[11669] Burton. Source page 612, y: "Qui mulierem violasset, virilia execabant, & mille virgas dabant." "They cut off the genitals of a man who had violated a woman, and gave him a thousand strokes of the rod."

[11670] Editor. Numbers 5:14 belongs to the ordeal for a wife suspected of adultery; Deuteronomy 22:22 concerns adultery. Thus "laws against jealousie" is rendered "laws concerning jealousy," while the original wording remains visible. "Vivi-comburio" means burning alive, distinct from the following burial alive. "Expurgations" are procedures claiming to clear an accusation, here rendered ordeals of purgation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
we may say the same of those Vestall virgins that fetched water in a Sive, as Tatia did in Rome, anno ab urb. condita 800. before the Senators; and [11671]Æmilia, virgo innocens, that ran over hot irons, as Emma, Edward the Confessors mother did, the King himself being a spectator, with the like.	We may say the same of those Vestal virgins who carried water in a sieve, as Tatia did in Rome, in the eight-hundredth year from the city's foundation, before the senators; and Aemilia, "an innocent virgin," who ran over hot irons, as Emma, mother of Edward the Confessor, did while the king himself watched, and similar cases.[11672]
We reade in Nicephorus that Chunegunda the wife of Henricus Bavarus Emperour, suspected of adultery, insimulata adulterii per ignitos vomeres illæsa transiit, trod upon red hot coulters, and had no harm: such another story we finde in Regino lib.2. In Aventinus and Sigonius of Charles the third and his wife Richarda, An.887. that was so purged with hot irons.	We read in Nicephorus that Cunigunde, wife of the emperor Henry of Bavaria, was suspected of adultery: "accused of adultery, she passed unharmed over heated ploughshares." She trod on red-hot plough blades and suffered no injury. We find another such story in Regino, book 2; and in Aventinus and Sigonius, concerning Charles III and his wife Richardis in the year 887, who was similarly cleared by hot irons.[11673]
Pausanias saith that he was once an eye-witness of such a miracle at Diana's temple, a maid without any harm at all walked upon burning coals. Pius secund. in his description of Europe, c.46. relates as much, that it was commonly practised at Diana's Temple, for women to go barefoot over hot coals, to try their honesties;	Pausanias says that he once witnessed such a miracle at Diana's temple: a maiden walked upon burning coals without any harm at all. Pius II, in his Description of Europe, chapter 46, reports likewise that at Diana's temple women commonly walked barefoot over hot coals to test their chastity.[11674]

[11671] Burton. Source page 612, star: "Dion.Halic." "Dionysius of Halicarnassus."

[11672] Editor. Burton's Tatia and year 800 are retained. Dionysius 2.69 names Tuccia; 2.68 has Aemilia rekindle the sacred fire with her garment, not cross hot irons. Pliny, Natural History 28.12, also names Tuccia: the checked Latin prints DXVIIII (519), with variants including DCVIIII (609), not 800. Burton's chronology and apparent combination of ordeals remain unresolved, as does the Emma story.

[11673] Editor. The names are modernized as Cunigunde, wife of Henry II, and Richardis, wife of Charles III. "Purged" means cleared of an accusation by an ordeal. Burton's historical and hagiographical citations, including the date 887, are retained without treating the reported immunity to fire as independently established.

[11674] Editor. "Honesties" means chastity. Burton links Pausanias and Pius II through fire ordeals at Diana's temple; the exact passages, setting and relationship between the accounts have not yet been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 612–613 Plinius, Solinus, and many writers make mention of [11675]Feronias Temple, and Dionysius Halicarnasseus, lib.3. of Memnons statue, which were used to this purpose.	Pliny, Solinus and many writers mention Feronia's temple; and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, book 3, mentions Memnon's statue, which were used for this purpose.[11676]
Source page 613 Tatius lib.6. of Pan his Cave, (much like old, St. Wilfrides needle in Yorkshire) wherein they did use to try maids, [11677]whether they were honest: when Leucippe went in, suavissimus exaudiri sonus cœpit.	Tatius, in book 6, tells of Pan's cave—much like old St Wilfrid's Needle in Yorkshire—where they used to test whether maidens were chaste. When Leucippe entered, "a most delightful sound began to be heard."[11678]
Austin. de civ. Dei lib.10.c.16. relates many such examples, all which Lavater de spectr. part.1.cap.19. contends to be done by the illusion of Devils; though Thomas quæst.6. de potentia, &c. ascribe it to good Angels. Some, saith [11679]Austin, compell their wives to swear they be honest, as if perjury were a lesser sin than adultery; [11680]some consult Oracles, as Phærus that blinde King of Ægypt.	Augustine, in The City of God, book 10, chapter 16, relates many such examples, all of which Lavater, On Spectres, part 1, chapter 19, contends were performed through the deception of devils, although Thomas, in question 6 of On Power, and so on, attributes them to good angels. Some, Augustine says, compel their wives to swear that they are chaste, as if perjury were a lesser sin than adultery; some consult oracles, as did Phaerus, that blind king of Egypt.[11681]

[11675] Burton. Source page 612, z: "Viridi gaudens Feronia luco. Virg." "Feronia delighting in her green grove. Virgil."

[11676] Editor. The marginal verse is Virgil, Aeneid 7.800, naming Feronia and her grove; it does not itself describe an ordeal. Burton's separate reference to Memnon's statue and Dionysius, book 3, is retained but remains unresolved.

[11677] Burton. Source page 613, a: "Ismene was so tried by Diana's Well, in which maids did swimme, unchast were drowned, Eustathius lib.8."

[11678] Editor. The cave and its musical test appear in book 8 of Achilles Tatius's Leucippe and Clitophon in the consulted edition, not book 6 as Burton prints. They belong to a romance. Burton compares the cave with St Wilfrid's Needle and adds the Ismene ordeal in Eustathius; those two parallels await exact collation.

[11679] Burton. Source page 613, b: "Contra mendac.ad confess.21.cap." "Against Lying, to "confess.", chapter 21."

[11680] Burton. Source page 613, c: "Phærus Ægypti rex captus oculis per decennium, oraculum consuluit de uxoris pudicitia. Herod.Euterp." "Phaerus, king of Egypt, blind for ten years, consulted the oracle about his wife's chastity. Herodotus, Euterpe."

[11681] Editor. Augustine, City of God 10.16, mentions the Vestal's sieve. Against Lying §41 discusses husbands demanding oaths because they suppose adulterous wives may still fear perjury; Burton's wording changes the emphasis. The margin prints "ad confess.21.cap."; the work is addressed to Consentius. Herodotus 2.111 tells of Pheros's blindness and an oracle requiring a faithful woman's urine as the cure. Lavater's and Thomas's explanations remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Others reward, as those old Romanes used to do; If a woman were contented with one man, Coronâ pudicitiæ donabatur, she had a crown of chastity bestowed on her.	Others offer rewards, as the ancient Romans used to do: if a woman was content with one man, "she was given a crown of chastity"—a crown of chastity was bestowed on her.[11682]
When all this will not serve, saith Alexander Gaguinus, cap.5 descript. Muscoviæ, the Muscovites, if they suspect their wives, will beat them till they confess, and if that will not avail, like those wilde Irish, be divorced at their pleasures, or else knock them on the heads, as the old [11683]Gaules have done in former ages.	When none of this is enough, says Alexander Guagnini in chapter 5 of his Description of Muscovy, the Muscovites, if they suspect their wives, will beat them until they confess. If that does not work, they divorce them at will, like those wild Irish, or else knock them on the head and kill them, as the ancient Gauls did in former ages.[11684]
Of this tyranny of Jealousie reade more in Parthenius Erot. cap.10. Camerarius cap.53. hor. subcis. & cent.2.cap.34. Cælias Epistles, Tho. Chaloner de repub. Ang. lib.9. Ariosto lib.31 staffe 1. Felix Platerus observat. lib.1. &c.	For more about this tyranny of jealousy, read Parthenius's Love Stories, chapter 10; Camerarius's Miscellaneous Hours, chapter 53 and the second hundred, chapter 34; Cælia's Epistles; Thomas Chaloner's On the English Commonwealth, book 9; Ariosto, book 31, stanza 1; Felix Platter's Observations, book 1; and so on.[11685]

[11682] Editor. The Latin is immediately repeated in English by Burton, so both statements remain. The precise source and qualification for this "crown of chastity" have not been established; "one man" is not silently expanded into a specific rule about remarriage.

[11683] Burton. Source page 613, dagger: "Cæsar.lib.6.de bello Gall. vitæ necisque in uxores habuerunt potestatem." "Caesar, Gallic War, book 6. They had power of life and death over their wives."

[11684] Editor. Alexander Gaguinus is Alexander Guagnini. "Knock them on the heads" here means kill them. Caesar, Gallic War 6.19.3, describes power of life and death over wives and children, and interrogation of wives when a husband's death was suspicious. Burton's shortened margin changes the tense and omits the children; his surrounding account extends beyond that specific context.

[11685] Editor. The complete closing reading list is retained. "Staffe" means stanzas, and Ariosto's book 31 is canto 31. "Cælias Epistles" has not been securely identified; the remaining chapter numbers and editions remain unverified. Member 3, on the prognostics of jealousy, follows immediately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 3.	MEMBER 3.
Prognosticks of Jealousie, Despair, Madness, to make away themselves and others.	Prognostics of jealousy: despair, madness, killing themselves and others.
Those which are jealous, most part, if they be not otherwise relieved, [11686]proceed from suspition to hatred, from hatred to frenzie, madness, injurie, murder and despair.	Those who are jealous generally, unless otherwise relieved, "proceed from suspicion to hatred, from hatred to frenzy, madness, violence, murder and despair."[11687]
[11688]A plague by whose most damnable effect, Divers in deep despair to die have sought, By which a man to madness neer is brought, As well with causlesse as with just suspect.	A plague whose most damnable effect Has made many in deep despair seek death, And brings a man close to madness Through groundless as well as justified suspicion.[11689]
In their madness many times, saith [11690]Vives, they make away themselves and others. Which induceth Cyprian to call it Fœcundam & multiplicem perniciem, fontem cladium & seminarium delictorum, a fruitfull mischief, the seminary of offences, and fountain of murders.	In their madness, Vives says, they often kill themselves and others. This leads Cyprian to call it "a prolific and manifold source of ruin, a fountain of disasters and a seedbed of crimes": a fruitful evil, the nursery of offences and fountain of murders.[11691]

[11686] Burton. Source page 613, d: "Animi dolores & zelotypia si diutius perseverent, dementes reddunt. Acak. comment. in par. art. Galeni." "Mental pains and jealousy, if they persist too long, make people mad. Acakius, commentary on Galen's Little Art."

[11687] Editor. Prognostics are forecasts of a condition's course or outcome. Injury here means wrongdoing or violence. Burton's sequence belongs to his historical account of melancholy; it is not a modern clinical prediction. Acak. names the Galenic commentator Acakius; the precise passage remains to be collated.

[11688] Burton. Source page 613, e: "Ariosto lib. 31 staff. 6." "Ariosto, book 31, stanza 6."

[11689] Editor. Ariosto, Orlando furioso 31.6, as cited. Burton prints an English quatrain rather than Italian. Suspect means suspicion, and causeless means without grounds. Exact collation of this English version is deferred.

[11690] Burton. Source page 613, f: "3. de anima, c. 3. de zelotyp. transit in rabiem & odium, & sibi & aliis violentas sæpe manus injiciunt." "On the Soul, book 3, chapter 3, on jealousy: it passes into rage and hatred, and they often lay violent hands on themselves and others."

[11691] Editor. Vives is Juan Luis Vives, De anima et vita (On the Soul and Life). Cyprian, On Jealousy and Envy 6, treats destructive envy more broadly than sexual jealousy. Burton condenses that passage, then supplies his own English paraphrase, which is retained separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tragicall examples are too common in this kind, both new and old, in all ages, as of [11692]Cephalus and Procris, [11693]Phærus of Ægypt, Tereus, Atreus, and Thyestes. [11694]Alexander Phærus was murdered of his wife, ob pellicatus suspitionem, Tully saith. Antoninus Verus was so made away by Lucilla; Demetrius the son of Antigonus, and Nicanor, by their wives. Hercules poisoned by Deianira, [11695]Cæcinna murdered by Vespasian, Justina a Romane Lady by her husband.	Tragic examples of this kind are all too common, ancient and recent, in every age: Cephalus and Procris, Phaerus of Egypt, Tereus, Atreus and Thyestes. Alexander of Pherae was murdered by his wife "on suspicion of keeping a mistress," Cicero says. Antoninus Verus was similarly killed by Lucilla; Demetrius, son of Antigonus, and Nicanor by their wives. Hercules was poisoned by Deianira; Caecinna murdered by Vespasian; and Justina, a Roman lady, by her husband.[11696]
[11697]Amestris, Xerxes wife, because she found her husbands cloak in Masista his house, cut off Masista his wives paps, and gave them to the dogs, flead her besides, and cut off her ears, lips, tongue, and slit the nose of Artaynta her daughter. Our late writers are full of such outrages.	Amestris, Xerxes's wife, because she found her husband's cloak in Masista's house, "cut off the breasts of Masista's wife and gave them to the dogs, flayed her besides, and cut off her ears, lips and tongue, and slit the nose of her daughter Artaynta." Our recent writers are full of such outrages.[11698]

[11692] Burton. Source page 613, *: "Higinus cap. 189. Ovid. &c." "Hyginus, chapter 189; Ovid; and so on."

[11693] Burton. Source page 613, g: "Phærus Ægypti rex de cæcitate oraculum consulens, visum ei rediturum accepit, si oculos abluisset lotio mulieris quæ aliorum virorum esset expers; uxoris urinam expertus nihil profecit, & aliarum frustra, eas omnes (ea excepta per quam curatus fuit) unum in locum coactas concremavit. Herod. Euterp." "Phaerus, king of Egypt, consulting an oracle about his blindness, was told that his sight would return if he washed his eyes with the urine of a woman who had known no other men. Trying his wife's urine achieved nothing, and others' were tried in vain. He gathered all these women in one place—except the one through whom he was cured—and burned them. Herodotus, Euterpe."

[11694] Burton. Source page 613, h: "Offic. lib. 2." "On Duties, book 2."

[11695] Burton. Source page 613, i: "Aurelius Victor."

[11696] Editor. The catalogue combines myth, historical narrative and poisoning allegations. Hyginus, Fabulae 189.9, confirms the Procris reference: fearing Cephalus's attachment to Aurora, she hides in bushes; he sees the bushes move, throws his javelin and unknowingly kills her. Deianira destroys Hercules while trying to recover his love. Herodotus 2.111 supplies Phaerus; Cicero, On Duties 2.25, supplies Alexander's wife's suspicion. The remaining allegations still require collation.

[11697] Burton. Source page 613, k: "Herod. lib. 9. in Calliope. Masistæ uxorem excarnificat, mammillas præscindit, easque canibus abjicit, filiæ nares præscidit, labia, linguam, &c." "Herodotus, book 9, Calliope. She flays Masista's wife, cuts off her breasts and throws them to the dogs; she cuts off the daughter's nose, lips, tongue, and so on."

[11698] Editor. Herodotus 9.108–113 tells of Xerxes, Artaynte and her mother. At 9.112 all the listed mutilations are inflicted on Masistes' wife. Burton distributes them between mother and daughter; his margin and main text also distribute the injuries differently. Both are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 614 [11699]Paulus Æmilius in his History of France, hath a Tragicall story of Chilpericus the first his death, made away by Ferdegunde his Queene. In a jealous humour he came from hunting, and stole behinde his wife, as she was dressing and combing her head in the sun, gave her a familiar touch with his wand, which she mistaking for her lover said, Ah Landre, a good Knight should strike before, and not behinde: but when she saw her self betrayed by his presence, she instantly took order to make him away.	In his History of France, Paulus Aemilius tells a tragic story of the death of Chilperic I, killed through the agency of his queen, Fredegund. In a jealous mood he returned from hunting, crept behind his wife as she was arranging and combing her hair in the sun, and gave her an intimate tap with his rod. Mistaking him for her lover, she said, "Ah, Landre, a good knight should strike from the front, not from behind." But when she saw that his presence had betrayed her, she immediately arranged to have him killed.[11700]
Hierome Osorius in the eleventh book of the deeds of Emanuel King of Portugal, to this effect hath a tragicall narration of one Ferdinandus Chalderia, that wounded Gotherinus a noble countryman of his at Goa in the East Indies, [11701]and cut off one of his legs, for that he looked as he thought too familiarly upon his wife, which was afterwards a cause of many quarrels, and much bloodshed.	In book 11 of the Deeds of Emanuel, King of Portugal, Jerónimo Osório tells a tragic story to the same effect about a certain Ferdinandus Chalderia. At Goa in the East Indies he wounded Gotherinus, a nobleman from his own country, "and cut off one of his legs because, as he thought, the man looked too familiarly at his wife. This later caused many quarrels and much bloodshed."[11702]

[11699] Burton. Source page 614, l: "Lib. 1. Dum formæ curandæ intenta capillum in sole pectit, à marito per lusum leviter percussa furtim superveniente virga, Risu suborto, mi Landrice dixit, frontem vir fortis petet &c. Marito conspecto attonita, cum Landrico mox in ejus mortem conspirat, & statim inter venandum efficit." "Book 1. While intent on her appearance, combing her hair in the sun, she was lightly struck in play with a rod by her husband, who had crept up behind her. Laughing, she said, "My Landric, a brave man will aim at the front," and so on. Stunned at seeing her husband, she soon conspired with Landric to kill him and immediately accomplished it while he was hunting."

[11700] Editor. Paulus Aemilius is Paolo Emili, historian of the French monarchy. Burton presents the murder as a story from his book 1; its details are not independently established here. His Ferdegunde is Fredegund, and Landre corresponds to the marginal Landricus.

[11701] Burton. Source page 614, m: "Qui Goæ uxorem habens, Gotherinum principem quendam virum quod uxori suæ oculos adjecisset, ingenti vulnere deformavit in facie, & tibiam abscidit, unde mutuæ cædes." "Having a wife at Goa, he disfigured the face of a certain nobleman, Gotherinus, with a great wound and cut off his leg because he had cast his eyes on his wife; hence killings on both sides."

[11702] Editor. Osorius is Jerónimo Osório. The cited work concerns King Manuel I of Portugal, whom Burton calls Emanuel. The names Chalderia and Gotherinus are retained pending collation of book 11; Goa is the setting given by Burton.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Guianerius cap.36. de ægritud. matr. speakes of a silly jealous fellow, that seeing his childe new born included in a kell, thought sure an Franciscan that used to come to his house, [11703]was the father of it, it was so like the Friers Coule, and thereupon threatned the Frier to kill him. Fulgosius of a woman in Narbone that cut off her husbands privities in the night, because she thought he plaid false with her.	Guainerio, in chapter 36 of On Diseases of the Womb, speaks of a foolish jealous man who, seeing his newborn child enclosed in a caul, was certain "that a Franciscan who used to visit his house was its father, because it looked so like the friar's cowl; and he therefore threatened to kill the friar." Fulgosius tells of a woman at Narbonne who cut off her husband's genitals at night because she thought he was unfaithful to her.[11704]
The story of Jonuses Bassa, and fair Manto his wife, is well known to such as have read the Turkish History; and that of Ioane of Spaine, of which I treated in my former section. Her jealousie, saith Gomesius, was cause of both their deaths: King Philip died for grief a little after, as [11705]Martian his Physitian gave it out, and she for her part after a melancholy discontented life, mispent in lurking holes and corners, made an end of her miseries.	The story of Yunus Pasha and his beautiful wife Manto is well known to those who have read the Turkish History, as is the story of Joan of Spain, which I discussed in the preceding section. Her jealousy, says Gomesius, caused both their deaths: King Philip died of grief shortly afterwards, as Martian, his physician, reported; "and she, for her part, after a melancholy, unhappy life wasted in lurking in holes and corners, brought her miseries to an end."[11706]

[11703] Burton. Source page 614, n: "Eo quod infans natus involutus esset panniculo, credebat eum filium fratris Francisci, &c." "Because the newborn child was wrapped in a little membrane, he thought it was the son of Brother Francis, and so on."

[11704] Editor. Kell means caul, the membrane sometimes covering a newborn child; coule means a friar's cowl or hood. The joke depends on their resemblance. Guianerius is Antonio Guainerio; Fulgosius is Battista Fregoso. The two case reports remain uncollated.

[11705] Burton. Source page 614, p: "Zelotypia reginæ regis mortem acceleravit paulo post, ut Martianus medicus mihi retulit. Illa autem atra bile inde exagitata in latebras se subducens præ ægritudine animi reliquum tempus consumpsit." "The queen's jealousy hastened the king's death shortly afterwards, as the physician Martian reported to me. But she, tormented thereafter by black bile, withdrew into hiding and spent the rest of her time in anguish of mind."

[11706] Editor. Jonuses Bassa is rendered Yunus Pasha; the cited Turkish History is not specified here. Joan is Joanna of Castile, wife of Philip. Burton's statement that jealousy caused both deaths is stronger than his Latin margin, which says she spent the rest of her life in distress. "Made an end of her miseries" does not establish suicide. This is the cited author's causal story, not an independently verified explanation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Felix Pater in the first book of his observations, hath many such instances, of a Physitian of his acquaintance, [11707]that was first mad through Jealousie, and afterwards desperate: of a Merchant [11708]that killed his wife in the same humour, and after precipitated himself: Of a Doctor of law that cut off his mans nose: of a Painters wife in Basil Anno 1600, that was mother of nine children, and had been 27 yeers married, yet afterwards jealous, and so impatient that she became desperate, and would neither eat nor drink in her own house, for fear her husband should poison her.	Felix Pater, in the first book of his Observations, has many such examples: a physician he knew "who first went mad through jealousy and afterwards fell into despair"; a merchant "who killed his wife in the same state and afterwards threw himself from a height"; a doctor of law who cut off his servant's nose; and a painter's wife at Basel in 1600, the mother of nine children and married for twenty-seven years, who nevertheless became jealous afterwards, and so distressed that she fell into despair and would neither eat nor drink in her own house, for fear that her husband would poison her.[11709]
'Tis a common signe this; for when once the humours are stirred, and the imagination misaffected, it will vary it self in divers forms; and many such absurd symptomes will accompany, even madness it self. Skenkius observat. lib.4. cap. de Uter. hath an example of a jealous woman that by this means had many fits of the Mother: and in his first book of some that through jealousie ran mad: of a Baker that gelded himself to try his wives honesty, &c. Such examples are too common.	This is a common sign: once the humours are disturbed and the imagination affected, it will take different forms, accompanied by many such strange symptoms, even madness itself. Schenck, in his Observations, book 4, in the chapter on the womb, gives an example of a jealous woman who suffered many fits of the mother through this cause; and in his first book he writes of people driven mad by jealousy, and of a baker who castrated himself to test his wife's chastity, and so on. Such examples are all too common.[11710]

[11707] Burton. Source page 614, q: "A zelotypia redactus ad insaniam & desperationem." "Reduced by jealousy to madness and despair."

[11708] Burton. Source page 614, r: "Uxorem interemit, inde desperabundus ex alto se præcipitavit." "He killed his wife, then in despair threw himself from a height."

[11709] Editor. Felix Pater is the printed form for Felix Platter; Basil is Basel. The scan reads 1600, not 1609. Desperate denotes despair or desperation and does not in every occurrence specify a suicidal act. Burton's case summaries are retained without assigning modern diagnoses.

[11710] Editor. Fits of the Mother is an early medical name for attacks attributed to the womb; "Mother" means uterus. Skenkius is Johann Schenck von Grafenberg. His observations are presented within humoral and uterine explanations that differ from present medical categories.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 615 MEMB. 4. SUBSECT. 1.	MEMBER 4. SUBSECTION 1.
Cure of Jealosie: buy avoiding occasions, not to be idle: of good counsell: to contemn it, not to watch or lock them up: to dissemble it, &c.	The cure of jealousy: avoiding occasions for it, keeping occupied; good counsel; disregarding it, not watching women or locking them up; concealing it, and so on.
As of all other melancholy, some doubt whether this malady may be cured or no, they think 'tis like the [11711]Gout, or Suitzers, whom we commonly call Wallownes, those hired souldiers, if once they take possession of a Castle, they can never be got out.	As with every other form of melancholy, some doubt whether this illness can be cured. They think it is like gout, or those hired Swiss soldiers whom we commonly call Walloons: once they take possession of a castle, they can never be driven out.[11712]
Qui timet ut sua sit, ne quis sibi subtrahat illam, Ille Machaonia vix ope salvus erit.	He who fears she may not be his, lest someone take her from him, Will scarcely be cured even by Machaon's aid.[11713]
[11714]This is that cruel wound against whose smart, No liquors force prevailes, or any plaister, No skill of stars, no depth of Magick art, Devised by that great clerk Zoroaster, A wound that so infects the soul and heart, As all our sense and reason it doth master; A wound whose pang and torment is so durable, As it may rightly called be incurable.	This is the cruel wound whose pain No potent liquid or plaster can relieve, No knowledge of the stars, no depth of magic Devised by that great scholar Zoroaster: A wound that so infects the soul and heart That it overpowers all our sense and reason; A wound whose pang and torment last so long That it may rightly be called incurable.[11715]

[11711] Burton. Source page 615, s: "Tollere nodosam nescit medicina podagram." "Medicine does not know how to remove knotty gout."

[11712] Editor. Suitzers means Swiss soldiers. Burton identifies them here with Walloons, although the names designate different peoples; the wording is preserved. His gout quotation is Ovid, Ex Ponto 1.3.23. It serves an analogy for supposed incurability. The heading prints "buy avoiding," rendered "avoiding" in modern English.

[11713] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 545–546. Machaon is the physician of Greek heroic tradition. Burton prints subtrahat and salvus where the consulted Latin text has detrahat and sanus; the translation follows Burton's wording.

[11714] Burton. Source page 615, t: "Ariosto lib. 31. staff. 5." "Ariosto, book 31, stanza 5."

[11715] Editor. Ariosto, Orlando furioso 31.5, in Harington's 1607 English translation, matches this stanza in the EEBO-TCP transcription, which has "nor any plaster" against Burton's "or any plaister." The printed Harington witness and Burton's precise edition remain uncollated. Clerk means learned man; plaster is a medicinal dressing. Zoroaster appears as a legendary master of magic. The eight lines are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yet what I have formerly said of other Melancholy, I will say again; it may be cured or mitigated at least by some contrary passion, good counsel and perswasion, if it be withstood in the beginning, maturely resisted, and as those Ancients hold, [11716]the nailes of it be pared before they grow too long.	Yet I will say again what I have said before about other melancholy: it may be cured, or at least lessened, by some opposing passion, good counsel and persuasion, if it is resisted at the outset, opposed in good time, "and, as the ancients maintain, its nails are trimmed before they grow too long."[11717]
No better means to resist or repell it then by avoiding idleness, to be still seriously busied about some matters of importance, to drive out those vain fears, foolish fantasies and irksome suspitions out of his head, and then to be perswaded by his judicious friends, to give ear to their good counsel and advice,	There is no better way to resist or repel it than to avoid idleness, remaining earnestly occupied with important matters, to drive those empty fears, foolish fancies and troublesome suspicions out of his head; and then to let his sensible friends persuade him to listen to their good counsel and advice, and wisely to consider, how much he discredits himself, his friends, dishonours his children, disgraceth his family, publisheth his shame, and as a trumpeter of his own misery, divulgeth, macerates, grieves himself and others; what an argument of weakness it is, how absurd a thing in its own nature, how ridiculous, how brutish a passion, how sottish, how odious; for as [11718]Hierome well hath it, Odium sui facit, & ipse novissimè sibi odio est, others hate him, and at last he hates himself for it; how harebrain a disease, mad and furious. If he will but hear them speak, no doubt he may be cured.	and to consider wisely how greatly he discredits himself and his friends, dishonours his children, disgraces his family and makes his shame public. Like a trumpeter of his own misery, he broadcasts it, wears himself down, and grieves himself and others. Let him consider what evidence of weakness it is; how absurd in its own nature, how ridiculous and brutish a passion, how foolish and hateful. For, as Jerome aptly says, "He makes himself hated, and finally becomes hateful to himself": others hate him, and at last he hates himself for it. What a reckless illness, mad and furious! If only he will hear them speak, he may undoubtedly be cured.[11719]

[11716] Burton. Source page 615, u: "Veteres mature suadent ungues amoris esse radendos, priusquam producant se nimiùm." "The ancients advise trimming love's nails in good time, before they grow too long."

[11717] Editor. Maturely means promptly or in good time. The image is of trimming the passion's claws before it gains strength. Burton's margin attributes the saying collectively to "the ancients," without naming a work.

[11718] Burton. Source page 615, †: "In Iovianum." "Against Jovinian."

[11719] Editor. Hierome is Jerome; the marginal title is Against Jovinian. Sottish means foolish or senseless, and harebrain means rash or unbalanced. The exact Jerome quotation remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11720]Ioan Queen of Spain, of whom I have formerly spoken, under pretence of changing air, was sent to Complutum, or Alcada de las Heneras, where Ximenius the Archbishop of Toledo then lived, that by his good counsel (as for the present she was) she might be eased. [11721]For a disease of the soul, if concealed, tortures and overturnes it, and by no physick can sooner be removed then by a discreet mans comfortable speeches.	Joan, queen of Spain, whom I mentioned before, was sent under the pretext of a change of air to Complutum, or Alcalá de Henares, where Ximenius, archbishop of Toledo, then lived, so that his good counsel might relieve her—as it did for the time being. "For an illness of the soul, if concealed, tortures and overturns it, and no medicine can remove it more quickly than a sensible person's consoling words."[11722]
Source page 615–616 I will not here insert any consolatory sentences to this purpose, or forestall any mans invention, but leave it every one to dilate and amplifie as he shall think fit in his own judgment: let him advise with Siracides cap.9.1. Be not jealous over the wife of thy bosome; read that comfortable and pithy speech to this purpose of Ximenius in the author himself, as it is recorded by Gomesius; consult with Chaloner lib.9.de repub. Anglor. or Cælia in her Epistles, &c.	I will not insert consoling sayings here for this purpose, or anticipate anyone's invention, but leave each person to expand on the matter as their own judgment thinks fit. Let him consult Sirach 9:1, "Do not be jealous of the wife of your bosom"; read Ximenius's consoling and forceful speech on this subject in the author himself, as Gomesius records it; consult Chaloner's On the English Commonwealth, book 9, or Cælia's Epistles, and so on.[11723]

[11720] Burton. Source page 615, x: "Gomesius lib. 3. de reb. gestis Ximenii." "Gomesius, Deeds of Ximenius, book 3."

[11721] Burton. Source page 615, y: "Urit enim præcordia ægritudo animi compressa, & in angustias adducta mentem subvertit, nec alio medicamine facilius erigitur, quam cordati hominis sermone." "For distress of mind, when suppressed, burns the heart, and when hemmed in overturns the mind; nor is it more readily raised up by any other remedy than the speech of a sensible person."

[11722] Editor. Complutum is Alcalá de Henares. Ximenius is Francisco Jiménez de Cisneros; Gomesius is Álvar Gómez de Castro, author of De rebus gestis a Francisco Ximenio Cisnerio. The passage advocates consoling conversation; Burton's exact historical source remains to be collated.

[11723] Editor. Siracides is the biblical Book of Sirach, also called Ecclesiasticus. Chaloner is Thomas Chaloner, author of De republica Anglorum instauranda. The attribution to Cælia's Epistles is retained but not securely identified here; it should not silently be expanded to a guessed author.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 616 Only this I will add, that if it be considered aright, which causeth this jealous passion, be it just or unjust, whether with or without cause, true or false, it ought not so hainously to be taken; 'tis no such real or capital matter, that it should make so deep a wound. 'Tis a blow that hurts not, an insensible smart, grounded many times upon false suspition alone, and so fostered by a sinister conceit.	I will add only this: if whatever causes this jealous passion is rightly considered, whether it is justified or unjustified, well founded or groundless, true or false, it ought not to be taken so grievously. It is not so substantial or momentous a matter that it should inflict so deep a wound. It is a blow that does not hurt, a pain not physically felt, often founded on false suspicion alone and then nourished by a hostile interpretation.[11724]
If she be not dishonest, he troubles and macerates himself without a cause; or put case which is the worst, he be a cuckold, it cannot be helped, the more he stirres in it, the more he aggravates his own misery. How much better were it in such a case to dissemble or contemn it? why should that be feared which cannot be redressed? multæ tandem deposuerunt (saith [11725]Vives) quum flecti maritos non posse vident, many women when they see there is no remedy, have been pacified; and shall men be more jealous then women? 'Tis some comfort in such a case to have companions,	If she is not unfaithful, he torments and wears himself down without cause. Or suppose the worst: he is a cuckold. It cannot be helped, and the more he stirs the matter up, the more he increases his own misery. How much better, in such a case, to conceal or disregard it! Why fear what cannot be remedied? "Many women have finally put it aside," says Vives, "when they see that their husbands cannot be changed": many women have grown calm when they see there is no remedy. And are men to be more jealous than women? In such a case there is some comfort in having companions,
Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris;	It comforts the wretched to have companions in sorrow.[11726]

[11724] Editor. Capital means principal or momentous. Macerate means wear down or torment. Burton shifts from terrifying examples to a deliberately minimizing consolation: the "insensible" wound is one not physically felt. This rhetorical change does not erase the suffering described just before it.

[11725] Burton. Source page 616, z: "3. De anima." "On the Soul, book 3."

[11726] Editor. A proverbial Latin consolation, translated without a secure author attribution. Burton uses shared misfortune as an argument for endurance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Who can say he is free? Who can assure himself he is not one de præterito, or secure himself de futuro? If it were his case alone, it were hard; but being as it is almost a common calamity, 'tis not so grievously to be taken. If a man have a lock, which every mans key will open, as well as his own; why should he think to keep it private to himself?	Who can say he is exempt? Who can assure himself he has not been one in the past, or protect himself for the future? If his case were unique, it would be hard; but since it is almost a universal misfortune, he should not take it so grievously. If a man has a lock that everyone else's key will open as well as his own, why should he expect to reserve it for himself?
In some countries they make nothing of it, ne nobiles quidem, saith [11727]Leo Afer, in many parts of Africk (if she be past fourteen) there's not a Noble man that marries a maid, or that hath a chast wife; 'tis so common; as the Moon gives horns once a moneth to the world, do they to their husbands at least.	In some countries they think nothing of it. "Not even the nobles," says Leo Africanus: in many parts of Africa no nobleman marries a virgin, if she is over fourteen, or has a chaste wife. It is so common that, just as the moon shows its horns to the world once a month, they give horns to their husbands at least as often.[11728]
And 'tis most part true which that Caledonian Lady, [11729]Argetocoxus a Brittish Prince his wife, told Iulia Augusta, when she took her up for dishonesty, We Brittaines are naught at least with some few choice men of the better sort, but you Romanes lye with every base knave, you are a company of common whores.	And it is largely true, what that Caledonian lady, the wife of Argetocoxus, a British prince, told Julia Augusta when she rebuked her for unchastity: "We Britons at least misbehave with a few select men of the better sort; but you Roman women sleep with every low scoundrel. You are a company of common whores."[11730]

[11727] Burton. Source page 616, a: "Lib. 3." "Book 3."

[11728] Editor. Leo Afer is Leo Africanus. Burton's broad claim about African women and the nobility is a generalization attributed to book 3, not a verified demographic statement. Maid means virgin. The monthly crescent's horns supply another cuckoldry joke; exact collation of the cited passage remains open.

[11729] Burton. Source page 616, b: "Argetocoxi Caledonii Reguli uxor, Iuliæ Augustæ cum ipsam morderet quod inhoneste versaretur, respondet, nos cum optimis viris consuetudinem habemus; vos Romanas autem occulte passim homines constuprant." "The wife of Argetocoxus, a Caledonian ruler, replies to Julia Augusta, when she taunts her for living unchastely: "We have relations with the best men; but you Roman women are secretly debauched by men indiscriminately."" [11730] Editor. Cassius Dio, Roman History 77.16.5 in the consulted numbering (76.16.5 in another common scheme). Julia Augusta is Julia Domna. Dio reports a sharp reply by the wife of Argentocoxus; Burton intensifies its language. His Argetocoxus is preserved as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Severus the Emperor in his time made laws for the restraint of this vice; and as [11731]Dion Nicæus relates in his life, tria millia mœchorum, three thousand cuckold makers, or naturæ monetam adulterantes, as Philo cals them, false coyners, and clippers of natures money, were summoned into the Court at once. And yet,	In his time the emperor Severus made laws to restrain this vice; and, as Dio of Nicaea relates in his life, "three thousand adulterers"—three thousand makers of cuckolds, or "counterfeiters of nature's coin," as Philo calls them, false coiners and clippers of nature's money—were summoned before the court at once. And yet,[11732]
Non omnem molitor quæ fluit unda videt,	The miller does not see all the water that flows by, the Miller sees not all the water that goes by his mill: no doubt but as in our daies, these were of the commonalty, all the great ones were not so much as called in question for it. [11733]Martials Epigram I suppose might have been generally applied in those licencious times, Omnia solus habes, &c. thy goods, lands, mony, wits are thine own, Uxorem sed habes Candide cum populo; but neighbour Candidus your wife is common:	the miller does not see all the water that passes his mill. No doubt, as in our own days, these were ordinary people; the great were not all so much as called to account for it. Martial's epigram, I suppose, might have been generally applied in those licentious times: "You alone possess everything," and so on—your goods, lands, money and wits are your own—"but, Candidus, you share your wife with the public": but, neighbour Candidus, your wife is common property.[11734]

[11731] Burton. Source page 616, c: "Leges de mœchis fecit, ex civibus plures in jus vocati." "He made laws against adulterers; many citizens were summoned before the court."

[11732] Editor. Dio 77.16.4 (also numbered 76.16.4) says that he found three thousand adultery indictments on the docket during his consulship, with few actually prosecuted. Burton turns the docket into a simultaneous summons of three thousand adulterers. Philo's coinage metaphor makes adultery a falsification of descent; its precise source is not established here.

[11733] Burton. Source page 616, d: "L. 3. Epig. 26." "Book 3, epigram 26."

[11734] Editor. Martial 3.26.5–6: Candidus possesses his property alone but shares his wife with the public. Burton intersperses the Latin with an expanded English paraphrase. The miller's maxim immediately before it also retains its separate Latin and English forms.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 616–617 Husband and Cuckold in that age it seems were reciprocal termes; the Emperors themselves did wear Actæons badge; how many Cæsars might I reckon up together, and what a catalogue of cornuted Kings and Princes in every story? Agamemnon, Menelaus, Philippus, of Greece, Ptolomeus of Ægypt, Lucullus, Cæsar, Pompeius, Cato, Augustus, Antonius, Antoninus, &c. that wore fair plumes of Bulls feathers in their crests. The bravest souldiers and most heroical spirits could not avoid it. They have been active and passive in this business, they have either given or taken horns.	Husband and cuckold seem to have been interchangeable terms in that age. The emperors themselves wore Actaeon's badge. How many Caesars could I list together, and what a catalogue of horned kings and princes appears in every history! Agamemnon, Menelaus and Philip of Greece; Ptolemy of Egypt; Lucullus, Caesar, Pompey, Cato, Augustus, Antony, Antoninus, and so on—all wore fine plumes of bulls' feathers in their crests. The bravest soldiers and most heroic spirits could not escape it. They have been both agents and victims in this business: they have either given horns or received them.[11735]
Source page 617 [11736]King Arthur whom we call one of the nine worthies, for all his great valour was unworthily served by Mordred one of his Round-table knights: and Guithera, or Helena Alba his fair wife, as Leland interprets it, was an arrant honest woman. Parcerem libenter (saith mine [11737]author) Heroinarum læsæ majestati, si non historiæ veritas aurem vellicaret, I could willingly wink at a fair Ladies faults, but that I am bound by the laws of history to tell the truth: against his will, God knows, did he write it, and so do I repeat it.	King Arthur, whom we call one of the Nine Worthies, for all his great valour was shamefully treated by Mordred, one of his Round Table knights; and Guithera, or Helena Alba, his beautiful wife, as Leland interprets her name, was a thoroughly honest woman. "I would gladly spare the injured majesty of heroines," says my author, "if historical truth did not tug at my ear": I could willingly overlook a beautiful lady's faults, but the laws of history bind me to tell the truth. God knows he wrote it against his will, and I repeat it against mine.[11738]

[11735] Editor. Actaeon, changed into a stag, supplies the badge of horns; "bulls' feathers" is another comic name for horns. Cornuted means horned or cuckolded. The catalogue treats different historical and legendary stories as instances of the same condition; the list is not independently authenticated here.

[11736] Burton. Source page 617, e: "Asser Arthuri; parcerem libenter heroinarum læsæ majestati, si non historiæ veritas aurem vellicaret. Leland." "Defence of Arthur: I would gladly spare the injured majesty of heroines, if historical truth did not tug at my ear. Leland."

[11737] Burton. Source page 617, †: "Lelands assert. Arthuri." "Leland's Defence of Arthur."

[11738] Editor. Leland is John Leland, Assertio inclytissimi Arturii regis Britanniae (Defence of the Illustrious Arthur, King of Britain). The Nine Worthies are an exemplary group of heroes including Arthur. Guithera designates Guinevere; Helena Alba means "White Helen." Crucially, the scan prints "arrant honest woman," not "dishonest": the modern text preserves the apparent contradiction, which may be ironic or a printing error. The intended force of the phrase remains uncertain.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I speak not of our times all this while, we have good, honest, vertuous men and women, whom fame, zeal, fear of God, religion and superstition containes: and yet for all that, we have too many knights of this order, so dubbed by their wives, many good women abused by dissolute husbands. In some places, and such persons you may as soon injoyn them to carry water in a Sive, as to keep themselves honest.	All this time I have not been speaking of our own age. We have good, honest, virtuous men and women, restrained by reputation, zeal, fear of God, religion and superstition. Yet, for all that, we have too many knights of this order, knighted by their wives, and many good women wronged by dissolute husbands. In some places, with some people, you might as well order them to carry water in a sieve as to keep themselves faithful.[11739]
What shall a man do now in such a case? What remedy is to be had? how shall he be eased? By suing a divorce? that is hard to be effected: si non caste, tamen cautè, they carry the matter so cunningly, that though it be as common as Simony, as clear and as manifest as the nose in a mans face, yet it cannot be evidently proved, or they likely taken in the fact: they will have a knave Gallus to watch, or with that Roman [11740]Sulpitia, all made fast and sure,	What is a man to do in such a case? What remedy is there? How is he to find relief? By seeking a divorce? That is hard to achieve. “If not chastely, at least cautiously”: they manage the affair so cunningly that, though it is as common as simony and as plain as the nose on a man’s face, it cannot be clearly proved, nor are they likely to be caught in the act. They will have some rogue of a Gallus to keep watch, or, like that Roman Sulpitia, have everything secured,[11741]
Ne se Cadurcis destitutam fasciis, Nudam Caleno concumbentem videat.	Lest he see her stripped of her Cadurcian linen, Lying naked with Calenus.[11742]

[11739] Editor. “Knights of this order” continues the mock chivalric language for cuckolds; their wives have metaphorically knighted them. Fame means concern for reputation, and contain means restrain.

[11740] Burton. Source page 617, †: “Epigram.”

[11741] Editor. Simony is trafficking in church offices or spiritual benefits. “If not chastely, at least cautiously” is a maxim of concealment. Gallus is presented as a lookout; its precise literary reference remains unresolved. Burton’s account of divorce is historical and rhetorical, not present legal advice.

[11742] Editor. Cadurcian linen takes its name from the Cadurci of Gaul. A related couplet ascribed to Sulpicia is quoted under CADURCI in Hofmann’s Lexicon universale; its form differs from Burton’s. Martial 10.38 presents Sulpicia and Calenus as husband and wife, so Burton’s use here as an illustration of concealed infidelity is problematic. The unidentified “he” in Burton’s Latin is left unspecified; no husband or deity is silently supplied.

Original text 1651	Modern English
She will hardly be surprised by her husband, be he never so wary. Much better then to put it up: the more he strives in it, the more he shall divulge his own shame; make a vertue of necessity, and conceal it. Yea but the world takes notice of it, 'tis in every mans mouth: let them talke their pleasure, of whom speak they not in this sence? From the highest to the lowest they are thus censured all: there is no remedy then but patience.	Her husband will scarcely catch her, however watchful he is. Far better, then, to put up with it: the more he struggles over it, the more he will publicize his own shame. Make a virtue of necessity and conceal it. Yes, but the world notices it; everyone is talking about it. Let them talk as they please. Of whom do they not speak in this way? From the highest to the lowest, they judge everyone so. There is no remedy, then, but patience.
It may be 'tis his own fault, and he hath no reason to complain, 'tis quid pro quo, she is bad, he is worse: [11743]Bethink thy self, hast thou not done as much for some of thy neighbours? why dost thou require that of thy wife, which thou wilt not performe thy self? Thou rangest like a Town Bull, [11744]why art thou so incensed if she tread awry?	Perhaps it is his own fault, and he has no reason to complain: it is a return in kind; she is bad, and he is worse. "Think: have you not done as much to some of your neighbours? Why do you require from your wife what you will not do yourself?" You roam like a town bull: "Why are you so furious if she strays?"[11745]

[11743] Burton. Source page 617, f: "Cogita an sic aliis tu unquam feceris; an hoc tibi nunc fieri dignum sit? severus aliis, indulgens tibi, cur ab uxore exigis quod non ipse præstas? Plutar." "Consider whether you have ever done this to others, and whether you deserve to have it done to you now. Harsh towards others, indulgent towards yourself, why do you demand from your wife what you do not yourself supply? Plutarch."

[11744] Burton. Source page 617, g: "Vaga libidine cum ipse quovis rapiaris, cur si vel modicum aberret ipsa, insanias?" "Since you yourself are swept anywhere by wandering lust, why go mad if she strays even a little?"

[11745] Editor. Quid pro quo means a return in kind, here retaliatory infidelity; the town bull is a communal breeding bull. Plutarch, Conjugal Precepts 47, condemns a husband who enjoys the conduct he forbids his wife, comparing him to a deserter demanding that she fight. This confirms the parallel in English translation; Burton's fuller Latin wording and intermediary remain untraced.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11746]Be it that some woman break chast wedlocks laws, And leaves her husband and becomes unchast: Yet commonly it is not without cause, She sees her man in sin her goods to waste, She feeles that he his love from her withdraws, And hath on some perhaps less worthy plac't, Who strikes with sword, the scabbard them may strike, And sure love craveth love, like asketh like.	Suppose some woman breaks chaste marriage's laws, Leaves her husband and becomes unfaithful: Usually it is not without a cause. She sees her husband waste her property in sin, Feels that he has withdrawn his love from her And given it to someone perhaps less worthy. Whoever strikes with the sword may be struck by the scabbard; Surely love calls for love, and like demands like.[11747]
Source page 617–618 Ea semper studebit, saith [11748]Nevisanus, pares reddere vices, she will quit it if she can. And therefore as well adviseth Siracides, cap.9.1. teach her not an evill lesson against thy self, which as Iansenius, Lyranus, on this text and Carthusianus interpret, is no otherwise to bee understood then that she do thee not a mischief. I do not excuse her in accusing thee; but if both be naught, mend they self first; for as the old saying is, A good husband makes a good wife.	"She will always try," says Nevisanus, "to repay like for like": she will pay you back if she can. Therefore Sirach 9:1 aptly advises, "Do not teach her an evil lesson against yourself." As Jansenius and Nicholas of Lyra explain this passage, along with Denis the Carthusian, it means simply that she should not do you harm. I do not excuse her by accusing you; but if both are at fault, reform yourself first. For, as the old saying goes, a good husband makes a good wife.[11749]

[11746] Burton. Source page 617, h: "Ariosto li. 28. staffe 80." "Ariosto, book 28, stanza 80."

[11747] Editor. Ariosto, Orlando furioso 28.80, as cited. Sword and scabbard carry a sexual double meaning while arguing for reciprocal treatment. The print has "the scabbard them may strike"; the modern version makes the apparent intended relation readable without altering the original column.

[11748] Burton. Source page 617, i: "Sylva nupt. l. 4. num. 72." "The Marriage Forest, book 4, number 72."

[11749] Editor. Quit it means repay or retaliate. Nevisanus is Giovanni Nevizzano, author of Sylva nuptialis. Burton names biblical commentators on Sirach 9:1; Carthusianus is Denis the Carthusian. The scan's "mend they self" is rendered "reform yourself." Identification of the particular Jansenius commentary remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 618 Yea but thou repliest, 'Tis not the like reason betwixt man and woman, through her fault my children are bastards, I may not endure it; [11750]Sit amarulenta, sit imperiosa, prodiga, &c. Let her scold, brawl, and spend, I care not, modo sit casta, so she be honest, I could easily bear it; but this I cannot, I may not, I will not; my faith, my fame, mine eye must not be touched, as the diverbe is,	Yes, but you reply, the same reasoning does not apply to men and women: through her fault my children are bastards; I cannot endure it. "Let her be bitter, domineering, wasteful," and so on—let her scold, quarrel and spend, I do not care, "provided she is chaste"; so long as she is faithful, I could easily bear it. But this I cannot, I must not, I will not bear. My faith, my reputation and my eye must not be touched, as the saying goes,[11751]
Non patitur tactum fama, fides, oculus.	Reputation, faith and the eye cannot bear a touch.

[11750] Burton. Source page 618, k: "Lemnius lib. 4. cap. 13. de occult. nat. mir." "Lemnius, On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 4, chapter 13."

[11751] Editor. Lemnius is Levinus Lemnius; the margin cites De occultis naturae miraculis. Diverbe means proverb or saying. Faith may include fidelity or trust; the sequence compares these vulnerable possessions with the sensitive eye. Burton now voices the husband's objection, rather than simply speaking in his own person.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I say the same of my wife, touch all, use all, take all but this. I acknowledge that of Seneca to be true, Nullius boni jucunda possessio sine socio, there is no sweet content in the possession of any good thing without a companion, this only accepted, I say, This.	I say the same of my wife: touch everything, use everything, take everything except this. I acknowledge the truth of Seneca's saying, "No good thing is pleasant to possess without a companion": there is no sweet satisfaction in possessing any good thing without someone to share it—except this alone, I say, this.[11752]
And why this? Even this which thou so much abhorrest, it may be for thy progenies good, [11753]better be any mans son then thine, to be begot of base Irus, poor Seius, or mean Mevius, the town swineheards, a shepheards son: and well is he, that like Hercules he hath any two fathers; for thou thy self hast paradventure more diseases then an horse, more infirmities of body and minde, a cankerd soul, crabbed conditions,	And why this? Even this thing you abhor so much may benefit your offspring. Better to be any man's son than yours: begotten by lowly Irus, poor Seius or humble Mevius, the town swineherd's son, a shepherd's son. And fortunate is he who, like Hercules, has any two fathers; for you yourself may perhaps have more diseases than a horse, more weaknesses of body and mind, a corrupted soul and a sour disposition.[11754]
make the worst of it, as it is vulnus insanabile, sic vulnus insensibile, as it is incurable, so it is insensible. But art thou sure it is so?	Take the worst view of it: just as it is "an incurable wound, so it is a wound not felt"; as it is incurable, so it causes no bodily pain. But are you sure it is so?

[11752] Editor. Seneca, Moral Letters 6.4, speaks of sharing knowledge and wisdom. Burton applies the maxim to possessions while the imagined husband insists on an exception for his wife. The printed "accepted" is interpreted as "excepted" in context. Latin and Burton's English paraphrase remain separate.

[11753] Burton. Source page 618, l: "Optimum bene nasci." "It is best to be well born."

[11754] Editor. Burton answers with deliberately provocative consolation: the other father might be better than the jealous husband. Irus, Seius and Mevius function as contemptuous or generic names. Hercules's two fathers are his divine father Jupiter and his human father Amphitryon. "Crabbed conditions" means an ill-tempered disposition; the passage reflects historical assumptions about birth and inheritance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11755]res agit ille tuas? doth he so indeed? It may be thou art over suspitious, and without a cause as some are: if it be octimestris partus, born at eight months, or like him, and him they fondly suspect he got it; if she speak or laugh familiarly with such or such men, then presently she is naught with them; such is thy weaknes: Whereas charity, or a well-disposed minde, would interpret all unto the best.	"Is he attending to your business?" Does he really do so? Perhaps you are excessively suspicious and, like some people, without cause. If it is "an eight-month birth"—born at eight months—or the child resembles this man or that, they foolishly suspect that he fathered it. If she speaks or laughs freely with such and such men, then at once she must be sleeping with them. Such is your weakness; whereas charity, or a well-disposed mind, would put the best construction on everything.[11756]
S. Francis by chance seeing a Frier familiarly kissing another mans wife, was so far from misconceiving it, that he presently kneeled down and thanked God there was so much charity left: but they on the other side will ascribe nothing to naturall causes, indulge nothing to familiarity, mutuall society, freindship: but out of a sinister suspition, presently lock them close, watch them, thinking by those means to prevent all such inconveniences, that's the way to help it; whereas by such tricks they do aggravate the mischief. 'Tis but in vain to watch that which will away.	St Francis happened to see a friar affectionately kissing another man's wife. Far from misconstruing it, he immediately knelt and thanked God that so much charity remained. But jealous men, on the other hand, will attribute nothing to natural causes and allow nothing to familiar acquaintance, companionship or friendship. Instead, out of a hostile suspicion, they immediately lock women up and watch them, thinking these measures will prevent all such troubles: that is the way to remedy it! Yet by such tricks they make the trouble worse. It is useless to guard what is determined to get away.[11757]

[11755] Burton. Source page 618, †: "Mart." "Martial."

[11756] Editor. The phrase adapts Martial 5.61.14, whose joke is that the man conducting the wife's "business" is really conducting the husband's. Burton converts it into a question. He then criticizes suspicious interpretations of a child's birth date or resemblance; he does not establish either as evidence of paternity.

[11757] Editor. The St Francis anecdote has no source citation here and remains unverified. Burton contrasts a charitable reading of social familiarity with the jealous husband's punitive interpretation. His "that's the way to help it" voices the latter's reasoning before rejecting it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11758]Nec custodiri si velit ulla potest; Nec mentem servare potes, licet omnia serves; Omnibus exclusis, intus Adulter erit.	No woman can be kept under guard if she wishes otherwise; Nor can you guard her mind, though you guard everything; Shut everyone out: the adulterer will be within.[11759]
None can be kept resisting for her part; Though body be kept close, within her heart Advoury lurks, t' exclude it ther's no art.	None can be guarded if she herself resists; Though her body is confined, within her heart Adultery lurks: no skill can shut it out.[11760]
Argus with an hundred eyes cannot keep her, & hunc unus sæpè fefellit amor, as in [11761]Ariosto.	Argus with his hundred eyes cannot guard her, "and Love alone has often deceived him," as in Ariosto.[11762]
If all our hearts were eyes, yet sure they said We husbands of our wives should be betraied.	Even if our hearts were all eyes, they said, We husbands would still surely be betrayed by our wives.

[11758] Burton. Source page 618, m: "Ovid. amor. lib. 3. eleg. 4." "Ovid, Amores, book 3, elegy 4."

[11759] Editor. Ovid, Amores 3.4.6–8, substantially adapted. The consulted Latin has ne velit ("so that she does not desire"), corpus ("body") rather than mentem ("mind"), and claudas ("shut") rather than serves ("guard"). The modern translation follows Burton's printed version rather than replacing it with Ovid's text.

[11760] Editor. Advoury is the printed form here for adultery. This is Burton's separate English verse rendering of the preceding Latin, retained and modernized as a separate three-line unit.

[11761] Burton. Source page 618, n: "Lib. 4. st. 72." "Book 4, stanza 72."

[11762] Editor. Argus is the many-eyed mythological watchman. The Latin adapts Ovid, Amores 3.4.20, where hos ("these," the eyes) replaces Burton's hunc ("him"). The marginal Ariosto reference belongs to the following English couplet, cited as Orlando furioso 4.72. Exact collation of that English version remains open.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 619 Hierome holds, uxor impudica servari non potest, pudica non debet, infida custos castitatis est necessitas, to what end is all your custody? A dishonew woman cannot be kept, an honest woman ought not to be kept, necessity is a keeper not to be trusted. Difficile custoditur, quod plures amant; That which many covet, can hardly be preserved, as [11763]Salisburiensis thinks.	Jerome holds that "an unchaste wife cannot be guarded; a chaste one should not be; compulsion is an untrustworthy guardian of chastity." What is the point of all your guarding? An unchaste woman cannot be kept under guard; a chaste woman should not be; necessity is a keeper not to be trusted. "What many desire is hard to guard": what many covet can hardly be preserved, as John of Salisbury thinks.[11764]
I am of Æneas Sylvius minde, [11765]Those jealous Italians do very ill to lock up their wives; for women are of such a disposition, they will most covet that which is denyed most, and offend least when they have free liberty to trespass. It is in vain to lock her up if she be dishonest; & tyrannicum imperium, as our great Mr. Aristotle cals it, too tyrannical a taske, most unfit:	I agree with Aeneas Sylvius: "Those jealous Italians do very wrong to lock up their wives; for women are so disposed that they most desire what is most denied them, and offend least when they have complete freedom to transgress." Locking her up is useless if she is unchaste; and it is "tyrannical rule," as our great master Aristotle calls it—an excessively tyrannical imposition, altogether improper.[11766]

[11763] Burton. Source page 619, o: "Policrat. lib.8. c.11. De amor." "Policraticus, book 8, chapter 11, on love."

[11764] Editor. Jerome, Against Jovinian 1.47, quotes a discussion attributed to Theophrastus; both maxims occur there. Burton also cites John of Salisbury, Policraticus 8.11, for the second. "Necessity" here means imposed restraint. The scan appears to print "dishonew" across a line break; the evident sense, unchaste, is used in modern English.

[11765] Burton. Source page 619, star: "Eurial. & Lucret. qui uxores occludunt, meo judicio minus utiliter faciunt; sunt enim eo ingenio mulieres ut id potissimum cupiant, quod maxime denegatur: si liberas habent habenas, minus delinquunt; frustra seram adhibes, si non sit sponte casta." "Euryalus and Lucretia. Those who lock up their wives act, in my judgment, less usefully; for women are so disposed that they chiefly desire what is most denied them. If they have free rein, they offend less; you apply a bolt in vain if she is not chaste of her own accord."

[11766] Editor. Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini, later Pope Pius II, wrote the story of Euryalus and Lucretia. "Master" translates Mr. here. Burton does not supply a precise Aristotle reference, and the exact locus of the phrase remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For when she perceives her husband observes her and suspects, liberius peccat, saith [11767]Nevisanus. [11768]Toxica Zelotypo dedit uxor mæcha marito, she is exasperated, seeks by all means to vindicate her self, and will therefore offend, because she is unjustly suspected. The best course then is to let them have their own wills, give them free liberty, without any keeping.	For when she realizes that her husband watches and suspects her, "she sins more freely," says Nevizzano. "The adulterous wife gave poison to her jealous husband." She is infuriated, tries every means of avenging herself, and will therefore offend because she is unjustly suspected. The best course, then, is to let them do as they wish and give them complete freedom, without any guarding.[11769]
In vain our friends from this do us dehort, For beauty will be where is most resort.	Our friends try in vain to dissuade us from this, For beauty will go where the most people gather.[11770]
If she be honest as Lucretia to Collatinus, Laudamia to Protesilaus, Penelope to her Ulysses, she will so continue her honour, good name, credit,	If she is faithful, as Lucretia was to Collatinus, Laodamia to Protesilaus, or Penelope to her Ulysses, she will thus preserve her honour, good name and reputation:
Penelope conjux semper Ulyssis ero;	I, Penelope, shall always be Ulysses's wife.[11771]

[11767] Burton. Source page 619, p: "Quando cognoscunt maritos hoc advertere." "When they realize that their husbands notice this."

[11768] Burton. Source page 619, q: "Ausonius."

[11769] Editor. Nevizzano is Giovanni Nevizzano, author of Sylva nuptialis. Vindicate here means avenge. Burton attributes the poisoning line to Ausonius, but the epigram has not been collated; the following prose is not a full translation of it.

[11770] Editor. Dehort means dissuade; resort means an assembly or gathering of people. The couplet has no attribution in this margin.

[11771] Editor. Ovid, Heroides 1.84, Penelope to Ulysses. Lucretia, Laodamia and Penelope are conventional exemplars of marital fidelity; Burton uses the printed form Laudamia for Laodamia.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as Phocias wife in [11772]Plutarch, called her husband her wealth, treasure, world, joy, delight, orbe and spheare, she will hers. The vow she made unto her good man; love, vertue, religion, zeal, are better keepers then all those locks, Eunuches, prisons; she will not be moved:	And just as Phocion's wife in Plutarch called her husband "her wealth, treasure, world, joy, delight, orb and sphere," so will she call hers. The vow she made to her husband, love, virtue, religion and devotion are better guardians than all those locks, eunuchs and prisons. She will not be moved:[11773]
[11774]At mihi vel tellus optem prius ima dehiscat, Aut pater omnipotens adigat me fulmine ad umbras, Pallentes umbras Erebi, noctemq; profundam, Ante pudor quam te violem, aut tua jura resolvam.	But may the earth first gape open beneath me, Or the almighty Father drive me with his thunderbolt to the shades, The pale shades of Erebus and the depths of night, Before, O chastity, I violate you or break your laws.[11775]
First I desire the earth to swallow mee, Before I violate mine honesty, Or thunder from above drive me to hell, With those pale ghosts, and ugly nights to dwell.	First I would have the earth swallow me, Before I violate my chastity; Or thunder from above drive me to hell, To dwell with those pale ghosts and dreadful nights.
She is resolv'd with Dido to be chast; though her husband be false, she will be true: and as Octavia writ to her Anthony;	She is resolved, with Dido, to be chaste: though her husband is unfaithful, she will be true. And as Octavia wrote to her Antony:

[11772] Burton. Source page 619, dagger: "Opes suas, mundum suum, thesaurum suum, &c." "Her wealth, her world, her treasure, and so on."

[11773] Editor. Phocias is Burton's printed form for Phocion. In Plutarch, Life of Phocion 19, his wife identifies her husband as her adornment; Burton expands the image into an entire world. Good man means husband; orb and sphere reinforce that image.

[11774] Burton. Source page 619, r: "Virg. Æn." "Virgil, Aeneid."

[11775] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.24–27: Dido declares fidelity to her dead husband Sychaeus, before her relationship with Aeneas. Burton varies the Latin, including At/Aut and Erebi, and the translation follows his text. His separate English rendering follows as a separate four-line unit; honesty there means chastity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11776]These wals that here do keep me out of sight, Shall keep me all unspotted unto thee, And testifie that I will do thee right, Ile never stain thine house, though thou shame mee;	These walls that keep me here out of sight Shall keep me wholly unstained for you, And bear witness that I will be faithful: I will never stain your house, though you shame me.[11777]
Turn her loose to all those Tarquines ann Satyrs, she will not be tempted. In the time of Valence the Emperour, saith [11778]St. Austin, one Archidamus a Consul of Antioch, offered an hundred pound of gold to a fair young wife, and besides to set her husband free, who was then sub gravissima custodia, a dark prisoner, pro unius noctis concubitu: but the chast matron would not accept of it.	Set her free among all those Tarquins and satyrs: she will not be tempted. In the time of the emperor Valens, says St Augustine, a certain Archidamus, a consul of Antioch, offered a beautiful young wife a hundred pounds of gold, and also to free her husband, who was then "under the harshest confinement," a prisoner in darkness, "in return for one night's intercourse"; but the chaste wife would not accept it.[11779]
[11780]When one commended Theana's fine arme to his fellows, she took him up short, Sir, 'tis not common; she is wholly reserved to her husband.	"When a man praised Theano's beautiful arm to his companions, she answered him sharply, 'Sir, it is not public property.'" She reserves herself entirely for her husband.[11781]

[11776] Burton. Source page 619, dagger: "Daniel."

[11777] Editor. Samuel Daniel's literary epistle in the voice of Octavia to Mark Antony, not a surviving letter by the historical Octavia. The verse is retained in four lines. Exact line-number collation remains open.

[11778] Burton. Source page 619, dagger: "1 de serm. d. in monte ros. 16." "Book 1, On the Lord's Sermon on the Mount; ros. 16 [obscure abbreviation]."

[11779] Editor. The source is Augustine, On the Sermon on the Mount 1.16.50, but Burton changes the story markedly. Augustine sets it under Constantius, names the official Acyndinus, gives one pound of gold, and makes an unnamed rich man the proposer. The wife consents with her husband's approval; she does not refuse. Burton's account is preserved, not reconciled. The marginal "ros. 16" is obscure. "Ann" is rendered "and." Tarquin evokes the rape of Lucretia; satyrs are figures of sexual appetite.

[11780] Burton. Source page 619, s: "O quam formosus lacertus hic quidam inquit ad æquales conversus; at illa, publicus, inquit, non est." ""Oh, what a beautiful arm!" someone said, turning to his companions; but she said, "It is not public property.""

[11781] Editor. Theana is Theano. Plutarch, Conjugal Precepts 31 (142C–D), tells how her slipping cloak exposed her arm and prompted the compliment. Her reply refuses public access; Plutarch then extends the lesson to a woman's speech. This English comparison locates the anecdote; Burton's Latin intermediary remains unidentified. His marginal wording is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 619–620 [11782]Bilia had an old man to her spouse, and his breath stunk, so that no body could abide it abroad, comming home one day, he reprehended his wife, because she did not tell him of it: she vowed unto him she had told him, but that she thought every mans breath had been as strong as his.	Bilia had an old man for her husband, whose breath stank so badly that no one outside the home could bear it. "Coming home one day, he rebuked his wife for not telling him about it. She assured him that she would have told him, except that she thought every man's breath was as strong as his."[11783]
Source page 620 [11784]Tigranes and Armena his Lady were invited to supper by King Cyrus: when they came home, Tigranes asked his wife, how she liked Cyrus, and what she did especially commend in him? she swore she did not observe him; when he replyed again, what then she did observe, whom she looked on? She made answer, her husband that said he would dye for her sake.	Tigranes and his lady Armena were invited to supper by King Cyrus. When they came home, Tigranes asked his wife how she liked Cyrus, and what she particularly admired in him. "She swore that she had not noticed him. When he asked again what she had noticed, then, and whom she had looked at, she answered: her husband, who had said he would die for her sake."[11785]

[11782] Burton. Source page 619, t: "Bilia Dinutum virum senem habuit & spiritum fœtidum habentem, quem quum quidam exprobrasset, &c." "Bilia had Dinutus as her husband, an old man with foul breath; when someone had reproached him for it, and so on."

[11783] Editor. Compare Jerome, Against Jovinian 1.46, where Bilia's husband is Duilius. Burton's margin prints Dinutum; that form is retained rather than silently replaced. "She had told him, but that" is conditional: she would have told him, had she not thought this normal.

[11784] Burton. Source page 620, u: "Numquid tibi, Armena, Tigranes videbatur esse pulcher? & illum, inquit, ædepol, &c. Xenoph. Cyropæd. l.3." ""Did Tigranes seem handsome to you, Armena?" "And him," she said, "by Pollux," and so on. Xenophon, Education of Cyrus, book 3."

[11785] Editor. Xenophon, Education of Cyrus 3.1.36–41. Tigranes offers his life to keep his wife from slavery; afterwards she says she looked only at him. The margin instead asks whether Tigranes seemed handsome to Armena, whereas the question in the narrative concerns Cyrus. The inconsistent marginal wording is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such are the properties and conditions of good women: and if she be well given, she will so carry her self; if otherwise she be naught, use all the means thou canst, she will be naught. Non deest animus sed corruptor, she hath so many lies, excuses, as an hare hath muses, tricks, Panders, Bawds, shifts to deceive, 'tis to no purpose to keep her up, or to reclaime her by hard usage. Faire means peradventure may do somewhat.	Such are the qualities and dispositions of good women. If she is well disposed, she will behave like this; if, on the other hand, she is unchaste, use every means you can: she will remain so. "It is not the willingness that is lacking, but a seducer." She has as many lies and excuses as a hare has gaps to escape through—tricks, pimps, procuresses and schemes for deception. It is useless to confine her, or try to reform her through harsh treatment. Kindness may perhaps accomplish something.[11786]
[11787]Obsequio vinces aptius ipse tuo.	You yourself will prevail more effectively through your consideration.[11788]
Men and women are both in a predicament in this behalfe, so sooner won, and better pacified. Duci volunt, non cogi: though she be as arrant a scold as Xantippe, as cruel as Medea, as clamorous as Hecuba, as lustfull as Messalina, by such means (if at all) she may be reformed.	Men and women are in the same category in this respect: they are won over sooner and calmed more effectively in this way. "They wish to be led, not forced." Though she is as thorough a scold as Xanthippe, as cruel as Medea, as loud in her complaints as Hecuba, or as lustful as Messalina, such means may reform her, if anything can.[11789]

[11786] Editor. Muses are gaps or passages through which a hare escapes; shifts are expedients or evasions. Panders and bawds are procurers. Burton's statement is a categorical moral generalization, not an account of a particular woman's behaviour. The Latin maxim is unattributed here.

[11787] Burton. Source page 620, x: "Ovid."

[11788] Editor. Ovid, Amores 3.4.12. Burton prints ipse, "you yourself," where the consulted text has illa, "those things," referring to faults. The translation follows Burton. Obsequium here means accommodating consideration or compliance.

[11789] Editor. In a predicament means in the same category, not merely in difficulty. The names are conventional examples: Xanthippe, Socrates's wife; Medea and Hecuba, figures of Greek tragedy; and Messalina, the Roman empress. The sentence reproduces Burton's inherited characterizations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many patient [11790]Grisels by their obsequiousness in this kind, have reclaimed their husbands from their wandring lusts. In Nova Francia and Turky (as Leah, Rachel, and Sarah did to Abraham and Jacob) they bring their fairest damsels to their husbands beds; Livia seconded the lustfull appetites of Augustus: Stratonice wife to King Diotarus did not only bring Electra a fair maid, to her goodmans bed, but brought up the children begot on her, as careful as if they had been her own.	Many patient Griseldas, through compliance of this kind, have reclaimed their husbands from their wandering lusts. In New France and Turkey, as Leah, Rachel and Sarah did for Abraham and Jacob, they bring their prettiest young women to their husbands' beds. Livia assisted Augustus's lustful appetites; Stratonice, wife of King Diotarus, not only brought a beautiful young woman, Electra, to her husband's bed, but raised the children he fathered on her as carefully as if they had been her own.[11791]
Tertius Æmilius wife, Cornelia's mother perceaving her husbands intemperance, rem dissimulavit, made much of the maid, and would take no notice of it. A new married man, when a pickthank friend of his, to curry favour, had shewed him his wife familiar in private with a young gallant, courting and dallying, &c. Tush said he, let him do his worst, I dare trust my wife, though I dare not trust him.	The wife of Tertius Aemilius, Cornelia's mother, perceived her husband's lack of restraint but "pretended not to notice," treated the maid kindly, and took no notice of the affair. A newly married man had a tale-bearing friend who, to win his favour, showed him his wife privately intimate with a young gallant, courting and fondling her, and so on. "Nonsense," he said, "let him do his worst: I dare trust my wife, though I dare not trust him."[11792]

[11790] Burton. Source page 620, y: "Read Petrarchs tale of patient Grizel in Chaucer."

[11791] Editor. Patient Griselda appears in Chaucer's Clerk's Tale, whose narrator names Petrarch. Nova Francia is New France; the Biblical handmaids are Hagar, Bilhah and Zilpah. Plutarch, Bravery of Women 21 (258C–D), relates Stratonice's arrangement with Deiotarus: Electra is a captive, chosen to provide royal heirs whom Stratonice raises. Burton's intermediary and the New France, Turkish and Livia claims remain uncollated; the anecdote does not establish a general custom.

[11792] Editor. Valerius Maximus 6.7.1 tells this story of Tertia Aemilia, wife of Scipio Africanus and mother of Cornelia. Burton's "Tertius Æmilius wife" confuses her name and relationship; the printed formulation is preserved. A pickthank is someone who seeks favour by carrying tales; "made much of" means treated kindly or attentively.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The best remedy then is by fair means; if that will not take place, to dissemble it as I say, or turn it off with a jest: hear Guexerra's advise in this case, vel joco excipies, vel silentio eludes; for if you take exceptions at every thing your wife doth, Solomons wisdome, Hercules valour, Homers learning, Socrates patience, Argus vigilancy will not serve turne. Therefore Minus malum, [11793]a less mischief Nevisanus holds, dissimulare, to be a Cunarum emptor, [11794]a buyer of cradles, as the proverb is, then to be too solicitous.	The best remedy, then, is kind treatment; if that will not work, pretend not to notice, as I say, or dismiss it with a joke. Hear Guevara's advice in this case: "Either receive it with a joke, or evade it with silence." For if you take offence at everything your wife does, Solomon's wisdom, Hercules's courage, Homer's learning, Socrates's patience and Argus's watchfulness will not suffice. Therefore Nevizzano thinks it "the lesser evil"—a smaller mischief—to pretend not to notice, to be "a buyer of cradles," as the proverb says, rather than to be too anxious.[11795]

[11793] Burton. Source page 620, z: "Sil. nup. lib.4. num.80." "The Marriage Wood, book 4, number 80."

[11794] Burton. Source page 620, a: "Erasmus."

[11795] Editor. Guexerra is a printed form for Antonio de Guevara. The sequence invokes wisdom, strength, learning, patience and the many-eyed watchman Argus. A "buyer of cradles" knowingly overlooks dubious paternity, as the following joke explains; Burton cites Erasmus without a precise work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11796]A good fellow when his wife was brought to bed before her time, bought halfe a dozen of Cradles before hand for so many children, as if his wife should continue to bear children at every two months. [11797]Pertinax the Emperour, when one told him a Fidler was too familiar with his Empress, made no reckoning of it. And when that Macedonian Philip was upbraided with his wives dishonesty, cum tot victor regnorum ac populorum esset, &c. a Conqueror of Kingdomes could not tame his wife, (for she thrust him out at doores) he made a jest of it. Sapientes portant cornua in pectore, stulti in fronte, saith Nevisanus, wise men bear their horns in their hearts, fooles on their foreheads.	"A good fellow, when his wife gave birth before her time, bought half a dozen cradles in advance for as many children, as if she were going to keep having children every two months." When someone told the emperor Pertinax that a fiddler was too familiar with his empress, he took no notice. And when Philip of Macedon was reproached for his wife's unchastity—"although he was the conqueror of so many kingdoms and peoples," and so on, a conqueror of kingdoms could not tame his wife, for she put him out of doors—he made a joke of it. "Wise men bear their horns in their breasts; fools on their foreheads," says Nevizzano: wise men bear their horns in their hearts, fools on their foreheads.[11798]

[11796] Burton. Source page 620, b: "Quum accepisset uxorem peperisse secundo à nuptiis mense, cunas quinas vel senas coemit, ut si forte uxor singulis bimensibus pareret." "When he learned that his wife had given birth in the second month after the wedding, he bought five or six cradles, in case she should give birth every two months."

[11797] Burton. Source page 620, c: "Iulius Capitol. vita ejus. quum palam citharædus uxorem diligeret, minime curiosus fuit." "Julius Capitolinus, his Life. When a lyre-player openly loved his wife, he showed very little concern."

[11798] Editor. The joke treats a birth two months after marriage as a repeatable two-month pregnancy. Cornua, horns, signifies cuckoldry; bearing them in the heart means keeping one's knowledge private. Burton's Pertinax reference is to the Life attributed to Julius Capitolinus; exact collation of that passage and the Philip anecdote remains open.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 620–621 Eumenes King of Pergamus was at deadly feud with Perseus of Macedonia, in so much that Perseus hearing of a journey he was to take to Delphus, [11799]set a company of souldiers to intercept him in his passage; they did it accordingly, and as they supposed left him stoned to death. The news of this fact was brought instantly to Pergamus; Attalus, Eumenes brother proclaimed himself King forthwith, took possession of the crown, and married Stratonice the Queen.	Eumenes, king of Pergamum, was in a deadly feud with Perseus of Macedonia. When Perseus heard of a journey Eumenes was going to make to Delphi, he stationed a company of soldiers to intercept him on the way. They did so and, as they supposed, left him stoned to death. News of this deed was immediately brought to Pergamum. Attalus, Eumenes's brother, at once proclaimed himself king, took possession of the crown, and married Queen Stratonice.[11800]
Source page 621 But by and by when contrary newes was brought, that King Eumenes was alive, and now coming to the citie, he laid by his crown, left his wife, as a private man went to meet him, and congratulate his return. Eumenes though he knew all particulars passed, yet dissembling the matter, kindly embraced his brother, and took his wife into his favour again, as if no such matter had been heard of or done.	But soon, when news came to the contrary—that King Eumenes was alive and approaching the city—he put aside his crown, left his wife, and went as a private citizen to meet him and welcome his return. Though Eumenes knew everything that had happened, he concealed his knowledge, affectionately embraced his brother, and restored his wife to favour, as though no such thing had been heard of or done.

[11799] Burton. Source page 621, star and ensuing unmarked continuations: "Disposuit armatos qui ipsum interficerent: hi protenus mandatum exequentes, &c. Ille & rex declaratur, & Stratonicem quæ fratri nupserat, uxorem ducit; sed postquam audivit fratrem vivere, &c. Attalum comiter accepit, pristinamque uxorem complexus, magno honore apud se habuit." "He stationed armed men to kill him; these immediately carried out the command, and so on. The other is both proclaimed king and takes as his wife Stratonice, who had married his brother; but after he heard that his brother was alive, and so on. He received Attalus graciously and, embracing his former wife, kept her with him in great honour."

[11800] Editor. Burton's Eumenes–Attalus story combines the reported attack near Delphi with a premature succession and marriage. The long marginal Latin has three separate paragraphs but only one initial symbol; all three are retained in a single Burton note. No author is named there, and the exact source remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Iocundo in Ariosto, found his wife in bed with a knave, both asleep, went his wayes, and would not so much as wake them, much less reprove them for it. [11801]An honest fellow finding in like sort his wife had plaid false at tables, and born a man too many, drew his dagger, and swore if he had not been his very friend, he would have kill'd him.	Jocundo in Ariosto found his wife in bed with a scoundrel, both asleep, went away, and would not even wake them, much less reproach them. A good fellow, similarly discovering that his wife had cheated at backgammon and borne one man too many, drew his dagger and swore that, had the man not been his very friend, he would have killed him.[11802]
Another hearing one had done that for him, which no man desires to be done by a deputy, followed in a rage with his sword drawn, and having overtaken him, laid adultery to his charge; the offender hotly pursued, confessed it was true; with which confession he was satisfied, and so left him, swearing that if he had denyed it, he would not have put it up.	Another man, hearing that someone had done for him what no man wants done by a deputy, pursued him in a rage with his sword drawn. Having caught him, he accused him of adultery. The offender, so hotly pursued, admitted that it was true. Satisfied with this confession, the husband left him, swearing that if he had denied it, he would not have put up with it.
How much better is it to do thus, then to macerate himself, impatiently to rave and rage, to enter an Action (as Arnoldus Tilius did in the court of Tholouse, against Martin Guerre his fellow souldier, for that he counterfeited his habit, and was too familiar with his wife) so to divulge his own shame, and to remaine for ever a Cuckold on record? how much better be Cornelius Tacitus, than Publius Cornutus, to condemn in such cases, or take no notice of it?	How much better to act like this than to torment oneself, rave and rage impatiently, or bring a lawsuit—as Arnoldus Tilius did in the court of Toulouse against his fellow soldier Martin Guerre, for impersonating him and being too familiar with his wife—and thus make one's own shame public and remain a cuckold on record for ever! How much better to be Cornelius Tacitus than Publius Cornutus: to condemn it in such cases, or take no notice of it![11803]

[11801] Burton. Source page 621, d: "S. Iohn Harringtons notes in 28. book of Ariosto."

[11802] Editor. Jocundo appears in Orlando furioso, canto 28. Burton also cites Sir John Harington's notes to that canto. Tables means a game of the backgammon family; a man is a playing piece. "Borne a man too many" makes a sexual and possibly paternity pun on bearing off a piece; the translation retains the double sense.

[11803] Editor. Burton reverses the roles in the Martin Guerre case: the early narrative Histoire admirable d'un faux et supposé mari identifies Arnauld Tily, or Arnaud du Tilh, as the impersonator of Martin Guerre. The names remain in Burton's order here. Tacitus suggests being silent; Publius Cornutus suggests a publicly known cuckold. The scan reads "condemn," despite the argument for disregarding the matter; this unresolved reading is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Melius sic errare, quam Zelotypiæ curis, saith Erasmus, se conficere, better be a wittall and put it up, then to trouble himself to no purpose. And though he will not omnibus dormire, be an asse, as he is an oxe, yet to wink at it as many do, is not amisse at some times, in some cases, to some parties, if it be for his commodity, or some great mans sake, his Land-Lord, Patron, Benefactor, (as Calbas the Roman saith [11804]Plutarch did by Mæcenas, and Phayllus of Argos did by King Philip, when he promised him an office on that condition he might lie with his wife) and so to let it passe:	"Better to err in this way," says Erasmus, "than to consume oneself with the anxieties of jealousy": better to be a knowing cuckold and put up with it than to trouble oneself to no purpose. And though he will not "sleep for everyone"—be an ass as well as an ox—still, to close his eyes to it, as many do, is not amiss at certain times, in certain cases, with certain people, if it serves his advantage or some great man's wishes: his landlord, patron or benefactor. So Calbas the Roman, says Plutarch, acted towards Maecenas; and Phayllus of Argos towards King Philip, when the king promised him an office on condition that he could sleep with his wife. And so let it pass:[11805]
——[11806]pol me haud pænitet, Scilicet boni dimidium dividere cum Iove,	By Pollux, I have no regret, Indeed, at sharing half the good fortune with Jupiter.[11807]
it never troubles me, said Amphitrio, to be cornuted by Jupiter; let it not molest thee then; be friends with her;	"It never troubles me," said Amphitryon, "to be cuckolded by Jupiter." Then do not let it distress you: be reconciled with her.
[11808]Tu cum Alcmenâ uxore antiquam in gratiam Redi——	Return to your old good relations With your wife Alcmena.

[11804] Burton. Source page 621, dagger: "Amator. dial." "Dialogue on Love."

[11805] Editor. Wittall means a knowing, tolerant cuckold; ox and ass suggest horns and folly. Plutarch, On Love 16, names Galba, corresponding to Burton's Calbas: he pretends to sleep for Maecenas but stops a servant stealing wine. The same section makes Phayllus hope for office through his wife's access to Philip, without stating a promise by Philip. Commodity means advantage; Burton's source version remains untraced.

[11806] Burton. Source page 621, dagger: "Plautus scen. ult. Amphit." "Plautus, Amphitryon, final scene."

[11807] Editor. Plautus, Amphitryon 1124–1125, followed by 1141–1142. Burton prints Scilicet, "indeed," and omits mihi, where the consulted text has si licet, "if it is permitted," and mihi. His English paraphrase explicitly adds cuckoldry. The second quotation is Jupiter's instruction to Amphitryon, not Amphitryon's own speech. Both verse units and Burton's prose remain distinct.

[11808] Burton. Source page 621, unmarked: "Idem." "The same author."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 621–622 let it I say make no breach of love betwixt you. Howsoever the best way is to contemn it, which [11809]Henry the second King of France advised a courtier of his, jealous of his wife, and complaining of her unchastness, to reject it, and comfort himself; for he that suspects his wives incontinencie, and fears the Popes curse, shall never live a merry hour, or sleep a quiet night: no remedy but patience. When all is done according to that counsell of [11810]Nevisanus, si vitium uxoris corrigi non potest, ferendum est: If it may not be helped, it must be endured.	Let it, I say, cause no break in the love between you. In any case, the best course is to disregard it, as Henry II, king of France, advised a courtier who was jealous of his wife and complained of her unchastity: dismiss it and take comfort. For a man who suspects his wife's infidelity and fears the pope's curse will never enjoy a cheerful hour or sleep a peaceful night. There is no remedy but patience. When all is said and done, follow Nevizzano's counsel: "If the wife's fault cannot be corrected, it must be endured." If it cannot be helped, it must be borne.[11811]
Source page 622 Date veniam & sustinete taciti, 'tis Sophocles advice, keep it to thy self, and which Chrysostome calls palæstram philosophiæ, & domesticum Gymnasium, a school of Philosophy, put it up. There is no other cure, but time to wear it out, Injuriarum remedium est oblivio, as if they had drunk a draught of Lethe in Trophonius den: To conclude, age will bereave her of it, dies dolorem minuit, time and patience must end it.	"Forgive, and bear it in silence": that is Sophocles's advice. Keep it to yourself, and accept what Chrysostom calls "a wrestling ground of philosophy and a household gymnasium," a school of philosophy. There is no other cure but for time to wear it away: "The remedy for injuries is forgetfulness," as though they had drunk a draught of Lethe in Trophonius's cave. To conclude, age will deprive her of it; "time lessens sorrow." Time and patience must bring it to an end.[11812]
[11813]The minds affections Patience will appease, It passions kills, and healeth each disease.	Patience will calm the emotions of the mind; It kills the passions and heals every disease.[11814]

[11809] Burton. Source page 621, d: "T. Daniel conjurat. French."

[11810] Burton. Source page 622, e: "Lib.4. num.80." "Book 4, number 80."

[11811] Editor. The repeated marginal letter d is retained as printed. "T. Daniel conjurat. French" remains an unresolved bibliographical abbreviation; it should not be silently expanded to Samuel Daniel. The pope's curse means ecclesiastical condemnation or excommunication. This counsel closes the subsection's argument for patience.

[11812] Editor. Lethe is associated with forgetfulness; Trophonius's cave is the site of a Greek oracle. The wrestling ground and household gymnasium are metaphors for training in endurance. Precise loci for the Sophocles and Chrysostom sayings are not established here.

[11813] Burton. Source page 622, f: "R.T."

[11814] Editor. Burton gives only the initials R.T.; no author is securely identified. Affections means emotions or states of mind. The couplet's claim about healing every disease is proverbial rhetoric.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 2.	SUBSECTION 2.
By prevention before, or after marriage, Plato's communitie, marry a Curtesan, Philters, Stewes, to marry one equal in yeers, fortunes, of a good family, education, good place, to use them well, &c.	Prevention before or after marriage: Plato's community of wives; marrying a courtesan; love potions; brothels; marrying someone equal in age and fortune, from a good family, well educated and of good standing; treating wives well; and so on.
Of such medicines as conduce to the cure of this malady, I have sufficiently treated; there be some good remedies remaining, by way of prevention, precautions, or admonitions, which if rightly practised, may do much good. Plato in his commonwealth, to prevent this mischief belike, would have all things common, wives and children all as one:	I have said enough about medicines that help cure this malady. Some good remedies remain in the form of prevention, precautions or warnings, which, properly put into practice, may do much good. Plato, in his commonwealth, apparently to prevent this evil, would have everything held in common, wives and children shared alike.[11815]
and which Cæsar in his commentaries observed of those old Britaines, that first inhabited this land, they had ten or twelve wives allotted to such a family, or promiscuously to be used by so many men; not one to one, as with us, or four five or six to one, as in Turkie.	And Caesar observed in his Commentaries that the ancient Britons who first inhabited this land had ten or twelve wives allotted to a household, or shared indiscriminately by as many men: not one wife to one man, as among us, or four, five or six to one, as in Turkey.[11816]

[11815] Editor. The new subsection collects possible preventives, including practices Burton later rejects. His reference to Plato invokes the Republic's proposed sharing of wives and children. Philters are love potions; stews are brothels. The descriptor also announces topics that continue in the following discussion.

[11816] Editor. Caesar, Gallic War 5.14.4, says that groups of ten or twelve men share wives, especially brothers and fathers with sons. Burton initially makes ten or twelve the number of wives, then mentions as many men. His formulation is preserved. Neither the Roman account nor Burton's comparison is independently verified social history here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The [11817]Nicholaites, a Sect that sprung, saith Austin, from Nicholas the Deacon, would have women indifferent; and the cause of this filthie sect, was Nicholas the Deacons jealousie, for which when he was condemned, to purge himself of his offence, he broched his heresie, that it was lawfull to lie with one anothers wives, and for any man to lie with his:	The Nicolaitans, a sect that arose, says Augustine, from Nicholas the deacon, would have women shared without distinction. The cause of this filthy sect was Nicholas the deacon's jealousy: when he was condemned for it, he sought to clear himself of the offence by advancing his heresy that it was lawful to sleep with one another's wives, and for any man to sleep with his.[11818]
like to those [11819]Anabaptists in Munster, that would consort with other mens wives as the spirit moved them: or as [11820]Mahomet the seducing prophet, would needs use women as he list himself, to beget prophets; [11821]205 their Alcoran saith were in love with him, and he as able as fortie men.	Like those Anabaptists at Münster, who would consort with other men's wives as the spirit moved them; or Muhammad, the prophet who led people astray, who insisted on having women as he pleased, to beget prophets. Their Alcoran says that 205 women were in love with him, and that he had the sexual capacity of forty men.[11822]

[11817] Burton. Source page 622, g: "Lib. de hæres. Quum de zelo culparetur, purgandi se causa permisisse fertur ut ea qui vellet uteretur; quod ejus factum in sectam turpissimam versum est, qua placet usus indifferens fœminarum." "Book on Heresies. When blamed for jealousy, he is said to have permitted anyone who wished to have her, to clear himself; this action of his developed into a most shameful sect, which approves the indiscriminate use of women."

[11818] Editor. Burton cites Augustine's On Heresies. An alternative early account, Clement of Alexandria as quoted by Eusebius, Church History 3.29, distinguishes Nicholas's conduct from the later sect's interpretation and presents Nicholas as continent. Burton's version belongs to a contested polemical tradition; indifferent means shared without distinction.

[11819] Burton. Source page 622, star: "Sleiden, Com." "Sleidan, Commentaries."

[11820] Burton. Source page 622, h: "Alchoran."

[11821] Burton. Source page 622, star: "Alcoran edit. à Bibliandro." "The Alcoran, edited by Bibliander."

[11822] Editor. Sleidan is Johannes Sleidanus, the historian cited for Münster. Burton's account of Muhammad is openly hostile; the translation retains that stance as Burton's voice. His figure 205 is printed as a number, not a footnote. Bibliander's published collection included a Latin Qur'an and other material: these claims have not been located in the Qur'an itself and must not be treated as verified Qur'anic statements.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Amongst the old Carthaginians, as [11823]Bohemus relates out of Sabellicus, the king of the countrey lay with the bride the first night, and once in a yeer they went promiscuously altogether. Munster Cosmog. lib.3. cap.497. ascribes the beginning of this brutish custome (injustly) to one Picardus a Frenchman, that invented a new sect of Adamites, to go naked as Adam did, and to use promiscuous Venery at set times.	Among the ancient Carthaginians, as Boemus relates from Sabellicus, the country's king slept with the bride on the first night, and once a year they all had intercourse indiscriminately. Münster, in his Cosmography, book 3, chapter 497, unjustly attributes the beginning of this brutish custom to a certain Frenchman, Picardus, who invented a new sect of Adamites: they went naked, as Adam did, and engaged in indiscriminate sexual intercourse at appointed times.[11824]
Source page 622–623 When the Priest repeated that of Genesis, Increase and multiply, [11825]out went the candles in the place where they met, and without all respect of age, persons, conditions, catch that catch may, every man took her came next, &c. some fasten this on those ancient Bohemians and Russians: [11826]others on the inhabitants of Mambrium, in the Lucerne valley in Pedemont; and as I read it was practised in Scotland amongst Christians themselves, untill King Malcomes time, the King or the Lord of the town had their maidenheads.	When the priest repeated the words from Genesis, "Increase and multiply," "out went the candles in their meeting place, and without any regard for age, person or social condition, it was catch as catch can: every man took whichever woman came nearest," and so on. Some attach this charge to the ancient Bohemians and Russians; others to the inhabitants of Mambrium in the Lucerne valley in Piedmont. And, as I have read, it was practised in Scotland among Christians themselves until King Malcolm's time: the king or lord of the town took their virginity.[11827]

[11823] Burton. Source page 622, i: "De mor. gent. lib.1. cap.6. Nupturæ regi devirginandæ exhibentur." "On the Customs of Nations, book 1, chapter 6. Brides are presented to the king to be deflowered."

[11824] Editor. Bohemus is Johannes Boemus; Sabellicus is Marcantonio Sabellico; Munster is Sebastian Münster. Venery means sexual intercourse here. Burton himself inserts "injustly," challenging the attribution to Picardus. The other ethnographic and sectarian claims remain reports from his sources, not independently established practices.

[11825] Burton. Source page 622, star: "Lumina extinguebantur, nec personæ & ætatis habita reverentia, in quam quisque per tenebras incidit, mulierem cognoscit." "The lights were extinguished, and without regard for person or age, each man had intercourse with whichever woman he encountered in the darkness."

[11826] Burton. Source page 623, dagger: "Leander Albertus. Flagitioso ritu cuncti in ædem convenientes post impuram concionem, extinctis luminibus in Venerem ruunt." "Leandro Alberti. In a shameful rite, they all gather in a building and, after an impure sermon, with the lights extinguished, rush into sexual intercourse."

[11827] Editor. The lights-out story and the Scottish first-night claim are allegations in Burton's compilation; citing them does not establish that the described customs existed. Genesis 1:28 supplies "Increase and multiply." Mambrium and the exact Alberti passage remain unresolved. The Lucerne valley here is in Piedmont, not the Swiss city of Lucerne.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 623 In some parts of [11828]India in our age, and those [11829]Islanders, [11830]as amongst the Babylonians of old, they will prostitute their wives and daughters (which Chalcocondila a Greek modern writer, for want of better intelligence, puts upon us Britains) to such travellers or sea-faring men as come amongst them by chance, to shew how far they were from this feral vice of jealousie, and how little they esteemed it.	In some parts of India in our own time, and among those islanders, as among the ancient Babylonians, they prostitute their wives and daughters to travellers or seafarers who happen to arrive among them—a practice that Chalcocondylas, a modern Greek writer, for lack of better information, attributes to us Britons—to show how far they were from this savage vice of jealousy, and how little account they took of it.[11831]
The Kings of Calecut, as [11832]Lod. Vertomannus relates, will not touch their wives, till one of their Biarmi or high priests have lain first with them, to sanctifie their wombs. But those Essai and Montanists, two strange sects of old, were in another extream, they would not marry at all, or have any society with women, [11833]because of their intemperance they held them all to be naught.	The kings of Calicut, as Ludovico di Varthema relates, will not touch their wives until one of their Brahmins or high priests has first slept with them, to sanctify their wombs. But the Essenes and Montanists, two strange sects of antiquity, went to the opposite extreme: they would not marry at all, or have any dealings with women, "because of their lack of restraint: they considered them all unchaste."[11834]

[11828] Burton. Source page 623, k: "Lod. Vertomannus navig. lib.6. cap.8. & Marcus Polus lib.1. cap.46. Uxores viatoribus prostituunt." "Ludovico di Varthema, Travels, book 6, chapter 8, and Marco Polo, book 1, chapter 46. They prostitute their wives to travellers."

[11829] Burton. Source page 623, l: "Dithmarus, Bleskenius, ut Agetas Aristoni, pulcherrimam uxorem habens prostituit." "Dithmarus Bleskenius; as Agetas, who had a very beautiful wife, prostituted her to Ariston."

[11830] Burton. Source page 623, m: "Herodot. in Erato. Mulieres Babylonicæ cum hospite permiscentur ob argentum quod post Veneri sacrum. Bohemus lib.2. cap." "Herodotus, in Erato. Babylonian women have intercourse with a stranger for money which is afterwards sacred to Venus. Boemus, book 2, chapter [no number supplied]."

[11831] Editor. Varthema and Marco Polo are travel writers; Dithmarus Bleskenius names Dithmar Blefken. The body says "Islanders," without naming the islands. Chalcocondila is Laonikos Chalcocondyles. Herodotus's Babylonian passage is Histories 1.199, not book 6, Erato, as the margin says; it concerns a reported ritual, not precisely Burton's hospitality claim. The incomplete Boemus chapter reference is preserved.

[11832] Burton. Source page 623, dagger: "Navigat. lib.5. cap.4. prius thorum non init, quam à digniore sacerdote nova nupta deflorata sit." "Travels, book 5, chapter 4. He does not enter the marriage bed before the new bride has been deflowered by a priest of higher rank."

[11833] Burton. Source page 623, n: "Bohemus lib.2. cap.3. Ideo nubere nollent ob mulierum intemperantiam, nullam servare viro fidem putabant." "Boemus, book 2, chapter 3. They therefore refused to marry because of women's lack of restraint; they thought no woman kept faith with her husband."

[11834] Editor. Calecut is Calicut, now Kozhikode; Biarmi denotes Brahmins. Burton combines Essenes and Montanists in a generalization whose exact sources remain uncollated. The sentence's "their intemperance" refers to the alleged lack of restraint of women. The travellers' and sectarian allegations are not independently authenticated here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nevisanus the Lawyer, lib.4. num.33. syl. nupt. would have him that is inclined to this malady, to prevent the worst, marry a quean, Capiens meretricem, hoc habet saltem boni, quod non decipitur, quia scit eam sic esse, quod non contingit aliis. A fornicator in Seneca constuprated two wenches in a night; for satisfaction the one desired to hang him, the other to marry him.	Nevizzano the lawyer, in The Marriage Wood, book 4, number 33, would have a man prone to this malady marry a prostitute to forestall the worst. "In taking a prostitute, he has at least this advantage: he is not deceived, because he knows what she is, which is not the case with other men." A fornicator in Seneca raped two young women in one night; as redress, one wanted him hanged, the other wanted to marry him.[11835]
[11836]Hierome king of Syracuse in Sicily, espoused himself to Pitho, keeper of the Stews; and Ptolomy took Thais a common whore to be his wife, had two sons, Leontiscus and Lagus by her, and one daughter Irene: 'tis therefore no such unlikely thing. [11837]A Citizen of Eugubine gelded himself to try his wives honesty, and to be freed from jealousie: so did a Baker in [11838]Basil, to the same intent.	Hieronymus, king of Syracuse in Sicily, married Pitho, a keeper of brothels; and Ptolemy took Thais, a common prostitute, as his wife, and had two sons by her, Leontiscus and Lagus, and a daughter, Irene. It is therefore no such unlikely thing. A citizen of Gubbio castrated himself to test his wife's chastity and free himself from jealousy; so did a baker at Basel, with the same purpose.[11839]

[11835] Editor. Quean here means prostitute. Seneca the Elder, Controversies 1.5, presents a rhetorical case of rape: a supposed law allows the victim to choose the rapist's death or marriage without a dowry, and the two victims choose differently. "Constuprated" is therefore rendered "raped"; the passage is a declamatory problem, not a documented event.

[11836] Burton. Source page 623, o: "Stephanus præfat. Herod. Alius è lupanari meretricem, Pitho dictam, in uxorem duxit; Ptolomæus Thaidem nobile scortum duxit & ex ea duos filios suscepit, &c." "Estienne, preface to Herodotus. Another married a prostitute from a brothel, called Pitho; Ptolemy married Thais, a famous courtesan, and had two sons by her, and so on."

[11837] Burton. Source page 623, p: "Poggius Florentino."

[11838] Burton. Source page 623, q: "Felix Plater."

[11839] Editor. Hierome is Burton's form for Hieronymus of Syracuse. Stews means brothels; the margin calls Pitho a prostitute, whereas the body calls her their keeper. The difference is retained. Eugubine is Gubbio, Basil is Basel, and Plater is Felix Platter. These anecdotes remain for direct source collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But of all other presidents in this kind, that of [11840]Combalus is most memorable: Who to prevent his masters suspition, for he was a beautiful yong man, and sent by Seleucus his Lord and King, with Stratonice the Queen to conduct her into Syria, fearing the worst, gelded himself before he went, and left his genitals behind him in a box sealed up.	But among all examples of this kind, that of Combalus is the most memorable. He was a beautiful young man, sent by Seleucus, his lord and king, to accompany Queen Stratonice and escort her into Syria. To prevent his master's suspicion, and fearing the worst, he castrated himself before leaving and left his genitals behind in a sealed box.[11841]
His mistriss by the way fell in love with him, but he not yielding to her, was accused to Seleucus of incontinency, (as that Bellerophon was in like case, falsely traduced by Sthenobia, to King Prætus her husband, cum non posset ad coitum inducere) and that by her, and was therefore at his coming home cast into prison: the day of hearing appointed, he was sufficiently cleared and acquitted by shewing his privities, which to the admiration of the beholders he had formerly cut off.	On the way his mistress fell in love with him. When he would not yield to her, she herself accused him to Seleucus of sexual misconduct—just as Bellerophon, in a similar case, was falsely denounced by Sthenoboea to her husband King Proetus "when she could not induce him to have intercourse." Consequently, on his return he was thrown into prison. On the appointed day of the hearing, he was fully cleared and acquitted by displaying the genitals he had cut off beforehand, to the astonishment of those present.

[11840] Burton. Source page 623, r: "Plutarch, Lucian, Salmutz Tit.2. de porcellanis cum in Panciro l. de nov. repert. & Plutarchus." "The compressed reference names Plutarch, Lucian, Salmuth and Panciroli. De porcellanis means on porcelain; de nov. repert. means on new discoveries. The remaining connection is unclear."

[11841] Editor. Combalus corresponds to Combabus in On the Syrian Goddess 19–27, transmitted under Lucian's name. The tale explains the self-castration of temple attendants. Burton's linking of it with Bellerophon draws on a separate false-accusation story. The compressed marginal bibliography, including Salmutz and Panciro, is transcribed without claiming its references have been resolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Lydians used to geld women whom they suspected, saith Leonicus var. hist. lib.3. cap.59. as well as men. To this purpose [11842]Saint Francis, because he used to confess women in private, to prevent suspition, and prove himself a maid, stripped himself before the Bishop of Assise and others: and Frier Leonard for the same cause went through Viterbium in Italy, without any garments.	The Lydians used to castrate women whom they suspected, says Leonicus in his Various Histories, book 3, chapter 59, as well as men. For this purpose St Francis, because he heard women's confessions in private, stripped himself before the bishop of Assisi and others, to forestall suspicion and prove himself a virgin; and Friar Leonard, for the same reason, went through Viterbo in Italy without any clothes.[11843]
Source page 623–624 Our Pseudocatholikes, to help these inconveniences which proceed from Jealousie, to keep themselves and their wives honest, make severe Laws; against adultery present death; and withal fornication a venial sin, as a sink to convey that furious and swift stream of concupiscence, they appoint and permit stews, those punks and pleasant sinners, the more to secure their wives in all populous Cities, for they hold them as necessary as Churches; and howsoever unlawful, yet to avoid a greater mischief, to be tolerated in policy, as usury, for the hardness of mens hearts; and for this end they have whole Colledges of Curtesans in their Towns and Cities.	Our false Catholics, to remedy these troubles arising from jealousy and keep themselves and their wives chaste, make severe laws: immediate death for adultery, while treating fornication as a venial sin. As a drain to carry off that fierce, swift stream of lust, they establish and permit brothels, those prostitutes and pleasure-loving sinners, the better to safeguard their wives in all populous cities. They consider them as necessary as churches; and, however unlawful, they are to be tolerated as a matter of policy, like usury, to avoid a greater evil, because of the hardness of human hearts. To this end they have whole communities of courtesans in their towns and cities.[11844]

[11842] Burton. Source page 623, s: "Stephanus el. confor. Bonavent. c.6. vit. Francisci." "Estienne, el. confor. [unresolved abbreviation]; Bonaventure, Life of Francis, chapter 6."

[11843] Editor. Geld literally means castrate; for women the historical claim concerns genital mutilation, whose exact procedure Burton does not specify. A maid here means a virgin, including a man. Leonicus is Niccolò Leonico Tomeo. The Francis and Leonard anecdotes are presented through a polemical source chain; Bonaventure's cited chapter has not yet been collated, so Burton's proposed motive is not authenticated.

[11844] Editor. Pseudocatholikes is Burton's hostile designation for Roman Catholics. Present means immediate; sink means drain; concupiscence means lust; punks means prostitutes; colleges means organized communities. Burton's characterization of doctrine and civic policy is polemical, and the translation does not turn it into an independent statement of Catholic teaching.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 624 Of [11845]Cato's mind belike, that would have his servants (cum ancillis congredi coitus causa, definito ære, ut graviora facinora evitarent, cæteris interim interdicens) familiar with some such feminine creatures, to avoid worse mischiefs in his house, and made allowance for it.	They apparently share Cato's view. He would have his servants "have intercourse with the female slaves at a fixed price, to avoid more serious offences, while forbidding them other women"—be intimate with such female creatures to avoid worse trouble in his household—and permitted it.[11846]
They hold it impossible for idle persons, yong, rich, and lusty, so many servants, Monks, Friers, to live honest, too tyrannical a burden to compel them to be chaste, and most unfit to suffer poor men, yonger brothers and souldiers at all to marry, as those diseased persons, votaries, priests, servants. Therefore as well to keep and ease the one as the other, they tolerate and wink at these kind of Brothel houses and Stews. Many probable arguments they have to prove the lawfulness, the necessity, and a toleration of them, as of usury; and without question in policy they are not to be contradicted: but altogether in Religion.	They consider it impossible for idle people—young, rich and vigorous—and so many servants, monks and friars to live chastely, and too tyrannical a burden to compel them to do so. They also consider it altogether improper to allow poor men, younger brothers and soldiers to marry at all, as with diseased people, those under religious vows, priests and servants. Therefore, to restrain and relieve one group as well as the other, they tolerate and overlook these brothels. They have many plausible arguments for their lawfulness, necessity and toleration, as they do for usury; and without question, in terms of policy they cannot be contradicted, though in terms of religion they must be opposed entirely.[11847]

[11845] Burton. Source page 624, star: "Plutarch. vit. ejus." "Plutarch, his Life."

[11846] Editor. Plutarch, Life of Cato the Elder 21.2, describes permission for male slaves to have intercourse with female slaves for a fixed payment, while forbidding other women. "Made allowance" means permitted it, not necessarily paid an allowance. The Latin explicitly concerns enslaved people within Cato's household.

[11847] Editor. Votaries are people bound by religious vows. Probable means plausible or persuasive; policy concerns civic expediency, as distinct from religious judgment. Burton's concession about brothels is qualified immediately by his religious objection. "They" continues his account of the position he attributes to his opponents.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Others prescribe philters, spels, charms to keep men and women honest. [11848]Mulier ut alienum virum non admittat præter suum: Accipe fel hirci, & adipem, & exsicca, calescat in oleo, &c. & non alium præter te amabit. In Alexi, Porta, &c. plura invenies, & multo his absurdiora, uti & in Rhasi, ne mulier virum admittat, & maritum solum diligat, &c. But these are most part Pagan, impious, irreligious, absurd, and ridiculous devices.	Others prescribe love potions, spells and charms to keep men and women chaste. "So that a woman admits no other man besides her husband: take a he-goat's bile and fat, and dry them; let it warm in oil," and so on, "and she will love no one but you. In Alexis, Porta and others you will find more, and things much more absurd than these; likewise in Rhazes, so that a woman admits no man, and loves only her husband," and so on. But these are mostly pagan, impious, irreligious, absurd and ridiculous devices.[11849]
The best means to avoid these and like inconveniences, are, to take away the causes and occasions. To this purpose [11850]Varro writ Satyram Menippeam, but it is lost. [11851]Patritius prescribes foure rules to be observed in chusing of a wife (which who so will may read) Fonseca the Spaniard in his 45. c. Amphitheat. Amoris, sets down six special cautions for men, foure for women; Sam. Neander out of Shonbernerus, five for men, five for women; Anthony Guivarra many good lessons; [11852]Cleobulus two alone, others otherwise;	The best way to avoid these and similar troubles is to remove their causes and occasions. Varro wrote a Menippean Satire for this purpose, but it is lost. Patrizi prescribes four rules to observe when choosing a wife, which anyone who wishes may read. The Spaniard Fonseca, in chapter 45 of his Amphitheatre of Love, sets out six special cautions for men and four for women; Samuel Neander, drawing on Schönborner, gives five for men and five for women; Antonio de Guevara gives many good lessons; Cleobulus only two; others offer different advice.[11853]

[11848] Burton. Source page 624, t: "Vecker. lib.7. secret." "Wecker, Secrets, book 7."

[11849] Editor. Wecker is Johann Jacob Wecker; the cited Secrets is a compilation. Alexis refers to the tradition of Alessio Piemontese's books of secrets; Porta is Giambattista della Porta, and Rhasi is Rhazes. The incomplete recipe is translated as historical text, including its omissions. Burton expressly rejects these devices; no efficacy is implied. Exact recipe collation remains open.

[11850] Burton. Source page 624, a: "Citatur à Gellio." "Quoted by Gellius."

[11851] Burton. Source page 624, b: "Lib.4. Tit.4. de instit. reipub. de officio mariti." "On the Ordering of a Commonwealth, book 4, title 4, on the husband's duty."

[11852] Burton. Source page 624, c: "Ne cum eâ blandè nimis agas, ne objurges præsentibus extraneis." "Do not flatter her excessively; do not scold her in the presence of strangers."

[11853] Editor. Patritius is Francesco Patrizi; Fonseca, Cristóbal de Fonseca; Guivarra, Antonio de Guevara. Menippean satire mixes forms and registers. The rule lists and Neander–Schönborner reference remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as first to make a good choice in marriage, to invite Christ to their wedding, and which [11854]Saint Ambrose adviseth, Deum conjugii præsidem habere, and to pray to him for her, (A Domino enim datur uxor prudens, Prov. 19.) not to be too rash and precipitate in his election, to run upon the first he meets, or dote on every stout fair piece he sees, but to chuse her as much by his ears as eys, to be well advised whom he takes, of what age, &c. and cautelous in his proceeding. An old man should not marry a yong woman, or a yong woman an old man,	First, make a good choice in marriage, invite Christ to the wedding and, as St Ambrose advises, "have God preside over the marriage," and pray to him for a wife: "For a prudent wife is given by the Lord," Proverbs 19. A man should not be too rash and hasty in choosing, rush at the first woman he meets, or dote on every handsome, well-built woman he sees. He should choose her as much by his ears as by his eyes, carefully consider whom he is taking, her age and so on, and proceed cautiously. An old man should not marry a young woman, nor a young woman an old man:[11855]
[11856]Quàm malè inæquales veniunt ad aratra juvenci!	How badly unequal bullocks work together at the plough![11857]
such matches must needs minister a perpetual cause of suspicion, and be distastful to each other.	Such matches must inevitably furnish a constant cause for suspicion and make the partners distasteful to one another.
[11858]Noctua ut in tumulis, super atque cadavera bubo, Talis apud Sophoclem nostra puella sedet.	As a little owl sits on tombs, and an eagle owl on corpses, So our girl sits beside Sophocles.[11859]
Source page 624–625 Night-crows on tombs, Owl sits on carcass dead, So lies a wench with Sophocles in bed.	Night-crows on tombs, an owl on a dead body— So a girl lies in bed with Sophocles.

[11854] Burton. Source page 624, star: "Epist.70." "Letter 70."

[11855] Editor. Proverbs 19:14 supplies the prudent wife. Choosing by ears as well as eyes means considering reports of character alongside appearance. Stout suggests physical vigour or a fine figure. The reversed age pairing repeats Burton's wording.

[11856] Burton. Source page 624, dagger: "Ovid."

[11857] Editor. Ovid, Heroides 9.29: Deianira compares unequal marriage to badly yoked bullocks. Line 32 follows later.

[11858] Burton. Source page 624, t: "Alciat. emb.116." "Alciato, emblem 116."

[11859] Editor. Burton cites Alciato's emblem 116. In the Padua 1621 edition, this is emblem 117, Senex puellam amans, p. 495; its last couplet reads super utque, against Burton's super atque. His precise edition remains unidentified. Noctua and bubo are different owls. Burton's separate English couplet changes sitting beside Sophocles into lying in bed; the aged lover is compared to a tomb or corpse.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 625 For Sophocles, as [11860]Atheneus describes him, was a very old man, as cold as January, a bedfellow of bones, and doted yet upon Archippe a yong Curtesan, then which nothing can be more odious. [11861]Senex maritus uxori juveni ingratus est, an old man is a most unwelcome guest to a yong wench, unable, unfit:	For Sophocles, as Athenaeus describes him, was a very old man, as cold as January, a bedfellow made of bones, yet he doted on Archippe, a young courtesan. Nothing could be more odious. "An old husband is unwelcome to a young wife": an old man is a most unwelcome guest to a young woman, incapable and unsuitable.[11862]
[11863]Amplexus suos fugiunt puellæ, Omnis horret amor, Venusque Hymenque.	Girls flee his embraces; Every love recoils, and Venus and Hymen too.[11864]
And as in like case a good fellow that had but a peck of corn weekly to grind, yet would needs build a new mill for it, found his error eftsoons, for either he must let his mill lye waste, pull it quite down, or let others grind at it. So these men, &c.	Similarly, a good fellow who had only a peck of grain to grind each week nevertheless insisted on building a new mill for it. He soon discovered his mistake: he must either leave the mill idle, pull it down altogether, or let others grind at it. So it is with these men, and so on.[11865]

[11860] Burton. Source page 625, u: "Deipnosoph. l.3. cap.12." "The Learned Banqueters, book 3, chapter 12."

[11861] Burton. Source page 625, star: "Euripides."

[11862] Editor. Athenaeus's Archippe anecdote occurs in The Learned Banqueters, book 13, chapter 61 (592a–b); the margin prints l.3. cap.12, which is retained. The Euripides maxim has not been assigned a secure surviving passage here. Burton's abusive picture belongs to the conventional satire of the aged lover.

[11863] Burton. Source page 625, dagger: "Pontanus biarum lib.1." "Pontanus, biarum, book 1 [title abbreviation as printed; Baiae]."

[11864] Editor. Pontanus is Giovanni Pontano. The margin's biarum appears to abbreviate or corrupt the title Baiae. Venus and Hymen personify love and marriage. The printed suos is awkward in this context; "his embraces" follows the passage's intended reference to the old man, pending collation with Pontano.

[11865] Editor. A peck is a small dry measure. The mill is an extended sexual joke: the husband lacks the capacity to keep his young wife occupied, so others will use the mill. Eftsoons here means soon or promptly.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Seneca therefore disallows all such unseasonable matches, habent enim maledicti locum crebræ nuptiæ. And as [11866]Tully farther inveighs, 'tis unfit for any, but ugly and filthy in old age. Turpe senilis amor, one of the three things [11867]God hateth. Plutarch in his book contra Coleten, rails downright at such kind of marriages, which are attempted by old men, qui jam corpore impotenti, & à voluptatibus deserti, peccant animo, and makes a question whether in some cases it be tolerable at least for such a man to marry,	Seneca therefore disapproves of all such ill-timed matches: "For repeated marriages give grounds for reproach." And, as Cicero further protests, "it is improper for anyone, but ugly and filthy in old age." "Love in old age is shameful"—one of the three things God hates. Plutarch, in his Against Colotes, fiercely attacks marriages attempted by old men "who, now physically impotent and deserted by pleasures, sin in their minds." He raises the question whether, in some cases, it is even tolerable for such a man to marry:[11868]
——qui Venerem affectat sine viribus,	Who seeks the pleasures of Venus without the strength for them,

[11866] Burton. Source page 625, dagger: "Offic. lib. Luxuria cum omni ætati turpis, tum senectuti fœdissima." "Book of Duties. Luxury is shameful at any age, but most foul in old age."

[11867] Burton. Source page 625, star: "Ecclus.25.2. An old man that dotes, &c."

[11868] Editor. The maxim about repeated marriages appears in the Sentences transmitted under Publilius Syrus, although Burton attributes it to Seneca. Cicero, On Duties 1.123, condemns luxuria generally; Burton applies it to marriage in old age. Turpe senilis amor is Ovid, Amores 1.9.4. Ecclesiasticus 25:2 concerns an old adulterer, not every aged lover. The Plutarch locus remains unconfirmed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
that is now past those venerous exercises, as a gelded man lies with a virgin and sighs, Ecclus 30.20. and now complains with him in Petronius, funerata est hæc pars jam, quæ fuit olim Achillea, he is quite done,	one who is now past those sexual activities, "as a castrated man lies with a virgin and sighs," Ecclesiasticus 30:20, and now complains with the man in Petronius, "This part, which was once an Achilles, is now dead and buried." He is quite finished:[11869]
[11870]Vixit puellæ nuper idoneus, Et militavit non sine gloriâ.	Until lately he lived fit for a girl, And fought his campaigns not without glory.[11871]
But the question is whether he may delight himself as those Priapeian Popes, which in their decrepit age lay commonly between two wenches every night, contactu formosarum, & contrectatione, num adhuc gaudeat; and as many doting Syres still do to their own shame, their childrens undoing, and their families confusion: he abhors it, tanquam ab agresti & furioso domino fugiendum, It must be avoided as a Bedlam master, and not obeyed.	But the question is whether he may indulge himself like those Priapean popes who, in their decrepit old age, commonly lay between two young women every night: "whether he may still enjoy touching and fondling beautiful women," as many foolish old fathers still do, to their own shame, their children's ruin and their families' destruction. He abhors it: "It must be fled from like a brutal and furious master." It must be avoided like a mad master, not obeyed.[11872]
Alecto—— Ipsa faces præfert nubentibus, & malus Hymen Triste ululat,——	Alecto herself Carries the torches before the marrying couple, and an evil Hymen Howls mournfully.[11873]

[11869] Editor. Venerous means sexual. Ecclesiasticus is also called Sirach; chapter 30's verse numbering differs among traditions. The Petronius phrase occurs in Satyrica 129, when Encolpius speaks to Giton about impotence. Achilles represents former sexual prowess; Burton varies the wording of the comparison.

[11870] Burton. Source page 625, star: "Hor. lib.3. ode26." "Horace, book 3, ode 26."

[11871] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.26.1–2. Burton changes the first-person Vixi and militavi to third-person Vixit and militavit, and puellis, "girls," to puellæ, "a girl." The translation follows Burton's altered text. Love is figured as military service.

[11872] Editor. Priapeian evokes Priapus, a god of sexual potency. Burton's claim about unnamed popes is polemical and is not authenticated by the unspecified attribution here. Bedlam means mad or associated with Bethlem hospital. The passage moves between reporting a question and condemning the appetite under discussion.

[11873] Editor. These lines occur in Thomas Chaloner, On Restoring the English Commonwealth 9.658–660. Alecto is a Fury; Hymen is the wedding god. Wedding torches and song become sinister torches and a howl. Burton omits surrounding phrases and retains the contrast.

Original text 1651	Modern English
the divel himself makes such matches. [11874]Levinus Lemnius reckons up three things which generally disturb the peace of marriage: the first is when they marry intempestive or unseasonably, as many mortal men marry precipitately and inconsiderately, when they are effæte and old: The second when they marry unequally for fortunes and birth: the third, when a sick impotent person weds one that is sound, novæ nuptæ spes frustratur: Many dislikes instantly follow.	The devil himself makes such matches. Levinus Lemnius lists three things that generally disturb marital peace. First, marrying at an unsuitable time, “as many people marry hastily and thoughtlessly when they are worn out and old.” Second, “marrying unequally in wealth and birth.” Third, “when a sick, impotent person marries a healthy one, the new bride’s hopes are disappointed.” Much dissatisfaction immediately follows.[11875]
Many doting dizards, it may not be denyed, as Plutarch confesseth, [11876]recreate themselves with such obsolete, unseasonable and filthy remedies (so he calls them) with a remembrance of their former pleasures, against nature they stir up their dead flesh: but an old lecher is abominable; mulier tertio nubens, [11877]Nevisanus holds, præsumitur lubrica & inconstans, a woman that marries the third time may be presumed to be no honester then she should.	It cannot be denied that many doting fools, as Plutarch admits, “refresh themselves with such worn-out, ill-timed and filthy remedies”—as he calls them—“with the recollection of former pleasures; against nature, they rouse their dead flesh.” But an old lecher is abominable. “A woman marrying for the third time,” Nevizzano maintains, “is presumed to be wanton and inconstant”: a woman who marries a third time may be presumed to be none too chaste.[11878]

[11874] Burton. Source page 625, x: “Cap.54. instit. ad optimam vitam; maxima mortalium pars præcipitanter & inconsideratè nubit, idque ea ætate quæ minus apta est, quum senex adolescentulæ, sanus morbidæ, dives pauperi, &c.” “Instruction towards the Best Life, chapter 54: most people marry hastily and thoughtlessly, and at an age that is less suitable—when an old man marries a young girl, a healthy man a sick woman, a rich man a poor woman, and so on.”

[11875] Editor. Intempestive means ill-timed; effæte means worn out or exhausted. Lemnius’s three categories mix age, social standing and bodily capacity. The marginal Latin’s final pairings and Burton’s body summary differ in detail; both are retained.

[11876] Burton. Source page 625, y: “Absoleto, intempestivo, turpi remedio fatentur se uti; recordatione pristinarum voluptatum se recreant, & adversante natura, pollinctam carnem & enectam excitant.” “They admit using a worn-out, ill-timed, shameful remedy; they refresh themselves with the recollection of former pleasures and, against nature’s resistance, rouse flesh prepared for burial and dead.”

[11877] Burton. Source page 625, z: “Lib.2. nu.25.” “Book 2, number 25.”

[11878] Editor. Dizard means fool; lubrica suggests sexual wantonness or unreliability. “No honester then she should” functions as insinuation that she is not particularly chaste. Burton’s judgment about third marriages is attributed to Nevizzano; it is not established by the number of marriages. The Plutarch and Nevizzano loci remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 625–626 Of them both, thus Ambrose concludes in his comment upon Luke, [11879]they that are coupled together, not to get children, but to satisfie their lust, are not husbands, but fornicators, with whom St. Austin consents: matrimony without hope of children, non matrimonium, sed concubium dici debet, is not a wedding but a jumbling or coupling together.	Of both, Ambrose concludes in his commentary on Luke that "those who couple together, not to have children but to satisfy their lust, are not husbands but fornicators." St Augustine agrees with him: matrimony without the hope of children "should be called sexual intercourse, not matrimony"; it is no wedding, but a tumbling or coupling together.[11880]
Source page 626 In a word (except they wed for mutual society, help and comfort one of another, in which respects though [11881]Tiberius deny it, without question old folks may well marry) for sometimes a man hath most need of a wife, according to Puccius, when he hath no need of a wife: otherwise it is most odious, when an old Acheronticke dizard, that hath one foot in his grave, à silicernium, shall flicker after a lusty yong wench that is blithe and bonny,	In a word—unless they marry for companionship, mutual help and comfort, purposes for which old people may certainly marry, though Tiberius denies it; for, according to Puccius, a man sometimes most needs a wife when he has no need of a wife—otherwise it is most odious when an old fool from the brink of the underworld, with one foot in the grave, a walking corpse, flutters after a vigorous young woman, lively and beautiful:[11882]
——[11883]salaciorque Verno passere, & albulis columbis.	And lustier Than a sparrow in spring or little white doves.[11884]
What can be more detestable?	What could be more detestable?

[11879] Burton. Source page 626, a: "Qui verò non procreandæ prolis, sed explendæ libidinis causa sibi invicem copulantur, non tam conjuges quam fornicarii habentur." "Those who couple with one another not to produce offspring but to satisfy lust are considered not so much spouses as fornicators."

[11880] Editor. Burton attributes the first claim to Ambrose's commentary on Luke and the second to Augustine without a precise work. Their exact wording and contexts remain for collation. His following parenthesis expressly allows marriage in old age for companionship, help and comfort; it is essential to the argument.

[11881] Burton. Source page 626, dagger: "Lex Papia. Sueton. Claud. c.23." "The Papian law. Suetonius, Claudius, chapter 23."

[11882] Editor. Suetonius, Claudius 23.1, says Claudius annulled Tiberius's addition to the Papian law, which treated men over sixty as incapable of fathering children. This is narrower than a general ban on elderly marriage. Acheronticke invokes Acheron, an underworld river; silicernium is an insult for an old man ready for burial. Puccius's exact reference remains unresolved.

[11883] Burton. Source page 626, e: "Pontanus biarum lib.1." "Pontanus, biarum, book 1 [title abbreviation as printed; Baiae]."

[11884] Editor. Sparrows and doves conventionally represent sexual appetite. Burton again cites Pontano with the printed biarum abbreviation; the exact poem has not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11885]Tu cano capite amas senex nequissime Jam plenus ætatis, animâque fœtidâ, Senex hircosus tu osculare mulierem? Utine adiens vomitum potius excuties.	You love, with your grey head, you most wicked old man, Already full of years and foul of breath? You goat-stinking old man—would you kiss a woman? Will you not make her vomit instead when you approach?[11886]
Thou old goat, hoary lecher, naughty man, With stinking breath, art thou in love? Must thou be slavering? she spews to see Thy filthy face, it doth so move.	You old goat, grey-haired lecher, wicked man, With stinking breath—are you in love? Must you slobber? She vomits at the sight Of your filthy face: it affects her so.
Yet as some will, it is much more tolerable for an old man to marry a yong woman (our Ladies match they call it) for cras erit mulier, as he said in Tully. Cato the Roman, Critobulus in [11887]Xenophon, [11888]Tyraquellus of late, Julius Scaliger, &c. and many famous presidents we have in that kind; but not è contra: 'tis not held fit for an ancient woman to match with a yong man. For as Varro will, Anus dum ludit morti delitias facit, 'tis Charons match between [11889]Cascus and Casca, and the devil himself is surely well pleased with it. And therefore as the Poet inveighs, thou old Vetustina bed-ridden quean, that art now skin and bones,	Yet some maintain that it is much more tolerable for an old man to marry a young woman—they call it Our Lady's match—for "tomorrow she will be a woman," as the man in Cicero said. We have Cato the Roman, Critobulus in Xenophon, more recently Tiraqueau, Julius Scaliger and many other famous precedents of this kind. But not the reverse: it is considered unsuitable for an old woman to marry a young man. For, as Varro has it, "When an old woman plays, she provides amusement for death." It is Charon's match between Cascus and Casca, and the devil himself is surely well pleased with it. And so the poet attacks you, old Vetustina, you bedridden hussy, now nothing but skin and bones:[11890]

[11885] Burton. Source page 626, b: "Plautus mercator." "Plautus, The Merchant."

[11886] Editor. Burton combines and alters Plautus, The Merchant 305 and 574–576. The consulted text has ieiunitatis plenus, "full of fasting" or "famished," where Burton prints Jam plenus ætatis, "already full of years." Other forms differ too. The Latin and Burton's separate English quatrain are translated independently.

[11887] Burton. Source page 626, dagger: "Symposio." "In the Symposium."

[11888] Burton. Source page 626, star: "Vide Thuani historiam." "See de Thou's History."

[11889] Burton. Source page 626, star: "Calabect. vet. poetarum." "Calabect. of the ancient poets [title as printed; apparently Catalecta, a collection of poems]."

[11890] Editor. Our Lady's match alludes to the traditional depiction of Joseph as older than Mary. The paragraph openly applies unequal standards to men and women. Tyraquellus is André Tiraqueau; presidents means precedents. Charon ferries the dead, while Cascus and Casca evoke age. The printed Calabect. and the particular Cicero, Xenophon, Varro and de Thou references remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11891]Cui tres capilli, quatuorque sunt dentes, Pectus cicadæ, crusculumque formicæ, Rugosiorem quæ geris stolâ frontem, Et arænarum cassibus pares mammas.	You who have three hairs and four teeth, A cicada's breast and an ant's little leg, Who wear a forehead more wrinkled than your robe, And breasts like spiders' webs.[11892]
That hast three hairs, foure teeth, a brest Like grashopper, an emmets crest, A skin more rugged then thy coat, And duggs like spiders web to boot.	You have three hairs, four teeth, a breast Like a grasshopper's, an ant's crest, Skin more wrinkled than your coat, And breasts like spiders' webs besides.
Must thou marry a youth again? And yet ducentas ire nuptum post mortes amant: howsoever it is, as [11893]Apuleius gives out of his Meroe, congressus annosus, pestilens, abhorrendus, a pestilent match, abominable, and not to be endured. In such case how can they otherwise choose but be jealous, how should they agree one with another? This inequality is not in years only, but in birth, fortunes, conditions, and all good qualities,	Must you marry a youth again? And yet "they love to marry after two hundred deaths." However that may be, as Apuleius says of his Meroe, "a coupling with an old woman, pestilent and abhorrent": a pestilent match, abominable and intolerable. In such a case, how can they avoid jealousy? How should they agree with one another? This inequality concerns not only years, but birth, wealth, dispositions and all good qualities.[11894]
[11895]Si qua voles apte nubere, nube pari,	If you wish to marry fittingly, marry your equal.[11896]

[11891] Burton. Source page 626, c: "Martial. lib.3.62. Epig." "Martial, book 3, epigram 62."

[11892] Editor. Compare Martial 3.93.2–5, not the margin's 3.62. Burton alters several words, uses Vetustina for Martial's Vetustilla, and prints arænarum where araneorum means "of spiders." The modern Latin rendering uses the evident spider image. His separate English verse replaces an ant's leg with an ant's crest; that difference is retained.

[11893] Burton. Source page 626, unmarked: "Lib.I. Miles." "Milesian Tales, book 1."

[11894] Editor. Ducentas…mortes means "two hundred deaths": Burton recasts Martial 3.93.18, not a count of years or husbands. In Apuleius, Metamorphoses 1.7, Socrates calls Meroe an attractive older woman; one encounter begins an annosam ac pestilentem consuetudinem, a lasting, ruinous relationship. Annosam there describes the relationship. Burton's congressus annosus, pestilens, abhorrendus is a compressed recasting, not an exact quotation; abhorrendus is absent from the checked passage.

[11895] Burton. Source page 626, star: "Ovid."

[11896] Editor. Ovid, Heroides 9.32, continuing the marriage comparison invoked earlier. Burton quotes the line before introducing Guevara's advice; these are separate attributions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 626–627 'Tis my counsel, saith Anthony Guiverra, to chose such a one. Civis Civem ducat, Nobilis Nobilem, let a citizen match with a citizen, a gentleman with a gentlewoman; he that observes not this precept (saith he) non generum sed malum Genium, non nurum sed Furiam, non vitæ Comitem, sed litis fomitem domi habebit, in stead of a fair wife shall have a fury, for a fit son in law a meer feind, &c. examples are too frequent.	"It is my advice," says Antonio de Guevara, "to choose such a person. Let a citizen marry a citizen, a noble a noble": let a citizen marry a citizen, a gentleman a gentlewoman. Whoever neglects this rule, he says, "will have at home not a son-in-law but an evil spirit, not a daughter-in-law but a Fury, not a companion for life but fuel for quarrels." Instead of a fair wife he will have a fury, and instead of a suitable son-in-law a downright fiend, and so on. Examples are all too common.[11897]
Source page 627 Another main caution fit to be observed, is this, that though they be equal in years, birth, fortunes, and other conditions, yet they do not omit vertue and good education, which Musonius and Antipater so much inculcate in Stobeus;	Another important caution is that, though they are equal in age, birth, wealth and other circumstances, they should not neglect virtue and a good upbringing, which Musonius and Antipater so insist upon in Stobaeus.[11898]
Dos est magna parentum Virtus, & metuens alterius viri Certo fœdere castitas.	A great dowry is the parents' Virtue, and chastity which, bound by a firm covenant, Shrinks from another man.[11899]

[11897] Editor. Civis denotes a citizen, and nobilis someone of noble standing. The Latin distinguishes son-in-law, daughter-in-law and life companion; Burton's own English summary substitutes a wife for the daughter-in-law. Both formulations are retained. Fomes, fuel or tinder, makes domestic discord something readily ignited.

[11898] Editor. Musonius and Antipater are authorities excerpted by Stobaeus. Education here includes moral upbringing and habits, rather than schooling alone. Burton supplies no chapter for these two excerpts; precise collation is reserved.

[11899] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.24.21–23. A moral inheritance and marital fidelity are presented as the bride's great dowry. Burton prints parentum where the consulted text has parentium; the meaning is unchanged.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If as Plutarch adviseth, one must eat modium salis, a bushell of salt with him, before he chuse his friend, what care should be had in chusing a wife, his second self, how sollicitous should he be to know her qualities and behaviour? and when he is assured of them, not to prefer birth, fortune, beauty, before bringing up, and good conditions.	If, as Plutarch advises, one must eat "a bushel of salt" with a man before choosing him as a friend, how much care should a man take in choosing a wife, his second self! How anxious he should be to know her qualities and behaviour, and, once he is sure of them, to avoid preferring birth, wealth and beauty to upbringing and good character.[11900]
[11901]Coquage god of Cuckolds, as one merrily said, accompanies the goddess jealousie, both follow the fairest, by Jupiters appointment, and they sacrifice to them together: beauty and honesty seldom agree; straight personages have often crooked manners; fair faces, foul vices; good complexions, ill conditions. Suspitionis plena res est, & insidiarum, beauty (saith [11902]Chrysostome) is full of treachery and suspition: he that hath a fair wife, cannot have a worse mischief; and yet most covet it, as if nothing else in marriage but that and wealth were to be respected.	Coquage, the god of cuckolds, as someone jokingly said, accompanies the goddess Jealousy. By Jupiter's appointment both follow the fairest women, and people sacrifice to them together. Beauty and chastity seldom agree: straight bodies often have crooked manners; fair faces, foul vices; good complexions, bad dispositions. "It is a thing full of suspicion and snares": beauty, says Chrysostom, is full of treachery and suspicion. A man with a beautiful wife can have no worse trouble; yet most men desire one, as if nothing but beauty and wealth mattered in marriage.[11903]

[11900] Editor. Eating a bushel of salt together is a proverb for the long acquaintance needed to know someone. Bushel is Burton's approximate English equivalent for the Latin modius. His exact Plutarch reference is not supplied.

[11901] Burton. Source page 627, e: "Rablais hist. Pantagruel. l.3. cap.33." "Rabelais, History of Pantagruel, book 3, chapter 33."

[11902] Burton. Source page 627, f: "Hom.80. Qui pulchram habet uxorem, nihil pejus habere potest." "Homily 80. Whoever has a beautiful wife can possess nothing worse."

[11903] Editor. Coquage personifies cuckoldry. Rabelais, book 3, chapter 33, makes Jupiter give Cuckoldry the same festival as Jealousy and power over married people, especially those with beautiful wives. The satire makes jealous surveillance an offering that attracts Cuckoldry. Burton compresses this story; the comparison is through the later English translation. Honesty means chastity; conditions means dispositions. The Chrysostom homily's series remains unidentified, and the claims about beauty and vice are rhetorical generalizations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11904]Francis Sforza Duke of Millain, was so curious in this behalf, that he would not marry the Duke of Mantua's daughter, except he might see her naked first: Which Lycurgus appointed in his lawes, and Morus in his Utopian Commonwealth approves. [11905]In Italy, as a travellour observes, if a man have three or four daughters, or more, and they prove fair, they are married eftsoones: if deformed, they change their lovely names of Lucia, Cynthia, Camæna, call them Dorothie, Ursula, Briget, and so put them into Monasteries, as if none were fit for marriage, but such as are eminentlie fair: but these are erroneous tenents: a modest virgin well conditioned, to such a fair snout peece, is much to be preferred.	Francesco Sforza, duke of Milan, was so particular about this that he would not marry the duke of Mantua's daughter unless he could first see her naked—a practice Lycurgus prescribed in his laws and More approves in his Utopian commonwealth. In Italy, a traveller observes, if a man has three or four daughters, or more, and they turn out beautiful, they are married at once. If unattractive, their pretty names—Lucia, Cynthia, Camena—are changed: they are called Dorothy, Ursula or Bridget and put into convents, as if only outstandingly beautiful women were fit for marriage. But these are mistaken opinions: a modest virgin of good character is much to be preferred to such a pretty-faced creature.[11906]

[11904] Burton. Source page 627, g: "Arnisæus."

[11905] Burton. Source page 627, h: "Itinerar. Ital. Coloniæ edit.1620. Nomine trium Ger. fol.304. displicuit quod dominæ filiabus immutent nomen inditum in Baptismo, & pro Catharina, Margareta, &c. ne quid desit ad luxuriam, appellant ipsas nominibus Cynthiæ, Camænæ, &c." "Italian Itinerary, published at Cologne in 1620, in the name of three Ger. [abbreviation, apparently Germans], folio 304. He disliked the fact that ladies change their daughters' baptismal names and, instead of Catherine, Margaret and so on, call them Cynthia, Camena and so on, so that nothing should be lacking to luxury."

[11906] Editor. More's Utopia, book 2, describes prospective spouses being shown naked to each other. Burton's Sforza and Lycurgus references need separate verification. The long travel margin describes changing baptismal names such as Catherine into Cynthia; the body describes changing pretty names back before entering a convent. The two accounts should not be silently merged. Snout peece is a contemptuous term for a pretty face.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If thou wilt avoid them, take away all causes of suspition and jealousie, marry a course peece, fetch her from Cassandra's [11907]Temple, which was wont in Italy to be a Sanctuary of all deformed maids, and so thou shalt be sure that no man will make thee cuckold, but for spight. A citizen of Bizante in Thrace, had a filthy dowdy, deformed slut to his wife, and finding her in bed with another man, cryed out as one amazed; O miser! quæ te necessitas huc adegit? O thou wretch what necessity brought thee hither? as well he might; for who can affect such a one?	If you would avoid them, remove every cause of suspicion and jealousy: marry an ugly woman, fetch her from Cassandra's temple, which used to be a sanctuary in Italy for all unattractive maidens. Then you can be sure that no man will cuckold you except out of spite. A citizen of Byzantium in Thrace had a filthy, dowdy, ugly slattern for a wife. Finding her in bed with another man, he cried out in astonishment, "O wretch! What necessity drove you here?" You poor wretch, what necessity brought you here? As well he might ask: for who could desire such a woman?[11908]
But this is warily to be understood, most offend in another extream, they prefer wealth before beauty, and so she be rich, they care not how she look; but these are all out as faulty as the rest. Attendenda uxoris forma, as [11909]Salisburiensis adviseth, ne si alteram aspexeris, mox eam sordere putes, as the Knight in Chaucer that was married to an old woman,	But this must be understood cautiously. Most err at the other extreme: they prefer wealth to beauty and, provided a woman is rich, do not care how she looks. But they are quite as much at fault as the rest. "You must consider a wife's looks," as John of Salisbury advises, "lest, on seeing another woman, you immediately think your wife repulsive"—like Chaucer's knight who married an old woman:[11910]
Source page 628 And all day after hid him as an Owl, So woe was his wife looked so foul.	And all that day he hid himself like an owl, So miserable was he that his wife looked so ugly.[11911]

[11907] Burton. Source page 627, i: "Leonicus de var. lib.3. c.43. Asylus virginum deformium Cassandræ templum. Plutarch." "Leonicus, Miscellaneous History, book 3, chapter 43. Cassandra's temple, a refuge for unattractive maidens. Plutarch."

[11908] Editor. Course means coarse or unattractive. Burton's joke offers ugliness as protection, then immediately supplies a counterexample. Leonicus is Niccolò Leonico Tomeo. Cassandra's sanctuary and the Byzantine anecdote remain for direct collation; Plutarch is named at the foot of the same marginal entry.

[11909] Burton. Source page 627, k: "Polycrat. l.8. cap.11." "Policraticus, book 8, chapter 11."

[11910] Editor. All out means entirely or quite. Salisburiensis is John of Salisbury, author of Policraticus. The advice shifts again, now rejecting wealth as the sole criterion. Exact collation of book 8, chapter 11 remains open.

[11911] Editor. Chaucer, The Wife of Bath's Tale, in the episode after the knight marries the old woman. Burton's second line prints "So woe was his wife looked so foul," an elliptical or defective reading; "so miserable was he that" supplies its evident sense. The black-letter type has been normalized to the edition's ordinary typeface.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Have a care of thy wifes complexion, lest whilst thou seest another, thou loathest her, she prove jealous, thou naught,	Pay attention to your wife's appearance, lest, when you see another woman, you come to loathe her, she becomes jealous, and you unfaithful.
Si tibi deformis conjux, si serva venusta, Ne utaris servâ,——	If your wife is ugly and your maid beautiful, Do not make use of the maid.[11912]
I can perhaps give instance. Molestum est possidere, quod nemo habere dignetur, a misery to possess that which no man likes: on the other side, Difficile custoditur quod plures amant. And as the bragging souldier vaunted in the Comedy, nimia est miseria pulchrum esse hominem nimis. Scipio did never so hardly besiege Carthage, as these yong gallants will beset thine house, one with wit or person, another with wealth, &c. If she be fair, saith Guazze, she will be suspected howsoever.	I could perhaps give an example. "It is a burden to possess what no one thinks worth having"—a misery to possess what no man likes. On the other hand, "What many love is hard to guard." And, as the boastful soldier bragged in the comedy, "It is an immense misery for a man to be too handsome." Scipio never besieged Carthage so fiercely as these young gallants will beset your house: one with wit or good looks, another with wealth, and so on. If she is beautiful, says Guazzo, she will be suspected in any event.[11913]
Both extreams are naught, Pulchra citò adamatur, fœda facile concupiscit, the one is soon beloved, the other loves; one is hardly kept, because proud and arrogant, the other not worth keeping; what is to be done in this case? Ennius in Menelippe adviseth thee as a friend to take statam formam, si vis habere incolumem pudicitiam, one of a middle size, neither too fair, nor too foul,	Both extremes are bad: "A beautiful woman is quickly loved; an ugly one readily desires." One is soon beloved, the other loves; one is hard to guard because she is proud and arrogant, the other not worth guarding. What should be done in this case? Ennius, in Melanippe, advises you as a friend to choose "moderate beauty, if you wish to preserve chastity intact"—one of a middling sort, neither too beautiful nor too ugly:[11914]

[11912] Editor. The couplet warns a husband against intercourse with a female servant. No author is identified here. The original "make use of" idiom treats the servant as sexually available; the translation preserves the warning without adding a consensual relationship.

[11913] Editor. Burton moves between Latin maxims and his own English expansions. The soldier is the stock boastful soldier of comedy; the precise passage remains for collation. Guazze is Stefano Guazzo. Scipio's siege supplies a metaphor for the many suitors surrounding a household.

[11914] Editor. Gellius, Attic Nights 5.11.8–14, discusses a mean between exceptional beauty and ugliness and cites Ennius's Melanippa. Statam formam concerns moderate appearance; Burton's "middle size" is accordingly rendered as a middling sort, not specifically medium height. His spelling Menelippe is retained in the original column.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11915]Nec formosa magis quam mihi casta placet,	Nor does her beauty please me more than her chastity.[11916]
with old Cato, though fit, let her beauty be, neque lectissima, neque illiberalis, between both. This I approve; but of the other two I resolve with Salisburiensis, cæteris paribus, both rich alike, endowed alike, majori miseria deformis habetur quam formosa servatur, I had rather marry a fair one, and put it to the hazard, than be troubled with a blowze; but do thou as thou wilt, I speak only of my self.	With old Cato, let her beauty be suitable, "neither exquisite nor mean," between the two. I approve of this. But between the other two choices I decide with John of Salisbury, "other things being equal"—both equally wealthy and endowed—"it is more miserable to possess an ugly woman than to guard a beautiful one." I would rather marry a beautiful woman and take the risk than be troubled with a blowsy one. But do as you please: I speak only for myself.[11917]
Howsoever, quod iterum moneo, I would advise thee thus much, be she fair or foul, to choose a wife out of a good kindred, parentage, well brought up, in an honest place.	In any case, "as I advise again," I would give you this counsel: whether she is beautiful or ugly, choose a wife from a good family and parentage, well brought up in a respectable place.
[11918]Primum animo tibi proponas quo sanguine creta, Quâ formâ, quâ ætate, quibusque ante omnia virgo Moribus, in junctos veniat nova nupta penates.	First consider in your mind her lineage, Her looks, her age, and above all the young woman's Character, as she comes a new bride to your shared home.[11919]

[11915] Burton. Source page 628, star: "Marullus."

[11916] Editor. Burton attributes the line to Marullus without naming a work. The comparative magis gives "beauty does not please me more than chastity." Exact collation remains open.

[11917] Editor. Blowze is a coarse or blowsy woman. Burton moves from recommending moderation to a personal preference for beauty when other advantages are equal. The Latin says it is more miserable to possess an ugly wife than to guard a beautiful one; his English elaboration is retained separately.

[11918] Burton. Source page 628, dagger: "Chaloner lib.9. de repub. Ang." "Chaloner, On the English Commonwealth, book 9."

[11919] Editor. Thomas Chaloner, On Restoring the English Commonwealth 9.301–303. The household gods, penates, stand for the marital home. The advice concerns lineage, looks, age and, above all, character.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He that marries a wife out of a suspected Inne or Alehouse, buyes a horse in Smithfield, and hires a servant in Pauls, as the diverbe is, shall likely have a jade to his horse, a knave for his man, an arrant honest woman to his wife. Filia præsumitur esse matri similis, saith [11920]Nevisanus? Such a mother, such a daughter; mali corvi malum ovum, Cat to her kind.	A man who marries a wife from a disreputable inn or alehouse, buys a horse in Smithfield and hires a servant in St Paul's—as the proverb goes—is likely to have a worn-out nag for his horse, a rogue for his servant and a thoroughly "honest" woman for his wife. "The daughter is presumed to resemble her mother," says Nevizzano. Like mother, like daughter; "a bad egg from a bad crow"; a cat follows its kind.[11921]
[11922]Scilicet expectas ut tradat mater honestos Atque alios mores quàm quos habet?——	Do you really expect a mother to pass on honest Manners, different from those she has herself?[11923]
If the mother be dishonest, in all likelihood the daughter will [11924]matrizare, take after her in all good qualities.	If the mother is unchaste, in all likelihood the daughter will "take after her mother"—follow her in all her good qualities.
Creden' Pasiphae non tauripotente futuram Tauripetam?	Do you believe that a daughter of bull-loving Pasiphae Will not herself become a bull-seeker?[11925]

[11920] Burton. Source page 628, l: "Lib.2. num.159." "Book 2, number 159."

[11921] Editor. Diverbe means proverb; jade, a worn-out or ill-conditioned horse; man, a male servant. Smithfield and St Paul's are London settings in the proverb. The printed "arrant honest woman" is ironic in this sequence, so quotation marks indicate its pointed use in modern English. The crow and cat sayings claim that offspring follow their parents.

[11922] Burton. Source page 628, dagger: "Juven. Sat.6." "Juvenal, Satire 6."

[11923] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.239–240. The question is sarcastic; Burton's following "all good qualities" continues the sarcasm. The separate marginal couplet makes the same categorical claim about daughters following their mothers, rather than supplying evidence for it.

[11924] Burton. Source page 628, m: "Si genetrix castè, castè quoque filia vivit; Si meretrix mater, filia talis erit." "If the mother lives chastely, her daughter also lives chastely; if the mother is a prostitute, the daughter will be the same."

[11925] Editor. Pasiphae is the mythic woman who desired a bull. The printed tauripotente is unusual and the syntax compressed; the translation supplies "a daughter" from Burton's surrounding mother–daughter argument and takes the word as "bull-loving." This is a contextual reading, not a securely identified quotation. The nearby Juvenal 6 note fits the preceding couplet; this second couplet's source remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If the dam trot, the foal will not amble. My last caution is, that a woman do not bestow her self upon a fool, or an apparant melancholy person; jealousie is a symptome of that disease, and fools have no moderation. Justina a Romane Lady was much persecuted, and after made away by her jealous husband, she caused and enjoyned this Epitaph, as a caveat to others, to be engraven on her tomb:	If the mare trots, the foal will not amble. My last caution is that a woman should not give herself in marriage to a fool or an obviously melancholy man: jealousy is a symptom of that disease, and fools have no restraint. Justina, a Roman lady, was badly persecuted and later killed by her jealous husband. She had ordered this epitaph to be engraved on her tomb as a warning to others:[11926]
Source page 629 [11927]Discite ab exemplo Justinæ, discite patres, Ne nubat fatuo filia vestra viro, &c.	Learn from Justina's example; learn, you fathers, Not to let your daughter marry a foolish man, and so on.
Learn parents all, and by Justina's case, Your children to no dizards for to place.	Learn, all you parents, from Justina's case, Not to marry your children to fools.

[11926] Editor. The horse proverb says that offspring imitate their parents. Made away means killed. Burton treats melancholy within his historical medical framework; it is not equivalent to a modern diagnosis. The Justina story and epitaph are attributed to Camerarius in the following margin and still require direct source collation.

[11927] Burton. Source page 629, n: "Camerarius cent.2. cap.54. oper. subcis." "Camerarius, Leisure Hours, second hundred, chapter 54 [subcis. as printed]."

Original text 1651	Modern English
After marriage, I can give no better admonitions than to use their wives well, and which a friend of mine told me that was a married man, I will tell you as good cheap, saith Nicostratus in [11928]Stobeus, to avoid future strife, and for quietness sake, when you are in bed, take heed of your wives flattering speeches over night, and curtain sermons in the morning. Let them do their endeavour likewise to maintain them to their means, which [11929]Patricius ingeminates, and let them have liberty with discretion, as time and place requires:	After marriage I can give men no better advice than to treat their wives well. "What a married friend told me, I will tell you just as cheaply," says Nicostratus in Stobaeus: to avoid future quarrels and for peace's sake, "when you are in bed, beware of your wives' flattering speeches at night and lectures behind the bed-curtains in the morning." Let men also do their best to support their wives according to their means, as Patrizi repeatedly urges, and allow them reasonable freedom as time and place require.[11930]
many women turn queans by compulsion, as [11931]Nevisanus observes, because their husbands are so hard, and keep them so short in diet and apparell, paupertas cogit eas meretricari, poverty and hunger, want of means, makes them dishonest, or bad usage; their churlish behaviour forceth them to fly out, or bad examples, they do it to cry quittance.	Many women are driven to prostitution, as Nevizzano observes, because their husbands are so harsh and keep them so short of food and clothing: "poverty forces them to prostitute themselves." Poverty, hunger and lack of means make them unchaste—or ill-treatment does; their husbands' surly behaviour drives them to rebel, or their bad example leads the women to repay them in kind.[11932]

[11928] Burton. Source page 629, dagger: "Ser.72. Quod amicus quidam uxorem habens mihi dixit, dicam vobis, In cubili cavendæ adulationes vesperi, mane clamores." "Discourse 72. What a certain married friend told me, I will tell you: in bed, beware of flattery in the evening and shouting in the morning."

[11929] Burton. Source page 629, dagger: "Lib.4 tit.4. de institut. Reipub. cap de officio mariti & uxoris." "On the Ordering of a Commonwealth, book 4, title 4, chapter on the duties of husband and wife."

[11930] Editor. Use means treat; as good cheap means at as little cost; curtain sermons are a spouse's private lectures in bed; ingeminates means repeats or insists upon. The passage in Stobaeus is attributed to Nicostratus. Its first-person married friend belongs to the quoted speaker, not necessarily Burton.

[11931] Burton. Source page 629, o: "Lib.4. syl. nup. num.81. Non curant de uxoribus, nec volunt iis subvenire de victu, vestitu, &c." "The Marriage Wood, book 4, number 81. They take no care of their wives and will not provide them with food, clothing and so on."

[11932] Editor. Quean here means prostitute. Cry quittance means retaliate or repay in kind. The passage explicitly connects women's conduct with husbands' deprivation, ill-treatment and example, rather than presenting it as an isolated disposition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In the other extreme some are too liberal, as the proverb is, Turdus malum sibi cacat, they make a rod for their own tails, as Candaules did to Gyges in [11933]Herodotus, commend his wifes beauty himself, and besides would needs have him see her naked. Whilst they give their wives too much liberty to gad abroad, and bountifull allowance, they are accessary to their own miseries; animæ uxorum pessime olent, as Plautus jybes, they have deformed souls, and by their painting and colours procure odium mariti, their husbands hate, especially,	At the opposite extreme, some are too generous. As the proverb says, "The thrush shits its own ruin": they make a rod for their own backs, as Candaules did with Gyges in Herodotus, praising his wife's beauty himself and insisting that Gyges see her naked. By giving their wives too much freedom to wander about and a lavish allowance, they contribute to their own miseries. "Wives' breaths smell very foul," as Plautus jeers—they have ugly souls—and by their paint and cosmetics they provoke "their husband's hatred," their husband's hate, especially:[11934]
——[11935]cum misere viscantur labra mariti.	When the husband's lips are miserably smeared with sticky stuff.[11936]
Besides, their wives (as [11937]Basil notes) Impudenter se exponunt masculorum aspectibus, jactantes tunicas, & coram tripudiantes, impudently thrust themselves into other mens companies, and by their undecent wanton carriage, provoke and tempt the spectators. Vertuous women should keep house; and 'twas well performed and ordered by the Greeks,	Besides, their wives, as Basil notes, "shamelessly expose themselves to men's gaze, tossing their tunics and dancing before them." They shamelessly thrust themselves into other men's company and, by their indecent, wanton behaviour, provoke and tempt those watching. Virtuous women should stay at home; and the Greeks wisely prescribed and practised this:[11938]

[11933] Burton. Source page 629, star: "In Clio. Speciem uxoris supra modum extollens fecit ut illam nudam coram aspiceret." "In Clio. Praising his wife's beauty beyond measure, he arranged for the man to see her naked before him."

[11934] Editor. Herodotus 1.8–12 tells the Candaules and Gyges story. The thrush proverb concerns causing one's own destruction; its Latin is deliberately coarse. Anima can mean breath or soul: the Latin joke is rendered as foul breath, followed by Burton's moralizing "deformed souls." His exact Plautus locus remains for collation.

[11935] Burton. Source page 629, dagger: "Juven. Sat.6. He cannot kisse his wife for paint." "Juvenal, Satire 6. He cannot kiss his wife because of her cosmetics."

[11936] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.464, describes cosmetics sticking to a husband's lips. Burton prints misere, "miserably," in place of the consulted text's miseri, "of the unfortunate [husband]," and begins with cum instead of et hinc. The translation follows his wording; the English marginal gloss remains a Burton note.

[11937] Burton. Source page 629, q: "Orat. contra ebr." "Oration against Drunkenness."

[11938] Editor. Basil's homily Against Drunkenness condemns women dancing at martyrs' shrines outside the city during a Resurrection festival and attracting young male spectators (French translation, pp. 162–163). Thus the concern about spectators occurs in Basil as well as Burton. The exact Greek and Burton's Latin version remain uncollated. The following anonymous couplet and these prescriptions belong to Burton's gendered moral argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
——mulier ne qua in publicum Spectandam se sine arbitro præbeat viro:	Let no woman offer herself to public view Without a man to supervise her.
which made Phidias belike at Elis paint Venus treading on a Tortoise, a symbole of womens silence and house-keeping. For a woman abroad and alone, is like a Deer broke out of a Parke, quam mille venatores insequuntur, whom every hunter followes; and besides in such places she cannot so well vindicate her self, but as that virgin Dinah (Gen. 34.2.) going for to see the daughters of the land, lost her virginity, she may be defiled and overtaken on a sudden; Imbelles damæ quid nisi præda sumus?	This presumably led Phidias at Elis to paint Venus treading on a tortoise, a symbol of women's silence and staying at home. For a woman out alone is like a deer escaped from a park, "pursued by a thousand hunters," whom every hunter follows. Besides, in such places she cannot defend herself so well. Like the virgin Dinah, Genesis 34:2, who lost her virginity when "going out to see the daughters of the land," she may suddenly be assaulted and violated. "Defenceless does, what are we but prey?"[11939] [11939] Editor. Plutarch, Advice to Bride and Groom 32, describes Phidias making the image of Aphrodite at Elis with a tortoise; Burton says "paint," which is retained. Genesis 34:1–2 describes Dinah's visit and Shechem's sexual violence. Burton turns the assault into a warning about women going out; that framing must be distinguished from responsibility for the assault. The final Latin speaks in the voice of vulnerable does.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 629–630 And therefore I know not what Philosopher he was, that would have women come but thrice abroad all their time, [11940]to be baptized, married, and buried; but he was too strait laced. Let them have their liberty in good sort, and go in good sort, modo non annos viginti ætatis suæ domi relinquant, as a good fellow said, so that they look not twenty years yonger abroad then they do at home, they be not spruce, neat, Angels abroad, beasts, dowdies, sluts at home; but seek by all means to please and give content to their husbands; to be quiet above all things, obedient, silent and patient; if they be incensed, angry, chide a little, their wives must not [11941]cample again, but take it in good part.	And so some philosopher—I do not know who—would have women go out only three times in their lives: "to be baptized, married and buried." But he was too strict. Let them have a proper measure of freedom and go out respectably, "provided they do not leave twenty years of their age at home," as a good fellow said—provided they do not look twenty years younger outside than at home, trim, neat angels abroad but beasts, dowdies and slatterns at home. Instead, let them try in every way to please and satisfy their husbands; above all, be peaceable, obedient, silent and patient. If their husbands are provoked, angry and scold a little, their wives must not answer back but take it well.[11942]

[11940] Burton. Source page 629, dagger: "Ad baptismum, matrimonium & tumulum." "To baptism, marriage and the tomb."

[11941] Burton. Source page 630, star: "Non vociferatur illa si maritus obganniat." "She does not raise her voice if her husband scolds."

[11942] Editor. In good sort means in an appropriate manner; strait laced, excessively strict; cample, quarrel or answer back. The change from they to their wives shows that the angry people are the husbands. The anonymous philosopher's identity is unresolved. Burton permits some freedom while placing the burden of silence on wives.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 630 An honest woman, I cannot now tell where she dwelt, but by report an honest woman she was, hearing one of her gossips by chance complain of her husbands impatience, told her an excellent remedy for it, and gave her withall a glasse of water, which when he brawled she should hold still in her mouth, and that toties quoties, as often as he chid; she did so two or three times with good success, and at length seeing her neighbour, gave her great thanks for it, and would needs know the ingredients, [11943]she told her in brief what it was, Fair water, and no more: for it was not the water, but her silence which performed the cure.	A respectable woman—I cannot now say where she lived, but she was reportedly respectable—happened to hear one of her women friends complain of her husband's bad temper. She told her an excellent remedy and gave her a glass of water, which she was to hold still in her mouth whenever he raged, "as often as it happened," whenever he scolded. She did this two or three times successfully. Eventually, on seeing her neighbour, she thanked her warmly and insisted on knowing the ingredients. The neighbour told her briefly what it was: "Clean water, and nothing more." For it was her silence, not the water, that effected the cure.[11944]
Let every froward woman imitate this example, and be quiet within doors, and (as [11945]M. Aurelius prescribes) a necessary caution it is to be observed of all good matrons that love their credits, to come little abroad, but follow their work at home, look to their houshold affairs and private business, œconomiæ incumbentes, be sober, thrifty, wary, circumspect, modest, and compose themselves to live to their husbands means, as a good huswife should do,	Let every contrary woman follow this example and be quiet indoors. As Marcus Aurelius prescribes, all good wives who value their reputations must observe this necessary caution: go out little, attend to their work at home, look after their household affairs and private business, "devoting themselves to household management"; be sober, thrifty, careful, prudent and modest; and settle themselves to live within their husbands' means, as a good housewife should.[11946]

[11943] Burton. Source page 630, dagger: "Fraudem aperiens ostendit ei non aquam sed silentium iracundiæ moderari." "Revealing the trick, she showed her that it was silence, not water, that restrained anger."

[11944] Editor. Gossip here means a woman friend or familiar companion, not a rumour. Fair water is clean, plain water. The anecdote makes silence the effective remedy and gives no medicinal ingredients; Burton does not identify its source.

[11945] Burton. Source page 630, q: "Horol. princi. lib.2. cap.8. Diligenter cavendum fœminis illustribus ne frequenter exeant." "The Dial of Princes, book 2, chapter 8. Women of rank must take particular care not to go out frequently."

[11946] Editor. The cited Dial of Princes is Antonio de Guevara's literary presentation of Marcus Aurelius, not the emperor's Meditations. Credit means reputation; huswife means housewife or household manager. The exact chapter and wording remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11947]Quæ studiis gavisa coli, partita labores Fallet opus cantu, formæ assimulata coronæ Cura puellaris, circum fusosque rotasque Cum volvet, &c.	Taking pleasure in being trained in useful pursuits, she will share the tasks And lighten the work with song; the girls' busy company, Arranged like a garland, will keep The spindles and spinning wheels turning, and so on.[11948]
Howsoever 'tis good to keep them private, not in prison;	In any case, it is good to keep them in private life, not in prison.
[11949]Quisquis custodit uxorem vectibus & seris, Etsi sibi sapiens, stultus est, & nihil sapit.	Whoever guards his wife with bars and bolts, Though wise in his own eyes, is a fool and knows nothing.[11950]
Reade more of this subject Horol. princ. lib.2. per totum. Arnisæus polit. Cyprian, Tertullian, Bossus de mulier. apparat. Godefridus de Amor. lib.2. cap.4. Levinus Lemnius cap.54. de institut. Christ. Barbarus de re uxor. lib.2. cap.2. Franciscus Patritius de institut. Reipub. lib.4. Tit.4. & 5. de officio mariti & uxoris, Christ. Fonseca Amphitheat. Amor. cap.45. Sam. Neander.&c.	Read more on this subject in the Dial of Princes, throughout book 2; Arnisaeus's Politics; Cyprian; Tertullian; Bossus, On Women's Dress; Godefridus, On Love, book 2, chapter 4; Levinus Lemnius, On Christian Education, chapter 54; Barbaro, On Marriage, book 2, chapter 2; Francesco Patrizi, On the Ordering of a Commonwealth, book 4, titles 4 and 5, on the duties of husband and wife; Cristóbal de Fonseca, Amphitheatre of Love, chapter 45; Samuel Neander; and so on.[11951]

[11947] Burton. Source page 630, dagger: "Chaloner."

[11948] Editor. Compare Chaloner, On Restoring the English Commonwealth 9.506–509. Burton changes Tot to Quæ, Curia to Cura and the continuation substantially. "The girls' busy company" is a contextual interpretation of his compressed wording, informed by Chaloner's curia, a group arranged like a garland. The printed wording remains in the original; the exact relationship to Chaloner's early editions has not been established.

[11949] Burton. Source page 630, star: "Menander."

[11950] Editor. Burton attributes this Latin couplet to Menander. Its contrast is between domestic privacy and imprisonment by physical locks. The precise Greek fragment or intermediary Latin source remains unresolved.

[11951] Editor. This is Burton's own reading list, retained in the modern-only text as part of the book. The abbreviated titles are translated descriptively; Arnisæus is Henning Arnisaeus, Barbarus is Francesco Barbaro, and Patritius is Francesco Patrizi. The particular works by Bossus and Godefridus and several editions remain to be identified conclusively.

Original text 1651	Modern English
These cautions concern him; and if by those or his own discretion otherwise he cannot moderate himself, his friends must not be wanting by their wisdom, if it be possible, to give the party grieved satisfaction, to prevent and remove the occasions, objects, if it may be to secure him. If it be one alone, or many, to consider whom he suspects or at what times, in what places he is most incensed, in what companies.	These cautions concern the husband. If neither these measures nor his own judgement can bring him to moderate himself, his friends must use their wisdom, if possible, to reassure the distressed man, prevent and remove the occasions and objects of his jealousy, and, if they can, make him feel secure. Whether he suspects one person or many, they should consider whom he suspects, at what times, in what places and in what company he becomes most inflamed.
[11952]Nevisanus makes a question whether a young Physitian ought to be admitted in case of sickness, into a new married mans house, to administer a julip, a syrup, or some such physick. The Persians of old would not suffer a young Physitian to come amongst women. [11953]Apollonides Cous made Artaxerxes cuckold, and was after buried alive for it.	Nevizzano raises the question whether, in a case of illness, a young physician should be admitted into a newly married man's house to administer a julep, a syrup or some similar medicine. The ancient Persians would not allow a young physician among women. Apollonides of Cos cuckolded Artaxerxes and was afterwards buried alive for it.[11954]

[11952] Burton. Source page 630, r: "Lib.5.num.11." "Book 5, number 11."

[11953] Burton. Source page 630, s: "Ctesias in Persicis finxit vulvæ morbum esse nec curari posse nisi cum viro concumberet, hac arte voti compos. &c." "Ctesias, in his Persian History: he pretended it was a disease of the womb and could not be cured unless she lay with a man; by this trick he gained his wish, and so on."

[11954] Editor. Julip means a sweet medicinal drink. Nevisanus is Giovanni Nevizzano. Burton misstates the Ctesias episode: in Photius's excerpt of the Persian History, section 44, the physician's patient and lover is Amytis, widow of Megabyzus and sister of Artaxerxes, not the king's wife. The original claim is retained and translated, rather than silently corrected.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A gaoler in Aristænetus had a fine young gentleman to his prisoner; [11955]in commiseration of his youth and person he let him loose, to enjoy the liberty of the prison, but he unkindly made him a Cornuto. Menelaus gave good welcome to Paris a stranger, his whole house and family were at his command, but he ungently stole away his best beloved wife.	A jailer in Aristaenetus had a handsome young gentleman as his prisoner. Out of compassion for his youth and appearance, he released him from his restraints and allowed him the freedom of the prison; but the prisoner ungratefully made him a cuckold. Menelaus welcomed Paris as a stranger, putting his whole house and household at his disposal; but Paris discourteously stole away his dearly loved wife.[11956]
Source page 630–631 The like measure was offered to Agis king of Lacedæmon, by [11957]Alcibiades an exile, for his good entertainment, he was too familiar with Timæa his wife, begetting a child of her, called Leotichides; and bragging moreover when he came home to Athens, that he had a son should be king of the Lacedemonians.	Agis, king of Sparta, received similar treatment from the exile Alcibiades in return for his hospitality. Alcibiades became too intimate with Agis's wife Timaea, fathering a child by her named Leotychides, and moreover boasted, when he returned home to Athens, that he had a son who would become king of the Spartans.[11958]

[11955] Burton. Source page 630, dagger: "Exsolvit vinculis, solutumque demisit, at ille inhumanus stupravit conjugem." "He freed him from his chains and let him go; but the ungrateful man had illicit intercourse with his wife."

[11956] Editor. Cornuto means cuckold. Halhed and Sheridan's 1771 Love Epistles of Aristaenetus, epistle XX, "The Jailor Tricked," pp. 131–133, retells this incident as Phylacides' complaint to Phrurion. That later verse adaptation confirms the story, not Burton's Greek or Latin source or its numbering. Stupravit denotes illicit or dishonouring intercourse; the margin alone does not establish force. Paris's removal of Helen violates Menelaus's hospitality.

[11957] Burton. Source page 630, star: "Plutarch. vita ejus." "Plutarch, his Life."

[11958] Editor. Plutarch, Alcibiades 23.7–8, reports the affair with Timaea and Alcibiades's ambition to have his descendants rule Sparta. Burton adds a particular setting for the boast, his return to Athens, which the consulted passage does not supply. His Lacedæmon and Lacedemonians are rendered as Sparta and Spartans.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 631 If such objects were removed, no doubt but the parties might easily be satisfied, or that they could use them gently, and intreat them well, not to revile them, scoffe at, hate them, as in such cases commonly they do; 'tis an humane infirmity, a miserable vexation, and they should not add grief to grief, nor aggravate their misery, but seek to please, and by all means give them content, by good counsel, removing such offensive objects, or by mediation of some discreet friends.	If such objects of suspicion were removed, no doubt the sufferers might easily be reassured. Or others could treat them gently and kindly, instead of reviling, mocking or hating them, as people commonly do in such cases. It is a human weakness, a wretched torment; they should not add grief to grief or aggravate their misery, but seek to please them and do everything possible to put them at ease, through good advice, the removal of such provoking objects, or the mediation of sensible friends.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In old Rome there was a Temple erected by the matrons to that [11959]Viriplaca Dea, another to Venus verticorda, quæ maritos uxoribus reddebat benevolos, whither (if any difference hapned betwixt man and wife) they did instantly resort: there they did offer sacrifice, a white Hart, Plutarch records, sine felle, without the gall, (Some say the like of Juno's temple) and make their prayers for conjugall peace: before some [11960]indifferent arbitrators and friends, the matter was heard betwixt man and wife, and commonly composed.	In ancient Rome, the married women erected a temple to the goddess Viriplaca, and another to Venus Verticordia, "who made husbands well disposed towards their wives." Whenever a disagreement arose between husband and wife, they immediately went there. They offered a sacrifice—a white stag, as Plutarch records, "without gall," without the gallbladder; some say the same of Juno's temple—and prayed for peace in marriage. The dispute between husband and wife was heard before impartial arbitrators and friends, and usually settled.[11961]
In our times we want no sacred Churches, or good men to end such controversies, if use were made of them. Some say that precious stone called [11962]Beryllus, others a Diamond, hath excellent vertue, contra hostium injurias, & conjugatos invicem conciliare, to reconcile men and wives, to maintain unity and love; you may try this when you will, and as you see cause.	In our own time we lack neither sacred churches nor good men to settle such disputes, if only we made use of them. Some say that the precious stone called beryl, others a diamond, has excellent power "against injuries inflicted by enemies, and to reconcile married people to one another": to reconcile husbands and wives and preserve harmony and love. You may try this whenever you wish, and as you see fit.[11963]

[11959] Burton. Source page 631, t: "Rosinus lib.2.19. Valerius lib.2.cap.1." "Rosinus, book 2, chapter 19; Valerius, book 2, chapter 1."

[11960] Burton. Source page 631, u: "Alexander ab Alexandro l.4.cap.8.gen.dier." "Alessandro degli Alessandri, Genial Days, book 4, chapter 8."

[11961] Editor. Viriplaca means the appeaser of husbands; Verticordia, the turner of hearts. Valerius Maximus 2.1.6 describes husbands and wives speaking their grievances in Viriplaca's temple and returning reconciled. Plutarch, Advice to Bride and Groom 27, says that the gall is excluded from sacrifices to Hera, symbolizing the absence of marital bitterness; it does not specify Burton's white stag. Indifferent means impartial. Exact collation of Rosinus and Alessandro remains open.

[11962] Burton. Source page 631, star: "Fr. Rueus de gemmis l.2.cap.8.&15." "François de La Rue, On Gems, book 2, chapters 8 and 15."

[11963] Editor. Burton reports supposed powers of gemstones, citing François de La Rue. The Latin also includes protection against enemies, which his subsequent English gloss omits. Both are retained. The conditional invitation to try them follows the reported claims; it does not establish their efficacy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If none of all these means and cautions will take place, I know not what remedy to prescribe, or whither such persons may go for ease, except they can get into the same [11964]Turkie paradise, where they shall have as many fair wives as they will themselves, with cleer eyes, and such as look on none but their own husbands, no fear, no danger of being cuckolds; or else I would have them observe that strict rule of [11965]Alphonsus, to marry a deaf and dumb man to a blind woman.	If none of these measures and precautions has any effect, I do not know what remedy to prescribe or where such people can go for relief, unless they can enter that Turkish paradise, "where they will have as many beautiful wives as they wish, with clear eyes that look at no one except their own husbands": no fear, no danger of being cuckolded. Otherwise, I would have them follow Alphonsus's strict rule: marry a deaf man who cannot speak to a blind woman.[11966]
If this will not help, let them to prevent the worst, consult with an [11967]Astrologer, and see whether the significators in her Horoscope agree with his, that they be not in signis & partibus odiose intuentibus aut imperantibus, sed mutuo & amice antiscijs & obedientibus, otherwise, (as they hold) there will be intolerable enmities between them:	If this does not help, let them consult an astrologer to prevent the worst, and see whether the significators in her horoscope agree with his: that they are not "in signs and degrees that regard one another with hostility or command one another, but in mutually friendly antiscial and obedient positions"; otherwise, as the astrologers maintain, there will be intolerable hostility between them.[11968]

[11964] Burton. Source page 631, x: "Strozius Cicogna lib.2.cap.15.spirit.et in can. habent ibidem uxores quot volunt cum oculis clarissimis, quos nunquam in aliquem præter maritum fixuri sunt, &c. Bredenbacchius, Idem & Bohemus &c." "Strozzi Cicogna, book 2, chapter 15, on spirits and incantations: there they have as many wives as they wish, with very bright eyes, which they will never fix on anyone except their husband, and so on. Breydenbach; the same in Boemus, and others."

[11965] Burton. Source page 631, dagger: "Uxor cæca ducat maritum surdum, &c." "Let a blind wife marry a deaf husband, and so on."

[11966] Editor. The "Turkish paradise" is Burton's satirical account of Muslim belief, mediated through the European writers named in his margin, rather than a direct quotation from Islamic scripture. The original joke says deaf and dumb; the marginal Latin says only deaf. The identity and source of this Alphonsus saying remain unresolved.

[11967] Burton. Source page 631, star: "See Valent. de Nabod. differ. Com. in Alcabitium, ubi plura." "See Valentin Nabod's commentary on Alcabitius, where there is more."

[11968] Editor. A significator is a celestial body or point taken to represent a person or matter in a horoscope. Antiscial positions are paired across the solstitial axis; commanding and obeying signs form another traditional relationship. Compare Ptolemy's Tetrabiblos, the chapters on commanding/obeying signs and signs beholding one another (1.17–18 in Ashmand's version). Burton cites Nabod's commentary on Alcabitius; the compressed phrase differ. is left unexpanded in the marginal transcription.

Original text 1651	Modern English
or else get him Sigillum veneris, a Characteristical Seal stamped in the day and hour of Venus, when she is fortunate, with such and such set words and charmes, which Villanovanus and Leo Suavius prescribe, ex sigillis magicis Salomonis, Hermetis, Raguelis, &c. with many such, which Alexis, Albertus, and some of our natural magicians put upon us: ut mulier cum aliquo adulterare non possit, incide de Capillis ejus, &c. and he shall surely be gracious in all womens eyes, and never suspect or disagree with his own wife, so long as he wears it.	Or else let him obtain "the seal of Venus," a seal bearing magical characters, stamped on Venus's day and hour when she is favourably placed, with prescribed words and charms such as Villanovanus and Leo Suavius recommend, "from the magical seals of Solomon, Hermes, Raguel, and so on," together with many similar things that Alexis, Albertus and some of our natural magicians foist upon us: "So that a woman cannot commit adultery with anyone, cut off some of her hair, and so on." He will assuredly find favour in every woman's eyes, and never suspect or quarrel with his own wife, so long as he wears it.[11969]
Source page 631–632 If this course be not approved, and other remedies may not be had, they must in the last place sue for a divorce: but that is somewhat difficult to effect, and not all out so fit. For as Felisacus in his Tract de justa uxore urgeth, If that law of Constantine the great, or that of Theodosius and Valentinian, concerning divorce, were in use in our times, innumeras propemodum viduas haberemus, et cælibes viros, we should have almost no married couples left.	If this course is unacceptable and no other remedies are available, they must, as a last resort, seek a divorce. But that is somewhat difficult to obtain, and not altogether suitable. For, as Felisacus argues in his treatise On a Lawful Wife, if that law of Constantine the Great, or that of Theodosius and Valentinian concerning divorce, were in force in our time, "we would have almost innumerable unmarried women and unmarried men": we would have almost no married couples left.[11970]

[11969] Editor. A characteristical seal bears occult symbols. Burton reports a talisman whose manufacture is timed astrologically; he calls such practices things magicians "put upon us," or foist upon us. The hair recipe stops at etc. in the source and is not completed here. Villanovanus is the name under which works were attributed to Arnald of Villanova; these particular textual attributions and the sources named alongside him still need collation.

[11970] Editor. Felisacus is Jean Filesac; De justa uxore is translated descriptively. Viduas here can include women without husbands, not only women bereaved by death, hence "unmarried women" in this divorce context. Burton offers no precise legal citations for the imperial laws, so their provisions and his numerical inference remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 632 Try therefore those former remedies: or as [11971]Tertullian reports of Democritus, that put out his eyes, because he could not look upon a woman without lust, and was much troubled to see that which he might not enjoy; let him make himself blind, and so he shall avoid that care and molestation of watching his wife.	Try those earlier remedies, then. Or, as Tertullian reports of Democritus, who put out his eyes because he could not look at a woman without lust and was greatly troubled to see what he could not enjoy, let him make himself blind: then he will escape the care and trouble of watching his wife.[11972]
One other soveraign remedy I could repeat, an especial Antidote against Iealousie, an excellent cure, but I am not now disposed to tell it, not that like a covetous Emperick I conceal it for any gain, but some other reasons, I am not willing to publish it; if you be very desireous to know it, when I meet you next, I will peradventure tell you what it is in your ear. This is the best councel I can give; which he that hath need of, as occasion serves may apply unto himself. In the mean time,	I could mention one other sovereign remedy, a special antidote against jealousy, an excellent cure; but I am not now inclined to disclose it. It is not that I conceal it for profit, like a greedy quack: for other reasons I am unwilling to publish it. If you are very eager to know, perhaps, when we next meet, I will whisper it in your ear. This is the best advice I can give; whoever needs it may apply it to himself as occasion arises. Meanwhile,[11973]
——dii talem terris avertite pestem,	Gods, turn such a plague away from the earth![11974]
as the proverb is, from Heresie, Iealousie, and Frensie, good Lord deliver us.	As the proverb says: from heresy, jealousy and frenzy, good Lord deliver us.

[11971] Burton. Source page 631, dagger, attached to Tertullian on 632: “Cap.46.Apol. quod mulieres sine concupiscentia aspicere non posset &c.” “Apology, chapter 46: because he could not look at women without lust, and so on.”

[11972] Editor. Tertullian, Apology 46, recounts Democritus’s self-blinding in an argument comparing philosophers with Christians. Burton transfers that reported story to the jealous husband. It is a literary and polemical example, not independently established biography; the marginal reference is printed at the foot of page 631, while the relevant sentence occurs on 632.

[11973] Editor. Sovereign means supremely effective; empiric here is an unlearned or secretive medical practitioner, hence quack. Burton conspicuously withholds the final remedy and offers to whisper it. The text never identifies it, and no conjectural remedy has been supplied.

[11974] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 3.620. The original context is Achaemenides’s description of the Cyclops Polyphemus; Burton applies the prayer to jealousy. His closing proverb adopts the form of a litany petition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SECT. 4.	SECTION 4
MEMB. 4. SUBSECT. 1. Religious Melancholy.	MEMBER 1. SUBSECTION 1. Religious melancholy.[11975]
Its object God; what his beauty is; How it allureth. The parts and parties affected.	Its object, God; what his beauty is; how it attracts. The parts and people affected.
That there is such a distinct Species of love Melancholy, no man hath ever yet doubted; but whether this subdivision of [11976]Religious Melancholy be warrantable, it may be controverted.	No one has ever yet doubted that love melancholy is a distinct species; but whether this subdivision, religious melancholy, is justified may be disputed.[11977]
[11978]Pergite Pierides, medio nec calle vagantem Linquite me, quà nulla pedum vestigia ducunt, Nulla rotæ currus testantur signa priores.	Go on, Muses; do not abandon me wandering midway Along a path where no footprints lead, Where no wheel marks testify to earlier chariots.[11979]

[11975] Editor. The displayed heading in this 1651 copy reads MEMB. 4.; the running headings and the new section's sequence identify Member 1. The original column preserves 4; the modern heading corrects it to 1. This is the beginning of Section 4, not a continuation of the preceding section's Member 4.

[11976] Burton. Source page 632, y: "Called Religious because it is still conversant about Religion and such divine objects."

[11977] Editor. Species and subdivision belong to Burton's historical classification of melancholy. He distinguishes agreement about love melancholy from debate about making religious melancholy a separate subdivision. His category includes conditions and beliefs that do not correspond to a single modern diagnosis. In the margin, still means continually.

[11978] Burton. Source page 632, star: "Grotius."

[11979] Editor. Pierides are the Muses. The margin attributes the three lines to Grotius without naming a work; that precise attribution remains unresolved. The unworn road and absent wheel tracks figure Burton's claim to be entering a field without a model.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I have no pattern to follow as in some of the rest, no man to imitate. No Physitian hath as yet distinctly written of it as of the other; all acknowledge it a most notable Symptome, some a cause, but few a species or kinde. [11980]Areteus, Alexander, Rhasis, Avicenna, and most of our late writers, as Gordonius, Fuchsius, Plater, Bruel, Montaltus, &c. repeat it as a Symptome.	I have no pattern to follow, as I have in some of the other parts, no one to imitate. No physician has yet written a separate account of it as of the other kind. All acknowledge it as a very notable symptom, some as a cause, but few as a species or kind. Aretaeus, Alexander, Rhazes, Avicenna and most of our later writers—Gordon, Fuchs, Plater, Bruel, Montalto and others—list it as a symptom.[11981]
[11982]Some seem to bee inspired of the holy Ghost, some take upon them to bee Prophets, some are addicted to new opinions, some foretell strange things, de statu mundi & Antichristi, saith Gordonius. Some will prophecy of the end of the world to a day almost, and the fall of the Antichrist; as they have been addicted or brought up; for so melancholy works with them, as [11983]Laurentius holds.	"Some seem to be inspired by the Holy Ghost"; some claim to be prophets, some are devoted to new opinions, some predict strange things "about the state of the world and of Antichrist," says Gordon. Some will prophesy the end of the world almost to the day, and the fall of Antichrist, according to their predispositions or upbringing; for, as Du Laurens maintains, this is how melancholy works upon them.

[11980] Burton. Source page 632, z: "Lib.1.cap.16. nonnulli opinionibus addicti sunt, & futura se prædicere arbitrantur." "Book 1, chapter 16: some are devoted to opinions and think that they predict the future."

[11981] Editor. These are medical authorities, including Aretaeus of Cappadocia, Alexander of Tralles, Rhazes, Avicenna, Bernard de Gordon, Leonhart Fuchs, Felix Plater, Walter Bruel and Montalto. The first marginal reference, book 1, chapter 16, is retained where printed without imposing an uncertain attribution. Burton's claim that there is no distinct treatment is qualified by the exceptions he immediately discusses.

[11982] Burton. Source page 632, a: "Aliis videtur quod sunt prophetæ & inspirati à Spiritu sancto, & incipiunt prophetare & multa futura prædicunt." "Others imagine that they are prophets and inspired by the Holy Spirit; they begin to prophesy and predict many future events."

[11983] Burton. Source page 632, b: "Cap.6.de Melanch." "Chapter 6, on melancholy."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 632–633 If they have been precisely given, all their meditations tend that way, and in conclusion produce strange effects: the humour imprints symptomes according to their several inclinations and conditions, which makes [11984]Guianerius and [11985]Felix Plater put too much devotion, blinde zeal, fear of eternal punishment, and that last judgement for a cause of those enthusiasticks and desperate persons:	If they have been strictly religious, all their meditations tend in that direction and eventually produce strange effects. The humour impresses symptoms upon them according to their individual inclinations and dispositions. This leads Guaineri and Felix Plater to regard excessive devotion, blind zeal, fear of eternal punishment and the Last Judgement as a cause of the condition of those people who believe themselves inspired or are overwhelmed by despair.[11986]
Source page 633 but some do not obscurely make a distinct species of it, dividing Love Melancholy into, that whose object is women; and into the other whose object is God. Plato in Convivio, makes mention of two distinct furies; and amongst our Neotericks, Hercules de Saxonia lib. 1. pract. med. cap. 16. cap. de Melanch. doth expresly treat of it in a distinct Species.	But some plainly make a distinct species of it, dividing love melancholy into the kind whose object is women and the other whose object is God. Plato, in the Symposium, mentions two distinct frenzies; and among our more recent writers, Hercules de Saxonia, in his Practice of Medicine, book 1, chapter 16, the chapter on melancholy, expressly treats it as a distinct species.[11987]

[11984] Burton. Source page 633, c: “Cap.5.Tractat. multi ob timorem Dei sunt melancholici, & timorem gehennæ. They are still troubled for their sins.” “Chapter 5 of the treatise: many are melancholy because of fear of God and fear of hell. They are continually troubled about their sins.”

[11985] Burton. Source page 633, d: “Plater, c.13.” “Plater, chapter 13.”

[11986] Editor. Precisely given means strictly or scrupulously religious. Humour refers to the bodily humour in Burton’s medical account. Enthusiast here is someone claiming divine inspiration, not merely an eager person; desperate means driven to despair. The causal argument is Burton’s and the physicians’ historical account of religious distress.

[11987] Editor. Convivium is Plato’s Symposium; neotericks means more recent writers. Hercules de Saxonia is Ercole Sassonia. The exact basis for the claim of two distinct frenzies in the Symposium remains for collation; the later Phaedrus quotation is separately identifiable.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11988]Love Melancholy (saith he) is twofold; the first is that (to which peradventure some will not vouchsafe this name or species of Melancholy) affection of those which put God for their object, and are altogether about prayer, fasting, &c. the other about women. Peter Forestus in his observations delivereth as much in the same words: and Felix Platerus de mentis alienat. cap. 3. frequentissima est ejus species, in qua curanda sæpissimè multum fui impeditus; 'tis a frequent disease; and they have a ground of what they say, forth of Areteus and Plato.	"Love melancholy," he says, "is of two kinds. The first is the condition of those who make God their object and devote themselves entirely to prayer, fasting and so on—though perhaps some will not grant it the name or classification of melancholy. The other concerns women." Pieter van Foreest, in his Observations, says as much in the same words. Felix Plater, in On Mental Disturbance, chapter 3, says, "It is a very frequent species, and in treating it I have very often been greatly hindered." It is a common disease; and Aretaeus and Plato provide grounds for what they say.[11989]

[11988] Burton. Source page 633, e: "Melancholia Erotica vel quæ cum amore est, duplex est: prima quæ ab aliis forsan non meretur nomen melancholiæ, est affectio eorum quæ pro objecto proponunt Deum & ideo nihil aliud curant aut cogitant quam Deum, jejunia, vigilias: altera ob mulieres." "Erotic melancholy, or that associated with love, is twofold. The first, which perhaps in others' judgement does not deserve the name of melancholy, is the condition of those who set God before themselves as their object and therefore care or think about nothing except God, fasts and vigils; the other arises because of women."

[11989] Editor. The Latin margin adds vigils to the devotions named in Burton's English quotation. Plater's Latin also says that he often experienced serious difficulty treating this species, a point omitted from Burton's brief English gloss. Both versions are retained. Exact collation of Sassonia, Foreest and Plater remains open; the earlier margin cites Plater chapter 13, whereas this body passage cites chapter 3.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11990]Areteus an old author in his third book cap. 6. doth so divide Love Melancholy, and derives this second from the first, which comes by inspiration or otherwise. [11991]Plato in his Phædrus hath these words, Apollo's Priests in Delphos, and at Dodona, in their fury do many pretty feats, and benefit the Greeks, but never in their right wits. He makes them all mad, as well he might;	Aretaeus, an ancient author, in his third book, chapter 6, divides love melancholy in this way and derives this second kind from the first; it comes through inspiration or otherwise. Plato, in his Phaedrus, has these words: "Apollo's priests at Delphi, and those at Dodona, perform many fine feats in their frenzy and benefit the Greeks, but never in their right minds." He makes them all mad, as well he might.[11992]
and he that shall but consider that superstition of old, those prodigious effects of it (as in its place I will shew the several furies of our Fatidici dii, Pythonissæ, Sibyls, Enthusiasts, Pseudoprophets, Hereticks and Schismaticks in these our latter ages) shall instantly confess, that all the world again cannot afford so much matter of madness, so many stupend symptomes, as superstition, heresie, schisme hath brought out;	Anyone who considers ancient superstition and its monstrous effects—as in the appropriate place I shall show the various frenzies of our prophetic gods, Pythonesses, Sibyls, enthusiasts, false prophets, heretics and schismatics in these later times of ours—will immediately admit that the whole world besides cannot furnish so much material for madness, so many astonishing symptoms, as superstition, heresy and schism have produced.[11993]

[11990] Burton. Source page 633, f: "Alia reperitur furoris species à prima vel à secunda, deorum rogantium, vel afflatu numinum furor hic venit." "Another species of frenzy is found, different from the first or the second: this frenzy comes upon those who petition the gods, or through divine inspiration."

[11991] Burton. Source page 633, g: "Qui in Delphis futura prædicunt vates, & in Dodona sacerdotes furentes quidem multa jocunda Græcis deferunt, sani vero exigua aut nulla." "The seers who predict the future at Delphi and the priests at Dodona bring the Greeks many benefits when frenzied, but few or none when sane."

[11992] Editor. Aretaeus, Causes and Signs of Chronic Diseases 1.6, describes religiously inspired self-wounding by people otherwise sane, as the Adams translation confirms; this is not simply a division of love melancholy. Burton's book 3 counts after two books on acute diseases. His Latin intermediary remains untraced. Plato, Phaedrus 244a–b, names the Delphic prophetess and Dodona's priestesses, not simply Apollo's priests, and praises divine madness. Burton redirects this towards superstition; "never" exceeds his Latin margin's "few or none."

[11993] Editor. Pythonesses and Sibyls are prophetic women; enthusiasts here claim inspiration. Heretics and schismatics are Burton's confessional categories. He combines ancient divination with religious conflicts of his own age and treats them as evidence for this species of melancholy; the labels and judgement remain his.

Original text 1651	Modern English
that this species alone may be parallel'd to all the former, hath a greater latitude, and more miraculous effects; that it more besots and infatuates men, than any other above named whatsoever, doth more harm, work more disquietness to mankinde, and hath more crucified the souls of mortal men (such hath been the divels craft) than wars, plagues, sicknesses, dearth, famine, and all the rest.	This species alone can be set against all the preceding ones: it has a wider range and more extraordinary effects. It stupefies and deludes people more than any other kind named above, does more harm, causes humanity more unrest and has tormented mortal souls more—such has been the devil's cunning—than wars, plagues, sicknesses, scarcity, famine and all the rest.
Give me but a little leave, and I will set before your eyes in breif a stupend, vast, infinite Ocean of incredible madness and folly: a sea full of shelves and rocks, sands, gulfes, Euripes and contrary tides, full of fearfull monsters, uncouth shapes, roaring waves, tempests, and Siren calmes, Halcyonian seas; unspeakable misery, such Comædies and Tragedies, such absurd and ridiculous, ferall and lamentable fits, that I know not whether they are more to be pitied or derided, or may bee beleived, but that we daily see the same still practised in our dayes, fresh examples, nova novitia, fresh objects of misery and madness in this kind that are still represented unto us, abroad, at home, in the midst of us, in our bosomes.	Give me only a little liberty, and I shall briefly set before your eyes an astonishing, vast, infinite ocean of incredible madness and folly: a sea full of shoals and rocks, sandbanks, gulfs, turbulent straits and contrary tides; full of fearful monsters, strange shapes, roaring waves, tempests, Siren calms and halcyon seas; unspeakable misery, such comedies and tragedies, such absurd and ridiculous, deadly and lamentable fits, that I do not know whether they deserve more pity or ridicule, or can even be believed—except that every day we still see the same things happening in our own time: fresh examples, "new novelties," fresh instances of misery and madness of this kind continually presented to us, abroad, at home, among us, in our own hearts.[11994]
Source page 633–634 But before I can come to treat of these several errours and obliquities, their causes, symptomes, affections, &c. I must say something necessarily of the object of this love, God himself, what this love is, how it allureth, whence it proceeds, and (which is the cause of all our miseries) how we mistake, wander and swerve from it.	But before I can discuss these various errors and deviations, their causes, symptoms, disturbances and so on, I must necessarily say something about the object of this love, God himself: what this love is, how it attracts us, where it comes from and—what causes all our miseries—how we misunderstand it, wander and turn away from it.

[11994] Editor. Shelves are shoals; Euripes evokes the Euripus and its changeable currents, here turbulent straits. Siren calms suggest deceptive attractions and peril; halcyon seas, the legendary calm associated with the kingfisher's nesting. Ferall means deadly or funereal, not wild in the modern sense. Nova novitia is deliberately repetitive: new novelties. The ocean image includes apparently tranquil as well as violent dangers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 634 Amongst all those divine attributes that God doth vindicate to himself, eternity, omnipotency, immutability, wisdome, majesty, justice, mercy, &c. his [11995]beauty is not the least, One thing saith David, have I desired of the Lord, and that I will still desire, to behold the beauty of the Lord, Psal. 27.4. And out of Sion which is the perfection of beauty hath God shined, Psal. 50.2.	Among all the divine attributes that God claims for himself—eternity, omnipotence, immutability, wisdom, majesty, justice, mercy and so on—his beauty is not the least. "One thing," says David, "have I desired of the Lord, and that I shall continue to desire: to behold the beauty of the Lord," Psalm 27:4. "And out of Zion, which is the perfection of beauty, God has shone," Psalm 50:2.
All other creatures are fair, I confess, and many other objects do much enamour us, a fair house, a fair horse, a comely person. [11996]I am amazed, saith Austin, when I look up to heaven and behold the beauty of the stars, the beauty of Angels, principalities, powers, who can express it? who can sufficiently commend, or set out this beauty which appears in us? so fair a body, so fair a face, eyes, nose, cheeks, chin, brows, all fair and lovely to behold; besides the beauty of the soul which cannot be discerned. If we so labour and be so much affected with the comeliness of creatures, how should we be ravished with that admirable lustre of God himself?	All other created things are beautiful, I admit, and many other objects greatly captivate us: a beautiful house, a beautiful horse, a handsome person. "I am amazed," says Augustine, "when I look up to heaven and see the beauty of the stars. The beauty of angels, principalities and powers—who can express it? Who can adequately praise or describe the beauty that appears in us? So beautiful a body, so beautiful a face, eyes, nose, cheeks, chin and brows, all beautiful and lovely to behold, besides the beauty of the soul, which cannot be seen. If we exert ourselves so much and are so deeply moved by the beauty of created things, how should we be transported by the wonderful radiance of God himself?"[11997]

[11995] Burton. Source page 634, h: "Deus bonus, justus, pulcher, juxta Platonem." "God is good, just and beautiful, according to Plato."

[11996] Burton. Source page 634, i: "Miror & stupeo cum cœlum aspicio & pulchritudinem syderum, angelorum, &c. & quis digne laudet quod in nobis viget, corpus tam pulchrum, frontem pulchram, nares, genas, oculos, intellectum, omnia pulchra; si sic in creaturis laboramus, quid in ipso deo?" "I marvel and am amazed when I look at heaven and the beauty of the stars, angels, and so on. And who can fittingly praise what flourishes in us: so beautiful a body, a beautiful forehead, nose, cheeks, eyes, understanding, all beautiful? If we labour so over created things, what of God himself?"

[11997] Editor. Austin is Augustine; principalities and powers are orders of angels. Burton's English elaborates the Latin marginal excerpt, which includes intellectum, understanding, among the beauties of humanity. The precise Augustinian locus for this first quotation is not supplied here and remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If ordinary beauty have such a prerogative and power, and what is amiable and fair, to draw the eyes and ears, hearts and affections of all spectatours unto it, to move, win, entice, allure: how shall this divine forme ravish our souls, which is the fountain and quintessence of all beauty? Cœlum pulchrum, sed pulchrior cœli fabricator; if heaven be so fair, the sun so fair, how much fairer shall he be, that made them fair? For by the greatness and beauty of the creatures, proportionally the maker of them is seen. Wisd. 13.5.	If ordinary beauty and everything lovely and fair have such privilege and power to draw to themselves the eyes and ears, hearts and affections of all who behold them—to move, win, entice and attract—how will this divine form transport our souls, being the fountain and purest essence of all beauty? "Heaven is beautiful, but heaven's maker is more beautiful." If heaven is so beautiful, the sun so beautiful, how much more beautiful must he be who made them beautiful? "For, through the greatness and beauty of created things, their maker is seen by analogy," Wisdom 13:5.[11998]
If there be such pleasure in beholding a beautifull person alone, and as a plausible sermon, he so much affect us, what shall this beauty of God himself, that is infinitely fairer then all creatures, men, angels, &c. [11999]Omnis pulchritudo florum, hominum, angelorum, & rerum omnium pulcherrimarum ad Dei pulchritudinem collata, nox est & tenebræ, all other beauties are night it self, meer darkness to this our inexplicable, incomprehensible, unspeakable, eternal, infinite, admirable and divine beauty.	If simply looking at a beautiful person gives such pleasure, and a pleasing sermon moves us so deeply, what will the beauty of God himself do, infinitely more beautiful than all created things, human beings, angels and so on? "All the beauty of flowers, human beings, angels and all the most beautiful things, compared with God's beauty, is night and darkness." All other beauties are night itself, sheer darkness beside this inexplicable, incomprehensible, inexpressible, eternal, infinite, wonderful and divine beauty.[12000]

[11998] Editor. Wisdom is the Wisdom of Solomon, chapter 13, verse 5. Proportionally is rendered by analogy: the beauty of created things affords an inference to their creator. Burton moves from attraction to visible beauty towards the soul's attraction to divine beauty.

[11999] Burton. Source page 634, dagger: "Drexelius Nicet. lib.2.cap.11." "Drexel, Nicetas, book 2, chapter 11."

[12000] Editor. The printed clause "and as a plausible sermon, he so much affect us" is grammatically unsettled. The modern wording supplies the apparent comparison with the pleasure of a pleasing sermon, without claiming to resolve the text conclusively. Plausible means pleasing or worthy of approval. The Drexel quotation compares created beauty to night; Burton then gives his own English expansion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This lustre, pulchritudo omnium pulcherrima. This beauty and [12001]splendor of the divine Majesty, is it that draws all creatures to it, to seek it, love, admire, and adore it; and those Heathens, Pagans, Philosophers, out of those reliques they have yet left of Gods Image, are so far forth incensed, as not only to acknowledge a God; but, though after their own inventions, to stand in admiration of his bounty, goodness, to adore and seek him;	This radiance, "the most beautiful of all beauties"—this beauty and "splendour of the divine Majesty"—draws all creatures towards it, to seek it, love, admire and adore it. Those heathens, pagans and philosophers, through the remnants of God's image still left in them, are so far inspired that they not only acknowledge a God, but also, though according to their own inventions, stand in admiration of his bounty and goodness, worship and seek him.
the magnificence and structure of the world it self, and beauty of all his creatures, his goodness, providence, protection, inforceth them to love him, seek him, fear him, though a wrong way to adore him: but for us that are Christians, regenerate, that are his adopted sons, illuminated by his word, having the eyes of our hearts and understandings opened; how fairly doth he offer and expose himself? Ambit nos Deus (Austin saith) donis & formâ suâ, he wooes up by his beauty, gifts, promises, to come unto him;	The magnificence and structure of the world itself, the beauty of all his creatures, his goodness, providence and protection compel them to love him, seek him, fear him and worship him, though in the wrong way. But as for us Christians, born again, his adopted sons, enlightened by his word, with the eyes of our hearts and understandings opened—how beautifully he offers and reveals himself! "God courts us," Augustine says, "with his gifts and his beauty." He woos us with his beauty, gifts and promises to come to him.[12002]

[12001] Burton. Source page 634, k: "Fulgor divinæ majestatis, Aug." "The radiance of the divine majesty. Augustine."

[12002] Editor. The print reads "he wooes up"; the evident sense is "he woos us," which the modern column supplies. Ambit means courts or seeks to win over, continuing Burton's language of love. His contrast between pagans and regenerate Christians is part of the theological argument, not an editorial judgement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12003]the whole Scripture is a message, an exhortation, a love letter to this purpose, to incite us, and invite us, [12004]Gods Epistle, as Gregory calls it, to his creatures. He sets out his Son and his Church in that Epithalamium or mystical song of Solomon, to enamour us the more,	"The whole of Scripture is a message, an exhortation, a love letter for this purpose, to stir us and invite us": "God's letter to his creatures," as Gregory calls it. To captivate us still more, he portrays his Son and his Church in that wedding song, the mystical Song of Solomon,[12005]
Source page 634–635 comparing his head to fine gold, his locks curled and black as a Raven, Cant. 4.5. his eyes like doves on rivers of waters, washed with milk; his lippes as lillies, droping down pure juyce, his hands as rings of gold set with chrysolite: and his Church a vineyard, a garden inclosed, a fountain of living waters, an orchard of Pomegranates, with sweet sents of saffron, spike, calamus and cinamon, and all the trees of incense, as the chief spices, the fairest amongst women, no spot in her, [12006]his sister, his Spouse, undefiled, the onely daughter of her mother, dear unto her, fair as the Moon, pure as the Sun, looking out as the morning;	comparing "his head to fine gold, his curling locks black as a raven," Song of Solomon 4–5; "his eyes to doves beside streams of water, washed with milk; his lips to lilies dripping pure juice; his hands to rings of gold set with chrysolite"; and his Church to "a vineyard, an enclosed garden, a fountain of living waters, an orchard of pomegranates, with sweet scents of saffron, spikenard, calamus and cinnamon, and all the trees of incense, like the finest spices; the fairest among women, without a spot in her; his sister, his bride, undefiled, the only daughter of her mother, dear to her, fair as the moon, pure as the sun, looking forth like the morning."[12007]

[12003] Burton. Source page 634, l: "In Psal.64. misit ad nos Epistolas & totam scripturam, quibus nobis faceret amandi desiderium." "On Psalm 64: he sent us letters and the whole of Scripture, to create in us the desire to love."

[12004] Burton. Source page 634, m: "Epist.48.l.4. quid est tota Scriptura nisi Epistola omnipotentis dei ad creaturam suam?" "Letter 48, book 4: what is the whole of Scripture but a letter from almighty God to his creature?"

[12005] Editor. Epithalamium means a wedding song. Burton reads the Song of Solomon allegorically as the love between Christ and the Church. Augustine is cited as On Psalm 64, using the Latin Psalter's numbering. Gregory's image of Scripture as God's letter occurs in his letter to Theodorus, physician to the emperor, numbered 4.31 in the consulted collection; Burton cites 4.48, a numbering that remains for collation.

[12006] Burton. Source page 635, n: "Cap.6.8." "Chapter 6, verse 8."

[12007] Editor. This is a composite paraphrase of Song of Solomon 4–6, not a continuous quotation: the head, eyes, lips and hands chiefly come from 5:11–14; the enclosed garden and spices from 4:12–15; the only daughter, moon, sun and dawn from 6:9–10 in the King James numbering. Burton prints Cant. 4.5.; the modern text treats this as chapters 4–5, not verse 4:5. His marginal 6:8 and his chrysolite are retained as source readings. Spike is spikenard; calamus, an aromatic reed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 635 That by these figures, that glass, these spiritual eyes of contemplation, we might perceive some resemblance of his beauty, the love betwixt his Church and him. And so in the 45. Psalm this beauty of his Church is compared to a Queen in a vesture of gold of Ophir, embrodered raiment of needle worke, that the King might take pleasure in her beauty.	Through these figures, this mirror, these spiritual eyes of contemplation, we may perceive some likeness of his beauty and the love between his Church and him. Likewise, in Psalm 45, the beauty of his Church is compared to a "queen dressed in the gold of Ophir, embroidered garments of needlework, so that the king might take pleasure in her beauty."[12008]
To incense us further yet, [12009]John in his Apocalypse, makes a description of that heavenly Jerusalem, the beauty of it, and in it the maker of it; Likening it to a city of pure gold, like unto cleer glass, shining and garnished with all manner of precious stones, having no need of Sun or Moon: for the Lambe is the light of it, the glory of God doth illuminate it; To give us to understand the infinite glory, beauty and happiness of it.	To inflame us still further, John, in his Revelation, describes that heavenly Jerusalem, its beauty and, within it, its maker, "likening it to a city of pure gold, like clear glass, shining and adorned with every kind of precious stone, needing neither sun nor moon, for the Lamb is its light and God's glory illuminates it"—to make us understand its infinite glory, beauty and happiness.[12010]
Not that it is no fairer then these creatures to which it is compared, but that this vision of his, this lustre of his divine majesty cannot otherwise be expressed to our apprehensions, no tongue can tell, no heart can conceive it, as Paul saith. Moses himself, Exod. 33.18. when he desired to see God in his glory, was answered that he might not endure it, no man could see his face and live.	It is not that it is no more beautiful than the created things to which it is compared, but that this vision of him, this radiance of his divine majesty, cannot otherwise be expressed in terms we can grasp. "No tongue can tell, no heart can conceive it," as Paul says. Even Moses, Exodus 33:18, when he wished to see God in his glory, was told that he could not bear it: "No one could see his face and live."[12011]

[12008] Editor. Psalm 45:9–14 combines the queen in gold of Ophir, the king's desire for her beauty, and the embroidered clothing. Burton applies this royal wedding imagery to the Church. Glass means a mirror through which spiritual beauty can be apprehended indirectly.

[12009] Burton. Source page 635, o: "Cap.27.11." "Chapter 27, verse 11."

[12010] Editor. The margin clearly prints Cap.27.11., although Revelation has only 22 chapters. The description belongs to Revelation 21, especially verses 11, 18–19 and 23. The erroneous reference is preserved in the Burton note. Apocalypse is rendered by the familiar title Revelation.

[12011] Editor. Compare 1 Corinthians 2:9, which mentions eye, ear and heart; Burton's "no tongue can tell" is a paraphrase, not that verse's wording. Moses asks to see God's glory in Exodus 33:18; the response that no one can see God's face and live is in verse 20. Both the request and answer are included in Burton's reference.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sensible forte destruit sensum, a strong object overcometh the sight, according to that axiome in Philosophy: fulgorem solis ferre non potes, multo magis creatoris: if thou canst not endure the Sun beams, how canst thou endure that fulgor and brightness of him that made the Sun?	"An overpowering object of sense destroys the faculty of sense": a powerful object overwhelms sight, according to that philosophical axiom. "You cannot bear the sun's radiance, much less the Creator's." If you cannot bear the sun's rays, how can you bear the radiance and brightness of him who made the sun?[12012]
The Sun it self and all that we can imagine, are but shadowes of it, 'tis visio præcellens, as [12013]Austin calls it, the quintessence of beauty this, which far exceeds the beauty of Heavens, Sun and Moon, Stars, Angels, gold and silver, woods, fair fields, and whatsoever is pleasant to behold. All those other beauties fail, vary, are subject to corruption, to loathing; [12014]But this is an immortall vision, a divine beauty, an immortall love, an indefatigable love and beauty, with sight of which we shall never be tired, nor wearied, but still the more we see the more we shall covet him.	The sun itself and everything we can imagine are only shadows of it. It is "a surpassing vision," as Augustine calls it, the purest essence of beauty, "which far exceeds the beauty of the heavens, sun and moon, stars, angels, gold and silver, woods, fair fields and whatever is pleasant to behold." All those other beauties fail, change, are subject to decay and can become repulsive. "But this is an immortal vision, a divine beauty, an immortal love, an inexhaustible love and beauty." We shall never tire or grow weary of seeing it: the more we see, the more we shall desire him.[12015]

[12012] Editor. Sensible here means an object apprehended by a sense, not something reasonable. The scholastic maxim concerns an overwhelming stimulus damaging the sensory faculty; Burton's English applies it specifically to sight. The Latin about the Creator is elliptical: the negative from the first clause carries into the second, giving "much less."

[12013] Burton. Source page 635, p: "In Psal.85. omnes pulchritudines terrenas auri, argenti, nemorum & camporum, pulchritudinem Solis & Lunæ, stellarum, omnia pulchra superans." "On Psalm 85: surpassing all earthly beauties, of gold, silver, woods and fields, the beauty of the sun and moon, of the stars, all beautiful things."

[12014] Burton. Source page 635, r: "Immortalis hæc visio, immortalis amor, indefessus amor & visio." "This vision is immortal, the love immortal, the love and vision inexhaustible."

[12015] Editor. Burton cites Augustine On Psalm 85, but the list of earthly beauties is found in Homilies on the First Epistle of John 4.5 (Latin text, PL 35, col. 2008). Burton compresses a list that also includes sea, air and angels. Visio præcellens means a surpassing vision. The adjoining "immortal vision" formulation and the route of the Psalm reference remain untraced; the two quotations should not be treated as one verified passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For [12016]as one saith, where this vision is, there is absolute beauty; and where is that beauty, from the same fountain comes all pleasure and happiness; neither can beauty, pleasure, happiness, be separated from his vision or sight, or his vision from beauty, pleasure, happiness.	For, "as one writer says, where this vision is, there is perfect beauty; and where that beauty is, all pleasure and happiness flow from the same fountain. Neither can beauty, pleasure and happiness be separated from the vision or sight of him, nor that vision from beauty, pleasure and happiness."[12017]
In this life we have but a glimpse of this beauty and happiness: we shall hereafter, as John saith, seem him as he is: thine eyes, as Isay promiseth, 33.17. shall behold the King in his glory, then shall we be perfectly inamoured, have a full fruition of it, desire, [12018]behold and love him alone as the most amiable and fairest object, or summum bonum, or cheifest good.	In this life we have only a glimpse of this beauty and happiness. Hereafter, as John says, we shall see him as he is. Your eyes, as Isaiah promises, 33:17, "shall behold the King in his glory." Then we shall be perfectly in love, enjoy this beauty and happiness to the full, and desire, behold and love him alone as the most lovable and most beautiful object, the "supreme good," or highest good.[12019]

[12016] Burton. Source page 635, s; continued across the foot of the page: "Osorius; ubicunque visio & pulchritudo divini aspectus, ibi voluptas ex eodem fonte omnisque beatitudo, nec ab ejus aspectu voluptas, nec ab illa voluptate aspectus separari potest." "Osorius: wherever there is the vision and beauty of the divine countenance, there pleasure and all blessedness flow from the same fountain; neither can pleasure be separated from the sight of him, nor that sight from the pleasure."

[12017] Editor. The margin attributes this passage only to Osorius; its precise work remains unresolved. The marginal Latin speaks of vision, pleasure and blessedness; Burton's English develops the relation further. Both are preserved. The Latin note continues across the bottom of the source page.

[12018] Burton. Source page 635, t; at the foot of the page: "Leon Hebreus. Dubitatur an humana felicitas Deo cognoscendo an amando terminetur." "Leone Ebreo: it is disputed whether human happiness finds its fulfilment in knowing God or in loving him."

[12019] Editor. The print reads "seem him as he is," evidently "see him as he is," from 1 John 3:2; the modern column supplies see. Isaiah 33:17 has the king in his beauty in the King James Bible; Burton's "in his glory" is retained. Fruition means full enjoyment. The note from Leone Ebreo raises a distinction between knowing and loving God; Burton's closing sentence brings beholding and loving together as enjoyment of the supreme good.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 635–636 This likewise should we now have done, had not our will been corrupted; and as we are enjoyned to love God with all our heart, and all our soul: for to that end were we born, to love this object, as [12020]Melancthon discourseth, and to enjoy it. And him our will would have loved and sought alone as our summum bonum, or principall good, and all other good things for Gods sake: and nature as she proceeded from it, would have sought this fountain; but in this infirmity of humane nature this order is disturbed, our love is corrupt:	We too would now have done this, had our will not been corrupted, as indeed we are commanded to love God with all our heart and all our soul. For we were born to this end: to love this object and enjoy it, as Melanchthon explains. Our will would have loved and sought him alone as our supreme good, or principal good, and all other good things for God's sake. And nature, having proceeded from this source, would have sought this fountain. But in the infirmity of human nature this order is disturbed, and our love is corrupted.[12021]
Source page 636 and a man is like that monster in [12022]Plato composed of a Scylla, a lyon, and a man; we are carried away headlong with the torrent of our affections: the world, and that infinite variety of pleasing objects in it, do so allure and enamour us, that we cannot so much as look towards God, seek him, or think on him as we should: we cannot saith Austin, Rempub. cœlestem cogitare, we cannot contain our selves from them, their sweetness is so pleasing to us:	And a human being is like that monster in Plato, composed of a Scylla, a lion and a man. We are swept headlong away by the torrent of our passions. The world, with its infinite variety of pleasing objects, so entices and captivates us that we cannot so much as look towards God, seek him or think of him as we should. We cannot, says Augustine, set our minds on the heavenly commonwealth. We cannot restrain ourselves from these things, so pleasing is their sweetness to us.[12023]

[12020] Burton. Source page 636, u: "Lib de anima. Ad hoc objectum amandum & fruendum nati sumus; & hunc expetiisset, unicum hunc amasset humana voluntas, ut summum bonum, & cæteras res omnes eo ordine." "On the Soul. We were born to love and enjoy this object; the human will would have sought him and loved him alone as the highest good, and all other things in that order."

[12021] Editor. The object is God, the supreme good discussed at the end of Block 151. Burton's argument assumes the corruption of the human will after the Fall. Melancthon is Philipp Melanchthon; the margin cites his work On the Soul. "Enjoy" here means possess or participate in the good, not merely take pleasure in it.

[12022] Burton. Source page 636, x: "9. de Repub." "Republic, book 9."

[12023] Editor. Plato, Republic 9, 588b–589b, imagines a many-headed beast, a lion and a man enclosed within a human exterior. Scylla is one of the mythical composite creatures mentioned just before the construction; Burton substitutes her name for the many-headed beast. The separate Augustinian phrase about the heavenly commonwealth is not located by the margin's reference to Plato.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Marriage, saith [12024]Gualter, detains many; a thing in it self laudable, good and necessary, but many deceived and carried away with the blind love of it, have quite laid aside the love of God, and desire of his glory. Meat and drink hath overcome as many, whilest they rather strive to please, satisfie their guts and belly, then to serve God and nature. Some are so busied about merchandise to get mony, they loose their own souls, whiles covetously carried, and with an unsatiable desire of gain, they forget God; as much we may say of honour, leagues, friendships, health, wealth, and all other profits or pleasures in this life whatsoever.	Marriage, says Gwalther, holds many back: a thing praiseworthy, good and necessary in itself; yet many, deceived and swept away by their blind love of it, have quite abandoned the love of God and the desire for his glory. Food and drink have overcome as many, while they strive to please and satisfy their guts and bellies rather than to serve God and nature. Some are so occupied with trade and making money that they lose their own souls: carried away by greed and an insatiable desire for gain, they forget God. We may say as much of honour, alliances, friendships, health, wealth and every other profit or pleasure in this life.[12025]

[12024] Burton. Source page 636, y: “Hom.9. in epist. Johannis cap.2. Multos conjugium decepit; res alioqui salutaris & necessaria, eo quod cæco ejus amore decepti, divini amoris & gloriæ studium in universum abjecerunt; plurimos cibus & potus perdit.” “Homily 9 on chapter 2 of John’s Epistle. Marriage has deceived many, though in itself wholesome and necessary, because, deceived by blind love of it, they have altogether abandoned devotion to divine love and glory. Food and drink ruin very many.”

[12025] Editor. Gualter is Rudolf Gwalther, cited through his homilies on the First Epistle of John. Detains means holds back from devotion. The passage criticizes disordered attachment to otherwise legitimate goods; it expressly describes marriage as good and necessary.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12026]In this world there be so many beautiful objects, splendors and brightness of gold, majesty of glory, assistance of friends, fair promises, smooth words, victories, triumphs, and such an infinite company of pleasing beauties to allure us, and draw us from God, that we cannot look after him. And this is it which Christ himself, those Prophets and Apostles so much thundred against, 1 John 17. 15. dehort us from; Love not the world, nor the things that are in the world: if any man love the world, the love of the father is not in him. 16. For all that is in the World, as lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and pride of life, is not of the Father, but of the world: And the world passeth away and the lust thereof; but he that fulfilleth the will of God abideth for ever.	In this world there are so many beautiful objects—the splendour and brightness of gold, the majesty of glory, the help of friends, fair promises, smooth words, victories, triumphs, and such an infinite multitude of pleasing beauties—to entice us and draw us away from God that we cannot attend to him. This is what Christ himself, the prophets and the apostles thundered against and warned us to avoid. In 1 John 2:15–17: Do not love the world or the things in the world. If anyone loves the world, the Father's love is not in him. For all that is in the world—the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes and the pride of life—is not from the Father but from the world. And the world passes away, and its lust with it; but whoever fulfils God's will remains for ever.[12027]
No man, saith our Saviour, can serve two masters, but he must love the one and hate the other, &c. bonos vel malos mores, boni vel mali faciunt amores, Austin well infers: and this is that which all the fathers inculcate. He cannot ([12028]Austin admonisheth) bee Gods friend, that is delighted with the pleasures of the world: make clean thine heart, purifie thine heart, if thou wilt see this beauty, prepare thy self for it.	No one, says our Saviour, can serve two masters: he must love the one and hate the other, and so on. Good or bad loves produce good or bad conduct, Augustine rightly concludes; and this is what all the Church Fathers repeatedly teach. No one, Augustine warns, can be God's friend while delighting in the pleasures of the world. Cleanse your heart, purify your heart; if you wish to see this beauty, prepare yourself for it.[12029]

[12026] Burton. Source page 636, z: "In mundo splendor opum, gloriæ majestas, amicitiarum præsidia, verborum blanditiæ, voluptatum omnis generis illecebræ, victoriæ, triumphi, & infinita alia ab amore dei nos abstrahunt, &c." "In the world, the splendour of riches, the majesty of glory, the support of friendships, flattering words, the enticements of pleasures of every kind, victories, triumphs and countless other things draw us away from the love of God, and so on."

[12027] Editor. The print reads "1 John 17.15." The quotation belongs to 1 John 2:15–17; the modern column supplies that reference. Burton's wording is a composite rendering rather than an exact quotation of the King James text. The unassigned Latin margin expands the catalogue of worldly attractions.

[12028] Burton. Source page 636, a: "In Psal.32. Dei amicus esse non potest qui mundi studiis delectatur; ut hanc formam videas, munda cor, serena cor, &c." "On Psalm 32. Whoever delights in worldly pursuits cannot be God's friend. To see this beauty, cleanse your heart, calm your heart, and so on."

[12029] Editor. The two masters recalls Matthew 6:24 and Luke 16:13; good and bad loves occurs in Augustine, Letter 155.4.13. On Psalm 32, second exposition, sermon 1.7 (PL 36, col. 282), relates divine wisdom's beauty to cleansing the heart so as to see and embrace it. This is a thematic parallel: Burton's fuller Latin wording was not found there. His intermediary and the heavenly-commonwealth phrase remain untraced.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is the eye of contemplation by which we must behold it, the wing of meditation which lifts us up and rears our souls with the motion of our hearts, and sweetness of contemplation: so saith Gregory cited by [12030]Bonaventure. And as [12031]Philo Judæus seconds him, He that loves God, will soare aloft and take him wings; and leaving the earth flye up to Heaven, wander with Sun and Moon, Stars, and that heavenly troop, God himself being his guide.	We must behold it with the eye of contemplation. The wing of meditation lifts us up and raises our souls through the movement of our hearts and the sweetness of contemplation: so says Gregory, quoted by Bonaventure. Philo of Alexandria supports him: Whoever loves God will soar aloft and take wings; leaving the earth, he will fly up to heaven and wander with the sun, moon, stars and that heavenly host, with God himself as his guide.[12032]
Source page 636–637 If we desire to see him, we must lay aside all vain objects, which detain us and dazel our eyes, and as [12033]Ficinus adviseth us, get us solar eyes, spectacles as they that look on the Sun: to see this divine beauty, lay aside all material objects, all sense, and then thou shalt see him as he is.	If we desire to see him, we must put aside all the vain objects that hold us back and dazzle our eyes; and, as Ficino advises, acquire sunlike eyes, spectacles such as those who look at the sun use. To see this divine beauty, set aside all material objects and all sense perception; then you will see him as he is.[12034]

[12030] Burton. Source page 636, b: “Contemplationis pluma nos sublevat, atque inde erigimur intentione cordis, dulcedine contemplationis, distinct.6. de 7. Itineribus.” “The feather of contemplation lifts us up, and thence we are raised by the intentness of the heart and the sweetness of contemplation. Distinction 6, On the Seven Journeys.”

[12031] Burton. Source page 636, c: “Lib. de victimis: amans Deum, sublimia petit, sumptis alis & in cœlum rectè volat, relicta terra, cupidus aberrandi cum sole, luna, stellarumque sacra militia, ipso Deo duce.” “On Sacrificial Victims. The lover of God seeks the heights, takes wings and flies straight to heaven, leaving the earth, eager to wander with the sun, moon and sacred host of stars, with God himself as guide.”

[12032] Editor. Burton attributes the first image to Gregory through a work circulating under Bonaventure’s name, cited as On the Seven Journeys, distinction 6; the precise intermediary remains to be collated. Philo’s flight with the heavenly host has a parallel in The Special Laws 1.207, in the discussion of sacrifices. Burton cites it under the older sectional title On Sacrificial Victims.

[12033] Burton. Source page 636, d: “In com. Plat. cap.7. ut Solem videas oculis, fieri debes solaris: ut divinam aspicias pulchritudinem, demitte materiam, demitte sensum, & Deum qualis sit videbis.” “In the commentary on Plato, chapter 7. To see the sun with your eyes, you must become sunlike. To behold divine beauty, lay aside matter, lay aside sense perception, and you will see God as he is.”

[12034] Editor. Solar eyes expresses a philosophical likeness between the faculty of seeing and its object; compare Plotinus, Enneads 1.6.9, where the eye must become sunlike. Burton’s addition of spectacles makes the metaphor concrete. The sentence continues across the printed page break; “all sense” means sensory perception.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 637 Thou covetous wretch, as [12035]Austin expostulates, Why dost thou stand gaping on this dross, muck-hils, filthy excrements? behold a far fairer object, God himself wooes thee; behold him, enjoy him, he is sick for love. Cant. 5. He invites thee to his sight, to come into his fair Garden, to eat and drink with him, to be merry with him, to enjoy his presence for ever. [12036]Wisdome cryes out in the streets, besides the gates, in the top of high places, before the city, at the entry of the door, and bids them give ear to her instruction, which is better then gold or precious stones; no pleasures can be compared to it: leave all then and follow her, vos exhortor ô amici & obsecro.	You greedy wretch, Augustine protests, why do you stand gaping at this dross, these dungheaps, these filthy excrements? Look at a far more beautiful object: God himself courts you. Behold him, enjoy him; he is sick with love. Song of Solomon 5. He invites you to see him, to come into his beautiful garden, to eat and drink with him, to rejoice with him and enjoy his presence for ever. Wisdom cries out in the streets, beside the gates, on the heights, before the city and at the entrance, bidding people listen to her instruction, which is better than gold or precious stones. No pleasures can compare with it. Leave everything, then, and follow her: I exhort and entreat you, my friends.[12037]

[12035] Burton. Source page 637, e: "Avare, quid inhias his, &c. pulchrior est qui te ambit ipsum visurus, ipsum habiturus." "Greedy man, why do you gape at these things, and so on? More beautiful is he who courts you: you will see him, you will possess him."

[12036] Burton. Source page 637, dagger: "Prov.8." "Proverbs 8."

[12037] Editor. Burton joins an Augustinian appeal to the avaricious with the Song of Solomon's garden and lovesickness imagery (5:1, 8) and personified Wisdom in Proverbs 8. "He is sick for love" is his devotional application: in Song 5:8 the female lover speaks of her own lovesickness. The closing Latin begins the exhortation attributed to Ficino in the next unit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In [12038]Ficinus words, I exhort and beseech you, that you would embrace and follow this divine love with all your hearts and abilities, by all offices and endeavours make this so loving God propitious unto you. For whom alone saith [12039]Plotinus, we must forsake the Kingdomes and Empires of the whole earth, Sea, Land, and Air, if we desire to be ingrafted into him, leave all and follow him.	In Ficino's words, I exhort and entreat you to embrace and follow this divine love with all your hearts and all your powers. By every service and effort, seek the favour of this God who loves you so much. For his sake alone, says Plotinus, we must forsake the kingdoms and empires of the whole earth—sea, land and air—if we wish to be grafted into him: leave everything and follow him.[12040]
Now forasmuch as this love of God, is an habit infused of God, as [12041]Thomas holds, 1. 2. quæst. 23. by which a man is inclined to love God above all, and his neighbour as himself, We must pray to God that he will open our eyes, make clean our hearts, that we may be capable of his glorious rayes, and performe those duties that he requires of us, Deut. 6. and Jos. 23. To love God above all, and our neighbour as our self, to keep his commandments.	Now, since this love of God is a settled disposition infused by God—as Thomas Aquinas holds, 1.2, question 23—by which a person is inclined to love God above all and his neighbour as himself, we must pray that God will open our eyes and cleanse our hearts. Then we may be able to receive his glorious rays and perform the duties he requires of us: Deuteronomy 6 and Joshua 23, to love God above all and our neighbour as ourselves, and to keep his commandments.[12042]

[12038] Burton. Source page 637, f: "Cap.18. Rom. Amorem hunc divinum totis viribus amplexamini; Deum vobis omni officiorum genere propitium facite." "Chapter 18, Rom. Embrace this divine love with all your strength; by every kind of service win God's favour."

[12039] Burton. Source page 637, g: "Cap.7. de pulchritudine. regna et imperia totius terræ & maris & cœli oportet abjicere si ad ipsum conversus velis inseri." "On Beauty, chapter 7. You must cast aside the kingdoms and empires of the whole earth, sea and heaven if, turning towards him, you wish to be grafted into him."

[12040] Editor. The Plotinus parallel is Enneads 1.6.7, On Beauty, on renouncing dominion for the vision of the Good. Burton presents this in Christian devotional language. The Ficino margin prints "Cap.18. Rom."; its abbreviated title and exact passage remain unresolved. Burton's English expansion is retained after the independently translated Latin exhortation.

[12041] Burton. Source page 637, h: "Habitus à Deo infusus, per quem inclinatur homo ad diligendum Deum super omnia." "A disposition infused by God, through which a person is inclined to love God above all things."

[12042] Editor. Habit is a settled disposition or capacity, not a repeated routine. The printed Aquinas reference is "1.2. question 23"; relevant discussions of charity are in Summa theologiae II–II, questions 23–24, especially 24.2 on infusion. The reference is preserved rather than silently emended. Deuteronomy 6:5 and Joshua 23:11 command love of God; the combined command concerning one's neighbour also recalls Matthew 22:37–39.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In this we know, saith John, c. 5. 2. we love the children of God, when we love God and keep his commandments. This is the love of God that we keep his commandments; he that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love, cap. 4. 8. and he that dwelleth in love, dwelleth in God, and God in him; for love presupposeth knowledge, faith, hope, and unites us to God himself, as [12043]Leon Hebrew delivereth unto us, and is accompanied with the fear of God, humility, meekness, patience, all those vertues, and charity it self.	By this we know, says John, 5:2, that we love the children of God: when we love God and keep his commandments. This is the love of God, that we keep his commandments. Whoever does not love does not know God, for God is love, 4:8; and whoever dwells in love dwells in God, and God in him. For love presupposes knowledge, faith and hope, and unites us to God himself, as Leone Ebreo teaches us. It is accompanied by fear of God, humility, meekness, patience, all those virtues, and charity itself.[12044]
For if we love God, we shall love our neighbour, and performe the duties which are required at our hands, to which we are exhorted, 1 Cor. 15. 4, 5. Ephes. 4. Coloss. 3. Rom. 12. We shall not be envious or puffed up, or boast, disdain, think evil, or be provoked to anger, but suffer all things; Endeavour to keep the unity of the spirit in the bond of peace. Forbear one another, forgive one another, cloath the naked, visit the sick, and perform all those works of mercy, which [12045]Clemens Alexandrinus cals amoris & amicitiæ impletionem & extensionem, the extent and complement of Love; and that not for fear or worldly respects, but ordine ad Deum, for the love of God himself.	For if we love God, we shall love our neighbour and carry out the duties required of us, to which we are exhorted in 1 Corinthians 13:4–5, Ephesians 4, Colossians 3 and Romans 12. We shall not envy, swell with pride, boast, show contempt, think evil or give way to anger, but bear all things; strive to preserve the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace. Bear with one another, forgive one another, clothe the naked, visit the sick and perform all those works of mercy that Clement of Alexandria calls the fulfilment and extension of love and friendship—the reach and completion of love. And do this neither from fear nor for worldly considerations, but with reference to God, for the love of God himself.[12046]

[12043] Burton. Source page 637, i: “Dial.1. Omnia convertit amor in ipsius pulchri naturam.” “Dialogue 1. Love transforms all things into the nature of the beautiful itself.”

[12044] Editor. These sentences combine 1 John 5:2–3, 4:8 and 4:16. Leon Hebrew is Leone Ebreo (Judah Abravanel), author of the Dialogues of Love. Charity here has the broad theological sense of love of God and neighbour, not simply giving money to the poor.

[12045] Burton. Source page 637, k: “Stromatum lib.2.” “Miscellanies, book 2.”

[12046] Editor. The source prints “1 Cor.15.4,5”; the description of love belongs to 1 Corinthians 13:4–7, so the modern reference is corrected to 13:4–5. The rest gathers Ephesians 4:3, 32, Colossians 3:13 and the works of mercy associated with Matthew 25:35–36. Complement means completion. Clement’s exact Latin formulation remains for collation against the cited Miscellanies, book 2.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This we shall do if we be truly enamoured; but we come short in both, we neither love God nor our neighbour as we should. Our love in spiritual things is too [12047]defective, in worldly things too excessive, there is a jarre in both. We love the World too much; God too little; our neighbour not at all, or for our own ends.	This is what we shall do if we truly love; yet we fall short in both respects, loving neither God nor our neighbour as we should. Our love in spiritual things is too deficient, and in worldly things too excessive: there is discord in both. We love the world too much, God too little, and our neighbour either not at all or for our own ends.[12048]
Vulgus amicitias utilitate probat.	The crowd judges friendships by their usefulness.[12049]
Source page 637–638 The cheif thing we respect is our commodity: and what we do, is for fear of worldly punishment, for vain-glory, praise of men, fashion, and such by-respects, not for Gods sake. We neither know God aright, nor seek, love, or worship him as we should. And for these defects, we involve our selves into a multitude of errours, we swerve from this true love and worship of God: which is a cause unto us of unspeakable miseries; running into both extrems, we become fools, madmen, without sense, as now in the next place I will shew you.	Our chief concern is our own advantage. What we do is prompted by fear of worldly punishment, by vanity, by human praise, by fashion and by such secondary motives, rather than done for God's sake. We neither know God rightly nor seek, love or worship him as we should. Through these failings we entangle ourselves in a multitude of errors and stray from this true love and worship of God, bringing unspeakable miseries upon ourselves. Rushing into both extremes, we become fools and madmen, deprived of reason, as I shall now go on to show you.

[12047] Burton. Source page 637, l: "Greenham."

[12048] Editor. Greenham is Richard Greenham. Defective means deficient, and jarre means discord. The distinction between too little spiritual love and too much worldly love prepares Burton's division of religious melancholy into deficiency and excess.

[12049] Editor. Ovid, Letters from the Black Sea 2.3.8. Burton gives the Latin as a separate verse line; his following prose applies its judgement to religious conduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 638 The parties affected are innumerable almost, and scattered over the face of the earth, far and neer, and so have been in all precedent ages, from the beginning of the world to these times, of all sorts and conditions. For methods sake I will reduce them to a twofold division, according to those two extreams of Excess and Defect, Impiety and Superstition, Idolatry and Atheisme.	Those affected are almost innumerable, scattered far and near across the face of the earth, and have been so in every previous age, from the beginning of the world until now, among all ranks and conditions of people. For the sake of method, I shall arrange them in two divisions corresponding to the two extremes of excess and deficiency: impiety and superstition, idolatry and atheism.[12050]
Not that there is any excess of divine worship or love of God; that cannot be, we cannot love God too much, or do our duty as we ought, as Papists hold, or have any perfection in this life, much less supererogate; when we have all done, we are unprofitable servants. But because we do aliud agere, zealous without knowledge, and too solicitous about that which is not necessary, busying our selves about impertinent, needless, idle, and vain ceremonies, populo ut placerent, as the Jews did about sacrifices, oblations, offerings, incense, new Moons, feasts, &c. but as Isay taxeth them 1. 12. Who required this at your hands?	This does not mean that worship or love of God can be excessive: that is impossible. We cannot love God too much; nor can we fulfil our duty as we ought, as the Papists claim, or attain any perfection in this life, much less do more than duty requires. When we have done everything, we are unprofitable servants. The excess lies in pursuing something else, being zealous without knowledge and too anxious about what is unnecessary, occupying ourselves with irrelevant, needless, idle and empty ceremonies to please the people, as the Jews did with sacrifices, oblations, offerings, incense, new moons, festivals and so on. As Isaiah reproaches them, 1:12: Who required this of you?[12051]

[12050] Editor. The labels are not given in a consistent paired order: superstition and idolatry belong to Burton's excess, while impiety and atheism belong to deficiency. His categories join moral, theological and medical judgements; they are not modern psychiatric diagnoses.

[12051] Editor. Papists is Burton's polemical term for Roman Catholics. His claim is that no one perfectly fulfils duty, still less exceeds it. "Unprofitable servants" recalls Luke 17:10; Isaiah 1:12 occurs in a denunciation of worship divorced from righteousness. "Pursuing something else" translates aliud agere, making clear why Burton calls this an excess without allowing excessive love of God.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We have too great opinion of our own worth, that we can satisfie the Law; and do more then is required at our hands, by performing those Evangelical Counsels, and such works of supererogation, merit for others, which Bellarmine, Gregory de Valentia, all their Jesuites and champions defend; that if God should deal in rigour with them, some of their Franciscans and Dominicans are so pure, that nothing could be objected to them:	We think too highly of our own worth: we suppose that we can satisfy the Law and do more than is required of us, by observing the evangelical counsels and performing such works beyond duty, earning merit for others. Bellarmine, Gregory of Valencia and all their Jesuits and champions defend these claims: even if God judged them strictly, some of their Franciscans and Dominicans are supposedly so pure that nothing could be held against them.[12052]
Some of us again are too dear, as we think, more divine and sanctified then others, of a better mettle, greater gifts, and with that proud Pharisee, contemn others in respect of our selves, we are better Christians, better learned, choice spirits, inspired, know more, have special revelation, perceive Gods secrets, and thereupon presume, say and do many times which is not befitting to be said or done.	Others among us consider ourselves especially dear to God, more godly and sanctified than other people, made of better stuff and endowed with greater gifts. Like that proud Pharisee, we despise others in comparison with ourselves: we are better Christians, more learned, select spirits, inspired; we know more, receive special revelations and perceive God's secrets. On this presumption we often say and do things that ought neither to be said nor done.[12053]

[12052] Editor. Evangelical counsels are forms of religious life traditionally associated with poverty, chastity and obedience. Works of supererogation are works held to exceed strict obligation. Burton attacks Catholic accounts of merit through a Protestant polemical summary; this passage should not be treated as a direct quotation from Robert Bellarmine or Gregory of Valencia.

[12053] Editor. The proud Pharisee recalls Luke 18:9–14. "Some of us" turns the criticism towards Burton's own religious community. Dear means favoured or beloved by God; mettle means character or quality. The print omits an object after "say and do"; the modern supplies "things".

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of this number are all superstitious Idolaters, Ethnicks, Mahometans, Jews, Heretiques, [12054]Enthusiasts, Divinators, Prophets, Sectaries, and Scismatiques. Zanchius reduceth such Infidels to four chief sects; but I will insist and follow mine own intended method: all which with many other curious persons, Monks, Heremits, &c. may be ranged in this extream, and fight under this superstitious banner, with those rude Idiots, and infinite swarms of people that are seduced by them.	Among these are all superstitious idolaters, pagans, Muslims, Jews, heretics, enthusiasts, diviners, prophets, sectarians and schismatics. Zanchi divides such unbelievers into four main groups; but I shall persevere with my own intended method. All these, together with many other people given to excessive religious curiosity —monks, hermits and so on—may be placed at this extreme, fighting under the banner of superstition alongside the ignorant simpletons and countless swarms of people they lead astray.[12055]
In the other extream or in defect, march those impious Epicures, Libertines, Atheists, Hypocrites, Infidels, worldly, secure, impenitent, unthankful, and carnal-minded men, that attribute all to natural causes, that will acknowledge no supream power; that have cauterized consciences, or live in a reprobate sense: or such desperate persons as are too distrustful of his mercies. Of these there be many subdivisions, divers degrees of madness and folly, some more then other, as shall be shewed in the Symptomes: And yet all miserably out, perplexed, doting, and besides themselves for religions sake.	At the opposite extreme, that of deficiency, march those impious pleasure-seekers, libertines, atheists, hypocrites and unbelievers: worldly, complacent, unrepentant, ungrateful and carnally minded people who attribute everything to natural causes and acknowledge no supreme power; whose consciences are seared, or who live with depraved judgement; or those despairing people who distrust his mercy too much. There are many subdivisions among them and different degrees of madness and folly, some greater than others, as will be shown under the Symptoms. Yet all are miserably astray, perplexed, deluded and beside themselves over religion.[12056]

[12054] Burton. Source page 638, m: “De primo præcepto.” “On the First Commandment.”

[12055] Editor. Enthusiasts here means people claiming immediate divine inspiration. Sectaries and schismatics are those accused of forming religious factions or divisions. Zanchius is Girolamo Zanchi. The margin’s reference On the First Commandment stands beside Enthusiasts but accompanies the ensuing appeal to Zanchi. Burton’s grouping of Muslims, Jews and other communities as deluded idolaters is his confessional polemic, not an editorial classification.

[12056] Editor. Epicures is used polemically for people devoted to pleasure; secure means spiritually complacent. The seared conscience and reprobate mind recall 1 Timothy 4:2 and Romans 1:28. Burton also places despair of divine mercy at the deficient extreme. Symptomes refers forward to his account of symptoms within this section.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 638–639 For as [12057]Zanchy well distinguished, and all the world knows, Religion is twofold, true or false; False is that vain superstition of Idolaters, such as were of old, Greeks, Romans, present Mahometans, &c. Timorem deorum inanem, [12058]Tully could terme it; or as Zanchy defines it, Ubi falsi dii, aut falso cultu colitur Deus, when false gods, or that God is falsly worshipped.	For, as Zanchi rightly distinguished, and everyone knows, religion is of two kinds, true or false. False religion is the empty superstition of idolaters, such as the ancient Greeks and Romans, present-day Muslims and so on. Cicero could call it a groundless fear of the gods; or, as Zanchi defines it, where false gods are worshipped, or God is worshipped with false worship—when the gods are false, or God is falsely worshipped.[12059]
Source page 639 And 'tis a miserable plague, a torture of the Soul, a meer madness, Religiosa insania, [12060]Meteran cals it, or insanus error, as [12061]Seneca, a frantick error; or as Austin, Insanus animi morbus, a furious disease of the Soul; insania omnium insanissima, a quintessence of madness; [12062]for he that is superstitious, can never be quiet.	It is a wretched plague, a torture of the soul, sheer madness: religious insanity, as van Meteren calls it; or a mad error, as Seneca says, a frantic error; or, in Augustine's words, a raging disease of the mind, a furious disease of the soul; the maddest of all madnesses, the very essence of madness. For a superstitious person can never be at peace.[12063]

[12057] Burton. Source page 638, n: "De relig. l.2. Thes.1." "On Religion, book 2, thesis 1."

[12058] Burton. Source page 639, n (body o): "2 De nat. deorum." "On the Nature of the Gods, book 2."

[12059] Editor. Tully is Cicero. The margin prints n against the body's o, and cites book 2. The phrase occurs in On the Nature of the Gods 1.117 as timor inanis deorum. Cotta argues that the doctrines he criticizes remove pious religion along with superstition; Burton changes the phrase's case and word order. Zanchi distinguishes false gods from false worship of God. Burton applies these definitions according to his own religious commitments.

[12060] Burton. Source page 639, p: "Hist. Belgic. lib.8." "History of the Netherlands, book 8."

[12061] Burton. Source page 639, q: "Superstitio error insanus est. epist.223." "Superstition is a mad error. Letter 223."

[12062] Burton. Source page 639, dagger: "Nam qui superstitione imbutus est, quietus esse nunquam potest." "For whoever is imbued with superstition can never be at peace."

[12063] Editor. Meteran is Emanuel van Meteren. The Seneca margin clearly prints Letter 223; "Superstition is a mad error" is found in Moral Letters 123.16. The two phrases attributed to Augustine are preserved as Burton gives them; their exact locations, and the unassigned marginal sentence about never being quiet, remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis proper to man alone, uni superbia, avaritia, superstitio, saith Plin. lib. 7. cap. 1. atq; etiam post sævit de futuro, which wrings his soul for the present, and to come: the greatest miserie belongs to mankinde, a perpetual servitude, a slavery, [12064]Ex timore timor, an heavie yoak, the seal of damnation, an intolerable burthen. They that are superstitious, are still fearing, suspecting, vexing themselves with auguries, prodigies, false tales, dreams, idle, vain works, unprofitable labours, as [12065]Boterus observes, curâ mentis ancipite versantur: Enemies to God and to themselves.	It belongs to humanity alone: to humanity alone belong pride, greed and superstition, says Pliny, book 7, chapter 1; and even afterwards he rages with anxiety about the future. It wrings his soul over both the present and what is to come. Humanity bears the greatest misery: perpetual servitude, slavery, fear springing from fear, a heavy yoke, the seal of damnation, an intolerable burden. Superstitious people are continually afraid, suspicious and tormented by omens, portents, false tales, dreams, idle and empty works, and fruitless labours. As Botero observes, they are tossed about by the anxiety of an uncertain mind: enemies of God and of themselves.[12066]
In a word, as Seneca concludes, Religio Deum colit, superstitio destruit, superstition destroyes, but true Religion honours God. True Religion, ubi verus Deus vere colitur, where the true God is truely worshipped, is the way to Heaven, the mother of all vertues, Love, Fear, Devotion, Obedience, Knowledge, &c. It rears the dejected Soul of man, and amidst so many cares, miseries, persecutions, which this world affords, it is a sole ease, an unspeakable comfort, a sweet reposal, Jugum suave, & leve, a light yoke, an anchor, and an Haven.	In a word, as Seneca concludes, religion worships God; superstition destroys him: superstition destroys, but true religion honours God. True religion, where the true God is truly worshipped—where the true God is worshipped in truth—is the road to heaven and the mother of all virtues: love, fear, devotion, obedience, knowledge and so on. It raises the dejected human soul. Amid the many cares, miseries and persecutions this world affords, it is our sole relief, an inexpressible comfort, a sweet repose, an easy and light yoke, a light yoke, an anchor and a harbour.[12067]

[12064] Burton. Source page 639, r: "Greg." "Gregory."

[12065] Burton. Source page 639, s: "Polit. lib.1. cap.13." "Politics, book 1, chapter 13."

[12066] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 7.5 (within chapter 1), lists distinctively human afflictions including greed, superstition and concern about what follows death. Burton abbreviates and alters the wording, including his added sævit, "rages"; this is retained in the translation. Auguries are divinatory signs, and prodigies extraordinary events interpreted as portents. The brief Gregory and Botero references need further collation.

[12067] Editor. Compare Seneca, On Clemency 2.5.1: religion honours the gods, whereas superstition violates them. Burton changes the plural gods to God and uses destruit, "destroys"; the modern renders his text, not a corrected Seneca. The easy yoke recalls Matthew 11:30. Burton's separate Latin definitions and English restatements remain in sequence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It addes courage, boldness, and begets generous spirits: although tyrants rage, persecute, and that bloudy Lictor or Serjeant be ready to martyr them, aut lita, aut morere, (as in those persecutions of the primitive Church, it was put in practise, as you may read in Eusebius and others) though enemies be now ready to invade, and all in an uproare, [12068]Si fractus illabatur orbis, impavidos ferient ruinæ, though heaven should fall on his head, he would not be dismaid.	It gives courage and boldness, and fosters noble spirits. Though tyrants rage and persecute, and the bloodthirsty lictor or officer stands ready to make martyrs of them—sacrifice, or die, as was practised in the persecutions of the early Church, described by Eusebius and others—though enemies are about to invade and everything is in uproar, if the shattered world falls upon them, its ruins will strike them unafraid. Though heaven should fall upon his head, he would not be dismayed.[12069]
But as a good Christian prince once made answer to a menacing Turke, facilè scelerata hominum arma contemnit, qui dei præsidio tutus est: Or as [12070]Phalaris writ to Alexander in a wrong cause, he nor any other enemie could terrifie him, for that he trusted in God. Si Deus nobiscum, quis contra nos?	As a good Christian prince once answered a threatening Turk, whoever is safe under God's protection readily scorns the wicked weapons of men. Or as Phalaris wrote to Alexander, though in an unjust cause, neither he nor any other enemy could frighten him, because he trusted in God. If God is with us, who can be against us?[12071]

[12068] Burton. Source page 639, t: "Hor." "Horace."

[12069] Editor. A lictor was an attendant of a Roman magistrate, here cast as an officer enforcing persecution. The command is to offer sacrifice or die. Horace, Odes 3.3.7–8, has singular impavidum, "him unafraid"; Burton uses plural impavidos, then returns to a singular Christian believer in his English expansion. The verse is embedded in prose in the source and remains so here.

[12070] Burton. Source page 639, u: "Epist. Phalar." "Letters of Phalaris."

[12071] Editor. The unnamed Christian prince's reply and the precise letter attributed to Phalaris remain to be identified. The Letters of Phalaris circulated under the ancient tyrant's name; Burton acknowledges the injustice of his cause even while borrowing his confidence. "If God is with us" recalls Romans 8:31.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In all calamities, persecutions whatsoever, as David did, 2 Sam. 2. 22. he will sing with him, The Lord is my rock, my fortresse, my strength, my refuge, the towre and horn of my salvation, &c. In all troubles and adversities, Psal. 46. 1. God is my hope and help, still ready to be found, I will not therefore fear, &c. 'tis a fear expelling fear; he hath peace of conscience, and is full of hope, which is (saith [12072]Austin) vita vitæ mortalis, the life of this our mortall life, hope of immortality, the sole comfort of our misery:	In every calamity and persecution he will sing with David, 2 Samuel 22:2–3: The Lord is my rock, my fortress, my strength, my refuge, the tower and horn of my salvation, and so on. In all troubles and adversities, Psalm 46:1, God is my hope and help, always ready to be found; therefore I will not fear, and so on. It is a fear that drives out fear. He has peace of conscience and is full of hope, which is, says Augustine, the life of mortal life, the life of this mortal life of ours: hope of immortality, the sole comfort of our misery.[12073]
Source page 639–640 otherwise as Paul saith, we of all others were most wretched, but this makes us happy, counterpoising our hearts in all miserie; superstition torments, and is from the Divell, the author of lies; but this is from God himself, as Lucian that Antiochian Priest made his divine confession in [12074]Eusebius, Author nobis de Deo Deus est, God is the author of our Religion himself, his word is our rule, a lanthorn to us, dictated by the holy Ghost; he playes upon our hearts as so many harp-strings, and we are his Temples, he dwelleth in us, and we in him.	Otherwise, as Paul says, we would be the most wretched of all people. But this makes us happy, steadying our hearts amid every misery. Superstition torments us and comes from the Devil, the father of lies; but true religion comes from God himself. As Lucian, the priest of Antioch, declared in his sacred confession in Eusebius, God himself is our authority concerning God: God himself is the author of our religion. His word is our rule and our lantern, dictated by the Holy Spirit. He plays upon our hearts as upon so many harp strings; we are his temples, he dwells in us, and we in him.[12075]

[12072] Burton. Source page 639, x: "In Psal.3." "On Psalm 3."

[12073] Editor. The source prints "2 Sam.2.22"; the song begins at 2 Samuel 22:2–3, supplied in the modern column. The following paraphrase combines Psalm 46:1–2. A horn symbolizes strength or deliverance. The Augustinian marginal reference to Psalm 3 is retained, pending exact collation of the phrase concerning hope.

[12074] Burton. Source page 639, y: "Lib.9. cap.6." "Book 9, chapter 6."

[12075] Editor. "Most wretched" recalls 1 Corinthians 15:19. Lucian is the Christian presbyter of Antioch, not the satirist. Eusebius, Church History 9.6.3, records his defence without this declaration in the checked Greek-derived translation. The Latin is attested in Acta Sanctorum, January I, pp. 362–363, in the account headed "Ex Ruffino, et mss." This establishes a Latin-tradition parallel, not Burton's precise edition or the speech's verbatim authenticity. His English gloss follows the Latin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 640 The part affected of superstition, is the brain, heart, will, understanding, soul it self, and all the faculties of it, totum compositum, all is mad, and dotes: Now for the extent, as I say, the world it self is the subject of it, (to omit that grand sin of Atheisme) all times have been misaffected, past, present, there is not one that doth good, no not one from the Prophet to the Priest, &c.	The part affected by superstition is the brain, heart, will, understanding, the soul itself and all its faculties—the whole composite being: all is mad and deluded. As for its extent, as I say, the whole world is subject to it. To leave aside that great sin of atheism, every age, past and present, has been afflicted: there is no one who does good, not even one, from the prophet to the priest, and so on.[12076]

[12076] Editor. Burton returns to the anatomy's conventional questions: which part is affected and how widely the condition extends. "No one who does good" recalls Psalm 14:3 and Romans 3:12; "from the prophet to the priest" recalls Jeremiah 6:13. This joins biblical phrases rather than quoting one continuous passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A lamentable thing it is to consider, how many myriads of men this idolatrie and superstition (for that comprehends all) hath infatuated in all ages, besotted by this blind zeal, which is Religions Ape, Religions bastard, Religions shadow, false glass. For where God hath a Temple, the Divell will have a chappel: where God hath sacrifices, the Divell will have his oblations; where God hath ceremonies, the Divell will have his traditions; where there is any religion, the Divell will plant superstition; and 'tis a pitifull sight to behold and read, what tortures, miseries it hath procured, what slaughter of soules it hath made, how it rageth amongst those old Persians, Syrians, Ægyptians, Greeks, Romans, Tuscans, Gaules, Germanes, Britaines, &c.	It is lamentable to consider how many myriads of people this idolatry and superstition—for that includes them all—has made fools of in every age, stupefying them with this blind zeal, religion's ape, religion's bastard, religion's shadow and distorting mirror. For where God has a temple, the Devil will have a chapel; where God has sacrifices, the Devil will have his offerings; where God has ceremonies, the Devil will have his traditions; wherever there is religion, the Devil will plant superstition. It is pitiful to see and read of the tortures and miseries it has caused, the slaughter of souls it has committed, and how it rages among those ancient Persians, Syrians, Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, Etruscans, Gauls, Germans, Britons and so on.
Britannia jam hodie celebrat tam attonitè, saith [12077]Pliny, tantis ceremoniis (speaking of superstition) ut dedisse Persis videri possit. The Britaines are so stupendly superstitious in their ceremonies, that they go beyond those Persians.	Britain even today practises it with such awe, says Pliny, with such elaborate ceremonies—speaking of superstition—that she might seem to have taught it to the Persians. The Britons are so astonishingly superstitious in their ceremonies that they surpass the Persians.[12078]

[12077] Burton. Source page 640, z: "Lib.3. cap." "Book 3, chapter [number not supplied]."

[12078] Editor. The incomplete margin reads "Lib.3. cap." The passage is Pliny, Natural History 30.13 (chapter 4), about magic among the Britons. Pliny says their ceremonies might seem to have taught the Persians; Burton's subsequent English says they surpass the Persians. Both formulations are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He that shall but read in Pausanias alone, those gods, temples, altars, Idols, statues, so curiously made with such infinite cost and charge, amongst those old Greeks, such multitudes of them and frequent varieties, as [12079]Gerbelius truely observes, may stand amazed, and never enough wonder at it; and thank God withall, that by the light of the Gospel, we are so happily freed from that slavish Idolatrie in these our dayes. But heretofore almost in all countries, in all places, superstition hath blinded the hearts of men: in all ages what a small portion hath the true Church ever been!	Anyone who merely reads Pausanias's account of the gods, temples, altars, idols and statues among the ancient Greeks, made with such exquisite workmanship and boundless expense, in such multitudes and so many varieties—as Gerbelius rightly observes—may stand amazed and never cease to wonder. At the same time, he may thank God that the light of the Gospel has so happily freed us in our own days from that enslaving idolatry. But formerly, in almost every country and place, superstition blinded people's hearts. In every age, how small a portion the true Church has been![12080]
Divisum imperium cum Jove Dæmon habet.	The Devil shares dominion with Jove.[12081]

[12079] Burton. Source page 640, dagger: "Lib.6. descrip. Græc. nulla est via quæ non innumeris idolis est referta. Tantum tunc temporis in miserrimos mortales potentiæ & crudelis Tyrannidis Satan exercuit." "Description of Greece, book 6. There is no road that is not filled with countless idols. Such power and cruel tyranny did Satan then exercise over most wretched mortals."

[12080] Editor. Pausanias's Description of Greece catalogues Greek sanctuaries, monuments and cults. Gerbelius is Nikolaus Gerbel, cited here for a Description of Greece. Curiously means skilfully or elaborately. Burton's celebration of deliverance from pagan worship will shortly give way to criticism of contemporary Christian superstition.

[12081] Editor. Jove is Jupiter, used here as the poetic name for God in a line about the Devil's share of dominion. The line is left as Burton prints it; its precise immediate source is unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Patriarchs and their families, the Israelites a handfull in respect, Christ and his Apostles, and not all of them neither. Into what straights hath it been compinged, a little flock! how hath superstition on the other side dilated her self, errour, ignorance, barbarisme, folly, madness, deceived, triumphed, and insulted over the most wise, discreet and understanding men, Philosophers, Dynastes, Monarches, all were involved and over-shadowed in this mist, in more than Cymmerian darkness. [12082]Adeo ignara superstitio mentes hominum depravat, & nonnunquam sapientum animos transversos agit.	The patriarchs and their families; the Israelites, a mere handful by comparison; Christ and his apostles—and not even all of them. Into what narrow bounds it has been confined: a little flock! Meanwhile, how superstition has spread; how error, ignorance, barbarism, folly and madness have deceived, triumphed over and mocked the wisest, most prudent and most discerning people! Philosophers, rulers and monarchs were all enveloped and overshadowed by this mist, in darkness deeper than that of the Cimmerians. So greatly does ignorant superstition corrupt human minds and sometimes lead even the wise astray.[12083]
At this present, quota pars! How small a part is truely religious! How little in respect! Divide the World into six parts, and one or not so much is Christians; Idolaters and Mahometans possesse almost Asia, Africk, America, Magellanica. The Kings of China, great Cham, Siam, and Bornaye, Pegu, Decan, Narsinga, Japan, &c. are Gentiles, Idolaters, and many other pettie Princes in Asia, Monomotopa, Congo, and I know not how many Negro Princes in Africk, all Terra Australis incognita most of America Pagans, differing all in their severall superstitions; and yet all Idolaters.	At the present time, what a fraction! How small a part is truly religious, how little by comparison! Divide the world into six parts, and one part, or less, is Christian. Idolaters and Muslims possess almost all of Asia, Africa, America and Magellanica. The kings of China, the Great Khan, Siam, Borneo, Pegu, the Deccan, Narsinga, Japan and so on are pagans and idolaters; so are many other minor princes in Asia, those of Monomotapa and Congo, and I know not how many Black princes in Africa. All the Unknown Southern Land and most of America are pagan, differing in their various superstitions, yet all idolaters.[12084]

[12082] Burton. Source page 640, star: “Alex. ab Alex. lib.6 cap.26.” “Alessandro Alessandri, book 6, chapter 26.”

[12083] Editor. Compinged means compressed or confined; dynastes means rulers. Cimmerian darkness is proverbial impenetrable darkness. The source’s marginal Alex. ab Alex. is Alessandro Alessandri; Burton cites book 6, chapter 26, for the Latin judgement on superstition.

[12084] Editor. This is Burton’s schematic religious geography, not a reliable census. Magellanica and Terra Australis incognita refer to the conjectural southern continent; the latter means Unknown Southern Land. Cham is khan; Bornaye is Borneo; Pegu is in present-day Myanmar; Decan is the Deccan; Narsinga names the Vijayanagara realm in European accounts; Monomotopa is the Mutapa kingdom in southeastern Africa. These labels mix rulers, regions and imagined lands. His blanket classification of Congo is contradicted by Lopes and Pigafetta’s Report of the Kingdom of Congo, which describes its Christian kings João and Afonso.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 640–641 The Mahometans extend themselves over the great Turks dominions in Europe, Afrik, Asia, to the Xeriffes in Barbary, and his territories in Fez, Sus, Morocco, &c. The Tartar, the great Mogor, the Sophy of Persia, with most of their dominions and subjects, are at this day Mahometans. See how the Divell rageth: Those at oddes, or differing amongst themselves, some for [12085]Alli, some for Enbocar, for Acmar, and Ozimen, those four Doctors, Mahomets successors, and are subdivided into 72 inferior sects, as [12086]Leo Afer reports.	The Muslims extend throughout the Great Turk's dominions in Europe, Africa and Asia, to the Sharif's lands in Barbary and his territories in Fez, Sus, Morocco and elsewhere. The Tartar, the Great Mughal and the Shah of Persia, with most of their dominions and subjects, are Muslims today. See how the Devil rages! These are at odds among themselves: some support Ali, some Abu Bakr, Umar or Uthman, those four teachers and successors of Muhammad; and they are subdivided into seventy-two lesser sects, as Leo Africanus reports.[12087]
Source page 641 The Jews as a company of vagabonds are scattered over all parts; whose story, present estate, progresse from time to time, is fully set down by [12088]Mr. Thomas Jackson Doctor of Divinity, in his Comment on the Creed. A fift part of the world, and hardly that, now professeth CHRIST, but so inlarded and interlaced with several superstitions, that there is scarce a sound part to be found, or any agreement amongst them.	The Jews are scattered everywhere like a band of vagabonds. Their history, present condition and development through time are fully set out by Thomas Jackson, Doctor of Divinity, in his commentary on the Creed. A fifth of the world, and scarcely that, now professes Christ; yet it is so stuffed and interwoven with various superstitions that scarcely a sound part, or any agreement among its members, can be found.[12089]

[12085] Burton. Source page 641, a: "Purchas Pilgrim. lib.1.c.3." "Purchas, Pilgrimage, book 1, chapter 3."

[12086] Burton. Source page 641, b: "Lib.3." "Book 3."

[12087] Editor. Mahometans is rendered Muslims. The Great Turk is the Ottoman sultan; Xeriffes refers to the sharifian ruler of Morocco; the Great Mogor is the Mughal emperor, and the Sophy the Safavid shah. Alli, Enbocar, Acmar and Ozimen represent Ali, Abu Bakr, Umar and Uthman. Burton's four "Doctors" and seventy-two sects are a schematic account of Islamic succession and division, not a reliable description of distinct confessions. His theological condemnation is retained as his own.

[12088] Burton. Source page 641, star: "2 Part. sec.3. lib.1. cap.& deinceps." "Part 2, section 3, book 1, chapter [number not supplied], and following."

[12089] Editor. The derogatory description of dispersed Jews is Burton's. His appeal to Thomas Jackson's commentary on the Creed gives the judgement a Christian theological frame. The new estimate of one fifth is retained, though the preceding discussion said one sixth or less: the figures are rhetorical approximations, not census results. The Jackson margin lacks a legible chapter number after cap.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Presbyter John in Africk, Lord of those Abyssines, or Æthiopians, is by his profession a Christian, but so different from us, with such new absurdities and ceremonies, such liberty, such a mixture of Idolatry and Paganisme, [12090]that they keep little more then a bare title of Christianitie. They suffer Polygamy, Circumcision, stupend fastings, divorce as they will themselves, &c. and as the Papists call on the Virgin Mary, so do they on Thomas Didymus before Christ.	Prester John in Africa, ruler of the Abyssinians or Ethiopians, professes Christianity, but their religion differs so much from ours, with such strange absurdities and ceremonies, such licence and such a mixture of idolatry and paganism, that they retain little more than the bare name of Christianity. They permit polygamy, circumcision, extraordinary fasts, divorce at their own pleasure and so on; and just as the Papists invoke the Virgin Mary, they invoke Thomas Didymus in preference to Christ.[12091]
[12092]The Greek or Eastern Church is rent from this of the West, and as they have four chief Patriarchs, so have they four subdivisions, besides those Nestorians, Iacobines, Syrians, Armenians, Georgians, &c. scattered over Asia minor, Syria, Ægypt, &c. Greece, Valachia, Circassia, Bulgary, Bosnia, Albania, Illyricum, Slavonia, Croatia, Thrace, Servia, Rascia, and a sprinkling amongst the Tartars.	The Greek or Eastern Church is separated from that of the West. As it has four chief patriarchs, so it has four subdivisions, besides the Nestorians, Jacobites, Syrians, Armenians, Georgians and others scattered across Asia Minor, Syria, Egypt and elsewhere: Greece, Wallachia, Circassia, Bulgaria, Bosnia, Albania, Illyricum, Slavonia, Croatia, Thrace, Serbia, Rascia, and a scattering among the Tartars.[12093]

[12090] Burton. Source page 641, c: “Titelmannus. Maginus. Bredenbachius. Fr. Aluaresius Itin. de Abyssinis Herbis solum vescuntur votarii, aquis mento tenus dormiunt, &c.” “Titelmann, Magini, Breydenbach, Francisco Álvares, Journey concerning the Abyssinians. Those under religious vows eat only herbs; they sleep in water up to their chins, and so on.”

[12091] Editor. Presbyter John, or Prester John, is the European title here applied to the Ethiopian ruler. Burton’s catalogue combines hostile generalizations with reports about ascetics; the marginal votarii means those under religious vows, not the whole population. Before Christ means in preference to Christ. The particular claim about invoking Thomas Didymus needs collation against Burton’s cited travellers; it is preserved as a claim, not established as Ethiopian practice.

[12092] Burton. Source page 641, d: “Bredenbachius Iod à Meggen.” “Breydenbach; Jodocus a Meggen.”

[12093] Editor. Burton’s list gathers different Eastern Christian communities under a loose geographical heading. Jacobines here means Jacobite Christians, not the later French political group. His four patriarchates and subdivisions should not be read as an exact organizational map. Wallachia, Illyricum and Rascia are historical regional names; Rascia refers to a Serbian region.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Russians, Muscovites, and most of that great Dukes subjects, are part of the Greek Church, and still Christians: but as [12094]one saith, temporis successu multas illi addiderunt superstitiones, In processe of time they have added so many superstitions, they be rather semi-Christians, then otherwise. That which remaines, is the Western Church with us in Europe, but so ecclipsed with severall schismes, heresies and superstitions, that one knows not where to finde it.	The Russians, Muscovites and most of that grand duke's subjects belong to the Greek Church and remain Christians; but, as one writer says, over time they have added many superstitions. In the course of time they have added so many superstitions that they are more half-Christian than anything else. What remains is the Western Church here with us in Europe, but so obscured by various schisms, heresies and superstitions that one hardly knows where to find it.[12095]
The Papists have Italy, Spaine, Savoy, part of Germany, France, Poland and a sprinkling in the rest of Europe. In America they hold all that which Spaniards inhabit, Hispania nova, Castella Aurea, Peru, &c. In the East Indies, the Philippinæ, some small holds about Goa, Malacha, Zelan, Ormus &c. which the Portugall got not long since, and those land-leaping Jesuites have assayed in China, Japan, as appears by their yearly letters; in Africk they have Melinda, Quiloa, Mombaze, &c. and some few towns, they drive out one superstition with another.	The Papists have Italy, Spain, Savoy, parts of Germany, France and Poland, and a scattering throughout the rest of Europe. In America they hold all the lands inhabited by Spaniards: New Spain, Golden Castile, Peru and so on. In the East Indies they have the Philippines and some small strongholds around Goa, Malacca, Ceylon, Hormuz and elsewhere, which the Portuguese acquired not long ago; and those land-leaping Jesuits have made attempts in China and Japan, as their annual letters show. In Africa they have Malindi, Kilwa, Mombasa and a few other towns: they drive out one superstition with another.[12096]

[12094] Burton. Source page 641, e: "See Possevinus Herbastein, Magin. D. Fletcher, Iovius, Hacluit, Purchas, &c. of their errors." "See Possevino, Herberstein, Magini, Dr Fletcher, Giovio, Hakluyt, Purchas and others concerning their errors."

[12095] Editor. Muscovites refers to the inhabitants of Muscovy. The judgement "half-Christian" is confessional polemic. The Latin charge and Burton's ensuing English expansion are both retained. The margin offers several authorities without identifying which supplies this exact sentence.

[12096] Editor. Papists is Burton's hostile name for Roman Catholics. Hispania nova is New Spain; Castella Aurea is Golden Castile, the Spanish colonial name for a region of Central America. Malacha, Zelan and Ormus are Malacca, Ceylon and Hormuz; Melinda, Quiloa and Mombaze are Malindi, Kilwa and Mombasa. The statement combines colonial settlements with missionary ventures rather than describing uniform Catholic rule. Land-leaping mocks the Jesuits' overseas travels.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Poland is a receptacle of all religions, where Samosetans, Socinians, Photinians (now protected in Transilvania and Poland) Arrians, Anabaptists are to be found, as well as in some German Cities. Scandia is Christian, but as [12097]Damianus A-Goes the Portugall Knight complains, so mixt with Magick, Pagan Rites and ceremonies, they may be as well counted Idolaters:	Poland is a gathering place for every religion: Samosatans, Socinians, Photinians—now protected in Transylvania and Poland—Arians and Anabaptists can be found there, as in some German cities. Scandinavia is Christian, but, as the Portuguese knight Damião de Góis complains, so mixed with magic and pagan rites and ceremonies that its people might equally well be counted idolaters.[12098]
what Tacitus formerly said of a like nation, is verified in them, [12099]A people subject to superstition, contrary to Religion.	What Tacitus once said of a similar nation is borne out in them: a people subject to superstition and opposed to religion.[12100]

[12097] Burton. Source page 641, f: “Deplorat. Gentis Lapp.” “Lamentation over the Lapp People.”

[12098] Editor. Samosetans, Photinians and Arians are labels derived from earlier doctrinal controversies, used here alongside Socinians to classify rejection of orthodox Trinitarian teaching. They need not designate four neatly distinct contemporary groups. Scandia means Scandinavia. Damião de Góis’s title concerns the Sámi, whom the older source calls Lapps; Burton broadens the charge to the northern region.

[12099] Burton. Source page 641, dagger: “Gens superstitioni obnoxia, religionibus adversa.” “A people subject to superstition, opposed to religious rites.”

[12100] Editor. Tacitus, Histories 5.13.1, applies this hostile description to the Jews of Judaea, not to Scandinavians. His religionibus concerns religious observances or propitiatory rites; Burton recasts the opposition as superstition versus true religion. Both the Latin margin and Burton’s English wording are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 641–642 And some of them as about Lapland and the Pilapians, the Divels possession to this day; Misera hæc gens (saith mine [12101]Author) Satanæ hactenus possessio, quod maxime mirandum & dolendum, and which is to be admired and pittied, if any of them be baptized, which the Kings of Sweden much labour, they die within 7 or 9 dayes after, and for that cause they will hardly be brought to Christianity, but worship still the Divel, who daily appears to them. In their idolatrous courses, Gaudentibus diis patriis, quos religiose colunt, &c. Yet are they very superstitious, like our wild Irish: Though they of the better note, the Kings of Denmark and Sweden themselves, that govern them, be Lutherans;	Some of them, such as those around Lapland and the Pilapians, remain the Devil's possession to this day. This wretched people, says my author, has until now been Satan's possession, a thing most astonishing and lamentable; and what is to be wondered at and pitied is that, if any of them are baptized—as the kings of Sweden work hard to bring about—they die within seven or nine days afterwards. For that reason they can scarcely be brought to Christianity, but continue to worship the Devil, who appears to them daily. In their idolatrous practices, their ancestral gods, whom they devoutly worship, rejoice, and so on. They are very superstitious, like our wild Irish, although the more eminent among them—the kings of Denmark and Sweden themselves, who govern them—are Lutherans.[12102]
Source page 642 The remnant are Calvinists, Lutherans, in Germany equally mixt: And yet the Emperor himself, Dukes of Loraine, Bavaria, and the Princes Electors, are most part professed Papists. And though some part of France and Ireland, Great Britaine, half the Cantos in Suitzerland, and the Low countries be Calvinists, more defecate then the rest, yet at oddes amongst themselves, not free from superstition.	The remainder are Calvinists and Lutherans, equally mixed in Germany; yet the emperor himself, the dukes of Lorraine and Bavaria, and most of the prince-electors are professed Papists. And although parts of France and Ireland, Great Britain, half the cantons of Switzerland and the Low Countries are Calvinist, and purer than the rest, they are still at odds among themselves and are not free from superstition.[12103]

[12101] Burton. Source page 641, star: "Boissardus de Magia. Intra septimum aut nonum à baptismo diem moriuntur. Hinc fit, &c." "Boissard, On Magic. They die within the seventh or ninth day after baptism. Hence it happens, and so on."

[12102] Editor. Pilapians is an old designation used here for northern inhabitants alongside Lapland; its exact geographical scope remains uncertain. The claim that baptized people die within seven or nine days comes from Boissard's demonological account. Burton supplies no evidence establishing it. Admired means wondered at. His comparison with the "wild Irish" carries the same derogatory, outsider perspective.

[12103] Editor. The first remnant means the remaining Christians in this survey. Defecate means purified or cleared of impurities. Burton ranks the Reformed churches closest to his own position but explicitly denies that they are free from superstition. His summary of territories compresses mixed populations into confessional labels.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And which [12104]Brochard the Monk in his description of the holy Land, after he had censured the Greek Church, and shewed their errours, concluded at last, Faxit Deus ne Latinis multa irrepserint stultitiæ, I say God grant there be no fopperies in our Church. As a damme of water stopt in one place breaks out into another, so doth superstition.	And as the monk Brochard concluded in his description of the Holy Land, after criticizing the Greek Church and setting out its errors, God grant that many follies have not crept in among the Latins, so I say: God grant there are no foolish practices in our Church. Just as dammed water, stopped in one place, breaks out in another, so does superstition.[12105]
I say nothing of Anabaptists, Socinians, Brownists, Barrowists, Familists, &c. There is superstition in our prayers, often in our hearing of Sermons, bitter contentions, invectives, persecutions, strange conceits, besides diversitie of opinions, schismes, factions, &c.	I say nothing of Anabaptists, Socinians, Brownists, Barrowists, Familists and so on. There is superstition in our prayers, often in our listening to sermons; there are bitter quarrels, denunciations, persecutions and strange notions, besides differences of opinion, schisms, factions and the rest.[12106]
But as the Lord (Job 42. cap.7.5.) said to Eliphaz the Temanite, and his two friends, his wrath was kindled against them, for they had not spoken of him things that were right: we may justly of these Schismatiques, and Heretiques, how wise soever in their own conceits, non rectè loquuntur de Deo, they speak not, they think not, they write not well of God, and as they ought.	But as the Lord said to Eliphaz the Temanite and his two friends in Job 42:7, his anger was kindled against them because they had not spoken rightly of him, so we may justly say of these schismatics and heretics, however wise they consider themselves, they do not speak rightly of God. They neither speak, think nor write properly of God, as they ought.[12107]

[12104] Burton. Source page 642, star: “cap. de Incolis terræ sanctæ.” “Chapter on the inhabitants of the Holy Land.”

[12105] Editor. Brochard is Burchard of Mount Sion. His Description of the Holy Land (Antwerp, 1536), sig. D1v, prints faxit Deus ne & Latinis multæ irrepserint stultitiæ, after criticizing Greek Christians. Burton omits & and prints multa for multæ; his edition remains unidentified. The prayer therefore has a direct Latin parallel. Burton then applies its warning to his own Church. Fopperies means foolish practices.

[12106] Editor. Brownists and Barrowists are names associated with English separatism; Familists with the Family of Love. Burton turns from remote religions to quarrels, persecution and habits of worship within his own setting. These labels are his classification of dissent, not a diagnosis of the people named.

[12107] Editor. The passage is Job 42:7. The source’s compact and disordered “Job 42. cap.7.5.” is retained on the left, while the modern column supplies the identifiable reference. Burton’s Latin sentence restates his charge against the schismatics, followed by a further English expansion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And therefore, Quid quæso mi Dorpi, as Erasmus concludes to Dorpius, hisce Theologis faciamus, aut quid preceris, nisi forte fidelem medicum, qui cerebro medeatur? What shall we wish them, but sanam mentem, and a good Physician? But more of their differences, paradoxes, opinions, mad pranks, in the Symptomes: I now hasten to the causes.	And therefore, as Erasmus concludes to Dorp: What, I ask you, my dear Dorp, are we to do with these theologians? What would you wish for them, except perhaps a trustworthy physician to treat their brains? What should we wish them but a sound mind and a good physician? But more of their differences, paradoxes, opinions and mad antics under the symptoms: I now hurry on to the causes.[12108]

[12108] Editor. Dorpius is Martin Dorp. Erasmus's letter to him of May 1515 (Epistle 337) defends the Praise of Folly. The physician joke occurs at lines 685–686, after a story of a theologian hostile to Greek and Hebrew learning; Burton rearranges its opening. "A sound mind" translates sanam mentem. The medical joke reconnects religious controversy with Burton's subject of melancholy; it does not amount to a clinical diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 2.	SUBSECTION 2
Causes of Religious melancholy. From the Divell by miracles, apparitions, oracles. His instruments or factors, polititians, Priests, Impostors, Hereticks, blind guides. In them simplicity, fear, blinde zeal, ignorance, solitariness, curiosity, pride, vain-glory, presumption, &c. his engins, fasting, solitariness, hope, fear, &c.	Causes of religious melancholy. From the Devil, through miracles, apparitions and oracles. His instruments or agents: politicians, priests, impostors, heretics and blind guides. In them: credulity, fear, blind zeal, ignorance, solitude, curiosity, pride, vanity, presumption and so on. His devices: fasting, solitude, hope, fear and the rest.[12109]
Source page 642–643 WE are taught in holy Scripture, that the Divel rangeth abroad like a roaring Lyon, still seeking whom he may devour: and as in severall shapes, so by several engines and devices he goeth about to seduce us; sometimes he transforms himself into an Angel of light; and is so cunning, that he is able, if it were possible, to deceive the very Elect.	We are taught in Holy Scripture that the Devil roams abroad like a roaring lion, always seeking someone to devour. In various shapes, and by various devices and tricks, he goes about enticing us astray. Sometimes he transforms himself into an angel of light; and he is so cunning that he could, if it were possible, deceive even the elect.[12110]

[12109] Editor. The subsection's synopsis is part of Burton's source text and is retained in full. Factors means agents, and engines means devices or means. Its repeated solitude, hope and fear signal both circumstances of vulnerability and instruments of manipulation.

[12110] Editor. The opening combines 1 Peter 5:8, 2 Corinthians 11:14 and Matthew 24:24. The last concerns false Christs and false prophets who would deceive even the elect if possible; Burton applies it here to the Devil's agency.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 643 He will be worshipped as [12111]God himself, and is so adored by the Heathen, and esteemed. And in imitation of that divine power, as [12112]Eusebius observes, [12113]to abuse or emulate Gods glory, as Dandinus adds, he will have all homage, sacrifices, oblations, and whatsoever else belongs to the worship of God, to be done likewise unto him, similis erit altissimo, and by this means infatuates the world, deludes, entraps, and destroys many a thousand souls.	He insists on being worshipped as God himself, and the heathen revere and regard him as such. In imitation of that divine power, as Eusebius observes, and to mock or rival God's glory, as Dandini adds, he demands that all homage, sacrifices, offerings and everything else belonging to God's worship be offered to him as well: he will be like the Most High. By this means he makes fools of the world, deceiving, ensnaring and destroying many thousands of souls.[12114]

[12111] Burton. Source page 643, g: "Plato in Crit. Dæmones custodes sunt hominum & eorum domini, ut nos animalium; nec hominibus, sed & regionibus imperant, vaticiniis, auguriis, nos regunt. Idem fere Max. Tyrius ser.1. & 26,27. medios vult dæmones inter Deos & homines deorum ministros, præsides hominum, a cœlo ad homines descendentes." "Plato in the Critias. Spirits are the guardians and masters of human beings, as we are of animals; they rule not only people but regions too, governing us by prophecies and auguries. Maximus of Tyre says much the same in Discourses 1, 26 and 27: he places spirits between gods and human beings, servants of the gods and guardians of humanity, descending from heaven to human beings."

[12112] Burton. Source page 643, h: "De Præparat. Evangel." "Preparation for the Gospel."

[12113] Burton. Source page 643, i: "Vel in abusum Dei vel in æmulationem. Dandinus com. in lib.2. Arist. de An. Text.29." "Either to mock God or to rival him. Dandini, commentary on Aristotle's On the Soul, book 2, text 29."

[12114] Editor. "He will be like the Most High" adapts Isaiah 14:14. Plato, Critias 109b–c, describes divine shepherds. Maximus of Tyre, Dissertation XXVII in Thomas Taylor's 1804 translation, places spirits between god and humanity and sends them to assist the worthy, avenge the injured and punish wrongdoers. This supports the margin's intermediary and guardian roles; it does not identify them as Christian devils. Burton's Greek or Latin edition and full numbering remain uncollated. Dandinus is Girolamo Dandini.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sometimes by dreams, visions (as God to Moses by familiar conference) the divel in several shapes talks with them: in the [12115]Indies it is common, and in China nothing so familiar as apparitions, inspirations, oracles, by terrifying them with false prodigies, counterfeit miracles, sending storms, tempests, diseases, plagues, (as of old in Athens there was Apollo, Alexicacus, Apollo λοίμιος pestifer & malorum depulsor) raising wars, seditions by Spectrums, troubling their Consciences, driving them to despair, terrors of mind, intolerable pains; by promises, rewards, benefits, and fair means, he raiseth such an opinion of his Deity and greatness, that they dare not do otherwise then adore him, do as he will have them, they dare not offend him.	Sometimes the Devil speaks to them in various shapes through dreams and visions, as God spoke directly and intimately to Moses. This is common in the Indies, and in China nothing is more familiar than apparitions, inspirations and oracles. He terrifies them with false portents and counterfeit miracles, sends storms, tempests, diseases and plagues—as in ancient Athens there was Apollo the Averter of Evil, Apollo the Pestilential, the plague-bringer and the dispeller of evils—raises wars and rebellions through spectres, troubles their consciences and drives them to despair, mental terrors and unbearable pain. Through promises, rewards, benefits and gentle means he inspires such belief in his divinity and greatness that they dare do nothing but worship him and obey his will: they dare not offend him.[12116]

[12115] Burton. Source page 643, k: “Dæmones consulunt, & familiares habent dæmones pleriq; sacerdotes. Riccius lib.1. cap.10. expedit. Sinar.” “They consult demons, and most priests have familiar demons. Ricci, book 1, chapter 10, of the expedition to China.”

[12116] Editor. Alexicacus means averter of evil; the Greek epithet, printed with a contracted ending, is read as loimios, pestilential. Burton then repeats the opposition in Latin: plague-bringer and averter of evils. It supports his claim that the same supposed power both afflicts and relieves. “Familiar conference” means direct, intimate conversation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And to compel them more to stand in awe of him, [12117]he sends and cures diseases, disquiets their spirits (as Cyprian saith) torments and terrifies their souls, to make them adore him: and all his study, all his endeavour is to divert them from true Religion, to superstition: and because he is damned himself, and in an errour, he would have all the world participate of his errours, and be damned with him.	And to compel them to fear him still more, he sends and cures diseases, disturbs their spirits, as Cyprian says, and torments and terrifies their souls to make them worship him. All his attention and effort goes towards turning them from true religion to superstition; and because he is himself damned and in error, he would have the whole world share his errors and be damned with him.[12118]
The primum mobile therefore, and first mover of all superstition, is the Devil, that great enemy of mankind, the principal agent, who in a thousand several shapes, after divers fashions, with several engines, illusions, and by several names hath deceived the inhabitants of the earth, in several places and countries, still rejoycing at their fals.	The first moving cause, therefore, the first mover of all superstition, is the Devil, that great enemy of mankind, the chief agent who, in a thousand different shapes and forms, with various devices and illusions and under various names, has deceived the inhabitants of the earth in different places and countries, always rejoicing at their falls.[12119]

[12117] Burton. Source page 643, l: "Vitam turbant, somnos inquietant, irrepentes etiam in corpora mentes terrent, valetudinem frangunt, morbos lacessunt, ut ad cultum sui cogant, nec aliud his studium, quam ut a vera religione, ad superstitionem vertant; cum sint ipsi pœnales, quærunt sibi adpœnas comites, ut habeant erroris participes." "They disturb life and trouble sleep; creeping even into bodies, they terrify minds, destroy health and provoke diseases to compel people to worship them. Their sole aim is to turn people from true religion to superstition. Since they themselves are under punishment, they seek companions in their penalties, to have others share their error."

[12118] Editor. The parallel is in the treatise traditionally attributed to Cyprian, That Idols Are Not Gods, section 7. Burton's English paraphrase and the longer Latin margin are both preserved; the latter supplies a fuller account of illness and apparent healing. The passage expresses a theological explanation of suffering.

[12119] Editor. Primum mobile literally means first moving thing, here the initiating cause. The astronomical phrase reinforces Burton's causal structure: the Devil acts first, while human agents will be considered next. "Their fals" means their falls into error.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All the world over before Christs time, he freely domineered, and held the souls of men in most slavish subjection, saith [12120]Eusebius, in divers forms, ceremonies, and sacrifices, till Christs coming, as if those divels of the Ayre had shared the earth amongst them, which the Platonists held for Gods, ([12121]Ludus deorum sumus) and were our governours and keepers.	Throughout the world before Christ's time he ruled unchecked and held human souls in the most abject slavery, says Eusebius, through various forms, ceremonies and sacrifices, until Christ's coming; as though those devils of the air, whom the Platonists took for gods, had divided the earth among themselves—we are the gods' plaything—and were our rulers and guardians.[12122]

[12120] Burton. Source page 643, m; continued across the foot: "Lib.4.præparat. Evangel. c. Tantamque victoriam amentia hominum consequuti sunt, ut si colligere in unum velis, universum orbem istis scelestibus spiritibus subjectum fuisse invenies: Usque ad Salvatoris adventum hominum cæde perniciosissimos dæmones placabant, &c." "Preparation for the Gospel, book 4, chapter [number not supplied]. Through human folly they gained so great a victory that, if you gathered the evidence together, you would find the entire world subjected to these wicked spirits. Until the Saviour's coming, people appeased these most destructive demons by slaughtering human beings, and so on."

[12121] Burton. Source page 643, dagger: "Plato."

[12122] Editor. Eusebius, Preparation for the Gospel, book 4, argues that demonic worship and human sacrifice held sway before Christianity; Burton's margin omits the chapter number. "We are the gods' plaything" recalls Plato, Laws 7, 803c–d, but Burton makes the image serve his hostile account of pagan domination. The chronological generalization is preserved, not independently certified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In several places, they had several rites, orders, names, of which read Wierus de præstigiis dæmonum lib.1. cap.5. [12123]Strozius, Cicogna, and others; Adonided amongst the Syrians, Adramelech amongst the Capernaites, Asiniæ amongst the Emathites, Astartes with the Sydonians, Asteroth with the Palestines, Dagon with the Philistines; Tartary with the Hanæi; Melchonis amongst the Ammonites: Beli the Babylonian, Beelzebub, and Baal with the Samaritans and Moabites, Apis, Isis and Osiris amongst the Ægyptians: Apollo Pythius at Delphos, Colophon, Ancyra, Cuma, Erythra: Jupiter in Crete, Venus at Cyprus, Juno at Carthage, Æsculapius at Epidaurus, Diana at Ephesus, Pallas at Athens, &c.	In different places they had different rites, orders and names, on which read Weyer's On the Deceptions of Demons, book 1, chapter 5, Strozzi, Cicogna and others: Adonided among the Syrians; Adramelech among the Capernaites; Asiniæ among the Emathites; Astartes among the Sidonians; Asteroth among the Palestinians; Dagon among the Philistines; Tartary among the Hanæi; Melchonis among the Ammonites; the Babylonian Beli; Beelzebub and Baal among the Samaritans and Moabites; Apis, Isis and Osiris among the Egyptians; Pythian Apollo at Delphi, Colophon, Ancyra, Cumae and Erythrae; Jupiter in Crete; Venus in Cyprus; Juno at Carthage; Aesculapius at Epidaurus; Diana at Ephesus; Pallas at Athens; and so on.[12124]
Source page 643–644 And even in these our days, both in the East and West Indies, in Tartary, China, Japan, &c. what strange Idols, in what prodigious forms, with what absurd ceremonies are they adored! What strange Sacraments, like ours of Baptism and the Lords Supper, what goodly Temples, Priests, sacrifices they had in America when the Spaniards first landed there, let Acosta the Jesuite relate lib.5. cap.1,2,3,4, &c. and how the Divel imitated the Ark, and the children of Israels coming out of Egypt: with many such.	Even in our own days, in both the East and West Indies, in Tartary, China, Japan and elsewhere, what strange idols are worshipped, in what monstrous forms and with what absurd ceremonies! What strange sacraments resembling our baptism and the Lord's Supper, what splendid temples, priests and sacrifices they had in America when the Spaniards first landed there—let the Jesuit Acosta relate it in book 5, chapters 1, 2, 3, 4 and following, along with the way the Devil imitated the Ark and the children of Israel's departure from Egypt, and many similar things.[12125]

[12123] Burton. Source page 643, n; at the foot: "Strozius, Cicogna omnif. mag. lib.3. cap.7. Ezek. 8.4. Reg.11.4. Reg.3. & 17,14. Jer.49. Num.13. 3.Reg.13." "Strozzi; Cicogna, All Kinds of Magic, book 3, chapter 7; Ezekiel, Kings, Jeremiah and Numbers: the printed string of biblical numbers is retained for collation."

[12124] Editor. The catalogue's unusual names and pairings are left visible rather than silently replaced by reconstructed ancient cults. The long biblical reference string is also preserved without imposing a speculative punctuation. Wierus is Johann Weyer; Strozzi and Cicogna are cited as authorities on spirits and magic. De præstigiis dæmonum means On the Deceptions of Demons.

[12125] Editor. Burton uses reports of American rites to argue that the Devil counterfeits Christian sacraments and biblical history. Acosta is José de Acosta. His book and the travellers listed next are witnesses to European descriptions, not proof of Burton's supernatural explanation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 644 For as Lipsius well discourseth out of the † doctrine of the Stoicks, maxime cupiunt adorationem hominum, now and of old, they still and most especially desire to be adored by men. See but what Vertomannus, l.5.c.2. Marcus Polus, Lerius, Benzo, P. Martyr in his Ocean Decades, Acosta, and Mat. Riccius expedit. christ. in Sinas lib.1. relate.	For, as Lipsius explains well from the Stoics' teaching, above all they desire human worship: now as in the past, their constant and chief desire is to be worshipped by human beings. Just see what Varthema, book 5, chapter 2, Marco Polo, Léry, Benzoni, Peter Martyr in his Decades of the Ocean, Acosta, and Matteo Ricci in book 1 of the Christian Expedition to China relate.[12126]
[12127]Eusebius wonders how that wise city of Athens, and flourishing kingdoms of Greece should be so besotted; and we in our times, how those witty China's, so perspicacious in all other things should be so gulled, so tortured with superstition, so blind as to worship stocks and stones. But it is no marvel, when we see all out as great effects amongst Christians themselves: how are those Anabaptists, Arrians, and Papists above the rest, miserably infatuated!	Eusebius wonders how that wise city of Athens and the flourishing kingdoms of Greece could be so stupefied; and we in our own times wonder how those intelligent Chinese, so discerning in everything else, can be so deceived, so tormented by superstition, so blind as to worship wood and stone. But it is no wonder when we see every bit as powerful effects among Christians themselves. How miserably deluded are those Anabaptists and Arians, and above all the Papists![12128]
Mars, Jupiter, Apollo, and Æsculapius, have resigned their interest, names and offices to Saint George,	Mars, Jupiter, Apollo and Aesculapius have handed over their authority, names and functions to Saint George,

[12126] Editor. The Latin maxim and Burton's English restatement are retained separately. Vertomannus is Ludovico di Varthema; Marcus Polus is Marco Polo; Lerius, Jean de Léry; Benzo, Girolamo Benzoni; P. Martyr, Peter Martyr d'Anghiera; and Mat. Riccius, Matteo Ricci. Ricci's account circulated through Nicolas Trigault's Latin version. The dagger before "doctrine" has no corresponding new marginal entry visible on this page.

[12127] Burton. Source page 644, o: "Lib.4. cap.8. præpar." "Preparation for the Gospel, book 4, chapter 8."

[12128] Editor. Witty and perspicacious mean intelligent and discerning. Stocks means wooden images. The comparison turns Burton's attack back onto Christian groups, particularly Catholics; "infatuated" means made foolish or deluded. These judgements belong to his confessional argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12129](Maxime bellorum rector, quem nostra juventus Pro Mavorte colit.)———	(Greatest ruler of wars, whom our young men Worship in place of Mars.)———[12130]
St. Christopher, and a company of fictitious Saints, Venus to the Lady of Lauretta. And as those old Romans had several distinct gods, for divers offices, persons, places, so have they Saints, as [12131]Lavater well observes out of Lactantius, mutato nomine tantum, 'tis the same spirit or Divel that deludes them still.	to Saint Christopher and a host of fictitious saints; Venus has handed hers over to Our Lady of Loreto. And just as the ancient Romans had separate gods for different functions, people and places, so these people have saints, as Lavater aptly observes from Lactantius: with only the name changed, it is still the same spirit or Devil that deceives them.[12132]
The manner how, as I say, is by rewards, promises, terrors, affrights, punishments: In a word, faire and foule means, Hope and Fear. How often hath Jupiter, Apollo, Bacchus and the rest, sent plagues in [12133]Greece and Italy, because their sacrifices were neglected?	The means, as I say, are rewards, promises, terrors, alarms and punishments—in a word, fair means and foul, hope and fear. How often have Jupiter, Apollo, Bacchus and the rest sent plagues into Greece and Italy because their sacrifices were neglected?
[12134]Dii multa neglecti dederunt Hesperiæ mala luctuosæ.	Neglected, the gods have brought many woes Upon grieving Italy.[12135]

[12129] Burton. Source page 644, dagger: "Bapt. Mant.4. Fast. de Sancto Georgio." "Baptista Mantuanus, Fasti, book 4, on Saint George."

[12130] Editor. Baptista Mantuanus is the Latin poet Battista Spagnoli of Mantua. Mavors is Mars, the Roman war god. The two verse lines praise Saint George in martial language; Burton makes this a bridge between pagan gods and Christian saints. The exact Fasti passage remains unverified.

[12131] Burton. Source page 644, p: "Part.1. cap.1. & lib.2. cap.9." "Part 1, chapter 1, and book 2, chapter 9."

[12132] Editor. Lauretta is Loreto, the Marian pilgrimage shrine in Italy. Burton alleges a transfer of pagan divine functions to saints; that is his polemical analogy, not a literal historical succession. The Latin qualification means that only the name has changed. The Lavater citation supplies book and chapter numbers without a title.

[12133] Burton. Source page 644, q: "Polyd. Virg. lib.1. de prodig." "Polydore Vergil, On Prodigies, book 1."

[12134] Burton. Source page 644, dagger: "Hor. l.3.od.6." "Horace, Odes 3.6."

[12135] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.6.7–8. Hesperia is Italy. The Latin is retained as two verse lines, and its translation remains verse. Burton's following prose explains the punitive purpose he assigns to these calamities.

Original text 1651	Modern English
to terrifie them, to rouze them up, and the like: see but Livy, Dyonysius Halicarnasseus, Thucydides, Pausanias, Philostratus, [12136]Polybius, before the battel of Cannas, prodigiis, signis, ostentis, templa cuncta, privatæ etiam, ædes scatebant. Oeneus raigned in Ætolia, and because he did not sacrifice to Diana with his other Gods (see more in Libanius his Diana) she sent a wild Bore, insolitæ magnitudinis, qui terras & homines misere depascebatur, to spoil both men and country, which was afterwards killed by Meleager.	They did so to terrify them, to rouse them and the like. Just read Livy, Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Thucydides, Pausanias, Philostratus and Polybius: before the battle of Cannae, all the temples, and even private houses, swarmed with prodigies, signs and portents. Oeneus ruled in Aetolia; because he did not sacrifice to Diana along with his other gods—see more in Libanius's Diana—she sent a wild boar of extraordinary size, which dreadfully ravaged both lands and people, to destroy people and country alike. Meleager afterwards killed it.[12137]
So Plutarch in the life of Lucullus relates, how Mithridates King of Pontus, at the seige of Cizicum, with all his Navy was overthrown by Proserpina, for neglecting of her holy day. She appeared in a vision to Aristagoras in the night, Cras inquit tybicinem Libicum cum tybicine pontico committam, and the day following this Ænigma was understood; for with a great South wind which came from Lybia, she quite overwhelmed Mithridates army.	So Plutarch, in his Life of Lucullus, relates how Mithridates, king of Pontus, was defeated with his entire navy at the siege of Cyzicus by Proserpina for neglecting her holy day. She appeared to Aristagoras in a vision at night: Tomorrow, she said, I shall pit the Libyan flute-player against the Pontic flute-player. The following day the riddle became clear: with a great south wind from Libya she completely overwhelmed Mithridates' army.[12138]

[12136] Burton. Source page 644, dagger: "Lib.3. hist." "Histories, book 3."

[12137] Editor. Polybius, Histories 3.112.8, describes the profusion of reported signs and religious activity at Rome before Cannae. The boar episode is the Calydonian hunt: Oeneus's omission angers Diana, and Meleager kills the creature. Burton names Libanius's Diana without a fuller locator; his phrase about extraordinary size and devastation is translated before his own English restatement.

[12138] Editor. Compare Plutarch, Lucullus 10.1–3: Persephone appears to Aristagoras and foretells a Libyan flute-player against a Pontic trumpeter; a storm wrecks Mithridates' siege engines. Burton calls both musicians flute-players and combines this with destruction of the fleet, narrated separately in chapter 13. His altered narrative and Latin wording are retained. Proserpina is the Latin name of Persephone.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 644–645 What prodigies and miracles, dreams, visions, predictions, apparitions, oracles, have been of old at Delphos, Dodona, Trophonius Denne, at Thebes, and Lebaudia, of Jupiter Ammon in Ægypt, Amphiareus in Attica, &c. what strange cures performed by Apollo and Æsculapius? Juno's Image, and that of [12139]Fortune spake, [12140]Castor and Pollux fought in person for the Romans against Hannibals army, as Pallas, Mars, Iuno, Venus, for Greeks and Trojans, &c.	What prodigies and miracles, dreams, visions, predictions, apparitions and oracles there were in ancient times at Delphi, Dodona, Trophonius's cave, Thebes and Lebadea, at the oracle of Jupiter Ammon in Egypt, and that of Amphiaraus in Attica, and elsewhere! What strange cures Apollo and Aesculapius performed! The images of Juno and Fortune spoke; Castor and Pollux fought in person for the Romans against Hannibal's army, as Pallas, Mars, Juno and Venus did for the Greeks and Trojans, and so on.[12141]
Source page 645 Amongst our pseudocatholiques, nothing so familiar as such miracles; how many cures done by our Lady of Lauretta, at Sichem! of old at our S. Thomas Shrine, &c. [12142]S. Sabine was seen to fight for Arnulphus Duke of Spoleto, [12143]S. George fought in person for John, the bastard of Portugal, against the Castilians; S. James for the Spaniards in America.	Among our false Catholics, nothing is more familiar than such miracles. How many cures Our Lady of Loreto has performed, and how many at Sichem, or formerly at our Saint Thomas's shrine! Saint Sabinus was seen fighting for Arnulf, duke of Spoleto; Saint George fought in person for John, the bastard of Portugal, against the Castilians; and Saint James for the Spaniards in America.[12144]

[12139] Burton. Source page 645, r: "Oratâ lege me dicastis mulieres Dion Halicarn." ""Women, you have dedicated me according to sacred ordinance." Dionysius of Halicarnassus."

[12140] Burton. Source page 645, s: "Tully de nat. deorum lib.2. Æqua Venus Teucris Pallas iniqua fuit." "Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, book 2. Venus favoured the Trojans; Pallas was hostile to them."

[12141] Editor. The list concerns oracular shrines and healing gods. Trophonius's cave was at Lebadea; Burton places it alongside Thebes. The Fortune margin appears to print "me dicastis"; the intended dedication formula is supplied in translation, pending collation. Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods 2.6, places Castor and Pollux at Lake Regillus in the Latin War, with Postumius opposing Octavius Mamilius, not Hannibal. He also tells of their announcing Perseus's defeat. Burton's Hannibal remains in both columns.

[12142] Burton. Source page 645, t: "Jo. Molanus lib.3. cap.59." "Johannes Molanus, book 3, chapter 59."

[12143] Burton. Source page 645, u: "Pet. Oliver. de Johanne primo Portugalliæ Rege strenue pugnans, & diversæ partis ictus clypeo excipiens." "Pedro de Oliveira, On John the First, King of Portugal: fighting vigorously and receiving the opposing side's blows on his shield."

[12144] Editor. Pseudocatholiques means false Catholics and expresses Burton's refusal of his opponents' claim to catholicity. Sichem is Scherpenheuvel or Montaigu, a Marian pilgrimage site in the Low Countries; "our Saint Thomas's shrine" refers to Thomas Becket at Canterbury. The fighting saints are reported miracle traditions, presented here as parallels to pagan apparitions. John the bastard is John I of Portugal.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In the battel of Bonnoxburn, where Edward the second, our English King was foyled by the Scots, S. Philanus arm was seen to fight (if [12145]Hector Boethius doth not impose) that was before shut up in a silver capcase: Another time in the same Author, S. Magnus fought for them.	At the battle of Bannockburn, where our English king Edward II was defeated by the Scots, Saint Fillan's arm, previously shut inside a silver casket, was seen fighting—if Hector Boece is not deceiving us. On another occasion, according to the same author, Saint Magnus fought for them.[12146]
Now for visions, revelations, miracles, not only out of the Legend, out of purgatory, but every day comes news from the Indies, and at home, read the Jesuits letters, Ribadineira, Thurselinus, Acosta, Lippomanus, Xaverius, Ignatius lives, &c. and tell me what difference?	As for visions, revelations and miracles, we hear of them not only in the legends of saints and in reports from purgatory: news comes every day from the Indies and here at home. Read the Jesuits' letters, Ribadeneira, Tursellinus, Acosta, Lippomanus, the lives of Xavier and Ignatius, and the rest, and tell me what difference there is.[12147]

[12145] Burton. Source page 645, x: "L.14. Loculos sponte aperuisse & pro iis pugnasse." "Book 14. The casket opened of its own accord, and he fought on their behalf."

[12146] Editor. Philanus represents Saint Fillan; capcase means a small chest or case, here a reliquary. Burton cites Hector Boece's History of Scotland, book 14, for the story at Bannockburn, while adding his own doubt ("if … doth not impose"). His marginal claim about the casket and the body's account of the arm are retained separately. The exact story, and the separate Saint Magnus episode, remain for collation.

[12147] Editor. The Legend points to the literature of saints' lives. Ribadineira, Tursellinus, Acosta and Lippomanus are writers cited for Catholic or missionary narratives; Xavier and Ignatius are Francis Xavier and Ignatius of Loyola. Burton's closing question asks readers to compare these reports with the pagan wonders just listed. His next paragraph turns to human agents of superstition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
His ordinary instruments or factors which he useth, as God himself did good Kings, Lawful Magistrates, patriarchs, prophets, to the establishing of his Church, [12148]are Polititians, Statesmen, Priests, Heretiques, blind guides, Impostors, pseudoprophets, to propagate his superstition. And first to begin with Polititians, it hath ever been a principal axiom with them, to maintain religion, or superstition, which they determine of, alter and vary upon all occasions, as to them seems best: they make Religion meer policie, a cloak, a humane invention; nihil æque valet ad regendos vulgi animos ac superstitio, as [12149]Tacitus and [12150]Tully hold.	The ordinary instruments or agents he employs to spread his superstition—just as God himself employed good kings, lawful magistrates, patriarchs and prophets to establish his Church—are politicians, statesmen, priests, heretics, blind guides, impostors and false prophets. To begin with politicians: it has always been a chief maxim of theirs to maintain religion or superstition, deciding upon it, altering it and varying it whenever they think best. They make religion mere political expediency, a cloak, a human invention: nothing is so effective in governing the minds of the crowd as superstition, as Tacitus and Cicero hold.[12151]

[12148] Burton. Source page 645, y: “Religion, as they hold, is policie, invented alone to keep men in awe.”

[12149] Burton. Source page 645, z: “1. Annal.” “Annals, book 1.”

[12150] Burton. Source page 645, a: “Omnes religione moventur. 5. in Verrem.” “All are moved by religion. Fifth speech against Verres.”

[12151] Editor. Factors are agents; policy means political calculation. Tacitus, Annals 1.28, describes frightened mutineers’ superstition during an eclipse and Drusus’s use of it, but not Burton’s exact maxim. Curtius 4.10 supplies a closer Latin parallel: nothing rules a crowd more effectively than superstition. This is a parallel, not proof of Burton’s immediate source. Cicero’s separate “all are moved by religion” is Against Verres 2.4.132; the margin prints “5. in Verrem”.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Austin l.4. de civitat. Dei c.9. censures Scævola saying and acknowledging, expedire civitates religione falli, that it was a fit thing cities should be deceived by religion, according to the diverb, Si mundus vult decipi, decipiatur, if the world will be gulled, let it be gulled, 'tis good howsoever to keep it in subjection. 'Tis that [12152]Aristotle and † Plato inculcate in their Politiques, [12153]Religion neglected, brings plagues to the city, opens a gap to all naughtiness.	Augustine, in The City of God, book 4, chapter 27, censures Scaevola for saying and acknowledging that it is expedient for communities to be deceived by religion: that it was fitting for cities to be deceived through religion. As the proverb says, if the world wishes to be deceived, let it be deceived; if the world wants to be fooled, let it be fooled—it is good, at any rate, to keep it in subjection. This is what Aristotle and Plato impress upon us in their political writings: neglected religion brings plagues upon the city and opens the way to every kind of wickedness.[12154]

[12152] Burton. Source page 645, b: "Zeleuchus, præfat. legis. qui urbem aut regionem inhabitant, persuasos esse oportet esse Deos." "Zaleucus, preface to the law: those who inhabit a city or region ought to be convinced that gods exist."

[12153] Burton. Source page 645, dagger: "10. de legibus. Religio neglecta maximam pestem in civitatem infert, omnium scelerum fenestram aperit." "Laws, book 10. Neglected religion brings the greatest ruin upon a city and opens a window to every crime."

[12154] Editor. Augustine's discussion of Scaevola and useful religious deception is in City of God 4.27; the source prints 4.9, which is kept on the left and corrected on the right. The proverbial Latin and Burton's English repeat are retained separately. The sentence about neglected religion is a generalizing summary, attributed to Aristotle and Plato; the margin separately cites Zaleucus and Plato's Laws 10.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis that which all our late Polititians ingeminate. Cromerus l.2. pol. hist. Boterus, l.3. de incrementis urbium, Clapmarius l.2. c.9. de Arcanis rerump. Arneseus cap.4. lib.2. polit. Captain Machiavel will have a prince, by all means to counterfeit religion, to be superstitious in shew at least, to seem to be devout, frequent holy exercises, honour divines, love the Church, affect priests, as Numa, Lycurgus, and such law-makers were, and did, non ut his fidem habeant, sed ut subditos religionis metu facilius in officio contineant, to keep people in obedience.	This is what all our recent political writers repeat: Kromer, History of Poland, book 2; Botero, On the Growth of Cities, book 3; Clapmar, On the Secrets of States, book 2, chapter 9; and Arnisaeus, Politics, book 2, chapter 4. Captain Machiavelli insists that a prince must by every means counterfeit religion, be superstitious at least in appearance, seem devout, attend religious exercises, honour theologians, love the Church and favour priests, as Numa, Lycurgus and such lawgivers were and did: not to believe these things themselves, but to keep their subjects more easily at their duty through religious fear—to keep the people obedient.[12155]
[12156]Nam naturaliter (as Cardan writes) lex Christiana lex est pietatis, justitiæ, fidei, simplicitatis, &c. But this error of his, Innocentius Jentillettus a French Lawyer, Theorem.9. comment.1. de Relig. and Thomas Bozius in his book de ruinis gentium & Regnorum have copiously confuted:	For by its nature, as Cardano writes, the Christian law is a law of piety, justice, fidelity, simplicity, and so on. But this error of Machiavelli's has been amply refuted by the French lawyer Innocent Gentillet, theorem 9, commentary 1, On Religion, and by Tommaso Bozio in his book On the Ruin of Nations and Kingdoms.[12157]

[12155] Editor. Ingeminate means repeat or insist upon. The listed authors are Marcin Kromer, Giovanni Botero, Arnold Clapmar and Henning Arnisaeus. Burton's "Captain Machiavel" is sardonic. His description presents a hostile reading of religion as a means of government, and is followed by his concession that some statesmen are sincerely religious. The Latin explanation and English restatement remain distinct.

[12156] Burton. Source page 645, dagger: "Cardanus Com. in Ptolomæum quadripart." "Cardano, Commentary on Ptolemy's Quadripartitum."

[12157] Editor. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano; his phrase describes Christianity as a law of piety, justice, fidelity and simplicity. Innocentius Jentillettus is Innocent Gentillet; Thomas Bozius is Tommaso Bozio. Burton cites these opponents of Machiavelli; the exact theorem and passages remain for collation. The translated book titles are retained in the modern-only text as part of Burton's reading list.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many Politicians, I dare not deny, maintain Religion as a true means, and sincerely speak of it without hypocrisie, are truely zealous and religious themselves. Justice and Religion are the two chief props and supporters of a well governed commonwealth:	I cannot deny that many politicians uphold religion as a genuine means, speak sincerely of it without hypocrisy, and are themselves truly zealous and religious. Justice and religion are the two chief pillars supporting a well-governed state.[12158]
Source page 645–646 but most of them are but Machiavellians, counterfeits only for politicall ends; for Solus Rex (which Campanella cap.18. Atheismi Triumphati observes) as amongst our modern Turks, Reipub. Finis, as knowing [12159]magnus ejus in animos imperium; and that as [12160]Sabellicus delivers, A man without religion, is like an horse without a bridle.	but most of them are merely Machiavellians, pretending only for political ends. For the king alone, as Campanella observes in chapter 18 of Atheism Defeated, and as among the Turks of our own day, is the purpose of the state. They know how great religion's power over people's minds is, and that, as Sabellicus says, a man without religion is like a horse without a bridle.[12161]
Source page 646 No way better to curb then superstition, to terrifie mens consciences, and to keep them in awe: they make new laws, statutes, invent new religions, ceremonies, as so many stalking horses, to their own ends. [12162]Hæc enim (religio) si falsa sit, dummodo vera credatur, animorum ferociam domat, libidines coercet, subditos principi obsequentes efficit.	There is no better restraint than superstition for terrifying people's consciences and keeping them in awe. They make new laws and statutes, invent new religions and ceremonies, all as so many screens for their own purposes. For this religion, even if false, provided it is believed true, tames fierce spirits, restrains desires, and makes subjects obedient to their prince.[12163]

[12158] Editor. Commonwealth means a political community or state. This qualification separates sincere religious government from the expedient uses of religion attacked around it. The next passage resumes immediately with "but most of them", introducing Burton's contrary judgement of the majority.

[12159] Burton. Source page 646, c: "Lipsius l.1.c.3." "Lipsius, book 1, chapter 3."

[12160] Burton. Source page 646, d: "Homo sine religione, sicut equus sine fræno." "A man without religion is like a horse without a bridle."

[12161] Editor. The opening continues Burton's distinction between sincere governors and cynical users of religion. Machiavellians is his hostile label for the latter. Solus Rex … Reipub. Finis means "the king alone is the end of the commonwealth"; the separated Latin phrases form one proposition, not a reference to a Sun King. Campanella's Atheismus triumphatus is cited at chapter 18; the precise wording awaits collation.

[12162] Burton. Source page 646, dagger: "Vaninus dial.52 de oraculis." "Vanini, dialogue 52, on oracles."

[12163] Editor. A stalking horse concealed a hunter's approach; figuratively, a pretext or screen for another purpose. Burton presents religious fear here as a means of restraint. The Vanini quotation grants political efficacy to a belief even if it is false; it does not establish that all religion is false.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Therefore (saith [12164]Polybius of Lycurgus) did he maintain ceremonies, not that he was superstitious himself, but that he perceived mortal men more apt to embrace Paradoxes, then ought else, and durst attempt no evil things for fear of the gods.	That is why, Polybius says of Lycurgus, he maintained religious ceremonies: not because he was superstitious himself, but because he saw that mortals were more inclined to embrace paradoxes than anything else, and dared attempt nothing evil for fear of the gods.[12165]
This was Zamolcus stratagem amongst the Thracians, Numa's plot, when he said he had conference with the Nymph Ægeria, and that of Sertorius with an Hart; To get more credit to their Decrees, by deriving them from the gods; or else they did all by divine instinct, which Nicholas Damascen well observes of Lycurgus, Solon, and Minos, they had their laws dictated, monte sacro, by Jupiter himself.	This was Zamolxis's stratagem among the Thracians; Numa's device when he said he had spoken with the nymph Egeria; and Sertorius's with a stag: to give their decrees greater authority by deriving them from the gods. Or else everything they did was divinely inspired, as Nicolaus of Damascus observes of Lycurgus, Solon and Minos: their laws were dictated on the sacred mountain by Jupiter himself.[12166]

[12164] Burton. Source page 646, e: "Lib.10. Ideo Lycurgus, &c. non quod ipse superstitiosus, sed quod videret mortales paradoxa facilius amplecti, nec res graves audere sine periculo deorum." "Book 10. Thus Lycurgus, and so on: not because he himself was superstitious, but because he saw that mortals more readily embraced paradoxes, and did not dare serious undertakings without danger from the gods."

[12165] Editor. Compare Polybius, Histories 10.2.8–12. Polybius says that people do not readily accept unfamiliar proposals or risk danger without hope of divine help. Burton's "more apt to embrace Paradoxes" and fear of committing evil change that reasoning. His Latin margin also diverges. Both printed versions are retained rather than silently replaced with Polybius's argument.

[12166] Editor. Burton groups traditions about Zamolxis, Numa's nymph Egeria and Sertorius's deer as examples of rulers claiming supernatural guidance. Hart means a male deer, though the familiar Sertorius story concerns a hind. His additional grouping of Lycurgus, Solon and Minos under Nicolaus of Damascus needs precise source collation; "on the sacred mountain" is the literal sense of monte sacro.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So Mahomet referred his new laws to the [12167]Angel Gabriel by whose direction he gave out they were made. Caligula in Dion fained himself to be familiar with Castor and Pollux, and many such, which kept those Romans under (who, as Machiavel proves, lib.1. disput. cap.11. & 12. were Religione maximè moti, most superstitious:) and did curb the people more by this means, then by force of arms, or severity of humane laws.	So Muhammad attributed his new laws to the angel Gabriel, under whose direction, he declared, they had been made. In Dio, Caligula pretended to be on familiar terms with Castor and Pollux, and there were many such devices which kept the Romans in subjection. For, as Machiavelli shows in Discourses 1.11–12, they were above all moved by religion, most superstitious. These means restrained the people more effectively than force of arms or the severity of human laws.[12168]
Sola plebecula eam agnoscebat (saith Vaninus dial.1. lib.4. de admirandis naturæ arcanis) speaking of Religion, quæ facile decipitur, magnates vero & Philosophi nequaquam, your Grandes and Philosophers had no such conceit, sed ad imperii conformationem & amplificationem, quam sine prætextu religionis tueri non poterant; and many thousands in all ages have held as much, Philosophers especially, animadvertebant hi semper hæc esse fabellas, attamen ob metum publicæ potestatis silere cogebantur; they were still silent for fear of Laws, &c.	Speaking of religion, Vanini says in On the Wonderful Secrets of Nature, book 4, dialogue 1: Only the easily deceived common crowd acknowledged it; the great and the philosophers did not at all. Your grandees and philosophers had no such belief, but used it to consolidate and enlarge their dominion, which they could not maintain without the pretext of religion. Many thousands in every age have held as much, especially philosophers: they always recognized these things as little fables, yet fear of the public authorities forced them to remain silent. They kept silent for fear of the laws, and so on.[12169]

[12167] Burton. Source page 646, star: “Clenardus epist.1. Novas leges suas ad Angelum Gabrielem referebat, quo monitore mentiebatur omnia se gerere.” “Clenardus, letter 1. He referred his new laws to the angel Gabriel, falsely claiming to do everything under his guidance.”

[12168] Editor. The claims about Muhammad’s revelation and Caligula’s intimacy with the Dioscuri are placed within Burton’s argument about political invention. The former, echoed by Clenardus in the margin, is hostile Christian polemic. Machiavelli’s Discourses 1.11–12 discuss Roman religion as a support for civic institutions and discipline.

[12169] Editor. Vanini’s On the Wonderful Secrets of Nature is cited by book and dialogue; its correspondence with the separately numbered dialogue 52 in the margin requires collation. Burton adopts the claim that the educated privately disbelieve what they publicly uphold. His separate English restatements of the Latin are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To this end that Syrian Phyrecides, Pythagoras his master, broached in the East amongst the Heathens, first the immortality of the Soul, as Trismegistus did in Egypt, with a many of fained Gods.	For this purpose Pherecydes of Syros, Pythagoras's teacher, first put forward the immortality of the soul among the pagans in the East, as Trismegistus did in Egypt, along with a host of invented gods.[12170]
Those French and Brittain Druids in the West first taught, saith [12171]Cæsar, non interire animas, but after death to go from one to another, that so they might encourage them to vertue.	Those Druids of France and Britain first taught in the West, Caesar says, that souls do not perish, but after death pass from one person to another, so that they might inspire courage.[12172]
'Twas for a politique end, and to this purpose the old Poets fained those Elysian fields, their Æacus, Minos, and Rhadamantus, their infernal judges, and those Stygian lakes, fiery Phlegetons, Pluto's kingdome, and variety of torments after death.[12173] Those that had done well, went to the Elysian fields, but evil doers to Cocytus, and to that burning lake of [12174]hell with fire and brimstone for ever to be tormented.	It was for a political purpose. With this aim the ancient poets invented the Elysian fields; Aeacus, Minos and Rhadamanthus, their judges below; the Stygian lakes, fiery Phlegethons, Pluto's kingdom, and the various torments after death. Those who had done good went to the Elysian fields; evildoers went to Cocytus and that burning lake of hell, to be tormented for ever with fire and brimstone.[12175]

[12170] Editor. Pherecydes was from the island of Syros: compare Diogenes Laertius 1.116–121. Burton's "Syrian" is retained on the left and clarified on the right. Trismegistus is Hermes Trismegistus, the legendary Egyptian sage. The claim that these figures invented immortality for political ends remains Burton's account.

[12171] Burton. Source page 646, dagger: "Lib.16. belli Gallici. Ut metu mortis neglecto, ad virtutem incitarent." "Gallic War, book 16. So that, disregarding the fear of death, they might be incited to courage."

[12172] Editor. Caesar, Gallic War 6.14.5, describes the Druids' teaching that souls pass after death from one person to another, encouraging courage by removing fear of death. The margin's book 16 is erroneous. Vertue here includes courage; the modern rendering brings out that context. Burton's statement of priority is not established by Caesar's passage.

[12173] Burton. Source page 646, f: "De his lege Lucianum de luctu Tom.1. Homer. Odyss.11 Virg. Æn.6." "On these matters read Lucian, On Mourning, volume 1; Homer, Odyssey 11; Virgil, Aeneid 6."

[12174] Burton. Source page 646, dagger: "Barathro sulfure & flammâ stagnante æternum demergebantur." "They were plunged for ever into an abyss pooled with sulphur and flame."

[12175] Editor. Elysium is the blessed afterlife; Aeacus, Minos and Rhadamanthus judge the dead. Styx, Phlegethon and Cocytus belong to the classical underworld. Burton combines them with Christian hell imagery. The nearby f reference is placed here with the classical catalogue; its body marker is not distinct in the scan.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis this which [12176]Plato labors for in his Phædon, & 9. de rep.	This is what Plato strives to establish in his Phaedo and book 9 of the Republic.[12177]
Source page 646–647 The Turks in their Alcoran, when they set down rewards, and several punishments for every particular vertue and vice, [12178]when they perswade men, that they that die in battle, shall go directly to heaven, but wicked livers to eternal torment, and all of all sorts (much like our Papistical Purgatory) for a set time shall be tortured in their graves, as appears by that tract which John Baptista Alfaqui that Mauritanian Priest, now turn'd Christian, hath written in his confutation of the Alcaron.	The Turks do the same in their Quran when they assign rewards and distinct punishments to every particular virtue and vice; when they persuade people that those who die in battle will go straight to heaven, but those who live wickedly to eternal torment, and that everyone of every kind will be tortured in the grave for a fixed time, much like our papist purgatory. So it appears from the tract written in refutation of the Quran by John Baptista Alfaqui, that Moorish priest now converted to Christianity.[12179]

[12176] Burton. Source page 646, dagger: "Et 3. de repub. omnis institutio adolescentum eo referenda ut de deo bene sentiant ob commune bonum." "And Republic 3: all instruction of the young should be directed towards their thinking well of God for the common good."

[12177] Editor. Plato's Phaedo ends with an account of the afterlife; the Myth of Er closes Republic 10, not 9. The opening of Republic 3, cited in the margin, requires stories that honour gods and parents, then rejects terrifying portrayals of Hades so that guardians will not fear death. It therefore needs qualification as support for Burton's argument about governing through fear of punishment. The book numbers remain as printed; his exact chain of sources is unresolved.

[12178] Burton. Source page 646, g: "Boterus."

[12179] Editor. Burton introduces the account of grave punishment through an anti-Islamic tract attributed to John Baptista Alfaqui, described as a converted Moorish religious scholar. It should not be treated as a direct quotation from the Quran. Compare Jami al-Tirmidhi 1071, which names the questioning angels al-Munkar and al-Nakir and distinguishes the believer's rest from the hypocrite's punishment; Burton's claim that everyone is tortured differs from that account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 647 After a mans death two black Angels, Nunquir and Nequir (so they call them) come to him to his grave and punish him for his precedent sins; if he lived well, they torture him the less; if ill, perindesinentes cruciatus ad diem judicii, they incessantly punish him to the day of judgement. Nemo viventium qui ad horum mentionem non totus horret & contremiscit, the thought of this crucifies them all their lives long, and makes them spend their days in fasting and prayer, ne mala hæc contingant, &c.	After a man's death, two black angels, Nunquir and Nequir, as they call them, come to his grave and punish him for his former sins. If he lived well, they torture him less; if badly, with unceasing torments until judgement day: they punish him continually until the day of judgement. No living person hears them mentioned without shuddering and trembling all over. The thought of this torments them throughout their lives and makes them spend their days in fasting and prayer, so that these evils may not befall them, and so on.[12180]
A Tartar Prince, saith Marcus Polus, lib.1. cap.28. called Senex de montibus, the better to establish his government amongst his subjects, and to keep them in awe, found out a convenient place in a pleasant valley, environed with hills, in [12181]which he made a delicious Park full of odoriferous flowers and fruits, and a Palace of all worldly contents, that could possibly be devised, Musick, Pictures, variety of meats, &c. and chose out a certain yong man, whom with a [12182]soporiferous potion he so benummed, that he perceived nothing: and so fast asleep as he was, caused him to be conveyed into this fair garden.	A Tartar prince called the Old Man of the Mountains, says Marco Polo in book 1, chapter 28, wished to strengthen his rule over his subjects and keep them in awe. He found a suitable spot in a pleasant valley surrounded by hills, where he made a delightful park full of fragrant flowers and fruits, and a palace containing every worldly pleasure that could possibly be devised: music, pictures, varied foods, and so on. He selected a certain young man and stupefied him with a sleeping draught until he perceived nothing; then had him carried, fast asleep, into this beautiful garden.[12183]

[12180] Editor. The scan reads perindesinentes, divided at the line end after perinde-. It is malformed or corrupt Latin; a non-ceasing sense is supplied from Burton's immediately following English. The original reading is retained, with its exact source form unresolved. Nunquir and Nequir are Burton's forms of Munkar and Nakir.

[12181] Burton. Source page 647, h: "Citra aquam; viridarium plantavit maximum & pulcherrimum, floribus odoriferis & suavibus plenum, &c." "On this side of the water he planted a very large and beautiful garden, full of fragrant and delightful flowers, and so on."

[12182] Burton. Source page 647, i: "Potum quendam dedit quo inescatus, & gravi sopore oppressus, in viridarium interim ducebatur &c." "He gave him a certain drink; enticed by it and overcome by deep sleep, he was meanwhile carried into the garden, and so on."

[12183] Editor. Marco Polo's story of the Old Man of the Mountain appears in chapters 23–24 of the Yule–Cordier English edition, as a report heard from people of the region. Chapter numbering varies. Burton calls him a Tartar prince, compresses the narrative to one young man, and adds a corresponding artificial hell. The primary parallel establishes the garden story, not the truth of those additional details.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Where after he had lived a while in all such pleasures a sensual man could desire, [12184]He cast him into a sleep again, and brought him forth, that when he awaked he might tell others he had been in Paradise. The like he did for Hell, and by this means brought his people to subjection.	After the young man had lived there for a while amid every pleasure a sensual man could desire, he put him to sleep again and brought him out, so that when he awoke he might tell others he had been in Paradise. He did the same for hell, and by this means brought his people into subjection.
Because Heaven and Hell are mentioned in the Scriptures, and to be beleeved necessary by Christians: so cunningly can the Divel and his ministers in imitation of true Religion, counterfeit and forge the like, to circumvent and delude his superstitious followers. Many such tricks and impostures are acted by Politicians, in China especially, but with what effect I will discourse in the Symptomes.	Because heaven and hell are mentioned in Scripture and Christians must necessarily believe in them, the Devil and his ministers can cunningly imitate true religion, counterfeiting and inventing the like to ensnare and deceive his superstitious followers. Political schemers practise many such tricks and frauds, especially in China; I will discuss their effects under the symptoms.[12185]
Next to Politicians, if I may distinguish them, are some of our priests, (who make Religion Policy) if not far beyond them, for they domineer over Princes and Statesmen themselves. Carnificinam exercent, one saith they tyrannize over mens consciences more then any other tormentors whatsoever, partly for their commodity and gain; Religionum enim omnium abusus (as [12186]Postellus holds) quæstus scilicet sacrificum in causa est: for soveraignty, credit, to maintain their state and reputation, out of Ambition and Avarice, which are their chief supporters:	Next to political schemers, if I may distinguish the two, come some of our priests, who turn religion into policy. Indeed they go far beyond them, for they lord it over princes and statesmen themselves. They practise butchery, one says; they tyrannize over people's consciences more than any other tormentors whatsoever, partly for their own advantage and gain. For the abuse of all religions, as Postel holds, is caused by the profit made by the priests. They do it for supremacy and prestige, to maintain their position and reputation, out of ambition and avarice, their chief supports.[12187]

[12184] Burton. Source page 647, k: "Atque iterum memoratum potum bibendum exhibuit, & sic extra Paradisum reduxit, ut cum evigilaret, sopore soluto, &c." "Again he gave him the aforesaid drink, and so brought him back out of Paradise, so that when he woke, released from sleep, and so on."

[12185] Editor. The heavenly garden is explained by Burton as a counterfeit of Christian truth. His causal explanation invokes the Devil; the reference to China anticipates the subsection on symptoms. These are his religious and interpretive claims.

[12186] Burton. Source page 647, dagger: "Lib.1. de orb. Concord. cap.7." "On the Concord of the World, book 1, chapter 7."

[12187] Editor. Politicians here means practitioners of statecraft, particularly those who use religion instrumentally. Commodity means private advantage. Carnificinam exercent literally means "they practise butchery" or "act as executioners." Postellus is Guillaume Postel, whose On the Concord of the World is cited in the margin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What have they not made the common people beleeve? Impossibilities in nature, incredible things, what devices, traditions, ceremonies, have they not invented in all ages to keep men in obedience, to inrich themselves? Quibus quæstui sunt capti superstitione animi, as [12188]Livy saith.	What have they not made ordinary people believe? Things impossible in nature, things beyond belief! What devices, traditions and ceremonies have they not invented in every age to keep people obedient and enrich themselves? They profit from minds held captive by superstition, as Livy says.[12189]
Those Ægyptian priests of old got all the soveraignty into their hands, and knowing, as [12190]Curtius insinuates, nulla res efficacius multitudinem regit quam superstitio; melius vatibus quam ducibus parent, vanâ religione capti, etiam impotentes fœminæ; the common people will sooner obey Priests then Captains, and nothing so forcible as superstition, or better then blind zeal to rule a multitude; have so terrified and gulled them, that it is incredible to relate.	Those ancient Egyptian priests took all sovereign power into their hands. Knowing, as Curtius suggests, that nothing rules a multitude more effectively than superstition; when captured by empty religion, even unruly women obey seers better than leaders—that ordinary people will obey priests sooner than captains, and nothing is more powerful than superstition, or better than blind zeal, for ruling a crowd—they so terrified and deceived them that the account is scarcely believable.[12191]

[12188] Burton. Source page 647, l: “Lib.4.” “Book 4.”

[12189] Editor. Livy 4.30 describes people who profited from minds held captive by superstition during a public crisis. Burton uses the phrase as a general account of priestly enrichment. The rhetorical questions extend his indictment; they are not findings about every religious institution.

[12190] Burton. Source page 647, m: “Lib.4.” “Book 4.”

[12191] Editor. Curtius Rufus, History of Alexander 4.10, describes Egyptian interpreters reassuring soldiers after a lunar eclipse. His sentence concerns the crowd, not specifically women. Burton’s Latin rearranges the passage and adds etiam impotentes fœminæ, retained and translated here. His ensuing English restatement is also retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 647–648 All nations almost have been besotted in this kind: amongst our Brittaines and old Gauls the Druides; Magi in Persia; Philosophers in Greece; Chaldeans amongst the Orientali; Brachmanni in India; Gymnosophists in Æthiopia; the Turditanes in Spain; Augures in Rome, have insulted; Apollo's Priests in Greece, Phœbades and Pythonissæ, by their oracles and phantasms; Amphiarius and his companions; now Mahometan and Pagan Priests, what can they not effect? How do they not infatuate the world?	Almost every nation has been stupefied in this way. Among our Britons and the ancient Gauls the Druids have lorded it over people; the Magi in Persia; philosophers in Greece; Chaldeans among eastern peoples; Brahmans in India; gymnosophists in Ethiopia; the Turditanes in Spain; augurs in Rome; Apollo's priests in Greece, the Phoebades and Pythonissae, through their oracles and apparitions; Amphiaraus and his companions; and now Muslim and pagan priests. What can they not accomplish? In what way do they not make fools of the world?[12192]
Source page 648 Adeo ubique (as [12193]Scaliger writes of the Mahometan Priests) tum gentium tum locorum, gens ista sacrorum ministra, vulgi secat spes, ad ea quæ ipsi fingunt somnia, so cunningly can they gull the commons in all places and countries.	So everywhere, among all peoples and in all places, as Scaliger writes of Muslim priests, that tribe which ministers in sacred matters trims the people's hopes to the dreams they themselves invent. So cunningly can they deceive ordinary people in every place and country.[12194]

[12192] Editor. This catalogue combines priesthoods, diviners and philosophical schools. Magi are Persian religious specialists; Brahmans, Indian religious teachers; gymnosophists, "naked philosophers." Phoebades and Pythonissae are women inspired by Apollo; Amphiaraus is a prophetic hero. Turditanes is retained as Burton's uncertain designation, rather than silently converted into a known priesthood.

[12193] Burton. Source page 648, dagger: "Exercit.228." "Exercise 228."

[12194] Editor. Julius Caesar Scaliger's Exercises, no. 228, is the marginal authority. The Latin concerns people who administer religious rites manipulating popular hopes through their own fictions. Burton immediately supplies his own English summary. Infatuate means make foolish, not inspire romantic attraction.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But above all others, that high Priest of Rome, the dam of that monstrous and superstitious brood, the bull-bellowing Pope, which now rageth in the West, that three-headed Cerberus hath plaid his part. [12195]Whose religion at this day is meer policie, a state wholly composed of superstition and wit, and needs nothing but wit and superstition to maintain it, that useth Colledges and religious houses to as good purpose as Forts and Castles, and doth more at this day	But above all others, that high priest of Rome, the mother of that monstrous and superstitious brood, the bull-bellowing pope who now rages in the West, that three-headed Cerberus, has played his part. His religion today is pure policy: a state composed entirely of superstition and cunning, needing only cunning and superstition to maintain it. He uses colleges and religious houses as effectively as forts and castles, and accomplishes more today[12196]
by a company of scribling Parasites, fiery spirited Friers, zealous Anachorites, hypocritical Confessors, and those Pretorian souldiers, his Janisary Jesuits, that dissociable society, as [12197]Langius terms it, postremus diaboli conatus, & sæculi excrementum, that now stand in the fore front of the battle, will have a monopoly of, and ingrosse all other learning, but domineer in Divinity,	through a company of scribbling parasites, fiery friars, zealous anchorites, hypocritical confessors, and those Praetorian soldiers, his Janissary Jesuits—that unsociable society, as Langius calls it, the Devil's last effort and the excrement of the age—who now stand in the front line of battle, seek to monopolize and engross all other learning, and lord it over theology,[12198]
[12199]Excipiunt soli totius vulnera belli,	They alone receive the wounds of the whole war,[12200]

[12195] Burton. Source page 648, n: "S. Ed. Sands." "Sir Edwin Sandys."

[12196] Editor. The following is sustained anti-Catholic invective. "Dam" makes the pope the breeding mother of a monstrous brood; "bull-bellowing" puns on papal bulls, formal documents, and a bull's roar. Cerberus is the three-headed hound of the classical underworld. Burton attributes the ensuing description to Sir Edwin Sandys.

[12197] Burton. Source page 648, star: "In consult. de princ. inter provinc. Europ." "In the Consultation concerning precedence among the provinces of Europe [abbreviated title]."

[12198] Editor. Anchorites are religious recluses. The Praetorian Guard and the Ottoman Janissaries supply military comparisons for the Jesuits. "Dissociable society" is a hostile play on the Society of Jesus. The Langius reference is abbreviated and its precise work and passage remain to be identified; the translation of its title is provisional.

[12199] Burton. Source page 648, a: "Lucian."

[12200] Editor. The printed attribution is Lucian. Compare Lucan, Civil War 6.204–205: tot uolnera belli / solus obit, describing Scaeva alone sustaining the battle's many wounds. This is a related image with different wording, not an identification of Burton's line or grounds for silently changing Lucian to Lucan. The immediate source remains unlocated. Burton applies the military image to the Jesuits as the pope's foremost combatants.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and fight alone almost (for the rest are but his dromedaries and asses) then ever he could have done by garrisons and armies. What power of Prince, or pœnal law, be it never so strict, could enforce men to do that which for conscience sake they will voluntarily undergo? As to fast from all flesh, abstain from marriage, rise to their prayers at midnight, whip themselves, with stupend fasting and penance, abandon the world, wilfull poverty, perform canonical and blind obedience, to prostrate their goods, fortunes, bodies, lives, and offer up themselves at their superiors feet, at his command?	and fight almost alone (for the rest are merely his camels and asses), than he could ever have accomplished through garrisons and armies. What princely power or penal law, however strict, could force people to do what they will voluntarily endure for conscience's sake? To abstain from all meat, refrain from marriage, rise to pray at midnight, whip themselves, practise astonishing fasting and penance, abandon the world, choose poverty, render canonical and blind obedience, lay down their goods, fortunes, bodies and lives, and offer themselves at their superior's feet, at his command?[12201]
What so powerfull an engine as superstition? which they right well perceiving, are of no religion at all themselves: Primum enim (as Calvin rightly suspects, the tenor and practice of their life proves) arcanæ illius Theologiæ, quod apud eos regnat, caput est, nullum esse deum, they hold there is no God, as Leo 10. did, Hildebrand the Magician, Alexander 6. Julius 2. meer Atheists,	What instrument is as powerful as superstition? They see this very well, yet have no religion themselves. For the first principle of that secret theology which rules among them, as Calvin rightly suspects, and the course and conduct of their lives prove, is that there is no God. They hold that there is no God, as Leo X did, Hildebrand the magician, Alexander VI and Julius II: outright atheists.[12202]

[12201] Editor. The rest are likened to beasts of burden. Burton's list joins voluntary ascetic disciplines and religious obedience to his charge of manipulation. Flesh means meat; wilfull poverty means poverty deliberately chosen. The argument attacks the direction and motives of these practices, not merely their physical severity.

[12202] Editor. The Latin, attributed to Calvin without a precise reference, accuses the inner circle of denying God. Burton then names Leo X, Hildebrand (Gregory VII), Alexander VI and Julius II. "Magician" and "atheists" are allegations within his anti-papal polemic, not established descriptions of their beliefs.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and which the common proverb amongst them approves. [12203]The worst Christians of Italy are the Romans, of the Romans the Priests are wildest, the lewdest Priests are preferred to be Cardinals, and the baddest man amongst the Cardinals is chosen to be Pope; that is an Epicure, as most part the Popes are, Infidels and Lucianists, for so they think and believe; and what is said of Christ to be fables and impostures, of heaven and hell, day of Judgement, Paradise, Immortality of the soul, are all,	The common proverb among them confirms it: The worst Christians in Italy are the Romans; among Romans, the priests are the most dissolute; the wickedest priests are promoted to cardinal; and the worst man among the cardinals is chosen pope—that is, an Epicure, as popes for the most part are, unbelievers and Lucianists, for this is what they think and believe. They consider what is said of Christ to be fable and fraud, and everything about heaven and hell, judgement day, Paradise and the immortality of the soul to be[12204]
[12205]Rumores vacui, verbaque inania, Et par sollicito fabula somnio.	Empty rumours and meaningless words, A story like an anxious dream.[12206]
Source page 648–649 Dreams, toys, and old wives tales. Yet as so many [12207]whetstones to make other tools cut, but cut not themselves, though they be of no religion at all, they will make others most devout and superstitious, by promises and threats, compel, enforce from, and lead them by the nose like so many bears in a line;	Dreams, trifles and old wives' tales. Yet, like so many whetstones that make other tools cut but do not cut themselves, although they have no religion at all, they will make others exceedingly devout and superstitious. With promises and threats they compel them, extort from them, and lead them by the nose like so many bears in a line.[12208]

[12203] Burton. Source page 648, dagger: "S. Ed. Sands in his Relation." "Sir Edwin Sandys in his Relation."

[12204] Editor. Lewd here means wicked or morally corrupt. Epicure and Lucianist are polemical labels for sensuality and religious scepticism. The proverb is attributed to Sandys; Burton then turns its attack on moral conduct into a claim of secret unbelief. The sweeping assertion remains his.

[12205] Burton. Source page 648, p: "Seneca."

[12206] Editor. Seneca, Trojan Women 405–406: the chorus calls the terrors of the underworld empty stories comparable to an anxious dream. Burton borrows the dramatic speech to describe the unbelief he imputes to church leaders. The two lines and his English restatement remain separate.

[12207] Burton. Source page 648, q: "Vice cotus, acutum Reddere quæ ferrum valet, exors ipsa secandi." "Like a whetstone, which can sharpen iron but cannot itself cut."

[12208] Editor. The whetstone comparison comes from Horace, Art of Poetry 304–305. The margin prints cotus where Horace has cotis; that reading is retained. Horace uses it of a critic who sharpens other writers' talents; Burton turns it into an image of leaders who make others devout while remaining irreligious themselves. "Enforce from" is understood as extract or extort from them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 649 When as their end is not to propagate the Church, advance Gods Kingdome, seek his glory or common good, but to enrich themselves, to enlarge their territories, to domineer and compel them to stand in awe, to live in subjection to the See of Rome. For what otherwise care they? Si mundus vult decipi, decipiatur, 'tis fit it should be so.	Their purpose is not to spread the Church, advance God's kingdom, seek his glory or the common good, but to enrich themselves, enlarge their territories, dominate people and force them to live in awe and subjection to the See of Rome. What else do they care about? If the world wishes to be deceived, let it be deceived; it is fitting that it should be so.[12209]
And for which [12210]Austin cites Varro to maintain his Roman religion, we may better apply to them: multa vera, quæ vulgus scire non est utile; pleraque falsa, quæ tamen aliter existimare populum expedit; some things are true, some false, which for their own ends they will not have the gullish commonalty take notice of.	What Augustine cites from Varro in defence of his Roman religion we may apply still better to them: many things are true which it is not useful for the people to know; many are false, yet it is expedient for the people to think otherwise. Some things are true and some false, and for their own purposes they will not let the credulous common people recognize them.[12211]

[12209] Editor. The Latin maxim means "If the world wishes to be deceived, let it be deceived." Burton speaks in the voice he attributes to cynical church leaders. See of Rome means the papal office and its jurisdiction.

[12210] Burton. Source page 649, dagger: "De civ. Dei lib.4. cap.31." "City of God, book 4, chapter 31."

[12211] Editor. Augustine, City of God 4.31, reports Varro's view that some religious truths should be withheld and false popular beliefs may be expedient. Augustine criticizes this policy; Burton applies the criticism to the Roman Church. Gullish commonalty means credulous ordinary people.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As well may witness their intolerable covetousness, strange forgeries, fopperies, fooleries, unrighteous subtleties, impostures, illusions, new doctrines, paradoxes, traditions, false miracles, which they have still forged, to enthral, circumvent and subjugate them, to maintain their own estates. [12212]One while by Buls, Pardons, Indulgences, and their doctrine of good works, that they be meritorious, hope of heaven, by that means they have so fleece the commonalty, and spurred on this free superstitious horse, that he runs himself blind, and is an Asse to carry burdens.	Their intolerable greed bears witness: their strange forgeries, absurdities, follies, wicked subtleties, frauds, illusions, new doctrines, paradoxes, traditions and false miracles, which they have continually fabricated to enslave, ensnare and subjugate people, maintaining their own possessions. At one time, through bulls, pardons, indulgences, their doctrine that good works earn merit, and hope of heaven, they have so fleeced ordinary people and spurred on this willing, superstitious horse that he runs himself blind and becomes an ass to carry burdens.[12213]
They have so amplified Peters patrimony, that from a poor Bishop, he is become Rex Regum, Dominus dominantium, a Demi-god, as his Canonists make him (Felinus and the rest) above God himself. And for his wealth and [12214]temporalities, is not inferiour to many Kings; his [12215]Cardinals Princes companions;	They have so enlarged Peter's patrimony that, from a poor bishop, he has become King of kings, Lord of lords, a demigod—as his canon lawyers, Felinus and the rest, make him—above God himself. In wealth and worldly possessions he is not inferior to many kings; his cardinals are the peers of princes.[12216]

[12212] Burton. Source page 649, r: "Seeking their own saith Paul, not Christs."

[12213] Editor. Bulls are papal documents; pardons and indulgences concern remission of penalties for sin. Burton joins them with the doctrine that good works have merit and with hope of heaven, presenting the combination as exploitation. The free horse is willing and easily overdriven; "runs himself blind" heightens the image.

[12214] Burton. Source page 649, s: "He hath the Dutchy of Spoledo in Italy, the Marquisate of Anchona, beside Rome, and the territories adjacent, Bologne, Ferrara, &c. Avignion in France, &c."

[12215] Burton. Source page 649, t: "Estote fratres mei, & principes hujus mundi." "Be my brothers, and princes of this world."

[12216] Editor. Peter's patrimony means the temporal possessions of the papacy. "King of kings" and "Lord of lords" borrow biblical titles. Felinus is the canon-law authority named by Burton; the precise passage supporting his accusation has not been located. Temporalities are worldly property and revenues. Burton's marginal exhortation "Be my brothers, and princes of this world" is presented as a sardonic motto, without a source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and in every kingdome almost, Abbots, Priors, Monks, Friers, &c. and his Clergy have ingrossed a [12217]third part, half, in some places all into their hands. Three Princes Electors in Germany Bishops; besides Magdeburge, Spire, Saltsburge, Breme, Bamberge, &c.	In almost every kingdom, abbots, priors, monks, friars and the rest of his clergy have gathered a third, a half, and in some places everything into their hands. Three prince-electors in Germany are bishops, besides those of Magdeburg, Speyer, Salzburg, Bremen, Bamberg, and so on.[12218]
In France, as Bodine lib. de repub. gives us to understand, their revenues are twelve millions, and three hundred thousand levres; and of twelve parts of the revenues in France, the Church possesseth seven. The Jesuits, a new sect begun in this age, have as [12219]Middendorpius and [12220]Pelargus reckon up three or foure hundred Colledges in Europe, and more revenues then many Princes. In France, as Arnoldus proves, in thirty years they have got bis centum librarum millia annua, 200000l. I say nothing of the rest of their orders.	In France, as Bodin tells us in his book On the Commonwealth, their revenues amount to twelve million three hundred thousand livres; and of the twelve parts of France's revenues, the Church possesses seven. The Jesuits, a new sect begun in this age, have three or four hundred colleges in Europe, according to the reckoning of Middendorpius and Pelargus, and greater revenues than many princes. In France, as Arnoldus shows, within thirty years they have acquired two hundred thousand pounds a year: £200,000. I say nothing of their other orders.[12221]

[12217] Burton. Source page 649, u: "The Laity suspect their greatness, witness those statutes of mortmain."

[12218] Editor. The three ecclesiastical electors were the archbishops of Mainz, Trier and Cologne; Burton then lists other episcopal territories. Mortmain refers to land held perpetually by an ecclesiastical or other corporate body, and to restrictions on such transfers. His fractions and revenue figures are reported estimates and require independent collation, not acceptance as a statistical survey.

[12219] Burton. Source page 649, star: "Lib.8. de Academ." "On Academies, book 8."

[12220] Burton. Source page 649, dagger: "Præfat. lib. de paradox. Jesuit. Rom. provincia habet Col.36. Neapol.23 Veneta13. Lucit.15. India orient.27. Brasil.20 &c." "Preface to the book on Jesuit paradoxes. The Roman province has 36 colleges; Naples, 23; Venice, 13; Lusitania, 15; the East Indies, 27; Brazil, 20, and so on."

[12221] Editor. Bodine is Jean Bodin; livres are French monetary units. Middendorpius and Pelargus supply Burton's college counts. "This age" is Burton's own period, not the date of this modernization. His quoted annual 200,000 pounds repeats the Latin figure; both remain, and no conversion into present-day money is attempted.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We have had in England, as Armachanus demonstrates, above thirty thousand Friers at once, and as [12222]Speed collects out of Lelande and others, almost 600 religious houses, and neer two hundred thousand pound in revenues of the old rent belonging to them, besides Images of Gold, Silver, plate, furniture, goods and ornaments, as [12223]Weever calculates, and esteems them at the dissolution of Abbies, worth a million of gold.	In England, as Armachanus demonstrates, we have had more than thirty thousand friars at once. As Speed gathers from Leland and others, there were almost six hundred religious houses, with nearly two hundred thousand pounds in revenue at the old rental valuation, besides images of gold and silver, precious metal vessels, furniture, goods and ornaments. Weever calculates these possessions and estimates their worth at the dissolution of the abbeys at a million in gold.[12224]
Source page 649–650 How many Towns in every kingdome hath superstition enriched? What a deal of mony by musty reliques, Images, Idolatry, have their Mass-Priests ingrossed, and what sums have they scraped by their other tricks! Lauretum in Italy, Walsingham in England, in those days, Ubi omnia auro nitent, saith Erasmus, S. Thomas Shrine, &c. may witness. [12225]Delphos so renowned of old in Greece for Apollo's oracle, Delos commune conciliabulum & emporium sola religione munitum; Dodona, whose fame and wealth were sustained by religion, were not so rich, so famous.	How many towns in every kingdom has superstition enriched? What heaps of money their Mass-priests have amassed through musty relics, images and idolatry, and what sums they have scraped together through their other tricks! Loreto in Italy, Walsingham in England in those days—where everything gleams with gold, as Erasmus says—Saint Thomas's shrine, and the rest, can bear witness. Delphi, once so renowned in Greece for Apollo's oracle; Delos, a common meeting place and marketplace protected by religion alone; and Dodona, whose fame and wealth were sustained by religion, were neither so rich nor so famous.[12226]

[12222] Burton. Source page 649, dagger: "In his Chronic vit. Hen.8." "In his Chronicle, life of Henry VIII."

[12223] Burton. Source page 649, star: "15. cap of his funeral monuments." "Chapter 15 of his Funeral Monuments."

[12224] Editor. Armachanus is Richard FitzRalph, archbishop of Armagh; Speed, Leland and Weever are English historical and antiquarian authorities. Old rent means the older assessed rental income. The number of houses, annual income and value of moveable goods are distinct measures. "A million of gold" leaves the denomination unspecified; it is not silently changed into pounds.

[12225] Burton. Source page 649, dagger: "Pausanias in Laconicis lib.3. Idem de Achaicis lib.7. cujus summæ opes, & unde inclyta fama." "Pausanias, Laconia, book 3; the same author, Achaea, book 7: its immense wealth, and the source of its renowned fame."

[12226] Editor. Lauretum is Loreto; Saint Thomas's shrine is Becket's at Canterbury. In Erasmus's Colloquies, A Pilgrimage for Religion's Sake, Ogygius describes Walsingham's small wooden chapel: adeo gemmis, auro argentoque nitent omnia, "everything gleams so with gems, gold and silver." Burton shortens this to gold alone. The passage supports the chapel's splendour, not his comparison of its wealth with Delphi, Delos and Dodona. The combined Pausanias references remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 650 If they can get but a relique of some Saint, the Virgin Maries picture, idols or the like, that City is for ever made, it needs no other maintenance. Now if any of these their impostures, or jugling tricks be controverted, or called in question: If a magnanimous or zealous Luther, an heroical Luther, as [12227]Dithmarus cals him, dare touch the Monks bellies, all is in a combustion, all is in an uprore: Demetrius and his associates are ready to pull him in pieces, to keep up their trades, [12228]Great is Diana of the Ephesians: With a mighty shout of two hours long they will roar and not be pacified.	If they can obtain even a relic of some saint, a picture of the Virgin Mary, idols or the like, that city's fortune is made for ever; it needs no other support. Now if any of their frauds or juggling tricks is disputed or questioned—if a generous-spirited or zealous Luther, a heroic Luther, as Dithmarus calls him, dares threaten the monks' bellies—everything is in a blaze, everything in uproar. Demetrius and his associates stand ready to tear him apart to preserve their trades: Great is Diana of the Ephesians! With a mighty shout lasting two hours they will roar and refuse to be pacified.[12229]
Now for their authority, what by auricular confession, satisfaction, penance, Peters keys, thundrings, excommunications, &c. roaring buls, this high Priest of Rome, shaking his Gorgons head, hath so terrified the soule of many a silly man, insulted over majesty it self, and swaggered generally over all Europe for many ages, and still doth to some, holding them as yet in slavish subjection, as never tyrannizing Spaniards did by their poor Negroes, or Turks by their gally-slaves.	As for their authority: through private confession, satisfaction, penance, Peter's keys, thunderings, excommunications and roaring bulls, this high priest of Rome, shaking his Gorgon's head, has terrified many a simple person's soul, trampled on majesty itself, and swaggered over almost all Europe for many ages. He still does so to some, keeping them in a servile subjection greater than that in which tyrannical Spaniards ever held the poor Africans they enslaved, or Turks their galley slaves.[12230]

[12227] Burton. Source page 650, star: "Exercit. Eth. Colleg.3. disp.3." "Ethical Exercises, college 3, disputation 3."

[12228] Burton. Source page 650, dagger: "Act.19.28." "Acts 19:28."

[12229] Editor. To touch the monks' bellies is to threaten their livelihood. Burton compares resistance to Luther with the silversmith Demetrius's defence of the Ephesian shrine trade in Acts 19:23–41. Verse 28 supplies the cry; verse 34 supplies the duration of about two hours. Diana is the traditional Latin name used for the Artemis of the narrative.

[12230] Editor. Auricular confession is private spoken confession to a priest; satisfaction and penance concern acts of reparation. Peter's keys symbolize authority to bind and loose. A Gorgon's head evokes a sight that petrifies its beholder. Burton's comparison with enslaved Africans and galley slaves is an extreme rhetorical claim about religious coercion, not a measured comparison of their conditions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12231]The Bishop of Rome (saith Stapleton, a parasite of his, de mag. Eccles. lib.2. cap.1.) hath done that without arms, which those Roman Emperours could never atchieve with forty legions of souldiers, deposed Kings, and crowned them again with his foot, made friends, and corrected at his pleasure, &c. [12232]'Tis a wonder, saith Machiavel, Florentinæ hist. lib.1. what slavery King Henry the second endured for the death of Th. Becket, what things he was enjoyned by the Pope, and how he submitted himself to do that which in our times a private man would not endure, and all through superstition.	The bishop of Rome, says his flatterer Stapleton in On the Greatness of the Church, 2.1, has accomplished without arms what the Roman emperors could never achieve with forty legions of soldiers: deposed kings and crowned them again with his foot, reconciled enemies and chastised at his pleasure, and so on. It is astonishing, says Machiavelli in Florentine Histories, book 1, what servitude King Henry II endured for the death of Thomas Becket, what the pope commanded him to do, and how he submitted to things that in our times a private man would not endure—all through superstition.[12233]
[12234]Henry the fourth, deposed of his Empire, stood bare-footed with his wife at the gates of Canossus. [12235]Fredericke the Emperour was troden on by Alexander the third. Another held Adrians stirrup, King John kissed the knees of Pandulphus the Popes Legat, &c.	Henry IV, deposed from his empire, stood barefoot with his wife at the gates of Canossa. Emperor Frederick was trodden on by Alexander III. Another held Adrian's stirrup; King John kissed the knees of Pandulph, the pope's legate, and so on.[12236]

[12231] Burton. Source page 650, x: "Pontifex Romanus prorsus inermis regibus terræ jura dat, ad regna evehit ad pacem cogit, & peccantes castigat, &c. quod imperatores Romani 40. legionibus armati non effecerunt." "The Roman pontiff, completely unarmed, lays down laws for the kings of the earth, raises them to thrones, compels them to peace, and chastises offenders, and so on: what the Roman emperors, armed with forty legions, did not accomplish."

[12232] Burton. Source page 650, y: "Mirum quanta passus sit H.2. quomodo se submisit, ea se facturum pollicitus, quorum hodie ne privatus quidem partem faceret." "It is astonishing how much Henry II endured, how he submitted and promised to do things of which even a private person today would not do a part."

[12233] Editor. Stapleton's praise of papal authority is quoted through Burton's hostile framing; the title is abbreviated. Machiavelli, Florentine Histories 1, recounts Henry II's submission following Becket's death and contrasts it with what a private person would accept in his own time. "All through superstition" is Burton's explanatory conclusion.

[12234] Burton. Source page 650, z: "Sigonius 9. hist. Ital." "Sigonius, History of Italy, book 9."

[12235] Burton. Source page 650, a: "Curio lib.4. Fox Martyrol." "Curio, book 4; Foxe, Martyrology."

[12236] Editor. Burton gathers familiar accounts of rulers' humiliation before popes: Henry IV at Canossa, Frederick and Alexander III, the holding of Adrian's stirrup, and John before the legate Pandulph. His "another" should not be taken as a secure identification of a different emperor. The precise forms of these stories in Sigonius, Curio and Foxe remain for collation; the dramatic trampling episode is reported as Burton's claim.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What made so many thousand Christians travel from France, Brittain, &c. into the Holy land, spend such huge summs of mony, go a pilgrimage so familiarly to Jerusalem, to creep and couch, but slavish superstition? What makes them so freely venture their lives, to leave their native countries, to go seek martyrdome in the Indies, but superstition? to be assassinates, to meet death, murder Kings, but a false perswasion of merit, of canonical or blind obedience which they instill into them, and animate them by strange illusions, hope of being Martyrs and Saints? Such pretty feats can the Divel work by Priests, and so well for their own advantage can they play their parts.	What made so many thousands of Christians travel from France, Britain and elsewhere into the Holy Land, spend such enormous sums, go so often on pilgrimage to Jerusalem, crawl and crouch in submission, but servile superstition? What makes them so readily risk their lives, leave their native countries and seek martyrdom in the Indies, but superstition? What makes them become assassins, face death and murder kings, but a false conviction of merit, of canonical or blind obedience, instilled into them, and encouragement through strange illusions and the hope of becoming martyrs and saints? Such fine tricks can the Devil perform through priests, and so skilfully can they play their parts for their own advantage.[12237]
And if it were not yet enough, by Priests and Politicians to delude mankind, and crucifie the souls of men, he hath more actors in his Tragœdy, more irons in the fire, another Sceane of Hereticks, factious, ambitious wits, insolent spirits, Schismaticks, Impostors, false Prophets, blind guides,	And if it were still not enough to deceive mankind through priests and politicians, and torture people's souls, he has more actors in his tragedy, more irons in the fire: another scene of heretics, factional and ambitious minds, arrogant spirits, schismatics, impostors, false prophets, and blind guides;[12238]

[12237] Editor. Familiarly means habitually or commonly; creep and couch means crawl and crouch in submission. Burton's closing questions combine pilgrimage, overseas martyrdom and assassination under his category of superstition and blind obedience. His accusation concerning motives should not be read as proof that these distinct activities shared one cause.

[12238] Editor. The Devil remains the subject of "he." Politicians means practitioners of statecraft. Singularitie is the desire to stand apart; crotchets are fanciful notions. Burton moves from rulers and priests to religious dissenters, treating conflict through the categories of his own confessional polemic.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 650–651 that out of pride, singularity, vainglory, blind zeal, cause much more madness yet, set all in an uprore by their new doctrines, paradoxes, figments, crotchets, make new divisions, subdivisions, new sects, oppose one superstition to another, one Kingdome to another, commit Prince and subjects; brother against brother, father against son, to the ruine and destruction of a commonwealth, to the disturbance of peace, and to make a generall confusion of all estates.	out of pride, a desire to stand apart, vainglory and blind zeal, they cause still more madness. They throw everything into uproar with their new doctrines, paradoxes, inventions and fancies; create new divisions, subdivisions and sects; set one superstition against another and one kingdom against another; pit ruler against subjects, brother against brother, father against son; ruin and destroy a commonwealth, disturb the peace, and throw every rank of society into confusion.
Source page 651 How did those Arrians rage of old? How many did they circumvent? Those Pelagians, Manichees, &c. their names alone would make a just volume. How many silly souls have Impostors still deluded, drawn away, and quite alienated from Christ! Lucians Alexander, Simon Magus, whose statue was to be seen and adored in Rome, saith Justine Martyr, Simoni deo sancto, &c. after his decease,	How those Arians raged in former times! How many did they ensnare? Those Pelagians, Manichaeans and the rest—their names alone would fill a whole volume. How many simple souls have impostors continually deceived, drawn away and wholly estranged from Christ! Lucian's Alexander; Simon Magus, whose statue could be seen and worshipped in Rome after his death, Justin Martyr says, inscribed "To Simon, the holy god," and so on;[12239]
[12240]Apollonius Tianæus, Cynops, Eumo, who by counterfeiting some new ceremonies and Jugling tricks of that Dea Syria, by spitting fire, and the like, got an army together of forty thousand men, and did much harm:	Apollonius of Tyana; Cynops; Eumo, who, by devising sham new ceremonies and conjuring tricks connected with that Syrian goddess, spitting fire and the like, gathered an army of forty thousand men and did much harm;[12241]

[12239] Editor. Arians, Pelagians and Manichaeans are grouped as heretics by Burton, despite their different doctrines and histories. Lucian's Alexander attacks Alexander of Abonoteichus. Justin Martyr, First Apology 26, reports a statue to Simon Magus with this inscription; the report is preserved as Justin's claim, not independent proof that such a statue honoured Simon.

[12240] Burton. Source page 651, b: "Hierocles contends Apollonius to have been as great a Prophet as Christ, whom Eusebius confutes."

[12241] Editor. Apollonius is of Tyana; Eusebius, Against Hierocles 1–2, disputes the comparison with Christ. Cynops belongs to John's magician-contest traditions. Printed Eumo points to Eunus: Florus, Epitome 2.7.4, describes the Syrian goddess and fire breathed from a concealed nut containing sulphur and fire. Florus gives an army exceeding sixty thousand, against Burton's forty thousand. This identifies a close narrative parallel, not Burton's immediate source or an independently verified troop count. Both columns retain Burton's name and number.

Original text 1651	Modern English
with Eudo de stellis, of whom Nubrigensis speakes, lib.1.cap.19. that in King Stephens dayes imitated most of Christs miracles, fed I know not how many people in the wilderness, and built castles in the air, &c. to the seducing of multitudes of poor souls.	and Eudo de Stellis, of whom William of Newburgh speaks in book 1, chapter 19: in King Stephen's days he imitated most of Christ's miracles, fed I do not know how many people in the wilderness, and built castles in the air, and so on, misleading multitudes of poor souls.[12242]
In Franconia 1476, a base illerate fellow took upon him to be a Prophet, and preach, John Beheim by name, a neatherd at Nicholhausen, he seduced 30000 persons, and was taken by the Commonalty to be a most holy man, come from heaven.	In Franconia in 1476, a low-born, illiterate fellow took it upon himself to be a prophet and to preach. His name was John Beheim, a cattle herder at Nicholhausen. He led thirty thousand people astray, and the common people regarded him as a most holy man come from heaven.[12243]
[12244]Tradesmen left their shops, women their distaves, servants ran from their masters, children from their parents, schollers left their tutors, all to hear him, some for novelty, some for zeal. He was burnt at last by the Bishop of Wartzburge, and so he and his heresie vanished together.	Tradesmen left their shops, women their distaffs; servants ran away from their masters, children from their parents, and students left their tutors, all to hear him, some for novelty, some from zeal. At last he was burned by the bishop of Würzburg, and so he and his heresy disappeared together.

[12242] Editor. Nubrigensis is William of Newburgh. His History of English Affairs 1.19 recounts Eudo or Eon de Stella and describes supernatural feasts and illusory wealth as demonic deceptions. The castles are not in the checked chapter; Burton's additional detail remains to be traced. His wording belongs to a marvel narrative, not merely the modern idiom for unrealistic plans.

[12243] Editor. John Beheim is Hans Böhm, the preacher associated with Niklashausen in Franconia in 1476. Neatherd means cattle herder; distaves are distaffs used in spinning. Wartzburge is Würzburg. Burton's figure of 30,000 and his account of the movement's disappearance are retained; the exact Münster passage still needs collation.

[12244] Burton. Source page 651, star: "Munster Cosmogr. l.3.c.36. Artifices ex officinis, arator è stivâ, fœminæ è colo, &c. quasi numine quodam rapti, nesciis parentibus & dominis rectâ adeunt, &c. Combustus demum ab Herbipolensi Episcopo; hæresis evanuit." "Münster, Cosmography, book 3, chapter 36. Craftsmen from their workshops, the ploughman from his plough-handle, women from the distaff, and so on, as though seized by some divine power, went straight there without their parents or masters knowing, and so on. At last he was burned by the bishop of Würzburg; the heresy disappeared."

Original text 1651	Modern English
How many such Impostors, false Prophets, have lived in every Kings reign? what Chronicle will not afford such examples? that as so many Ignes fatui, have led men out of the way, terrified some, deluded others, that are apt to be carried about with the blast of every winde, a rude inconstant multitude, a silly company of poor souls, that follow all, and are cluttered together like so many pibbles in a tide.	How many such impostors and false prophets have lived in every king's reign? What chronicle does not offer examples? Like so many will-o'-the-wisps, they have led people astray, frightened some and deceived others, people ready to be blown about by every gust of wind: an uncultivated, fickle multitude, a simple company of poor souls who follow anyone and are huddled together like pebbles washed up by the tide.[12245]
What prodigious follies, madness, vexations, persecutions, absurdities, impossibilities, these impostors, heretickes, &c. have thrust upon the world, what strange effects, shall be shewed in the Symptomes.	The monstrous follies, madness, torments, persecutions, absurdities and impossibilities that these impostors, heretics and the rest have thrust upon the world, and their strange effects, will be shown in the Symptoms.
Now the means by which, or advantages the divell and his infernall ministers take, so to delude and disquiet the world with such idle ceremonies, false doctrines, superstitious fopperies, are from themselves, innate fear, ignorance, simplicity, Hope and Fear, those two battering Canons and principal Engines, with their objects, reward and punishment, Purgatory, Limbus Patrum, &c. which now more than ever tyrannize;	Now the means by which the Devil and his infernal ministers so deceive and unsettle the world with these empty ceremonies, false doctrines and superstitious follies—the advantages they exploit—come from people themselves: inborn fear, ignorance and simplicity; Hope and Fear, those two battering cannon and chief siege engines, with their objects, reward and punishment, purgatory, the limbo of the fathers, and so on, which tyrannize now more than ever.[12246]

[12245] Editor. Ignes fatui are will-o'-the-wisps, imagined as lights that lead travellers astray. The wind image recalls Ephesians 4:14. Burton's "Symptoms" points ahead within his treatment of religious melancholy; the contemptuous description of the crowd is his.

[12246] Editor. The military comparison makes hope and fear siege engines. Limbus Patrum, "the limbo of the fathers," was the abode assigned to the righteous dead before Christ's redemption. Burton treats both this and purgatory as instruments of fear within his Protestant argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12247]for what Province is free from Atheisme, superstition, idolatry, schisme, heresie, impiety, their factours and followers? thence they proceed, and from that same decayed image of God, which is yet remaining in us.	For what province is free from atheism, superstition, idolatry, schism, heresy and impiety, or from their agents and followers? From these things they arise, and from that same impaired image of God that still remains in us.
[12248]Os homini sublime dedit, cœlumque tueri Jussit,——	He gave mankind an uplifted face, and bade us look Towards heaven—[12249]
our own conscience doth dictate so much unto us, we know there is a God, and nature doth inform us; Nulla gens tam barbara (saith Tully) cui non insideat hæc persuasio Deum esse; sed nec Scytha, nec Græcus, nec Persa, nec Hyperboreus dissentiet (as Maximus Tyrius the Platonist ser.1. farther addes) nec continentis nec insularum habitator,	Our own conscience tells us as much: we know that there is a God, and nature teaches us this. "No nation is so barbarous," says Cicero, "that the conviction that God exists is not implanted in it; neither Scythian, Greek, Persian nor Hyperborean will disagree," as the Platonist Maximus of Tyre further adds in sermon 1, "nor any inhabitant of the mainland or the islands."[12250]

[12247] Burton. Source page 651, dagger: "Nulla non provincia hæresibus, Atheismis, &c. plena. Nullus orbis angulus ab hisce belluis immunis." "There is no province that is not full of heresies, atheisms, and so on. No corner of the world is free of these monsters."

[12248] Burton. Source page 651, o: "Lib.1. de nat. Deorum." "On the Nature of the Gods, book 1."

[12249] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.85–86. The usual text has videre where Burton prints tueri, with the same basic sense of looking. The marginal marker o is printed before the verse, although its reference, On the Nature of the Gods 1, belongs to the following Cicero passage; its printed position is retained here.

[12250] Editor. Tully is Cicero: compare On the Nature of the Gods 1.43, on widespread belief in gods. Burton's words are a compressed formulation. Hyperboreans are a people imagined beyond the north wind. The Maximus of Tyre passage is cited as sermon 1; its exact edition and correspondence with later numbering remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 651–652 let him dwell where he will, in what coast soever, there is no nation so barbarous that is not perswaded there is a God. It is a wonder to read of that infinite superstition amongst the Indians in this kinde, of their Tenents in America; pro suo quisque libitu varias res venerabantur superstitiosè, plantas, animalia, montes, &c. omne quod amabant aut horrebant (some few places excepted as he grants, that had no God at all.)	Let a person live where he will, in whatever region: no nation is so barbarous that it is not persuaded there is a God. It is astonishing to read of the boundless superstition of this kind among the Indians, of their beliefs in America: "Each, according to his own pleasure, superstitiously worshipped various things—plants, animals, mountains and so on—everything they loved or feared" (except, as he admits, a few places that had no god at all).[12251]
Source page 652 So the Heavens declare the glory of God, and the Firmament declareth his handie work, Psalm.19. Every creature will evince it;	Thus "the heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament declares his handiwork," Psalm 19. Every created thing will prove it:
Præsentemque refert quælibet herba deum.	And every plant reveals God's presence.[12252]
Nolentes sciunt, fatentur inviti, as the said Tyrius proceeds, will or nill, they must acknowledge it. The Philosophers, Socrates, Plato, Plotinus, Pythagoras, Trismegistus, Seneca, Epictetus, those Magi, Druides, &c. went as far as they could by the light of Nature; [12253]multa præclara de natura Dei scripta reliquerunt, writ many things well of the nature of God, but they had but a confused light, a glimpse,	"Unwillingly they know it; reluctantly they confess it," as the same Maximus of Tyre continues: willing or unwilling, they must acknowledge it. The philosophers Socrates, Plato, Plotinus, Pythagoras, Trismegistus, Seneca and Epictetus, the Magi, Druids and the rest, went as far as they could by the light of nature. "They left many splendid writings on the nature of God," wrote many things well about God's nature; but they had only an indistinct light, a glimpse:[12254]

[12251] Editor. The Latin generalizes about Indigenous American religious practices. The unnamed "he" is not securely identified here; it should not automatically be assigned to the preceding ancient author. Burton's exception also qualifies his claim of universal belief. The biblical quotation is Psalm 19:1.

[12252] Editor. The line makes even a small plant evidence of divine presence. Its immediate source in Burton has not been established; it is retained without assigning a definite author.

[12253] Burton. Source page 652, l: "Zanchius."

[12254] Editor. Zanchius is Girolamo Zanchi, the Reformed theologian; no work is specified. Trismegistus means Hermes Trismegistus, the legendary sage. Magi and Druids stand here for non-Christian religious learning. Burton's distinction is between natural knowledge and Christian revelation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12255]Quale per incertam lunam sub luce malignâ Est iter in sylvis,——	As under a wavering moon, in grudging light, A journey passes through the woods—[12256]
as he that walkes by Moonshine in a wood, they groped in the dark; they had a gross knowledge; as he in Euripides, O Deus quicquid es, sive cœlum, sive terra, sive aliud quid, and that of Aristotle, Ens entium miserere mei. And so of the immortality of the Soul, and future happiness.	Like someone walking by moonlight in a wood, they groped in the dark; their knowledge was crude. As the speaker in Euripides says, "O God, whatever you are, whether heaven, earth or something else"; and that saying attributed to Aristotle, "Being of beings, have mercy on me." The same was true of the soul's immortality and happiness in the life to come.[12257]
Immortalitatem animæ (saith Hierom) Pythagoras somniavit, Democritus non credidit, in consolationem damnationis suæ Socrates in carcere disputavit; Indus, Persa, Gothus, &c. Philosophantur.	"Pythagoras dreamed of the soul's immortality," says Jerome; "Democritus did not believe in it; Socrates discussed it in prison to console himself for his condemnation. Indian, Persian, Goth and the rest philosophize about it."[12258]

[12255] Burton. Source page 652, dagger: "Virg.6.Æn." "Virgil, Aeneid 6."

[12256] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 6.270–271, compares the journey through the underworld to walking through woods in uncertain moonlight. Burton applies the image to the limits of natural theology, then gives his own English restatement.

[12257] Editor. Compare Hecuba's prayer in Euripides, Trojan Women 884–888: she addresses Zeus as the power sustaining earth, whether natural necessity or the human mind, and invokes his just guidance. Burton's Latin substitutes "heaven, earth or something else" and omits that conclusion; it is a free recasting, not a literal quotation. His intermediary remains untraced. Ens entium means "being of beings"; the plea attributed to Aristotle is not verified in his surviving works.

[12258] Editor. Jerome, Letter 60.4 to Heliodorus, supplies the parallel. Burton compresses a passage contrasting ancient uncertainty with the spread of Christian belief. Damnationis here concerns Socrates's judicial condemnation, not a sentence to hell.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So some said this, some that, as they conceived themselves, which the Divell perceiving, led them farther out (as [12259]Lemnius observes) and made them worship him as their God, with stockes and stones, and torture themselves to their own destruction, as he thought fit himself, inspired his Priests and Ministers with lies and fictions to prosecute the same, which they for their own ends were as willing to undergo, taking advantage of their simplicitie, fear and ignorance.	So some said one thing, some another, according to their own conceptions. Perceiving this, the Devil led them further astray, as Lemnius observes, and made them worship him as their god through blocks of wood and stones, and torture themselves to their own destruction, just as he pleased. He inspired his priests and ministers with lies and fictions to pursue the same purpose, which they were equally willing to undertake for their own ends, exploiting people's simplicity, fear and ignorance.[12260]

[12259] Burton. Source page 652, e: "Superstitio ex ignorantia divinitatis emersit, ex vitiosa æmulatione, & dæmonis illecebris, inconstans, timens, fluctuans, & cui se addicat nesciens, quem imploret, cui se committat, à dæmone facilè decepta. Lemnius lib.3.c.8." "Superstition arose from ignorance of the divine, from corrupt rivalry and the Devil's enticements: unstable, fearful, wavering, and not knowing to whom to devote itself, whom to implore, or to whom to entrust itself, it was easily deceived by the Devil. Lemnius, book 3, chapter 8."

[12260] Editor. Stockes means wooden objects of worship. Lemnius is Levinus Lemnius; Burton does not give the book's title in this margin. His account assigns both error and self-torment to demonic manipulation; these are the author's theological explanations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For the common people are as a flock of sheep, a rude illiterate rout, void many times of common sense, a meer beast, bellua multorum capitum, will go whithersoever they are led: as you lead a Ram over a gap by the horns, all the rest will follow, [12261]Non quâ eundum, sed quâ itur, they will do as they see others do, and as their Prince will have them, let him be of what Religion he will, they are for him.	For the common people are like a flock of sheep, an uncultivated, illiterate mob, often lacking common sense: a mere beast, "a beast with many heads," that will go wherever it is led. Lead a ram by the horns through a gap and all the rest will follow, "not by the way one ought to go, but by the way people do go." They will do as they see others do, and as their ruler wishes: whatever his religion, they are on his side.[12262]
Now for those idolaters, Maxentius and Licinius, then for Constantine a Christian. [12263]Qui Christum negant malè pereant, acclamatum est Decies, for two hours space; qui Christum non colunt, Augusti inimici sunt, acclamatum est ter decies; and by and by Idolaters again under that Apostate Iulianus; all Arrians under Constantius, good Catholiques again under Iovinianus.	Now they support those idolaters Maxentius and Licinius; then Constantine, a Christian. "May those who deny Christ perish miserably!" was shouted ten times, over the course of two hours; "Those who do not worship Christ are the emperor's enemies!" was shouted thirty times. Before long they are idolaters again under that apostate Julian; all Arians under Constantius; good Catholics again under Jovian.[12264]

[12261] Burton. Source page 652, f: "Seneca."

[12262] Editor. The many-headed beast is a familiar image for the multitude. Seneca, On the Happy Life 1.3, likewise warns against following the herd, going where people go rather than where one ought to go. Burton's brief Latin differs slightly from Seneca's wording.

[12263] Burton. Source page 652, star: "Vide Baronium 3. Annalium ad annum 324. vit. Constantin." "See Baronius, Annals, volume 3, under the year 324, life of Constantine."

[12264] Editor. Baronius's Annals is cited for the acclamations; their exact form remains to be collated. Augustus in the second cry is the imperial title, so the translation gives "the emperor." Burton's sequence is rhetorical rather than chronological: Constantius II preceded Julian. Iovinianus here designates the emperor Jovian. "Catholic" means adherence to the orthodox Christian faith in this ancient context.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And little difference there is betwixt the discretion of men, and children in this case, especially of old folkes and women, as [12265]Cardan discourseth, when as they are tossed with fear and superstition, and with other mens folly and dishonesty. So that I may say their ignorance is a cause of their superstition, a Symptome, and madness it self.	"And there is little difference between the judgment of adults and children in this matter, especially that of old people and women," as Cardano argues, "when they are driven about by fear and superstition, and by other people's folly and dishonesty." So I may say that their ignorance is a cause of their superstition, a symptom, and itself a form of madness.[12266]
Supplicii causa est, suppliciumque sui.	It is the cause of its punishment, and itself its punishment.
Source page 652–653 Their own fear, folly, stupidity, to be deplored Lethargy, is that which gives occasion to the other, and puls these miseries on their own heads. For in all these Religions and Superstitions, amongst our idolaters, you shall still find that the parties first affected, are silly, rude, ignorant people, old folkes, that are naturally prone to superstition, weak women, or some poor rude illiterate persons, that are apt to be wrought upon, and gulled in this kinde,	Their own fear, folly, stupidity and deplorable lethargy give the others their opportunity and bring these miseries down upon their own heads. For in all these religions and superstitions, among our idolaters, you will always find that those first affected are simple, uncultivated, ignorant people: old people naturally prone to superstition, weak women, or poor, uneducated, illiterate persons, readily influenced and tricked in this way;

[12265] Burton. Source page 652, g: "De rerum varietate l.3.c.38. Parum vero distat sapientia virorum à puerili, multo minus senum & mulierum, cum metu & superstitione & alienâ stultitiâ & improbitate simplices agitantur." "On the Variety of Things, book 3, chapter 38. The wisdom of men differs little from that of children, and that of old people and women much less, since these simple people are driven about by fear and superstition and by others' folly and dishonesty."

[12266] Editor. The comparisons disparaging women, children and old people belong to Burton and Cardano's argument. They are retained as features of the historical text. The verse that follows has not been securely attributed; it makes ignorance both the source of punishment and a punishment in itself.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 653 prone without either examination or due consideration (for they take up Religion a trust, as at Mercers they do their wares) to beleeve any thing. And the best means they have to broach first, or to maintain it when they have done, is to keep them still in ignorance: for Ignorance is the mother of devotion, as all the world knows, and these times can amply witness.	ready to believe anything without examination or proper consideration—for they take religion on trust, as they buy goods on credit at the cloth merchant's. The best means of first introducing it, or maintaining it once introduced, is to keep them continually ignorant: for "Ignorance is the mother of devotion," as the whole world knows and these times can amply testify.[12267]
This hath been the divels practice, and his infernall ministers in all ages; not as our Saviour by a few silly Fishermen, to confound the wisdom of the world, to save Publicans and sinners, but to make advantage of their ignorance, to convert them and their associates; and that they may better effect what they intend, they begin, as I say, with poor [12268]stupid, illiterate persons.	This has been the practice of the Devil and his infernal ministers in every age: not, like our Saviour, to confound the world's wisdom through a few simple fishermen and save tax collectors and sinners, but to exploit their ignorance and convert them and their companions. To achieve their purposes more effectively, they begin, as I say, with poor, stupid, illiterate people.[12269]

[12267] Editor. To take up goods "a trust" is to buy them on credit. Burton's pun presents unexamined religious belief as a similar reliance on another's assurance. His attacks on the susceptibility of women, the elderly and the uneducated reflect the prejudices of this passage.

[12268] Burton. Source page 653, h: "In all superstition wise men follow fools. Bacons Essayes."

[12269] Editor. Publicans are tax collectors. Burton alludes to the calling of fishermen and sinners in the Gospels and to the confounding of worldly wisdom in 1 Corinthians 1:27. Bacon's Of Superstition supplies the marginal remark about wise men following fools.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So Mahomet did when he published his Alcoran, which is a piece of work (saith [12270]Bredenbachius) full of non-sense, barbarisme, confusion, without rime, reason, or any good composition, first published to a company of rude rustickes, hog-rubbers, that had no discretion, judgement, art, or understanding, and is so still maintained.	So Muhammad did when he published his Quran, a work, says Breydenbach, "full of nonsense, barbarous language and confusion, without rhyme, reason or sound composition, first published among a company of uncouth peasants, swine-tenders, without discernment, judgment, skill or understanding; and it is still maintained in the same way."[12271]
For it is a part of their policy to let no man comment, dare to dispute or call in question to this day any part of it, be it never so absurd, incredible, ridiculous, fabulous as it is, it must be beleeved implicitè, upon pain of death no man must dare to contradict it, God and the Emperour, &c.	For it is part of their policy to allow no one to comment on it, or dare to dispute or question any part of it, even to this day. However absurd, incredible, ridiculous or fabulous it may be, it must be believed without question. On pain of death, no one must dare contradict it: "God and the emperor," and so on.
What else do our Papists, but by keeping the people in ignorance, vent and broach all their new ceremonies and traditions, when they conceal the Scripture, read it in Latine, and to some few alone, feeding the slavish people in the mean time with tales out of Legends, and such like fabulous narrations?	What else do our Papists do but put forward and spread all their new ceremonies and traditions by keeping the people ignorant? They conceal Scripture, read it in Latin and only to a few, meanwhile feeding the servile people with tales from saints' legends and similar fabulous stories.[12272]

[12270] Burton. Source page 653, i: "Peregrin. Hieros. ca.5. totum scriptum confusum sine ordine vel colore, absque sensu & ratione ad rusticissimos idem dedit, rudissimos, & prorsus agrestes, qui nullius erant discretionis, ut dijudicare possent." "Pilgrimage to Jerusalem, chapter 5. The whole writing is confused, without order or rhetorical colouring, without sense or reason; he gave it to the most rustic, uncultivated, utterly boorish people, who had no discernment with which to judge it."

[12271] Editor. Bredenbachius is Bernhard von Breydenbach, author of a pilgrimage account. This assessment of the Quran and its audience is hostile Christian polemic, not a neutral account of the text or of Islamic interpretation. Hog-rubbers is an abusive word for rustic labourers; the claim that no commentary or debate was permitted is Burton's generalization.

[12272] Editor. Papists is Burton's derogatory term for Roman Catholics. Legends refers especially to saints' lives. Collapsed Ladies appears to mean women he regards as fallen away from the true faith; the exact force remains uncertain. His list makes ignorance and dissatisfaction targets for religious recruitment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whom do they begin with but collapsed Ladies, some few tradesmen, superstitious old folkes, illiterate persons, weak women, discontent, rude, silly companions, or sooner circumvent? So do all our schismaticks and hereticks. Marcus and Valentinian hereticks in [12273]Irenæus, seduced first I know not how many women, and made them beleeve they were Prophets. [12274]Frier Cornelius of Dort seduced a company of silly women.	Whom do they begin with, or more readily ensnare, than fallen-away ladies, a few tradesmen, superstitious old people, illiterate persons, weak women, and dissatisfied, uncultivated, simple fellows? All our schismatics and heretics do the same. The heretics Marcus and Valentinus, in Irenaeus, first led astray I do not know how many women and made them believe they were prophets. Friar Cornelius of Dort led a company of simple women astray.[12275]
What are all our Anabaptists, Brownists, Barrowists, Familists, but a company of rude, illiterate, capricious base fellowes? What are most of our Papists, but stupid, ignorant and blinde bayards? how should they otherwise be, when as they are brought up and kept still in darkness?	What are all our Anabaptists, Brownists, Barrowists and Familists but a company of uncultivated, illiterate, capricious, low fellows? What are most of our Papists but stupid, ignorant, blind horses? How could they be otherwise, when they are brought up and continually kept in darkness?[12276]

[12273] Burton. Source page 653, k: “Lib.1.cap.9. Valent. hæres.9.” “Book 1, chapter 9. Valentinus, heresy 9 [abbreviated reference].”

[12274] Burton. Source page 653, l: “Meteranus li.8. hist. Belg.” “Meteren, History of the Netherlands, book 8.”

[12275] Editor. Compare Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.13, on Marcus’s cultivation of women as prophets. The printed Valentinian refers to Valentinus or his school. The marginal book/chapter and “Valent. hæres.9” are retained; their exact edition-specific reference needs collation. Cornelius of Dort is the friar associated with the polemical tales cited from Emanuel van Meteren.

[12276] Editor. Brownists and Barrowists were English separatists associated with Robert Browne and Henry Barrow; Familists were members of the Family of Love. Burton groups them with Anabaptists without distinguishing their doctrines. A bayard is a horse, often a bay horse; “blind bayards” is an insult suggesting ignorant, headstrong people.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12277]If their Pastors (saith Lavater) had done their duties, and instructed their flockes as they ought, in the Principles of Christian Religion, or had not forbidden them the reading of Scriptures, they had not been as they are. But being so mis-led all their lives in superstition, and carried hood-winked like hawkes, how can they prove otherwise than blinde ideots, and superstitious Asses? what shall we expect else at their hands?	"If their pastors," says Lavater, "had done their duty and instructed their flocks as they ought in the principles of Christian religion, or had not forbidden them to read Scripture, they would not have been as they are." But misled throughout their lives by superstition, and carried about blindfolded like hooded hawks, how can they turn out as anything but blind fools and superstitious asses? What else should we expect from them?[12278]
Source page 653–654 Neither is it sufficient to keep them blinde, and in Cymmerian darkness, but withall, as a Shoolmaster doth by his boyes, to make them follow their books, sometimes by good hope, promises and encouragements, but most of all by fear, strict discipline, severity, threats and punishment, do they collogue and sooth up their silly Auditors, and so bring them into a fools paradise.	Nor is it enough to keep them blind and in Cimmerian darkness. Like a schoolmaster making his boys attend to their books, sometimes through hopeful expectations, promises and encouragement, but chiefly through fear, strict discipline, severity, threats and punishment, they flatter and coax their simple listeners and so bring them into a fool's paradise.[12279]

[12277] Burton. Source page 653, m: "Si Doctores suum fecissent officium, et plebem fidei commissam rectè instituissent de doctrinæ Christianæ capitib. nec sacris scripturis interdixissent, de multis proculdubio rectè sensissent." "If the teachers had done their duty and rightly instructed the people entrusted to their care in the chief points of Christian doctrine, and had not forbidden them the sacred Scriptures, they would undoubtedly have held correct opinions on many matters."

[12278] Editor. Lavater is Ludwig Lavater, the Reformed writer on apparitions and spirits, also cited on the next page. Burton's English restatement differs from the Latin margin: the latter says people would have judged many matters correctly. A hooded hawk cannot see; the image continues his accusation of deliberately withheld knowledge.

[12279] Editor. Cimmerian darkness is proverbial total darkness, from the sunless land in Odyssey 11. Collogue means flatter or coax. A fool's paradise is a false sense of safety or happiness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 654 Rex eris aiunt, si rectè facies, do well, thou shalt be crowned; but for the most part by threats, terrors and affrights, they tyrannize and terrifie their distressed souls: knowing that fear alone is the sole and onely means to keep men in obedience, according to that Hemistichium of Petronius, primus in orbe deos fecit timor, the fear of some divine and supreme powers, keeps men in obedience, makes the people do their duties: they play upon their consciences;	"You will be king, they say, if you act rightly": do well and you shall be crowned. But chiefly, through threats, terrors and alarms, they tyrannize over and frighten people's distressed souls, knowing that fear alone is the sole means of keeping them obedient. According to that half-line of Petronius, "Fear first created gods in the world": fear of divine and supreme powers keeps people obedient and makes them do their duty. They play upon their consciences.[12280]
[12281]which was practised of old in Ægypt by their Priests; when there was an Ecclipse, they made the people beleeve God was angry, great miseries were to come; they take all opportunities of naturall causes, to delude the peoples senses, and with fearfull tales out of purgatory, fained apparitions, earth quakes in Japonia or China, tragicall examples of divels, possessions, obsessions, false miracles, counterfeit visions, &c.	This was practised long ago by the priests in Egypt: when there was an eclipse, they made the people believe God was angry and great miseries were coming. They seize every opportunity offered by natural causes to deceive people's senses: terrifying stories from purgatory, invented apparitions, earthquakes in Japan or China, dreadful examples of devils, possessions, demonic harassment, false miracles, counterfeit visions, and so on.[12282]

[12280] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.1.59–60, quotes children playing: correct conduct wins kingship. The line attributed to Petronius occurs in fragment 27.1; Burton calls this excerpt a hemistich, a half-line. It makes fear the origin of gods, whereas his following English emphasizes fear's use in enforcing obedience.

[12281] Burton. Source page 654, n: "Curtius li.4." "Curtius, book 4."

[12282] Editor. Curtius Rufus, History of Alexander 4.10, describes Egyptian priests interpreting a lunar eclipse to reassure Alexander's frightened soldiers. Burton instead describes priests frightening people; his claim is retained, with the difference made explicit. Obsessions here means demonic harassment from outside, distinguished from possession.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They do so insult over, and restrain them, never Hobby so dared a Larke, that they will not [12283]offend the least tradition, tread, or scarce look awry: Deus bone ([12284]Lavater exclaimes) quot hoc commentum de purgatorio miserè afflixit! good God, how many men have been miserably afflicted by this fiction of purgatory!	They so domineer over and restrain them—no hobby ever so terrified a lark—that they will not violate the least tradition, step out of line, or scarcely look the wrong way. "Good God," Lavater exclaims, "how many people this invention of purgatory has miserably tormented!" Good God, how many people have been miserably afflicted by this fiction of purgatory![12285]
To these advantages of Hope and Fear, ignorance and simplicity, he hath severall engines, traps, devices, to batter and enthrall, omitting no opportunities, according to mens severall inclinations, abilities, to circumvent and humour them, to maintain his superstition; sometimes to stupifie, besot them; sometimes again by oppositions, factions, to set all at oddes and in an uproar; sometimes he infects one man, and makes him a principall agent; sometimes whole Cities, Countries.	Along with these advantages of Hope and Fear, ignorance and simplicity, he has various engines, traps and devices with which to batter and enslave people. He misses no opportunity, according to their different inclinations and abilities, to ensnare and humour them and maintain his superstition: sometimes to stupefy and befool them; sometimes, through opposition and faction, to set everyone at odds and in an uproar. Sometimes he infects one man and makes him a chief agent; sometimes whole cities and countries.

[12283] Burton. Source page 654, o: "See more in Kemnisius Examen Concil. Trident. de Purgatorio." "See more in Chemnitz, Examination of the Council of Trent, on purgatory."

[12284] Burton. Source page 654, p: "Part.1.c.16. part.3.cap.18. &14." "Part 1, chapter 16; part 3, chapters 18 and 14."

[12285] Editor. A hobby is a small falcon. To dare a lark is to frighten it into immobility. The margin names Kemnisius, Martin Chemnitz, and his Examination of the Council of Trent; the original spelling and abbreviated title are preserved. Lavater's exclamation is translated before Burton's own English restatement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If of meaner sort, by stupidity, canonicall obedience, blinde zeal, &c. If of better note, by pride, ambition, popularity, vain glory. If of the Clergie and more eminent, of better parts than the rest, more learned, eloquent, he puffes them up with a vain conceit of their own worth, scientia inflati, they begin to swell and scorn all the world in respect of themselves, and thereupon turn heretickes, schismatickes, broach new doctrines, frame new crotchets and the like;	If they are of lower station, he works through stupidity, obedience to religious authority, blind zeal, and so on. If they are more distinguished, through pride, ambition, the desire for popularity and vainglory. If they are eminent clergy, more gifted than the rest, more learned and eloquent, he inflates them with a vain opinion of their own worth. "Puffed up with knowledge," they begin to swell with pride and despise the whole world in comparison with themselves. Then they turn heretic or schismatic, put forward new doctrines, devise new fancies, and the like;[12286]
or else out of too much learning become mad, or out of curiosity they will search into Gods secrets, and eat of the forbidden fruit; or out of presumption of their holiness and good gifts, inspirations, become prophets, Enthusiasts, and what not?	or else too much learning drives them mad, or curiosity makes them pry into God's secrets and eat the forbidden fruit; or, presuming on their holiness, spiritual gifts and inspirations, they become prophets, enthusiasts, and what not?[12287]

[12286] Editor. Canonicall obedience means submission to religious authority. Popularity is the pursuit of popular favour. Scientia inflati, "puffed up with knowledge," recalls 1 Corinthians 8:1. Burton shifts from the credulity he attributes to social inferiors to the pride he attributes to educated leaders.

[12287] Editor. Enthusiasts here are people claiming immediate divine inspiration. "Too much learning" recalls Acts 26:24, and the forbidden fruit recalls Genesis 3. The passage treats both intellectual curiosity and spiritual self-confidence as possible openings for delusion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or else if they be displeased, discontent, and have not (as they suppose) preferment to their worth, have some disgrace, repulse, neglected, or not esteemed as they fondly value themselves, or out of emulation, they begin presently to rage and rave, cœlum terræ miscent, they become so impatient in an instant, that a whole kingdom cannot contain them; they will set all in a combustion, all at variance, to be revenged of their adversaries.	Or if they are displeased and discontented, and have not—as they suppose—received advancement equal to their worth; if they suffer some disgrace or rejection, are neglected, or are not esteemed as highly as they foolishly value themselves; or out of envious rivalry, they immediately begin to rage and rave, "mixing heaven with earth." They become so intolerant of their lot in an instant that a whole kingdom cannot contain them. They will set everything ablaze, set everyone at odds, to revenge themselves on their adversaries.[12288]
[12289]Donatus when he saw Cecilianus preferred before him in the bishoprick of Carthage, turned hereticke, and so did Arian, because Alexander was advanced: we have examples at home, and too many experiments of such persons. If they be lay men of better note, the same engines of pride, ambition, emulation and jealousie take place, they will be gods themselves: [12290]Alexander in India after his victories, became so insolent, he would be adored for a god:	When Donatus saw Caecilianus preferred to him for the bishopric of Carthage, he turned heretic; so did Arius, because Alexander was promoted. We have examples at home, and all too much experience of such people. If they are distinguished laymen, the same engines of pride, ambition, rivalry and jealousy operate: they will be gods themselves. After his victories in India, Alexander became so arrogant that he demanded worship as a god.[12291]

[12288] Editor. Preferment means advancement to office; emulation means envious rivalry. Cœlum terræ miscent, "they mix heaven with earth," is a proverbial image of throwing everything into confusion. Burton makes disappointed ambition the cause of public religious strife.

[12289] Burton. Source page 654, q: "Austin." "Augustine."

[12290] Burton. Source page 654, r: "Curtius lib.8." "Curtius, book 8."

[12291] Editor. Printed Arian is rendered Arius. Optatus, Against the Donatists 1.18, names Botrus and Celestius as disappointed candidates after Caecilian's election; it does not give Burton's Donatus anecdote. This is a distinct, partisan account, checked in English translation. Burton's bare "Austin" and the Arius–Alexander ambition story remain untraced. Curtius 8.5–8 places Alexander's divine honours and prostration controversy before the Indian campaign; Burton's "in India after his victories" compresses the chronology.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 654–655 and those Romane Emperors came to that heighth of madness they must have Temples built to them, sacrifices to their deities, Divus Augustus, D. Claudius, D. Adrianus: [12292]Heliogabalus put out that Vestall fire at Rome, expelled the Virgins, and banished all other Religions all over the world, and would be the sole God himself.	And those Roman emperors reached such a height of madness that they had to have temples built to them and sacrifices offered to their divinities: "the deified Augustus," "the deified Claudius," "the deified Hadrian." Heliogabalus put out the Vestal fire at Rome, expelled the virgins, banished all other religions throughout the world, and wanted to be the sole god himself.[12293]
Source page 655 Our Turks, China Kings, great Chams, and Mogors do little less, assuming divine and bumbast titles to themselves; the meaner sort are too credulous, and led with blinde zeal, blinde obedience, to prosecute and maintain whatsoever their sottish leaders shall propose, what they in pride and singularity, revenge, vain glory, ambition, spleen, for gain, shall rashly maintain and broach,	Our Turks, Chinese kings, great khans and Mughal rulers do little less, assuming divine and bombastic titles. The lower sort are too credulous, led by blind zeal and blind obedience to pursue and defend whatever their foolish leaders propose: whatever those leaders, through pride and a desire to stand apart, revenge, vainglory, ambition, malice or greed, rashly uphold and put forward,[12294]

[12292] Burton. Source page 655, s: "Lampridius vita ejus. Virgines vestales, & sacrum ignem Romæ extinxit, & omnes ubiq. per orbem terræ religiones, unum hoc studens ut solus deus coleretur." "Lampridius, his Life. He suppressed the Vestal virgins and extinguished the sacred fire at Rome, and all religions everywhere throughout the world, striving for this one thing: that he alone should be worshipped as god."

[12293] Editor. Divus, abbreviated D., marks a deified emperor. Lampridius is the traditional author-name attached to the Life of Elagabalus in the Historia Augusta. Chapters 3 and 6 describe subordinating other cults to the god Elagabalus and attempting to extinguish Vesta's fire. Burton's assertion that the emperor wanted worship for himself conflates ruler and deity; the primary parallel does not verify his universal suppression of religions.

[12294] Editor. Chams are khans; Mogors are Mughal rulers. Bumbast means inflated or pompous. Pseudo-martyrs means false martyrs in Burton's judgment. The closing catalogue returns to his concern that a leader's ambition can turn followers' consciences into instruments of violence and self-sacrifice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
their disciples make a matter of conscience, of hell and damnation, if they do it not, and will rather forsake wives, children, house and home, lands, goods, fortunes, life it self, than omit or abjure the least tittle of it, and to advance the common cause, undergo any miseries, turn traitors, assassinates, pseudo-martyrs, with full assurance and hope of reward in that other world, that they shall certainly merit by it, win heaven, be canonized for Saints.	their disciples make a matter of conscience, believing that failure to comply means hell and damnation. They would sooner abandon wives, children, house and home, lands, goods, fortunes and life itself than neglect or renounce the slightest part of it. To advance the common cause they endure any misery, become traitors, assassins and false martyrs, fully assured of and hoping for a reward in the other world: that they will certainly earn merit by it, gain heaven, and be canonized as saints.
Now when they are truly possessed with blinde zeal, and nusled with superstition, he hath many other baits to inveagle and infatuate them farther yet, to make them quite mortified and mad, and that under colour of perfection, to merit by penance, going wolward, whipping, alms, fastings, &c. An.1320. there was a Sect of [12295]whippers in Germany, that to the astonishment of the beholders, lashed, and cruelly tortured themselves. I could give many other instances of each particular.	Now, when they are thoroughly possessed by blind zeal and nurtured in superstition, he has many other baits to entice and delude them further, to make them utterly mortified and mad, all under the pretence of perfection: to earn merit through penance, wearing wool against the skin, whipping, alms, fasts and so on. In 1320 there was a sect of flagellants in Germany who, to the astonishment of onlookers, lashed and cruelly tortured themselves. I could give many other examples of each practice.[12296]

[12295] Burton. Source page 655, dagger: “Flagellatorum secta. Munster. lib.3. Cosmogr. cap.19.” “The sect of flagellants. Münster, Cosmography, book 3, chapter 19.”

[12296] Editor. The Devil remains the subject of “he.” Nusled means nurtured or habituated. Going wolward means wearing wool next to the skin as a penance. Mortified retains its ascetic sense of subduing bodily desires; Burton turns that ideal towards bodily exhaustion and madness. The printed date 1320 is retained; the precise Münster episode needs collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But these works so done are meritorious, ex opere operato, ex condigno, for themselves and others, to make them macerate and consume their bodies, specie virtutis & umbra, those Evangelicall counsels are propounded, as our pseudocatholicks call them, canonicall obedience, wilfull poverty, [12297]vows of chastity, monkery, and a solitary life, which extend almost to all religions and superstitions, to Turks, China's, Gentiles, Abyssines, Greeks, Latines, and all Countries.	But works performed in this way are held to earn merit, "by the work performed," "by strict desert," for themselves and others. To make them wear down and consume their bodies, "under virtue's appearance and shadow," those evangelical counsels, as our false Catholics call them, are proposed: canonical obedience, voluntary poverty, vows of chastity, monkish practices and a solitary life. These extend to almost every religion and superstition—to Turks, Chinese, pagans, Ethiopians, Greeks, Latins and every country.[12298]
Amongst the rest, fasting, contemplation, solitariness, are as it were certain rams by which the divell doth batter and work upon the strongest constitutions. Nonnulli (saith Peter Forestus) ob longas inedias, studia & meditationes cœlestes, de rebus sacris & religione semper agitant, by fasting over much, and divine meditations, are overcome.	Among these, fasting, contemplation and solitude are like battering rams with which the Devil assaults and works upon even the strongest constitutions. "Some," says Pieter van Foreest, "through prolonged fasting, study and heavenly meditations, continually occupy themselves with sacred matters and religion": they are overcome by excessive fasting and meditation on divine things.[12299]

[12297] Burton. Source page 655, t: "Votum cœlibatus, monachatus." "The vow of celibacy; the monastic state."

[12298] Editor. Ex opere operato, "by the work performed," and ex condigno, "by strict desert," are theological terms concerning efficacy and merit. Burton combines them polemically in describing penitential acts. Evangelical counsels are practices directed towards religious perfection, especially poverty, chastity and obedience. Wilfull means voluntary; monkery is disparaging. Gentiles here means non-Christians, chiefly pagans; Abyssines are Ethiopians, and Greeks and Latins the Eastern and Western Christian traditions.

[12299] Editor. Forestus is Pieter van Foreest. His Latin describes people continually preoccupied with sacred matters after prolonged fasting, study and meditation; Burton's English restatement draws out the harmful effect. Both are retained. The exact observation is not specified here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Not that fasting is a thing of it self to be discommended, for it is an excellent means to keep the body in subjection, [12300]a preparative to devotion, the physick of the soul, by which chast thoughts are ingendred, true zeal, a divine spirit, whence wholesome counsels do proceed, concupiscence is restrained, vicious and predominant lusts and humours are expelled. The Fathers are very much in commendation of it, and as Calvin notes, sometimes immoderate.	Not that fasting is blameworthy in itself: it is an excellent means of keeping the body in subjection, a preparation for devotion, medicine for the soul. It produces chaste thoughts, true zeal and a divine spirit; from it sound counsels proceed, desire is restrained, and vicious, overpowering lusts and humours are expelled. The Fathers praise it highly and, as Calvin observes, sometimes excessively.[12301]
The mother of health, key of heaven, a spirituall wing to ereare us, the chariot of the holy Ghost, banner of faith, &c. And 'tis true they say of it, if it be moderately and seasonably used, by such parties as Moses, Elias, Daniel, CHRIST, and as his [12302]Apostles made use of it; but when by this means they will supererogate, and as [12303]Erasmus well taxeth, Cœlum non sufficere putant suis meritis, Heaven is too small a reward for it;	The mother of health, the key to heaven, a spiritual wing to lift us up, the chariot of the Holy Spirit, the banner of faith, and so on. What they say is true, if fasting is practised moderately and at the proper time, as by Moses, Elijah, Daniel and CHRIST, and as his apostles used it. But when they use it to perform works beyond what duty requires, and, as Erasmus aptly rebukes them, "think heaven insufficient for their merits"—heaven is too small a reward for it —[12304]

[12300] Burton. Source page 655, u: "Mater sanitatis, clavis cœlorum, ala animæ quæ leves pennas producat, ut in sublime ferat; currus spiritus sancti, vexillum fidei, porta paradisi, vita angelorum, &c." "Mother of health, key of heaven, a wing of the soul that may grow light feathers to bear it aloft; chariot of the Holy Spirit, banner of faith, gate of paradise, life of angels, and so on."

[12301] Editor. Physick means medicine. Humours belongs to Burton's account of bodily constitution, not merely moods. He explicitly distinguishes moderate fasting from its excess. Compare Calvin, Institutes 4.12.15–19, especially section 19 on extravagant praise of fasting by earlier Christian writers.

[12302] Burton. Source page 655, x: "Castigo corpus meum. Paul." "I discipline my body. Paul."

[12303] Burton. Source page 655, y: "Mor. encom." "Praise of Folly."

[12304] Editor. Ereare means raise or lift up. Elias is Elijah. The marginal quotation is from 1 Corinthians 9:27. Supererogation means doing more than duty requires, here with a supposed surplus of merit. Erasmus, Praise of Folly, similarly mocks religious people who think heaven an insufficient reward for their observances.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 655–656 They make choice of times and meats, buy and sell their merits, attribute more to them than to the ten Commandments, and count it a greater sin to eat meat in Lent, than to kill a man, and as one saith, Plus respiciunt assum piscem, quam Christum crucifixum, plus salmonem quam Solomonem, quibus in ore Christus, Epicurus in corde, when some counterfeit, and some attribute more to such works of theirs than to Christs death and passion; the divell sets in a foot, strangely deludes them, and by that means makes them to overthrow the temperature of their bodies, and hazard their souls.	they prescribe times and foods, buy and sell their merits, give them greater weight than the Ten Commandments, and count eating meat in Lent a greater sin than killing a man. As someone says, "They care more for a roast fish than for Christ crucified, more for salmon than for Solomon: Christ is in their mouths, Epicurus in their hearts." When some pretend, and others credit these works of theirs with more than Christ's death and passion, the Devil gets a foothold, strangely deceives them, and so makes them overturn the balance of their bodies and endanger their souls.[12305]
Source page 656 Never any strange illusions of divels amongst Hermites, Anachorites, never any visions, phantasmes, apparitions, Enthusiasmes, Prophets, any revelations, but immoderate fasting, bad diet, sickness, melancholy, solitariness, or some such things were the precedent causes, the forerunners or concomitants of them. The best opportunity and sole occasion the Divell takes to delude them. Marcilius Cognatus lib.1.cont.cap.7. hath many stories to this purpose, of such as after long fasting have been seduced by divels:	There have never been any strange demonic illusions among hermits or anchorites, any visions, phantoms, apparitions, states of inspiration, prophets or revelations, without excessive fasting, bad diet, sickness, melancholy, solitude or some such thing as their preceding causes, forerunners or companions. These give the Devil his best opportunity and very occasion to deceive them. Marcilius Cognatus, book 1, cont., chapter 7, has many stories to this effect, about people seduced by devils after long fasting;[12306]

[12305] Editor. The Latin mocks attention to roast fish over the crucified Christ and plays on salmonem and Solomonem, "salmon" and "Solomon." Epicurus serves as a conventional emblem of indulgence. Temperature means the balance of bodily qualities. Burton is attacking claims made for fasting, not simply all restraint in eating; the attribution "as one saith" remains unresolved.

[12306] Editor. Anchorites are religious recluses. Enthusiasmes means supposed possession or inspiration by a divine spirit. Marcilius Cognatus is the printed name, probably referring to the physician Marsilio Cagnati. The abbreviated reference lib.1.cont.cap.7 remains to be matched to an edition. Burton's claim that these experiences invariably have bodily or environmental precursors is his own generalization.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and [12307]'tis a miraculous thing to relate (as Cardan writes) what strange accidents proceed from fasting; dreams, superstition, contempt of torments, desire of death, prophesies, paradoxes, madness; fasting naturally prepares men to these things. Monkes, Anachorites, and the like, after much emptiness become melancholy, vertiginous, they think they hear strange noises, confer with Hobgoblins, Divels, rivell up their bodies, & dum hostem insequimur, saith Gregory, civem quem diligimus trucidamus, they become bare Skeletons, skin and bones: Carnibus abstinentes proprias carnes devorant, ut nil præter cutem & ossa sit reliquum.	and it is astonishing to relate, as Cardano writes, what strange effects arise from fasting: dreams, superstition, contempt for torments, a desire for death, prophecies, paradoxes, madness. Fasting naturally prepares people for these things. Monks, anchorites and the like, after prolonged emptiness, become melancholic and dizzy. They think they hear strange noises and speak with hobgoblins and devils; they shrivel their bodies; "and while we pursue the enemy," says Gregory, "we slaughter the fellow citizen we love." They become bare skeletons, skin and bones: "Abstaining from flesh, they devour their own flesh, until nothing remains but skin and bones."[12308]

[12307] Burton. Source page 656, z: "Lib.8.cap.10 de rerum varietate: admiratione digna sunt quæ per jejunium hoc modo contingunt: somnia, superstitio, contemptus tormentorum, mortis desiderium, obstinata opinio, insania: jejunium naturaliter præparat ad hæc omnia." "On the Variety of Things, book 8, chapter 10: astonishing are the things that occur in this way through fasting: dreams, superstition, contempt for torments, a desire for death, stubborn conviction, madness. Fasting naturally prepares a person for all these things."

[12308] Editor. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. Burton's English list differs from the Latin marginal quotation: "paradoxes" corresponds loosely to obstinata opinio, stubborn conviction. Vertiginous means dizzy; rivell up means shrivel. Gregory, Moralia on Job 9.63, warns that excessive restraint can weaken the body needed for good works: one may kill a fellow citizen while pursuing an enemy. The separate flesh-eating aphorism remains untraced.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hilarion, as [12309]Hierome reports in his life, and Athanasius of Antonius, was so bare with fasting, that the skin did scarce stick to the bones; for want of vapours he could not sleep, and for want of sleep became idle headed, heard every night infants cry, oxen low, wolves howl, lions roar (as he thought) clattering of chains, strange voices, and the like illusions of divels.	Hilarion, as Jerome reports in his life, and as Athanasius reports of Antony, was so wasted by fasting that his skin scarcely clung to his bones. For lack of vapours he could not sleep, and for lack of sleep his mind became disordered. Every night he heard infants crying, oxen lowing, wolves howling, lions roaring—or so he thought—chains clattering, strange voices and similar demonic illusions.[12310]

[12309] Burton. Source page 656, a: "Epist. l.3. Ita attenuatus fuit jejunio & vigiliis, in tantum exeso corpore ut ossibus vix hærebat, unde nocte infantum vagitus, balatus pecorum, mugitus boum, voces & ludibria dæmonum, &c." "Letters, book 3. He was so weakened by fasting and vigils, his body so wasted that it scarcely clung to his bones; hence at night the wailing of infants, the bleating of flocks, the lowing of oxen, voices and the mockeries of demons, and so on."

[12310] Editor. Jerome, Life of Hilarion 5–6, describes wasting and terrifying nocturnal noises; Burton recasts the devotional narrative in physiological terms. Vapours refers to the period's explanation of sleep through bodily exhalations. "Idle headed" means mentally disordered. Athanasius, Life of Antony 7–9, also describes fasting and frightening apparitions, but section 14 stresses Antony's bodily equilibrium after seclusion; it does not support treating every detail here as an exact account of Antony.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such symptomes are common to those that fast long, are solitary, given to contemplation, over much solitariness and meditation. Not that these things (as I said of fasting) are to be discommended of themselves, but very behovefull in some cases and good: sobriety and contemplation joyn our souls to God, as that heathen [12311]Porphyrie can tell us. [12312]Extasis is a taste of future happiness, by which we are united unto God, a divine melancholy, a spirituall wing Bonaventure terms it, to lift us up to heaven: But as it is abused, a meer dotage, madness, a cause and symptome of Religious Melancholy.	Such symptoms are common in those who fast for long periods, live alone, and give themselves to contemplation—to excessive solitude and meditation. Not that these things, as I said of fasting, deserve blame in themselves: in some cases they are beneficial and good. Temperance and contemplation unite our souls with God, as even the pagan Porphyry can tell us. Ecstasy is a taste of future happiness, through which we are united with God, a divine melancholy, a spiritual wing, as Bonaventure calls it, to lift us to heaven. But when abused it is sheer delusion and madness, a cause and symptom of religious melancholy.[12313]

[12311] Burton. Source page 656, b: “Lib. de abstinentia. Sobrietas & continentia mentem deo conjungunt.” “On Abstinence. Sobriety and self-restraint unite the mind with God.”

[12312] Burton. Source page 656, c: “Extasis nihil est aliud quam gustus futuræ beatitudinis. Erasmus epist. ad Dorpium in qua toti absorbemur in Deum.” “Ecstasy is nothing other than a taste of future blessedness. Erasmus, letter to Dorpius: in it we are wholly absorbed into God.”

[12313] Editor. Sobriety means temperance; behovefull means beneficial. Porphyry, On Abstinence 1.56–57, connects a simple diet and purification with approach to divinity. Taylor’s 1823 translation supplies a contextual parallel, not a location for Burton’s exact Latin maxim. Ecstasy means being carried beyond ordinary awareness; Burton allows a positive spiritual sense before condemning its abuse. Bonaventure’s “wing” and the Erasmus letter wording remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12314]If you shall at any time see (saith Guatinerius) a Religious person over superstitious, too solitary or much given to fasting, that man will certainly be melancholy, thou maist boldly say it, he will be so. P. Forestus hath almost the same words, and [12315]Cardan subtil. lib.18. & cap.40.lib.8. de rerum varietate, solitariness, fasting, and that melancholy humour, are the causes of all Hermites illusions.	If at any time you see, says Guaineri, a member of a religious order who is excessively superstitious, too solitary or much given to fasting, that person will certainly become melancholic: you may boldly say it; he will. Pieter van Foreest says almost the same thing, and Cardano, On Subtlety, book 18, and On the Variety of Things, book 8, chapter 40, says that solitude, fasting and the melancholic humour cause all hermits' illusions.[12316]
Source page 656–657 Lavater, de spect.cap.19.part.1. and part.1.cap.10. puts solitariness a main cause of such spectrums and apparitions; none, saith he, so melancholy as Monkes and Hermites, the divels bath melancholy, [12317]none so subject to visions and dotage in this kinde, as such as live solitary lives, they hear and act strange things in their dotage.	Lavater, On Spectres, part 1, chapter 19, and part 1, chapter 10, makes solitude a principal cause of such spectres and apparitions. No one, he says, is so melancholic as monks and hermits; melancholy is the Devil's bath. No one is so subject to visions and delusions of this kind as those who lead solitary lives: in their delusion they hear and do strange things.[12318]

[12314] Burton. Source page 656, d: "Si religiosum nimis jejunia videris observantem, audacter melancholichum pronunciabis. Tract.5.cap.5." "If you see a member of a religious order observing fasts too strictly, you may confidently pronounce him melancholic. Treatise 5, chapter 5."

[12315] Burton. Source page 656, e: "Solitudo ipsa, mens ægra laboribus anxiis & jejuniis, tum temperatura cibis mutata agrestibus, & humor melancholicus Heremitis illusionum causa sunt." "Solitude itself, a mind made sick by anxious labours and fasts, a bodily temperament altered by rustic foods, and the melancholic humour are the causes of hermits' illusions."

[12316] Editor. The printed Guatinerius is a form of Antonio Guaineri's name; a Religious person means a member of a religious order. The margin specifies treatise 5, chapter 5. Forestus is again Pieter van Foreest. Cardano's On Subtlety 18 and On the Variety of Things 8.40 are cited for the combined effects of solitude, fasting and melancholy; these are historical explanatory categories.

[12317] Burton. Source page 657, f: "Solitudo est causa apparitionum; nulli visionibus & hinc delirio magis obnoxii sunt quàm qui collegiis & eremo vivunt monachi; tales plerumque melancholici ob victum, solitudinem." "Solitude is a cause of apparitions; no one is more exposed to visions and the resulting delirium than monks who live in communities and in the wilderness; such people are generally melancholic because of their diet and solitude."

[12318] Editor. Lavater is Ludwig Lavater. In R. H.'s English Of Ghostes and Spirites (1596), I.10 discusses fabricated monastic visions, while I.19 includes monasteries among places of apparitions. These are related contexts, not a verified source for Burton's entire Latin margin; his Latin edition remains uncollated. "The Devil's bath" makes melancholy congenial to demonic action. Collegia means religious communities; eremus, solitary retirement or wilderness. Burton combines natural causes with demonic agency.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 657 [12319]Polydore Virgil lib.2. de prodigiis, holds that those prophesies and Monkes revelations, Nunnes dreams, which they suppose come from God, do proceed wholly ab instinctu dæmonum, by the Divels means: and so those Enthusiasts, Anabaptists, pseudo-Prophets from the same cause.	Polydore Vergil, On Prodigies, book 2, holds that those prophecies, monks' revelations and nuns' dreams that they suppose come from God proceed wholly "from the prompting of demons," by the Devil's means. So too with those enthusiasts, Anabaptists and false prophets: the cause is the same.[12320]
[12321]Fracastorius lib.2. de intellect. will have all your Pythonisses, Sibyls, and pseudo-prophets to be meer melancholy: so doth Wierus prove, lib.1.cap.8. & l.3.cap.7. and Arculanus in 9. Rhasis, that melancholy is a sole cause, and the Divell together, with fasting and solitariness, of such Sibylline prophesies, if there were ever such, which with [12322]Casaubon and others I justly except at;	Fracastoro, On Understanding, book 2, maintains that all your prophetic women, sibyls and false prophets are merely melancholic. Weyer likewise argues, in book 1, chapter 8, and book 3, chapter 7, as does Arcolani on book 9 of Rhazes, that melancholy is a sufficient cause, together with the Devil, fasting and solitude, of such Sibylline prophecies—if such prophecies ever existed, which, with Casaubon and others, I have good grounds for questioning.[12323]

[12319] Burton. Source page 657, g: "Monachi sese putant prophetare ex Deo, & qui solitariam agunt vitam, quum sit instinctu dæmonum; & sic falluntur fatidicæ; à malo genio habent, quæ putant à Deo, & sic Enthusiastæ." "Monks and those who lead solitary lives think that they prophesy from God, when it is through the prompting of demons; prophetic women are deceived in the same way: what they think comes from God comes from an evil spirit. So too with enthusiasts."

[12320] Editor. Polydore Vergil's On Prodigies is cited here as book 2. Enthusiasts are claimants to direct divine inspiration. Pseudo-prophets means false prophets. The grouping with Anabaptists belongs to Burton's confessional polemic.

[12321] Burton. Source page 657, h: "Sibyllæ, Pythii & Prophetæ qui divinare solent, omnes phanatici sunt melancholici." "Sibyls, Pythian seers and prophets who practise divination are all frenzied melancholics."

[12322] Burton. Source page 657, i: "Exercit. c.1." "Exercises, chapter 1."

[12323] Editor. Fracastorius is Girolamo Fracastoro; Wierus is Johann Weyer; Arculanus is Giovanni Arcolani, commenting on book 9 of Rhazes. Pythonisses are prophetic women associated with Apollo, by extension inspired diviners. Burton disputes the purportedly ancient Sibylline predictions of Christ, citing Casaubon's Exercises, chapter 1; the precise edition and passage remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
for it is not likely that the Spirit of God should ever reveal such manifest revelations and predictions of Christ, to those Pythonissæ, witches, Apollo's priests, the Divels ministers, (they were no better) and conceal them from his own prophets: for these Sibyls set down all particular circumstances of Christs coming, and many other future accidents far more perspicuous and plain than ever any prophet did.	For it is unlikely that the Spirit of God would ever disclose such clear revelations and predictions of Christ to those prophetesses, witches, Apollo's priests, the Devil's ministers—they were no better—and conceal them from his own prophets. Yet these sibyls set out every particular circumstance of Christ's coming and many other future events far more clearly and plainly than any prophet ever did.
But howsoever there be no Phœbades or Sibyls, I am assured there be other Enthusiasts, prophets, dii Fatidici, Magi, (of which read Io. Boissardus, who hath laboriously collected them into a great [12324]volume of late, with elegant pictures, and epitomized their lives) &c. ever have been in all ages, and still proceeding from those causes, [12325]qui visiones suas enarrant, somniant futura, prophetisant, & ejusmodi deliriis agitati, Spiritum Sanctum sibi communicari putant.	But even if there are no prophetesses of Apollo or sibyls, I am certain there are other enthusiasts, prophets, oracular gods, magicians and so on. Read Jean-Jacques Boissard about them: he has recently and laboriously gathered them into a large volume, with fine pictures and summaries of their lives. They have existed in every age, always arising from those causes: "They recount their visions, dream of future events, prophesy, and, driven by delusions of this kind, think that the Holy Spirit is imparted to them."[12326]

[12324] Burton. Source page 657, first dagger: "De divinatione & Magicis præstigiis." "On Divination and Magical Illusions."

[12325] Burton. Source page 657, star: "Idem." "The same author."

[12326] Editor. Phœbades are priestesses or prophetesses of Phoebus Apollo. Dii fatidici means gods that utter oracles, and Magi here means magicians or learned diviners. Io. Boissardus is Jean-Jacques Boissard; the marginal title is On Divination and Magical Illusions. "Idem" at the next quotation refers back to the same author. Burton's denial concerns the authenticity of the alleged prophetic texts, not a denial that people have claimed inspiration.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That which is written of Saint Francis five wounds, and other such monasticall effects, of him and others, may justly be referred to this our Melancholy; and that which Matthew Paris relates of the [12327]Monk of Evesham, who saw heaven and hell in a vision; of [12328]Sir Owen, that went down into Saint Patrickes purgatory in King Stephens dayes, and saw as much: Walsingham of him that was shewed as much by Saint Julian.	What is written about Saint Francis's five wounds, and other such monastic experiences of his and of others, may reasonably be attributed to this melancholy of ours. So may what Matthew Paris relates about the monk of Evesham, who saw heaven and hell in a vision, and about Sir Owen, who went down into Saint Patrick's Purgatory in King Stephen's days and saw as much; and what Walsingham tells of the man to whom Saint Julian showed as much.[12329]
Beda lib.5.cap.13.14.15. & 20. reports of King Sebba, lib.4.cap.11. eccles. hist. that saw strange visions; and Stumphius Helvet. Cornic. a cobler of Basil, 1520 that beheld rare apparitions at Ausborough [12330]in Germany.	Bede, book 5, chapters 13, 14, 15 and 20, and book 4, chapter 11, of his Ecclesiastical History, reports strange visions, including those of King Sæbbi; and Stumpf's Swiss chronicle tells of a cobbler of Basel who saw extraordinary apparitions at Augsburg in Germany in 1520.[12331]

[12327] Burton. Source page 657, k: "Post.15. dierum preces & jejunia, mirabiles videbat visiones." "After fifteen days of prayers and fasts, he saw wonderful visions."

[12328] Burton. Source page 657, l: "Fol.84. vita Stephani & fol.177. post trium mensium inediam & languorem per 9 dies nihil comedens aut bibens." "Folio 84, life of Stephen, and folio 177: after three months of fasting and weakness, eating and drinking nothing for nine days."

[12329] Editor. Saint Francis's five wounds are the stigmata, corresponding to the wounds of Christ. Burton assimilates accounts of them to his category of melancholy. The monk of Evesham and Sir Owen belong to medieval vision literature; Saint Patrick's Purgatory is represented as an entrance to the other world. The two folio references in margin l are preserved together and require edition-specific checking.

[12330] Burton. Source page 657, second dagger: "Bede, Gregory, Iacobus de Voragine, Liypomanus, Hieronymus, Iohn Major de vitis Patrum, &c." "Bede, Gregory, Jacobus de Voragine, Lippomano, Jerome, John Major, On the Lives of the Fathers, and so on."

[12331] Editor. Sebba is Sæbbi. Bede's Ecclesiastical History 4.11 and the cited chapters of book 5 concern several different experiences around death and the afterlife; Burton's compressed syntax strings them together. Stumphius is Johannes Stumpf; Helvet. Cornic. is printed here, apparently for a Swiss chronicle. Basil means Basel and Ausborough Augsburg. The second dagger adds a general catalogue of authorities for visions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Alexander ab Alexandro, gen. dier. lib.6.cap.21. of an Enthusiasticall prisoner, (all out as probable as that of Eris Armenius, in Plato's tenth dialogue de Repub. that revived again ten dayes after he was killed in a battell, and told strange wonders, like those tales Ulysses related to Alcinous in Homer, or Lucians vera historia it self) was still after much solitariness, fasting, or long sickness, when their brains were addle, and their bellies as empty of meat as their heads of wit.[12332]	Alessandro d'Alessandro, Genial Days, book 6, chapter 21, tells of an inspired prisoner. All this is every bit as probable as the story of Eris Armenius in the tenth book of Plato's Republic, who revived ten days after being killed in battle and told strange wonders, like the tales Ulysses told Alcinous in Homer, or Lucian's True History itself. It always happened after prolonged solitude, fasting or long illness, when their brains were addled and their bellies as empty of food as their heads of sense.[12333]
Florilegus hath many such examples, fol.191. one of Saint Gultlake of Crowalde that fought with Divels, but still after long fasting, overmuch solitariness, [12334]the Divell perswaded him therefore to fast, as Moses and Elias did, the better to delude him.	Florilegus has many such examples: on folio 191, one of Saint Guthlac of Crowland fighting with devils, but always after long fasting and excessive solitude. The Devil therefore persuaded him to fast as Moses and Elijah did, the better to deceive him.[12335]

[12332] Burton. Source page 657, m: "After contemplation in an extasis; so Hierom was whipped for reading Tully; see millions of examples in our Annals."

[12333] Editor. Alexander ab Alexandro is Alessandro d'Alessandro; gen. dier. abbreviates Genial Days. Plato's Republic 10.614b says Er's body was recovered on the tenth day and he revived on the twelfth: Burton's ten days is retained. Eris Armenius also compresses the name and parentage: Er, son of Armenius. Lucian's True History is a deliberately fantastic fiction. The comparison sharply questions the credibility of the other narratives.

[12334] Burton. Source page 657, n: "Fol.199 post abstinentiæ curas miras illusiones dæmonum audivit." "Folio 199: after the rigours of abstinence, he heard strange illusions of demons."

[12335] Editor. Tully is Cicero. The loosely attached margin m is placed with Burton's explanation of the visions; compare Jerome, Letter 22.30, where illness, a judgment scene and scourging accompany his attachment to classical books. Florilegus is the traditional name attached to the Flowers of History. Gultlake of Crowalde is Saint Guthlac of Crowland. Burton's folio references and their exact editions remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12336]In the same Authour is recorded Carolus Magnus vision An.185. or extasis, wherein he saw heaven and hell after much fasting and meditation. So did the Divell of old with Apollos priests, Amphiaraus and his fellowes, those Ægyptians,	The same author records Charlemagne's vision or ecstasy in the year 185, in which he saw heaven and hell after much fasting and meditation. So the Devil acted in former times with Apollo's priests, Amphiaraus and his companions, and those Egyptians:[12337]
Source page 657–658 still enjoyn long fasting before he would give any Oracles, triduum à cibo & vino abstinere, [12338]before they gave any answers, as Volateran lib.13.cap.4. records, and Strabo Geog. lib.14. describes Charons den, in the way betwixt Tralles and Nissum, whither the Priests led sick and fanaticke men: but nothing performed without long fasting, no good to be done.	he always prescribed long fasting before he would give any oracles, "abstaining from food and wine for three days," before they gave any answers, as Volateran records in book 13, chapter 4. Strabo, Geography, book 14, describes Charon's cave, on the road between Tralles and Nissum, where priests led sick and frenzied people: but nothing could be accomplished without long fasting; no good could be done.[12339]
Source page 658 That scoffing [12340]Lucian conducts his Menippus to hell by the directions of that Chaldean Mithrobarzanes, but after long fasting, and such like idle preparation.	That scoffer Lucian takes his Menippus to the underworld under the direction of the Chaldean Mithrobarzanes, but only after long fasting and similar empty preparations.[12341]

[12336] Burton. Source page 657, o: "Fol.155. post seriam meditationem in vigilia diei dominicæ visionem habuit de purgatorio." "Folio 155: after earnest meditation on the eve of the Lord's day, he had a vision of purgatory."

[12337] Editor. Carolus Magnus means Charlemagne, for whom printed An.185 is impossible. Compare Flowers of History, traditionally attributed to Matthew of Westminster, under 885 (Yonge, 1853, I, pp. 437–440): Charles, son of Louis, sees punishments and paradise after Sunday night prayers. This close parallel does not establish Burton's folio 155 or justify silently repairing his name and date. Margin o says purgatory; the body says heaven and hell. Amphiaraus is the legendary oracular seer.

[12338] Burton. Source page 658, p: "Ubi multos dies manent jejuni consilio sacerdotum auxilia invocantes." "There they remain fasting for many days, invoking aid at the priests' direction."

[12339] Editor. Volateran is Raffaele Maffei of Volterra. Strabo, Geography 14.1.44, describes the Charonium at Acharaca, between Tralles and Nysa, and sick people fasting under priests' direction. Nissum is retained as the source's place-name form. Margin p is printed earlier, before "before they gave any answers," although its content corresponds to Strabo's account.

[12340] Burton. Source page 658, q: "In Necromant. Et cibus quidem glandes erant, potus aqua, lectus sub dio, &c." "In Necromancy. Their food was acorns, their drink water, their bed under the open sky, and so on."

[12341] Editor. Lucian, Menippus or Necromancy 6–7, satirizes ritual preparations for a visit to Hades. Burton's marginal account compresses the diet: Lucian also mentions milk and honey-drink as well as water. His "hell" here translates the classical underworld, not specifically Christian damnation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Which the Jesuites right well perceiving of what force this fasting and solitary meditation is, to alter mens minds, when they would make a man mad, ravish him, improve him beyond himself, to undertake some great business of moment, to kill a King, or the like, [12342]they bring him into a melancholy dark chamber, where he shall see no light for many dayes together; no company, little meat, gastly pictures of Divels all about him,	The Jesuits, perceiving very well how powerfully this fasting and solitary meditation can alter people's minds, when they wish to make a man mad, transport him and work him up beyond himself to undertake some great enterprise—kill a king or the like—bring him into a gloomy, dark chamber. There he will see no light for many days together, have no company and little food, with ghastly pictures of devils all around him;[12343] and leave him to lie as he will himself, on the bare floor in this chamber of meditation, as they call it, on his back, side, belly, till by this strange usage they make him quite mad and beside himself. And then after some ten dayes, as they find him animated and resolved, they make use of him. The Divell hath many such factours, many such engines, which what effect they produce, you shall hear in these following Symptomes.	and they leave him to lie as he pleases on the bare floor of this "chamber of meditation," as they call it, on his back, side or belly, until this strange treatment makes him wholly mad and beside himself. Then, after some ten days, when they find him fired up and resolute, they make use of him. The Devil has many such agents, many such instruments. You will hear what effects they produce in the symptoms that follow.

[12342] Burton. Source page 658, r: "John Everardus Britano-Romanus lib. edit.1611. describes all the manner of it."

[12343] Editor. Burton alleges that Jesuits use enforced isolation to prepare assassins. This is presented as his anti-Jesuit polemic, supported by his printed reference to John Everard's Britano-Romanus (1611); it has not been independently established by that citation. Improve him beyond himself means heighten or work up his state of mind. Meat means food. Factours are agents and engines instruments or devices.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 3.	SUBSECTION 3
Symptomes generall, love to their own sect, hate of all other Religions, obstinacie, peevishness, ready to undergo any danger or crosse for it; Martyrs, blinde zeal, blinde obedience, fastings, vowes, belief of incredibilities, impossibilities: Particular of Gentiles, Mahometans, Jews, Christians; and in them, Heretickes old and new, Schismaticks, Schoolmen, Prophets, Enthusiasts, &c.	General symptoms: love of their own sect; hatred of all other religions; obstinacy and ill temper; readiness to undergo any danger or adversity for it; martyrs; blind zeal and blind obedience; fasts and vows; belief in incredible and impossible things. Particular symptoms among pagans, Muslims, Jews and Christians; and among Christians, heretics old and new, schismatics, scholastic theologians, prophets, enthusiasts and so on.[12344]
Fleat Heraclitus, an rideat Democritus? in attempting to speak of these Symptomes, shall I laugh with Democritus, or weep with Heraclitus? they are so ridiculous and absurd on the one side, so lamentable and tragical on the other; a mixt Scene offers it self, so full of errours, and a promiscuous variety of objects, that I know not in what strain to represent it.	"Should Heraclitus weep, or Democritus laugh?" In attempting to speak of these symptoms, shall I laugh with Democritus or weep with Heraclitus? They are so ridiculous and absurd on the one hand, so lamentable and tragic on the other. A mixed scene presents itself, so full of errors and such a confused variety of objects that I do not know in what manner to portray it.[12345]

[12344] Editor. The new subsection shifts from causes to symptoms. Cross means adversity; peevishness includes wilfulness and ill temper. Schoolmen are scholastic theologians. The source's religious labels and hostile generalizations are retained as Burton's own historical language, not adopted as editorial judgments.

[12345] Editor. The opposed figures are the traditionally weeping Heraclitus and laughing Democritus. Burton resumes the double perspective announced by his persona "Democritus Junior": religious folly invites ridicule, while its suffering and violence call for pity. The opening Latin question is followed by Burton's own English expansion, both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
When I think of that Turkish paradise, those Jewish fables, and pontifical rites, those Pagan superstitions, their sacrifices and ceremonies, as to make images of all matter, and adore them when they have done; to see them kiss the pyx, creep to the cross, &c. I cannot choose but laugh with Democritus: but when I see them whip and torture themselves, grind their souls for toyes and trifles, desperate, and now ready to die, I cannot choose but weep with Heraclitus.	When I think of that Turkish paradise, those Jewish fables and priestly rites, those pagan superstitions, their sacrifices and ceremonies—making images out of every sort of material and worshipping them when they are finished—or see people kiss the pyx, creep to the cross and so on, I cannot help laughing with Democritus. But when I see them whip and torture themselves, torment their souls over toys and trifles, despairing and now ready to die, I cannot help weeping with Heraclitus.[12346]
Source page 658–651 [659] When I see a Priest say masse, with all those apish gestures, murmurings, &c. read the customes of the Jews Synagogue, or Mahometa Meschites, I must needs [12347]laugh at their folly, risum teneatis amici? but when I see them make matters of conscience of such toyes and trifles, to adore the Divel, to endanger their souls, to offer their children to their Idols, &c. I must needs condole their misery.	When I see a priest say Mass with all those ape-like gestures and mutterings, or read of the customs of Jewish synagogues or Muslim mosques, I must laugh at their folly: "Could you keep from laughing, friends?" But when I see them make matters of conscience of such toys and trifles, worship the Devil, endanger their souls and offer their children to their idols, I must pity their misery.[12348]

[12346] Editor. A pyx is a vessel for the consecrated host. Creeping to the cross refers to a devotional approach to the cross, particularly in Good Friday observance. Pontifical rites means priestly ceremonies. Burton's vocabulary places different traditions together as objects of Protestant criticism.

[12347] Burton. Source page 658, s: "Varius mappa componere risum vix poterat." "Varius could scarcely compose his laughter with a napkin."

[12348] Editor. Meschites means mosques. Risum teneatis amici adapts Horace, Art of Poetry 5, "could you keep from laughing, friends?" Margin s adapts Satires 2.8.63–64; the usual verb is compescere, "check or restrain," where this scan prints componere, "compose." The source reading is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 651 [659] When I see two superstitious Orders contend pro aris & focis, with such have and hold, de lana caprina, some write such great Volumes to no purpose, take so much pains to so small effect, their Satyrs, invectives, apologies, dull and gross fictions; when I see grave learned men rail and scold like butter-women, methinks 'tis pretty sport, and fit [12349]for Calphurnius and Democritus to laugh at. But when I see so much bloud spilt, so many murders and massacres, so many cruel battels fought, &c. 'tis a fitter subject for Heraclitus to lament.	When I see two superstitious orders contend "for altars and hearths," with such fierce persistence, "about goat's wool"; when some write such great volumes to no purpose, take so much trouble to so little effect with their satires, invectives, defences and dull, crude fictions; when I see grave, learned men rail and scold like women selling butter, I think it is fine sport, fit for Calphurnius and Democritus to laugh at. But when I see so much blood shed, so many murders and massacres, so many cruel battles fought, it is a fitter subject for Heraclitus to lament.[12350]
[12351]As Merlin when he sate by the lake side with Vortiger, and had seen the white and red dragon fight, before he began to interpret or to speak, in fletum prorupit, fell a weeping, and then proceeded to declare to the King what it meant. I should first pity and bewaile this misery of humane kind with some passionate preface, wishing mine eyes a fountain of tears, as Jeremy did, and then to my task.	As Merlin, when sitting beside the lake with Vortigern, after seeing the white and red dragons fight, "burst into tears" before he began to interpret or speak—fell to weeping, and then went on to tell the king what it meant—so I should first pity and mourn this misery of humankind in some passionate preface, wishing my eyes a fountain of tears, as Jeremiah did, and then turn to my task.[12352]

[12349] Burton. Source page 651 [659], t: "Pleno ridet Calphurnius ore. Hor." "Calphurnius laughs with his mouth wide open. Horace."

[12350] Editor. Pro aris et focis means "for altars and hearths"; de lana caprina, "about goat's wool," denotes a pointless dispute. Have and hold means determined contention; apologies, defences; butter-women invokes market sellers' scolding. Angus Gowland identifies a similar Calphurnius margin, also attributed to Horace, in Foxe's Acts and Monuments (1570), p. 1423. This transmission lead needs direct collation here; the Horatian original remains unidentified.

[12351] Burton. Source page 651 [659], u: "Alanus de Insulis." "Alan of Lille."

[12352] Editor. Vortiger is Vortigern. The white and red dragons belong to the legendary story also told by Geoffrey of Monmouth, History of the Kings of Britain 7.3, where Merlin weeps before interpreting their combat. Burton instead cites Alan of Lille in the margin; the precise intermediary needs collation. The wish for a fountain of tears recalls Jeremiah 9:1.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For it is that great torture, that infernal plague of mortal men, omnium pestium pestilentissima superstitio, and able of it self alone to stand in opposition to all other plagues, miseries and calamities whatsoever; far more cruel, more pestiferous, more grievous, more general, more violent, of a greater extent.	For this is that great torment, that infernal plague of mortals, "superstition, the most pestilent of all plagues," capable by itself of matching all other plagues, miseries and calamities whatsoever: far more cruel, more destructive, more grievous, more widespread, more violent and more far-reaching.[12353]
Other fears and sorrows, grievances of body and mind, are troublesome for the time; but this is for ever, eternal damnation, hell it self, a plague, a fire: an inundation hurts one Province alone, and the loss may be recovered; but this superstition involves all the world almost, and can never be remedied.	Other fears and sorrows, afflictions of body and mind, trouble us for a time; but this is for ever: eternal damnation, hell itself. A plague, a fire or a flood harms only one province, and the loss may be repaired; but this superstition engulfs almost the whole world and can never be remedied.
Sickness and sorrows come and go, but a superstitious soul hath no rest; [12354]superstitione imbutus animus nunquam quietus esse potest, no peace, no quietness. True Religion and Superstition are quite opposite, longe diversa carnificina & pietas, as Lactantius describes, the one ereares, the other dejects; illorum pietas, mera impietas;	Sickness and sorrows come and go, but a superstitious soul has no rest: "A mind steeped in superstition can never be at peace"—no peace, no quiet. True religion and superstition are complete opposites: "Torture and piety are far apart," as Lactantius puts it. One raises us, the other casts us down; "their piety is sheer impiety."[12355]

[12353] Editor. Burton describes superstition as a torment extending beyond ordinary illness or calamity because its fears include eternal punishment. Pestilence, fire and flood supply the comparison; the argument is rhetorical and theological rather than a quantitative comparison of harms.

[12354] Burton. Source page 651 [659], x: "Cicero 1. de finibus." "Cicero, On Ends, book 1."

[12355] Editor. The source cites Cicero, On Ends 1. The quotation adapts 1.60, where Cicero says that someone steeped in superstition can never be at peace; compare 1.63 on relief through knowledge of nature. Lactantius, Divine Institutes 5.19, distinguishes religious devotion from torture and argues against coercion in religion. Burton abbreviates his words.

Original text 1651	Modern English
the one is an easie yoak, the other an intolerable burden, an absolute tyranny; the one a sure anchor, an haven; the other a tempestuous Ocean; the one makes, the other marrs; the one is wisdome, the other is folly, madness, indiscretion; the one unfained, the other a counterfeit; the one a diligent observer, the other an ape; one leads to heaven, the other to hell. But these differences will more evidently appear by their particular symptomes.	One is an easy yoke, the other an intolerable burden, an absolute tyranny; one a secure anchor, a harbour, the other a stormy ocean; one builds up, the other ruins; one is wisdom, the other folly, madness and lack of judgment; one sincere, the other counterfeit; one a careful observer, the other a mere imitator; one leads to heaven, the other to hell. These differences will appear more clearly in their particular symptoms.[12356]
What Religion is, and of what parts it doth consist, every Catechism will tell you, what Symptomes it hath, and what effects it produceth: but for their superstitions, no tongue can tell them, no pen express, they are so many, so diverse, so uncertain, so unconstant, and so different from themselves. Tot mundi superstitiones, quot cœlo stellæ, one saith, there be as many superstitions in the world, as there be stars in heaven, or divels themselves that are the first founders of them:	Every catechism will tell you what religion is and what its parts are, what signs it has and what effects it produces. But as for their superstitions, no tongue can tell them, no pen describe them: they are so many, so diverse, so uncertain, so unstable and so inconsistent with themselves. "As many superstitions in the world as stars in heaven," someone says: there are as many superstitions in the world as stars in heaven, or as the devils themselves who first founded them.
with such ridiculous, absurd symptomes and signs, so many several rites, ceremonies, torments and vexations accompanying, as may well expresse and beseem the divel to be the author and maintainer of them. I will only point at some of them, ex ungue leonem, guesse at the rest, and those of the chief kinds of superstition, which beside us Christians now domineer and crucifie the world, Gentiles, Mahometans, Jews, &c.	They are accompanied by such ridiculous, absurd symptoms and signs, so many different rites, ceremonies, torments and afflictions, that they plainly display the Devil as their author and supporter, as befits him. I shall only point out some of them—"from the claw, the lion"; infer the rest—and examples from the chief kinds of superstition that, besides those of us Christians, now tyrannize over and torment the world: pagans, Muslims, Jews and so on.[12357]

[12356] Editor. The "easy yoke" recalls Matthew 11:30. An ape is an imitator. Burton's sharp distinction between true religion and superstition preserves a positive role for faith even as he subjects religious conduct to satire and medical explanation.

[12357] Editor. "From the claw, the lion" is the proverbial inference of a whole from a small sample. Gentiles and Mahometans become pagans and Muslims in the modern column. The source page is misnumbered 651; its sequential place is 659. The following leaf is printed 660.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 660 Of these symptomes some be general, some particular to each private sect: general to all, are, an extraordinary love and affection they bear and shew to such as are of their own sect, and more then Vatinian hate to such as are opposite in Religion, as they call it, or disagree from them in their superstitious rites, blind zeal, (which is as much a symptome as a cause,) vain fears, blind obedience, needless works, incredibilities, impossibilities, monstrous rites and ceremonies, wilfulness, blindness, obstinacy, &c.	Some of these symptoms are general; others belong to each individual sect. Common to all are the extraordinary love and affection they bear and show towards members of their own sect, and more than Vatinian hatred towards those who oppose them in religion, as they call it, or differ from them in their superstitious rites; blind zeal, which is as much a symptom as a cause; groundless fears; blind obedience; needless works; incredible and impossible beliefs; monstrous rites and ceremonies; wilfulness, blindness, obstinacy, and so on.[12358]
For the first, which is love and hate, as [12359]Montanus saith, nulla firmior amicitia quàm quæ contrahitur hinc; nulla discordia major, quàm quæ à religione fit; no greater concord, no greater discord then that which proceeds from Religion.	As for the first, love and hatred, Montanus says, "No friendship is stronger than that formed by religion; no discord greater than that which arises from it": no greater concord, no greater discord than that which proceeds from religion.[12360]
It is incredible to relate, did not our dayly experience evince it, what factions, quam teterrimæ factiones, (as [12361]Rich. Dinoth writes) have been of late for matters of Religion in France, and what hurly burlies all over Europe for these many years. Nihil est quod tam impotenter rapiat homines, quam suscepta de salute opinio; siquidem pro ea omnes gentes corpora & animas devovere solent, & arctissimo necessitudinis vinculo se invicem colligare.	Were it not proved by daily experience, it would be incredible to relate what factions—what utterly hideous factions, as Richard Dinoth writes—have lately arisen over religion in France, and what turmoil has convulsed all Europe for so many years. "Nothing carries people away so uncontrollably as an accepted belief about salvation: for its sake, all nations commonly devote their bodies and souls and bind themselves to one another by the closest ties of fellowship."[12362]

[12358] Editor. Vatinian hatred is proverbial bitter enmity, associated with the Roman politician Vatinius. Sect here means a religious party or community. The scan reads printed page 660. The body begins here without omission.

[12359] Burton. Source page 660, y: "In Micah comment." "Commentary on Micah."

[12360] Editor. The scan reads Montanus, with a reference to a commentary on Micah. The precise edition and passage remain to be collated. Burton gives both a Latin maxim and an English restatement, retained separately here.

[12361] Burton. Source page 660, dagger: "Gall. hist. lib.1." "French history, book 1."

[12362] Editor. Richard Dinoth is cited for the French religious wars. Quam teterrimæ factiones intensifies Burton's preceding "what factions": "what utterly hideous factions." The Latin statement about salvation is translated separately; the exact passage in the history remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We are all brethren in Christ, servants of one Lord, members of one body, and therefore are or should be at least dearly beloved, inseparably allied in the greatest bond of love and familiarity, united partakers not only of the same cross, but coadjutors, comforters, helpers, at all times, upon all occasions: as they did in the primitive Church, Acts the 5. they sold their patrimonies, and laid them at the Apostles feet, and many such memorable examples of mutual love we have had under the ten general persecutions, many since. Examples on the other side of discord none like, as our Saviour saith, he came therefore into the world to set father against son, &c.	We are all brothers in Christ, servants of one Lord, members of one body; and therefore we are, or at least should be, dearly loved, inseparably joined in the closest bond of love and intimacy. United, we should not merely share the same cross but assist, comfort and help one another at all times and on every occasion. So they did in the early Church: in Acts 5 they sold their inherited property and laid it at the apostles' feet. We have many such memorable examples of mutual love during the ten general persecutions, and many since. Yet on the other side are unparalleled examples of discord: as our Saviour says, he came into the world to set father against son, and so on.[12363]

[12363] Editor. Compare Acts 4:34–35 for the sale of property and the money laid at the apostles' feet; Acts 5 continues with Ananias and Sapphira. Burton's Acts 5 is retained. The "ten persecutions" is a traditional Christian division of Roman persecution, not a count established here. The saying about father and son recalls Matthew 10:35 and Luke 12:53.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In imitation of whom the Devil belike ([12364]nam superstitio irrepsit veræ religionis imitatrix, superstition is still Religions ape, as in all other things, so in this) doth so combine and glew together his superstitious followers in love and affection, that they will live and die together: and what an innate hatred hath he still inspired to any other superstition opposite? How those old Romans were affected, those ten persecutions may be a witness, and that cruel executioner in Eusebius, aut lita aut morere, sacrifice or dye. No greater hate, more continuate, bitter faction, wars, persecution in all ages, then for matters of Religion, no such feral opposition, father against son, mother against daughter, husband against wife, City against City, Kingdome against Kingdome: as of old at Tentira and Combos:	Apparently in imitation of him, the Devil—for "superstition has crept in as an imitator of true religion"; superstition always apes religion, in this as in everything else—so binds and glues his superstitious followers together in love and affection that they will live and die together. And what deeply rooted hatred he has always inspired against any rival superstition! The ten persecutions bear witness to the temper of those ancient Romans, as does that cruel executioner in Eusebius: "Either sacrifice or die"—sacrifice or die. In every age there has been no greater hatred, no more persistent and bitter faction, war or persecution than that over religion; no such savage conflict of father against son, mother against daughter, husband against wife, city against city, kingdom against kingdom—as long ago at Tentira and Combos:[12365]
[12366]Immortale odium, & nunquam sanabile vulnus, Inde furor vulgo, quod numina vicinorum Odit uterque locus, quum solos credit habendos Esse deos quos ipse colat. —	Undying hatred, a wound that can never be healed; Hence the people's fury: the neighbours' gods Are hated by each town, since each believes that only The gods it worships should be held as gods. —[12367]
Immortal hate it breeds, a wound past cure, And fury to the commons still to endure: Because one City t'others gods as vain Deride, and his alone as good maintain.	It breeds undying hate, a wound beyond all cure, And fury that the common people must endure: One city mocks the other's gods as vain, And holds that its own gods alone are good.

[12364] Burton. Source page 660, z: "Lactantius."

[12365] Editor. Religions ape means a counterfeit imitator of religion. Compare Lactantius, Divine Institutes 4.28: true religion and superstition differ by the object of worship, not merely the frequency of prayers or sacrifices. This contextual comparison, checked in English translation, does not locate Burton's exact maxim. The Eusebius executioner also remains unidentified. Feral means deadly or savage. Burton treats persecution as a symptom of superstition while distinguishing it from true religion.

[12366] Burton. Source page 660, a: "Juv. Sat.15." "Juvenal, Satire 15."

[12367] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 15.33–38, describes hatred between Egyptian communities. Burton abridges and adapts the Latin. His Combos corresponds to Juvenal's Ombos; Tentira to Tentura. The Latin verse and Burton's separate four-line English rendering both remain, each with its source lineation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 660–661 The Turks at this day count no better of us then of dogs, so they commonly call us Gaures, infidels, miscreants, make that their main quarrel and cause of Christian persecution. If he will turn Turk, he shall be entertained as a brother, and had in good esteem, a Muselman or a believer, which is a greater tye to them then any affinity or consanguinity.	The Turks today think no better of us than of dogs. They commonly call us Gaures, infidels, unbelievers, and make this their chief grievance and reason for persecuting Christians. If a man will become a Turk, he will be welcomed as a brother and held in esteem as a Muselman, or believer—a bond stronger to them than any relationship by marriage or blood.[12368]
Source page 661 The Jews stick together like so many burrs, but as for the rest whom they call Gentiles, they do hate and abhor, they cannot endure their Messias should be a common Saviour to us all, and rather as [12369]Luther writes, then they that now scoff at them, curse them, persecute and revile them, shall be coheirs and brethren with them, or have any part of fellowship with their Messias, they would crucifie their Messias ten times over, and God himself, his Angels, and all his creatures, if it were possible, though they endure a thousand hels for it: Such is their malice towards us.	The Jews cling together like burrs; but the rest, whom they call Gentiles, they hate and abhor. They cannot bear that their Messiah should be a common Saviour to us all; and, as Luther writes, rather than allow those who now mock, curse, persecute and revile them to become their fellow heirs and brothers, or to share in any fellowship with their Messiah, they would crucify their Messiah ten times over, and God himself, his angels and all his creatures, if that were possible, though they should suffer a thousand hells for it. Such is their malice towards us.[12370]

[12368] Editor. Turk here combines a political and a religious designation; to turn Turk means to become Muslim. Gaures is a form of giaour, a hostile designation for a non-Muslim; Muselman means Muslim. The sweeping descriptions are Burton's confessional polemic, not neutral accounts of Muslim or Jewish belief.

[12369] Burton. Source page 661, b: "Comment. in Micha. Ferre non possunt ut illorum Messias communis servator sit, nostrum gaudium &c. Messias vel decem decies crucifixuri essent, ipsumque deum si id fieri posset, una cum angelis & creaturis omnibus, nec absterrerentur ab hoc facto etsi mille inferna subeunda forent." "Commentary on Micah. They cannot bear that their Messiah should be a common saviour, our joy, and so on. They would crucify the Messiah ten times ten times, and God himself, if that were possible, together with all the angels and creatures; nor would they be deterred from this deed even if they had to undergo a thousand hells."

[12370] Editor. This is an anti-Jewish accusation quoted from Luther and adopted by Burton. It does not describe Jewish teaching. The Latin margin says decem decies, "ten times ten"; Burton's body text says "ten times." Both readings are retained. The exact Micah passage requires collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now for Papists, what in a common cause for the advancement of their Religion they will endure, our Traitors and Pseudocatholicks will declare unto us; and how bitter on the other side to their adversaries, how violently bent, let those Marian times record, as those miserable slaughters at Merindol and Cabriers, the Spanish inquisition, the Duke of Alva's tyranny in the Low-countries, the French Massacres and Civil Wars.	As for Papists, our traitors and false Catholics show us what they will endure in a common cause to advance their religion. As evidence of their bitterness and violent hostility towards their opponents, let Mary's reign stand on record, along with the miserable massacres at Mérindol and Cabrières, the Spanish Inquisition, the Duke of Alba's tyranny in the Low Countries, and the French massacres and civil wars.[12371]
[12372]Tantum relligio potuit suadere malorum.	Such great evils could religion persuade people to commit.[12373]
Not there only, but all over Europe, we read of bloody battels, racks and wheels, seditions, factions, oppositions,	Not only there, but throughout Europe, we read of bloody battles, racks and breaking wheels, rebellions, factions and conflicts:
—— [12374]obvia signis Signa, pares aquilas, & pila minantia pilis,	—— standards confronting Standards, matching eagles, spears threatening spears,[12375]

[12371] Editor. Papists is a disparaging Protestant name for Roman Catholics; Pseudocatholicks means false Catholics. Marian times refers to Mary I's reign. Merindol and Cabriers are Mérindol and Cabrières; Burton groups their massacres with the Inquisition, the Duke of Alba's rule in the Netherlands, and French religious violence. His list serves a polemical argument rather than a balanced history.

[12372] Burton. Source page 661, c: "Lucret." "Lucretius."

[12373] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 1.101, concludes the account of Iphigenia's sacrifice. Burton applies the line to confessional violence. The rack and breaking wheel were instruments of torture and execution.

[12374] Burton. Source page 661, dagger: "Lucan."

[12375] Editor. Lucan, Civil War 1.6–7. The matched standards, eagles and spears signify Romans fighting Romans; Burton transfers the image to Europe's religious divisions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Invectives and contentions. They had rather shake hands with a Jew, Turk, or as the Spaniards do, suffer Moores to live amongst them, and Jews than Protestants; My name, (saith [12376]Luther) is more odious to them then any thief or murderer.	Invective and strife. They would rather shake hands with a Jew or a Turk, or, as the Spaniards do, allow Moors and Jews to live among them rather than Protestants. "My name," says Luther, "is more hateful to them than any thief or murderer."[12377]
So it is with all hereticks and schismaticks whatsoever: And none so passionate, violent in their tenents, opinions, obstinate, wilful, refractory, peevish, factious, singular and stiffe in defence of them; they do not only persecute and hate, but pity all other Religions, account them damned, blind, as if they alone were the true Church, they are the true heirs, have the Feesimple of heaven by a peculiar donation, 'tis entailed on them and their posterities, their doctrine sound, per funem aureum de cœlo delapsa doctrina, they alone are to be saved.	So it is with all heretics and schismatics whatsoever. None are so passionate and violent in their beliefs and opinions, so obstinate, wilful, defiant, perverse, factious, self-willed and rigid in defending them. They not only persecute and hate but pity all other religions, counting their followers damned and blind, as though they alone were the true Church. They are the true heirs; they own heaven outright by a special grant, and it is entailed upon them and their descendants. Their doctrine is sound—doctrine let down from heaven by a golden rope—and they alone will be saved.[12378]

[12376] Burton. Source page 661, d: "Ad Galat. comment. Nomen odiosius meum quam ullus homicida aut fur." "Commentary on Galatians. My name is more hateful than any murderer or thief."

[12377] Editor. Luther is cited through his commentary on Galatians; the exact passage remains uncollated. Burton's statement about Spain is retained as his comparison, without implying that it gives a reliable general account of Spanish policy towards Jews or Muslims.

[12378] Editor. Fee simple and entail are contrasting legal terms for ownership and hereditary restriction. Burton piles them up to ridicule claims of exclusive ownership of heaven. Per funem aureum means "by a golden rope"; that reading is clear in the scan.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Jews at this day are so incomprehensibly proud and churlish, (saith [12379]Luther, that soli salvari, soli domini terrarum salutari volunt. And as [12380]Buxtorfius adds, so ignorant and self-willed withall, that amongst their most understanding Rabbines you shall find nought but gross dotage, horrible hardness of heart, and stupend obstinacy, in all their actions, opinions, conversations: and yet so zealous withall, that no man living can be more, and vindicate themselves for the elect people of GOD.	The Jews today are "so incomprehensibly proud and surly," says Luther, "that they wish to be saved alone, and alone to be hailed as lords of the earth." And, as Buxtorf adds, "so ignorant and self-willed besides, that among their most learned rabbis you will find nothing but gross foolishness, dreadful hardness of heart and stupendous obstinacy in all their actions, opinions and conduct; yet so zealous that no one alive could be more so, claiming for themselves the title of God's chosen people."[12381]
'Tis so with all other superstitious sects, Mahometans, Gentiles in China, and Tartary; our ignorant Papists, Anabaptists, Separatists, and peculiar Churches of Amsterdam, they alone, and none but they can be saved. [12382]Zealous (as Paul saith, *Rom.*10.2.) without knowledge, they will endure any misery, any trouble, suffer and do that which the Sun beams will not endure to see, Religionis acti Furiis, all extremities, losses and dangers, take any pains, fast, pray, vow chastity, wilful poverty, forsake all and follow their Idols, dye a thousand deaths,	So it is with all other superstitious sects: Muslims; pagans in China and Tartary; our ignorant Papists, Anabaptists and Separatists; and the particular churches of Amsterdam. They alone, and no one else, can be saved. Zealous, as Paul says in Romans 10:2, "without knowledge," they will endure any misery or trouble, suffer and do things that the sun's rays cannot bear to see. Driven by the Furies of religion, they face every extremity, loss and danger, take any pains, fast, pray, vow chastity and voluntary poverty, abandon everything to follow their idols, and die a thousand deaths,[12383]

[12379] Burton. Source page 661, e: "In comment. Micah. Adeo incomprehensibilis & aspera eorum superbia, &c." "In the commentary on Micah. So incomprehensible and harsh is their pride, and so on."

[12380] Burton. Source page 661, f: "Synagog. Judæorum ca.1. Inter eorum intelligentissimos Rabbinos nil præter ignorantiam & insipientiam grandem invenies, horrendam indurationem, & obstinationem, &c." "The Jewish Synagogue, chapter 1. Among their most learned rabbis you will find nothing but ignorance and great foolishness, dreadful hardness of heart and obstinacy, and so on."

[12381] Editor. These are further hostile generalizations about Jews, attributed to Luther and Johannes Buxtorf's Synagoga Judaica, chapter 1. Churlish means harsh or ill-mannered; dotage means foolishness. Their exact quoted wording remains to be collated against those works.

[12382] Burton. Source page 661, g: "Great is Diana of the Ephesians, Act.19."

[12383] Editor. Separatists were Christians who separated from an established church; particular congregations in Amsterdam are not individually named. Burton extends the charge of exclusive salvation across religious communities. "Zealous … without knowledge" refers to Romans 10:2, correctly printed here. The margin's final chapter digit is damaged; Act.19 is read from context and the surviving shape, with comparison to Acts 19:28, 34.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 661–662 as some Jews did to Pilats souldiers, in like case, exertos præbentes jugulos, & manifeste præ se ferentes, (as Josephus hath it) chariorem esse vitâ sibi legis patriæ observationem, rather then abjure, or deny the least particle of that Religion which their Fathers profess, and they themselves have been brought up in, be it never so absurd, ridiculous, they will embrace it, and without farther enquiry or examination of the truth, though it be prodigiously false, they will believe it: they will take much more pains to go to hell, then we shall do to heaven.	as some Jews did when facing Pilate's soldiers in a similar situation, "offering their bared throats and plainly showing," as Josephus puts it, "that the observance of their ancestral law was dearer to them than life." Rather than renounce or deny the smallest part of the religion their fathers profess and in which they themselves were brought up, however absurd or ridiculous it may be, they will embrace it. Without further inquiry or examination of its truth, though it be monstrously false, they will believe it. They will take much more trouble to go to hell than we shall to go to heaven.[12384]
Source page 662 Single out the most ignorant of them, convince his understanding, shew him his errors, grosness, and absurdities of his sect, Non persuadebis etiamsi persuaseris, he will not be perswaded. As those Pagans told the Jesuits in Japona, [12385]they would do as their fore-fathers have done; and with Ratholde the Frisian Prince, go to hell for company, if most of their friends went thither: they will not be moved, no perswasion, no torture can stir them.	Single out the most ignorant of them, convince his understanding, show him his errors and the gross absurdities of his sect: "You will not persuade me, even if you persuade me." He will not be persuaded. As those pagans told the Jesuits in Japan, they would do as their forefathers had done; and, like Rathold, the Frisian prince, go to hell for company if most of their friends went there. They will not be moved: no persuasion, no torture can shake them.[12386]

[12384] Editor. Josephus, Jewish Antiquities 18.3.1 (18.55–59), relates resistance to Pilate's introduction of imperial images into Jerusalem; compare Jewish War 2.169–174. They bared their necks rather than permit violation of their laws. Burton uses this account as an example of zeal, but the surrounding disparagement is his own.

[12385] Burton. Source page 662, h: "Malunt cum illis insanire, quam cum aliis bene sentire." "They would rather be mad with those people than think soundly with others."

[12386] Editor. "You will not persuade me, even if you persuade me" is a proverbial paradox: argument may establish a case without overcoming refusal to assent. Ratholde is the Frisian ruler commonly called Radbod; Burton invokes the story of his refusal of baptism in order to remain with his ancestors. The precise narrative source is not supplied.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So that Papists cannot brag of their vows, poverty, obedience, orders, merits, martyrdoms, fastings, alms, good works, pilgrimages: much and more then all this, I shall shew you, is, and hath been done by these superstitious Gentiles, Pagans, Idolaters and Jews: their blind zeal and idolatrous superstition in all kinds is much at one; little or no difference, and it is hard to say which is the greatest, which is the grossest.	Papists, then, cannot boast of their vows, poverty, obedience, religious orders, merits, martyrdoms, fasting, alms, good works and pilgrimages. I shall show you that as much as all this, and more, is and has been done by these superstitious Gentiles, pagans, idolaters and Jews. Their blind zeal and idolatrous superstition of every kind are much the same; there is little or no difference, and it is hard to say which is the greatest or the grossest.
For if a man shall duly consider those superstitious rites amongst the Ethnicks in Japan, the Bannians in Gusart, the Chinese idolaters, [12387]Americans of old, in Mexico especially, Mahometan priests, he shall finde the same government almost, the same orders and ceremonies, or so like, that they may seem all apparently to be derived from some heathen spirit, and the Roman Hierarchy no better then the rest.	For anyone who carefully considers those superstitious rites among the pagans in Japan, the Banians in Gujarat, Chinese idolaters, the ancient Americans, especially in Mexico, and Muslim priests, will find almost the same government, the same orders and ceremonies—or such similar ones that all may plainly seem to derive from some heathen spirit, with the Roman hierarchy no better than the rest.[12388]

[12387] Burton. Source page 662, star: “Acosta. l.5.” “Acosta, book 5.”

[12388] Editor. Ethnicks means pagans. Bannians is an early European designation for Indian merchants, often extended to their religious practices; Gusart means Gujarat. José de Acosta’s Natural and Moral History, book 5, is Burton’s cited authority for American religion. Burton collapses distinct traditions into a Protestant comparison with Roman Catholic practice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In a word, this is common to all superstition, there is nothing so mad and absurd, so ridiculous, impossible, incredible, which they will not believe, observe, and diligently perform as much as in them lies; nothing so monstrous to conceive, or intolerable to put in practice, so cruel to suffer, which they will not willingly undertake. So powerful a thing is superstition. [12389]O Ægypt (as Trismegistus exclaims) thy religion is fables, and such as posterity will not believe.	In a word, this is common to all superstition: nothing is so mad and absurd, so ridiculous, impossible or incredible that they will not believe it, observe it and diligently carry it out as far as they can; nothing so monstrous to conceive, so intolerable to practise or so cruel to suffer that they will not willingly undertake it. Such is the power of superstition. "O Egypt," as Trismegistus exclaims, "your religion consists of fables, and such as future generations will not believe."[12390]
I know that in true Religion it self, many mysteries are so apprehended alone by faith, as that of the Trinity, which Turks especially deride, Christs Incarnation, resurrection of the body at the last day, quod ideo credendum (saith Tertullian) quod incredibile, &c. many miracles not to be controverted or disputed of.	I know that even in true religion many mysteries are apprehended by faith alone: the Trinity, which the Turks especially mock; Christ's Incarnation; and the resurrection of the body on the last day—"which must be believed precisely because," says Tertullian, "it is incredible," and so on. There are many miracles that are not to be questioned or disputed.[12391]
Mirari non rimari sapientia vera est, saith [12392]Gerhardus; & in divinis (as a good Father informs us) quædam credenda, quædam admiranda, &c. some things are to be believed, embraced, followed with all submission and obedience; some again admired.	"To wonder, not to probe, is true wisdom," says Gerhard; and "in divine matters," as a good Father tells us, "some things are to be believed, others wondered at," and so on. Some things are to be believed, embraced and followed with complete submission and obedience; others, again, to be wondered at.[12393]

[12389] Burton. Source page 662, first dagger: "O Ægypte, religionis tuæ solæ supersunt fabulæ eæque incredibiles posteris tuis." "O Egypt, only fables of your religion remain, and those unbelievable to your descendants."

[12390] Editor. Compare the lament in the Hermetic Asclepius 24: it predicts the loss of Egyptian worship and its reduction to stories disbelieved by posterity. Burton recasts that lament as testimony against the religion itself. His margin uses the present supersunt, "remain," while the body speaks of future unbelief; both forms are retained.

[12391] Editor. Burton defends the Trinity, Incarnation and resurrection as mysteries of true religion. His Tertullian quotation adapts On the Flesh of Christ 5, where belief in Christ's death and resurrection is expressed through paradoxes of absurdity and impossibility. It is not Tertullian's exact wording.

[12392] Burton. Source page 662, second dagger: "Meditat.19. de cœna domin." "Meditation 19, on the Lord's Supper."

[12393] Editor. Johann Gerhard is cited at Sacred Meditations 19, on the Lord's Supper. The wordplay mirari/rimari contrasts reverent wonder with probing inquiry. The following "good Father" is unnamed; its exact source remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Though Julian the Apostate scoff at Christians in this point, quod captivemus intellectum in obsequium fidei, saying, that the Christian Creed is like the Pythagorean Ipse dixit, we make our will and understanding too slavishly subject to our faith, without farther examination of the truth; yet as Saint Gregory truly answers, our Creed is altioris præstantiæ, and much more divine;	Julian the Apostate mocks Christians on this point, "because we take our understanding captive in obedience to faith," saying that the Christian Creed resembles the Pythagorean "He himself said it": we make our will and understanding too slavishly subject to our faith, without further examination of the truth. Yet, as Saint Gregory rightly answers, our Creed is "of a higher excellence," and far more divine;[12394]
Source page 662–663 and as Thomas will, piè consideranti semper suppetunt rationes, ostendentes credibilitatem in mysteriis supernaturalibus, we do absolutely believe it, and upon good reasons, for as Gregory well informeth us; Fides non habet meritum, ubi humanâ ratio quærit experimentum; that faith hath no merit, is not worth the name of faith, that will not apprehend without a certain demonstration:	and, as Thomas maintains, "For one who reflects devoutly, reasons are always available to show the credibility of supernatural mysteries." We believe it absolutely, and on good grounds, for, as Gregory rightly tells us, "Faith has no merit where human reason seeks proof." Faith that refuses to accept anything without certain demonstration has no merit and does not deserve the name of faith.[12395]
Source page 663 we must and will beleeve Gods word; and if we be mistaken or erre in our generall belief, as [12396]Richardus de sancto Victore vows he will say to Christ himself at the day of judgement; Lord, if we be deceived, thou alone hast deceived us: thus we plead.	We must and will believe God's word; and if we are mistaken or err in our common belief, we shall say, as Richard of Saint-Victor vows he will say to Christ himself on the day of judgment, "Lord, if we have been deceived, you alone have deceived us." This is our plea.[12397]

[12394] Editor. Julian the Apostate is the emperor who rejected Christianity. Ipse dixit, "he himself said it," denotes reliance on a master's authority. The language of taking thought captive recalls 2 Corinthians 10:5. Burton's Saint Gregory here appears to mean Gregory of Nazianzus, but the precise Julian passage and reply require collation.

[12395] Editor. Thomas is Aquinas. Summa theologiae II–II, 2.9, reply 3, distinguishes sufficient grounds for belief from grounds for knowledge. Article 10, objection 1, quotes Gregory's maxim; its answer allows reasoning that follows willing belief to indicate greater merit. Burton's piè consideranti formulation remains unlocated. The Latin comparison has cui … præbet, "to which … supplies," against Burton's ubi … quærit, "where … seeks." Gregory's source is Gospel Homily 26.

[12396] Burton. Source page 663, first star: "Lib.1. de trin. cap.2. si decepti sumus, &c." "On the Trinity, book 1, chapter 2: if we have been deceived, and so on."

[12397] Editor. Richard of Saint-Victor, On the Trinity 1.2, argues that divine signs warrant Christian trust. Compare its quotation in Duns Scotus, Ordinatio, prologue, part 2. Burton's presentation as words to be said at judgment is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But for the rest I will not justifie that pontificial consubstantiation, that which [12398]Mahometans and Jewes justly except at, as Campanella confesseth, Atheismus triumphat. cap.12. fol.125, difficillimum dogma esse, nec aliud subjectum magis hæreticorum blasphemiis, & stultis irrisionibus politicorum reperiri.	But as for the rest, I will not defend that papal consubstantiation, to which Muslims and Jews justly object. As Campanella admits in Atheism Defeated, chapter 12, folio 125, "it is a most difficult doctrine, and no subject is more exposed to the blasphemies of heretics and the foolish mockery of worldly thinkers."[12399]
They hold it impossible, Deum in pane manducari; and besides they scoffe at it, vide gentem comedentem Deum suum, inquit quidam Maurus.	They hold it impossible "that God should be eaten in bread"; and they mock it besides: "Look at a people eating their own God," said a certain Moor.[12400]
[12401]Hunc Deum muscæ et vermes irrident, quum ipsum polluunt & devorant, subditus est igni, aquæ, & latrones furantur, pixidem auream humi prosternunt, & se tamen non defendit hic Deus. Qui fieri potest, ut sit integer in singulis hostiæ particulis; idem corpus numero, tam multis locis, cœlo, terra? &c.	"Flies and worms mock this God when they foul and devour him. He is subject to fire and water; thieves steal him and throw the golden pyx to the ground, yet this God does not defend himself. How can he be whole in every particle of the host—the selfsame body in so many places, in heaven and on earth?" And so on.[12402]

[12398] Burton. Source page 663, second star: "Vide Samsatus Isphocanis objectiones in monachum Milesium." "See the objections of Samsatus Isphocanus against the Milesian monk."

[12399] Editor. The scan reads consubstantiation, retained here, though the Roman Catholic doctrine under attack is ordinarily called transubstantiation. Campanella's Atheismus triumphatus is cited at chapter 12, folio 125. The distinction matters: Burton's wording should not be silently substituted for the doctrine's name.

[12400] Editor. Politici here denotes worldly or politically minded thinkers. Burton's margin names Samsatus Isphocanus and a Milesian monk; the spelling and precise underlying work remain uncollated. The Latin objection is reported in Burton's own polemical sequence.

[12401] Burton. Source page 663, first dagger: "Lege Hossman. Mus exenteratus." "Read Hossman, The Disembowelled Mouse."

[12402] Editor. The host is the consecrated eucharistic bread; the pyx its container. Burton's objections concern bodily presence and the host's vulnerability. The marginal Hossman is retained as printed. The title Mus exenteratus is catalogued under Wilhelm Holder, writing as Wilhelmus de Stutgard; Burton's attribution therefore needs further collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But he that shall read the [12403]Turkes Alcaron, the Jewes Talmud, and Papists Golden Legend, in the mean time will swear that such gross fictions, fables, vain traditions, prodigious paradoxes and ceremonies, could never proceed from any other spirit, than that of the divell himself, which is the Author of confusion and lies; and wonder withall how such wise men as have been of the Jews, such learned understanding men as Averroes, Avicenna, or those Heathen Philosophers, could ever be perswaded to beleeve, or to subscribe to the least part of them: aut fraudem non detegere: but that as [12404]Vanninus answers, ob publicæ potestatis formidinem allatrare philosophi non audebant, they durst not speak for fear of the law. But I will descend to particulars: read their severall Symptomes and then guess.	Yet anyone who reads the Turks' Quran, the Jews' Talmud and the Papists' Golden Legend will swear that such gross inventions, fables, empty traditions, monstrous paradoxes and ceremonies could never have proceeded from any spirit but the Devil's own, the author of confusion and lies. He will wonder, too, how the wise men among the Jews, such learned and intelligent men as Averroes and Avicenna, or those pagan philosophers, could ever have been persuaded to believe or assent to the smallest part of them, "or fail to expose the fraud." The answer is that, as Vanini says, "For fear of the public authorities, the philosophers did not dare bark against them": they dared not speak for fear of the law. But I shall come down to particulars: read their various symptoms and then judge.[12405]
Of such Symptomes as properly belong to superstition, or that irreligious Religion, I may say as of the rest, some are ridiculous, some again ferall to relate. Of those ridiculous, there can be no better testimony than the multitude of their gods, those absurd names, actions, offices they put upon them, their feasts, holy dayes, sacrifices, adorations, and the like.	Of the symptoms that belong specifically to superstition, or that irreligious religion, I may say, as I did of the rest, that some are ridiculous, while others are dreadful to relate. As evidence of the ridiculous ones, nothing could be better than the multitude of their gods, the absurd names, actions and duties they assign to them, their feasts, holy days, sacrifices, acts of worship, and the like.[12406]

[12403] Burton. Source page 663, i: "As true as Homers Iliads, Ovids Metamorphosis, Æsops Fables."

[12404] Burton. Source page 663, second dagger: "Dial.52 de oraculis." "Dialogue 52, on oracles."

[12405] Editor. Alcaron means the Quran. The Golden Legend is Jacobus de Voragine's collection of saints' lives. Averroes and Avicenna are Ibn Rushd and Ibn Sina. Burton's charge that these religious texts originate with the Devil is his own theological judgment. Vanninus is Giulio Cesare Vanini; the margin specifies dialogue 52 on oracles, whose exact quotation remains uncollated.

[12406] Editor. Feral here means dreadful or horrifying. Burton now turns from general symptoms to particular examples, beginning with what he regards as the ridiculous forms of superstition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Ægyptians that pretended so great antiquity, 300 Kings before Amasis: and as Mela writes, 13000 years from the beginning of their Chronicles, that brag'd so much of their knowledge of old, for they invented Arithmetick, Astronomy, Geometry: of their wealth and power, that vaunted of 20000 Cities: yet at the same time their Idolatry and superstition was most gross: they worshipped, as Diodorus Siculus records, Sun and Moon under the name of Isis and Osyris, and after, such men as were beneficial to them, or any creature that did them good.	The Egyptians claimed such great antiquity—300 kings before Amasis and, as Mela writes, 13,000 years from the beginning of their chronicles. They boasted so much of their ancient learning, for they invented arithmetic, astronomy and geometry; of their wealth and power, vaunting their 20,000 cities. Yet at the same time their idolatry and superstition were of the grossest kind. As Diodorus Siculus records, they worshipped the sun and moon under the names of Isis and Osiris, and later any people who benefited them, or any creature that did them good.[12407]
In the city of Bubasti they adored a Cat, saith Herodotus, Ibis and Storks, an Oxe (saith Pliny) [12408]Leekes and Onions, Macrobius,	In the city of Bubastis they worshipped a cat, says Herodotus; ibises and storks; an ox, says Pliny; leeks and onions, says Macrobius:[12409]
[12410]Porrum & cæpe deos imponere nubibus ausi, Hos tu Nile deos colis,——	Daring to set leeks and onions in the clouds as gods, These are the gods you worship, Nile. ——[12411]

[12407] Editor. Pomponius Mela, Chorography 1.59–60 (1.50–51 in the linked Latin text), reports 330 kings before Amasis, more than 13,000 years, and 20,000 cities. Burton's 300, 13000 and 20000 are retained. These are ancient reported claims, not dates or counts adopted by this edition. Diodorus, Library 1.11, associates Osiris and Isis with the sun and moon.

[12408] Burton. Source page 663, third dagger: "O sanctas gentes quibus hæc nascuntur in horto Numina! Juven. Sat.15." "O holy peoples, for whom these divinities grow in the garden! Juvenal, Satire 15."

[12409] Editor. Bubastis is the Egyptian city associated with the cat goddess. Burton strings together reports from Herodotus, Pliny and Macrobius; the exact passages for the combined list remain to be collated. The marginal joke about garden-grown gods is Juvenal, Satire 15.10–11.

[12410] Burton. Source page 663, third star: "Prudentius."

[12411] Editor. Prudentius, Against Symmachus 2.867 and 871, adapted and brought together: Burton adds deos in the second line. The cited poem attacks both Egyptian and Roman worship. The two printed verse lines remain distinct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 663–664 Scoffing [12412]Lucian in his vera Historia: which as he confesseth himself was not perswasively written as a truth, but in Comical fashion to glaunce at the monstrous fictions, and gross absurdities of writers and nations, to deride without doubt this prodigious Ægyptian Idolatry, fains this story of himself; that when he had seen the Elisian fields, and was now comming away, Radamanthus gave him a Mallow-root, and bade him pray to that when he was in any peril or extremity; which he did accordingly; for when he came to Hydamordia in the Iland of treacherous women, he made his prayers to his root, and was instantly delivered.	The mocking Lucian, in his True History—which, as he himself admits, was not written to persuade readers of its truth, but as comedy aimed at the monstrous inventions and gross absurdities of writers and nations—undoubtedly means to ridicule this prodigious Egyptian idolatry when he invents this story about himself. After seeing the Elysian Fields, as he was leaving, Rhadamanthus gave him a mallow root and told him to pray to it whenever he was in danger or distress. He did so: when he came to Hydamordia, on the island of treacherous women, he prayed to his root and was instantly delivered.[12413]
Source page 664 The Syrians, Chaldeans had as many proper Gods of their own invention; see the said Lucian de dea Syriâ. Morny cap.22. de veritat. relig. Guliel. Stuckius [12414]Sacrorum Sacrificiorumque Gentil. descript. Peter Faber Semester. l.3. c.1, 2, 3. Selden de diis Syris, Purchas Pilgrimage, [12415]Rosinus of the Romans, and Lilius Giraldus of the Greeks.	The Syrians and Chaldeans had just as many gods peculiar to themselves, of their own invention. See the same Lucian's On the Syrian Goddess; Mornay's On the Truth of Religion, chapter 22; Wilhelm Stucki's Description of the Rites and Sacrifices of the Gentiles; Peter Faber's Six-Month Studies, book 3, chapters 1, 2 and 3; Selden's On the Syrian Gods; Purchas's Pilgrimage; Rosinus on the Romans; and Lilius Giraldus on the Greeks.[12416]

[12412] Burton. Source page 663, fourth dagger: "Præfat. ver. hist." "Preface to the True History."

[12413] Editor. Lucian, True History, opening disclaimer and book 2.28, 46: Rhadamanthus supplies a mallow root; the traveller later uses it against deceptive women. Lucian's fiction satirizes fantastic travel narratives. Burton's claim that this episode specifically ridicules Egyptian idolatry is his interpretation; Hydamordia is retained as printed.

[12414] Burton. Source page 664, first dagger: "Tiguri fol.1494." "Zürich, folio, 1494."

[12415] Burton. Source page 664, k: "Rosin. antiq. Rom. l.2 c.1. & deinceps." "Rosinus, Roman Antiquities, book 2, chapter 1 and following."

[12416] Editor. These are works by Lucian (On the Syrian Goddess), Mornay (On the Truth of the Christian Religion), Stucki (gentile rites and sacrifices), Du Faur (Semestria), Selden (On the Syrian Gods), Purchas (Pilgrimage), Rosinus (Roman Antiquities) and Giraldi (pagan gods). The inspected Stucki title page in Zürich's 5.18,2 copy gives Tiguri, Johannes Wolff, 1598. Burton's 1494 is incompatible with Stucki's catalogued lifespan, 1542–1607; retain it pending identification of his edition. All five margins on page 664 belong here; none on page 665 precedes the endpoint.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Romans borrowed from all, besides their own gods, which were majorum and minorum gentium, as Varro holds, certain and uncertain; some cœlestial select and great ones, others Indigites and Semi-dei, Lares, Lemures, Dioscuri, Soteres, and Parastatæ, dii tutelares amongst the Greekes: gods of all sorts, for all functions; some for the Land, some for Sea; some for Heaven, some for Hell; some for passions, diseases, some for birth, some for weddings, husbandry, woods, waters, gardens, orchards, &c.	The Romans borrowed from them all, besides having their own gods, of the higher and lower orders, as Varro puts it, known and unknown; some heavenly, select and great gods; others native gods and demigods, household spirits, spirits of the dead, the Dioscuri, saviours and protectors—the Greeks' tutelary gods. Gods of every kind, for every function: some for the land, some for the sea; some for heaven, some for hell; some for passions and diseases, some for birth, some for weddings, farming, woods, waters, gardens, orchards, and so on.
All actions and offices, Pax, Quies, Salus, Libertas, Fælicitas, Strenua, Stimula, Horta, Pan, Sylvanus, Priapus, Flora, Cloacina, Stercutius, Febris, Pallor, Invidia, Protervia, Risus, Angerona, Volupia, Vacuna, Viriplaca, Veneranda, Pales, Neptunia, Doris.	Every activity and office had its god: Pax, Peace; Quies, Rest; Salus, Health; Libertas, Liberty; Felicitas, Happiness; Strenua, Stimula, Horta, Pan, Sylvanus, Priapus, Flora, Cloacina and Stercutius; Febris, Fever; Pallor, Paleness; Invidia, Envy; Protervia, Impudence; Risus, Laughter; Angerona, Volupia, Vacuna, Viriplaca, Veneranda, Pales, Neptunia and Doris.[12417]

[12417] Editor. Burton lists categories and names without a consistent theological classification. Majorum/minorum gentium distinguishes higher and lower ranks; Indigites is an ancient cult title, rendered here "native gods" without resolving its disputed meaning. Lares and Lemures are spirits, while Dioscuri names Castor and Pollux. His catalogue of personified powers is retained in full; readily transparent Latin names are explained in the modern text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Kings, Emperours, valiant men that had done any good offices for them, they did likewise canonize and adore for Gods; and it was usually done, usitatum apud antiquos, as [12418]Jac. Boissardus well observes, deificare homines qui beneficiis mortales juvarent, and the Divel was still ready to second their intents, statim se ingessit illorum sepulchris, statuis, templis, aris, &c. he crept into their temples, statues, tombs, altars, and was ready to give oracles, cure diseases, do miracles, &c. as by Jupiter, Æsculapius, Tiresias, Apollo, Mopsus, Amphiaraus, &c. dii & Semi-dei.	Kings, emperors and brave men who had performed any service for them they likewise canonized and worshipped as gods. It was commonly done: "It was usual among the ancients," as Jacques Boissard rightly observes, "to deify people whose good deeds benefited mortals." And the Devil was always ready to support their intentions: "At once he insinuated himself into their tombs, statues, temples and altars," and so on. He crept into their temples, statues, tombs and altars, ready to give oracles, cure diseases and perform miracles, as through Jupiter, Aesculapius, Tiresias, Apollo, Mopsus, Amphiaraus and the rest—gods and demigods.[12419]

[12418] Burton. Source page 664, second dagger: "Lib. de divinatione & magicis præstigiis in Mopso." "On Divination and Magical Illusions, under Mopsus."

[12419] Editor. Jean-Jacques Boissard's On Divination and Magical Illusions is cited under Mopsus. Burton interprets ancient divine benefactors and oracles through demonic impersonation; this is his theological explanation. The precise Boissard passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For so they were Semi-dii, demi-gods, some medii inter Deos & homines, as Max. [12420]Tyrius, the Platonist, ser.26. & 27. maintains and justifies in many words. When a good man dies, his body is buried, but his soul ex homine dæmon evadit, becomes forthwith a Demi-god, nothing disparaged with malignity of aire, or variety of forms, rejoyceth, exults and sees that perfect beauty with his eyes. Now being deified, in commiseration he helps his poor friends here on earth, his kindred and allies, informs, succours, &c. punisheth those that are bad, and do amiss, is a good Genius to protect and govern mortal men appointed by the gods, so they will have it, ordaining some for provinces, some for private men, some for one office, some for another.	For such they were: "half-gods," demigods, some "intermediate between gods and human beings," as Maximus of Tyre, the Platonist, maintains and defends at length in discourses 26 and 27. When a good man dies, his body is buried, but his soul, "passing from human being to spirit," immediately becomes a demigod. Unimpaired by harmful air or the diversity of forms, it rejoices, exults and sees that perfect beauty with its own eyes. Now deified, out of compassion it helps its poor friends here on earth, its relatives and kin; instructs and aids them; punishes the wicked and those who do wrong; and becomes a good guardian spirit appointed by the gods to protect and govern mortal people. So they would have it, assigning some to provinces, some to individuals, some to one duty, some to another.[12421]

[12420] Burton. Source page 664, third dagger: "Cosmo Paccio Interpret. nihil ab aeris caligine aut figurarum varietate impeditus meram pulchritudinem meruit, exultans & misericordia motus, cognatos amicos qui adhuc morantur in terra tuetur, errantibus succurrit, &c. Deus hoc jussit ut essent genii dii tutelares hominibus, bonos juvantes, malos punientes &c." "Cosimo Pazzi, translator. Unhindered by the darkness of the air or the variety of forms, he has attained pure beauty; rejoicing and moved by compassion, he watches over his relatives and friends who still remain on earth, and helps those who stray, and so on. God commanded that there should be guardian spirits, tutelary gods for human beings, helping the good and punishing the wicked, and so on."

[12421] Editor. Maximus of Tyre is cited in the Latin translation associated with Cosimo Pazzi, discourses 26–27 in Burton's numbering. Daimon here is an intermediate spirit, not necessarily an evil demon in the ancient account; Burton's glosses repeatedly impose his own Christian interpretation. His English paraphrase and embedded Latin are both translated and retained. The exact numbered passages require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hector and Achilles assist Souldiers to this day; Æsculapius all sick men, the Dioscuri Seafaring men, &c. and sometimes upon occasion they shew themselves. The Dioscuri, Hercules and Æsculapius, he saw himself (or the divel in his likeness) non somnians sed vigilans ipse vidi: So far Tyrius. And not good men only do they thus adore, but tyrants, monsters, divels, (as [12422]Stukius inveighs) Nero's, Domitians, Heliogables, beastly women, and arrant whores amongst the rest.	Hector and Achilles assist soldiers to this day; Aesculapius, all the sick; the Dioscuri, seafarers; and so on. Sometimes, when occasion calls, they show themselves. The Dioscuri, Hercules and Aesculapius he saw himself—or the Devil in his likeness: "I myself saw them, not dreaming but awake." So much for Maximus of Tyre. Nor do they worship only good people in this way, but tyrants, monsters and devils, as Stucki indignantly says: Neros, Domitians, Elagabaluses, depraved women and outright whores among the rest.[12423]
For all intents, places, creatures, they assign gods;	For every purpose, place and creature they assign gods:
Source page 665 Et domibus, tectis, thermis, & equis soleatis Assignare solent genios ——	To houses, roofs, baths and shod horses They are accustomed to assign guardian spirits. ——[12424]

[12422] Burton. Source page 664, star: "Sacrorum gent. descript. non bene meritos solum, sed & tyrannos pro diis colunt, qui genus humanum horrendum in modum portentosa immanitate divexarunt, &c. fœdas meretrices, &c." "Description of Gentile Rites. They worship as gods not only those who have deserved well, but also tyrants who have tormented the human race dreadfully with monstrous cruelty, and so on; filthy prostitutes, and so on."

[12423] Editor. The Dioscuri are Castor and Pollux; Aesculapius is Asclepius, associated with healing. Burton's "or the devil in his likeness" is his intervention in the reported testimony. Stucki's catalogue includes Nero, Domitian and Heliogabalus, now usually called Elagabalus; the exact Stucki passage remains to be located.

[12424] Editor. Burton adapts Prudentius, Against Symmachus 2.445–446, replacing the source's list with houses, roofs, baths and shod horses. Equīs soleatis is clear in the scan, and is translated as printed. A genius is a guardian spirit, not a person of exceptional talent.

Original text 1651	Modern English
saith Prudentius. Cuna for cradles, Diverra for sweeping houses, Nodina knots, Prema, Pramunda, Hymen, Hymeneus, for weddings; Comus the god of good fellows, gods of silence, of comfort, Hebe goddess of youth, Mena menstruarum, &c. male and female gods, of all ages, sexes, and dimensions, with beards, without beards, married, unmarried, begot, not born at all, but as Minerva start out of Jupiters head. Hesiodus reckons up at least 30000 gods, Varro 300 Jupiters. As Jeremy told them, their gods were to the multitude of Cities;	So says Prudentius. Cuna for cradles; Diverra for sweeping houses; Nodina for knots; Prema, Pramunda, Hymen and Hymeneus for weddings; Comus, god of good companions; gods of silence and comfort; Hebe, goddess of youth; Mena of menstruation; and so on. Male and female gods of every age, sex and size, bearded and beardless, married and unmarried, begotten or not born at all, but springing, like Minerva, from Jupiter's head. Hesiod counts at least 30,000 gods; Varro, 300 Jupiters. As Jeremiah told them, their gods were as numerous as their cities:[12425]
Quicquid humus, pelagus, cœlum miserabile gignit Id dixêre deos, colles, freta, flumina, flammas.	Whatever earth, sea, heaven brings forth—pitiable indeed— They called gods: hills, straits, rivers, flames.[12426]
What ever heavens, sea and land begat, Hils, seas and rivers, God was this and that.	Whatever heaven, sea and land brought forth, Hills, seas and rivers—this was God, and that.

[12425] Editor. Cuna, Diverra, Nodina, Prema, Pramunda, Hymen, Hymeneus and Mena remain as printed. Compare Hesiod, Works and Days 252–255, on thirty thousand divine guardians. Tertullian, Apology 14, attributes three hundred Jupiters, all headless, to Varro in a passage about ridicule of the gods. This supplies a literary parallel, not a census of deities or proof of Burton's immediate source. Jeremiah 2:28 and 11:13 compare the number of gods with cities.

[12426] Editor. The couplet adapts Prudentius, Against Symmachus 1.297–298. Burton prints miserabile, "pitiable," where Prudentius has mirabile, "marvellous"; he also adds heaven and changes other wording. The printed reading is retained, tentatively rendered as a parenthetical judgment. Burton's separate English couplet omits flames.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And which was most absurd, they made gods upon such ridiculous occasions; As children make babies (so saith [12427]Morneus) their Poets make Gods; & quos adorant in templis, ludunt in Theatris, as Lactantius scoffs.	And, most absurdly, they made gods on such ridiculous grounds. As children make dolls, says Mornay, their poets make gods; "and those whom they worship in temples, they make sport of in theatres," as Lactantius scoffs.[12428]
Saturn a man, gelded himself, did eat his own children, a cruel tyrant driven out of his kingdom by his son Jupiter, as good a God as himself, a wicked lascivious paltry King of Crete, of whose rapes, lusts, murders, villanies, a whole volume is too little to relate. Venus a notorious strumpet, as common as a barbars chair, Mars, Adonis, Anchises whore, is a great she-goddess as well as the rest, as much renowned by their Poets; with many such:	Saturn, a man, castrated himself and ate his own children: a cruel tyrant driven from his kingdom by his son Jupiter, as good a god as he was—a wicked, lecherous, contemptible king of Crete, whose rapes, lusts, murders and villainies would fill more than a whole volume. Venus, a notorious prostitute, as freely available as a barber's chair, the whore of Mars, Adonis and Anchises, is a great goddess like the rest, just as celebrated by their poets; and there are many more like them.[12429]
and these gods so fabulously and foolishly made, ceremoniis, Hymnis, & Canticis celebrant; their errors, luctus & gaudia, amores, iras, nuptias & liberorum procreationes, ([12430]as Eusebius well taxeth) weddings, mirth and mournings, loves, angers, and quarrelling they did celebrate in Hymns, and sing of in their ordinary songs, as it were publishing their villanies.	These gods, so fancifully and foolishly invented, "they celebrate with ceremonies, hymns and songs": their misdeeds, "sorrows and joys, loves, angers, marriages and the begetting of children," as Eusebius rightly censures them. Weddings, merriment and mourning, loves, angers and quarrels they celebrated in hymns and sang about in their ordinary songs, as though publicizing their villainies.[12431]

[12427] Burton. Source page 665, first dagger: "Cap.22. de ver. rel. Deos finxerunt eorum Poetæ, ut infantium puppas." "On True Religion, chapter 22. Their poets fashioned gods like children's dolls."

[12428] Editor. Babies means dolls. Morneus is Philippe Duplessis-Mornay, also called Mornay below. Burton treats invented gods as toys and theatrical characters. His polemic is retained; the precise Mornay and Lactantius passages remain for collation.

[12429] Editor. This is Burton's hostile retelling of myth as the misconduct of human rulers. His claim that Saturn castrated himself is retained, though it differs from the familiar account in which Cronus castrates Uranus. "As common as a barber's chair" is a sexual insult implying indiscriminate availability.

[12430] Burton. Source page 665, second dagger: "Procem. lib. Contra philos." "Preface to the book Against the Philosophers."

[12431] Editor. Taxeth means censures. The Latin list includes the begetting of children, which Burton does not repeat in his English list; both are retained. The abbreviated Eusebius reference, Against the Philosophers, has not been securely located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But see more of their originals. When Romulus was made away by the sedition of the Senators, to pacifie the people, [12432]Julius Proculus gave out that Romulus was taken up by Jupiter into Heaven, and therefore to be ever after adored for a God amongst the Romans.	But consider further accounts of their origins. When Romulus was killed in the senators' revolt, Julius Proculus, to pacify the people, announced that Jupiter had taken Romulus up into heaven, and that the Romans should therefore worship him as a god for ever afterwards.[12433]
Syrophanes of Ægypt had one only son, whom he dearly loved, he erected his statue in his house, which his servants did adorn with crowns and garlands, to pacifie their masters wrath when he was angry; so by little and little he was adored for a god. This did Semiramis for her husband Belus, and Adrian the Emperour by his minion Antinous.	Syrophanes of Egypt had an only son whom he dearly loved. He set up the boy's statue in his house, and his servants adorned it with crowns and garlands to soothe their master's anger when he was enraged. Thus, little by little, the son came to be worshipped as a god. Semiramis did the same for her husband Belus, and the emperor Hadrian for his favourite Antinous.[12434]
Flora was a rich harlot in Rome, and for that she made the Common-wealth her heir, her birth day was solemnized long after; and to make it a more plausible holiday, they made her Goddess of flowers, and sacrificed to her amongst the rest.	Flora was a rich prostitute in Rome, and because she made the commonwealth her heir, her birthday was celebrated long afterwards. To make it a more acceptable holy day, they made her goddess of flowers and sacrificed to her among the rest.[12435]

[12432] Burton. Source page 665, star: "Livius lib.1. Deus vobis in posterum propitius, Quirites." "Livy, book 1. A god favourable to you hereafter, citizens of Rome."

[12433] Editor. Livy 1.16 reports both Romulus's disappearance and a less widely credited rumour that senators killed him, then Proculus Julius's claim to have seen him. Burton presents the murder and political deception more categorically. Apotheosis means elevation to divine status.

[12434] Editor. Minion here means a favourite, with an implication of a sexual relationship in the case of Hadrian and Antinous. Burton gathers accounts of memorial statues and deification as explanations of idolatry. His Syrophanes and Semiramis narratives require further source collation.

[12435] Editor. Plausible here means acceptable or likely to win public approval. The story of Flora as a wealthy prostitute is a hostile explanation of the Floralia, retained as Burton's reported account rather than adopted as established history.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The matrons of Rome, as Dionysius Halicarnassæus relates, because at their entreaty Coriolanus desisted from his Wars, consecrated a Church Fortunæ muliebri; and [12436]Venus Barbata had a temple erected, for that somewhat was amiss about hair, and so the rest.	The matrons of Rome, Dionysius of Halicarnassus relates, dedicated a temple to Women's Fortune because Coriolanus abandoned his war at their entreaty. And a temple was erected to Bearded Venus because something had gone wrong with people's hair; and so with the rest.[12437]
Source page 665–666 The Citizens [12438]of Alabanda a small town in Asia minor, to curry favor with the Romans (who then warred in Greece with Perseus of Macedon, and were formidable to these parts) consecrated a temple to the City of Rome, and made her a goddess, with annual games and sacrifices: so a town of houses was deified, with shameful flattery of the one side to give, and intolerable arrogance on the other to accept, upon so vile and absurd an occasion.	The citizens of Alabanda, a small town in Asia Minor, wanted to curry favour with the Romans, who were then fighting Perseus of Macedon in Greece and inspired fear in those regions. They dedicated a temple to the city of Rome and made her a goddess, with yearly games and sacrifices. Thus a town of houses was deified: shameful flattery on the one side in offering the honour, and intolerable arrogance on the other in accepting it, on so base and absurd a pretext.[12439]

[12436] Burton. Source page 665, l: "Anth. Verdure Imag. deorum." "Antoine du Verdier, Images of the Gods."

[12437] Editor. Fortuna muliebris means Women's Fortune; Venus barbata means Bearded Venus. Church is rendered temple in its ancient context. Burton's du Verdier reference and the hair-related foundation story remain to be collated.

[12438] Burton. Source page 665, third dagger: "Mulieris candido splendentes amictimine varioque lætantes gestimine, verno florentes conamine, solum sternentes, &c. Apuleius lib.11. de Asino aureo." "Women shining in white clothing and rejoicing in varied movement, flourishing with spring's effort, strewing the ground, and so on. Apuleius, The Golden Ass, book 11."

[12439] Editor. The long marginal quotation is attached to "The Citizens" in the print, although it describes a procession rather than Alabanda. Compare Apuleius, Metamorphoses 11.9: his women wear spring wreaths and scatter flowers. Burton's printed Mulieris, amictimine, gestimine and conamine differ from the parallel; the translation follows the apparent sense of his wording, without silently replacing it. Alabanda is a city of Asia Minor; Burton interprets its worship of Rome as political flattery.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 666 Tully writes to Atticus, that his daughter Tulliola might be made a goddess, and adored as Juno and Minerva, and as well she deserved it. Their Holydays and adorations were all out as ridiculous; those Lupercals of Pan, Florales of Flora, Bona dea, Anna Perenna, Saturnals, &c. as how they were celebrated, with what lascivious and wanton gestures, bald ceremonies, [12440]by what bawdy Priests, how they hang their noses over the smoke of sacrifices, saith [12441]Lucian, and lick bloud like flies that was spilled about the altars.	Cicero writes to Atticus that his daughter Tulliola might be made a goddess and worshipped like Juno and Minerva—and she deserved it just as well. Their holy days and acts of worship were equally ridiculous: Pan's Lupercalia, Flora's Floralia, the festivals of the Good Goddess and Anna Perenna, the Saturnalia, and so on. Consider how they were celebrated: the lewd and wanton gestures, the paltry ceremonies, the bawdy priests; how they hang their noses over the smoke of sacrifices, Lucian says, and like flies lick the blood spilled around the altars.[12442]
Their carved Idols, gilt Images of wood, iron, ivory, silver, brass, stone, olim truncus eram, &c. were most absurd, as being their own workmanship; for as Seneca notes, adorant ligneos deos, & fabros interim qui fecerunt, contemnunt, they adore work, contemn the workman; and as Tertullian follows it, Si homines non essent diis propitii, non essent dii, had it not been for men, they had never been gods, but blocks still, and stupid statues, in which mice, swallows, birds made their nests, spiders their webbes, and in their very mouths laid their excrements.	Their carved idols and gilded images of wood, iron, ivory, silver, brass and stone—"once I was a tree-trunk," and so on—were utterly absurd, since they were their own handiwork. As Seneca observes, "They worship wooden gods, while despising the craftsmen who made them": they adore the work and despise the worker. And as Tertullian continues the argument, "If people were not favourable to the gods, there would be no gods." Had it not been for people, they would never have been gods, but still blocks and lifeless statues, in which mice, swallows and other birds built their nests, spiders their webs, and left their droppings in the very mouths.[12443]

[12440] Burton. Source page 666, first dagger: "Magna religione quæritur quæ possit adulteria plura numerare. Minut." "With great religious care they seek a woman who can count the greatest number of adulteries. Minucius."

[12441] Burton. Source page 666, star: "Lib. de sacrificiis, Fumo inhiantes, & muscarum in morem sanguinem exugentes circum aras effusum." "On Sacrifices. Gaping for smoke, and like flies sucking up the blood poured around the altars."

[12442] Editor. Tully is Cicero; Tulliola is his daughter Tullia. Burton's claim concerns the proposed commemoration of her after death; the precise letter remains to be collated. Bald means bare or paltry. Lupercalia, Floralia and Saturnalia are festival names; Bona Dea means the Good Goddess. The marginal charge about adulteries comes from Minucius Felix's anti-pagan polemic, not a neutral description of priesthood.

[12443] Editor. "Once I was a tree-trunk" recalls Horace, Satires 1.8.1, where a wooden figure speaks. Lactantius, Divine Institutes 2.2, quotes Seneca on worshippers honouring images while despising their makers. Burton's Tertullian sentence similarly makes the gods dependent on human favour; the precise passage remains to be collated. Stupid means insensible or lifeless here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Those Images I say were all out as gross, as the shapes in which they did represent them: Jupiter with a rams head, Mercury a doggs, Pan like a goat, Hecate with three heads, one with a beard, another without; see more in Carterius and [12444]Verdurius of their monstrous formes and ugly pictures: and which was absurder yet, they told them these Images came from heaven, as that of Minerva in her temple at Athens, quod è cœlo cecidisse credebant accolæ, saith Pausanias. They formed some like Storks, Apes, Buls, and yet seriously believed;	Those images, I say, were every bit as gross as the shapes in which they represented the gods: Jupiter with a ram's head, Mercury with a dog's, Pan like a goat, Hecate with three heads; one bearded, another beardless. Read more in Carterius and du Verdier about their monstrous forms and ugly pictures. More absurd still, they told people these images had come from heaven, like Minerva's in her temple at Athens, "which the local people believed had fallen from the sky," as Pausanias says. They made some like storks, apes and bulls, yet believed in them in earnest.[12445]
and that which was impious, and abominable, they made their Gods notorious whoremasters, incestious Sodomites, (as commonly they were all, as well as Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Neptune, &c.) theeves, slaves, drudges, (for Apollo and Neptune, made tiles in Phrygia,) kept sheep, Hercules empty'd stables, Vulcan a black-smith, unfit to dwell upon the earth for their villanies, much less in heaven, as [12446]Mornay well saith, and yet they gave them out to be such;	And, impiously and abominably, they made their gods notorious whoremongers and incestuous sodomites—as they commonly all were, along with Jupiter, Mars, Apollo, Mercury, Neptune and the rest—thieves, slaves and drudges. Apollo and Neptune made tiles in Phrygia and kept sheep; Hercules cleaned out stables; Vulcan was a blacksmith. Their villainies made them unfit to live on earth, much less in heaven, as Mornay rightly says; yet such were the beings they proclaimed as gods.[12447]

[12444] Burton. Source page 666, second dagger: "Imagines Deorum lib. sic inscript." "Images of the Gods: the book is so entitled."

[12445] Editor. Burton combines Greek and Roman names with animal-headed representations and uses them as an argument against images. He attributes the fallen-from-heaven image to Pausanias; the passage and the Carterius and du Verdier references require collation. The translation preserves his identifications rather than harmonizing different cult traditions.

[12446] Burton. Source page 666, third dagger: "De ver. relig. cap.22. Indigni qui terram calcent, &c." "On True Religion, chapter 22. Unworthy to tread the earth, and so on."

[12447] Editor. Sodomites is a condemnatory term in Burton's Christian polemic about sexual conduct. Drudges are servants doing menial labour. His gods' occupations and crimes are presented as reasons they should be unworthy of worship; these are his judgments about myth.

Original text 1651	Modern English
so weak and brutish, some to whine, lament, and roare, as Isis for her son and Cenocephalus, as also all her weeping Priests; Mars in Homer to be wounded, vexed; Venus run away crying, and the like: then which, what can be more ridiculous? Nonne ridiculum lugere quod colas, vel colere quod lugeas? (which [12448]Minutius objects) Si dii, cur plangitis? si mortui, cur adoratis?	They were so weak and brutish: some whined, lamented and roared, like Isis for her son and Cenocephalus, and all her weeping priests; Mars in Homer was wounded and distressed; Venus ran away crying; and so on. What could be more ridiculous? "Is it not ridiculous to mourn what you worship, or worship what you mourn?" Minucius objects. "If they are gods, why do you mourn them? If they are dead, why do you worship them?"[12449]
that it is no marvel if [12450]Lucian, that adamantine persequutor of superstition, and Pliny could so scoffe at them and their horrible Idolatry as they did: If Diagoras took Hercules Image, and put it under his pot to seeth his pottage, which was, as he said, his 13th labour.	No wonder Lucian, that unyielding assailant of superstition, and Pliny mocked them and their horrible idolatry as they did; or that Diagoras took an image of Hercules and put it under his pot to boil his soup—Hercules's thirteenth labour, as he called it.[12451]
But see more of their fopperies in Cypr. 4. tract. de Idol. varietat. Chrysostome advers. Gentil. Arnobius adv. Gentes. L. Austin. de civ. dei. Theodoret. de curat. Græc. affect. Clemens Alexandrinus, Minutius Felix, Eusebius, Lactantius, Stuckius, &c.	Read more of their follies in Cyprian, the fourth treatise, On the Variety of Idols; Chrysostom, Against the Gentiles; Arnobius, Against the Gentiles; Augustine, The City of God; Theodoret, The Cure of Greek Affections; Clement of Alexandria, Minucius Felix, Eusebius, Lactantius, Stucki, and others.[12452]

[12448] Burton. Source page 666, fourth dagger: "Octaviano." "In the Octavius."

[12449] Editor. Cenocephalus means dog-headed; Burton's reference is to an Egyptian divine figure. The questions oppose divine immortality to rituals of mourning. His marginal Octaviano identifies Minucius Felix's Octavius, but the precise wording and its transmission require collation.

[12450] Burton. Source page 666, m: "Jupiter Tragœdus, de sacrificiis, & passim alias." "Jupiter the Tragedian, On Sacrifices, and frequently elsewhere."

[12451] Editor. Adamantine means unyielding. The thirteenth labour is a joke added to Hercules's customary twelve: even his wooden image is made to work, as cooking fuel. Burton cites Lucian broadly; the precise source for the Diagoras anecdote remains to be located.

[12452] Editor. The list groups Christian attacks on pagan worship with later compilations: Cyprian, On the Variety of Idols; Chrysostom and Arnobius, Against the Gentiles; Augustine, The City of God; Theodoret, The Cure of Greek Affections; and the other named writers. Burton's compressed titles and numbering are preserved; individual passages have not all been identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 666–667 Lamentable, tragical, and fearful these Symptomes are; that they should be so far forth affrighted with their fictitious Gods, as to spend the goods, lives, fortunes, precious time, best dayes in their honour, to [12453]Sacrifice unto them, to their inestimable loss, such Hecatombes, so many thousand sheep, Oxen, with gilded horns, Goats, as [12454]Crœsus King of Lydia, [12455]Marcus Julianus, surnamed ob crebras hostias Victimarius, & Tauricremus, and the rest of the Roman Emperours usually did with such labour and cost:	Lamentable, tragic and fearful are these symptoms: that they should be so terrified of their imaginary gods as to spend their goods, lives, fortunes, precious time and best days in their honour; to sacrifice to them, at incalculable loss, such hecatombs, so many thousands of sheep, oxen with gilded horns, and goats. So Croesus, king of Lydia, Marcus Julianus—nicknamed "the sacrificial slaughterer and bull-burner, for his frequent sacrifices"—and the other Roman emperors regularly did, at such labour and expense.[12456]

[12453] Burton. Source page 667, first star: "666 severall kinds of sacrifices in Egypt Maior reckons up, Tom.2. coll. of which read more in cap.1. of Laurentius Pignorius his Ægypt characters, a cause of which Sanubius gives subcis. lib.3. cap.1." "Major counts 666 different kinds of sacrifices in Egypt, in volume 2 of his collections. Read more in chapter 1 of Lorenzo Pignoria's Egyptian Characters; Sanubius gives a reason for them in the work abbreviated subcis., book 3, chapter 1."

[12454] Burton. Source page 667, first dagger: "Herod Clio. Immolavit lecta pecora ter mille Delphis, una cum lectis phialis tribus." "Herodotus, Clio. He sacrificed three thousand choice cattle at Delphi, together with three choice bowls."

[12455] Burton. Source page 667, n: "Superstitiosus Julianus innumeras sine parsimonia pecudes mactavit. Amianus 25. Boves albi. M. Cæsari salutem, si tu viceris perimus; lib.3. Romani observantissimi sunt ceremoniarum, bello præsertim." "The superstitious Julian slaughtered countless animals without restraint. Ammianus, book 25. The white oxen greet Marcus Caesar: if you win, we perish. Book 3. The Romans are most scrupulous in their ceremonies, especially in war."

[12456] Editor. A hecatomb literally means a sacrifice of a hundred cattle. Ammianus 25.4.17 criticizes Julian's excessive sacrifices, then compares him with an earlier Marcus Caesar targeted by the white-oxen epigram. Thus the passage distinguishes two rulers; it does not name one "Marcus Julianus." Burton's wording remains in both columns. Victimarius means sacrificial slaughterer; Tauricremus, bull-burner; neither epithet occurs in that passage. Their source, Maior, Sanubius and subcis. remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 667 and not Emperours only and great ones pro communi bono, were at this charge, but private men for their ordinary occasions. Pythagoras offered an hundred Oxen for the invention of a Geometrical Probleme, and it was an ordinary thing to sacrifice in [12457]Lucians time, a heifer for their good health, four Oxen for wealth, an hundred for a Kingdom, nine Buls for their safe return from Troja to Pylus, &c.	Nor was this expense borne only by emperors and great men "for the public good," but by private people for their everyday concerns. Pythagoras offered a hundred oxen on discovering a geometrical proposition. In Lucian's time it was commonplace to sacrifice a heifer for good health, four oxen for wealth, a hundred for a kingdom, nine bulls for a safe return from Troy to Pylos, and so on.[12458]
Every God almost had a peculiar sacrifice, the Sun horses, Vulcan fire, Diana a white Hart, Venus a Turtle, Ceres an hog, Proserpina a black lamb, Neptune a bull, (read more in [12459]Stukius at large) besides sheep, cocks, corals, frankincense, to their undoings, as if their gods were affected with bloud or smoke.	Almost every god had a particular sacrifice: horses for the Sun, fire for Vulcan, a white hart for Diana, a turtledove for Venus, a pig for Ceres, a black lamb for Proserpina, a bull for Neptune—read more at length in Stucki. Besides these came sheep, cocks, corals and frankincense, to the worshippers' ruin, as though their gods took pleasure in blood or smoke.[12460]

[12457] Burton. Source page 667, a: "De sacrificiis: buculam pro bona valetudine, boves quatuor pro divitiis, centum tauros pro sospite a Trojæ reditu, &c." "On Sacrifices: a heifer for good health, four oxen for wealth, a hundred bulls for a safe return from Troy, and so on."

[12458] Editor. Burton gives nine bulls in the body but a hundred in the Latin margin for the return from Troy. Both are retained. Lucian, Of Sacrifice 2, has nine for that journey and a hundred for kingship; Burton's marginal excerpt compresses the list inconsistently. The Pythagoras anecdote is retained as an attributed story.

[12459] Burton. Source page 667, second star: "De sacris Gentil. & sacrific. Tyg.1596." "On Gentile Rites and Sacrifices. Zürich, 1596."

[12460] Editor. Turtle means turtledove, not the reptile; hart means a male deer. Burton's "corals" is retained. This catalogue assigns particular offerings to particular gods; the precise Stucki passage and individual assignments remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And surely ([12461]saith he) if one should but repeat the fopperies of mortall men, in their sacrifices, feasts, worshipping their Gods, their rites and ceremonies, what they think of them, of their diet, houses, orders, &c. what prayers and vowes they make; if one should but observe their absurditie and madness, he would burst out a laughing, and pitie their folly.	And surely, he says, if anyone merely recounted mortal people's follies in their sacrifices, feasts and worship of the gods; their rites and ceremonies; what they think about the gods, their food, houses and arrangements; what prayers and vows they make—if anyone merely observed their absurdity and madness, he would burst out laughing and pity their folly.[12462]
For what can be more absurd than their ordinary prayers, petitions, [12463]requests, sacrifices, oracles, devotions? of which we have a taste in Maximus Tyrius serm.1. Plato's Alcibiades Secundus, Persius Sat.2. Juvenal. Sat.10. there likewise exploded,	For what could be more absurd than their ordinary prayers, petitions, requests, sacrifices, oracles and devotions? We get a taste of them in Maximus of Tyre's discourse 1, Plato's Second Alcibiades, Persius's Satire 2 and Juvenal's Satire 10, where they are likewise exposed to ridicule.[12464]
Mactant opimas & pingues hostias deo quasi esurienti, profundunt vina tanquam sitienti, lumina accendunt velut in tenebris agenti (Lactantius lib.2. cap.6.) as if their Gods were an hungrie, a thirst, in the dark, they light candles, offer meat and drink.	"They slaughter rich, fat victims for a god as though he were hungry, pour out wine as though he were thirsty, and light lamps as though he lived in darkness"—Lactantius, book 2, chapter 6. As though their gods were hungry, thirsty or in the dark, they light candles and offer food and drink.[12465]

[12461] Burton. Source page 667, b: "Enimvero si quis recenseret quæ stulti mortales in festis, sacrificiis, diis adorandis, &c. quæ vota faciant, quid de iis statuant, &c. haud scio an risurus, &c." "Indeed, if someone recounted what foolish mortals do at festivals, sacrifices and the worship of gods, what vows they make and what opinions they hold about them, and so on, I rather think he would laugh, and so on."

[12462] Editor. The speaker is Lucian, resumed after the intervening Stucki reference: compare Of Sacrifice 1. Burton's English paraphrase and the separate Latin marginal excerpt remain distinct. The compressed Latin haud scio an is rendered with its idiomatic force, "I rather think."

[12463] Burton. Source page 667, second dagger: "Max Tyrius ser.1. Crœsus regum omnium stultissimus de lebete consuluit, alius de numero arenarum, dimensione maris, &c." "Maximus of Tyre, discourse 1. Croesus, the most foolish of all kings, consulted the oracle about a cauldron; another about the number of grains of sand, the measure of the sea, and so on."

[12464] Editor. Exploded means rejected or exposed to ridicule. Burton's list concerns the folly of asking gods for ill-chosen benefits or testing their knowledge. Sermon means a philosophical discourse here. The Second Alcibiades is the dialogue traditionally transmitted under Plato's name.

[12465] Editor. The passage about fat victims, wine and lights occurs in Lactantius, Divine Institutes 6.2. Burton's reference reverses the book and chapter numbers to 2.6; that reading remains in the original and translation. His Latin quotation and subsequent English explanation are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And what so base as to reveal their counsels and give oracles è viscerum sterquiliniis, out of the bowels and excrementall parts of beasts? sordidos Deos Varro truely cals them therefore, and well he might. I say nothing of their magnificent and sumptuous temples, those majestical structures: To the roof of Apollo Didymeus Temple, ad Branchidas, as [12466]Strabo writes, a thousand okes did not suffice.	And what could be more degrading than to reveal their counsels and deliver oracles "from the dung-heaps of entrails"—from the bowels and excretory parts of animals? Varro therefore truly calls them "filthy gods," and well he might. I say nothing of their magnificent and sumptuous temples, those majestic structures. A thousand oaks did not suffice for the roof of Apollo Didymeus's temple "at Branchidae," Strabo writes.[12467]
Who can relate the glorious splendor, and stupend magnificence, the sumptuous building of Diana at Ephesus, Jupiter Ammons Temple in Afrike, the Pantheon at Rome, the Capitoll, the Sarapium at Alexandria, Apollos Temple at Daphne in the Suburbs of Antioch. The great Temple at Mexico so richly adorned, and so capacious (for 10000 men might stand in it at once) that fair Pantheon of Cusco, described by Acosta in his Indian History, which ecclipses both Jews and Christians.	Who can describe the glorious splendour and astonishing magnificence, the sumptuous construction of Diana's temple at Ephesus, Jupiter Ammon's in Africa, the Pantheon at Rome, the Capitol, the Serapeum at Alexandria, or Apollo's temple at Daphne in the suburbs of Antioch? Or the great temple at Mexico, so richly adorned and so spacious that 10,000 people could stand in it at once? Or that beautiful pantheon at Cuzco, described by Acosta in his History of the Indies, which eclipses both Jews and Christians?[12468]

[12466] Burton. Source page 667, third dagger: "Lib.4." "Book 4."

[12467] Editor. Divination from entrails supplies Burton's deliberately degrading comparison. Apollo Didymeus is Apollo at Didyma, near Miletus. Strabo 14.1.5 says the huge temple remained roofless because of its size; the thousand oaks are not present in that checked passage. Burton's marginal Book 4 and the additional detail therefore require further collation.

[12468] Editor. Burton's catalogue ranges from Mediterranean sanctuaries to Mexico and Cuzco. Jupiter Ammon combines a Greek or Roman identification with the Egyptian god Amun; Sarapium is the temple of Serapis. Capacities and comparative magnificence are Burton's reported claims. Acosta's Natural and Moral History, book 5, is a colonial Christian account whose judgments about Indigenous religions inform Burton's discussion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
There were in old Jerusalem as some write, 408 Synagogues; but new Cairo reckons up (if [12469]Radzinilus may be beleeved) 6800 meskites. Fessa 400, whereof 50 are most magnificent, like Saint Pauls in London. Helena built 300 fair Churches in the holy Land, but one Bassa hath built 400 meskites.	Old Jerusalem had 408 synagogues, some writers say; but new Cairo counts 6,800 mosques, if Radziwiłł is to be believed. Fez has 400, of which fifty are magnificent, like St Paul's in London. Helena built 300 beautiful churches in the Holy Land, but a single pasha has built 400 mosques.[12470]
Source page 667–668 The Mahometans have 1000 Monks in a Monastery; the like saith Acosta of Americans; Riccius of the Chineses, for men and women, fairly built; and more richly endowed some of them, then Arras in Artois, Fulda in Germany, or Saint Edmunds-Bury in England with us: who can describe those curious and costlie statues, Idols, Images, so frequently mentioned in Pausanias?	The Muslims have a thousand monks in a monastery. Acosta says the same of the Americans, and Ricci of the Chinese, with houses for men and women, beautifully built, some more richly endowed than Arras in Artois, Fulda in Germany, or our own Bury St Edmunds in England. Who can describe those elaborate and costly statues, idols and images so often mentioned in Pausanias?[12471]

[12469] Burton. Source page 667, third star: "Peregr. Hierosol." "Pilgrimage to Jerusalem."

[12470] Editor. The scan reads 408 synagogues, not 40. Meskites means mosques; Fessa is Fez; Bassa means pasha. Radzinilus names the traveller Mikołaj Krzysztof Radziwiłł. The building counts and comparison with the old St Paul's are retained as reported figures, not independently verified totals.

[12471] Editor. Burton calls Muslim, American and Chinese religious residents monks, applying a European Christian category across different institutions. Saint Edmunds-Bury is Bury St Edmunds. Curious means skilfully or elaborately made. Riccius refers to Matteo Ricci and the account of the Jesuit mission to China associated with him.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 668 I conceal their donaries, pendants, other offerings, presents, to these their fictitious Gods daily consecrated. [12472]Alexander the son of Amyntas, K. of Macedonia, sent two statues of pure gold to Apollo at Delphos. [12473]Crœsus king of Lydia dedicated an hundreth golden tiles in the same place, with a golden altar: No man came empty-handed to their Shrines.	I pass over their votive gifts, hanging ornaments, other offerings and presents, dedicated daily to these imaginary gods. Alexander, son of Amyntas and king of Macedonia, sent two statues of pure gold to Apollo at Delphi. Croesus, king of Lydia, dedicated a hundred golden tiles there, along with a golden altar. No one came empty-handed to their shrines.[12474]
But these are base offerings in respect; they offered men themselves alive: The Leucadians, as Strabo writes, sacrificed every yeer a man, averruncandæ deorum iræ causa, to pacifie their Gods, de montis præcipitio dejecerunt, &c. and they did voluntarily undergo it. The Decii did so sacrifice Diis manibus, Curtius did leap into the gulf.	But these offerings are paltry by comparison: they offered living people themselves. The Leucadians, Strabo writes, sacrificed a man every year, "to avert the anger of the gods"—to pacify their gods. "They threw him from a mountain precipice," and so on; and people underwent it voluntarily. The Decii likewise sacrificed themselves to the spirits of the dead; Curtius leapt into the chasm.[12475]

[12472] Burton. Source page 668, c: "Solinus."

[12473] Burton. Source page 668, d: "Herodotus."

[12474] Editor. Donaries are gifts dedicated to a deity; pendants are hanging offerings. The gold gifts to Delphi are attributed to Solinus and Herodotus. Burton's quantities and wording remain; their precise correspondence with the ancient accounts requires collation.

[12475] Editor. Strabo 10.2.9 describes the annual casting of a criminal from the Leucadian cliff, with birds attached to lighten the fall and boats below to rescue him. Burton omits these precautions and adds voluntary participation. The Decii are Romans remembered for dedicating themselves to the gods in battle; Diis manibus means to the spirits of the dead. Curtius is the legendary Roman who leapt into a chasm.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Were they not all strangely deluded to go so far to their Oracles, to be so gulled by them, both in war and peace, as Polybius relates, (which their Augures, Priests, Vestall Virgins can witness) to be so superstitious, that they would rather lose goods and lives, then omit any ceremonies, or offend their Heathen gods? Nicias that generous and valiant captain of the Greeks, overthrew the Athenian Navy, by reason of his too much superstition, [12476]because the Augures told him it was ominous to set sail from the haven of Syracuse whilest the Moon was ecclipsed, he tarried so long till his enemies besieged him, he and all his army was overthrown.	Were they not all strangely deluded, travelling so far to their oracles and being so cheated by them, in war and peace alike, as Polybius relates—and as their augurs, priests and Vestal Virgins bear witness? So superstitious that they would rather lose their possessions and lives than omit a ceremony or offend their pagan gods! Nicias, that noble and valiant Greek commander, brought the Athenian fleet to ruin through excessive superstition. Because the augurs told him it was an evil omen to sail from Syracuse's harbour during a lunar eclipse, he delayed until his enemies besieged him, and he and his whole army were defeated.[12477]
The [12478]Parthians of old were so sottish in this kinde, they would rather lose a victorie, nay lose their own lives, then fight in the night, 'twas against their religion. The Jewes would make no resistance on the Sabbath, when Pompeius besieged Jerusalem; and some Jewish Christians in Africk, set upon by the Gothes, suffered themselves upon the same occasion to be utterly vanquished.	The ancient Parthians were so foolish in this respect that they would rather lose a victory—indeed, their own lives—than fight at night: it was against their religion. The Jews offered no resistance on the Sabbath when Pompey besieged Jerusalem; and some Jewish Christians in Africa, attacked by the Goths, allowed themselves to be utterly defeated for the same reason.[12479]

[12476] Burton. Source page 668, e: "Boterus polit. lib.2. cap.16." "Botero, Politics, book 2, chapter 16."

[12477] Editor. Augurs interpret divine signs. Burton uses Nicias's delay at Syracuse to illustrate the military danger of excessive religious scruple. His immediate reference is Botero; the exact passage remains for collation. The translation preserves Burton's causal claim rather than making it the sole historical explanation of the defeat.

[12478] Burton. Source page 668, first star: "Plutarch vit. Crassi." "Plutarch, Life of Crassus."

[12479] Editor. Burton generalizes about the Parthians and Sabbath observance, collecting military anecdotes into a single argument. Pompeius is Pompey. The episodes in Plutarch and the unspecified account of Jewish Christians in Africa require closer collation before these claims can be treated as historical findings.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The superstition of the Dibrenses a bordering town in Epirus, besieged by the Turkes, is miraculous almost to report. Because a dead dog was flung into the only fountain which the citie had, they would die of thirst all, rather then drink of that [12480]unclean water, and yeeld up the Citie upon any conditions. Though the Prætor and chief Citizens began to drink first, using all good perswasions, their superstition was such, no saying would serve, they must all forthwith die or yeeld up the citie.	The superstition of the people of Dibra, a frontier town in Epirus besieged by the Turks, is almost incredible to relate. Because a dead dog had been thrown into the town's only spring, they would all die of thirst rather than drink that unclean water, and would surrender the city on any terms. Although the magistrate and leading citizens drank first and used every reasonable argument, their superstition was such that no words would persuade them: they must all immediately die or surrender the city.[12481]

[12480] Burton. Source page 668, second star: "They were of the Greek Church."

[12481] Editor. Dibrenses designates the inhabitants of Dibra, which Burton loosely treats as a town-name. His Greek Church note identifies them as eastern Christians. The narrative concerns fear of ritually unclean water during a siege; the translation does not certify that the water was safe. Prætor means the governing magistrate here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Vix ausum ipse credere (saith [12482]Barletius) tantam superstitionem, vel affirmare levissimam hanc causam tantæ rei vel magis ridiculam, quum non dubitem risum potius quam admirationem posteris excitaturam. The story was too ridiculous, he was ashamed to report it, because he thought no body would beleeve it.	"I scarcely dared believe such superstition myself," says Barleti, "or assert so trivial—or rather ridiculous—a cause for so great an event, since I do not doubt it will provoke laughter rather than astonishment in posterity." The story was too ridiculous: he was ashamed to report it, because he thought no one would believe it.[12483]
It is stupend to relate what strange effects this Idolatry and superstition hath brought forth of the latter years in the Indies and those bordering parts: [12484]in what feral shapes the [12485]Divel is adored, ne quid mali intentent, as they say: for in the mountains betwixt Scanderone and Aleppo at this day, there are dwelling a certain kind of people called Coordes coming of the race of the ancient Parthians, who worship the Divel, and alledge this reason in so doing; God is a good man and will do no harm, but the divel is bad and must be pleased, lest he hurt them.	It is astonishing to relate the strange effects this idolatry and superstition have produced in recent years in the Indies and neighbouring regions: in what savage shapes the Devil is worshipped, "lest they threaten some harm," as they say. For in the mountains between Alexandretta and Aleppo there now lives a people called Kurds, descended from the ancient Parthians, who worship the Devil and give this reason for doing so: God is a good man and will do no harm, but the Devil is bad and must be appeased lest he hurt them.[12486]

[12482] Burton. Source page 668, third star: "Lib.5. de gestis Scanderbegi." "On the Deeds of Scanderbeg, book 5."

[12483] Editor. Barletius is Marin Barleti, author of a history of Scanderbeg. The Latin expresses the narrator's reluctance to credit or report such a slight and ridiculous cause for a major event. Burton's following English explanation is a looser restatement; both remain. The exact edition and passage are uncollated.

[12484] Burton. Source page 668, p: "In templis immania Idolorum monstra conspiciuntur, marmorea, lignea, lutea, &c. Riccius." "In the temples enormous monstrous idols are seen, made of marble, wood, clay, and so on. Ricci."

[12485] Burton. Source page 668, dagger: "Deum enim placare non est opus, quia non nocet; sed dæmonem sacrificiis placant, &c." "For there is no need to appease God, because he does no harm; but they appease the demon with sacrifices, and so on."

[12486] Editor. Coordes is an early modern form of Kurds; Scanderone is Alexandretta, now İskenderun. Burton's assertions of Parthian descent and devil-worship are hostile outsider claims, not reliable descriptions of a whole people. His text moves rapidly among the Indies, China and the eastern Mediterranean; the referents of "they" should not be made more definite than he makes them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 668–669 It is wonderful to tell how the divel deludes them, how he terrifies them, how they offer men, and women sacrifices unto him, an hundred at once, as they did infants in Crete to Saturne of old, the finest children, like Agamemnons Iphigenia, &c.	It is extraordinary to tell how the Devil deceives and terrifies them, how they sacrifice men and women to him, a hundred at a time, as people once offered infants to Saturn in Crete—the finest children, like Agamemnon's Iphigenia, and so on.[12487]
Source page 669 At [12488]Mexico, when the Spaniards first overcame them, they daily sacrificed viva hominum corda è viventium corporibus extracta, the hearts of men yet living, 20000 in a year (Acosta lib.5. cap.20.) to their Idols made of flower and mens blood, and every year six thousand infants of both sexes:	At Mexico, when the Spaniards first conquered them, they daily sacrificed "living human hearts torn from living bodies"—the hearts of people still alive: 20,000 a year, according to Acosta, book 5, chapter 20, to their idols made of flour and human blood, and every year six thousand children of both sexes.[12489]
And as prodigious to relate [12490]how they burie their wives with husbands deceased, 'tis fearfull to report, and harder to beleeve.	Equally monstrous to relate is how they bury wives with their dead husbands: fearful to report, and harder still to believe.[12491]

[12487] Editor. Iphigenia is Agamemnon's daughter, offered as a sacrifice in Greek myth. Burton connects ancient stories to reports about other peoples by treating them as instances of the same demonic deception. The numerical and ethnographic claims remain attributed to this argument.

[12488] Burton. Source page 669, q: "Fer. Cortesius." "Fernando Cortés."

[12489] Editor. The scan gives Acosta 5.20 and 20,000 in a year. Acosta 5.20 distinguishes accounts of Peruvian child sacrifice from his knowledge of Mexican practice; 5.21 gives a report of more than 20,000 victims in different places, without Burton's annual framing. Neither confirms the further figure of 6,000 children here. The Cortés citation requires collation. Flower means flour; the paste idol in Acosta 5.20 uses grain and honey, so Burton's blood also needs separate verification.

[12490] Burton. Source page 669, r: "M. Polus. Lod. Vertomannus navig. lib.6. cap.9. P. Martyr. Ocean. dec." "Marco Polo. Ludovico di Varthema, Travels, book 6, chapter 9. Peter Martyr, Decades of the Ocean."

[12491] Editor. The margin collects travellers and colonial historians with different geographical subjects. Burton moves from Mexico to accounts of wives dying with husbands; this transition must not be read as locating all the customs in Mexico. The precise Polo, Varthema and Peter Martyr passages remain to be identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12492]Nam certamen habent lethi quæ viva sequatur Conjugium, pudor est non licuisse mori,	For they compete for death—to follow their husband while still alive; It is a disgrace not to have been allowed to die.[12493]
and burn them alive, best goods, servants, horses, when a grandie dies, [12494]12000 at once amongst the Tartars, when a great Cham departs, or an Emperor in America:	And they burn them alive, together with the finest possessions, servants and horses, when a great person dies: 12,000 at once among the Tartars when a great khan dies, or an emperor in America.[12495]
how they plague themselves, which abstain from all that hath life, like those old Pythagoreans, with immoderate fastings, [12496]as the Bannians about Surat, they of China, that for superstitions sake never eat flesh nor fish all their lives, never marry, but live in deserts and by-places, and some pray to their Idols 24 hours together, without any intermission, biting of their tongues when they have done, for devotions sake.	And how they torment themselves with excessive fasting, abstaining from everything that has life, like the ancient Pythagoreans: the Banians around Surat, for example, and people in China who, for superstition's sake, never eat meat or fish throughout their lives, never marry, but live in deserts and remote places. Some pray to their idols for twenty-four hours without interruption, biting off their tongues when they have finished, out of devotion.[12497]

[12492] Burton. Source page 669, dagger: "Propertius lib.3. eleg.12." "Propertius, book 3, elegy 12."

[12493] Editor. The couplet corresponds to Propertius 3.13.19–20 in the checked text; Burton cites 3.12 and begins Nam where that text has et. Conjugium stands for the husband. The lines describe wives competing to follow a dead husband in death; their literary presentation is not an endorsement by this edition.

[12494] Burton. Source page 669, s: "Matthæus à Michou." "Matthias of Miechów."

[12495] Editor. The scan reads 12,000, not 11,000. Cham means khan; grandie means a person of high rank. Burton's huge number and his reference to Matthias of Miechów are retained but remain unverified.

[12496] Burton. Source page 669, t: "Epist. Jesuit. ann.1549 à Xaverio & sociis. Idemque Riccius expedit. ad Sinas l.1. per totum Jejunatores apud eos toto die carnibus abstinent & piscibus ob religionem, nocte & die Idola colentes; nusquam egredientes." "Jesuit letters of 1549 from Xavier and his companions. Ricci says the same throughout book 1 of the Expedition to China. Their ascetics abstain all day from meat and fish for religious reasons, worshipping idols night and day and never going out."

[12497] Editor. Bannians is Burton's broad designation for Indian communities associated here with Surat and abstention from animal food. By-places means remote places. He groups vegetarianism, celibacy, seclusion and bodily injury within one polemical account; the different peoples and practices should not be treated as interchangeable. The Jesuit and Ricci references require detailed collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some again are brought to that madness by their superstitious Priests, (that tell them such vain stories of immortality, and the joyes of heaven in that other life) [12498]that many thousands voluntarily break their own necks, as Cleombrotus Amborciatus Auditors of old, precipitate themselves, that they may participate of that unspeakable happiness in the other world. One poisons, another strangleth himself; and the King of China had done as much, deluded with this vain hope, had he not been detained by his servant.	Others are driven to such madness by their superstitious priests, who tell them these empty stories of immortality and the joys of heaven in the life to come, that many thousands voluntarily break their own necks. Like the hearers of Cleombrotus of Ambracia in ancient times, they throw themselves from heights to share in that unspeakable happiness in the other world. One poisons himself, another strangles himself; and the king of China, deceived by this empty hope, would have done the same had his servant not restrained him.[12499]
But who can sufficiently tell of their severall superstitions, vexations, follies, torments? I may conclude with [12500]Possevinus, Religio facit asperos mites, homines è feris; superstitio ex hominibus feras, Religion makes wild beasts civil, superstition makes wise men beasts and fools; and the discreetest that are, if they give way to it, are no better then dizards;	But who can adequately recount their many superstitions, vexations, follies and torments? I may conclude with Possevino: "Religion makes the rough gentle, human beings out of beasts; superstition makes beasts out of human beings." Religion civilizes wild beasts; superstition makes wise people beasts and fools. Even the most sensible, if they give way to it, are no better than fools.[12501]

[12498] Burton. Source page 669, u: "Ad immortalitatem morte aspirant summi magistratus, &c. Et multi mortales hac insania, et præpostero immortalitatis studio laborant, & misere pereunt: rex ipse clam venenum hausisset, nisi à servo fuisset detentus." "The highest magistrates aspire to immortality through death, and so on. Many people suffer from this madness and this perverse pursuit of immortality, and perish miserably: the king himself would secretly have drunk poison if he had not been restrained by a servant."

[12499] Editor. Burton's "Cleombrotus Amborciatus Auditors" appears to combine two stories. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 1.83–84, juxtaposes Hegesias, whose lectures reportedly prompted listeners' suicides, and the Ambraciot who died after reading Plato, named Theombrotus in the Latin text consulted. Augustine, City of God 1.22, calls the latter Cleombrotus and gives no audience. The apparent conflation and Burton's intermediary remain unproved; "the hearers of Cleombrotus" is retained. The unnamed Chinese ruler and Ricci report remain unverified.

[12500] Burton. Source page 669, x: "Cantione in lib.10. Bonini de repub. fol.111." "In a song in book 10 of Bonini's On the Commonwealth, folio 111."

[12501] Editor. Dizards are fools. Possevinus is Antonio Possevino; the marginal wording cites a song in Bonini's On the Commonwealth, but the exact bibliographical relationship and locus remain unresolved. Burton distinguishes religion, which humanizes, from superstition, which dehumanizes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
nay more, if that of Plotinus be true, is unus religionis scopus, ut ei quem colimus similes fiamus, that's the drift of religion to make us like him whom we worship: what shall be the end of Idolaters, but to degenerate into stocks and stones? of such as worship these Heathen gods, for dii gentium dæmonia, [12502]but to become divels themselves?	More than that, if Plotinus's saying is true, "The sole aim of religion is that we should become like the one we worship"—if religion's purpose is to make us like him whom we worship—what will idolaters come to but to degenerate into blocks and stones? What will those who worship these pagan gods become—for "the gods of the nations are demons"—but devils themselves?[12503]
'Tis therefore exitiosus error, & maximè periculosus, a most perilous and dangerous error of all others, as [12504]Plutarch holds, turbulenta passio hominem consternans, a pestilent, a troublesome passion, that utterly undoeth men. Unhappy superstition, [12505]Pliny calls it, morte non finitur, death takes away life, but not superstition. Impious and ignorant are far more happy then they which are superstitious, no torture like to it, none so continuate, so generall, so destructive, so violent.	It is therefore "a ruinous and supremely dangerous error," the most perilous and dangerous of all errors, as Plutarch holds: "a turbulent passion that strikes a person with terror," a pestilent, distressing passion that utterly ruins people. Unhappy superstition, Pliny calls it, "does not end with death": death takes away life, but not superstition. The impious and ignorant are far happier than the superstitious. No torment equals it: none is so unremitting, so widespread, so destructive, so violent.[12506]

[12502] Burton. Source page 669, star: "Quin ipsius diaboli ut nequitiam referant." "Indeed, so that they reproduce the wickedness of the Devil himself."

[12503] Editor. The maxim attributed to Plotinus presents worship as an imitation of its object; its precise source remains unlocated. "The gods of the nations are demons" follows the Latin wording of Psalm 95:5 in the Vulgate, corresponding to Psalm 96:5 in common modern numbering. Burton turns this theological premise into a claim that worshippers become like what they worship.

[12504] Burton. Source page 669, y: "Lib. de superstit." "On Superstition."

[12505] Burton. Source page 669, z: "Hominibus vitæ finis mors, non autem superstitionis, profert hæc suos terminos ultra vitæ finem." "For people, death is the end of life, but not of superstition; superstition extends its boundaries beyond life's end."

[12506] Editor. Compare Plutarch, On Superstition, especially section 4, where religious fear continues beyond death. Burton names Pliny in the body, but the thought and the marginal Latin paraphrase correspond to that Plutarch passage; the attribution is preserved and the discrepancy flagged. His closing absolutes express his diagnosis of superstition, not a modern clinical definition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In this superstitious row, Jewes for antiquitie may go next to Gentiles; what of old they have done, what Idolatries they have committed in their groves and high places? what their Pharisees, Sadduces, Scribes, Essei, and such sectaries have maintained, I will not so much as mention:	In this superstitious line, Jews may follow the Gentiles in order of antiquity. What they did in ancient times, what idolatries they committed in their groves and high places, what their Pharisees, Sadducees, scribes, Essenes and similar sects maintained—I will not even mention.[12507]
Source page 670 for the present, I presume no nation under heaven can be more sottish, ignorant, blinde, superstitious, wilfull, obstinate and peevish, tyring themselves with vain ceremonies to no purpose; he that shall but read their Rabbins ridiculous Comments, their strange interpretation of Scriptures, their absurd ceremonies, fables, childish tales, which they stedfastly beleeve, will think they be scarce rational creatures;	As for the present, I believe no nation under heaven can be more foolish, ignorant, blind, superstitious, wilful, obstinate and perverse, wearing themselves out with pointless ceremonies. Anyone who reads their rabbis' ridiculous commentaries, their strange interpretations of Scripture, their absurd ceremonies, fables and childish tales, which they firmly believe, will think them scarcely rational creatures.[12508]
their foolish [12509]customes, when they rise in the morning, and how they prepare themselves to prayer, to meat, with what superstitious washings, how to their Sabbath, to their other feasts, weddings, burials, &c.	Their foolish customs when they rise in the morning, the way they prepare themselves for prayer and meals, their superstitious washings, and how they prepare for their Sabbath and other festivals, weddings, burials, and so on.[12510]

[12507] Editor. Row means a line or sequence. Essei are Essenes. Burton moves from pagan religion to Judaism using the vocabulary of Christian anti-Jewish polemic; the denunciations that follow are his judgments, not neutral descriptions of Jewish people or belief.

[12508] Editor. Sottish means foolish or stupid, and peevish here means perverse. The sweeping assertion about an entire people is preserved as part of Burton's historical argument; it is not substantiated by the literary examples he supplies.

[12509] Burton. Source page 670, a: "Buxtorfius Synagog. Jud. c.4. Inter precandum nemo pediculos attingat, vel pulicem, aut per guttur inferius ventum emittas, &c. Id. c.5. & seq. cap.36." "Buxtorf, The Jewish Synagogue, chapter 4. During prayer let no one touch lice or a flea, or release wind through the lower throat, and so on. The same work, chapter 5 and following; chapter 36."

[12510] Editor. The margin cites Johannes Buxtorf's Christian account of Jewish practice. Its lower throat is a coarse euphemism for the anus. The exact Buxtorf passages remain to be collated; Burton's presentation treats ritual observance itself as evidence of folly.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Last of all, the expectation of their Messias, and those figments, miracles, vain pompe that shall attend him, as how he shall terrifie the Gentiles, and overcome them by new diseases; how Michael the Archangel shall sound his trumpet, how he shall gather all the scattered Jewes into the holy Land, and there make them a great banquet, [12511]Wherein shall be all the birds, beasts, fishes, that ever God made, a cup of wine that grew in Paradise, and that hath been kept in Adams cellar ever since.	Lastly, their expectation of the Messiah, and the fictions, miracles and empty splendour that will attend him: how he will terrify the Gentiles and overcome them with new diseases; how the archangel Michael will sound his trumpet; how he will gather all the scattered Jews into the Holy Land and prepare a great banquet for them, containing all the birds, beasts and fish that God ever made, and a cup of wine grown in Paradise and kept in Adam's cellar ever since.[12512]
At the first course shall be served in that great Oxe in Job 4.10. that every day feeds on a thousand hils, Psal. 50.10. that great Leviathan, and a great bird, that laid an egge so big, [12513]that by chance tumbling out of the nest, it knockt down 300 tall Cedars, and breaking as it fell, drowned 160 villages:	The first course will include that great ox in Job 4:10, which feeds every day on a thousand hills, Psalm 50:10, the great Leviathan, and a great bird that laid an egg so large that, accidentally falling from its nest, it knocked down three hundred tall cedars, then broke and flooded one hundred and sixty villages.[12514]

[12511] Burton. Source page 670, b: "Illic omnia animalia, pisces, aves, quos Deus unquam creavit mactabuntur, & vinum generosum, &c." "There all the animals, fish and birds that God ever created will be slaughtered, and there will be fine wine, and so on."

[12512] Editor. Messias means Messiah. Burton presents a collection of eschatological stories as a single uniform belief. The immediate channel is the hostile account cited in the preceding margin; these details have not all been traced to their underlying rabbinic texts.

[12513] Burton. Source page 670, c: "Cujus lapsu cedri altissimi 300 dejecti sunt, quumque è lapsu ovum fuerat confractum, pagi 160 inde submersi, & alluvione inundati." "At its fall three hundred very tall cedars were brought down; and when the egg broke in falling, one hundred and sixty villages were submerged and flooded by the deluge."

[12514] Editor. The scan reads Job 4.10; the intended beast is apparently Behemoth in Job 40, not the lions of Job 4:10. Buxtorf's Jewish Synagogue, English translation (1657), chapter 36, p. 327, gives three hundred cedars and sixty villages, against Burton's 160. Bekhorot 57b:5 likewise gives sixty cities and explains the egg's being cast away. This later translation does not identify Burton's edition. These are narrative traditions, not a zoological report.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This bird stood up to the knees in the Sea, and the sea was so deep, that a hatchet could not fall to the bottom in seaven years: Of their Messias [12515]wives and children; Adam and Eve, &c.	This bird stood knee-deep in the sea, yet the sea was so deep that a hatchet could not reach the bottom in seven years. Then there are accounts of their Messiah's wives and children; of Adam and Eve, and so on.[12516] and that one stupend fiction amongst the rest: When a Roman Prince asked of Rabbi Jehosua ben Hanania, why the Jewes God was compared to a Lion; he made answer, he compared himself to no ordinary lion, but to one in the wood Ela, which when he desired to see, the Rabbin pray'd to God he might, and forthwith the Lyon set forward;	And among the rest there is that one astonishing fiction: when a Roman prince asked Rabbi Joshua ben Hananiah why the Jews' God was compared to a lion, the rabbi answered that he compared himself to no ordinary lion, but to one in the forest of Ela. When the prince wished to see it, the rabbi prayed to God that he might, and the lion immediately set out.[12517]
[12518]But when he was 400 miles from Rome, he so roared that all the great-bellied women in Rome made aborts, the citie walls fell down, and when he came an hundred miles nearer, and roared the second time, their teeth fell out of their heads, the Emperour himself fell down dead, and so the Lyon went back.	But when it was four hundred miles from Rome, it roared so loudly that all the pregnant women in Rome miscarried and the city walls collapsed. When it came a hundred miles nearer and roared a second time, their teeth fell from their mouths, the emperor himself fell down dead, and so the lion went back.[12519]

[12515] Burton. Source page 670, d: "Every King of the world shall send him one of his daughters to be his wife, because it is written Ps.45.10. Kings daughters shal attend on him, &c."

[12516] Editor. Bava Batra 73b contains the separate story of a bird in water and an axe falling for seven years; Burton joins it to the egg story. His margin's Psalm 45:10 corresponds to the royal daughters in 45:9 in common English numbering. Burton's inference about wives is part of the report, not the psalm's wording.

[12517] Editor. The parallel is Chullin 59b:9–10, a dialogue between an emperor and Rabbi Yehoshua ben Hananya about the lion of Bei Ila'ei. Burton's Ela is retained. The tale dramatizes the limits of imperial power through an impossible encounter.

[12518] Burton. Source page 670, e: "Quum quadringentis adhuc milliaribus ab imperatore Leo hic abesset, tam fortiter rugiebat, ut mulieres Romanæ abortierint omnes, murique &c." "When this lion was still four hundred miles from the emperor, it roared so loudly that all the Roman women miscarried, and the walls, and so on."

[12519] Editor. In Chullin 59b:10 the distances are parasangs, and the emperor falls from his throne and then asks the rabbi to send the lion away; he does not die. Burton's miles and death remain in the translation, with the discrepancies recorded here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
With an infinite number of such lies and forgeries, which they verily beleeve, feed themselves with vain hope, and in the mean time will by no perswasions be diverted, but still crucifie their souls with a company of idle ceremonies, live like slaves and vagabonds, will not be relieved or reconciled.	With countless such lies and fabrications, which they truly believe, they feed themselves on empty hope. Meanwhile no persuasion will turn them aside: they continually torment their souls with a host of idle ceremonies, live like slaves and wanderers, and will neither accept relief nor be reconciled.[12520]
Mahometans are a compound of Gentiles, Jewes, and Christians, and so absurd in their ceremonies, as if they had taken that which is most sottish out of every one of them, full of idle fables in their superstitious law, their Alcoran it self a gallimaufrie of lyes, tales, ceremonies, traditions, precepts, stole from other sects, and confusedly heaped up to delude a company of rude and barbarous clownes.	Muslims are a mixture of Gentiles, Jews and Christians, and so absurd in their ceremonies that they seem to have taken the most foolish elements from each. Their superstitious law is full of idle fables; their Quran itself is a jumble of lies, tales, ceremonies, traditions and precepts stolen from other sects and heaped together in confusion to deceive a crowd of ignorant, barbarous rustics.[12521]
As how birds, beasts, stones, saluted Mahomet when he came from Mecha, the Moon came down from heaven to visit him, [12522]how God sent for him, spake to him, &c. with a company of stupend figments of the angels, sun, moon, and stars, &c.	For example, how birds, beasts and stones greeted Muhammad when he came from Mecca, how the moon came down from heaven to visit him, how God sent for him and spoke to him, and a host of astonishing inventions about angels, the sun, moon and stars, and so on.[12523]

[12520] Editor. Crucifie is a figurative intensification of torment. Burton's language of reconciliation assumes a Christian standard of religious truth. His hostile generalizations should be distinguished from the rabbinic stories he has reshaped.

[12521] Editor. Mahometans is Burton's term for Muslims, Alcoran for the Quran, and gallimaufrie for a miscellaneous stew or jumble. His account is explicitly hostile. In what follows he mixes Quranic material with stories and practices reported by European intermediaries.

[12522] Burton. Source page 670, f: "Strozius Cicogna omnif. mag. lib.1. c.1. putida multa recenset ex Alcorano, de cœlo, stellis, Angelis, Lonicerus c.21,22 l.1." "Strozzi Cicogna, Universal Magic, book 1, chapter 1, recounts many contemptible things from the Quran about heaven, stars and angels. Lonicer, book 1, chapters 21 and 22."

[12523] Editor. The margin points to Strozzi Cicogna and Philipp Lonicer. Burton does not distinguish the Quran from later narrative traditions or from hostile European retellings. The precise passages in those compilations remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 670–671 Of the day of judgement, and three sounds to prepare to it, which must last 50000 years, of Paradise, which wholly consists in coeundi & comedendi voluptate, and pecorinis hominibus scriptum, bestialis beatitudo, is so ridiculous, that Virgil, Dantes, Lucian, nor any Poet can be more fabulous.	Their account of the Day of Judgment, with three trumpet blasts to prepare for it and its duration of fifty thousand years; of Paradise, consisting wholly in "the pleasure of intercourse and eating," and "written for brutish people, a beastlike blessedness"—is so ridiculous that Virgil, Dante, Lucian or any poet could invent nothing more fabulous.[12524]
Source page 671 Their rites and ceremonies are most vain and superstitious, wine and swines flesh are utterly forbidden by their law, [12525]they must pray five times a day; and still towards the South, wash before and after all their bodies over, with many such. For fasting, vows, religious orders, peregrinations, they go far beyond any Papists,	Their rites and ceremonies are utterly vain and superstitious. Their law absolutely forbids wine and pork; they must pray five times a day, always towards the south, and wash their whole bodies before and afterwards, with many similar observances. In fasting, vows, religious orders and pilgrimages they far surpass any Papists.[12526]
[12527]they fast a month together many times, and must not eat a bit till Sun be set. Their Kalenders, Dervises, and Torlachers, &c. are more [12528]abstemious some of them, than Carthusians, Franciscans, Anachorites forsake all, live solitary, fare hard, go naked, &c.	They often fast for a month together and must not eat a morsel until sunset. Their Qalandars, dervishes and Torlachers, and so on, are in some cases more abstemious than Carthusians, Franciscans and anchorites: they give up everything, live alone, eat sparingly and go naked.[12529]

[12524] Editor. Quran 70:4 mentions a day measured at fifty thousand years. Burton adds other traditions and his own derogatory reduction of paradise to bodily pleasure. The Latin judgment has no separately identified speaker in this passage. Fabulous means belonging to fable, not excellent.

[12525] Burton. Source page 671, g: "Quinquies in die orare Turcæ tenentur ad meridiem. Bredenbachius cap.5." "The Turks are required to pray five times a day towards the south. Bredenbach, chapter 5."

[12526] Editor. Still means always. The southward direction is Burton's generalization: Quran 2:144 directs worshippers towards the Sacred Mosque in Mecca, so the direction depends on location. Papists is his disparaging name for Roman Catholics. The blanket statement about whole-body washing is also his report.

[12527] Burton. Source page 671, h: "In quolibet anno mensem integrum jejunant interdiu, nec comedentes nec bibentes, &c." "In every year they fast by day for a whole month, neither eating nor drinking, and so on."

[12528] Burton. Source page 671, i: "Nullis unquam multi per totam ætatem carnibus vescuntur. Leo Afer." "Many never eat any meat throughout their lives. Leo Africanus."

[12529] Editor. The margin specifies a daytime fast for one month each year; compare the Ramadan fast in Quran 2:185. Burton groups different Muslim ascetic communities under travel writers' names. Torlachers is retained as a historical designation; the Christian orders provide his comparison.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12530]Their pilgrimages are as far as to the River [12531]Ganges (which the Gentiles of those Tracts likewise do) to wash themselves, for that river as they hold hath a soveraign vertue to purge them of all sins, and no man can be saved that hath not been washed in it. For which reason they come far and near from the Indies; Maximus gentium omnium confluxus est, and infinite numbers yearly resort to it.	They make pilgrimages as far as the River Ganges —as the Gentiles of those regions also do—to wash themselves. They hold that the river has a supreme power to cleanse them of all sins, and that no one can be saved without washing in it. For this reason they come from near and far throughout India: "there is a vast gathering of people of every nation," and countless numbers visit it every year.[12532]
Others go as far as Mecha to Mahomets Tombe, which journey is both miraculous and meritorious. The ceremonies of flinging stones to stone the Divel, of eating a Camell at Cairo by the way; their fastings, their running till they sweat, their long prayers, Mahomets Temple, Tombe, and building of it, would aske a whole volume to dilate:	Others go as far as Mecca to Muhammad's tomb, a journey both miraculous and meritorious. Their ceremonies of throwing stones to stone the Devil, of eating a camel at Cairo on the way, their fasts, their running until they sweat, their long prayers, Muhammad's temple and tomb and how it was built—these would take a whole volume to describe.[12533]

[12530] Burton. Source page 671, k: "Lonicerus to.1. cap.17.18." "Lonicer, volume 1, chapters 17 and 18."

[12531] Burton. Source page 671, dagger: "Gotardus Arthus ca.33. hist. orient. Indiæ: opinio est expiatorium esse Gangem; & nec mundum ab omni peccato nec salvum fieri posse, qui non hoc flumine se abluat: quam ob causam ex tota India, &c." "Gotthard Arthus, History of the East Indies, chapter 33: the belief is that the Ganges purifies, and that whoever does not wash in this river can neither be cleansed of every sin nor be saved; for this reason, from all India, and so on."

[12532] Editor. Burton places Ganges bathing within his discussion of Muslims, while also naming local Gentiles. The Arthus margin reports an Indian belief without identifying Muslims; the transition merges religious communities and cannot be taken as a dependable account of Islamic pilgrimage.

[12533] Editor. Burton confuses Mecca, the destination of the hajj, with Medina, where Muhammad's tomb is located. Purchas's Pilgrimage, fourth edition (1626), III.6, p. 271, distinguishes the journey to Medina and rejects the magnetic-coffin story at Mecca. Its p. 267 reports self-blinding without establishing that it occurred. These European accounts require separate evaluation; Burton's chapter references, including the restored 5 below, still need matching to his edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and for their pains taken in this holy pilgrimage, all their sins are forgiven, and they reputed for so many Saints. And divers of them with hot bricks, when they return, will put out their eyes, [12534]that they never after see any prophane thing, bite out their tongues, &c. They look for their Prophet Mahomet as Jewes do for their Messias.	For the trouble they take in this holy pilgrimage, all their sins are forgiven and they are regarded as saints. Several of them, when they return, put out their eyes with hot bricks so that they may never again see anything profane, and bite out their tongues, and so on. They look for their prophet Muhammad as Jews do for their Messiah.[12535]
Read more of their customes, rites, ceremonies, in Lonicerus Turcic. hist. tom. 1. from the tenth to the 24. chapter. Bredenbachius cap. 4.5.6. Leo Afer lib. 1. Busbequius, Sabellicus, Purchas lib. 3. cap. 3. & 4. 5. Theodorus Bibliander, &c. Many foolish ceremonies you shall finde in them; and which is most to be lamented, the people are generally so curious in observing of them, that if the lest circumstance be omitted, they think they shall be damned, 'tis an irremissible offence, and can hardly be forgiven.	Read more about their customs, rites and ceremonies in Lonicer's Turkish History, volume 1, chapters 10–24; Bredenbach, chapters 4–6; Leo Africanus, book 1; Busbecq; Sabellicus; Purchas, book 3, chapters 3, 4 and 5; Theodor Bibliander; and others. You will find many foolish ceremonies among them. Most lamentably, the people are generally so scrupulous in observing them that, if the smallest detail is omitted, they think they will be damned: it is an unforgivable offence and can scarcely be pardoned.[12536]

[12534] Burton. Source page 671, l: "Quia nil volunt deinceps videre." "Because they wish to see nothing afterwards."

[12535] Editor. These sensational claims about mutilation and the expected return of Muhammad are reproduced as Burton's statements, not confirmed religious practices or doctrines. His short Latin margin says only that they wish to see nothing afterwards; the body adds the qualification about profane sights.

[12536] Editor. Curious means scrupulous or excessively exact. Burton's list combines travel narratives, histories and religious compilations; naming them does not independently verify every preceding anecdote. His apparent contradiction between unforgivable and scarcely pardoned is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I kept in my house amongst my followers (saith Busbequius sometimes the Turkes Orator in Constantinople) a Turkey boy that by chance did eat shell-fish, a meat forbidden by their law, but the next day when he knew what he had done, he was not only sick to cast and vomit, but very much troubled in minde, would weep and [12537]grieve many dayes after, torment himself for his fowl offence.	"I kept in my house among my attendants," says Busbecq, formerly the Turkish ambassador in Constantinople, "a Turkish boy who happened to eat shellfish, food forbidden by their law. The next day, when he learned what he had done, he was not merely sick and vomiting but deeply distressed. He wept and grieved for many days afterwards, tormenting himself over his foul offence."[12538]
Another Turke being to drink a cup of wine in his Cellar, first made a huge noise and filthy faces, [12539]to warn his soul, as he said, that it should not be guilty of that foul fact which he was to commit. With such toyes as these are men kept in awe, and so cowed, that they dare not resist, or offend the least circumstance of their Law, for conscience sake misled by superstition, which no humane edict otherwise, no force of arms could have enforced.	Another Turk, about to drink a cup of wine in his cellar, first made a tremendous noise and grotesque faces to warn his soul, he said, not to share the guilt of the foul deed he was about to commit. Such trifles keep people in fear and so cowed that they dare not resist or infringe the smallest detail of their law, because their conscience is misled by superstition. No human decree or force of arms could otherwise have imposed such obedience.[12540]

[12537] Burton. Source page 671, m: "Nullum se conflictandi finem facit." "He puts no end to his self-torment."

[12538] Editor. Busbecq served Ferdinand as ambassador to the Ottoman court, not as the Turks' ambassador. More substantially, Turkish Letter I describes a boy of the Greek Church tricked into eating snails. Burton changes his religious identity and food. Both changes are retained in the body; they materially alter the example.

[12539] Burton. Source page 671, n: "Ut in aliquem angulum se reciperet, ne reus fieret ejus delicti quod ipse erat admissurus." "So that it might withdraw into some corner and not become guilty of the offence he himself was about to commit."

[12540] Editor. Busbecq, Turkish Letter I, reports an old man shouting before drinking, with the explanation that he warned his soul to withdraw or leave his body. Burton's cellar and facial grimaces are absent from the checked passage. Fact means deed; toyes means trifles.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 671–672 In the last place are Pseudo-Christians, in describing of whose superstitious symptomes, as a mixture of the rest, I may say that which S. Benedict once saw in a vision, one divel in the market place, but ten in a Monastery, because there was more work; in populous Cities, they would swear and forswear, lye, falsifie, deceive fast enough of themselves, one divel could circumvent a thousand; but in their religious houses a thousand divels could scarce tempt on silly Monk.	Last come false Christians. In describing their superstitious symptoms, a mixture of all the others, I may repeat what St Benedict once saw in a vision: one devil in the marketplace, but ten in a monastery, because there was more work there. In populous cities, people would swear, perjure themselves, lie, falsify and deceive readily enough on their own: one devil could ensnare a thousand. But in their religious houses a thousand devils could scarcely tempt one simple monk.[12541]
Source page 672 All the principal Divels I think busie themselves in subverting Christians; Jewes, Gentiles, and Mahometans are extra caulem, out of the fold, and need no such attendance, they make no resistance, [12542]eos enim pulsare negligit, quos quieto jure possidere se sentit, they are his own already; but Christians have that shield of faith, sword of the spirit to resist, and must have a great deal of battery before they can be overcome.	I think all the chief devils busy themselves undermining Christians. Jews, Gentiles and Muslims are "outside the fold," out of the fold, and need no such attention: they offer no resistance, "for he neglects to assail those whom he feels he possesses by undisputed right"; they are his own already. But Christians have the shield of faith and sword of the Spirit with which to resist, and must endure a heavy bombardment before they can be overcome.[12543]

[12541] Editor. Pseudo-Christians means false Christians. Silly here means simple or innocent; on is the printed form of one. The attribution of the vision to Benedict remains unlocated. Burton initially contrasts monastic resistance with ordinary wrongdoing before turning to attacks on Christian institutions.

[12542] Burton. Source page 672, star: "Gregor. Hom." "Gregory, Homilies."

[12543] Editor. Burton's assertion that non-Christians belong to the Devil is a confessional claim. The printed extra caulem is retained, although the intended idiom is extra caulam, outside the sheepfold. The armour echoes Ephesians 6:16–17. The Gregory homily is not specified and remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That the Divel is most busie amongst us that are of the true Church, appears by those several oppositions, heresies, schismes, which in all ages he hath raised to subvert it, and in that of Rome especially, wherein Antichrist himself now sits and playes his prize. This mystery of iniquity began to work even in the Apostles time, many Antichrists and Hereticks were abroad, many sprung up since, many now present, and will be to the worlds end, to dementate mens minds, to seduce and captivate their souls.	That the Devil is busiest among us who belong to the true Church is evident from the various forms of opposition, heresies and schisms he has raised in every age to overthrow it, especially in the Church of Rome, where Antichrist himself now sits and displays his skill. This mystery of iniquity began to work even in the apostles' time. Many antichrists and heretics were abroad; many have arisen since, many are present now, and there will be more until the world's end, to derange people's minds and seduce and enslave their souls.[12544]
Their symptomes I know not how better to express, than in that twofold division, of such as lead, and are led. Such as lead are Hereticks, Schismaticks, false Prophets, impostors, and their ministers: they have some common symptomes, some peculiar. Common, as madness, folly, pride, insolency, arrogancy, singularity, peevishness, obstinacy, impudence, scorn and contempt of all other sects:	I know no better way to describe their symptoms than by dividing them into those who lead and those who are led. The leaders are heretics, schismatics, false prophets, impostors and their ministers. They have some symptoms in common and others peculiar to themselves. The common ones are madness, folly, pride, insolence, arrogance, affected singularity, perversity, obstinacy, shamelessness, and scorn and contempt for every other sect:[12545]
Nullius addicti jurare in verba magistri;	Bound to swear allegiance to no master's words;[12546]

[12544] Editor. Plays his prize evokes a public display of fighting skill. Mystery of iniquity echoes 2 Thessalonians 2:7; many antichrists recalls 1 John 2:18. Burton identifies the true Church with his own religious position and applies the Protestant charge of Antichrist to Rome.

[12545] Editor. Singularity is the insistence on being different from others. Burton's medical language of symptoms organizes religious disagreement, but his list also consists of conventional moral accusations against opponents.

[12546] Editor. Adapted from Horace, Epistles 1.1.14, where the poet uses singular addictus. Burton prints plural addicti and applies a declaration of intellectual independence to sectarian leaders.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They will approve of nought but what they first invent themselves, no interpretation good but what their infallible spirit dictates; none shall be in secundis, no not in tertiis, they are onely wise, onely learned in the truth, all damned but they and their followers, cædem scripturarum faciunt ad materiam suam, saith Tertullian, they make a slaughter of Scriptures, and turn it as a nose of wax to their own ends.	They approve nothing unless they first invent it themselves; no interpretation is good unless their infallible spirit dictates it. No one else may rank "second," no, not even "third." They alone are wise and learned in the truth; everyone is damned except themselves and their followers. "They massacre the Scriptures to fit their own subject," says Tertullian: they slaughter Scripture and twist it like a wax nose to serve their own ends.[12547]
So irrefragable, in the mean time, that what they have once said, they must and will maintain, in whole Tomes, duplications, triplications, never yield to death, so self-conceited, say what you can. As [12548]Bernard (erroniously some say) speaks of P. Aliardus, omnes patres sic, atque ego sic. Though all the Fathers, Councels, the whole World contradict it, they care not, they are all one:	Meanwhile they are so unyielding that whatever they have once said, they must and will defend in whole volumes, replies and further replies, never yielding until death, so conceited are they, whatever you may say. As Bernard says of Peter Abelard—mistakenly, according to some—"All the Fathers speak one way, and I another." Though all the Fathers, councils and the whole world contradict them, they do not care: they remain the same.[12549]
and as [12550]Gregory well notes of such as are vertiginous, they think all turns round and moves, all err; when as the error is wholly in their own brains.	And, as Gregory aptly observes of people suffering from vertigo, they think that everything turns and moves, that everyone else is mistaken, when the whole error is in their own brains.[12551]

[12547] Editor. Compare Tertullian, Prescription against Heretics 38.9, where the charge concerns Marcion specifically and the wording is singular. Burton generalizes it to religious innovators. A nose of wax was something that could be bent into any desired shape.

[12548] Burton. Source page 672, o: "Epist.190." "Letter 190."

[12549] Editor. Duplications and triplications evoke successive replies in a dispute. P.Aliardus is Peter Abelard. Bernard's Letter 190, V.11–14, attacks Abelard's disagreement with the Fathers about redemption from the devil's power. The French translation compared locates that context, not Burton's exact Latin wording. Burton himself qualifies Bernard's accusation; the two occurrences of sic point to contrasting positions.

[12550] Burton. Source page 672, p: "Orat.8. ut vertigine correptis videntur omnia moveri, omnia iis falsa sunt, quum error in ipsorum cerebro sit." "Oration 8. Just as everything seems to move to those seized by vertigo, everything is false to them, although the error lies in their own brain."

[12551] Editor. Vertiginous means affected by dizziness. The margin gives Gregory, Oration 8, without an unambiguous identification or edition. The comparison makes bodily misperception an analogy for intellectual error; its precise source remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Magallianus the Jesuite in his Comment on the first of Timothy cap. 16. vers. 20. and Alphonsus de Castro lib. 1. adversus hæreses, gives two more eminent notes, or probable conjectures to know such men by, (they might have taken themselves by the noses when they said it) [12552]First, they affect novelties and toyes, and prefer falsehood before truth; [12553]Secondly, they care not what they say, that which rashness and folly hath brought out, pride afterward, peevishness and contumacy shall maintain to the last gasp.	The Jesuit Magallianus, in his commentary on the First Epistle to Timothy, chapter 16, verse 20, and Alfonso de Castro, in book 1 of Against Heresies, give two further notable signs, or probable tests, by which to recognize such people —they might have taken themselves by the nose when they said it. First, they pursue novelties and trifles, preferring falsehood to truth. Second, they do not care what they say: whatever rashness and folly bring forth, pride, perversity and obstinacy will afterwards defend to the last gasp.[12554]
Source page 672–673 Peculiar symptomes are prodigious paradoxes, new doctrines, vain phantasies, which are many and divers as they themselves. [12555]Nicholaites of old would have wives in common; Montanists will not marry at all, nor Tatians, forbidding all flesh, Severians wine; [12556]Adamians go naked, because Adam did so in Paradise;	Their particular symptoms are monstrous paradoxes, new doctrines and empty fantasies, as numerous and various as the people themselves. The ancient Nicolaitans would have wives in common; Montanists refuse marriage altogether, as do the followers of Tatian, who forbid all meat; Severians forbid wine. Adamites go naked because Adam did so in Paradise.[12557]

[12552] Burton. Source page 672, q: “Res novas affectant & inutiles, falsa veris præferunt. 2. quod temeritas effutierit, id superbia post modum tuebitur & contumacia, &c.” “They pursue new and useless things, preferring falsehood to truth. Second, what rashness has blurted out, pride and obstinacy will afterwards defend, and so on.”

[12553] Burton. Source page 672, r: “See more in Vincent. Lyrin.” “See more in Vincent of Lérins.”

[12554] Editor. The scan prints chapter 16, although 1 Timothy has only six chapters; no silent correction is made. The Magallianus and Castro loci remain uncollated. Taking themselves by the nose means recognizing themselves in their own accusation. Burton also refers to Vincent of Lérins, whose Commonitorium attacks doctrinal novelty.

[12555] Burton. Source page 673, s: “Aust. de hæres. usus mulierum indifferens.” “Augustine, On Heresies. Indiscriminate use of women.”

[12556] Burton. Source page 673, t: “Quod ante peccavit Adam, nudus erat.” “Because before Adam sinned, he was naked.”

[12557] Editor. Burton condenses a heresiological catalogue into labels and prohibitions. Such catalogues describe opponents from an adversarial standpoint, and his compressed statements should not be treated as adequate accounts of each movement. The separate doctrines and their exact Augustinian loci await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 673 and some [12558]barefoot all their lives, because God, Exod. 3. and Josua 5. bid Moses so to do; and Isay 20. was bid put of his shooes: Manichees hold that Pythagorian transmigration of souls from men to beasts;	Some go barefoot all their lives because God, in Exodus 3 and Joshua 5, told Moses to do so; and in Isaiah 20 the prophet was told to remove his shoes. Manichaeans maintain the Pythagorean transmigration of souls from human beings into animals.[12559]
[12560]the Circumcellions in Africk, with a mad cruelty made away themselves, some by fire, water, breaking their necks, and seduced others to do the like, threatning some if they did not, with a thousand such; as you may read in [12561]Austin, (for there were fourscore and eleven heresies in his times, besides schismes and smaller factions) Epiphanius, Alphonsus de Castro, Danæus, Gab. Prateolus, &c.	The Circumcellions in Africa, with mad cruelty, killed themselves, some by fire, drowning or falls, and led others to do the same, threatening some if they refused. There are a thousand similar examples, as you may read in Augustine—for there were ninety-one heresies in his time, besides schisms and smaller factions—Epiphanius, Alfonso de Castro, Daneau, Gabriel Prateolus, and others.[12562]

[12558] Burton. Source page 673, u: “Alii nudis pedibus semper ambulant.” “Others always walk with bare feet.”

[12559] Editor. Burton joins different biblical addressees: Exodus 3:5 concerns Moses, Joshua 5:15 concerns Joshua, and Isaiah 20:2 concerns Isaiah. His wording is preserved. Transmigration means the passage of a soul into another body after death.

[12560] Burton. Source page 673, x: “Insana feritate sibi non parcunt nam per mortes varias præcipitiorum aquarum & ignium, seipsos necant; & in istum furorem alios cogunt, mortem minantes ni faciant.” “With insane savagery they do not spare themselves: through various deaths by falls, water and fire, they kill themselves, and force others into this frenzy, threatening death if they refuse.”

[12561] Burton. Source page 673, y: “Elench. hæret. ab orbe condito.” “Catalogue of Heretics from the Creation of the World.”

[12562] Editor. Austin is Augustine; Danæus is Lambert Daneau. Burton repeats hostile reports of the Circumcellions and gives the number ninety-one, retained without treating it as a verified count of Augustine’s catalogue. The margin’s Catalogue of Heretics is abbreviated and its bibliographical attachment is uncertain.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of Prophets, Enthusians and Impostors, our Ecclesiastical stories afford many examples; of Elias and Christs, as our [12563]Eudo de stellis, a Brittain in King Stephens time, that went invisible, translated himself from one to another in a moment, fed thousands with good chear in the wilderness, and many such; nothing so common as miracles, visions, revelations, prophesies.	Our church histories supply many examples of prophets, enthusiasts and impostors, of Elijahs and Christs: for example, our Eudo de Stellis, a Breton in King Stephen's time, who went about invisibly, transported himself from one place to another in a moment and fed thousands with excellent food in the wilderness, with many similar examples. Nothing is so common as miracles, visions, revelations and prophecies.[12564]
Now what these brain-sick Hereticks once broach, and Impostors set on foot, be it never so absurd, false, and prodigious, the common people will follow and believe. It will run along like Murrain in cattel, scab in sheep. Nulla scabies, as [12565]he said, superstitione scabiosior: as he that is bitten with a mad dogg, bites others, and all in the end become mad. For either out of affection of novelty, simplicity, blinde zeal, hope and fear, the giddy-headed multitude will embrace it, and without farther examination approve it.	Whatever these deranged heretics first put forward and impostors set going, however absurd, false and monstrous, ordinary people will follow and believe it. It spreads like murrain in cattle or scab in sheep. "No scab," as he said, "is scabbier than superstition." Just as someone bitten by a rabid dog bites others, all eventually become mad. From love of novelty, simplicity, blind zeal, hope or fear, the fickle multitude will embrace it and approve it without further examination.[12566]

[12563] Burton. Source page 673, z: "Nubrigensis. lib. cap.19." "William of Newburgh, book unspecified, chapter 19."

[12564] Editor. William of Newburgh, History of English Affairs 1.19, identifies Eudo de Stella as a Breton and relates his movement in hostile, demonic terms. Brittain here means Breton. Enthusians are claimants to inspired revelation. Burton's account reproduces reported wonders, not independently established events.

[12565] Burton. Source page 673, a: "Jovian. Pont. Ant. Dial." "Giovanni Pontano, Antonius, a dialogue."

[12566] Editor. Murrain is a disease of livestock. Burton extends a contagion metaphor from cattle and sheep to rabies and then collective belief. The scabies wordplay is retained in English; the margin attributes it to Pontano's Antonius, but the exact passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sed vetera querimur, these are old, hæc prius fuere. In our dayes we have a new scene of superstitious impostors and hereticks, a new company of Actors, of Antichrists, that great Antichrist himself: A rope of Popes, that by their greatness and authority bear down all before them:	"But we complain of ancient things"; these are old; "these things happened before." In our own time we have a new scene of superstitious impostors and heretics, a new company of actors, of antichrists, and that great Antichrist himself: a string of popes who overwhelm everything before them with their greatness and authority.[12567]
who from that time they proclaimed themselves universal Bishops, to establish their own kingdom, soveraignty, greatness, and to enrich themselves, brought in such a company of humane traditions, Purgatory, Limbus Patrum, Infantum, and all that subterranean Geography, Mass, adoration of Saints, almes, fastings, buls, indulgences, orders, Friers, Images, Shrines, musty Reliques, Excommunications, confessions, satisfactions, blinde obediences, vowes, pilgrimages, peregrinations,	From the time they proclaimed themselves universal bishops, to establish their own kingdom, sovereignty and grandeur and to enrich themselves, they introduced a host of human traditions: purgatory, "the limbo of the Fathers and of infants," and all that subterranean geography; the Mass, adoration of saints, alms, fasts, papal bulls, indulgences, religious orders, friars, images, shrines, musty relics, excommunications, confessions, acts of satisfaction, blind obedience, vows, pilgrimages and religious journeys.[12568]

[12567] Editor. Rope means a succession or string, with a contemptuous implication. The theatrical language of scene and actors introduces an extended Protestant attack on the papacy. The exact sources, if any, of the two short Latin phrases are unresolved.

[12568] Editor. Limbus Patrum denotes the abode of the righteous awaiting Christ; Limbus Infantum the proposed state of infants dying without baptism. Satisfaction refers to penitential reparation; bulls are papal documents. Burton's catalogue combines doctrines, practices and institutions in a deliberately hostile account of their origins.

Original text 1651	Modern English
with many such curious toyes, intricate subtleties, gross errors, obscure questions, to vindicate the better and set a gloss upon them, that the light of the Gospel was quite eclipsed, darkness over all, the Scriptures concealed, legends brought in, religion banished, hypocritical superstition exalted, and the Church it self [12569]obscured and persecuted:	They added many similar elaborate trifles, intricate subtleties, gross errors and obscure questions to defend and gloss over them, until the light of the Gospel was entirely eclipsed: darkness everywhere, Scripture concealed, legends introduced, religion banished, hypocritical superstition exalted, and the Church itself obscured and persecuted.[12570]
Christ and his members crucified more, saith Benzo, by a few Necromantical, Atheisticall Popes, than ever it was by [12571]Julian the Apostate, Porphyrius the Platonist, Celsus the Physician, Libanius the Sophister; by those heathen Emperors, Hunnes, Gothes, and Vandals.	Christ and his members were crucified more, says Benzo, by a few necromantic, atheistic popes than ever by Julian the Apostate, Porphyry the Platonist, Celsus the physician or Libanius the sophist; by those pagan emperors, Huns, Goths and Vandals.[12572]
What each of them did, by what means, at what times, quibus auxiliis, superstition climbed to this height, traditions increased, and Antichrist himself came to his estate, let Magdeburgenses, Kemnitius, Osiander, Bale, Mornay, Fox, Usher, and many others relate.	Let the Magdeburg historians, Chemnitz, Osiander, Bale, Mornay, Foxe, Ussher and many others relate what each of them did, by what means, at what times and "with what assistance" superstition reached this height, traditions multiplied and Antichrist himself attained his position.[12573]

[12569] Burton. Source page 673, b: "Cum per Paganos nomen ejus persequi non poterat, sub specie religionis fraudulenter subvertere disponebat." "When he could not persecute his name through the pagans, he planned to overthrow it deceitfully under the appearance of religion."

[12570] Editor. Curious means elaborate or over-refined. The margin's unnamed agent is apparently the Devil: Burton argues that religion's outward form can conceal its destruction. The historical account expresses his confessional interpretation and is not a neutral institutional history.

[12571] Burton. Source page 673, star: "That writ de professo against christians, & palæstinum deum (ut Socrates lib.3. cap.19.) scripturam nugis plenam, &c. vide Cyrillum in Julianum, Origenem in Celsum, &c." "Who wrote expressly against Christians and the Palestinian God (as Socrates, book 3, chapter 19), calling Scripture full of trifles, and so on. See Cyril Against Julian, Origen Against Celsus, and so on."

[12572] Editor. Benzo's identity and exact locus remain unresolved here. The description of Celsus as a physician is retained without confirming the identification. The margin cites Socrates 3.19, but the checked chapter concerns Theodore's torture; the extended answer to Libanius occurs in 3.23. The quoted wording requires further collation.

[12573] Editor. Magdeburgenses names the compilers of the Magdeburg Centuries; the list assembles Protestant historical and controversial authorities. Burton delegates the detailed historical case to them. The particular works and editions intended by each name remain to be established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 673–674 In the mean time he that shall but see their prophane rites and foolish customes, how superstitiously kept, how strictly observed, their multitude of Saints, Images, that rabble of Romish Deities, for trades, professions, diseases, persons, offices, countries, places; St. George for England; St. Denis for France; Patrick, Ireland; Andrew, Scotland; Iago, Spain; &c.	Meanwhile, anyone who sees their profane rites and foolish customs, so superstitiously kept and strictly observed; their multitude of saints and images, that rabble of Roman deities assigned to trades, professions, diseases, people, offices, countries and places—St George for England, St Denis for France, Patrick for Ireland, Andrew for Scotland, James for Spain, and so on;[12574]
Source page 674 Gregory for Students; Luke for Painters; Cosmus and Damian for Philosophers; Crispine, Shooemakers; Katherine, Spinners; &c. Anthony for Piggs; Gallus, Geese; Wenceslaus, Sheep; Pelagius, Oxen; Sebastian the plague; Valentine falling sickness; Apollonia tooth-ach; Petronella for agues; and the Virgin Mary for sea and land, for all parties, offices:	Gregory for students, Luke for painters, Cosmas and Damian for philosophers, Crispin for shoemakers, Catherine for spinners, and so on; Anthony for pigs, Gallus for geese, Wenceslaus for sheep, Pelagius for oxen; Sebastian for plague, Valentine for epilepsy, Apollonia for toothache, Petronella for fevers; and the Virgin Mary for sea and land, for all people and offices;[12575]
he that shall observe these things, their Shrines, Images, Oblations, Pendants, Adorations, Pilgrimages they make to them, what creeping to Crosses, our Lady of Lauretta's rich [12576]gownes, her donaries, the cost bestowed on Images, and number of suters; S. Nicholas Burge in France; our S. Thomas Shrine of old at Canterbury; those Reliques at Rome, Jerusalem, Genua, Lions, Pratum, S. Denis;	anyone who observes these things—their shrines, images, offerings, hanging ornaments, acts of adoration and pilgrimages to them; their creeping to crosses; the rich gowns of Our Lady of Loreto, her votive gifts, the expense lavished on images and the number of petitioners; St Nicholas Burge in France, our former shrine of St Thomas at Canterbury, and those relics at Rome, Jerusalem, Genoa, Lyon, Prato and St Denis;[12577]

[12574] Editor. Iago is James. The sentence begins a long catalogue, reaching its conclusion below at will think. Burton presents the patronage of saints as a continuation of pagan deities; that comparison is central to his argument, rather than the saints' own theological status.

[12575] Editor. The patronage assignments are transcribed as Burton gives them and have not all been independently confirmed. Philosophers is the printed reading for Cosmas and Damian. Falling sickness means epilepsy; agues are recurrent fevers, not one precisely identified modern disease.

[12576] Burton. Source page 674, c: "One Image had one gown worth 400. crownes and more."

[12577] Editor. Donaries are votive gifts; suters are petitioners. Creeping to crosses refers to approaching a cross in ritual reverence. Lauretta is Loreto; Genua, Lions and Pratum are Genoa, Lyon and Prato. St Nicholas Burge remains Burton's designation pending identification. His margin values one image's gown at over 400 crowns.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and how many thousands come yearly to offer to them, with what cost, trouble, anxiety, superstition, (for forty several Masses are daily said in some of their [12578]Churches, and they rise at all houres of the night to Mass, come bare-foot, &c.) how they spend themselves, times, goods, lives, fortunes, in such ridiculous observations; their tales and figments, false miracles, buying and selling of pardons, indulgences for 40000. years to come,	and how many thousands come each year to make offerings, at such expense, trouble, anxiety and superstition—for forty separate Masses are said daily in some of their churches, and they rise at every hour of the night for Mass and come barefoot; how they exhaust themselves, their time, possessions, lives and fortunes in such ridiculous observances; their tales and inventions, false miracles, buying and selling of pardons, and indulgences for forty thousand years to come;[12579]
their processions on set dayes, their strict fastings, Monks, Anchorites, Frier Mendicants, Franciscans, Carthusians, &c. Their Vigils and fasts, their ceremonies at Christmas, Shrovetide, Candlemas, Palme-sunday, Blase, S. Martin, S. Nicholas day; their adorations, exorcismes, &c. will think all those Grecian, Pagan, Mahometan superstitions, gods, idols, and ceremonies, the name, time and place, habit onely altered, to have degenerated into Christians.	their processions on appointed days, their strict fasts, monks, anchorites, mendicant friars, Franciscans, Carthusians and the rest; their vigils and fasts, their ceremonies at Christmas, Shrovetide, Candlemas, Palm Sunday, St Blaise's, St Martin's and St Nicholas's days; their adorations and exorcisms—will think that all those Greek, pagan and Muslim superstitions, gods, idols and ceremonies have passed in a debased form into Christianity, with only the name, time, place and outward appearance changed.[12580]

[12578] Burton. Source page 674, dagger: "As at our Ladies church at Bergamo in Italy."

[12579] Editor. The scan reads 40000, forty thousand. Burton presents the number as a future duration, but its precise documentary basis is not supplied. The Bergamo margin and the claims about Masses and expenditure likewise remain unverified reports.

[12580] Editor. This completes the long sentence begun with In the mean time. Habit means outward form or dress. Blase is St Blaise. Burton's claim of continuity between the practices of different religions is polemical comparison, not a demonstrated chain of transmission.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whilst they prefer traditions before Scriptures, those Evangelical Councels, poverty, obedience, vowes, almes, fasting, supererogations, before Gods Commandments; their own ordinances in stead of his precepts, and keep them in ignorance, blindness,	By preferring traditions to Scripture, those evangelical counsels—poverty, obedience, vows, alms, fasting and works beyond strict obligation —to God's commandments, putting their own ordinances in place of his precepts, and keeping people in ignorance and blindness,[12581]
they have brought the common people into such a case by their cunning conveiances, strict discipline and servile education, that upon pain of damnation they dare not break the least ceremony, tradition, edict: hold it a greater sin to eat a bit of meat in Lent, than kill a man: their consciences are so terrified, that they are ready to despair if a small ceremony be omitted;	they have, through their cunning manoeuvres, strict discipline and servile upbringing, reduced ordinary people to such a state that, on pain of damnation, they dare not break the slightest ceremony, tradition or decree. They consider it a greater sin to eat a morsel of meat in Lent than to kill a person. Their consciences are so terrified that they are ready to despair if a minor ceremony is omitted.[12582]
and will accuse their own father, mother, brother, sister, nearest and dearest friends of heresie, if they do not as they do, will be their chief executioners, and help first to bring a fagot to burn them.	They will accuse their own father, mother, brother, sister and closest and dearest friends of heresy if they do not act as they do. They will be foremost among their executioners, the first to help bring a bundle of firewood to burn them.[12583]

[12581] Editor. Councels here means counsels, or recommendations, rather than church councils. Supererogations are works regarded as going beyond strict duty. Burton expands these terms into an accusation that human rules have displaced divine commands.

[12582] Editor. Conveiances means contrivances or manoeuvres. The comparison between eating meat and murder is Burton's accusation, not a statement of Catholic moral teaching. His focus returns to the fear and despair he associates with a conscience trained by superstition.

[12583] Editor. A fagot is a bundle of sticks used as fuel. Burton dramatizes religious obedience as overriding family loyalty. No particular prosecution is identified in this passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What mulct, what penance soever is enjoyned, they dare not but do it, tumble with S. Francis in the mire amongst hogs, if they be appointed, go woolward, whip themselves, build Hospitals, Abbies, &c. go to the East or West Indies, kill a King, or run upon a swords point: they performe all, without any muttering or hesitation, believe all.	Whatever fine or penance is imposed, they dare do nothing but obey: roll with St Francis in the mud among pigs if ordered, wear wool next to the skin, whip themselves, build hospitals and abbeys, go to the East or West Indies, kill a king or run onto a sword's point. They do everything without a murmur or hesitation, and believe everything.[12584]

[12584] Editor. Mulct means a fine; woolward, wearing wool against the skin as penance. Matthew Paris, Chronica majora, under 1227 (Luard III, p. 132), tells how Innocent III sent Francis to the pigs, then accepted him after his literal obedience. This locates a chronicle parallel, not independent proof of the event or Burton's immediate source. The placement under 1227 is not the audience's date. Burton's regicide claim is a polemical generalization.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12585]Ut pueri infantes credunt signa omnia ahena Vivere, & esse homines; & sic isti omnia ficta Vera putant, credunt signis cor inesse ahenis.	As little children believe that every bronze statue Lives and is human, so these people think every fiction True, and believe that bronze statues have a heart.[12586]
Source page 675 As children think their babies live to be, Do they these brazen Images they see.	As children think their dolls are living things, So they believe the bronze images they see.[12587]
And whilst the ruder sort are so carried headlong with blind zeal, are so gulled and tortured by their superstitions, their own too credulous simplicity and ignorance, their Epicurean Popes, and Hypocritical Cardinals laugh in their sleeves, and are merry in their chambers with their Punkes, they do indulgere genio, and make much of themselves.	And while the less educated are swept headlong by blind zeal, cheated and tormented by their superstitions, their own over-credulous simplicity and ignorance, their Epicurean popes and hypocritical cardinals laugh secretly and make merry in their rooms with their prostitutes. They indulge their appetites and pamper themselves.[12588]
The middle sort, some for private gain, hope of Ecclesiastical preferment, (quis expedivit psittaco suum χαῖρε) popularity, base flattery, must and will believe all their paradoxes and absurd tenents, without exception, and as obstinately maintain and put in practice all their traditions and idolatrous ceremonies (for their religion is halfe a Trade) to the death;	Those in between—some for private profit, the hope of advancement in the Church (who taught the parrot its "greetings"?), popularity or servile flattery—must and will believe all their paradoxes and absurd doctrines without exception. Just as stubbornly, they will uphold and practise all their traditions and idolatrous ceremonies to the death, for their religion is half a business.[12589]

[12585] Burton. Source page 674, d: "Lucilius lib.1. cap.22. de falsa relig." "Lucilius, On False Religion, book 1, chapter 22."

[12586] Editor. Lucilius is quoted by Lactantius, Divine Institutes 1.22, the chapter called On False Religion. Burton's margin compresses the poet and the transmitting work into a misleading citation. Cor means heart and is the reading in this scan. The three Latin lines and their separate English adaptation are both retained.

[12587] Editor. Babies means dolls; brazen means made of brass or bronze. Burton's two-line English adaptation abbreviates the Latin comparison. It is retained in addition to the full modern translation of the Latin.

[12588] Editor. Epicurean is Burton's polemical shorthand for pleasure-loving, rather than an account of Epicurus's philosophy. Punkes means prostitutes. The accusation continues his attack on papal authority from Block 159.

[12589] Editor. Persius, Prologue 8–11, asks who taught the parrot to greet; the answer is hunger, the belly being a teacher of ingenuity. Burton uses the allusion to expose a material motive for professions of belief. The Greek greeting is translated within the Latin question.

Original text 1651	Modern English
they will defend all, the golden Legend it self, with all the lyes and tales in it: as that of S. George, S. Christopher, S. Winifred, S. Denis, &c. It is a wonder to see how Nic. Harpsfield that pharisaicall Impostor amongst the rest, Ecclesiast. hist. cap.22. sæc. prim. sex. puzzles himself to vindicate that ridiculous fable of S. Ursula and the eleven thousand Virgins, as when they lived, how they came to Cullen, by whom martyred, &c.	They will defend everything, even the Golden Legend, with all its lies and stories, such as those of Saint George, Saint Christopher, Saint Winifred, Saint Denis and the rest. It is astonishing to see how Nicholas Harpsfield, that pharisaical impostor among the others, in his Ecclesiastical History, chapter 22 of the first six centuries, ties himself in knots defending the ridiculous fable of Saint Ursula and the eleven thousand virgins: when they lived, how they came to Cologne, who martyred them, and so on.[12590]
though he can say nothing for it, yet he must and will approve it: nobilitavit (inquit) hoc [12591]sæculum Ursula cum comitibus, cujus historia utinam tam mihi esset expedita & certa, quam in animo meo certum ac expeditum est, eam esse cum sodalibus beatam in cœlo virginem.	Although he can say nothing in its favour, he must and will endorse it: "Ursula and her companions," he says, "ennobled this century. I wish her history were as clear and certain to me as I am clearly and certainly convinced that she is a blessed virgin in heaven with her companions."[12592]
They must and will (I say) either out of blinde zeal believe, vary their compass with the rest, as the latitude of religion varies, apply themselves to the times and seasons, and for fear and flattery are content to subscribe and do all that in them lies to maintain and defend their present government,	They must and will, I say, believe out of blind zeal, or shift their compass with everyone else as the latitude of religion changes, adapting themselves to the times and seasons. Through fear and flattery they are willing to give their assent and do everything in their power to uphold and defend the existing government.[12593]

[12590] Editor. The Golden Legend is the medieval collection of saints' lives associated with Jacobus de Voragine. Cullen is Cologne. Harpsfield's precise chapter and the Ursula chronology remain for collation; Burton's denunciation does not by itself settle the history of the legend.

[12591] Burton. Source page 675, dagger: "An.441." "Year 441."

[12592] Editor. The marginal year 441 belongs to this quotation. Burton sets a profession of religious certainty against an admission of historical uncertainty; the quotation's precise wording in Harpsfield has not yet been checked.

[12593] Editor. The navigational metaphor turns changes of religious allegiance into adjustments of compass and latitude. Subscribe means formally assent, with an implication of submission to ecclesiastical authority.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and slavish religious Schoolmen, Canonists, Jesuits, Friers, Priests, Orators, Sophisters, who either for that they had nothing else to do, luxuriant wits knew not otherwise how to busie themselves in those idle times, for the Church then had few or no open adversaries, or better to defend their lyes, fictions, miracles, transubstantions, traditions, Popes pardons, Purgatories, Masses, impossibilities, &c.	And servile churchmen—scholastic theologians, canon lawyers, Jesuits, friars, priests, orators and sophists—either because they had nothing else to do, their over-abundant ingenuity finding no other occupation in those idle times when the Church had few or no open opponents, or to defend more effectively their lies, fictions, miracles, transubstantiations, traditions, papal pardons, purgatories, masses, impossibilities and so on,[12594]
with glorious shews, fair pretences, big words, and plausible wits have coined a thousand idle questions, nice distinctions, subtleties, Obs and Sols, such tropological, allegorical expositions, to salve all appearances, objections, such quirks and quiddities, Quodlibetaries, as Bale saith of Ferribrigge and Strode, instances, ampliations, decrees, glosses, canons,	have used splendid displays, attractive pretexts, imposing words and plausible ingenuity to invent a thousand pointless questions, minute distinctions, subtleties, objections and solutions, moral and allegorical interpretations to explain away every appearance and objection; such quirks and quiddities, disputations on any subject whatever—as Bale says of Ferribrigge and Strode—counterexamples, extensions, decrees, glosses and canons,[12595]

[12594] Editor. The source's long sentence loosely introduces another set of agents. Its transubstantions is retained on the left and rendered by the standard modern term. The catalogue represents Burton's Protestant polemic, including his classification of doctrines as impossibilities.

[12595] Editor. Obs and Sols abbreviates objections and solutions. Tropological interpretation draws moral meanings from a text. Quiddities concern what a thing is; quodlibetary disputations address questions on any proposed subject; ampliation extends a logical term's range. The Bale attribution remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
that in stead of sound Commentaries, good preachers, are come in a company of mad sophisters, primo secundo secundarii, sectaries, Canonists, Sorbonists, Minorites, with a rabble of idle controversies and questions, [12596]an Papa sit Deus, an quasi Deus? An participet utramque Christi naturam?	so that sound commentaries and good preachers have been replaced by a crowd of mad sophists, first-and-second-part-of-the-second-part men, sectarians, canon lawyers, Sorbonne theologians and Franciscan friars, with a mob of pointless controversies and questions: Is the pope God, or something like God? Does he share both of Christ's natures?[12597]
Whether it be as possible for God to be a Humble bee, or a Gourd as a man? Whether he can produce respect without a foundation or term, make a Whore a Virgine? Fetch Trajans soul from hell, and how? with a rable of questions about hell fire: Whether it be a greater sin to kill a man, or to clout shooes upon a Sunday? Whether God can make another God like unto himself?	Is it as possible for God to be a bumblebee or a gourd as a man? Can he produce a relation without a foundation or an object, make a prostitute a virgin, or fetch Trajan's soul from hell—and how? Then comes a crowd of questions about hellfire: is it a greater sin to kill a man or patch shoes on a Sunday? Can God make another God like himself?[12598]

[12596] Burton. Source page 675, e: "Hospinian. Osiander. An hæc propositio Deus fit cucurbita vel scarabæus, sit æque possibilis ac Deus & homo? An possit respectum producere sine fundamento & termino. An levius sit hominem jugulare quam die dominico calceum consuere?" "Hospinian. Osiander. Is this proposition, God becomes a gourd or a beetle, as possible as God and man? Can he produce a relation without a foundation and a term? Is it a lighter offence to cut a man's throat than to sew a shoe on the Lord's day?"

[12597] Editor. Primo secundo secundarii mocks scholastic subdivisions, apparently those of works such as Aquinas's Summa; its precise allusion remains open. Minorites are Franciscans. Erasmus's Praise of Folly similarly ridicules questions about Christ becoming a gourd and killing a thousand men versus stitching a shoe on the Sabbath. This is a satirical parallel, not evidence that all schoolmen held these views. The exact Hospinian and Osiander passages remain unlocated.

[12598] Editor. Respect means a relation; its term is that to which it relates. Clout means patch. The margin says beetle where the body says bumblebee. The Trajan question alludes to the medieval story of his release through Gregory's prayers; the specific scholastic discussions remain to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 675–676 Such, saith Kemnitius, are most of your Schoolmen, (meer Alchymists) 200. Commentators on Peter Lombard; (Pitseus catal. scriptorum Anglic. reckons up 180. English Commentators alone, on the matter of the sentences) Scotists, Thomists, Reals, Nominals, &c.	Such, says Chemnitz, are most of your scholastic theologians—mere alchemists: two hundred commentators on Peter Lombard. Pits's Catalogue of English Writers counts one hundred and eighty English commentators alone on the subject of the Sentences: Scotists, Thomists, realists, nominalists and the rest.[12599]
Source page 676 and so perhaps that of Saint [12600]Austin may be verefied. Indocti rapiunt cœlum, docti interim descendunt ad infernum. Thus they continued in such errour, blindness, decrees, sophismes, superstitions; idle ceremonies and traditions were the sum of their new coyned holiness and religion, and by these knaveries and stratagems they were able to involve multitudes, to deceive the most sanctified souls, and if it were possible the very elect.	And so perhaps Saint Augustine's saying may be proved true: The unlearned seize heaven, while the learned descend into hell. Thus they persisted in such error, blindness, decrees, sophisms and superstitions. Pointless ceremonies and traditions made up their newly minted holiness and religion. Through these tricks and stratagems they could entangle multitudes, deceive the most sanctified souls and, if it were possible, the very elect.[12601]
In the mean time the true Church, as wine and water mixt, lay hid and obscure to speak of, till Luthers time, who began upon a sudden to defecate, and as another Sun to drive away those foggy mists of superstition, to restore it to that purity of the Primitive Church. And after him many good and godly men, divine spirits, have done their endeavors, and still do.	Meanwhile the true Church, like wine mixed with water, lay virtually hidden and obscure until Luther's time. Suddenly he began to clarify it and, like another sun, to drive away those foggy mists of superstition and restore the purity of the early Church. After him, many good and godly men, inspired spirits, have worked to the same end, and still do.[12602]

[12599] Editor. Peter Lombard's Sentences was a central text of scholastic theology. Scotists and Thomists follow Duns Scotus and Thomas Aquinas; realists and nominalists differ over the status of universals. Burton's numerical claims, attributed to Chemnitz and Pits, have not been independently collated.

[12600] Burton. Source page 676, first star: "De doct. Christian." "On Christian Doctrine."

[12601] Editor. The parallel is Confessions 8.8.19, not On Christian Doctrine as the margin says. Augustine contrasts the unlearned seizing heaven with learned people immersed in flesh and blood; descent into hell is Burton's altered formulation. The elect echoes Matthew 24:24.

[12602] Editor. Defecate here means clarify or purify by removing sediment. Primitive means earliest. Burton presents the Reformation as recovery of an obscured original Church; this is his confessional account of its history.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12603]And what their ignorance esteem'd so holy, Our wiser ages do accompt as folly.	And what their ignorance thought so holy, Our wiser ages reckon as folly.[12604]
But see the divel, that will never suffer the Church to be quiet or at rest: no garden so well tilled but some noxious weeds grow up in it, no wheat but it hath some tares; we have a mad giddy company of Precisians, Schismaticks, and some Hereticks even in our own bosoms in another extream, Dum vitant stulti vitia in contraria currunt;	But look at the devil, who will never let the Church be quiet or at rest. No garden is so well cultivated that harmful weeds do not spring up in it; no wheat is without its tares. Even among ourselves we have a mad, giddy company of religious rigorists, schismatics and some heretics at the opposite extreme: Fools, avoiding one vice, rush into its opposite.[12605]
That out of too much zeal in opposition to Antichrist, humane traditions, those Romish rites and superstitions, will quite demolish all, they will admit of no ceremonies at all, no fasting dayes, no Cross in Baptism, kneeling at Communion, no Church musick, &c. no Bishops Courts, no Church government, rail at all our Church discipline, will not hold their tongues, and all for the peace of thee O Sion.	In their excessive zeal against Antichrist, human traditions, Roman rites and superstitions, they would demolish everything. They allow no ceremonies whatever, no fast days, no sign of the cross at baptism, no kneeling at Communion, no church music and so on; no bishops' courts, no church government. They rail against all our ecclesiastical discipline and will not hold their tongues—all for your peace, O Zion![12606]

[12603] Burton. Source page 676, second star: "Daniel."

[12604] Editor. Samuel Daniel, The Complaint of Rosamond, lines 881–882, in Grosart's edition of the Complete Works, I (1885), p. 112. Rosamond speaks amid the remembered ruins of Godstow. That text begins the second line "The wiser ages"; Burton has "Our wiser ages," retained here. The early edition used by Burton remains unidentified.

[12605] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.2.24. Precisians are people insistently exact in religious observance; the word often targets Puritans. Tares are weeds among grain and recall Matthew 13. Burton now attacks excess within his own religious camp.

[12606] Editor. Antichrist here is the Protestant polemical designation of papal power. Burton lists disputed practices of the English Church. His appeal to Zion's peace, recalling Psalm 122, is ironic in the context of quarrels over worship.

Original text 1651	Modern English
No not so much as Degrees some of them will tolerate, or Universities, all humane learning, (tis cloaca diaboli) hoods, habits, cap and surpless, such as are things indifferent in themselves and wholly for ornament, decency, or distinction sake, they abhor, hate, and snuff at, as a stone horse when he meets a Bear: they make matters of conscience of them, and will rather forsake their livings than subscribe to them.	Some will not even tolerate degrees, universities or any human learning—it is the devil's sewer. Hoods, robes, caps and surplices, things morally indifferent in themselves and used solely for ornament, propriety or distinction, they abhor, hate and snort at like a stallion meeting a bear. They make matters of conscience of them and would rather give up their church livings than assent to their use.[12607]
They will admit of no Holidayes, or honest recreations, as of hawking, hunting, &c. no Churches, no bels some of them, because Papists use them: no discipline, no ceremonies but what they invent themselves: no interpretations of Scriptures, no Comments of Fathers, no Councels, but such as their own phantastical spirits dictate, or Recta ratio, as Socinians, by which spirit misled, many times they broach as prodigious paradoxes as Papists themselves.	They allow no holy days or innocent recreations such as hawking and hunting; some allow no churches or bells because Catholics use them. They accept no discipline or ceremonies except those they invent themselves; no interpretations of Scripture, commentaries of the Church Fathers or councils except what their own fanciful spirits dictate—or right reason, as the Socinians call it. Misled by this spirit, they often put forward paradoxes as monstrous as those of the Catholics themselves.[12608]
Some of them turn Prophets, have secret revelations, will be of privy councel with God himself, and know all his secrets, [12609]Per capillos spiritum sanctum tenent, & omnia sciunt cum sint asini omnium obstinatissimi,	Some become prophets, have secret revelations, claim to sit on God's own privy council and know all his secrets: They hold the Holy Spirit by the hair and know everything, although they are the most obstinate asses of all.[12610]

[12607] Editor. Things indifferent are practices neither commanded nor forbidden in themselves, often called adiaphora. A stone horse is a stallion. Livings are benefices providing clergy with income; subscription could involve formal assent to Church requirements.

[12608] Editor. Burton groups distinct opponents together in a deliberately cumulative attack. His reference to Socinian right reason concerns the authority of rational interpretation in religion; it should not be read as a precise description shared by every group listed.

[12609] Burton. Source page 676, f: "Agrip. ep.29." "Agrippa, Letter 29."

[12610] Editor. The margin attributes the Latin insult to Agrippa, Letter 29; its exact setting remains uncollated. Privy council turns supposed direct access to God into a claim of political intimacy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A company of giddy heads will take upon them to define how many shall be saved, and who damned in a parish, where they shall sit in heaven, interpret Apocalypses, (Commentatores præcipites & vertiginosos, one cals them, as well he might) and those hidden mysteries to private persons, times, places, as their own spirit informs them, private revelations shall suggest, and precisely set down when the world shall come to an end, what year, what moneth, what day.	A crowd of giddy heads presumes to determine how many in a parish will be saved and who will be damned, and where they will sit in heaven. They interpret apocalyptic visions—rash and dizzy commentators, someone rightly calls them —and apply those hidden mysteries to particular people, times and places, as their own spirit informs them or private revelations suggest. They set down exactly when the world will end: the year, the month, the day.[12611]
Source page 676–677 Some of them again have such strong faith, so presumptuous, they will go into infected houses, expel divels, and fast forty daies, as Christ himself did; some call God and his attributes into question, as Vorstius and Socinus; some Princes, civil Magistrates, and their authorities, as Anabaptists, will do all their own private spirit dictates, and nothing else.	Others have such strong faith, so presumptuous, that they will enter plague-infected houses, cast out devils and fast forty days as Christ himself did. Some question God and his attributes, like Vorstius and Socinus; others question princes, civil magistrates and their authority, like the Anabaptists, and will do everything their own private spirit dictates, and nothing else.[12612]
Source page 677 Brownists, Barrowists, Familists, and those Amsterdamian sects and sectaries, are led all by so many private spirits. It is a wonder to reveal what passages Sleidan relates in his Commentaries, of Cretink, Knipperdoling, and their associates, those mad men of Munster in Germany; what strange Enthusiasmes, sottish Revelations they had, how absurdly they carried themselves, deluded others;	Brownists, Barrowists, Familists and those Amsterdam sects and sectarians are all led by as many private spirits. The episodes Sleidan recounts in his Commentaries about Cretink, Knipperdolling and their associates, those madmen of Münster in Germany, are astonishing: their strange claims of divine inspiration, their foolish revelations, their absurd behaviour and the ways they deceived others.[12613]

[12611] Editor. Apocalypses includes the interpretation of Revelation and prophetic disclosures more generally. Private persons means particular individuals, rather than necessarily people without public office. The unnamed source of the Latin description remains unresolved.

[12612] Editor. The polemical catalogue moves between theological controversy, rejection of civil authority and hazardous imitation of biblical acts. It collapses differences within Anabaptism; these are Burton's generalizations, not definitions of every adherent.

[12613] Editor. Brownists and Barrowists refer to separatists associated with Robert Browne and Henry Barrow; Familists to the Family of Love. Enthusiasm here means a claim of immediate divine inspiration. The Münster episodes in Sleidan remain for detailed collation; Cretink is retained as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and as prophane Machiavel in his political disputations holds of Christian religion, in general it doth enervate, debilitate, take away mens spirits and courage from them, simpliciores reddit homines, breeds nothing so couragious souldiers as that Romane: we may say of these peculiar sects, their Religion takes away not spirits onely, but wit and judgement, and deprives them of their understanding:	And just as the irreligious Machiavelli argues in his political discussions that Christianity in general weakens and debilitates people, takes away their spirit and courage, makes them less worldly, and produces soldiers far less courageous than Roman religion did, so we may say of these particular sects that their religion takes away not only spirit but intelligence and judgment, and deprives them of understanding.[12614]
for some of them are so far gone with their private Enthusiasmes and revelations, that they are quite mad, out of their wits. What greater madness can there be, than for a man to take upon him to be God, as some do? to be the holy Ghost, Elias, and what not? In [12615]Poland 1518. in the reign of King Sigismund, one said he was Christ, and got him 12. Apostles, came to judge the world, and strangely deluded the Commons.	For some are so far carried away by their private inspirations and revelations that they are completely mad, out of their senses. What greater madness could there be than for a man to claim to be God, as some do, or the Holy Spirit, Elijah, or anything else? In Poland in 1518, in King Sigismund's reign, a man said he was Christ, gathered twelve apostles, came to judge the world and extraordinarily deceived the common people.[12616]

[12614] Editor. Discourses 2.2 contrasts ancient civic courage with Christian humility, but then attributes modern weakness to an indolent interpretation of Christianity rather than to its inability to support virtue. Burton compresses that qualified argument. Simpliciores can suggest simplicity or guilelessness; less worldly preserves the immediate contrast without making it mean unintelligent.

[12615] Burton. Source page 677, g: "Alex. Gaguin. 22. Discipulis ascitis mirum in modum populum decepit." "Alexander Guagnini, 22. Having gathered disciples, he deceived the people in an extraordinary way."

[12616] Editor. The Guagnini reference is incomplete. The margin prints 22 followed by a point before Discipulis; this may be a locator and has not been used to change the body's twelve apostles. The episode remains an attributed report requiring collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12617]One David George an illiterate painter, not many years since, did as much in Holland, took upon him to be the Messias, and had many followers. Benedictus Victorinus Faventinus consil. 15. writes as much of one Honorius, that thought he was not onely inspired as a Prophet, but that he was a God himself, and had [12618]familiar conference with God and his Angels.	Not many years ago a certain David George, an unlearned painter, did the same in Holland: he claimed to be the Messiah and had many followers. Benedictus Victorinus of Faenza, in consultation 15, writes similarly of a certain Honorius, who thought himself not only inspired as a prophet but a god himself, and believed that he conversed familiarly with God and his angels.[12619]
Lavat. de spect. c.2. part. 8. hath a story of one John Sartorius, that thought he was the Prophet Elias, and cap. 7. of divers others that had conference with Angels, were Saints, Prophets, Wierus lib. 3. de Lamiis c. 7. makes mention of a Prophet of Groning that said he was God the Father; of an Italian and Spanish Prophet that held as much.	Lavater, On Apparitions, chapter 2, part 8, tells of a certain John Sartorius who thought he was the prophet Elijah; and in chapter 7, of several others who conversed with angels and were saints and prophets. Weyer, On Witches, book 3, chapter 7, mentions a prophet of Groningen who said he was God the Father, and an Italian and a Spanish prophet who made the same claim.[12620]

[12617] Burton. Source page 677, h: “Guicciard. descrip. Belg. complures habuit asseclas ab iisdem honoratus.” “Guicciardini, Description of the Low Countries. He had many followers and was honoured by them.”

[12618] Burton. Source page 677, i: “Hen. Nicholas at Leiden 1580. such a one.”

[12619] Editor. David George is David Joris. The marginal Henry Nicholas is an additional comparison with the founder of the Family of Love, rather than part of Honorius’s name or case. The precise Guicciardini and Victorinus passages, and the marginal date and location, remain uncollated.

[12620] Editor. The scan reads part. 8; this problematic Lavater locator is retained rather than silently corrected. Wierus is Johann Weyer, Groning is Groningen, and de Lamiis means On Witches. These compressed bibliographical references and the individual cases remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We need not rove so far abroad, we have familiar examples at home; Hacket that said he was Christ, Coppinger and Arthington his disciples: [12621]Burchet and Hovatus burned at Norwich. We are never likely seven years together without some such new Prophets that have several inspirations, some to convert the Jews, some fast forty dayes, go with Daniel to the Lions den; some foretel strange things, some for one thing, some for another.	We need not range so far abroad; we have familiar examples at home: Hacket, who said he was Christ, and his disciples Coppinger and Arthington; Burchet and Hovatus, burned at Norwich. We are unlikely ever to pass seven years without new prophets of this kind, each with a different inspiration: some to convert the Jews, some to fast forty days or go with Daniel into the lions' den; some to foretell strange things, some for one purpose, some for another.[12622]
Great precisians of mean conditions and very illiterate, most part by a preposterous zeal, fasting, meditation, melancholy, are brought into those gross errors and inconveniences. Of those men I may conclude generally, that howsoever they may seem to be discreet, and men of understanding in other matters, discourse well, læsam habent imaginationem, they are like comets, round in all places but only where they blaze, cætera sani,	Strict religious zealots of humble standing and little learning are, for the most part, brought into these gross errors and troubles by misguided zeal, fasting, meditation and melancholy. Of such people I may conclude generally that, however sensible and intelligent they may seem in other matters, however well they may converse, their imagination is impaired. They are like comets, round everywhere except where their tails flare out: otherwise sound.[12623]
they have impregnable wits many of them, and discreet otherwise, but in this their madness and folly breaks out beyond measure, in infinitum erumpit stultitia. They are certainly far gone with melancholy, if not quite mad, and have more need of physick than many a man that keeps his bed; more need of Hellebor than those that are in Bedlam.	Many have formidable intellects and are otherwise sensible, but on this subject their madness and folly break out beyond measure: their foolishness erupts without limit. They are certainly deep in melancholy, if not completely mad, and need medical treatment more than many people confined to bed—more hellebore than those in Bedlam.[12624]

[12621] Burton. Source page 677, k: "See Camdens Annals fo.242. & 285."

[12622] Editor. The margin prints Camden folios 242 and 285; the edition remains unidentified. Camden's Annals, 1573, section 16, in the English translation compared, says Burchet attacked Hawkins, killed a Tower keeper and was hanged after his right hand was cut off. That contradicts Burton's compressed pairing with Hovatus as burnt at Norwich. Hovatus remains unidentified; neither the pairing nor its execution claim is verified. Daniel's den refers to Daniel 6.

[12623] Editor. Mean conditions means low social standing. The comet image describes a supposedly circumscribed disorder amid otherwise coherent thought. Burton's imagination is a faculty within historical psychology, not simply the modern sense of creativity.

[12624] Editor. Bedlam is Bethlem Hospital. Hellebore was used as a purgative in historical treatment of melancholy. The passage combines medical explanation with sectarian invective; its classification and remedy belong to Burton's period.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 678 SUBSECT. 4. Prognosticks of Religious Melancholy.	SUBSECTION 4. Prognosis of Religious Melancholy.
You may guess at the Prognosticks, by the Symptomes. What can these signes foretel otherwise than folly, dotage, madness, gross ignorance, despair, obstinacy, a reprobate sense, [12625]a bad end? What else can superstition, heresie produce, but wars, tumults, uprores, torture of souls, and despaire, a desolate land, as Jeremy teacheth, cap. 7. 34. when they commit Idolatry, and walk after their own wayes?	You can infer the prognosis from the symptoms. What can these signs predict but folly, mental confusion, madness, gross ignorance, despair, obstinacy, a corrupt understanding and a bad end? What else can superstition and heresy produce but wars, riots, disturbances, tormented souls, despair and a desolate land, as Jeremiah teaches in chapter 7, verse 34, when people practise idolatry and follow their own ways?[12626]
how should it be otherwise with them? what can they expect but blasting, famine, dearth, and all the plagues of Ægypt, as Amos denounceth, cap. 4. vers. 9. 10. to be led into captivity? If our hopes be frustrate, we sow much and bring in little, eat and have not enough, drink and are not filled, clothe and be not warme, &c. Haggai 1. 6. we look for much and it comes to little, whence is it? His house was waste, they came to their own houses, vers. 9. therefore the heaven staid his dew, the earth his fruit:	How could it be otherwise for them? What can they expect but blight, famine, scarcity and all the plagues of Egypt, as Amos declares in chapter 4, verses 9–10, and to be led into captivity? If our hopes are disappointed, if we sow much and harvest little, eat but do not have enough, drink but are not satisfied, clothe ourselves but are not warm, and so on, Haggai 1:6; if we expect much and it comes to little, why is this? His house lay waste while they attended to their own houses, verse 9; therefore heaven withheld its dew and the earth its fruit.[12627]

[12625] Burton. Source page 678, l: “Arius his bowels burst, Montanus hanged himself, &c. Eudo de stellis, his disciples, ardere potius quam ad vitam corrigi maluerunt; tanta vis infixi semel erroris, they died blaspheming. Nubrigensis c.9. lib.1. Jer.7.23. Amos.5.5.” “Arius’s bowels burst; Montanus hanged himself, and so on. Eudo de Stellis’s disciples preferred to burn rather than be corrected and live: such is the power of error once firmly planted. They died blaspheming. William of Newburgh, book 1, chapter 9. Jeremiah 7:23. Amos 5:5.”

[12626] Editor. Prognosis means expected outcome; reprobate sense recalls Romans 1:28. Eusebius, Church History 5.16.13–15, quotes a hostile report that Montanus and Maximilla hanged themselves, but its author expressly disclaims eyewitness knowledge and certainty. It is not an established death record. Other deaths in Burton’s margin remain unverified. Newburgh c.9 should be compared with 1.19, the Eudo passage cited in Block 159.

[12627] Editor. Blasting means damage to crops by blight. Burton combines biblical phrases: the withholding of dew and produce is Haggai 1:10, following the explanation in 1:9. The clauses retain the source’s movement from prophetic warning to collective self-examination.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Because we are superstitious, irreligious, we do not serve God as we ought, all these plagues and miseries come upon us; what can we look for else but mutual wars, slaughters, fearfull ends in this life, and in the life to come eternal damnation? What is it that hath caused so many feral battles to be fought, so much Christian blood shed, but superstition? That Spanish Inquisition, Racks, Wheels, Tortures, Torments, whence do they proceed? from superstition.	Because we are superstitious and irreligious and do not serve God as we ought, all these plagues and miseries fall upon us. What else can we expect but wars against one another, slaughter, dreadful deaths in this life and eternal damnation in the next? What but superstition has caused so many bloody battles and so much Christian bloodshed? The Spanish Inquisition, racks, breaking wheels, tortures and torments—where do they come from? From superstition.[12628]
Bodine the Frenchman in his [12629]method. hist. accounts Englishmen Barbarians, for their civil wars: but let him but read those Pharsalian fields [12630]fought of late in France for Religion, their Massacres, wherein by their own relations in 24. years, I know not how many millions have been consumed, whole families and cities, and he shall find ours to have been but velitations to theirs.	The Frenchman Bodin, in his Method of History, calls the English barbarians because of their civil wars. But let him read about those battles like Pharsalus fought recently in France over religion, and their massacres, in which, by their own accounts, countless millions have perished in twenty-four years—whole families and cities—and he will find that ours were mere skirmishes beside theirs.[12631]

[12628] Editor. Feral here means deadly or destructive. The breaking wheel is an instrument of torture and execution. Burton makes a theological and moral argument about collective suffering; the attribution of calamity to divine punishment is his explanation.

[12629] Burton. Source page 678, m: “5.Cap.” “Chapter 5.”

[12630] Burton. Source page 678, n: “Poplinerius Lerius præf. hist. Rich. Dinoth.” “La Popelinière. Léry, preface to his history. Richard Dinothus.”

[12631] Editor. Pharsalian fields invokes the Roman civil war and Caesar’s victory over Pompey at Pharsalus. Velitations are skirmishes. The margin cites French historians, but Burton’s vague millions is a rhetorical casualty claim, not a verified total. Bodin’s precise passage and the supporting accounts remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But it hath ever been the custome of hereticks and idolaters, when they are plagued for their sins, and Gods just judgements come upon them, not to acknowledge any fault in themselves, but still impute it unto others. In Cyprians time it was much controverted betwixt him and Demetrius an idolater, who should be the cause of those present calamities. Demetrius laid all the fault on Christians, (and so they did ever in the primitive Church, as appears by the first book of [12632]Arnobius)	But heretics and idolaters have always made it their practice, when punished for their sins and visited by God's just judgments, to acknowledge no fault in themselves and put all the blame on others. In Cyprian's time he and an idolater called Demetrius disputed intensely about who caused the calamities of their day. Demetrius blamed the Christians for everything, as people always did in the early Church, as the first book of Arnobius shows.[12633]
[12634]that there were not such ordinary showres in Winter, the ripening heat in Summer, so seasonable Springs, fruitful Autumnes, no marble mines in the mountaines, less gold and silver than of old; that husbandmen, seamen, souldiers, all were scanted, justice, friendship, skill in Arts, all was decayed, and that through Christians default, and all their other miseries from them, quòd dii nostri à vobis non colantur, because they did not worship their gods.	There were no longer the usual winter rains or ripening summer heat, such seasonable springs or fruitful autumns; no marble quarries in the mountains, less gold and silver than before; farmers, sailors and soldiers were all in short supply; justice, friendship and skill in the arts had all declined. This was the Christians' fault, and all their other miseries came from them, because you do not worship our gods—because they did not worship their gods.[12635]

[12632] Burton. Source page 678, dagger: "Advers. gentes lib.1. postquam in mundo Christiana gens cœpit, terrarum orbem periisse, & multis malis affectum esse genus humanum videmus." "Against the Nations, book 1. Since the Christian people began to exist in the world, we see that the world has perished and the human race has been afflicted with many evils."

[12633] Editor. Cyprian's work is addressed to Demetrianus; Burton prints Demetrius, retained in the body. Arnobius, Against the Nations 1.1, opens with the accusation that Christianity has brought disasters. The marginal quotation reports that accusation, not Arnobius's own conclusion.

[12634] Burton. Source page 678, o: "Quod nec hyeme, nec æstate tanta imbrium copia, nec frugibus torrendis solita flagrantia, nec vernali temperie sata tam læta sint, nec arboreis fœtibus autumni fœcundi, minus de montibus marmor eruatur, minus aurum, &c." "That neither in winter nor in summer is there such an abundance of rain, nor the usual heat to ripen crops; that the spring weather produces less luxuriant growth, and autumn is less fruitful in the produce of trees; that less marble is quarried from the mountains, less gold, and so on."

[12635] Editor. Cyprian, To Demetrianus 3, develops a picture of an ageing world, including declining productivity and human excellence. Burton compresses it: his body says no marble mines, whereas the margin and Cyprian describe less marble being quarried. The Latin and Burton's separate English restatement are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 678–679 But Cyprian retorts all upon him again, as appears by his Tract against him. 'Tis true the world is miserably tormented and shaken with wars, dearth, famine, fire, inundations, plagues, and many feral diseases rage amongst us, sed non ut tu quereris ista accidunt quod dii vestri a nobis non colantur, sed quod à vobis non colatur Deus, à quibus nec quæritur, nec timetur,	But Cyprian turns it all back upon him, as his treatise against him shows. It is true that the world is miserably tormented and shaken by wars, scarcity, famine, fire, floods and plagues, and that many deadly diseases rage among us; but these things happen, not as you complain because your gods are not worshipped by us, but because God is not worshipped by you, who neither seek nor fear him.[12636]
Source page 679 Not as thou complainest, that we do not worship your Gods, but because you are Idolaters, and do not serve the true God, neither seek him, nor fear him as you ought. Our Papists object as much to us, and account us heretiques, we them; the Turks esteem of both as Infidels, and we them as a company of Pagans, Jews against all;	Not, as you complain, because we do not worship your gods, but because you are idolaters and do not serve the true God, neither seeking nor fearing him as you ought. Our Catholics bring the same charge against us and call us heretics, as we do them. The Turks regard both as unbelievers, and we regard them as a crowd of pagans; the Jews oppose everyone.[12637]
When indeed there is a generall fault in us all, and something in the very best, which may justly deserve Gods wrath, and pull these miseries upon our heads. I will say nothing here of those vain cares, torments, needless works, pennance, pilgrimages, pseudomartyrdome, &c. We heap upon our selves unnecessary troubles, observations;	Yet in truth there is a common fault in us all, and something even in the best of us that may justly deserve God's wrath and bring these miseries down upon our heads. I will say nothing here of those futile anxieties, torments, needless works, penance, pilgrimages, false martyrdom and so on. We heap unnecessary troubles and observances upon ourselves.[12638]

[12636] Editor. Cyprian's counter-argument appears in To Demetrianus 5–6. Burton preserves the adversarial structure: calamities accepted by both parties become evidence for opposed accounts of religious error. This is a historical attribution of divine agency.

[12637] Editor. The opening is Burton's own English restatement of the preceding Latin, preserved as a separate part of his text. Turks functions as his broad designation for Muslims. The reciprocal labels are evidence of the polemical exchange he describes, not equivalent theological definitions.

[12638] Editor. The admission of shared fault qualifies the preceding exchange of accusations. Observations means observances. Pseudomartyrdom describes suffering that Burton denies the religious value claimed for it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
we punish our bodies, as in Turkie (saith [12639]Busbequius leg. Turcic. ep. 3.) one did, that was much affected with Musick, and to hear Boyes sing, but very superstitious; an old Sybil coming to his house, or an holy woman (as that place yeelds many) took him down for it, and told him, that in that other world he should suffer for it; thereupon he flung his rich and costly Instruments which he had bedeckt with Jewels, all at once into the fire.	We punish our bodies, as a man in Turkey did, according to Busbecq's Turkish Embassy, Letter 3. He was very fond of music and of hearing boys sing, but very superstitious. An old sibyl, or holy woman, came to his house—the place produces many such women—rebuked him for it and told him he would suffer for it in the next world. He immediately threw all his rich and costly instruments, decorated with jewels, into the fire.[12640]
He was served in silver plate, and had goodly houshold-stuffe: a little after, another religious man reprehended him in like sort, and from thenceforth he was served in earthen vessels. Last of all, a decree came forth, because Turks might not drink wine themselves, that neither Jew nor Christian then living in Constantinople, might drink any wine at all.	He was served from silver plate and had magnificent household furnishings. A little later another religious man rebuked him in the same way, and thereafter he was served in earthenware. Finally a decree was issued that, since the Turks themselves could not drink wine, no Jew or Christian living in Constantinople could drink any wine either.[12641]
In like sort amongst Papists, fasting at first was generally proposed as a good thing; after, from such meats at set times; and then last of all so rigorously proposed, to binde the consciences upon pain of damnation. First Fryday, saith Erasmus, then Saturday, & nunc periclitatur dies Mercurii, and Wednesday now is in danger of a fast.	Similarly, among Catholics fasting was first recommended in general as a good thing, then abstinence from particular foods at fixed times, and finally imposed so rigorously that it bound consciences under threat of damnation. First Friday, says Erasmus, then Saturday, and now Wednesday is in danger—Wednesday is now in danger of becoming a fast day.[12642]

[12639] Burton. Source page 679, p: "Solitus erat oblectare se fidibus, & voce musica canentium; sed hoc omne sublatum Sybillæ cujusdam interventu, &c. Inde quicquid erat instrumentorum Symphoniacorum, auro gemmisque egregio opere distinctorum comminuit, & in ignem injecit &c." "He used to delight in stringed instruments and the musical voices of singers; but all this was abolished through the intervention of a certain sibyl, and so on. He then broke up all his musical instruments, exquisitely decorated with gold and jewels, and threw them into the fire, and so on."

[12640] Editor. In the consulted Busbecq text this episode occurs in Turkish Letter 4, and the man is Sultan Suleiman, called Solyman there. Burton leaves him unnamed and cites Letter 3. Sibyl means a prophetic woman. His compressed narrative is retained rather than silently harmonized with Busbecq.

[12641] Editor. Busbecq describes the abandonment of silver plate and a prohibition on importing wine into Constantinople; he then recounts obtaining a limited import exemption for ambassadors. Burton turns this into an unqualified prohibition on drinking. The difference matters to the example's apparent severity.

[12642] Editor. Meats means foods, not only flesh. The day of Mercury is Wednesday. The Latin translation and Burton's explanatory English are both kept. The precise Erasmus passage remains to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12643]And for such like toyes, some so miserably afflict themselves, to despaire, and death it self, rather then offend, and think themselves good Christians in it, when as indeed they are superstitious Jews.	Over such trifles some afflict themselves so miserably that they fall into despair and even death rather than transgress, thinking themselves good Christians in doing so, when in fact they are superstitious Jews.[12644]
So saith Leonardus Fuchsius, a great Physician in his time, [12645]We are tortured in Germany with these Popish edicts, our bodies so taken down, our goods so diminished, that if God had not sent Luther, a worthy man, in time to redresse these mischiefes, we should have eaten hay with our horses before this.	So says Leonhard Fuchs, a distinguished physician of his time: We are tortured in Germany by these papal decrees; our bodies are so weakened and our possessions so reduced that, if God had not sent that worthy man Luther in time to remedy these evils, we would by now have been eating hay with our horses.[12646]
[12647]As in fasting, so in all other superstitious edicts, we crucifie one another without a cause, barring our selves of many good and lawfull things, honest disports, pleasures and recreations; for wherefore did God create them but for our use? Feasts, mirth, musick, hauking, hunting, singing, dancing, &c. non tam necessitatibus nostris Deus inservit, sed in delitiis amamur, as Seneca notes, God would have it so.	In fasting and in every other superstitious ordinance, we torment one another without cause, depriving ourselves of many good and lawful things, innocent sports, pleasures and recreations. Why did God create them, if not for our use? Feasts, merriment, music, hawking, hunting, singing, dancing and so on: God does not merely provide for our necessities; we are lovingly supplied with delights, as Seneca observes. God intended it so.[12648]

[12643] Burton. Source page 679, q: “Ob id genus observatiunculas videmus homines misere affligi, & denique mori, & sibi ipsis Christianos videri quum revera sint Judæi.” “For petty observances of this kind we see people miserably afflicted and finally dying, while they seem to themselves to be Christians, although in reality they are Jews.”

[12644] Editor. The anti-Jewish comparison is Burton’s inherited Christian polemical language: it equates external or excessive observance with Judaism. It is preserved as part of the historical text, not accepted as a neutral description of Jewish religious life.

[12645] Burton. Source page 679, r: “Ita in corpora nostra fortunasque decretis suis sæviit ut parum abfuerat nisi Deus Lutherum virum perpetua memoria dignissimum excitasset, quin nobis fœno mox communi cum jumentis cibo utendum fuisset.” “It so savaged our bodies and fortunes with its decrees that, had God not raised up Luther, a man most worthy of perpetual remembrance, we would very nearly have had to eat hay, sharing our food with beasts of burden.”

[12646] Editor. Fuchsius is the Latinized name of Leonhard Fuchs. The marginal Latin praises Luther in stronger terms than the body’s worthy man. Burton supplies no work or chapter for this passage, which remains for collation.

[12647] Burton. Source page 679, s: “The Gentiles in India will eat no sensible creatures, or ought that hath bloud in it.”

[12648] Editor. Seneca, On Benefits 4.5, argues that divine gifts provide pleasure as well as necessity. The margin on Indian abstinence is anchored here in the scan but anticipates the next page’s examples. Sensible creatures means creatures capable of sensation; the sweeping generalization is Burton’s.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as Plato 2. de legibus gives out, Deos laboriosam hominum vitam miseratos, the gods in commiseration of humane estate sent Apollo, Bacchus, and the Muses, qui cum voluptate tripudia & saltationes nobis ducant, to be merry with mortals, to sing and dance with us.	And as Plato says in book 2 of the Laws, the gods took pity on humanity's toilsome life. In compassion for the human condition, the gods sent Apollo, Bacchus and the Muses, to lead us in joyful dances, to make merry with mortals, to sing and dance with us.[12649]
So that he that will not rejoyce and enjoy himself, making good use of such things as are lawfully permitted, non est temperatus, as he will, sed superstitiosus. There is nothing better for a man, than that he should eat and drink, and that he should make his Soul enjoy good in his labour, Eccles. 2. 24.	Thus a person who refuses to rejoice and enjoy himself, making good use of things lawfully permitted, is not temperate, as Plato would have it, but superstitious. There is nothing better for a person than to eat and drink and let the soul enjoy the good of its labour, Ecclesiastes 2:24.[12650]
Source page 679–680 And as [12651]one said of hauking and hunting, ut solatia in hac ægri orbis calamitate mortalibus tædiis deus objecit, I say of all honest recreations, God hath therefore indulged them to refresh, ease, solace and comfort us.	And as one writer said of hawking and hunting, God provided comforts for mortal weariness amid the misery of this afflicted world. I say the same of all innocent recreations: God has granted them to refresh, ease, solace and comfort us.[12652]

[12649] Editor. Laws 2.653c–654a describes festivals and divine companions as relief from human toil. Burton interweaves Latin paraphrase and English explanation; both are retained. Bacchus is Dionysus, the name used in Plato.

[12650] Editor. The sentence about the person who will not rejoice is Burton's application of the Platonic argument; its precise Latin wording was not found in the checked passage. He then joins a biblical warrant for enjoyment to the classical one.

[12651] Burton. Source page 679, star: "Vandormilius de Aucupio. cap.27." "Vandormilius, On Fowling, chapter 27."

[12652] Editor. The margin gives Vandormilius, On Fowling, chapter 27. This attribution and the precise Latin remain uncollated. The source reads mortalibus tædiis, rendered as mortal weariness; the modern sentence resolves the compressed Latin syntax without altering the original column.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 680 But we are some of us too stern, too rigid, too precise, too grossely superstitious, and whilst we make a conscience of every toy, with touch not, taste not, &c. as those Pythagorians of old, and some Indians now that will eat no flesh, or suffer any living creature to be killed, the Bannians about Guzzerat;	But some of us are too stern, too rigid, too exacting, too grossly superstitious. We make a matter of conscience of every trifle, with "do not touch, do not taste," and so on, like the ancient Pythagoreans and some Indians today who will eat no flesh or allow any living creature to be killed—the Banians around Gujarat.[12653]
we tyrannize over our brothers soul, lose the right use of many good gifts; honest [12654]sports, games and pleasant recreations, [12655]punish our selves without a cause, lose our liberties, and sometimes our lives.	We tyrannize over our brother's soul, lose the proper use of many good gifts—innocent sports, games and pleasant recreations—punish ourselves without cause, and lose our liberties and sometimes our lives.[12656]

[12653] Editor. Touch not, taste not recalls Colossians 2:21. Bannians is an early European term associated with Indian mercantile communities, not a precise label for a single religious doctrine. Burton's comparison reduces differing practices of abstinence and non-violence to excessive scruple.

[12654] Burton. Source page 680, star: "Some explode all humane authors, arts, and sciences, Poets, histories, &c. so precise, their zeal overruns their wits, and so stupid they oppose all humane learning, because they are ignorant themselves and illiterate, nothing must be read but Scriptures: but these men deserve to be pitied, rather then confuted. Others are so strict they will admit of no honest game and pleasure, no dancing, singing, other playes, recreations and games, hauking, hunting, Cock-fighting, Bear-baiting, &c. because to see one beast kill another is the fruit of our rebellion against God, &c."

[12655] Burton. Source page 680, t: "Nuda ac tremebunda cruentis Irrepet genibus si candida jusserit Ino. Juvenalis. Sect.6." "Naked and trembling, she will crawl on bloodied knees if bright Ino commands it. Juvenal, Satire 6."

[12656] Editor. The long English margin extends the attack to rejection of secular learning; explode means reject or denounce. The Juvenal margin parallels Satire 6.525–526, but prints tremebunda, Irrepet and Ino where the consulted text has tremibunda, erepet and Io. Io belongs to the surrounding cult of Isis; Burton's Ino is retained and translated as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Anno 1270, at [12657]Magdeburge in Germany, a Jew fell into a Privy upon a Saturday, and without helpe could not possibly get out; he called to his fellows for succour, but they denied it, because it was their Sabbath, non licebat opus manuum exercere, the Bishop hearing of it, the next day forbade him to be pulled out, because it was our Sunday: In the mean time the wretch died before Monday.	In the year 1270, at Magdeburg in Germany, a Jew fell into a privy on a Saturday and could not possibly get out without help. He called to his companions for assistance, but they refused because it was their Sabbath: it was forbidden to perform manual work. Hearing of this, the bishop forbade anyone to pull him out the next day because it was our Sunday. Meanwhile the unfortunate man died before Monday.[12658]
We have myriads of examples in this kinde, amongst those rigid Sabbatarians, and therefore not without good cause, [12659]Intolerabilem perturbationem Seneca calls it, as well he might, an intolerable perturbation, that causeth such dire events, folly, madness, sickness, despair, death of body and soul, and hell it self.	We have countless examples of this kind among those rigid Sabbatarians. And therefore with good reason Seneca calls it an intolerable disturbance, as indeed he might: an intolerable disturbance that causes such dreadful consequences—folly, madness, sickness, despair, death of body and soul, and hell itself.[12660]

[12657] Burton. Source page 680, dagger: “Munster Cosmog. lib.3. cap.444. Incidit in cloacam, unde se non possit eximere, implorat opem sociorum, sed illi negant, &c.” “Münster, Cosmography, book 3, chapter 444. He falls into a privy from which he cannot extricate himself, begs his companions for help, but they refuse, and so on.”

[12658] Editor. This hostile anecdote is attributed to Münster, Cosmography 3.444; its occurrence and wording there remain uncollated, and the event is not independently verified. It does not state the rabbinic principle that saving life overrides the Sabbath: compare Babylonian Talmud, Yoma 85b:3. Burton also condemns the bishop’s retaliatory refusal.

[12659] Burton. Source page 680, u: “De benefic.7.2.” “On Benefits, book 7, chapter 2.”

[12660] Editor. Sabbatarians here means rigorists about observance of a weekly holy day. On Benefits 7.2 associates well-being with freedom from mental disturbances and from false ideas about the gods; the exact Latin phrase cited by Burton has not been confirmed there. His separate English restatement is retained. Subsection 4 ends here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 5. Cure of Religious Melancholy.	SUBSECTION 5 The Cure of Religious Melancholy
To purge the world of Idolatry and superstition, will require some monster-taming Hercules, a divine Æsculapius, or CHRIST himself to come in his own person, to raign a thousand years on earth before the end, as the Millenaries will have him.	To purge the world of idolatry and superstition will require some monster-taming Hercules, a divine Asclepius, or Christ himself to come in person and reign on earth for a thousand years before the end, as the millenarians would have him do.[12661]
They are generally so refractory, self-conceited, obstinate, so firmely addicted to that religion in which they have been bred and brought up, that no perswasion, no terror, no persecution can divert them. The consideration of which, hath induced many commonwealths to suffer them to enjoy their consciences as they will themselves;	People are generally so resistant, so confident in their own opinions, so obstinate and firmly attached to the religion in which they were raised, that no persuasion, terror or persecution can turn them from it. This consideration has induced many states to allow them freedom of conscience as they themselves choose.[12662]
a toleration of Jews is in most Provinces of Europe: In Asia they have their Synagogues: Spaniards permit Moores to live amongst them; the Mogullians, Gentiles: the Turks all religions. In Europe, Poland and Amsterdam are the common Sanctuaries.	Jews are tolerated in most provinces of Europe; in Asia they have their synagogues. The Spaniards allow Moors to live among them; the Mughals allow non-Muslims; the Turks allow all religions. In Europe, Poland and Amsterdam are the common places of refuge.[12663]

[12661] Editor. Hercules destroys monsters; Asclepius is the god of healing. The millenarians expect a thousand-year reign of Christ, drawing on Revelation 20. Burton gives no particular group or writer here.

[12662] Editor. Commonwealths means political communities or states, without implying a republican constitution. Burton begins his discussion of toleration with the practical difficulty of changing inherited belief.

[12663] Editor. This is Burton's compressed survey, not a reliable statement of uniform legal conditions. Gentiles here denotes the non-Muslim populations of Mughal India. His sweeping claims about Spain and Ottoman toleration have not been independently established and should not be read as uniform historical facts.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 680–681 Some are of opinion, that no man ought to be compelled for conscience sake, but let him be of what religion he will, he may be saved, as Cornelius was formerly accepted, Jew, Turk, Anabaptists, &c. If he be an honest man, live soberly and civilly in his profession, (Volkelius, Crellius, and the rest of the Socinians, that now nestle themselves about Crakowe and Rakowe in Poland, have renewed this opinion) serve his own God, with that fear and reverence as he ought.	Some believe that no one ought to be coerced in matters of conscience: whatever religion a person follows, he may be saved, just as Cornelius was accepted in former times—Jew, Turk, Anabaptist or anyone else—provided he is honest, lives soberly and peaceably in his professed faith, and serves his own God with due fear and reverence. Volkel, Crell and the other Socinians now settled around Kraków and Raków in Poland have revived this opinion.[12664]
Source page 681 Sua cuiq; civitati (Læli) religio sit, nostra nobis; Tully thought fit every city should be free in this behalf, adore their own Custodes & Topicos Deos, tutelar and local gods, as Symmachus cals them.	Let every city, Laelius, have its own religion, and let us have ours. Cicero thought that every city should be free in this respect to worship its own protective and local gods—its tutelary and local gods, as Symmachus calls them.[12665]

[12664] Editor. Cornelius is the centurion whose prayers are heard before baptism in Acts 10. Volkel and Crell were Socinian writers. Crell's Vindication of Liberty of Religion, N. Y.'s English translation (1646), II, pp. 14–15, separates civil toleration from approval of error; III, pp. 46–47, argues that force produces hypocrisy rather than belief. These passages support opposition to coercion, not Burton's broader claim about salvation in any religion. His Latin edition and Volkel's position remain uncollated.

[12665] Editor. Cicero, Pro Flacco 69, has est, "has," where Burton prints sit, "let it have." Burton turns a statement about civic religious practice into a permission. Tully is Cicero. The translated Latin terms and Burton's separate English explanation are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Isocrates adviseth Demonicus, when he came to a strange citie, to [12666]worship by all means the Gods of the place, & unumquemq; Topicum deum sic coli oportere, quomodo ipse præceperit: which Cecilius in [12667]Minutius labours, and would have every nation, sacrorum ritus gentiles habere, & deos colere municipes, keep their own ceremonies, worship their peculiar gods,	Isocrates advises Demonicus that, when he comes to a foreign city, he should by all means worship the gods of the place, and that each local god ought to be worshipped in the way that he himself has commanded. Caecilius in Minucius presses this point, wishing every nation to retain its ancestral religious rites and worship its local gods—to keep its own ceremonies and worship its particular gods.[12668]
which Pomponius Mela reports of the Africans, Deos suos patrio more venerantur, they worship their own gods according to their own ordination. For why should any one nation, as he there pleads, challenge that universalitie of God, Deum suum quem nec ostendunt, nec vident, discurrentem scilicet & ubique præsentem, in omnium mores, actus, & occultas cogitationes inquirentem, &c. as Christians do?	Pomponius Mela reports this of the Africans: They worship their own gods according to ancestral custom—they worship their own gods according to their own prescribed practice. For why, as the speaker argues there, should any one nation claim this universality for its God, as Christians do: their God, whom they neither show nor see, supposedly moving about and present everywhere, investigating everyone's conduct, actions and secret thoughts, and so on?[12669]

[12666] Burton. Source page 681, first dagger: "Numen venerare præsertim quod civitas colit." "Worship especially the deity that the city worships."

[12667] Burton. Source page 681, second dagger: "Octavio dial." "In the dialogue Octavius."

[12668] Editor. Compare To Demonicus 13 on honouring the gods and public worship; Burton's advice about a foreign city is a freer formulation. Caecilius is the pagan speaker in Minucius Felix's Octavius 6. Burton presents an argument from that dialogue, not Minucius's own final position.

[12669] Editor. Mela, Chorography 1.36 (older division 1.8), describes some coastal African peoples retaining ancestral gods and worship, while most coastal inhabitants follow Roman ways. Burton broadens and shortens that account. The second Latin quotation returns to Caecilius's criticism of Christianity in Octavius 10, despite the intervening Mela reference. Challenge means claim as one's own.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Let every Province enjoy their libertie in this behalf, worship one God, or all as they will, and are informed. The Romans built Altars Diis Asiæ, Europæ, Lybiæ, diis ignotis & peregrinis: others otherwise, &c. Plinius Secundus as appears by his Epistle to Trajan, would not have the Christians so persecuted,	Let every province enjoy its liberty in this matter, worshipping one god or all, as it chooses and is taught. The Romans built altars to the gods of Asia, Europe and Libya, to unknown and foreign gods; others did otherwise, and so on. Pliny the Younger, as his letter to Trajan shows, would not have had Christians persecuted so harshly.[12670]
and in some time of the reign of Maximinus, as we find it registred in Eusebius lib.9. cap.9. there was a decree made to this purpose, Nullus cogatur invitus ad hunc vel illum deorum cultum, and by Constantine in the 19 year of his reign, as [12671]Baronius enformeth us, Nemo alteri exhibeat molestiam, quod cujusque animus vult, hoc quisque transigat,	And at one point in Maximinus's reign, as Eusebius records in his Church History, book 9, chapter 9, a decree was made to this effect: No one shall be compelled against his will to adopt this or that worship of the gods. Constantine likewise decreed in the nineteenth year of his reign, as Baronius tells us: Let no one trouble another; let each person do what his own soul desires.[12672]
new gods, new lawgivers, new Priests will have new ceremonies, customes and religions, to which every wise man as a good Formalist should accommodate himself.	New gods, new lawgivers and new priests will have new ceremonies, customs and religions, to which every prudent person, as a good conformist, should adapt himself.[12673]
[12674]Saturnus periit, perierunt & sua jura, Sub Jove nunc mundus, jussa sequare Jovis.	Saturn has perished, and his laws have perished too; The world is now under Jove: obey Jove's commands.[12675]

[12670] Editor. Pliny, Letters 10.96–97, is no straightforward advocate of toleration: he reports executing persistent Christians. Trajan's reply says they should not be sought out, but should be punished if accused and convicted, unless they recant. Burton gives a selective account.

[12671] Burton. Source page 681, third dagger: "Annal. tom.3. ad annum 324.1." "Annals, volume 3, under the year 324, 1."

[12672] Editor. Eusebius, Church History 9.9.20–25, records Maximinus's concession but stresses its insincerity and limits. Constantine's wording has a close parallel in Life of Constantine 2.56. The Baronius locator, including its final 1, is preserved for collation.

[12673] Editor. Formalist describes someone who conforms to outward forms. The advice belongs to Burton's survey of arguments for accommodation; its cynical phrasing need not be read as his unqualified conclusion.

[12674] Burton. Source page 681, star: "Ovid."

[12675] Editor. A distich transmitted after Heroides 4.132 in some manuscripts and early editions of Ovid, but omitted from modern critical texts. The textual history is documented by Buda and Tüskés with reference to Dörrie's apparatus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The said Constantine the Emperour, as Eusebius writes, flung down and demolished all the heathen gods, silver gold statues, altars, Images and temples, and turned them all to Christian Churches, infestus gentilium monumentis ludibrio exposuit; the Turke now converts them again to Mahometan Meskites. The like Edict came forth in the raign of Arcadius and Honorius.	That same emperor Constantine, as Eusebius writes, threw down and destroyed all the pagan gods, statues of silver and gold, altars, images and temples, and converted them all into Christian churches: hostile to pagan monuments, he exposed them to ridicule. The Turk now converts them in turn into Muslim mosques. A similar edict appeared in the reign of Arcadius and Honorius.[12676]
[12677]Symmachus the Orator in his dayes, to procure a generall toleration used this argument, [12678]Because God is immense and infinite, and his nature cannot perfectly be known, it is convenient he should be as diversly worshipped, as every man shall perceive or understand.	The orator Symmachus, seeking general toleration in his time, used this argument: Since God is immense and infinite, and his nature cannot be perfectly known, it is fitting that he should be worshipped in as many different ways as people perceive or understand him.[12679]
It was impossible he thought for one religion to be universall: you see that one small Province can hardly be ruled by one law civil or spirituall; and how shall so many distinct and vast Empires of the world be united into one? it never was, never will be.	He thought it impossible for one religion to be universal. You see that one small province can scarcely be governed by a single civil or spiritual law; how, then, can so many separate and vast empires of the world be united into one? It never has happened, and never will.[12680]

[12676] Editor. Meskites means mosques. The repeated all makes this a sweeping historical claim, whose precise scope is not established by the passage cited earlier. The Latin formulation and the Arcadius–Honorius edict remain for collation.

[12677] Burton. Source page 681, y: “In epist. Sym.” “In Symmachus’s letter.”

[12678] Burton. Source page 681, z: “Quia deus immensum quiddam est, & infinitum cujus natura perfectè cognosci non potest, æquum ergo est, ut diversa ratione colatur prout quisque aliquid de Deo percipit aut intelligit.” “Since God is something immense and infinite, whose nature cannot be known perfectly, it is therefore right that he should be worshipped in different ways, according as each person perceives or understands something of God.”

[12679] Editor. Compare Symmachus’s plea for ancestral worship in his third Relation, especially 10, on the impossibility of reaching so great a mystery by one road. Burton’s extended formulation is a paraphrase, not a literal quotation of that sentence. Convenient here means fitting or appropriate.

[12680] Editor. Burton continues the argument for plurality through a comparison between religious and political government. The boundaries between reported argument and his own development are not sharply marked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 681–682 Besides, if there be infinite planetary and firmamentals worlds, as [12681]some will, there be infinite Genii or commanding Spirits belonging to each of them: and so per consequens, (for they will be all adored) infinite religions: and therefore let every Territory keep their proper rites and ceremonies, as their dii tutelares will, so Tyrius cals them, and according to the quarter they hold: their own institutions, revelations, orders, Oracles, which they dictate to from time to time, or teach their Priests or Ministers.	Besides, if there are infinitely many planetary and stellar worlds, as some maintain, there are infinitely many guardian or ruling spirits belonging to each of them; and consequently, since they will all be worshipped, infinitely many religions. Let every territory therefore retain its own rites and ceremonies as its tutelary gods—as Maximus of Tyre calls them—wish, and according to the region they govern: its own institutions, revelations, ordinances and oracles, which these gods dictate from time to time or teach their priests or ministers.[12682]
Source page 682 This tenent was stiffely maintained in Turkie not long since, as you may read in the third Epistle of Busbequius, [12683]that all those should participate of eternall happinesse, that lived an holy and innocent life, what religion soever they professed: Rustan Bassa was a great Patron of it; though Mahomet himself was sent virtute gladii, to enforce all, as he writes in his Alcoran, to follow him.	This doctrine was stoutly maintained in Turkey not long ago, as you may read in Busbecq's third letter: everyone who lived a holy and innocent life should share in eternal happiness, whatever religion they professed. Rüstem Pasha was a strong supporter of it, although Muhammad himself was sent by the power of the sword to compel everyone to follow him, as he writes in his Quran.[12684]

[12681] Burton. Source page 681, last dagger: "Campanella Calcagninus, and others."

[12682] Editor. Firmamentals worlds is the printed form, rendered as stellar worlds. Genii here are attendant or governing spirits. The margin names Campanella and Calcagninus (Calcagnini), without loci; the precise cosmological attribution and Maximus of Tyre reference remain open.

[12683] Burton. Source page 682, a: "Æternæ beatitudinis consortes fore, qui sancte innocenterque hanc vitam traduxerint; quamcunque illi religionem sequuti sunt." "Those who have passed this life holily and innocently will share in eternal happiness, whatever religion they have followed."

[12684] Editor. Busbecq's third Turkish Letter reports this exchange with Rüstem, adding that the opinion was considered heretical. The claim about Muhammad and the sword is Burton's polemical assertion; he supplies no Quranic passage, and it should not be treated as a verified quotation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some again will approve of this for Jewes, Gentiles, Infidels, that are out of the fold, they can be content to give them all respect and favour, but by no means to such as are within the precincts of our own Church, and called Christians, to no Heretiques, Schismatiques, or the like; let the Spanish Inquisition, that fourth Fury, speak of some of them, the civill wars and Massacres in France, our Marian times.	Others approve of this for Jews, pagans and unbelievers outside the fold. They are willing to show them every consideration and favour, but by no means to those within the bounds of our own Church who are called Christians—to heretics, schismatics or the like. Let the Spanish Inquisition, that fourth Fury, speak for some of them, along with the civil wars and massacres in France and our own Marian times.[12685]
[12686]Magallianus the Jesuite will not admit of conference with an heretique, but severity and rigour to be used, non illis verba reddere, sed furcas figere oportet; and Theodosius is commended in Nicephorus lib.12. cap.15. [12687]That he put all Heretiques to silence.	Magallianus the Jesuit will allow no discussion with a heretic, insisting on severity and rigour: we ought not to answer them with words, but to set up gallows. And Theodosius is praised in Nicephorus, book 12, chapter 15, for silencing all heretics.[12688]
Bernard. epist.190. will have club law, fire and sword for Heretiques, [12689]compell them, stop their mouthes not with disputations, or refute them with reasons, but with fists; and this is their ordinary practise.	Bernard, in Letter 190, would use the law of the club, fire and sword against heretics: compel them, stop their mouths with blows rather than disputation, refute them with fists rather than reasons. And this is their ordinary practice.[12690]

[12685] Editor. The fourth Fury adds the Inquisition to the three avenging Furies of classical mythology. Marian times refers to Mary I's reign in England and the persecution of Protestants. Burton exposes unequal toleration of external religions and internal dissent.

[12686] Burton. Source page 682, b: "Comment. in c. Tim.6. ver.20. & 21. severitate cum hæreticis agendum, & non aliter." "Commentary on Timothy, chapter 6, verses 20 and 21. Heretics must be dealt with severely, and in no other way."

[12687] Burton. Source page 682, c: "Quod silentium hæreticis indixerit." "Because he imposed silence on heretics."

[12688] Editor. The marginal Timothy citation and the Nicephorus attribution are retained as printed; their precise wording and context remain uncollated. Burton's reported recommendation of gallows is stronger than mere refusal to debate.

[12689] Burton. Source page 682, d: "Igne & fuste potius agendum cum hæreticis quam cum disputationibus; os alia loquens, &c." "Heretics should be dealt with by fire and club rather than by disputations; a mouth speaking other things, and so on."

[12690] Editor. Club law means coercion by brute force. Burton's emphatic account of Bernard and the fragment in the margin require checking against the full letter; they are reported here as his attribution.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Another companie are as milde on the other side, to avoid all heart-burning, and contentious wars and uproars, they would have a generall toleration in every kingdom, no mulct at all, no man for religion or conscience be put to death, which [12691]Thuanus the French Historian much favours: our late Socinians defend; Vaticanus against Calvin in a large Treatise in behalf of Servetus, vindicates; Castalio, &c.	Another group is correspondingly mild on the other side. To avoid all resentment, contentious wars and disturbances, they would establish general toleration in every kingdom, with no fine at all and no one put to death for religion or conscience. The French historian de Thou strongly favours this; our recent Socinians defend it; Vaticanus upholds it against Calvin in a long treatise on behalf of Servetus; so does Castellio, and others.[12692]
Martin Ballius and his companions, maintained this opinion not long since in France, whose errour is confuted by Beza in a just Volume. The medium is best, and that which Paul prescribes, Gal.1. If any man shall fall by occasion, to restore such a one with the spirit of meeknesse, by all fair means, gentle admonitions:	Martin Ballius and his companions maintained this opinion in France not long ago; Beza refutes their error in a substantial volume. The middle course is best: what Paul prescribes in Galatians 1, if anyone should be overtaken by a fault, restore that person in a spirit of gentleness, using every kindly means and gentle admonition.[12693]
but if that will not take place, Post unam & alteram admonitionem hæreticum devita, he must be excommunicate, as Paul did by Hymenæus, delivered over to Satan. Immedicabile vulnus ense recidendum est: As Hippocrates said in Physick, I may well say in Divinitie, Quæ ferro non curantur, ignis curat.	But if that has no effect, after a first and second warning, avoid the heretic: he must be excommunicated and delivered over to Satan, as Paul did with Hymenaeus. An incurable wound must be cut away with the sword. What Hippocrates said in medicine I may well say in theology: What iron does not cure, fire cures.[12694]

[12691] Burton. Source page 682, dagger: “Præfat. hist.” “Preface to the history.”

[12692] Editor. Mulct means a fine or penalty. Thuanus is Jacques-Auguste de Thou; Castalio is Sébastien Castellio. The reference concerns the controversy over Michael Servetus’s execution. Vaticanus is a literary name in the anti-Calvin polemic; the exact edition used by Burton remains for collation.

[12693] Editor. The biblical passage is Galatians 6:1, although Burton prints Gal.1. Just means full-sized or substantial. Martin Ballius points to the name Martinus Bellius used in the toleration controversy; the relationship of Burton’s named writers and publications remains to be collated.

[12694] Editor. The warning echoes Titus 3:10; Hymenaeus appears in 1 Timothy 1:20. The incurable wound recalls Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.190–191; the surgical maxim is from Hippocrates, Aphorisms 7.87. Burton’s middle course still includes coercion, as the following sentence makes explicit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For the vulgar, restrain them by lawes, mulcts, burn their books, forbid their conventicles: for when the cause is taken away, the effect will soon cease. Now for Prophets, dreamers, and such rude silly fellowes, that through fasting, too much meditation, preciseness, or by Melancholy are distempered: the best means to reduce them ad sanam mentem, is to alter their course of life, and with conference, threats, promises, perswasions, to intermixe Physick.	As for the common people, restrain them by laws and fines, burn their books and prohibit their private religious meetings: once the cause is removed, the effect will soon cease. But for prophets, dreamers and such ignorant, simple people whose minds are disturbed through fasting, excessive meditation, religious scrupulosity or melancholy, the best means of restoring them to a sound mind is to change their way of life and combine discussion, threats, promises and persuasion with medical treatment.[12695]
Hercules de Saxonia had such a Prophet committed to his charge in Venice, that thought he was Elias, and would fast as he did: he dressed a fellow in Angels attire, that said he came from heaven to bring him divine food, and by that means staid his fast, administred his Physick: so by the meditation of this forged Angel he was cured.	Hercules of Saxony had such a prophet entrusted to his care in Venice. The man believed he was Elijah and insisted on fasting as Elijah had done. The physician dressed someone as an angel, who said he had come from heaven to bring divine food. In this way he stopped the man's fast and administered medicine; through the intervention of this counterfeit angel the man was cured.[12696]

[12695] Editor. Conventicles are private religious assemblies, here regarded as unauthorized. Preciseness means excessive religious strictness. Burton shifts from public suppression to medical management of particular sufferers; his category does not correspond directly to a modern diagnosis.

[12696] Editor. The physician is Ercole Sassonia; Elias is Elijah. The source prints meditation, apparently for mediation, rendered here as intervention. Burton does not give a precise source for this reported therapeutic deception.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 682–683 [12697]Rhasis an Arabian, cont. lib.1. cap.9. speakes of a fellow that in like case complained to him, and desired his help: I asked him (saith he) what the matter was, he replyed, I am continually meditating of heaven and hell, and me thinkes I see and talk with fierie spirits, smell brimstone, &c. and am so carried away with these conceits, that I can neither eat, nor sleep, nor go about my businesse: I cured him (saith Rhasis) partly by perswasion, partly by Physick, and so have I done by many others.	Rhazes, the Arabian physician, in his Comprehensive Book, book 1, chapter 9, speaks of a man in a similar condition who complained to him and asked for help. I asked him, he says, what was wrong. He replied: I am constantly meditating on heaven and hell, and think I see and speak with fiery spirits, smell sulphur, and so on. These ideas carry me away so completely that I can neither eat nor sleep nor attend to my business. I cured him, says Rhazes, partly by persuasion and partly by medicine, and have treated many others in the same way.[12698]
Source page 683 We have frequently such prophets and dreamers amongst us, whom we persecute with fire and fagot: I think the most compendious cure for some of them at least, had been in Bedlam. Sed de his satis.	We often have such prophets and dreamers among us, whom we persecute by burning them at the stake. I think the most direct cure for at least some of them would have been treatment in Bedlam. But enough of them.[12699]

[12697] Burton. Source page 682, e: “Quidam conquestus est mihi de hoc morbo, & deprecatus est ut ego illum curarem; ego quæsivi ab eo quid sentiret; respondit, semper imaginor & cogito de Deo & angelis, &c. et ita demersus sum hac imaginatione, ut nec edam nec dormiam, nec negotius &c. Ego curavi medicina & persuasione; & sic plures alios.” “A certain man complained to me of this illness and begged me to cure him. I asked what he felt. He replied: I constantly imagine and think about God and angels, and so on, and am so absorbed in this imagining that I neither eat nor sleep nor attend to business, and so on. I cured him with medicine and persuasion, and have cured many others in the same way.”

[12698] Editor. Cont. abbreviates the Latin title Continens of al-Razi’s medical compilation. The margin says God and angels where Burton’s English says heaven, hell and fiery spirits; both are preserved. Its printed negotius is grammatically irregular; the sense is supplied from the body. The cited chapter remains uncollated.

[12699] Editor. Fire and fagot means burning at the stake. Bedlam is Bethlem Hospital in London. Burton proposes confinement and treatment for some people subjected to religious persecution; this remains a historically specific conception of care.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 2. SUBSECT. 1. Religious Melancholy in defect; parties affected, Epicures, Atheists, Hypocrites, worldly secure, Carnalists, all impious persons, Impenitent sinners, &c.	MEMBER 2 SUBSECTION 1 Religious Melancholy from Deficiency: Those Affected—Epicures, Atheists, Hypocrites, the Worldly and Complacent, Carnalists, All Impious People, Impenitent Sinners, and Others[12700]
In that other extream, or defect of this love of God, knowledge, faith, fear, hope, &c. are such as erre both in doctrine and manners, Sadduces, Herodians, Libertines, polititians; all manner of Atheists, Epicures, Infidels, that are secure, in a reprobate sense, fear not God at all, and such are too distrustfull and timorous, as desperate persons be:	At the other extreme, where this love of God, knowledge, faith, fear, hope and so on are deficient, stand those who err in both doctrine and conduct: Sadducees, Herodians, Libertines, political schemers, every kind of atheist, Epicure and unbeliever who is complacent, has a corrupted understanding and does not fear God at all; also those who are excessively distrustful and fearful, as despairing people are.[12701]
That grand sin of Atheisme or impietie, [12702]Melancthon cals it monstrosam melancholiam, monstrous melancholy; or venenatam melancholiam, poysoned melancholy. A company of Cyclopes or Giants, that war with the gods, as the Poets fained, Antipodes to Christians, that scoffe at all religion, at God himself, deny him and all his attributes, his wisdom, power, providence, his mercy and judgement.	Melanchthon calls that great sin of atheism or impiety monstrous melancholy—monstrous melancholy—or poisoned melancholy—poisoned melancholy. They are a band of Cyclopes or Giants warring against the gods, as the poets imagined, the opposite of Christians: they mock all religion and God himself, denying him and all his attributes—his wisdom, power, providence, mercy and judgment.[12703]

[12700] Editor. In defect means arising from a deficiency, the opposite of the religious excess just discussed. Secure here means heedlessly confident. Carnalists live for bodily or worldly interests. Epicures is Burton's polemical term for pleasure-seekers, not a precise description of Epicurean philosophy.

[12701] Editor. Polititians here implies people who subordinate religion to policy or expediency. The list gathers very different groups under a theological and moral classification. Burton includes excessive distrust alongside insufficient faith; desperate means despairing in this clause.

[12702] Burton. Source page 683, f: "De anima, c. de humoribus." "On the Soul, chapter on the humours."

[12703] Editor. Melanchthon's cited chapter is on the humours in On the Soul. Burton's separate Latin and English labels are both retained even though they coincide in modern English. Antipodes means diametrical opposites; the mythic comparison is polemical, not a clinical finding.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12704]Esse aliquos manes, & subterranea regna, Et contum, & Stygio ranas in gurgite nigras, Atq; unâ transire vadum tot millia cymbâ, Nec pueri credunt, nisi qui nondum ære lavantur.	That there are ghosts and kingdoms underground, A boatman's pole, and black frogs in the Styx's pool, And thousands crossing the water in one boat — Not even boys believe, except those too young to pay for baths.[12705]
That there is either Heaven or hell, resurrection of the dead, pain, happinesse, or world to come, credat Judæus Apella: for their parts they esteem them as so many Poets tales, Bugbears, Lucians Alexander; Moses, Mahomet and Christ are all as one in their creed.	That there is either heaven or hell, resurrection of the dead, suffering, happiness or a world to come—let Apella the Jew believe it! For their part, they regard these as so many poets' tales and bogeys, like Lucian's Alexander. Moses, Muhammad and Christ are all the same in their creed.[12706]
When those bloudy wars in France for matters of Religion, (saith [12707]Richard Dinoth) were so violently pursued betwixt Hugenotes and Papists, there was a company of good fellows laughed them all to scorn, for being such superstitious fools, to loose their lives and fortunes, accounting faith, religion, immortality of the soul, meer fopperies and illusions.	When those bloody religious wars in France were fought so fiercely between Huguenots and Catholics, says Richard Dinothus, a band of merry companions laughed them all to scorn as superstitious fools for losing their lives and fortunes. They considered faith, religion and the immortality of the soul mere nonsense and delusion.[12708]

[12704] Burton. Source page 683, g: "Juvenal."

[12705] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 2.149–152. Burton's Et contum, "and a pole," differs from the consulted text's Cocytum, the underworld river Cocytus. The translation follows Burton's reading. The last line refers to small children admitted to the baths without charge.

[12706] Editor. The phrase about Apella comes from Horace, Satires 1.5.100, and invokes an anti-Jewish stereotype of credulity. Lucian's Alexander portrays a fraudulent religious entrepreneur. Burton attributes this levelling of religious founders to the people he attacks.

[12707] Burton. Source page 683, star: "Li.5. Gal.hist. quamplurimi reperti sunt qui tot pericula subeuntes irridebant; & quæ de fide, religione &c. dicebant, ludibrio habebant, nihil eorum admittentes de futura vita." "Book 5 of the History of France. Very many were found who mocked those undergoing so many dangers and made a joke of what they said about faith, religion and so on, accepting none of their claims about a future life."

[12708] Editor. Good fellows carries a suggestion of convivial companions. The margin cites book 5 of Dinothus's History of France; the exact passage remains for collation. Papists is rendered as Catholics, while the hostile argument is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such loose [12709]Atheisticall spirits are too predominant in all kingdoms. Let them contend, pray, tremble, trouble themselves that will, for their parts, they fear neither God nor divel; but with that Cyclops in Euripides,	Such dissolute, atheistical spirits are all too prevalent in every kingdom. Let others dispute, pray, tremble and torment themselves if they will; these people fear neither God nor devil, but behave like the Cyclops in Euripides:[12710]
Haud ulla numina expavescunt cœlitum, Sed victimas uni deorum maximo, Ventri offerunt, deos ignorant cæteros.	They fear none of the heavenly powers, But offer sacrifice to one, the greatest god, Their belly, and acknowledge no other gods.[12711]
Source page 683–684 They fear no God but one, They sacrifice to none, But belly, and him adore, For Gods they know no more.	They fear no god but one; They sacrifice to none But Belly, whom they adore, And know no gods besides.
Source page 684 Their God is their belly, as Paul saith, Sancta mater saturitas;	Their god is their belly, as Paul says: holy mother Fullness![12712]
—— quibus in solo vivendi causa palato est.	—— whose only reason for living lies in their palate.[12713]

[12709] Burton. Source page 683, dagger: "50000 Atheists at this day in Paris, Mercennus thinks."

[12710] Editor. The estimate of 50,000 atheists in Paris is attributed to Marin Mersenne. It is an unverified polemical number, not a demonstrated count. Burton's category of atheism here encompasses irreligious behaviour as well as explicit disbelief.

[12711] Editor. A Latin rendering of the Cyclops's self-indulgent speech in Euripides' Cyclops, adapted to the plural. The particular Latin version has not yet been identified. Burton's own English stanza follows separately.

[12712] Editor. Paul's phrase is Philippians 3:19. The second expression makes satiety into a mock divinity; it is not a continuation of Paul's words.

[12713] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 11.11: people who live only for the pleasures of eating.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Idol which they worship and adore, is their Mistris, with him in Plautus, mallem hæc mulier me amet quam dii, they had rather have her favour then the Gods. Satan is their guide, the flesh is their instructor, Hypocrisie their Counsellour, Vanity their fellow-souldier, their will their law, Ambition their captain, Custome their rule: temerity, boldnesse, impudence their Art, toyes their trading, damnation their end.	The idol they worship and adore is their mistress. Like the man in Plautus, I would rather this woman loved me than the gods did—they would rather have her favour than the gods'. Satan is their guide, the flesh their teacher, hypocrisy their counsellor, vanity their fellow soldier, their own will their law, ambition their captain, custom their rule; rashness, audacity and shamelessness are their art, trifles their business and damnation their end.[12714]
All their endeavours are to satisfie their lust and appetite, how to please their Genius, and to be merry for the present,	All their efforts go towards satisfying their lust and appetite, indulging their own inclinations and making merry for the present:[12715]
Ede, lude, bibe, post mortem nulla voluptas.	Eat, play, drink: after death there is no pleasure.
The same condition is of men and of beasts; as the one dieth, so dieth the other, Eccles.3.19. the world goes round,	Human beings and beasts share the same condition: as one dies, so does the other, Ecclesiastes 3:19. The world goes round:[12716]
—— [12717]truditur dies die, Novæque pergunt interire Lunæ:	—— day is driven out by day, And new moons keep passing away:[12718]
[12719]they did eat and drink of old, marry, bury, bought, sold, planted, built, and will do still.	In former times they ate and drank, married and buried, bought and sold, planted and built, and they will go on doing so.[12720]

[12714] Editor. Burton builds a moral allegory through a succession of personified powers and military offices. His precise Plautus reference remains to be located. Toys means trifles or frivolities.

[12715] Editor. To please one's Genius is to indulge oneself, drawing on the idea of a person's attendant spirit.

[12716] Editor. Burton extracts the verse for the outlook he is describing; it should not be taken as a complete account of Ecclesiastes' argument.

[12717] Burton. Source page 684, first dagger: "Hor. l.2. od.18." "Horace, book 2, ode 18."

[12718] Editor. Horace, Odes 2.18.15–16. The margin reads ode 18; the faded numeral must not be read as 13.

[12719] Burton. Source page 684, first star: "Luke 17."

[12720] Editor. Luke 17:26–30 lists ordinary activities before catastrophe in the days of Noah and Lot. Burton combines the lists and adds burying.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12721]Our life is short and tedious, and in the death of a man there is no recovery, neither was any man known that hath returned from the grave: for we are born at all adventure, and we shall be hereafter as though we had never been; for the breath is as smoke in our nostrils, &c. and the spirit vanisheth as the soft air.	Our life is short and wearisome; there is no remedy when a person dies, and no one has been known to return from the grave. We are born by chance, and afterwards shall be as though we had never existed; the breath in our nostrils is like smoke, and so on, and the spirit vanishes like thin air.[12722]
[12723]Come let us enjoy the pleasures that are present, let us chearfully use the creatures as in youth, let us fill our selves with costly wine and ointments, let not the flower of our life passe by us, let us crown our selves with rose buds before they are withered, &c.	Come, let us enjoy the pleasures before us; let us eagerly use created things as in our youth, fill ourselves with costly wine and perfumes, let the flower of life not pass us by, and crown ourselves with rosebuds before they wither, and so on.[12724]
[12725]Vivamus mea Lesbia & amemus, &c. [12726]Come let us take our fill of love, and pleasure in dalliance, for this is our portion, this is our lot.	Let us live, my Lesbia, and let us love, and so on. Come, let us take our fill of love and find pleasure in embraces, for this is our portion, this is our lot.[12727]
Tempora labuntur, tacitisque senescimus annis,	Time slips away, and we grow old as the years pass silently.[12728]

[12721] Burton. Source page 684, h: “Wisd.2.2.” “Wisdom 2:2.”

[12722] Editor. Wisdom 2:1–3, though the margin cites only 2:2. These are the words attributed to the ungodly by the biblical narrator, not the book’s endorsed teaching. At all adventure means by chance.

[12723] Burton. Source page 684, i: “Vers.6,7,8.” “Verses 6, 7 and 8.”

[12724] Editor. Wisdom 2:6–8 continues the speech of the ungodly. Creatures means created things or the goods of creation; ointments here are scented oils.

[12725] Burton. Source page 684, second star: “Catullus.”

[12726] Burton. Source page 684, second dagger: “Prov.7.8.” “Proverbs 7:8.”

[12727] Editor. Catullus 5.1 is followed by an adaptation of Proverbs 7:18, the seductress’s invitation. Burton’s margin prints 7.8; it is preserved rather than silently corrected. The concluding portion and lot are not part of that verse.

[12728] Editor. Ovid, Fasti 6.771. The displayed Latin line is retained as verse even though the next prose sentence begins beside it in the scan.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For the rest of heaven and hell, let children and superstitious fools beleeve it: for their parts they are so far from trembling at the dreadfull day of judgement, that they wish with Nero, Me vivo fiat, let it come in their times: so secure, so desperate, so immoderate in lust and pleasure, so prone to revenge,	As for the rest, heaven and hell, let children and superstitious fools believe it. These people are so far from trembling at the dreadful day of judgment that they wish with Nero, let it happen while I am alive—let it come in their own time. They are so complacent, so reckless, so excessive in lust and pleasure, so ready for revenge,[12729]
that as Paterculus said of some Caitiffes in his time in Rome, Quod nequiter ausi, fortiter executi: it shall not be so wickedly attempted, but as desperately performed, what ere they take in hand.	that, as Velleius Paterculus said of certain villains in Rome in his time, what they wickedly dared, they resolutely carried out. Whatever they undertake will be carried out with as much recklessness as the attempt was wicked.[12730]
Were it not for Gods restraining grace, fear and shame, temporall punishment, and their own infamy, they would Lycaon-like exenterate, as so many Cannibals eat up, or Cadmus souldiers, consume one another.	Were it not for God's restraining grace, fear and shame, earthly punishment and their own disgrace, they would disembowel one another like Lycaon, devour one another like cannibals, or destroy one another like Cadmus's soldiers.[12731]
These are most impious, and commonly professed Atheists, that never use the name of God but to swear by it: that expresse naught else but Epicurisme in their carriage, or hypocrisie; with Pentheus they neglect and contemn these rites and religious ceremonies of the Gods, they will be Gods themselves, or at least socii deorum;	These are utterly impious and commonly avowed atheists, who use God's name only to swear by it. Their behaviour expresses nothing but sensual indulgence or hypocrisy. Like Pentheus, they neglect and scorn the gods' rites and religious ceremonies; they would be gods themselves, or at least companions of the gods:[12732]

[12729] Editor. Burton applies Nero's reported desire to see the world burn to the day of judgment. Compare Suetonius, Nero 38.1. Desperate here means recklessly heedless, unlike the despairing people introduced at the beginning of the subsection.

[12730] Editor. Caitiffes means wretches or villains. Burton's English restatement follows the translated Latin, as in the source. The exact Paterculus passage remains to be established.

[12731] Editor. Exenterate means disembowel. Lycaon's myth involves the killing and serving of human flesh; the armed men who spring from the dragon's teeth sown by Cadmus fight one another. Burton imagines social violence unchecked by religion and punishment.

[12732] Editor. Pentheus resists the worship of Dionysus in Greek myth. Carriage means conduct. As elsewhere, Burton uses Epicurisme loosely for sensual self-indulgence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Divisum imperium cum Jove Cæsar habet.	Caesar shares dominion with Jove.[12733]
Source page 684–685 Aproyis an Ægyptian tyrant, grew, saith [12734]Herodotus, to that height of pride, insolency and impietie, to that contempt of God and men, that he held his kingdom so sure, ut à nemine deorum aut hominum sibi eripi posset, neither God nor men could take it from him.	Apries, an Egyptian tyrant, rose, says Herodotus, to such a height of pride, arrogance and impiety, such contempt for God and humanity, that he thought his kingdom so secure that no god or human being could wrest it from him—neither God nor men could take it from him.[12735]
Source page 685 [12736]A certain blasphemous King of Spaine (as [12737]Lansius reports) made an edict, that no subject of his for ten years space, should beleeve in, call on, or worship any god.	A certain blasphemous king of Spain, as Lansius reports, issued an edict forbidding any of his subjects for ten years to believe in, invoke or worship any god.[12738]

[12733] Editor. A line traditionally associated with the anecdote of Virgil's verses praising Augustus. Its exact textual source and Burton's route to it remain for collation.

[12734] Burton. Source page 684, last star: "Lib.1." "Book 1."

[12735] Editor. The source spells the name Aproyis. The boast belongs to Herodotus, Histories 2.169, rather than book 1 as the margin says. Burton's translation after the Latin has been retained as a separate restatement.

[12736] Burton. Source page 685, first dagger: "M. Montan. lib.1.cap.4." "Michel de Montaigne, book 1, chapter 4."

[12737] Burton. Source page 685, first star: "Orat. cont. Hispan. ne proximo decennio deum adorarent, &c." "Oration against Spain: that they should not worship God for the next ten years, and so on."

[12738] Editor. The two marginal references point to Montaigne and Thomas Lansius's Oration against Spain. Montaigne, Essays 1.4, explicitly calls this a story current in his youth and treats it as a portrayal of national vainglory. It is not verified here as an actual royal decree.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as [12739]Jovius relates of Mahomet the second, that sacked Constantinople, he so behaved himself, that he beleeved neither Christ nor Mahomet, and thence it came to passe, that he kept his word and promise no farther than for his advantage; neither did he care to commit any offence to satisfie his lust.	And as Paolo Giovio relates of Mehmed II, who sacked Constantinople, he behaved as one who believed neither in Christ nor in Muhammad. Hence he kept his word and promises only so far as they served his own advantage, and did not scruple to commit any offence to gratify his desires.[12740]
I could say the like of many Princes, many private men (our stories are full of them) in times past, this present age, that love, fear, obey, and perform all civil duties, as they shall finde them expedient or behoveful to their own ends.	I could say the same of many princes and private individuals, in former times and in the present age—our histories are full of them—who love, fear, obey and perform every civic duty only as they find it useful or advantageous to their own ends.[12741]

[12739] Burton. Source page 685, second star: "Talem se exhibuit, ut nec in Christum, nec Mahometem crederet; unde effectum ut promissa nisi quatenus in suum commodum cederent minime servaret, nec ullo scelere peccatum statueret, ut suis desideriis satisfaceret." "He showed himself to be such a man that he believed neither in Christ nor in Muhammad; consequently he did not keep promises unless they served his own advantage, and considered no wicked deed a sin if it satisfied his desires."

[12740] Editor. The alleged unbelief and unscrupulous conduct are Giovio's account as reported by Burton. They are not independently established by the quotation; Burton gives no work or chapter here.

[12741] Editor. Stories means histories; behoveful means beneficial or useful. Burton's category includes instrumental obedience, not merely openly professed disbelief.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Securi adversus Deos, securi adversus homines, votis non est opus, which [12742]Tacitus reports of some Germans, they need not pray, fear, hope, for they are secure to their thinking, both from God and men.	Untroubled by gods, untroubled by human beings, they have no need of prayers, as Tacitus reports of some Germans. They need not pray, fear or hope, for in their own estimation they are safe from both God and other people.[12743]
Bulco Opiliensis, sometimes Duke of Silesia, was such a one to an hair, he lived (saith [12744]Æneas Sylvius[12745]) at [12746]Wratislavia, and was so mad to satisfie his lust, that he beleeved neither heaven nor hell, or that the soul was immortall, but married wives, and turned them up as he thought fit, did murder and mischief, and what he list himself.	Bolko of Opole, formerly a duke in Silesia, was exactly such a man. He lived, says Aeneas Sylvius, at Wrocław and was so mad to satisfy his lust that he believed in neither heaven nor hell nor the immortality of the soul. He married wives and discarded them as he pleased, committed murder and other crimes, and did whatever he wished.[12747]
This duke hath too many followers in our dayes: say what you can, dehort, exhort, perswade to the contrary, they are no more moved,	This duke has all too many followers in our own day. Say what you can, warn, exhort and argue against them: they remain as unmoved—[12748]
—— quam si dura silex aut stet Marpesia cautes,	—— as though they were hard flint or a Marpesian crag,[12749]

[12742] Burton. Source page 685, second dagger: “Lib. de mor. Germ.” “Book on the customs of the Germans.”

[12743] Editor. Tacitus, Germania 46, describes the Fenni and the absence of possessions and anxieties in their lives. Burton reverses the order of gods and humans and abbreviates the conclusion. Tacitus’s point about freedom from wants is repurposed as a charge of irreligion.

[12744] Burton. Source page 685, k: “Usque adeo insanus, ut nec inferos, nec superos esse dicat, animasque cum corporibus interire credat &c.” “So mad that he says there are neither gods below nor gods above, and believes that souls perish with bodies, and so on.”

[12745] Burton. Source page 685, third dagger: “Europæ descr. cap.24.” “Description of Europe, chapter 24.”

[12746] Burton. Source page 685, i: “Or Breslaw.”

[12747] Editor. Sometimes means formerly; to an hair means exactly; turned them up means dismissed or discarded them. Wratislavia and Breslau are names for Wrocław. The account is attributed to Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini’s Description of Europe, chapter 24; its details remain uncollated.

[12748] Editor. Dehort means dissuade, the opposite of exhort. The following line supplies Burton’s comparison.

[12749] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 6.471: Dido remains unmoved by Aeneas in the underworld. Marpesus was associated with Parian marble. Burton borrows the image of unyielding stone.

Original text 1651	Modern English
then so many stockes, and stones, tell them of Heaven and hell, 'tis to no purpose, laterem lavas, they answer as Ataliba that Indian Prince did Frier Vincent, [12750]when he brought him a book, and told him all the mysteries of salvation, heaven and hell were contained in it: he looked upon it, and said he saw no such matter, asking withall how he knew it: they will but scoffe at it, or wholly reject it.	—as so many logs and stones. Tell them of heaven and hell: it is useless; you are washing a brick. They answer as Atahualpa, that American prince, answered Friar Vincent: when he brought him a book and said it contained all the mysteries of salvation, heaven and hell, the prince looked at it and said he saw nothing of the kind, asking how the friar knew it. They will merely scoff at it or reject it altogether.[12751]
Petronius in Tacitus when he was now by Nero's command bleeding to death, audiebat amicos nihil referentes de immortalitate animæ, aut sapientum placitis, sed levia carmina & faciles versus, in stead of good counsel and divine meditations, he made his friends sing him bawdy verses and scurrile songs.	Petronius, in Tacitus's account, when he was bleeding to death at Nero's command, listened to his friends speaking neither of the soul's immortality nor of the philosophers' doctrines, but reciting light poems and easy verses. Instead of sound counsel and divine meditations, he had his friends sing him bawdy verses and coarse songs.[12752]

[12750] Burton. Source page 685, m: "Fratres à Bry Amer. par.6. librum à Vincentio monacho datum abjecit, nihil se videre ibi hujusmodi dicens, rogansque unde hæc sciret, quum de cœlo & Tartaro contineri ibi diceret." "The de Bry brothers, America, part 6. He threw away the book given him by the friar Vincent, saying he saw nothing of the kind in it and asking how he knew these things, when the friar said that it contained information about heaven and hell."

[12751] Editor. Washing a brick is a proverb for wasted effort. Ataliba is Atahualpa, the Inca ruler; Vincent is Vicente de Valverde. Burton relies on a European account cited to the de Bry collection. The margin adds the throwing away of the book, absent from his body text. Neither version is a transparent record of Atahualpa's beliefs.

[12752] Editor. Tacitus, Annals 16.19, describes light poems and easy verses. Burton intensifies this into bawdy and scurrilous songs in his English restatement; both the translated Latin and the stronger gloss are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Let them take heaven, paradise, and that future happinesse that will, bonum est esse hic, it is good being here: there is no talking to such, no hope of their conversion; they are in a reprobate sense, meer Carnalists, fleshly minded men, which howsoever they may be applauded in this life by some few parasites, and held for worldly wise men, [12753]They seem to me (saith Melancthon) to be as mad as Hercules was when he raved and killed his wife and children.	Let whoever wants them have heaven, paradise and that future happiness: it is good to be here—it is good being here. There is no talking to such people, no hope of their conversion. Their understanding is corrupt; they are mere carnalists, bodily-minded people. However a few flatterers may applaud them in this life and consider them worldly-wise, they seem to me, says Melanchthon, as mad as Hercules when he raved and killed his wife and children.[12754]
A milder sort of these Atheisticall spirits there are that profess religion, but timide & hæsitanter, tempted hereunto out of that horrible consideration of diversity of Religions, which are and have been in the world, (which argument Campanella, Atheismi Triumphati cap.9. both urgeth and answers) besides the covetousness, imposture and knavery of Priests, quæ faciunt (as [12755]Postellus observes) ut rebus sacris minus faciant fidem;	There is a milder kind of these atheistical spirits who profess religion, but timidly and hesitantly. They are tempted into this by the disturbing thought of the diversity of religions that exist and have existed in the world—an argument Campanella both presents and answers in chapter 9 of Atheism Conquered—and also by the greed, imposture and dishonesty of priests, which, as Postel observes, make them put less faith in sacred things.[12756]

[12753] Burton. Source page 685, n: “Non minus hi furunt quam Hercules, qui conjugem, & liberos interfecit; habet hæc ætas plura hujusmodi portentosa monstra.” “These men are no less mad than Hercules, who killed his wife and children; this age has many such monstrous prodigies.”

[12754] Editor. It is good to be here echoes Peter at the Transfiguration, here turned into an attachment to earthly life. Parasites means flatterers or dependants who live at another’s expense. Burton ends this portrait by treating impiety as madness; Melanchthon’s exact wording and the mythic family details remain for collation.

[12755] Burton. Source page 685, final star: “De orbis con. lib.1.cap.7.” “On the Concord of the World, book 1, chapter 7.”

[12756] Editor. Atheistical is Burton’s broad polemical category, here encompassing hesitant believers. Postellus is Guillaume Postel. Campanella’s title means Atheism Conquered; Burton presents him as an opponent of the argument he reports.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 685–686 and those religions some of them so phantasticall, exorbitant, so violently maintained with equall constancie and assurance; whence they infer, that if there be so many religious sects, and denyed by the rest, why may they not be all false? or why should this or that be preferred before the rest? The Scepticks urge this, and amongst others it is the conclusion of Sextus Empericus lib.8. advers. Mathematicos:	Some of those religions are so fanciful and extravagant, yet defended so fiercely with equal firmness and certainty, that they infer: if there are so many religious sects, each denied by the others, why may they not all be false? Why should one or another be preferred to the rest? The Sceptics press this argument; among others, Sextus Empiricus reaches this conclusion in book 8 of Against the Mathematicians.[12757]
Source page 686 after many Philosophical arguments and reasons pro and con that there are Gods, and again that there are no Gods, he so concludes, cum tot inter se pugnent, &c. Una tantum potest esse vera, as Tully likewise disputes: Christians say, they alone worship the true God, pity all other sects, lament their case;	After many philosophical arguments and reasons for and against the existence of gods, he concludes: since so many contend with one another, and so on, only one can be true, as Cicero likewise argues. Christians say that they alone worship the true God; they pity all other sects and lament their condition.[12758]

[12757] Editor. The Latin title Adversus mathematicos is conventionally also rendered Against the Professors. Burton's book number and précis are retained; the exact passage requires collation. The argument from religious disagreement is reported here before Burton rejects it.

[12758] Editor. Tully is Marcus Tullius Cicero. Compare On the Nature of the Gods 1.5: conflicting opinions may all be false, but more than one cannot be true. Thus only one can be true means at most one, not that one must be true. Burton's compressed wording concerns an opinion or religious claim, not a god; it does not establish the adjoining Sextus locator.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and yet those old Greeks and Romans that worshiped the Divel, as the China's do now, aut Deos Topicos their own Gods; as Julian the Apostate, [12759]Cecilius in Minutius, Celsus and Porphyrius the Philosopher object: and as Machiavel contends, were much more noble, generous, victorious, had a more flourishing common-wealth, better Cities, better Souldiers, better Scholars, better wits. Their Gods often overcame our Gods, did as many miracles, &c.	Yet those ancient Greeks and Romans who worshipped the Devil, as the Chinese do now, or local gods—their own gods—were much nobler, more high-spirited and victorious, with a more flourishing commonwealth, better cities, soldiers, scholars and minds: so Julian the Apostate, Caecilius in Minucius, Celsus and the philosopher Porphyry object, and Machiavelli maintains. Their gods often overcame our gods and performed as many miracles, and so on.[12760]
Saint Cyril, Arnobius, Minutius, with many other ancients, of late Lessius, Morneus, Grotius de verit. Relig. Christianæ, Savanarola de verit. fidei Christianæ, well defend; but Zanchius, [12761]Campanella, Marinus Marcennus, Bozius, and Gentilettus answer all these Atheistical arguments at large. But this again troubles many as of old, wicked men generally thrive, professed Atheists thrive,	Saint Cyril, Arnobius, Minucius and many other ancient writers defend Christianity well, as more recently do Lessius, Duplessis-Mornay, Grotius in On the Truth of the Christian Religion, and Savonarola in On the Truth of the Christian Faith. Zanchi, Campanella, Marin Mersenne, Bozio and Gentillet answer all these atheistical arguments at length. But another difficulty troubles many people, as it did in ancient times: wicked people generally prosper; professed atheists prosper.[12762]

[12759] Burton. Source page 686, first dagger: "Nonne Romani sine Deo vestro regnant & fruuntur orbe toto, & vos & Deos vestros captivos tenent &c. Minutius Octaviano." "Do not the Romans reign without your God and enjoy the whole world, and hold you and your gods captive, and so on? Minucius, in Octavius."

[12760] Editor. The assertion about Chinese worship is Burton's Christian polemic. Caecilius is the pagan speaker in Minucius Felix's Octavius, especially chapters 11–12 here. The margin adapts his challenge about Roman power; it is not the Christian author's own conclusion.

[12761] Burton. Source page 686, second dagger: "Comment. in Genesin copiosus in hoc subjecto." "The commentary on Genesis is copious on this subject."

[12762] Editor. These are Christian apologists cited as a group, not interchangeable authorities. The Genesis commentary named in the margin is Mersenne's; its precise attachment among the adjacent names is loose in the printing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12763]Nullos esse Deos, inane cœlum, Affirmat Selius: probatque, quod se Factum, dum negat hæc, videt beatum;	There are no gods, and heaven is empty, Selius declares; his proof is that he sees himself Made prosperous while denying these things.[12764]
There are no Gods, heavens are toyes, Selius in publique justifies; Because that whil'st he thus denyes Their Deities, he better thrives.	There are no gods; the heavens are a fiction, Selius publicly maintains; For while he thus denies their divinity, He prospers all the more.
This is a prime argument: and most part your most sincere, upright, honest, and [12765]good men are depressed, The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, (Eccles.9.11.) nor yet bread to the wise, favour nor riches to men of understanding, but time and chance comes to all.	This is a principal argument: for the most part, the sincerest, most upright, honest and good people are brought low. The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong (Ecclesiastes 9:11), nor bread to the wise, nor favour or riches to people of understanding; time and chance come to all.[12766]

[12763] Burton. Source page 686, first star: "Ecce pars vestrum & major & melior alget, fame laborat, & deus patitur, dissimulat, non vult, non potest opitulari suis, & vel invalidus vel iniquus est. Cecilius in Minut. Dum rapiunt mala fata bonos, ignoscite fasso, Sollicitor nullos esse putare deos. Ovid. Vidi ego diis fretos, multos decipi. Plautus Casina act.2.scen.5." "Look: the greater and better part of you shivers and suffers hunger, and God permits it, looks away, is unwilling or unable to help his own, and is either powerless or unjust. Caecilius in Minucius. When cruel fates carry off the good—forgive my confession—I am tempted to think there are no gods. Ovid. I have seen many who trusted the gods deceived. Plautus, Casina, act 2, scene 5."

[12764] Editor. Martial 4.21. The Latin text consulted reads Segius, where Burton prints Selius. The adjacent marginal references to Martial and the suffering of the good have crossed or loose markers; both entries are retained at their printed body anchors.

[12765] Burton. Source page 686, third dagger: "Martial. l.4.Epig.21." "Martial, book 4, epigram 21."

[12766] Editor. The attached Martial locator belongs to the preceding poem. The longer margin at that poem combines Caecilius's challenge in Octavius 12, Ovid's Amores 3.9.35–36 on the death of the good, and Plautus's Casina. Burton's biblical quotation is condensed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
There was a great plague in Athens (as Thucydides lib.2. relates) in which at last every man with great licentiousness, did what he list, not caring at all for Gods or mens laws. Neither the fear of God nor lawes of men (saith he) awed any man, because the plague swept all away alike, good and bad; they thence concluded it was alike to worship or not worship the Gods, since they perished all alike.	There was a great plague at Athens, as Thucydides relates in book 2, during which everyone eventually acted with great licence, doing as he pleased without regard for divine or human laws. Neither fear of God nor human laws, he says, restrained anyone, because the plague carried off good and bad alike. They therefore concluded that worshipping or not worshipping the gods made no difference, since all perished alike.[12767]
Some cavil and make doubts of Scripture it self, it cannot stand with Gods mercy, that so many should be damned, so many bad, so few good, such have and hold about religions, all stiffe on their side, factious alike, thrive alike, and yet bitterly persecuting and damning each other;	Some raise objections and doubts about Scripture itself: it cannot accord with God's mercy that so many should be damned, so many be bad and so few good; that there should be such contention over religions, all obstinate in their own cause, equally factional, equally prosperous, yet bitterly persecuting and condemning one another to damnation.[12768]

[12767] Editor. Thucydides, History 2.53, describes the plague's erosion of religious and legal restraints. Burton gives a close paraphrase, using the singular God before returning to the Greek gods.

[12768] Editor. Have and hold here conveys contention and tenacity over rival religious claims. Burton is assembling objections in the speakers' voices; their conclusions should not be mistaken for his own.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It cannot stand with Gods goodness, protection and providence (as [12769]Saint Chrysostome in the Dialect of such discontented persons) to see and suffer one man to be lame, another mad, a third poor and miserable all the dayes of his life, a fourth grievously tormented with sickness and aches, to his last hour. Are these signes and works of Gods providence, to let one man be deaf, another dumb?	It cannot accord with God's goodness, protection and providence, as Saint Chrysostom puts it in the language of such discontented people, to see and permit one person to be lame, another mad, a third poor and miserable throughout life, a fourth grievously tormented by sickness and pain until his last hour. Are these signs and works of God's providence—to let one person be deaf and another mute?[12770]
Source page 686–687 A poor honest fellow lives in disgrace, wo and want, wretched he is; when as a wicked caitiffe abounds in superfluitie of wealth, keeps whores, parasites, and what he will himself: Audis Jupiter hæc? Talia multa connectentes, longum reprehensionis sermonem erga dei providentiam contexunt. Thus they mutter and object, (see the rest of their arguments in Marcennus in Genesin, and in Campanella, amply confuted) with many such vain cavils, well known, not worthy the recapitulation or answering, whatsoever they pretend, they are interim of little or no religion.	An honest poor fellow lives in disgrace, sorrow and want; his life is wretched, while a wicked scoundrel overflows with wealth, keeps prostitutes and flatterers, and has whatever he desires. Do you hear this, Jupiter? Linking many such complaints together, they weave a lengthy indictment of God's providence. Thus they mutter and object, with many similar, familiar, empty quibbles, unworthy of repetition or reply. See the rest of their arguments fully refuted in Mersenne's commentary on Genesis and in Campanella. Whatever they profess, meanwhile they have little or no religion.[12771]

[12769] Burton. Source page 686, last star: "Ser.30. in 5.cap. ad Ephes. hic fractus est pedibus, alter furit, alius ad extremam senectam progressus omnem vitam paupertate peragit, ille morbis gravissimis: sunt hæc providentiæ opera? hic surdus, ille mutus &c." "Sermon 30 on chapter 5 of Ephesians. This man is crippled in his feet, another is mad, another has reached extreme old age having spent his entire life in poverty, another suffers very grave diseases. Are these the works of providence? This one is deaf, that one mute, and so on."

[12770] Editor. Dialect means manner of speaking. Chrysostom's Homily 19 on Ephesians 5:15–21 presents these complaints, including the prosperous wrongdoer in the next row, before defending providence through the order of creation and the limits of human understanding. They are objections he answers, not his final teaching. The English comparison does not resolve Burton's printed Sermon 30 or its Latin transmission.

[12771] Editor. The sentence crosses the page boundary. Audis Jupiter hæc echoes Juvenal 13.114; Burton interweaves classical and Christian language. Parasites are flattering dependants. The dismissal of these questions as quibbles is Burton's judgment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 687 Cosin-germans to these men, are many of our great Philosophers, and Deists, who though they be more temperate in this life, give many good moral precepts, honest, upright, and sober in their conversation, yet in effect they are the same, (accompting no man a good Scholar that is not an Atheist) nimis altum sapiunt, too much learning makes them mad:	First cousins to these people are many of our great philosophers and deists. Although more temperate in this life, giving many sound moral precepts, and honest, upright and sober in their conduct, they are in effect the same. They count no one a good scholar unless he is an atheist. They aspire to knowledge too high for them: too much learning makes them mad.[12772]
Whiles they attribute all to natural causes, [12773]contingence of all things, as Melancthon cals them, Pertinax hominum genus, a peevish Generation of men, that mis-led by Philosophy, and the Divels suggestion, their own innate blindness, deny God as much as the rest, hold all Religion a fiction, opposite to reason and Philosophy, though for fear of Magistrates, saith [12774]Vaninus, they durst not publikely profess it.	They attribute everything to natural causes and the contingency of all things: as Melanchthon calls them, an obstinate breed of people—a perverse generation, misled by philosophy, the Devil's prompting and their own innate blindness, who deny God as much as the rest. They hold all religion a fiction, contrary to reason and philosophy, although, Vanini says, fear of the magistrates prevents their professing this openly.[12775]

[12772] Editor. Conversation means conduct or way of life. Deists is used within Burton's accusation, not as a precise label for the later movement. The final phrase echoes the charge made against Paul in Acts 26:24.

[12773] Burton. Source page 687, o: "Omnia contingenter fieri volunt. Melancthon in præceptum primum." "They maintain that everything happens contingently. Melanchthon, on the first commandment."

[12774] Burton. Source page 687, first dagger: "Dial.1. lib.4. de admir.nat. Arcanis." "Dialogue 1, book 4, On the Marvellous Secrets of Nature."

[12775] Editor. Contingence denotes events that need not occur as they do, here opposed to providential government. Peevish means perverse or obstinate. The marginal Vanini locator is reproduced as printed; its dialogue and book numbering require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ask one of them of what Religion he is, he scoffingly replies, a Philosoper, a Galenist, an [12776]Averroist, and with Rablais a Physitian, a Peripatetick, an Epicure. In spiritual things God must demonstrate all to sense, leave a pawn with them, or else seek some other creditor.	Ask one of them what religion he belongs to, and he answers mockingly: a philosopher, a Galenist, an Averroist, or, with Rabelais, a physician, a Peripatetic, an Epicurean. In spiritual matters God must demonstrate everything to the senses, leave a pledge with them, or seek another creditor.[12777]
They will acknowledge nature and fortune, yet not God: though in effect they grant both: for as Scaliger defines, Nature signifies Gods ordinary power; or as Calvin writes, Nature is Gods order, and so things extraordinary may be called unnatural: Fortune his unrevealed will, and so we call things changeable that are beside reason and expectation.	They will acknowledge nature and fortune, but not God, although in effect they acknowledge both. For, as Scaliger defines it, nature signifies God's ordinary power; or, as Calvin writes, nature is God's order, so that extraordinary things may be called unnatural. Fortune is his unrevealed will: thus we call things subject to chance when they fall outside reason and expectation.[12778]

[12776] Burton. Source page 687, second dagger: "Anima mea sit cum animis Philosophorum." "May my soul be with the souls of the philosophers."

[12777] Editor. Galenist, Averroist and Peripatetic refer to followers of Galen, Averroes and Aristotle. Burton treats intellectual allegiances as evasions of religious confession. Pawn means security for a debt: belief is figured as credit granted to God.

[12778] Editor. Burton argues that nature and fortune are names for divine action. The precise Scaliger and Calvin passages are not specified in the source and remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To this purpose [12779]Minutius in Octavio, and [12780]Seneca well discourseth with them, lib.4. de beneficiis cap.5.6.7. They do not understand what they say; what is Nature but God? call him what thou wilt, Nature, Jupiter, he hath as many names as Offices: it comes all to one pass, God is the fountain of all, the first Giver and Preserver, from whom all things depend, [12781]à quo, & per quem omnia,	Minucius in Octavius and Seneca in On Benefits, book 4, chapters 5–7, argue well with them to this effect: They do not understand what they say. What is nature but God? Call him what you will—Nature, Jupiter—he has as many names as functions. It all amounts to the same thing: God is the source of all, the first giver and preserver, on whom all things depend; from whom and through whom are all things.[12782]
Nam quodcunque vides Deus est, quocunque moveris.	For whatever you see is God, wherever you move.[12783]
God is all in all, God is everywhere, in every place. And yet this Seneca that could confute and blame them, is all out as much to be blamed and confuted himself, as mad himself; for he holds fatum Stoicum, that inevitable necessity in the other extreme,	God is all in all; God is everywhere, in every place. Yet this Seneca, who could refute and blame them, deserves just as much blame and refutation himself, and is just as mad: for he holds to Stoic fate, that inescapable necessity at the opposite extreme.[12784]

[12779] Burton. Source page 687, third dagger: “Deum unum multis designant nominibus, &c.” “They designate one God by many names, and so on.”

[12780] Burton. Source page 687, p: “Non intelligis te quum hæc dicis, negare te ipsum nomen dei: quid enim est aliud natura quam Deus? &c. tot habet appellationes quot munera.” “You do not understand that, when you say these things, you yourself deny the name of God: for what else is nature but God? And so on. He has as many names as functions.”

[12781] Burton. Source page 687, q: “Austin.” “Augustine.”

[12782] Editor. Seneca, On Benefits 4.5–7, identifies nature, divine reason and God. Burton combines this with Christian language attributed in the margin to Augustine. The Latin in the Seneca margin is compressed and does not exactly reproduce the consulted text.

[12783] Editor. An adaptation of Lucan, Civil War 9.580, spoken by Cato. Lucan has Jupiter and repeats quodcumque; Burton substitutes Deus and prints quocunque in the second clause.

[12784] Editor. All out means altogether or fully. Burton objects both to events governed by chance and to a necessity he believes would constrain God. Madness here is his theological and rhetorical verdict.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as those Chaldean Astrologers of old did, against whom the Prophet Jeremy so often Thunders, and those heathen Mathematicians, Nigidius Figulus, Magicians, and Priscilianists, whom S. Austin so eagerly confutes, those Arabian questionaries, Novem Judices, Albumazar, Dorotheus, &c. and our Country-man Estuidus [12785],	as did the ancient Chaldean astrologers, against whom the prophet Jeremiah so often thunders; those pagan astrologers such as Nigidius Figulus, magicians and Priscillianists, whom Saint Augustine so vigorously refutes; those Arabian writers on astrological questions, the Nine Judges, Albumasar, Dorotheus and others; and our countryman Estuidus.[12786]
that take upon them to define out of those great conjunctions of Stars, with Ptolomeus, the periods of Kingdoms, of Religions, of all future Accidents, Wars, Plagues, Schismes, Heresies, and what not? all from Stars, and such things, saith Maginus, Quæ sibi & intelligentiis suis reservavit Deus, which God hath reserved to himself and his Angels, they will take upon them to foretell, as if Stars were immediate, inevitable causes of all future Accidents.	They presume, with Ptolemy, to determine from great conjunctions of stars the cycles of kingdoms and religions, and all future events—wars, plagues, schisms, heresies and everything else—all from the stars. They presume to foretell things that God, as Magini says, has reserved for himself and his intelligences—things God has reserved for himself and his angels—as though stars were the direct, inevitable causes of every future event.[12787]

[12785] Burton. Source page 687, r: "principio Ephemer." "At the beginning of the Ephemerides."

[12786] Editor. Mathematicians means astrologers. Augustine, City of God 5.3, rejects Nigidius's potter's-wheel argument that tiny differences in twins' birth times explain unlike destinies; this does not locate every adjoining attribution. Novem Judices is a collection of astrological authorities, loosely grouped as Arabian. Estuidus appears to be John Eschuid (Eschenden), pending bibliographical collation. Priscillianists are followers of Priscillian, here associated polemically with fatalism.

[12787] Editor. Intelligences are incorporeal beings associated with the heavens; Burton glosses them as angels. Accidents means occurrences, and periods includes the completion or ending of a cycle. The exact Magini passage remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 687–688 Cæsar Vaninus in his Book de admirandis naturæ Arcanis dial.52. de oraculis, is more free, copious and open in the explication of this Astrological Tenent of Ptolomy, than any of our modern Writers, Cardan excepted, a true disciple of his Master Pomponatius, according to the doctrine of Peripateticks, he refers all Apparitions, Prodigies, Miracles, Oracles, Accidents, Alterations of Religions, Kingdoms, &c. (for which he is soundly lashed by Marinus Marcennus, as well he deserves) to natural causes,	In dialogue 52, on oracles, of his book On the Marvellous Secrets of Nature, Giulio Cesare Vanini explains this astrological doctrine of Ptolemy more freely, fully and openly than any of our modern writers except Cardano. A true disciple of his master Pomponazzi, following Peripatetic doctrine, he attributes all apparitions, portents, miracles, oracles, events, changes of religions and kingdoms, and so on, to natural causes—for which Marin Mersenne soundly castigates him, as he well deserves.[12788]
Source page 688 (for spirits he will not acknowledge) to that light, motion, influences of Heavens and Stars, and to the Intelligences that move the Orbes. Intelligentia quæ movet orbem mediante Cœlo, &c. Intelligences do all: and after a long Discourse of Miracles done of old, si hæc dæmones possint, cur non & intelligentiæ cœlorum motrices?	He will not acknowledge spirits, but attributes these things to the light, motion and influences of the heavens and stars, and to the intelligences that move the celestial spheres. The intelligence that moves the sphere, through the agency of heaven, and so on. Intelligences do everything; and after a long discussion of ancient miracles he asks: If demons can do these things, why cannot the intelligences that move the heavens?[12789]

[12788] Editor. Burton links Vanini, Cardano and Pietro Pomponazzi through natural explanations of apparently supernatural events. His claim of discipleship is intellectual, not evidence that Vanini personally studied under Pomponazzi.

[12789] Editor. The fragmentary Latin remains fragmentary in translation. Spirits and celestial intelligences belong to different explanatory categories in this account; Burton's compressed report should not be flattened into a simple denial of all incorporeal beings.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as these great Conjunctions, Aspects of Planets begin or end, vary, are vertical and predominant, so have Religions, Rites, Ceremonies, and Kingdoms their beginning, progress, periods, in Urbibus, Regibus, Religionibus, ac in particularibus hominibus hæc vera ac manifesta sunt, ut Aristoteles innuere videtur, & quotidiana docet experientia, ut historias perlegens videbit;	As these great conjunctions and planetary aspects begin or end, vary, stand overhead and prevail, so religions, rites, ceremonies and kingdoms have their beginnings, development and endings. In cities, kings, religions and individual people these things are true and evident, as Aristotle seems to suggest and daily experience teaches, as anyone reading histories will see.[12790]
quid olim in Gentili lege Jove sanctius & illustrius? Quid nunc vile magis & execrandum? Ita cœlestia corpora pro mortalium beneficio religiones ædificant, & cum cessat influxus, cessat lex, &c.	What was once holier or more illustrious in pagan religion than Jupiter? What now is baser and more detestable? Thus the heavenly bodies establish religions for the benefit of mortals, and when the influence ceases, the religious law ceases, and so on.[12791]
And because according to their Tenents, the world is eternal, intelligences eternal, Influences of Stars eternal, Kingdoms, Religions, alterations shall be likewise eternal, and run round after many Ages; Atque iterum ad Troiam magnus mittetur Achilles; renascentur Religiones, & Ceremoniæ, res humanæ in idem recident, nihil nunc quod non olim fuit, & post sæculorum revolutiones alias est, erit, &c. idem specie, saith Vaninus, non individuo quod Plato significavit.	And because, according to their doctrines, the world, the intelligences and the influences of the stars are eternal, kingdoms, religions and their changes will likewise be eternal, returning in cycles after many ages. And mighty Achilles will be sent to Troy again. Religions and ceremonies will be reborn; human affairs will return to the same condition. Nothing exists now that did not exist before, and after other revolutions of the ages it exists, will exist, and so on—the same in kind, says Vanini, not in the individual, as Plato indicated.[12792]

[12790] Editor. Vertical means overhead or at the zenith. Aspects are the angular relationships between planets; conjunctions are their apparent coming together. Burton reports a theory of historical cycles governed by celestial influences.

[12791] Editor. Lex here means a religious dispensation or system. The passage continues the naturalistic account Burton attributes to Vanini; the judgment on Jupiter belongs within that quotation.

[12792] Editor. The Achilles line is Virgil, Eclogue 4.36; Burton embeds it in prose. The Latin sequence est, erit is awkward but retained. Same in kind, not in the individual qualifies the recurrence: like forms return, not necessarily the identical persons.

Original text 1651	Modern English
These (saith mine [12793]Author) these are the Decrees of Peripateticks, which though I recite, in obsequium Christianæ fidei detestor, as I am a Christian I detest and hate. Thus Peripateticks and Astrologians held in former times,	These, says my author, are the doctrines of the Peripatetics; although I recount them, out of obedience to the Christian faith I abhor them—as a Christian I detest and hate them. Such were the beliefs of Peripatetics and astrologers in former times.[12794] and to this effect of old in Rome, saith Dionysius Halicarnassus, lib.7. when those Meteors and Prodigies appeared in the Ayr, after the banishment of Coriolanus, [12795]Men were diversly Affected, some said they were Gods just judgements for the execution of that good man, some referred all to natural causes, some to Stars, some thought they came by chance, some by necessity decreed ab initio, and could not be altered. The two last Opinions of Necessity and Chance, were, it seems, of greater note than the rest.	So too in ancient Rome, says Dionysius of Halicarnassus, book 7, when atmospheric signs and portents appeared after the banishment of Coriolanus: People were variously affected. Some said these were God's just judgments for the execution of that good man; some attributed everything to natural causes, some to the stars. Some thought the signs came by chance, others by a necessity decreed from the beginning, which could not be altered. The last two opinions, those of necessity and chance, seem to have had more prominence than the rest.[12796]
[12797]Sunt qui in Fortunæ jam casibus omnia ponunt, Et mundum credunt nullo rectore moveri, Naturâ volvente vices, &c.	Some now put everything down to fortune's chances, And believe the world moves with no ruler, As nature rolls through its changes, and so on.[12798]

[12793] Burton. Source page 688, first star: "Vaninus dial.52. de oraculis." "Vanini, dialogue 52, on oracles."

[12794] Editor. Burton reproduces Vanini's stated rejection of the doctrines he reports. The Latin and Burton's English restatement are both retained; the passage does not by itself settle whether the disclaimer was sincere.

[12795] Burton. Source page 688, s: "Varie homines affecti; alii dei judicium ad tam pii exilium, alii ad naturam referebant, nec ab indignatione dei, sed humanis causis, &c." "People were variously affected: some ascribed it to God's judgment at the exile of so pious a man, others to nature, and not to God's anger but to human causes, and so on."

[12796] Editor. Compare Dionysius, Roman Antiquities 7.68.1–2, in Cary's translation: prodigies and sickness prompt rival explanations, divine anger at a citizen's banishment or chance. This passage supports exile, not Burton's execution, and does not supply his full list of natural, stellar and necessary causes. Both body readings and the margin's exile remain unchanged. Meteors can mean atmospheric phenomena generally; Burton's intermediary remains untraced.

[12797] Burton. Source page 688, second star: "Juv.Sat.13." "Juvenal, Satire 13."

[12798] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 13.86–88, adapted: Burton alters the order and wording and stops before the specification of day and year.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For the first of Chance, as [12799]Sallust likewise informeth us, those old Romans generally received; They supposed Fortune alone gave Kingdoms and Empires, Wealth, Honours, Offices, and that for two causes; first, because every wicked, base unworthy wretch was preferred, rich, potent, &c. Secondly, because of their uncertainty, though never so good, scarce any one enjoyed them long: but after they began upon better advice to think otherwise, that every man made his own fortune.	As for chance, Sallust likewise tells us that the ancient Romans generally accepted it. They supposed that fortune alone bestowed kingdoms, empires, wealth, honours and offices, for two reasons. First, every wicked, low, unworthy wretch was advanced, rich and powerful. Second, these advantages were uncertain: however good they were, scarcely anyone enjoyed them long. Later, on wiser reflection, they began to think differently: that each person made his own fortune.[12800]
Source page 688–689 The last of Necessity was Seneca's tenent, that God was alligatus causis secundis, so tyed to second causes, to that inexorable necessity, that he could alter nothing of that which was once decreed, sic erat in fatis, it cannot be altered, semel jussit, semper paret Deus; nulla vis rumpit, nullæ preces, nec ipsum fulmen, [12801]God hath once said it, and it must for ever stand good, no prayers, no threats, nor power, nor thunder it self can alter it.	The last opinion, that of necessity, was Seneca's doctrine: God was bound to secondary causes, so tied to them and to that inexorable necessity that he could change nothing once decreed. So it stood in the fates: it cannot be altered. God commanded once; he always obeys. No force breaks it, no prayers, not even the thunderbolt. God has spoken once, and it must stand forever: no prayers, threats, power or thunder itself can alter it.[12802]

[12799] Burton. Source page 688, dagger: "Epist. ad C. Cæsar. Romani olim putabant fortunam regna & imperia dare: Credebant antea mortales fortunam solam opes & honores largiri, idque duabus de causis; primum quod indignus quisque dives honoratus, potens; alterum, vix quisquam perpetuo bonis iis frui visus. Postea prudentiores didicere fortunam suam quemque fingere." "Letter to Gaius Caesar. The Romans once thought that fortune bestowed kingdoms and empires. Mortals formerly believed that fortune alone granted wealth and honours, for two reasons: first, that every unworthy person was rich, honoured and powerful; second, that scarcely anyone seemed to enjoy these advantages continually. Later, wiser people learned that each person shapes his own fortune."

[12800] Editor. The passage parallels the opening of the Speech to Caesar transmitted under Sallust's name, where the saying about shaping one's fortune is attributed to Appius. The consulted edition labels the work pseudo-Sallust; Burton's attribution and title are retained.

[12801] Burton. Source page 688, unmarked citation: "l.2. Natural. quæst 33.39." "Book 2 of Natural Questions, chapters 33 and 39."

[12802] Editor. Secondary causes are the created causes through which events occur. Seneca's On Providence 5.8 says that God wrote fate and follows it; Burton reverses the order of its closing clauses. Natural Questions 2 discusses fate and thunderbolts. Its otherwise unanchored marginal citation is placed here with the relevant discussion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 689 Zeno, Chrysippus, and those other Stoicks, as you may read in Tully 2. de divinatione, Gellius, lib.6.cap.2. &c. maintained as much. In all Ages, there have been such, that either deny God in all, or in part, some deride him, they could have made a better world, and rule it more orderly themselves, blaspheme him, derogate at their pleasure from him.	Zeno, Chrysippus and the other Stoics maintained as much, as you may read in Cicero's On Divination, book 2, and Gellius, book 6, chapter 2, among others. In every age there have been people who deny God wholly or in part. Some ridicule him, claiming they could have made a better world and governed it more orderly themselves; they blaspheme him and diminish him as they please.[12803]
'Twas so in [12804]Plato's time, Some say there be no gods, others that they care not for men, a middle sort grant both. Si non sit Deus, unde bona? si sit Deus, unde mala? So Cotta argues in Tully, why made he not all good, or at least tenders not the welfare of such as are good?	It was so in Plato's time: Some say there are no gods; others, that they do not care for human beings; a middle group grants both. If there is no God, where does good come from? If there is a God, where does evil come from? So Cotta argues in Cicero: why did God not make everyone good, or at least look after the welfare of those who are good?[12805]
As the woman told Alexander, if he be not at leasure to hear Causes, and redress them, why doth he reign? [12806]Sextus Empericus hath many such Arguments. Thus perverse men cavil. So it will ever be, some of all sorts, good, bad, indifferent, true, false, zealous, ambodexters, neutralists, lukewarm, Libertines, atheists, &c.	As the woman told Alexander: if he has no time to hear cases and remedy grievances, why does he reign? Sextus Empiricus has many such arguments. Thus perverse people quibble. It will always be so: some of every sort—good, bad, indifferent, true, false, zealous, double-dealers, neutrals, lukewarm believers, libertines, atheists and the rest.[12807]

[12803] Editor. The Gellius locator is retained as printed. Burton gathers different philosophical positions and insults into one category of denial; the passage is a polemical survey rather than a neutral history of Stoicism.

[12804] Burton. Source page 689, first star: "10. de legib. Alii negant esse deos, alii deos non curare res humanas, alii utraque concedunt." "Laws, book 10. Some deny that gods exist; others, that the gods care for human affairs; others concede both."

[12805] Editor. Plato, Laws 10.885b, distinguishes denial of gods, denial of their care, and belief that they can be bribed. Burton's grant both is an incomplete summary, not Plato's full third position. Cotta is a speaker in Cicero's On the Nature of the Gods; the compact Latin dilemma is not verified here as a verbatim Ciceronian quotation.

[12806] Burton. Source page 689, second star: "Lib.8.ad mathem." "Book 8, Against the Mathematicians."

[12807] Editor. Ambodexters are people who serve both sides for their own advantage. Libertine here carries religious and moral disapproval. The royal petitioner anecdote circulates in several forms; Burton's attribution to Alexander is retained pending collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They will see these religious Sectaries agree amongst themselves, be reconciled all, before they will participate with, or believe any: They think in the mean time, (which [12808]Celsus objects, and whom Origen confutes) we Christians adore a person put to [12809]death with no more reason then the barbarous Getes worshipped Zamolxis, the Cilicians Mopsus, the Thebans Amphiaraus, and the Lebadians Trophonius:	They insist on seeing these religious sectarians agree and become entirely reconciled before they will join or believe any of them. Meanwhile they think—as Celsus objects, and Origen refutes him—that we Christians worship a person put to death with no more reason than the barbarian Getae worshipped Zalmoxis, the Cilicians Mopsus, the Thebans Amphiaraus, and the people of Lebadea Trophonius.[12810]
one Religion is as true as another, new fangled devices, all for humane respects; great witted Aristotles works are as much authentical to them as Scriptures, subtle Seneca's Epistles as Canonical as Saint Pauls, Pindarus Odes as good as the Prophet Davids Psalms, Epictetus Enchiridion equivalent to wise Solomons Proverbs. They do openly and boldly speak this and more, some of them, in all places and companies.	One religion is as true as another: new inventions, all serving human interests. To them, the works of the brilliant Aristotle carry as much authority as Scripture; subtle Seneca's letters are as canonical as Saint Paul's; Pindar's odes are as good as the prophet David's psalms; Epictetus's Handbook equals wise Solomon's proverbs. Some of them say this and more openly and boldly, in every place and company.[12811]

[12808] Burton. Source page 689, dagger: "Origines contra Celsum l.3. vos immerito nobiscum conferri fuse declarat." "Origen, Against Celsus, book 3, explains at length that your comparison with us is unwarranted."

[12809] Burton. Source page 689, third star: "Crucifixum deum ignominiose Lucianus vita peregrini Christum vocat." "Lucian, in The Life of Peregrinus, disparagingly calls Christ the crucified god."

[12810] Editor. Origen, Against Celsus 3.34–35, reports and answers this comparison with local heroes or divinities. The margin adds Lucian's Peregrinus. These are hostile comparisons quoted within a Christian rebuttal, not independent verification of their premises.

[12811] Editor. Authentical means authoritative; canonical invokes the status of sacred scripture. Humane respects means human considerations or interests. Burton objects to assigning pagan moral and literary texts an authority equal to biblical writings.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12812]Claudius the Emperour was angry with Heaven, because it thundred, and challenged Jupiter into the field: with what madness, saith Seneca? he thought Jupiter could not hurt him, but he could hurt Jupiter.	The emperor Claudius was angry with heaven because it thundered and challenged Jupiter to battle. What madness! says Seneca. He thought Jupiter could not hurt him, but he could hurt Jupiter.[12813]
Diagoras, Demonax, Epicurus, Pliny, Lucian, Lucretius,	Diagoras, Demonax, Epicurus, Pliny, Lucian and Lucretius,[12814]
—— Contemptorque Deum Mezentius,	—— and Mezentius, despiser of the gods,[12815] professed Atheists all in their times: though not simple Atheists neither, as Cicogna proves. lib.1.cap.1. they scoffed onely at those Pagan gods, their plurality, base and fictitious Offices. Gilbertus Cognatus labours much, and so doth Erasmus, to vindicate Lucian from scandal, and there be those that apologize for Epicurus; but all in vain, Lucian scoffs at all, Epicurus he denys all, and Lucretius his Scholar defends him in it;	all professed atheists in their times—though not outright atheists either, as Cicogna demonstrates in book 1, chapter 1: they mocked only the pagan gods, their multitude, and their base, invented functions. Gilbert Cousin and Erasmus work hard to clear Lucian's reputation, and some defend Epicurus. But all in vain: Lucian mocks everything, Epicurus denies everything, and his follower Lucretius defends him in it.[12816]

[12812] Burton. Source page 689, n: "De ira 16.34. iratus cœlo quod obstreperet, ad pugnam vocans Jovem, quanta dementia? putavit sibi nocere non posse, & se nocere tamen Jovi posse." "On Anger 16.34. Angry with heaven because it made a din, calling Jupiter to battle—what madness! He thought Jupiter could not hurt him, but that he could hurt Jupiter."

[12813] Editor. Seneca, On Anger 1.20.8–9, names Gaius Caesar, Caligula, not Claudius. Burton's Claudius and irregular marginal locator 16.34 are retained. The correction belongs in this note, rather than being silently substituted into his account.

[12814] Editor. The list mixes philosophers, satirists and a natural historian. Burton's next assertion groups them as atheists, then briefly admits that rejection of pagan gods need not mean denial of all divinity.

[12815] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 7.648. Mezentius is a character in epic, inserted among the historical names.

[12816] Editor. Simple means unqualified or outright; apologize means offer a defence. Burton's claim that Epicurus denies all divinity overstates Epicurean doctrine: Lucretius 1.44–49 describes immortal gods free from human affairs. Scholar here means follower, not a personal pupil.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12817]Humana ante oculos fœde cum vita jaceret, In terris oppressa gravi cum relligione, Quæ caput à cœli regionibus ostendebat, Horribili super aspectu mortalibus instans, &c.	When human life lay foully before our eyes, On earth oppressed under heavy religion, Which showed its head from the regions of heaven, Looming over mortals with a terrifying face, and so on.[12818]
When humane kinde was drencht in superstition, With gastly looks aloft, which frighted mortal men, &c.	When humankind was steeped in superstition, With ghastly looks above that frightened mortal men, and so on.
Source page 690 He alone as another Hercules, did vindicate the world from that Monster. Unkle [12819]Pliny, lib.2.cap.7. nat.hist. & lib.7.cap.55. in express words denies the Immortality of the Soul. [12820]Seneca doth little less, lib.7.epist.55. ad Lucilium, & lib.de consol. ad Martiam, or rather more.	He alone, like another Hercules, freed the world from that monster. Pliny the Elder, in his Natural History, book 2, chapter 7, and book 7, chapter 55, expressly denies the immortality of the soul. Seneca does little less—or rather more—in book 7, letter 55 to Lucilius and his Consolation to Marcia.[12821]

[12817] Burton. Source page 689, x: “Lib.1.1.” “Book 1, 1.”

[12818] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 1.62–65. Burton prints cum relligione where the consulted Latin has sub religione. Religio is oppressive religious fear in context; Burton’s separate English version calls it superstition.

[12819] Burton. Source page 690, first dagger: “Idem status post mortem, ac fuit antequam nasceremur. & Seneca. Idem erit post me quod ante me fuit.” “Our condition after death is the same as it was before we were born. And Seneca: after me it will be as it was before me.”

[12820] Burton. Source page 690, first star: “Lucernæ eadem conditio quum extinguitur, ac fuit antequam accenderetur; ita & hominis.” “A lamp, when extinguished, is in the same condition as before it was lit; so too is a human being.”

[12821] Editor. He refers to Epicurus as celebrated by Lucretius. Unkle Pliny distinguishes the Elder from his nephew. The marginal comparison of death with the time before birth, and of a person with an extinguished lamp, occurs in Seneca’s Letter 54; Burton’s 55 is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some Greek Commentators would put as much upon Job, that he should deny resurrection, &c. whom Pineda copiously confutes in cap.7.Job.vers.9. Aristotle is hardly censured of some, both Divines and Philosophers. S. Justine in Parænetica ad gentes, Greg. Nazianzen. in disput. adversus Eun. Theodoret. lib.5. de curat. græc. affec. Origen. lib. de principiis.	Some Greek commentators would impute as much to Job, making him deny resurrection and the rest; Pineda refutes them at length on Job 7:9. Aristotle is harshly judged by some theologians and philosophers: Saint Justin in the Exhortation to the Greeks; Gregory Nazianzen in the Disputation against Eunomius; Theodoret in book 5 of the Cure of Greek Maladies; Origen in On First Principles.[12822]
Pomponatius justifies in his Tract (so stiled at least) De immortalitate Animæ, Scaliger, (who would forswear himself at any time, saith Patritius, in defence of his great master Aristotle) and Dandinus, lib.3. de anima, acknowledges as much.	Pomponazzi upholds it in his treatise entitled—at least so it is styled—On the Immortality of the Soul; Scaliger, who, Patrizi says, would perjure himself at any time in defence of his great master Aristotle, and Dandini, in book 3 On the Soul, acknowledge as much.[12823]
Averroes oppugnes all spirits and supream powers; of late Brunus, (infœlix Brunus, [12824]Kepler cals him) Machiavel, Cæsar Vanninus lately burned at Tolose in France, and Pet. Aretine, have publikely maintained such Atheistical paradoxes,	Averroes attacks all spirits and supreme powers. More recently Bruno—unfortunate Bruno, as Kepler calls him—Machiavelli, Giulio Cesare Vanini, lately burned at Toulouse in France, and Pietro Aretino have publicly maintained such atheistical paradoxes.[12825]

[12822] Editor. Hardly means harshly. Burton's abbreviated titles and attributions are translated as printed; their precise identification and the extent of each author's criticism remain unverified. The report about Job concerns an interpretation Burton rejects.

[12823] Editor. The compressed syntax refers back to denial of the soul's immortality; Burton's irony turns on the treatise's title. This is his polemical account of the authors' positions, not a substitute for their arguments. Patrizi's accusation against Scaliger remains an attributed accusation.

[12824] Burton. Source page 690, y: "Dissert. cum nunc. syder." "Conversation with the Starry Messenger."

[12825] Editor. Brunus is Giordano Bruno; the margin cites Kepler's Conversation with the Starry Messenger. Burton gathers very different authors under one charge. Infœlix can mean unhappy, unfortunate or ill-fated; the exact force in Kepler remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12826]with that Italian Bocase, with his Fable of three Rings, &c. ex quo infert haud posse internosci, quæ sit verior Religio, Judaica, Mahometana, an Christiana, quoniam eadem signa, &c.	So too the Italian Boccaccio, with his fable of the three rings, from which he infers that one cannot distinguish which religion is truer—Judaism, Islam or Christianity—because they have the same signs, and so on.[12827]
[12828]Marinus Mercennus suspects Cardan for his subtleties, Campanella, and Charrons Book of Wisdome, with some other Tracts to savour of [12829]Atheism: but amongst the rest that pestilent Book de tribus mundi impostoribus, quem sine horrore (inquit) non legas, & mundi Cymbalum dialogis quatuor contentum, Anno 1538. auctore Peresio, Parisiis excusum [12830], &c.	Marin Mersenne suspects Cardano, for his subtleties, Campanella, and Charron's Book of Wisdom, with some other works, of having a taint of atheism. Among the rest is that pestilent book On the Three Impostors of the World, which, he says, you cannot read without horror; and The Cymbal of the World, in four dialogues, by Des Périers, printed at Paris in 1538, and so on.[12831]
And as there have been in all Ages such blasphemous spirits, so there have not been wanting their Patrons, Protectors, Disciples and Adherents. Never so many Atheists in Italy and Germany, saith [12832]Colerus, as in this Age: the like complaint Mercennus makes in France, 50000 in that one City of Paris.	And as every age has had such blasphemous spirits, so they have never lacked patrons, protectors, disciples and adherents. Never have there been so many atheists in Italy and Germany, says Colerus, as in this age. Mersenne makes the same complaint about France: fifty thousand in the city of Paris alone.[12833]

[12826] Burton. Source page 690, second star: "Campanella cap.18. Atheismo triumphat." "Campanella, Atheism Conquered, chapter 18."

[12827] Editor. Boccaccio, Decameron 1.3: Melchizedek answers Saladin's dangerous question with three indistinguishable rings, leaving rival claims unresolved. Burton reports the moral through a Campanella reference. A character's strategic answer is not automatically a direct declaration of the author's beliefs.

[12828] Burton. Source page 690, second dagger: "Comment. in Genes.cap.7." "Commentary on Genesis, chapter 7."

[12829] Burton. Source page 690, third dagger: "So that a man may meet an Atheist as soon in his study as in the Street."

[12830] Burton. Source page 690, third star: "Simonis religio incerto authore Craconiæ edit.1588. conclusio libri est. Ede itaque, bibe, lude, &c. Jam deus figmentum est." "Simon's Religion, by an unknown author, published at Cracow in 1588. The conclusion of the book is: Eat, then, drink, play, and so on; God is now a fiction."

[12831] Editor. The Three Impostors title and Mersenne's accusations are reported claims; no particular surviving text or reading by Burton is established here. Cymbalum mundi is Bonaventure des Périers's work; Burton's date is retained pending bibliographical collation. The margin adds an anonymous Simonis religio, whose identity remains unresolved.

[12832] Burton. Source page 690, c: "Lib.de immortal.animæ." "Book on the Immortality of the Soul."

[12833] Editor. The Paris figure repeats the polemical estimate mentioned in Block 161; it is not a verified count. Colerus's exact passage and the historical reach of his category atheist remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Frederick the Emperour, as [12834]Matthew Paris records, licet non sit recitabile (I use his own words) is reported to have said, Tres præstigiatores, Moses, Christus, & Mahomet, uti mundo dominarentur, totum populum sibi contemporaneum seduxisse.	The emperor Frederick, as Matthew Paris records, although it ought not to be repeated—I use his own words—is reported to have said that three deceivers, Moses, Christ and Muhammad, misled all the people of their own times in order to rule the world.[12835]
(Henry the Lantgrave of Hessen heard him speak it,) Si principes imperii institutioni meæ adhærerent, ego multo meliorem modum credendi & vivendi ordinarem.	Henry, Landgrave of Hesse, heard him say it: If the princes of the empire followed my teaching, I would establish a much better way of believing and living.[12836]
To these professed Atheists we may well add that impious and carnal crew of wordly-minded men, impenitent sinners, that go to Hel in a lethargy, or in a dream, who though they be professed Christians, yet they will Nulla pallescere culpa, make a conscience of nothing they do, they have cauterized consciences, and are indeed in a reprobate sense, past all feeling, have given themselves over to wantonness, to work all manner of uncleanness even with greediness, Ephes. 4.19.	To these professed atheists we may well add that impious and carnal crowd of worldly-minded people, unrepentant sinners who go to hell in a stupor or a dream. Although they profess Christianity, they will turn pale at no guilt and feel no scruple about anything they do. Their consciences are seared, and their understanding is depraved: past all feeling, they have given themselves over to sensuality, greedily practising every kind of impurity, Ephesians 4:19.[12837]

[12834] Burton. Source page 690, last in-scope dagger: “Pag.645. an.1238. ad finem Henrici tertii. Idem Pisterius pag.743. in compilat. sua.” “Page 645, year 1238, towards the end of Henry III. The same in Pistorius, page 743 of his compilation.”

[12835] Editor. Frederick II is the subject of this report. Burton explicitly presents the saying as reported, through Matthew Paris, rather than as something he can verify. The charge should not be treated as established evidence of Frederick’s beliefs.

[12836] Editor. The identification of the alleged witness and the wording transmitted through Matthew Paris and Pistorius require collation. The source’s geographical designation is retained; neither this detail nor the alleged speech has been independently established here.

[12837] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.1.61, presents freedom from guilt as a good; Burton turns the phrase into a charge of shamelessness. Cauterized means seared or made insensible, echoing 1 Timothy 4:2; reprobate sense recalls Romans 1:28. The printed wordly-minded is retained in the original column.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They do know there is a God, a day of Judgement to come, and yet for all that, as Hugo saith, ita comedunt ac dormiunt, ac si diem judicii evasissent; ita ludunt ac rident, ac si in cœlis cum Deo regnarent: they are as merry for all the sorrow, as if they had escaped all dangers, and were in heaven already:	They know that there is a God and a judgement day to come; yet despite that, as Hugh says, they eat and sleep as though they had escaped the day of judgement; they play and laugh as though they reigned with God in heaven. For all the sorrow awaiting them, they are as cheerful as if they had escaped every danger and were already in heaven:[12838]

[12838] Editor. Hugo is rendered as Hugh; the precise author and passage remain for collation. Burton supplies both a Latin quotation and an English restatement, so both are retained in translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [12839]Metus omnes, & inexorabile fatum Subjecit pedibus, strepitumque Acherontis avari.	—— All fears and inexorable fate He trampled underfoot, and greedy Acheron's roar.[12840]
Source page 691 Those rude Idiots and ignorant persons, that neglect and contemn the means of their salvation, may march on with these, but above all others, those Herodian temporizing Statesmen, politick Machiavilians and Hypocrites, that make a shew of Religion, but in their hearts laugh at it. Simulata sanctitas duplex iniquitas; they are in a double fault,	Those uneducated simpletons and ignorant people who neglect and despise the means of their salvation may march along with them; above all, those Herodian statesmen who accommodate themselves to the times, scheming Machiavellians and hypocrites who make a show of religion but laugh at it in their hearts. Pretended holiness is double wickedness: they are doubly at fault,[12841]
that fashion themselves to this world, which [12842]Paul forbids, and like Mercury the Planet, are good with good, bad with bad. When they are at Rome, they do there as they see done, Puritans with Puritans, Papists with Papists; omnium horarum homines, Formalists, Ambodexters, luke-warm Laodiceans.	conforming themselves to this world, which Paul forbids, and behaving like the planet Mercury: good among the good, bad among the bad. In Rome they do as they see others do; Puritans among Puritans, Papists among Papists; people for every occasion, formalists, double-dealers, lukewarm Laodiceans.[12843]

[12839] Burton. Source page 690, final dagger: "Virg." "Virgil."

[12840] Editor. Virgil, Georgics 2.491–492, from the praise of one who understands natural causes and overcomes fear. Acheron is an underworld river. Burton reuses the praise ironically of people complacent about judgement; the opening omission mark is retained.

[12841] Editor. Idiots means unlearned people. Herodian and Machiavellian are polemical labels for religion serving political interest. Compare Augustine, Exposition of Psalm 63.11: simulated equity is double wickedness, combining wrong with deception. Burton's proverb has sanctitas, holiness, rather than Augustine's aequitas, equity; the parallel does not establish direct borrowing. Neither political label proves the beliefs of a historical group.

[12842] Burton. Source page 691, z: "Rom.12.2." "Romans 12:2."

[12843] Editor. The Mercury comparison invokes astrology, in which the planet takes on the character of its companions. Formalists observe outward forms; ambodexters serve both sides. Laodiceans recalls Revelation 3:15–16. Puritan and Papist are Burton's contemporary religious labels.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12844]All their study is to please, and their god is their commodity, their labour to satisfie their lusts, and their endeavours to their own ends. Whatsoever they pretend, or in publick seem to do, [12845]With the fool in their hearts, they say there is no God.	All their attention goes into pleasing others; their god is their own advantage, their labour goes into satisfying their appetites, and their efforts serve their own ends. Whatever they profess, or seem to do in public, they say in their hearts with the fool, "There is no God."[12846]
Heus tu —— de Jove quid sentis?	You there —— what do you think of Jupiter?[12847]
Their words are as soft as oyl, but bitterness is in their hearts, like [12848]Alexander the Sixth so cunning dissemblers, that what they think they never speak. Many of them are so close, you can hardly discern it, or take any just exceptions at them;	Their words are as soft as oil, but bitterness lies in their hearts. Like Alexander VI, they are such cunning dissemblers that they never say what they think. Many conceal themselves so well that you can scarcely detect it or find any just grounds for criticism;[12849]
they are not factious, oppressours as most are, no bribers, no simoniacal Contracters, no such ambitious, lascivious persons as some others are, no drunkards, sobrii solem vident orientem, sobrii vident occidentem, they rise sober, and go sober to bed,	they do not stir up factions or oppress people as most do; they offer no bribes, make no bargains in church offices, show none of the ambition or lust of some others, and are no drunkards: sober they see the sun rise, sober they see it set; they rise sober and go to bed sober,[12850]

[12844] Burton. Source page 691, a: "Omnis Aristippum decuit color, & status & res." "Every colour, station and circumstance suited Aristippus."

[12845] Burton. Source page 691, b: "Psal.13.1." "Psalm 13:1."

[12846] Editor. Commodity means personal advantage or profit. The marginal line is Horace, Epistles 1.17.23, about Aristippus's adaptability. The Psalm 13 locator follows the Greek and Latin numbering; the equivalent is Psalm 14:1 in the Hebrew numbering familiar from most English Bibles.

[12847] Editor. Persius, Satire 2.17–18, adapted and abbreviated. The omitted wording in Persius asks for an answer; Burton's question tests the discrepancy between public piety and private desires.

[12848] Burton. Source page 691, c: "Guicciardine." "Guicciardini."

[12849] Editor. Alexander VI is the pope. Guicciardini, History of Italy 1.2, portrays him as lacking sincerity, truth, faith and religion. This hostile assessment supplies a related context, not the exact source of Burton's claim that he never spoke his thoughts; that wording remains untraced. Close means secretive. Words softer than oil recalls Psalm 55:21.

[12850] Editor. Simony is trafficking in ecclesiastical office or spiritual benefits. The Latin and Burton's English restatement both emphasize outward sobriety; the exact source of the Latin remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
plain dealing, upright honest men, they do wrong to no man, and are so reputed in the worlds esteem at least, very zealous in Religion, very charitable, meek, humble, peace-makers, keep all duties, very devout, honest, well spoken of, beloved of all men: but he that knows better how to judge, he that examines the heart, saith they are Hypocrites, Cor dolo plenum; sonant vitium percussa malignè, they are not sound within.	plain-dealing, upright, honest people who wrong no one—or so the world regards them, at least. They are zealous in religion, charitable, meek, humble, peacemakers, observing every duty, devout, honest, well spoken of and universally loved. Yet he who knows better how to judge, who examines the heart, says that they are hypocrites: a heart full of deceit; struck, the vessels ring faultily and reveal a flaw. They are unsound within.[12851]
As it is with Writers [12852]oftentimes, Plus sanctimoniæ in libello, quàm libelli authore, more holiness is in the Book than in the Author of it: So it is with them; many come to Church with great Bibles, whom Cardan said he could not choose but laugh at, and will now and then dare operam Augustino, reade Austin, frequent Sermons,	It is often the same with writers: more holiness in the little book than in its author, more holiness in the book than in the person who wrote it. So it is with these people. Many come to church with large Bibles—Cardano said he could not help laughing at them—and will occasionally devote themselves to Augustine, read Augustine and attend sermons,[12853]
and yet professed Usurers, meer Gripes, tota vitæ ratio Epicurea est; all their life is Epicurism and Atheism, come to Church all day, and lie with a Curtezan at night.	yet they are open usurers, outright graspers: their whole way of life is Epicurean; their entire life is Epicurean indulgence and atheism. They spend the day at church and sleep with a courtesan at night.[12854]
Qui Curios simulant & Bacchanalia vivunt,	They pose as Curii but live lives of Bacchanalian revelry.[12855]

[12851] Editor. The vessel image adapts Persius, Satire 3.21–22, where badly fired pottery betrays its defect when tapped. Burton prints sonant rather than sonat and compresses the comparison. He who examines the heart is God, not a human observer claiming certainty about hidden motives.

[12852] Burton. Source page 691, d: “Erasmus.”

[12853] Editor. The Erasmus and Cardano references lack precise locators and remain for collation. Austin is the customary English form of Augustine. Great Bibles means large Bibles here; it need not identify the edition called the Great Bible.

[12854] Editor. Gripes are grasping or rapacious people. Usury and Epicurism are used as moral accusations. Epicurean here means sensual indulgence in Burton’s polemical usage, not a careful account of Epicurus’s philosophy.

[12855] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 2.3. The Curii exemplify old Roman austerity; Bacchanalia evokes riotous revels associated with Bacchus. Burton recruits the satirist’s attack on hypocrisy into his religious argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They have Esaus hands, and Jacobs voyce; Yea, and many of those holy Fryers, sanctified men, Cappam, saith Hierom, & cilicium induunt, sed intus latronem tegunt. They are Wolves in sheeps clothing,	They have Esau's hands and Jacob's voice. Yes, and many of those holy friars, those sanctified men, put on a cloak, says Jerome, and a hair shirt, but conceal a robber within. They are wolves in sheep's clothing,[12856]
Introrsum turpes, speciosi pelle decorâ,	Foul within, attractive in their handsome skin,[12857]
Fair without, and most foul within: [12858]Latet plerumque sub tristi amictu lascivia, & deformis horror vili veste tegitur; oft-times under a mourning weed lies lust it self, and horrible vices under a poor coat.	Fair outside and utterly foul within: lust often hides beneath sombre clothing, and hideous ugliness is covered by a shabby garment; lust itself often lies beneath mourning dress, and dreadful vices beneath a poor coat.[12859]
But who can examine all those kinds of Hypocrites, or dive into their hearts? If we may guess at the tree by the fruit, never so many as in these days; shew me a plain dealing true honest man? Et pudor, & probitas, & timor omnis abest.	But who can examine all these kinds of hypocrites or penetrate their hearts? If we may judge the tree by its fruit, there have never been so many as today. Show me a plain-dealing, truly honest man! Shame, integrity and every fear are absent.[12860]

[12856] Editor. Genesis 27:22 supplies the contrast between Jacob's voice and Esau's hands; Matthew 7:15 the wolves in sheep's clothing. Cilicium is a penitential hair shirt. Burton attributes the cloak saying to Jerome, without a precise citation.

[12857] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.16.45, changed from singular to plural. Burton's separate English restatement follows in the next unit.

[12858] Burton. Source page 691, e: "Hierom." "Jerome."

[12859] Editor. Weed means clothing; tristi amictu suggests sombre or austere dress. Burton's English restatement makes the moral implication explicit. A close parallel is Ambrose, On the Death of Satyrus 2.12; Burton's Jerome attribution and altered wording are retained pending fuller collation.

[12860] Editor. The tree and fruit recall Matthew 7:16–20. The Latin statement about shame, integrity and fear is retained without an unverified author attribution.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 691–692 He that shall but look into their lives, and see such enormous vices, men so immoderate in lust, unspeakable in malice, furious in their rage, flattering and dissembling (all for their own ends) will surely think they are not truly religious, but of an obdurate heart, most part in a reprobate sense, as in this Age. But let them carry it as they will for the present, dissemble as they can, a time will come when they shall be called to an account, their melancholy is at hand, they pull a plague and curse upon their own heads, thesaurisant iram Dei.	Anyone who looks into their lives and sees such monstrous vices—people so unrestrained in lust, unspeakable in malice, furious in rage, flattering and dissembling entirely for their own ends—will surely think they are not truly religious but hardened in heart, most of them depraved in understanding, as in this age. Let them conduct themselves as they please for now and dissemble as best they can: a time will come when they must account for themselves. Their melancholy is close at hand. They bring a plague and curse upon their own heads: they store up God's wrath.[12861]
Source page 692 Besides all such as are in deos contumeliosi, blaspheme, contemn, neglect God, or scoff at him, as the Poets feign of Salmoneus, that would in derision imitate Jupiters Thunder, he was precipitated for his pains, Jupiter intonuit contra, &c. so shall they certainly rue it in the end, ([12862]in se spuit, qui in cœlum spuit) their doom's at hand, and Hell is ready to receive them.	Besides, all who are insulting towards the gods, who blaspheme, despise or neglect God, or mock him, will certainly regret it in the end. So the poets tell of Salmoneus, who mockingly tried to imitate Jupiter's thunder and was hurled down for his pains: Jupiter thundered in reply, and so on. Whoever spits into heaven spits upon himself. Their doom is near, and hell is ready to receive them.[12863]

[12861] Editor. Enormous means grossly wicked or beyond proper bounds. Storing up wrath recalls Romans 2:5. Burton presents anticipated punishment as the hypocrites' approaching melancholy; this is a theological warning within his argument.

[12862] Burton. Source page 692, first star: "Senec. consol. ad Polyb. ca.21." "Seneca, Consolation to Polybius, chapter 21."

[12863] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 6.585–594, describes Salmoneus's imitation of thunder and Jupiter's response. The spitting proverb makes an attack on heaven rebound upon its speaker. Burton's Seneca locator, Consolation to Polybius chapter 21, is retained pending identification of the precise source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some are of Opinion, that it is in vain to dispute with such Atheistical spirits in the mean time, 'tis not the best way to reclaim them. Atheism, Idolatry, Heresie, Hypocrisie, though they have one common root, that is indulgence to corrupt affection, yet their growth is different, they have divers symptoms, occasions, and must have several cures and remedies.	Some hold that meanwhile it is useless to argue with such atheistical spirits: disputation is not the best way to reclaim them. Atheism, idolatry, heresy and hypocrisy have a common root—indulgence of corrupt passions—but they develop differently, have different symptoms and causes, and require different cures and remedies.[12864]
'Tis true some deny there is any God, some confess, yet believe it not; a third sort confess and believe, but will not live after his Laws, Worship and obey him: others allow God and Gods subordinate, but not one God, no such general God, non talem deum, but several Topick gods for several places, and those not to persecute one another for any differences, as Socinus will, but rather love and cherish.	It is true that some deny there is any God; some acknowledge one but do not believe it; a third kind acknowledge and believe, but will not live by his laws, worship him or obey him. Others accept God and subordinate gods, but not one God, no such universal God, no God of that kind, instead assigning different local gods to different places. Those people, as Socinus would have it, should not persecute one another over their differences, but love and care for one another.[12865]

[12864] Editor. Affection means a passion or disposition; several means distinct or different. Burton applies the language of symptoms and remedies to religious and moral categories.

[12865] Editor. Topick means local. The Socinus clause is compressed and its scope uncertain: the translation takes those as the people or communities attached to different beliefs. Burton's wording should not be treated as a verified account of Socinian doctrine; the exact source remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To describe them in particular, to produce their Arguments and reasons, would require a just volumn, I refer them therefore that expect a more ample satisfaction, to those subtile and elaborate Treatises, devout and famous Tracts of our learned Divines (Schoolmen amongst the rest, and Casuists) that have abundance of reasons to prove there is a God, the immortality of the soul, &c. out of the strength of wit and Philosophy bring irrefragable Arguments to such as are ingenious and well disposed; at the least, answer all cavils and objections to confute their folly and madness, and to reduce them, si fieri posset, ad sanam mentem, to a better mind, though to small purpose many times.	To describe them individually and set out their arguments and reasons would require a full volume. I therefore refer anyone seeking fuller satisfaction to the subtle, carefully worked treatises, the devout and celebrated writings of our learned theologians, including the scholastics and casuists. They offer abundant reasons to prove God's existence, the soul's immortality and so forth; by intellectual power and philosophy they supply irrefutable arguments for receptive, well-disposed readers. At least they answer every quibble and objection, refuting their opponents' folly and madness and bringing them, if it could be done, to a sound mind, to a better disposition —though often with little effect.[12866]
Amongst others consult with Julius Cæsar Lagalla professour of Philosophy in Rome, who hath written a large Volumn of late to confute Atheists: of the Immortality of the Soul, Hierom. Montanus de immortalitate Animæ: Lelius Vincentius of the same subject: Thomas Giaminus, and Franciscus Collius de Paganorum animabus post mortem, a famous Doctor of the Ambrosian Colledge in Millain.	Among others, consult Giulio Cesare Lagalla, professor of philosophy in Rome, who has recently written a large volume to refute atheists; on the soul's immortality, Hieronymus Montanus's On the Immortality of the Soul, and Laelius Vincentius on the same subject; Thomas Giaminus; and Franciscus Collius's On the Souls of Pagans after Death, by a celebrated doctor of the Ambrosian College in Milan.[12867]

[12866] Editor. A just volume is a full-sized volume. Schoolmen are scholastic theologians; casuists discuss particular moral cases. Ingenious here suggests intellectually receptive readers. Burton's claim of irrefutable proof is part of his own apologetic assessment.

[12867] Editor. The printed name is Collius, not the OCR reading Coffius. Titles are translated, but the abbreviated bibliography and uncertain Giaminus name await full bibliographical collation. The final description grammatically belongs to Collius.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Bishop Fotherby in his Atheomastix, Doctor Dove, Doctor Jackson, Abernethy, Corderoy, have written well of this subject in our mother tongue: In Latine, Colerus, Zanchius, Palearius, Illyricus, [12868]Philippus, Faber Faventinus, &c.	Bishop Fotherby in his Scourge of Atheists, Dr Dove, Dr Jackson, Abernethy and Corderoy have written well on this subject in our own language; in Latin, Colerus, Zanchi, Paleario, Illyricus, Philippus, Faber of Faenza and others.[12869]
Source page 692–693 But instar omnium, the most copious confuter of Atheists, is Marinus Mercennus in his Commentaries on Genesis: [12870]with Campanellas Atheismus Triumphatus. He sets down at large the causes of this brutish passion (seventeen in number I take it) answers all their Arguments and Sophisms, which he reduceth to twenty six heads, proving withall his own Assertion; There is a God, such a God, the true and sole God, by 35 reasons. His Colophon is how to resist and repress Atheism, and to that purpose he adds four especial means or wayes, which who so will may profitably peruse.	But the equal of them all, the most extensive refuter of atheists, is Marin Mersenne in his commentaries on Genesis, together with Campanella's Atheism Conquered. He sets out at length the causes of this brutish passion—seventeen, I believe—and answers all their arguments and sophisms, arranging them under twenty-six heads. At the same time, he proves his own assertion with thirty-five reasons: there is a God, a God of this kind, the true and only God. His concluding section explains how to resist and suppress atheism; for that purpose he adds four particular means or methods, which anyone interested may read with profit.[12871]

[12868] Burton. Source page 692, dagger: "Disput.4. Philosophiæ adver. Atheos Venetiis 1627. quarto." "Disputation 4 of Philosophy against Atheists; Venice, 1627, quarto."

[12869] Editor. Fotherby is Martin Fotherby; Atheomastix means scourge of atheists. The indexed text of the Biblioteca Nacional de México's historical catalogue lists Philippus Faber Faventinus and Four Philosophical Disputations against Impious Atheists, Venice, 1627, quarto. This supports reading Philippus and Faber Faventinus as one author despite Burton's comma. The printed separation and marginal attachment are retained; the book's title page and Burton's edition remain uncollated.

[12870] Burton. Source page 692, final star: "Edit. Romæ fol.1631." "Published at Rome, folio, 1631."

[12871] Editor. Colophon here means the concluding section. The pronoun he follows references to both Mersenne and Campanella; Burton's numerical summary and its attribution require comparison with the editions he used. Seventeen remains explicitly qualified by I take it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 693 SUBSECT. 2. Despair.	SUBSECTION 2 Despair
Despaires, Æquivocations, Definitions, parties and parts affected.	The different meanings and definitions of despair and the people and parts affected
There be many kinds of desperation; whereof some be holy, some unholy, as [12872]one distinguisheth; that unholy he defines out of Tully, to be Ægritudinem animi sine ulla rerum expectatione meliore, a sickness of the soul without any hope or expectation of amendment: which commonly succeeds fear; for whilst evil is expected, we fear; but when it is certain, we despair.	There are many kinds of despair, some holy and some unholy, as one writer distinguishes them. Drawing on Cicero, he defines unholy despair as distress of mind without any expectation of better things: a sickness of the soul without any hope or expectation of improvement. It commonly follows fear: while evil is anticipated, we fear; when it is certain, we despair.[12873]
According to Thomas 2.2æ. distinct. 40. art.4. it is Recessus à re desiderata, propter impossibilitatem existimatam, a restraint from the thing desired, for some impossibility supposed.	According to Thomas Aquinas, second part of the second part, distinction 40, article 4, it is a withdrawal from the desired thing because it is thought impossible: holding back from what is desired because of some supposed impossibility.[12874]

[12872] Burton. Source page 693, f: "Abernethy c.24. of his physick of the Soul." "Abernethy, chapter 24 of his Physic of the Soul."

[12873] Editor. Abernethy's Physic of the Soul, chapter 24, in the inspected 1630 edition, pp. 367–368, distinguishes holy despair of one's own strength, with refuge in God, from unholy despair without hope of improvement. Its margin also gives the problematic Second Part of the Second Part, 40.4, for Aquinas. Compare Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 4.18; Burton's Latin adds animi and has meliore. The matching passage does not identify his edition.

[12874] Editor. The parallel is Summa theologiae I–II, question 40, article 4, reply to objection 3, not II–II as printed. Aquinas distinguishes despair as withdrawal from a desired good thought unattainable. Burton's locator is preserved and corrected here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Because they cannot obtain what they would, they become desperate, and many times either yeeld to the passion by death it self, or else attempt impossibilities, not to be performed by men. In some cases, this desperate humor is not much to be discommended, as in Wars it is a cause many times of extraordinary valour; as Joseph. lib.1. de bello Jud. cap.14. L. Danæus in Aphoris. polit. pag.226. and many Politicians hold. It makes them improve their worth beyond it self, and of a forlorn impotent Company become Conquerors in a moment.	Because they cannot obtain what they want, people become desperate and often either succumb to this passion through death itself or attempt impossible feats beyond human power. In some circumstances this desperate disposition is not much to be condemned: in war it often produces extraordinary courage, as Josephus, The Jewish War, book 1, chapter 14, Lambert Daneau, Political Aphorisms, page 226, and many political writers maintain. It makes people surpass their own courage and turn in a moment from an abandoned, powerless company into conquerors.[12875]
Una salus victis nullam sperare salutem.	The defeated have one hope of safety—to hope for none.[12876]
In such courses when they see no remedy, but that they must either kill or be killed, they take courage, and often times præter spem, beyond all hope vindicate themselves. Fifteen thousand Locrenses fought against a hundred thousand Crotonienses, and seeing now no way but one, they must all die, [12877]thought they would not depart unrevenged, and thereupon desperately giving an assault, conquered their Enemies. Nec alia causa victoriæ (saith Justine mine Author) quam quod desperaverant.	In such circumstances, when they see no escape and must either kill or be killed, they take courage and often beyond hope, beyond all expectation, deliver themselves. Fifteen thousand Locrians fought a hundred thousand Crotoniates. Seeing only one outcome—that they must all die—they resolved not to leave the world unavenged. They launched a desperate assault and defeated their enemies. There was no other cause of their victory, says my authority Justin, than that they had despaired.[12878]

[12875] Editor. Humor here means a disposition, though the work also uses humoral medicine. Politicians are writers on statecraft, not necessarily officeholders. Burton distinguishes desperate courage in war from the religious despair to which he will restrict the discussion.

[12876] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 2.354: Aeneas addresses his companions during Troy's fall. Salus means safety or deliverance; the paradox turns abandoned hope into courage.

[12877] Burton. Source page 693, dagger: "Omissa spe victoriæ in destinatam mortem conspirant, tantusque ardor singulos cepit, ut victores se putarent si non inulti morerentur. Justin. l.20." "Abandoning hope of victory, they unite in facing their destined death; such ardour seizes each man that they would count themselves victorious if they did not die unavenged. Justin, book 20."

[12878] Editor. Justin, Epitome 20.3, gives fifteen thousand Locrians but a hundred and twenty thousand Crotoniates, unlike Burton's hundred thousand. The marginal resolve to die unavenged comes from the same passage. His closing statement includes quam quod desperaverunt, while Burton has desperaverant. These are the figures and interpretation in the ancient narrative, not independently established battle statistics.

Original text 1651	Modern English
William the Conqueror, when he first landed in England, sent back his ships, that his Souldiers might have no hope of retyring back. [12879]Bodine excuseth his Countrymens overthrow at that famous Battel at Agencourt, in Henry the Fifth his time, (cui simile, saith Frossard, tota historia producere non possit, which no History can parallel almost, wherein one handful of Englishmen overthrew a Royal Army of Frenchmen) with this refuge of despair, pauci desperati, a few desperate fellows being compassed in by their Enemies, past all hope of life, fought like so many Divels;	When William the Conqueror first landed in England, he sent his ships back so that his soldiers would have no hope of retreat. Bodin excuses his countrymen's defeat at the famous battle of Agincourt in Henry V's time by this resort to despair: a few desperate men, surrounded by their enemies and beyond all hope of surviving, fought like so many devils. Of this battle Froissart says, all history could produce nothing like it: history can scarcely parallel how a handful of Englishmen defeated a royal French army.[12880]
Source page 693–694 and gives a caution, that no Soldiers hereafter set upon desperate persons, which [12881]after Frontinus and Vegetius, Guicciardine likewise admonisheth, Hypomnes. part.2. pag.25. not to stop an enemy that is going his way.	He therefore warns soldiers never to attack desperate people. Following Frontinus and Vegetius, Guicciardini gives the same advice in his Memoranda, part 2, page 25: do not block an enemy who is withdrawing.[12882]
Source page 694 Many such kinds there are of desperation, when men are past hope of obtaining any suit, or in despair of better fortune; Desperatio facit Monachum, as the saying is; and desperation causeth death it self; how many thousands in such distress have made away themselves, and many others? For he that cares not for his own, is master of another mans life.	There are many such kinds of despair, when people have lost hope of succeeding in a petition or despaired of better fortune. Despair makes the monk, as the saying goes. Despair also causes death itself: how many thousands in such distress have killed themselves and many others? For someone who cares nothing for his own life has another person's life at his command.[12883]

[12879] Burton. Source page 693, g: "Method. hist. cap.5." "Method of History, chapter 5."

[12880] Editor. Burton's William anecdote remains for historical collation. Froissart's chronicle does not extend to Agincourt in 1415; the attribution therefore needs correction or identification of the passage being transferred. Bodin's exact argument is not established here by Burton's abbreviated citation.

[12881] Burton. Source page 694, dagger: "Hosti abire volenti iter minime interscindas, &c." "Never cut off the way of an enemy who wishes to leave," and so on.

[12882] Editor. The warning is to leave an avenue of retreat. Compare Frontinus, Stratagems 2.6, and Vegetius, Epitome of Military Science 3.21. The particular Guicciardini collection and page remain for collation.

[12883] Editor. Suit means a petition or request. The proverb describes a frustrated person's withdrawal into monastic life. The maxim introduces an example of despair in a secular rather than a specifically religious setting.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A Tuscan South-sayer, as [12884]Paterculus tels the story, perceiving himself and Fulvius Flaccus his dear friend, now both carryed to prison by Opimius, and in despair of pardon, seeing the young man weep, quin tu potius hoc inquit facis, do as I do; and with that knockt out his brains against the door cheek, as he was entring into Prison, protinusque illiso capite in carceris januam effuso cerebro expiravit, and so desperately died.	An Etruscan soothsayer, as Paterculus tells the story, found himself and his dear friend Fulvius Flaccus being taken to prison by Opimius, without hope of pardon. Seeing the young man weep, he said, "Why do you not do this instead?"—do as I do—and dashed his brains out against the doorpost as he entered the prison: striking his head against the prison doorway, he immediately died, his brains spilling out. Thus he died in despair.[12885]
But these are equivocal, unproper. When I speak of despair, saith [12886]Zanchie, I speak not of every kinde, but of that alone which concerns God. It is opposite to hope, and a most pernicious sin, wherewith the Divel seeks to entrap men.	But these are broader, less precise uses of the word. When I speak of despair, says Zanchi, I do not mean every kind, but only that which concerns God. It is opposed to hope and is a most destructive sin, through which the devil seeks to entrap people.[12887]
Musculus makes four kinds of desperation, of God, our selves, our Neighbour, or any thing to be done; but this division of his may be reduced easily to the former: all kinds are opposite to hope, that sweet Moderator of passions, as Simonides cals it; I do not mean that vain hope which phantastical Fellows fain to themselves, which according to Aristotle is insomnium vigilantium, a waking dream;	Musculus distinguishes four kinds of despair: concerning God, ourselves, our neighbour or anything to be accomplished. But his division can easily be brought under the previous one. All kinds are opposed to hope, that sweet moderator of the passions, as Simonides calls it. I do not mean the empty hope that fanciful people invent for themselves, which according to Aristotle is a dream of the waking, a waking dream;[12888]

[12884] Burton. Source page 694, star: "Poster. volum." "The latter volume."

[12885] Editor. Velleius Paterculus 2.7.2 names the young man as Fulvius Flaccus's son and says that his Etruscan friend saw him being led away. Burton compresses and alters the account, including the assertion that both were prisoners. His version and the repeated Latin description are retained.

[12886] Burton. Source page 694, h: "Super præceptum primum de Relig. & partibus ejus. Non loquor de omni desperatione, sed tantum de ea qua desperare solent homines de deo; opponitur spei, & est peccatum gravissimum, &c." "On the first commandment, concerning religion and its parts. I do not speak of every kind of despair, but only of that by which people commonly despair of God; it is opposed to hope and is a most grievous sin," and so on.

[12887] Editor. Equivocal and unproper mean uses outside the strict sense now being defined, not false reports. Zanchie or Zanchius is Girolamo Zanchi. The category is specifically theological: despair concerning God and salvation.

[12888] Editor. Musculus is Wolfgang Musculus. The Aristotle saying is recorded among his sayings by Diogenes Laertius, Lives 5.18. The precise Musculus division and Simonides phrase remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but this Divine hope which proceeds from confidence, and is an Anchor to a floating soul; spes alit agricolas, even in our temporal affairs, hope revives us, but in spiritual it farther animateth; and were it not for hope, we of all others were the most miserable, as Paul saith, in this life; were it not for hope, the heart would break, for though they be punished in the sight of men, (Wisdom 3.4.) yet is their hope full of immortality:	I mean divine hope, which springs from trust and anchors the drifting soul. Hope sustains farmers: even in earthly affairs hope revives us, but in spiritual matters it gives us still greater life. Without hope we would be the most miserable of all people in this life, as Paul says. Without hope the heart would break; for though they are punished in the sight of men, their hope is nevertheless full of immortality (Wisdom 3:4).[12889]
yet doth it not so rear, as despair doth deject; this violent and sour passion of Despair, is of all perturbations most grievous, as [12890]Patritius holds. Some divide it into final and temporal; [12891]final is incurable, which befalleth Reprobates; temporal is a rejection of hope and comfort for a time, which may befal the best of Gods children, and it commonly proceeds [12892]from weakness of Faith, as in David when he was oppressed he cryed out, O Lord, thou hast forsaken me, but this for a time.	Yet hope does not lift us as high as despair casts us down. This violent, bitter passion of despair is the most grievous of all disturbances, as Patrizi maintains. Some divide it into final and temporary despair. Final despair is incurable and befalls the reprobate; temporary despair is a rejection of hope and comfort for a time, which may befall the best of God's children. It commonly proceeds from weakness of faith, as when David, in distress, cried, "O Lord, you have forsaken me"—but only for a time.[12893]

[12889] Editor. The anchor recalls Hebrews 6:19; Paul's allusion is 1 Corinthians 15:19, which in context concerns hope in Christ limited to this life. Spes alit agricolas opens Tibullus 2.6.21. Burton combines these with Wisdom 3:4 to describe sustaining hope.

[12890] Burton. Source page 694, i: "Lib.5.tit.21. de regis institut. Omnium perturbationum deterrima." "Book 5, section 21, On the Education of a King. The worst of all disturbances."

[12891] Burton. Source page 694, k: "Reprobi usque ad finem pertinaciter persistunt. Zanchius." "The reprobate persist stubbornly to the end. Zanchi."

[12892] Burton. Source page 694, l: "Vitium ab infidelitate proficiscens." "A fault proceeding from lack of faith."

[12893] Editor. Final means persisting to the end of life; temporary is a condition that passes. Reprobate is a theological category of rejection, not a clinical diagnosis. Burton expressly allows temporary despair to afflict the best believers. David's words recall the opening of Psalm 22.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This ebbs and flows with hope and fear; it is a grievous sin howsoever: although some kind of Despair be not amiss, when, saith Zanchius, we despair of our own means, and rely wholy upon God: but that species is not here meant.	This ebbs and flows with hope and fear; nevertheless it is a grievous sin. Yet one kind of despair is not wrong: when, says Zanchi, we lose confidence in our own resources and rely wholly upon God. But that is not the kind meant here.[12894]
This pernicious kind of desperation is the subject of our Discourse, homicida animæ, the Murderer of the soul, as Austin terms it, a fearful passion, wherein the party oppressed thinks he can get no ease but by death, and is fully resolved to offer violence unto himself, so sensible of his burthen, and impatient of his cross, that he hopes by death alone to be freed of his calamity (though it prove otherwise) and chuseth with Job 6.8,9. 17.5. Rather to be strangled and die, then to be in his bonds.	This destructive kind of despair is the subject of our discussion: the soul's murderer, as Augustine calls it. It is a terrible passion in which the afflicted person believes that death alone can bring relief and is fully resolved to harm himself. So acutely does he feel his burden, and so unable is he to endure his cross, that he hopes death alone will free him from his misery—though the outcome is otherwise—and chooses with Job 6:8 –9 and 17:5 to be strangled and die rather than remain in his bonds.[12895]
Source page 694–695 [12896]The part affected is the whole soul, and all the faculties of it; there is a privation of joy, hope, trust, confidence, of present and future good, and in their place succeed fear, sorrow, &c. as in the Symptomes shall be shewed: The heart is grieved, the conscience wounded, the minde eclypsed with black fumes arising from those perpetual terrours.	The part affected is the whole soul and all its faculties. Joy, hope, trust, confidence, and present and future good are lost; fear, sorrow and the like take their place, as will be shown under the symptoms. The heart is grieved, the conscience wounded, and the mind darkened by black fumes rising from those unending terrors.[12897]

[12894] Editor. Burton distinguishes despair of salvation from relinquishing reliance on one's own powers. His moral judgements and categories are retained as part of the historical text.

[12895] Editor. Cross means an affliction to be borne. Job 6:8–9 expresses a wish for death; the preference for strangling is at Job 7:15, not the printed 17:5. The Augustine phrase and Burton's bonds wording remain for collation. This describes the sufferer's belief within Burton's theology, not an assertion that death brings relief.

[12896] Burton. Source page 694, m: "Abernethie." "Abernethy."

[12897] Editor. Faculties are the soul's powers or capacities. Black fumes belongs to Burton's account of bodily vapours affecting the mind, alongside the theological language of conscience. The next subsection begins the causes of despair.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 695 SUBSECT. 3.	SUBSECTION 3
Causes of despair, the Divel, melancholy, meditation, Distrust, weakness of faith, rigid Ministers, misunderstanding Scriptures, guilty consciences, &c.	Causes of despair: the devil, melancholy, meditation, distrust, weakness of faith, harsh ministers, misunderstanding Scripture, guilty consciences, and so on.[12898]
The principal agent and procurer of this mischief, is the Divel; those whom God forsakes, the Divel by his permission layes hold on. Sometimes he persecutes them with that worme of conscience, as he did Judas, [12899]Saul, and others. The Poets call it Nemesis, but it is indeed Gods just judgement, sero sed serio, he strikes home at last, and setteth upon them as a thief in the night, 1 Thes. 2.	The chief agent and author of this affliction is the devil. Those whom God forsakes, the devil seizes with God's permission. Sometimes he torments them with that gnawing worm of conscience, as he did Judas, Saul and others. The poets call it Nemesis, but it is in fact God's just judgement: late, but in earnest. He strikes home at last and comes upon them like a thief in the night, 1 Thessalonians 2.[12900]
[12901]This temporary passion made David cry out, Lord, rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chasten me in thine heavy displeasure; for thine arrowes have light upon mee, &c. There is nothing sound in my flesh, because of thine anger. Again, I roare for the very grief of my heart;	This temporary affliction made David cry out, Lord, do not rebuke me in your anger or chastise me in your fierce displeasure; for your arrows have struck me, and so on. There is nothing sound in my flesh because of your anger. Again, I roar from the very grief of my heart;[12902]

[12898] Editor. Burton's causes combine theology, humoral medicine, habits of devotion and pastoral conduct. The headings belong to the original text. Rigid means harsh or inflexible, rather than merely doctrinally exact.

[12899] Burton. Source page 695, n: "1 Sam.2.16." "1 Samuel 2:16."

[12900] Editor. The account is Burton's theological explanation of affliction. Nemesis is divine retribution in classical personification. The Saul parallel is 1 Samuel 16:14, unlike the printed marginal 2.16; thief in the night is 1 Thessalonians 5:2, not the incomplete 1 Thes. 2. Both printed references are retained.

[12901] Burton. Source page 695, o: "Psal 38." "Psalm 38."

[12902] Editor. Passion here means an affliction or suffering. Burton draws on Psalm 38:1–3 and 8, stressing temporary distress rather than an irreversible state.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and Psalme 22. My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken mee, and art so far from my health, and the words of my crying?[12903] I am like to water poured out, my bones are out of joynt, mine heart is like waxe, that is molten in the midst of my bowels.[12904]	and in Psalm 22: My God, my God, why have you forsaken me, and why are you so far from helping me and from the words of my cry? I am like water poured out; my bones are out of joint; my heart is like wax melted within me.[12905]
So Psal. 88. 15. and 16. vers. and Psal. 102. I am in misery at the point of death, from my youth I suffer thy terrours, doubting for my life; thine indignations have gone over mee, and thy fear hath cut mee off. Job doth often complain in this kinde; and those God doth not assist, the Divel is ready to try and torment, still seeking whom he may devour.	So in Psalm 88, verses 15 and 16, and Psalm 102: I am miserable and at the point of death; from my youth I suffer your terrors, fearing for my life; your wrath has swept over me, and the fear you inspire has cut me off. Job often complains in this way. Those whom God does not help, the devil is ready to test and torment, always seeking someone to devour.[12906]
If he finde them merry, saith Gregory, he tempts them forthwith to some dissolute act; if pensive and sad, to a desperate end. Aut suadendo blanditur, aut minando terret, sometimes by faire means, sometimes again by foule, as he perceives men severally inclined.	If he finds them cheerful, says Gregory, he immediately tempts them to some dissolute act; if troubled and sad, to a desperate end. He either entices them with persuasion or terrifies them with threats: sometimes by fair means, sometimes by foul, according to the inclinations he perceives in different people.[12907]

[12903] Burton. Source page 695, unmarked beside the Psalm quotations: “Vers.9.” “Verse 9.”

[12904] Burton. Source page 695, second unmarked verse reference: “Vers.14.” “Verse 14.”

[12905] Editor. Health here means help or deliverance. The passages correspond to Psalm 22:1 and 14. The two unmarked marginal references, Vers.9 and Vers.14, are preserved beside this group of quotations; the placement of Vers.9 is loose and does not accurately locate the opening cry in Psalm 22.

[12906] Editor. The words about distress since youth and overwhelming wrath correspond to Psalm 88:15–16. Burton additionally names Psalm 102. Seeking whom he may devour recalls 1 Peter 5:8. His biblical sequence and its attribution are retained.

[12907] Editor. A related saying appears under Augustine’s name in Cornelius a Lapide on Leviticus 18:21; this does not settle Burton’s Gregory attribution. For the following Latin, compare Albert the Great, On the Sentences II, distinction 8, article 9, quoting Gregory on threatening and persuading. These are transmission parallels, not proved immediate sources. Desperate end implies destruction through despair; the exact patristic passages remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
His ordinary engine by which he produceth this effect, is the melancholy humour it self, which is balneum Diaboli, the Divels bath; and as in Saul, those evil spirits get in [12908]as it were, and take possession of us. Black choler is a shooing-horn, a bait to allure them,	His usual instrument for producing this effect is the melancholy humour itself, which is the devil's bath, the devil's bathing place. As with Saul, those evil spirits seem to enter and take possession of us. Black bile is a shoehorn to ease their entrance, a bait to attract them,[12909]
in so much that many writers make melancholy an ordinary cause, and a symptome of despair, for that such men are most apt by reason of their ill disposed temper, to distrust, fear, grief, mistake, and amplifie whatsoever they preposterously conceive, or falsly apprehend. Conscientia scrupulosa nascitur ex vitio naturali, complexione melancholica (saith Navarrus cap. 27. num. 282. Tom. 2. cas. conscien.)	so much so that many writers regard melancholy as a common cause and a symptom of despair. Because their bodily constitution is disordered, such people are especially prone to distrust, fear, grief and error, and to magnify whatever they conceive perversely or apprehend falsely. A scrupulous conscience arises from a natural defect, a melancholy constitution, says Navarrus, chapter 27, number 282, volume 2 of Cases of Conscience.[12910]
The body works upon the minde, by obfuscating the spirits and corrupted instruments, which [12911]Perkins illustrates by simile of an Artificer, that hath a bad toole, his skill is good, ability correspondent, by reason of ill tooles his work must needs be lame and unperfect.	The body acts upon the mind by clouding the spirits and through impaired instruments. Perkins illustrates this with the comparison of a craftsman who has a bad tool: his skill is good and his ability adequate, but because his tools are faulty, his work must be defective and imperfect.[12912]

[12908] Burton. Source page 695, p: "Immiscent se mali genii, Lem. lib.1.cap.16." "Evil spirits mingle with them. Lemnius, book 1, chapter 16."

[12909] Editor. Melancholy humour and black choler mean black bile within humoral physiology. The shoehorn and bath are figurative descriptions of how Burton thinks bodily disposition assists temptation. His as it were qualification is preserved.

[12910] Editor. Navarrus is Martín de Azpilcueta. Scrupulous denotes excessive or troubling doubts of conscience. Temper here is bodily constitution. The exact edition and passage of the casuistic work remain for collation.

[12911] Burton. Source page 695, q: "Cases of conscience. l.1.16." "Cases of Conscience, book 1, 16."

[12912] Editor. Spirits are subtle bodily agents of thought and sensation; instruments are bodily organs or faculties. Perkins's Cases of Conscience (1606), I.12, section 1, p. 190, gives the faulty-tool analogy: bodily impairment obstructs the soul's work without removing its capacity. The comparison was checked in the EEBO-TCP transcription. Burton's printed locator ending 16 remains unchanged; his edition is unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 695–696 But melancholy and despaire though often, do not alwaies concur; there is much difference; melancholy fears without a cause, this upon great occasion; melancholy is caused by fear and grief, but this torment procures them and all extremity of bitterness; much melancholy is without affliction of conscience, as [12913]Bright and Perkins illustrate by four reasons; and yet melancholy alone again may be sometimes a sufficient cause of this terror of conscience.	But although melancholy and despair often occur together, they do not always do so. There is a great difference: melancholy fears without a cause; despair fears on serious grounds. Melancholy is caused by fear and grief, while this torment produces them, together with the utmost bitterness. Much melancholy occurs without distress of conscience, as Bright and Perkins explain through four reasons. Yet melancholy alone may sometimes be a sufficient cause of this terror of conscience.[12914]
Source page 696 [12915]Fælix Plater so found it in his observations, è melancholicis alii damnatos se putant, Deo curæ non sunt, nec prædestinati, &c. They think they are not predestinate, God hath forsaken them; and yet otherwise very zealous and religious; and 'tis common to be seen, Melancholy for fear of Gods judgement and hell fire, drives men to desperation; fear and sorrow, if they be immoderate, end often with it.	Felix Platter found this in his observations: some melancholy people think themselves damned, uncared for by God and not predestined, and so on. They think they are not predestined and that God has forsaken them, though otherwise they are very zealous and religious. It is commonly seen that melancholy arising from fear of God's judgement and hellfire drives people to despair; excessive fear and sorrow often end in it.[12916]

[12913] Burton. Source page 696, first dagger: "Tract. Melan. cap.33. & 34." "Treatise of Melancholy, chapters 33 and 34."

[12914] Editor. Perkins (1606), I.12, section 2, pp. 194–195, distinguishes conscience from imagination, real from supposed grounds, selective from pervasive fear, and spiritual from medical remedy. Section 3, pp. 198–199, nevertheless allows their interaction, calling melancholy an occasion, though no direct cause, of terror of conscience. These are historical distinctions. Bright's corresponding comparison remains uncollated; Burton's stronger sufficient cause is retained.

[12915] Burton. Source page 696, r: "C.3. de mentis alien. Deo minus se curæ esse, nec ad salutem prædestinatos esse. Ad desperationem sæpe ducit hæc melancholia, & est frequentissima ob supplicii metum æternumque judicium; mœror & metus in desperationem plerumque desinunt." "Chapter 3, On Mental Derangement. They think God cares little for them and that they are not predestined for salvation. This melancholy often leads to despair and is very common because of fear of punishment and eternal judgement; sorrow and fear generally end in despair."

[12916] Editor. Plater is the physician Felix Platter. Burton first translates or adapts the Latin account, then supplies an English restatement; both remain. The conclusions about damnation are the sufferers' beliefs in the reported cases.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Intolerable pain and anguish, long sickness, captivity, misery, loss of goods, loss of friends, and those lesser griefs do sometimes effect it, or such dismal accidents. Si non statim relevantur, saith [12917]Mercennus, dubitant an sit Deus, if they be not eased forthwith, they doubt whether there be any God, they rave, curse, and are desperately mad, because good men are oppressed, wicked men flourish, they have not as they think to their desert, and through impatience of calamities are so misaffected.	Unbearable pain and anguish, prolonged sickness, captivity, misery, loss of property or friends, and lesser griefs sometimes produce it, as do other dreadful misfortunes. If they are not relieved immediately, says Mersenne, they doubt whether God exists: if they are not eased at once, they doubt whether there is any God. They rave, curse and become mad with despair because good people are oppressed, the wicked flourish, and they do not receive what they believe they deserve. Their inability to endure calamity brings them into this distressed condition.[12918]
Democritus put out his eies, ne malorum civium prosperos videret successus, because he could not abide to see wicked men prosper, and was therefore ready to make away himself, as [12919]Agellius writes of him.	Democritus put out his eyes so that he would not see the success of wicked citizens, because he could not bear to see wicked people prosper; he was therefore ready to kill himself, as Aulus Gellius writes of him.[12920]

[12917] Burton. Source page 696, second dagger: “Comment. in 1 cap. gen. artic.3. quia impii florent, boni opprimuntur &c. alius ex consideratione hujus rei in desperabundus.” “Commentary on Genesis, chapter 1, article 3: because the wicked flourish and the good are oppressed, and so on. Another, from considering this matter, falls into despair.” The final Latin construction is defective as printed.

[12918] Editor. Mercennus is Marin Mersenne. Desert means what a person deserves. The marginal Latin ends with the defective in desperabundus; its intended sense is rendered without silently repairing the transcription.

[12919] Burton. Source page 696, first star: “Lib.20.c.17.” “Book 20, chapter 17.”

[12920] Editor. The parallel is Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights 10.17, not printed 20.17. Gellius distinguishes the story of blinding for concentration from a different motive invented by the playwright Laberius, whose character wishes not to see wicked citizens prosper. Burton’s retelling and added readiness for self-destruction are preserved, rather than treated as established biography.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Fælix Plater hath a memorable example in this kinde, of a Painters wife in Basil, that was melancholy for her sons death, and for melancholy became desperate, she thought God would not pardon her sins, [12921]and for four months, still raved, that she was in hell-fire, already damned. When the humour is stirred up, every small object aggravates and incenseth it, as the parties are addicted.	Felix Platter has a memorable example of this kind: a painter's wife in Basel became melancholy over her son's death and through melancholy fell into despair. She thought God would not forgive her sins, and for four months continually raved that she was in hellfire, already damned. Once the humour is stirred up, every small thing aggravates and inflames it, according to the sufferer's disposition.[12922]
[12923]The same author hath an example of a merchant man, that for the loss of a little wheat, which he had over long kept, was troubled in conscience, for that he had not sold it sooner, or given it to the poor, yet a good Schollar and a great Divine; no perswasion would serve to the contrary, but that for this fact he was damned; in other matters very judicious and discreet.	The same author gives the example of a merchant who, after losing a little wheat he had kept too long, was troubled in conscience because he had not sold it sooner or given it to the poor. He was nevertheless a good scholar and an accomplished theologian. No persuasion could dislodge his belief that he was damned for this deed; in other matters he was very judicious and sensible.[12924]
Solitariness, much fasting, divine meditations, and contemplations of Gods judgements, most part accompany this melancholy, and are main causes, as [12925]Navarrus holds; to converse with such kinde of persons so troubled, is sufficient occasion of trouble to some men.	Solitude, excessive fasting, religious meditation and contemplation of God's judgements generally accompany this melancholy and are principal causes of it, as Navarrus maintains. For some people, associating with others troubled in this way is enough to cause distress.[12926]

[12921] Burton. Source page 696, t: "Damnatam se putavit, & per quatuor menses gehennæ pœnam sentire." "She thought herself damned and believed she was suffering the punishment of hell for four months."

[12922] Editor. Basil is Basel. This is Burton's report of Platter's case, not an independently verified medical history. Addicted means disposed or inclined; humour retains its bodily meaning.

[12923] Burton. Source page 696, u: "1566. ob triticum diutius servatum conscientiæ stimulis agitatur, &c." "1566. He is tormented by pangs of conscience over wheat kept too long," and so on.

[12924] Editor. Fact means deed. The merchant's fixed belief is explicitly contrasted with his sound judgement in other matters. The marginal date 1566 is retained.

[12925] Burton. Source page 696, second star: "Tom.2.c.27. num.282. conversatio cum scrupulosis, vigiliæ, jejunia." "Volume 2, chapter 27, number 282: association with scrupulous people, vigils, fasts."

[12926] Editor. Converse means associate with, not merely speak to. Navarrus's marginal list includes vigils as well as fasting and association. These are historical causal claims within Burton's argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nonnulli ob longas inedias, studia & meditationes cœlestes, de rebus sacris & religione semper agitant, &c. Many (saith P. Forestus) through long fasting, serious meditations of heavenly things, fall into such fits;	Some, because of prolonged fasting, study and heavenly meditations, continually occupy their minds with sacred matters and religion, and so on. Many, says Pieter van Foreest, fall into such attacks through prolonged fasting and intense meditation on heavenly things;[12927]
and as Lemnius adds, lib. 4. cap. 21. [12928]If they be solitary given, superstitious, precise, or very devout: seldome shall you finde a Merchant, a Souldier, an Inn-keeper, a Bawd, an Host, an Usurer so troubled in minde, they have cheverel consciences that will stretch, they are seldome moved in this kinde or molested: young men and middle age are more wild, and less apprehensive; but old folks, most part, such as are timorous and religiously given.	and, as Lemnius adds in book 4, chapter 21, if they are inclined to solitude, superstitious, strict in religious observance or very devout. You will seldom find a merchant, soldier, innkeeper, procurer, host or usurer so troubled in mind: their consciences are like supple leather that stretches, and they are seldom disturbed or troubled in this way. Young and middle-aged people are wilder and less apprehensive; those affected are mostly older people, especially the timid and religiously inclined.[12929]

[12927] Editor. Forestus is Pieter van Foreest, also known as Petrus Forestus. The Latin fragment and Burton's separate English restatement are both translated. Fits means episodes or attacks of the condition.

[12928] Burton. Source page 696, x: "Solitarios & superstitiosos plerumque exagitat conscientia, non mercatores, lenones, caupones, fæneratores, &c. largiorem hi nacti sunt conscientiam. Juvenes plerumque conscientiam negligunt, senes autem, &c." "Conscience generally torments solitary and superstitious people, not merchants, procurers, innkeepers or moneylenders, and so on; these have acquired a more accommodating conscience. Young people generally neglect conscience, but the old," and so on.

[12929] Editor. Cheverel is soft, pliable leather, conventionally kidskin; a stretching conscience accommodates misconduct. Precise means exacting in religious observance. Lemnius's generalizations about occupations and age are retained as reported claims; apprehensive here means susceptible to apprehension or fear.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Pet. Forestus observat. lib. 10. cap. 12. de morbis cerebri, hath a fearful example of a Minister, that through precise fasting in Lent, and overmuch meditation contracted this mischief, and in the end became desperate, thought he saw divels in his chamber, and that he could not be saved; he smelled nothing, as he said, but fire and brimstone, was already in hell, and would ask them still, if they did not [12930]smel as much.	Pieter van Foreest, in his Observations, book 10, chapter 12, On Diseases of the Brain, gives a terrible example of a minister who developed this affliction through rigorous fasting during Lent and excessive meditation. Eventually he fell into despair, thought he saw devils in his room and believed that he could not be saved. He said he smelled nothing but fire and sulphur, that he was already in hell, and kept asking the others whether they smelled it too.[12931]
Source page 696–697 I told him he was melancholy; but he laughed me to scorn, and replied that he saw divels, talked with them in good earnest, would spit in my face, and ask me if I did not smel brimstone, but at last he was by him cured.	I told him he was melancholy, but he laughed me to scorn and replied that he saw devils and really talked with them. He would spit in my face and ask whether I did not smell sulphur. Yet at last he was cured by Foreest.[12932]
Source page 697 Such another story I finde in Plater observat. lib. 1. A poor fellow had done some foul offence, and for fourteen dayes would eat no meat, in the end became desperate, the Divines about him could not ease him, [12933]but so he died.	I find another such story in Platter's Observations, book 1. A poor man had committed some grave offence and would eat nothing for fourteen days. He eventually fell into despair; the theologians attending him could not relieve him, and in that condition he died.[12934]

[12930] Burton. Source page 696, y: "Annon sentis sulphur inquit?" "Do you not smell sulphur? he asks."

[12931] Editor. Brimstone is sulphur. The minister's perceptions and belief that he was damned are reported symptoms in the anecdote. The printed Foreest locator is retained pending edition-level collation.

[12932] Editor. The first-person I belongs to the physician's quoted account, not to a claim that Burton treated this man. Burton then shifts back to he was by him cured; the translation names Foreest to make that reference clear.

[12933] Burton. Source page 697, z: "Desperabundus miserè periit." "In despair, he died miserably."

[12934] Editor. Meat means food generally. Divines are theologians or clergy. The fourteen-day refusal of food and death are retained as details of Burton's reported case; his source is not independently verified here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Continual meditation of Gods judgements troubles many, Multi ob timorem futuri judicii, saith Guatinerius cap. 5. tract. 15. & suspitionem desperabundi sunt: David himself complains that Gods judgements terrified his Soul, Psal. 119. part. 16. vers. 8. My flesh trembleth for fear of thee, and I am affraid of thy judgements.	Continual meditation on God's judgements troubles many. Many fall into despair through fear and apprehension of the coming judgement, says Guaineri, chapter 5, treatise 15. David himself complains that God's judgements terrified his soul: Psalm 119, part 16, verse 8: My flesh trembles for fear of you, and I am afraid of your judgements.[12935]
Quoties diem illum cogito (saith [12936]Hierome) toto corpore contremisco, I tremble as often as I think of it.	Whenever I think of that day, says Jerome, my whole body trembles: I tremble whenever I think of it.[12937]
The terrible meditation of hell-fire and eternal punishment much torments a sinfull silly soul. What's a thousand years to eternity? Ubi mœror, ubi fletus, ubi dolor sempiternus. Mors sine morte, finis sine fine; a finger burnt by chance we may not endure, the pain is so grievous, we may not abide an hour, a night is intolerable; and what shall this unspeakable fire then be that burns for ever, innumerable infinite millions of years, in omne ævum, in æternum. O eternity!	The terrible contemplation of hellfire and eternal punishment greatly torments a poor sinful soul. What is a thousand years beside eternity? Where there is sorrow, where there is weeping, where there is everlasting pain. Death without death, an end without end. We can scarcely endure an accidentally burned finger: the pain is so grievous that an hour is more than we can bear, a night intolerable. What, then, must that indescribable fire be, burning for ever, for countless, infinite millions of years, through every age, for eternity? O eternity![12938]

[12935] Editor. Guatinerius is Antonio Guaineri. The printed Psalm locator, part 16, verse 8, does not match the quotation in the usual eight-verse divisions of Psalm 119: the words are at verse 120, the eighth verse of its fifteenth division. The source's locator remains in the text.

[12936] Burton. Source page 697, a: "In 17. Johannis. Non pauci se cruciant, & excarnificant in tantum, ut non parum absint ab insania; necq; tamen aliud hac mentis anxietate efficiunt, quam ut diabolo potestatem faciant ipsos per desperationem ad inferos producendi." "On John 17. Many torment and lacerate themselves so much that they are not far from madness; yet by this mental anguish they achieve nothing except to give the devil power to lead them to hell through despair."

[12937] Editor. The body attributes the trembling saying to Jerome; the attached margin begins On John 17 and proceeds with a longer statement about self-torment. The relationship between that locator, the body quotation and the marginal extract remains unresolved. Both are retained without a conjectural reassignment.

[12938] Editor. Silly here means poor, pitiable or helpless. The paradoxes death without death and end without end describe punishment with no release in Burton's theological rhetoric. The Latin and the English surrounding it are all retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12939]Æternitas est illa vox, Vox illa fulminatrix, Tonitruis minacior, Fragoribusq; cœli, Æternitas est illa vox, —— meta carens & ortu, &c.	Eternity is that word, That word that hurls the thunderbolt, More threatening than thunder, Than the crashes of the heavens. Eternity is that word, —— without end or beginning, and so on.[12940]
Tormenta nulla territant, Quæ finiuntur annis; Æternitas, æternitas Versat coquitq; pectus. Auget hæc pœnas indies, Centuplicatq; flammas, &c.	No torments terrify That end after a span of years; Eternity, eternity Wrings and burns the heart. It increases punishments day by day And multiplies the flames a hundredfold, and so on.
This meditation terrifies these poor distressed souls, especially if their bodies be predisposed by melancholy, they religiously given, and have tender consciences; every small object affrights them, the very inconsiderate reading of Scripture it self, and mis-interpretation of some places of it, as,	This meditation terrifies these poor distressed souls, especially if melancholy has predisposed their bodies and they are religiously inclined, with sensitive consciences. Every small thing frightens them—even an unreflective reading of Scripture itself, and misinterpretation of particular passages, such as these:[12941]
Many are called, few are chosen. Not every one that saith Lord. Fear not little flock. He that stands, let him take heed lest he fall. Work out your salvation with fear and trembling. That night two shall be in a bed, one received, the other left. Straight is the way that leads to heaven, and few there are that enter therein.	Many are called, but few are chosen. Not everyone who says Lord. Do not fear, little flock. Let anyone who stands take care lest he fall. Work out your salvation with fear and trembling. That night two will be in one bed: one taken, the other left. Narrow is the way that leads to heaven, and few enter it.[12942]

[12939] Burton. Source page 697, star: “Drexelius Nicet.lib.2.cap.11.” “Drexelius, Nicetas, book 2, chapter 11.”

[12940] Editor. Drexelius is Jeremias Drexel. Burton cites Nicetas, book 2, chapter 11. The two six-line columns in the scan are read consecutively as two verse units. The omission mark and both and so on endings remain. Exact wording and transmission of the poem await collation with Drexel’s edition.

[12941] Editor. Inconsiderate means unreflective or insufficiently considered. Burton’s point is that reading without judgement and misinterpreting individual passages can intensify distress in susceptible readers.

[12942] Editor. The sequence draws on Matthew 22:14; Matthew 7:21; Luke 12:32; 1 Corinthians 10:12; Philippians 2:12; Luke 17:34; and Matthew 7:14. Burton shortens and combines scriptural wording. Straight is rendered narrow in the context of the last allusion; Fear not little flock is itself consolatory.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The parable of the seed and of the sower, some fell on barren ground, some was choaked. Whom he hath predestinated he hath chosen. He will have mercy on whom he will have mercy. Non est volentis nec currentis, sed miserentis Dei.	The parable of the seed and the sower: some fell on barren ground; some was choked. Those whom he has predestined, he has chosen. He will have mercy on whom he will have mercy. It depends neither on the one who wills nor on the one who runs, but on God who shows mercy.[12943]

[12943] Editor. The sower recalls Matthew 13. The predestination sentence compresses Romans 8:29–30 without reproducing its sequence exactly. Mercy recalls Romans 9:15 and 18; the Latin is Romans 9:16. Burton's selections are preserved as his wording, not replaced with a modern Bible translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
These and the like places terrifie the souls of many; election, predestination, reprobation, preposterously conceived offend divers, with a deal of foolish presumption, curiosity, needless speculation, contemplation, sollicitude, wherein they trouble and pusle themselves about those questions of grace, free-will, perseverance, Gods secrets; they will know more than is revealed by God in his word, humane capacity, or ignorance can apprehend, and so importunate enquiry after that which is revealed;	These and similar passages terrify many souls. Misconceived ideas of election, predestination and reprobation distress many people, together with much foolish presumption, curiosity, needless speculation, contemplation and anxiety. They torment and bewilder themselves over questions of grace, free will, perseverance and God's secrets. They insist on knowing more than God has revealed in his word, more than human capacity—or human ignorance—can grasp; and then comes their relentless inquiry into what has been revealed:[12944]
Source page 697–698 mysteries, ceremonies observation of Sabbaths, laws, duties, &c. with many such which the Casuists discuss, and Schoolmen broach, which divers mistake, misconstrue, misapply to themselves, to their own undoing, and so fall into this gulf. They doubt of their Election, how they shall know it, by what signs. And so far forth, saith Luther, with such nice points, torture and crucifie themselves, that they are almost mad, and all they get by it is this, they lay open a gap to the Divel by Desperation to carry them to hell;	mysteries, ceremonies, Sabbath observance, laws, duties and the like, with many similar matters debated by casuists and raised by scholastic theologians. Many misunderstand and misconstrue them, applying them wrongly to themselves, to their own undoing, and so fall into this abyss. They doubt their election: how can they know it, and by what signs? Through these subtle questions, says Luther, they torture and crucify themselves until they are almost mad. All they gain is to open a breach through which the devil can carry them to hell by means of despair;[12945]

[12944] Editor. Election and predestination concern divine choosing and appointment; reprobation concerns rejection. Offend means distress or cause to stumble. Perseverance here is continuance in saving faith. Burton criticizes intrusive speculation, not only ignorance.

[12945] Editor. Casuists discuss cases of conscience; Schoolmen are scholastic theologians. Nice means subtle or over-refined. The Luther attribution lacks a precise locator and remains for collation; its thought also resembles the earlier long marginal warning attached to the Jerome passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 698 but the greatest harm of all proceeds from those thundering Ministers, a most frequent cause they are of this malady: [12946]and do more harm in the Church (saith Erasmus) then they that flatter; great danger on both sides, the one lulls them asleep in carnal security, the other drives them to despaire.	but the greatest harm of all comes from those thundering ministers, a very frequent cause of this affliction. They do more harm in the Church, says Erasmus, than those who flatter. There is great danger on both sides: one lulls people to sleep in worldly complacency; the other drives them to despair.[12947]
Whereas [12948]S. Bernard well adviseth, We should not meddle with the one without the other, nor speak of judgement without mercy; the one alone brings Desperation, the other security.	Saint Bernard, however, wisely advises that we should not handle one without the other, or speak of judgement without mercy: one alone brings despair, the other complacency.[12949]
But these men are wholly for judgement, of a rigid disposition themselves, there is no mercy with them, no salvation, no balsome for their diseased souls, they can speak of nothing but reprobation, hell fire, and damnation, as they did Luke 11. 46. lade men with burdens grievous to be born, which they themselves touch not with a finger.	But these men are wholly devoted to judgement. Harsh by disposition, they offer no mercy, no salvation, no balm for afflicted souls. They can speak of nothing but reprobation, hellfire and damnation, loading people with burdens hard to bear, as in Luke 11:46, while refusing to touch those burdens with a finger themselves.[12950]

[12946] Burton. Source page 698, b: “Ecclesiast.l.1. Haud scio an majus discrimen ab his qui blandiuntur, an ab his qui territant; ingens utrinq; periculum: alii ad securitatem ducant, alii afflictionum magnitudine mentem absorbent, & in desperationem trahunt.” “Ecclesiastes, book 1. I do not know whether there is greater danger from those who flatter or those who terrify; the danger is great on either side. Some lead to complacency; others overwhelm the mind with the magnitude of afflictions and drag it into despair.”

[12947] Editor. Erasmus’s marginal title Ecclesiastes refers to his work on preaching, not the biblical book. The Latin asks which extreme is more dangerous, while Burton’s English makes the stronger comparative claim that terrifying preachers do more harm. That difference is retained.

[12948] Burton. Source page 698, c: “Bern. sup.16. Cant.1. alterum sine altero proferre non expedit: recordatio solius judicii in desperationem præcipitat, & misericordiæ fallax ostentatio pessimam generat securitatem.” “Bernard, on the Song, 16, 1. It is not fitting to set forth one without the other: remembrance of judgement alone plunges into despair, and a misleading display of mercy breeds the worst complacency.”

[12949] Editor. Security here means an unwarranted sense of spiritual safety. Bernard is Bernard of Clairvaux. Burton’s compressed marginal locator and quotation are retained pending verification against the relevant sermon on the Song of Songs.

[12950] Editor. The allusion is to Luke 11:46. Balsome means balm or soothing treatment. The medical metaphor applies to pastoral care of afflicted consciences.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis familiar with our Papists to terrifie mens souls with purgatory, tales, visions, apparitions, to daunt even the most generous spirits, to [12951]require charity, as Brentius observes, of others, bounty, meekness, love, patience, when they themselves breath nought but lust, envy, covetousness.	Our Papists commonly terrify people's souls with purgatory, tales, visions and apparitions, dismaying even the noblest spirits, and require charity, generosity, meekness, love and patience from others, as Brenz observes, while breathing nothing but lust, envy and greed themselves.[12952]
They teach others to fast, give alms, do penance, and crucifie their minde with superstitious observations, bread and water, hair-clothes, whips, and the like, when they themselves have all the dainties the world can afford, lie on a down bed with a Curtezan in their armes: Heu quantum patimur pro Christo, as [12953]he said, what a cruel tyranny is this, so to insult over and terrifie mens souls!	They teach others to fast, give alms, do penance and torment their minds with superstitious observances—bread and water, hair shirts, whips and the like—while enjoying every delicacy the world can offer and lying on feather beds with courtesans in their arms. Alas, how much we suffer for Christ! as one of them said. What cruel tyranny this is, to domineer over people's souls and terrify them![12954]
Our indiscreet Pastors many of them come not far behind, whilest in their ordinary Sermons they speak so much of election, predestination, reprobation ab æterno, subtraction of grace, prætерition, voluntary permission, &c. by what signs and tokens they shall discern and try themselves, whether they be Gods true children elect, an sint reprobi, prædestinati, &c.	Many of our own indiscreet pastors are not far behind. In their ordinary sermons they dwell on election, predestination, reprobation from eternity, the withdrawal of grace, being passed over, deliberate divine permission and so on; on the signs by which people should examine and test themselves to discover whether they are God's true, elect children, whether they are reprobate or predestined, and so on.[12955]

[12951] Burton. Source page 698, d: "In Luc.hom.103. exigunt ab aliis charitatem, beneficentiam, cum ipsi nil spectent præter libidinem, invidiam, avaritiam." "On Luke, homily 103. They demand charity and generosity from others, while attending to nothing themselves but lust, envy and greed."

[12952] Editor. Papists is Burton's polemical designation for Roman Catholics; this paragraph makes accusations, not a neutral statement of Catholic teaching or universal clerical conduct. Brentius is Johannes Brenz; the quoted homily remains for collation.

[12953] Burton. Source page 698, e: "Leo decimus." "Leo the Tenth."

[12954] Editor. Hair-clothes are penitential hair shirts. The margin attributes the sarcastic Latin saying to Pope Leo X, but supplies no corroborating source. It is preserved as an attributed anecdote, not an authenticated quotation.

[12955] Editor. Our own pastors brings the criticism home to Burton's Protestant setting. Prætерition is God's passing over those not elected to salvation. Voluntary permission means divine allowance rather than direct production of an event; the precise doctrinal distinctions depend on the theologian being discussed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
with such scrupulous points, they still aggravate sin, thunder out Gods judgements without respect, intempestively rail at and pronounce them damned in all auditories, for giving so much to sports and honest recreations, making every smal fault and thing indifferent an irremissible offence, they so rent, tear and wound mens consciences, that they are almost mad, and at their wits ends.	Through these scrupulous questions they continually magnify sin and thunder out God's judgements without discrimination. They rail at people at ill-chosen times and pronounce them damned before every congregation for devoting so much time to sports and innocent recreation. Making every small fault, and every morally indifferent matter, an unforgivable offence, they rend, tear and wound people's consciences until they are almost mad and at their wits' end.[12956]
These bitter potions (saith [12957]Erasmus) are still in their mouths, nothing but gall and horror, and a mad noyse, they make all their auditors desperate:	These bitter potions, says Erasmus, are always in their mouths: nothing but gall, horror and a frenzied clamour. They drive all their hearers to despair.[12958]
many are wounded by this means, and they commonly that are most devout and precise, have been formerly presumptuous, and certain of their salvation; they that have tender consciences, that follow sermons, frequent lectures, that have indeed least cause, they are most apt to mistake, and fall into these miseries.	Many are wounded in this way, commonly those who are most devout and strict in religious observance, who were formerly presumptuous and certain of their salvation. Those with sensitive consciences, who attend sermons and frequent religious lectures, and who in fact have least cause for alarm, are most liable to misunderstand and fall into these miseries.[12959]

[12956] Editor. Without respect means without regard to differences of circumstance; intempestively means at an unsuitable time. Things indifferent are acts not inherently commanded or forbidden on moral or religious grounds. The passage defends innocent recreation against indiscriminate condemnation.

[12957] Burton. Source page 698, f: "De futuro judicio, de damnatione horrendum crepant, & amaras illas potiones in ore semper habent, ut multos inde in desperationem cogant." "They thunder terribly about the coming judgement and damnation, and always have those bitter potions in their mouths, so that they drive many into despair."

[12958] Editor. Auditors are hearers. The Latin marginal passage says many are driven into despair; Burton's English intensifies this to all their auditors. Both versions remain.

[12959] Editor. Precise again means strict in religious practice. Lectures here are religious addresses. Burton emphasizes that the people most alarmed may be those with least reason for such fear.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I have heard some complain of Parsons Resolution, and other books of like nature (good otherwise) they are too tragical, too much dejecting men, aggravating offences; great care and choice, much discretion is required in this kinde.	I have heard some complain that Parsons's Resolution and other books of that kind, otherwise good, are too grim: they cast people down too much and magnify their offences. Great care in selection, and much discretion, are needed in such matters.[12960]
Source page 698–699 The last and greatest cause of this malady, is our own conscience, sense of our sins, and Gods anger justly deserved, a guilty conscience for some foul offence formerly committed,	The last and greatest cause of this affliction is our own conscience: awareness of our sins and of God's justly deserved anger, a guilty conscience over some grave offence committed in the past,[12961]
Source page 699 [12962]—— O miser Oreste, quid morbi te perdit? Or: Conscientia, Sum enim mihi conscius de malis perpetratis.	—— Poor Orestes, what sickness is destroying you? Orestes: Conscience, for I know the wrongs I have committed.[12963]
A good conscience is a continual feast, but a galled conscience is as great a torment as can possibly happen, a still baking oven, (so Pierius in his Hieroglyph. compares it) another hell.	A good conscience is a continual feast, but a wounded conscience is as great a torment as one can suffer: an oven that never stops baking, as Pierius compares it in his Hieroglyphics— another hell.[12964]

[12960] Editor. Parsons is Robert Persons, also known as Parsons. Resolution is Burton's short title for a work of religious guidance; the particular edition and its relation to later adaptations remain to be established. Tragical means excessively fearful or distressing in tone. Burton expressly calls such books otherwise good.

[12961] Editor. The sentence states Burton's account of guilt within his theological framework. It begins on printed page 698 and continues on 699; the page turn is not a break in the argument.

[12962] Burton. Source page 699, dagger: "Euripides." "Euripides."

[12963] Editor. A Latin rendering of the exchange between Menelaus and Orestes in Euripides, Orestes 395–396. Menelaus asks what sickness destroys him; Orestes answers with his awareness of wrongdoing. Or is the speaker abbreviation. The printed two-line arrangement is preserved.

[12964] Editor. A good conscience is a continual feast adapts the proverbial thought of Proverbs 15:15, which speaks of a merry heart. Galled means sore or wounded; still means continually. Pierius is Pierio Valeriano; the oven and mill references await precise location in his Hieroglyphica.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Our conscience, which is a great ledgier book, wherein are written all our offences, a register to lay them up, (which those [12965]Ægyptians in their Hieroglyphicks expressed by a mill, as well for the continuance, as for the torture of it) grinds our souls with the remembrance of some precedent sins, makes us reflect upon, accuse and condemn our own selves. [12966]Sin lies at door, &c.	Our conscience is a great ledger in which all our offences are written, a register preserving them. The Egyptians represented it in their hieroglyphics by a mill, both for its ceaseless working and for its torment. It grinds our souls with the memory of past sins, making us turn upon ourselves, accuse ourselves and condemn ourselves. Sin lies at the door, and so on.[12967]
I know there be many other causes assigned by Zanchius, [12968]Musculus, and the rest; as incredulity, infidelity, presumption, ignorance, blindness, ingratitude, discontent, those five grand miseries in Aristotle, Ignominy, need, sickness, enmity, death, &c. but this of conscience is the greatest, [12969]Instar ulceris corpus jugiter percellens:	I know that Zanchi, Musculus and the others assign many further causes: doubt, unbelief, presumption, ignorance, blindness, ingratitude, discontent, and those five great miseries in Aristotle—disgrace, poverty, sickness, enmity and death—and so on. But this cause, conscience, is the greatest, like an ulcer continually afflicting the body:[12970]

[12965] Burton. Source page 699, g: “Pierius.” “Pierius.”

[12966] Burton. Source page 699, h: “Gen 4.” “Genesis 4.”

[12967] Editor. The marginal biblical reference is Genesis 4:7. The Egyptian mill is transmitted through Pierius’s emblematic interpretation, not presented here as an independently established reading of Egyptian writing. Ledgier means ledger.

[12968] Burton. Source page 699, i: “9. Causes Musculus makes.”

[12969] Burton. Source page 699, k: “Plutarch.”

[12970] Editor. The list of five miseries is broadly paralleled in Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 3.6, where fear concerns disgrace, poverty, illness, friendlessness and death; Burton has enmity. The ulcer comparison is paralleled in Plutarch, On Tranquillity of Mind 19, 476F, where consciousness of wrongdoing continually wounds the soul. Exact Latin transmission remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This scrupulous conscience (as [12971]Peter Forestus calls it) which tortures so many, that either out of a deep apprehension of their unworthiness, and consideration of their own dissolute life, accuse themselves and aggravate every small offence, when there is no such cause, misdoubting in the mean time Gods mercies, they fall into these inconveniences.	this scrupulous conscience, as Pieter van Foreest calls it, which tortures so many. From a deep sense of their unworthiness or reflection on their own dissolute lives, they accuse themselves and magnify every small offence, even when there is no such cause. Meanwhile doubting God's mercy, they fall into these troubles.[12972]
The Poets call them [12973]Furies, Diræ, but it is the conscience alone which is a thousand witnesses to accuse us,	The poets call them Furies, the Dread Ones; but it is conscience alone that supplies a thousand witnesses against us,[12974]
[12975]Nocte dieq; suum gestant in pectore testem.	Night and day they carry their own witness in their breast.[12976]
A continual testor to give in evidence; to empanel a Jury to examine us, to cry guilty, a persecutor with hue and cry to follow, an apparitor to summon us, a bayliffe to carry us, a Serjeant to arrest, an Attourney to plead against us, a gaolour to torment, a Judge to condemn, still accusing, denouncing, torturing and molesting.	It is an unceasing witness giving evidence, empanelling a jury to examine us and pronounce us guilty; a pursuer following with hue and cry, a court officer summoning us, a bailiff carrying us off, a sergeant arresting us, a lawyer pleading against us, a jailer tormenting us and a judge condemning us—continually accusing, denouncing, torturing and harassing.[12977]

[12971] Burton. Source page 699, l: "Alios miserè castigat plena scrupulis conscientia, nodum in scirpo quærunt, & ubi nulla causa subest misericordiæ divinæ diffidentes, se orco destinant." "A conscience full of scruples torments others miserably: they look for a knot in a bulrush, and where there is no cause, distrusting divine mercy, they consign themselves to hell."

[12972] Editor. The proverbial knot in a bulrush means finding a difficulty where none exists. Inconveniences are harmful troubles. The distinction between actual misconduct and unfounded self-accusation remains explicit in the text and margin.

[12973] Burton. Source page 699, m: "Cœlius lib 6." "Caelius, book 6."

[12974] Editor. Diræ is a Latin name for the Furies, rendered the Dread Ones. Burton gives the conscience itself the role assigned to avenging spirits in poetry. The brief Caelius citation remains for fuller identification.

[12975] Burton. Source page 699, first star: "Juvenal."

[12976] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 13.198. Burton changes the infinitive gestare, to carry, into gestant, they carry. The altered Latin and corresponding translation remain.

[12977] Editor. Testor is a witness. Hue and cry is a public pursuit of an offender; an apparitor serves a court's summons. The accumulating legal offices turn conscience into the entire apparatus of prosecution and punishment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as the statue of Juno in that holy city neer Euphrates in [12978]Assyria will look still towards you, sit where you will in her temple, she stares full upon you, if you go by, she follows with her eye, in all sites, places, conventicles, actions, our conscience will be still ready to accuse us.	And just as the statue of Juno in that sacred city near the Euphrates in Assyria always looks towards you—sit wherever you like in her temple, she stares directly at you; pass by, and her gaze follows—so in every position, place, gathering and action, our conscience will always be ready to accuse us.[12979]
After many pleasant daies, and fortunate adventures, merry tides; this conscience at last doth arrest us. Well he may escape temporal punishment, [12980]bribe a corrupt judge, and avoid the censure of law, and flourish for a time;	After many pleasant days, fortunate ventures and merry seasons, conscience finally arrests us. A person may indeed escape punishment in this world, bribe a corrupt judge, evade the sentence of the law and flourish for a time;[12981] for [12982]who ever saw (saith Chrysostome) a covetous man troubled in minde when he is telling of his money, an adulterer mourn with his mistris in his arms? we are then drunk with pleasure, and perceive nothing:	for who ever saw, says Chrysostom, a greedy man troubled in mind while counting his money, or an adulterer grieving with his mistress in his arms? At such times we are drunk with pleasure and notice nothing:[12983]

[12978] Burton. Source page 699, second star: “Lucian de dea Syria. Si adstiteris, te aspicit: si transeas, visu te sequitur.” “Lucian, On the Syrian Goddess. If you stand before her, she looks at you; if you pass by, she follows you with her gaze.”

[12979] Editor. Lucian, On the Syrian Goddess 32, describes the gaze of Hera’s statue at the sacred city; Juno is her Roman equivalent. Burton uses the image as a comparison, not as evidence that the statue literally moved. Conventicles means gatherings here.

[12980] Burton. Source page 699, n: “Prima hæc est ultio, quod se Judice nemo nocens absolvitur, improba quamvis gratia fallacis prætoris vicerit urnam. Juvenal.” “This is the first punishment: no guilty person is acquitted in his own judgement, although corrupt influence may have prevailed over the dishonest praetor’s voting urn. Juvenal.”

[12981] Editor. Temporal means belonging to this world. The marginal quotation adapts Juvenal, Satire 13.2–4, where guilty people cannot acquit themselves even if corrupt influence has secured a favourable legal result. Burton’s altered word order and fallacis reading are retained.

[12982] Burton. Source page 699, o: “Quis unquam vidit avarum ringi, dum lucrum adest, adulterum dum potitur voto, lugere in perpetrando scelere? voluptate sumus ebrii, proinde non sentimus, &c.” “Who ever saw a greedy man fret while profit was coming in, or an adulterer, while enjoying his desire, grieve in committing the crime? We are drunk with pleasure and therefore feel nothing,” and so on.

[12983] Editor. Telling means counting. Chrysostom is cited without a work or locator; the attribution remains for collation. The body and marginal Latin express related examples in different wording.

Original text 1651	Modern English
yet as the prodigal Son had dainty fare, sweet musick at first, merry company, jovial entertainment, but a cruel reckoning in the end, as bitter as wormwood, a fearful visitation commonly follows. And the divel that then told thee that it was a light sin, or no sin at all, now aggravates on the other side, and telleth thee, that it is a most irremissible offence, as he did by Cain and Judas, to bring them to despaire;	yet, as the prodigal son at first had fine food, sweet music, merry company and jovial entertainment, but a cruel reckoning in the end, bitter as wormwood, a dreadful visitation commonly follows. The devil who then told you that it was a slight sin, or no sin at all, now magnifies it in the opposite direction and tells you it is an utterly unforgivable offence, as he did with Cain and Judas, to bring them to despair;[12984]
Source page 699–700 every small circumstance before neglected and contemned, will now amplifie it self, rise up in judgement and accuse, the dust of their shooes, dumb creatures, as to Lucians tyrant, lectus & candela the bed and candle did bear witness, to torment their souls for their sins past.	every small circumstance previously overlooked and despised will now magnify itself, rise in judgement and accuse them—the dust of their shoes, creatures without speech. As with Lucian's tyrant, the bed and the candle, the bed and candle bore witness, tormenting their souls for their past sins.[12985]
Source page 700 Tragical examples in this kinde are too familiar and common: Adrian, Galba, Nero, Otho, Vitellius, Caracalla, were in such horror of conscience for their offences committed, murders, rapes, extortions, injuries, that they were weary of their lives, and could get no body to kill them.	Tragic examples of this kind are all too familiar and common. Hadrian, Galba, Nero, Otho, Vitellius and Caracalla were so horrified in conscience by their crimes—murders, rapes, extortion and wrongs—that they grew weary of life and could find no one to kill them.[12986]

[12984] Editor. The prodigal son recalls Luke 15:11–32, but Burton expands the account and rearranges its imagery into a warning about later reckoning. Wormwood is proverbial bitterness; visitation means an affliction understood as divine punishment.

[12985] Editor. Lucian's Voyage to the Lower World, also called The Downward Journey or The Tyrant, section 27, brings the tyrant Megapenthes's bed and lamp forward as witnesses. Burton says candle, including in the Latin candela; both the Latin and his separate English restatement are retained. The paragraph ends on the opening line of printed page 700.

[12986] Editor. Burton groups six Roman emperors into a single moral example. His collective account should not be taken as a verified description of each emperor's death; the individual traditions require separate collation. Injuries means wrongs or injustices.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[12987]Kennetus King of Scotland, when he had murdered his Nephew Malcolme King Duffes son, Prince of Cumberland, and with counterfeit tears and protestations dissembled the matter a long time, [12988]at last his conscience accused him, his unquiet soul could not rest day or night, he was terrified with fearful dreams, visions, and so miserably tormented all his life.	Kenneth, King of Scotland, after murdering his nephew Malcolm, King Duff's son and Prince of Cumberland, concealed the matter for a long time with false tears and solemn declarations. At last his conscience accused him. His troubled soul could find no rest by day or night; terrifying dreams and visions frightened him, and he was miserably tormented throughout his life.[12989]
It is strange to read what [12990]Cominæus hath written of Lewes the 11. that French King, of Charles the 8. of Alphonsus King of Naples, in the fury of his passion how he came into Sicily, and what pranks he plaid.	It is extraordinary to read what Commynes writes of Louis XI, that French king; of Charles VIII; and of Alfonso, King of Naples—how, in the frenzy of his passion, he came to Sicily, and what wild acts he committed.[12991]
Guicciardine a man most unapt to believe lyes, relates how that Ferdinand his fathers ghost who before had died for grief, came and told him, that he could not resist the French King, he thought every man cried France, France;	Guicciardini, a man very unlikely to believe falsehoods, relates how the ghost of his father Ferdinand, who had earlier died of grief, came and told him that he could not resist the French king. He thought everyone was crying, France, France![12992]

[12987] Burton. Source page 700, a: "Puchanan. lib. 6. Hist. Scot." "Buchanan, Scottish History, book 6."

[12988] Burton. Source page 700, b: "Animus conscientia sceleris inquietus nullum admisit gaudium, sed semper vexatus noctu & interdiu per somnium visis horrore pœnis perterrefactus, &c." "His mind, troubled by consciousness of his crime, admitted no joy, but was continually harassed, terrified by day and night by dream-visions full of horror," and so on.

[12989] Editor. The margin prints Puchanan for George Buchanan's Scottish history, book 6. Its faint word after horrore is provisionally read pœnis; the translation tentatively takes the intended reading as plenis, full of. This reading requires collation. The names, kinship and narrative are preserved as Burton transmits them; they remain to be checked against Buchanan and the historical succession. Protestations are solemn declarations, not public demonstrations.

[12990] Burton. Source page 700, p: "De bello Neapol." "On the Neapolitan War."

[12991] Editor. Cominæus is Philippe de Commynes. The final clause concerns Alfonso of Naples. Pranks here means wild or extravagant acts; the exact passages and Burton's relation to their wording remain for collation.

[12992] Editor. Burton treats the chronicler's reputation as support for the apparition story. The supernatural event remains an attributed report. His father and him refer to Ferdinand and Alfonso respectively; the precise transmission through Guicciardini and Commynes remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
the reason of it (saith Cominæus) was because he was a vile tyrant, a murderer, an oppressour of his subjects, he bought up all commodities, and sold them at his own price, sold Abbies to Jews and Falkoners; both Ferdinand his father, and he himself, never made conscience of any committed sin; and to conclude saith he, it was impossible to do worse then they did.	The reason, says Commynes, was that he was a vile tyrant, a murderer and an oppressor of his subjects. He bought up all goods and sold them at prices he set himself; he sold abbeys to Jews and falconers. Neither his father Ferdinand nor he himself ever felt any scruple about a sin they committed. In conclusion, he says, it was impossible to act worse than they did.[12993]
Why was Pausanias the Spartan Tyrant, Nero, Otho, Galba, so persecuted with spirits in every house they came, but for their murders which they had committed? [12994]Why doth the divel haunt many mens houses after their deaths, appear to them living, and take possession of their habitations, as it were, of their palaces, but because of their several villanies?	Why were Pausanias, the Spartan tyrant, Nero, Otho and Galba so pursued by spirits in every house they entered, if not because of the murders they had committed? Why does the devil haunt many people's houses after their deaths, appear to them while they are alive and seem to take possession of their homes and palaces, if not because of their various crimes?[12995]
why had Richard the 3 such fearful dreams, saith Polydor, but for his frequent murders? Why was Herod so tortured in his mind? because he had made away Mariamne his wife. Why was Theodoricus the King of the Gothes so suspicious, and so affrighted with a fish head alone, but that he had murdered Symmachus, and Boethius his son in law, those worthy Romans? Cælius lib. 27. cap. 22.	Why did Richard III have such terrifying dreams, asks Polydore, if not because of his many murders? Why was Herod so tormented in mind? Because he had killed his wife Mariamne. Why was Theodoric, King of the Goths, so suspicious and so frightened by a mere fish's head, if not because he had murdered those worthy Romans, Symmachus and his son-in-law Boethius? Caelius, book 27, chapter 22.[12996]

[12993] Editor. The accusations belong to Burton's cited account. The reference to Jews and falconers presents the disposal of ecclesiastical property as scandalous within that account; it is not an editorial judgement about those groups.

[12994] Burton. Source page 700, q: "Thireus de locis infestis, part. 1. cap. 2. Nero's mother was still in his eyes." "Thyraeus, On Haunted Places, part 1, chapter 2." Nero's mother was constantly before his eyes.

[12995] Editor. Burton's rhetorical questions assert a connection between wrongdoing and hauntings. Plutarch's On the Delay of Divine Justice relates Pausanias's killing of Cleonice and the disturbing apparition that follows; it does not establish all the claims in Burton's grouped list.

[12996] Editor. Polydor is Polydore Vergil. Procopius, Wars 5.1.32–39 (Gothic War 1.1), tells how Theodoric saw the slain Symmachus in a fish's head and regretted killing him and Boethius, his son-in-law. This earlier narrative was compared in Dewing's English translation; it does not verify the events or Burton's immediate source. The printed Caelius locator is book 27, not the OCR's book 7; that passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
See more in Plutarch, in his tract De his qui sero a Numine puniuntur, and in his book De tranquillitate animi, &c. Yea, and sometimes GOD himself hath a hand in it, to shew his power, humiliate, exercise, and to try their faith, (divine temptation Perkins cals it, Cas. cons. lib. 1. cap. 8. sect. 1.) to punish them for their sins.	See further examples in Plutarch's treatise On Those Who Are Punished Late by Divine Power, and in his book On Tranquillity of Mind, and so on. Indeed, sometimes God himself has a hand in it: to show his power, humble and discipline them, test their faith—Perkins calls it divine testing in his Cases of Conscience, book 1, chapter 8, section 1—and punish them for their sins.[12997]
God the avenger, as [12998]David terms him, ultor a tergo Deus, his wrath is apprehended of a guilty soul, as by Saul and Judas, which the Poets expressed by Adrastia, or Nemesis:	God the avenger, as David calls him—God pursuing from behind in vengeance: a guilty soul feels his wrath, as Saul and Judas did. The poets expressed this through Adrastia, or Nemesis:[12999]
Assequitur Nemesisq; virûm vestigia servat, Ne malè quid facias. ———	Nemesis follows and watches people's footsteps, So that you do no wrong. ———[13000]

[12997] Editor. The first Plutarch title is commonly rendered On the Delay of Divine Justice. Exercise means discipline or put through trials. Perkins, Cases of Conscience (1606), I.8, opening and section 1, p. 106 onward, describes divine temptation as conflict with God, experienced as signs of wrath; Job and David exemplify it. Burton's term thus concerns trial of faith, distinct from enticement to wrongdoing. His edition remains unidentified.

[12998] Burton. Source page 700, r: "Psal. 44. 1." "Psalm 44:1."

[12999] Editor. The margin prints Psalm 44:1; the corresponding appeal to the God of vengeance is Psalm 94:1. The Latin phrase also occurs in Seneca, Hercules Furens 385, concerning a god pursuing the proud. Burton places the classical phrase beside the biblical one. Both printed locator and wording are retained. Adrastia and Nemesis name the personification of retribution.

[13000] Editor. The lines adapt Andrea Alciato's emblem Nec verbo nec facto quenquam lædendum, numbered 27 in Mason Tung's variorum. Burton joins material from its first and third lines, omitting the intervening line and ending early. His two-line arrangement and omission mark are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And she is, as [13001]Ammianus lib. 14. describes her, the Queen of causes, and moderator of things, now she puls down the proud, now she rears and encourageth those that are good; he gives instance in his Eusebius; Nicephorus lib. 10. cap. 35. eccles. hist. in Maximinus and Julian.	As Ammianus describes her in book 14, she is the queen of causes and the governor of events: now she pulls down the proud, now she raises and encourages the good. He gives Eusebius as an example; Nicephorus, in his Ecclesiastical History, book 10, chapter 35, gives Maximinus and Julian.[13002]
Source page 700–701 Fearful examples of Gods just judgement, wrath and vengeance, are to be found in all histories, of some that have been eaten to death with Rats and Mice, as [13003]Popelius the second King of Poland, ann. 830. his wife and children; the like story is of Hatto Archbishop of Mentz, Ann. 969, so devoured by these vermine,	Terrifying examples of God's just judgement, wrath and vengeance appear throughout histories: some people were eaten alive by rats and mice, such as Popiel II, King of Poland, in the year 830, with his wife and children. A similar story is told of Hatto, Archbishop of Mainz, in 969, likewise devoured by these vermin,[13004]
Source page 701 which howsoever Serrarius the Jesuite Mogunt. rerum lib. 4. cap. 5. impugne by 22 arguments, Tritemius, [13005]Munster, Magdeburgenses, and many others relate for a truth. Such another example I finde in Geraldus Cambrensis Itin. Cam. lib. 2. cap. 2. and where not?	a story which, although the Jesuit Serarius disputes it with twenty-two arguments in his History of Mainz, book 4, chapter 5, Trithemius, Münster, the Magdeburg historians and many others report as true. I find another such example in Gerald of Wales's Journey through Wales, book 2, chapter 2—and where does one not?[13006]

[13001] Burton. Source page 700, s: "Regina causarum & arbitra rerum, nunc erectas cervices opprimit, &c." "Queen of causes and arbiter of events, now she presses down upraised necks," and so on.

[13002] Editor. Ammianus Marcellinus 14.11.25–26 supplies the description of Nemesis, following the fall of Gallus and the punishment of those involved. Burton's particular application to Eusebius, and the compressed Nicephorus reference, remain for fuller collation.

[13003] Burton. Source page 700, t: "Alex. Gaguinus catal. reg. Pol." "Alexander Gaguinus, Catalogue of the Kings of Poland."

[13004] Editor. These are retribution legends as Burton presents them. The dates 830 and 969 belong to his account; neither the dates nor the alleged deaths are being independently authenticated here. Mentz is Mainz.

[13005] Burton. Source page 701, u: "Cosmog. Munster. & Magde." "Münster's Cosmography and the Magdeburg historians."

[13006] Editor. Burton records disagreement within his sources. Gerald's book 2, chapter 2 tells of a young man in Cemmeis consumed by toads, then briefly mentions another man similarly pursued by rats. These are parallel tales, not independent confirmation of the Popiel or Hatto stories. Magdeburgenses refers to the Magdeburg ecclesiastical historians.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And yet for all these terrors of conscience, affrighting punishments which are so frequent, or whatsoever else may cause or aggravate this fearful malady in other religions, I see no reason at all why a Papist at any time should despaire, or be troubled for his sins; for let him be never so dissolute a catiffe, so notorious a villain, so monstrous a sinner, out of that Treasure of Indulgences and merits of which the Pope is dispensator, he may have free pardon and plenary remission of all his sins.	Yet despite all these terrors of conscience, these frequent and frightening punishments, or whatever else may cause or worsen this dreadful affliction in other religions, I see no reason at all why a Papist should ever despair or be troubled by his sins. However dissolute a wretch, notorious a villain or monstrous a sinner he may be, he can receive free pardon and complete remission of all his sins from that treasury of indulgences and merits which the pope administers.[13007]
There be so many general pardons for ages to come, 40000. years to come, so many Jubilies, so frequent gaol-deliveries out of Purgatory for all souls, now living, or after dissolution of the body, so many particular Masses daily said in several Churches, so many Altars consecrated to this purpose,	There are so many general pardons for ages to come—for forty thousand years to come—so many jubilees, such frequent releases from the prison of purgatory for all souls, whether now living or after the body's dissolution, so many particular Masses said daily in different churches, and so many altars consecrated for this purpose,[13008]
that if a man have either mony or friends, or will take any paines to come to such an Altar, hear a Mass, say so many Pater-nosters, undergo such and such penance, he cannot do amiss, it is impossible his mind should be troubled, or he have any scruple to molest him.	that if a man has money or friends, or will make the effort to visit such an altar, hear a Mass, say a prescribed number of Our Fathers and perform such and such a penance, he cannot go wrong. It is impossible for his mind to be troubled or for any scruple to disturb him.[13009]

[13007] Editor. This is Burton's sarcastic anti-Catholic argument, continuing the preceding polemic. Papist is his partisan designation. It should not be read as a neutral account of Catholic teaching: the Council of Trent's decree on indulgences, session 25, expressly calls for moderation and the abolition of financial abuses.

[13008] Editor. The forty-thousand-year claim is retained as Burton's accusation; he gives no supporting reference here. Jubilees are special religious observances associated with indulgences. Gaol-delivery is release from prison, used mockingly of purgatory.

[13009] Editor. Pater-noster is the Latin opening of the Lord's Prayer, hence the name of the prayer. Burton's repeated assertions of impossibility sustain his sarcasm; they are not clinical observations about Catholic believers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Besides that Taxa Cameræ Apostolicæ, which was first published to get money in the daies of Leo decimus that sharking Pope, and since divulged to the same ends, sets down such easie rates and dispensations for all offences, for perjury, murder, incest, adultery, &c. for so many grosses or dollers (able to invite any man to sin, and provoke him to offend, me thinks, that otherwise would not)	Besides, the Schedule of Fees of the Apostolic Chamber, first published to raise money in the days of Leo X, that grasping pope, and since circulated for the same purpose, sets such low rates and grants dispensations for every offence—perjury, murder, incest, adultery and so on—for so many grossi or dollars. It seems to me enough to invite anyone to sin and provoke someone to offend who otherwise would not.[13010]
such comfortable remission, so gentle and parable a pardon, so ready at hand, with so smal cost and suit obtained, that I cannot see how he that hath any friends amongst them (as I say) or money in his purse, or will at least to ease himself, can any way miscarry or be misaffected, how he should be desperate, in danger of damnation or troubled in minde.	Such comforting remission, so lenient and easily obtained a pardon, so ready to hand and secured at such little expense and effort—I cannot see how anyone with friends among them, as I say, or money in his purse, or at least the will to seek relief, can come to harm or become distressed; how he can despair, be in danger of damnation or be troubled in mind.[13011]
Their ghostly fathers can so readily apply remedies, so cunningly string and unstring, winde and unwinde their devotions, play upon their consciences with plausible speeches and terrible threats, for their best advantage settle and remove, erect with such facility and deject, let in and out, that I cannot perceive how any man amongst them should much or often labour of this disease, or finally miscarry. The causes above named must more frequently therefore take hold in others.	Their spiritual fathers can apply remedies so readily, so skilfully tighten and loosen the strings of their devotions, wind and unwind them, play upon their consciences with persuasive speeches and terrifying threats, settle and unsettle them to their own best advantage, raise and cast them down so easily, let them in and out, that I cannot see how anyone among them should suffer greatly or often from this disease, or finally come to ruin. The causes named above must therefore take hold more frequently in others.[13012]

[13010] Editor. Taxa Cameræ Apostolicæ is Burton's title. Berlin's Typenrepertorium records Taxae cancellariae and Taxae poenitentiariae printed by Adam Rot about 1471–1474, before Leo X; his first-publication claim therefore needs qualification. These catalogue records do not identify his edition or verify its contents and polemical use. Administrative fees must not be equated automatically with selling forgiveness. Grosses and dollers are coins; sharking means extortionate. The forty-thousand-years claim remains unverified.

[13011] Editor. Parable means obtainable or procurable, from Latin parabilis. Suit means an application or request. The rhetorical question continues the previous sentence in the original.

[13012] Editor. Ghostly fathers are spiritual advisers or confessors. The images of tuning strings and winding mechanisms portray the manipulation Burton attributes to them. His concluding comparison is polemical inference, not a supported estimate of the frequency of illness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 4.	SUBSECTION 4
Symptomes of Despaire, Fear, Sorrow, Suspition, Anxiety, Horror of conscience, fearful dreams and visions.	Symptoms of despair: fear, sorrow, suspicion, anxiety, horror of conscience, terrifying dreams and visions.
Source page 701–702 As Shoomakers do when they bring home shooes, still cry, Leather is dearer and dearer; may I justly say of those melancholy Symptomes: these of despaire are most violent, tragical and grievous; far beyond the rest, not to be expressed but negatively, as it is privation of all happiness, not to be endured; for a wounded spirit who can bear it? Prov. 18. 19.	As shoemakers, whenever they deliver shoes, keep crying that leather grows dearer and dearer, so I may justly speak of these symptoms of melancholy. Those of despair are the most violent, tragic and grievous, far beyond the rest. They can be expressed only negatively, as the loss of all happiness, and are unbearable: for who can bear a wounded spirit? Proverbs 18:19.[13013]
Source page 702 What therefore [13014]Timanthes, did in his picture of Iphigenia, now ready to be sacrificed, when he had painted Chalcas mourning, Ulysses sad, but most sorrowful Menelaus; and shewed all his art in expressing variety of affections, he covered the maids father, Agamemnons head with a vail, and left it to every spectator to conceive what he would himself; for that true passion and sorrow in summo gradu, such as his was, could not by any art be deciphered.	Consider what Timanthes did in his picture of Iphigenia about to be sacrificed. Having painted Calchas mourning, Ulysses sad and Menelaus most sorrowful of all, and displayed all his skill in expressing different emotions, he covered the head of the maiden's father, Agamemnon, with a veil and left each spectator to imagine his feelings. Such true emotion and sorrow in their highest degree, as his were, could not be portrayed by any art.[13015]

[13013] Editor. The shoemaker's ever-rising price introduces Burton's claim to an ever-higher degree of suffering. The quoted biblical verse is Proverbs 18:14, although the source prints 18:19. The printed citation remains in the text; the subsection on prognosis that follows later gives 18:14.

[13014] Burton. Source page 702, dagger: "Plinius cap. 10. l. 35. Consumptis affectibus, Agamemnonis caput velavit, ut omnes quem possent, maximum mærorem in virginis patre cogitarent." "Pliny, chapter 10, book 35. Having exhausted the emotions, he veiled Agamemnon's head, so that everyone might imagine the greatest sorrow they could in the maiden's father."

[13015] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 35.73, describes Timanthes's painting and the veiled father; the margin uses an older chapter division. Burton's Chalcas is rendered Calchas. Deciphered means depicted or represented. The example concerns the limits of representation, which Burton applies to despair.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What he did in his picture, I will do in describing the Symptomes of Despaire; imagine what thou canst, fear, sorrow, furies, grief, pain, terror, anger, dismal, gastly, tedious, irksome, &c. it is not sufficient, it comes far short, no tongue can tell, no heart conceive it. 'Tis an Epitome of hell, an extract, a quintessence, a compound, a mixture of all feral maladies, tyrannical tortures, plagues and perplexities.	What he did in his picture, I will do in describing the symptoms of despair. Imagine whatever you can: fear, sorrow, furies, grief, pain, terror, anger; all that is dismal, ghastly, wearisome and distressing. It is not enough; it falls far short. No tongue can tell it, no heart conceive it. It is hell in miniature, an extract, a pure essence, a compound, a mixture of every deadly affliction, cruel torture, plague and bewilderment.[13016]
There is no sickness almost but Physick provideth a remedy for it; to every sore, Chirurgery will provide a salve: friendship helps poverty; hope of liberty easeth imprisonment; suit and favour revoke banishment; authority and time wear away reproach: but what Physick, what Chirurgery, what wealth, favour, authority can relieve, bear out, asswage, or expel a troubled conscience? A quiet minde cureth all them, but all they cannot comfort a distressed soul: who can put to silence the voice of desperation?	There is scarcely an illness for which medicine offers no remedy; for every wound, surgery will provide a salve. Friendship helps poverty; hope of freedom eases imprisonment; petitions and influence reverse banishment; authority and time wear away disgrace. But what medicine, surgery, wealth, favour or authority can relieve, sustain, soothe or dispel a troubled conscience? A peaceful mind cures all those troubles, but all of them together cannot comfort a distressed soul. Who can silence the voice of despair?[13017]

[13016] Editor. Epitome is a condensed representation; quintessence is the purest concentrated essence. Feral means deadly or disastrous here. The accumulation of images is preserved rather than reduced to a diagnostic label.

[13017] Editor. Physick is medicine; chirurgery is surgery. Burton's absolute claims form part of this rhetorical description. They should be read alongside his later subsection on treatment, where medicine and counsel work together.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All that is single in other melancholy, Horribile, dirum, pestilens, atrox, ferum, concur in this, it is more than melancholy in the highest degree; a burning feaver of the soul; so mad, saith [13018]Jacchinus, by this misery; fear, sorrow and despair he puts for ordinary symptomes of Melancholy. They are in great pain and horror of mind, distraction of soul, restless, full of continual fears, cares, torments, anxieties, they can neither eat, drink, nor sleep for them, take no rest,	Everything found separately in other forms of melancholy—the horrible, dreadful, pestilential, cruel and savage—comes together in this. It exceeds even melancholy in its highest degree: a burning fever of the soul. They are driven mad by this misery, says Jacchinus, who lists fear, sorrow and despair among melancholy's ordinary symptoms. They suffer great mental pain and horror, disturbance of soul and restlessness, full of unceasing fears, cares, torments and anxieties. These prevent them from eating, drinking or sleeping; they find no rest,[13019]
[13020]Perpetua impietas, nec mensæ tempore cessat, Exagitat vesana quies, somniq; furentes.	Unceasing impiety does not stop even at mealtime; Frenzied rest and raging dreams torment them.[13021]
Neither at bed, nor yet at bord, Will any rest Despair afford.	Neither in bed nor at the table Will despair allow any rest.

[13018] Burton. Source page 702, x: "Cap. 15. in 9. Rhasis." "Chapter 15, on book 9 of Rhazes."

[13019] Editor. The Latin adjectives are all translated. Jacchinus is cited through his commentary on Rhazes; the compressed marginal locator is retained pending direct collation.

[13020] Burton. Source page 702, y: "Juv. Sat. 13." "Juvenal, Satire 13."

[13021] Editor. The first line adapts Juvenal, Satire 13.211, printing impietas, impiety, where the consulted Latin text has anxietas, anxiety. The second adapts Lucan, Civil War 7.764, changing quos agitat to exagitat; the marginal citation names only Juvenal. The source reading is retained and translated, rather than silently corrected. The following English couplet is Burton's separate rendering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Fear takes away their content, and dries the blood, wasteth the marrow, alters their countenance, even in their greatest delights, singing, dancing, dalliance they are still (saith [13022]Lemnius) tortured in their souls.	Fear takes away their contentment, dries their blood, wastes their marrow and changes their appearance. Even amid their greatest pleasures —singing, dancing and lovemaking—their souls remain tormented, says Lemnius.[13023]
It consumes them to nought, I am like a Pelican in the wilderness (saith David of himself, temporally afflicted) an Owle because of thine indignation. Psal. 102. vers. 8, 10. and Psal. 55. 4. My heart trembleth within me, and the terrours of death have come upon me; fear and trembling are come upon mee, &c. at deaths dore, Psal. 107. 18. Their soul abhors all manner of meats.	It consumes them entirely. I am like a pelican in the wilderness, says David of himself in temporary distress, an owl because of your indignation. Psalm 102, verses 8 and 10; and Psalm 55:4: My heart trembles within me, and the terrors of death have come upon me; fear and trembling have come upon me, and so on. At death's door, Psalm 107:18: Their soul loathes every kind of food.[13024]
[13025]Their sleep is (if it be any) unquiet, subject to fearful dreams and terrors. Peter in his bonds, slept secure, for he knew God protected him; and Tully makes it an argument of Roscius Amerinus innocency, that he killed not his father, because he so securely slept.	Their sleep, if they get any, is disturbed by terrifying dreams and fears. Peter slept peacefully in chains because he knew God protected him. Cicero likewise argues for Roscius of Ameria's innocence—that he did not kill his father—because he slept so peacefully.[13026]

[13022] Burton. Source page 702, z: "Mentem eripit timor hujus, vultum, totumque corporis habitum immutat, etiam in delitiis, in tripudiis, in symposiis, in amplexu conjugis carnificinam exercet, lib. 4, cap. 21." "Fear robs him of his mind, changes his face and the entire condition of the body; even amid pleasures, dances, banquets and a spouse's embrace, it practises torture. Book 4, chapter 21."

[13023] Editor. The bodily effects reflect the physiological account transmitted by Burton and Lemnius. Countenance is facial appearance; dalliance here is amorous intimacy. The margin names embraces with a spouse; its abbreviated hujus is expanded in transcription.

[13024] Editor. Burton combines phrases and locators. The pelican and owl occur at Psalm 102:6; wrath at 102:10. The next quotation spans Psalm 55:4–5. His printed references remain. Meats means foods generally. Temporally here indicates distress for a time.

[13025] Burton. Source page 702, a, without a matching body marker: "Non sinit conscientia tales homines recta verba proferre, aut rectis quemquam oculis aspicere, ab omni hominum cœtu eosdem exterminat, & dormientes perterrefacit. Philost. lib. 1. de vita Apollonii." "Conscience does not allow such people to speak honest words or look anyone straight in the eye; it banishes them from every human gathering and terrifies them in sleep. Philostratus, Life of Apollonius, book 1."

[13026] Editor. Peter's sleep in chains is in Acts 12:6. Tully is Cicero. In For Sextus Roscius 23.64–65, the sleeping sons are the two sons of Titus Caelius, introduced as a comparison in Roscius's defence. Burton transfers the circumstance to Roscius himself; that alteration is preserved and identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 702–703 Those Martyrs in the Primitive Church were most [13027]chearful and merry in the midst of their persecutions; but it is far otherwise with these men, tossed in a Sea, and that continually without rest or intermission, they can think of naught that is pleasant, [13028]their conscience will not let them be quiet, in perpetual fear, anxiety, if they be not yet apprehended, they are in doubt still they shall be ready to betray themselves, as Cain did, he thinks every man will kill him:	Those martyrs in the early Church were cheerful and joyful in the midst of persecution. But it is very different with these people: tossed endlessly on a sea without rest or respite, they can think of nothing pleasant. Their conscience will not let them be at peace. In perpetual fear and anxiety, if they have not yet been arrested, they constantly fear that they will be, and are ready to give themselves away. Like Cain, they think everyone will kill them:[13029]
Source page 703 And roar for the grief of heart, Psal. 38. 8. as David did, as Job did, 20. 3. 21. 22. &c. Wherefore is light given to him that is in misery, and life to them that have heavie hearts? Which long for death, and if it come not, search it more then treasures, and rejoyce when they can find the grave. They are generally weary of their lives, a trembling heart they have, a sorrowful mind, and little or no rest.	And roar from grief of heart, Psalm 38:8, as David did, and as Job did, 20.3.21.22, and so on: Why is light given to someone in misery, and life to those with heavy hearts, who long for death and, if it does not come, search for it more than for treasure, and rejoice when they can find the grave? They are generally weary of life, with trembling hearts, sorrowful minds and little or no rest.[13030]
Terror ubiq; tremor, timor undiq; & undiq; terror.	Terror and trembling everywhere, fear on every side and terror all around.[13031]

[13027] Burton. Source page 702, b: “Eusebius, Nicephorus eccles. hist. lib. 4. c. 17.” “Eusebius; Nicephorus, Ecclesiastical History, book 4, chapter 17.”

[13028] Burton. Source page 702, c: “Seneca lib. 18. epist. 106. Conscientia aliud agere non patitur, perturbatam vitam regunt, nunquam vacant, &c.” “Seneca, book 18, letter 106. Conscience does not permit them to attend to anything else; they lead a troubled life, they are never free,” and so on.

[13029] Editor. Primitive Church means the early Church. Cain’s fear is in Genesis 4:14. The sentence’s apprehended means arrested. Burton’s Seneca margin gives letter 106, but the relevant passage is Moral Letters 105.7–8; the original locator is retained. The unanchored Philostratus margin has been placed with the preceding passage on troubled sleep; its parallel is Life of Apollonius 7.14, rather than the printed book 1.

[13030] Editor. The printed Job locator is disordered. The quoted questions and longing correspond to Job 3:20–22. Burton’s sequence of numbers remains in both columns, with the correct location supplied here.

[13031] Editor. The Latin line’s repeated sounds and words reinforce the sense of inescapable fear. Its exact source remains unlocated. Burton follows it with an English restatement, which is retained separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Fears, terrors, and affrights in all places, at all times and seasons. Cibum & potum pertinaciter aversantur multi, nodum in scirpo quæritantes, & culpam imaginantes ubi nulla est, as Wierus writes de Lamiis, lib. 3. c. 7. they refuse many of them meat and drink, cannot rest, aggravating still and supposing grievous offences where there are none.	Fears, terrors and alarms in every place, at every time and season. Many stubbornly reject food and drink, looking for a knot in a bulrush and imagining guilt where none exists, as Weyer writes in On Witches, book 3, chapter 7. Many of them refuse food and drink and cannot rest, continually magnifying and imagining serious offences where there are none.[13032]
Gods heavie wrath is kindled in their souls, and notwithstanding their continual prayers and supplications to Christ Jesus, they have no release or ease at all, but a most intolerable torment, and insufferable anguish of conscience, and that makes them through impatience to murmure against God many times, to rave, to blasphem, turn Atheists, and seek to offer violence to themselves. Deut. 28. 65, 66. In the morning they wish for evening, and for morning in the evening, for the sight of their eyes which they see, and fear of hearts.	God's fierce wrath burns within their souls, and despite their continual prayers and appeals to Christ Jesus, they find no release or relief, only intolerable torment and unbearable anguish of conscience. Unable to endure it, they often murmur against God, rave, blaspheme, become atheists and seek to harm themselves. Deuteronomy 28:65–66: In the morning they wish for evening, and in the evening for morning, because of what their eyes see and the fear in their hearts.[13033]

[13032] Editor. Wierus is Johann Weyer. The proverbial knot in a bulrush means inventing a difficulty where there is none. Burton explicitly describes imagined guilt, a qualification important to the surrounding discussion. The printed short title and locator remain for edition-specific verification.

[13033] Editor. The biblical wording about morning and evening comes from Deuteronomy 28:67, following the fear described in verses 65–66. Burton's locator is retained. The paragraph states his theological interpretation of the suffering and its possible consequences.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[13034]Marinus Mercennus in his Comment on Genesis, makes mention of a desperate friend of his, whom amongst others he came to visit, and exhort to patience, that broke out into most blasphemous Atheistical speeches, too fearful to relate, when they wished him to trust in God, Quis est ille Deus (inquit) ut serviam illi, quid proderit si oraverim, si præsens est, cur non succurrit? cur non me carcere, inediâ, squalore confectum liberat? quid ego feci? &c. absit a me hujusmodi Deus.	Marin Mersenne, in his commentary on Genesis, mentions a despairing friend whom he went with others to visit and encourage to patience. When they urged him to trust in God, he burst into blasphemous, atheistic speeches, too dreadful to relate: Who is this God, he said, that I should serve him? What good will it do if I pray? If he is present, why does he not help? Why does he not free me, worn out by imprisonment, hunger and squalor? What have I done? And so on. Away from me with such a God![13035]
Another of his acquaintance brake out into like Atheistical blasphemies, upon his Wives death raved, cursed, said and did he car'd not what. And so for the most part it is with them all, many of them in their extremity, think they hear and see visions, out-crys, confer with Divels, that they are tormented, possessed, and in Hell Fire, already damned, quite forsaken of God, they have no sense or feeling of mercy, or grace, hope of salvation, their sentence of condemnation is already past, and not to be revoked, the Divel will certainly have them.	Another acquaintance of his broke out into similar atheistic blasphemies: after his wife's death he raved and cursed, heedless of what he said or did. For the most part, so it is with them all. Many, at their worst, think they hear cries and see visions, converse with devils, and are tormented, possessed and already in hellfire, damned and utterly forsaken by God. They feel no mercy or grace and have no hope of salvation. Their sentence of condemnation, they believe, has already been passed and cannot be revoked; the devil will certainly have them.[13036]

[13034] Burton. Source page 703, dagger: "Artic. 3. ca. 1. fol. 230. quod horrendum dictu, desperabundus quidam me præsente cum ad patientiam hortaretur, &c." "Article 3, chapter 1, folio 230. A certain despairing man—dreadful to relate—in my presence, when he was being urged to patience," and so on.

[13035] Editor. Mercennus is Marin Mersenne. The first-person questions belong to the distressed friend quoted within Mersenne's account, not to Burton. Although Burton calls the words too fearful to relate, he then gives them in Latin; that contradiction is retained, and the Latin is fully translated.

[13036] Editor. The account continues to report what the sufferers think and feel. The translation makes that framing clear without replacing Burton's historical language with modern diagnoses. His sweeping generalization, for the most part, remains.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Never was any living creature in such torment before, in such a miserable estate, in such distress of mind, no hope, no faith, past cure, reprobate, continually tempted to make away themselves: Something talks with them, they spit fire and brimstone, they cannot but blaspheme, they cannot repent, believe, or think a good thought,	No living creature, they believe, has ever suffered such torment, such a miserable condition, such distress of mind: no hope, no faith, beyond cure, rejected by God, continually tempted to kill themselves. Something talks with them; they spit fire and sulphur; they cannot help blaspheming, cannot repent or believe or think a good thought,[13037]
so far carryed, ut cogantur ad impia cogitandum etiam contra voluntatem, said [13038]Fælix Plater, ad blasphemiam erga deum, ad multa horrenda perpetranda, ad manus violentas sibi inferendas, &c. and in their distracted fits and desperate humors, to offer violence to others, their familiar and dear friends sometimes, or to meer strangers, upon very small or no occasion: For he that cares not for his own, is master of another mans life.	carried so far, says Felix Platter, that they are driven to think impious thoughts even against their will, to blaspheme against God, to commit many dreadful acts and to lay violent hands upon themselves, and so on. In their disturbed fits and despairing states they may attack others, sometimes close and dear friends, sometimes complete strangers, on the slightest provocation or none. For someone who does not care about his own life has power over another person's.[13039]
Source page 703–704 They think evill against their wils; that which they abhor themselves, they must needs think, do, and speak. He gives instance in a Patient of his, that when he would pray, had such evill thoughts still suggested to him, and wicked [13040]meditations. Another instance he hath of a woman that was often tempted to curse God, to blasphem and kill her self.	They think evil against their will: what they themselves abhor, they feel compelled to think, do and say. Platter gives the example of a patient who, whenever he tried to pray, continually had such evil thoughts and wicked meditations suggested to him. He gives another example of a woman often tempted to curse God, blaspheme and kill herself.[13041]

[13037] Editor. Estate means condition; reprobate means rejected from salvation within the theological account. The paragraph continues the sufferers' reported experience. Brimstone is sulphur.

[13038] Burton. Source page 703, d: "Lib. 1. observ. cap. 3." "Observations, book 1, chapter 3."

[13039] Editor. Compare Seneca, Moral Letters 4.8: one who scorns his own life has power over yours, within an argument against fear of death. This verbal parallel does not establish Burton's immediate source. The earlier Terror ubique verse remains unlocated. The separate phrase impia cogitandum, quoted here from Platter, is awkward as printed. Burton's selected cases and maxim are historical rhetoric, not an assessment of people experiencing mental distress today.

[13040] Burton. Source page 704, e: "Ad maledicendum Deo." "To curse God."

[13041] Editor. The distinction between unwanted thoughts and willing assent is explicit in the source. The patient and woman are Platter's reported cases. The marginal Latin specifies cursing God.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 704 Sometimes the Divel (as they say) stands without and talks with them, sometimes he is within them, as they think, and there speaks and talks as to such as are possessed: so Apollidorus in Plutarch, thought his heart spake within him.	Sometimes the devil, as they say, stands outside and talks with them; sometimes they think he is inside them, speaking there as he does to those who are possessed. Thus Apollodorus, in Plutarch, thought his heart spoke within him.[13042]
There is a most memorable Example of [13043]Francis Spira an Advocate of Padua, Ann. 1545, that being desperate, by no counsel of learned men could be comforted; he felt (as he said) the pains of Hell in his soul, in all other things he discoursed aright; but in this most mad. Frismelica, Bellovat, and some other excellent Physitians, could neither make him eat, drink, or sleep, no perswasion could ease him. Never pleaded any man so well for himself, as this man did against himself, and so he desperately died. Springer a Lawyer hath written his life.	There is a most memorable example in Francis Spira, a lawyer of Padua, in 1545. In his despair, no counsel from learned men could comfort him. He felt, as he said, the pains of hell in his soul; on every other subject he reasoned correctly, but on this he was utterly deranged. Frismelica, Bellovat and other excellent physicians could make him neither eat nor drink nor sleep; no persuasion could relieve him. No man ever pleaded his own case as well as this man pleaded against himself, and so he died in despair. Springer, a lawyer, wrote his life.[13044]
Cardinal Crescence died so likewise desperate at Verona, still he thought a black dog followed him to his death-bed, no man could drive the dog away. Sleidan. com. 23. cap. lib. 3.	Cardinal Crescence likewise died in despair at Verona. He constantly thought a black dog followed him to his deathbed; no one could drive it away. Sleidan, Commentaries, 23, chapter, book 3.[13045]

[13042] Editor. Burton qualifies the report with as they say and as they think. In Plutarch, On the Delay of Divine Justice, Apollodorus dreams that he is flayed and boiled, and his heart speaks from the cauldron. Burton compresses the dream into an inward voice; his version remains.

[13043] Burton. Source page 704, f: "Goulart."

[13044] Editor. Francis Spira is Francesco Spira. Burton prints 1545; the episode is dated 1548 in Nathaniel Bacon's Relation of the Fearful Estate of Francis Spira, and the Wellcome catalogue records Spira's death in 1548. The printed date remains. The physicians' names and Springer attribution require further bibliographical collation.

[13045] Editor. The story is cited to Johannes Sleidan. Burton's confused locator, com. 23. cap. lib. 3., is retained rather than silently rearranged. The cardinal's perceived black dog is an attributed narrative; its historical details remain for verification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whilst I was writing this Treatise, saith Montaltus cap. 2. de mel. [13046]A Nun came to me for help, well for all other matters, but troubled in conscience for five year last past; she is almost mad, and not able to resist, thinks she hath offended God, and is certainly damned.	While I was writing this treatise, says Montalto in chapter 2 On Melancholy, a nun came to me for help. Well in every other respect, but troubled in conscience for the past five years, she is almost mad and unable to resist; she thinks she has offended God and is certainly damned.[13047]
Fælix Plater hath store of Instances of such as thought themselves damned, [13048]forsaken of God, &c. One amongst the rest, that durst not go to Church, or come near the Rhine, for fear to make away himself, because then he was most especially tempted. These and such like Symptoms, are intended and remitted, as the malady it self is more or less; some will hear good counsel, some will not; some desire help, some reject all, and will not be eased.	Felix Platter has many examples of people who thought themselves damned, forsaken by God, and so on. One dared neither go to church nor approach the Rhine for fear of killing himself, because those were the occasions when he was most strongly tempted. These and similar symptoms intensify or lessen as the illness itself grows stronger or weaker. Some will listen to good counsel, others will not; some want help, while others reject it all and will not be comforted.[13049]

[13046] Burton. Source page 704, g: “Dum hæc scribo, implorat opem meam monacha, in reliquis sana, & judicio recta, per. 5. annos melancholica; damnatam se dicit, conscientiæ stimulis oppressa, &c.” “While I write this, a nun begs my help, sound in other respects and right in her judgement, melancholy for five years. She says she is damned, oppressed by the stings of conscience,” and so on.

[13047] Editor. The first-person speaker is the physician Montalto, not Burton. The margin emphasizes that the nun’s judgement is sound in other matters. The Latin and Burton’s English differ in detail; both are preserved.

[13048] Burton. Source page 704, h: “Alios conquerentes audivi se esse ex damnatorum numero, Deo non esse curæ, aliaque infinita quæ proferre non audebant, vel abhorrebant.” “I have heard others complain that they were among the damned, that God did not care for them, and countless other things which they did not dare to utter or shrank from saying.”

[13049] Editor. Intended and remitted means intensified and diminished, not planned and forgiven. The final sentences qualify the catalogue: symptoms vary in severity and people differ in their response to help. This completes Subsection 4; Subsection 5, on prognosis, follows.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 5.	SUBSECTION 5
Prognostiques of Despair, Atheism, Blasphemy, violent death, &c.	Prognosis of despair: atheism, blasphemy, violent death, and so on.
Most part these kind of persons [13050]make away themselves, some are mad, blaspheme, curse, deny God, but most offer violence to their own persons, and sometimes to others. A wounded spirit who can bear? Prov. 18. 14. As Cain, Saul, Achitophel, Judas, blasphemed and died. Bede saith, Pilate died desperate eight years after Christ.	Most people of this kind kill themselves; some go mad, blaspheme, curse and deny God, but most do violence to themselves, and sometimes to others. Who can bear a wounded spirit? Proverbs 18:14. Thus Cain, Saul, Ahithophel and Judas blasphemed and died. Bede says that Pilate died in despair eight years after Christ.[13051]
[13052]Felix Plater hath collected many Examples. [13053]A Merchants Wife that was long troubled with such temptations, in the night rose from her Bed, and out of the Window broke her neck into the Street: another drowned himself desperate as he was in the Rhine; some cut their throats, many hang themselves. But this needs no illustration.	Felix Platter has collected many examples. A merchant's wife, long troubled by such temptations, rose from bed at night and fell from the window into the street, breaking her neck. Another, in despair, drowned himself in the Rhine; some cut their throats, many hang themselves. But this needs no further illustration.[13054]

[13050] Burton. Source page 704, i: "Musculus, Partritus, ad vim sibi inferendam cogit homines." "Musculus, Partritus: it drives people to inflict violence on themselves."

[13051] Editor. Prognostiques means the anticipated course or outcome of a condition. Burton's sweeping most is a historical assertion, not an established frequency. His biblical examples are grouped rhetorically: Genesis does not report Cain's suicide. Eusebius, Church History 2.7, reports a tradition of Pilate's suicide under Gaius; Burton's Bede attribution and eight-year interval remain for direct collation.

[13052] Burton. Source page 704, k: "3 De mentis alienat. observ. lib. 1." "3. On mental derangement, Observations, book 1."

[13053] Burton. Source page 704, l: "Uxor Mercatoris diu vexationibus tentata, &c." "A merchant's wife, long assailed by torments," and so on.

[13054] Editor. These are cases Burton attributes to Platter. Temptations here means impulses toward self-destruction. The passage does not establish how common these outcomes were among the broader group Burton calls despairing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is controverted by some, whether a man so offering violence to himself, dying desperate, may be saved or no? If they die so obstinatly and suddenly, that they cannot so much as wish for mercy, the worst is to be suspected, because they die impenitent.	Some dispute whether a person who thus does violence to himself and dies in despair may be saved. If they die so obstinately and suddenly that they cannot even wish for mercy, the worst must be feared, because they die unrepentant.[13055]
Source page 704–705 [13056]If their death had been a little more lingring, wherein they might have some leisure in their hearts to cry for mercy, charity may judge the best; divers have been recovered out of the very act of hanging and drowning themselves, and so brought ad sanam mentem, they have been very penitent, much abhorred their former fact, confessed that they have repented in an instant, and cryed for mercy in their hearts.	If their death had been a little slower, allowing them some time to cry for mercy in their hearts, charity may judge favourably. Several people have been rescued in the very act of hanging or drowning themselves and so brought back to a sound mind. They have been deeply penitent, abhorred their former act and confessed that they repented in an instant and cried for mercy in their hearts.[13057]
Source page 705 If a man put desperate hands upon himself, by occasion of madness or melancholy, if he have given testimony before of his regeneration, in regard he doth this not so much out of his will, as ex vi morbi, we must make the best construction of it, as [13058]Turks do, that think all fools and mad men go directly to heaven.	If someone lays desperate hands upon himself because of madness or melancholy, and has previously shown evidence of his spiritual rebirth, we must interpret it as favourably as possible, since he does this less from his own will than under the force of illness. This is what the Turks do, believing that all fools and mad people go directly to heaven.[13059]

[13055] Editor. Saved concerns eternal salvation. Burton presents a theological dispute and then qualifies the severity of this judgement in the following passages, particularly when illness impairs the will.

[13056] Burton. Source page 704, m: “Abernethie.” “Abernethy.”

[13057] Editor. Charity means the Christian obligation to judge others with love; fact means deed. Abernethy, Physic of the Soul (1630), chapter 24, p. 374, closely matches this account of survivors’ reported repentance and the adjoining cautions about sudden death and bodily disturbance. The facsimile confirms the textual parallel, not the reported events or Burton’s edition. It supports withholding the harshest judgement within this historical pastoral argument.

[13058] Burton. Source page 705, n: “Busbequius.” “Busbecq.”

[13059] Editor. Regeneration is spiritual rebirth. Burton explicitly distinguishes an act compelled by illness from an act freely willed. His generalization about Turks is attributed to Busbecq in the margin; it is not a verified statement of universal Ottoman or Muslim belief.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 6.	SUBSECTION 6
Cure of Despair by Physick, good counsel, comforts, &c.	Treatment of despair through medicine, good counsel, consolation, and so on.
Experience teacheth us that though many die obstinate, and wilful in this malady, yet multitudes again are able to resist and overcome, seek for help and finde comfort, are taken è faucibus Erebi, from the chops of Hell, and out of the Divels pawes, though they have by [13060]obligation given themselves to him. Some out of their own strength, and Gods assistance, Though he kill me (saith Job) yet will I trust in him, out of good counsel, advice, and Physick.	Experience teaches us that although many die obstinate and wilful in this illness, multitudes in turn can resist and overcome it, seek help and find comfort. They are taken from the jaws of the underworld, from the jaws of hell and out of the devil's claws, even though they have bound themselves over to him. Some recover through their own strength and God's assistance—Though he kill me, says Job, yet will I trust in him—others through good counsel, advice and medicine.[13061]
[13062]Bellovacus cured a Monke by altering his habit, and course of life: Plater many by Physick alone. But for the most part they must concur: and they take a wrong course that think to overcome this feral passion by sole Physick; and they are as much out, that think to work this effect by good advice alone; though both be forcible in themselves, yet vis unita fortior, they must go hand in hand to this disease:	Bellovacus cured a monk by changing his habit and way of life; Platter cured many through medicine alone. But generally the two must work together. Those who think they can overcome this deadly affliction through medicine alone take the wrong course, and those who expect to achieve it through good advice alone are equally mistaken. Although each is powerful in itself, united strength is greater: they must go hand in hand in treating this disease:[13063]
——alterius sic altera poscit opem.	——so each seeks the other's help.[13064]

[13060] Burton. Source page 705, o: "John Maior vitis patrum: quidam negavit Christum, per chirographum post restitutus." "John Major, Lives of the Fathers: someone denied Christ by a written bond and was afterwards restored."

[13061] Editor. The Latin Erebus names the classical underworld; Burton's immediately following Christian restatement is retained separately. Obligation means a binding pledge or bond, illustrated by the reported written pact in the margin. Job's words correspond to Job 13:15.

[13062] Burton. Source page 705, p: "Trincavelius lib. 3. consil. 46." "Trincavellius, book 3, consultation 46."

[13063] Editor. Physick means medicine; feral means deadly or disastrous. Habit may include the monk's clothing as well as his manner of life. The Trincavellius marginal reference accompanies the Bellovacus claim as printed; its precise relation to the anecdote remains unresolved. Burton's central recommendation is cooperation between medicine and counsel.

[13064] Editor. Adapted from Horace, Art of Poetry 410–411, where natural talent and cultivated skill need one another. Burton applies the phrase to medicine and counsel, combining words from two original lines into one displayed line.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For Physick the like course is to be taken with this as in other melancholy: diet, ayr, exercise, all those passions and perturbations of the minde, &c. are to be rectified by the same means. They must not be left solitary, or to themselves, never idle, never out of company.	As for medicine, the same course should be followed here as in other forms of melancholy: diet, air, exercise and all those passions and disturbances of the mind, and so on, must be put right by the same means. They must not be left alone or to themselves, never idle, never without company.[13065]
Counsel, good comfort is to be applyed, as they shall see the parties inclined, or to the causes, whether it be loss, fear, grief, discontent, or some such feral accident, a guilty conscience, or otherwise by frequent meditation, too grievous an apprehension, and consideration of his former life: by hearing, reading of Scriptures, good Divines, good advice and conference, applying Gods word to their distressed souls, it must be corrected and counter-poysed:	Counsel and good consolation must be suited to the person's disposition and to the causes: loss, fear, grief, discontent or some such disastrous event; a guilty conscience; or frequent meditation and an excessively painful apprehension and consideration of one's past life. It must be corrected and counterbalanced through hearing and reading Scripture, good theologians, sound advice and conversation, applying God's word to their distressed souls:[13066]
Many excellent Exhortations, parænetical Discourses are extant to this purpose, for such as are any way troubled in minde: Perkins, Greenham, Hayward, Bright, Abernethy, Bolton, Culmannus, Hemmingius, Cælius Secundus, Nicholas Laurentius, are copious in this subject: Azorius, Navarrus, Sayrus, &c. and such as have written cases of conscience amongst our Pontificial Writers.	Many excellent exhortations and discourses of moral counsel are available for this purpose, for anyone troubled in mind. Perkins, Greenham, Hayward, Bright, Abernethy, Bolton, Culmannus, Hemmingius, Caelius Secundus and Nicholas Laurentius write extensively on the subject; so do Azorius, Navarrus, Sayrus and others who have written cases of conscience among our Catholic writers.[13067]

[13065] Editor. Burton refers back to the earlier medical treatment of melancholy. His repeated never gives this historical prescription its emphatic force; the translation preserves it.

[13066] Editor. Divines are theologians or religious teachers; conference is discussion or conversation. The advice is to be fitted to the person and the cause, rather than applied indiscriminately.

[13067] Editor. Parænetical means exhortatory, offering moral counsel. Cases of conscience examine particular moral or religious difficulties. Pontificial is Burton's designation for Roman Catholic authors; his inclusion of their works follows the anti-Catholic polemic at the end of the causes subsection.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 705–706 But because these mens works are not to all parties at hand, so parable at all times, I will for the benefit and ease of such as are afflicted, at the request of some [13068]friends, recollect out of their voluminous Treatises, some few such comfortable speeches, exhortations, arguments, advice, tending to this subject, and out of Gods Word, knowing, as Culmannus saith upon the like occasion, [13069]how unavailable and vain mens counsels are to comfort an afflicted conscience, except Gods Word concur and be annexed, from which comes life, ease, repentance, &c.	But because these works are not at everyone's hand or always so easily obtained, I will, for the benefit and relief of the afflicted and at some friends' request, gather from their extensive treatises a few consoling sayings, exhortations, arguments and pieces of advice concerning this subject, and from God's word. For I know, as Culmannus says on a similar occasion, how ineffective and futile human counsels are for comforting an afflicted conscience unless God's word joins and accompanies them, from which come life, relief, repentance, and so on.[13070]
Source page 706 Presupposing first that which Beza, Greenham, Perkins, Bolton, give in charge, the parties to whom counsel is given be sufficiently prepared, humbled for their sins, fit for comfort, confessed, tryed how they are more or less affected, how they stand affected, or capable of good advice, before any remedies be applyed: To such therefore as are so throughly searched and examined, I address this following Discourse.	First I presuppose what Beza, Greenham, Perkins and Bolton require: before any remedies are applied, those receiving counsel must be sufficiently prepared, humbled for their sins and ready for consolation; they must have confessed and been examined as to how deeply they are affected, their present disposition and their capacity to receive good advice. It is therefore to those so thoroughly explored and examined that I address the following discourse.[13071]

[13068] Burton. Source page 705, dagger: "My brother George Burton; M. James Whitehall, Rector of Checkly in Staffordshire my quondam Chamber Fellow, and late Fellow Student in Christ-Church Oxon." "My brother George Burton; Mr James Whitehall, rector of Checkley in Staffordshire, my former roommate and late fellow student at Christ Church, Oxford."

[13069] Burton. Source page 706, a: "Scio quam vana sit & inefficax humanorum verborum penes afflictos consolatio, nisi verbum Dei audiatur, à quo vita, refrigeratio, solatium, pœnitentia." "I know how empty and ineffective is the consolation of human words among the afflicted unless God's word is heard, from which come life, refreshment, consolation and repentance."

[13070] Editor. Parable means obtainable. Recollect means gather together. The personal margin names Burton's brother George and James Whitehall; quondam means former, and Oxon abbreviates Oxford. The first-person Latin in the following margin is Culmannus's cited statement.

[13071] Editor. These are historical pastoral prerequisites. Perkins, Cases of Conscience (1606), I.7, third question, section 5, pp. 101–104, requires assessment before applying the promise of salvation and warns against premature comfort without humility. This supplies one close comparison, not a collation of every author Burton names. Tryed means examined or assessed; affected concerns both distress and disposition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Two main Antidotes [13072]Hemmingius observes opposite to Despair, good Hope out of Gods Word, to be embraced; perverse security and presumption, from the Divels treachery, to be rejected; Illa salus animæ, hæc pestis; one saves, the other kils, occidit animam, saith Austin, and doth as much harm as Despair it self.	Hemmingius identifies two chief antidotes to despair: good hope from God's word, to be embraced; and perverse complacency and presumption, arising from the devil's deceit, to be rejected. The former is the soul's salvation, the latter its plague: one saves, the other kills; it kills the soul, says Augustine, and does as much harm as despair itself.[13073]
[13074]Navarrus the Casuist, reckons up ten special cures out of Anton. 1. part. Tit. 3. cap. 10. 1. God. 2. Physick. 3. [13075]Avoiding such Objects as have caused it. 4. Submission of himself to other mens judgements. 5. Answer of all Objections, &c. All which Cajetan, Gerson, lib. de vit. spirit. Sayrus, lib. 1. cas. conf. cap. 14. repeat and approve out of Emanuel Roderiques, cap. 51. & 52.	Navarrus the casuist lists ten particular remedies from Antoninus, part 1, title 3, chapter 10: 1. God. 2. Medicine. 3. Avoiding the objects that caused it. 4. Submitting oneself to other people's judgement. 5. Answering every objection, and so on. Cajetan, Gerson in his On the Spiritual Life, and Sayrus in book 1 of his Cases of Conscience, chapter 14, repeat and approve all these from Emanuel Rodrigues, chapters 51 and 52.[13076]
Greenham prescribes six special rules, Culmannus 7. First, to acknowledge all help come from God. 2. That the cause of their present misery is sin. 3. To repent and be heartily sorry for their sins. 4. To pray earnestly to God they may be eased. 5. To expect and implore the prayers of the Church, and good mens advice. 6. Physick. 7. To commend themselves to God, and rely upon his mercy: others otherwise, but all to this effect.	Greenham prescribes six particular rules, Culmannus seven. First, acknowledge that all help comes from God. 2. That sin is the cause of their present misery. 3. Repent and be sincerely sorry for their sins. 4. Pray earnestly to God for relief. 5. Look for and implore the Church's prayers and good people's advice. 6. Medicine. 7. Entrust themselves to God and rely on his mercy. Others put it differently, but all to this effect.[13077]

[13072] Burton. Source page 706, b: "Antid. adversus desperationem." "Antidote against Despair."

[13073] Editor. Burton calls both antidotes although he rejects the second; the apparent contradiction is retained. Security here is careless assurance, not safety. The Latin statements and Burton's separate English restatement remain.

[13074] Burton. Source page 706, c: "Tom. 2. c. 27. num. 282." "Volume 2, chapter 27, number 282."

[13075] Burton. Source page 706, d: "Aversio cogitationis à re scrupulosa; contraventio scrupulorum." "Turning thought away from the matter that causes scruples; opposing scruples."

[13076] Editor. A casuist reasons about particular cases of conscience. Burton announces ten remedies but gives only five before and so on; no missing five have been supplied. His compressed chain of authorities and its edition-specific locators require further collation.

[13077] Editor. The seven rules follow the reference to Culmannus. The attribution of present misery to sin is part of the theological scheme Burton is reporting; it is preserved as such.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But forasmuch as most men in this malady are spiritually sick, void of reason almost, over-born by their miseries, and too deep an apprehension of their sins, they cannot apply themselves to good counsel, pray, believe, repent, we must as much as in us lies occur and help their peculiar infirmities, according to their several Causes and Symptoms, as we shall find them distressed and complain.	But since most people with this illness are spiritually sick, almost deprived of reason, overwhelmed by their miseries and by an excessively deep apprehension of their sins, they cannot attend to good counsel, pray, believe or repent. We must therefore do all we can to meet and help their particular infirmities, according to their different causes and symptoms, as we find them suffering and complaining.[13078]
The main matter which terrifies and torments most that are troubled in mind, is the enormity of their offences, the intolerable burthen of their sins, Gods heavie wrath and displeasure so deeply apprehended, that they account themselves Reprobates, quite forsaken of God, already damned, past all hope of grace, uncapable of mercy, diaboli mancipia, slaves of sin, and their offences so great they cannot be forgiven.	What chiefly terrifies and torments most people troubled in mind is the enormity of their offences, the intolerable burden of their sins and God's heavy wrath and displeasure, apprehended so deeply that they consider themselves reprobates, utterly forsaken by God, already damned, beyond all hope of grace and incapable of receiving mercy, the devil's slaves, slaves of sin, with offences so great that they cannot be forgiven.[13079]
But these men must know there is no sin so haynous which is not pardonable in it self; no crime so great, but by Gods mercy it may be forgiven. Where sin aboundeth, grace aboundeth much more, Rom. 5. 20 And what the Lord said unto Paul in his extremity, 2 Cor. 11. 9. My grace is sufficient for thee, for my power is made perfect through weakness; concerns every man in like case.	But these people must know that no sin is so heinous as to be unpardonable in itself; no crime is so great that God's mercy cannot forgive it. Where sin abounds, grace abounds much more, Romans 5:20. And what the Lord said to Paul in his extremity, 2 Corinthians 11:9—My grace is sufficient for you, for my power is made perfect through weakness—concerns everyone in a similar case.[13080]

[13078] Editor. Occur means come to meet or assist. Burton recognizes that distress can obstruct the very responses his rules demand, and turns from general prescriptions to assistance fitted to each person.

[13079] Editor. Reprobates means those rejected from salvation. Burton is describing what the sufferers believe about themselves; the following argument contests that belief. The Latin names the devil, while Burton's English restatement names sin; both are retained.

[13080] Editor. The first biblical locator is Romans 5:20. Burton prints 2 Corinthians 11:9, but the quoted promise occurs at 12:9. His printed reference is retained here and the correct location supplied in this note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 706–707 His promises are made indefinite to all Believers, generally spoken to all touching remission of sins that are truly penitent, grieved for their offences, and desire to be reconciled, Matth. 9. 12, 13. I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance, that is, such as are truly touched in conscience for their sins. Again, Mat. 11. 28. Come unto me all ye that are heavie laden, and I will ease you.	His promises are made without restriction to all believers, addressed generally to all who are truly penitent, grieved by their offences and desirous of reconciliation, concerning the forgiveness of sins. Matthew 9:12–13: I came not to call the righteous, but sinners to repentance; that is, those whose consciences are truly touched by their sins. Again, Matthew 11:28: Come to me, all you who are heavily burdened, and I will give you relief.[13081]
Source page 707 Ezek. 18. 27. At what time soever a sinner shall repent him of his sins from the bottom of his heart, I will blot out all his wickedness out of my remembrance saith the Lord, Isay 43. 25. I even I am he that put away thine iniquity for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins.	Ezekiel 18:27: Whenever a sinner repents of his sins from the bottom of his heart, I will blot all his wickedness from my remembrance, says the Lord. Isaiah 43:25: I, even I, am he who puts away your iniquity for my own sake, and will not remember your sins.[13082]
As a father (saith David, Psal. 103. 13.) hath compassion on his children, so hath the Lord compassion on them that fear him. And will receive them again as the prodigal Son was entertained, Luk. 15. if they shall so come with tears in their eyes and a penitent heart. Peccator agnoscat, Deus ignoscit.	As a father, says David in Psalm 103:13, has compassion on his children, so the Lord has compassion on those who fear him. And he will receive them again as the prodigal son was welcomed, Luke 15, if they come with tears in their eyes and a penitent heart. Let the sinner acknowledge his fault; God forgives.[13083]

[13081] Editor. Indefinite here means unrestricted in application, not vague. The Matthew quotation on calling sinners is in 9:13; the preceding verse compares the sick person's need for a physician. The repeated 11.28 at the next page's opening is treated as a carried-over locator, not a second quotation.

[13082] Editor. The first wording resembles the penitential sentence in the 1559 Book of Common Prayer, which cites Ezekiel 18 generally, rather than a verbatim quotation of 18:27. Burton's wording and printed locator remain. The Isaiah reference is 43:25.

[13083] Editor. The Latin contrasts agnoscat, acknowledge, with ignoscit, forgives. Its wordplay cannot be reproduced exactly in English. The prodigal son's return is told in Luke 15:11–32.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Lord is full of compassion and mercy, slow to anger, of great kindness, Psal. 103. 8. He will not alwayes chide, neither keep his anger for ever. 9. As high as the heaven is above the earth, so great is his mercy towards them that fear him. 11. As far as the East is from the West, so far hath he removed our sins from us. 12.	The Lord is full of compassion and mercy, slow to anger and great in kindness, Psalm 103:8. He will not always rebuke, nor keep his anger forever. Verse 9. As high as heaven is above the earth, so great is his mercy toward those who fear him. Verse 11. As far as east is from west, so far has he removed our sins from us. Verse 12.
Though Cain cry out in the anguish of his soul, my punishment is greater then I can bear, 'tis not so; Thou liest Cain (saith Austin) Gods mercy is greater then thy sins. His mercy is above all his works, Psal. 145. 9. able to satisfie for all mens sins, antilutron, 1 Tim. 2. 6.	Though Cain cries out in the anguish of his soul, my punishment is greater than I can bear, it is not so. You lie, Cain, says Augustine; God's mercy is greater than your sins. His mercy is above all his works, Psalm 145:9, able to make satisfaction for everyone's sins, a ransom in exchange, 1 Timothy 2:6.[13084]
His mercy is a panacea, a balsom for an afflicted soul, a Soveraign medicine, an Alexipharmacum for all sin, a charm for the Divel; his mercy was great to Solomon, to Manasses, to Peter, great to all Offenders, and whosoever thou art, it may be so to thee.	His mercy is a cure-all, a balm for an afflicted soul, a sovereign medicine, an antidote to all sin, a charm against the devil. His mercy was great toward Solomon, Manasseh and Peter, great toward all offenders; and whoever you are, it may be so toward you.[13085]
For why should God bid us pray (as Austin infers) Deliver us from all evil, nisi ipse misericors perseveraret, if he did not intend to help us? He therefore that [13086]doubts of the remission of his sins, denies Gods mercy, and doth him injury, saith Austin.	For why should God tell us to pray, as Augustine reasons, Deliver us from all evil, unless he himself remained merciful, if he did not intend to help us? Therefore anyone who doubts the forgiveness of his sins denies God's mercy and does him an injustice, says Augustine.[13087]

[13084] Editor. Cain's cry is Genesis 4:13. The Greek term antilutron in 1 Timothy 2:6 means a ransom, here rendered a ransom in exchange. Burton's Augustine attribution is retained, but the precise source of the rebuke to Cain remains unverified.

[13085] Editor. Panacea is a universal remedy; alexipharmacum is an antidote to poison. Burton extends his medical vocabulary into the account of divine mercy. The direct address now makes the imagined sufferer the reader.

[13086] Burton. Source page 707, e: "Magnam injuriam Deo facit qui diffidit de ejus misericordia." "One who distrusts his mercy does God a great injustice."

[13087] Editor. The Latin says unless he himself remained merciful; Burton follows it with his own explanatory English paraphrase, if he did not intend to help us. Both are translated separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yea but thou replyest, I am a notorious sinner, mine offences are not so great as infinite. Hear Fulgentius, [13088]Gods invincible goodness cannot be overcome by sin, his infinite mercy cannot be terminated by any: the multitude of his mercy is equivalent to his magnitude.	Yes, but you reply, I am a notorious sinner; my offences are not merely great but infinite. Hear Fulgentius: God's invincible goodness cannot be overcome by sin; his infinite mercy cannot be bounded by anything. The abundance of his mercy equals his greatness.[13089]
Hear [13090]Chrysostom, Thy malice may be measured, but Gods mercy cannot be defined; thy malice is circumscribed, his mercies infinite. As a drop of water is to the Sea, so are thy misdeeds to his mercy: nay, there is no such proportion to be given; for the Sea though great, yet may be measured, but Gods mercy cannot be circumscribed.	Hear Chrysostom: Your wickedness may be measured, but God's mercy cannot be bounded; your wickedness has limits, his mercies are infinite. As a drop of water is to the sea, so are your misdeeds to his mercy. Indeed, even that proportion cannot be assigned: although the sea is great, it can be measured, but God's mercy cannot be bounded.[13091]
Whatsoever thy sins be then in quantity or quality, multitude or magnitude, fear them not, distrust not. I speak not this, saith [13092]Chrysostom, to make thee secure and negligent, but to cheer thee up.	Whatever your sins may be, then, in quantity or quality, number or magnitude, do not fear them or lose trust. I do not say this, says Chrysostom, to make you complacent and negligent, but to encourage you.[13093]

[13088] Burton. Source page 707, f: "Bonitas invicti non vincitur, infiniti misericordia non finitur." "The goodness of the invincible one is not overcome; the mercy of the infinite one is not bounded."

[13089] Editor. Terminated means bounded or limited. Burton develops the consolation as a dialogue, answering objections put into the distressed reader's voice. The precise Fulgentius passage remains for collation.

[13090] Burton. Source page 707, g: "Hom. 3. De pœnitentia: Tua quidem malitia mensuram habet. Dei autem misericordia mensuram non habet. Tua malitia circumscripta est, &c. Pelagus etsi magnum, mensuram habet; dei autem, &c." "Homily 3, On Repentance: your wickedness indeed has a measure, but God's mercy has none. Your wickedness is bounded," and so on. "Although the sea is great, it has a measure; but God's," and so on.

[13091] Editor. The sea comparison ultimately proves inadequate because the sea, unlike divine mercy, has a limit. A related comparison appears in Chrysostom's Homily 61 on Matthew; that parallel does not establish the exact edition or wording of Burton's printed Homily 3 on Repentance reference.

[13092] Burton. Source page 707, h: "Non ut desidiores vos faciam, sed ut alacriores reddam." "Not to make you more negligent, but to make you more cheerful."

[13093] Editor. Secure again means carelessly assured. The qualification prevents encouragement from becoming the presumption Burton has already rejected.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yea, but thou urgest again, I have little comfort of this which is said, it concerns me not: Inanis pœnitentia quam sequens culpa coinquinat: 'tis to no purpose for me to repent and to do worse then ever I did before, to persevere in sin, and to return to my lusts as a Dog to his vomit, or a Swine to the mire: [13094]to what end is it to ask forgiveness of my sins, and daily to sin again and again, to do evil out of an habit?	Yes, but you insist again, I take little comfort from what has been said; it does not concern me. Repentance is empty when subsequent wrongdoing defiles it. It is pointless for me to repent and then do worse than ever before, persist in sin and return to my lusts like a dog to its vomit or a sow to the mud. What is the point of asking forgiveness for my sins while sinning again and again each day, doing evil from habit?[13095]
Source page 707–708 I daily and hourly offend in thought, word, and deed, in a relapse by mine own weakness and wilfulness: my bonus Genius, my good protecting Angel is gone, I am faln from that I was, or would be, worse and worse, my latter end is worse then my beginning: Si quotidie peccas, quotidie, saith Chrysostom, pœnitentiam age, If thou daily offend, daily repent: [13096]if twice, thrice, an hundreth, an hundreth thousand times, twice, thrice, an hundreth thousand times repent.	Every day and hour I offend in thought, word and deed, relapsing through my own weakness and wilfulness. My good guardian spirit, my good protecting angel, is gone. I have fallen from what I was, or wished to be, growing worse and worse; my latter end is worse than my beginning. If you sin daily, repent daily, says Chrysostom. If you offend daily, repent daily: if twice, three times, a hundred, a hundred thousand times, repent twice, three times, a hundred thousand times.[13097]

[13094] Burton. Source page 707, i: "Pro peccatis veniam poscere, & mala de novo iterare." "To seek pardon for sins and repeat wrongs anew."

[13095] Editor. The animal comparison occurs in 2 Peter 2:22, with the dog also in Proverbs 26:11. Burton's Latin maxim and its English development are preserved as distinct parts of the objection; the maxim's precise source is unresolved.

[13096] Burton. Source page 707, k: "Si bis, si ter, si centies millies, toties pœnitentiam age." "If twice, if three times, if a hundred thousand times, repent as many times."

[13097] Editor. The complaint draws on 2 Peter 2:20. Bonus Genius is translated before Burton's own explanation, and the repeated Latin and English injunctions to repent remain. The marginal Latin says a hundred thousand; Burton's English additionally includes a hundred.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 708 As they do by an old house that is out of repair, still mend some part or other; so do by thy soul, still reform some vice, repair it by repentance, call to him for grace and thou shalt have it; for we are freely justified by his grace, Rom. 3. 24. If thine enemy repent, as our Saviour enjoyned Peter, forgive him 77 times; and why shouldst thou think God will not forgive thee? Why should the enormity of thy sins trouble thee? God can do it, he will do it.	Treat your soul as people treat an old house in disrepair, continually mending one part or another: keep reforming some vice and repairing it through repentance. Call to him for grace and you shall have it, for we are freely justified by his grace, Romans 3:24. If your enemy repents, forgive him seventy-seven times, as our Saviour commanded Peter. Why should you think God will not forgive you? Why should the enormity of your sins trouble you? God can do it; he will do it.[13098]
My conscience (saith [13099]Anselm) dictates to me, that I deserve damnation, my repentance will not suffice for satisfaction; but thy mercy, O Lord, quite overcomes all my transgressions.	My conscience, says Anselm, tells me that I deserve damnation; my repentance will not suffice to make satisfaction. But your mercy, O Lord, entirely overcomes all my transgressions.[13100]

[13098] Editor. The house metaphor makes repentance continuing repair. Burton prints 77. Matthew 18:22 is traditionally rendered seventy times seven in the King James Bible and seventy-seven in some other translations; Burton's number is retained.

[13099] Burton. Source page 708, dagger: "Conscientia mea meruit damnationem, pœnitentia non sufficit ad satisfactionem: sed tua misericordia superat omnem offensionem." "My conscience has deserved damnation; repentance does not suffice to make satisfaction, but your mercy surpasses every offence."

[13100] Editor. The I is the speaker in the prayer attributed to Anselm, not a new autobiographical statement by Burton. Satisfaction means making adequate amends for sin. The exact prayer and its attribution require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The gods once (as the Poets fain) with a gold chain would pull Jupiter out of Heaven, but all they together could not stir him; and yet he could draw and turn them as he would himself: maugre all the force and fury of these infernal feinds, and crying sins, his grace is sufficient.	Once, as the poets imagine, the gods wished to pull Jupiter out of heaven with a golden chain, but all together could not move him; yet he could draw and turn them as he pleased. Despite all the force and fury of these infernal fiends and clamorous sins, his grace is sufficient.[13101]
Confer the debt and the payment; Christ and Adam; sin and the cure of it; the disease and the medicine; confer the sick man to the Physician, and thou shalt soon perceive that his power is infinitely beyond it. God is better able, as [13102]Bernard enformeth us, to help, then sin to do us hurt; Christ is better able to save, then the Divel to destroy.	Compare the debt and its payment; Christ and Adam; sin and its cure; the disease and its medicine. Compare the sick person with the physician, and you will soon see that his power is infinitely greater than the disease. As Bernard tells us, God is better able to help than sin is to harm us; Christ is better able to save than the devil is to destroy.[13103]
[13104]If he be a skilful Physician, as Fulgentius adds, he can cure all diseases; if merciful, he will. Non est perfecta bonitas à qua non omnis malitia vincitur, his goodness is not absolute and perfect, if it be not able to overcome all malice.	If he is a skilful physician, as Fulgentius adds, he can cure every disease; if merciful, he will. Goodness is not perfect unless it overcomes all wickedness: his goodness is not complete and perfect if it cannot overcome all wickedness.[13105]

[13101] Editor. The golden-chain comparison comes from Homer, Iliad 8.18–27. There Zeus issues a hypothetical challenge to all the gods, rather than recounting an actual attempt; Burton's retelling is preserved. Maugre means despite.

[13102] Burton. Source page 708, l: "Multo efficacior Christi mors in bonum, quam peccata nostra in malum. Christus potentior ad salvandum, quam dæmon ad perdendum." "Christ's death is far more effective for good than our sins are for evil. Christ is more powerful to save than the devil is to destroy."

[13103] Editor. Confer means compare. The sequence draws together legal, biblical and medical analogies. The margin explicitly compares the good effected by Christ's death with the evil of human sins; Burton's body gives a broader restatement.

[13104] Burton. Source page 708, m: "Peritus medicus potest omnes infirmitates sanare; si misericors, vult." "A skilled physician can cure every infirmity; if merciful, he wills it."

[13105] Editor. The medical language here is an analogy for divine power and mercy. Burton repeats the Latin proposition in English, and both are retained. Malice means wickedness rather than only personal spite.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Submit thy self unto him, as Saint Austin adviseth, [13106]he knoweth best what he doth; and be not so much pleased when he sustains thee, as patient when he corrects thee; he is Omnipotent and can cure all diseases when he sees his own time.	Submit yourself to him, as Saint Augustine advises: he knows best what he does. Be as patient when he corrects you as you are pleased when he sustains you; he is almighty and can cure all diseases when he judges the time right.[13107]
He looks down from Heaven upon Earth, that he may hear the mourning of prisoners, and deliver the children of death, Psal. 102. 19, 20. and though our sins be as red as scarlet, he can make them as white as snow, Isay 1. 18.	He looks down from heaven upon earth to hear the prisoners' mourning and deliver those condemned to death, Psalm 102:19–20. And though our sins are as red as scarlet, he can make them as white as snow, Isaiah 1:18.[13108]
Doubt not of this, or ask how it shall be done; he is all-sufficient that promiseth; qui fecit mundum de immundo, saith Chrysostom, he that made a fair world of nought, can do this and much more for his part: do thou onely believe, trust in him, rely on him, be penitent and heartily sorry for thy sins.	Do not doubt this or ask how it will be done. He who promises is all-sufficient: he who made the clean from the unclean, says Chrysostom; he who made a fair world from nothing can do this and much more on his part. For your part, only believe, trust in him, rely on him, repent and be sincerely sorry for your sins.[13109]

[13106] Burton. Source page 708, n: "Omnipotenti medico nullus languor insanabilis occurrit: tu tantum doceri te sine, manum ejus ne repelle: novit quid agat; non tantum delecteris cum fovet, sed toleres quum secat." "No incurable illness confronts the almighty physician. Only let yourself be taught; do not push away his hand. He knows what he is doing. Do not merely delight when he comforts you; endure when he cuts."

[13107] Editor. Augustine, Exposition of Psalm 102.5, supplies the physician metaphor in Latin: allow yourself to be healed, and endure cutting as well as comforting. Burton's margin prints doceri, to be taught, where the compared text has curari, to be healed. Both his quotation and body wording remain unchanged. The image asks for patience under divine correction; the source of the verbal difference remains untraced.

[13108] Editor. Children of death is a biblical expression for those appointed or condemned to die. Burton joins the promise of release to Isaiah's image of cleansing.

[13109] Editor. Mundum can mean clean or world, while immundo means unclean. The Latin is rendered according to that verbal contrast; Burton's following English instead gives a creation-from-nothing paraphrase. Both remain, without making the Latin say nought. The quotation's exact source is unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Repentance is a sovereign remedy for all sins, a spiritual wing to rerear us, a charm for our miseries, a protecting Amulet to expel sins venom, an attractive loadstone to draw Gods mercy and graces unto us. [13110]Peccatum vulnus, pœnitentia medicinam: sin made the breach, repentance must help it; howsoever thine offence came by error, sloath, obstinacy, ignorance, exitur per pœnitentiam, this is the sole means to be relieved.	Repentance is a sovereign remedy for every sin, a spiritual wing to raise us up again, a charm against our miseries, a protective amulet to expel sin's venom and an attracting lodestone to draw God's mercy and graces to us. Sin is the wound, repentance the medicine: sin made the breach, repentance must repair it. However your offence arose—through error, sloth, obstinacy or ignorance—the way out is through repentance; this is the sole means of relief.[13111]
[13112]Hence comes our hope of safety, by this alone sinners are saved, God is provoked to mercy. This unlooseth all that is bound, enlightneth darkness, mends that is broken, puts life to that which was desperately dying: Makes no respect of offences, or of persons.	From this comes our hope of salvation; by this alone sinners are saved and God is moved to mercy. It loosens all that is bound, illuminates darkness, repairs what is broken and restores life to what was dying beyond hope. It makes no distinction between offences or persons.[13113]
[13114]This doth not repel a fornicator, reject a drunkard, resist a proud fellow, turn away an Idolater, but entertains all, communicates it self to all.	It does not repel a fornicator, reject a drunkard, resist a proud person or turn away an idolater. It welcomes everyone and gives itself to everyone.[13115]

[13110] Burton. Source page 708, o: "Chrys. hom. 3. de pœnit." "Chrysostom, Homily 3, On Repentance."

[13111] Editor. Rerear means raise again; a lodestone is a naturally magnetic stone. The accumulation of medical and protective images belongs to Burton's religious rhetoric. The printed medicinam has an awkward case form; the intended sense is translated without altering the original.

[13112] Burton. Source page 708, p: "Spes salutis per quam peccatores salvantur, Deus ad misericordiam provocatur. Isidor. omnia ligata tu solvis, contrita sanas, confusa lucidas, desperata animas." "The hope of salvation, through which sinners are saved and God is moved to mercy. Isidore. You loose all that is bound, heal what is broken, illuminate what is confused and give life to what is beyond hope."

[13113] Editor. Safety here means salvation. Provoked means moved or stirred, without the modern implication of anger. The margin adds Isidor, presumably an attribution to Isidore, but gives no title or locator; that identification remains provisional.

[13114] Burton. Source page 708, q: "Chrys. hom. 5. non fornicatorem abnuit, non ebrium avertit, non superbum repellit, non aversatur Idololatram, non adulterum, sed omnes suscipit, omnibus communicat." "Chrysostom, Homily 5. It does not refuse a fornicator, turn away a drunkard, repel a proud person or shun an idolater or adulterer, but receives all and gives itself to all."

[13115] Editor. Entertains means receives or welcomes. The marginal Latin also names an adulterer, omitted from Burton's English restatement; the fuller list is retained in the translated Burton note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 708–709 Who persecuted the Church more then Paul, offended more then Peter? and yet by repentance (saith Chrysologus) they got both Magisterium & ministerium sanctitatis, the Magistery of holiness.	Who persecuted the Church more than Paul, or offended more than Peter? Yet through repentance, says Chrysologus, they gained both the teaching office and the ministry of holiness, the mastery of holiness.[13116]
Source page 709 The prodigall Son went far, but by repentance he came home at last. [13117]This alone will turn a wolf into a sheep, make a Publican a Preacher, turn a thorn into an olive, make a deboshed Fellow Religious, a Blasphemer sing Halleluia, make Alexander the Copper-smith truly devout, make a Divel a Saint.	The prodigal son went far away, but through repentance he came home at last. This alone will turn a wolf into a sheep, make a tax collector a preacher, turn a thorn into an olive tree, make a debauched fellow religious, set a blasphemer singing Hallelujah, make Alexander the coppersmith truly devout and turn a devil into a saint.[13118]
[13119]And him that polluted his mouth with calumnies, lying, swearing and filthy tunes and tones, to purge his throat with divine Psalms. Repentance will effect prodigious cures, make a stupend metamorphosis.	And it will make someone who polluted his mouth with slanders, lies, oaths and filthy songs and sounds cleanse his throat with divine psalms. Repentance will bring about extraordinary cures and an astonishing transformation.[13120]

[13116] Editor. Chrysologus is distinct from Chrysostom. The Latin names both a teaching office and a ministry; Burton's following English abbreviates them into Magistery. Both forms remain. The exact Chrysologus passage requires collation.

[13117] Burton. Source page 709, r: "Chrys. hom. 5." "Chrysostom, Homily 5."

[13118] Editor. Publican means a tax collector. Alexander the coppersmith is named as an opponent in 2 Timothy 4:14. Burton's sequence states repentance's transforming power; it does not report Alexander's actual conversion. The Homily 5 citation remains for edition-specific verification.

[13119] Burton. Source page 709, s: "Qui turpibus cantilenis aliquando inquinavit os, divinis hymnis animum purgabit." "One who once polluted his mouth with filthy songs will purify his soul with divine hymns."

[13120] Editor. The marginal Latin speaks of purifying the soul with divine hymns; Burton's English extends the mouth and throat imagery and adds slander, lying and swearing. Both versions are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
An Hauk came into the Ark, and went out again an Hauk; a Lyon came in, went out a Lyon; a Bear, a Bear; a wolf, a wolf; but if an Hauk come into this sacred Temple of repentance, he will go forth a Dove, (saith [13121]Chrysostom) a wolf go out a sheep, a Lyon a Lamb.	A hawk entered the ark and came out a hawk; a lion entered and came out a lion; a bear, a bear; a wolf, a wolf. But if a hawk enters this sacred temple of repentance, it will go out a dove, says Chrysostom; a wolf will go out a sheep, a lion a lamb.[13122]
[13123]This gives sight to the blind, legs to the lame, cures all diseases, confers grace, expels vice, inserts vertue, comforts and fortifies the soul. Shall I say, let thy sin be what it will, do but repent, it is sufficient.	It gives sight to the blind and legs to the lame, cures every disease, confers grace, drives out vice, implants virtue, comforts and strengthens the soul. Shall I say it? Whatever your sin may be, only repent: that is sufficient.[13124]
[13125]Quem pœnitet peccasse pene est innocens.	One who regrets having sinned is almost innocent.[13126]

[13121] Burton. Source page 709, t: “Hom. 5. Introivit hic quis accipiter, columba exit; introivit lupus, ovis egreditur, &c.” “Homily 5. Someone entered here a hawk and leaves a dove; a wolf entered and comes out a sheep,” and so on.

[13122] Editor. Compare Chrysostom, On Repentance, Homily 8.1 (PG 49.336–337), in English translation: the church, unlike the ark, transforms moral choice rather than animal nature. Its final pair is serpent and lamb; Burton has lion and lamb. His printed Homily 5 and all animal pairs are retained. The numbering and Latin transmission remain uncollated.

[13123] Burton. Source page 709, u: “Omnes languores sanat, cæcis visum, claudis gressum, gratiam confert, &c.” “It heals every illness, confers sight on the blind, the power to walk on the lame, and grace,” and so on.

[13124] Editor. The catalogue culminates in sufficiency of repentance. The next paragraph immediately raises the objection that the sufferer cannot repent; the present assurance is not the end of Burton’s argument.

[13125] Burton. Source page 709, dagger: “Seneca.” “Seneca.”

[13126] Editor. Seneca, Agamemnon 243. In the tragedy Clytemnestra speaks of returning to marital fidelity; Burton applies the maxim to repentance. Pene, almost, is essential and is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis true indeed and all sufficient this, they do confess, if they could repent, but they are obdurate, they have cauterized consciences, they are in a reprobate sense, they cannot think a good thought, they cannot hope for grace, pray, believe, repent, or be sorry for their sins, they find no grief for sin in themselves, but rather a delight, no groaning of spirit, but are carryed headlong to their own destruction, heaping wrath to themselves against the day of wrath, Rom. 2. 5.	All this is indeed true and entirely sufficient, they admit, if they could repent. But they are hardened; their consciences are seared; their minds are reprobate. They cannot think a good thought, hope for grace, pray, believe, repent or be sorry for their sins. They find no sorrow for sin in themselves, but rather delight; no groaning of spirit. They are carried headlong to their own destruction, storing up wrath for themselves against the day of wrath, Romans 2:5.[13127]
'Tis a grievous case this I do yeeld, and yet not to be despaired; God of his bounty and mercy cals all to repentance, Rom. 2. 4. thou maist be called at length, restored, taken to his grace as the Thief upon the Cross, at the last hour; as Mary Magdalen and many other sinners have been, that were buryed in sin.	I grant that this is a grievous condition, yet it need not be despaired of. In his generosity and mercy God calls all to repentance, Romans 2:4. You may at last be called, restored and received into his grace, like the thief on the cross at the final hour; like Mary Magdalene and many other sinners who had been buried in sin.[13128]
God (saith [13129]Fulgentius) is delighted in the conversion of a sinner, he sets no time; prolixitas temporis Deo non præjudicat, aut gravitas peccati, deferring of time or grievousness of sin, do not prejudicate his grace, things past and to come are all one to him, as present, 'tis never too late to repent.	God, says Fulgentius, delights in a sinner's conversion and sets no time limit; neither the length of time nor the gravity of sin prejudices God: delay or the gravity of sin does not prejudice his grace. Things past and things to come are all alike present to him. It is never too late to repent.[13130]

[13127] Editor. Burton voices the sufferer's objection to the preceding assurance. Cauterized evokes a conscience seared into insensibility; reprobate sense means a corrupt or rejected understanding. These are descriptions within the imagined religious complaint, not the editor's judgement of the sufferer.

[13128] Editor. The thief is the penitent criminal in Luke 23:39–43. The last hour also anticipates Burton's later use of the labourers called late to the vineyard. Mary Magdalene appears here in the traditional role of the penitent sinner.

[13129] Burton. Source page 709, x: "Delectatur Deus conversione peccatoris; omne tempus vitæ conversioni deputatur; pro præsentibus habentur tam præterita quam futura." "God delights in a sinner's conversion; the whole span of life is allotted for conversion; past and future things alike are regarded as present."

[13130] Editor. Prejudicate means prejudice or impair a claim. The Latin sentence and Burton's English restatement are both retained. The precise Fulgentius passage remains for collation; the margin adds that the whole span of life is allotted for conversion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[13131]This heaven of repentance is still open for all distressed souls; and howsoever as yet no signs appear, thou maist repent in good time. Hear a comfortable speech of S. Austin, [13132]Whatsoever thou shalt do, how great a sinner soever, thou art yet living; if God would not help thee, he would surely take thee away; but in sparing thy life, he gives thee leasure, and invites thee to repentance.	This heaven of repentance remains open to all distressed souls. Although no signs yet appear, you may repent in due time. Hear a consoling saying of Saint Augustine: Whatever you may do, however great a sinner you may be, you are still alive. If God would not help you, he would surely take you away; but in sparing your life, he gives you time and invites you to repent.[13133]
Howsoever as yet, I say, thou perceivest no fruit, no feeling, findest no likelihood of it in thy self, patiently abide the Lords good leisure; despair not, or think thou art a Reprobate; he came to call sinners to repentance, Luk. 5. 32. of which number thou art one; he came to call thee, and in his time will surely call thee.	Although, I say, you perceive no fruit or feeling yet and find no sign of it in yourself, wait patiently for the Lord's appointed time. Do not despair or think yourself rejected by God. He came to call sinners to repentance, Luke 5:32, and you are one of that number. He came to call you, and in his own time he will surely call you.[13134]

[13131] Burton. Source page 709, y: "Austin. Semper pœnitentiæ portus apertus est ne desperemus." "Augustine. The harbour of repentance is always open, so that we may not despair."

[13132] Burton. Source page 709, z: "Quicquid feceris, quantumcunque peccaveris, adhuc in vita es, unde te omnino si sanare te nollet Deus, auferret; parcendo clamat ut redeas, &c." "Whatever you have done, however much you have sinned, you are still alive; God would surely remove you from life if he did not wish to heal you. By sparing you he calls on you to return," and so on.

[13133] Editor. The scan's heaven is retained; the margin's portus means harbour or haven. That first saying remains unlocated. The following reassurance about being spared to repent corresponds to Augustine, Sermon 351.5.12, in a fuller Latin passage on God's patience. Burton compresses and varies its wording; his intermediary is untraced. Comfortable means consoling.

[13134] Editor. Reprobate is used here in the theological sense of one excluded from salvation. Fruit means the effects or outward signs of grace. Burton's assurance answers a feared judgement, not a demonstrated fact about the person's spiritual state.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 709–710 And although as yet thou hast no inclination to pray, to repent, thy faith be cold and dead, and thou wholy averse from all divine functions, yet it may revive, as Trees are dead in Winter but flourish in the Spring; these Vertues may lie hid in thee for the present, yet hereafter shew themselves, and peradventure already bud, howsoever thou dost not perceive it. 'Tis Satans policy to plead against, suppress and aggravate, to conceal those sparks of faith in thee.	Although you have no inclination yet to pray or repent, although your faith is cold and dead and you are wholly averse to religious duties, it may revive, as trees are dead in winter but flourish in spring. These virtues may lie hidden in you for the present and reveal themselves later; perhaps they are already budding, though you do not perceive it. Satan's strategy is to argue against you, suppress and aggravate, and conceal those sparks of faith within you.[13135]
Source page 710 Thou dost not believe thou saist, yet thou wouldst believe if thou couldst, 'tis thy desire to believe; then pray, [13136]Lord help mine unbelief; and hereafter thou shalt certainly believe: [13137]Dabitur sitienti, It shall be given to him that thirsteth.	You say that you do not believe, yet you would believe if you could: you desire to believe. Then pray, Lord, help my unbelief, and in time you will certainly believe: It will be given to the thirsty; it will be given to the one who thirsts.[13138]
Thou canst not yet repent, hereafter thou shalt; a black cloud of sin as yet obnubilates thy soul, terrifies thy conscience, but this cloud may conceive a Rain-bow at the last, and be quite dissipated by repentance. Be of good chear; a child is rational in power, not in act; and so art thou penitent in affection, though not yet in action.	You cannot repent yet; in time you will. A black cloud of sin still darkens your soul and terrifies your conscience, but this cloud may at last bring forth a rainbow and be entirely dispersed by repentance. Take heart: a child is rational in potential, though not in its exercise; so you are penitent in desire, though not yet in action.[13139]

[13135] Editor. The images of dormant trees and hidden sparks make lack of present feeling compatible with future revival. The objects of suppress and aggravate are compressed in Burton's syntax; the translation does not supply a new catalogue of sins or symptoms.

[13136] Burton. Source page 710, a: "Matth. 6. 23." "Matthew 6:23."

[13137] Burton. Source page 710, b: "Rev. 21. 6." "Revelation 21:6."

[13138] Editor. Lord help mine unbelief comes from Mark 9:24, not the printed marginal Matthew 6:23. The second margin correctly points to Revelation 21:6. The Latin promise and Burton's separate English translation both remain.

[13139] Editor. Obnubilates means clouds or darkens. In power and in act distinguish a capacity from its actual exercise; affection here means an inward disposition or desire. The rainbow continues the cloud image without cancelling the delay Burton acknowledges.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis thy desire to please God, to be heartily sorry; comfort thy self, no time is overpast, 'tis never too late. A desire to repent, is repentance it self, though not in nature, yet in Gods acceptance; a willing minde is sufficient. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, Mat. 5. 6. He that is destitute of Gods Grace, and wisheth for it shall have it.	You desire to please God and to be sincerely sorry. Take comfort: the time has not passed; it is never too late. The desire to repent is itself repentance, if not in its nature, then in God's acceptance of it; a willing mind is enough. Blessed are those who hunger and thirst for righteousness, Matthew 5:6. Anyone who lacks God's grace and longs for it shall have it.[13140]
The Lord (saith David, Psal. 10. 17) will hear the desire of the poor, that is, of such as are in distress of body and minde. 'Tis true thou canst not as yet grieve for thy sin, thou hast no feeling of faith, I yeeld; yet canst thou grieve thou dost not grieve? It troubles thee, I am sure, thine heart should be so impenitent and hard, thou wouldst have it otherwise; 'tis thy desire to grieve, to repent and believe.	The Lord, says David in Psalm 10:17, will hear the desire of the poor, meaning those distressed in body and mind. I grant that you cannot yet grieve for your sin and have no feeling of faith. Yet can you grieve because you do not grieve? It troubles you, I am sure, that your heart should be so unrepentant and hard; you would have it otherwise. You desire to grieve, repent and believe.[13141]
Thou lovest Gods children and Saints in the mean time, hatest them not, persecutest them not, but rather wishest thy self a true Professor, to be as they are, as thou thy self hast been heretofore; which is an evident token thou art in no such desperate case. 'Tis a good sign of thy conversion, thy sins are pardonable, thou art, or shalt surely be reconciled.	Meanwhile you love God's children and saints; you do not hate or persecute them. Rather, you wish to be a true professing believer, to be as they are and as you yourself once were. This plainly indicates that your condition is not so desperate. It is a good sign of your conversion: your sins can be pardoned; you are, or surely will be, reconciled.[13142]

[13140] Editor. Compare Perkins, Cases of Conscience (1606), I.7, third question, section 4, pp. 97–98: desire to repent and believe in a touched heart is accepted as faith and repentance. Burton preserves the distinction between nature and God's acceptance; removing it would falsely make a simple identity. The EEBO-TCP comparison does not identify his edition or settle the adjoining attributions.

[13141] Editor. The question shifts attention from the absence of sorrow to distress about that absence. Burton treats this second response as evidence of the desire for repentance. His poor is an interpretive paraphrase of the psalm's afflicted or humble.

[13142] Editor. Professor means someone who professes the faith, not an academic teacher. The distinction between present reconciliation and a hoped-for future reconciliation is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Lord is near them that are of a contrite heart, Luk. 4. 18. [13143]A true desire of mercy in the want of mercy, is mercy it self; a desire of grace in the want of grace, is grace it self; a constant and earnest desire to believe, repent, and to be reconciled to God, if it be in a touched heart, is an acceptation of God, a reconciliation, Faith and Repentance it self.	The Lord is near those with a contrite heart, Luke 4:18. A true desire for mercy when mercy is lacking is itself mercy; a desire for grace when grace is lacking is itself grace. A constant and earnest desire to believe, repent and be reconciled to God, if it is in a heart that has been moved, is acceptance by God, reconciliation, faith and repentance itself.[13144]
For it is not thy Faith and Repentance, as [13145]Chrysostom truly teacheth, that is vailable, but Gods mercy that is annexed to it, he accepts the will for the deed: So that I conclude; to feel in our selves the want of grace, and to be grieved for it, is grace it self.	For what has effect, as Chrysostom truly teaches, is not your faith and repentance but God's mercy joined to it: he accepts the will for the deed. I therefore conclude that to feel the lack of grace within ourselves and grieve over it is itself grace.[13146]
I am troubled with fear my sins are not forgiven, Careless objects; but Bradford answers, they are; For God hath given thee a penitent and believing heart, that is, an heart which desireth to repent and believe; for such a one is taken of him (he accepting the will for the deed) for a truly penitent and believing heart.	I am troubled by the fear that my sins are not forgiven, Careless objects. But Bradford answers that they are: God has given you a penitent and believing heart, meaning a heart that desires to repent and believe. He regards such a heart— accepting the will for the deed—as truly penitent and believing.[13147]

[13143] Burton. Source page 710, c: "Abernethy, Perkins."

[13144] Editor. The opening wording corresponds to Psalm 34:18. Burton prints Luke 4:18, a related passage that speaks in the King James tradition of healing the brokenhearted. Both the printed locator and the distinction are preserved. Touched means inwardly moved, particularly by an awareness of sin.

[13145] Burton. Source page 710, d: "Non est pœnitentia, sed Dei misericordia annexa." "It is not repentance, but God's mercy joined to it."

[13146] Editor. Vailable means effective or availing. The marginal Latin names repentance and divine mercy; Burton's body adds faith and the acceptance of intention. No work or homily is specified for the Chrysostom attribution.

[13147] Editor. John Bradford's letter to John Careless, preserved in Foxe's Acts and Monuments, contains this assurance and the explanation of a heart that desires to repent and believe. The exchange is cited testimony, not a confession by Burton.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All this is true thou replyest, but yet it concerns not thee, 'tis verified in ordinary offenders, in common sins, but thine are of an higher strain, even against the Holy Ghost himself, irremissible sins, sins of the first magnitude, written with a pen of Iron, engraven with the point of a Diamond.	All this is true, you reply, but it does not apply to you. It holds for ordinary offenders and common sins, while yours are of a higher order, against the Holy Spirit himself: unforgivable sins, sins of the greatest magnitude, written with an iron pen and engraved with a diamond point.[13148]

[13148] Editor. The iron pen and diamond point echo Jeremiah 17:1. First magnitude borrows the language of ranking stars by brightness. Burton is again stating the sufferer's objection, which he will answer by distinguishing unwanted thoughts from final, wilful rejection.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thou art worse then a Pagan, Infidel, Jew, or Turk; for thou art an Apostate and more, thou hast voluntarily blasphemed, renounced God and all Religion, thou art worse then Judas himself, or they that crucified Christ: for they did offend out of ignorance, but thou hast thought in thine heart there is no God.	You are worse than a pagan, unbeliever, Jew or Turk, for you are an apostate and more: you have deliberately blasphemed and renounced God and all religion. You are worse than Judas himself or those who crucified Christ, for they sinned out of ignorance, whereas you have thought in your heart that there is no God.[13149]
Source page 710–711 Thou hast given thy soul to the Divel, as Witchers and Conjurers do, explicitè and implicitè, by compact, band, and obligation (a desperate, a fearfull case) to satisfie thy lust, or to be revenged of thine enemies, thou didst never pray, come to Church, hear, read, or do any divine duties with any devotion, but for formality and fashion sake, with a kinde of reluctancie, 'twas troublesome and painfull to thee to perform any such thing, præter voluntatem, against thy will.	You have given your soul to the devil, as witches and conjurers do, explicitly and implicitly, by pact, bond and obligation—a desperate and fearful condition—to satisfy your lust or take revenge on your enemies. You have never prayed, attended church, listened, read or performed any religious duty with devotion, but only for form's sake and to follow custom, with a kind of reluctance. Any such performance was troublesome and painful to you, contrary to your will, against your will.[13150]
Source page 711 Thou never mad'st any conscience of lying, swearing, bearing false witness, murder, adultery, brybery, oppression, theft, drunkenness, idolatry, but hast ever done all duties for fear of punishment, as they were most advantageous, and to thine own ends, and committed all such notorious sins, with an extraordinary delight, hating that thou shouldest love, and loving that thou shouldest hate.	You have never had any scruple about lying, swearing, bearing false witness, murder, adultery, bribery, oppression, theft, drunkenness or idolatry. You have always fulfilled duties from fear of punishment, when they were most advantageous and served your own ends, and committed all such notorious sins with extraordinary delight, hating what you should love and loving what you should hate.[13151]

[13149] Editor. The hierarchy of religious outsiders belongs to the imagined self-accusation and to Burton's Christian polemical vocabulary. Apostate means one who abandons a previously professed faith. The translation retains the accusation rather than endorsing its ranking of people.

[13150] Editor. Band means bond, particularly a binding undertaking. Explicit and implicit pacts belong to the period's demonological account of witchcraft. The passage continues the sufferer's catalogue of accusations. The Latin phrase and its English restatement are both translated.

[13151] Editor. To make conscience of something means to consider it as a matter of moral obligation or scruple. The catalogue deliberately accumulates accusations; it is not evidence that a particular person committed them all.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In stead of Faith, fear and love of God, repentance, &c. blasphemous thoughts have been ever harboured in his minde, even against God himself, the blessed Trinitie: the [13152]Scripture false, rude, harsh, immethodicall: Heaven, hell, resurrection, meer toyes and fables; [13153]incredible, impossible, absurd, vain, ill contrived; Religion, Policie, and humane invention, to keep men in obedience, or for profit, invented by Priests and Law-givers to that purpose.	In place of faith, fear and love of God, repentance and so on, blasphemous thoughts have always lodged in his mind, even against God himself, the blessed Trinity: Scripture is false, crude, harsh and disordered; heaven, hell and resurrection are mere trifles and fables—incredible, impossible, absurd, empty and badly devised. Religion is statecraft and human invention, devised by priests and lawmakers to keep people obedient or to make a profit.[13154]
If there be any such supream power he takes no notice of our doings, hears not our prayers, regardeth them not, will not, cannot help, or else he is partiall, an excepter of persons, authour of sin, a cruell, a destructive God, to create our souls, and destinate them to eternall damnation, to make us worse then our dogs and horses, why doth he not govern things better, protect good men, root out wicked livers? why do they prosper and flourish? as she raved in the [13155]tragedy —— pellices cœlum tenent, there they shine,	If there is such a supreme power, he takes no notice of our actions, does not hear or regard our prayers, will not or cannot help; or else he is partial, shows favouritism, authors sin—a cruel and destructive God who creates our souls and destines them for eternal damnation, making us worse off than our dogs and horses. Why does he not govern things better, protect good people and root out the wicked? Why do they prosper and flourish? As she raged in the tragedy, mistresses occupy heaven: there they shine,[13156]
Suásq; Perseus aureas stellas habet,	And Perseus has his golden stars.[13157]

[13152] Burton. Source page 711, first asterisk: “Cecilius Minutio, Omnia ista figmenta male sanæ religionis, & inepta solatia à poetis inventa, vel ab aliis ob commodum, superstitiosa misteria, &c.” “Caecilius in Minucius: all those inventions of an unsound religion, foolish consolations devised by poets, or by others for gain, superstitious mysteries,” and so on.

[13153] Burton. Source page 711, second asterisk: “These temptations and objections are well answered in John Downams christian warfare.” “These temptations and objections are well answered in John Downame’s Christian Warfare.”

[13154] Editor. Burton shifts from thou to his while presenting thoughts he condemns. Policie here means political contrivance or statecraft. The margin invokes Caecilius, the pagan speaker in Minucius Felix’s Octavius 11; Burton abbreviates and extends that speech. These objections are not the conclusions of the dialogue or of this edition.

[13155] Burton. Source page 711, first dagger: “Seneca.”

[13156] Editor. The speaker is Juno in Seneca’s Hercules Furens 5. She complains that Jupiter’s mistresses occupy the sky as constellations. An excepter of persons is one who shows partiality. Burton uses Juno’s complaint within the imagined objection about divine justice; the following line is also hers.

[13157] Editor. Seneca, Hercules Furens 13, continuing Juno’s complaint. Aureas makes golden describe the stars. Suásq; abbreviates suasque, and the reference is to the constellation Perseus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
where is his providence? how appears it?	Where is his providence? How does it show itself?
Marmoreo Licinus tumulo jacet, at Cato parvo, Pomponius nullo, quis putet esse Deos.	Licinus lies in a marble tomb, Cato in a small one, Pomponius in none: who would think that gods exist?[13158]
Why doth he suffer Turks to overcome Christians, the enemy to triumph over his Church; Paganisme to domineer in all places as it doth, heresies to multiply, such enormities to be committed? and so many such bloudy wars, murders, massacres, plagues, feral diseases? why doth he not make us all good, able, sound? why makes he venomous creatures, rocks, sands, deserts, this earth it self the muck-hill of the world, a prison, an house of correction?	Why does he allow Turks to overcome Christians, the enemy to triumph over his Church, paganism to prevail everywhere as it does, heresies to multiply and such atrocities to be committed? Why so many bloody wars, murders, massacres, plagues and deadly diseases? Why does he not make us all good, capable and healthy? Why does he make venomous creatures, rocks, sands and deserts, and this earth itself the universe's dunghill, a prison, a house of correction?[13159]
[13160]Mentimur regnare Iovem, &c.[13161]	We lie when we say that Jupiter reigns, and so on.[13162]

[13158] Editor. A circulating Latin epigram contrasts burial honours with merit. Camden's Remaines prints Pompeius, Pompey, where Burton prints Pomponius, and Credimus esse Deos as its closing question. Burton's name and wording remain; they have not been silently replaced by the parallel. The epigram's authorship remains unresolved.

[13159] Editor. Burton continues the objection from the existence of suffering and evil, using the religious conflicts and hostile terminology of his own period. World in the earth–world contrast means the larger cosmos; a house of correction was a penal institution.

[13160] Burton. Source page 711, second dagger: "Vid. Campanella cap. 6. Atheis. Triumphat. et. c. 2 ad argumentum 12. ubi plura. Si Deus bonus unde colum, &c." "See Campanella, Atheism Triumphed Over, chapter 6, and chapter 2, argument 12, where there is more. If God is good, whence [evil?]?" and so on.

[13161] Burton. Source page 711, third dagger: "Lucan."

[13162] Editor. Lucan, Civil War 7.447, in the narrator's outcry over civil war and divine inaction. The scan's two dagger margins, Campanella and Lucan, are both attached here. In the Campanella margin, the final word after unde appears as colum; the familiar question would require malum, evil. The reading and tentative sense are explicitly recorded for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
With many such horrible and execrable conceits, not fit to be uttered; Terribilia de fide, horribilia de Divinitate. They cannot some of them but think evil, they are compelled volentes nolentes, to blaspheme, especially when they come to Church and pray, read, &c. such foul and prodigious suggestions come into their hearts.	With many other such horrible and accursed notions, unfit to be uttered: terrible things about faith, horrible things about the Godhead. Some cannot help thinking evil; they are compelled, willing or unwilling, to blaspheme, especially when they attend church, pray or read. Such foul and monstrous suggestions enter their hearts.[13163]
Source page 711–712 These are abominable, unspeakable offences, and most opposite to God, tentationes fœdæ & impiæ; yet in this case, he or they that shall be tempted and so affected, must know, that no man living is free from such thoughts in part, or at some times the most divine spirits have been so tempted in some sort, evil custom, omission of holy exercises, ill company, idleness, solitariness, melancholy, or depraved nature, and the divel is still ready to corrupt, trouble, and divert our souls, to suggest such blasphemous thoughts into our phantasies, ungodly, profane, monstrous and wicked conceits:	These are abominable, unspeakable offences, utterly opposed to God, foul and impious temptations. Yet anyone tempted and affected in this way must know that no living person is wholly free of such thoughts; at times even the most godly souls have been tempted in some degree. Evil habit, neglect of religious exercises, bad company, idleness, solitude, melancholy or corrupted nature may contribute, and the devil is always ready to corrupt, trouble and divert our souls, suggesting such blasphemous thoughts to our imaginations—ungodly, profane, monstrous and wicked notions.[13164]

[13163] Editor. Volentes nolentes means whether willing or not. Burton moves from the content of the objections to their unwanted occurrence, particularly during religious exercises. Prodigious here means monstrous, not impressively large.

[13164] Editor. Burton's syntax compresses a list of contributing conditions before returning to the devil's agency. Phantasies means the imagination or its representations. The religious and humoral explanation is preserved as Burton's account, without converting it into a modern diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 712 If they come from Satan, they are more speedy, fearfull and violent, the parties cannot avoid them: they are more frequent, I say, and monstrous when they come; for the divel he is a spirit, and hath means and opportunitie to mingle himself with our spirits, and sometimes more slily, sometimes more abruptly and openly, to suggest such divelish thoughts into our hearts; he insults and domineers in melancholy distempered phantasies and persons especially:	If they come from Satan, they are swifter, more frightening and more violent, and the sufferers cannot avoid them. They are more frequent, I say, and monstrous when they come. For the devil is a spirit and has the means and opportunity to mingle himself with our spirits, introducing such devilish thoughts into our hearts sometimes more secretly, sometimes more abruptly and openly. He assails and dominates especially those people and imaginations disturbed by melancholy.[13165]
Melancholy is balneum diaboli, as Serapio holds, the divels bath, and invites him to come to it. As a sick man frets, raves in his fits, speakes and doth he knows not what, the divel violently compels such crazed souls, to think such damned thoughts against their wils, they cannot but do it; sometimes more continuate, or by fits, he takes his advantage, as the subject is less able to resist, he aggravates, extenuates, affirms, denies, damnes, confounds the spirits, troubles heart, brain, humors, organs, senses, and wholly domineers in their imaginations.	Melancholy is the devil's bath, as Serapio holds—the devil's bath, inviting him into it. Just as a sick person frets and raves during attacks, saying and doing he knows not what, so the devil violently compels such disordered souls to think these damned thoughts against their wills. They cannot help it. Sometimes continuously, sometimes in attacks, he exploits their reduced power to resist: he exaggerates, minimizes, affirms, denies, condemns, confounds the spirits, troubles the heart, brain, humours, organs and senses, and wholly dominates their imaginations.[13166]

[13165] Editor. Spirits can refer to the subtle bodily vehicles of sensation and mental activity in early modern physiology, while Satan is described as a spiritual being. Burton combines these meanings in his explanation. Insults means attacks or assails.

[13166] Editor. The Latin bath image and Burton's English restatement both remain. The precise Serapio attribution has not been verified. Crazed means impaired or disordered, and fits means episodes or attacks. The catalogue describes Burton's model of compulsion; it does not establish supernatural causation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If they proceed from themselves, such thoughts, they are remiss and moderate, not so violent and monstrous, not so frequent. The divel commonly suggests things opposite to nature, opposite to God and his word, impious, absurd, such as a man would never of himself, or could not conceive, they strike terror and horror into the parties own heart.	If such thoughts proceed from the sufferers themselves, they are weaker and more moderate, less violent and monstrous, and less frequent. The devil commonly suggests things contrary to nature, contrary to God and his word: impious, absurd things that a person would never, or could never, conceive unaided. They strike terror and horror into the sufferer's own heart.[13167]
For if he or they be asked whether they do approve of such like thoughts or no, they answer (and their own souls truely dictate as much) they abhor them as Hell and the Divel himself, they would fain think otherwise if they could; he hath thought otherwise, and with all his soul desires so to think again; he doth resist, and hath some good motions intermixt now and then:	For if the sufferer is asked whether he approves of such thoughts, he answers—and his own soul truly tells him the same—that he abhors them as much as hell and the devil himself. He would gladly think otherwise if he could. He has thought otherwise and desires with his whole soul to think so again; he resists and sometimes has good impulses mingled with the rest.[13168]
So that such blasphemous, impious, unclean thoughts, are not his own, but the Divels; they proceed not from him, but from a crazed phantasie, distempered humours, black fumes which offend his brain: [13169]they are thy crosses, the Divels sins, and he shall answer for them, he doth enforce thee to do that which thou dost abhor, and didst never give consent to:	Thus these blasphemous, impious and unclean thoughts are not his own but the devil's. They proceed not from him but from a disordered imagination, disturbed humours and black vapours that injure his brain. They are your afflictions and the devil's sins, and he shall answer for them: he forces you to do what you abhor and have never consented to.[13170]

[13167] Editor. Remiss means slackened or less intense. The contrast in intensity and origin is Burton's proposed distinction, not a reliable modern means of identifying the cause of an unwanted thought.

[13168] Editor. The original shifts between singular and plural; the modern text follows the individual sufferer through this sentence. Motions means inward impulses. Approval and resistance, rather than the thought's mere presence, become central to Burton's argument.

[13169] Burton. Source page 712, e: "Perkins."

[13170] Editor. Crosses means afflictions or burdens. Burton places the moral responsibility outside the unwilling sufferer while also invoking a bodily explanation through humours and vapours. The margin attributes the counsel to Perkins without a precise locator.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And although he hath sometimes so slily set upon thee, and so far prevailed, as to make thee in some sort to assent to such wicked thoughts, to delight in, yet they have not proceeded from a confirmed will in thee, but are of that nature which thou dost afterwards reject and abhor.	Although he has sometimes attacked so secretly and prevailed so far as to make you assent in some degree to these wicked thoughts and take delight in them, they have not proceeded from a settled will within you; they are thoughts that you afterwards reject and abhor.[13171]
Therefore be not overmuch troubled and dismaid with such kinde of suggestions, at least if they please thee not, because they are not thy personall sins, for which thou shalt incur the wrath of God, or his displeasure: contemn, neglect them, let them go as they come, strive not too violently, or trouble thy self too much, but as our Saviour said to Satan in like case, say thou, Avoid Satan, I detest thee and them.	Therefore do not be excessively troubled or dismayed by such suggestions, at least if they give you no pleasure, because they are not your personal sins, bringing God's wrath or displeasure upon you. Disregard and ignore them; let them go as they come. Do not struggle too violently or distress yourself too much. Instead, as our Saviour said to Satan in a similar case, say, Begone, Satan; I detest you and these thoughts.[13172]
Source page 712–713 Satanæ est mala ingerere (saith Austin) nostrum non consentire: as Satan labours to suggest, so must we strive not to give consent, and it will be sufficient: the more anxious and sollicitous thou art, the more perplexed, the more thou shalt otherwise be troubled, and intangled.	It is Satan's part to thrust evil upon us, says Augustine, ours not to consent. As Satan labours to suggest it, so we must strive not to consent, and that will be enough. The more anxious and preoccupied you are, the more perplexed, troubled and entangled you will otherwise become.[13173]

[13171] Editor. A confirmed will is a settled, deliberate disposition. Burton extends the distinction beyond absolute absence of assent to partial or temporary assent that is later rejected. The qualification in some sort is retained.

[13172] Editor. Avoid is an imperative meaning depart or begone; it does not mean that the sufferer should avoid a place or activity. The phrase recalls Matthew 4:10. Burton qualifies his advice with if they please thee not; that condition is preserved.

[13173] Editor. The Latin maxim and Burton's explanatory English both remain. Sollicitous means anxiously concerned. Burton warns that excessive attention to the thoughts can deepen distress. The exact Augustinian source remains for verification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 713 Besides, they must know this, all so molested and distempered, that although these be most execrable and grievous sins, they are pardonable yet, through Gods mercy and goodness they may be forgiven, if they be penitent and sorry for them. Paul himself confesseth, Rom. 7. 19. He did not the good he would do, but the evil which he would not do; 'tis not I, but sin that dwelleth in me.	Besides, all who are so troubled and disordered must know that, although these are most accursed and grievous sins, they can still be pardoned. Through God's mercy and goodness they may be forgiven if the sufferers repent and are sorry for them. Paul himself confesses in Romans 7:19: He did not do the good he wished to do, but the evil he did not wish to do; it is not I, but sin dwelling in me.[13174]
'Tis not thou, but Satans suggestions, his craft and subtilty, his malice: comfort thy self then if thou be penitent and grieved, or desirous to be so, these hainous sins shall not be laid to thy charge; Gods mercy is above all sins, which if thou do not finally contemn, without doubt thou shalt be saved.	It is not you, but Satan's suggestions, his cunning, subtlety and malice. Take comfort, then, if you are penitent and grieved, or desire to be so: these heinous sins will not be charged against you. God's mercy is above all sins; if you do not finally reject it, you will without doubt be saved.[13175]
[13176]No mans sins against the Holy Ghost, but he that wilfully and finally renounceth Christ, and contemneth him and his word to the last, without which there is no salvation, from which grievous sin, God of his infinite mercy deliver us.	No one sins against the Holy Spirit except the person who wilfully and finally renounces Christ and despises him and his word to the end, without which there is no salvation. From that grievous sin may God in his infinite mercy deliver us.[13177]

[13174] Editor. The quotation combines Romans 7:19 with the following verse, 7:20, and shifts from reporting Paul to his first-person words. Burton turns from denying culpability for involuntary thoughts to the additional assurance of pardon where sin has occurred.

[13175] Editor. Finally means conclusively or to the end, anticipating the definition in the next sentence. The promise retains Burton's condition concerning the rejection of mercy.

[13176] Burton. Source page 713, f: "Hemmingius. Nemo peccat in spiritum sanctum nisi qui finaliter & voluntarie renunciat Christo, eumque & ejus verbum extreme contemnit, sine quo nulla salus; à quo peccato, liberet nos Dominus Jesus Christus. Amen." "Hemmingsen. No one sins against the Holy Spirit except one who finally and voluntarily renounces Christ and utterly despises him and his word, without whom there is no salvation. May the Lord Jesus Christ deliver us from that sin. Amen."

[13177] Editor. The scan prints No mans sins, a grammatical irregularity rendered No one sins. Hemmingius is Niels Hemmingsen. Burton gives one theological definition of the sin against the Holy Spirit; the exact passage in Hemmingsen remains unresolved. The marginal prayer names the Lord Jesus Christ and ends Amen, details retained in its translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Take hold of this to be thy comfort, and meditate withall on Gods word, labour to pray, to repent, to be renewed in minde, keep thine heart with all diligence, Prov. 4. 13. resist the Divel and he will fly from thee, poure out thy soul unto the Lord with sorrowfull Hannah, pray continually, as Paul injoyns, and as David did, Psal. 1. meditate on his law day and night.	Take hold of this as your comfort, and also meditate on God's word. Strive to pray, repent and be renewed in mind. Guard your heart with all diligence, Proverbs 4:13. Resist the devil and he will flee from you; pour out your soul to the Lord with sorrowful Hannah; pray continually, as Paul commands; and, as David did in Psalm 1, meditate on his law day and night.[13178]
Yea but this meditation is that that mars all, and mistaken makes many men far worse, misconceiving all they read or hear, to their own overthrow; the more they search and read Scriptures, or divine Treatises, the more they pusle themselves, as a bird in a net, the more they are intangled and precipitated into this preposterous gulf:	Yes, but this very meditation ruins everything when misdirected, making many people far worse. They misunderstand all they read or hear, to their own downfall. The more they search and read Scripture or theological treatises, the more they bewilder themselves, like a bird in a net, becoming more entangled and plunging into this perverse gulf:[13179]
Many are called, but few are chosen, Mat. 20. 16. and 22. 14. with such like places of Scripture misinterpreted strike them with horror, they doubt presently whether they be of this number or no: Gods eternall decree of predestination, absolute reprobation, and such fatall tables they form to their own ruine, and impinge upon this rock of despair.	Many are called, but few are chosen, Matthew 20:16 and 22:14. Such passages of Scripture, misinterpreted, strike them with horror; they immediately doubt whether they belong to this number. They construct God's eternal decree of predestination, absolute reprobation and such tables of destiny to their own ruin, and strike against this rock of despair.[13180]

[13178] Editor. Guarding the heart belongs to Proverbs 4:23, not the printed 4:13. The other allusions are James 4:7, Hannah's prayer in 1 Samuel 1:15, 1 Thessalonians 5:17 and Psalm 1:2. Printed locators remain visible; the note supplies the distinctions.

[13179] Editor. Burton now raises a difficulty with his own advice: religious reading can intensify distress when interpreted against oneself. Pusle means puzzle or perplex; precipitated means hurled headlong.

[13180] Editor. Predestination concerns God's determination of salvation; reprobation concerns exclusion from it. Fatall tables evokes determinations or registers of destiny, possibly the schemes used to set out such doctrine. Burton's Matthew 20:16 wording is present in the King James tradition but absent from some modern textual traditions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
How shall they be assured of their salvation, by what signes? If the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and sinners appear? 1 Pet. 4. 18. Who knows, saith Solomon, whether he be elect? This grinds their souls, how shall they discern they are not reprobates? But I say again, how shall they discern they are?	How can they be assured of their salvation, and by what signs? If the righteous are scarcely saved, where shall the ungodly and sinners appear? 1 Peter 4:18. Who knows, says Solomon, whether he is among the elect? This grinds their souls. How can they tell that they are not rejected by God? But I ask in return: how can they tell that they are?[13181]
From the divell can be no certainty, for he is a lyar from the beginning: if he suggest any such thing, as too frequently he doth, reject him as a deceiver, an enemy of humane kinde, dispute not with him, give no credit to him, obstinately refuse him, as S. Anthony did in the wilderness, whom the Divel set upon in severall shapes, or as the Collier did, so do thou by him.	No certainty can come from the devil, for he is a liar from the beginning. If he suggests anything of the kind, as he all too often does, reject him as a deceiver and an enemy of humankind. Do not debate with him or believe him; refuse him stubbornly, as Saint Anthony did in the wilderness when the devil attacked him in various shapes, or as the charcoal-burner did. Treat him in the same way.[13182]
For when the divell tempted him with the weakness of his faith, and told him he could not be saved, as being ignorant in the principles of Religion: and urged him moreover to know what he beleeved, what he thought of such and such points and mysteries: the Collier told him, he beleeved as the Church did; but what (said the Divel again) doth the Church beleeve? as I do (said the Collier) and what's that thou beleevest? as the Church doth, &c. when the divel could get no other answer, he left him.	When the devil tempted him with the weakness of his faith and told him that he could not be saved because he was ignorant of religion's principles, he pressed him further about what he believed and what he thought of this or that doctrine and mystery. The charcoal-burner said that he believed as the Church did. But what, the devil asked again, does the Church believe? As I do, said the charcoal-burner. And what do you believe? As the Church does, and so on. When the devil could get no other answer, he left him.[13183]

[13181] Editor. The reversal challenges the certainty of self-condemnation. Elect means chosen for salvation. Burton gives no biblical locator for the question attributed to Solomon, and its exact source remains unresolved.

[13182] Editor. The liar from the beginning recalls John 8:44. Anthony's resistance to demons in different forms is narrated in Athanasius's Life of Antony, especially sections 8–10. Collier here is a charcoal-burner; the anecdote's immediate source is not specified.

[13183] Editor. The story makes refusal to enter an endless dispute a defence against temptation. The circular exchange is deliberately retained rather than supplied with doctrinal answers absent from the source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 713–714 If Satan summon thee to answer, send him to Christ: he is thy liberty, thy protector against cruell death, raging sin, that roaring Lyon; he is thy righteousness, thy Saviour, and thy life. Though he say, thou art not of the number of the elect, a reprobate, forsaken of God, hold thine own still,	If Satan summons you to answer, send him to Christ. Christ is your freedom, your protector against cruel death, raging sin and that roaring lion; he is your righteousness, your Saviour and your life. Though Satan says that you are not among the elect, that you are rejected and forsaken by God, still hold your ground,[13184] [13184] Editor. The roaring lion is the devil of 1 Peter 5:8. The modern text makes the shifting references of he explicit so that Christ's protection is not confused with Satan's accusation. The following Horatian fragment introduces a protective wall.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 714 ——hic murus aheneus esto,	——let this be a wall of bronze.[13185]
Let this be as a bulwark, a brazen wall to defend thee, stay thy self in that certainty of faith; let that be thy comfort, CHRIST will protect thee, vindicate thee, thou art one of his flock, he will triumph over the law, vanquish death, overcome the divel, and destroy hell.	Let this be a rampart, a wall of bronze to defend you. Steady yourself in that certainty of faith; let it be your comfort. CHRIST will protect and deliver you; you are one of his flock. He will triumph over the law, vanquish death, overcome the devil and destroy hell.[13186]
If he say thou art none of the elect, no beleever, reject him, defie him, thou hast thought otherwise, and maist so be resolved again; comfort thy self; this perswasion cannot come from the divell, and much less can it be grounded from thy self; men are lyars, and why shouldest thou distrust?	If he says that you are not among the elect and are no believer, reject and defy him. You have thought otherwise and may be assured of it again. Take comfort: this conviction cannot come from the devil, and still less can it be grounded in yourself; human beings are liars, and why should you distrust?[13187]
A denying Peter, a persecuting Paul, an adulterous cruell David, have been received; an Apostate Solomon may be converted; no sin at all but impenitency, can give testimony of final reprobation. Why shouldest thou then distrust, misdoubt thy self, upon what ground, what suspicion? This opinion alone of particularity?	Peter who denied, Paul who persecuted, and David who was adulterous and cruel have been received; Solomon who fell away may be converted. No sin but unrepentance can testify to final rejection. Why, then, should you distrust and doubt yourself? On what grounds, on what suspicion? Merely this opinion that salvation is restricted to particular people?[13188]

[13185] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.1.60–61. In Horace the wall is a clear conscience; Burton applies the image to certainty of faith. The verse fragment and Burton's following English expansion are both retained. Aheneus means made of bronze or brass.

[13186] Editor. Stay means support or steady; vindicate here includes rescue or deliverance. The repeated fortification image translates the Latin wall into the language of spiritual protection.

[13187] Editor. This perswasion has an unstable antecedent: the passage moves between the devil's accusation and assurance of faith. The wording is retained without silently resolving the ambiguity. The next sentences return to reasons against despair.

[13188] Editor. Particularity concerns election confined to particular persons, in contrast to the universal promises Burton now assembles. May be converted is retained for Solomon rather than turned into a claim that his conversion is established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Against that, and for the certainty of Election and salvation on the other side, see Gods good will toward men, hear how generally his grace is proposed to him, and him, and them, each man in particular, and to all. 1 Tim. 2. 4. God will that all men be saved, and come to the knowledge of the truth.	Against that opinion, and in support of certainty of election and salvation, consider God's goodwill towards humanity. Hear how universally his grace is offered to this person, that person and those people, to each individual and to all. 1 Timothy 2:4: God wills that all people be saved and come to knowledge of the truth.[13189]
'Tis an universall promise, God sent not his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that through him the world might be saved, John 3. 17. He then that acknowledgeth himself a man in the world, must likewise acknowledge he is of that number that is to be saved: Ezek. 33. 11. I will not the death of a sinner, but he that he repent and live: But thou art a sinner, therefore he will not thy death.	It is a universal promise: God did not send his Son into the world to condemn the world, but that through him the world might be saved, John 3:17. Anyone, then, who acknowledges himself to be a person in the world must also acknowledge that he is among those to be saved. Ezekiel 33:11: I do not will a sinner's death, but that he repent and live. But you are a sinner; therefore he does not will your death.[13190]
This is the will of him that sent me, that every man that beleeveth in the Son, should have everlasting life. John 6. 40. He would have no man perish, but all come to repentance, 2 Pet. 3. 9. Besides, remission of sins is to be preached, not to a few, but universally to all men. Go therefore and tell all Nations, baptizing them, &c. Matth. 28. 19. Go into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature, Mark 16. 15.	This is the will of him who sent me, that everyone who believes in the Son should have everlasting life, John 6:40. He wishes no one to perish, but all to come to repentance, 2 Peter 3:9. Moreover, forgiveness of sins is to be preached universally, to everyone, not merely a few. Go therefore and tell all nations, baptizing them, and so on, Matthew 28:19. Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, Mark 16:15.[13191]

[13189] Editor. The distribution to him, and him, and them insists that a general promise reaches the individual hearer. Burton's argument concerning universal grace continues beyond this block and will include objections and competing positions.

[13190] Editor. Burton frames the promises as arguments addressed to the individual sufferer. The Ezekiel quotation contains the printed irregularity but he that he, rendered according to its evident sense. Will here means desire or intend, not merely a prediction of the future.

[13191] Editor. The sequence preserves the condition believes alongside the language of universality. Burton prints tell all Nations in the Matthew quotation; it is not silently replaced with teach or make disciples from other biblical texts.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now there cannot be contradictory wils in God; he will have all saved, and not all, how can this stand together? be secure then, beleeve, trust in him, hope well and be saved.	Now God cannot have contradictory wills: he wills that all be saved, and that not all be saved—how can these stand together? Be assured, then; believe, trust in him, hope for the best and be saved.[13192]
Yea that's the main matter, how shall I beleeve or discern my security from carnall presumption? my faith is weak and faint, I want those signes and fruits of sanctification, [13193]sorrow for sin, thirsting for grace, groanings of the spirit, love of Christians as Christians, avoiding occasion of sin, endeavour of new obedience, charity, love of God, perseverance.	Yes, that is the main difficulty: how can I believe or distinguish my assurance from fleshly presumption? My faith is weak and faint. I lack the signs and fruits of sanctification: sorrow for sin, thirst for grace, groanings of the spirit, love of Christians as Christians, avoidance of occasions of sin, striving for renewed obedience, charity, love of God and perseverance.[13194]
Source page 714–715 Though these signes be languishing in thee, and not seated in thine heart, thou must not therefore be dejected or terrified, the effects of the faith and spirit are not yet so fully felt in thee; conclude not therefore thou art a reprobate, or doubt of thine election, because the Elect themselves are without them, before their conversion. Thou maist in the Lords good time be converted; some are called at the 11th. hour: Use, I say, the means of thy conversion, expect the Lords leisure, if not yet called, pray thou maist be, or at least wish and desire thou maist be.	Although these signs are weak in you and not established in your heart, you must not therefore be dejected or terrified. The effects of faith and the Spirit are not yet fully felt within you. Do not therefore conclude that you are rejected, or doubt your election, for even the elect lack these signs before their conversion. You may be converted in the Lord's good time; some are called at the eleventh hour. Use, I say, the means of your conversion; wait for the Lord's appointed time. If you have not yet been called, pray that you may be, or at least wish and desire it.[13195]

[13192] Editor. This is Burton's rhetorical question within a pastoral argument. It should not be taken as a resolution of every distinction concerning divine will; the discussion of election and universal grace continues in the following discussion.

[13193] Burton. Source page 714, g: "Abernethy."

[13194] Editor. The sufferer objects again. Carnall presumption means unfounded confidence rooted in the unrenewed self; security here means assurance. Sanctification is growth in holiness. The margin names Abernethy as a source for the signs.

[13195] Editor. The eleventh hour recalls the labourers hired late in Matthew 20:6–9. Expect means await. This completes the response about weak signs of faith; the next paragraph turns to the continuing torment caused by speculation about election, reprobation, free will and grace.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 715 Notwithstanding all this which might be said to this effect, to ease their afflicted minds, what comfort our best Divines can afford in this case, Zanchius, Beza, &c. This furious curiosity, needless speculation, fruitless meditation about election, reprobation, free will, grace, such places of Scripture preposterously conceived, torment still, and crucifie the souls of too many, and set all the world together by the ears.	Despite all that might be said to this purpose to ease their afflicted minds, despite whatever comfort our best theologians—Zanchius, Beza and others—can offer in this case, this frenzied curiosity, needless speculation and fruitless meditation on election, reprobation, free will and grace, and these passages of Scripture perversely understood, still torment and crucify too many souls and set the whole world at odds.[13196]
To avoid which inconveniences, and to settle their distressed mindes, to mitigate those divine Aphorismes, (though in another extream some) our late Arminians have revived that plausible doctrine of universall grace, which many Fathers, our late Lutheran and modern Papists do still maintain, that we have free-will of our selves, and that grace is common to all that will beleeve.	To prevent these troubles, settle distressed minds and soften those theological pronouncements—though some go to the other extreme—our recent Arminians have revived the appealing doctrine of universal grace. Many Church Fathers, recent Lutherans and present-day Roman Catholics still maintain it: that we have free will of ourselves, and that grace is available to all who will believe.[13197]
Some again though less orthodoxall, will have a far greater part saved, then shall be damned, (as [13198]Cælius secundus stiffly maintains in his book, De amplitudine regni cœlestis, or some impostor under his name) beatorum numerus multo major quam damnatorum.	Others, though less orthodox, hold that far more will be saved than damned—as Caelius Secundus firmly maintains in his book On the Extent of the Heavenly Kingdom, or as some impostor writing under his name maintains: the number of the blessed is far greater than that of the damned.[13199]

[13196] Editor. Election is God's choosing for salvation; reprobation, exclusion from it. Burton connects private torment with public religious conflict. The scan reads minds at the opening; mindes was an earlier transcription of the continuation cue. The wording here follows the scan.

[13197] Editor. Plausible means attractive or persuasive, not necessarily true. Papists is Burton's polemical term for Roman Catholics. These are his compressed descriptions of disputed teachings, not exact definitions accepted by every theologian he groups together.

[13198] Burton. Source page 715, i: "See whole books of these arguments."

[13199] Editor. Caelius Secundus is Celio Secondo Curione. Basel's catalogue identifies De amplitudine beati regni Dei (1554) as dialogi sive libri duo, dialogues or two books. Burton's book 3, leaf 122 locator therefore remains unexplained. Catalogue identification does not verify his attributed arguments or suspicion about the author; his shortened title and wording are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[13200]He cals that other Tenent of speciall [13201]Election and Reprobation, a prejudicate, envious and malicious opinion, apt to draw all men to desperation. Many are called, few chosen, &c. He opposeth some opposite parts of Scripture to it, Christ came into the world to save sinners, &c.	He calls the other doctrine, of particular election and reprobation, a prejudiced, envious and malicious opinion, apt to drive everyone to despair. Against Many are called, few are chosen, and similar passages, he sets other, contrary passages of Scripture: Christ came into the world to save sinners, and so on.[13202]
And four especiall arguments he produceth, one from Gods power. If more be damned then saved, he erroneously concludes, [13203]the divel hath the greater sovereigntie; for what is power but to protect? and Majestie consists in multitude. If the divell have the greater part, where is his mercy, where is his power? how is he Deus Optimus Maximus, misericors? &c. where is his greatness, where his goodness?	He produces four principal arguments, one drawn from God's power. If more are damned than saved, he wrongly concludes, the devil has the greater sovereignty; for what is power but the ability to protect? And majesty consists in numbers. If the devil has the greater share, where is God's mercy, where is his power? How is he God Most Good, Most Great and Merciful, and so on? Where is his greatness, where his goodness?[13204]

[13200] Burton. Source page 715, k: "Lib. 3. fol. 122. Præjudicata opinio, invida, maligna, & apta ad impellendos animos in desperationem." "Book 3, leaf 122. A prejudiced, envious, malicious opinion, apt to drive minds into despair."

[13201] Burton. Source page 715, first dagger: "See the Antidote in Chamiers Tom. 3. lib. 7. Downams Christian warfare, &c." See the counterargument in Chamier, volume 3, book 7, and Downam's Christian Warfare, and so on.

[13202] Editor. Prejudicate means prejudged or prejudiced. The contrasting texts recall Matthew 22:14 and 1 Timothy 1:15. The second margin recommends counterarguments in Chamier and Downam; it is Burton's intervention in the reported dispute.

[13203] Burton. Source page 715, l: "Potentior est Deo diabolus & mundi princeps, & in multitudine hominum sita est majestas." "The devil, the prince of the world, is more powerful than God; and majesty resides in the multitude of people."

[13204] Editor. Erroneously marks Burton's rejection of the inference. The Latin divine titles are translated. Burton announces four arguments but does not set out four formally numbered divisions here; none have been supplied.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He proceeds, [13205]We account him a murderer that is accessary onely, or doth not help when he can; which may not be supposed of God without great offence, because he may do what he will, and is otherwise accessary, and the author of sin.	He continues: We consider someone a murderer who merely assists the crime, or fails to help when he can. Such a thing cannot be supposed of God without great offence, since he can do whatever he wills; otherwise he is an accomplice and the author of sin.[13206]
The nature of good is to be communicated, God is good, and will not then be contracted in his goodness: for how is he the Father of mercy and comfort, if his good concern but a few? O envious and unthankfull men to think otherwise!	Goodness by its nature is shared. God is good, and therefore will not be restricted in his goodness: for how is he the Father of mercy and comfort if his goodness concerns only a few? How envious and ungrateful people are to think otherwise![13207]
[13208]Why should we pray to God that are Gentiles, and thank him for his mercies and benefits, that hath damned us all innocuous for Adams offence, one mans offence, one small offence, eating of an apple? Why should we acknowledge him for our governour that hath wholly neglected the salvation of our souls, contemned us, and sent no Prophets or instructors to teach us, as he hath done to the Hebrewes? So Julian the Apostate objects.	Why should we Gentiles pray to God and thank him for his mercies and benefits, when he has condemned us all, though innocent, for Adam's offence—one person's offence, one small offence, eating an apple? Why should we acknowledge as our ruler one who has entirely neglected our souls' salvation, despised us and sent no prophets or teachers to instruct us, as he has the Hebrews? So Julian the Apostate objects.[13209]

[13205] Burton. Source page 715, m: "Homicida qui non subvenit quum potest; hoc de Deo sine scelere cogitari non potest, utpote quem quod vult licet. Boni natura communicari. Bonus Deus, quomodo misericordiæ pater, &c." "One who does not help when able is a murderer. This cannot be thought of God without wickedness, since whatever he wills is within his power. It is the nature of goodness to be shared. God is good: how is he the Father of mercy?" And so on.

[13206] Editor. Accessary means complicit or an accomplice. This continues the argument Burton is reporting; its accusation is not the editor's conclusion. The full Latin marginal version appears in the Burton note.

[13207] Editor. Communicated means imparted or shared; contracted means confined or narrowed. The argument moves from divine power to the nature and extent of divine goodness.

[13208] Burton. Source page 715, second dagger: "Vide Cyrillum lib. 4. adversus Julianum, qui poterimus illi gratias agere qui nobis non misit Mosen & prophetas, & contempsit bona animarum nostrarum?" "See Cyril, book 4 Against Julian. How shall we give thanks to one who did not send us Moses and the prophets, and disregarded the welfare of our souls?"

[13209] Editor. Innocuous means innocent. Julian's Against the Galileans, preserved through Cyril's refutation, asks why God withheld teachers and prophets from other nations (Wright translation, pp. 353–355). This parallels the marginal objection, not every detail of Burton's broader paraphrase. The Cyril book 4 locator and Latin wording remain uncollated. The apple is traditional: Genesis names only fruit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Why should these Christians (Cælius urgeth) reject us and appropriate God unto themselves, Deum illum suum unicum, &c. But to return to our forged Cælius. At last he comes to that, he will have those saved that never heard of, or beleeved in Christ, ex puris naturalibus, with the Pelagians, and proves it out of Origen and others.	Why should these Christians, Caelius argues, reject us and claim God exclusively for themselves—that God of theirs alone, and so on? But to return to our counterfeit Caelius. At last he reaches this position: that those who never heard of or believed in Christ may be saved by their unaided natural powers, along with the Pelagians; and he supports it from Origen and others.[13210]
Source page 715–716 They (saith [13211]Origen) that never heard Gods word, are to be excused for their ignorance: we may not think God will be so hard, angry, cruell or injust as to condemn any man indicta causa. They alone (he holds) are in the state of damnation that refuse Christs mercy and grace, when it is offered.	Those who have never heard God's word, says Origen, are to be excused for their ignorance. We must not think God so hard, angry, cruel or unjust as to condemn anyone without a hearing. Only those who refuse Christ's mercy and grace when it is offered, he holds, are in a state of damnation.[13212]

[13210] Editor. Forged continues Burton's doubt about the author's identity. Ex puris naturalibus refers to natural capacities without added grace. The association with Pelagianism and the claim about Origen remain Burton's account and require separate collation with the named authors.

[13211] Burton. Source page 715, n: "Venia danda est iis qui non audiunt ob ignorantiam. Non est tam iniquus Judex Deus, ut quemquam indicta causa damnare velit. Ii solum damnantur, qui oblatam Christi gratiam rejiciunt." "Pardon must be granted to those who do not hear, because of their ignorance. God is not so unjust a judge as to wish to condemn anyone without a hearing. Only those who reject Christ's offered grace are condemned."

[13212] Editor. Indicta causa means without the case being heard. Burton's English sentence crosses the page boundary before this Latin phrase. The exact Origen passage and the extent of the attribution remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 716 Many worthy Greeks and Romans, good moral honest men, that kept the Law of Nature, did to others as they would be done to themselves, as certainly saved, he concludes, as they were that lived uprightly before the Law of Moses. They were acceptable in Gods sight, as Job was, the Magi, the Queen of Sheba, Darius of Persia, Socrates, Aristides, Cato, Curius, Tully, Seneca, and many other Philosophers, upright livers, no matter of what Religion, as Cornelius, out of any Nation, so that he live honestly, call on God, trust in him, fear him, he shall be saved.	He concludes that many worthy Greeks and Romans—good, moral, upright people who kept the law of nature and treated others as they wished to be treated—are as certainly saved as those who lived uprightly before the law of Moses. They were acceptable in God's sight, as Job was: the Magi, the Queen of Sheba, Darius of Persia, Socrates, Aristides, Cato, Curius, Cicero, Seneca and many other philosophers who lived uprightly. Whatever someone's religion or nation, as with Cornelius, provided he lives honestly, calls on God, trusts him and fears him, he will be saved.[13213]
This Opinion was formerly maintained by the Valentinian and Basilidian hereticks, revived of late in [13214]Turky, of what sect Rustan Bassa was patron, defended by [13215]Galeatius Martius, and some ancient Fathers, and of later times favoured by [13216]Erasmus, by Zuinglius in exposit. fidei ad Regem Galliæ, whose Tenet Bullinger vindicates, and Gualter approves in a just Apology with many Arguments.	This opinion was formerly maintained by the Valentinian and Basilidian heretics, revived recently in Turkey in a sect whose patron was Rustan Pasha, defended by Galeatius Martius and some ancient Church Fathers, and in later times favoured by Erasmus and by Zwingli in his Exposition of the Faith to the King of France. Bullinger defends Zwingli's position, and Gualter supports it in a full defence with many arguments.[13217]

[13213] Editor. Tully is Cicero. Cornelius is the Gentile centurion of Acts 10, especially verses 34–35. The condition so that means provided that. Burton is still reporting the argument, rather than declaring his own final position.

[13214] Burton. Source page 716, o: "Busbequius Lonicrus Tur. hist. To. 1. l. 2." Busbecq; Lonicer, Turkish History, volume 1, book 2.

[13215] Burton. Source page 716, p: "Clem. Alex." Clement of Alexandria.

[13216] Burton. Source page 716, q: "Paulus Jovius Elog. vir. Illust." Paolo Giovio, Eulogies of Illustrious Men.

[13217] Editor. Zwingli, Exposition of the Christian Faith (1536), fol. 27r, places virtuous pagans among the blessed. Gwalther's Apology (1545), fol. 56r, defends their salvation through divine grace, expressly denying that each religion saves through itself. These Latin passages clarify two entries, not the whole catalogue or Burton's editions. Just means full or duly developed; the margins cite Busbecq/Lonicer, Clement and Giovio.

Original text 1651	Modern English
There be many Jesuites that follow these Calvinists in this behalf, Franciscus Buchsius Moguntinus, Andradius Consil. Trident. many Schoolmen that out of the 1 Rom. v. 18. 19. are verily perswaded that those good works of the Gentiles did so far please God, that they might vitam æternam promereri, and be saved in the end.	Many Jesuits follow these Calvinists on this point: Franciscus Buchsius of Mainz, Andradius at the Council of Trent, and many scholastic theologians who are firmly persuaded from Romans 5:18–19 that the Gentiles' good works so pleased God that they might merit eternal life and ultimately be saved.[13218]
Sesellius, and Benedictus Justinianus in his Comment on the first of the Romans, Mathias Ditmarsh the Politician, with many others, hold a mediocrity, they may be salute non indigni, but they will not absolutely decree it. Hofmannus a Lutheran Professor of Helmstad, and many of his Followers, with most of our Church, and Papists are stiffe against it.	Sesellius, Benedictus Justinianus in his commentary on the first chapter of Romans, Mathias Ditmarsh the political writer and many others take a middle position: these people may be not unworthy of salvation, but they will not pronounce on it absolutely. Hofmannus, a Lutheran professor at Helmstedt, and many of his followers, together with most of our Church and the Roman Catholics, firmly oppose it.[13219]
Franciscus Collius hath fully censured all Opinions in his five Books de Paganorum animabus post mortem, and amply dilated this question, which who so will may peruse.	Franciscus Collius has fully examined all the opinions in his five books On the Souls of Pagans after Death, and discussed this question at length; anyone who wishes may consult them.[13220]

[13218] Editor. The printed locator is 1 Rom. v. 18. 19.; its chapter and verses identify Romans 5:18–19. Moguntinus means of Mainz. The catalogue's exact bibliographical references and classification of individuals remain for collation.

[13219] Editor. Mediocrity means a middle position. Burton's earlier some Catholic writers and here most Catholics should remain distinct. Our Church is the Church of England.

[13220] Editor. Censured here means critically examined or judged, not simply condemned; dilated means expanded upon. Burton gives the reader a bibliographical exit from the controversy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But to return to my Author, his conclusion is, that not only wicked Livers, Blasphemers, Reprobates, and such as reject Gods grace, but that the Divels themselves shall be saved at last, as [13221]Origen long since delivered in his works, and our late [13222]Socinians defend Ostorodius, cap. 41. institut. Smaltius, &c.	But to return to my author: his conclusion is that not only wicked people, blasphemers, the reprobate and those who reject God's grace, but even the devils themselves will at last be saved, as Origen long ago taught in his works and our recent Socinians defend—Ostorodius, chapter 41 of his Instruction, Smaltius and others.[13223]
Those terms of all and for ever in Scripture, are not eternal, but only denote a longer time, which by many Examples they prove. The world shall end like a Comedy, and we shall meet at last in Heaven, and live in bliss altogether; or else in conclusion, in nihil evanescere.	They argue, with many examples, that the scriptural terms "all" and "for ever" do not mean eternity, but only a longer time. The world will end like a comedy, and we shall all meet at last in heaven and live together in bliss; or else, ultimately, vanish into nothing.[13224]
For how can he be merciful that shall condemn any creature to eternal unspeakable punishment, for one small temporary fault, all posterity, so many myriads, for one and another mans offence, quid meruistis oves? But these absurd paradoxes are exploded by our Church, we teach otherwise.	For how can he be merciful if he condemns any creature to eternal, unspeakable punishment for one small, temporary fault—all posterity, so many myriads, for a single offence committed by someone else? What have you done to deserve this, sheep? But our Church rejects these absurd paradoxes; we teach otherwise.[13225]

[13221] Burton. Source page 716, r: "Non homines sed & ipsi dæmones aliquando servandi." "Not only human beings, but even the demons themselves, are one day to be saved."

[13222] Burton. Source page 716, dagger: "Vid. Pelsii Harmoniam art. 22. p. 3." See Pelsii, Harmony, article 22, page 3.

[13223] Editor. Origen, On First Principles 1.6.1–4, in the consulted English translation, explores restoration and leaves the return of demonic orders as a question; 1.6.4 distinguishes transformation from material annihilation. This is more qualified than Burton's summary. His second alternative must remain distinct. The Socinian references and printed Pelsii are unverified; Origen's textual transmission and the earlier ignorance attribution remain uncollated.

[13224] Editor. Comedy means a story ending happily. All and for ever are the printed terms, retained despite their different grammatical functions. Burton places universal restoration and disappearance into nothing alongside each other; the alternatives are not harmonized.

[13225] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 15.116: Pythagoras asks what innocent sheep have done to deserve slaughter. Burton borrows the question for inherited punishment. Exploded means repudiated, not physically blown apart. The final sentence explicitly resumes his own confessional judgement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That this vocation, predestination, election, reprobation, non ex corrupta massa, prævisa fide, as our Arminians, or ex prævisis operibus, as our Papists, non ex præteritione, but Gods absolute decree ante mundum creatum, (as many of our Church hold) was from the beginning, before the foundation of the world was laid, or homo conditus, (or from Adams fall, as others will, homo lapsus objectum est reprobationis) with perseverantia sanctorum, we must be certain of our salvation, we may fall but not finally, which our Arminians will not admit.	We teach that this calling, predestination, election and reprobation arise not from the corrupted mass of humanity, or from foreseen faith, as our Arminians hold, or from foreseen works, as our Roman Catholics hold, nor from being passed over, but from God's absolute decree before the creation of the world. As many in our Church hold, it was from the beginning, before the world's foundations were laid or humanity was created; or, as others hold, from Adam's fall—fallen humanity is the object of reprobation. With the perseverance of the saints, we must be certain of our salvation: we may fall, but not finally. Our Arminians will not admit this.[13226]
Source page 716–717 According to his immutable, eternall, just decree and counsell of saving men and Angels, God cals all and would have all to be saved according to the efficacy of vocation: all are invited, but onely the elect apprehended: the rest that are unbeleeving, impenitent, whom God in his just judgement leaves to be punished for their sins, are in a reprobate sense; yet we must not determine who are such, condemn our selves or others, because we have an universal invitation; all are commanded to beleeve, and we know not how soon or late before our end we may be received.	According to his unchangeable, eternal and just decree and counsel for saving human beings and angels, God calls everyone and wills that all be saved according to the efficacy of the calling. All are invited, but only the elect are taken hold of. The rest, unbelieving and unrepentant, whom God in his just judgment leaves to be punished for their sins, have a reprobate mind. Yet we must not decide who these are or condemn ourselves or others, because the invitation is universal. All are commanded to believe, and we do not know how early or late, before our end, we may be received.[13227]

[13226] Editor. Burton compresses several disputes into a syntactically uneven list: humanity considered before or after the Fall, foreseen faith or works, passing over, and final perseverance. The rendering supplies grammatical connections but preserves the printed negatives and alternatives. This is not a systematic statement of any one school's position.

[13227] Editor. Apprehended is printed as a passive participle: taken hold of, rather than silently changed to apprehend or accept. Burton's practical conclusion forbids identifying oneself or another person as finally rejected, despite the preceding doctrinal distinctions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 717 I might have said more of this subject, but forasmuch as it is a forbidden question, and in the Preface or Declaration to the Articles of the Church, printed 1633, to avoid factions and altercations, we that are Universitie Divines especially, are prohibited all curious search, to print or preach, or draw the Article aside by our own sence and Comments, upon pain of Ecclesiastical censure, I will surcease, and conclude with [13228]Erasmus of such controversies:	I might have said more on this subject. But since it is a forbidden question, and the preface or declaration to the Articles of the Church, printed in 1633, forbids us—especially university theologians—in order to prevent factions and disputes, all inquisitive investigation, publishing or preaching, or twisting the Article through our own interpretation and commentary, on pain of ecclesiastical censure, I shall stop, and conclude with Erasmus on such controversies:[13229]
Pugnet qui volet, ego censeo leges majorum reverenter suscipiendas, & religiose observandas, velut a Deo profectas; nec esse tutum, nec esse pium, de potestate publicâ sinistram concipere aut serere suspitionem. Et siquid est tyrannidis, quod tamen non cogat ad impietatem, satius est ferre, quam seditiose reluctari.	Let whoever wishes fight; I think the laws of our forebears should be reverently accepted and religiously observed, as though they came from God. It is neither safe nor pious to conceive or sow sinister suspicions about public authority. And if there is some tyranny, provided it does not compel impiety, it is better to endure it than to resist seditiously.[13230]

[13228] Burton. Source page 717, dagger: "Epist. Erasmi de utilitate Colloquior. ad lectorem." Erasmus's letter to the reader on the usefulness of the Colloquies.

[13229] Editor. Burton invokes the royal declaration prefixed to the Church of England's Articles, which restricts speculative disputes and private reinterpretation, particularly in the universities. Printed 1633 is his edition date. Surcease means cease. The prohibition is part of his explanation for ending the digression.

[13230] Editor. The qualification provided it does not compel impiety is essential and remains in the translation. Burton's margin attributes the passage to Erasmus's address to the reader on the usefulness of the Colloquies; the exact Latin wording remains for independent collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But to my former taske. The last main torture and trouble of a distressed mind, is not so much this doubt of Election, and that the promises of grace are smothered and extinct in them, nay quite blotted out, as they suppose, but withall Gods heavy wrath, a most intolerable pain and grief of heart seiseth on them: to their thinking they are already damned, they suffer the pains of hell, and more then possibly can be expressed, they smell brimstone, talk familiarly with divels, hear and see Chimeraes, prodigious, uncouth shapes, Bears, Owls, Antiques, black dogs, feinds, hideous outcries, fearfull noises, shreeks, lamentable complaints, they are possessed,	But to return to my former task. The final great torment and trouble of a distressed mind is not so much doubt about election, or the belief that the promises of grace have been smothered and extinguished within them—indeed, entirely blotted out—as the heavy wrath of God that also seizes them, an utterly unbearable pain and grief of heart. They think themselves already damned, suffering the pains of hell and more than words can possibly express. They smell sulphur, speak familiarly with devils, hear and see chimeras, monstrous, unfamiliar shapes, bears, owls, grotesques, black dogs and fiends, hideous cries, terrifying noises, shrieks and pitiful lamentations. They are possessed,[13231]
[13232]and and through impatience they roar and howl, curse, blaspheme, deny God, call his power in question, abjure religion, and are still ready to offer violence unto themselves, by hanging, drowning, &c. Never any miserable wretch from the beginning of the world, was in such a wofull case.	and through inability to endure it they roar and howl, curse, blaspheme, deny God, question his power, renounce religion and are constantly ready to harm themselves by hanging, drowning and so on. Never, since the world began, has any miserable person been in so wretched a condition.[13233]

[13231] Editor. To their thinking and as they suppose mark the sufferer's experience within Burton's account. Antiques means grotesque figures; chimeras are fantastic composite creatures. His language of possession belongs to the book's historical religious and medical framework.

[13232] Burton. Source page 717, s: "Vastatâ conscientiâ sequitur sensus iræ divinæ. (Hemingius) fremitus cordis, ingens animæ cruciatus, &c." "Once the conscience is devastated, a sense of divine wrath follows." Hemmingius. "A raging of the heart, an immense torment of the soul," and so on.

[13233] Editor. The original prints and and; the accidental repetition is retained at left and reduced to one and in the modern rendering. Impatience here means inability to bear suffering. The final sentence continues the imagined extremity of the sufferer's complaint.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To such persons I oppose Gods mercy and his justice; Judicia Dei occulta, non injusta: his secret counsell and just judgement, by which he spares some, and sore afflicts others again in this life: his judgement is to be adored, trembled at, not to be searched or enquired after by mortall men: he hath reasons reserved to himself, which our frailty cannot apprehend. He may punish all if he will, and that justly for sin; in that he doth it in some, is to make a way for his mercy that they repent and be saved, to heal them, to try them, exercise their patience, and make them call upon him, to confess their sins and pray unto him,	I answer such people with God's mercy and justice: God's judgments are hidden, not unjust. His counsel is secret and his judgment just; by it he spares some and severely afflicts others in this life. His judgment is to be worshipped and trembled at, not searched out or investigated by mortals. He has reasons reserved to himself that our frailty cannot grasp. He may punish everyone if he wishes, and justly, for sin. When he does so to some, it is to make way for his mercy, so that they may repent and be saved: to heal and test them, exercise their patience and make them call upon him, confess their sins and pray to him,[13234]
as David did, Psal. 119. 137. Righteous art thou, O Lord, and just are thy judgements. As the poor Publican, Luke 18. 13. Lord have mercy upon me a miserable sinner. To put confidence and have an assured hope in him, as Job had 13. 15. Though he kill me I will trust in him: Ure, seca, occide O Domine, (saith Austin) modo serves animam, kill, cut in pieces, burn my body (O Lord) to save my soul.	as David did in Psalm 119:137: Righteous are you, O Lord, and just are your judgments. As the poor tax collector did in Luke 18:13: Lord, have mercy on me, a miserable sinner. To place confidence and assured hope in him, as Job did in 13:15: Though he kill me, I will trust in him. Burn, cut, kill, O Lord, says Augustine, provided you save my soul: kill, cut to pieces and burn my body, O Lord, to save my soul.[13235]
Source page 717–718 A small sickness, one lash of affliction, a little miserie many times will more humiliate a man, sooner convert, bring him home to know himself, than all those parænetical discourses, the whole Theory of Philosophy, Law, Physick and Divinity, or a world of instances and examples.	A slight illness, one stroke of affliction or a little misery will often humble someone more, convert him sooner and bring him home to knowledge of himself more effectively than all those exhortatory discourses, the entire theory of philosophy, law, medicine and theology, or a world of instances and examples.[13236]

[13234] Editor. Oppose means set against as an answer. The Latin maxim is translated before Burton's English expansion. This is his theological interpretation of affliction; retaining its force does not turn it into a modern explanation of illness.

[13235] Editor. Publican means tax collector. The Latin prayer and Burton's separate English version both remain, including their different ordering of the verbs. Burton presents this as an address to God amid affliction, not an instruction to inflict bodily injury. The precise Augustinian source remains unresolved.

[13236] Editor. Parænetical means exhortatory or intended to urge right conduct; Physick means medicine. The comparison concerns the force of lived affliction against accumulated instruction.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 718 So that this, which they take to be such an insupportable plague, is an evident sign of Gods mercie and justice, of his love and goodness: periissent nisi periissent, had they not thus been undone, they had finally been undone.	Thus what they regard as so unbearable a scourge is a clear sign of God's mercy and justice, his love and goodness: they would have perished if they had not perished; had they not been brought to ruin in this way, they would have been ruined for ever.[13237]
Many a carnall man is lulled asleep in perverse securitie, foolish presumption, is stupified in his sins, and hath no feeling at all of them: I have sinned (he saith) and what evill shall come unto me, Eccles. 5. 4. and tush, how shall God know it? And so in a reprobate sense goes down to hell. But here, Cynthius aurem vellit, God pulls them by the ear, by affliction, he will bring them to heaven and happiness;	Many a worldly person is lulled asleep in perverse complacency and foolish presumption, numbed by his sins and entirely insensible to them. I have sinned, he says, and what harm will come to me? Ecclesiasticus 5:4. And, Nonsense! How will God know? So, with a reprobate mind, he goes down to hell. But here, Apollo pulls the ear: God pulls them by the ear through affliction and will bring them to heaven and happiness;[13238]
Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted, Matth. 5. 4. a blessed and an happy state, if considered aright, it is, to be so troubled. It is good for me that I have been afflicted, Psal. 119. before I was afflicted I went astray: but now I keep thy word. Tribulation works patience, patience hope, Rom. 5. 4. and by such like crosses and calamities we are driven from the stake of securitie.	Blessed are those who mourn, for they shall be comforted, Matthew 5:4. Rightly considered, to be troubled in this way is a blessed and happy condition. It is good for me that I have been afflicted, Psalm 119. Before I was afflicted I went astray, but now I keep your word. Tribulation produces patience, and patience hope, Romans 5:4. Such troubles and calamities drive us away from the stake to which our complacency has tethered us.[13239]

[13237] Editor. The Latin paradox and its English explanation are separately preserved. The first undoing is temporal distress; the second is final destruction. The claim belongs to Burton's argument for consolation.

[13238] Editor. Eccles. here abbreviates Ecclesiasticus, also called Sirach, not Ecclesiastes. Cynthius is Apollo; the phrase comes from Virgil, Eclogue 6.3–4, where the god checks the poet's ambitions. Burton turns the pagan admonition into an image of divine correction. The following question recalls Psalm 73:11.

[13239] Editor. The Psalm quotations are 119:71 and 119:67. Burton compresses Romans 5:3–4, omitting the intervening experience or proven character. His abbreviated chain is retained. The stake image presents complacency as a fixed attachment from which suffering drives a person.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So that affliction is a School or Academy, wherein the best Schollers are prepared to the commencements of the deity. And though it be most troublesome and grievous for the time, yet know this, it comes by Gods permission and providence, he is a spectator of thy groans and tears, still present with thee, the very hairs of thy head are numbred, not one of them can fall to the ground, without the express will of God: he will not suffer thee to be tempted above measure, he corrects us all [13240]numero, pondere, & mensura. The Lord will not quench the smoaking flax, or break the bruised reed. Tentat (saith Austin) non ut obruat, sed ut coronet, he suffers thee to be tempted for thy good.	Affliction, then, is a school or academy in which the best students are prepared for graduation into divine life. Though it is deeply troublesome and grievous for the time, know that it comes by God's permission and providence. He witnesses your groans and tears and is always present with you. The very hairs of your head are numbered; not one can fall to the ground without God's express will. He will not allow you to be tried beyond measure; he disciplines us all by number, weight and measure. The Lord will not extinguish the smouldering wick or break the bruised reed. He tests us, says Augustine, not to overwhelm us, but to crown us; he allows you to be tried for your good.[13241]
And as a mother doth handle her child sick and weak, not reject it, but with all tenderness observe and keep it, so doth God by us; not forsake us in our miseries, or relinquish us for our imperfections; but with all piety and compassion support and receive us; whom he loves he loves to the end.	As a mother treats her sick and weak child, refusing to reject it but watching over and tending it with every tenderness, so God treats us. He does not forsake us in our miseries or abandon us for our imperfections, but supports and receives us with all tenderness and compassion. Those he loves, he loves to the end.[13242]
Rom. 8. Whom he hath elected, those he hath called, justified, sanctified, and glorified. Think not then thou hast lost the spirit, that thou art forsaken of God, be not overcome with heaviness of heart, but as David said, I will not fear though I walk in the shadows of death.	Romans 8: Those he has elected, he has called, justified, sanctified and glorified. Do not think, then, that you have lost the Spirit or that God has forsaken you. Do not be overcome by heaviness of heart, but say with David, I will not fear though I walk in the shadows of death.[13243]

[13240] Burton. Source page 718, dagger: "Austin." Augustine.

[13241] Editor. Commencements are university degree ceremonies, extended metaphorically to divine life. Number, weight and measure recalls Wisdom 11:20; the numbered hairs and falling image combine gospel assurances. Smoaking flax is a lamp wick. The scan reads coronet, crown, not curet, heal. Exact Augustinian loci remain unverified.

[13242] Editor. Observe and keep means watch over and care for. Piety here includes compassionate devotion, rather than religious observance alone. The final phrase recalls John 13:1.

[13243] Editor. Burton adapts Romans 8:29–30: the verse's sequence is not quoted exactly, and sanctified is added. The final assurance paraphrases Psalm 23:4. His expanded sequence and wording remain in the body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We must all go, non a delitiis ad delitias, but from the cross to the crown, by hell to heaven, as the old Romans put vertues Temple in the way to that of honour: we must endure sorrow and miserie in this life.	We must all pass not from delights to delights, but from the cross to the crown, through hell to heaven, just as the ancient Romans placed the temple of Virtue on the way to the temple of Honour. We must endure sorrow and misery in this life.[13244]
'Tis no new thing this, Gods best servants and dearest children have been so visited and tryed. Christ in the garden cryed out, My God my God why hast thou forsaken me: his son by nature, as thou art by adoption and grace. Job in his anguish said, The arrows of the Almighty God were in him, Job 6. 4. His terrors fought against him, the venom drank up his spirit, cap. 13. 26. He saith, God was his enemie, writ bitter things against him, (16. 9.) hated him. His heavy wrath had so seized on his soul.	This is nothing new. God's best servants and dearest children have been afflicted and tested in this way. Christ cried out in the garden, My God, my God, why have you forsaken me? He was God's Son by nature, as you are by adoption and grace. In his anguish Job said that the arrows of Almighty God were within him, Job 6:4; God's terrors fought against him and their poison drank up his spirit. In chapter 13:26 he says that God was his enemy and wrote bitter things against him; in 16:9, that he hated him. So heavily had God's wrath seized his soul.[13245]

[13244] Editor. The paired temples make virtue the necessary route to honour. Here through hell extends the metaphor of extreme suffering in the present life; it should not silently be made into a new doctrine about the afterlife.

[13245] Editor. The cry of abandonment is spoken on the cross in Matthew 27:46 and Mark 15:34, not in the garden; Burton's conflation remains visible. Job 6:4 supplies arrows, poison and terrors. The enemy image is at 13:24; bitter things at 13:26. Visited here means afflicted or tested.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 718–719 David complains, His eyes were eaten up, sunk into his head, Ps. 6. 7. His moisture became as the drought in Summer, his flesh was consumed, his bones vexed: yet neither Job nor David did finally despaire. Job would not leave his hold, but still trust in him, acknowledging him to bee his good God. The Lord gives, the Lord takes, blessed be the name of the Lord, Job 1. 21. Behold I am vile, I abhor my self, repent in dust and ashes, Job 39. 37. David humbled himself, Psal. 31. and upon his confession received mercy.	David complains that his eyes were wasted away and sank into his head, Psalm 6:7; that his moisture became like the drought of summer, his flesh was consumed and his bones tormented. Yet neither Job nor David finally despaired. Job would not let go, but still trusted him, acknowledging him as his good God: The Lord gives, the Lord takes; blessed be the name of the Lord, Job 1:21. See, I am vile; I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes, Job 39:37. David humbled himself, Psalm 31, and received mercy on confessing.[13246]
Source page 719 Faith, hope, repentance, are the soveraign cures and remedies, the sole comforts in this case; confess, humble thy self, repent, it is sufficient. Quod purpura non potest, saccus potest, saith Chrysostome; the King of Ninive's Sackcloth and ashes did that which his purple robes and crown could not effect; Quod diadema non potuit, cinis perfecit.	Faith, hope and repentance are the sovereign cures and remedies, the only comforts in this case. Confess, humble yourself and repent: that is enough. What purple cannot do, sackcloth can, says Chrysostom. The king of Nineveh's sackcloth and ashes accomplished what his purple robes and crown could not: what the diadem could not do, ashes achieved.[13247]

[13246] Editor. The moisture image is Psalm 32:4; the passage combines several laments. Job 39:37 follows Geneva numbering for what is Job 40:4 in the King James Bible; the added repentance in dust and ashes is Job 42:6. Psalm 31 is retained, though confession and forgiveness particularly recall Psalm 32:5.

[13247] Editor. Jonah 3:6 supplies the king's descent from his throne into sackcloth and ashes. The antitheses occur in the Chrysostomic On Repentance tradition, with a parallel at PG 49.311–312. Both Latin formulations and Burton's intervening English restatement are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Turn to him, he will turn to thee; the Lord is neer those that are of a contrite heart, and will save such as be afflicted in spirit, Psal. 34. 18. He came to the lost sheep of Israel, Mat. 15. 14. Si cadentem intuetur, clementiæ manum protendit, he is at all times ready to assist. Nunquam spernit Deus Pœnitentiam, si sincerè & simpliciter offeratur, he never rejects a penitent sinner, though he have come to the full height of iniquity, wallowed and delighted in sin; yet if he will forsake his former waies, libenter amplexatur, he will receive him.	Turn to him and he will turn to you. The Lord is near those whose hearts are contrite and will save those afflicted in spirit, Psalm 34:18. He came to the lost sheep of Israel, Matthew 15:14. If he sees someone falling, he stretches out a merciful hand: he is always ready to help. God never scorns repentance if it is offered sincerely and without pretence: he never rejects a penitent sinner, even one who has reached the height of wickedness and wallowed and delighted in sin. If that person will abandon his former ways, he gladly embraces him; he will receive him.[13248]
Parcam huic homini, saith [13249]Austin, (ex persona Dei) quia sibi ipsi non pepercit; ignoscam quia peccatum agnovit. I will spare him because he hath not spared himself; I will pardon him, because he doth acknowledge his offence; let it be never so enormous a sin, his grace is sufficient, 2 Cor. 12. 9.	I will spare this person, says Augustine, speaking in God's person, because he has not spared himself; I will forgive him because he has acknowledged his sin. I will spare him because he has not spared himself; I will pardon him because he acknowledges his offence. However enormous the sin, his grace is sufficient, 2 Corinthians 12:9.[13250]
Despaire not then, faint not at all, be not dejected, but rely on God, call on him in thy trouble, and he will heare thee, he will assist, help, and deliver thee; Draw near to him, he will draw near to thee, Jam. 4. 8. Lazarus was poor and full of boyles, and yet still he relied upon God, Abraham did hope beyond hope.	Do not despair, then, or lose heart at all; do not be cast down, but rely on God. Call on him in your trouble and he will hear you, support, help and deliver you. Draw near to him and he will draw near to you, James 4:8. Lazarus was poor and covered in sores, yet still relied on God; Abraham hoped beyond hope.[13251]

[13248] Editor. The lost sheep saying is Matthew 15:24, not the printed 15:14. Each Latin sentence and Burton's separate English elaboration remain. A related assurance about sincere return appears in Chrysostom's To Theodore After His Fall; the precise sources of all three Latin phrases still require collation.

[13249] Burton. Source page 719, asterisk: "Super Psal. 52. Convertar ad liberandum eum, quia conversus est ad peccatum suum puniendum." "On Psalm 52. I will turn to deliver him, because he has turned to punish his own sin."

[13250] Editor. The Latin and English versions are both retained. The margin prints On Psalm 52. A related argument about confession, self-judgement and pardon occurs in Augustine's exposition of Psalm 50 in Latin numbering, commonly Psalm 51 in English; this parallel does not establish the exact source of Burton's quotation.

[13251] Editor. Lazarus is the beggar of Luke 16:19–31, not the man raised from the dead in John 11. Abraham's hope recalls Romans 4:18. Faint means lose courage or give up.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thou exceptest, these were chief men, divine spirits, Deo chari, beloved of God, especially respected; but I am a contemptible and forlorne wretch, forsaken of God, and left to the merciless fury of evil spirits. I cannot hope, pray, repent, &c. How often shall I say it! thou maist performe all these duties, Christian offices, and be restored in good time.	You object: these were eminent people, godly spirits, dear to God, beloved by him and especially favoured. But I am a contemptible and abandoned wretch, forsaken by God and left to the merciless fury of evil spirits. I cannot hope, pray, repent and so on. How often must I say it? You may perform all these duties and Christian observances, and be restored in due time.[13252]
A sick man loseth his appetite, strength and ability, his disease prevaileth so far, that all his faculties are spent, hand and foot performe not their duties, his eyes are dimme, hearing dull, tongue distasts things of pleasant rellish, yet nature lies hid, recovereth again, and expelleth all those fæculent matters by vomit, sweat, or some such like evacuations.	A sick person loses appetite, strength and ability. His illness advances so far that all his powers are exhausted: hand and foot cannot do their work, his eyes are dim, hearing dull, and his tongue finds pleasantly flavoured things distasteful. Yet nature lies hidden, recovers and expels all that foul matter through vomiting, sweat or similar discharges.[13253]
Thou art spiritually sick, thine heart is heavy, thy mind distressed, thou maist happily recover again, expell those dismal passions of fear and grief; God did not suffer thee to be tempted above measure; whom he loves (I say) he loves to the end; Hope the best.	You are spiritually sick; your heart is heavy and your mind distressed. You may yet recover and drive out those dreadful emotions of fear and grief. God did not allow you to be tried beyond measure. Those he loves, I say, he loves to the end. Hope for the best.[13254]
David in his misery prayed to the Lord, remembring how he had formerly dealt with him; and with that meditation of Gods mercy confirmed his faith, and pacified his own tumultuous heart in his greatest agony. O my soul, why art thou so disquieted within me, &c.	In his misery David prayed to the Lord, remembering how God had formerly dealt with him. By meditating on God's mercy he strengthened his faith and calmed his own turbulent heart in its greatest agony. O my soul, why are you so troubled within me? And so on.[13255]

[13252] Editor. Exceptest means raise an objection; chief means eminent. The Latin dear to God and Burton's immediate English repetition remain. His repeated answer maintains possibility and deferred recovery rather than demanding a present feeling of certainty.

[13253] Editor. Fæculent means foul or dreg-like. This is Burton's bodily analogy for powers that seem absent but may recover, expressed through the period's theory of evacuation; it is not a prescription offered by the modern edition.

[13254] Editor. Happily here carries the sense of perhaps or by good fortune, not merely cheerfully. Passions means powerful emotions. The bodily comparison now becomes an argument for possible spiritual recovery.

[13255] Editor. The repeated question recalls Psalms 42:5, 42:11 and 43:5. Burton calls the speaker David in keeping with his broad treatment of the Psalms; the attribution is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 719–720 Thy soul is eclipsed for a time, I yeeld, as the Sun is shadowed by a cloud; no doubt but those gracious beams of Gods mercy will shine upon thee again, as they have formerly done; those embers of faith, hope and repentance, now buried in ashes, will flame out afresh, and be fully revived.	I grant that your soul is darkened for a time, as the sun is obscured by a cloud. Yet those gracious beams of God's mercy will surely shine upon you again, as they have before. Those embers of faith, hope and repentance, now buried in ashes, will burst into fresh flame and fully revive.[13256]
Source page 720 Want of faith, no feeling of grace for the present, are not fit directions; we must live by faith, not by feeling; 'tis the beginning of grace to wish for grace: we must expect and tarry.	A lack of faith or a present absence of any feeling of grace are not reliable guides. We must live by faith, not by feeling. To wish for grace is the beginning of grace: we must wait and be patient.[13257]
David a man after Gods own heart, was so troubled himself; Awake, why sleepest thou? O Lord, arise, cast me not off; wherefore hidest thou thy face, and forgettest mine affliction and oppression? My soul is bowed down to the dust. Arise, redeem us, &c. Psal. 44. 22. He prayed long before he was heard, expectans expectavit; endured much before he was relieved, Psal. 69. 3. He complains, I am weary of crying, and my throat is dry, mine eyes fail, whilst I wait on the Lord; and yet he perseveres. Be not dismayed, thou shalt be respected at last.	David, a man after God's own heart, was himself troubled in this way: Awake! Why do you sleep? O Lord, arise; do not cast me off. Why do you hide your face and forget my affliction and oppression? My soul is bowed down to the dust. Arise and redeem us, and so on, Psalm 44:22. He prayed long before he was heard: waiting, he waited. He endured much before relief came. In Psalm 69:3 he complains, I am weary of crying, my throat is dry and my eyes fail as I wait for the Lord; yet he perseveres. Do not be dismayed: at last you will be attended to.[13258]

[13256] Editor. Burton moves from a clouded sun to embers under ashes: what is hidden is not necessarily extinguished. Eclipsed is used broadly for darkening, not as a precise astronomical explanation.

[13257] Editor. Directions means guides for judging one's condition; expect and tarry both concern waiting. The distinction between faith and felt assurance is central to the counsel, despite the apparent tension in opening with want of faith.

[13258] Editor. The Psalm 44 extract corresponds chiefly to verses 23–26 in the King James Bible, not only the printed verse 22; Burton also shifts the psalm's plural voice to singular. Expectans expectavit adapts the patient-waiting formula of Psalm 40:1. Respected means regarded or attended to.

Original text 1651	Modern English
God often works by contrarieties, he first kils and then makes alive, he woundeth first and then healeth, he makes man sow in tears that he may reap in joy; 'tis Gods method: He that is so visited, must with patience endure and rest satisfied for the present.	God often works through opposites: he first kills and then makes alive, first wounds and then heals; he makes a person sow in tears so that he may reap in joy. This is God's method. Whoever is afflicted in this way must endure patiently and be content for the present.[13259]
The Paschal Lamb was eaten with sowr hearbs; we shall feel no sweetness of his blood, till we first feel the smart of our sins.	The Passover lamb was eaten with bitter herbs. We shall feel no sweetness from his blood until we first feel the sting of our sins.[13260]
Thy paines are great, intolerable for the time; thou art destitute of grace and comfort, stay the Lords leisure, he will not (I say) suffer thee to be tempted above that thou art able to bear, 1 Cor. 10. 13. but will give an issue to temptation. He works all for the best in them that love God, Rom. 8. 28.	Your pains are great and, for the time, unbearable; you lack grace and comfort. Wait for the Lord's appointed time. He will not, I say, allow you to be tried beyond what you can bear, 1 Corinthians 10:13, but will provide a way out of the trial. He makes all things work for the best for those who love God, Romans 8:28.[13261]

[13259] Editor. The reversals recall Deuteronomy 32:39 and 1 Samuel 2:6; sowing in tears and reaping in joy recalls Psalm 126:5. For the present keeps the emphasis on endurance during an interval of distress.

[13260] Editor. Exodus 12:8 supplies the bitter herbs. Burton reads the Passover lamb as a figure of Christ and turns the contrast of bitter and sweet into a sequence of repentance and consolation.

[13261] Editor. Issue means a way out or deliverance. Burton places the felt unbearable pain beside the promise of a limit to trial; the tension is preserved rather than resolved by weakening either statement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Doubt not of thine election, it is an immutable decree; a mark never to be defaced; you have been otherwise, you may and shall be. And for your present affliction, hope the best, it will shortly end. He is present with his servants in their affliction, Ps. 91. 15. Great are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth them out of all. Psal. 34. 19. Our light affliction which is but for a moment, worketh in us an eternal weight of glory, 2 Cor. 4. 17. Not answerable to that glory which is to come; though now in heaviness, saith 1 Pet. 1. 6. you shall rejoyce.	Do not doubt your election: it is an unchangeable decree, a mark that can never be erased. You have been otherwise; you may and will be so again. As for your present affliction, hope for the best: it will soon end. He is present with his servants in their affliction, Psalm 91:15. Great are the troubles of the righteous, but the Lord delivers them from them all, Psalm 34:19. Our light affliction, which lasts only a moment, produces in us an eternal weight of glory, 2 Corinthians 4:17. It cannot compare with the glory to come; though now in sorrow, says 1 Peter 1:6, you will rejoice.[13262]
Now last of all to those external impediments, terrible objects, which they hear and see many times, divels, bugbears, and Mormeluches, noysome smels, &c. These may come, as I have formerly declared in my precedent discourse of the Symptomes of Melancholy, from inward causes; as a concave glass reflects solid bodies, a troubled brain for want of sleep, nutriment, and by reason of that agitation of spirits to which Hercules de Saxonia attributes all Symptomes almost, may reflect and shew prodigious shapes, as our vain fear and crased phantasie shall suggest and faign,	Now, last of all, to those outward disturbances: the terrifying things they often hear and see—devils, bogeymen and spectres—foul smells, and so on. As I explained earlier in my discussion of the symptoms of melancholy, these may arise from internal causes. Just as a concave mirror reflects solid bodies, a brain disturbed by lack of sleep or nourishment, and by that agitation of the spirits to which Hercules de Saxonia attributes almost all the symptoms, may reflect and display monstrous shapes, as our groundless fear and disordered imagination suggest and invent them,[13263]

[13262] Editor. Not answerable means not comparable and recalls Romans 8:18 before the reference to 1 Peter. Burton's assurances close this sequence of spiritual counsel. The next paragraph turns to frightening sights, sounds and smells, their possible bodily causes and proposed remedies.

[13263] Editor. Bugbears and Mormeluches are frightening apparitions or bogeys. Glass means mirror; phantasie is the faculty of imagination. Spirits here are the subtle bodily spirits of historical physiology. Burton allows a bodily origin for appearances experienced as external; he does not yet exclude supernatural causes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as many silly weak women and children in the dark, sick folks, and frantick for want of repast and sleep, suppose they see that they see not: Many times such terriculaments may proceed from natural causes, and all other senses may be deluded.	just as many helpless, weak women and children in the dark, sick people, and those driven frantic by lack of food and sleep imagine that they see what they do not see. Such terrors may often arise from natural causes, and all the other senses may likewise be deceived.[13264]
Besides, as I have said, this humour is Balneum Diaboli, the divels bath, by reason of the distemper of humours, and infirm Organs in us: he may so possess us inwardly to molest us, as he did Saul and others, by Gods permission; he is Prince of the Ayr, and can transform himself into several shapes, delude all our senses for a time, but his power is determined, he may terrifie us, but not hurt;	Besides, as I have said, this humour is the devil's bath, the devil's bathing place, because of the disorder of our humours and the weakness of our organs. By God's permission he may possess us inwardly to torment us, as he did Saul and others. He is the prince of the air and can assume various shapes and deceive all our senses for a time. But his power has its limits: he may terrify us, but cannot harm us;[13265]
Source page 720–721 God hath given his Angels charge over us, he is a wall round about his people, Psal. 91. 11. 12. There be those that prescribe Physick in such cases, 'tis Gods instrument and not unfit. The divel works by mediation of humours, and mixt diseases must have mixt remedies.	God has given his angels charge over us; he is a wall around his people, Psalm 91:11–12. Some prescribe medical treatment in such cases: it is God's instrument, and appropriate. The devil works through the humours, and diseases with mixed causes must have mixed remedies.[13266]

[13264] Editor. Silly can mean helpless or vulnerable; repast means food or a meal; terriculaments are things that frighten. The original's gendered generalization is retained as Burton's, not converted into a modern clinical description.

[13265] Editor. Determined means bounded or limited. Saul's torment recalls 1 Samuel 16:14–23; prince of the air recalls Ephesians 2:2. The Latin phrase and Burton's separate English restatement are both represented. The passage retains his historical combination of humoral disorder and demonic agency.

[13266] Editor. Physick means medicine or medical treatment. Psalm 91:11–12 supplies the protecting angels; the wall image also recalls Zechariah 2:5. Burton's citation embraces a combination of images. The ensuing remedies belong to his historical account, not to present-day medical advice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 721 Levinus Lemnius cap. 57. & 58. exhort. ad vit. ep. instit. is very copious in this subject, besides that chief remedy of confidence in God, prayer, hearty repentance, &c. of which for your comfort and instruction, read Lavater de spectris part. 3. cap. 5. & 6. Wierus de præstigiis dæmonum lib. 5. to Philip. Melancthon, and others, and that Christian armour which Paul prescribes; he sets down certain Amulets, hearbs, and precious stones, which have marvelous vertues all profligandis dæmonibus, to drive away Divels and their illusions.	Levinus Lemnius discusses this subject at great length in chapters 57 and 58 of his Exhortation to a Well-Ordered Life. Besides the chief remedy of confidence in God, prayer, heartfelt repentance and so on—on which, for comfort and instruction, read Lavater's On Spectres, part 3, chapters 5 and 6; Wierus's On the Deceptions of Demons, book 5, addressed to Philip Melanchthon; and others—and besides the Christian armour prescribed by Paul, he sets down certain amulets, herbs and precious stones, all with marvellous powers for driving away demons, to drive away devils and their illusions.[13267]
Saphyres, Chrysolites, Carbuncles, &c. Quæ mirâ virtute pollent ad Lemures, Stryges, Incubos, Genios aëreos arcendos, si veterum monimentis habenda fides.	Sapphires, chrysolites, carbuncles and so on, which have marvellous power to ward off ghosts, witches, incubi and spirits of the air, if the records of the ancients are to be believed.[13268]
Of hearbs, he reckons us Pennirial, Rue, Mint, Angelica, Piony: Rich. Argentine de præstigiis dæmonum cap. 20. addes hypericon or S. Johns wort, perforata herba, which by a divine vertue drives away divels, and is therefore called fuga dæmonum:	Among herbs he lists pennyroyal, rue, mint, angelica and peony. Richard Argentine, in chapter 20 of On the Deceptions of Demons, adds hypericum or St John's wort, the perforated herb, which drives away devils by a divine power and is therefore called the flight of demons:[13269]

[13267] Editor. The sentence returns to Lemnius; his Exhortation title remains unidentified. Lavater, Of Ghosts and Spirits (1596), III.5–6, pp. 190–195, recommends courage, prayer, fasting and Paul's armour, supporting the spiritual counsel without verifying the herb and gemstone remedies. Paul's image is in Ephesians 6:11–17. The printed all before profligandis dæmonibus is repositioned in modern English; both Latin and English repetition remain.

[13268] Editor. The final condition makes the claim dependent on ancient testimony. Lemures are haunting spirits; stryges can denote witchlike or night-haunting beings; incubi are spirits imagined to oppress sleepers. Historical gemstone names do not map precisely onto modern mineral classifications; carbuncle denotes a glowing red gem.

[13269] Editor. Perforata herba refers to the perforated appearance of the leaves; fuga dæmonum is a historical name expressing the supposed power to put demons to flight. The catalogue reports the authors' claims and is not an endorsement of these uses.

Original text 1651	Modern English
all which rightly used by their suffitus, Dæmonum vexationibus obsistunt, afflictas mentes à dæmonibus relevant, & venenatis fumis, expel divels themselves, and all divelish illusions.	all these, when properly used as fumigations, resist the torments caused by demons and relieve minds afflicted by demons and poisonous vapours; they expel the devils themselves and all diabolical illusions.[13270]
Anthony Musa the Emperour Augustus his Physitian, cap. 6. de Betonia approves of Betony to this purpose; [13271]the ancients used therefore to plant it in Church-yards, because it was held to be an holy hearb and good against fearful visions, did secure such places it grew in, and sanctified those persons that carried it about them.	Antonius Musa, the Emperor Augustus's physician, recommends betony for this purpose in chapter 6 of On Betony. The ancients therefore used to plant it in churchyards, because it was considered a holy herb, effective against frightening visions, protecting the places where it grew and sanctifying those who carried it about them.[13272]
Idem fere Mathiolus in Dioscoridem. Others commend accurate musick, so Saul was helped by Davids harpe. Fires to be made in such roomes where spirits haunt, good store of lights to be set up, odors, perfumes, and suffumigations, as the Angel taught Tobias;	Mattioli says much the same in his commentary on Dioscorides. Others recommend skilfully performed music: Saul was helped in this way by David's harp. Fires are to be lit in rooms haunted by spirits, with plenty of lights, fragrant substances, perfumes and fumigations, as the angel taught Tobias;[13273]
of brimstone and bitumen, thus, myrrha, briony root, with many such simples which Wecker hath collected lib. 15. de secretis cap. 15.	fumigations of sulphur and bitumen, frankincense, myrrh and bryony root, with many similar individual ingredients collected by Wecker in book 15, chapter 15 of On Secrets.[13274]

[13270] Editor. Suffitus means fumigation or aromatic smoke. Venenatis fumis is grammatically uneven in the printed sentence; this rendering takes it with the afflictions from which minds are relieved, rather than silently making poisonous smoke a separate recommended agent. The wording is preserved in the original column, with its grammatical uncertainty visible.

[13271] Burton. Source page 721, dagger: "Antiqui soliti sunt hanc herbam ponere in cœmiteriis ideo quod, &c." "The ancients used to put this herb in cemeteries because," and so on.

[13272] Editor. The attribution to Augustus's physician is Burton's bibliographical claim; authorship and transmission of the treatise require separate collation. Secure means protect. The margin repeats the cemetery-planting claim in Latin.

[13273] Editor. Accurate means carefully or skilfully executed. David's playing occurs in 1 Samuel 16:23. Tobit 6 and 8 describe Raphael's instruction to Tobias and the burning of a fish's heart and liver; the next list of substances is not the recipe given in that biblical narrative.

[13274] Editor. Simples are individual medicinal substances, as opposed to compounded preparations. Thus is the Latin noun for frankincense, not the English adverb. Brimstone is sulphur; bitumen is a tarry mineral substance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
℞ sulphuris drachmam unam, recoquatur in vitis albæ aqua, ut dilutius sit sulphur; detur ægro; nam dæmones sunt morbi (saith Rich. Argentine lib. de præstigiis dæmonum cap. ult.)	Take one drachm of sulphur; boil it again in white-bryony water so that the sulphur is more diluted; give it to the patient, for demons are diseases, says Richard Argentine in the final chapter of On the Deceptions of Demons.[13275]
Vigetus hath a far larger receit to this purpose, which the said Wecker cites out of Wierus. ℞ sulphuris, vini, bituminis, opoponacis, galbani, castorei, &c.	Vigetus has a much more extensive prescription for this purpose, which the same Wecker quotes from Wierus: Take sulphur, wine, bitumen, opopanax, galbanum, castoreum, and so on.[13276]
Why sweet perfumes, fires and so many lights should be used in such places, Ernestus Burgravius Lucerna vitæ & mortis, and Fortunius Lycetus assignes this cause, quod his boni Genii provocentur, mali arceantur; because good spirits are well pleased with, but evil abhor them.	Ernestus Burgravius, in The Lamp of Life and Death, and Fortunius Lycetus give this reason for using sweet perfumes, fires and so many lights in such places: because these attract good spirits and repel evil ones; because good spirits are pleased with them, while evil spirits abhor them.[13277]
And therefore those old Gentiles, present Mahometans, and Papists have continual lamps burning in their Churches all day and all night, lights at funerals and in their graves; lucernæ ardentes ex auro liquefacto for many ages to endure (saith Lazius) ne dæmones corpus lædant; lights ever burning as those Vestall virgins, Pythonissæ maintained heretofore, with many such,	And therefore the ancient pagans, present-day Muslims and Roman Catholics keep lamps burning continually in their places of worship, all day and all night, and use lights at funerals and in their tombs: lamps burning from liquefied gold, to last for many ages, says Lazius, so that demons may not harm the body; lights burning perpetually, as the Vestal Virgins and prophetic priestesses formerly maintained, with many similar practices,[13278]

[13275] Editor. The prescription sign is represented by ℞ and translated Take. Drachm is a historical apothecaries' unit; no modern dose is supplied. Vitis alba is the herbal name for white bryony, confirmed in The Grete Herball, chapter 73, not white wine. The abrupt demons are diseases is preserved as the cited statement, without extending it to everything Burton says about spirits.

[13276] Editor. Receit means recipe or prescription. Opopanax and galbanum are gum-resins; castoreum is an animal-derived medicinal substance obtained from beavers. Burton gives neither quantities nor complete instructions here. Vigetus and the chain of quotation remain to be identified precisely.

[13277] Editor. Genii are spirits, not intellectual abilities. The Latin explanation and Burton's English restatement are both retained. Lycetus is Fortunio Liceti; the precise cited works and editions remain for collation.

[13278] Editor. Mahometans and Papists are Burton's historical religious labels. Pythonissæ denotes prophetesses or divining women. The association of these different rites with one explanation, and the extraordinary claim about liquefied gold, remain the reported account; they are not silently corrected or certified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
of which read Tostatus in 2 Reg. cap. 6. quæst. 43. Thyreus cap. 57. 58. 62. &c. de locis infestis, Pictorius Isagog. de dæmonibus, &c. see more in them.	on which read Tostatus on 2 Kings, chapter 6, question 43; Thyreus's On Haunted Places, chapters 57, 58, 62 and others; Pictorius's Introduction on Demons; and so on. Consult them for further examples.[13279]
Source page 721–722 Cardan would have the party affected wink altogether in such a case, if he see ought that offends him, or cut the aire with a sword in such places they walke and abide; gladiis enim & lanceis terrentur, shoot a pistole at them, for being aerial bodies, (as Cælius Rhodiginus lib. 1. cap. 29. Tertullian, Origen, Psellus, and many hold) if stroken, they feel pain.	In such a case Cardan would have the sufferer keep his eyes entirely shut if he sees anything that troubles him, or slash the air with a sword in the places where the spirits walk and dwell—for swords and spears terrify them—or fire a pistol at them. For, being bodies composed of air, as Caelius Rhodiginus in book 1, chapter 29, Tertullian, Origen, Psellus and many others maintain, they feel pain if struck.[13280]
Source page 722 Papists commonly injoyne and apply crosses, holy water, sanctified beads, Amulets, musick, ringing of bells, for to that end are they consecrated, and by them baptized, Characters, counterfeit reliques, so many Masses, peregrinations, oblations, adjurations, and what not?	Roman Catholics commonly prescribe and employ crosses, holy water, blessed prayer beads, amulets, music and the ringing of bells—for this purpose the bells are consecrated and, as they put it, baptized—magical signs, counterfeit relics, quantities of Masses, pilgrimages, offerings, adjurations, and what else besides?[13281]

[13279] Editor. The printed 2 Reg. belongs to the older Latin four-book numbering of Kings: its second book corresponds to 2 Samuel in most modern English Bibles. The modern column retains Burton's title as 2 Kings; the older numbering and exact commentary locator must be kept distinct. The other titles are descriptive expansions of his abbreviations.

[13280] Editor. Wink means close the eyes; ought means anything. Tertullian, Apology 22, describes demons as subtly constituted and dwelling in the air. This English comparison supplies context for one named authority, not verification of injury by swords or pistols. Cardan's treatment and the collective attribution remain historical reports; their precise source passages are uncollated.

[13281] Editor. Characters are inscribed signs or figures; peregrinations are pilgrimages; adjurations are solemn commands invoking sacred authority. Counterfeit and the sarcastic catalogue belong to Burton's polemical voice. The reference to baptizing bells describes his account of their consecration.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Alexander Albertinus à Rocha, Petrus Thyreus, and Hieronymus Mengus with many other Pontificial writers, prescribe and set down several formes of exorcismes, aswell to houses possessed with divels, as to dæmoniacal persons; but I am of [13282]Lemnius mind, 'tis but damnosa adjuratio, aut potius ludificatio, a meer mockage, a counterfeit charme, to no purpose, they are fopperies and fictions,	Alexander Albertinus a Rocha, Petrus Thyreus and Hieronymus Mengus, with many other Roman Catholic writers, prescribe and set down various forms of exorcism, both for houses possessed by devils and for possessed people. But I agree with Lemnius: it is merely a harmful adjuration, or rather a mockery, sheer deception, a counterfeit charm serving no purpose. These are follies and inventions,[13283]
as that absurd [13284]story is amongst the rest, of a penitent woman seduced by a Magitian in France, at S. Bawne, exorcised by Domphius, Michaelis, and a company of circumventing Friers.	among them the absurd story of a penitent woman seduced by a magician in France, at S. Bawne, and exorcised by Domphius, Michaelis and a company of deceitful friars.[13285]
If any man (saith Lemnius) will attempt such a thing, without all those jugling circumstances, Astrological elections of time, place, prodigious habits, fustian, big, sesquipedal words, spels, crosses, characters, which exorcists ordinarily use, let him follow the example of Peter and John, that without any ambitious swelling terms, cured a lame man, Acts 3. In the name of Christ Jesus rise and walke.	If anyone wishes to attempt such a thing, says Lemnius, let him dispense with all those fraudulent trappings ordinarily used by exorcists: astrologically chosen times and places, outlandish costumes, bombast, grand words a foot and a half long, spells, crosses and magical signs. Let him follow Peter and John, who cured a lame man without any ostentatious, inflated language: In the name of Christ Jesus, rise and walk, Acts 3.[13286]

[13282] Burton. Source page 722, dagger: "Non desunt nostrâ ætate sacrificuli, qui tale quid attentant, sed à cacodæmone irrisi pudore suffecti sunt, & re infectâ abierunt." "There is no shortage in our age of petty priests who attempt such a thing; but, mocked by the evil spirit, they have been covered with shame and have gone away without accomplishing it."

[13283] Editor. Pontificial means associated with the papacy. Burton's first-person rejection marks a change from cataloguing proposed remedies to judging elaborate exorcisms. The Latin and English judgments are both retained; the accompanying margin describes failed attempts by priests.

[13284] Burton. Source page 722, asterisk: "Done into English by W. B. 1613." Translated into English by W. B., 1613.

[13285] Editor. Circumventing means practising deception. The 1613 title page of Michaelis's Admirable History names S. Baume, Friar Francis Domptius and the translator W. B. It clarifies Burton's S. Bawne and Domphius, which remain as printed. The facsimile verifies these title-page forms, not the possession narrative or Burton's assessment. W. B.'s identity is not established here.

[13286] Editor. Habits means clothing; fustian is pompous language; sesquipedal literally means a foot and a half long and mocks oversized words. Acts 3:6 is the healing formula. The contrast opposes elaborate ritual to the simple invocation of Christ's name.

Original text 1651	Modern English
His Name alone is the best and only charme against all such diabolical illusions, so doth Origen advise: and so Chrysostome, Hæc erit tibi baculus, hæc turris inexpugnabilis, hæc armatura.	His name alone is the best and only charm against all such diabolical illusions: so Origen advises, and Chrysostom likewise: This will be your staff, your impregnable tower, your armour.[13287]
Nos quid ad hæc dicemus, plures fortasse expectabunt, saith S. Austin. Many men will desire my counsel and opinion whats to be done in this behalfe; I can say no more, quam ut verâ fide, quæ per dilectionem operatur, ad Deum unum fugiamus, let them fly to God alone for helpe.	Perhaps many will await what we shall say to this, says St Augustine. Many will want my counsel and opinion on what should be done in this matter. I can say no more than that, with true faith which works through love, we should flee to God alone: let them flee to God alone for help.[13288]
Athanasius in his book De variis quæst. prescribes as a present charme against divels, the beginning of the 67. Ps. Exurgat Deus, dissipentur inimici, &c.	Athanasius, in his book On Various Questions, prescribes as an immediately effective charm against devils the beginning of Psalm 67: Let God arise; let his enemies be scattered, and so on.[13289]
But the best remedy is to flye to God, to call on him, hope, pray, trust, rely on him, to commit our selves wholly to him. What the practise of the primitive Church was in this behalfe, Et quis dæmonia ejiciendi modus, read Wierus at large, lib. 5. de Cura. Lam. meles. cap. 38. & deinceps.	But the best remedy is to flee to God, call upon him, hope, pray, trust and rely on him, and commit ourselves wholly to him. For the practice of the early Church in this matter, and its method of casting out demons, read Wierus at length in book 5, in the section on treating those harmed by witches, chapter 38 and following.[13290]

[13287] Editor. Burton applies the language of charms to reliance on Christ's name after rejecting elaborate exorcisms. The Latin pronouns have uneven agreement in print; the clear sequence of protective images is translated without silently rewriting the original. Exact Origen and Chrysostom sources remain unresolved.

[13288] Editor. Augustine, City of God 18.18, discusses demonic deceptions and flight from Babylon through faith working in love. Burton compresses and alters its Latin: Augustine's living God becomes his one God. The Latin and English restatements remain separate. Galatians 5:6 informs the faith phrase; Burton's intermediary and the source of the verbal changes remain untraced.

[13289] Editor. Present means immediately effective. Psalm 67 follows Septuagint and Vulgate numbering; the corresponding psalm is 68 in the King James Bible. Burton's Athanasius attribution and abbreviated title are retained without deciding the work's authorship.

[13290] Editor. Primitive Church means the early Christian Church. The compressed printed title de Cura. Lam. meles. is retained at left; the modern rendering supplies its subject descriptively, not a verified full title. The exact edition and chapter division remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Last of all: If the party affected shall certainly know this malady to have proceeded from too much fasting, meditation, precise life, contemplation of Gods judgements, (for the Divel deceives many by such means) in that other extreme he circumvents Melancholy it self, reading some books, Treatises, hearing rigid preachers, &c.	Last of all: if the sufferer knows for certain that this malady arose from too much fasting, meditation, a life of strict religious observance, contemplation of God's judgments—for the devil deceives many by such means; in that other extreme he ensnares melancholy itself—or from reading certain books and treatises, hearing severe preachers, and so on;[13291]
If he shall perceive that it hath begun first from some great loss, grievous accident, disaster, seeing others in like case, or any such terrible object, let him speedily remove the cause, which to the cure of this disease [13292]Navarrus so much commends, avertat cogitationem à re scrupulosa,	if he sees that it first began with some great loss, painful incident, disaster, the sight of others in a similar condition, or any such terrifying object, let him promptly remove the cause—a measure Navarrus strongly recommends for curing this disease: let him turn his thoughts away from what occasions his scruples;[13293]
by all opposite means, art, and industry, let him laxare animum, by all honest recreations, refresh and recreate his distressed soul; let him direct his thoughts, by himself and other of his friends.	by every counteracting means, skill and effort, let him relax his mind, and refresh and restore his distressed soul through wholesome recreation of every kind. Let him guide his thoughts, both by his own efforts and with his friends' help.[13294]

[13291] Editor. Precise life means rigorously scrupulous religious conduct, not merely an orderly routine. Burton's sentence is syntactically loose; in that other extreme he circumvents Melancholy it self interrupts the list. The modern punctuation marks the interruption without suppressing its uncertain relation to the surrounding clauses.

[13292] Burton. Source page 722, unmarked: "Tom. 2. cap. 27. num. 282." Volume 2, chapter 27, numbered section 282.

[13293] Editor. Scruples are distressing doubts of conscience. Navarrus is the customary Latin designation of Martín de Azpilcueta; the exact work and volume cited in the margin remain to be checked. Avertat calls for redirecting attention, in keeping with Burton's following practical advice.

[13294] Editor. Art means skilled method; industry means effort or application; honest means decent or wholesome. Recreate retains its sense of restoring strength, as well as taking recreation. The Latin phrase is translated as part of Burton's English sentence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 722–723 Let him read no more such tracts or subjects, hear no more such fearful tones, avoid such companies, and by all means open himself, submit himself to the advice of good Physitians and Divines, which is [13295]contraventio scrupulorum, as he calls it, hear them speak to whom the Lord hath [13296]given the tongue of the learned, to be able to minister a word to him that is weary, whose words are as flagons of wine.	Let him stop reading such tracts or subjects, hearing such frightening discourse and keeping such company. Above all, let him disclose his troubles and submit to the advice of good physicians and theologians. This is counteracting scruples, as Navarrus calls it. Let him listen to those whom the Lord has given the tongue of the learned, able to offer a word to the weary, whose words are like flagons of wine.[13297]

[13295] Burton. Source page 723, unmarked: “Navarrus.”

[13296] Burton. Source page 723, unmarked: “Is. 50. 4.” Isaiah 50:4.

[13297] Editor. Open himself means speak freely about his distress. The second margin cites Isaiah 50:4, on speaking a sustaining word to the weary; flagons of wine also recalls the sustaining image in Song of Songs 2:5. Contraventio describes acting against scrupulous doubts under counsel, not multiplying them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 723 Let him not be obstinate, head-strong, peevish, wilful, self-conceited (as in this malady they are) but give ear to good advice, be ruled and perswaded;	Let him not be obstinate, headstrong, irritable, wilful or convinced of his own judgment—as sufferers from this malady are—but listen to good advice and allow himself to be guided and persuaded;[13298]
and no doubt but such good counsel may prove as prosperous to his soul, as the Angel was to Peter, that opened the iron gates, loosed his bands, brought him out of prison and delivered him from bodily thraldome; they may ease his afflicted minde, relieve his wounded soul, and take him out of the jawes of Hell it self.	and surely such good counsel may benefit his soul as the angel benefited Peter, opening the iron gates, loosening his bonds, bringing him out of prison and delivering him from bodily captivity. These advisers may ease his afflicted mind, relieve his wounded soul and rescue him from the very jaws of hell.[13299]
I can say no more, or give better advice to such as are any way distressed in this kind, then what I have given and said. Only take this for a corollary and conclusion, as thou tendrest thine own welfare in this, and all other melancholy, thy good health of body and mind, observe this short precept, give not way to solitariness and idleness. Be not solitary, be not idle.	I can say no more, or offer better advice to anyone distressed in this way, than I have already given. Only take this as a final inference and conclusion: as you value your own welfare in this and every other kind of melancholy, and your health of body and mind, observe this short precept. Do not give way to solitude and idleness. Do not be solitary; do not be idle.[13300]
SPERATE MISERI, CAVETE FŒLICES.	Have hope, you who are miserable; Be on your guard, you who are fortunate.[13301]

[13298] Editor. Self-conceited here emphasizes undue confidence in one's own judgment. Burton's generalization about sufferers is retained as part of his exhortation. The direct appeal continues his insistence that distress be shared with capable advisers.

[13299] Editor. Prosperous means beneficial or successful; thraldome means bondage. Acts 12:7–10 supplies Peter's release. Burton compresses the narrative, in which the iron gate opens of its own accord, and makes bodily deliverance an image of relief through counsel.

[13300] Editor. Tendrest means cherish or care for; corollary is a concluding inference. Burton closes the sustained prose argument by returning to companionship and occupation, recurrent concerns of the book. The Latin motto and final quotation follow this closing counsel in the source.

[13301] Editor. The two balanced imperatives address opposite conditions: misery calls for hope, good fortune for vigilance. Fœlices means the happy or fortunate. The source's two-line display is preserved; it is a concluding motto, not an added editorial heading.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Vis à dubio liberari? vis quod incertum est evadere? Age pœnitentiam dum sanus es; sic agens, dico tibi quod securus es, quod pœnitentiam egisti eo tempore quo peccare potuisti. Austin.	Do you wish to be freed from doubt? Do you wish to escape uncertainty? Repent while you are healthy. If you do so, I tell you that you are secure, because you have repented at a time when you could still sin. Augustine.[13302]

[13302] Editor. A close parallel occurs in Sermon 393, De poenitentibus, transmitted among the sermons attributed to Augustine and included under Sermones dubi in the consulted Latin collection. Burton abridges and reshapes it. Dum sanus es contrasts repentance in health with postponement until the final illness; it does not mean merely while sane. His attribution is retained without settling authorship.

Original text 1651	Modern English
FINIS.	END.[13303]
Source page unnumbered Table The Table.	The Index[13304]
A Page	A Page
Absence a cure of love melanch. 552	Absence as a cure for love melancholy. 552
Absence over long cause of jealousie 599	Overlong absence as a cause of jealousy. 599
Academicorum Errata 141,139	Errors of scholars. 141,139
Abstinence commended 236	Abstinence commended. 236
Adversitie why better than prosperitie 338	Why adversity is better than prosperity. 338
Æquivocations of melancholy 11. of jealousie 591	Different meanings of melancholy, 11; of jealousy, 591.[13305]
Æmulation, hatred, faction, desire of revenge, causes of mel. 102. their cure 347	Rivalry, hatred, faction and desire for revenge as causes of melancholy, 102; their cure, 347.
Affections whence they arise 25. how they transform us 5. of sleeping and waking 24	Where the emotions arise, 25; how they transform us, 5. The states of sleeping and waking, 24.[13306]
Affection in melancholy what 32	What kind of disorder melancholy is. 32

[13303] Editor. This marks the end of the main text in the 1651 copy. The alphabetical Table, the closing notice signed H. C. and the imprint follow as back matter. The original preliminary matter precedes Democritus Junior to the Reader.

[13304] Editor. Burton's Table is an alphabetical index. Every number in the parallel columns is a page reference printed in the 1651 source, not a page number in this modern edition. Original order, repeated entries and printed numbers are retained. In digital editions, linked subject words lead to checked matching passages; the printed numbers themselves remain unchanged. Unlinked destinations have not been independently verified. A subject link does not establish what the indexer intended by a faulty number. Medical, religious and social assertions in these compressed headings represent the historical text.

[13305] Editor. Equivocations here means distinct senses of a word, not deceptive or evasive speech. The index distinguishes melancholy as a passing disposition from melancholy as an established disorder.

[13306] Editor. Affections can mean emotions, bodily conditions or states. The entry compresses different discussions into one heading; sleeping and waking are states rather than emotions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Against abuses, repulse, injuries, contumely, disgraces, scoffes 350	Against abuse, rejection, injuries, insults, disgrace and mockery. 350
Against envy, livor, hatred, malice 33	Against envy, spite, hatred and malice. 33[13307]
Against sorrow, vain fears, death of friends 340	Against sorrow, groundless fears and the death of friends. 340
Aire how it causeth melancholy 82. how rectified it cureth melanch. 219. 265, aire in love 457	How air causes melancholy, 82; how properly managed it cures melancholy, 219, 265. Air in relation to love, 457.
Aereall Divels 40	Aerial devils. 40
All are melancholy 33	Everyone is melancholic. 33
All beautiful parts attractive in love 463	All beautiful features attract love. 463
Alkermes good against melancholy 393	Alkermes as a remedy for melancholy. 393[13308]
Aloes his vertues 378	The medicinal properties of aloes. 378
Alteratives in physick to what use 367 against melancholy 389,398	The purpose of alterative medicines, 367; their use against melancholy, 389,398.[13309]
Ambition defined, described, cause of melancholy 103,112. of heresie 647. hinders and spils many matches 579	Ambition defined and described: a cause of melancholy, 103,112; of heresy, 647. It obstructs and spoils many marriages, 579.
Amiableness loves object 412	Loveliness as the object of love. 412
Amorous objects causes of love melancholy 481,494	Attractive objects as causes of love melancholy. 481,494

[13307] Editor. The source prints 33. This conspicuously short locator is retained, as are other suspect numbers in the Table. Compare the separate entry on envy and malice, which directs the reader to 347; the intended number here remains to be established.

[13308] Editor. Alkermes is the historical compound confection discussed among Burton's remedies. Its name is retained. The Table summarizes his medical authorities and does not itself supply ingredients or doses.

[13309] Editor. Alteratives were medicines intended to change an unhealthy bodily quality or humour. Averters, below, are treatments intended to draw or divert the offending humour away from the affected part.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Amulets controverted, approved 394	Amulets debated and approved. 394
Angers description; effects, how it causeth melancholy 104	Anger described; its effects and how it causes melancholy. 104
Antimony a purger of melancholy 377	Antimony as a purge for melancholy. 377
Anthony inveigled by Cleopatra 476	Antony captivated by Cleopatra. 476
Apology of love melancholy 406	A defence of the treatment of love melancholy. 406

Original text 1651	Modern English
Appetite 24	Appetite. 24
Apples good or bad how 69	How apples are beneficial or harmful. 69
Apparel and Cloaths, a cause of love melancholy 473	Dress and clothing as a cause of love melancholy. 473
Aqueducts of old 233	Ancient aqueducts. 233
Arteries what 16	What arteries are. 16
Artificial ayr against melancholy 261	Air modified by human art as a remedy for melancholy. 261
Artificial allurements of love 469	Artificial attractions that awaken love. 469
Arminians Tenents 715	The doctrines of the Arminians. 715
Art of memory 284	The art of memory. 284
Astrological Aphorisms, how available, signs or causes of melancholy 57	Astrological rules: their usefulness as signs or causes of melancholy. 57
Astrological signs of love 447	Astrological signs of love. 447
Atheists described 683	Atheists described. 683
Averters of melancholy 388	Treatments that divert melancholy. 388
Aurum potabile censured, approved 371	Drinkable gold criticized and approved. 371

Original text 1651	Modern English
B	B
Banishments effects 170. his cure and Antidote 339	The effects of banishment, 170; its cure and antidote, 339.
Bald lascivious 603	Bald men as lustful. 603
Barrenness what grievances it causeth 171	The distress caused by infertility. 171
Barrenness cause of Jealousie 603	Infertility as a cause of jealousy. 603
Barren grounds have best ayr 260	Barren land has the best air. 260
Bashfulness a symptome of melanch. 187 of love melancholy 502. cured 396	Bashfulness as a symptom of melancholy, 187; of love melancholy, 502; its cure, 396.
Baseness of birth no disparagement 312	Humble birth is no disgrace. 312
Bathes rectified 237	Bathing properly regulated. 237
Bawds a cause of love-melancholy 498	Procurers as a cause of love melancholy. 498
Bawm good against melanch. 368	Balm as a remedy for melancholy. 368
Beasts and birds in love 436	Beasts and birds in love. 436
Beats of lovers 494	Lovers' baits. 494[13310]
Biefe a melancholy meat 66	Beef as a food that produces melancholy. 66
Beer censured 71	Beer criticized. 71
Best site of an house 261	The best location for a house. 261

[13310] Editor. The 1651 Table prints Beats; the inspected 1638 Table has Beates, with locator 490. Neither prints Baits. The 1651 page 494 discusses allurements, promises, lies and offers of property (Block 125). This context supports the tentative modern baits, but the earlier spelling does not prove that interpretation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Beauties definition 404. cure of mel. 467 described 462. in parts 463. commendation 453. attractive power, prerogatives, excellencie, how it causeth mel. 456.468. makes grievous wounds, irresistible, 461. more beholding to art then nature 469. brittle and uncertain 560. censured 562. a cause of jealousie 601. beauty of God 634	Beauty defined, 404; as a cure for melancholy, 467; described, 462; in particular features, 463; praised, 453. Its power to attract, advantages and excellence; how it causes melancholy, 456,468. It inflicts grievous wounds and is irresistible, 461. It owes more to art than to nature, 469; is fragile and uncertain, 560; is criticized, 562; is a cause of jealousy, 601. The beauty of God, 634.
Bezoars stone good against melanch. 392	Bezoar stone as a remedy for melancholy. 392
Black eyes best 464	Black eyes are best. 464
Black spots in the nailes signs of mel. 58	Black spots on the nails as signs of melancholy. 58
Black man a pearl in a womans eye 464	The black man as a pearl in a woman's eye. 464[13311]
Blasphemy how pardonable 713	How blasphemy may be forgiven. 713
Blindness of lovers 519	The blindness of lovers. 519
Blood-letting when and how cure of melanch. 384	When and how bloodletting cures melancholy. 384
Blood-letting and purging, how causes of melancholy 80	How bloodletting and purging cause melancholy. 80
Blow on the head cause of melanch. 176	A blow to the head as a cause of melancholy. 176
Body melancholy his causes 178	The causes of melancholy throughout the body. 178
Bodily symptomes of melancholy 178. of love-melancholy 503	Bodily symptoms of melancholy, 178; of love melancholy, 503.

[13311] Editor. On printed 464 (PDF 572; Block 119), this saying follows a grim Sarazan and a martial, hairy face, then compares the man with Vulcan, a sweaty, soot-darkened blacksmith. The passage joins complexion, appearance and social contrast. It supplies no single modern racial identification; black man is retained without narrowing it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Bodily exercises 268. body how it works on the mind 89.174.189	Physical exercises, 268. How the body affects the mind, 89,174,189.
Books of all sorts 280,281	Books of every kind. 280,281

Original text 1651	Modern English
Borage and Bugloss, soveraign herbs against melanch. 370. their wines and juyce most excellent 374	Borage and bugloss as sovereign herbs against melancholy, 370; their wines and juice as excellent remedies, 374.
Brain distempered how cause of melancholy 174. his parts anatomised 19	How a disordered brain causes melancholy, 174; its parts examined anatomically, 19.
Bread and beer how causes of mel. 70	How bread and beer cause melancholy. 70
Brow and fore-head which are most pleasing 463	Which brows and foreheads are most attractive. 463
Brute beasts jealous 594	Jealousy in beasts. 594
Business the best cure of love mel. 545	Occupation as the best cure for love melancholy. 545

Original text 1651	Modern English
C	C
Cardans Father conjured up seven divels at once, 41. had a spirit bound to him 46	Cardan's father summoned seven devils at once, 41; had a spirit bound to his service, 46.
Cards and Dice censured, approved 274	Cards and dice criticized and approved. 274
Carp fishes nature 68	The nature of the carp. 68
Cares effects 107	The effects of worry. 107
Cataplasmes and Cerots for melanch. 375	Poultices and wax ointments for melancholy. 375
Cause of diseases 2	The cause of diseases. 2
Cause immediate of mel. symptomes. 205	The immediate cause of the symptoms of melancholy. 205
Causes of honest love 420. of heroical love 443. of jealousie 600	Causes of virtuous love, 420; of passionate love, 443; of jealousy, 600.[13312]
Cautions against jealousie 629	Precautions against jealousy. 629
Centaury good against melancholy 367	Centaury as a remedy for melancholy. 367
Charls the Great enforced to love basely by a philter 481	Charlemagne compelled by a love potion to love unworthily. 481
Change of countenance, sign of love-melancholy 506	A change of expression as a sign of love melancholy. 506
Charity described 424. defects of it 429	Charity described, 424; failures of charity, 429.
Character of a covetous man 114	A portrait of a greedy man. 114
Charls the sixt King of France mad for anger 105	Charles VI, king of France, driven mad by anger. 105

[13312] Editor. Honest means virtuous or honourable. Heroical love is Burton's term for intense erotic passion, treated as a form of lovesickness; it does not simply praise such love as heroic.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Chess-play censured 274	Chess criticized. 274
Chiromantical signs of melancholy 59	Signs of melancholy found in palm-reading. 59
Chirurgical remedies of melancholy 382	Surgical remedies for melancholy. 382
Cholerick melancholy signs 192	Signs of choleric melancholy. 192[13313]
Chorus sancti Viti a disease 10	St Vitus's dance, a disease. 10[13314]
Chymical physick censured 387	Chemical medicine criticized. 387
Circumstances increasing jealousie 602	Circumstances that increase jealousy. 602
Cities recreations 274	Recreations in cities. 274
Civil Lawyers miseries 134	The miseries of civil lawyers. 134
Climes and particular places, how causes of love melancholy 449	How climates and particular places cause love melancholy. 449
Cloaths a meer cause of good respect 156	Clothing alone as a reason for being respected. 156
Cloaths causes of love melancholy 473	Clothing as a cause of love melancholy. 473
Clysters good for melancholy 400	Enemas as a remedy for melancholy. 400
Coffa a Turky cordial drink 392	Coffee, a Turkish restorative drink. 392

[13313] Editor. Choleric and phlegmatic melancholy refer to Burton's humoral classifications. They should not be read merely as the modern personality descriptions irritable and unemotional.

[13314] Editor. The Latin means "St Vitus's dance." This historical diagnostic label must not be assumed to identify a single modern disorder in every case Burton cites.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Clod ayr cause of melancholy 83	Cold air as a cause of melancholy. 83[13315]
Colonies to be sent whither 591	Where colonies should be sent. 591
Combats 68	Combats. 68
Comets above the Moon 251	Comets above the moon. 251
Compound Alteratives censured, approved 368. compound purgers of melan. 377. compound Wines for mel. 583	Compound alterative medicines criticized and approved, 368; compound purges for melancholy, 377; compound medicinal wines for melancholy, 583.[13316]
Community of Wives a cure of jealousie 622	Wives held in common as a cure for jealousy. 622
Complement and good carriage causes of love melancholy 471	Polite attentions and graceful conduct as causes of love melancholy. 471
Confections and conserves against mel. 374	Medicinal confections and preserves against melancholy. 374
Confession of his grief to a friend, a principal cure of melancholy 293	Confiding one's grief to a friend as a principal cure for melancholy. 293
Confidence in his Physitian half a cure 229	Confidence in one's physician is half the cure. 229
Conjugal love best 443	Married love is best. 443
Continual cogitation of his mistress a symptome of love-melancholy 512	Continually thinking of one's beloved as a symptom of love melancholy. 512
Conscience troubled a cause of despair 699	A troubled conscience as a cause of despair. 699

[13315] Editor. Clod is a transposition error for cold. The original misprint is retained on the left; the modern column gives the intended word.

[13316] Editor. The Table prints 583 for compound wines. The inspected body page 381 (PDF 489; Block 102, passage 36) explicitly lists compound wines of hellebore, sea-onion and senna under Compound Purgers. This verifies the relevant passage; 583 remains in both index columns as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Conscience what it is 29	What conscience is. 29
Contention, brawling, law-suits, effects 169	The effects of disputes, quarrelling and lawsuits. 169
Continent or inward causes of melan. 172	Underlying or internal causes of melancholy. 172[13317]
Cookery taxed 70	Cookery criticized. 70
Content above all 325, whence to be had ibid.	Contentment above all, 325; where to find it, same page.
Contentions cure 357	The cure for quarrelling. 357
Costiveness to some a cause of mel. 78	Constipation as a cause of melancholy in some people. 78
Costiveness helped 401	Constipation relieved. 401
Correctors of accidents in mel. 394	Remedies for accompanying symptoms of melancholy. 394
Correctors to expel windiness and costiveness helped 401	Remedies to expel wind and relieve constipation. 401
Cordials against melancholy 388	Restorative medicines against melancholy. 388
Covetousness defined, described, how it causeth melancholy 114	Greed defined and described; how it causes melancholy. 114
Councel against melancholy 289. & 556. cure of jealousie 619. of despair 705	Counsel against melancholy, 289 and 556; to cure jealousy, 619; despair, 705.
Cuckolds common in all ages 616	Cuckolds common in every age. 616
Countrey recreations 273	Country recreations. 273

[13317] Editor. Continent is a technical causal term for a cause residing within, or sustaining, the disorder. It does not mean sexually abstinent here. Accidents in the later entry Correctors of accidents means accompanying symptoms or complications.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Crocodiles jealous 599	Jealousy in crocodiles. 599
Cupids two darts to cause & cure love 175	Cupid’s two arrows, which cause and cure love. 175[13318]

[13318] Editor. The Table prints 175. On inspected printed 575 (PDF 683; Block 140, passage 26), Cupid has a sharp golden dart to cause love and a blunt leaden one to hinder it. This verifies the indexed subject at 575. The original locator 175 remains in both columns.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cupping glasses, Cauteries how and when used to melancholy 388	How and when cupping glasses and cauteries are used for melancholy. 388
Custom of diet, delight of appetite, how to be kept and yeelded to 79	How established eating habits and the preferences of the appetite should be respected and indulged. 79
Cure of mel. unlawful rejected 219. from God 222. of head-melanch. 370. over all the body 494. of hypochondriacal melancholy 395. of love melanch. 543 of jealousie 618. of despair 705	Cures for melancholy: unlawful ones rejected, 219; those from God, 222. Cures for melancholy of the head, 370; throughout the body, 494; hypochondriacal melancholy, 395; love melancholy, 543; jealousy, 618; despair, 705.[13319]
Cure of mel. in himself 286. or friends 294	Curing melancholy through one's own efforts, 286; or through friends, 294.
Curiosity described, his effects 166	Curiosity described; its effects. 166

[13319] Editor. The source numbers 370 and 494 are retained. They conflict with other headings in this same Table and with the locations of the medical sections. These two references remain unresolved and unlinked; the printed numbers are not silently repaired.

Original text 1651	Modern English
D	D
Dancing, masking, mumming censured, approved 491.493.494, their effects, how they cause love-melan. 492. how symptomes of lovers 535	Dancing, masquerading and mumming criticized and approved, 491,493,494; their effects and how they cause love melancholy, 492; how they are symptoms of being in love, 535.
Deformity of body no misery 312	Bodily deformity is no misery. 312
Death foretold by spirits 48	Death foretold by spirits. 48
Death of friends cause of melanch. 162 other effects ibid. how cured 337. death advantageous 344	The death of friends as a cause of melancholy, 162; other effects, same page; how grief is cured, 337. The advantages of death, 344.
Despair, equivocations 693. causes 695. symptomes 701. Prognosticks 704. Cure 705	Despair: its different meanings, 693; causes, 695; symptoms, 701; prognosis, 704; cure, 705.
Diet what and how causeth melanch. 64 quantity 72. diet of divers nations 75.	Diet: what it is and how it causes melancholy, 64; quantity, 72; the diets of different nations, 75.
Diet how rectified to cure 231. In quantity 234	How diet is regulated to cure melancholy, 231; in quantity, 234.
Diet a cause of love mel. 450 a cure, 552	Diet as a cause of love melancholy, 450; as a cure, 552.
Digression against all manner of discontents, 307 digression of ayre, 240. of Anatomie, 13. of devils and spirits, 39	Digression against every kind of discontent, 307; digression on air, 240; on anatomy, 13; on devils and spirits, 39.
Discommodities of unequall matches, 628	The disadvantages of unequal marriages. 628
Discontents, cares, miseries, causes of mel. 105. how repelled and cured by good counsel 293.307	Discontent, worries and miseries as causes of melancholy, 105; how they are countered and cured by good counsel, 293,307.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Diseases why inflicted upon us, 3. Their number, definition, division, 6. diseases of the head, 7. diseases of the mind more grievous then those of the body 216	Why diseases are inflicted upon us, 3; their number, definition and classification, 6; diseases of the head, 7. Diseases of the mind are more grievous than those of the body, 216.
Disgrace a cause of mel. 99.169. qualified by counsel 363	Disgrace as a cause of melancholy, 99,169; alleviated by counsel, 363.
Dissimilar parts of the body 16	The body's composite parts. 16[13320]
Distemper of particular parts, causes of mel. and how 174	Disorders of particular organs as causes of melancholy, and how they cause it. 174
Divels how they cause melancholy, 41.42. their beginning, nature, conditions, ibid. feel pain: swift in motion, mortal, 40 their orders, 43. power, 51. how they cause religious melancholy, 642. how despair, 695. Divels are often in love 437. shall be saved, as some hold 716	How devils cause melancholy, 41,42; their origin, nature and attributes, same pages. They feel pain, move swiftly and are mortal, 40. Their orders, 43; power, 51; how they cause religious melancholy, 642; despair, 695. Devils are often in love, 437; will be saved, according to some, 716.
Divine sentences 359	Religious maxims. 359
Divines miseries, 135. with the causes of their miseries 136,137	The miseries of theologians and clergy, 135; the causes of those miseries, 136,137.
Divers accidents causing mel. 163	Various misfortunes that cause melancholy. 163
Dreams and their kinds 24	Dreams and their kinds. 24
Dreams troublesome, how to be amended 289	How to remedy disturbing dreams. 289
Drunkards children often mel. 61	The children of drunkards are often melancholic. 61
Drunkenness taxed 73.305	Drunkenness criticized. 73,305

[13320] Editor. Dissimilar parts are organs composed of different kinds of tissue, as opposed to the supposedly uniform or similar parts of traditional anatomy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Dowry and money main causes of love-melancholy 478	Dowries and money as principal causes of love melancholy. 478
Dotage what 8	What mental derangement is. 8[13321]
Dotage of lovers 519	The infatuation of lovers. 519

[13321] Editor. Dotage has a wider medical meaning here than senility: mental derangement or impaired understanding. In the following lovers' entry, it means infatuation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
E	E
Earths motion examined, 252. compass, center, &c. 253. an sit animata 253	The earth's motion examined, 252; its circumference, centre and so forth, 253; whether it has a soul, 253.
Education a cause of mel. 144	Upbringing as a cause of melancholy. 144
Election misconceived, cause of despair, 713,714,715	Misunderstanding divine election as a cause of despair. 713,714,715
Element of fire exploded 251	The elemental sphere of fire rejected. 251
Effects of love 537,540	The effects of love. 537,540
Envie and malice cause of melancholy, 100 their antidote 347	Envy and malice as causes of melancholy, 100; their antidote, 347.
Epicurus vindicated 289	Epicurus defended. 289
Epicurus medicine for mel. 303	Epicurus's medicine for melancholy. 303
Epicures, Atheists, Hypocrites, how mad, and melancholy 682	How Epicures, atheists and hypocrites are mad and melancholic. 682
Epithalamium 589	A wedding song. 589
Eunuches why kept, and where 611	Why eunuchs are kept, and where. 611
Evacuations how they cause mel. 78	How bodily evacuations cause melancholy. 78
Excentricks and Epicicles exploded, 251	Eccentrics and epicycles rejected. 251[13322]
Exercise if immoderate, cause of mel. 84 before meales wholsom, ibid. exercise rectified, 267. several kinds, when fit, 278. exercises of the mind 277.279	Excessive exercise as a cause of melancholy, 84; exercise before meals as healthy, same page; exercise properly regulated, 267; its different kinds and suitable times, 278; exercises of the mind, 277,279.

[13322] Editor. Eccentrics and epicycles are devices used in historical models of planetary motion. Exploded means rejected or discredited, as it does in the earlier entry on the elemental sphere of fire.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Exotick and strange simples censured, 375	Exotic and unfamiliar medicinal ingredients criticized. 375
Extasis ibid.	Ecstasy, same page.[13323]
Eyes main instruments of love, 452. loves darts, 465. seats, orators, arrows, torches, 466. how they pierce 470	Eyes as the principal instruments of love, 452; love's darts, 465; its seats, spokesmen, arrows and torches, 466; how they pierce, 470.

[13323] Editor. The source gives only ibid., apparently referring to the preceding 375. This is retained as "same page." Burton discusses ecstasy in the early account of madness (Block 022, passage 23, printed page 9). The digital subject link leads to that discussion; the intended Table locator remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
F	F
Faces prerogative, a most attractive part 462,463	The special power of the face, a most attractive feature. 462,463
Fasting cause of melancholy, 75. a cure of love mel. 546. abused, the Divels instruments, 656.658. effects of it ibid.	Fasting as a cause of melancholy, 75; a cure for love melancholy, 546. When abused, an instrument of the Devil, 656,658; its effects, same pages.
Fayries 47	Fairies. 47
Fear cause of mel. his effects, 97. fear of death, destinies foretold, 165. a symptome of mel. 181. sign of love mel. 518. antidote to fear 340	Fear as a cause of melancholy; its effects, 97. Fear of death and foretold destinies, 165; as a symptom of melancholy, 181; a sign of love melancholy, 518. The antidote to fear, 340.
Fenny foul mel. 67	Marsh birds as food that produces melancholy. 67
Flaxen hair a great motive of love 473	Flaxen hair as a powerful incentive to love. 473
Flegmatick melancholy signs 191	Signs of phlegmatic melancholy. 191
Fires rage 4	The destructive fury of fire. 4
Fiery Divels 45	Fiery devils. 45
Fish, what melancholy 67	Which fish produce melancholy. 67
Fish good 234	Beneficial fish. 234
Fishes in love 437	Fish in love. 437
Fishing and fowling how and when good exercise 269	How and when fishing and catching birds are good exercise. 269
Fools often beget wise men, 62. by love become wise 533	Fools often father wise men, 62; become wise through love, 533.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Force of imagination 91	The power of imagination. 91
Friends a cure of mel. 295	Friends as a cure for melancholy. 295
Fruits causing mel. 67. allowed 234	Fruits that cause melancholy, 67; those permitted, 234.
Fumitory purgeth melancholy 369	Fumitory as a purge for melancholy. 369

Original text 1651	Modern English
G	G
Gaming a cause of melancholy, his effects 119	Gambling as a cause of melancholy; its effects. 119
Gardens of Simples where, to what end, 376	Gardens of medicinal plants: where they are and their purpose. 376
Gardens for pleasure 271	Pleasure gardens. 271
General toleration of Religion, by whom permitted, and why 681	General religious toleration: who permits it, and why. 681
Gentry, whence it came first, 314. base without means, ibid. vices accompanying it, ibid. true gentry whence, 316 gentry commended 318	The origins of gentility, 314; degraded without means, same page; the vices that accompany it, same page; the source of true gentility, 316; gentility commended, 318.
Gesture cause of love mel. 471	Gesture as a cause of love melancholy. 471
Gifts and promises of great force amongst lovers 494	The great power of gifts and promises among lovers. 494
Gods just judgement cause of melancholy, 2. sole cause sometimes 37	God's just judgment as a cause of melancholy, 2; sometimes its sole cause, 37.
Geography commended 280	Geography commended. 280
Geometry, Arithmetick, Algebra, commended 284	Geometry, arithmetic and algebra commended. 284
Gold good against mel. 371. a most beautiful object 418	Gold as a remedy for melancholy, 371; a most beautiful object, 418.
Good counsel a charm to melancholy: 273 good counsel for love-sick persons, 564 against mel. it self, 360 for such as are jealous 615	Good counsel as a charm against melancholy, 273; good counsel for the lovesick, 564; against melancholy itself, 360; for the jealous, 615.[13324]

[13324] Editor. The first locator is printed 273. It is retained, although the discussions of consolatory counsel occur elsewhere and the Table's own entry Confession points to 293. The intended destination remains unresolved and this locator is left unlinked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Great men most part unhonest, 603	Great men are mostly unchaste. 603
Gristle what 15	What cartilage is. 15
Guts described 17	The intestines described. 17

Original text 1651	Modern English
H	H
Hand and paps how forcible in Love-melanch. 464	The power of hands and breasts in love melancholy. 464
Hard usage a cause of jealousie 599	Harsh treatment as a cause of jealousy. 599
Hauking and hunting why good 269	Why hawking and hunting are beneficial. 269
Hatred cause of mel. 100	Hatred as a cause of melancholy. 100
Hereditary diseases, 61	Hereditary diseases. 61
Head melancholies causes, 175. symptomes, 198. his cure 392	Melancholy of the head: causes, 175; symptoms, 198; cure, 392.
Heavens penetrable, 252. Infinitly swift, 253	The heavens as penetrable, 252; infinitely swift, 253.
Hearing what 22	What hearing is. 22
Heat immoderate cause of mel. 82	Excessive heat as a cause of melancholy. 82
Health a pretious thing 170	Health as a precious possession. 170
Hell where 246	Where hell is. 246
Help from friends against melanch. 294	Help from friends against melancholy. 294
Hellebor white and black purgers of mel. 378. black his vertues and history 379	White and black hellebore as purges for melancholy, 378; the properties and history of black hellebore, 379.
Hemorrogia cause of mel. 78	Haemorrhage as a cause of melancholy. 78
Hemrods stopped cause of mel. 77	Suppressed haemorrhoidal bleeding as a cause of melancholy. 77
Hearbs causing mel. 68. curing mel. 234 proper to most diseases ibid.	Herbs that cause melancholy, 68; cure it, 234; are suitable for most diseases, same page.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hereticks their conditions 657 their symptomes 666	The characteristics of heretics, 657; their symptoms, 666.
Heroical loves pedegree, power, extent, 433 definition, part affected 440. tyranny ibid.	Passionate love: its pedigree, power and extent, 433; definition and the part affected, 440; tyranny, same page.
Hippocrates jealousie 600	Hippocrates' jealousy. 600
Hippocrates described 691	Hypocrites described. 691[13325]
Honest objects of love 421	Worthy objects of love. 421
Hope, a cure of misery 344	Hope as a cure for misery. 344
Hope and fear, the Divels main engins to entrap the world 651	Hope and fear as the Devil's principal devices for ensnaring the world. 651
Hope, good against melan. 378	Hope as a remedy for melancholy. 378[13326]
Hot Countreys apt and prone to jealousie 601	Hot countries as susceptible and prone to jealousy. 601
Horse-leeches how and when used in melancholy 392.399	How and when horse-leeches are used for melancholy. 392,399
How oft 'tis fit to eat in a day 235	How often it is suitable to eat each day. 235
How to resist passions 287	How to resist the passions. 287
How men fall in love 468	How people fall in love. 468

[13325] Editor. The source prints Hippocrates in this entry as well as the preceding one. Page 691, however, concerns hypocrites: see Block 163, passages 04–17. The modern column corrects the repeated name to Hypocrites; the actual Hippocrates entry above remains unchanged.

[13326] Editor. The 1651 Table prints Hope at 378; the inspected 1638 Table also reads Hope, at 374. The 1651 page 378 discusses antimony, tobacco and purging simples, without locating this claim about hope or hops. Hops remains an unproved conjecture. Hope and its printed number are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Humours what they are 14	What the humours are. 14
Hydrophobia described 10	Hydrophobia described. 10
Hypocondriacal melancholy 35. his causes, inward, outward, 180 symptome 199. cure of it 408. Hypocondries misaffected, causes 175	Hypochondriacal melancholy, 35; its internal and external causes, 180; symptoms, 199; cure, 408. Disorders of the hypochondria as causes, 175.[13327]

[13327] Editor. The hypochondria are the upper abdominal regions below the ribs. Hypochondriacal melancholy in Burton's medical scheme is associated with disturbances there, and is not simply the modern fear of having an illness. The anomalous cure reference 408 is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I	I
Idleness a main cause of mel. 85 Of love mel. 450. of jealousie 598	Idleness as a principal cause of melancholy, 85; of love melancholy, 450; of jealousy, 598.[13328]
Jealousie a symptome of mel. 185. defined, described 591. of Princes, 593. of brute beasts 594, causes of it 596,599, symptomes of it 608, prognosticks 613, cure of it 615,622. &c.	Jealousy as a symptom of melancholy, 185; defined and described, 591; in princes, 593; in beasts, 594; its causes, 596,599; symptoms, 608; prognosis, 613; cure, 615,622 and following.
Jests how and when to be used 151	How and when jokes should be used. 151
Jews Religious symptomes 661	The religious symptoms of Jews. 661
Ignorance the mother of devotion 655	Ignorance as the mother of devotion. 655
Ignorance commended 361	Ignorance commended. 361
Ignorant persons still circumvented 656	Ignorant people are continually deceived. 656
Imagination what 25. his force and effects 91,92,93,94	What imagination is, 25; its power and effects, 91,92,93,94.
Immateriall mel. 34	Immaterial melancholy. 34
Immortality of the soul prov'd, impugned by whom 27,690	The soul's immortality proved; those who dispute it. 27,690
Importunity and opportunity cause of love melan. 480 of jealousie 607	Persistent solicitation and opportunity as causes of love melancholy, 480; of jealousy, 607.
Imprisonment cause of melancholy 152	Imprisonment as a cause of melancholy. 152
Impostures of Divels 648 of politicians 647 of Priests 649	The impostures of devils, 648; of politicians, 647; of priests, 649.
Impediments of lovers 583	Obstacles faced by lovers. 583

[13328] Editor. The source uses I for the section that also contains J entries; its order is retained even where modernization changes the headword. The religious headings that follow preserve Burton's polemical classification rather than offering an independent diagnosis of the groups named.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Impotency a cause of jealousie 598	Impotence as a cause of jealousy. 598
Impulsive cause of mans misery 2	The impelling cause of human misery. 2
Incubi and succubi 438	Male and female demons that have intercourse with humans. 438
Inconstancy of lovers 563,564	The inconstancy of lovers. 563,564
Inconstancy a sign of mel. 185	Inconstancy as a sign of melancholy. 185
Infirmities of body and mind, what grievances they cause 173	The distress caused by infirmities of body and mind. 173
Inner senses described 23	The internal senses described. 23
Injuries and abuses rectified 353	Injuries and abuses redressed. 353
Instrumental causes of diseases 3	The instrumental causes of diseases. 3
Instrumental cause of mans misery 3 & 4.	The instrumental cause of human misery. 3 and 4.
Interpreters of dreams 24	Interpreters of dreams. 24
Inundations fury 4	The fury of floods. 4
Joy in excess cause of mel. 126	Excessive joy as a cause of melancholy. 126
Irrigations for mel. 403	Irrigation treatments for melancholy. 403
Issues when used in mel. 383	When issues are used for melancholy. 383[13329]

[13329] Editor. An issue was an artificially maintained opening or sore intended to discharge harmful matter. Irrigations means applications or pourings of liquid; the historical treatments are translated without adding modern prescriptions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Inward causes of mel. 172	Internal causes of melancholy. 172

Original text 1651	Modern English
K	K
Kings and Princes discontents 110	The discontents of kings and princes. 110
Kissing a main cause of love mel. 481 a symptome of love mel. 506	Kissing as a principal cause of love melancholy, 481; a symptom of love melancholy, 506.

Original text 1651	Modern English
L	L
Labour, business, cure of love mel. 553	Labour and occupation as a cure for love melancholy. 553
Lapis Armenius, his vertues against melancholy 379	Armenian stone: its properties against melancholy. 379[13330]
Lascivious meats to be avoided 460,546	Foods that provoke lust are to be avoided. 460,546
Laurel a purge for mel. 376	Laurel as a purge for melancholy. 376
Laws against Adultery 612	Laws against adultery. 612
Leo decimus the Popes riot 70 his scoffing tricks 149	The extravagance of Pope Leo X, 70; his mocking tricks, 149.
Leoline Prince of Wales his submission 353	The submission of Llywelyn, prince of Wales. 353
Leucata petra the cure of love-sick persons 573	The Leucadian rock as a cure for the lovesick. 573[13331]
Liberty of Princes and great men, how abused 607	How princes and great men abuse their freedom. 607
Libraries commended 282	Libraries commended. 282
Liver his site, 16. cause of mel. distempers, if hot or cold 174	The liver's position, 16; its disorders as causes of melancholy when it is hot or cold, 174.
Loss of liberty cause of mel. 150. servitude, imprisonment, cause of mel. 152	Loss of liberty as a cause of melancholy, 150; servitude and imprisonment as causes of melancholy, 152.

[13330] Editor. Lapis Armenius is Armenian stone, a mineral drug. Its historical name is translated without assigning it a precise modern chemical composition.

[13331] Editor. The Leucadian rock is the cliff associated with the legendary leap that would end lovesickness. The heading condenses a story Burton discusses; it is not a practical recommendation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Losses in general how they offend 164 cause of despair, 541. how eased 344	How losses generally cause distress, 164; as a cause of despair, 541; how they are alleviated, 344.
Love of gaming and pleasures, immoderate cause of mel. 117	Excessive love of gambling and pleasures as a cause of melancholy. 117
Love of learning, over-much study cause of mel. 127	Love of learning and excessive study as causes of melancholy. 127
Loves beginning, object, definition, division, 411,422. love made the world, 416 love's power, 435. in vegetals, 436. in sensible creatures, 437. loves power in Divels and Spirits, 438. in men, 440 love a disease, 538.596. a fire, 516. loves passions, 512. phrases of lovers, 522 their vain wishes and attempts, 529 lovers impudent, 529. couragious, 527 wise, valiant, free, 533. neat in Apparel, 535. Poets, Musitians, Dancers, 535. loves effects, 549. love lost revived by sight, 550. love cannot be compelled 579	Love: its origin, object, definition and classification, 411,422. Love created the world, 416. Its power, 435; in plants, 436; in sentient creatures, 437; in devils and spirits, 438; in humans, 440. Love as a disease, 538,596; a fire, 516. The passions of love, 512; lovers' expressions, 522; their futile wishes and attempts, 529. Lovers are shameless, 529; courageous, 527; wise, valiant and generous, 533; carefully dressed, 535; poets, musicians and dancers, 535. The effects of love, 549; lost love revived by sight, 550. Love cannot be compelled, 579.
Love and hate symptomes of religious melancholy 660,661	Love and hatred as symptoms of religious melancholy. 660,661
Lycanthropia described 9	Lycanthropy described. 9

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page unnumbered Table and closing notice M	M[13332]
Madness described, 8. The extent of mel. 213. A symptome and effect of love mel. 542	Madness described, 8. The extent of melancholy, 213. Madness as a symptom and effect of love melancholy, 542.
Made dishes cause mel. 70	Elaborately prepared dishes as a cause of melancholy. 70
Maids, Nuns, Widows mel. 202	Melancholy in unmarried women, nuns and widows. 202[13333]
Magicians how they cause mel. 53 how they cure it 220	How magicians cause melancholy, 53; how they cure it, 220.
Mahometans their symptomes 671	The symptoms of Muslims. 671[13334]
Mans excellency, misery 1	Human excellence and misery. 1
Man the greatest enemy to man 4 & 5	Humankind as its own greatest enemy. 4 and 5
Many means to divert lovers, 549. To cure them 556	Many ways to distract lovers, 549; to cure them, 556.
Marriage if unfortunate cause of mel. 168 best cure of love melan. 573. Marriage helps, 627. miseries, 565. benefits and commendation 590	Unhappy marriage as a cause of melancholy, 168; marriage as the best cure for love melancholy, 573. Aids to marriage, 627; its miseries, 565; benefits and praise, 590.
Mathematical studies commended 281	Mathematical studies commended. 281

[13332] Editor. The alphabetical Table continues with M through Y. Every numerical locator is the original printed page reference, not a page number in the modern edition. Original ordering, repeated entries and faulty numbers remain. U and V share the source heading V; there are no separate X or Z sections. Digital subject links lead only to checked matching passages; unlinked destinations have not been independently verified. Printed numbers are never silently replaced by the linked passage's page number.

[13333] Editor. Maids here means unmarried women. These headings reproduce Burton's historical classification, in which reproductive physiology and sexual abstinence figure prominently; they do not name modern diagnostic categories.

[13334] Editor. Mahometans is the source's older term for Muslims. Its placement under symptoms belongs to Burton's polemical account of religious melancholy. Papists below is his disparaging term for Roman Catholics; the translation preserves that polemical force.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Medicines select for melanch. 362. against wind and costiveness, 401. for love melancholy 543	Selected medicines for melancholy, 362; for wind and constipation, 401; for love melancholy, 543.
Melancholy in disposition, mel. equivocations, 11. definition, name, difference, 31 part and parties affected in melancholy, his affection, 32. matter, 34. species or kinds of mel. 35. mel. an hereditary disease, 61. meats causing it, 65,66,67. antecedent causes, particular parts, 174 symptomes of it, 178. they are passionate above measure, humours, 186. melancholy adust symptomes, 192. mixt symptomes of mel. with other diseases, 194. melanch. a cause of jealousie, 631 of despair, 695. melancholy men why witty, 207. why so apt to laugh, weep, swear, blush, ibid. why they see visions, hear strange noyses, speak untaught languages, prophesie, &c. 208,209	Melancholy as a disposition; the different meanings of melancholy, 11; its definition, name and distinctions, 31; the part and people affected, and the nature of the disorder, 32; its material substance, 34; species or kinds, 35. Melancholy as a hereditary disease, 61; foods that cause it, 65,66,67; antecedent causes in particular organs, 174; its symptoms, 178; excessive passions and peculiar moods, 186; symptoms of adust melancholy, 192; symptoms mixed with those of other diseases, 194. Melancholy as a cause of jealousy, 631; of despair, 695. Why melancholic people are clever, 207; so prone to laugh, weep, swear and blush, same page; why they see visions, hear strange noises, speak languages they have never learned, prophesy and so forth, 208,209.[13335]
Menstruus Concubitus causa melanc. 63	Intercourse during menstruation as a cause of melancholy. 63[13336]
Memory his seat 23	The seat of memory. 23
Men seduced by spirits in the night 48	People led astray by spirits at night. 48
Metempsycosis 26	The transmigration of souls. 26
Metals, minerals for mel. 370	Metals and minerals for melancholy. 370

[13335] Editor. Adust means burned or overheated: Burton's humoral account distinguishes natural melancholy from pathological matter produced by the supposed burning of humours. Matter denotes the bodily substance held responsible for the disorder, not its subject matter. Humours near 186 instead concerns peculiar dispositions or moods.

[13336] Editor. The Latin entry makes a claim within the discussion of inherited melancholy and parental generation. It is translated as a historical claim, without converting it into a modern statement about inheritance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Meteors strange, how caused 250	How strange meteors are caused. 250[13337]
Metoposcopy fore-shewing mel. 59	Forehead-reading as a way of predicting melancholy. 59[13338]
Milk a melancholy meat 67	Milk as a food that produces melancholy. 67
Minde how it works on the body 89	How the mind affects the body. 89
Minerals good against mel. 370	Minerals as remedies for melancholy. 370
Ministers how they cause despair 698	How ministers cause despair. 698
Mirach, mesentery, matrix, meseriack veines causes of mel. 175	The mirach, mesentery, womb and mesenteric veins as causes of melancholy. 175[13339]
Mirabolanes purgers of mel. 378	Myrobalans as purges for melancholy. 378
Mirth and merry company excellent against mel. 281. their abuses 305	Mirth and cheerful company as excellent remedies for melancholy, 281; their abuses, 305.
Miseries of man, 1. how they cause mel. 106 284. common miseries, 105. miseries of both sorts, 346. no man free, miseries effects in us, sent for our good, 310. miseries of Students and Scholars 127	Human miseries, 1; how they cause melancholy, 106,284; common miseries, 105; miseries of both kinds, 346. No one is free from them; their effects on us, and how they are sent for our good, 310. The miseries of students and scholars, 127.
Mitigations of melancholy 360	Ways of alleviating melancholy. 360
Monies prerogatives 418	The advantages of money. 418

[13337] Editor. Meteors has a wider historical sense here, including unusual atmospheric appearances and weather phenomena, rather than only the luminous tracks of falling extraterrestrial bodies.

[13338] Editor. Metoposcopy interprets the lines of the forehead. The related physiognomical signs below concern judgments from bodily appearance. See the discussion translated in Block 032.

[13339] Editor. Burton identifies mirach with the epigastrium in his anatomical survey (Block 024). Matrix means womb; meseriack veins are mesenteric veins. These terms belong to the historical localization of melancholy in bodily organs.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Moon inhabited, 254. Moon in love 444	The moon inhabited, 254; the moon in love, 444.
Moving faculty described 25	The faculty of movement described. 25
Mother how cause of melanch. 62	How the mother causes melancholy. 62
Musick a present remedy for mel. his effects, 299. a symptome of lovers, 535 causes of love mel. 493	Music as an immediate remedy for melancholy; its effects, 299; a symptom of being in love, 535; a cause of love melancholy, 493.

Original text 1651	Modern English
N	N
Natural melanch. signs 190	Signs of natural melancholy. 190
Natural signs of love mel. 503	Natural signs of love melancholy. 503
Narrow Streets where in use 261	Where narrow streets are used. 261
Nakedness of parts a cause of love mel. 473 cure of love mel. 559	Exposure of parts of the body as a cause of love melancholy, 473; as a cure for love melancholy, 559.
Necessity to what it inforceth 78,159	What necessity compels people to do. 78,159
Neglect and contempt, best cures of jealousie 616	Disregard and contempt as the best cures for jealousy. 616
Nemesis or punishment comes after 353	Nemesis, or punishment, follows. 353
Nerves what 15	What nerves are. 15
Newes most welcome 275	News is most welcome. 275
Non-necessary causes of melancholy 142	Non-necessary causes of melancholy. 142[13340]
Nobility censured 315	Nobility criticized. 315
Nuns melancholy 202	Melancholy in nuns. 202
Nurse how cause of melancholy 142,143	How a nurse causes melancholy. 142,143[13341]

[13340] Editor. Burton calls these causes remote, outward, adventitious or accidental (Block 050). Non-necessary is a technical contrast with the preceding class of causes; it does not mean unimportant.

[13341] Editor. The nurse in this discussion is a wet nurse. Strange Nurses below means nurses from outside the family, rather than nurses who behave oddly.

Original text 1651	Modern English
O	O
Objects causing melanch. to be removed 549	Objects that cause melancholy should be removed. 549
Obstacles and hindrances of lovers 574	Obstacles and hindrances faced by lovers. 574
Occasions to be avoided in love mel. 56	Occasions to avoid in love melancholy. 56[13342]
Odoraments to smell to for mel. 393	Aromatic substances to smell as remedies for melancholy. 393
Old folks apt to be jealous 598	Older people are prone to jealousy. 598
Old folks incontinency taxed 625	Sexual incontinence in old people criticized. 625
Old age a cause of mel. 60. old mens Sons often melanch. 63	Old age as a cause of melancholy, 60; old men's sons are often melancholic, 63.
One love drives out another 554	One love drives out another. 554
Opinions of or concerning the Soul 27	Opinions concerning the soul. 27
Oppressions effects 170	The effects of oppression. 170
Opportunity and importunity causes of love mel. 480	Opportunity and persistent solicitation as causes of love melancholy. 480
Organical parts 17	The organs of the body. 17
Othes of lovers pardoned, unkept, frequent 406	Lovers' oaths: pardoned, broken and frequent. 406
Overmuch joy, pride, praise, how causes of melancholy 121	How excessive joy, pride and praise cause melancholy. 121
Oyntments for melancholy 371	Ointments for melancholy. 371

[13342] Editor. The Table prints 56. A matching discussion begins on printed 549 (PDF 657; Block 134): the subsection title includes avoid occasions, and the text develops that advice. This is a verified subject match, not proof of which number the indexer intended. The printed 56 is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Oyntments riotously used 476	Ointments used extravagantly. 476

Original text 1651	Modern English
P	P
Paleness and leanness, symptomes of love-melancholy 503	Pallor and thinness as symptoms of love melancholy. 503
Papists religious symptomes 671	The religious symptoms of papists. 671
Paracelsus defence of Minerals 372	Paracelsus's defence of mineral medicines. 372
Parents how they wrong their children 578. how they cause mel. by propagation 61. how by remisness and indulgence 145	How parents wrong their children, 578; how they cause melancholy through generation, 61; through laxity and indulgence, 145.
Passions and perturbations causes of mel. 89. how they work on the body 90. their divisions 97. how rectified and eased 289	Passions and emotional disturbances as causes of melancholy, 89; how they affect the body, 90; their classifications, 97; how they are regulated and relieved, 289.
Particular cures of all three kinds of melancholy 482	Particular cures for all three kinds of melancholy. 482
Particular parts distempered, how they cause melanch. 174	How disorders in particular organs cause melancholy. 174
Parties affected in religious melan. 641	People affected by religious melancholy. 641
Passions of lovers 418,419	The passions of lovers. 418,419
Patience a cure of misery 352	Patience as a cure for misery. 352
Patient, his conditions that would be cured 228. patience, confidence, liberality, not to practice on himself 230, what he must do himself 291. reveal his grief to a friend 293	The qualities required of a patient who wishes to be cured, 228: patience, confidence and generosity; he should not prescribe for himself, 230. What he must do himself, 291; disclose his grief to a friend, 293.[13343]
Parænetical discourse to such as are troubled in mind 706	An exhortatory address to those troubled in mind. 706

[13343] Editor. Liberality here means willingness to pay or reward the physician. Practice on himself means undertaking his own treatment or prescribing for himself.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Penirial good against mel. 378	Pennyroyal as a remedy for melancholy. 378
Perswasion a means to cure love mel. 564 other mel. 296	Persuasion as a means of curing love melancholy, 564; other melancholy, 296.
Perjury of lovers 501. pardoned 496	Lovers' perjury, 501; forgiven, 496.
Perversness and pride of lovers 581	The perversity and pride of lovers. 581
Phantasie what 24	What imagination is. 24
Philippus Bonus how he used a Countrey fellow 278	How Philip the Good treated a countryman. 278
Philosophers censured 122. their errors, ib.	Philosophers criticized, 122; their errors, same page.
Philters cause of love mel. 498 how they cure melancholy 572	Love potions as a cause of love melancholy, 498; how they cure melancholy, 572.
Phlebotomy cause of mel. 80. how to be used, when, in melancholy 393. in head mel. 397	Bloodletting as a cause of melancholy, 80; how and when it should be used for melancholy, 393; for melancholy of the head, 397.
Phrensies description 8	Frenzy described. 8
Physitians miseries 133. his qualities if he be good 227	The physician's miseries, 133; the qualities of a good physician, 227.
Physick censured 359. commended 364 when to be used ibid.	Medicine criticized, 359; commended, 364; when it should be used, same page.
Physiognomicall signs of mel. 59	Signs of melancholy in bodily appearance. 59
Pictures good against mel. 279. cause love mel. 494	Pictures as remedies for melancholy, 279; as causes of love melancholy, 494.
Planets inhabited 253	The planets inhabited. 253
Plagues effects 4	The effects of plague. 4

Original text 1651	Modern English
Playes more famous 274	Notable plays and public spectacles. 274

Original text 1651	Modern English
Pleasant Palaces 267	Pleasant palaces. 267
Pleasant objects of love 419	Pleasant objects of love. 419
Pleasing tone and voyce a cause of love-melancholy 492	A pleasing tone and voice as a cause of love melancholy. 492
Poets why poor 132	Why poets are poor. 132
Poetry a symptome of lovers 539	Poetry as a symptom of being in love. 539
Poëtical cures of love melanch. 577	Poetic cures for love melancholy. 577
Poor mens miseries 157. their happiness 337. they are dear to God 343	The miseries of the poor, 157; their happiness, 337; they are dear to God, 343.
Politicians pranks 647	Politicians' tricks. 647
Pork a melancholy meat 66	Pork as a food that produces melancholy. 66
Pope Leo Decimus his scoffing 149	The mockery of Pope Leo X. 149
Possession of Divels 10	Possession by devils. 10
Power of spirits 50	The power of spirits. 50
Poverty and want causes of melan. their effects 154 no such misery to be poor 319	Poverty and want as causes of melancholy; their effects, 154. Being poor is no great misery, 319.
Preparatives and purgers for mel. 385	Preparatory medicines and purges for melancholy. 385[13344]
Predestination misconstrued, a cause of despair 713	Predestination misunderstood as a cause of despair. 713
Priests how they cause religious mel. 649	How priests cause religious melancholy. 649

[13344] Editor. Preparatives were medicines intended to prepare the offending humour for evacuation. Purgers upward and downward below distinguish medicines that induce vomiting from those that act through the bowels; simples are single medicinal substances, as opposed to compounds.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Princes discontents 110	The discontents of princes. 110
Pride and praise causes of Melanch. 121	Pride and praise as causes of melancholy. 121
Preventions to the cure of jealousie 623	Preventive measures in treating jealousy. 623
Progress of love-mel. exemplified 487	The progress of love melancholy illustrated. 487
Prognosticks or events of love mel. 549 of despair 630. of jealousie 616. of melancholy 212	Prognoses or outcomes of love melancholy, 549; of despair, 630; of jealousy, 616; of melancholy, 212.
Precedency what stirs it causeth 102	The disturbances caused by precedence. 102
Precious stones, metals, altering mel. 370	Precious stones and metals as alteratives for melancholy. 370[13345]
Prospect good against mel. 262	A view as a remedy for melancholy. 262
Prosperity a cause of misery 347	Prosperity as a cause of misery. 347
Profitable objects of love 417	Profitable objects of love. 417
Protestations and deceitful promises of lovers 496	Lovers' declarations and deceptive promises. 496
Pseudoprophets their pranks, 653. Their symptomes 672	False prophets: their tricks, 653; their symptoms, 672.
Pulse, pease, beanes, cause of mel. 68	Pulses, peas and beans as causes of melancholy. 68
Pulse of mel. men how 'tis affected 179	How the pulse is affected in melancholic people. 179

[13345] Editor. Alteratives were understood to change the quality of the offending humour, as distinct from purges intended to expel it. The term is retained as part of Burton's medical vocabulary.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Pulse a sign of love mel. 505	The pulse as a sign of love melancholy. 505
Purgers and preparatives to head mel. 385	Purges and preparatory medicines for melancholy of the head. 385
Purging simples upward 376. downward 378	Simple medicines that purge upwards, 376; downwards, 378.
Purging how cause of mel. 79	How purging causes melancholy. 79

Original text 1651	Modern English
Q	Q
Quantity of diet cause 71 cure of mel. 213	The quantity of food as a cause, 71; as a cure for melancholy, 213.

Original text 1651	Modern English
R	R
Rational soul 26	The rational soul. 26[13346]
Reading Scriptures good against melancholy 283	Reading Scripture as a remedy for melancholy. 283
Recreations good against mel. 264	Recreations as remedies for melancholy. 264
Redness of the face helped 397	Redness of the face relieved. 397
Regions of the belly 18	The regions of the abdomen. 18
Relation or hearing a cause of love-melancholy 452	Accounts of someone, or hearing about them, as a cause of love melancholy. 452
Religious mel. a distinct species, his object 633. causes of it 642. symptomes 658. Prognosticks 678. cure 680. religion, policy, by whom 646	Religious melancholy as a distinct species; its object, 633; causes, 642; symptoms, 658; prognosis, 678; cure, 680. Religion as statecraft, and those who use it so, 646.
Repentance his effects 709	The effects of repentance. 709
Retention & evacuation causes of mel. 78 Rectified to the cure 237	Retention and evacuation as causes of melancholy, 78; regulated to cure it, 237.[13347]
Rich mens discontents and miseries, 116.330,332. their prerogatives 155	The discontents and miseries of the rich, 116,330,332; their advantages, 155.
Rivals and corrivals 595	Rivals and competing suitors. 595
Roots censured 69	Roots criticized. 69
Rosie cross-mens promises 285	The promises of the Rosicrucians. 285

[13346] Editor. The rational, sensitive and vegetative soul entries refer to the traditional hierarchy of faculties: reasoning; sensation and animal activity; and nutrition, growth and reproduction. The repeated vegetative-soul entries under V are both retained.

[13347] Editor. Retention and evacuation concern the keeping and discharge of bodily substances, a broad category within the regimen Burton discusses. The printed cure reference, 237, remains unresolved and is retained without a link.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ryot in Apparel, excess of it, a great cause of love mel. 476.482.483	Extravagance and excess in dress as a powerful cause of love melancholy. 476,482,483

Original text 1651	Modern English
S	S
Saints aid rejected in mel. 224	The aid of saints rejected in treating melancholy. 224
Sallets censured 67	Salads criticized. 67
Sanguine mel. signs 191	Signs of sanguine melancholy. 191
Scilla or Sea Onyon, a purger of mel. 376	Squill, or sea onion, as a purge for melancholy. 376
Scipio's continency 551	Scipio's sexual self-restraint. 551
Scoffes, calumnies, bitter jests, how they cause mel. 148. their Antidote 359	How mockery, slander and bitter jokes cause melancholy, 148; their antidote, 359.
Scholars miseries 129	The miseries of scholars. 129
Scripture misconstrued cause of religious mel. 713. cure of mel. 284	Scripture misunderstood as a cause of religious melancholy, 713; Scripture as a cure for melancholy, 284.
Scorzonera good against mel. 368	Scorzonera as a remedy for melancholy. 368
Sea sick good physick for mel. 369	Seasickness as beneficial treatment for melancholy. 369
Self-love cause of mel. his effects 121	Self-love as a cause of melancholy; its effects. 121
Sensible soul and his parts 22	The sensitive soul and its parts. 22
Senses why and how deluded in mel. 210	Why and how the senses are deceived in melancholy. 210
Sentences selected out of humane Authors 359	Maxims selected from secular authors. 359
Servitude cause of mel. 152. it and imprisonment eased 338	Servitude as a cause of melancholy, 152; servitude and imprisonment alleviated, 338.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Several mens delights and recreations 264	The pleasures and recreations of different people. 264
Severe Tutors and Guardians causes of melancholy 144	Harsh tutors and guardians as causes of melancholy. 144
Shame and disgrace how causes of melancholy, their effects 99	How shame and disgrace cause melancholy; their effects. 99
Sickness for our good 313	Sickness as a means to our good. 313
Sighs and tears sympt. of love-mel. 503	Sighs and tears as symptoms of love melancholy. 503
Sight a principal cause of love-mel. 452	Sight as a principal cause of love melancholy. 452
Signs of honest love 623	Signs of honourable love. 623
Simples censured proper to mel. 366. fit to be known 367. purging mel. upward 376. downward purging simples 378	Simple medicines for melancholy evaluated, 366; those worth knowing, 367; medicines that purge melancholy upwards, 376; simple medicines that purge downwards, 378.
Similar parts of the body 15	The body's uniform parts. 15[13348]
Singing a symptome of lovers, 532. cause of love-mel. 484	Singing as a symptom of being in love, 532; as a cause of love melancholy, 484.
Sin the impulsive cause of mans misery 2	Sin as the impelling cause of human misery. 2
Single life and virginity commended 570 their prerogatives ibid.	The single life and virginity commended, 570; their advantages, same page.
Slavery of lovers 523	The slavery of lovers. 523

[13348] Editor. Similar parts are bodily materials understood as uniform throughout, such as flesh or bone, in contrast to organs composed of several kinds of material. The distinction appears in the anatomical survey.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sleep and waking causes of melanch. 88 by what means procured, helped 396	Sleep and wakefulness as causes of melancholy, 88; ways of inducing sleep and relieving sleeplessness, 396.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Small bodies have greatest wits 313	Small bodies have the greatest intelligence. 313
Smelling what 23	What smell is. 23
Smiling a cause of love-mel. 471	Smiling as a cause of love melancholy. 471
Sodomy 441	Sodomy. 441
Soldiers most part lascivious 603	Soldiers are mostly lustful. 603
Solitariness cause of mel. 87. coact, voluntary, how good 88. sign of mel. 188	Solitude as a cause of melancholy, 87; forced and voluntary solitude, and how it is beneficial, 88; as a sign of melancholy, 188.
Sorrow his effect 96. a cause of mel. 96, a sympt. of mel. 183. eased by counsel 340	Sorrow: its effect, 96; a cause of melancholy, 96; a symptom of melancholy, 183; relieved by counsel, 340.
Soul defined, his faculties, 20. ex traduce as some hold 26	The soul defined; its faculties, 20; transmitted through generation, as some maintain, 26.[13349]
Spleen his site, 17. how mis-affected cause of mel. 174	The spleen's position, 17; how its disorders cause melancholy, 174.
Spices how causes of mel. 70	How spices cause melancholy. 70
Spirits in the body what 14,15	What the bodily spirits are. 14,15[13350]
Spirits and Divels their orders, kinds, power, &c. 43	Spirits and devils: their orders, kinds, power and so forth. 43
Spots in the Sun 257	Spots on the sun. 257
Spruceness a symptome of lovers 534	Smartness of dress as a symptom of being in love. 534

[13349] Editor. Ex traduce means derived or propagated through generation. Burton is reporting the view that the soul is transmitted from the parents, a disputed question which he distinguishes from the description of its faculties.

[13350] Editor. Bodily spirits are the subtle physiological agents of older medicine. They are distinct from the supernatural spirits and devils in the following entry.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Stars how causes or signs of mel. 57. of love mel. 443. of jealousie 596	How the stars are causes or signs of melancholy, 57; of love melancholy, 443; of jealousy, 596.
Step-mother her mischiefes 169	The harm caused by a stepmother. 169
Stomack distempered cause of mel. 174	A disordered stomach as a cause of melancholy. 174
Stones like birds, beasts, fishes, &c. 244	Stones resembling birds, beasts, fish and so forth. 244
Stewes why allowed 634	Why brothels are permitted. 634
Strange Nurses when best 143	When nurses from outside the family are best. 143
Study over-much cause of mel. 125. why & how 126,193,207. study good against melanch. 278,279	Excessive study as a cause of melancholy, 125; why and how, 126,193,207. Study as a remedy for melancholy, 278,279.
Subterranean Divels 50	Subterranean devils. 50
Supernatural causes of mel. 37	Supernatural causes of melancholy. 37
Suspition and jealousie sympt. of mel. 185 how caused 206	Suspicion and jealousy as symptoms of melancholy, 185; how they are caused, 206.
Superstitious effects, symptomes 665 how it domineers 640,667	The effects and symptoms of superstition, 665; how it dominates, 640,667.
Surfetting and drunkenness taxed 72	Overeating and drunkenness criticized. 72
Swallows, Cuckows, &c. where are they in winter 242	Where swallows, cuckoos and other birds are in winter. 242
Sweet tunes and singing causes of love-melancholy 484	Sweet melodies and singing as causes of love melancholy. 484

Original text 1651	Modern English
Symptomes or signs of mel. in the body 178. mind 180. from starrs, members, 190. from education, custom, continuance of time, mixt with other diseases 194. Symptomes of head-mel. 198. of hypocondriacal mel. 199. of the whole body, 201. Symptomes of Nuns, Maids, Widows, mel. 202. immediate causes of mel. symptomes, 205. Symptomes of love mel. 503. cause of these symptomes, 299. symptomes of a lover pleased, 511. dejected, ibid. of a great man in love 36. symptomes of Jealousie, 608. of Religious mel. 660. of despair. 701	Symptoms or signs of melancholy in the body, 178; in the mind, 180; from the stars and bodily parts, 190; from upbringing, habit and the passage of time, mixed with other diseases, 194. Symptoms of melancholy of the head, 198; hypochondriacal melancholy, 199; melancholy throughout the body, 201. Symptoms of melancholy in nuns, unmarried women and widows, 202; immediate causes of melancholic symptoms, 205. Symptoms of love melancholy, 503; causes of these symptoms, 299; symptoms of a happy lover, 511; of a dejected lover, same page; of a great man in love, 36; symptoms of jealousy, 608; of religious melancholy, 660; of despair, 701.[13351]
Synteresis 29	Synderesis. 29[13352]

[13351] Editor. Several locators in this composite entry are doubtful, notably 299 for causes of the symptoms of love melancholy and 36 for a great man in love. These destinations remain unresolved and unlinked; both numbers are unchanged in the parallel columns. Hypochondriacal melancholy here refers to Burton's bodily and humoral category, not simply anxiety about illness.

[13352] Editor. Synderesis is the conventional modern form of this term for the innate awareness of basic moral principles. Burton relates it to conscience and the first knowledge of God and nature in the discussion translated in Block 026.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Syrupe of Hellebor 395	Syrup of hellebore. 395

Original text 1651	Modern English
T	T
Tale of a prebend 351	A story about a prebend. 351[13353]
Tarantula's, stingings effects 171	The effects of tarantula bites. 171
Tast what 21	What taste is. 21
Temperament a cause of love mel. 456	Bodily temperament as a cause of love melancholy. 456
Tempestuous ayr, dark and fuliginous, how cause of mel. 84	How stormy, dark and smoky air causes melancholy. 84
Terrestrial Divels 47	Terrestrial devils. 47
Terrors and affrights cause mel. 146	Terrors and frights as causes of melancholy. 146
Theologasters censured 257	Pretenders to theology criticized. 257
The best cure of love melanc. is to let them have their desire 573	The best cure for love melancholy is to let lovers have what they desire. 573
Three degrees of mel. symptomes 186	Three degrees of melancholic symptoms. 186
Tobacco censured 378	Tobacco criticized. 378
Torments of love 510	The torments of love. 510
Transmigration of souls 26	The transmigration of souls. 26
Travelling commended, good against melancholy 261. for love-melancholy especially 552	Travel commended as a remedy for melancholy, 261; especially for love melancholy, 552.
Tutors cause mel. 144	Tutors as a cause of melancholy. 144

[13353] Editor. A prebend is an endowed ecclesiastical position or its income. Burton's story concerns competing applicants for a vacant place in a cathedral; see Block 096.

Original text 1651	Modern English
V	V
Vain glory described a cause of melancholy 121	Vainglory described as a cause of melancholy. 121
Veines described 16	Veins described. 16
Valour and courage caused by love 532	Valour and courage inspired by love. 532
Variation of the compass where 241	Where variation of the compass occurs. 241
Variety of meats and dishes cause melan. 235	A variety of foods and dishes as a cause of melancholy. 235
Variety of mistresses and objects a cure of melanch. 555	A variety of beloved women and objects of attraction as a cure for melancholy. 555
Variety of weather, ayr, manners, countreys, whence 248	The origins of differences in weather, air, customs and countries. 248
Variety of places, change of ayr, good against mel. 262	Variety of place and change of air as remedies for melancholy. 262
Vegetal soul and his faculties 20	The vegetative soul and its faculties. 20
Vegetal creatures in love 436	Plants in love. 436
Vegetal soul and his parts 20	The vegetative soul and its parts. 20
Venus rectified 239	Sexual activity properly regulated. 239[13354]
Venery a cause of mel. 79	Sexual intercourse as a cause of melancholy. 79
Vertue and vice principal habits of the will. 31	Virtue and vice as the principal dispositions of the will. 31
Venison a mel. meat. 66	Venison as a food that produces melancholy. 66

[13354] Editor. Venus stands for sexual activity in this medical discussion. Rectified means regulated as part of the regimen, not morally or textually corrected. Uxorii below is Latin for husbands excessively attached or subservient to their wives.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Vices of women 563	The vices of women. 563
Violent misery continues not 309	Extreme misery does not last. 309
Violent death prognostick of mel. 214 event of love mel. 543. of despair 545 by some defended 216. how to be censured 218	Violent death as a prognosis of melancholy, 214; an outcome of love melancholy, 543; of despair, 545; defended by some, 216; how it should be judged, 218.[13355]
Virginity by what signs to be known 612	By what signs virginity may be known. 612
Virginity commended 570	Virginity commended. 570
Vitex or Agnus castus good against love mel. 547	Vitex, or chaste tree, as a remedy for love melancholy. 547
Understanding defined, divided 28	The understanding defined and classified. 28
Unfortunate marriages effects 111.168	The effects of unhappy marriages. 111,168
Unlawful cures of mel. rejected 219	Unlawful cures for melancholy rejected. 219
Unkind friends cause melancholy, 169	Unkind friends as a cause of melancholy. 169
Uncharitable men described 430	Uncharitable people described. 430
Upstarts censured, their symptomes 318.327	Upstarts criticized; their characteristics. 318,327
Urine of mel. persons 179	The urine of melancholic people. 179
Uxorii 599	Men excessively devoted to their wives. 599

[13355] Editor. This entry joins references to different discussions, including Burton's treatment of self-inflicted death. The source's 545 for despair is preserved; the final religious-despair section occurs much later in the volume.

Original text 1651	Modern English
W	W
Walking, shooting, swimming, &c. good against mel. 470	Walking, shooting, swimming and similar exercises as remedies for melancholy. 470
Want of sleep a symptome of love mel. 503	Lack of sleep as a symptom of love melancholy. 503
Waking cause of mel. 88. a symptome 179 cured 287	Wakefulness as a cause of melancholy, 88; a symptom, 179; its cure, 287.
Wanton carriage and gesture cause of love melancholy 470	Wanton behaviour and gestures as causes of love melancholy. 470
Water Divels 46	Water devils. 46
Water if foul causeth mel. 70	Foul water causes melancholy. 70
Waters censured, their effects 71	Waters evaluated; their effects. 71
Waters, which good 232	Which waters are beneficial. 232
Waters in love 457	Waters in love. 457
Wearisomness of life a symptome of melancholy 516	Weariness of life as a symptom of melancholy. 516
What physick fit in love mel. 539	What medicine is suitable for love melancholy. 539
Who are most apt to be jealous 597	Who is most prone to jealousy. 597
Whores properties and conditions 465.557	The characteristics and behaviour of whores. 465,557
Why good men are often rejected, 351	Why good men are often rejected. 351
Why fools beget wise children, wisemen fools, 62	Why fools father wise children, and wise men fools. 62

Original text 1651	Modern English
Will defined, divided, his actions, why over-ruled 29.30	The will defined and classified; its actions, and why it is overruled. 29,30
Wine causeth mel. 70.119.112. a good cordial against mel. 391. forbid in love mel. 546	Wine as a cause of melancholy, 70,119,112; a good restorative against melancholy, 391; forbidden in love melancholy, 546.
Wind expelled by what medicines 310	Which medicines expel wind. 310[13356]
Windes in love 457	Winds in love. 457
Wives censured 573. commended 588	Wives criticized, 573; commended, 588.
Wittie devices against mel. 553 and 298	Ingenious devices against melancholy. 553 and 298
Wit proved by love 533	Intelligence demonstrated through love. 533
Withstand the beginnings, a principall cure of love mel. 549	Resist the beginnings: a principal cure for love melancholy. 549
Witches power, how they cause mel. 54 their transformations how caused 55. they can cure mel. 220. procure love 465 not to be sought to for help 221 nor Saints 224	Witches' power; how they cause melancholy, 54; how their transformations are caused, 55; they can cure melancholy, 220; procure love, 465; should not be sought for help, 221; nor should saints, 224.
Widdows mel. 203	Melancholy in widows. 203
Woodbine, Amni, Rue, Lettice, how good in love mel. 546	How honeysuckle, ammi, rue and lettuce are beneficial in love melancholy. 546[13357]

[13356] Editor. The Table prints 310 here, but its C entry Correctors to expel windiness gives 401. The inspected body subsection Correctors to expell winde begins on printed 401 (PDF 509; Block 106). Both the cross-entry and the body confirm the discrepancy. The printed 310 is preserved.

[13357] Editor. The Table prints Amni and gives 546. The inspected body list on printed 547 (PDF 655; Block 134, passage 30) reads Woodbine, Ammi, Lettice, with Rue just before them. This supports modern ammi and the page discrepancy. Amni remains in the original column; 546 remains in both.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Women how cause of mel. 120. their vanity in apparell taxed. 473. how they cozen men. 474. by what art. 475. their counterfeit tears. 497. their vices 563 Tasks proper to them against mel. 286 commended 588	How women cause melancholy, 120; their vanity in dress criticized, 473; how they deceive men, 474; by what arts, 475; their counterfeit tears, 497; their vices, 563. Tasks suitable for them against melancholy, 286; women commended, 588.
Wormwood good against mel. 367	Wormwood as a remedy for melancholy. 367
World taxed 107	The world criticized. 107

Original text 1651	Modern English
Writers of the cure of mel. 393	Writers on the cure of melancholy. 393
Writers of imagination 96. de consolatione 306. of mel. 393. of love mel. 594 539. against idolatrie 668. against despaire 705	Writers on imagination, 96; on consolation, 306; on melancholy, 393; on love melancholy, 594,539; against idolatry, 668; against despair, 705.[13358]

[13358] Editor. The source places 594 and 539 together after of love mel.; both are retained in that order. De consolatione means on consolation. The titles and subjects here should not be treated as a modern bibliography without checking the cited discussions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Y.	Y
Young man in love with a picture 507	A young man in love with a picture. 507
Youth a cause of love melanch. 448.	Youth as a cause of love melancholy. 448.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To the Reader.	To the Reader
Be pleased to know (Courteous Reader) that since the last Impression of this Book, the ingenuous Author of it is deceased, leaving a Copy of it exactly corrected, with severall considerable Additions by his own hand; This Copy he committed to my care and custody, with directions to have those Additions inserted in the next Edition; which in order to his command, and the Publike Good, is faithfully performed in this last Impression.	Please know, courteous reader, that since the previous printing of this book its gifted author has died, leaving a carefully corrected copy with several substantial additions in his own hand. He entrusted this copy to my care and keeping, with instructions to have those additions inserted in the next edition. In obedience to his wishes, and for the public good, this has been faithfully carried out in the present printing.[13359]
H. C.	H. C.
Printed by R. W. for Henry Cripps of Oxford, and are to be sold by Andrew Crook in Pauls Church-yard, and by Henry Cripps and Lodowick Lloyd in Popes-head Ally. 1651.	Printed by R. W. for Henry Cripps of Oxford, and sold by Andrew Crook in St Paul's Churchyard, and by Henry Cripps and Lodowick Lloyd in Pope's Head Alley. 1651.[13360]

[13359] Editor. The notice on PDF 845 speaks as the custodian signed H. C. It reports a corrected copy, additions in Burton's own hand and instructions to insert them in the next edition. This is testimony about the preparation of the 1651 printing. It neither describes a complete autograph manuscript nor establishes that the corrected copy survives today.

[13360] Editor. The imprint distinguishes the printer R. W., the person for whom the book was printed, Henry Cripps of Oxford, and the named London sellers. Initials and names are retained without conjectural expansion. This is the last substantive printed text in the McGill copy; the following leaves are blank, later library matter, endpapers and binding.

Contextual lexicon

These three hundred sixteen articles form the completed text of the contextual lexicon for the modern English edition of The Anatomy of Melancholy. They run alphabetically from Abdicate through Zeal, within the fixed selection of 316 entries. Each explains a word or related group through Burton's usage and the accompanying modern text.

The source forms preserve the spellings found in the edited passages. An article heading may gather related forms or supply an explanatory name. The word gives the relevant sense; In Burton follows its work in the argument; The places identifies selected passages; In this edition records the actual contextual renderings. Source footnotes preserve qualifications and point to the edition's supporting notes.

References give source pagination and stable passage identifiers. Bracketed qualifications distinguish supplied or irregular numbering; scan pages are labelled explicitly. These are selected examples, not an exhaustive concordance. The source-term, modern-rendering and thematic indexes cover all 316 articles. Related-entry links lead to the corresponding articles.

Historical medical explanations, astrological claims and religious polemics are described as they occur in Burton. Explaining a term does not independently establish the claims made with it. Modern equivalents vary with context, and an unchanged word may still require explanation.

Abdicate

Source forms: abdicate; abdicated[13361]

The word. To abdicate can mean to reject someone, disown a relation, or exclude an heir. In these passages the person who loses the position is the object of another person's action.

In Burton. Burton first describes a father repudiating a child for sexual misconduct, within a satire on the unequal treatment of rich and poor. Later he reports an heir excluded from the empire because of his devotion to study. Both uses involve deprivation imposed from outside; reading the later passage as a voluntary resignation would reverse its agency.

The places. A father disowns his child. (p. 35; DJR-010-18.) An heir is excluded because of his bookishness. (p. 127; DJR-046-19.)

In this edition. "abdicate" → "disown" (DJR-010-18); "abdicated" → "excluded" (DJR-046-19). The different equivalents preserve the family relationship in one passage and the loss of succession in the other.

See also. Estate; Church patronage.

Abraham men

Source forms: counterfeit cranks; dummerers; Abraham men; counterfeit crank[13362]

The word. Abraham men are beggars accused of feigning mental illness. Burton groups them with counterfeit cranks, accused of feigning illness more generally, and dummerers, accused of pretending to be mute.

In Burton. In the account of poverty, these labels accompany the claim that want drives people to desperate expedients. In the later passage, a poor petitioner is dismissed as a counterfeit crank despite his protests. The repetition shows how the vocabulary of suspected imposture can also serve the refusal of relief. The accusation must not be mistaken for a diagnosis established by the narrative.

[13361] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 35 (DJR-010-18); p. 127 (DJR-046-19). The second example records Burton's historical anecdote; the lexical interpretation does not independently authenticate the identification of Cornutus.

[13362] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 159 (DJR-053-32); p. 430 (DJR-112-15). These are categories and accusations in Burton's account of begging, not neutral descriptions of people living in poverty or with disabilities.

The places. Poverty and the labels attached to suspected feigned disability. (p. 159; DJR-053-32.) A petitioner is rejected as a supposed cheat. (p. 430; DJR-112-15.)

In this edition. “counterfeit Cranks” → “sham invalids” (DJR-053-32); “Dummerers” → “people who pretend to be mute” (DJR-053-32); “counterfeit crank” → “feigned invalid” (DJR-112-15). The historical name “Abraham men” remains in the modern text; the article supplies its contextual explanation.

See also. Counterfeit.

Absolute

Source forms: absolute cure; absolute[13363]

The word. Absolute means complete or perfected in the selected passages. Its force is supplied by what would make a cure or a human life whole.

In Burton. The opening discussion joins the physician’s work to the clergyman’s: their combined contribution makes an absolute cure. Later, a catalogue of exceptional gifts and possessions still cannot make a person absolute or secure lasting happiness. Completeness can thus be an aim of treatment and an elusive condition of life.

The places. Bodily and spiritual care combine in a complete cure. (p. 16; DJR-006-21.) Even extraordinary advantages cannot make a life complete. (p. 108–109; DJR-042-28.)

In this edition. “absolute cure” → “complete cure” (DJR-006-21); “make thee absolute” → “make you complete” (DJR-042-28). “Complete” keeps the relation to wholeness visible. The adjective does not here promise unconditional certainty or name unrestricted political power.

See also. Just; Simple; Generous; Absolve.

Absolve

Source forms: absolved[13364]

The word. Absolve here means to finish or bring a work to completion. The headword is the dictionary form of the attested past tense absolved.

In Burton. In the report of attempts to cut a canal between Africa and Asia, earlier rulers abandon their undertaking. Ptolemy later renews it and absolves it in a more suitable place. The abandoned work and its resumption establish the sense: an engineering undertaking is completed.

The places. Ptolemy is said to complete a previously abandoned undertaking. (p. 57–58; DJR-015-12.)

In this edition. “absolved it” → “completed it” (DJR-015-12). The rendering prevents the more familiar sense of pardon from intruding into the account.

See also. Absolute; Fact.

Accident

Source forms: accident; accidental; accidents; accidentall[13365]

The word. Accident ranges from an accompanying condition or incidental circumstance to a property contrasted with substance. In medical classifications, accidents can be accompanying symptoms; opposed to innate, accidental can mean acquired.

[13363] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 16 (DJR-006-21); p. 108–109 (DJR-042-28).

[13364] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 57–58 (DJR-015-12). Burton attributes the report to Diodorus; the account of the canal and relative water levels is preserved as his report, not endorsed by this word explanation.

[13365] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 106 (DJR-042-07); p. 161 (DJR-054-02); unnumbered; scan p. 326 (DJR-067-24); p. 252 (DJR-075-04); p. 312 (DJR-087-38).

In Burton. Discontent is called an inseparable accident of human life, while the survey of causes opens into a labyrinth of accidental causes. The treatment synopsis uses accidents for symptoms requiring relief. The astronomical digression asks whether light is substance or accident. Finally, bodily impairments are classified as innate or accidental. These contexts require distinct senses rather than a single substitution.

The places. An accompanying condition of human existence. (p. 106; DJR-042-07.) Incidental causes form a branching labyrinth. (p. 161; DJR-054-02.) The treatment synopsis lists remedies for accompanying symptoms. (unnumbered; scan p. 326; DJR-067-24.) Light is considered as substance or property. (p. 252; DJR-075-04.) Acquired impairments are distinguished from those present at birth. (p. 312; DJR-087-38.)

In this edition. "inseparable accident" → "inseparable condition" (DJR-042-07); "accidental causes" → "incidental causes" (DJR-054-02); "accidents" → "accompanying symptoms" (DJR-067-24); "an accident" → "an accidental property" (DJR-075-04); "accidentall" → "acquired" (DJR-087-38). The modern equivalents follow the argument in each place. Chance mishap is not the controlling sense of these examples.

See also. Cause; Equivocation.

Action

Source forms: action[13366]

The word. Action can name an orator's delivery or performance. Here it stands beside speech and gesture, directing attention to the speaker's manner of presenting words.

In Burton. Burton's attack on declaimers judges their speech, action and gesture as signs of apparent madness. The passage then contrasts verbal display with wisdom shown in deeds. That contrast makes it particularly important to distinguish the first, rhetorical use of action from the ordinary acts invoked in the moral comparison.

The places. A satire on declaimers contrasts performance with conduct. (p. 71; DJR-018-02.)

In this edition. "speech, action, gesture" → "speech, performance, or gesture" (DJR-018-02). "Performance" gives the rhetorical sense without imposing it on every occurrence of action elsewhere in the book.

See also. Pathetical; Parrhesia; Confer and conference; Judgment; Fact.

Actuality

Source forms: ἐντελέχεια; first act[13367]

The word. Actuality renders the philosophical act by which a capacity is realized or possessed in a determinate form. First actuality must be distinguished from the active exercise of that capacity.

In Burton. Burton reports the definition of soul as the first act of an organized body capable of life, then develops it in his account of the rational soul. Much later, the distinction between power and act becomes a consolatory analogy: a child has rational capacity before exercising it, as a troubled person may desire repentance before accomplishing it. The shared vocabulary connects different arguments without making them identical.

The places. The Aristotelian definition of soul as first actuality. (p. 19–20; DJR-024-21.) The rational soul includes the powers of the other faculties. (p. 27; DJR-026-22.) Potential and exercise illustrate delayed repentance. (p. 710; DJR-167-08.)

[13366] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 71 (DJR-018-02).

[13367] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 19–20 (DJR-024-21); p. 27 (DJR-026-22); p. 710 (DJR-167-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-024:E19, DJR-026:E19, DJR-167:E08. The existing note at DJR-024:E19 distinguishes possession of a capacity from its use and identifies Aristotle, On the Soul 2.1, 412a–b. The later analogy should not erase that distinction.

In this edition. “first act” → “first actuality” (DJR-024-21); “first substantial act” → “first substantial actuality” (DJR-026-22); “rational in power, not in act” → “rational in potential, though not in its exercise” (DJR-167-08). The modern text uses “exercise” in the consolatory comparison and “actuality” in the philosophical definitions.

See also. Soul; Inseparable and individual; Intellect.

Admire

Source forms: admired[13368]

The word. Admire can mean to wonder at or find astonishing, without implying approval. Its past tense admired is the attested form here.

In Burton. Burton describes elaborate cookery and reports Adrian VI’s reaction to the accounts of his predecessor Leo X. The surrounding language condemns excessive luxury and expense. Taking admired as appreciative praise would obscure the astonishment that the context supplies.

The places. Adrian is astonished by the accounts of elaborate dishes. (p. 72; DJR-034-46.)

In this edition. “so much admired” → “found so astonishing” (DJR-034-46). The rendering conveys wonder while leaving the passage’s judgment of extravagance explicit.

See also. Art; Antick.

Adust

Source forms: adust; choler adust; adustion[13369]

The word. Adust describes a humour supposedly scorched or burnt by excessive internal heat. Adustion names that process of alteration in historical humoral explanation.

In Burton. The synopsis lists an adust humour among the inward causes of head melancholy. In the discussion of demonic causation, Burton reports a model in which even a supernatural cause operates through altered bodily humour. His later account of symptoms varies their character according to which humour has been scorched. The term therefore concerns a proposed material transformation and its effects.

The places. A scorched humour appears in the causal synopsis. (p. 98; DJR-020-31.) Burnt choler mediates the reported account of demonic causation. (p. 52–53; DJR-031-16.) Different scorched humours supposedly produce different symptoms. (p. 191; DJR-060-15.)

In this edition. “adust” → “scorched” (DJR-020-31); “choler adust” → “burnt choler” (DJR-031-16); “adustion” → “scorched” (DJR-060-15). “Scorched” and “burnt” retain the physical image underlying the theory.

See also. Melancholy.

Adventitious

Source forms: adventious; adventitious[13370]

The word. Adventitious means coming from outside or acquired rather than innate. Burton’s shorter form adventious belongs to the same contextual family.

In Burton. At the transition from external to internal causes, the hunter’s circuit of the forest becomes a figure for surveying outward adventious causes. Later, the contrasts applied to the humours include innate and adventitious. The first usage concerns the origin of a cause; the second concerns the acquisition of a bodily condition.

[13368] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 72 (DJR-034-46).

[13369] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 98 (DJR-020-31); p. 52–53 (DJR-031-16); p. 191 (DJR-060-15). The explanation describes Burton’s historical medical categories; it does not identify a modern bodily process or diagnosis.

[13370] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 172 (DJR-056-40); p. 190 [second occurrence] (DJR-060-09).

The places. The survey moves from external causes to internal ones. (p. 172; DJR-056-40.) Acquired humours are distinguished from innate ones. (p. 190 [second occurrence]; DJR-060-09.)

In this edition. “outward adventious causes” → “external, adventitious causes” (DJR-056-40); “innate or adventitious” → “innate or acquired” (DJR-060-09). The retained term in the first passage is clarified by “external”; the second passage makes the innate/acquired contrast explicit.

See also. Cause; Artificial.

Affection

Source forms: Affection[13371]

The word. Affection can be a bodily condition, a disorder, or a passion or disposition. The object affected and the surrounding classification determine its force.

In Burton. The definition of disease calls it an affection of the body contrary to nature. Erotic melancholy is later placed among the affections of the brain. In religious controversy, corrupt affection becomes the common root assigned to several distinct errors. These uses connect bodily and moral language, but none is adequately explained by the everyday meaning of fondness.

The places. Affection appears in a definition of disease. (p. 6; DJR-022-02.) Erotic melancholy is counted among disorders of the brain. (p. 446; DJR-115-60.) Corrupt passions are made a common root of religious errors. (p. 692; DJR-163-20.)

In this edition. “Affection of the body” → “condition of the body” (DJR-022-02); “affections of the brain” → “disorders of the brain” (DJR-115-60); “corrupt affection” → “corrupt passions” (DJR-163-20). The modern column distinguishes condition, disorder and passion according to the passage.

See also. Passion; Bowels.

Affinity and consanguinity

Source forms: affinitie; consanguinitie; affinity; consanguinity[13372]

The word. Affinity denotes kinship through marriage; consanguinity denotes relationship by blood. Together they distinguish two kinds of family connection.

In Burton. In the satire on quarrels, neither marriage ties nor blood relationships can restrain resentment when self-interest is touched. In the account of scholarly patronage, the same two connections fail to secure advancement from an unyielding patron. Burton treats family bonds as obligations that people disregard, or claims that patrons resist.

The places. Family ties fail to prevent hostility. (p. 36; DJR-010-24.) A scholar pleads family connection when seeking an appointment. (p. 142 [printed 128]; DJR-049-28.)

In this edition. “affinitie” → “marriage tie” (DJR-010-24); “consanguinitie” → “blood relationship” (DJR-010-24); “affinity, consanguinity” → “kinship by marriage or blood” (DJR-049-28). The paired equivalents preserve the distinction; “affinity” here does not merely mean shared tastes or sympathetic feeling.

See also. Dowry and jointure; Bowels.

[13371] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 6 (DJR-022-02); p. 446 (DJR-115-60); p. 692 (DJR-163-20). Existing edition notes: DJR-022:E01, DJR-115:E48, DJR-163:E20. The medical and religious classifications are Burton’s. Existing notes DJR-022:E01, DJR-115:E48 and DJR-163:E20 explain the local senses.

[13372] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 36 (DJR-010-24); p. 142 [printed 128] (DJR-049-28).

Air

Source forms: bad ayr; middle Region; rectification of Aire[13373]

The word. Air belongs both to Burton's account of places and to the environmental conditions considered in treatment. The middle region refers to an older layered account of the atmosphere.

In Burton. A supposedly unhealthy atmosphere helps explain the misfortunes of particular settlements. The digression on mountains invokes the cold middle region to account for snow near hot lowlands. The treatment discussion then makes rectification of air a practical concern, distinguishing the choice of a place from human arrangements that alter its air. Climate, geography and regimen thus meet in this vocabulary.

The places. Unhealthy air is listed among disadvantages of place. (p. 47; DJR-013-05.) The middle region figures in an explanation of mountain cold. (p. 248; DJR-074-06.) Natural and artificial air are distinguished in treatment. (p. 259; DJR-076-20.)

In this edition. "bad ayr" → "unhealthy air" (DJR-013-05); "middle Region" → "middle region of the air" (DJR-074-06); "rectification of Aire" → "improving the air" (DJR-076-20). The expanded wording clarifies what Burton's regional and corrective terms refer to.

See also. Non naturals; Essence and quintessence; Fulsome.

Alteratives

Source forms: alterative; alteratives[13374]

The word. Alteratives are remedies intended to change an unhealthy bodily condition or humoral quality, as distinguished from treatment that expels material by purging.

In Burton. The pharmaceutical synopsis places alterative treatment above a group of simple substances that alter melancholy. Later, while defending the proper use of purges, Burton distinguishes alteratives and cordials and announces his selection from the many medicines recorded by physicians and herbalists. The classification describes an intended kind of operation, not a particular ingredient.

The places. Alterative treatment is a branch of the pharmaceutical synopsis. (scan p. 324; DJR-067-13.) Alteratives and cordials are distinguished in a discussion of purging. (p. 365; DJR-099-28.)

In this edition. "Alterative" → "Alterative treatment" (DJR-067-13); "Alteratives and Cordials" → "alteratives and cordials" (DJR-099-28). The technical name is retained so that the divisions of Burton's medical scheme remain recognizable.

See also. Cordial; Lenitive; Corrected medicines; Purging; Physick.

Ambodexter

Source forms: ambodexters[13375]

The word. An ambodexter is a double-dealer who serves opposed sides for personal advantage. Burton's plural ambodexters is applied to moral conduct.

In Burton. The satire groups ambodexters with hypocrites and compares them to pictures that show a lion from one angle and a lamb from another. A later denunciation places them among people whose apparent sociability conceals self-interest. In both places the emphasis falls on contradictory outward faces and opportunistic dealings.

[13373] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 47 (DJR-013-05); p. 248 (DJR-074-06); p. 259 (DJR-076-20). Existing edition notes: DJR-076:E20. The climatic and therapeutic explanations belong to the historical account. DJR-076:E20 identifies natural air as that of a chosen place and artificial air as air altered by human arrangements.

[13374] Editor. Edited source passages: scan p. 324 (DJR-067-13); p. 365 (DJR-099-28). This is the claimed function of a historical class of remedies; retaining the category does not establish the efficacy of its members.

[13375] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 36 (DJR-010-28); p. 109 (DJR-042-38). Existing edition notes: DJR-010:E24. DJR-010:E24 leaves the exact optical device behind the turning-picture image unspecified.

The places. Changing pictures illustrate the opposed faces of hypocrites. (p. 36; DJR-010-28.) Double-dealing forms part of a catalogue of selfish conduct. (p. 109; DJR-042-38.)

In this edition. “ambodexters” → “double-dealers” (DJR-010-28); “ambodexters” → “double-dealing” (DJR-042-38). The equivalents convey the moral accusation without suggesting a person’s physical dexterity.

See also. Parasite; Temporize.

Anatomical arteries

Source forms: aspera arteria; vocall artery; Carotides; juglars; Venosal Artery[13376]

The word. Burton’s anatomical vocabulary does not map directly onto modern artery and vein names. Aspera arteria and vocal artery name the windpipe; the venosal artery belongs to the historical account of the pulmonary vessels.

In Burton. The lung passage sends air to the heart through a venosal artery and connects that route with the windpipe. The discussion of breathing likewise uses vocal artery for the airway. Elsewhere the carotides carry a strong pulse, while juglars swell in the account of excessive drinking. The latter examples must remain distinct from the older airway terminology gathered under this editorial heading.

The places. Historical vessel and airway names in the account of the lungs. (p. 19; DJR-024-16.) The vocal artery carries inhaled air. (p. 25; DJR-025-34.) The carotides are named in a description of the pulse. (p. 180; DJR-058-16.) Swollen juglars occur among the reported effects of excess drinking. (p. 306; DJR-086-31.)

In this edition. “aspera arteria” → “windpipe” (DJR-024-16); “Venosal Artery” → “venosal artery” (DJR-024-16); “vocall Artery” → “windpipe” (DJR-025-34); “Carotides” → “carotid arteries” (DJR-058-16); “juglars” → “jugular veins” (DJR-086-31). “Venosal artery” is retained where replacing the name would silently recast Burton’s physiological claim.

See also. Organical parts.

Anatomical membranes

Source forms: rim; Tunicles[13377]

The word. Rim can denote an abdominal membrane or lining; tunicles are thin membranes or coverings. The anatomical location matters more than the everyday shape suggested by rim.

In Burton. In the division of the lower body, the rim separates the region of the navel and flanks from that above it. In the account of head melancholy, membranes and tunicles are possible seats of the offending humour around the brain. Burton uses these coverings as landmarks within his organization of bodily regions and disease.

The places. The rim marks a division in the lower bodily region. (p. 17; DJR-024-05.) Membranes and tunicles surround the brain. (p. 176; DJR-057-23.)

In this edition. “Rim” → “abdominal membrane” (DJR-024-05); “Membranes, and Tunicles” → “membranes and coverings” (DJR-057-23). The modern text explains the type of structure without assigning a more precise modern anatomical identity than the passage warrants.

See also. Organical parts.

[13376] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 19 (DJR-024-16); p. 25 (DJR-025-34); p. 180 (DJR-058-16); p. 306 (DJR-086-31). Existing edition notes: DJR-024:E14. The saved glossary identifies the venosal artery with the historical pulmonary-vein terminology. DJR-024:E14 compares Crooke’s Microcosmographia, book 6, chapter 18, p. 390, to explain the compressed connection. The account is not modern respiratory physiology.

[13377] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 17 (DJR-024-05); p. 176 (DJR-057-23). The saved terminology record notes that historical uses of rim vary; the broader rendering deliberately preserves that limit.

Anatomy

Source forms: living anatomy; anatomies[13378]

The word. An anatomy can be an exposed or skeleton-like body, and figuratively a person wasted to extreme thinness. This bodily image differs from the analytical activity announced by the book's title.

In Burton. Envy produces a living anatomy: a ghastly, emaciated person likened to a skeleton and a carcass animated by a fiend. The more general account of cares again turns sufferers into anatomies, immediately glossed by the image of skin and bones. The metaphors make mental distress visibly consume the body.

The places. Envy reduces a person to a living anatomical specimen. (p. 100; DJR-041-04.) Care makes bodies skeleton-like and wasted. (p. 111; DJR-043-11.)

In this edition. "living Anatomy" → "living anatomical specimen" (DJR-041-04); "Anatomies" → "skeletons" (DJR-043-11). The two renderings retain the corporeal image without confusing the people described with anatomical treatises.

See also. Organical parts; Melancholy.

Anchorite

Source forms: anachorites; Anachorites[13379]

The word. An anchorite is a religious recluse. Anachorite is a related spelling used in the selected passages.

In Burton. Burton's treatment is not uniform. In discussing diet he praises the remarkable abstinence of hermits and anchorites. In the account of pride he accuses some ascetics of making contempt for worldly honour a new occasion of pride. In the discussion of solitude, prescribed withdrawal becomes a possible source of melancholy. The same way of life can therefore supply an example of temperance and an object of criticism.

The places. Ascetic temperance supplies an admired dietary example. (p. 236–237; DJR-071-23.) Contempt of worldly honour is accused of becoming pride. (p. 124; DJR-045-45.) Enforced solitude is discussed as a cause of distress. (p. 87–88; DJR-038-02.)

In this edition. "Anachorites" → "anchorites" (DJR-071-23); "Anachorites" → "anchorites" (DJR-045-45); "Anchorites" → "anchorites" (DJR-038-02). The modern spelling is consistent, while the article preserves the changing judgment in the surrounding prose.

See also. Solitude; Mortification.

Anger

Source forms: Anger[13380]

The word. In the selected classification, anger is defined by its object as a desire for revenge. Hatred is then characterized as anger that has become inveterate.

In Burton. Burton places anger among mixed affections and passions, alongside zeal, malicious joy, pride, rivalry, envy and shame. The sequence classifies emotions through their relations to desired or suffered goods and harms. The definition is narrower than every ordinary occurrence of anger: it explains the particular scheme being presented.

The places. Anger and hatred appear in a classification of mixed passions. (p. 25; DJR-025-29.)

[13378] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 100 (DJR-041-04); p. 111 (DJR-043-11).

[13379] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 236–237 (DJR-071-23); p. 124 (DJR-045-45); p. 87–88 (DJR-038-02). Existing edition notes: DJR-038:E01, DJR-045:E37. DJR-038:E01 identifies the hostile monastic language Burton adopts from Bale and Hospinian; the passage's absolute claims about enclosure and silence retain that polemical qualification.

[13380] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 25 (DJR-025-29).

In this edition. “Anger, which is a desire of revenge” → “anger, a desire for revenge” (DJR-025-29); “inveterate anger” → “inveterate anger” (DJR-025-29). The familiar word remains, together with Burton’s defining phrase, so that the classification can be followed on its own terms.

See also. Passion.

Animal and vegetal

Source forms: vegetals; vegetal[13381]

The word. Vegetals are plants; vegetal names the faculty associated with plant life. Animal in the article heading identifies the sensitive level of living creatures in the division Burton reports.

In Burton. The satire extends melancholy beyond humans to vegetals and sensibles, using transplanted plants as an example. The later account of soul orders the vegetative, sensitive and rational faculties: the higher includes the lower, though the lower may exist alone. Plants, other animals and humans are thus distinguished by capacities within a connected account of life.

The places. Plants and creatures with senses enter the extended account of melancholy. (p. 46; DJR-012-38.) The three faculties are ordered by inclusion. (p. 20; DJR-024-24.)

In this edition. “vegetals and sensibles” → “plants and creatures with senses” (DJR-012-38); “Vegetal, Sensitive, and Rational” → “vegetative, sensitive and rational” (DJR-024-24). “Vegetative” names a faculty here; it does not carry the modern colloquial suggestion of an unresponsive human state.

See also. Soul; Sensible.

Animal faculties

Source forms: animal faculties; moving faculty[13382]

The word. Animal faculties are the brain-associated powers of sensation, mental activity and voluntary movement. Animal in this terminology concerns the functions of living sentient beings, including humans.

In Burton. In the account of the brain, vapours from other parts supposedly disturb the animal faculties. In the advice on governing appetite, Burton distinguishes the moving faculty from desire: appetite may seek an action while reason prevents the power of movement from carrying it out. Together the examples show faculties as powers that can be affected, commanded or exercised.

The places. Vapours are said to alter brain-associated faculties. (p. 174; DJR-057-06.) The faculty of movement can refrain from executing appetite’s demand. (p. 292; DJR-083-30.)

In this edition. “animal faculties” → “animal faculties” (DJR-057-06); “moving faculty” → “faculty of movement” (DJR-083-30). The retained technical phrase needs this explanation; “animal” should not be read as excluding human mental powers.

See also. Faculty.

Antick

Source forms: antick picture; anticks; Antick[13383]

The word. Antick describes a grotesque or fantastic figure, design or conception. The plural anticks can name such invented figures.

[13381] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 46 (DJR-012-38); p. 20 (DJR-024-24). The saved glossary associates the vegetal faculty with nutrition, growth and reproduction. The article heading groups the levels; the cited source forms are vegetals and vegetal.

[13382] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 174 (DJR-057-06); p. 292 (DJR-083-30). The account of vapours belongs to historical physiology. The examples of restraint describe Burton’s argument, rather than present-day therapeutic advice.

[13383] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 5 (DJR-003-02); p. 23–24 (DJR-025-19); p. 187 (DJR-059-32).

In Burton. A grotesque picture first illustrates the attraction of novelty to frivolous readers. In the account of imagination, poets' and painters' anticks demonstrate its inventive power. Later, the fantastic conceits attributed to melancholy show the same power producing distressing imagined presences. The term crosses visual art and mental imagery, with different judgments in each setting.

The places. A grotesque picture attracts the passer-by's gaze. (p. 5; DJR-003-02.) Poets and painters produce imaginative grotesques. (p. 23–24; DJR-025-19.) Fantastic ideas become part of the reported symptoms of melancholy. (p. 187; DJR-059-32.)

In this edition. "antick picture" → "grotesque picture" (DJR-003-02); "Anticks" → "grotesques" (DJR-025-19); "Antick, phantasticall conceipts" → "grotesque, fantastic ideas" (DJR-059-32). The renderings preserve the relation between unusual forms and the imagination; the word need not mean an amusing prank.

See also. Emblem; Imagination; Fustian and bombast; Admire.

Apologize

Source forms: apologize[13384]

The word. To apologize here is to defend or justify someone's position. The word names advocacy in a controversy.

In Burton. Burton says that Rhenanus undertakes to apologize for Anthony and dismisses his opponents. He then steps back from the extensive controversy, arranging chemical physicians and Galenists on opposing sides. The movement from apologize to defend and attack within the passage makes its forensic sense explicit.

The places. Rhenanus defends Anthony in the dispute over chemical medicine. (p. 387; DJR-103-52.)

In this edition. "Apologize for Anthony" → "defend Anthony" (DJR-103-52). "Defend" preserves the direction of the argument. Rhenanus is not represented as expressing regret for Anthony's conduct.

See also. Parrhesia; Censure.

Apophlegmatisms

Source forms: apophlegmatisms; masticatories[13385]

The word. Apophlegmatisms are preparations intended to draw off phlegm. Masticatories are medicinal substances held and chewed in the mouth.

In Burton. Burton distinguishes medicines swallowed from those merely kept in the mouth. After gargles, he names apophlegmatisms and masticatories, divides them into gentle and strong examples, and explains their use through holding and chewing. The paired terms therefore concern both an intended effect and a manner of application.

The places. Chewed preparations are distinguished from swallowed medicines and gargles. (p. 382; DJR-102-44.)

In this edition. "Apophlegmatisms, Masticatories" → "apophlegmatisms, or masticatories" (DJR-102-44); "held and chewed in the mouth" → "held and chewed in the mouth" (DJR-102-44). The historical names remain beside Burton's own explanation of how they were used.

See also. Purging.

[13384] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 387 (DJR-103-52). The entry explains the reported controversy without deciding the competing medical claims.

[13385] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 382 (DJR-102-44). The article identifies a category of historical treatment; the listed substances and claimed effect are not evaluated as current remedies.

Apothecaries measures

Source forms: drams; an.; ʒ; ℥; j; ß; iij[13386]

The word. Drams can mean medicinal draughts or doses without specifying a measured weight. In formal prescriptions, drachms and ounces appear through apothecaries' signs and abbreviated quantities.

In Burton. The account of allegedly staged cures at Padua uses drams for preparations supposedly administered beforehand. A later prescription instead gives exact written quantities: an. signifies of each, ʒ a drachm, ℥ an ounce, j one, ß a half and iij three. The prose use of drams must not be turned into a precise dose merely because a related word names a unit.

The places. Ointments and drams occur in a polemical accusation about cures. (p. 225; DJR-068-36.) A prescription uses signs and abbreviations for quantities. (p. 548–549; DJR-134-46.)

In this edition. "drams" → "potions" (DJR-068-36); "an. ʒ j." → "one drachm of each" (DJR-134-46); "ʒ ß." → "half a drachm" (DJR-134-46); "℥ iij." → "three ounces" (DJR-134-46). The written quantities are expanded into words but left in historical units, without conversion into modern doses.

See also. Receipt.

Appetite

Source forms: appetite[13387]

The word. Appetite is a power of impulse or desire. It is broader than hunger and can mediate between an imagined object and bodily movement.

In Burton. In Burton's explanation of sleepwalking, vapours stir imagination, imagination stirs appetite, and appetite moves the animal spirits that make the body walk. Appetite occupies a specific place in the proposed chain of causes. The sleeping person's movement is explained through these powers rather than through a conscious decision described in ordinary terms.

The places. Appetite mediates between imagination and bodily movement in sleepwalking. (p. 93; DJR-039-11.)

In this edition. "the Phantasie the Appetite" → "the imagination stirs the appetite" (DJR-039-11). The word remains in the modern column because it names a recurring faculty; reading it as a desire for food would break the explanation.

See also. Concupiscible and irascible; Concupiscence; Passion; Pleasure.

Apprehension

Source forms: strong apprehension; apprehensions; apprehensive[13388]

The word. Apprehension can be intellectual grasp, imaginative conception, awareness, or anxious susceptibility. Apprehensive likewise ranges from perceptive or sensitive to fearful.

In Burton. The Stoic wise person is credited with strong apprehension in an argument Burton mocks; melancholy sufferers elsewhere possess excellent apprehensions despite their distress. In love, strong apprehension combines with weak judgment as powerful imagination. The consolatory and religious

---

[13386] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 225 (DJR-068-36); p. 548–549 (DJR-134-46). Existing edition notes: DJR-134:E35. DJR-134:E35 explains the notation. The allegations at Padua remain Burton's reported claims; the prescription is historical text, not a recommendation for use.

[13387] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 93 (DJR-039-11). The chain involving vapours and animal spirits records historical physiology, not a current explanation of sleepwalking.

[13388] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 75 (DJR-019-02); p. 179–180 (DJR-058-13); p. 292 [296] (DJR-084-16); p. 450 (DJR-116-42); p. 696 (DJR-164-19). Existing edition notes: DJR-116:E37, DJR-164:E18. DJR-116:E37 and DJR-164:E18 explain the later uses and preserve the polemical and reported character of the surrounding generalizations.

passages instead emphasize awareness of an intolerable situation or susceptibility to fear. Context separates strengths of understanding from vulnerabilities of feeling.

The places. Firm understanding is attributed to the Stoic wise person. (p. 75; DJR-019-02.) Melancholy can coexist with excellent powers of understanding. (p. 179–180; DJR-058-13.) Sensitivity to a distressing situation affects the response to it. (p. 292 [296]; DJR-084-16.) Powerful imagination is paired with weak judgment. (p. 450; DJR-116-42.) Apprehensive describes susceptibility to religious fear. (p. 696; DJR-164-19.)

In this edition. "strong apprehension" → "firmness of his understanding" (DJR-019-02); "excellent apprehensions" → "excellent powers of understanding" (DJR-058-13); "apprehensive" → "sensitive to what is happening" (DJR-084-16); "strong apprehension" → "powerful imagination" (DJR-116-42); "less apprehensive" → "less apprehensive" (DJR-164-19). The retained adjective in the final example has its familiar anxious sense; that sense must not be carried backward into every other occurrence.

See also. Imagination; Shame.

Aqua vitae

Source forms: Aquavitæ; strong waters; water of life[13389]

The word. Aqua vitae, literally water of life, denotes distilled alcoholic spirit. Strong waters belongs to the same vocabulary.

In Burton. A fearful sufferer carries aqua vitae or strong waters against anticipated fainting or illness. In a later medicinal formula, water of life is the liquid mixed with other ingredients for a plaster. These contexts distinguish something carried for an anticipated need from a preparation used externally; neither calls for the ordinary sense of water.

The places. A sufferer carries aqua vitae through fear of fainting. (p. 181–182; DJR-058-33.) Distilled spirit appears as an ingredient of a historical plaster. (p. 396; DJR-105-47.)

In this edition. "Aquavitæ" → "aqua vitae" (DJR-058-33); "strong waters" → "strong spirits" (DJR-058-33); "water of life" → "distilled spirit" (DJR-105-47). The name is retained in one passage and explained in the other; both refer to distilled spirit.

See also. Aurum potabile; Cordial; Pleasure.

Art

Source forms: Art[13390]

The word. Art can mean deliberate skill or enhancement, an organized discipline, or a skilled method of proceeding. It is not confined to painting, poetry or other fine arts.

In Burton. In the discussion of beauty, art is set against nature as a power of deliberate enhancement. Lovers' diverse symptoms then exceed what any art can encompass, where the word concerns a body of organized knowledge. Near the close, art joins industry among the means of directing a distressed person's thoughts. Each setting emphasizes a different relation between skill and its object.

The places. Beauty is considered in relation to art and nature. (p. 469; DJR-120-22.) No organized discipline can encompass all lovers' symptoms. (p. 509; DJR-127-36.) Skill and effort are invoked in the management of distress. (p. 722; DJR-169-28.)

[13389] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 181–182 (DJR-058-33); p. 396 (DJR-105-47). The medicinal use and formula are part of Burton's historical account. This entry does not endorse their safety or effectiveness.

[13390] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 469 (DJR-120-22); p. 509 (DJR-127-36); p. 722 (DJR-169-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-120:E19, DJR-127:E30, DJR-169:E28. The note at DJR-120:E19 leaves the exact Heliodorus passage uncollated. Explaining the word art does not change that source status.

In this edition. “arti an naturæ” → “art or to nature” (DJR-120-22); “no Art” → “no discipline” (DJR-127-36); “art, and industry” → “skill and effort” (DJR-169-28). “Art,” “discipline” and “skill” retain the distinct contextual uses rather than forcing a uniform equivalent.

See also. Science; Experimental; Herbal; Emblem; Exhibition; Curiosity.

Artificial

Source forms: artificial; artificial Malady; artificiall Wildernesses[13391]

The word. Artificial can mean acquired or brought about by circumstances, and can also describe something deliberately made. It need not mean false or feigned.

In Burton. Burton distinguishes melancholy arising through circumstances from the naturally melancholy character assigned to certain creatures. He later contrasts an artificial malady with the natural disposition associated with age. In the account of recreation, artificial wildernesses are garden features deliberately planted to appear wild. The shared contrast with nature changes its practical meaning from illness to landscape.

The places. Melancholy produced by circumstances is distinguished from natural character. (p. 46; DJR-012-38.) Acquired disease is contrasted with natural melancholy. (p. 33; DJR-027-26.) Planted wildernesses belong to pleasurable garden walks. (p. 269; DJR-078-34.)

In this edition. “artificial” → “brought about by circumstances” (DJR-012-38); “artificial Malady” → “acquired disease” (DJR-027-26); “artificiall Wildernesses” → “planted wildernesses” (DJR-078-34). The rendering follows the distinction at issue: acquired in the medical account, deliberately planted in the garden.

See also. Cause; Adventitious.

Astrological aspects

Source forms: partile conjunction[13392]

The word. An astrological aspect is an angular relationship between heavenly bodies or chart points. Conjunction, opposition and quartile name particular relations; a partile conjunction is treated as exact by degree.

In Burton. Burton describes Mars in partile conjunction with his ascendant in his self-portrait. In the account of love, mutual aspects of the Moon and Venus figure among remote causes. Elsewhere conjunctions, oppositions and quartiles form part of the threatening celestial order. The examples show the vocabulary operating in personal description, causal theory and admonition.

The places. Mars and the ascendant are placed in partile conjunction. (p. 3; DJR-002-03.) The Moon and Venus are described as mutually aspected. (p. 447; DJR-116-02.) Oppositions and quartiles are included among hostile aspects. (p. 4; DJR-021-28.)

In this edition. “partile conjunction” → “exact conjunction” (DJR-002-03); “mutually aspected” → “in mutual aspect” (DJR-116-02); “Oppositions, Quartiles” → “oppositions, quartiles” (DJR-021-28). The technical names remain where they organize the source account. “Aspect” here does not merely mean outward appearance.

See also. Astrology.

[13391] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 46 (DJR-012-38); p. 33 (DJR-027-26); p. 269 (DJR-078-34). Existing edition notes: DJR-027:E17, DJR-078:E32. DJR-027:E17 explicitly excludes the sense of pretended illness. Its unresolved marginal reference and age-limit source remain separate questions.

[13392] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 3 (DJR-002-03); p. 447 (DJR-116-02); p. 4 (DJR-021-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-021:E21, DJR-116:E02. DJR-021:E21 explains opposition as 180 degrees and quartile or square as 90 degrees. These are meanings within historical astrology, not evidence that celestial configurations cause the effects claimed.

Astrological significators

Source forms: Horoscope; significators; Mercurialists; combust; Hylech; promissors[13393]

The word. Significators are astrological indicators of the matter judged. A horoscope can mean the ascendant in context; the hyleg signifies life, and promissors are natal positions or aspects used in predicting events.

In Burton. Burton's reported rules connect chart positions with melancholy and distinguish the points being directed from positions said to promise events. He also calls people governed by Mercury Mercurialists and records unusual abilities attributed to a combust Moon. These expressions belong to a technical system of interpretation, whose terms must be understood before its claims can be followed.

The places. Horoscope denotes the ascendant in a rule about Mercury. (p. 58; DJR-032-10.) Significators, hyleg and promissors occur in timing an event. (p. 59; DJR-032-16.) The heavens supply indicators of character and disease. (p. 190 [first occurrence]; DJR-060-02.) Mercurialists are people said to be governed by Mercury. (p. 190 [second occurrence]; DJR-060-08.) Combust describes the Moon's proximity to the Sun in an anecdote. (p. 192; DJR-060-24.)

In this edition. "Horoscope" → "ascendant" (DJR-032-10); "Hylech" → "hyleg" (DJR-032-16); "radical promissors" → "natal promissors" (DJR-032-16); "significators" → "astrological indicators" (DJR-060-02); "Mercurialists" → "Those governed by Mercury" (DJR-060-08); "combust" → "combust" (DJR-060-24). The modern text expands some labels and retains others. Combust means astrologically obscured by proximity to the Sun; it does not describe literal burning.

See also. Astrology.

Astrology

Source forms: judicial astrology; Iatromathematicall[13394]

The word. Judicial astrology judges human dispositions and events from celestial configurations. Iatromathematical describes the combination of medicine with astrology.

In Burton. Burton introduces heavenly influences as causes according to astrologers while declining to settle whether stars are causes or signs. In the discussion of treatment, he objects to the certainty of those who prescribe a match between particular healer and patient and regulate gathering and administration astrologically. Reporting astrological categories therefore does not mean that he endorses every use or claim made for them.

The places. Burton postpones the dispute over stars as causes or signs. (p. 57; DJR-032-02.) He criticizes the certainty claimed by some astrological physicians. (p. 227; DJR-069-08.)

In this edition. "judicial Astrology" → "judicial astrology" (DJR-032-02); "Iatromathematicall professors" → "practitioners of astrological medicine" (DJR-069-08). The familiar label remains in the first passage; the specialized compound is explained in the second.

See also. Geniture; Astrological aspects; Astrological significators; Jovial and martial; Election; Judicial and judicious.

Aurum potabile

Source forms: aurum potabile[13395]

[13393] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 58 (DJR-032-10); p. 59 (DJR-032-16); p. 190 [first occurrence] (DJR-060-02); p. 190 [second occurrence] (DJR-060-08); p. 192 (DJR-060-24). Existing edition notes: DJR-032:E11. DJR-032:E11 explains directions, promissors and the subdivisions called terms, with a recorded comparison to Lilly. The reported predictions and extraordinary anecdotes remain historical claims.

[13394] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 57 (DJR-032-02); p. 227 (DJR-069-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-069:E06. DJR-069:E06 identifies the reported claim from which Burton distances himself. His criticism is local and should not be inflated into a rejection of every astrological explanation in the book.

The word. Aurum potabile literally means drinkable gold. Here the phrase supplies a joke about wealth consumed in drinking.

In Burton. Burton describes people who have shipwrecked their fortunes through wine and turned all their substance into aurum potabile. The surrounding losses of rank, property and security give the phrase its satirical force: what might have sustained a prosperous life has been swallowed away.

The places. The drinking of a fortune becomes the conversion of property into drinkable gold. (p. 120; DJR-045-05.)

In this edition. "aurum potabile" → "drinkable gold" (DJR-045-05). The literal English phrase preserves the play between gold as wealth and something made drinkable.

See also. Aqua vitae.

Baffle

Source forms: baffled; bafled[13396]

The word. Baffle can mean to humiliate, disgrace or treat contemptuously. The attested spellings baffled and bafled describe treatment suffered at another person's hands.

In Burton. Burton applies the word to his own disappointment with patrons, to the insults endured by poor dependants, and to a time-server who dominates in one place but submits elsewhere. The repeated contrast concerns power and humiliation. Bewilderment is not the central experience named by these examples.

The places. Burton recalls contemptuous treatment by patrons. (p. 136; DJR-048-10.) A poor dependant suffers humiliation from the powerful. (p. 159; DJR-053-27.) A changeable opportunist tyrannizes here and is humiliated there. (p. 36; DJR-010-29.)

In this edition. "baffled" → "treated me with contempt" (DJR-048-10); "bafled" → "humiliated" (DJR-053-27); "be baffled" → "being humiliated" (DJR-010-29). The modern equivalents make the social injury explicit while preserving the different grammatical settings.

See also. Explode.

Bawd

Source forms: bawd[13397]

The word. A bawd is a procurer: someone who facilitates sexual encounters. The noun need not denote a woman, despite some familiar later associations.

In Burton. In Burton's attack on a Jesuit, professions of poverty, fasting and chastity are set against accusations of wealth, gluttony and sexual misconduct. Bawd is paired with fornicator, distinguishing procurement from participation in the sexual act. Its force here is an accusation of hypocrisy within religious polemic.

The places. The term appears in an accusation against a professedly chaste religious figure. (p. 29; DJR-009-13.)

In this edition. "notorious Bawd" → "notorious procurer" (DJR-009-13). "Procurer" preserves the role named by the insult and its application to the male figure being attacked.

[13395] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 120 (DJR-045-05). This occurrence is figurative. It does not establish that the drinkers consumed a particular gold-containing preparation.

[13396] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 136 (DJR-048-10); p. 159 (DJR-053-27); p. 36 (DJR-010-29). Existing edition notes: DJR-010:E25. The source question concerning a separate Latin phrase in DJR-010:E25 remains unlocated; it does not determine the meaning of baffled.

[13397] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 29 (DJR-009-13). The allegations are Burton's polemical assertions, not independently established facts about Jesuits as a group.

See also. Quean and slut.

Bewray

Source forms: bewray[13398]

The word. Bewray here means to soil or befoul. Its sense is determined by the sustained language of excrement surrounding it.

In Burton. Burton attacks annotators who disfigure good authors with absurd commentary. His Latin abuse, the accompanying verb dawb, and the later images of dungheaps and dung-dwelling beetles make the meaning concrete. The word participates in a deliberately coarse satire on textual interference.

The places. Annotators are accused of fouling the books they comment on. (p. 71–72; DJR-018-10.)

In this edition. "bewray and dawb" → "soil and smear" (DJR-018-10). The English pair follows the local image. A sense such as reveal or betray would not convey the action described here.

See also. Fact; Privy.

Bile and boil

Source forms: bile[13399]

The word. The spelling bile needs particular care. In a Latin title, atra bile refers to black bile; in the English list of discharging sores, bile means a boil.

In Burton. Burton cites a work On Black Bile in discussing bodily disturbance. A few passages later, he lists a bile with an ulcer and an issue as a source of discharge whose closure is thought harmful. Much later black choler supplies a metaphorical bath or bait for evil spirits. These contexts distinguish a humour, a skin sore, and figurative use of the humour's name.

The places. A Latin book title names black bile. (p. 78; DJR-036-06.) Bile is listed beside ulcer and issue as a discharging sore. (p. 80; DJR-036-19.) Black choler figures in the account of temptation. (p. 695; DJR-164-08.)

In this edition. "de atra bile" → "On Black Bile" (DJR-036-06); "bile" → "boil" (DJR-036-19); "Black choler" → "Black bile" (DJR-164-08). "Boil" restores the distinct English sense in the list of sores. "Black bile" renders the humoral term and black choler.

See also. Chirurgery.

Blood and sanguine

Source forms: sanguine[13400]

The word. Sanguine means related to blood as a humour. In sanguine melancholy, the adjective qualifies the humoral mixture rather than simply describing an optimistic mood.

In Burton. Burton reports an explanation of unusual intellectual ability through slightly scorched melancholy mixed with blood. He then cites a learned young patient described as sanguine melancholy. The connection with cheerful delirium and inspired activity belongs to the historical account of the mixture; the phrase is not a modern diagnostic label.

The places. Blood enters the proposed explanation of gifted sanguine melancholy. (p. 192; DJR-060-22.)

[13398] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 71–72 (DJR-018-10).

[13399] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 78 (DJR-036-06); p. 80 (DJR-036-19); p. 695 (DJR-164-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-036:E14, DJR-164:E07. The claim about stopped discharges belongs to historical medicine. DJR-164:E07 identifies the bath and shoehorn as figures and preserves Burton's qualification as it were.

[13400] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 192 (DJR-060-22). The claims about inspiration and exceptional ability are reported through Burton's authorities and retain their historical character.

In this edition. “mixture of bloud” → “admixture of blood” (DJR-060-22); “sanguine melancholy” → “sanguine melancholy” (DJR-060-22). The technical adjective remains, with its humoral basis supplied by the surrounding account.

See also. Humour.

Bowels

Source forms: bowels[13401]

The word. Bowels can figuratively mean one’s own children or intimate kin. The bodily term emphasizes their closeness to the person being addressed.

In Burton. Burton condemns people who will extinguish a neighbour’s house fire while ignoring the sexual distress of their own flesh and blood. Their own bowels belongs to this comparison of responsibilities. The following phrase flesh and blood confirms that the referent is family rather than an internal organ.

The places. The failure to recognize one’s children’s distress is compared with neglecting a fire. (p. 205; DJR-063-14.)

In this edition. “their own bowels” → “their own flesh and blood, their very children” (DJR-063-14). The expanded rendering makes the kinship sense explicit while preserving the force of the bodily metaphor.

See also. Affinity and consanguinity; Affection.

Brave

Source forms: brave; bravery; brave array[13402]

The word. Brave can mean splendid or finely dressed. Bravery can name finery, and brave array splendid clothing.

In Burton. Burton complains that a writer without wealth, rank or splendid appearance is dismissed despite his qualifications. His discussion of envy makes another person’s bravery an object of resentment, while a poem contrasts the flatterer’s brave array with the scholar’s rags. The selected uses all turn on outward display and its social value.

The places. Splendid appearance influences the judgment of authors. (p. 10; DJR-005-14.) Finery becomes an object of envy. (p. 101–102; DJR-041-10.) The flatterer’s rich clothing contrasts with the scholar’s rags. (p. 133; DJR-047-32.)

In this edition. “polite and brave” → “polished and splendid” (DJR-005-14); “bravery” → “finery” (DJR-041-10); “brave array” → “splendid clothes” (DJR-047-32). These equivalents keep courage from entering passages concerned with appearance and dress.

See also. Honest; Tires and weeds.

Bugbear

Source forms: bugbears[13403]

The word. A bugbear is a frightening imaginary being or apparition. It can be invoked to frighten someone or experienced as a feared presence.

[13401] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 205 (DJR-063-14).

[13402] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 10 (DJR-005-14); p. 101–102 (DJR-041-10); p. 133 (DJR-047-32). The generalizations about women in DJR-041-10 are Burton’s hostile rhetoric; the lexical explanation does not validate them.

[13403] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 148 [sequence; printed 144] (DJR-050-41); p. 182 (DJR-058-38). Existing edition notes: DJR-050:E31. DJR-050:E31 explains the beings and identifies the Lavater reference. The apparent repetition there preserves both the translated Latin and Burton’s own English restatement.

In Burton. Burton criticizes adults who scare children with bugbears and hobgoblins, citing lasting effects attributed to such fear. In the symptoms of melancholy, bugbears appear among the visions that a sufferer is convinced he sees. The word connects an instrument of frightening tales with the terrifying content of imagination.

The places. Adults use bogeymen to frighten children. (p. 148 [sequence; printed 144]; DJR-050-41.) Terrifying apparitions occur among reported imagined sights. (p. 182; DJR-058-38.)

In this edition. “bugbears” → “bogeymen” (DJR-050-41); “bugbears” → “terrifying apparitions” (DJR-058-38). The two renderings distinguish the frightening figure invoked by another person from the apparition apparently seen by a sufferer.

See also. Daemon and genius.

Calenture and ague

Source forms: quartan ague; calentures; quartane[13404]

The word. Ague names a fever, often a recurrent one. Quartan marks recurrence on the fourth day by inclusive counting; calenture denotes a burning fever in the selected travel account.

In Burton. A dietary warning associates pork with quartan ague. Travellers’ calentures are reported alongside fluxes after unfamiliar food. Later, Burton records a dispute about quartan fever: although improvement after it is claimed, prolonged agues are also numbered among causes of melancholy. The vocabulary identifies the historical fever patterns without resolving these competing causal assertions.

The places. Quartan ague appears in a warning about pork. (p. 66; DJR-033-38.) Travellers are said to suffer burning fevers and diarrhoea. (p. 77; DJR-035-52.) Quartan fever is discussed both as a possible precursor to relief and as a cause. (p. 212; DJR-065-08.)

In this edition. “quartan ague” → “quartan ague” (DJR-033-38); “Calentures” → “burning fevers” (DJR-035-52); “quartane” → “quartan fever” (DJR-065-08). The periodic designation remains without assigning a modern disease identity to every historical example.

See also. Phrenitis; Madness; Helleborism; Feral.

Calling

Source forms: calling; callings[13405]

The word. Calling means an occupation or vocation: the work for which a person is trained or which ordinarily occupies them.

In Burton. In the criticism of government, people raised without a calling are driven into begging or theft and then punished. Later, studies and callings help explain the particular objects that occupy a melancholy person’s thoughts. Occupation thus matters both as a social provision and as a source of the mind’s habitual material.

The places. Failure to train people for occupations contributes to poverty and punishment. (p. 35; DJR-010-20.) Studies and occupations shape the content of symptoms. (p. 194; DJR-061-02.)

In this edition. “no calling” → “no occupation” (DJR-010-20); “studies and callings” → “studies and occupations” (DJR-061-02). “Occupation” fits both examples. Neither requires a special inward summons or an exclusively religious office.

See also. Commonwealth.

[13404] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 66 (DJR-033-38); p. 77 (DJR-035-52); p. 212 (DJR-065-08). The dietary and prognostic claims are those reported by Burton. The lexical meanings do not independently establish their medical validity.

[13405] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 35 (DJR-010-20); p. 194 (DJR-061-02).

Careful

Source forms: carefull[13406]

The word. Careful can mean filled with cares or burdened by worry. Carefull thoughts are thoughts that trouble someone.

In Burton. In the account of balm, Burton lists among its attributed virtues the expulsion of carefull thoughts and anxious imaginations. The parallel with anxious makes the sense clear: the claimed benefit concerns relief from worry, not the removal of attentive or conscientious thinking.

The places. Worried thoughts figure among the troubles a herb is claimed to relieve. (p. 368–369; DJR-100-12.)

In this edition. “carefull thoughts” → “worried thoughts” (DJR-100-12). “Worried” preserves the emotional burden expressed by the older adjective.

See also. Painful.

Carnal presumption

Source forms: carnall presumption[13407]

The word. Carnal presumption is unfounded confidence rooted in the unrenewed self, as distinguished here from warranted religious assurance. Carnal is not confined to sexual desire.

In Burton. The troubled speaker asks how assurance can be distinguished from carnal presumption, then lists signs of sanctification that seem to be missing. This is an objection voiced within the consolatory exchange. Treating it as a settled diagnosis by the narrator would erase the dialogue between distress and reassurance.

The places. The sufferer fears that apparent assurance may instead be unfounded confidence. (p. 714; DJR-167-54.)

In this edition. “carnall presumption” → “fleshly presumption” (DJR-167-54); “my security” → “my assurance” (DJR-167-54). “Fleshly” preserves the theological contrast, while “assurance” clarifies security. The article explains why the first phrase is broader than sensual indulgence.

See also. Faith and assurance.

Carriage

Source forms: cariages[13408]

The word. Carriage can mean conduct or manner of behaving. Cariages is the spelling found in the selected passage.

In Burton. Burton’s catalogue of follies runs through mad labours, books, endeavours and cariages before naming ignorance, actions and gestures. The sequence concerns forms of human activity and behaviour. Conduct supplies the sense appropriate to this satirical enumeration.

The places. Conduct is included in the catalogue of supposedly mad human activities. (p. 74; DJR-018-33.)

In this edition. “endeavors, cariages” → “undertakings and conduct” (DJR-018-33). The rendering prevents an irrelevant image of wheeled vehicles from entering the list.

[13406] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 368–369 (DJR-100-12). The virtues ascribed to balm remain claims within Burton’s historical herbal discussion, not conclusions established by this entry.

[13407] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 714 (DJR-167-54). Existing edition notes: DJR-167:E53. DJR-167:E53 identifies the speaker as the sufferer and records Abernethy as the marginal source for the signs of sanctification.

[13408] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 74 (DJR-018-33). Existing edition notes: DJR-018:E21. DJR-018:E21 also discusses a separate discrepancy between country houses and villages in the passage. That discrepancy remains preserved and does not affect this lexical reading.

See also. Conversation.

Casuists

Source forms: casuists[13409]

The word. Casuists are writers who discuss cases of conscience: particular problems of moral conduct and judgment.

In Burton. Burton invokes their criticism while attacking a gentry whose lives are consumed by recreation. The clause refers to their judgment on the sports and recreations just listed, especially the immoderation Burton immediately emphasizes. It identifies a type of moral authority rather than itself accusing that authority of dishonest reasoning.

The places. Writers on cases of conscience are cited against excessive aristocratic recreation. (p. 266; DJR-078-06.)

In this edition. "our Casuists tax" → "our writers on cases of conscience condemn" (DJR-078-06). The expanded phrase explains both the writers' field and tax in its sense of censure.

See also. Divine.

Catoptrics and perspectives

Source forms: perspectives; Catoptricks; perspective glasses[13410]

The word. Perspectives can name optics, the study of sight. Catoptrics concerns reflected images, while perspective glasses denotes optical instruments or glasses without necessarily specifying one device.

In Burton. Burton assigns the problems of vision to writers on perspectives. Later, catoptrics helps explain apparently uncanny sights through dark rooms and shaped mirrors. Optical glasses also enter a gallery of objects enjoyed as recreation. The vocabulary spans an organized inquiry, an account of visual effects and a class of objects for viewing.

The places. Perspectives names the discipline concerned with vision. (p. 22; DJR-025-09.) Dark-room effects and shaped mirrors explain strange sights. (p. 211; DJR-064-28.) Optical glasses appear among objects of pleasurable inspection. (p. 278; DJR-080-33.)

In this edition. "Perspectives" → "optics" (DJR-025-09); "Catoptricks" → "catoptrics" (DJR-064-28); "perspective glasses" → "optical glasses" (DJR-080-33). "Optics" makes the disciplinary sense clear. "Optical glasses" leaves the instrument unspecified, as it is in the source.

See also. Glass; Species in perception; Fascination.

Cause

Source forms: impulsive cause; efficient cause; Continent causes; next causes; instrumental causes[13411]

The word. Cause takes several technical qualifications. An impulsive cause impels; an instrumental cause supplies the means; an efficient cause brings an action about. In the medical classification, antecedent causes prepare a condition, continent causes sustain it directly, and next causes are nearest or proximate.

[13409] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 266 (DJR-078-06). The sentence does not specify an individual casuist or establish a uniform judgment on every form of hunting or recreation.

[13410] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 22 (DJR-025-09); p. 211 (DJR-064-28); p. 278 (DJR-080-33). The dark-room passage brings several optical effects together; the entry does not force them into a single modern apparatus or identify every glass as a telescope.

[13411] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 2 (DJR-021-12); p. 3–4 (DJR-021-27); p. 25 (DJR-025-31); p. 65 (DJR-033-28); p. 172 (DJR-056-39). Existing edition notes: DJR-021:E07, DJR-021:E19, DJR-025:E22, DJR-033:E16, DJR-056:E30. DJR-021:E19 explains instrumental agency; DJR-033:E16 and DJR-056:E30 qualify the loose grouping of medical categories. These distinctions describe the historical argument, not an endorsement of its causal claims.

In Burton. Burton relates Adam's sin to the physical agents of illness by distinguishing an impelling cause from its instruments. His account of movement distinguishes efficient cause from end, the desired or avoided object. The medical headings then gather internal, antecedent and immediate causes. These are overlapping explanatory schemes, and Burton's compressed grouping should not be mistaken for a single consistently separated classification.

The places. Adam's sin is called the impelling cause of human misery. (p. 2; DJR-021-12.) Created things act as instruments of infirmity. (p. 3–4; DJR-021-27.) Efficient cause is distinguished from the end of movement. (p. 25; DJR-025-31.) External and internal causes are classified. (p. 65; DJR-033-28.) A heading groups causes acting on the mind through the body. (p. 172; DJR-056-39.)

In this edition. "impulsive cause" → "impelling cause" (DJR-021-12); "instrumental causes" → "instrumental causes" (DJR-021-27); "Efficient cause" → "efficient cause" (DJR-025-31); "Continent causes" → "containing causes" (DJR-033-28); "Continent, inward, antecedent, next causes" → "Immediate, internal, antecedent and proximate causes" (DJR-056-39). The renderings preserve the distinctions locally. Containing and immediate express the sustaining force of continent; proximate expresses the nearness meant by next.

See also. Consent and essence; Accident; Contingence; Adventitious; Artificial.

Cautery

Source forms: cautery; seared; cauterized consciences[13412]

The word. Cautery involves searing bodily tissue. In the selected medical passage, a cautery is the resulting wound maintained as a draining outlet. A cauterized conscience figuratively lacks sensitivity.

In Burton. A reported case attributes madness to the healing of a draining wound and recovery to its reopening. Elsewhere the willingness to endure cauterization illustrates how strongly most people desire life. In the satire on wealthy patrons, seared consciences resist rebuke. The physical action thus supplies both a treatment term and a moral image.

The places. Closure of a cautery wound is given as a cause of illness. (p. 176; DJR-057-26.) Cauterization appears among sufferings endured for health. (p. 215; DJR-066-01.) Seared consciences disregard denunciation. (p. 137; DJR-048-22.)

In this edition. "a cautery" → "a cautery wound" (DJR-057-26); "seared" → "cauterized" (DJR-066-01); "cauterized consciences" → "consciences are seared" (DJR-048-22). Adding wound clarifies the object that dries up; seared preserves the bodily metaphor in the moral passage.

See also. Chirurgery.

Censure

Source forms: censured; censure; censures[13413]

The word. Censure can mean judgment or assessment, as well as adverse criticism. Its force depends on who judges and on the surrounding action.

In Burton. The synopsis asks how someone who harms himself should be judged. Addressing patrons, Burton submits himself to their censure and service: their judgment is being acknowledged, not necessarily their condemnation. A scholar who scorns all censures, by contrast, dismisses criticism. The word moves from an act of assessment to the opinions that an author resents.

[13412] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 176 (DJR-057-26); p. 215 (DJR-066-01); p. 137 (DJR-048-22). Existing edition notes: DJR-048:E17, DJR-057:E22, DJR-066:E01. DJR-048:E17 identifies the seared conscience with 1 Timothy 4:2. The reported treatment belongs to historical medicine and is not independently established by the lexical explanation.

[13413] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 100 (DJR-020-63); p. 141 (DJR-049-19); p. 195 (DJR-061-07). Existing edition notes: DJR-020:E29, DJR-049:E15, DJR-061:E06.

The places. The synopsis poses a question about judgment. (p. 100; DJR-020-63.) Burton submits to the judgment of worthy patrons. (p. 141; DJR-049-19.) A scholar dismisses criticism. (p. 195; DJR-061-07.)

In this edition. "censured" → "judge" (DJR-020-63); "censure" → "judgement" (DJR-049-19); "censures" → "criticism" (DJR-061-07). Judge and judgement preserve the broader sense; criticism fits the scholar's defensive attitude.

See also. Fact; Explode; Apologize.

Cento

Source forms: Cento[13414]

The word. A cento is a patchwork composition assembled from other writings. Here the term names Burton's own gathered work.

In Burton. The author compares his collection to cloth woven from different fleeces and to a bee's gathering from flowers. He then claims that the resulting cento wrongs no author because each receives his due. The term makes combination itself a form of composition, while the adjoining claim raises the question of acknowledgment.

The places. Burton describes his method through weaving and gathering. (p. 8; DJR-005-01.)

In this edition. "this Cento" → "this patchwork" (DJR-005-01). Patchwork retains the material image and makes the literary term intelligible. It does not imply that the parts lack an organizing purpose.

See also. Humane learning; Science; Schoolmen; Parrhesia; Fustian and bombast.

Century

Source forms: cent.[13415]

The word. Century can mean a collection of one hundred items. The abbreviation cent. in a citation identifies such a division rather than a period of one hundred years.

In Burton. Among authorities on transformation and illness, Burton cites Mizaldus by cent. 5. 77. The numerals identify the fifth collection and item 77. This is a bibliographical locator, and interpreting century chronologically would obscure the reference.

The places. Mizaldus is cited by collection and item. (p. 9–10; DJR-022-28.)

In this edition. "Mizaldus cent. 5. 77." → "Mizaldus, fifth century, item 77" (DJR-022-28). The modern text retains century as the collection's name and makes item explicit. The article supplies the otherwise unfamiliar numerical sense.

See also. Neoterics; Prognostics.

Cerebral chambers

Source forms: middle cell of the Brain[13416]

The word. Cerebral chambers is an editorial heading for the cavities, cells or ventricles to which Burton's historical physiology assigns mental faculties.

[13414] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 8 (DJR-005-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-005:E01. The assurance that every author receives his due is Burton's statement. This entry does not certify every attribution or quotation source.

[13415] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 9–10 (DJR-022-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-022:E25. DJR-022:E25 explains century and records separate problems in the surrounding citations. Understanding this locator does not authenticate all the abbreviated references in the list.

[13416] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 19 (DJR-024-19); p. 23 (DJR-025-18). Existing edition notes: DJR-024:E17, DJR-025:E13. DJR-025:E13 identifies the historical ventricular model. The locations reported here are not presented as modern neuroscience.

In Burton. The account of the brain places imagination and thought in a middle ventricle, and memory in a fourth chamber that receives and transmits animal spirits. The later definition of imagination calls its organ the middle cell. Reading the two passages together shows that cell names an internal chamber, rather than a microscopic unit of tissue.

The places. Imagination, thought and memory are assigned to ventricles. (p. 19; DJR-024-19.) The middle cell is named as imagination's organ. (p. 23; DJR-025-18.)

In this edition. "Middle ventricle" → "middle ventricle" (DJR-024-19); "fourth Creek" → "fourth chamber" (DJR-024-19); "middle cell of the Brain" → "brain's middle chamber" (DJR-025-18). Chamber makes the older spatial vocabulary clear while retaining ventricle where Burton uses that term.

See also. Imagination.

Characters

Source forms: characters; character[13417]

The word. Characters may be inscribed signs or magical symbols. A character can also be a distinguishing mark by which a condition is recognized.

In Burton. Signs stamped on metals appear among the alleged means of witchcraft, and written symbols among disputed cures. When Burton asks whether such treatments are lawful, characters again belong to the list of magical devices. In the account of symptoms, however, sorrow is the other character of melancholy: a distinguishing feature rather than an inscription.

The places. Stamped signs appear among the alleged instruments of magic. (p. 56–57; DJR-031-54.) Written symbols enter the discussion of contested cures. (p. 95–96; DJR-039-27.) Inscribed signs are included in the question about lawful treatment. (p. 216; DJR-067-36.) Sorrow is called a characteristic mark. (p. 183; DJR-059-01.)

In this edition. "characters stamped" → "signs stamped" (DJR-031-54); "Characters" → "written symbols" (DJR-039-27); "Characters" → "inscribed signs" (DJR-067-36); "Character" → "distinguishing mark" (DJR-059-01). The equivalents distinguish visible inscriptions from a diagnostic feature; neither passage concerns a fictional person or personality.

See also. Fascination.

Charity

Source forms: charity[13418]

The word. Charity has the broad Christian sense of love of God and neighbour. It can also name the loving disposition through which another person's conduct is judged.

In Burton. In the account of divine love, charity accompanies faith, hope and other virtues. Later it governs judgment of those who have died after harming themselves: the possibility of inward repentance supports withholding the harshest conclusion. The term concerns a relation to God and other people, with practical consequences for judgment.

The places. Charity appears among the virtues accompanying divine love. (p. 637; DJR-152-11.) Charity supports a favourable judgment of possible inward repentance. (p. 704–705; DJR-166-06.)

[13417] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 56–57 (DJR-031-54); p. 95–96 (DJR-039-27); p. 216 (DJR-067-36); p. 183 (DJR-059-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-031:E36, DJR-039:E19, DJR-059:E01, DJR-067:E18. The claims of magical operation and cure remain those reported and debated by Burton. The entry does not establish their efficacy.

[13418] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 637 (DJR-152-11); p. 704–705 (DJR-166-06). Existing edition notes: DJR-152:E11, DJR-166:E04. DJR-152:E11 explains the theological sense. DJR-166:E04 records a close parallel in Abernethy's Physic of the Soul and distinguishes textual confirmation from verification of the reported events.

In this edition. “charity it self” → “charity itself” (DJR-152-11); “charity may judge the best” → “charity may judge favourably” (DJR-166-06). Charity is retained for its theological breadth. Restricting it to financial assistance would miss both passages.

See also. Love; Complement.

Chirurgery

Source forms: chirurgicall; scarification[13419]

The word. Chirurgery is the older name for surgery; chirurgicall means surgical. Scarification means making small incisions in the skin.

In Burton. Burton places surgical remedies under a separate member. Its discussion includes cupping glasses used with or without scarification and intended to divert humours and relieve bodily troubles. The heading therefore includes procedures understood through the historical theory of evacuation and diversion.

The places. The heading announces surgical remedies. (p. 382; DJR-103-01.) Cupping is distinguished according to whether scarification accompanies it. (p. 383; DJR-103-07.)

In this edition. “Chirurgicall remedies” → “Surgical remedies” (DJR-103-01); “with or without scarification” → “with or without scarification” (DJR-103-07). Surgical gives the familiar equivalent of the heading. Scarification remains a precise procedure term, explained here.

See also. Cautery; Issue; Impostume; Bile and boil; Friction and embrocation; Epithemes.

Choler

Source forms: Cholerick; black choler[13420]

The word. Choler connects humoral vocabulary with temperament. Choleric may describe a hot-tempered person, with the association of yellow bile; black choler denotes black bile, the melancholy humour.

In Burton. Aretino’s Lucretia describes managing a choleric suitor despite his blustering. In the account of religious melancholy, black choler becomes the devil’s bath and a shoehorn easing the entrance of evil spirits. The first usage characterizes behaviour; the second names a bodily humour employed in a figurative account of temptation.

The places. A choleric suitor is managed through his infatuation. (p. 496; DJR-125-28.) Black choler figures in the account of bodily disposition and temptation. (p. 695; DJR-164-08.)

In this edition. “cholerick” → “hot-tempered” (DJR-125-28); “Black choler” → “Black bile” (DJR-164-08). Hot-tempered expresses the behavioural sense; black bile preserves the particular humour. The adjective black must not be lost.

See also. Humour.

Church patronage

Source forms: advousons; impropriations; simony; church-chopping; lapse[13421]

[13419] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 382 (DJR-103-01); p. 383 (DJR-103-07). Existing edition notes: DJR-103:E06. The claim of rapid relief is attributed to Fernel in the passage. Explaining the procedure does not validate its historical indications.

[13420] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 496 (DJR-125-28); p. 695 (DJR-164-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-125:E21, DJR-164:E07. DJR-125:E21 supplies the yellow-bile association. DJR-164:E07 identifies the bath and shoehorn as figures and preserves Burton’s qualification as it were.

[13421] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 60–61 (DJR-015-41); p. 64 (DJR-016-27); p. 114 (DJR-043-34); p. 138 (DJR-048-28); p. 143 (DJR-049-38). Existing edition notes: DJR-015:E24, DJR-016:E12, DJR-043:E29, DJR-048:E22, DJR-049:E32. These are explanations of Burton’s historical institutional vocabulary, not statements about present-day church law. The polemical descriptions remain his.

The word. Church patronage gathers terms concerning appointments and revenues. Advowsons are rights of patronage over church appointments; impropriations place church revenues in lay ownership. Simony is the buying or selling of spiritual offices or privileges; church-chopping is trafficking in church appointments. Lapse concerns the loss or transfer of a right of nomination after an appointment is not made in time.

In Burton. Burton's imagined commonwealth restricts private patronage and provides collective oversight of appointments. His satire later attacks the trade in livings, associates simony with covetousness, and describes a scholar's fear of a prior lapse affecting an appointment. These terms connect the proposed reform with the abuses and insecurities experienced by scholars seeking a living.

The places. Advowsons are excluded from a proposed appointment scheme. (p. 60–61; DJR-015-41.) Collective patronage replaces private interests. (p. 64; DJR-016-27.) Simony appears among the offspring of covetousness. (p. 114; DJR-043-34.) Trading in church livings is condemned. (p. 138; DJR-048-28.) A previous lapse threatens the right of appointment. (p. 143; DJR-049-38.)

In this edition. "advousons" → "rights of patronage over appointments" (DJR-015-41); "impropriations" → "church revenues appropriated to lay ownership" (DJR-016-27); "Simony" → "simony" (DJR-043-34); "Church-chopping Patrons" → "patrons who trade in church livings" (DJR-048-28); "precedent Lapse" → "prior lapse of the right of appointment" (DJR-049-38). Expanded phrases explain the institutional terms while simony retains its established name.

See also. Living and preferment; Cure; Mortmain; Hospital; Legal evidence; Abdicate.

Chyle

Source forms: Chilus; Chylus[13422]

The word. Chyle is the nutritive material produced from food during digestion in the physiological account Burton follows. Chilus is the form used in the cited passage.

In Burton. Burton reports an explanation in which heat and obstruction in the mesenteric veins delay the passage of chyle to the liver or corrupt it into rumbling and wind. The term belongs to a proposed route of digestion and bodily nourishment, here interrupted to explain illness.

The places. Chyle is glossed as the white juice derived from food digested in the stomach. (p. 14; DJR-023-31.) Blocked passage of chyle is named among immediate causes. (p. 176; DJR-057-31.)

In this edition. "Chylus" → "chyle" (DJR-023-31); "Chilus" → "chyle" (DJR-057-31). The modern spelling is retained without replacing the surrounding historical physiology with a modern account.

See also. Concoction.

Clerk

Source forms: Clarkes[13423]

The word. Clerk can mean a learned person or scholar. The plural Clarkes has this sense in Burton's account of princely hospitality.

In Burton. The surrounding examples concern philosophers and men distinguished by learning. Their arrival at court is compared to going to a Lyceum or university, and they are admitted to the ruler's table. The context therefore identifies learned guests rather than office workers.

The places. Learned men are welcomed at princes' courts. (p. 139; DJR-048-40.)

[13422] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 14 (DJR-023-31); p. 176 (DJR-057-31). Existing edition notes: DJR-057:E26. The claim is attributed through Montaltus to Galen. Its pathway and explanation of wind are historical propositions, not validated by modernizing the noun.

[13423] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 139 (DJR-048-40). Existing edition notes: DJR-048:E33. The historical anecdotes remain Burton's examples of support for learning; the lexical reading does not independently confirm each attribution.

In this edition. “famous Clarkes” → “Famous scholars” (DJR-048-40). Scholars states the relevant social and intellectual role without implying clerical employment.

See also. Neoterics.

Clister

Source forms: clister; clisters; clysters[13424]

The word. Clister and clyster are spellings of enema, a preparation administered through the lower bowel. Burton uses both spellings within his discussion of evacuation.

In Burton. A merchant’s supposed delusion is attributed to constipation and treated with a clister. In the regimen discussion, clisters appear among measures used when natural evacuation fails. The pharmaceutical classification later places clysters among remedies administered through the lower parts and distinguishes them from suppositories.

The places. An enema is given in a reported case of constipation. (p. 78; DJR-036-07.) Enemas appear among aids to evacuation. (p. 237; DJR-071-28.) The classification distinguishes enemas from suppositories. (p. 382; DJR-102-46.)

In this edition. “Clister” → “enema” (DJR-036-07); “clisters” → “enemas” (DJR-071-28); “Clysters” → “enemas” (DJR-102-46). One modern term covers the spelling variants. The distinction from suppositories and the source’s strong or weak preparations remain intact.

See also. Purging.

Clown

Source forms: clowns[13425]

The word. Clown can mean a country labourer. In the selected passage the word identifies a person accustomed to hard bodily work.

In Burton. The description of Cape Verde claims that heat defeats even the hardiest men and stiffest clowns. The comparison depends on the labourer’s presumed toughness. Reading clowns as comic performers would remove the point of the example.

The places. Extreme heat is said to overcome even hardy labourers. (p. 82; DJR-036-36.)

In this edition. “stiffest clowns” → “toughest labourers” (DJR-036-36). Labourers supplies the occupational sense, while toughest preserves the force of stiffest.

See also. Parasite; Silly.

Collogue

Source forms: collogue; colloguing; cogging; collogueing; colloging[13426]

The word. To collogue is to flatter, coax or ingratiate oneself through speech. Burton’s forms colloguing, collogueing and colloging belong to the same family; cogging in the paired phrase means lying or cheating.

[13424] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 78 (DJR-036-07); p. 237 (DJR-071-28); p. 382 (DJR-102-46). Existing edition notes: DJR-036:E05, DJR-071:E21, DJR-102:E44. The reported recovery and recommended substances belong to Burton’s historical medical account. This entry explains the term rather than recommending treatment.

[13425] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 82 (DJR-036-36). Existing edition notes: DJR-036:E26. DJR-036:E26 explains the word and records differences between Burton’s compressed account and Hawkins’s Observations. The lexical explanation does not resolve the climatic claims.

[13426] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 7 (DJR-004-08); p. 74 (DJR-018-35); p. 112 [122]–113 (DJR-043-22); p. 140 (DJR-049-04). Existing edition notes: DJR-004:E07, DJR-018:E23, DJR-043:E19, DJR-049:E04.

In Burton. Writers collogue with powerful men to gain favour. The larger catalogue of folly joins colloguing to parasitical fawning, while the portrait of ambition gives it a place among bows, visits and other attempts to obtain office. The warning to scholars then rejects extravagant praise as a shameful means of approaching patrons. The repeated word exposes speech used for advantage.

The places. Scribblers flatter powerful patrons. (p. 7; DJR-004-08.) Wheedling forms part of the catalogue of folly. (p. 74; DJR-018-35.) Ambition employs lying and coaxing. (p. 112 [122]–113; DJR-043-22.) Scholars are warned against parasitical praise. (p. 140; DJR-049-04.)

In this edition. "collogue" → "ingratiate themselves" (DJR-004-08); "colloguing" → "wheedling" (DJR-018-35); "cogging and collogueing" → "lying and wheedling" (DJR-043-22); "colloging" → "coaxing" (DJR-049-04). The varying equivalents retain the shared element of interested flattery and distinguish the lying named by cogging.

See also. Parasite.

Comfortable

Source forms: comfortable speeches[13427]

The word. Comfortable can mean giving comfort or consolation. Comfortable speeches are words intended to relieve mental distress.

In Burton. Introducing the consolatory section, Burton links these speeches with good counsel and persuasion. He proposes to gather examples from orators, philosophers, theologians and church fathers. The adjective describes what the words do for a troubled hearer, not how physically pleasant they are.

The places. Consoling words introduce the collection of remedies for discontent. (p. 307; DJR-086-38.)

In this edition. "comfortable speeches" → "consoling words" (DJR-086-38). Consoling makes the active sense explicit and fits the passage's emphasis on advice and persuasion.

See also. Cordial; Despair.

Commodity

Source forms: commodity; commodious; commoditie[13428]

The word. Commodity can mean benefit or advantage. Commodious can describe something materially advantageous or profitable.

In Burton. In justifying his subject, Burton pairs commodity with common good: knowledge of melancholy is meant to benefit everyone. In the satire on learning, commodious professions attract students because they offer financial rewards. In the description of a form of melancholy, commoditie names the relative advantage of intermittent rather than continuous symptoms. The beneficiaries and kinds of benefit differ.

The places. Knowledge of the disease promises a common benefit. (p. 16–17; DJR-006-24.) Students choose profitable professions. (p. 133–134; DJR-047-33.) Intervals between symptoms count as a relative advantage. (p. 201; DJR-062-21.)

In this edition. "commodity" → "benefit" (DJR-006-24); "commodious" → "lucrative" (DJR-047-33); "commoditie" → "advantage" (DJR-062-21). Benefit, lucrative and advantage specify the local sense. None requires the modern meaning of an article of commerce.

See also. Usury; Estate.

[13427] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 307 (DJR-086-38). Burton's claims that such speech can provide immediate or sufficient cure remain part of his argument; the definition does not establish a universal therapeutic result.

[13428] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 16–17 (DJR-006-24); p. 133–134 (DJR-047-33); p. 201 (DJR-062-21). Existing edition notes: DJR-047:E30, DJR-062:E19.

Common sense

Source forms: common sense[13429]

The word. Common sense is an internal faculty that receives and combines what the separate senses perceive. In this technical usage it does not mean ordinary practical judgment.

In Burton. Burton's account of the brain assigns common sense to the ventricles associated with animal spirits, sensation and movement. His fuller definition calls it the judge or governor of the other senses: it compares sounds, colours and other sensory forms. The phrase names a particular power within a system of faculties, with a proposed bodily seat.

The places. The ventricles are identified as the seat of common sense. (p. 19; DJR-024-18.) Common sense judges the evidence brought by the separate senses. (p. 23; DJR-025-17.)

In this edition. "seat of the common sense" → "seat of the common sense" (DJR-024-18); "Judge or Moderator" → "judge or governor" (DJR-025-17). The phrase remains unchanged because it is the name of a faculty; the lexicon supplies the distinction from its familiar everyday sense.

See also. Faculty; Sensible.

Commonwealth

Source forms: body politick; common-wealth[13430]

The word. Commonwealth names a political community, including a monarchy. Body politic presents that community as an organized body whose parts can suffer disorder.

In Burton. Burton explicitly extends the language of disease to kingdoms, provinces and political bodies. The analogy compares bodily humours with the disorders of a commonwealth. His subsequent list of public grievances includes oppression, broken privileges and unfit magistrates. These examples make government and social organization part of the book's enlarged anatomy of illness.

The places. Kingdoms and other political communities are compared with diseased bodies. (p. 46; DJR-013-01.) Public grievances harm the political body. (p. 47; DJR-013-10.)

In this edition. "common-wealth" → "commonwealth" (DJR-013-01); "body politick" → "political body" (DJR-013-10). Commonwealth is retained without narrowing it to a republican constitution. Political body preserves the governing bodily analogy.

See also. Policy; Estate; Calling; Custom and education; Manure.

Complement

Source forms: complement; vulgar complement[13431]

The word. Complement can name a courtesy or social observance; it can also mean completion or fulfilment. The spelling alone does not decide between these senses.

In Burton. In the symptom catalogue, an omitted small complement can be felt as contempt, while another passage describes reluctance to perform vulgar complement, ordinary courtesies. In the discussion of charity, works of mercy are the complement of love: they bring love into fulfilment through action. The later theological use must remain distinct from the social formality.

[13429] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 19 (DJR-024-18); p. 23 (DJR-025-17). Existing edition notes: DJR-024:E16, DJR-025:E12. The assignment of faculties to ventricles and the account of animal spirits belong to historical physiology. DJR-025:E12 clarifies that future or absent objects are represented through previously received forms, not directly sensed at a distance.

[13430] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 46 (DJR-013-01); p. 47 (DJR-013-10). Existing edition notes: DJR-013:E01.

[13431] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 185 (DJR-059-15); p. 185–186 (DJR-059-24); p. 637 (DJR-152-12). Existing edition notes: DJR-059:E15, DJR-059:E22, DJR-152:E12. DJR-152:E12 explains completion and records the corrected biblical reference. Clement's exact Latin formulation remains uncollated; this entry does not claim otherwise.

The places. An omitted courtesy is interpreted as neglect. (p. 185; DJR-059-15.) Ordinary courtesies are avoided. (p. 185–186; DJR-059-24.) Works of mercy complete the exercise of love. (p. 637; DJR-152-12.)

In this edition. "small complement" → "small courtesy" (DJR-059-15); "vulgar complement" → "ordinary courtesies" (DJR-059-24); "complement of Love" → "completion of love" (DJR-152-12). Courtesy and completion keep the two senses separate; vulgar here means ordinary.

See also. Conversation; Charity.

Complexion and temperament

Source forms: temperature; temperament; complexion; distemperature; Crasis; temperatures; temper[13432]

The word. Complexion, temperament, temperature and crasis can name bodily constitution or a mixture and balance of qualities. Distemperature denotes a disordered state. Temper can also describe the inherent constitution of something other than a human body.

In Burton. Diet can overthrow the body's temperature, while grief can alter its complexion. Burton uses temperament and crasis in explaining individual symptoms, and temperatures in explaining why foods affect people differently. The digression on springs extends temper to the constitution of the earth. These uses concern composition and disposition, not simply measured heat, facial colour or a person's current mood.

The places. Eating and drinking can disturb bodily balance. (p. 42–43; DJR-012-11.) Galen's ideal constitution is compared with other ideal descriptions. (p. 44; DJR-012-23.) Passion alters bodily constitution. (p. 13; DJR-023-16.) A heading treats disorders of particular parts. (p. 174; DJR-057-01.) Symptoms vary with temperament and crasis. (p. 190 [first occurrence]; DJR-060-02.) Different constitutions respond differently to diet. (p. 236; DJR-071-21.) The earth has an inherent temper. (p. 246; DJR-073-29.)

In this edition. "temperature of his body" → "body's balance" (DJR-012-11); "Temperament" → "balanced bodily constitution" (DJR-012-23); "complexion" → "bodily constitution" (DJR-023-16); "Distemperature" → "Disorders" (DJR-057-01); "Crasis" → "bodily constitution" (DJR-060-02); "temperatures" → "constitutions" (DJR-071-21); "innate temper" → "inherent constitution" (DJR-073-29). The equivalents explain constitution or balance where a familiar modern sense would mislead. Temperament is retained alongside the explanation of crasis in the symptom passage.

See also. Humour.

Conceit

Source forms: conceited; conceit; conceipt; conceited in discourse; conceipted; conceits[13433]

The word. Conceit and its related forms can mean a thought, idea or imagining, or the wit and ingenuity displayed in speech. They need not suggest excessive self-esteem.

In Burton. Burton calls a tale conceited because it is amusing. In discussing imagination, a strong conceit is a powerful idea or impression; elsewhere conceipt joins fear in bringing a prediction to pass. Conceited discourse and conceipted scoffers belong to wit and conversation. The vain conceits from which treatment seeks to divert the mind are empty fancies. The word family ranges from inventive ability to distressing mental content.

[13432] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 42–43 (DJR-012-11); p. 44 (DJR-012-23); p. 13 (DJR-023-16); p. 174 (DJR-057-01); p. 190 [first occurrence] (DJR-060-02); p. 236 (DJR-071-21); p. 246 (DJR-073-29). Existing edition notes: DJR-012:E06, DJR-012:E15, DJR-023:E11, DJR-060:E01, DJR-071:E15, DJR-073:E26. The account includes historical humoral and astrological explanations. Constitution clarifies the terminology without silently validating those explanations.

[13433] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 79–80 (DJR-036-16); p. 95 (DJR-039-21); p. 166 (DJR-055-09); p. 191 (DJR-060-19); p. 199 (DJR-062-08); p. 289 (DJR-083-03). Existing edition notes: DJR-036:E12, DJR-055:E09, DJR-060:E18, DJR-062:E07, DJR-083:E02. The national generalization and claims about imagination's bodily effects remain Burton's reported assertions, not findings established by this article.

The places. An anecdote is described as amusing. (p. 79–80; DJR-036-16.) A strong idea is credited with bodily effects. (p. 95; DJR-039-21.) Imagination accompanies fear of predictions. (p. 166; DJR-055-09.) Conversation is witty and imaginative. (p. 191; DJR-060-19.) Scoffers show wit. (p. 199; DJR-062-08.) Treatment seeks diversion from empty fancies. (p. 289; DJR-083-03.)

In this edition. "conceited tale" → "amusing tale" (DJR-036-16); "strong conceit or apprehension" → "strong idea or impression" (DJR-039-21); "conceipt" → "imagination" (DJR-055-09); "conceited in discourse" → "imaginative in conversation" (DJR-060-19); "conceipted" → "witty" (DJR-062-08); "vain conceits" → "empty fancies" (DJR-083-03). Different equivalents preserve the shift between a mental conception and an engaging manner of speaking.

See also. Imagination; Wit; Fond.

Concoction

Source forms: crudity; concoction; elixation; assation; semiustulation; sanguification; crudities[13434]

The word. Concoction means digestive transformation or processing. Crudity can mean indigestion; crudities are incompletely digested or processed matter. Elixation and assation are boiling and roasting within the historical account, semiustulation incomplete roasting, and sanguification conversion into blood.

In Burton. Burton explains digestion through natural heat and cooking analogies, then distinguishes a sequence running from chewing through chyle and blood to assimilation. Crudity names a failure of such processing, whether associated with distress or with exercise after meals. The vocabulary makes bodily nourishment a succession of transformations rather than a single act in the stomach.

The places. Distress is followed by impaired digestion and crudity. (p. 13; DJR-023-16.) Concoction appears in the account of acquired humours. (p. 14; DJR-023-28.) Natural heat supplies the model for digestion. (p. 20; DJR-024-27.) Boiling, roasting and incomplete roasting are distinguished. (p. 20–21; DJR-024-29.) A fourfold sequence includes conversion into blood. (p. 21; DJR-024-30.) Exercise is discussed in relation to undigested matter. (p. 84–85; DJR-037-17.)

In this edition. "crudity" → "indigestion" (DJR-023-16); "concoction" → "digestive processing" (DJR-023-28); "Elixation" → "Boiling" (DJR-024-29); "Assation" → "Roasting" (DJR-024-29); "Semiustulation" → "incomplete roasting" (DJR-024-29); "Sanguification" → "sanguification" (DJR-024-30); "crudities" → "undigested matter" (DJR-037-17). The cooking terms remain literal equivalents of Burton's analogy. Sanguification is retained with its explanation in the surrounding sentence.

See also. Radical moisture; Chyle; Oppilation; Excrements; Diet and regimen; Distillation and rheum.

Concupiscence

Source forms: concupiscence[13435]

The word. Concupiscence is disordered desire in the theological passage cited here. Its scope is broader than sexual appetite alone.

[13434] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 13 (DJR-023-16); p. 14 (DJR-023-28); p. 20 (DJR-024-27); p. 20–21 (DJR-024-29); p. 21 (DJR-024-30); p. 84–85 (DJR-037-17). Existing edition notes: DJR-023:E11, DJR-023:E20, DJR-024:E24, DJR-024:E26, DJR-024:E27, DJR-037:E11. The sequence and physiology are historical. The entry preserves the source's own classifications, including its reference to first concoction in the liver, without harmonizing them into a modern digestive model.

[13435] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 29 (DJR-026-38). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E29. The assertions about regeneration and the will are those of Burton's theological argument; the definition reports their sense.

In Burton. Burton describes the unregenerate will as turned away from God and its powers as confused. Eating, drinking and sexual desire appear together among the natural matters into which temperament and unruly appetite drive people. Concupiscence supplies the wider name for this disorder of desire.

The places. Natural concupiscence enters the account of the will and spiritual disorder. (p. 29; DJR-026-38.)

In this edition. "natural concupiscence" → "natural concupiscence" (DJR-026-38); "inordinate appetite" → "unruly appetite" (DJR-026-38). The theological term remains, while the surrounding examples and unruly make its force intelligible.

See also. Appetite; Venery; Impotent.

Concupiscible and irascible

Source forms: concupiscible; irascible; irascible appetite[13436]

The word. Concupiscible and irascible name two powers of appetite. The concupiscible seeks pleasant or desired goods and recoils from the unpleasant; the irascible concerns resistance or struggle, including anger and indignation.

In Burton. The initial account gives the pair the English names coveting and anger that attacks or resists. The later discussion of passions reports a division into six passions of the desiring faculty and five of the faculty of struggle. Burton places sorrow first within the irascible appetite, showing why irascible cannot be reduced to ordinary bad temper.

The places. Appetite is divided into two powers. (p. 24–25; DJR-025-27.) The Thomist elevenfold division is reported. (p. 97 [scan p. 197]; DJR-040-02.) Sorrow is placed within the irascible appetite. (p. 96 repeated [scan p. 198]; DJR-040-07.)

In this edition. "Concupiscible" → "concupiscible" (DJR-025-27); "Irascible" → "irascible" (DJR-025-27); "Coveting" → "desiring faculty" (DJR-040-02); "Invading" → "faculty of struggle" (DJR-040-02); "Irascible appetite" → "irascible appetite" (DJR-040-07). The technical names remain linked to explanatory English. Concupiscible is not confined to sexual desire, nor irascible to anger alone. Burton's placement of sorrow does, however, differ from the Thomist classification he has just reported.

See also. Appetite.

Confection

Source forms: confection; confections[13437]

The word. Confection means a compounded medicinal preparation. The word concerns the combining or preparation of medicines, not necessarily a sweet food.

In Burton. Burton cites Ecclesiasticus to justify medicines made from the earth and the apothecary's production of a confection. Later chemical confections include preparations associated with potable gold and mercury. The two passages place compounding within both a scriptural defence of medicine and a debate over chemical practice.

The places. The apothecary makes a medicinal compound. (p. 230; DJR-070-02.) Chemical preparations are praised by Mattioli. (p. 372; DJR-100-44.)

[13436] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 24–25 (DJR-025-27); p. 97 [scan p. 197] (DJR-040-02); p. 96 repeated [scan p. 198] (DJR-040-07). Existing edition notes: DJR-025:E19, DJR-040:E02, DJR-040:E05. DJR-040:E02 identifies Aquinas's division and explains the faculties. DJR-040:E05 notes that Aquinas places sorrow in the concupiscible faculty; Burton's different placement is preserved. Source locators retain the repeated and irregular pagination.

[13437] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 230 (DJR-070-02); p. 372 (DJR-100-44). Existing edition notes: DJR-070:E01, DJR-100:E37. The approval of mineral medicines is attributed to Mattioli. Naming their historical category does not establish their safety or efficacy.

In this edition. “confection” → “compound” (DJR-070-02); “Chymicall Confections” → “chemical preparations” (DJR-100-44). Compound and preparations express the pharmaceutical sense without implying confectionery.

See also. Receipt; Tables.

Confer and conference

Source forms: conference; confer[13438]

The word. Conference can mean conversation. Confer can mean either to converse or to compare; its object and construction distinguish the senses.

In Burton. Conversation is recommended as nourishment for the troubled mind. In the consolation for discontent, conferring oneself with others means comparing circumstances. The love discussion uses confer with the beloved for conversation, then confer hand to hand for comparing appearances. Similar wording thus serves both social exchange and deliberate examination.

The places. Continual conversation is proposed as mental nourishment. (p. 283; DJR-081-30.) People neglect to compare their circumstances with others’. (p. 310; DJR-087-17.) A lover struggles to avoid conversation with the beloved. (p. 551; DJR-135-24.) Comparison of appearances is offered as a test. (p. 558; DJR-136-47.)

In this edition. “continuall conference” → “continual conversation” (DJR-081-30); “confer themselves with others” → “comparing ourselves with them” (DJR-087-17); “confer with them” → “converse with them” (DJR-135-24); “confer hand to hand” → “Compare hand with hand” (DJR-136-47). Conversation, converse and compare follow the separate actions in the passages. Conference does not require a formal meeting.

See also. Action; Conversation; Intention and remission; Impertinent.

Conscience

Source forms: conscience[13439]

The word. Conscience concerns moral judgment and obligation. To make conscience of something is to regard it as a matter of moral scruple; a scrupulous conscience is troubled by excessive doubts.

In Burton. The account of despair connects a scrupulous conscience with a melancholy constitution. Elsewhere making conscience of nothing describes moral insensibility, expressed through the image of searing. The accusation that someone never made conscience of wrongdoing belongs to a sustained rhetorical catalogue. The same vocabulary can therefore describe burdensome doubt or the absence of restraint.

The places. Scrupulous conscience is linked with bodily constitution. (p. 695; DJR-164-09.) Seared consciences are accused of feeling no scruple. (p. 690; DJR-163-01.) Making conscience of wrongdoing appears in an accusatory address. (p. 711; DJR-167-18.)

In this edition. “Conscientia scrupulosa” → “A scrupulous conscience” (DJR-164-09); “make a conscience of nothing” → “feel no scruple about anything” (DJR-163-01); “never mad’st any conscience” → “never had any scruple” (DJR-167-18). Scruple makes the idiom explicit, while scrupulous conscience retains the name of the troubling moral condition.

See also. Reason; Faith and assurance; Synderesis; Satisfaction; Venial sin; Temptation.

[13438] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 283 (DJR-081-30); p. 310 (DJR-087-17); p. 551 (DJR-135-24); p. 558 (DJR-136-47). Existing edition notes: DJR-081:E30, DJR-135:E22, DJR-136:E41. DJR-135:E22 and DJR-136:E41 distinguish the two verbal senses and preserve the qualifications in the love passages.

[13439] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 695 (DJR-164-09); p. 690 (DJR-163-01); p. 711 (DJR-167-18). Existing edition notes: DJR-163:E01, DJR-164:E08, DJR-167:E18. DJR-164:E08 leaves the exact Navarrus reference for collation. DJR-167:E18 cautions that the accumulated accusations do not establish the conduct of a particular person.

Consent and essence

Source forms: consent; by essence; by consent; Essence[13440]

The word. By essence means that a disorder originates in the affected part itself. By consent means that it affects that part through sympathy or communication with another part; consent here is physiological connection rather than agreement.

In Burton. Burton compares the mind's harmful effects on the body with bodily disease affecting the soul by consent. The symptom classification then distinguishes illness originating in the head from a brain affected through another part. The latter account traces the disturbance to the womb and its supposed vapours. The pair identifies proposed origins and routes of affection.

The places. Body and soul affect one another by sympathy. (p. 173; DJR-056-47.) Signs are assigned to illness originating in the head. (p. 198; DJR-062-04.) The brain is said to be affected through another bodily part. (p. 202; DJR-062-30.)

In this edition. "by consent" → "through their mutual sympathy" (DJR-056-47); "by essence in the head" → "originates in the head itself" (DJR-062-04); "not in essence, but by consent" → "through sympathy with another part, rather than through a disorder originating in itself" (DJR-062-30). The expanded rendering makes the distinction legible without turning consent into a mental choice.

See also. Hypochondria; Cause.

Constancy

Source forms: constantly; constancy[13441]

The word. Constancy means firmness or steadfastness. Constantly can describe the strength of a belief or resolution rather than how often something happens.

In Burton. Elionora Meliorina constantly believes herself married to a king: the adverb marks conviction. The account of Atticus uses it for settled resolution, while the advice on calming the mind recommends constancy alongside cheerfulness and hope. Firmness can therefore qualify a mistaken belief, a determined action or a sustaining disposition; it does not itself establish that its object is sound.

The places. A reported belief is held firmly. (p. 194; DJR-061-05.) Atticus maintains a settled resolution. (p. 217; DJR-066-09.) Steadfastness is recommended in calming the mind. (p. 289; DJR-083-03.)

In this edition. "constantly beleeved" → "firmly believed" (DJR-061-05); "constantly" → "steadfastly" (DJR-066-09); "constancy" → "steadfastness" (DJR-083-03). Firmly and steadfastly preserve the manner of belief or action. Continually would suggest duration or repetition instead.

See also. Happiness and fortune.

Continence

Source forms: incontinent; inforced temperance; incontinency; contain; continency[13442]

The word. Continence is self-restraint, often specifically sexual restraint. Incontinent and incontinency can denote its absence. Contain can mean restrain more generally, as its object requires.

[13440] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 173 (DJR-056-47); p. 198 (DJR-062-04); p. 202 (DJR-062-30). Existing edition notes: DJR-056:E38, DJR-062:E03, DJR-062:E26. The explanation concerns historical physiology, including the gendered theory of uterine vapours. It does not endorse those causal claims.

[13441] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 194 (DJR-061-05); p. 217 (DJR-066-09); p. 289 (DJR-083-03). Existing edition notes: DJR-061:E04, DJR-066:E09, DJR-083:E02. The Atticus passage reports a historical example within Burton's discussion; the lexical sense of steadfastly is not an endorsement of the action described.

[13442] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 201 (DJR-062-21); p. 205 (DJR-063-15); p. 208 (DJR-064-10); p. 313–314 (DJR-088-14); p. 422–423 (DJR-110-32). Existing edition notes: DJR-062:E19, DJR-063:E15, DJR-064:E10, DJR-088:E13, DJR-110:E25. The allegations against religious houses are Burton's polemical claims. The physiological explanation of sexual desire likewise remains historical; neither is established by defining continence.

In Burton. The medical passages call some patients incontinent and offer bodily explanations of sexual desire. Burton's polemic against compulsory celibacy calls it enforced temperance. Elsewhere authority fails to contain people in general, while the story of Abdolominus praises continency among qualities fitting a ruler. The term therefore extends beyond sexual abstinence to command of conduct.

The places. Incontinent qualifies sexual conduct. (p. 201; DJR-062-21.) Enforced temperance names compulsory sexual restraint. (p. 205; DJR-063-15.) Incontinency receives a humoral explanation. (p. 208; DJR-064-10.) Authorities fail to restrain people. (p. 313–314; DJR-088-14.) Self-restraint is praised in a future king. (p. 422–423; DJR-110-32.)

In this edition. "incontinent" → "sexually unrestrained" (DJR-062-21); "inforced temperance" → "enforced continence" (DJR-063-15); "incontinency" → "Sexual incontinence" (DJR-064-10); "contain us" → "restrain us" (DJR-088-14); "continency" → "self-restraint" (DJR-110-32). The sexual qualification is stated where the context requires it. General restraint remains general in the passages about conduct and kingship.

See also. Venery.

Contingence

Source forms: contingence[13443]

The word. Contingence denotes events that need not occur as they do. In the cited polemic it is set against providential government.

In Burton. Burton accuses a group of thinkers of attributing everything to natural causes and contingency while treating religion as fiction. The phrase reports the position he attacks, alongside hostile descriptions attributed to Melanchthon and Vanini. It should not be detached from that argumentative setting and treated as a neutral survey of those writers' philosophies.

The places. Contingency is invoked in the attack on denials of providence. (p. 687; DJR-162-14.)

In this edition. "contingence of all things" → "contingency of all things" (DJR-162-14). Contingency modernizes the noun while preserving the conceptual claim attributed to Burton's opponents.

See also. Cause.

Conversation

Source forms: conversation; converse[13444]

The word. Conversation can mean conduct or manner of life. Converse can mean associate or have dealings with someone, a broader activity than speaking alone.

In Burton. Burton warns that people repeat the ruin caused by others' bad conversation: their conduct, not merely their talk. In the discussion of spirits, familiar converse with humans is an alleged habitual association that includes being seen and heard. The object and accompanying actions establish the breadth of each sense.

The places. Bad conduct provides an example others fail to heed. (p. 25; DJR-008-18.) Spirits are said to associate familiarly with people. (p. 41; DJR-028-47.)

In this edition. "bad conversation" → "bad conduct" (DJR-008-18); "familiarly converse with men" → "associate familiarly with human beings" (DJR-028-47). Conduct and associate prevent the passages from being narrowed to conversation in its usual modern sense.

[13443] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 687 (DJR-162-14). Existing edition notes: DJR-162:E14. DJR-162:E14 explains the term and records that the marginal Vanini locator still requires collation.

[13444] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 25 (DJR-008-18); p. 41 (DJR-028-47). Existing edition notes: DJR-008:E16. The asserted familiarity of spirits is part of Burton's reported evidence. This entry identifies the verb's meaning without independently verifying the encounters.

See also. Entertain; Carriage; Confer and conference; Custom and education; Complement; Gossip.

Cordial

Source forms: cordial[13445]

The word. Cordial describes a remedy or substance thought to strengthen or cheer the heart. Its force here is medicinal rather than socially friendly.

In Burton. Burton reports that jewels and precious stones calm the emotions, then calls small pearls very cordial and explains their effect as exhilaration of the heart. The neighbouring phrase supplies the sense directly: the heart is the proposed seat and beneficiary of the action.

The places. Pearls are credited with strengthening and cheering the heart. (p. 371; DJR-100-35.)

In this edition. "very cordial" → "very strengthening to the heart" (DJR-100-35). The expanded phrase gives the intended medicinal action rather than leaving cordial open to its modern social meaning.

See also. Alteratives; Aqua vitae; Virtue; Comfortable.

Corrected medicines

Source forms: corrected[13446]

The word. A corrected medicine is one prepared or combined so as to counteract properties considered harmful. Correction names an operation of medical art.

In Burton. Burton distinguishes medicines that help one person but harm another from substances harmful in themselves that become beneficial when corrected. He uses this distinction to explain why skilled physicians must manage remedies according to rules and particular purposes. The word concerns preparation of the medicine, not correction of a written prescription.

The places. Medical preparation is said to alter harmful properties. (p. 230; DJR-070-03.)

In this edition. "corrected by art" → "properly prepared" (DJR-070-03). Properly prepared supplies the pharmaceutical sense. The surrounding sentence retains Burton's claim about the resulting benefit.

See also. Alteratives.

Corrosive

Source forms: corsives; corrosive[13447]

The word. A corrosive is something that eats away. Burton transfers the physical action to persistent trouble or mental pain; corsives is a shortened form.

In Burton. Households have corsives just as commonwealths do, extending the bodily analogy across forms of social life. In the account of injury, continual brooding turns the hurt into a perpetual corrosive. The image emphasizes distress that continues to consume the sufferer rather than a single passing blow.

The places. Household troubles are compared with those of political communities. (p. 68; DJR-017-19.) Dwelling on an injury makes it a persistent corrosive. (p. 150; DJR-051-41.)

[13445] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 371 (DJR-100-35). Existing edition notes: DJR-100:E29. The virtues of pearls and other stones are attributed to Burton's authorities. The lexical explanation does not establish their therapeutic efficacy.

[13446] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 230 (DJR-070-03). Existing edition notes: DJR-070:E02. This is the historical purpose claimed for correction, not a guarantee that the substances or processes described elsewhere are safe.

[13447] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 68 (DJR-017-19); p. 150 (DJR-051-41). Existing edition notes: DJR-017:E12, DJR-051:E36.

In this edition. “corsives” → “corrosive troubles” (DJR-017-19); “perpetual corrosive” → “perpetual corrosive” (DJR-051-41). Corrosive troubles explains the abbreviated plural, while the later metaphor remains intact.

See also. Jealousy.

Costiveness

Source forms: costiveness; costivenesse[13448]

The word. Costiveness means constipation or retention of the ordinary bowel waste. Costivenesse is a spelling variant.

In Burton. Burton places costiveness first among the forms of retention discussed as causes of melancholy. In the symptom catalogue, it appears with poor digestion, undigested matter and obstructions. The same condition can thus occupy a place in the causal discussion and in the description of a patient’s bodily troubles.

The places. Costiveness is placed under retention and evacuation. (p. 78; DJR-036-05.) Constipation appears among nutritive disturbances. (p. 180; DJR-058-15.)

In this edition. “Costiveness” → “constipation” (DJR-036-05); “costivenesse” → “constipation” (DJR-058-15). Constipation gives the direct modern equivalent for both spellings.

See also. Purging.

Counterfeit

Source forms: counterfeit[13449]

The word. Counterfeit can be a noun for a person pretending or acting a part. The particular role must be supplied by context.

In Burton. In the reported treatment of a man who believes he is dead, another person is placed nearby as a supposed corpse and made to eat. The patient addresses this counterfeit and then imitates him. The noun identifies the staged performer, not the patient or a forged object.

The places. A man acts the part of a corpse in a therapeutic deception. (p. 298; DJR-084-37.)

In this edition. “the counterfeit” → “the pretended corpse” (DJR-084-37). Pretended corpse names the role and keeps the two people in the anecdote distinct.

See also. Abraham men; Mountebank; Habit and disposition.

Crased

Source forms: crased; crasie; crazed[13450]

The word. Crased, crasie and crazed can describe impairment, infirmity or broken bodily health. The word family is not confined to mental derangement.

In Burton. A sustained habit of imagining ends with fancy crased: the Latin phrase immediately calls the imagination injured. The portrait of unhappy wealth describes people as crasie among other bodily complaints. In consolation for bereavement, crazed accompanies sickly and the image of an exhausted traveller. The affected subject determines whether impaired or frail is appropriate.

[13448] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 78 (DJR-036-05); p. 180 (DJR-058-15). Existing edition notes: DJR-036:E03, DJR-058:E13. Burton’s causal account of melancholy remains distinct from the lexical identification of constipation.

[13449] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 298 (DJR-084-37). Existing edition notes: DJR-084:E35. The recovery is a reported outcome attributed to Forestus. Explaining counterfeit does not independently confirm the case or the effectiveness of the device.

[13450] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 196 (DJR-061-18); p. 321 (DJR-089-40); p. 345 (DJR-095-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-061:E14.

The places. Fancy is described as injured or impaired. (p. 196; DJR-061-18.) The outward splendour of wealth conceals infirmity. (p. 321; DJR-089-40.) The deceased is imagined remaining frail and sickly. (p. 345; DJR-095-05.)

In this edition. “crased” → “impaired” (DJR-061-18); “crasie” → “infirm” (DJR-089-40); “crazed and sickly” → “frail and sickly” (DJR-095-05). The equivalents keep the bodily senses from becoming unintended claims of mental illness.

See also. Stupid; Madness.

Cure

Source forms: cure[13451]

The word. Cure can mean a pastoral charge: the care of a congregation entrusted to a clergyman. Here it identifies the church appointment or parish so served.

In Burton. Burton concludes a satirical account of patronage with the matching pair of patron and clergyman, like a lid fitted to a dish. The declaration that the cure is well supplied belongs to that irony. It concerns filling a pastoral office, not curing a disease.

The places. A patron and clergyman are matched in a satirical conclusion. (p. 142 [printed 128]; DJR-049-30.)

In this edition. “the cure is well supplied” → “The parish is well provided for” (DJR-049-30). Parish makes the institutional sense clear, while the apparently satisfied conclusion retains the satire.

See also. Church patronage.

Curiosity

Source forms: nice; curious; curiously; curiosity; curious Wroks[13452]

The word. Curious and curiosity range from painstaking attention and elaborate workmanship to excessive scruple or misplaced inquiry. The word family does not always carry the modern neutral sense of wanting to learn.

In Burton. Burton attacks nice and curious schismatics as over-scrupulous, but curious crosses and curious works concern elaborate or fine making. Curiously describes a mother’s scrupulous observance, while curiosity is expressly defined as tyrannical preoccupation with useless or forbidden things. His refusal to torture a patient for observation uses curious for excessively painstaking investigation. These judgments depend on the activity and its purpose.

The places. Religious scrupulosity is criticized. (p. 29; DJR-009-15.) Crosses are described as elaborate. (p. 29; DJR-009-12.) Craftsmanship sustains a trading city. (p. 55; DJR-014-31.) An observance is carried out scrupulously. (p. 147 [sequence; printed 143]; DJR-050-33.) Curiosity is defined as excessive or forbidden inquiry. (p. 166; DJR-055-16.) Painstaking observation is associated with cruelty. (p. 178; DJR-058-03.)

In this edition. “nice & curious” → “over-scrupulous” (DJR-009-15); “curious crosses” → “elaborate crosses” (DJR-009-12); “curious Wroks” → “fine craftsmanship” (DJR-014-31); “curiously” → “scrupulously” (DJR-050-33); “Curiosity” → “curiosity” (DJR-055-16); “curious” → “painstaking” (DJR-058-03). The modern column separates workmanship, exactness and misplaced inquiry. Where curiosity remains, Burton’s explicit definition supplies its critical sense.

[13451] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 142 [printed 128] (DJR-049-30). Existing edition notes: DJR-049:E25. The locator preserves the source’s printed-page discrepancy: sequence page 142 is printed 128.

[13452] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 29 (DJR-009-15); p. 29 (DJR-009-12); p. 55 (DJR-014-31); p. 147 [sequence; printed 143] (DJR-050-33); p. 166 (DJR-055-16); p. 178 (DJR-058-03). Existing edition notes: DJR-009:E13, DJR-009:E16, DJR-050:E27, DJR-055:E15, DJR-058:E02. The religious judgments are Burton’s polemic. Wroks is the form in the edited original passage and remains visible among the source forms.

See also. Nice; Precise; Scruple; Art.

Custom and education

Source forms: tuition; informed; discipline; inform; informs[13453]

The word. The vocabulary of education includes tuition as care or guardianship, discipline as training, and inform as teaching or giving form. Custom names the habitual practice through which dispositions develop.

In Burton. Burton warns guardians against excessive severity and criticizes schooling that produces a learned fool or sickly scholar. Later custom, discipline and education help explain differences among symptoms, while acquired habits can worsen the will's condition. Inform extends from teaching a person to giving life its proper form in the contrast between kinds of love. These terms concern the shaping of a person, not merely the transmission of information.

The places. Tuition is the care and supervision of children. (p. 148 [sequence; printed 144]; DJR-050-40.) A child is entrusted to a schoolmaster to be informed. (p. 149 [sequence; printed 145]; DJR-050-55.) Training and custom shape individual dispositions. (p. 194; DJR-061-02.) Training and custom can form bad habits. (p. 29–30; DJR-026-40.) Inform means teach in the discussion of remarriage. (p. 345; DJR-095-07.) Divine love is said to give life its proper form. (p. 428; DJR-111-39.)

In this edition. "tuition and oversight" → "care and supervision" (DJR-050-40); "informed" → "educated" (DJR-050-55); "discipline" → "training" (DJR-061-02); "Custom" → "custom" (DJR-026-40); "inform another" → "teach another" (DJR-095-07); "informs" → "gives our life its proper form" (DJR-111-39). Care, training, educated and teach specify the personal actions; proper form retains the explicit opposition between informs and deforms.

See also. Commonwealth; Conversation.

Daemon and genius

Source forms: genius; substantiæ separatæ; dæmones; Genii; starve his Genius; starve their Genius; familiarem dæmonem[13454]

The word. Daemon can name a spirit without necessarily implying an evil Christian devil. Genius can be an attendant or guardian spirit, but in the idiom starve one's genius it refers to denying one's own enjoyment or comforts.

In Burton. Burton explicitly distinguishes the broad classical name for spirits from their goodness or evil, and gathers traditions of tutelary and familiar spirits. His self-description makes melancholy an evil genius, while the criticism of avarice and account of poverty use starving one's genius for self-denial. In the discussion of Plotinus, Divell represents the ancient philosophical daemon. These contexts require different English renderings.

The places. Melancholy is personified as an evil genius. (p. 5; DJR-003-08.) Classical spirit names are distinguished from moral character. (p. 39; DJR-028-25.) Genii are described as guardians. (p. 40; DJR-028-31.) Familiar spirits are said to instruct notable people. (p. 52; DJR-031-09.) A miser denies himself enjoyment. (p. 115; DJR-044-06.) Hardship forces people to deny themselves comforts. (p. 157–158; DJR-053-13.) Spirit appears among the philosophical accounts of love. (p. 412; DJR-108-29.)

[13453] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 148 [sequence; printed 144] (DJR-050-40); p. 149 [sequence; printed 145] (DJR-050-55); p. 194 (DJR-061-02); p. 29–30 (DJR-026-40); p. 345 (DJR-095-07); p. 428 (DJR-111-39). Existing edition notes: DJR-050:E42, DJR-061:E01, DJR-095:E04, DJR-111:E34. The account of a husband teaching a wife reflects the passage's hierarchical assumptions. The lexical explanation preserves rather than silently endorses them.

[13454] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 5 (DJR-003-08); p. 39 (DJR-028-25); p. 40 (DJR-028-31); p. 52 (DJR-031-09); p. 115 (DJR-044-06); p. 157–158 (DJR-053-13); p. 412 (DJR-108-29). Existing edition notes: DJR-003:E11, DJR-003:E12, DJR-028:E16, DJR-028:E21, DJR-031:E07, DJR-044:E05, DJR-053:E12, DJR-108:E23. DJR-031:E07 distinguishes traditions Burton groups together. DJR-108:E23 identifies the opening of Plotinus's Enneads 3.5.1 and keeps Burton's following conclusion as his own summary.

In this edition. “malus genius” → “evil spirit” (DJR-003-08); “substantiæ separatæ” → “Separate substances” (DJR-028-25); “dæmones” → “daimones” (DJR-028-25); “boni and mali Genii” → “good and evil guardian spirits” (DJR-028-31); “familiarem dæmonem” → “familiar spirit” (DJR-031-09); “starve his Genius” → “starving his own appetite for enjoyment” (DJR-044-06); “starve their Genius” → “deny themselves” (DJR-053-13); “a God or a Divell” → “a god, a spirit” (DJR-108-29). Spirit and guardian spirit preserve distinctions obscured by a uniform devil. The idiomatic renderings of starve one’s genius retain their concern with ordinary enjoyment.

See also. Demonic apparitions; Obsession and possession; Incubus; Bugbear; Ecstasy.

Decoction

Source forms: decoction[13455]

The word. A decoction is a preparation made by boiling material in liquid. The name identifies a method of preparation rather than a particular ingredient.

In Burton. Randolotius is said to have drunk a decoction of wormwood after an upsetting incident brought on a hypochondriacal attack while he was copying medical notes. Wormwood names the ingredient; decoction specifies the form in which it was taken.

The places. A decoction of wormwood appears in a reported personal case. (p. 177; DJR-057-43.)

In this edition. “decoction of wormwood” → “decoction of wormwood” (DJR-057-43). The precise preparation term remains, with its meaning supplied here.

See also. Receipt.

Defecate

Source forms: defecate[13456]

The word. Defecate can mean to clarify a liquid or remove its dregs. This older sense differs from the usual modern reference to bowel evacuation.

In Burton. In discussing stagnant water and brewing, Burton reports an opinion that boiling defecates it and improves its substance and flavour. His final qualification calls the claim a paradox. The verb concerns clarification in a disputed account of water or beer, not a bodily action.

The places. Boiling is said to clarify water used in brewing. (p. 71; DJR-034-39.)

In this edition. “seething doth defecate it” → “boiling clarifies it” (DJR-034-39). Clarifies supplies the appropriate process; boiling also modernizes seething. The surrounding qualification remains.

See also. Concoction; Excrements.

Demonic apparitions

Source forms: spectrums; Ambulones; puck; spectrum; lay[13457]

The word. Spectrum and spectrums name an apparition or apparitions. Ambulones are wanderers; pucks are spirits said to mislead travellers. To lay spirits means to quiet or dismiss them, paired here with raising or summoning them.

[13455] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 177 (DJR-057-43). Existing edition notes: DJR-057:E37. The relief is a reported historical outcome, not a verified result or a recommendation to use wormwood.

[13456] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 71 (DJR-034-39). Burton attributes the opinion to Cardan and marks it as contrary to received opinion. The article establishes the verbal sense, not the quality of the proposed brewing water.

[13457] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 41 (DJR-028-40); p. 49 (DJR-030-34); p. 88 (DJR-038-09); p. 146 (DJR-051-08); p. 49 (DJR-030-33). Existing edition notes: DJR-028:E26, DJR-028:E27, DJR-030:E25, DJR-038:E04, DJR-051:E06. The article explains reported beliefs and images. It neither verifies supernatural agency nor assigns a modern diagnosis to the people described.

In Burton. Burton's spirit survey lists deceptive sights and describes midnight wanderers on heaths. The solitude passage turns the puck's circular leading into a simile for enthralling thoughts. Later a spectrum can frighten someone, alongside imitation devils used in jokes. The vocabulary crosses reported supernatural events, figurative description and staged appearances; the entry heading does not settle their reality.

The places. Apparitions occur among sights allegedly produced by spirits. (p. 41; DJR-028-40.) Wandering spirits are called Pucks. (p. 49; DJR-030-34.) A puck's leading becomes a simile for absorbing thoughts. (p. 88; DJR-038-09.) A sudden apparition is described as a source of terror. (p. 146; DJR-051-08.) Necromancers claim to raise and lay spirits. (p. 49; DJR-030-33.)

In this edition. "spectrums" → "apparitions" (DJR-028-40); "Ambulones" → "Ambulones, "wanderers,"" (DJR-030-34); "a Puck" → "a puck" (DJR-038-09); "spectrum" → "ghost" (DJR-051-08); "raise and lay them" → "summon and dismiss these spirits" (DJR-030-33). Apparitions and ghost give the local senses of spectrum; summon and dismiss make the paired actions clear. Puck remains a named kind of figure, with the story qualification preserved.

See also. Daemon and genius.

Despair

Source forms: Despair[13458]

The word. Despair is the loss or rejection of hope and comfort. Burton reports a theological distinction between final despair, persisting to the end, and temporary despair, which may pass.

In Burton. The classification expressly allows temporary despair to afflict the best of God's children. Its description as rejection of hope for a time is therefore essential to the argument, not an incidental qualification. The later catalogue of fatal outcomes records particular cases attributed to Platter; it does not show that every person called despairing follows that course.

The places. Final and temporary despair are distinguished. (p. 694; DJR-163-40.) Particular fatal cases are attributed to Platter. (p. 704; DJR-166-04.)

In this edition. "final and temporal" → "final and temporary despair" (DJR-163-40); "rejection of hope and comfort for a time" → "rejection of hope and comfort for a time" (DJR-163-40); "desperate as he was" → "in despair" (DJR-166-04). Temporary makes temporal clear. Despair names the condition described without supplying a present-day clinical diagnosis.

See also. Sorrow; Desperate; Faith and assurance; Grace; Salvation; Scruple.

Desperate

Source forms: desperate[13459]

The word. Desperate can mean despairing, but it can also mean recklessly heedless. It does not by itself specify a suicidal act.

In Burton. In the jealousy cases, desperate describes people who have fallen into despair, with different behaviours narrated separately. The religious classification likewise calls excessively distrustful and fearful people desperate. A later denunciation joins desperate with secure and excessive pleasure: there the sense is reckless disregard rather than afflicted hopelessness. The immediate contrast governs the reading.

[13458] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 694 (DJR-163-40); p. 704 (DJR-166-04). Existing edition notes: DJR-163:E38, DJR-166:E02. DJR-163:E38 explains final and reprobate as theological terms. DJR-166:E02 warns that the examples do not establish the frequency of these outcomes among the broader group.

[13459] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 614 (DJR-148-12); p. 683 (DJR-161-29); p. 684 (DJR-161-49). Existing edition notes: DJR-148:E10, DJR-161:E29, DJR-161:E49. DJR-148:E10 and DJR-161:E29 explain the despairing sense; DJR-161:E49 distinguishes the heedless sense. Historical case summaries remain free of added modern diagnoses.

The places. Despair follows jealousy in several reported cases. (p. 614; DJR-148-12.) Desperate persons are excessively distrustful and fearful. (p. 683; DJR-161-29.) Desperate accompanies complacency and reckless indulgence. (p. 684; DJR-161-49.)

In this edition. "became desperate" → "fell into despair" (DJR-148-12); "desperate persons" → "despairing people" (DJR-161-29); "so desperate" → "so reckless" (DJR-161-49). Despairing and reckless preserve two different senses. Actions described in individual cases are not imported into every occurrence of the adjective.

See also. Despair; Secure; Feral; Make away.

Diet and regimen

Source forms: diet; regiment[13460]

The word. Diet can mean food or board supplied as part of someone's maintenance. Regiment can mean a regimen, a plan or ordered account for preserving health.

In Burton. A poorly rewarded scholar receives a small wage and his diet: the food included with his employment, not a programme of restriction. In the pharmaceutical discussion, a physician's regiment of health names the kind of work in which a remedy is reported. The first usage concerns provision; the second, the organization of health care.

The places. Food is included in a scholar's meagre remuneration. (p. 131; DJR-047-12.) A remedy is cited from a regimen of health. (p. 375; DJR-101-23.)

In this edition. "his diet" → "his food" (DJR-047-12); "regiment of health" → "Regimen of Health" (DJR-101-23). Food states the employment benefit directly. Regimen removes the misleading association of regiment with a military unit.

See also. Concoction; Non naturals; Luxurious and riot; Meat.

Distillation and rheum

Source forms: distillation; rheume[13461]

The word. Distillation here is a downward flow of rheum or catarrhal fluid. Rheum names a bodily discharge, especially mucus. These passages concern the historical account of bodily fluids rather than the preparation of a distilled medicine.

In Burton. Burton compares neglected emotional disturbances with a recurring discharge that becomes a wasting disease of the lungs. The comparison explains how a passing disturbance can harden into an established condition. In the later description of melancholic patients, rheum is one symptom among sleepiness, spitting and a particular complexion.

The places. Repeated discharge supplies an analogy for repeated emotional disturbance. (p. 12–13; DJR-023-15.) Rheum appears in a description of melancholic patients. (p. 191; DJR-060-17.)

In this edition. "one Distillation" → "a single catarrhal discharge" (DJR-023-15); "rheume" → "rheum" (DJR-060-17). Catarrhal discharge makes the first sense explicit. Rheum remains in the later passage and is explained in its local note and here.

See also. Concoction.

[13460] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 131 (DJR-047-12); p. 375 (DJR-101-23). Existing edition notes: DJR-047:E11, DJR-101:E21. The reported action of borage is a historical claim in the cited passage, not established by identifying the title's terminology.

[13461] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 12–13 (DJR-023-15); p. 191 (DJR-060-17). Existing edition notes: DJR-023:E10, DJR-060:E16. DJR-023:E10 identifies the comparison in Seneca, Moral Letters 75.12, while recording differences in Burton's citation and wording. The proposed progression of bodily disease belongs to the historical analogy.

Distraction

Source forms: distracted[13462]

The word. Distraction can mean mental disturbance or derangement. Distracted in this passage means distraught, with a force stronger than momentary inattention.

In Burton. The first-person verse approaches madness by a hair's breadth. Burton prints Latin lines and then an English version whose final word, distracted, describes the speaker's present distress. Preserving both versions allows their related but not identical wording to remain visible.

The places. The Latin verse describes proximity to madness. (p. 543; DJR-133-51.) The accompanying English verse ends with distracted. (p. 543; DJR-133-52.)

In this edition. "now distracted" → "already distraught" (DJR-133-52). Distraught conveys the disturbance without turning the line into a statement about poor concentration. The neighbouring references to madness retain their force.

See also. Madness.

Divination

Source forms: metoposcopy; cheiromancy; Πυρομαντεία; ὑδρομαντεία; chiromancy[13463]

The word. Divination interprets signs to obtain otherwise hidden knowledge. The selected terms distinguish methods: metoposcopy reads the forehead, chiromancy or cheiromancy the hand, pyromancy fire, and hydromancy water.

In Burton. The synopsis and section heading group bodily signs with astrology. Elsewhere, Burton associates divination by fire and water with reported spirit worship. That association is part of his account; the word for a divinatory practice does not itself mean worship.

The places. The synopsis groups bodily signs with the stars. (p. 98; DJR-020-25.) Divination by fire appears in the survey of spirits. (p. 46; DJR-029-50.) Divination by water is associated with sacrifice. (p. 47; DJR-030-14.) The section heading retains the specialist names. (p. 57; DJR-032-01.)

In this edition. "Metoposcopy" → "reading the forehead" (DJR-020-25); "Cheiromancy" → "palmistry" (DJR-020-25); "Πυρομαντεία" → "divination by fire" (DJR-029-50); "ὑδρομαντεία" → "hydromancy" (DJR-030-14); "Metoposcopy, Chiromancy" → "metoposcopy and chiromancy" (DJR-032-01). Plain explanations in the synopsis accompany retained technical names in the heading. The two presentations refer to the same practices.

See also. Astrology.

Divine

Source forms: Divine; divine Seneca; divines[13464]

The word. As a noun, a divine is a theologian or member of the clergy. As an adjective, divine can express elevated praise. The grammatical distinction matters when Burton applies the word to himself and to Seneca.

[13462] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 543 (DJR-133-51); p. 543 (DJR-133-52). Existing edition notes: DJR-133:E35. The verse's source and speaker remain unidentified. DJR-133:E35 explains why the nearby Lucian reference does not securely identify it.

[13463] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 98 (DJR-020-25); p. 46 (DJR-029-50); p. 47 (DJR-030-14); p. 57 (DJR-032-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-020:E19, DJR-029:E30, DJR-030:E11, DJR-032:E01. The supposed predictive or diagnostic power belongs to Burton's historical argument. The correction of the Boece syntax in DJR-030-14 is separately documented in DJR-030:E11; it does not authenticate the supernatural explanation.

[13464] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 3 (DJR-002-01); p. 5 (DJR-003-05); p. 135 (DJR-048-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-002:E01, DJR-002:E02, DJR-003:E06, DJR-003:E07, DJR-048:E01. DJR-003:E06 records only a possible Senecan parallel for Burton's saying. DJR-048:E01 explains that the preacher's description as a bishop "now" belongs to an earlier stage of Burton's text.

In Burton. Burton identifies theology as his profession while describing his appetite for many subjects. His lament for poorly supported divines concerns the clergy. Calling Seneca divine, however, praises a classical writer; it does not assign Seneca a Christian clerical profession.

The places. Burton identifies his profession. (p. 3; DJR-002-01.) Divine praises Seneca. (p. 5; DJR-003-05.) Divines names the distressed clergy. (p. 135; DJR-048-01.)

In this edition. "a Divine" → "a theologian" (DJR-002-01); "divine Seneca" → "divine Seneca" (DJR-003-05); "our Divines" → "our clergy" (DJR-048-01). Theologian and clergy specify the noun's institutional senses. The adjective remains, with its rhetorical sense explained by the note.

See also. Casuists; Schoolmen; Professor; Humane learning.

Dotage

Source forms: dotage; dote; still dotage[13465]

The word. Dotage can name delusion or disordered reasoning; to dote can mean to lose reason or become delirious. It need not imply old age. Still dotage means quiet mental derangement, with still describing its subdued character.

In Burton. The prefatory catalogue includes dotage among the many literal and figurative senses gathered under melancholy. A reported case concerns a young man who suddenly loses his reason. In another definition, still dotage accompanies sorrow and bodily pain that come and go in fits.

The places. Dotage appears in the broad catalogue of melancholy. (p. 18; DJR-007-08.) A young man is said to begin to dote. (p. 56; DJR-031-53.) Still dotage belongs to an intermittent condition. (p. 202; DJR-062-32.)

In this edition. "dotage" → "delusion" (DJR-007-08); "began to dote on a sudden" → "he suddenly lost his reason" (DJR-031-53); "still dotage" → "quiet mental derangement" (DJR-062-32). The renderings distinguish delusion, an abrupt loss of reason and a quiet disturbance. They avoid making advanced age part of each occurrence.

See also. Madness; Silly.

Dowry and jointure

Source forms: dowers; portion; indotatus; joynters[13466]

The word. A dowry or marriage portion is property brought into a marriage. Jointure names property or income settled for a wife, especially for her widowhood. Dowers in the cited proposal means dowries; the local sense should not be replaced by the distinct legal sense of a widow's dower.

In Burton. Burton's imagined social order regulates marriage payments, while his account of household burdens lists jointures among financial obligations. The poverty of learning receives two marriage metaphors: the Muses lack portions, and an unappointed scholar is indotatus, without a dowry —that is, without money to secure advancement.

The places. The proposed commonwealth regulates dowries. (p. 66; DJR-017-05.) Jointures appear among charges on a household. (p. 69; DJR-017-32.) The Muses lack marriage portions. (p. 133; DJR-047-27.) An impoverished scholar is called indotatus. (p. 142 [printed 128]; DJR-049-28.)

In this edition. "great dowers" → "large dowries" (DJR-017-05); "joynters" → "jointures" (DJR-017-32); "no portion" → "no dowries" (DJR-047-27); "indotatus" → "without a dowry" (DJR-049-28).

[13465] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 18 (DJR-007-08); p. 56 (DJR-031-53); p. 202 (DJR-062-32). Existing edition notes: DJR-007:E09, DJR-031:E35, DJR-062:E28. The magical and medical reports in DJR-031-53 remain reported cases, not independently verified diagnoses. DJR-062:E28 also distinguishes bodily pain from the emotional sense of grief.

[13466] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 66 (DJR-017-05); p. 69 (DJR-017-32); p. 133 (DJR-047-27); p. 142 [printed 128] (DJR-049-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-017:E03, DJR-017:E15, DJR-047:E25, DJR-049:E23. The article describes the historical vocabulary and Burton's proposal. The locator for DJR-049-28 preserves the source's misprinted page number.

Dowry clarifies both the financial arrangement and the satire. Jointure remains as the more specific provision and is explained locally.

See also. Affinity and consanguinity; Venery; Suit; Mistress; Legal evidence.

Eclegme

Source forms: eclegmes[13467]

The word. An eclegme is a medicine taken by licking, also called a lincture or linctus. The name identifies a form of administration within the list of prepared medicines.

In Burton. The synopsis places eclegmes among compounds taken internally. They occur with theriac and mithridate under confections in the thicker branch of liquid preparations. Their position in the scheme helps explain why a general word such as medicine alone would lose useful information.

The places. Eclegmes occur in the synopsis of compound medicines. (scan p. 324; DJR-067-15.)

In this edition. "Eclegmes or Linctures" → "medicines taken by licking, or linctuses" (DJR-067-15). The modern wording gives both the action and a related technical term, allowing the reader to follow the classification.

See also. Receipt.

Ecstasy

Source forms: extasies; Extasie; Extasis[13468]

The word. Ecstasy names a trance or a state beyond ordinary awareness. Intense happiness is not an adequate general gloss here. Burton also allows a favourable spiritual sense before distinguishing harmful excess or abuse.

In Burton. The early classification describes states in which people are said to deliver oracles. Another narrative includes trance among a woman's reported fits. In religious melancholy, Burton explicitly grants the value of temperance and contemplation, describing ecstasy as a foretaste of heavenly happiness, before turning to its abuse.

The places. Ecstasy is linked with reported divination. (p. 9; DJR-022-23.) Trance occurs among the reported fits. (p. 53–54; DJR-031-25.) Spiritual ecstasy is distinguished from its abuse. (p. 656; DJR-156-10.)

In this edition. "Extasie" → "ecstasy" (DJR-022-23); "extasies" → "trance" (DJR-031-25); "Extasis is a taste of future happiness" → "Ecstasy is a taste of future happiness" (DJR-156-10). Trance clarifies the narrative symptom; ecstasy remains where the philosophical or spiritual category matters. The favourable qualification in the later passage is retained.

See also. Madness; Daemon and genius.

Election

Source forms: elections; election of times; election[13469]

[13467] Editor. Edited source passages: scan p. 324 (DJR-067-15). Existing edition notes: DJR-067:E06. This is a synopsis leaf cited by scan page. DJR-067:E06 explains its separate subsection-number correction and the senses of theriac, mithridate and thicker preparations. The term does not establish a preparation's effectiveness.

[13468] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 9 (DJR-022-23); p. 53–54 (DJR-031-25); p. 656 (DJR-156-10). Existing edition notes: DJR-022:E20, DJR-031:E18, DJR-156:E10. The narratives remain reports. DJR-156:E10 treats Porphyry as a contextual parallel and records that Bonaventure's "wing" remains uncollated; neither attribution is newly authenticated here.

[13469] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 167 (DJR-055-21); p. 422 (DJR-110-24); p. 27 (DJR-026-22). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E19, DJR-055:E20, DJR-110:E17. DJR-110:E17 leaves the precise passages of the named authorities for collation. The article explains the reported astrological practice without verifying its power.

The word. Election means choosing. In astrology it is the selection of a supposedly favourable time for an action; in the account of the rational soul it is free choice. These senses are distinct from election to salvation.

In Burton. Burton's satire of learning dismisses astrological elections alongside predictions. His discussion of love reports a debate about compelling affection by choosing times. The philosophical definition, by contrast, places election with the rational soul's capacity to act freely.

The places. Astrological elections are ridiculed in a catalogue of disciplines. (p. 167; DJR-055-21.) Choosing times is proposed as a means of influencing love. (p. 422; DJR-110-24.) Election names the rational soul's choice. (p. 27; DJR-026-22.)

In this edition. "vain elections" → "futile choices of auspicious times" (DJR-055-21); "election of times" → "choosing favourable times" (DJR-110-24); "with election" → "by choice" (DJR-026-22). The renderings make the object of choosing explicit where necessary. Choice is sufficient in the philosophical definition.

See also. Astrology.

Election and reprobation

Source forms: reprobate; reprobates; Elect[13470]

The word. In the theological discussion, the elect are those chosen for salvation; reprobates are those rejected from it. The terms describe opposed spiritual conditions, but their occurrence in a sufferer's speech does not establish that the feared condition is true.

In Burton. Burton recounts people's conviction that they are forsaken and beyond mercy. His subsequent argument challenges that certainty: if they cannot prove that they are not reprobates, how can they prove that they are? The reversal is a move against self-condemnation, not confirmation of it.

The places. Reprobate forms part of the sufferers' reported despair. (p. 703; DJR-165-39.) People consider themselves forsaken and beyond mercy. (p. 706; DJR-166-22.) Burton challenges the certainty of rejection. (p. 713; DJR-167-42.)

In this edition. "reprobate" → "rejected by God" (DJR-165-39); "account themselves Reprobates" → "consider themselves reprobates" (DJR-166-22); "whether he be elect" → "whether he is among the elect" (DJR-167-42). Rejected by God explains the term where the narrative requires it. Retained reprobates and elect remain theological vocabulary; the wording preserves who believes or questions each claim.

See also. Faith and assurance.

Electuaries

Source forms: electuaries[13471]

The word. Electuaries are medicinal compounds commonly mixed with a sweet vehicle. Lenitive describes a gentle laxative effect in the cited recommendation.

In Burton. Burton's discussion of evacuation places electuaries among the treatments proposed when the body does not discharge its ordinary wastes naturally. They stand beside suppositories, preserved prunes and other preparations, so the noun identifies one particular medicinal form within a varied list.

The places. Lenitive electuaries appear among proposed aids to evacuation. (p. 237; DJR-071-28.)

[13470] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 703 (DJR-165-39); p. 706 (DJR-166-22); p. 713 (DJR-167-42). Existing edition notes: DJR-165:E36, DJR-166:E18, DJR-167:E41. DJR-167:E41 records that the precise source of the question attributed to Solomon remains unresolved. The article does not supply a new biblical locator.

[13471] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 237 (DJR-071-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-071:E21. These are Burton's historical treatment recommendations. DJR-071:E21 specifically preserves turpentine as a historical drug, not a direction for present treatment.

In this edition. “lenitive electuaries” → “laxative electuaries” (DJR-071-28). Electuaries remains as the name of the preparation; laxative makes the intended action explicit. The local note explains the sweet vehicle and the gentler force of lenitive.

See also. Receipt.

Emblem

Source forms: impresse; impresses[13472]

The word. An impresse is a symbolic device or emblem, often associated with a motto. Impresses can therefore name images that carry an argument, rather than impressions left on a surface or on the mind.

In Burton. The bending branch is the device attributed to the Colonna family. Its Latin motto and Burton’s explanation disagree about bending and breaking; an explanation of the emblem must preserve that difficulty. In the praise of love, rings and other figures suggest ideas through symbols, devices and emblems.

The places. The Colonna branch is called an impresse. (p. 353; DJR-096-36.) Poets convey ideas about love through symbolic devices. (p. 416; DJR-109-18.)

In this edition. “an Impresse” → “their emblem” (DJR-096-36); “Symbols, Impresses, Emblemes” → “symbols, devices and emblems” (DJR-109-18). Emblem and device convey the visual and symbolic function. Neither rendering resolves the contradictory explanation of the branch.

See also. Art; Antick.

Empiric

Source forms: empiricks; Empericks in policie; Empericks; empirick; Empirick[13473]

The word. An empiric practises from experience or particular remedies without the learned physician’s systematic account of causes. Burton often uses the term disparagingly, but its force varies. It does not mean a practitioner of modern empirical science.

In Burton. The medical discussion contrasts relief from particular remedies with treatment based on causes. Elsewhere, Burton admits that an empiric may accomplish remarkable cures because the patient trusts him. Political empirics are similarly people exercising a profession without adequate training. A later example of acquired confidence uses the term more neutrally.

The places. Impoverished clergy turn to empirical healing. (p. 16; DJR-006-18.) Unqualified rulers are political empirics. (p. 48–49; DJR-013-20.) Empirical treatment is contrasted with knowledge of causes. (p. 37; DJR-028-03.) Patient confidence can favour an empiric. (p. 96; DJR-039-29.) The learned physician is distinguished from untrained practitioners. (p. 226; DJR-069-04.) Experience produces confident practitioners. (p. 295–292 [296]; DJR-084-13.)

In this edition. “empiricks” → “empirical healers” (DJR-006-18); “Empericks in policie” → “untrained practitioners of politics” (DJR-013-20); “Empericks” → “Empirical practitioners” (DJR-028-03); “An Empirick” → “An empiric” (DJR-039-29); “Empericks” → “untrained practitioners” (DJR-069-04); “bold Empericks” → “confident practitioners” (DJR-084-13). The varied renderings preserve the professional contrast without giving every occurrence the same degree of condemnation.

See also. Physick.

[13472] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 353 (DJR-096-36); p. 416 (DJR-109-18). Existing edition notes: DJR-096:E30, DJR-109:E15. DJR-096:E30 records the mismatch between the Latin motto and Burton’s gloss and leaves the emblem’s transmission uncollated. DJR-109:E15 treats the Platonic resemblance as a parallel, not proof of Burton’s immediate source.

[13473] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 16 (DJR-006-18); p. 48–49 (DJR-013-20); p. 37 (DJR-028-03); p. 96 (DJR-039-29); p. 226 (DJR-069-04); p. 295–292 [296] (DJR-084-13). Existing edition notes: DJR-006:E17, DJR-028:E01, DJR-039:E21, DJR-069:E03, DJR-084:E12. The historical hierarchy of medical training is retained. The unusual pagination of DJR-084-13 is recorded as printed and qualified; it is not silently regularized.

Emulation

Source forms: κακοζηλίαν; emulation; honest emulation[13474]

The word. Emulation is rivalry or a wish to equal or surpass another. It can be honourable and useful, or misguided and excessive. The Greek kakozēlia in the satire emphasizes a perverse form of imitation.

In Burton. The chain of favourites and flatterers illustrates servile ambition. The classification of passions places emulation among emotions that become destructive when immoderate. Burton then expressly allows honest emulation in study and other callings, presenting it as a stimulus to intelligence and courage.

The places. Misguided imitation drives a chain of dependence. (p. 37; DJR-011-07.) Emulation is listed among passions liable to excess. (p. 97 [scan p. 197]; DJR-040-03.) Honest emulation is defended. (p. 103; DJR-041-19.)

In this edition. "κακοζηλίαν" → "misguided imitation" (DJR-011-07); "Emulation" → "rivalry" (DJR-040-03); "Honest emulation" → "Honourable rivalry" (DJR-041-19). Rivalry gives the competitive sense. Honourable preserves the qualification that makes Burton's approval intelligible; honest is not limited here to truthfulness.

See also. Jealousy.

Entertain

Source forms: entertainment; entertain; gives entertainment[13475]

The word. To entertain can mean to receive someone, provide a place in a household, or maintain a person in service. Entertainment consequently includes reception and support, without necessarily implying amusement.

In Burton. The impoverished scholar may be admitted to a patron's household yet wait years for an appointment. Princes entertain jesters by maintaining them at court, even though the jesters' work is itself entertaining in the modern sense. A man acting the grandee gives entertainment by receiving visitors.

The places. A patron may receive a scholar into his household. (p. 142 [printed 128]; DJR-049-28.) Princes maintain jesters and actors. (p. 420; DJR-110-09.) The imagined grandee receives visitors. (p. 194; DJR-061-03.)

In this edition. "give him entertainment" → "take him into his household" (DJR-049-28); "entertain Jesters" → "maintain jesters" (DJR-110-09); "gives entertainment" → "receives visitors" (DJR-061-03). The translations identify the particular act of reception or employment. They retain the difference between providing a livelihood and securing the desired appointment.

See also. Ordinary; Hospital; Conversation; Familiar.

Enthusiasm

Source forms: fanaticall; Enthusiasts; Enthusiasmus; enthusiasticks; Enthusiasmes[13476]

[13474] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 37 (DJR-011-07); p. 97 [scan p. 197] (DJR-040-03); p. 103 (DJR-041-19). Existing edition notes: DJR-011:E06, DJR-040:E03, DJR-041:E17. DJR-041:E17 stresses that Burton condemns excess rather than every wish to excel. The shifting four- and six-passion classifications in DJR-040-03 remain part of his account.

[13475] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 142 [printed 128] (DJR-049-28); p. 420 (DJR-110-09); p. 194 (DJR-061-03). Existing edition notes: DJR-049:E23, DJR-061:E02, DJR-110:E06. DJR-110:E06 leaves the exact Gomesius passage for collation. The ambitious man's behaviour is part of Burton's reported account, without a new diagnostic identification.

[13476] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 181 (DJR-058-25); p. 181 (DJR-058-27); p. 192 (DJR-060-22); p. 632–633 (DJR-151-23); p. 656 (DJR-156-07); p. 677 (DJR-160-21). Existing edition notes: DJR-058:E22, DJR-058:E24, DJR-060:E21, DJR-151:E17, DJR-156:E07, DJR-160:E21. The association with exceptional ability is mediated through Laurentius's interpretation of the Aristotelian Problems. Burton's universal claim about bodily precursors and his polemical accounts of sects remain attributed claims; the notes retain their collation limits.

The word. Enthusiasm here means inspiration or possession attributed to a divine spirit. An enthusiast is someone understood or claiming to be so inspired. Fanatical can likewise describe prophetic frenzy, rather than simply intense commitment.

In Burton. Burton uses inspired figures to qualify the rule that melancholy always brings fear and sorrow. He also reports a medical account linking inspired possession with exceptional intellectual ability. In the religious discussion, enthusiasm appears amid claims he distrusts, ranging from excessive devotion to the revelations of hostilely described sects. The word's valuation therefore depends on the passage.

The places. Prophetic frenzy qualifies a general account of melancholy. (p. 181; DJR-058-25.) Inspired people are excluded from one classification. (p. 181; DJR-058-27.) Enthusiasmus is linked with exceptional ability. (p. 192; DJR-060-22.) Excessive devotion is said to produce claims of inspiration. (p. 632–633; DJR-151-23.) Bodily and environmental conditions are alleged precursors. (p. 656; DJR-156-07.) Sectarian revelations are attacked. (p. 677; DJR-160-21.)

In this edition. "fanaticall persons" → "people seized by prophetic frenzy" (DJR-058-25); "Enthusiasts" → "people seized by inspiration" (DJR-058-27); "Enthusiasmus" → "inspired possession" (DJR-060-22); "enthusiasticks" → "people who believe themselves inspired" (DJR-151-23); "Enthusiasmes" → "states of inspiration" (DJR-156-07); "strange Enthusiasmes" → "strange claims of divine inspiration" (DJR-160-21). Inspiration and possession preserve the stronger historical senses. Where the passage contests a claim, the rendering makes that distance visible.

See also. Religion and superstition.

Epichairekakia

Source forms: ἐπιχαιρεκακία[13477]

The word. The Greek epichairekakia means delight in another person's misfortune. Burton describes it as a compound of joy and hatred and adds the converse response, grief at another's prosperity.

In Burton. The term occurs in a list of mixed affections alongside anger, hatred and zeal. Burton's explanation gives two connected movements: pleasure at another's harm and distress at another's success. Both are needed to reproduce his fuller description, even though the Greek name directly identifies the malicious pleasure.

The places. Malicious joy appears among the mixed emotions. (p. 25; DJR-025-29.)

In this edition. "ἐπιχαιρεκακία" → "malicious joy" (DJR-025-29); "rejoyce at other mens mischief" → "rejoice in other people's misfortunes" (DJR-025-29). Malicious joy provides an intelligible English name. Misfortunes gives mischief its sense of harm suffered, and the subsequent grief at prosperity remains in the sentence.

See also. Jealousy.

Epicure

Source forms: epicurize[13478]

The word. Epicurize means to pursue or indulge pleasure in the conventional hostile use associated with the name Epicure. The verb here is a term of reproach, not a precise account of Epicurus's philosophy.

[13477] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 25 (DJR-025-29). Existing edition notes: DJR-025:E21. DJR-025:E21 distinguishes the word's meaning from Burton's expanded definition and records the immediate antecedent of his phrase "these two."

[13478] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 60 (DJR-015-35). Existing edition notes: DJR-015:E20. DJR-015:E20 identifies the Circe episode in Odyssey 10 and leaves the final Latin sentence without a secure source. The entry does not treat Burton's hostile shorthand as a neutral definition of Epicurean teaching.

In Burton. Burton puts epicurize in a scornful series with tyranny, oppression, luxury, conflict and waste. The catalogue culminates in the comparison with Ulysses' companions as swine. Its force comes from the accumulated denunciation rather than a developed argument about a philosophical school.

The places. Epicurize appears in a catalogue of destructive conduct. (p. 60; DJR-015-35.)

In this edition. "epicurize" → "pursue pleasure" (DJR-015-35). Pursue pleasure conveys the verb's local action, while the surrounding list preserves its condemnatory tone.

See also. Religion and superstition; Luxurious and riot.

Epithemes

Source forms: epithymes; epithemes[13479]

The word. Epithemes are liquid medicinal preparations applied externally, often on cloths over an affected part. Epithymes in the synopsis names these applications and is distinct from the herb epithyme.

In Burton. The synopsis lists epithymes with plasters, poultices and other external preparations. The later account specifies an application over the heart region and names the waters and ingredients proposed for it. This context distinguishes a liquid dressing from a medicine swallowed or an herb named in isolation.

The places. Epithymes are grouped with external applications. (scan p. 324; DJR-067-17.) A liquid preparation is applied over the heart. (p. 394; DJR-105-23.)

In this edition. "Epithymes" → "medicinal lotions" (DJR-067-17); "Epithemes" → "liquid dressings" (DJR-105-23); "an Epitheme for the Heart" → "a liquid dressing for the heart" (DJR-105-23). Medicinal lotions and liquid dressings convey the external use. The second description concerns application over the bodily region of the heart.

See also. Chirurgery.

Equivocation

Source forms: Æquivocations; equivocal[13480]

The word. Equivocation here concerns the different senses of a word. Equivocal can describe a loose or imprecise use, without implying that a speaker deliberately deceives or evades.

In Burton. The jealousy heading announces a survey of meanings before narrowing the subject to marital jealousy. The discussion of melancholy distinguishes passing disturbance from an established condition and calls the broader everyday application equivocal and improper. The source index directs readers to both discussions.

The places. The jealousy heading announces different meanings. (p. 591; DJR-144-04.) The source index groups the two discussions. (unnumbered Table; DJR-171-008.) The broad use of melancholy is called equivocal. (p. 11; DJR-023-02.)

In this edition. "Æquivocations" → "different meanings" (DJR-144-04); "Æquivocations of melancholy" → "Different meanings of melancholy" (DJR-171-008); "equivocal & improper sense" → "loose and imprecise sense" (DJR-023-02). Different meanings conveys the heading and index function. Loose and imprecise gives the local criticism of usage while retaining the contrast between passing state and established condition.

[13479] Editor. Edited source passages: scan p. 324 (DJR-067-17); p. 394 (DJR-105-23). Existing edition notes: DJR-067:E08, DJR-105:E23. DJR-067:E08 distinguishes these preparations from the similarly named herb. The recipe is reported as historical medicine; identifying its form does not establish its efficacy.

[13480] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 591 (DJR-144-04); unnumbered Table (DJR-171-008); p. 11 (DJR-023-02). Existing edition notes: DJR-023:E01, DJR-144:E01, DJR-171:E02. The Table is an unnumbered index leaf. Its cited numbers are retained as source locators; the entry does not turn the broader historical category of melancholy into a modern diagnosis.

See also. Quiddity and quodlibet; Genus and species; Accident; Impertinent.

Essence and quintessence

Source forms: quinta essentia; quintessence; Essence[13481]

The word. Essence can mean the substance or nature of something. Quinta essentia is the fifth substance, or aether, distinguished in the Aristotelian account from the four elements. Quintessence also has a figurative sense: the concentrated essence or animating principle of something.

In Burton. The astronomical discussion asks what the heavens are made of and contrasts the fifth essence with a penetrable medium. The praise of cheerfulness uses quintessence figuratively, making mirth the life of medicine. The shared vocabulary should not obscure the difference between a cosmological substance and a claim about what makes treatment effective.

The places. The matter of the heavens is disputed. (p. 251; DJR-074-29.) Cheerfulness is called the quintessence of medicine. (p. 305; DJR-086-22.)

In this edition. “Essence and matter” → “substance and matter” (DJR-074-29); “quinta essentia” → “fifth essence” (DJR-074-29); “life and quintessence of Physick” → “life and very essence of medicine” (DJR-086-22). Substance clarifies the astronomical question. Very essence gives the figurative intensity of the medical praise.

See also. Matter; Prime mover; Air; Paracelsian; Intelligence.

Estate

Source forms: stock; estates; substance[13482]

The word. Estate can mean a person’s condition or circumstances, not only landed property. The related financial vocabulary in these examples includes stock, meaning capital, and substance, meaning wealth.

In Burton. One reported patient has spent his stock on unnecessary building. In another passage, Burton warns that even apparently healthy readers share an unstable estate, meaning their vulnerable condition. The discussion of illness describes people surrendering their substance in pursuit of health. The movement between money and human circumstances requires separate renderings.

The places. Stock is exhausted by unnecessary building. (p. 164; DJR-054-40.) Fickle estates describes shared human vulnerability. (p. 197–198; DJR-061-30.) Substance is wealth people would exchange for health. (p. 215; DJR-066-01.)

In this edition. “spent his stock” → “spent his capital” (DJR-054-40); “our own fickle estates” → “our own unstable condition” (DJR-061-30); “fortunes, substance” → “possessions and wealth” (DJR-066-01). Capital and wealth specify the financial senses. Condition preserves the wider application to the reader’s bodily and spiritual vulnerability.

See also. Commonwealth; Manure; Abdicate; Commodity.

Ex traduce

Source forms: ex traduce[13483]

[13481] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 251 (DJR-074-29); p. 305 (DJR-086-22). Existing edition notes: DJR-074:E26, DJR-086:E15. DJR-074:E26 explains the compressed syntax and preserves the difference between Tycho’s distinction and the marginal statement. DJR-086:E15 attributes the praise to its historical context; it is not a new recommendation about treatment.

[13482] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 164 (DJR-054-40); p. 197–198 (DJR-061-30); p. 215 (DJR-066-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-054:E33, DJR-061:E26, DJR-066:E01. DJR-054:E33 records the ungrammatical Latin in the reported loss-of-money case. The modern sense is supplied without claiming the cited cure has been independently verified.

[13483] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 26 (DJR-026-03). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E02. DJR-026:E02 explains the conventional identification behind “Phil.” and retains Burton’s inherited attribution of On the Spirit and the Soul to Hugh.

The word. Ex traduce means by propagation or transmission from the parent. The theory that the soul is transmitted in this way is called traducianism.

In Burton. Burton introduces the position as something some authorities hold: one person begets another in body and soul. The image of one candle lighting another illustrates the proposed transmission. The formulation belongs to a disputed account of the soul's origin, rather than to an uncontested description of generation.

The places. The soul is said by some authorities to be propagated from the parent. (p. 26; DJR-026-03.)

In this edition. "ex traduce" → "propagated from the parent" (DJR-026-03). The English phrase states the theory directly; the accompanying candle comparison preserves Burton's explanatory image. His opening attribution to some authorities remains essential.

See also. Soul; Maternal impressions.

Excrements

Source forms: excrements[13484]

The word. Excrements can mean waste or residual matter generally, including bodily discharges and secretions. Its scope in these passages is wider than faeces.

In Burton. Excessive sleep is said to accumulate excrements in the brain and other parts, within the historical account of humours and spirits. The contrasting description of a dry brain mentions few excrements in the eyes and nostrils. The bodily locations make the broader sense clear.

The places. Too much sleep is said to accumulate residual matter. (p. 90; DJR-038-24.) Dryness is associated with few discharges from eyes and nostrils. (p. 198; DJR-062-05.)

In this edition. "great store of excrements" → "a great accumulation of waste matter" (DJR-038-24); "Few excrements in their eyes and nostrils" → "few discharges from the eyes and nostrils" (DJR-062-05). Waste matter gives the general category; discharges specifies the visible secretions. Both follow the immediate bodily context.

See also. Concoction; Strangury; Meat; Defecate.

Exercise

Source forms: exercise; Exercise[13485]

The word. Exercise can be activity of the body or mind, but it can also name a particular academic performance or assignment. The object and setting determine its scope.

In Burton. The scholar fears being out in his next exercise: faltering in an academic task. The medical headings, meanwhile, distinguish excessive exercise as a cause from exercise of body and mind properly regulated. Together they show that the book concerns both intellectual performance and the management of activity.

The places. The scholar fears failure in an academic exercise. (p. 195; DJR-061-07.) Excessive exercise is introduced among causes. (p. 84; DJR-037-15.) Exercise of body and mind is to be regulated. (p. 265; DJR-078-01.)

The individual citations remain for collation.

[13484] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 90 (DJR-038-24); p. 198 (DJR-062-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-038:E15, DJR-062:E04. The physiological explanation remains historical. DJR-062:E04 retains the extraordinary claim of months without sleep as a transmitted report, without treating the vocabulary explanation as confirmation.

[13485] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 195 (DJR-061-07); p. 84 (DJR-037-15); p. 265 (DJR-078-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-061:E06. The headings establish the distinction between excess and regulation; they are not a complete catalogue of the particular activities discussed in those sections.

In this edition. “his next exercise” → “his next academic exercise” (DJR-061-07); “Immoderate exercise” → “Excessive exercise” (DJR-037-15); “Exercise rectified of Body and minde” → “Exercise of body and mind regulated” (DJR-078-01). Academic supplies the institutional context of the scholar’s task. Regulated gives rectified its sense of bringing activity into an appropriate order.

See also. Non naturals.

Exhibition

Source forms: exhibition; Lecture[13486]

The word. An exhibition is financial maintenance, support or a stipend. A lecture in this institutional setting can be an endowed teaching post, rather than one spoken lesson.

In Burton. Burton imagines an appeal for support to maintain or enlarge a college, teaching foundation or library. His criticism falls on patrons who resent the revenues devoted to learning and would rather see existing institutions ruined or diverted to other uses.

The places. An appeal for an exhibition seeks support for learning. (p. 281–282; DJR-081-20.)

In this edition. “an exhibition” → “financial support” (DJR-081-20); “College, Lecture, Library” → “college, lectureship, library” (DJR-081-20). Financial support removes the modern association with a public display. Lectureship identifies the continuing educational provision among the institutions named.

See also. Art.

Experimental

Source forms: try conclusions; conclusions; experimentall[13487]

The word. Experimental can mean learned or tested through experience. To try conclusions is to make experiments or practical trials; conclusions here are things attempted, not merely propositions reached by reasoning.

In Burton. Burton warns against trying a recipe on oneself simply because it appears in a book. He praises practical trials in cultivating imported medicinal plants, and describes his mother’s skill in remedies learned through experience. These passages give experience different settings and values; they do not amount to one uniform account of experimental method.

The places. Trying conclusions from a recipe can cause harm. (p. 229–230; DJR-069-38.) Practical trials concern the cultivation of medicinal plants. (p. 367; DJR-099-42.) Burton describes his mother’s experience of treatment. (p. 394–395; DJR-105-30.)

In this edition. “try conclusions” → “making experiments” (DJR-069-38); “tryed excellent conclusions” → “conducted excellent experiments” (DJR-099-42); “experimentall medicines” → “remedies learned from experience” (DJR-105-30). Experiments makes the practical trials clear. Remedies learned from experience avoids suggesting that the historical claim rests on a modern clinical testing procedure.

See also. Art.

[13486] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 281–282 (DJR-081-20). Existing edition notes: DJR-081:E20. DJR-081:E20 explains these institutional senses and the modern repair of the source’s awkward phrase “they repine many.” The article does not identify a particular foundation beyond those Burton names generically.

[13487] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 229–230 (DJR-069-38); p. 367 (DJR-099-42); p. 394–395 (DJR-105-30). Existing edition notes: DJR-099:E36, DJR-105:E29. DJR-105:E29 identifies Dorothy Burton in the margin and explains the broad practical sense of surgery. The spider-amulet narrative remains Burton’s account, not independent proof of a remedy.

Explode

Source forms: exploded; explode[13488]

The word. To explode can mean to hiss down, drive away by noisy disapproval, or reject contemptuously. These uses concern public rejection and ridicule rather than an explosion.

In Burton. The allegorical crowd expels Virtue and Wisdom while admiring Fortune and Folly, reversing the expected relation between merit and success. In the catalogue of national prejudices, people explode foreign fashions while their neighbours return the contempt. The verb helps make disapproval audible or socially forceful.

The places. The crowd drives Virtue and Wisdom away. (p. 19; DJR-007-12.) People ridicule the customs of other nations. (p. 39; DJR-011-21.)

In this edition. “were hissed out, and exploded by the common people” → “the crowd hissed and jeered them off” (DJR-007-12); “explode many of their fashions” → “ridicule many of their customs” (DJR-011-21). Hissed and jeered them off preserves the public action; ridicule conveys the more general contempt for customs.

See also. Baffle; Censure; Tax.

Exquisite

Source forms: exquisite torments; exquisite knowledge[13489]

The word. Exquisite can mean exact or highly developed, but in a description of torment it means extreme or acutely painful. The favourable modern association with beauty or delicacy cannot govern every use.

In Burton. The historical account of a city’s devastation uses exquisite to intensify torture. The warning against medical practice from books demands exquisite knowledge: exact knowledge sufficient to judge how a remedy should be used. Each noun determines a different force for the adjective.

The places. Exquisite intensifies the description of torture. (p. 165; DJR-054-48.) Exquisite knowledge is required before practising from books. (p. 230; DJR-069-41.)

In this edition. “exquisite torments” → “agonising torture” (DJR-054-48); “exquisite knowledge” → “exact knowledge” (DJR-069-41). Agonising conveys severity without favourable overtones. Exact conveys the precision demanded by the warning about remedies.

See also. Painful; Art.

Fact

Source forms: fact; foule fact[13490]

The word. Fact means a deed or act in these passages. Its moral character comes from the description and context; the word does not simply mean a true statement or an established piece of information.

In Burton. David’s fact is a condemned deed. A foul fact may produce disgrace when committed or exposed, yet Burton also argues that an offender should not be mocked. In the catalogue of deaths

---

[13488] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 19 (DJR-007-12); p. 39 (DJR-011-21). Existing edition notes: DJR-007:E14, DJR-011:E19. DJR-007:E14 preserves the source’s sequence of allegorical names. DJR-011:E19 treats the national caricatures as Burton’s examples of reciprocal prejudice, not endorsements of the stereotypes.

[13489] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 165 (DJR-054-48); p. 230 (DJR-069-41). Existing edition notes: DJR-054:E40, DJR-069:E26. The violent episode remains Burton’s historical report. In DJR-069-41 he moves from a printed example to a friend’s case he says he knew; DJR-069:E26 preserves that distinction and leaves the friend unnamed.

[13490] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 30 (DJR-026-49); p. 99 [supplied] (DJR-040-30); p. 151 (DJR-051-49); p. 216–217 (DJR-066-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E36, DJR-040:E23, DJR-051:E43, DJR-066:E08. DJR-066:E08 qualifies Burton’s compression of Augustine’s argument and notes the difficulty in his claim about Jonah. The lexical rendering does not remove those historical and theological qualifications.

discussed by religious authorities, the same fact again means the same deed, with the question of approval belonging to the surrounding argument.

The places. David knows the vileness of his deed. (p. 30; DJR-026-49.) A foul deed can bring public disgrace. (p. 99 [supplied]; DJR-040-30.) A shameful act does not justify cruel reproach. (p. 151; DJR-051-49.) Fact names a deed discussed by religious authorities. (p. 216–217; DJR-066-08.)

In this edition. "filthiness of his fact" → "vileness of his deed" (DJR-026-49); "some foul fact" → "some foul deed" (DJR-040-30); "committed a foule fact" → "committed a shameful act" (DJR-051-49); "the same fact" → "the same deed" (DJR-066-08). Deed and act preserve the reference to something done. The adjectives, speakers and reported judgments retain their separate roles.

See also. Action; Censure; Tax; Bewray; Absolve.

Faculty

Source forms: faculty; Æstimative; Cogitative[13491]

The word. A faculty is a power or capacity of the soul or mind. Estimative and cogitative name powers of estimation or thought which Burton groups here under imagination. Faculty does not refer to a university teaching body in these passages.

In Burton. Imagination receives and examines forms communicated by common sense, recalls them, and makes others of its own. The religious discussion later describes an impaired imagination alongside otherwise coherent thought. In both places imagination is a particular capacity within historical psychology, broader than the modern association with creativity.

The places. Imagination is described as an internal faculty. (p. 23; DJR-025-18.) An impaired imagination is distinguished from other coherent thought. (p. 677; DJR-160-27.)

In this edition. "Æstimative, or Cogitative" → "the estimative or cogitative faculty" (DJR-025-18); "this faculty is free" → "this faculty is free" (DJR-025-18); "læsam habent imaginationem" → "their imagination is impaired" (DJR-160-27). Faculty is retained as a useful technical term and supplied in the first phrase to identify what the adjectives name. The later rendering preserves the claim of a particular impairment.

See also. Animal faculties; Common sense; Intellect; Memory and recollection; Will and nill; Reason.

Faith and assurance

Source forms: faith; security[13492]

The word. Faith occurs both among kinds of understanding and in the religious discussion of belief and salvation. Assurance is confidence in one's spiritual state; security has that sense in the sufferer's question about distinguishing it from presumption.

In Burton. The philosophical list places faith among lasting intellectual dispositions. The later dialogue asks how a person can trust while feeling no signs of grace. Burton answers feared rejection with patience and hope, while the sufferer objects that weak faith may conceal unfounded confidence. The voices must remain distinct for the argument to be intelligible.

The places. Faith appears among kinds of understanding. (p. 28; DJR-026-30.) Burton counsels patience despite a lack of felt signs. (p. 709; DJR-167-05.) The sufferer questions the difference between assurance and presumption. (p. 714; DJR-167-54.)

[13491] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 23 (DJR-025-18); p. 677 (DJR-160-27). Existing edition notes: DJR-025:E13, DJR-160:E27. DJR-025:E13 places the brain chambers within the historical ventricular model. DJR-160:E27 explains the comet image as Burton's account of a circumscribed disorder; no modern diagnostic identification is added.

[13492] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 28 (DJR-026-30); p. 709 (DJR-167-05); p. 714 (DJR-167-54). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E23, DJR-167:E05, DJR-167:E53. DJR-167:E05 identifies fruit as the effects or signs of grace. DJR-167:E53 identifies the sufferer's renewed objection and records the marginal attribution of the signs to Abernethy.

In this edition. “Faith” → “faith” (DJR-026-30); “despair not, or think thou art a Reprobate” → “Do not despair or think yourself rejected by God” (DJR-167-05); “discern my security from carnall presumption” → “distinguish my assurance from fleshly presumption” (DJR-167-54). Faith remains in both contexts. Assurance gives security its local favourable sense; the objection and the pastoral reply keep their separate speakers.

See also. Despair; Carnal presumption; Secure; Election and reprobation; Hope; Conscience.

Familiar

Source forms: familiars[13493]

The word. Familiars here are close friends or associates. The noun identifies people on intimate or habitual terms with someone, rather than spirits or merely things that are well known.

In Burton. Burton tells of a friend who attempted to treat himself with hellebore after finding a recipe in a book. The accidental visit of his familiars prevents the dangerous experiment from proceeding as it otherwise might. Their role is social and practical within the anecdote.

The places. A patient’s familiars happen to visit him. (p. 230; DJR-069-41.)

In this edition. “some of his familiars” → “some of his close friends” (DJR-069-41). Close friends conveys the relationship without bringing in the supernatural sense that the same word can have elsewhere.

See also. Entertain; Gossip.

Fascination

Source forms: fascinate; fascinations[13494]

The word. Fascination is bewitchment, especially an influence thought to operate through the eyes. To fascinate in this setting is to cast such a spell, rather than merely to attract someone’s interest.

In Burton. Burton asks why children are supposedly bewitched and reports an explanation in terms of one person’s imagination altering another’s spirits. In the discussion of sleep, a quoted account attributes sleeplessness to fascination. The explanation of the vocabulary must keep the supposed cause attached to the people and authorities who assert it.

The places. Fascination is explained through the supposed action of imagination. (p. 96; DJR-039-31.) Bewitchment is offered as an explanation of sleeplessness. (p. 287; DJR-082-30.)

In this edition. “fascinate and bewitch children” → “cast the evil eye on children and bewitch them” (DJR-039-31); “witches and fascinations” → “witches and enchantments” (DJR-082-30). Cast the evil eye gives the particular ocular sense; enchantments conveys the broader supposed magical action in the sleep passage.

See also. Philter; Lodestone and adamant; Occult; Characters; Ligation and ligature; Catoptrics and perspectives.

Favour and feature

Source forms: feature; favour; out of favour[13495]

[13493] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 230 (DJR-069-41). Existing edition notes: DJR-069:E26. DJR-069:E26 distinguishes Burton’s claimed personal knowledge of this incident from the preceding printed case. The friend remains unnamed; the article supplies no speculative identity.

[13494] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 96 (DJR-039-31); p. 287 (DJR-082-30). Existing edition notes: DJR-039:E23, DJR-082:E25. DJR-039:E23 identifies the related bleeding-corpse belief. DJR-082:E25 records that Boissard’s exact passage remains uncollated. Neither belief is authenticated by the lexical explanation.

[13495] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 304 (DJR-086-14); p. 453 (DJR-117-15); p. 501 (DJR-126-08); p. 561 (DJR-137-42). Existing edition notes: DJR-086:E11, DJR-117:E13, DJR-126:E08, DJR-137:E32. The Muses’ alleged human origin remains an antiquarian explanation. DJR-126:E08 identifies the Charlemagne account as a legend and records the discrepancy in the

The word. Favour can mean appearance or looks. Feature can mean bodily form or beauty of form, rather than one facial characteristic. The phrases require attention to whether Burton describes a person's looks, social standing or loss of beauty.

In Burton. The attendants in the antiquarian story possess excellent feature and sweet voices. The love discussion praises comeliness of person. Charlemagne's legendary beloved has mean favour and condition: ordinary looks and humble standing. In the rhetoric against beauty's permanence, growing out of favour means losing beauty, not falling from someone's patronage.

The places. Excellent feature describes the attendants' beauty. (p. 304; DJR-086-14.) Comeliness of person is an object of love. (p. 453; DJR-117-15.) Favour and condition distinguish appearance from rank. (p. 501; DJR-126-08.) Out of favour describes the loss of beauty. (p. 561; DJR-137-42.)

In this edition. "most excellent feature" → "exceptional beauty" (DJR-086-14); "comeliness of person" → "good looks" (DJR-117-15); "mean favour and condition" → "ordinary looks and humble standing" (DJR-126-08); "wax out of favour" → "lose so much of her beauty" (DJR-137-42). The translations specify appearance and keep it separate from social position. Burton's harsh rhetoric about ageing remains attributed to his argument.

See also. Honest.

Fear

Source forms: Fear[13496]

The word. Fear is an affection directed towards an anticipated evil. In the selected classification, the temporal distinction separates it from sorrow, which concerns an evil already present.

In Burton. Burton organizes emotions by their objects and by whether those objects are present or absent. Good objects produce joy or longing; bad objects produce sorrow or fear. The same passage describes emotion as bodily action through the heart and the condition of the body, so the classification joins psychological and physiological explanation.

The places. Fear concerns a future evil within the classification of affections. (p. 25; DJR-025-28.)

In this edition. "or future, as Fear" → "Or they concern some future evil, as fear does" (DJR-025-28). The modern sentence supplies the repeated subject and object needed to make Burton's compressed contrast clear. It preserves the opposition between present sorrow and anticipated fear.

See also. Passion; Jealousy; Shame.

Feral

Source forms: feral; ferall[13497]

The word. Feral can mean savage or brutal; ferall can also mean deadly or fatal. The spelling alone does not decide between these senses.

In Burton. The comparison with Hercules describes vices as savage monsters of the mind, to be fought by moral reform. In the account of persistent melancholy, a ferall plague is a deadly affliction that follows the sufferer everywhere, like an arrow lodged in a wounded deer.

The places. Feral describes the vices opposed by Crates. (p. 59; DJR-015-28.) Ferall describes an inescapable affliction. (p. 184; DJR-059-06.)

Petrarch letter number.

[13496] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 25 (DJR-025-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-025:E20. DJR-025:E20 retains the tension between emotions described as natural and not to be resisted and the earlier demand that reason govern appetite. The physiological account belongs to Burton's historical model.

[13497] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 59 (DJR-015-28); p. 184 (DJR-059-06). Existing edition notes: DJR-059:E06. DJR-059:E06 locates the wounded-deer phrase in Aeneid 4.73. The entry identifies the local senses without turning the transmitted medical description into a modern diagnosis.

In this edition. “feral vices” → “savage vices” (DJR-015-28); “ferall plague” → “deadly affliction” (DJR-059-06). Savage preserves the monstrous moral imagery; deadly gives the second passage its fatal force. Plague there names an affliction rather than establishing a specific infectious disease.

See also. Calenture and ague; Desperate.

Flux and lask

Source forms: fluxes; lask[13498]

The word. Flux names a flow or discharge; in the cited illness account, fluxes are bowel discharges, commonly diarrhoea or dysentery. A lask is diarrhoea or looseness of the bowels.

In Burton. Travellers’ fluxes appear beside burning fevers in the warning about unfamiliar foods. The minister’s sudden lask forces an embarrassing retreat; Burton uses the reported incident to illustrate the power of shame. The bodily event and the emotional consequence occupy different roles in the story.

The places. Fluxes afflict travellers in the account of unfamiliar diets. (p. 77; DJR-035-52.) A sudden lask begins the minister’s story of shame. (p. 99–100 [supplied; scan p. 200]; DJR-040-34.)

In this edition. “Calentures, Fluxes” → “burning fevers and diarrhoea” (DJR-035-52); “suddenly taken with a lask or looseness” → “suddenly seized with diarrhoea” (DJR-040-34). Diarrhoea makes the bowel sense explicit in both passages. It does not carry over every possible meaning of flux into these contexts.

See also. Purging.

Fond

Source forms: fond[13499]

The word. Fond here means foolish or deluded. It does not express affection, attachment or liking.

In Burton. Burton begins with people laughing at an old man described as a little fond, then extends the charge of folly to the whole town and eventually to everyone. The passage turns a familiar insult about age into a universal accusation; its argument depends on that widening movement.

The places. The old man’s supposed foolishness becomes an example of general folly. (p. 22; DJR-008-02.)

In this edition. “by reason of his age was a little fond” → “whose age had made him a little foolish” (DJR-008-02). Foolish gives the immediate sense. The successive quotations and English restatements remain, allowing the expansion from one person to everyone to be followed.

See also. Conceit.

Form

Source forms: form; formam[13500]

[13498] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 77 (DJR-035-52); p. 99–100 [supplied; scan p. 200] (DJR-040-34). Existing edition notes: DJR-035:E34, DJR-040:E27. The attribution of travellers’ illnesses to fruit belongs to Burton’s sources. DJR-040:E27 leaves Foreest’s exact case for collation and distinguishes the margin’s fear of accusation from the embarrassment described in the body.

[13499] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 22 (DJR-008-02). Existing edition notes: DJR-008:E02, DJR-008:E03. DJR-008:E02 preserves the unusual noun delirium in the Latin and leaves the exact Pontano passage for checking. DJR-008:E03 locates the separate Lactantius passage; it does not resolve the Pontano citation.

[13500] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 188–190 (DJR-059-49); p. 192 (DJR-060-21); p. 443 (DJR-115-06). Existing edition notes: DJR-059:E43, DJR-060:E20, DJR-115:E06. DJR-059:E43 treats the hare emblem as Pierius’s reported account, without independent authentication as Egyptian usage. DJR-060:E20 leaves the Brunsellius anecdote uncollated. DJR-115:E06 identifies generational continuity as the marriage passage’s sense of immortality.

The word. Form has several unrelated contextual uses here: a hare's shallow resting place, a bench, and the philosophical form that gives determination or fulfilment to matter. A hare's form is not a burrow.

In Burton. The fearful hare supplies a reported emblem of melancholy. A woman falling from a form begins an anecdote about uncontrollable laughter. In praise of marriage, the Latin comparison of matter desiring form applies Aristotelian language to the relation between woman and man. The shared spelling must not collapse these different objects and concepts.

The places. A hare sits in its resting place. (p. 188–190; DJR-059-49.) A woman falls from a bench. (p. 192; DJR-060-21.) Matter and form provide a comparison for marriage. (p. 443; DJR-115-06.)

In this edition. "an Hare sitting in her form" → "a hare sitting in its form" (DJR-059-49); "fall off from a form" → "fall off a bench" (DJR-060-21); "ut materia appetit formam" → "As matter desires form" (DJR-115-06). Form is retained for the animal's named resting place and for the philosophical concept, with explanation. Bench removes ambiguity in the anecdote.

See also. Matter.

Friction and embrocation

Source forms: frictions; embrocations[13501]

The word. Frictions are rubbings of the body. Embrocations are applications of liquid remedies. Both name physical procedures in the historical bathing regimen.

In Burton. The first recommendation follows bathing with rubbing all over the body. The next joins baths to head washes, anointing and applications of liquid preparations. These are successive kinds of bodily treatment; the vocabulary should not reduce them all to bathing or confuse the application of a remedy with swallowing it.

The places. Frictions follow the prescribed baths. (p. 238; DJR-071-35.) Embrocations accompany anointing and head washes. (p. 238; DJR-071-36.)

In this edition. "frictions all over the body" → "rubbing all over the body" (DJR-071-35); "embrocations" → "applications of liquid remedies" (DJR-071-36). The English phrases identify the actions directly while preserving the order in which the sources recommend them.

See also. Chirurgery.

Fulsome

Source forms: fulsome; fulsomeness[13502]

The word. Fulsome can mean foul, offensive or disgusting. Fulsomeness names the corresponding offensiveness or foulness. These senses do not imply abundance or lavish praise.

In Burton. The reported vomiting case describes fulsome stuffe, emphasizing the repulsiveness of the expelled matter. The discussion of public baths speaks of the fulsomeness of sweat and suggests washing it away. The second account marks its explanation as conjectural through belike.

The places. Fulsome describes the matter in a reported vomiting case. (p. 53–54; DJR-031-25.) Fulsomeness describes offensive sweat in the discussion of baths. (p. 238; DJR-071-39.)

[13501] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 238 (DJR-071-35); p. 238 (DJR-071-36). Existing edition notes: DJR-071:E25, DJR-071:E26. DJR-071:E25 preserves the difference between the margin's cooling emphasis and the body's moderate warmth. DJR-071:E26 identifies lye and herbs for the head; these historical preparations are not harmonized into a new treatment rule.

[13502] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 53–54 (DJR-031-25); p. 238 (DJR-071-39). Existing edition notes: DJR-031:E18, DJR-071:E28. The extraordinary symptoms remain reported rather than independently verified. DJR-071:E28 records that the number of baths and the marginal pairing with nymphaea require further comparison with Gillius.

In this edition. “fulsome stuffe” → “foul matter” (DJR-031-25); “that fulsomeness of sweat” → “the offensive sweat” (DJR-071-39). Foul and offensive make the unfavourable sensory meaning clear. Presumably elsewhere in the bath sentence retains the qualification of Burton’s proposed explanation.

See also. Air; Homely.

Fustian and bombast

Source forms: bumbast; fustian[13503]

The word. Bombast, printed bumbast, evokes stuffing or padding and can describe inflated pretension. Fustian here names grandiose, empty language. The terms connect verbal display with exaggerated social importance.

In Burton. Competitive households spend beyond their means to win bumbast titles. The attack on patrons who profit from church property turns padding into a verb: they bumbast themselves. The supposedly accomplished gentleman talks big fustian, one more showy qualification offered in place of governing ability.

The places. Bumbast titles reward ruinous competition. (p. 102–103; DJR-041-17.) Church spoils are said to pad out patrons’ greatness. (p. 137; DJR-048-23.) Fustian forms part of the gentleman’s empty display. (p. 315–316; DJR-088-33.)

In this edition. “bumbast titles” → “inflated titles” (DJR-041-17); “bumbast themselves” → “pad themselves out” (DJR-048-23); “talk big fustian” → “spout grandiose nonsense” (DJR-088-33). Inflated and pad themselves out preserve the image behind bombast. Grandiose nonsense conveys the contempt directed at pretentious speech.

See also. Cento; Antick.

Generation and corruption

Source forms: generation; corruption[13504]

The word. Generation and corruption mean coming into being and passing away. Corruption can also mean bodily decay. Neither use is primarily about moral dishonesty.

In Burton. The astronomical question asks whether the heavens undergo change or whether apparent novelties are previously created bodies that recur at set times. In the discussion of regimen, corruption concerns the body’s decay and the claim that moderation could prevent it. The word’s subject determines the kind of change at issue.

The places. Generation and corruption challenge the supposed changelessness of the heavens. (p. 252; DJR-075-01.) Corruption names bodily decay in the discussion of regimen. (p. 291; DJR-083-20.)

In this edition. “Whether there be generation and corruption” → “Whether things come into being and pass away in the heavens” (DJR-075-01); “all corruption” → “all bodily decay” (DJR-083-20). The astronomical rendering states the technical pair in ordinary English. Bodily decay supplies the local sense in the regimen passage.

See also. Matter.

[13503] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 102–103 (DJR-041-17); p. 137 (DJR-048-23); p. 315–316 (DJR-088-33). Existing edition notes: DJR-041:E15, DJR-048:E18, DJR-088:E30. DJR-048:E18 retains Burton’s admission that his own charity fails amid the attack. DJR-088:E30 identifies the sarcastic Virgilian echo; the praise in that passage is not straightforward approval.

[13504] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 252 (DJR-075-01); p. 291 (DJR-083-20). Existing edition notes: DJR-075:E01, DJR-083:E18. DJR-075:E01 preserves Burton’s grouping of new stars with comets, dates and constellation labels. DJR-083:E18 explains the six non-naturals and leaves the Bacon references without a claim of complete collation.

Generous

Source forms: generous; generosity; generous wines[13505]

The word. Generous can mean noble in birth, disposition or spirit. Generosity can accordingly mean greatness of spirit, while generous wine is excellent or full-bodied. Willingness to give is not the common meaning of these examples.

In Burton. Noble spirits suffer intensely from disgrace and adversity. In the account of extraordinary endurance, generosity is reconsidered as frenzy or insensibility, and Burton intervenes to distinguish madness or desperation from melancholy. The death catalogue uses generous courage as attributed praise. Fine wines belong to another context altogether, the display of luxury.

The places. Generous minds suffer from public disgrace. (p. 99 [supplied]; DJR-040-29.) Generous spirits withdraw under adversity. (p. 160; DJR-053-47.) Generosity is reconsidered in an account of endurance. (p. 192; DJR-060-26.) Generous courage appears in reported praise of voluntary deaths. (p. 216; DJR-066-07.) Generous describes wine in a scene of luxury. (p. 270; DJR-079-05.)

In this edition. “Generous minds” → “Noble minds” (DJR-040-29); “generous spirits” → “noble spirits” (DJR-053-47); “this generosity” → “this nobility of spirit” (DJR-060-26); “generous courage” → “noble courage” (DJR-066-07); “generous wines” → “fine wines” (DJR-079-05). Noble and nobility preserve the social and moral register. Fine gives the different evaluative sense for wine.

See also. Honest; Absolute.

Geniture

Source forms: geniture; casting a nativity; genitures; Genethliacal; Lords of the geniture; nativity; cast a Nativity[13506]

The word. Geniture can name a birth or its astrological figure. A nativity in these passages is a birth horoscope; genethliacal describes judgments based on births. Lords of the geniture are the planets thought to rule that figure.

In Burton. Burton uses natal astrology in his self-portrait and among supposed predispositions to melancholy. He can also ridicule genethliacal studies and, elsewhere, allow casting a nativity as an absorbing exercise. The vocabulary recurs across personal description, causal theory, satire and qualified recreation, with different argumentative purposes.

The places. Burton describes his birth chart. (p. 3; DJR-002-03.) An astrologer’s fee supplies a satirical comparison. (p. 60; DJR-015-40.) Adverse birth charts are listed as predispositions. (p. 33; DJR-027-24.) Genethliacal studies are ridiculed. (p. 167; DJR-055-21.) Planets are called rulers of the geniture. (p. 190 [first occurrence]; DJR-060-02.) Saturn’s predominance is linked with character. (p. 190 [first occurrence]; DJR-060-04.) Casting a nativity is permitted in some cases as an exercise. (p. 285; DJR-082-11.)

In this edition. “my geniture” → “my birth chart” (DJR-002-03); “casting a Nativity” → “casting a birth horoscope” (DJR-015-40); “genitures” → “birth charts” (DJR-027-24); “Genethliacal studies” → “studies of birth horoscopes” (DJR-055-21); “Lords of the geniture” → “rulers of the nativity” (DJR-060-02); “his nativity” → “a person’s nativity” (DJR-060-04); “cast a Nativity” → “cast a birth horoscope" (DJR-082-11). Birth chart and birth horoscope explain the common sense; nativity remains where the technical language is retained and locally glossed.

[13505] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 99 [supplied] (DJR-040-29); p. 160 (DJR-053-47); p. 192 (DJR-060-26); p. 216 (DJR-066-07); p. 270 (DJR-079-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-040:E22, DJR-053:E37, DJR-060:E25, DJR-066:E07, DJR-079:E05. DJR-053:E37 records competing accounts of Terence’s death. DJR-066:E07 identifies the catalogue as a mixture of historical and literary examples, not a verified list. Burton’s own intervention in DJR-060-26 remains distinct from the view he reports.

[13506] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 3 (DJR-002-03); p. 60 (DJR-015-40); p. 33 (DJR-027-24); p. 167 (DJR-055-21); p. 190 [first occurrence] (DJR-060-02); p. 190 [first occurrence] (DJR-060-04); p. 285 (DJR-082-11). Existing edition notes: DJR-002:E04, DJR-002:E05, DJR-015:E23, DJR-027:E15, DJR-055:E20, DJR-060:E01, DJR-060:E03, DJR-082:E11. The causal claims belong to the historical astrology. DJR-015:E23 leaves Cardan’s fee unlocated. DJR-060:E01 distinguishes the two source pages numbered 190 by scan position; those qualifications remain in the locators.

See also. Astrology.

Genus and species

Source forms: summum genus; specifical difference; genus; species[13507]

The word. Genus and species are levels of logical classification. Summum genus names the highest or broadest class in a definition; a specifical difference is the feature that distinguishes a species within its genus.

In Burton. The attempt to define melancholy asks both for its broad class and for what distinguishes it. The objection about imagination and the brain is therefore logical as well as medical. Elsewhere, genus and species become a comic shorthand for academic philosophy, forced to walk while medicine and law provide wealth and honours.

The places. Summum genus identifies the broad class in a definition. (p. 31; DJR-027-09.) The definition is criticized for lacking its distinctive features. (p. 31; DJR-027-08.) Genus and species stand for poorly rewarded philosophy. (p. 133; DJR-047-25.)

In this edition. "summum genus" → "highest general category" (DJR-027-09); "specifical difference" → "distinctive features" (DJR-027-08); "genus & species" → "genus and species" (DJR-047-25). Plain equivalents explain the logical role in the definition. The Latin terms remain in the verse because their personification carries the joke.

See also. Equivocation.

Glass

Source forms: glass[13508]

The word. Glass here means a mirror. It names the reflective object used in the reported divinatory procedure, rather than a drinking vessel or merely the material glass.

In Burton. Burton describes a mirror lowered on a thread at a spring near Ceres' temple, where the outcome of illness was supposedly revealed. He groups this with another oracle and concludes that ordinary people have been deceived about future events. The procedure is divination, not a medical examination.

The places. A glass is lowered at the spring oracle. (p. 166; DJR-055-08.)

In this edition. "A glass let down by a thred" → "a mirror was lowered on a thread" (DJR-055-08). Mirror identifies the object immediately, allowing the reader to follow the procedure without importing another common sense of glass.

See also. Catoptrics and perspectives; Lodestone and adamant; Fascination.

Gossip

Source forms: gossips[13509]

[13507] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 31 (DJR-027-09); p. 31 (DJR-027-08); p. 133 (DJR-047-25). Existing edition notes: DJR-027:E05, DJR-027:E06, DJR-047:E24. DJR-027:E06 preserves a more precise marginal distinction than the body supplies. DJR-047:E24 explains that the nearby Buchanan attribution securely belongs to the following couplet, not demonstrably to the genus-and-species lines.

[13508] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 166 (DJR-055-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-055:E08. DJR-055:E08 locates the two accounts in Pausanias 7.21.12–13 and records the difference between the printed Thrixeus and the modern Thyrxeus. This source identification does not confirm the oracle's predictive claim.

[13509] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 102 (DJR-041-16); p. 169–170 (DJR-056-10). Existing edition notes: DJR-041:E14, DJR-056:E08. DJR-056:E08 records the earlier association with fellow godparent and leaves the exact Ronsse wording uncollated. The undisclosed infirmity remains unspecified, as in Burton's account.

The word. Gossips can be familiar companions or associates, especially women in social company. In the second example a gossip is a familiar female friend. The noun need not identify a habitual spreader of rumours.

In Burton. The general account of rivalry finds factions even among small groups of companions. The later case describes a woman publicly reproached by one of her gossips after a quarrel, then withdrawing from society. Although the story involves disclosure, the noun first identifies the relationship between the women.

The places. Rivalry occurs among familiar companions. (p. 102; DJR-041-16.) A woman quarrels with a female friend. (p. 169–170; DJR-056-10.)

In this edition. “amongst Gossips” → “among familiar companions” (DJR-041-16); “one of her Gossips” → “one of her female friends” (DJR-056-10). Companions and female friends preserve the social sense. The public reproach is narrated separately rather than built into the meaning of gossip.

See also. Conversation; Familiar; Jealousy.

Grace

Source forms: grace[13510]

The word. Grace in the religious discussion concerns God’s mercy and help in salvation. Burton distinguishes its presence from a person’s immediate feeling of it, and contrasts it with reliance on unaided natural powers.

In Burton. The consolation argues that the longing to repent may be accepted by God even when the sufferer feels deficient. Burton then calls grief over the lack of grace itself grace. Later, he surveys disputed accounts of universal grace and attacks a position he attributes to the author called Caelius. These passages combine pastoral reassurance with contested theological description.

The places. A lack of felt signs is answered with patience. (p. 709; DJR-167-05.) The desire to repent is distinguished from repentance in its nature. (p. 710; DJR-167-09.) Grief over a lack of grace is itself called grace. (p. 710; DJR-167-13.) Universal grace appears in a survey of disputed teachings. (p. 715; DJR-168-02.) Unaided natural powers are contrasted with grace. (p. 715; DJR-168-09.)

In this edition. “Gods Grace” → “God’s grace” (DJR-167-09); “to feel in our selves the want of grace” → “to feel the lack of grace within ourselves” (DJR-167-13); “grace is common to all that will beleeve” → “grace is available to all who will believe” (DJR-168-02); “ex puris naturalibus” → “by their unaided natural powers” (DJR-168-09). Grace is retained. The distinction between repentance in its nature and in God’s acceptance remains explicit; removing it would turn a qualified reassurance into a simple identity.

See also. Despair.

Green sickness

Source forms: green sickness[13511]

The word. Green sickness is the historical diagnosis also called chlorosis. Burton associates it here with young women who grow weak and thin. The name belongs to the older account of nourishment and blood-making, and is retained as a historical term.

[13510] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 709 (DJR-167-05); p. 710 (DJR-167-09); p. 710 (DJR-167-13); p. 715 (DJR-168-02); p. 715 (DJR-168-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-167:E05, DJR-167:E09, DJR-167:E13, DJR-168:E02, DJR-168:E09. DJR-167:E09 gives a Perkins parallel without identifying Burton’s edition. No work is specified for the Chrysostom attribution. DJR-168:E02 and E09 preserve the limits of Burton’s compressed doctrinal groupings and his doubts about Caelius’s identity.

[13511] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 503 (DJR-126-30). Existing edition notes: DJR-126:E22. DJR-126:E22 identifies chlorosis and explains the older physiology. The article does not infer a present diagnosis from Burton’s symptoms.

In Burton. In the account of love's bodily effects, the liver is said to fail to turn food into blood because the spirits are distracted. Burton sets green sickness in young women beside cachexia, a poor bodily condition, in men. His garden plants withering for lack of rain make the supposed failure of nourishment visible.

The places. Green sickness follows the account of wasting and insufficient nourishment. (p. 503; DJR-126-30.)

In this edition. "green sickness" → "green sickness" (DJR-126-30). The retained name is explained by the local note. Cachexia and poor bodily condition preserve the accompanying comparison without collapsing the two historical labels.

See also. Matrix and mother; Humoral qualities; Heroical love.

Habit and disposition

Source forms: habit; in disposition; disposition; ill habit; habit of Melancholy; habitual melancholy; habituated; intellectual habits[13512]

The word. Habit can mean an established condition, a bodily constitution, an acquired intellectual capacity, or outward dress and appearance. Disposition commonly names a less settled tendency or state. Habitual and habituated describe the establishment of a condition, rather than merely frequent behaviour.

In Burton. The distinction between disposition and habit helps Burton move from general folly to melancholy as an illness. Repeated disturbances can become settled, and an established illness can be difficult to cure. Yet the same noun also names the guise of someone hiding himself, a dead wife's supposed appearance and a lover's clothing. Intellectual habits belong to the philosophical account of capacities; the monk's habit may include both clothing and manner of life.

The places. Passing disposition and settled habit are followed by habit as a disguise. (p. 39; DJR-011-19.) The argument turns away from merely being disposed to melancholy. (p. 76; DJR-019-15.) The disease classification distinguishes habit from disposition. (p. 7; DJR-022-10.) Excessive purging produces a bad bodily condition. (p. 81; DJR-036-26.) Repeated disturbances become an established disposition. (p. 92; DJR-038-41.) A disposition advances to a settled condition. (p. 104; DJR-041-30.) Loss is said to cause lasting melancholy. (p. 164; DJR-054-37.) Established illness is discussed in the prognosis. (p. 213; DJR-065-09.) Habit names the body's condition in a definition of disease. (p. 6; DJR-022-02.) Habit is the dead wife's apparent form. (p. 438; DJR-114-01.) Habit belongs to the catalogue of a lover's appearance. (p. 522–523; DJR-129-82.) A monk's habit and way of life are changed. (p. 705; DJR-166-11.) Intellectual habits occur in the account of understanding. (p. 28–29; DJR-026-31.)

In this edition. "one in disposition, another in habit" → "a passing disposition, in another an established condition" (DJR-011-19); "an unknown habit" → "an unfamiliar guise" (DJR-011-19); "in disposition" → "merely disposed that way" (DJR-019-15); "in Habit or in Disposition" → "established as a habit or present as a disposition" (DJR-022-10); "an ill habit" → "a bad bodily condition" (DJR-036-26); "an habit of Melancholy" → "an established disposition to melancholy" (DJR-038-41); "an habit" → "a settled condition" (DJR-041-30); "habitual melancholy" → "settled melancholy" (DJR-054-37); "if once it be habituated" → "once it has become established" (DJR-065-09); "an ill habit of the body" → "an unhealthy condition of the body" (DJR-022-02); "in her habit" → "in her form" (DJR-114-01); "habit, gesture" → "dress and gesture" (DJR-129-82); "altering his habit" → "changing his habit"

[13512] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 39 (DJR-011-19); p. 76 (DJR-019-15); p. 7 (DJR-022-10); p. 81 (DJR-036-26); p. 92 (DJR-038-41); p. 104 (DJR-041-30); p. 164 (DJR-054-37); p. 213 (DJR-065-09); p. 6 (DJR-022-02); p. 438 (DJR-114-01); p. 522–523 (DJR-129-82); p. 705 (DJR-166-11); p. 28–29 (DJR-026-31). Existing edition notes: DJR-011:E17, DJR-019:E12, DJR-022:E01, DJR-022:E08, DJR-026:E24, DJR-036:E19, DJR-041:E25, DJR-054:E31, DJR-065:E08, DJR-114:E01, DJR-129:E54, DJR-166:E07. DJR-026:E24 records the earlier witness supporting the supplied art in the intellectual-habits passage. DJR-054:E31 preserves friends in the body beside children in the margin. DJR-065:E08 treats incurability as a historical judgment. The Bellovacus reference's relation to the monk's story remains unresolved, and Sabinus's reported supernatural story remains uncollated.

(DJR-166-11); “intellectual habits” → “intellectual habits” (DJR-026-31). Context determines whether the modern text uses condition, disposition, guise, form or dress, or retains habit with explanation. Established disposition in the repeated-disturbance passage has the force of a settled state; disposition alone does not carry one fixed meaning throughout the edition.

See also. Melancholy; Counterfeit; Tires and weeds.

Happily

Source forms: happily[13513]

The word. Happily can mean perhaps or by good fortune. Here it introduces a possible explanation of relief, rather than describing a cheerful manner of giving advice.

In Burton. Burton describes distress relieved by telling a trusted friend. The friend’s counsel, wisdom or helpful intervention may accomplish what the sufferer cannot do alone. Happily qualifies the means of relief in this account.

The places. A friend’s counsel is proposed as the means of relief. (p. 293; DJR-083-33.)

In this edition. “by his counsel happily” → “perhaps through his counsel” (DJR-083-33). Perhaps makes the qualifying force explicit and avoids suggesting that the friend is merely speaking cheerfully.

See also. Still.

Happiness and fortune

Source forms: happinesse; halcyonian times[13514]

The word. Happiness may include good fortune or favourable circumstances as well as contentment. Halcyonian times are calm, secure times: an image of conditions in which a person might feel safe and satisfied.

In Burton. Hippocrates admires the freedom that allows Democritus to pursue his inquiry, contrasting it with his own household obligations. In the later account of discontent, Burton denies that any settled period of security satisfies us: what we eagerly seek may weary us once obtained.

The places. Hippocrates admires Democritus’s favourable circumstances and leisure. (p. 24; DJR-008-11.) Halcyonian times figure an elusive security and contentment. (p. 107; DJR-042-19.)

In this edition. “happinesse and leasure” → “good fortune and leisure” (DJR-008-11); “Halcyonian times” → “halcyon days” (DJR-042-19). Good fortune emphasizes the circumstances that make inquiry possible. Halcyon days retains the familiar image, while the following clause states its sense.

See also. Constancy; Hope; Mediocrity.

Heart and cordolium

Source forms: Cordolium[13515]

The word. Cordolium is literally heart-pain or heartache. In this passage it names grief that ordinary comforts cannot remove, rather than supplying an anatomical diagnosis.

[13513] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 293 (DJR-083-33). Existing edition notes: DJR-083:E30. DJR-083:E30 identifies a contextual parallel in Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 9.11, and treats the mandrake-wine comparison as an image of sedation.

[13514] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 24 (DJR-008-11); p. 107 (DJR-042-19). Existing edition notes: DJR-008:E11, DJR-042:E16. DJR-042:E16 explains the kingfisher tradition and the difference between Boethius’s ignorance of an untried condition and Burton’s recasting of it as desire. That difference remains visible.

[13515] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 184 (DJR-059-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-059:E08. DJR-059:E08 explains that Menedemus drove his son abroad by opposing his love affair. The article retains that narrative distinction.

In Burton. Menedemus's servants attend to his clothes, bed and supper, but these acts cannot reach his distress over his absent son. The list of practical comforts makes the persistence of the heartache more forceful.

The places. The father's grief survives his servants' efforts to comfort him. (p. 184; DJR-059-08.)

In this edition. "Cordolium" → "heartache" (DJR-059-08). Heartache preserves both the bodily image and the emotional sense. The surrounding lost his son means that the son has gone away; it does not report his death.

See also. Sorrow.

Helleborism

Source forms: Helleborismum[13516]

The word. Helleborism here means treatment with hellebore. The Latin Helleborismum occurs in a marginal remedy, naming treatment rather than a separate disease.

In Burton. Burton closes this part of the discussion of young women's illnesses by directing readers to medical authorities on diet, bloodletting and other remedies. The margin singles out enemas and Mattioli's treatment with hellebore for praise. Keeping the margin distinct from the body prevents its term from becoming an extra diagnosis in the catalogue.

The places. The treatment survey carries a marginal reference to hellebore. (p. 203–204; DJR-063-06.)

In this edition. "Helleborismum" → "treatment with hellebore" (DJR-063:B03; margin). The equivalent comes from the translated marginal note. Helleborism is the article heading; the book's note explains the treatment directly.

See also. Purging; Calenture and ague.

Herbal

Source forms: Herbal[13517]

The word. An herbal is a book describing plants and their properties. A well-cut herbal is well engraved; the adjective concerns the making of its illustrations, not the cutting of herbs.

In Burton. Burton includes illustrated plant books among the pleasures of study and looking. His list culminates in Besler's large herbal, praised for natural colours and plants depicted at their own size. The book serves as an example of absorbing visual recreation.

The places. Illustrated herbals provide pleasure through accurate-looking plant images. (p. 280; DJR-081-06.)

In this edition. "a well cut Herbal" → "a well-engraved herbal" (DJR-081-06). Well-engraved clarifies the workmanship. Herbal remains the book's historical genre, explained here and in the local note.

See also. Art; Pine apple.

[13516] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 203–204 (DJR-063-06). Existing edition notes: DJR-063:B03, DJR-063:E06. DJR-063:B03, printed page 203, second star, reads "Clisteres & Helleborismum Mathioli summè laudat." DJR-063:E06 distinguishes the remedy from a disease name and records the separate printed errors may and malancholy. The prescriptions remain historical.

[13517] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 280 (DJR-081-06). Existing edition notes: DJR-081:E06. DJR-081:E06 identifies Besler's Hortus Eystettensis, published in 1613. The claim that almost every plant is life-size remains Burton's description; last means recent rather than final.

Heroical love

Source forms: Knight melancholy; heroical; Ilishi; Elishi[13518]

The word. Heroical love is a historical category of erotic love associated with melancholy. The name does not by itself praise courage or nobility. Knight's melancholy belongs to the same vocabulary, while Ilishi and Elishi are printed forms in Burton's citations of Avicenna.

In Burton. Burton's early classification reserves love melancholy for the Third Partition. Its synopsis places heroic melancholy before marriage and jealousy after it. The detailed discussion then questions the honourable title, preferring burning lust, and describes sustained preoccupation with the beloved. A later treatment passage uses the variant Elishi for the same general subject.

The places. Knight's melancholy is reserved for the Third Partition. (p. 35–36; DJR-027-52.) The synopsis distinguishes heroic melancholy from jealousy. (unnumbered [403]; DJR-107-06.) Burton challenges the honourable name. (p. 442; DJR-115-01.) The Avicennian definition describes persistent preoccupation. (p. 446; DJR-115-49.) Elishi appears in a treatment citation. (p. 554; DJR-135-55.) The section heading identifies love as a cause of melancholy. (p. 433; DJR-113-01.)

In this edition. "Knight melancholy" → "knight's melancholy" (DJR-027-52); "Heroical" → "heroic" (DJR-107-06); "Heroicall Love" → "heroic love" (DJR-115-01); "Ilishi" → "Ilishi" (DJR-115-49); "Elishi" → "Elishi" (DJR-135-55); "Heroicall love causing Melancholy" → "Love melancholy" (DJR-113-01). The heading makes the subject explicit as love melancholy; the prose retains heroic where Burton's argument turns on the name. The two Avicennian spellings remain distinct.

See also. Melancholy; Green sickness; Love.

Homely

Source forms: homely[13519]

The word. Homely describes plain or shabby appearance in these examples, especially clothing. It does not mean comfortable and welcoming, and need not be a judgment of someone's natural features.

In Burton. Burton's account of poverty shows learning and merit overlooked because people are poorly dressed. The stories of Philopoemen, Terence and Dante turn outward appearance into an obstacle to recognition and hospitality.

The places. Plain clothing causes people of merit to be treated dismissively. (p. 161; DJR-053-49.)

In this edition. "homely attired" → "plainly dressed" (DJR-053-49); "homely outside" → "shabby appearance" (DJR-053-49). The translations locate the judgment in dress and presentation, preserving the social point of the examples.

See also. Tires and weeds; Fulsome.

Honest

Source forms: honest; honest mirth; honesty[13520]

[13518] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 35–36 (DJR-027-52); unnumbered [403] (DJR-107-06); p. 442 (DJR-115-01); p. 446 (DJR-115-49); p. 554 (DJR-135-55); p. 433 (DJR-113-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-027:E32, DJR-113:E01, DJR-115:E01, DJR-115:E39, DJR-135:E48. DJR-027:E32 explains why this last refers back to love melancholy despite the intervening lycanthropy. The precise history of Knight melancholy and the cited Latin forms remains unverified; DJR-115:E39 and DJR-135:E48 preserve that limit. The synopsis's unnumbered pagination is retained.

[13519] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 161 (DJR-053-49). Existing edition notes: DJR-053:E38. DJR-053:E38 identifies Philopoemen as the general, despite Burton's orator, and explains that the Terence anecdote compresses a reversal from a lowly seat to an invitation to dine. The Dante reference remains uncollated.

[13520] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 29 (DJR-026-36); p. 301–302 (DJR-085-30); p. 312 (DJR-087-39). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E27, DJR-085:E28. DJR-085:E28 identifies Gómez Miedes while leaving the precise preface and Galateus folio uncollated. The Plutarch saying remains Burton's attribution.

The word. Honest can mean morally honourable or wholesome; honesty can name honour or moral worth. Truthfulness is therefore only one possible part of its wider ethical sense.

In Burton. The rational will seeks what is honourable, whereas sensitive appetite seeks pleasure. Honest mirth is merriment that can be praised as wholesome. In the discussion of appearance, honesty is contrasted with beauty, and wisdom may be hidden by a threadbare coat.

The places. Honest names the object of the rational will. (p. 29; DJR-026-36.) Honest mirth is praised as relief for the mind. (p. 301–302; DJR-085-30.) Honesty and beauty are contrasted. (p. 312; DJR-087-39.)

In this edition. "this honest" → "what is morally honourable" (DJR-026-36); "honest mirth" → "wholesome merriment" (DJR-085-30); "honesty and beauty" → "Honour and beauty" (DJR-087-39). The equivalents distinguish moral worth and acceptable pleasure from the narrower question of telling the truth.

See also. Quean and slut; Generous; Brave; Proper; Favour and feature; Virtue.

Hope

Source forms: Hope[13521]

The word. Hope is an emotion directed towards an absent good in Burton's account of the passions. In the religious discussion, expectation of good must also be distinguished from the assurance a troubled believer fears he lacks.

In Burton. The classification places hope with love, desire and longing when the good object is absent, whereas its presence produces joy. The later sufferer's objection concerns weak faith and the difficulty of distinguishing assurance from presumption. These are related problems of expectation and confidence, but the second passage is not another definition of hope.

The places. Hope arises in relation to an absent good. (p. 25; DJR-025-28.) The sufferer questions the grounds of spiritual assurance. (p. 714; DJR-167-54.)

In this edition. "Hope, Love, Desire, and Concupiscence" → "hope, love, desire and longing" (DJR-025-28); "discern my security from carnall presumption" → "distinguish my assurance from fleshly presumption" (DJR-167-54). Hope remains in the classification. Assurance clarifies security in the related theological passage without treating the two words as interchangeable.

See also. Passion; Happiness and fortune; Faith and assurance.

Hospital

Source forms: hospitals; spittle[13522]

The word. A hospital can be a charitable residence or institution of care, not only a place for medical treatment. Spittle is a shortened form of hospital, often referring to provision for the sick or poor.

In Burton. Burton's proposed commonwealth provides institutions for children, older people, soldiers and others as well as the sick. In the attack on uncharitable wealth, a hospital and spittle join orphans and a prison in a petition that the passing rich man refuses to hear.

The places. The proposed commonwealth includes institutions for several groups. (p. 61; DJR-016-06.) Institutions for vulnerable people petition for help. (p. 430; DJR-112-16.)

[13521] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 25 (DJR-025-28); p. 714 (DJR-167-54). Existing edition notes: DJR-025:E20, DJR-167:E53. DJR-025:E20 retains Burton's tension between natural emotions and reason's government of appetite. DJR-167:E53 identifies the later speech as the sufferer's renewed objection, rather than the author's verdict on that person.

[13522] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 61 (DJR-016-06); p. 430 (DJR-112-16). Existing edition notes: DJR-016:E03, DJR-112:E16. DJR-016:E03 explains the wider charitable sense. DJR-112:E16 treats the suffering and ignored appeal as part of Burton's moral indictment.

In this edition. “hospitals of all kinds” → “institutions of every kind” (DJR-016-06); “an Hospital, a Spittle” → “a hospital, a shelter for the sick” (DJR-112-16). Institutions preserves the breadth of the first list. Shelter for the sick explains spittle while hospital remains beside it in the second.

See also. Church patronage; Entertain.

Humane learning

Source forms: humanity; philologer[13523]

The word. Humanity can name secular learning, especially the study of language and literature, in contrast with divinity or theology. A philologer is a student of language and literature; the term does not mean someone chiefly distinguished by kindness.

In Burton. Burton defends his decision to write on medicine by conceding that other subjects within secular learning and theology would have been more familiar to him. His satire of rewards then shows fashionable skills and practical services bringing advancement sooner than literary study.

The places. Humanity is paired with divinity as a field of study. (p. 14; DJR-006-10.) The philologer is poorly rewarded beside other workers. (p. 37–38; DJR-011-09.)

In this edition. “humanity and divinity” → “secular learning and theology” (DJR-006-10); “a philologer or a poet” → “a student of literature or a poet” (DJR-011-09). The modern terms identify the subjects and the scholar’s activity. The article heading gathers this educational vocabulary rather than quoting one phrase from the passages.

See also. Divine; Cento; Neoterics.

Humoral qualities

Source forms: cold and dry; temperature[13524]

The word. Cold and dry are bodily qualities in humoral physiology. Temperature can mean the balance of such qualities in a constitution, rather than a numerical measure of heat.

In Burton. Burton attributes coldness and dryness to older men in a discussion of jealous marriages, contrasting them with the supposed vigour of young wives. In the polemic about fasting, he describes bodily balance as endangered by practices to which excessive spiritual merit is attributed.

The places. Old age is described as naturally cold and dry. (p. 598; DJR-145-25.) The body’s temperature is disturbed by the condemned practices. (p. 655–656; DJR-156-06.)

In this edition. “cold and dry by nature” → “naturally cold and dry” (DJR-145-25); “the temperature of their bodies” → “the balance of their bodies” (DJR-156-06). The qualities remain literal terms within Burton’s historical model. Balance makes temperature intelligible without importing a thermometer reading.

See also. Humour; Green sickness.

Humour

Source forms: gross humors; humorous; simple[13525]

[13523] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 14 (DJR-006-10); p. 37–38 (DJR-011-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-011:E08. DJR-011:E08 leaves paint Thais open between portrayal and cosmetic adornment. That uncertainty does not affect the comparison of rewards for literary study.

[13524] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 598 (DJR-145-25); p. 655–656 (DJR-156-06). Existing edition notes: DJR-145:E17, DJR-156:E06. DJR-145:E17 explains the contrast with full of sap and the reference to Chaucer’s January. DJR-156:E06 distinguishes Burton’s attack on claims for fasting from a rejection of all restraint in eating.

[13525] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 173 (DJR-056-53); p. 186 (DJR-059-30); p. 207 (DJR-064-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-056:E42, DJR-059:E28, DJR-064:E05. DJR-064:E05 distinguishes constitutional black bile from disease and preserves the body’s half-blood mixture beside the margin’s double proportion. The accounts of temperament and intellectual gifts are historical claims, with several cited medical passages still uncollated.

The word. Humours are bodily fluids within the historical physiological model. Their thickness, mixture and condition are said to affect both body and mind. Humorous can consequently describe a variable mood or disposition; it need not mean amusing.

In Burton. Burton argues that thick humours can obstruct the body and disturb the soul. His symptom catalogue then describes rapid changes between laughter and tears as humorous. In the discussion of exceptional intellect, the argument turns on a mixture of humours: simple means unmixed, while adust means scorched.

The places. Thick humours are said to disturb the soul. (p. 173; DJR-056-53.) Humorous describes extreme changes of mood. (p. 186; DJR-059-30.) The distinction between unmixed and mixed humours shapes the argument about intellect. (p. 207; DJR-064-05.)

In this edition. "gross humors" → "thick humours" (DJR-056-53); "Humorous they are beyond all measure" → "They are changeable beyond all measure" (DJR-059-30); "not of the simple" → "not the unmixed humour" (DJR-064-05). Thick, changeable and unmixed state the particular senses. Retaining humour elsewhere allows the historical bodily model to remain visible.

See also. Melancholy; Blood and sanguine; Choler; Phlegm; Complexion and temperament; Humoral qualities.

Hypochondria

Source forms: Hypocondries; hypocondries; Hypocondriacal[13526]

The word. The hypochondria are the upper abdominal regions beneath the ribs; hypochondrium is singular. Hypochondriacal therefore has an anatomical force in these passages, especially in relation to the spleen and supposed wind or vapours.

In Burton. The term appears both in the general map of the body and among the parts said to cause melancholy. The symptom discussion distinguishes right and left regions in connection with liver and spleen, then describes swelling and belching. Burton's introductory account similarly names hypochondriacal wind as a common trouble.

The places. Hypochondria occur in the catalogue of bodily causes. (p. 174; DJR-057-02.) The anatomical list locates the regions beneath the ribs. (p. 16; DJR-024-02.) Right and left hypochondria are associated with different symptoms. (p. 200; DJR-062-17.) Splenic hypochondriacal wind is emphasized. (p. 76; DJR-019-19.)

In this edition. "Hypocondries" → "hypochondria" (DJR-057-02); "hypocondries" → "regions beneath the ribs" (DJR-024-02); "right Hypocondrie" → "right hypochondrium" (DJR-062-17); "left Hypocondrie" → "left hypochondrium" (DJR-062-17); "Hypocondriacal winde" → "hypochondriacal wind" (DJR-019-19). The explanatory phrase in the anatomical list supports the technical terms retained elsewhere. They are not automatically equivalents for modern health anxiety.

See also. Melancholy; Spleen; Matrix and mother; Consent and essence; Vapours; Spirits.

Idiot

Source forms: idiots[13527]

The word. Idiots here means unlearned people. It is one term in a disparaging description of ignorance, not a precise designation of intellectual capacity.

[13526] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 174 (DJR-057-02); p. 16 (DJR-024-02); p. 200 (DJR-062-17); p. 76 (DJR-019-19). Existing edition notes: DJR-019:E15, DJR-024:E01, DJR-057:E01, DJR-062:E15. DJR-062:E15 explains that on the other side means on the other hand, not that the liver is on the left. The article retains the historical anatomy and causal account without turning them into a present diagnosis.

[13527] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 138 (DJR-048-29). Existing edition notes: DJR-048:E23. DJR-048:E23 leaves the Junius passage for collation and records the subject-based placement of a marginal proverb without a clear matching body marker.

In Burton. Burton argues that contempt for learning grows from lack of learning. His series of insults turns back on people who judge scholars by their own uncultivated standards.

The places. Idiots forms part of the attack on contempt for scholarship. (p. 138; DJR-048-29.)

In this edition. "idiots" → "unlearned" (DJR-048-29). Unlearned identifies the educational sense while the surrounding adjectives preserve the passage's hostility.

See also. Silly.

Idleness

Source forms: Idleness[13528]

The word. Idleness in this causal discussion means inactivity or lack of occupation. It is closely associated with excessive solitude, but the two remain distinct conditions.

In Burton. Burton calls too much solitude idleness's first cousin and accompanying cause. He then distinguishes solitude imposed on a person from solitude freely chosen. The kinship metaphor connects the causes without making all time alone identical with idleness.

The places. Excessive solitude is introduced as a companion of idleness. (p. 87; DJR-038-01.)

In this edition. "Cozen German to Idleness" → "First cousin to idleness" (DJR-038-01); "too much solitariness" → "too much being alone" (DJR-038-01). The wording preserves both the family metaphor and the qualification excessive. The distinction between imposed and voluntary solitude follows explicitly.

See also. Solitude.

Imagination

Source forms: phantasie; læsa imaginatio[13529]

The word. Imagination or phantasie is a mental faculty that forms or handles representations. Læsa imaginatio means impaired imagination. Corrupt imagination in the medical discussion describes a disordered faculty, not simply immoral subject matter.

In Burton. The faculty is classified with common sense and memory among the internal senses. It is then made a means by which passions disturb the heart and bodily spirits. Erotic melancholy, unwanted religious thoughts and frightening appearances supply different contexts for its activity. In the last case, Burton allows an internal bodily origin for things experienced as external.

The places. Imagination is one of the internal senses. (p. 22; DJR-025-04.) Impaired imagination is said to misinform the heart. (p. 92; DJR-039-03.) Erotic melancholy is located in the brain through impaired imagination. (p. 446; DJR-115-60.) Blasphemous thoughts are suggested to the imagination. (p. 711–712; DJR-167-27.) A disturbed brain can present frightening shapes. (p. 720; DJR-169-01.)

In this edition. "Phantasie" → "imagination" (DJR-025-04); "læsa Imaginatio" → "impaired imagination" (DJR-039-03); "corrupt imagination" → "an impaired imagination" (DJR-115-60); "our phantasies" → "our imaginations" (DJR-167-27); "crased phantasie" → "disordered imagination" (DJR-169-01). Imagination unites the varying spellings and forms. Impaired or disordered clarifies the medical force without erasing the separate moral and religious claims made elsewhere.

See also. Conceit; Species in perception; Simulacra; Cerebral chambers; Apprehension; Maternal impressions.

[13528] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 87 (DJR-038-01). The assertion that all physicians agree belongs to Burton's account. The passage presents solitude as both cause and symptom, then considers its causal role.

[13529] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 22 (DJR-025-04); p. 92 (DJR-039-03); p. 446 (DJR-115-60); p. 711–712 (DJR-167-27); p. 720 (DJR-169-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-025:E03, DJR-115:E48, DJR-167:E26, DJR-169:E01. DJR-115:E48 identifies the faculty's impairment; DJR-167:E26 preserves the compressed list of contributing conditions. DJR-169:E01 notes that allowing an internal cause does not yet exclude supernatural causes from Burton's argument.

Impertinent

Source forms: impertinent[13530]

The word. Impertinent means irrelevant or not belonging to the matter under discussion. The criticism here concerns whether a digression fits the book, rather than whether it is impolite.

In Burton. Burton justifies a digression on imagination because of its role in melancholy. He also defends digressions as refreshment for a weary reader, comparing them with sauce that revives a poor appetite.

The places. Burton answers the charge that digressions are frivolous and impertinent. (p. 93; DJR-039-06.)

In this edition. "frivolous and impertinent" → "frivolous and irrelevant" (DJR-039-06). Irrelevant states the objection directly. Burton's answer preserves both the digression's relevance to the illness and its restorative pleasure.

See also. Equivocation; Confer and conference.

Impostume

Source forms: impostume[13531]

The word. An impostume is an abscess. Burton uses the bodily image figuratively for accumulated matter in his head that presses to be discharged through writing.

In Burton. His account of beginning the book joins a burdened heart, a pregnant head and an abscess. Writing becomes an evacuation that promises relief. The succession of images explains his need to write without constituting a literal medical case history.

The places. Writing is represented as the discharge of an impostume. (p. 5; DJR-003-07.)

In this edition. "a kind of impostume in my head" → "a kind of abscess in my head" (DJR-003-07). Abscess supplies the recognizable bodily term, preserving its place beside pregnancy and evacuation in the account of authorship.

See also. Chirurgery.

Impotent

Source forms: impotent[13532]

The word. Impotent here means ungovernable or lacking self-command. Applied to desire, it concerns the inability to restrain a passion, rather than an absence of sexual capacity.

In Burton. Burton's preliminary catalogue calls love madness, a hell and an incurable force. The Latin phrase attributed to Seneca and its following English explanation emphasize raging desire that has escaped control, anticipating the later treatment of love melancholy.

The places. Love is described as impotent and raging lust. (p. 72; DJR-018-16.)

In this edition. "impotentem & insanam libidinem" → "ungovernable and insane desire" (DJR-018-16); "an impotent and raging lust" → "an uncontrolled and raging lust" (DJR-018-16). Ungovernable and uncontrolled make the older sense explicit. The Latin formulation and Burton's English restatement remain separate.

[13530] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 93 (DJR-039-06). Existing edition notes: DJR-039:E04. DJR-039:E04 explains the medical imagery applied to the construction of the book. Beroaldus remains Burton's named authority for the defence.

[13531] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 5 (DJR-003-07). Existing edition notes: DJR-003:E10. DJR-003:E10 explains the burdened heart, pregnant head and guiding genius. These images describe the pressure to write.

[13532] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 72 (DJR-018-16). Existing edition notes: DJR-018:E11. DJR-018:E11 records the announcement of the later love discussion and leaves the particular Cicero remarriage anecdote unlocated.

See also. Concupiscence; Will and nill.

Incubus

Source forms: incubus; witch-ridden[13533]

The word. Incubus names an oppressive nightmare experience, described here as being ridden or crushed in sleep. Witch-ridden expresses the sufferer's supposed explanation of that pressure.

In Burton. The disease list includes incubus among disorders associated with parts of the brain. In the discussion of imagination, the sleeper imagines an old woman sitting heavily on the body. Burton explains the experience through humours and vapours troubling imagination, replacing the supposed assailant with an internal cause.

The places. Incubus occurs in the catalogue of disorders. (p. 7–8; DJR-022-14.) The witch-ridden sleeper imagines an old woman's weight. (p. 93; DJR-039-10.)

In this edition. "Incubus" → "nightmare oppression" (DJR-022-14); "Incubus, or Witch-ridden" → "incubus, or "witch-ridden,"" (DJR-039-10). Nightmare oppression explains the catalogue term. The later technical name and familiar expression remain together because the passage itself describes their experience.

See also. Daemon and genius.

Indifferent

Source forms: indifferent[13534]

The word. Indifferent means middling in this passage: occupying a middle rank between the supposedly wise and those dismissed as fools. It does not describe a lack of interest or concern.

In Burton. Burton mocks competing claims to superiority. After the saying that some peoples have two eyes, others one and others none, he depicts the reader's own party as claiming wisdom, granting a middle place to some outsiders and contemptuously dismissing the rest.

The places. Indifferent marks the middle rank in a satirical classification. (p. 40; DJR-011-24.)

In this edition. "others indifferent" → "others are middling" (DJR-011-24). Middling makes the hierarchy legible. The translation preserves the insults and the turn against the person who laughs at others.

See also. Judgment; Mediocrity; Honest.

Inseparable and individual

Source forms: individuall; numericall[13535]

The word. Individual can mean indivisible or inseparable. Numerical identity, by contrast, means being the very same particular thing. The two examples turn on closeness and sameness in different senses.

[13533] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 7–8 (DJR-022-14); p. 93 (DJR-039-10). Existing edition notes: DJR-022:E11, DJR-022:E12, DJR-022:E13, DJR-039:E06. DJR-022:E11 cautions against assigning the historical labels exact present diagnoses. DJR-039:E06 identifies Burton's explanation through humours and imagination as his historical physiology.

[13534] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 40 (DJR-011-24). Existing edition notes: DJR-011:E22. DJR-011:E22 leaves the precise sources of the Chinese saying and Scaliger's contempt unresolved. Their role here is to expose reciprocal claims to superiority.

[13535] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 183 (DJR-059-01); p. 190 (DJR-059-53). Existing edition notes: DJR-059:E01, DJR-059:E47. DJR-059:E01 explains the paired companions and Trophonius's cave. DJR-059:E47 notes that the comparisons organize varied symptoms without resolving the contradictions already catalogued.

In Burton. Sorrow is described as melancholy's inseparable companion through paired saints and the faithful Achates. Later, the image of a river distinguishes the same place from the same water, helping Burton describe a disease that shows likeness amid varied symptoms.

The places. Individual describes the inseparability of companions. (p. 183; DJR-059-01.) Numerical identity is distinguished from sameness of place. (p. 190; DJR-059-53.)

In this edition. "as individuall as Saint Cosmus and Damian" → "as inseparable as Saints Cosmas and Damian" (DJR-059-01); "the same numericall water" → "the very same water" (DJR-059-53). Inseparable avoids the modern implication of separateness. Very same states numerical identity in ordinary language while leaving the river comparison intact.

See also. Actuality.

Intellect

Source forms: intellectus agens; discoursing; agent[13536]

The word. The active intellect, intellectus agens, is the mind's active power of understanding. Discoursing means reasoning through successive steps. These terms concern intellectual activity, although Burton can also use them playfully.

In Burton. The anatomy of understanding begins with sensory objects and proceeds through reasoning towards corporeal and spiritual substance. Its classifications include active and passive understanding. Elsewhere, Burton puts the active intellect in craftspeople's fingertips, making philosophical vocabulary praise practical skill.

The places. The active intellect is humorously lodged in skilled fingers. (p. 55; DJR-014-34.) The activities and divisions of understanding are listed. (p. 28; DJR-026-27.)

In this edition. "intellectus agens" → "active intellect" (DJR-014-34); "by discoursing" → "by reasoning" (DJR-026-27); "Discoursing, Reasoning" → "discursive thought, reasoning" (DJR-026-27); "Agent, and Patient" → "active and passive" (DJR-026-27). The renderings distinguish reasoning from conversation. Active intellect retains the technical term where Burton's joke depends on placing it in the hands.

See also. Faculty; Actuality.

Intelligence

Source forms: intelligence[13537]

The word. An intelligence here is an immaterial being or mover understood to animate or move a celestial body. It does not simply mean cleverness or information.

In Burton. Burton surveys claims that the earth and stars possess souls. Intelligence stands alongside soul and angel in the proposed account of a star's life or motion. The surrounding catalogue assembles several philosophical traditions rather than setting out a single agreed doctrine.

The places. A star is said to have a soul, angel or intelligence. (p. 252–253; DJR-075-06.)

In this edition. "intelligence to animate or move it" → "intelligence to give it life or motion" (DJR-075-06). The noun remains, while the expanded verbs clarify what this supposed being does. The local note supplies immaterial mover.

See also. Astrology; Essence and quintessence.

[13536] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 55 (DJR-014-34); p. 28 (DJR-026-27). Existing edition notes: DJR-014:E21, DJR-026:E21. DJR-014:E21 leaves the fingertip saying's attribution to Sallust unresolved. DJR-026:E21 explains the difference between possessing an enduring capacity and exercising it.

[13537] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 252–253 (DJR-075-06). Existing edition notes: DJR-075:E06. DJR-075:E06 cautions that Burton's assembled traditions should not be harmonized or assigned identically to every author named.

Intention and remission

Source forms: intended; remitted; intention; intentive; remiss; intend[13538]

The word. Intend can mean strengthen, intensify or direct attention; remit can mean lessen or relax. Intention may mean tension or strain, and intentive describes concentrated attention. These senses do not reduce to planning an action or forgiving an offence.

In Burton. Burton repeatedly describes symptoms and imagination as heightened or diminished. The same vocabulary applies to strengthening hearing and fixing attention on someone's beauty. In the account of appetite and mental exertion, intention is strain, while intentive operations demand concentration. Remiss illness is comparatively mild.

The places. The severity of impairment varies among people. (p. 8; DJR-022-18.) Imagination is heightened or relaxed. (p. 96; DJR-039-34.) Symptoms intensify or diminish with further disturbance. (p. 202; DJR-062-30.) Tension and concentrated operations burden the soul. (p. 208; DJR-064-11.) Remiss describes a less severe form of illness. (p. 212; DJR-065-06.) An instrument is said to strengthen hearing. (p. 284; DJR-082-05.) The lover is told not to fix special attention on a woman. (p. 550; DJR-135-05.) Symptoms grow stronger or weaker with the illness. (p. 704; DJR-165-46.)

In this edition. "intended or remitted in particular men" → "its severity generally varies from person to person" (DJR-022-18); "intended or remitted" → "heightened or relaxed" (DJR-039-34); "intended or remitted" → "intensified or diminished" (DJR-062-30); "intention proceeds from perturbations" → "tension proceeds from disturbances" (DJR-064-11); "intentive operations" → "operations requiring concentration" (DJR-064-11); "most secure, gentle, and remiss" → "safest, mildest and least severe" (DJR-065-06); "to intend hearing" → "to strengthen hearing" (DJR-082-05); "do not intend her more then the rest" → "pay her no more attention than the rest" (DJR-135-05); "are intended and remitted" → "intensify or lessen" (DJR-165-46). The varied equivalents preserve changes of degree and direction of attention. They avoid reading modern purpose into every occurrence of intention or intend.

See also. Remedy by diversion; Confer and conference; Waking.

Issue

Source forms: issue; issues[13539]

The word. Issue can mean a discharge or an outlet through which it escapes. In historical surgery it is an artificially made sore kept open to discharge. In the religious consolation it means a way out or deliverance.

In Burton. The discussion of bodily retention warns against stopping an accustomed discharge. The surgical synopsis and treatment section describe intentionally maintained openings. The later promise of an issue to temptation uses the broader sense of escape from a trial, with no surgical implication.

The places. Issue names an accustomed bodily discharge. (p. 79; DJR-036-10.) The surgical synopsis lists deliberately made open sores. (scan p. 325; DJR-067-20.) Issues are to be kept open. (p. 383; DJR-103-10.) An issue to temptation is promised. (p. 720; DJR-168-50.)

In this edition. "such an issue" → "such a discharge" (DJR-036-10); "Issues to severall parts, and upon severall occasions" → "Open sores made in different parts for different purposes" (DJR-067-20);

[13538] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 8 (DJR-022-18); p. 96 (DJR-039-34); p. 202 (DJR-062-30); p. 208 (DJR-064-11); p. 212 (DJR-065-06); p. 284 (DJR-082-05); p. 550 (DJR-135-05); p. 704 (DJR-165-46). Existing edition notes: DJR-022:E16, DJR-062:E26, DJR-064:E11, DJR-065:E05, DJR-082:E05, DJR-135:E05, DJR-165:E43. DJR-065:E05 preserves the discrepancy between the cited aphorism and Burton's added varices or water under the skin. DJR-082:E05 treats the promised instrument as a report. DJR-135:E05 records differing source locators and Burton's broader use of Jerome. DJR-165:E43 preserves differences in severity and willingness to receive help.

[13539] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 79 (DJR-036-10); scan p. 325 (DJR-067-20); p. 383 (DJR-103-10); p. 720 (DJR-168-50). Existing edition notes: DJR-067:E10, DJR-103:E09, DJR-168:E50. DJR-067:E10 and DJR-103:E09 describe the historical surgical practice. DJR-168:E50 preserves the tension between pain felt as unbearable and the promise that trial has a limit. The synopsis locator is a scan page.

“Issues” → “Issues” (DJR-103-10); “give an issue to temptation” → “provide a way out of the trial” (DJR-168-50). Discharge and open sores clarify the bodily senses; the retained surgical term is locally explained. Way out gives the distinct force of the scriptural promise.

See also. Chirurgery; Strangury; Voluntary.

Jealousy

Source forms: Jealousie[13540]

The word. Jealousy is defined here as suspicion that the beloved may love someone else, or a desire to possess that person exclusively. Fear of another person’s participation in the relationship is central to the definition.

In Burton. Burton treats jealousy separately as an irregular offshoot of love melancholy, commonly following marriage as heroic love precedes it. His symptom account piles up images of fire, bitterness and lost peace. Riches and distinguished family connections cannot compensate for the disturbance he describes.

The places. Jealousy is assigned its separate place after love melancholy. (p. 591; DJR-144-07.) The symptoms are described through bitterness and loss of peace. (p. 608; DJR-147-04.) The definition joins suspicion, exclusive desire and fear. (p. 591; DJR-144-09.)

In this edition. “a bastard-branch or kinde of Love Melancholy” → “an illegitimate offshoot or kind of love melancholy” (DJR-144-07); “a pernicious curiosity” → “a destructive inquisitiveness” (DJR-147-04); “Jealousie” → “Jealousy” (DJR-144-09). Jealousy remains the familiar name. Destructive inquisitiveness makes the harmful prying explicit, while the offshoot metaphor preserves the structure of Burton’s classification.

See also. Love; Emulation; Epichairekakia; Fear; Corrosive; Wittal and cuckold.

Jovial and martial

Source forms: Jovial; Martial[13541]

The word. Jovial and martial here mean belonging to Jupiter and Mars. They classify spirits by planetary association, rather than describing cheerful or warlike temperaments.

In Burton. Burton reports a sevenfold division of ethereal spirits or angels corresponding to the seven traditional planets. The list begins with Saturnian, Jovian and Martian kinds, then connects the scheme with authorities who discuss celestial and sublunary spirits.

The places. Planetary names classify ethereal spirits. (p. 45; DJR-029-35.)

In this edition. “Saturnine, Jovial, Martial” → “Saturnian, Jovian, Martian” (DJR-029-35). Jovian and Martian make the planetary reference immediate. Their place beside Saturnian preserves the structure of the list.

See also. Astrology.

Judgment

Source forms: sentence[13542]

[13540] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 591 (DJR-144-07); p. 608 (DJR-147-04); p. 591 (DJR-144-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-144:E04, DJR-147:E02. DJR-147:E02 confirms the domestic-peace context in Chrysostom, Homilies on Genesis 38.5, while distinguishing Genesis 16:1 from Burton’s marginal chapter 17 and leaving the Latin version uncollated.

[13541] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 45 (DJR-029-35). Existing edition notes: DJR-029:E19. DJR-029:E19 identifies the seven traditional planets as Moon, Mercury, Venus, Sun, Mars, Jupiter and Saturn. The spiritual classification remains Burton’s reported account.

[13542] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 208 (DJR-064-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-064:E08. DJR-064:E08 identifies Heraclitus B118 as a comparison transmitted by Stobaeus, while leaving Burton’s intermediary and Aelian’s elephant passage unresolved. The incomplete Mercatus book reference remains incomplete.

The word. Sentence here means a judgment, opinion or proposition. It introduces a claim to be compared with another thinker's claim, rather than naming a grammatical unit or punishment.

In Burton. The discussion of intellectual ability compares a preceding judgment with Heraclitus's saying about dryness and wisdom. Burton then assembles animal and medical examples in support of the bodily explanation. The vocabulary of judgment identifies the claim's argumentative role.

The places. A sentence is compared with a saying attributed to Heraclitus. (p. 208; DJR-064-08.)

In this edition. "This sentence of his" → "This judgment" (DJR-064-08). Judgment gives the relevant sense directly. It does not endorse the ensuing explanation of intellectual capacity through bodily dryness.

See also. Reason; Action; Indifferent.

Judicial and judicious

Source forms: judicially conferring[13543]

The word. Judicially can mean judiciously, with sound judgment. Conferring here means comparing. The phrase concerns careful assessment of circumstances, rather than proceedings before a court.

In Burton. Burton lists complaints about unequal wealth and labour, then charges the complainants with failing to compare conditions properly or weigh the instability of fortune. The phrase is part of his consolatory response to poverty and social difference.

The places. Judicially conferring describes the comparison Burton says is missing. (p. 326; DJR-090-56.)

In this edition. "judicially conferring one condition with another" → "judiciously comparing one condition with another" (DJR-090-56). The modern phrase clarifies both words. It preserves Burton's argument without making its judgments about inequality an editorial conclusion.

See also. Astrology.

Just

Source forms: just volumes; just treatises; just volume; just tract[13544]

The word. Just can mean full, substantial or of proper extent. Applied to a volume, tract or treatise, it concerns the work's scale, rather than fairness or moral correctness.

In Burton. Burton invokes substantial books both when acknowledging predecessors and when directing readers to specialized accounts. The same sense appears in his hostile discussion of possession and in a cosmological argument he ridicules. Calling a tract just therefore does not mean agreeing with its contents.

The places. Earlier physicians have written full volumes on the subject. (p. 6; DJR-003-13.) Specialized medical accounts are called full treatises. (p. 202; DJR-062-28.) Harsnett's work is described as a substantial volume. (p. 225; DJR-068-37.) Biancani argues his claim at length. (p. 244; DJR-073-05.)

In this edition. "just Volumes" → "full-length volumes" (DJR-003-13); "two just Treatises" → "two full treatises" (DJR-062-28); "a just volume" → "a substantial volume" (DJR-068-37); "in a just tract proves" → "argues at length" (DJR-073-05). Full-length, full, substantial and at length make the scale of treatment explicit. They leave Burton's approval or disapproval to the surrounding argument.

[13543] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 326 (DJR-090-56). Existing edition notes: DJR-090:E47. DJR-090:E47 identifies the following discussion's turn to unstable fortune and retains the tensions and sweeping judgments in the consolation.

[13544] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 6 (DJR-003-13); p. 202 (DJR-062-28); p. 225 (DJR-068-37); p. 244 (DJR-073-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-003:E17, DJR-062:E24, DJR-068:E28, DJR-073:E05. DJR-062:E24 preserves the count of two treatises despite the additional named writers. DJR-068:E28 records Harsnett's first publication in 1603 beside Burton's printed 1605. DJR-073:E05 leaves the Bruno and Biancani summaries for direct collation.

See also. Absolute.

Legal evidence

Source forms: obligation; assurances; evidence[13545]

The word. Obligation can mean a written bond or binding pledge. Assurances are instruments securing property or title, and evidence can mean a legal document or title deed. These senses concern enforceable claims and their records, not merely a general duty, confidence or proof.

In Burton. The contrast between paid services and scholarship includes a clerk's work on a bond. Burton praises the brevity of older property documents, then mocks people who can barely read one. In the religious discussion, obligation describes the supposed pledge by which people have bound themselves to the devil.

The places. A clerk receives payment for an obligation. (p. 37–38; DJR-011-09.) Assurances belong to transfers and guarantees of property. (p. 51; DJR-013-36.) Evidence names the document read with difficulty. (p. 138; DJR-048-31.) Obligation describes a binding pledge in the report of recovery. (p. 705; DJR-166-10.)

In this edition. "for an obligation" → "for drawing up a bond" (DJR-011-09); "conveyances, assurances" → "transfers of property and guarantees" (DJR-013-36); "scamble at a piece of Evidence" → "stumble through a legal document" (DJR-048-31); "by obligation given themselves to him" → "bound themselves over to him" (DJR-166-10). The renderings identify the particular instrument or act of binding. The last remains part of a reported supernatural claim, not confirmation of a pact's power.

See also. Church patronage; Usury; Dowry and jointure.

Leisure

Source forms: otiosum otium[13546]

The word. Otiosum otium means idle leisure. Leisure names time free from occupation; the added adjective can make that freedom a matter of unproductive inactivity. Its exact attachment in Burton's sentence is awkward.

In Burton. After wondering what absorbed Socrates, Burton turns abruptly to the destructive solitude of melancholic people. The phrase stands at that turn. His contrast is clear enough, but assigning idle leisure decisively to Socrates would make the syntax more definite than it is.

The places. Idle leisure appears at the transition from Socrates to destructive solitude. (p. 90; DJR-038-18.)

In this edition. "otiosum otium" → "idle leisure" (DJR-038-18). The literal equivalent preserves the repeated idea of unoccupied time. The abrupt transition remains rather than being resolved by an explanatory addition.

See also. Mirth; Solitude.

Lenitive

Source forms: lenitive; lenitives[13547]

[13545] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 37–38 (DJR-011-09); p. 51 (DJR-013-36); p. 138 (DJR-048-31); p. 705 (DJR-166-10). Existing edition notes: DJR-011:E08, DJR-013:E18, DJR-048:E25, DJR-166:E06. DJR-013:E18 leaves the golden crosses unexplained pending collation with Camden. DJR-048:E25 leaves the emperor unnamed. DJR-166:E06 identifies the written pact reported in the margin as the illustration of obligation.

[13546] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 90 (DJR-038-18). Existing edition notes: DJR-038:E11. DJR-038:E11 identifies Seneca, Letters 25.5, and records that no separate marginal source accompanies the asterisk. It explicitly leaves the phrase's attachment uncertain.

[13547] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 237 (DJR-071-28); p. 283 (DJR-081-36). Existing edition notes: DJR-071:E21, DJR-081:E36. DJR-071:E21 explains the gentle force and the preparation's sweet vehicle. DJR-081:E36 leaves the

The word. Lenitive means easing or soothing. In the prescription of electuaries it has the more specific sense of gently laxative; in the spiritual medical metaphor it names a soothing remedy.

In Burton. The regimen supplies medical help where ordinary evacuation fails. Later, Scripture is compared to an apothecary's shop containing many different classes of remedies, among which lenitives soothe the afflicted mind. The shared idea of relief takes its precise sense from each setting.

The places. Lenitive electuaries assist evacuation. (p. 237; DJR-071-28.) Lenitives are part of the metaphorical pharmacy of Scripture. (p. 283; DJR-081-36.)

In this edition. "lenitive electuaries" → "laxative electuaries" (DJR-071-28); "lenitives" → "soothing remedies" (DJR-081-36). Laxative identifies the intended bodily action. Soothing remedies preserves the broader sense in the theological comparison.

See also. Alteratives.

Ligation and ligature

Source forms: ligation; ligatures[13548]

The word. Ligation means binding or suspension. A ligature can be a binding or tied-on charm. The common idea of binding takes a physiological sense in sleep and a magical sense in the catalogue of purported remedies.

In Burton. Burton explains sleep through a suspension of the senses caused by vapours blocking the passage of bodily spirits. In the discussion of cures, ligatures stand beside spells, images, amulets and love potions as means whose efficacy and lawfulness are questioned.

The places. Ligation names the suspension of sensory activity in sleep. (p. 24; DJR-025-22.) Ligatures occur among proposed magical remedies. (p. 216; DJR-067-36.)

In this edition. "This ligation of senses" → "This suspension of the senses" (DJR-025-22); "Ligatures" → "magical bindings" (DJR-067-36). Suspension clarifies the state of the senses; magical bindings identifies the second catalogue's intended objects. Neither wording replaces Burton's question with an endorsement.

See also. Fascination.

Lights

Source forms: lights[13549]

The word. Lights means lungs. The word in this anatomical account names the organ, not sources of illumination.

In Burton. Burton makes the lungs the instrument of voice and breathing, comparing them to an orator speaking for the heart. His account of cooling the heart then connects air, windpipe and the vessel called the venosal artery within historical physiology.

The places. Lights names the lungs in the account of voice and respiration. (p. 19; DJR-024-16.)

In this edition. "which wanteth these lights" → "lacking lungs" (DJR-024-16). Lungs removes an obsolete anatomical term while preserving the surrounding claims about the organ's functions.

See also. Organical parts.

Augustine quotation and Psalm 36 locator uncollated; the theological promise remains Burton's assertion.

[13548] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 24 (DJR-025-22); p. 216 (DJR-067-36). Existing edition notes: DJR-025:E17, DJR-067:E18. DJR-025:E17 explains the historical mechanism of vapours and spirits. DJR-067:E18 distinguishes magical signs, tied charms and purported sympathetic cures within the reported categories.

[13549] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 19 (DJR-024-16). Existing edition notes: DJR-024:E14. DJR-024:E14 gives a comparison from Crooke's Microcosmographia that helps explain the compressed vascular connection. Burton's syntax and general assertion about voice and lungs remain, rather than being rewritten as modern anatomy.

Living and preferment

Source forms: preferment; preferments; prebend[13550]

The word. Preferment means advancement to an appointment or remunerated position, often in the Church. A living is an endowed church office and its income; a prebend is an endowed cathedral position or its income.

In Burton. Burton's scholar completes costly studies but cannot obtain advancement. Shy people may refuse appointments offered to them, while the tale of a vacant prebend exposes competition and patronage. The complaint about parsonages and vicarages presents a further purchase after the expense of education.

The places. The qualified scholar remains unable to obtain preferment. (p. 131; DJR-047-11.) Shyness causes appointments to be refused. (p. 188; DJR-059-39.) A lucrative prebend becomes the object of competition. (p. 351; DJR-096-17.) Church appointments involve financial and spiritual risks. (p. 135; DJR-048-03.)

In this edition. "fit for preferment" → "ready for advancement" (DJR-047-11); "honours, offices and preferments" → "honours, offices and promotions" (DJR-059-39); "a fat Prebend" → "a lucrative prebend" (DJR-096-17); "spiritual preferments" → "church appointments" (DJR-048-03). Advancement, promotions and appointments describe the opportunities at issue. Lucrative makes the economic force of fat explicit, while prebend remains the particular office.

See also. Church patronage.

Lodestone and adamant

Source forms: lodestone; adamant; adamantinum[13551]

The word. A lodestone is a naturally magnetized stone. Adamant can likewise mean a magnet, but adamantine can instead evoke extreme hardness and an unbreakable bond. The context determines whether attraction or firmness is intended.

In Burton. Industry is the lodestone drawing commerce to the Low Countries. The beloved's beauty similarly attracts and holds the lover like a magnet drawing iron. In the argument for marriage, however, the adamantine bond of love is described through its strength rather than its attractive power.

The places. Industry draws commerce like a lodestone. (p. 53–54; DJR-014-17.) Beauty attracts the lover like a magnet drawing iron. (p. 462; DJR-119-04.) The bond of conjugal love is called adamantine. (p. 586; DJR-143-23.)

In this edition. "their chiefest Lodestone" → "the chief magnet" (DJR-014-17); "as an adamant doth iron" → "like a magnet drawing iron" (DJR-119-04); "Vinculum Conjugalis charitatis adamantinum" → "The bond of conjugal love is unbreakable" (DJR-143-23). Magnet makes the two images of attraction clear. Unbreakable preserves the different force of the marriage maxim.

See also. Fascination; Glass.

Love

Source forms: sensible love; dilection[13552]

[13550] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 131 (DJR-047-11); p. 188 (DJR-059-39); p. 351 (DJR-096-17); p. 135 (DJR-048-03). Existing edition notes: DJR-047:E10, DJR-048:E03, DJR-059:E36, DJR-096:E14. DJR-059:E36 leaves the particular refusals by Peter of Blois and Urswick untraced. DJR-096:E14 treats Moronia as an imaginary setting, not an identified cathedral vacancy. DJR-048:E03 explains the patronage and simony vocabulary.

[13551] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 53–54 (DJR-014-17); p. 462 (DJR-119-04); p. 586 (DJR-143-23). Existing edition notes: DJR-014:E11, DJR-119:E02, DJR-143:E14. DJR-014:E11 distinguishes Burton's broad Low Countries from the United Provinces alone. DJR-119:E02 explains the separate Medusa and basilisk images; DJR-143:E14 supplies the hardness sense of adamantine.

The word. Love is a broad category in Burton, extending across animal attraction, human affection and religious devotion. Sensible love means the love of sentient animals; dilection means affection. Heroical love and charity name more particular kinds within the larger discussion.

In Burton. The account of animals relates love to mating, offspring and likeness of kind. Charity gathers virtuous dispositions under Christian love, whereas heroic love is criticized as burning lust. The religious discussion directs love towards God as the supreme good and connects it with knowledge, faith, hope and obedience. These contexts prevent erotic desire from becoming the word's universal meaning.

The places. Sensible love is defined through animal life. (p. 415; DJR-109-09.) Charity includes dilection and other virtuous dispositions. (p. 426; DJR-111-17.) Heroical love is contrasted with its honourable title. (p. 442; DJR-115-01.) Love is directed towards God as the supreme good. (p. 635; DJR-151-45.) Love of God is connected with commandments and other virtues. (p. 637; DJR-152-11.)

In this edition. "Sensible love" → "Sentient love" (DJR-109-09); "dilection" → "affection" (DJR-111-17); "Heroicall Love" → "heroic love" (DJR-115-01); "perfectly inamoured" → "perfectly in love" (DJR-151-45); "love presupposeth knowledge, faith, hope" → "love presupposes knowledge, faith and hope" (DJR-152-11). The retained word love gathers the discussion, while sentient and affection clarify less familiar terms. The modern text keeps the theological and erotic uses in their particular arguments.

See also. Heroical love; Jealousy; Charity; Self love; Pleasure.

Lucid intervals

Source forms: lucida intervalla[13553]

The word. Lucida intervalla means lucid intervals. Here it describes interruptions in symptoms and pain, which come in fits rather than continuing without relief.

In Burton. Burton presents these intervals as an advantage of windy or flatulent melancholy over other kinds. His immediate explanation names fear, sorrow and pain as less continuous; the phrase should therefore be read through that explanation rather than restricted to a claim about reasoning alone.

The places. Lucid intervals are explained by the intermittent course of symptoms. (p. 201; DJR-062-21.)

In this edition. "lucida intervalla" → "lucid intervals" (DJR-062-21). The familiar phrase remains, followed by Burton's account of what varies. No additional modern diagnostic or legal meaning is supplied.

See also. Madness.

Lust and lusty

Source forms: lust; lusty; salacity[13554]

The word. Lust can mean appetite or desire broadly, as well as sexual desire. Lusty can mean vigorous or robust. Salacity has the more specifically sexual sense in the discussion of sparrows.

[13552] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 415 (DJR-109-09); p. 426 (DJR-111-17); p. 442 (DJR-115-01); p. 635 (DJR-151-45); p. 637 (DJR-152-11). Existing edition notes: DJR-109:E09, DJR-111:E15, DJR-115:E01, DJR-151:E35, DJR-152:E11. DJR-109:E09 leaves the precise Epicharmus and Diogenianus passages uncollated. DJR-111:E15 marks the Christian limitation as Burton's theological claim. DJR-151:E35 records the correction of seem to see and preserves his glory beside Isaiah's beauty; DJR-152:E11 identifies the combined Johannine passages.

[13553] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 201 (DJR-062-21). Existing edition notes: DJR-062:E19. DJR-062:E19 retains the subsequent wind-based explanation of sexual appetite and the attributed benefit of intercourse as historical claims. It also records the placement of the Rhasis marginal locator.

[13554] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 152 (DJR-052-07); p. 240 (DJR-072-06); p. 240 (DJR-072-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-052:E06, DJR-072:E06, DJR-072:E09. DJR-052:E06 leaves the Marcus Aurelius passage unidentified. DJR-072:E06 preserves the difference between the body and margin's patient lists. DJR-072:E09 explains Burton's use of Martial's elegiac line as a warning and treats the animal example as historical physiology.

In Burton. The account of weariness with pleasure calls unsatisfied desires lust. The regimen uses lusty of bodily strength as a condition in a recommendation about sexual activity. The example of sparrows then joins sexual appetite with the supposed shortening of life through excess.

The places. Lust describes desires left unsatisfied by worldly pleasure. (p. 152; DJR-052-07.) Lusty describes bodily vigour. (p. 240; DJR-072-06.) Salacity names sexual appetite in the animal example. (p. 240; DJR-072-09.)

In this edition. "their lust could never be satisfied" → "their desires could never be satisfied" (DJR-052-07); "very lusty" → "very vigorous" (DJR-072-06); "their salacity, which is very frequent" → "their very frequent sexual activity" (DJR-072-09). Desires and vigorous preserve the wider senses. Sexual activity gives salacity its specific force in the claim about repeated expenditure.

See also. Luxurious and riot.

Luxurious and riot

Source forms: riot; Sybaritical; luxurious[13555]

The word. Riot can mean extravagant or dissolute living. Luxurious can mean lustful; Sybaritical evokes proverbial extravagance and luxury. These words overlap in criticism of excess without naming precisely the same conduct.

In Burton. Burton includes riot among the causes of urban poverty, alongside declining trade and bad government. His spendthrifts consume inherited wealth in spectacular pleasures. In the symptom account, luxurious has a specifically sexual force, placed with incontinence and inclination to intercourse.

The places. Riot appears among explanations of towns' decline. (p. 56; DJR-015-02.) Sybaritic spendthrifts squander their estates. (p. 119; DJR-044-38.) Luxurious describes sexual appetite in the symptom account. (p. 201; DJR-062-21.)

In this edition. "idlenesse of their Inhabitants, riot" → "their inhabitants are idle and dissolute" (DJR-015-02); "mad Sybaritical spendthrifts" → "mad, Sybaritic squanderers" (DJR-044-38); "luxurious, incontinent" → "lustful, sexually unrestrained" (DJR-062-21). Dissolute avoids the modern sense of a public disturbance. Lustful makes the sexual sense of luxurious explicit, while Sybaritic retains the allusion explained locally.

See also. Lust and lusty; Epicure; Pleasure; Diet and regimen.

Lycanthropy

Source forms: lycanthropia[13556]

The word. Lycanthropy names the condition Burton describes as wolf-madness: a belief that one is a wolf or a similar beast, accompanied in his account by nocturnal howling and wandering. He does not assert a bodily transformation.

In Burton. The preliminary classification names lycanthropy among disorders of imagination or reason. The subsequent definition makes the disputed classification explicit: Aetius and Paulus call it a kind of melancholy, while Burton prefers to place it under madness. That disagreement is part of the term's use in the book.

[13555] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 56 (DJR-015-02); p. 119 (DJR-044-38); p. 201 (DJR-062-21). Existing edition notes: DJR-015:E01, DJR-044:E29, DJR-062:E19. DJR-015:E01 preserves the simultaneous blame assigned to government, trade and inhabitants. DJR-044:E29 leaves the Antony quotation unlocated. DJR-062:E19 treats the wind-based explanation as historical.

[13556] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 8 (DJR-022-15); p. 9 (DJR-022-25). Existing edition notes: DJR-022:E14, DJR-022:E22. The definition at DJR-022-25 supplements the frozen catalogue example with an already edited passage. DJR-022:E22 explains the belief and the classification dispute, retaining Cucubuth as the printed name attributed to Avicenna.

The places. Lycanthropy appears in the preliminary disease classification. (p. 8; DJR-022-15.) The following definition describes wolf-madness and disputes its classification. (p. 9; DJR-022-25.)

In this edition. “Lycanthropia” → “lycanthropy” (DJR-022-15); “Wolf-madness” → “wolf-madness” (DJR-022-25). The technical name remains, supported by Burton’s own explanatory term and description. The distinction between a belief and a physical transformation is preserved.

See also. Madness.

Macerate

Source forms: macerate; macerating; macerated[13557]

The word. Macerate means wear down, waste or exhaust. Burton applies it to people, minds and souls; in these passages it describes the consuming force of effort, care or persistent thought.

In Burton. The prefatory observer watches others wear themselves out in public life. The symptom account depicts people consumed by repeated thoughts, and the later account of solitude describes a soul wasted by cares. In the moral explanation, passions that people encourage turn against them like Actaeon’s dogs.

The places. Worldly activity wears people out. (p. 3; DJR-002-05.) Persistent thought wears sufferers away. (p. 187; DJR-059-33.) Care and discontent waste the soul. (p. 196; DJR-061-19.) Disturbances wear away the mind in the moral account. (p. 97 [scan p. 197]; DJR-040-05.)

In this edition. “macerate themselves” → “wear themselves out” (DJR-002-05); “macerating themselves” → “wearing themselves away” (DJR-059-33); “macerated with cares and discontents” → “wasted by cares and discontents” (DJR-061-19); “macerate their mindes” → “wear away their minds” (DJR-040-05). The related equivalents preserve the image of attrition. They do not introduce the modern material-processing sense of soaking or softening.

See also. Sorrow; Painful.

Madness

Source forms: Madness[13558]

The word. Madness is defined in this classification as vehement mental derangement or raving without fever. Burton distinguishes it from melancholy by greater violence and from frenzy by the absence of fever and generally better memory.

In Burton. The definition gathers anger, clamour, alarming gestures and force, while excluding fear and sorrow from the type being described. These are the terms of Burton’s local taxonomy. They should not be generalized into a claim that all experiences called madness throughout the book share this exact pattern.

The places. The formal definition distinguishes madness from melancholy and frenzy. (p. 9; DJR-022-21.)

In this edition. “a vehement Dotage” → “severe mental derangement” (DJR-022-21); “raving without a Fever” → “raving without fever” (DJR-022-21). Madness remains the historical category; severe mental derangement explains vehement dotage. The distinction involving fever is preserved explicitly.

See also. Melancholy; Calenture and ague; Dotage; Distraction; Lycanthropy; Ecstasy.

[13557] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 3 (DJR-002-05); p. 187 (DJR-059-33); p. 196 (DJR-061-19); p. 97 [scan p. 197] (DJR-040-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-002:E08, DJR-040:E04, DJR-059:E31, DJR-061:E15. DJR-002:E08 treats the elevated viewpoint as imagery and leaves Hensius unverified. DJR-059:E31 leaves the precise medical passages uncollated. DJR-061:E15 identifies the Virgilian tree comparison, while DJR-040:E04 locates responsibility within Burton’s moral argument. The combined printed and scan locator is retained.

[13558] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 9 (DJR-022-21). The article describes this particular definition and its contrasts. It does not equate the category with one present diagnosis or treat the violent description as universal.

Magnanimity and pusillanimity

Source forms: magnanimity; pusillanimity[13559]

The word. Magnanimity means courage or greatness of spirit in the exhortation to endurance. Pusillanimity means faint-heartedness. The opposed terms do not make Burton's treatment of suffering a simple division between strong and weak people.

In Burton. One passage urges readers to bear affliction steadfastly as soldiers of Christ. Another rebukes healthy people who laugh at sufferers' faint-heartedness and suppose it can be dismissed at will. Sudden bereavement and fear on a precipice ask those readers to imagine emotions they could not simply choose away.

The places. Magnanimity is called for in enduring affliction. (p. 12; DJR-023-13.) Ridicule of sufferers' pusillanimity is challenged. (p. 206; DJR-063-24.)

In this edition. "patience, with magnanimity" → "patience and courage" (DJR-023-13); "dejected pusillanimity" → "dejected faint-heartedness" (DJR-063-24). Courage and faint-heartedness give the local senses. Preserving the second passage's challenge prevents the first exhortation from becoming the book's only position on emotional control.

See also. Shame.

Make away

Source forms: make away themselves; dispatch himself[13560]

The word. To make away oneself or dispatch oneself means to kill oneself. These expressions concern self-inflicted death in the cited passages, not departure or the completion of a task.

In Burton. Burton first describes the despair associated with extreme poverty. The later philosophical discussion asks whether self-killing under severe suffering can be lawful and how those who do it should be judged. The attributed arguments remain distinct from an instruction or endorsement by the edition.

The places. The expression occurs at the extreme of distress associated with poverty. (p. 159; DJR-053-33.) The philosophical discussion asks about self-killing and judgment. (p. 216; DJR-066-03.)

In this edition. "to make away themselves" → "to kill themselves" (DJR-053-33); "to make away himself" → "to kill himself" (DJR-066-03); "he may dispatch himself" → "he may kill himself" (DJR-066-03). The direct equivalents remove an obsolete euphemism while preserving the different narrative and argumentative settings.

See also. Desperate; Despair.

Manure

Source forms: well manured; manured[13561]

The word. To manure land is to cultivate or improve it. The verb has a wider scope here than adding fertilizer.

[13559] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 12 (DJR-023-13); p. 206 (DJR-063-24). Existing edition notes: DJR-023:E09, DJR-063:E23. DJR-023:E09 identifies 2 Timothy 2:3 and the immediate turn to endurance. DJR-063:E23 emphasizes Burton's challenge to the assumption that symptoms can be resisted merely by choosing to do so.

[13560] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 159 (DJR-053-33); p. 216 (DJR-066-03). Existing edition notes: DJR-053:E27, DJR-066:E03. DJR-053:E27 leaves the intermediary Latin verse unlocated. DJR-066:E03 distinguishes a contextual Plotinus comparison from proof of Burton's immediate source and records that the attributed claim about incurable disease is not a direct quotation of Phaedo 61c–62c.

[13561] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 52–53 (DJR-014-09); p. 250 (DJR-074-16). Existing edition notes: DJR-014:E07, DJR-074:E15. DJR-014:E07 identifies James VI and I and the union of the crowns in 1603, preserving the praise's Jacobean setting in the 1651 printing. DJR-074:E15 qualifies Burton's absolute claims of barrenness and uninhabitability; the marginal Nav. remains unexpanded.

In Burton. Burton praises a well-cultivated country among England's blessings, alongside peace and defences. In the geographical digression, he contrasts watered Damascus with a wilderness supposedly beyond cultivation. Both uses concern the condition and management of land.

The places. Cultivation figures among the country's advantages. (p. 52–53; DJR-014-09.) The Arabian wilderness is declared incapable of cultivation. (p. 250; DJR-074-16.)

In this edition. "well manured" → "a well-cultivated country" (DJR-014-09); "by no art can be manured" → "no skill can cultivate" (DJR-074-16). Cultivate preserves the broad agricultural meaning. Human skill and natural conditions remain distinct contributors to the descriptions.

See also. Commonwealth; Estate.

Maternal impressions

Source forms: strange imagination; depraved phantasie[13562]

The word. Maternal impressions is an explanatory heading for the historical belief that a pregnant woman's images, fears or cravings could mark or shape her child. Strange imagination and depraved phantasie name the mental activity credited with this supposed power.

In Burton. Burton describes a mother's distress as disturbing her child's bodily balance and her imagination as leaving a physical mark. The later examples extend the claim to resemblance, birthmarks and unusual births. These passages assign bodily effects to images held in the mind.

The places. The mother's fears and cravings are said to affect her infant. (p. 64; DJR-033-16.) A pictured form is said to be stamped upon the child. (p. 94; DJR-039-17.)

In this edition. "strange imagination" → "extraordinary imagination" (DJR-033-16); "depraved phantasie" → "disordered imagination" (DJR-039-17). Extraordinary and disordered retain the distinctions in Burton's description. They explain the historical theory without making the mother responsible for a child's physical features.

See also. Imagination; Seed; Ex traduce.

Matrix and mother

Source forms: Matrix; the mother; mother; fits of the mother; uteri labiorum[13563]

The word. Matrix and mother can mean the womb. The mother also names a historical disorder attributed to that organ; fits of the mother are attacks explained through the same uterine pathology. Anatomical expressions must still be interpreted locally.

In Burton. The womb appears in the list of parts capable of causing melancholy. The disorder called the mother supplies an analogy for men's illness and a comparison for symptoms that resemble uterine suffocation. Jealousy is also said to provoke such fits. In a separate discussion of supposed signs of virginity, the Latin lips of the womb refers to the genital opening rather than precisely to the uterus.

The places. Matrix or womb occurs in the anatomical catalogue. (p. 174; DJR-057-02.) The mother supplies a comparison for the frequency of men's illness. (p. 177; DJR-057-41.) The symptoms resemble suffocation of the womb. (p. 202–203; DJR-063-01.) Jealousy is said to cause fits of the mother. (p. 614; DJR-148-13.) The historical phrase lips of the womb occurs in a discussion of virginity. (p. 612; DJR-147-39.)

[13562] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 64 (DJR-033-16); p. 94 (DJR-039-17). Existing edition notes: DJR-033:E12, DJR-039:E13. DJR-033:E12 and DJR-039:E13 identify the belief and distinguish its anecdotes from established causal explanation. The article heading names the theory rather than quoting a phrase from Burton.

[13563] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 174 (DJR-057-02); p. 177 (DJR-057-41); p. 202–203 (DJR-063-01); p. 614 (DJR-148-13); p. 612 (DJR-147-39). Existing edition notes: DJR-057:E01, DJR-057:E35, DJR-063:E01, DJR-147:E29, DJR-148:E11. DJR-057:E35 leaves the Melanchthon reference unresolved. DJR-063:E01 retains the Latin symptom details and the single placement of marginal c. DJR-147:E29 explains the imprecise anatomy and the uncollated names and references. These expressions are not converted into present diagnostic categories.

In this edition. “Matrix or Wombe” → “matrix or womb” (DJR-057-02); “the mother” → “the disorder called “the mother”” (DJR-057-41); “fits of the mother” → “fits of the womb” (DJR-063-01); “fits of the Mother” → “fits of the mother” (DJR-148-13); “uteri labiorum” → “lips of the womb” (DJR-147-39). The modern text sometimes explains womb directly and sometimes retains the named disorder with a note. The Latin anatomical expression remains qualified by its context.

See also. Hypochondria; Green sickness.

Matter

Source forms: materia prima; ens; non Ens[13564]

The word. Materia prima is prime or first matter, the underlying matter considered apart from particular forms. Ens means being; non ens means a nonentity or something without existence. These terms concern substance and existence, but are not interchangeable.

In Burton. In the reported account of the soul’s survival, the body decays into prime matter before the soul vanishes. Being then appears among the objects of understanding. In the controversy over potable gold, non ens becomes a dismissive denial that the promised substance has any reality.

The places. The decayed body is said to resolve into prime matter. (p. 27; DJR-026-16.) Being is included among the objects of understanding. (p. 28; DJR-026-26.) Non ens dismisses the alchemical promise as unreal. (p. 371; DJR-100-38.)

In this edition. “materia prima” → “prime matter” (DJR-026-16); “Ens” → “being” (DJR-026-26); “a non Ens” → “a nonentity” (DJR-100-38). The contextual equivalents keep first matter, being in general and nonexistence separate. Matter is a heading for the group, not a replacement for every Latin term.

See also. Soul; Form; Generation and corruption; Essence and quintessence; Simple.

Meat

Source forms: meats; meat[13565]

The word. Meat and meats can mean food of any kind, rather than only animal flesh. Both selected passages use this broader sense.

In Burton. Food supplies the first example of pleasures that become tiresome through repetition; manna makes the breadth of meats clear. In the account of severe melancholy, the biblical loathing of all meat expresses the sufferer’s inability to eat.

The places. Food introduces the comparison with tiresome repetition in other pleasures. (p. 152; DJR-052-03.) All meat occurs in the scriptural description of distress. (p. 214; DJR-065-17.)

In this edition. “meats” → “food” (DJR-052-03); “all meat” → “all food” (DJR-065-17). Food prevents a restriction to flesh that neither passage requires. The first example concerns satiety, the second a loss of appetite amid suffering.

See also. Diet and regimen; Privy; Excrements.

Mediocrity

Source forms: mediocrity[13566]

[13564] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 27 (DJR-026-16); p. 28 (DJR-026-26); p. 371 (DJR-100-38). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E14, DJR-100:E32. DJR-026:E14 explains prime matter and leaves Burton’s immediate sources for Zeno and Hermotimus uncollated. DJR-100:E32 identifies Gwinne and Anthony and the Horatian mountain-and-mouse allusion, while preserving the controversy as reported.

[13565] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 152 (DJR-052-03); p. 214 (DJR-065-17). Existing edition notes: DJR-052:E02, DJR-065:E15. DJR-052:E02 links the manna example to Numbers 11. DJR-065:E15 preserves the erroneous marginal Job 33 beside the explanation that the curse on the day of birth occurs in Job 3; Burton’s reading of Job as melancholy remains an attributed interpretation.

The word. Mediocrity means a middle state or condition here. It does not criticize inferior achievement.

In Burton. The speaker longs for prosperity in adversity and fears adversity in prosperity. The question asks whether any middle condition can escape trial. Burton's following pairs attach a burden to each apparent good.

The places. The question seeks a middle condition free from trial. (p. 107; DJR-042-15.)

In this edition. "What mediocrity may be found" → "What middle state can be found" (DJR-042-15). Middle state preserves the question's position between prosperity and adversity. No judgment about mediocre talent is implied.

See also. Happiness and fortune; Indifferent.

Melancholy

Source forms: atra bilis; melancholizing; melancholize; adventitious melancholy; Asininam melancholiam; melancholicus ad octo[13567]

The word. Melancholy can name black bile, a bodily temperament, an illness, or a disposition and experience associated with it. Its range includes the figurative and expressive verbs melancholize and melancholizing. A single present-day diagnosis cannot replace all these uses.

In Burton. Democritus seeks the bodily seat of black bile, while Burton claims experiential authority through melancholizing. Solitary fantasy initially offers delight. The medical discussion distinguishes acquired melancholy and varieties attributed to different humours; the extravagant series of degrees and ratios emphasizes variation rather than a workable numerical scale. The definition and source index explicitly acknowledge different senses of the name.

The places. Black bile links the substance with the affliction. (p. 4; DJR-002-13.) Melancholizing supports Burton's claim to experience. (p. 6; DJR-003-11.) Melancholizing describes pleasurable solitary fantasy. (p. 88; DJR-038-07.) Adventitious melancholy is discussed as acquired. (p. 175; DJR-057-14.) Asinine melancholy names a disparaging historical subtype. (p. 191; DJR-060-16.) Degrees and ratios express the condition's variety. (p. 195; DJR-061-10.) The name is explained through black bile and disputed categories. (p. 31; DJR-027-03.) The source index gathers the word's different meanings and subjects. (unnumbered Table and closing notice; DJR-172-013.)

In this edition. "atra bilis" → "black bile" (DJR-002-13); "melancholizing" → "melancholizing" (DJR-003-11); "so to melancholize" → "to indulge in melancholy like this" (DJR-038-07); "adventitious Melancholy" → "acquired melancholy" (DJR-057-14); "Asininam melancholiam" → "Asinine melancholy" (DJR-060-16); "melancholicus ad octo" → "melancholic to the eighth degree" (DJR-061-10); "black Choler" → "black bile" (DJR-027-03); "mel. equivocations" → "the different meanings of melancholy" (DJR-172-013). The modern text generally retains melancholy while explaining its changing sense. Black bile identifies the material substance; acquired explains adventitious. The source index's old numbers remain source references, not a newly verified clinical or navigational system.

See also. Adust; Humour; Habit and disposition; Madness; Hypochondria; Religious melancholy.

[13566] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 107 (DJR-042-15). Existing edition notes: DJR-042:E13. DJR-042:E13 identifies the Augustinian continuation and a Cardano parallel, while retaining their differences: Cardano pairs disease with intemperance and rejects the earlier-sins supposition. His consulted edition postdates Burton; luendorum remains a conjecture for printed fruendorum.

[13567] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 4 (DJR-002-13); p. 6 (DJR-003-11); p. 88 (DJR-038-07); p. 175 (DJR-057-14); p. 191 (DJR-060-16); p. 195 (DJR-061-10); p. 31 (DJR-027-03); unnumbered Table and closing notice (DJR-172-013). Existing edition notes: DJR-002:E16, DJR-003:E15, DJR-027:E01, DJR-060:E15, DJR-061:E09, DJR-172:E04. DJR-002:E16 and DJR-027:E01 explain the humoral meanings. DJR-003:E15 identifies Robert as Burton's playful self-reference. DJR-060:E15 preserves the marginal anchor qualification. DJR-061:E09 explains the ratios and historical eighth degree; DJR-172:E04 distinguishes bodily matter from moods. The final source-index policy retains unverified destinations as unlinked.

Memory and recollection

Source forms: reminiscentia; recollect[13568]

The word. Reminiscentia means recollection or remembering. Recollect can also mean gather together, so the later use need not describe recovering something from memory.

In Burton. Burton reports Plato's account of learning as the soul remembering what it knew before entering the body. In the consolation for troubled consciences, Burton instead promises to collect useful sayings from extensive books and Scripture for readers who cannot readily obtain them.

The places. Recollection belongs to the reported account of the soul's earlier knowledge. (p. 26; DJR-026-09.) Recollect describes gathering passages for the afflicted reader. (p. 705–706; DJR-166-16.)

In this edition. "reminiscentia, or recalling" → "recollection or remembering" (DJR-026-09); "recollect out of their voluminous Treatises" → "gather from their extensive treatises" (DJR-166-16). Recollection serves the philosophical account, while gather makes the editorial activity plain.

See also. Faculty.

Meseraic

Source forms: miseriack; Meseraick veines; Meseraicke veins[13569]

The word. Meseraic and the variant miseriack mean mesenteric: belonging to the mesentery, the tissue supporting the intestines. Meseraic veins are the veins of that region.

In Burton. The synopsis lists these veins among possible internal causes of windy melancholy. The anatomical catalogue repeats them, and the symptom discussion associates them with a particular appetite pattern. Their role belongs to Burton's historical map of abdominal causes.

The places. Miseriack veins occur among internal causes in the synopsis. (p. 98; DJR-020-33.) Meseraic veins appear in the catalogue of bodily parts. (p. 174; DJR-057-02.) The veins and liver are associated with diminished appetite. (p. 200; DJR-062-17.)

In this edition. "miseriack veins" → "mesenteric veins" (DJR-020-33); "Meseraick veines" → "mesenteric veins" (DJR-057-02); "Meseraicke veins" → "mesenteric veins" (DJR-062-17). The same anatomical equivalent covers the spelling variants. On the other hand in the third passage marks a contrast in symptoms, not the side on which the liver lies.

See also. Organical parts.

Metempsychosis

Source forms: metempsychosis; palingenesia[13570]

The word. Metempsychosis is the passage of a soul from one body to another; palingenesia is rebirth. Burton pairs them in his account of Pythagorean teaching.

[13568] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 26 (DJR-026-09); p. 705–706 (DJR-166-16). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E07, DJR-166:E12. DJR-026:E07 leaves the immediate source of Burton's sponge and shortened transmigration sequence unresolved. DJR-166:E12 identifies the personal marginal references and attributes the following first-person Latin to Culmannus.

[13569] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 98 (DJR-020-33); p. 174 (DJR-057-02); p. 200 (DJR-062-17). Existing edition notes: DJR-020:E22, DJR-057:E01, DJR-062:E15. DJR-020:E22 explains the synopsis's other compressed terms. DJR-057:E01 supplies the historical anatomical map. DJR-062:E15 explicitly prevents the mistaken inference of a left-sided liver.

[13570] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 26 (DJR-026-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E04. DJR-026:E04 explains both terms and Lethe. The article describes the teaching as Burton reports it, rather than independently authenticating each name in his preceding list.

In Burton. The souls first drink the water of forgetfulness and then enter new bodies. The animal examples connect their new forms with inclinations or traits shown during their human lives. Burton combines several traditions in this brief survey.

The places. The paired terms introduce passage into new bodies. (p. 26; DJR-026-05.)

In this edition. "Metempsychosis, and Palingenesia" → "transmigration and rebirth" (DJR-026-05). Transmigration and rebirth state the two meanings directly, while the surrounding account retains their association with Lethe and animal character.

See also. Soul.

Meteors

Source forms: meteors; Ignes fatui; blazing Stars; ignis fatuus[13571]

The word. Meteors can cover atmospheric phenomena and disturbances broadly. Blazing stars are comets; ignes fatui, or the singular ignis fatuus, are will-o'-the-wisps, misleading lights that also supply a figurative expression.

In Burton. Burton first lists dangerous weather among the threats to human life. In the classification of spirits, several different lights become instruments of fiery devils. Elsewhere imagination itself is a will-o'-the-wisp, leading the sufferer through changing forms of distress.

The places. Meteors introduces the threatening phenomena of the air. (p. 4; DJR-021-29.) Comets and misleading lights enter the classification of fiery spirits. (p. 46; DJR-029-46.) The will-o'-the-wisp becomes an image of shifting imagination. (p. 195; DJR-061-11.)

In this edition. "Meteors" → "atmospheric disturbances" (DJR-021-29); "blazing Stars" → "comets" (DJR-029-46); "Ignes fatui" → "will-o'-the-wisps" (DJR-029-46); "ignis fatuus of phantasie" → "will-o'-the-wisp, imagination" (DJR-061-11). The equivalents distinguish weather, comets and reported wandering lights rather than treating all as modern astronomical meteors. The figurative light retains its power to lead astray.

See also. Astrology.

Microcosm

Source forms: Microcosme[13572]

The word. Microcosm means a little world. Here it names the human being, whose internal changes can be compared with disturbances in a larger world.

In Burton. The thunderbolt of emotional disturbance violently alters this little world. Burton then describes the body acting upon the mind through humours, spirits and vapours. The image gathers bodily and mental effects within one human constitution.

The places. The little world is shaken by the thunderbolt of the passions. (p. 91; DJR-038-30.)

In this edition. "this our Microcosme" → "our little world, the human being" (DJR-038-30). The added explanation identifies the metaphor's human referent. Healthy condition and balance clarify the accompanying estate and temperature.

See also. Soul.

[13571] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 4 (DJR-021-29); p. 46 (DJR-029-46); p. 195 (DJR-061-11). Existing edition notes: DJR-021:E22, DJR-029:E26, DJR-061:E10. DJR-021:E22 leaves the mortality totals as reported claims. DJR-029:E26 distinguishes the lights grouped under the supernatural category. DJR-061:E10 preserves the astrological context and the difference between Plater's body-anchor order and the margin's order.

[13572] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 91 (DJR-038-30). The physiological sequence is retained as Burton's historical account. The passage begins a comparison and ends before the next part of his argument.

Mirth

Source forms: mirth[13573]

The word. Mirth means cheerfulness or enjoyable social activity, including lively company. In the remedy discussion it belongs to means of diverting distressing thoughts and restoring the mind.

In Burton. Burton gives mirth a prominent place beside music and company in his account of relief. His final counsel likewise recommends wholesome recreation and help from friends. The later passage develops the restorative purpose without repeating the word mirth itself.

The places. Mirth joins music and company among the preferred means of relief. (p. 298–299; DJR-085-02.) Wholesome recreation and friendship serve the related purpose of restoration. (p. 722; DJR-169-28.)

In this edition. “mirth” → “cheerfulness” (DJR-085-02); “refresh and recreate his distressed soul” → “refresh and restore his distressed soul” (DJR-169-28). Cheerfulness names the immediate sense; restore makes the related force of recreation explicit. The two examples connect enjoyment with a change in the course of thought.

See also. Music and harmony; Recreate; Remedy by diversion; Nepenthe; Leisure.

Mistress

Source forms: mistress; Mistris[13574]

The word. A mistress can be the woman a person loves or courts. The word need not imply an adulterous relationship.

In Burton. The definition of lovesickness describes sustained attention to the beloved’s beauty and behaviour. The unassigned couplet imagines a beloved not yet found. Cicero’s account of the lover’s obedience supplies a related image of the woman’s rule, though the selected body passage calls her a woman rather than a mistress.

The places. The mistress is the object of the lover’s consuming attention. (p. 446; DJR-115-49.) The speaker seeks an as-yet-unknown mistress. (p. 468; DJR-120-14.) The related argument represents love as subjection to a woman’s commands. (p. 523; DJR-130-02.)

In this edition. “his Mistris” → “his mistress” (DJR-115-49); “a mistress yet to come” → “a mistress still to come” (DJR-120-14); “a woman domineers” → “a woman rules him” (DJR-130-02). Mistress is retained where it occurs, with its historical sense explained. The argument about rule and obedience concerns command of the passions, not proof of the couple’s marital status.

See also. Dowry and jointure; Quean and slut.

Mortification

Source forms: mortified[13575]

The word. Mortification is the subduing of bodily desires through ascetic discipline. Mortified in this passage carries that religious sense, turned towards exhaustion and madness; it does not simply mean embarrassed.

[13573] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 298–299 (DJR-085-02); p. 722 (DJR-169-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-085:E01, DJR-169:E28. DJR-085:E01 notes that Burton quotes only the opening of Sirach 40:20 and describes the remedies as historical claims. DJR-169:E28 explains honest, art and industry in the final counsel.

[13574] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 446 (DJR-115-49); p. 468 (DJR-120-14); p. 523 (DJR-130-02). Existing edition notes: DJR-115:E39, DJR-120:E12, DJR-130:E02. DJR-115:E39 leaves the exact Avicennian Latin tradition uncollated. DJR-120:E12 leaves the couplet unattributed. DJR-130:E02 identifies Cicero, Paradoxa Stoicorum 5.36, while recording Burton’s compression and modification.

[13575] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 655 (DJR-156-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-156:E01. DJR-156:E01 identifies the Devil as the subject of he and keeps the printed date 1320. The precise Münster episode remains to be collated; the polemical judgment is Burton’s.

In Burton. Burton attacks practices undertaken to earn merit under a claim of perfection. He describes the Devil as exploiting blind zeal through penance, harsh clothing, whipping and fasting. The word's spiritual ideal is drawn into his account of harmful excess.

The places. Mortified links the ascetic ideal with Burton's polemical account of madness. (p. 655; DJR-156-01.)

In this edition. "quite mortified and mad" → "utterly mortified and mad" (DJR-156-01). The retained word preserves the religious vocabulary and its bitter turn in Burton's sentence. Wearing wool against the skin explains the accompanying going wolward.

See also. Solitude; Supererogation; Anchorite; Non naturals; Zeal.

Mortmain

Source forms: mortmain[13576]

The word. Mortmain concerns land held perpetually by an ecclesiastical or other corporate body, and the legal restrictions on transfers into such ownership. The selected occurrence is in Burton's margin.

In Burton. The body describes large accumulations of ecclesiastical wealth. The margin invokes statutes of mortmain as evidence that lay people distrust the clergy's power. The legal term supports the argument about lasting institutional possession.

The places. The marginal reference to mortmain accompanies the account of ecclesiastical holdings. (p. 649; DJR-154-33.)

In this edition. "mortmain" → "mortmain" (DJR-154:B28; margin). The English marginal term is retained and explained. It is not inserted into the main text's list of territories or estimates.

See also. Church patronage.

Mountebank

Source forms: Mountebanks; Quacksalvers[13577]

The word. Mountebank and quacksalver are disparaging names for sellers of dubious remedies or pretended healers. Their context emphasizes deceit and the lack of the qualifications Burton demands.

In Burton. Mountebanks first join a polemical list of people who fabricate strange voices and frighten their audiences. In the defence of medicine, Burton separates such practitioners from a learned, skilful and honest physician. The accusation targets abuses of medical authority.

The places. Mountebanks join the catalogue of deceptive performers. (p. 211; DJR-064-30.) Mountebanks and quacksalvers are contrasted with qualified physicians. (p. 226; DJR-069-04.)

In this edition. "Mountebanks" → "quacks" (DJR-064-30); "Mountebanks, Quacksalvers" → "mountebanks, quacks" (DJR-069-04). Quacks gives a familiar equivalent; retaining mountebanks in the fuller list preserves its historical vocabulary. The neighbouring empirics refers to untrained practitioners in this argument, not to modern empirical science.

See also. Physick; Counterfeit.

[13576] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 649 (DJR-154-33). Existing edition notes: DJR-154:B28, DJR-154:E32. DJR-154:B28 reads "The Laity suspect their greatness, witness those statutes of mortmain." DJR-154:E32 explains the legal sense and identifies the ecclesiastical electors; Burton's fractions and revenue figures remain reported estimates.

[13577] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 211 (DJR-064-30); p. 226 (DJR-069-04). Existing edition notes: DJR-064:E28, DJR-069:E03. DJR-064:E28 preserves Burton's anti-Catholic terminology and leaves the Bacon and Blancanus passages and acoustic sites uncollated. DJR-069:E03 explains the disparaging medical names and the shortened references.

Music and harmony

Source forms: diapason; concent[13578]

The word. Diapason is a complete musical octave, used figuratively for full harmony. Concent means concord or harmony, rather than consent or agreement to an act.

In Burton. The proposed commonwealth turns a musical relation into an image of social ranks bound by affection and law. In the discussion of recreation, the harmony of musicians adorns a banquet like a precious stone set in gold. Music connects proportion and pleasure in two distinct settings.

The places. Diapason figures the harmony of social ranks. (p. 65; DJR-016-37.) Concent names the musicians' harmony at a banquet. (p. 300; DJR-085-20.)

In this edition. "a diapason and sweet harmony" → "a full and sweet harmony" (DJR-016-37); "the concent of Musicians" → "the harmony of musicians" (DJR-085-20). Full harmony conveys the first metaphor without requiring a technical musical gloss in the sentence. Harmony also prevents a misreading of concent as consent.

See also. Mirth.

Myrach

Source forms: myrach; Mirache; Myrachiall; myrache[13579]

The word. Myrach, mirach and myrache refer to the abdominal region or its containing wall. Myrachial is the adjective used for a historical kind of melancholy associated with that region.

In Burton. Burton lists myrachial melancholy among bodily varieties, then equates it with hypochondriacal or flatulent melancholy. He calls it especially distressing and frequent while reporting that other physicians regard it as less dangerous. The symptom account associates the region with swelling, wind and nausea.

The places. Myrach supplies the name of one kind of melancholy. (p. 35; DJR-027-47.) Mirache appears in the anatomical catalogue. (p. 174; DJR-057-02.) Myrachial is equated with hypochondriacal melancholy. (p. 176; DJR-057-29.) The abdominal wall is associated with particular symptoms. (p. 200; DJR-062-16.)

In this edition. "myrach" → "myrach" (DJR-027-47); "Mirache" → "mirach" (DJR-057-02); "Myrachiall" → "myrachial" (DJR-057-29); "myrache" → "abdominal wall" (DJR-062-16). The technical name is retained in the classifications; abdominal wall explains it in the symptom discussion. The article preserves the historical term's regional breadth.

See also. Organical parts.

Neoterics

Source forms: neotericks; Juniors[13580]

The word. Neoterics are more recent writers relative to Burton and his older authorities. Juniors likewise means later writers, rather than younger or subordinate members of a profession.

[13578] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 65 (DJR-016-37); p. 300 (DJR-085-20). Existing edition notes: DJR-016:E15, DJR-085:E19. DJR-016:E15 identifies the accompanying Juvenal lines and explains the octave. DJR-085:E19 identifies the Sirach comparison but leaves Burton's claims about More and the saying attributed to Epictetus unchecked against their complete texts.

[13579] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 35 (DJR-027-47); p. 174 (DJR-057-02); p. 176 (DJR-057-29); p. 200 (DJR-062-16). Existing edition notes: DJR-057:E01, DJR-057:E24, DJR-062:E14. DJR-057:E01 and E24 explain the anatomy and windy melancholy. DJR-062:E14 records Furetière's 1690 lexical comparison and retains the original consultation locators; that later comparison is not presented as Burton's source.

[13580] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 7 (DJR-022-11); p. 179 (DJR-058-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-022:E09, DJR-058:E08. DJR-022:E09 records the supplied separator between Paulus and Aetius. DJR-058:E08 leaves the unclear marginal culentumque and its relation to virulentum and the body's fish comparison unresolved.

In Burton. Burton directs readers from ancient and medieval medical books to the meticulous work of more recent authors. A later catalogue of symptoms describes their repetition through successive authorities. The terms locate writers within a learned succession.

The places. Neoterics identifies the more recent medical authors. (p. 7; DJR-022-11.) Juniors identifies later writers repeating the symptoms. (p. 179; DJR-058-09.)

In this edition. "exact Neotericks" → "meticulous modern writers" (DJR-022-11); "all the Juniors" → "all the later writers" (DJR-058-09). Modern is relative to Burton's time. Later makes the chronological sense of juniors explicit.

See also. Clerk; Humane learning; Schoolmen; Century.

Nepenthe

Source forms: nepenthe[13581]

The word. Nepenthe names Homer's grief-banishing drug, used here through an interpretation that makes it timely, consoling speech. Burton's argument depends on the capacity of words to ease distress.

In Burton. Gentle speech becomes a remedy, a charm and refreshment for an agitated mind. Burton invokes an interpretation of the Homeric gift as speech suited to its occasion, rather than a medicinal plant. The sequence makes the manner and timing of consolation part of its efficacy.

The places. Nepenthe becomes the culminating image for timely consolation. (p. 292 [296]–297; DJR-084-21.)

In this edition. "Nepenthe" → "nepenthe" (DJR-084-21); "opportunity of speech" → "speech suited to the occasion" (DJR-084-21). The name is retained while opportunity is explained as fitness to the occasion. The reading follows Burton's appeal to the allegorical interpretation, without replacing Homer's narrative with it.

See also. Mirth.

Nice

Source forms: nice; nice education; nice gentlewomen; nicely[13582]

The word. Nice can mean delicate or fastidious; nice education is an excessively delicate upbringing. Nicely can mean with excessive scruple. These examples do not use nice simply to praise pleasantness.

In Burton. The gentlewoman's disgust and the pampered child's upbringing both concern delicacy. The discussion of women's illness extends the word into a class-based contrast between labour and leisure. In the account of games, excessive scruple is distinguished from reasonable objections to actual abuse.

The places. Nice describes the gentlewoman whose disgust is intensified by speech. (p. 147; DJR-051-13.) Nice education is paired with coddling. (p. 149 [sequence; printed 145]; DJR-050-53.) Nice gentlewomen belong to Burton's contrast with labouring women. (p. 204; DJR-063-09.) Nicely describes excessive objections to games. (p. 274–275; DJR-080-01.)

In this edition. "nice Gentlewoman" → "delicate gentlewoman" (DJR-051-13); "nice education" → "delicate upbringing" (DJR-050-53); "nice gentlewomen" → "delicate gentlewomen" (DJR-063-09);

[13581] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 292 [296]–297 (DJR-084-21). Existing edition notes: DJR-084:E19. DJR-084:E19 distinguishes the drug in Odyssey 4 from Macrobius's interpretation as a well-timed story, preserves Burton's Epidamna beside Homer's Polydamna, and notes disputed authorship of the Plutarchan consolation. Goropius and Gregory remain uncollated. The printed 292 [296] pagination is retained.

[13582] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 147 (DJR-051-13); p. 149 [sequence; printed 145] (DJR-050-53); p. 204 (DJR-063-09); p. 274–275 (DJR-080-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-050:E40, DJR-051:E10, DJR-063:E09, DJR-080:E01. DJR-050:E40 locates part of the Quintilian material at 1.2.6–8 rather than the printed 1.3, without identifying the opening maxim there. DJR-063:E09 qualifies the social generalization. DJR-080:E01 explains Gataker's recreational lots. The supplied sequence page 149 and printed 145 remain distinguished.

“too nicely” → “too scrupulously” (DJR-080-01). Delicate and scrupulously distinguish the personal, educational and moral contexts. The account of games still allows justified criticism of harmful conduct.

See also. Curiosity.

Non naturals

Source forms: non-natural; non-natural things[13583]

The word. The six non-naturals are conditions of life that can support or disturb health: diet, retention and evacuation, air, exercise and rest, sleep and waking, and the passions. Non-natural is a technical category, not a judgment that these things are unnatural.

In Burton. Burton calls them necessary because people cannot avoid their influence. Their use or misuse changes the body, so they supply a framework for both causes and the management of illness. The synopsis gives the same category a structural place among the necessary causes.

The places. Necessary causes are explained as unavoidable conditions of life. (p. 65; DJR-033-29.) The synopsis introduces the six non-natural things. (p. 99; DJR-020-35.)

In this edition. “six non-natural things” → “six non-natural things” (DJR-033-29); “six non-naturall things” → “six non-natural things” (DJR-020-35). The technical name is retained and explained. Necessary does not mean that their harmful misuse is inevitable; it describes the conditions themselves.

See also. Air; Diet and regimen; Exercise; Waking; Perturbation; Rectification.

Obnubilate

Source forms: obnubilate[13584]

The word. To obnubilate is to cloud or darken. Burton uses the verb for a mind supposedly obscured by melancholy vapour.

In Burton. The cloud covering the Sun and smoke rising through a chimney give visible form to his account of vapours ascending from the abdomen to the brain. Their supposed effect explains how ordinarily wise and judicious people may think and act in uncharacteristic ways.

The places. Cloud and smoke comparisons explain the darkening of the mind. (p. 200; DJR-062-18.)

In this edition. “obnubilate the minde” → “clouds the mind” (DJR-062-18). Cloud preserves the governing image while replacing the unfamiliar verb. The historical physiology remains distinguishable from the comparison used to illustrate it.

See also. Imagination; Vapours.

Obsession and possession

Source forms: obsession; possession[13585]

The word. Obsession here means harassment or assault by a spirit, placed beside possession by devils. It does not name an intrusive recurring thought in the modern psychiatric sense.

[13583] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 65 (DJR-033-29); p. 99 (DJR-020-35). Existing edition notes: DJR-020:E23, DJR-033:E17. DJR-033:E17 explains the pairings that yield six, including exercise as the heading for motion and rest. DJR-020:E23 provides the enumeration and distinguishes these conditions from incidental circumstances such as poverty or imprisonment.

[13584] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 200 (DJR-062-18). Existing edition notes: DJR-062:E16. DJR-062:E16 explains the verb, chimeras and callings, and identifies the vapours as part of the period’s account rather than an independently established mechanism.

[13585] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 9 (DJR-022-24). Existing edition notes: DJR-022:E21. DJR-022:E21 distinguishes obsession from the modern psychiatric usage and explains enthusiasm and reduce to in the surrounding classification.

In Burton. Burton includes the paired terms in a catalogue of states classified under fury or madness, together with visions, prophetic transports, poetic frenzy and conditions attributed to poisons. The grouping records a historical scheme with several kinds of alleged cause.

The places. Obsession and possession appear among the reported kinds of fury. (p. 9; DJR-022-24.)

In this edition. "Obsession or possession of devils" → "demonic harassment or possession" (DJR-022-24). Harassment makes the older sense of obsession explicit. Possession remains the name of the reported supernatural state.

See also. Daemon and genius.

Occult

Source forms: occult[13586]

The word. Occult means hidden in its workings. In this passage it describes a quality whose attractive operation is not visible, without making occult a separate name for magic.

In Burton. Burton concedes an honourable, natural love and describes its force through a hidden snare and magnetic attraction. Occult belongs to that account of love's compelling power, alongside adamantine and virtue.

The places. A hidden attractive property explains the supposed force of natural love. (p. 442; DJR-115-02.)

In this edition. "occult" → "hidden" (DJR-115-02). Hidden fits the immediate account. Magnetic and force clarify the neighbouring words, preserving their contribution to the image of attraction.

See also. Fascination; Virtue.

Oppilation

Source forms: oppilations[13587]

The word. Oppilations are blockages or obstructions within the body. The term belongs here to a list of harmful effects explained through digestion and humours.

In Burton. Burton's catalogue moves from undigested matter and wind through obstruction, corrupt humours, excessive fullness and poor digestion to sudden death. Oppilation names one stage or condition in that accumulation of consequences.

The places. Oppilations occurs among the bodily consequences listed under Fernel's authority. (p. 72; DJR-035-04.)

In this edition. "oppilations" → "obstructions" (DJR-035-04). Obstructions gives the general meaning without identifying a specific modern disease or location that the sentence does not specify.

See also. Concoction.

Ordinary

Source forms: ordinary preacher; ordinary[13588]

[13586] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 442 (DJR-115-02). Existing edition notes: DJR-115:E02. DJR-115:E02 explains honest, virtue and adamantine. It also preserves the Latin's statement that men cannot be separated from women beside Burton's shorter English paraphrase.

[13587] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 72 (DJR-035-04). Existing edition notes: DJR-035:E01, DJR-035:E02. DJR-035:E01 retains printed cruelties while explaining the contextual conjecture crudities behind undigested matter; Fernel remains uncollated. E02 identifies Juvenal 1.144 and distinguishes dying without a will from anything intestinal, despite Burton's printed Sat. 5.

[13588] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 99–100 [supplied; scan p. 200] (DJR-040-34); p. 274 (DJR-079-41). Existing edition notes: DJR-040:E27, DJR-079:E35. DJR-040:E27 preserves the marginal fear of accusation beyond the embarrassment in the body; Foreest's exact case remains uncollated. The supplied-page qualification, displayed 99–100 span and scan locator

The word. Ordinary means regular or usual in these passages. An ordinary preacher holds a regular role; ordinary recreations are customary pastimes.

In Burton. The minister's regular public activity makes his withdrawal through shame especially striking. The recreation catalogue describes familiar winter occupations rather than judging their quality as unexceptional.

The places. Ordinary identifies the minister's regular preaching. (p. 99–100 [supplied; scan p. 200]; DJR-040-34.) Ordinary identifies customary winter recreations. (p. 274; DJR-079-41.)

In this edition. "ordinary Preacher" → "regular preacher" (DJR-040-34); "ordinary recreations" → "usual winter recreations" (DJR-079-41). Regular and usual state the two contextual senses directly. Neither example requires a judgment about the preacher's ability or the amusements' merit.

See also. Entertain.

Organical parts

Source forms: similar parts; dissimilar parts; organical; similar part; Organicall parts[13589]

The word. Similar parts are bodily substances considered uniform in kind; dissimilar parts combine unlike tissues. Organical or instrumental parts are organs that perform particular functions. The contrast is anatomical and functional, not a comparison of visual resemblance.

In Burton. The subsection headings organize Burton's account of the body around uniform and composite parts. His description of melancholy then treats the brain as a similar part when considering its substance, rather than its ventricles. A later catalogue attributes symptoms to organs and the humours or spirits associated with them.

The places. The heading introduces similar parts. (p. 15; DJR-023-37.) The following heading introduces dissimilar parts. (p. 16; DJR-024-01.) Organical and instrumental explain the composite parts. (p. 16; DJR-024-02.) The brain is considered in its substance as a similar part. (p. 32; DJR-027-14.) Organicall parts names the organs associated with symptoms. (p. 190 [second occurrence]; DJR-060-09.)

In this edition. "Similar parts" → "Uniform parts" (DJR-023-37); "Dissimilar parts" → "Composite parts" (DJR-024-01); "Organical, or Instrumental" → "organs, or instruments" (DJR-024-02); "as a similar part" → "in its substance" (DJR-027-14); "Organicall parts" → "organs" (DJR-060-09). Uniform, composite and in its substance make the organizing distinction explicit. Organs preserves the functional sense in the later list.

See also. Anatomical arteries; Anatomical membranes; Ventricle; Lights; Meseraic; Myrach.

Oxymel

Source forms: oxymel[13590]

The word. Oxymel is a medicinal mixture of honey and vinegar. Squill oxymel is a preparation that also contains squill.

In Burton. Burton lists it among compound remedies, alongside named syrups and a purgative broth. The name identifies a preparation within his catalogue; the passage does not supply a full recipe.

---

remain explicit. DJR-079:E35 leaves some game rules and small trunks unresolved.

[13589] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 15 (DJR-023-37); p. 16 (DJR-024-01); p. 16 (DJR-024-02); p. 32 (DJR-027-14); p. 190 [second occurrence] (DJR-060-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-024:E01, DJR-027:E09, DJR-060:E08. DJR-024:E01 explains why books on the soul can include anatomy. DJR-027:E09 distinguishes affection through another part from affection in itself and retains apoplexy as historical. DJR-060:E08 reports Saxonia's immaterial spirits as his claim. The second occurrence of printed page 190 remains specified.

[13590] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 381 (DJR-102-37). Existing edition notes: DJR-102:E35. DJR-102:E35 explains the ingredients and distinguishes greater and lesser formulations, broom, chicory and rooster broth. These are historical formula names.

The places. Squill oxymel heads the list of further compound preparations. (p. 381; DJR-102-37.)

In this edition. “Oxymel Scilliticum” → “squill oxymel” (DJR-102-37). The plant modifier is translated and the established preparation name retained. Quantities and instructions are not added to the catalogue.

See also. Receipt.

Painful

Source forms: painful; painfully; painfull[13591]

The word. Painful can mean painstaking, diligent or hardworking. Painfully can mean laboriously, describing effort rather than the experience of hurt.

In Burton. The philosopher’s diligence survives the criticisms of his style. Dutch land reclamation exemplifies sustained labour and skill. The preacher’s hard work is a qualification offered in the competition for a church appointment.

The places. Painful praises the philosopher’s diligence amid criticism. (p. 11; DJR-005-18.) Painfully describes the labour of maintaining reclaimed land. (p. 52; DJR-014-04.) Painfull describes a preacher supported by his parish. (p. 351; DJR-096-19.)

In this edition. “painful omniscious philosopher” → “painstaking philosopher of universal learning” (DJR-005-18); “so painfully preserved” → “maintained with such labour” (DJR-014-04); “painfull preacher” → “hardworking preacher” (DJR-096-19). The equivalents make effort the common element while adapting to scholarship, engineering and ministry.

See also. Careful; Macerate; Sorrow; Exquisite.

Parable

Source forms: parable[13592]

The word. Parable as an adjective means obtainable or readily available. It does not refer here to a story with a moral lesson.

In Burton. Burton asks what employment a newly qualified scholar can obtain. Schoolteaching or serving as a lecturer or curate offers a relatively accessible route, but the low pay and dependence on patron or parish undermine its security.

The places. Parable describes the available course of employment. (p. 131; DJR-047-12.)

In this edition. “most parable and easie” → “most readily available and easiest” (DJR-047-12). Readily available keeps the word attached to opportunity. The following terms explain the work and subsistence the route offers.

See also. Receipt; Physick.

Paracelsian

Source forms: spagirically; Paracelsians[13593]

[13591] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 11 (DJR-005-18); p. 52 (DJR-014-04); p. 351 (DJR-096-19). Existing edition notes: DJR-005:E23, DJR-014:E03, DJR-096:E16. DJR-005:E23 identifies Quintilian and Gellius but notes that Burton assembles rather than consecutively quotes their judgments. DJR-014:E03 leaves Bertius’s wording unlocated. DJR-096:E16 explains the signatures and identifies the deceased person as the sixth claimant’s father, leaving the debt’s circumstances uncertain.

[13592] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 131 (DJR-047-12). Existing edition notes: DJR-047:E11. DJR-047:E11 explains lecturer, curate and diet. The falconer’s wages retain their comparison with household service, without a modern monetary conversion.

[13593] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 394 (DJR-105-19); p. 134 (DJR-047-38). Existing edition notes: DJR-047:E35, DJR-105:E19. DJR-105:E19 identifies Bacon and a compared English passage but leaves his Latin edition and Croll’s precise passage uncollated. DJR-047:E35 explains the practitioners and leaves the exact Clenard context of lawsuit-makers and

The word. Paracelsian identifies the medical tradition associated with Paracelsus. Spagirically refers to chemical or alchemical methods of preparing substances within that tradition.

In Burton. In discussing scents, Burton directs readers seeking chemically prepared remedies to Croll. In his account of medical employment, self-styled Paracelsians instead join a hostile catalogue of competing practitioners. The practical reference and the polemical use have different functions.

The places. Spagirically describes the preparation of remedies in Croll. (p. 394; DJR-105-19.) Self-styled Paracelsians appear in the crowded field of practitioners. (p. 134; DJR-047-38.)

In this edition. "spagirically prepared" → "prepared by chemical methods" (DJR-105-19); "Paracelsians, as they call themselves" → "self-styled Paracelsians" (DJR-047-38). Chemical methods explains the preparation without turning it into a present-day standard of chemistry. Self-styled preserves Burton's distancing qualification in the hostile list.

See also. Physick; Essence and quintessence.

Parasite

Source forms: Parasites[13594]

The word. Parasites are flattering dependants, with the older association of people dining at another's expense. Their dependence gives the praise a self-interested character.

In Burton. Burton asks who can resist excessive applause. The flatterers raise a ruler beyond exemplary heroism to supposed divinity, so that praise itself becomes a means of overthrowing his judgment.

The places. Parasites inflate the ruler's standing through extravagant praise. (p. 125; DJR-046-01.)

In this edition. "those Parasites" → "those parasites" (DJR-046-01). The retained word is explained through dependence and flattery. The article does not read it as a biological description.

See also. Collogue; Ambodexter; Proletary; Clown.

Parrhesia

Source forms: parrhesiam[13595]

The word. Parrhesia means frank, open or free speaking. The Latinized form parrhesiam occurs in a marginal comment on Burton's style.

In Burton. The margin's claim that there is no style except frank speaking accompanies Burton's declaration that his pen matches his mind. Calling a spade a spade and preferring substance to words turn openness into an authorial stance, expressed through repeated Latin and English formulations.

The places. The marginal term accompanies the declaration of plain, outspoken writing. (p. 12; DJR-005-26.)

In this edition. "parrhesiam" → "frank speaking" (DJR-005:B44; margin); "as free, as loose" → "as outspoken as I am unrestrained" (DJR-005-26). Frank speaking comes from the translated marginal note; outspoken expresses the related claim in the body. Both are kept distinct from the rhetorical repetitions they accompany.

See also. Cento; Action; Apologize.

---

health-killers unresolved.

[13594] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 125 (DJR-046-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-046:E01. DJR-046:E01 explains the historical social meaning and the Nine Worthies. The ruler's supposed divinity belongs to Burton's account of corrupting praise.

[13595] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 12 (DJR-005-26). Existing edition notes: DJR-005:B44, DJR-005:E32. DJR-005:B44 reads "Stylus hic nullus præter parrhesiam." DJR-005:E32 explains the water-drinker joke and the deliberately repeated spade and Latin-English formulations. The exact Cardano and shorter Seneca references remain untraced.

Passion

Source forms: passions; passion[13596]

The word. Passion can mean an emotion, an attack of illness, or an affliction and suffering. Its sense depends on whether Burton is describing feeling, a bodily episode or distress endured.

In Burton. The reported case of Katherine Gualter uses passions beside convulsions for violent attacks. Lovers pass from passions to actions, so the word there names feelings or emotions. David's temporary passion is the affliction expressed in a psalm, with its temporary character emphasized.

The places. Passions names attacks accompanying convulsions. (p. 53; DJR-031-24.) Passions is contrasted with lovers' actions. (p. 510; DJR-127-51.) A temporary passion names David's suffering. (p. 695; DJR-164-04.)

In this edition. "strange passions and convulsions" → "strange attacks and convulsions" (DJR-031-24); "passions to actions" → "feelings to actions" (DJR-127-51); "actions and passions" → "actions and emotions" (DJR-127-51); "temporary passion" → "temporary affliction" (DJR-164-04). Attacks, feelings, emotions and affliction preserve the distinct contexts. A single emotional equivalent would obscure the first and third examples.

See also. Appetite; Affection; Perturbation; Anger; Fear; Sorrow.

Pathetical

Source forms: pathetical[13597]

The word. Pathetical means impassioned or emotionally forceful. In this example it describes a declaration of enthusiasm.

In Burton. Scaliger's admiration for poetry becomes an outburst in which authorship of a few admired lines outweighs imperial rank. Pathetical marks the intensity of his preference.

The places. Pathetical characterizes Scaliger's declaration about poetry. (p. 280; DJR-081-11.)

In this edition. "pathetical protestation" → "passionate declaration" (DJR-081-11). Passionate declaration avoids the narrower present-day suggestion of pitiable inadequacy that pathetic might introduce.

See also. Action.

Perturbation

Source forms: perturbation; perturbations[13598]

The word. Perturbation is a disturbance of the emotions or mind. In the Stoic argument it names a disordered passion that excludes wisdom; in the treatment heading it identifies the disturbances to be corrected.

In Burton. Burton first presents the stringent claim that even the slightest emotional disturbance is incompatible with wisdom. The later heading turns to practical responses, including resistance and confiding grief to a friend.

[13596] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 53 (DJR-031-24); p. 510 (DJR-127-51); p. 695 (DJR-164-04). Existing edition notes: DJR-031:E17, DJR-127:E41, DJR-164:E03. DJR-031:E17 treats the extraordinary case and its eyewitness claim as a historical report. DJR-127:E41 leaves the precise Lucian, Plato and marginal Aristotelian sources unresolved. DJR-164:E03 identifies Psalm 38:1–3 and 8.

[13597] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 280 (DJR-081-11). Existing edition notes: DJR-081:E11. DJR-081:E11 identifies the Renaissance scholar Julius Caesar Scaliger and Horace's Ode 3.9. The twelve Lucan lines and the precise passage in Scaliger remain unidentified.

[13598] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 43 (DJR-012-13); p. 289 (DJR-083-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-012:E08. DJR-012:E08 identifies Horace, Epistles 1.16.65–66, and preserves Burton's vivit beside the compared vivet. The Stoic claim is reported as a philosophical position.

The places. Perturbation appears in the statement of the Stoic ideal. (p. 43; DJR-012-13.) Perturbations identifies the subject of the practical counsel. (p. 289; DJR-083-01.)

In this edition. “the least perturbation” → “the slightest disturbance of the emotions” (DJR-012-13); “Perturbations of the minde rectified” → “Disturbances of the mind corrected” (DJR-083-01). Disturbance retains the shared sense while emotions and mind follow the particular contexts. The heading’s corrected states the aim of the ensuing counsel.

See also. Non naturals; Passion.

Philter

Source forms: philters; philtrum[13599]

The word. A philter or philtrum is a love potion. Burton also uses the term figuratively for flattery that wins attachment and favour.

In Burton. The witchcraft account attributes power to potions that change affections. In the merchant’s case, friends suspect such a potion, but the physician assigns a bodily cause and reports relief after treatment. The political example makes flattering speech itself a potion by which dependants gain office.

The places. Philters are credited with compelling or changing affection. (p. 55; DJR-031-41.) A suspected philtrum is displaced by the physician’s explanation. (p. 78; DJR-036-07.) Philters figuratively names the flattering means of gaining favour. (p. 421–422; DJR-110-23.)

In this edition. “philters” → “love potions” (DJR-031-41); “Philtrum” → “love potion” (DJR-036-07); “such like philters” → “similar love potions” (DJR-110-23). Love potion makes the material name plain and preserves the metaphor when applied to social manipulation. The merchant’s initial suspicion remains distinct from the case’s reported conclusion.

See also. Fascination.

Phlebotomy

Source forms: phlebotomy[13600]

The word. Phlebotomy means bloodletting. Burton discusses it as an intervention intended to remove an excess of blood or corrupt humours.

In Burton. The passage argues that both omission and misuse can be harmful. Timely bleeding is said to prevent the effects of heated humours, while excessive or ill-timed bleeding is said to cool the body and deplete its spirits. The balance of the argument depends on retaining both claims.

The places. The discussion weighs neglect of bloodletting against its excessive or unsuitable use. (p. 80; DJR-036-22.)

In this edition. “Phlebotomy” → “bloodletting” (DJR-036-22). Bloodletting supplies the familiar term. Without judgement, at an unsuitable time and to excess clarify the separate qualifications on its use.

See also. Purging.

[13599] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 55 (DJR-031-41); p. 78 (DJR-036-07); p. 421–422 (DJR-110-23). Existing edition notes: DJR-036:E05, DJR-110:E16. DJR-036:E05 treats the cure as Schenck’s case transmitted by Burton and leaves Cnelinus unresolved. DJR-110:E16 leaves the Caelius Secundus anecdote unidentified and explains the Rehoboam reference. The witchcraft claims remain Burton’s reports.

[13600] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 80 (DJR-036-22). The explanation follows the selected passage’s historical humoral reasoning. It does not convert the catalogue of benefits and harms into present treatment guidance.

Phlegm

Source forms: pituita[13601]

The word. Pituita means phlegm, named here as a bodily substance received by a passage of the brain's middle ventricle. Its place belongs to the historical physiological description.

In Burton. Burton surveys the brain's chambers and the faculties assigned to them. Phlegm appears beside the pathways of the animal spirits and the supposed locations of imagination, thought and memory.

The places. Pituita occurs in the account of the middle ventricle's passages. (p. 19; DJR-024-19.)

In this edition. "Pituita" → "phlegm" (DJR-024-19). Phlegm supplies the English term. They place and they say preserve Burton's attribution of the faculties' locations to the writers he summarizes.

See also. Humour.

Phrenitis

Source forms: phrenitis; Phrensie[13602]

The word. Phrenitis is the historical disorder defined here by continual mental disturbance with acute fever. Phrensie, rendered frenzy, can likewise denote fever-associated delirium, rather than merely intense excitement.

In Burton. Burton distinguishes phrenitis from melancholy and madness through fever and contrasts its clamour with melancholy's usual silence. In the later account of causes, frenzy appears among illnesses said to develop into melancholy. The classification and the claimed transition are separate uses of the medical vocabulary.

The places. Phrenitis is defined and distinguished by acute fever. (p. 8; DJR-022-19.) Phrensie is listed among preceding illnesses. (p. 173; DJR-056-57.)

In this edition. "Phrenitis" → "Phrenitis" (DJR-022-19); "Phrensie" → "frenzy" (DJR-056-57). The technical name remains in the definition. Frenzy is retained in the list with its historical medical sense explained; ague is rendered fever.

See also. Calenture and ague.

Physick

Source forms: physick; kitchin Physick; Pharmaceutice[13603]

The word. Physick means medicine, either the field of study and practice or remedies used for treatment. Kitchen physick is domestic medicine. Pharmaceutice is the branch concerned with treatment through medicines.

In Burton. The sufferer's study of physick makes illness a motive for medical learning, as in Burton's own reading. The treatment section distinguishes remedies prepared by apothecaries from the preceding regulation of life. Its subsequent polemic contrasts professional medicines with household remedies and country living.

[13601] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 19 (DJR-024-19). Existing edition notes: DJR-024:E17. DJR-024:E17 identifies pituita and explains that the ventricular placement of the internal senses is a historical theory.

[13602] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 8 (DJR-022-19); p. 173 (DJR-056-57). Existing edition notes: DJR-022:E17, DJR-056:E45. DJR-022:E17 explains phrēn, fever and sleeplessness. DJR-056:E45 clarifies German for Dutch and develop into for degenerate into, while leaving Botaldus in Burton's form pending identification.

[13603] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 6 (DJR-003-09); p. 362–363 (DJR-098-45); p. 362 (DJR-098-40). Existing edition notes: DJR-003:E13, DJR-098:E30, DJR-098:E35. DJR-003:E13 retains the printed frog sounds and explains physicians as their writings. DJR-098:E30 defines the transition from the six non-naturals; E35 identifies the following passage as historical polemic rather than an instruction to avoid treatment.

The places. Physick names the subject studied in search of relief. (p. 6; DJR-003-09.) Kitchen and apothecaries' physick are contrasted. (p. 362–363; DJR-098-45.) Pharmaceutice introduces treatment by medicines after regimen. (p. 362; DJR-098-40.)

In this edition. "studied physick" → "studied medicine" (DJR-003-09); "kitchin Physick" → "kitchen remedies" (DJR-098-45); "Apothecaries Physick" → "apothecaries' medicines" (DJR-098-45); "Pharmaceutice" → "pharmaceutics" (DJR-098-40). Medicine and remedies follow the different grammatical and practical contexts. Pharmaceutics preserves the named branch and its contrast with regimen.

See also. Empiric; Mountebank; Paracelsian; Simples; Receipt; Prognostics.

Physiognomy

Source forms: physiognomer[13604]

The word. A physiognomer claims to read character from bodily features. The selected example concerns Zopyrus's judgment of Socrates from his appearance.

In Burton. Burton uses the story to argue that tendencies assigned to nature can be corrected. Socrates admits faults yet overcomes them; the Christian reader is then urged to govern similarly unwanted inclinations.

The places. Zopyrus's judgment introduces the example of self-correction. (p. 348; DJR-095-44.)

In this edition. "Zopirus the Physiognomer" → "Zopyrus the reader of faces" (DJR-095-44). Reader of faces describes the claimed practice directly. The argument's focus remains the capacity to reform rather than the independent validity of that practice.

See also. Astrology.

Pine apple

Source forms: pine-apple; Pinas[13605]

The word. Pine-apple can mean a pine cone in the older English usage. Pinas in the travellers' food list means pineapples. The similar names therefore refer to different objects in the two passages.

In Burton. The heart's pyramidal shape is compared with a cone in the anatomical account. The American food list instead names edible produce alongside palm hearts and potatoes. Shape and diet establish the respective senses.

The places. The pine-apple comparison describes the heart's shape. (p. 18; DJR-024-14.) Pinas appears among reported American foods. (p. 77; DJR-035-47.)

In this edition. "Pine-apple" → "pine cone" (DJR-024-14); "Pinas" → "pineapples" (DJR-035-47). The distinct equivalents prevent the anatomical comparison from silently becoming the tropical fruit. The food list retains that fruit where its context supports it.

See also. Herbal; Organical parts.

Plausible

Source forms: plausible[13606]

[13604] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 348 (DJR-095-44). Existing edition notes: DJR-095:E29. DJR-095:E29 compares Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 4.80. That passage records alleged faults overcome by reason but does not give Burton's particular list; the intermediary and list remain uncollated.

[13605] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 18 (DJR-024-14); p. 77 (DJR-035-47). Existing edition notes: DJR-024:E12, DJR-035:E30. DJR-024:E12 explains the cone and the historical physiology of the heart. DJR-035:E30 identifies the food names while leaving potatoes broad enough to include sweet potatoes and treating the list as travellers' reports.

[13606] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 297 (DJR-084-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-084:E26. DJR-084:E26 notes that Lemnius's cited Latin emphasizes compassion rather than harshness and explains insult over as browbeating.

The word. Plausible means pleasing, acceptable or agreeable here. It describes a manner of dealing with a distressed person, rather than the probability of a statement.

In Burton. Burton recommends kind words and gentle persuasion, forbidding mockery and contempt. Plausible means of restoring the sufferer belong to this compassionate manner of approach.

The places. Plausible qualifies the means of bringing the sufferer back to health. (p. 297; DJR-084-28.)

In this edition. "all plausible means" → "every agreeable means" (DJR-084-28). Agreeable preserves the emphasis on reception and treatment. Bring back to health explains reduce in the same sentence.

See also. Secure.

Pleasure

Source forms: voluptas; summum bonum[13607]

The word. Voluptas means pleasure; summum bonum means the highest good. In Burton's defence of Epicurus, they describe freedom from pain and care and tranquillity of mind.

In Burton. The discussion of correcting passions begins by making a quiet mind the principal aim. Burton rejects the reduction of Epicurean pleasure to eating and drinking and protests that the teaching has been unfairly blamed for excess.

The places. Pleasure and the highest good are identified with mental quiet. (p. 289; DJR-083-02.)

In this edition. "voluptas" → "pleasure" (DJR-083-02); "Summum bonum" → "highest good" (DJR-083-02). The Latin terms are translated, and the following explanation preserves the restrained sense Burton wishes to defend. Want cares means to lack cares.

See also. Aqua vitae; Appetite; Love; Luxurious and riot.

Plethora and repletion

Source forms: cacochymia; plethora; Cacexia; repletion; inanition; Cachexia[13608]

The word. Plethora is excessive bodily fullness or an excess of humours. Repletion and inanition name opposed conditions of overfilling and depletion. Cacochymia concerns corrupt humours, while cachexia names a poor or wasted bodily condition.

In Burton. The first catalogue places excess, corruption and wasting together among harmful consequences. The account of study emphasizes wasting and digestive trouble. The dietary discussion then warns against both too much food and complete fasting: opposite extremes can harm.

The places. Plethora and related terms occur in a catalogue of bodily disorders. (p. 72; DJR-035-04.) Cacexia is associated with excessive study and sitting. (p. 128; DJR-046-26.) Repletion and inanition describe the opposed dietary extremes. (p. 235; DJR-071-04.)

In this edition. "Cacochymia" → "corrupt humours" (DJR-035-04); "Plethora" → "an excess of humours" (DJR-035-04); "Cachexia" → "a wasted constitution" (DJR-035-04); "Cacexia" → "wasting ill health" (DJR-046-26); "repletion and inanition" → "overfilling and emptying the body" (DJR-071-04). The equivalents distinguish excessive quantity, corrupted quality and wasted condition. Emptying the body retains the opposition to overfilling, with depletion explained in the note.

[13607] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 289 (DJR-083-02). Existing edition notes: DJR-083:E01. DJR-083:E01 supplies close Senecan parallels without claiming one verified source for the Latin. Burton's accusation against Aristotle is retained despite its chronological problem; its basis remains unidentified. The treatment claims remain historical.

[13608] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 72 (DJR-035-04); p. 128 (DJR-046-26); p. 235 (DJR-071-04). Existing edition notes: DJR-035:E01, DJR-035:E02, DJR-046:E24, DJR-071:E03. DJR-035:E01 preserves the cruelties/crudities qualification and distinguishes the humoral names from current diagnoses. DJR-046:E24 leaves Vossius's bibliography unresolved. DJR-071:E03 explains no stomach as no appetite and retains the unverified compressed references.

See also. Humour.

Policy

Source forms: policy; policie; politick[13609]

The word. Policy or policie can mean government and public order. Politick can describe skill or shrewdness in affairs of state. The noun need not denote one particular rule or programme.

In Burton. The debate about spirits' mortality extends their supposed changes to religion and government. The polemic against forced celibacy invokes good government alongside religion and humanity. Commines's political experience then lends weight to advice for distressed rulers, including prayer and the help of friends.

The places. Policy names government in the reported claim about mortal spirits. (p. 42; DJR-029-10.) Policie names public order within the attack on enforced celibacy. (p. 204–205; DJR-063-13.) Politick praises the historian's skill in state affairs. (p. 223; DJR-068-13.) Politick again characterizes Commines's counsel. (p. 294; DJR-083-43.)

In this edition. "religion and policy" → "religion and government" (DJR-029-10); "policie" → "good government" (DJR-063-13); "politick historiographer" → "historian skilled in affairs of state" (DJR-068-13); "politick Commineus" → "politically shrewd Commynes" (DJR-083-43). Government, public order and political skill keep the institutional and personal senses distinct. Apparently retains Burton's belike in the first Commines account.

See also. Commonwealth; Temporize.

Precise

Source forms: precise; Precisians; preciseness[13610]

The word. Precise can describe religious strictness, often with a polemical reference to Puritans. Precisians are religious rigorists; preciseness is excessive scrupulosity in religious observance.

In Burton. The dependent chaplain must conform to the patron's strictness or Catholic allegiance. Burton later attacks rigorists within his own religious camp. In the proposed response to disturbed prophets and dreamers, preciseness appears among causes to be addressed through changes of life and medical management.

The places. Precise identifies the patron's religious position. (p. 142 [printed 128]; DJR-049-33.) Precisians names the rigorists attacked within Burton's own camp. (p. 676; DJR-160-14.) Preciseness is included among the causes assigned to particular sufferers. (p. 682; DJR-161-24.)

In this edition. "precise" → "a strict Puritan" (DJR-049-33); "Precisians" → "religious rigorists" (DJR-160-14); "preciseness" → "religious scrupulosity" (DJR-161-24). The equivalents specify religious observance rather than accuracy in general. Strict Puritan follows the particular contrast between patronal allegiances; rigorists allows the broader force of the later noun.

See also. Religion and superstition; Curiosity.

[13609] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 42 (DJR-029-10); p. 204–205 (DJR-063-13); p. 223 (DJR-068-13); p. 294 (DJR-083-43). Existing edition notes: DJR-029:E06, DJR-063:E13, DJR-068:E12, DJR-083:E40. DJR-029:E06 places Jerome's creature within the historical debate. DJR-063:E13 retains Burton's institutional accusations as allegations and treats Lily's 1641 grammar as a later parallel. DJR-068:E12 compares Commines but leaves the Latin edition and wording uncollated; DJR-083:E40 preserves that source limit.

[13610] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 142 [printed 128] (DJR-049-33); p. 676 (DJR-160-14); p. 682 (DJR-161-24). Existing edition notes: DJR-049:E27, DJR-160:E14, DJR-161:E24. DJR-049:E27 preserves the different animals in Heinsius's margin and Burton's body; its exact source remains unlocated. DJR-160:E14 identifies the Horatian line and the tares image. DJR-161:E24 distinguishes public suppression from management of individual sufferers. The sequence page 142 remains distinguished from printed 128.

Present

Source forms: present possession; present death; present; present ease; present remedy; present diverter[13611]

The word. Present often means immediate or immediately effective. It can describe possession, an effect, relief or a remedy, rather than merely something belonging to the current time.

In Burton. Appointment in Burton's imagined commonwealth brings immediate possession. Unkindness becomes instant death in the exaggerated language of courtly dependence. In the medical passages, present expresses the urgency of recovery, the demand for relief, or the claimed speed of a remedy. Scriptural reading offers an immediate diversion of attention.

The places. The qualified appointee takes possession without delay. (p. 60–61; DJR-015-41.) An angry look is described as instant death. (p. 169; DJR-056-07.) The sufferer desires immediate recovery. (p. 215; DJR-066-01.) Lack of immediate relief prompts repeated changes of physician. (p. 229; DJR-069-35.) Moderate sexual activity is called an immediate remedy for some people. (p. 239; DJR-072-01.) Reading Scripture supplies an immediate diversion. (p. 282; DJR-081-27.)

In this edition. "present possession" → "take possession immediately" (DJR-015-41); "present death" → "instant death" (DJR-056-07); "a present recovery" → "an immediate recovery" (DJR-066-01); "present ease" → "immediate relief" (DJR-069-35); "a present remedy" → "an immediate remedy" (DJR-072-01); "present diverter" → "an immediate diversion" (DJR-081-27). The equivalents make the temporal force explicit. The immediacy of a reported cure remains Burton's claim, while instant death retains the rhetorical exaggeration.

See also. Still; Prevent; Prognostics.

Prevent

Source forms: prevent; prevented death[13612]

The word. Prevent can mean act beforehand, anticipate or intervene before something occurs. Its older force may differ sharply from the modern sense of stopping an event altogether.

In Burton. The heavenly Physician prevents by intervening before a fatal outcome. In the account of old people forestalling their deaths, the word instead describes anticipating the death that would otherwise come. The second use cannot mean preserving their lives.

The places. Divine aid is described as intervening before a fatal outcome. (p. 214; DJR-065-20.) Prevented death means anticipated the death otherwise expected. (p. 217; DJR-066-11.)

In this edition. "do not prevent" → "intervenes" (DJR-065-20); "they prevented death" → "they forestalled death" (DJR-066-11). The surrounding unless clause preserves the condition expressed by if the Physician does not intervene in the source. Forestalled retains the anticipatory sense in the second passage.

See also. Present.

[13611] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 60–61 (DJR-015-41); p. 169 (DJR-056-07); p. 215 (DJR-066-01); p. 229 (DJR-069-35); p. 239 (DJR-072-01); p. 282 (DJR-081-27). Existing edition notes: DJR-015:E24, DJR-066:E01, DJR-069:E24, DJR-072:E01, DJR-081:E27. DJR-015:E24 explains the appointment and advowson context. DJR-066:E01 distinguishes the Juvenal quotation from the erroneous Persius attribution. DJR-069:E24 reads twenty physicians in succession, not twenty-one. DJR-072:E01 uses the margin to clarify the release of reason; DJR-081:E27 leaves the sermon's Augustinian authorship unverified.

[13612] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 214 (DJR-065-20); p. 217 (DJR-066-11). Existing edition notes: DJR-065:E18, DJR-066:E11. DJR-065:E18 identifies the claim that only divine aid can help as theological, not a conclusion about available medical care. DJR-066:E11 retains Choa and Barbicians and leaves the exact Aelian and Boemus accounts uncollated.

Prime mover

Source forms: primum mobile[13613]

The word. Primum mobile is the first moving sphere in the older astronomical model. Prime mover is the explanatory heading for that image here, rather than a substitution of a separate theological argument.

In Burton. Love and hatred are imagined as a sphere carrying all other passions around with them. Burton uses the cosmological image to explain their governing place among the affections before expanding his account of love.

The places. Love and hatred carry the other affections as the first moving sphere carries the heavens. (p. 411; DJR-108-27.)

In this edition. "the primum mobile of all other affections" → "the first moving sphere of all the other affections" (DJR-108-27). First moving sphere preserves the physical image behind the claim about emotional dependence.

See also. Astrology; Essence and quintessence.

Privy

Source forms: jakes; Draughts[13614]

The word. Jakes and draughts can mean privies or latrines. Here draughts names a source of foul air, not a current of air or a drink.

In Burton. The humiliating labour assigned to the poor includes emptying privies and clearing drains. The medical account also groups privies with dunghills and carrion as sources of unhealthy air. The same object serves a social argument and a historical account of disease.

The places. Emptying privies appears in the catalogue of degrading labour. (p. 156; DJR-053-03.) Privies and drains are listed among sources of foul air. (p. 83; DJR-037-02.)

In this edition. "empty jakes" → "empty privies" (DJR-053-03); "Draughts, Sinks" → "privies and drains" (DJR-037-02). Privies makes the shared meaning plain without weakening the degrading imagery in the first passage.

See also. Meat; Bewray.

Professor

Source forms: Christian Professors; Professor[13615]

The word. A professor can be someone who professes a religion. Christian professors and a true professor name believers, without requiring an academic office.

In Burton. In the attack on diverted church revenues, a decline among Christian professors accompanies increased ignorance. In the consolation for religious distress, the wish to be a true professor becomes evidence that the sufferer has not wholly rejected faith.

[13613] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 411 (DJR-108-27). Existing edition notes: DJR-108:E21. DJR-108:E21 explains the astronomical model and retains Piccolomini and Caussin as Burton's stated authorities; their exact editions remain uncollated.

[13614] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 156 (DJR-053-03); p. 83 (DJR-037-02). Existing edition notes: DJR-053:E03. DJR-053:E03 distinguishes jakes from the neighbouring gutter-cleaning expression and preserves the unresolved Plautus/Aristophanes citation mismatch. The disease-producing air is described as the physicians' historical explanation.

[13615] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 137 (DJR-048-17); p. 710 (DJR-167-11). Existing edition notes: DJR-048:E13, DJR-167:E11. DJR-048:E13 explains the Julian comparison and leaves the Coke and Nicephorus references open. DJR-167:E11 explicitly distinguishes this professor from an academic teacher.

The places. Those professing Christianity suffer from the deprivation of church support. (p. 137; DJR-048-17.) The desire to be a professing believer supports hope of reconciliation. (p. 710; DJR-167-11.)

In this edition. "Christian Professors" → "those who profess Christianity" (DJR-048-17); "a true Professor" → "a true professing believer" (DJR-167-11). Professing identifies the religious commitment in both contexts. The later passage retains the distinction between being reconciled now and being reconciled in the future.

See also. Divine.

Prognostics

Source forms: prognosticks; event[13616]

The word. Prognostics concern an illness's expected course and outcome. Event can mean the outcome itself, rather than an occurrence considered without reference to what preceded it.

In Burton. Burton warns melancholy readers that descriptions of symptoms and prognoses may be misapplied to their own cases. His prognosis chapter then presents different consequences of humoral heat and cold. Reading these general descriptions as personal predictions is precisely the danger named in the warning.

The places. Readers are warned against treating general prognoses as personal descriptions. (p. 17; DJR-006-27.) Event names the supposed outcome of increasing humoral heat. (p. 213; DJR-065-12.)

In this edition. "prognosticks" → "prognoses" (DJR-006-27); "the common event" → "the usual outcome" (DJR-065-12). Prognoses and outcome clarify the predictive purpose. The historical categories of frenzy, stupefaction and possession remain distinct reported claims.

See also. Physick; Present; Century.

Proletary

Source forms: proletaries; proletariique[13617]

The word. Proletaries are people of low social rank; in the battle example they are common soldiers. The Latin proletarii can also be used disparagingly of low fellows.

In Burton. The anonymous dead expose the brevity and unequal distribution of military fame. In the attack on corrupt appointments, the related Latin term becomes an insult directed at those obstructing the Church and universities. The social contempt of the second passage is stronger than the descriptive military equivalent in the first.

The places. Common soldiers receive far less recognition than the general. (p. 32–33; DJR-010-05.) Proletariique joins Harpies in the attack on corrupt appointments. (p. 144 [sequence]; DJR-050-09.)

In this edition. "proletaries" → "common soldiers" (DJR-010-05); "proletariique" → "and low fellows" (DJR-050-09). The renderings follow the local distinction between soldiers drawn from ordinary people and a polemical label. Neither passage uses the later political category proletariat.

See also. Parasite.

[13616] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 17 (DJR-006-27); p. 213 (DJR-065-12). Existing edition notes: DJR-006:E25, DJR-065:E11. DJR-006:E25 preserves both Burton's prohibition and his subsequent advice about cautious reading. DJR-065:E11 explains the humoral language and records the continuation of marginal n and all six references at the foot of the page.

[13617] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 32–33 (DJR-010-05); p. 144 [sequence] (DJR-050-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-010:E04, DJR-050:E08. DJR-010:E04 identifies the fifteen-thousand-to-fifteen contrast as rhetorical rather than a verified casualty count. DJR-050:E08 preserves Burton's explicit distinction between corrupt appointments and the Church or universities generally.

Proper

Source forms: proper; propernes of person[13618]

The word. Proper can mean handsome or well formed. Properness of person describes physical appearance, rather than correctness of behaviour or ownership.

In Burton. A handsome man can be recognized readily, whereas learning takes time to acquire and recognize. Loyola's handsome appearance then stands among the worldly advantages surpassed by the honour gained after his injury. Both examples distinguish bodily attractions from another kind of achievement.

The places. A proper man is a handsome man in the comparison with learning. (p. 131; DJR-047-08.) Properness of person names Loyola's handsome appearance. (p. 313; DJR-088-01.)

In this edition. "a proper man" → "a handsome man" (DJR-047-08); "propernes of person" → "handsome appearance" (DJR-088-01). Handsome prevents the moral or possessive senses of proper from obscuring these physical descriptions.

See also. Honest.

Purging

Source forms: vomit; vomits; purging upwards[13619]

The word. Purging means evacuating bodily matter in the historical treatment of illness. It can act upwards by vomiting or downwards through the bowels. A vomit may name the emetic substance administered, rather than the material expelled.

In Burton. An emetic plays a part in the reported serpent cure, alongside a concealed object intended to change the patient's belief. The pharmacological survey classifies melancholy-purging medicines by composition, strength and direction of evacuation. Laurel and asarabacca are called common vomits within that scheme.

The places. A vomit names the administered emetic in the serpent anecdote. (p. 298; DJR-084-34.) Two common vomits means two familiar emetics. (p. 376; DJR-101-34.) Purging upwards and downwards distinguishes the directions of evacuation. (p. 376; DJR-101-32.)

In this edition. "a vomit" → "an emetic" (DJR-084-34); "two common vomits" → "two common emetics" (DJR-101-34); "purging upwards or downward" → "upwards or downwards" (DJR-101-32). Emetic clarifies the medicinal noun. The modern description retains the directions of purging and explains them in the accompanying note, without reconciling historical doses or imposing a botanical identity.

See also. Alteratives; Clister; Flux and lask; Costiveness; Apophlegmatisms; Helleborism.

Quean and slut

Source forms: slut; Quean; queans[13620]

[13618] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 131 (DJR-047-08); p. 313 (DJR-088-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-047:E07, DJR-088:E01. DJR-047:E07 locates the learned/good contrast in Seneca, Letter 88.38, but not Burton's details of dress, hair and scent. DJR-088:E01 leaves the abbreviated Ribera and Macrobius references unresolved.

[13619] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 298 (DJR-084-34); p. 376 (DJR-101-34); p. 376 (DJR-101-32). Existing edition notes: DJR-084:E32, DJR-101:E29, DJR-101:E31. DJR-084:E32 treats the cures as reported stories, not verified clinical events. DJR-101:E29 explains upwards as vomiting and downwards as bowel evacuation. DJR-101:E31 retains the anomalous Dioscorides book 11 and the unexplained relationship between the two stated doses.

[13620] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 168 (DJR-055-36); p. 521 (DJR-129-62); p. 569 (DJR-139-09); p. 629 (DJR-150-54). Existing edition notes: DJR-055:E34, DJR-129:E40, DJR-139:E06, DJR-150:E43. DJR-055:E34 locates the Paulina comparison in Seneca 104.1–5 rather than the printed 105. DJR-129:E40 identifies Burton's condensed Heloise passage and irregular tuæ. DJR-139:E06 treats the Lucian-transmitted accusation as polemic; DJR-150:E43 retains the causal account of husbands' conduct.

The word. Slut can mean a dirty or slovenly woman. Quean is an abusive term for a sexually disreputable woman and, in some contexts, a prostitute. These insults do not carry identical accusations.

In Burton. The marriage catalogues separate slovenliness from the accusation carried by harlot or wantonness. Heloise's reported preference for Abelard turns the contrast between quean and queen into a contrast of personal attachment and rank. The later discussion attributes some women's prostitution or retaliation to husbands' deprivation and ill-treatment.

The places. Slut and harlot form separate items in the hostile catalogue. (p. 168; DJR-055-36.) Quean contrasts with queen in the report of Heloise's preference. (p. 521; DJR-129-62.) Slut describes slovenliness in advice against marriage. (p. 569; DJR-139-09.) Queans refers to women driven to prostitution. (p. 629; DJR-150-54.)

In this edition. "a slut" → "a slattern" (DJR-055-36); "his Quean" → "his mistress" (DJR-129-62); "if she be a slut" → "if she is slovenly" (DJR-139-09); "turn queans by compulsion" → "are driven to prostitution" (DJR-150-54). The equivalents distinguish untidiness, sexual stigma and prostitution. Mistress in the Heloise passage accompanies the stronger whore in the translated Latin; the source's quean/queen wordplay is explained in the note.

See also. Bawd; Mistress; Sodomy; Honest; Wittal and cuckold.

Quiddity and quodlibet

Source forms: quiddities; Quodlibetaries[13621]

The word. A quiddity concerns what a thing is, its defining nature. A quodlibetary disputation takes up questions on whatever subject is proposed. Burton uses the terms contemptuously within a catalogue of argumentative refinements.

In Burton. The passage attacks theological ingenuity that produces minute distinctions, objections, solutions and interpretations to explain away difficulties. Quirks and quiddities places a technical inquiry into essence beside the charge of verbal evasion; quodlibetary names the disputational form.

The places. The catalogue joins quiddities and unrestricted disputations to other scholastic techniques. (p. 675; DJR-160-07.)

In this edition. "quirks and quiddities" → "quirks and quiddities" (DJR-160-07); "Quodlibetaries" → "disputations on any subject whatever" (DJR-160-07). Quiddities remains as a marked term explained here and in the note; the more obscure Quodlibetaries receives an explanatory phrase. Burton's hostile assessment remains his own.

See also. Equivocation.

Radical moisture

Source forms: cambium; ros; gluten; radicall moisture[13622]

The word. Radical moisture is the innate or rooted moisture imagined to sustain natural heat. Cambium, ros and gluten are technical names in the associated historical account of nourishment; gluten here is not the modern food protein.

In Burton. The definition of humour distinguishes innate from acquired bodily liquids and describes their replenishment. The later account makes innate moisture necessary to preserve the heat supporting [13621] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 675 (DJR-160-07). Existing edition notes: DJR-160:E07. DJR-160:E07 distinguishes tropological interpretation and logical ampliation from the other terms and leaves the Bale attribution uncollated.

[13622] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 14 (DJR-023-28); p. 21 (DJR-024-35). Existing edition notes: DJR-023:E20, DJR-024:E30. DJR-023:E20 records the syntactic difficulty and the tension between first concoction in the liver and the subsequent account of stomach digestion. DJR-024:E30 explains the moisture-and-heat model and the six non-natural conditions. Collation of the medical sources remains pending.

vegetative life, in plants as well as people. Bodily constitution and management of the six non-natural conditions affect this preservation.

The places. Cambium, ros and gluten occur in the compressed account of nourishing innate humour. (p. 14; DJR-023-28.) Radical moisture sustains natural heat and prevents its exhaustion. (p. 21; DJR-024-35.)

In this edition. “Cambium” → “cambium” (DJR-023-28); “Ros and Gluten” → “ros and gluten” (DJR-023-28); “radicall moisture” → “innate moisture” (DJR-024-35). Innate explains radical directly. The technical Latin names remain, with ros and gluten glossed as dew and glue in the note. The difficult physiological sequence is preserved rather than silently harmonized.

See also. Concoction.

Reason

Source forms: Reason[13623]

The word. Reason is the capacity to deliberate and judge, here presented in conflict with appetite and will. Recognizing what ought to be done does not guarantee doing it.

In Burton. The first sentence sets reason’s counsel against lust’s. The related moral account then gives an obstinate will the power to pervert judgement even when the right action is known. Its image of Actaeon destroyed by his own dogs makes the passions appear as forces encouraged by the sufferer.

The places. Reason and lust offer competing advice. (p. 30; DJR-026-47.) The will perverts judgement despite knowledge of the right action. (p. 97 [scan p. 197]; DJR-040-05.)

In this edition. “reason another” → “reason another” (DJR-026-47); “perverts judgment” → “perverts judgement” (DJR-040-05). Reason is retained; the second selected passage develops the conflict through judgement without repeating the headword. The modern text follows this moral argument without treating it as a comprehensive explanation of illness.

See also. Faculty; Judgment; Wit; Synderesis; Conscience; Will and nill.

Receipt

Source forms: receipts[13624]

The word. A receipt is a prescription or medicinal recipe. The selected plural names customary formulas relied upon by practitioners, not acknowledgments of payment.

In Burton. Burton reproaches prescribers and patients for placing profit or remedies above trust in God. Receipts and medicines belong to the practical means whose proper place he is debating in a religious argument about treatment.

The places. Ordinary receipts are the practitioner’s customary prescriptions. (p. 223; DJR-068-19.)

In this edition. “ordinary receipts” → “customary prescriptions” (DJR-068-19). Prescriptions clarifies the medical sense; customary explains ordinary. The complaint concerns reliance and motivation, rather than a claim that every recipe is ineffective.

See also. Physick; Apothecaries measures; Confection; Decoction; Electuaries; Oxymel.

[13623] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 30 (DJR-026-47); p. 97 [scan p. 197] (DJR-040-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-040:E04. DJR-040:E04 identifies the Actaeon image and locates the claim of responsibility within Burton’s moral account. The source pagination and scan-image locator remain distinct.

[13624] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 223 (DJR-068-19). Existing edition notes: DJR-068:E17. DJR-068:E17 identifies Ecclesiasticus and repairs the printed 1.12.and 12. to 1:11–12 in the modern text while preserving the original reference.

Recreate

Source forms: recreate[13625]

The word. To recreate can mean restore or refresh someone's strength and spirits, as well as provide recreation. The restorative sense remains active in this final counsel.

In Burton. Burton joins wholesome recreation to deliberate guidance of thought and assistance from friends. Refresh and recreate describes what these activities should do for a distressed person; it is more than a recommendation to fill time with amusement.

The places. Recreation is intended to refresh and restore the distressed soul. (p. 722; DJR-169-28.)

In this edition. "refresh and recreate his distressed soul" → "refresh and restore his distressed soul" (DJR-169-28). Restore brings out the verb's purpose, while recreation remains the name of the activity. Skill, effort and friends' help preserve the means surrounding it.

See also. Mirth; Solitude; Tables.

Rectification

Source forms: rectified; rectification[13626]

The word. Rectification is correction, improvement or regulation according to the subject. In these passages it covers treatment of jealousy, regulation of sexual activity and improvement of air.

In Burton. Jealousy deserves rectification because Burton treats it as a branch of love melancholy. The source index compresses a regimen topic into Venus rectified. In the discussion of air, rectification includes choosing a place and changing the air through human arrangements.

The places. Jealousy requires treatment comparable to that of passionate love. (p. 591; DJR-144-07.) The source index names the regulation of sexual activity. (unnumbered Table and closing notice; DJR-172-236.) Improvement of air forms part of the proposed cure. (p. 259; DJR-076-20.)

In this edition. "to be rectified alike" → "similar treatment" (DJR-144-07); "Venus rectified" → "Sexual activity properly regulated" (DJR-172-236); "the rectification of Aire" → "improving the air" (DJR-076-20). The equivalents follow the object being corrected. Venus is explained as sexual activity; rectified in that heading does not mean editorial correction or necessarily moral amendment.

See also. Non naturals.

Religion and superstition

Source forms: Religion; superstition[13627]

The word. Religion and superstition are evaluative categories in Burton's argument. His distinction between true and false religion depends on whether the deity and the manner of worship meet his own religious commitments.

In Burton. Burton uses Cicero and Zanchi to define false religion, then applies the distinction polemically. Yet he permits beneficial contemplation and a positive spiritual ecstasy before condemning [13625] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 722 (DJR-169-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-169:E28. DJR-169:E28 explains art, industry and honest and integrates the Latin laxare animum into the modern sentence.

---

[13626] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 591 (DJR-144-07); unnumbered Table and closing notice (DJR-172-236); p. 259 (DJR-076-20). Existing edition notes: DJR-076:E20, DJR-144:E04, DJR-172:E23. DJR-144:E04 explains the love-melancholy classification. DJR-172:E23 identifies the regimen sense; the source index's number remains a retained source reference. DJR-076:E20 places the air discussion within historical humoral and environmental theory.

[13627] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 638–639 (DJR-152-22); p. 656 (DJR-156-10); p. 683 (DJR-161-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-152:E21, DJR-156:E10, DJR-161:E28. DJR-152:E21 locates the Cicero phrase in On the Nature of the Gods 1.117 rather than the printed book 2 and records its altered grammar and context. DJR-156:E10 uses the later Taylor translation only as a contextual Porphyry parallel; Bonaventure and Erasmus remain uncollated. DJR-161:E28 explains the polemical labels in the heading.

their abuse. His later category of religious deficiency shows that he can criticize both excessive devotion and insufficient concern for religion.

The places. False religion is defined through false gods or false worship. (p. 638–639; DJR-152-22.) Contemplation and ecstasy receive qualified approval before abuse is condemned. (p. 656; DJR-156-10.) The heading introduces melancholy arising from religious deficiency. (p. 683; DJR-161-28.)

In this edition. "Religion is twofold, true or false" → "religion is of two kinds, true or false" (DJR-152-22); "vain superstition" → "empty superstition" (DJR-152-22); "a divine melancholy" → "a divine melancholy" (DJR-156-10); "Religious Melancholy in defect" → "Religious Melancholy from Deficiency" (DJR-161-28). The modern text retains the distinctions and the author's polemical judgments. It does not make superstition a neutral synonym for every form of religious practice.

See also. Religious melancholy; Zeal; Enthusiasm; Epicure; Precise; Tables.

Religious melancholy

Source forms: Religious Melancholy[13628]

The word. Religious melancholy names Burton's category of melancholy shaped by religious beliefs, practices, fears or their supposed deficiency. It includes several different conditions rather than a single modern diagnosis.

In Burton. The opening account makes symptoms follow a person's prior religious inclinations and bodily humour. The later division includes both excessive devotion and deficient religion. In the treatment of despair, Burton distinguishes lasting rejection from temporary loss of hope and expressly allows the latter to afflict devout believers.

The places. Religious inclinations are said to shape the humour's effects. (p. 632–633; DJR-151-23.) The heading extends the category to religious deficiency. (p. 683; DJR-161-28.) Temporary despair is distinguished from final despair. (p. 694; DJR-163-40.)

In this edition. "precisely given" → "strictly religious" (DJR-151-23); "Religious Melancholy in defect" → "Religious Melancholy from Deficiency" (DJR-161-28); "final and temporal" → "final and temporary" (DJR-163-40). The heading retains religious melancholy; the contextual phrases clarify strict observance, deficiency and duration. Enthusiasm and reprobation remain historical religious categories with their own explanations.

See also. Melancholy; Religion and superstition.

Remedy by diversion

Source forms: alienate his mind[13629]

The word. To alienate his mind here means to turn the sufferer's attention elsewhere. Remedy by diversion is an explanatory heading for that redirection, not Burton's name for a separate medical school.

In Burton. The recommended response combines counsel, persuasion, removal of distressing circumstances and changes in the person's way of life. It includes ingenious contrivances and both gentle and harsh means. Diversion works alongside efforts to understand and settle the troubling belief.

The places. Alienating the mind redirects attention and seeks reassurance. (p. 294–295; DJR-084-05.)

[13628] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 632–633 (DJR-151-23); p. 683 (DJR-161-28); p. 694 (DJR-163-40). Existing edition notes: DJR-151:E17, DJR-161:E28, DJR-163:E38. DJR-151:E17 identifies the causal account as Burton's and his physicians' historical theory. DJR-161:E28 explains the heading's labels. DJR-163:E38 distinguishes theological reprobation from clinical diagnosis, defines final as lasting to life's end and connects David's words with Psalm 22.

[13629] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 294–295 (DJR-084-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-084:E04. DJR-084:E04 explains artificial invention as a devised contrivance and will not be known as refusal to acknowledge troubles. The statement about immediate cures is Burton's reported claim, not an independently established result.

In this edition. “to alienate his mind” → “turn his mind elsewhere” (DJR-084-05); “security and satisfaction” → “security and reassurance” (DJR-084-05). Turn his mind elsewhere avoids suggesting social estrangement. Reassurance explains the intended satisfaction, while gentle or harsh preserves the breadth of the historical proposal.

See also. Mirth; Intention and remission.

Salvation

Source forms: salvation; safety[13630]

The word. Salvation means deliverance in the religious sense. Safety can carry that meaning too, particularly when the context concerns sinners, divine mercy and the hope of being saved.

In Burton. The first passage makes hope of safety part of a spiritual appeal to mercy. The later question about assurance confronts a sufferer’s certainty of being rejected: Burton turns the demand for proof back upon that self-condemnation.

The places. Safety names the hope of salvation. (p. 708; DJR-166-45.) Assurance of salvation is opposed to unproved certainty of rejection. (p. 713; DJR-167-42.)

In this edition. “hope of safety” → “hope of salvation” (DJR-166-45); “assured of their salvation” → “assured of their salvation” (DJR-167-42). Salvation makes the first passage’s religious sense explicit and remains unchanged in the second. The argument’s consolatory reversal is preserved.

See also. Despair.

Satisfaction

Source forms: satisfactory; satisfaction[13631]

The word. Satisfaction can mean making amends, especially for sin, or answering a doubt so as to provide reassurance. Satisfactory in the charitable example concerns atonement, not merely acceptable quality.

In Burton. Burton mocks a wealthy wrongdoer’s last-minute charitable building as an attempt to make amends. His medical explanation instead gives satisfaction by replacing fears of demonic agency with natural causes. Penitential satisfaction then appears in both an anti-papal catalogue and a prayer that contrasts inadequate repentance with divine mercy.

The places. A satisfactory almshouse is built to make amends. (p. 61; DJR-016-06.) An explanation of natural causes gives reassurance. (p. 205; DJR-063-18.) Acts of satisfaction appear among the attacked religious practices. (p. 673; DJR-159-36.) The attributed prayer says repentance is insufficient to make amends. (p. 708; DJR-166-37.)

In this edition. “build a satisfactory alms-house” → “building an almshouse, school, or bridge to make amends” (DJR-016-06); “give some satisfaction” → “give some reassurance” (DJR-063-18); “satisfactions” → “acts of satisfaction” (DJR-159-36); “suffice for satisfaction” → “suffice to make satisfaction” (DJR-166-37). Make amends and reassurance distinguish the two main senses. Where satisfaction remains, its penitential meaning is explained locally.

See also. Conscience.

[13630] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 708 (DJR-166-45); p. 713 (DJR-167-42). Existing edition notes: DJR-166:E40, DJR-167:E41. DJR-166:E40 explains provoked as moved, without anger, and leaves the bare Isidor attribution provisional. DJR-167:E41 defines elect and retains the uncertainty about the question attributed to Solomon.

[13631] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 61 (DJR-016-06); p. 205 (DJR-063-18); p. 673 (DJR-159-36); p. 708 (DJR-166-37). Existing edition notes: DJR-016:E03, DJR-063:E17, DJR-159:E36, DJR-166:E32. DJR-016:E03 explains the satirical benefactor and the broader sense of hospital. DJR-063:E17 records the expanded syntax of hear or see. DJR-159:E36 identifies the hostile catalogue; DJR-166:E32 assigns the prayer’s first person to the speaker attributed to Anselm, whose exact text remains uncollated.

Satyriasis and priapism

Source forms: Satyriasis; Priapismus[13632]

The word. Satyriasis is a historical term for excessive male sexual desire; priapism names a persistent erection. Burton's pairing does not make the two conditions equivalent.

In Burton. The proposed ways of calming sexual passion lead Burton to chapters bearing these medical names. In his attack on compulsory celibacy, he includes them in a much broader catalogue of illness, vice and crime. Their medical specificity should remain visible even within that polemical accumulation.

The places. The two names identify medical chapters cited in the discussion of sexual passion. (p. 547; DJR-134-31.) Both conditions enter the catalogue attributed to rash vows and celibate life. (p. 581; DJR-142-11.)

In this edition. "de Satyriasi & Priapismo" → "On Satyriasis and Priapism" (DJR-134-31); "satyriasis, priapismus" → "satyriasis, priapism" (DJR-142-11). The edition retains the medical names and explains them in notes. It preserves Burton's causal assertion as part of his historical argument.

See also. Venery.

Schoolmen

Source forms: Schoolmen; Peripateticks; school divinity[13633]

The word. Schoolmen are scholastic theologians and philosophers; school divinity is scholastic theology. Peripatetics are followers of Aristotle, a related intellectual designation rather than an exact synonym for all schoolmen.

In Burton. In the discussion of spirits, even the sharpest learned minds are said to fail before the mysteries. The next passage reports disagreement about Aristotle and spirits. Elsewhere school divinity supplies examples of inquiry that Burton condemns as perplexing and practically fruitless.

The places. Schoolmen appear among learned thinkers whose understanding is inadequate. (p. 39; DJR-028-23.) Peripatetics enter a disputed account of belief in spirits. (p. 39; DJR-028-24.) School divinity names the theology attacked for fruitless questions. (p. 166–167; DJR-055-18.)

In this edition. "Schoolmen" → "scholastics" (DJR-028-23); "Peripateticks" → "Peripatetics" (DJR-028-24); "school divinity" → "scholastic theology" (DJR-055-18). Scholastic identifies the intellectual tradition rather than a school occupation. The account of Aristotelian belief retains its competing authorities.

See also. Divine; Cento; Neoterics.

Science

Source forms: science; sciences; theorick[13634]

[13632] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 547 (DJR-134-31); p. 581 (DJR-142-11). Existing edition notes: DJR-134:E20, DJR-142:E08. DJR-134:E20 retains Hanea and leaves its textual history and the Aelian passage unresolved. DJR-142:E08 explains mastupration and distinguishes the mixture of medical categories and moral accusations from present medical explanation.

[13633] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 39 (DJR-028-23); p. 39 (DJR-028-24); p. 166–167 (DJR-055-18). Existing edition notes: DJR-028:E14, DJR-028:E15, DJR-055:E17. DJR-028:E14 explains the Thomists and the typifying plurals Cardans and Scaligers. DJR-028:E15 identifies Acts 23:8 and the dispute over separate intelligences and angels. DJR-055:E17 places the attack within Burton's satire of unprofitable inquiry.

[13634] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 3 (DJR-002-01); p. 7 (DJR-004-08); p. 16 (DJR-006-22). Existing edition notes: DJR-002:E01, DJR-002:E02, DJR-004:E07, DJR-006:E21. DJR-002:E01–E02 retain Burton's self-deprecating paradox and the limits of the Montaigne and Lipsius comparisons. DJR-004:E07 explains the patronage context. DJR-006:E21 identifies the horoscope claim as Burton's explanation of inclination rather than professional training.

The word. Science can mean a branch of knowledge or learning, without the modern restriction to experimental or natural science. Theorick is theory, here distinguished from medical practice.

In Burton. Burton's account of his wide reading refuses confinement to a single science. The complaint about publishing similarly treats sciences as learned disciplines that poor writing debases. His account of medical study then claims theoretical acquaintance while expressly denying an intention to practise.

The places. One science is one branch of learning among many. (p. 3; DJR-002-01.) Noble sciences are learned fields harmed by unskilled writing. (p. 7; DJR-004-08.) Theorick names study of medicine apart from practice. (p. 16; DJR-006-22.)

In this edition. "one science" → "one branch of learning" (DJR-002-01); "noble sciences" → "noble fields of knowledge" (DJR-004-08); "the theorick of physick" → "medical theory" (DJR-006-22). Learning and knowledge retain the breadth of the first two uses. Medical theory preserves the narrower theory/practice contrast without implying a medical qualification.

See also. Cento; Art.

Scruple

Source forms: scrupulous conscience; scrupulous[13635]

The word. A scruple is a doubt or hesitation about right conduct. Scrupulous conscience in these passages means excessive, troubling moral doubt, whereas having a scruple can simply mean taking moral obligation seriously.

In Burton. The historical medical account relates a tortured conscience to melancholy constitution. Burton describes sufferers who magnify small offences or accuse themselves without adequate cause. The later accusation of never making conscience of wrongdoing uses the underlying moral concern in a different, ordinary sense.

The places. Scrupulous conscience is linked to melancholy constitution. (p. 695; DJR-164-09.) The sufferer magnifies offences and distrusts mercy. (p. 699; DJR-164-48.) Making conscience means considering conduct as morally binding. (p. 711; DJR-167-18.)

In this edition. "Conscientia scrupulosa" → "A scrupulous conscience" (DJR-164-09); "This scrupulous conscience" → "this scrupulous conscience" (DJR-164-48); "mad'st any conscience" → "had any scruple" (DJR-167-18). Scrupulous is retained with explanation of its distressing excess. Scruple in the final example translates a different source expression and does not itself imply an illness.

See also. Despair; Conscience; Curiosity.

Secure

Source forms: securely; secure; security[13636]

The word. Secure can mean safe, confidently untroubled, or heedlessly complacent; as a verb it can mean protect. Security can be welcome freedom from anxiety or an unwarranted sense of spiritual safety.

[13635] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 695 (DJR-164-09); p. 699 (DJR-164-48); p. 711 (DJR-167-18). Existing edition notes: DJR-164:E08, DJR-164:E46, DJR-167:E18. DJR-164:E08 identifies Navarrus as Azpilcueta but leaves the exact casuistic passage uncollated. DJR-164:E46 keeps actual misconduct distinct from unfounded accusation. DJR-167:E18 treats the accumulated offences as rhetoric, not evidence about a particular person.

[13636] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 40 (DJR-011-24); p. 178 (DJR-057-51); p. 212 (DJR-065-06); p. 223 (DJR-068-17); p. 335 (DJR-092-53); p. 638 (DJR-152-21); p. 698 (DJR-164-34); p. 721 (DJR-169-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-011:E22, DJR-057:E44, DJR-065:E05, DJR-068:E15, DJR-092:E39, DJR-152:E20, DJR-164:E32, DJR-169:E09. DJR-011:E22 leaves the Chinese saying and Scaliger source unresolved. DJR-057:E44 identifies the biblical and Ausonian echoes. DJR-065:E05 preserves Burton's expansion of Hippocrates and the varices/fluid discrepancy. DJR-068:E15 does not identify a surviving Solomonic book. DJR-092:E39 records the Pseudo-Seneca parallel and unlocated Jerome phrase. DJR-152:E20 explains the religious labels; DJR-164:E32 leaves the Bernard sermon unverified; DJR-169:E09 retains the uncertainty about the Musa treatise.

In Burton. The satire attacks confident ridicule and the counsel against complacency urges vigilance. A medical prognosis instead uses secure comparatively for a less dangerous condition. The Solomonic-book story condemns confidence in remedies that displaces religious duty, while consolation for lost wealth praises freedom from care. In religious controversy and counsel, security again means complacency. Betony is finally said to secure, or protect, places.

The places. Securely describes uncritical confidence in ridiculing others. (p. 40; DJR-011-24.) Be not secure warns against complacency. (p. 178; DJR-057-51.) Most secure describes a comparatively safe form of illness. (p. 212; DJR-065-06.) Trust in remedies is said to make people complacent. (p. 223; DJR-068-17.) Security names freedom from anxiety after loss. (p. 335; DJR-092-53.) Secure is a polemical label for spiritual complacency. (p. 638; DJR-152-21.) Mercy without judgement is said to produce complacency. (p. 698; DJR-164-34.) Secure is the protective action attributed to betony. (p. 721; DJR-169-09.)

In this edition. "securely deride" → "confidently ridicule" (DJR-011-24); "Be not secure" → "Do not be complacent" (DJR-057-51); "most secure" → "the safest" (DJR-065-06); "made the people secure" → "made the people complacent" (DJR-068-17); "Security succeeds" → "Freedom from anxiety follows" (DJR-092-53); "worldly, secure" → "worldly, complacent" (DJR-152-21); "the other security" → "the other complacency" (DJR-164-34); "did secure such places" → "protecting the places" (DJR-169-09). Context determines whether freedom from fear is praised, blamed or merely described. No single equivalent replaces all eight uses.

See also. Faith and assurance; Desperate; Plausible.

Seed

Source forms: spermatical; Seed-veins; seed[13637]

The word. Seed can mean semen or generative material. Spermatical parts are parts said to derive from seed; seed-veins are seminal vessels in the older anatomical vocabulary.

In Burton. The division of uniform bodily parts distinguishes those supposedly derived from seed from fleshy parts. The account of melancholy then attributes illness to retained or altered reproductive matter, including semen and menstrual blood. Both belong to historical theories of bodily formation and nourishment.

The places. Spermatical names one class of uniform bodily parts. (p. 15; DJR-023-38.) Seed-veins and retained seed enter the proposed explanation of melancholy. (p. 175; DJR-057-11.)

In this edition. "Spermatical" → "derive from seed" (DJR-023-38); "Seed-veins" → "seminal vessels" (DJR-057-11); "seed too long detained" → "semen retained too long" (DJR-057-11). The anatomical phrase is modernized to seminal vessels; semen clarifies seed in the causal claim. Melancholy in the same sentence can mean the supposed morbid humour.

See also. Maternal impressions; Venery.

Self love

Source forms: Philautia[13638]

The word. Philautia means self-love. In this subsection it belongs to the cluster of pride, vainglory and excessive delight in praise rather than a neutral recommendation of care for oneself.

[13637] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 15 (DJR-023-38); p. 175 (DJR-057-11). Existing edition notes: DJR-023:E26, DJR-057:E09. DJR-023:E26 explains the uniform/non-uniform distinction in Aristotle, History of Animals 1.1. DJR-057:E09 identifies the terminology and the historical theory of retained matter.

[13638] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 121 (DJR-045-11); p. 124 (DJR-045-46). Existing edition notes: DJR-045:E38. DJR-045:E38 locates the Augustine comparison in Confessions 10.38.63 and notes Burton's insertion of homo to generalize the wording. Diogenes supplies the example of inward boasting.

In Burton. The heading lists self-love among possible causes of melancholy. The later example exposes the paradox of being proud of one's humility: apparent contempt for public praise can become inward self-congratulation.

The places. Philautia introduces the subsection on self-love and praise. (p. 121; DJR-045-11.) Pride in humility illustrates self-regard surviving its apparent rejection. (p. 124; DJR-045-46.)

In this edition. "Philautia, or Self-love" → "Self-love" (DJR-045-11); "self-conceit of sanctity" → "a conceit of holiness" (DJR-045-46). Self-love states the Greek term's meaning directly. The related example explains the subsection's moral concern without repeating philautia.

See also. Love.

Sensible

Source forms: sensibles; sensitive; sensible soul; sensible[13639]

The word. Sensible can mean capable of sensation, sensitive to injury, or an object perceived by a sense. Sensitive in the faculty theory denotes the capacity for sensation, not merely emotional delicacy.

In Burton. Sensibles contrasts beings with senses against plants. The classification of souls then makes the sensitive faculty include the vegetative, while the rational includes both. Elsewhere melancholy people are especially sensible to humiliation. In the Latin axiom, sensible is the object whose overwhelming strength harms the faculty of sense.

The places. Sensibles are beings capable of sensation. (p. 46; DJR-012-38.) Sensitive names one of the soul's principal faculties. (p. 20; DJR-024-24.) Sensible soul appears as the heading for that faculty. (p. 21; DJR-025-01.) Sensible describes susceptibility to distressing injury. (p. 150; DJR-051-41.) Sensible names an object of sense in the philosophical maxim. (p. 635; DJR-151-42.)

In this edition. "sensibles" → "creatures with senses" (DJR-012-38); "Sensitive" → "sensitive" (DJR-024-24); "sensible Soul" → "sensitive soul" (DJR-025-01); "most sensible" → "most sensitive" (DJR-051-41); "Sensible forte" → "An overpowering object of sense" (DJR-151-42). The equivalents separate sensory capacity, personal susceptibility and a sensory object. None of these uses means reasonable in the common modern sense.

See also. Animal and vegetal; Common sense; Species in perception.

Shame

Source forms: subrusticus pudor; rusticus pudor; shamefac'd[13640]

The word. Pudor can mean shame or bashfulness. Rusticus pudor and subrusticus pudor describe socially awkward shyness; shamefaced in the selected passage means shy rather than necessarily guilty.

In Burton. Awkward shyness appears among the feelings that seize a melancholic person. The later treatment connects blushing with company, social superiors and fear of observation. In the account of behaviour, bashfulness prevents people from putting themselves forward for offices or honours.

The places. Subrusticus pudor forms part of the sudden onset of distress. (p. 89; DJR-038-11.) Rusticus pudor introduces the discussion of bashfulness and blushing. (p. 396; DJR-106-01.) Shamefaced describes reluctance to speak or accept advancement. (p. 188; DJR-059-39.)

[13639] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 46 (DJR-012-38); p. 20 (DJR-024-24); p. 21 (DJR-025-01); p. 150 (DJR-051-41); p. 635 (DJR-151-42). Existing edition notes: DJR-012:E27, DJR-024:E22, DJR-051:E36, DJR-151:E32. DJR-012:E27 explains the astrological and acquired-melancholy context. DJR-024:E22 locates the geometrical comparison in Aristotle, On the Soul 2.3, and leaves Flavius unidentified. DJR-051:E36 records the repaired parenthesis. DJR-151:E32 distinguishes the general sensory maxim from Burton's application to sight and explains much less in the elliptical Latin.

[13640] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 89 (DJR-038-11); p. 396 (DJR-106-01); p. 188 (DJR-059-39). Existing edition notes: DJR-038:E05, DJR-059:E36, DJR-106:E01. DJR-038:E05 identifies Virgil's wounded-deer image. DJR-106:E01 retains flect as provisionally flushed, distinguishes printed Statius from Stasinus in Plato, and treats Luís as a possible, unproved intermediary. DJR-059:E36 leaves the particular refusals by Peter of Blois and Urswick untraced.

In this edition. “subrusticus pudor” → “awkward shyness” (DJR-038-11); “Rusticus pudor” → “Rustic shyness” (DJR-106-01); “very shamefac’d” → “very shy” (DJR-059-39). Shyness and bashfulness preserve the social difficulty without implying wrongdoing. The Latin phrase in the blushing discussion is translated before Burton’s own list of symptoms.

See also. Magnanimity and pusillanimity; Fear; Apprehension.

Silly

Source forms: silly[13641]

The word. Silly can mean simple or unlearned, weak or helpless, unsuspecting, or pitiable. The word’s precise force must be taken from the person and situation described.

In Burton. The surgeon is unlearned in contrast to a theoretically trained physician. The vulnerable human creature is helpless before changing fortune. Travellers targeted by procurers are unsuspecting, while the love-stricken shepherd and the soul terrified by punishment are pitiable. Foolishness would flatten these differences.

The places. The silly surgeon is contrasted with the learned physician. (p. 96; DJR-039-29.) Silly describes human weakness and vulnerability. (p. 178; DJR-057-48.) The Plautus verses introduce the targeting of a newly arrived traveller. (p. 499; DJR-125-64.) The immediately following prose calls the travellers silly. (p. 499; DJR-125-65.) The Latin verses describe the shepherd’s neglect and grief. (p. 516; DJR-128-75.) Burton’s following English verse calls the shepherd silly. (p. 516; DJR-128-76.) A sinful silly soul is tormented by thoughts of eternal punishment. (p. 697; DJR-164-25.)

In this edition. “a silly Chyrurgian” → “a simple surgeon” (DJR-039-29); “weak and silly” → “weak and helpless” (DJR-057-48); “silly travellers” → “unsuspecting travellers” (DJR-125-65); “The silly shepherd” → “The poor shepherd” (DJR-128-76); “a sinfull silly soul” → “a poor sinful soul” (DJR-164-25). The renderings distinguish lack of learning, vulnerability, inexperience and pitiableness. The traveller and shepherd examples include the adjoining prose or English verse where silly actually occurs, alongside the selected Latin verse anchors.

See also. Idiot; Clown; Stupid; Dotage.

Simple

Source forms: simple[13642]

The word. Simple can mean unqualified or outright, or unmixed in composition. Neither selected use means merely easy to understand.

In Burton. In the religious controversy, not simple atheists qualifies the assertion that certain ancient writers denied divinity. In the humoral explanation of intellectual gifts, simple melancholy means unmixed black bile, distinguished from the proposed beneficial mixture with other humours.

The places. Simple atheists means atheists without qualification. (p. 689; DJR-162-40.) Simple names the unmixed humour in the discussion of intellectual ability. (p. 207; DJR-064-05.)

[13641] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 96 (DJR-039-29); p. 178 (DJR-057-48); p. 499 (DJR-125-64); p. 499 (DJR-125-65); p. 516 (DJR-128-75); p. 516 (DJR-128-76); p. 697 (DJR-164-25). Existing edition notes: DJR-039:E21, DJR-057:E41, DJR-125:E45, DJR-125:E46, DJR-128:E49, DJR-164:E24. DJR-039:E21 explains the professional distinction. DJR-057:E41 clarifies the moral address. DJR-125:E45–E46 identify the Plautus context and qualify Maserius’s uncollated, exaggerated claims. DJR-128:E49 distinguishes Ovid’s account of Polyphemus’s appearance from Burton’s. DJR-164:E24 explains the punitive rhetoric. The two adjoining passages are existing edited text, added as explicit lexicon evidence without changing the book.

[13642] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 689 (DJR-162-40); p. 207 (DJR-064-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-064:E05, DJR-162:E40. DJR-162:E40 qualifies Burton’s overstatement about Epicurus with Lucretius 1.44–49 and explains scholar as follower. DJR-064:E05 identifies Problems 30.1 in the Aristotelian collection and preserves the body/margin difference in the humoral proportions; the other named medical sources remain uncollated.

In this edition. “not simple Atheists” → “not outright atheists” (DJR-162-40); “not of the simple” → “not the unmixed humour” (DJR-064-05). Outright and unmixed make the logical and material senses distinct. The contextual account does not turn Burton’s religious label or physiological theory into an independent conclusion.

See also. Matter; Absolute.

Simples

Source forms: simples; in substance[13643]

The word. Simples are single medicinal substances, contrasted with compound preparations. Taking a substance in substance means taking the material itself rather than an extract or other prepared form.

In Burton. The treatment synopsis places alterative simples within pharmaceutical medicine. The related report of hellebore in substance concerns plant material taken directly. The broader synopsis locates pharmaceutical treatment beside dietetic and surgical treatment; it supplies the framework without repeating simples.

The places. Simples are classified as alterative substances in the treatment synopsis. (scan p. 324; DJR-067-13.) In substance describes the form of hellebore in the reported tolerance example. (p. 77; DJR-035-54.) The broader synopsis locates pharmaceutical treatment within medicine. (scan p. 323; DJR-067-04.)

In this edition. “Simples altering melancholy” → “Simple substances that alter melancholy” (DJR-067-13); “Hellebor in substance” → “hellebore in its solid form” (DJR-035-54); “Pharmaceuticall” → “Pharmaceutical treatment” (DJR-067-04). Simple substances explains the noun, while solid form identifies the material in the anecdote. The navigational wording in the synopsis follows the edition’s settled treatment structure.

See also. Physick.

Simulacra

Source forms: simulachra[13644]

The word. Simulacra are images or likenesses. In the Lucretian setting the word also carries the technical sense of image-films acting on perception.

In Burton. The absent beloved remains present through images and a remembered name. Burton incorporates the verses into his catalogue of persistent remembrance, where the word joins sensory representation to continuing desire.

The places. Images remain at hand when the beloved is absent. (p. 528; DJR-130-48.)

In this edition. “simulachra” → “images” (DJR-130-48). Images is readable in the immediate love context; the note retains the term’s philosophical background. The article heading normalizes the Latin spelling while the source form records simulachra.

See also. Imagination.

Sodomy

Source forms: Sodomy; buggery; Sodomites[13645]

[13643] Editor. Edited source passages: scan p. 324 (DJR-067-13); p. 77 (DJR-035-54); scan p. 323 (DJR-067-04). Existing edition notes: DJR-035:E36, DJR-067:E04. DJR-067:E04 distinguishes alteration from purging in historical humoral medicine. DJR-035:E36 explains in substance and retains the partly blemished three days; doses are not converted to modern units. The synopsis locators are scan pages, not printed page numbers.

[13644] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 528 (DJR-130-48). Existing edition notes: DJR-130:E38. DJR-130:E38 identifies Lucretius, De rerum natura, book 4, and explains both the general and technical senses.

The word. Sodomy and buggery are overlapping historical terms for condemned sexual acts. Their range does not correspond neatly to a single modern act or sexual orientation; sodomites is likewise an accusatory label in these passages.

In Burton. Burton places the terms in catalogues combining myth, alleged conduct and broad accusations against peoples. A further catalogue uses sodomites in a Christian polemic against the morality of pagan gods. The labels reveal the structure and hostility of his argument rather than supplying neutral descriptions of identities.

The places. Sodomy appears amid an extended catalogue of alleged conduct and fabulous births. (p. 441; DJR-114-25.) Sodomy and buggery occur together in a list of condemned acts. (p. 450; DJR-116-33.) Sodomites forms part of the attack on the gods' supposed unworthiness. (p. 666; DJR-158-12.)

In this edition. "peccatum Sodomiæ" → "the sin of sodomy" (DJR-114-25); "sodomy, buggery" → "sodomy, buggery" (DJR-116-33); "incestious Sodomites" → "incestuous sodomites" (DJR-158-12). The historical labels remain visible with their condemnatory force and contextual explanation. Their overlap is not silently replaced by a modern taxonomy.

See also. Quean and slut.

Solitude

Source forms: solitariness; solitudo[13646]

The word. Solitude and solitariness mean being alone. Burton distinguishes excessive solitude, which may be forced or voluntary, from forms of solitary contemplation he considers beneficial.

In Burton. The cause chapter makes too much solitude a close companion of idleness and also a symptom. It then explicitly allows profitable meditation and solitude rightly used. The danger therefore depends upon excess, circumstances and use rather than isolation alone.

The places. Excessive solitude is divided into imposed and voluntary kinds. (p. 87; DJR-038-01.) Profitable solitude receives qualified praise. (p. 89; DJR-038-12.)

In this edition. "nimia solitudo" → "excessive solitude" (DJR-038-01); "too much solitariness" → "too much being alone" (DJR-038-01); "kinde of solitariness" → "kind of solitude" (DJR-038-12). The modern text keeps both the warning and the concession. Excessive is essential to the first definition, and used rightly limits the second.

See also. Idleness; Leisure; Anchorite; Mortification; Recreate.

Sorrow

Source forms: sorrow[13647]

The word. Sorrow is the emotion directed toward a present evil in this classification. Fear, by contrast, concerns an evil still to come.

In Burton. Burton gives sorrow effects on both soul and body: it contracts the heart, torments the soul and obstructs bodily operations. His emotional classification thus also provides a historical physiological explanation for melancholy.

The places. Sorrow concerns present evil and is said to contract the heart. (p. 25; DJR-025-28.)

[13645] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 441 (DJR-114-25); p. 450 (DJR-116-33); p. 666 (DJR-158-12). Existing edition notes: DJR-114:E20, DJR-116:E29, DJR-158:E12. DJR-114:E20 distinguishes fabulous births from biological claims. DJR-116:E29 leaves Giovio's narrative uncollated. DJR-158:E12 identifies the account as Burton's polemical judgment about myth.

[13646] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 87 (DJR-038-01); p. 89 (DJR-038-12). Existing edition notes: DJR-038:E06. DJR-038:E06 compares Jerome's Letters 22.7 and 14.10, including temptation and the desert-as-prison image. Those parallels do not establish the whole marginal paraphrase or explain Burton's printed epistle 72, which remains retained.

[13647] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 25 (DJR-025-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-025:E20. DJR-025:E20 preserves Burton's criticism of the Stoics and his statement that these affections are natural and not to be resisted, alongside his earlier claim that reason should govern appetite. The tension is not silently removed.

In this edition. “as sorrow, which contracts the Heart” → “as sorrow does: it contracts the heart” (DJR-025-28); “macerates the Soule” → “torments the soul” (DJR-025-28). Sorrow remains unchanged, while torments clarifies macerates. The temporal distinction from fear and the claimed bodily consequences remain part of the account.

See also. Passion; Heart and cordolium; Tædium vitae; Despair; Macerate; Painful.

Soul

Source forms: Soul[13648]

The word. Soul can name the principle of life, perception and understanding, or life itself. Latin anima can also mean breath, allowing wordplay that requires different English equivalents within one passage.

In Burton. The philosophical definition unites three faculties in one rational soul that acts through organs while remaining incorporeal. The marriage satire uses soul for a husband’s life. A later Latin joke about wives’ breath is followed by Burton’s moralizing gloss about deformed souls.

The places. The rational soul contains the other faculties and works through bodily organs. (p. 27; DJR-026-22.) Ransoming the husband’s soul means saving his life. (p. 606; DJR-146-53.) Anima supports a breath/soul play between the Latin and Burton’s gloss. (p. 629; DJR-150-55.)

In this edition. “Reasonable Soul” → “rational soul” (DJR-026-22); “whose soul they would not ransome” → “they would not ransom his life” (DJR-146-53); “animæ uxorum pessime olent” → “Wives’ breaths smell very foul” (DJR-150-55); “deformed souls” → “ugly souls” (DJR-150-55). The philosophical sense remains soul; life and breaths follow the local meanings. Translating the Latin joke separately from Burton’s gloss preserves their difference.

See also. Animal and vegetal; Actuality; Matter; Metempsychosis; Ex traduce; Microcosm.

Species in perception

Source forms: species; species of objects; Species[13649]

The word. Species in the theory of perception are forms, impressions or representations through which objects are apprehended. The word does not here classify biological kinds.

In Burton. An imagined instrument multiplies sensory impressions, while melancholy imagination retains and enlarges mental images. Descriptions of an unseen beloved likewise convey images through language. The account of the sensitive soul compares their reception and retention with a seal’s impression in wax.

The places. The imagined instrument amplifies sensory impressions. (p. 39; DJR-011-16.) Imagination retains and magnifies the representations of objects. (p. 93; DJR-039-08.) A description conveys images of love without direct sight. (p. 452; DJR-117-07.) Sensory forms are received and retained like a seal in wax. (p. 21–22; DJR-025-03.)

In this edition. “multiply species” → “amplified impressions” (DJR-011-16); “species of objects” → “mental images of objects” (DJR-039-08); “species of love” → “images of love” (DJR-117-07); “Species of sensible things” → “sensory forms of things” (DJR-025-03). Impressions, mental images and sensory forms preserve the representational sense while following each passage’s emphasis. The related physical and psychological models remain historical explanations.

[13648] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 27 (DJR-026-22); p. 606 (DJR-146-53); p. 629 (DJR-150-55). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E19, DJR-146:E32, DJR-150:E44. DJR-026:E19 explains actuality and choice and retains the apparent organ/independence tension. DJR-146:E32 leaves the Platina quotation uncollated. DJR-150:E44 identifies the Herodotus story but leaves the precise Plautus locus unresolved.

[13649] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 39 (DJR-011-16); p. 93 (DJR-039-08); p. 452 (DJR-117-07); p. 21–22 (DJR-025-03). Existing edition notes: DJR-011:E14, DJR-025:E02, DJR-039:E05, DJR-117:E06. DJR-011:E14 explains the optical and listening instruments and the reading sphere for printed spear; the Martianus passage is uncollated. DJR-039:E05 defines meditation broadly. DJR-117:E06 leaves the Philostratus letter unidentified. DJR-025:E02 explains the wax-and-seal comparison.

See also. Imagination; Catoptrics and perspectives; Sensible.

Spirits

Source forms: animal spirits; spirits[13650]

The word. Animal spirits are subtle bodily agents thought to carry sensation and movement. Spirits can also express vitality or courage, as in martial spirit; animal does not mean belonging to nonhuman animals here.

In Burton. The discussion of exercise and digestion makes corrupted bodily material disrupt the animal spirits. The polemic against excessive study connects bodily weakness, dulled spirits and reduced military courage. The physiological and figurative senses overlap without being identical.

The places. Animal spirits are disturbed in the historical account of ill-timed exercise. (p. 84–85; DJR-037-17.) Dulled spirits and martial spirits connect study with lost vigour and courage. (p. 127; DJR-046-18.)

In this edition. "animal spirits" → "animal spirits" (DJR-037-17); "dulls the spirits" → "dulls their spirits" (DJR-046-18); "martiall spirits" → "martial spirit" (DJR-046-18). The technical phrase remains with explanation. The later military expression becomes singular martial spirit, making the collective courage sense natural in modern English.

See also. Hypochondria.

Spleen

Source forms: Splenitick; Splenatick[13651]

The word. Splenitic or splenatic means associated with the spleen or suffering from a disorder attributed to it. In these passages the adjective is anatomical and medical, rather than simply a description of ill temper.

In Burton. Laurentius's classification names a form of melancholy after the spleen, alongside liver and mesentery. The treatment passage then discusses apples in disorders of that organ and in the form of melancholy under consideration, with their supposed humoral qualities to be corrected.

The places. Splenitic melancholy is one of the forms named after an organ. (p. 177; DJR-057-39.) Splenatic describes a spleen disorder in the discussion of apples. (p. 399; DJR-106-27.)

In this edition. "Splenitick" → "splenic" (DJR-057-39); "in Splenatick" → "in disorders of the spleen" (DJR-106-27). Splenic gives the corresponding adjective; disorders of the spleen makes the compressed second construction explicit. These are historical disease classifications.

See also. Hypochondria.

Stibium

Source forms: stibium[13652]

[13650] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 84–85 (DJR-037-17); p. 127 (DJR-046-18). Existing edition notes: DJR-037:E11, DJR-046:E16. DJR-037:E11 explains crudities and leaves Bayerus and Veni mecum unresolved. DJR-046:E16 records the contextual emendation by no means for printed by all means, supported by the margin; the source column and Burton's sweeping claim remain intact.

[13651] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 177 (DJR-057-39); p. 399 (DJR-106-27). Existing edition notes: DJR-057:E33, DJR-106:E24. DJR-057:E33 preserves the different orders of the organ list and the names derived from it. DJR-106:E24 identifies lamb's wool as the apple preparation here but supplies no recipe; corrected concerns supposedly undesirable qualities.

[13652] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 377 (DJR-102-01). Existing edition notes: DJR-102:E01. DJR-102:E01 explains chemical physicians, falling sickness and the upper-abdominal sense of hypochondriacal. The historical measures in the surrounding account remain unconverted.

The word. Stibium is the name paired with antimony in Burton's discussion of chemical medicines. The passage distinguishes administering the material itself from an infusion.

In Burton. Burton introduces a substance highly praised by chemical physicians and frequently prescribed for melancholy. Mattioli's claim and examples supply the reported justification. The vocabulary belongs to that therapeutic controversy and its historical account of black bile.

The places. Antimony or stibium is introduced as a remedy praised by chemical physicians. (p. 377; DJR-102-01.)

In this edition. "Antimony or Stibium" → "Antimony, or stibium" (DJR-102-01); "in substance or infusion" → "as the substance itself or as an infusion" (DJR-102-01). The material's two names remain together. The modern text explicitly attributes the therapeutic claims to Mattioli rather than adopting them.

See also. Receipt.

Still

Source forms: still; still running[13653]

The word. Still can mean continually or always, but it can also mean silent. The latter sense survives in still rhetoric, eloquence that works without speech.

In Burton. The imagined frogs croak continually; rivers run continuously even where navigation is obstructed; the lover's heart is always with the beloved. Beauty's still rhetoric instead persuades silently. Temporal persistence and absence of sound must remain distinct.

The places. Still crying describes continual imagined croaking. (p. 6; DJR-003-09.) Still running describes the rivers' continued flow. (p. 52; DJR-014-05.) Still rhetoric is persuasion without speech. (p. 454–455; DJR-117-30.) The lover's heart is always with the beloved. (p. 529; DJR-131-08.)

In this edition. "still crying" → "continually crying" (DJR-003-09); "still running rivers" → "ever-flowing rivers" (DJR-014-05); "still rhetorick" → "silent rhetoric" (DJR-117-30); "his heart is still with her" → "his heart is always with her" (DJR-131-08). Continually, ever-flowing and always express duration; silent identifies the separate sense. Obstructed rivers do not become motionless merely because Burton criticizes their lost usefulness for transport.

See also. Waking; Present; Happily.

Strangury

Source forms: strangury[13654]

The word. Strangury means difficult and painful passage of urine. It is a historical disease term whose range should not be assumed identical to one present diagnostic category.

In Burton. Burton includes strangury in a catalogue of conditions physicians allegedly cannot cure. The term identifies the complaint, while the categorical claim about incurability belongs to his debate over medical skill.

The places. Strangury appears among the conditions claimed to resist cure. (p. 364; DJR-099-17.)

In this edition. "Strangury" → "strangury" (DJR-099-17). The historical name is retained and explained in the note. The edition does not turn the period's assertion of incurability into a current medical conclusion.

[13653] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 6 (DJR-003-09); p. 52 (DJR-014-05); p. 454–455 (DJR-117-30); p. 529 (DJR-131-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-003:E13, DJR-014:E04, DJR-117:E27, DJR-131:E04. DJR-003:E13 preserves the croaking sequence. DJR-014:E04 explains the navigation complaint and marginal anchor. DJR-117:E27 leaves the exact attribution chain unresolved; DJR-131:E04 retains the irregular marginal order and the uncertainty about Philostratus's letters.

[13654] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 364 (DJR-099-17). Existing edition notes: DJR-099:E16. DJR-099:E16 distinguishes strangury from stone and apoplexy and qualifies the correspondence of historical terms with present diagnoses.

See also. Issue; Excrements.

Stupid

Source forms: stupified; stupid; stupidity[13655]

The word. Stupid, stupified and stupidity can describe being stunned, numbed or mentally insensible. They need not make a judgment about a person's intelligence.

In Burton. Niobe's grief and the women's response to military disaster produce stupefaction. In the comic scene before the magistrate, stupidity names the company's bewildered insensibility. The symptom passage uses stupid for an episodic state in which distressed people will not speak or answer.

The places. Stupified names the numbing force of Niobe's grief. (p. 32; DJR-009-30.) Stupid describes women stunned by the disaster at Cannae. (p. 164; DJR-054-44.) Stupidity names the company's stupefaction before the magistrate. (p. 171; DJR-056-30.) Stupid describes a temporary or recurrent state of insensibility. (p. 203; DJR-063-05.)

In this edition. "quite stupified" → "utterly numb" (DJR-009-30); "stupid women" → "stupefied women" (DJR-054-44); "their stupidity" → "their stupefaction" (DJR-056-30); "stupid for the time" → "insensible for the time" (DJR-063-05). The equivalents preserve states of shock or impaired responsiveness rather than substituting the modern insult. Their different causes and narrative uses remain visible.

See also. Silly; Crased.

Suit

Source forms: suiters; sute[13656]

The word. A suit can be a legal action or a petition for favour or office. Suiters in the legal catalogue are litigants, not people seeking marriage.

In Burton. Burton's attack on litigation condemns the expense, bitterness and delay of pursuing cases. The account of ambition instead describes the exhausting performance of deference required when seeking a favour or position. Both involve pursuit, but the institutions and objects differ.

The places. Suiters are parties pursuing legal cases. (p. 51; DJR-013-41.) A sute is a petition pursued through attendance and ingratiation. (p. 113; DJR-043-23.)

In this edition. "ordinary suiters" → "ordinary litigants" (DJR-013-41); "about a sute" → "pursuing a petition" (DJR-043-23). Litigants and petition distinguish the contexts. The modern text retains Burton's divided attribution of blame in the legal complaint.

See also. Dowry and jointure.

Supererogation

Source forms: supererogate[13657]

The word. To supererogate is to perform good works beyond what duty requires. Supererogation supplies the noun for that claimed surplus of merit.

[13655] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 32 (DJR-009-30); p. 164 (DJR-054-44); p. 171 (DJR-056-30); p. 203 (DJR-063-05). Existing edition notes: DJR-009:E31, DJR-054:E36, DJR-056:E24, DJR-063:E05. DJR-009:E31 locates Niobe in Ovid and preserves the difference between the Scaliger Latin and Burton's expansion. DJR-054:E36 explains the shift to collective disaster. DJR-056:E24 keeps the Latin and English speeches separate. DJR-063:E05 treats supernatural fears as reported experiences and leaves Rodericus's three-degree scheme uncollated.

[13656] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 51 (DJR-013-41); p. 113 (DJR-043-23). Existing edition notes: DJR-013:E20, DJR-043:E20. DJR-013:E20 explains termers and property title. DJR-043:E20 identifies the Cineas comparison in Plutarch's Pyrrhus 14 and records the backward-pointing Cyprian margin.

[13657] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 29 (DJR-009-14). Existing edition notes: DJR-009:E15. DJR-009:E15 explains the Machiavellian stereotype and the sarcastic use of the way to the stars.

In Burton. Burton sarcastically applies the term to monks whom he accuses of political intrigue and violence. His alleged peacemakers become incendiaries, and the phrase about earning heaven sharpens the contrast between their profession and the conduct charged against them.

The places. Supererogate appears in the sarcastic conclusion of an attack on monks. (p. 29; DJR-009-14.)

In this edition. "to supererogate" → "to perform works beyond duty" (DJR-009-14). The explanatory phrase retains the technical meaning so that the irony remains intelligible. The surrounding charges and account of merit are Burton's polemical presentation.

See also. Mortification.

Synderesis

Source forms: synteresis; dictamen rationis[13658]

The word. Synderesis is the innate grasp of moral principles. Dictamen rationis is the dictate of reason. Burton lists both alongside conscience as innate kinds of understanding.

In Burton. The account distinguishes fleeting acts of apprehension from lasting intellectual dispositions, or habits. After enumerating acquired forms of understanding, it adds the three innate terms and gives a total of fourteen. The three are related without being collapsed into a single label.

The places. Synteresis and the dictate of reason occur in the classification of understanding. (p. 28; DJR-026-30.)

In this edition. "Synteresis" → "synderesis" (DJR-026-30); "Dictamen rationis" → "the dictate of reason" (DJR-026-30). The modern spelling synderesis replaces synteresis; the Latin phrase is translated directly. Habit in the surrounding passage means an enduring disposition rather than a repeated routine.

See also. Reason; Conscience.

Tables

Source forms: tables[13659]

The word. Tables can name a backgammon-type board game or physical tablets bearing records. The plural does not always refer to furniture.

In Burton. The gambling passage describes anger after losing at tables. The treatment synopsis recommends the same game among moderate mental recreations. In the shrine description, tables instead names commemorative or votive tablets displayed with inscriptions and gifts.

The places. Tables is the game whose losses provoke the gambler's anger. (p. 119; DJR-044-35.) Tables appears among recreations in the regimen synopsis. (scan p. 323; DJR-067-09.) Tables are tablets displayed in the healing shrine. (p. 225; DJR-068-38.)

In this edition. "games at Tables" → "games of backgammon" (DJR-044-35); "cards, tables" → "cards, backgammon" (DJR-067-09); "tables, inscriptions" → "tablets, inscriptions" (DJR-068-38). Backgammon gives the reader the game family, while tablets preserves the material sense in the shrine. The contrast between uncontrolled gambling and moderate recreation belongs to the different passages.

See also. Recreate; Confection; Religion and superstition.

[13658] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 28 (DJR-026-30). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E23. DJR-026:E23 explains the technical terms, including science as certain knowledge, and points to Burton's further explanation in the following paragraph.

[13659] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 119 (DJR-044-35); scan p. 323 (DJR-067-09); p. 225 (DJR-068-38). Existing edition notes: DJR-044:E26. DJR-044:E26 identifies a backgammon-type game and the Galateo tradition, leaving the precise version uncollated. The synopsis uses a scan-page locator; the shrine's comparison with Loreto remains Burton's reported and polemical account.

Tax

Source forms: taxeth; taxe; tax[13660]

The word. To tax can mean reproach, censure or attack someone in speech or writing. These uses do not concern imposing a financial levy.

In Burton. Erasmus is said to tax scholars for mishandling patrons. Princes are reported to pay Aretino to avoid being attacked in satire. Burton finally claims that his own discussion of lust aims to censure and deter it rather than teach it.

The places. Taxeth means reproaches scholars for neglecting patrons. (p. 139–140; DJR-049-01.) Taxe names an attack in Aretino's satire. (p. 148; DJR-051-27.) Tax declares Burton's censuring purpose in discussing love. (p. 410; DJR-108-16.)

In this edition. "as Erasmus well taxeth" → "as Erasmus justly reproaches them" (DJR-049-01); "taxe them in his Satyres" → "attack them in his satires" (DJR-051-27); "to tax and deter others from it" → "to censure it and deter others from it" (DJR-108-16). The renderings follow the different objects and force of criticism. The payment in the Aretino story is part of the reported means of avoiding censure, not the meaning of tax itself.

See also. Fact; Explode.

Temporize

Source forms: temporize; temporising[13661]

The word. To temporize is to adapt one's conduct to circumstances, particularly for advantage. Burton's uses concern opportunistic accommodation, rather than merely postponing a decision.

In Burton. The conscientious person refuses the practices that society rewards as worldly wisdom. In the discussion of false friends, a temporising age enables flatterers to gain access to powerful patrons and rise to office. Both passages expose the social rewards of compromised judgement.

The places. Honest people are despised for refusing opportunistic conduct. (p. 19; DJR-007-14.) The age's opportunism makes flattering companions difficult to expose. (p. 421–422; DJR-110-23.)

In this edition. "temporize as other men do" → "trim their conduct to circumstances as others do" (DJR-007-14); "this temporising age" → "this opportunistic age" (DJR-110-23). The renderings make the adjustment of conduct explicit and retain its critical force. The surrounding language of promotion, patronage and bribery explains what the accommodation is meant to secure.

See also. Policy; Ambodexter.

Temptation

Source forms: tentation; temptation; temptations[13662]

[13660] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 139–140 (DJR-049-01); p. 148 (DJR-051-27); p. 410 (DJR-108-16). Existing edition notes: DJR-049:E01, DJR-051:E22, DJR-108:E13. DJR-049:E01 retains Burton's Erasmus reference while explaining that the consulted Adages locus does not establish the patronage borrowing. DJR-051:E22 preserves as some relate and the uncollated references. DJR-108:E13 distinguishes the marginal Godfridus and Aeneas Sylvius materials and leaves their exact bibliographical links open.

[13661] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 19 (DJR-007-14); p. 421–422 (DJR-110-23). Existing edition notes: DJR-007:E16, DJR-110:E16. DJR-007:E16 explains the irony and leaves the Latin catalogue's source unlocated. DJR-110:E16 retains the unresolved Caelius Secundus anecdote, identifies the love-potion metaphor and points to Rehoboam's counsellors in 1 Kings 12.

[13662] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 311 (DJR-087-29); p. 700 (DJR-165-08); p. 704 (DJR-166-04). Existing edition notes: DJR-087:E21, DJR-165:E08, DJR-166:E02. DJR-087:E21 supplies a close Augustinian parallel, not the exact wording, and leaves the Basil reference uncollated. DJR-165:E08 identifies the discussion in Perkins's Cases of Conscience while leaving Burton's edition unidentified. DJR-166:E02 treats the Platter cases as attributed reports, not evidence of their frequency.

The word. Temptation, also written tentation, can mean a trial or testing, an inducement to wrongdoing, or a troubling impulse. The context determines which force is present.

In Burton. Adversity tests a Christian as a storm tests a sailor. The later discussion calls a trial of faith divine temptation, following Perkins. In the examples attributed to Platter, temptations instead names impulses towards self-destruction. A single modern equivalent would obscure this change of sense.

The places. Temptation and misery test the Christian's endurance. (p. 311; DJR-087-29.) Divine temptation names the testing of faith. (p. 700; DJR-165-08.) Temptations refers to destructive impulses in the reported cases. (p. 704; DJR-166-04.)

In this edition. "tentation & misery" → "temptation and misery" (DJR-087-29); "divine temptation" → "divine testing" (DJR-165-08); "such temptations" → "such temptations" (DJR-166-04). Divine testing clarifies the theological use without implying that God entices people to wrongdoing. Where temptation remains unchanged, the article distinguishes trial from the impulses described in the narrative.

See also. Conscience.

Tires and weeds

Source forms: tires; tyres; weeds[13663]

The word. Tires and tyres are forms of attire: dress or adornments. Weeds can likewise mean clothes, without its familiar botanical sense.

In Burton. Dress participates in courtly imitation and in the appearance of wealth. The magnificent clothing attributed to Cyrus helps explain why people are judged by their exterior. Chariclea's beggar's weeds supply the opposite appearance: beauty is said to remain visible even beneath impoverished clothing.

The places. Tires are the fashions imitated along with gestures and conduct. (p. 37; DJR-011-04.) Gay tyres are magnificent dress that encourages admiration. (p. 156; DJR-052-41.) Beggar's weeds are the clothes in which Chariclea's beauty still shines. (p. 469; DJR-120-22.)

In this edition. "fashions in tires" → "fashions in dress" (DJR-011-04); "gay tyres" → "magnificent dress" (DJR-052-41); "beggers weeds" → "beggar's clothes" (DJR-120-22). Dress and clothes identify the material sense. Magnificent preserves the splendour of gay in this setting. The Chariclea example forms part of Burton's comparison of natural beauty with deliberate enhancement, not a botanical metaphor.

See also. Habit and disposition; Brave; Homely.

Tædium vitae

Source forms: tædium vitæ[13664]

The word. Tædium vitæ is weariness or disgust with life. The expression describes aversion to living, more deeply than passing boredom.

In Burton. Burton places it among symptoms that include restlessness, dissatisfaction, thoughts of self-injury and alternating desires to live and die. The rapid changes between staying and leaving, rising and going to bed give the phrase its immediate setting.

[13663] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 37 (DJR-011-04); p. 156 (DJR-052-41); p. 469 (DJR-120-22). Existing edition notes: DJR-011:E03, DJR-052:E38, DJR-120:E19. DJR-011:E03 preserves the court anecdotes as Burton's reports. DJR-052:E38 explains the satire on seeming wealth and the placement of the Xenophon marginal note. DJR-120:E19 identifies weeds as clothes and leaves the precise Heliodorus passage uncollated. DJR-120-22 supplements the selected evidence for the existing compound headword.

[13664] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 184 (DJR-059-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-059:E09. DJR-059:E09 relates the slow and joyless passage of time to Horace, Epistles 1.1.23–24. The Aurelianus reference is retained as printed; its particular edition remains unchecked.

The places. Weariness of life appears amid restless changes of purpose and desire. (p. 184; DJR-059-09.)

In this edition. “tædium vitæ” → “Weariness of life” (DJR-059-09). The translation states the Latin sense directly. The surrounding passage preserves both the seriousness of the distress and the alternation of desires, without turning Burton’s historical symptom description into a modern diagnostic category.

See also. Sorrow.

Usury

Source forms: usury[13665]

The word. Usury can mean lending at interest generally. It does not invariably carry the narrower sense of an exceptionally high or extortionate charge.

In Burton. Burton’s imagined commonwealth excludes biting usurers but makes a concession to human imperfection by tolerating some lending at interest. The force of the passage depends on that distinction between the rejected abuse and the admitted practice.

The places. The rejection of extortionate lenders is followed by a qualified allowance of interest. (p. 66; DJR-017-08.)

In this edition. “biting usurers” → “extortionate moneylenders” (DJR-017-08); “some kinde of usury” → “some lending at interest” (DJR-017-08). The two equivalents preserve the distinction within the paragraph. Reading both expressions as extortion would conceal the scope of Burton’s concession.

See also. Legal evidence; Commodity.

Vapours

Source forms: vapours[13666]

The word. Vapours are bodily exhalations in the historical physiology invoked here. Their presence or absence is used to explain sleep and disturbances of the mind.

In Burton. Burton links severe fasting to a lack of the vapours thought necessary for sleep, and sleeplessness to mental disorder and frightening sounds. He gives a physiological explanation to material drawn from accounts of Hilarion and Antony.

The places. Lack of vapours is offered as the reason fasting prevents sleep. (p. 656; DJR-156-09.)

In this edition. “for want of vapours he could not sleep” → “For lack of vapours he could not sleep” (DJR-156-09). Vapours is retained because it belongs to the causal model Burton is reporting. Substituting a present-day physiological agent would replace that model rather than explain it.

See also. Hypochondria; Obnubilate.

Venery

Source forms: Venus; Venery; debt[13667]

[13665] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 66 (DJR-017-08). Existing edition notes: DJR-017:E05. DJR-017:E05 explains the regulated exception and the ensuing provision for lenders, borrowers, rates and a common bank. The Latin clauses and Burton’s English restatements are both retained.

[13666] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 656 (DJR-156-09). Existing edition notes: DJR-156:E09. DJR-156:E09 compares Jerome’s Life of Hilarion 5–6 and Athanasius’s Life of Antony 7–9. Antony’s bodily equilibrium in section 14 limits the attribution: not every detail of Burton’s combined account can be assigned equally to both figures.

[13667] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 78 (DJR-036-08); p. 176 (DJR-057-27); p. 64 (DJR-033-14). Existing edition notes: DJR-033:E11, DJR-036:E06, DJR-057:E23. DJR-036:E06 explains Venus and the adjoining anatomical terms. DJR-057:E23 identifies headpiece as a helmet but leaves the medical case and Caesius identification unverified. DJR-033:E11 distinguishes the reciprocal duty in 1 Corinthians 7:3 from the author’s added claim about weak offspring; no

The word. Venery means sexual intercourse in these passages. Venus names the activity through the goddess of love; the marital debt is another expression for sexual relations, framed as an obligation between spouses.

In Burton. Sexual activity appears within the historical regimen of retentions and evacuations, where both excess and absence may be blamed for illness. Frequent venery is also among the reported causes in an individual case. The debt passage joins a scriptural allusion to a medical author's claim about the quality of offspring.

The places. Venus names sexual activity in a catalogue of bodily discharges and retentions. (p. 78; DJR-036-08.) Frequent venery is one of the causes attributed to a medical case. (p. 176; DJR-057-27.) The marital debt provides the language for a claim about procreation. (p. 64; DJR-033-14.)

In this edition. "immoderate, or no use at all of Venus" → "excessive sexual activity or none at all" (DJR-036-08); "frequent use of Venery" → "frequent sexual intercourse" (DJR-057-27); "they pay their debt" → "They pay their debt" (DJR-033-14). The explicit sexual equivalents clarify the first two expressions. Debt remains as the scriptural metaphor, with its reciprocal marital context explained. The assertion about offspring remains attributed to the historical medical writer.

See also. Dowry and jointure; Continence; Satyriasis and priapism; Seed; Concupiscence; Wittal and cuckold.

Venial sin

Source forms: venially; venialiter[13668]

The word. Venial sin is a lesser sin, distinguished from mortal sin in the theological classification Burton cites. Venially and the Latin venialiter mean in that lesser degree.

In Burton. In the argument against excessive parental restrictions on marriage, Burton reports that marrying for physical beauty is not even a venial sin. The qualification strengthens the cited permission; it does not concede a minor fault.

The places. Bonaventure is cited as denying even venial guilt in marrying for beauty. (p. 577; DJR-140-85.)

In this edition. "denies that he so much as venially sins" → "denies that a man commits even a venial sin" (DJR-140-85); "Non peccat venialiter" → "He does not commit a venial sin" (DJR-140:B34; margin). The modern text retains the technical term and the scope of the denial. The accompanying marginal Latin states the same proposition.

See also. Conscience.

Ventricle

Source forms: creek; Ventricle[13669]

The word. Ventricle can mean a cavity or chamber. In the anatomical passages selected here it names a cavity of the brain or the stomach; creek likewise means a chamber in the account of the brain.

In Burton. The brain's ventricles are assigned roles in imagination, thought, memory and the movement of animal spirits. In the later discussion of melancholy, the lower opening of the ventricle is the pylorus, making the organ the stomach.

---

missing marginal note has been invented.

[13668] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 577 (DJR-140-85). Existing edition notes: DJR-140:B34, DJR-140:E54. DJR-140:E54 explains the distinction, corrects the Rachel reference to Genesis 29 and preserves the limits of Burton's description of the captive-marriage conditions. The Bonaventure and Apuleius passages remain uncollated. DJR-140:B34 supplies the marginal Latin and its translation.

[13669] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 19 (DJR-024-19); p. 177 (DJR-057-38). Existing edition notes: DJR-024:E17, DJR-057:E32. DJR-024:E17 explains phlegm and the historical theory of internal senses. DJR-057:E32 preserves both the anatomical conflation in mesentery or midriff and the theory of suppressed haemorrhoidal bleeding.

The places. The middle ventricle and fourth creek belong to the account of brain cavities. (p. 19; DJR-024-19.) The ventricle whose lower outlet is the pylorus means the stomach. (p. 177; DJR-057-38.)

In this edition. “Middle ventricle” → “middle ventricle” (DJR-024-19); “fourth creek” → “fourth chamber” (DJR-024-19); “neather mouth of the Ventricle” → “lower opening of the stomach” (DJR-057-38). Ventricle remains where the brain context is explicit; chamber explains creek, and stomach prevents the later occurrence from being mistaken for another brain cavity. They place and they say retain the attribution of the historical faculties to anatomical locations.

See also. Organical parts.

Virtue

Source forms: vertues[13670]

The word. Virtues can mean effective properties or powers, rather than moral excellences. The relevant power depends on the substance or being described.

In Burton. In this account of supernatural knowledge, herbs, plants, stones, minerals, animals, elements and heavenly bodies have virtues that the beings under discussion know how to apply. The word identifies the capacities attributed to those things.

The places. The virtues of natural things are powers that can be understood and put to use. (p. 43; DJR-029-16.)

In this edition. “vertues of Hearbs, Plants, stones, Minerals” → “properties of herbs, plants, stones, minerals” (DJR-029-16). Properties makes the non-moral sense clear. It reproduces the meaning of the claim without independently establishing the powers or the knowledge attributed to these beings.

See also. Occult; Cordial; Honest.

Voluntary

Source forms: voluntary; wilfull[13671]

The word. Voluntary may describe what happens spontaneously, without being forced, or what is deliberately willed. Wilfull can supply the latter sense without implying obstinacy.

In Burton. The spontaneous opening of haemorrhoids is contrasted with a forced intervention. Wilfull poverty is poverty undertaken by choice in the evangelical counsels. Voluntary permission concerns deliberate divine allowance in a list of doctrines that Burton thinks indiscreet preaching can make distressing.

The places. Voluntary describes a bodily occurrence that is not forced. (p. 212; DJR-065-07.) Wilfull describes chosen religious poverty. (p. 655; DJR-156-02.) Voluntary permission names divine allowance within the theological catalogue. (p. 698; DJR-164-38.)

In this edition. “so they be voluntary” → “that it happens spontaneously” (DJR-065-07); “wilfull poverty” → “voluntary poverty” (DJR-156-02); “voluntary permission” → “deliberate divine permission” (DJR-164-38). Spontaneously prevents the first occurrence from being read as a conscious decision by the patient. The other renderings preserve choice and intention, while the theological note distinguishes allowance from direct production of an event.

See also. Will and nill; Issue.

[13670] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 43 (DJR-029-16). Existing edition notes: DJR-029:E09. DJR-029:E09 explains virtues as properties or powers, meteors as a broad class of atmospheric phenomena, and the four elements as earth, water, air and fire.

[13671] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 212 (DJR-065-07); p. 655 (DJR-156-02); p. 698 (DJR-164-38). Existing edition notes: DJR-065:E06, DJR-156:E02, DJR-164:E36. DJR-065:E06 retains the historical medical reports and the equation of varices with water. DJR-156:E02 explains the evangelical counsels and Burton’s polemical use of merit terminology. DJR-164:E36 notes that the precise doctrinal distinctions depend on the theologian being discussed.

Waking

Source forms: night walking; night-waking; waking; watchings; watchfull[13672]

The word. Waking and watchings can mean wakefulness or periods without sleep. Watchfull may likewise mean sleepless. Night-waking is staying awake at night, whereas night walking in the selected passage is sleepwalking.

In Burton. Burton treats wakefulness both as a feature of conduct, especially prolonged study, and as a symptom or supposed cause of illness. The distinction from sleepwalking matters: night walking occurs among disturbed experiences during sleep, not among a scholar's waking labours.

The places. Night walking appears among disturbances of sleep. (p. 90; DJR-038-25.) Night-waking accompanies prolonged scholarly study. (p. 127; DJR-046-17.) Waking is among the things said to produce bodily heat. (p. 175; DJR-057-14.) Watchings names the long periods of sleeplessness reported by authorities. (p. 180; DJR-058-14.) Watchfull describes the sleepless sufferer who continues to fret. (p. 198–199; DJR-062-07.)

In this edition. "night walking" → "sleepwalking" (DJR-038-25); "night-waking" → "staying awake at night" (DJR-046-17); "solitarinesse, waking" → "solitude, sleeplessness" (DJR-057-14); "Mighty and often watchings" → "long and frequent periods of wakefulness" (DJR-058-14); "watchfull" → "sleepless" (DJR-062-07). The equivalents distinguish absent sleep from disturbed sleep and avoid suggesting a guard's vigilance. Burton's remarkable reports of months or years without sleep remain expressly reported claims.

See also. Non naturals; Still; Intention and remission.

Will and nill

Source forms: velle; nolle; nill[13673]

The word. To nill is not to will: to refuse or be unwilling. Latin velle and nolle name willing and not willing. Will we or nill we means whether we wish it or not.

In Burton. The account of the will treats willing and refusing as its two basic acts, then distinguishes human freedom in contingent matters from necessity in relation to divine purpose. The later proverbial expression introduces an argument about adversity regardless of the reader's preference.

The places. Velle and nolle divide the will's acts into willing and refusing. (p. 30; DJR-026-42.) Will we or nill we means willing or unwilling. (p. 337–338; DJR-093-20.)

In this edition. "Velle and Nolle, to well and nill" → "willing and refusing" (DJR-026-42); "will we, or nill we" → "willing or unwilling" (DJR-093-20). The first rendering translates the meaning of both language pairs, while the original retains the printed well. The second gives the idiom's force. Neither changes Burton's stated relation between contingent choice and divine necessity.

See also. Faculty; Reason; Impotent; Voluntary.

Wit

Source forms: wit; happy wits; witty[13674]

[13672] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 90 (DJR-038-25); p. 127 (DJR-046-17); p. 175 (DJR-057-14); p. 180 (DJR-058-14); p. 198–199 (DJR-062-07). Existing edition notes: DJR-038:E16, DJR-046:E15, DJR-058:E12, DJR-062:E06. DJR-038:E16 places nightmare oppression and sleepwalking within the older humoral account. DJR-046:E15 explains scholarly night-waking and Ficino's varying titles. DJR-058:E12 qualifies the extraordinary durations and uncollated cases; DJR-062:E06 explains watchfull and the heating-and-fumes physiology.

[13673] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 30 (DJR-026-42); p. 337–338 (DJR-093-20). Existing edition notes: DJR-026:E32, DJR-093:E17. DJR-026:E32 records the scan's well and nill, explains contingent and attributes the summary of Stoic determinism to Burton. DJR-093:E17 identifies Ovid, Art of Love 2.437, and explains the transfer of a comment about lovers to prosperity.

The word. Wit can mean intelligence, understanding or intellectual capacity. Witty may mean intelligent or intellectually gifted, without implying humour. Happy wits are gifted minds.

In Burton. Wit appears in the praise of Epicurus, in a defence of honourable rivalry, and in descriptions of intellectual ability coexisting with melancholy. The intelligent child in the consolation passage is another use of witty, distinct from a judgement about the child's future moral character.

The places. Wit in the English couplet corresponds to intellect in the translated Latin. (p. 20; DJR-007-17.) Useful rivalry sharpens wit or intelligence. (p. 103; DJR-041-19.) Happy wits contrasts intellectual gifts with outward dullness and incapacity. (p. 179–180; DJR-058-13.) The disputed connection between melancholy and intellectual gifts is expressed by witty. (p. 207; DJR-064-05.) A witty child is an intelligent child of promise. (p. 346; DJR-095-15.)

In this edition. "Whose wit excel'd the wits of men" → "Whose wit surpassed the wits of men" (DJR-007-17); "the nurse of wit and valor" → "the nurse of intelligence and courage" (DJR-041-19); "happy wits" → "gifted minds" (DJR-058-13); "melancholy men are witty" → "melancholy people are intellectually gifted" (DJR-064-05); "a witty child" → "intelligent child" (DJR-095-15). Wit remains in the verse and whetstone image, where its older meaning can be heard alongside the more explicit equivalents. The article does not turn Burton's disputed humoral explanation into an established connection between illness and genius.

See also. Reason; Conceit.

Wittal and cuckold

Source forms: wittal; wittall[13675]

The word. A cuckold is a husband whose wife is unfaithful. A wittal or wittall knows of and tolerates that infidelity. Horns are a conventional image of cuckoldry in these passages.

In Burton. The opening satire contrasts the wittal's chosen blindness with his sharp sight in other affairs. A hostile catalogue of marriage warns a husband of horns in his absence. The later treatment of jealousy considers toleration in particular circumstances, including material advantage and a patron's wishes.

The places. The wittal knowingly turns a blind eye to his wife's fidelity. (p. 38; DJR-011-10.) Grafting horns describes the feared adultery during a husband's absence. (p. 587; DJR-143-31.) The wittall tolerates infidelity instead of consuming himself with jealousy. (p. 621; DJR-149-28.)

In this edition. "a wittal" → "a willing cuckold" (DJR-011-10); "graft hornes" → "give you cuckold's horns" (DJR-143-31); "a wittall" → "a knowing cuckold" (DJR-149-28). Willing and knowing explain the additional force of wittal. The terms belong to the passages' gendered satire and argument about jealousy; the article preserves the difference between being deceived and knowingly tolerating infidelity.

See also. Jealousy; Quean and slut; Venery.

Zeal

Source forms: zealous[13676]

[13674] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 20 (DJR-007-17); p. 103 (DJR-041-19); p. 179–180 (DJR-058-13); p. 207 (DJR-064-05); p. 346 (DJR-095-15). Existing edition notes: DJR-007:E18, DJR-041:E17, DJR-058:E11, DJR-064:E05, DJR-095:E10. DJR-007:E18 explains the paired Latin and English couplets and leaves the Philostratus wording uncollated. DJR-041:E17 preserves the approval of restrained rivalry. DJR-064:E05 cites Problems 30.1 in the collection attributed to Aristotle and qualifies the mixture and uncollated authorities. DJR-095:E10 distinguishes intelligence from moral uprightness and corrects the implication that Pindar personally mourned Eteoneus.

[13675] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 38 (DJR-011-10); p. 587 (DJR-143-31); p. 621 (DJR-149-28). Existing edition notes: DJR-011:E09, DJR-143:E18, DJR-149:E23. DJR-011:E09 explains honesty as sexual fidelity and leaves the Augustus reference unlocated. DJR-143:E18 identifies the horns metaphor. DJR-149:E23 compares Plutarch, On Love 16: Galba corresponds to Calbas, while Phayllus hopes for office without an explicit promise by Philip in that text. Burton's version remains untraced.

The word. Zeal is ardent commitment or religious fervour; zealous describes the person who has it. Burton's selected use concerns fervour without knowledge, a qualification essential to his criticism.

In Burton. The phrase from Romans accompanies a polemical catalogue of communities claiming exclusive salvation and undertaking extreme practices. Related passages turn the criticism towards rigorists within Burton's own religious camp and describe his proposed treatment of excessive strictness and disturbed minds. These latter passages supply context rather than additional occurrences of zealous.

The places. Zealous without knowledge qualifies the fervour of the groups Burton attacks. (p. 661; DJR-157-17.) The attack on religious rigorists brings the criticism into his own camp. (p. 676; DJR-160-14.) Preciseness and excessive practices appear in the account of suppression and treatment. (p. 682; DJR-161-24.)

In this edition. "Zealous" → "Zealous" (DJR-157-17); "without knowledge" → "without knowledge" (DJR-157-17). The retained word carries its qualification with it. The related evidence explains how fervour becomes, in Burton's argument, misguided excess; his religious judgements and coercive proposals remain his own.

See also. Religion and superstition; Mortification.

Source term index

abdicate — Abdicate.

abdicated — Abdicate.

abraham men — Abraham men.

absolute — Absolute.

absolute cure — Absolute.

absolved — Absolve.

accident — Accident.

accidental — Accident.

accidentall — Accident.

accidents — Accident.

action — Action.

adamant — Lodestone and adamant.

adamantinum — Lodestone and adamant.

admired — Admire.

adust — Adust.

adustion — Adust.

adventious — Adventitious.

adventitious — Adventitious.

adventitious melancholy — Melancholy.

advousons — Church patronage.

[13676] Editor. Edited source passages: p. 661 (DJR-157-17); p. 676 (DJR-160-14); p. 682 (DJR-161-24). Existing edition notes: DJR-157:E15, DJR-160:E14, DJR-161:E24. DJR-157:E15 identifies Romans 10:2 and explains the damaged marginal Acts reference. DJR-160:E14 identifies the Horace quotation and the attack on precisians. DJR-161:E24 distinguishes public suppression from medical management and notes that Burton's category is not a modern diagnosis.

affection — Affection.

affinitie — Affinity and consanguinity.

affinity — Affinity and consanguinity.

agent — Intellect.

alienate his mind — Remedy by diversion.

alterative — Alteratives.

alteratives — Alteratives.

ambodexters — Ambodexter.

ambulones — Demonic apparitions.

an. — Apothecaries measures.

anachorites — Anchorite.

anatomies — Anatomy.

anger — Anger.

animal faculties — Animal faculties.

animal spirits — Spirits.

antick — Antick.

antick picture — Antick.

anticks — Antick.

apologize — Apologize.

apophlegmatisms — Apophlegmatisms.

appetite — Appetite.

apprehensions — Apprehension.

apprehensive — Apprehension.

aquavitæ — Aqua vitae.

art — Art.

artificial — Artificial.

artificial malady — Artificial.

artificiall wildernesses — Artificial.

asininam melancholiam — Melancholy.

aspera arteria — Anatomical arteries.

assation — Concoction.

assurances — Legal evidence.

atra bilis — Melancholy.

aurum potabile — Aurum potabile.

bad ayr — Air.

baffled — Baffle.

bafled — Baffle.

bawd — Bawd.

bewray — Bewray.

bile — Bile and boil.

black choler — Choler.

blazing stars — Meteors.

body politick — Commonwealth.

bowels — Bowels.

brave — Brave.

brave array — Brave.

bravery — Brave.

bugbears — Bugbear.

buggery — Sodomy.

bumbast — Fustian and bombast.

by consent — Consent and essence.

by essence — Consent and essence.

cacexia — Plethora and repletion.

cachexia — Plethora and repletion.

cacochymia — Plethora and repletion.

calentures — Calenture and ague.

calling — Calling.

callings — Calling.

cambium — Radical moisture.

carefull — Careful.

cariages — Carriage.

carnall presumption — Carnal presumption.

carotides — Anatomical arteries.

cast a nativity — Geniture.

casting a nativity — Geniture.

casuists — Casuists.

catoptricks — Catoptrics and perspectives.

cauterized consciences — Cautery.

cautery — Cautery.

censure — Censure.

censured — Censure.

censures — Censure.

cent. — Century.

cento — Cento.

character — Characters.

characters — Characters.

charity — Charity.

cheiromancy — Divination.

chilus — Chyle.

chiromancy — Divination.

chirurgicall — Chirurgery.

choler adust — Adust.

cholerick — Choler.

christian professors — Professor.

church-chopping — Church patronage.

chylus — Chyle.

clarkes — Clerk.

clister — Clister.

clisters — Clister.

clowns — Clown.

clysters — Clister.

cogging — Collogue.

cogitative — Faculty.

cold and dry — Humoral qualities.

colloging — Collogue.

collogue — Collogue.

collogueing — Collogue.

colloguing — Collogue.

combust — Astrological significators.

comfortable speeches — Comfortable.

commodious — Commodity.

commoditie — Commodity.

commodity — Commodity.

common sense — Common sense.

common-wealth — Commonwealth.

complement — Complement.

complexion — Complexion and temperament.

conceipt — Conceit.

conceipted — Conceit.
conceit — Conceit.
conceited — Conceit.
conceited in discourse — Conceit.
conceits — Conceit.
concent — Music and harmony.
conclusions — Experimental.
concoction — Concoction. concupiscence — Concupiscence.
concupiscible — Concupiscible and irascible.
confection — Confection.
confections — Confection.
confer — Confer and conference.
conference — Confer and conference.
consanguinitie — Affinity and consanguinity.
consanguinity — Affinity and consanguinity. conscience — Conscience. consent — Consent and essence.
constancy — Constancy. constantly — Constancy.
contain — Continence. continency — Continence.
continent causes — Cause.
contingence — Contingence. conversation — Conversation.
converse — Conversation.
cordial — Cordial.
cordolium — Heart and cordolium.
corrected — Corrected medicines.
corrosive — Corrosive. corruption — Generation and corruption.
corsives — Corrosive. costiveness — Costiveness. costivenesse — Costiveness. counterfeit — Counterfeit. counterfeit crank — Abraham men.

counterfeit cranks — Abraham men.

crased — Crased.

crasie — Crased.

crasis — Complexion and temperament.

crazed — Crased.

creek — Ventricle.

crudities — Concoction.

crudity — Concoction.

cure — Cure.

curiosity — Curiosity.

curious — Curiosity.

curious wroks — Curiosity.

curiously — Curiosity.

debt — Venery.

decoction — Decoction.

defecate — Defecate.

depraved phantasie — Maternal impressions.

despair — Despair.

desperate — Desperate.

diapason — Music and harmony.

dictamen rationis — Synderesis.

diet — Diet and regimen.

dilection — Love.

discipline — Custom and education.

discoursing — Intellect.

dispatch himself — Make away.

disposition — Habit and disposition.

dissimilar parts — Organical parts.

distemperature — Complexion and temperament.

distillation — Distillation and rheum.

distracted — Distraction.

divine — Divine.

divine seneca — Divine.

divines — Divine.

dotage — Dotage.

dote — Dotage.

dowers — Dowry and jointure.

drams — Apothecaries measures.

draughts — Privy.

dummerers — Abraham men.

dæmones — Daemon and genius.

eclegmes — Eclegme.

efficient cause — Cause.

elect — Election and reprobation.

election — Election.

election of times — Election.

elections — Election.

electuaries — Electuaries.

elishi — Heroical love.

elixation — Concoction.

embrocations — Friction and embrocation.

empericks — Empiric.

empericks in policie — Empiric.

empirick — Empiric.

empiricks — Empiric.

emulation — Emulation.

ens — Matter.

entertain — Entertain.

entertainment — Entertain.

enthusiasmes — Enthusiasm.

enthusiasmus — Enthusiasm.

enthusiasticks — Enthusiasm.

enthusiasts — Enthusiasm.

epicurize — Epicure.

epithemes — Epithemes.

epithymes — Epithemes.

equivocal — Equivocation.

essence — Consent and essence; Essence and quintessence.

estates — Estate.

event — Prognostics.

evidence — Legal evidence.

ex traduce — Ex traduce.

excrements — Excrements.

exercise — Exercise.

exhibition — Exhibition.

experimentall — Experimental.

explode — Explode.

exploded — Explode.

exquisite knowledge — Exquisite.

exquisite torments — Exquisite.

extasie — Ecstasy.

extasies — Ecstasy.

extasis — Ecstasy.

fact — Fact.

faculty — Faculty.

faith — Faith and assurance.

familiarem dæmonem — Daemon and genius.

familiars — Familiar.

fanaticall — Enthusiasm.

fascinate — Fascination.

fascinations — Fascination.

favour — Favour and feature.

fear — Fear.

feature — Favour and feature.

feral — Feral.

ferall — Feral.

first act — Actuality.

fits of the mother — Matrix and mother.

fluxes — Flux and lask.

fond — Fond.

form — Form.

formam — Form.

foule fact — Fact.

frictions — Friction and embrocation.

fulsome — Fulsome.

fulsomeness — Fulsome.

fustian — Fustian and bombast.

generation — Generation and corruption.

generosity — Generous.

generous — Generous.

generous wines — Generous.

genethliacal — Geniture.

genii — Daemon and genius.

geniture — Geniture.

genitures — Geniture.

genius — Daemon and genius.

genus — Genus and species.

gives entertainment — Entertain.

glass — Glass.

gluten — Radical moisture.

gossips — Gossip.

grace — Grace.

green sickness — Green sickness.

gross humors — Humour.

habit — Habit and disposition.

habit of melancholy — Habit and disposition.

habitual melancholy — Habit and disposition.

habituated — Habit and disposition.

halcyonian times — Happiness and fortune.

happily — Happily.

happinesse — Happiness and fortune.

happy wits — Wit.

helleborismum — Helleborism.

herbal — Herbal.

heroical — Heroical love.

homely — Homely.

honest — Honest.

honest emulation — Emulation.

honest mirth — Honest.

honesty — Honest.

hope — Hope.

horoscope — Astrological significators.

hospitals — Hospital.

humanity — Humane learning.

humorous — Humour.

hylech — Astrological significators.

hypocondriacal — Hypochondria.

hypocondries — Hypochondria.

iatromathematicall — Astrology.

idiots — Idiot.

idleness — Idleness.

ignes fatui — Meteors.

ignis fatuus — Meteors.

iij — Apothecaries measures.

ilishi — Heroical love.

ill habit — Habit and disposition.

impertinent — Impertinent.

impostume — Impostume.

impotent — Impotent.

impresse — Emblem.

impresses — Emblem.

impropriations — Church patronage.

impulsive cause — Cause.

in disposition — Habit and disposition.

in substance — Simples.

inanition — Plethora and repletion.

incontinency — Continence.

incontinent — Continence.

incubus — Incubus.

indifferent — Indifferent.

individuall — Inseparable and individual.

indotatus — Dowry and jointure.

inforced temperance — Continence.

inform — Custom and education.

informed — Custom and education.

informs — Custom and education.

instrumental causes — Cause.

intellectual habits — Habit and disposition.

intellectus agens — Intellect.

intelligence — Intelligence.

intend — Intention and remission.

intended — Intention and remission.

intention — Intention and remission.

intentive — Intention and remission.

irascible — Concupiscible and irascible.

irascible appetite — Concupiscible and irascible.

issue — Issue.

issues — Issue.

j — Apothecaries measures.

jakes — Privy.

jealousie — Jealousy.

jovial — Jovial and martial.

joynters — Dowry and jointure.

judicial astrology — Astrology.

judicially conferring — Judicial and judicious.

juglars — Anatomical arteries.

juniors — Neoterics.

just tract — Just.

just treatises — Just.

just volume — Just.

just volumes — Just.

kitchin physick — Physick.

knight melancholy — Heroical love.

lapse — Church patronage.

lask — Flux and lask.

lay — Demonic apparitions.

lecture — Exhibition.

lenitive — Lenitive.

lenitives — Lenitive.

ligation — Ligation and ligature.

ligatures — Ligation and ligature.

lights — Lights.

living anatomy — Anatomy.

lodestone — Lodestone and adamant.

lords of the geniture — Geniture.

lucida intervalla — Lucid intervals.

lust — Lust and lusty.

lusty — Lust and lusty.

luxurious — Luxurious and riot.

lycanthropia — Lycanthropy.

læsa imaginatio — Imagination.

macerate — Macerate.

macerated — Macerate.

macerating — Macerate.

madness — Madness.

magnanimity — Magnanimity and pusillanimity.

make away themselves — Make away.

manured — Manure.

martial — Jovial and martial.

masticatories — Apophlegmatisms.

materia prima — Matter.

matrix — Matrix and mother.

meat — Meat.

meats — Meat.

mediocrity — Mediocrity.

melancholicus ad octo — Melancholy.

melancholize — Melancholy.

melancholizing — Melancholy.

mercurialists — Astrological significators.

meseraick veines — Meseraic.

meseraicke veins — Meseraic.

metempsychosis — Metempsychosis.

meteors — Meteors.

metoposcopy — Divination.

microcosme — Microcosm.

middle cell of the brain — Cerebral chambers.

middle region — Air.

mirache — Myrach.

mirth — Mirth.

miseriack — Meseraic.

mistress — Mistress.

mistris — Mistress.

mortified — Mortification.

mortmain — Mortmain.

mother — Matrix and mother.

mountebanks — Mountebank.

moving faculty — Animal faculties.

myrach — Myrach.

myrache — Myrach.

myrachiall — Myrach.

nativity — Geniture.

neotericks — Neoterics.

nepenthe — Nepenthe.

next causes — Cause.

nice — Curiosity; Nice.

nice education — Nice.

nice gentlewomen — Nice.

nicely — Nice.

night walking — Waking.

night-waking — Waking.

nill — Will and nill.

nolle — Will and nill.

non ens — Matter.

non-natural — Non naturals.

non-natural things — Non naturals.

numericall — Inseparable and individual.

obligation — Legal evidence.

obnubilate — Obnubilate.

obsession — Obsession and possession.

occult — Occult.

oppilations — Oppilation.

ordinary — Ordinary.

ordinary preacher — Ordinary.

organical — Organical parts.

organicall parts — Organical parts.

otiosum otium — Leisure.

out of favour — Favour and feature.

oxymel — Oxymel.

painful — Painful.

painfull — Painful.

painfully — Painful.

palingenesia — Metempsychosis.

parable — Parable.

paracelsians — Paracelsian.

parasites — Parasite.

parrhesiam — Parrhesia.

partile conjunction — Astrological aspects.

passion — Passion.

passions — Passion.

pathetical — Pathetical.

peripateticks — Schoolmen.

perspective glasses — Catoptrics and perspectives.

perspectives — Catoptrics and perspectives.

perturbation — Perturbation.

perturbations — Perturbation.

phantasie — Imagination.

pharmaceutice — Physick.

philautia — Self love.

philologer — Humane learning.

philters — Philter.

philtrum — Philter.

phlebotomy — Phlebotomy.

phrenitis — Phrenitis.

phrensie — Phrenitis. physick — Physick.

physiognomer — Physiognomy.

pinas — Pine apple.

pine-apple — Pine apple.

pituita — Phlegm.

plausible — Plausible.

plethora — Plethora and repletion.

policie — Policy.

policy — Policy.

politick — Policy.

portion — Dowry and jointure.

possession — Obsession and possession.

prebend — Living and preferment.

precise — Precise.

preciseness — Precise.

precisians — Precise.

preferment — Living and preferment.

preferments — Living and preferment.

present — Present.

present death — Present.

present diverter — Present.

present ease — Present.

present possession — Present.

present remedy — Present.

prevent — Prevent.

prevented death — Prevent.

priapismus — Satyriasis and priapism.

primum mobile — Prime mover.

professor — Professor.

prognosticks — Prognostics.

proletaries — Proletary.

proletariique — Proletary.

promissors — Astrological significators.

proper — Proper.

propernes of person — Proper.

puck — Demonic apparitions.

purging upwards — Purging.

pusillanimity — Magnanimity and pusillanimity.

quacksalvers — Mountebank.

quartan ague — Calenture and ague.

quartane — Calenture and ague.

quean — Quean and slut.

queans — Quean and slut.

quiddities — Quiddity and quodlibet.

quinta essentia — Essence and quintessence.

quintessence — Essence and quintessence.

quodlibetaries — Quiddity and quodlibet.

radicall moisture — Radical moisture.

reason — Reason.

receipts — Receipt.

recollect — Memory and recollection.

recreate — Recreate.

rectification — Rectification.

rectification of aire — Air.

rectified — Rectification.

regiment — Diet and regimen.

religion — Religion and superstition.

religious melancholy — Religious melancholy.

reminiscentia — Memory and recollection.

remiss — Intention and remission.

remitted — Intention and remission.

repletion — Plethora and repletion.

reprobate — Election and reprobation.

reprobates — Election and reprobation.

rheume — Distillation and rheum.

rim — Anatomical membranes.

riot — Luxurious and riot.

ros — Radical moisture.

rusticus pudor — Shame.

safety — Salvation.

salacity — Lust and lusty.

salvation — Salvation.

sanguification — Concoction.

sanguine — Blood and sanguine.

satisfaction — Satisfaction.

satisfactory — Satisfaction.

satyriasis — Satyriasis and priapism.

scarification — Chirurgery.

school divinity — Schoolmen.

schoolmen — Schoolmen.

science — Science.

sciences — Science.

scrupulous — Scruple.

scrupulous conscience — Scruple.

seared — Cautery.

secure — Secure.

securely — Secure.

security — Faith and assurance; Secure.

seed — Seed.

seed-veins — Seed.

semiustulation — Concoction.

sensible — Sensible.

sensible love — Love.

sensible soul — Sensible.

sensibles — Sensible.

sensitive — Sensible.

sentence — Judgment.

shamefac'd — Shame.

significators — Astrological significators.

silly — Silly.

similar part — Organical parts.

similar parts — Organical parts.

simony — Church patronage.

simple — Humour; Simple.

simples — Simples.

simulachra — Simulacra.

slut — Quean and slut.

sodomites — Sodomy.

sodomy — Sodomy.

solitariness — Solitude.

solitudo — Solitude.

sorrow — Sorrow.

soul — Soul.

spagirically — Paracelsian.

species — Genus and species; Species in perception.

species of objects — Species in perception.

specifical difference — Genus and species.

spectrum — Demonic apparitions.

spectrums — Demonic apparitions.

spermatical — Seed.

spirits — Spirits.

spittle — Hospital.

splenatick — Spleen.

splenitick — Spleen.

starve his genius — Daemon and genius.

starve their genius — Daemon and genius.

stibium — Stibium.

still — Still.

still dotage — Dotage.

still running — Still.

stock — Estate.

strange imagination — Maternal impressions.

strangury — Strangury.

strong apprehension — Apprehension.

strong waters — Aqua vitae.

stupid — Stupid.

stupidity — Stupid.

stupified — Stupid.

subrusticus pudor — Shame.

substance — Estate.

substantiæ separatæ — Daemon and genius.

suiters — Suit.

summum bonum — Pleasure.

summum genus — Genus and species.

supererogate — Supererogation.

superstition — Religion and superstition.

sute — Suit.

sybaritical — Luxurious and riot.

synteresis — Synderesis.

tables — Tables.

tax — Tax.

taxe — Tax.

taxeth — Tax.

temper — Complexion and temperament.

temperament — Complexion and temperament.

temperature — Complexion and temperament; Humoral qualities.

temperatures — Complexion and temperament.

temporising — Temporize.

temporize — Temporize.

temptation — Temptation.

temptations — Temptation.

tentation — Temptation.

the mother — Matrix and mother.

theorick — Science.

tires — Tires and weeds.

try conclusions — Experimental.

tuition — Custom and education.

tunicles — Anatomical membranes.

tyres — Tires and weeds.

tædium vitæ — Tædium vitae.

usury — Usury.

uteri labiorum — Matrix and mother.

vapours — Vapours.

vegetal — Animal and vegetal.

vegetals — Animal and vegetal.

velle — Will and nill.

venery — Venery.

venialiter — Venial sin.

venially — Venial sin.

venosal artery — Anatomical arteries.

ventricle — Ventricle.

venus — Venery.

vertues — Virtue.

vocall artery — Anatomical arteries.

voluntary — Voluntary.

voluptas — Pleasure.

vomit — Purging.

vomits — Purging.

vulgar complement — Complement.

waking — Waking.

watchfull — Waking. watchings — Waking.
water of life — Aqua vitae.
weeds — Tires and weeds.
well manured — Manure.
wilfull — Voluntary.
wit — Wit.
witch-ridden — Incubus.
wittal — Wittal and cuckold.
wittall — Wittal and cuckold.
witty — Wit.
zealous — Zeal.
ß — Apothecaries measures.
æquivocations — Equivocation. æstimative — Faculty.
ʒ — Apothecaries measures.
κακοζηλίαν — Emulation. πυρομαντεία — Divination. ἐντελέχεια — Actuality. ἐπιχαιρεκακία — Epichairekakia. ὑδρομαντεία — Divination.
ʒ̄ — Apothecaries measures.

Modern rendering index

a bad bodily condition — Habit and disposition.
a cautery wound — Cautery.
a conceit of holiness — Self love.
a destructive inquisitiveness — Jealousy.
a divine melancholy — Religion and superstition.
a full and sweet harmony — Music and harmony.
a god, a spirit — Daemon and genius.
a great accumulation of waste matter — Excrements.
a handsome man — Proper.
a hare sitting in its form — Form.
a hospital, a shelter for the sick — Hospital.
a kind of abscess in my head — Impostume.
a knowing cuckold — Wittal and cuckold.

a liquid dressing for the heart — Epithemes.

a lucrative prebend — Living and preferment.

a mirror was lowered on a thread — Glass.

a mistress still to come — Mistress.

a nonentity — Matter.

a passing disposition, in another an established condition — Habit and disposition.

a person's nativity — Geniture.

a poor sinful soul — Silly.

a puck — Demonic apparitions.

a scrupulous conscience — Conscience; Scruple.

a settled condition — Habit and disposition.

a simple surgeon — Silly.

a single catarrhal discharge — Distillation and rheum.

a slattern — Quean and slut.

a strict puritan — Precise.

a student of literature or a poet — Humane learning.

a substantial volume — Just.

a theologian — Divine.

a true professing believer — Professor.

a wasted constitution — Plethora and repletion.

a well-cultivated country — Manure.

a well-engraved herbal — Herbal.

a willing cuckold — Wittal and cuckold.

a woman rules him — Mistress.

abdominal membrane — Anatomical membranes.

abdominal wall — Myrach.

accompanying symptoms — Accident.

acquired — Accident.

acquired disease — Artificial.

acquired melancholy — Melancholy.

actions and emotions — Passion.

active and passive — Intellect.

active intellect — Intellect.

acts of satisfaction — Satisfaction.

admixture of blood — Blood and sanguine.

advantage — Commodity.

affection — Love.

agonising torture — Exquisite.

all bodily decay — Generation and corruption.

all food — Meat.

all the later writers — Neoterics.

already distraught — Distraction.

alterative treatment — Alteratives.

alteratives and cordials — Alteratives.

ambulones, “wanderers,” — Demonic apparitions.

among familiar companions — Gossip.

amplified impressions — Species in perception.

amusing tale — Conceit.

an accidental property — Accident.

an emetic — Purging.

an empiric — Empiric.

an established disposition to melancholy — Habit and disposition.

an excess of humours — Plethora and repletion.

an illegitimate offshoot or kind of love melancholy — Jealousy.

an immediate diversion — Present.

an immediate recovery — Present.

an immediate remedy — Present.

an impaired imagination — Imagination.

an overpowering object of sense — Sensible.

an uncontrolled and raging lust — Impotent.

an unfamiliar guise — Habit and disposition.

an unhealthy condition of the body — Habit and disposition.

anchorites — Anchorite.

and low fellows — Proletary.

anger, a desire for revenge — Anger.

animal faculties — Animal faculties.

animal spirits — Spirits.

antimony, or stibium — Stibium.

apophlegmatisms, or masticatories — Apophlegmatisms.

apothecaries’ medicines — Physick.

apparitions — Demonic apparitions.

applications of liquid remedies — Friction and embrocation.

aqua vitae — Aqua vitae.

are driven to prostitution — Quean and slut.

argues at length — Just.

art or to nature — Art.

as erasmus justly reproaches them — Tax.

as inseparable as saints cosmas and damian — Inseparable and individual.

as matter desires form — Form.

as outspoken as i am unrestrained — Parrhesia.

as sorrow does: it contracts the heart — Sorrow.

as the substance itself or as an infusion — Stibium.

ascendant — Astrological significators.

asinine melancholy — Melancholy.

associate familiarly with human beings — Conversation.

assured of their salvation — Salvation.

astrological indicators — Astrological significators.

atmospheric disturbances — Meteors.

attack them in his satires — Tax.

awkward shyness — Shame.

bad conduct — Conversation.

balanced bodily constitution — Complexion and temperament.

beggar's clothes — Tires and weeds.

being — Matter.

being humiliated — Baffle.

benefit — Commodity.

birth charts — Geniture.

black bile — Bile and boil; Choler; Melancholy.

blood relationship — Affinity and consanguinity.

bloodletting — Phlebotomy.

bodily constitution — Complexion and temperament.

body's balance — Complexion and temperament.

bogeymen — Bugbear.

boil — Bile and boil.

boiling — Concoction.

boiling clarifies it — Defecate.

bound themselves over to him — Legal evidence.

brain's middle chamber — Cerebral chambers.

brought about by circumstances — Artificial.

building an almshouse, school, or bridge to make amends — Satisfaction.

burning fevers — Calenture and ague.

burning fevers and diarrhoea — Flux and lask.

burnt choler — Adust.

by choice — Election.

by reasoning — Intellect.

by their unaided natural powers — Grace.

cambium — Radical moisture.

cards, backgammon — Tables.

care and supervision — Custom and education.

carotid arteries — Anatomical arteries.

cast a birth horoscope — Geniture.

cast the evil eye on children and bewitch them — Fascination.

casting a birth horoscope — Geniture.

catoptrics — Catoptrics and perspectives.

cauterized — Cautery.

changing his habit — Habit and disposition.

charity itself — Charity.

charity may judge favourably — Charity.

cheerfulness — Mirth.

chemical preparations — Confection.

choosing favourable times — Election.

church appointments — Living and preferment.

church revenues appropriated to lay ownership — Church patronage.

chyle — Chyle.

clouds the mind — Obnubilate.

coaxing — Collogue.

college, lectureship, library — Exhibition.

combust — Astrological significators.

comets — Meteors.

committed a shameful act — Fact.

common soldiers — Proletary.

commonwealth — Commonwealth.

compare hand with hand — Confer and conference.

comparing ourselves with them — Confer and conference.

complete cure — Absolute.

completed it — Absolve.

completion of love — Complement.

composite parts — Organical parts.

compound — Confection.

concupiscible — Concupiscible and irascible.

condition of the body — Affection.

conducted excellent experiments — Experimental.

confident practitioners — Empiric.

confidently ridicule — Secure.

consciences are seared — Cautery.

consider themselves reprobates — Election and reprobation.

consoling words — Comfortable.

constipation — Costiveness.

constitutions — Complexion and temperament.

containing causes — Cause.

contingency of all things — Contingence.

continual conversation — Confer and conference.

continually crying — Still.

converse with them — Confer and conference.

corrosive troubles — Corrosive.

corrupt humours — Plethora and repletion.

corrupt passions — Affection.

creatures with senses — Sensible.

criticism — Censure.

curiosity — Curiosity.

custom — Custom and education.

customary prescriptions — Receipt.

daimones — Daemon and genius.

deadly affliction — Feral.

decoction of wormwood — Decoction.

defend anthony — Apologize.

dejected faint-heartedness — Magnanimity and pusillanimity.

deliberate divine permission — Voluntary.

delicate gentlewoman — Nice.

delicate gentlewomen — Nice.

delicate upbringing — Nice.

delusion — Dotage.

demonic harassment or possession — Obsession and possession.

denies that a man commits even a venial sin — Venial sin.

deny themselves — Daemon and genius.

derive from seed — Seed.

desiring faculty — Concupiscible and irascible.

despairing people — Desperate.

different meanings — Equivocation.

different meanings of melancholy — Equivocation.

digestive processing — Concoction.

discursive thought, reasoning — Intellect.

disordered imagination — Imagination; Maternal impressions.

disorders — Complexion and temperament.

disorders of the brain — Affection.

disown — Abdicate.

disputations on any subject whatever — Quiddity and quodlibet.

distilled spirit — Aqua vitae.

distinctive features — Genus and species.

distinguish my assurance from fleshly presumption — Faith and assurance; Hope.

distinguishing mark — Characters.

disturbances of the mind corrected — Perturbation.

divination by fire — Divination.

divine seneca — Divine.

divine testing — Temptation.

do not be complacent — Secure.

do not despair or think yourself rejected by god — Faith and assurance.

double-dealers — Ambodexter.

double-dealing — Ambodexter.

dress and gesture — Habit and disposition.

drinkable gold — Aurum potabile.

dulls their spirits — Spirits.

ecstasy — Ecstasy.

ecstasy is a taste of future happiness — Ecstasy.

educated — Custom and education.

efficient cause — Cause.

elaborate crosses — Curiosity.

elishi — Heroical love.

empirical healers — Empiric.

empirical practitioners — Empiric.

empty fancies — Conceit.

empty privies — Privy.

empty superstition — Religion and superstition.

enema — Clister.

enemas — Clister.

enforced continence — Continence.

established as a habit or present as a disposition — Habit and disposition.

ever-flowing rivers — Still.

every agreeable means — Plausible.

evil spirit — Daemon and genius.

exact conjunction — Astrological aspects.

exact knowledge — Exquisite.

excellent powers of understanding — Apprehension.

exceptional beauty — Favour and feature.

excessive exercise — Exercise.

excessive sexual activity or none at all — Venery.

excessive solitude — Solitude.

excluded — Abdicate.

exercise of body and mind regulated — Exercise.

external, adventitious causes — Adventitious.

extortionate moneylenders — Usury.

extraordinary imagination — Maternal impressions.

faculty of movement — Animal faculties.

faculty of struggle — Concupiscible and irascible.

faith — Faith and assurance.

fall off a bench — Form.

familiar spirit — Daemon and genius.

famous scholars — Clerk.

fashions in dress — Tires and weeds.

feel no scruple about anything — Conscience.

feelings to actions — Passion.

feigned invalid — Abraham men.

fell into despair — Desperate.

few discharges from the eyes and nostrils — Excrements.

fifth essence — Essence and quintessence.

final and temporary — Religious melancholy.

final and temporary despair — Despair.

financial support — Exhibition.

fine craftsmanship — Curiosity.

fine wines — Generous.

finery — Brave.

firmly believed — Constancy.

firmness of his understanding — Apprehension.

first actuality — Actuality.

first cousin to idleness — Idleness.

first substantial actuality — Actuality.

fits of the mother — Matrix and mother.

fits of the womb — Matrix and mother.

fleshly presumption — Carnal presumption.

food — Meat.

for drawing up a bond — Legal evidence.

for lack of vapours he could not sleep — Vapours.

foul matter — Fulsome.

found so astonishing — Admire.

fourth chamber — Cerebral chambers; Ventricle.

frail and sickly — Crased.

frank speaking — Parrhesia.

freedom from anxiety follows — Secure.

frenzy — Phrenitis.

frequent sexual intercourse — Venery.

frivolous and irrelevant — Impertinent.

full-length volumes — Just.

futile choices of auspicious times — Election.

games of backgammon — Tables.

gather from their extensive treatises — Memory and recollection.

genus and species — Genus and species.

ghost — Demonic apparitions.

gifted minds — Wit.

give some reassurance — Satisfaction.

give you cuckold's horns — Wittal and cuckold.

gives our life its proper form — Custom and education.

god's grace — Grace.

good and evil guardian spirits — Daemon and genius.

good fortune and leisure — Happiness and fortune.

good government — Policy.

good looks — Favour and feature.

grace is available to all who will believe — Grace.

green sickness — Green sickness.

grotesque picture — Antick.

grotesque, fantastic ideas — Antick.

grotesques — Antick.

had any scruple — Scruple.

halcyon days — Happiness and fortune.

half a drachm — Apothecaries measures.

handsome appearance — Proper.

hardworking preacher — Painful.

he does not commit a venial sin — Venial sin.

he may kill himself — Make away.

he suddenly lost his reason — Dotage.

heartache — Heart and cordolium.

heightened or relaxed — Intention and remission.

held and chewed in the mouth — Apophlegmatisms.

hellebore in its solid form — Simples.

heroic — Heroical love.

heroic love — Heroical love; Love.

hidden — Occult.

highest general category — Genus and species.

highest good — Pleasure.

his food — Diet and regimen.

his heart is always with her — Still.

his mistress — Mistress; Quean and slut.

his next academic exercise — Exercise.

historian skilled in affairs of state — Policy.

honour and beauty — Honest.

honourable rivalry — Emulation.
honours, offices and promotions — Living and preferment.
hope of salvation — Salvation.
hope, love, desire and longing — Hope.
hot-tempered — Choler.
humiliated — Baffle. hydromancy — Divination.
hyleg — Astrological significators.
hypochondria — Hypochondria. hypochondriacal wind — Hypochondria.
idle leisure — Leisure.
if she is slovenly — Quean and slut.
ilishi — Heroical love.
images — Simulacra.
images of love — Species in perception. imagination — Conceit; Imagination.
imaginative in conversation — Conceit.
immediate relief — Present.
immediate, internal, antecedent and proximate causes — Cause.
impaired — Crased.
impaired imagination — Imagination.
impelling cause — Cause.
improving the air — Air; Rectification.
in despair — Despair.
in disorders of the spleen — Spleen.
in her form — Habit and disposition.
in its substance — Organical parts.
in mutual aspect — Astrological aspects.
incestuous sodomites — Sodomy.
incidental causes — Accident.
incomplete roasting — Concoction.
incubus, or “witch-ridden,” — Incubus.
indigestion — Concoction.
infirm — Crased.
inflated titles — Fustian and bombast.
ingratiate themselves — Collogue.

inherent constitution — Complexion and temperament.

innate moisture — Radical moisture.

innate or acquired — Adventitious.

inscribed signs — Characters.

insensible for the time — Stupid.

inseparable condition — Accident.

inspired possession — Enthusiasm.

instant death — Present.

institutions of every kind — Hospital.

instrumental causes — Cause.

intellectual habits — Habit and disposition.

intelligence to give it life or motion — Intelligence.

intelligent child — Wit.

intensified or diminished — Intention and remission.

intensify or lessen — Intention and remission.

intervenes — Prevent.

inveterate anger — Anger.

irascible — Concupiscible and irascible.

irascible appetite — Concupiscible and irascible.

issues — Issue.

its severity generally varies from person to person — Intention and remission.

jealousy — Jealousy.

jointures — Dowry and jointure.

judge — Censure.

judge or governor — Common sense.

judgement — Censure.

judicial astrology — Astrology.

judiciously comparing one condition with another — Judicial and judicious.

jugular veins — Anatomical arteries.

kind of solitude — Solitude.

kinship by marriage or blood — Affinity and consanguinity.

kitchen remedies — Physick.

knight’s melancholy — Heroical love.

lacking lungs — Lights.

large dowries — Dowry and jointure.

laxative electuaries — Electuaries; Lenitive.

left hypochondrium — Hypochondria.

less apprehensive — Apprehension.

life and very essence of medicine — Essence and quintessence.

like a magnet drawing iron — Lodestone and adamant.

lips of the womb — Matrix and mother.

liquid dressings — Epithemes.

living anatomical specimen — Anatomy.

long and frequent periods of wakefulness — Waking.

loose and imprecise sense — Equivocation.

lose so much of her beauty — Favour and feature.

love melancholy — Heroical love.

love potion — Philter.

love potions — Philter.

love presupposes knowledge, faith and hope — Love.

lower opening of the stomach — Ventricle.

lucid intervals — Lucid intervals.

lucrative — Commodity.

lustful, sexually unrestrained — Luxurious and riot.

lycanthropy — Lycanthropy.

lying and wheedling — Collogue.

mad, sybaritic squanderers — Luxurious and riot.

made the people complacent — Secure.

magical bindings — Ligation and ligature.

magnificent dress — Tires and weeds.

maintain jesters — Entertain.

maintained with such labour — Painful.

make you complete — Absolute.

making experiments — Experimental.

malicious joy — Epichairekakia.

marriage tie — Affinity and consanguinity.

martial spirit — Spirits.

matrix or womb — Matrix and mother.

medical theory — Science.

medicinal lotions — Epithemes.

medicines taken by licking, or linctuses — Eclegme.

melancholic to the eighth degree — Melancholy.

melancholizing — Melancholy.
melancholy people are intellectually gifted — Wit.
membranes and coverings — Anatomical membranes.
mental images of objects — Species in perception. merely disposed that way — Habit and disposition.
mesenteric veins — Meseraic.
meticulous modern writers — Neoterics.
metoposcopy and chiromancy — Divination.
middle region of the air — Air.
middle ventricle — Cerebral chambers; Ventricle. mirach — Myrach.
misguided imitation — Emulation.
mizaldus, fifth century, item 77 — Century.
mortmain — Mortmain.
most readily available and easiest — Parable.
most sensitive — Sensible.
mountebanks, quacks — Mountebank.
my assurance — Carnal presumption.
my birth chart — Geniture.
myrach — Myrach.
myrachial — Myrach.
natal promissors — Astrological significators.
natural concupiscence — Concupiscence.
naturally cold and dry — Humoral qualities.
nepenthe — Nepenthe.
never had any scruple — Conscience.
nightmare oppression — Incubus.
no discipline — Art.
no dowries — Dowry and jointure.
no occupation — Calling.
no skill can cultivate — Manure.
noble courage — Generous.
noble fields of knowledge — Science.
noble minds — Generous.
noble spirits — Generous.
not outright atheists — Simple.

not the unmixed humour — Humour; Simple.

notorious procurer — Bawd.

obstructions — Oppilation.

on black bile — Bile and boil.

on satyriasis and priapism — Satyriasis and priapism.

once it has become established — Habit and disposition.

one branch of learning — Science.

one drachm of each — Apothecaries measures.

one of her female friends — Gossip.

open sores made in different parts for different purposes — Issue.

operations requiring concentration — Intention and remission.

oppositions, quartiles — Astrological aspects.

optical glasses — Catoptrics and perspectives.

optics — Catoptrics and perspectives.

or they concern some future evil, as fear does — Fear.

ordinary courtesies — Complement.

ordinary litigants — Suit.

ordinary looks and humble standing — Favour and feature.

organs — Organical parts.

organs, or instruments — Organical parts.

originates in the head itself — Consent and essence.

others are middling — Indifferent.

our clergy — Divine.

our imaginations — Imagination.

our little world, the human being — Microcosm.

our own unstable condition — Estate.

our writers on cases of conscience condemn — Casuists.

over-scrupulous — Curiosity.

overfilling and emptying the body — Plethora and repletion.

pad themselves out — Fustian and bombast.

painstaking — Curiosity.

painstaking philosopher of universal learning — Painful.

palmistry — Divination.

passionate declaration — Pathetical.

patience and courage — Magnanimity and pusillanimity.

patrons who trade in church livings — Church patronage.

pay her no more attention than the rest — Intention and remission.

people seized by inspiration — Enthusiasm.

people seized by prophetic frenzy — Enthusiasm.

people who believe themselves inspired — Enthusiasm.

people who pretend to be mute — Abraham men.

perfectly in love — Love.

perhaps through his counsel — Happily.

peripatetics — Schoolmen.

perpetual corrosive — Corrosive.

perverts judgement — Reason.

pharmaceutical treatment — Simples.

pharmaceutics — Physick.

phlegm — Phlegm.

phrenitis — Phrenitis.

pine cone — Pine apple.

pineapples — Pine apple.

plainly dressed — Homely.

planted wildernesses — Artificial.

plants and creatures with senses — Animal and vegetal.

pleasure — Pleasure.

polished and splendid — Brave.

political body — Commonwealth.

politically shrewd commynes — Policy.

possessions and wealth — Estate.

potions — Apothecaries measures.

powerful imagination — Apprehension.

practitioners of astrological medicine — Astrology.

prepared by chemical methods — Paracelsian.

prime matter — Matter.

prior lapse of the right of appointment — Church patronage.

privies and drains — Privy.

prognoses — Prognostics.

propagated from the parent — Ex traduce.

properly prepared — Corrected medicines.

properties of herbs, plants, stones, minerals — Virtue.

protecting the places — Secure.

provide a way out of the trial — Issue.

pursue pleasure — Epicure.

pursuing a petition — Suit.

quacks — Mountebank.

quartan ague — Calenture and ague.

quartan fever — Calenture and ague.

quiet mental derangement — Dotage.

quirks and quiddities — Quiddity and quodlibet.

rational in potential, though not in its exercise — Actuality.

rational soul — Soul.

raving without fever — Madness.

reading the forehead — Divination.

ready for advancement — Living and preferment.

reason another — Reason.

receives visitors — Entertain.

recollection or remembering — Memory and recollection.

refresh and restore his distressed soul — Mirth; Recreate.

regimen of health — Diet and regimen.

regions beneath the ribs — Hypochondria.

regular preacher — Ordinary.

rejected by god — Election and reprobation.

rejection of hope and comfort for a time — Despair.

rejoice in other people's misfortunes — Epichairekakia.

religion and government — Policy.

religion is of two kinds, true or false — Religion and superstition.

religious melancholy from deficiency — Religion and superstition; Religious melancholy.

religious rigorists — Precise.

religious scrupulosity — Precise.

remedies learned from experience — Experimental.

restrain us — Continence.

rheum — Distillation and rheum.

ridicule many of their customs — Explode.

right hypochondrium — Hypochondria.

rights of patronage over appointments — Church patronage.

rivalry — Emulation.

roasting — Concoction.

ros and gluten — Radical moisture.

rubbing all over the body — Friction and embrocation.

rulers of the nativity — Geniture.

rustic shyness — Shame.

safest, mildest and least severe — Intention and remission.

sanguification — Concoction.

sanguine melancholy — Blood and sanguine.

saturnian, jovian, martian — Jovial and martial.

satyriasis, priapism — Satyriasis and priapism.

savage vices — Feral.

scholastic theology — Schoolmen.

scholastics — Schoolmen.

scorched — Adust.

scrupulously — Curiosity.

seat of the common sense — Common sense.

secular learning and theology — Humane learning.

security and reassurance — Remedy by diversion.

self-love — Self love.

self-restraint — Continence.

self-styled paracelsians — Paracelsian.

semen retained too long — Seed.

seminal vessels — Seed.

sensitive — Sensible.

sensitive soul — Sensible.

sensitive to what is happening — Apprehension.

sensory forms of things — Species in perception.

sentient love — Love.

separate substances — Daemon and genius.

settled melancholy — Habit and disposition.

severe mental derangement — Madness.

sexual activity properly regulated — Rectification.

sexual incontinence — Continence.

sexually unrestrained — Continence.

shabby appearance — Homely.

sham invalids — Abraham men.

signs stamped — Characters.

silent rhetoric — Still.

similar love potions — Philter.

similar treatment — Rectification.

simony — Church patronage.

simple substances that alter melancholy — Simples.

six non-natural things — Non naturals.

skeletons — Anatomy.

skill and effort — Art.

sleepless — Waking.

sleepwalking — Waking.

small courtesy — Complement.

so reckless — Desperate.

sodomy, buggery — Sodomy.

soil and smear — Bewray.

solitude, sleeplessness — Waking.

some foul deed — Fact.

some lending at interest — Usury.

some of his close friends — Familiar.

soothing remedies — Lenitive.

speech suited to the occasion — Nepenthe.

speech, performance, or gesture — Action.

spent his capital — Estate.

splendid clothes — Brave.

splenic — Spleen.

spout grandiose nonsense — Fustian and bombast.

squill oxymel — Oxymel.

starving his own appetite for enjoyment — Daemon and genius.

states of inspiration — Enthusiasm.

staying awake at night — Waking.

steadfastly — Constancy.

steadfastness — Constancy.

strange attacks and convulsions — Passion.

strange claims of divine inspiration — Enthusiasm.

strangury — Strangury.

strictly religious — Religious melancholy.

strong idea or impression — Conceit.

strong spirits — Aqua vitae.

studied medicine — Physick.

studies and occupations — Calling.

studies of birth horoscopes — Geniture.

stumble through a legal document — Legal evidence.

stupefied women — Stupid.

substance and matter — Essence and quintessence.

such a discharge — Issue.

such temptations — Temptation.

suddenly seized with diarrhoea — Flux and lask.

suffice to make satisfaction — Satisfaction.

summon and dismiss these spirits — Demonic apparitions.

surgical remedies — Chirurgery.

symbols, devices and emblems — Emblem.

synderesis — Synderesis.

tablets, inscriptions — Tables.

take him into his household — Entertain.

take possession immediately — Present.

teach another — Custom and education.

temporary affliction — Passion.

temptation and misery — Temptation.

tension proceeds from disturbances — Intention and remission.

terrifying apparitions — Bugbear.

that it happens spontaneously — Voluntary.

the balance of their bodies — Humoral qualities.

the bond of conjugal love is unbreakable — Lodestone and adamant.

the chief magnet — Lodestone and adamant.

the crowd hissed and jeered them off — Explode.

the dictate of reason — Synderesis.

the different meanings of melancholy — Melancholy.

the disorder called “the mother” — Matrix and mother.

the estimative or cogitative faculty — Faculty.

the first moving sphere of all the other affections — Prime mover.

the harmony of musicians — Music and harmony.

the imagination stirs the appetite — Appetite.

the nurse of intelligence and courage — Wit.

the offensive sweat — Fulsome.

the other complacency — Secure.

the parish is well provided for — Cure.

the poor shepherd — Silly.

the pretended corpse — Counterfeit.

the safest — Secure.

the same deed — Fact.

the sin of sodomy — Sodomy.

the slightest disturbance of the emotions — Perturbation.

the usual outcome — Prognostics.

the very same water — Inseparable and individual.

their desires could never be satisfied — Lust and lusty.

their emblem — Emblem.

their imagination is impaired — Faculty.

their inhabitants are idle and dissolute — Luxurious and riot.

their own flesh and blood, their very children — Bowels.

their stupefaction — Stupid.

their very frequent sexual activity — Lust and lusty.

they are changeable beyond all measure — Humour.

they forestalled death — Prevent.

they pay their debt — Venery.

they would not ransom his life — Soul.

thick humours — Humour.

this faculty is free — Faculty.

this judgment — Judgment.

this nobility of spirit — Generous.

this opportunistic age — Temporize.

this patchwork — Cento.

this scrupulous conscience — Scruple.

this suspension of the senses — Ligation and ligature.

those governed by mercury — Astrological significators.

those parasites — Parasite.

those who profess christianity — Professor.

three ounces — Apothecaries measures.

through sympathy with another part, rather than through a disorder originating in itself — Consent and essence.

through their mutual sympathy — Consent and essence.

to censure it and deter others from it — Tax.

to feel the lack of grace within ourselves — Grace.

to indulge in melancholy like this — Melancholy.

to kill himself — Make away.

to kill themselves — Make away.

to perform works beyond duty — Supererogation.

to strengthen hearing — Intention and remission.

too much being alone — Idleness; Solitude.

too scrupulously — Nice.

torments the soul — Sorrow.

toughest labourers — Clown.

training — Custom and education.

trance — Ecstasy.

transfers of property and guarantees — Legal evidence.

transmigration and rebirth — Metempsychosis.

treated me with contempt — Baffle.

treatment with hellebore — Helleborism.

trim their conduct to circumstances as others do — Temporize.

turn his mind elsewhere — Remedy by diversion.

two common emetics — Purging.

two full treatises — Just.

ugly souls — Soul.

undertakings and conduct — Carriage.

undigested matter — Concoction.

ungovernable and insane desire — Impotent.

unhealthy air — Air.

uniform parts — Organical parts.

unlearned — Idiot.

unruly appetite — Concupiscence.

unsuspecting travellers — Silly.

untrained practitioners — Empiric.

untrained practitioners of politics — Empiric.

upwards or downwards — Purging.

usual winter recreations — Ordinary.

utterly mortified and mad — Mortification.

utterly numb — Stupid.

vegetative, sensitive and rational — Animal and vegetal.

venosal artery — Anatomical arteries.

very shy — Shame.

very strengthening to the heart — Cordial.

very vigorous — Lust and lusty.

vileness of his deed — Fact.

voluntary poverty — Voluntary.

wasted by cares and discontents — Macerate.

wasting ill health — Plethora and repletion.

weak and helpless — Silly.

wear away their minds — Macerate.

wear themselves out — Macerate.

weariness of life — Tædium vitae.

wearing themselves away — Macerate.

what is morally honourable — Honest.

what middle state can be found — Mediocrity.

wheedling — Collogue.

whether he is among the elect — Election and reprobation.

whether things come into being and pass away in the heavens — Generation and corruption.

wholesome merriment — Honest.

whose age had made him a little foolish — Fond.

whose wit surpassed the wits of men — Wit.

will-o'-the-wisp, imagination — Meteors.

will-o'-the-wisps — Meteors.

willing and refusing — Will and nill.

willing or unwilling — Will and nill.

windpipe — Anatomical arteries.

witches and enchantments — Fascination.

with or without scarification — Chirurgery.

without a dowry — Dowry and jointure.

without knowledge — Zeal.

witty — Conceit.

wives' breaths smell very foul — Soul.

wolf-madness — Lycanthropy.

worldly, complacent — Secure.

worried thoughts — Careful.

written symbols — Characters.

zealous — Zeal.

zopyrus the reader of faces — Physiognomy.

Thematic index

Learning and authorship. Action; Antick; Art; Cento; Century; Clerk; Emblem; Equivocation; Exhibition; Fustian and bombast; Humane learning; Neoterics; Parrhesia; Pathetical; Quiddity and quodlibet; Science.

Body and medicine. Adust; Adventitious; Alteratives; Anatomical arteries; Anatomical membranes; Anatomy; Apophlegmatisms; Apothecaries measures; Aqua vitae; Aurum potabile; Bile and boil; Blood and sanguine; Calenture and ague; Cautery; Chirurgery; Choler; Chyle; Clister; Complexion and temperament; Concoction; Confection; Consent and essence; Cordial; Corrected medicines; Costiveness; Decoction; Diet and regimen; Distillation and rheum; Eclegme; Electuaries; Empiric; Epithemes; Excrements; Exercise; Experimental; Flux and lask; Friction and embrocation; Green sickness; Helleborism; Herbal; Humoral qualities; Humour; Hypochondria; Impostume; Intention and remission; Issue; Lenitive; Lights; Maternal impressions; Matrix and mother; Melancholy; Meseraic; Mountebank; Myrach; Nepenthe; Non naturals; Oppilation; Organical parts; Oxymel; Paracelsian; Phlebotomy; Phlegm; Physick; Plethora and repletion; Prognostics; Purging; Radical moisture; Receipt; Rectification; Satyriasis and priapism; Seed; Simples; Spirits; Spleen; Stibium; Strangury; Vapours; Ventricle; Waking.

Mind passions and conduct. Affection; Anger; Animal faculties; Appetite; Apprehension; Bugbear; Cerebral chambers; Common sense; Conceit; Concupiscence; Concupiscible and irascible; Constancy; Corrosive; Distraction; Dotage; Ecstasy; Emulation; Epichairekakia; Faculty; Fear; Habit and disposition; Happiness and fortune; Heart and cordolium; Heroical love; Idleness; Imagination; Jealousy; Judgment; Leisure; Love; Lucid intervals; Lycanthropy; Madness; Magnanimity and pusillanimity; Memory and recollection; Mirth; Music and harmony; Obnubilate; Passion; Perturbation; Phrenitis; Pleasure; Recreate; Remedy by diversion; Self love; Shame; Simulacra; Solitude; Sorrow; Species in perception; Tædium vitae; Wit.

Nature astrology and supernatural agencies. Air; Astrological aspects; Astrological significators; Astrology; Catoptrics and perspectives; Characters; Daemon and genius; Demonic apparitions; Divination; Essence and quintessence; Fascination; Geniture; Incubus; Intelligence; Jovial and martial; Ligation and ligature; Lodestone and adamant; Meteors; Obsession and possession; Occult; Philter; Physiognomy; Prime mover.

Philosophical distinctions. Accident; Actuality; Animal and vegetal; Cause; Contingence; Election; Ex traduce; Form; Generation and corruption; Genus and species; Inseparable and individual; Intellect; Matter; Mediocrity; Metempsychosis; Microcosm; Reason; Schoolmen; Sensible; Soul; Synderesis; Will and nill.

Religion and conscience. Anchorite; Carnal presumption; Casuists; Charity; Conscience; Cure; Despair; Desperate; Divine; Election and reprobation; Enthusiasm; Epicure; Faith and assurance; Grace; Hope; Mortification; Precise; Professor; Religion and superstition; Religious melancholy; Salvation; Satisfaction; Scruple; Supererogation; Temptation; Venial sin; Zeal.

Social life and institutions. Abraham men; Affinity and consanguinity; Ambodexter; Bawd; Calling; Church patronage; Clown; Commonwealth; Continence; Counterfeit; Custom and education; Dowry and jointure; Estate; Gossip; Hospital; Legal evidence; Living and preferment; Luxurious and riot; Mistress; Mortmain; Parasite; Policy; Proletary; Quean and slut; Sodomy; Suit; Temporize; Usury; Venery; Wittal and cuckold.

Words with changing senses. Abdicate; Absolute; Absolve; Admire; Apologize; Artificial; Baffle; Bewray; Bowels; Brave; Careful; Carriage; Censure; Collogue; Comfortable; Commodity; Complement; Confer and conference; Conversation; Crased; Curiosity; Defecate; Entertain; Explode; Exquisite; Fact; Familiar; Favour and feature; Feral; Fond; Fulsome; Generous; Glass; Happily; Homely; Honest; Idiot; Impertinent; Impotent; Indifferent; Judicial and judicious; Just; Lust and lusty; Macerate; Make away; Manure; Meat; Nice; Ordinary; Painful; Parable; Pine apple; Plausible; Present; Prevent; Privy; Proper; Secure; Silly; Simple; Still; Stupid; Tables; Tax; Tires and weeds; Virtue; Voluntary.

Source record

The principal witness is the sixth edition of 1651 in the McGill University Library copy. Printed labels, sequential positions and scan pages are recorded separately below. The supplied opening and its comparison witnesses are identified first. The Note on the Text explains the editorial treatment; the records here preserve the local documentary locations.

McGill 1651 copy

BSB 1651 supplied opening

Independent 1651 comparison microfilm

The supplied opening

Printed pages 98–99 are absent between base PDF199 and200; repeated96–97 are recorded as printed, not silently renumbered.

Supplied text: “anguish, and vexation” through “sur-”; base resumption: “prized at unawares”.

Supplied witness: 10330491bsb, Archive leaves n191, n192.

Independent comparison: bim_early-english-books-1641-1700_the-anatomy-of-melanchol_burton-robert_1651, Archive leaves n197, n198.

Image identities and SHA256 checksums:

- block39-source-197.png: `5356a469d0eda7b9523852c31a9fda797d8036ea1c502bba8977d4f09be30a17`
- block39-source-198.png: `7945dd1dda7c58e56bf000f608b6a8d90419201b7786c6c090e45d7a413a890a`
- block40-source-199.png: `3f0f8ecd789be3c6b8c6a1233836ef22b80fc5f2abe15ff87874c332dfa96f10`
- block40-source-200.png: `3017833fc6e41c9b4d29296ec4a64b8a587d620d054507877c43012dccd21b5f`
- bsb1651-page191.jpg: `377c22683bc63bf2df9d48a9ebf4db6fdf6d3c9abbd4d64494d4b4c56c5a07cb`
- bsb1651-page192.jpg: `6394190e1b1a8de1ce2adea6ac929aaf1b0b27678b21823f2e897834d716d98e`
- alternate1651-page197.jpg: `04bcb08a438cb6b3a5f7a435014f241094f09504290a914c800651795d48afd6`
- alternate1651-page198.jpg: `1698e3d920e6d418f748ba7e2323885480f19833cdf4dceba9d5d65a97fa1716`

Passages DJR-170-01 to DJR-170-57

Source page labels: unnumbered preliminary matter. Scan pages: 7, 8, 9, 11, 13, 14, 15, 16.

Scan 7; printed unnumbered; image block170-source-007.png. Half-title. Entire printed text included. Show-through excluded.

Scan 8; printed unnumbered; image block170-source-008.png. Entire Argument of the Frontispiece, 84 verse lines, all numbered panels and final address. Source typography and display breaks retained.

Scan 9; printed unnumbered; image block170-source-009.png. Central engraved title, Horatian motto, imprint, date, engraver signature and all ten panel captions transcribed and translated. Facsimile preserves spatial arrangement, image and symbols.

Scan 11; printed unnumbered; image block170-source-011.png. Entire Latin dedication, including DOMINO SUO missed by OCR; set continuously. Source uppercase U/V and I/J conventions mechanically normalized.

Scan 13; printed unnumbered; image block170-source-013.png. Heading, 46 lines of Latin address and its one Latin marginal note. Obscured portions of lines 5–7 collated with later Latin witness. Source ausum retained, intended sense noted.

Scan 14; printed unnumbered; image block170-source-014.png. Remaining 44 lines of Latin address. Running head omitted. Non minus retained literally and interpretive uncertainty recorded.

Scan 15; printed unnumbered; image block170-source-015.png. Greek and English Abstract heading and six eight-line stanzas. Printed walking and places preserved. Modern lie awake explicitly recorded as probable error correction.

Scan 16; printed unnumbered; image block170-source-016.png. Six concluding eight-line stanzas of Abstract. Entire source text before Gentle Reader in Block 001 is now included.

Opening words: THE ANATOMIE OF MELANCHOLY.

Closing words: Naught so damn’d as Melancholy.

Passages DJR-001-01 to DJR-001-11

Source page labels: 1–3. Scan pages: 17, 18, 19.

Passages DJR-002-01 to DJR-002-14

Source page labels: 3–5. Scan pages: 19, 20, 21.

Passages DJR-003-01 to DJR-003-14

Source page labels: 5–6. Scan pages: 21, 22.

Passages DJR-004-01 to DJR-004-15

Source page labels: 6–8. Scan pages: 22, 23, 24.

Passages DJR-005-01 to DJR-005-29

Source page labels: 8–13. Scan pages: 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29.

Passages DJR-006-01 to DJR-006-28

Source page labels: 13–17. Scan pages: 29, 30, 31, 32, 33.

Passages DJR-007-01 to DJR-007-26

Source page labels: 17–22. Scan pages: 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38.

Passages DJR-008-01 to DJR-008-24

Source page labels: 22–26. Scan pages: 38, 39, 40, 41, 42.

Passages DJR-009-01 to DJR-009-30

Source page labels: 27–32. Scan pages: 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48.

Passages DJR-010-01 to DJR-010-29

Source page labels: 32–36. Scan pages: 48, 49, 50, 51, 52.

Passages DJR-011-01 to DJR-011-34

Source page labels: 37–41. Scan pages: 53, 54, 55, 56, 57.

Passages DJR-012-01 to DJR-012-39

Source page labels: 41–46. Scan pages: 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62.

Passages DJR-013-01 to DJR-013-42

Source page labels: 46–51. Scan pages: 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67.

Passages DJR-014-01 to DJR-014-39

Source page labels: 51–56. Scan pages: 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72.

Passages DJR-015-01 to DJR-015-41

Source page labels: 56–61. Scan pages: 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77.

Passages DJR-016-01 to DJR-016-43

Source page labels: 61–66. Scan pages: 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82.

Passages DJR-017-01 to DJR-017-48

Source page labels: 66–71. Scan pages: 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87.

Passages DJR-018-01 to DJR-018-41

Source page labels: 71–74. Scan pages: 87, 88, 89, 90.

Passages DJR-019-01 to DJR-019-42

Source page labels: 74–78. Scan pages: 90, 91, 92, 93, 94.

Passages DJR-020-01 to DJR-020-63

Source page labels: unnumbered, after 78. Scan pages: 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

Passages DJR-021-01 to DJR-021-45

Source page labels: 1–6. Scan pages: 101, 102, 103, 104, 105, 106.

Passages DJR-022-01 to DJR-022-39

Source page labels: 6–11. Scan pages: 106, 107, 108, 109, 110, 111.

Passages DJR-023-01 to DJR-023-47

Source page labels: 11–16. Scan pages: 111, 112, 113, 114, 115, 116.

Passages DJR-024-01 to DJR-024-36

Source page labels: 16–21. Scan pages: 116, 117, 118, 119, 120, 121.

Passages DJR-025-01 to DJR-025-34

Source page labels: 21–25. Scan pages: 121, 122, 123, 124, 125.

Passages DJR-026-01 to DJR-026-50

Source page labels: 26–30. Scan pages: 126, 127, 128, 129, 130.

Passages DJR-027-01 to DJR-027-61

Source page labels: 31–37. Scan pages: 131, 132, 133, 134, 135, 136, 137.

Passages DJR-028-01 to DJR-028-48

Source page labels: 37–41. Scan pages: 137, 138, 139, 140, 141.

Passages DJR-029-01 to DJR-029-50

Source page labels: 41–46. Scan pages: 141, 142, 143, 144, 145, 146.

Passages DJR-030-01 to DJR-030-48

Source page labels: 46–51. Scan pages: 146, 147, 148, 149, 150, 151.

Passages DJR-031-01 to DJR-031-55

Source page labels: 51–57. Scan pages: 151, 152, 153, 154, 155, 156, 157.

Passages DJR-032-01 to DJR-032-49

Source page labels: 57–62. Scan pages: 157, 158, 159, 160, 161, 162.

Passages DJR-033-01 to DJR-033-53

Source page labels: 63–67. Scan pages: 163, 164, 165, 166, 167.

Passages DJR-034-01 to DJR-034-47

Source page labels: 68–72. Scan pages: 168, 169, 170, 171, 172.

Passages DJR-035-01 to DJR-035-55

Source page labels: 72–77. Scan pages: 172, 173, 174, 175, 176, 177.

Passages DJR-036-01 to DJR-036-38

Source page labels: 77–82. Scan pages: 177, 178, 179, 180, 181, 182.

Passages DJR-037-01 to DJR-037-37

Source page labels: 83–87. Scan pages: 183, 184, 185, 186, 187.

Passages DJR-038-01 to DJR-038-41

Source page labels: 87–92. Scan pages: 187, 188, 189, 190, 191, 192.

Passages DJR-039-01 to DJR-039-34

Source page labels: 92–96. Scan pages: 192, 193, 194, 195, 196.

Passages DJR-040-01 to DJR-040-37

Source page labels: 97 then repeated 96–97 and 98–100. Scan pages: 197, 198, 199, 200.
Scan 197; printed 97; image block39-source-197.png.
Scan 198; printed 96 repeated; image block39-source-198.png.
Scan 199; printed 97 repeated; image block40-source-199.png.
Scan 200; printed 100; image block40-source-200.png.

Passages DJR-041-01 to DJR-041-37

Source page labels: 100–105. Scan pages: 200, 201, 202, 203, 204, 205.
Scan 200; printed 100; image block40-source-200.png.
Scan 201; printed 101; image block41-source-201.png.
Scan 202; printed 102; image block41-source-202.png.
Scan 203; printed 103; image block41-source-203.png.
Scan 204; printed 104; image block41-source-204.png.
Scan 205; printed 105; image block41-source-205.png.
Opening words: Subsect. 7. Envy, Malice, Hatred, Causes.
Closing words: Good Lord deliver us.

Passages DJR-042-01 to DJR-042-43

Source page labels: 105–110. Scan pages: 205, 206, 207, 208, 209, 210.
Scan 205; printed 105; image block41-source-205.png.
Scan 206; printed 106; image block41-source-206.png.
Scan 207; printed 107; image block42-source-207.png.
Scan 208; printed 108; image block42-source-208.png.
Scan 209; printed 109; image block42-source-209.png.
Scan 210; printed 110; image block42-source-210.png.
Opening words: Subsect. 10. Discontents, Cares, Miseries, &c. causes.
Closing words: full of cares, woes, and miseries?

Passages DJR-043-01 to DJR-043-40

Source page labels: 110–115 (112 misnumbered 122). Scan pages: 210, 211, 212, 213, 214, 215.
Scan 210; printed 110; image block42-source-210.png.

Scan 211; printed 111; image block42-source-211.png.

Scan 212; printed 112 [printed 122]; image block43-source-212.png.

Scan 213; printed 113; image block43-source-213.png.

Scan 214; printed 114; image block43-source-214.png.

Scan 215; printed 115; image block43-source-215.png.

Opening words: If this be not a sufficient proof of their discontent and misery, examine every condition and calling apart.

Closing words: but an extraordinary delight they take in riches?

Passages DJR-044-01 to DJR-044-42

Source page labels: 115–120. Scan pages: 215, 216, 217, 218, 219, 220.

Scan 215; printed 115; image block43-source-215.png.

Scan 216; printed 116; image block44-source-216.png.

Scan 217; printed 117; image block44-source-217.png.

Scan 218; printed 118; image block44-source-218.png.

Scan 219; printed 119; image block44-source-219.png.

Scan 220; printed 120; image block44-source-220.png.

Opening words: This may seem plausible at first shew, a popular and strong argument; but let him that so thinks, consider better of it,

Closing words: to the utter undoing of their Families.

Passages DJR-045-01 to DJR-045-50

Source page labels: 120–125. Scan pages: 220, 221, 222, 223, 224, 225.

Scan 220; printed 120; sequence 120; image block44-source-220.png.

Scan 221; printed 121; sequence 121; image block44-source-221.png.

Scan 222; printed 122; sequence 122; image block45-source-222.png.

Scan 223; printed 113; sequence 123; image block45-source-223.png.

Scan 224; printed 124; sequence 124; image block45-source-224.png.

Scan 225; printed 125; sequence 125; image block45-source-225.png.

Opening words: I may not here omit those two main plagues, and common dotages of humane kinde, Wine and Women, which have infatuated and besotted Myriades of people:

Closing words: It makes them fat and lean, as frost doth Conies.

Passages DJR-046-01 to DJR-046-42

Source page labels: 125–130. Scan pages: 225, 226, 227, 228, 229, 230.

Scan 225; printed 125; sequence 125; image block45-source-225.png.

Scan 226; printed 126; sequence 126; image block45-source-226.png.

Scan 227; printed 127; sequence 127; image block45-source-227.png.

Scan 228; printed 128; sequence 128; image block46-source-228.png.

Scan 229; printed 129; sequence 129; image block46-source-229.png.

Scan 230; printed 130; sequence 130; image block46-source-230.png.

Opening words: And who is that mortal man that can so containe himself, that if he be immoderately commended, and applauded, will not be moved?

Closing words: they are most part harmless, honest, upright, innocent, plain dealing men.

Passages DJR-047-01 to DJR-047-42

Source page labels: 130–135. Scan pages: 230, 231, 232, 233, 234, 235.

Scan 230; printed 130; sequence 130; image block46-source-230.png.

Scan 231; printed 131; sequence 131; image block47-source-231.png.

Scan 232; printed 132; sequence 132; image block47-source-232.png.

Scan 233; printed 133; sequence 133; image block47-source-233.png.

Scan 234; printed 134; sequence 134; image block47-source-234.png.

Scan 235; printed 135; sequence 135; image block47-source-235.png.

Opening words: Now because they are commonly subject to such hazards, and inconveniences, as dotage, madness, simplicity, &c.

Closing words: scientiæ nomen, tot sumptibus partum & vigiliis, profiteri dispudeat, postquam &c.

Passages DJR-048-01 to DJR-048-43

Source page labels: 135–139. Scan pages: 235, 236, 237, 238, 239.

Scan 235; printed 135; sequence 135; image block47-source-235.png.

Scan 236; printed 136; sequence 136; image block48-source-236.png.

Scan 237; printed 137; sequence 137; image block48-source-237.png.

Scan 238; printed 138; sequence 138; image block48-source-238.png.

Scan 239; printed 139; sequence 139; image block48-source-239.png.

Opening words: Last of all to come to our Divines, the most noble profession and worthy of double honor, but of all others the most distressed and miserable.

Closing words: and 'tis a true saying still.

Passages DJR-049-01 to DJR-049-39

Source page labels: 139–143 (sequence; 142 printed 128). Scan pages: 239, 240, 241, 242, 243.

Scan 239; printed 139; sequence 139; image block48-source-239.png.

Scan 240; printed 140; sequence 140; image block48-source-240.png.

Scan 241; printed no visible numeral; sequence 141; image block48-source-241.png.

Scan 242; printed 128; sequence 142; image block48-source-242.png.

Scan 243; printed no visible numeral; sequence 143; image block49-source-243.png.

Opening words: Yet oftentimes I may not deny it the main fault is in our selves.

Closing words: and daily converse with a company of Idiots and Clownes.

Passages DJR-050-01 to DJR-050-55

Source page labels: 143–149 (sequence; last five printed141–145). Scan pages: 243, 244, 245, 246, 247, 248, 249.

Scan 243; printed no visible numeral; sequence 143; image block49-source-243.png.

Scan 244; printed no visible numeral; sequence 144; image block49-source-244.png.

Scan 245; printed 141; sequence 145; image block50-source-245.png.

Scan 246; printed 142; sequence 146; image block50-source-246.png.

Scan 247; printed 143; sequence 147; image block50-source-247.png.

Scan 248; printed 144; sequence 148; image block50-source-248.png.

Scan 249; printed 145; sequence 149; image block50-source-249.png.

Opening words: Nos interim quod attinet (nec enim immunes ab hac noxâ sumus) idem reatus manet

Closing words: doth no other, then that he be a learned fool, or a sickly wise man.

Passages DJR-051-01 to DJR-051-54

Source page labels: 146–151 (sequence150–155). Scan pages: 250, 251, 252, 253, 254, 255.

Scan 250; printed 146; sequence 150; image block50-source-250.png.

Scan 251; printed 147; sequence 151; image block51-source-251.png.

Scan 252; printed 148; sequence 152; image block51-source-252.png.

Scan 253; printed 149; sequence 153; image block51-source-253.png.

Scan 254; printed 150; sequence 154; image block51-source-254.png.

Scan 255; printed 151; sequence 155; image block51-source-255.png.

Opening words: SUBSECT. 3. Terrors and Affrights, Causes of Melancholy.

Closing words: little content and charity, much virulency, hatred, malice, and disquietnesse among us.

Passages DJR-052-01 to DJR-052-42

Source page labels: 152–156 (sequence156–160). Scan pages: 256, 257, 258, 259, 260.

Scan 256; printed 152; sequence 156; image block51-source-256.png.
Scan 257; printed 153; sequence 157; image block52-source-257.png.
Scan 258; printed 154; sequence 158; image block52-source-258.png.
Scan 259; printed 155; sequence 159; image block52-source-259.png.
Scan 260; printed 156; sequence 160; image block52-source-260.png.
Opening words: SUBSECT. 5. Loss of liberty, servitude, imprisonment, how they cause Melancholy.
Closing words: and take place by reason of his outward habit.

Passages DJR-053-01 to DJR-053-51

Source page labels: 156–161 (sequence160–165). Scan pages: 260, 261, 262, 263, 264, 265.
Scan 260; printed 156; sequence 160; image block52-source-260.png.
Scan 261; printed 157; sequence 161; image block52-source-261.png.
Scan 262; printed 158; sequence 162; image block52-source-262.png.
Scan 263; printed 159; sequence 163; image block53-source-263.png.
Scan 264; printed 160; sequence 164; image block53-source-264.png.
Scan 265; printed 161; sequence 165; image block53-source-265.png.
Opening words: But on the contrary, if he be poor, Prov. 15.15. all his days are miserable Closing words: feed me with food convenient for me.

Passages DJR-054-01 to DJR-054-51

Source page labels: 161–165 (sequence165–169). Scan pages: 265, 266, 267, 268, 269.
Scan 265; printed 161; sequence 165; image block53-source-265.png.
Scan 266; printed 162; sequence 166; image block53-source-266.png.
Scan 267; printed 163; sequence 167; image block54-source-267.png.
Scan 268; printed 164; sequence 168; image block54-source-268.png.
Scan 269; printed 165; sequence 169; image block54-source-269.png.
Opening words: SUBSECT. 7. An heap of other Accidents causing Melancholy, Death of Friends, losses, &c.
Closing words: riches do not so much exhilarate us with their possession, as they torment us with their loss.

Passages DJR-055-01 to DJR-055-45

Source page labels: 165–169 (sequence169–173). Scan pages: 269, 270, 271, 272, 273.
Scan 269; printed 165; sequence 169; image block54-source-269.png.
Scan 270; printed 166; sequence 170; image block54-source-270.png.
Scan 271; printed 167; sequence 171; image block54-source-271.png.
Scan 272; printed 168; sequence 172; image block55-source-272.png.
Scan 273; printed 169; sequence 173; image block55-source-273.png.
Opening words: Next to Sorrow still I may annex such accidents as procure Fear;
Closing words: what offence had he done, that he should marry again?

Passages DJR-056-01 to DJR-056-59

Source page labels: 169–174 (sequence173–178). Scan pages: 273, 274, 275, 276, 277, 278.
Scan 273; printed 169; sequence 173; image block55-source-273.png.
Scan 274; printed 170; sequence 174; image block56-source-274.png.
Scan 275; printed 171; sequence 175; image block56-source-275.png.
Scan 276; printed 172; sequence 176; image block56-source-276.png.
Scan 277; printed 173; sequence 177; image block56-source-277.png.
Scan 278; printed 174; sequence 178; image block56-source-278.png.
Opening words: Unkinde, unnatural friends, evil neighbors, bad servants, debts and debates, &c.
Closing words: according to Laurentius, as coming from a more inevitable cause.

Passages DJR-057-01 to DJR-057-51

Source page labels: 174–178 (sequence178–182). Scan pages: 278, 279, 280, 281, 282.
Scan 278; printed 174; sequence 178; image block56-source-278.png.
Scan 279; printed 175; sequence 179; image block57-source-279.png.
Scan 280; printed 176; sequence 180; image block57-source-280.png.
Scan 281; printed 177; sequence 181; image block57-source-281.png.
Scan 282; printed 178; sequence 182; image block57-source-282.png.
Opening words: SUBSECT. 2. Distemperature of particular Parts, causes.
Closing words: if sick and poor, moderate thy self. I have said.

Passages DJR-058-01 to DJR-058-51

Source page labels: 178–183 (sequence182–187). Scan pages: 282, 283, 284, 285, 286, 287.
Scan 282; printed 178; sequence 182; image block57-source-282.png.
Scan 283; printed 179; sequence 183; image block57-source-283.png.
Scan 284; printed 180; sequence 184; image block57-source-284.png.
Scan 285; printed 181; sequence 185; image block58-source-285.png.
Scan 286; printed 182; sequence 186; image block58-source-286.png.
Scan 287; printed 183; sequence 187; image block58-source-287.png.
Opening words: SECT. 3. MEMB. 1. SUBSECT. 1. Symptomes, or signs of Melancholy in the Body.
Closing words: this fear ever molesteth, and so long as melancholy lasteth, cannot be avoided.

Passages DJR-059-01 to DJR-059-53

Source page labels: 183–188 and 190 (sequence187–193). Scan pages: 287, 288, 289, 290, 291, 292, 293.
Scan 287; printed 183; sequence 187; image block58-source-287.png.
Scan 288; printed 184; sequence 188; image block58-source-288.png.
Scan 289; printed 185; sequence 189; image block59-source-289.png.
Scan 290; printed 186; sequence 190; image block59-source-290.png.
Scan 291; printed 187; sequence 191; image block59-source-291.png.
Scan 292; printed 188; sequence 192; image block59-source-292.png.
Scan 293; printed 190; sequence 193; image block59-source-293.png.
Opening words: Sorrow is the other Character, and inseparable companion
Closing words: to bring them into some order; and so descend to particulars.

Passages DJR-060-01 to DJR-060-37

Source page labels: 190 twice then 191–194 (sequence193–198). Scan pages: 293, 294, 295, 296, 297, 298.
Scan 293; printed 190 [first occurrence]; sequence 193; image block59-source-293.png.
Scan 294; printed 190 [second occurrence]; sequence 194; image block60-source-294.png.
Scan 295; printed 191; sequence 195; image block60-source-295.png.
Scan 296; printed 192; sequence 196; image block60-source-296.png.
Scan 297; printed 193; sequence 197; image block60-source-297.png.
Scan 298; printed 194; sequence 198; image block60-source-298.png.
Opening words: SUBSECT. 3. Particular Symptomes from the influence of Stars, parts of the body, & humors.
Closing words: Sed abunde fabularum audivimus.

Passages DJR-061-01 to DJR-061-30

Source page labels: 194–198 (sequence198–202). Scan pages: 298, 299, 300, 301, 302.
Scan 298; printed 194; sequence 198; image block60-source-298.png.
Scan 299; printed 195; sequence 199; image block60-source-299.png.
Scan 300; printed 196; sequence 200; image block60-source-300.png.
Scan 301; printed 197; sequence 201; image block61-source-301.png.

Scan 302; printed 198; sequence 202; image block61-source-302.png.

Opening words: SUBSECT. 4. Symptomes from Education, custome, continuance of time, our condition, mixt with other diseases, by fits, inclination, &c.

Closing words: to be more circumspect and wary in the midst of these dangers.

Passages DJR-062-01 to DJR-062-32

Source page labels: 198–202 (sequence202–206). Scan pages: 302, 303, 304, 305, 306.

Scan 302; printed 198; sequence 202; image block61-source-302.png.

Scan 303; printed 199; sequence 203; image block61-source-303.png.

Scan 304; printed 200; sequence 204; image block62-source-304.png.

Scan 305; printed 201; sequence 205; image block62-source-305.png.

Scan 306; printed 202; sequence 206; image block62-source-306.png.

Opening words: MEMB. 2. SUBSECT. 1. Symptomes of Head-Melancholy.

Closing words: and is not so permanent as other melancholy.

Passages DJR-063-01 to DJR-063-26

Source page labels: 202–206 (sequence206–210). Scan pages: 306, 307, 308, 309, 310.

Scan 306; printed 202; sequence 206; image block62-source-306.png.

Scan 307; printed 203; sequence 207; image block62-source-307.png.

Scan 308; printed 204; sequence 208; image block62-source-308.png.

Scan 309; printed 205; sequence 209; image block63-source-309.png.

Scan 310; printed 206; sequence 210; image block63-source-310.png.

Opening words: But to leave this brief description, the most ordinary symptomes be these, pulsatio juxta dorsum, a beating about the back, which is almost perpetuall,

Closing words: or him that is wounded, not to feel pain.

Passages DJR-064-01 to DJR-064-30

Source page labels: 206–211 (sequence210–215). Scan pages: 310, 311, 312, 313, 314, 315.

Scan 310; printed 206; sequence 210; image block63-source-310.png.

Scan 311; printed 207; sequence 211; image block63-source-311.png.

Scan 312; printed 208; sequence 212; image block64-source-312.png.

Scan 313; printed 209; sequence 213; image block64-source-313.png.

Scan 314; printed 210; sequence 214; image block64-source-314.png.

Scan 315; printed 211; sequence 215; image block64-source-315.png.

Opening words: Suspicion follows Fear and Sorrow at heels, arising out of the same fountaine, so thinks Fracastorius, that Fear is the cause of Suspicion, and still they suspect some treachery, or some secret machination to be framed against them, Closing words: a reason of which Blancanus in his Echometria gives, and mathematically demonstrates.

Passages DJR-065-01 to DJR-065-34

Source page labels: 211–215 (sequence215–219). Scan pages: 315, 316, 317, 318, 319.

Scan 315; printed 211; sequence 215; image block64-source-315.png.

Scan 316; printed 212; sequence 216; image block64-source-316.png.

Scan 317; printed 213; sequence 217; image block65-source-317.png.

Scan 318; printed 214; sequence 218; image block65-source-318.png.

Scan 319; printed 215; sequence 219; image block65-source-319.png.

Opening words: So that the hearing is as frequently deluded as the sight, from the same causes almost, as he that hears bels, will make them sound what he list.

Closing words: for so doth Lilius Geraldus interpret it, of anxieties, and those griping cares, and so ought it to be understood.

Passages DJR-066-01 to DJR-066-23

Source page labels: 215–217, 454 (sequence219–222). Scan pages: 319, 320, 321, 322.

Scan 319; printed 215; sequence 219; image block65-source-319.png.

Scan 320; printed 216; sequence 220; image block65-source-320.png.

Scan 321; printed 217; sequence 221; image block66-source-321.png.

Scan 322; printed 454; sequence 222; image block66-source-322.png.

Opening words: In all other maladies, we seek for help, if a leg or an arm ake, through any distemperature or wound, or that we have an ordinary disease, above all things whatsoever, we desire help & health, a present recovery;

Closing words: FINIS.

Passages DJR-067-01 to DJR-067-53

Source page labels: unnumbered synopsis;216,220–221 (sequence 223–229). Scan pages: 323, 324, 325, 326, 327, 328, 329.

Scan 323; printed unnumbered; sequence 223; image block66-source-323.png.

Scan 324; printed unnumbered; sequence 224; image block66-source-324.png.

Scan 325; printed unnumbered; sequence 225; image block67-source-325.png.

Scan 326; printed unnumbered; sequence 226; image block67-source-326.png.

Scan 327; printed 216; sequence 227; image block67-source-327.png.

Scan 328; printed 220; sequence 228; image block67-source-328.png.

Scan 329; printed 221; sequence 229; image block67-source-329.png.

Opening words: THE SYNOPSIS OF THE SECOND PARTITION.

Closing words: you shall finde many vain and frivolous superstitious formes of exorcismes among them, not to be tolerated, or endured.

Passages DJR-068-01 to DJR-068-43

Source page labels: 222–226 (sequence 230–234). Scan pages: 330, 331, 332, 333, 334.

Scan 330; printed 222; sequence 230; image block67-source-330.png. all body and margins.

Scan 331; printed 223; sequence 231; image block68-source-331.png. all body and margins.

Scan 332; printed 224; sequence 232; image block68-source-332.png. all body and margins.

Scan 333; printed 225; sequence 233; image block68-source-333.png. all body and margins.

Scan 334; printed 226; sequence 234; image block68-source-334.png. Member3 conclusion only; margins x,y,z,a,b; exclude Member4 and margin c onward.

Opening words: MEMB. 2. Lawfull Cures, first from God.

Closing words: why should we then seek to any other but to him?

Passages DJR-069-01 to DJR-069-42

Source page labels: 226–230 (sequence 234–238). Scan pages: 334, 335, 336, 337, 338.

Scan 334; printed 226; sequence 234; image block68-source-334.png. Member4 Subsection1 only; margins c,d,e,f; exclude preceding Member3 and margins x,y,z,a,b.

Scan 335; printed 227; sequence 235; image block68-source-335.png. all body and margins.

Scan 336; printed 228; sequence 236; image block68-source-336.png. all body and margins.

Scan 337; printed 229; sequence 237; image block69-source-337.png. all body and margins.

Scan 338; printed 230; sequence 238; image block69-source-338.png. Subsection2 conclusion only; margins *,m,n,o; exclude Subsection3 and margins p,q.

Opening words: MEMB. 4. SUBSECT. 1. Physician, Patient, Physick.

Closing words: shall surely be much eased, if not throughly cured.

Passages DJR-070-01 to DJR-070-49

Source page labels: 230–234 (sequence 238–242). Scan pages: 338, 339, 340, 341, 342.

Scan 338; printed 230; sequence 238; image block69-source-338.png. Subsection3 heading and body only, with margins p,q; exclude preceding Subsection2 and margins *,m,n,o.

Scan 339; printed 231; sequence 239; image block69-source-339.png. all body and margins.

Scan 340; printed 232; sequence 240; image block69-source-340.png. all body and margins.

Scan 341; printed 233; sequence 241; image block69-source-341.png. all body and margins.

Scan 342; printed 234; sequence 242; image block70-source-342.png. Section2 Member1 Subsection1 through rosewater paragraph only; margins s,t,u,x,y,z,a,b,c; exclude following Subsection2 heading/body and margins e,f.

Opening words: SUBSECT. 3. Concerning Physick.

Closing words: it is in so great request with them.

Passages DJR-071-01 to DJR-071-48

Source page labels: 234–239 (sequence 242–247). Scan pages: 342, 343, 344, 345, 346, 347.

Scan 342; printed 234; sequence 242; image block70-source-342.png. Subsection2 heading and body only, with margins e,f; exclude preceding food/water/rosewater passage and its margins.

Scan 343; printed 235; sequence 243; image block70-source-343.png. all body and margins.

Scan 344; printed 236; sequence 244; image block70-source-344.png. all body and margins.

Scan 345; printed 237; sequence 245; image block71-source-345.png. all body and margins.

Scan 346; printed 238; sequence 246; image block71-source-346.png. all body and margins.

Scan 347; printed 239; sequence 247; image block71-source-347.png. through As for sweating paragraph only; include margins u,x,y,z,a,b,c,d,e,asterisk; exclude Immoderate Venus paragraph and margins f,g,h.

Opening words: SUBSECT. 2. Dyet rectified in quantity.

Closing words: I shall elsewhere more opportunely speak of them.

Passages DJR-072-01 to DJR-072-42

Source page labels: 239–243 (sequence 247–251). Scan pages: 347, 348, 349, 350, 351.

Scan 347; printed 239; sequence 247; image block71-source-347.png. Begin Immoderate Venus; include margins f,g,h only; preceding bathing discussion belongs to071.

Scan 348; printed 240; sequence 248; image block71-source-348.png. all body and margins.

Scan 349; printed 241; sequence 249; image block72-source-349.png. all body and margins.

Scan 350; printed 242; sequence 250; image block72-source-350.png. all body and margins.

Scan 351; printed 243; sequence 251; image block72-source-351.png. End and so they get them gon; include margins y,z,p,q,t,asterisk,r; exclude Many strange places and bottom margins m,n.

Opening words: Immoderate Venus in excess, as it is a cause, or in defect;

Closing words: and so they get them gon.

Passages DJR-073-01 to DJR-073-40

Source page labels: 243–248 (sequence 251–256). Scan pages: 351, 352, 353, 354, 355, 356.

Scan 351; printed 243; sequence 251; image block72-source-351.png. Begin Many strange places; include only the final two marginal containers m and n; preceding text belongs to072.

Scan 352; printed 244; sequence 252; image block72-source-352.png. all body and margins.

Scan 353; printed 245; sequence 253; image block72-source-353.png. all body and margins.

Scan 354; printed 246; sequence 254; image block72-source-354.png. all body and margins.

Scan 355; printed 247; sequence 255; image block73-source-355.png. all body and margins.

Scan 356; printed 248; sequence 256; image block73-source-356.png. Opening continuation only through keep it self from cold; no marginal containers included; begin074 at Our Climes breed lice and its Lansius asterisk.

Opening words: Many strange places, Isthmi, Euripi, Chersonesi, creekes, havens, promontories, straights, lakes, bathes, rocks, mountaines, places, and fields, Closing words: and once heated like an oven will keep it self from cold?

Passages DJR-074-01 to DJR-074-36

Source page labels: 248–252 (sequence 256–260). Scan pages: 356, 357, 358, 359, 360.

Scan 356; printed 248; sequence 256; image block73-source-356.png. Begin Our Climes breed lice after keep it self from cold; all seven margins included.

Scan 357; printed 249; sequence 257; image block74-source-357.png. all body and margins.

Scan 358; printed 250; sequence 258; image block74-source-358.png. all body and margins.

Scan 359; printed 251; sequence 259; image block74-source-359.png. all body and margins.

Scan 360; printed 252; sequence 260; image block74-source-360.png. Opening continuation and the next sentence about flight, through and see what is done amongst them; no margins on this page included.

Opening words: Our Climes breed lice, Hungary and Ireland malè audiunt in this kinde;

Closing words: and see what is done amongst them.

Passages DJR-075-01 to DJR-075-38

Source page labels: 252–256 (sequence 260–264). Scan pages: 360, 361, 362, 363, 364.

Scan 360; printed 252; sequence 260; image block74-source-360.png. Begin Whether there be generation and corruption, after the074 telescope/wings sentence; all seven margins included.

Scan 361; printed 253; sequence 261; image block74-source-361.png. all body and margins.

Scan 362; printed 254; sequence 262; image block75-source-362.png. all body and margins.

Scan 363; printed 255; sequence 263; image block75-source-363.png. all body and margins.

Scan 364; printed 256; sequence 264; image block75-source-364.png. Opening continuation through reformes some, and marres all, after the Horace verse; margins t, u and unnumbered Lugduni1633 included; x and final asterisk excluded.

Opening words: Whether there be generation and corruption, as some think,

Closing words: reformes some, and marres all.

Passages DJR-076-01 to DJR-076-34

Source page labels: 256–261 (261 supplied; sequence 264–269). Scan pages: 364, 365, 366, 367, 368, 369.

Scan 364; printed 256; sequence 264; image block75-source-364.png. Begin In the mean time, the World is tossed in a blanket amongst them; include final two margins x and asterisk.

Scan 365; printed 257; sequence 265; image block75-source-365.png. all body and margins.

Scan 366; printed 258; sequence 266; image block76-source-366.png. all body and margins.

Scan 367; printed 259; sequence 267; image block76-source-367.png. all body and margins.

Scan 368; printed 260; sequence 268; image block76-source-368.png. all body and margins.

Scan 369; printed [261; number not visible in scan]; sequence 269; image block76-source-369.png. Opening continuation through and all manner of pleasures; include x Lib.1.cap.2 only; later body and all other margins reserved for077.

Opening words: In the mean time, the World is tossed in a blanket amongst them,

Closing words: and all manner of pleasures.

Passages DJR-077-01 to DJR-077-35

Source page labels: 261–265 (261 supplied; sequence 269–273). Scan pages: 369, 370, 371, 372, 373.

Scan 369; printed [261; number not visible in scan]; sequence 269; image block76-source-369.png. Begin Perigort in France is barren, immediately after prior block ending and all manner of pleasures. Include y at Wadley through h at Cato; preceding x belongs to076.

Scan 370; printed 262; sequence 270; image block77-source-370.png. All body and margins, including footer marginal continuations on371.

Scan 371; printed 263; sequence 271; image block77-source-371.png. All body and margins, including footer marginal continuations on371.

Scan 372; printed 264; sequence 272; image block77-source-372.png. All body and margins, including footer marginal continuations on371.

Scan 373; printed 265; sequence 273; image block77-source-373.png. Opening continuation are infinite through and did most good. Include five margins dagger, o, p, q, r; exclude Member4 heading, body and margins.

Opening words: Perigort in France is barren, yet by reason of the excellency of the aire, Closing words: and did most good.

Passages DJR-078-01 to DJR-078-36

Source page labels: 265–270 (sequence273–278). Scan pages: 373, 374, 375, 376, 377, 378.

Scan 373; printed 265; sequence 273; image block77-source-373.png. Begin with Member4 heading. Include all following body and four margins s, dagger, asterisk, t; exclude prior Member3 body and its five margins. Final The Æ-continues gyptians on374.

Scan 374; printed 266; sequence 274; image block77-source-374.png. All body and seven margins u, x, dagger, asterisk, y, z, a. Final Ga- continues len on375.

Scan 375; printed 267; sequence 275; image block78-source-375.png. All body and eleven margins b, c, d, e, f, g, h, i, k, l, m. Include l continuation at foot and full m at foot. Unmatched body asterisk retained; g anchored at corresponding warning.

Scan 376; printed 268; sequence 276; image block78-source-376.png. All body and eleven margins n, dagger, o, p, q, r, s, t, u, x, y. Dagger bibliography has no clearly visible body marker and is anchored at books written of it.

Scan 377; printed 269; sequence 277; image block78-source-377.png. All body and seven margins z, a, b, c, asterisk, dagger, d; includes verse and garden paragraph through final and.

Scan 378; printed 270; sequence 278; image block78-source-378.png. Only opening completion: and various harmony of Birdes: Good God (saith he) what a company of pleasures hast thou made for man? No marginalia on this page are in scope. All following body and margins reserved for079.

Opening words: Memb. 4. Exercise rectified of Body and minde.

Closing words: what a company of pleasures hast thou made for man?

Passages DJR-079-01 to DJR-079-49

Source page labels: 270–274 (sequence278–282). Scan pages: 378, 379, 380, 381, 382.

Scan 378; printed 270; sequence 278; image block78-source-378.png. Begin He that should be admitted on a sudden, after078 final garden exclamation. All following body and all nine margins: dagger Diodorus, asterisk Aelian, e, f including its In utraque continuation, dagger Aurei panes, asterisk Lucan, dagger300 pellices, asterisk Ubi omnia, asterisk Odyssey delta. Final ocu- continues los itinerantium on379.

Scan 379; printed 271; sequence 279; image block78-source-379.png. All body and six margins: dagger Lucan8, dagger Iliad10, g, dagger Swertius, h, i. Final The very reading continues of feasts on380.

Scan 380; printed 272; sequence 280; image block79-source-380.png. All body and seven margins: dagger Modius, asterisk Josephus, dagger Procopius, asterisk Laet, dagger Amaseo, k, l. Final Nemean continues games on381.

Scan 381; printed 273; sequence 281; image block79-source-381.png. All body and nine margins m, n, o, p, q, r, s, t, u. Read long q and u completely. Final Turkie Gentle- continues women on382.

Scan 382; printed 274; sequence 282; image block79-source-382.png. Opening continuation women through Hic Veneri indulget, hunc decoquit alea. Include eight margins: x, dagger Miles4, dagger Prodromus, asterisk Pliny, dagger Horace, asterisk Caesar, asterisk Giovio, dagger Juvenal. Exclude final sentence beginning Many too nicely and margin y; both belong to080.

Opening words: He that should be admitted on a sudden to the sight of such a Palace as that of Escuriall in Spain,

Closing words: Hic Veneri indulget, hunc decoquit alea——

Passages DJR-080-01 to DJR-080-45

Source page labels: 274–279 (sequence 282–287). Scan pages: 382, 383, 384, 385, 386, 387.

Scan 382; printed 274; sequence 282; image block79-source-382.png. Begin final body sentence Many too nicely take exceptions, continuing the pastimes paragraph. Include final margin y only. Body ends such; mixt at the foot is a catchword, with the actual continuation mixt lusorious on383.

Scan 383; printed 275; sequence 283; image block79-source-383.png. All body and seven marginal containers: z Lemnius, a Abusus, b Ubi semel, c Instituitur, dagger Latrunculorum including Bellonius and Daniel Souter Palamedes book3 continuation at page foot, d Hayward, e Moscovit. Final much is a catchword; actual continuation much used on384.

Scan 384; printed 276; sequence 284; image block79-source-384.png. All body and seven margins: f Fez citizens, g Tullius, h Demorgent, i Polycrat1cap8, k Idem Sarisburiensis, dagger Histlib1, l Nemo including the complete long More passage. Final the life of continues most of on385.

Scan 385; printed 277; sequence 285; image block80-source-385.png. All body and four margins: dagger Rerum Burgund4, dagger Jussit hominem, m Quid interest Vives, n Henri Estienne preface. Final some- continues times on386.

Scan 386; printed 278; sequence 286; image block80-source-386.png. All body and four margins: dagger Orat12, o3 De anima, asterisk Iliad19, dagger Topogr Rom Part1. Final Golt- continues zius on387.

Scan 387; printed 279; sequence 287; image block80-source-387.png. Opening continuation zius through and he is a very block that is affected with none of them. Include six margins: dagger Quod heroum, asterisk Melanchthon, dagger Pluvines, asterisk Thibault, dagger As in travelling including Janus Bifrons, asterisk Cardan. Exclude final Hondius margin and next body sentence Some take an infinite delight; these belong to081.

Opening words: Many too nicely take exceptions at Cardes, Tables, and Dice, and such mixt lusorious lots, whom Gataker well confutes.

Closing words: and he is a very block that is affected with none of them.

Passages DJR-081-01 to DJR-081-42

Source page labels: 279–284 (sequence 287–292). Scan pages: 387, 388, 389, 390, 391, 392.

Scan 387; printed 279; sequence 287; image block80-source-387.png. Begin Some take an infinite delight, continuing the study paragraph. Include final asterisk Hondius margin only. Final body com- continues passe on388; the footer passe is a catchword.

Scan 388; printed 280; sequence 288; image block80-source-388.png. All body and nine margins: p Atlas, asterisk Cardan, q Plutarch, r Leonard Digges, dagger Hipperchen, dagger Cardan preface, t Poetices, dagger Horace3.9, dagger De Pelopones. Final Ger- continues belius on389.

Scan 389; printed 281; sequence 289; image block80-source-389.png. All body and five margins: asterisk Quos si integros, u Isaac Wake, x Si unquam, y Heinsius letter including all its long continuation, asterisk Erasmus. Final Li- continues brary on390.

Scan 390; printed 282; sequence 290; image block81-source-390.png. All body and six margins: asterisk Virgil, dagger Bodley founder, asterisk Nicholson Christ Church, z Animus levatur, asterisk sermon38, dagger homily4 including full quotation. Final body to continues the soul on391; the at the foot is a catchword.

Scan 391; printed 283; sequence 291; image block81-source-391.png. All body and thirteen margins a,b,c,d,e,f,g,h,i,k,l,m and asterisk Clavius. Jerome m continues lectione occupes. Masticat divinum pabulum meditatio along the page foot, followed by the complete Clavius note. Body ends in all; humane at the foot is a catchword and continues in the actual body on392.

Scan 392; printed 284; sequence 292; image block81-source-392.png. Opening humane disciplines through with infinite such. Include first two margins: dagger Colossus1080000 weight of brass; asterisk Vide Clavium in com. de Sacrobosco. Preserve ten/40320 and148456800000000; source digits checked in enlarged crop. Exclude following But in all nature and remaining two margins Distantias and Cap.4.&5; these belong to082.

Opening words: Some take an infinite delight to study the very languages wherein these books are written, Hebrew, Greek, Syriack, Chalde, Arabick, &c.

Closing words: with infinite such.

Passages DJR-082-01 to DJR-082-46

Source page labels: 284–289 (sequence 292–297). Scan pages: 392, 393, 394, 395, 396, 397.

Scan 392; printed 284; sequence 292; image block81-source-392.png. Begin But in all nature immediately after081 with infinite such. Include remaining two dagger margins Distantias cœlorum sola Optica dijudicat and Cap.4.&5. Last experi- continues ments on393; footer ments is catchword. Earlier body and first two margins belong to081.

Scan 393; printed 285; sequence 293; image block81-source-393.png. All body and six margins: dagger Printed at London1620, asterisk Late Astronomy-reader, dagger Printed London William Iones1623, asterisk Præfat Meth Astrol, n Tot tibi sunt dotes, asterisk Da pie Christe. Final or Scaliger continues Chrysolithus on394; footer Chrysolithus is catchword. Enlarged name crop verifies Entisberus.

Scan 394; printed 286; sequence 294; image block82-source-394.png. All body and four margins: dagger Chalonerus, asterisk Hortus Coronarius, o Plutarch extending along entire page foot, and p Ut pulchram also in footer. End of Member4. Footer Memb5 is catchword. Enlarged verse crop verifies abbreviated præsesq; expanded to præsesque; name crop verifies Cleppisius.

Scan 395; printed 287; sequence 295; image block82-source-395.png. Member5 heading and all body, including Ovid Latin and Burton English verse and final Horace verse. Nine margins q,r,asterisk Paracelsus,s,t,dagger Ter,u,x,dagger Horace. Footer Who is catchword.

Scan 396; printed 288; sequence 296; image block82-source-396.png. All body and eleven margins y,z,a,b,c,d,e,f,g,h,i. Ovid stands at end of a note. Printed i Aristæ hist is anchored at Petronius verse, apparently displaced from next Ptolemy anecdote; retained at printed anchor and explained. Footer For is catchword.

Scan 397; printed 289; sequence 297; image block82-source-397.png. Opening For that cause paragraph through I must refer you to a more convenient place, completing Member5. Four margins k,l,m,n; l continues across the foot below this paragraph, followed by m Icon and n Sect5. Exclude Member6 heading and all subsequent body and lower margins; these begin083.

Opening words: But in all nature what is there so stupend as to examine and calculate the motion of the planets, their magnitudes, apogeums, perigeums, excentricities, how far distant from the earth;

Closing words: I must refer you to a more convenient place.

Passages DJR-083-01 to DJR-083-43

Source page labels: 289–294 (sequence 297–302). Scan pages: 397, 398, 399, 400, 401, 402.

Scan 397; printed 289; sequence 297; image block82-source-397.png. Begin Member6 Subsection1 heading and complete subtitle. Opening sleep paragraph and k,l,m,n margins belong to082. Include all body after heading and five lower margins o,p,q,r,asterisk Disputat; last note continues across page foot. Final sufficiently continues informed on398; footer informed is catchword.

Scan 398; printed 290; sequence 298; image block82-source-398.png. All body, including Crato continuation, and three margins s,t,u. Final thinking of continues something else on399; footer something is catchword.

Scan 399; printed 291; sequence 299; image block82-source-399.png. All body, including three-line Latin verse, Burton's separate four-line English verse and separate Latin maxim. Six margins x,y,z,a,b,c. Final a melancholy continues man on400; footer man is catchword.

Scan 400; printed 292; sequence 300; image block83-source-400.png. All body and three margins d,e,f. Final Will pre- continues cipitated on401; footer ci- is catchword. In margin e, herili imperio read from the enlarged scan.

Scan 401; printed 293; sequence 301; image block83-source-401.png. All body, including Greek verse and Terence Latin couplet. Twelve marginal containers: g,h,dagger Camerarius26,asterisk Plutarch,dagger Isidore,asterisk Latin gloss of Greek,dagger Camerarius54,i,dagger Seneca67,asterisk Cicero,k Ovid,dagger De amicitia. Final It is the best continues thing in the world on402; footer thing is catchword.

Scan 402; printed 294; sequence 302; image block83-source-402.png. Opening Seneca and Commynes paragraphs only, through nothing so forcible to strengthen, recreate and heal the wounded soul of a miserable man. Include margins l and m and both full footer continuations. Subsection2 heading, following body and its three asterisk margins are reserved for084.

Opening words: Memb. 6. Subsect. 1. Perturbations of the minde rectified. From himself, by resisting to the utmost, confessing his grief to a friend, &c.

Closing words: nothing so forcible to strengthen, recreate and heal the wounded soul of a miserable man.

Passages DJR-084-01 to DJR-084-38

Source page labels: 294–298, with 292 misprinted for 296 (sequence 302–306). Scan pages: 402, 403, 404, 405, 406.

Scan 402; printed 294; sequence 302; image block83-source-402.png. Begin Subsection 2 heading and full subtitle. Preceding Seneca and Commynes paragraphs and l,m footer margins belong to 083. Include all following body and three asterisk margins, Ep. Q. frat., Aphor. prim., Epist. 10. Final will not be known of continues them on 403; footer them is catchword.

Scan 403; printed 295; sequence 303; image block83-source-403.png. All body and ten marginal containers n,o,p,q,r,s,t,u,x,y, including the full u continuation and x,y across the page foot. Final to desire continues nothing more on 404; footer nothing is catchword. Doubled saith retained in original. The enlarged q margin reads prima-ria across the line break, normalized to primaria.

Scan 404; printed 292 [296]; sequence 304; image block84-source-404.png. Printed 292 in error between 295 and 297; recorded as 292 [296]. All body and five margins z,dagger Nisi prius,asterisk E graeco,a,b. Displayed three-line Latin adaptation retained. Final which continues was no Indian plant on 405; footer was is catchword.

Scan 405; printed 297; sequence 305; image block84-source-405.png. All body and eleven margins dagger Lib.12,c,d,e,f,g,h,i,k,l,m. The initial dagger belongs to Cicero letters, not Julian. Final rational continues Physick on 406; footer Physick is catchword. Marginal afflictus and inprimit retained with explanation.

Scan 406; printed 298; sequence 306; image block84-source-406.png. Opening continuation through I read a multitude of examples, of melancholy men cured by such artificial inventions. All eight margins dagger Platter,n,o,p,q,r,s,t belong to this block. Subsection 3 Musick a remedy and its following paragraph are reserved for 085. That new body ends Wine and musick; footer rejoyce is catchword.

Opening words: Subsect. 2. Help from friends by counsell, comfort, fair and foul means, witty devices, satisfaction, alteration of his course of life, removing objects, &c.

Closing words: I read a multitude of examples, of melancholy men cured by such artificial inventions.

Passages DJR-085-01 to DJR-085-43

Source page labels: 298–303 (sequence 306–311). Scan pages: 406, 407, 408, 409, 410, 411.

Scan 406; printed 298; sequence 306; image block84-source-406.png. Begin Subsection 3 heading Musick a remedy and following body Many and sundry are the means. Earlier body and every margin on this page belong to 084. Final Wine and musick continues rejoyce the heart on 407; footer rejoyce is a catchword.

Scan 407; printed 299; sequence 307; image block84-source-407.png. All body and eleven margins u,x,y,z,a,b,c,d,dagger Lib.de Natali,e,dagger Arbores, including both footer continuations. Final as common experience evinceth continues are much affected on 408; footer are is a catchword. Quæ à spiritus and cruentum sævitiam retained as printed.

Scan 408; printed 300; sequence 308; image block84-source-408.png. All body and twelve margins f,g,h,i,k,l,m,n,o,asterisk Libro9,p,dagger Ista. Full dagger continuation across page foot directly checked: tripudiaturum, not tripudiantium. Final Lucian in his continues book de saltatione on 409; footer book is a catchword.

Scan 409; printed 301; sequence 309; image block85-source-409.png. All body and eight margins q,asterisk3.Delegibus,r,s,t,u,x,y, including full footer continuations. Completes Subsection3 and begins Subsection4. Marginal ve retained without supplying l. Final and continues well they deserve it on 410; footer well is a catchword.

Scan 410; printed 302; sequence 310; image block85-source-410.png. All body and fifteen margins z,a,b,c,dagger Homericum,asteriskPlaut,d,e,f,g,daggerPar5,h,i,daggerDypnosoph,asteriskUt, including footer continuations f,g. Two-line Plautus adaptation displayed. Final wench that continues could play on 411; footer could is a catchword.

Scan 411; printed 303; sequence 311; image block85-source-411.png. Opening continuation through as we do sauce to our meats. First three margins asteriskTom2,daggerEpistfam,eValerMax included. One-line Horace reed-riding fragment included. Next So did Scipio and Lælius, with following Latin/English four-line verse and Horace asterisk and all later margins, reserved for086. Running head incorrectly gives Member2 instead ofMember6.

Opening words: Subsect. 3. Musick a remedy.

Closing words: as we do sauce to our meats.

Passages DJR-086-01 to DJR-086-47

Source page labels: 303–308 (sequence 311–316). Scan pages: 411, 412, 413, 414, 415, 416.

Scan 411; printed 303; sequence 311; image block85-source-411.png. Begin So did Scipio and Lælius and continue to page end. Seven margins: asterisk Horace, f,g,h,dagger Ecclesiastes,i,k. Body reference to John of Salisbury is printed h but corresponds to margin g. Earlier body and first three margins belong to085. Four-line Latin verse and separate four-line Burton English retained. Final epigram introduction continues with Moll on412; footer Moll is a catchword. Running head incorrectly says Member2 instead of6.

Scan 412; printed 304; sequence 312; image block86-source-412.png. All body and nine margins: dagger Lucretia,l,m,n,o,asterisk Cap61,asterisk Universa,p,dagger Athenaeus/Jovius. Complete twenty-line Harington poem retained in three aligned groups. Final saltare consueverant continues onto413; catchword tare is excluded. Page seam repaired without duplicating syllables.

Scan 413; printed 305; sequence 313; image block86-source-413.png. All body and fourteen margins: q,r,s,t,u,dagger Sacerdos/Medicus,x,asterisk Loebeus,y,z,a,b,c,asterisk Athenaeus. Footer a continuation vivat retained; b and c and the complete Athenaeus book1 reference transcribed at foot. The right-margin partial Athenaeus repeat is not counted twice. Printed Numerus retained. Final Tis joins their sole exercise on414; footer their is a catchword.

Scan 414; printed 306; sequence 314; image block86-source-414.png. All body and six margins: d,e,dagger Froissart,f,g,hGreek. Completes Subsection4 and Section2 at sorrowfull reckoning in the end. Next SECT is a catchword, not body. Altered Juvenal, Horace and Plautus material retained and explained.

Scan 415; printed 307; sequence 315; image block86-source-415.png. Complete Section3 Member1 Subsection1 heading and all body. Five margins: iCardan,kNullum,asteriskSallust,daggerJob,daggerPliny. Final dolore is divided across415–416 and joined in transcription; footer re is a catchword. Printed Cornelius and Pliny letter13 retained and explained.

Scan 416; printed 308; sequence 316; image block86-source-416.png. Opening continuation through be it as it may, I will essay. Only margins lHorace and mMontaigne in086. All later body, starting Discontents and grievances are either generall or particular, and margins n onward with full footer continuations reserved for087. The running head correctly reads Part2. Printed but by study retained.

Opening words: So did Scipio and Lælius,

Closing words: be it as it may, I will essay.

Passages DJR-087-01 to DJR-087-44

Source page labels: 308–313 (sequence 316–321). Scan pages: 416, 417, 418, 419, 420, 421.

Scan 416; printed 308; sequence 316; image block86-source-416.png. Begin Discontents and grievances are either generall or particular; and continue to page end. Earlier body and margins l/m belong to086. Eight margins n,o,p,q,r,s,t,u included; s continues across footer, and t/u occur in footer. Last body words If it be join so on417; catchword so is excluded.

Scan 417; printed 309; sequence 317; image block87-source-417.png. Complete body and ten margins x,y,z,a,b,c,d,e,asterisk,f. Note e ends adversata at foot; full asterisk Giovio and f Lipsius notes appear at foot. Keep Seneca maxim plus Burton gloss, Ovid couplet, Horace maxim plus Burton couplet, and full astrology analogy. Footer Yea is a catchword.

Scan 418; printed 310; sequence 318; image block87-source-418.png. Complete body and six margins g,h,i,k,l,m. Horace four-line Latin and Burton separate four-line English retained; note i aligns with next prose. Last for is a catchword; the sentence joins for thee on419. Reading same content again retained.

Scan 419; printed 311; sequence 319; image block87-source-419.png. Complete body and sixteen margins n,o,p,q,r,asterisk,dagger,asterisk,s,t,dagger,u,v,y,asterisk,dagger. Two Camerarius couplets and Boethius four-line verse retained. Boethius body marker x differs from margin v; incorrect book5 reference retained and explained. Printed biblical references126.6/Eccl25.5 retained. Nominal printed311 is between printed310/312; no visible page numeral in this scan. Last contented is split between419/420; catchword ed excluded.

Scan 420; printed 312; sequence 320; image block87-source-420.png. Complete body, including end of Member1 and heading/opening Member2. Eight margins z,a,asteriskJosephus,daggerHomuncio,b,daggerCicero,c,asteriskCamerarius. Printed antitode and Plato lib25 retained. Last parvus is a catchword; actual parvus starts421.

Scan 421; printed 313; sequence 321; image block87-source-421.png. Only opening sentence completion parvus erat, sed magnus erat, &c. yet of incomparable parts all three. No margins from421 included. Next body starts Ignatius Loiola; dagger Ribera note and every later margin/body passage are reserved for088, including long footer continuation. Whole page viewed for boundary context.

Opening words: Discontents and grievances are either generall or particular;

Closing words: yet of incomparable parts all three.

Passages DJR-088-01 to DJR-088-44

Source page labels: 313–317 (sequence 321–325). Scan pages: 421, 422, 423, 424, 425.

Scan 421; printed 313; sequence 321; image block87-source-421.png. Begins Ignatius Loiola the founder of the Jesuits. Earlier opening completion belongs to087. All later body and all14 margins belong to088: dagger Ribera,d,asterisk Suetonius,dagger Diodorus,e,asterisk Ovid,asterisk Virgil,f,dagger Corpore,g,h,dagger Pliny,dagger Chrysostom,asterisk Chytraeus. Last note continues across full footer. Sentence joins engraven on next page; catchword excluded.

Scan 422; printed 314; sequence 322; image block87-source-422.png. Complete body and all7 margins: i,dagger Cicero,k,l,m,n,o. Final his is a catchword; the actual his wife begins423. Illness gives way to the discussion of low birth. Awkward Latin non tam mari quam praelio, sensus and nobilitate retained and explained.

Scan 423; printed 315; sequence 323; image block88-source-423.png. Complete body and all10 margins: dagger Sat.Menip,p,q,r,s,asterisk Gresser,t Horace,u,dagger Exodus,x. Body t at nobiliorem corresponds to asterisk Gresser, not the following t Horace. Last grace is catchword; sentence continues on424.

Scan 424; printed 316; sequence 324; image block88-source-424.png. Complete body and all8 margins: y,z,dagger masque,dagger AeneasSylvius,a,b,c,dagger Giovio. Final Aurelius is divided across424/425; catchword lius excluded, body completion included. Nations and claims of merit versus hereditary honour preserved as Burton's argument.

Scan 425; printed 317; sequence 325; image block88-source-425.png. Opening body through and why then should baseness of birth be objected to any man? Only five margins belong to088: d OlausMagnus,dagger Seneca,dagger Cardano,e Machiavelli,asterisk ScaligerExercises265. Later body begins who thinks worse of Tully for being Arpinas, an upstart? Later margins and footer continuations belong to089. Whole page read for boundary context; prepared426/427 images not yet read.

Opening words: Ignatius Loiola the founder of the Jesuits,

Closing words: and why then should baseness of birth be objected to any man?

Passages DJR-089-01 to DJR-089-50

Source page labels: 317–321 (sequence 325–329). Scan pages: 425, 426, 427, 428, 429.

Scan 425; printed 317; sequence 325; image block88-source-425.png. Begins who thinks worse of Tully for being Arpinas, an upstart? Earlier body and top five margins through Scaliger Exercises 265 belong to 088. All later body and six marginal containers belong to 089: dagger Machiavelli, asterisk Bale continuing into footer, dagger Giovio, dagger Curtius, dagger Bodin, dagger Aeneas Sylvius. The complete footer is included. Final is is a catchword; actual is on 426 included in the joined sentence.

Scan 426; printed 318; sequence 326; image block88-source-426.png. Complete body and all five margins: g Ecclesiasticus, dagger Cujus possessio, y Aristippus/Bacon corresponding to body h, asterisk Polynices, i Stuckius. Printed terra filius and blotted outs retained and explained. Final huma- joins nitatis on 427; catchword excluded.

Scan 427; printed 319; sequence 327; image block88-source-427.png. Complete body and all seven margins: k Sabinus, l Lemnius, asterisk Horace, asterisk Jerome, dagger Nihil fortunato, m Claudian, asterisk Sesellius. Printed Claud. l 9 in Eutrop. checked against enlarged crop and retained. Member 2 ends here. Signature Ss and catchword Memb. excluded.

Scan 428; printed 320; sequence 328; image block89-source-428.png. Complete body from the Member 3 heading and all eight margins: n Menander, o Gualther, p Apuleius (body marker resembles q), q Peter of Blois, r Bernard, dagger Cardano, s Lucian, dagger Seneca. Greek checked in enlarged crop. Peter of Blois reads ex onere metiens; irregular final clause preserved pending collation. Final acc- joins cording on 429; catchword excluded.

Scan 429; printed 321; sequence 329; image block89-source-429.png. Body through the higher they are elevated, the more grievously depressed. All twelve margins belong to 089: asterisk Chrysostom, dagger Juvenal, u Saturnalian Letters, x Vos quidem, y Et quota pars, dagger Seneca with repeated in, z Et diis similes, a Flammas, b Omnium oculis, c Horace, d Boethius, asterisk Aeneas Sylvius. Final body line For the rest of his prerogatives which wealth affords, starts 090 and continues on 430. Catchword as excluded.

Opening words: who thinks worse of Tully for being Arpinas, an upstart?

Closing words: the higher they are elevated, the more grievously depressed.

Passages DJR-090-01 to DJR-090-56

Source page labels: 321–326 (sequence 329–334). Scan pages: 429, 430, 431, 432, 433, 434.

Scan 429; printed 321; sequence 329; image block89-source-429.png. Only the final body line beginning For the rest of his prerogatives which wealth affords. Earlier body and all twelve margins belong to 089. The sentence continues on 430. Bottom catchword as excluded.

Scan 430; printed 322; sequence 330; image block90-source-430.png. Complete body and all four margins: asterisk Horace, e Theodoret, f Horace book 2 ode 9 as printed, g Horace book 2. Enlarged crop confirms Nor in the Horace verse, retained and explained. Bottom catchword stomack excluded; actual stomack on 431 included in joined sentence.

Scan 431; printed 323; sequence 331; image block90-source-431.png. Complete body and all nine margins: h Apuleius, i Seneca, k Horace, asterisk Brisson, asterisk Epictetus, l Cardano, asterisk Philostratus, dagger Pliny, asterisk Zonaras. Last body words Perox the Persian join King on 432. Bottom catchword King excluded.

Scan 432; printed 324; sequence 332; image block90-source-432.png. Complete body and all ten margins: dagger Plutarch, asterisk Horace Satires, dagger Suetonius, m Juvenal, n Psalm, asterisk Contemplatio Idiotae, dagger Boethius, o Augustine, p Bonae mentis, q Apuleius. Final plague joins curse on 433; bottom catchword curse excluded.

Scan 433; printed 325; sequence 333; image block90-source-433.png. Complete body and all eight identifiable margins: r Cardano corresponding to a body dagger, asterisk Tully, dagger Seneca Epist. 74, dagger Seneca Epist. 66 and 90 at the later Seneca body anchor, asterisk Panormita, s Nevizzano, t collectior, u Pliny. The separate body dagger at Macrobius has no identifiable marginal entry; retained and explained. Seneca first clause provisionally reads sumne and remains flagged. Final en- joins quires on 434; catchword excluded.

Scan 434; printed 326; sequence 334; image block90-source-434.png. Body from quires after the 433 page break through or well weighing their own present estate. All six margins in scope included: x Poliziano, full y Gyges note, z Horace, dagger Amos, asterisk Pliny, dagger Seneca On Anger. Later body beginning What they are now, thou mayst shortly be and the later Lipsius and Roman-population margins belong to 091.

Opening words: For the rest of his prerogatives which wealth affords, Closing words: or well weighing their own present estate.

Passages DJR-091-01 to DJR-091-63

Source page labels: 326–331 (sequence 334–339). Scan pages: 434, 435, 436, 437, 438, 439.

Scan 434; printed 326; sequence 334; image block90-source-434.png. Body from What they are now, thou mayst shortly be through the page bottom. Only the two later marginal containers, dagger Lipsius and asterisk Roman population, belong to 091. Earlier body and six margins belong to 090. Final how joins fortunate on 435; catchword fortunate excluded.

Scan 435; printed 327; sequence 335; image block91-source-435.png. Complete body and all five margins: a Foxe, dagger Horace Satires 2.2, asterisk Machiavelli, dagger Guicciardini, asterisk Persius. The Guicciardini title reading H ponest remains provisional. Final poor joins from the dust on 436; catchword from excluded.

Scan 436; printed 328; sequence 336; image block91-source-436.png. Complete body and all twelve margins: b Omnes, c Horace Epistle 12, d compound Seneca Epistles 15/8, dagger Boethius, asterisk Muffaeus, dagger Brisson, e Psalm 84, f Apuleius, g Gellius, h Jerome, dagger Euripides, i Horace. Final keepes thee joins in health on 437; catchword in excluded.

Scan 437; printed 329; sequence 337; image block91-source-437.png. Complete body and all fifteen marginal containers: k Horace, asterisk Virtue, l Lucan, m Lipsius, n Horace, dagger Horace Satires 4, asterisk Apuleius, dagger Chytraeus/Foscarinus, o Terence/Socrates compound, asterisk Epictetus, p Puteanus, dagger Marullus, q Horace farm, r Jerome, s Seneca. Final and joins he on 438; catchword he excluded.

Scan 438; printed 330; sequence 338; image block91-source-438.png. Complete body and all eight margins: asterisk Chrysostom, dagger Chytraeus meal poem, t Cardano, dagger Martial, u Augustine, x Augustine, y Horace, dagger Horace Epistles 1. Final Latin angulus verse is followed by its English gloss on 439; catchword O that excluded. Enlarged Martial margin confirms read it cut thy self; retained with explanation.

Scan 439; printed 331; sequence 339; image block91-source-439.png. Body from O that through for thou art not poor indeed but in opinion. All six margins on this page belong to 091: z full Cardano 8.40, dagger Plutarch, asterisk Censorinus, asterisk Stobaeus, asterisk Chrysostom, a Seneca. Following paragraph Yea, but this is very good counsell begins 092 and is excluded. Footer Tt3 and catchword that excluded.

Opening words: What they are now, thou mayst shortly be;

Closing words: for thou art not poor indeed but in opinion.

Passages DJR-092-01 to DJR-092-60

Source page labels: 331–336 (sequence 339–344). Scan pages: 439, 440, 441, 442, 443, 444.

Scan 439; printed 331; sequence 339; image block91-source-439.png. Body begins Yea, but this is very good counsell, immediately after the end of 091. All six margins on this page belong to 091 and are excluded. Continue the objection from actual deprivation through According to; catchword that excluded, while actual body that of Thales begins 440. Signature Tt3 excluded.

Scan 440; printed 332; sequence 340; image block91-source-440.png. Complete body and all eight marginal containers: asterisk Vopiscus, b Seneca rich, dagger Bernard, asterisk Nemo paupertatem, dagger Petronius, asterisk Ovid, dagger Ovid, asterisk Plutarch Crassus. Last body devil joins himself on 441; catchword him- excluded. The contradiction declame against fasting versus laudat jejunia is retained and explained.

Scan 441; printed 333; sequence 341; image block92-source-441.png. Complete body and all ten margins: asterisk Lucan, dagger Job, asterisk Hæc videntes, asterisk 1 Samuel, c James, d Afflictio compound, e Quam sordet, asterisk Seneca Providence, dagger Homer, dagger Chrysostom Hom. 9. Body so can joins he thee on 442; catchword he excluded.

Scan 442; printed 334; sequence 342; image block92-source-442.png. Complete body and all twelve marginal containers: f Psalm 113, g Micah, h Lipsius/Pindar, i Augustine and constancy exempla compound, dagger Horace, dagger Chrysostom Hom. 5, dagger Leonides, asterisk Modo in pressura, k Virgil, l Seneca, m Nemo desperet, dagger Theocritus. Poorly printed Greek checked in a high-resolution crop; reading is expressly provisional. Leonides attachment is uncertain and recorded at the next marked dagger without silently moving it. French couplet ends the body; catchword hope excluded.

Scan 443; printed 335; sequence 343; image block92-source-443.png. Complete body and all nine margins: asterisk Ovid (actually Horace), dagger Ovid, n Thales, o Machiavelli, p Camden, q Seneca, r Seneca compound, dagger Horace, s Zeno. Last body de- joins fiance on 444; catchword fiance and signature Vu excluded.

Scan 444; printed 336; sequence 344; image block92-source-444.png. Body from fiance through (Hor. Od. 11. lib. 2.). First three marginal containers belong to 092: dagger Sallust Cotta, asterisk Seneca superlunar image, t Valerius compound. Following paragraph Hope and Patience are two soveraigne remedies for all begins 093 and is excluded. Remaining margins beginning u Hor. belong to 093. Whole page read for boundary context.

Opening words: Yea, but this is very good counsell,

Closing words: (Hor. Od. 11. lib. 2.)

Passages DJR-093-01 to DJR-093-46

Source page labels: 336–339, 327 [misprint for 340] (sequence 344–348). Scan pages: 444, 445, 446, 447, 448.

Scan 444; printed 336; sequence 344; image block92-source-444.png. Body begins Hope and Patience are two soveraigne remedies for all, immediately after 092 ends (Hor. Od. 11. lib. 2.). Preceding body and first three margins belong to 092. All eight remaining margins belong to 093: u Hor., x Aequam, dagger Epictetus, y Terence, asterisk two handles, z Terence, asterisk Epictetus feast, a Theodoret. The Theodoret margin runs across the footer and is read in an enlarged crop. Last body his joins gifts on 445; catchword gifts excluded.

Scan 445; printed 337; sequence 345; image block93-source-445.png. Complete body and all eight margins: b Si sint omnes, c Livy, d Cardano, dagger Seneca, dagger Pontanus, asterisk Pellham, e Terence, dagger Seneca98. The body ends But will we, or nill we, and continues make on 446; catchword make and signature Vu2 excluded.

Scan 446; printed 338; sequence 346; image block93-source-446.png. Complete body and all seven margins: f Publilius, asterisk Seneca Happy Life, dagger Plutarch Cato, asterisk Horace Epistles, g Horace, h Boethius, i Jerome Life of Paul. Member 3 concludes and Member 4 heading and opening are included. Last body They are subject to joins their own lawes on 447; catchword their excluded.

Scan 447; printed 339; sequence 347; image block93-source-447.png. Complete body and all nine margins: dagger Macrobius, asterisk Seneca Natural Questions, k Cardano Consol.l.5, l prison-of-soul, m Herberstein, n Varthema, o solitude, asterisk Alessandri, p Augustine. The heavily inked Alessandri book numeral is provisionally read as 1 and explicitly flagged. Cardano numeral 5 retained. Last body set- joins tles on 448; catchword tles and signature Vu3 excluded.

Scan 448; printed 327 [misprint for 340]; sequence 348; image block93-source-448.png. Body from tles through Read Pet. Alcionius his two books of this subject. First four margins belong to 093: q Boethius, dagger Philostratus, asterisk Pliny, asterisk Plato. Actual printed page number 327 is a misprint for expected 340. The following Member 5 heading, body beginning Death and departure of friends, and margin r Cardan belong to 094 and are excluded. Whole page read for boundary context.

Opening words: Hope and Patience are two soveraigne remedies for all,

Closing words: Read Pet. Alcionius his two books of this subject.

Passages DJR-094-01 to DJR-094-54

Source page labels: 327 [misprint for 340], 341–345 (sequence 348–353). Scan pages: 448, 449, 450, 451, 452, 453.

Scan 448; printed 327 [misprint for 340]; sequence 348; image block93-source-448.png. Begin actual MEMB.5 heading near page foot, following093 ending Read Pet.Alcionius his two books of this subject. Printed327 is a misprint for340. Include opening body Death and departure of friends and sole in-scope margin r Cardan de consol.lib.2. Preceding body and four margins belong093. Last body troublesome joins unto us on449; catchword unto excluded.

Scan 449; printed 341; sequence 349; image block94-source-449.png. Complete body and nine margins: daggerSeneca, sBenzo, tOrtelius, uCatullus, xVirgil, yLucan, dagger3Annal, zVirgilAeneid10, aConfessions1. Preserve color in the Virgil quotation, Rutili, Genesis37.37 and their discrepancies in notes. Final body one anothers joins presence on450; catchword excluded.

Scan 450; printed 342; sequence 350; image block94-source-450.png. Complete body and nine margins: daggerJuvenal, bCardano, asteriskSeneca, daggerBernard3, asteriskPlatoApology, cComedi, daggerBernard3, dEstEnim, daggerVaticanus. Next-page Virgil quote is introduced here. Catchword non excluded.

Scan 451; printed 343; sequence 351; image block94-source-451.png. Complete body and nine marginal containers: eLucan, daggerIliad9, asteriskOvid, daggerConsolApollonius, fOvidTristia4, daggerTacitus4, asteriskAugustine9.9, daggerFestus, gObhanc. Opening body has an asterisk but no corresponding marginal container. Festus margin was enlarged again to read cum frater abit and ab hospite, retained literally. Body ends upon and continues which on452; catchword and signature excluded.

Scan 452; printed 344; sequence 352; image block94-source-452.png. Complete body and sixteen marginal containers: daggerScardeone, asterisk12Innuptae, hConsolatio, iPraeceptis, daggerUtLignum, kBoethius2m3, daggerBoethius, lHensel, mTwenty, nMagdalen, unmarkedObeunt, asteriskAssyriorum, daggerOmnium, asteriskOvid, daggerArcad8, daggerGillesPreface. The unmarked Statius fragment is attached to the universal-decay passage and explained. Running head incorrectly reads Section6; omitted. Catchword nec excluded.

Scan 453; printed 345; sequence 353; image block94-source-453.png. Include body from nec solidis prodest through Our second meeting shall be much more pleasant, then our departure was grievous. Only first two margins oEpistTull3 and pQuumtot belong094. Next body begins I but he was my most dear and loving friend, my sole friend; all later margins, starting daggerHorace1.24, belong095. Whole page read for context; no later body transcribed in094.

Opening words: MEMB. 5.

Closing words: Our second meeting shall be much more pleasant, then our departure was grievous.

Passages DJR-095-01 to DJR-095-57

Source page labels: 345–349 (sequence 353–357). Scan pages: 453, 454, 455, 456, 457.

Scan 453; printed 345; sequence 353; image block94-source-453.png. Begin I but he was my most dear and loving friend, my sole friend, immediately after094. First two margins oEpistTull3 and pQuumtot belong094 and are excluded. Include remaining eight containers: daggerHor1.24, qDeRemed, rErubesce, sVisAegrum, tUxorem, uStulti, daggerHor and asteriskHor1.24. Enlarged scan confirms same master and & bona tam sequitur, quam bona prima fuit. The next-page verse begins Num quia. Catchword excluded.

Scan 454; printed 346; sequence 354; image block95-source-454.png. Complete body and eight marginal containers: asteriskVirg4, asteriskEpictetus19, xMenander, yConsolApollonius, zTom1TractDeLuctu, daggerVirgil, asteriskHor and daggerChytreus. The large Lucian margin is one complete container; enlarged reading confirms malus senex. Preserve Num and miser in the Dido quotation, as well as the mistaken Horace attribution to Martial. Last body Moses joins the continuation on455; catchword excluded.

Scan 455; printed 347; sequence 355; image block95-source-455.png. Complete body, completing Member5 and opening Member6 near foot. Include eight containers: asteriskSen85, aSardus, bPremeditation with Plutarch and Cicero together, daggerEpictetus8, asteriskSeneca, cBoeth1pros4, dQuiInvidiam and daggerTerHeautont. The running head anticipates Member6 before Member5 ends and is excluded. Member6 actual heading retained. Last body sufferance has its Epictetus marginal source at top of456; that container is included and anchored here. Catchword excluded.

Scan 456; printed 348; sequence 356; image block95-source-456.png. Complete body and seven marginal containers: daggerEpictetus14 for preceding-page sufferance, daggerTerPhor, daggerAlciat, asteriskVirg, daggerNatChytreus, dOccupetHor and eLipsiusEpistQuaest1.7. Beaver verse and Burton English gloss retained as separate displayed units. Includes Aeneas, forethought, Venice, Socrates and Lipsius. Ends summo jam monte potitos; catchword But excluded.

Scan 457; printed 349; sequence 357; image block95-source-457.png. Complete body to Mock others now, for I have done with you. Eight marginal containers: fLipsiusEpist1.7, gGloria, hQuidAliudAmbitiosus, iEtOmnesFama, kSenHerFur, lHor, daggerPatrons and combined daggerPrudentius/Puccius/Chytreus. Preserve bibery, contended, Philip.1.11 and intercedunt illi mecum with explanatory notes. Closing Latin and Burton English verses both retained. MEMB. at foot is a catchword; excluded. Member6 is complete.

Opening words: I but he was my most dear and loving friend, my sole friend, Closing words: Mock others now, for I have done with you.

Passages DJR-096-01 to DJR-096-55

Source page labels: 350–354 (sequence 358–362). Scan pages: 458, 459, 460, 461, 462.

Scan 458; printed 350; sequence 358; image block95-source-458.png. Begin actual MEMB.7 heading after095. Complete body and ten marginal containers: unmarked Repulse, mPaederatus, nKissing, asteriskAeneasSylvius, daggerSesellius, asteriskImperitus/Cardan, daggerEpistDedicMachiavelli, daggerQuumIs, asteriskLib22Hist, daggerMinistri. Include slaves/asses verse. Enlarged lower margin confirms damaged mille in Cardan; Zeubbco is a tentative first-name reading.

Preserve honores, editum and Solarium with notes. Last body illiterate continues459. Running head, signature and catchword excluded.

Scan 459; printed 351; sequence 359; image block96-source-459.png. Complete body and four marginal containers: daggerHor2Sat5, oSolomonEccles9.11, asteriskSatMenip, daggerValentAndreae5.39. Includes Tiresias advice, poor scholars and the twelve candidates for a prebend. Last body he completes on460. Catchword excluded.

Scan 460; printed 352; sequence 360; image block96-source-460.png. Complete body and ten marginal containers: oStellaFomahant, daggerLibDeLibPropriis, asteriskHor, daggerQuiInduit, asteriskSalvian4, pPlutarchLysandro, qOvidMet, rMagistratusVirum, sIdeoBoniViri, uAelian. Complete twelfth applicant and fictional award; preserve Muse verse. Continue unsuitable office, pride, Socrates and quarrels. Last body or if patience had taken completes on461. Catchword excluded.

Scan 461; printed 353; sequence 361; image block96-source-461.png. Complete body and thirteen marginal containers: xInjuriarum, yMat18.22/5.39 combined, zRom12.17, daggerSiToleras, daggerDispeream both replies, asteriskCamerarius, aHeliodorus, daggerTerAdelph, asteriskOvid, bCamden, cUsqueAdPectus complete anecdote, daggerChrysostome, dRom12.14. Include both branch verses and both magnanimity verses. Preserve Euclid role reversal and Colonna motto/gloss contradiction with notes. Terence note retains its dagger placement at the lion passage. Final quo quisque stultior continues462. Catchword excluded.

Scan 462; printed 354; sequence 362; image block96-source-462.png. Include body through But stab'd or maim'd to hell they hie, with Plautus, Horace and Juvenal verse and Burton English gloss. All thirteen margins belong096: ePro, fContendNot, asteriskOccidere, daggerNonFacile, daggerArcana, unmatched fPsal45, gRom12, asteriskPsa13.12, daggerNullusTam, daggerArcturus, asteriskHor3.2, daggerWisd11.6, asteriskJuvenal. Preserve numerical discrepancies, deseruit and & sanguine with notes. Correct the CharlesII beheading claim only in an editorial note. The remaining paragraph beginning Oftentimes too a base contemptible fellow starts097; it and the catchword are excluded here.

Opening words: MEMB. 7.

Closing words: But stab'd or maim'd to hell they hie.

Passages DJR-097-01 to DJR-097-56

Source page labels: 354–358 (sequence 362–366). Scan pages: 462, 463, 464, 465, 466.

Scan 462; printed 354; sequence 362; image block96-source-462.png. Begin Oftentimes too a base contemptible fellow immediately after096 closing English couplet. Include only the remaining body through Haman, completed on463. All462 margins already included096; none repeated. Catchword excluded.

Scan 463; printed 355; sequence 363; image block96-source-463.png. Complete body, beginning Haman continuation from462 and ending sufficient to, continued on464. Include all15 marginal containers: iLeo, daggerChrysostom, kValerius, daggerEpQfrat, daggerCamerarius, asteriskPape, daggerQuodTibi, l1Pet2, kSiquidem, daggerAlciato, daggerNaturam, lByManyIndignities, unmarkedEpictetus, daggerPlutarch, asteriskLib18. Preserve put it it up, Dionysius, Bracidas and Cato Censorius. Notes explain Dion and Cato conflations. The last two unanchored moral notes are placed editorially and flagged.

Scan 464; printed 356; sequence 364; image block97-source-464.png. Complete body and all5 margins: mHocScio, daggerPlinyLib8Cap2, nChrysostom, oCiceroDolabella, daggerBoethius4.3. Include two reward-and-punishment couplets; preserve the awkward first Latin line and Burton separate gloss. Keep notoriour and deprendi. Final i'th aire continues465. Catchword excluded.

Scan 465; printed 357; sequence 365; image block97-source-465.png. Complete body and one unmarked Terence Phormio margin. Preserve both Latin and English bird-trapping couplets and the separate Quocunque verse fragment. Includes fleeting news, guilt and unequal punishment, repentance, recovered credit and exile. Final trouble not thy selfe continues466. Catchword excluded.

Scan 466; printed 358; sequence 366; image block97-source-466.png. Include body through he shall much ease and benefit himself, ending before In fine, if Princes would do justice. All11 margins included: daggerCamerarius61, pLipsius, asteriskCatullus, oCiceroDolabella repeated, oKevenbeder, asteriskGonzaga, qPresSat1, asteriskSeneca31, daggerCiceroFin2, rConscientiaBoethius, sPuteanus. Preserve repeated Cicero container and flag ambiguous attachment. Preserve animal-emblem marker mismatch and Kevenbeder reading. Preserve salvare and proba bonitas, with tentative gloss and Boethius comparison. All verse and separate English glosses included. Remaining466 body and all467 body/margins excluded.

Opening words: Oftentimes too a base contemptible fellow is the instrument of Gods justice

Closing words: And whosoever he is that shall observe these short instructions, without all question he shall much ease and benefit himself.

Passages DJR-098-01 to DJR-098-45

Source page labels: 358–363 (sequence 366–371). Scan pages: 466, 467, 468, 469, 470, 471.

Scan 466; printed 358; sequence 366; image block97-source-466.png. Begin In fine, if Princes would do justice directly after097 end. Include remaining body from this paragraph; all11 margins already included097, none repeated. Continue enemies on467. Catchword excluded.

Scan 467; printed 359; sequence 367; image block97-source-467.png. Complete body, finishing social-duty catalogue, then handling quarrels and starting biblical moral counsels. Both margins included: Plautus Miles gloriosus and Bion anecdote. Preserve bridle up himself. Final apply your selves to the times continues468.

Scan 468; printed 360; sequence 368; image block98-source-468.png. Complete body and all34 marginal containers, including15 left-margin and19 bottom-margin containers. Preserve dense maxim series, contradictory faction counsels, original Horace references and inscrutaberis, pace, tardo and Crete. Unresolved basil proverb translated literally. Final Memb8 catchword excluded; heading retained on469.

Scan 469; printed 361; sequence 369; image block98-source-469.png. Complete body and all5 margins: Seneca burden, Livy, Terence, Plautus and Petronius Catul. Retain source heading and two displayed Latin units, with fresh translations and Burton separate English gloss. Preserve sinit and Catul.; record comparison differences. Final down-right remedy phrase continues470.

Scan 470; printed 362; sequence 370; image block98-source-470.png. Complete body and all8 marginal containers: Parmeno Celestina, Busbecq/Sandys, Menippean satire, Boece, Ortelius, Capella, Blefken, Lemnius. Unanchored Menippean note attached editorially and disclosed. Retain three source heading units across469–470. Medicine discussion begins; retain120 and250 year claims as attributed reports, not verified. Last sentence ends on471.

Scan 471; printed 363; sequence 371; image block98-source-471.png. Opening continuation only, use of Apothecaries Physick. All remaining body and all margins excluded.099 begins next sentence Many are overthrown by preposterous use of it.

Opening words: In fine, if Princes would do justice

Closing words: use of Apothecaries Physick.

Passages DJR-099-01 to DJR-099-44

Source page labels: 363–367 (sequence 371–375). Scan pages: 471, 472, 473, 474, 475.

Scan 471; printed 363; sequence 371; image block98-source-471.png. Begin Many are overthrown by preposterous use of it immediately after098 ending. All remaining body and all eight marginal containers included. Extra Dutch-proverb asterisk retained in body, with no invented marginal text. Ends one saith this another that continuing472. Running head, signature and catchword excluded.

Scan 472; printed 364; sequence 372; image block99-source-472.png. Complete body and all five marginal containers included. Four-line epigram and Ovid gout line preserved as distinct displayed verse. Preserve pro frigidis humida and explain unusual opposition. Herodotus Egyptian/Babylonian conflation retained and annotated. Final they continues473.

Scan 473; printed 365; sequence 373; image block99-source-473.png. Complete body and all nine marginal containers included. Preserve Eccles.58.1, explaining Sirach38. Transition from attack to praise of medicine retained; every Latin quotation translated separately from any English gloss. Unresolved Arnoldus, Bart. and other references recorded.

Scan 474; printed 366; sequence 374; image block99-source-474.png. Complete body and all nine marginal containers included: c,d,e,f,g,h,unmarked Sincerus,dagger,k. Single subsection heading and Greek plus English verse preserved. Greek ligatures and accents normalized; printed lexical reading ᾐδ᾽ retained against comparison αἳ δ᾽. Preserve henbane versus marginal cicuta and safety versus benefit in Fuchs gloss. Disclose g mismatch, missing h anchor and editorial Sincerus attachment. Continue final sentence on475.

Scan 475; printed 367; sequence 375; image block99-source-475.png. Opening body through which he must of necessity use, completing Subsection2. Include first three margins only: asterisk Pliny, dagger Melchior Adam, and m Fuchs. Subsection3 heading and all following body excluded. Remaining five margins n,o,p,q,r deferred100.

Opening words: Many are overthrown by preposterous use of it

Closing words: which he must of necessity use.

Passages DJR-100-01 to DJR-100-44

Source page labels: 367–372 (sequence 375–380). Scan pages: 475, 476, 477, 478, 479, 480.

Scan 475; printed 367; sequence 375; image block99-source-475.png. Begin with Subsection 3 heading Alteratives, Herbes, other vegetals, &c., then Amongst those 800 simples, immediately after099 ending which he must of necessity use. Include remaining body and five margins n,o,p,q,r; the preceding three notes belong099. Running head, signature and catchword excluded.

Scan 476; printed 368; sequence 376; image block100-source-476.png. Complete body and ten marginal containers included: s,t,unmarked Borage,u,x,dagger Odyssey Delta,unmarked Bawme,y,z,Scorzonera label. Four-line Latin paraphrase of Homer preserved as verse with fresh translation. The t note lacks a visible body anchor, and the Scorzonera label anticipates the next page; editorial attachments disclosed. Enlarged z margin confirms resecare, translated remove obstructions.

Scan 477; printed 369; sequence 377; image block100-source-477.png. Complete body and eleven marginal containers included: a,Hop label,b,c,unmarked De Laet,d,e,f,g,h,i. Unmarked De Laet attached to the Chamico asterisk with disclosure. Preserve printed decoction or Guiacum and Linshcosteus. The i note lacks a visible body anchor and is attached to goats milk/whey with disclosure.

Scan 478; printed 370; sequence 378; image block100-source-478.png. Complete body and fourteen marginal containers included: k,l,m,n,o,p,q,r,s,t,u,x,y,z. Preserve substantive forms Eban, Emmetris and Elenum; disclose the Rondelet/Elenum marginal mismatch. Subsection 4 heading preserved. Distinctions between Latin margins and English body retained, including coral, fears and size of pearls.

Scan 479; printed 371; sequence 379; image block100-source-479.png. Complete body and twelve marginal containers included: a,b,c,d,e,f,unmarked Minerals,g,dagger Chaucer,h,i,second dagger Paracelsus. Two-line Chaucer quotation preserved as verse. The final Paracelsus note continues below the body across the bottom margin; its full continuation is included. Horace allusions freshly translated and annotated.

Scan 480; printed 372; sequence 380; image block100-source-480.png. Opening body through Look for Antimony among purgers, completing Subsection 4. Include first four marginal notes: asterisk Burgiatius, asterisk drop, k and l. Subsection 5 heading and following body excluded; three lower margins m,n,o belong101.

Opening words: SUBSEC. 3. Alteratives, Herbes, other vegetals, &c.

Closing words: Look for Antimony among purgers.

Passages DJR-101-01 to DJR-101-42

Source page labels: 372–377 (sequence 380–385). Scan pages: 480, 481, 482, 483, 484, 485.

Scan 480; printed 372; sequence 380; image block100-source-480.png. Begin Subsection5 heading Compound Alteratives, censure of Compounds, and mixt Physick, then Pliny lib.24.c.1. Include all remaining body, and m,n,o marginal notes with both bottom continuations. Earlier body and four upper notes already100. End A few continuing481.

Scan 481; printed 373; sequence 381; image block101-source-481.png. Complete body and all six marginal notes p,r,dagger,s,t,u. Preserve Cornarius body asterisk with no invented marginal text; missing corresponding note disclosed. Preserve names Simon Eitover, Meripsa, Scribanius. Horace quotation translated independently of Burton English elaboration.

Scan 482; printed 374; sequence 382; image block101-source-482.png. Complete body and all five marginal containers x,y,z,dagger,a. Read long a note and bottom continuation in full. Preserve noxia in Latin versus new in English. One displayed Latin verse freshly translated, its source unresolved. Keep differences between body and marginal borage story.

Scan 483; printed 375; sequence 383; image block101-source-483.png. Complete body and both notes b,c. Preserve c syntax, Alablastritum Populeum phrase and formulation names. Ends Member1 with external remedies and scents. Running head erroneously Subsection3 excluded with other running furniture.

Scan 484; printed 376; sequence 384; image block101-source-484.png. Complete body including Member2 Subsection1 heading and all thirteen margins d,e,f,g,h,i,k,l,m,n,o,p,q. The p note and q note extend below body and are included in full. Preserve anomalous Dioscorides book11, Melangoga, purgin, Diaserum, Rubel and Hermophilus. Persius Acci retained against comparison Atti. Final sentence completes485.

Scan 485; printed 377; sequence 385; image block101-source-485.png. Opening body through examples and Receipts, closing white hellebore discussion. Include first three notes r,s,t with their printed anchor placements; possible displaced attachments disclosed. Raised d in monetary weight flattened and explained. Antimony paragraph and five notes u,x,y,z,a reserved102.

Opening words: SUBSECT. 5. Compound Alteratives, censure of Compounds, and mixt Physick.

Closing words: where he shall finde great diversity of examples and Receipts.

Passages DJR-102-01 to DJR-102-46

Source page labels: 377–382 (sequence 385–390). Scan pages: 485, 486, 487, 488, 489, 490.

Scan 485; printed 377; sequence 385; image block101-source-485.png. Begin Antimony or Stibium, immediately after the white hellebore paragraph completed in101. Include all remaining body and five margins u,x,y,z,a. Preserve unmatched closing parenthesis and distinguish Mattioli testimony from Burton. First three margins r,s,t already101.

Scan 486; printed 378; sequence 386; image block102-source-486.png. Complete body and eight margins b,c,d,e,f,g,h,i. Finish antimony, include tobacco and Subsection2 heading, gentler purgatives, senna and aloes. Preserve b citation to Crato/Monavius despite body Zwinger.

Scan 487; printed 379; sequence 387; image block102-source-487.png. Complete body and ten marginal containers k,l,m,n,o,p,q,r,s,dagger, including the bottom s note. Preserve displaced marginal attachments and unmatched body t. Include black hellebore history and Greek ho Zeus; retain Burton names. Horace fragment remains within prose.

Scan 488; printed 380; sequence 388; image block102-source-488.png. Complete body and ten margins u,x,y,z,a,b,c,d,e,f. Retain Geoponics Lib23 and Amatus century66, Dutch physician designation and irregular maximae praestantia. Keep Latin quotations and Burton English glosses separately. Melatasta anecdote and extract discussion continue onto489.

Scan 489; printed 381; sequence 389; image block102-source-489.png. Complete body and four margins g,h,i,k. Include g continuation and h below body. Preserve six hundred times in body versus six hundred people in h. Include Subsection3 Compound Purgers. Read name as Udalrinus Leonorus; retain extra, secus in marginal Latin.

Scan 490; printed 382; sequence 390; image block102-source-490.png. Opening body through These are all used...as shall be shewed in his place, completing Member2. Include three upper margins l,m,n. Lower Member3 heading, bloodletting text and o margin reserved103.

Opening words: Antimony or Stibium, which our Chymists so much magnifie

Closing words: These are all used, and prescribed to this malady upon severall occasions, as shall be shewed in his place.

Passages DJR-103-01 to DJR-103-56

Source page labels: 382–387 (sequence 390–395). Scan pages: 490, 491, 492, 493, 494, 495.

Scan 490; printed 382; sequence 390; image block102-source-490.png. Begin MEMB.3. Chirurgicall remedies. heading and all following body on this page. Include lower o margin only; all earlier body and upper l,m,n margins already102. Opening bloodletting discussion continues491.

Scan 491; printed 383; sequence 391; image block102-source-491.png. Complete body and four margins q,r,s,t. Finish Section4 Member3 Surgical remedies, include Section5 Member1 Subsection1 heading and opening regimen for head melancholy. Preserve q book2 and r full author/chapter series.

Scan 492; printed 384; sequence 392; image block103-source-492.png. Complete body and two margins u,x. Include full medical bibliography and consultations, preserving numerical readings from scan including Venice1620, Savonarola rubric82, Hugo13and14, Solinander3section3. Include Subsection2 Bloodletting and conditional claims.

Scan 493; printed 385; sequence 393; image block103-source-493.png. Complete body and seven margins y,z,a,b,c,d,e, including y continuation and bottom z,a,b. Preserve Aphorisms6.11 despite wording also resembling6.21. Preserve differing body/margin phlebotomy arguments. Include Subsection3 Preparatives and Purgers heading, Augeas allusion, preparatives and beginning of gentle purgatives.

Scan 494; printed 386; sequence 394; image block103-source-494.png. Complete body and twelve margins f,g,h,asterisk,i,dagger,k,m,n,o,p,q; include o continuation and bottom p,q. Keep apparently displaced m,n attachments and full reply-to-Aubert passage. Include two Latin recipes with ounce/drachm signs and all quantities, preserving original line units. Keep Hankshius name, quotations and separate English glosses.

Scan 495; printed 387; sequence 395; image block103-source-495.png. Complete body and eleven margins s,t,u,x,y,z,a,dagger,b,c,d, including dagger continuation and bottom b,c,d. Include third recipe. Retain fifty doubled to101, body/margin egg differences, Anthony1600 and Cap.1/Adfinemlibri. End Subsection3 at Thus they contend and rail...I proceed. All495complete.

Opening words: MEMB. 3. Chirurgicall remedies.

Closing words: Thus they contend and rail, and every Mart write books pro and con, & adhuc sub judice lis est, let them agree as they will, I proceed.

Passages DJR-104-01 to DJR-104-46

Source page labels: 388–392 (sequence 396–400). Scan pages: 496, 497, 498, 499, 500.

Scan 496; printed 388; sequence 396; image block103-source-496.png. Complete body beginning SUBSECT.4. Averters. and12 margins, including bottom p,q. Preserve body Byarus/margin Bayerus and printed Baleni; treatment of caution, cupping and beginning Salvianus.

Scan 497; printed 389; sequence 397; image block103-source-497.png. Complete body and9 margins, including bottom continuation of u and x. Preserve unmatched body y,z as superscript characters. Include Subsection5heading and openingcordials/wine; printed Plutarch7question12 retained.

Scan 498; printed 390; sequence 398; image block104-source-498.png. Complete body and11 marginalcontainers. Preserve full MattioliLatin, Odyss.A, Judges9.12, 180days andHester18. EnglishdaggerAthenians/Germans retained with uncertainattachmentrecorded. Include Horace andTibullusdisplayedLatin plusBurtoncouplet.

Scan 499; printed 391; sequence 399; image block104-source-499.png. Complete body and10 marginalcontainers. Preserve sourceSeneca1.15, adaptations andEnglishglosses, HoracepatchworkLatin andBurtonverse, GreekAnacreonwithmargin26, Pliny14.5/pernitiosus. Theocritusp marginbelongsbody500butincludedhere.

Scan 500; printed 392; sequence 400; image block104-source-500.png. Firstbodyparagraph only, completing Mattioliwarning and wine discussion. Include upper q,r,s margins. Stop after Wine soberly used, may be very good. China roots and all followingbody, t,u,y,z,a,b,c margins reserved105.

Opening words: SUBSECT. 4. Averters.

Closing words: But to determine with Laurentius c. 8. de melan. wine is bad for mad men, and such as are troubled with heat in their inner parts or brains; but to melancholy, which is cold (as most is) Wine soberly used, may be very good.

Passages DJR-105-01 to DJR-105-50

Source page labels: 392–396 (sequence 400–404). Scan pages: 500, 501, 502, 503, 504.

Scan 500; printed 392; sequence 400; image block104-source-500.png. Begin second body paragraph, China roots, after104wine conclusion. Include remaining body through bezoar testimony continued501 and all seven lower margins t,u,y,z,a,b,c. Upper q,r,s belong104. First displayedrecipe preserved; no c marker before Manardus in opening paragraph.

Scan 501; printed 393; sequence 401; image block104-source-501.png. Complete body and six marginal containers d,e,f,g,g,h. Unanchored f placed with ram recipe introduction; repeated g containers remain distinct. Include second displayed recipe, all ram-head directions and both three-day/fourteen-day periods. End with Latin olfactu & potu continued502.

Scan 502; printed 394; sequence 402; image block104-source-502.png. Complete body and thirteen marginal containers: opening dagger,i,k,l,m,n,o,hypericum dagger,Philes asterisk,Martial dagger,p,q,r. Include bottom extensions. Preserve lacte Nymphææ, sanitate pristina and c.1. Martial line remains embedded in paragraph. Mother story continues503.

Scan 503; printed 395; sequence 403; image block104-source-503.png. Complete body and three marginal containers: DorothyBurton asterisk,f,t. Complete amulets and beginSubsection6; third displayedrecipe retains three-and-halfounceslettucewater. Worn diascordii weight read as dram and uncertainty recorded. Requiemparagraph continues504.

Scan 504; printed 396; sequence 404; image block105-source-504.png. Body from continued Ruland paragraph through endoffearfuldreams advice, ending or lye on their backs,&c. Include five margins u,x,y,z,Veni mecum dagger. Stop before Rusticus pudor; lower a,b belong106. Source505–506 read for planning only, not translated.

Opening words: I may say the same of the decoction of China roots, Sassafras, Sarsaparilla, Guajacum:

Closing words: Such men must not eat Beans, Pease, Garlick, Onions, Cabbidge, Venison, Hare, use black wines, or any meat hard of digestion at supper, or lye on their backs, &c.

Passages DJR-106-01 to DJR-106-62

Source page labels: 396–402 (sequence 404–410). Scan pages: 504, 505, 506, 507, 508, 509, 510.

Scan 504; printed 396; sequence 404; image block105-source-504.png. Only final body paragraph from Rusticus pudor, continuing onto505. Include lower a and b margins. Upper body and u,x,y,z,dagger margins completed105.

Scan 505; printed 397; sequence 405; image block105-source-505.png. Complete body and thirteen margins c,d,dagger,e,f,g,h,i,k,l,m,n,o, including bottom extensions. Two recipes retained; first separated from running text. Ambiguous unc. followed by apparent scruple sign in second recipe recorded.

Scan 506; printed 398; sequence 406; image block105-source-506.png. Complete body: close Member1/Subsection6 then all Member2 on melancholy throughout the body. Eight margins p,q,r,s,t,u,x,z. Extra r before Median retained; z diet note kept at printed anchor although it belongs in sense to507 opening.

Scan 507; printed 399; sequence 407; image block106-source-507.png. Complete body: Member3/Subsection1 on hypochondriacal melancholy, through sentence continued508. All seven margins b,c,dagger,d,e,f,g. Preserve Altinus, Celsus, Assyria and defective final renovat clause in margin d.

Scan 508; printed 400; sequence 408; image block106-source-508.png. Complete body through sentence continued509. All eleven margins h,i,k,l,m,dagger,asterisk,n,o,p,q, including bottom extensions. Preserve printed affirmative there may be again against negative Latin note.

Scan 509; printed 401; sequence 409; image block106-source-509.png. Complete body, close Subsection1 and begin Subsection2; final list continues510. All eleven margins r,s,t,u,x,y,z,a,b,c,dagger. Unanchored s placed with Treacle; body asterisk versus margin c recorded. Preserve ventriculi regimen.

Scan 510; printed 402; sequence 410; image block106-source-510.png. Complete body through closing verse and FINIS; six margins c,d,e,dagger,f,g. Preserve open the bowels and differences between prose and turpentine margin. Final inline prescription set apart. Second Partition complete.

Opening words: Rusticus pudor, bashfulness, flushing in the face, high colour, ruddiness are common grievances,

Closing words: FINIS.

Passages DJR-107-01 to DJR-107-55

Source page labels: unnumbered [403–405] and 406–409 (sequence 411–417). Scan pages: 511, 512, 513, 514, 515, 516, 517.

Scan 511; printed unnumbered [403]; sequence 411; image block107-source-511.png. Complete first page of ANALYSIS OF THE THIRD PARTITION. Preserve hierarchical outline, including Of women under Pleasant and the separate Honest branch. Printed locators and zodiac cross-reference signs retained.

Scan 512; printed unnumbered [404]; sequence 412; image block107-source-512.png. Complete second outline page: heroic or love melancholy, then jealousy. Preserve printed Section 2 under jealousy and all nested causes, symptoms, prognosis and cures.

Scan 513; printed unnumbered [405]; sequence 413; image block107-source-513.png. Complete third outline page: religious melancholy in excess and deficiency, including despair. Printed Gemini/Cancer pointer placement and Med. 1 recorded; structural braces linearized as indentation.

Scan 514; printed 406; sequence 414; image block107-source-514.png. Complete prose body opening Third Partition, Section 1 Member 1 Subsection 1, and five marginal containers. Includes Martial verse and Burton's separate English gloss; retain printed legit.

Scan 515; printed 407; sequence 415; image block107-source-515.png. Complete body and six marginal containers, including Plato epigram. Preserve Aeneid 2 as printed while noting Servius parallel in book 4. Join Maximus Tyrius and Arnoldus Villanovanus in modern text.

Scan 516; printed 408; sequence 416; image block107-source-516.png. Complete body and seven marginal containers, including lower extensions and k. Preserve à demente and discrepancy between margin Platonem and body plane trees. Heliodorus bishop story retained as Burton's cited tradition.

Scan 517; printed 409; sequence 417; image block107-source-517.png. Opening body through I will not presse you with my Pamphlets, or beg attention, but if you like them you may. Include four margins: dagger Discum, l Macrobius, m Xenophon, dagger Aretino. Retain studiosorum and note Pliny studiorum. Subsequent body and margins reserved for 108.

Opening words: ANALYSIS OF THE THIRD PARTITION.

Closing words: I will not presse you with my Pamphlets, or beg attention, but if you like them you may.

Passages DJR-108-01 to DJR-108-49

Source page labels: 409–414 (sequence 417–422). Scan pages: 517, 518, 519, 520, 521, 522.

Scan 517; printed 409; sequence 417; image block107-source-517.png. From Pliny holds it expedient through the end of the body page; five remaining marginal containers included. The opening four margins and preceding body belong to 107. Preserve Maudarensis, Amnianus and lætam materiam; identify Apuleius in the modern text and explanatory note.

Scan 518; printed 410; sequence 418; image block107-source-518.png. Complete body and thirteen marginal containers, including the unanchored lower Martianus Capella note attached to Pallas. Preserve Latin and separate English glosses and the picture/statues discrepancy.

Scan 519; printed 411; sequence 419; image block107-source-519.png. Complete body and four marginal containers. Completes Subsection 1 preface and opens Subsection 2 on love's origin, object, definition and divisions.

Scan 520; printed 412; sequence 420; image block108-source-520.png. Complete body and twelve marginal containers. Definitions of love and beauty, including Augustine/body versus Godefridus/margin and the difference between margin z and the body over fair.

Scan 521; printed 413; sequence 421; image block108-source-521.png. Complete body and nine marginal containers. Beauty, sensory faculties, two Venuses and two loves. Unanchored Dionysius and Plato references attached to their relevant passages; preserve the misplaced n anchor and note its sense.

Scan 522; printed 414; sequence 422; image block108-source-522.png. Opening body through Latin two-Venuses epigram and Burton's separate eight-line English rendering, ending Rules whom she will, both where and when. Margins p, q and r included; s reserved for 109. Preserve two cities/two loves reversal and Plaontis. The Subsection 3 running head is premature: actual body still Subsection 2.

Opening words: Pliny holds it expedient, and most fit, severitatem jucunditate etiam in scriptis condire, Closing words: Rules whom she will, both where and when.

Passages DJR-109-01 to DJR-109-50

Source page labels: 414–419 (sequence 422–427). Scan pages: 522, 523, 524, 525, 526, 527.

Scan 522; printed 414; sequence 422; image block108-source-522.png. From This twofold division of Love, Origen likewise followes through the remaining body, including margin s. Prior body and margins p, q and r belong to 108. Retain rest it self. Running head Subsection 3 is premature; body remains Member 1 Subsection 2.

Scan 523; printed 415; sequence 423; image block108-source-523.png. Complete body and six marginal containers. Directions of love, natural and sentient love. Preserve Scaliger 501, printed margin o out of sequence, and olei; translate conditional With the world it should run without making it an injunction.

Scan 524; printed 416; sequence 424; image block109-source-524.png. Complete body and ten marginal containers. Rational and divine love, angels, and the close of Member 1 Subsection 2. Preserve Disciple of love, servant of peace, John 3.55, Hosea 14.5, and the body/sea versus margin/air difference. Casti genii confirmed in enlarged scan.

Scan 525; printed 417; sequence 425; image block109-source-525.png. Complete body and seven marginal containers. Actual heading MEMB. 2. SUBSETC. 1. retained, followed by useful, pleasant and honourable objects. Preserve differences over the heart and over fear in the margin versus love in the body.

Scan 526; printed 418; sequence 426; image block109-source-526.png. Complete body and five marginal containers. Wealth, gifts, conditional friendship and Timon. Preserve Ovid placant and Burton's separate English God/good turns adaptation, and Juvenal's altered line.

Scan 527; printed 419; sequence 427; image block109-source-527.png. Body through in not providing for his family, completing Member 2 Subsection 1, with margins s, t and u. Preserve Horace Desinit and 1 Timothy 1.8. Exclude actual SUSECT. 2. heading and subsequent body and margins x, y and z, all reserved for 110.

Opening words: This twofold division of Love, Origen likewise followes in his Comment on the Canticles, Closing words: in not providing for his family.

Passages DJR-110-01 to DJR-110-51

Source page labels: 419–424 (sequence 427–432). Scan pages: 527, 528, 529, 530, 531, 532.

Scan 527; printed 419; sequence 427; image block109-source-527.png. From the actual heading SUSECT. 2. Pleasant objects of Love through the remaining body and margins x, y and z. Earlier body and margins s, t and u belong to 109. Heading omission of B retained.

Scan 528; printed 420; sequence 428; image block110-source-528.png. Complete body and twelve marginal containers. Pleasant objects, attraction, likeness, familiarity and mutual offices. Retain both adjacent markers before Thessalus, and Julius Flaccus in the long marginal note.

Scan 529; printed 421; sequence 429; image block110-source-529.png. Complete body and five marginal containers. Praise, kinship and erotic love complete Subsection 2. Actual heading SUBSECT. 3. Honest objects of Love begins the next subsection; the running head is not its start. Jet/amber and direction of attraction differ in body and margin.

Scan 530; printed 422; sequence 430; image block110-source-530.png. Complete body and six marginal containers. Flattery, inward virtue, eloquence and bodily beauty. Retain biblical locators, Eurymone, and the body/soul discrepancy in the Alcibiades comparison.

Scan 531; printed 423; sequence 431; image block110-source-531.png. Complete body and fourteen marginal containers, including the two marginal continuations along the bottom. Philosophia, patrū and devincentur checked in enlarged images. Calvisius, Magdalen, Q. Cincinnatus and other substantive readings retained and explained.

Scan 532; printed 424; sequence 432; image block110-source-532.png. Body through and as so many Geryons to be united into one, with nine marginal containers f, g, i, k, inscription dagger, l, Stobaeus asterisk, Solinus dagger and m. Preserve the Sibylline line and three-line Stobaeus quotation. Exclude For the nature of true friendship, its Statius verse and margin n, reserved for 111.

Opening words: SUSECT. 2. Pleasant objects of Love.

Closing words: and as so many Geryons to be united into one.

Passages DJR-111-01 to DJR-111-47

Source page labels: 424–429 (sequence 432–437). Scan pages: 532, 533, 534, 535, 536, 537.

Scan 532; printed 424; sequence 432; image block110-source-532.png. Begin For the nature of true friendship, its two-line Latin verse and marginal n Statius. All preceding body and margin m belong to 110.

Scan 533; printed 425; sequence 433; image block110-source-533.png. Complete body and marginal text. Friendship, memorials, patronage and false friendship. Ten Burton footnotes include two portions of a continuous Pliny margin attached to separate body markers. The Giovio margin continues across the bottom.

Scan 534; printed 426; sequence 434; image block110-source-534.png. Complete body and seven marginal notes. Finish Member 2 Subsection 3, then actual heading MEMB. 3 Charity. Retain unmasked, Psalm 37.5 and the equant circle. Continue the final sentence on the next page.

Scan 535; printed 427; sequence 435; image block111-source-535.png. Complete body and eight marginal notes. Natural, patriotic and chosen affection; the two Ovid couplets; both nine-line Spenser stanzas. The asterisk before Amor laudis has no separate recoverable marginal text and is retained as a literal marker.

Scan 536; printed 428; sequence 436; image block111-source-536.png. Complete body and nine marginal notes. Charity's primacy, Augustinian friendship and scriptural duties. Preserve will resist evil and the biblical locators; distinguish English and Latin marginal wording.

Scan 537; printed 429; sequence 437; image block111-source-537.png. Opening body through Christian Laws of Love, Boethius three-line verse with margin p, then Angelical souls through and have another heaven upon earth! Exclude the following paragraph But this we cannot do and marginal q, reserved for 112.

Opening words: For the nature of true friendship is to combine, to be like affected, of one minde, Closing words: and have another heaven upon earth!

Passages DJR-112-01 to DJR-112-46

Source page labels: 429–433 (sequence 437–441). Scan pages: 537, 538, 539, 540, 541.

Scan 537; printed 429; sequence 437; image block111-source-537.png. Begin But this we cannot do, after the Boethius verse and Angelical souls passage already included in111. Include margins q–t. The final sentence continues on538.

Scan 538; printed 430; sequence 438; image block111-source-538.png. Complete body and marginal u. Revenge, hoarding, refused appeals for aid and self-interested beneficence. Preserve both Latin verse passages in lineated form. Final sentence continues on539.

Scan 539; printed 431; sequence 439; image block112-source-539.png. Complete body and seven marginal notes, x, y, dagger, asterisk, dagger, z and a. Cosimo, architectural memorials, poetry, exemplars of virtue and the departure of Justice. Preserve the one-line Muse fragment and two-line Horace quotation. Final sentence continues on540.

Scan 540; printed 432; sequence 440; image block112-source-540.png. Complete body and five marginal notes, b–e and Josephus dagger. Litigation, war, religious polemic, attributed Inquisition totals, lack of charity and disasters. Gallienus, intervening verse and Aurelian share one marginal note. Final sentence continues on541.

Scan 541; printed 433; sequence 441; image block112-source-541.png. Opening body and margins f–h only, through think upon it: and be wise. Completes Member3 Charity and Section1. Exclude the actual Section2 heading, following body and margins i/k, all reserved for113.

Opening words: But this we cannot do; and which is the cause of all our woes, miseries, discontent, melancholy, Closing words: think upon it: and be wise.

Passages DJR-113-01 to DJR-113-58

Source page labels: 433–438 (sequence 441–446). Scan pages: 541, 542, 543, 544, 545, 546.

Scan 541; printed 433; sequence 441; image block112-source-541.png. Begin at the actual SECT.2 MEMB.1 SUBSECT.1 heading, Heroicall love causing Melancholy. Include opening body and margins i/k. Exclude charity conclusion and margins f–h already in112. Continue sentence on542.

Scan 542; printed 434; sequence 442; image block112-source-542.png. Complete body and13 margins. Love's genealogy, Porus/Penia, Aristophanes, Vulcan, Cupid iconography, divinity, Plautus and Caecilius. Keep Plautus lineated. Final Caecilius passage continues on543.

Scan 543; printed 435; sequence 443; image block112-source-543.png. Complete body and13 margins. Caecilius verse, blindness and expulsion myths, Sophocles and Thetide verses, Jupiter and Venus, Hercules and Ovid, plant love and Claudian. Preserve all verse units and Burton's independent English couplet.

Scan 544; printed 436; sequence 444; image block112-source-544.png. Complete body and8 recoverable margins f,g,h,k,l,m,n,asterisk. Palm stories, authority chain, Virgil, Propertius, mares and lions, rutting stags. Orphan superscript i retained literally; no matching marginal text visible on scan. Last sentence continues on545.

Scan 545; printed 437; sequence 445; image block113-source-545.png. Complete body and8 margins. Finish stags, birdsong and Lucretius, fish, Saxo bear, peacock, dolphins, Busbecq lynx/crane, Orphic couplet, spirits and Weyer denial. Last passage continues on546.

Scan 546; printed 438; sequence 446; image block113-source-546.png. Opening body through Menippus phantom bride and many thousands took notice of this fact, for it was done in the midst of Greece. Include margins t,u,x only. Exclude Sabine in his Comment… and subsequent margins y onward, reserved for114.

Opening words: SECT. 2. MEMB. 1. SUBSECT. 1. Heroicall love causing Melancholy. His Pedegree, Power, and Extent.

Closing words: many thousands took notice of this fact, for it was done in the midst of Greece.

Passages DJR-114-01 to DJR-114-42

Source page labels: 438–442 (sequence 446–450). Scan pages: 546, 547, 548, 549, 550.

Scan 546; printed 438; sequence 446; image block113-source-546.png. Begin Sabine in his Comment on the 10th of Ovids Metamorphosis, at the tale of Orpheus, telleth us of a Gentleman of Bavaria. Include remaining body and margins y,z only. Exclude Menippus and t,u,x already in113. Venus tale continues on547.

Scan 547; printed 439; sequence 447; image block113-source-547.png. Complete body and nine margins a,dagger,b,c,d,e,f,g,h. Finish Venus ring story, Phlegon, fallen angels, travellers and Herodotus, Lipsius. Last sentence continues on548.

Scan 548; printed 440; sequence 448; image block114-source-548.png. Complete body and five margins i,k,l,m,n. End Subsection1, begin Subsection2 heading, Virgil fragments, love and destruction, disease catalogue. Preserve verse fragments separately.

Scan 549; printed 441; sequence 449; image block114-source-549.png. Complete body and nine margins dagger,k,l,m,n,o,p,q,r. The extended Latin catalogue begins. Distinguish margin Philosophis from body At hunc; retain printed Euristium and Beventinus. Printed n/o references are crossed. Last sentence continues on550.

Scan 550; printed 442; sequence 450; image block114-source-550.png. Opening body through nolo quem diutius hisce sordibus inquinare. Include nine margins s,dagger,t,u,x,y,dagger,z,dagger. Exclude I come at last to that Heroicall Love and Fonseca asterisk and later margins reserved for115.

Opening words: Sabine in his Comment on the 10th of Ovids Metamorphosis, at the tale of Orpheus, telleth us of a Gentleman of Bavaria, Closing words: nolo quem diutius hisce sordibus inquinare.

Passages DJR-115-01 to DJR-115-64

Source page labels: 442–447 (sequence 450–455). Scan pages: 550, 551, 552, 553, 554, 555.

Scan 550; printed 442; sequence 450; image block115-source-550.png. Begin I come at last to that Heroicall Love. Include five final margins: asterisk Fonseca, a, dagger Tertullian, b, c. Exclude prior Latin catalogue and its nine margins already in114. Cupid sentence continues on551.

Scan 551; printed 443; sequence 451; image block115-source-551.png. Complete body and nine margins: asterisk Plutarch, d, asterisk Lucretius, dagger Fonseca, dagger Horace, e, dagger Simonides, f, dagger Geryon. Preserve independent Latin and English verse. Plutarch mirror sentence continues on552.

Scan 552; printed 444; sequence 452; image block115-source-552.png. Complete body and eight margins: asterisk Propertius, asterisk Plutarch, dagger Petronius, dagger Aretino, asterisk Broughton, g, dagger Leo, dagger Catullus. End-page Helies is a catchword; next-page body supplies it once.

Scan 553; printed 445; sequence 453; image block115-source-553.png. Complete body and ten margins: dagger Euripides, h, dagger Plautus, asterisk Cyprian, dagger Pliny, i, k, l, m, n. One Pliny marginal note has two body daggers; preserve first literally and anchor one footnote at second. Final Amor nobilis continues onto554.

Scan 554; printed 446; sequence 454; image block115-source-554.png. Complete body and thirteen margins: o,p,q,r,s,t,u,x,y at side and z,a,b,c at foot. Page misprinted246 corresponds to446. Read sited and extruso from enlarged body; printed Gnastivinus retained. Sentence continues on555.

Scan 555; printed 447; sequence 455; image block115-source-555.png. Opening body through ideoq; recte melancholicus appellatur. Concupiscentia vehemens ex corrupto judicio æstimativæ virtutis. Include marginal e only. Exclude Member2 Subsection1 heading, subsequent body and f onward, reserved for116.

Opening words: I come at last to that Heroicall Love, which is proper to men and women, is a frequent cause of melancholy, Closing words: Concupiscentia vehemens ex corrupto judicio æstimativæ virtutis.

Passages DJR-116-01 to DJR-116-57

Source page labels: 447–451 (sequence 455–459). Scan pages: 555, 556, 557, 558, 559.

Scan 555; printed 447; sequence 455; image block116-source-555.png. Begin at Member2 Subsection1 heading; include subsequent body and marginal f,g,dagger,asterisk,dagger,h. Exclude preceding body and marginal e belonging to115. The sentence ending longo continues on556; omit catchword procul-. Planetary glyphs enlarged and read: Mars, Venus, Mercury, Mercury; later Moon and Mercury.

Scan 556; printed 448; sequence 456; image block116-source-556.png. Complete body and five margins: h,dagger,asterisk,i,dagger. Greek incipit enlarged and read. Latin and separate English verse preserved. Final for which continues on557; omit catchword cause.

Scan 557; printed 449; sequence 457; image block116-source-557.png. Complete body and nine margins: k,dagger,l,m,asterisk,dagger,n,o,p. Source Misnia and extra negative non concupierit retained and annotated. Concubines crosses to558; omit catchword cubines.

Scan 558; printed 450; sequence 458; image block116-source-558.png. Complete body and eleven margins: q,r,s,t,dagger,u,dagger,dagger,x,y,asterisk. Original Latin and English couplets retained. Printed juxu retained. Final those continues on559; omit catchword Sybarites.

Scan 559; printed 451; sequence 459; image block116-source-559.png. Complete body and fourteen margins: dagger,z,a,b,c,d,e,dagger,dagger,f,asterisk,g,h,dagger. h and final dagger continue across page foot; both read and transcribed in full. Entire Latin catalogue translated. End completes subsection. Omit catchword Sub-.

Opening words: MEMB. 2. SUBSECT. 1. Causes of Heroicall love, Temperature, full Diet, Idleness, Place, Climate, &c.

Closing words: sed pro virili tanquam syrtes & cautes consulto effugiat.

Passages DJR-117-01 to DJR-117-51

Source page labels: 452–456 (sequence 460–464). Scan pages: 560, 561, 562, 563, 564.

Scan 560; printed 452; sequence 460; image block117-source-560.png. Begin at Member2 Subsection2 heading. Complete body and eleven margins: i,k,l,m,n,o,p,dagger,r,dagger,t. Marginal n is anchored at its corresponding clause with the indistinct body marker explained. The final four notes and conclusion of p run across the foot. Greek and sluices enlarged and checked. Omit catchword This.

Scan 561; printed 453; sequence 461; image block117-source-561.png. Complete body and nine marginal units: u,dagger,x,y,asterisk,z,a,dagger,and unmarked Plutarch/Brissonius/Strabo lines. Last body word condemned crosses onto562. Omit catchword ned.

Scan 562; printed 454; sequence 462; image block117-source-562.png. Complete body and six margins: dagger,asterisk,asterisk,b,c,d. Preserve No worth is eminent,Idalian,and the printed Massovius. Final command crosses onto563; omit catchword mand.

Scan 563; printed 455; sequence 463; image block117-source-563.png. Complete body and nine margins: dagger,dagger,y,k,l,m,n,dagger,asterisk. Preserve separate Daniel and Strozzi verse units; the body's Athenaeus and marginal Various History mismatch is annotated. Omit catchword And.

Scan 564; printed 456; sequence 464; image block117-source-564.png. Include body from And those mali genii through Malthus and the fly,ending as ravished with his divine looks. Include all six margins: dagger,o,p,dagger,asterisk,dagger. Reserve final Inanimate creatures I suppose and all565 content for118. The ass passage's printed book8 is retained and compared with Apuleius6.28–29.

Opening words: MEMB. 2. SUBSECT. 2. Other causes of Love-Melancholy, Sight, Beauty from the face, eyes, other parts, and how it pierceth.

Closing words: as ravished with his divine looks.

Passages DJR-118-01 to DJR-118-68

Source page labels: 456–461 (sequence 464–469). Scan pages: 564, 565, 566, 567, 568, 569.

Scan 564; printed 456; sequence 464; image block118-source-564.png. Only the final Inanimate creatures I suppose is in118. All preceding body and all six margins are in117. Omit catchword have,which is read from565.

Scan 565; printed 457; sequence 465; image block118-source-565.png. Complete body and all nine marginal units,p,dagger,dagger,asterisk,dagger,asterisk,dagger,asterisk,dagger. Latin and Burton English mirror versions kept separate. Preserve this was turn,Pincus,Ericthons and aspicias; uncertain readings annotated. Omit catchword with and signature.

Scan 566; printed 458; sequence 466; image block118-source-566.png. Complete body and all thirteen marginal units,dagger,dagger,r,s,t,asterisk,u,x,dagger,asterisk,y,dagger,asterisk. Enlarged Musaeus margin read and its absent or indistinct body marker explained. Preserve Plutus and Philo Dioneus; Latin and English Hero quotations separate. Omit catchword When.

Scan 567; printed 459; sequence 467; image block118-source-567.png. Complete body and thirteen marginal units,dagger,asterisk,dagger,z,asterisk,dagger,a,b,c,dagger,d,dagger,asterisk. Perno enlarged and retained. Priamus,labore and Sterpsichores preserved and annotated. Final Provinces carried from568; omit catchword and signature.

Scan 568; printed 460; sequence 468; image block118-source-568.png. Complete body and all twelve margins,asterisk,e,f,dagger,g,dagger,h,k,dagger,asterisk,l,m. Preserve Curtius l.1,Ast eares word-division issue,Apuleius and Ovid book mismatches,body Antiochus and margin Antiloquus. The final presence spans568–569; omit catchword.

Scan 569; printed 461; sequence 469; image block118-source-569.png. Body through I could hold out no longer. Include eight margins,n,dagger,o,p,q,r,dagger,asterisk. Greek enlarged and retained; Spenser lineation and separate Latin/English expressions preserved. Reserve Such another mishap and the remainder of569,including final dagger Amaranto dial,for119.

Opening words: Inanimate creatures I suppose, have a touch of this, when a drop of Psyches Candle fell on Cupids shoulder, I think sure it was to kiss it.

Closing words: I could hold out no longer.

Passages DJR-119-01 to DJR-119-74

Source page labels: 461–467 (sequence 469–475). Scan pages: 569, 570, 571, 572, 573, 574, 575.

Scan 569; printed 461; sequence 469; image block119-source-569.png. Begin Such another mishap after118 ends I could hold out no longer. Include remaining body and dagger Amaranto dial note. Enlarged opening reads muco plenus. Omit catchword look, which is read from570.

Scan 570; printed 462; sequence 470; image block119-source-570.png. Complete body and five margins:dagger,s,t,u,x. Preserve the altered Seneca dedit quotation, source Chaucer wording and separate Plautus/English couplet. Omit catchword Urit.

Scan 571; printed 463; sequence 471; image block119-source-571.png. Complete body and nine margins:y,dagger,z,asterisk,dagger,dagger,asterisk,a,dagger. Body pointer for the Petronius note differs from margin z. Cava thyma and illa rosas spirat retained; all Latin translated. Omit catchword picture and signature.

Scan 572; printed 464; sequence 472; image block119-source-572.png. Complete body and eleven margins:b,c,asterisk,dagger,asterisk,dagger,d,asterisk,e,dagger,f, including bottom notes. Enlarged the apparent flatorem; statorem retained as alternative in apparatus pending another-copy collation. Preserve blank in Priapus marginal quotation. Read final other from573 rather than catchword.

Scan 573; printed 465; sequence 473; image block119-source-573.png. Complete body and ten margins:dagger,asterisk,g,h,dagger,i,k,n,p,q. Extra l-like marker before Castilio has no matching marginal text; editorial note records this. Enlarged Lernutius,flammeolis heræ,faceteely. Preserve Sulpitio and printed source references. Musaeus Latin continues574; omit catchword Oculus.

Scan 574; printed 466; sequence 474; image block119-source-574.png. Complete body and all ten margins:r,s,t,dagger,dagger,u,dagger,asterisk,x,y. Preserve printed flamma in margin though body has water. The purported Ovid verse is identified in Editor note as Horace Ars poetica37. Preserve Son of beauty; interpret sun in modern text. Omit catchword dull,read from575.

Scan 575; printed 467; sequence 475; image block119-source-575.png. Only opening continuation through yet without question they are most amorous, and marginal z Sands relation fol67. Next paragraph Now last of all and all remaining margins reserved for120.

Opening words: Such another mishap, but worse, had Stratocles the Physitian, that blear-eyed old man

Closing words: yet without question they are most amorous.

Passages DJR-120-01 to DJR-120-63

Source page labels: 467–473 (sequence 475–481). Scan pages: 575, 576, 577, 578, 579, 580, 581.

Scan 575; printed 467; sequence 475; image block120-source-575.png. Begin Now last of all immediately after119, which included only the top paragraph and z Sandys margin. Include remaining body and nine margins a,b,c,d,e,f,g,dagger,h. Enlarged mirror clause directly checked; continuation read from576 rather than catchword.

Scan 576; printed 468; sequence 476; image block120-source-576.png. Complete body and six margins i,k,dagger,l,m,n. Preserve Marrhusian and Lycias in the original, explain Myrrhinusian and Lysias in the modern text. Retain Burton's reversal of the final Ficino comparison and the distinction between fairies and demons in the hermit story. Catchword Memb.2 omitted and its discrepancy with the following heading recorded.

Scan 577; printed 469; sequence 477; image block120-source-577.png. Complete body and three margins o,dagger,p. Preserve printed MEMB.3.SUBSECT.3 and annotate numbering. Martial Latin and Burton's English verse remain separate. Léry's argument compared with the French chapter8. Omit running head, signature and catchword.

Scan 578; printed 470; sequence 478; image block120-source-578.png. Complete body and nine margins q,r,s,dagger,dagger,t,u,x,dagger. Enlarged eye of the countenance clause confirms eye, not cyse. Modern text supplies the elliptical repeated sense, with an explicit note. Daniel quotation compared with1592 text. Omit catchword.

Scan 579; printed 471; sequence 479; image block120-source-579.png. Complete body and eight margins y,z,a,b,c,dagger,dagger,dagger. Ovid,Persius,Horace,Petronius and Mantuan parallels checked. Preserve Burton's separate Latin and English renderings and prose glosses. Omit catchword.

Scan 580; printed 472; sequence 480; image block120-source-580.png. Complete body and ten margins d,e,dagger,asterisk,y,e,f,g,asterisk,dagger. Preserve repeated marginal e and Burton's Ausonius variant. Enlarged bottom margin reads in ipsis complexibus. Keep the displaced Epist.7.lib.2 dagger before Antoninus while noting its likely backward reference. Caracalla paragraph continues581; omit catchword.

Scan 581; printed 473; sequence 481; image block120-source-581.png. Only opening continuation through unseemly,undecent carriage of it and marginal h Spartian. Historia Augusta anecdote retained but its fabricated marriage and stepmother relationship explained. Following When you have all done paragraph and all remaining margins, beginning asterisk Sidneys Arcadia, reserved for121.

Opening words: Now last of all, I will shew you by what means beauty doth fascinate, bewitch, as some hold, and work upon the soul of a man by the eye.

Closing words: unseemly, undecent carriage of it.

Passages DJR-121-01 to DJR-121-46

Source page labels: 473–478 (sequence 481–486). Scan pages: 581, 582, 583, 584, 585, 586.

Scan 581; printed 473; sequence 481; image block121-source-581.png. Begin When you have all done after120 ends unseemly,undecent carriage of it. Include remaining body and six margins:asterisk Sidney,i Bossus,dagger Matenesius,k Petronius,l Terence,asterisk Aretino. Top h Spartian belongs to120. Omit catchword; Philocharus paragraph continues582.

Scan 582; printed 474; sequence 482; image block121-source-582.png. Complete body and nine margins:dagger Aristaenetus,m Lucian,dagger Seneca,n Castiglione,dagger Ovid,o Bossus,dagger Scribanius,dagger Terence,asterisk Stroza. Enlarged anchors confirm m before Lucian,n before Because,dagger Ovid before Sanguine. Enlarged parvamque exortamque is retained and annotated against Juvenal. Defuit checked in Castiglione margin. Glycere Latin and English remain separate. Omit catchword.

Scan 583; printed 475; sequence 483; image block121-source-583.png. Complete body and six margins:p Ovid,dagger Daniel,q Philo,r Basil,s Homeric hymn,t Apollonius. Enlarged Basil marginal word transcribed tentatively as pornœium; uncertainty recorded. Separate original Latin and Burton English verses preserved. Apollonius introduction continues584; omit catchword.

Scan 584; printed 476; sequence 484; image block121-source-584.png. Complete body and eleven margins:asterisk Plutarch,u Plutarch,y Heliodorus,x Cardan,z Ruth,a Judith,b Juvenal,c Horace,d Suetonius,e Seneca,f Seneca. Source y before x retained. Altered and erroneous references recorded. Heliogabalus paragraph continues585; omit catchword.

Scan 585; printed 477; sequence 485; image block121-source-585.png. Complete body and seven margins:g Livy,h Bossus,i Bernard,k Cyprian/Clement,l Tertullian,m Bossus/Plautus,n Seneca. Bottom continuation of m and n directly read in enlarged crop. Printed Venus and Titus retained on the left with explanatory notes. Lucian gold maxim continues586; omit catchword.

Scan 586; printed 478; sequence 486; image block121-source-586.png. Only opening continuation through all such inordinate,furious and unruly passions and two margins:o Lucian,p Non sic Furius. Jerome comparison checked as Letter77 on Fabiola,not Blesilla. Following But I am over tedious paragraph and all remaining margins,beginning dagger Anacreon4,are reserved for122.

Opening words: When you have all done, veniunt à veste sagittæ, the greatest provocations of lust are from our apparel;

Closing words: all such inordinate, furious and unruly passions.

Passages DJR-122-01 to DJR-122-43

Source page labels: 478–483 (sequence 486–491). Scan pages: 586, 587, 588, 589, 590, 591.

Scan 586; printed 478; sequence 486; image block122-source-586.png. Begin But I am over tedious after the closing121 paragraph. Include remaining body and six margins: dagger Anacreon, dagger Affer tecum, asterisk Theognis, dagger Chaloner, r Danae, s Ovid. The opening continuation and o Lucian/p Non sic Furius belong to121. Greek and ligatures directly read enlarged. Omit catchword; Sir Giles Goosecap continues587.

Scan 587; printed 479; sequence 487; image block122-source-587.png. Complete body and eight margins: dagger Aristaenetus14, asterisk Qui caret, t Juvenal, dagger Lucian, dagger Newburgh, u Gaguinus, x Zonaras, y Barbaro. Printed t and anchors checked. Names retained in source column; Lucian and Geoffrey discrepancies noted. Omit signature and catchword.

Scan 588; printed 480; sequence 488; image block122-source-588.png. Complete body, Subsection4 heading and five margins: z Tatius, dagger hungry dogs, asterisk Shakespeare, a Tatius1, b breasts. Heading split into two aligned heading units. Body Tatius2 and margin1 both retained. Ismenius paragraph continues589. Ornamental initial becomes ordinary capital; omit running head and catchword.

Scan 589; printed 481; sequence 489; image block122-source-589.png. Complete body and seven margins: asterisk Mantuan, asterisk OvidMet1, c Eustathius scene, dagger Aristaenetus4, asterisk Virgil, asterisk Propertius, d OvidAmores. Geneseo and plea retained on left with contextual readings explained. Youth/night paragraph continues590; omit signature and catchword.

Scan 590; printed 482; sequence 490; image block122-source-590.png. Complete body and eight margins: dagger Aretino, e Castiglione, dagger adulterated cloth, f Busbecq, g Boemus, h Chrysostom, i Jerome, k gestures. The bottom horizontal continuation belongs to k and is included in full. Body hair/girdle account differs from margin and is noted. For as he goes on continues591; omit catchword.

Scan 591; printed 483; sequence 491; image block122-source-591.png. Only top body through Pontanus Latin and Burton English verse and the following How shall he contain? Include l Jerome dress, m Chrysostom, dagger PontanusBaiae1. Printed ruffling checked in enlarged crop. Remaining body begins voices/speech and is reserved123 along with n P.Jovius and subsequent margins.

Opening words: But I am over tedious, I confess, and whilst I stand gaping after fine clothes, there is another great allurement, Closing words: How shall he contain?

Passages DJR-123-01 to DJR-123-52

Source page labels: 483–488 (sequence 491–496). Scan pages: 591, 592, 593, 594, 595, 596.

Scan 591; printed 483; sequence 491; image block123-source-591.png. Begin The very tone of some of their voices immediately after the Block 122 ending How shall he contain? Include six remaining margins: n Giovio, o Ovid, dagger Aristaenetus book 1, dagger Aristaenetus 2.5 including Quam suave, p Lucian and q Theocritus. Earlier l, m and dagger Pontanus belong to Block 122. The displaced dagger near Petronius is explained, not silently reassigned. Omit running head, signature and catchword.

Scan 592; printed 484; sequence 492; image block123-source-592.png. Complete body and five margins: dagger Plutarch, r Tatius, s Apollonius, t Catullus and dagger Pornodidascalus. Latin and Burton English verses remain separate. Argus line identified as Ovid Metamorphoses 1.625. Omit running head and catchword.

Scan 593; printed 485; sequence 493; image block123-source-593.png. Complete body and eight margins: dagger Lucian, u Tatius, dagger de luxuria, x Aeneas Silvius, asterisk Martial, dagger Vitruvius, y Eustathius with Suetonius and dagger Xenophon. Preserve nequam in the Martial verse and explain the disagreement with Burton English. Omit running head, signature and catchword.

Scan 594; printed 486; sequence 494; image block123-source-594.png. Complete body and nineteen margins: z Horace, a Heinsius, dagger Aretino, b Petronius, c Catullus, d Petronius, e Apuleius, dagger Petronius, asterisk Apuleius, f Petronius Proselios, g Petronius, h Castiglione, dagger Catullus, i Lucian, asterisk Secundus, k Eustathius, dagger Catullus, asterisk Buchanan and l Ovid. Preserve the printed Proselios pending collation. Omit running head and catchword.

Scan 595; printed 487; sequence 495; image block123-source-595.png. Complete body and six margins: m Ovid, n Lipsius, dagger Lucian, o Apuleius including the full compound continuation, asterisk Jerome and q Ovid. Record doubtful Lipsius wording and the body p versus margin o mismatch. Preserve theological claims in the body and qualify checked Aquinas and Jerome parallels in editorial notes. Omit running head, signature and catchword.

Scan 596; printed 488; sequence 496; image block123-source-596.png. Include continuation of Hero and Leander, the final comparative paragraph and r Petronius on the widow of Ephesus. End those ordinary proceedings of doting Lovers. Remaining body from Many such allurements there are and the daggered Terence margin belong to Block 124.

Opening words: The very tone of some of their voices, a pretty pleasing speech, an affected tone they use, is able of it self to captivate a yong man;

Closing words: These are tales you will say, but they have most significant Morals, and do well express those ordinary proceedings of doting Lovers.

Passages DJR-124-01 to DJR-124-60

Source page labels: 488–494 (sequence 496–502). Scan pages: 596, 597, 598, 599, 600, 601, 602.

Scan 596; printed 488; sequence 496; image block124-source-596.png. Begin Many such allurements there are after the Block 123 endpoint. Include the remaining four margins: dagger Terence, a Marlowe, b Pornodidascalus and c Quo majoribus. Earlier body and r Petronius belong to 123.

Scan 597; printed 489; sequence 497; image block124-source-597.png. Complete body and six margins d through i: Count of Monte Turco, His artibus, Lucian, Relicto illo, the full Si quis jealousy passage and Venientem. Source retellings of Lucian retained with differences explained in Editor notes.

Scan 598; printed 490; sequence 498; image block124-source-598.png. Complete body and six margins: k Et sic, t Petronius, u Images of the Gods, x Jerome, y Meretrix and z Camden. Preserve independent Latin and English verses and the printed indolo.

Scan 599; printed 491; sequence 499; image block124-source-599.png. Complete body and eight margins: a Ille impiger, b Post sermones, dagger dance circle, c Multae, d Turpium, e Juvenal, dagger Justin and f Horace. Source errors and doubtful readings retained and explained.

Scan 600; printed 492; sequence 500; image block124-source-600.png. Complete body and six margins: g Hayward, h smock anecdote, dagger Aristaenetus, i Xenophon including its continuation across the bottom, dagger Haedus and asterisk Gregory. Preserve uncompleted anecdotes and printed book numbers.

Scan 601; printed 493; sequence 501; image block124-source-601.png. Complete body and eight margins: dagger Gregory, asterisk Lucian, k Plutarch, asterisk Lucian, dagger Ovid, dagger Hider, l Apuleius and asterisk Quintilian. Venus and Mercury symbols and the printed singular planet preserved.

Scan 602; printed 494; sequence 502; image block124-source-602.png. Opening body through But I proceed, the balanced conclusion of the dancing discussion. Include six margins: dagger Nepos, asterisk Caelius, dagger travel writers, dagger Angerianus, m Plato Greek and Latin, n Aspectus. Remaining body from If these allurements do not take place and asterisk Camden belong to 125.

Opening words: Many such allurements there are, Nods, Jests, Winks, Smiles, Wrastlings, Tokens, Favours, Symbols, Letters, Valentines, &c.

Closing words: There is a mean in all things: this is my censure in brief; Dancing is a pleasant recreation of body and mind, if sober and modest, (such as our Christian dances are) if tempestively used; a furious motive to burning lust, if as by Pagans heretofore, unchastely abused. But I proceed.

Passages DJR-125-01 to DJR-125-76

Source page labels: 494–500 (sequence 502–508). Scan pages: 602, 603, 604, 605, 606, 607, 608.

Scan 602; printed 494; sequence 502; image block125-source-602.png. Begin If these allurements do not take place after the Block 124 endpoint. Include seven remaining margins: asterisk Camden, dagger Ovid, asterisk Erasmus, asterisk Virgil, dagger Lecheus, a Lucian and b dowry. Earlier body and first six margins belong to 124.

Scan 603; printed 495; sequence 503; image block125-source-603.png. Complete body and six margins. Jupiter and Juno; age and wealth deception; Jonson verse. Preserve cernere, operosa and the printed thirty-two next December; explain checked differences.

Scan 604; printed 496; sequence 504; image block125-source-604.png. Complete body and eleven margins. Catullus Latin and Burton English triplets kept separately, oaths and gifts, three Lucretia suitors, Chaucer and Pontano. All foreign-language material translated.

Scan 605; printed 497; sequence 505; image block125-source-605.png. Complete body and eight margins. Pontano English quatrain, tears, Castiglione, Celestina, Apuleius, Seneca and Lucian. The printed Pythius retained; dialogue's Lysias and Pythias identified in note.

Scan 606; printed 498; sequence 506; image block125-source-606.png. Complete body, subsection heading and nine independent marginal entries. Preserve printed turgeri, with transparent modern interpretation tergeri. Marginal d has no clear body anchor and is attached to the tears passage. Unmarked Tritemius is a separate citation from Plautus. New Subsection 5 starts on its own body page.

Scan 607; printed 499; sequence 507; image block125-source-607.png. Complete body and seven margins. Philippa, Myrrha, Celestina, Aelred misattributed to Augustine, Petronius and Plautus, Maserius. Include the entire Maserius continuation across the page foot.

Scan 608; printed 500; sequence 508; image block125-source-608.png. Opening body through But I spare these men for the present and all eight marginal entries. The next paragraph, The last battering engins, belongs to 126 and has no additional marginal note on this page.

Opening words: If these allurements do not take place, for Simierus, that great master of dalliance shall not behave himself better, the more effectually to move others, and satisfie their lust, they will swear and lye, promise, protest, forge, counterfeit, brag, bribe, flatter and dissemble of all sides.

Closing words: Howsoever in publike they pretend much zeal, seem to be very holy men, and bitterly preach against adultery, fornication, there are no verier Bawds or whoremasters in a country, Whose soul they should gain to God, they sacrifice to the Divel. But I spare these men for the present.

Passages DJR-126-01 to DJR-126-58

Source page labels: 500–506 (sequence 508–514). Scan pages: 608, 609, 610, 611, 612, 613, 614.

Scan 608; printed 500; sequence 508; image block126-source-608.png. Begin The last battering engins immediately after the Block 125 endpoint. Include the remaining body and continue its sentence onto PDF 609. All eight margins on PDF 608 belong to 125.

Scan 609; printed 501; sequence 509; image block126-source-609.png. Complete body and eight independently anchored marginal entries. Separate the Aix place-name gloss from the following unmarked Temple gloss. Retain the isolated I. in the Barth quotation as an unresolved printed reading.

Scan 610; printed 502; sequence 510; image block126-source-610.png. Complete body and eight margins, including the parenthesis-like mark on the mandrake note. Translate all magical and botanical terminology with explicitly recorded uncertainties. Preserve the Aachen verse as six lines.

Scan 611; printed 503; sequence 511; image block126-source-611.png. Complete body, Member 4/Subsection 1 heading and nine margins. Preserve the printed zeriscæ in the Pratensis margin; interpret in context with a note. The modern Avicenna title is On Love. Keep the Seneca extracts and their introductions together.

Scan 612; printed 504; sequence 512; image block126-source-612.png. Complete body and six independent marginal entries, including the unmarked Chaucer citation. Preserve separate Latin and Burton English versions of Theocritus and Virgil. Retain the printed amorem in Virgil and explain its divergence from noctem.

Scan 613; printed 505; sequence 513; image block126-source-613.png. Complete body and thirteen margins. Retain printed medico in Barclay, with the modern slight explicitly identified as a conjectural modico. Read quam subolfacerem adulteri amore in the Struś margin. Explain the Galen identity conflation and Apollonius book reference.

Scan 614; printed 506; sequence 514; image block126-source-614.png. Opening continuation through the Latin and English couplets on mutual blushes; include only the first marginal entry, Arnulphus as bishop of Lisieux. The following paragraph But the best conjectures and the Theodorus Prodromus margin begin Block 127.

Opening words: The last battering engins, are Philters, Amulets, Spells, Charms, Images, and such unlawful means; if they cannot prevail of themselves by the help of Bawds, Panders, and their adherents, they will flye for succour to the Divel himself.

Closing words: Their faces answer, and by blushing say, How both affected are, they do bewray.

Passages DJR-127-01 to DJR-127-77

Source page labels: 506–512 (sequence 514–520). Scan pages: 614, 615, 616, 617, 618, 619, 620.

Scan 614; printed 506; sequence 514; image block127-source-614.png. Begin But the best conjectures immediately after the Block 126 endpoint. Include the rest of the body and nine remaining marginal entries, beginning with Theodorus Prodromus. The first margin, Arnulphus, belongs to 126. Retain Figam in Secundus and millia in the Catullus conclusion; explain variants in notes.

Scan 615; printed 507; sequence 515; image block127-source-615.png. Complete body and ten independent marginal entries. Preserve the printed Lucretius readings and the mutual-gaze couplet. The final dagger Dial. amorum and asterisk Ad occasum entries are separate notes with separate anchors, verified from an enlarged detail.

Scan 616; printed 508; sequence 516; image block127-source-616.png. Complete body and eight margins. Preserve the discrepancy between seven or eight journeys in the body and six or seven in the Theatre of the World margin. Retain Horace repetuntur and explain the variant.

Scan 617; printed 509; sequence 517; image block127-source-617.png. Complete body and nine margins. The account moves from bodily behaviour to mental symptoms. Record the printed Sphines as uncertain. Preserve Augustine chapter 20 in the margin and identify the matching passage in chapter 22. Retain audaciae and Excogitantia in the dramatic catalogues.

Scan 618; printed 510; sequence 518; image block127-source-618.png. Complete body and nine marginal entries, including the unmarked Ovid beside the Catullus quotation. Preserve Burton's daughters of Venus claim and explain the Hesiod discrepancy. Latin quotations and Burton's separate English versions remain independent units.

Scan 619; printed 511; sequence 519; image block127-source-619.png. Complete body and eight margins. Preserve optandum in Catullus. Notes identify the context and reordered chronology of Chaerea's speeches, and correct the final Adelphoe attribution to Andria 606, spoken by Davus. Continue the final sentence onto PDF 620.

Scan 620; printed 512; sequence 520; image block127-source-620.png. Opening continuation only, through every Lover's in the like state. The next paragraph If he hear ill news begins Block 128. All marginal entries on this page, beginning with Hædus, belong to 128.

Opening words: But the best conjectures are taken from such symptomes as appear when they are both present; all their speeches, amorous glances, actions, lascivious gestures will bewray them, they cannot contain themselves, but that they will be still kissing.

Closing words: 'Tis not Chæreas case this alone, but his, and his, and every Lover's in the like state.

Passages DJR-128-01 to DJR-128-82

Source page labels: 512–517 (sequence 520–525). Scan pages: 620, 621, 622, 623, 624, 625.

Scan 620; printed 512; sequence 520; image block128-source-620.png. Begin If he hear ill news immediately after Block 127. Include remaining body and all eleven margins, starting Haedus. Preserve defective in armor in the margin and explain the marble interpretation. Windmill margin reads emblem 13.

Scan 621; printed 513; sequence 521; image block128-source-621.png. Complete body and six margins. Preserve Burton's altered Terence and Virgil quotations, and the separate Terence sleeplessness fragment. Buchanan poem continues onto the next page.

Scan 622; printed 514; sequence 522; image block128-source-622.png. Complete body and eight margins. Enlarged detail confirms niveam. Retain placidae in Ovid and explain the Tarquinius context. Preserve Silius potis and the untraced Gargara fragment.

Scan 623; printed 515; sequence 523; image block128-source-623.png. Complete body and fifteen margins. Enlarged margin confirms Leonibus cor est violabile telis. Preserve the Marullo rearrangement and distinguish est meaning eats from Burton's gentle-fire English rendering.

Scan 624; printed 516; sequence 524; image block128-source-624.png. Complete body and twelve margins, including the first Qui quaeso amo gloss at the bottom. The next page repeats the gloss as a separate marginal entry. Preserve the alleged dissection as a reported claim with unresolved source.

Scan 625; printed 517; sequence 525; image block128-source-625.png. Opening body through all his mind was on his new Mistress, completing the Abelard example. First five marginal entries included, ending Epist. prima. Next block begins Now to this end and purpose; resume margins at Boethius l. 3 Met. ult.

Opening words: If he hear ill news, have bad success in his suit, she frown upon him, or that his Mistress in his presence respect another more Closing words: all his mind was on his new Mistress.

Passages DJR-129-01 to DJR-129-92

Source page labels: 517–523 (sequence 525–531). Scan pages: 625, 626, 627, 628, 629, 630, 631.

Scan 625; printed 517; sequence 525; image block129-source-625.png. Begin Now to this end and purpose immediately after Block 128. Include remaining body and last four marginal entries, beginning Boethius l. 3 Met. ult. The first five margins belong to 128. Prodromus margin Amor is an abbreviated work title, not the subject of genibus provolutus.

Scan 626; printed 518; sequence 526; image block129-source-626.png. Complete body and all eight marginal entries. Enlarged detail confirms ipso in Immensus amor ipso stultitia est; retain and explain the expected ipsa. Distinguish the Latin quotations from Burton's separate English renderings, including Myrrha and Medea.

Scan 627; printed 519; sequence 527; image block129-source-627.png. Complete body and all five marginal entries. Preserve the distinction between Burton's Lap-wing and Alciato's hoopoe. Enlarged catalogue detail confirms savours with long s, meaning smells, rather than favours.

Scan 628; printed 520; sequence 528; image block129-source-628.png. Complete body and all nine marginal entries. Preserve Tyndarios in the Octavia quotation and the indistinct Spenser locator Cant. lir.4; exact Spenser line remains unresolved.

Scan 629; printed 521; sequence 529; image block129-source-629.png. Complete body and all five marginal entries. Preserve the separate Chaucer, Ovid and Burton English verse. Retain tuæ in the Heloise Latin quotation and explain its grammar. Distinguish Burton's Nicomachus anecdote from the related Aelian Nicostratus account.

Scan 630; printed 522; sequence 530; image block129-source-630.png. Complete body and all eight marginal entries. Preserve Martial erit and Burton's citation 5.38 while documenting the consulted 5.37 context. Retain the irregular Ariosto pastoral list and separate Catulus Latin and English versions.

Scan 631; printed 523; sequence 531; image block129-source-631.png. Opening body through and yet their slavery is more eminent, a greater sign of their folly then the rest. Include first five marginal entries, ending Epist.24. Retain and flag doubtful nullo loco solus es. Next block starts They are commonly slaves; its first margin is y Lib.3. de aulico.

Opening words: Now to this end and purpose, if there be any hope of obtaining his suit, to prosecute his cause, he will spend himself, goods, fortunes for her

Closing words: and yet their slavery is more eminent, a greater sign of their folly then the rest.

Passages DJR-130-01 to DJR-130-56

Source page labels: 523–528 (sequence 531–536). Scan pages: 631, 632, 633, 634, 635, 636.

Scan 631; printed 523; sequence 531; image block130-source-631.png. Begin They are commonly slaves immediately after Block 129. Include remaining body and last four margins y, z, c, d, including the bottom continuation of d. First five margins belong to 129.

Scan 632; printed 524; sequence 532; image block130-source-632.png. Complete body and both margins e and dagger Plutarch. Preserve Pears, sprucely and Troilus on his Cresseid. Latin hunting and travel lines translated; Phaedra Ovid quotation differs from consulted Heroides.

Scan 633; printed 525; sequence 533; image block130-source-633.png. Complete body and all eight margins, including extended c at page foot. Restore printed she in Galeatus sentence; retain aprone and submisse. Preserve the Xenophon male beloved and record Burton's rearrangement of Critobulus's boast.

Scan 634; printed 526; sequence 534; image block130-source-634.png. Complete body and all nine margins. Preserve Latin and separate Burton English verses. Retain paratus and Te tunc jubere in altered Seneca quotation. Explain changed gender and circumstances in Amores and the source context of the adapted Medea lines.

Scan 635; printed 527; sequence 535; image block130-source-635.png. Complete body and all nine margins. Preserve Burton's abridged Chaucer, Harington and Spenser verse. Enlarged crop confirms riveld wreak; marginal Faerie Queene locator repeats canto 3 book 4. Modern rendering follows the evident sense while noting the difficult reading.

Scan 636; printed 528; sequence 536; image block130-source-636.png. Opening body through and drink he will where she drank, if it be possible, in that very place, &c. Include first eight margins s, t, dagger Lucretius, m, n, o, p, q. Preserve elliptical love and admire a servant and explain interpretation. Block 131 begins If absent; next margin r Buchanan. Sylva.

Opening words: They are commonly slaves, captives, voluntary servants, Amator amicæ mancipium, as Castilio terms him

Closing words: and drink he will where she drank, if it be possible, in that very place, &c.

Passages DJR-131-01 to DJR-131-67

Source page labels: 528–534 (sequence 536–542). Scan pages: 636, 637, 638, 639, 640, 641, 642.

Scan 636; printed 528; sequence 536; image block131-source-636.png. Begin If absent immediately after 130. Remaining body and last marginal entry r Buchanan. Sylva. Preserve quotes; Latin door and wind verses translated.

Scan 637; printed 529; sequence 537; image block131-source-637.png. Complete body and all eight margins. Preserve o/p order by body anchor. Translate Anacreontic Latin across page boundary; retain teipsum and marginal evanescis with explanation.

Scan 638; printed 530; sequence 538; image block131-source-638.png. Complete body and all eight margins including unmarked Holyday credit. Enlarged crop confirms fructu sponsi. Preserve Xenophon/Lucian anchor positions. Latin and independent English versions remain separate.

Scan 639; printed 531; sequence 539; image block131-source-639.png. Complete body and all five margins. Preserve get privileg'd, obii, gender shifts, future erit, and the Latin quatrain attributed to Petrarch. Record altered classical contexts.

Scan 640; printed 532; sequence 540; image block131-source-640.png. Complete body and all nine margins. Love's beneficial transformations and courage. Enlarged crop confirms each other slew in altered Spenser. Record source comparison and contextual rendering.

Scan 641; printed 533; sequence 541; image block131-source-641.png. Complete body and all ten margins. Retain adjacent Hyginus and Aratus margins in printed order. Explain Nemesis/Leda difference and sleeping woman, and the dog/hare conflation. Begin Cymon story.

Scan 642; printed 534; sequence 542; image block131-source-642.png. Opening three lines through and all for the love of Mistress Iphigenia. No margins belong to 131. Next begins In a word, I may say thus much of them all, let them be never so clownish; first margin dagger Plautus Casina act 2 scene 4.

Opening words: If absent, he will walk in the walk, sit under that tree where she did use to sit Closing words: and all for the love of Mistress Iphigenia.

Passages DJR-132-01 to DJR-132-53

Source page labels: 534–539 (sequence 542–547). Scan pages: 642, 643, 644, 645, 646, 647.

Scan 642; printed 534; sequence 542; image block132-source-642.png. Begin In a word immediately after Cymon and Iphigenia. All remaining body and six margins. Translate Latin and retain separate English versions. h Plautus anchor inferred from adjacent elegance quotation.

Scan 643; printed 535; sequence 543; image block132-source-643.png. Complete body and five margins. Preserve liquidâque and Thalamis; enlarged detail confirms Mart. Epig. 5. Record Virgil male beloved and barber-name difference.

Scan 644; printed 536; sequence 544; image block132-source-644.png. Complete body and all eight margins. Grooming gives way to music and dancing. Record Callistratus/Daedalus conflation, wedding details and Lucian redistribution of torch/song motifs.

Scan 645; printed 537; sequence 545; image block132-source-645.png. Complete body and eight margins. Love and Death, elderly dancers and poets, and start of the cursed-dancers story. Assign reversed Gellius and Josephus margins to their respective stories. Pontano margin reads Tom. 2. Ant. Dialogo.

Scan 646; printed 538; sequence 546; image block132-source-646.png. Complete body and nine margins. Preserve all three and Amphitomantia. Record displaced Hyginus, E Græco and Patrizi references; retain both Pliny and Gerbelius citations with painting story.

Scan 647; printed 539; sequence 547; image block132-source-647.png. Opening conclusion of painting story and Sicyon's excellence through before all the Cities in Greece. Stop before Apollo. All three margins on this page remain for 133; first u margin concerns symbols in continuing argument.

Opening words: In a word, I may say thus much of them all, let them be never so clownish

Closing words: before all the Cities in Greece.

Passages DJR-133-01 to DJR-133-76

Source page labels: 539–544 (sequence 547–552). Scan pages: 647, 648, 649, 650, 651, 652.

Scan 647; printed 539; sequence 547; image block133-source-647.png. Start Apollo immediately after Sicyon sentence ending 132. Include all remaining body and all three margins. First u margin on symbols assigned by subject; printed author Fransus retained as uncertain.

Scan 648; printed 540; sequence 548; image block133-source-648.png. Complete body and ten margins including unmarked S. R. 1600. Keep comic pastoral verse and song refrains. Retain Mat. 1.47. and explain apparent reference to Matthew 14:7.

Scan 649; printed 541; sequence 549; image block133-source-649.png. Complete body and seven margins. Preserve apparent crossing of Haedus and Aeneas Sylvius margins at their printed anchors. Include Member 5 and Subsection 1 headings.

Scan 650; printed 542; sequence 550; image block133-source-650.png. Complete body and fourteen margins. Keep Propertius non habet variant and historical humoral medical claims. Record R. T. margin/body marker discrepancy.

Scan 651; printed 543; sequence 551; image block133-source-651.png. Complete body and thirteen margins. Retain car. 56. as printed in Amatus citation, with explanation, and x before Gentleman. Keep separate Latin and Burton English verse versions. Medical and chronicle sources remain for full collation.

Scan 652; printed 544; sequence 552; image block133-source-652.png. Include body and ten margins through Such Acts and Scenes hath this Tragecomœdy of love. Stop before Member 6. Its heading, first prose and final Virgil Aeneid 6 margin belong to 134.

Opening words: Apollo was the first inventer of Physick, Divination, Oracles Closing words: Such Acts and Scenes hath this Tragecomœdy of love.

Passages DJR-134-01 to DJR-134-57

Source page labels: 544–549 (sequence 552–557). Scan pages: 652, 653, 654, 655, 656, 657.

Scan 652; printed 544; sequence 552; image block134-source-652.png. Begin Member 6, Subsection 1 heading, then Although it be controverted by some. Include final Virgil margin; all earlier body and margins belong to 133. Keep Latin verse and separate Burton English couplet.

Scan 653; printed 545; sequence 553; image block134-source-653.png. Complete body and seven margins. Preserve Ovid margin lib. 3. remed. as printed. Translate Buchanan adaptation to the goddesses and preserve its altered pronouns. Retain Horace variants.

Scan 654; printed 546; sequence 554; image block134-source-654.png. Complete body and eleven margins. Include violent Gordonius remedy and confirm printed fœtere; distinguish historical claims from editorial explanation. Preserve Rer. Sam. and explain apparent Reg. San. abbreviation. Keep Ovid rocket versus Burton eryngo difference.

Scan 655; printed 547; sequence 555; image block134-source-655.png. Complete body and seven margins. Preserve uncertain Hanea and the historical plant names. Collate Plato Laws book 2 against Burton margin book 3. Preserve sexual-discharge claims and dicteria falsa.

Scan 656; printed 548; sequence 556; image block134-source-656.png. Complete body and six margins. Include extended Latin remedy catalogue and start of prescription; retain historical female seed and provisional de Herol. title expansion. Preserve apothecary units; prescription continues onto 657.

Scan 657; printed 549; sequence 557; image block134-source-657.png. Finish prescription and Subsection 1. Include Subsection 2 headings and body through and every Physitian that treats of this subject, with first five margins. Preserve Plautus Sussilite and mihi/misero order, explain door-bolt setting. Four remaining margins and next paragraph Not only to avoid as Gregory Tholosanus exhorts belong to 135.

Opening words: Although it be controverted by some, whether Love Melancholy may be cured Closing words: and every Physitian that treats of this subject.

Passages DJR-135-01 to DJR-135-56

Source page labels: 549–554 (sequence 557–562). Scan pages: 657, 658, 659, 660, 661, 662.

Scan 657; printed 549; sequence 557; image block135-source-657.png. Begin Not only to avoid as Gregory Tholosanus exhorts, continuing Subsection 2. Include four remaining margins and Lipsius verse. Earlier body, five margins and subsection heading belong to 134. Enlarged detail confirms capita liment.

Scan 658; printed 550; sequence 558; image block135-source-658.png. Complete body and twelve margins. Retain Prosper attribution against differing marginal title, Lucretius and Ovid variants, and separate English verse version. Propertius number is retained and corrected only in editorial note.

Scan 659; printed 551; sequence 559; image block135-source-659.png. Complete body and nine margins. Preserve the reported examples of restraint and separate Lucretius/English couplets. Curtius margin prints andivisset; identify variant without silently repairing it. Preserve unidentified Venus verse.

Scan 660; printed 552; sequence 560; image block135-source-660.png. Complete body and eight margins. Include the travel and separation argument, printed Virgil attribution to Ovid, adapted amatum, Propertius travel verse, unpaired dagger marker and Heinsius noose line. Record uncertain attributions and the historical literary context.

Scan 661; printed 553; sequence 561; image block135-source-661.png. Complete body and five margins. Retain the one-eyed girl anecdote and fabricated accusations in the abbot story; distinguish Burton from the consulted Jerome parallel. Preserve Terence fragments and the catalogue of allegations against the beloved.

Scan 662; printed 554; sequence 562; image block135-source-662.png. Include Gordonius lead-in and Latin remedy, Avicenna and Arculanus through Idem Arculanus cap. 16. in 9. Rhasis, &c. Include first two margins only, g Hypatia and h Savonarola. Enlarged details confirm laboravit, demiserit and Elishi. Stop before Withall as they do discommend the old; eight later margins belong to 136.

Opening words: Not only to avoid as Gregory Tholosanus exhorts

Closing words: Idem Arculanus cap. 16. in 9. Rhasis, &c.

Passages DJR-136-01 to DJR-136-51

Source page labels: 554–558 (sequence 562–566). Scan pages: 662, 663, 664, 665, 666.

Scan 662; printed 554; sequence 562; image block136-source-662.png. Begin Withall as they do discommend the old. Include eight remaining margins, from Virg. Egl. 2 through Mus in cista natus. First two margins, Hypatia and Savonarola, belong to 135. Preserve Latin and separate English formulations.

Scan 663; printed 555; sequence 563; image block136-source-663.png. Complete body and eight margins. Include the cave allegory, changing lovers, Jerome, Pausanias, Ovid, Cicero and the Euryalus example. Two marginal entries around Triton and Galatea have uncertain exact relation; editorial note records this. Checked parallels distinguish Burton's adaptations.

Scan 664; printed 556; sequence 564; image block136-source-664.png. Complete body and five margins. Original heading SUBSECT. 6. retained; modern heading corrected to Subsection 3 with a note based on running head and sequence. Include counsel, the Terence and Virgil quotations, grief and the teacher maxim. The maxim was not located in the cited Seneca chapter.

Scan 665; printed 557; sequence 565; image block136-source-665.png. Complete body and six margins. Include moral authorities, invective, marriage considerations and the Virgil departure quotations. Preserve Surgestumque and Cloanthem in the original; explain their differences from the consulted Aeneid. Abbreviated titles and the Aretino speaker remain provisional.

Scan 666; printed 558; sequence 566; image block136-source-666.png. Complete body and seven margins, ending vilius sterquilinium nunquam vidisti. Include reason, age differences, the Petronius verse, appearances and bodily disparagement. Enlarged details confirm the Lucian simum reading and the awkward More jam sis informis. Retain the anomalous Socraticus ille Aristophanes, with explanation. All of PDF 667 belongs to 137.

Opening words: Withall as they do discommend the old

Closing words: vilius sterquilinium nunquam vidisti.

Passages DJR-137-01 to DJR-137-64

Source page labels: 559–563 (sequence 567–571). Scan pages: 667, 668, 669, 670, 671.

Scan 667; printed 559; sequence 567; image block137-source-667.png. Complete body and ten margins, beginning Follow my counsell, see her undrest. Preserve the Ovid couplet and separate English version. Notes distinguish the Newburgh kinship and chapter discrepancy, Juvenal variants, Martial Phœbi and the Cicero/Horace marginal order.

Scan 668; printed 560; sequence 568; image block137-source-668.png. Complete body and twelve margins. Include the praise of beauty, its impermanence, the Seneca and Boethius parallels, the Spartan marriage story, and the start of the catalogue of features. Separate Latin and English versions remain distinct. Pausanias contradicts Burton's characterization of Ariston's wife; the note identifies the difference.

Scan 669; printed 561; sequence 569; image block137-source-669.png. Complete body and five margins. Include the composite beauty, Candida poem attributed to Petronius, catalogue of familiar names, Drayton verse, and Hercules Oetaeus quotation. Enlarged detail confirms Malisq; minus est, partu labat and ex illa. The final English poem continues on PDF 670.

Scan 670; printed 562; sequence 570; image block137-source-670.png. Complete body and three margins, including the long Latin passage attributed to Chrysostom and two Cardano references. Complete Burton's English tree simile from the previous page. Include scrutiny of features and conduct, ending with the parents-and-companions passage that continues onto 671.

Scan 671; printed 563; sequence 571; image block137-source-671.png. Begin by completing the parents-and-companions passage; include the Thucydides and Theocritus quotations, Haedus/Ovid counsel, Philostratus, medical prejudice and the Calcagnini ring fable. End yea peradventure all women for her sake. Include only the first three margins. The remaining Læthæus margin and all body from I will say nothing of the vices of their mindes belong to 138.

Opening words: Follow my counsell, see her undrest

Closing words: yea peradventure all women for her sake.

Passages DJR-138-01 to DJR-138-63

Source page labels: 563–568 (sequence 571–576). Scan pages: 671, 672, 673, 674, 675, 676.

Scan 671; printed 563; sequence 571; image block138-source-671.png. Begin I will say nothing of the vices of their mindes, after the ring fable included in 137. Include the remaining body and final margin, Lætheus, whose spelling is checked in the enlarged scan. Three earlier margins belong to 137.

Scan 672; printed 564; sequence 572; image block138-source-672.png. Complete body and seven margins. Include Jupiter's speech, Diogenes, Chaucer, the lantern of Hero, Ariosto, the defence of both sexes and the reversible horse picture. Continue the marriage wordplay across the page boundary.

Scan 673; printed 565; sequence 573; image block138-source-673.png. Complete body and six margins. Include the hectic fever, Menander, Synesius and the books-as-children pun, Plautus and the Senecan quotations, Job, scriptural warnings, the Vestal's verse and the birdcage emblem. The final sentence continues with the Latin on PDF 674.

Scan 674; printed 566; sequence 574; image block138-source-674.png. Complete body and seven margins. Include the honey-and-gall verse, yellow hose, Stanihurst's Irish anecdote, Eubulus and Ralph Burton's separate English version, Juvenal, the comic Syracusan and the opening of the sober assessment of marriage. The sentence continues onto PDF 675.

Scan 675; printed 567; sequence 575; image block138-source-675.png. Complete body and ten margins. Include the defence of harmonious marriage, the Euripides couplet and its separate English version, Aelius Verus, Horace, polygamy, Terence, Lucian, Juvenal and Seneca. The final comparison continues onto PDF 676. Ecclus 28 final numeral is marked uncertain; Pythias retained.

Scan 676; printed 568; sequence 576; image block138-source-676.png. Include the completion of the Nero paragraph, the blackletter couplet, the catalogue of mismatched couples and the disclaimer. Continue through Being that men and women are so irreligious, the Latin verse and the English couplet ending Thou hadst much better be alone. Include only the first two margins: Camerarius and Simonides. All text from If she be barren, she is not and remaining margins belong to 139.

Opening words: I will say nothing of the vices of their mindes

Closing words: Thou hadst much better be alone.

Passages DJR-139-01 to DJR-139-68

Source page labels: 568–573 (sequence 576–581). Scan pages: 676, 677, 678, 679, 680, 681.

Scan 676; printed 568; sequence 576; image block139-source-676.png. Begin If she be barren, she is not, after the couplet included in 138. Include children, poverty, the Greek proverb and its Latin version, Augustus and troublesome households. Include the remaining six margins beginning the Bacon note. Camerarius and Simonides belong to 138. Final sentence continues onto 677.

Scan 677; printed 569; sequence 577; image block139-source-677.png. Complete body and ten margins. Include the learned wife, cosmetics, Casimir, widowhood, dowry and loss of freedom, and the paradox of the right age for marriage. Preserve Latin verse and separate English glosses.

Scan 678; printed 570; sequence 578; image block139-source-678.png. Complete body and nine margins. Praise of unmarried life and virginity, Catullus, drawbacks, the proposed college for unmarried women, and the legacy-hunters. The Juvenal asterisk has no corresponding margin. The final Annals 11 margin is attached to Tacitus in the sentence continuing onto 679.

Scan 679; printed 571; sequence 579; image block139-source-679.png. Complete body and five margins. Include legacy-hunters, Plautus and Burton's separate verse, marriage as servitude, Terence, Scheraeus and the closing bibliography. Do not duplicate the catchword SUBS.

Scan 680; printed 572; sequence 580; image block139-source-680.png. Complete body, Subsection 4 heading, and five margins. Include the magical remedies, owl's egg, Faustina, talismans, Protesilaus, Leucadian rock and opening Sappho account. Preserve Burton's Protela daughter of Degoneus, with discrepancy from Strabo explained.

Scan 681; printed 573; sequence 581; image block139-source-681.png. Include the completion of the Sappho account, Deucalion verse and separate English rendering, Scaliger, the spring, Love of Forgetfulness, Naupactus, Seneleus and the closing rebellion against Cupid. Include seven margins ending Cupido crucifixus, including the separate Seneca note. End or satisfie their desires. Stop before Subsection 5 heading; its body and Jason Pratensis margin belong to 140.

Opening words: If she be barren, she is not Closing words: or satisfie their desires.

Passages DJR-140-01 to DJR-140-89

Source page labels: 573–577 with unnumbered versos (sequence 581–587). Scan pages: 681, 682, 683, 684, 685, 686, 687.

Scan 681; printed 573; sequence 581; image block140-source-681.png. Start at Subsection 5 heading, then The last refuge and surest remedy. Include the Jason Pratensis marginal entry and the Latin and English Aeneas/Lavinia couplets. Seven preceding margins and the body above the heading belong to 139. Omit catchword Tis.

Scan 682; printed 574; sequence 582; image block140-source-682.png. Complete body and eight margins. Union as the final medical remedy; Julia/Julian and the Petronius Catal. attribution; Avicenna; Aretaeus; Pontanus verse and prose; impediments; Euphues; Elizabeth; Lucretia. Final sentence continues on 683.

Scan 683; printed 575; sequence 583; image block140-source-683.png. Complete body and nine margins. Complete Lucretia sentence; sum(m)am quotation; ranks and marriage; Moschus; Cupid's arrows; Choresus; appeal Alma to the Sibyl adapted to a mistress; Erasmus; Angeriano; Virgil; Lechæus. Final sentence continues on 684.

Scan 684; printed unnumbered verso after575; sequence 584; image block140-source-684.png. Complete unnumbered verso and five margins. Rejected lovers, Daphne, choosy women, Strozzi's Ariadne, T.H., Virgil's changed gender, torments and spoils, Atalanta and Narcissus. Preserve petiere/dira/petiere readings against Ovid. English Narcissus rendering continues on 685.

Scan 685; printed 576; sequence 585; image block140-source-685.png. Complete body and three margins. Printed page 576. English Narcissus rendering, Echo, Psyche and Fracastoro, Gargiliana, Plutarch's mare, Ausonius, the circle of love, Nisa/Mopsus and opportunities. Closing proverb begins on 686.

Scan 686; printed unnumbered verso after576; sequence 586; image block140-source-686.png. Complete unnumbered verso and four margins. Proverb, multiple suitors, Turnus and Phyllis, fox and grapes, parents and wealth, Chrysostom and Terence. End-page Non catchword omitted; actual Non possum begins next page.

Scan 687; printed 577; sequence 587; image block140-source-687.png. Include the continuation Non possum pater through the Marlowe couplet ending For will in us is over-rul'd by fate. Include first seven margins: Livy, Apuleius, Genesis26, Bonaventure, Plato, Philostratus, Juvenal. Stop before A servant maid in Aristænetus; its Lib.2.ep.7 and Ejulans notes and all later margins belong to141.

Opening words: SUBSECT. 5. The last and best cure of Love Melancholy, is, to let them have their desire.

Closing words: For will in us is over-rul'd by fate.

Passages DJR-141-01 to DJR-141-53

Source page labels: 577–580 with two unnumbered pages (sequence 587–592). Scan pages: 687, 688, 689, 690, 691, 692.

Scan 687; printed 577; sequence 587; image block140-source-687.png. Begin A servant maid in Aristænetus. Four remaining marginal entries belong to141: Aristaenetus2.7, Ejulans, Bodin and Melanchthon. First seven margins and prior body belong to140. Final family-history sentence continues on688; omit catchword as.

Scan 688; printed unnumbered page after577; sequence 588; image block141-source-688.png. Complete unnumbered page and ten margins. Free love, parental responsibilities, medical and legal arguments for timely marriage, Ambrose, Lucretia, Lysistrata and first Latin rose couplet. The English version begins689; omit catchword She.

Scan 689; printed second unnumbered page after577; sequence 589; image block141-source-689.png. Complete unnumbered page and seven marginal entries including unnumbered Idem. Rose poems, Catullus and Jonson, parental responsibility, Plautus, dowries, Eubulides, Acontius and Cydippe. Proverb begins690; omit catchword Blessed.

Scan 690; printed 578; sequence 590; image block141-source-690.png. Complete printed578 and five margins: Virgil, Fabius Pictor, Lipsius/Mayer, Mayer/Aelian and Pausanias. Short courtship, Dido, Sophonisba, golden age, Athenais/Eudocia, Rhodopis, Sirach, Danaus and riches. Omit catchword Crales.

Scan 691; printed 579; sequence 591; image block141-source-691.png. Complete printed579 body and five margins, including final Apuleius and Anacreon notes. Serbian marriage, social ambition, Galeazzo and Lionel, institutional obstacles and Tantalus. End-page sentence continues on692. Omit signatureEeee and catchword will.

Scan 692; printed 580; sequence 592; image block141-source-692.png. Printed580: complete opening sentence and dilemma, Beza advice, Paul's proposed journeys. Include first three margins: Continentiæ, Acts16:7, Romans1:13. End but hindred of Satan he could not. Nextblock142 begins There be those that think they are necessitated by Fate; remaining body and three lower margins belong to142.

Opening words: A servant maid in Aristænetus loved her mistris Minion Closing words: but hindred of Satan he could not.

Passages DJR-142-01 to DJR-142-65

Source page labels: 580–585 (sequence 592–597). Scan pages: 692, 693, 694, 695, 696, 697.

Scan 692; printed 580; sequence 592; image block141-source-692.png. Begin There be those that think they are necessitated by Fate. The first three marginal entries belong to141; include final three: Præfix. gen. Leovitii, Idem Wolfius dial., That is make the best of it. Astrology and freedom, then continue the final sentence onto693. Omit catchword ruisse.

Scan 693; printed 581; sequence 593; image block142-source-693.png. Complete printed581 and all eight margins. Compulsory celibacy, medical and sexual accusations, the fishpond allegation, Bellarmine/Coster/Valencia, James Rossa, Jerome, Cyprian and Witzel. Preserve600 in body versus more than6000 in margin and printed1419. Omit signature/catchword.

Scan 694; printed 582; sequence 594; image block142-source-694.png. Complete printed582 and all seven margins. Lydgate stanzas, poverty/colonization, marriage policy, Maranhão, religious houses and Tertullian. Final not continues695. Omit catchword.

Scan 695; printed 583; sequence 595; image block142-source-695.png. Complete printed583 and all eleven margins. Polygamy and brothels, Radziwiłł, Crassus, Surena, privileges for parenthood, marriage penalties and hesitant bachelors. Final sentence continues696. Last two margins anticipate Seneca/Epaminondas and repeat696; retain both copies. Omit signature/catchword.

Scan 696; printed 584; sequence 596; image block142-source-696.png. Complete printed584 and all twelve margins. Seneca/Horace, scholars and marriage, Beroaldo, Ovid, praise of wives, Sirach, Afranius, Lœbeus and Bacon. Final Latin poem completed here; Bacon citation anchors beginning697. Omit catchword A.

Scan 697; printed 585; sequence 597; image block142-source-697.png. Printed585 opening through Alcestis: end what more can be desired or expected? Include first margin Euripides only. Nextblock143 begins And although on the other side there be an infinite number of bad husbands; remaining margins begin Cum juxta mare agrum coleret and belong143.

Opening words: There be those that think they are necessitated by Fate

Closing words: what more can be desired or expected?

Passages DJR-143-01 to DJR-143-75

Source page labels: 585–590 (sequence 597–602). Scan pages: 697, 698, 699, 700, 701, 702.

Scan 697; printed 585; sequence 597; image block142-source-697.png. Begin And although on the other side there be an infinite number of bad husbands. First Euripides margin belongs to142. Include remaining six margins, beginning Cum juxta mare agrum coleret. Devoted husband, necessary troubles and Susarion. Last sentence continues698. Omit catchword.

Scan 698; printed 586; sequence 598; image block143-source-698.png. Complete printed586 and all ten margins, counting unmarked Lib.3.num.1 separately from Seneca and provisionally attaching it to Nevizzano. Marriage, population and the public good; beginning of Latin twelve-point list. Omit signature and catchword.

Scan 699; printed 587; sequence 599; image block143-source-699.png. Complete printed587; no marginal notes. Conclude Latin list, preserve separate English version, then all twelve opposing arguments. Discussion after the lists continues700. Omit catchword.

Scan 700; printed 588; sequence 600; image block143-source-700.png. Complete printed588 and seven margins. Take the chance of marriage; Vigil of Venus; authorities and personal wish. Final sentence continues701. Omit signature and catchword.

Scan 701; printed 589; sequence 601; image block143-source-701.png. Complete printed589 and fourteen marginal entries. Chaucer, romance couples, wedding song and classical blessings. Final English stanza continues702. Omit catchword.

Scan 702; printed 590; sequence 602; image block143-source-702.png. Complete printed590 and all three margins. Complete wedding stanza, wishes for mutual love and shared death, closing Latin bibliography and Chaucer stanza. End But now to purpose of my rather speech. Dangling dagger before concordes has no accompanying marginal note; retain source mark and explain. Section2 ends here.

Opening words: And although on the other side there be an infinite number of bad husbands

Closing words: But now to purpose of my rather speech.

Passages DJR-144-01 to DJR-144-59

Source page labels: 591–596 (sequence 603–608). Scan pages: 703, 704, 705, 706, 707, 708.

Scan 703; printed 591; sequence 603; image block143-source-703.png. Begin with Section3, Member1, Subsection1, Jealousy and its descriptor. Entire printed591 and all seven marginal entries included. End of Aegeus sentence continues704. Omit running heads, signature and catchword.

Scan 704; printed 592; sequence 604; image block144-source-704.png. Entire printed592 and all eleven margins, including two separate x entries and separate Commynes title and extract. Includes Seneca maxim, parental and religious concern, political suspicion, divine envy and opening Bodin extract. Last sentence continues705. Omit catchword.

Scan 705; printed 593; sequence 605; image block144-source-705.png. Entire printed593 and all eleven margins. Ottoman, Roman, Muscovite, French and English examples of political suspicion. Continuous Fletcher/Herodot./Maximinus marginal entry counted once. Robert Duke of Normandy sentence continues706. Omit signature and catchword.

Scan 706; printed 594; sequence 606; image block144-source-706.png. Entire printed594 and all nine margins. Complete Robert sentence, three causes, Daniel composite verse, return to erotic jealousy, Seneca verses and separate English rendering, swan story and Chaucer, elephants and camel. Last sentence continues707. Repeated t markers retained. Omit catchword.

Scan 707; printed 595; sequence 607; image block144-source-707.png. Entire printed595 and all seven margins, counting unmarked R.T. beside Propertius verse as one, provisionally attached to English version. Crocodiles and dogs, bachelors and rivalry, Memmius, Phaedria, pine and Adonis, Petronius and Chaucer, Propertius Latin and first part of separate English version. Omit catchword.

Scan 708; printed 596; sequence 608; image block144-source-708.png. Only the continuation of the English Propertius rendering and the complete closing paragraph of Subsection1, with its two margins, 1Sam1.6 and Blason of Jealousie. Ends that reverend Lord, as he stiles him. Stop before Subsection2, Causes of Jealousie; its descriptor, body and marginalia belong to145.

Opening words: SECT. 3. MEMB. 1. SUBSECT. 1. JEALOUSY.

Closing words: that reverend Lord, as he stiles him.

Passages DJR-145-01 to DJR-145-64

Source page labels: 596–601 (sequence 608–613). Scan pages: 708, 709, 710, 711, 712, 713.

Scan 708; printed 596; sequence 608; image block144-source-708.png. Start at Subsection2 and full descriptor; all following body and final three margins b, dagger and c included. Previous two margins belong to144. Sentence continues709.

Scan 709; printed 597; sequence 609; image block145-source-709.png. Entire printed597, including all eight margins: dagger, d,e,f,g, unmarked Ovid, h and unmarked R.T. First R.T. provisionally attached to High colour verse on710. Last sentence continues710.

Scan 710; printed 598; sequence 610; image block145-source-710.png. Entire printed598 and six margins: unmarked R.T., i,k,l, dagger Mimnermus and m. Complete verses, Gallus attribution, January and Latin passages retained. Last sentence continues711.

Scan 711; printed 599; sequence 611; image block145-source-711.png. Entire printed599 and nine margins: n, dagger Chaloner,o,p,p repeated,q,r,dagger Chaloner and star Pliny. Foràs claros and cannot use but checked directly. All verse lineation retained.

Scan 712; printed 600; sequence 612; image block145-source-712.png. Entire printed600 and nine entries: q,r,s,t,u,x,y,starred scholar narrative and detached unmarked lib.1. Both last entries retained separately with uncertainty recorded. Genis gratus checked against scan and Apuleius. Last sentence continues713.

Scan 713; printed 601; sequence 613; image block145-source-713.png. Entire printed601 and eight margins: a,b,star,c,dagger,star,dagger Horace and d. Snowt fair checked at enlarged scale and rendered as facial beauty. End complete paragraph at she certainly loves some other man better then himself. Omit signature and catchword.

Opening words: SUBSECT. 2. Causes of Jealousie.

Closing words: she certainly loves some other man better then himself.

Passages DJR-146-01 to DJR-146-79

Source page labels: 602–608 (sequence 614–620). Scan pages: 714, 715, 716, 717, 718, 719, 720.

Scan 714; printed 602; sequence 614; image block146-source-714.png. All body from Nevisanus at top, all eight margins e,f,g,h,i,dagger,k,l. Ends Propertius Latin couplet; separate English rendering begins715.

Scan 715; printed 603; sequence 615; image block146-source-715.png. All body and eight margins star,dagger,dagger,m,n,o,dagger,star. Final sentence continues716. Names and Latin variants retained.

Scan 716; printed 604; sequence 616; image block146-source-716.png. All body and nine margins p,q,r,star,dagger,star,dagger,dagger,s. Repeated in in in q and ut ut in Seyssel margin retained. End sentence continues717.

Scan 717; printed 605; sequence 617; image block146-source-717.png. All body and seven margins star,dagger,t,u,star,dagger,x. Burton's own qualification about honest women retained as author note. Latin and separate English versions retained.

Scan 718; printed 606; sequence 618; image block146-source-718.png. All body and eight marginal notes y,z,a,b,c,d,e,f; e continues along foot of page. Adjacent Ariosto attribution joined with f. Dagger at Livia has no matching marginal entry and is recorded editorially. Last sentence continues719.

Scan 719; printed 607; sequence 619; image block146-source-719.png. All body and ten marginal entries: dagger,star,star,unmarked Chaucer,g,dagger,star,h,star Euripides,detached1.63. Detached number provisionally attached to Martial and explained. Last sentence continues720.

Scan 720; printed 608; sequence 620; image block146-source-720.png. Opening paragraph through These are the ordinary causes of jealousie, which are intended or remitted as their circumstances vary. Only first two margins dagger and i included. Following Member2 Subsection1 heading, descriptor, body and remaining margins excluded for147.

Opening words: Nevisanus lib.4.num.72. Will have barrenness to be a main cause of Jealousie.

Closing words: These are the ordinary causes of jealousie, which are intended or remitted as their circumstances vary.

Passages DJR-147-01 to DJR-147-51

Source page labels: 608–613 (sequence 620–625). Scan pages: 720, 721, 722, 723, 724, 725.

Scan 720; printed 608; sequence 620; image block147-source-720.png. Start at MEMB.2.SUBSECT.1 and descriptor Symptoms of Jealousy. Include following body and margins star Chrysostom and k Vives. Earlier concluding causes paragraph and its margins belong146. Last sentence continues721.

Scan 721; printed 609; sequence 621; image block147-source-721.png. All body and both margins l Propertius and m Aeneas Sylvius. Latin and Burton English Propertius verses retained separately. Last sentence continues722.

Scan 722; printed 610; sequence 622; image block147-source-722.png. All body and five margins n,o,dagger Daniel,p,star Seneca. Daniel excerpt and both Latin and English Seneca verse units preserved.

Scan 723; printed 611; sequence 623; image block147-source-723.png. All body and seven margins star Quran,dagger Plautus,q,r,dagger Dio/Seneca,s,t Sandys. Last Latin sentence continues724. All Latin translated.

Scan 724; printed 612; sequence 624; image block147-source-724.png. All body and nine margins u,x,star,dagger Rhasis,dagger Aristaenetus,dagger Barthius,y,star Dionysius,z Virgil. Printed Tatia and800 retained; end sentence continues725.

Scan 725; printed 613; sequence 625; image block147-source-725.png. Opening continuation through Felix Platerus observat.lib.1.&c.; margins a Ismene,b Augustine,c Phaerus,dagger Caesar included. Following MEMB.3 heading, descriptor, body and margins beginning d Acakius excluded for148.

Opening words: MEMB. 2. SUBSECT. 1.

Closing words: Felix Platerus observat. lib.1. &c.

Passages DJR-148-01 to DJR-148-52

Source page labels: 613–618 (sequence 625–630). Scan pages: 725, 726, 727, 728, 729, 730.

Scan 725; printed 613; sequence 625; image block148-source-725.png. Start at MEMB.3 and descriptor Prognosticks of Jealousie. Include all ensuing body and eight margins d,e,f,star,g,h,i,k, including the long Phaerus and Amestris notes continued at the page foot. Earlier Member2 text and margins excluded as belonging147.

Scan 726; printed 614; sequence 626; image block148-source-726.png. All body and six margins l,m,n,p,q,r. Include bottom continuations of p and notes q,r. Printed date1600 and FelixPater retained. Finish Member3 at Such examples are too common.

Scan 727; printed 615; sequence 627; image block148-source-727.png. All body, Member4 Subsection1 heading and descriptor, and six margins s,t,u,dagger,x,y. Printed buy avoiding retained. Ovid Latin couplet and Ariosto English stanza preserved as distinct units. Last prose continues728.

