7206] Burton. Printed page 352, r: "Magistratus virum indicat." Office reveals the man.

[7207] Burton. Printed page 352, s: "Ideo boni viri aliquando gratiam non accipiunt, ne in superbiam eleventur ventositate jactantiæ, ne altitudo muneris negligentiores efficiat." Good men therefore sometimes receive no favour, lest the empty wind of boasting raise them into pride, or high office make them more careless.

[7208] Editor. The Ovid fragment is Fasti 1.419, where pride accompanies physical beauty; Burton reapplies it to the danger of preferment. Turgent means swollen or inflated. The exact Chrysostom passage remains uncollated.

[7209] Burton. Printed page 352, u: "Ælian." Aelian; precise passage requires collation.

[7210] Editor. Lis litem generat means one dispute breeds another. Compare Diogenes Laertius 2.21, where Socrates likens legal retaliation to suing a kicking donkey, and 2.37, where Xanthippe tears off his cloak and he rejects a fight that spectators would cheer. Burton alters the details. His Aelian margin and immediate intermediary remain unreconciled.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 352–353 Many men spend themselves, their goods, friends, fortunes, upon small quarrels, and sometimes at other mens procurements, with much vexation of spirit and anguish of minde; all which with good advice, or mediation of friends might have been happily composed, or if patience had taken place.	Many men exhaust themselves, their possessions, friendships and fortunes over petty quarrels, sometimes at others' instigation, with great vexation of spirit and anguish of mind. All these disputes might have been happily settled through good advice or friends' mediation, or if patience had prevailed.
Source page 353 Patience in such cases is a most soveraign remedy, to put up, conceal, or dissemble it, to [7211]forget and forgive, [7212]not seven, but seventy seven times, as often as he repents forgive him; Luk. 17.3. as our Saviour enjoyns us stroken, to turn the other side: as our [7213]Apostle perswades us, to recompence no man evill for evill, but as much as is possible to have peace with all men: not to avenge our selves, and we shall heap burning coales upon our adversaries head.	Patience is a supreme remedy in such cases: endure the injury, conceal it or act as though it has not occurred; forget and forgive, "not seven but seventy-seven times; as often as he repents, forgive him": Luke 17:3. When we are struck, our Saviour commands us to turn the other cheek. Our Apostle urges us to repay no one evil for evil, to live at peace with everyone as far as possible, and not to avenge ourselves; thus we shall heap burning coals on our adversary's head.[7214]
For if you put up wrong (as Chrysostome comments) [7215]you get the victorie; he that loseth his mony, loseth not the conquest in this our Philosophy. If he contend with thee, submit thy self unto him first, yeeld to him.	As Chrysostom comments, if you bear an injury, you win the victory: in this philosophy of ours, losing your money does not mean losing the contest. If he quarrels with you, be the first to submit; yield to him.[7216]

[7211] Burton. Printed page 353, x: "Injuriarum remedium est oblivio." The remedy for injuries is forgetting.

[7212] Burton. Printed page 353, y: "Mat. 18.22. Mat. 5.39." Matthew 18:22 and 5:39. Both references share one marginal container.

[7213] Burton. Printed page 353, z: "Rom. 12.17." Romans 12:17; the body also draws on the following verses.

[7214] Editor. Burton prints seventy seven, retained here; the King James Version of Matthew 18:22 reads seventy times seven. His paragraph combines Matthew 18:22 and 5:39, Luke 17:3–4, and Romans 12:17–20. The coal image belongs to kindness towards an enemy, including feeding him, in the surrounding Pauline passage.

[7215] Burton. Printed page 353, dagger: "Si toleras injuriam, victor evadis; qui enim pecuniis privatus est, non est privatus victoria in hac Philosophia." If you endure an injury, you emerge victorious; for someone deprived of money is not deprived of victory in this philosophy.

[7216] Editor. Chrysostom, Homily 16 on First Corinthians, commenting on 1 Corinthians 6:7, makes this comparison: enduring injustice can win the moral contest despite losing money. The English translation locates the passage; Burton's Latin version and edition remain uncollated. "Philosophy" here concerns disciplined conduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Durum & durum non faciunt murum, as the diverb is, two refractory spirits will never agree; the onely means to overcome, is to relent, obsequio vinces. Euclide in Plutarch, when his brother had angred him, swore he would be revenged; but he gently replied; [7217]Let me not live if I do not make thee to love me again, upon which meek answer he was pacified.	"Hard and hard do not make a wall," as the proverb says: two stubborn spirits will never agree. The only way to prevail is to soften; "you will conquer by yielding." Euclid, in Plutarch, swore revenge when his brother angered him; but the brother gently replied, "May I not live if I do not make you love me again." This gentle answer pacified him.[7218]

[7217] Burton. Printed page 353, dagger: "Dispeream nisi te ultus fuero: dispeream nisi ut me deinceps ames effecero." May I perish unless I take revenge on you; may I perish unless I make you love me hereafter.

[7218] Editor. The printed syntax makes Euclid the threatening brother; the rendering preserves that sequence. In Plutarch, On Brotherly Love, the brother threatens Euclid, and Euclid gives the conciliatory reply. This is Euclid of Megara, associated with Socrates, rather than the geometer. The source discrepancy has not been silently repaired.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7219]Flectitur obsequio curvatus ab arbore ramus, Frangis si vires experiare tuas.	A branch is bent from its tree by gentle handling; You break it if you try your strength.[7220]
A branch if easily bended yeelds to thee, Pul' hard it breaks: the difference you see.	A branch bends to you when gently bent; Pull hard and it breaks: you see the difference.
The noble family of the Columni in Rome, when they were expelled the city by that furious Alexander the sixt, gave the bending branch therefore as an Impresse with this motto, Flecti potest, frangi non potest, to signifie that he might break them by force, but so never make them stoop; for they fled in the midst of their hard usage to the kingdome of Naples, and were honourably entertained by Frederick the King, according to their callings.	When the noble Colonna family were expelled from Rome by the furious Alexander VI, they therefore adopted the bending branch as their emblem, with the motto, "It can be bent; it cannot be broken," to signify that he might break them by force but could never make them bow. Amid their harsh treatment they fled to the kingdom of Naples, where King Frederick received them honourably according to their rank.[7221]
Gentleness in this case might have done much more, and let thine adversary be never so perverse, it may be by that means thou mayst win him; [7222]favore & benevolentia etiam immanis animus mansuescit, soft words pacifie wrath, and the fiercest spirits are so soonest overcome;	Gentleness might have achieved much more in this case. However perverse your adversary, you may win him by that means: "kindness and goodwill tame even a savage spirit." Gentle words calm anger, and this is the quickest way to overcome the fiercest spirits.[7223]

[7219] Burton. Printed page 353, asterisk: "Joach. Camerarius Embl. 21. cent. 1." Joachim Camerarius, Emblems, first century, emblem 21.

[7220] Editor. The lines are Ovid, Ars amatoria 2.179–180, cited here through Camerarius. Burton's experiare differs from the consulted experiere. Ovid applies yielding conduct to love; Burton uses the image to counsel restraint in conflict.

[7221] Editor. The printed Latin says the branch can bend but cannot break, while Burton's following explanation says the family can be broken but will not bow. Both are retained so the contradiction remains visible. Columni means the Colonna family; the historical details and emblem's transmission remain uncollated.

[7222] Burton. Printed page 353, a: "Heliodorus." Heliodorus; exact passage and Latin intermediary remain uncollated.

[7223] Editor. Heliodorus is the author cited for the Latin maxim about goodwill. Its precise location and the translation Burton used remain uncertain. The gentle-word image also recalls Proverbs 15:1.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7224]A generous Lion will not hurt a beast that lies prostrate, nor an Elephant an innocuous creature, but is infestus infestis, a terrour and scourge alone to such as are stubborn, and make resistance. It was the symbole of Emanuel Philibert Duke of Savoy, and he was not mistaken in it, for	A noble lion will not hurt a prostrate beast, nor an elephant a harmless creature: it is "hostile to the hostile," a terror and scourge only to those that stubbornly resist. This was the emblem of Emmanuel Philibert, Duke of Savoy, and he was not mistaken in choosing it, for[7225]
[7226]Quo quisque est major, magis est placabilis iræ, Et faciles motus mens generosa capit.	The greater a man, the more readily his anger is appeased; A noble mind admits gentle impulses.[7227]
A greater man is soonest pacified, A noble spirit quickly satisfied.	A greater man is soonest pacified; A noble spirit quickly satisfied.

[7224] Burton. Printed page 353, dagger: "Reipsa reperi nihil esse homini melius facilitate & clementia. Ter. Adelph." I have found by experience that nothing is better for a man than affability and clemency. Terence, The Brothers.

[7225] Editor. The dagger note at the lion passage quotes Terence, Adelphoe, Demea's late speech on affability and clemency; it supports the surrounding argument rather than identifying a zoological source. The lion image also occurs immediately after the Ovid couplet cited below. Infestus infestis is an emblematic motto, "hostile to the hostile".

[7226] Burton. Printed page 353, asterisk: "Ovid." Ovid.

[7227] Editor. Ovid, Tristia 3.5.31–32. Ovid hopes that imperial anger can be softened. Burton retains the Latin couplet and adds his own English verse, reproduced separately here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is reported by [7228]Gualter Mapes an old Historiographer of ours, (who lived 400 yeers since) that king Edward Seneor, and Leolin Prince of Wales, being at an interview neer Aust upon Severn in Glocestershire, & the Prince sent for, refused to come to the King, he would needs goe over to him: which Leolin perceiving, [7229]went up to the armes in water, and imbracing his boat, would have carried him out upon his shoulders, adding that his humility and wisdom had triumphed over his pride and folly; And thereupon was reconciled unto him, and did his homage.	Walter Map, an old historian of ours who lived four hundred years ago, reports that King Edward the Elder and Llywelyn, Prince of Wales, were to meet near Aust on the Severn in Gloucestershire. The prince, when summoned, refused to come to the king, who insisted on crossing to him instead. Seeing this, Llywelyn waded into the water up to his arms and clasped the king's boat, offering to carry him ashore on his shoulders. He added that the king's humility and wisdom had triumphed over his pride and folly. He was then reconciled to him and did him homage.[7230]
If thou canst not so win him, put it up, if thou beest a true Christian, a good divine, an imitator of Christ, [7231](For he was reviled and put it up, whipped and sought no revenge) thou wilt pray for thine enemies, [7232]and blesse them that persecute thee; be patient, meek, humble, &c.	If you cannot win him in this way, bear the injury. If you are a true Christian, a good theologian and an imitator of Christ—who endured insults, was whipped and sought no revenge—you will pray for your enemies and bless those who persecute you. Be patient, meek, humble, and so on.[7233]

[7228] Burton. Printed page 353, b: "Camden in Glouc." Camden, the Gloucestershire section of Britannia.

[7229] Burton. Printed page 353, c: "Usque ad pectus ingressus est aquam &c. cymbam amplectens, sapientissime rex ait, tua humilitas meam vicit superbiam, & sapientia triumphavit ineptiam; collum ascende quod contra te fatuus erexi, intrabis terram quam hodie fecit tuam benignitas, &c." He entered the water up to his chest, and so on. Clasping the boat, he said: Most wise king, your humility has overcome my pride, and your wisdom has triumphed over my folly. Mount the neck that I foolishly raised against you; you shall enter the land which your kindness has today made yours, and so on.

[7230] Editor. Gualter Mapes is Walter Map; Camden is Burton's stated intermediary. Edward Seneor is rendered Edward the Elder and Leolin as Llywelyn, preserving the reported names without certifying the chronology. The Latin margin adds an invitation to mount the speaker's neck; exact historical identification and collation remain pending.

[7231] Burton. Printed page 353, dagger: "Chrysostome, Contumeliis affectus est et eas pertulit; opprobriis, nec ultus est; verberibus cæsus, nec vicem reddidit." Chrysostom: He was subjected to insults and bore them; to reproaches, and took no revenge; struck with blows, and did not strike back.

[7232] Burton. Printed page 353, d: "Rom. 12.14." Romans 12:14.

[7233] Editor. Divine means a theologian or religious teacher. Romans 12:14 supplies the blessing of persecutors. Burton links Christian patience with the preceding pagan examples; the Chrysostom citation remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 353–354 An honest man will not offer thee injury, probus non vult; if he were a brangling knave, 'tis his fashion so to do; where is least heart, is most tongue; quo quisque stultior, eò magis insolescit, the more foolish he is, still the more insolent: [7234]Doe not answer a fool according to his folly.	An honest man will not injure you: "a good man has no wish to." If he is a quarrelsome scoundrel, that is simply his way. Where there is least courage, there is most talk; "the more foolish a man, the more insolent he grows": the greater his folly, the greater his insolence. "Do not answer a fool according to his folly."[7235]
Source page 354 If he be thy superiour, [7236]bear it by all means, grieve not at it, let him take his course; Anitus and Melitus [7237]may kill me, they cannot hurt me: as that generous Socrates made answer in like case. Mens immota manet, though the body be torn in peeces with wild horses, broken on the wheel, pinched with fiery tongs, the Soul cannot be distracted.	If he is your superior, bear it at all costs; do not grieve over it, but let him take his course. "Anytus and Meletus may kill me; they cannot harm me," as noble Socrates answered in a similar case. "The mind remains unmoved." Though the body is torn apart by wild horses, broken on the wheel or pinched with red-hot tongs, the soul cannot be shaken.[7238]

[7234] Burton. Printed page 354, e: "Pro." Proverbs.

[7235] Editor. Brangling means quarrelsome. Heart here means courage. The biblical admonition is Proverbs 26:4; the following verse gives the complementary instruction to answer a fool lest he think himself wise.

[7236] Burton. Printed page 354, f: "Contend not with a greater man, Pro." A proverbial or biblical admonition; the precise intended reference remains uncertain.

[7237] Burton. Printed page 354, asterisk: "Occidere possunt." They can kill.

[7238] Editor. The warning against contending with a superior resembles Sirach 8:1; Burton's margin says Pro., so this is a comparison, not a silent correction. Socrates' distinction between death and moral harm appears in Plato, Apology 30c–d. Mens immota manet recalls Virgil, Aeneid 4.449, on Aeneas's resolve. Burton asserts an ethical ideal despite bodily suffering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis an ordinary thing for great men to vilifie and insult, oppress, injure, tyrannise, to take what liberty they list, and who dare speak against? Miserum est ab eo lædi, à quo non possis queri, a miserable thing 'tis to be injured of him, from whom is no appeal: [7239]and not safe to write against him that can proscribe and punish a man at his pleasure, which Asinius Pollio was ware of, when Octavianus provoked him.	It is common for powerful men to vilify, insult, oppress, injure and tyrannize, taking whatever liberties they please; and who dares speak against them? "It is miserable to be injured by someone against whom you cannot complain": miserable to suffer injury from one against whom there is no appeal. Nor is it safe to write against someone who can proscribe and punish a man at will, as Asinius Pollio understood when Octavian provoked him.[7240]
'Tis hard I confesse to be so injur'd: One of Chilo's three difficult things: [7241]To keep counsell, spend his time well, put up injuries;	I admit that such injury is hard to bear. It is one of Chilo's three difficult things: keeping secrets, spending one's time well and enduring injuries.[7242]
but be thou patient, and leave [7243]revenge unto the Lord. [7244]Vengeance is mine and I will repay, saith the Lord. I know the Lord, saith [7245]David, will avenge the afflicted and judge the poor.	But be patient and leave vengeance to the Lord. "Vengeance is mine, and I will repay, says the Lord." "I know the Lord," says David, "will avenge the afflicted and judge the poor."[7246]

[7239] Burton. Printed page 354, dagger: "Non facile aut tutum in eum scribere qui potest proscribere." It is neither easy nor safe to write against someone who can proscribe you.

[7240] Editor. The maxim about an enemy against whom one cannot complain appears in Publilius Syrus. Macrobius, Saturnalia 2.4.21, gives Pollio's reply to Augustus. Scribere and proscribere make a pointed verbal pair: writing against someone versus putting someone on a proscription list.

[7241] Burton. Printed page 354, dagger: "Arcana tacere, otium recte collocare, injuriam posse ferre, difficillimum." To keep secrets, employ leisure well and be able to endure injury are most difficult.

[7242] Editor. Chilo was one of the Seven Sages. Diogenes Laertius, Life of Chilo, reports these three difficulties. Keeping counsell means keeping confidential information, and otium means leisure.

[7243] Burton. Printed page 354, f: "Psal. 45." Psalm 45, as printed. The reference is not clearly matched to the surrounding words and remains uncollated.

[7244] Burton. Printed page 354, g: "Rom. 12." Romans 12.

[7245] Burton. Printed page 354, asterisk: "Psa 13.12." Psalm 13:12, as printed; the quoted sense corresponds to Psalm 140:12.

[7246] Editor. Romans 12:19 is the vengeance quotation. David's statement corresponds to Psalm 140:12, not the printed Psa 13.12; Psalm 13 has no verse 12. The additional marginal Psal.45 is preserved separately because its intended attachment or correction is unclear.

Original text 1651	Modern English
No man (as [7247]Plato farther addes) can so severely punish his adversary, as God will such as oppresse miserable men.	No man, Plato further adds, can punish his adversary as severely as God will punish those who oppress the wretched.[7248]
[7249]Iterum ille rem judicatam judicat, Majoreque mulctâ mulctat.	He judges again the case already judged, And imposes a heavier penalty.[7250]
If there be any religion, any God, and that God be just, it shall be so; if thou beleevest the one, beleeve the other: Erit, erit, it shall be so. Nemesis comes after, serò sed serio, stay but a little and thou shalt see Gods just judgement overtake him.	If there is any religion, any God, and that God is just, it shall be so. If you believe the one, believe the other: "It will, it will"—it shall be so. Nemesis follows, "late, but in earnest." Wait a little, and you will see God's just judgement overtake him.[7251]
[7252]Raro antecedentem scelestum Deseruit pede pœna claudo.	Rarely has Punishment, though lame of foot, Abandoned the criminal who goes ahead.[7253]

[7247] Burton. Printed page 354, dagger: "Nullus tam severè inimicum suum ulcisci potest, quam deus solet miserorum oppressores." No one can take such severe vengeance on his enemy as God customarily takes on the oppressors of the wretched.

[7248] Editor. Burton attributes this maxim to Plato without identifying a dialogue. The exact source and Latin intermediary have not been established; the attribution is retained as his.

[7249] Burton. Printed page 354, dagger: "Arcturus in Plaut." Arcturus in Plautus.

[7250] Editor. Plautus, Rudens 19–20, spoken in the prologue by the star Arcturus about Jupiter's judgement. Burton shortens the lines and omits eam before rem; the rendering follows his shortened text.

[7251] Editor. Nemesis personifies retribution. The Latin contrast sero sed serio means delayed but earnest or decisive punishment. Burton combines classical personification with Christian divine judgement.

[7252] Burton. Printed page 354, asterisk: "Hor. 3. od. 2." Horace, Odes, book 3, ode 2.

[7253] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.2.31–32. Punishment, although lame, rarely loses the criminal ahead. Burton prints deseruit, a past tense, where the consulted text has deservit, present; the rendering follows the printed form.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thou shalt perceive that verified of Samuel to Agag, 1. Sam.15.33. thy sword hath made many women childlesse, so shall thy mother be childlesse amongst other women. It shall be done to them as they have done to others. Conradinus that brave Suevian Prince, came with a well prepared army into the Kingdom of Naples, was taken prisoner by King Charles, and put to death in the flower of his youth; a little after (ultionem Conradini mortis, Pandulphus Collinutius Hist. Neap. lib.5. calls it,) King Charles his own sonne, with 200. Nobles was so taken prisoner, and beheaded in like sort.	You will see Samuel's words to Agag fulfilled: "Your sword has made many women childless; so shall your mother be childless among other women": 1 Samuel 15:33. They will be treated as they have treated others. Conradin, that gallant Swabian prince, entered the kingdom of Naples with a well-prepared army, was captured by King Charles and put to death in the flower of his youth. A little later—"vengeance for Conradin's death," as Pandolfo Collenuccio calls it in book 5 of his History of Naples—King Charles's own son, with two hundred nobles, was likewise captured and beheaded.[7254]
Not in this only, but in all other offences, quo quisque peccat in eo punietur, [7255]they shall be punished in the same kinde, in the same part, like nature, eye with or in the eye, head with or in the head, persecution with persecution, lust with effects of lust; let them march on with ensignes displayed, let drums beat on, trumpets sound Taratantarra, let them sack cities, take the spoil of countries, murder infants, deflour Virgins, destroy, burn, persecute, and tyrannize, they shall be fully rewarded at last in the same measure, they and theirs, and that to their desert.	Not only in this, but in every other offence, "each will be punished through that in which he sins." They shall suffer punishment of the same kind, in the same part, of a like nature: eye for eye or in the eye, head for head or in the head, persecution for persecution, lust through the consequences of lust. Let them march with standards flying, drums beating and trumpets sounding "taratantara"; let them sack cities, plunder countries, murder infants, violate virgins, destroy, burn, persecute and tyrannize. They and theirs shall finally be repaid in full, in the same measure, according to their deserts.[7256]

[7254] Editor. Conradinus is Conradin of Swabia. Burton's claim that Charles I's son was beheaded is erroneous: Charles II was captured but later released and ruled Naples. His appeal to Collenuccio requires collation. The erroneous story remains in the body as part of Burton's argument, with the correction here.

[7255] Burton. Printed page 354, dagger: "Wisd. 11.6." Wisdom 11:6, as printed; the maxim is generally numbered 11:16.

[7256] Editor. The principle that punishment answers the offence is Wisdom 11:16 in common modern numbering; Burton prints 11.6. Ensignes are military standards. Taratantarra imitates a trumpet call. The threat extends to the offenders and their households or descendants, conveyed by they and theirs.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7257]Ad generum Cereris sine cæde & sanguine pauci Descendunt reges & siccâ morte tyranni,	Few kings descend to Ceres' son-in-law without slaughter and blood; Few tyrants die a bloodless death.[7258]
Few Tyrants in their beds do die, But stab'd or maim'd to hell they hie.	Few tyrants die in their beds; Stabbed or maimed, they hasten to hell.
Source page 354–355 Oftentimes too a base contemptible fellow is the instrument of Gods justice to punish, to torture and vex them, as an Ichneumon doth a Crocodile. They shall be recompenced according to the works of their hands, as Haman was hanged on the gallowes he provided for Mordochy; They shall have sorrow of heart, and be destroyed from under the heaven, Thre. 3.64.65,66. Only be thou patient: vincit qui patitur: and in the end thou shalt be crowned.	Often, too, a low, contemptible fellow becomes the instrument of God's justice to punish, torment and trouble them, as an ichneumon does a crocodile. They will be repaid according to the work of their hands, as Haman was hanged on the gallows he had prepared for Mordecai. They will suffer sorrow of heart and be destroyed from under heaven: Lamentations 3:64–66. Only be patient: "He conquers who endures"; in the end you will be crowned.[7259]

[7257] Burton. Printed page 354, asterisk: "Juvenal." Juvenal.

[7258] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 10.112–113. Ceres' son-in-law is Pluto, husband of Proserpina, so descent to him means death. Burton prints & sanguine in place of the consulted ac vulnere and supplies a freer English couplet. Both his text and his English gloss are retained.

[7259] Editor. The pronoun "them" continues the powerful wrongdoers of Block 096. The ichneumon is the Egyptian mongoose of ancient animal lore; Pliny, Natural History 8.90, tells how it enters and kills a crocodile. Burton's Haman example recalls Esther 7:10. Thre. abbreviates Threni, Lamentations; the wording is retained as Burton gives it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 355 Yea but 'tis a hard matter to do this, flesh and blood may not [7260]abide it; 'Tis grave, grave! no (Chrysostome replies) non est grave ô homo, 'tis not so grievous, [7261]neither had God commanded it, if it had been so difficult. But how shall it be done? Easily, as he followes it, if thou shalt look to heaven, behold the beauty of it, and what God hath promised to such as put up injuries.	"Yes, but this is hard to do: flesh and blood cannot bear it. It is hard, hard!" "No," Chrysostom replies, "it is not hard, my friend"; it is not so grievous, nor would God have commanded it had it been so difficult. But how can it be done? Easily, he continues, if you look towards heaven, contemplate its beauty, and consider what God has promised those who endure injuries.[7262]
But if thou resist and go about vim vi repellere, as the custome of the world is, to right thy self, or hast given just cause of offence, 'tis no injury then but a condign punishment: thou hast deserved as much: A te principium, in te recidit crimen quod à te fuit; peccasti, quiesce, as Ambrose expostulates with Cain. lib.3. de Abel & Cain.	But if you resist and try to "repel force with force," as the world generally does, to obtain redress for yourself, or if you have given just cause for offence, then it is no injury but a deserved punishment: you have earned as much. "You began it; the crime that originated with you falls back upon you. You have sinned; be still," as Ambrose remonstrates with Cain in book 3 of On Abel and Cain.[7263]

[7260] Burton. Printed page 355, i: "Apud Christianos non qui patitur, sed qui facit injuriam miser est. Leo ser." Among Christians, the unhappy man is not he who suffers injury but he who inflicts it. Leo, sermon; the particular sermon remains unidentified.

[7261] Burton. Printed page 355, dagger: "Neque præcepisset deus si grave fuisset: sed qua ratione potero? facile si cœlum suspexeris; & ejus pulchritudine, & quod pollicetur Deus, &c." Nor would God have commanded it had it been difficult. But how shall I be able? Easily, if you look towards heaven, its beauty and what God promises, and so on. The compressed Latin has pulchritudine as printed.

[7262] Editor. "Put up injuries" means endure wrongs. Chrysostom's argument is that a divine command must be possible to obey. The exact source of this passage and the preceding Leo quotation remains to be established.

[7263] Editor. "Condign" means deserved or proportionate. Burton moves from suffering an unjust injury to suffering the consequences of one's own wrongdoing. His Ambrose citation is retained as printed; its book numbering and wording await verification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7264]Dionysius of Syracuse, in his exile was made stand without dore; patienter ferendum, fortasse nos tale quid fecimus, quum in honore essemus, he wisely put it it up, and laid the fault where it was, on his own pride and scorn which in his prosperity he had formerly shewed others.	Dionysius of Syracuse, during his exile, was kept waiting outside a door. “This must be borne patiently; perhaps we did something similar when we held an honoured position.” He wisely endured it and placed the blame where it belonged: on the pride and contempt he had formerly shown others in his prosperity.[7265]
’Tis [7266]Tullies axiome, ferre ea molestissimè homines non debent, quæ ipsorum culpa contracta sunt, self do, self have, as the saying is, they may thank themselves.	Cicero’s maxim is that “people should not take most grievously those troubles they have brought upon themselves through their own fault.” As the saying goes, what you do comes back to you: they have themselves to thank.[7267]
For he that doth wrong must look to be wronged again; habet & musca splenem, & formicæ sua bilis inest, The least fly hath a Spleen, and a little Bee a sting.	For whoever does wrong must expect to be wronged in return. “Even a fly has a spleen, and an ant has its own bile”: the smallest fly has a spleen, and a little bee a sting.[7268]
[7269]An Asse overwhelmed a Thisselwarps nest, the little Bird pecked his gaul’d back in revenge; and the Humble-bee in the fable flung down the Eagles eggs out of Jupiters lap.	An ass destroyed a goldfinch’s nest; the little bird pecked its chafed back in revenge. And the bumblebee in the fable threw the eagle’s eggs down from Jupiter’s lap.[7270]

[7264] Burton. Printed page 355, k: “Valer. lib.4. cap.1.” Valerius Maximus, book 4, chapter 1; see the editorial correction to the person named.

[7265] Editor. Valerius Maximus 4.1.ext.3 names Dion of Syracuse, exiled by Dionysius, as the man kept outside Theodorus’s door at Megara. Burton gives the name of the ruler who banished him instead. Both body columns preserve Burton’s named subject; this note records the discrepancy. The original also repeats “it” in “put it it up.”

[7266] Burton. Printed page 355, dagger: “Ep. Q. frat.” Letters to his brother Quintus: Cicero. The exact letter remains to be located.

[7267] Editor. Tully is Cicero. “Self do, self have” assigns responsibility for the consequences to the person who caused them; the sentence does not promise that everyone receives a just outcome.

[7268] Editor. The Latin mentions a fly’s spleen and an ant’s bile; Burton’s English substitutes a bee and its sting. Both are retained. Spleen and bile conventionally suggest anger or resentment.

[7269] Burton. Printed page 355, dagger: “Camerarius emb.75. cen.2.” Joachim Camerarius, emblems, second century, no.75. A century is a set of one hundred emblems.

[7270] Editor. “Thisselwarp” is an old name for a goldfinch; “gaul’d” means rubbed sore. “Humble-bee” means bumblebee. The familiar Aesopic eagle-and-beetle story has a beetle, not a bee; Burton’s animal is preserved. Camerarius is cited for the preceding bird-and-ass example.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Bracidas in Plutarch put his hand into a Mouse nest, and hurt her young ones, she bit him by the finger: [7271]I see now (saith he) there is no creature so contemptible, that will not be revenged.	In Plutarch, Brasidas put his hand into a mouse's nest and hurt her young; she bit his finger. "I see now," he said, "that no creature is so contemptible that it will not take revenge."[7272]
'Tis lex Talionis, and the nature of all things so to do: If thou wilt live quietly thy self, [7273]do no wrong to others; if any be done thee, put it up, with patience endure it.	This is the law of retaliation, and it is in the nature of all things to act so. If you want to live peacefully yourself, do no wrong to others; if someone wrongs you, bear it and endure it patiently.[7274]
For [7275]this is thankworthy, saith our Apostle, if a man for conscience towards God endure grief, and suffer wrong undeserved: for what praise is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye take it patiently? but if when you do well, ye suffer wrong, and take it patiently, there is thanks with God: for hereunto verily we are called.	For, as our apostle says, "This deserves approval: when someone, mindful of God, endures sorrow and suffers undeserved wrong. What credit is it if you patiently endure a beating for your faults? But if you do good, suffer wrong and bear it patiently, this finds favour with God; for this, indeed, is what we are called to."[7276]

[7271] Burton. Printed page 355, asterisk: "Pape, inquit, nullum animal tam pusillum, quod non cupiat ulcisci." Good heavens, he said, no animal is so small that it does not desire revenge.

[7272] Editor. Bracidas is the form printed here for Brasidas. Burton presents the mouse story as Plutarch's; the precise passage and his version involving the young remain for collation.

[7273] Burton. Printed page 355, dagger: "Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris." Do not do to another what you would not wish done to yourself.

[7274] Editor. Lex talionis is the principle of retaliation or equivalent requital. Burton first describes the impulse to retaliate, then urges the reader to interrupt it by practising restraint.

[7275] Burton. Printed page 355, l: "1 Pet.2." 1 Peter 2; the body follows verses 19–21.

[7276] Editor. 1 Peter 2:19–21. "Buffeted" means struck or beaten; "thankworthy" and "thanks with God" concern divine approval. The modern column follows Burton's quotation rather than substituting a complete modern Bible version.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Qui mala non fert, ipse sibi testis est per impatientiam quod bonus non est, He that cannot bear injuries witnesseth against himself that he is no good man, as [7277]Gregory holds. 'Tis the nature of wicked men to do injuries, as it is the property of all honest men patiently to bear them.	"Whoever does not bear wrongs bears witness against himself, by his impatience, that he is not good." As Gregory maintains, a man who cannot endure injuries testifies against his own goodness. It is the nature of wicked men to inflict injuries, just as it is the character of all good men to bear them patiently.[7278]
Improbitas nullo flectitur obsequio. The Wolf in the [7279]Emblem sucked the Goat, (so the shepheard would have it) but he kept nevertheless a Wolfs nature; [7280]a knave will be a knave.	"Wickedness yields to no kindness." The wolf in the emblem suckled at the goat, as the shepherd wished, but kept a wolf's nature all the same: a knave will remain a knave.[7281]

[7277] Burton. Printed page 355, k: "Siquidem malorum proprium est inferre damna, & bonorum pedissequa est injuria." For it is the nature of the wicked to inflict harm, and injury is the attendant of the good.

[7278] Editor. Gregory is cited without a work or passage. The Latin in the margin and the body make related but distinct claims about patience; both are retained, with attribution left for collation.

[7279] Burton. Printed page 355, dagger: "Alciat. emb." Andrea Alciato, Emblems; the wolf nursed by a goat.

[7280] Burton. Printed page 355, dagger: "Naturam expellas furca licet usque, recurret." Though you keep driving nature out with a pitchfork, it will return. Adapted from Horace, Epistles 1.10.24; the comparison text has Naturam expelles furca, tamen usque recurret.

[7281] Editor. An emblem combines a symbolic image with a motto or explanatory text. Burton's wolf remains predatory despite being nurtured by a goat. The following Horatian maxim similarly treats nature as resistant to alteration; Alciato's precise emblem remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7282]Injury is on the other side a good mans foot-boy, his fidus Achates, and as a lackey followes him wheresoever he goes. Besides misera est fortuna quæ caret inimico, he is in a miserable estate that wants enemies: [7283]it is a thing not to be avoided, and therefore with more patience to be endured.	Injury, on the other hand, is a good man's page, his "faithful Achates," following him everywhere like a servant. Besides, "wretched is the fortune that has no enemy": the man without enemies is in a miserable position. Enmity cannot be avoided, and therefore should be endured with all the more patience.[7284]
Cato Censorius, that upright Cato of whom Paterculus gives that honourable elogium, bene fecit quod aliter facere non potuit, was [7285]50 times endited and accused by his fellow citizens,	Cato the Censor—that upright Cato to whom Paterculus pays the honourable tribute, "he did right because he could not do otherwise"—was indicted and accused fifty times by his fellow citizens.[7286]
and as [7287]Ammianus well hath it, Quis erit innocens si clam vel palam accusasse sufficiat: if it be sufficient to accuse a man openly or in privat, who shall be free?	And, as Ammianus rightly puts it, "Who will be innocent if a private or public accusation is enough?" If merely accusing a man openly or privately is sufficient, who will escape?[7288]

[7282] Burton. Printed page 355, l: "By many indignities we come to dignities." A play on affronts and honours. The printed margin has l; the nearby body uses asterisks without an exact corresponding l. Attached here to the good man's attendant injuries.

[7283] Burton. Printed page 355, unmarked margin: "Tibi subjicito quæ fiunt aliis, furtum, convitia, &c. Et in iis in te admissis non excandesces. Epictetus." Picture to yourself what happens to others—theft, abuse and so on—and you will not flare up when these things are done to you. Epictetus; the precise passage and Latin intermediary remain unlocated. Its exact body attachment is unclear.

[7284] Editor. Achates is Aeneas's faithful companion, hence a byword for loyalty. Burton makes injury a servant who never leaves the good man. "Wants enemies" means lacks enemies, not desires them; the assertion about such a man's misfortune is retained.

[7285] Burton. Printed page 355, dagger: "Plutarch, quinquagies Catoni dies dicta ab inimicis." Plutarch: Cato was summoned to trial fifty times by his enemies. The precise Plutarch passage and numerical claim await collation.

[7286] Editor. Burton combines the two Catos. Velleius Paterculus 2.35.2 praises Cato the Younger for doing right by nature, not for display. Plutarch, Cato the Elder 15.4, reports nearly fifty cases against the Elder; Burton gives fifty. The English Plutarch comparison locates that separate anecdote without identifying Burton's edition.

[7287] Burton. Printed page 355, asterisk: "Lib.18." Ammianus Marcellinus, book 18; compare 18.1.4.

[7288] Editor. Ammianus Marcellinus 18.1.4 gives Julian's reply to an accuser who asks how anyone can be guilty if denial is enough. Julian asks how anyone can be innocent if accusation is enough. Burton expands the wording with "privately or publicly."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 355–356 If there were no other respect then that of Christianity, Religion and the like, to induce men to be long-suffering and patient, yet me thinks the nature of Injury it self is sufficient to keep them quiet, the tumults, uproars, miseries, discontents, anguish, losse, dangers that attend upon it might restrain the calamities of contention: for as it is with ordinary gamesters, the gains go to the box, so falls it out to such as contend; the Lawyers get all; and therefore if they would consider of it, aliena pericula cautos, other mens misfortunes in this kind, and common experience might detain them.	Even if there were no other consideration beyond Christianity, religion and the like to induce people to be forbearing and patient, the nature of injury itself seems to me enough to keep them quiet. The disturbances, uproars, miseries, discontents, anguish, losses and dangers attending it might check the calamities of quarrelling. As with ordinary gamblers, whose winnings go to the gaming box, so with those who litigate: the lawyers get everything. If people would consider this—"other men's dangers make us cautious"—the misfortunes of others in such matters and common experience might hold them back.[7289]
Source page 356 [7290]The more they contend, the more they are involved in a Labyrinth of woes, and the Catastrophe is to consume one another, like the Elephant and Dragons conflict in [7291]Pliny: the Dragon got under the Elephants belly, and sucked his blood so long, till he fell down dead upon the Dragon, and killed him with the fall, so both were ruin'd.	The more they quarrel, the further they become entangled in a labyrinth of woes; the final outcome is mutual destruction, as in Pliny's contest between the elephant and the dragon. The dragon got beneath the elephant's belly and sucked its blood until the elephant fell dead upon it, killing it in the fall: both were destroyed.[7292]

[7289] Editor. The "box" is the gaming establishment's money box or takings; the comparison is that those conducting the contest profit at the players' expense. The Latin is compressed: other people's dangers or misfortunes should make the observer cautious.

[7290] Burton. Printed page 356, m: "Hoc scio pro certo quod si cum stercore certo, Vinco seu vincor, semper ego maculor." This I know for certain: if I contend with dung, whether I win or lose, I am always soiled. The Latin plays on certo, "for certain" and "I contend."

[7291] Burton. Printed page 356, dagger: "Lib.8. cap.2." Pliny, book 8, chapter 2, as printed. The elephant–serpent combat is at Natural History 8.11–12, sections 32–34, in the comparison text.

[7292] Editor. Pliny's Natural History 8.32–34 recounts the mutual destruction of an elephant and a huge serpent. Burton calls it a dragon and compresses the accounts. His marginal chapter 2 differs from chapters 11–12 in the consulted numbering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis an Hydra's head, contention; the more they strive, the more they may: and as Praxitiles did by his glass, when he saw a scurvy face in it, brake it in pieces: but for that one, he saw many more as bad in a moment: for one injury done they provoke another cum fænore, and twenty enemies for one.	Contention is a Hydra's head: the more people struggle, the more struggling remains. It is like Praxiteles and his mirror: seeing an ugly face in it, he smashed it, but in place of that one face he instantly saw many more equally ugly. For one injury they provoke another "with interest," and twenty enemies in place of one.[7293]
Noli irritare crabrones, oppose not thy self to a multitude: but if thou hast received a wrong, wisely consider of it, and if thou canst possibly, compose thy self with patience to bear it. This is the safest course, and thou shalt find greatest ease to be quiet.	"Do not stir up hornets": do not set yourself against a multitude. If you have suffered a wrong, consider it wisely and, if you possibly can, compose yourself to bear it patiently. This is the safest course; you will find the greatest relief in remaining at peace.
[7294]I say the same of scoffs, slanders, contumelies, obloquies, defamations, detractions, pasquilling libels, and the like, which may tend any way to our disgrace: 'tis but opinion: if we could neglect, contemn, or with patience digest them, they would reflect on them that offered them at first.	I say the same of mockery, slander, insults, abuse, defamation, disparagement, satirical libels and the like, which may in any way bring us into disgrace. It is only opinion: if we could disregard or scorn them, or absorb them patiently, they would rebound upon those who first offered them.[7295]
A wise citizen I know not whence, had a scold to his wife: when she brawled, he plaid on his drum, and by that means madded her more, because she saw that he would not be moved.	A wise citizen, from I know not where, had a quarrelsome wife. When she scolded, he played his drum, which maddened her still more because she saw that he would not be disturbed.

[7293] Editor. The Hydra's severed heads grow again, making it an image of multiplying troubles. "Glass" means mirror, "scurvy" ugly or disagreeable, and cum fænore "with interest." The broken-mirror anecdote and the identification behind Praxitiles remain unverified.

[7294] Burton. Printed page 356, n: "Obloquutus est, probrumque tibi intulit quispiam, sive vera is dixerit, sive falsa, maximam tibi coronam texueris si mansuetè convitium tuleris. Chrys. in 6. cap. ad Rom. ser.10." Someone has spoken against you and brought reproach upon you: whether he spoke truth or falsehood, you will have woven yourself a magnificent crown if you bear the abuse meekly. Chrysostom, sermon 10 on Romans, chapter 6, as printed; the precise citation remains unverified.

[7295] Editor. "Pasquilling libels" are abusive or satirical writings circulated against someone. Burton's claim that disgrace is "opinion" concerns the power of others' judgements over one's peace of mind; it does not establish that every accusation is false.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Diogenes in a crowd when one called him back, and told him how the boys laughed him to scorn, Ego, inquit non rideor, took no notice of it.	When Diogenes was in a crowd, someone called him back and told him that the boys were laughing him to scorn. “I am not being laughed at,” he replied, and took no notice.[7296]
Socrates was brought upon the stage by Aristophanes, and misused to his face, but he laughed as if it concerned him not: and as Ælian relates of him, whatsoever good or bad accident or fortune befel him, going in or coming out, Socrates still kept the same countenance:	Aristophanes put Socrates on the stage and abused him to his face, but Socrates laughed as though it did not concern him. As Aelian relates, whatever good or bad event or fortune befell him, whether going in or coming out, Socrates always kept the same expression.[7297]
Even so should a Christian souldier do, as Hierom describes him, per infamiam & bonam famam grassari ad immortalitatem, march on through good and bad reports to immortality, [7298]not be moved:	A Christian soldier should do the same: as Jerome describes him, “advance through ill repute and good repute towards immortality”—march on through good and bad reports towards immortality, unmoved.[7299]
for honesty is a sufficient reward, probitas sibi præmium; and in our times the sole recompence to do well, is, to do well: but naughtiness will punish it self at last, [7300]Improbis ipsa nequitia supplicium, As the diverbe is,	For uprightness is reward enough: “goodness is its own reward.” In our times the only recompense for doing well is doing well; but wickedness will eventually punish itself: “For the wicked, wickedness itself is punishment.” As the saying goes,[7301]

[7296] Editor. Compare Diogenes Laertius 6.54: Diogenes refuses to count others’ laughter as a defeat. This locates the reply in English translation, but not Burton’s Latin version, the boys or the crowd. The paradox is that mockery fails to wound a person who does not accept it as an injury.

[7297] Editor. Socrates is caricatured in Aristophanes’ Clouds. The accounts of his response and unchanging expression are presented here as Burton reports them; his precise Aelian citation remains to be located.

[7298] Burton. Printed page 356, o: “Tullius epist. Dolabella, tu forti sis animo; & tua moderatio, constantia, eorum infamet injuriam.” Cicero, letter to Dolabella: Be of good courage, and let your restraint and steadfastness bring their wrongdoing into disgrace. The wording recurs in the margin on printed page 358.

[7299] Editor. Hierom is Jerome. The martial metaphor makes endurance a Christian soldier’s advance towards eternal life. The exact Jerome passage and the Cicero letter cited beside it remain for collation.

[7300] Burton. Printed page 356, dagger: “Boethius consol. lib.4. pros.3.” Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy, book 4, prose 3.

[7301] Editor. “Honesty” means moral uprightness, and “naughtiness” wickedness. Boethius, Consolation 4, prose 3, argues that goodness carries its own reward and wickedness its own punishment. “Diverbe” means a saying or maxim.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Qui benè fecerunt, illi sua facta sequentur; Qui male fecerunt, facta sequentur eos:	Those who have done well will follow their deeds; The deeds of those who have done ill will follow them.[7302]
They that do well, shall have reward at last; But they that ill, shall suffer for that's past.	Those who do well will have reward at last; Those who do ill will suffer for their past.
Yea but I am ashamed, disgraced, dishonoured, degraded, exploded: my notoriour crimes and villanies, are come to light, (deprendi miserum est) my filthy lust, abominable oppression and avarice lies open, my good name's lost, my fortune's gone, I have been stigmatized, whipt at post, arraigned and condemned, I am a common obloquy, I have lost my ears, odious, execrable, abhorred of God and men.	"Yes, but I am ashamed, disgraced, dishonoured, degraded and publicly hissed down. My notorious crimes and villainies have come to light —'it is miserable to be caught.' My filthy lust, abominable oppression and greed lie exposed; my good name is lost, my fortune gone. I have been branded, whipped at the post, tried and condemned; I am an object of public abuse. My ears have been cut off. I am hateful, accursed, abhorred by God and men."[7303]

[7302] Editor. The first Latin line says that those who have done well will follow their deeds; the second makes the deeds follow the wrongdoers. Burton's separate English couplet turns this into reward and punishment. The awkward first line is translated as printed, not silently rewritten. Its source remains unidentified.

[7303] Editor. "Exploded" means hissed or hooted down; "stigmatized," physically branded. Ear cropping and whipping are literal punishments here. The original's notoriour is rendered "notorious." Deprendi miserum est comes from Horace, Satires 1.2.134, on the misery of being caught.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 356–357 Be content, 'tis but a nine dayes wonder, and as one sorrow drives out another, one passion another, one cloud another, one rumor is expelled by another; every day almost, come new newes unto our ears, as how the Sun was eclipsed, meteors seen i'th aire, monsters born, prodigies, how the Turks were overthrown in Persia, an Earth-quake in Helvetia, Calabria, Japan, or China, an inundation in Holland, a great plague in Constantinople, a fire at Prage, a dearth in Germany, such a man is made a Lord, a Bishop, another hanged, deposed, prest to death, for some murder, treason, rape, theft, oppression,	Be at peace: it is only a nine days' wonder. As one sorrow drives out another, one passion another, one cloud another, so one rumour displaces another. Almost every day fresh news reaches our ears: the sun was eclipsed; meteors were seen in the sky; monstrous births and prodigies occurred; the Turks were defeated in Persia; there was an earthquake in Switzerland, Calabria, Japan or China, a flood in Holland, a great plague in Constantinople, a fire in Prague, a famine in Germany. One man is made a lord or bishop; another is hanged, deposed or pressed to death for murder, treason, rape, theft or oppression.[7304]
Source page 357 all which we do hear at first with a kind of admiration, detestation, consternation, but by and by they are buried in silence: thy father's dead, thy brother rob'd, wife runs mad, neighbour hath killed himselfe; 'tis heavy, gastly, fearfull newes at first, in every mans mouth, table talk; but after a while who speaks or thinks of it?	At first we hear all this with a kind of wonder, horror or dismay, but soon it is buried in silence. Your father has died; your brother has been robbed; your wife has gone mad; your neighbour has killed himself. At first it is grievous, ghastly, frightening news, on everyone's lips and discussed at every table; but after a while, who speaks or thinks of it?
It will be so with thee and thine offence, it will be forgotten in an instant, be it theft, rape, sodomy, murder, incest, treason, &c. thou art not the first offender, nor shalt not be the last, 'tis no wonder, every houre such malefactors are called in question, nothing so common,	So it will be with you and your offence: it will be forgotten in a moment, whether theft, rape, sodomy, murder, incest, treason or anything else. You are not the first offender, and will not be the last. It is no marvel: every hour such offenders are brought to account. Nothing is more common,[7305]

[7304] Editor. Burton piles up examples of news without identifying particular events. Helvetia is Switzerland; Prage is Prague. "Dearth" means severe scarcity, here famine. "Prest to death" means killed by pressing under weights. The modern column does not assign dates to this catalogue.

[7305] Editor. "Called in question" means brought to account or prosecuted. "Sodomy" is retained as Burton's historical category of sexual offence; it is not a precise modern identity term. His consolatory argument turns here from the innocent sufferer to the acknowledged offender.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Quocunque in populo, quocunque sub axe:	Among whatever people, under whatever sky.[7306]
Comfort thy self, thou art not the sole man. If he that were guiltless himself should fling the first stone at thee, and he alone should accuse thee that were faultless, how many executioners, how many accusers wouldst thou have? If every mans sinnes were written in his fore-head, and secret faults known, how many thousands would parallel, if not exceed thine offence?	Take comfort: you are not the only one. If only someone guiltless himself could throw the first stone at you, and only someone faultless could accuse you, how many executioners or accusers would you have? If everyone's sins were written on his forehead and his secret faults made known, how many thousands would equal, if not exceed, your offence?[7307]
It may be the Judge that gave sentence, the Jury that condemned thee, the spectators that gazed on thee, deserved much more, and were farre more guilty then thou thy self. But it is thine infelicity to be taken, to be made a publike example of justice, to be a terror to the rest; yet should every man have his desert, thou wouldest peradventure be a Saint in comparison; vexat censura columbas, poor souls are punished; the great ones do twenty thousand times worse, and are not so much as spoken of.	Perhaps the judge who passed sentence, the jury that condemned you and the spectators who stared at you deserved much worse and were far guiltier than you. It is your misfortune to have been caught, made a public example of justice and a warning to the rest. Yet if everyone received his deserts, you might be a saint by comparison. "Censure persecutes the doves": poor souls are punished, while the great do twenty thousand times worse and are not even mentioned.[7308]
[7309]Non rete accipitri tenditur neque milvio, Qui male faciunt nobis; illis qui nil faciunt tenditur.	The net is not spread for the hawk or the kite, Which harm us; it is spread for birds that do no harm.[7310]
The net's not laid for kites or birds of prey, But for the harmless still our gins we lay.	We lay no net for kites or birds of prey; For harmless birds we always set our snares.

[7306] Editor. The Latin fragment extends the claim to all peoples and countries. Its source remains unidentified. Axe is the ablative of axis, here the heavens or sky.

[7307] Editor. An allusion to John 8:7, the challenge that the person without sin should throw the first stone. Burton extends it to accusers and executioners generally.

[7308] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 2.63: censure spares ravens and harasses doves. Burton quotes the second half and applies the contrast to unequal punishment of powerful and poor people. "Desert" means what a person deserves.

[7309] Burton. Printed page 357, unmarked margin: "Ter. Phor." Terence, Phormio; compare lines 330–331. The final abbreviated title is lightly printed.

[7310] Editor. Terence, Phormio 330–331; the metaphor is that harmless, profitable birds are trapped while damaging predators escape. Burton's separate English gloss follows the Latin and is retained. "Gins" means snares or traps.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Be not dismaid then, humanum est errare, we are all sinners, daily and hourely subject to temptations, the best of us is an hypocrite, a grievous offender in Gods sight. Noah, Lot, David, Peter, &c. how many mortal sins do we commit?	Do not be dismayed, then: "to err is human." We are all sinners, subject to temptation every day and every hour; the best of us is a hypocrite, a grievous offender in God's sight. Noah, Lot, David, Peter and the rest: how many mortal sins do we commit?[7311]
Shall I say, be penitent, ask forgiveness, and make amends by the sequel of thy life, for that foule offence thou hast committed? recover thy credit by some noble exploit, as Themistocles did, for he was a most deboshed and vitious youth, sed juventæ maculas præclaris factis delevit, but made the World amends by brave exploits; at last become a new man and seek to be reformed.	Shall I tell you to repent, ask forgiveness and, through the rest of your life, make amends for the foul offence you have committed? Recover your reputation by some noble achievement, as Themistocles did. He was a thoroughly debauched and vicious youth, "but erased the stains of his youth with illustrious deeds": through brave achievements he made amends to the world. Become a new man at last, and seek to reform.[7312]
He that runs away in a battle, as Demosthenes said, may fight again; and he that hath a fall may stand as upright as ever he did before. Nemo desperet meliora lapsus, a wicked liver may be reclaimed, and prove an honest man;	As Demosthenes said, the man who runs away in battle may fight again, and the man who falls may stand as upright as ever. "Let no one who has fallen despair of better things": someone who has lived wickedly may reform and become an honest man.[7313]
he that is odious in present, hissed out, an exile, may be received again with all mens favours, and singular applause; so Tully was in Rome, Alcibiades in Athens.	Someone who is now hated, hissed away and exiled may be welcomed back with everyone's favour and extraordinary applause, as Cicero was in Rome and Alcibiades in Athens.[7314]

[7311] Editor. The biblical names illustrate the failings of revered figures. "Mortal sins" are grave sins; Burton's use here is a general moral indictment. His "wicked liver" in the following paragraph means a person who lives wickedly.

[7312] Editor. "Credit" means reputation; "deboshed" means debauched. Burton's account of Themistocles' youth and subsequent reform is retained; no exact source is supplied here, and its wording remains for collation.

[7313] Editor. The saying about retreat is attributed here to Demosthenes without a specific source. "Lapsed" in the Latin means fallen; the maxim refuses to treat a moral fall as irreparable. Its author remains unidentified.

[7314] Editor. Burton invokes the public restoration of Cicero and Alcibiades after exile. The passage concerns recovered favour, not a claim that either man's later fortunes were permanently secure.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 357–358 Let thy disgrace then be what it will, quod fit, infectum non potest esse, that which is past cannot be recalled; trouble not thy selfe, vexe and grieve thy self no more, be it obloquy, disgrace, &c. No better way, then to neglect, contemn, or seem not to regard it, to make no reckoning of it. Deesse robur arguit dicacitas: If thou be guiltless it concerns thee not:	Whatever your disgrace, then, "what has been done cannot be undone": the past cannot be recalled. Do not distress, torment or grieve yourself any longer over abuse, disgrace or anything of the kind. There is no better course than to disregard it, scorn it, or appear indifferent and make nothing of it. "Abusive wit betrays a lack of strength." If you are guiltless, it does not concern you.[7315]
Source page 358 [7316]Irrita vaniloquæ quid curas spicula linguæ, Latrantem curatne alta Diana canem?	Why heed the powerless darts of an idle tongue? Does Diana on high heed a barking dog?[7317]
Doth the Moon care for the barking of a dog? They detract, scoffe and raile saith one, [7318]and bark at me on every side, but I, like that Albanian dog sometimes given to Alexander for a present, vindico me ab illis solo contemptu, I lie still and sleep, vindicate my self by contempt alone.	Does the moon care about a dog's barking? They disparage, mock and abuse me, says one, and bark at me on every side; but I am like the Albanian dog once given to Alexander: "I defend myself against them by contempt alone." I lie still and sleep, defending myself merely by disregarding them.[7319]
[7320]Expers terroris Achilles armatus:	Achilles armed and free from fear.[7321]

[7315] Editor. Quod fit is literally "what is done"; Burton's gloss applies it to the irreversible past. Dicacitas means biting or abusive wit. The exact sources of these maxims remain unlocated.

[7316] Burton. Printed page 358, dagger: "Camerar. emb.61. cent.3." Camerarius, emblems, third century, no.61; the moon and the barking dog. Exact emblem collation remains pending.

[7317] Editor. Diana is the moon goddess; the image is of the moon remaining unaffected by dogs barking below. Burton cites Camerarius, third century, emblem 61; the couplet's exact textual source remains to be collated.

[7318] Burton. Printed page 358, p: "Lipsius elect. lib.3. ult. Latrant me jaceo ac taceo, &c." Justus Lipsius, Electa, book 3, last chapter: They bark at me; I lie still and keep silent, and so on. Exact collation remains pending.

[7319] Editor. "Sometimes" here means once, not occasionally. The magnificent dog sent to Alexander serves as an image of indifference to petty provocations. Burton's Lipsius passage and the precise ancient dog narrative remain for collation.

[7320] Burton. Printed page 358, asterisk: "Catullus." Catullus; compare poem 64, line 339.

[7321] Editor. Catullus 64.339 contains expers terroris Achilles, "Achilles free from fear." Burton adds armatus, "armed," to the excerpt. The entire printed phrase is translated; it is not presented as an exact line of Catullus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As a Tortoise in his shell, [7322]virtute meâ me involvo, [7323]or an Urchin round, nil moror ictus, [7324]a Lizard in Camomile, I decline their fury and am safe.	Like a tortoise in its shell, "I wrap myself in my virtue"; or like a hedgehog curled into a ball, "I care nothing for blows"; like a lizard in camomile, I evade their fury and remain safe.[7325]
Integritas virtusque suo munimine tuta, Non patet adversæ morsibus invidiæ:	Integrity and virtue, safe behind their own defences, Are not exposed to the bites of hostile envy.[7326]
Vertue and integrity are their own fence, Care not for envy or what comes from thence.	Virtue and integrity are their own defence; They disregard envy and whatever comes from it.
Let them rail then, scoffe, and slander, sapiens contumeliâ non afficitur, a wise man Seneca thinks, is not moved, because he knows, contra Sycophantæ morsum non est remedium, there is no remedy for it: Kings and Princes, wise, grave, prudent, holy, good men, divine, all are so served alike.	Let them abuse, mock and slander, then. "The wise man is unaffected by insult": Seneca thinks he remains unmoved because he knows that "there is no remedy against a slanderer's bite." There is no remedy for it. Kings and princes, wise, dignified, prudent, holy, good and godly men—all are treated alike.[7327]

[7322] Burton. Printed page 358, o: "Tullius epist. Dolabellæ; tu forti sis animo, & tua moderatio, constantia eorum infamet injuriam." Cicero, letter to Dolabella: Be of good courage, and let your restraint and steadfastness bring their wrongdoing into disgrace. This repeats the page 356 note with small textual differences. Its exact anchor on page 358 is unclear; it is retained beside the images of self-command.

[7323] Burton. Printed page 358, o: "The symbole of I. Kevenbeder a Carinthian Baron saith Sambucus." The printed name is retained. Burton cites Johannes Sambucus for this emblem; the identification and its attachment within the animal sequence await collation. The body has a dagger before the hedgehog and o before the lizard.

[7324] Burton. Printed page 358, asterisk: "The symbole of Gonzaga Duke of Mantua." Burton associates the animal imagery with a Gonzaga emblem; the particular bearer and the mismatch between marginal and body signs remain to be checked.

[7325] Editor. "Urchin" means hedgehog, not a child. "I wrap myself in my virtue" recalls Horace, Odes 3.29.54–55. These are emblematic images of self-protection; the lizard's camomile, the printed Kevenbeder, and the precise Gonzaga attribution remain to be checked. The duplicate Cicero marginal note is preserved separately.

[7326] Editor. Munimen means a defence or fortification. The fresh Latin translation is followed by Burton's distinct English gloss. No author is named for the couplet.

[7327] Editor. A sycophant here is a malicious accuser or slanderer, not a flatterer. Compare Seneca, De constantia sapientis 3.3: the wise person is safe from both injury and insult. Burton's shorter formula expresses that position but is not verbatim. The maxim about the slanderer's bite and the immediate intermediaries remain unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7328]O Jane à tergo quem nulla ciconia pinsit, Antevorta and Postvorta Jupiters gardians may not help in this case, they cannot protect;	"O Janus, whom no stork pecks at from behind!" Antevorta and Postvorta, Jupiter's guardians, cannot help here; they cannot protect you.[7329]
Moses had a Dathan, a Corath, David a Shimei, God himself is blasphemed: nondum felix es si te nondum turba deridet.	Moses had his Dathan and Korah, David his Shimei; God himself is blasphemed. "You are not yet fortunate if the crowd has not yet mocked you."[7330]
It is an ordinary thing so to be misused: [7331]Regium est cum benè faceris malè audire, the chiefest men and most understanding are so vilified; let him take his [7332]course.	It is ordinary to be treated so badly. "It is a king's lot to be spoken ill of when he has done good." The greatest and most discerning men are vilified in this way; let the slanderer go his way.[7333]
And as that lusty courser in Æsop, that contemned the poor Asse, came by and by after with his bowels burst, a pack on his back, and was derided of the same Asse: contemnentur ab iis quos ipsi prius contempsere, & irridebuntur ab iis quos ipsi prius irrisere, they shall be contemned and laughed to scorn of those whom they have formerly derided.	Just as the spirited horse in Aesop, which scorned the poor ass, soon returned ruptured and carrying a pack, and was mocked by that same ass: "They will be scorned by those whom they themselves once scorned, and laughed at by those whom they once laughed at." Those they formerly derided will despise and mock them in turn.[7334]

[7328] Burton. Printed page 358, q: "Pres. sat.1." Persius, Satire 1, line 58. Pres. is the printed abbreviation.

[7329] Editor. Persius, Satire 1.58: two-faced Janus cannot be mocked unseen from behind; the "stork" is a derisive gesture. Macrobius, Saturnalia 1.7.20, associates Antevorta and Postvorta with foresight and hindsight in his account of Janus. This supplies context, not Burton's description of them as Jupiter's guardians, which remains unreconciled.

[7330] Editor. Dathan and Korah oppose Moses in Numbers 16; Shimei curses David in 2 Samuel 16. Corath is Burton's printed form of Korah. The closing Latin maxim about being mocked is unattributed here.

[7331] Burton. Printed page 358, asterisk: "Magni animi est injurias despicere. Seneca de ira, cap.31." It is the mark of a great spirit to disregard injuries. Seneca, On Anger, chapter 31, as printed; the sentence occurs at 2.32.3 in the comparison text.

[7332] Burton. Printed page 358, dagger: "Quid turpius quam sapientis vitam ex insipientis sermone pendere? Tullius 2. de finibus." What is more shameful than for a wise man's life to depend on a fool's talk? Cicero, On Ends, book 2, as printed; the quotation was not located in the comparison text.

[7333] Editor. The marginal Seneca sentence is at On Anger 2.32.3, rather than the printed chapter 31. It supports the general argument but is not the source of the adjacent maxim about kings. Burton's Cicero citation for the next maxim remains unverified.

[7334] Editor. "Courser" means a spirited riding or warhorse. "His bowels burst" describes a rupture or disabling bodily injury, not necessarily immediate death: the horse lives to carry a pack. Burton's exact fable version remains to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Let them contemn, defame, or undervalue, insult, oppress, scoffe, slander, abuse, wrong, curse and swear, fain and lye, do thou comfort thy self with a good conscience, [7335]in sinu gaudeas, when they have all done, a good conscience is a continual feast, innocency will vindicate it self:	Let them scorn, defame or belittle you; insult, oppress, mock, slander, abuse and wrong you; curse, swear, fabricate and lie. Take comfort in a good conscience: "rejoice within yourself." When they have done their worst, a good conscience is a continual feast, and innocence will vindicate itself.[7336]
And which the Poet gave out of Hercules, diis fruitur iratis, enjoy thy self, though all the world be set against thee,	And, as the poet said of Hercules, "he prospers despite the anger of the gods": enjoy your life, though the whole world is set against you.[7337]
contemn and say with him, Elogium mihi præ foribus, my [7338]posie is, not to be moved, that's my Palladium, my brest-plate, my buckler, with which I ward all injuries, offences, lies, slanders; I lean upon that stake of modesty, so receive and break asunder all that foolish force of Livor and spleen.	Disregard it and say with him, "I have an inscription before my door." My motto is "Remain unmoved": that is my Palladium, my breastplate, my shield, with which I ward off every injury, insult, lie and slander. I lean upon that stake of self-restraint, meet the assault, and shatter all the foolish force of envy and spite.[7339]
And whosoever he is that shall observe these short instructions, without all question he shall much ease and benefit himself.	Whoever follows these brief instructions will undoubtedly bring himself much relief and benefit.

[7335] Burton. Printed page 358, r: "Tua te conscientia salvare, in cubiculum ingredere, ubi secure requiescas. Minuit se quodammodo proba bonitas conscientiæ secretum, Boethius l.1. pros.4." The opening appears to intend: Let your conscience save you; enter your chamber, where you may rest securely. The printed salvare is syntactically uncertain. The next clause is defective: roughly, "Upright goodness somehow diminishes itself … the privacy of conscience." See the editorial comparison with Boethius 1.4.33.

[7336] Editor. "In sinu" means in one's bosom, hence inwardly. "A continual feast" recalls Proverbs 15:15, which speaks of a merry heart. The marginal Latin has uncertain or defective wording, preserved in its note. Boethius 1.4.33 instead has se probantis conscientiæ secretum: the private satisfaction of an approving conscience diminishes when a person displays a deed for public praise. Burton's proba bonitas is a textual discrepancy, not substituted into the comparison text.

[7337] Editor. Burton applies the phrase to Hercules without identifying a poet or work. A closely matching phrase appears in Juvenal 1.49–50 about the disgraced Marius enjoying himself despite divine anger. This comparison does not establish Burton's intended Hercules source, which remains unresolved.

[7338] Burton. Printed page 358, s: "Ringantur licet & maledicant; Palladium illud pectori oppono, Non Moveri: consilio modestiæ veluti sudi innitens, excipio & frango stultissimum impetum livoris. Putean. lib.2. epist.58." Let them snarl and curse: I set this Palladium before my breast, Remain Unmoved. Leaning on the counsel of self-restraint as on a stake, I meet and break envy's utterly foolish attack. Erycius Puteanus, letters, book 2, letter 58; exact collation remains pending.

[7339] Editor. "Posie" means an inscription or motto. A Palladium is a safeguarding object, named after the protective image associated with Troy. Livor means envy or malice, and spleen rancour. "Modesty" here denotes restraint; Burton's stake metaphor is retained. The marginal source is Puteanus, letters 2.58.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 358–359 In fine, if Princes would do justice, Judges be upright, Clergie-men truly devout, and so live as they teach, if great men would not be so insolent, if souldiers would quietly defend us, the poor would be patient, rich men would be liberal and humble, Citizens honest, Magistrates meek, Superiours would give good example, subjects peaceable, young men would stand in awe: if Parents would be kind to their children, and they again obedient to their Parents, brethren agree amongst themselves, enemies be reconciled, servants trusty to their Masters, Virgins chaste, Wives modest, Husbands would be loving and less jealous:	Finally, if princes would administer justice, judges be upright, clergymen truly devout and live as they teach; if the great would be less insolent, soldiers defend us peaceably, the poor be patient, the rich generous and humble, citizens honest, magistrates gentle, superiors set a good example, subjects be peaceable, and young men show respect; if parents would be kind to their children and children in turn obey their parents, brothers agree with one another, enemies be reconciled, servants be faithful to their masters, virgins chaste, wives modest, and husbands loving and less jealous—[7340]
Source page 359 If we could imitate Christ and his Apostles, live after Gods laws, these mischiefs would not so frequently happen amongst us; but being most part so irreconcileable as we are, perverse, proud, insolent, factious and malicious, prone to contention, anger and revenge, of such fiery spirits, so captious, impious, irreligious, so opposite to vertue, void of grace, how should it otherwise be?	if we could imitate Christ and his apostles and live according to God's laws, these troubles would not occur among us so often. But since most of us are as implacable as we are—perverse, proud, insolent, factious and malicious, prone to quarrels, anger and revenge, so hot-tempered, fault-finding, impious and irreligious, so opposed to virtue and devoid of grace—how could things be otherwise?

[7340] Editor. The whole catalogue is conditional. Burton does not claim that these social duties are actually fulfilled. "Stand in awe" means show reverence or respectful restraint; "liberal" means generous.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many men are very teasty by nature, apt to mistake, apt to quarrel, apt to provoke and misinterpret to the worst, every thing that is said or done, & thereupon heap unto their selves a great deal of trouble, & disquietness to others, smatterers in other mens matters, tale-bearers, whisperers, lyers, they cannot speak in season, or hold their tongues when they should, [7341]Et suam partem itidem tacere, cum aliena est oratio:	Many people are naturally very touchy, ready to misunderstand, quarrel, provoke others and put the worst interpretation on everything said or done. They thereby heap trouble upon themselves and disturb others: meddling in other people's affairs, carrying tales, whispering rumours and lying. They cannot speak at the right time or hold their tongues when they should, "and likewise keep silent for their share of the time when someone else is speaking."[7342]
they will speak more then comes to their shares, in all companies, and by those bad courses accumulate much evil to their own souls, (qui contendit, sibi convicium facit) their life is a perpetual braul, they snarl like so many dogs, with their wives, children, servants, neighbours, and all the rest of their friends, they can agree with no body.	In every company they speak more than their share, and through these bad habits bring much harm upon their own souls: "whoever quarrels brings abuse upon himself." Their life is a perpetual brawl. They snarl like so many dogs at their wives, children, servants, neighbours and all their other friends; they can agree with nobody.
But to such as are judicious, meek, submiss, and quiet, these matters are easily remedied: they will forbear upon all such occasions, neglect, contemn, or take no notice of them, dissemble, or wisely turn it off. If it be a natural impediment, as a red nose, squint eyes, crooked legs, or any such imperfection, infirmity, disgrace, reproach, the best way is to speak of it first thy [7343]self, & so thou shalt surely take away all occasions from others to jest at, or contemn, that they may perceive thee to be careless of it.	But people who are judicious, gentle, yielding and quiet can easily remedy these troubles. On all such occasions they will exercise restraint, disregard or scorn the offence, take no notice of it, conceal their feelings or wisely turn it aside. If it concerns a natural defect—a red nose, crossed eyes, crooked legs—or any such imperfection, infirmity, disgrace or reproach, the best course is to mention it yourself first. You will thereby deprive others of grounds for mockery or contempt, since they will see that you are unconcerned about it.[7344]

[7341] Burton. Printed page 359, asterisk: "Mil. glor. Act. 3. Plautus." Plautus, The Braggart Soldier, act 3.

[7342] Editor. Plautus, Miles gloriosus 646, has meam, "my," where Burton adapts it to suam, "his/their." The speaker describes taking his fair turn in conversation. "Teasty" means touchy or irritable; "smatterers" here are meddling busybodies.

[7343] Burton. Printed page 359, t: "Bion said his father was a rogue, his mother a whore, to prevent obloquy, and to shew that nought belonged to him but goods of the mind."

[7344] Editor. The marginal Bion anecdote illustrates pre-emptive self-disclosure. Its precise source remains to be collated. "Dissemble" here means hide one's reaction, not necessarily tell a lie.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Vatinius was wont to scoffe at his own deformed feet, to prevent his enemies obloquies and sarcasms in that kind; or else by prevention, as Cotys King of Thrace, that brake a company of fine glasses presented to him, with his own hands, lest he should be overmuch moved when they were broken by chance.	Vatinius used to mock his own deformed feet to forestall his enemies' insults and sarcasms about them. Or take preventive action, as Cotys, king of Thrace, did: he broke with his own hands a collection of fine glasses presented to him, lest he become too angry if they were accidentally broken.[7345]
And sometimes again, so that it be discreetly and moderately done, it shall not be amiss to make resistance, to take down such a saucy companion, no better means to vindicate himself to purchase final peace: for he that suffers himself to be ridden, or through pusillanimity or sottishness will let every man baffle him, shall be a common laughing stock for all to flout at.	At other times, provided it is done with discretion and moderation, it may be right to resist and put an insolent fellow in his place. There is no better means of defending yourself and securing lasting peace. For whoever lets himself be ridden over, or through cowardice or stupidity allows everyone to humiliate him, will become a common laughingstock for all to mock.
As a cur that goes through a Village, if he clap his taile between his legs, and run away, every cur will insult over him: but if he bridle up himself, and stand to it, give but a counter-snarle, there's not a dog dares meddle with him: much is in a mans courage and discreet carriage of himself.	It is like a cur going through a village: if he tucks his tail between his legs and runs away, every other cur will lord it over him. But if he draws himself up, stands his ground and merely snarls back, not a dog dares meddle with him. Much depends on a man's courage and the discretion with which he conducts himself.[7346]

[7345] Editor. Seneca, On the Constancy of the Wise 17, recounts Vatinius's jokes about his own feet and scarred throat. Plutarch, Sayings of Kings and Commanders 174C, tells the Cotys story with fragile decorated earthenware; Burton has "glasses." Both differences are retained.

[7346] Editor. The scan reads "bridle up himself." The modern rendering follows the sense of drawing oneself up to resist; it does not silently replace the original with "bristle," found in later texts. "Baffle" in the preceding passage means disgrace or humiliate.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many other grievances there are, which happen to mortals in this life, from friends, wives, children, servants, masters, companions, neighbours, our own defaults, ignorance, errours, intemperance, indiscretion, infirmities, &c. and many good remedies to mitigate and oppose them, many divine precepts to counterpoise our hearts, special antidotes both in Scriptures & humane Authors, which who so will observe, shall purchase much ease and quietness unto himself: I will point at a few.	Many other troubles befall us in this life, arising from friends, wives, children, servants, masters, companions, neighbours, and our own faults, ignorance, errors, intemperance, indiscretion, infirmities and so on. There are many good remedies to alleviate and withstand them, many divine precepts to steady our hearts, and special antidotes in both Scripture and secular writers. Whoever observes them will gain much ease and peace of mind. I will point out a few.
Source page 359–360 Those Prophetical, Apostolical admonitions are well known to all; what Salomon, Siracides, our Saviour Christ himself hath said tending to this purpose, as Fear God: obey the Prince: be sober and watch: pray continually: be angry but sin not: remember thy last: fashion not your selves to this world, &c. apply your selves to the times: strive not with a mighty man: recompence good for evil, let nothing be done through contention or vain glory, but with meekness of mind, every man esteeming of others better then himself: love one another;	Everyone knows those prophetic and apostolic admonitions, and what Solomon, the son of Sirach and our Saviour Christ himself have said to this effect: “Fear God; obey the ruler; be sober and watchful; pray continually; be angry, but do not sin; remember your end; do not conform yourselves to this world; adapt yourselves to the times; do not contend with a powerful man; repay evil with good; do nothing through rivalry or vanity, but in humility let everyone esteem others more highly than himself; love one another.”[7347]

[7347] Editor. A composite biblical catalogue, not one continuous quotation. Compare 1 Peter 2:17 and 5:8; 1 Thessalonians 5:17; Ephesians 4:26; Sirach 7:36 and 8:1; Romans 12:2 and 12:21; Philippians 2:3; John 13:34. Siracides means the son of Sirach, author of Ecclesiasticus. “Remember thy last” means remember your end or death.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 360 Or that Epitome of the law and the Prophets, which our Saviour inculcates, love God above all, thy neighbour as thy self: And whatsoever you would that men should do unto you, so do unto them, which Alexander Severus writ in letters of gold, and used as a motto. [7348]Hierom commends to Celantia as an excellent way, amongst so many inticements and worldly provocations to rectifie her life.	Or take that summary of the Law and the Prophets which our Saviour impresses upon us: "Love God above all, and your neighbour as yourself"; and "Whatever you would have people do to you, do likewise to them." Alexander Severus had this written in gold letters and used it as a motto. Jerome recommends it to Celantia as an excellent means of setting her life right amid so many enticements and worldly provocations.[7349]
Out of humane Authors take these few cautions, [7350]Know thy self. [7351]Be contented with thy lot. [7352]Trust not wealth, beauty, nor parasites, they will bring thee to destruction.	From secular writers take these few counsels: "Know yourself. Be content with your lot. Do not trust wealth, beauty or flatterers: they will bring you to destruction."[7353]
[7354]Have peace with all men, war with vice. [7355]Be not idle. [7356]Look before you leap. [7357]Beware of Had I wist.	"Be at peace with everyone, at war with vice. Do not be idle. Look before you leap. Beware of having to say, 'If only I had known.'"[7358]

[7348] Burton. Printed page 360, u: "Lib. 2. ep. 25." Book 2, letter 25; attached to Jerome's advice to Celantia.

[7349] Editor. Compare Matthew 22:37–40 and 7:12. Historia Augusta, Alexander Severus 51.8, gives the negative rule and public inscription; Burton gives the positive form and adds gold. Letter 148 to Celantia, §§14–15, transmitted under Jerome's name, recommends the positive Gospel rule as a guide to conduct. Its attribution is disputed; Burton's book 2, letter 25 remains unreconciled.

[7350] Burton. Printed page 360, x: "Nosce teipsum." Know yourself.

[7351] Burton. Printed page 360, y: "Contentus abi." Go away content.

[7352] Burton. Printed page 360, z: "Ne fidas opibus, neq; parasitis, trahunt in præcipitium." Do not trust riches or flatterers: they drag you over a precipice. Beauty is present in Burton's English but absent from this Latin.

[7353] Editor. "Parasites" here means flattering dependants or hangers-on. The Latin margin omits the body's warning against beauty. Burton collects short maxims rather than constructing a single systematic argument.

[7354] Burton. Printed page 360, a: "Pace cum hominibus habe, bellum cum vitiis. Otho. 2. imperat. symb." Have peace with people, war with vices. Motto of Emperor Otto II. Pace is printed; the sense requires pacem.

[7355] Burton. Printed page 360, b: "Dæmon te nunquam otiosum inveniat. Hierom." Let the devil never find you idle. Jerome.

[7356] Burton. Printed page 360, c: "Diu deliberandum quod statuendum est semel." What must be decided once for all requires long deliberation.

[7357] Burton. Printed page 360, d: "Insipientis est dicere non putâram." It is the fool who says, "I had not thought of that."

[7358] Editor. "Had I wist" means "Had I known": the regret that follows failure to think ahead. Jerome, Letter 125.11, recommends work so that the devil will find one occupied. The motto's attribution to Otto II remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7359]Honour thy parents, speak well of friends. Be temperate in foure things, lingua, loculis, oculis, & poculis. Watch thine eye. [7360]Moderate thine expences. Hear much, speak little. [7361]sustine & abstine. If thou seest ought amiss in another, mend it in thy self. Keep thine own counsel, reveal not thy secrets, be silent in thine intentions.	"Honour your parents; speak well of your friends. Be moderate in four things: your tongue, your purse, your eyes and your cups. Watch your eye. Keep your spending moderate. Listen much; speak little. Endure and abstain. If you see something wrong in someone else, correct it in yourself. Keep your own counsel; do not reveal your secrets; keep your intentions to yourself."[7362]
[7363]Give not ear to tale-tellers, bablers, be not scurrilous in conversation. [7364]Jest without bitterness: give no man cause of offence: set thine house in order. [7365]take heed of suretiship. [7366]Fide & diffide, as a fox on the ice, take heed whom you trust.	"Do not listen to tale-bearers or babblers; do not be coarse or abusive in conversation. Make jokes without bitterness; give nobody cause for offence; put your house in order. Beware of standing surety. Trust, yet be wary: like a fox on the ice, take care whom you trust."[7367]

[7359] Burton. Printed page 360, e: "Ames parentem, si æquum, aliter feras; præstes parentibus pietatem, amicis dilectionem." Love a parent if he is just; otherwise bear with him. Show dutiful affection to parents and love to friends.

[7360] Burton. Printed page 360, f: "Comprime linguam. Quid de quoq; viro & cui dicas sæpe caveto. Libentius audias quam loquaris; vive ut vivas." Restrain your tongue. Always take care what you say about each man, and to whom. Be readier to listen than to speak; live so that you may live.

[7361] Burton. Printed page 360, dagger: "Epictetus: optimè feceris si ea fugeris quæ in alio reprehendis. Nemini dixeris quæ nolis efferri." Epictetus: You will do best if you avoid what you blame in another. Tell no one what you do not wish to have divulged.

[7362] Editor. The list plays on the rhyming loculis, oculis and poculis: purse, eyes and cups. With lingua, the tongue, these concern speech, spending, looking or desire, and drinking. Sustine et abstine is the Stoic rule of endurance and restraint. The adjoining Epictetus margin contains two further counsels, both translated in its note.

[7363] Burton. Printed page 360, g: "Fuge susurrones. Percontatorem fugito, &c." Avoid whisperers. Shun the inquisitive person, and so on.

[7364] Burton. Printed page 360, asterisk: "Sint sales sine vilitate. Sen." Let wit be free of baseness. Seneca.

[7365] Burton. Printed page 360, h: "Sponde, præsto noxa." Stand surety, and harm is at hand.

[7366] Burton. Printed page 360, dagger: "Camerar. emb. 55. cent. 2. cave cui credas, vel nemini fidas. Epicarmus." Camerarius, Emblems, second hundred, emblem 55. Take care whom you trust, or trust no one. Epicharmus.

[7367] Editor. Suretyship means becoming responsible for another person's debt or obligation. Fide et diffide combines trust with caution. The fox-on-ice emblem and its Camerarius number remain for direct collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7368]Live not beyond thy means. [7369]Give chearfully. Pay thy dues willingly. Be not a slave to thy mony; [7370]Omit not occasion, embrace opportunity, loose no time. Be humble to thy superiors, respective to thine equals, affable to all [7371]but not familiar. Flatter no man.	"Do not live beyond your means. Give cheerfully. Pay what you owe willingly. Do not be a slave to your money. Do not miss the occasion: seize the opportunity and waste no time. Be humble towards your superiors, respectful towards your equals, and courteous to everyone, but not overfamiliar. Flatter nobody."[7372]
[7373]Lie not, dissemble not. Keep thy word and promise, be constant in a good resolution. Speak truth. Be not opinative, maintain no factions. Lay no wagers, make no comparisons. [7374]Find no faults, meddle not with other mens matters. Admire not thy self. [7375]Be not proud or popular. Insult not. Fortunam reverenter habe.	"Do not lie or dissemble. Keep your word and your promise; remain firm in a good resolution. Speak the truth. Do not be opinionated or support factions. Lay no wagers; make no comparisons. Do not find fault or meddle in other people's affairs. Do not admire yourself. Be neither proud nor eager for popular favour. Do not exult over others. Treat Fortune with respect."[7376]

[7368] Burton. Printed page 360, i: "Tecum habita." Dwell with yourself.

[7369] Burton. Printed page 360, k: "Bis dat qui cito dat." He gives twice who gives promptly.

[7370] Burton. Printed page 360, l: "Post est occasio calva." Opportunity is bald at the back.

[7371] Burton. Printed page 360, m: "Nimia familiaritas parit contemptum." Excessive familiarity breeds contempt.

[7372] Editor. "Respective" means respectful. Tecum habita, literally "dwell with yourself," occurs at Persius 4.52 as an injunction to self-examination; Burton attaches it to living within one's means. Bald-backed Opportunity can be grasped as she approaches but not after she has passed.

[7373] Burton. Printed page 360, n: "Mendacium servile vitium." Lying is a slavish vice.

[7374] Burton. Printed page 360, o: "Arcanum neq; inscrutaberis ullius unquam, commissumq; teges, Hor. lib. 1. ep. 19. Nec tua laudabis studia aut aliena reprendes. Hor. ep. lib. 18." You will never pry into anyone's secret, and you will conceal what has been entrusted to you. Horace, book 1, letter 19. Nor will you praise your own pursuits or disparage another's. Horace, letter, book 18. Both references and the form inscrutaberis are retained as printed.

[7375] Burton. Printed page 360, p: "Ne te quæsiveris extra." Do not seek yourself outside yourself.

[7376] Editor. "Popular" here is taken as courting popular favour; "insult" as exulting over others. The Horace marginal quotations correspond to Epistles 1.18.37–39, despite the printed references to 1.19 and "book 18." The unusual inscrutaberis is retained. Burton's version generalizes Horace's advice about a powerful friend.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7377]Fear not that which cannot be avoided. [7378]Grieve not for that which cannot be recalled. [7379]Undervalue not thy self. Accuse no man, commend no man rashly. Go not to law without great cause. Strive not with a greater man. Cast not off an old friend, Take heed of a reconciled enemy.	"Do not fear what cannot be avoided. Do not grieve for what cannot be recalled. Do not undervalue yourself. Do not rashly accuse or praise anyone. Do not go to law without serious cause. Do not contend with a more powerful man. Do not cast off an old friend; beware of an enemy who has been reconciled."
[7380]If thou come as a guest, stay not too long. Be not unthankful. Be meek, merciful and patient. Do good to all. Be not fond of fair words. [7381]Be not a newter in a faction; moderate thy passions. [7382]Think no place without a witness.	"If you come as a guest, do not stay too long. Do not be ungrateful. Be gentle, merciful and patient. Do good to everyone. Do not be taken in by fine words. Do not remain neutral in a factional conflict; moderate your passions. Think of no place as being without a witness."[7383]
[7384]Admonish thy friend in secret, commend him in publike. Keep good company. [7385]Love others to be beloved thy self. Ama tanquam osurus. Amicus tardo fias. Provide for a tempest. Noli irritare crabrones.	"Admonish your friend in private; praise him in public. Keep good company. Love others so that you yourself may be loved. Love as though you might one day hate. Be slow to become a friend. Prepare for a storm. Do not stir up hornets."[7386]

[7377] Burton. Printed page 360, q: "Stultum est timere, quod vitari non potest." It is foolish to fear what cannot be avoided.

[7378] Burton. Printed page 360, dagger: "De re amissa irreparabili ne doleas." Do not grieve over an irrecoverable loss.

[7379] Burton. Printed page 360, asterisk: "Tanti eris aliis quanti tibi fueris. Neminem cito laudes vel accuses." You will be worth as much to others as you are to yourself. Do not be quick to praise or accuse anyone.

[7380] Burton. Printed page 360, s: "Nullius hospitis grata est mora longa." No guest's prolonged stay is welcome.

[7381] Burton. Printed page 360, asterisk: "Solonis lex apud Aristotelem Gellius lib. 2. cap. 12." Solon's law in Aristotle; Gellius, book 2, chapter 12.

[7382] Burton. Printed page 360, t: "Nullum locum putes sine teste, semper adesse Deum cogita." Think of no place as without a witness; remember that God is always present.

[7383] Editor. Gellius, Attic Nights 2.12, records through Aristotle a law attributed to Solon penalizing neutrality during armed civil division. Gellius explains it as a means of ending strife through the intervention of responsible citizens. Burton's abbreviated counsel sits in tension with "maintain no factions" earlier in this catalogue.

[7384] Burton. Printed page 360, u: "Secretò amicos admone, lauda palam." Admonish friends privately; praise them openly.

[7385] Burton. Printed page 360, x: "Ut ameris amabilis esto. Eros & anteros gemelli Veneris, amatio & redamatio. Plat." To be loved, be lovable. Eros and Anteros, Venus's twins: love and love returned. Plato.

[7386] Editor. Ama tanquam osurus counsels guarding against the possibility that affection may turn into enmity. Amicus tardo fias is printed with tardo; its intended sense is "be slow to become a friend." The Eros/Anteros margin associates love with reciprocal love; its precise Plato reference remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Do not prostitute thy soul for gain. Make not a fool of thy self to make others merry. Marry not an old Crony or a fool for mony. Be not over sollicitous or curious. Seek that which may be found. Seem not greater then thou art. Take thy pleasure soberly. Ocymum ne terito.	"Do not sell your soul for profit. Do not make a fool of yourself to amuse others. Do not marry an old crone or a fool for money. Do not be excessively anxious or inquisitive. Seek what can be found. Do not seem greater than you are. Take your pleasure in moderation. Do not crush the basil."[7387]
[7388]Live merrily as thou canst. [7389]Take heed by other mens examples. Go as thou wouldst be met, sit as thou wouldst be found, [7390]yield to the time, follow the stream. Wilt thou live free from fears and cares? [7391]Live innocently, keep thy self upright, thou needest no other keeper, &c. Look for more in Isocrates, Seneca, Plutarch, Epictetus, &c. and for defect, consult with cheese-trenchers and painted cloths.	"Live as cheerfully as you can. Take warning from other people's examples. Go about as you would wish to be encountered; sit as you would wish to be found. Yield to the times; follow the current. Would you live free of fears and cares? Live innocently and keep yourself upright: you need no other guardian." Look for more in Isocrates, Seneca, Plutarch, Epictetus and the rest; and if these fail you, consult cheese-plates and painted cloth hangings.[7392]

[7387] Editor. "Old Crony" is rendered as an old crone in this mercenary-marriage context. Ocymum ne terito literally says "Do not crush the basil"; the proverb's intended application and precise source remain unresolved, so no speculative meaning is substituted in the modern text.

[7388] Burton. Printed page 360, y: "Dum fata sinunt vivite læti, Seneca." While the Fates permit, live joyfully. Seneca.

[7389] Burton. Printed page 360, z: "Id apprime in vita utile, ex aliis observare sibi quod ex usu siet. Ter." This is especially useful in life: to learn from others what may be of use to oneself. Terence.

[7390] Burton. Printed page 360, a: "Dum furor in cursu currenti cede furori. Cretizandum cum Crete. Temporibus servi, nec contra flamina flato." While rage runs its course, yield to its onward rush. With a Cretan one must play the Cretan. Accommodate yourself to the times, and do not blow against the winds. Crete is the form printed.

[7391] Burton. Printed page 360, b: "Nulla certior custodia innocentiâ: inexpugnabile munimentum munimento non egere." No protection is surer than innocence: to need no defence is an impregnable defence.

[7392] Editor. Cheese-trenchers are plates or flat boards for serving cheese. Such objects and painted cloth hangings could carry moral sayings; Burton closes his learned list by pointing to these everyday sources of wisdom. Several anonymous or abbreviated maxim attributions remain for full collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 361 Memb. 8. Against Melancholy it self.	Member 8 Against melancholy itself
Every man, saith, [7393]Seneca, thinks his own burthen the heaviest, and a melancholy man above all others complains most; weariness of life, abhorring all company and light, fear, sorrow, suspition, anguish of mind, bashfulness, and those other dread Symptomes of body and mind must needs aggravate this misery; yet conferred to other maladies, they are not so hainous as they be taken.	"Everyone," says Seneca, "thinks his own burden the heaviest," and a melancholy man complains more than anyone else. Weariness of life, aversion to all company and light, fear, sorrow, suspicion, anguish of mind, shyness and those other dreadful symptoms of body and mind must necessarily aggravate this misery. Yet, compared with other ailments, they are not as grievous as people suppose.[7394]
For first this disease is either in habit or disposition, curable or incurable. If new and in disposition, 'tis commonly pleasant, and it may be helped. If inveterate, or an habit, yet they have lucida intervalla, sometimes well, and sometimes ill; or if more continuate, as the [7395]Vejentes were to the Romans, 'tis hostis magis assiduus quàm gravis, a more durable enemy then dangerous: and amongst many inconveniences, some comforts are annexed to it.	First, this illness exists either as an established condition or as a passing disposition; it is either curable or incurable. If recent and a passing disposition, it is commonly pleasant and can be relieved. If longstanding or established, sufferers nevertheless have "lucid intervals," sometimes well and sometimes ill. Or, if it is more continuous, it resembles the people of Veii in their struggle with Rome: "an enemy more persistent than formidable"—more enduring than dangerous. Among its many disadvantages, some comforts accompany it.[7396]

[7393] Burton. Printed page 361, c: "Unicuiq; suum onus intolerabile videtur." To everyone his own burden seems unbearable.

[7394] Editor. "Conferred" means compared. Burton is using a consolatory argument to lessen the sufferer's sense of exceptional misery. His historical category of melancholy is broader than any single modern diagnosis; the minimizing comparison is retained as his claim.

[7395] Burton. Printed page 361, dagger: "Livius." Livy.

[7396] Editor. "Disposition" contrasts a passing or occasional state with an established "habit." "Pleasant" is the word printed, despite the surrounding account of suffering. Lucida intervalla means periods of clarity or relief. The Veii comparison adapts Livy 2.48.7, describing an enemy more persistent than formidable.

Original text 1651	Modern English
First it is not catching, and as Erasmus comforted himself, when he was grievously sick of the stone, though it was most troublesome, and an intolerable pain to him, yet it was no whit offensive to others, not lothsome to the spectators, gastly, fulsom, terrible, as plagues, apoplexies, leprosies, wounds, sores, tetters, pox, pestilent agues are, which either admit of no company, terrify or offend those that are present.	First, it is not contagious. Erasmus comforted himself in the same way when he was grievously ill with the stone: though it caused him great distress and intolerable pain, it was not at all offensive to other people, nor repulsive, ghastly, disgusting or terrifying to onlookers, as plague, apoplexy, leprosy, wounds, sores, skin eruptions, pox and pestilential fevers are. These either permit no company or frighten or disgust those present.[7397]
In this malady that which is, is wholly to themselves: and those symptomes not so dreadful, if they be compared to the opposite extreams. They are most part bashful, suspicious, solitary, &c. therefore no such ambitious, impudent intruders, as some are, no sharkers, no Cunnicatchers, no prolers, no smel-feasts, praters, panders, parasites, bawds, drunkards, whoremasters; necessity and defect compels them to be honest; as Mitio told Demea in the comedy,	In this illness, whatever suffering there is belongs entirely to the sufferers themselves; and its symptoms are not so dreadful when compared with the opposite extremes. Most are shy, suspicious and solitary; they are therefore not the ambitious, shameless intruders that some people are—not swindlers, confidence tricksters, prowlers, dinner-hunters, babblers, procurers, flatterers, bawds, drunkards or whoremongers. Necessity and lack of means compel them to be honest, as Micio told Demea in the comedy:[7398]
[7399]Hæc si neq; ego neq; tu fecimus, Non sinit egestas facere nos.	If neither you nor I have done these things, Poverty does not allow us to do them.[7400]
If we be honest, 'twas poverty made us so: if we melancholy men be not as bad as he that is worst, 'tis our dame melancholy kept us so:	If we are honest, poverty made us so; if we melancholy men are not as bad as the worst of them, our lady Melancholy has kept us that way:

[7397] Editor. "The stone" denotes urinary stone disease; "apoplexies" sudden paralytic attacks; "tetters" skin eruptions; "agues" fevers. The Erasmus anecdote is not given a specific source. Burton's grouping concerns contagion, appearance and company together, not a consistent medical classification.

[7398] Editor. A "sharker" exploits or cheats others; a "cunnicatcher" is a confidence trickster; "smel-feasts" seek out free dinners. Burton personifies melancholy as a restraint upon vice. Mitio is the printed form of Micio, a character in Terence's Brothers.

[7399] Burton. Printed page 361, unmarked: "Ter. Scen. 2. Adelphus." Terence, The Brothers, scene 2.

[7400] Editor. Terence, Adelphoe 101–102, in act 1 scene 2. The consulted Latin reads non siit, "did not allow," where Burton prints non sinit, "does not allow"; the modern translation preserves Burton's tense. His ensuing English gloss draws a general moral from the comic dialogue.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Non deerat voluntas sed facultas.	The will was not lacking, but the means were.
Besides they are freed in this from many other infirmities, solitariness makes them more apt to contemplate, suspition wary, which is a necessary humour in these times, [7401]Nam pol qui maxime cavet, is sæpe cautor captus est, he that takes most heed, is often circumvented & overtaken.	Besides, through this they are spared many other weaknesses. Solitude makes them more inclined to contemplation; suspicion makes them wary, a necessary disposition in these times. “For, by Pollux, even the man who takes the greatest care is often caught in spite of his caution”: the most watchful man is often outwitted and trapped.[7402]
Fear and sorrow keep them temperate and sober, and free them from many dissolute acts, which jollity and boldness thrust men upon: They are therefore no sicarii, roaring boyes, theeves or assassinates. As they are soon dejected, so they are as soon, by soft words and good perswasions reared. Wearisomness of life makes them they are not so besotted on the transitory vain pleasures of the world. If they dote in one thing, they are wise and well understanding in most other.	Fear and sorrow keep them moderate and sober, and spare them many dissolute acts into which high spirits and boldness drive people. They are therefore no cutthroats, swaggering ruffians, thieves or assassins. As they are quickly cast down, so gentle words and kindly persuasion quickly raise them again. Weariness of life keeps them from being so infatuated with the world’s fleeting, empty pleasures. If they are deluded on one subject, they are wise and sensible on most others.[7403]
If it be inveterate, they are insensati, most part doting, or quite mad, insensible of any wrongs, ridiculous to others, but most happy and secure to themselves. Dotage is a state which many much magnifie and commend: so is simplicity, & folly, as he said, hic furor [7404]ô superi, sit mihi perpetuus.	If it is longstanding, they are “without understanding,” mostly deluded or entirely mad, unaware of any wrongs done to them, ridiculous to others but, to themselves, perfectly happy and free from care. Many greatly extol and praise such a state of delusion, as they do simplicity and folly. As the poet said, “O gods above, may this madness be mine for ever.”[7405]

[7401] Burton. Printed page 361, d: “Plautus.”

[7402] Editor. Compare Plautus, Captivi 255–256: even the person who thinks he has taken precautions may be caught. Burton’s introductory wording varies from that text. Pol is an oath by Pollux. The separate English paraphrase is retained.

[7403] Editor. Sicarii are dagger-men or assassins; “roaring boys” are swaggering, quarrelsome young men. “Dote” here means be deluded or mentally disordered, not show affection. These are Burton’s sweeping consolatory generalizations.

[7404] Burton. Printed page 361, e: “Petronius Catul.” The printed abbreviation reads Catul.; the precise intended reference remains uncertain.

[7405] Editor. The margin reads “Petronius Catul.” A related line occurs in poems printed with Petronius as Errones Venerei: Hic furor? hic, superi, sit mihi perpetuus. Its speaker wishes to remain mad with love. Burton adapts the line to his paradoxical praise of folly; the exact edition and attribution require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 361–362 Some think fools and disards live the merriest lives, as Ajax in Sophocles, Nihil scire vita jucundissima, 'tis the pleasantest life to know nothing; iners malorum remedium ignorantia, ignorance is a down-right remedy of evils.	Some think fools and simpletons live the merriest lives, as Ajax says in Sophocles: "To know nothing is the pleasantest life"—ignorance makes life most pleasant. "Ignorance is an effortless remedy for troubles": ignorance is a downright remedy for evils.[7406]
Source page 362 These curious arts and laborious sciences, Galens, Tullies, Aristotles, Justinians, do but trouble the world some think; we might live better with that illiterate Virginian simplicity, and gross ignorance; entire Ideots do best, they are not macerated with cares, tormented with fears, and anxiety, as other wise men are:	Some think these intricate arts and laborious sciences—our Galens, Ciceros, Aristotles and Justinians—merely trouble the world. We might live better, they say, with the unlettered simplicity and complete ignorance they attribute to the people of Virginia. Those wholly without understanding fare best: they are not worn away by cares or tormented with fears and anxiety, as other, wiser people are.[7407]
for as [7408]he said, If folly were a pain, you should hear them houl, roar, and cry out in every house, as you go by in the street, but they are most free, jocund, and merry, and in some Countries, as amongst the [7409]Turks, honoured for Saints, and abundantly maintained out of the common stock.	For, as someone said, if folly were painful, you would hear people howl, roar and cry out in every house as you passed along the street. Instead, they are entirely carefree, cheerful and merry; and in some countries, as among the Turks, they are honoured as saints and generously supported from the common fund.[7410]

[7406] Editor. Ajax 554, in the address to Eurysaces, supplies the thought that life without awareness is sweetest. This locates the first saying; Burton's Latin intermediary and the following iners malorum remedium ignorantia remain unidentified. Iners suggests requiring no activity or skill; Burton's "down-right" means thorough or outright. The two formulations are translated separately.

[7407] Editor. Galen, Cicero, Aristotle and Justinian stand respectively for medicine, eloquence, philosophy and law. The reference to Virginia repeats a European colonial stereotype of Indigenous peoples as unlettered and ignorant; it is Burton's reported comparison, not an assessment adopted by this edition. "Macerated" means worn down.

[7408] Burton. Printed page 362, dagger: "Parmeno Cælestinæ, Act. 8. Si stultitia dolor esset, in nulla non domo ejulatus audires." Pármeno in Celestina, act 8. If folly were painful, there would not be a house in which you did not hear wailing.

[7409] Burton. Printed page 362, f: "Busbequius. Sands lib. 1. fol. 89." Busbecq; Sandys, book 1, folio 89.

[7410] Editor. Pármeno is a character in Celestina. Burton's act 8 attribution and the exact Latin translation remain to be verified. His generalization about Ottoman treatment of people regarded as fools or mad cites Busbecq and George Sandys; those passages have not yet been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They are no dissemblers, lyers, hypocrites, for fools and mad men tell commonly truth. [7411]In a word as they are distressed, so are they pittied, which some hold better then to be envied, better to be sad then merry, better to be foolish and quiet, quàm sapere & ringi, to be wise and still vexed; better to be miserable then happy: of two extremes it is the best.	They are no dissemblers, liars or hypocrites, for fools and mad people generally tell the truth. In a word, as they suffer distress, so they receive pity —which some think better than being envied: better to be sad than merry, better to be foolish and at peace “than to be wise and fret”—wise and perpetually vexed; better to be miserable than happy. Of the two extremes, this is the better.[7412]

[7411] Burton. Printed page 362, dagger: “Quis hodie beatior, quam cui licet stultum esse, & eorundam immunitatibus frui. Sat. Menip.” Who today is happier than someone allowed to be a fool and enjoy the privileges of such people? Menippean Satire. The unanchored margin is attached here editorially; its exact work remains unidentified.

[7412] Editor. The Menippean Satire note has no secure point of attachment in the body; it is placed beside the concluding paradox. “Secure” earlier means free from care. Burton ends the section with the deliberately paradoxical claim that the apparently unfortunate may suffer less inwardly.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SECT. 4.	Section 4
Memb. 1. Subsect. 1. Of Physick which cureth with Medicines.	Member 1 Subsection 1 Medical treatment by medicines
After a long and tedious discourse of these six non-naturall things, and their severall rectifications, all which are comprehended in Diet, I am come now at last to Pharmaceutice, or that kinde of Physick which cureth by Medicines, which Apothecaries most part make, mingle, or sell in their shops.	After a long and tedious discussion of these six non-natural things and their several adjustments, all of which come under regimen, I have now at last reached pharmaceutics: the branch of medicine that cures through remedies, which apothecaries generally prepare, compound or sell in their shops.[7413]
Many cavill at this kinde of Physick, & hold it unnecessary, unprofitable to this or any other disease, because those countries which use it least, live longest, and are best in health, as [7414]Hector Boethius relates of the Isles of Orcades, the people are still sound of Body and minde, without any use of Physick, they live commonly 120 yeers, and Ortelius in his Itinerary of the inhabitants of the Forrest of Arden, [7415]they are very painfull, long-lived, sound, &c.	Many find fault with this kind of medicine and consider it unnecessary and useless for this or any other illness, because the countries that use it least enjoy the longest lives and the best health. Hector Boece reports that the people of the Orkney Islands remain sound in body and mind without using medicine, and commonly live for 120 years. Ortelius likewise says in his Itinerary that the inhabitants of the Forest of Arden "are very hardworking, long-lived and healthy," and so on.[7416]

[7413] Editor. The six "non-naturals" are the traditional external or regulative factors: air; food and drink; exercise and rest; sleeping and waking; evacuation and retention; and the passions. "Diet" encompasses the whole regimen. Pharmaceutice names treatment through medicines, as distinguished from the regulation just discussed.

[7414] Burton. Printed page 362, g: "Lib. Hist." Book of history; attached to Hector Boece.

[7415] Burton. Printed page 362, dagger: "Parvo viventes laboriosi, longævi, suo contenti, ad centum annos vivunt." Living on little, hardworking, long-lived and content with what they have, they live to a hundred years.

[7416] Editor. Hector Boethius is Hector Boece, the Scottish historian, not the author of the Consolation. Orcades is Orkney. "Painfull" means hardworking; the Forest of Arden here is the continental Ardennes. The extraordinary ages are reported claims; Burton's Boece and Ortelius references remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7417]Martianus Capella, speaking of the Indians of his time, saith, they were (much like our western Indians now) bigger then ordinary men, bred coursly, very long-lived, in so much, that he that died at an hundred yeers of age, went before his time, &c.	Martianus Capella, speaking of the Indians of his time, says that they were, much like the Indians of the West in our own day, "larger than ordinary men, roughly brought up and very long-lived, so that anyone who died at a hundred died before his time," and so on.[7418]
Damianus A-Goes, Saxo Grammaticus, Aubanus Bohemus, say the like of them that live in Norway, Lapland, Finmark, Biarmia, Corelia, all over Scandia, and those Northern Countries, they are most healthfull, and very long-lived, in which places there is no use at all of Physick, the name of it is not once heard.	Damião de Góis, Saxo Grammaticus and Johannes Boemus say the same of those who live in Norway, Lapland, Finnmark, Biarmia, Karelia, throughout Scandinavia and in those northern countries: they are exceptionally healthy and long-lived, although medicine is never used there and its very name is unheard of.[7419]
Dithmarus Bleskenius in his accurate description of Island 1607, makes mention amongst other matters, of the Inhabitants, and their manner of living, [7420]which is dried fish in stead of bread, butter, cheese, and salt meats, most part they drink water and whey, and yet without Physick or Physitian, they live many of them 250 yeers. I finde the same relation by Lerius, and some other Writers of Indians in America.	Dithmar Blefken, in his accurate description of Iceland published in 1607, mentions, among other things, the inhabitants and their way of life: "They eat dried fish instead of bread, butter, cheese and salted meat, and chiefly drink water and whey; yet without medicine or physician many of them live for 250 years." I find the same account in Léry and some other writers on the Indians of America.[7421]

[7417] Burton. Printed page 362, asterisk: "Lib. 6. de Nup. Philol. Ultra humanam fragilitatem prolixi, ut immaturè pereat qui centenarius moriatur, &c." Book 6 of The Marriage of Philology. Their lives extend beyond human frailty, so that one who dies at a hundred dies prematurely, and so on. The body uses a dagger at this citation.

[7418] Editor. Capella's Indians are inhabitants of India; Burton compares them with Indigenous peoples of the Americas, his "western Indians." "Bred coursly" means brought up roughly or on coarse fare. The shortened Capella citation is preserved, with its precise passage still unverified.

[7419] Editor. The names are modernized as Damião de Góis and Johannes Boemus. Scandia is the northern Scandinavian region; Biarmia is a historical northern geographical name, and Corelia is Karelia. Burton's broad claim that medicine was unknown throughout these regions is left as an attributed report, not endorsed as fact.

[7420] Burton. Printed page 362, h: "Victus eorum caseo & lacte consistit, potus aqua & serum; pisces loco panis habent; ita multos annos sæpe 250 absq; medico & medicinâ vivunt." Their food consists of cheese and milk; their drink is water and whey. They have fish instead of bread, and thus live many years, often 250, without a physician or medicine.

[7421] Editor. Island means Iceland; Lerius is Jean de Léry. The claim of 250-year lives is transcribed without correction. Burton's description of Blefken as "accurate" is retained, but neither that assessment nor the longevity claim has been independently established here. His English list of foods differs from the shorter Latin marginal list; both are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 362–363 Paulus Jovius in his description of Brittain, and [7422]Levinus Lemnius, observe as much of this our Island, that there was of old no use of Physick amongst us, and but little at this day, except it be for a few nice idle citizens, surfetting Courtiers, and stall-fed Gentlemen lubbers. The country people use kitchin Physick, and common experience tells us, that they live freest from all manner of infirmities, that make least use of Apothecaries Physick.	Paolo Giovio, in his description of Britain, and Levinus Lemnius make the same observation about our own island: in former times medicine was not used among us, and it is little used even now, except by a few fastidious, idle townsmen, overfed courtiers and stall-fed, loutish gentlemen. Country people use kitchen remedies, and common experience tells us that those who use apothecaries' medicines least live most free of every kind of infirmity.[7423]
Source page 363 Many are overthrown by preposterous use of it, and thereby get their bane, that might otherwise have escaped; [7424]some think Physitians kill as many as they save, and who can tell,	Many are ruined by its improper use, and meet their death through it when they might otherwise have escaped. Some think physicians kill as many as they save; and who can tell—[7425]
[7426]Quot Themison ægros autumno occiderit uno?	How many patients Themison killed in a single autumn?[7427]

[7422] Burton. Printed page 362, i: "Lib. de 4. complex." Book on the four complexions; Levinus Lemnius.

[7423] Editor. "Nice" means fastidious or delicate. "Stall-fed" likens pampered gentlemen to fattened livestock; "lubbers" are clumsy or idle fellows. "Kitchin Physick" means domestic remedies. This opens an argument against professional medicine which Burton develops in the following discussion; it is historical polemic, not an instruction to avoid treatment.

[7424] Burton. Printed page 363, asterisk: "Per mortes agunt experimenta & animas nostras negotiantur; & quod aliis exitiale hominem occidere, iis impunitas summa. Plinius." They conduct experiments through deaths and trade in our lives; while killing a person is fatal to others, they enjoy complete impunity. Pliny.

[7425] Editor. "Preposterous" means ill-ordered or improper; "bane" is ruin or death. Burton continues the prosecution of medicine begun in the preceding discussion. He explicitly reverses this rhetorical position later in this discussion, distinguishing medical practice from its abuses.

[7426] Burton. Printed page 363, k: "Juven." Juvenal.

[7427] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 10.221. Themison is the physician named in the satirical catalogue. Autumno means "in autumn"; Burton's following English expands this to "in a year." The fresh translation and his separate gloss are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
How many murders they make in a yeer, quibus impunè licet hominem occidere, that may freely kill folks and have a reward for it, and according to the * Dutch proverb, a new Physician must have a new Church-yard; and who daily observes it not? Many that did ill under Physitians hands, have happily escaped, when they have been given over by them, left to God and Nature, and themselves;	How many murders they commit in a year, "those who are allowed to kill a person with impunity"—who may freely kill people and be paid for it! As the Dutch proverb says, a new physician must have a new churchyard. Who does not observe it daily? Many who fared badly in physicians' hands have fortunately recovered after the doctors gave them up, leaving them to God, nature and themselves.[7428]
'Twas Plinies dilemma of old, [7429]Every disease is either curable or incurable, a man recovers of it, or is killed by it; both wayes Physick is to be rejected. If it be deadly, it cannot be cured: if it may be helped, it requires no Physitian, Nature will expell it of it selfe.	This was Pliny's old dilemma: "Every disease is either curable or incurable: a person recovers from it or is killed by it. Either way, medicine must be rejected. If it is fatal, it cannot be cured; if it can be remedied, it needs no physician, for nature will expel it by itself."[7430]
Plato made it a great signe of an intemperate and corrupt commonwealth, where Lawyers and Physitians did abound; and the Romans distasted them so much, that they were often banished out of their city, as Pliny and Celsus relate, for 600 yeers not admitted.	Plato considered an abundance of lawyers and physicians a strong sign of an intemperate and corrupt commonwealth. The Romans disliked physicians so much that they were often banished from their city; according to Pliny and Celsus, they were not admitted for 600 years.[7431]

[7428] Editor. The Pliny margin adapts Natural History 29.18, on fatal experiments and physicians' impunity. The second asterisk beside "Dutch proverb" has no separate matching marginal container; it is retained in the original without inventing a note. "Dutch" may refer broadly to German-speaking as well as Netherlandish usage.

[7429] Burton. Printed page 363, l: "Omnis morbus lethalis aut curabilis; in vitam desinit aut in mortem. Utroq; igitur modo medicina inutilis; si lethalis, curari non potest; si curabilis, non requirit medicum; Natura expellet." Every disease is fatal or curable; it ends in life or death. In either case, therefore, medicine is useless: if fatal, it cannot be cured; if curable, it needs no physician; nature will expel it.

[7430] Editor. A dilemma offers two alternatives supposedly leading to the same conclusion. Here recovery is credited to nature and fatal illness deemed incurable, excluding treatment by definition. Burton's exact source for this argument under Pliny's name remains to be located.

[7431] Editor. Compare Plato, Republic 405a–d, on doctors and courts as signs of disordered living. Pliny, Natural History 29.11, says Rome lacked physicians for over six hundred years, but not medicine; 29.12–16 describes Archagathus and Cato's hostility. At 29.16 physicians were exempted from an expulsion of Greeks, contrary to Burton's repeated-banishment claim. The Celsus reference remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is no art at all, as some hold, no not worthy the name of a liberall science (nor Law neither) as [7432]Pet. And. Canonherius a Patritian of Rome and a great Doctor himself, one of their own tribe, proves by 16 arguments, because it is mercenary as now used, base, and as Fidlers play for a reward. Juridicis, medicis, fisco, fas vivere rapto, tis a corrupt trade, no science, art, no profession; the beginning, practice, and progresse of it, all is naught, full of imposture, incertainty, and doth generally more harm then good.	Some hold that it is no art at all, not even worthy of the name of a liberal science—and neither is law. Pietro Andrea Canonhiero, a Roman patrician and himself a distinguished doctor, "one of their own tribe," proves this by sixteen arguments: as now practised, it is mercenary and base, like fiddlers playing for pay. "Lawyers, physicians and the treasury may lawfully live by plunder." It is a corrupt trade, no science, art or profession; its origins, practice and development are all bad, full of deceit and uncertainty, and it generally does more harm than good.[7433]
The Divell himself was the first inventer of it: Inventum est medicina meum, said Apollo, and what was Apollo, but the Divell? The Greeks first made an Art of it, and they were all deluded by Apollo's sons, Priests, Oracles. If we may beleeve Varro, Pliny, Columella, most of their best medicines were derived from his Oracles.	The devil himself first invented it. "Medicine is my invention," said Apollo—and what was Apollo but the devil? The Greeks first made an art of it, and they were all deceived by Apollo's sons, priests and oracles. If we may believe Varro, Pliny and Columella, most of their best medicines came from his oracles.[7434]
Æsculapius his son had his temples erected to his Diety, and did many famous cures, but as Lactantius holds, he was a Magician, a meer Impostor, and as his successors, Phaon, Podalirius, Melampius, Menecrates (another God) by charmes, spells, and ministery of bad spirits, performed most of their cures.	His son Aesculapius had temples erected to his divinity and performed many famous cures. Yet, as Lactantius holds, he was a magician, a mere impostor, and, like his successors Phaon, Podalirius, Melampius and Menecrates—another god—performed most of these cures through charms, spells and the service of evil spirits.[7435]

[7432] Burton. Printed page 363, dagger: "In interpretationes politico-morales in 7. Aporism. Hippoc. libros." In the political and moral interpretations of the seven books of Hippocrates' Aphorisms. The abbreviated form Aporism. is retained.

[7433] Editor. Canonherius is Pietro Andrea Canonhiero; the precise sixteen-argument passage has not been collated. "Liberal science" contrasts learned, supposedly disinterested study with work done for payment. Fiscus is the public or imperial treasury. The satirical Latin maxim does not express an actual legal permission to steal.

[7434] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.521, has inventum medicina meum est, with the same meaning but a different word order. Apollo speaks while pursuing Daphne; his inability to cure his own love supplies the poem's irony. Calling him the devil belongs to the polemical argument Burton is assembling.

[7435] Editor. Aesculapius is Asclepius, Apollo's healing son. Lactantius, Divine Institutes 1.10, discusses his mortal origins, healing and death; the consulted English text does not establish Burton's claim that he was a magician. The sequence of healers and its intermediary remain uncollated. Burton's demonizing prosecution is followed later by praise of the founders.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The first that ever wrote in Physick to any purpose, was Hippocrates, and his Disciple and Commentator Galen, whom Scaliger cals Fimbriam Hippocratis, but as [7436]Cardan censures them, both immethodicall and obscure, as all those old ones are, their precepts confused, their medicines obsolete, and now most part rejected.	The first to write anything worthwhile on medicine were Hippocrates and his disciple and commentator Galen, whom Scaliger calls "the fringe of Hippocrates." But Cardano criticizes both as disorganized and obscure, like all those ancient writers: their precepts confused, their medicines obsolete and now mostly rejected.[7437]
Those cures which they did, Paracelsus holds, were rather done out of their Patients confidence, and [7438]good opinion they had of them, then out of any skill of theirs, which was very small, he saith, they themselves Idiots and Infants, as are all their Academicall followers.	Paracelsus holds that the cures they achieved owed more to their patients' confidence and good opinion of them than to their own skill, which, he says, was very slight. They themselves were ignorant men and mere children, as are all their academic followers.[7439]

[7436] Burton. Printed page 363, m: "Præfat. de contrad. med." Preface to On Medical Contradictions; Cardano.

[7437] Editor. "Disciple" need not mean a personal pupil: Galen lived centuries after Hippocrates. Fimbria is a fringe or hem, making Galen a mere appendage to Hippocrates. The exact Scaliger and Cardano passages remain for collation.

[7438] Burton. Printed page 363, n: "Opinio facit medicos: a fair gowne, a velvet cap, the name of a Doctor is all in all." Reputation makes physicians. Burton follows the Latin with his own English comment on the outward signs of professional standing.

[7439] Editor. "Idiots" here means ignorant or unlearned people; "infants" makes them intellectual children. The margin stresses reputation, academic dress and title. Burton reports a claim about confidence in treatment; this should not be equated without qualification with a modern clinical account of placebo effects.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 363–364 The Arabians received it from the Greeks, and so the Latines, adding new precepts and medicines of their own, but so imperfect still, that through ignorance of Professors, Impostors, Mountebanks, Empericks, disagreeing of Sectaries, (which are as many almost as there be diseases) envy, covetousnesse, and the like, they doe much harm amongst us. They are so different in their consultations, prescriptions, mistaking many times the parties constitution, [7440]disease, and causes of it, they give quite contrary Physick; [7441]one saith this, another that, out of singularity or opposition, as he said of Adrian, multitudo medicorum principem interfecit, a multitude of Physitians hath killed the Emperour; Plus à medico quam à morbo periculi, more danger there is from the Physician, then from the disease.	The Arabs received medicine from the Greeks, and the Latins did likewise, adding new precepts and medicines of their own. Yet it remains so imperfect that practitioners' ignorance, impostors, mountebanks, empirics, the disagreements of sects—almost as numerous as diseases—envy, greed and the like cause much harm among us. They differ so greatly in their consultations and prescriptions, often misunderstanding the patient's constitution, disease and its causes, that they prescribe wholly contrary medicines. "One says this, another that," from a desire to be different or simply to contradict. As someone said of Hadrian, "a multitude of doctors killed the ruler": a multitude of physicians killed the emperor. "There is more danger from the physician than from the disease"—more danger from the doctor than the illness.[7442]
Source page 364 Besides, there is much Imposture and malice amongst them. [7443]All arts (saith Cardan) admit of couzening, Physick amongst the rest, doth appropriate it to her selfe; and tells a story of one Curtius a Physician in Venice, because he was a stranger, and practised among them, the rest of the Physitians did still crosse him in all his precepts.	Besides, there is much deceit and malice among them. "All arts," says Cardano, "admit cheating; medicine, among the rest, makes it peculiarly its own." He tells of a physician named Curtius in Venice: because he was an outsider practising among them, the other physicians continually contradicted all his instructions.[7444]

[7440] Burton. Printed page 363, asterisk: "Morbus alius pro alio curatur; aliud remedium pro alio." One disease is treated for another; one remedy is used in place of another.

[7441] Burton. Printed page 363, o: "Contrarias proferunt sententias. Card." They express contrary opinions. Cardano.

[7442] Editor. "Professors" are practitioners; "sectaries" adherents of competing medical schools. An empiric relies on practical experience rather than university theory, though the term can also imply a quack. Cassius Dio 69.22.4 reports Hadrian himself uttering the saying about many physicians; Burton's "as he said of Adrian" leaves the speaker indefinite.

[7443] Burton. Printed page 364, p: "Lib. 3. de sap. Omnes artes fraudem admittunt, sola medicina sponte eam accersit." Book 3 of On Wisdom. All arts admit fraud; medicine alone invites it of its own accord.

[7444] Editor. "Couzening" means cheating; "stranger" here is an outsider, not an unknown patient. The marginal Latin says medicine actively invites fraud, a stronger formulation than merely admitting it. The Curtius anecdote has not yet been collated directly with Cardano.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If he prescribed hot medicines, they would prescribe cold, miscentes pro calidis frigida, pro frigidis humida, pro purgantibus astringentia, binders for purgatives, omnia perturbabant. If the party miscarried, Curtium damnabant, Curtius killed him, that disagreed from them: If he recovered, then [7445]they cured him themselves.	If he prescribed hot medicines, they prescribed cold ones, "mixing cold remedies in place of hot, moist in place of cold, astringents in place of purgatives"—binding medicines instead of purges; "they threw everything into confusion." If the patient died, "they condemned Curtius": Curtius, who disagreed with them, had killed him. If he recovered, then they themselves had cured him.[7446]
Much emulation, imposture, malice, there is amongst them: if they be honest, and mean well, yet a knave Apothecary that administers the Physick, and makes the medicine, may do infinite harm, by his old obsolete doses, adulterine druggs, bad mixtures, a quid pro quo, &c. See Fuchsius lib. 1. sect. 1. cap. 8. Cordus Dispensatory, and Brassivola's Examen simpl. &c.	There is much rivalry, deceit and malice among them. Even if they are honest and mean well, a dishonest apothecary who prepares and administers the medicine may do boundless harm through stale, outworn preparations, adulterated drugs, bad mixtures, substituting one ingredient for another, and so on. See Fuchs, book 1, section 1, chapter 8; Cordus's Dispensatory; and Brasavola's Examination of Simples, among others.[7447]

[7445] Burton. Printed page 364, q: "Omnis ægrotus propriâ culpâ perit, sed nemo nisi medici beneficio restituitur. Agrippa." Every sick person dies through his own fault, but no one recovers except through the physician's help. Agrippa.

[7446] Editor. Hot, cold and moist are humoral qualities; the unusual Latin opposition of moist to cold is retained. Astringents bind, purgatives evacuate; "miscarried" means died. Compare Agrippa, Vanity, chapter 83, in the later 1676 English translation, pp. 288–289: patients get the blame for deaths, physicians the credit for cures. This locates the marginal thought, not its Latin wording or the Curtius story.

[7447] Editor. Quid pro quo literally means one thing for another: here the substitution of an ingredient, with a suggestion of deception or danger. Cordus's Dispensatory and Brasavola's Examination of Simples are pharmaceutical works. The particular passages in the three cited authors remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But it is their ignorance that doth more harm then rashness, their Art is wholly conjecturall, if it be an art, uncertain, imperfect, and got by killing of men, they are a kind of butchers, leeches, men-slayers; Chirurgeons and Apothecaries especially, that are indeed the Physicians hangmen, carnifices, and common executioners; though to say truth, Physicians themselves come not far behinde; for according to that facete Epigram of Maximilianus Urentius, what's the difference?	But their ignorance does more harm than their rashness. Their art—if it is an art—is wholly conjectural, uncertain, imperfect, and learned by killing people. They are a sort of butchers, leeches and killers, especially surgeons and apothecaries, who are indeed the physicians' hangmen, "executioners," and public headsmen. Yet, to tell the truth, physicians themselves are not far behind. For, according to that witty epigram by Maximilianus Urentius, what is the difference?[7448]
Chirurgus medico quo differt? scilicet isto, Enecat hic succis, enecat ille manu: Carnifice hoc ambo tantum differre videntur, Tardius hi faciunt, quod facit ille citò.	How does a surgeon differ from a physician? In this: The physician kills with drugs, the surgeon with his hand. Both seem to differ from the executioner only in this: They do more slowly what he does quickly.
But I return to their skill; many diseases they cannot cure at all, as Apoplexie, Epilepsie, Stone, Strangury, Gout,	But I return to their skill. Many diseases they cannot cure at all: apoplexy, epilepsy, stone, strangury, gout,[7449]
Tollere nodosam nescit medicina Podagram;	Medicine cannot remove the knotted swellings of gout.[7450]

[7448] Editor. "Leech" could itself mean a physician, while the surrounding insults exploit its parasitic associations. "Facete" means witty. The epigram contrasts death by medical drugs with death by the surgeon's hand, then makes both slower executioners. Its author and exact source under the printed name Urentius remain unresolved.

[7449] Editor. Historical disease terms: apoplexy denotes a sudden disabling or paralytic attack; "stone" urinary stones; strangury difficult and painful passage of urine. These categories do not map perfectly onto present diagnoses, and Burton's assertions about incurability describe his period's debate.

[7450] Editor. Ovid, Epistulae ex Ponto 1.3.23. Nodosam describes the knotted or nodular swellings of gout. Burton sets this line apart within his list of illnesses; its position is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Quartan Agues, a common ague sometimes stumbles them all, they cannot so much as ease, they know not how to judge of it. If by Pulses, that doctrine some hold, is wholly superstitious, and I dare boldly say with [7451]Andrew Dudeth, that variety of pulses described by Galen, is neither observed nor understood of any. And for urine, that is meretrix medicorum, the most deceitfull thing of all, as Forestus & some other Physicians have proved at large.	Quartan fevers—even an ordinary fever sometimes baffles them all. They cannot so much as relieve it; they do not know how to assess it. By the pulse? Some hold that doctrine wholly superstitious, and I dare say boldly with Andrew Dudith that "the various pulses described by Galen are neither observed nor understood by anyone." As for urine, it is "the physicians' whore," the most deceitful thing of all, as Pieter van Foreest and some other physicians have shown at length.[7452]
I say nothing of Critick dayes, errours in Indications, &c. The most rationall of them, and skilfull, are so often deceived, that as [7453]Tholosanus infers, I had rather beleeve and commit my selfe to a meer Emperick, then to a meer Doctor, and I cannot sufficiently commend that custome of the Babylonians, that have no professed Physicians, but bring all their patients to the market to be cured: which Herodotus relates of the Ægyptians: Strabo, Sardus, and Aubanus Bohemus of many other nations.	I say nothing of critical days, errors in indications, and so on. Even the most rational and skilful are so often mistaken that Tholosanus concludes: "I would rather trust and entrust myself to a mere empiric than to a mere doctor; and I cannot praise enough the Babylonians' custom of having no professional physicians, but bringing all their patients to the marketplace to be cured." Herodotus reports this of the Egyptians; Strabo, Sardus and Johannes Boemus report it of many other peoples.[7454]

[7451] Burton. Printed page 364, r: "Lib. 3. Crat. ep. Wenceslao Raphæno. Ausim dicere, tot pulsuum differentias, quæ describuntur à Galeno, nec à quoquam intelligi, nec observari posse." Crato, book 3, letter to Wenceslaus Raphænus. I would venture to say that all the differences of pulse described by Galen can neither be understood nor observed by anyone.

[7452] Editor. A quartan fever recurs every fourth day by inclusive counting. Pulse distinctions and examination of urine were major diagnostic methods. Meretrix medicorum literally calls urine the physicians' prostitute, implying a seductive and unreliable guide. Burton's body attributes the pulse judgment to Dudith; the margin locates it in Crato's collected correspondence.

[7453] Burton. Printed page 364, s: "Lib. 28. cap. 7. syntax. art. mirab. Mallem ego expertis credere solum, quam merè ratiocinantibus: neq; satis laudare possum institutum Babylonicum &c." Book 28, chapter 7, Syntaxis of the Marvellous Arts. I would rather trust those experienced in practice alone than those who merely reason; nor can I sufficiently praise the Babylonian custom, and so on.

[7454] Editor. "Critical days" were days believed to determine a disease's turning point; "indications" signs guiding treatment. Herodotus 1.197 gives the marketplace custom to the Babylonians; 2.84 describes medical specialization among Egyptians. Burton conflates the two in his transition, then reproduces the Egyptian specialization in the margin. Tholosanus's wording awaits direct collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 364–365 And those that prescribed Physick amongst them did not so arrogantly take upon them to cure all diseases, as our professours do, but some one, some another, as their skill and experience did serve; [7455]One cured the eyes, a second the teeth, a third the head, another the lower parts, &c. not for gain, but in charity, to do good, they made neither art, profession, nor trade of it, which in other places was accustomed:	Those who prescribed medicine among them did not arrogantly undertake to cure every disease, as our practitioners do. One treated this, another that, according to their skill and experience: "One treated the eyes, a second the teeth, a third the head, another the lower parts," and so on. They worked for charity and to do good, not for profit, making no art, profession or trade of it, as was customary elsewhere.
Source page 365 and therefore Cambises in [7456]Xenophon told Cyrus, that to his thinking, Physicians were like Taylers and Coblers, the one mended our sick bodies, as the other did our cloaths. But I will urge these cavelling and contumelious arguments no farther, lest some Physician should mistake me, and deny me Physick when I am sick: for my part, I am well perswaded of Physick: I can distinguish the abuse from the use, in this and many other Arts, and Sciences: [7457]Aliud vinum, aliud ebrietas, wine and drunkennesse are two distinct things.	Thus Cambyses, in Xenophon, told Cyrus that, in his view, "physicians were like tailors and cobblers: they mended our sick bodies as the others mended our clothes." But I will press these carping, insulting arguments no further, lest some physician misunderstand me and refuse me medicine when I am ill. For my part, I think well of medicine: in this, as in many other arts and sciences, I can distinguish its abuse from its use. "Wine is one thing, drunkenness another": wine and drunkenness are two distinct things.[7458]

[7455] Burton. Printed page 364, dagger: "Herod. Euterpe de Ægyptiis. Apud eos singulorum morborum sunt singuli medici, alius curat oculos, alius dentes, alius caput, partes occultas alius." Herodotus, Euterpe, on the Egyptians. Among them each disease has its own physicians: one treats the eyes, another the teeth, another the head, another the hidden parts.

[7456] Burton. Printed page 365, dagger: "Cyrop. lib. 1. Velut vestium fractarum resarcinatores &c." Cyropaedia, book 1. Like menders of torn clothes, and so on.

[7457] Burton. Printed page 365, dagger: "Chrys. hom." Chrysostom, homily; no number is supplied.

[7458] Editor. Xenophon, Cyropaedia 1.6.16, compares doctors to menders of torn clothes; Burton adds cobblers. His joke about being refused treatment turns accusation into defence. Compare Chrysostom, Homily 1 on the Statues, §§11–12, which distinguishes wine from drunkenness and misuse. The English comparison supports the contrast; Burton's precise Latin formulation and edition remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I acknowledge it a most noble and divine science, in so much that Apollo, Æsculapius, and the first founders of it, meritò pro diis habiti, were worthily counted Gods by succeeding ages, for the excellency of their invention. And whereas Apollo at Delos, Venus at Cyprus, Diana at Ephesus, and those other Gods were confined and adored alone in some peculiar places: Æsculapius had his Temples, and Altars everywhere, in Corinth, Lacedæmon, Athens, Thebes, Epidaure, &c. Pausanias records, for the latitude of his art, diety, worth, and necessity.	I acknowledge it as a most noble and divine science, so much so that Apollo, Aesculapius and its earliest founders were "deservedly regarded as gods"—rightly counted gods by later ages for the excellence of their invention. Whereas Apollo at Delos, Venus at Cyprus, Diana at Ephesus and those other gods were confined to worship in particular places, Aesculapius had temples and altars everywhere—in Corinth, Sparta, Athens, Thebes, Epidaurus and elsewhere, as Pausanias records—because of the wide reach of his art, divinity, worth and necessity.[7459]
With all vertuous and wise men therefore I honour the name, and calling, as I am enjoyned to honour the Physician for necessities sake. The knowledge of the Physician lifteth up his head, and in the sight of great men he shall be admired. The Lord hath created medicines of the earth, and he that is wise will not abhorre them, Eccles. 58.1. But of this noble subject how many panegyricks are worthily written? For my part, as Salust said of Carthage, præstat silere, quam pauca dicere; I have said,	Together with all virtuous and wise people, therefore, I honour the name and calling, as I am commanded to "honour the physician because of your need of him. The physician's knowledge raises his standing, and he will be admired in the sight of great men. The Lord has created medicines from the earth, and a wise person will not reject them"—Ecclesiasticus 58:1. How many worthy panegyrics have been written on this noble subject! For my part, as Sallust said of Carthage, "it is better to be silent than to say too little." I have finished.[7460]

[7459] Editor. Merito pro diis habiti and Burton's following English are translated separately. His account of the geographical reach of the cults is a rhetorical comparison, not a complete map of ancient worship. The specific Pausanias passages remain for collation.

[7460] Editor. The scan prints "Eccles. 58.1"; the words are from Ecclesiasticus, or Sirach, 38:1, 3–4. The printed number is retained and corrected here. Burton's Sallust phrase paraphrases Jugurthine War 19.2, on saying too little about Carthage. "I have said" is a conventional declaration that the speaker has finished, immediately undercut by one further addition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
yet One thing I will adde, that this kinde of Physick is very moderately and advisedly to be used, upon good occasion, when the former of diet will not take place. And 'tis no other which I say, then that which Arnoldus prescribes in his 8. Aphorism. [7461]A discreet and godly Physician doth first endeavour to expell a disease by medicinall diet, then by pure medicine: and in his ninth, [7462]he that may be cured by diet, must not meddle with Physick.	Yet I will add one thing: this kind of medicine should be used very moderately and thoughtfully, when there is good reason and the treatment by regimen discussed earlier will not work. I say only what Arnoldus prescribes in his eighth aphorism: "A prudent and godly physician first tries to expel disease by medicinal diet, and then by medicines alone"; and in his ninth: "A person who can be cured by diet must not resort to drugs."[7463]
So in 11. Aphorism. [7464]A modest and wise Physician, will never hasten to use medicines, but upon urgent necessity, and that sparingly too: because (as he addes in his 13. Aphorism.) [7465]Whosoever takes much Physick in his youth, shall soon bewail it in his old age: Purgative Physick especially, which doth much debilitate nature.	So, in his eleventh aphorism: "A restrained and wise physician will never hurry to use medicines except under urgent necessity, and even then sparingly." For, as he adds in his thirteenth: "Whoever takes much medicine in youth will soon regret it in old age"—especially purgative medicine, which greatly weakens the body's natural powers.

[7461] Burton. Printed page 365, t: "Prudens & pius medicus, morbum ante expellere satagit, cibis medicinalibus, quam puris medicinis." A prudent and godly physician strives to expel disease by medicinal foods before using medicines alone.

[7462] Burton. Printed page 365, u: "Cuicunq; potest per alimenta restitui sanitas, fugiendus est penitus usus medicamentorum." For anyone whose health can be restored through food, the use of drugs should be avoided altogether.

[7463] Editor. "Diet" includes regimen; "pure medicine" means medicines as such, contrasted with medicinal foods. Arnald of Villanova's Medicationis parabole II.8, 9, 11 and 13 supply these aphorisms (Latin text printed by Giralt, pp. 82–83). Wording differs: II.13 includes sepius, "often," absent from Burton's Latin margin but reflected in his English "much." His printed quotations remain unchanged.

[7464] Burton. Printed page 365, x: "Modestus & sapiens medicus, nunquam properabit ad Pharmaciam, nisi cogente necessitate." A restrained and wise physician will never hurry to drug treatment unless necessity compels him.

[7465] Burton. Printed page 365, y: "Quicunq; pharmacatur in juventute, deflebit in senectute." Whoever takes drugs in youth will weep for it in old age.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For which causes some Physicians refrain from the use of Purgatives, or else sparingly use them. [7466]Henricus Ayrerus in a consultation for a melancholy person, would have him take as few purges as he could, because there be no such medicines, which do not steal away some of our strength, and rob the parts of our body, weaken Nature, and cause that Cacochymia, which [7467]Celsus and others observe, or ill digestion, and bad juyce through all the parts of it.	For these reasons some physicians avoid purgatives, or use them sparingly. Heinrich Ayrer, in a consultation concerning a melancholy patient, advised him to take as few purges as possible, "because there are no such medicines that do not steal some of our strength, rob parts of our body and weaken nature," causing the cacochymia observed by Celsus and others—that is, poor digestion and bad humours throughout the body.[7468]
Galen himself confesseth, [7469]that purgative Physick is contrary to nature, takes away some of our best spirits, and consumes the very substance of our bodies: But this without question, is to be understood of such purges as are unseasonably or immoderately taken; they have their excellent use in this, as well as most other infirmities. Of Alteratives and Cordials no man doubts, be they simples or compounds. I will amongst that infinite variety of medicines, which I finde in every Pharmacopœia, every Physitian, Herbalist, &c. single out some of the chiefest.	Galen himself admits "that purgative medicine is contrary to nature, carries away some of our finest spirits and consumes the very substance of our bodies." But this must undoubtedly be understood of purges taken at the wrong time or to excess: they have excellent uses in this disorder, as in most others. No one doubts the value of alteratives and cordials, whether simple or compound. From the immense variety of medicines I find in every pharmacopoeia, physician's work, herbal and so forth, I will select some of the principal ones.[7470]

[7466] Burton. Printed page 365, z: "Hildish. spic. 2 de mel. fol. 276. Nulla est firmè medicina purgans, quæ non aliquam de viribus & partibus corporis deprædatur." Hildesheim, Spicilegium 2 on melancholy, folio 276. There is scarcely a purgative medicine that does not plunder some of the body's strength and substance.

[7467] Burton. Printed page 365, a: "Lib. 1. & Bart. lib. 1. cap. 12." Book 1, and Bart., book 1, chapter 12. The second abbreviated authority remains unidentified here.

[7468] Editor. Cacochymia is a bad mixture or condition of the bodily humours. "Nature" and the bodily "spirits" in the surrounding passage belong to humoral physiology. The note cites Ayrer through Hildesheim; the abbreviated Bart. has not been securely expanded.

[7469] Burton. Printed page 365, b: "2 De vict. acut. Omne purgans medicamentum, corpori purgato contrarium &c. succos & spiritus abducit, substantiam corporis aufert." Book 2, On Regimen in Acute Diseases. Every purgative drug is opposed to the body purged, and so on; it carries away humours and spirits and removes bodily substance.

[7470] Editor. Alteratives were intended to change an unhealthy bodily condition without purging; cordials to strengthen or comfort the heart and vital powers. A simple is a single medicinal substance, a compound a combination. "Pharmacopoeia" denotes a collection of medicinal preparations. The force and limits of the Galenic quotation await source collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 366 SUBSEC. 2. Simples proper to Melancholy, Against Exotick Simples.	SUBSECTION 2 Simple remedies suited to melancholy Against imported simples
Medicines properly applied to Melancholy, are either Simple or Compound. Simples are Alterative or Purgative. Alteratives are such as correct, strengthen nature, alter, any way hinder or resist the disease; and they be herbs, stones, minerals, &c. all proper to this humor. For as there be diverse distinct infirmities, continually vexing us,	Medicines appropriately used against melancholy are either simple or compound. Simples are either alterative or purgative. Alteratives correct or strengthen the body's natural powers, bring about change, or in some way hinder or resist the disease. They include herbs, stones, minerals and other things suited to this humour. For just as many distinct illnesses continually afflict us—[7471]
[7472]Νοῦσοι δ᾽ ἀνθρώποισιν ἐφ᾽ ἡμέρῃ ἠδ᾽ ἐπὶ νυκτὶ Αὐτόματοι φοιτῶσι κακὰ θνητοῖσι φέρουσαι Σιγῇ, ἐπεὶ φωνὴν ἐξείλετο μητίετα Ζεύς.	Diseases come to people by day and by night, Roaming of themselves, bringing harm to mortals In silence, since wise Zeus took away their voice.[7473]
Diseases steal both day and night on men, For Jupiter hath taken voice from them:	Diseases steal upon people by day and night, For Jupiter has taken their voice away.
So there be severall remedies, as [7474]he saith, each disease a medicine, for every humor; and as some hold, every clime, every country, and more then that, every private place hath his proper remedies growing in it, peculiar almost to the domineering and most frequent maladies of it.	so there are different remedies: as the writer says, "a medicine for each disease, for every humour." Some hold that every climate, every country and, more than that, every particular place has its own remedies growing there, almost specially adapted to its prevailing and most frequent illnesses.

[7471] Editor. The heading's "exotick" means foreign or imported. "Proper" means suited or specifically applicable. Burton classifies remedies according to humoral medicine; "alter" here is to change the bodily condition, rather than necessarily to evacuate a humour.

[7472] Burton. Printed page 366, c: "Hesiod. op." Hesiod, Works and Days.

[7473] Editor. Hesiod, Works and Days 102–104. Greek ligatures and accents are normalized. The scan reads ἠδ᾽, "and," where the consulted text has αἳ δ᾽, "and others"; Burton's reading is retained. His following two English lines compress the Greek, omitting its account of diseases wandering by themselves and bringing harm. Both versions are preserved.

[7474] Burton. Printed page 366, d: "Heurnius præf. pra. med. Quot morborum sunt Ideæ, tot remediorum genera variis potentiis decorata." Heurnius, preface to the Practice of Medicine. As many forms of disease as there are, so many kinds of remedies exist, endowed with different powers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As [7475]one discourseth, Wormwood growes sparingly in Italy, because most part there they be misaffected with hot diseases: but henbane, poppy, and such cold herbes: With us in Germany and Poland, great store of it in every wast. Baracellus Horto geniali, and Baptista Porta Physiognomicæ, lib. 6. cap. 23. gave many instances and examples of it, and bring many other proofes.	As one writer explains: "Wormwood grows sparsely in Italy, because people there are mostly afflicted by hot diseases; instead, henbane, poppy and similar cold herbs grow there. With us in Germany and Poland, wormwood abounds on every piece of waste ground." Baricelli, in The Delightful Garden, and Giambattista della Porta, in Physiognomics, book 6, chapter 23, give many examples and bring forward much further proof.[7476]
For that cause belike that learned Fuchsius of Noremberge, [7477]when he came into a village, considered alwayes what herbs did grow most frequently about it, and those he distilled in a silver limbeck, making use of others amongst them as occasion served.	Perhaps for this reason the learned Fuchs of Nuremberg, "whenever he came to a village, always considered which herbs grew most abundantly around it, and distilled those in a silver alembic," using other herbs among them as occasion required.[7478]

[7475] Burton. Printed page 366, e: "Penottus denar. med. Quæcunq; regio producit simplicia, pro morbis regionis; Crescit raro absynthium in Italia, quod ibi plerumq; morbi calidi, sed cicuta, papaver, & herbæ frigidæ; apud nos Germanos & Polonos ubiq; provenit absynthium." Penottus, De denario medico. Every region produces simples for its own diseases. Wormwood grows sparsely in Italy because diseases there are generally hot; instead, hemlock, poppy and cold herbs grow there. Among us Germans and Poles, wormwood grows everywhere.

[7476] Editor. The Latin margin has cicuta, "hemlock," whereas Burton's English has "henbane"; the difference is retained. Hot and cold are humoral classifications. The claim that each locality supplies remedies for its illnesses is an argument about nature's provision, not a demonstrated rule of plant distribution.

[7477] Burton. Printed page 366, f: "Quum in villam venit, consideravit quæ ibi crescebant medicamenta, simplicia frequentiora & iis plerumq; usus distillatis, & aliter, alimbacum ideo argenteum circumferens." When he came into a village, he considered which medicinal simples grew most abundantly there, and generally used them, distilled and otherwise, carrying a silver alembic about for that purpose.

[7478] Editor. A limbeck or alembic is a distilling vessel. The margin says that the simples were used distilled and otherwise; the body also mentions using other herbs. Fuchs's association with Nuremberg and the exact source of this anecdote remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I know that many are of opinion, our Northern simples are weak, unperfect, not so well concocted, of such force, as those in the Southerne parts, not so fit to be used in Physick, and will therefore fetch their drugs a far off: Sena, Cassia out of Ægypt, Rubarbe from Barbary, Aloes from Zocotora; Turbith, Agarick, Mirabolanes, Hermodactils from the East Indies, Tobacco from the west, and some as far as China, Hellebor from the Antycira, or that of Austria which bears the purple flower, which Mathiolus so much approves, and so of the rest.	I know that many believe our northern simples to be weak and imperfect, less thoroughly matured and less potent than those from southern regions, and less suited to medicine. They therefore fetch their drugs from far away: senna and cassia from Egypt, rhubarb from Barbary, aloes from Socotra; turpeth, agaric, myrobalans and hermodactyls from the East Indies; tobacco from the West Indies; some drugs from as far away as China; hellebore from Anticyra, or the Austrian variety with purple flowers so highly approved by Mattioli, and so with the rest.[7479]
In the kingdome of Valence in Spain, [7480]Maginus commends two mountains, Mariola and Renagolosa, famous for simples: Leander Albertus, [7481]Baldus a mountain near the lake Benacus in the territory of Verona, to which all the herbalists in the country continually flock: [7482]Ortelius one in Apulia, Munster Mons maior in Histria: others [7483]Montpelier in France; Prosper Altinus preferres Egyptian simples, Garcias ab Horto Indian before the rest, another those of Italy, Crete &c.	In the kingdom of Valencia in Spain, Magini commends two mountains, Mariola and Renagolosa, famous for medicinal plants. Leandro Alberti commends Monte Baldo, near Lake Garda in the territory of Verona, to which all the region's herbalists constantly flock; Ortelius, a mountain in Apulia; Münster, Monte Maggiore in Istria; and others, Montpellier in France. Prospero Alpini prefers Egyptian simples, Garcia da Orta those of India, others those of Italy, Crete and so on.[7484]

[7479] Editor. "Concocted" suggests ripened or perfected by heat. Socotra is Burton's Zocotora; Barbary denotes northwestern Africa. Turpeth, agaric, myrobalans and hermodactyls are historical drug names, often used of purgative materials. Their exact botanical or commercial identities, and the stated places of origin, should not be inferred from the names alone.

[7480] Burton. Printed page 366, g: "Herbæ medicis utiles omnium in Apulia feracissimæ." Herbs useful to physicians are most abundantly produced in Apulia. The printed g anchor follows the reference to Valencia and Magini, although the marginal wording names Apulia.

[7481] Burton. Printed page 366, dagger: "Baldus mons prope Benacum herbilegis maxime notus." Mount Baldo, near Lake Benacus, is particularly well known to herb-gatherers.

[7482] Burton. Printed page 366, h: "Geog. ad quos magnus herbariorum numerus undiq; confluit." Geography: to which a great number of herbalists flock from every direction. No corresponding h is securely visible in the body; the note is attached editorially after the Verona clause.

[7483] Burton. Printed page 366, unmarked: "Sincerus Itiner. Gallia." Sincerus, Itinerary, France. The unmarked reference is placed editorially with Montpellier.

[7484] Editor. Baldus and Benacus are Monte Baldo and Lake Garda; Histria is Istria. The g marginal anchor is incongruous with its Apulia wording; h has no secure body anchor, and Sincerus is unmarked. All are retained with these attachment issues disclosed. Renagolosa is left in its printed form pending geographical collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 366–367 Many times they are overcurious in this kind, whom Fuchsius taxeth, Instit. l. 1. sec. 1. cap. 1. [7485]that think they doe nothing, except they rake all over India, Arabia, Æthiopia for remedies, and fetch their Physick from the three quarters of the World, and from beyond the Garamantes. Many an old wife or country woman doth often more good with a few known and common garden herbs, then our bumbast Physitians, with all their prodigious, sumptuous, far-fetched, rare, conjecturall medicines: without all question if we have not these rare Exotick simples, we hold that at home which is in vertue equivalent unto them, ours will serve as well as theirs if they be taken in proportionable quantity, fitted and qualified aright, if not much better, and more proper to our constitutions.	They are often too fastidious in this, as Fuchs rebukes them in his Institutes, book 1, section 1, chapter 1: "They think they have achieved nothing unless they scour India, Arabia and Ethiopia for remedies, fetching their medicines from three quarters of the world and from beyond the Garamantes. An old woman or countrywoman often does more good with a few familiar, common garden herbs than our puffed-up physicians with all their extraordinary, costly, far-fetched, rare and speculative medicines." Without question, if we lack these rare imported simples, we have things at home equivalent in medicinal power. Ours will serve as well as theirs if taken in proportionate quantities and properly prepared and adjusted—if not much better, and more suitably for our constitutions.[7486]
Source page 367 But so tis for the most part, as Pliny writes to Gallus, [7487]We are careless of that which is neer us, and follow that which is afarre off, to know which we will travell and sail beyond the seas, wholly neglecting that which is under our eyes.	But it is generally as Pliny writes to Gallus: "We neglect what is near us and pursue what is far away, travelling and sailing overseas to learn about it, while wholly overlooking what lies before our eyes."[7488]

[7485] Burton. Printed page 366, k: "Qui se nihil effecisse arbitrantur, nisi Indiam, Æthiopiam, Arabiam, & ultra Garamantas à tribus mundi partibus exquisita remedia corradant. Tutius sæpe medetur rustica anus una, &c." They think they have accomplished nothing unless they scrape together choice remedies from India, Ethiopia, Arabia, beyond the Garamantes and from three parts of the world. A single old countrywoman often treats more safely, and so on.

[7486] Editor. "Bumbast" means inflated or pretentious; "virtue" is medicinal power. The Garamantes, an ancient North African people, stand here for remote regions. The Latin margin says the countrywoman often treats more safely, while Burton's English says she does more good; the distinction is preserved.

[7487] Burton. Printed page 367, asterisk: "Ep. lib. 8. Proximorum incuriosi longinqua sectamur, & ad ea cognoscenda iter ingredi & mare transmittere solemus; at quæ sub oculis posita negligimus." Letters, book 8. Unconcerned with what is near, we pursue distant things and commonly travel and cross the sea to learn about them, while neglecting what lies before our eyes.

[7488] Editor. Pliny the Younger, Letters 8.20.1, to Gallus. Burton rearranges and condenses its opening reflection about neglecting nearby wonders. This is a different Pliny from the author of the Natural History quoted earlier.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Opium in Turky doth scarce offend, with us in a small quantity it stupifies: Cicuta or hemlock is a strong poyson in Greece, but with us it hath no such violent effects: I conclude with I. Voschius, who as he much inveighs against those exotick medicines, so he promiseth by our European, a full cure, and absolute of all diseases; à capite ad calcem, nostræ regionis herbæ nostris corporibus magis conducunt, our own simples agree best with us.	Opium scarcely harms people in Turkey, while here a small quantity stupefies us; cicuta, or hemlock, is a powerful poison in Greece, but here it has no such violent effects. I conclude with I. Voschius: while strongly attacking those imported medicines, he promises a complete and absolute cure of all diseases through our European remedies, "from head to heel; the herbs of our own region are more beneficial to our bodies"—our own simples agree best with us.[7489]
It was a thing that Fernelius much laboured in his French practice, to reduce all his cure to our proper and domestick Physick: So did [7490]Janus Cornarius, and Martin Rulandus in Germany. T. B. with us, as appeareth by a treatise of his divulged in our tongue 1615. to prove the sufficiency of English medicines, to the cure of all manner of diseases.	Fernel worked hard in his French practice to conduct all treatment with our own domestic medicines. So did Janus Cornarius and Martin Ruland in Germany, and T. B. here, as appears from his treatise published in English in 1615 to prove that English medicines suffice to cure every kind of disease.[7491]
If our simples be not altogether of such force, or so apposite, it may be, if like industry were used, those far fetched druggs would prosper as well with us, as in those countries, whence now we have them, as well as Cherries, Artichokes, Tobacco, and many such. There have been diverse worthy Physicians, which have tryed excellent conclusions in this kind, and many diligent, painfull Apothecaries, as Gesner, Besler, Gerard, &c.	If our simples are not quite as potent or as suitable, perhaps, with equal care, those far-fetched medicinal plants would flourish here as well as in the countries from which we now obtain them, just as cherries, artichokes, tobacco and many others do. Several worthy physicians have conducted excellent experiments of this kind, as have many diligent, hardworking apothecaries, such as Gesner, Besler, Gerard and others.[7492]

[7489] Editor. Burton's claims about opium and hemlock are preserved as historical assertions, not established differences in safety between countries. The sweeping promise of universal cure belongs to the cited Voschius; his identity and exact text remain to be collated.

[7490] Burton. Printed page 367, dagger: "Exotica rejecit, domesticis solum nos contentos esse voluit. Melch. Adamus vit. ejus." He rejected imported remedies and wished us to be content with domestic ones alone. Melchior Adam, his Life.

[7491] Editor. T. B. is identifiable with Timothie Bright: the Wellcome Collection holds the 1615 edition of A treatise, wherein is declared the sufficiencie of English Medicines, with the subject Burton describes. The initials remain in the body. The marginal reference cites Melchior Adam's life of Cornarius.

[7492] Editor. "Conclusions" means experiments or practical trials; "painfull" means painstaking or hardworking. Here "drugs" includes medicinal plants capable of cultivation. The passage proposes acclimatizing imported plants, qualifying the preceding preference for native remedies.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but amongst the rest those famous publike Gardens of Padua in Italy, Noremberge in Germany, Leiden in Holland, Montpelier in France, (and ours in Oxford now in fieri, at the cost and charges of the right Honourable the Lord Danvers Earl of Danby) are much to be commended, wherein all exotick plants almost are to be seen, and liberall allowance yearly made for their better maintenance, that young students may be the sooner informed in the knowledge of them:	Above all, those famous public gardens at Padua in Italy, Nuremberg in Germany, Leiden in Holland and Montpellier in France deserve great praise—as does ours at Oxford, now being established at the expense of the Right Honourable Lord Danvers, Earl of Danby. In them almost every foreign plant can be seen, and generous annual funds are provided for their upkeep, so that young students may learn about them more readily.[7493] which as [7494]Fuchsius holds, is most necessary for that exquisite manner of curing, and as great a shame for a Physitian not to observe them, as for a workman not to know his axe, saw, square, or any other tool which he must of necessity use.	For, as Fuchs holds, this knowledge "is essential to that accomplished method of healing." It is as shameful for a physician not to study these plants as for a craftsman not to know his axe, saw, square or any other tool he must use.

[7493] Editor. In fieri means in the course of being made or established. Oxford's Physic Garden was founded through Henry Danvers in 1621; its institutional history records subsequent construction and planting. Burton's "now" belongs to the evolving seventeenth-century text and is not updated to a later date.

[7494] Burton. Printed page 367, m: "Instit. l. 1. cap. 8. sec. 1. ad exquisitam curandi rationem, quorum cognitio imprimis necessaria est." Institutes, book 1, chapter 8, section 1. Knowledge of these things is especially necessary for an accomplished method of healing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 3. Alteratives, Herbes, other vegetals, &c.	SUBSECTION 3 Alteratives herbs and other plant remedies
Amongst those 800 simples, which Galeottus reckons up, lib. 3. de promisc. doctor. cap. 3. and many exquisite herbalists have written of, these few following alone, I finde appropriated to this humour: Of which some be alteratives; [7495]which by a secret force, saith Renodæus, and speciall quality expell future diseases, perfectly cure those which are, and many such incurable effects.	Among the 800 simples enumerated by Galeottus in book 3 of On Various Kinds of Learning, chapter 3, and described by many accomplished herbalists, I find only the following few specifically suited to this humour. Some are alteratives, "which by a hidden power," says Renodaeus, "and a special quality ward off future diseases, perfectly cure those already present, and remedy many such incurable conditions."[7496]
This is as well observed in other plants, stones, minerals, and creatures, as in herbs, in other maladies as in this. How many things are related of a mans skull? What severall vertues of corns in a horse legge, [7497]of a Wolves liver, &c. Of diverse [7498]excrements of beasts, all good against severall diseases?	This is observed in other plants, stones, minerals and animals as well as in herbs, and in other illnesses as well as this one. How many things are reported of a human skull? What different powers are attributed to the horny growths on a horse's leg, to a wolf's liver and so forth? Or to various animal excrements, all said to be good against particular diseases?[7499]

[7495] Burton. Printed page 367, n: "Quæ cæcâ vi ac specifica qualitate morbos futuros arcent. lib. 1. cap. 10. Instit. Phar." By a hidden power and a specific quality they ward off future diseases. Pharmaceutical Institutes, book 1, chapter 10.

[7496] Editor. A "simple" is a single medicinal substance; an "alterative" was intended to change an unhealthy bodily condition without evacuation. "Humour" here is the melancholic humour. Burton reports the powers assigned to remedies by his authorities within historical medicine. "Secret" means hidden or unexplained. The marginal Latin promises prevention; the English body adds cure and the deliberately striking phrase "incurable effects." The precise Galeottus and Renodaeus passages remain to be collated.

[7497] Burton. Printed page 367, o: "Galen. lib. epar lupi hepaticos curat." Galen, book [unspecified]. A wolf's liver cures those with liver disease.

[7498] Burton. Printed page 367, p: "Stercus pecoris ad Epilepsiam &c." Livestock dung against epilepsy, and so on.

[7499] Editor. "Corns" means the horny growths on a horse's leg. Burton's materia medica includes animal and human substances as well as plants and minerals. The rhetorical questions accumulate reported powers rather than explain how they operate.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 367–368 What extraordinary vertues are ascribed unto plants? [7500]Satyrium & eruca penem erigunt, vites & nymphea semen extinguunt, [7501]some herbs provoke lust; some again, as agnus Castus, waterlilly, quite extinguisheth seed: poppy causeth sleep, Cabbige resisteth drunkenness, &c.	What extraordinary powers are ascribed to plants! “Satyrion and rocket cause an erection; vines and water lilies extinguish semen.” Some herbs arouse sexual desire; others, such as chaste tree and water lily, entirely suppress semen. Poppy causes sleep; cabbage resists drunkenness, and so on.[7502]
Source page 368 and that which is more to be admired, that such and such plants, should have a peculiar vertue to such particular parts, [7503]as to the head Anniseeds, foalfoot, Betony, Calamint, eye-bright, Lavander, Bayes, Roses, Rue, Sage, Marjorum, Piony, &c. For the lungs Calamint, Liquorice, Ennula campana, Hysop, Horehound, water Germander, &c. For the heart, Borage, Buglosse, Saffron, Bawm, Basil, Rosemary, Violet, Roses, &c.	More remarkable still is that particular plants should have a special power over particular parts of the body: for the head, aniseed, coltsfoot, betony, calamint, eyebright, lavender, bay, roses, rue, sage, marjoram, peony and so on. For the lungs, calamint, liquorice, elecampane, hyssop, horehound, water germander and so on. For the heart, borage, bugloss, saffron, balm, basil, rosemary, violet, roses and so on.[7504]

[7500] Burton. Printed page 367, q: “Priestpintle, rocket.”

[7501] Burton. Printed page 367, r: “Sabina fœtum educit.” Savin brings forth the fetus.

[7502] Editor. The margin glosses satyrium as “priestpintle,” an old plant name whose precise identification is not settled here. The Latin reads vites, “vines,” whereas the ensuing English names agnus castus, the chaste tree; vitex would agree with that name, but the printed wording is retained. “Seed” means semen. The savin note adds a different reproductive effect and is retained at its printed anchor.

[7503] Burton. Printed page 368, s: “Wecker. Vide Oswaldum Crollium lib. de Internis rerum signaturis, de herbis particularibus parti cuique convenientibus.” Wecker. See Oswald Croll’s book On the Inner Signatures of Things, concerning particular herbs appropriate to each part.

[7504] Editor. The catalogue assigns remedies to organs according to period medicine. “Foalfoot” is coltsfoot: Culpeper’s contemporary English Physitian also gives the paired names. Ennula campana is rendered elecampane. The sequence and repetitions are preserved rather than reorganized by modern botanical classification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For the stomack, Wormwood, Mints, Betony, Bawm, Centaury, Sorel, Purslan. For the liver, Darthspine or Camæpitis, Germander, Agrimony, Fennell, Endive, Succory, Liverwort, Barbaryes. For the spleen, Maidenhair, finger-ferne, dodder of thyme, hoppe, the rinde of ash, Betony. For the kidnies, grumell, parsly, saxifrage, plantane, mallowe. For the womb, mugwort, pennyroyall, fetherfew, savine, &c. For the joynts, Camomile, S. Johns-wort, organ, rue, cowslips, centaury the lesse, &c.	For the stomach, wormwood, mints, betony, balm, centaury, sorrel and purslane. For the liver, darthspine or chamaepitys, germander, agrimony, fennel, endive, chicory, liverwort and barberries. For the spleen, maidenhair, finger fern, dodder of thyme, hops, ash bark and betony. For the kidneys, gromwell, parsley, saxifrage, plantain and mallow. For the womb, mugwort, pennyroyal, feverfew, savin and so on. For the joints, chamomile, St John's wort, organ, rue, cowslips, lesser centaury and so on.[7505]
And so to peculiar diseases. To this of melancholy you shall find a Catalogue of herbs proper, and that in every part. See more in Wecker, Renodeus, Hœurnius lib. 2. cap. 19. &c. I will briefly speak of them, as first of alteratives, which Galen in his third book of diseased parts, prefers before diminutives, and [7506]Trallianus brags, that he hath done more cures on melancholy men by moistning, then by purging of them.	The same applies to particular diseases. For melancholy you will find a catalogue of suitable herbs, for every affected part. See further in Wecker, Renodaeus, Heurnius, book 2, chapter 19, and others. I will discuss them briefly, beginning with alteratives, which Galen, in his third book On the Affected Parts, prefers to evacuating remedies; Alexander of Tralles boasts that he has cured more melancholy patients by moistening them than by purging them.[7507]

[7505] Editor. "Succory" is chicory; "rinde" is bark; "grumell" is gromwell, a name also documented by the Anglo-Norman Dictionary. "Fetherfew" is feverfew and "savine" savin. The less certain names darthspine, finger fern and organ are retained rather than assigned unverified species. Camæpitis is normalized to chamaepitys in the modern column. This vocabulary is not a species-level identification of every remedy.

[7506] Burton. Printed page 368, t: "Idem Laurentius c. 9." Laurentius says the same, chapter 9.

[7507] Editor. "Diminutives" reduce or evacuate bodily matter; "moistening" and purging are contrasted as modes of humoral treatment. Trallianus is Alexander of Tralles. The t reference to Laurentius has no clearly visible matching body marker in this scan; it is attached to the report about Trallianus to which it is aligned. The precise passage remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7508]In this Catalogue, Borage and Buglosse may challenge the chiefest place, whether in substance, juice, roots, seeds, flowers, leaves, decoctions, distilled waters, extracts, oils, &c. for such kind of herbs be diversly varied. Buglosse is hot and moist, and therefore worthily reckoned up amongst those herbs which expell melancholy, and [7509]exhilarate the heart, Galen lib. 6. cap. 80. de simpl. med. Dioscorides lib. 4. cap. 123. Pliny much magnifies this plant. It may be diversly used; as in Broth, in [7510]Wine, in Conserves, Syrops, &c.	In this catalogue, borage and bugloss may claim first place, whether as the plant itself, juice, roots, seeds, flowers, leaves, decoctions, distilled waters, extracts, oils and so on, for these herbs can be prepared in many ways. Bugloss is hot and moist, and is therefore rightly counted among the herbs that expel melancholy and cheer the heart: Galen, book 6, chapter 80, On Simple Medicines; Dioscorides, book 4, chapter 123. Pliny praises this plant highly. It can be used in various ways: in broth, wine, preserves, syrups and so on.[7511]
It is an excellent cordiall, and against this malady most frequently prescribed; an herb indeed of such Soveraignty, that as Diodorus lib. 7. bibl. Plinius lib. 25. cap. 2. & lib. 21. cap. 22. Plutarch sympos. lib. 1. cap. 1. Dioscorides lib. 5. cap. 40. Cælius lib. 19. c. 3. suppose, it was that famous Nepenthes of [7512]Homer, which Polydamna Thonis wife (then King of Thebes in Ægypt) sent Helena for a token, of such rare vertue, that if taken steept in wine, if wife and children, father and mother, brother and sister, and all thy dearest friends should die before thy face, thou couldst not grieve or shed a tear for them.	It is an excellent cordial and is very frequently prescribed for this disorder. Indeed, the herb is so powerful that Diodorus, Library, book 7; Pliny, book 25, chapter 2, and book 21, chapter 22; Plutarch, Table Talk, book 1, chapter 1; Dioscorides, book 5, chapter 40; and Caelius, book 19, chapter 3, suppose it to have been Homer's famous nepenthe. Polydamna, the wife of Thon, then king of Thebes in Egypt, sent this to Helen as a gift. It had so extraordinary a power that, if you took it steeped in wine, you could neither grieve nor shed a tear even if your wife and children, father and mother, brother and sister, and all your dearest friends died before your eyes.[7513]

[7508] Burton. Printed page 368, unmarked subject label: "Borage."

[7509] Burton. Printed page 368, u: "Dicor Borago gaudia semper ago." I am called borage; I always bring joy.

[7510] Burton. Printed page 368, x: "Vino infusum hilaritatem facit." Infused in wine, it makes people cheerful.

[7511] Editor. "Hot and moist" describes humoral qualities, not the physical temperature or wetness of the preparation. A "cordial" strengthens or cheers the heart; "conserves" are preserved preparations. The unmarked Borage heading and both Latin marginal sayings are preserved as notes. Burton moves between borage and bugloss without resolving their botanical relationship.

[7512] Burton. Printed page 368, dagger: "Odyss. Δ." Odyssey, book 4.

[7513] Editor. Odyssey 4.219–232 describes Helen's grief-banishing drug, given by Polydamna, wife of Thon. Diodorus 1.97.7 connects this with Egyptian Thebes and its women's drugs. Neither consulted passage identifies borage or makes Thon king. Burton's "Diodorus lib. 7" remains as printed; the comparison supplies a different location, not an explanation of his numbering. Other nepenthe authorities remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Qui semel id paterâ mistum Nepenthes Iaccho Hauserit, hic lachrymam, non si suavissima proles, Si germanus ei charus, materq; paterq; Oppetat, ante oculos ferro confossus atroci.	Whoever once has drunk that nepenthe mixed with wine in a bowl Will shed no tear, even if his dearest child, His beloved brother, mother or father Dies before his eyes, pierced by a cruel sword.[7514]
Helenas commended Boul, to exhilarate the heart, had no other ingredient, as most of our Criticks conjecture, then this of Borage.	Helen's celebrated bowl, which cheered the heart, contained no other ingredient than this borage, as most of our learned commentators conjecture.

[7514] Editor. This Latin verse paraphrases the episode in Odyssey 4. It is freshly translated here as printed, including its compressed syntax: the verb "shed" is supplied with lachrymam, "a tear." Iacchus, a name associated with Bacchus, stands for wine. The four printed verse lines remain a separate unit from Burton's preceding English account. The Latin translator has not been securely identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 368–369 [7515]Melissa Bawm, hath an admirable vertue to alter Melancholy, be it steeped in our ordinary drink, extracted, or otherwise taken. Cardan lib. 8. much admires this herb. It heats and dries, saith [7516]Heurnius, in the second degree, with a wonderfull vertue comforts the heart, and purgeth all melancholy vapors from the spirits, Matthiol. in lib. 3. c. 10. in Dioscoridem. Besides they ascribe other vertues to it, [7517]as to help concoction, to cleanse the braine, expell all carefull thoughts, and anxious imaginations. The same words in effect are in Avicenna, Pliny, Simon Sethi, Fuchsius, Leobel, Delacampius, and every Herbalist. Nothing better for him that is melancholy then to steep this and Borage in his ordinary drink.	Melissa, or balm, has a remarkable power to alter melancholy, whether steeped in our usual drink, extracted or taken in some other form. Cardano, book 8, greatly admires this herb. According to Heurnius, it heats and dries in the second degree, wonderfully strengthens the heart and purges all melancholic vapours from the spirits: Mattioli, on Dioscorides, book 3, chapter 10. They attribute other powers to it as well: "to aid digestion, cleanse the brain, banish all worried thoughts and anxious imaginings." Much the same words occur in Avicenna, Pliny, Simeon Seth, Fuchs, L'Obel, Dalechamps and every herbalist. Nothing is better for a melancholy person than to steep this and borage in his usual drink.[7518]

[7515] Burton. Printed page 368, unmarked subject label: "Bawme." Balm.

[7516] Burton. Printed page 368, y: "Lib. 2. cap. 2. prax. med. mira vi lætitiam præbet & cor confirmat, vapores melancholicos purgat à spiritibus." Medical Practice, book 2, chapter 2. With wonderful power it brings joy and strengthens the heart; it clears melancholic vapours from the spirits.

[7517] Burton. Printed page 368, z: "Proprium est eius animum hilarem reddere, concoctionem juvare, cerebri obstructiones resecare, sollicitudines fugare, sollicitas imaginationes tollere." Its special power is to cheer the mind, assist digestion, remove obstructions of the brain, banish anxieties and remove troubled imaginings.

[7518] Editor. "In the second degree" places heat and dryness on the graded scale of humoral qualities. "Spirits" are the subtle bodily agents of life and sensation. "Concoction" means digestion; "carefull" means burdened with cares. The Latin margin speaks specifically of removing obstructions of the brain, where the English says cleansing it. Both formulations are retained. Burton's claims belong to his source tradition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 369 Matthiolus in his fift book of medicinall Epistles, reckons up [7519]Scorzonera, [7520]not against poison only, falling sicknesse, and such as are vertiginous, but to this malady; the root of it taken by it self expells sorrow, causeth mirth and lightnes of heart.	In the fifth book of his Medical Letters, Mattioli lists scorzonera "not only against poison, epilepsy and vertigo, but for this disorder: its root, taken by itself, drives away sorrow and brings mirth and lightness of heart."[7521]
Antonius Musa that renowned Physician to Cæsar Augustus, in his book which he writ of the vertues of Betony, cap. 6. wonderfully commends that herb, animas hominum & corpora custodit, securas de metu reddit, it preserves both body and minde, from fears, cares, griefs, cures falling-sicknes, this and many other diseases, to whom Galen subscribes, lib. 7. simpl. med. Dioscorides lib. 4. cap. 1. &c.	Antonius Musa, that renowned physician to Caesar Augustus, praises betony wonderfully in chapter 6 of his book on its virtues: "it guards people's souls and bodies and makes them secure from fear." It preserves both body and mind from fears, cares and griefs, and cures epilepsy, this disorder and many other diseases. Galen agrees, in book 7, On Simple Medicines, as does Dioscorides, book 4, chapter 1, and others.[7522]
Marigold is much approved against Melancholy, and often used therefore in our ordinary broth, as good against this and many other diseases.	Marigold is highly esteemed against melancholy, and is therefore often used in our everyday broth, being considered good against this and many other diseases.

[7519] Burton. Printed page 368, unmarked subject label at foot of margin: "Scorzonera." The label anticipates the paragraph on printed page 369; it is attached there in this edition.

[7520] Burton. Printed page 369, a: "Non solum ad viperarum morsus, comitiales, vertiginosos; sed per se accommodata radix tristitiam discutit, hilaritatemq; conciliat." Not only against vipers' bites, epilepsy and vertigo; the root administered by itself also dispels sadness and brings cheerfulness.

[7521] Editor. The unmarked Scorzonera label stands at the bottom of the preceding page; it anticipates this paragraph and has been moved with an explicit note. "Falling sickness" is epilepsy and "vertiginous" refers to vertigo. The marginal Latin specifies vipers' bites, whereas Burton's English has the broader "poison." The difference is preserved.

[7522] Editor. The work on betony is transmitted under Antonius Musa's name, but manuscript catalogues identify its author as Pseudo-Antonius Musa. The British Library's Harley MS 1585 catalogue records this attribution. Burton's historical identification is preserved in the body. His English paraphrase extends the shorter Latin assurance about protection and freedom from fear.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7523]Lupulus, hop, is a soveraign remedy; Fuchsius cap. 58. Plant. hist. much extolls it; [7524]it purgeth all choler, and purifies the blood. Matthiol. cap. 140. in 4. Dioscor. wonders the Physicians of his time made no more use of it, because it rarifies and cleanseth: we use it to this purpose in our ordinary beer, which before was thick and fulsome.	Lupulus, the hop, is a sovereign remedy. Fuchs, chapter 58 of his History of Plants, praises it highly: "it purges all bile and purifies the blood." Mattioli, chapter 140 of his commentary on Dioscorides, book 4, wonders why the physicians of his time made so little use of it, since it thins and cleanses. We use it for this purpose in our ordinary beer, which previously was thick and cloying.[7525]
Wormwood, Centaury, Penniroyall are likewise magnified and much prescribed (as I shall after shew) especially in Hypocondriake melancholy, daily to be used, sod in whey: and as Ruffus Ephesius, [7526]Areteus, relate, by breaking winde, helping concoction, many melancholy men have been cured with the frequent use of them alone.	Wormwood, centaury and pennyroyal are likewise praised and frequently prescribed, as I shall show later, especially for hypochondriac melancholy: they are to be used daily, boiled in whey. As Rufus of Ephesus and Aretaeus report, many melancholy patients have been cured by their frequent use alone, through dispersing wind and aiding digestion.[7527]

[7523] Burton. Printed page 369, unmarked subject label: "Hop."

[7524] Burton. Printed page 369, b: "Bilem utrāq; detrahit, sanguinē purgat." It removes both kinds of bile and purifies the blood.

[7525] Editor. The Latin margin says "both kinds of bile," the yellow and black forms of humoral theory, where Burton writes "all choler." Both are retained. "Rarifies" means thins or makes less dense; "fulsome" here means heavy or cloying. The observation about beer is Burton's account, not a revised history of brewing.

[7526] Burton. Printed page 369, c: "Lib. 7. cap. 5." Book 7, chapter 5.

[7527] Editor. "Sod" means boiled. "Hypochondriac" melancholy is the bodily form associated in this work with the region beneath the ribs; it does not mean the modern preoccupation with having an illness. "Breaking wind" here is dispersing intestinal wind. The printed citation "Lib. 7. cap. 5" is retained without silently supplying a different book number.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And because the spleen and blood are often misaffected in melancholy, I may not omit Endive, Succory, Dandelyon, Fumetory, &c. which cleanse the blood. Scolopendria, Cuscuta, Ceterache, Mugwort, Liverwort, Ashe, Tamerisk, Genist, Maidenhair, &c. which much help and ease the spleen. To these I may adde Roses, Violets, Capers, Fetherfew, Scordium, Stœchas, Rosemary, Ros Solis, Saffron, Ocyme, sweet Apples, Wine, Tobacco, Sanders, &c.	And because the spleen and blood are often disordered in melancholy, I must not omit endive, chicory, dandelion, fumitory and the like, which cleanse the blood; or scolopendria, dodder, ceterach, mugwort, liverwort, ash, tamarisk, broom, maidenhair and the like, which greatly help and relieve the spleen. To these I may add roses, violets, capers, feverfew, scordium, stoechas, rosemary, sundew, saffron, basil, sweet apples, wine, tobacco, sandalwood and so on.[7528]
That Peruvian Chamico, [7529]monstrosâ facultate, &c. Linshcosteus Datera; And to such as are cold, the [7530]decoction or Guiacum, China, Salsaperilla, Sassafras, the flowers of Carduus Benedictus, which I find much used by Montanus in his consultations, Julius Alexandrinus, Lelius, Egubinus, and others.	That Peruvian chamico, “of prodigious power,” and so forth; Linshcosteus’s datera. And for those who are cold, the decoction or guaiacum, China root, sarsaparilla, sassafras, and the flowers of blessed thistle, which I find much used by Montanus in his consultations, Julius Alexandrinus, Lelius, Egubinus and others.[7531]

[7528] Editor. Several traditional plant names are retained because their historical usage need not select a single modern species. Scolopendria and ceterach are fern names; scordium and stoechas remain in their herbal forms. Ros solis is sundew, as documented in the Missouri Botanical Garden’s botanical Latin dictionary. Cuscuta, Genist, Ocyme and Sanders are rendered dodder, broom, basil and sandalwood.

[7529] Burton. Printed page 369, unmarked reference corresponding to the body asterisk: “Laet occid. Indiæ descrip. lib. 10 cap. 2.” De Laet, Description of the West Indies, book 10, chapter 2.

[7530] Burton. Printed page 369, d: “Heurnius l. 2. consil. 185. Scoltzii consil. 77.” Heurnius, book 2, consultation 185; Scholz’s consultations, 77.

[7531] Editor. The printed “decoction or Guiacum” is retained, though “of” fits the list. “Cold” is humoral. Linshcosteus probably refers to Linschoten, whose Itinerario, chapter 61, describes dutroa; the intermediary and datera wording remain unverified. Chamico and datera receive no forced species identification. The unmarked De Laet reference follows the Chamico asterisk. China is a medicinal root.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7532]Bernardus Penottus prefers his Herba solis, or Dutch-Sindaw, before all the rest in this disease, and will admit of no herb upon the earth to be comparable to it. It excells Homers Moly, cures this, falling sicknes, and almost all others infirmities. The same Penottus speaks of an excellent balm out of Aponensis, which taken to the quantity of three drops in a cup of wine, [7533]will cause a sudden alteration, drive away dumps, and chear up the heart.	Bernardus Penottus prefers his herba solis, or Dutch sundew, to all the rest for this disease, "and allows no herb on earth to compare with it." It surpasses Homer's moly, cures this disorder, epilepsy and almost every other infirmity. The same Penottus, drawing on Aponensis, describes an excellent balm which, taken in the quantity of three drops in a cup of wine, "will bring a sudden change, drive away dejection and cheer the heart."[7534]
Ant. Guianerius in his Antidotary hath many such. [7535]Jacobus de Dondis the Aggregator, repeats ambergreece, nutmegs, & all spice amongst the rest. But that cannot be generally, Amber and Spice will make a hot brain mad, good for cold and moist. Garcias ab Horto hath many Indian plants, whose vertues he much magnifies in this disease.	Antonio Guaineri has many such remedies in his Antidotary. Jacobus de Dondis, the Compiler, includes ambergris, nutmegs and every kind of spice among the rest. But that cannot apply generally: amber and spice will drive a hot brain mad, though they are good for one that is cold and moist. Garcia da Orta lists many Indian plants whose powers he greatly praises against this disease.[7536]

[7532] Burton. Printed page 369, e: "Præf. denar. med. Omnes capitis dolores & phantasmata tollit; scias nullam herbam in terris huic comparandam viribus & bonitate nasci." Preface to the Medical Decade. It removes all headaches and phantasms; know that no herb grows on earth comparable to it in power and excellence.

[7533] Burton. Printed page 369, f: "Optimum medicamentum in celeri cordis confortatione, & ad omnes qui tristantur, &c." An excellent medicine for quickly strengthening the heart, and for all who are sad, and so forth.

[7534] Editor. Herba solis means "herb of the sun"; Burton immediately gives its vernacular name, Dutch-Sindaw, rendered sundew. Homer's moly is the protective plant given to Odysseus against Circe in Odyssey 10.302–306. "Out of Aponensis" means drawn from that author, not a balm extracted from a plant with that name. The precise Penottus and Aponensis formulations remain to be located.

[7535] Burton. Printed page 369, g: "Rondoletius. Elenum quod vim habet miram ad hilaritatem et multi pro secreto habent. Schenkius observ. med. cen. 5. observ. 86." Rondelet. Elenum has a wonderful power to cause cheerfulness, and many keep it as a secret remedy. Schenck, Medical Observations, fifth hundred, observation 86.

[7536] Editor. "Aggregator" means compiler, not the name of another remedy. Burton first gives ambergreece, ambergris, but then writes "Amber"; the distinction is retained rather than silently resolved. His qualification depends on whether the brain is considered hot or cold and moist. The g note at Jacobus de Dondis names Rondelet and Elenum instead; this mismatch and the uncertain Elenum reading remain recorded for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Lemnius instit. cap. 58. admires Rue, and commends it to have excellent vertue, to [7537]expell vain imaginations, Divels, and to ease afflicted souls. Other things are much magnified by writers, as an old Cock, a Rams head, a Wolfes heart born or eaten, which Mercurialis approves; Prosper Altinus, the water of Nilus; Gomesius all sea water, and at seasonable times to be sea-sick: [7538]Goats milk, Whey, &c.	Lemnius, Institutes, chapter 58, admires rue, praising its excellent power "to expel vain imaginings and devils, and relieve afflicted souls." Writers also greatly praise other things: an old cock, a ram's head, or a wolf's heart carried on the person or eaten, which Mercurialis approves; the water of the Nile, praised by Prosper Altinus; all seawater, praised by Gomesius; and being seasick at suitable times; goats' milk, whey and so on.[7539]

[7537] Burton. Printed page 369, h: "Afflictas mentes relevat, animi Imaginationes & Dæmones expellit." It relieves afflicted minds, expels the mind's imaginings and demons.

[7538] Burton. Printed page 369, i: "Sckenkius, Mizaldus, Rhasis." Schenck, Mizaldus and Rhazes.

[7539] Editor. "Born" means carried on the person, contrasted with eaten. Burton combines remedies used internally with objects carried as amulets. His statements about devils are preserved as part of his explanatory world. The i reference has no secure visible body anchor; it is attached editorially to the final goats' milk and whey clause beside which it appears. The printed name Altinus is retained pending collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 370 SUBSECT. 4. Pretious stones, Metals, Minerals, Alteratives.	SUBSECTION 4 Precious stones metals and minerals as alteratives
Pretious stones are diversly censured; many explode the use of them or any Minerals in Physick, of whom Thomas Erastus is the chief, in his Tract against Paracelsus, and in an Epistle of his to Peter Monavius, [7540]That stones can work any wonders, let them believe that list, no man shall perswade me, for my part I have found by experience there is no vertue in them.	Precious stones are variously judged. Many reject their use, or that of any minerals, in medicine. Foremost among them is Thomas Erastus, in his treatise against Paracelsus and in a letter to Peter Monavius: "Let those who wish believe that stones can work wonders; no one will persuade me. For my part, experience has shown me that there is no virtue in them."[7541]
But Matthiolus in his comment upon [7542]Dioscorides, is as profuse on the other side in their commendation; so is Cardan, Renodeus, Alardus, Rueus, Encelius, Marbodeus, &c. [7543]Matthiolus specifies in Corall: and Oswaldus Crollius Basil. chym. prefers the salt of Corall. [7544]Christoph. Encelius lib. 3. cap. 131. will have them to be as so many severall medicines against melancholy, sorrow, fear, dulnesse, and the like;	On the other side, Mattioli is equally lavish in their praise in his commentary on Dioscorides; so are Cardano, Renodaeus, Alardus, Rueus, Encelius, Marbodeus and others. Mattioli singles out coral, and Oswald Croll, in his Chemical Basilica, prefers salt of coral. Christoph Encelius, book 3, chapter 131, regards them as so many distinct medicines against melancholy, sorrow, fear, dullness and the like.[7545]

[7540] Burton. Printed page 370, k: "Cratonis ep. vol. 1. Credat qui vult gemmas mirabilia efficere; mihi qui & ratione & experientia didici aliter rem habere, nullus facile persuadebit falsum esse verum." Crato's Letters, volume 1. Let whoever wishes believe that gems work wonders. No one will easily persuade me, who have learned otherwise by both reason and experience, that falsehood is truth.

[7541] Editor. "Censured" means judged or assessed, not necessarily condemned; "explode" means reject. Burton sets opponents and defenders of mineral medicine against one another. The Latin note appeals to both reason and experience and refuses to accept falsehood as truth; the English body shortens this to the absence of virtue in the stones. Crato's letter collection and the Erastus letter are cited as printed, without claiming direct collation.

[7542] Burton. Printed page 370, l: "L. de gemmis." Book on gems.

[7543] Burton. Printed page 370, m: "Margaritæ & corallum ad melancholiam præcipue valent." Pearls and coral are especially effective against melancholy.

[7544] Burton. Printed page 370, n: "Margaritæ & gemmæ Spiritus confortant & cor, melancholiam fugant." Pearls and gems strengthen the spirits and heart and banish melancholy.

[7545] Editor. "Virtue" throughout this catalogue means an attributed power or efficacy. Salt of coral is a prepared substance; the phrase is not expanded into an unverified chemical recipe. The margin includes pearls as well as coral and gems. The Dioscorides anchor points to the short marginal "Book on gems"; that imprecise relationship is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7546]Renodeus admires them, besides they adorn Kings Crowns, grace the fingers, enrich our houshold stuffe, defend us from enchantments, preserve health, cure diseases, they drive away grief, cares, and exhilarate the minde. The particulars be these.	Renodaeus admires them: “Besides adorning kings’ crowns, gracing the fingers, enriching our household furnishings, defending us from enchantments, preserving health and curing diseases, they drive away grief and cares and cheer the mind.” The particular stones are these.
Granatus a pretious stone so called, because it is like the kernels of a Pomegranate, an unperfect kinde of Ruby, it comes from Calecut; [7547]if hung about the neck, or taken in drink, it much resisteth sorrow, and recreats the heart. The same properties I find ascribed to the Jacinth and Topaze, [7548]They allay anger, grief, diminish madnes, much delight and exhilarate the minde, [7549]If it be either carried about, or taken in a potion, it will increase wisdome, saith Cardan, expell fear; he brags that he hath cured many mad men with it, which when they laid by the stone, were as mad again as ever they were at first.	Granatus, or garnet, is a precious stone so called because it resembles the seeds of a pomegranate. An imperfect kind of ruby, it comes from Calicut. “Hung about the neck or taken in a drink, it strongly resists sorrow and refreshes the heart.” I find the same properties ascribed to jacinth and topaz: “They allay anger and grief, lessen madness, and greatly delight and cheer the mind. If carried on the person or taken in a potion, it will increase wisdom,” says Cardano, “and banish fear.” He boasts of curing many mad people with it, who, when they put the stone aside, became as mad again as they had been at first.[7550]

[7546] Burton. Printed page 370, o: “Præfat. ad lap. prec. lib. 2. sect. 2. de mat. med. Regum coronas ornant, digitos illustrant, supellectilem ditant, è fascino tuentur, morbis medentur, sanitatem conservant, mentem exhilarant, tristitiam pellunt.” Preface on precious stones, book 2, section 2, On Medicinal Materials. They adorn kings’ crowns, brighten the fingers, enrich household furnishings, protect against enchantment, cure diseases, preserve health, cheer the mind and drive away sadness.

[7547] Burton. Printed page 370, p: “Encelius l. 3. c. 4. Suspensus vel ebibitus tristitiæ multum resistit, & cor recreat.” Encelius, book 3, chapter 4. Worn suspended or drunk, it strongly resists sadness and refreshes the heart.

[7548] Burton. Printed page 370, q: “Idem cap. 5. & cap. 6. de Hyacintho & Topazio. Iram sedat & animi tristitiam pellit.” The same author, chapters 5 and 6, on jacinth and topaz. It calms anger and drives sadness from the mind.

[7549] Burton. Printed page 370, r: “Lapis hic gestatus aut ebibitus prudentiam auget, nocturnos timores pellit; insanos hac sanavi, & quum lapidem abjecerint, erupit iterum stultitia.” This stone, worn or drunk, increases prudence and drives away night fears. I have cured mad people with it; when they cast the stone aside, their madness broke out again.

[7550] Editor. These are period lapidary names and classifications. Burton calls garnet an imperfect ruby and places its origin at Calicut; this is retained, not converted into modern mineralogy. He moves from two stones, jacinth and topaz, to a singular “it”; the modern column preserves that uncertainty about which stone receives Cardano’s claims. The margin specifies night fears where the body says fear.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Petrus Bayerus lib. 2. cap. 13. veni mecum. Fran. Rueus, cap. 19. de gemmis, say as much of the Chrysolite, [7551]a friend of wisdome, an enemy to folly. Pliny lib. 37. Solinus cap. 52. Albertus de lapid. Cardan. Encelius lib. 3. cap. 66. highly magnifies the vertue of the Beryll, [7552]it much availes to a good understanding, represseth vain conceits, evil thoughts, causeth mirth, &c.	Petrus Bayerus, Come with Me, book 2, chapter 13, and François de La Rue, On Gems, chapter 19, say as much of chrysolite: a friend to wisdom and an enemy to folly. Pliny, book 37; Solinus, chapter 52; Albertus, On Stones; Cardano; and Encelius, book 3, chapter 66, highly praise the power of beryl: “it greatly helps sound understanding, suppresses idle fancies and evil thoughts, and causes mirth,” and so on.[7553]
In the belly of a swallow there is a stone found called Chelidonius, [7554]which if it be lapped in a fair cloath, and tied to the right arm, will cure lunaticks, mad men, make them amiable and merry. There is a kinde of Onyx called a Chalcidonye, which hath the same qualities; [7555]availes much against phantastick illusions which proceed from melancholy, preserves the vigour and good estate of the whole body.	A stone called chelidonius is found in a swallow’s belly. “Wrapped in a clean cloth and tied to the right arm, it will cure lunatics and mad people and make them agreeable and merry.” There is a kind of onyx called chalcedony, with the same qualities: it “greatly helps against imaginary illusions arising from melancholy,” and preserves the vigour and good condition of the whole body.[7556]

[7551] Burton. Printed page 370, s: “Inducit sapientiam, fugat stultitiam. Idem Cardanus, lunaticos juvat.” It brings wisdom and banishes folly. Cardano says the same: it helps lunatics.

[7552] Burton. Printed page 370, t: “Confert ad bonum intellectum, comprimit malas cogitationes, &c. Alacres reddit.” It promotes sound understanding, restrains evil thoughts, and so forth. It makes people cheerful.

[7553] Editor. The quoted powers are taken from a lapidary tradition linking stones with intellect and emotion. Veni mecum literally means “come with me”; the abbreviated title and the Bayerus reference remain unverified. The printed list of authorities and its attribution to beryl are retained. No modern mineral identity is imposed on historical chrysolite.

[7554] Burton. Printed page 370, u: “Albertus, Encelius cap. 44. lib. 3. Plin. lib. 37. cap. 10. Jacobus de Dondis: dextro brachio alligatus sanat lunaticos, insanos, facit amabiles, jucundos.” Albertus; Encelius, book 3, chapter 44; Pliny, book 37, chapter 10; Jacobus de Dondis. Tied to the right arm, it cures lunatics and mad people and makes them agreeable and cheerful.

[7555] Burton. Printed page 370, x: “Valet contra phantasticas illusiones ex melancholia.” It is effective against imaginary illusions arising from melancholy.

[7556] Editor. Chelidonius means a swallow stone in this tradition. “Fair” means clean; “amiable” means agreeable or lovable. “Lunatic,” “mad” and “phantastick illusions” are historical categories, not precise modern diagnoses. Burton classifies chalcedony as a kind of onyx; that classification is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Eban stone which Goldsmiths use to sleeken their gold with, born about or given to drink, [7557]hath the same properties or not much unlike.	The eban stone, which goldsmiths use to polish their gold, has the same or very similar properties when carried on the person or given in a drink.[7558]
Source page 370–371 Levinus Lemnius Institut. ad vit. cap. 58. amongst other Jewels makes mention of two more notable; Carbuncle and Corall, [7559]which drive away childish fears, Divels, overcome sorrow, and hung about the neck repress troublesome dreams, which properties almost Cardan gives to that green coloured [7560]Emmetris, if it be carried about, or worn in a ring; Rueus to the Diamond.	Among other jewels, Levinus Lemnius, Institutes for Life, chapter 58, mentions two more notable ones, carbuncle and coral, "which drive away childish fears and devils, overcome sorrow and, hung about the neck, suppress troublesome dreams." Cardano gives nearly the same properties to the green stone emmetris when carried on the person or worn in a ring, and La Rue gives them to diamond.[7561]
Source page 371 Nicholas Cabeus a Jesuit of Farrara, in the first book of his magneticall Philosophy, cap. 3 speaking of the vertues of a loadstone recites many severall opinions; some say that if it be taken in parcels inward, si quis per frusta voret, juventutem restituet, it will like vipers wine, restore one to his youth, and yet if carried about them, others will have it to cause melancholy; let experience determine.	Niccolò Cabeo, a Jesuit of Ferrara, recounts many different opinions about the powers of a lodestone in the first book of his Magnetic Philosophy, chapter 3. Some say that if it is swallowed in pieces—"if anyone swallows it in fragments, it will restore youth"—it will, like viper wine, restore a person's youth. Yet others maintain that carrying it about causes melancholy. Let experience decide.[7562]

[7557] Burton. Printed page 370, y: "Amentes sanat, tristitiam pellit, iram, &c." It cures madness, drives away sadness, anger and so forth.

[7558] Editor. "Sleeken" means smooth or polish. The material meant by "Eban stone" has not been securely identified here, so its name is retained. The margin's therapeutic assertions are preserved separately from Burton's cross-reference to the preceding stones.

[7559] Burton. Printed page 370, z: "Valet ad fugandos timores & dæmones, turbulenta somnia abigit, & nocturnos puerorum timores compescit." It is effective in banishing fears and demons, dispels troubled dreams, and checks children's night fears.

[7560] Burton. Printed page 371, a: "Somnia læta facit argenteo annulo gestatus." Worn in a silver ring, it makes dreams pleasant.

[7561] Editor. "Carbuncle" is a historical gem name. The reading Emmetris is retained because its precise identification remains uncertain. Burton gives it nearly the same properties as carbuncle and coral, while the Latin note makes the narrower claim of pleasant dreams when worn in a silver ring. The body and margin should not be flattened into one statement.

[7562] Editor. A lodestone is a naturally magnetic stone. Burton balances contradictory claims of restored youth and induced melancholy, then appeals to experience to decide. The short Latin clause is translated separately from his ensuing English gloss. The exact chapter in Cabeo remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Mercurialis admires the Emerald for his vertues in pacifying all affections of the mind; others the Saphyre, which is the [7563]fairest of all precious stones, of skye colour, and a great enemy to black choler, frees the mind, mends manners, &c. Jacobus de Dondis in his Catalogue of Simples, hath AmberGreece, os in corde cervi, [7564]the bone in a Stags heart, a Monocerots horn, Bezoars stone [7565](of which elsewhere) it is found in the belly of a little beast in the East Indies brought into Europe by Hollanders and our country-men Merchants. Renodeus cap. 22. lib. 3. de ment. med. saith he saw two of these beasts alive in the Castle of the Lord of Vitry at Coubert.	Mercurialis admires the emerald for its power to calm all emotions of the mind; others admire sapphire, “the fairest of all precious stones, sky-coloured and a great enemy to black bile: it frees the mind and improves conduct,” and so on. In his Catalogue of Simples, Jacobus de Dondis includes ambergris; “the bone in a stag’s heart”—a bone in the heart of a stag; a unicorn’s horn; and bezoar stone, discussed elsewhere. This last is found in the belly of a small animal in the East Indies and is brought to Europe by Dutch merchants and our own countrymen. Renodaeus, book 3, chapter 22, On Medicinal Materials, says that he saw two of these animals alive in the castle of the Lord of Vitry at Coubert.[7566]
Lapis Lazuli and Armenus because they purge, shall be mentioned in their place.	Lapis lazuli and Armenian stone will be discussed in their proper place, because they purge.[7567]

[7563] Burton. Printed page 371, b: “Atræ bili adversatur, omnium gemmarum pulcherrima, cœli colorem refert, animum ab errore liberat, mores in melius mutat.” It opposes black bile; the most beautiful of all gems, it resembles the colour of the sky, frees the mind from error and improves conduct.

[7564] Burton. Printed page 371, c: “Longis mœroribus feliciter medetur, deliquiis, &c.” It successfully remedies prolonged grief, fainting fits and so forth.

[7565] Burton. Printed page 371, d: “Sect. 5. Memb. 1. Subs. 5.” Section 5, member 1, subsection 5.

[7566] Editor. Monoceros means a unicorn in this medicinal vocabulary. Bezoar denotes a concretion found inside an animal; Burton’s account of its origin and trade is retained. He does not identify the particular animals seen at Coubert. The stag-heart phrase is translated twice because Burton gives both Latin and an English gloss. The printed cross-reference and abbreviated Renodaeus title are preserved.

[7567] Editor. Armenus is the Armenian stone of the historical pharmacopoeia. These stones are deferred because Burton classifies them as purgatives rather than alteratives. Precise modern mineral identification is not supplied from the name alone.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of the rest in brief thus much I will adde out of Cardan, Renodeus cap. 23. lib. 3. Rondoletius lib. 1. de Testat. c. 15. &c. [7568]That almost all Jewels and pretious stones, have excellent vertues to pacifie the affections of the mind, for which cause rich men so much covet to have them: [7569]and those smaller Unions which are found in shells amongst the Persians and Indians, by the consent of all writers, are very cordial, and most part avail to the exhilaration of the heart.	Of the rest I will briefly add this much from Cardano; Renodaeus, book 3, chapter 23; Rondelet, book 1 On Shellfish, chapter 15; and others: "Almost all jewels and precious stones have excellent powers to calm the emotions of the mind," which is why rich people are so eager to possess them. "And those smaller pearls found in shells among the Persians and Indians," by the agreement of all writers, "are very strengthening to the heart," and generally help to cheer it.[7570]
[7571]Most men say as much of Gold, and some other Minerals, as these have done of pretious stones. Erastus still maintains the opposite part. Disput. in Paracelsum cap. 4. fol. 196. he confesseth of gold, [7572]that it makes the heart merry, but in no other sense but as it is in a misers chest: at mihi plaudo simulac nummos contemplor in arcâ, as he said in the Poet, it so revives the spirits, and is an excellent receit against Melancholy,	Most people say as much of gold and some other minerals as these writers have said of precious stones. Erastus still takes the opposing side. In his Disputations against Paracelsus, chapter 4, folio 196, he admits that gold "makes the heart merry, but only in the sense that it lies in a miser's chest." "But I applaud myself as soon as I gaze at the coins in my chest," as the man in the poet says. In that way it revives the spirits and makes an excellent remedy for melancholy.[7573]

[7568] Burton. Printed page 371, e: "Gestamen lapidum & gemmarum maximum fert auxilium & juvamen; unde qui dites sunt gemmas secum ferre studeant." Wearing stones and gems brings very great help and relief; hence those who are rich should take care to carry gems with them.

[7569] Burton. Printed page 371, f: "Margaritæ & Uniones quæ à conchis & piscibus apud Persas & Indos, valde cordiales sunt, &c." Pearls and large pearls obtained from shells and fish among the Persians and Indians are very strengthening to the heart, and so on.

[7570] Editor. "Unions" means pearls, not a mixture of ingredients. The Latin margin names margaritae and uniones, traditionally pearls and large pearls, whereas the English calls these "smaller Unions"; both formulations are retained. "Cordial" again means strengthening or cheering the heart. Burton's appeal to all writers is his own generalization.

[7571] Burton. Printed page 371, unmarked subject label: "Minerals."

[7572] Burton. Printed page 371, g: "Aurum lætitiam generat, non in corde, sed in arcâ virorum." Gold generates joy, not in people's hearts but in their chests of money.

[7573] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.1.66–67, gives the miser's self-applause over his coins. Burton omits ipse domi, "myself at home," and joins the remaining phrases; the modern column follows his shortened quotation. The joke turns medicine's gold into accumulated money. The unmarked Minerals label begins this new portion of the argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7574]For Gold in Physick is a cordial, Therefore he loved Gold in special.	For gold in medicine strengthens the heart; Therefore he loved gold especially.[7575]
Aurum potabile [7576]he discommends and inveighs against it, by reason of the corrosive waters which are used in it: Which argument our D[r]. Guin urgeth against D. Antonius. [7577]Erastus concludes their Philosophicall stones and potable gold, &c. to be no better then poyson, a meer imposture, a non Ens; dig'd out of that broody hill belike this goodly golden stone is, ubi nascetur ridiculus mus.	He condemns potable gold and attacks it because of the corrosive liquids used in it, an argument our Dr Gwinne brings against Dr Anthony. Erastus concludes that their philosophers' stones, potable gold and the like are "no better than poison," a mere fraud, a nonentity. This splendid golden stone has presumably been dug out of that pregnant mountain "where a ridiculous mouse will be born."[7578]

[7574] Burton. Printed page 371, dagger: "Chaucer."

[7575] Editor. Chaucer, Canterbury Tales, General Prologue 443–444, in the portrait of the Physician. Burton's wording and spelling are retained on the left; the new rendering keeps the two-line form. The joke exploits both the alleged medicinal value of gold and the physician's fondness for money. Harvard's Chaucer text confirms the passage.

[7576] Burton. Printed page 371, h: "Aurum non aurum. Noxium ob aquas rodentes." Gold that is not gold. Harmful because of the corrosive liquids.

[7577] Burton. Printed page 371, i: "Ep. ad Monavium. Metallica omnia in universum quovis modo parata, nec tutò nec commodè intra corpus sumi." Letter to Monavius. All mineral preparations in general, however prepared, can be taken into the body neither safely nor beneficially.

[7578] Editor. "Potable" means drinkable; "corrosive waters" are chemically active liquids. Guin and Antonius are Matthew Gwinne and Francis Anthony: the Wellcome catalogue records Gwinne's 1611 attack with the running title Aurum non aurum, also quoted in Burton's margin. The "broody hill" alludes to Horace, Art of Poetry 139, where labouring mountains produce a ridiculous mouse. Burton adapts that line into his sentence. His "non Ens" denies the promised substance's reality.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 371–372 Paracelsus and his Chymisticall followers, as so many Promethei, will fetch fire from heaven, will cure all manner of diseases with Minerals, accounting them the only Physick on the other side. [7579]Paracelsus calls Galen, Hippocrates, and all their adherents, infants, idiots, Sophisters, &c. Apage sis istos qui Vulcanias istas Metamorphoses sugillant, inscitiæ soboles, supinæ pertinaciæ alumnos, &c. not worthy the name of Physicians, for want of these remedies;	On the other side, Paracelsus and his chemical followers, like so many Prometheuses, will fetch fire from heaven and cure every kind of disease with minerals, counting them the only true medicine. Paracelsus calls Galen, Hippocrates and all their followers children, ignoramuses, sophists and so forth: "Away, I beg you, with those who disparage these transformations of Vulcan, offspring of ignorance, pupils of supine obstinacy," and so on. Without these remedies, they are unworthy of the name of physicians.[7580]
Source page 372 and brags that by them he can make a man live 160 yeers, or to the worlds end, with their [7581]Alexipharmacums, Panaceas, Mummia's, unguentum Armarium, and such Magneticall cures, Lampas vitæ & mortis, Balneum Dianæ, Balsamum, Electrum Magico-physicum, Amuleta Martialia, &c. What will not he and his followers effect?	He boasts that with these remedies he can make a person live 160 years, or until the world's end: their antidotes, panaceas, mummy preparations, weapon salve and similar magnetic cures; the lamp of life and death, Diana's bath, balsam, magical-medical electrum, martial amulets and so on. What will he and his followers not accomplish?[7582]

[7579] Burton. Printed page 371, second dagger with continuation below the body: "In parag. Stultissimus pilus occipitis mei plus scit quam omnes vestri doctores, & calceorum meorum annuli doctiores sunt quam vester Galenus & Avicenna, barba mea plus experta est quam vestræ omnes Academiæ." In the Paragranum. The most foolish hair on the back of my head knows more than all your doctors; the rings on my shoes are more learned than your Galen and Avicenna; my beard has more experience than all your academies.

[7580] Editor. Prometheus' theft of heavenly fire and Vulcan's mastery of fire frame the chemical physicians' claims. "Sophisters" means disputants accused of specious argument. The Latin invective is translated in full rather than replaced by a summary. The marginal taunts run across the foot of printed page 371 and belong to the same dagger note; all are preserved. Their exact wording in Paracelsus's Paragranum remains to be collated.

[7581] Burton. Printed page 372, first asterisk: "Vide Ernestum Burgiatium edit. Franaker. 8°. 1611. Crollius and others." See Ernestus Burgiatius, Franeker edition, octavo, 1611; Croll and others.

[7582] Editor. Alexipharmacums are antidotes and panaceas universal remedies. The remaining terms are historical preparation names: mummy preparations, weapon salve, the lamp of life and death, Diana's bath, balsam, electrum and martial amulets. "Magnetic" here extends to supposed sympathetic action, not simply attraction by a lodestone. The Franeker 1611 octavo cited under Ernestus Burgiatius is identifiable with Johann Ernst Burggrav's Biolychnium seu Lucerna in the Wellcome catalogue; its detailed contents have not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He brags moreover that he was primus medicorum, and did more famous cures then all the Physicians in Europe besides, [7583]a drop of his preparations should go farther then a dram, or ounce of theirs, those loathsome and fulsome filthy potions, Heterocliticall pills (so he cals them) horse medicines, ad quorum aspectum Cyclops Polyphemus exhorresceret.	He further boasts that he was "the foremost of physicians" and achieved more famous cures than all the other physicians in Europe: "a drop of his preparations would go further than a dram or an ounce of theirs"—those loathsome, nauseating, filthy potions, irregular pills, as he calls them, horse medicines "at the sight of which the Cyclops Polyphemus would shudder."[7584]
And though some condemn their skill, and Magneticall cures as tending to Magicall superstition, witchery, charms, &c. yet they admire, stiffly vindicate nevertheless, and infinitely prefer them. But these are both in extreams, the middle sort approve of Minerals, though not in so high a degree.	Although some condemn their practice and magnetic cures as tending towards magical superstition, witchcraft, charms and so forth, they nevertheless admire them, stoutly defend them and prefer them beyond measure. But both sides go to extremes. Those who take a middle course approve of minerals, though not so extravagantly.
Lemnius lib. 3. cap. 6. de occult. nat. mir. commends Gold inwardly, and outwardly used, as in Rings, excellent good in medicines; and such mixtures as are made for melancholy men, saith Wecker. antid. spec. lib. 1. to whom Renodeus subscribes, lib. 2. cap. 2. Ficinus lib. 2. cap. 19. Fernel. meth. med. lib. 5. cap. 21. de Cardiacis, Daniel Sennertus lib. 1. part. 2. cap. 9. Audernacus, Libavius, Quercetanus, Oswaldus Crollius, Euonymus, Rubeus, and Matthiolus in the fourth book of his Epistles, Andreas à Blawen epist. ad Matthiolum, as commended and formerly used by Avicenna, Arnoldus, and many others:	Lemnius, book 3, chapter 6, On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, commends gold used internally and externally, as in rings, and considers it excellent in medicines. Wecker, Special Antidotary, book 1, recommends it in mixtures for melancholy patients. Renodaeus agrees, book 2, chapter 2; so do Ficino, book 2, chapter 19; Fernel, Method of Medicine, book 5, chapter 21, on heart remedies; Daniel Sennert, book 1, part 2, chapter 9; Audernacus, Libavius, Quercetanus, Oswald Croll, Euonymus, Rubeus and Mattioli in the fourth book of his Letters; and Andreas à Blawen, in a letter to Mattioli. It was praised and used earlier by Avicenna, Arnoldus and many others.[7585]

[7583] Burton. Printed page 372, second asterisk: "Plus proficiet gutta mea, quam tot eorum drachmæ & unciæ." A drop of mine will do more good than all those drams and ounces of theirs.

[7584] Editor. A dram and an ounce are units of weight. "Heteroclitical" means irregular or anomalous; in this insult the pills defy proper form. "Horse medicines" dismisses the rival preparations as fit for animals. Polyphemus, the monstrous Cyclops, supplies a comic measure of their repulsiveness. The claims are presented as Paracelsus's boasts.

[7585] Editor. Burton's middle position admits mineral remedies while resisting both blanket rejection and extravagant claims. The long list of authorities is retained in order. Abbreviated titles are translated descriptively where clear; Audernacus, Euonymus, Rubeus and Andreas à Blawen remain in the printed forms pending a full bibliographical collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7586]Matthiolus in the same place approves of potable gold, Mercury, with many such Chymicall Confections, and goes so far in approbation of them, that he holds [7587]no man can be an excellent Physician that hath not some skill in Chymisticall distillations, and that Chronick diseases can hardly be cured without mineral medicines: Look for Antimony among purgers.	In the same place Mattioli approves of potable gold, mercury and many similar chemical preparations. He goes so far in approving them as to maintain that "no one can be an excellent physician without some skill in chemical distillation, and chronic diseases can scarcely be cured without mineral medicines." Look for antimony among purgatives.[7588]

[7586] Burton. Printed page 372, k: "Nonnulli huic supra modum indulgent, usum esse non adeo magnum, non tamen abjiciendum censeo." Some indulge in this beyond measure; I judge its usefulness not so great, yet not to be rejected.

[7587] Burton. Printed page 372, l: "Ausim dicere neminem medicum excellentem qui non in hac distillatione chymica sit versatus. Morbi chronici devinci citra metallica vix possunt, aut ubi sanguis corrumpitur." I would venture to say that no physician is excellent unless experienced in this chemical distillation. Chronic diseases, or cases in which the blood is corrupted, can hardly be overcome without mineral remedies.

[7588] Editor. "Confections" means compounded medicinal preparations, not sweets. The k note says that the use is overrated but should not be rejected, while the body stresses Mattioli's approval; both remain. The l note adds cases involving corrupted blood to chronic disease, a qualification absent from the English body. "Without mineral medicines" follows citra metallica. The final sentence directs the reader to Burton's later discussion of purgatives.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 5. Compound Alteratives, censure of Compounds, and mixt Physick.	SUBSECTION 5 Compound alteratives criticism of compounds and mixed medicines
Pliny lib. 24. c. 1. bitterly taxeth all compound medicines. [7589]Mens knavery, imposture, and captious wits have invented these shops, in which every mans life is set to sale: and by and by came in those compositions and inexplicable mixtures, far fetcht out of India and Arabia; a medicine for a botch must be had as farre as the red sea, &c.	Pliny, book 24, chapter 1, bitterly attacks all compound medicines. "Human knavery, fraud and cunning have invented these shops, in which everyone's life is put up for sale. Soon afterwards came those compounds and incomprehensible mixtures, fetched from as far away as India and Arabia; a medicine for a sore must come all the way from the Red Sea," and so on.[7590]
And 'tis not without cause which he saith; for out of question they are much to [7591]blame in their compositions, whilst they make infinite variety of mixtures,	He does not say this without reason. They are unquestionably much to blame for their compounds when they make endless varieties of mixtures, [7589] Burton. Printed page 372, m: "Fraudes hominum & ingeniorum capturæ, officinas invenêre istas, in quibus sua cuique venalis promittitur vita; statim compositiones & mixturæ inexplicabiles ex Arabia & India, ulceri parvo medicina à rubro mari importatur." Human fraud and intellectual trickery invented these shops, in which each person is promised his own life for a price; immediately there are compounds and inexplicable mixtures from Arabia and India; for a little sore medicine is imported from the Red Sea.

[7590] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 24.1.4–5, attacks the sale of elaborate medicines made from costly imports. "Botch" means a sore or swelling. Burton compresses the Latin and supplies his own English account; each is retained. The marginal promittitur and importatur are preserved rather than replaced with the comparison text's wording. This is historical medical argument, not a prescription for present-day treatment.

[7591] Burton. Printed page 372, n, below the body: "Arnoldus Aphor. 15. Fallax medicus qui potens mederi simplicibus, composita dolose aut frustra quærit." Arnoldus, Aphorism 15. A physician is deceitful who, though able to cure with simples, seeks compounds fraudulently or needlessly.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as [7592]Fuchsius notes. They think they get themselves great credit, excel others, and to be more learned then the rest, because they make many variations; but he accounts them fools, and whilst they brag of their skill, and think to get themselves a name, they become ridiculous, bewray their ignorance and error.	as Fuchs observes. “They think they gain great credit, surpass others and show themselves more learned than the rest by making many variations. But he considers them fools: while they boast of their skill and think to make a name for themselves, they become ridiculous and reveal their ignorance and error.”[7593]
Source page 372–373 A few simples well prepared and understood, are better then such an heap of nonsense confused compounds, which are in Apothecaries shops ordinarily sold. In which many vain, superfluous, corrupt, exolete things out of date are to be had (saith Cornarius*) a company of barbarous names given to Syrrops, Julips, an unnecessary company of mixt medicines: rudis indigestaque moles.	A few single medicinal substances, properly prepared and understood, are better than the heap of nonsensical, confused compounds ordinarily sold in apothecaries’ shops. “There one finds many useless, superfluous, spoiled, obsolete things, long out of date,” says Cornarius, “a collection of barbarous names given to syrups and juleps, an unnecessary mass of mixed medicines: a crude, undigested heap.”[7594]

[7592] Burton. Printed page 372, o, continued across the foot: “Lib. 1. Sect. 1. cap. 8. Dum infinita medicamenta miscent, laudem sibi comparare student, & in hoc studio alter alterum superare conatur, dum quisque, quo plura miscuerit, eo se doctiorem putet, inde fit ut suam prodant inscitiam, dum ostentant peritiam, & se ridiculos exhibeant, &c.” Book 1, section 1, chapter 8. While mixing innumerable medicines, they strive to win praise, and each tries to surpass the other in this pursuit, thinking himself more learned the more ingredients he mixes. Thus, while displaying their expertise, they reveal their ignorance and make themselves ridiculous, and so on.

[7593] Editor. “Simples” are single medicinal substances; compounds combine them. The n note resembles Arnald of Villanova, Medicationis parabole II.15 (Giralt, p. 83), but adds Fallax medicus qui and varies the wording. It is an independent condemnation; o supplies the Latin for Fuchs. Both foot-of-page notes are retained in full. “Bewray” means reveal.

[7594] Editor. “Exolete” means obsolete or fallen out of use; “barbarous” criticizes the names as uncouth or linguistically corrupt. Juleps are sweet medicinal drinks. The phrase rudis indigestaque moles comes from Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.7, where it describes primordial chaos. An asterisk precedes Cornarius in the body, but no corresponding marginal text is visible on these two pages; the asterisk is retained without an invented source note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 373 Many times (as Agrippa taxeth) there is by this means [7595]more danger from the medicine then from the disease; when they put together they know not what, or leave it to an illiterate Apothecary to be made, they cause death and horror for health. Those old Physitians had no such mixtures; a simple potion of Hellebor in Hippocrates time, was the ordinary purge;	Often, as Agrippa charges, this makes the medicine more dangerous than the disease. When they combine they know not what, or leave an unlearned apothecary to prepare it, they bring death and horror in place of health. The ancient physicians had no such mixtures: in Hippocrates' time a simple hellebore potion was the usual purge.[7596]
and at this day, saith [7597]Mat. Riccius, in that flourishing Commonwealth of China, Their Physitians give precepts quite opposite to ours, not unhappy in their Physick: they use altogether roots, hearbs, and simples in their medicines, and all their Physick in a manner is comprehended in an herbal: no science, no schoole, no art, no degree, but like a trade, every man in private is instructed of his Master. [7598]Cardan cracks that he can cure all diseases with water alone, as Hippocrates of old did most infirmities with one medicine.	Even today, says Matteo Ricci, in the flourishing commonwealth of China, "their physicians teach principles quite opposite to ours, yet are not unsuccessful in their practice. They use only roots, herbs and single substances in their medicines, and almost their entire medicine is contained in a herbal. There is no science, school, formal art or degree: each man learns privately from his master, as in a trade." Cardano boasts that he can cure every disease with water alone, just as Hippocrates long ago treated most ailments with one medicine.[7599]

[7595] Burton. Printed page 373, p: "Multo plus periculi à medicamento quam à morbo, &c." There is much more danger from the medicine than from the disease, and so on.

[7596] Editor. Compare Agrippa, Vanity, chapter 83, opening, on danger from medicine; chapter 84 attacks excessive compounding and compares mixtures to chaos (1676 English translation, pp. 285–286, 300). Burton's Latin and intermediary remain uncollated. His Hippocratic generalization is retained. "Illiterate" means lacking learned education; "for health" means instead of health.

[7597] Burton. Printed page 373, r: "Expedit in Sinas lib. 1. c. 5. Præcepta medici dant nostris diversa, in medendo non infelices, pharmacis utuntur simplicibus, Herbis, radicibus, &c. tota eorum medicina nostræ herbariæ præceptis continetur; nullus ludus hujus artis, quisque privatus à quolibet magistro eruditur." Expedition to China, book 1, chapter 5. Their physicians give rules different from ours and are not unsuccessful in healing. They use simple medicines, herbs, roots and so on. All their medicine is contained in the precepts of our herbal learning. There is no school for this art; each individual is taught privately by a master of his choice.

[7598] Burton. Printed page 373, dagger: "Lib. de Aqua." Book on Water.

[7599] Editor. Mat. Riccius is Matteo Ricci. The margin cites Expedition to China, book 1, chapter 5; the USTC records De Christiana expeditione apud Sinas under Ricci, Augsburg, 1615. Burton's account is a European observer's generalization about Chinese medicine and instruction, not an independently verified description of the entire tradition. "Cracks" means boasts. Cardano's Book on Water remains an abbreviated, uncollated reference.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Let the best of our rational Physitians demonstrate and give a sufficient reason for those intricate mixtures; why just so many simples in Mithridate or Treacle, why such and such quantity; may they not be reduced to half or a quarter? Frustra fit per plura (as the saying is) quod fieri potest per pauciora; 300 simples in a julip, potion, or a little pill, to what end or purpose?	Let the best of our physicians who reason from theory demonstrate and give a sufficient explanation for those intricate mixtures. Why precisely that many ingredients in mithridate or theriac? Why these particular quantities? Could they not be reduced by half, or to a quarter? As the saying goes, "It is needless to do with more what can be done with fewer." Three hundred ingredients in a julep, a potion or a little pill: to what end or purpose?[7600]
I know not what [7601]Alkindus, Capivaccius, Montagna, and Simon Eitover, the best of them all and most rational have said in this kind; but neither he, they, nor any one of them, gives his reader, to my judgement, that satisfaction which he ought; why such, so many simples? Rog. Bacon hath taxed many errors in his tract de graduationibus, explained some things, but not cleared.	I do not know what al-Kindi, Capivaccius, Montagna and Simon Eitover, the best and most rational of them all, have said on this subject; but neither he nor they nor any one of them gives the reader, in my judgement, the satisfaction he should. Why these ingredients, and why so many? Roger Bacon has criticized many errors in his treatise On Degrees, explaining some things without making them clear.[7602]

[7600] Editor. Mithridate and theriac are complex compound antidotes; "treacle" has that medicinal sense here. "Rational" means proceeding by learned reasoning or theory, as opposed to relying principally on experience. The Latin maxim recommends economy of means. Burton's figure of 300 is retained as part of his challenge, not treated as the verified composition of a particular pill.

[7601] Burton. Printed page 373, s: "Opusc. de Dos." Short work on dosage; the title is abbreviated in the print.

[7602] Editor. Alkindus is al-Kindi. Simon Eitover probably refers to Simon e Tovar, author of De compositorum medicamentorum examine nova methodus (Antwerp, 1586), recorded in Plantin's commercial list, f. 4v, item 80. This is bibliographical evidence, not collation of the book. The printed name, Montagna and the uncertain s-note attachment remain unchanged. Degrees are graded medicinal qualities; Burton's scepticism is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Mercurialis in his book de composit. medicin. gives instance in Hamech, and Philonium Romanum, which Hamech an Arabian, and Philonius a Roman long since composed, but crasie as the rest. If they be so exact, as by him it seems they were, and those mixtures so perfect, why doth Fernelius alter the one, and why is the other obsolete? [7603]Cardan taxeth Galen for presuming out of his ambition to correct Theriachum Andromachi, and we as justly may carp at all the rest.	Mercurialis, in his book On the Composition of Medicines, takes as examples Hamech and Philonium Romanum, compounded long ago by Hamech, an Arabian, and Philonius, a Roman, but as unsound as the rest. If they are so exact, as his account suggests, and the mixtures so perfect, why does Fernel alter one, and why has the other fallen out of use? Cardano criticizes Galen for ambitiously presuming to correct Andromachus' theriac, and we may find fault with all the others just as fairly.[7604]
Galens medicines are now exploded and rejected; what Nicholas Meripsa, Mesue, Celsus, Scribanius, Actuarius, &c. writ of old, are most part contemned. Mellichius, Cordus, Wecker, Quercetan, Rhenodeus, the Venetian, Florentine states have their several receipts, and Magistrals: They of Noremberge have theirs, and Augustana Pharmacopœa, peculiar medicines to the meridian of the City:	Galen's medicines are now discredited and rejected. Most of what Nicholas Meripsa, Mesue, Celsus, Scribanius, Actuarius and others wrote long ago is despised. Mellichius, Cordus, Wecker, Quercetanus and Renodaeus, and the Venetian and Florentine states, have their respective recipes and special formulations. Nuremberg has its own, and the Augsburg Pharmacopoeia has medicines peculiar to that city's meridian.[7605]

[7603] Burton. Printed page 373, t: "Subtil. cap. de scientiis." On Subtlety, chapter on the sciences.

[7604] Editor. "Crasie" means unsound or defective. Hamech and Philonium Romanum name compound preparations; their supposed inventors and histories are Burton's account, still requiring collation with Mercurialis. "Exploded" in the next passage means discredited or rejected, not physically blown apart.

[7605] Editor. "Receipts" are recipes, and "magistrals" special or individually devised formulations. The "meridian" invokes the local situation or climate to which a city's remedies are supposedly suited. Augustana is Augsburg. Meripsa and Scribanius are retained as printed forms rather than silently corrected; the catalogue of pharmacopoeias and authorities remains to be fully collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
London hers, every city, town, almost every private man hath his own mixtures, compositions, receipts, magistrals, precepts, as if he scorned antiquity, and all others in respect of himself. But each man must correct and alter to shew his skill, every opinionative fellow must maintain his own paradox, be it what it will; Delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi: they dote, and in the mean time the poor patients pay for their new experiments, the Commonalty rue it.	London has its own; every city, town and almost every private individual has his own mixtures, compounds, recipes, special formulations and rules, as though he scorned antiquity and everyone else in comparison with himself. Each must correct and alter things to display his skill; every opinionated fellow must defend his own paradox, whatever it may be. "The kings act madly; the Greeks suffer for it." They rave, while the poor patients pay for their new experiments: ordinary people bear the cost.[7606]
Source page 373–374 Thus others object, thus I may conceive out of the weaknesse of my apprehension; but to say truth, there is no such fault, no such ambition, no novelty, or ostentation, as some suppose, but as [7607]one answers, this of compound medicines, is a most noble and profitable invention found out, and brought into Physick with great judgement, wisdome, counsel and discretion.	These are the objections others raise, and the conclusions I may draw through the weakness of my understanding. Yet in truth there is no such fault, ambition, novelty or ostentation as some suppose. As one writer answers, the practice of compound medicines "is a most noble and useful invention, devised and introduced into medicine with great judgement, wisdom, deliberation and discretion."[7608]

[7606] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.2.14, describes the Greeks suffering for their kings' folly. Burton omits the opening word of the line and applies its political relation to physicians and patients. The new translation of the Latin is followed by Burton's separate English elaboration. "Dote" means act foolishly or irrationally.

[7607] Burton. Printed page 373, u: "Quercetan. pharmacop. restitut. cap. 2. Nobilissimum & utilissimum inventum summa cum necessitate adinventum & introductum." Quercetanus, Restored Pharmacopoeia, chapter 2. A most noble and useful invention, devised and introduced under the greatest necessity.

[7608] Editor. The abrupt reversal is Burton's own: he moves from objections to a defence of compounds. The margin names Quercetanus, Restored Pharmacopoeia, chapter 2. Its summa cum necessitate stresses necessity, whereas Burton's English stresses judgement and discretion. Neither is rewritten to match the other.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 374 Mixt diseases must have mixt remedies, and such simples are commonly mixt as have reference to the part affected, some to qualify, the rest to comfort, some one part, some another. Cardan and Brassavola both hold that Nullum simplex medicamentum sine noxa, no simple medicine is without hurt or offence; and although Hippocrates, Erasistratus, Diocles of old, in the infancy of this art, were content with ordinary simples;	Mixed diseases require mixed remedies. The substances commonly combined relate to the affected part, some to temper its condition, others to strengthen it, some acting on one part and some on another. Cardano and Brasavola both maintain that "no single medicinal substance is without harm": no simple medicine is free from hurt or injury. Although Hippocrates, Erasistratus and Diocles, in the infancy of this art, were content with ordinary simples,[7609]
yet now, saith [7610]Ætius, necessity compelleth to seek for new remedies, and to make compounds of simples, as well to correct their harms if cold, dry, hot, thick, thin, insipid, noysome to smell, to make them savory to the palat, pleasant to taste and take, and to preserve them for continuance, by admixtion of sugar, hony, to make them last moneths, and years for several uses.	now, says Aetius, "necessity compels us to seek new remedies and combine single substances: to correct their harmful properties, whether cold, dry, hot, thick, thin, tasteless or foul-smelling; to make them agreeable to the palate and pleasant to taste and take; and, by adding sugar or honey, to preserve them for months or years for various uses."[7611]

[7609] Editor. "Mixed diseases" have more than one contributing condition in this medical scheme. To "qualify" is to temper or modify; to "comfort" is to strengthen. Burton gives both the Latin statement and its English gloss, and both remain in the modern text.

[7610] Burton. Printed page 374, x: "Cap. 25. Tetrabib. 4. ser. 2. Necessitas nunc cogit aliquando noxia quærere remedia, & ex simplicibus compositas facere, tum ad saporem, odorem, palati gratiam, ad correctionem simplicium, tum ad futuros usus, conservationem, &c." Chapter 25, fourth Tetrabiblos, second section. Necessity now sometimes compels us to seek harmful remedies and make compound preparations from simples, both for flavour, smell, the palate's satisfaction and the correction of the simples, and for future use, preservation and so on.

[7611] Editor. The scan clearly prints noxia, "harmful," in the Latin margin, whereas Burton's English says "new remedies," which would correspond to nova. Both readings are preserved. Compositas is also retained as printed. Aetius' abbreviated location and the quotation need collation; the discrepancy is not silently repaired.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In such cases, compound medicines may be approved, and Arnoldus in his 18. Aphorisme, doth allow of it. [7612]If Simples cannot, necessity compels us to use compounds; so for receits and magistrals, dies diem docet, one day teacheth another, and they are as so many words or phrases, Quæ nunc sunt in honore vocabula si volet usus. Ebbe and flow with the season, and as wits vary, so they may be infinitely varied.	In such cases compound medicines deserve approval, and Arnoldus allows them in his eighteenth aphorism: "If simples cannot do the work, necessity compels us to use compounds." As for recipes and special formulations, "one day teaches another"—one day instructs the next. They resemble words and phrases, "the words now held in honour, if usage so wills." They ebb and flow with the season, and as minds differ, so they can be endlessly varied.[7613]
Quisque suum placitum quo capiatur habet,	Everyone has a favourite that captivates him.[7614]
Every man as he likes, so many men so many minds; and yet all tending to good purpose, though not the same way. As arts and sciences, so Physick is still perfected amongst the rest; Horæ musarum nutrices, and experience teacheth us every day [7615]many things which our predecessors knew not of. Nature is not effœte, as he saith, or so lavish, to bestow all her gifts upon an age, but hath reserved some for posterity, to shew her power, that she is still the same, and not old or consumed.	Each man follows his own liking: as many minds as men, yet all working towards a good end, though by different paths. Like the other arts and sciences, medicine continues to improve. "The hours are the nurses of the Muses," and experience teaches us every day many things our predecessors did not know. Nature, as he says, is not exhausted, nor so lavish as to bestow all her gifts on a single age. She has kept some for posterity, to show her power and prove that she is still the same, neither aged nor spent.[7616]

[7612] Burton. Printed page 374, y: "Cum simplicia non possunt necessitas cogit ad composita." When simples cannot do the work, necessity compels us to resort to compounds.

[7613] Editor. Horace, Art of Poetry 70–72, describes words falling out of use and returning as usage dictates. Burton quotes only the subordinate phrase at line 71, leaving its governing verb unstated; the fragment is retained within his comparison of changing words and changing recipes. Dies diem docet receives both a new translation and Burton's own English gloss.

[7614] Editor. The single Latin verse means that each person has a preferred thing or opinion that wins him over. Burton gives no author here, and the source has not been securely identified. Its separate verse form and the following English paraphrase are retained.

[7615] Burton. Printed page 374, z: "Lips. Epist." Lipsius, Letters.

[7616] Editor. "Still" means continually; "effœte" means exhausted or no longer productive. The Latin saying makes passing time the nurse of learning and the arts. The margin cites Lipsius' Letters for the argument about knowledge reserved for later ages, without specifying a letter; that reference remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Birds and beasts can cure themselves by nature, [7617]naturæ usu ea plerumque cognoscunt, quæ homines vix longo labore & doctrinâ assequuntur, but men must use much labour and industry to find it out: But I digresse.	Birds and beasts can cure themselves by nature: "Through natural experience they commonly know things that human beings scarcely attain through long labour and learning." But people must work hard and diligently to discover them. Yet I digress.[7618]
Compound medicines, are inwardly taken, or outwardly applyed. Inwardly taken, be either liquid or solid: liquid, are fluid or consisting. Fluid, as Wines and Syrrups. The wines ordinarily used to this disease, are Wormewood-wine, Tamarisk, and Buglossatum, wine made of Borage and bugloss. The composition of which, is specified in Arnoldus Villanovanus, lib. de vinis of Borage, Bawm, Bugloss, Cinamon, &c. and highly commended for its vertues,	Compound medicines are taken internally or applied externally. Those taken internally are either liquid or solid; liquids are either fluid or thick. Fluids include wines and syrups. The wines ordinarily used for this disease are wormwood wine, tamarisk wine and buglossatum, a wine made from borage and bugloss. Arnoldus Villanovanus, in his Book of Wines, specifies its composition: borage, balm, bugloss, cinnamon and so on. It is highly praised for its powers:[7619]

[7617] Burton. Printed page 374, dagger: "Theod. Podromus Amor. lib. 9." Theodorus Podromus, Amours, book 9.

[7618] Editor. The margin prints Theod. Podromus; this may refer to Theodorus Prodromus' romance, but the identification, exact passage and Latin intermediary remain uncollated. The wording naturæ usu is translated as printed, "through natural experience." The claim contrasts animal self-treatment with acquired human knowledge.

[7619] Editor. "Consisting" means having body or thickness: here liquids of a thicker consistency, distinguished from freely flowing ones. Arnoldus Villanovanus is the name under which Burton cites the Book of Wines; the authorship and edition of this particular text remain to be checked. Borage and bugloss are retained as separate historical herb names.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7620]it drives away Leprosy, Scabs, cleers the blood, recreates the spirits, exhilarates the mind, purgeth the brain of those anxious black melancholy fumes, and cleanseth the whole body of that black humour by urine. To which I adde, saith Villanovanus, that it will bring mad men, and such raging Bedlams as are tied in chains, to the use of their reason again.	"It drives away leprosy and scabs, clears the blood, refreshes the spirits, cheers the mind, purges the brain of those distressing black melancholic fumes, and cleanses the whole body of that black humour through the urine. To this I add," says Villanovanus, "that it will restore reason to mad people and to raging lunatics who have been put in chains."[7621]
Source page 374–375 My conscience bears me witness, that I do not lye, I saw a grave matron helped by this means; she was so cholerick, and so furious sometimes, that she was almost mad, and beside her self, she said and did she knew not what, scolded, beat her maids, and was now ready to be bound till she drank of this Borage wine, and by this excellent remedy, was cured, which a poor forrainer, a silly beggar taught her by chance, that came to crave an alms from door to door.	"My conscience is my witness that I do not lie. I saw a respectable matron helped in this way. She was so irritable, and sometimes so furious, that she was almost mad and beside herself; she did not know what she was saying or doing, scolded and beat her maids, and was about to be bound. Then she drank this borage wine and was cured by that excellent remedy, which a poor stranger, a humble beggar going from door to door for alms, happened to teach her."[7622]

[7620] Burton. Printed page 374, a, continued across the foot: "Sanguinem corruptum emaculat, scabiem abolet, lepram curat, spiritus recreat, & animum exhilarat. Melancholicos humores per urinam educit, & cerebrum à crassis, ærumnosis melancholiæ fumis purgat, quibus addo dementes & furiosos vinculis retinendos plurimum juvat, & ad rationis usum ducit. Testis est mihi conscientia, quod viderim matronam quandam hinc liberatam, quæ frequentius ex iracundia demens, & impos animi dicenda tacenda loquebatur, adeo furens ut ligari cogeretur. Fuit ei præstantissimo remedio, vini istius usus, indicatus à peregrino homine mendico, eleemosynam præ foribus dictæ matronæ implorante." It cleanses corrupted blood, removes scabs, cures leprosy, refreshes the spirits and cheers the mind. It expels melancholic humours through the urine and purges the brain of thick, distressing fumes of melancholy. I add that it greatly helps the mad and the raging who must be restrained in bonds, restoring the use of reason. My conscience is my witness that I saw a certain matron relieved by it. Often driven mad by anger and beside herself, she said things that should be spoken and things that should remain unsaid, raging so violently that she had to be bound. The use of this wine proved a most excellent remedy for her, revealed by a wandering beggar asking for alms before her door.

[7621] Editor. "Spirits" are the subtle bodily agents of life and sensation. "Bedlams" is a period term for people considered mad, associated with Bethlem hospital; it is rendered in its historical sense. The long a note includes the matron's story and continues across the foot of printed page 374. The full note is attached here at its printed anchor.

[7622] Editor. The first-person witness is Villanovanus as quoted by Burton, not Burton himself. "Grave" means respectable or dignified, and "silly" means humble or pitiable. The Latin says the matron had to be bound; Burton's English says she was about to be bound and adds the beating of her maids. Both versions remain. "Cholerick" joins irascibility to the language of bodily humours.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 375 The juyce of Borage, if it be clarified, and drunk in wine, will do as much, the roots sliced and steeped, &c. saith Ant. Mizaldus art. med. who cites this story verbatim out of Villanovanus, and so doth Magninus a Physitian of Millan, in his regiment of health.	Clarified borage juice drunk in wine will do as much, as will the sliced and steeped roots and so on, says Antoine Mizauld in The Art of Medicine. He quotes this story word for word from Villanovanus, as does Magninus, a physician of Milan, in his Regimen of Health.[7623]
Such another excellent compound water I find in Rubeus de distill. sect. 3. which he highly magnifies out of Savanarola, [7624]for such as are solitary, dull, heavy or sad without a cause, or be troubled with trembling of heart. Other excellent compound waters for melancholy, he cites in the same place; [7625]If their melancholy be not inflamed, or their temperature over hot. Evonimus hath a pretious Aqua vitæ to this purpose, for such as are cold.	I find another excellent compound water in Rubeus, On Distillation, section 3. Citing Savonarola, he praises it highly "for those who are solitary, dull, dejected or sad without cause, or troubled by trembling of the heart." In the same place he cites other excellent compound waters for melancholy, "provided their melancholy is not inflamed and their bodily constitution is not too hot." Evonimus has a valuable aqua vitae for this purpose, for those of a cold constitution.[7626]

[7623] Editor. "Clarified" means cleared of suspended matter; "regiment" here means regimen, a plan for preserving health. Mizauld and Magninus are cited as transmitters of the story. The claim of verbatim repetition has not been independently established, and the authorial attribution to Villanovanus remains subject to collation.

[7624] Burton. Printed page 375, b: "Iis qui tristantur sine causa, & vitant amicorum societatem & tremunt corde." For those who are sad without cause, avoid the company of friends and tremble at heart.

[7625] Burton. Printed page 375, c: "Modo non inflammetur melancholia, aut calidiore temperamento sint." Provided melancholy is not inflamed, or they are of a hotter constitution.

[7626] Editor. "Compound waters" are medicinal preparations obtained or compounded as waters; aqua vitae denotes a distilled spirit. "Temperature" means bodily temperament or constitution. The b margin mentions avoiding friends, where the body says solitary. The c margin lacks a second explicit negative before "of a hotter constitution"; Burton's English excludes excessive heat. Its Latin syntax is retained in the separate translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But he and most commend Aurum potabile, and every writer prescribes clarified whey, with Borage, Bugloss, Endive, Succory, &c. of Goats milk especially, some indefinitely at all times, some thirty dayes together in the spring, every morning fasting, a good draught. Syrupes are very good, and often used to digest this humour in the heart, spleen, liver, &c. As Syrupe of Borage, (there is a famous Syrupe of Borage highly commended by Laurentius to this purpose in his Tract of melancholy) de pomis of King Sabor now obsolete; of Thyme and Epithyme, Hops, Scolopendria, Fumitory, Maidenhair, Bizantine, &c.	But he and most other writers recommend potable gold; and every writer prescribes clarified whey, especially from goat's milk, with borage, bugloss, endive, chicory and so on. Some prescribe it at any time without restriction; others prescribe a good draught every morning before eating for thirty consecutive days in spring. Syrups are very good and often used to prepare this humour for evacuation from the heart, spleen, liver and other parts. These include syrup of borage—Laurentius highly praises a famous borage syrup for this purpose in his Treatise on Melancholy—King Sabor's apple syrup, now obsolete, and syrups of thyme, dodder of thyme, hops, scolopendria, fumitory, maidenhair, Bizantine and so on.[7627]
These are most used for preparatives to other Physick, mixt with distilled waters of like nature, or in Julips otherwise. Consisting, are conserves or confections; conserves of Borage, Bugloss, Bawm, Fumitory, Succory, Maidenhair, Violets, Roses, Wormwood, &c. Confections, Treacle, Mithridate, Eclegms, or Linctures, &c.	These are mostly used to prepare for other medicines, mixed with distilled waters of the same nature or otherwise made into juleps. Thick preparations are conserves or confections: conserves of borage, bugloss, balm, fumitory, chicory, maidenhair, violets, roses, wormwood and so on; confections such as theriac, mithridate, eclegms or linctures, and the like.[7628]

[7627] Editor. "Potable" means drinkable. To "digest" a humour means to prepare or mature it for evacuation within humoral medicine. "Indefinitely" does not specify a fixed schedule. De pomis means "of apples." Sabor, Scolopendria and Bizantine remain historical names; their precise identification or formulation here has not been securely established.

[7628] Editor. Conserves preserve plant material, commonly with sugar; confections are compounded medicinal preparations. Eclegms and linctures are preparations taken by licking or swallowing slowly. These categories and the preceding medicinal schedules are retained as Burton's account. "Consisting" is again rendered "thick."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Solid, as Aromatical confections; hot, Diambra, Diamargaritum calidum, Dianthus, Diamoschum dulce, Electuarium de gemmis, lætificans Galeni & Rhasis, Diagalinga, Diacimynum, Dianisum, Diatrion piperion, Diazinziber, Diacapers, Diacinnamonum: Cold, as Diamargaritum frigidum, Diacorolli, Diarrhodon Abbatis, Diacodion, &c. as every Pharmacopœa will shew you, with their tables or losings that are made out of them; with Condites and the like.	Solid preparations include aromatic confections. The hot ones are Diambra, Diamargaritum calidum, Dianthus, Diamoschum dulce, Electuarium de gemmis, the cheering preparation of Galen and Rhazes, Diagalinga, Diacimynum, Dianisum, Diatrion piperion, Diazinziber, Diacapers and Diacinnamonum. The cold ones include Diamargaritum frigidum, Diacorolli, Diarrhodon Abbatis, Diacodion and so on, as any pharmacopoeia will show you, together with the tablets or lozenges made from them, candied preparations and the like.[7629]
Outwardly used as occasion serves, as amulets, oyls hot and cold, as of Camomile, Stæchado's, Violets, Roses, Almonds, Poppy, Nymphea, Mandrake, &c. to be used after bathing, or to procure sleep. Oyntments composed of the said species, oyls and wax, &c. as Alablastritum Populeum, some hot, some cold, to moysten, procure sleep, and correct other accidents.	External preparations, used as occasion requires, include amulets and oils, hot and cold: oils of chamomile, stoechas, violets, roses, almonds, poppy, water lily, mandrake and so on, for use after bathing or to bring on sleep. Ointments are compounded from those ingredients, oils, wax and the like, such as Alablastritum Populeum. Some are hot and some cold, to moisten, induce sleep and remedy other symptoms.[7630]
Liniments are made of the same matter to the like purpose: Emplaisters of herbs, flowers, roots, &c. with oyls, and other liquors mixt and boiled together. Cataplasms, salves, or pultises made of green herbs, pounded, or sod in water till they be soft, which are applied to the Hypocondries, and other parts when the body is empty;	Liniments are made from the same materials for the same purposes. Plasters consist of herbs, flowers, roots and so on, mixed and boiled together with oils and other liquids. Cataplasms, salves or poultices are made from fresh herbs, pounded or boiled in water until soft, and applied to the upper abdominal regions and other parts when the body is empty.[7631]

[7629] Editor. The preparation names are retained so they can be traced in historical pharmacopoeias. Calidum and frigidum mean hot and cold; Electuarium de gemmis is an electuary of gems; lætificans denotes a cheering preparation. The remaining names are not replaced by guessed modern recipes. "Tables" and "losings" mean tablets and lozenges; "condites" are preserved or candied preparations.

[7630] Editor. Stæchado's is a historical stoechas name, and Nymphea is water lily. The print has Alablastritum Populeum without an intervening conjunction; that uncertain formulation is retained rather than silently divided into two ointment names. "Species" means ingredients in this pharmaceutical context, and "accidents" associated symptoms or conditions.

[7631] Editor. "Sod" means boiled; the "hypocondries" are the regions beneath the ribs, particularly the upper abdomen. Burton does not specify precisely what degree or kind of bodily emptiness he intends here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cerotes, are applyed to several parts, and Frontals, to take away pain, grief, heat, procure sleep. Fomentations or spunges, wet in some decoctions, &c. Epithemata, or those moist medicines, laid on linnen, to bath and cool several parts misaffected. Sacculi, or little bags of herbs, flowers, seeds, roots, and the like applied to the head, heart, stomack, &c. odoraments, balls, perfumes, posies to smell to, all which have their several uses in melancholy, as shall be shewed, when I treate of the cure of the distinct Species by themselves.	Wax-based dressings are applied to various parts, and forehead dressings used to relieve pain, distress and heat, or to bring on sleep. There are fomentations, or sponges soaked in decoctions and similar liquids; epithems, moist medicines laid on linen to bathe and cool the affected parts; and sacculi, little bags of herbs, flowers, seeds, roots and the like, applied to the head, heart, stomach and other parts. There are also scented substances, scent balls, perfumes and bouquets to smell. Each has its particular use in melancholy, as I will show when I discuss the treatment of its distinct kinds separately.[7632]

[7632] Editor. Cerotes are wax-based medicinal dressings; frontals are applied to the forehead. Fomentations bathe a part with medicated liquid; epithems are moist topical applications. Sacculi means small bags. The list moves from internal compounds to externally applied preparations and scents, concluding Member 1.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 376 MEMB. 2. SUBSECT. 1. Purging Simples upward.	MEMBER 2 SUBSECTION 1 Single substances that purge upwards
Melangoga, or melancholy purgin medicines, are either Simple or Compound, and that gently, or violently, purging upwards or downward. These following purge upward. [7633]Asarum, or Asrabecca, which as Mesue saith, is hot in the second degree, and dry in the third, it is commonly taken in wine, whey, or as with us, the juyce of two or three leaves or more sometimes, pounded in posset drink qualified with a little liquorice, or anniseeds, to avoid the fulsomness of the taste, or as Diaserum Fernelii.	Melangoga, medicines that purge melancholy, are either single substances or compounds, acting gently or violently, upwards or downwards. The following purge upwards. Asarum, or asarabacca, is, according to Mesue, hot in the second degree and dry in the third. "It is commonly taken in wine or whey"; or, as among us, the juice of two or three leaves, sometimes more, is pounded into posset drink, tempered with a little liquorice or aniseed to prevent its nauseating taste; or it is used as Fernel's Diaserum.[7634]
Brassivola in Catart. reckons it up amongst those simples that only purge melancholy, and Ruellius confirms as much out of his experience, that it purgeth [7635]black choler, like Hellebor it self. Galen lib. 6. simplic. and [7636]Matthiolus ascribe other vertues to it, and will have it purge other humors as well as this.	Brasavola, in his work on purgatives, lists it among the single substances that purge only melancholy. Ruel confirms from experience that it purges black bile like hellebore itself. Galen, book 6, On Simple Medicines, and Mattioli attribute other powers to it and maintain that it purges other humours as well.[7637]

[7633] Burton. Printed page 376, d: "Heurnius: datur in sero lactis, aut vino." Heurnius: it is given in whey or wine.

[7634] Editor. "Purging upwards" means inducing vomiting, while downward purging evacuates through the bowels. The printed Melangoga and purgin are preserved on the left. The historical Asrabecca is modernized to asarabacca; exact botanical identity is not imposed on every occurrence. A posset is a drink based on curdled milk. Degrees of heat and dryness refer to humoral qualities. The printed Diaserum is retained as a preparation name.

[7635] Burton. Printed page 376, e: "Veratri modo expurgat cerebrum, roborat memoriam. Fuchsius." It purges the brain like hellebore and strengthens the memory. Fuchs.

[7636] Burton. Printed page 376, f: "Crassos & biliosos humores per vomitum educit." It expels thick and bilious humours by vomiting.

[7637] Editor. The body attributes the experience to Ruellius, while margin e cites Fuchs and speaks of purging the brain and strengthening memory. Both attributions and claims are retained. The f margin mentions thick and bilious humours without specifying only black bile.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Laurel, by Heurnius method. ad prax. lib. 2. cap. 24. is put amongst the strong purgers of melancholy; it is hot and dry in the fourth degree. [7638]Dioscorides lib. 11. cap. 114. adds other effects to it. Pliny sets down 15. berries in drink for a sufficient potion: it is commonly corrected with his opposites, cold and moist, as juyce of Endive, Purslane, and is taken in a potion to seaven grains and a half. But this and Asrabecca, every Gentlewoman in the Country knows how to give, they are two common vomits.	Heurnius, in his Method of Practice, book 2, chapter 24, classes laurel among the strong purgatives of melancholy. It is hot and dry in the fourth degree. Dioscorides, book 11, chapter 114, attributes other effects to it. Pliny gives fifteen berries in a drink as a sufficient potion. It is usually tempered with substances of the opposite qualities, cold and moist, such as endive or purslane juice, and taken in a potion in an amount of seven and a half grains. But every country gentlewoman knows how to administer this and asarabacca: they are two common emetics.[7639]
Scilla, or Sea Onyon, is hot and dry in the third degree. Brassivola in Catart. out of Mesue, others and his own experience, will have this simple to purge [7640]melancholy alone. It is an ordinary vomit, vinum Scilliticum, mixt with Rubel in a little white wine.	Squilla, or sea onion, is hot and dry in the third degree. Brasavola, in his work on purgatives, relying on Mesue, others and his own experience, maintains that this single substance purges melancholy alone. It is a common emetic: squill wine, mixed with Rubel in a little white wine.[7641]

[7638] Burton. Printed page 376, g: “Vomitum & menses cit. valet ad Hydrop. &c.” It provokes vomiting and menstruation; it is effective for dropsy, and so on.

[7639] Editor. The scan prints Dioscorides lib. 11, cap. 114, an anomalous book number for the usual five-book De materia medica; it is preserved pending collation. “His opposites” means substances with qualities opposite to the drug’s own. A grain is a historical unit of weight. The relationship between the fifteen berries and seven-and-a-half-grain dose is not explained by Burton and has not been silently reconciled.

[7640] Burton. Printed page 376, h: “Materias atras educit.” It expels black substances.

[7641] Editor. Scilla is squill, also called sea onion; vinum Scilliticum is squill wine. Rubel is retained as the printed name of an accompanying preparation, its exact identity unresolved. “Vomits” in this section means emetic medicines, not expelled matter.

Original text 1651	Modern English
White Hellebor, which some call sneezing powder, a strong purger upward, which many reject, as being too violent: Mesue and Averroes will not admit of it, [7642]by reason of danger of suffocation, [7643]great pain and trouble it puts the poor patient to, saith Dodonæus. Yet Galen lib. 6. simpl. med. and Dioscorides cap. 145. allow of it.	White hellebore, which some call sneezing powder, is a powerful upward purgative, rejected by many as too violent. Mesue and Averroes will not allow it "because of the danger of suffocation," and, as Dodoens says, "the great pain and distress it causes the poor patient." Yet Galen, book 6, On Simple Medicines, and Dioscorides, chapter 145, approve it.[7644]
It was indeed [7645]terrible in former times, as Pliny notes, but now familiar, insomuch that many took in those dayes, [7646]that were students, to quicken their wits, which Persius Sat. 1. objects to Accius the Poet, Ilias Acci ebria veratro. [7647]It helps melancholy, the falling sicknesse, madnesse, gout, &c. but not to be taken of old men, youths, such as are weaklings, nice or effeminate, troubled with headach, high coloured, or fear strangling, saith Dioscorides.	It was indeed "terrifying in former times," as Pliny notes, but has now become familiar. In those days many students took it "to sharpen their wits," a charge Persius brings against the poet Accius in his first satire: "Accius' Iliad, drunk on hellebore." "It helps melancholy, epilepsy, madness, gout and so on, but must not be taken by old people, the young, the weak, the delicate or effeminate, or those who have headaches, a high colour or fear of choking," says Dioscorides.[7648]

[7642] Burton. Printed page 376, i: "Ab arte ideo rejiciendum, ob periculum suffocationis." It must therefore be rejected from medical practice because of the danger of suffocation.

[7643] Burton. Printed page 376, k: "Cap. 16. magna vi educit, & molestia cum summa." Chapter 16. It expels with great force and the utmost distress.

[7644] Editor. The following debate concerns white hellebore as a historical drug, whose strength and dangers are central to Burton's account. The forms and preparation methods are not equated here with a modern product. The objections from suffocation and distress precede the favourable authorities; both sides are preserved.

[7645] Burton. Printed page 376, l: "Quondam terribile." Once terrifying.

[7646] Burton. Printed page 376, m: "Multi studiorum gratia ad providenda acutius quæ commentabantur." Many took it for the sake of their studies, to discern more sharply the matters they were considering.

[7647] Burton. Printed page 376, n: "Medetur comitialibus, melancholicis, podagricis; vetatur senibus, pueris, mollibus & effœminatis." It treats those with epilepsy, melancholy or gout; it is forbidden to the old, children, the delicate and the effeminate.

[7648] Editor. Persius, Satire 1.50–51, has Ilias Atti in the comparison text, whereas Burton prints Ilias Acci and names Accius. Burton's attribution is preserved, not silently corrected. The allusion describes an Iliad intoxicated with hellebore. "Falling sickness" means epilepsy; "nice" means delicate. The English list of exclusions extends beyond the shorter Latin marginal list.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 376–377 [7649]Oribasius an old Physitian, hath written very copiously, and approves of it, in such affections, which can otherwise hardly be cured. Heurnius lib. 2. prax. med. de vomitoriis, will not have it used [7650]but with great Caution, by reason of its strength, and then when Antimony will do no good, which caused Hermophilus to compare it to a stout captain (as Codroncus observes cap. 7. comment. de Helleb.) that will see all his souldiers go before him and come post principia, like the bragging souldier, last himself: [7651]when other helps fail in inveterate melancholy, in a desperate case, this vomit is to be taken.	Oribasius, an ancient physician, wrote at great length about it and approves its use “in conditions that can scarcely be cured otherwise.” Heurnius, in his Medical Practice, book 2, on emetics, would use it “only with great caution because of its strength, and when antimony does no good.” This led Hermophilus to compare it to a valiant captain—as Codroncus observes in chapter 7 of his Commentary on Hellebore—who sees all his soldiers go before him and comes “behind the front ranks,” like the boasting soldier, last himself. When other remedies fail in long-established melancholy, in a desperate case, this emetic is to be taken.[7652]

[7649] Burton. Printed page 376, o: “Collect. lib. 8. cap. 3. in affectionibus iis quæ difficulter curantur, Helleborum damus.” Collection, book 8, chapter 3. In conditions that are difficult to cure, we give hellebore.

[7650] Burton. Printed page 376, p, continued across the foot: “Non sine summa cautione hoc remedio utemur; est enim validissimum, & quum vires Antimonii contemnit morbus, in auxilium evocatur, modo validæ vires efflorescant.” We shall not use this remedy without the greatest caution, for it is extremely powerful. When the disease defies the power of antimony, it is summoned to help, provided the patient’s strength remains vigorous.

[7651] Burton. Printed page 376, q, below the body: “Ætius tetrab. cap. 1. ser. 2. Iis solum dari vult Helleborum album, qui secus spem non habent, non iis qui Syncopen timent, &c.” Aetius, Tetrabiblos, chapter 1, second section. He would give white hellebore only to those who otherwise have no hope, not to those at risk of fainting, and so on.

[7652] Editor. “Inveterate” means long-established. The p note conditions use on continuing bodily strength, and q excludes those at risk of syncope, or fainting; these qualifications do not all appear in the body and are preserved in the notes. “Post principia” literally places the captain behind the front ranks. Hermophilus is retained as printed, pending identification and collation with Codronchus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 377 And yet for all this, if it be well prepared, it may be [7653]securely given at first. [7654]Matthiolus brags, that he hath often, to the good of many, made use of it; and Heurnius, [7655]that he hath happily used it, prepared after his own prescript, and with good success. Christophorus à Vega lib. 3. c. 41. is of the same opinion, that it may be lawfully given; and our country Gentlewomen finde it by their common practice, that there is no such great danger in it.	Yet, for all this, if properly prepared, it may safely be given at the outset. Mattioli boasts that he has often used it to many people's benefit; and Heurnius says that "he has used it successfully, prepared according to his own prescription," with good results. Christophorus à Vega, book 3, chapter 41, likewise considers its administration permissible. Our country gentlewomen find through their regular practice that there is no such great danger in it.[7656]
D. Turner speaking of this plant, in his Herball, telleth us, that in his time it was an ordinary receipt among good wives, to give Hellebor in powder to iid. weight, and he is not much against it. But they do commonly exceed, for who so bold as blinde Bayard, and prescribe it by penyworths, and such irrationall wayes, as I have heard my self market folks ask for it in an Apothecaries shop:	Dr Turner, discussing this plant in his Herbal, says that in his time it was a common household recipe to give powdered hellebore up to the weight of two pence, and he does not much object. But people commonly exceed that amount —for who is as bold as blind Bayard?—and prescribe it by the pennyworth and in similarly unreasonable ways, as I myself have heard market people ask for it in an apothecary's shop.[7657]

[7653] Burton. Printed page 377, r: "Cum salute multorum." With benefit to many.

[7654] Burton. Printed page 377, s: "Cap. 12. de morbis cap." Chapter 12, on diseases of the head.

[7655] Burton. Printed page 377, t: "Nos facillime utimur nostro præparato Helleboro albo." We use white hellebore prepared by our own method with the greatest ease.

[7656] Editor. The r note, "with benefit to many," is anchored in the print at "securely"; the s note at Matthiolus supplies "chapter 12, on diseases of the head," without a named author. These potentially displaced attachments are preserved and not reassigned. The t Latin says "with the greatest ease"; Burton's English emphasizes successful use. Both remain.

[7657] Editor. The printed ii with raised d denotes two pence, followed explicitly by "weight"; the modern text preserves that monetary-weight description without converting it into a modern dose. Burton then criticizes purchase by monetary value ("pennyworths"), which is a different and imprecise measure. Blind Bayard is the proverb's blindly bold horse. Turner's reported recipe still requires direct collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but with what successe God knows; they smart often for their rash boldness and folly, break a vein, make their eyes ready to start out of their heads, or kill themselves. So that the fault is not in the Physick, but in the rude and undiscreet handling of it.	God knows with what success. They often suffer for their rash boldness and folly: they burst a vein, make their eyes almost start from their heads, or kill themselves. The fault, then, lies not in the medicine but in its ignorant and reckless use.[7658]
He that will know therefore, when to use, how to prepare it aright, and in what dose, let him read Heurnius lib. 2. prax. med. Brassivola de Catart. Godefridus Stegius the Emperour Rodolphus Physitian cap. 16. Matthiolus in Dioscor. and that excellent Commentary of Baptista Codronchus, which is instar omnium de Helleb. alb. where he shall finde great diversity of examples and Receipts.	Anyone wishing to know when to use it, how to prepare it correctly and in what dose should read Heurnius, Medical Practice, book 2; Brasavola, On Purgatives; Godefridus Stegius, Emperor Rudolf's physician, chapter 16; Mattioli on Dioscorides; and Baptista Codronchus' excellent Commentary on White Hellebore, which "is worth all the others." There he will find a great variety of examples and recipes.[7659]
Antimony or Stibium, which our Chymists so much magnifie, is either taken in substance or infusion, &c. and frequently prescribed in this disease. It helps all infirmities, saith [7660]Matthiolus, which proceed from black choler, falling sickness, and Hypocondriacall passions; and for farther proof of his assertion, he gives severall instances of such as have been freed with it:	Antimony, or stibium, which our chemical physicians praise so highly, is taken either as the substance itself or as an infusion, and so on, and is frequently prescribed for this disease. "It helps all ailments arising from black bile, epilepsy and hypochondriacal disorders," says Mattioli. To support his claim further, he gives several examples of people who have been relieved by it:[7661]

[7658] Editor. Burton follows the favourable household evidence with a warning about excessive and reckless administration. The conclusion that the fault lies in the handling rather than the medicine belongs to his argument; it does not erase the dangers just described.

[7659] Editor. Instar omnium means that the one work serves for, or is worth, all the rest. The sequence of authorities, chapter numbers and variant spellings of Codronchus is retained on the left. Godefridus Stegius and the detailed bibliographic references remain uncollated. This block ends before the separate discussion of antimony.

[7660] Burton. Printed page 377, u: "In lib. 5. Dioscor. cap. 3. Omnibus opitulatur morbis, quos atrabilis excitavit comitialibus iisque præsertim qui Hypocondriacas obtinent passiones." On Dioscorides, book 5, chapter 3. It helps all diseases caused by black bile, epileptic sufferers, and especially those afflicted by hypochondriacal disorders.

[7661] Editor. "Chymists" here means practitioners of chemical medicine. "In substance" contrasts the material itself with an infusion. "Falling sickness" is epilepsy; "hypochondriacal" refers to Burton's account of disorders associated with the upper abdominal organs. The claims belong to the physicians he quotes; "grains" below are historical units of weight, left unconverted.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7662]One of Andrew Gallus, a Physitian of Trent, that after many other essayes, imputes the recovery of his health, next after God, to this remedy alone. Another of George Handschius, that in like sort, when other medicines failed, [7663]was by this restored to his former health, and which of his knowledge, others have likewise tried, and by the help of this admirable medicine, been recovered.	One is Andrew Gallus, a physician of Trent, who, after many other attempts, "attributes his recovery, after God, to this remedy alone." Another is George Handschius, who similarly, when other medicines failed, "was restored by it to his former health; and others, as he knows, have likewise tried this admirable medicine and recovered through its help."[7664]
A third of a parish Priest at Prage in Bohemia, [7665]that was so far gone with melancholy, that he doted, and spake he knew not what, but after he had taken 12. grains of Stibium, (as I my self saw, and can witness, for I was called to see this miraculous accident)	A third is a parish priest at Prague in Bohemia, "who was so far gone in melancholy that he was delirious and did not know what he was saying. But after he had taken twelve grains of stibium—as I myself saw and can testify, for I was called to witness this miraculous occurrence—[7666]

[7662] Burton. Printed page 377, x: "Andreas Gallus, Tridentinus medicus, salutem huic medicamento post Deum debet." Andreas Gallus, a physician of Trent, owes his health to this medicine, after God.

[7663] Burton. Printed page 377, y: "Integræ sanitati, brevi restitutus. Id quod aliis accidisse scio, qui hoc mirabili medicamento usi sunt." Soon restored to full health. I know that the same has happened to others who used this wonderful medicine.

[7664] Editor. The Gallus and Handschius cases are reports transmitted through Mattioli. In the y margin the first person belongs to the cited witness, not to Burton. "Essays" means trials or attempts at treatment.

[7665] Burton. Printed page 377, z: "Qui melancholicus factus planè desipiebat, multaque stulte loquebatur, huic exhibitum 12. gr. stibium, quod paulo post atram bilem ex alvo eduxit (ut ego vidi, qui vocatus tanquam ad miraculum adfui testari possum,) & ramenta tanquam carnis dissecta in partes totum excrementum tanquam sanguinem nigerrimum repræsentabat." Having become melancholic, he was completely deranged and spoke much nonsense. Twelve grains of stibium were given to him, and shortly afterwards it drew black bile from his bowels—as I saw and can testify, having been summoned to witness it as a marvel—and fragments like flesh cut into pieces; all the excrement resembled the blackest blood.

[7666] Editor. The first-person witness in the Prague story is Mattioli, whom Burton is citing. "Accident" means an occurrence. The complete z marginal account is retained here, including the description continued in the next paired passage. Its syntax becomes irregular after "ramenta"; the translation preserves the reported sequence without inventing a missing observation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
he was purged of a deal of black choler, like little gobbets of flesh, and all his excrements were as black blood, a medicine fitter for a Horse then a Man) yet it did him so much good, that the next day he was perfectly cured. This very story of the Bohemian Priest, Sckenkius relates verbatim, Exoter. experiment. ad Var. morb. cent. 6. observ. 6. with great approbation of it.	he expelled a great quantity of black bile, like little pieces of flesh, and all his excrement resembled black blood"—a medicine fitter for a horse than a man—"yet it did him so much good that the next day he was completely cured." Sckenkius repeats this very story of the Bohemian priest word for word in his Experiments on Various Diseases, century 6, observation 6, with strong approval.[7667]
Hercules de Saxonia calls it a profitable medicine, if it be taken after meat to 6. or 8. grains, of such as are apt to vomit. Rodericus à Fonseca the Spaniard, and late professor of Padua in Italy, extols it to this disease, Tom. 2. consul. 85. So doth Lod. Mercatus de inter. morb. cur. lib. 1. cap. 17. with many others.	Hercules de Saxonia calls it a useful medicine when taken after food, up to six or eight grains, by those who vomit readily. Rodericus à Fonseca, the Spaniard and recent professor at Padua in Italy, praises it for this disease in volume 2, consultation 85. So does Lodovicus Mercatus, On the Treatment of Internal Diseases, book 1, chapter 17, with many others.[7668]
Iacobus Gervinus a French Physitian on the other side, lib. 2. de venenis confut. explodes all this, and saith he took three grains only upon Matthiolus and some others commendation, but it almost killed him, whereupon he concludes, [7669]Antimony is rather poyson then a medicine. Th. Erastus concurres with him in his opinion, and so doth Ælian Montaltus cap. 30. de melan.	On the other side, Iacobus Gervinus, a French physician, rejects all this in book 2 of his refutation concerning poisons. He says that on the recommendation of Mattioli and others he took only three grains, but it almost killed him. He therefore concludes that "antimony is a poison rather than a medicine." Thomas Erastus agrees with him, as does Ælian Montaltus in chapter 30, On Melancholy.[7670]

[7667] Editor. "Gobbets" are small lumps or pieces. The 1651 body has an unmatched closing parenthesis after "Man"; the original retains it, while the modern column uses dashes to mark Burton's interruption. His remark about a horse interrupts the favourable account. The precise bibliographic expansion of Exoter. remains unverified; Sckenkius and Skenkius are variant printed forms retained on the left.

[7668] Editor. "After meat" means after food. "Apt to vomit" means readily able or inclined to vomit. Burton reports doses attached to particular historical claims rather than a uniform preparation; no equivalence with a modern formulation is supplied.

[7669] Burton. Printed page 377, a: "Antimonium venenum, non medicamentum." Antimony is poison, not medicine.

[7670] Editor. "Explodes" means rejects or discredits. Iacobus Gervinus probably denotes Jacques Grévin: Plantin's historical catalogue lists his De venenis, identified as the 1571 Latin edition with an antimony treatise. This is bibliographical evidence; the three-grain near-fatal experience and Burton's abbreviated citation remain uncollated. The contrast with the preceding claimed cures is deliberate.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 377–378 But what do I talk? 'tis the subject of whole books, I might cite a century of Authors pro and con. I will conclude with [7671]Zuinger, Antimony is like Scanderbegs sword, which is either good or bad, strong or weak, as the party is that prescribes, or useth it; a worthy medicine if it be rightly applied to a strong man, otherwise poyson. For the preparing of it, look in Evonimi thesaurus, Quercetan, Oswaldus Crollius, Basil. Chim. Basil. Valentius, &c.	But why do I go on? Whole books deal with the subject; I could cite a hundred authors for and against it. I will conclude with Zwinger: antimony is like Scanderbeg's sword, good or bad, strong or weak according to the person who prescribes or uses it. "It is a valuable medicine if properly administered to a strong man; otherwise, poison." For its preparation, consult Evonymus' Treasury, Quercetan, Oswald Croll's Chemical Basilica, Basil Valentius and the rest.[7672]
Source page 378 Tobacco, divine, rare, superexcellent Tobacco, which goes far beyond all their Panaceas, potable gold, and Philosophers stones, a soveraign remedy to all diseases. A good vomit, I confesse, a vertuous herb, if it be well qualified, opportunely taken, and medicinally used, but as it is commonly abused by most men, which take it as Tinkers do ale, 'tis a plague, a mischief, a violent purger of goods, lands, health, hellish, divellish and damned Tobacco, the ruine and overthrow of body and soul.	Tobacco, divine, rare, superexcellent tobacco, surpassing all their panaceas, drinkable gold and philosophers' stones: a sovereign remedy for every disease. A good emetic, I admit, a beneficial herb if properly tempered, taken at the right time and used medicinally. But as most men commonly abuse it, taking it as tinkers take ale, it is a plague, a scourge, a violent purger of possessions, land and health: hellish, devilish and damned tobacco, the ruin and destruction of body and soul.[7673]

[7671] Burton. Printed page 378, b: "Cratonis ep. sect. vel ad Monavium ep. In utramque partem dignissimum medicamentum, si rectè utentur; secus venenum." Crato's selected letters, or a letter to Monavius. A most valuable medicine for either direction, if properly used; otherwise, poison.

[7672] Editor. Scanderbeg's sword stands for an instrument whose power depends on its wielder; the Library of Congress documents the associated story and proverb. Burton names Zwinger, but the b margin directs the reader to Crato's letters or a letter to Monavius; that discrepancy is retained. "In utramque partem" literally means in either direction, in this context potentially upward or downward evacuation. The precise correspondence reference remains unlocated.

[7673] Editor. The extravagant opening praise turns into denunciation. "Qualified" means suitably moderated or prepared. "Purger" shifts from a medical action to the loss of property and health. The comparison with tinkers drinking ale is Burton's social stereotype. "Potable gold" means a preparation meant to make gold drinkable; the philosophers' stone belongs to the alchemical language of universal remedies.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 2. Simples purging Melancholy downward.	SUBSECTION 2 Single substances that purge melancholy downwards
Polypodie and Epithyme, are without all exceptions, gentle purgers of melancholy. Dioscorides will have them void flegm; but Brassivola out of his experience averreth, that they purge this humor; they are used in decoction, infusion, &c. simple, mixt, &c.	Polypody and epithyme are gentle purgatives of melancholy, beyond all objection. Dioscorides holds that they evacuate phlegm; but Brasavola affirms from experience that they purge this humour. They are used in decoctions, infusions and so on, singly or mixed.[7674]
Mirabolanes, all five kinds, are happily [7675]prescribed against melancholy and quartan agues. Brassivola speaks out [7676]of a thousand experiences, he gave them in pills, decoction, &c. look for peculiar Receipts in him.	All five kinds of myrobalans are successfully prescribed against melancholy and quartan fevers. Brasavola speaks from "a thousand experiences"; he gave them in pills, decoctions and so on. Consult him for particular recipes.[7677]

[7674] Editor. The subsection turns from emetics to remedies acting through the bowels. "Simples" are individual medicinal substances. Epithyme is the historical drug name associated with dodder growing on thyme. "Without all exceptions" here means beyond objection, rather than the result of a modern assessment of safety.

[7675] Burton. Printed page 378, c: "Mærores fugant; utilissimè dantur melancholicis & quaternariis." They drive away sorrow; they are very beneficially given to melancholic patients and sufferers from quartan fever.

[7676] Burton. Printed page 378, d: "Millies horum vires expertus sum." I have tested their powers a thousand times.

[7677] Editor. Myrobalans were a group of medicinal fruits distinguished into five kinds in the pharmacology Burton cites; the kinds are not specified here. A quartan fever recurs on the fourth day by inclusive counting, with two intervening days. "Happily" means successfully.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Stœchas, Fumitory, Dodder, herb Mercury, roots of Capers, Genista or broom, Pennyriall and half boiled Cabbage, I finde in this Catalogue of purgers of black choler, Origan, Fetherfew, Ammoniack [7678]Salt, Salt-peter. But these are very gentle, alyppus, dragon root, centaury, ditany, Colutea, which Fuchsius cap. 168. & others take for Sene, but most distinguish.	In this list of purgatives of black bile I find stoechas, fumitory, dodder, herb mercury, caper roots, genista or broom, pennyroyal and half-boiled cabbage; oregano, feverfew, ammoniac salt and saltpetre. But these are very gentle; also alyppus, dragon root, centaury, dittany and colutea, which Fuchs, chapter 168, and others take to be senna, though most distinguish them.[7679]
Sene is in the middle of violent and gentle purgers downward, hot in the second degree, dry in the first. Brassivola calls it [7680]a wonderfull herb against melancholy, it scowres the blood, illightens the spirits, shakes off sorrow, a most profitable medicine, as [7681]Dodonæus terms it, invented by the Arabians, and not heard of before.	Senna stands midway between violent and gentle downward purgatives, hot in the second degree and dry in the first. Brasavola calls it "a wonderful herb against melancholy: it cleanses the blood, brightens the spirits and shakes off sorrow." It is "a most beneficial medicine," as Dodoens calls it, discovered by the Arabians and unheard of before.[7682]

[7678] Burton. Printed page 378, e: "Sal nitrum, sal ammoniacum, Dracontii radix, dictamnum." Nitre, ammoniac salt, dragon-plant root, dittany.

[7679] Editor. Burton's compressed list leaves the relation of "very gentle" to the following items unclear; the modern wording keeps the list without supplying a stronger classification. Stoechas, alyppus, dragon root and colutea remain historical plant names here, without imposed modern species identifications. The e margin repeats some items in Latin and adds no authority.

[7680] Burton. Printed page 378, f: "Calet ordine secundo, siccat primo, adversus omnia vitia atræ bilis valet, sanguinem mundat, spiritus illustrat, mærorem discutit herba mirifica." It heats in the second degree and dries in the first; it is effective against all disorders of black bile, cleanses the blood, brightens the spirits and dispels sorrow: a marvellous herb.

[7681] Burton. Printed page 378, g: "Cap. 4. lib. 2." Chapter 4, book 2.

[7682] Editor. Hot and dry in numbered degrees are classifications within humoral medicine. "Spirits" are the physiological spirits of that system. The statement that the Arabians discovered senna is Burton's historical claim; the note does not establish priority. Dodoens is the modern form of Dodonæus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is taken divers wayes, in powder, infusion, but most commonly in the infusion, with ginger, or some cordiall flowres added to correct it. Actuarius commends it sod in broath, with an old cock, or in whey, which is the common convayer of all such things as purge black choler; or steeped in wine, which Heurnius accounts sufficient, without any farther correction.	It is taken in various ways, as a powder or infusion, but most commonly as an infusion, with ginger or some cordial flowers added to temper its effects. Actuarius recommends it boiled in broth with an old rooster, or in whey, the usual vehicle for substances that purge black bile; or steeped in wine, which Heurnius considers sufficient without any further tempering.[7683]
Aloes by most is said to purge choler, but Aurelianus lib. 2. c. 6. de morb. chron. Arculanus cap. 6. in 9. Rhasis, Julius Alexandrinus, consil. 185. Scoltz. Crato consil. 189. Scoltz. prescribe it to this disease, as good for the stomack and to open the Hæmrods, out of Mesue, Rhasis, Serapio, Avicenna; Menardus ep. lib. 1. epist. 1. opposeth it, Aloes [7684]doth not open the veines, or move the Hæmrods, which Leonhartus Fuchsius paradox. lib. 1. likewise affirmes; but Brassivola and Dodonæus defend Mesue out of their experience; let [7685]Valesius end the controversie.	Most say that aloes purges choler; but Aurelianus, Chronic Diseases, book 2, chapter 6; Arculanus, chapter 6 on the ninth book of Rhazes; Julius Alexandrinus, consultation 185 in Scholtz; and Crato, consultation 189 in Scholtz, prescribe it for this disease. Following Mesue, Rhazes, Serapio and Avicenna, they consider it good for the stomach and for opening the haemorrhoidal veins. Menardus opposes this in his Letters, book 1, letter 1: aloes "does not open the veins or provoke haemorrhoidal bleeding." Leonhart Fuchs likewise affirms this in his Paradoxes, book 1; but Brasavola and Dodoens defend Mesue on the basis of their experience. Let Valesius settle the controversy.[7686]

[7683] Editor. "Correction" means moderating a medicine's action by another ingredient. Cordial flowers were understood to strengthen or comfort the heart. A "convayer" is the liquid vehicle carrying the medicine. "Sod" means boiled.

[7684] Burton. Printed page 378, h: "Recentiores negant ora venarum resecare." More recent writers deny that it opens the mouths of the veins.

[7685] Burton. Printed page 378, i: "An aloe aperiat ora venarum. lib. 9. cont. 3." Whether aloes opens the mouths of the veins. Book 9, controversy 3.

[7686] Editor. "Opening the haemorrhoids" refers to encouraging evacuation of blood through the haemorrhoidal veins within humoral treatment, not simply curing piles. The concluding Valesius differs from Valescus elsewhere; the names are not silently conflated. The references to "9. Rhasis" denote commentary on a numbered book of Rhazes rather than a chapter of this edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 379 Lapis Armenus and Lazuli are much magnified by [7687]Alexander lib. 1. cap. 16. Avicenna, Ætius, and Actuarius, if they be well washed, that the water be no more coloured, fiftie times some say. [7688]That good Alexander (saith Guianerus) puts such confidence in this one medicine, that he thought all melancholy passions might be cured by it; and I for my part, have oftentimes happily used it, and was never deceived in the operation of it.	Armenian stone and lapis lazuli are highly praised by Alexander, book 1, chapter 16, Avicenna, Aetius and Actuarius, provided they are thoroughly washed until the water is no longer coloured—fifty times, some say. "That good Alexander," says Guainerius, "places such confidence in this one medicine that he thought it could cure every melancholic disorder. For my part, I have often used it successfully and have never been disappointed by its action."[7689]
The like may be said of Lapis Lazuli, though it be somewhat weaker then the other. Garcias ab Horto hist. lib. 1. cap. 65. relates, that the [7690]Physitians of the Moores, familiarly prescribe it to all melancholy passions, and Matthiolus ep. lib. 3. [7691]brags of that happy successe which he still had in the administration of it. Nicholas Meripsa puts it amongst the best remedies, sect. 1. cap. 12. in Antidotis;	The same may be said of lapis lazuli, although it is somewhat weaker than the other. Garcia da Orta, History, book 1, chapter 65, reports that Moorish physicians routinely prescribe it for all melancholic disorders; and Mattioli, Letters, book 3, boasts of the consistent success he has had in administering it. Nicholas Meripsa places it among the best remedies in his Antidotes, section 1, chapter 12.[7692]

[7687] Burton. Printed page 379, k: "Vapores absurgit à vitalibus partibus." Vapours rise from the vital parts.

[7688] Burton. Printed page 379, l: "Tract. 15. c. 6. Bonus Alexander, tantam lapide Armeno confidentiam habuit, ut omnes melancholicas passiones ab eo curari posse crederet, & ego inde sæpissime usus sum, & in ejus exhibitione nunquam fraudatus fui." Treatise 15, chapter 6. Good Alexander had such confidence in Armenian stone that he believed all melancholic disorders could be cured by it; and I have used it very often and have never been disappointed when administering it.

[7689] Editor. Lapis Armenus means Armenian stone; lapis lazuli is a separate mineral drug in Burton's account. Historical medicinal stones are not assigned a precise modern chemical composition here. The k margin, "Vapores absurgit…," is grammatically irregular and does not explain the washing instruction. Its printed placement at Alexander is preserved. The first-person testimony in l belongs to Guainerius.

[7690] Burton. Printed page 379, m: "Maurorum medici hoc lapide plerumque purgant melancholiam, &c." Moorish physicians commonly purge melancholy with this stone, and so on.

[7691] Burton. Printed page 379, n: "Quo ego sæpe feliciter usus sum, & magno cum auxilio." I have often used it successfully, with great benefit.

[7692] Editor. "Moors" is Burton's broad historical designation, here reporting Garcia da Orta; exact location and identity are not established. "Still" means consistently. Nicholas Meripsa probably denotes Nicolaus Myrepsus, whose Antidotarium is catalogued under Nicolaus Alexandrinus in a 1543 edition. The cited section 1, chapter 12 has not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7693]and if this will not serve (saith Rhasis) then there remaines nothing but Lapis Armenus, and Hellebor it self. Valescus and Iason Pratensis, much commend Pulvis Hali, which is made of it. Iames Damascen. 2. cap. 12. Hercules de Saxonia, &c. speakes well of it. [7694]Crato will not approve this; it, and both Hellebors, he saith, are no better then poyson. Victor Trincavelius, lib. 2. cap. 14. found it in his experience, [7695]to be very noysome, to trouble the stomack, and hurt their bodies that take it overmuch.	"If this will not serve," says Rhazes, "nothing remains but Armenian stone and hellebore itself." Valescus and Jason Pratensis strongly recommend Hali's powder, which is made from it. James Damascene, book 2, chapter 12, Hercules de Saxonia and others speak well of it. Crato does not approve: it and both hellebores, he says, are no better than poison. Victor Trincavelli, book 2, chapter 14, found from experience that it was "very harmful, troubling the stomach and injuring the bodies of those who take too much."[7696]
Black Hellebor, that most renowned plant, and famous purger of melancholy, which all antiquity so much used and admired, was first found out by Melampodius a shepherd, as Pliny records, lib. 25. cap. 5. [7697]Who seeing it to purge his Goats when they raved, practised it upon Elize and Calene, King Prætus daughters, that ruled in Arcadia, neer the fountain Clitorius, and restored them to their former health.	Black hellebore, that renowned plant and famous purgative of melancholy, so widely used and admired throughout antiquity, was first discovered by a shepherd named Melampodius, as Pliny records in book 25, chapter 5. Seeing it purge his goats when they were raving, he tried it on Elize and Calene, the daughters of King Proetus, who ruled in Arcadia near the spring Clitorius, and restored them to their former health.[7698]

[7693] Burton. Printed page 379, o: "Si non hoc, nihil restat nisi Helleborus, & lapis Armenus. Consil. 184. Scoltzii." If not this, nothing remains but hellebore and Armenian stone. Consultation 184 in Scholtz.

[7694] Burton. Printed page 379, p: "Multa corpora vidi gravissimè hinc agitata, & stomacho multum obfuisse." I have seen many bodies very severely disturbed by this, and it has greatly harmed the stomach.

[7695] Burton. Printed page 379, q: "Cum vidisset ab eo curari capras furentes &c." When he had seen raving goats cured by it, and so on.

[7696] Editor. Several notes on printed page 379 appear displaced. The p note at Crato describes bodily and gastric injury, corresponding in subject to the following Trincavelli sentence; q at that sentence concerns the goats discussed next. The following r note names On Simple Medicines, and s cites Plautus. Their lettered positions are preserved rather than silently reassigned. Hali's powder and its exact recipe remain uncollated.

[7697] Burton. Printed page 379, r: "Lib. 6. simpl. med." Book 6, On Simple Medicines.

[7698] Editor. Compare Pliny, Natural History 25.21.47: he names Melampus and says that, after observing goats purged by the plant, the shepherd gave their milk to the daughters of Proetus. Burton instead describes trying the remedy upon the daughters and adds names and an Arcadian setting. His Melampodius, Elize, Calene, Clitorius and chapter 5 are retained. The r margin attached here reads only "Book 6, On Simple Medicines."

Original text 1651	Modern English
In Hippocrates time it was in only request, insomuch that he writ a book of it, a fragment of which remaines yet. Theophrastus, [7699]Galen, Pliny, Cælius Aurelianus, as ancient as Galen. lib. 1. cap. 6. Areteus lib. 1. cap. 5. Oribasius lib. 7. collect. a famous Greek, Ætius ser. 3. cap. 112. & 113. p. Ægineta, Galens Ape, lib. 7. cap. 4. Actuarius, Trallianus lib. 5. cap. 15. Cornelius Celsus only remaining of the old Latines, lib. 3. cap. 23. extoll and admire this excellent plant,	In Hippocrates' time it alone was in demand, so much so that he wrote a book about it, a fragment of which still survives. Theophrastus, Galen, Pliny, Caelius Aurelianus—as ancient as Galen—book 1, chapter 6; Aretaeus, book 1, chapter 5; Oribasius, a famous Greek, Collection, book 7; Aetius, section 3, chapters 112 and 113; Paul of Aegina, Galen's imitator, book 7, chapter 4; Actuarius; Trallianus, book 5, chapter 15; and Cornelius Celsus, the only surviving author of the old Latin writers, book 3, chapter 23: all praise and admire this excellent plant.[7700] and it was generally so much esteemed of the ancients for this disease amongst the rest, that they sent all such as were crased, or that doted, to the Anticyræ, or to Phocis in Achaia to be purged, where this plant was in abundance to be had. In Straboes time it was an ordinary voyage, Naviget Anticyras; a common proverb among the Greeks and Latines, to bid a disard or a mad man go take Hellebor;	The ancients generally esteemed it so highly for this disease, among others, that they sent people who were mentally disordered or delirious to the Anticyras, or to Phocis in Achaia, to be purged, since the plant was plentiful there. In Strabo's time this was a common journey: "Let him sail to Anticyra." It was a familiar proverb among Greeks and Romans, telling a fool or madman to go and take hellebore.[7701]

[7699] Burton. Printed page 379, s: "Pseudolo act. 4. scen. ult. helleboro hisce hominibus opus est." Pseudolus, act 4, last scene. These men need hellebore.

[7700] Editor. "Galen's ape" means his imitator. Burton's statements about the surviving Hippocratic fragment, the age of Caelius Aurelianus and the survival of Latin medical authors are retained as his claims; these and the long series of chapter references still require collation. The s note beside Galen actually cites Plautus' Pseudolus, matching the later Harpax anecdote.

[7701] Editor. "Disard" means a fool. The journey to Anticyra became a way of telling someone that he needed treatment for madness. Burton's plural Anticyræ and geographical wording are retained. Gellius 17.15 also associates Anticyra with hellebore treatment, but that corroborates the literary association, not every geographical detail here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as in Lucian, Menippus to Tantalus, Tantale desipis, helleboro epoto tibi opus est, eoque sane meraco, Thou art out of thy little wit O Tantalus, and must needs drink Hellebor, and that without mixture. Aristophanes in vespis, drink Hellebor, &c. and Harpax in the ᵗ Comœdian, told Simo and Ballio, two doting fellows, that they had need to be purged with this plant.	Thus in Lucian, Menippus says to Tantalus: "Tantalus, you are talking nonsense; you need a draught of hellebore, and quite undiluted at that." You are out of your little wits, O Tantalus, and must drink hellebore, without anything mixed with it. Aristophanes says in The Wasps, drink hellebore, and so on; and Harpax, in the comic playwright, told Simo and Ballio, two foolish fellows, that they needed purging with this plant.[7702]
When that proud Menacrates, ὁ Ζεὺς, had writ an arrogant letter to Phil. of Macedon, he sent back no other answer but this, Consulo tibi ut ad Anticyram te conferas, noting thereby that he was crased, atque elleboro indigere, had much need of a good purge. Lilius Geraldus saith, that Hercules after all his mad pranks upon his wife and children, was perfectly cured by a purge of Hellebor, which an Anticyrian administred unto him.	When that proud Menacrates, "Zeus," wrote an arrogant letter to Philip of Macedon, Philip sent back only this reply: "I advise you to go to Anticyra." He meant that Menacrates was out of his mind "and needed hellebore": he badly needed a good purge. Lilius Giraldus says that Hercules, after all his mad assaults upon his wife and children, was completely cured by a purge of hellebore administered by a man of Anticyra.[7703]

[7702] Editor. Lucian's Menippus–Tantalus dialogue is numbered 17 or 7 by arrangement; Burton's Latin and separate English gloss are both rendered. In Wasps 1489, Xanthias tells the dancing Philocleon to take hellebore. Plautus' Pseudolus 1185 has Harpax tell the others they need it; Burton's marginal s gives act 4, last scene. The later body marker t has no visible matching note and remains ᵗ on the left. Burton's editions remain unidentified.

[7703] Editor. The Greek ὁ Ζεὺς means "Zeus," the name assumed by the physician. Aelian, Various History 12.51, preserves Philip's advice to visit Anticyra and supports this anecdote. Burton's spelling Menacrates remains in both columns. The separate story attributed to Lilius Giraldus still requires direct collation. Both the Latin phrase about needing hellebore and Burton's English expansion are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 379–380 They that were sound commonly took it to quicken their wits, (as Ennius of old, [7704]Qui non nisi potus ad arma—prosiluit dicenda; and as our Poets drink sack to improve their inventions I find it so registred by Agellius lib. 17. cap. 15.) Carneades the Academick when he was to write against Zeno the Stoick, purged himselfe with Hellebor first, which [7705]Petronius puts upon Chrysippus.	People of sound mind commonly took it to sharpen their wits—as Ennius did long ago, “who never sprang to sing of arms unless he had been drinking,” and as our poets drink sack to improve their invention. I find it so recorded by Aulus Gellius, book 17, chapter 15. Carneades the Academic, when preparing to write against Zeno the Stoic, first purged himself with hellebore; Petronius attributes this to Chrysippus.[7706]
Source page 380 In such esteem it continued for many ages, till at length Mesue and some other Arabians began to reject and reprehend it, upon whose authority for many following lusters, it was much debated and quite out of request, held to be poyson and no medicine; and is still oppugned to this day by [7707]Crato and some Iunior Physitians.	It remained highly esteemed for many ages, until Mesue and some other Arabian writers began to reject and condemn it. On their authority, for many succeeding periods of years it was hotly disputed and fell entirely out of favour, being regarded as poison rather than medicine. Crato and some more recent physicians still oppose it today.[7708]

[7704] Burton. Printed page 379, dagger: “Hor.” Horace.

[7705] Burton. Printed page 380, u: “In Satyr.” In the Satyricon.

[7706] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.19.7–8, describes Ennius composing after drinking wine; Burton adapts the opening to “Qui non nisi” and compresses the quotation within prose. It is not evidence that Ennius took hellebore. Gellius 17.15 names Carneades and explicitly specifies white hellebore, despite the present black-hellebore discussion. Petronius, Satyricon 88, names Chrysippus and says he purged his mind three times. Sack is a kind of wine; “invention” means imaginative or intellectual productivity.

[7707] Burton. Printed page 380, x: “Crato consil. 16. l. 2. Etsi multi magni viri probent, in bonam partem accipiant medici, non probem.” Crato, consultation 16, book 2. Although many great men approve it, may physicians take it in good part if I do not.

[7708] Editor. “Lusters” strictly means periods of five years and here suggests a succession of years. “Junior” and “neoteric” mean later or more recent, not inexperienced. The Crato margin adds a courteous qualification asking other physicians not to take offence at his dissent.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Their reasons are, because Aristotle l. 1. de plant. c. 3. said, Henbane and Hellebor were poyson; and Alexander Aphrodiseus in the preface of his Problems, gave out, that (speaking of Hellebor) [7709]Quailes fed on that which was poyson to men. Galen l. 6. Epid. com. 5. Text. 35. confirms as much: [7710]Constantine the Emperour in his Geoponicks, attributes no other vertue to it, then to kill mice and rats, flies and mouldwarps, and so Mizaldus. Nicander of old, Gervinus, Skenkius, and some other Neotericks that have written of poysons, speak of Hellebor in a chief place.	Their reasons are that Aristotle, On Plants, book 1, chapter 3, called henbane and hellebore poisons; and Alexander of Aphrodisias, in the preface to his Problems, said, speaking of hellebore, that "quails feed on what is poisonous to men." Galen, Epidemics, book 6, commentary 5, text 35, confirms this. Emperor Constantine, in his Geoponics, attributes no other virtue to it than killing mice, rats, flies and moles; Mizaldus does the same. Nicander in antiquity, and Gervinus, Skenkius and other recent writers on poisons, give hellebore a prominent place.[7711]
[7712]Nicholas Leonicus hath a story of Solon, that besieging I know not what city, steeped Hellebor in a spring of water, which by pipes was conveyed into the middle of the town, and so either poysoned, or else made them so feeble and weak by purging, that they were not able to bear arms.	Nicholas Leonicus tells a story of Solon who, while besieging I do not know what city, steeped hellebore in a spring whose water was piped into the town's centre. In this way he either poisoned the inhabitants or weakened them so much through purging that they could no longer bear arms.[7713]

[7709] Burton. Printed page 380, y: "Vescuntur veratro coturnices quod hominibus toxicum est." Quails feed on hellebore, which is poisonous to human beings.

[7710] Burton. Printed page 380, z: "Lib. 23. c. 7. 12. 14." Book 23, chapters 7, 12 and 14.

[7711] Editor. "Mouldwarps" are moles. The z margin's "Lib.23" and 7,12,14 remain as printed; their application to the Geoponics is unresolved. On Plants circulated under Aristotle's name. Forster's 1913 preface rejects his authorship and discusses attribution to Nicolaus of Damascus. This clarifies the attribution, but does not locate Burton's particular botanical argument or establish his edition.

[7712] Burton. Printed page 380, a: "De var. hist." On Various Histories.

[7713] Editor. Pausanias, Description of Greece 10.37.7, tells the corresponding story of Solon and Cirrha: contaminated water leaves the defenders unable to maintain their posts. This identifies a parallel for Burton's unnamed city, without substituting it into his text or establishing his immediate source in Leonicus. Burton's uncertainty between poisoning and debilitating purgation remains.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Notwithstanding all these cavils and objections, most of our late writers do much approve of it. [7714]Gariopontus lib. 1. cap. 13. Codronchus com. de helleb. Falopius lib. de med. purg. simpl. cap. 69. & consil. 15. Trincavelii, Montanus 239. Frisemelica consil. 14. Hercules de Saxonia, so that it be opportunely given. Iacobus de Dondis, Agg. Amatus, Lusit. cent. 66. Godef. Stegius cap. 13. Hollerius, and all our Herbalists subscribe.	Despite all these cavils and objections, most recent writers strongly approve of it: Gariopontus, book 1, chapter 13; Codronchus' Commentary on Hellebore; Fallopius, On Simple Purgative Medicines, chapter 69; Trincavelli, consultation 15; Montanus, 239; Frisemelica, consultation 14; and Hercules de Saxonia, provided it is given at the right time. Jacobus de Dondis, Aggregator; Amatus Lusitanus, century 66; Godefridus Stegius, chapter 13; Hollerius and all our herbalists concur.[7715]
Fernelius meth. med. lib. 5. cap. 16. confesseth it to be a [7716]terrible purge and hard to take, yet well given to strong men, and such as have able bodies. P. Forestus and Capivaccius forbid it to be taken in substance, but allow it in decoction or infusion, both which wayes P. Monavius approves above all others, Epist. 231. Scoltzii, Iacchinus in 9. Rhasis, commends a receipt of his own preparing; Penottus another of his Chymically prepared, Evonimus another.	Fernel, Method of Medicine, book 5, chapter 16, admits that it is "a terrible purge and difficult to take, yet suitable for strong men with robust bodies." Pieter van Foreest and Capivaccius forbid taking the substance itself but permit a decoction or infusion, the two methods P. Monavius prefers above all others in letter 231 in Scholtz. Jacchinus, commenting on the ninth book of Rhazes, recommends a recipe of his own; Penottus another, chemically prepared; and Evonymus another.[7717]

[7714] Burton. Printed page 380, b: "Corpus incolume reddit, & juvenile efficit." It restores the body to health and makes it youthful.

[7715] Editor. The list records authorities and qualifications rather than one agreed preparation. Agg. is treated as the abbreviated title Aggregator. The unusual "Amatus, Lusit. cent.66" is preserved, including the number 66, pending bibliographic collation; Godefridus Stegius and several other abbreviated references likewise remain unresolved.

[7716] Burton. Printed page 380, c: "Veteres non sine causa usi sunt: Difficilis ex Helleboro purgatio & terroris plena, sed robustis datur tamen, &c." The ancients did not use it without reason. Purging with hellebore is difficult and full of terror, yet it is given to the robust, and so on.

[7717] Editor. The distinction between the substance itself and a decoction or infusion matters to the disagreement. Fernel's marginal quotation explicitly calls the treatment frightening and restricts it to the robust. "In 9.Rhasis" is a commentary reference. Preparation names and the numbered consultations are retained without reconstructing recipes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hildesheim spicel. 2. de mel. hath many examples how it should be used, with diversity of receipts. Heurnius lib. 7. prax. med. cap. 14. calls it an [7718]innocent medicine howsoever, if it be well prepared. The root of it is onely in use, which may be kept many yeers, and by some given in substance, as by Falopius and Brassivola amongst the rest, who [7719]brags that he was the first that restored it again to his use,	Hildesheim, Gleanings, book 2, On Melancholy, gives many examples of its use and a variety of recipes. Heurnius, Medical Practice, book 7, chapter 14, calls it "a harmless medicine, after all, if properly prepared." Only its root is used, and that may be kept for many years. Some administer the substance itself, among them Fallopius and Brasavola, who boasts that he was the first to restore its use.[7720]
and tels a story how he cured one Melatasta a mad man, that was thought to be possessed, in the Duke of Ferrara's Court with one purge of black Hellebor in substance: the receipt is there to be seen; his excrements were like inke, [7721]he perfectly healed at once.	He tells how, at the Duke of Ferrara's court, he cured a madman named Melatasta, thought to be possessed, with a single purge of black hellebore given as the substance itself. The recipe can be found there; the man's excrement was like ink, and "he recovered completely at once."[7722]

[7718] Burton. Printed page 380, d: "Innocens medicamentum, modo rite paretur." A harmless medicine, provided it is properly prepared.

[7719] Burton. Printed page 380, e: "Absit jactantia, ego primus præbere cœpi, &c." Let there be no boasting: I was the first to begin administering it, and so on.

[7720] Editor. "Innocent" means harmless in the cited judgement, explicitly conditional on preparation. In the e margin Brasavola disclaims boasting—"Absit jactantia"—where Burton calls it boasting. Both voices remain. The modern text does not turn the assertion of being first into an independently verified priority claim.

[7721] Burton. Printed page 380, f: "In Catart. Ex una sola evacuatione furor cessavit & quietus inde vixit. Tale exemplum apud Skenkium & apud Scoltzium, ep. 231. P. Monavius se stolidum curasse jactat hoc epoto tribus aut quatuor vicibus." On Purgatives. With a single evacuation his madness ceased, and he lived quietly thereafter. There is a similar example in Schenck; and in Scholtz, letter 231, P. Monavius boasts that he cured a mentally impaired man who drank this three or four times.

[7722] Editor. The f margin reports a continuing quiet life after the single evacuation, then adds a separate Monavius example involving three or four administrations. These details are absent from the body and are therefore retained in the footnote. "Possessed" expresses the reported contemporary interpretation of the man's condition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Vidus Vidius a Dutch Physitian, will not admit of it in substance, to whom most subscribe, but as before in the decoction, infusion, or which is all in all, in the Extract, which he prefers before the rest, and calls suave medicamentum, a sweet medicine, an easie, that may be securely given to women, children, and weaklings. Baracellus horto geniali, terms it maximæ præstantia medicamentum, a medicine of great worth and note. Quercetan in his Spagir. Phar. and many other, tell wonders of the Extract.	Vidus Vidius, a Dutch physician, refuses to allow the substance itself, and most agree with him. Instead, as before, he permits a decoction or infusion, or, best of all, an extract, which he prefers to the rest and calls "a pleasant medicine": a sweet, mild medicine that may safely be given to women, children and weak people. Baracellus, in his Delightful Garden, calls it "a medicine of the highest excellence": a medicine of great worth and distinction. Quercetan, in his Spagyric Pharmacopoeia, and many others tell wonders of the extract.[7723]
Source page 380–381 Paracelsus above all the rest is the greatest admirer of this plant, and especially the extract, he calls it Theriacum, terrestre Balsamum, another Treacle, a terrestriall Bawm, instar omnium, all in all, the [7724]sole and last refuge to cure this malady, the Gout, Epilepsie, Leprosie, &c. If this will not help, no Physick in the world can but minerall, it is the upshot of all.	Above all the others, Paracelsus is this plant's greatest admirer, especially of its extract. He calls it "theriac, earthly balm": another theriac, a balm of the earth, "worth all the rest," everything in one; "the sole and final refuge for curing this disease, gout, epilepsy, leprosy and so on." If this will not help, no medicine in the world can, except a mineral one: it is the last resort.[7725]

[7723] Editor. The printed "Dutch" is retained, although the usual identification is Guido Guidi of Florence: the Metropolitan Museum's record for his 1544 Chirurgia names him and reproduces the title's "Vido Vidio Florentino." The precise passage meant here still requires collation. "Maximæ præstantia" is retained as printed despite its irregular Latin form. Spagyric refers to chemical preparation. Burton's English expansions following both Latin phrases remain in the modern text.

[7724] Burton. Printed page 381, g, continued below the body: "Ultimum refugium, extremum medicamentum, quod cætera omnia claudit, quæcunque cæteris laxativis pelli non possunt ad hunc pertinent; si non huic, nulli cedunt." The last refuge, the final medicine that closes the series of all the others. Whatever cannot be expelled by other laxatives falls to this one; if disorders do not yield to this, they yield to none.

[7725] Editor. "Treacle" here means theriac, a medicinal antidote, not the sweet foodstuff. The Latin labels and Burton's English explanations are both translated. "Instar omnium" means worth all the rest. The apparent finality of the claim is qualified by the exception for mineral medicines, which is retained. The g margin continues below the main paragraph and is included in full.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 381 Matthiolus laughs at those that except against it, and though some abhor it out of the authority of Mesue, and dare not adventure to prescribe it, [7726]yet I (saith he) have happily used it six hundred times without offence, and communicated it to divers worthy Physitians, who have given me great thanks for it. Look for receipts, dose, preparation, and other cautions concerning this simple in him, Brassivola, Baracellus, Codronchus, and the rest.	Mattioli laughs at those who object to it. Although some reject it on Mesue's authority and dare not venture to prescribe it, "I," he says, "have used it successfully six hundred times without harm, and shared it with several worthy physicians, who have thanked me warmly for it." For recipes, dosage, preparation and other cautions concerning this single substance, consult him, Brasavola, Baracellus, Codronchus and the others.[7727]

[7726] Burton. Printed page 381, h, below the body: "Testari possum me sexcentis hominibus Helleborum nigrum exhibuisse, nullo prorsus incommodo, &c." I can testify that I have administered black hellebore to six hundred people with no harm whatsoever, and so on.

[7727] Editor. The body says six hundred times; the h margin says six hundred people. Both readings are retained. "Without offence" means without harm. The statement about communicating the remedy to other physicians belongs to the English body and is not supplied by the quoted margin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 3. Compound Purgers.	SUBSECTION 3 Compound purgatives
Compound medicines which purge melancholy, are either taken in the superior or inferior parts: superior at mouth or nostrils. At the mouth swallowed or not swallowed: If swallowed liquid or solid: liquid, as compound wine of Hellebor, Scilla or Sea-onyon, Sena, Vinum Scilliticum, Helleboratum, which [7728]Quercetan so much applauds for melancholy and madness, either inwardly taken, or outwardly applied to the head, with little pieces of linen dipped warm in it.	Compound medicines that purge melancholy are taken through either the upper or the lower parts of the body: through the upper parts at the mouth or nostrils. At the mouth they are either swallowed or not swallowed; those swallowed are liquid or solid. Liquids include compound wines of hellebore, squill or sea onion, and senna; squill wine and hellebore wine, which Quercetan praises so highly "for melancholy and madness, either taken internally or applied externally to the head with small pieces of linen dipped into it while warm."[7729]
Oxymel Scilliticum, Syrupus Helleboratus major and minor in Quercetan, and Syrupus Genistæ for Hypocondriacall melancholy in the same Author, compound Syrupe of Succory, of Fumitory, Polypodie, &c. Heurnius his purging Cockbroth.	Other examples are squill oxymel and Quercetan's greater and lesser hellebore syrups; the same author's broom syrup for hypochondriacal melancholy; compound syrups of chicory, fumitory, polypody and so on; and Heurnius' purgative rooster broth.[7730]

[7728] Burton. Printed page 381, i: "Pharmacop. Optimum est ad maniam & omnes melancholicos affectus, tum intra assumptum, tum extra, secus capiti cum linteolis in eo madefactis tepide admotum." Pharmacopoeia. It is excellent for mania and all melancholic disorders, whether taken internally or applied externally to the head, warm, with little linen cloths soaked in it.

[7729] Editor. "Superior" and "inferior" refer to routes of administration through upper and lower parts, not to relative quality. Squill is also called sea onion. The i margin prints "extra, secus"; the translation takes the separated parts in the sense of external application, without changing the Latin transcription.

[7730] Editor. Oxymel is a medicinal mixture of honey and vinegar; squill oxymel adds squill. Major and minor distinguish two formulations. Genista is broom and succory is chicory. "Cockbroth" is broth made with a rooster. The formula names are translated without adding quantities or reconstructing their recipes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some except against these Syrupes, as appears by [7731]Udalrinus Leonorus his Epistle to Matthiolus, as most pernitious and that out of Hippocrates, cocta movere, & medicari, non cruda, no raw things to be used in Physick; but this in the following Epistle is exploded and soundly confuted by Matthiolus; many Julips, potions, receipts, are composed of these, as you shall finde in Hildesheim spicel. 2. Heurnius lib. 2. cap. 14. George Skenkius Ital. med. prax. &c.	Some object to these syrups as extremely harmful, as appears in Udalrinus Leonorus' letter to Mattioli. They appeal to Hippocrates: "Move and treat what is concocted, not what is crude"—no raw things should be used in medicine. But Mattioli rejects and thoroughly refutes this in the following letter. Many juleps, potions and recipes are compounded from these substances, as you will find in Hildesheim's Gleanings, book 2; Heurnius, book 2, chapter 14; George Skenkius' Practice of Italian Medicine and elsewhere.[7732]
Solid purgers are confections, electuaries, pills by themselves, or compound with others, as de lapide Lazulo, Armeno, Pil. Indæ, of fumitory, &c. Confection of Hamech, which though most approve, Solenander sec. 5. consil. 22. bitterly inveighs against, so doth Randeletius Pharmacop. officina, Fernelius and others; Diasena, Diapolypodium, Diacasia, Diacatholicon, Weckers Electuarie de Epithymo, Ptolomyes Hierologadium, of which diverse receipts are daily made.	Solid purgatives are confections, electuaries and pills, taken alone or compounded with other ingredients: preparations of lapis lazuli or Armenian stone, Indian pills, fumitory pills and so on. There is Hamech's confection, which most approve, although Solenander attacks it bitterly in section 5, consultation 22, as do Rondelet in his Apothecary's Workshop, Fernel and others. There are Diasena, Diapolypodium, Diacasia, Diacatholicon, Wecker's electuary of epithyme and Ptolemy's Hierologadium, from which various recipes are made daily.[7733]

[7731] Burton. Printed page 381, k: "Epist. Math. lib. 3. Tales Syrupi nocentissimi & omnibus modis extirpandi." Mattioli's Letters, book 3. Such syrups are extremely harmful and must be eliminated by every means.

[7732] Editor. Compare Hippocrates, Aphorisms 1.22: its rule concerns purging humours after they have been "concocted," or matured, rather than while crude. Burton's wording applies the contrast to raw things used in medicine. The modern column preserves both his Latin maxim and his own English gloss so that this shift remains visible. Udalrinus Leonorus and the precise pair of letters await collation.

[7733] Editor. Confections and electuaries are medicinal mixtures, often bound with syrup or honey. Hierologadium probably corresponds to Hiera Logadii, headed NICOL: MYREPS: in the revised 1618 London Pharmacopoeia, p. 99. This name parallel does not establish Burton's precise formula or his Ptolemy attribution. Diacasia and other formulation identities remain provisional. "Daily made" describes contemporary practice in his account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ætius 22. 33. commends Hieram Ruffi. Trincavelius consil. 12. lib. 1. approves of Hiera; non, inquit, invenio melius medicamentum, I finde no better medicine, he saith. Heurnius adds pil. Aggregat. pills de Epithymo. pil. Ind. Mesue describes in the Florentine Antidotary, Pillulæ sine quibus esse nolo, Pillulæ Cochiæ cum Helleboro, Pil. Arabicæ, Fœtidæ, de quinque generibus myrabolanorum, &c. More proper to melancholy, not excluding in the mean time, Turbith, Manna, Rubarb, Agarick, Elescophe, &c. which are not so proper to this humour.	Aetius, 22, 33, recommends Rufus' Hiera. Trincavelli, book 1, consultation 12, approves of Hiera: "I find no better medicine," he says; he says he finds no better medicine. Heurnius adds aggregate pills, epithyme pills and Indian pills. Mesue describes, in the Florentine Antidotary, "pills I would not be without," Cochia pills with hellebore, Arabian pills, fetid pills and pills of the five kinds of myrobalans. These are more specifically suited to melancholy, without meanwhile excluding turbith, manna, rhubarb, agaric, Elescophe and others less specifically suited to this humour.[7734]
Source page 381–382 For as Montaltus holds cap. 30. and Montanus cholera etiam purganda, quod atræ sit pabulum, choler is to be purged because it feeds the other: and some are of an opinion, as Erasistratus and Asclepiades maintained of old, against whom Galen disputes, [7735]that no Physick doth purge one humour alone, but all alike or what is next. Most therefore in their receipts and magistrals which are coined here, make a mixture of severall simples and compounds to purge all humors in generall as well as this.	For, as Montaltus maintains in chapter 30, and Montanus also, "choler too must be purged, because it feeds black bile": choler must be purged because it nourishes the other humour. Some hold the opinion maintained long ago by Erasistratus and Asclepiades, against whom Galen argues, "that no medicine purges only one humour, but all alike, or whichever is nearest." Most therefore combine several single substances and compounds in the recipes and special preparations devised here, to purge all the humours generally as well as this one.[7736]

[7734] Editor. Hiera denotes a class of compound purgative preparations. The unexpanded Aetius reference "22.33" and the name Elescophe remain as printed. The Latin "I find no better medicine" and Burton's separate English repetition are both retained. "Pills I would not be without" translates the actual Latin preparation-name, Pillulæ sine quibus esse nolo. Other abbreviated pill names are expanded only as far as their wording permits.

[7735] Burton. Printed page 382, l: "Purgantia censebant medicamenta, non unum humorem attrahere, sed quemcunque attigerint in suam naturam convertere." They thought that purgative medicines do not draw out one particular humour, but transform whatever they touch into their own nature.

[7736] Editor. "Choler" here is distinguished from black bile, which it is said to nourish. "Magistrals" are special medical formulations. The l margin gives a more specific theory than the body: medicines transform whatever humour they touch into their own nature, rather than selectively attracting one humour. That difference is preserved. The Latin proposition and Burton's English explanation are both rendered.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 382 Some rather use potions then pills to purge this humour, because that as Heurnius and Crato observe, hic succus à sicco remedio ægrè trahitur, this juyce is not so easily drawn by dry remedies, and as Montanus adviseth 25. cons. All [7737]drying medicines are to be repelled, as Aloe, Hiera, and all pills whatsoever, because the disease is dry of it self.	Some prefer potions to pills for purging this humour because, as Heurnius and Crato observe, "this fluid is drawn out with difficulty by a dry remedy": dry remedies do not draw this fluid out so easily. As Montanus advises in consultation 25, "all drying medicines must be rejected, such as aloes, Hiera and pills of every kind," because the disease is dry in itself.[7738]
I might here insert many receipts of prescribed potions, boles, &c. The doses of these, but that they are common in every good Physitian, and that I am loth to incurre the censure of Forestus lib. 3. cap. 6. de urinis, [7739]against those that divulge and publish medicines in their mother tongue, and lest I should give occasion thereby to some ignorant Reader to practise on himself, without the consent of a good Physitian.	I could insert many recipes for prescribed potions, boluses and the like, together with their doses. But these are familiar to every good physician; and I am reluctant to incur Foreest's censure in On Urines, book 3, chapter 6, "against those who divulge and publish medicines in their native language." I also fear giving some uninformed reader an opportunity to experiment on himself without a good physician's consent.[7740]

[7737] Burton. Printed page 382, m: "Religantur omnes exsiccantes medicinæ, ut Aloe, Hiera, pilulæ quæcunque." Let all drying medicines be banished, such as aloes, Hiera and pills of every kind.

[7738] Editor. "Dry" belongs to the humoral classification of disease and medicine. The quotation does not simply refer to pills being physically dry. The m margin's Religantur is retained as printed and understood as an injunction to banish or exclude the medicines. Burton's Latin phrase and his English restatement both remain.

[7739] Burton. Printed page 382, n: "Contra eos qui lingua vulgari & vernacula remedia & medicamenta præscribunt, & quibusvis communia faciunt." Against those who prescribe remedies and medicines in the common, native language and make them available to everyone.

[7740] Editor. Boles here are boluses, doses formed into a mass. Burton expressly limits how much practical detail he will provide, citing Foreest's objection to vernacular medical publication and the risk of readers treating themselves. The n margin adds that such publication makes the remedies available to everyone.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such as are not swallowed, but only kept in the mouth, are Gargarisms used commonly after a purge, when the body is soluble and loose. Or Apophlegmatisms, Masticatories, to be held and chewed in the mouth, which are gentle, as Hyssope, Origan, Pennyriall, Thyme, Mustard; strong, as Pellitory, Pepper, Ginger, &c.	Medicines not swallowed but merely held in the mouth include gargles, commonly used after a purge when the bowels are open and loose. There are also apophlegmatisms, or masticatories, held and chewed in the mouth: gentle ones such as hyssop, oregano, pennyroyal, thyme and mustard; and strong ones such as pellitory, pepper, ginger and so on.[7741]
Such as are taken into the nostrils, Errhina are liquid or drie, juyce of Pimpernell, Onions, &c. Castor, Pepper, white Hellebor, &c. To these you may adde odoraments, perfumes, and suffumigations, &c.	Those taken into the nostrils, called errhines, are liquid or dry: pimpernel juice, onions and so on; castoreum, pepper, white hellebore and the like. To these you may add scented preparations, perfumes and fumigations.[7742]
Taken into the inferior parts are Clysters strong or weak, Suppositories of Castilian sope, hony boiled to a consistence; or stronger of Scamony, Hellebor, &c. These are all used, and prescribed to this malady upon severall occasions, as shall be shewed in his place.	Those administered through the lower parts are enemas, strong or weak; suppositories of Castile soap or honey boiled to a firm consistency; or stronger ones made of scammony, hellebore and so on. All these are used and prescribed for this disease in various circumstances, as will be explained in the proper place.[7743]

[7741] Editor. Apophlegmatisms are preparations intended to draw off phlegm, here by chewing or holding them in the mouth; "masticatories" emphasizes chewing. "Soluble and loose" describes an open or lax state of the bowels. Burton's division into gentle and strong substances is retained.

[7742] Editor. Errhines are preparations administered through the nostrils. Castor here means castoreum, the historical animal-derived drug, rather than castor oil. "Suffumigations" are applications of medicinal fumes. Pimpernel and pellitory are kept as historical common names without forcing exact modern species identifications.

[7743] Editor. "Clysters" are enemas. "To a consistence" means until the honey has thickened or become firm. "In his place" means in the appropriate place in the book. This sentence ends Member 2; Member 3 begins, on surgical remedies, immediately below it on the same source page.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 3. Chirurgicall remedies.	MEMBER 3 Surgical remedies
In letting of blood three main circumstances are to be considered, [7744]Who, how much, when. That is, that it be done to such a one as may endure it, or to whom it may belong, that he be of a competent age, not too young, nor too old, overweak, fat, or lean, sore laboured, but to such as have need, are full of bad blood, noxious humors, and may be eased by it.	In bloodletting three main circumstances must be considered: who, how much and when. That is, it should be performed on someone able to endure it, or for whom it is appropriate: someone of a suitable age, neither too young nor too old, excessively weak, fat or thin, or exhausted by labour; someone who needs it, is full of bad blood and harmful humours, and may obtain relief from it.[7745]
The quantity depends upon the parties habit of body, as he is strong or weak, full or empty, may spare more or less.	The quantity depends on the person's bodily constitution: whether he is strong or weak, full or depleted, and can spare more or less.[7746]
Source page 382–383 In the morning is the fittest time: some doubt whether it be best fasting, or full, whether the Moons motion or aspect of Planets be to be observed, some affirm, some deny, some grant in acute, but not in Chronick diseases, whether before or after Physick. 'Tis Heurnius Aphorism, à Phlebotomia auspicandum esse curationem, non à pharmacia, you must begin with blood-letting and not Physick; some except this peculiar malady.	Morning is the most suitable time. Some dispute whether it is best done fasting or after food; whether the moon's motion or the planets' aspects should be observed—some affirm this, some deny it, some allow it in acute diseases but not chronic ones—and whether it should precede or follow medicinal treatment. Heurnius' maxim is, "Treatment must begin with bloodletting, not with medication": you must begin with bloodletting and not medicine. Some make an exception for this particular disease.[7747]

[7744] Burton. Printed page 382, o: "Quis, quantum, quando." "Who, how much, when."

[7745] Editor. "Chirurgicall" means surgical. Bloodletting here belongs to the humoral account of disease: excess or corrupt blood is to be removed from patients thought able to withstand the loss. The paragraph's restrictions are part of Burton's argument, not dispensable qualifications to a general recommendation.

[7746] Editor. "Habit of body" means bodily constitution, not a repeated behaviour. "Full" and "empty" describe the supposed abundance or depletion of the body's contents, particularly its blood and humours.

[7747] Editor. "Physick" here means medicinal treatment, as distinguished from drawing blood. Planetary "aspects" are the relations between celestial positions used in astrological judgments. Burton records disagreement about their relevance. The Latin maxim is translated separately from his own English gloss; neither has been silently removed as repetition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 383 But what do I? Horatius Augenius, a Physitian of Padua, hath lately writ 17. books of this subject, Jobertus, &c.	But what am I doing? Horatius Augenius, a physician of Padua, has recently written seventeen books on this subject; Jobertus and others have written on it too.[7748]
Particular kinds of blood-letting in use [7749]are three, first is that opening a Vein in the arm with a sharp knife, or in the head, knees, or any other parts, as shall be thought fit.	Three particular kinds of bloodletting are in use. The first is opening a vein with a sharp knife, in the arm, head, knees or any other part thought suitable.[7750]
Cupping-glasses with or without scarification, ocyssimè compescunt, saith Fernelius, they work presently, and are applyed to severall parts, to divert humours, aches, winde, &c.	Cupping glasses, with or without scarification, "bring relief very quickly," says Fernel: they act immediately. They are applied to various parts to divert humours, aches, wind and the like.[7751]
Horse-leeches, are much used in melancholy, applied especially to the Hæmrods. Horatius Augenius lib. 10. cap. 10. Platerus de mentis alienat. cap. 3. Altomarus, Piso, and many others, prefer them before any evacuations in this kinde.	Horse-leeches are widely used in melancholy, especially on the haemorrhoids. Horatius Augenius, book 10, chapter 10; Plater, On Mental Derangement, chapter 3; Altomarus, Piso and many others prefer them to any other evacuation of this kind.[7752]

[7748] Editor. "Books" can mean divisions of a single work, rather than seventeen separate volumes. Burton's aside checks his own tendency to expand the discussion. The abbreviated reference to Jobertus supplies neither a title nor a location; these have not been invented.

[7749] Burton. Printed page 383, q: "Fernelius lib. 2. cap. 19." Fernel, book 2, chapter 19.

[7750] Editor. The next three entries distinguish opening a vein, applying cupping glasses, and using leeches. Burton's attribution to Fernel remains in its printed position; the exact work behind "book 2, chapter 19" still requires collation.

[7751] Editor. Scarification means making small incisions in the skin. "Presently" means immediately. The Latin literally says "restrain very swiftly," while Burton's English emphasizes speed of action. "Diversion" is the proposed redirection of humours away from an affected part.

[7752] Editor. "Horse-leeches" is retained as Burton's historical name without assigning it a modern zoological species. The reference to haemorrhoids concerns the contemporary practice of drawing blood from that region, a form of evacuation within his medical scheme.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7753]Cauteries or searing with hot irons, combustions, boarings, launcings, which because they are terrible, Dropax and Sinapismus are invented, by plaisters to raise blisters, and eating medicines of pich, mustard-seed and the like.	Cauteries, or searing with hot irons, burnings, borings and lancings are frightening procedures. Dropax and sinapismus were therefore devised: plasters to raise blisters, and corrosive applications made from pitch, mustard seed and the like.[7754]
Issues still to be kept open, made as the former, and applyed in and to severall parts, have their use here on diverse occasions, as shall be shewed.	Issues, made by the foregoing methods and continually kept open in various parts of the body, have their uses here on different occasions, as will be shown.[7755]

[7753] Burton. Printed page 383, r: “Renodeus lib. 5. cap. 21. de his Mercurialis lib. 3. de composit. med. cap. 24. Heurnius lib. 1. prax. med. Wecker, &c.” Renodeus, book 5, chapter 21; on these, Mercurialis, On the Composition of Medicines, book 3, chapter 24; Heurnius, Medical Practice, book 1; Wecker, and others.

[7754] Editor. “Dropax” denotes a pitch preparation or plaster; “sinapismus” a mustard application. “Eating medicines” are substances understood to corrode tissue. These are historical alternatives to the instruments and burning procedures just listed, rather than the sense of medicine taken as food.

[7755] Editor. An “issue” is an artificially produced sore maintained as an outlet for discharge. The sentence closes Section 4’s account of remedies; the next heading begins the particular treatment of the three kinds of melancholy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SECT. 5. MEMB. 1. SUBSEC. 1. Particular cure of the three severall kindes: of head Melancholy.	SECTION 5 MEMBER 1 SUBSECTION 1 Specific treatment of the three distinct kinds Head melancholy
The generall cures thus briefly examined and discussed, it remains now, to apply these medicines to the three particular species or kindes, that according to the severall parts affected, each man may tell in some sort how to help or ease himself. I will treat of head melancholy first, in which, as in all other good cures we must begin with Diet, as a matter of most moment, able oftentimes of it self to work this effect.	Having thus briefly examined and discussed the general treatments, I must now apply these medicines to the three particular species or kinds, so that, according to the parts affected, each person may know to some extent how to help or relieve himself. I shall treat head melancholy first. Here, as in every other sound treatment, we must begin with diet: a matter of the greatest importance, often able to bring about the desired effect by itself.[7756]
I have read, saith Laurentius cap. 8. de Melanch. that in old diseases which have gotten the upper hand or an habit, the manner of living is to more purpose, then whatsoever can be drawn out of the most pretious boxes of the Apothecaries.	"I have read," says Laurentius in chapter 8, On Melancholy, "that in longstanding diseases which have gained the upper hand or become established, one's manner of living does more good than anything that can be taken from the apothecaries' most precious boxes."[7757]

[7756] Editor. "Head melancholy" is Burton's category for melancholy whose primary seat is the brain. It belongs to the threefold classification already developed in the work; it should not be equated with a single modern diagnosis. The printed section, member and subsection hierarchy is retained.

[7757] Editor. "Habit" here is an established or settled condition. The point is that daily regimen may matter more in a settled illness than even costly preparations from an apothecary.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This diet, as I have said, is not only in choice of meat and drink, but of all those other non-naturall things. Let air be clear and moist most part: diet moistning, of good juyce, easie of digestion, and not windie: drink clear, and well brewed, not too strong nor too small. Make a melancholy man fat, as [7758]Rhasis saith, and thou hast finished the cure.	This regimen, as I have said, concerns not only the choice of food and drink but all the other "non-natural" things. Let the air be clear and generally moist; the food moistening, nourishing, easily digested and not productive of wind; the drink clear and well brewed, neither too strong nor too weak. "Make a melancholic man fat," as Rhazes says, "and you have completed the cure."[7759]
Exercise not too remisse, nor too violent. Sleep a little more then ordinary. [7760]Excrements daily to be avoided by art or nature, and which Fernelius enjoyns his Patient consil. 44. above the rest, to avoid all passions and perturbations of the mind.	Exercise should be neither too slack nor too strenuous. Sleep a little longer than usual. The bowels should be emptied daily, naturally or with assistance; and, above all, as Fernel directs his patient in consultation 44, avoid every passion and disturbance of the mind.[7761]
Source page 383–384 Let him not be alone or idle, (in any kind of melancholy) but still accompanied with such friends and familiars he most affects, neatly dressed, washed and combed, according to his ability at least, in clean sweet linen, spruce, handsome, decent, and good apparell; for nothing sooner dejects a man then want, squalor and nastiness, foul, or old cloaths out of fashion.	Let him be neither alone nor idle, whatever kind of melancholy he has, but always in the company of the friends and intimates he likes best. Let him be neatly dressed, washed and combed, at least as far as his means allow, in clean, fresh linen and smart, presentable, decent, good clothing. Nothing casts a person down sooner than poverty, squalor and filth, or dirty, old, unfashionable clothes.[7762]

[7758] Burton. Printed page 383, s: "Cont. lib. 1. c. 9. festines ad impinguationem, & cum impinguantur, removetur malum." Continens, book 1, chapter 9: "Hasten to make them fat; when they grow fat, the disease is removed."

[7759] Editor. The "six non-natural things" are the traditional factors of regimen: air; food and drink; movement and rest; sleep and waking; evacuation and retention; and the passions. They are "non-natural" as a technical category, not unnatural behaviour. The claim about becoming fat is attributed to Rhazes in the margin.

[7760] Burton. Printed page 383, t: "Beneficium ventris." "Relief of the bowels."

[7761] Editor. "Avoided" means discharged or evacuated, not shunned; "by art" means with medical assistance. "Beneficium ventris" refers to bowel relief. The paragraph moves from bodily regimen to the passions and disturbances of the mind.

[7762] Editor. "Affects" means likes or prefers; "ability" includes the means to obtain suitable clothing. The recommendations combine nourishment, cleanliness, companionship and activity, rather than reducing the patient's care to medicines alone.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 384 Concerning the medicinal part, he that will satisfie himself at large (in this precedent of diet) and see all at once, the whole cure and manner of it in every distinct species, let him consult with Gordonius, Valescus, with Prosper Calenius lib. de atra bile ad Card. Cæsium, Laurentius cap. 8. & 9. de mela. Ælian Montaltus de mel. cap. 26. 27. 28. 29. 30. Donat. ab Altomari cap. 7. artis med. Hercules de Saxonia in Panth. cap. 7. & Tract. ejus peculiar. de melan. per Bolzetam edit. Venetiis 1620. cap. 17. 18. 19.	As for medicinal treatment, anyone who wants a full account—including the preceding discussion of regimen—and a view of the entire treatment and its method for each distinct species should consult Gordonius and Valescus; Prosper Calenius, On Black Bile, addressed to Cardinal Caesius; Laurentius, On Melancholy, chapters 8 and 9; Ælian Montaltus, On Melancholy, chapters 26, 27, 28, 29 and 30; Donatus ab Altomari, The Art of Medicine, chapter 7; Hercules de Saxonia, Pantheum, chapter 7, and his separate Treatise on Melancholy, edited by Bolzeta, Venice, 1620, chapters 17, 18 and 19;[7763]
Savanarola Rub. 82. Tract. 8. cap. 1. Skenkius in prax. curat. Ital. med. Heurnius cap. 12. de morb. Victorius Faventinus pract. Magn. & Empir. Hildesheim Spicel. 2. de man. & mel. Fel. Platter, Stokerus, Bruel. P. Bayerus, Forestus, Fuchsius, Capivaccius, Rondoletius, Jason Pratensis. Salust. Salvian. de re med. lib. 2. cap. 1. Iacchinus. in 9. Rhasis, Lod. Mercatus de Inter. morb. cur. lib. 1. cap. 17. Alexan. Messaria pract. med. lib. 1. cap. 21. de mel. Piso. Hollerius &c. that have culled out of those old Greeks, Arabians, and Latines, whatsoever is observable or fit to be used.	Savonarola, rubric 82, treatise 8, chapter 1; Skenkius, Practice of Italian Medical Treatments; Heurnius, On Diseases, chapter 12; Victorius Faventinus, Great Practice and Empirical Practice; Hildesheim, Gleanings, book 2, On Mania and Melancholy; Felix Platter, Stokerus, Bruel, P. Bayerus, Foreest, Fuchs, Capivaccius, Rondelet, Jason Pratensis; Sallust Salvian, On Medicine, book 2, chapter 1; Jacchinus on the ninth book of Rhazes; Lodovicus Mercatus, On the Treatment of Internal Diseases, book 1, chapter 17; Alexander Massaria, Medical Practice, book 1, chapter 21, On Melancholy; Piso, Hollerius and others. They have selected from the ancient Greeks, Arabians and Latins whatever deserves notice or is suitable for use.[7764]

[7763] Editor. This catalogue preserves Burton's printed subdivisions and numbers, including the Venetian date 1620. "Tract." means treatise; "rub." a rubric or section; "cons." a consultation. Expansion of these abbreviations in English does not certify every reference against a separate copy of the cited work.

[7764] Editor. Names and abbreviated titles are retained in the original column, with conventional English forms where sufficiently clear on the right. The list is an inventory of authorities Burton offers his reader, not a claim that all endorse the same treatment. Its detailed medical bibliography has not been fully verified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or let him read those counsels and consultations of Hugo Senensis consil. 13. & 14. Renerus Solinander cons. 6. sec. 1. & consil. 3. sec. 3. Crato consil. 16. lib. 1. Montanus 20. 21. 229. and his following counsels, Lælius à Fonte. Egubinus consult. 44. 69. 77. 125. 129. 142. Fernelius consil. 44. 45. 46. Iul. Cæsar Claudinus, Mercurialis, Frambesarius, Sennertus, &c.	Or let him read the counsels and consultations of Hugo Senensis, consultations 13 and 14; Renerus Solinander, consultation 6 in section 1 and consultation 3 in section 3; Crato, consultation 16, book 1; Montanus, 20, 21, 229 and the counsels that follow; Laelius à Fonte Egubinus, consultations 44, 69, 77, 125, 129 and 142; Fernel, consultations 44, 45 and 46; Julius Caesar Claudinus, Mercurialis, Frambesarius, Sennertus and others.[7765]
Wherein he shall finde particular receipts, the whole method, preparatives, purgers, correcters, averters, cordials in great variety and abundance: Out of which, because every man cannot attend to read or peruse them, I will collect for the benefit of the reader, some few more notable medicines.	In these he will find particular recipes, the entire method, and a great variety and abundance of preparatives, purgatives, correctives, medicines that divert humours, and cordials. Since not everyone can devote time to reading and examining these works, I shall collect from them a few of the more notable medicines for the reader's benefit.[7766]

[7765] Editor. "Egubinus" belongs to the designation of Laelius, rather than identifying an additional author. Consultation and chapter numbers are retained as printed. Burton's use of a bare surname or shortened title does not justify supplying an unverified full bibliographic identity.

[7766] Editor. "Preparatives" ready the body or humours for treatment; "correctors" modify another medicine's effects; "cordials" are intended to support the heart and spirits. The list presents stages and classes of treatment. Burton then explicitly limits himself to selected examples.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 2. Blood-letting*.	SUBSECTION 2 Bloodletting
Phlebotomy is promiscuously used before and after Physick, commonly before, and upon occasion is often reiterated, if there be any need at least of it. For Galen, & many others make a doubt of bleeding at all in this kind of head-melancholy.	Bloodletting is used both before and after medicinal treatment, usually before, and is often repeated as occasion requires—if there is any need for it at all. For Galen and many others question whether bleeding should be used at all in this kind of head melancholy.[7767]
If the malady, saith Piso cap. 23. & Altomarus cap. 7. Fuchsius cap. 33. [7768]shall proceed primarily from the misaffected brain, the Patient in such case shall not need at all to bleed, except the blood otherwise abound, the veins be full, inflamed blood, and the party ready to run-mad.	If the disease, say Piso, chapter 23, Altomarus, chapter 7, and Fuchs, chapter 33, "arises primarily from the affected brain, the patient has no need to be bled, unless blood is otherwise excessive, the veins full, the blood inflamed, and the person on the verge of madness."[7769]
In immateriall melancholy, which especially comes from a cold distemperature of spirits, Hercules de Saxonia cap. 17. will not admit of Phlebotomy; Laurentius cap. 9. approves it out of the authority of the Arabians, but as Mesue, Rhasis, Alexander appoint, [7770]especially in the head, to open the veins of the fore-head, nose and ears is good.	In immaterial melancholy, which arises especially from a cold imbalance of the spirits, Hercules de Saxonia, chapter 17, refuses to allow bloodletting. Laurentius, chapter 9, approves it on the authority of the Arabian writers, particularly in the head, as Mesue, Rhazes and Alexander prescribe: opening the veins of the forehead, nose and ears is beneficial.[7771]

[7767] Editor. "Promiscuously" here means without distinguishing the two categories in advance. It does not mean that every patient is to receive both treatments: the qualification "if need be" is essential to the sentence.

[7768] Burton. Printed page 384, u: "Si ex primario cerebri affectu melancholici evaserint, sanguinis detractione non indigent, nisi ob alias causas sanguis mittatur, si multus in vasis, &c. frustra enim fatigatur corpus &c." "If they have become melancholic from a primary affection of the brain, they do not need bloodletting, unless blood is drawn for other reasons—if there is much in the vessels, and so forth; for otherwise the body is wearied to no purpose, and so forth."

[7769] Editor. The marginal Latin makes the caution stronger than the main text alone: without a separate reason for bloodletting, the body is needlessly wearied. "Primary" identifies a disease thought to originate in the brain, rather than an effect transmitted there from elsewhere.

[7770] Burton. Printed page 384, x: "Competit iis phlebotomia frontis." "Bloodletting at the forehead is suitable for them."

[7771] Editor. "Immaterial" distinguishes a disorder not attributed to a substantial accumulation of bodily humour. "Spirits" are the subtle agents of bodily activity in this physiology, not ghosts. The contrast between cold and other kinds of melancholy follows the humoral qualities of the argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 384–385 They commonly set cupping-glasses on the parties shoulders, having first scarified the place, they apply horse-leeches on the head, and in all melancholy diseases, whether essentiall or accidentall, they cause the Hæmrods to be opened, having the eleventh Aphorism of the 6. book of Hippocrates for their ground and warrant, which saith, that in melancholy and mad-men, the varicous tumour or hemorrhoides appearing doth heal the same.	They commonly place cupping glasses on the patient's shoulders after scarifying the area, and apply horse-leeches to the head. In all melancholic diseases, whether primary or secondary, they cause the haemorrhoids to bleed, taking as their basis and warrant the eleventh aphorism of Hippocrates' sixth book, which says that "in melancholic and mad people, the appearance of varicose swelling or haemorrhoids cures the condition."[7772]
Source page 385 Valescus prescribes blood-letting in all three kinds, whom Salust. Salvian follows, [7773]If the blood abound, which is discerned by the fulness of the veins, his precedent diet, the parties laughter, age, &c. begin with the median or middle vein of the arm: if the blood be ruddy and clear, stop it, but if black in the spring time, or a good season, or thick, let it run, according to the parties strength: and some eight or twelve dayes after, open the head vein, and the veins in the forehead, or provoke it out of the nostrils, or cupping-glasses, &c.	Valescus prescribes bloodletting in all three kinds, and Sallust Salvian follows him: "If blood is excessive—as judged by the fullness of the veins, the previous diet, the patient's laughter, age and so on—begin with the median, or middle, vein of the arm. If the blood is red and clear, stop it; but if it is black, in spring or another suitable season, or thick, let it flow according to the patient's strength. Some eight or twelve days later, open the head vein and the forehead veins, or provoke bleeding from the nostrils, or use cupping glasses, and so on."[7774]

[7772] Editor. Burton prints Aphorisms 6.11. In Adams's English translation, that passage calls haemorrhoids favourable in melancholic and nephritic complaints; 6.21 links relief of mania with varicose veins or haemorrhoids. Both describe their appearance, not a direction to open them surgically. Burton's wording resembles 6.21 as well as 6.11; his Latin version or intermediary remains unidentified.

[7773] Burton. Printed page 385, y: "Si sanguis abundet, quod scitur ex venarum repletione, victus ratione præcedente, risu ægri, ætate & aliis, Tundatur mediana; & si sanguis apparet clarus & ruber, supprimatur; aut si vere, si niger aut crassus permittatur fluere pro viribus ægri, dein post 8. vel 12. diem aperiatur cephalica partis magis affectæ, & vena frontis, aut sanguis provocetur setis per nares, &c." "If blood is excessive, as may be known from the fullness of the veins, the previous regimen, the patient's laughter, age and other signs, open the median vein. If the blood appears clear and red, stop it; or, if it is spring, if the blood is black or thick, let it flow according to the patient's strength. Then, after the eighth or twelfth day, open the cephalic vein on the more affected side and the vein of the forehead, or provoke bleeding with bristles through the nostrils, and so forth." The note continues beneath the main text.

[7774] Editor. The "head vein" is the cephalic vein, a named vein of the arm; the forehead vein is separately mentioned. Both versions include the patient's laughter among the signs. The margin additionally specifies bristles through the nostrils as a means of provoking bleeding. Its awkward sequence "aut si vere, si" is retained and rendered without inventing missing words.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Trallianus allows of this, [7775]If there have been any suppression or stopping of blood at nose, or hemrods, or womens moneths, then to open a vein in the head or about the ankles.	Trallianus approves this: "If there has been any suppression or stoppage of nosebleeding, haemorrhoidal bleeding or women's monthly periods, then open a vein in the head or near the ankles."[7776]
Yet he doth hardly approve of this course, if melancholy be sited in the head alone, or in any other dotage, [7777]except it primarily proceed from blood, or that the malady be increased by it: for blood-letting refrigerates and dries up, except the body be very full of blood, and a kind of ruddiness in the face.	Yet he scarcely approves this course if melancholy is situated in the head alone, or in any other mental derangement, "unless it arises primarily from blood, or the disease is aggravated by it: for bloodletting cools and dries, unless the body is very full of blood and the face has a certain redness."[7778]
Therefore I conclude with Areteus, [7779]before you let blood, deliberate of it, and well consider all circumstances belonging to it.	I therefore conclude with Aretaeus: "Before you let blood, deliberate about it," and carefully consider every relevant circumstance.[7780]

[7775] Burton. Printed page 385, z: "Si quibus consuetæ suæ suppressæ sunt menses, &c. talo secare oportet, aut vena frontis si sanguis peccet cerebro." "If any women's customary monthly courses have been suppressed, and so forth, one should bleed at the ankle; or at the vein of the forehead if the blood is at fault in the brain." Printed beneath the main text.

[7776] Editor. The passage treats suppressed menstrual bleeding as a cause requiring evacuation. Its movements between the ankle and forehead reflect the proposed site and direction of the disorder within this medical system. The irregular Latin construction in the margin is preserved.

[7777] Burton. Printed page 385, a: "Nisi ortum ducat à sanguine, ne morbus inde augeatur: phlebotomia refrigerat & exiccat, nisi corpus sit valde sanguineum, rubicundum." "Unless it takes its origin from blood, lest the disease thereby be aggravated: bloodletting cools and dries, unless the body is very full of blood and ruddy." Printed beneath the main text; the initial prohibition is supplied by Burton's surrounding sentence.

[7778] Editor. Burton's English and marginal Latin do not correspond word for word. The margin's "lest the disease thereby be aggravated" points to a danger of the proposed bloodletting; his English associates aggravation with blood. Both formulations remain available to the reader, without harmonizing them.

[7779] Burton. Printed page 385, b: "Cum sanguinem detrahere oportet, deliberatione indiget. Areteus lib. 7. c. 5." "When blood must be drawn, the matter requires deliberation." Aretaeus, book 7, chapter 5. Printed beneath the main text.

[7780] Editor. Burton preserves an argument about whether blood should be drawn at all, before proceeding to details of treatment. The marginal reference to Aretaeus, book 7, chapter 5, has not been matched to a particular edition or converted to another system of numbering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 3. Preparatives and Purgers.	SUBSECTION 3 Preparatives and purgatives
After blood-letting we must proceed to other medicines; first prepare, and then purge, Augeæ stabulum purgare, make the body clean before we hope to do any good. Gualter Bruel would have a practitioner begin first with a Clister of his, which he prescribes before blood-letting: the common sort, as Mercurialis, Montaltus cap. 30. &c. proceed from lenitives to preparatives, and so to purgers. Lenitives are well known, Electuarium lenitivum, Diaphenicum, Diacatholicon, &c.	After bloodletting we must proceed to other medicines: first prepare, then purge—"clean out Augeas' stable"—make the body clean before we can hope to do any good. Gualter Bruel would have a practitioner begin with an enema of his own, which he prescribes before bloodletting. Most, such as Mercurialis, Montaltus in chapter 30, and others, proceed from gentle laxatives to preparatives, and then to purgatives. The gentle laxatives are well known: the lenitive electuary, Diaphenicum, Diacatholicon and others.[7781]
Preparatives are usually Syrups of Borage, Buglosse, Apples, Fumitory, Thyme and Epithyme, with double as much of the same decoction or distilled water, or of the waters of Buglosse, Bawm, Hops, Endive, Scolopendry, Fumitory, &c. or these sod in whey, which must be reiterated and used for many dayes together.	Preparatives are usually syrups of borage, bugloss, apples, fumitory, thyme and epithyme, with twice as much of the corresponding decoction or distilled water; or waters of bugloss, balm, hops, endive, scolopendry, fumitory and the like; or these boiled in whey. They must be repeatedly administered for many days in succession.[7782]

[7781] Editor. Augeas' stables are the proverbial immense task assigned to Heracles. Apollodorus, Library 2.5.5, tells how he cleans them by diverting rivers. Burton makes the cleansing of a disordered body similarly formidable. "Clysters" are enemas; "lenitives" are gentler remedies. See Apollodorus below.

[7782] Editor. The plant and preparation names belong to the historical materia medica. They have been carried over or given established English forms without treating every early modern name as an exact modern species identification. A "decoction" is a preparation made by boiling; "sod" means boiled.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Purges come last, which must not be used at all, if the malady may be otherwise helped, because they weaken nature and dry so much; and in giving of them, [7783]we must begin with the gentlest first. Some forbid all hot medicines, as Alexander and Salvianus, &c. Ne insaniores inde fiant, Hot medicines increase the disease [7784]by drying too much.	Purgatives come last, and "must not be used at all if the disease can be relieved otherwise," because they weaken nature and dry the body so much. In administering them, "we must begin with the gentlest." Some, including Alexander and Salvianus, forbid all hot medicines "lest the patients become more deranged through them": hot medicines increase the disease "by excessive drying."[7785]
Purge downward rather then upward, use potions rather then pills, and when you begin Physick, persevere and continue in a course; for as one observes, movere & non educere in omnibus malum est; To stir up the humour (as one purge commonly doth) and not to prosecute, doth more harm then good. They must continue in a course of Physick, yet not so that they tire and oppress nature, [7786]danda quies naturæ, they must now and then remit, and let nature have some rest.	Purge downwards rather than upwards, use potions rather than pills, and once you begin medicinal treatment, persevere with a course of it. For, as one writer observes, "to stir up without drawing out is harmful in every case": to stir up the humour, as a single purge commonly does, and then fail to follow through does more harm than good. Patients must continue a course of treatment, yet without exhausting and overburdening nature. "Nature must be given rest": treatment must sometimes be relaxed so that nature can rest.[7787]

[7783] Burton. Printed page 385, c: "A lenioribus auspicandum. (Valescus, Piso, Bruel) rariusque medicamentis purgantibus utendum, nisi sit opus." "One should begin with milder remedies (Valescus, Piso, Bruel), and use purgative medicines less often, unless they are needed."

[7784] Burton. Printed page 385, d: "Quia corpus exiccant, morbum augent." "Because they dry out the body, they aggravate the disease."

[7785] Editor. The Latin warning against making patients more insane is translated independently of Burton's following English. His terms "hot" and "dry" denote humoral qualities, used here to explain why a treatment might intensify the condition it is meant to relieve.

[7786] Burton. Printed page 385, e: "Guianerius Tract. 15. c. 6." Guainerius, treatise 15, chapter 6.

[7787] Editor. The Latin contrasts stirring up with drawing out; Burton's English develops that into a warning against abandoning a course after a single purge. Both are retained. "Nature" is the body's own restorative capacity, which he also warns against exhausting by continuous treatment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 385–386 The most gentle purges to begin with, are [7788]Sena, Cassia, Epithyme, Myrabolanes, Catholicon: If these prevail not, we may proceed to stronger, as the confection of Hamech, Pil. Indæ, Fumitoriæ, de Assaieret, of Lapis Armenus and Lazuli, Diasena. Or if pills be too dry; [7789]some prescribe both Hellebors in the last place, amongst the rest Areteus, [7790]because this disease will resist a gentle medicine.	The gentlest purgatives with which to begin are senna, cassia, epithyme, myrobalans and Catholicon. If these do not succeed, we may proceed to stronger ones, such as Hamech's confection, Indian pills, fumitory pills, pills of Assaieret, Armenian stone and lapis lazuli, and Diasena. Or, if pills are too dry, some prescribe both hellebores as a last resort, among them Aretaeus, "because this disease will resist a gentle medicine."[7791]
Source page 386 Laurentius and Hercules de Saxonia would have Antimony tried last, if the [7792]party be strong, and it warily given. [7793]Trincavelius prefers Hierologodium, to whom Francis Alexander in his Apol. rad. 5. subscribes, a very good medicine they account it. But Crato in a counsell of his, for the Duke of Bavaria's Chancellour, wholly rejects it.	Laurentius and Hercules de Saxonia would have antimony tried last, provided the patient is strong and it is given cautiously. Trincavelli prefers Hierologodium, and Francis Alexander agrees in his Apology, rad. 5: they regard it as an excellent medicine. But Crato, in a consultation for the Duke of Bavaria's chancellor, rejects it entirely.[7794]

[7788] Burton. Printed page 386, f: "Piso." Piso.

[7789] Burton. Printed page 386, g: "Rhasis, sæpe valent ex Helleboro." Rhazes: "They often recover through hellebore."

[7790] Burton. Printed page 386, h: "Lib. 7. Exiguis medicamentis morbus non obsequitur." Book 7: "The disease does not yield to weak medicines."

[7791] Editor. The list moves from mild to stronger purgatives. Catholicon, Hamech's confection and Diasena are compound names; "Indian" and "fumitory" expand the corresponding pill labels. Assaieret remains unexpanded because its precise formula has not been established here. The two hellebores are the white and black kinds discussed earlier.

[7792] Burton. Printed page 386, asterisk: "Modo caute detur & robustis." "Provided it is given cautiously, and to strong patients."

[7793] Burton. Printed page 386, i: "Consil. 10. l. 1." Consultation 10, book 1.

[7794] Editor. Burton gives "Apol. rad. 5." for Francis Alexander; the uncertain subdivision "rad." remains visible in the modern rendering. Hierologodium is retained as the printed preparation name. The caution about the patient's strength belongs to the antimony recommendation, which is followed by disagreement about another remedy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I finde a vast Chaos of medicines, a confusion of receipts and magistrals, amongst writers, appropriated to this disease; some of the chiefest I will rehearse. [7795]To be Sea-sick first is very good at seasonall times.	Among writers I find a vast chaos of medicines, a confusion of recipes and special formulations intended for this disease. I shall recount some of the principal ones. To begin with, being seasick is very beneficial at suitable times.[7796]
Helleborismus Matthioli, with which he vants and boasts he did so many severall cures, [7797]I never gave it (saith he) but after once or twice, by the help of God they were happily cured. The manner of making it he sets down at large in his third book of Epist. to George Hankshius a Physitian. Gualter Bruel and Heurnius, make mention of it with great approbation; so doth Skenkius in his memorable cures, and experimentall medicines, cen. 6. obser. 37.	Mattioli's hellebore treatment, with which he boasts of having performed so many different cures: "I never administered it," he says, "without their being successfully cured, with God's help, after one or two doses." He describes its preparation at length in his third book of Letters, to the physician George Hankshius. Gualter Bruel and Heurnius mention it with strong approval, as does Skenkius in his Memorable Cures and Experimental Medicines, century 6, observation 37.[7798]

[7795] Burton. Printed page 386, dagger: "Plin. l. 31. c. 6. Navigationes ob vomitionem prosunt plurimis morbis capitis, & omnibus ob quæ Helleborum bibitur. Idem Dioscorides, lib. 5. cap. 13. Avicenna tertia imprimis." Pliny, book 31, chapter 6: "Sea voyages, because of the vomiting, benefit many diseases of the head and all those for which hellebore is drunk." The same in Dioscorides, book 5, chapter 13; Avicenna, especially the third [part]. The abbreviated Avicenna reference leaves the subdivision unstated.

[7796] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 31.63, connects the vomiting caused by sea travel with benefit in disorders of the head, eyes and chest, and complaints treated with hellebore. Burton's book 31, chapter 6 is retained as printed. The Dioscorides and abbreviated Avicenna references still require separate collation. See Pliny 31 below.

[7797] Burton. Printed page 386, k: "Nunquam dedimus, quin ex una aut altera assumptione, Deo juvante, fuerint ad salutem restituti." "We never administered it without their being restored to health, with God's help, after one or two doses."

[7798] Editor. The quoted first person belongs to Mattioli, not Burton. The margin uses "we," where Burton's English has "I"; both are preserved. The addressee's printed name here is Hankshius, and has not been silently replaced with a spelling found elsewhere. A "century" is a collection of one hundred observations or cases.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That famous Helleborisme of Montanus, which he so often repeats in his consultations and counsels, as 28. pro melan. sacerdote & consil. 148. pro Hypocondriaco, and cracks, [7799]to be a most soveraign remedy for all melancholy persons, which he hath often given without offence, and found by long experience and observation to be such.	Then there is Montanus' famous hellebore treatment, so often repeated in his consultations and counsels, such as number 28, for a melancholic priest, and consultation 148, for a hypochondriacal patient. He boasts that it is "a most sovereign remedy for all melancholic people, which he has often administered without harm and found effective through long experience and observation."[7800]
Quercetan prefers a Syrupe of Hellebor in his Spagirica Pharmac. and Hellebors Extract cap. 5. of his invention likewise (a most safe medicine, [7801]and not unfit to be given children) before all remedies whatsoever.	Quercetan prefers a syrup of hellebore in his Spagyric Pharmacopoeia, and an extract of hellebore, chapter 5, likewise of his own invention, to every other remedy: "a very safe medicine, and not unsuitable for children."[7802]

[7799] Burton. Printed page 386, m: "Lib. 2. Inter composita purgantia melancholiam." "Book 2, among compound medicines that purge melancholy."

[7800] Editor. The letter m attaches here in the print, although its short reference to book 2 and compound purgatives appears more naturally related to the following Quercetan passage. The next marginal container begins with the claim about long experience developed here. The notes retain their printed attachments; proposed reassignment awaits source collation.

[7801] Burton. Printed page 386, n: "Longo experimento à se observatum esse, melancholicos sine offensa egregie curandos valere. Idem responsione ad Aubertum, veratrum nigrum, alias timidum & periculosum vini spiritu etiam & oleo amygdalarum sic usui redditur ut etiam pueris tuto administrari possit." "He had observed through long experience that it was effective in curing melancholic people remarkably well, without harm. The same author, in his reply to Aubert: black hellebore, otherwise feared and dangerous, is made usable with spirit of wine and also oil of almonds, so that it can even be administered safely to children."

[7802] Editor. The n margin appears to combine material relevant to Montanus with a reply to Aubert associated with the following discussion. Its "timidum" is rendered contextually as "feared," without changing the Latin. The assertions about harmlessness and children are the historical writers' claims, preserved as claims rather than independently established conclusions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Paracelsus in his book of black Hellebor, admits this medicine, but as it is prepared by him. [7803]It is most certain (saith he) that the vertue of this herb is great, and admirable in effect, and little differing from balm it self; and he that knowes well how to make use of it, hath more art then all their books contain, or all the Doctors in Germany can shew.	Paracelsus, in his book on black hellebore, accepts this medicine, but only as he prepares it. "It is quite certain," he says, "that this herb has great powers and remarkable effects, differing little from balsam itself. Anyone who knows how to use it properly possesses more skill than all their books contain or all the doctors in Germany can display."[7804]
Ælianus Montaltus in his exquisite work de morb. capitis, cap. 31. de mel. sets a speciall receipt of Hellebor of his own, which in his practice [7805]he fortunately used; because it is but short I will set it down.	Ælianus Montaltus, in his excellent work On Diseases of the Head, chapter 31, On Melancholy, gives a particular recipe of his own for hellebore, which he used successfully in his practice. Since it is short, I shall set it down.[7806]
R Syrupe de pomis ʒ ij, aquæ borag. ʒ iiij, Ellebori nigri per noctem infusi in ligaturâ 6. vel 8. gr. manè factâ collaturâ exhibe.	Take two ounces of apple syrup, four ounces of borage water, and six or eight grains of black hellebore, infused overnight in a tied packet. Strain it in the morning and administer it.[7807]

[7803] Burton. Printed page 386, o: "Certum est hujus herbæ virtutem maximam & mirabilem esse, parumque distare à balsamo. Et qui novit eo rectè uti, plus habet artis quam tota scribentium cohors aut omnes Doctores in Germania." "It is certain that this herb's power is very great and marvellous, and differs little from balsam. Whoever knows how to use it properly has more skill than the entire company of writers, or all the doctors in Germany." The note continues beneath the main text.

[7804] Editor. "Balm" here renders Latin "balsamum," a prized medicinal balsam; the word need not mean the herb lemon balm. The margin compares the practitioner with an entire company of writers, whereas Burton's English speaks of what their books contain. The extravagant claim of superiority is retained in each form.

[7805] Burton. Printed page 386, p: "Quo feliciter usus sum." "Which I have used successfully." Printed beneath the main text.

[7806] Editor. The margin's "I have used" is Montaltus' first person; the body reports it as "he" used. Burton then speaks in his own person when deciding to print the short recipe. The typography has not been taken to imply that every italicized word is a verbatim quotation from Montaltus.

[7807] Editor. R means "take"; ʒ marks an ounce, gr. a grain, ij two and iiij four. "In ligaturâ" indicates an infusion in a tied packet. The historical quantities are spelled out without conversion to modern measures; their units and methods belong to the source. See the Folger transcription guide below.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Other receipts of the same to this purpose you shall finde in him. Valescus admires pulvis Hali, and Jason Pratensis after him: the confection of which our new London Pharmacopœa hath lately revived. [7808]Put case (saith he) all other medicines fail, by the help of God this alone shall do it, and 'tis a crowned medicine which must be kept in secret.	You will find other recipes for it, serving the same purpose, in his work. Valescus admires Hali's powder, and Jason Pratensis follows him. Our new London Pharmacopoeia has recently revived its preparation. "Suppose," he says, "that all other medicines fail: with God's help this alone will succeed. It is a crowned medicine that must be kept secret."[7809]
R Epithymi semunc. lapidis Lazuli, agarici ana ʒ ij, Scammonii, ʒ j, Chariophillorum numero 20. pulverisentur Omnia, & ipsius pulveris scrup. 4. singulis septimanis assumat.	Take half an ounce of epithyme, two ounces each of lapis lazuli and agaric, one drachm of scammony, and twenty cloves. Reduce everything to powder; let the patient take four scruples of the powder each week.[7810]

[7808] Burton. Printed page 386, q: "Hoc posito quod aliæ medicinæ non valeant, ista tunc Dei misericordiâ valebit, & est medicina coronata, quæ secretissimè teneatur." "Supposing other medicines do not work, this one will then work through God's mercy; it is a crowned medicine, which must be kept most strictly secret." Printed beneath the main text.

[7809] Editor. The revised 1618 London Pharmacopoeia, p. 68, has a Pulvis Haly containing white poppy seed, gums and other ingredients unlike Burton's following epithyme and lapis-lazuli recipe. The shared name does not verify his revival claim; the first 1618 issue and other formulations remain uncollated. "Crowned" conveys praise. The secrecy demand stands beside his publication of the formula.

[7810] Editor. Semunc. means half an ounce; ana means "of each"; ʒ and ʒ distinguish ounces from drachms. The source specifies two ounces each of lapis lazuli and agaric, one drachm of scammony, twenty cloves, and four scruples of the mixed powder weekly. These readings follow the scan, without substituting modern doses. See the Folger guide below.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 387 To these I may adde Arnoldi vinum Buglossatum, or Borage wine before mentioned, which [7811]Mizaldus calls vinum mirabile, a wonderfull wine, and Stockerus vouchsafes to repeat verbatim amongst other receipts. [7812]Rubeus his compound water out of Savanarola: Pinetus his Balm; Cardans Pulvis Hyacinthi, with which in his book de curis admirandis, he boasts that he had cured many melancholy persons in eight dayes, which [7813]Sckenkius puts amongst his observeable medicines:	To these I may add Arnold's bugloss wine, or the borage wine mentioned earlier, which Mizaldus calls "marvellous wine," a wonderful wine, and Stockerus deigns to repeat word for word among his other recipes; Rubeus' compound water from Savonarola; Pinetus' balm; and Cardan's hyacinth powder, with which, in his book On Remarkable Cures, he boasts of having cured many melancholic people in eight days. Sckenkius includes it among his noteworthy medicines.[7814]
Altomarus his Syrupe, with which [7815]he calls God so solemnly to witness, he hath in his kind done many excellent cures, and which Sckenkius cent. 7. observ. 80. mentioneth, Daniel Sennertus lib. 1. part. 2. cap. 12. so much commends; Rulandus admirable water for melancholy, which cent. 2. cap. 96. he names Spiritum vitæ aureum, Panaceam, what not, and his absolute medicine of 50 Egges, curat. Empir. cent. 1. cur. 5. to be taken three in a morning, with a powder of his.	There is Altomarus' syrup, with which he solemnly calls God to witness that he has performed many excellent cures of this kind; Sckenkius mentions it in century 7, observation 80, and Daniel Sennertus greatly praises it in book 1, part 2, chapter 12. There is Rulandus' remarkable water for melancholy, which in century 2, chapter 96, he calls "the golden spirit of life," a "panacea"—what does he not call it?—and his perfect remedy of fifty eggs, Empirical Cures, century 1, cure 5, to be taken three each morning with a powder of his.[7816]

[7811] Burton. Printed page 387, s: "Lib. de artif. med." Book on medicinal artifices; Burton abbreviates the title.

[7812] Burton. Printed page 387, t: "Sect. 3. Optimum remedium aqua composita Savanarolæ." Section 3: "Savonarola's compound water is the best remedy."

[7813] Burton. Printed page 387, u: "Sckenkius observ. 31." Schenck, observation 31.

[7814] Editor. The source calls the wine both bugloss wine and borage wine; the difference is retained. "Pulvis Hyacinthi" is kept as hyacinth powder, without substituting a modern flower recipe for an uncollated historical compound. The sequence is a catalogue of named preparations and claims of successful cures.

[7815] Burton. Printed page 387, x: "Donatus ab Altomari. cap. 7 Testor Deum, me multos melancholicos hujus solius syrupi usu curasse, factâ prius purgatione." Donatus ab Altomari, chapter 7: "I call God to witness that I have cured many melancholic people with this syrup alone, a purge having first been given."

[7816] Editor. Altomarus' marginal testimony adds that a purge had first been given: the syrup's supposed success "alone" is qualified by that earlier treatment. Burton's "what not" punctures the extravagant names Rulandus gives his medicine. The fifty-egg total is retained exactly, in preparation for the numerical difficulty that follows.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7817]Faventinus prac. Emper. doubles this number of Egges, and will have 101. to be taken by three and three in like sort, which Salust. Salvian approves de re med. lib. 2. c. 1. with some of the same powder, till all be spent, a most excellent remedy for all melancholy and mad-men.	Faventinus, in his Empirical Practice, doubles this number of eggs and calls for 101, to be taken three at a time in the same way, which Sallust Salvian approves in On Medicine, book 2, chapter 1, with some of the same powder until all are used: a most excellent remedy for all melancholic and mad people.[7818]
℞ Epithymi, thymi, ana drachmas duas, sacchari albi unciam unam, croci grana tria, Cinamomi drachmam unam; misce, fiat pulvis.	Take two drachms each of epithyme and thyme, one ounce of white sugar, three grains of saffron and one drachm of cinnamon. Mix them to make a powder.[7819]
All these yet are nothing to those [7820]Chymical preparatives of Aqua Chalidonia, quintessence of Hellebor, salts, extracts, distillations, oyles, Aurum potabile, &c. D[r] Anthony in his book de auro potab. edit. 1600. is all in all for it.	Yet all these are nothing beside chemical preparations of Aqua Chalidonia, quintessence of hellebore, salts, extracts, distillations, oils, drinkable gold and the like. Dr Anthony, in his book On Drinkable Gold, published in 1600, is wholly in favour of it.[7821]

[7817] Burton. Printed page 387, y: “Centum ova & unum, quolibet mane sumant ova sorbilia, cum sequenti pulvere supra ovum asperso, & contineant quousque assumpserint centum & unum, maniacis & melancholicis utilissimum remedium.” “One hundred and one eggs: every morning let them take soft eggs, with the following powder sprinkled over the egg, and continue until they have taken one hundred and one—a most useful remedy for the manic and melancholic.”

[7818] Editor. The print says that Faventinus “doubles” fifty, then gives 101. The modern text preserves the mismatch instead of changing either number. The marginal Latin prescribes soft eggs each morning but does not repeat the body’s three-at-a-time instruction. “Mad” is retained as Burton’s broad historical category, not a specific diagnosis.

[7819] Editor. This recipe writes out its measures: two drachms each of epithyme and thyme, one ounce of white sugar, three grains of saffron and one drachm of cinnamon. Epithyme and thyme remain distinct ingredients. The prescription sign is rendered as “Take”; the lineated form keeps the recipe separate from surrounding prose.

[7820] Burton. Printed page 387, z: “Quercetan cap. 4 Phar. Oswaldus Crollius.” Quercetan, Pharmacopoeia, chapter 4; Oswald Croll.

[7821] Editor. Aurum potabile means drinkable gold. Burton prints 1600 for Anthony’s book; that date is preserved. Wellcome catalogues Francis Anthony’s Medicinae chymicæ, et veri potabilis auri assertio as Cambridge, 1610. This is evidence of a bibliographic discrepancy, not authority for silently changing Burton. Aqua Chalidonia remains unexpanded pending identification. See the Wellcome record below.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7822]And though all the school of Galenists, with a wicked and unthankfull pride and scorn, detest it in their practice, yet in more grievous diseases, when their vegetals will do no good, they are compelled to seek the help of minerals, though they use them rashly, unprofitably, slackly, and to no purpose.	"Although the whole school of Galenists, in wicked and ungrateful pride and contempt, detests it in practice, yet in more serious diseases, when their vegetable remedies do no good," they are forced to seek help from minerals, "though they use them rashly, unprofitably, negligently and to no purpose."[7823]
Rhenanus, a Dutch Chymist in his book de Sale e puteo emergente, takes upon him to Apologize for Anthony, and sets light by all that speak against him. But what do I meddle with this great Controversie, which is the subject of many volumes? Let Paracelsus, Quercetan, Crollius, and the brethren of the Rosy crosse defend themselves as they may. Crato, Erastus, and the Galenists oppugn.	Rhenanus, a Dutch chemical physician, undertakes to defend Anthony in his book On Salt Rising from a Well, and makes light of everyone who speaks against him. But why do I meddle with this great controversy, the subject of so many volumes? Let Paracelsus, Quercetan, Crollius and the brethren of the Rosy Cross defend themselves as they can. Crato, Erastus and the Galenists attack them.[7824]

[7822] Burton. Printed page 387, a: "Cap. 1. Licet tota Galenistarum schola, mineralia non sine impio & ingrato fastu à sua practica detestentur; tamen in gravioribus morbis omni vegetabilium derelicto subsidio, ad mineralia confugiunt, licet ea temere, ignaviter, & inutiliter usurpent. Ad finem libri." Chapter 1: "Although the whole school of Galenists rejects minerals from its practice with impious and ungrateful arrogance, nevertheless in more serious diseases, abandoning all help from vegetable remedies, they resort to minerals, though they employ them rashly, negligently and uselessly." At the end of the book.

[7823] Editor. "Vegetals" are medicines derived from plants. The attack on the Galenists is the chemical physicians' polemic, which Burton proceeds to balance with opposing abuse. The margin prints both "Cap. 1" and "Ad finem libri"; the apparent inconsistency remains visible until the cited edition can be collated.

[7824] Editor. "Apologize" means defend or offer a justification, not express regret. "The brethren of the Rosy Cross" names the Rosicrucian brotherhood. "Dutch" is retained as Burton's geographical designation for Rhenanus; it has not been silently narrowed to a modern national identity. The passage deliberately withdraws from an extended controversy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Paracelsus, he brags on the other side, he did more famous cures by this means, then all the Galenists in Europe, and calls himself a Monarch; Galen, Hippocrates, infants, illiterate, &c. As Thessalus of old railed against those ancient Asclepiadean writers, [7825]he contemns others, insults, triumphs, overcomes all antiquity (saith Galen as if he spake to him) declares himself a conquerour, and crowns his own doings.	Paracelsus, for his part, boasts that by these means he has performed more celebrated cures than all Europe's Galenists. He calls himself a monarch, and Galen and Hippocrates infants, illiterates and so on. As Thessalus once railed against the ancient Asclepiadean writers, "he despises others, exults, triumphs, overcomes all antiquity," says Galen, as though speaking to Paracelsus, "declares himself a conqueror, and crowns his own achievements."[7826]
[7827]One drop of their Chymical preparatives, shall do more good then all their fulsome potions. Erastus, and the rest of the Galenists vilifie them on the other side, as Hereticks in Physick: [7828]Paracelsus did that in Physick, which Luther in Divinity.	"One drop of their chemical preparations will do more good than all those nauseating potions." Erastus and the other Galenists, on the opposing side, revile them as heretics in medicine: "Paracelsus did in medicine what Luther did in theology."[7829]

[7825] Burton. Printed page 387, dagger: "Veteres maledictis incessit, vincit, & contra omnem antiquitatem coronatur, ipseque à se victor declaratur. Gal. lib. 3. meth. c. 2." "He attacks the ancients with abuse, conquers, and is crowned against all antiquity; he himself declares himself the victor." Galen, Method of Medicine, book 3, chapter 2. The note continues beneath the main text.

[7826] Editor. Galen, Method of Medicine 1.2 in Kühn's Greek text, describes Thessalus attacking his predecessors and crowning himself victor in his own books. Burton prints 3.2; his Latin version or intermediary remains unidentified. This locates the comparison, not a Galenic statement about Paracelsus, to whom Burton applies it. Pliny, Natural History 29.9, supplies further background.

[7827] Burton. Printed page 387, b: "Codronchus de sale absynthii." Codronchus, On Salt of Wormwood. Printed beneath the main text.

[7828] Burton. Printed page 387, c: "Idem Paracelsus in medicina, quod Lutherus in Theologia." "Paracelsus is the same in medicine as Luther in theology." Printed beneath the main text.

[7829] Editor. "Fulsome" means nauseating or offensive here, not lavishly complimentary. The comparison with Luther is a polemical analogy between innovation in medicine and religious reform. Its force comes from the Galenists' accusation of heresy; the sentence records their position rather than supplying a neutral judgment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7830]A drunken rogue he was, a base fellow, a Magitian, he had the divel for his master, divels his familiar companions, and what he did, was done by the help of the Divel.	"He was a drunken rogue, a worthless fellow, a magician; the devil was his master, devils his familiar companions, and whatever he did was done with the devil's help."[7831]
Thus they contend and rail, and every Mart write books pro and con, & adhuc sub judice lis est, let them agree as they will, I proceed.	Thus they dispute and rail, and at every book fair write books for and against; "the case is still before the judge." Let them settle it as they please: I shall proceed.[7832]

[7830] Burton. Printed page 387, d: "Disput. in eundem, parte. 1. Magus ebrius, illiteratus, dæmonem præceptorem habuit, dæmones familiares, &c." Disputation against the same man, part 1: "A drunken, illiterate magician; he had a demon as his teacher, demons as his familiars, and so forth." Printed beneath the main text.

[7831] Editor. These charges are presented as hostile assertions by Paracelsus' opponents. Burton's English "rogue" and "base fellow" do not correspond exactly to the margin's "illiteratus," or illiterate. Both versions are retained. "Familiars" are attendant spirits in the accusation, not merely ordinary acquaintances.

[7832] Editor. "Mart" refers to a book fair or market occasion. "Adhuc sub judice lis est" comes from Horace, Art of Poetry 78, where the unresolved dispute concerns the origin of elegiac verse. Burton reuses the judicial phrase for rival medical schools. The block ends with this sentence; Subsection 4, Averters, follows. See Horace below.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 388 SUBSECT. 4. Averters.	SUBSECTION 4 Remedies that divert the humours
Averters and Purgers must go together, as tending all to the same purpose, to divert this rebellious humor, and turn it another way. In this range, Clysters and Suppositories challenge a chief place, to draw this humour from the brain and heart, to the more ignoble parts.	Remedies that divert the humours and those that purge them must go together, since they all serve the same purpose: to divert this rebellious humour and turn it another way. In this category, enemas and suppositories claim a leading place, to draw this humour away from the brain and heart towards the less noble parts.[7833]
Some would have them still used a few dayes between, and those to be made with the boyled seeds of Anise, Fennel, and bastard Saffron, Hops, Thyme, Epithyme, Mallows, Fumitory, Bugloss, Polypody, Sene, Diasene, Hamech, Cassia, Diacatholicon, Hierologodium, Oyl of Violets, sweet Almonds, &c.	Some would have them used regularly, a few days apart, and prepared with boiled seeds of anise, fennel and safflower, hops, thyme, epithyme, mallows, fumitory, bugloss, polypody, senna, Diasena, Hamech's confection, cassia, Diacatholicon, Hierologodium, oil of violets, sweet almonds and so on.[7834]
For without question, a Clyster opportunely used, cannot choose in this, as most other maladies, but to do very much good; Clysteres nutriunt, sometimes Clysters nourish, as they may be prepared, as I was informed not long since by a learned Lecture of our natural Philosophy [7835]Reader, which he handled by way of discourse, out of some other noted Physicians.	For there is no doubt that an enema used at the right time cannot fail to do much good in this disease, as in most others. "Enemas nourish": sometimes enemas provide nourishment, depending on how they are prepared, as I learned not long ago from a scholarly lecture by our Reader in natural philosophy, who discussed the subject using other noted physicians.[7836]

[7833] Editor. "Averters" redirect humours away from the affected organs; purgatives evacuate them. The contrast between noble and less noble parts belongs to the hierarchical physiology of heart, brain and other organs. "Clysters" are enemas. This heading follows the end of Subsection 3.

[7834] Editor. "Bastard saffron" is safflower. The list combines plants with named preparations already encountered. Diasena, Hamech's confection, Diacatholicon and Hierologodium remain historical preparation names; their individual formulas have not been reconstructed. Epithyme remains distinct from thyme.

[7835] Burton. Printed page 388, dagger: "Master D. Lapworth." The name attached to the Reader in natural philosophy.

[7836] Editor. A "Reader" is a university lecturer. Burton's margin names Master D. Lapworth without expanding the initial. The Latin statement and Burton's explanatory English are both retained, even though the modern rendering consequently repeats the claim that enemas may nourish.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such things as provoke urine most commend, but not sweat. Trincavelius consil. 16 cap. 1. in head melancholy forbids it. P. Byarus and others approve frictions of the outward parts, and to bath them with warm water. Instead of ordinary frictions, Cardan prescribes rubbing with nettles till they blister the skin, which likewise [7837]Basardus Visontinus so much magnifies.	Most recommend things that stimulate urination, but not sweating. Trincavelius, consultation 16, chapter 1, forbids the latter in head melancholy. P. Byarus and others approve rubbing the external parts and bathing them with warm water. Instead of ordinary rubbing, Cardan prescribes rubbing with nettles until they blister the skin, a practice that Basardus Visontinus likewise praises highly.[7838]
Sneezing, masticatories, and nasals are generally received. Montaltus c. 34. Hildesheim spicel. 2. fol. 136. and 138. give several receits of all three. Hercules de Saxoniâ relates of an Emperick in Venice [7839]that had a strong water to purge by the mouth and nostrils, which he still used in head melancholy, and would sell for no gold.	Remedies that provoke sneezing, preparations to chew, and nasal medicines are generally accepted. Montaltus, chapter 34, and Hildesheim, Gleanings 2, folios 136 and 138, give several recipes for all three. Hercules de Saxonia tells of an empiric in Venice who had a powerful medicinal water for purging through the mouth and nostrils, which he regularly used for head melancholy and would not sell for any amount of gold.[7840]

[7837] Burton. Printed page 388, dagger: “Ant. Philos. cap. de melan. frictio vertice, &c.” Ant. Philos., chapter on melancholy: “Rubbing at the crown of the head, and so forth.”

[7838] Editor. “Frictions” means rubbing. The ban on sweating is attributed specifically to Trincavelius in head melancholy. His consultation and chapter numbers, and the printed name Basardus Visontinus, are retained without conjectural correction. The body has P. Byarus, whereas a later margin on this page has P. Bayerus.

[7839] Burton. Printed page 388, g: “Aqua fortissima purgans os, nares, quam non vult auro vendere.” “An extremely powerful water purging the mouth and nostrils, which he is unwilling to sell for gold.”

[7840] Editor. “Masticatories” are medicines chewed to provoke salivation; “nasals” are preparations applied through the nose. An “empiric” practises from experience rather than the learned theoretical system. “Strong water” here is a potent liquid preparation, not necessarily ordinary drinking alcohol. The refusal to sell it emphasizes the claimed value of a secret remedy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To open months and Hemroids is very good Physick, [7841]If they have been formerly stopped. Faventinus would have them opened with horse-leeches, so would Hercul. de Sax. Julius Alexandrinus consil. 185. Scoltzii thinks Aloes fitter: [7842]most approve horse-leaches in this case, to be applied to the fore-head, [7843]nostrils, and other places.	Restoring menstrual and haemorrhoidal bleeding is very good treatment if they have previously been stopped. Faventinus would have the flow restored with horse-leeches, as would Hercules de Saxonia. Julius Alexandrinus, consultation 185 in Scoltzius' collection, considers aloes more suitable. Most approve of horse-leeches in this case, to be applied to the forehead, nostrils and other places.[7844]
Montaltus cap. 29. out of Alexander and others, prescribes [7845]cupping-glasses, and Issues in the left thigh. Areteus lib. 7. cap. 5. [7846]Paulus Regolinus, Sylvius will have them without scarification, applied to the shoulders and back, thighs and feet: [7847]Montaltus cap. 34. bids open an Issue in the arm, or hinder part of the head.	Montaltus, chapter 29, drawing on Alexander and others, prescribes cupping glasses and issues in the left thigh. Aretaeus, book 7, chapter 5, Paulus Regolinus and Sylvius would have the cups applied without scarification to the shoulders and back, thighs and feet. Montaltus, chapter 34, directs that an issue be opened in the arm or back of the head.[7848]

[7841] Burton. Printed page 388, h: "Mercurialis consil. 6. & 30. hemorroidum & mensium provocatio juvat, modo ex eorum suppressione ortum habuerit." Mercurialis, consultations 6 and 30: "Stimulating haemorrhoidal and menstrual bleeding helps, provided the disease arose from their suppression."

[7842] Burton. Printed page 388, i: "Laurentius, Bruel, &c." Laurentius, Bruel and others.

[7843] Burton. Printed page 388, k: "P. Bayerus l. 2. cap. 13. naribus, &c." P. Bayerus, book 2, chapter 13: "To the nostrils, and so forth."

[7844] Editor. "Months" refers to menstrual periods; the opening of haemorrhoids concerns inducing bleeding. The margin restricts the treatment to disease arising from suppressed bleeding. "Horse-leeches" is retained as the historical term, without assigning a modern species. The printed Scoltzii identifies the consultation collection.

[7845] Burton. Printed page 388, l: "Cucurbitulæ siccæ, & fontanellæ crure sinistro." "Dry cupping glasses, and issues in the left leg."

[7846] Burton. Printed page 388, m: "Hildesheim spicel. 2. Vapores à cerebro trahendi sunt frictionibus universi, cucurbitulis siccis, humeris ac dorso affixis, circa pedes & crura." Hildesheim, Gleanings 2: "Vapours must be drawn away from the brain by rubbing the whole body, with dry cupping glasses applied to the shoulders and back, about the feet and legs."

[7847] Burton. Printed page 388, n: "Fontanellam aperi juxta occipitium, aut brachium." "Open an issue near the back of the head, or the arm."

[7848] Editor. An "issue" is a deliberately maintained sore serving as an outlet for discharge. "Scarification" means making incisions in the skin; dry cupping omits them. The body's left thigh and the margin's left leg are retained independently. The source's Aretaeus 7.5 remains uncollated against a specified edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7849]Piso injoyns ligatures, frictions, suppositories, and cupping-glasses still without scarification, and the rest.	Piso prescribes ligatures, rubbing, suppositories and cupping glasses, again without scarification, and the rest.[7850]
Cauteries and hot irons are to be used [7851]in the suture of the Crown, and the seared or ulcerated place suffered to run a good while. 'Tis not amiss to bore the skull with an instrument, to let out the fuliginous vapours.	Cauteries and hot irons are to be used at the suture of the crown, and the burned or ulcerated place allowed to discharge for a considerable time. It is also advisable to bore through the skull with an instrument, to let out the sooty vapours.[7852]
Source page 388–389 Salust. Salvianus de re medic. lib. 2. cap. 1. [7853]Because this humour hardly yeelds to other Physick, would have the leg cauterized, or the left leg below the knee, [7854]and the head boared in two or three places, for that it much availes to the exhalation of the vapours:	Sallustius Salvianus, On Medicine, book 2, chapter 1, because this humour scarcely yields to other treatment, would have the leg cauterized, or the left leg below the knee, and the head bored in two or three places, because this greatly helps the vapours to escape.[7855]

[7849] Burton. Printed page 388, o: "Baleni, ligaturæ, frictiones, &c." "Baths, ligatures, rubbing, and so forth." The printed Baleni is retained; the sense is baths.

[7850] Editor. "Ligatures" are bindings or constricting bands. The marginal list includes baths, while the body includes suppositories and cupping. Both lists are retained, rather than made to correspond. The margin prints Baleni, apparently a transposition in balnei, baths.

[7851] Burton. Printed page 388, p: "cauterium fiat sutura coronali, diu fluere permittantur loca ulcerosa. Trepano etiam cranii densitas imminui poterit, ut vaporibus fuliginosis exitus pateat." "Let a cautery be applied at the coronal suture; let the ulcerated places discharge for a long time. The thickness of the skull may also be reduced with a trepan, so that an outlet may be opened for sooty vapours." Printed beneath the main text.

[7852] Editor. "Fuliginous" means sooty or smoke-like. The alleged escape of vapours explains the historical rationale for cautery and trepanning. The margin explicitly names the coronal suture, a joint between skull bones, and a trepan, an instrument for boring the skull. These are the procedures and claims of Burton's authorities.

[7853] Burton. Printed page 388, q: "Quoniam difficulter cedit aliis medicamentis, ideo fiat in vertice cauterium, aut crure sinistro infra genu." "Since it yields with difficulty to other medicines, let a cautery therefore be applied at the crown of the head, or in the left leg below the knee." Printed beneath the main text.

[7854] Burton. Printed page 389, r: "Fiant duo aut tria cauteria, cum ossis perforatione." "Let two or three cauteries be made, with perforation of the bone."

[7855] Editor. The main text repeats "leg," then specifies the left leg below the knee. The marginal Latin instead gives the crown of the head or the left leg. That discrepancy is preserved. The next margin specifies cauteries with perforation of the bone, whereas the body simply says that the head is bored.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 389 [7856]I saw (saith he) a melancholy man at Rome, that by no remedies could be healed, but when by chance he was wounded in the head, and the skul broken, he was excellently cured. Another to the admiration of the beholders, [7857]breaking his head with a fall from on high, was instantly recovered of his dotage.	"I saw," he says, "a melancholic man at Rome whom no remedies could heal; but when he happened to suffer a head wound and a fractured skull, he was completely cured." Another, to the astonishment of the onlookers, fractured his skull in a fall from a height and immediately recovered from his mental derangement.[7858]
Gordonius cap. 13. part. 2. would have these cauteries tryed last, when no other Physick will serve. [7859]The head to be shaved and bored to let out fumes, which without doubt will do much good. I saw a melancholy man wounded in the head with a sword, his brain pan broken; so long as the wound was open he was well, but when his wound was healed, his dotage returned again.	Gordonius, chapter 13, part 2, would have these cauteries tried last, when no other treatment will work. "The head is to be shaved and bored to let out fumes, which will undoubtedly do much good. I saw a melancholic man wounded in the head with a sword, his skull fractured: as long as the wound remained open, he was well, but when it healed, his mental derangement returned."[7860]

[7856] Burton. Printed page 389, s: "Vidi Romæ melancholicum qui adhibitis multis remediis, sanari non poterat; sed cum cranium gladio fractum esset, optime sanatus est." "I saw a melancholic man at Rome who could not be cured despite the application of many remedies; but when his skull had been fractured by a sword, he was completely cured."

[7857] Burton. Printed page 389, t: "Et alterum vidi melancholicum, qui ex alto cadens non sine astantium admiratione, liberatus est." "And I saw another melancholic man who, falling from a height, was freed of his illness, to the considerable astonishment of those standing by."

[7858] Editor. "Admiration" means astonishment; "dotage" here means disordered mental functioning rather than an affectionate infatuation or necessarily old age. Both stories are reported as testimony from Salvianus. The first margin specifies a sword wound, a detail omitted from the corresponding body sentence.

[7859] Burton. Printed page 389, u: "Radatur caput & fiat cauterium in capite; procul dubio ista faciunt ad fumorum exhalationem; vidi melancholicum à fortuna gladio vulneratum, & cranium fractum; quam diu vulnus apertum, curatus optime; at cum vulnus sanatum, reversa est mania." "Let the head be shaved and a cautery applied to it; undoubtedly these things help fumes escape. I saw a melancholic man accidentally wounded by a sword, his skull fractured: while the wound was open, he was completely cured; but when it healed, the madness returned." The marginal container continues beneath the main text.

[7860] Editor. The requirement to try these procedures last is part of the argument. The Latin margin says to shave the head and apply a cautery; the body says to shave and bore it. It also describes the returning disorder as mania. These variations are preserved without converting them into modern diagnostic claims.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But Alexander Messaria a professor in Padua lib. 1. pract. med. cap. 21. de melanchol. will allow no cauteries at all, 'tis too stiffe an humor and too thick as he holds, to be so evaporated.	But Alexander Messaria, a professor at Padua, Practical Medicine, book 1, chapter 21, on melancholy, will allow no cauteries at all: in his view the humour is too resistant and too thick to be evaporated in this way.[7861]
Guianerius c. 8. Tract. 15. cured a noble man in Savoy, by boaring alone, [7862]leaving the hole open a month together, by means of which after two years melancholy and madness, he was delivered. All approve of this remedy in the suture of the crown; but [y] Arculanus would have the cautery to be made with gold.	Guianerius, chapter 8, treatise 15, cured a nobleman in Savoy by boring alone, leaving the hole open for a whole month; by this means the man was freed from two years of melancholy and madness. All approve of applying this remedy at the suture of the crown, but Arculanus would have the cautery made with gold.[7863]
In many other parts, these cauteries are prescribed for melancholy men, as in the thighs, (Mercurialis consil. 86.) arms, legs Idem consil. 6. & 19. & 25. Montanus 86. Rodericus à Fonseca Tom. 2. consult. 84. pro hypocond. coxâ dextrâ, &c. but most in the head, [z] If other Physick will do no good.	These cauteries are prescribed for melancholic people in many other parts of the body: in the thighs, for example, by Mercurialis, consultation 86; in the arms and legs by the same author, consultations 6, 19 and 25, and Montanus, consultation 86; and "for hypochondriacal melancholy, in the right hip," by Rodericus à Fonseca, volume 2, consultation 84, and so on. But they are prescribed chiefly in the head, if other treatment will do no good.[7864]

[7861] Editor. Messaria's objection remains within the same humoral framework: he disputes whether the supposed material can escape by evaporation. Burton places disagreement immediately beside the success stories, rather than presenting a unanimous medical account.

[7862] Burton. Printed page 389, x: "Usq; ad duram matrem trepanari feci, & per mensæm aperte stetit." "I had the skull trepanned as far as the dura mater, and it remained open for a month." Printed beneath the main text.

[7863] Editor. The margin adds that the boring reached the dura mater, the tough outer membrane around the brain. The body's sweeping "all approve" follows Messaria's explicit disagreement and is retained. A superscript y precedes Arculanus in the print, but no corresponding marginal container appears on the page; the marker remains in the original column without an invented note.

[7864] Editor. The superscript z before the final qualification also lacks a corresponding marginal container. The condition "If other Physick will do no good" is retained in full. The scan reads Mercurialis consultation 86. "Pro hypocond." refers to the hypochondriacal kind of melancholy; coxa dextra is the right hip.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 5. Alteratives and Cordials, corroborating, resolving the reliques, and mending the Temperament.	SUBSECTION 5 Alteratives and cordials that strengthen the body, disperse the remaining matter and improve the temperament
Because this Humor is so maligne of it self, and so hard to be removed, the reliques are to be cleansed, by alteratives, cordials and such means; the temper is to be altered and amended, with such things as fortifie and strengthen the heart and brain, [7865]which are commonly both affected in this malady, and do mutually affect one another: which are still to be given every other day, or some few dayes inserted after a purge, or like Physick, as occasion serves, and are of such force, that many times they help alone, and as [7866]Arnoldus holds in his Aphorismes, are to be preferred before all other medicines, in what kind soever.	Because this humour is so malignant in itself, and so difficult to remove, the remaining matter must be cleared away by alteratives, cordials and similar means. The temperament must be changed and improved with things that fortify and strengthen the heart and brain, which are usually both affected in this disease and mutually affect one another. These remedies are to be given regularly every other day, or with a few days' interval after a purge or similar treatment, as circumstances require. They are so powerful that they often help on their own and, as Arnoldus maintains in his Aphorisms, should be preferred to every other kind of medicine.[7867]

[7865] Burton. Printed page 389, a: "Cordis ratio semper habenda quod cerebro compatitur, & sese invicem afficiunt." "The heart must always be considered, because it suffers with the brain, and they affect one another."

[7866] Burton. Printed page 389, b: "Aphor. 38. Medicina Theriacalis præ cæteris eligenda." Aphorism 38: "Theriacal medicine should be chosen before the others."

[7867] Editor. "Alteratives" were intended to change the body's qualities; "cordials" to support the heart and spirits; "reliques" are the matter believed to remain after evacuation. "Temperament" denotes a bodily balance of qualities. The margin specifically recommends theriacal medicine, a narrower term than Burton's general praise of these remedies; both formulations are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 389–390 Amongst this number of Cordials and Alteratives, I do not find a more present remedy, then a cup of wine or strong drink, if it be soberly and opportunely used. It makes a man bold, hardy, couragious, [7868]whetteth the wit, if moderately taken, [7869]and as Plutarch saith, Symp. 7. quæst. 12. it makes those which are otherwise dull, to exhale & evaporate like frankincense, or quicken (Xenophon adds) [7870]as oyl doth fire.	Among these cordials and alteratives, I find no more immediate remedy than a cup of wine or strong drink, if used soberly and at the right time. It makes a person bold, hardy and courageous, and sharpens the intelligence if taken moderately. As Plutarch says, Table Talk 7, question 12, it makes people who are otherwise dull open up and give off their spirit like frankincense; or it kindles them, Xenophon adds, as oil kindles fire.[7871]
Source page 390 [7872]A famous Cordial Matthiolus in Dioscoridem calls it, an excellent nutriment to refresh the body, it makes a good colour, a flourishing age, helps concoction, fortifies the stomack, takes away obstructions, provokes urine, drives out excrements, procures sleep, cleers the blood, expels wind and cold poysons, attenuates, concocts, dissipates all thick vapours, and fuliginous humours. And that which is all in all to my purpose, it takes away feare and sorrow.	Mattioli, in his commentary on Dioscorides, calls it a celebrated cordial, an excellent nourishment to refresh the body. It gives a healthy complexion and a flourishing life, aids digestion, strengthens the stomach, removes obstructions, stimulates urination, expels waste, brings sleep, clears the blood, drives out wind and cold poisons, and thins, digests and disperses all thick vapours and sooty humours. And what matters above all for my purpose is that it takes away fear and sorrow.[7873]

[7868] Burton. Printed page 389, c: “Galen, de temp. lib. 3. c. 3. moderate vinum sumptum, acuit ingenium.” Galen, On Temperaments, book 3, chapter 3: “Wine taken moderately sharpens the intelligence.”

[7869] Burton. Printed page 389, d: “Tardos aliter & tristes thuris in modum exhalare facit.” “It makes those who are otherwise dull and sad give off their spirit like frankincense.”

[7870] Burton. Printed page 390, dagger: “Hilaritatem ut oleum flammam excitat.” “It kindles cheerfulness as oil kindles a flame.”

[7871] Editor. “Present” means immediately effective. Plutarch’s frankincense comparison occurs in the discussion of deliberating over wine, headed book 7, question 10 in the linked English text; Burton prints question 12. The numbering and Burton’s edition remain unresolved. Xenophon, Symposium 2.24, likens wine’s kindling of friendly feelings to oil feeding flame; 2.25–26 qualifies the drinking. Galen’s passage remains unlocated.

[7872] Burton. Printed page 390, e: “Viribus retinendis cardiacum eximium, nutriendo corpori alimentum optimum, ætatem floridam facit, calorem innatum fovet, concoctionem juvat, stomachum roborat, excrementis viam parat, urinam movet, somnum conciliat, venena, frigidos flatus dissipat, crassos humores attenuat, coquit, discutit, &c.” “An excellent cordial for maintaining strength, the best sustenance for nourishing the body; it makes life flourish, fosters innate heat, aids digestion, strengthens the stomach, opens a passage for waste, stimulates urination, brings sleep, disperses poisons and cold winds, thins, digests and disperses thick humours, and so forth.”

[7873] Editor. Burton’s English and the marginal Latin vary. The margin adds innate heat, and groups poisons with cold winds; the body has wind and cold poisons. Neither has been harmonized with the other. “Concoction” means digestion and, in the description of humours, their supposed processing or maturation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7874]Curas edaces dissipat Evius.	Bacchus scatters gnawing cares.[7875]
It glads the heart of man, Psal. 104. 15. hilaritatis dulce seminarium. Helenas boule, the sole nectar of the Gods, or that true Nepenthes in [7876]Homer, which puts away care and grief, as Oribasius 5. Collect. cap. 7. and some others will, was naught else but a cup of good wine.	"It gladdens the human heart," Psalm 104:15: "a sweet seedbed of cheerfulness." Helen's bowl, the sole nectar of the gods, or that true nepenthe in Homer that banishes care and grief, was, according to Oribasius, Collections 5, chapter 7, and some others, nothing but a cup of good wine.[7877]
It makes the mind of the King and of the fatherless both one, of the bond and freeman, poor and rich, it turneth all his thoughts to joy and mirth, makes him remember no sorrow or debt, but enricheth his heart, and makes him speak by talents, Esdras 3. 19, 20, 21. It gives life it self, spirits, wit, &c.	"It makes the mind of the king and of the orphan alike, of the slave and the free, the poor and the rich. It turns all his thoughts to joy and merriment, makes him forget sorrow and debt, enriches his heart and makes him talk in talents," Esdras 3:19–21. It gives life itself, spirits, intelligence and so on.[7878]

[7874] Burton. Printed page 390, dagger: "Hor. lib. 2. Od. 11." Horace, Odes, book 2, ode 11.

[7875] Editor. Horace, Odes 2.11.17–18. Burton rearranges the words of the Latin passage; Evius is a name of Bacchus. The fresh translation follows his displayed line. See Horace, Odes 2, below.

[7876] Burton. Printed page 390, asterisk: "Odyss. A." Odyssey A, as printed. See the editorial note on Helen's bowl.

[7877] Editor. "Nepenthe" denotes something that banishes grief; "seminarium" is literally a seedbed or nursery. In Odyssey 4, Helen mixes a grief-dispelling drug into the wine. The identification with wine alone is Burton's report of an interpretation, not Homer's plain statement. The margin visibly prints Odyss. A., although the episode is in book 4. See Homer below.

[7878] Editor. The reference is to 1 Esdras, in the Apocrypha, during the argument that wine is the strongest thing. A talent is a large unit of money or weight: the drinker talks as if wealthy. "Spirits" retains Burton's physiological vocabulary, as well as the passage's sense of animation. The three printed verse numbers remain unchanged.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For which cause the Ancients called Bacchus, Liber pater à liberando, and [7879]sacrificed to Bacchus and Pallas still upon an altar. [7880]Wine measurably drunk, and in time, brings gladness and chearfulness of mind, it cheareth God and men, Judges 9. 12. lætitiæ Bacchus dator, it makes an old wife dance, and such as are in misery, to forget evil, and be [7881]merry.	For this reason the ancients called Bacchus "Father Liber," from his setting people free, and regularly sacrificed to Bacchus and Pallas on one altar. "Wine drunk in moderation and at the right time brings gladness and cheerfulness of mind"; it cheers God and humanity, Judges 9:12. "Bacchus, giver of joy": it makes an old woman dance, and those in misery forget their troubles and be merry.[7882]
Bacchus & afflictis requiem mortalibus affert, Crura licet duro compede vincta forent.	Bacchus also brings rest to suffering mortals, Though their legs should be bound in a hard fetter.[7883]
Wine makes a troubled soul to rest, Though feet with fetters be opprest.	Wine gives a troubled soul its rest, Though fetters weigh upon the feet.[7884]

[7879] Burton. Printed page 390, f: "Pausanias." No more precise location is supplied in this margin.

[7880] Burton. Printed page 390, g: "Syracides 31. 28." Sirach 31:28.

[7881] Burton. Printed page 390, h: "Legitur. & prisci Catonis Sæpe mero caluisse virtus." "We read that even old Cato's virtue often grew warm with unmixed wine."

[7882] Editor. Burton plays on Liber and liberare, "to free." Pallas is Athena. His Pausanias reference gives no location and remains unresolved. In the fable of the trees, the vine's answer about cheering God and humanity occurs at Judges 9:13; 9:12 addresses the vine. The margin about Cato adapts Horace, Odes 3.21.11–12. Burton's printed 9:12 is retained. See Judges and Horace 3 below.

[7883] Editor. Compare Tibullus 1.7.41–42. Burton's second line has legs bound in a hard fetter; the comparison text has legs sounding as they strike against a hard fetter. His wording is translated as printed, rather than replaced by the independently consulted Latin. See Tibullus below.

[7884] Editor. This is Burton's separate English couplet, following the Latin. Both versions are preserved and modernized independently; the repeated thought is part of his presentation. The right column does not force the verse into rhyme at the expense of its meaning.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Demetrius in Plutarch, when he fell into Seleucus hands, and was prisoner in Syria, [7885]spent his time with dice and drink that he might so ease his discontented mind, and avoid those continual cogitations of his present condition wherewith he was tormented.	Demetrius, in Plutarch, when he fell into Seleucus' hands and was held prisoner in Syria, spent his time at dice and drinking, to relieve his unhappy mind and escape the incessant thoughts of his present condition that tormented him.[7886]
Therefore Solomon, Prov. 31. 6. bids wine be given to him that is ready to perish, and to him that hath grief of heart, let him drink that he forget his poverty, and remember his misery no more. Sollicitis animis onus eximit, it easeth a burdened soule, nothing speedier, nothing better: which the Prophet Zachary perceived, when he said, that in the time of Messias, they of Ephraim should be glad, and their heart should rejoyce as through wine.	Therefore Solomon, Proverbs 31:6, directs that wine be given to someone near death and to someone whose heart is grieving: let him drink, forget his poverty and remember his misery no more. "It lifts the burden from anxious minds": it relieves a burdened soul; nothing works faster, nothing better. The prophet Zechariah recognized this when he said that, in the Messiah's time, the people of Ephraim would be glad and their hearts rejoice as through wine.[7887]

[7885] Burton. Printed page 390, dagger: "In pocula & aleam se præcipitavit, & iis fere tempus traduxit, ut ægram crapula mentem levaret, & conditionis præsentis cogitationes quibus agitabatur sobrius vitaret." "He plunged into drinking and dice, and spent nearly all his time at them, to relieve his sick mind with intoxication and avoid the thoughts of his present condition that tormented him when sober."

[7886] Editor. Plutarch, Life of Demetrius 52, describes Demetrius' turn to drinking and dice during captivity. The marginal Latin stresses the contrast between drunken oblivion and sober reflection more explicitly than the main text. Burton uses the episode as an example of escaping painful thoughts. See Plutarch below.

[7887] Editor. The Proverbs passage extends across 31:6–7. Burton's account of Zechariah corresponds to 10:7; the messianic framing is his interpretation. The Latin phrase about anxious minds and his following English gloss are both retained. "Nothing speedier, nothing better" is part of this accumulating praise, which the subsequent argument qualifies.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All which makes me very well approve of that pretty description of a feast in [7888]Bartholomeus Anglicus, when grace was said, their hands washed, and the Guests sufficiently exhilarated, with good discourse, sweet musick, dainty fare, exhilarationis gratia, pocula iterum atque iterum offeruntur, as a Corollary to conclude the feast, and continue their mirth, a grace cup came in to cheer their hearts, and they drank healths to one another again and again.[7889]	All this makes me warmly approve of that charming description of a feast in Bartholomew the Englishman. When grace had been said, their hands washed, and the guests sufficiently enlivened by good conversation, sweet music and delicious food, "cups are offered again and again to promote cheerfulness." As a final addition to close the feast and prolong their merriment, a grace cup was brought in to cheer their hearts, and they repeatedly drank one another's health.[7890]
Which as I. Fredericus Matenesius Crit. Christ. lib. 2. cap. 5, 6, & 7. was an old custome in all ages in every Commonwealth, so as they be not enforced, bibere per violentiam, but as in that royal feast of [7891]Assuerus which lasted 180 dayes, without compulsion they drank by order in golden vessels, when and what they would themselves.	This, as I. Fredericus Matenesius reports in Christian Criticism, book 2, chapters 5, 6 and 7, was an ancient custom in every age and every commonwealth—provided people were not forced "to drink under compulsion," but drank as at Ahasuerus' royal feast, which lasted 180 days. There, by command, they drank without compulsion from golden vessels, when and what they themselves wished.[7892]

[7888] Burton. Printed page 390, dagger: "Lib. 6. cap. 23. & 24. de rerum proprietat." On the Properties of Things, book 6, chapters 23 and 24.

[7889] Burton. Printed page 390, dagger: "So did the Athenians of old, as Suidas relates, and so do the Germans at this day." This English marginal comment is retained alongside the feast and health-drinking passage; its precise body attachment is not separately marked.

[7890] Editor. A "grace cup" is a cup passed at the close of a meal after grace; drinking healths means offering toasts. Burton's margin identifies On the Properties of Things. A further English marginal comment about Athenians and Germans has no distinct surviving attachment in the body and is placed at the health-drinking sentence, with that uncertainty recorded. The Latin and Burton's following expansion are both retained.

[7891] Burton. Printed page 390, dagger: "Hester. 18." Esther, with the number 18 as printed; compare 1:8.

[7892] Editor. "Bibere per violentiam" means forced drinking. Esther 1:4 describes 180 days of displaying royal wealth; the following feast lasts seven days (1:5), with gold vessels and no compulsion (1:7–8). Burton combines these details. His 180 days and the margin's Hester. 18. are retained. See Esther below.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 390–391 This of drink is a most easie and parable remedy, a common, a cheap, still ready against fear, sorrow, and such troublesome thoughts, that molest the mind; as brimstone with fire, the spirits on a suddain are enlightned by it. No better Physick (saith [7893]Rhasis) for a melancholy man: and he that can keep company, and carouse, needs no other medicines, 'tis enough.	Drink is a very easy remedy to obtain: common, cheap and always at hand against fear, sorrow and the troublesome thoughts that torment the mind. Like sulphur touched by fire, the spirits are suddenly lit up by it. "There is no better medicine," says Rhazes, "for a melancholic person; someone who can keep company and carouse needs no other medicines: this is enough."[7894]
Source page 391 His country man Avicenna 31. doct. 2. cap. 8. proceeds farther yet, and will have him that is troubled in minde, or melancholy, not to drink only, but now and then to be drunk: excellent good Physick it is for this and many other diseases. Magninus Reg. san. part. 3. c. 31. will have them to be so once a month at least, & gives his reasons for it, [7895]because it scoures the body by vomit, urine, sweat, of all manner of superfluities, and keeps it clean.	His countryman Avicenna, 31, doctrine 2, chapter 8, goes further still: he would have someone troubled in mind or melancholic not only drink but occasionally get drunk, considering it excellent medicine for this and many other diseases. Magninus, Regimen of Health, part 3, chapter 31, would have them do so at least once a month. He gives as his reason that vomiting, urination and sweating scour the body of every kind of excess and keep it clean.[7896]

[7893] Burton. Printed page 391, k: "Tract. 1. cont. l. 1. Non est res laudabilior eo, vel cura melior; qui melancholicus, utatur societate hominum & biberia; & qui potest sustinere usum vini, non indiget alia medicina, quod eo sunt omnia ad usum necessaria hujus passionis." Treatise 1, Continens, book 1: "Nothing is more praiseworthy than this, nor is any cure better. Let the melancholic person resort to human company and drinking; whoever can tolerate wine needs no other medicine, because it contains everything necessary for treating this disorder."

[7894] Editor. "Parable" means easily obtainable. "Enlightned" evokes ignition and animation as well as brightness; sulphur flaring when touched by fire supplies the comparison. The emphatic recommendation is attributed to Rhazes and then developed by other writers, before Burton turns against the defence of intoxication. His margin's treatment claim is retained as a quotation from that tradition.

[7895] Burton. Printed page 391, l: "Tum quod sequatur inde sudor, vomitio, urina, à quibus superfluitates à corpore removentur & remanet corpus mundum." "Also because sweating, vomiting and urination follow from it, by which excess matter is removed from the body, leaving the body clean."

[7896] Editor. The compressed Avicenna reference is printed 31. doct. 2. cap. 8.; it has not been silently expanded to a conjectural subdivision. "Countryman" is Burton's grouping of the authorities. The rationale for drunkenness is evacuation of bodily excess, explicitly attributed to the writers under discussion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of the same mind is Seneca the Philosopher in his book de tranquil. lib. 1. c. 15. nonnunquam ut in aliis morbis ad ebrietatem usq; veniendum, Curas deprimit, tristitia medetur, It is good sometimes to be drunk, it helps sorrow, depresseth cares, and so concludes his Tract with a cup of wine: Habes, Serene charissime, quæ ad tranquillitatem animæ pertinent.	The philosopher Seneca takes the same view in his book On Tranquillity, book 1, chapter 15: "Sometimes, as in other illnesses, one must go as far as drunkenness: it presses down cares and cures sadness." It is good sometimes to get drunk; it relieves sorrow and suppresses cares. And so he ends his treatise with a cup of wine: "You have, dearest Serenus, the things that concern tranquillity of soul."[7897]
But these are Epicureall tenents, tending to looseness of life, Luxury and Atheism, maintained alone by some Heathens, dissolute Arabians, prophane Christians, and are exploded by Rabbi Moses Tract. 4. Guliel. Placentinus lib. 1. cap. 8. Valescus de Taranta, and most accurately ventilated by Io. Sylvaticus, a late writer and Physician of Millan, med. cont. cap. 14. where you shall finde this tenent copiously confuted.	But these are Epicurean doctrines, tending towards loose living, sensual indulgence and atheism, upheld only by certain pagans, dissolute Arabs and irreligious Christians. They are rejected by Rabbi Moses, treatise 4, Gulielmus Placentinus, book 1, chapter 8, and Valescus de Taranta, and examined with the greatest care by Joannes Sylvaticus, a recent writer and physician of Milan, Medical Controversies, chapter 14, where you will find this doctrine extensively refuted.[7898]
Howsoever you say, if this be true, that wine and strong drink have such vertue to expell fear and sorrow, and to exhilarate the minde, ever hereafter lets drink and be merry.	However, you say, if it is true that wine and strong drink have such power to drive out fear and sorrow and enliven the mind, then from now on let us drink and be merry.[7899]

[7897] Editor. Seneca, On Tranquillity of Mind 17.8–9, says wine washes away cares and treats sadness like some diseases; Burton compresses and adapts this wording. His closing address to Serenus also adapts 17.12. He prints book 1, chapter 15. Seneca limits the practice's frequency; Burton's picture of the treatise ending over a cup is his own. Both his Latin and English gloss are rendered.

[7898] Editor. "Epicureall" is a hostile moral label here; it does not establish an accurate account of Epicurus' philosophy. "Luxury" means sensual excess; "exploded" means repudiated; "ventilated" means thoroughly examined. The religious and ethnic judgments belong to Burton's polemic and are retained as such. His medical counter-authorities remain for bibliographic collation.

[7899] Editor. "You say" introduces an imagined reader's response, temporarily turning the preceding praise into an invitation to perpetual merriment. This change of voice matters: Burton will answer it with restrictions and his own declaration that he abstains from wine.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7900]Prome reconditum Lyde strenua cæcubum, Capaciores puer huc affer Scyphos, Et Chia vina aut Lesbia.	Brisk Lyde, bring out the stored Caecuban wine; Boy, bring larger cups here, And wine from Chios or Lesbos.[7901]
Come lusty Lyda, fill's a cup of sack, And sirrah Drawer, bigger pots we lack, And Scio wines that have so good a smack.	Come, lively Lyda, fill us a cup of sack, And you, wine-server, we need larger pots, And wines from Chios with their excellent flavour.[7902]
I say with him in [7903]A. Gellius, let us maintain the vigor of our souls with a moderate cup of wine, [7904]Natis in usum lætitiæ scyphis, and drink to refresh our minde; if there be any cold sorrow in it, or torpid bashfulness, lets wash it all away. ———Nunc vino pellite curas: so saith [7905]Horace, so saith Anacreon,	I say with the writer in Aulus Gellius: let us sustain the vigour of our souls with a moderate cup of wine, "with cups made for joy," and drink to refresh our minds. If there is any cold sorrow in the mind, or paralysing shyness, let us wash it all away. "Now drive away your cares with wine": so says Horace; so says Anacreon,[7906]

[7900] Burton. Printed page 391, m: "Hor." Horace.

[7901] Editor. The first line combines words from Horace, Odes 3.28.2–3; the next two adapt Epodes 9.33–34. Caecuban is an Italian wine, while Chios and Lesbos name Greek island wines. Burton's arrangement and word order are preserved. See Horace 3 and the Epodes below.

[7902] Editor. "Fill's" means fill us; a "drawer" draws and serves wine; "sack" names a historical class of wines. Scio is Chios. Burton's English version introduces sack and omits the Latin alternative of Lesbian wine. The two verse units remain separate, with neither adjusted to match the other.

[7903] Burton. Printed page 391, n: "Lib. 15 2. noct. Att. Vigorem animi moderato vini usu tueamur, & calefacto simul, refotoque animo si quid in eo vel frigidæ tristitiæ, vel torpentis verecundiæ fuerit, diluamus." Attic Nights, book 15, chapter 2: "Let us preserve the vigour of the mind by moderate use of wine; and, with the mind warmed and refreshed, let us wash away whatever cold sadness or numbing shyness may be in it."

[7904] Burton. Printed page 391, dagger: "Hor. l. 1. Od. 27." Horace, Odes, book 1, ode 27.

[7905] Burton. Printed page 391, dagger: "Od. 7. lib. 1." Odes, book 1, ode 7.

[7906] Editor. Gellius, Attic Nights 15.2.8, says moderate drinking should preserve temperance and self-control; Burton's Latin instead makes vigour of mind the object of preservation. The rest closely adapts the passage, in a discussion of Plato and controlled drinking. Horace's fragments are Odes 1.27.1 and 1.7.30, the latter spoken by Teucer before the voyage. Each Latin fragment is translated in the modern prose.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[7907]Μεθύοντα γὰρ με κεῖσθαι Πολὺ κρεῖσσον ἢ θανόντα.	For it is much better that I should lie here drunk Than dead.[7908]
Let's drive down care with a cup of wine: and so say I too, (though I drink none my self) for all this may be done, so that it be modestly, soberly, opportunely used: So that, they be not drunk with wine, wherein is excess, which our [7909]Apostle forewarns;	Let us drown care with a cup of wine. And so say I too, though I drink none myself, for all this may be done provided wine is used moderately, soberly and at the right time; provided people are not "drunk with wine, in which there is excess," as our Apostle warns.[7910]
for as Chrysostome well comments on that place, ad lætitiam datum est vinum, non ad ebrietatem, 'tis for mirth wine, but not for madness: And will you know where, when, and how that is to be understood? Vis discere ubi bonum sit vinum? Audi quid dicat Scriptura, hear the Scriptures, Give wine to them that are in sorrow, or as Paul bid Timothy drink wine for his stomack sake, for concoction, health, or some such honest occasion.	For, as Chrysostom aptly comments on that passage, "wine was given for cheerfulness, not for drunkenness": wine is for merriment, not madness. Would you know where, when and how to understand this? "Do you wish to learn where wine is good? Hear what Scripture says." Listen to the Scriptures: give wine to those in sorrow; or, as Paul told Timothy, drink wine for your stomach's sake—for digestion, health or some similarly proper reason.[7911]

[7907] Burton. Printed page 391, asterisk: "26. Nam præstat ebrium me quam mortuum jacere." "26. For it is better that I lie drunk than dead."

[7908] Editor. Burton attributes these lines to Anacreon and the margin numbers them 26. They occur as Anacreontea 48.9–10 in the compared Greek collection. Their meaning is that lying drunk is better than lying dead, as Burton's Latin margin also says. The next English sentence about driving away care is retained separately. The original's Greek ligature for gar is expanded mechanically. See the Anacreontea Greek text below.

[7909] Burton. Printed page 391, dagger: "Ephes. 5. 18. ser. 19. in cap. 5." Ephesians 5:18; sermon 19 on chapter 5. The latter reference points to Chrysostom's commentary discussed in the following sentence.

[7910] Editor. Burton's assertion that he drinks no wine belongs in the modern text as part of his personal voice. His three qualifications precede the warning from Ephesians 5:18. The paragraph permits bounded use while rejecting intoxication; it does not endorse the imagined reader's unrestricted conclusion.

[7911] Editor. Chrysostom, Homily 19 on Ephesians, connects Ephesians 5:18 with Proverbs 31:6 and Paul's counsel to Timothy, 1 Timothy 5:23. The Latin uses "drunkenness," while Burton's English develops the opposition as mirth and madness. Both are kept. "Honest occasion" means a proper or legitimate reason. See Chrysostom below.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Otherwise as Pliny telleth us: If singular moderation be not had, [7912]nothing so pernicious, 'tis meer vinegar, blandus dæmon, poyson it self.	Otherwise, as Pliny tells us, without exceptional moderation nothing is so harmful: it is mere vinegar, "a coaxing demon," poison itself.[7913]
But hear a more fearfull doom, Habac. 2. 15. & 16. Wo be to him that makes his neighbour drunk, shamefull spewing shall be upon his glory.	But hear a more terrible judgment, Habakkuk 2:15–16: "Woe to the man who makes his neighbour drunk; shameful vomiting shall cover his glory."[7914]
Source page 391–392 Let not good fellows triumph therefore (saith Matthiolus) that I have so much commended wine; if it be immoderatly taken, in stead of making glad, it confounds both body and soul, it makes a giddy head, a sorrowfull heart.	"Let drinking companions not rejoice," therefore says Mattioli, "because I have praised wine so highly. If taken immoderately, instead of bringing gladness it ruins both body and soul, producing a dizzy head and a sorrowful heart."[7915]

[7912] Burton. Printed page 391, o: "Lib. 14. 5. Nihil pernitiosus viribus si modus absit, venenum." Book 14, chapter 5: "Nothing is more harmful to the strength if moderation is absent: it is poison." The source spelling pernitiosus is retained.

[7913] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 14.58, contrasts usefulness to bodily strength with the danger of unmoderated enjoyment. Burton's marginal summary combines these into harm to strength; it is an adaptation, not an exact quotation. His book 14, chapter 5 and spelling pernitiosus remain. The coaxing demon image belongs to Burton's surrounding warning.

[7914] Editor. Burton draws together Habakkuk 2:15–16. The humiliating reversal of glory into vomiting gives the warning both a moral and bodily force. "Doom" means judgment, and the second clause refers back to the person who makes a neighbour drunk.

[7915] Editor. "Good fellows" here means drinking companions. The first-person defence belongs to Mattioli, whose praise Burton has quoted, not to a new assertion about Burton's own drinking. The warning crosses the source page break and is kept complete in one aligned unit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 392 And 'twas well said of the Poet of old, [7916]Vine causeth mirth and grief, [7917]nothing so good for some, so bad for others, especially as [7918]one observes, qui à causâ calida male habent, that are hot or inflamed. And so of spices, they alone, as I have shewed, cause head-melancholy themselves, they must not use wine as an [7919]ordinary drink, or in their diet.	And the ancient poet put it well: "The vine causes mirth and grief." Nothing is so good for some people and so bad for others, especially, as one author observes, those "who suffer from a hot cause"—those who are hot or inflamed. The same applies to spices: as I have shown, they can by themselves cause head melancholy. Such people must not use wine as an everyday drink or as part of their diet.[7920]
But to determine with Laurentius c. 8. de melan. wine is bad for mad men, and such as are troubled with heat in their inner parts or brains; but to melancholy, which is cold (as most is) Wine soberly used, may be very good.	But to conclude with Laurentius, chapter 8, On Melancholy: wine is bad for mad people and for those troubled by heat in their internal organs or brains; but for melancholy that is cold, as most melancholy is, wine used soberly may be very good.[7921]

[7916] Burton. Printed page 391, p: "Theocritus edyl. 13. vino dari lætitiam & dolorem." Theocritus, idyll 13: "Joy and grief are given by wine." The marginal reference is printed on page 391, while the related words appear at the top of page 392.

[7917] Burton. Printed page 392, q: "Renodeus." Renodeus.

[7918] Burton. Printed page 392, r: "Mercurialis consil. 25. Vinum frigidis optimum, & pessimum ferinâ melancholiâ." Mercurialis, consultation 25: "Wine is best for those of cold constitution, and worst in fierce melancholy."

[7919] Burton. Printed page 392, s: "Fernelius consil. 44. & 45. vinum prohibet assiduum, & aromata." Fernel, consultations 44 and 45: "He forbids habitual wine-drinking and spices."

[7920] Editor. The Theocritus margin is printed on the preceding page; its idyll number 13 has not been independently reconciled with the saying. The body's Vine is retained as "the vine." The margin narrows the contraindication to fierce melancholy, while the body emphasizes heat. The references to spices and ordinary diet continue that constitutional distinction.

[7921] Editor. Burton ends the wine discussion by distinguishing cold melancholy from conditions thought hot or inflamed. "Mad" and "melancholy" retain his broad historical categories. This is the natural boundary chosen for the block; Subsection 5 continues next with China roots, sassafras, sarsaparilla and guaiacum.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I may say the same of the decoction of China roots, Sassafras, Sarsaparilla, Guajacum: China, saith Manardus, makes a good colour in the face, takes away melancholy, and all infirmities proceeding from cold, even so Sarsaparilla provokes sweat mightily, Guajacum dries, Claudinus consult. 89. & 46. Montanus, Capivaccius consult. 188. Scoltzii. make frequent and good use of Guajacum, and China, [7922]so that the liver be not incensed, good for such as are cold, as most melancholy men are, but by no means to be mentioned in hot.	I may say the same of a decoction of China roots, sassafras, sarsaparilla and guaiacum. China root, says Manardus, gives the face a healthy colour, takes away melancholy and all disorders arising from cold; similarly, sarsaparilla powerfully stimulates sweating, and guaiacum dries. Claudinus, consultations 89 and 46, Montanus, and Capivaccius, consultation 188 in Scoltzius' collection, make frequent and effective use of guaiacum and China root, provided the liver is not inflamed. They are good for people of a cold constitution, as most melancholic people are, but are by no means to be considered for those of a hot constitution.[7923]
The Turks have a drink called Coffa (for they use no wine) so named of a berry as black as soot, and as bitter, (like that black drink which was in use amongst the Lacedemonians and perhaps the same) which they sip still of, and sup as warm as they can suffer; they spend much time in those Coffa-houses, which are somewhat like our Ale-houses or Taverns, and there they sit chatting and drinking to drive away the time, and to be merry together, because they finde by experience that kinde of drink so used helpeth digestion, and procureth alacrity. Some of them take Opium to this purpose.	The Turks have a drink called coffee—for they drink no wine—named after a berry as black as soot and just as bitter, like the black drink once used among the Spartans, and perhaps the same. They keep sipping it, and drink it as hot as they can bear. They spend much time in these coffee houses, which are somewhat like our alehouses or taverns, sitting there chatting and drinking to pass the time and enjoy themselves together, because experience shows them that this kind of drink, used in this way, helps digestion and brings cheerfulness. Some of them take opium for this purpose.[7924]

[7922] Burton. Printed page 392, t: "Modo jecur non incendatur." "Provided the liver is not inflamed."

[7923] Editor. China root is a medicinal root imported under that name; guaiacum is medicinal wood. A decoction is made by boiling. Cold, heat and dryness here describe humoral qualities, while incensed means heated or inflamed. The references to Claudinus, Montanus and Capivaccius are kept in their printed order; their precise allocation awaits bibliographical collation.

[7924] Editor. Coffa is coffee. Burton presents Ottoman practice in broad terms. His proposed connection with Sparta's black drink is conjecture: Plutarch, Lycurgus 12.6–7, describes black broth served as food at the communal mess. The suggestion that it was coffee is preserved as Burton's suggestion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Borrage, Bawm, Saffron, Gold, I have spoken of; Montaltus c. 23, commends Scorzonera roots condite. Garcius ab Horto plant. hist. lib. 2. cap. 25. makes mention of an hearb called Datura, [7925]which if it be eaten, for 24. hours following, takes away all sense of grief, makes them incline to laughter and mirth: and another called Bange, like in effect to Opium, Which puts them for a time into a kinde of Extasis, and makes them gently to laugh. One of the Roman Emperours had a seed, which he did ordinarily eat to exhilarate himself.	I have spoken of borage, balm, saffron and gold. Montaltus, chapter 23, recommends preserved scorzonera roots. Garcius ab Horto, History of Plants, book 2, chapter 25, mentions a herb called datura which, if eaten, takes away all sense of pain for the next twenty-four hours and inclines people to laughter and merriment; and another called bhang, similar in effect to opium, which puts them for a time into a kind of trance and makes them laugh gently. One of the Roman emperors had a seed that he regularly ate to cheer himself up.[7926]
[7927]Christophorus Ayrerus prefers Bezoars stone, and the confection of Alkermes, before other cordials, and Amber in some cases. [7928]Alkermes comforts the inner parts: and Bezoar stone hath an especiall vertue against all melancholy affections, [7929]it refresheth the heart, and corroborates the whole body. [7930]Amber provokes urine, helps the body, breaks winde, &c.	Christophorus Ayrerus prefers bezoar stone and the confection of alkermes to other cordials, and amber in some cases. Alkermes strengthens the internal organs, and bezoar stone has a special power against all melancholic disorders: it refreshes the heart and strengthens the whole body. Amber stimulates urination, helps the body, dispels wind and so on.[7931]

[7925] Burton. Printed page 392, u: “Per. 24. horas sensum doloris omnem tollit, & ridere facit.” “For twenty-four hours it removes all sensation of pain and makes one laugh.”

[7926] Editor. Balm is lemon balm; condite means preserved, usually with sugar. Bange is bhang, a cannabis preparation; extasis means an altered state. Orta’s Colloquies 8 and 20, in Markham’s 1913 translation, distinguish bhang from opium and describe datura-induced laughter with impaired judgment, exploited by thieves. Burton’s Latin intermediary remains uncollated. Grief is rendered as pain from dolor. The unnamed emperor and seed remain unidentified.

[7927] Burton. Printed page 392, y: “Hildesheim spicel. 2.” Hildesheim, Gleanings 2.

[7928] Burton. Printed page 392, z: “Alkermes, omnia vitalia viscera mire confortat.” “Alkermes wonderfully strengthens all the vital organs.”

[7929] Burton. Printed page 392, a: “Contra omnes melancholicos affectus confert, ac certum est ipsius usu omnes cordis & corporis vires mirum in modum refici.” “It helps against all melancholic disorders, and it is certain that its use wonderfully restores all the powers of the heart and body.”

[7930] Burton. Printed page 392, b: “Succinum vero albissimum confortat ventriculum, flatum discutit, urinam movet, &c.” “The whitest amber strengthens the stomach, dispels wind, stimulates urination, and so on.”

[7931] Editor. Cordials were medicines believed to strengthen the heart and vital powers. Bezoars are concretions formed in animals’ digestive tracts and historically used against poison and disease; compare the Science Museum’s specimen A642502. Alkermes is a compound cordial associated with kermes colouring. The white amber named in the margin is distinct from the ambergris mentioned below.

Original text 1651	Modern English
After a purge, 3 or 4 gr. of Bezoar stone, and 3. gr. of Amber Greece, drunk, or taken in Borage or Bugloss water, in which gold hot hath been quenched, will do much good, and the purge shall diminish less (the heart so refreshed) of the strength and substance of the body.	After a purge, three or four grains of bezoar stone and three grains of ambergris, drunk or taken in borage or bugloss water in which hot gold has been quenched, will do much good; with the heart thus refreshed, the purge will take away less of the body's strength and substance.[7932]
℞. confect. Alkermes ʒß lap. Bezor. j. Succini albi subtiliss. pulverisat. Ɔ jj. cum Syrup. de cort. citri; fiat electuarium.	Take half a dram of confection of alkermes; one scruple of bezoar stone; two scruples of white amber, very finely powdered. With syrup of citron peel, make an electuary.[7933]
Source page 392–393 To Bezoars stone most subscribe, Manardus, and [7934]many others, it takes away sadness, and makes him merry that useth it; I have seen some that have been much diseased with faintness, swounings, and melancholy, that taking the weight of three grains of this stone, in the water of Oxtongue, have been cured. Garcias ab Horto brags how many desperate cures he hath done upon melancholy men by this alone, when all Physicians had forsaken them.	Most endorse bezoar stone: Manardus and many others. "It takes away sadness and makes its user cheerful. I have seen people much afflicted with weakness, fainting fits and melancholy cured by taking three grains by weight of this stone in oxtongue water." Garcias ab Horto boasts of how many desperate cases of melancholy he has cured with this alone, when all physicians had abandoned them.[7935]

[7932] Editor. Amber Greece means ambergris. Burton's next recipe specifies white amber instead: the two are not silently made identical. Quenching hot gold means plunging the heated metal into the liquid. Grains are historical apothecaries' weights; the amounts are preserved without modern conversions.

[7933] Editor. The prescription signs represent take (℞), dram (ʒ), scruple (Ɔ) and half (ß). Final j is the terminal form of i in Roman numerals: j means one, jj two. An electuary is a medicinal paste made with a sweet carrier. This recipe gives one scruple of bezoar, whereas the preceding prose gives three or four grains; both are retained.

[7934] Burton. Printed page 392, c: "Gartias ab Horto aromatum lib. 1. cap. 15. adversus omnes morbos melancholicos conducit, & venenum. Ego (inquit) utor in morbis melancholicis, &c. & deploratos hujus usu ad pristinam sanitatem restitui. See more in Bauhinus book de lap. Bezoar c. 45." Gartias ab Horto, On Aromatics, book 1, chapter 15: "It is helpful against all melancholic diseases and poison. I use it," he says, "in melancholic diseases, and so forth; and by its use I have restored desperate cases to their former health." Burton adds a reference to Bauhin's book On the Bezoar Stone, chapter 45. The margin prints Gartias, whereas the body has Garcias.

[7935] Editor. Oxtongue is a name for bugloss. The first-person claim belongs to quoted medical testimony, not Burton's observation. Orta's Colloquy 45, in Markham's 1913 translation, pp. 364–365, reports uses against melancholy and a secondhand account of restored strength. This contextual parallel does not establish Burton's three-grain claim or the Latin passage cited as book 1, chapter 15. Orta's name appears in several Latinized forms.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 393 But Alchermes many except against; in some cases it may help, if it be good and of the best, such as that of Monspelier in France, which [7936]Iodocus Sincerus Itinerario Galliæ, so much magnifies, and would have no traveller omit to see it made. But it is not so generall a medicine as the other. Fernelius consil. 49. suspects Alchermes, by reason of its heat, [7937]nothing (saith he) sooner exasperates this disease, then the use of hot working meats and medicines, and would have them for that cause warily taken.	But many object to alkermes. In some cases it may help, if it is good and of the finest quality, such as that made at Montpellier in France, which Iodocus Sincerus praises so highly in his Journey through France: he would have no traveller miss seeing it made. But it is not as generally applicable a medicine as the other. Fernelius, consultation 49, distrusts alkermes because of its heat: nothing, he says, aggravates this disease more readily than foods and medicines that act by heating, and he would therefore have them taken cautiously.[7938]
I conclude therefore of this and all other medicines, as Thucydides of the plague at Athens; No remedy could be prescribed for it, Nam quod uni profuit, hoc aliis erat exitio: There is no Catholike medicine to be had: that which helps one, is pernicious to another.	I therefore conclude about this and all other medicines as Thucydides does about the plague at Athens: no remedy could be prescribed for it, "for what benefited one proved fatal to others." There is no universal medicine to be had: what helps one person harms another.[7939]

[7936] Burton. Printed page 393, d: "Edit. 1617. Monspelii electuarium fit preciosissimum Alcherm. &c." Edition of 1617: "At Montpellier the extremely precious electuary of alkermes is made," and so forth.

[7937] Burton. Printed page 393, e: "Nihil morbum hunc æque exasperat, ac alimentorum vel calidiorum usus. Alchermes ideo suspectus, & quod semel moneam, caute adhibenda calida medicamenta." "Nothing aggravates this disease so much as the use of even somewhat hot foods. Alkermes is therefore suspect, and, to give the warning once for all, hot medicines must be used cautiously."

[7938] Editor. Alchermes and Alkermes are variant forms of the same medicine's name. The original margin speaks of even somewhat hot foods, while the body includes hot-working medicines as well. Montpellier is the French place name; the particular travel-book passage and Fernelius consultation remain to be collated.

[7939] Editor. Thucydides, History of the Peloponnesian War 2.51.2, says that a treatment beneficial to one person harmed another. Burton quotes a Latin version with the stronger exitio, "destruction" or "death," then supplies his own English gloss. Catholike means universal or applicable to everyone, without a denominational meaning here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Diamargaritum frigidum, Diambra, Diaboraginatum, Electuarium lætificans Galeni & Rhasis, de Gemmis, Dianthos, Diamoscum dulce & amarum, Electuarium Conciliatoris, syrup. Cidoniorum de pomis, conserves of Roses, Violets, Fumitory, Enula campana, Satyrion, Limmons, Orange-pills condite, &c. have their good use.	The cold pearl preparation, the ambergris and borage preparations, the cheering electuary of Galen and Rhazes, the electuary of gems, Dianthos, the sweet and bitter musk confections, the Conciliator's electuary, syrup of quinces, of apples, conserves of roses, violets, fumitory, elecampane, satyrion and lemons, preserved orange peel and so on all have their proper uses.[7940]
℞. Diamoschi dulcis & amari ana ʒ ij. Diabuglossati, Diaboraginati, sacchari violacei ana ʒ j. misce cum syrupo de pomis.	Take two drams each of the sweet and bitter musk confections; one dram each of bugloss confection, borage confection and violet sugar. Mix with syrup of apples.[7941]
Every Physician is full of such receipts, one only I will add for the rareness of it, which I finde recorded by many learned Authors, as an approved medicine against dotage, head-melancholy, and such diseases of the brain.[7942]	Every physician's writings are full of such recipes. I will add just one because it is unusual: I find it recorded by many learned authors as a proven medicine for mental derangement, head melancholy and similar diseases of the brain.[7943]

[7940] Editor. These are established pharmaceutical compound names, not fully specified recipes. The transparent ingredient names and lætificans ("cheering") are translated; Dianthos and the Conciliator's title are retained. Satyrion denotes an orchid used medicinally. The compressed syrup. Cidoniorum de pomis is preserved without inserting an unprinted conjunction in the original; the modern list reads it as syrups of quinces and apples.

[7941] Editor. Ana means "of each": two drams of each musk confection, then one dram of each of the three remaining ingredients. Saccharum violaceum is sugar prepared with violets. The amounts are the printed recipe, not a standardized modern formulation.

[7942] Burton. Printed page 393, f: "Skenkius l. 1. Observat. de Mania, ad mentis alienationem, & desipientiam vitio cerebri obortam, in manuscripto codice Germanico, tale medicamentum reperi." Schenck, Observations, book 1, on mania: "For mental alienation and derangement arising from a disorder of the brain, I found the following medicine in a German manuscript book." This margin lacks a visible f anchor in the body; it is placed with the introduction to the ram's-head recipe to which it refers.

[7943] Editor. Approved means reported as tested or effective; rareness means unusualness. Dotage here denotes mental derangement, rather than simply the infirmity of old age. The nearby f margin introduces this recipe even though no matching body marker is visible.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Take a [7944]Rams head that never medled with an Ewe, cut off at a blow, and the horns only taken away, boyl it well skin and wooll together, after it is well sod, take out the brains, and put these spices to it, Cinamome, Ginger, Nutmeg, Mace, Cloves, ana ʒ ß, mingle the powder of these spices with it, and heat them in a platter upon a chafing-dish of coals together, stirring them well, that they do not burn; take heed it be not overmuch dried, or dryer then a calves brains ready to be eaten.	Take the head of a ram that has never mated with a ewe, cut off with a single blow and with only the horns removed. Boil it thoroughly, skin and wool together. When it is well cooked, take out the brains and add these spices: cinnamon, ginger, nutmeg, mace and cloves, half a dram of each. Mix the powdered spices with the brains and heat them together in a platter over a chafing dish of coals, stirring them well so that they do not burn. Take care not to dry the mixture too much, or more than calf's brains ready to be eaten.[7945]
Keep it so prepared, and for three daies give it the patient fasting, so that he fast two hours after it. It may be eaten with bread in an egg or broath, or any way, so it be taken. For 14 daies let him use this diet, drink no wine, &c.	Keep it prepared in this way, and for three days give it to the patient on an empty stomach, making him fast for two hours afterwards. It may be eaten with bread, in an egg or in broth, or in any way, provided it is taken. For fourteen days let him follow this diet and drink no wine, and so on.[7946]

[7944] Burton. Printed page 393, first g: "Caput arietis nondum experti venerem, uno ictu amputatum, cornibus tantum demotis, integrum cum lana & pelle bene elixabis, tum aperto cerebrum eximes, & addens aromata, &c." "Boil thoroughly the whole head of a ram that has not yet experienced mating, cut off with one blow and with only the horns removed, together with its wool and skin; then open it, remove the brain, and add spices," and so forth.

[7945] Editor. Sod means boiled; a chafing dish is a vessel of hot coals used to keep food or a preparation warm. The Latin ana applies the half-dram measure to every spice. The source's selection of a ram that has never mated is retained.

[7946] Editor. Burton gives both a three-day administration and a fourteen-day regimen, without fully explaining their relationship. The translation preserves both periods rather than harmonizing them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Gesner. hist. animal. lib. 1. pag. 917. Caricterius pract. cap. 13. in Nich. de metri pag. 129. Iatro: Witenberg. edit. Tubing. pag. 62. mention this medicine, though with some variation; he that list may try it, [7947]and many such.	Gesner, History of Animals, book 1, page 917; Caricterius, Practice, chapter 13, in Nich. de metri, page 129; and the Wittenberg physicians' work, Tübingen edition, page 62, mention this medicine, though with some variation. Whoever wishes may try it, and many others like it.[7948]
Odoraments to smell to, of Rose water, Violet flowers, Bawm, Rose-cakes, Vineger, &c. do much recreate the brains and spirits, according to Solomon, Provo. 27. 9. They rejoyce the heart, and as some say, nourish: 'tis a question commonly controverted in our schools, an odores nutriant; let Ficinus lib. 2. cap. 18. decide it, [7949]many arguments he brings to prove it;	Aromatic preparations to smell, made from rosewater, violet flowers, balm, rose cakes, vinegar and so on, greatly refresh the brain and spirits. According to Solomon, Proverbs 27:9, they gladden the heart; and some say they nourish it. "Whether smells nourish" is a question commonly debated in our schools: let Ficino, book 2, chapter 18, decide it, for he brings many arguments to prove that they do.[7950]
as of Democritus, that lived by the smel of bread alone, applyed to his nostrils, for some few daies, when for old age he could eat no meat.	One is the case of Democritus, who lived for a few days solely by the smell of bread held to his nostrils, when old age prevented him from eating any food.[7951]

[7947] Burton. Printed page 393, second g: "Cinis testudinis ustus, & vino potus melancholiam curat, & rasura cornu Rhinocerotis, &c. Skenkius." "The ash of a burned tortoise, drunk with wine, cures melancholy, as do shavings of rhinoceros horn," and so forth. Schenck. The repeated g is retained as a distinct marginal container.

[7948] Editor. He that list means whoever wishes. Nich. de metri probably denotes Nicolaus de Metri's Artzneybuch, edited by Jeremias Martius, Augsburg 1572 (VD16 M 4950); the cited page and edition remain uncollated. Iatro: Witenberg. refers to Wittenberg physicians, but the exact work remains unidentified. The second g margin adds tortoise ash and rhinoceros horn, separate from the ram's-head recipe; its differing treatment periods remain.

[7949] Burton. Printed page 393, h: "Instat in matrice, quòd sursum & deorsum ad odoris sensum præcipitatur." "He gives the instance of the womb, which rushes upward and downward on sensing a smell."

[7950] Editor. Odoraments are preparations intended to be smelled, and rose cakes are cakes of rose material. Schools refers to learned or university disputation. Proverbs 27:9 links ointment and perfume with a glad heart; it does not make the further claim that smells nourish. Ficino's cited argument and the marginal example of the womb belong to the period's physiology.

[7951] Editor. Diogenes Laertius, Lives of Eminent Philosophers 9.43, tells of the dying Democritus holding hot loaves to his nostrils and surviving the three days of the Thesmophoria. Burton uses the anecdote as an argument about nourishment by smell. It remains an ancient reported anecdote.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 393–394 Ferrerius lib. 2. meth. speaks of an excellent confection of his making, of wine, saffron, &c. which he prescribed to dull, weak, feeble, and dying men to smell to, & by it to have done very much good, æquè ferè profuisse olfactu & potu, as if he had given them drink.	Ferrerius, Method, book 2, speaks of an excellent confection he made from wine, saffron and other ingredients, which he prescribed for dull, weak, feeble and dying people to smell, and with which he says he did much good: "it was almost as beneficial when smelled as when drunk," as if he had given them a drink.[7952]
Source page 394 Our noble and learned Lord [7953]Verulam, in his book de vita & morte, commends therefore all such cold smels as any way serve to refrigerate the spirits. Montanus consil. 31. prescribes a form which he would have his melancholy Patient never to have out of his hands. If you will have them spagirically prepared, look in Oswaldus Crollius basil. Chymica.	Our noble and learned Lord Verulam therefore recommends, in his book On Life and Death, all those cold scents that in any way help to cool the spirits. Montanus, consultation 31, prescribes a preparation that he would have his melancholic patient always keep in his hands. If you want them prepared by chemical methods, consult Oswald Croll's Basilica Chymica.[7954]
Irrigations of the head shaven, [7955]of the flowers of water-lillies, Lettuce, Violets, Camomile, wild Mallows, wethers head, &c. must be used many mornings together. Montan. consil. 31. would have the head so washed once a week.	The shaved head must be bathed for many mornings in succession with preparations of water lily flowers, lettuce, violets, camomile, wild mallows, a wether's head and so on. Montanus, consultation 31, would have the head washed in this way once a week.[7956]

[7952] Editor. The Latin compares benefit by smelling with benefit by drinking. Burton then adds an English explanation, which is separately retained. The precise Ferrerius passage has not yet been collated.

[7953] Burton. Printed page 394, dagger: "Vicount, S. Albans." Viscount St Albans.

[7954] Editor. Lord Verulam and Viscount St Albans identify Francis Bacon. His History of Life and Death, first operation, §57, describes earth, leaves and flowers as cooling the spirits in the compared English text. Burton's Latin edition remains unidentified. Spagirically refers to Paracelsian chemical or alchemical preparation. Croll's Basilica Chymica is retained as a title; its particular passage remains uncollated.

[7955] Burton. Printed page 394, i: "Ex decocto florum nymphææ, lactucæ, violarum, chamomillæ, altheæ, capitis vervecum, &c." "From a decoction of water lily flowers, lettuce, violets, camomile, marshmallow, a wether's head, and so forth."

[7956] Editor. A wether is a castrated male sheep. Irrigations are repeated pourings or bathings; Burton first reports consecutive mornings, then Montanus's weekly use. These distinct regimens are not reconciled. The margin has althea, marshmallow, where the body says wild mallows.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Lælius à fonte Eugubinus consult. 44. for an Italian Count, troubled with head melancholy, repeats many medicines which he tried, [7957]but two alone which did the cure; use of whey made of Goats milk, with the extract of Hellebor, and irrigations of the head with water-lillies, lettuce, violets, camomile, &c. upon the suture of the crown.	Laelius a Fonte Eugubinus, consultation 44, treating an Italian count troubled with head melancholy, lists many medicines that he tried, but only two that effected the cure: the use of goat's milk whey with extract of hellebore, and bathing the head with water lilies, lettuce, violets, camomile and other ingredients, over the suture of the crown.[7958]
Piso commends a Rams lungs applied hot to the forepart of the head, [7959]or a yong Lamb divided in the back, exenterated, &c. all acknowledge the chief cure to consist in moistning throughout. Some, saith Laurentius, use powders, and caps to the brain: but forasmuch as such aromaticall things are hot and dry, they must be sparingly administred.	Piso recommends a ram's lungs applied hot to the front of the head, or a young lamb split along the back with its entrails removed, and so on. All agree that the chief cure consists in moistening thoroughly. Some, says Laurentius, use powders and caps for the brain; but since such aromatic substances are hot and dry, they must be used sparingly.[7960]
Unto the Heart we may do well to apply bags, Epithemes, Oyntments, of which Laurentius c. 9. de melan. gives examples. Bruel prescribes an Epitheme for the Heart, of Bugloss, Borage, water-lilly, Violet waters, sweet wine, Bawm leaves, Nutmegs, Cloves, &c.	It may be beneficial to apply bags, liquid dressings and ointments over the heart; Laurentius, chapter 9, on melancholy, gives examples. Bruel prescribes a liquid dressing for the heart made from bugloss, borage, water lily and violet waters, sweet wine, balm leaves, nutmegs, cloves and so on.[7961]

[7957] Burton. Printed page 394, k: "Inter auxilia multa adhibita, duo visa sunt remedium adferre, usus seri caprini, cum extracto Hellebori, & irrigatio ex lacte Nymphææ, violarum, &c. suturæ coronali adhibita; his remediis sanitate pristina adeptus est." "Among the many remedies employed, two appeared to bring relief: the use of goat's whey with extract of hellebore, and an irrigation made from milk of water lily, violets, and so forth, applied to the coronal suture. By these remedies he regained his former health." The printed lacte Nymphææ and grammatically irregular sanitate pristina are retained.

[7958] Editor. The coronal suture is the seam between the frontal and parietal skull bones. The margin's lacte Nymphææ, literally "milk of water lily," differs from the body's longer list; it has not been silently changed to lactucæ, "lettuce." The grammatically defective closing Latin is translated by its evident sense, with the original wording preserved.

[7959] Burton. Printed page 394, l: "Confert & pulmo arietis, caldus agnus per dorsum divisus, exenteratus, admotus sincipiti." "A ram's lung also helps, as does a warm lamb split along the back, its entrails removed, and applied to the front of the head."

[7960] Editor. Exenterated means having the entrails removed. Caps were medicinal head coverings, often containing aromatic material. The warning about hot and dry ingredients follows the humoral argument for moistening the brain.

[7961] Editor. Bags contain medicinal ingredients; epithemes are liquid preparations applied on cloths over an affected part. The waters are preparations made from the named plants. The application is over the bodily region of the heart.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For the Belly, make a Fomentation of oyle, [7962]in which the seeds of Cummin, Rue, Carrets, Dill, have been boyled.	For the belly, make a warm application of oil in which the seeds of cumin, rue, carrots and dill have been boiled.
Baths are of wonderfull great force in this malady, much admired by [7963]Galen, [7964]Ætius, Rhasis, &c. of sweet water, in which is boyled the leaves of Mallows, Roses, Violets, water-lillies, Wethers head, flowers of Bugloss, Camomile, Melilot, &c. Guianer. cap. 8. tract. 15. would have them used twice a day, and when they come forth of the Baths, their back bones to be anointed with oyle of Almonds, Violets, Nymphæa, fresh capon grease, &c.	Baths have extraordinarily great power in this disease, and are highly praised by Galen, Aetius, Rhazes and others: baths of fresh water in which leaves of mallows, roses, violets and water lilies, a wether's head, flowers of bugloss, camomile, melilot and so on have been boiled. Guianerius, chapter 8, treatise 15, would have them used twice a day, and the patients' spines anointed after they leave the baths with oils of almonds, violets and water lilies, fresh capon fat and so on.[7965]
Amulets and things to be born about, I finde prescribed, taxed by some, approved by Renodeus, Platerus, (amuleta inquit non negligenda) and others; look for them in Mizaldus, Porta, Albertus, &c.	I find amulets and things to be carried about prescribed, criticized by some, approved by Renodeus, Platerus—"amulets," he says, "must not be neglected"—and others. Look for them in Mizaldus, Porta, Albertus and so on.[7966]

[7962] Burton. Printed page 394, m: "Semina Cumini, rutæ, dauci, anethi cocta." "Boiled seeds of cumin, rue, carrot and dill."

[7963] Burton. Printed page 394, n: "Lib. 3. de locis affect." Book 3, On Affected Parts.

[7964] Burton. Printed page 394, o: "Tetrab. 2. ser. 1. cap. 10." Tetrabiblos 2, section 1, chapter 10.

[7965] Editor. Sweet water means fresh water, not water sweetened with sugar. Melilot is sweet clover; a capon is a castrated male chicken. Burton's animal and vegetable ingredients and twice-daily regimen are all retained.

[7966] Editor. Taxed means censured. Born about means carried on the person. The Latin in parentheses is Platerus' reported injunction, separately translated. Albertus is retained without asserting a precise work or authorship for the remedies ascribed to him.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Bassardus Visontinus ant. philos. commends Hypericon, or S. Iohns wort gathered on a [7967]friday in the hour of Iupiter, when it comes to his effectuall operation (that is about the full Moon in July) so gathered and born, or hung about the neck, it mightily helps this affection, and drives away all phantasticall spirits.	Bassardus Visontinus, Ant. philos., recommends hypericum, or St John's wort, gathered on a Friday in Jupiter's hour, when it reaches its effective power—that is, around the full moon in July. Gathered then and carried about or hung around the neck, it powerfully helps this disorder and drives away all spirits that produce phantasms.[7968]
[7969]Philes a Greek Author that flourished in the time of Michael Paleologus, writes that a Sheep or Kids skin, whom a Woolf worried, [7970]Hædus inhumani raptus ab ore Lupi, ought not at all to be worn about a man, because it causeth palpitation of the heart, not for any fear, but a secret vertue which Amulets have.	Philes, a Greek author who flourished in the time of Michael Palaeologus, writes that the skin of a sheep or kid mauled by a wolf—"a kid snatched from the jaws of a cruel wolf"—should never be worn on the body, because it causes heart palpitations, through no fear, but through a hidden power that amulets possess.[7971]

[7967] Burton. Printed page 394, dagger: "Cap. de mel. collectum die vener. hora Iovis cum ad Energiam venit. c. 1. ad plenilunium Iulii, inde gesta & collo appensa hunc affectum apprime juvat & fanaticos spiritus expellit." Chapter on melancholy: "Gathered on Friday in Jupiter's hour, when it attains its power. c. 1. at the full moon of July; then carried and hung around the neck, it greatly helps this disorder and expels frenzied spirits." The obscure printed c. 1. is left unexpanded.

[7968] Editor. Jupiter's hour is a planetary hour; Burton connects the herb's power with July's full moon. Bassardus Visontinus probably denotes Jean Baptiste Besard, whose Antrum philosophicum is catalogued in a 1617 printing. This supports a possible expansion of ant. philos., but the herb passage and marginal c. 1. remain uncollated. His means its, referring to the herb's operation.

[7969] Burton. Printed page 394, asterisk: "L. de proprietat. animal. ovis à lupo correptæ pelle non esse pro indumento corporis usurpandam, cordis enim palpitationem excitat, &c." Book On the Properties of Animals: "The skin of a sheep seized by a wolf should not be used as clothing for the body, for it causes palpitation of the heart," and so forth.

[7970] Burton. Printed page 394, dagger: "Mart." Martial; the line is Epigrams 10.48.14.

[7971] Editor. Worried means attacked or mauled. The inserted verse is Martial, Epigrams 10.48.14, where the kid is part of a dinner menu, not a statement about amulets. Philes' animal lore is the surrounding authority. Burton's dating under Michael Palaeologus is retained without silently choosing an emperor; the precise Philes passage remains to be checked. Secret virtue means an occult or hidden natural power.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A ring made of the hoofe of an Asses right forefoot carried about, &c. I say with [7972]Renodeus, they are not altogether to be rejected. Piony doth cure Epilepsie; pretious stones most diseases; [7973]a Wolfs dung born with one helps the Colick; [7974]a Spider an Ague, &c.	A ring made from the hoof of an ass's right forefoot, carried about, and so on: I say with Renodeus that they should not be rejected altogether. Peony cures epilepsy; precious stones cure most diseases; a wolf's dung carried on the person helps colic; a spider helps an ague, and so on.[7975]
Source page 394–395 Being in the country in the vacation time not many years since, at Lindly in Lecestershire my Fathers house, I first observed this Amulet of a Spider in a nut-shell lapped in silke, &c. so applied for an Ague by [7976]my Mother. Whom although I knew to have excellent skill in Chirurgery, sore eyes, aches, &c. and such experimentall medicines, as all the country where she dwelt can witness, to have done many famous and good cures upon divers poor folks, that were otherwise destitute of help:	While staying in the country during the vacation some years ago, at my father's house in Lindley in Leicestershire, I first observed this amulet—a spider in a nutshell wrapped in silk, and so on—used in this way against an ague by my mother. I knew that she had excellent skill in surgery, treating sore eyes, aches and the like, and in such remedies learned from experience; all the countryside where she lived can testify that she performed many notable and successful cures on poor people who otherwise had no help.[7977]

[7972] Burton. Printed page 394, p: "Phar. lib. 1. cap. 12." Pharmacy, book 1, chapter 12; the reference continues beneath the body text.

[7973] Burton. Printed page 394, q: "Ætius cap. 31. Tet. 3. ser. 4." Aetius, chapter 31, Tetrabiblos 3, section 4. Printed beneath the body text.

[7974] Burton. Printed page 394, r: "Dioscorides, Vlysses Alderovandus de aranea." Dioscorides; Ulisse Aldrovandi, on the spider. Printed beneath the body text.

[7975] Editor. The string of cures continues Burton's report of amulets. Ague denotes an intermittent fever with shivering fits; it is not automatically replaced with a modern diagnosis. The incomplete ass's-hoof example, with its et cetera, is left incomplete.

[7976] Burton. Printed page 395, asterisk: "Mistress Dorothy Burton. she Died, 1629." Burton names his mother and records her death.

[7977] Editor. Lindley in Leicestershire is identified by Burton as his father's home. Lapped means wrapped, and experimental means learned or tested through experience. The margin names Dorothy Burton and gives 1629 as her death year. Surgery here includes the practical treatment of wounds and bodily ailments; it should not be restricted to modern operative surgery.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 395 Yet among all other experiments, this me thought was most absurd and ridiculous, I could see no warrant for it. Quid Aranea cum febre? For what Antipathy? till at length rambling amongst authors (as often I do) I found this very medicine in Dioscorides, approved by Matthiolus, repeated by Alderovandus cap. de Aranea lib. de insectis, I began to have a better opinion of it, and to give more credit to Amulets, when I saw it in some parties answer to experience.	Yet of all her remedies, this seemed to me the most absurd and ridiculous; I could see no justification for it. “What has a spider to do with a fever?” What antipathy could there be? At last, wandering among authors, as I often do, I found this very remedy in Dioscorides, approved by Mattioli and repeated by Aldrovandi in the chapter on the spider in his book On Insects. I began to think better of it and to give more credit to amulets when I saw it prove effective in some people’s experience.[7978]
Such medicines are to be exploded, that consist of words, characters, spels, and charms, which can do no good at all, but out of a strong conceipt, as Pomponatius proves; or the Divels policy, who is the first founder and teacher of them.	Medicines consisting of words, signs, spells and charms must be rejected: they can do no good at all except through a powerful conviction, as Pomponazzi proves, or through the Devil’s contrivance, since he is their original inventor and teacher.[7979]

[7978] Editor. Antipathy is a supposed hidden opposition between things in nature, invoked to explain a therapeutic effect. Burton’s sequence matters: he first doubts the remedy, then finds written authorities, then cites its apparent success in particular people. The exact Dioscorides, Mattioli and Aldrovandi passages remain unverified.

[7979] Editor. Exploded means rejected or discredited. Characters are written or engraved magical signs; strong conceipt is a powerful belief or act of imagination. Burton distinguishes such verbal charms from the hidden natural powers he has just allowed to amulets. His attribution to Pomponazzi is retained; the particular passage remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 6. Correctors of accidents to procure sleep. Against fearfull dreams, redness, &c.	SUBSECTION 6 Remedies for accompanying symptoms: to bring sleep, and against fearful dreams, redness and so on
When you have used all good means and helps of alteratives, averters, diminutives, yet there will be still certain accidents to be corrected and amended, as waking, fearfull dreams, flushing in the face to some ruddiness, &c.	When you have used all the good means and assistance offered by alteratives, remedies that divert the humours, and mild purgatives, there will still be certain accompanying symptoms to correct and relieve: sleeplessness, fearful dreams, flushing of the face to a degree of redness, and so on.[7980]
Waking, by reason of their continuall cares, fears, sorrows, dry brains, is a symptome that much crucifies melancholy men, and must therefore be speedily helped, and sleep by all means procured, which sometimes is a sufficient [7981]remedy of it self without any other Physick. Skenkius in his observations hath an example of a woman that was so cured. The means to procure it, are inward or outward.	Sleeplessness, caused by their continual cares, fears and sorrows, and by dry brains, is a symptom that greatly torments melancholic people. It must therefore be relieved quickly, and sleep procured by every means; sometimes it is a sufficient remedy in itself, without any other treatment. Schenck, in his Observations, gives an example of a woman cured in this way. The means of bringing sleep are internal or external.[7982]

[7980] Editor. Accidents are accompanying symptoms, not mishaps. Alteratives change the humoral condition, averters divert humours, and diminutives gently reduce their quantity. The phrase to some ruddiness is preserved in sense as a degree of redness; it is not rewritten as "in some people."

[7981] Burton. Printed page 395, f: "Solo somno curata est citra medici auxilium, fol. 154." "She was cured by sleep alone, without a physician's help," folio 154.

[7982] Editor. Waking is persistent wakefulness or sleeplessness, and crucifies means torments. Dryness of the brain is one of Burton's humoral explanations. His claim for sleep alone is supported here by Schenck's reported case, not by an independently established diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Inwardly taken, are simples, or compounds; simples, as Poppy, Nymphæa, Violets, Roses, Lettuce, Mandrake, Henbane, Nightshade or Solanum, Saffron, Hemp-seed, Nutmegs, Willows with their seeds, juyce, decoctions, distilled waters, &c. Compounds are syrupes, or opiats, syrup of Poppy, Violets, Verbasco, which they are commonly taken with distilled waters.	Those taken internally are simple or compound medicines. Simple medicines include poppy, water lily, violets, roses, lettuce, mandrake, henbane, nightshade or solanum, saffron, hempseed, nutmegs and willows, with their seeds, juices, decoctions, distilled waters and so on. Compounds include syrups or opiate preparations, syrup of poppy, violets and mullein, which are commonly taken with distilled waters.[7983]
℞. diacodii ʒ j. diascordii ʒ ß aquæ lactucæ ℥ iij ß mista fiat potio ad horam somni sumenda.	Take one ounce of diacodium, half a dram of diascordium, and three and a half ounces of lettuce water. Mix to make a draught to be taken at bedtime.[7984]
Requies Nicholai, Philonium Romanum, Triphera magna, pilulæ de Cynoglossa, Discordium, Laudanum Paracelsi, Opium, are in use, &c. Country folks commonly make a posset of hemp-seed, which Fuchsius in his herball so much discommends, yet I have seen the good effect, and it may be used where better medicines are not to be had.	Nicholas's Rest, Roman Philonium, the great Triphera, hound's-tongue pills, Discordium, Paracelsus' laudanum and opium are in use, and so on. Country people commonly make a posset with hempseed, which Fuchs condemns so strongly in his herbal; yet I have seen its good effect, and it may be used where better medicines are unavailable.[7985]

[7983] Editor. Simples are single medicinal substances; compounds combine ingredients. Nymphæa and nenuphar mean water lily, while verbasco denotes mullein. The list includes seeds, juices, boiled preparations and distilled waters; the wording does not specify an identical preparation for every plant.

[7984] Editor. Diacodium is a poppy preparation; diascordium is a compound medicine named for scordium. The printed measures are read as ℥ j (one ounce), ʒ ß (half a dram), and ℥ iij ß (three and a half ounces). The second weight sign is worn in the scan and is provisionally read as a dram; that unit is less secure than the clearly printed lettuce-water amount. The historical units are retained without conversion.

[7985] Editor. Requies Nicholai literally means "Nicholas's Rest"; the other Latin names designate recognized compound preparations. Cynoglossa means hound's-tongue. The body prints Discordium here and below, whereas the recipe has diascordii: the difference is preserved. A posset is a warm milk drink, commonly curdled with ale or wine. Fuchs' objection is followed by Burton's own reported experience.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Laudanum Paracelsi is prescribed in two or three grains, with a dram of Discordium, which Oswald. Crollius commends. Opium it self is most part used outwardly, to smell to in a ball, though commonly so taken by the Turks to the same quantity for a [7986]cordiall, and at Goa in the Indies; the dose 40 or 50 grains.	Paracelsus' laudanum is prescribed in doses of two or three grains, with a dram of Discordium, which Oswald Croll recommends. Opium itself is used mostly externally, in a ball to be smelled, though the Turks commonly take it in the same quantity as a cordial; at Goa in the Indies the dose is forty or fifty grains.[7987]
Source page 395–396 Rulandus calls Requiem Nicholai, ultimum refugium, the last refuge, but of this and the rest look for peculiar receipts in Victorius Faventinus cap. de phrenesi. Heurnius cap. de Mania, Hildesheim spicel. 4. de somno & vigil. &c.	Ruland calls Nicholas's Rest "the last resort," the final refuge; but for specific recipes for this and the others, consult Victorius Faventinus, the chapter on frenzy; Heurnius, the chapter on mania; Hildesheim, Gleanings 4, on sleep and waking; and so on.[7988]
Source page 396 Outwardly used, as oyl of Nutmegs by extraction, or expression with Rosewater to annoint the temples, oyls of Poppy, Nenuphar, Mandrake, Purslan, Violets, all to the same purpose:	Among those used externally are oil of nutmegs, obtained by extraction or pressing, with rosewater to anoint the temples, and oils of poppy, water lily, mandrake, purslane and violets, all for the same purpose.[7989]

[7986] Burton. Printed page 395, t: "Bellonius observat. l. 3. c. 15 lassitudinem & labores animi tollunt; inde Garcias ab horto, lib. 1. cap 4. simp. med." Belon, Observations, book 3, chapter 15: "They remove weariness and mental distress"; then Garcia da Orta, book 1, chapter 4, on simple medicines.

[7987] Editor. Paracelsian laudanum was a named compound whose formulation must not be assumed identical to a later tincture sold under that name. Burton contrasts smelling opium with taking it internally, then gives a much larger amount at Goa. His quantities and the somewhat compressed "same quantity" reference are preserved, without harmonizing them.

[7988] Editor. Requiem is the inflected form of Requies. The Latin ultimum refugium and Burton's separate English gloss are both represented. Phrenesis denotes frenzy or an acute delirious state in historical medicine; these chapter titles do not map exactly onto present-day diagnostic categories.

[7989] Editor. Expression means pressing the oil out. Purslan is purslane, and nenuphar water lily. The preparation methods and external application belong to the text's historical prescriptions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Montan. consil. 24. & 25. much commends odoraments of Opium, Vineger, and Rosewater. Laurentius cap. 9. prescribes Pomanders and nodules; see the receipts in him; Codronchus [7990]wormwood to smell to.	Montanus, consultations 24 and 25, highly recommends aromatic preparations of opium, vinegar and rosewater. Laurentius, chapter 9, prescribes pomanders and small sachets; see his recipes. Codronchus prescribes wormwood to smell.[7991]
Unguentum Alablastritum, populeum, are used to annoint the temples, nostrils, or if they be too weak, they mix Saffron and Opium. Take a grain or two of Opium, and dissolve it with three or four drops of Rose-water in a spoon, and after mingle with it as much Unguentum populeum as a nut, use it as before:	Alablastritum ointment and poplar ointment are used to anoint the temples and nostrils; or, if these are too weak, saffron and opium are mixed in. Take a grain or two of opium and dissolve it in a spoon with three or four drops of rosewater; then mix in a nut-sized quantity of poplar ointment and use it as before.[7992]
or else take half a dram of Opium, Unguentum populeum, oyl of Nenuphar, Rose-water, Rose-vineger, of each half an ounce, with as much virgin wax as a nut; annoint your temples with some of it, ad horam somni.	Alternatively, take half a dram of opium; half an ounce each of poplar ointment, oil of water lily, rosewater and rose vinegar; and a nut-sized quantity of virgin wax. Anoint your temples with some of it at bedtime.[7993]

[7990] Burton. Printed page 396, u: “Absynthium somnos allicit olfactu.” “Wormwood induces sleep through its smell.”

[7991] Editor. Pomanders are aromatic balls, often carried or held in containers; nodules are small tied bundles or sachets of medicinal material. The wormwood margin specifically attributes the supposed effect to smelling it.

[7992] Editor. The source prints Alablastritum; that form is retained, rather than silently corrected to Alabastrinum. Populeum names poplar ointment. The comparison to a nut gives an approximate size, not a precise weight.

[7993] Editor. Virgin wax is wax before use or admixture, rather than a modern product specification. Ad horam somni means at bedtime. Half a dram applies to opium; half an ounce of each applies to the four following ingredients.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sacks of Wormwood, [7994]Mandrake, [7995]Henbane, Roses made like pillows and laid under the patients head, are mentioned by [7996]Cardan and Mizaldus, to annoint the soles of the feet with the fat of a dormouse, the teeth with eare wax of a dog, swines gall, hares ears: charms, &c.	Cardan and Mizaldus mention bags of wormwood, mandrake, henbane and roses, made into pillows and placed under the patient's head; anointing the soles of the feet with dormouse fat, and the teeth with a dog's earwax; swine's gall, hares' ears; charms and so on.[7997]
Frontlets are well known to every good wife, Rose-water and Vineger, with a little womans milk, and Nutmegs grated upon a Rose-cake applied to both temples.	Forehead dressings are well known to every housewife: rosewater and vinegar with a little woman's milk, and nutmegs grated onto a rose cake, applied to both temples.[7998]
For an Emplaster, take of Castorium a dram and half, of Opium half a scruple, mixt both together with a little water of life, make two small plasters thereof, and apply them to the temples.	For a plaster, take one and a half drams of castoreum and half a scruple of opium; mix them with a little distilled spirit, make two small plasters from the mixture, and apply them to the temples.[7999]

[7994] Burton. Printed page 396, x: "Read Lemnius lib. her. bib. cap. 2. of Mandrake." Read Lemnius, his book on biblical herbs, chapter 2, on mandrake.

[7995] Burton. Printed page 396, y: "Hyoscyamus sub cervicali viridis." "Fresh henbane beneath the pillow."

[7996] Burton. Printed page 396, z: "Plantam pedis inungere pinguedine gliris dicunt efficacissimum, & quod vix credi potest, dentes inunctos ex sorditie aurium canis somnum profundum conciliare, &c. Cardan. de rerum varietat." "They say it is extremely effective to anoint the sole of the foot with dormouse fat; and, what can scarcely be believed, that teeth smeared with matter from a dog's ears bring deep sleep," and so forth. Cardan, On the Variety of Things.

[7997] Editor. The margin specifies fresh henbane underneath the pillow, while the body lists pillow-like sacks. Cardan's Latin expresses disbelief about the dog's earwax even as it records the claim. The final disconnected items and "charms" remain part of Burton's catalogue; they are not supplied with invented instructions.

[7998] Editor. A frontlet is a dressing or band applied to the forehead or temples. Good wife means a housewife or woman managing a household. Rose cake here is a medicinal cake of rose material, not a modern baked cake.

[7999] Editor. Castoreum is the animal substance historically obtained from beavers' castor sacs. Water of life is aqua vitae, a distilled alcoholic spirit. The quantities are retained in the historical units.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Rulandus cent. 1. cur. 17. cent. 3. cur. 94. prescribes Epithemes and lotions of the head, with the decoction of flowers of Nymphæa, Violet-leaves, Mandrake roots, Henbane, white Poppy. Herc. de Saxonia, stillicidia, or droppings &c. Lotions of the feet do much avail of the said herbs: by these means, saith Laurentius, I think you may procure sleep to the most melancholy man in the world. Some use horseleeches behinde the ears, and apply Opium to the place.	Ruland, first hundred cases, cure 17, and third hundred, cure 94, prescribes liquid dressings and washes for the head made from a decoction of water lily flowers, violet leaves, mandrake roots, henbane and white poppy. Hercules de Saxonia prescribes “drip applications,” or droppings, and so on. Washing the feet with preparations of these herbs is very beneficial. By these means, says Laurentius, I think you may bring sleep to the most melancholic man in the world. Some use horse-leeches behind the ears and apply opium to the spot.[8000]
[8001]Bayerus lib. 2. c. 13. sets down some remedies against fearfull dreams, and such as walk and talk in their sleep. Baptista Porta Mag. nat. l. 2. c. 6. to procure pleasant dreams and quiet rest, would have you take Hippoglossa, or the hearb Horsetongue, Bawm, to use them or their distilled waters after supper, &c.	Bayerus, book 2, chapter 13, sets out some remedies against fearful dreams and for people who walk and talk in their sleep. To bring pleasant dreams and peaceful rest, Baptista Porta, Natural Magic, book 2, chapter 6, would have you take hippoglossa, or the herb horse-tongue, and balm, using them or their distilled waters after supper, and so on.[8002]
Such men must not eat Beans, Pease, Garlick, Onions, Cabbidge, Venison, Hare, use black wines, or any meat hard of digestion at supper, or lye on their backs, &c.	Such people must not eat beans, peas, garlic, onions, cabbage, venison or hare, drink dark wines, or have any food that is hard to digest at supper; nor should they lie on their backs, and so on.[8003]

[8000] Editor. Centuria designates a collection of a hundred cases or cures. Stillicidia means liquids applied by dripping; Burton also supplies “droppings,” which is retained. Horse-leeches denotes the leeches used in this therapeutic tradition.

[8001] Burton. Printed page 396, dagger: “Veni mecum lib.” The book Veni mecum, literally “Come with me.”

[8002] Editor. The margin prints Veni mecum, literally “Come with me,” and is not silently corrected to the more familiar vade mecum, “Go with me.” Hippoglossa and horse-tongue are preserved as Burton’s plant names without imposing a modern species identification. Porta’s precise book-and-chapter reference remains to be checked.

[8003] Editor. Black wines means dark-coloured wines. Burton closes this part of the discussion with dietary and sleeping-position rules. The next paragraph begins Rusticus pudor, on bashfulness and blushing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Rusticus pudor, bashfulness, flushing in the face, high colour, ruddiness are common grievances, which much torture many melancholy men, when they meet a man, or come in [8004]company of their betters, strangers, after a meal, or if they drink a cup of wine or strong drink, they are as red and flect, and sweat, as if they had been at a Majors feast, præsertim si metus accesserit, it exceeds, [8005]they think every man observes, takes notice of it: and fear alone will effect it, suspicion without any other cause.	"Rustic shyness," bashfulness, flushing of the face, a high colour and redness are common afflictions that greatly torment many melancholic people. When they meet someone, or find themselves among their social superiors or strangers, after a meal, or after drinking a cup of wine or strong drink, they become as red and flushed, and sweat as much, as if they had been at a mayor's banquet. "Especially if fear is added," it becomes excessive. They think everyone observes it and takes notice; fear alone will bring it on, mere suspicion without any other cause.[8006]
Source page 396–397 Skenkius observ. med. lib. 1. speaks of a waiting Gentlewoman in the Duke of Savoyes Court, that was so much offended with it, that she kneeled down to him, and offered Biarus a Physician, all that she had to be cured of it.	Schenck, Medical Observations, book 1, speaks of a lady-in-waiting at the Duke of Savoy's court who was so distressed by it that she knelt down to him and offered Biarus, a physician, everything she possessed to be cured of it.[8007]

[8004] Burton. Printed page 396, a: "Aut si quid incautius exciderit aut, &c." "Or if something has slipped out incautiously, or," and so on.

[8005] Burton. Printed page 396, b: "Nam qua parte pavor simul est pudor additus illi. Statius." "For wherever there is fear, shame is added to it at the same time." Attributed here to Statius; see the editorial note.

[8006] Editor. "Flect" remains provisionally "flushed"; "Major" means mayor. Margin b prints Statius. Compare Stasinus in Plato, Euthyphro 12a–c, where Socrates disputes fear's necessarily implying shame. Luís's De pudore, in Guimarães Pinto's 2013 edition, p. 140, has a close Latin parallel, with quoque where Burton has simul. Burton cites Luís next, making him a possible intermediary; direct dependence and the early edition remain unproved.

[8007] Editor. "Offended" means distressed or afflicted. The original moves awkwardly from "him" to the named physician Biarus; that sequence is retained. The personal name and Schenck reference await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 397 And 'tis most true, that [8008]Antony Lodovicus saith in his book de Pudore, Bashfulness either hurts or helps; such men I am sure it hurts. If it proceed from suspicion or fear, [8009]Felix Plater prescribes no other remedy but to reject and contemn it: Id populus curat scilicet; as a [8010]worthy Physician in our town said to a friend of mine in like case, complaining without cause, suppose one look red, what matter is it, make light of it, who observes it?	And what Antony Lodovicus says in his book On Bashfulness is perfectly true: "Bashfulness either harms or helps." Such people, I am sure, it harms. If it arises from suspicion or fear, Felix Plater prescribes no other remedy than to dismiss it and think nothing of it: "Of course, that is what everyone cares about!" As a worthy physician in our town said to a friend of mine in the same situation, complaining without cause: suppose someone looks red—what does it matter? Make light of it; who notices?[8011]
If it trouble at, or after meals, (as [8012]Iobertus observes med. pract. l. 1. c. 7.) after a little exercise or stirring, for many are then hot and red in the face, or if they do nothing at all, especially women; he would have them let blood in both arms, first one, then another, two or three daies between, if blood abound, to use frictions of the other parts, feet especially, and washing of them, because of that consent which is betwixt the head and the feet.	If it troubles them at or after meals, as Joubert observes in Medical Practice, book 1, chapter 7, or after a little exercise or movement—for many people then become hot and red in the face, or even when they do nothing at all, especially women—he would have them bled in both arms if they have an excess of blood: first one, then the other, two or three days apart. He advises rubbing other parts, especially the feet, and washing them, because of the sympathetic connection between the head and the feet.[8013]

[8008] Burton. Printed page 397, c: "Olysipponensis medicus; pudor aut juvat aut lædit." "A physician of Lisbon; bashfulness either helps or harms."

[8009] Burton. Printed page 397, d: "De mentis alienat." On Mental Alienation.

[8010] Burton. Printed page 397, dagger: "M[r] Doctor Ashworth." The marginal identification of the local physician.

[8011] Editor. The Latin is Terence, Andria 185, a sarcastic reply by Davus: the public supposedly has nothing better to think about. Its irony supports the advice to stop imagining that everyone notices the blush. The margin identifies the local physician only as Doctor Ashworth.

[8012] Burton. Printed page 397, e: "Facies nonnullis maxime calet rubetq; si se paululum exercuerint; nonnullis quiescentibus idem accidit, fœminis præsertim; causa quicquid fervidum aut halituosum sanguinem facit." "Some people's faces become very hot and red if they exercise a little; the same happens to some when resting, especially women. The cause is anything that makes the blood hot or full of vapour."

[8013] Editor. "Consent" means an assumed sympathetic connection between bodily parts. "Frictions" are rubbings; the passage explains treatment through the period's physiology of blood and communication between organs.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8014]And withall to refrigerate the face, by washing it often with Rose, Violet, Nenuphar, Lettuce, Lovage waters, and the like: but the best of all is that lac virginale, or strained liquor of Litary: It is diversly prepared; by Iobertus thus;	At the same time, the face should be cooled by frequent washing with rose, violet, water-lily, lettuce or lovage waters, and the like. But best of all is the preparation called “virgin’s milk,” or strained liquor of litharge. It is prepared in various ways; Joubert makes it as follows.[8015]
℞. lithar. argent. unc. j. cerussæ candidissimæ. ʒ iij. caphuræ. ℈ ij. dissolvantur aquarum solani, lactucæ, & nenupharis ana unc. iij. aceti vini albi. unc. ij. aliquot horas resideat, deinde transmittatur per philt. aqua servetur in vase vitreo, ac ea bis terve facies quotidie irroretur.	Take one ounce of silver litharge, three drams of the whitest ceruse and two scruples of camphor. Dissolve them in three ounces each of nightshade, lettuce and water-lily waters, and two ounces of white-wine vinegar. Let it settle for several hours, then pass it through a filter. Keep the liquid in a glass vessel, and sprinkle the face with it twice or three times daily.[8016]

[8014] Burton. Printed page 397, f: “Interim faciei prospiciendum ut ipsa refrigeretur: utrumq; præstabit frequens potio ex aqua rosarum, violarum, nenupharis, &c.” “Meanwhile care must be taken that the face is cooled; frequent drinking of rose, violet and water-lily waters, and so on, will accomplish both.”

[8015] Editor. “Litary” means litharge, a lead preparation; lac virginale is literally “virgin’s milk,” the name of the lotion. The body directs washing, whereas margin f says potio, a drink. Both readings are retained.

[8016] Editor. The prescription is in running text in the source and is separated here for readability. Litharge and ceruse are lead preparations; “silver litharge” is the named variety, not an instruction to add silver. The weight signs are read as dram and scruple. Ana means “of each.” No conversion to modern weights is attempted.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8017]Quercetan spagir. phar. cap. 6. commends the water of frogs spawn for ruddiness in the face. [8018]Crato consil. 283. Scoltzii would fain have them use all summer, the condite flowers of Succory, Strawbury water, Roses (cupping-glasses are good for the time) consil. 285. & 286. and to defecate impure blood with the infusion of Sene, Savory, Bawm water. [8019]Hollerius knew one cured alone with the use of Succory boyled, and drunk for five months, every morning in the summer.	Quercetan, Spagyric Pharmacy, chapter 6, recommends frogspawn water for redness of the face. Crato, consultation 283 in Scoltzius' collection, would have them use preserved chicory flowers, strawberry water and roses throughout the summer—cupping glasses are good for the time being—as in consultations 285 and 286, and purify impure blood with an infusion of senna, savory and balm water. Hollerius knew someone cured solely by drinking boiled chicory every morning for five months during the summer.[8020]
[8021]It is good overnight to annoint the face with Hares blood, and in the morning to wash it with strawbury and cowslip water, the juyce of distil'd Lemmons, juyce of cowcumbers, or to use the seeds of Melons, or kernels of Peaches beaten small, or the roots of Aron, and mixt with wheat bran to bake it in an oven, and to crumble it in strawbury water, [8022]or to put fresh cheese curds to a red face.	It is good to anoint the face with hare's blood at night, and wash it in the morning with strawberry and cowslip water, distilled lemon juice or cucumber juice; or to use melon seeds, finely crushed peach kernels or arum roots, mixed with wheat bran, baked in an oven and crumbled into strawberry water; or to apply fresh cheese curds to a red face.[8023]

[8017] Burton. Printed page 397, g: "Ad faciei ruborem aqua spermatis ranarum." "For redness of the face, water of frogspawn."

[8018] Burton. Printed page 397, h: "Recte utantur in æstate floribus Cichorii saccharo conditis vel saccharo rosaceo, &c." "They may properly use chicory flowers preserved with sugar in summer, or rose sugar," and so on.

[8019] Burton. Printed page 397, i: "Solo usu decocti Cichorii." "By the use of chicory decoction alone."

[8020] Editor. "Spagyric" refers to chemical or alchemical preparation. "Defecate" here means purify. Margin h specifies chicory flowers preserved with sugar or rose sugar, while the body adds strawberry water and says simply "Roses."

[8021] Burton. Printed page 397, k: "Utile imprimis noctu faciem illinire sanguine leporino, & mane aqua fragorum vel aqua floribus verbasci cum succo limonum distillato abluere." "It is especially useful to anoint the face at night with hare's blood, and wash it in the morning with strawberry water or water of mullein flowers, with distilled lemon juice."

[8022] Burton. Printed page 397, l: "Utile rubenti faciei caseum recentem imponere." "It is useful to put fresh cheese on a reddened face."

[8023] Editor. The body says cowslip, but margin k has verbasci, mullein; neither is changed to agree with the other. "Aron" is arum. The compressed baking directions leave their exact application to the preceding alternatives uncertain.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If it trouble them at meal times that flushing, as oft it doth, with sweating or the like, they must avoid all violent passions and actions, as laughing, &c. strong drink, and drink very little, [8024]one draught saith Crato, and that about the midst of their meal; avoid at all times indurate salt, and especially spice and windy meat.	If this flushing troubles them at mealtimes, as it often does, with sweating or the like, they must avoid all violent emotions and actions, such as laughter, and strong drink, and drink very little—one draught, says Crato, about the middle of the meal. They must always avoid hard salt, and especially spices and food that produces wind.[8025]
[8026]Crato prescribes the condite fruit of wild rose, to a nobleman his Patient to be taken before dinner or supper, to the quantity of a chestnut. It is made of sugar, as that of Quinces. The decoction of the roots of sowthistle before meat by the same author is much approved. To eat of a baked Apple some advise, or of a preserved Quince, Commin seed prepared with meat in stead of salt, to keep down fumes: not to study or to be intensive after meals.	Crato prescribes preserved wild rose fruit for a nobleman, his patient: an amount the size of a chestnut, taken before dinner or supper. It is made with sugar, as preserved quince is. The same author highly recommends a decoction of sow-thistle roots before a meal. Some advise eating baked apple or preserved quince, or using prepared cumin seed with food instead of salt, to keep down vapours; and avoiding study or intense concentration after meals.[8027]
℞. Nucleorum persic. seminis melonum ana unc. ℈ ß aquæ fragrorum l. ij. misce, utatur mane.	Take half an ounce each of peach kernels and melon seeds, and two pounds of strawberry water. Mix; use in the morning.[8028]

[8024] Burton. Printed page 397, m, continuing at foot: “Consil. 21. lib. unico vini haustu sit contentus.” “Consultation 21, book [unspecified]. Let him be content with a single draught of wine.” The text supplies no clear book number.

[8025] Editor. “Indurate” means hardened; the precise intended form of salt is not specified. “Windy meat” is any food believed to produce intestinal wind, not meat alone. Margin m leaves its book reference incomplete.

[8026] Burton. Printed page 397, n, at foot: “Idem consil. 283. Scoltzii laudatur conditus rosæ caninæ fructus ante prandium & cœnam ad magnitudinem castaneæ. Decoctum radicum Sonchi, si ante cibum sumatur, valet plurimum.” “The same author, consultation 283 in Scoltzius: preserved dog-rose fruit is recommended before dinner and supper, in an amount the size of a chestnut. A decoction of sow-thistle roots is very effective if taken before food.”

[8027] Editor. The fruit of the wild rose is the rose hip. “Condite” means preserved, here with sugar; “intensive” means intensely occupied or mentally absorbed. The supposed rising “fumes” belong to Burton’s account of digestion.

[8028] Editor. The source prints ana unc. followed by a sign read here as ℈ and ß: an ounce abbreviation apparently followed by a scruple sign and “half.” The modern half-ounce rendering follows the explicit unc. but remains tentative; the intended quantity cannot be established securely from this scan. The spelling fragrorum is retained on the left; the intended strawberry water is clear from the surrounding passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 397–398 [8029]To apply cupping glasses to the shoulders is very good. For the other kinde of ruddiness which is setled in the face with pimples, &c. because it pertains not to my subject, I will not meddle with it. I refer you to Crato's Counsels, Arnoldus lib. 1. breviar. cap. 39. I. Rulande, Peter Forestus de Fuco, lib. 31. obser. 2. To Platerus, Mercurialis, Ulmus, Randolettius, Heurnius, Menadous, and others that have written largely of it.	Applying cupping glasses to the shoulders is very good. As for the other kind of redness, which is permanently settled in the face with pimples and so on, I will not discuss it, since it falls outside my subject. I refer you to Crato's Consultations; Arnoldus, Breviary, book 1, chapter 39; I. Rulande; Peter Forestus, On Cosmetics, book 31, observation 2; Plater, Mercurialis, Ulmus, Randolettius, Heurnius, Menadous, and others who have written extensively about it.[8030]

[8029] Burton. Printed page 397, o, at foot: "Cucurbit. ad scapulas appositæ." "Cupping glasses applied to the shoulder blades."

[8030] Editor. De Fuco means "On Cosmetics" or "On Cosmetic Colouring." Burton distinguishes persistent facial redness and pimples from the episodic flushing under discussion. The printed author forms and detailed medical references are retained pending collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 398 Those other grievances and symptomes of headach, palpitation of heart, Vertigo, deliquium &c. which trouble many melancholy men, because they are copiously handled apart in every Physician, I do voluntarily omit.	I deliberately omit those other afflictions and symptoms—headache, palpitation of the heart, dizziness, fainting and so forth—which trouble many melancholic people, because every medical writer discusses them separately at length.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 2. Cure of Melancholy over all the body.	MEMBER 2 Treatment of melancholy throughout the body
Where the melancholy blood possesseth the whole body with the Brain, [8031]it is best to begin with blood-letting. [8032]The Greeks prescribe the [r] Median or middle vein to be opened, and so much blood to be taken away, as the Patient may well spare, and the cut that is made must be wide enough. The Arabians hold it fittest to be taken from that arm, on which side there is more pain and heaviness in the head: if black blood issue forth, bleed on; if it be clear and good, let it be instantly suppressed, [8033]because the malice of melancholy is much corrected by the goodness of the blood.	When melancholic blood affects the whole body as well as the brain, it is best to begin with bloodletting. The Greeks prescribe opening the median, or middle, vein and removing as much blood as the patient can comfortably spare, making the incision wide enough. The Arab physicians consider it best to take blood from the arm on the side where there is more pain and heaviness in the head. If black blood flows out, continue bleeding; if it is clear and good, stop it immediately, because the harmfulness of melancholy is greatly moderated by the goodness of the blood.[8034]
If the parties strength will not admit much evacuation in this kinde at once, it must be assayed again and again: if it may not be conveniently taken from the arm, it must be taken from the knees and ancles, especially to such men or women whose hemrods or months have been stopped.	If the person's strength will not allow much blood to be removed at once, it must be attempted repeatedly. If blood cannot conveniently be taken from the arm, it must be taken from the knees and ankles, especially in men whose haemorrhoidal bleeding has stopped, or women whose monthly periods have stopped.[8035]

[8031] Burton. Printed page 398, p: "Piso."

[8032] Burton. Printed page 398, q: "Mediana præ cæteris." "The median vein before the others."

[8033] Burton. Printed page 398, r: "Succi melancholici malitia à sanguinis bonitate corrigitur." "The harmfulness of the melancholic humour is moderated by the goodness of the blood."

[8034] Editor. "Melancholy blood" is blood thought to contain the melancholic humour. The source has an additional superscript r before Median and another at "because"; the former is retained as [r], while the single r marginal note is anchored at the latter, where its wording applies.

[8035] Editor. "Months" means menstrual periods. Haemorrhoidal bleeding and menstruation are treated here as evacuations whose suppression may be harmful. The source's general pairing of men and women is expanded to clarify the two examples.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8036]If the malady continue, it is not amiss to evacuate in a part in the fore-head, and to virgins in the ancles, which are melancholy for love matters; so to widows that are much grieved and troubled with sorrow and cares: for bad blood flows in the heart, and so crucifies the minde. The hemrods are to be opened with an instrument or horse-leeches, &c. See more in Montaltus cap. 29. [8037]Sckenkius hath an example of one that was cured by an accidentall wound in his thigh, much bleeding freed him from melancholy.	If the illness continues, it is worth drawing blood from a place on the forehead, and from the ankles in unmarried women who are melancholic over love affairs; likewise in widows greatly distressed and troubled by sorrow and cares, for bad blood flows in the heart and so torments the mind. The haemorrhoidal vessels are to be opened with an instrument or medicinal leeches, and so on. See further in Montaltus, chapter 29. Schenck gives an example of someone cured by an accidental wound in his thigh: heavy bleeding freed him from melancholy.[8038]
Diet, Diminutives, Alteratives, Cordials, Correctors as before, intermixt as occasion serves, [8039]all their study must be to make a melancholy man fat, and then the cure is ended.	Diet, gentle purgatives, alteratives, cordials and corrective medicines are to be used as before, combined as circumstances require. All their efforts must be directed towards making the melancholic person fat; then the cure is complete.[8040]

[8036] Burton. Printed page 398, s: “Perseverante malo ex quacunq; parte sanguinis detrahi debet.” “If the trouble persists, blood must be taken from any part.”

[8037] Burton. Printed page 398, t: “Observat. fol. 154. curatus ex vulnere in crure ob cruorem amissum.” “Observations, folio 154: cured through a wound in the leg, because of the blood lost.”

[8038] Editor. “Virgins” is rendered “unmarried women” in this social and medical context. “Crucifies” means torments. The body specifies a thigh wound; the margin says crure, leg. “Horse-leeches” retains its historical medicinal sense.

[8039] Burton. Printed page 398, u: “Studium sit omne ut melancholicus impinguetur: ex quo enim pingues & carnosi, illico sani sunt.” “Let every effort be directed towards making the melancholic patient fat; for once they are fat and fleshy, they are immediately well.”

[8040] Editor. “Diminutives” are mild evacuating or purging medicines. Alteratives were intended to change the humours’ qualities; cordials to strengthen the heart. The emphasis on becoming fat belongs to the contrast between moist, well-nourished flesh and melancholic dryness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Diuretica or medicines to procure urine, are prescribed by some in this kinde hot and cold: hot where the heat of the liver doth not forbid; cold where the heat of the liver is very great: [8041]amongst hot are Parsely roots, Lovage, Fennel, &c. cold, Melon-seeds, &c. with whey of Goats milk, which is the common conveigher.	Some prescribe diuretics, or medicines to increase urination, for this kind of melancholy, both hot and cold: hot ones where the liver's heat does not forbid them; cold ones where the liver's heat is very great. Among the hot are parsley roots, lovage, fennel and so on; among the cold, melon seeds and the like, with goat's-milk whey as the usual vehicle.[8042]
To purge and [8043]purify the blood, use Sowthistle, Succory, Sena, Endive, Carduus Benedictus, Dandelion, Hop, Maidenhair, Fumitory, Bugloss, Borage, &c. with their juyce, decoctions, distilled waters, Syrups, &c.	To purge and purify the blood, use sow-thistle, chicory, senna, endive, blessed thistle, dandelion, hops, maidenhair fern, fumitory, bugloss, borage and so on, with their juices, decoctions, distilled waters, syrups and the like.[8044]
Oswaldus Crollius basil. Chym. much admires salt of Corals in this case, and Ætius tetrabb. ser. 2. cap. 114. Hieram Archigenis, which is an excellent medicine to purify the blood, for all melancholy affections, falling sickness, none to be compared to it.	Oswald Croll, in his Chemical Basilica, greatly admires salt of coral in this case; and Aëtius, Tetrabiblos, section 2, chapter 114, admires Archigenes' hiera, an excellent medicine for purifying the blood. For all melancholic disorders and epilepsy, nothing compares with it.[8045]

[8041] Burton. Printed page 398, x: "Hildesheim spicel. 2. Inter calida radix petroselini, apii, feniculi; Inter frigida emulsio seminis melonum cum sero caprino quod est commune vehiculum." "Hildesheim, Gleanings 2. Among hot medicines are the roots of parsley, smallage and fennel; among cold medicines, an emulsion of melon seed with goat's-milk whey, which is the usual vehicle."

[8042] Editor. "Hot" and "cold" are medicinal qualities in humoral theory. A "conveigher" or vehicle carries the medicine. The margin lists apium, smallage or celery, where the body names lovage; that discrepancy is retained.

[8043] Burton. Printed page 398, z: "Hoc unum præmoneo domine ut sis diligens circa victum, sine quo cætera remedia frustra adhibentur." "This one thing I warn you beforehand, my lord: be careful about your diet, without which the other remedies are applied in vain." This margin belongs in sense to the Montanus passage at the beginning of Member 3 on the following page; its printed anchor is retained here.

[8044] Editor. The printed z anchor stands at "purify," but its marginal text concerns careful diet and clearly matches the opening Montanus passage in Member 3 on the next page. The note is preserved at its printed location, with the displacement made explicit.

[8045] Editor. A hiera is a named compound purgative; this one is attributed to Archigenes. "Falling sickness" means epilepsy. The abbreviated location in Aëtius and the precise coral preparation remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 399 MEMB. 3. SUBSECT. 1. Cure of Hypocondriacall melancholy.	MEMBER 3. SUBSECTION 1 Treatment of hypochondriacal melancholy
In this cure, as in the rest, is especially required the rectification of those six non-naturall things above all, as good diet, which Montanus consil. 27. enjoyns a French Nobleman, To have an especiall care of it, without which all other remedies are in vain.	In this treatment, as in the others, what is required above all is the proper regulation of those six non-natural things, especially a good diet. Montanus, consultation 27, tells a French nobleman to take particular care over it, without which all other remedies are useless.[8046]
Blood-letting is not to be used, except the Patients body be very full of blood, and that it be derived from the liver and spleen to the stomack and his vessels, then [8047]to draw it back, to cut the inner vein of either arm, some say the salvatella, and if the malady be continuate, [8048]to open a vein in the forehead.	Bloodletting should not be used unless the patient's body is very full of blood and it is carried from the liver and spleen to the stomach and its vessels. Then, to draw it back, cut the inner vein of either arm—some say the salvatella—and if the illness persists, open a vein in the forehead.[8049]

[8046] Editor. "Hypochondriacal" here concerns the region beneath the ribs and associated digestive organs. The six "non-natural" things are the traditional regimen of air, food and drink, exercise and rest, sleep and waking, evacuation and retention, and the passions. The related diet note is displaced to the preceding page.

[8047] Burton. Printed page 399, b: "Laurentius cap. 15. evulsionis gratia venam internam alterius brachii secamus." "Laurentius, chapter 15. For revulsion we cut the inner vein of either arm."

[8048] Burton. Printed page 399, c: "Si pertinax morbus, venam fronte secabis. Bruel." "If the disease is persistent, cut a vein in the forehead." Bruel.

[8049] Editor. The salvatella is the small vein on the little-finger side of the hand used in historical bloodletting. "Derived" means diverted or carried; "revulsion" draws material away from the affected part. Exact vein identifications and the cited medical passages remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Preparatives and Alteratives may be used as before, saving that there must be respect had as well to the liver, spleen, stomack, hypocondries, as to the heart and brain. To comfort the [8050]stomack and inner parts against winde and obstructions, by Areteus, Galen, Ætius, Aurelianus, &c. and many latter writers, are still prescribed the decoctions of Wormwood, Centaury, Penniroyall, Betony sod in whey, and daily drunk: many have been cured by this medicine alone.	Preparatory medicines and alteratives may be used as before, except that attention must be paid to the liver, spleen, stomach and regions beneath the ribs, as well as to the heart and brain. To strengthen the stomach and internal parts against wind and obstructions, Aretaeus, Galen, Aëtius, Aurelianus and many later writers regularly prescribe decoctions of wormwood, centaury, pennyroyal and betony boiled in whey and drunk daily. Many have been cured by this medicine alone.[8051]
Prosper Altinus and some others, as much magnifie the water of Nilus against this malady, an especiall good remedy for windie melancholy. For which reason belike Ptolomeus Philadelphus, when he married his daughter Berenice to the King of Assyria (as Celsus lib. 2. records) magnis impensis Nili aquam afferri jussit, to his great charge caused the water of Nilus to be carried with her, and gave command, that during her life she should use no other drink.	Prosper Altinus and some others praise Nile water just as highly against this illness, as an especially good remedy for windy melancholy. Presumably for this reason, when Ptolemy Philadelphus married his daughter Berenice to the king of Assyria—as Celsus records in book 2—"he ordered Nile water to be brought at great expense": at great cost to himself, he had Nile water carried with her, and commanded that throughout her life she should drink nothing else.[8052]
I finde those that commend use of Apples, in Splenatick and this kinde of melancholy (Lambswooll some call it) which howsoever approved, must certainly be corrected of cold rawness and winde.	I find writers who recommend apples in disorders of the spleen and in this kind of melancholy—some call the preparation "lamb's wool." However highly it is praised, its cold, raw quality and tendency to produce wind must certainly be corrected.[8053]

[8050] Burton. Printed page 399, dagger: "Ego maximam curam stomacho delegabo. Octa. Horatianus lib. 2. c. 5." "I shall devote the greatest care to the stomach." Octavius Horatianus, book 2, chapter 5.

[8051] Editor. "Comfort" means strengthen. "Hypocondries" are the regions below the ribs; "sod" means boiled. The assertion that this remedy alone cured many is the cited historical claim, preserved in Burton's voice.

[8052] Editor. Altinus, Celsus and "King of Assyria" are retained as printed. Compare Athenaeus, Deipnosophists 2.45b–c, reporting the story from Polybius: Philadelphus sends Nile water to Berenice after her marriage to Antiochus, king of Syria. This parallel does not establish Burton's immediate source. The Latin and his separate English gloss are both translated.

[8053] Editor. "Splenatick" means suffering from a disorder of the spleen. Lamb's wool names the apple preparation here; Burton gives no recipe. "Corrected" means modified to counter the food's supposedly undesirable qualities.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Codronchus in his book de sale absyn. magnifies the oyl and salt of Wormwood above all other remedies, [8054]which works better and speedier then any simple whatsoever, and much to be preferred before all those fulsome decoctions, and infusions, which must offend by reason of their quantity; this alone in a small measure taken, expels winde, and that most forcibly, moves urine, cleanseth the stomack of all gross humours, crudities, helps appetite, &c.	Codronchus, in his book On Salt of Wormwood, praises wormwood oil and salt above all other remedies: it works better and faster than any simple medicine whatsoever, and is greatly to be preferred to all those nauseating decoctions and infusions, whose sheer quantity must cause discomfort. A small dose of this alone expels wind with great force, promotes urination, cleanses the stomach of all thick humours and undigested matter, helps the appetite, and so on.[8055]
Arnoldus hath a wormwood wine which he would have used, which every Pharmacopæa speaks of.	Arnoldus has a wormwood wine that he recommends using; every pharmacopoeia describes it.[8056]
Diminutives and purgers may [8057]be taken as before, of hiera, manna, cassia, which Montanus consil. 230. for an Italian Abbot, in this kind prefers before all other simples. [8058]And these must be often used, still abstaining from those which are more violent, lest they do exasperate the stomack, &c. and the mischief by that means be increased.	Gentle purgatives and purging medicines may be taken as before, of hiera, manna and cassia, which Montanus, consultation 230, for an Italian abbot, prefers to all other simple medicines in this kind of illness. These must be used frequently, always avoiding the more violent ones, lest they irritate the stomach and thereby increase the trouble.[8059]

[8054] Burton. Printed page 399, d: “Citius & efficacius suas vires exercet quam solent decocta ac diluta in quantitate multa, & magna cum assumentium molestia desumpta. Flatus hic sal efficaciter dissipat, urinam movet, humores crassos abstergit, stomachum egregie confortat, cruditatem, nauseam, appetentiam mirum in modum renovat, &c.” “It exerts its powers more quickly and effectively than decoctions and diluted preparations generally do, taken in large quantities and with great discomfort to those taking them. This salt effectively disperses wind, promotes urination, clears away thick humours, admirably strengthens the stomach, and wonderfully renews undigested matter, nausea and appetite,” and so on. The odd final sequence is retained; see the editorial note.

[8055] Editor. The body has a clear sequence of benefits. The margin’s final renovat, “renews,” grammatically extends to “undigested matter” and “nausea” as well as “appetite,” making the first two items anomalous. The marginal wording is preserved and translated literally; the missing or faulty construction awaits collation.

[8056] Editor. A pharmacopoeia is a collection of medicinal preparations and their recipes.

[8057] Burton. Printed page 399, e: “Piso, Altomarus. Laurentius c. 15.” Piso, Altomarus, and Laurentius, chapter 15.

[8058] Burton. Printed page 399, f: “His utendum sæpius iteratis: à vehementioribus semper abstinendum ne ventrem exasperent.” “These must be used repeatedly; stronger remedies must always be avoided lest they irritate the belly.”

[8059] Editor. Hiera, manna and cassia are pharmaceutical names retained from the preceding discussion. The left column keeps the printed “of,” rather than substituting “or.” The contrast is between repeated gentle evacuation and irritating, more forceful purging.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 399–400 Though in some Physicians I finde very strong purgers, Hellebor it self prescribed in this affection. If it long continue, vomits may be taken after meat, or otherwise gently procured with warm water, oxymel, &c. now and then. Fuchsius cap. 33. prescribes Hellebor; but still take heed in this malady, which I have often warned, of hot medicines, [8060]because (as Salvianus adds) drought follows heat, which increaseth the disease: and yet Baptista Sylvaticus controv. 32. forbids cold medicines, [8061]because they increase obstructions, and other bad symptomes. But this varies as the parties do, and 'tis not easie to determine which to use.	Yet in some medical writers I find very powerful purgatives, even hellebore itself, prescribed for this disorder. If it continues for a long time, emetics may be taken after a meal, or vomiting may occasionally be induced gently with warm water, oxymel and the like. Fuchs, chapter 33, prescribes hellebore; but in this illness always beware of hot medicines, as I have often warned, because, as Salvianus adds, dryness follows heat and increases the disease. Yet Baptista Sylvaticus, controversy 32, forbids cold medicines because they increase obstructions and other bad symptoms. But this varies from person to person, and it is not easy to decide which to use.[8062]
Source page 400 [8063]The stomack most part in this infirmity is cold, the liver hot; scarce therefore (which Montanus insinuates consil. 229. for the Earl of Mansfort) can you help the one, and not hurt the other: much discretion must be used; take no Physick at all he concludes without great need.	In this illness the stomach is usually cold and the liver hot. You can therefore scarcely help one without harming the other, as Montanus suggests in consultation 229 for the Earl of Mansfort. Great judgement is needed; take no medicine at all, he concludes, unless there is great need.[8064]

[8060] Burton. Printed page 399, g: "Lib. 2. cap. 1. Quoniam caliditate conjuncta est siccitas quæ malum auget." "Book 2, chapter 1. Because dryness accompanies heat, and this increases the trouble."

[8061] Burton. Printed page 400, h: "Quisquis frigidis auxiliis hoc morbo usus fuerit, is obstructionem aliaque symptomata augebit." "Whoever uses cold remedies for this disease will increase the obstruction and other symptoms."

[8062] Editor. "Vomits" means emetic medicines; oxymel is a honey-and-vinegar preparation. "Drought" here means dryness. The opposed advice on hot and cold medicines is deliberately retained, followed by Burton's qualification about individual constitutions.

[8063] Burton. Printed page 400, i: "Ventriculus plerumq; frigidus, hepar calidum: quomodo ergo ventriculum calefaciet, vel refrigerabit hepar sine alterius maximo detrimento?" "The stomach is generally cold, the liver hot: how, then, will one warm the stomach or cool the liver without gravely harming the other?"

[8064] Editor. "Physick" here means medicine or medicinal treatment. "Insinuates" means suggests or intimates. Mansfort is retained without supplying an unverified modern identification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Lælius Ægubinus consil. 77. for an Hypocondriacall German Prince, used many medicines; but it was after signified to him in [8065]letters, that the decoction of China and Sassafras, and salt of Sassafras, wrought him an incredible good. In his 108. consult. he used as happily the same remedies; this to a third might have been poison, by over-heating his liver and blood.	Laelius Eugubinus, consultation 77, used many medicines for a German prince with hypochondriacal melancholy; but letters later informed him that a decoction of China root and sassafras, and salt of sassafras, had done the prince an incredible amount of good. In consultation 108 he used the same remedies just as successfully. For a third person, they might have been poison, by overheating his liver and blood.[8066]
For the other parts look for remedies in Savanarola, Gordonius, Massaria, Mercatus, Johnson, &c. One for the spleen, amongst many other, I will not omit, cited by Hildesheim spicel. 2. prescribed by Mat. Flaccus, and out of the authority of Benevenius. Antony Benevenius in an hypocondriacall passion, [8067]cured an exceeding great swelling of the spleen with Capers alone, a meat befitting that infirmity, and frequent use of the water of a Smiths forge; by this Physick he helped a sick man, whom all other Physicians had forsaken, that for seven yeers had been Splenatick.	For remedies for the other parts, consult Savonarola, Gordonius, Massaria, Mercatus, Johnson and others. Among many remedies for the spleen, I will not omit one cited by Hildesheim, Gleanings 2, prescribed by Mat. Flaccus on Benevenius' authority. In a hypochondriacal disorder, Antony Benevenius cured an exceedingly large swelling of the spleen with capers alone, a food suited to that illness, and frequent use of water from a blacksmith's forge. With this treatment he helped a sick man whom all other physicians had abandoned, and who had suffered from a diseased spleen for seven years.[8068]

[8065] Burton. Printed page 400, k: "Significatum per literas, incredibilem utilitatem ex decocto Chinæ, & Sassafras percepisse." "It was reported by letter that he had obtained incredible benefit from a decoction of China root and sassafras."

[8066] Editor. China root and sassafras recur from the preceding discussion. Burton explicitly contrasts successful cases with a hypothetical patient for whom the same preparation would be harmful.

[8067] Burton. Printed page 400, l: "Tumorem splenis incredibilem sola cappari curavit, cibo tali ægritudini aptissimo. Soloq; usu aquæ, in qua faber ferrarius sæpe candens ferrum extinxerat, &c." "He cured an incredible swelling of the spleen with capers alone, a food particularly suited to such a disorder. And by the use alone of water in which a blacksmith had frequently quenched glowing iron," and so on.

[8068] Editor. "Passion" here means disorder. The margin explains forge water as water used repeatedly to quench glowing iron. "Capers alone" is followed by a second remedy in both body and margin; the compressed sequence is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And of such force is this water, [8069]that those creatures as drink of it, have commonly little or no spleen. See more excellent medicines for the Spleen in him, and [8070]Lod. Mercatus, who is a great magnifier of this medicine.	Such is the power of this water that creatures drinking it commonly have little or no spleen. See further excellent medicines for the spleen in him and in Lod. Mercatus, who highly praises this medicine.[8071]
This Chalybs præparatus, or steel-drink is much likewise commended to this disease by Daniel Sennertus l. 1. part. 2. cap. 12. and admired by I. Cæsar Claudinus Respons. 29. he cals steel the proper [8072]Alexipharmacum of this malady, and much magnifies it; look for receipts in them. Averters must be used to the liver and spleen, and to scoure the Meseriack veins; and they are either to open or provoke urine.	This "prepared steel," or steel drink, is likewise highly recommended for this disease by Daniel Sennert, book 1, part 2, chapter 12, and admired by I. Caesar Claudinus, response 29. He calls steel the specific antidote to this illness and praises it highly; look for recipes in their works. Remedies that divert the humours must be used for the liver and spleen, and to cleanse the mesenteric veins; they must either open the passages or promote urination.[8073]

[8069] Burton. Printed page 400, m: "Animalia quæ apud hos fabros educantur, exiguos habent lienes." "Animals raised at these blacksmiths' premises have small spleens."

[8070] Burton. Printed page 400, dagger: "L. 1. cap. 17." Book 1, chapter 17.

[8071] Editor. The body infers an effect in creatures drinking the water; the margin describes animals raised at blacksmiths' premises. These are related but not identical claims.

[8072] Burton. Printed page 400, asterisk: "Continuus ejus usus semper felicem in ægris finem est assequutus." "Its continued use has always achieved a happy outcome in sick people."

[8073] Editor. Alexipharmacum means an antidote or protective remedy. "Meseriack" means mesenteric, concerning the tissues and vessels associated with the intestines. "Open" refers broadly to opening obstructed passages; the exact preparation called steel drink is not supplied here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
You can open no place better then the Hæmrods, which if by horse-leeches they be made to flow, [8074]there may be again such an excellent remedy, as Plater holds. Salust. Salvian will admit no other phlebotomy but this; and by his experience in an hospitall which he kept, he found all mad and melancholy men worse for other blood-letting. Laurentius cap. 15. cals this of horse-leeches, a sure remedy to empty the spleen and Meseriack membrane.	There is no better place to open than the haemorrhoidal vessels: if leeches make them flow, there may again be so excellent a remedy, as Plater holds. Sallust Salvian allows no bloodletting except this; from his experience in a hospital he ran, he found that other bloodletting made all mad and melancholic patients worse. Laurentius, chapter 15, calls this use of leeches a sure remedy for emptying the spleen and mesenteric membrane.[8075]
Only Montanus consil. 241. is against it; [8076]to other men (saith he) this opening of the hemrods seems to be a profitable remedy; for my part I do not approve of it, because it draws away the thinnest blood, and leaves the thickest behind.	Only Montanus, consultation 241, opposes it: "To other men," he says, "this opening of the haemorrhoidal vessels seems a beneficial remedy. For my part, I do not approve of it, because it draws off the thinnest blood and leaves the thickest behind."

[8074] Burton. Printed page 400, n: "Si Hemorroides fluxerint, nullum præstantius esse remedium, quæ sanguisugis admotis provocari poterunt. observat. lib. 1. pro hypoc. leguleio." "If the haemorrhoidal vessels flow, there is no better remedy; the flow can be induced by applying leeches. Observations, book 1, for a lawyer with hypochondriacal melancholy."

[8075] Editor. The source prints "there may be again such an excellent remedy," without "not." The margin instead says that there is no better remedy. The awkward affirmative body reading is preserved, rather than silently inserting the missing negative that the sense may suggest.

[8076] Burton. Printed page 400, o, continuing at foot: "Aliis apertio hæc in hoc morbo videtur utilissima; mihi non admodum probatur, quia sanguinem tenuem attrahit & crassum relinquit." "To others this opening seems extremely useful in this disease; I do not greatly approve of it, because it draws off the thin blood and leaves the thick."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ætius, Vidus Vidius, Mercurialis, Fuchsius, recommend Diureticks, or such things as provoke urine, as Anniseeds, Dil, Fennel, Germander, ground Pine, sod in water, or drunk in powder; and yet [8077]P. Bayerus is against them; And so is Hollerius; All melancholy men (saith he) must avoid such things as provoke urine, because by them the subtile or thinnest is evacuated, the thicker matter remains.	Aëtius, Vidus Vidius, Mercurialis and Fuchs recommend diuretics, or substances that promote urination, such as aniseed, dill, fennel, germander and ground pine, boiled in water or taken in powder with a drink. Yet P. Bayerus opposes them, as does Hollerius: "All melancholic people," he says, "must avoid substances that promote urination, because they remove the fine or thinnest material, while the thicker matter remains."[8078]
Source page 400–401 Clysters are in good request. Trincavelius lib. 3. cap. 38. for a young Nobleman, esteems of them in the first place, and Hercules de Saxonia Panth. lib. 1. cap. 16. is a great approver of them. [8079]I have found (saith he) by experience, that many hypocondriacall melancholy men have been cured by the sole use of Clysters, receipts are to be had in him.	Enemas are much favoured. Trincavelli, book 3, chapter 38, ranks them first for a young nobleman, and Hercules de Saxonia, Pantheum, book 1, chapter 16, strongly approves of them. "I have found by experience," he says, "that many people with hypochondriacal melancholy have been cured by enemas alone." Recipes can be found in his work.[8080]

[8077] Burton. Printed page 400, p, at foot: "Lib. 2. cap. 13. omnes melancholici debent omittere urinam provocantia, quoniam per ea educitur subtile, & remanet crassum." "Book 2, chapter 13. All melancholic people must avoid substances that promote urination, since they remove the fine material and the thick remains."

[8078] Editor. "Subtile" means fine or thin in consistency. The dispute concerns which components of the humours a diuretic removes. Both the recommendation and the objection belong to the historical argument.

[8079] Burton. Printed page 400, q, at foot: "Ego experientia probavi, multos Hypocondriacos solo usu Clysterum fuisse sanatos." "I have found by experience that many people with hypochondriacal illness have been cured by enemas alone."

[8080] Editor. "Clysters" are enemas; "in good request" means well regarded or much favoured. The Latin margin and Burton's English report both stress experience as evidence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 401 Besides those fomentations, irrigations, inunctions, odoraments, prescribed for the head, there must be the like used for the Liver, Spleen, Stomack, Hypocondries, &c. [8081]In crudity (saith Piso) 'tis good to binde the stomack hard to hinder winde, and to help concoction.	Besides those warm applications, washings, anointings and aromatic preparations prescribed for the head, similar ones must be used for the liver, spleen, stomach and regions beneath the ribs. "For imperfect digestion," says Piso, "it is good to bind the stomach tightly to prevent wind and help digestion."[8082]
Of inward medicines I need not speak; use the same Cordials as before. In this kinde of melancholy, some prescribe [8083]Treacle in winter, especially before or after purges, or in the Spring, as Avicenna, [8084]Trincavellius Mithridate, [8085]Montaltus Piony seeds, Unicorns horn; os de corde cervi, &c.	I need not discuss internal medicines: use the same cordials as before. In this kind of melancholy some, such as Avicenna, prescribe theriac in winter, especially before or after purging, or in spring; Trincavelli prescribes mithridate; Montaltus, peony seeds, unicorn's horn, bone from a stag's heart, and so on.[8086]

[8081] Burton. Printed page 401, r: "In cruditate optimum, ventriculum arctius alligari." "For imperfect digestion it is best to bind the stomach more tightly."

[8082] Editor. "Crudity" is imperfect digestion or undigested matter; "concoction" is digestion understood as bodily processing, often by heat. The tight binding is described as an aid to that process.

[8083] Burton. Printed page 401, s, without a matching body marker: "℥ j Theriacæ, Vere præsertim & æstate." "One dram of theriac, especially in spring and summer." Placed with the related theriac passage; the body says winter and spring.

[8084] Burton. Printed page 401, t: "Cons. 12. l. 1." Consultation 12, book 1.

[8085] Burton. Printed page 401, u: "Cap. 33." Chapter 33.

[8086] Editor. "Treacle" is medicinal theriac, a compound antidote; mithridate is another compound antidote. The unanchored s margin gives one dram and spring/summer, while the body says winter/spring. "Bone from a stag's heart" is the literal pharmaceutical expression. The source does not explain the unicorn-horn ingredient here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Amongst Topicks or outward medicines, none are more pretious then Baths, but of them I have spoken. Fomentations to the Hypocondries are very good, of wine and water, in which are sod Southernwood, Melilot, Epithyme, Mugwort, Sena, Polypody, as also [8087]Cerots, [8088]Plaisters, Liniments, Oyntments for the Spleen, Liver, and Hypocondries, of which look for examples in Laurentius, Iobertus, lib. 3. c. 1. pra. med. Montanus consil. 231. Montaltus cap. 33. Hercules de Saxoniâ, Faventinus.	Among topical or external medicines, none are more valuable than baths, but I have discussed them already. Warm applications to the regions beneath the ribs are very good: wine and water in which southernwood, melilot, thyme dodder, mugwort, senna and polypody have been boiled. So too are wax ointments, plasters, liniments and ointments for the spleen, liver and regions beneath the ribs. For examples, consult Laurentius; Joubert, Medical Practice, book 3, chapter 1; Montanus, consultation 231; Montaltus, chapter 33; Hercules de Saxonia; and Faventinus.[8089]
And so of Epithemes, digestive powders, bags, oils, Octavius Horatianus lib. 2. c. 5. prescribes calastick Cataplasms, or dry purging medicines: Piso [8090]Dropaces of pitch, and oil of Rue, applied at certain times to the stomack, to the metaphrene, or part of the back which is over against the heart, Ætius synapisms.	The same applies to liquid dressings, digestive powders, sachets and oils. Octavius Horatianus, book 2, chapter 5, prescribes relaxing poultices, or dry purging medicines; Piso, pitch plasters with oil of rue, applied at certain times to the stomach and to the metaphrenon, the part of the back opposite the heart; Aëtius, mustard plasters.[8091]

[8087] Burton. Printed page 401, x: “Trincavellius consil. 15. cerotum pro sene melancholico ad jecur optimum.” “Trincavelli, consultation 15: an excellent wax ointment for the liver, for an old man with melancholy.”

[8088] Burton. Printed page 401, y: “Emplastra pro splene. Fernel. consil. 45.” “Plasters for the spleen. Fernel, consultation 45.”

[8089] Editor. “Topicks” are topical applications; “cerots” are wax-based medicinal preparations. Epithyme is thyme dodder, and polypody is a fern whose root was used medicinally. The cited recipe details remain for collation.

[8090] Burton. Printed page 401, z: “Dropax è pice navali, & oleo rutaceo affigatur ventriculo, & toti metaphreni.” “A plaster of ship’s pitch and oil of rue is to be fastened to the stomach and the whole region of the back opposite the heart.”

[8091] Editor. “Calastick” means relaxing or loosening. Burton adds the gloss “or dry purging medicines,” which is retained without treating the two expressions as exact equivalents. Dropaces are pitch plasters, synapisms mustard plasters; the back region is defined by Burton himself.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Montaltus cap. 35. would have the thighs to be [8092]cauterised, Mercurialis prescribes beneath the knees; Lælius Ægubinus cons. 77. for an Hypocondriacall Dutchman, will have the cautery made in the right thigh, and so Montanus consil. 55. The same Montanus consil. 34. approves of issues in the arms or hinder part of the head. Bernardus Paternus in Hildesheim spicel. 2. would have [8093]issues made in both the thighs: [8094]Lod. Mercatus prescribes them neer the Spleen, aut prope ventriculi regimen, or in either of the thighs.	Montaltus, chapter 35, would have the thighs cauterised; Mercurialis prescribes it below the knees. Laelius Eugubinus, consultation 77, for a German with hypochondriacal melancholy, would have the cautery applied to the right thigh, as does Montanus, consultation 55. The same Montanus, consultation 34, approves of issues in the arms or back of the head. Bernardus Paternus, in Hildesheim, Gleanings 2, would have issues made in both thighs; Lod. Mercatus prescribes them near the spleen, "or near the stomach's governing region," or in either thigh.[8095]
Ligatures, Frictions, and Cupping-glasses above or about the belly, without scarification, which [8096]Felix Platerus so much approves, may be used as before.	Binding, rubbing, and cupping glasses applied over or around the belly without scarification, which Felix Plater so strongly approves, may be used as before.[8097]

[8092] Burton. Printed page 401, a: "Cauteria cruribus inusta." "Cauteries burned into the legs."

[8093] Burton. Printed page 401, b: "Fontanellæ sint in utroq; crure." "Let issues be made in each leg."

[8094] Burton. Printed page 401, c, with an asterisk in the body: "Lib. 1. c. 17." Book 1, chapter 17. The body and marginal markers differ; the reference accompanies Mercatus.

[8095] Editor. "Issues" are deliberately maintained openings for discharge. Dutchman here has the older broad Germanic sense, consistent with the German prince in the same consultation cited above. The phrase ventriculi regimen is awkwardly "the stomach's governing region," perhaps intended as its anatomical region; no emendation is imposed. The Mercatus asterisk in the body corresponds to margin c.

[8096] Burton. Printed page 401, dagger: "De mentis alienat. c. 3. flatus egregie discutiunt materiamq; evocant." "On Mental Alienation, chapter 3: they admirably disperse wind and draw out the material."

[8097] Editor. "Scarification" means making small cuts in the skin. The distinction is between cupping with and without such cuts; "ligatures" here means binding the body, not modern surgical tying of blood vessels.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 2. Correctors to expell winde. Against costiveness, &c.	SUBSECTION 2 Corrective medicines to expel wind. Against constipation, and so on
In this kind of melancholy one of the most offensive symptoms is winde, which as in the other species, so in this, hath great need to be corrected and expelled.	In this kind of melancholy one of the most troublesome symptoms is wind, which needs to be corrected and expelled here just as in the other kinds.
The medicines to expell it are either inwardly taken, or outwardly. Inwardly to expell winde, are simples or compounds: Simples are herbs, roots, &c. as Galanga, Gentian, Angelica, Enula, Calamus Aromaticus, Valerean, Zeodoti, Iris, condite Ginger, Aristolochy, Cicliminus, China, Dittander, Pennyroyall, Rue, Calamint, Bay-berries, & Bay-leaves, Betany, Rosemary, Hysope, Sabine, Centaury, Mint, Camomile, Stæchas, Agnus Castus, Broom-flowres, Origan, Orange pills, &c.	Medicines to expel it are taken internally or applied externally. Internal medicines for expelling wind are simple or compound. Simple medicines are herbs, roots and the like: galangal, gentian, angelica, elecampane, sweet flag, valerian, zedoary, iris, preserved ginger, birthwort, cyclamen, China root, dittander, pennyroyal, rue, calamint, bay berries and bay leaves, betony, rosemary, hyssop, savin, centaury, mint, camomile, French lavender, chaste tree, broom flowers, oregano, orange peel, and so on.[8098]
Source page 401–402 Spices, as Saffron, Cinamome, Bezoar stone, Myrrhe, Mace, Nutmegs, Pepper, Cloves, Ginger, seeds of Annis, Fennell, Amni, Cary, Nettle, Rue, &c. Juniper berries, grana Paradisi: Compounds, Dianisum, Diagalanga, Diaciminum, Diacalaminth, Electuarium de baccis lauri, Benedicta laxativa, Pulvis ad flatus. Antid. Florent. pulvis Carminativus, Aromaticum Rosatum, Treacle, Mithridate, &c.	Spices include saffron, cinnamon, bezoar stone, myrrh, mace, nutmegs, pepper, cloves and ginger; seeds of anise, fennel, ammi, caraway, nettle and rue; juniper berries and grains of paradise. Compounds include dianisum, diagalanga, diaciminum, diacalaminth, electuary of bay berries, benedicta laxativa, powder against wind from the Florentine Antidotary, carminative powder, aromaticum rosatum, theriac, mithridate, and so on.[8099]

[8098] Editor. The lists are retained in full. Printed Zeodoti is interpreted as zedoary, Cicliminus as cyclamen, and Orange pills as orange peel. Dittander is pepperwort; savin is a juniper. These historical plant names should not be assumed to identify every modern botanical preparation precisely.

[8099] Editor. The source places bezoar stone among “spices,” and that grouping is retained. Amni and Cary are interpreted as ammi and caraway. The compound names remain recognisable pharmaceutical labels; “carminative” means intended to expel wind. Antid. Florent. is the abbreviated Florentine Antidotary reference.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 402 This one caution of [8100]Gualter Bruel is to be observed in the administring of these hot medicines and dry, that whilst they covet to expell winde, they do not inflame the blood, and increase the disease; sometimes (as he saith) medicines must more decline to heat, sometimes more to cold, as the circumstances require, and as the parties are inclined to heat or cold.	This one caution from Walter Bruel must be observed when administering these hot and dry medicines: in trying to expel wind, do not inflame the blood and increase the disease. Sometimes, as he says, medicines must tend more towards heat, sometimes more towards cold, as circumstances require and according to the person's tendency towards heat or cold.[8101]
Outwardly taken to expell winds, are oils, as of Camomile, Rue, Baies, &c. fomentations of the Hypocondries, with the decoctions of Dill, Penniroyal, Rue, Bay-leaves, Cummin, &c. bags of camomile flowres, Aniseed, Cummin, Bayes, Rue, Wormwood, ointments of the oil of Spikenard, Wormwood, Rue, &c. [8102]Areteus prescribes Cataplasms, of Camomile-flowres, Fennell, Aniseeds, Cummin, Rosemary, Wormwood-leaves, &c.	External applications to expel wind include oils of camomile, rue and bay; warm applications to the regions beneath the ribs, using decoctions of dill, pennyroyal, rue, bay leaves and cumin; sachets of camomile flowers, aniseed, cumin, bay, rue and wormwood; and ointments of spikenard, wormwood or rue oil, and the like. Aretaeus prescribes poultices of camomile flowers, fennel, aniseed, cumin, rosemary, wormwood leaves and so on.[8103]

[8100] Burton. Printed page 402, c: "Cavendum hic diligenter à multum calefacientibus, atq; exsiccantibus sive alimenta fuerint hæc, sive medicamenta: nonnulli enim ut ventositates & rugitus compescant, hujusmodi utentes medicamentis, plurimum peccant, morbum sic augentes: debent enim medicamenta declinare ad calidum vel frigidum secundum exigentiam circumstantiarum, vel ut patiens inclinat ad cal. & frigid." "Great care must be taken here to avoid very heating and drying substances, whether foods or medicines: some, in using such medicines to suppress wind and rumbling, make a grave mistake, increasing the disease in this way. Medicines must tend towards heat or cold as circumstances require, or according to the patient's inclination towards heat and cold."

[8101] Editor. The margin extends the warning to food as well as medicine and names rumbling among the symptoms. Burton's principle is to balance the remedy against the individual constitution, not merely against one symptom.

[8102] Burton. Printed page 402, d: "Cap. 5. lib. 7." Chapter 5, book 7.

[8103] Editor. "Bags" are medicinal sachets; "cataplasms" are poultices. The Aretaeus book/chapter reference is reproduced as printed and remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8104]Cupping-glasses applied to the Hypocondries, without scarification, do wonderfully resolve winde. Fernelius consil. 43. much approves of them at the lower end of the belly; [8105]Lod. Mercatus calls them a powerfull remedy, and certifies moreover out of his own knowledge, how many he hath seen suddenly eased by them. Iulius Cæsar Claudinus respons. med. resp. 33. admires these Cupping-glasses, which he calls out of Galen, [8106]a kinde of enchantment, they cause such present help.	Cupping glasses applied beneath the ribs, without scarification, disperse wind wonderfully. Fernel, consultation 43, strongly approves of applying them to the lower belly. Lod. Mercatus calls them a powerful remedy and further testifies from his own knowledge how many people he has seen suddenly relieved by them. Julius Caesar Claudinus, Medical Responses, response 33, admires these cupping glasses, calling them, after Galen, a kind of enchantment: so immediate is the relief they bring.[8107]
Empyricks have a myriade of medicines, as to swallow a bullet of lead, &c. which I voluntarily omit. Amatus Lusitanus cent. 4. curat. 54. for an Hypocondriacall person, that was extreamly tormented with winde, prescribes a strange remedy. Put a pair of bellows end into a Clyster pipe, and applying it into the fundament, open the bowels, so draw forth the winde, Natura non admittit vacuum.	Empirical practitioners have countless remedies, such as swallowing a lead bullet, which I deliberately omit. Amatus Lusitanus, fourth hundred of cases, treatment 54, prescribes a strange remedy for a person with hypochondriacal melancholy who was severely tormented by wind. Put the end of a pair of bellows into an enema pipe; insert it into the anus, open the bowels, and so draw out the wind: "Nature does not permit a vacuum."[8108]

[8104] Burton. Printed page 402, e: "Piso Bruel. mire flatus resolvit." "Piso, Bruel: it wonderfully disperses wind."

[8105] Burton. Printed page 402, dagger: "Lib. 1. c. 17. nonnullos præ tensione ventris deploratos illico restitutos his vidimus." "Book 1, chapter 17. We have seen some people, given up as hopeless because of abdominal distension, immediately restored by these."

[8106] Burton. Printed page 402, f: "Velut incantamentum quoddam ex flatuoso spiritu, dolorem ortum levant." "Like a kind of enchantment they relieve pain arising from windy vapour."

[8107] Editor. "Present help" means immediate relief. "Enchantment" is a comparison for the alleged speed of the effect, not an additional instruction to use a charm.

[8108] Editor. "Empyricks" are practitioners relying on experience, often contrasted with formally learned physicians. The scan prints "open the bowels," although opening the bellows is suggested by the proposed mechanism; the printed wording is retained. Natura non admittit vacuum expresses the traditional principle that nature does not allow empty space.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He vants he was the first invented this remedy, and by means of it, speedily eased a melancholy man. Of the cure of this flatuous melancholy, read more in Fienus de flatibus cap. 26. & passim alias.	He boasts that he was the first to invent this remedy and that by its means he quickly relieved a melancholic man. For further treatment of this flatulent melancholy, read Fienus, On Wind, chapter 26 and elsewhere throughout the work.[8109]
Against Head-ach, Vertigo, vapours which ascend forth of the stomack to molest the head, read Hercules de Saxonia, and others.	For headache, dizziness and vapours that rise from the stomach to trouble the head, read Hercules de Saxonia and others.
If Costiveness offend in this, or any other of the three species, it is to be corrected with suppositories, clysters, or lenitives, powder of Sene, condite Prunes, &c.	If constipation causes trouble in this or either of the other two kinds, it is to be corrected with suppositories, enemas or gentle laxatives, senna powder, preserved prunes and the like.[8110]
℞. Elect. lenit. è succo rosar. ana ʒj. misce.	Take one ounce each of lenitive electuary and the electuary made from rose juice; mix.[8111]

[8109] Editor. "Vants" means boasts. Passim alias means elsewhere throughout the work. The claim to invention and rapid success is Amatus' claim as reported by Burton.

[8110] Editor. "Costiveness" is constipation; "lenitives" are gentle laxatives. The three kinds are the forms treated in this section: melancholy of the head, throughout the body, and of the hypochondriacal region.

[8111] Editor. The recipe occurs within the running paragraph and is set apart here for clarity. Ana, "of each," supports reading the abbreviated prescription as two electuaries: lenitive electuary and electuary of rose juice. The omitted second noun is supplied in the modern rendering; the compressed Latin remains on the left.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Take as much as a nutmeg at a time, half an hour before dinner or supper, or pil. mastichin. ʒ j. in six pills, a pill or two at a time. See more in Montan. consil. 229. Hildesheim spicel. 2. P. Cnemander, and Montanus commend [8112]Cyprian Turpentine, which they would have familiarly taken, to the quantity of a small nut, two or three hours before dinner and supper, twice or thrice a week if need be; for besides that it keeps the belly soluble, it clears the stomack, opens obstructions, cleanseth the liver, provokes urine.	Take an amount the size of a nutmeg at a time, half an hour before dinner or supper; or one dram of mastic pills divided into six pills, one or two pills at a time. See further in Montanus, consultation 229, and Hildesheim, Gleanings 2. P. Cnemander and Montanus recommend Cyprian turpentine, which they would have taken regularly, in an amount the size of a small nut, two or three hours before dinner and supper, twice or three times a week if necessary. Besides keeping the bowels loose, it clears the stomach, opens obstructions, cleanses the liver and promotes urination.[8113]
These in brief are the ordinary medicines which belong to the cure of melancholy, which if they be used aright, no doubt may do much good; Si non levando saltem leniendo valent, peculiaria bene selecta, saith Bessardus, a good choice of particular receipts, must needs ease, if not quite cure, not one but all or most, as occasion serves.	These, in brief, are the ordinary medicines used to treat melancholy, which, if properly used, may undoubtedly do much good. “Well-chosen specific remedies can at least alleviate, if they cannot remove, the trouble,” says Bessardus: a good selection of particular recipes must bring relief, even if it does not completely cure—not one alone, but all or most, as circumstances require.[8114]
Et quæ non prosunt singula, multa juvant.	And remedies that do no good singly may help in numbers.[8115]

[8112] Burton. Printed page 402, g: “Terebinthinam cypriam habeant familiarem, ad quantitatem deglutiant nucis parvæ, tribus horis ante prandium vel cœnam, ter singulis septimanis prout expedire videbitur; nam præterquam quod alvum mollem efficit, obstructiones aperit, ventriculum purgat, urinam provocat hepar mundificat.” “Let them make regular use of Cyprian turpentine, swallowing an amount the size of a small nut three hours before dinner or supper, three times each week as seems appropriate; for besides keeping the bowels loose, it opens obstructions, purges the stomach, promotes urination and cleanses the liver.”

[8113] Editor. Mastic is the named resin in the pills; Cyprian turpentine is the historical medicinal resin preparation. The body permits two or three hours and twice or three times weekly; the margin specifies three hours, dinner or supper, and three times weekly. These differences remain visible.

[8114] Editor. Burton’s Latin maxim and separate English paraphrase are both retained. Levando means removing the trouble, contrasted with soothing it. Bessardus probably denotes Jean Baptiste Besard, whose Antrum philosophicum is catalogued in a 1617 printing; compare Bassardus Visontinus in Block 105. This is a probable identification, not verification of the maxim’s exact source or location.

[8115] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 420. The standard Latin text begins Sed, “But”; Burton prints Et, “And,” which is retained in translation. The maxim endorses the combined effect of smaller remedies and also anticipates the next partition’s subject, love.

Original text 1651	Modern English
FINIS.	END.[8116]
Source page unnumbered [403] ANALYSIS OF THE THIRD PARTITION.	OUTLINE OF THE THIRD PARTITION[8117]
Love and love Melancholy, Memb. 1. Sect. 1.	Love and love melancholy, Member 1, Section 1 Sections: 3.1.1.
Preface or Introduction. Subsect. 1. Loves definition, Pedegree, Object, Fair, Amiable, Gracious and pleasant, from which comes Beauty, Grace, which all desire and love, parts affected.	Preface or introduction. Subsection 1. The definition and origin of love, Subsection 2; its object—the fair, lovable, gracious and pleasant—from which come Beauty and grace, which everyone desires and loves; the parts affected. Sections: 3.1.1.1; 3.1.1.2.
Division or kinds. Subs. 2. Natural, in things without life, as love and hatred of elements; and with life, as vegetal, vine and elm, sympathy, antipathy, &c. Sensible, as of Beasts, for pleasure, preservation of kind, mutual agreement, custome, bringing up together, &c.	Divisions or kinds. Subsection 2. Natural: in lifeless things, as the love and hatred of the elements; and in living things, such as plants—the vine and elm, attraction, repulsion, and so on. Sentient: as in animals, for pleasure, preservation of the species, mutual compatibility, habit, being brought up together, and so on.[8118] Sections: 3.1.1.2.

[8116] Editor. FINIS closes the Second Partition, not the whole book. The following source page begins the Analysis of the Third Partition.

[8117] Editor. The three unnumbered analysis pages occupy the positions of printed pages 403–405 (PDF 511–513). Braces and vertical labels are rendered as an indented outline. Zodiac signs are navigational marks, not astrological claims. The original column preserves the printed locators; the modern outline follows the body headings, including the separately explained corrections to those headings. Definition and origin belong to 3.1.1.2; the two introductory topics of heroic love belong to 3.2.1.1 and 3.2.1.2. Their omitted numbers are supplied on the right.

[8118] Editor. Natural love here includes affinities attributed to inanimate elements and plants. The vine was trained on an elm, a familiar image of attachment. “Sensible” distinguishes creatures capable of sensation; it does not mean prudent.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or Rational. Simple which hath 3. objects as M. 1 Profitable. Su. 1. Health, wealth, honor, we love our benefactors: nothing so amiable as profit, or that which hath a shew of commodity.	Or rational. Simple, with three objects, as in Member 2: The useful. Subsection 1. Health, wealth, honour; we love our benefactors. Nothing is so lovable as advantage, or what seems advantageous.[8119] Sections: 3.1.2.1.
Pleasant. Subs. 2. Things without life, made by art, pictures, sports, games, sensible objects, as hauks, hounds, horses. Or men themselves for similitude of manners, natural affections, as to friends, children, kinsmen, &c. for glory, such as commend us. Of women, as Before marriage, as Heroical, Mel. Sect. 2. vide ♈. Or after marriage, as Jealousie, Sect. 3. vide ♉.	The pleasant. Subsection 2. Lifeless things made by human skill; pictures, sports, games; objects of the senses, such as hawks, hounds and horses. Or people themselves, from similarity of character or natural affection, as towards friends, children and relatives; or for the sake of praise, those who commend us. Of women: Before marriage, as heroic melancholy, Section 2; see “Heroic or love melancholy” below. Or after marriage, as jealousy, Section 3; see “Jealousy” below. Sections: 3.1.2.2; 3.2; 3.3.
Or Honest. Subs. 3. Fucate in shew, by some error or hypocrisie; some seem and are not; or truly for vertue, honesty, good parts, learning, eloquence, &c.	Or the honourable. Subsection 3. Counterfeit in appearance, through some error or hypocrisy: some seem to be what they are not. Or genuine, for virtue, integrity, good qualities, learning, eloquence, and so on.[8120] Sections: 3.1.2.3.

[8119] Editor. “Profitable,” “pleasant” and “honest” distinguish advantage, pleasure and moral worth as objects of love. The outline prints “M. 1” at this branch, but the body begins rational love in 3.1.2.1. The modern locator therefore gives Member 2; the original retains 1.

[8120] Editor. The branch for love of women continues the “pleasant” category in the printed brace diagram; “honest” introduces the following branch on apparent or genuine moral worth. “Fucate” means coloured or disguised. “Heroical” is the historical name for passionate lovesickness, not a commendation of heroic conduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Mixt of al three which extends to M. 3 Common good, our neighbour, country, friends, which is charity; the defect of which is cause of much discontent and Melancholy. or God, Sect. 4. In excess, vide ♊ In defect, vide ♋	Mixed from all three, extending to Member 3: The common good, our neighbour, country and friends: this is charity, whose absence causes much discontent and melancholy. Or God, Section 4: In excess, see Section 4, Member 1. In deficiency, see Section 4, Member 2.[8121] Sections: 3.1.3; 3.4.1; 3.4.2.

[8121] Editor. The printed "M. 3" agrees with the body's charity heading, 3.1.3. "Charity" means love of others directed towards their good. The Gemini/Cancer pointers distinguish excess and deficiency of religious love, but the later chart does not repeat Cancer beside deficiency. Modern verbal destinations identify Section 4, Members 1 and 2 respectively.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page unnumbered [404] ♈ Heroical or Love-Melancholy, in which consider,	Section 2. Heroic or love melancholy, in which consider: Sections: 3.2.
Memb. 1. His pedegree, power, extent to vegetals and sensible creatures, as well as men, to spirits, divels, &c. His name, definition, object, part affected, tyranny.	Member 1. Its origin, power and extension to plants and sentient creatures, as well as human beings, spirits, devils and so on. Subsection 1. Its name, definition, object, the part affected and its tyranny. Subsection 2. Sections: 3.2.1.1; 3.2.1.2.
Causes Mem. 2. Stars, temperature, full dyet, place, country, clime, condition, idleness. S. 1. Natural allurements, and causes of love, as beauty, its praise, how it allureth. Comeliness, grace, resulting from the whole, or some parts, as face, eyes, hair, hands, &c. Subs. 2.	Causes. Member 2. The stars, bodily temperament, rich diet, place, country, climate, condition and idleness. Subsection 1. Natural attractions and causes of love, such as beauty, its praise and how it attracts. Good looks and grace, arising from the whole person or particular parts, such as the face, eyes, hair and hands. Subsection 2.[8122] Sections: 3.2.2.1; 3.2.2.2.
Artificial allurements, and provocations of lust and love, gestures, apparel, dowry, mony, &c. Quæst. Whether beauty owe more to Art or Nature? Subs. 3. Opportunity of time and place, conference, discourse, musick, singing, dancing, amorous tales, lascivious objects, familiarity, gifts, promises, &c. Subs. 4. Bawds and Philters. Subs. 5.	Further causes. Member 3. Artificial attractions and incitements to lust and love: gestures, clothing, dowry, money, and so on. Question: Does beauty owe more to art or nature? Subsection 3. Favourable time and place, conversation, discourse, music, singing, dancing, love stories, sexually enticing sights, familiarity, gifts, promises, and so on. Subsection 4. Procurers and love potions. Subsection 5. Sections: 3.2.3.3; 3.2.3.4; 3.2.3.5.

[8122] Editor. “Temperature” means the balance of bodily qualities or humours. “Condition” can cover constitution, circumstances or social station. The outline gives natural, social and astral influences together. The synopsis groups all causes under Member 2, then gives symptoms as 3, prognosis as 4 and treatments as 5. The displayed body headings instead move from Member 2, Subsection 2, to Member 3, Subsection 3; symptoms, prognosis and treatments then occupy Members 4, 5 and 6. The modern synopsis follows that body sequence. Member 3 begins at Subsection 3: no missing Subsections 1 or 2 are invented. The discrepancy with the preceding catchword is explained at the artificial-attractions heading.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Symptomes or signs Memb. 3. Of Body Dryness, paleness, leanness, waking, sighing, &c. Quæst. An detur pulsus amatorius? or Of mind Bad, as Fear, sorrow, suspition, anxiety, &c. An hell, torment, fire, blindness, &c. Dotage, slavery, neglect of business. or Good, as Spruceness, neatness, courage, aptness to learn musick, singing, dancing, poetry, &c.	Symptoms or signs. Member 4. Of the body: Dryness, pallor, thinness, sleeplessness, sighing, and so on. Question: Is there a distinctive lover's pulse? Or of the mind: Bad, such as: Fear, sorrow, suspicion, anxiety, and so on. A hell, torment, fire, blindness, and so on. Infatuation, enslavement, neglect of business. Or good, such as: Smartness, neatness, courage, readiness to learn music, singing, dancing, poetry, and so on. Sections: 3.2.4.1.
Prognosticks: Despair, Madness, Phrensie, Death, Memb. 4.	Prognosis: despair, madness, frenzy, death. Member 5. Sections: 3.2.5.1.
Cures Mem. 5. By labour, diet, Physick, abstinence, Subs. 1. To withstand the beginnings, avoid occasions, fair and foul means, change of place, contrary passion, witty inventions, discommend the former, bring in another, Subs. 2. By good counsel, perswasion, from future miseries, inconveniences, &c. S. 3. By Philters, magical, and poetical cures, S. 4. to let them have their desire disputed pro and con. Impedements removed, reasons for it. Subs. 5.	Treatments. Member 6. By work, diet, medicine and abstinence. Subsection 1. Resist it at the outset; avoid occasions; use fair means and foul, change of place, an opposing passion, ingenious devices; disparage the former beloved and introduce another. Subsection 2. By good advice and persuasion, drawing on future miseries, disadvantages and so forth. Subsection 3. By love potions, magical and poetic cures. Subsection 4. Allowing lovers to have their desire, debated for and against; obstacles removed; reasons in favour. Subsection 5. Sections: 3.2.6.1; 3.2.6.2; 3.2.6.3; 3.2.6.4; 3.2.6.5.

Original text 1651	Modern English
♉ Jealousie. Sect. 3.	♉ Jealousy. Section 3 Sections: 3.3.
His name, definition, extent, power, tyranny, Memb. 1. Division, Æquivocations, kinds. Subs. 1. Improper To many beasts: as Swans, Cocks, Bulls. To Kings and Princes, of their subjects, successors. To friends, parents, tutors over their children, or otherwise. or Proper Before marriage, corrivals, &c. After, as in this place our present subject.	Its name, definition, extent, power and tyranny. Member 1. Divisions, different senses of the word, kinds. Subsection 1. In an extended sense: In many animals, such as swans, cocks and bulls. In kings and princes, concerning their subjects and successors. In friends, parents and guardians concerning their children, or in other cases. Or in the strict sense: Before marriage: rivals in love, and so on. After marriage, as in our present subject.[8123] Sections: 3.3.1.1.
Causes Sect. 2. In the parties themselves, Idleness, impotency in one party, melancholy, long absence. They have been naught themselves. Hard usage, unkindness, wantonness, Inequality of years, persons, fortunes, &c. or From others Outward inticements and provocations of others.	Causes. Member 1, Subsection 2. In the people themselves: Idleness, impotence in one partner, melancholy, long absence. Their own previous misconduct; harsh treatment, unkindness, sexual licence, inequality in age, person, fortune and so on. Or from others: External enticements and provocations by others.[8124] Sections: 3.3.1.2.

[8123] Editor. “Improper” and “proper” distinguish extended and strict uses of “jealousy,” rather than improper and proper behaviour. “Corrivals” are competing lovers.

[8124] Editor. The causes branch prints “Sect. 2,” although jealousy is Section 3. Its body heading is 3.3.1.2; the modern outline gives Member 1, Subsection 2 within that section. “Naught” means morally or sexually blameworthy, not worthless.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Symptomes, Memb. 2. Fear, sorrow, suspition, anguish of mind, strange actions, gestures, looks, speeches, locking up, outrages, severe laws, prodigious tryals, &c. Prognosticks Memb. 3. Despair, madness, to make away themselves, and others.	Symptoms. Member 2. Fear, sorrow, suspicion, mental anguish, strange actions, gestures, looks and speeches; confinement, violence, harsh laws, extraordinary trials, and so on. Prognosis. Member 3. Despair, madness, killing themselves and others. Sections: 3.3.2.1; 3.3.3.
Cures Memb. 4. By avoiding occasions, always busie, never to be idle. By good counsel, advice of friends, to contemn or dissemble it. Subs. 1. By prevention before marriage. Plato's communion. To marry such as are equal in years, birth, fortunes, beauty, of like conditions, &c. Of a good family, good education. To use them well.	Treatments. Member 4. Avoid occasions; always be busy, never idle. Through good counsel and friends' advice, disregard it or conceal it. Subsection 1. Prevention before marriage. Subsection 2; Plato's community of partners. Marry people equal in age, birth, fortune and beauty, with similar dispositions, and so on. From a good family, well brought up. Treat them well.[8125] Sections: 3.3.4.1; 3.3.4.2.

[8125] Editor. "Plato's communion" alludes to the sharing of wives and children among the guardians in Republic 5. Burton lists it here as a proposed way of preventing jealousy. "Use them well" means treat spouses well. Prevention before marriage begins at 3.3.4.2; the modern outline supplies the subsection number omitted here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page unnumbered [405] ♊ Religious melancholy. Sect. 4.	♊ Religious melancholy. Section 4 Sections: 3.4.
In excess of such as do, that which is not required. Med. 1. A proof that there is such a species of Melancholy, Name, Object God, what his beauty is, how it allureth, Part and parties affected, superstitious, Idolaters, Prophets, Hereticks, &c. Sub. 1.	In excess: among those who do what is not required. Member 1. Proof that there is such a kind of melancholy; its name; God as its object; what his beauty is and how it attracts; the part and people affected —the superstitious, idolaters, prophets, heretics and so on. Subsection 1.[8126] Sections: 3.4.1.1.
Causes Sub. 2. From others The divels allurements, false miracles, Priests for their gain. Politicians to keep men in obedience, Bad instructors, blind Guides. Or from themselves Simplicity, fear, ignorance, solitariness, Melancholy, curiosity, pride, vain glory, decayed Image of God.	Causes. Subsection 2. From others: The devil's enticements, false miracles, priests seeking profit; politicians seeking to keep people obedient; bad teachers and blind guides. Or from themselves: Naivety, fear, ignorance, solitude, melancholy, prying curiosity, pride, vanity, the impaired image of God. Sections: 3.4.1.2.
Symptomes Subs. 3. General Zeal without knowledge, obstinacy, superstition, strange devotion, stupidity, confidence, stiffe defence of their tenents, mutual love & hate of other sects, belief of incredibilities, impossibilities Or Particular. Of Hereticks, pride, contumacy, contempt of others, wilfulness, vain-glory, singularity, prodigious paradoxes.	Symptoms. Subsection 3. General: Zeal without knowledge, obstinacy, superstition, strange devotion, mental dullness, self-assurance, stubborn defence of their beliefs, love among themselves and hatred of other sects, belief in incredible and impossible things. Or particular: Among heretics: pride, defiance, contempt for others, wilfulness, vanity, insistence on being different, extraordinary paradoxes. Sections: 3.4.1.3.

[8126] Editor. The outline prints "Med. 1," rendered as Member 1 in context. Excess means religious practice beyond what Burton regards as required; deficiency means too little or impaired religious assurance. These are the author's theological classifications.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In superstitious blind zeale, obedience, strange works, fasting, sacrifices, oblations, prayers, vows, pseudo-martyrdome, mad and ridiculous customes, ceremonies, observations. In Pseudo-prophets, visions, revelations, dreams, prophecies, new doctrines, &c. of Jews, Gentiles, Mahometans, &c.	Among the superstitious: blind zeal, obedience, strange works, fasting, sacrifices, offerings, prayers, vows, false martyrdom, mad and ridiculous customs, ceremonies and observances. Among false prophets: visions, revelations, dreams, prophecies, new doctrines and so forth—among Jews, Gentiles, Muslims and others.[8127] Sections: 3.4.1.3.
Prognosticks. Subs. 4. New doctrines, paradoxes, blasphemies, madness, stupidity, despair, damnation. Cures. Subs. 5. By Physick if need be, conference, good counsel, perswasion, compulsion, correction, punishment. Quæritur an cogi debent? Affir.	Prognosis. Subsection 4. New doctrines, paradoxes, blasphemies, madness, mental dullness, despair, damnation. Treatments. Subsection 5. Medicine if necessary, discussion, good counsel, persuasion, compulsion, correction, punishment. Question: Should they be coerced? Affirmative. Sections: 3.4.1.4; 3.4.1.5.
In defect, as Me. 2. Secure void of grace and fears. Epicures, Atheists Magitians, Hypocrites, such as have cauterised consciences, or else are in a reprobate sense, worldly-secure, some Philosophers, impenitent sinners. Subs. 1.	In deficiency, as in Member 2. Complacent, without grace or fear: Epicureans, atheists, magicians, hypocrites, those with seared consciences or depraved understanding, secure in worldly things, some philosophers, unrepentant sinners. Subsection 1.[8128] Sections: 3.4.2.1.

[8127] Editor. “Gentiles” here denotes non-Jewish peoples, especially pagans; “Mahometans” is rendered Muslims. Burton groups these communities under his own polemical categories. “Observations” means observances.

[8128] Editor. “Secure” means complacently free from spiritual fear. “Epicures” is the polemical label for people governed by pleasure, not a precise account of Epicurus’ philosophy. “Cauterised” conscience evokes 1 Timothy 4:2; a “reprobate” understanding evokes Romans 1:28. In the following despair branch, the body gives definition as 3.4.2.2, causes as 3.4.2.3, symptoms as 3.4.2.4, prognosis as 3.4.2.5 and treatment as 3.4.2.6. The modern outline supplies the definition’s locator and adjusts the remaining numbers to match; the source outline’s 2–5 sequence remains on the left.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or Distrustful, or too timorous, as desperat. In despair consider, Causes Subs. 2. The divel and his allurements, Rigid Preachers, that wound their consciences, Melancholy, contemplation, solitariness How melancholy & dispair differ. Distrust, weakness of faith. Guilty conscience for offence committed, misunderstanding Scr.	Or distrustful, or excessively fearful, as those in despair. Despair, Subsection 2. In despair consider: Causes. Subsection 3. The devil and his enticements; harsh preachers who wound their consciences; melancholy, contemplation, solitude. How melancholy and despair differ; distrust, weakness of faith. A guilty conscience for an offence committed; misunderstanding Scripture. Sections: 3.4.2.2; 3.4.2.3.
Symptomes Subs. 3. Fear, sorrow, anguish of mind, extream tortures and horror of conscience, fearful dreams, conceits, visions, &c. Prognosticks; Blasphemy, violent death. Subs. 4. Cures S. 5. Physick as occasion serves, conference, not to be idle or alone Good counsel, good company, all comforts & contents &c.	Symptoms. Subsection 4. Fear, sorrow, mental anguish, extreme torment and horror of conscience, frightening dreams, imaginings, visions and so on. Prognosis: blasphemy, violent death. Subsection 5. Treatments. Subsection 6. Medicine as needed, discussion, avoiding idleness and solitude. Good counsel, good company, every comfort and source of contentment, and so on. Sections: 3.4.2.4; 3.4.2.5; 3.4.2.6.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 406 THE THIRD PARTITION. LOVE-MELANCHOLY.	THE THIRD PARTITION LOVE MELANCHOLY
The First Section. Member. Subsection. The Preface*.	SECTION 1. MEMBER 1. SUBSECTION 1 The preface
There will not be wanting, I presume, one or other that will much discommend some part of this Treatise of Love-Melancholy, and object (which [8129]Erasmus in his Preface to S[r] Thomas Moore suspects of his) that it is too light for a Divine, too Commical a subject to speak of Love-Symptomes, too phantastical, and fit alone for a wanton Poet, a feeling young love-sick gallant, an effeminate Courtier, or some such idle person.	I presume there will be someone or other who strongly disapproves of part of this treatise on love melancholy, objecting—as Erasmus anticipates about his own work in his preface to Sir Thomas More—that it is too frivolous for a clergyman, too comic a subject: to discuss the symptoms of love is too fanciful, fit only for a licentious poet, a sensitive young lovesick gallant, an effeminate courtier or some such idle person.[8130]

[8129] Burton. Printed page 406, a: "Encom. Moriæ leviores esse nugas quam ut Theologum deceant." Praise of Folly: "Trifles too frivolous to befit a theologian."

[8130] Editor. "Divine" means a theologian or clergyman. Erasmus' dedicatory preface to Thomas More opens The Praise of Folly. "Feeling" means sensitive or emotionally affected; "phantastical" means fanciful.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And tis true they say: for by the naughtiness of men it is so come to pass, as [8131]Caussinus observes, ut castis auribus vox amoris suspecta sit, & invisa, the very name of love is odious to chaster ears: And therefore some again out of an affected gravity will dislike all for the names sake before they read a word; dissembling with him in [8132]Petronius, and seem to be angry that their ears are violated with such obscene speeches, that so they may be admired for grave Philosophers, and staid carriage.	And what they say is true: human wickedness has brought things to such a pass, as Caussin observes, "that the word love is suspect and hateful to chaste ears"—the very name of love is offensive to more modest ears. So some, putting on an air of solemnity, will reject the whole work for its name before reading a word. Like the character in Petronius, they pretend to be angry that such obscene talk offends their ears, hoping to be admired as serious philosophers with sober manners.[8133]
They cannot abide to hear talk of Love toies, or amorous discourses, vultu, gestu, oculis in their outward actions averse, and yet in their cogitations they are all out as bad, if not worse then others.	They cannot bear talk of love's trifles or amorous subjects; "in expression, gesture and eyes," their outward behaviour shows aversion, yet in their thoughts they are every bit as bad as others, if not worse.
[8134]Erubuit, posuitq; meum Lucretia librum, Sed coram Bruto, Brute recede, legit.	Lucretia blushed and put my book aside, But only before Brutus. Brutus, leave: she reads.[8135]

[8131] Burton. Printed page 406, dagger: "Lib. 8. Eloquent. cap. 14. de affectibus mortalium vitio fit qui præclara quæq; in pravos usus vertunt." Eloquence, book 8, chapter 14, on the emotions: "It happens through the fault of mortals, who turn everything excellent to bad uses."

[8132] Burton. Printed page 406, b: "Quoties de amatoriis mentio facta est, tam vehementer excandui; tam severa tristitia violari aures meas obsceno sermone nolui, ut me tanquam unam ex Philosophis intuerentur." "Whenever amorous matters were mentioned, I flared up so vehemently and with such stern solemnity refused to have my ears offended by obscene talk that they regarded me as one of the philosophers." Printed unam is retained.

[8133] Editor. Nicolas Caussin is cited on eloquence and the emotions. The Petronius passage is Satyricon 85: Eumolpus describes feigned moral indignation used to conceal his intentions. Burton adapts its wording. His margin's feminine unam is retained rather than corrected to unum.

[8134] Burton. Printed page 406, dagger: "Martial." Epigrams 11.16.9–10; see the editorial note for the variant.

[8135] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 11.16.9–10. Lucretia is invoked as an emblem of chastity, Brutus as a stern Roman observer. The 1651 text prints legit, "she reads"; the consulted Latin text has leget, "she will read." The modern line follows Burton's printed present tense.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 406–407 But let these cavillers and counterfeit Cato's know, that as the Lord John answered the Queen in that Italian [8136]Guazzo, An old, a grave discreet man is fittest to discourse of love matters, because he hath likely more experience, observed more, hath a more staid judgment, can better discern, resolve, discusse, advise, give better cautions, and more solid precepts, better inform his auditors in such a subject, and by reason of his riper years sooner divert.	But let these faultfinders and counterfeit Catos know that, as Lord John answered the queen in the Italian Guazzo, an older, serious and judicious man is best fitted to discuss matters of love. He is likely to have more experience, to have observed more and to have sounder judgement. He can better distinguish, decide, examine and advise; give better warnings and firmer precepts; instruct his listeners better on such a subject; and, because of his mature years, more readily turn them away from it.[8137]
Source page 407 Besides, nihil in hac amoris voce subtimendum, there is nothing here to be excepted at; Love is a species of melancholy, and a necessary part of this my Treatise, which I may not omit; operi suscepto inserviendum fuit; so Jacobus Mycillus pleadeth for himself in his translation of Lucians Dialogues, and so do I; I must and will perform my task. And that short Excuse of Mercerus, for his edition of Aristænetus shall be mine, [8138]If I have spent my time ill to write, let not them be so idle as to read.	Besides, "there is nothing to fear in this word love"; there is nothing here to object to. Love is a kind of melancholy and a necessary part of this treatise of mine, which I cannot omit. "The work undertaken had to be served": so Jacobus Micyllus pleads for himself in his translation of Lucian's Dialogues, and so do I. I must and will carry out my task. And I shall adopt Mercerus' brief excuse for his edition of Aristaenetus: if I have wasted my time writing, let them not be so idle as to read.[8139]

[8136] Burton. Printed page 406, asterisk: "Lib 4. of civil conversation." Book 4 of Civil Conversation.

[8137] Editor. Cato, proverbial for stern morality, supplies the name for Burton's ostentatiously severe critics. Stefano Guazzo's Civil Conversation is a dialogue; the lord and queen belong to its speaking company. "Sooner divert" is understood as more readily diverting listeners from excessive love; the object is implicit.

[8138] Burton. Printed page 407, asterisk: "Si male locata est opera scribendo, ne ipsi locent in legendo." "If effort has been ill spent in writing, let them not spend theirs in reading."

[8139] Editor. Micyllus is the humanist translator Jacob Moltzer; Mercerus is the Latinised name of an editor of Aristaenetus' love letters. Burton uses their prefatory defences as precedents. The Latin phrases are translated as well as their separate English glosses.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But I am perswaded it is not so ill spent, I ought not to excuse or repent my self of this subject, on which many grave and worthy men have written whole volumns, Plato, Plutarch, Plotinus, Maximus, Tyrius, Alcinous, Avicenna, Leon Hebreus in three large Dialogues, Xenophon sympos. Theophrastus, if we may believe Athenæus lib. 13. cap 9. Picus Mirandula, Marius Æquicola, both in Italian, Kornmannus de linea Amoris, lib. 3. Petrus Godefridus hath handled in three books, P. Hædus,	But I am convinced my time is not so ill spent. I need neither excuse nor regret this subject, on which many serious and worthy men have written whole volumes: Plato, Plutarch, Plotinus, Maximus of Tyre, Alcinous, Avicenna, Leone Ebreo in three long dialogues, Xenophon in his Symposium, Theophrastus—if we may believe Athenaeus, book 13, chapter 9—Pico della Mirandola and Mario Equicola, both in Italian; Kornmann, On the Line of Love, book 3; Petrus Godefridus, who has treated it in three books; and P. Haedus.[8140]
and which almost every Physitian, as Arnoldus, Villanovanus, Valleriola observat. med. lib. 2. observ. 7. Ælian Montaltus, and Laurentius in their Treatises of Melancholy, Jason Pratensis de morb. cap. Valescus de Taranta, Gordonius, Hercules de Saxonia, Savanarola, Langius, &c. have treated of apart, and in their works. I excuse my self therefore with Peter Godefridus, Valleriola, Ficinus, and in [8141]Langius words. Cadmus Milesius writ fourteen books of Love, and why should I be ashamed to write an Epistle in favour of young men, of this subject?	Almost every physician has discussed it separately or in his works: Arnoldus Villanovanus; Valleriola, Medical Observations, book 2, observation 7; Elianus Montalto and Laurentius in their treatises on melancholy; Jason Pratensis, On Diseases of the Head; Valescus de Taranta, Gordon, Hercules de Saxonia, Savonarola, Lange, and others. I therefore defend myself with Peter Godefridus, Valleriola and Ficino, and in Lange's words: Cadmus of Miletus wrote fourteen books on love; why should I be ashamed to write a letter on the subject for the benefit of young men?[8142]

[8140] Editor. The commas in "Maximus, Tyrius" separate what is one name, Maximus of Tyre; the modern text joins it. "Sympos." abbreviates Symposium. Leone Ebreo is Judah Abravanel; P. Haedus is Pietro Edo. The exact editions and some title forms in this catalogue remain for bibliographical collation.

[8141] Burton. Printed page 407, c: "Med. epist. l. 1. ep. 14. Cadmus Milesius teste Suida. de hoc Erotico Amore, 14. libros scripsit nec me pigebit in gratiam adolescentum hanc scribere epistolam." Medical Letters, book 1, letter 14: "Cadmus of Miletus, according to Suidas, wrote fourteen books on this erotic love; nor shall I be ashamed to write this letter for the benefit of young men."

[8142] Editor. Arnoldus, Villanovanus is one name, Arnold of Villanova. De morb. cap. abbreviates a title on diseases of the head. Burton cites Johannes Lange for Cadmus's fourteen books. The consulted Suda entry, Adler κ 23, instead lists four books on release from the sufferings of love, followed by twelve on Attic history. Burton's fourteen remains; Lange's text and the early Suda edition require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A company of stern Readers dislike the second of the Æneads, and Virgils gravity, for inserting such amorous passions in an heroical subject; But [8143]Servius his Commentator justly vindicates the Poets worth, wisdome, and discretion in doing as he did. Castalio would not have young men read the [8144]Canticles, because to his thinking it was too light and amorous a tract, a Ballade of Ballades, as our old English translation hath it.	Some stern readers disapprove of the second book of the Aeneid, and question Virgil's seriousness, because he introduces such amorous passions into an epic subject. But his commentator Servius rightly defends the poet's merit, wisdom and judgement in doing so. Castellio would not have young men read the Song of Songs because he thought it too frivolous and amorous a work—a "Ballad of Ballads," as our old English translation calls it.[8145]
He might as well forbid the reading of Genesis, because of the loves of Jacob and Rachel, the stories of Sichem and Dinah, Judah and Thamar; reject the book of Numbers, for the fornications of the people of Israel with the Moabites; that of Judges for Sampson and Dalilahs embracings; that of the Kings, for David and Bersheba's adulteries, the incest of Ammon and Thamar, Solomons Concubines, &c. The stories of Esther, Judith, Susanna, and many such.	He might as well forbid Genesis because of Jacob's love for Rachel and the stories of Shechem and Dinah, Judah and Tamar; reject Numbers for the Israelites' fornication with the Moabites; Judges for Samson's embraces with Delilah; the books of Kings for David and Bathsheba's adultery, Amnon's incest with Tamar, Solomon's concubines and so on; or the stories of Esther, Judith, Susanna and many others.[8146]
Dicearchus, and some other carp at Plato's majesty, that he would vouchsafe to indite such love toyes; amongst the rest, for that dalliance with Agatho,	Dicaearchus and others find fault with Plato's dignity for his condescending to write such amorous trifles, among them this dalliance with Agathon:

[8143] Burton. Printed page 407, dagger: "Comment. in 2. Æneid." Commentary on Aeneid 2; the number is retained as printed.

[8144] Burton. Printed page 407, asterisk: "Meros amores meram impudicitiam sonare videtur nisi &c." "It seems to speak of nothing but love affairs, nothing but immodesty, unless," and so on. The qualification is unfinished.

[8145] Editor. Both the prose and marginal note print Aeneid 2. The obvious parallel is Servius' opening commentary on Aeneid 4, which defends its treatment of love and its connection to the previous book; Burton's number is retained. Canticles is the Song of Songs. "Castalio" denotes Sebastian Castellio; the precise source for Burton's allegation remains to be collated.

[8146] Editor. Principal passages: Genesis 29, 34 and 38; Numbers 25; Judges 16; 2 Samuel 11 and 13; 1 Kings 11. Older arrangements could call Samuel the first and second books of Kings. Burton's euphemistic catalogue includes stories of coercion and assault as well as mutual desire; the modern text preserves his classification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Suavia dans Agathoni, animam ipse in labra tenebam; Ægra etenim properans tanquam abitura fuit.	Kissing Agathon, I held my soul upon my lips; For the poor thing hurried there, as though about to leave.[8147]
Source page 407–408 For my part saith [8148]Maximus Tyrius, a great Platonist himself, me non tantum admiratio habet, sed etiam stupor, I do not only admire, but stand amazed to read, that Plato and Socrates both should expell Homer from their City, because he writ of such light and wanton subjects, Quod Iunonem cum Iove in Ida concumbentes inducit, ab immortali nube contectos, Vulcans net, Mars and Venus fopperies before all the Gods, because Apollo fled, when he was persecuted by Achilles, the [8149]Gods were wounded and ran whining away, as Mars that roared lowder then Stentor, and covered nine akers of ground with his fall;	"For my part," says Maximus of Tyre, himself a great Platonist, "I am seized not only by wonder but by astonishment": I do not merely marvel but stand amazed to read that Plato and Socrates should both expel Homer from their city because he wrote of such frivolous and licentious subjects. "He brings Juno and Jupiter together in bed on Ida, covered by an immortal cloud"; there are Vulcan's net and the follies of Mars and Venus before all the gods; Apollo flees when Achilles pursues him; the gods are wounded and run away whining, like Mars, who roared louder than Stentor and covered nine acres of ground when he fell.[8150]

[8147] Editor. The Greek epigram attributed to Plato is quoted in Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights 19.11.1–2. Burton gives a Latin version, translated here directly. The soul's movement towards the lips imagines it passing into the beloved during a kiss; the exact source of this Latin rendering remains unverified.

[8148] Burton. Printed page 407, dagger: "Ser. 8." Discourse 8; Maximus of Tyre, in the numbering used here.

[8149] Burton. Printed page 407, dagger: "Quod risum & eorum amores commemoret." "Because he recounts their laughter and their love affairs."

[8150] Editor. Maximus of Tyre, Discourse 8 in Burton's numbering, supplies the argument about Socrates and Homer. The gods' sexual and comic adventures belong to Homeric narrative. Burton's nine acres and Stentor comparison are retained as his telling, not silently corrected to another edition or measure.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 408 Vulcan was a summers day falling down from heaven, and in Lemnos Ile brake his leg, &c. with such ridiculous passages; when as both Socrates and Plato, by his testimony writ lighter themselves: quid enim tam distat (as he follows it) quam amans à temperante, formarum admirator à demente, what can be more absurd then for grave Philosophers to treate of such fooleries, to admire Autiloquus, Alcibiades, for their beauties as they did, to run after, to gaze, to dote on fair Phædrus, delicate Agatho, young Lysis, fine Charmides, hæccine Philosophum decent? Doth this become grave Philosophers?	Vulcan spent a summer's day falling from heaven and broke his leg on the island of Lemnos, and there are other such ridiculous passages. Yet Socrates and Plato, according to his testimony, wrote more frivolously themselves. "For what is so far apart," he continues, "as a lover from a temperate man, an admirer of beauty from a madman?" What could be more absurd than for serious philosophers to treat such follies: to admire Autolycus and Alcibiades for their beauty, as they did; to pursue, gaze at and dote on handsome Phaedrus, delicate Agathon, young Lysis and fine Charmides? "Do these things befit a philosopher?" Does this become serious philosophers?[8151]
Thus peradventure Callias, Thrasimachus, Polus, Aristophanes, or some of his adversaries and emulators might object; but neither they nor [8152]Anytus and Melitus his bitter enemies, that condemned him for teaching Critias to tyrannize, his impiety for swearing by dogs and plain trees, for his juggling sophistry, &c. never so much as upbraided him with impure love, writing or speaking of that subject; and therefore without question, as he concludes, both Socrates and Plato in this are justly to be excused.	Callias, Thrasymachus, Polus, Aristophanes, or some other opponent or rival of his might perhaps object in this way. Yet neither they nor his bitter enemies Anytus and Meletus, who condemned him for teaching Critias tyranny, for impiously swearing by dogs and plane trees, for his deceptive sophistry and so forth, ever so much as reproached him with impure love or with writing or speaking on the subject. Therefore, he concludes, Socrates and Plato undoubtedly deserve to be acquitted on this point.[8153]

[8151] Editor. The scan reads à demente, "from a madman," although the contrast is awkward. The translation follows that reading; Burton's ensuing English is a rhetorical paraphrase. "Autiloquus" is rendered Autolycus, the name required by the context. Burton's precise source edition and its wording have not been established.

[8152] Burton. Printed page 408, asterisk: "Quum multa ei objecissent quod Critiam tyrannidem docuisset, quod Platonem juraret loquacem sophistam, &c. accusationem amoris nullam fecerunt. Ideoq; honestus amor, &c." "Although they brought many charges against him—that he had taught Critias tyranny, that he swore by Plato, [that he was] a talkative sophist, and so on—they made no accusation of love. Therefore the love was honourable," and so on. Platonem is printed here; the body has plane trees.

[8153] Editor. The pronoun "him" refers to Socrates. Maximus imagines objections and answers them by appeal to what Socrates' accusers did not allege. The margin prints Platonem, "Plato," where the body has plane trees; Maximus' account supports the tree reading. The discrepancy is preserved in the note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But suppose they had been a little overseen, should divine Plato be defamed? no, rather as he said of Cato's drunkenness, if Cato were drunk, it should be no vice at all to be drunk. They reprove Plato then, but without cause (as [8154]Ficinus pleads) for all love is honest and good, and they are worthy to be loved that speak well of love.	But suppose they had been a little indiscreet: should the divine Plato be defamed? No; rather, as someone said of Cato's drunkenness, if Cato were drunk, drunkenness should be no vice at all. They therefore reproach Plato without reason, as Ficino argues, for all love is honourable and good, and those who speak well of love deserve to be loved.[8155]
Being to speak of this admirable affection of love (saith [8156]Valleriola) there lyes open a vast and philosophical field to my discourse, by which many lovers become mad: let me leave my more serious meditations, wander in these Philosophical fields, and look into those pleasant Groves of the Muses, where with unspeakable variety of flowers, we may make Garlands to our selves, not to adorn us only, but with their pleasant smell and juyce to nourish our souls, and fill our minds desirous of knowledge, &c.	"As I prepare to discuss this remarkable passion of love," says Valleriola, "a vast philosophical field lies open to my discourse, through which many lovers come to madness. Let me leave my graver meditations, wander through these philosophical fields and look into the Muses' pleasant groves. With their indescribable variety of flowers we may make ourselves garlands, not merely to adorn us, but, with their pleasant fragrance and juice, to nourish our souls and satisfy our minds' desire for knowledge," and so on.[8157]

[8154] Burton. Printed page 408, d: "Carpunt alij Platonicam majestatem quod amori nimium indulserit, Dicearchus & alii; sed male. Omnis amor honestus & bonus, & amore digni qui bene dicunt de Amore." "Others, Dicaearchus and the rest, criticise Plato's dignity because he indulged too much in love; but wrongly. All love is honourable and good, and those who speak well of love deserve love."

[8155] Editor. Overseen means caught in an indiscretion. Seneca, On Tranquillity of Mind 17.9, says Cato's accusers would sooner make the charge honourable than Cato disgraceful. Burton sharpens this into drunkenness being no vice; Seneca also limits its frequency. The source of Burton's wording remains unidentified. Ficino is Marsilio Ficino, but his particular defence of Platonic love here remains uncollated.

[8156] Burton. Printed page 408, e: "Med. obser. lib. 2. cap. 7. de admirando amoris affectu dicturus; ingens patet campus & philosophicus, quo sæpe homines ducuntur ad insaniam, libeat modo vagari, &c. Quæ non ornent modo, sed fragrantia & succulentia jucunda plenius alant, &c." Medical Observations, book 2, chapter 7: "About to speak of the remarkable passion of love, a vast philosophical field lies open, through which people are often led to madness; let me now wander," and so on. "Which may not merely adorn, but nourish more fully with their fragrance and pleasant richness," and so on.

[8157] Editor. Valleriola is François Valleriola. The flowers, garlands and nourishing juices turn the gathering of literary passages into an image of mental refreshment. His Latin marginal extract and Burton's expanded English paraphrase are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
After an harsh and unpleasing discourse of Melancholy, which hath hitherto molested your patience, and tired the author, give him leave with [8158]Godefridus the Lawyer, and Laurentius (cap. 5.) to recreate himself in this kind after his laborious studies, since so many grave Divines and worthy men have without offence to manners, to help themselves and others, voluntarily written of it.	After a harsh and unpleasant discussion of melancholy that has so far tried your patience and wearied the author, allow him, with Godefridus the lawyer and Laurentius, chapter 5, to refresh himself in this way after his laborious studies, since so many serious theologians and worthy men have willingly written about it, without offending against morality, to benefit themselves and others.
Heliodorus a Bishop, penned a love story of Theagines and Chariclea, and when some Cato's of his time reprehended him for it, chose rather, saith [8159]Nicephorus, to leave his Bishoprick then his book.	Heliodorus, a bishop, wrote the love story of Theagenes and Chariclea. When some Catos of his time reproached him for it, he chose, says Nicephorus, to give up his bishopric rather than his book.[8160]
Æneas Sylvius an ancient Divine and past 40 years of age, (as [8161]he confesseth himself, (after Pope Pius Secundus) endited that wanton history of Euryalus and Lucretia. And how many Superintendents of learning could I reckon up that have written of light phantastical subjects? Beroaldus, Erasmus, Alpheratius, twenty foure times printed in Spanish, &c.	Aeneas Sylvius, an elderly theologian over forty years old, as he himself admits—later Pope Pius II—composed that licentious story of Euryalus and Lucretia. And how many leading scholars could I list who have written on frivolous and fanciful subjects? Beroaldus, Erasmus, Alpheratius—printed twenty-four times in Spanish—and others.[8162]

[8158] Burton. Printed page 408, f: "Lib. 1. præfat. de amoribus agens relaxandi animi causa laboriosissimis studiis fatigati; quando & Theologi se his juvari & juvare illæsis moribus volunt?" Book 1, preface: "Treating of love affairs to relax the mind wearied by strenuous studies, since theologians too wish to be helped by these things and to help others without injury to morals?" The note continues across the foot of the page.

[8159] Burton. Printed page 408, g: "Hist. lib. 12. cap. 34." History, book 12, chapter 34.

[8160] Editor. The novel is Heliodorus' Aethiopica, centred on Theagenes and Chariclea. Burton reports the story of the author's choosing his book over his bishopric on Nicephorus' authority; this is presented as the cited tradition, not independently established biography.

[8161] Burton. Printed page 408, i: "Præfat. quid quadragenario convenit cum amore? Ego vero agnosco amatorium scriptum mihi non convenire: qui jam meridiem prætergressus in vesperem feror. Æneas Sylvius præfat." Preface: "What has a man of forty to do with love? I certainly acknowledge that an amorous work does not befit me, who have already passed noon and am moving towards evening." Aeneas Sylvius, preface.

[8162] Editor. Aeneas Sylvius is Enea Silvio Piccolomini, later Pius II. His story is commonly titled The Tale of Two Lovers. Burton's description of him as elderly and over forty goes beyond the quoted quadragenario, "a man of forty." The identity of "Alpheratius" and the claim of twenty-four Spanish printings remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 408–409 Give me leave then to refresh my muse a little, and my weary Readers, to expatiate in this delightsome field, hoc deliciarum campo, as Fonseca terms it, to [8163]season a surly discourse, with a more pleasing aspersion of love matters: Edulcare vitam convenit, as the Poet invites us, curas nugis, &c. 'tis good to sweeten our life with some pleasing toyes to rellish it, and as Pliny tell us, magna pars studiosorum amœnitates quærimus, most of our students love such pleasant [8164]subjects.	Allow me, then, to refresh my muse a little, and my weary readers, by wandering freely in this delightful field—"this field of delights," as Fonseca calls it—and to season a stern discourse with a more agreeable sprinkling of love matters. "It is fitting to sweeten life," as the poet invites us, "and cares with trifles," and so on: it is good to sweeten our life with a few pleasing trifles to give it flavour. And, as Pliny tells us, "most of us scholars seek pleasant things": most of our students love such agreeable subjects.[8165]
Source page 409 Though Macrobius teach us otherwise, [8166]that those old Sages banished all such light Tracts from their studies, to Nurses cradles, to please only the ear; yet out of Apuleius I will oppose as honourable Patrons, Solon, Plato, [8167]Xenophon, Adrian, &c. that as highly approve of these Treatises. On the other side me thinks they are not to be disliked, they are not so unfit.	Although Macrobius teaches otherwise—that the sages of old banished all such frivolous writings from their studies to nurses' cradles, as things that merely please the ear—I will set against him equally honourable supporters from Apuleius: Solon, Plato, Xenophon, Hadrian and others, who approve these works just as highly. Looking at the other side, I think they need not be condemned; they are not so inappropriate.[8168]

[8163] Burton. Printed page 408, k: "Ut severiora studia iis amœnitatibus lector condire possit. Accius." "So that the reader may season more serious studies with these delights." Attributed to Accius here; the precise source remains unverified.

[8164] Burton. Printed page 409, dagger: "Discum quam philosophum audire malunt." "They prefer to hear a discus rather than a philosopher." A contrast between sport and serious discourse.

[8165] Editor. The body's poetic phrases and the margin's attribution to Accius have not yet been tied to a precise source. Pliny the Elder's Natural History, preface 14, has studiorum rather than Burton's studiosorum; the translation follows Burton. "Students" means people engaged in study generally, not only pupils.

[8166] Burton. Printed page 409, l: "In Som. Scip. è sacrario suo tum ad cunas nutricum sapientes eliminarunt, solas aurium delitias profitentes." On the Dream of Scipio: "The sages then banished from their sanctuary to nurses' cradles those things that profess only to delight the ears."

[8167] Burton. Printed page 409, m: "Babylonius & Ephesius, qui de Amore scripserunt, uterq; amores Myrrhæ, Cyrenes, & Adonidis. Suidas." "The Babylonian and the Ephesian, who wrote about love; both [wrote] the loves of Myrrha, Cyrene and Adonis. Suidas." The compressed distribution of the titles requires collation.

[8168] Editor. Macrobius, Commentary on the Dream of Scipio 1.2.7–8, excludes merely entertaining fiction from philosophical exposition; Burton adapts its grammar. Suda entries ξ 49–51 distinguish Xenophon of Antioch (Babyloniaca), of Ephesus (Habrocomes and Anthia), and of Cyprus (Cinyras, Myrrha and Adonis). Thus the last group belongs to the Cypriot entry, not to both writers named in Burton's margin. His Babylonius and Cyrenes remain; the early source chain is unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I will not peremptorily say as one did, [8169]tam suavia dicam facinora, ut male sit ei qui talibus non delectetur, I will tell you such pretty stories, that foul befall him that is not pleased with them; Neq; dicam ea quæ vobis usui sit audivisse, & voluptati meminisse, with that confidence, as Beroaldus doth his enarrations on Propertius.	I will not declare imperiously, as someone did, "I shall recount such delightful misdeeds that a plague on anyone who takes no pleasure in them": I will tell you such pretty stories that ill befall whoever is not pleased with them. Nor shall I say, "I shall tell things that will be useful for you to have heard and delightful to remember," with Beroaldus' confidence in his commentary on Propertius.[8170]
I will not expect or hope for that approbation, which Lipsius gives to his Epictetus, pluris facio quum relego: semper ut novum, & quum repetivi, repetendum; the more I read, the more shall I covet to read. I will not presse you with my Pamphlets, or beg attention, but if you like them you may.	I will neither expect nor hope for the praise Lipsius gives his Epictetus: "I value it more when I reread it: always like something new, and, when I have returned to it, something to return to again." The more I read, the more I shall want to read. I will not force my pamphlets on you or beg for attention; but if you like them, you may read them.[8171]
Pliny holds it expedient, and most fit, severitatem jucunditate etiam in scriptis condire, to season our works with some pleasant discourse; Synesius approves it, licet in ludicris ludere, the [8172]Poet admires it,	Pliny considers it useful and entirely fitting "to season seriousness with pleasantness even in writing": to season our works with some entertaining discourse. Synesius approves: "In playful matters we may play." The poet praises it:[8173]
Omne tulit punctum qui miscuit utile dulci;	He wins every vote who mixes the useful with the pleasant.

[8169] Burton. Printed page 409, dagger: "Pet. Aretine dial. Ital." Pietro Aretino, Italian dialogues.

[8170] Editor. Pietro Aretino's Italian dialogues are the stated source of the boast. Facinora can mean deeds or misdeeds; its provocative sense suits the context. The next promise is attributed to Beroaldus' commentary on Propertius. Both Latin sayings and Burton's separate English rendering of the first are retained.

[8171] Editor. Justus Lipsius praises Epictetus' writings as inviting repeated reading. Burton follows the Latin commendation with his own shorter English gloss; both appear here. The precise Lipsius reference remains for collation.

[8172] Burton. Printed page 409, asterisk: "Hor." Horace.

[8173] Editor. Pliny the Younger, Letters 4.3.2–3, praises combining gravity with pleasantness; Burton compresses his words. Horace's line is Ars Poetica 343. Punctum is a voting mark: the writer wins everyone's approval. The exact Synesius passage remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And there be those without question, that are more willing to read such toyes, then [8174]I am to write: Let me not live, saith Aratines Antonia, If I had not rather hear thy discourse, [8175]then see a play! No doubt but there be more of her minde; ever have been, ever will be, as [8176]Hierome bears me witnesse. A far greater part had rather read Apuleius then Plato: Tully himself confesseth he could not understand Plato's Timæus, and therefore cared lesse for it; but every school-boy hath that famous testament of Grunnius Corocotta Porcellus at his fingers ends. The Comicall Poet,	There are certainly people more eager to read such trifles than I am to write them. "May I die," says Aretino's Antonia, "if I would not rather hear your conversation than watch a play!" No doubt others share her mind, as they always have and always will; Jerome is my witness. "Far more people would rather read Apuleius than Plato." Cicero himself admits that he could not understand Plato's Timaeus and therefore cared less for it, while every schoolboy knows the famous will of Grunnius Corocotta Porcellus by heart. The comic poet:[8177]
——— Id sibi negoti credidit solum dari, Populo ut placerent, quas fecisset fabulas.	He thought this his sole task: To make the plays he wrote please the public.[8178]

[8174] Burton. Printed page 409, dagger: "Legendi cupidiores, quam ego scribendi, saith Lucian." "More eager to read than I am to write," says Lucian.

[8175] Burton. Printed page 409, asterisk: "Plus capio voluptatis inde, quam spectandis in theatro ludis." "I take more pleasure from it than from watching plays in the theatre."

[8176] Burton. Printed page 409, o: "Proœmio in Isaiam. Multo major pars Milesias fabulas revolventium quam Platonis libros." In the preface to Isaiah: "Far more people turn over Milesian tales than Plato's books."

[8177] Editor. "Toys" means trifles. Antonia is a speaker in Aretino's dialogues. Jerome, preface to book 12 of his Commentary on Isaiah, contrasts Plato with Milesian tales, reports Cicero's difficulty with the Timaeus, and describes laughing schoolboys reciting the pig's will. Burton adds Apuleius to this comparison. The pig is Grunnius Corocotta Porcellus. Jerome's report does not independently verify Cicero's confession; the Lucian and Aretino passages remain uncollated.

[8178] Editor. Terence, Andria, prologue 2–3. Burton follows the Latin with his own expanded English explanation; both stages are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Made this his onely Care and sole study to please the people, tickle the ear, and to delight; but mine earnest intent is as much to profit as to please; non tam ut populo placerem, quam ut populum juvarem, and these my writings I hope, shall take like guilded pills, which are so composed as well to tempt the appetite, and deceive the palat, as to help and medicinally work upon the whole body; my lines shall not only recreate, but rectifie the minde.	He made it his only concern and sole endeavour to please the public, tickle the ear and give delight. My earnest intention, however, is as much to benefit as to please: "not so much to please the people as to help them." I hope these writings will go down like gilded pills, prepared both to tempt the appetite and deceive the palate, and to help and work medicinally upon the whole body. My lines should not only refresh the mind but set it right.[8179]
I think I have said enough; If not, let him that is otherwise minded, remember that of [8180]Maudarensis, he was in his life a Philosopher (as Ausonius apologizeth for him;) in his Epigrams a Lover, in his precepts most severe; in his Epistle to Cærellia, a wanton. Amnianus, Sulpitius, Evenus, Menander, and many old Poets besides, did in scriptis prurire, write Fescennines, Attellanes, and lascivious songs; lætam materiam; yet they had in moribus censuram, & severitatem, they were chast, severe, and upright livers.	I think I have said enough. If not, let anyone who thinks otherwise remember the case of Apuleius of Madaura: "In his life he was a philosopher," as Ausonius says in his defence; "in his epigrams a lover, in his precepts utterly strict, and in his letter to Caerellia, licentious." Amnianus, Sulpitius, Evenus, Menander and many other ancient poets "itched with lust in their writings": they wrote Fescennine verses, Atellan farces and lewd songs, "cheerful material." Yet they possessed "restraint and strictness in their conduct"; they lived chaste, strict and upright lives.[8181]
Castum esse decet pium poetam Ipsum, versiculos nihil necesse est, Qui tum deniq; habent salem & leporem.	The dutiful poet himself should be chaste; His little verses need not be— Only then do they have wit and charm.[8182]

[8179] Editor. Gilded pills disguise an unpleasant medicine. The comparison states Burton's purpose: pleasure should make corrective reading acceptable, and the book should act upon the mind as a medicine acts upon the body.

[8180] Burton. Printed page 409, dagger: "In vita philosophus, in Epigram. amator, in Epistolis petulans, in præceptis severus." "A philosopher in his life, a lover in his epigrams, licentious in his letters, strict in his precepts."

[8181] Editor. "Maudarensis" means Apuleius of Madaura. The passage occurs in the prose postscript to Ausonius' Cento Nuptialis; the early printed text consulted, page 130, likewise carries the Caerellia clause on from Apuleius. Burton's wording is retained; his exact source edition remains to be collated. Fescennine verses and Atellan farces are forms of Roman comic entertainment. Lætam materiam means "cheerful material." The printed name Amnianus is retained pending collation.

[8182] Editor. Catullus 16.5–7. Burton quotes only part of the argument; the following line in Catullus continues the condition. The passage distinguishes the poet's conduct from the character of his verses.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 409–410 I am of Catullus opinion, and make the same Apologie in mine own behalf; Hoc etiam quod scribo, pendet plerumq; ex aliorum sententia & authoritate; nec ipse forsan insanio, sed insanientes sequor. Atqui detur hoc insanire me; Semel insanivimus omnes, & tute ipse opinor insanis aliquando, & is, & ille, & ego, scilicet Homo sum, humani à me nihil alienum puto:	I agree with Catullus and make the same defence on my own behalf: "What I write here also depends largely on the opinions and authority of others; perhaps I am not mad myself but follow those who are. Yet grant that I am mad in this: we have all been mad at one time; and you yourself, I think, are sometimes mad, as are this man, that man and I." For, of course, "I am human; I consider nothing human foreign to me."[8183]
Source page 410 And which he urgeth for himself, accused of the like fault, I as justly plead,	What another urges in his defence when accused of the same fault, I can plead with equal justice:
[8184]Lasciva est nobis pagina, vita proba est, Howsoever my lines erre, my life is honest, [8185]Vita verecunda est, musa jocosa mihi.	My page is licentious; my life is upright. However my lines go astray, my life is honest. My life is modest; my muse is playful.[8186]
But I presume I need no such Apologies, I need not as Socrates in Plato, cover his face when he spake of love, or blush and hide mine eyes, as [8187]Pallas did in her hood, when she was consulted by Jupiter about Mercuries marriage, quod super nuptiis virgo consulitur, it is no such lascivious, obscene or wanton discourse;	But I presume I need no such defences. I need not cover my face, as Socrates did in Plato when he spoke of love, or blush and hide my eyes under a hood as Pallas did when Jupiter consulted her about Mercury's marriage, "because a virgin is consulted about a wedding." This is no licentious, obscene or wanton discussion.[8188]

[8183] Editor. The final maxim is Terence, Heauton Timorumenos 77. "Madness" here is Burton's comic defence of writing about love. The exact source of the preceding Latin prose and the proverb about everyone having been mad remains for collation.

[8184] Burton. Printed page 410, n: "Mart." Martial.

[8185] Burton. Printed page 410, dagger: "Ovid." Ovid.

[8186] Editor. The Latin lines are Martial 1.4.8 and Ovid, Tristia 2.354. Burton's English line paraphrases Martial and is retained as a separate line between the two Latin quotations in modern form.

[8187] Burton. Printed page 410, asterisk, lower margin; no visible body anchor: "Martianus Capella lib. 1. de nupt. philol. virginali suffusa rubore oculos peplo obnubens, &c." Martianus Capella, book 1, On the Marriage of Philology: "Suffused with a maiden's blush, veiling her eyes with her robe," and so on. Placed with the Pallas passage.

[8188] Editor. Socrates covers his head in Plato, Phaedrus 237a. Pallas is Athena; the second scene is attributed in the lower margin to Martianus Capella. "Because a virgin is consulted about a wedding" explains her embarrassment. The lower marginal reference is attached here because its printed body anchor is not visible.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I have not offended your chaster ears with any thing that is here written, as many French and Italian Authors in their modern language of late have done, nay some of our Latine pontificall writers, Zanches, Asorius, Abulensis, Burchardus, &c. whom [8189]Rivet accuseth to be more lascivious then Virgil in Priapeiis, Petronius in Catalectis, Aristophanes in Lycistrata, Martialis, or any other Pagan prophane writer, qui tam atrociter ([8190]one notes) hoc genere peccarunt ut multa ingeniosissimè scripta obscænitatum gratia castæ mentes abhorreant.	Nothing written here has offended your more modest ears, as many French and Italian authors have lately done in their vernaculars, and even some of our Latin writers on the papal side—Zanches, Asorius, Abulensis, Burchardus and others. Rivet accuses them of being more licentious than Virgil in the Priapeia, Petronius in the Catalecta, Aristophanes in Lysistrata, Martial, or any other pagan, secular writer, “who,” as someone observes, “have offended so grievously in this way that chaste minds recoil from many brilliantly written works because of their obscenities.”[8191]

[8189] Burton. Printed page 410, asterisk: “Isago. ad Sac. scrip. cap. 13.” Introduction to Holy Scripture, chapter 13.

[8190] Burton. Printed page 410, asterisk: “Barthius notis in Cælestinam, ludum Hisp.” Barth, notes on Celestina, a Spanish play.

[8191] Editor. “Pontifical” marks Burton’s polemical reference to Roman Catholic writers; Rivet is the authority he invokes for the accusation. The title forms and author attributions—including Virgil and the Priapeia—are Burton’s, not modern bibliographical endorsements. The individual names and Rivet and Barth references remain for full collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis not scurrile this, but chast, honest, most part serious, and even of religion it self. [8192]Incensed (as he said) with the love of finding love, we have sought it, and found it. More yet, I have augmented and added something to this light Treatise (if light) which was not in the former Editions, I am not ashamed to confess it, with a good [8193]Author, quod extendi & locupletari hoc subjectum pleriq; postulabant, & eorum importunitate victus, animum utcunq; renitentem eò adegi, ut jam sexta vice calamum in manum sumerem, scriptioniq; longè & à studiis & professione meâ alienæ me accingerem, horas aliquas à seriis meis occupationibus interim suffuratus, easq; veluti ludo cuidam ac recreationi destinans;	This is no coarse abuse, but a chaste, honourable and mostly serious work, even treating religion itself. "Fired," as he said, "by the love of finding love, we have sought it and found it." Moreover, I have enlarged this light treatise—if it is light—and added things absent from earlier editions. I am not ashamed to admit, with a good author, "that many people asked for this subject to be expanded and enriched. Overcome by their insistence, I forced my somewhat reluctant mind to take up the pen now for the sixth time and undertake writing far removed from my studies and profession, meanwhile stealing a few hours from my serious occupations and setting them aside for a kind of play and recreation."[8194]
[8195]Cogor ——— retrorsum Vela dare, atq; iterare cursus Olim relictos ———	I am compelled to turn back, Set sail again and retrace courses Long since abandoned.[8196]
Etsi non ignorarem novos fortasse detractores novis hisce interpolationibus meis minimè defuturos.	"Although I knew very well that these new additions of mine would perhaps bring no shortage of new detractors."

[8192] Burton. Printed page 410, o: "Ficinus Comment. c. 17. Amore incensi inveniendi amoris, amorem quæsivimus et invenimus." Ficino, Commentary, chapter 17: "Fired by the love of finding love, we sought love and found it."

[8193] Burton. Printed page 410, dagger: "Author Cælestinæ Barth. interprete." The author of Celestina, with Barth as translator.

[8194] Editor. "Incensed" means inspired, not angered. Burton cites Ficino, then Celestina through Barth's Latin translation. USTC 2135281 records Fernando de Rojas's Pornoboscodidascalus Latinus, translated by Kaspar von Barth, Frankfurt 1624. This identifies the edition, not the exact borrowed passage. The claim that the pen is taken up for the sixth time remains within Burton's defence; its adaptation and the Ficino wording require collation.

[8195] Burton. Printed page 410, dagger: "Hor. lib. 1. Ode 34." Horace, Odes 1.34.

[8196] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.34.3–5. Burton rearranges the phrasing and adds olim, "long ago." The original sailing metaphor becomes a figure for returning to writing. "Interpolations" in the next sentence means additions, without the modern implication of textual falsification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And thus much I have thought good to say by way of preface, lest any man (which [8197]Godfridus feared in his book) should blame in me lightness, wantonness, rashness, in speaking of loves causes, entisements, symptomes, remedies, lawfull and unlawfull loves, and lust it self, [8198]I speak it only to tax and deter others from it, not to teach, but to shew the vanities and fopperies of this heroicall or Herculean love, and to apply remedies unto it. I will treat of this with like liberty as of the rest.	This much I thought fit to say by way of preface, lest anyone accuse me—as Godfridus feared in his book—of frivolity, wantonness or rashness in discussing love's causes, enticements, symptoms and remedies, lawful and unlawful loves, and lust itself. "I speak of it only to censure it and deter others from it, not to teach it": to expose the vanities and follies of this heroic or Herculean love and "apply remedies to it." I will treat this subject as freely as the rest.[8199]
[8200]Sed dicam vobis, vos porrò dicite multis Millibus, & facite hæc charta loquatur anus.	But I shall tell you; you in turn tell many Thousands, and make this page speak in its old age.[8201]

[8197] Burton. Printed page 410, p: "Hæc prædixi ne quis temerè nos putaret scripsisse de amorum lenociniis, de praxi, fornicationibus, adulteriis, &c." "I said this beforehand so that no one should rashly suppose that we wrote about love's enticements, its practice, fornications, adulteries, and so forth."

[8198] Burton. Printed page 410, q, with its lower-page continuation: "Taxando & ab his deterrendo humanam lasciviam & insaniam, sed & remedia docendo: non igitur candidus lector nobis succenseat, &c. Commonitio erit juvenibus hæc, hisce ut abstineant magis, & omissa lascivia quæ homines reddit insanos, virtutis incumbant studiis (Æneas Sylv.) & curam amoris si quis nescit hinc poterit scire." "By censuring human lust and madness and deterring people from these things, and also by teaching remedies: therefore let the fair-minded reader not be angry with us, and so on. This will warn young people to abstain from them more firmly and, abandoning the lust that makes people mad, devote themselves to the pursuit of virtue" (Aeneas Sylvius). "And anyone who does not know love's cure will be able to learn it here." The print has curam, "care" or "cure," in the final clause.

[8199] Editor. "Tax" means censure. "Heroical" names passionate love; "Herculean" gives it a playfully enormous strength. The marginal extracts combine a defence attributed to Godfridus with material attributed to Aeneas Sylvius. Their exact bibliographical links remain for collation.

[8200] Burton. Printed page 410, dagger, lower margin: "Catullus." Catullus.

[8201] Editor. Catullus 68.45–46. The page is imagined as an old woman still speaking in years to come: Burton asks readers to carry his words to others.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 410–411 Condemn me not good Reader then, or censure me hardly, if some part of this Treatise to thy thinking as yet be too light, but consider better of it; Omnia munda mundis, [8202]a naked man to a modest woman is no otherwise then a picture, as Augusta Livia truly said, and [8203]mala mens, malus animus, 'tis as 'tis taken.	Do not condemn me, then, good reader, or judge me harshly if you still think some part of this treatise too frivolous; consider it more carefully. "To the pure all things are pure." A naked man is no different from a picture to a modest woman, as the empress Livia rightly said. And "an evil mind, an evil disposition": it depends on how one takes it.[8204]
Source page 411 If in thy censure it be too light, I advise thee as Lipsius did his reader for some places of Plautus, Istos quasi Sirenum scopulos prætervehare, if they like thee not, let them pass, or oppose that which is good to that which is bad, and reject not therefore all. For to invert that verse of Martial, and with Hierom Wolfius to apply it to my present purpose,	If you judge it too frivolous, I advise you as Lipsius advised his reader about certain passages in Plautus: "Sail past these as though they were the Sirens' rocks." If they do not please you, pass them by; or set the good against the bad, and do not reject everything on that account. For, reversing Martial's verse and applying it with Hieronymus Wolf to my present purpose:
Sunt mala, sunt quædam mediocria, sunt bona plura;	Some things are bad, some middling, but more are good.[8205]

[8202] Burton. Printed page 410, o, lower margin: "Viros nudos castæ fœminæ nihil à statuis distare." "For a chaste woman, naked men differ in no way from statues."

[8203] Burton. Printed page 410, asterisk, lower margin: "Hony Soyt qui maly pense." "Shame on whoever thinks evil of it."

[8204] Editor. Omnia munda mundis echoes Titus 1:15. Compare Cassius Dio 58.2.3a in the consulted Xiphilinus excerpt: Livia excuses naked men because a chaste woman sees them as statues. Burton's margin likewise says statues, but his English says a picture; both remain. His Latin intermediary is unestablished. The French maxim varies the Garter motto. The immediate source of mala mens, malus animus remains uncollated.

[8205] Editor. Burton explicitly reverses Martial 1.16.1: Martial has "some good" and "more bad"; Burton makes more of the book good. His following English summary does not repeat that numerical contrast; it is preserved separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some is good, some bad, some is indifferent. I say farther with him yet, I have inserted ([8206]levicula quædam & ridicula ascribere non sum gravatus, circumforanea quædam è theatris, è plateis, etiam è popinis) some things more homely, light, or comicall, litans Gratiis, &c. which I would request every man to interpret to the best, and as Julius Cæsar Scaliger besought Cardan (Si quid urbaniusculè lusum à nobis, per deos immortales te oro Hieronyme Cardane ne me malè capias.) I beseech thee good Reader, not to mistake me, or misconstrue what is here written;	Some is good, some bad, some neither. I say further with him that I have inserted—"I have not shrunk from adding some light and ridiculous things, some marketplace chatter from theatres, streets and even taverns"—some homelier, lighter or comic material, "making an offering to the Graces," and so on. I ask everyone to interpret it favourably. As Julius Caesar Scaliger begged Cardan, "If I have indulged in a little wit, I beg you by the immortal gods, Hieronymus Cardan, do not take me amiss," so I beg you, good reader, not to misunderstand me or misconstrue what is written here.[8207]
Per Musas & Charites, & omnia Poëtarum numina, benigne lector, oro te ne me malè capias. 'Tis a Comicall subject, in sober sadness I crave pardon of what is amiss, and desire thee to suspend thy judgement, wink at small faults, or to be silent at least; but if thou likest, speak well of it, and wish me good success.	"By the Muses and Graces, and all the poets' divinities, kindly reader, I beg you not to take me amiss." It is a comic subject; in all seriousness I ask pardon for what is wrong, and ask you to suspend judgement, overlook small faults or at least remain silent. But if you like it, speak well of it and wish me success.
Extremum hunc Arethusa mihi concede laborem.	Arethusa, grant me this final labour.[8208]

[8206] Burton. Printed page 411, asterisk: "Præf. Suid." Preface to Suidas.

[8207] Editor. Hieronymus Wolf is cited for the preface to Suidas. "Homely" means plain or familiar; "indifferent" means neither good nor bad. The Graces, Greek Charites, are divinities associated with beauty and charm. Exact references for Wolf, Lipsius and Scaliger remain for collation.

[8208] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 10.1. Arethusa is invoked as the pastoral poet's source of inspiration. Burton uses the opening of Virgil's last eclogue at the end of his preface.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I am resolved howsoever, velis, nolis, audacter stadium intrare, in the Olympicks, with those Æliensian Wrestlers in Philostratus, boldly to shew my self in this common Stage, and in this Trage-comedy of Love, to Act severall parts, some Satyrically, some Comically, some in a mixt Tone, as the subject I have in hand gives occasion, and present Scene shall require, or offer it self.	In any case, I am resolved, "whether you wish it or not, to enter the arena boldly," like those Elean wrestlers at the Olympic games in Philostratus: to show myself boldly on this public stage and play several parts in this tragicomedy of love, some satirically, some comically, some in a mixed tone, as my subject gives occasion and the scene before me requires or presents itself.[8209]

[8209] Editor. "Æliensian" is rendered Elean, referring to Elis and the Olympic games; the particular Philostratus passage remains to be established. "Sober sadness" in the preceding paragraph means sober seriousness. Burton ends the preface by describing his changing literary roles.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 2. Loves Beginning, Object, Definition, Division.	SUBSECTION 2 Love's origin, object, definition and divisions
Loves limits are ample and great, and a spatious walk it hath, beset with thorns, and for that cause, which [8210]Scaliger reprehends in Cardan, not lightly to be passed over. Least I incur the same censure, I will examine all the kinds of love, his nature, beginning, difference, objects, how it is honest or dishonest, a vertue or vice, a naturall passion or a disease, his power and effects, how far it extends:	"Love's territory is broad and vast, with a spacious path beset by thorns," and therefore, as Scaliger rebukes Cardan, "it must not be passed over lightly." To avoid the same criticism, I will examine every kind of love: its nature, origin, differences and objects; how it is honourable or dishonourable, a virtue or a vice, a natural passion or a disease; its power, its effects and how far it extends.[8211]
of which, although something hath been said in the first Partition, in those Sections of Perturbations (for love and hatred are the first and most common passions, from which all the rest arise, and are attendant, as [8212]Picolomineus holds, or as Nich. Caussinus, the primum mobile of all other affections, which carry them all about them) I will now more copiously dilate, through all his parts and severall branches, that so it may better appear what Love is, and how it varies with the objects, how in defect, or (which is most ordinary and common) immoderate, and in excess, causeth melancholy.	Although I said something about it in the First Partition, in the sections on the passions—for "love and hatred are the first and most common passions, from which all the rest arise and on which they attend," as Piccolomini holds; or, as Nicolas Caussin puts it, they are the first moving sphere of all the other affections, carrying them all around with them—I shall now discuss all its parts and branches more fully. In this way it may become clearer what love is, how it varies with its objects, and how its deficiency, or more commonly its immoderate excess, causes melancholy.[8213]

[8210] Burton. Printed page 411, r: "Exerc. 301. Campus amoris maximus & spinis obsitus, nec levissimo pede transvolandus." Exercise 301: "The field of love is vast and strewn with thorns, and must not be skimmed over with the lightest step."

[8211] Editor. "Object" means that towards which love is directed. "Honest" means morally honourable. The subsection begins an account broad enough to include natural attraction, affection, desire and love of God, not only erotic love.

[8212] Burton. Printed page 411, s: "Grad. 1. cap. 29. Ex Platone, primæ & communissimæ perturbationes ex quibus ceteræ oriuntur & earum sunt pedissequæ." Grade 1, chapter 29. From Plato: "The first and most common passions, from which the others arise and upon which they attend."

[8213] Editor. Primum mobile is the first moving sphere in the older astronomical model, imagined to carry the others around with it. Here the image makes love and hatred the movers of other passions. Piccolomini and Caussin supply the stated authorities; exact editions remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 411–412 Love universally taken, is defined to be a Desire, as a word of more ample signification: and though Leon Hebreus the most copious writer of this subject, in his third Dialogue make no difference, yet in his first he distinguisheth them again, and defines love by desire. [8214]Love is a voluntary affection, and desire to enjoy that which is good. [8215]Desire wisheth, Love enjoyes; the end of the one is the beginning of the other: that which we love is present; that which we desire is absent.	Love, taken in its broadest sense, is defined as desire, a word of wider meaning. Although Leone Ebreo, the most expansive writer on this subject, makes no distinction between them in his third Dialogue, in his first he distinguishes them again and defines love through desire: “Love is a voluntary affection and a desire to enjoy what is good.” “Desire wishes; love enjoys. The end of one is the beginning of the other: what we love is present; what we desire is absent.”[8216]
Source page 412 [8217]It is worth the labour, saith Plotinus, to consider well of Love, whether it be a God or a Divell, or passion of the minde, or partly God, partly Divell, partly passion. He concludes Love to participate of all three, to arise from desire of that which is beautifull and fair, and defines it to be an action of the mind desiring that which is good.	“It is worth the effort,” says Plotinus, to consider love carefully: “whether it is a god, a spirit, a passion of the mind, or partly god, partly spirit and partly passion.” He concludes that love shares in all three and arises from desire for what is beautiful and fair, and defines it as “an action of the mind desiring what is good.”[8218]

[8214] Burton. Printed page 411, t: “Amor est voluntarius affectus & desiderium re bona fruendi.” “Love is a voluntary affection and a desire to enjoy a good thing.”

[8215] Burton. Printed page 412, u: “Desiderium optantis, amor eorum quibus fruimur; amoris principium, desiderii finis, amatum adest.” “Desire belongs to one who wishes; love to the things we enjoy. The beginning of love is the end of desire: the beloved is present.”

[8216] Editor. Leone Ebreo is the author of the Dialogues of Love. Burton first treats desire as the wider term, then reports a distinction between wishing for an absent good and enjoying a present one; these formulations should not be forced into a single consistent definition.

[8217] Burton. Printed page 412, x: “Principio l. de amore. Operæ pretium est de amore considerare, utrum Deus, an Dæmon, an passio quædam animæ, an partim Deus, partim Dæmon, passio partim, &c. Amor est actus animi bonum desiderans.” At the beginning of the book On Love: “It is worth considering love: whether it is a god, a spirit, a certain passion of the soul, or partly god, partly spirit and partly passion, and so on. Love is an act of the mind desiring good.”

[8218] Editor. Plotinus, Enneads 3.5.1, opens with the alternatives of god, daemon and passion. Burton’s “Divell” translates daemon; “spirit” here preserves its ancient philosophical sense without implying an evil Christian devil. Burton’s subsequent conclusion remains his summary of Plotinus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8219]Plato calls it the great Divell, for its vehemency, and soveraignty over all other passions, and defines it an appetite, [8220]by which we desire some good to be present. Ficinus in his Comment addes the word Fair to this definition, Love is a desire of enjoying that which is good and fair.	Plato calls it "the great spirit" because of its force and mastery over all the other passions, and defines it as an appetite "by which we desire some good to be present." Ficino adds the word "fair" to this definition in his commentary: love is a desire to enjoy what is good and fair.[8221]
Austin dilates this common definition, and will have love to be a delectation of the heart, [8222]for something which we seek to win, or joy to have, coveting by desire, resting in joy. [8223]Scaliger Exerc. 301. taxeth these former definitions, and will not have love to be defined by Desire or Appetite: for when we enjoy the things we desire, there remaines no more appetite: as he defines it, Love is an affection by which we are either united to the thing we love, or perpetuate our union; which agrees in part with Leon Hebreus.	Augustine expands this common definition, taking love to be a delight of the heart "in something we seek to gain or rejoice to possess, reaching out in desire and resting in joy." Scaliger, in Exercise 301, criticizes these earlier definitions and refuses to define love through desire or appetite: "when we enjoy the things we desire, appetite no longer remains." He defines it instead as "an affection by which we are either united with what we love or maintain our union with it." This partly agrees with Leone Ebreo.[8224]

[8219] Burton. Printed page 412, y: "Magnus Dæmon, convivio." "A great spirit," in the Symposium.

[8220] Burton. Printed page 412, z: "Boni pulchriq; fruendi desiderium." "The desire to enjoy what is good and beautiful."

[8221] Editor. Plato's "great daemon" occurs in Symposium 202d–e. The margin's z includes both good and beautiful, although Burton says in the body that Ficino adds "fair." The discrepancy is retained. "Appetite" means an inclination or desire generally, not merely hunger.

[8222] Burton. Printed page 412, a: "Godefridus, l. 1. cap. 2. Amor est delectatio cordis, alicujus ad aliquid, propter aliquod desiderium in appetendo, & gaudium perfruendo per desiderium currens, requiescens per gaudium." Godefridus, book 1, chapter 2: "Love is a delight of someone's heart in something, through a certain desire in seeking and joy in enjoying, running through desire and resting through joy."

[8223] Burton. Printed page 412, b: "Non est amor desiderium aut appetitus ut ab omnibus hactenus traditum; nam cum potimur amata re, non manet appetitus; est igitur affectus quo cum re amata aut unimur, aut unionem perpetuamus." "Love is not desire or appetite, as everyone has hitherto taught; for when we possess the beloved thing, appetite does not remain. It is therefore an affection by which we are either united with the beloved thing or maintain that union."

[8224] Editor. The body names Augustine, while the margin cites Godefridus, book 1, chapter 2, for the definition. Both attributions are preserved. Scaliger's objection turns on whether love continues when desire has been satisfied; his alternative makes union central.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now this love varies as its object varies, which is alwayes Good, Amiable, Fair, Gracious, and Pleasant: [8225]All things desire that which is good, as we are taught in the Ethicks, or at least that which to them seems to be good; quid enim vis mali (as Austin well inferres) dic mihi? puto nihil in omnibus actionibus, thou wilt wish no harm I suppose, no ill in all thine actions, thoughts or desires, nihil mali vis;	This love varies as its object varies, and its object is always good, lovable, fair, graceful and pleasant. "All things desire what is good," as the Ethics teaches us, or at least what seems good to them. "For what bad thing do you want," as Augustine aptly asks, "tell me? Nothing, I think, in all your actions." You wish for no harm, I suppose, no evil in any of your actions, thoughts or desires: "you want nothing bad."[8226]
[8227]thou wilt not have bad corn, bad soil, a naughty tree, but all good; a good servant, a good horse, a good son, a good friend, a good neighbour, a good wife. From this goodness comes Beauty: from Beauty, Grace, and comeliness, which result as so many rayes from their good parts, make us to love, and so to covet it: for were it not pleasing and gracious in our eyes, we should not seek.	You do not want bad grain, bad soil or a worthless tree, but everything good: a good servant, a good horse, a good son, a good friend, a good neighbour, a good wife. From this goodness comes beauty; from beauty, grace and comeliness, which shine like so many rays from their good qualities and make us love and thus desire it. For if it did not seem pleasing and graceful to our eyes, we would not seek it.
[8228]No man loves (saith Aristotle 9. mor. cap. 5.) but he that was first delighted with comliness and beauty. As this fair object varies, so doth our love; for as Proclus holds, Omne pulchrum amabile, every fair thing is amiable, and what we love is fair and gratious in our eyes, or at least we do so apprehend and still esteem of it.	"No one loves," says Aristotle in book 9, chapter 5 of the Ethics, "unless first delighted by comeliness and beauty." As this fair object varies, so does our love; for, as Proclus holds, "everything beautiful is lovable." Every fair thing is lovable, and what we love is fair and graceful in our eyes, or at least that is how we perceive it and continue to regard it.[8229]

[8225] Burton. Printed page 412, c: "Omnia appetunt bonum." "All things seek the good."

[8226] Editor. The maxim about all things seeking good recalls Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 1.1. Burton includes apparent good as well as genuine good. Augustine's precise passage remains to be established; the claim here describes the intended object of desire, not a claim that every action is morally good.

[8227] Burton. Printed page 412, dagger, lower margin: "Terram non vis malam, malam segetem, sed bonam arborem, equum bonum, &c." "You do not want bad land or a bad crop, but a good tree, a good horse, and so on."

[8228] Burton. Printed page 412, d, lower margin: "Nemo amore capitur nisi qui fuerit ante formæ specieq; delectatus." "No one is seized by love unless first delighted by beauty and appearance."

[8229] Editor. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 9.5, distinguishes goodwill from love and describes delight in someone's appearance as love's beginning. Burton's Latin and English compress that argument. "Amiable" throughout this discussion means worthy of love or lovable.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8230]Amiableness is the object of love, the scope and end is to obtain it, for whose sake we love, and which our minde covets to enjoy. And it seems to us especially fair and good, for good, fair, and unity, cannot be separated. Beauty shines, Plato saith, and by reason of its splendor and shining causeth admiration: and the fairer the object is, the more eagerly it is sought.	"Loveliness is the object of love; its aim and end is to obtain that for whose sake we love and which our mind longs to enjoy." It seems especially fair and good to us, for goodness, beauty and unity cannot be separated. Beauty shines, Plato says, and its splendour and radiance cause wonder; the fairer the object, the more eagerly it is sought.
For as the same Plato defines it, [8231]Beauty is a lively shining or glittering brightness, resulting from effused good, by ideas, seeds, reasons, shadowes, stirring up our minds, that by this good they may be united and made one.	For, as Plato himself defines it, "Beauty is a living radiance or glittering brightness flowing from goodness poured forth through ideas, seeds, formative principles and shadows, stirring our minds so that through this goodness they may be united and made one."[8232]

[8230] Burton. Printed page 412, e, lower margin: "Amabile objectum amoris & scopus, cujus adeptio est finis, cujus gratia amamus. Animus enim aspirat ut eo fruatur, & formam boni habet & præcipuè videtur & placet. Picolomineus, grad. 7. cap. 2. & grad. 8. cap. 35." "The lovable is love's object and aim; gaining it is the end for whose sake we love. For the mind aspires to enjoy it, and it has the appearance of goodness, is especially seen and pleases." Piccolomini, grade 7, chapter 2, and grade 8, chapter 35. The compressed syntax of the final clause is retained.

[8231] Burton. Printed page 412, f, lower margin: "Forma est vitalis fulgor ex ipso bono manans per ideas, semina, rationes, umbras effusus, animos excitans ut per bonum in unum redigantur." "Beauty is a living radiance flowing from goodness itself, poured forth through ideas, seeds, formative principles and shadows, rousing minds so that through goodness they may be brought into one."

[8232] Editor. "Reasons" renders rationes, formative or intelligible principles, rather than reasons offered in an argument. The vocabulary of ideas, seeds, radiance and union belongs to Burton's Platonist account. The exact intermediary for this attribution to Plato remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 412–413 Others will have beauty to be the perfection of the whole composition, [8233]caused out of the congruous symmetry, measure, order and manner of parts, and that comeliness which proceeds from this beauty is called grace, and from thence all fair things are gratious. For grace and beauty are so wonderfully annexed, [8234]so sweetly and gently win our souls, and strongly allure, that they confound our judgement and cannot be distinguished. Beauty and Grace are like those beams and shinings that come from the glorious and divine Sun, which are diverse, as they proceed from the diverse objects, to please and affect our severall senses;	Others take beauty to be the perfection of the whole composition, “arising from the harmonious symmetry, measure, order and arrangement of its parts. The comeliness that proceeds from this beauty is called grace, and hence all fair things are graceful.” Grace and beauty are so wonderfully joined, “so sweetly and gently win our souls, and attract them so powerfully, that they confound our judgement and cannot be distinguished. Beauty and grace are like the beams and radiance of the glorious, divine sun.” They differ as they proceed from different objects to please and affect our several senses.[8235]

[8233] Burton. Printed page 412, g, lower margin: “Pulchritudo est perfectio compositi ex congruente ordine, mensura & ratione partium consurgens, & venustas inde prodiens gratia dicitur & res omnes pulchræ gratiosæ.” “Beauty is the perfection of a composite whole, arising from the fitting order, measure and proportion of its parts; the comeliness proceeding from it is called grace, and all beautiful things are graceful.”

[8234] Burton. Printed page 413, h: “Gratia & pulchritudo ita suaviter animos demulcent, ita vehementer alliciunt, & admirabiliter connectuntur, ut in unum confundantur & distingui non possunt, & sunt tanquam radii & splendores divini solis in rebus variis vario modo fulgentes.” “Grace and beauty soothe minds so sweetly, attract them so powerfully and are so wonderfully joined that they blend into one and cannot be distinguished; they are like rays and splendours of the divine sun, shining differently in different things.”

[8235] Editor. “Grace” here means an attractive comeliness or charm; it need not mean divine saving grace. The first account emphasizes goodness radiating outward, the second the proportion of parts. Burton places these explanations beside one another.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 413 [8236]As the species of beauty are taken at our eyes, ears, or conceived in our inner soul, as Plato disputes at large in his Dialogue de pulchro, Phædro, Hyppias, and after many sophisticall errours confuted, concludes that beauty is a grace in all things, delighting the eyes, ears, and soul it self; so that as Valesius infers hence, whatsoever pleaseth our ears, eys, and soul, must needs be beautifull, fair, and delightfome to us.	"Forms of beauty are received through our eyes and ears, or conceived within our soul," as Plato discusses at length in his dialogue On Beauty, in Phaedrus and Hippias. After refuting many sophistical errors, he concludes that beauty is a grace in all things, delighting the eyes, ears and soul itself. Thus, as Valesius infers, whatever pleases our ears, eyes and soul must be beautiful, fair and delightful to us.[8237]
[8238]And nothing can more please our ears then musick, or pacifie our minds. Fair houses, pictures, orchards, gardens, fields, a fair Hawk, a fair horse is most acceptable unto us; whatsoever pleaseth our eys and ears, we call beautifull and fair; [8239]Pleasure belongeth to the rest of the senses, but grace and Beauty to these two alone. As the objects vary and are diverse, so they diversly affect our eys, ears, and soul it self.	"Nothing can please our ears or soothe our minds more than music." Fine houses, pictures, orchards, gardens and fields, a fine hawk or a fine horse are most welcome to us. Whatever pleases our eyes and ears we call beautiful and fair. "Pleasure belongs to the other senses, but grace and beauty to these two alone." As the objects vary and differ, so they affect our eyes, ears and soul itself in different ways.

[8236] Burton. Printed page 413, i: "Species pulchritudinis hauriuntur oculis, auribus, aut concipiuntur interna mente." "Forms of beauty are received through the eyes and ears, or conceived within the mind."

[8237] Editor. "Species" means perceptible forms or appearances. Burton groups Platonic titles loosely. His positive definition should not be read as an exact conclusion of Hippias Major, which ends at 304c–e with Socrates still unable to define beauty. The formulation mediated through Valesius remains to be traced.

[8238] Burton. Printed page 413, k: "Nihil hinc magis animos conciliat quàm musica, pulchræ picturæ, ædes &c." "Nothing, then, wins over minds more than music, beautiful pictures, buildings and so on."

[8239] Burton. Printed page 413, l: "In reliquis sensibus voluptas, in his pulchritudo & gratia." "In the other senses there is pleasure; in these, beauty and grace."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Which gives occasion to some, to make so many severall kindes of love as there be objects: One beauty ariseth from God, of which and divine love [8240]S. Dionysius with many Fathers and Neotericks, have written just volumes, De amore Dei, as they term it, many parænetical discourses; another from his creatures; there is a beauty of the body, a beauty of the soul, a beauty from vertue, formam martyrum Austin calls it, quam videmus oculis animi, which we see with the eys of our minde, which beauty, as Tully saith, if we could discern with these corporeal eyes, admirabiles sui amores excitaret, would cause admirable affections, and ravish our souls.	This leads some to distinguish as many kinds of love as there are objects. One beauty arises from God; on this and on divine love Saint Dionysius, many Church Fathers and more recent writers have written whole volumes—On the Love of God, as they call them—and many works of exhortation. Another arises from his creatures. There is beauty of the body, beauty of the soul and beauty arising from virtue, "the beauty of the martyrs," Augustine calls it, "which we see with the eyes of the mind": which we see with our mind's eyes. This beauty, Cicero says, if we could perceive it with our bodily eyes, "would awaken wondrous love for itself": it would arouse wonderful affections and transport our souls.[8241]
This other beauty which ariseth from those extreme parts, and graces which proceed from gestures, speeches, severall motions, and proportions of creatures, men and women (especially from women, which made those old Poets put the three Graces still in Venus company, as attending on her, and holding up her train) are infinite almost, and vary their names with their objects, as love of mony, covetousness, love of Beauty, Lust, immoderate desire of any pleasure, concupiscence, friendship, love, good will, &c. and is either vertue or vice, honest, dishonest, in excesse, defect, as shall be shewed in his place: Heroicall love, Religious love, &c.	This other beauty, arising from outward parts, and the graces proceeding from the gestures, speech, various movements and proportions of creatures, of men and women—especially women, which made the ancient poets always place the three Graces in Venus's company, attending her and holding up her train—are almost infinite. The loves they arouse take different names from their objects: love of money, covetousness; love of beauty, lust; immoderate desire for any pleasure, concupiscence; friendship, love, goodwill, and so on. Love is either virtue or vice, honourable or dishonourable, excessive or deficient, as will be shown in its place: heroic love, religious love, and so forth.[8242]

[8240] Burton. Printed page 413, dagger, unanchored in the body: "Lib. 4. de divinis." Book 4, On Divine Things. Placed here with Dionysius, whose discussion of beauty and love is in chapter 4 of The Divine Names.

[8241] Editor. "Neotericks" means recent writers; "parænetical" means exhortatory. The unanchored locator is placed with Dionysius, The Divine Names 4. Cicero, On Duties 1.15, invoking Plato, describes love awakened by visible moral beauty; Burton's differing Latin and English remain. Augustine, Exposition of Psalm 64.8, compares inward beauty with the martyrs' bodily suffering. This is a contextual parallel, not an exact match for Burton's compressed phrase; see Block 110.

[8242] Editor. "Extreme parts" means outward or external parts. "Concupiscence" means strong desire, often sexual desire. The syntax moves from beauty and its graces to the kinds of love they inspire; the modern version makes that transition explicit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
which may be reduced to a twofold division, according to the principall parts which are affected, the Braine and Liver: Amor & amicitia, which Scaliger exercitat. 301. Valesius and Melancthon warrant out of [8243]Plato φιλεῖν & ἐρᾶν from that speech of Pausanias belike, that makes two Veneres and two loves.	These may be reduced to two divisions according to the principal organs affected, the brain and liver: "love and friendship." Scaliger in Exercise 301, Valesius and Melanchthon support this distinction from Plato's "to love as a friend" and "to love erotically," presumably from Pausanias's speech, which makes two Venuses and two loves.[8244]
[8245]One Venus is ancient without a mother, and descended from heaven, whom we call cælestiall; The younger, begotten of Jupiter and Dione, whom commonly we call Venus. Ficinus in his comment upon this place cap. 8. following Plato, calls these two loves, two Divels, [8246]or good and bad Angels according to us, which are still hovering about our souls.	"One Venus is ancient, without a mother, and descended from heaven; we call her celestial. The younger was begotten by Jupiter and Dione, and is the one we commonly call Venus." Ficino, commenting on this passage in chapter 8 and following Plato, calls these two loves two spirits—or, in our terms, good and bad angels—continually hovering about our souls.[8247]

[8243] Burton. Printed page 413, unmarked citation: "Convivio Platonis." In Plato's Symposium. Placed with the following reference to Pausanias's speech.

[8244] Editor. Burton associates love with bodily organs under the older account of the faculties. The Greek verbs distinguish affection or friendship from erotic love. Pausanias's account of two Aphrodites and two loves is in Plato, Symposium 180d–181c; Burton uses the Roman name Venus.

[8245] Burton. Printed page 413, m, with lower-page continuation: "Duæ Veneres duo amores; quarum una antiquior & sine matre, cœlo nata, quam cœlestem Venerem nuncupamus; altera vero Junior à Jove & Dione prognata, quam vulgarem Venerem vocamus." "Two Venuses, two loves: one is older and without a mother, born of heaven, whom we call Heavenly Venus; the younger was born of Jupiter and Dione, whom we call Common Venus."

[8246] Burton. Printed page 413, n, lower margin: "Alter ad superna erigit, alter deprimit ad inferna." "One raises us to the heights; the other casts us into the depths." The printed n anchor precedes the phrase about angels, although its sense belongs with the next sentence.

[8247] Editor. The first Venus is described as motherless, born from Heaven; the second as the daughter of Jupiter and Dione. The Latin margin calls the second "Common Venus," while Burton's English says she is commonly called Venus. Both formulations are preserved. "Spirits" continues the philosophical sense of daemons, which Burton then compares to good and bad angels.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 413–414 [8248]The one rears to heaven, the other depresseth us to hell; the one good, which stirs us up to the contemplation of that divine beauty, for whose sake we perform Justice, and all godly offices, study Philosophy, &c. the other base, and though bad, yet to be respected; for indeed both are good in their own natures: procreation of children is as necessary as that finding out of truth, but therefore called bad, because it is abused, and withdrawes our soul from the speculation of that other, to viler objects; So far Ficinus.	"One raises us to heaven; the other casts us down to hell. The good one stirs us to contemplate that divine beauty for whose sake we practise justice, perform all godly duties and study philosophy. The other is lower and, though bad, still deserves regard; for in fact both are good in their own natures. Begetting children is as necessary as discovering truth. It is called bad because it is misused and draws our soul away from contemplation of the other towards baser objects." So far Ficino.
Source page 414 S. Austin lib. 15. de civ. Dei & sup. Psal. 64. hath delivered as much in effect. [8249]Every creature is good, and may be loved well or ill: And [8250]Two cities make two loves, Jerusalem and Babylon, the love of God the one, the love of the world the other; of these two cities we all are Citizens, as by examination of our selves we may soon finde, and of which: The one love is the root of all mischief, the other of all good.	Saint Augustine, in book 15 of The City of God and his exposition of Psalm 64, says much the same. "Every creature is good, and may be loved well or badly." And "two cities make two loves: Jerusalem and Babylon, one the love of God, the other the love of the world. We all belong to one of these two cities, and by examining ourselves we may soon discover which." One love is the root of all evil, the other of all good.[8251]

[8248] Burton. Printed page 413, o, with lower-page continuation: "Alter excitat hominem ad divinam pulchritudinem lustrandam, cujus causa philosophiæ studia & justitiæ &c." "One stirs a person to contemplate divine beauty, for whose sake there are the studies of philosophy and justice, and so on."

[8249] Burton. Printed page 414, p: "Omnis creatura cum bona sit, & bene amari potest & male." "Since every creature is good, it can be loved both well and badly."

[8250] Burton. Printed page 414, q: "Duas civitates duo faciunt amores; Jerusalem facit amor Dei, Babylonem amor sæculi; unusquisq; se quid amet interroget, & inveniet unde sit civis." "Two loves make two cities: love of God makes Jerusalem; love of the world makes Babylon. Let each person ask himself what he loves, and he will discover which city he belongs to."

[8251] Editor. The body reverses the relationship given in the margin: "two cities make two loves" versus "two loves make two cities." This difference is preserved. The text presents moral assessment as a question of the object and manner of loving, not simply whether love exists.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So in his 15 cap. lib. de amor. Ecclesiæ, he will have those four cardinall vertues to be naught else but love rightly composed; in his 15, book de civ. Dei cap. 22. he calls vertue the order of Love, whom Thomas following 1. part. 2. quæst. 55. art. 1. and quæst. 56. 3. quæst. 62. art. 2. confirmes as much, and amplifies in many words.	Likewise, in chapter 15 of his book On the Love of the Church, he takes the four cardinal virtues to be nothing but love rightly ordered. In The City of God, book 15, chapter 22, he calls virtue the order of love. Thomas follows him in the First Part of the Second Part, question 55, article 1; question 56, article 3; and question 62, article 2, confirming and explaining this at length.[8252]
[8253]Lucian to the same purpose hath a division of his own, one love was born in the sea, which is as various and raging in young mens brests as the sea it self, and causeth burning lust: the other is that golden chain which was let down from heaven, and with a divine Fury ravisheth our souls, made to the image of God, and stirs us up to comprehend the innate and incorruptible beauty, to which we were once created. Beroaldus hath expressed all this in an Epigram of his:	Lucian makes a similar division of his own: "One love was born in the sea, and is as changeable and raging in young men's hearts as the sea itself, causing burning lust. The other is that golden chain let down from heaven, which with divine rapture transports our souls, made in God's image, and stirs us to comprehend the innate and incorruptible beauty in which we were originally created." Beroaldus expresses all this in one of his epigrams:[8254]

[8252] Editor. The four cardinal virtues are prudence, justice, courage and temperance. The printed title de amor. Ecclesiæ appears to point to Augustine's On the Morals of the Catholic Church 15.25, which treats the four virtues as forms of love; its title form is retained in the original and translated literally here. The City of God 15.22 does define virtue as the order of love. Thomas is Thomas Aquinas; Burton's compressed references to the Summa require full collation.

[8253] Burton. Printed page 414, r: "Alter mari ortus, ferox, varius, fluctuans, inanis, juvenum, mare referens, &c. Alter aurea catena cœlo demissa bonum furorem mentibus mittens, &c." "One, born of the sea, fierce, changeable, fluctuating, empty, belonging to the young, resembling the sea, and so on. The other, a golden chain let down from heaven, sending a good madness into minds, and so on."

[8254] Editor. "Divine fury" means inspired rapture. The passage mixes classical images with the Christian language of creation in God's image. The exact Lucian passage and the intermediary behind this wording remain unresolved; the attribution is Burton's.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Dogmata divini memorant si vera Plaontis, Sunt geminæ Veneres, & geminatus amor. Cælestis Venus est nullo generata parente, Quæ casto sanctos nectit amore viros. Altera sed Venus est totum vulgata per orbem, Quæ divûm mentes alligat, atq; hominum; Improba, seductrix, petulans, &c.	If the teachings of divine Plato tell the truth, There are twin Venuses, and love is doubled. The heavenly Venus was born of no parent; She binds holy men in chaste love. But the other Venus is spread throughout the world, Binding the minds of gods and mortals: Wicked, seductive, wanton, and so forth.[8255]
If divine Plato's Tenents they be true, Two Veneres, two Loves there be; The one from heaven, unbegotten still, Which knits our souls in unitie. The other famous over all the world, Binding the hearts of Gods and men; Dishonest, wanton, and seducing she, Rules whom she will, both where and when.	If divine Plato's teachings are true, There are two Venuses, two loves. One is from heaven, always unbegotten, And binds our souls in unity. The other, known throughout the world, Binds the hearts of gods and men. Wicked, wanton and seductive, She rules whom she will, wherever and whenever.
This twofold division of Love, Origen likewise followes in his Comment on the Canticles, one from God, the other from the Divell, as he holds, (understanding it in the worst sense) which many others repeat and imitate. Both which (to omit all subdivisions) in excesse or defect, as they are abused, or degenerate, cause melancholy in a particular kinde, as shall be shewed in his place.	Origen likewise follows this twofold division of love in his commentary on the Song of Songs: one comes from God, the other, he holds, from the Devil—taking the term in its worst sense. Many others repeat and follow this distinction. Both kinds, to omit all subdivisions, cause a particular kind of melancholy through excess or deficiency, when they are misused or degenerate, as will be shown in the appropriate place.[8256]

[8255] Editor. The Latin prints Plaontis for Platonis; the modern version gives the evident name Plato. Burton supplies an eight-line English rendering after the seven Latin lines, whose final "and so forth" marks an abbreviated quotation. Both versions are retained separately; the exact Beroaldus source remains for collation.

[8256] Editor. Canticles is the Song of Songs. Burton's qualification distinguishes the Devil from the non-evil philosophical daemon discussed earlier. Origen's exact wording and Burton's intermediary remain for collation; the twofold scheme is presented as Burton reports it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 414–415 Austin in another Tract, makes a threefold division of this love, which we may use well or ill: [8257]God, our neighbour, and the world: God above us, our neighbour next us, the world beneath us. In the course of our desires, God hath three things, the world one, our neighbour two. Our desire to God, is either from God, with God, or to God, and ordinarily so runs. From God, when it receives from him, whence, and for which it should love him: with God, when it contradicts his will in nothing: to God, when it seeks and rest it self in him.	In another treatise Augustine divides this love, which we may use well or badly, into three: "God, our neighbour and the world: God above us, our neighbour beside us, the world beneath us. In the course of our desires, God has three relations, the world one, our neighbour two. Our desire for God proceeds either from God, with God or towards God, and this is its proper course. It proceeds from God when it receives from him the means and reason for loving him; with God when it contradicts his will in nothing; towards God when it seeks and finds its rest in him."[8258]
Source page 415 Our Love to our neighbour may proceed from him, and run with him, not to him: From him, as when we rejoyce of his good safety, and well doing: with him, when we desire to have him a fellow and companion of our journey in the way of the Lord: not in him, because there is no aid, hope, or confidence in man.	"Our love for our neighbour may proceed from him and travel with him, but not towards him as its final end. From him, when we rejoice in his safety and well-being; with him, when we wish to have him as a fellow traveller and companion on the Lord's way; but not resting in him, because help, hope and trust are not to be placed in a human being."[8259]

[8257] Burton. Printed page 414, s: "Tria sunt, quæ amari à nobis bene vel male possunt; Deus, proximus, mundus; Deus supra nos; juxta nos proximus; infra nos mundus. Tria Deus, duo proximus, unum mundus habet, &c." "Three things can be loved by us well or badly: God, our neighbour and the world. God is above us, our neighbour beside us, the world beneath us. God has three, our neighbour two, the world one, and so on."

[8258] Editor. The parallel is De substantia dilectionis 5, transmitted under Augustine's name. Heidelberg's catalogue of Pal. lat. 193, item 15, identifies chapters 1–5 with Hugh of Saint Victor's Institutiones in Decalogum 4 (PL 176, 15A–18B). Burton's attribution remains as transmission evidence, not verified authorship. "Ordinarily" means in due order; the parallel has ordinate. The three, two and one describe the directions of love explained next.

[8259] Editor. The distinction concerns love's ultimate resting place, not a prohibition on helping or trusting neighbours in ordinary life. The source's from, with and towards express origin, companionship and final end. Burton shifts from "not to him" to "not in him"; the translation preserves the distinction while clarifying the argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
From the world our love comes, when we begin to admire the Creator in his works: and glorify God in his Creatures. With the world it should run, if according to the mutability of all temporalties, it should be dejected in adversity, or over elevated in prosperity: To the world, if it would settle it self in its vain delights and studies.	"Our love comes from the world when we begin to admire the Creator in his works and glorify God in his creatures. It would travel with the world if, following the changeability of all temporal things, it sank in adversity or rose too high in prosperity; towards the world, if it wished to settle in the world's empty pleasures and pursuits."[8260]
Many such Partitions of Love I could repeat, and Subdivisions, but least (which Scaliger objects to Cardan, Exercitat. 501.) [8261]I confound filthy burning lust, with pure and divine Love, I will follow that accurate Division of Leon Hebreus dial. 2. betwixt Sophia and Philo, where he speaks of Naturall, Sensible, and Rationall Love, and handleth each apart.	I could repeat many such divisions and subdivisions of love. But lest I "confuse filthy, burning lust with pure and divine love"—the objection Scaliger makes against Cardan in Exercise 501—I will follow Leone Ebreo's precise division in Dialogue 2, between Sophia and Philo, where he discusses natural, sentient and rational love, treating each separately.[8262]

[8260] Editor. "Should" is conditional here: love would move with worldly changes if it rose and fell with fortune. The parallel in De substantia dilectionis 5 explicitly permits love from the world, but not with or into it. "Temporalties" means passing, earthly things; "studies" means pursuits.

[8261] Burton. Printed page 415, t: "Ne confundam vesanos & fœdos amores beatis, sceleratum cum puro divino & vero, &c." "Lest I confuse mad and foul loves with blessed ones, wicked love with pure, divine and true love, and so on."

[8262] Editor. Leone Ebreo's speakers are Sophia and Philo. "Sensible" means capable of sensation, not prudent; it is rendered "sentient" to distinguish animal affection from natural attraction and rational love. The printed Scaliger locator is 501, although Burton elsewhere cites Exercise 301 for love; it is preserved pending collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Naturall love or hatred, is that Sympathy or Antipathy, which is to be seen in animate and inanimate creatures, in the four Elements, Mettals, Stones, gravia tendunt deorsum, as a Stone to his Center, Fire upward, and Rivers to the Sea. The Sun, Moon, and Stars go still round, [8263]Amantes naturæ debita exercere, for love of perfection. This love is manifest, I say, in inanimate creatures. How comes a load-stone to draw iron to it? jet chaff? the ground to covet showers, but for love? No creature S. Hierom concludes, is to be found, quod non aliquid amat, no stock, no stone, that hath not some feeling of love.	Natural love or hatred is the sympathy or antipathy seen in living and lifeless creatures, in the four elements, metals and stones: "heavy things tend downwards," as a stone towards its centre, fire upwards, and rivers towards the sea. The sun, moon and stars continually circle, "loving to fulfil the duties of their nature," for love of perfection. This love is evident, I say, in lifeless creatures. Why does a lodestone draw iron to itself, jet attract chaff, or the ground thirst for showers, except through love? No creature can be found, Saint Jerome concludes, "that does not love something": no tree trunk, no stone, that has not some feeling of love.[8264]

[8263] Burton. Printed page 415, dagger: "Fonseca cap. 1. Amor ex Augustini forsan lib. 11. de Civit. Dei. Amore inconcussus stat mundus, &c." Fonseca, chapter 1, Love; perhaps from Augustine, The City of God, book 11. "Through love the world stands unshaken," and so on. Burton's forsan means "perhaps."

[8264] Editor. "Sympathy" and "antipathy" mean natural attraction and repulsion. The four elements are earth, water, air and fire; heavy bodies are imagined as tending to their natural centre. Jet is a material traditionally credited with attracting light objects. These examples belong to the natural philosophy Burton is reporting. The exact Jerome and Fonseca references remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis more eminent in Plants, Hearbs, and is especially observed in vegetals; as betwixt the Vine and Elm a great Sympathy, betwixt the Vine and the Cabbage, betwixt the Vine and Olive, [8265]Virgo fugit Bromium, betwixt the Vine and Baies, a great antipathy, the Vine loves not the Bay, [8266]nor his smell, and will kill him, if he grow near him; the Bur and the Lintle cannot endure one another; the Olive and the [8267]Mirtle embrace each other, in roots and branches if they grow neer.	It is more evident in plants and herbs, and particularly observed in growing things: a great sympathy between vine and elm; a great antipathy between vine and cabbage, vine and olive—"the maiden flees Bromius"—and vine and bay. The vine does not love the bay "or its smell, and will kill it if it grows nearby." Burdock and lentil cannot endure one another; olive and myrtle embrace each other with roots and branches if they grow close together.[8268]
Read more of this in Picolomineus grad. 7. cap. 1. Crescentius lib. 5. de agric. Baptista Porta de mag. lib. 1. cap. de plant. odio & Element. sym. Fracastorius de sym & antip. of the love and hatred of Planets, consult with every Astrologer: Leon Hebreus gives many fabulous reasons, and moralizeth them withall.	Read more in Piccolomini, grade 7, chapter 1; Crescentius, On Agriculture, book 5; Giambattista della Porta, On Magic, book 1, in the chapter on the antipathy of plants and sympathy of elements; and Fracastoro, On Sympathy and Antipathy. On the love and hatred of planets, consult any astrologer. Leone Ebreo gives many explanations drawn from fables and supplies moral interpretations of them as well.[8269]

[8265] Burton. Printed page 415, u: "Alciat." Alciato.

[8266] Burton. Printed page 415, x: "Porta. Vitis laurum non amat, nec ejus odorem; si prope crescat, enecat. Lappus lenti adversatur." Porta: "The vine does not love the laurel or its smell; if it grows nearby, it kills it. Burdock is hostile to lentil." The direction of the killing is grammatically compressed; the body makes the vine its subject.

[8267] Burton. Printed page 415, y: "Sympathia olei & myrti ramorum & radicum se complectentium. Mizaldus secret. cent. 1. 47." "The sympathy of olive and myrtle, their branches and roots embracing one another." Mizaldus, Secrets, century 1, number 47. The printed olei is retained.

[8268] Editor. Burton uses love to explain reported relations among plants. Lintle is lentil, Mirtle is myrtle, and bur here is supported by the marginal Lappus, burdock. In Alciato's emblem The wise abstain from wine, the olive is Pallas's tree and Bromius is Bacchus: the maiden's avoidance of the wine god becomes an image of the olive's aversion to the vine. The Latin and Burton's botanical account are retained as given.

[8269] Editor. The cited authors combine accounts of natural affinities with allegory. "Fabulous" can mean derived from fables; "moralizeth" means giving a moral interpretation. Burton's abbreviated titles and locators are expanded only as far as their wording permits; exact editions remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sensible love, is that of brute beasts, of which, the same Leon Hebreus dial. 2. assigns these causes. First, for the pleasure they take in the Act of Generation, male and female love one another. Secondly, for the preservation of the species, and desire of yong brood. Thirdly, for the mutuall agreement, as being of the same kinde: Sus sui, Canis Cani, Bos Bovi, & Asinus Asino pulcherrimus videtur, as Epicharmus held, and according to that Adagy of Diogenianus,	Sentient love is the love of animals. The same Leone Ebreo, in Dialogue 2, assigns these causes to it. First, male and female love one another for the pleasure they take in mating. Second, for the preservation of their species and the desire for offspring. Third, because they agree in being of the same kind: "A pig seems most beautiful to a pig, a dog to a dog, an ox to an ox, and an ass to an ass," as Epicharmus held; and according to that proverb of Diogenianus:[8270]
Assidet usq; graculus apud graculum,	A jackdaw always sits beside a jackdaw.
they much delight in one anothers company,	They take great delight in one another's company:
[8271]Formica grata est formicæ, Cicada Cicadæ,	Ant is dear to ant, cicada to cicada.[8272]
Source page 415–416 and birds of a feather will gather together. Fourthly, for custome, use, and familiarity, as if a dog be trained up with a Lion and a Bear, contrary to their natures, they will love each other. Hawks, dogs, horses, love their masters and keepers: many stories I could relate in this kinde, but see Gillius de hist. anim. lib. 3. cap. 14. those two Epistles of Lipsius, of doggs and horses, Agellius, &c.	And birds of a feather will gather together. Fourth, through habit, use and familiarity: if a dog is raised with a lion and a bear, they will love one another despite their natures. Hawks, dogs and horses love their masters and keepers. I could relate many stories of this kind; but see Gillius, On the History of Animals, book 3, chapter 14; those two letters of Lipsius on dogs and horses; Aulus Gellius; and others.[8273]

[8270] Editor. "Generation" is reproduction. The Latin assertion makes each animal most beautiful to its own kind; it does not compare all the animals with one another. Epicharmus and Diogenianus are Burton's named authorities; their exact passages and the Latin intermediary remain for collation.

[8271] Burton. Printed page 415, o: "Theocritus. eidyll. 9." Theocritus, Idyll 9. The marker is printed o, though it interrupts the surrounding alphabetical sequence.

[8272] Editor. Theocritus, Idyll 9.31, pairs the same insects, in the reverse order from Burton's Latin. Cicada is retained rather than substituting a different familiar insect. The following English proverb is a separate part of Burton's prose.

[8273] Editor. "Trained up" means raised. Agellius is Aulus Gellius. Burton distinguishes learned familiarity from the nurturing relation in his fifth cause; the exact Gillius, Lipsius and Gellius passages remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 416 Fifthly, for bringing up, as if a Bitch bring up a Kid, a hen ducklings, an hedge-sparrow a Cuckow, &c.	Fifth, through nurturing, as when a bitch raises a kid, a hen ducklings, or a hedge sparrow a cuckoo, and so on.
The third kind is Amor cognitionis, as Leon calls it, Rationall Love, Intellectivus amor, and is proper to men, on which I must insist. This appears in God, Angels, Men. God is love it self, the fountain of Love, the Disciple of love, as Plato stiles him; the servant of peace, the God of love and Peace; have peace with all men, and God is with you.	The third kind is "love arising from knowledge," as Leone calls it: rational love, "intellectual love," which belongs properly to human beings and on which I must dwell. It appears in God, angels and human beings. God is love itself, the fountain of love, the disciple of love, as Plato calls him; the servant of peace, the God of love and peace. Be at peace with everyone, and God is with you.[8274]
———[8275]Quisquis veneratur olympum, Ipse sibi mundum subjicit atq; Deum:	Whoever reveres heaven Brings the world, and God himself, under his sway.[8276]
[8277]By this Love (saith Gerson) we purchase heaven, and buy the kingdom of God. This [8278]Love is either in the Trinity it self, for the Holy Ghost is the Love of the Father and the Son, &c. Joh. 3. 55. and 5. 20. and 14. 31. or towards us his creatures, as in making the world.	"Through this love," says Gerson, "we purchase heaven and buy the kingdom of God." This love is either within the Trinity itself—for the Holy Spirit is the love of the Father and the Son, and so on, John 3:55, 5:20 and 14:31—or directed towards us, his creatures, as in making the world.[8279]

[8274] Editor. Burton first calls rational love proper to human beings, then extends its discussion to God and angels; the sequence is retained. "Disciple of love" and "servant of peace" are also retained as printed; the precise Platonic passage and construction require collation. The language of God as love and of the God of love and peace recalls 1 John 4:8 and 2 Corinthians 13:11.

[8275] Burton. Printed page 416, z: "Mantuan." Mantuan.

[8276] Editor. Mantuan is the poet Battista Mantovano. The verse's bold claim that reverence brings even God under one's sway is preserved; the exact poem remains to be established.

[8277] Burton. Printed page 416, a: "Charitas munifica, qua mercamur de Deo regnum Dei." "Bountiful charity, by which we purchase from God the kingdom of God."

[8278] Burton. Printed page 416, b: "Polanus partit. Zanchius de natura Dei, c. 3. copiose de hoc amore Dei agit." Polanus, Partitions. Zanchius, On the Nature of God, chapter 3, treats this love of God extensively.

[8279] Editor. Charity here is love, not merely almsgiving; the buying metaphor belongs to the quoted theological account. John 3:55 is the printed reference, although that chapter has only 36 verses. John 3:35, on the Father's love for the Son, is the likely intended parallel; the error is retained in the modern column and identified here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Amor mundum fecit, Love built Cities, mundi anima, invented Arts, Sciences, and all [8280]good things, incites us to vertue and humanity, combines and quickens; keepes peace on earth, quietness by sea, mirth in the windes and elements, expells all fear, anger, and rusticity: Circulus a bono in bonum, a round circle still from good to good; for love is the beginner and end of all our actions, the efficient and instrumental cause, as our Poets in their Symbols, Impresses, [8281]Emblemes of rings, squares, &c. shadow unto us,	"Love made the world"; love built cities, is "the soul of the world," invented arts, sciences and all good things, urges us towards virtue and kindness, unites and gives life. It keeps peace on earth, calm at sea, joy in the winds and elements; drives out all fear, anger and uncouthness. "A circle from good to good": a circle constantly returning from goodness to goodness. For love is the beginning and end of all our actions, their efficient and instrumental cause, as our poets suggest through their symbols, devices and emblems of rings, squares and the like:[8282]
Si rerum quæris fuerit quis finis & ortus, Desine, nam causa est unica solus amor.	If you ask what was the end and origin of things, Stop: love alone is their one cause.
If first and last of any thing you wit, Cease; love's the sole and onely cause of it.	If you would know the first and last of anything, Stop: love is its sole and only cause.[8283]

[8280] Burton. Printed page 416, asterisk: "Nich. Bellus discurs. 28. de amatoribus, virtutem provocat, conservat pacem in terra, tranquillitatem in aëre, ventis lætitiam, &c." Nicholas Bellus, discourse 28, On Lovers: "It incites virtue, preserves peace on earth, tranquillity in the air, joy in the winds, and so on." The margin has air where the body has sea.

[8281] Burton. Printed page 416, dagger: "Camerarius Emb. 100. cen. 2." Camerarius, Emblems, century 2, emblem 100.

[8282] Editor. "Quickens" means gives life. An efficient cause produces an effect; an instrumental cause is its means. "Impresses" are symbolic devices. Compare Agathon's praise of love in Plato's Symposium, joining peace on earth, calm at sea, still winds and sleep. This is a parallel, not proof of Burton's immediate source. The margin's calm in the air differs from the body's sea; both remain. Bellus and Camerarius still require exact collation.

[8283] Editor. "Wit" is a verb meaning know. Burton's English couplet follows the Latin and is retained as a separate rendering; it is not silently replaced by the new translation of the Latin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Love, saith [8284]Leo, made the world, and afterwards in redeeming of it, God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten son for it, John 3. 16. Behold what love the Father hath shewed on us, that we should be called the sons of God. 1 John 3. 1. Or by his sweet providence, in protecting of it; either all in generall, or his Saints elect and Church in particular, whom he keeps as the apple of his eye, whom he loves freely, as Hosea 14. 5. speaks, and dearly respects, [8285]Charior est ipsis homo quam sibi.	Love, says Leone, made the world; and afterwards, in redeeming it, "God so loved the world that he gave his only-begotten Son for it," John 3:16. "See what love the Father has shown us, that we should be called the sons of God," 1 John 3:1. Or love appears in his gracious providence, protecting the world: either the whole of it generally, or his chosen saints and Church particularly. He keeps them as the apple of his eye, loves them freely, as Hosea 14:5 says, and holds them dear: "A human being is dearer to the gods than to himself."[8286]
Not that we are fair, nor for any merit or grace of ours, for we are most vile and base; but out of his incomparable love and goodness, out of his divine Nature. And this is that Homers golden chain, which reacheth down from Heaven to Earth, by which every creature is annexed, and depends on his Creator. He made all, saith [8287]Moses, and it was good, and he loves it as good.	Not because we are beautiful, nor for any merit or excellence of our own—for we are utterly vile and lowly—but from his incomparable love and goodness, from his divine nature. This is Homer's golden chain, reaching down from heaven to earth, by which every creature is linked to and depends upon its Creator. He made everything, says Moses, "and it was good"; and he loves it as good.[8288]

[8284] Burton. Printed page 416, c: "Dial. 3." Dialogue 3.

[8285] Burton. Printed page 416, d: "Juven." Juvenal.

[8286] Editor. Hosea 14:5 is Burton's locator; "I will love them freely" appears at 14:4 in the King James numbering consulted. The closing Latin is adapted from Juvenal 10.350: humans are dearer to the gods than to themselves. Its plural divine pronoun is translated explicitly, even within Burton's Christian account. His separate biblical quotations are retained.

[8287] Burton. Printed page 416, e: "Gen. 1." Genesis 1.

[8288] Editor. The golden chain alludes to Zeus's challenge in Homer, Iliad 8.18–27; Burton gives it a philosophical and Christian interpretation as the bond between Creator and creatures. Genesis 1 repeatedly describes the creation as good. The allegorical intermediary remains to be identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The love of Angels and living souls, is mutuall amongst themselves, towards us militant in the Church, and all such as love God; as the Sun beams irradiate the earth from those celestiall thrones, they by their well wishes reflect on us, [8289]in salute hominum promovenda alacres, & constantes administri, there is joy in heaven for every sinner that repenteth; they pray for us, are solicitous for our good, [8290]Casti genii.	Angels and living souls love one another, and also us who still struggle in the Church on earth, and everyone who loves God. As sunbeams shine upon the earth from those heavenly thrones, so their good wishes shine upon us: "eager and steadfast ministers in advancing human salvation." There is joy in heaven over every sinner who repents. They pray for us and care for our welfare, "pure spirits":[8291]
Ubi regnat charitas, suave desiderium, Lætitiaq; & amor Deo conjunctus.	Where charity reigns, sweet longing, And joy and love united with God.
Love proper to mortall men, is the third Member of this subdivision, and the subject of my following discourse.	Love belonging to mortal human beings is the third part of this subdivision, and the subject of the discussion that follows.

[8289] Burton. Printed page 416, dagger: "Caussinus." Caussin.

[8290] Burton. Printed page 416, f: "Theodoret è Plotino." Theodoret, from Plotinus.

[8291] Editor. The Church militant means believers still living and struggling on earth. The rejoicing over repentance recalls Luke 15:7 and 15:10. Casti genii means pure spirits; the margin attributes the passage to Theodoret drawing on Plotinus. Its precise wording and the following two lines remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 417 MEMB. 2. SUBSETC. 1. Love of men, which varies as his objects, profitable, pleasant, honest.	MEMBER 2 SUBSECTION 1 Human love, which varies with its objects: the useful, the pleasant and the honourable
Valesius lib. 3. contr. 13. defines this love which is in men, to be [8292]an affection of both powers, Appetite, and Reason. The rational resides in the Brain, the other in the Liver (as before hath been said out of Plato and others) the heart is diversly affected of both, and carried a thousand waies by consent. The sensitive faculty most part over-rules reason, the Soul is carried hood-winkt, and the understanding captive like a beast.	Valesius, in book 3, controversy 13, defines human love as "an affection of both faculties, appetite and reason." The rational faculty resides in the brain, the other in the liver, as has already been said on the authority of Plato and others. Both affect the heart in different ways and carry it in a thousand directions through their mutual connection. The sensitive faculty generally overrules reason; the soul is led blindfold, and the understanding is taken captive like an animal.[8293]
[8294]The heart is variously inclin'd, sometimes they are merry, sometimes sad, and from love arise Hope and Fear, Jealousie, Fury, Desperation. Now this love of men is divers, and varies, as the object varies, by which they are enticed, as vertue, wisdome, eloquence, profit, wealth, money, fame, honour, or comeliness of person, &c.	"The heart inclines in different directions: sometimes people are cheerful, sometimes sad; and from love arise hope and fear, jealousy, fury and despair." Human love thus takes different forms and varies with the object that attracts people: virtue, wisdom, eloquence, advantage, wealth, money, fame, honour or personal beauty, and so on.

[8292] Burton. Printed page 417, g: "Affectus nunc appetitivæ potentiæ, nunc rationalis, alter cerebro residet, alter hepate, corde, &c." "An affection now of the appetitive faculty, now of the rational; one resides in the brain, the other in the liver, heart, and so on." The body separately describes the heart as affected by both.

[8293] Editor. The placement of reason in the brain and appetite in the liver belongs to the inherited account of the faculties. "Consent" means their mutual sympathy or connection. The margin's compressed reference to the heart differs from the body's explanation. "Hood-winkt" means blindfolded.

[8294] Burton. Printed page 417, h: "Cor varie inclinatur, nunc gaudens, nunc mœrens; statim ex timore nascitur Zelotypia, furor, spes, desperatio." "The heart inclines in different ways, now rejoicing, now grieving; immediately from fear arise jealousy, fury, hope and despair." The margin has fear where the body has love.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Leon Hebreus in his first Dialogue, reduceth them all to these three, Utile, Jucundum, Honestum, Profitable, Pleasant, Honest; (out of Aristotle belike 8. moral.) of which he discourseth at large, and whatsoever is beautifull and fair, is referred to them, or any way to be desired. [8295]To profitable, is ascribed health, wealth, honour, &c. which is rather Ambition, Desire, Covetousness, then Love: Friends, Children, love of women, [8296]all delightfull and pleasant objects, are referred to the second.	In his first dialogue Leone Ebreo reduces them all to three: "the useful, the pleasant and the honourable"—probably following Aristotle's Ethics, book 8. He discusses these at length, and assigns to them everything beautiful and fair, or desirable in any way. "Health, wealth, honour and so on belong to the useful; this is ambition, desire or greed rather than love." Friends, children, love of women, and all delightful and pleasant objects belong to the second category.[8297]
The love of honest things, consists in vertue and wisdome, and is preferred before that which is profitable and pleasant: Intellectuall, about that which is honest. [8298]St. Austin calls profitable, worldly; pleasant, carnal; honest, spirituall. [8299]Of and from all three, result Charity, Friendship, and true love, which respects God and our neighbour. Of each of these I will briefly dilate, and shew in what sort they cause melancholy.	Love of honourable things consists in virtue and wisdom, and takes precedence over love of the useful and pleasant. Intellectual love concerns what is honourable. Saint Augustine calls "the useful worldly, the pleasant carnal, and the honourable spiritual." "From all three arise charity, friendship and true love, directed towards God and our neighbour." I shall briefly discuss each and show how it causes melancholy.[8300]

[8295] Burton. Printed page 417, i: "Ad utile sanitas refertur; utilium est ambitio, cupido, desiderium potius quam amor excessus avaritia." "Health belongs to the useful; in useful things there is ambition, appetite and desire rather than love; excess is avarice." The compressed Latin is punctuated here for sense.

[8296] Burton. Printed page 417, k: "Picolom. grad. 7. Cap. 1." Piccolomini, grade 7, chapter 1.

[8297] Editor. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 8.2–3, distinguishes the good, the pleasant and the useful as objects of affection. Burton's "honest" means morally honourable; "profitable" means useful or advantageous. His wording and his placement of friends, children and women under pleasure are retained. Margin h says passions arise from fear, while the body says from love.

[8298] Burton. Printed page 417, l: "Lib. de amicit. utile mundanum, carnale jucundum, Spirituale honestum." Book On Friendship: "The useful is worldly, the pleasant carnal, the honourable spiritual."

[8299] Burton. Printed page 417, m: "Ex singulis tribus fit charitas & amicitia, quæ respicit deum & proximum." "From each of the three come charity and friendship, which look to God and our neighbour."

[8300] Editor. The margin cites On Friendship for the attribution to Augustine; its authorship and exact passage remain to be established. Charity means love directed towards God and one's neighbour. The body's "all three" and the margin's "each of the three" are translated separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Amongst all these fair entising objects, which procure Love, and bewitch the Soul of man, there is none so moving, so forcible as profit, and that which carrieth with it a shew of commodity. Health indeed is a pretious thing, to recover and preserve which we will undergo any misery, drink bitter potions, freely give our goods: restore a man to his health, his purse lies open to thee, bountifull he is, thankfull and beholding to thee;	Among all these beautiful, enticing objects that awaken love and bewitch the human soul, none is so moving or powerful as profit, or anything that promises advantage. Health is indeed precious: to recover and preserve it we will undergo any suffering, drink bitter potions and freely give our possessions. Restore someone's health, and his purse lies open to you; he is generous, grateful and in your debt.
but give him wealth and honour, give him gold, or what shall be for his advantage and preferment, and thou shalt command his affections, oblige him eternally to thee, heart, hand, life and all is at thy service, thou art his dear and loving friend, good and gracious Lord and Master, his Mæcenas; he is thy slave, thy vassall, most devote, affectioned, and bound in all duty: tell him good tydings in this kinde, there spoke an Angel, a blessed hour that brings in gain, he is thy creature, and thou his creator, he hugges and admires thee; he is thine for ever.	But give him wealth and honour, give him gold or anything that advances his interests and position, and you will command his affections and bind him to you for ever. Heart, hand, life and everything are at your service. You are his dear and loving friend, his good and gracious lord and master, his Maecenas. He is your slave, your vassal, utterly devoted, affectionate and bound by every duty. Tell him good news of this kind, and an angel has spoken; blessed is the hour that brings gain. He is your creature, and you his creator; he embraces and admires you; he is yours for ever.[8301]
No Loadstone so attractive as that of profit, no so fair an object as this of gold: [8302]nothing wins a man sooner then a good turn; bounty and liberality command body and soul:	No lodestone attracts like profit; no object is so beautiful as gold. Nothing wins someone over sooner than a good turn; bounty and generosity command body and soul:
Source page 418 Munera (crede mihi) placant hominesq; deosque; Placatur donis Jupiter ipse datis.	Gifts, believe me, appease both men and gods; Jupiter himself is appeased by gifts bestowed.

[8301] Editor. Maecenas, the Roman patron of poets, stands for a generous patron. "Commodity" here means material advantage or self-interest; "preferment" means advancement in position. "Creature" is a person dependent on a patron. Burton's praise becomes deliberately extravagant as he depicts the power of wealth.

[8302] Burton. Printed page 417, n: "Benefactores præcipue amamus. Vives 3. de anima." "We particularly love our benefactors." Vives, On the Soul, book 3.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Good turns do pacifie both God and men, And Jupiter himself is won by them.	Good turns appease both God and men, And Jupiter himself is won by them.[8303]
Gold of all other is a most delitious object, a sweet sight, a goodly lustre it hath; gratius aurum quàm solem intuemur, saith Austin, and we had rather see it then the Sun. Sweet and pleasant in getting, in keeping; it seasons all our labours, intolerable pains we take for it, base imployments, endure bitter flouts and taunts, long journeys, heavy burdens, all are made light and easie by this hope of gain; At mihi plaudo ipse domi, simulac nummos contemplor in arca.	Gold above all is a delightful object, a sweet sight, with a splendid lustre. "We look at gold more gladly than at the sun," says Augustine; and we would rather see it than the sun. It is sweet and pleasant to acquire and to keep. It gives savour to all our labours: the unbearable pains we take for it, degrading work, bitter jeers and taunts endured, long journeys and heavy burdens—all are made light and easy by this hope of gain. "But at home I applaud myself as soon as I gaze upon the coins in my chest."[8304]

[8303] Editor. Ovid, Ars Amatoria 3.653–654. The Latin text consulted has capiunt, "win over," where Burton prints placant, "appease." Burton's own English couplet also changes "gifts" to "good turns" and "gods" to "God"; both Latin and English are preserved and modernized separately.

[8304] Editor. The closing Latin is Horace, Satires 1.1.66–67: the speaker consoles himself with money despite public contempt. The gold-and-sun comparison occurs in Gratian, Decretum, Distinction 47, chapter 8, under Ambrose's name, with intuetur ("he looks") rather than Burton's intuemur ("we look"). This locates a close parallel without confirming its ultimate authorship or Burton's intermediary. His attribution to Augustine remains.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The sight of gold refresheth our spirits, and ravisheth our hearts, as that Babylonian garment, and [8305]golden wedge did Achan in the camp, the very sight and hearing, sets on fire his soul with desire of it. It will make a man run to the Antipodes, or tarry at home and turn parasite, lye, flatter, prostitute himself, swear and bear false witness; he will venture his body, kill a King, murther his father, and damn his soul to come at it. Formosior auri massa, as [8306]he well observed, the mass of gold is fairer then all your Græcian pictures, that Apelles, Phydias, or any doting painter could ever make: we are enamoured with it,	The sight of gold refreshes our spirits and ravishes our hearts, as the Babylonian garment and wedge of gold did Achan in the camp: merely seeing or hearing of it sets his soul ablaze with desire. It will make a man travel to the other side of the world, or stay at home and become a parasite, lie, flatter, sell himself, swear oaths and bear false witness. He will risk his body, kill a king, murder his father and damn his soul to obtain it. "A mass of gold is more beautiful," as the writer aptly observed, than all your Greek pictures that Apelles, Phidias or any foolish painter could ever make. We are in love with it:[8307]
[8308]Prima ferè vota, & cunctis notissima templis, Divitiæ ut crescant. ———	The foremost prayer, familiar in every temple: That riches may increase.[8309]
All our labours, studies, endeavours, vows, prayers and wishes, are to get, how to compass it.	All our labours, studies, efforts, vows, prayers and wishes aim at getting it, at finding how to obtain it.
[8310]Hæc est illa cui famulatur maximus orbis, Diva potens rerum, domitrixq; pecunia fati.	This is she whom the vast world serves: Money, mighty goddess of all things, mistress of fate.[8311]

[8305] Burton. Printed page 418, o: "Jos. 7." Joshua 7.

[8306] Burton. Printed page 418, p: "Petronius Arbiter." Petronius Arbiter.

[8307] Editor. Achan's taking of a Babylonian garment and gold is told in Joshua 7, especially verse 21. "Antipodes" means the opposite side of the world. The comparison between gold and Greek art is Petronius, Satyricon 88; Burton combines an abbreviated Latin phrase with his English account. Phidias was a sculptor, although Burton groups him with painters.

[8308] Burton. Printed page 418, q: "Juvenalis." Juvenal.

[8309] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 10.23–25. Burton abbreviates and alters the line about riches increasing; the shortened form is translated as printed.

[8310] Burton. Printed page 418, dagger: "Joh. Secund. lib. sylvarum." Johannes Secundus, book of Silvae.

[8311] Editor. Johannes Secundus is the author named in the margin. Domitrix makes money the female ruler or conqueror of fate. The exact poem and edition in the Silvae remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This is the great Goddesse we adore and worship, this is the sole object of our desire. If we have it, as we think, we are made for ever, thrice happy, Princes, Lords, &c. If we lose it, we are dull, heavy, dejected, discontent, miserable, desperate and mad. Our estate and benè esse ebbs and flows with our commodity; and as we are endowed or enriched, so are we beloved and esteemed: it lasts no longer then our wealth; when that is gone, and the object removed, farewell friendship:	This is the great goddess we adore and worship, the sole object of our desire. If we possess it, we think ourselves made for ever, thrice happy, princes, lords and so on. If we lose it, we are dull, weighed down, dejected, dissatisfied, miserable, desperate and mad. Our condition and well-being ebb and flow with our material advantage; and we are loved and valued according to our possessions and wealth. That regard lasts no longer than our riches: when they are gone and the object is removed, farewell friendship.
as long as bounty, good cheer, and rewards were to be hoped, friends enough; they were tied to thee by the teeth, and would follow thee as Crows do a Carcass: but when thy goods are gone and spent, the lamp of their love is out, and thou shalt be contemned, scorned, hated, injured.	As long as generosity, good dinners and rewards could be expected, there were friends enough. They were tied to you by their teeth and would follow you as crows follow a carcass. But when your possessions are gone and spent, the lamp of their love goes out, and you will be despised, scorned, hated and wronged.[8312]
[8313]Lucians Timon, when he lived in prosperity, was the sole spectacle of Greece, onely admired; who but Timon? Every body loved, honoured, applauded him, each man offered him his service, and sought to be kin to him; but when his gold was spent, his fair possessions gone, farewell Timon: none so ugly, none so deformed, so odious an abject as Timon, no man so ridiculous on a sudden, they gave him a penny to buy a rope, no man would know him.	When Lucian's Timon lived in prosperity, he was the great spectacle of Greece, the one everyone admired: who could compare with Timon? Everyone loved, honoured and applauded him; each offered his services and sought to claim kinship. But when his gold was spent and his fine possessions gone, farewell Timon! No one was so ugly, so misshapen, so hateful an outcast as Timon; suddenly no one was so ridiculous. They gave him a penny to buy a rope; no one would acknowledge him.[8314]

[8312] Editor. Benè esse means well-being. "Good cheer" means plentiful food and hospitality. Being "tied by the teeth" turns the friends' attachment into dependence on the meals they expect.

[8313] Burton. Printed page 418, r: "Lucianus Timon." Lucian, Timon.

[8314] Editor. Lucian's Timon depicts the abandonment of a generous man after his ruin. The rope is a cruel invitation to hang himself: when Gnathonides returns, Timon recalls being offered a halter instead of alms. Burton compresses and adapts the story; his precise intermediary remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 418–419 'Tis the generall humour of the world, commodity steers our affections throughout, we love those that are fortunate and rich, that thrive, or by whom we may receive mutuall kindness, hope for like curtesies, get any good, gain, or profit; hate those, and abhor on the other side, which are poor and miserable, or by whom we may sustain loss or inconvenience.	This is the world's general disposition: advantage steers our affections from beginning to end. We love the fortunate and rich, those who prosper, or those from whom we may receive kindness in return, expect similar courtesies, or obtain some benefit, gain or profit. On the other hand, we hate and abhor the poor and miserable, or those through whom we may suffer loss or harm.
Source page 419 And even those that were now familiar and dear unto us, our loving and long friends, neighbours, kinsmen, allies, with whom we have conversed and lived as so many Geryons for some years past, striving still to give one another all good content and entertainment, with mutual invitations, feastings, disports, offices, for whom we would ride, run, spend our selves, and of whom we have so freely and honourably spoken, to whom we have given all those turgent titles, and magnificent elogiums, most excellent and most noble, worthy, wise, grave, learned, valiant, &c. and magnified beyond measure:	Even those who were just now close and dear to us—our loving friends of long standing, neighbours, relatives and connections—with whom we have associated and lived for years like so many Geryons, always striving to please and entertain one another through invitations, feasts, recreations and services; people for whom we would ride, run and spend ourselves, of whom we have spoken so freely and honourably, bestowing all those swollen titles and magnificent praises—most excellent, most noble, worthy, wise, dignified, learned, brave and so on—and exalting them beyond measure:[8315]

[8315] Editor. Apollodorus, Library 2.5.10, describes Geryon as three bodies joined together; here the image suggests friends joined closely together. "Allies" includes family connections by marriage. "Turgent" means swollen or inflated, and "elogiums" are speeches of praise.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If any controversie arise betwixt us, some trespass, injury, abuse, some part of our goods be detained, a peece of Land come to be litigious, if they cross us in our suit, or touch the string of our commodity, we detest and depress them upon a sudden: neither affinity, consanguinity, or old acquaintance can contain us, but [8316]rupto jecore exierit Caprificus. A golden apple sets altogether by the ears, as if a marrow bone, or hony comb were flung amongst Bears: Father and Son, Brother and Sister, kinsmen are at odds:	If any dispute arises between us—some trespass, injury or abuse, some of our property withheld, a piece of land brought into litigation—if they oppose our claim or touch the string of our self-interest, we suddenly detest and disparage them. Neither marriage ties, blood relationship nor old acquaintance can restrain us; instead, "the wild fig tree bursts out through the ruptured liver." A golden apple sets everyone fighting, as if a marrowbone or honeycomb had been thrown among bears. Father and son, brother and sister, relatives are at odds.[8317] and look what malice, deadly hatred can invent, that shall be done, Terribile, dirum, pestilens, atrox, ferum, mutuall injuries, desire of revenge, and how to hurt them, him and his, are all our studies. If our pleasures be interrupt, we can tolerate it: our bodies hurt, we can put it up and be reconciled:	Whatever malice and deadly hatred can devise will be done: "terrible, dreadful, deadly, savage, brutal" acts. Mutual injuries, the desire for revenge, and ways to harm them—a man and his family—occupy all our thoughts. If our pleasures are interrupted, we can tolerate it; if our bodies are hurt, we can bear it and be reconciled.
but touch our commodities, we are most impatient; fair becomes foul, the Graces are turned to Harpyes, friendly salutations to bitter imprecations, mutuall feastings to plotting villanies, minings and counterminings; good words to Satyres and invectives, we revile e contra, nought but his imperfections are in our eyes, he is a base knave, a Divel, a Monster, a Caterpiller, a Viper, an Hog-rubber, &c.	But touch our interests, and we lose all patience. Beauty becomes ugliness, the Graces become Harpies, friendly greetings turn into bitter curses, mutual feasts into plots of villainy, schemes and counter-schemes; kind words become satires and invective. We answer praise with abuse; we see nothing but his faults. He is a base rogue, a devil, a monster, a devouring pest, a viper, a boor, and so on.[8318]

[8316] Burton. Printed page 419, s: "Pers." Persius.

[8317] Editor. Persius 1.25 supplies the grotesque image of a wild fig tree breaking through the liver; Burton uses it for feeling that bursts its restraints. The golden apple recalls the apple of discord. Affinity is relationship by marriage; consanguinity is blood relationship. "By the ears" means quarrelling.

[8318] Editor. The Graces embody charm; Harpies are predatory monsters. "Minings and counterminings" transfers the language of siege warfare to intrigue. Caterpillar is an insult for a destructive exploiter. Hog-rubber is an old term of abuse for a coarse, clownish fellow; that sense is recorded in Halliwell's Dictionary of Archaic and Provincial Words, under the word.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Desinit in piscem mulier formosa superne:	A woman beautiful above ends below in a fish.[8319]
The Scene is altered on a sudden, love is turned to hate, mirth to melancholy: so furiously are we most part bent, our affections fixed upon this object of commodity, and upon money, the desire of which in excess is covetousness: Ambition tyrannizeth over our souls, as [8320]I have shewed, and in defect crucifies as much, as if a man by negligence, ill husbandry, improvidence, prodigality, waste and consume his goods and fortunes, beggery follows, and melancholy, he becomes an abject, [8321]odious and worse then an Infidel, in not providing for his family.	The scene changes suddenly: love turns to hatred, cheerfulness to melancholy. So furiously are most of us bent upon material advantage and money, with our affections fixed on them; excessive desire for money is greed. Ambition tyrannizes over our souls, as I have shown; and deficiency torments us just as much. If through negligence, bad management, lack of foresight or extravagance a man wastes and consumes his possessions and fortune, poverty follows, and melancholy. He becomes an outcast, "hateful and worse than an unbeliever, in failing to provide for his family."[8322]

[8319] Editor. Horace, Ars Poetica 4. The Latin text consulted has desinat, while Burton prints desinit. Horace imagines an incoherent painted creature; Burton applies its transformation from woman to fish to the sudden reversal of a person's appearance in a hostile observer's eyes.

[8320] Burton. Printed page 419, t: "Part. 1. sec. 2. memb. sub. 12." Part 1, section 2, member unspecified, subsection 12. The printed locator supplies no number after memb. Member 3 supplies the relevant series: 1.2.3.12 treats covetousness, while the adjacent 1.2.3.11 treats ambition. The printed 12 fits the surrounding discussion of money; the immediate sentence names ambition. Both destinations are given because the intended one cannot be established from this abbreviated locator alone. Related passages: 1.2.3.12; 1.2.3.11 (member supplied; two alternatives explicitly distinguished).

[8321] Burton. Printed page 419, u: "1 Tim. 1. 8." 1 Timothy 1:8, as printed; the passage about providing for one's household is 1 Timothy 5:8.

[8322] Editor. "Crucifies" means torments intensely. "In defect" moves from excessive desire for wealth to the misery caused by its lack. "Husbandry" means management of resources. The marginal 1 Timothy 1:8 is a wrong locator for the household passage, which is 5:8. "Infidel" is rendered unbeliever. The block ends before Member 2, Subsection 2, Pleasant objects of Love.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUSECT. 2. Pleasant objects of Love.	SUBSECTION 2 Pleasant objects of love
Source page 419–420 Pleasant Objects are infinite, whether they be such as have life, or be without life: Inanimate are Countries, Provinces, Towers, Towns, Cities, as he said, [8323]Pulcherrimam insulam videmus, etiam cum non videmus, we see a fair Island by description, when we see it not. The [8324]Sun never saw a fairer City, Thessala Tempe, Orchards, Gardens, pleasant walks, Groves, Fountains, &c. The heaven it self is said to be [8325]fair or foul: fair buildings, fair pictures, all artificiall, elaborate and curious works, clothes, give an admirable lustre: we admire, and gaze upon them, ut pueri Junonis avem, as children do on a Peacock: A fair Dog, a fair Horse and Hawk, &c.	Pleasant objects are innumerable, whether living or lifeless. Lifeless ones include countries, provinces, towers, towns and cities. As the writer said, “We see a most beautiful island even when we do not see it”: we see a beautiful island through a description, without seeing it ourselves. “The sun never saw a fairer city”; the Vale of Tempe in Thessaly, orchards, gardens, pleasant walks, groves, fountains and so on. The sky itself is called fair or foul. Fine buildings, fine pictures, all skilful, elaborate and finely wrought works, and clothes have an admirable splendour. We admire and gaze at them “as children do at Juno’s bird,” as children gaze at a peacock; a fine dog, a fine horse or hawk, and so on.[8326]
Source page 420 [8327][8328]Thessalus amat equum pullinum, buculum Ægyptius, Lacedæmonius Catulum, &c. such things we love, are most gracious in our sight, acceptable unto us, and whatsoever else may cause this passion, if it be superfluous or immoderately loved, as Guianerius observes.	“The Thessalian loves a young horse, the Egyptian a young bull, the Spartan a puppy,” and so on. Such things as we love are most pleasing to our eyes and welcome to us; and whatever else we love may cause this passion if it is unnecessary or loved immoderately, as Guaineri observes.[8329]

[8323] Burton. Printed page 419, x: “Lips. epist. Camdeno.” Lipsius, letter to Camden.

[8324] Burton. Printed page 419, y: “Leland of S. Edmondsbury.” Leland, on Bury St Edmunds.

[8325] Burton. Printed page 419, z: “Cœlum serenum, cœlum visu fœdum. Polid lib. 1 de Anglia.” “A clear sky; a sky foul to look at.” Polydore, On England, book 1.

[8326] Editor. Tempe is the celebrated valley in Thessaly. Juno’s bird is the peacock. “Curious” means finely wrought; “artificial” means made by skill. The opening heading prints SUSECT., omitting the B; the original retains it. The English explanation following Lipsius’s Latin is preserved separately.

[8327] Burton. Printed page 420, a: “Credo equidem vivos ducent e marmore vultus.” “I indeed believe they will draw living faces from marble.” The marker stands beside the following animal examples, though the verse concerns sculpture.

[8328] Burton. Printed page 420, dagger: “Max. Tyrius ser. 9.” Maximus of Tyre, discourse 9.

[8329] Editor. The passion here is melancholy arising from excessive attachment. The two marginal markers occupy the same place: a quotes Virgil, Aeneid 6.848, on sculpture, while the dagger cites Maximus of Tyre for the animal preferences. Virgil’s text has de marmore; Burton prints e marmore. No animal preference is silently substituted for his wording.

Original text 1651	Modern English
These things in themselves are pleasing and good, singular ornaments, necessary, comely, and fit to be had; but when we fix an immoderate eye, and dote on them overmuch, this pleasure may turn to pain, bring much sorrow, and discontent unto us, work our finall overthrow, and cause melancholy in the end.	These things are pleasing and good in themselves: excellent ornaments, necessary, attractive and suitable to possess. But when we gaze on them without restraint and dote on them too much, this pleasure may turn to pain, bring us much sorrow and discontent, cause our eventual ruin and end in melancholy.
Many are carried away with those bewitching sports of gaming, hawking, hunting, and such vain pleasures, as [8330]I have said: some with immoderate desire of fame, to be crowned in the Olympicks, knighted in the field, &c. and by these means ruinate themselves.	Many are carried away by the bewitching sports of gambling, hawking, hunting and such empty pleasures, as I have said; others by an excessive desire for fame, to be crowned at the Olympic games, knighted on the battlefield and so on. In these ways they ruin themselves.
The lascivious dotes on his fair mistress, the Glutton on his dishes, which are infinitely varied to please the palate, the Epicure on his severall pleasures, the superstitious on his Idoll, and fats himself with future joys, as Turks feed themselves with an imaginary perswasion of a sensuall Paradise: so severall pleasant objects, diversly affect divers men.	The lustful man dotes on his beautiful mistress; the glutton on his dishes, endlessly varied to please his palate; the pleasure-seeker on his different delights; the superstitious man on his idol, fattening himself on joys to come, as Turks feed themselves with an imagined belief in a sensual paradise. Thus different pleasant objects affect different people in different ways.[8331]
But the fairest objects and entisings proceed from men themselves, which most frequently captivate, allure, and make them dote beyond all measure upon one another, and that for many respects: First, as some suppose, by that secret force of stars, (quod me tibi temperat astrum?) They do singularly dote on such a man, hate such again, and can give no reason for it. [8332]Non amo te Sabidi, &c.	But the most beautiful and enticing objects come from human beings themselves, who most often captivate and allure people, making them dote on one another beyond all measure, for many reasons. First, as some suppose, through the secret power of the stars—"what star brings me into harmony with you?" People are especially devoted to one person and hate another, yet can give no reason for it: "I do not love you, Sabidius," and so on.[8333]

[8330] Burton. Printed page 420, b: "Part. 1. Se. 2. memb 3." Part 1, section 2, member 3.

[8331] Editor. "Epicure" denotes a person devoted to sensual pleasure. "Turks" is Burton's polemical designation for Muslims here; the imagined sensual paradise is his characterization, retained as part of his argument.

[8332] Burton. Printed page 420, d: "Mart." Martial.

[8333] Editor. The question adapts Persius 5.51, whose fuller statement says that some star brings the speaker into harmony with his friend. The following fragment is Martial 1.32, an epigram about disliking someone without being able to explain why.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Alexander admired Ephestion, Adrian, Antinous, Nero Sporus, &c. The Physitians refer this to their temperament, Astrologers to trine and sextile Aspects, or opposite of their severall Ascendents, Lords of their genitures, love and hatred of Planets; [8334]Cicogna, to concord and discord of Spirits; but most to outward Graces.	Alexander admired Hephaestion, Hadrian Antinous, Nero Sporus, and so on. Physicians attribute this to people's temperaments; astrologers to trine, sextile or opposing aspects of their respective ascendants, the ruling planets of their birth charts, and the love and hatred of planets; Cicogna to harmony and discord between spirits. Most, however, attribute it to outward charms.[8335]
A merry companion is welcome and acceptable to all men, and therefore saith [8336]Gomesius, Princes and great men entertain Jesters, and Players commonly in their Courts.	A cheerful companion is welcome and agreeable to everyone. Hence, says Gomesius, princes and great men commonly maintain jesters and actors at their courts.[8337]
But [8338]Pares cum paribus facillime congregantur, 'tis that [8339]similitude of manners, which ties most men in an inseparable link, as if they be addicted to the same studies or disports, they delight in one anothers companies, birds of a feather will gather together: if they be of divers inclinations, or opposite in manners, they can seldome agree.	But "like most readily gathers with like." It is similarity of character that binds most people inseparably: if they are devoted to the same studies or recreations, they delight in one another's company; birds of a feather will gather together. If their inclinations differ or their characters are opposed, they can seldom agree.

[8334] Burton. Printed page 420, dagger: "Omnif. mag. lib. 12. cap. 3." Omnifarious Magic, book 12, chapter 3.

[8335] Editor. The examples are Alexander and Hephaestion, Hadrian and Antinous, and Nero and Sporus. Trine, sextile and opposition name astrological angular relationships; the ascendant and ruling planets belong to a natal chart. These are the explanations Burton reports. Cicogna is the authority named for the account involving spirits.

[8336] Burton. Printed page 420, e: "De sale geniali l 3. c. 15." On Festive Wit, book 3, chapter 15.

[8337] Editor. "Entertain" means maintain or employ, rather than merely amuse; "players" are actors. Gomesius is the cited author of De sale geniali; the exact passage remains for collation.

[8338] Burton. Printed page 420, dagger: "Theod. Prodromus amor lib. 3." Theodore Prodromus, love narrative, book 3.

[8339] Burton. Printed page 420, f: "Similitudo morum parit amicitiam." "Similarity of character produces friendship."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Secondly, [8340]affability, custome and familiarity, may convert nature many times, though they be different in manners, as if they be Country-men, fellow-students, colleagues, or have been fellow-souldiers, [8341]brethren in affliction, ([8342]acerba calamitatum societas, diversi etiam ingenii homines conjungit) affinity, or some such accidentall occasion, though they cannot agree amongst themselves, they will stick together like burrs, and hold against a third:	Second, friendliness, habit and familiarity can often change nature, despite differences of character. People may be fellow countrymen, fellow students, colleagues, former comrades in arms or brothers in adversity—"the bitter fellowship of misfortune unites even people of different temperaments"—or connected by marriage or some such circumstance. Though they cannot agree among themselves, they will stick together like burrs and stand united against a third party.[8343]
so after some discontinuance, or death, enmity ceaseth; or in a forrain place.	So enmity ceases after some time apart, or after death; or when people meet in a foreign place.
Pascitur in vivis livor, post fata quiescit: Et cecidere odia, & tristes mors obruit iras.	Envy feeds on the living; after death it rests. Hatred has fallen away, and death has buried bitter anger.[8344]

[8340] Burton. Printed page 420, g: "Vives 3. de Anima." Vives, On the Soul, book 3.

[8341] Burton. Printed page 420, h: "Qui simul fecere naufragium, aut una pertulere vincula vel consilii conjurationisve societate junguntur, invicem amant: Brutum & Cassium invicem infensos Cæsarianus dominatus conciliavit. Æmilius Lepidus & Julius Flaccus, quum essent inimicissimi, censores renunciati simultates illico deposuere. Scultet. cap. 4 de causa Amor." "Those who have suffered shipwreck together, endured imprisonment together, or are joined in a common plan or conspiracy love one another. Caesar's domination reconciled Brutus and Cassius, who were hostile to each other. Aemilius Lepidus and Julius Flaccus, though bitter enemies, immediately laid aside their hostility when declared censors." Scultetus, chapter 4, On the Cause of Love.

[8342] Burton. Printed page 420, dagger: "Papinius." Papinius Statius.

[8343] Editor. "Affinity" means relationship through marriage. The long margin groups shared danger, imprisonment and political alliance as sources of attachment. Its Julius Flaccus is retained; the historical name and Scultetus reference require collation. Papinius is Statius; the precise prose intermediary remains unidentified.

[8344] Editor. The first line is Ovid, Amores 1.15.39. The second adapts Statius, Thebaid 12.574, replacing sed, "but," with et, "and." Burton prints them together as two verse lines, which are retained in that order.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 420–421 A third cause of love and hate, may be mutuall offices, acceptum beneficium, [8345]commend him, use him kindly, take his part in a quarrell, relieve him in his misery, thou winnest him for ever; do the opposite, and be sure of a perpetuall enemy.	A third cause of love and hatred may be services exchanged, “a kindness received.” Praise him, treat him kindly, take his side in a quarrel, relieve his distress, and you win him for ever. Do the opposite, and be sure of a lifelong enemy.[8346]
Source page 421 Praise and dispraise of each other, do as much, though unknown, as [8347]Schoppius by Scaliger and Casaubonus: mulus mulum scabit; who but Scaliger with him? what Encomions, Epithetes, Elegiums? Antistes sapientiæ, perpetuus dictator, literarum ornamentum, Europæ miraculum, noble Scaliger, incredibilis ingenii præstantia, &c. diis potius quam hominibus per omnia comparandus, scripta ejus aurea ancylia de cælo delapsa poplitibus veneramur flexis, &c.	Praising or disparaging one another has the same effect, even among people who do not know each other, as with Schoppius towards Scaliger and Casaubon: “one mule scratches another.” Who could compare with Scaliger in his eyes? What eulogies, epithets and praises! “High priest of wisdom,” “perpetual dictator,” “ornament of letters,” “wonder of Europe”; noble Scaliger, “of astonishing intellectual excellence,” and so on; “in every respect to be compared with gods rather than men”; “we bow our knees before his writings as golden sacred shields fallen from heaven,” and so on.[8348]
but when they began to vary, none so absurd as Scaliger, so vile and base, as his books de Burdonum familia and other Satyricall invectives may witness. Ovid. in Ibin, Archilocus himself was not so bitter.	But when they began to disagree, no one was so absurd, vile and base as Scaliger, as his books On the Family of the Burdons and other satirical attacks can testify. Ovid in his Ibis, and Archilochus himself, were not so bitter.[8349]

[8345] Burton. Printed page 420, i: “Isocrates Demonico præcipit ut quum alicujus amicitiam vellet, illum laudet; quod laus initium amoris sit, vituperatio simultatum.” “Isocrates instructs Demonicus, when he wishes for someone’s friendship, to praise him; for praise begins love, blame enmity.”

[8346] Editor. “Offices” are acts of service or kindness. The margin attributes the advice about praise to Isocrates’ To Demonicus; the exact wording and intermediary remain to be established.

[8347] Burton. Printed page 421, k: “Suspect. lect. lib. 1. cap. 2.” Suspect Readings, book 1, chapter 2.

[8348] Editor. Schoppius is Kaspar Schoppe; Scaliger and Casaubon are the scholars he praises and attacks. “One mule scratches another” mocks mutual flattery. Ancylia are sacred shields; the claim that the writings fell from heaven is deliberately extravagant. The precise quotations in Suspect Readings remain for collation.

[8349] Editor. De Burdonum familia probably points to Caspar Schoppe’s Scaliger hypobolimaeus (Mainz 1607), whose catalogued title attacks Joseph Scaliger’s family claims. This is a bibliographical identification, not passage collation. Ovid’s Ibis is an invective poem; Archilochus exemplifies bitter personal satire. The turn from extravagant praise to abuse continues Burton’s account of unstable friendship. Schoppe’s earlier praise in Suspect Readings remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Another great tye or cause of love, is consanguinity; Parents are dear to their children, children to their parents, brothers and sisters, cosens of all sorts, as an hen and chickens, all of a knot: every Crow thinks her own bird fairest. Many memorable examples are in this kinde, and 'tis portenti simile, if they do not: [8350]a mother cannot forget her child; Salomon so found out the true owner: love of parents may not be concealed, 'tis naturall, descends, and they that are inhumane in this kinde, are unworthy of that air they breath, and of the four elements;	Another great bond or cause of love is blood relationship. Parents are dear to their children, children to their parents; brothers, sisters and relatives of every kind are like a hen and her chicks, all in one cluster. Every crow thinks her own chick the fairest. There are many memorable examples, and it is "like a monstrous portent" when such love is absent. "A mother cannot forget her child": in this way Solomon discovered the true mother. Parental love cannot be hidden; it is natural and passes downwards. Those who are inhuman in this respect are unworthy of the air they breathe and of the four elements.[8351]
yet many unnaturall examples we have in this rank, of hard-hearted parents, disobedient children, of [8352]disagreeing brothers, nothing so common. The love of kinsmen is grown cold, many kinsmen, (as the saying is) few friends; if thine estate be good, and thou able, par pari referre, to requite their kindness, there will be mutuall correspondence, otherwise thou art a burden, most odious to them above all others.	Yet we have many unnatural examples of this kind: hard-hearted parents, disobedient children, quarrelling brothers—nothing is more common. The love of relatives has grown cold: "many relatives, few friends," as the saying goes. If your circumstances are good and you can "return like for like," repaying their kindness, there will be mutual goodwill; otherwise you are a burden, more hateful to them than anyone else.

[8350] Burton. Printed page 421, dagger: "Isay 49." Isaiah 49.

[8351] Editor. Isaiah 49:15 poses the question whether a mother can forget her child and allows that she may; Burton compresses it into an assertion. Solomon's judgement between two mothers is in 1 Kings 3:16–28. "Descends" gives parental love a downward direction from parent to child.

[8352] Burton. Printed page 421, l: "Rara est concordia fratrum." "Concord between brothers is rare."

Original text 1651	Modern English
The last object that tyes man and man, is comeliness of person, and beauty alone, as men love women with a wanton eye: which κατ' ἐξοχὴν is termed Heroicall, or Love Melancholy. Other loves (saith [8353]Picolomineus) are so called with some contraction, as the love of wine, gold, &c. but this of women is predominant in an higher strain, whose part affected is the liver, and this love deserves a longer explication, and shall be dilated apart in the next Section.	The last object that binds one person to another is physical attractiveness, beauty alone, as when men look on women with lustful love. This, above all, is called heroic melancholy, or love melancholy. Other kinds of love, says Piccolomini, are called love in a restricted sense, such as the love of wine, gold and so on; but love of women predominates in a higher degree, and the affected part is the liver. This love deserves a fuller explanation and will be discussed separately in the next section.[8354]

[8353] Burton. Printed page 421, m: "Grad. 1. cap. 22." Grade 1, chapter 22.

[8354] Editor. The Greek κατ' ἐξοχὴν means "pre-eminently" or "above all." "Heroical" names the traditional category of lovesickness, rather than an admirable heroism. The placement of the affected faculty in the liver belongs to the physiological account Burton inherits.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 3. Honest objects of Love.	SUBSECTION 3 Honourable objects of love
Beauty is the common object of all love, [8355]as jet draws a straw, so doth beauty love: vertue and honesty are great motives, and give as fair a lustre as the rest, especially if they be sincere and right, not fucate, but proceeding from true form, and an incorrupt judgement; Those two Venus twins, Eros and Anteros, are then most firm and fast.	Beauty is the common object of all love: "as jet attracts a straw, so beauty attracts love." Virtue and integrity are powerful inducements and shine as beautifully as the rest, especially when they are sincere and genuine, not painted over, but arise from true inward form and uncorrupted judgement. Then Venus's two twins, Eros and Anteros, are most firmly and securely joined.[8356]
For many times otherwise men are deceived by their flattering Gnathoes, dissembling Camelions, outsides, hypocrites that make a shew of great love, learning, pretend honesty, vertue, zeal, modesty, with affected looks and counterfeit gestures: fained protestations often steal away the hearts and favours of men, and deceive them, specie virtutis & umbra, when as revera and indeed, there is no worth or honesty at all in them, no truth, but meer hypocrisie, subtilty, knavery, and the like.	Otherwise people are often deceived by their flattering Gnathos, their dissembling chameleons, creatures of appearances, hypocrites who make a show of great love and learning, pretending to integrity, virtue, zeal and modesty through affected looks and counterfeit gestures. False declarations often steal people's hearts and favour, deceiving them "with the appearance and shadow of virtue," when "in reality," indeed, there is no worth or integrity in them, no truth, but sheer hypocrisy, cunning, roguery and the like.[8357]

[8355] Burton. Printed page 421, n: "Vives 3. de Anima, ut paleam succinum sic formam amor trahit." Vives, On the Soul, book 3: literally, "As amber draws straw, so love draws beauty." The printed formam amor reverses the direction of the body's beauty drawing love; the margin also has amber where the body has jet.

[8356] Editor. "Honest" means morally honourable; "fucate" means painted or falsely coloured. Eros and Anteros represent love and answering love. The body uses jet and says beauty attracts love, while the margin uses amber and its Latin makes love attract beauty. Both versions are preserved.

[8357] Editor. Gnatho, the flatterer in Terence's Eunuch, supplies a name for parasitic flatterers. Chameleons suggest changing appearances. "Outsides" describes people whose seeming worth is only external; "subtilty" here means deceitful cunning.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 421–422 As true friends they are, as he that Cælius Secundus met by the high way side; and hard it is in this temporising age to distinguish such companions, or to finde them out. Such Gnathoes as these for the most part belong to great men, and by this glozing flattery, affability, and such like philters, so dive and insinuate into their favours, that they are taken for men of excellent worth, wisdome, learning, demi-Gods, and so screw themselves into dignities, honours, offices: but these men cause harsh confusion often, and as many stirs as Rehoboams Councellors in a Common-wealth, overthrow themselves and others.	They are as true friends as the man Caelius Secundus met beside the highway; and in this opportunistic age it is hard to distinguish such companions or expose them. Such Gnathos generally attach themselves to great men. Through smooth flattery, friendliness and similar love potions, they worm their way so deeply into favour that they are taken for men of exceptional worth, wisdom and learning—demigods—and so work themselves into high positions, honours and offices. Yet these men often cause terrible confusion and as much turmoil in a commonwealth as Rehoboam's counsellors, ruining themselves and others.[8358]
Source page 422 Tandlerus, and some authors make a doubt, whether Love and Hatred may be compelled by philters or characters; Cardan, and Marbodius by precious stones and amulets; Astrologers by election of times, &c, as [8359]I shall elsewhere discuss.	Tandler and some other authors debate whether love and hatred can be compelled by love potions or magical symbols; Cardan and Marbod by precious stones and amulets; astrologers by choosing favourable times, and so on, as I shall discuss elsewhere.[8360]

[8358] Editor. Caelius Secundus is an unresolved anecdotal reference, retained without inventing the missing story. "Temporising" means adapting one's conduct opportunistically. "Philters" are love potions, here a metaphor for flattery. Rehoboam's harsh young counsellors appear in 1 Kings 12.

[8359] Burton. Printed page 422, o: "Sect. seq." The following section.

[8360] Editor. "Characters" are magical signs; "election of times" is the astrological selection of a favourable moment. Burton defers discussion to the next section. The named authorities' precise passages remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The true object of this honest love is vertue, wisdome, honesty, [8361]reall worth, Interna forma, and this love cannot deceive or be compelled, ut ameris amabilis esto, love it self is the most potent philtrum, vertue and wisdome, gratia gratum faciens, the sole and only grace, not counterfeit, but open, honest, simple, naked,	The true object of this honourable love is virtue, wisdom, integrity, real worth, "inward beauty"; and this love cannot deceive or be forced. "To be loved, be lovable." Love itself is the most powerful love potion; virtue and wisdom are "grace that makes one pleasing," the sole and only grace, unfeigned, open, honest, simple and unadorned,[8362]
[8363]descending from heaven, as our apostle hath it; an infused habit from God, which hath given severall gifts, as wit, learning, tongues, for which they shall be amiable and gratious, Eph. 4. 11. as to Saul stature and a goodly presence, 1. Sam. 9. 1. Joseph found favor in Pharao's court, Gen. 39. for [8364]his person; And Daniel with the Princes of the Eunuchs, Dan. 19. 19.	"descending from heaven," as our apostle says: a disposition infused by God, who has bestowed various gifts—intelligence, learning, languages—for which people become lovable and pleasing, Ephesians 4:11. Thus Saul received stature and a handsome presence, 1 Samuel 9:1. Joseph found favour in Pharaoh's court, Genesis 39, for his appearance; and Daniel with the princes of the eunuchs, Daniel 19:19.[8365]

[8361] Burton. Printed page 422, p: "Nihil divinius homine probo." "Nothing is more divine than a good man."

[8362] Editor. "To be loved, be lovable" is Ovid, Ars Amatoria 2.107. Gratia gratum faciens is the theological phrase for grace that makes its recipient pleasing or acceptable; Burton applies it within his account of virtue and attractiveness. "Naked" means unadorned or undisguised.

[8363] Burton. Printed page 422, q: "James 3. 10." James 3:10, as printed; wisdom from above is described at 3:17.

[8364] Burton. Printed page 422, r: "Gratior est pulchro veniens è corpore virtus." "Virtue is more pleasing when it comes from a beautiful body."

[8365] Editor. The printed references are retained. James 3:10 concerns blessing and cursing; wisdom from above appears at 3:17. Saul's height and appearance are described at 1 Samuel 9:2, not 9:1. Daniel has no chapter 19; the favour of the chief eunuch appears at 1:9. Genesis 39 concerns Joseph in Potiphar's house and prison, while Pharaoh's court is in Genesis 41. These distinctions are recorded rather than silently repaired.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Christ was gratious with God and men, Luk. 2. 52. There is still some peculiar grace, as of good discourse, eloquence, wit, honesty, which is the primum mobile, first mover, and a most forcible loadstone to draw the favours and good wills of mens eyes, ears, and affections unto them. When Jesus spake they were all astonied at his answers, (Luk. 2. 47.) and wondred at his gratious words which proceeded from his mouth. An Orator steals away the hearts of men, and as another Orpheus, quo vult, unde vult, he puls them to him by speech alone: a sweet voice causeth admiration; and he that can utter himself in good words, in our ordinary phrase, is called a proper man, a divine spirit.	Christ found favour with God and men, Luke 2:52. There is always some special grace—good conversation, eloquence, intelligence or integrity—that acts as the "first mover," a powerful lodestone drawing people's favourable eyes, ears and affections towards its possessor. When Jesus spoke, "they were all astonished at his answers," Luke 2:47, "and marvelled at the gracious words that came from his mouth." An orator steals people's hearts and, like another Orpheus, draws them to himself by speech alone, "wherever he wishes, from wherever he wishes." A sweet voice inspires admiration; someone who can express himself well is called, in our ordinary phrase, a fine man, a divine spirit.[8366]
For which cause belike, our old Poets, Senatus populusq; poetarum, made Mercury the Gentleman-usher to the Graces, Captain of eloquence, and those Charites to be Jupiters and Eurymones daughters, descended from above.	For this reason, perhaps, our ancient poets, "the senate and people of poets," made Mercury the gentleman usher to the Graces, the captain of eloquence, and those Graces the daughters of Jupiter and Eurymone, descended from above.[8367]

[8366] Editor. Primum mobile is the first moving sphere in older cosmology, here the initiating force of attraction. Orpheus is the mythical musician whose song draws listeners to him. The amazement at Jesus' answers belongs to Luke 2:47; the gracious words come from Luke 4:22. Burton places them together.

[8367] Editor. "Senate and people of poets" playfully borrows the Roman civic formula. Mercury escorts the Graces; Eurymone is Burton's printed name. The conventional mother of the Graces is Eurynome; the exact mythographic source for his combination remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Though they be otherwise deformed, crooked, ugly to behold, those good parts of the minde denominate them fair. Plato commends the beauty of Socrates: yet who was more grim of countenance, stern and gastly to look upon? So are and have been many great Philosophers, as [8368]Gregory Nazianzen observes, deformed most part in that which is to be seen with the eys, but most elegant in that which is not to be seen.	Though people may otherwise be misshapen, crooked and ugly to look at, these good qualities of mind entitle them to be called beautiful. Plato praises Socrates' beauty; yet who had a grimmer face or looked more stern and frightful? Many great philosophers are and have been like this: as Gregory of Nazianzus observes, "for the most part misshapen in what the eyes can see, but most beautiful in what cannot be seen."[8369]
Sæpe sub attrita latitat sapientia veste. Æsop, Democritus, Aristotle, Politianus, Melancthon, Gesner, &c. whithered old men, Sileni Alcibiadis, very harsh and impolite to the eye; but who were so terse, polite, eloquent, generally learned, temperate and modest?	"Wisdom often lies hidden beneath a worn garment." Aesop, Democritus, Aristotle, Poliziano, Melanchthon, Gesner and others: shrivelled old men, "the Sileni of Alcibiades," very rough and unpolished to the eye. Yet who were so refined, cultivated, eloquent, widely learned, temperate and modest?[8370]
No man then living was so fair as Alcibiades, so lovely quoad superficiem, to the eye, as [8371]Boethius observes, but he had Corpus turpissimum interne, a most deformed soul. Honesty, vertue, fair conditions, are great entisers to such as are well given, and much avail to get the favour and good will of men.	No man living then was as beautiful as Alcibiades, so lovely "on the surface," to the eye, as Boethius observes; yet he had "a body most hideous within," a most deformed soul. Integrity, virtue and good character strongly attract those who are well disposed, and do much to gain people's favour and goodwill.[8372]

[8368] Burton. Printed page 422, s: "Orat. 18. deformes plerumq. philosophi ad id quod in aspectum cadit ea parte elegantes quæ oculos fugit." Oration 18: "Philosophers are generally misshapen in what falls within sight, but beautiful in the part that escapes the eyes."

[8369] Editor. Burton contrasts visible appearance with inward qualities. His vocabulary of bodily deformity is retained as part of that contrast. Gregory's Oration 18 and the precise passage require comparison in the cited edition.

[8370] Editor. The "Sileni of Alcibiades" are figures with an unpromising exterior and precious contents, the comparison used for Socrates in Plato's Symposium, 215a–b. "Polite" means polished or cultivated, not simply courteous. Burton groups the named writers rhetorically as unattractive old men; the grouping is his.

[8371] Burton. Printed page 422, dagger: "43. de consol." 43, On Consolation, as printed; the Alcibiades comparison is in book 3, prose 8.

[8372] Editor. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 3, prose 8, imagines seeing through Alcibiades' beautiful exterior to the repellent bodily contents. Burton's Latin still says "body," but his separate English gloss changes this to a deformed soul. Both are translated distinctly; the discrepancy is not concealed. The marginal locator prints 43.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 422–423 Abdolominus in Curtius, a poor man (but which mine Author notes, [8373]the cause of this poverty was his honesty) for his modesty and continency from a private person (for they found him digging in his garden) was saluted King, and preferred before all the Magnificoes of his time, injecta ei vestis purpurâ auroq; distincta, a purple embroidered garment was put upon him, [8374]and they bade him wash himself, and as he was worthy, take upon him the stile and spirit of a King, continue his continency and the rest of his good parts:	Abdolominus, in Curtius, was a poor man—though, as my author notes, "his integrity was the cause of his poverty." For his modesty and self-restraint he was raised from private life—they found him digging in his garden—and hailed as king, preferred to all the great men of his time. "A robe adorned with purple and gold was thrown over him": a purple embroidered garment was put upon him, "and they told him to wash himself and, being worthy, to assume the title and spirit of a king," while maintaining his self-restraint and other good qualities.[8375]
Source page 423 Titus Pomponius Atticus, that noble Citizen of Rome, was so fair conditioned, of so sweet a carriage, that he was generally beloved of all good men, of Cæsar, Pompey, Anthony, Tully, of divers sects, &c. multas hæreditates ([8376]Cornelius Nepos writes) solâ bonitate consequutus.	Titus Pomponius Atticus, that noble citizen of Rome, had such a good character and gracious manner that he was generally beloved by all good men—Caesar, Pompey, Antony and Cicero, men of different parties and so on. As Cornelius Nepos writes, he "obtained many inheritances through goodness alone."[8377]

[8373] Burton. Printed page 423, t: "Causa ei paupertatis, philosophia, sicut plerisq; probitas fuit." "The cause of his poverty was philosophy, as integrity has been for many." The printed philosophia is retained; the body speaks only of integrity.

[8374] Burton. Printed page 423, u: "Ablue corpus & cape regis animum; & in eam fortunam qua dignus es continentiam istam profer." "Wash your body and assume a king's spirit; carry that self-restraint into the station of which you are worthy."

[8375] Editor. The account is Curtius, History of Alexander 4.1, where the name is commonly Abdalonymus. "Continency" means self-restraint, and "Magnificoes" means great or powerful men. The margin inserts philosophia alongside probitas, while the body attributes the poverty to integrity; that difference is preserved. The Latin robe description and Burton's separate English rendering are both retained.

[8376] Burton. Printed page 423, asterisk: "Vita ejus." His Life: the Life of Atticus.

[8377] Editor. Nepos, Atticus 21.1, attributes his many inheritances to goodness. "Sects" here are political groups or parties; "carriage" means manner or bearing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Operæ pretium audire, &c. It is worthy of your attention, Livy cries, [8378]you that scorn all but riches, and give no esteem to vertue, except they be wealthy withall, Q. Cincinnatus had but four acres, and by the consent of the Senate was chosen Dictator of Rome.	"It is worth hearing," and so on. It deserves your attention, Livy cries, "you who scorn everything but riches and esteem no one's virtue unless he is also wealthy: Quintus Cincinnatus had only four acres, yet by the Senate's consent was chosen dictator of Rome."[8379]
Of such account were Cato, Fabricius, Aristides, Antonius, Probus, for their eminent worth: so Cæsar, Trajan, Alexander, admired for valour, [8380]Ephestion loved Alexander, but Parmenio the King: Titus delitiæ humani generis, and which Aurelius Victor hath of Vespasian the dilling of his time, as [8381]Edgar Etheling was in England, for his [8382]excellent virtues: their memory is yet fresh, sweet, and we love them many ages after, though they be dead: Suavem memoriam sui reliquit, saith Lipsius of his friend, living and dead they are all one.	Cato, Fabricius, Aristides, Antonius and Probus were held in such esteem for their outstanding worth; so were Caesar, Trajan and Alexander, admired for courage. Hephaestion loved Alexander, but Parmenio loved the king. Titus was "the delight of humankind"; Vespasian, as Aurelius Victor says, was the darling of his age, as Edgar Atheling was in England, for his excellent virtues. Their memory is still fresh and sweet, and we love them many ages later, though they are dead. "He left a sweet memory of himself," Lipsius says of his friend: living or dead, they are all the same.[8383]

[8378] Burton. Printed page 423, x: "Qui præ divitiis humana spernunt, nec virtuti locum putant nisi opes affluant. Q. Cincinnatus consensu patrū in dictatorem Romanum electus." "Those who despise human things in comparison with riches, and think there is no place for virtue unless wealth abounds. Quintus Cincinnatus was chosen Roman dictator by the consent of the senators." The bar in patrū abbreviates the ending.

[8379] Editor. Livy 3.26 supplies the appeal against equating worth with wealth and describes four iugera of land. Burton renders this as four acres and gives Q. Cincinnatus; Livy's Latin has L. Quinctius Cincinnatus. Both of Burton's readings are retained.

[8380] Burton. Printed page 423, dagger: "Curtius." Curtius.

[8381] Burton. Printed page 423, y: "Edgar Etheling, Englands darling." Edgar Atheling, England's darling.

[8382] Burton. Printed page 423, z: "Morum suavitas, obvia comitas, prompta officia mortalium animos devincentur." "Sweetness of character, ready courtesy and willing services bind people's minds." The printed devincentur is grammatically awkward; the sense of binding is retained.

[8383] Editor. "Dilling" means darling or favourite. Plutarch, Alexander 47.9–10, contrasts Hephaestion's love for Alexander with Craterus's love for the king. Burton instead names Parmenio and cites Curtius. His forms remain; the route of the discrepancy is unestablished. The Vespasian and Edgar Atheling comparison also requires collation. The awkward devincentur in the margin is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8384]I have ever loved as thou knowest (so Tully wrote to Dolabella) Marcus Brutus for his great wit, singular honesty, constancy, sweet conditions: and believe it [8385]there is nothing so amiable and fair as vertue.	"I have always loved Marcus Brutus, as you know," Cicero wrote to Dolabella, "for his great intelligence, exceptional integrity, steadfastness and gracious character. Believe me, nothing is so lovable and beautiful as virtue."[8386]
I [8387]do mightily love Calvisius, (so Pliny writs to Sosius) a most industrious, eloquent, upright man, which is all in all with me: The affection came from his good parts.	"I love Calvisius dearly," Pliny writes to Sosius, "a most industrious, eloquent and upright man, which counts for everything with me." The affection arose from his good qualities.[8388]
And as S. Austin comments on the 84. Psalm, [8389]There is a peculiar beauty of justice, and inward beauty, which we see with the eyes of our hearts, love, and are enamoured with, as in Martyrs, though their bodies be torn to pieces with wilde beasts, yet this beauty shines, and we love their vertues.	And as Saint Augustine comments on Psalm 84: "There is a special beauty of justice, an inward beauty, which we see with the eyes of our hearts, love and become enamoured of—as in martyrs: though wild beasts tear their bodies to pieces, this beauty still shines, and we love their virtues."[8390]

[8384] Burton. Printed page 423, a: "Epist. lib. 8. Semper amavi ut tu scis, M. Brutum propter ejus summum ingenium, suavissimos mores, singularem probitatem & constantiam; nihil est, mihi crede, virtute formosius, nihil amabilius." Letters, book 8. "I have always loved Marcus Brutus, as you know, for his great intelligence, most gracious character, exceptional integrity and steadfastness. Believe me, nothing is more beautiful than virtue, nothing more lovable."

[8385] Burton. Printed page 423, b: "Ardentes amores excitaret, si simulachrum ejus ad oculos penetraret, Plato Phædone." "It would arouse burning love if its image reached our eyes." Plato, Phaedo, as printed; compare Phaedrus 250d.

[8386] Editor. Cicero's letter to Dolabella is Ad familiares 9.14.4–5 in the text consulted, rather than the margin's book 8. Burton brings the praise of Brutus before the statement about virtue, reversing their order in Cicero. The adjacent Platonic margin recalls Phaedrus 250d, although it prints Phaedo.

[8387] Burton. Printed page 423, asterisk: "Epist. lib. 4. Validissimè diligo virum rectum, disertum, quod apud me potentissimum est." Letters, book 4. "I love very dearly an upright, eloquent man, which has the greatest weight with me." The marginal text continues across the bottom of the page.

[8388] Editor. Pliny, Letters 4.4.1, addresses Sosius Senecio and praises Varisidius Nepos, then names Calvisius as his uncle. Burton makes Calvisius the object of the praise. That substitution is retained in both columns and identified here.

[8389] Burton. Printed page 423, c: "Est quædam pulchritudo justitiæ quam videmus oculis cordis, amamus, & exardescimus, ut in martyribus, quum eorum membra bestiæ lacerarent, etsi alias deformes, &c." "There is a certain beauty of justice which we see with the eyes of the heart, love and burn for, as in the martyrs when beasts tore their limbs, although they were otherwise misshapen," and so on.

[8390] Editor. The passage is Augustine, Exposition of Psalm 64.8, not 84: it describes justice's inward beauty and the martyrs' beauty despite bodily suffering. Psalm 64 in Augustine's numbering corresponds to 65 in common English numbering, so the printed 84 is not explained by that difference. Burton's locator, English paraphrase and Latin margin remain, including the margin's additional reference to bodily deformity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The [8391]Stoicks are of opinion that a wise man is only fair; and Cato in Tully 3. de Finibus contends the same, that the lineaments of the minde are far fairer then those of the body, incomparably beyond them: wisdom and valour according to [8392]Xenophon, especially deserve the name of beauty, and denominate one fair, & incomparabiliter pulchrior est (as Austin holds) veritas Christianorum quam Helena Græcorum.	The Stoics hold that only the wise man is beautiful. Cato in Cicero's On Ends, book 3, maintains the same: the features of the mind are far more beautiful than those of the body, incomparably surpassing them. Wisdom and courage, according to Xenophon, especially deserve the name of beauty and entitle a person to be called beautiful; "and Christian truth is incomparably more beautiful," as Augustine holds, "than the Greeks' Helen."[8393]
Wine is strong, the King is strong, women are strong, but truth overcometh all things, Esd. 1. 3. 10, 11, 12. Blessed is the man that findeth wisdom, and getteth understanding; for the merchandise thereof is better then silver, and the gain thereof better then gold; it is more precious then pearls, and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared to her, Prov. 2. 13, 14, 15. a wise, true, just, upright, and good man, I say it again, is onely fair:	"Wine is strong, the king is strong, women are strong, but truth overcomes all things," 1 Esdras 3:10–12. "Blessed is the man who finds wisdom and gains understanding; for its merchandise is better than silver and its profit better than gold. It is more precious than pearls, and nothing you can desire can be compared with her," Proverbs 2:13–15. A wise, truthful, just, upright and good man, I say again, is the only beautiful man.[8394]

[8391] Burton. Printed page 423, d: "Lipsius manuduc. ad Phys. Stoic. lib. 3. dis. 17. solus sapiens pulcher." Lipsius, Introduction to Stoic Physics, book 3, discussion 17: "Only the wise man is beautiful."

[8392] Burton. Printed page 423, dagger: "Fortitudo & prudentia pulchritudinis laudem præcipue merentur." "Courage and practical wisdom especially deserve the praise of beauty."

[8393] Editor. Cicero, On Ends 3.75, calls the wise man more beautiful in mind than body. Augustine, Letter 40, §7 (subsection 4.7), compares Christian truth with Greek Helen while urging Jerome to correct an interpretation; Burton abbreviates the Latin. Lipsius's and Xenophon's exact intermediary passages remain uncollated.

[8394] Editor. The contest about wine, kings, women and truth is introduced in 1 Esdras 3:10–12. Burton's Proverbs 2:13–15 points instead to the praise of wisdom at 3:13–15; his chapter number is retained. His "pearls" also remains, rather than the "rubies" of the King James text consulted.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 423–424 [8395]It is reported of Magdalen Queen of France, and wife to Lewes 11th, a Scottish woman by birth, that walking forth in an evening with her Ladies, she spied M. Alanus one of the Kings Chaplains, a silly, old, [8396]hard-favoured man fast asleep in a Bower, and kissed him sweetly; when the yong Ladies laughed at her for it, she replied, that it was not his person that she did embrace and reverence, but with a Platonick love, the divine beauty of [8397]his soul.	It is reported of Magdalen, queen of France and wife of Louis XI, a Scottish woman by birth, that one evening, walking out with her ladies, she saw Master Alanus, one of the king's chaplains, a simple, old, ugly man, fast asleep in a bower, and kissed him tenderly. When the young ladies laughed at her, she replied that she was not embracing and revering his person, but, with a Platonic love, the divine beauty of his soul.[8398]
Source page 424 Thus in all ages vertue hath been adored, admired, a singular lustre hath proceeded from it: and the more vertuous he is, the more gratious, the more admired. No man so much followed upon earth as Christ himself; and as the Psalmist saith 45. 2. He was fairer then the sons of men.	Thus virtue has been adored and admired in every age; a special radiance has shone from it. The more virtuous a man is, the more pleasing and admired he becomes. No man on earth was followed as much as Christ himself; as the Psalmist says at 45:2, "He was fairer than the sons of men."

[8395] Burton. Printed page 423, e: "Franc. Belforist. in hist. An. 1430." François de Belleforest, in his history, year 1430.

[8396] Burton. Printed page 424, f: "Erat autem fæde deformis, & eâ forma, qua citius pueri terreri possent, quam invitari ad osculum puellæ." "He was, however, hideously misshapen, with a face more likely to frighten boys than invite girls to kiss him."

[8397] Burton. Printed page 424, g: "Deformis iste etsi videatur senex, divinum animum habet." "Though that old man may appear misshapen, he has a divine soul."

[8398] Editor. This is the anecdote usually told of Margaret of Scotland and the poet Alain Chartier. Burton prints Magdalen and Alanus and calls her queen; these details are retained. Barbé's historical study, pages 119–120, records the older account and discusses the chronological difficulty that makes it doubtful. "Silly" here means simple or unassuming; "hard-favoured" means ugly.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Chrysostome Hom. 8. in Mat. Bernard Ser. 1. de omnibus sanctis, Austin, Cassiodore, Hier. in 9. Mat. interpret it of the [8399]beauty of his person; there was a divine Majestie in his looks, it shined like Lightning, and drew all men to it: but Basil, Cyril. lib. 6. super. 55. Esay. Theodoret, Arnobius, &c. of the beauty of his divinity, justice, grace, eloquence, &c. Thomas in Psal. 44. of both; and so doth Baradius, and Peter Morales, lib. de pulchritud. Jesu & Mariæ, adding as much of Joseph and the Virgin Mary,	Chrysostom, Homily 8 on Matthew; Bernard, Sermon 1 on All Saints; Augustine; Cassiodorus; and Jerome on Matthew 9 interpret this as the beauty of his person: divine majesty shone in his face like lightning and drew everyone towards it. But Basil, Cyril in book 6 on Isaiah 55, Theodoret, Arnobius and others understand the beauty of his divinity, justice, grace, eloquence and so on. Thomas, on Psalm 44, understands both; so do Baradas and Pedro de Morales in On the Beauty of Jesus and Mary, adding as much about Joseph and the Virgin Mary:[8400]
———hæc alios formâ præcesserit omnes,	She will have surpassed all others in beauty,
according to that prediction of Sybilla Cumea. Be they present or absent, near us, or afar off, this beauty shines, and will attract men many miles to come and visite it. Plato and Pythagoras left their Countrey, to see those wise Egyptian Priests: Apollonius travelled into Æthiopia, Persia, to consult with the Magi, Brachmanni, Gymnosophists.	according to that prediction of the Cumaean Sibyl. Whether its possessors are present or absent, near us or far away, this beauty shines and will draw people many miles to come and see it. Plato and Pythagoras left their country to see the wise Egyptian priests. Apollonius travelled into Ethiopia and Persia to consult the Magi, Brahmins and Gymnosophists.[8401]

[8399] Burton. Printed page 424, i: “Fulgebat vultu suo fulgor & divina majestas homines ad se trahens.” “Radiance and divine majesty shone in his face, drawing people to him.”

[8400] Editor. Burton sets out competing interpretations of Christ’s beauty, bodily and spiritual. Psalm 44 in the Latin numbering corresponds to Psalm 45 in the English numbering. The chain of patristic references, including Cyril’s printed Isaiah 55, and the works of Baradas and Morales remain for detailed collation.

[8401] Editor. The isolated verse is attributed to the Cumaean Sibyl through Burton’s preceding authorities; its precise source remains unidentified. Apollonius is the traveller and philosopher of Tyana. Magi, Brahmins and Gymnosophists designate the learned or ascetic groups whose wisdom draws visitors; the travel claims are Burton’s.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Queen of Sheba came to visit Solomon; and many, saith [8402]Hierom, went out of Spain and remote places a thousand miles, to behold that eloquent Livy; [8403]Multi Romam non ut urbem pulcherrimam, aut urbis & orbis dominum Octavianum, sed ut hunc unum inviserent audirentque, à Gadibus profecti sunt.	The Queen of Sheba came to visit Solomon; and many, says Jerome, travelled a thousand miles from Spain and distant places to see the eloquent Livy. "Many set out from Cadiz for Rome, not to see that most beautiful city or Octavian, master of the city and the world, but to visit and hear this one man."[8404]
No beauty leaves such an impression, strikes so deep, [8405]or links the souls of men closer then vertue.	No beauty leaves such an impression, strikes so deeply or binds people's souls more closely than virtue.
[8406]Non per deos aut pictor posset, Aut statuarius ullus fingere Talem pulchritudinem qualem virtus habet;	By the gods, no painter could, Nor any sculptor fashion Such beauty as virtue possesses.[8407]
no Painter, no Graver, no Carver can express vertues lustre, or those admirable rayes that come from it, those enchanting rayes that enamour posterity, those everlasting rayes that continue to the worlds end.	No painter, engraver or carver can express virtue's radiance, or the wonderful rays that come from it: those enchanting rays that make posterity fall in love, those everlasting rays that endure to the world's end.

[8402] Burton. Printed page 424, k: "Præfat. bib. vulgar." Preface to the Latin Bible.

[8403] Burton. Printed page 424, dagger: "Pars inscrip. Tit. Livii statuæ Patavii." Part of the inscription on the statue of Titus Livy at Padua.

[8404] Editor. Jerome's Letter 53.1, also used as a biblical preface, describes visitors travelling to see Livy. Burton then quotes the Padua statue inscription as a separate testimony. Gadibus means from Gades, modern Cadiz. The exact inscription and its historical setting remain for collation.

[8405] Burton. Printed page 424, l: "A true loves knot." A true love-knot: a binding emblem of affection.

[8406] Burton. Printed page 424, asterisk: "Stobæus è græco." Stobaeus, translated from the Greek.

[8407] Editor. Burton's margin names Stobaeus as the source of these translated Greek verses. The Latin is translated afresh and kept as three lines; Burton's following English elaboration remains separate. The Greek author and precise anthology entry have not yet been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many, saith Phavorinus, that loved and admired Alcibiades, in his youth, knew not, cared not for Alcibiades a man, nunc intuentes quærebant Alcibiadem: but the beauty of Socrates is still the same; [8408]vertues lustre never fades, is ever fresh and green, semper viva to all succeeding ages, and a most attractive loadstone, to draw and combine such as are present. For that reason belike, Homer feigns the three Graces to be linked and tied hand in hand, because the hearts of men are so firmly united with such graces.	Many who loved and admired Alcibiades in his youth, says Favorinus, did not know or care for the grown man: "now, looking at him, they searched for Alcibiades." But Socrates' beauty remains the same. Virtue's radiance never fades: it is always fresh and green, "ever living" for every succeeding age, and a most powerful lodestone to attract and unite those who are present. For this reason, perhaps, Homer imagines the three Graces linked hand in hand, because such graces unite human hearts so firmly.[8409]
[8410]O sweet bands (Seneca exclaims) which so happily combine, that those which are bound by them love their binders, desiring withall, much more harder to be bound, and as so many Geryons to be united into one.	"O sweet bonds," Seneca exclaims, "which unite so happily that those bound by them love their binders, desiring to be bound still more tightly," and, like so many Geryons, to be united into one.[8411]

[8408] Burton. Printed page 424, dagger: "Solinus, pulchri nulla est facies." Solinus: "Beauty has no face." The compressed wording and attribution are retained for collation.

[8409] Editor. Favorinus contrasts the fading attraction of youth with Socrates' lasting beauty of character. "Semper viva" means ever living. The margin's Solinus attribution and compressed "beauty has no face," and the claim about Homer's linked Graces, remain for collation; the text is not silently regularized.

[8410] Burton. Printed page 424, m: "O dulcissimi laquei, qui tam feliciter devinciunt, ut etiam à vinctis diligantur! qui à gratiis vincti sunt, cupiunt arctius deligari & in unum redigi." "O sweetest bonds, which bind so happily that even those bound by them love them! Those bound by graces wish to be bound more closely and brought into one." The body says they love their binders; the margin says the bonds themselves are loved.

[8411] Editor. "Bands" means bonds. The body has those bound love their binders, while the Latin margin says they love the bonds; both are preserved. Geryon's joined bodies supply Burton's image of friends united into one. The exact Seneca passage remains to be established. The discussion of true friendship and a quotation from Statius follow.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For the nature of true friendship is to combine, to be like affected, of one minde,	For the nature of true friendship is to unite, to share the same feelings and be of one mind:
[8412]Velle & nolle ambobus idem, satiataq; toto Mens ævo ——	Both have the same wishes and refusals, and a mind content Throughout life—[8413]
Source page 425 as the Poet saith, still to continue one and the same. And where this love takes place, there is peace and quietness, a true correspondence, perfect amity, a Diapason of vowes and wishes, the same opinions, as betwixt [8414]David and Jonathan, Damon, and Pythias, Pylades and Orestes, [8415]Nysus and Euryalus, Theseus and Perithous, [8416]they will live and die together, and prosecute one another with good turns. [8417]Nam vinci in amore turpissimum putant,	as the poet says: always to remain one and the same. Where this love exists, there is peace and quiet, true mutual understanding, perfect friendship, a harmony of vows and wishes, the same opinions—as between David and Jonathan, Damon and Pythias, Pylades and Orestes, Nisus and Euryalus, Theseus and Pirithous. They will live and die together and follow one kindness with another, "for they think it most shameful to be outdone in love."[8418]

[8412] Burton. Printed page 424, n: "Statius." The printed attribution is retained; the parallel is Silius Italicus, Punica 9.406–407.

[8413] Editor. The margin names Statius, but compare Silius Italicus, Punica 9.406–407, on the comrades Marius and Caper. Silius has sociataque, "and united," where this printing has satiataq;, "and satisfied." The modern column renders the printed reading; the parallel would give "a mind united throughout life."

[8414] Burton. Printed page 425, o: "He loved him as he loved his own soul, 1 Sam. 15. 1. Beyond the love of women." The first reference is printed 15:1; compare 1 Samuel 18:1 and 2 Samuel 1:26.

[8415] Burton. Printed page 425, p: "Virg. 9. Æn. Qui super exanæm sese conjecit amicum confossus." Virgil, Aeneid 9: "Pierced through, he threw himself upon his lifeless friend." The unusual printed exanæm is retained.

[8416] Burton. Printed page 425, q: "Amicus animæ dimidium, Austin. confess. 4. cap. 6. Quod de Virgilio Horatius, & serves animæ dimidium meæ." "A friend is half one's soul." Augustine, Confessions 4.6. What Horace says of Virgil: "and preserve the half of my soul."

[8417] Burton. Printed page 425, dagger: "Plinius." Pliny. Compare Letters 4.1.5.

[8418] Editor. Diapason means a musical octave or complete harmony. Burton gathers celebrated pairs of loyal friends from scripture, myth and classical literature. The first biblical locator should be compared with 1 Samuel 18:1; the second phrase is from David's lament in 2 Samuel 1:26. Virgil's account of Nisus dying over Euryalus is Aeneid 9.444–445. Pliny's maxim is Letters 4.1.5.

Original text 1651	Modern English
not only living, but when their friends are dead, with Tombs and monuments, Nænia's, Epitaphs, Elegies, Inscriptions, Pyramids, Obelisks, Statues, Images, Pictures, Histories, Poems, Annals, Feasts, Anniversaries, many ages after (as Plato's Schollers did) they will parentare still, omit no good office that may tend to the preservation of their names, honours, and eternall memory.	Not only while their friends are alive, but after their death, many ages later, they will still honour their memory—as Plato's pupils did—with tombs and monuments, funeral songs, epitaphs, elegies, inscriptions, pyramids, obelisks, statues, images, pictures, histories, poems, annals, feasts and anniversaries, neglecting no kindness that might preserve their names, honours and everlasting memory.[8419]
[8420]Illum coloribus, illum cerâ, illum ære, &c. He did express his friends in colours, in wax, in brass, in ivory, marble, gold and silver, (as Pliny reports of a Citizen in Rome) and in a great Auditory not long since, recited a just volume of his life.	"Him in colours, him in wax, him in bronze," and so on. "He portrayed his friends in colours, wax, bronze, ivory, marble, gold and silver," as Pliny reports of a citizen of Rome, "and not long ago, before a large audience, recited a full volume about his life."[8421]

[8419] Editor. Nænia means a funeral song; parentare means to perform commemorative rites for the dead. Good office means a service or kindness. Plutarch, Table Talk 8.1, describes celebrations of Socrates's and Plato's birthdays. This supports the later commemorative tradition, but does not establish Burton's exact claim about observances by Plato's pupils.

[8420] Burton. Printed page 425, asterisk: "Illum argento & auro, illum ebore, marmore effingit, & nuper ingenti adhibito auditorio ingentem de vita ejus librum recitavit. epist. lib. 4. epist. 68." "He portrays him in silver and gold, ivory and marble, and recently, before a large assembled audience, recited a large book about his life." Letters, book 4, letter 68, as printed; compare 4.7.1–2.

[8421] Editor. Compare Pliny, Letters 4.7.1–2. Pliny describes Regulus commemorating his dead son, rather than a citizen commemorating his friends. Burton's changed relationship, alternating plural and singular, and printed locator 4.68 are retained. Pliny's account is critical of Regulus's ostentatious mourning; Burton extracts an example of remembrance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In another place, [8422]speaking of an Epigram which Martial had composed in praise of him, [8423]He gave me as much as he might, and would have done more if he could: though what can a man give more then honour, glory, and eternity? But that which he wrote peradventure, will not continue, yet he wrote it to continue.	Elsewhere, speaking of an epigram Martial had written in his praise, he says: "He gave me as much as he could, and would have done more if he had been able. Yet what more can anyone give than honour, glory and eternity? Perhaps what he wrote will not endure; still, he wrote it to endure."[8424]
'Tis all the recompence a poor scholler can make his well-deserving Patron, Mæcenas, friend, to mention him in his works, to dedicate a book to his name, to write his life, &c. as all our Poets, Orators, Historiographers have ever done, and the greatest revenge such men take of their adversaries, to persecute them with Satyrs, Invectives, &c. [8425]and 'tis both wayes of great moment, as [8426]Plato gives us to understand.	This is all the recompense a poor scholar can make to his deserving patron, his Maecenas, his friend: to mention him in his works, dedicate a book to him, write his life and so on, as our poets, orators and historians have always done. And the greatest revenge such men take on their enemies is to attack them with satires, invectives and the like. In both ways their writing has great power, as Plato gives us to understand.[8427]

[8422] Burton. Printed page 425, asterisk: "Lib 4 ep. 61. Prisco suo; Dedit mihi quantum potuit maximum, daturus amplius si potuisset." Book 4, letter 61, to his Priscus: "He gave me as much as he could, and would have given more if he had been able." Compare Letters 3.21.6.

[8423] Burton. Printed page 425, continuation of the Pliny quotation: "Tamtsi quid homini dari potest majus quam gloria laus & æternitas? At non erunt fortasse quæ scripsit. Ille tamen scripsit tanquam essent futura." "Yet what greater gift can a person receive than glory, praise and eternity? Perhaps what he wrote will not survive. Yet he wrote it as if it would." The body's dagger refers into this continuing marginal quotation.

[8424] Editor. The letter about Martial is Pliny, Letters 3.21.6, to Cornelius Priscus, rather than the printed 4.61. Burton's two body markers refer into one continuing marginal quotation. The Latin Tamtsi is retained as printed. Pliny distinguishes the poet's intention to confer lasting fame from the uncertain survival of the poem.

[8425] Burton. Printed page 425, asterisk: "For genus irritabile vatum." "For the touchy tribe of poets." An English word introduces the Latin phrase.

[8426] Burton. Printed page 425, dagger: "Lib. 13. de Legibus. Magnam enim vim habent, &c." Book 13, On Laws: "For they have great power," and so on. The printed book number requires collation.

[8427] Editor. Maecenas, a Roman supporter of poets, supplies a general name for a literary patron. Satyrs here means satires. The marginal phrase about poets' irritability is Horace, Epistles 2.2.102. Plato's Laws has twelve books, so the printed reference to book 13 cannot stand as an ordinary book number; its intended passage remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Paulus Jovius in the fourth book of the life and deeds of Pope Leo Decimus, his noble Patron, concludes in these words; [8428]Because I cannot honour him as other rich men do, with like endeavour, affection, and piety, I have undertaken to write his life; since my fortunes will not give me leave to make a more sumptuous monument, I will perform those rites to his sacred ashes, which a small perhaps, but a liberal wit can afford. But I rove.	Paolo Giovio, in the fourth book of the life and deeds of Pope Leo X, his noble patron, concludes in these words: "Because I cannot honour him as other wealthy men do, I have undertaken to write his life with equal effort, affection and devotion. Since my means do not allow me to erect a more splendid monument, I will pay his sacred ashes the honours that an intellect, small perhaps but generous, can afford." But I digress.[8429]
Where this true love is wanting, there can be no firm peace, friendship from teeth outward, counterfeit, or for some by respects, so long dissembled, till they have satisfied their own ends, which upon every small occasion, breaks out into enmity, open war, defiance, heart-burnings, whispering, calumnies, contentions, and all manner of bitter melancholy discontents.	Where this true love is lacking, there can be no lasting peace: friendship is mere lip service, a pretence serving some ulterior motive, kept up only until people have satisfied their own ends. At the slightest provocation it breaks out into hostility, open war, defiance, resentment, malicious whispers, slander, disputes and every kind of bitter, melancholy discontent.[8430]

[8428] Burton. Printed page 425, r: "Pari tamen studio & pietate conscribendæ vitæ ejus munus suscepi, & postquam sumptuosa condere pro fortuna non licuit, exiguo sed eo forte liberalis ingenii monumento justa sanctissimo cineri solventur." "Yet with equal zeal and devotion I undertook the task of writing his life; and since my means did not allow me to build costly monuments, the proper honours will be paid to his most sacred ashes by this small memorial, perhaps, of a generous mind." This margin continues across the foot of the page.

[8429] Editor. Paulus Jovius is Paolo Giovio; Leo Decimus is Pope Leo X. Burton presents biography as the scholar's memorial to a patron when he cannot afford a costly monument. Liberal wit means a cultivated, generous intellect. The Latin margin and Burton's freer English version are both retained; the exact passage in Giovio remains for collation.

[8430] Editor. From teeth outward means outwardly, without inward sincerity; by respects are ulterior or secondary motives. Heart-burnings are resentments or jealousies, rather than a bodily symptom in this passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And those men which have no other object of their love, then greatness, wealth, authority, &c. are rather feared then beloved; nec amant quemquam, nec amantur ab ullo: and howsoever born with for a time, yet for their tyranny and oppression, griping, covetousness, currish hardness, folly, intemperance, imprudence, and such like vices, they are generally odious, abhorred of all, both God and men.	Those who love nothing but greatness, wealth, authority and so on are feared rather than loved: "they love no one and are loved by none." However much they may be tolerated for a time, their tyranny and oppression, extortion, greed, brutish hardness, folly, lack of restraint, recklessness and similar vices make them universally hateful, abhorred by all, both God and humankind.[8431]
Non uxor salvum te vult, non filius, omnes Vicini oderunt, ——	Neither wife nor son wishes you well; all Your neighbours hate you—[8432]
Source page 425–426 wife and children, friends, neighbours, all the world forsakes them, would fain be rid of them, and are compelled many times to lay violent hands on them, or else Gods judgements overtake them: instead of Graces, come Furies.	Wife and children, friends, neighbours, the whole world abandons them and gladly would be rid of them, often being driven to attack them violently; or God's judgements overtake them: the Furies come in place of the Graces.[8433]

[8431] Editor. Born with means borne with, or tolerated. Griping is extortionate grasping; currish compares harsh behaviour to a snarling dog. The unattributed Latin sentence denies both the capacity to love and the experience of being loved.

[8432] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.1.84–85, addresses the miser whose family and neighbours hate him. Burton adapts the example to people who pursue wealth and power without reciprocal affection.

[8433] Editor. The Graces personify beauty, graciousness and mutual beneficence; the Furies are avenging powers. Burton turns the mythological contrast into a description of kindness giving way to hostility. Lay violent hands on them refers here to others attacking the hated people.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 426 So when fair [8434]Abigail, a woman of singular wisdome, was acceptable to David, Nabal was churlish and evil-conditioned; and therefore [8435]Mardochy was received, when Haman was executed, Haman the favorite, that had his seat above the other Princes, to whom all the Kings servants that stood in the gates, bowed their knees and reverenced.	Thus beautiful Abigail, a woman of exceptional wisdom, pleased David, while Nabal was surly and ill-natured; and Mordecai was welcomed when Haman was executed—Haman the favourite, "whose seat was above the other princes and to whom all the king's servants standing at the gates bowed their knees in reverence."[8436]
Though they flourish many times, such Hypocrites, such temporizing Foxes, and blear the worlds eys by flattery, bribery, dissembling their natures, or other mens weakness, that cannot so soon apprehend their tricks, yet in the end they will be discerned, and precipitated in a moment: surely, saith David, thou hast set them in slippery places, Psa. 37. 5. as so many Sejani, they will come down to the Gemonian scales; and as Eusebius in [8437]Ammianus, that was in such authority, ad jubendum Imperatorem, be cast down headlong on a sudden.	Though such hypocrites, such opportunistic foxes, often flourish and blind the world through flattery, bribery, concealment of their character or the weakness of others who cannot quickly detect their tricks, they will eventually be exposed and thrown down in an instant. "Surely," says David, "you have set them in slippery places," Psalm 37:5. Like so many Sejanuses, they will come down to the Gemonian Steps; like Eusebius in Ammianus, whose authority extended "to giving orders to the emperor," they will suddenly be hurled headlong down.[8438]

[8434] Burton. Printed page 426, s: "1. Sam. 25. 3." 1 Samuel 25:3.

[8435] Burton. Printed page 426, t: "Esther. 3. 2." Esther 3:2.

[8436] Editor. The Abigail and Nabal contrast comes from 1 Samuel 25, beginning with the description at verse 3. Esther 3:1–2 describes Haman's elevation and public honours; the reversal in which Haman dies and Mordecai rises unfolds later in Esther. Mardochy is an older form of Mordecai.

[8437] Burton. Printed page 426, u: "Amm. Marcellinus l. 14." Ammianus Marcellinus, book 14.

[8438] Editor. Temporizing means pursuing immediate advantage; blear means obscure or deceive; precipitated means hurled down. The slippery places are in Psalm 73:18, not the printed 37:5. The Gemonian Steps evoke Sejanus's disgrace. Ammianus 22.3.12 describes Eusebius's extraordinary power and condemnation to death. His headlong fall is an image of retribution, not an identified method of execution. Burton's book 14 remains.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or put case they escape, and rest unmasked to their lives end, yet after their death, their memory stinks as a snuffe of a candle put out, and those that durst not so much as mutter against them in their lives, will prosecute their name with Satyrs, Libels, and bitter imprecations, they shall malè audire in all succeeding ages, and be odious to the worlds end.	Or suppose they escape and remain unmasked to the end of their lives: after death their memory stinks like the smoking wick of a candle just put out. Those who dared not even mutter against them while they lived will attack their name with satires, libels and bitter curses. They will "be spoken ill of" in every succeeding age, and be hated until the world's end.[8439]

[8439] Editor. Unmasked is the printed reading and is retained, although its relation to "escape" is awkward: it may imply surviving despite exposure, or be a textual error. The intended contrast is clear—security during life gives way to disgrace after death. A candle's snuff is its burnt wick; malè audire means to have a bad reputation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 3. Charity composed of all three kinds, Pleasant, Profitable, Honest.	MEMBER 3 Charity combining all three kinds of love Pleasant profitable and honourable
Besides this love that comes from Profit, Pleasant, Honest, (for one good turn asks another in equity) that which proceeds from the law of nature, or from discipline and Philosophy, there is yet another love compounded of all these three, which is Charity, and includes piety, dilection, benevolence, friendship, even all those vertuous habits; for love is the circle equant of all other affections, of which Aristotle dilates at large in his Ethicks, and is commanded by God, which no man can well perform, but he that is a Christian, and a true regenerate man;	Besides the love that arises from usefulness, pleasure or honour—for justice requires one good turn in return for another—and the love that proceeds from natural law, training or philosophy, there is another love combining all three: charity. It includes piety, affection, goodwill, friendship and all such virtuous dispositions; for love is the equant circle of all other affections, which Aristotle discusses at length in his Ethics. God commands it, and no one can properly practise it unless he is a Christian and truly born anew.[8440]
This is [8441]To love God above all, and our neighbour as our self; for this love is lychnus accendens & accensus, a Communicating light, apt to illuminate it self as well as others.	This is "to love God above all, and our neighbour as ourselves"; for this love is "a lamp that kindles and is kindled," a light that communicates itself, able to illuminate itself as well as others.[8442]

[8440] Editor. Charity here is Christian love of God and neighbour, broader than almsgiving. Honest means morally honourable, while dilection means love or affection. The astronomical image of an equant circle presents love as a principle ordering the other affections. Regenerate means spiritually born anew. The claim that this love requires Christianity belongs to Burton's theological argument.

[8441] Burton. Printed page 426, x: "Ut mundus duobus polis sustentatur: ita lex Dei, amore Dei & proximi; duobus his fundamentis vincitur; machina mundi corruit, si una de polis turbatur; lex perit divina si una ex his." "As the world is supported by two poles, so God's law by love of God and neighbour; it is bound by these two foundations. The world's structure falls if one pole is disturbed; divine law perishes if one of these is." The compressed syntax and printed vincitur and una are retained.

[8442] Editor. Lychnus is a lamp. Accendens and accensus make love both a source and a recipient of illumination. The marginal comparison makes love of God and love of neighbour the two supports of divine law, as two poles support the world.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All other objects are fair, and very beautifull, I confess; kindred, alliance, friendship, the love that we owe to our country, nature, wealth, pleasure, honour, and such moral respects, &c. of which read copious [8443]Aristotle in his Morals; A man is beloved of a man, in that he is a man; but all these are far more eminent and great, when they shall proceed from a sanctified spirit, that hath a true touch of Religion, and a reference to God.	All other objects are fair and very beautiful, I admit: kindred, marriage ties, friendship, the love we owe our country, nature, wealth, pleasure, honour and such moral considerations. Read Aristotle's ample account in his Ethics. One human being is loved by another simply as a human being; but all these loves become far more distinguished and great when they arise from a sanctified spirit with a true feeling for religion and a regard for God.[8444]
Source page 426–427 Nature binds all creatures to love their young ones; an hen to preserve her brood will run upon a Lion, an Hinde will fight with a Bull, a Sow with a Bear, a silly Sheep with a Fox. So the same nature urgeth a man to love his Parents, ([8445]dii me pater omnes oderint, ni te magis quam oculos amem meos!) and this love cannot be dissolved, as Tully holds, [8446]without detestable offence: but much more Gods commandment, which injoyns a filial love, and an obedience in this kind.	Nature binds all creatures to love their young: a hen will attack a lion to save her brood, a hind will fight a bull, a sow a bear, a helpless sheep a fox. That same nature urges a person to love his parents—"Father, may all the gods hate me if I do not love you more than my own eyes!" As Cicero holds, this love cannot be broken "without a detestable offence." How much more binding, then, is God's commandment, which enjoins a child's love and obedience.[8447]

[8443] Burton. Printed page 426, dagger: "8. & 9. libro." Books 8 and 9 of Aristotle's Ethics.

[8444] Editor. Aristotle's Nicomachean Ethics, books 8–9, examines friendship, including friendships grounded in usefulness, pleasure and virtue. Burton incorporates this moral scheme into his Christian account of charity. Alliance here includes connections through marriage, not only political treaties.

[8445] Burton. Printed page 426, asterisk: "Ter. Adelph. 4 5." Terence, The Brothers, act 4, scene 5.

[8446] Burton. Printed page 426, y: "De amicit." On Friendship, attributed here to Cicero.

[8447] Editor. Silly means weak or defenceless; a hind is a female deer. The filial declaration is attributed to Terence's Adelphoe 4.5. Cicero, On Friendship 27, describes the natural bond between parents and children as breakable only by a detestable crime. Burton moves from natural affection to the stronger obligation of a divine command.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 427 [8448]The love of brethren is great, and like an arch of stones, where if one be displaced, all comes down, no love so forcible and strong, honest, to the combination of which, nature, fortune, vertue, happily concur; yet this love comes short of it.	"The love of brothers is great, like an arch of stones: if one is dislodged, all comes down." No love is so powerful, strong and honourable, with nature, circumstance and virtue happily joining to unite it; yet even this love falls short of charity.[8449]
——— Dulce & decorum pro patriâ mori,	It is sweet and honourable to die for one's country—[8450]
[8451]it cannot be expressed, what a deal of Charity that one name of Country contains.	"It cannot be expressed how much affection that single name, country, contains."
* Amor laudis & patriæ pro stipendio est;	Love of praise and country serves as pay;[8452]
The Decii did se devovere, Horatii, Curii, Scævola, Regulus, Codrus, sacrifice themselves for their Countries peace and good.	The Decii "devoted themselves to death"; the Horatii, Curii, Scaevola, Regulus and Codrus sacrificed themselves for their country's peace and welfare.[8453]

[8448] Burton. Printed page 427, z: "Charitas parentum dilui nisi detestabili scelere non potest, lapidum fornicibus simillima, casura, nisi se invicem sustentaret. Seneca." "Love of parents cannot be dissolved without a detestable crime; it is very like an arch of stones, which would fall unless they supported one another." Seneca. The margin joins parental love to the arch image, while the body applies that image to brothers.

[8449] Editor. Seneca, Letters 95.53, compares human society to an arch supported by its parts. Burton applies this to brothers. His margin begins with parental love, echoing Cicero, On Friendship 27, before the Senecan image. The combined wording and differing applications remain. The closing "it" is read as charity, this member's subject.

[8450] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.2.13. Burton omits est, "is," from the familiar Latin line. The statement praises patriotic self-sacrifice within his survey of natural and civic loves; he will subordinate these to Christian charity.

[8451] Burton. Printed page 427, a: "Dii immortales, dici non potest quantum charitatis nomen illud habet." "Immortal gods! It cannot be said how much affection that name contains."

[8452] Editor. Stipendium means pay, especially soldiers' pay. The sentence presents praise and patriotism as rewards in themselves. The printed asterisk has no separately recoverable corresponding marginal text on this page; an exact source is not supplied here.

[8453] Editor. The list gathers Roman and Greek exemplars of devotion to a community. Se devovere refers to dedicating oneself to death, particularly the Roman Decii. Not every figure named simply died for the state; Burton compresses different stories of courage, sacrifice and public service. Curii is retained without substituting another name.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8454]Una dies Fabios ad bellum miserat omnes, Ad bellum missos perdidit una dies.	One day had sent all the Fabii to war; One day destroyed those sent to war.[8455]
One day the Fabii stoutly warred, One day the Fabii were destroyed.	One day the Fabii fought bravely; One day the Fabii were destroyed.
Fifty thousand Englishmen lost their lives willingly neer Battle-Abby, in defence of their Country. [8456]P. Æmilius l. 6. speaks of six Senators of Calice, that came with halters in their hands to the King of England, to die for the rest. This love makes so many writers take such pains, so many Historiographers, Physitians, &c. or at least as they pretend, for common safety, and their Countries benefit.	Fifty thousand Englishmen willingly lost their lives near Battle Abbey in defence of their country. Paolo Emilio, book 6, tells of six councillors of Calais who came to the king of England with nooses in their hands, to die for the rest. This love makes so many writers take such pains—so many historians, physicians and others—for the public safety and their country's benefit, or so they claim.[8457]

[8454] Burton. Printed page 427, b: "Ovid. Fast." Ovid, Fasti; the couplet is 2.235–236.

[8455] Editor. Ovid, Fasti 2.235–236, on the destruction of the Fabii. Burton follows the Latin couplet with his own English couplet. Both are preserved and modernized separately: his "stoutly warred" is a freer rendering of the Latin "sent to war."

[8456] Burton. Printed page 427, c: "Anno 1347. Jacob Mayer. Annal. Fland. lib. 12." In the year 1347. Jacob Meyer, Annals of Flanders, book 12.

[8457] Editor. Battle Abbey evokes the battle of Hastings. The figure of fifty thousand English dead is Burton's reported number, retained rather than endorsed as an established count. Calice is Calais; its six Senators are civic leaders, here rendered councillors. The margin dates the story to 1347 and adds Jacob Meyer's Annals of Flanders to the body's reference to Paolo Emilio. These historical citations remain for full collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8458]Sanctum nomen amicitiæ, sociorum communio sacra; Friendship is an holy name, and a sacred communion of friends. [8459]As the Sun is in the Firmament, so is friendship in the world, a most divine and heavenly band. As nuptial love makes, this perfects mankind, and is to be preferred (if you will stand to the judgement of Cornelius Nepos,) before affinity or consanguinity; [8460]plus in amicitia valet similitudo morum, quam affinitas, &c.	"The name of friendship is sacred; the fellowship of companions is holy": friendship is a holy name and a sacred communion of friends. "As the sun is in the heavens, so friendship is in the world," a most divine and heavenly bond. As married love creates humankind, friendship perfects it; and, if you accept Cornelius Nepos's judgement, it should be preferred to ties of marriage or blood: "in friendship, similarity of character has more power than relationship by marriage," and so on.[8461]
the cords of love bind faster then any other wreath whatsoever. Take this away, and take all pleasure, joy, comfort, happiness, and true content out of the world; 'tis the greatest tye, the surest Indenture, strongest band, and as our modern Maro decides it, is much to be preferred before the rest.	The cords of love bind more firmly than any other bond. Take friendship away and you take all pleasure, joy, comfort, happiness and true contentment out of the world. It is the greatest tie, the surest contract, the strongest bond; and, as our modern Virgil decides, it is far to be preferred to the rest.[8462]

[8458] Burton. Printed page 427, d: "Tully." Cicero, as attributed in the margin.

[8459] Burton. Printed page 427, e: "Lucianus Toxari. Amicitia ut sol in mundo, &c." Lucian, Toxaris: "Friendship is like the sun in the world," and so on.

[8460] Burton. Printed page 427, dagger: "Vit. Pompon. Attici." Life of Pomponius Atticus.

[8461] Editor. Affinity means relationship through marriage; consanguinity means blood relationship. Nepos, Atticus 5.3, explains Cicero's friendship with Atticus by shared character rather than family connection. Burton restates the indirect Latin as a maxim. The first Latin sentence and its English repetition remain. The Cicero and Lucian Toxaris passages still require exact collation.

[8462] Editor. Indenture means a binding written agreement. Maro is Virgil's cognomen; Burton's "modern Maro" is Edmund Spenser, whose verses follow. The comparison gives Spenser the stature of a classical epic poet.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8463]Hard is the doubt, and difficult to deem, When all three kinds of love together meet; And do dispart the heart with power extream, Whether shall weigh the ballance down; to wit, The dear affection unto kindred sweet, Or raging fire of love to women kind, Or zeal of friends, combin'd by vertues meet: But of them all, the band of vertuous mind, Me thinks the gentle heart should most assured bind.	Hard is the question, difficult to judge, When all three kinds of love meet together And divide the heart with overwhelming power, Which will tip the balance: namely, The dear affection for beloved kindred, The raging fire of love for women, Or friends' devotion, joined by matching virtues. But of them all, the bond of a virtuous mind, I think, should bind the noble heart most surely.[8464]
