The Anatomy of Melancholy

Robert Burton
A parallel reading edition of the 1651 text with a close modern English rendering

Contents

Introduction
Note on the Text
Democritus Junior to the Reader
To the reader who misuses his leisure.
Outline of the First Partition.
The First Partition.
Member 2
SYNOPSIS OF THE SECOND PARTITION.
Section 4
OUTLINE OF THE THIRD PARTITION
THE THIRD PARTITION LOVE MELANCHOLY
SECTION 3
JEALOUSY
SECTION 4
The Index
To the Reader
Contextual lexicon
Source term index
Modern rendering index
Thematic index
Source record
Bibliography and comparison resources

Introduction

A book that includes its reader

Robert Burton offers an unusual reason for writing a book about melancholy: he is trying to keep melancholy at bay. “I write of melancholy, by being busie to avoid melancholy,” he tells his reader. The work that follows is an occupation, an inquiry and an attempt to help others through knowledge acquired at some personal cost. “I would help others out of a fellow-feeling,” he adds. These declarations do not explain everything in The Anatomy of Melancholy, but they establish a relation that survives its many changes of subject. The writer does not occupy a place entirely outside the affliction he describes. His reader need not occupy one either.[1]

At first the book can seem to demand an impossible preparation. There are medical authorities to distinguish, ancient poets to recognize, Latin sentences to decipher and divisions within divisions to remember. Burton makes room for almost anything: digestion and demonic temptation, disappointed scholars and jealous husbands, gardens and planetary systems, poverty and the pleasures of music. Yet its abundance also offers many ways in. A reader may arrive through a familiar feeling and stay for an unfamiliar explanation. A comic portrait may open into an account of suffering; a catalogue that seems merely extravagant may expose how difficult it is to bring human experience under a single rule.

Burton repeatedly unsettles the comfortable position of the observer. He invites us to laugh at the world's follies, then discovers those follies among scholars, writers and people very much like himself. The pronoun changes: they become we. The book's prodigious learning does not secure its speaker against vanity, frustration or error. Reading it closely means listening for these changes of position. A confident judgement may be followed by an objection, an exception or a confession. Sometimes a new authority reverses the force of the authorities that came before it. The accumulation is part of the argument, even when the argument refuses to settle.[2]

This edition offers a close modern-English rendering beside the older text so that these movements can be followed without losing contact with Burton's words. It seeks to make the whole work accessible, including its repetitions, awkward transitions and conflicting voices. Burton's strangeness belongs to what there is to read. His familiarity does too: the pleasure of an absorbing occupation, the humiliations of dependence, the mind's return to a feared possibility, the difficulty of consoling someone whose suffering we cannot remove.

Burton and Democritus Junior

Robert Burton lived from 1577 to 1640. Born in Leicestershire, he completed his degree at Christ Church, Oxford, where he spent most of his adult life and served as librarian from 1624 until his death. The Anatomy first appeared in 1621 and grew through successive editions. A life centred on books supplied both its materials and one of its recurring subjects: what learning can give a person, and what it can cost.[3]

The author who addresses us, however, calls himself Democritus Junior. Burton's ancient model is the philosopher whose laughter at human conduct made his neighbours suspect him of madness. In the story Burton recounts, Hippocrates comes to examine Democritus and discovers that the supposed patient understands the world's disorder better than the people who summoned a physician. The story reaches Burton through letters attributed to Hippocrates, not through a contemporary record of the [1] Editor. Burton, “Democritus Junior to the Reader,” pp. 5–6 (1651). Unless stated otherwise, references in these notes are to the 1651 text. Quotations in this Introduction retain its wording with lightly modernized typography.

[2] Editor. “Democritus Junior to the Reader,” especially the defence of writing and borrowing, pp. 6–9, and the extension of folly and melancholy to humanity, pp. 18–20.

[3] Editor. Christ Church, University of Oxford, “A rare acquisition from our 17th-century librarian,” 15 July 2024, https://www.chch.ox.ac.uk/news/rare-acquisition-our-17th-century-librarian.

encounter. Its importance here lies in the situation it supplies: the person whom society calls mad may be its most searching critic.[4]

The adopted name permits Burton to move between distances. From one position he surveys the world as a vast spectacle. From another he is the secluded college scholar who hears of wars, marriages, crimes and changes of fortune while remaining largely in place. He presents his retirement as sufficient to his needs, yet the news he gathers fills it with agitation. The long address “Democritus Junior to the Reader” joins this self-portrait to attacks on war, exploitation, religious quarrels and the misuse of learning. It also imagines reforms. The private library opens onto the troubled commonwealth.[5]

Democritus Junior is neither a transparent diary voice nor a disguise that makes personal feeling irrelevant. Burton says that painful experience has taught him something; he also speaks through quotations, theatrical roles and borrowed complaints. When he describes the scholar's dependence on patrons, the length and expense of education or the humiliation of seeking advancement, the speaker's involvement is hard to miss. Elsewhere he admits that scholars help produce the abuses they deplore. His bookish authority repeatedly becomes a bookish vulnerability. These passages reward attention to self-presentation without turning every literary gesture into a biographical fact.[6]

The text used here is the sixth edition, published in 1651, after Burton's death. At its close, the notice signed H. C. describes a corrected copy with handwritten additions used in preparing the edition. That account helps explain the book's continued enlargement; it does not by itself establish that an original manuscript survives. The 1651 printed text is this edition's point of reference. It retains the accumulated character of a work revised over years, including expressions whose immediate political setting belongs to an earlier moment. The separate Note on the Text explains the choice of copy and the treatment of its difficulties.[7]

The many meanings of melancholy

The word melancholy cannot be exchanged throughout this book for one present-day diagnosis. Burton uses it for a bodily humour, a disposition, an established illness, a kind of suffering and, at times, an image of the human condition. In the preface he deliberately widens its reach until folly, discontent, fear and sorrow seem to implicate everyone. In the medical divisions he attempts more exact distinctions. The movement between these uses is essential. A satirist's claim that the world is melancholy does different work from a physician's account of a particular disorder.[8]

Burton explains the name through black bile. His account belongs to a physiology in which humours, bodily qualities, organs and spirits help explain health, temperament and illness. The spirits discussed in this anatomy are often physiological agencies, rather than ghosts or moods; their meaning must be taken from the passage. Similarly, a person's complexion can be a constitution, and a habit an established condition. Such words carry theories within them. Making their sentences easier to read should not make those theories disappear or silently replace them with the language of a later medicine.[9]

Even within its historical terms, melancholy is not a settled object. Burton assembles definitions, tests their scope and records disagreement. One usual definition associates it with fear and sadness, without fever and without an apparent cause adequate to the feeling. He then qualifies the formula: some of the [4] Editor. “Democritus Junior to the Reader,” pp. 23–26, retelling the encounter from the pseudonymous Hippocratic letters. See also the editorial notes to the passage.

---

[5] Editor. “Democritus Junior to the Reader,” pp. 3–4; the subsequent survey of social and political disorder occupies much of the address.

[6] Editor. First Partition, digression on the miseries of scholars; especially the accounts of education, patronage, simony and scholars' own responsibility. See also Burton's defence of medical writing by a clergyman in “Democritus Junior to the Reader,” pp. 14–16.

[7] Editor. Sixth-edition title page and the closing notice “To the Reader,” signed H. C. See the Note on the Text for the base copy, recovered leaves and limits of comparison.

[8] Editor. “Democritus Junior to the Reader,” p. 18; First Partition, definition of melancholy, pp. 31–35. The broad prefatory use and the medical divisions should be read together without treating them as interchangeable.

[9] Editor. First Partition, preliminary anatomy of body and soul and discussion of the humours, spirits and faculties; compare the definitions on pp. 31–35.

people described are cheerful or bold, and fear and sorrow are not present in every case. Authorities disagree about which bodily parts are affected and whether imagination, reason or both are impaired. Classification produces further divisions and exceptions. The system is learned and elaborate, but its categories remain under pressure from the cases they are meant to contain.[10]

Body and soul act upon one another throughout the book. Burton defends his participation in medical discussion as a clergyman by arguing that this mixed affliction needs both physical and spiritual understanding. Food, sleep, exercise, air and the passions belong within a connected account of human life. So do sin, conscience, divine judgement and the Devil. Natural and supernatural explanations can appear in the same sequence without being treated as mutually exclusive. To read this faithfully is to notice how Burton apportions causes and authority in a given passage, rather than assume that he is always making the same kind of claim.[11]

The historical distance is sometimes widest where the experience seems most familiar. A compelling description of sleeplessness or fear may stand beside an explanation we cannot accept. An extraordinary anecdote may illuminate what Burton or his source imagined possible without establishing that the event occurred. His medical recipes likewise belong to the historical work. Their presence in a readable modern rendering gives access to his account of treatment; it does not turn that account into contemporary advice. The book remains valuable as an encounter with the efforts, assumptions and difficulties through which people tried to understand distress.

The shape of the Anatomy

Burton gives his abundance a visible structure. Three partitions divide into sections, members and subsections, with synopses that offer a compressed view of the arrangement. The First Partition considers melancholy's definition, causes, symptoms and prognosis. Before narrowing its object, it surveys human vulnerability and supplies an account of body and soul. Its causes extend from bodily constitution and regimen to passions, habits and circumstances. The Second Partition considers cures. The Third turns to love melancholy and religious melancholy, including the disorders of desire, jealousy, superstition and despair. This outline is worth keeping in mind even when the prose seems to have travelled a long way from it.[12]

The architecture also permits an argument to grow beyond its heading. A discussion of scholars becomes an extended reckoning with poverty, patronage, clerical appointments and the distribution of honour. A consideration of air opens onto geographical and cosmological questions. Recreation brings gardens, buildings, spectacles, journeys and books into the account of relief. These passages are digressions in a literal sense, departures from a shorter route; they are also ways of testing how much of the world the stated subject requires. The reader can lose the local thread while still discovering why a narrowly medical book would be insufficient to Burton's purpose.[13]

The digression on air makes the method especially clear. Burton collects reports of strange places and natural marvels, considers the earth and the heavens, and repeatedly asks what can be known. An answer may lead to another disputed question. Astonishing testimony stands beside doubt about the people who offer it. The journey offers intellectual refreshment, but it also exhibits the appetite that makes the Anatomy so large: every boundary of knowledge becomes an invitation to read further. The scholar who warns against excessive study knows its attractions very well.[14]

---

[10] Editor. First Partition, definition of melancholy, especially pp. 31–32. Burton records exceptions to the association with fear and sorrow, then considers the parts and faculties affected.

[11] Editor. “Democritus Junior to the Reader,” pp. 15–16; First Partition, general causes and the accounts of spirits and celestial influence.

[12] Editor. The synopses of the three partitions and their corresponding divisions in the text.

[13] Editor. First Partition, digression on scholars; Second Partition, the discussions of air, exercise and recreations of body and mind.

[14] Editor. Second Partition, digression on air. The interpretation here concerns the movement of Burton's inquiry; it does not endorse the natural and geographical reports assembled there.

The Second Partition often works by adjustment rather than by a universal prescription. Music may relieve sorrow, but it can also intensify amorous fixation. Reading and retirement may provide pleasure, while excessive study and isolation may injure the person who seeks refuge in them. The preliminary "Abstract of Melancholy" already stages a comparable instability, alternating the pleasures and miseries of melancholy in its recurring refrains. Such reversals make repetition informative. When an activity appears once as a cause and elsewhere as a remedy, the question is what has changed: the person, the circumstances, the degree or the use.[15]

The book's organization therefore supports several kinds of reading. Its divisions help the reader return to a subject; its extended prose asks for enough patience to hear a case answered or qualified. Reading only an isolated maxim risks missing the objection that follows. Reading every catalogue at the same speed may obscure the larger movement. Burton provides an orderly table and an unruly experience of following it. The useful habit is to keep the outline available while allowing a particular passage to establish its own pace.

Learning, quotation and changing voices

Burton's authors crowd the page. Scripture, ancient poetry, philosophy, medical writing, histories and travellers' reports enter into arguments that also admit proverbs, jokes and remembered conversation. These materials do not all carry the same evidential weight. A verse may express an emotional truth; an anecdote may furnish a warning; a physician may supply an explanation or a case; a theological authority may establish the terms of an objection. The name in a margin tells us something about Burton's presentation of authority. It does not, on its own, tell us that the story is verified or that he consulted the named work directly.

He is explicit about the art of borrowing. In the preface, images of bees, food and digestion describe the transformation of material taken from others. What he gathers acquires another form through selection and arrangement. His defence can also become comedy: the industrious compiler shares in the literary appetites he mocks. The extensive treatment of self-love and the desire for fame gives this comedy a further edge. A writer who exposes the wish to survive in one's books is himself producing a book of formidable size.[16]

Readers will encounter places where Burton's English version and the preceding Latin do not say precisely the same thing. Both belong to his presentation. A gloss can sharpen, soften or redirect a quotation; a sequence can turn an authority towards a new purpose. The modern rendering accordingly retains both stages rather than merging them into one apparently seamless statement. That can produce a deliberate echo in English. The echo records Burton's rhetorical action, and sometimes makes an important difference easier to see.

The same attentiveness is needed when a speaker objects. In the consolations for poverty, the sufferer challenges the adequacy of comforting words offered by people who have enough. In the treatment of despair, a distressed voice presses doubts against the answer just given. Burton can sound impatient, then solicitous; he can minimize a wound and then describe it with force. We should not flatten these exchanges into a single continuous declaration. An objection that he intends to answer may nevertheless retain its power, especially when it names a material want that verbal consolation cannot supply.[17]

Nor does recognizing performance dissolve judgement. Some contradictions are productive; others expose limits in an argument or prejudice in a source. Burton can question a report, accept another with little apparent resistance, or preserve competing claims. The notes in this edition distinguish the act of transcribing his reference from independently locating the passage and from establishing what that passage proves. Where an identification remains uncertain, the uncertainty belongs in view. Clearer

[15] Editor. Second Partition, music as a remedy; First Partition, excessive study and solitude; the preliminary poem "The Author's Abstract of Melancholy."

[16] Editor. "Democritus Junior to the Reader," pp. 7–9; First Partition, self-love, vainglory, praise and honour.

[17] Editor. Second Partition, consolations against poverty and want; Third Partition, remedies for religious despair. Observe the changes between the objecting sufferer and the voice of counsel.

English should make it easier to evaluate the argument, not lend it an authority it did not previously possess.

Society, love and religion

The Anatomy repeatedly takes suffering beyond the individual body. Disappointment has institutions around it: households, universities, churches, courts and markets. Burton's portraits of poverty and dependence ask who has the means to live, who receives honour, and whose labour serves someone else's comfort. His attacks on avarice and prodigality connect mental disquiet with possessions and expenditure. The social reach of the book does not make him consistently egalitarian. Rank qualifies his permissions, and his schemes for national improvement can endorse domination. His account of the political body can criticize injustice while treating conquest and colonial settlement as instruments of improvement.[18]

Love gives these tensions another field. The Third Partition starts with broad questions about love and beauty before following desire through its occasions, symptoms and proposed remedies. Poems and stories supply imagined interiors as well as cautionary examples. The lover sees a world reorganized around one person; the jealous mind finds confirmation in what it fears. Burton's resources for describing these states are often vivid. His judgements about women, marriage and sexual conduct also carry damaging generalizations. Attribution matters here, but borrowing a judgement does not remove the force it receives within his own argument.[19]

Religious melancholy brings the book's claims about body, belief and community into their most difficult proximity. Burton's account is Christian and confessional. His survey of religions condemns Jews, Muslims and other communities, attacks Catholic and Eastern Christian practices, and then returns to disagreement within Protestant churches. The movement back towards his own religious world is significant without cancelling the hostility directed elsewhere. He can recognize folly among those nearest him and still claim a privileged position from which to describe the faith of others.[20]

The ensuing treatment also asks how religious fear is produced and maintained. Promises, threats, imitation, impressive ceremonies and alleged miracles help sustain what Burton calls superstition; political and clerical interests enter his explanation. He presents these agencies within a theology that includes demonic action. Their emotional operation is nevertheless part of the account: hope and fear can make people vulnerable to those who claim authority over their consciences. The book's criticism of credulity is thus entangled with its own commitments about true belief, legitimate counsel and spiritual danger.[21]

In the treatment of despair, argument becomes more intimate. The sufferer cannot repent, cannot feel assurance, fears that a thought already amounts to condemnation. Burton's collected answers distinguish an unwanted thought from willing assent and present feeling from what remains possible. The counsel retains theological conditions, but it also finds room for weakness and incomplete confidence. Images of a dormant tree, a hidden spark and embers beneath ashes allow hope to persist without demanding that it already feel secure. This is one of the places where the book's patient attention to distinctions serves compassion most directly.[22]

---

[18] Editor. “Democritus Junior to the Reader,” discussion of Britain, conquest, settlement, labour and prosperity; First Partition, avarice, prodigality and the miseries of scholars.

[19] Editor. Third Partition, general accounts of love and beauty, love melancholy and jealousy. These paragraphs distinguish the work's descriptive resources from its generalizations about groups.

[20] Editor. Third Partition, religious melancholy, especially pp. 640–642. The passage turns from judgements on other faiths and churches to superstition and division among Protestants.

[21] Editor. Third Partition, causes of religious melancholy, beginning at p. 642; the explanatory synopsis and the discussion of hope, fear and supposed miracles follow the survey of religions.

[22] Editor. Third Partition, remedies for despair: inability to repent, troubling thoughts, lack of assurance and the exchanges concerning grace. The distinctions and images discussed here occur in the final consolatory sequence before the return to bodily remedies.

Reading this edition

The original and modern texts offer two routes through the same passage. In the parallel layout, Burton's wording appears on the left and the modern rendering on the right. In the annotated ebook, corresponding passages follow one another so that they can adapt to the reader's screen. The modern version opens difficult syntax, translates the Latin and Greek, and explains obsolete senses where the sentence requires it. It retains lists, qualifications, repetitions, direct address and changes of tone. The older text remains available for comparison, including places where several renderings might reasonably be considered.

Notes labelled Burton reproduce his marginal material, with editorial translation or explanation distinguished from the quoted source. Notes labelled Editor explain vocabulary, allusion, context and textual decisions. They are aids to reading, not a demand to interrupt every sentence. For a first encounter with a long argument, it can be useful to read the prose through and return to the notes where a question has formed. Readers concerned with a particular attribution can instead move between the passage and its annotation. The separate Note on the Text gives the detailed account of transcription and modernization.

The contextual lexicon gathers recurring terms whose historical senses can be hard to hold in mind. Burton's own index supplies a different kind of access: its subjects and page references reveal how the earlier book offered itself for consultation. Those printed locators belong to the source edition. Where a destination has been established, a link assists the reader; an unresolved reference remains visible without pretending to lead somewhere secure. The modern-English-only ebook offers another choice, preserving the continuous rendering and navigation while leaving out the parallel original and editorial apparatus.

There is no single entrance that every reader must use. “Democritus Junior to the Reader” introduces the voice at its most expansive; the opening of the First Partition establishes the historical framework; the sections on study, music or consolation can make an inviting shorter encounter. Returning later to the surrounding argument often changes what a favourite passage seems to say. The frontispiece and its explanatory verses also repay attention: the illustrated figures make the subject bodily and particular, while Burton's portrait places the author among the things to be examined.

The last practical counsel returns to the purpose announced near the beginning. Burton urges the distressed person to disclose troubles, accept help from friends and suitable advisers, and seek a change in the thoughts and circumstances that sustain the distress. His final precept is brief: “Be not solitary, be not idle.” It follows a book that has made solitude immensely populous and occupation almost inexhaustible. The contradiction does not need to be tidied away. It leaves us with a writer whose chosen labour is implicated in the trouble he hopes to relieve, and whose learning becomes most generous when it makes room for another person's pain.[23]

[23] Editor. Third Partition, concluding counsel, pp. 722–723. The original final precept is quoted; the modern rendering reads, “Do not be solitary; do not be idle.”

Note on the Text

The source edition

This is a parallel reading edition of Robert Burton's The Anatomy of Melancholy, based on the sixth edition, printed for Henry Cripps in 1651. Its principal witness is the copy digitized by McGill University Library. The source column gives a reset transcription of that printed text; the accompanying column offers a close modern-English rendering. The purpose of the pairing is to make the work readable while allowing the reader to examine how the rendering relates to its source.[24]

The choice of 1651 establishes a definite text to follow. It does not identify that printing with an original manuscript, nor does it claim that every reading represents Burton's final intention. The closing notice signed H. C. states that Burton left a carefully corrected copy with additions in his own hand, entrusted to the writer of the notice for incorporation into the next edition. This is testimony about the preparation of the printing. It does not establish the present survival of that corrected copy or of a complete autograph manuscript. The notice is retained with the book's closing material so that its claim can be read directly.[25]

Burton's preliminary matter, explanatory verses, address to the reader, synopses, three partitions and alphabetical Table belong to the source work. The engraved frontispiece accompanies its explanatory text in the annotated edition. The Table, the H. C. notice and the imprint follow the main work. The new Introduction, this Note on the Text and the contextual lexicon are editorial additions. They should not be mistaken for Burton's own preliminaries or conclusions.

The supplied pages and printed pagination

The McGill scan repeats printed pages 96–97 and lacks the opening numbered 98–99 between PDF pages 199 and 200. The missing body text and marginalia have been supplied from another copy of the 1651 edition, held by the Bavarian State Library, shelfmark 2 Path. 17 k, digitization bsb10330491. In the Internet Archive presentation, the supplied leaves are n191–192, corresponding to image numbers 192–193. These were compared with an independent 1651 microfilm at Archive leaves n197–198.[26]

The supplied text begins “anguish, and vexation” and ends with “sur-”; the McGill copy resumes with “prized at unawares” on printed page 100. The divided word is surprized. Recording these verbal boundaries identifies the join more securely than a page number alone. The marginal material from the supplied opening is included, and the repeated page labels in the principal scan have not been silently converted into the missing numbers. The source record preserves the identities of the images used for the recovery.

Throughout the edition, a printed page label, a leaf's place in sequence and a PDF page number are separate kinds of reference. The source has repeated, missing and mistaken numerals, so there is no single arithmetic conversion from printed page to scan page. For example, a late page is printed 651 in the position corresponding to 659, and the next leaf is printed 660. A jump in numbering does not by itself prove the loss of text. Locations are established from the local sequence and the words on the page; the annotations explain discrepancies where they matter to the passage or a cross-reference.

---

[24] Editor. Robert Burton, The Anatomy of Melancholy, sixth edition, 1651, McGill University Library copy: digitized volume (https://archive.org/details/McGillLibrary-RBSC_QUATRO-2497-17110).

[25] Editor. Closing notice “To the Reader,” signed H. C., on the unnumbered closing leaf, PDF page 845 in the McGill scan. See also the editorial note accompanying the notice.

[26] Editor. Bavarian State Library, 2 Path. 17 k, bsb10330491: supplied opening (https://archive.org/details/10330491bsb/page/n191/mode/2up). Independent 1651 microfilm: comparison opening (https://archive.org/details/bim_early-english-books-1641-1700_the-anatomy-of-melanchol_burton-robert_1651/page/n197/mode/2up). Archive leaf labels and PDF page numbers use different sequences.

Transcribing the older English

The source column preserves historical wording and spelling while resetting the typography for reading. The long s is represented by ordinary s, spacing is regularized and words divided merely by a line ending are rejoined. The original page layout is not reproduced line for line. Short corresponding passages provide the units of alignment, and a long printed paragraph may occupy more than one pair of passages. Such divisions help comparison; they do not signal a new paragraph or a break in Burton's argument.

Source page locations remain associated with the passages. The divisions of the book, quotations and verse are retained, but the new typesetting does not reproduce every feature of a seventeenth-century page. It should therefore be read as a transcription alongside a rendering, not as a facsimile. The scan remains the evidence for the appearance of the printed witness. Square brackets can occur in Burton's own text, as in his discussion of the definition of melancholy; their presence in the source column does not automatically indicate an editorial insertion.[27]

A doubtful letterform, an apparent misprint and a conjectured correction are different matters. Where the evidence does not settle a reading, the local note states the difficulty or the basis of the adopted interpretation. The source has not been silently rewritten throughout to match a cited author, a later edition or an expected Latin form. Where a correction or supplied sense is needed for the modern rendering, the explanation identifies it. This preserves a distinction between what the witness prints and what an editor judges it may mean.

The modern rendering

The modern English aims to retain the sequence and substance of Burton's presentation. Long sentences may be divided and their syntax clarified; obsolete words receive a current equivalent where one can carry the relevant sense. Lists, qualifications, repetitions, direct address, jokes and changes of speaker are retained. A transition from an objecting sufferer to the voice of counsel is part of the argument and must remain perceptible. A claim reported from another writer is not silently promoted into an assertion made without qualification by Burton.

The same word does not always require the same modern equivalent. Complexion may describe bodily constitution; affection may mean a condition; habit may denote an established state, but elsewhere a costume. Melancholy, spirit and the names of the faculties carry historical meanings that cannot be replaced throughout with present-day psychological or medical terms. Context governs the choice. Notes and the lexicon explain recurring senses while allowing for differences between passages. Historical explanations and judgements remain attributed to the speaker or source that advances them.

Latin and Greek passages are translated in the modern text. When Burton follows a foreign-language quotation with his own English version, both stages are preserved: a fresh rendering of the quoted words and a modernization of his English. They may overlap, but they may also diverge in emphasis or meaning. Combining them would conceal part of his method. Verse remains lineated, without imposing a new rhyme scheme at the expense of sense. Names and titles use identifiable conventional forms where possible; unusual forms or uncertain identifications are explained when necessary.

Historical medical quantities and recipe terms are treated within the text's own system, with local explanations of difficult notation. An unclear sign is not made certain by converting it into a modern unit. For example, the note on the recipe at printed page 397 records conflicting indications and retains a tentative reading while stating that the intended quantity cannot be established securely from the scan. That distinction is part of the textual evidence, rather than a defect to hide through a smooth sentence.[28]

---

[27] Editor. First Partition, definition of melancholy, printed p. 31; Burton's explanation of the terms includes the bracketed phrases “without an ague” and “without a cause.”

[28] Editor. Second Partition, printed p. 397. See the recipe’s Editor note on the tentative half-ounce reading and the incompatible sign. No conversion can resolve the uncertainty in the witness.

Marginal material and editorial notes

Notes labelled Burton preserve the marginal references and quoted marginal text. Their printed location and reference letter are recorded where available. Translation or editorial explanation within such a note is distinguished from the quoted material. Notes labelled Editor address vocabulary, historical concepts, allusions, changes of voice, uncertain readings and decisions made in the modern rendering. Numbering belongs to the present edition; the labels identify the different kinds of material it brings together.

The attachment of a marginal note follows the words it explains, rather than its height on the printed page alone. A marginal passage can extend beside several lines or across a page boundary. The annotations follow the recorded connection with the body text, including places where two nearby references concern different subjects. Material appearing once in the margin is not duplicated merely because a later sentence recalls it. Conversely, an author's genuine repetition is not removed as an accidental duplication. A quoted passage and Burton's separate restatement can both be necessary to the reader's understanding.

Editorial notes distinguish three situations: a reference or quotation transcribed from Burton; a source passage or relevant parallel independently located; and an attribution or detail still unresolved. These are descriptions of evidence, not interchangeable marks of certainty. A close parallel may explain an allusion without proving which edition Burton used. A quotation found in a named author may still have reached Burton through another writer. A story's presence in an identifiable source establishes that source's testimony, not necessarily the truth of the reported event.

Corrections and the limits of comparison

Corrections to transcription, interpretation and note placement have been assessed against the base images, the paired passages, existing annotations and saved comparisons. Earlier printings, other copies and identifiable primary sources have been consulted for particular difficulties where recorded. This edition does not claim a complete collation of all historical printings, every surviving copy or every work Burton cites. It offers a reading text with documented local decisions, rather than a reconstructed text supported by an exhaustive apparatus of variants.

A comparison may settle one question while leaving another open. It may establish a page label, the wording of a marginal quotation or the meaning of a clause without identifying the precise intermediary through which Burton encountered it. An uncertain technical sense can likewise be disclosed even where a defensible general rendering is possible: condition renders the printed astrological word case at page 309, with the limit of that interpretation stated in the note. The distinction between a settled editorial treatment and a fully resolved source history is maintained.[29]

The bibliography gathers resources recorded in the preparation and comparison of the text. Repeated references to the same resource address are grouped while their differing descriptions and scopes are preserved. Distinct editions, language versions and page-specific addresses remain distinguishable. Inclusion in that record does not certify every attribution or assertion associated with a resource. The local note or comparison supplies the relevant finding and its limit. Unresolved scholarly questions remain visible without implying that the reader is being offered a fully authenticated chain of transmission for every quotation.

Navigation and forms of the edition

Burton's sections and synopses provide the principal structure. Where a printed synopsis and a body heading disagree, the source reading is retained and explained; the modern synopses follow the corresponding body headings. An incomplete or prospective cross-reference is not given an invented destination. The alphabetical Table retains its entries and printed locators. Its numbers refer to the source edition, not to pages in the new layout. Links are supplied only where a subject has been checked against its destination. Most numerical locators remain unlinked, and a matching topic does not by itself prove which number the indexer intended.

[29] Editor. Second Partition, printed p. 309, astrological use of “case.” The Editor note identifies “condition” as a general rendering and leaves the precise technical force unresolved.

The annotated PDF and DOCX place the older and modern texts side by side. The annotated EPUB places corresponding passages in sequence so that they can reflow on a screen; Markdown preserves the annotated edition in a text format. The modern-English-only EPUB contains the modern rendering and navigation, without the original column, footnotes, Introduction, this textual note or the lexicon. These different presentations serve different reading preferences. The source record and the paired text remain the means of examining an editorial choice when a closer comparison is wanted.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 7 THE ANATOMIE OF MELANCHOLY.	THE ANATOMY OF MELANCHOLY.[30]
Source page 8 The Argument of the Frontispiece.	An Explanation of the Frontispiece.[31]
Ten distinct Squares here seen apart, Are joyn'd in one by Cutters art.	Ten separate panels you see here Are joined as one by the engraver's art.
1 Old Democritus under a tree, Sits on a stone with book on knee; About him hang there many features, Of Cats, Dogs and such like creatures; Of which he makes Anatomy, The seat of black choler to see. Over his head appears the skie, And Saturn Lord of melancholy.	1 Old Democritus, beneath a tree, Sits on a stone, a book upon his knee; Around him hang the bodies Of cats, dogs and similar creatures, Which he dissects To find the seat of black bile. Above his head appears the sky, And Saturn, lord of melancholy.[32]
2 To th' left a landskip of Jealousie, Presents it self unto thine eye. A Kingfisher, a Swan, an Hern, Two fighting Cocks you may discern, Two roaring Bulls each other hie, To assault concerning Venery. Symboles are these; I say no more, Conceive the rest by that's afore.	2 On the left, a landscape of jealousy Presents itself to your eye. A kingfisher, a swan, a heron, And two fighting cocks can be seen; Two roaring bulls rush at each other, To fight over mating. These are symbols; I say no more. Infer the rest from what came before.[33]

[30] Editor. Half-title on PDF 7. The preceding leaves are binding and copy-specific material, including a bookplate and handwritten price or ownership marks. They are not Burton's text. This preliminary matter precedes Democritus Junior to the Reader.

[31] Editor. Argument means an account of the subject. The numbered verses explain the ten panels of the engraved title on the following leaf. That leaf is reproduced with the preliminary matter in this edition. Verse lines are retained; the modern version does not impose new rhyme.

[32] Editor. Features here means bodily forms. The scene presents the story of Democritus dissecting animals to locate black bile, the humour associated with melancholy. Saturn's place above him supplies the corresponding astrological influence; the poem itself identifies it.

[33] Editor. Hern is heron; hie means hurry. Venery here means sexual activity, not hunting. The landscape gathers animal emblems of jealousy and rivalry; the verse leaves their fuller application to the reader.

Original text 1651	Modern English
3 The next of Solitariness, A portraiture doth well express, By sleeping dog, cat: Buck and Do, Hares, Conies in the desart go: Bats, Owls the shady bowers over, In melancholy darkness hover. Mark well: If 't be not as't should be, Blame the bad Cutter, and not me.	3 The next gives a clear picture Of solitude: A sleeping dog and cat; buck and doe, Hares and rabbits roam the wilderness; Bats and owls above the shaded bowers Hover in melancholy darkness. Look carefully: if it is not as it should be, Blame the poor engraver, not me.[34]
4 Ith' under Columne there doth stand Inamorato with folded hand; Down hangs his head, terse and polite, Some dittie sure he doth indite. His lute and books about him lie, As symptomes of his vanity. If this do not enough disclose, To paint him, take thy self by th' nose.	4 In the panel below there stands The lover, with his hands folded; His head droops, neat and elegant; Surely he is composing some song. His lute and books lie around him, Signs of his foolishness. If this does not reveal enough To picture him, take yourself by the nose.[35]
5 Hypocondriacus leans on his arm, Winde in his side doth him much harm, And troubles him full sore God knows, Much pain he hath and many woes. About him pots and glasses lie, Newly brought from's Apothecary. This Saturn's aspects signifie, You see them portraid in the skie.	5 The sufferer from hypochondriac melancholy leans on his arm; Wind in his side does him much harm, And troubles him severely, God knows. He has much pain and many sorrows. Around him lie pots and glass vessels, Newly brought from his apothecary. Saturn's aspects signify this; You see them depicted in the sky.[36]

[34] Editor. Conies are rabbits. Desart means an uninhabited or deserted place, not necessarily an arid landscape. The dog is sleeping in this printing, despite errors in the scan's text extraction.

[35] Editor. Inamorato is a man in love. Terse and polite means trim and polished in appearance. The final gesture turns the portrait back upon the reader: you may supply the example yourself.

[36] Editor. Hypocondriacus denotes the bodily and mental disorder Burton associates with the region beneath the ribs, including digestive disturbance and wind. It should not be reduced to the modern sense of anxiety about illness. Aspects are astrological relationships between heavenly bodies, marked by the symbols above the figure.

Original text 1651	Modern English
6 Beneath them kneeling on his knee, A Superstitious man you see: He fasts, prays, on his Idol fixt, Tormented hope and fear betwixt. For hell perhaps he takes more pain, Then thou dost Heaven it self to gain. Alas poor Soul, I pitie thee, What stars incline thee so to be?	6 Beneath them, kneeling, You see a superstitious man: He fasts and prays, intent upon his idol, Tormented between hope and fear. Perhaps he takes more trouble to reach hell Than you take to gain heaven itself. Alas, poor soul, I pity you: What stars incline you to be this way?[37]
7 But see the Madman rage down right With furious looks, a gastly sight. Naked in chains bound doth he lie, And roars amain he knows not why? Observe him; for as in a glass, Thine angry portraiture it was. His picture keep still in thy presence, Twixt him and thee, ther's no difference.	7 But see the madman rage outright, With furious looks, a ghastly sight. He lies naked, bound in chains, And roars loudly, though he knows not why. Observe him: as in a mirror, There was your own angry portrait. Keep his picture always before you; There is no difference between him and you.[38]
8 9 Borage and Hellebor fill two scenes, Soveraign plants to purge the veins Of melancholy, and chear the heart, Of those black fumes which make it smart; To clear the Brain of misty fogs, Which dull our senses, and Soul clogs. The best medicine that ere God made For this malady, if well assaid.	8 9 Borage and hellebore fill two scenes: Supreme plants for purging the veins Of melancholy and cheering the heart, Clearing the black fumes that make it ache; For clearing the brain of misty fogs That dull our senses and clog the soul. The best medicine God ever made For this illness, if properly applied.[39]

[37] Editor. The description combines Burton's religious judgment with an astrological question. The claimed destination of this worship is part of the poem's polemical voice.

[38] Editor. Glass means mirror. Burton again implicates the reader: ordinary anger is made to resemble the violent condition displayed in the panel. The historical label and image are retained as part of his argument.

[39] Editor. Melancholy here includes the supposed material humour, black bile. Assaid means tried or put to use. The praise of these plants belongs to Burton's historical account of treatment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
10 Now last of all to fill a place, Presented is the Authors face; And in that habit which he wears, His Image to the world appears. His minde no art can well express, That by his writings you may guess. It was not pride, nor yet vain glory, (Though others do it commonly)	10 Last of all, to fill a space, The author's face is presented; In the clothing that he wears, His image appears before the world. No art can properly express his mind; You may judge that from his writings. It was neither pride nor vanity (Though others commonly act from those)[40]
Made him do this: if you must know, The Printer would needs have it so. Then do not frown or scoffe at it, Deride not, or detract a whit. For surely as thou dost by him, He will do the same again. Then look upon't, behold and see, As thou lik'st it, so it likes thee.	That made him do this: if you must know, The printer insisted on it. So do not frown or scoff at it; Do not mock or belittle it at all. For however you treat him, He will surely treat you in return. Look at it, then; look closely and see: As you like it, so it likes you.
And I for it will stand in view, Thine to command, Reader Adiew.	And I will stand here on its behalf, At your command. Reader, farewell.

[40] Editor. Habit means clothing. The stanza continues in the next unit; the gap between these groups of lines is present in the source.

Engraved frontispiece of the 1651 edition, McGill University Library copy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 9 THE ANATOMY OF MELANCHOLY.	THE ANATOMY OF MELANCHOLY.
What it is, With all the Kinds causes, Symptomes, Prognostickes, & severall cures of it. In three Partitions. with their severall Sections, members & subsections. Philosophically. Medicinally. Historically. opened & cut up. By. Democritus Junior. With a Satyricall Preface. Conducing to the following Discourse. The Sixt Edition, corrected and augmented by the Author.	What it is, with all its kinds, causes, symptoms, prognoses and various cures. In three Parts, with their respective Sections, Members and Subsections. Opened and dissected philosophically, medically and historically. By Democritus Junior. With a satirical preface leading into the following discussion. The sixth edition, corrected and enlarged by the author.[41]
Omne tulit punctum, qui miscuit utile dulci.	He wins every vote who mingles the useful with the pleasing.[42]
Oxford Printed for Henry Cripps. 1651 C. le Blon. fe.	Oxford Printed for Henry Cripps. 1651 Made by C. le Blon.[43]
Democritus Abderites. Zelotipia. Solitudo. Inamorato. Hypocondriacus.	Democritus of Abdera. Jealousy. Solitude. The lover. The sufferer from hypochondriac melancholy.[44]

[41] Editor. The engraved central title is transcribed here as text; its lettering sizes and spatial arrangement appear in the facsimile. Partition is rendered Part in this title; Member remains the book's formal intermediate division. Democritus Junior is Burton's authorial name.

[42] Editor. Horace, Art of Poetry 343. The title engraves miscuit. The following Horatian line explains the combination as delighting and instructing the reader at once.

[43] Editor. The engraver's signature is separated by the date and cartouche in the image. Fe. abbreviates fecit, made it. The imprint is part of the original title, not the publication information of this modern edition.

[44] Editor. These are the first five panel captions, listed in the order used by the Argument: top centre, top left, top right, middle left and middle right. Their spatial arrangement and the astrological and heraldic symbols are preserved in the facsimile.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Superstitiosus. Maniacus. Borago. Helleborus. Democritus Junior.	The superstitious man. The madman. Borage. Hellebore. Democritus Junior.
Source page 11 HONORATISSIMO DOMINO NON MINUS VIRTUTE SUA, QUAM GENERIS SPLENDORE, ILLUSTRISSIMO; GEORGIO BERKLEIO, MILITI DE BALNEO, BARONI DE BERKLEY MOUBREY, SEGRAVE, D. DE BRUSE, DOMINO SUO Multis Nominibus Observando, HANC SUAM MELANCHOLIAE ANATOMEN, JAM SEXTO REVISAM, D. D. DEMOCRITUS Junior.	To the most honourable lord, most illustrious no less for his own virtue than for the splendour of his lineage: George Berkeley, Knight of the Bath, Baron Berkeley, Mowbray and Segrave, Lord de Braose; his lord, to whom he owes respect on many grounds, Democritus Junior presents and dedicates this Anatomy of Melancholy of his, now revised for the sixth time.[45]

[45] Editor. The formal Latin dedication occupies a full leaf in the source; its text is set continuously here. D. de Bruse is expanded as Lord de Braose, and D. D. as the customary presentation and dedication formula. Multis nominibus means on many grounds, not merely by many names. The modernization follows the titles Burton prints without adjudicating their legal history.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 13 Democritus Junior ad Librum suum.	Democritus Junior to His Book.[46]
Vade liber, qualis, non ausum dicere, foelix, Te nisi foelicem fecerit Alma dies. Vade tamen quocunque lubet, quascunque per oras, Et Genium Domini fac imitere tui.	Go, book, such as you are; I dare not call you fortunate, Unless a kindly day makes you so. Yet go wherever you please, through any lands, And be sure to reflect your master's spirit.[47]
I blandas inter Charites, mystamque saluta Musarum quemvis, si tibi lector erit. Rura colas, urbem, subeasve palatia regum, Submissè, placidè, te sine dente geras.	Go among the gracious Graces, and greet Any initiate of the Muses who will read you. Whether you dwell in country or town, or enter kings' palaces, Behave humbly and gently, without biting.[48]
Nobilis, aut si quis te fortè inspexerit heros, Da te morigerum, perlegat usque lubet. Est quod Nobilitas, est quod desideret heros, Gratior hæc forsan charta placere potest.	If some nobleman or great person happens to inspect you, Be accommodating; let him read as far as he likes. There is something nobility, something a great person may want; Perhaps this page may win favour and give pleasure.

[46] Editor. The author addresses his book as a person travelling among possible readers. The Latin verse is translated line by line without adding rhyme. Speaker and addressee shifts are retained; the final couplet speaks of the author as the book's master.

[47] Editor. The 1651 print reads ausum, irregular here. The inspected 1638 poem opening also reads ausum, so it is not unique to the base edition. The translation understands the intended sense as ausim, I would dare, without claiming proof of authorial intention or changing the original column. Qualis is understood elliptically as such as you are.

[48] Editor. Charites are the Graces; an initiate of the Muses is a devotee of poetry or learning. Without a tooth is a figure for refraining from biting satire. Ink or staining obscures parts of lines 5–7 in this copy; the words are supported by the later Latin witness listed in the references.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Si quis morosus Cato, tetricusque Senator, Hunc etiam librum fortè videre velit, Sive magistratus, tum te reverenter habeto; Sed nullus; muscas non capiunt Aquilæ. Non vacat his tempus fugitivum impendere nugis, Nec tales cupio; par mihi lector erit.	If some sour Cato, some stern senator, Should happen to wish to see this book too, Or some magistrate, then behave respectfully. But none will: eagles do not catch flies. They have no time to spend their fleeting hours on trifles, Nor do I want such readers; mine will be someone like me.[49]
Si matrona gravis casu diverterit istuc, Illustris domina, aut te Comitissa legat: Est quod displiceat, placeat quod forsitan illis, Ingerere his noli te modo, pande tamen.	If a dignified matron happens to turn this way, If a distinguished lady or countess reads you, There is something to displease them, perhaps something to please. Only do not thrust yourself upon them; still, open your pages.
At si virgo tuas dignabitur inclyta chartas Tangere, sive schedis hæreat illa tuis: Da modo te facilem, & quædam folia esse memento Conveniant oculis quæ magis apta suis.	But if a noble maiden deigns to touch Your pages, or lingers over your sheets, Be obliging, and remember that there are some leaves More suitable for her eyes.
Si generosa ancilla tuos aut alma puella Visura est ludos, annue, pande lubens. Dic utinam nunc ipse meus[50] (nam diligit istas) In præsens esset conspiciendus herus.	If a well-born attendant or a lovely girl Wishes to see your games, consent; open gladly. Say, “If only my master himself—for he likes such women— Were here in person now, for you to see.”[51]

[49] Editor. Cato stands for an austere moral censor. The eagle-and-flies proverb treats the book as something beneath the attention of the exalted readers just named; Burton then declines their company himself.

[50] Burton. Hæc comicè dicta cave ne malè capias. These words are spoken in jest; take care not to misunderstand them.

[51] Editor. Ancilla normally means a female servant or attendant; generosa gives her a gentle or noble character or birth. The teasing invitation is accompanied by Burton’s own caution that it is a joke.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ignotus notusve mihi de gente togata Sive aget in ludis, pulpita sive colet, Sive in Lycæo, & nugas evolverit istas, Si quasdam mendas viderit inspiciens, Da veniam Authori, dices; nam plurima vellet Expungi, quæ jam displicuisse sciat.	If someone of the gowned profession, known to me or unknown, Whether he works in schools or occupies a pulpit, Or in a college, turns over these trifles, And notices some faults as he examines them, Say, "Forgive the author; he would wish many things Erased, which he knows have already displeased."[52]
Sive Melancholicus quisquam, seu blandus Amator, Aulicus aut Civis, seu bene comptus Eques Huc appellat, age & tutò te crede legenti, Multa istic forsan non malè nata leget. Quod fugiat, caveat, quodque amplexabitur, ista Pagina fortassis promere multa potest.	If a melancholy person or an affectionate lover, A courtier or citizen, or a well-dressed gentleman, Calls here, come, entrust yourself safely to his reading. Perhaps he will find much here that is not badly conceived. What to flee, what to beware of, what to embrace: This page may perhaps disclose many such things.
At si quis Medicus coram te sistet, amicè Fac circumspectè, & te sine labe geras: Inveniet namque ipse meis quoque plurima scriptis, Non leve subsidium quæ sibi forsan erunt.	But if a physician comes before you, be friendly, Act carefully and conduct yourself without fault; For in my writings too he will find many things That may be of no small assistance to him.
Source page 14 Si quis Causidicus chartas impingat in istas, Nil mihi vobiscum, pessima turba vale; Sit nisi vir bonus, & juris sine fraude peritus, Tum legat, & forsan doctior inde fiet.	If some lawyer blunders into these pages: "I have nothing to do with you; goodbye, you wretched crowd!" Unless he is a good man, honestly skilled in law; Then let him read, and perhaps he will leave better informed.

[52] Editor. The toga or gown marks the learned professions; the following alternatives include teachers, preachers and scholars. Lycæum, named for the ancient Lyceum, is used here for a place of higher learning. The source does not specify whose displeasure the author recognizes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Si quis cordatus, facilis, lectorque benignus Huc oculos vertat, quæ velit ipse legat; Candidus ignoscet, metuas nil, pande libenter, Offensus mendis non erit ille tuis,	If some sensible, easygoing and kindly reader Turns his eyes here, let him read what he likes. A fair man will forgive: fear nothing, open willingly; He will not be offended by your faults,
Laudabit nonnulla. Venit si Rhetor ineptus, Limata & tersa, & qui bene cocta petit, Claude citus librum; nulla hic nisi ferrea verba, Offendent stomachum quæ minus apta suum.	And will praise some things. If a foolish rhetorician comes, Looking for language polished, refined and thoroughly cooked, Quickly close the book: here are only iron words, Which, ill suited to his taste, will upset his stomach.[53]
At si quis non eximius de plebe poeta, Annue; namque istic plurima ficta leget. Nos sumus è numero, nullus mihi spirat Apollo, Grandiloquus Vates quilibet esse nequit.	But if an undistinguished poet of the common crowd arrives, Welcome him: he will read many fictions here. I am one of that number; no Apollo breathes into me. Not everyone can be a lofty-speaking bard.[54]
Si Criticus Lector, tumidus Censorque molestus, Zoilus & Momus, si rabiosa cohors: Ringe, freme, & noli tum pandere, turba malignis Si occurrat sannis invidiosa suis.	If the reader is a critic, a pompous and troublesome censor, A Zoilus or Momus, if a rabid crowd arrives, Bare your teeth and growl; do not open then, If the envious crowd confronts you with spiteful sneers.[55]

[53] Editor. Burton mixes the metaphors of polishing metal and cooking food. Iron words are hard or rough language, opposed to the stylist's demand for finish. The translation retains his joke rather than smoothing it away.

[54] Editor. Apollo is invoked as the god of poetic inspiration. Burton places himself among ordinary poets while giving this declaration its own deliberately elevated Latin dress.

[55] Editor. Zoilus and Momus are conventional names for carping critics: Zoilus as the hostile critic of Homer, Momus as the personification of fault-finding. The book is now told to bite, reversing its earlier instructions to be gentle.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Fac fugias; si nulla tibi sit copia eundi, Contemnes, tacitè scommata quæque feres. Frendeat, allatret, vacuas gannitibus auras Impleat, haud cures, his placuisse nefas.	Make your escape; if you have no chance to leave, Disdain them and bear every taunt in silence. Let the crowd gnash its teeth and bark, filling the empty air With yelps; do not care. To please them would be wrong.
Verum age si forsan divertat purior hospes, Cuique sales, ludi, displiceantque joci, Objiciatque tibi sordes, lascivaque: dices, Lasciva est Domino & Musa jocosa tuo;	But suppose a more scrupulous visitor turns aside to you, Who dislikes wit, games and jokes, And charges you with filth and indecency: say That your master's Muse is playful and fond of jokes;[56]
Nec lasciva tamen, si pensitet omne; sed esto; Sit lasciva licet pagina, vita proba est.	Yet not indecent, if he weighs everything; but grant it: Though the page may be wanton, the life is upright.[57]
Barbarus, indoctusque rudis spectator in istam Si messem intrudat, fuste fugabis eum, Fungum pelle procul (jubeo) nam quid mihi fungo? Conveniunt stomacho non minus ista suo.	If a barbarous, ignorant, uncultivated spectator Intrudes into this harvest, drive him away with a stick. Chase that mushroom far away, I command; what use have I for a mushroom? These pages suit his stomach no less.[58]

[56] Editor. Lasciva can mean playful or sexually wanton. Burton moves between those senses as he stages the objection and reply; the next couplet makes his distinction explicit.

[57] Editor. An adaptation of Martial, Epigrams 1.4.8, separating the character of the writing from the conduct of the writer. The final Latin line is printed in roman type, unlike the surrounding verse.

[58] Editor. Fungus, mushroom, insults a dullard; the harvest is the book's material. Both inspected 1638 and 1651 pages read non minus, no less. Their agreement supports retaining this wording, not settling its meaning. The abrupt comparison may be ironic or anticipate the welcome that follows. The translation remains literal; no correction is imposed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sed nec pelle tamen; læto omnes accipe vultu, Quos, quas, vel quales, inde vel unde viros. Gratus erit quicunque venit; gratissimus hospes Quisquis erit, facilis difficilisque mihi:	Yet do not drive him away; receive everyone with a cheerful face, Men or women, whatever they are like, wherever they come from. Whoever comes will be welcome, a most welcome guest, Whoever it is, easygoing or difficult with me.
Nam si culparit, quædam culpasse juvabit, Culpando faciet me meliora sequi. Sed si laudarit, neque laudibus efferar ullis, Sit satis hisce malis opposuisse bonum.	For if he finds fault, it will help that some faults were found; By finding fault he will make me pursue better things. But if he praises me, I will not be carried away by any praise; Let it be enough to have set something good against these ills.
Hæc sunt quæ nostro placuit mandare libello, Et quæ dimittens dicere jussit Herus.	These are the things he chose to entrust to our little book, And what its master, sending it away, ordered it to say.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 15 The Authors Abstract of Melancholy,* Διαλογικῶς.	The Author's Summary of Melancholy, in Dialogue.[59]
When I go musing all alone, Thinking of divers things fore-known, When I build Castles in the air, Void of sorrow and void of fear, Pleasing my self with phantasms sweet, Me thinks the time runs very fleet. All my joys to this are folly, Naught so sweet as melancholy.	When I go musing all alone, Thinking of things I knew before, When I build castles in the air, Free from sorrow and free from fear, Pleasing myself with sweet imaginings, It seems to me that time flies by. All my other joys are foolishness beside this; Nothing is as sweet as melancholy.
When I lie walking all alone, Recounting what I have ill done, My thoughts on me then tyrannise, Fear and sorrow me surprise, Whether I tarry still or go, Me thinks the time moves very slow. All my griefs to this are jolly, Naught so sad as melancholy.	When I lie awake all alone, Recalling what I have done wrong, My thoughts become my tyrants; Fear and sorrow seize me. Whether I stay still or move, It seems to me that time moves very slowly. All my other griefs are cheerful beside this; Nothing is as sad as melancholy.[60]
When to my self I act and smile, With pleasing thoughts the time beguile, By a brook side or wood so green, Unheard, unsought for, or unseen, A thousand pleasures do me bless, And crown my soul with happiness. All my joys besides are folly, None so sweet as melancholy.	When I act things out and smile to myself, Passing the time with pleasant thoughts, Beside a brook or a green wood, Unheard, unsought or unseen, A thousand pleasures bless me And crown my soul with happiness. All my other joys are foolishness; None is as sweet as melancholy.

[59] Editor. The Greek Διαλογικῶς means in the manner of a dialogue. Twelve eight-line stanzas alternate between delight and misery. No speakers are explicitly named. The source's repeated refrains and their variations are retained.

[60] Editor. The 1651 source prints lie walking; the inspected 1638 Abstract reads lie waking. This earlier reading supports lie awake in the modern version. Walking is retained in the original column, and a printing error remains the likely explanation. Surprise here means seize or overtake, rather than astonish.

Original text 1651	Modern English
When I lie, sit, or walk alone, I sigh, I grieve, making great mone, In a dark grove, or irksome den, With discontents and Furies then, A thousand miseries at once, Mine heavy heart and soul ensconce, All my griefs to this are jolly, None so sour as melancholy.	When I lie, sit or walk alone, I sigh and grieve, bitterly lamenting, In a dark grove or a dreary den, With discontent and Furies there, A thousand miseries at once Entrench themselves in my heavy heart and soul. All my other griefs are cheerful beside this; None is as bitter as melancholy.[61]
Me thinks I hear, me thinks I see, Sweet musick, wondrous melodie, Towns, places and Cities fine; Here now, then there; the world is mine; Rare beauties, gallant Ladies shine, What e're is lovely or divine. All other joys to this are folly, None so sweet as melancholy.	I seem to hear, I seem to see, Sweet music, wonderful melody, Towns, places and splendid cities; Now here, then there: the world is mine. Rare beauties, splendid ladies shine, Whatever is lovely or divine. All other joys are foolishness beside this; None is as sweet as melancholy.[62]
Me thinks I hear, me thinks I see Ghosts, goblins, fiends; my phantasie Presents a thousand ugly shapes, Headless bears, black men, and apes, Dolefull outcries, and fearfull sights, My sad and dismall soul affrights. All my griefs to this are jolly, None so damn'd as Melancholy.	I seem to hear, I seem to see Ghosts, goblins, fiends; my imagination Presents a thousand hideous shapes: Headless bears, black men and apes. Mournful cries and terrifying sights Frighten my sad and gloomy soul. All my other griefs are cheerful beside this; None is as accursed as melancholy.[63]

[61] Editor. Ensconce evokes occupation of a fortified position: the miseries establish themselves within the heart and soul. Furies can evoke the classical powers of torment as well as raging thoughts.

[62] Editor. The source reads places; it has not been silently changed to palaces. The paired acts of hearing and seeing range across the following images rather than assigning every object to both senses.

[63] Editor. Both inspected editions, 1638 and 1651, include black men among the shapes presented by the speaker's imagination. This confirms the wording, but does not settle whether dark figures, demons or people imagined in racial terms are meant. The phrase is retained without a narrower identification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 16 Me thinks I court, me thinks I kiss, Me thinks I now embrace my mistriss. O blessed days, O sweet content, In Paradise my time is spent. Such thoughts may still my fancy move, So may I ever be in love. All my joys to this are folly, Naught so sweet as Melancholy.	I imagine courting, I imagine kissing, I imagine embracing my beloved now. O blessed days, O sweet contentment, My time is spent in paradise. May such thoughts always stir my imagination; May I always be in love like this. All my other joys are foolishness beside this; Nothing is as sweet as melancholy.
When I recount loves many frights, My sighs and tears, my waking nights, My jealous fits; O mine hard fate I now repent, but 'tis too late. No torment is so bad as love, So bitter to my soul can prove. All my griefs to this are jolly, Naught so harsh as Melancholy.	When I recall love's many terrors, My sighs and tears, my sleepless nights, My fits of jealousy—O my cruel fate!— I now regret it, but too late. No torment is as bad as love, Or can prove so bitter to my soul. All my other griefs are cheerful beside this; Nothing is as harsh as melancholy.
Friends and Companions get you gone, 'Tis my desire to be alone; Ne're well but when my thoughts and I Do domineer in privacie. No Gemm, no treasure like to this, 'Tis my delight, my Crown, my bliss. All my joys to this are folly, Naught so sweet as Melancholy.	Friends and companions, go away; I want to be alone. I am never well except when my thoughts and I Reign freely in private. No jewel, no treasure can equal this: It is my delight, my crown, my bliss. All my other joys are foolishness beside this; Nothing is as sweet as melancholy.
'Tis my sole plague to be alone, I am a beast, a monster grown, I will no light nor company, I finde it now my misery. The scean is turn'd, my joys are gone; Fear, discontent, and sorrows come. All my griefs to this are jolly, Naught so fierce as Melancholy.	Being alone is my one great torment; I have become a beast, a monster. I want neither light nor company; I now find solitude my misery. The scene has changed, my joys are gone; Fear, discontent and sorrows come. All my other griefs are cheerful beside this; Nothing is as fierce as melancholy.[64]

[64] Editor. Will is a verb of desire: I will no light means I want no light. The changed scene makes explicit the reversal that structures the alternating stanzas.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I'le not change life with any King, I ravisht am: can the world bring More joy, then still to laugh and smile, In pleasant toys time to beguile? Do not, O do not trouble me, So sweet content I feel and see. All my joyes to this are folly, None so divine as Melancholy.	I would not exchange lives with any king; I am transported: can the world bring More joy than always laughing and smiling, Passing the time in pleasant fancies? Do not, O do not disturb me; Such sweet contentment I feel and see. All my other joys are foolishness beside this; None is as divine as melancholy.
I'le change my state with any wretch, Thou canst from gaole or dunghill fetch: My pain, past cure, another Hell, I may not in this torment dwell, Now desperate I hate my life, Lend me a halter or a knife. All my griefs to this are jolly, Naught so damn'd as Melancholy.	I would exchange my condition with any wretch You could fetch from a jail or dunghill. My incurable pain is another hell; I cannot remain in this torment. Now, in despair, I hate my life; Lend me a noose or a knife. All my other griefs are cheerful beside this; Nothing is as accursed as melancholy.[65]

Democritus Junior to the Reader

[65] Editor. Halter here means a noose. The poem ends with its darker voice rather than resolving the opposition between the two states. The next source leaf begins Gentle Reader, the opening of Democritus Junior to the Reader.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 1 Gentle Reader, I presume thou wilt be very inquisitive to know what antick or personate actor this is, that so insolently intrudes upon this common theatre, to the worlds view, arrogating another mans name, whence he is, why he doth it, and what he hath to say; Although, as [66]he said, Primum si noluero, non respondebo, quis coacturus est? I am a free man born, and may chuse whether I will tell, who can compel me?	Gentle reader, I imagine you will be very curious to know who this comic or masked actor is, who so insolently intrudes upon this public stage before the eyes of the world, claiming another man's name; where he comes from, why he does it, and what he has to say.[67] Although, as that writer said, "First, if I choose not to, I shall not answer; who will compel me?" I am a freeborn man and may choose whether to tell; who can compel me?[68]
If I be urged, I will as readily reply as that Egyptian in [69]Plutarch, when a curious fellow would needs know what he had in his basket, Quum vides velatam, quid inquiris in rem absconditam? It was therefore covered, because he should not know what was in it. Seek not after that which is hid, if the contents please thee, [70]and be for thy use, suppose the Man in the Moon, or whom thou wilt to be the Author; I would not willingly be known. Yet in some sort to give thee satisfaction, which is more then I need, I will shew a reason, both of this usurped name, title, and subject.	If pressed, I will answer as readily as the Egyptian in Plutarch, when an inquisitive fellow insisted on knowing what was in his basket: "Since you see that it is covered, why inquire into what is concealed?" It was covered precisely so that he should not know what was in it.[71] Do not pry into what is hidden. If the contents please you and serve your purpose, suppose the author to be the Man in the Moon, or whoever you like; I would prefer to remain unknown. Still, to satisfy you to some degree, which is more than I need do, I will explain my assumed name, my title, and my subject.

[66] Burton. Printed p. 1, a: "Seneca in ludo in mortem Claudii Cæsaris." Seneca, the satire on the death of the emperor Claudius.

[67] Editor. "Antick" suggests a comic or grotesque performer; "personate" means acting an assumed part. Burton introduces his authorial persona, Democritus Junior. "Arrogating" adds the joking suggestion that he has taken a name without entitlement.

[68] Editor. Seneca, Apocolocyntosis 1. Burton borrows the narrator's refusal to disclose his authority. The Latin is translated in the modern column; Burton's following English restatement is retained too.

[69] Burton. Printed p. 1, b: "Lib. de curiositate." The book On Curiosity.

[70] Burton. Printed p. 1, c: "Modo hæc tibi usui sint, quemvis authorem fingito. Wecker." Translation: Provided these things are useful to you, imagine any author you please. Attribution to Wecker retained; exact passage not yet located.

[71] Editor. Plutarch, On Curiosity (De curiositate), section 3, 516E. The covered object becomes a joke against the reader's demand to uncover the author. Burton's Latin rendering and his own explanatory paraphrase are both retained in translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And first of the name of Democritus; lest any man by reason of it, should be deceived, expecting a pasquil, a satyre, some ridiculous treatise (as I my self should have done) some prodigious tetent, or paradox of the earths motion, of infinite Worlds, in infinito vacuo, ex fortuita atomorum collisione, in an infinite waste, so caused by an accidental collision of Motes in the Sun, all which Democritus held, Epicurus and their Master Lucippus of old maintained, and are lately revived by Copernicus, Brunus, and some others.	First, the name Democritus: I would not have it mislead anyone into expecting a lampoon, a satire, some absurd treatise—as I myself would have expected—or some extraordinary doctrine or paradox about the earth's motion, about infinite worlds "in an infinite void, arising from the chance collision of atoms": worlds in an endless emptiness, formed by the accidental collision of specks like those visible in a sunbeam.[72] All these opinions Democritus held, Epicurus and their master Leucippus maintained in ancient times, and Copernicus, Bruno, and others have recently revived.[73]
Besides it hath been always an ordinary custom, as [74]Gellius observes, for later Writers and impostors, to broach many absurd and insolent fictions, under the name of so noble a philosopher as Democritus, to get themselves credit, and by that means the more to be respected, as artificers usually do, Novo qui marmori ascribunt Praxatilem suo. Tis not so with me.	Besides, as Gellius observes, later writers and impostors have commonly put forward absurd and outrageous inventions under the name of so distinguished a philosopher as Democritus, to gain credit and thereby greater respect. Craftsmen do much the same, "inscribing the name of Praxiteles on their own newly carved marble." That is not my purpose.[75]

[72] Editor. "Pasquil" is a lampoon. The scan reads "tetent," apparently a misprint for "tenent" (tenet or doctrine); "doctrine" is the proposed reading in the modern column. "Motes in the Sun" means dust specks made visible by sunlight.

[73] Editor. Burton groups ancient atomism, the earth's motion, and a plurality of worlds in one sweeping catalogue. His attribution is preserved as his claim; it should not be read as establishing that every named thinker held every listed opinion. "Brunus" is Giordano Bruno.

[74] Burton. Printed p. 1, d: "Lib. 10. c. 12. Multa à malè feriatis in Democriti nomine commenta data, nobilitatis, authoritatisq; ejus perfugio utentibus." Translation: Many inventions were circulated in Democritus's name by idlers sheltering behind his renown and authority.

[75] Editor. Gellius, Attic Nights 10.12, discusses works falsely attributed to Democritus. The marble comparison adapts Phaedrus, Fables 5, prologue 5–7: attaching a famous artist's name to new work increases its value. "Praxatilem" is the form in Burton's text; Praxiteles is the sculptor.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 1–2 [76]Non hic Centauros, non Gorgonas, Harpyasque Invenies, hominem pagina nostra sapit. No Centaures here, or Gorgons look to finde, My subject is of man, and humane kinde. Thou thy self art the subject of my discourse. [77]Quicquid agunt homines, votum, timor, ira, voluptas, Gaudia, discursus, nostri farrago libelli. What ere men do, vows, fears, in ire, in sport, Joys, wandrings, are the sum of my report.	Here you will find no Centaurs, Gorgons, or Harpies; my page has the flavour of human life. Look here for no Centaurs or Gorgons; my subject is humanity. You yourself are the subject of my discourse.[78] Whatever people do—their desires, fear, anger, pleasure, joys, restless pursuits—is the mixture in my little book. Whatever people do, their vows and fears, in anger or in play, their joys and wanderings: these make up my account.[79]

[76] Burton. Printed p. 1, e: “Martialis lib. 10. epigr. 14.” The printed reference is retained. The quotation is Martial 10.4.9–10; see the editorial note opposite.

[77] Burton. Printed p. 2, f: “Iuv. Sat. 1.” Juvenal, Satire 1.

[78] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 10.4.9–10, not 10.14 as Burton’s margin states. Centaurs, Gorgons, and Harpies are mythological creatures. The Latin couplet and Burton’s English version are translated separately, preserving his movement between quotation and adaptation.

[79] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 1.85–86. The Latin “farrago” evokes a mixture or medley. Burton’s rhymed English loosely recasts the list; the modern column renders the Latin and his English independently without forcing new rhymes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 2 My intent is no otherwise to use his name, then Mercurius Gallobelgicus, Mercurius Britannicus, use the name of Mercurie, [80]Democritus Christianus, &c. Although there be some other circumstances, for which I have masked my self under this visard, and some peculiar respects, which I cannot so well expresse, untill I have set down a brief character of this our Democritus, what he was, with an Epitome of his life.	I intend to use his name just as Mercurius Gallobelgicus and Mercurius Britannicus use the name of Mercury, or as Democritus Christianus uses that of Democritus, and so on.[81] There are, however, other circumstances that have led me to conceal myself behind this mask, and particular reasons that I cannot explain so well until I have sketched this Democritus of ours: what sort of man he was, with a brief account of his life.

[80] Burton. Printed p. 2, g: “Auth. Pet. Besseo edit. Coloniæ 1616.” By Pierre de Besse; published at Cologne, 1616.

[81] Editor. These titles illustrate borrowing a celebrated name. Mercury is the messenger god. Democritus Christianus is Pierre de Besse’s Christian Democritus, subtitled Contempt for the Vanities of the World; the Cologne 1616 edition is recorded by Zentralbibliothek Zürich. “Visard” means mask.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Democritus, as he is described by [82]Hippocrates and [83]Laertius, was a little wearish old man, very melancholy by nature, averse from company in his latter daies, [84]and much given to solitarinesse, a famous Philosopher in his age, [85]coævus with Socrates, wholly addicted to his studies at the last, and to a private life, writ many excellent works, a great Divine, according to the divinity of those times, an expert Physitian, a Politician, an excellent Mathematician, as [86]Diacosmus and the rest of his works do witnesse.	Democritus, as Hippocrates and Diogenes Laertius describe him, was a small, withered old man, very melancholy by temperament, averse to company in his later days and much inclined to solitude.[87] A famous philosopher in his time and a contemporary of Socrates, he devoted himself entirely, towards the end, to his studies and a private life. He wrote many excellent works. He was a great theologian, according to the theology of those times, an expert physician, a student of politics, and an excellent mathematician, as his Diacosmus and other works testify.[88]

[82] Burton. Printed p. 2, h: “Hip. Epist. Damaget.” The Hippocratic letter to Damagetus.

[83] Burton. Printed p. 2, i: “Laert. lib. 9.” Diogenes Laertius, book 9.

[84] Burton. Printed p. 2, k: “Hortulo sibi cellulam seligens, ibique seipsum includens, vixit solitarius.” Translation: Choosing a little cell in a garden and shutting himself up there, he lived alone.

[85] Burton. Printed p. 2, l: “Floruit Olympiade 80, 700. annis post Troiam.” Translation: He flourished in the eightieth Olympiad, seven hundred years after Troy. These are Burton’s chronological figures.

[86] Burton. Printed p. 2, m: “Diacos. quod cunctis operibus facile excellit, Laert.” Translation: The Diacosmos, which easily surpasses all his works; Laertius.

[87] Editor. “Wearish” means withered or wizened. The letters attributed to Hippocrates that describe his encounter with Democritus are later pseudonymous writings, not authenticated correspondence between the two men. They contribute to Burton’s literary portrait. See Sjöstrand, 2001, and Diogenes Laertius 9.34–49.

[88] Editor. “Divine” here means theologian; “Politician” concerns political knowledge. Diogenes Laertius 9.39–40 mentions the Great Diacosmos; 9.46 lists both a Great and a Lesser Diacosmos and records a rival attribution of the former to Leucippus. Burton’s abbreviated title is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He was much delighted with the studies of Husbandry, saith [89]Columella, and often I finde him cited by [90]Constantinus and others treating of that subject. He knew the natures, differences of all beasts, plants, fishes, birds; and as some say, could [91]understand the tunes and voyces of them. In a word, he was omnifariam doctus, a generall scholar, a great student; and to the intent he might better contemplate, [92]I find it related by some, that he put out his eys, and was in his old age voluntarily blinde, yet saw more then all Greece besides, and [93]writ of every subject, Nihil in toto opificio naturæ, de quo non scripsit.	He took great pleasure in the study of agriculture, Columella says; and I often find him quoted by Constantinus and other writers on that subject. He knew the natures and differences of all animals, plants, fish, and birds; some say he could understand their songs and cries. In a word, he was "learned in every field", a scholar of wide learning and a devoted student. Some relate that, to contemplate more effectively, he put out his eyes and chose blindness in old age; yet he saw more than all the rest of Greece, and wrote on every subject: "There was nothing in the whole fabric of nature about which he did not write."[94]

[89] Burton. Printed p. 2, n: "Col. lib. 1. c. 1." Columella, book 1, chapter 1.

[90] Burton. Printed p. 2, o: "Const. lib. de agric. passim." Constantinus, the book on agriculture, throughout.

[91] Burton. Printed p. 2, p: "Volucrum voces & linguas intelligere se dicit Abderitanus Ep. Hip." Translation: The man of Abdera says he understands the voices and languages of birds; Hippocratic letter.

[92] Burton. Printed p. 2, q: "Sabellicus exempl. lib. 10. oculis se privavit, ut melius contemplationi operam daret, sublimi vir ingenio, profundæ cogitationis, &c." Translation: Sabellicus, Examples, book 10: he deprived himself of his eyes to devote himself more fully to contemplation; a man of lofty intellect and profound thought, etc.

[93] Burton. Printed p. 2, r: "Naturalia, Moralia, Mathematica, liberales disciplinas, artiumque omnium peritiam calluit." Translation: He mastered natural philosophy, ethics, mathematics, liberal studies, and knowledge of all the arts.

[94] Editor. Burton signals reported traditions with "as some say" and "I find it related." The modern version preserves those qualifications. The self-blinding story also appears in Gellius, Attic Nights 10.17; its transmission is evidence of a story, not confirmation that the event occurred.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A man of an excellent wit, profound conceit; and to attain knowledg the better in his yonger years, he travelled to Egypt and [95]Athens, to confer with learned men, [96]admired of some, despised of others. After a wandring life, he setled at Abdera, a town in Thrace, and was sent for thither to be their Law-maker, Recorder or town-clerk as some will; or as others, he was there bred and born. Howsoever it was, there he lived at last in a garden in the suburbs, wholy betaking himself to his studies, and a private life, [97]saving that sometimes he would walk down to the haven, [98]and laugh heartily at such variety of ridiculous objects, which there he saw. Such a one was Democritus.	He was a man of outstanding intelligence and deep thought. To improve his knowledge when young, he travelled to Egypt and Athens to converse with learned men, admired by some and despised by others. After a wandering life, he settled at Abdera, a town in Thrace. Some say he was summoned there to be its lawgiver, recorder, or town clerk; others say that he was born and brought up there. Whatever the truth, he eventually lived in a garden outside the town, devoting himself entirely to his studies and a private life, except that he sometimes walked down to the harbour and laughed heartily at the variety of ridiculous sights he saw there. Such was Democritus.[99]

[95] Burton. Printed p. 2, s: “Veni Athenas, & nemo me novit.” Translation: I came to Athens, and no one knew me.

[96] Burton. Printed p. 2, t: “Idem contemptui, & admirationi habitus.” Translation: The same man was held in contempt and admiration.

[97] Burton. Printed p. 2, u: “Solebat ad portum ambulare, & inde, &c. Hip. Ep. Dameg.” Translation: He used to walk to the harbour, and from there, etc.; Hippocratic letter to Damegetus.

[98] Burton. Printed p. 2, x: “Perpetuo risu pulmonem agitare solebat Democritus. Iuv. Sat. 7.” Translation: Democritus used to shake his lungs with continual laughter. The printed citation is retained; compare Juvenal 10.33–34.

[99] Editor. “Wit” means intellectual ability and “conceit” thought or understanding. Diogenes Laertius 9.36–37 preserves conflicting accounts of a visit to Athens. The laughter quotation in Burton’s margin corresponds to Juvenal, Satire 10.33–34, rather than the printed “Sat. 7.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 2–3 But in the mean time, how doth this concern me, or upon what reference do I usurp his habit? I confesse indeed that to compare my self unto him for ought I have yet said, were both impudency and arrogancie. I do not presume to make any parallel, Antistat mihi millibus trecentis, [100]parvus sum, nullus sum, altum nec spiro, nec spero. Yet thus much I wil say of my self, and that I hope without all suspition of pride, or self-conceit, I have lived a silent, sedentary, solitary, private life, mihi & musis, in the University as long almost as Xenocrates in Athens, ad senectam ferè, to learn wisdom as he did, penned up most part in my study.	But meanwhile, how does this concern me? What connection gives me the right to assume his costume? I admit that, on the strength of what I have said so far, comparing myself with him would be both impudent and arrogant. I do not presume to set myself beside him: "He surpasses me three hundred thousandfold"; "I am small, I am nothing; I neither aspire to heights nor hope for them."[101] Yet I will say this much about myself, hopefully without any suspicion of pride or conceit: I have lived a quiet, sedentary, solitary, private life, "for myself and the Muses," at the university almost as long as Xenocrates in Athens, "nearly to old age," seeking wisdom as he did and shut up in my study most of the time.[102]

[100] Burton. Printed p. 2, y: "Non sum dignus præstare matellam. Mart." Translation: I am not worthy to supply a chamber pot. Adapted from Martial, Epigrams 10.11.3–4: Calliodorus is not worthy to provide Pylades with a chamber pot. Burton turns the insult into a profession of his own inferiority to Democritus.

[101] Editor. "Habit" means costume or assumed guise. The extravagant comparison with Democritus is part of Burton's profession of modesty. The Latin "millibus trecentis" literally gives three hundred thousand; its hyperbole is preserved.

[102] Editor. The Muses stand for literary and scholarly pursuits. Xenocrates is the ancient philosopher associated with the Academy at Athens; Burton invokes him as a model of a life devoted to study. "Sedentary" retains the sense of a life largely spent sitting at scholarly work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 3 For I have been brought up a student in the most florishing Colledge of Europe, [103]Augustissimo collegio, and can brag with [104]Iovius, almost, in eâ luce domicilii Vaticani, totius orbis celeberrimi, per 37. annos multa opportunaque didici; for 30 years I have continued (having the use of as good a [105]Libraries as ever he had) a scholar, and would be therefore loth, either by living as a drone, to be an unprofitable or unworthy a Member of so learned and noble a societie, or to write that which should be any way dishonourable to such a royal and ample foundation.	For I was educated as a scholar in the most flourishing college in Europe, "a most distinguished college," and can almost boast with Paolo Giovio: "In that brilliant home of the Vatican, renowned throughout the world, I learned much that was useful over thirty-seven years."[106] I have remained a scholar for thirty years, with access to libraries as good as any he enjoyed. I would therefore be unwilling either to live as a drone, an unproductive or unworthy member of so learned and noble a society, or to write anything that might dishonour so royal and generous a foundation.

[103] Burton. Printed p. 3, z: "Christ-Church in Oxford."

[104] Burton. Printed p. 3, *: "Præfat. hist." Preface to the history. Paolo Giovio, Historiarum sui temporis, preface to Cosimo de' Medici, concluding leaf; inspected in the Venice 1566 edition, tomus I, [3v]. Giovio describes thirty-seven years in the Vatican court. Burton condenses and rearranges his wording; this is an adaptation, not a verbatim quotation.

[105] Burton. Printed p. 3, a: "Keeper of our colledg library lately revived by Otho Nicolson Esquire." Burton identifies himself as keeper of the college library and credits Otho Nicolson with its restoration.

[106] Editor. "Student" at Christ Church could denote a member of the college's foundation, rather than an undergraduate in the modern sense. "Iovius" is Paolo Giovio. The thirty-seven years belong to the quotation; Burton claims thirty years for himself. His inherited figures are preserved, not recalculated for 1651.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Something I have done, though by my profession a Divine, yet turbine raptus ingenii, as [107]he said, out of a running wit, an unconstant, unsetled mind, I had a great desire, (not able to attain to a superficial skil in any) to have some smattering in all, to be aliquis in omnibus, nullus in singulis, which [108]Plato commends, out of him [109]Lipsius approves and furthers, as fit to be imprinted in all curious wits, not be a slave of one science, or dwell altogether in one subject, as most do, but to rove abroad, centum puer artium, to have an oar in every mans boat, to [110]taste of every dish, and sip of every cup, which saith [111]Montaigne, was well performed by Aristotle and his learned countrey-man Adrian Turnebus.	I have accomplished something, though I am a theologian by profession. Yet, "carried away by the whirlwind of my mind," as that writer said, my roaming intelligence and inconstant, unsettled mind made me eager—unable even to acquire a superficial skill in any subject—to gain a smattering of them all: to be "somebody in everything, nobody in any one thing."[112] Plato commends this, and Lipsius, following him, endorses and recommends it as a principle to impress upon every inquiring mind: not to be a slave to one branch of learning, or devote oneself entirely to one subject, as most people do, but to range widely, "a youth of a hundred talents," to have an oar in everyone's boat, to taste every dish and sip from every cup. This, Montaigne says, was admirably done by Aristotle and by his own learned countryman, Adrien Turnèbe.[113]

[107] Burton. Printed p. 3, b: "Scaliger." Julius Caesar Scaliger, Exotericarum exercitationum liber XV de subtilitate, exercise 324, concluding sentence (Frankfurt, 1620, p. 982). Scaliger accuses Cardano of being swept away by the whirlwind and storm of his own intellect. Burton shortens this rebuke and applies it to himself.

[108] Burton. Printed p. 3, c: "In Theat." The printed reference points to the Theaetetus, as does Lipsius's margin. The corresponding passage is actually Rival Lovers 136a–b, a dialogue transmitted under Plato's name. The educated lover proposes the comparison; Socrates then challenges it at 136c–137b.

[109] Burton. Printed p. 3, d: "Phil. Stoic. li. diff. 8. dogma cupidis & curiosis ingeniis imprimendum, ut sit talis qui nulli rei serviat, aut exactè unum aliquid elaboret, alia negligens, ut artifices, &c." Translation: A principle to impress upon eager and inquiring minds: one should not be enslaved to any one subject, or work out one thing precisely while neglecting others, as craftsmen do, etc. The abbreviated reference is preserved. The passage is in Lipsius, Manuductionis ad Stoicam philosophiam III.8 (Antwerp, 1610, pp. 162–163). Burton combines Lipsius's approval of the maxim with a shortened version of his Latin rendering of Rival Lovers.

[110] Burton. Printed p. 3, e: "Delibare gratum de quocunq; cibo, & pittisare de quocunq; dolio jucundum." Translation: It is pleasant to taste any dish, and delightful to sip from any cask.

[111] Burton. Printed p. 3, f: "Essaies lib. 3." Montaigne, Essays, book 3. The printed reference is preserved; no chapter is supplied.

[112] Editor. "Divine" here identifies Burton's theological profession. The self-deprecation is deliberate: he confesses inability even to master a subject superficially while seeking knowledge of everything. The modern rendering retains that paradox.

[113] Editor. "Science" means a field of knowledge. "Centum puer artium" occurs in Horace, Odes 4.1.15. Turnebus is Adrien Turnèbe, Montaigne's fellow Frenchman. Essays 1.3 remarks on Aristotle's habit of entering every discussion; 2.12 and 2.17 praise Turnèbe's learning. Book 3.3 commends versatility but does not supply Burton's paired example. The printed book 3 reference remains unconfirmed. Lipsius approves a passage that Socrates challenges in Rival Lovers; see the preceding notes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This roving humor (though not with like successe) I have ever had, & like a ranging spaniel, that barks at every bird he sees, leaving his game, I have followed all, saving that which I should, & may justly complain, and truly, qui ubique est, nusquam est, which [114]Gesner did in modesty, that I have read many books, but to little purpose, for want of good method, I have confusedly tumbled over divers authors in our Libraries, with small profit for want of art, order, memory, judgment.	I have always had this wandering inclination, though without the same success. Like a spaniel ranging about, barking at every bird it sees and abandoning its proper game, I have pursued everything except what I should. I may justly and truthfully complain, "Whoever is everywhere is nowhere,"[115] and say, as Gesner modestly did, that I have read many books to little purpose. Lacking a good method, I have rummaged confusedly through various authors in our libraries, gaining little for want of skill, order, memory, and judgment.
I never travelled but in Map or Card, in which my unconfined thoughts have freely expatiated, as having ever been especialy delighted with the study of Cosmography. [116]Saturn was Lord of my geniture, culminating, &c. and Mars principal significator of manners, in partile conjunction with mine Ascendent; both fortunate in their houses, &c.	I have travelled only through maps and charts, where my unconfined thoughts have wandered freely, for I have always taken particular delight in the study of cosmography.[117] Saturn ruled my birth chart and was culminating, and so forth; Mars was the chief indicator of my character, in exact conjunction with my ascendant. Both were favourably placed in their houses, and so forth.[118]

[114] Burton. Printed p. 3, g: "Præfat. bibliothec." Preface to the Bibliotheca. The Ad lectores and dedicatory letter in Gesner's Bibliotheca universalis (Zurich, 1545) were compared. They describe extensive reading and compilation, but the confession of unmethodical reading attributed to Gesner here has not been located. His name and Burton's wording are retained.

[115] Editor. Compare Seneca, Moral Letters 2.2: "Nusquam est qui ubique est." Seneca warns against indiscriminate reading. Burton reverses the order of the two clauses; Gesner's name belongs to the ensuing confession about extensive but unmethodical reading.

[116] Burton. Printed p. 3, h: "Ambo fortes & fortunati, Mars idem magisterii dominus juxta primam Leovitii regulam." Translation: Both strong and fortunate; Mars also rules vocation, according to Leovitius's first rule. The attribution to Leovitius has not been independently collated.

[117] Editor. "Card" means chart or map. Cosmography describes the world and its place in the heavens, encompassing material now divided between geography and astronomy. Burton presents reading and maps as forms of imaginative travel.

[118] Editor. The passage uses the language of a natal horoscope. "Geniture" is the birth or its astrological figure; the ascendant is the zodiacal point rising on the eastern horizon. A culminating planet is at the upper meridian. A partile conjunction is exact by degree. "Manners" means character or disposition. Compare William Lilly, Christian Astrology (1647), book 1, especially pp. 47–48 and 107.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I am not poor, I am not rich; nihil est, nihil deest, I have little, I want nothing: all my treasure is in Minerva's tower. Greater preferment as I could never get, so am I not in debt for it, I have a competency (Laus Deo) from my noble and munificent Patrons, though I live still a Collegiat student, as Democritus in his garden, and lead a monastique life, ipse mihi theatrum, sequestred from those tumults and troubles of the world,	I am not poor, I am not rich: "I have nothing; I lack nothing." I have little, but want for nothing; all my treasure is in Minerva's tower.[119] I have never obtained greater advancement, and so owe no debt for it. Thanks to my noble and generous patrons, I have enough to live on—"praise be to God"—although I remain a member of the college, like Democritus in his garden, leading a monastic life, "a theatre to myself," secluded from the world's turmoil and troubles.[120]

[119] Editor. Minerva, goddess of wisdom and the arts, represents learning: Burton locates his wealth in scholarship. The literal "I have nothing; I lack nothing" and his softer English restatement, "I have little," are both preserved.

[120] Editor. "Preferment" is advancement in office or status; a "competency" is a sufficient income. "Collegiat student" continues the description of his college membership in Block 001. "A theatre to myself" introduces the sustained image of Burton as both solitary entertainer and spectator of the world.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Et tanquam in specula positus, [121](as he said) in some high place above you all, like Stoicus Sapiens, omnia sæcula, præterita præsentiaq; videns, uno velut intuitu, I hear and see what is done abroad, how others [122]run, ride, turmoil, and macerate themselves in court and countrey, far from those wrangling Law suits, aulæ vanitatem, fori ambitionem, ridere mecum soleo: I laugh at all, [123]I only secure, lest my suit go amiss, my ships perish, corn and cattle miscarry, trade decay, I have no wife nor children good or bad to provide for.	"And as though stationed on a watchtower," as he said, somewhere high above you all, like "the Stoic sage, seeing every age, past and present, as if in a single glance," I hear and see what happens in the wider world: how others run, ride, struggle, and wear themselves out at court and in the country. Far from their wrangling lawsuits, "I am accustomed to laugh to myself at the vanity of the court and the ambition of the forum."[124] I laugh at it all. I alone am free from fears that my lawsuit will fail, my ships sink, my crops and cattle come to harm, or my trade decline. I have neither wife nor children, good or bad, to provide for.

[121] Burton. Printed p. 3, i: "Hensius." Burton's printed attribution is retained; the exact work and passage remain unresolved.

[122] Burton. Printed p. 3, k: "Calide ambientes, solicite litigantes, aut misere excidentes, voces, strepitum, contentiones, &c." Translation: Eagerly seeking advancement, anxiously pursuing lawsuits, or falling into misery; voices, noise, disputes, etc.

[123] Burton. Printed p. 3, l: "Cyp. ad Donat. Unice securus, ne excidam in foro, aut in mari Indico bonis eluã, de dote filiæ, patrimonio filii non sum solicitus." Translation: Alone untroubled by fear of losing in court or having my goods swept away in the Indian Ocean, I am not anxious about a daughter's dowry or a son's inheritance. Cyprian's Ad Donatum 6, 10, 12 and 14 offers thematic parallels, but comparison of the full Latin text did not locate this sentence. Its attribution remains unverified.

[124] Editor. The Stoic sage is an ideal of wisdom and detachment. The "forum" is the public world of legal and political business. "Macerate" means wear down or exhaust. The passage presents Burton's stance through theatrical and philosophical imagery; it is not a literal claim to see all history at once. Compare Cyprian, To Donatus 6 and 10, for the high viewpoint and troubled forum; the separate "Hensius" attribution remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 3–4 A meer spectator of other mens fortunes and adventures, and how they act their parts, which me thinks are diversly presented unto me, as from a common theatre or scene. I hear new news every day, and those ordinary rumors of war, plagues, fires, inundations, thefts, murders, massacres, meteors, comets, spectrums, prodigies, apparitions, of towns taken, cities besieged in France, Germany, Turky, Persia, Poland, &c. daily musters and preparations, and such like, which these tempestuous times afford, battles fought, so many men slain, monomachies, shipwracks, piracies, and sea-fights, peace, leagues, stratagems, and fresh alarums.	I am merely a spectator of other people's fortunes and adventures, watching them play their parts, which seem to unfold before me in all their variety upon a public stage. I hear fresh news every day: the usual reports of war, plagues, fires, floods, thefts, murders, massacres, phenomena in the sky, comets, spectres, marvels, and apparitions; of towns captured and cities besieged in France, Germany, Turkey, Persia, Poland, and elsewhere; daily musters of troops and preparations, and the other events these stormy times supply; battles fought, so many men killed, single combats, shipwrecks, piracy and sea battles, peace, alliances, stratagems, and fresh alarms.[125]
Source page 4 A vast confusion of vows, wishes, actions, edicts, petitions, law-suits, pleas, laws, proclamations, complaints, grievances are daily brought to our ears. New books every day, pamphlets, currantoes, stories, whole catalogues of volumes of all sorts, new paradoxes, opinions, schisms, heresies, controversies in philosophie, religion, &c.	A vast confusion of vows, wishes, deeds, edicts, petitions, lawsuits, pleas, laws, proclamations, complaints, and grievances reaches our ears each day. New books every day: pamphlets, news-sheets, histories, whole catalogues of volumes of every kind; new paradoxes, opinions, schisms, heresies, controversies in philosophy, religion, and more.[126]

[125] Editor. “Monomachies” are single combats. “Meteors” had a broader sense than the modern astronomical term, including phenomena in the air; “prodigies” are extraordinary signs or portents. The crowded enumeration is preserved rather than compressed into a general account of bad news.

[126] Editor. “Currantoes” are printed news-sheets or corantos. “Stories” here means histories or accounts. The succession of publications and disputes extends the preceding catalogue from public events to the world of print.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now come tidings of weddings, maskings, mummeries, entertainments, jubilies, embassies, tilts and tournaments, trophies, triumphs, revels, sports, playes: Then again, as in a new shifted scene, treasons, cheating tricks, robberies, enormous vilanies in all kindes, funerals, burials, death of Princes, new discoveries, expeditions; now comical, then tragical matters. To day we heare of new Lords and officers created, to morrow of some great men deposed, and then again of fresh honors conferred; one is let loose, another imprisoned; one purchaseth, another breaketh: he thrives, his neighbor turns bankrupt; now plenty, then again dearth and famine; one runs, another rides, wrangles, laughs, weeps, &c.	Now comes news of weddings, masques, mummers' performances, entertainments, jubilees, embassies, jousts and tournaments, trophies, triumphal celebrations, revels, sports, and plays. Then, as the scene changes, treasons, swindles, robberies, monstrous villainies of every kind, funerals, burials, the deaths of princes, new discoveries, expeditions: now comic events, then tragic ones. Today we hear of new lords and officers appointed, tomorrow of great men deposed, then of fresh honours bestowed. One is released, another imprisoned; one buys property, another goes broke; one prospers, his neighbour becomes bankrupt; now abundance, then scarcity and famine. One runs, another rides, quarrels, laughs, weeps, and so on.[127]
Thus I daily hear, and such like, both private and publick news, amidst the gallantry and misery of the world; jollitie, pride, perplexities and cares, simplicity and vilany; subtletie, knavery, candor and integrity, mutually mixt and offering themselves, I rub on privus privatus, as I have still lived, so I now continue, statu quo prius, left to a solitary life, and mine own domestick discontents:	Such things I hear each day, private and public news alike, amid the world's splendour and misery: merriment, pride, perplexities and cares, innocence and villainy, subtlety, knavery, candour and integrity, all mingling and presenting themselves. I jog along, "a private man apart," continuing as I have always lived, "in the same condition as before," left to a solitary life and my own troubles at home.[128]

[127] Editor. "Maskings" and "mummeries" are masked entertainments; "tilts" are jousts. "Breaketh" means fails financially, as the next clause makes explicit. Burton keeps changing the scene between good fortune and disaster, comedy and tragedy.

[128] Editor. "Rub on" means get along or carry on. "Gallantry" here suggests splendour or fine display. "Privus privatus" reinforces the speaker's separate, private condition; "statu quo prius" means in the same state as before. His admission of domestic discontents qualifies the preceding claims of detachment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
saving that sometimes, ne quid mentiar, as Diogenes went into the city, and Democritus to the haven to see fashions, I did for my recreation now and then walk abroad, look into the world, and could not choose but make some little observation, non tam sagax observator, ac simplex recitator, not as they did to scoff or laugh at all, but with a mixt passion. [129]Bilem sæpe, jocum vestri movere tumultus.	Except that sometimes, "to tell the whole truth," just as Diogenes went into the city and Democritus down to the harbour to observe people's ways, I would take a walk for recreation, look at the world, and inevitably make a few observations: "less a shrewd observer than a plain reporter." I did not, as they did, scoff or laugh at everything, but felt a mixture of emotions. Your commotions have often stirred my anger and my laughter.[130]
I did sometime laugh and scoff with Lucian, and satyrically tax with Menippus, lament with Heraclitus, sometimes again I was [131]petulanti splene chachinno, and then again, [132]urere bilis jecur, I was much moved to see that abuse which I could not amend.	At times I laughed and scoffed with Lucian, exposed faults through satire with Menippus, or lamented with Heraclitus. At other times I was "a scoffer with a mischievous spleen"; then again, "bile burned my liver." I was deeply stirred by abuses I could not remedy.[133]

[129] Burton. Printed p. 4, m: "Hor." Horace. Compare Epistles 1.19.19–20; Burton's wording is abbreviated and rearranged.

[130] Editor. "See fashions" means observe people's ways or behaviour. The Latin verse adapts Horace, Epistles 1.19.19–20, where the speaker alternates between anger and amusement at imitators. Burton transfers the line to the commotion of the world around him.

[131] Burton. Printed p. 4, n: "Per." Persius. Compare Satire 1.12.

[132] Burton. Printed p. 4, o: "Hor." Horace. Compare Satires 1.9.66.

[133] Editor. Lucian and Menippus evoke satire; Heraclitus supplies the contrasting figure of lamentation. The next phrases draw on Persius, Satire 1.12, and Horace, Satires 1.9.66. Spleen and liver give the changing emotions bodily expression. "Chachinno" is the spelling printed here; the consulted Persius text has "cachinno."

Original text 1651	Modern English
In which passion howsoever I may sympathize with him or them, tis for no such respect I shroud my self under his name, but either in an unknown habit, to assume a little more liberty and freedom of speech, or if you will needs know; for that reason and only respect, which Hippocrates relates at large in his Epistle to Damegetus, wherein he doth expresse, how coming to visit him one day, he found Democritus in his garden at Abdera, in the suburbs, [134]under a shady bower, [135]with a book on his knees, busie at his study, sometimes writing, sometime walking.	However much I may share those feelings with him or with them, that is not why I conceal myself beneath his name. I do it either to gain a little more liberty and freedom of speech under an unfamiliar disguise, or, if you insist on knowing, for the single reason Hippocrates describes at length in his letter to Damegetus. He relates that, visiting Democritus one day, he found him in his garden on the outskirts of Abdera, beneath a shady bower, with a book on his knees, absorbed in study, sometimes writing, sometimes walking.[136]
The subject of his book was melancholy and madnes, about him lay the carcasses of many several beasts, newly by him cut up and anatomized, not that he did contemn Gods creatures, as he told Hippocrates, but to finde out the seat of this atra bilis, or melancholy, whence it proceeds, and how it was engendred in mens bodies, to the intent he might the better cure it in himself, by his writings and observations [137]teach others how to prevent and avoid it.	His book concerned melancholy and madness. Around him lay the carcasses of many different animals, which he had recently cut open and dissected. As he told Hippocrates, this was not from contempt for God's creatures, but to discover the seat of this "black bile," or melancholy: where it came from and how it was generated in human bodies. He intended thereby to cure it more effectively in himself and, through his writings and observations, teach others how to prevent and avoid it.[138]

[134] Burton. Printed p. 4, p: "Secundum mænia locus erat frondosis populis opacus, vitibusq; sponte natis, tenuis prope aqua defluebat, placide murmurans, ubi sedile & domus Democriti conspiciebatur." Translation: Beside the walls was a place shaded by leafy poplars and wild vines; nearby a slender stream flowed down, murmuring gently, where Democritus's seat and dwelling could be seen.

[135] Burton. Printed p. 4, q: "Ipse compositè considebat, super genua volumen habens, & utrinque alia patentia parata, dissectaq; animalia cumulatim strata, quorum viscera rimabatur." Translation: He sat composedly, with a volume on his knees and others open and ready on either side; dissected animals lay in heaps, and he examined their entrails.

[136] Editor. This continues the story from the later letters attributed to Hippocrates, introduced in Block 001. The encounter is part of that pseudonymous literary tradition, rather than authenticated correspondence between Hippocrates and Democritus. Burton uses the scene to explain his adopted name and his own undertaking.

[137] Burton. Printed p. 4, r: "Cùm mundus extra se sit, & mente captus sit, & nesciat se languere, ut medelam adhibeat." Translation: Since the world is beside itself, out of its mind, and unaware that it is ill, so that it may apply a remedy. The fragment joins the argument of the main text.

[138] Editor. "Atra bilis" literally means black bile. Burton moves between melancholy as a bodily substance and as an affliction, within the historical medical framework of the passage. "Seat" means its bodily location. The translation retains that connection without substituting a present-day diagnostic term.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 4–5 Which good intent of his, Hippocrates highly commended: Democritus junior is therfore bold to imitate, & because he left it unperfect, & it is now lost, quasi succenturiator Democriti, to revive again, prosecute and finish in this treatise.	Hippocrates warmly praised this good intention. Democritus Junior therefore ventures to imitate him and, since he left the work unfinished and it is now lost, to revive, pursue, and complete it in this treatise, "as Democritus's stand-in."[139]
Source page 5 You have had a reason of the name; If the title and inscription offend your gravity, were it a sufficient justification to accuse others, I could produce many sober treatises, even sermons themselves, which in their fronts carry more phantastical names. Howsoever it is a kinde of policie in these daies, to prefix a phantastical title to a book which is to be sold:	You have heard my reason for the name. If the title and its wording offend your sense of seriousness, I could produce many sober treatises—even sermons—with more fanciful names on their title pages, if pointing to others were a sufficient defence. In any case, these days a fanciful title is a way of helping a book sell.[140]

[139] Editor. "Succenturiator" is one who takes another's place, with the underlying image of a replacement or reserve soldier. The assertion that Democritus left this work unfinished and that it was lost belongs to Burton's account. It frames the Anatomy as a continuation of his chosen predecessor's project.

[140] Editor. "Inscription" means the wording of a title; "gravity," seriousness or dignity; "phantastical," fanciful. "Policie" here is a practical strategy for attracting readers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For as Larks come down to a day-net, many vain readers will tarry and stand gazing like silly passengers, at an antick picture in a painters shop, that will not look at a judicious peece. And indeed as [141]Scaliger observes, nothing more invites a reader then an argument unlooked for, unthought of, and sels better than a scurrile pamphlet, tum maxime cum novitas excitat [142]palatum.	For, as larks descend into a net set by day, many frivolous readers will stop and stare, like foolish passers-by, at a grotesque picture in a painter's shop, though they will not look at a work of sound judgement. Indeed, as Scaliger observes, nothing attracts a reader more than an unexpected, unthought-of subject, and nothing sells better than a scurrilous pamphlet, "especially when novelty excites the palate."[143]

[141] Burton. Printed p. 5, s: "Scaliger Ep. ad Patisonem. nihil magis lectorem invitat quam inopinatum argumentum, neque vendibilior merx est quàm petulans liber." Translation: Scaliger, letter to Patison: nothing attracts a reader more than an unexpected subject, and no merchandise sells better than a scurrilous book. Compare Joseph Justus Scaliger, Confutatio stultissimae Burdonum fabulae, in Opuscula varia (Frankfurt, 1612), part II, pp. 52 and 54, misprinted 420 and 422. Burton combines shortened extracts in reverse order: the scurrilous book on p. 420, the unexpected subject on p. 422. This locates the wording; it does not explain his label "Ep. ad Patisonem."

[142] Burton. Printed p. 5, *: "Lib. 20. c. 11. miras sequuntur inscriptionum festivitates." Translation: Book 20, chapter 11: they pursue extraordinary cleverness in titles. The star is printed before "palatum," but the note concerns the following Gellius reference. The passage is now Attic Nights, preface 4–10. In the inspected Venice 1515 and Lyon 1537 editions, it follows book XX, chapter 10 at the end of the text. This supports the older placement behind Burton's 20.11, though neither inspected opening labels it XI. His Latin is a summary: Gellius says that he has not imitated other writers' clever titles.

[143] Editor. An "antick picture" is a grotesque or fanciful image, contrasted with a judiciously composed work. Burton compares its onlookers to birds drawn into a trap. The modern version supplies "nothing" before "sells better," following the two claims in his Latin marginal note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many men, saith Gellius, are very conceited in their inscriptions, and able (as [144]Plinie quotes out of Seneca) to make him loyter by the way, that went in hast to fetch a mid-wife for his daughter, now ready to lie down. For my part I have honorable [145]presidents for this which I have done: I will cite one for all, Anthonie Zara Pap. Episc. his Anatomie of wit, in four sections, members, subsections, &c. to be read in our Libraries.	Many writers, Gellius says, are very ingenious in devising titles, which can—as Pliny quotes from Seneca—make a man dawdle on his way to fetch a midwife for his daughter, who is about to give birth.[146] For my part, I have honourable precedents for what I have done. One will stand for them all: Bishop Antonio Zara's Anatomy of Wit, divided into four sections, members, subsections, and so on, available to read in our libraries.[147]
If any man except against the matter or manner of treating of this my subject, and will demand a reason of it, I can alleage more then one, I write of melancholy, by being busie to avoid melancholy. There is no greater cause of melancholy then idlenesse, no better cure then businesse, as [148]Rhasis holds:	If anyone objects to my subject, or to the way I treat it, and demands a reason, I can give more than one. I write about melancholy to avoid melancholy by keeping busy. Nothing causes melancholy more than idleness, and nothing cures it better than activity, as Rhazes maintains.[149]

[144] Burton. Printed p. 5, t: “Præfat. Nat. hist. patri obstetricem parturienti filiæ accersenti moram injicere possunt.” Translation: Preface to the Natural History: they can delay a father fetching a midwife for his daughter in labour. The Pliny and Seneca references are disentangled in the editorial note.

[145] Burton. Printed p. 5, u: “Anatomie of poperie. Anatomie of immortalitie. Angelus salas, Anatomie of Antimony, &c.” These are further examples of “anatomy” titles. Sala’s work is identifiable as Anatomia antimonii (Leiden: Godefridus Basson, 1617), a Latin account of antimony’s uses, properties and powers. Burton gives an English rendering of its title. The works intended by “poperie” and “immortalitie,” and his particular copy of Sala, remain unverified.

[146] Editor. “Conceited” here means ingenious or fanciful. Compare Gellius, Attic Nights, preface 4–10, and Pliny, Natural History, preface 24, on elaborate book titles. The father fetching a midwife occurs separately in Seneca, Moral Letters 117.30, where he would not stop to read a public notice. Burton combines these passages and reverses the force of Seneca’s example. His composite account is preserved in the modern column.

[147] Editor. “Presidents” means precedents; “wit” means intellect. The full title of Zara’s Anatomia ingeniorum et scientiarum (Venice, 1615) specifies four sections. Burton’s “members” are subdivisions, extending the anatomical metaphor. The 1615 title page calls Zara “episcopo Petinensi,” bishop of Pedena, now Pićan. It confirms his office and the four sections, but does not explain Burton’s “Pap. Episc.” The abbreviation is retained on the left; “Bishop” on the right leaves its uncertain first element unexpanded.

[148] Burton. Printed p. 5, x: “Cont. l. 4. c. 9. Non est cura melior quàm labor.” Translation: Continens, book 4, chapter 9: there is no better cure than work. Burton attributes this to Rhasis, or Rhazes; the cited edition and passage remain to be collated.

[149] Editor. “Businesse” means occupation or activity. Writing about melancholy is itself Burton’s chosen occupation: the subject that troubles him also gives him the work by which he hopes to find relief.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and howbeit, stultus labor est ineptiarum, to be busied in toyes is to small purpose, yet hear that divine Seneca, better aliud agere quam nihil, better do to no end than nothing. I writ therefore, and busied my self in this playing labour, otiosaq; diligentiâ ut vitarem torporem feriandi with Vectius in Macrobius, atq; otium in utile verterem negotium. [150]Simul & jucunda & idonea dicere vitæ, Lectorem delectando simul atque monendo.	And although "labour spent on trifles is foolish"—occupying oneself with trivial things serves little purpose—listen to the divine Seneca: better "to do something else than nothing," better to do something without purpose than nothing at all.[151] So I wrote and kept myself occupied in this playful labour, "with an idle diligence, to escape the torpor of doing nothing," like Vettius in Macrobius, "and to turn leisure into useful work."[152] To say things both pleasant and useful for life, delighting the reader while offering instruction.

[150] Burton. Printed p. 5, y: "Hor." Horace. Burton combines Ars Poetica 334 and 344, with changes: the second line of the consulted Latin text reads "lectorem delectando pariterque monendo."

[151] Editor. The Latin about trifling labour is from Martial, Epigrams 2.86.10. "Toyes" means trifles, not specifically children's playthings. "Divine Seneca" is praise of the writer, not an identification of him as a Christian theologian. Compare Seneca, Moral Letters 88.45: "Satius est supervacua scire quam nihil," better to know useless things than nothing. There Seneca contrasts useless learning with denial of knowledge; Burton speaks of activity and idleness. This is a possible parallel, not a verified source for his wording.

[152] Editor. Compare Macrobius, Saturnalia 1.7.7, where Vettius Praetextatus describes learned conversation during a festival as a way of avoiding idle torpor and making leisure useful. Burton adapts the wording to himself. "Idle diligence" preserves his paradox; "Vectius" is the name as printed in the 1651 text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To this end I write, like them, saith Lucian, that recite to trees, and declaim to pillars for want of auditors: as [153]Paulus Ægineta ingeniously confesseth, not that any thing was unknown or omitted, but to exercise my self, which course if some took, I think it would be good for their bodies, and much better for their souls; or peradventure as others do, for fame, to shew my self (Scire tuum nihil est, nisi te scire hoc sciat alter.)	For this purpose I write, like those who, Lucian says, recite to trees and deliver speeches to pillars for want of listeners. As Paul of Aegina frankly admits, it is not because anything was unknown or left out, but to exercise myself. If certain people followed that course, I think it would be good for their bodies and much better for their souls.[154] Or perhaps I write, as others do, for fame, to display myself: "Your knowledge counts for nothing unless someone else knows that you know it."[155]

[153] Burton. Printed p. 5, z: "Non quod de novo quid addere, aut à veteribus prætermissum, sed propriæ exercitationis causâ." Translation: Not to add anything new or anything omitted by the ancients, but for my own exercise. The opening of Paul's own preface supplies the comparison: Opus de re medica, Guinter's Latin translation (Cologne, 1534), unnumbered preface, scan n51. Paul says that the ancients omitted nothing necessary and that his compendium will serve readers and exercise himself. Burton condenses these remarks; his exact Latin differs from Guinter's, so the version he used remains unproved.

[154] Editor. Paul of Aegina is a medical author. Printed "ingeniously" is rendered "frankly" because the context is an admission. "Auditors" are listeners; "exercise" means mental practice. Compare the opening of Lucian's Symposium, or A Feast of Lapithae: Philo says that Lycinus, eager to recount a drunken banquet, would tell it to a pillar or statue if no listener were available. This offers a parallel for the pillars, but not Burton's trees or an example of practising declamation. The full allusion remains uncertain.

[155] Editor. Persius, Satire 1.27. In its original setting the line is a question challenging the need to have one's learning noticed. Burton uses it while admitting that a wish for recognition may be among his motives.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I might be of Thucydidis opinion, [156]to know a thing and not to expresse it, is all one as if he knew it not. When I first took this task in hand, & quod ait [157]ille, impellente genio negotium suscepi, this I aimed at; [158]vel ut lenirem animum scribendo, to ease my minde by writing, for I had gravidum cor, fætum caput, a kind of impostume in my head, which I was very desirous to be unladen of, and could imagin no fitter evacuation then this.	I might share Thucydides' opinion that knowing something without expressing it is as good as not knowing it. When I first took up this task, "and, as that writer says, undertook the work at the prompting of my genius," this was my aim: "at least to soothe my mind by writing," to ease my mind through writing. For I had "a burdened heart, a pregnant head," a kind of abscess in my head that I very much wanted to discharge, and I could imagine no better way to empty it than this.[159]
Besides I might not well refrain, for ubi dolor, ibi digitus, one must needs scratch where it itches. I was not a little offended with this maladie, shall I say my Mistris melancholy, my Ægeria, or my malus genius, & for that cause as he that is stung with a scorpion, I would expel clavum clavo, [160]comfort one sorrow with another, idlenes with idlenes, ut ex viperâ Theriacum, make an Antidote out of that which was the prime cause of my disease.	Besides, I could hardly hold back, for "where the pain is, there goes the finger": one must scratch where it itches. I was considerably afflicted by this malady—shall I call it my mistress Melancholy, my Egeria, or my "evil spirit"?[161] And so, like someone stung by a scorpion, I would drive out "one nail with another," soothe one sorrow with another, idleness with idleness, "as theriac is made from a viper," making an antidote from the very thing that was the chief cause of my disease.[162]

[156] Burton. Printed p. 5, a: "Qui novit, neque id quod sentit exprimit, perinde est ac si nesciret." Translation: Someone who knows but does not express what he thinks is as if he did not know. Compare Thucydides 2.60.6, in Pericles' speech; Burton gives a general formulation of the claim.

[157] Burton. Printed p. 5, b: "Jovius Præf. Hist." Paolo Giovio, preface to his History. The precise passage remains to be checked.

[158] Burton. Printed p. 5, c: "Erasmus." Burton's attribution is retained; no work is specified, and the exact source remains unresolved.

[159] Editor. A "genius" is a guiding spirit or inner prompting. "Gravidum cor, fætum caput" gives Burton a laden heart and a pregnant head; an "impostume" is an abscess. These bodily images convey the pressure to write and discharge what has accumulated.

[160] Burton. Printed p. 5, d: "Otium otio dolorem dolore sum solatus." Translation: I have consoled idleness with idleness, sorrow with sorrow. No author is named in this marginal note.

[161] Editor. Egeria is the nymph who advises Numa in Roman tradition; compare Livy 1.19.5. Burton tries out three relationships to melancholy: mistress, counsellor, or harmful spirit. "Malus genius" means an evil or malign spirit, not a person of unusual intelligence.

[162] Editor. One nail drives out another: one trouble displaces another. Theriac was a compound antidote containing viper flesh. Burton imagines making a remedy from the cause of his affliction.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 6 Or as he did, of whom [163]Felix Plater speaks, that thought he had some of Aristophanes frogs in his belly, still crying Brecc' ckex, coax, coax, oop, oop, and for that cause studied physick seven years, and travelled over most part of Europe to ease himself: To do my self good I turned over such physicians as our libraries would afford, or my [164]private friends impart, and have taken this pains.	Or like the man Felix Platter describes, who thought he had some of Aristophanes' frogs in his belly, continually crying "Brecc' ckex, coax, coax, oop, oop," and for that reason studied medicine for seven years and travelled through most of Europe in search of relief. To help myself, I read through whatever medical authors our libraries could supply or my personal friends could share with me, and undertook all this labour.[165]
And why not? Cardan professeth he writ his book De consolatione after his sons death, to comfort himself, so did Tully write of the same subject with like intent after his daughters departure, if it be his at least, or some impostors put out in his name, which Lipsius probably suspects.	And why not? Cardano says that he wrote his book On Consolation after his son's death to comfort himself. Cicero likewise wrote on the same subject, with the same purpose, after his daughter's death—if the work really is his, rather than an impostor's published under his name, as Lipsius suspects with good reason.[166]

[163] Burton. Printed p. 6, f: "Observat. l. 1." Felix Platter, Observations, book 1. Burton's report is retained; the individual case has not yet been checked in Platter's text.

[164] Burton. Printed p. 6, g: "M. Joh. Rous our Protobib. Oxon. M. Hopper. M. Guthridge, &c." The note names friends who supplied books. "Protobib. Oxon." abbreviates an Oxford chief librarian's title; Burton identifies John Rous in that role.

[165] Editor. "Still" means continually; "physick" means medicine; "physicians" here stands for their writings. The croaking invokes Aristophanes' comedy The Frogs. Burton's printed sound sequence is retained on both sides. Platter's story supplies another example of illness leading to medical study.

[166] Editor. Burton's chronology is mistaken: Cardano's De consolatione appeared in 1542, whereas his eldest son was executed in 1560. See the University of Milan's Cardano archive and Nancy G. Siraisi, The Clock and the Mirror (1997), p. 5. The modern column preserves Burton's claim. "Tully" is Cicero; "departure" means death. Burton doubts the authenticity of the consolation circulating under Cicero's name; the exact Lipsius discussion remains to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Concerning my self, I can peradventure affirm with Marius in Salust, [167]that which others hear or reade of, I felt, and practised my self, they get their knowledge by books, I mine by melancholizing, Experto crede Roberto.	As for myself, perhaps I can say with Marius in Sallust: what others hear or read about, I have felt and practised myself. They gain their knowledge from books; I gain mine by melancholizing. "Trust Robert: he knows from experience."[168]
Something I can speak out of experience, ærumnabilis experientia me docuit, and with her in the Poet, [169]Haud ignara mali miseris succurrere disco. I would help others out of a fellow-feeling, and as that vertuous Lady did of old, [170]being a leper her self, bestow all her portion to build an Hospital for Lepers, I will spend my time and knowledge, which are my greatest fortunes, for the common good of all.	There are things I can speak of from experience: "painful experience has taught me." And I can say with the woman in the poem: "Knowing misfortune myself, I am learning to help the unfortunate." I would help others from fellow-feeling. Just as that virtuous lady of old, herself suffering from leprosy, devoted her whole inheritance to building a hospital for people with leprosy, I will spend my time and knowledge, my greatest possessions, for the good of everyone.[171]

[167] Burton. Printed p. 6, h: "Quæ illi audire & legere solent, eorum partim vidi egomet, alia gessi, quæ illi literis, ego militando didici, nunc vos existimate facta an dicta pluris sint." Translation: Of what they commonly hear and read, I have seen some myself and done other things; what they learned from books, I learned through soldiering. Now judge whether deeds or words count for more. Compare Sallust, Jugurthine War 85.13–14; Burton adapts Marius's military experience to his own experience of melancholy.

[168] Editor. "Melancholizing" is retained as Burton's expressive verb for undergoing or dwelling in melancholy. "Experto crede Roberto" playfully names Robert himself as the authority: trust the person who has experienced it. It should not be mistaken for an independent authority called Robert.

[169] Burton. Printed p. 6, i: "Dido Virg." Dido in Virgil, Aeneid 1.630. Burton prints "Haud ignara"; the consulted Virgil text reads "Non ignara." Both mean "not unfamiliar with."

[170] Burton. Printed p. 6, k: "Camden. Ipsa elephantiasi correpta elephantiasis hospitium construxit." Translation: Camden: herself afflicted with leprosy, she built a house for people with leprosy. Compare Camden's account of Maiden Bradley in Wiltshire. The disease term is rendered in accordance with Burton's own English.

[171] Editor. The speaker in Virgil is Dido, welcoming the displaced Trojans; compare Aeneid 1.628–630. Camden's Britannia, Wiltshire, paragraph 9, tells the story of a woman at Maiden Bradley who devoted her inheritance to a hospital. That identifies Burton's literary example; it does not independently verify the foundation story. "Portion" means her inheritance or allotted property.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yea but you will infer that this is [172]actum agere, an unnecessary work, cramben bis coctam apponere, the same again and again in other words. To what purpose? [173]Nothing is omitted that may well be said, so thought Lucian in the like theam. How many excellent Physitians have written just Volumes and elaborate tracts of this subject? no news here, that which I have is stoln from others, [174]Dicitq; mihi mea pagina fur es.	Yes, but you will say that this is "doing what has already been done," an unnecessary task, "serving up twice-cooked cabbage": the same thing again and again in different words. What is the point? Nothing worth saying has been left unsaid, as Lucian thought on a similar theme. How many excellent physicians have written full-length volumes and painstaking treatises on this subject? There is nothing new here. What I have is stolen from others: "My own page says to me, 'You are a thief.'"[175]
If that severe doom of [176]Synesius be true, It is a greater offence to steal dead mens labours, than their clothes, what shall become of most Writers? I hold up my hand at the bar amongst others, and am guilty of felonie in this kinde, habes confitentem reum, I am content to be pressed with the rest.	If Synesius's severe judgement is right—that it is a greater offence to steal dead men's writings than their clothes—what will become of most writers? I raise my hand at the bar alongside the others and plead guilty to this kind of felony: "You have a defendant who confesses." I am content to be pressed with the rest.[177]

[172] Burton. Printed p. 6, l: "Iliada post Homerum." Translation: An Iliad after Homer. The phrase gives another image for repeating what an earlier writer has already accomplished.

[173] Burton. Printed p. 6, m: "Nihil prætermissum quod à quovis dici possit." Translation: Nothing has been left out that anyone could say. Burton attributes the thought in his main text to Lucian; the exact work and passage remain to be located.

[174] Burton. Printed p. 6, n: "Martialis." Martial. Compare Epigrams 1.53.12, where a plagiarist's page accuses its own author of theft. Burton turns the accusation upon himself.

[175] Editor. The twice-cooked cabbage is an image of stale repetition. "Just volumes" means full or substantial volumes. Burton's version of Martial's accusation turns a warning against plagiarism into a confession about his own method of borrowing.

[176] Burton. Printed p. 6, o: "Magis impium mortuorum lucubrationes, quàm vestes furari." Translation: It is more impious to steal the dead's writings than their clothes. Compare Synesius, Letter 143.7 to Herculian, in A. Fitzgerald's translation. Synesius is discussing his own incorporation of lines by an earlier poet; Burton applies the image to writers more generally.

[177] Editor. "Doom" means judgement; the "bar" is the place of the accused in court. "Pressed" sustains the image of judicial punishment while also suggesting the printing press. The modern rendering keeps the word so that the double meaning remains available.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tis most true, tenet insanabile multos scribendi cacoëthes, and [178]there is no end of writing of books, as the Wise-man found of old, in this [179]scribling age, especially wherein [180]the number of books is without number, (as a worthy man saith) presses be oppressed, and out of an itching humor, that every man hath to shew himself, [181]desirous of fame and honor (scribimus indocti doctiq;———) he will write no matter what, and scrape together it boots not whence.	It is very true: "many are gripped by an incurable itch to write," and "there is no end to the writing of books," as the wise man discovered long ago. In this scribbling age, especially, "the number of books is beyond number" (as a worthy man says), and "the presses are oppressed." Everyone has an itch to display himself and longs for fame and honour—"learned and unlearned alike, we write"—so he will write anything at all and scrape it together from anywhere.[182]
[183]Bewitched with this desire of fame, etiam mediis in morbis, to the disparagement of their health, and scarce able to hold a pen, they must say something, [184]and get themselves a name, saith Scaliger, though it be to the down-fall and ruine of many others.	Bewitched by this desire for fame, "even in the midst of illness," damaging their health and scarcely able to hold a pen, they must say something and make a name for themselves, Scaliger says, even at the cost of bringing many others down to ruin.

[178] Burton. Printed p. 6, p: "Eccl. ult." Ecclesiastes, last chapter. The passage is 12:12, which also speaks of the bodily weariness caused by much study.

[179] Burton. Printed p. 6, q: "Libros Eunuchi gignunt, steriles pariunt." Translation: Eunuchs beget books; the barren give birth. No author is named here. The reproductive image makes literary abundance a kind of unnatural fertility.

[180] Burton. Printed p. 6, r: "D. King præfat. lect. Jonas the late right reverend Lord B. of London." John King, preface to his Lectures upon Jonah. Burton identifies him as the late bishop of London; the precise wording remains to be collated.

[181] Burton. Printed p. 6, s: "Homines famelici gloriæ ad ostentationem eruditionis undique congerunt. Buchananus." Translation: Men hungry for glory heap things together from everywhere to display their learning. Burton attributes this to Buchanan; the exact passage remains unlocated.

[182] Editor. The opening Latin is from Juvenal, Satire 7.51–52; the later phrase about learned and unlearned writers is from Horace, Epistles 2.1.117. "Humor" here is an inclination or urge; "it boots not" means it does not matter. Burton's "wise man" is the speaker of Ecclesiastes.

[183] Burton. Printed p. 6, t: "Effascinati etiam laudis amore, &c. Justus Baronius." Translation: Bewitched also by love of praise, and so on. Burton's attribution to Justus Baronius is retained; the source has not yet been identified securely.

[184] Burton. Printed p. 6, u: "Ex ruinis alienæ existimationis sibi gradum ad famam struunt." Translation: From the ruins of other people's reputations they build themselves a step towards fame. Burton names Scaliger in the main text; the exact passage remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To be counted writers, scriptores ut salutentur, to be thought and held Polumathes and Polyhistors, apud imperitum vulgus ob ventosæ nomen artis, to get a paper-kingdom: nulla spe quæstus sed amplâ famæ, in this precipitate, ambitious age, nunc ut est sæculum, inter immaturam eruditionem, ambitiosum & præceps (tis [185]Scaligers censure) and they that are scarce auditors, vix auditores, must be masters and teachers, before they be capable and fit hearers.	To be counted as writers, "to be greeted as authors"; to be regarded as polymaths and scholars of universal learning "among the ignorant crowd, for the empty name of learning"; to acquire a kingdom of paper, "with no hope of profit, but great hope of fame": such is this rash, ambitious age, "the age as it now is, ambitious and headlong amid immature learning" (that is Scaliger's judgement). People who are scarcely students, "barely listeners," must become masters and teachers before they are capable, qualified pupils.[186]
Source page 6–7 They will rush into all learning, togatam, armatam, divine, humane authors, rake over all Indexes & Pamphlets for notes, as our merchants do strange havens for traffick, write great Tomes, Cum non sint re vera doctiores, sed loquaciores, when as they are not therby better scholars, but greater praters. They commonly pretend publike good, but as [187]Gesner observes, tis pride and vanity that eggs them on, no news or ought worthy of note, but the same in other terms. Ne feriarentur fortasse typographi, vel ideo scribendum est aliquid ut se vixisse testentur.	They rush into every branch of learning, "of the gown and of arms," into religious and secular authors, and rake through every index and pamphlet for notes, as our merchants scour foreign ports for trade. They write huge volumes, "though they are not really more learned, only more talkative": they become greater babblers, not better scholars. They usually claim to serve the public good, but, as Gesner observes, pride and vanity spur them on. They offer nothing new or worth noticing, only the same things in different words. "Perhaps something must be written to keep the printers from idleness, or simply to testify that the writers have lived."[188]

[185] Burton. Printed p. 6, x: "Exercit. 288." Scaliger's Exercitations, no. 288. The reference is retained; direct comparison with the cited passage remains open.

[186] Editor. "Polumathes" and "Polyhistors" name people reputed to possess extensive learning. The "paper-kingdom" is dominion or fame won through books. "Auditors" and "hearers" are pupils, set against the premature ambition to become teachers.

[187] Burton. Printed p. 7, a: "Omnes sibi famam quærunt & quovis modo in orbem spargi contendunt, ut novæ alicujus rei habeantur authores. Præf. biblioth." Translation: Everyone seeks fame and strives by any means to become known throughout the world, so as to be considered the author of something new. Burton attributes this to Gesner's bibliographical preface; the precise text remains to be collated.

[188] Editor. "Togatam, armatam" evokes the gown and military arms: civil and military learning. "Divine" and "humane" distinguish religious from secular authors. "Pretend" means profess or claim; "news," something new; "praters," babblers. Burton's Latin returns him to the printing trade and the wish to leave a record of one's existence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 7 As Apothecaries we make new mixtures every day, pour out of one vessell into another; and as those old Romans rob'd all the cities of the world, to set out their bad sited Rome, we skim off the cream of other mens wits, pick the choice flowers of their till'd gardens to set out our own sterill plots. Castrant alios ut libros suos per se graciles alieno adipe suffarciant (so [189]Jovius inveighs) They lard their lean books with the fat of others works. Ineruditi fures, &c.	Like apothecaries, we make new mixtures every day, pouring from one vessel into another. Like those ancient Romans who robbed every city in the world to adorn their badly situated Rome, we skim the cream from other people's minds and pluck the finest flowers from their cultivated gardens to decorate our own barren plots. "They castrate others to stuff their own naturally lean books with someone else's fat," as Giovio indignantly puts it. They lard their lean books with the fat of other people's works. "Unlearned thieves," and so on.[190]
A fault that every Writer findes, as I do now, and yet faulty themselves, [191]Trium literarum homines, all theeves; they pilfer out of old Writers to stuffe up their new Comments, scrape Ennius dung-hils, and out of [192]Democritus pit, as I have done.	Every writer points out this fault, as I am doing now, yet they are guilty of it themselves: "men of three letters," all thieves. They pilfer from old writers to pad their new commentaries, scrape Ennius's dung heaps, and draw from Democritus's well, as I have done.[193]

[189] Burton. Printed p. 7, *: "Præfat. hist." Preface to the History. Burton names Paolo Giovio in the main text; the exact passage remains to be checked.

[190] Editor. Burton's "we" includes himself in the charge. His metaphors move through pharmacy, plunder, gardening, castration, and cookery; the modern version retains their physical force. "Wits" means minds or intellectual productions.

[191] Burton. Printed p. 7, b: "Plautus." Compare Aulularia 325–326. A "man of three letters" is a fur, the Latin word for thief.

[192] Burton. Printed p. 7, c: "E Democriti puteo." Translation: From Democritus's well. This clarifies "pit" in the main text; the particular source of the expression remains unresolved.

[193] Editor. The three-letter joke depends on Latin fur, "thief"; it is translated literally and explained in Burton's note. Ennius's dung heaps evoke the story of Virgil finding literary gold in an earlier poet's rough work. Compare the Life of Virgil printed under Donatus's name, §71, where Virgil describes gathering gold from Ennius's dung.

Original text 1651	Modern English
By which means it comes to passe, [194]that not only libraries and shops are full of our putid papers, but every close-stool and jakes, Scribunt carmina quæ legunt cacantes; they serve to put under pies, to [195]lap spice in, and keep rost-meat from burning.	And so our stinking papers fill not only libraries and shops but every commode and privy: "They write verses that people read while shitting." These papers serve to line the bottoms of pies, wrap spices, and keep roasting meat from burning.[196]
With us in France, saith [197]Scaliger, every man hath liberty to write, but few ability. [198]Heretofore learning was graced by judicious scholars, but now noble sciences are vilified by base and illiterate scriblers, that either write for vain-glory, need, to get money, or as Parasites to flatter and collogue with some great men, they put out [199]burras, quisquiliasque ineptiasque.	"Here in France," Scaliger says, "everyone has permission to write, but few have the ability." Learning was once honoured by discerning scholars; now noble fields of knowledge are debased by low, unlearned scribblers. They write out of vanity or need, to make money, or as parasites to flatter and ingratiate themselves with some powerful man, publishing "trifles, rubbish, and nonsense."[200]

[194] Burton. Printed p. 7, d: "Non tam refertæ bibliothecæ quam cloacæ." Translation: Not so much libraries as sewers are filled. No author is named in this note.

[195] Burton. Printed p. 7, e: "Et quicquid cartis amicitur ineptis." Translation: And whatever is wrapped in worthless paper. The exact source of this line remains unlocated.

[196] Editor. "Putid" means foul-smelling; a "close-stool" is a commode, a "jakes" a privy, and "lap" means wrap. Burton adapts Martial, Epigrams 12.61.10, changing singular "scribit" to plural "scribunt." Martial describes verses written on walls for people using a latrine to read; Burton makes the line part of his attack on printed waste paper.

[197] Burton. Printed p. 7, f: "Epist. ad Petas. in regno Franciæ omnibus scribendi datur libertas, paucis facultas." Translation: Letter to Petasius: in the kingdom of France everyone is allowed to write, but few have the ability. The abbreviated addressee and exact letter require further checking.

[198] Burton. Printed p. 7, g: "Olim literæ ob homines in precio, nunc sordent ob homines." Translation: Once learning was valued because of its practitioners; now it is despised because of them. No author is named here.

[199] Burton. Printed p. 7, h: "Aus. pac." Ausonius, the prefatory poem to Pacatus Drepanius, line 5; printed as Eclogarum Liber 1 in Evelyn-White's edition. Burton adds "-que" to "quisquilias." The poet's modest description of his own verses becomes an attack on other writers.

[200] Editor. "Sciences" means fields of learning. "Collogue" means flatter or ingratiate oneself; "Parasites" are people who live by pleasing patrons. The Latin list means worthless trifles, refuse, and foolish things.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[201]Amongst so many thousand Authors you shall scarse finde one, by reading of whom you shall be any whit better, but rather much worse, quibus inficitur potius, quàm perficitur, by which he is rather infected than any way perfected. ———[202]Qui talia legit, Quid didicit tandem, quid scit nisi somnia, nugas? So that oftentimes it fals out (which Challimachus taxed of old) a great Book is a great mischief.	Among so many thousands of authors, you will scarcely find one whose works make you any better by reading them; instead, they make you much worse: "by which one is infected rather than perfected," corrupted rather than improved. Someone who reads such things— what has he learned, after all? What does he know but dreams and nonsense? So it often turns out, as Callimachus complained long ago, that a big book is a great evil.[203]
[204]Cardan findes fault with French men and Germans, for their scribling to no purpose, non inquit ab edendo deterreo, modo novum aliquid inveniant, he doth not bar them to write, so that it be some new invention of their own; but we weave the same web still, twist the same robe again and again, or if it be a new invention, tis but some bauble or toy which idle fellows write, for as idle fellows to read, and who so cannot invent?	Cardano criticizes the French and the Germans for their pointless scribbling: "I do not," he says, "discourage them from publishing, provided that they discover something new." He does not forbid them to write, so long as they produce a new invention of their own. But we keep weaving the same cloth, twisting the same rope again and again. Or, if the invention is new, it is merely some trinket or trifle, written by idle fellows for equally idle fellows to read. Who cannot invent something like that?[205]

[201] Burton. Printed p. 7, i: "Inter tot mille volumina vix unus a cujus lectione quis melior evadat, immo potius non pejor." Translation: Among so many thousands of volumes, scarcely one leaves a person better for reading it—or rather, does not leave him worse. No author is named in this note.

[202] Burton. Printed p. 7, k: "Palingenius." The verse is attributed to Palingenius. Its precise location in his work remains to be verified.

[203] Editor. Burton repeats the Latin contrast between infecting and perfecting in English; both stages are retained. The saying about a big book is preserved as Callimachus, fragment 465 in Pfeiffer's numbering. In a work of this size, Burton's inclusion of it also turns the joke against himself.

[204] Burton. Printed p. 7, l: "Lib. 5. de sap." Cardano, On Wisdom, book 5. The exact passage remains to be collated.

[205] Editor. The 1651 text prints "robe." The modern version reads this as "rope," matching the action "twist"; this is an editorial interpretation, not a silent correction of the left column. "Web" is woven cloth; "invention" is something devised or discovered; a "toy" is a trifle.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[206]He must have a barren wit, that in this scribling age can forge nothing. [207]Princes shew their armies, rich men vaunt their buildings, souldiers their man-hood, and scholars vent their toyes, they must read, they must hear whether they will or no.	A man must have a barren imagination if he can produce nothing in this scribbling age. Princes display their armies, rich men boast of their buildings, soldiers of their courage, and scholars put their trifles on show: people must read them and listen to them, whether they want to or not.[208]
[209]Et quodcunque semel chartis illeverit, omnes Gestiet à furno redeuntes scire lacuque, Et pueros & anus——— What once is said and writ, all men must know, Old wives and children as they come and go.	Whatever he has once smeared on paper, he will long for everyone returning from the bakehouse and the fountain to know it, both boys and old women. Everyone must know what has been said and written, old women and children, coming and going.[210]

[206] Burton. Printed p. 7, m: “Sterile oportet esse ingenium quod in hoc scripturientum pruritu, &c.” Translation: The mind must be barren which, amid this itch of people longing to write, and so on. Burton’s note ends with “&c.” and leaves the sentence unfinished.

[207] Burton. Printed p. 7, n: “Cardan præf. ad consol.” Cardano, preface to On Consolation. The passage remains to be checked directly.

[208] Editor. “Wit” means inventive intelligence; “forge” means fashion or produce. “Man-hood” here is martial courage. “Vent” combines putting something forth with offering it for sale. The unwilling readers and listeners become the audience for these displays.

[209] Burton. Printed p. 7, o: “Hor. ser. 1. Sat. 4.” Horace, Satires 1.4.36–38. The modern column translates the Latin, then separately renders Burton’s own shorter English couplet.

[210] Editor. Horace’s author wants even people returning from the bakehouse or public fountain to know his verses. Burton’s couplet condenses this into ordinary people coming and going; it omits those two locations. The two versions are kept distinct here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What a company of Poets hath this year brought out, as Pliny complains to Sossius Sinesius; [211]This April every day some or other have recited. What a catalogue of new books all this year, all this age (I say) have our Frank-furt Marts, our domestick Marts brought out?	What a crowd of poets this year has produced, as Pliny complains to Sosius Senecio: "This April someone or other has given a reading every day." What a catalogue of new books our Frankfurt fairs and our fairs at home have produced this whole year—this whole age, I should say![212]
Source page 7–8 Twice a year, [213]Proferunt se nova ingenia & ostentant, we stretch our wits out, and set them to sale, magno conatu nihil agimus. So that which [214]Gesner much desires, if a speedy reformation be not had, by some Princes Edicts and grave Supervisors, to restrain this liberty, it will run on in infinitum.	Twice a year, "new talents come forward and put themselves on display." We stretch our minds and put them up for sale: "with great effort we accomplish nothing." Unless there is a prompt reform of the kind Gesner so much desires, with princely decrees and responsible overseers to curb this freedom, it will go on "without end."[215]

[211] Burton. Printed p. 7, p: "Epist. Lib. 1. Magnum poetarum proventum annus hic attulit, mense Aprili nullus fere dies quo non aliquis recitavit." Translation: Letters, book 1: this year has brought a great crop of poets; in April there was scarcely a day when someone did not give a reading. Compare Pliny the Younger, Letters 1.13.1; Burton changes the wording and order slightly.

[212] Editor. Pliny writes to Sosius Senecio; Burton prints "Sossius Sinesius." In Letters 1.13.1 Pliny says he is pleased by literary activity, and the complaint that follows concerns reluctant audiences. Burton calls the passage a complaint about poets and makes "scarcely a day" into "every day." His stronger wording and altered emphasis are preserved. "Marts" are fairs or markets.

[213] Burton. Printed p. 8, a: "Idem." The same author, Pliny. Compare Letters 1.13.1, where human talents come forward and display themselves. Burton adapts this to new writers and the twice-yearly fairs.

[214] Burton. Printed p. 8, b: "Principibus & doctoribus deliberandum relinquo, ut argumenta authorum furta & millies repetita tollantur, & temere scribendi libido coërceatur, aliter in infinitum progressura." Translation: I leave it to princes and learned men to consider how authors' stolen and endlessly repeated material may be removed, and the appetite for rash writing restrained, which otherwise will go on without limit. Burton attributes this to Gesner; the exact source comparison remains open.

[215] Editor. The first Latin clause adapts Pliny's phrase about talent displaying itself. "Grave" means serious and responsible. Burton invokes regulation of publishing as a proposed response to the flood of books; the modern text preserves that proposal.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 8 Quis tam avidus librorum helluo, Who can read them? As already, we shall have a vast Chaos and confusion of Books, we are [216]oppressed with them, [217]our eyes ake with reading, our fingers with turning. For may part I am one of the number, nos numerus sumus, I do not deny it, I have only this of Macrobius to say for my self, Omne meum, nihil meum, tis all mine, and none mine.	"Who is such a ravenous devourer of books?" Who can read them all? We shall have—as we already do—a vast chaos and confusion of books. They overwhelm us; our eyes ache from reading and our fingers from turning the pages. For my part, I am one of the number, "we are just so many more"; I do not deny it.[218] I have only this saying of Macrobius to offer in my defence: "All mine, nothing mine." It is all mine, and none mine.[219]

[216] Burton. Printed p. 8, c: "Onerabuntur ingenia, nemo legendis sufficit." Translation: Minds will be overloaded; no one can manage to read them. No author is named in this note.

[217] Burton. Printed p. 8, d: "Libris obruimur, oculi legendo, manus volitando dolent. Fam. Strada Momo." Translation: We are buried under books; our eyes hurt from reading and our hands from fluttering through the pages. Burton names Famiano Strada and Momus; the work and passage remain to be identified.

[218] Editor. "For may part" is the printed reading, understood as "For my part." "Nos numerus sumus," from Horace, Epistles 1.2.27, means being merely part of the crowd. Burton includes his own book in the numerical excess he has just condemned.

[219] Editor. Burton attributes "Omne meum, nihil meum" to Macrobius. Angus Gowland, in his introduction (p. xxii), identifies the saying as an adaptation from Justus Lipsius's Politica. The attribution is preserved in the main text and the scholarly correction recorded here; direct collation with Lipsius's text remains open. The next passage develops Burton's defence of compilation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As a good house-wife out of divers fleeces weaves one peece of cloth, a Bee gathers wax and honey out of many flowers, and makes a new bundel of all, [220]Floriferis ut apes in saltibus omnia libant, I have laboriously [221]collected this Cento out of divers Writers, and that sine injuriâ, I have wronged no authors, but given every man his own;	As a good housewife weaves one piece of cloth from several fleeces, and a bee gathers wax and honey from many flowers and makes a new bundle of it all: As bees sip from everything in flower-filled pastures— so I have laboriously collected this patchwork from various writers, and done so "without injury": I have wronged no authors, but given everyone his due.[222]
which [223]Hierom so much commends in Nepotian, he stole not whole verses, pages, tracts, as some do now a daies, concealing their Authors names, but still said this was Cyprians, that Lactantius, that Hillarius, so said Minutius Felix, so Victorinus, thus far Arnobius: I cite and quote mine Authors (which howsoever some illiterate scriblers account pedantical, as a cloke of ignorance, and opposite to their affected fine stile, I must and will use) sumpsi, non surripui;	Jerome so highly praises this practice in Nepotian. He did not steal whole verses, pages, or treatises, as some do nowadays, concealing their authors' names; he always said, this was Cyprian's, that Lactantius's, that Hilary's; so said Minucius Felix, so Victorinus; thus far Arnobius. I name and quote my authors—a practice I must and will follow, however much some unlearned scribblers call it pedantic, to cloak their ignorance and because it clashes with their affected elegance. "I have borrowed, not stolen."[224]

[220] Burton. P. 8, unlettered: "Lucretius." Explanation: On the Nature of Things 3.11. The bee image makes reading and compilation a form of gathering nourishment.

[221] Burton. P. 8, e: "Quicquid ubique bene dictum facio meum, & illud nunc meis ad compendium, nunc ad fidem & authoritatem alienis exprimo verbis, omnes authores meos clientes esse arbitror, &c. Sarisburiensis ad Polycrat. prol." Translation: Whatever has been well said anywhere I make my own, expressing it sometimes in my own words for brevity, sometimes in others' words for credibility and authority; I regard all my authors as my clients, and so on. Explanation: John of Salisbury, prologue to the Policraticus; Burton's wording has not yet been collated with that work.

[222] Editor. Cento literally means a patchwork garment; as a literary term it denotes a composition assembled from other writing. Burton develops the image through weaving, gathering nectar, and digesting food: compilation becomes an act of transformation.

[223] Burton. P. 8, f: "In Epitaph. Nep. illud Cyp. hoc Lact. illud Hilar. est, ita Victorinus, in hunc modum loquutus est Arnobius, &c." Translation: In the funeral tribute to Nepotian: that is Cyprian's, this Lactantius's, that Hilary's; so Victorinus said; in this way Arnobius spoke, and so on. Explanation: Jerome's Letter 60, to Heliodorus, contains this account of Nepotian acknowledging his sources.

[224] Editor. Hierom is Jerome; Nepotian is the priest whose death he commemorates. Cyprian, Lactantius, Hilary, Minucius Felix, Victorinus, and Arnobius are earlier Christian writers. Burton's distinction is between acknowledged borrowing and passing off another's work as one's own.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and what Varro Lib. 6. de re rust. speaks of Bees, minime maleficæ nullius opus vellicantes faciunt deterius, I can say of my self, whom have I injured? The matter is theirs most part, and yet mine, apparet unde sumptum sit (which Seneca approves) aliud tamen quàm unde sumptum sit apparet, which nature doth with the aliment of our bodies incorporate, digest, assimilate, I do conquoquere quod hausi, dispose of what I take.	And what Varro says of bees in On Agriculture, book 6—"entirely harmless, they damage no one's work by taking from it"—I can say of myself: whom have I injured?[225] The material is mostly theirs, and yet mine: "it is clear where it was taken from" (as Seneca approves), "yet it appears different from what it was taken from." What nature does with our bodily food—incorporating, digesting, assimilating—I do too: "digest what I have swallowed," arrange what I take.[226]

[225] Editor. The printed "Lib. 6." is retained in both columns. The passage is actually Varro, On Agriculture 3.16.7, which says that a bee harms no one's work by taking from it. Burton adapts the singular description to the plural.

[226] Editor. Compare Seneca, Letters 84.3–7: the reader should gather like a bee, blend the gathered material, and digest it into something of his own. Burton's several phrases are adaptations of this argument, not one continuous verbatim quotation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I make them pay tribute, to set out this my Maceronicon, the method only is mine own, I must usurp that of [227]Wecker è Ter. nihil dictum quod non dictum prius, methodus sola artificem ostendit, we can say nothing but what hath been said, the composition and method is ours only, & shews a Scholar. Oribasius, Æsius, Avicenna, have all out of Galen, but to their own method, diverso stilo, non diversâ fide, our Poets steal from Homer, he spews, saith Ælian, they lick it up. Divines use Austins words verbatim still, and our Story-dressers do as much, he that comes last is commonly best, ———donec quid grandius ætas Postera sorsq; ferat melior.———	I make them pay tribute to furnish this medley of mine; only the method is my own. I must appropriate Wecker's saying, taken from Terence: "Nothing has been said that has not been said before; method alone reveals the craftsman." We can say nothing that has not been said; only the arrangement and method are ours, and these reveal the scholar.[228] Oribasius, Aesius, and Avicenna take everything from Galen, but arrange it in their own way: "with a different style, not a different fidelity." Our poets steal from Homer: he vomits, Aelian says, and they lick it up. Theologians keep using Augustine's words verbatim, and our reworkers of history do the same. Whoever comes last is usually best— until a later age and better fortune bring something greater.[229]

[227] Burton. P. 8, g: "Præf. ad Syntax. med." Translation: Preface to the Medical Compilations. Explanation: A reference to Johann Jacob Wecker's Syntaxes medicae. The first saying adapts Terence, Eunuchus, prologue, line 41; the continuation about method and the precise Wecker passage remain to be collated.

[228] Editor. Maceronicon evokes a mixed or "macaronic" composition: here a medley of borrowed material and languages. Method means arrangement as well as procedure. Burton preserves both the Latin maxim and its English expansion; so does the modern text.

[229] Editor. Oribasius and Avicenna are medical authors; "Æsius" probably denotes Aëtius of Amida, another compiler of medical learning, but the printed name is retained as Aesius. "Physick" means medicine, "Divines" theologians, and "Austin" Augustine. The Homer image presents later poets feeding on an earlier poet's work. The closing Latin couplet is unattributed and remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Though there were many Giants of old in Physick and Philosophy, yet I say with [230]Didacus Stella, A dwarf standing on the shoulders of a Giant may see farther then a Giant himself; I may likely add, alter, and see farther then my predecessors; And it is no greater prejudice for me to endite after others, then for Ælianus Montaltus that famous Physitian, to write de morbis capitis after Jason Pratensis, Heurnius, Hildesheim, &c. Many horses to run in a race, one Logician, one Rhetorician, after another. Oppose then what thou wilt, Allatres licet usq; nos & usque, Et gannitibus improbis lacessas.	Though medicine and philosophy had many giants in ancient times, I say with Diego de Estella: "A dwarf standing on a giant's shoulders may see farther than the giant himself." I too may add something, alter something, and see farther than my predecessors. It is no more objectionable for me to write after others than for that famous physician Eliano Montalto to write On Diseases of the Head after Jason Pratensis, Heurnius, Hildesheim, and others. Many horses run in a race; one logician or rhetorician follows another. So make whatever objections you please: You may bark at me again and again and assail me with your vicious yelping.[231]

[230] Burton. P. 8, h: "In Luc. 10. Tom. 2. Pigmei Gigantum humeris impositi plusquam ipsi Gigantes vident." Translation: On Luke 10, volume 2. Pygmies placed on giants' shoulders see more than the giants themselves. Explanation: Burton cites Diego de Estella's commentary on Luke; the exact passage remains unchecked.

[231] Editor. Didacus Stella is the Latin form of Diego de Estella. Burton uses the giant-and-dwarf image to claim that dependence on predecessors can enable improvement. The closing lines are Martial, Epigrams 5.60.1–2, where hostile criticism becomes a dog's barking. "Endite" means compose or write.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 9 I solve it thus. And for those other faults of barbarism, [232]Dorick dialect, extemporanean stile, tautologies, apish imitation, a rapsodie of rags gathered together from several dung-hils, excrements of authors, toyes and fopperies confusedly tumbled out, without art, invention, judgment, wit, learning, harsh, raw, rude, phantastical, absurd, insolent, indiscreet, ill-composed, indigested, vain, scurrile, idle, dull and dry; I confesse all (tis partly affected) thou canst not think worse of me then I do of my self. Tis not worth the reading, I yield it, I desire thee not to lose time in perusing so vain a subject, I should be peradventure loth my self to reade him or thee so writing, tis not operæ pretium.	That is my answer. As for those other faults—barbarous language, a rustic dialect, an improvised style, repetitions, monkey-like imitation, a patchwork of rags gathered from several dung heaps, authors' excrement, trifles and fooleries tumbled out in confusion, without art, invention, judgement, intelligence, or learning; harsh, raw, rough, fanciful, absurd, insolent, indiscreet, badly composed, undigested, vain, scurrilous, idle, dull, and dry—I confess them all. Some are deliberate. You cannot think worse of me than I think of myself. It is not worth reading: I concede it. I ask you not to waste time reading so worthless a subject; perhaps I myself would be reluctant to read him or you writing in this way. It is "not worth the trouble."[233]

[232] Burton. P. 9, a: "Nec aranearum textus ideo melior quia ex se fila gignuntur, nec noster ideo vilior, quia ex alienis libamus ut apes. Lipsius adversus dialogist." Translation: A spider's web is not better because its threads are produced from itself, nor is our work worse because, like bees, we sip from others. Explanation: Burton attributes the defence of borrowing to Lipsius, Against the Dialogue-Writer; direct collation remains open.

[233] Editor. Doric is a Greek dialect, used here to suggest rustic or unfashionable language; "barbarism" denotes faulty or uncultivated expression. Burton's "partly affected" means partly adopted on purpose. The deliberately excessive list performs the unruly style it pretends to condemn.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All I say, is this, that I have [234]presidents for it, which Isocrates cals perfugium iis qui peccant, others as absurd, vain, idle, illiterate, &c. Nonnulli alii idem fecerunt, others have done as much, it may be more, and perhaps thou thy self, Novimus & qui te, &c. we have all our faults; scimus, & hanc veniam, &c. [235]thou censurest me, so have I done others, and may do thee, Cedimus inque vicem, &c. tis lex talionis, quid pro quo. Go now censure, criticize, scoffe and rail.	All I say is that I have precedents—what Isocrates calls "a refuge for those who do wrong": others just as absurd, vain, idle, unlearned, and so on. "Some others have done the same." Others have done as much, perhaps more, and perhaps you yourself: "We know, too, who did it to you," and so on. We all have our faults; "we know, and this indulgence," and so on. You judge me; I have judged others, and may judge you. "We yield in turn," and so on. It is "the law of retaliation," "something for something." Go on, then: judge, criticize, mock, and rail.[236]

[234] Burton. P. 9, b: "Uno absurdo dato mille sequuntur." Translation: Grant one absurdity, and a thousand follow. Explanation: The maxim undercuts Burton's appeal to other writers' bad examples.

[235] Burton. P. 9, c: "Non dubito multos lectores hic fore stultos." Translation: I do not doubt that there will be many foolish readers here.

[236] Editor. "Presidents" means precedents. The truncated "Novimus & qui te" recalls the sexual taunt in Virgil, Eclogue 3.8; the omission is Burton's. "Scimus, & hanc veniam" recalls Horace, Art of Poetry 11–12, on the licence poets both grant and ask. Burton makes mutual indulgence slide into mutual retaliation; the other abbreviated sayings remain only partly identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[237]Nasutus sis usque licet, sis denique nasus: Non potes in nugas dicere plura meas, Ipse ego quam dixi, &c. Wer'st thou all scoffs and flouts, a very Momus. Then we our selves, thou canst not say worse of us. Thus, as when women scold, have I cried whore first, and in some mens censures, I am afraid I have overshot my self, Laudare se vani, vituperare stulti, as I do not arrogate, I will not derogate. Primus vestrûm non sum, nec imus, I am none of the best, I am none of the meanest of you.	Be as sharp-nosed a critic as you please—be all nose: you cannot say more against my trifles than I myself have said, and so on. Even if you were all scoffs and sneers, a very Momus, you could say nothing worse of us than we say ourselves.[238] So, like women quarrelling, I have been first to cry "whore"; and I fear some will judge that I have gone too far. "Praising oneself is vain; blaming oneself is foolish." Just as I will not overrate myself, I will not underrate myself. "I am not the first among you, nor the lowest." I am neither one of the best nor one of the worst of you.[239]

[237] Burton. P. 9, d: "Martial 13.2." Explanation: Epigrams 13.2.1, 4–5. Burton joins the opening line to lines 4–5, omitting the intervening couplet; his own English rendering follows the Latin.

[238] Editor. Nasutus, literally large-nosed, also means a sharp or fault-finding critic. Martial's joke imagines the reader becoming nothing but nose. Momus personifies fault-finding in Greek mythology. Burton's English couplet follows, and is separate from, the translated Latin.

[239] Editor. "Cried whore first" means making the first accusation to forestall an opponent's attack. Burton compares his self-criticism to this quarrelling tactic, then worries that he has conceded too much. "Arrogate" and "derogate" here mean claim too much and take too much away from his own merit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As I am an inch, or so many feet, so many parasanges, after him or him, I may be peradventure an ace before thee. Be it therefore as it is, well or ill, I have assayed, put my self upon the stage, I must abide the censure, I may not escape it. It is most true, stylus virum arguit, our stile bewrayes us, & as [240]hunters find their game by the trace, so is a mans genius descried by his works, Multo melius ex sermone quam lineamentis, de moribus hominum judicamus; 'twas old Catos rule. I have laid my self open (I know it) in this treatise, turned mine inside outward, I shall be censured, I doubt not, for to say truth with Erasmus, nihil morosius hominum judiciis, theres naught so peevish as mens judgments, yet this is some comfort, ut palata, sic judicia, our censures are as various as our palats.	Though I may be an inch, so many feet, or so many parasangs behind this man or that, perhaps I am a little ahead of you. Let it be as it is, good or bad: I have made the attempt and put myself on stage. I must submit to judgement; I cannot escape it. It is quite true that "style reveals the man": our style gives us away. As hunters find their quarry by its tracks, so a man's character can be discerned in his works. "We judge people's character much better from their speech than from their features": that was old Cato's rule. I have exposed myself in this treatise —I know it—turned myself inside out. I shall be criticized, no doubt, for, to tell the truth with Erasmus, "nothing is more captious than people's judgements." Nothing is so hard to please. Yet there is some comfort: "as tastes, so judgements." Our judgements vary as much as our palates.[241]

[240] Burton. P. 9, e: "Ut venatores feram è vestigio impresso, virum scriptiunculâ. Lips." Translation: As hunters recognize a wild beast from its footprint, so a man is recognized from a little piece of writing. Explanation: Attributed to Justus Lipsius; the precise passage remains unlocated.

[241] Editor. A parasang is a Persian measure of distance; an ace is a single point or very small amount. The movement from feet to parasangs comically enlarges Burton's inferiority before he claims a tiny superiority over the reader. "Genius" here means natural character or disposition. The Cato and Erasmus attributions in this passage still need exact sources.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[242]Tres mihi convivæ prope dissentire videntur Poscentes vario multum diversa palato, &c. Our writings are as so many dishes, our readers guests, our books like beauty, that which one admires, another rejects; so are we approved as mens fancies are inclined. Pro captu lectoris habent sua fata libelli. That which is most pleasing to one is amaracum sui, most harsh to another. Quot homines, tot sententiæ, so many men, so many mindes: that which thou condemnest he commends. [243]Quod petis, id sane est invisum acidumque duobus.	My three dinner guests seem almost to disagree, asking for very different things to suit their different palates, and so on. Our writings are so many dishes, our readers the guests. Our books are like beauty: what one admires, another rejects. Approval depends on the direction of each person's taste. Books have their destinies according to the reader's capacity.[244] What most pleases one is "marjoram to a pig"—most disagreeable—to another. "As many people, so many opinions": so many people, so many minds. What you condemn, he praises. What you ask for is certainly hateful and sour to the other two.[245]

[242] Burton. P. 9, f: "Hor." Explanation: Horace, Epistles 2.2.61–62, on the difficulty of satisfying different tastes.

[243] Burton. P. 9, g: "Hor." Explanation: Horace, Epistles 2.2.64. Burton places line 63 later, on printed page 10.

[244] Editor. Terentianus Maurus, On Letters, Syllables, and Metres, line 1286. The opening words qualify the familiar saying that books have their destinies: those destinies depend on what their readers can understand or take in.

[245] Editor. "Marjoram to a pig" is a proverbial image for something attractive offered to an unappreciative recipient. The taste metaphor links readers to diners. "Quot homines, tot sententiæ" is the familiar Latin saying that there are as many opinions as people; its precise form and transmission here have not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 9–10 He respects matter, thou art wholly for words, he loves a loose and free stile, thou art all for neat composition, strong lines, hyperboles, allogories; he desires a fine frontispiece, entising pictures, such as Hieron: Natali[246] the Jesuite hath cut to the Dominicals, to draw on the Readers attention, which thou rejectest; that which one admires, another explodes as most absurd and ridiculous.	He values substance; you care only about words. He likes a loose, free style; you insist on polished composition, striking phrases, exaggerations, and allegories. He wants a fine frontispiece and enticing pictures to draw the reader's attention, like the engravings in the Jesuit Jerónimo Nadal's work on the Sunday Gospel readings. You reject these; what one admires, another shouts down as utterly absurd and ridiculous.[247]

[246] Burton. P. 10, asterisk: "Antwerp. fol. 1607." Translation: Antwerp, folio, 1607. Explanation: Burton's edition reference for Jerónimo Nadal's illustrated Gospel work; this particular issue has not yet been bibliographically verified.

[247] Editor. "Strong lines" are forceful, pointed, or elaborately witty expressions. "Allogories" is retained on the left and understood as allegories on the right. "Cut" means engraved; the modernization refers to engravings in Nadal's work without implying that Nadal personally engraved them. "Dominicals" concerns the Sunday Gospel readings.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 10 If it be not point blank to his humor, his method, his conceit, [248]Si quid forsan omissum, quod is animo conceperit, si quæ dictio, &c. If ought be omitted, or added, which he likes, or dislikes, thou art mancipium paucæ lectionis, an idiot, an asse, nullus es, or plagiarius, a trifler, a trivant, thou art an idle fellow; or else tis a thing of meer industry, a collection without wit or invention, a very toy. [249]Facilia sic putant omnes quæ jam facta, nec de salebris cogitant, ubi via strata, so men are valued, their labours vilified by fellows of no worth themselves; as things of nought, who could not have done as much? unusquisque abundat sensu suo, every man abounds in his own sense; and whilest each particular party is so affected, how should one please all?	If it does not fit his taste, his method, and his ideas exactly—"if perhaps something he had in mind has been left out, if some expression," and so on—if anything is omitted or added that he likes or dislikes, you are "an ill-read drudge," an idiot, an ass; "you are nobody," or "a plagiarist," a trifler, a truant, an idle fellow. Otherwise it is a work of mere diligence, a collection without intelligence or invention, a mere trifle. "So everyone thinks things easy once they have been done, and no one thinks of the rough places when the road is paved." This is how people are valued: their labours dismissed as worthless by fellows of no worth themselves. Who could not have done as much? "Everyone abounds in his own opinion." Everyone has an opinion of his own; and while each person feels this way, how can anyone please them all?[250]

[248] Burton. P. 10, h: "Muretus." Explanation: Marc-Antoine Muret. Burton gives no work or passage for this imagined critic's complaint.

[249] Burton. P. 10, i: "Lipsius." Explanation: Justus Lipsius. The saying compares the critic of a finished work to a traveller who forgets the labour of paving a road; its precise source remains unlocated.

[250] Editor. "Mancipium" literally means a slave: "ill-read drudge" conveys the literary insult. "Trivant" is a form of truant. "Industry" here is sustained effort, contrasted by the critic with invention. The paved-road image exposes the critic's failure to recognize the work that made a finished book possible.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[251]Quid dem, quid non dem? Renuis tu quod jubet ille. How shall I hope to expresse my self to each mans humor and [252]conceit, or to give satisfaction to all? Some understand too little, some too much, Qui similiter in legendos libros, atq; in salutandos homines irruunt, non cogitantes quales, sed quibus vestibus induti sint, as [253]Austin observes, not regarding what, but who write, [254]orexin habet authores celebritas, not valuing the mettle, but stamp that is upon it, Cantharum aspiciunt, non quid in eo.	What should I give, and what withhold? You refuse what he demands. How can I hope to express myself to suit everyone's taste and ideas, or satisfy them all? Some understand too little, some too much. "They rush into reading books just as they rush into greeting people, considering not what they are like but what clothes they wear," as Augustine observes. They care about who writes, not what is written. "The author's celebrity gives an appetite." They value the stamp on the metal rather than the metal itself. "They look at the cup, not at what is in it."[255]

[251] Burton. P. 10, k: "Hor." Explanation: Horace, Epistles 2.2.63, between the lines already quoted on printed page 9. Burton varies the wording while retaining the disagreement among readers.

[252] Burton. P. 10, l: "Fieri non potest, ut quod quisq; cogitat, dicat unus. Muretus." Translation: One person cannot say everything that each person thinks. Explanation: Attributed to Muret; exact passage unlocated.

[253] Burton. P. 10, m: "Lib. 1. de ord. cap. 11." Translation: On Order, book 1, chapter 11. Explanation: Burton's reference for the saying attributed to Augustine. Its wording has not yet been independently collated.

[254] Burton. P. 10, n: "Erasmus." Explanation: Attribution of the saying about an author's celebrity stimulating appetite. No work is specified.

[255] Editor. The images criticize judging content by appearances: clothing, the stamp on a coin rather than its metal, and a cup rather than its contents. "Mettle" means metal. The translation understands the printed "authores" as authoris, "of the author," in the saying about celebrity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If he be not rich, in great place, polite and brave, a great doctor, or full fraught with grand titles, though never so well qualified, he is a dunce, but as [256]Baronius hath it of Cardinal Caraffa's works, he is a meer hog that rejects any man for his poverty. Some are too partial, as friends to overween, others come with a prejudice to carp, vilifie, detract, and scoffe; (qui de me forsan, quicquid est, omni contemptu contemptius judicant) some as bees for honey, some as spiders to gather poyson. What shall I do in this case?	If he is not rich, highly placed, polished and splendid, a great doctor, or loaded with grand titles, he is a dunce, however well qualified he may be. Yet, as Baronius says of Cardinal Caraffa's works, anyone who rejects a man for his poverty is a mere hog. Some are too partial: friends think too highly of us; others arrive prejudiced, ready to carp, disparage, belittle, and mock—"who perhaps judge whatever comes from me with contempt beyond all contempt." Some come like bees for honey, others like spiders to gather poison. What am I to do in such a case?[257]

[256] Burton. P. 10, asterisk: "Annal Tom. 3. ad annum 360. Est porcus ille qui sacerdotem ex amplitudine redituum sordide demetitur." Translation: Annals, volume 3, under the year 360. He is a hog who meanly measures a priest by the size of his revenues. Explanation: Burton cites Cesare Baronio, usually called Baronius. The note speaks specifically of a priest; Burton broadens its application to poor writers. The cited passage and its connection with Caraffa remain to be checked.

[257] Editor. "Brave" means splendid in appearance; "doctor" may denote an eminent learned man, not only a physician. The bees and spiders distinguish readers who seek nourishment from those determined to extract poison. This is a polemical image, not an account of how spiders feed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As a dutch host, if you come to an Inn in Germany, and dislike your fare, diet, lodging, &c. replies in a surly tone, [258]aliud tibi quæras diversorium, if you like not this, get you to another Inn: I resolve, if you like not my writing, go reade something else. I do not much esteem thy censure, take thy course, tis not as thou wilt, nor as I wil, but when we have both done, that of [259]Plinius Secundus to Trajan will prove true, Every mans witty labour takes not, except the matter, subject, occasion, and some commending favorite happen to it.	If you arrive at an inn in Germany and dislike the food, meals, lodging, and so on, a German innkeeper replies gruffly, "Find yourself another inn." If you do not like this one, go elsewhere. That is my decision: if you do not like my writing, read something else. I do not greatly value your judgement; do as you please. The outcome depends on neither your wishes nor mine. When we have both had our say, what Pliny the Younger says to Trajan will prove true: not everyone's intellectual work succeeds; it needs suitable material, a subject, an occasion, and some influential person to recommend it.[260]

[258] Burton. P. 10, o: "Erasm. dial." Translation: Erasmus, dialogues. Explanation: Burton attributes the innkeeper's reply to Erasmus, but supplies no dialogue title.

[259] Burton. P. 10, p: "Epist. lib. 6. Cujusque ingenium non statim emergit, nisi materiæ fautor, occasio, commendatorque contingat." Translation: Letters, book 6. A person's talent does not immediately rise to prominence unless a supporter of the undertaking, an opportunity, and a recommender come along. Explanation: Compare Pliny, Letters 6.23, addressed to Triarius, not Trajan. Burton rearranges the Latin and applies a passage about bringing a young advocate into public notice to the reception of writing.

[260] Editor. "Dutch" here means German, as the stated location makes clear. The modern column retains Burton's attribution of the letter to Trajan; the surviving Pliny passage is addressed to Triarius. The correction and the original context are recorded in Burton's accompanying note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If I be taxed, exploded by thee and some such, I shall haply be approved and commended by others, & so have been (Expertus loquor) and may truly say with [261]Jovius in like case (absit verbo jactantia) heroum quorundam, pontificum, & virorum nobilium familiaritatem & amicitiam, gratasque gratias, & multorum [262]bene laudatorum laudes sum inde promeritus, as I have been honoured by some worthy men, so have I been vilified by others, and shall be.	If you and others like you criticize and shout me down, perhaps others will approve and praise me; some already have—"I speak from experience." I may truly say with Giovio in a similar case—"let there be no boasting in the words"—"through it I have earned the intimacy and friendship of certain great men, pontiffs, and noblemen, their welcome thanks, and the praises of many who are themselves well praised." Just as some worthy men have honoured me, others have disparaged me and will do so again.[263]

[261] Burton. P. 10, q: "Præf. hist." Translation: Preface to the History. Explanation: Paolo Giovio, called Jovius in Latin. The precise wording remains to be collated.

[262] Burton. P. 10, r: "Laudari à laudato laus est." Translation: To be praised by someone who is praised is praise indeed.

[263] Editor. Pontifices means pontiffs or high churchmen. Burton borrows Giovio's catalogue of distinguished friends as a formula for his own reception; the borrowed list should not be treated as a separately verified record of Burton's personal acquaintances.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 10–11 At the first publishing of this book; (which [264]Probus of Persius satyrs) editum librum continuo mirari homines, atque avidè deripere cœperunt, I may in some sort apply to this my work. The first, second, and third edition were suddenly gone, eagerly read, & as I have said, not so much approved by some, as scornfully rejected by others. But it was Democritus his fortune, Idem admirationi & [265]irrisioni habitus. Twas Seneca's fate, that superintendent of wit, learning, judgement, [266]ad stuporem doctus, the best of Greek and Latine writers, in Plutarch's opinion;	Of this book's first publication I may apply, in some measure, what Probus says of Persius's satires: "As soon as the book was published, people began to admire it and snatch it up eagerly." The first, second, and third editions quickly sold out and were eagerly read; yet, as I have said, some praised them less warmly than others scornfully rejected them. That was Democritus's fortune too: "the same man was an object of admiration and ridicule."[267] It was also the fate of Seneca, that overseer of intelligence, learning, and judgement, "learned to an astonishing degree," the best of Greek and Latin writers in Plutarch's opinion;[268]

[264] Burton. P. 10, s: "Vit. Persii." Translation: Life of Persius. Explanation: The biography transmitted under Probus's name records readers admiring and seizing the published book. The consulted text has "diripere"; Burton has "deripere" and adds "avidè," eagerly.

[265] Burton. P. 10, asterisk: "Minuit præsentia famam." Translation: Presence diminishes reputation. Explanation: Familiarity with the living person can reduce the admiration accorded to a distant name.

[266] Burton. P. 11, t: "Lipsius Judic. de Seneca." Translation: Lipsius, Judgement on Seneca. Explanation: Burton's stated source for this extravagant praise. The purported opinion of Plutarch remains to be traced through Lipsius.

[267] Editor. The statement about the first three editions selling out is Burton's own claim. He balances it immediately with hostile reception, then aligns himself with Democritus and Seneca. "Superintendent" extends the image of Seneca's intellectual authority rather than naming an office he held.

[268] Editor. The praise attributed to Plutarch is transmitted here through Burton's citation of Lipsius. Until that chain is checked, it should be treated as Burton's attribution, not as an independently verified judgement by Plutarch.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 11 That renowned corrector of vice, as [269]Fabius terms him, and painful omniscious philosopher, that writ so excellently and admirably well, could not please all parties, or escape censure: How is he vilified by [270]Caligula, Agellius, Fabius, and Lipsius himself, his chief propugner? In eo pleraque perniciosa, saith the same Fabius, many childish tracts and sentences he hath, sermo illaboratus, too negligent often, and remisse, as Agellius observes, oratio vulgaris & protrita, dicaces & ineptæ sententiæ, eruditio plebeia, an homely shallow writer as he is.	that "renowned corrector of vice," as Quintilian calls him, and painstaking philosopher of universal learning, who wrote so excellently and admirably, could not please everyone or escape criticism. How he is disparaged by Caligula, Aulus Gellius, Quintilian, and even Lipsius, his chief defender! "Much in him is harmful," says that same Quintilian. He has many childish passages and sayings, "unpolished language," often too careless and slack, as Gellius observes: "commonplace, worn-out expression; smart but foolish sayings; ordinary learning"—a plain, shallow writer, such as he is.[271]

[269] Burton. P. 11, u: "Lib. 10. Plurimum studii, multam rerum cognitionem, omnem studiorum materiam, &c. multa in eo probanda, multa admiranda." Translation: Book 10. Very great diligence, wide knowledge of things, every subject of study, and so on; much in him deserves approval, much admiration. Explanation: This condenses Quintilian, The Orator's Education 10.1.128–131, a judgement combining praise with criticism.

[270] Burton. P. 11, x: "Suet. Arena sine calce." Translation: Suetonius: sand without lime. Explanation: Suetonius, Caligula 53, reports this description of Seneca's writing. Sand lacking the lime that binds mortar suggests brilliant particles without cohesion.

[271] Editor. Fabius is Marcus Fabius Quintilianus, usually called Quintilian; Agellius is Aulus Gellius. "Painful" means painstaking, "propugner" defender. Compare Quintilian 10.1.128–131 and Gellius, Attic Nights 12.2. Burton assembles their judgements into a running indictment; the Latin phrases are not all consecutive verbatim quotations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In partibus spinas & fastidia habet, saith [272]Lipsius, and as in all his other works, so especially in his epistles, aliæ in argutiis & ineptiis occupantur, intricatus alicubi, & parum compositus, sine copia rerum hoc fecit, he jumbles up many things together immethodically, after the Stoicks fashion, parum ordinavit, multa accumulavit, &c. If Seneca be thus lashed, and many famous men that I could name, what shall I expect? How shall I that am vix umbra tanti philosophi, hope to please? No man so absolute, [273]Erasmus holds, to satisfie all, except antiquity, prescription, &c. set a bar. But as I have proved in Seneca, this will not alwayes take place, how shall I evade?	"In places he has thorns and tedious passages," says Lipsius; and, as in all his other works, especially in his letters, "some are occupied with subtleties and foolishness"; "in places he is tangled and poorly arranged"; "he did this without an abundance of material." He jumbles many things together without method, in the Stoic fashion: "he arranged little and piled up much," and so on. If Seneca is whipped like this, and many famous men I could name, what should I expect? How can I, "scarcely the shadow of so great a philosopher," hope to please? No one is so perfect, Erasmus holds, as to satisfy everyone, unless antiquity, established authority, and so on bar criticism. But, as I have shown with Seneca, even this does not always work. How shall I escape?[274]

[272] Burton. P. 11, asterisk: "Introduc. ad Sen." Translation: Introduction to Seneca. Explanation: Lipsius's introduction; exact wording not yet collated.

[273] Burton. P. 11, y: "Judic. de Sen. Vix aliquis tam absolutus, ut alteri per omnia satisfaciat, nisi longæ temporis præscriptio, semota judicandi libertate, religione quadam animos occuparit." Translation: Judgement on Seneca. Scarcely anyone is so perfect as to satisfy another in every respect, unless the authority of long standing, removing freedom of judgement, has possessed people's minds with a kind of reverence. Explanation: The main text attributes this to Erasmus. The printed Latin "longæ" is retained here; the exact source wording remains unchecked.

[274] Editor. "Absolute" means perfect; "prescription," authority established by long acceptance, with a legal overtone. "Thorns" are difficult passages; "fastidia" suggests material causing weariness or distaste.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tis the common doom of all writers, I must (I say) abide it, I seek not applause: [275]Non ego ventosæ venor suffragia plebis; again, non sum adeo informis, I would not be [276]vilified. ———[277]laudatus abunde, Non fastiditus si tibi lector ero. I fear good mens censures, and to their favorable acceptance I submit my labors, ——[278]& linguas Mancipiorum Contemno,——— As the barking of a dog, I securely contemne those malicious and scurrile obloquies, flouts, calumnies of railers and detractors, I scorn the rest. What therefore I have said, pro tenuitate meâ I have said.	It is every writer's common sentence; I must, I say, endure it. I do not seek applause: "I do not hunt the votes of the fickle crowd." Yet again, "I am not so ugly": I would not be disparaged.[279] I shall be praised enough if you, reader, do not scorn me. I fear the judgement of good people and submit my labours to their favourable reception; "and I despise the tongues of slaves." Like a dog's barking, I calmly despise the malicious, scurrilous abuse, sneers, and slanders of those who rail and detract; I scorn the rest. What I have said, therefore, I have said "according to my limited ability."[280]

[275] Burton. P. 11, z: "Hor. Ep. 1. lib. 19." Explanation: Horace, Epistles 1.19.37, with changed word order. The printed book and letter numbers are reversed.

[276] Burton. P. 11, a: "Æque turpe frigide laudari ac insectanter vituperari. Phavorinus A. Gel. lib. 19. cap. 2." Translation: It is equally disgraceful to be coldly praised and to be spitefully blamed. Favorinus, Aulus Gellius, book 19, chapter 2. Explanation: Compare Attic Nights 19.3, on faint praise; Burton's chapter number and phrasing differ. Gellius makes cold praise worse, rather than equally bad.

[277] Burton. P. 11, b: "Ovid. trist. 1. eleg. 6." Explanation: Ovid, Tristia 1.7.31–32; the printed elegy number is wrong.

[278] Burton. P. 11, c: "Juven. Sat. 5." Explanation: Adapted from Juvenal 9.120–121, bracketed as doubtful in the consulted text. Burton changes contemnas (you may despise) to Contemno (I despise).

[279] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 2.25: the lovesick Corydon protests that he is not so ugly. Burton transfers this defence of physical attractiveness to literary merit.

[280] Editor. Burton dismisses hostile critics through a quotation about slaves, contrasting their abuse with good readers' judgement. "Securely" means without anxiety.

Original text 1651	Modern English
One or two things yet I was desirous to have amended if I could, concerning the manner of handling this my subject, for which I must apologize, deprecari, and upon better advice give the friendly reader notice: It was not mine intent to prostitute my muse in English, or to divulge secreta Minervæ, but to have exposed this more contract in Latine, if I could have got it printed. Any scurrile pamphlet is welcome to our mercenarie Stationers in English, they print all, ———cuduntque libellos In quorum foliis vix simia nuda cacaret.	There are still one or two things about my treatment of this subject that I wished to amend if I could. For these I must apologize, "beg indulgence," and, on further consideration, give the friendly reader notice. I did not intend to prostitute my muse in English or disclose "Minerva's secrets," but to publish this in a shorter Latin form, if I could have had it printed. Any scurrilous pamphlet in English is welcome to our money-minded booksellers; they print everything— and hammer out little books on whose pages scarcely a naked ape would shit.[281]

[281] Editor. To "prostitute" his muse is to expose his writing to the public in the vernacular. Minerva is the classical goddess of wisdom; her "secrets" suggest learned knowledge ordinarily shared in Latin. "Stationers" means the book trade, including booksellers and publishers. The coarse Latin couplet intensifies the attack on commercially attractive pamphlets; its source remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But in Latine they will not deal; which is one of the reasons [282]Nicholas Car in his oration of the paucity of English writers, gives, that so many flourishing wits are smothered in oblivion, ly dead and buried in this our nation. Another main fault is, that I have not revised the copy, and amended the stile, which now flows remissly, as it was first conceived, but my leasure would not permit. Feci nec quod potui, nec quod volui, I confesse it is neither as I would, nor as it should be. [283]Cum relego scripsisse pudet, quia plurima cerno Me quoque quæ fuerant judice digna lini. When I peruse this tract which I have writ, I am abash'd, and much I hold unfit.	But they will not deal in Latin. Nicholas Carr, in his oration on the scarcity of English writers, gives this as one reason why so many flourishing minds in our country are smothered in oblivion, lying dead and buried. Another major fault is that I have not revised the manuscript and improved its style, which now flows carelessly, just as it first came to me; my available time did not allow it. "I did neither what I could nor what I wished." I admit it is neither as I would like it nor as it should be. When I reread it, I am ashamed to have written it, for I see much that even in my own judgement deserved erasure. When I read through this treatise I have written, I am ashamed, and find much in it unfit.[284]

[282] Burton. P. 11, d: "Aut artis inscii, aut quæstui magis quam literis student. hab. Cantab. & Lond. Excus. 1976." Translation: Either ignorant of the art, or more devoted to profit than to letters. Delivered at Cambridge and printed at London, 1976. Explanation: "1976" is the printed reading, an error for 1576, the publication date recorded in the National Library of Finland catalogue for Nicholas Carr's oration De scriptorum Britannicorum paucitate. The quotation itself still needs direct collation.

[283] Burton. P. 11, e: "Ovid. de pont. Eleg. 1. 6." Explanation: The passage is Ovid, Letters from the Black Sea 1.5.15–16. Burton's second line varies from the consulted Latin text, which has "me quoque, qui feci, iudice," even in the judgement of me who wrote it. His printed wording and separate English couplet are both retained.

[284] Editor. "Copy" means the manuscript supplied for printing. Burton translates his Ovid quotation into an English couplet; both layers are retained. His claim to have left the style unrevised is part of his self-presentation and must eventually be considered alongside the book's successive enlarged editions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 12 Et quod gravissimum, in the matter it self, many things I disallow at this present, which when I writ, [285]Non eadem est ætas, non mens; I would willingly retract much, &c. but tis too late, I can only crave pardon now for what is amisse. I might indeed (had I wisely done) observed that precept of the poet, ———nonumque prematur in annum, And have taken more care: Or as Alexander the physician would have done by Lapis Lazuli, fifty times washed before it be used, I should have revised, corrected and amended this tract; but I had not as (I said) that happy leasure, no Amanuenses or assistants.	"And, most seriously," there are many things in the substance itself that I now disapprove of, though I did not when I wrote them: "my age is not the same, nor my mind." I would willingly retract much, and so on, but it is too late. I can only ask pardon now for what is wrong. Had I acted wisely, I might indeed have followed the poet's rule— and let it be kept back until the ninth year— and taken greater care. Or, as the physician Alexander required lapis lazuli to be washed fifty times before use, I should have revised, corrected, and improved this treatise. But, as I said, I lacked that fortunate leisure: I had no copyists or assistants.[286]

[285] Burton. P. 12, f: "Hor." Explanation: Horace, Epistles 1.1.4: age and mind have changed.

[286] Editor. The nine-year rule is Horace, Art of Poetry 388, advising a long delay before publication. Lapis lazuli was used in historical medical preparations; repeated washing becomes an image for repeated revision. Burton names the physician only as Alexander here; the exact medical passage remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Pancrates in [287]Lucian, wanting a servant as he went from Memphis to Coptus in Egypt, took a door bar, and after some superstitious words pronounced (Eucrates the relator was then present) made it stand up like a serving-man, fetch him water, turn the spit, serve in supper, and what work he would besides; and when he had done that service he desired, turn'd his man to a stick again. I have no such skil to make new men at my pleasure, or means to hire them, no whistle to call like the master of a ship, and bid them run, &c. I have no such authority, no such benefactors, as that noble [288]Ambrosius was to Origen, allowing him six or seven Amanuenses to write out his dictats, I must for that cause do my businesse my self.	In Lucian, Pancrates lacked a servant on his journey from Memphis to Coptus in Egypt. He took a door bar, spoke some magical words—Eucrates, who tells the story, was there—and made it stand up like a servant, fetch water, turn the spit, serve supper, and do whatever other work he wanted. When it had finished the service he required, he turned his man back into a stick. I have no such skill to create men whenever I please, or money to hire them; no whistle to summon them like a ship's master and order them to hurry. I have no such authority or benefactor as the noble Ambrose was to Origen, providing six or seven copyists to take down his dictation. So I must do my work myself.[289]

[287] Burton. P. 12, g: "Tom. 3. Philopseud. accepto pessulo, quum carmen quoddam dixisset, effecit ut ambularet, aquam hauriret, urnam pararet, &c." Translation: Volume 3, The Lover of Lies. Taking a door bar and uttering a certain spell, he made it walk, draw water, prepare a pitcher, and so on. Explanation: Lucian, The Lover of Lies 33–36, especially 35; Burton expands the household service in his retelling.

[288] Burton. P. 12, asterisk: "Eusebius eccles. Hist. lib. 6." Translation: Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History, book 6. Explanation: At 6.23.2 Eusebius describes more than seven shorthand writers working in relays, together with copyists, supported by Ambrose. Burton's "six or seven" is retained rather than silently corrected.

[289] Editor. Lucian's tale belongs to a dialogue about extraordinary and unreliable stories; Burton uses its magical servant as a comic wish for help with writing. Ambrose here is Origen's patron, not the later bishop of Milan. "Amanuenses" are writers taking dictation or making copies.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And was therefore enforced, as a Bear doth her whelps, to bring forth this confused lump, I had not time to lick it into form, as she doth her yong ones, but even so to publish it, as it was first written, quicquid in buccam venit, in an extemporean stile, as [290]I do commonly all other exercises, effudi quicquid dictavit genius meus, out of a confused company of notes, and writ with as small deliberation as I do ordinarily speak, without all affectation of big words, fustian phrases, jingling terms, tropes, strong lines, that like [291]Acesta's arrows caught fire as they flew, [292]strains of wit, brave heats, elogies, hyperbolical exornations, elegancies, &c. which many so much affect.	I was therefore forced, like a bear giving birth to her cubs, to bring forth this shapeless lump. I had no time to lick it into shape, as she does her young, but had to publish it just as it was first written: "whatever came into my mouth," in an improvised style, as I usually perform all my other compositions. "I poured out whatever my genius dictated," from a confused heap of notes, and wrote with as little deliberation as I ordinarily speak: without affecting grand words, inflated phrases, jingling expressions, figures of speech, striking lines that catch fire in flight like Acestes' arrows, flights of wit, splendid bursts of inspiration, eulogies, exaggerated ornament, elegant turns, and so on, which so many people love.[293]

[290] Burton. P. 12, h: "Stans pede in uno, as he made verses." Translation of Latin: Standing on one foot. Explanation: An allusion to Horace, Satires 1.4.10, on Lucilius's rapid production of verses.

[291] Burton. P. 12, asterisk: "Virg." Explanation: Virgil, Aeneid 5.525–528. During the archery contest, Acestes' arrow catches fire in flight. Burton makes the singular portent a plural image for dazzling phrases.

[292] Burton. P. 12, i: "Non eadem à summo expectes, minimoq; poeta." Translation: Do not expect the same things from the greatest and the least poet. Explanation: No author is named; the source remains unlocated.

[293] Editor. The bear licking shapeless cubs into form is an old natural-history belief, not an accurate account of birth. Burton turns it into an image of literary revision. His denial of ornament is itself an ornate catalogue, reaching a climax in the flaming arrow from Virgil.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I am aquæ potor, drink no wine at all, which so much improves our modern wits, a loose, plain, rude writer, ficum voco ficum, & ligonem ligonem, and as free, as loose, idem calamo quod in mente, [294]I call a spade a spade, animis hæc scribo, non auribus, I respect matter, not words; remembring that of Cardan, verba propter res, non res propter verba: and seeking with Seneca, quid scribam, non quemadmodum, rather what, then how to write.	I am "a water-drinker": I drink none of the wine that so greatly improves our modern wits. I am a loose, plain, rough writer: "I call a fig a fig and a spade a spade." I am as outspoken as I am unrestrained: "the same in my pen as in my mind." I call a spade a spade; "I write these things for minds, not ears." I value substance, not words, remembering Cardano's saying, "words for things, not things for words," and seeking, with Seneca, "what to write, not how": what to write about rather than how to write.[295]

[294] Burton. P. 12, k: "Stylus hic nullus præter parrhesiam." Translation: There is no style here except frank speaking. Explanation: Parrhesia is the Greek term for speaking openly and freely.

[295] Editor. Aquæ potor means water-drinker. Compare Horace, Epistles 1.19.1–3, which repeats the claim that verses written by water-drinkers cannot last: Burton's abstinence makes a literary joke as well as a personal statement. The repeated "spade" and the Latin-English restatements are deliberate and have been preserved. The exact Cardano and shorter Seneca references remain to be traced.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For as Philo thinks, [296]He that is conversant about matter, neglects words, and those that excell in this art of speaking, have no profound learning, [297]Verba nitent phaleris, at nullas verba medullas Intus habent——— Besides, it was the observation of that wise Seneca, [298]when you see a fellow carefull about his words, and neat in his speech, know this for a certaintie, that mans mind is busied about toyes, there's no soliditie in him. Non est ornamentum virile concinnitas: as he said of a nightingale, ———vox es, præterea nihil, &c.	For, as Philo thinks, someone occupied with substance neglects words, and those who excel in the art of speaking have no deep learning: Words glitter with trappings, but words have no marrow within. Besides, wise Seneca observed: when you see a man painstaking about his words and polished in his speech, be certain that his mind is occupied with trifles; there is nothing solid in him. "Verbal elegance is no manly ornament." As someone said of a nightingale: you are a voice, and nothing more, and so on.[299]

[296] Burton. P. 12, l: "Qui rebus se exercet, verba negligit, & qui callet artem dicendi, nullam disciplinam habet recognitam." Translation: One who concerns himself with things neglects words, and one skilled in the art of speaking has mastered no branch of learning. Explanation: The main text attributes the thought to Philo; the precise work remains unlocated.

[297] Burton. P. 12, m: "Palingenius." Explanation: Attribution of the verses about ornamental words without marrow to the poet Palingenius; their precise place in the Zodiacus vitae remains to be found.

[298] Burton. P. 12, n: "Cujuscunque orationem vides politam, & solicitam, scito animum in pusillis occupatum, in scriptis nil solidum. Epist. lib. 1. 21." Translation: Whenever you see someone's language polished and painstaking, know that his mind is occupied with trifles: nothing solid in his writings. Letters, book 1, 21. Explanation: Compare Seneca, Letters 115.1–2, which also contains "Non est ornamentum virile concinnitas." Burton condenses and changes the wording; his printed reference does not match the modern letter number.

[299] Editor. "Phaleræ" are ornamental trappings; "medullæ," marrow, suggests inward substance. Seneca's contrast between manly expression and studied elegance is preserved as his value judgement. The nightingale saying reduces a beautiful voice to sound without substance; Burton does not clearly identify its speaker here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 12–13 I am therefore in this point a professed disciple of [300]Apollonius a scholar of Socrates, I neglect phrases, and labor wholly to inform my readers understanding, not to please his ear; tis not my study or intent to compose neatly, which an Orator requires, but to express my self readily & plainly as it happens. So that as a River runs sometimes precipitate and swift, then dull and slow; now direct, then per ambages; now deep, then shallow; now muddy, then clear; now broad, then narrow; doth my stile flow: now serious, then light; now comical, then satyrical; now more elaborate, then remisse, as the present subject required, or as at that time I was affected.	On this point, therefore, I declare myself a disciple of Apollonius, a follower of Socrates: I disregard fine phrasing and devote my effort to informing my reader's understanding, not pleasing his ear. My purpose is not the polished composition an orator requires, but to express myself readily and plainly as things come to me.[301] So my style flows like a river: sometimes rushing and swift, then sluggish and slow; now straight, then "through winding ways"; now deep, then shallow; now muddy, then clear; now broad, then narrow. It is serious, then light; comic, then satirical; more elaborate, then more relaxed, as the subject required or as I felt at the time.

[300] Burton. P. 12, o: "Philostratus lib. 8. vit. Apol. Negligebat oratoriam facultatem, & penitus aspernabatur ejus professores, quod linguam duntaxat, non autem mentem redderent eruditiorem." Translation: Philostratus, Life of Apollonius, book 8. He neglected the art of oratory and thoroughly despised its teachers because they educated only the tongue, not the mind. Explanation: Compare 8.21, where the young followers of Apollonius turn from rhetoric to philosophy. Burton's singular formulation shifts the emphasis to Apollonius himself; the intervening Latin version still needs collation.

[301] Editor. The cited work concerns Apollonius of Tyana, whom Philostratus presents as devoted to Pythagorean philosophy. "Scholar of Socrates" is rendered "follower" rather than implying personal tuition; the two lived centuries apart. Burton's specific Socratic affiliation remains to be traced and may be an error or conflation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 13 And if thou vouchsafe to reade this treatise, it shall seem no otherwise to thee, then the way to an ordinary Traveller, sometimes fair, sometimes foul; here champion, there inclosed; barren in one place, better soyl in another: by woods, groves, hils, dales, plains, &c. I shall lead thee per ardua montium, & lubrica vallium, & roscida cespitum, & [302]glebosa camporum, through variety of objects, that which thou shalt like and surely dislike.	And if you are willing to read this treatise, it will seem to you like a road to an ordinary traveller: sometimes fair, sometimes foul; open country here, enclosed land there; barren in one place, better soil in another. By woods, groves, hills, valleys, plains, and so on, I shall lead you "over steep mountains, slippery valleys, dew-covered turf, and clod-filled fields," through a variety of sights—things you will like and things you will certainly dislike.[303]
For the matter it self or method, if it be faulty, consider I pray you that of Columella, Nihil perfectum, aut à singulari consummatum industria, no man can observe all, much is defective no doubt, may be justly taxed, altered, and avoided in Galen, Aristotle, those great Masters. Boni venatoris ([304]one holds) plures feras capere, non omnes; He is a good Huntsman can catch some, not all: I have done my endeavor.	As for the material itself or my method, if it is faulty, please consider Columella's saying: "Nothing is perfect or brought to completion by one person's efforts." No one can observe everything. Even in those great masters Galen and Aristotle, much is undoubtedly defective and may justly be criticized, corrected, and avoided.[305] "A good hunter," someone maintains, "catches many beasts, not all." A good huntsman can catch some, not all: I have done my best.

[302] Burton. P. 13, asterisk: "Hic enim, quod Seneca de Ponto, bos herbam, Ciconia larisam, canis leporem virgo florem legat." Translation, with the faulty readings interpreted: Here, as in Seneca's meadow, let the ox gather grass, the stork a lizard, the dog a hare, the maiden a flower. Explanation: The scan reads "Ponto" and apparently "larisam." Seneca, Letters 108.29, has "in eodem prato," in the same meadow, and "ciconia lacertam," the stork a lizard. These establish the intended sense; Burton adds the maiden and flower. The printed forms are preserved above.

[303] Editor. "Champion" means open country, opposed to enclosed ground; "remisse" means relaxed or less tightly worked. The river and road images offer a description of the book's changing pace, tone, difficulty, and subject matter. The closing marginal note returns to readers selecting different things from the same field.

[304] Burton. Printed p. 13, p: "Pet. Nannius not. in Hor." Explanation: Petrus Nannius (Pieter Nanninck), notes on Horace. The precise passage has not yet been located.

[305] Editor. Columella wrote on agriculture; Galen on medicine; Aristotle on philosophy and natural inquiry. Burton argues that even these authorities leave room for correction. The exact Columella wording has not been located; the attribution is retained as Burton's.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Besides, I dwell not in this study, Non hic sulcos ducimus, non hoc pulvere desudamus, I am but a smatterer, I confesse, a stranger, [306]here and there I pull a flower; I do easily grant, if a rigid censurer should criticize on this which I have writ, he should not finde three sole faults, as Scaliger in Terence, but 300. so many as he hath done in Cardans subtleties, as many notable errors as [307]Gul. Laurembergius, a late professor of Rostocke, discovers in that anatomie of Laurentius, or Barocius the Venetian in Sacro boscus.	Besides, I do not make my home in this field of study: "These are not the furrows I plough; this is not the dust in which I sweat." I admit that I am only a dabbler, a visitor, picking a flower here and there. I readily concede that a severe critic examining what I have written would find not just three faults, as Scaliger did in Terence, but three hundred—as many as he found in Cardan's Subtleties; as many conspicuous errors as Wilhelm Lauremberg, lately a professor at Rostock, finds in Laurentius's anatomy, or the Venetian Barozzi in Sacrobosco.[308]

[306] Burton. Printed p. 13, q: "Non hic colonus domicilium habeo, sed topiarii in morem, hinc inde florem vellico, ut canis Nilum lambens." Translation: "I have no settled home here as a cultivator; like a gardener I pluck a flower here and there, like a dog lapping the Nile." Explanation: the dog's quick, wary drinking recalls Phaedrus, Fables 1.25, where it avoids crocodiles.

[307] Burton. Printed p. 13, r: "Supra bis mille notabiles errores Laurentii demonstravit, &c." Translation: "He demonstrated more than two thousand conspicuous errors in Laurentius, and so on." Explanation: this is Burton's report of Lauremberg's criticism; the count has not been independently checked.

[308] Editor. The examples range across classical comedy, natural philosophy, anatomy, and astronomy. Julius Caesar Scaliger's critique of Girolamo Cardano's De subtilitate appeared in 1557; Francesco Barozzi's Cosmographia challenged Sacrobosco's astronomical textbook. Burton's counts of errors have not been verified. "Late professor" means a former or recent professor.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And although this be a sixth Edition, in which I should have been more accurate, corrected all those former escapes, yet it was magni laboris opus, so difficult and tedious, that as Carpenters do finde out of experience, tis much better build a new sometimes, then repair an old house; I could as soon write as much more, as alter that which is written. If ought therefore be amisse, (as I grant there is) I require a friendly admonition, no bitter invective, [309]Sint musis socii Charites, Furia omnis abesto,	And although this is a sixth edition, in which I ought to have been more accurate and corrected all the earlier oversights, it was nevertheless "a work of great labour"—so difficult and tedious that, as carpenters discover from experience, it is sometimes much better to build a new house than to repair an old one. I could write as much again as readily as revise what is already written. So if anything is wrong—and I admit that something is—I ask for a friendly correction, not bitter abuse: Let the Graces accompany the Muses; let every Fury keep away.[310]
Otherwise as in ordinarie controversies, funem contentionis nectamus, sed cui bono? We may contend, and likely misuse each other, but to what purpose? We are both scholars, say, [311]———Arcades ambo, Et cantare pares, & respondere parati. If we do wrangle, what shal we get by it? Trouble and wrong our selves, make sport to others. If I be convict of an error, I wil yield, I wil amend. Si quid bonis moribus, si quid veritati dissentaneum, in sacris vel humanis literis à me dictum sit, id nec dictum esto.	Otherwise, as in ordinary disputes, "let us knot the rope of contention—but who benefits?" We may quarrel, and probably abuse one another, but to what purpose? Let us say we are both scholars: Both Arcadians, equal at singing, and ready to answer. What shall we gain by wrangling? We shall trouble and injure ourselves and amuse other people. If I am proved wrong, I will give way; I will correct myself. "If I have said anything contrary to good morals or to truth, in sacred or secular learning, let it be as though I had never said it."

[309] Burton. Printed p. 13, s: "Philo de Con." Explanation: an abbreviated citation to Philo; its exact expansion and the source of the accompanying verse remain uncertain. The marker is printed at "Sint musis."

[310] Editor. The Muses stand for learning and poetry, the Graces for graciousness, and the Furies for vengeful anger. The invitation to civility follows a catalogue of famously combative criticism. "Escapes" means errors that escaped correction.

[311] Burton. Printed p. 13, t: "Virg." Explanation: Virgil, Eclogue 7.4–5. Corydon and Thyrsis are rival pastoral singers; their readiness to answer one another suits Burton's picture of scholarly combat.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In the mean time I require a favorable censure of all faults omitted, harsh compositions, pleonasmes of words, tautological repetitions (though Seneca bear me out, nunquam nimis dicitur, quod nunquam satis dicitur) perturbations of tenses, numbers, printers faults, &c. My translations are sometimes rather paraphrases, then interpretations, non ad verbum, but as an author, I use more liberty, and thats only taken, which was to my purpose:	Meanwhile, I ask for a lenient judgement of all uncorrected faults: awkward constructions, redundant words, repetitions of the same thing—though Seneca supports me: "What is never said enough is never said too often"—confusions of tense and number, printers' errors, and so on.[312] My translations are sometimes paraphrases rather than exact renderings: "not word for word." As an author, I take greater freedom, and select only what serves my purpose.[313]
Source page 13–14 Quotations are often inserted in the Text, which make the stile more harsh, or in the margent as it hapned. Greek authors, Plato, Plutarch, Athenæus, &c. I have cited out of their interpreters, because the original was not so readie. I have mingled sacra prophanis, but I hope not prophaned, and in repetition of authors names, ranked them per accidens, not according to Chronologie; sometimes Neotericks before Ancients, as my memory suggested. Some things are here altered, expunged in this sixth Edition, others amended, much added, because many good [314]authors in all kinds are come to my hands since, and tis no prejudice, no such indecorum, or oversight.	Quotations are often inserted into the text, making the style less smooth, or into the margin, as it happened. I have quoted Greek authors—Plato, Plutarch, Athenaeus, and others—through their translators, because the originals were less readily available. I have mixed "sacred things with secular," but I hope without profaning them. When naming authors I have placed them "as chance suggested," not in chronological order: sometimes modern writers before ancient ones, as they came to mind. In this sixth edition some things have been altered or removed, others corrected, and much added, because many good authors on all kinds of subjects have since come into my hands. This is no discredit, no impropriety or oversight.

[312] Editor. Seneca, Letters 27.9, has discitur ("is learned"), not Burton's second dicitur ("is said"): something insufficiently learned cannot be repeated too often. The modern column translates Burton's printed version. "Numbers" means grammatical singulars and plurals; "faults omitted" means errors left uncorrected.

[313] Editor. "Interpretations" here means translations. Burton openly describes selective quotation, adaptation, and paraphrase. Our modern column follows his actual wording; references to underlying sources in the notes are not silent replacements of it.

[314] Burton. Printed p. 14, *: "Frambesarius, Sennertus, Ferandus, &c." Explanation: Burton names examples of newly available authors. No titles or editions are specified in this note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 14 [315]Nunquam ita quicquam bene subductâ ratione ad vitam fuit, Quin res, ætas, usus, semper aliquid apportent novi, Aliquid moneant, ut illa quæ scire te credas, nescias, Et quæ tibi putaris prima, in exercendo ut repudias. Ne're was ought yet at first contriv'd so fit, But use, age, or something would alter it; Advise thee better, and, upon peruse, Make thee not say, and what thou tak'st, refuse. But I am now resolved never to put this treatise out again, Ne quid nimis, I wil not hereafter add, alter, or retract, I have done.	Nothing in life was ever so carefully worked out that events, age, and experience did not always bring something new, teach some lesson—so that you do not know what you think you know, and reject in practice what you considered best. Nothing was ever planned so well at first that use, age, or something would not change it, advise you better, and, on reconsideration, make you unsay your words and reject what you accepted. But I am now resolved never to publish this treatise again: "Nothing to excess." I will make no further additions, changes, or retractions. I have finished.[316]

[315] Burton. Printed p. 14, x: "Ter. Adelph." Explanation: Terence, The Brothers (Adelphoe), 855–858. Burton's Latin differs from the received text, including quicquam for quisquam and in exercendo for in experiundo. His English verse adapts the passage further; both versions are retained and separately modernized.

[316] Editor. The Latin quotation and Burton's accompanying English verse are both retained. "Make thee not say" is interpreted from its context as retracting a former statement. Ne quid nimis is the traditional maxim "Nothing to excess." The sixth edition was published posthumously in 1651; Burton died in 1640.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The last and greatest exception is, that I being a divine have medled with physick, [317]———tantumne est ab re tuâ otii tibi, Aliena ut cures, eaque nihil quæ ad te attinent? Which Menedemus objected to Chremes; have I so much leasure, or little businesse of mine own, as to look after other mens matters which concern me not? What have I to do with physick? quod medicorum est promittant medici.	The last and greatest objection is that I, a clergyman, have meddled with medicine: Have you so much leisure from your own affairs that you attend to other people's, which do not concern you at all? That was Menedemus's objection to Chremes. Have I so much leisure, or so little business of my own, that I must look after other people's affairs, which do not concern me? What have I to do with medicine? "Let physicians undertake what belongs to physicians."[318]
The [319]Lacedemonians were once in counsel about state-matters, a deboshed fellow spake excellent wel, and to the purpose, his speech was generally approved: A grave Senator steps up, and by all means would have it repealed, though good, because dehonestabatur pessimo authore, it had no better an author; let some good man relate the same, and then it should pass. This counsel was embraced, factum est, and it was registred forthwith, Et sic bona sententia mansit, malus author mutatus est.	The Spartans were once taking counsel on affairs of state when a dissolute fellow spoke extremely well and to the point. His speech met with general approval. A venerable senator stepped forward and insisted that it be rejected, good though it was, because "it was disgraced by its thoroughly bad author": it had no better source. Let some good man repeat it, and then it could pass. They accepted this advice: "it was done," and the proposal was immediately entered in the record. "And so the good opinion remained; the bad author was replaced."

[317] Burton. Printed p. 14, y: "Heaut. Act. 1. scen. 1." Explanation: Terence, The Self-Tormentor (Heauton Timorumenos), 75–76. The following line is Chremes's famous reply that, being human, he regards nothing human as foreign to him; Burton does not quote it here.

[318] Editor. "Divine" means a clergyman or theologian; "physick" means medicine. Burton adapts Horace, Epistles 2.1.115–116, changing promittunt ("physicians undertake") to promittant ("let physicians undertake"). Horace contrasts skilled trades with the indiscriminate writing of poetry.

[319] Burton. Printed p. 14, z: "Gellius. lib. 18. cap. 3." Explanation: Attic Nights 18.3, reporting Aeschines. Burton compresses the story and changes its concluding turpis auctor ("disgraceful author") to malus author ("bad author").

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thou saiest as much of me, stomachosus as thou art, & grantest peradventure this which I have written in physick, not to be amiss, had another done it, a professed physician, or so; but why should I meddle with this tract? Hear me speak: There be many other subjects, I do easily grant, both in humanity and divinity, fit to be treated of, of which had I written ad ostentationem only, to shew my self, I should have rather chosen, and in which I have been more conversant, I could have more willingly luxuriated, and better satisfied my self and others;	You say the same of me, irritable as you are. Perhaps you admit that what I have written on medicine would be acceptable if someone else had done it—a professional physician, say—but why should I meddle with this subject? Hear me out. I readily admit that many other subjects in both secular learning and theology deserve treatment. If I had written merely "for display," to show myself off, I would have preferred one of those. Being more familiar with them, I could more gladly have indulged myself and better satisfied myself and others;
Source page 14–15 but that at this time I was fatally driven upon this rock of melancholy, and carried away by this by-stream, which as a rillet, is deducted from the main chanel of my studies, in which I have pleased and busied my self at idle hours, as a subject most necessary and commodious. Not that I prefer it before Divinity, which I do acknowledge to be the Queen of professions, and to which all the rest are as handmaids, but that in Divinity I saw no such great need. For had I written positively, there be so many books in that kinde, so many commentators, treatises, pamphlets, expositions, sermons, that whole teemes of oxen cannot draw them;	except that at this time fate drove me onto this rock of melancholy and swept me away down this side stream—a little rivulet diverted from the main channel of my studies. In my spare hours I have occupied and amused myself with it as a most necessary and useful subject. I do not prefer it to theology, which I acknowledge as the queen of professions, with all the others as her handmaids. Rather, I saw no equally pressing need in theology. If I had written a straightforward exposition of doctrine, there are already so many books of that kind—so many commentators, treatises, pamphlets, expositions, and sermons—that whole teams of oxen could not haul them.[320]

[320] Editor. "Positively" contrasts the exposition of accepted doctrine with the controversial theology of the next passage. The rock and diverted stream turn Burton's personal involvement with melancholy into a story of an interrupted scholarly course; they do not establish a modern clinical diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 15 and had I been as forward and ambitious as some others, I might have haply printed a sermon at Pauls-Cross, a sermon in St. Maries Oxon, a sermon in Christ-Church, or a sermon before the right honorable, right reverend, a sermon before the right worshipful, a sermon in latine, in english, a sermon with a name, a sermon without, a sermon, a sermon, &c. But I have been ever as desirous to suppresse my labours in this kinde, as others have been to presse and publish theirs.	And if I had been as eager and ambitious as some others, I might perhaps have printed a sermon preached at Paul's Cross, a sermon at St Mary's, Oxford, a sermon at Christ Church, or a sermon before the Right Honourable, the Right Reverend, a sermon before the Right Worshipful; a sermon in Latin, in English, a sermon with a name, a sermon without; a sermon, a sermon, and so on. But I have always been as eager to keep my work of this kind unpublished as others have been to put theirs through the press and publish it.[321]
To have written in controversie, had been to cut off an Hydra's head, [322]lis litem generat, one begets another, so many duplications, triplications, & swarms of questions, In sacro bello hoc quod stili mucrone agitur, that having once begun, I should never make an end. One had much better, as [323]Alexander the sixth Pope, long since observed, provoke a great prince than a begging friar, a Jesuit, or a seminary priest, I will add, for inexpugnabile genus hoc hominum, they are an irrefragable society, they must and wil have the last word;	To write religious controversy would have been like cutting off one of the Hydra's heads: "one dispute breeds another." One produces the next, with so many replies, further replies, and swarms of questions, "in this sacred war fought with the point of the pen," that once I had begun I could never finish.[324] As Pope Alexander VI observed long ago, one would be much better off provoking a great prince than a begging friar—or, I would add, a Jesuit or a seminary priest. "This breed of men is unconquerable." They are a body that cannot be refuted; they must and will have the last word;[325]

[321] Editor. Paul's Cross was the preaching place beside St Paul's in London; St Mary's was Oxford's university church, and Christ Church was Burton's Oxford college. The repeated titles imitate sermon title pages. "Suppress" and "press" make a printing joke preserved here by "unpublished" and "through the press."

[322] Burton. Printed p. 15, a: "Et inde catena quædam fit, quæ hæredes etiam ligat. Cardan. Hensius." Translation: "And from this a kind of chain is made, which binds even the heirs." Explanation: Cardan and "Hensius" are named without titles; the precise sources remain unlocated.

[323] Burton. Printed p. 15, b: "Malle se bellum cum magno principe gerere, quam cum uno ex fratrum mendicantium ordine." Translation: "He would rather wage war with a great prince than with a single member of the order of mendicant friars." Explanation: Burton gives no source for the saying attributed to Alexander VI.

[324] Editor. The Hydra's severed heads were replaced by new ones. "Duplications" and "triplications" suggest the successive replies and rejoinders of formal controversy. The point of the pen turns literary dispute into armed combat.

[325] Editor. "Begging friars" are members of mendicant religious orders. "Seminary priest" here evokes Catholic clergy trained for missionary work. Burton's Protestant polemic claims that these opponents never concede defeat; its abusive generalization belongs to his argumentative voice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and that with such eagernesse, impudence, abominable lying, falsifying, and bitternesse in their questions they proceed, that as [326]he said, furorne cæcus, an rapit vis acrior, an culpa, responsum date? Blinde fury, or error, or rashnesse, or what it is that eggs them, I know not, I am sure many times, which [327]Austin perceived long since, tempestate contentionis, serenitas charitatis obnubilatur, with this tempest of contention, the serenity of charity is over-clouded, and there be too many spirits conjured up already in this kinde in all sciences, and more than we can tel how to lay, which do so furiously rage, and keep such a racket,	and they conduct their disputes with such vehemence, insolence, abominable lying, falsification, and bitterness that, as the poet said, "Is it blind fury, or does some fiercer force drive you, or guilt? Answer me." Whether blind fury, error, rashness, or something else spurs them on, I do not know. What I do know is that, as Augustine observed long ago, "the storm of contention clouds the clear sky of charity." This tempest of dispute overcasts charity's serenity. In every branch of learning, too many spirits of this kind have already been conjured up—more than we know how to lay to rest—and they rage so furiously and make such a racket,

[326] Burton. Printed p. 15, c: "Hor. epod. lib. od. 7." Explanation: Horace, Epode 7.13–14, a denunciation of Roman civil strife. Burton prints cæcus ("blind," describing fury) where the received text has caecos ("blind," describing those driven on); the modern column follows Burton's reading.

[327] Burton. Printed p. 15, d: "Epist. 86. ad Casulam presb." Explanation: Augustine's letter to the priest Casulanus, numbered 36 in modern editions, 1.2. Discussing different fasting customs, Augustine warns against allowing controversy to obscure Christian love. Burton condenses the wording; 86 reflects an older numbering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
that as [328]Fabius said, It had been much better for some of them to have been born dumb, and altogether illiterate, then so far to dote to their own destruction. At melius fuerat non scribere, namque tacere Tutum semper erit;——— Tis a generall fault, so Severinus the Dane complains [329]in physick, unhappy men as we are, we spend our daies in unprofitable questions and disputations, intricate subtilties, de lanâ caprinâ, about moonshine in the water, leaving in the mean time those chiefest treasures of nature untouched, wherein the best medicines for all manner of diseases are to be found, and do not only neglect them our selves, but hinder, condemn, forbid and scoffe at others, that are willing to enquire after them. These motives at this present have induced me to make choice of this medicinal subject.	that, as Quintilian said, it would have been far better for some of them to have been born unable to speak and wholly uneducated than to fall into such folly and destroy themselves. Better to have left unwritten: for silence will always be safe.[330] It is a general fault. So Severinus the Dane complains of medicine: unhappy creatures that we are, we spend our days on useless questions and disputes, intricate subtleties, "about goat's wool"—about moonlight reflected in water—while leaving nature's greatest treasures untouched, where the best remedies for every kind of disease may be found. We not only neglect them ourselves, but obstruct, condemn, forbid, and ridicule others willing to investigate them.[331] These considerations have now induced me to choose this medical subject.

[328] Burton. Printed p. 15, e: "Lib. 12. cap. 1. Mutos nasci, & omni scientia egere satius fuisset, quàm sic in propriam perniciem insanire." Translation: "It would have been better to be born mute and lack all learning than to act so madly to one's own destruction." Explanation: Fabius is Marcus Fabius Quintilianus. Institutio oratoria 12.1.2 instead speaks of lacking reason and turning providence's gifts to mutual destruction; Burton adapts it.

[329] Burton. Printed p. 15, f: "Infelix mortalitas inutilibus quæstionibus ac disceptationibus vitam traducimus, naturæ principes thesauros, in quibus gravissimæ morborum medicinæ collocatæ sunt, interim intactos relinquimus. Nec ipsi solum relinquimus sed & alios prohibemus, impedimus, condemnamus, ludibriisq; afficimus." Translation: "Unhappy mortals! We pass our lives in useless questions and disputes, meanwhile leaving untouched nature's chief treasures, in which the most potent remedies for diseases lie. Not only do we leave them alone ourselves: we forbid, obstruct, condemn, and ridicule others." Explanation: attributed to Severinus in the text; no work is specified.

[330] Editor. Burton gives no attribution for this couplet, and its source remains unlocated. The translation preserves the contrast between the risks of writing and the safety of silence.

[331] Editor. Severinus is Petrus Severinus, author of Idea medicinae philosophicae (1571), a work on Paracelsian, Hippocratic, and Galenic medicine. The exact quotation still needs direct comparison. "Goat's wool" is proverbial for a trivial subject of dispute; "moonshine in the water" adds an image of empty, insubstantial inquiry.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If any physician in the mean time shall infer, Ne sutor ultra crepidam, and finde himself grieved that I have intruded into his profession, I will tell him in brief, I do not otherwise by them, than they do by us. If it be for their advantage, I know many of their sect which have taken orders, in hope of a benefice, tis a common transition, and why may not a melancholy divine, that can get nothing but by simonie, professe physick?	If meanwhile any physician objects, "Let the cobbler stick to his shoes," and resents my intrusion into his profession, I will answer briefly: I treat them no differently from the way they treat us.[332] When it benefits them, many of their fraternity, as I know, take holy orders in the hope of obtaining a church living. It is a common change of profession. So why may a melancholy clergyman, who can obtain nothing except by buying a church appointment, not practise medicine?[333]
Source page 15–16 Drusianus an Italian (Crusianus, but corruptly, Trithemius cals him) [334]because he was not fortunate in his practice, forsook his profession, and writ afterwards in Divinity. Marcilius Ficinus was semel & simul, a priest and a physician at once, and [335]T. Linacer in his old age took orders. The Jesuits professe both at this time, divers of them permissu superiorum, Chirurgions, panders, bawds, and midwives, &c.	The Italian Drusianus—whom Trithemius mistakenly calls Crusianus—abandoned his profession because his medical practice was unsuccessful, and afterwards wrote on theology. Marsilio Ficino was "at one and the same time" a priest and a physician, and Thomas Linacre took holy orders in old age. The Jesuits practise both professions today; several of them, "with their superiors' permission," are surgeons, pimps, procurers, and midwives, and so on.[336]

[332] Editor. Literally, "Let the cobbler not go beyond the sandal": stay within your expertise. Pliny, Natural History 35.85, tells how Apelles accepted a shoemaker's correction of a painted sandal but rejected his further criticism of the leg.

[333] Editor. A "benefice" is a church office with an income or living. "Simony" is the buying or selling of ecclesiastical office or spiritual privilege. Burton's complaint is about the patronage system; he does not say here that he bought a living himself.

[334] Burton. Printed p. 15, g: "Quod in praxi minime fortunatus esset, medicinam reliquit, & ordinibus initiatus in Theologia postmodum scripsit. Gesner Bibliotheca." Translation: "Because he had very little success in practice, he abandoned medicine and, having taken holy orders, afterwards wrote on theology." Explanation: Conrad Gesner's Bibliotheca; direct comparison of this entry and Trithemius's name-form remains to be made.

[335] Burton. Printed p. 15, h: "P. Jovius." Explanation: Paolo Giovio is cited for Thomas Linacre's late ordination. Burton supplies no title or passage number.

[336] Editor. Ficino and Linacre are examples of overlapping clerical and medical vocations. The list then turns into an anti-Jesuit insult: "panders" and "bawds" both denote procurers for prostitution. Their inclusion should not be mistaken for neutral evidence about Jesuit occupations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 16 Many poor countrey-vicars for want of other means, are driven to their shifts; to turn mountebanks, quacksalvers, empiricks, and if our greedy patrons hold us to such hard conditions, as commonly they do, they will make most of us work at some trade, as Paul did, at last turn taskers, malsters, costermongers, grasiers, sel ale as some have done, or worse.	Many poor country vicars, lacking other means of support, are forced to fend for themselves by becoming mountebanks, quacks, and empirical healers. And if our greedy patrons keep us on such harsh terms, as they commonly do, they will force most of us to work at a trade, as Paul did—eventually to become hired labourers, maltsters, fruit sellers, cattle rearers, or ale sellers, as some already have, or worse.[337]
Howsoever in undertaking this task, I hope I shall commit no great error or indecorum, if all be considered aright, I can vindicate my self with Georgius Braunus, and Hieronymus Henningius, those two learned Divines, who (to borrow a line or to of mine [338]elder brother) drawn by a natural love, the one of pictures and maps, prospectives and corographical delights, writ that ample theatre of cities; the other to the studie of genealogies, penned theatrum genealogicum. Or else I can excuse my studies with [339]Lessius the Jesuit in like case, It is a disease of the soul, on which I am to treat, and as much appertaining to a Divine as to a physician;	However that may be, I hope that, all things properly considered, undertaking this task involves no great error or impropriety. I can defend myself by the example of those two learned clergymen, Georg Braun and Hieronymus Henning. To borrow a line or two from my elder brother: drawn by a natural love of pictures and maps, perspective views, and the delights of describing places, the first wrote that extensive Theatre of Cities; drawn to the study of genealogies, the other composed the Genealogical Theatre.[340] Or I can justify my studies as the Jesuit Lessius did in a similar case: I am treating a disease of the soul, which concerns a clergyman as much as a physician;

[337] Editor. Mountebanks advertised medicines by public performance; quacksalvers sold supposed cures; "empiricks" claimed practical experience rather than learned medical authority. These are disparaging terms. "Taskers" are labourers paid by the task; maltsters prepare malt, and graziers rear or fatten livestock. Paul's manual trade was tentmaking (Acts 18:3).

[338] Burton. Printed p. 16, i: "M. W. Burton Preface to his description of Leicestershire, printed at London by W. Jaggard for J. White, 1622." Explanation: William Burton, Robert's elder brother, The Description of Leicester Shire. The quotation explains the two clergymen's scholarly interests.

[339] Burton. Printed p. 16, k: "In Hygiasticon, neque enim hæc tractatio aliena videri debet à theologo, &c. agitur de morbo animæ." Translation: "In Hygiasticon: for this discussion should not seem foreign to a theologian, and so on; it concerns a disease of the soul." Explanation: Leonard Lessius's work on health and temperate living. Burton offers a Jesuit as an authority soon after attacking Jesuits.

[340] Editor. "Theatre" can mean a comprehensive illustrated survey. Braun is associated with the Civitates orbis terrarum, a collection of city views; Henning with the Theatrum genealogicum. "Chorographical" means concerned with the description of particular places or regions, and "prospectives" are perspective views. The source prints "a line or to," meaning "two."

Original text 1651	Modern English
and who knows not what an agreement there is betwixt these two professions? A good Divine either is or ought to be a good physician, a spiritual physician at least, as our Saviour cals himself, and was indeed, Mat. 4.23. Luke 5.18. Luke 7.8. They differ but in object, the one of the body, the other of the soul, and use divers medicines to cure: one amends animam per corpus, the other corpus per animam, as [341]our Regius Professor of physick well informed us in a learned lecture of his not long since. One helps the vices and passions of the soul, anger, lust, desperation, pride, presumption, &c. by applying that spiritual physick; as the other use proper remedies in bodily diseases.	and who does not know how closely these professions agree? A good clergyman either is or ought to be a good physician—a spiritual physician, at least—as our Saviour calls himself, and indeed was: Matthew 4:23, Luke 5:18, Luke 7:8.[342] The professions differ only in their object: one treats the body, the other the soul, and they use different medicines to cure. One heals "the soul through the body," the other "the body through the soul," as our Regius Professor of Medicine explained well in a learned lecture not long ago. One remedies the soul's vices and passions—anger, lust, despair, pride, presumption, and so on—by applying spiritual medicine, while the other uses appropriate remedies for bodily diseases.
Now this being a common infirmity of body and soul, and such a one that hath as much need of spiritual as a corporal cure, I could not finde a fitter task to busie my self about, a more apposite theam, so necessary, so commodious, and generally concerning all sorts of men, that should so equally participate of both, and require a whole physician. A divine in this compound mixt maladie, can do little alone, a physician in some kinds of melancholy much lesse, both make an absolute cure. [343]Alterius sic altera poscit opem.	Now melancholy is an infirmity shared by body and soul, needing spiritual treatment as much as bodily treatment. I could find no more fitting occupation, no more appropriate theme—so necessary, so useful, and of such general concern to every kind of person—that belongs so equally to both professions and requires a complete physician. In this complex, mixed illness, a clergyman alone can do little; in some kinds of melancholy a physician can do much less. Together they make a complete cure. Thus each needs the other's help.[344]

[341] Burton. Printed p. 16, l: "D. Clayton in comitiis, anno 1621." Translation: "Dr Clayton, at the academic exercises, in the year 1621." Explanation: Thomas Clayton the elder, Oxford's Regius Professor of Medicine. The lecture's precise wording has not been independently checked.

[342] Editor. Matthew 4:23 describes Jesus teaching and healing; Luke 5:18 begins the account of the paralysed man; Luke 7:8 is the centurion's comparison with military authority, within a healing story. The explicit physician comparison occurs at Luke 5:31–32. Burton's printed verse references are retained.

[343] Burton. Printed p. 16, m: "Hor." Explanation: Horace, Art of Poetry (Ars poetica), 410–411. In its original context, natural talent and disciplined study need one another; Burton applies the phrase to medicine and theology.

[344] Editor. "Common" means shared by body and soul. "Absolute" means complete, and the "whole physician" combines medical and spiritual care. Burton is stating his own account of melancholy and its cure, within the medicine and theology of his time.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And tis proper to them both, and I hope not unbeseeming me, who am by my profession a Divine, and by mine inclination a physician. I had Jupiter in my sixt house; I say with [345]Beroaldus, Non sum medicus, nec medicinæ prorsus expers, in the theorick of physick I have taken some pains, not with an intent to practise, but to satisfie my self, which was a cause likewise of the first undertaking of this subject.	So this subject belongs to both professions, and I hope it is not unsuitable for me: a clergyman by profession, a physician by inclination. Jupiter was in the sixth house of my horoscope.[346] I say with Beroaldus, "I am not a physician, nor wholly ignorant of medicine." I have taken some trouble over medical theory, with no intention of practising, but to satisfy myself. That too was one reason I first undertook this subject.
If these reasons do not satisfie thee good Reader, as Alexander Munificus that bountiful prelate, sometimes bishop of Lincoln, when he had built six castles, ad invidiam operis eluendam, saith [347]Mr. Camden, to take away the envy of his work (which very words Nubrigensis hath of Roger the rich bishop of Salisbury, who in King Stephens time, built Shirburn castle, and that of Devises) to divert the scandal or imputation, which might be thence inferred, built so many religious houses: If this my discourse be over medicinal, or savor too much of humanitie, I promise thee, that I wil hereafter make thee amends in some treatise of divinity.	If these reasons do not satisfy you, good reader, consider Alexander the Munificent, that generous prelate, formerly bishop of Lincoln. After building six castles, he built as many religious houses, "to wash away the odium of his work," as Mr Camden says—to remove the resentment his buildings caused and avert any scandal or accusation arising from them. William of Newburgh uses those very words of Roger, the wealthy bishop of Salisbury, who built Sherborne Castle and the castle at Devizes in King Stephen's time. So if my discourse is too medical, or savours too much of secular learning, I promise to make amends hereafter with a theological treatise.[348]

[345] Burton. Printed p. 16, n: "Lib. de pestil." Explanation: Beroaldus, a book on pestilence. The reference points to Filippo Beroaldo's writing on plague; the exact passage and edition remain to be checked.

[346] Editor. Burton appeals to the position of Jupiter in his birth horoscope to explain his medical inclination. "House" is an astrological division of that horoscope; this is not a claim that he held a medical qualification. "Theorick" means theory, contrasted with practice.

[347] Burton. Printed p. 16, o: "In Newarke in Nottinghamshire. Cum duo edificasset castella, ad tollendam structionis invidiam, & expiandam maculam, duo instituit cœnobia, & collegiis religiosis implevit." Translation: "Under Newark in Nottinghamshire. When he had built two castles, to remove the odium of the building and wipe away the stain, he founded two monasteries and filled them with religious communities." Explanation: this marginal note says two castles and two monasteries, whereas Burton's body text says six. Both readings are preserved.

[348] Editor. The main text says "six"; the marginal quotation says "two" twice. The contradiction is not resolved by changing either column. "Nubrigensis" is William of Newburgh. The full Latin of Camden's Newark account and Burton's claim about Newburgh's wording for Roger still await direct comparison.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 16–17 But this I hope shal suffice, when you have more fully considered of the matter of this my subject, rem substratam, melancholy, madnes, and of the reasons following, which were my chief motives: the generality of the disease, the necessity of the cure, and the commodity or common good that will arise to all men by the knowledg of it, as shal at large appear in the ensuing preface.	But I hope this will suffice once you have considered more fully the matter of my subject, "the underlying thing"—melancholy, madness—and the reasons that follow, which chiefly moved me: the disease's prevalence, the need for a cure, and the benefit or common good that knowledge of it will bring to everyone, as the following preface will show at length.
Source page 17 And I doubt not but that in the end you will say with me, that to anatomize this humor aright, through all the members of this our Microcosmus, is as great a task, as to reconcile those Chronologicall errors in the Assyrian monarchie, finde out the quadrature of a circle, the creeks and sounds of the north-east, or north-west passages, & all out as good a discovery as that hungry [349]Spaniards of Terra Australis Incognita, as great trouble as to perfect the motion of Mars and Mercury, which so crucifies our Astronomers, or to rectifie the Gregorian Kalender.	And I do not doubt that in the end you will agree with me: to dissect this humour properly throughout every part of our human microcosm is as great a task as reconciling the chronological errors in the history of the Assyrian monarchy, finding how to square the circle, or exploring the inlets and channels of the Northeast or Northwest Passage. It is every bit as fine a discovery as that hungry Spaniard's "Unknown Southern Land," and as troublesome as perfecting the calculation of the motions of Mars and Mercury—which so torments our astronomers—or correcting the Gregorian calendar.[350]

[349] Burton. Printed p. 17, p: "Ferdinando de Quir. anno 1612. Amsterdami impress." Translation: "Ferdinando de Quir; printed at Amsterdam in 1612." Explanation: Pedro Fernández de Quirós (Portuguese-born, in Spanish service) promoted his claimed discovery of a southern continent. Markham lists Dutch and Latin printings at Amsterdam in 1612; Burton does not specify the language. "Hungry" suggests avidity or need; its exact force is uncertain.

[350] Editor. "Microcosm" is the human being understood as a little world; "humour" retains its bodily as well as temperamental sense. Squaring the circle seeks a square equal in area to a given circle. The northern sea routes, supposed southern continent, planetary calculations, calendar reform, and Assyrian chronology form a catalogue of daunting intellectual and geographical projects. "Perfect the motion" means perfect its calculation or account, not alter the planets themselves.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I am so affected for my part, and hope as [351]Theophrastus did by his characters, That our posterity, O friend Policles, shal be the better for this which we have written, by correcting and rectifying what is amiss in themselves by our examples, and applying our precepts and cautions to their own use. And as that great captain Zisca would have a drum made of his skin when he was dead, because he thought the very noise of it would put his enemies to flight, I doubt not but that these following lines, when they shall be recited, or hereafter read, wil drive away melancholy (though I be gone) as much as Ziscaes drum could terrifie his foes.	That is how I feel, for my part. Like Theophrastus with his Characters, I hope "that our descendants, my friend Polycles, will be the better for what we have written: that they will correct and put right their faults by our examples, and apply our precepts and warnings to their own use." And just as the great commander Žižka wished a drum to be made from his skin after his death, thinking its very sound would put his enemies to flight, so I do not doubt that these following lines, when recited or read hereafter, will drive away melancholy—even after I am gone—as powerfully as Žižka's drum could terrify his foes.[352]
Yet one caution let me give by the way to my present, or future Reader, who is actually melancholy, that he reade not the [353]symptomes or prognosticks in this following tract, lest by applying that which he reads to himself, aggravating, appropriating things generally spoken, to his own person (as melancholy men for the most part do) he trouble or hurt himself, and get in conclusion more harm then good.	Yet let me give one passing warning to my present or future reader who is actually suffering from melancholy: do not read the descriptions of symptoms or prognoses in the treatise that follows. By applying what you read to yourself, magnifying it, and taking general statements as descriptions of your own case—as melancholy people mostly do—you may distress or harm yourself, and end up doing yourself more harm than good.[354]

[351] Burton. Printed p. 17, q: "Præfat. ad Characteres: Spero enim (O Policles) libros nostros meliores inde futuros, quod istiusmodi memoriæ mandata reliquerimus, ex præceptis & exemplis nostris ad vitam accommodatis, ut se inde corrigant." Translation, following the apparent sense: "For I hope, Polycles, that our children will become better because we have left such things on record, so that, applying our precepts and examples to life, they may correct themselves." Explanation: the scan reads libros ("books"), where the context and the proem support liberos ("children"); this interpretation is explicit, not a silent correction. The proem attached to Theophrastus's Characters is regarded by modern editors as a later addition.

[352] Editor. Jan Žižka was the Bohemian Hussite commander. The drum made from his skin is a transmitted story, not an established fact; it appears, for example, in Montaigne, Essays 1.3, in Florio's translation. Burton imagines his book similarly prolonging its author's power after death. This note does not establish Montaigne as his direct source.

[353] Burton. Printed p. 17, r: "Part. 1. sect. 3." Explanation: an internal reference to the First Partition, Section 3, on symptoms. The ensuing Section 4 treats prognostics. Burton's short marginal reference does not separately name that section.

[354] Editor. "Prognostics" concern a disease's expected course and outcome. Burton first says not to read these passages, then advises caution in reading them; both formulations are preserved. His warning makes the reader's response part of the book's concern with the benefits and harms of reading.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I advise them therefore warily to peruse that tract, Lapides loquitur (so said [355]Agrippa de occ. Phil.) & caveant lectores ne cerebrum iis excutiat. The rest I doubt not they may securely reade, and to their benefit. But I am over-tedious, I proceed.	I therefore advise them to read that section cautiously. "It speaks stones," as Agrippa said of Occult Philosophy, "and readers should beware lest it knock their brains out with them." The rest, I do not doubt, they may read safely and to their benefit. But I have gone on too long. I shall proceed.
Of the necessity and generality of this which I have said, if any man doubt, I shall desire him to make a brief survey of the world, as [356]Cyprian adviseth Donat, supposing himself to be transported to the top of some high mountain, and thence to behold the tumults and chances of this wavering world, he cannot chuse but either laugh at, or pity it. S. Hierom out of a strong imagination, being in the wilderness, conceived with himself, that he then saw them dancing in Rome;	If anyone doubts what I have said about the need for this work and the extent of its subject, I ask him to take a brief survey of the world, as Cyprian advises Donatus: imagine yourself carried to the top of a high mountain, and from there look at the disturbances and accidents of this unstable world; you cannot help either laughing at it or pitying it. While in the wilderness, Saint Jerome imagined so vividly that he thought he could see people dancing in Rome;[357]

[355] Burton. Printed p. 17, s: "Præf. Lectori." Translation: "Preface to the reader." Explanation: Agrippa, Three Books of Occult Philosophy, address to the reader. Agrippa directs the stone-throwing warning at hostile critics; Burton reuses it for a reader susceptible to melancholy. "It speaks stones" imagines a book's words as blows.

[356] Burton. Printed p. 17, t: "Ep. 2. l. 2. ad Donatum. Paulisper te crede subduci in ardui montis verticem celsiorem, speculare inde rerum jacentium facies, & oculis in diversa porrectis, fluctuantis mundi turbines intuere, jam simul aut ridebis aut misereberis, &c." Translation: "Letter 2, book 2, to Donatus. Imagine yourself briefly carried to the higher summit of a steep mountain; look from there at the things lying below, and, turning your eyes in different directions, behold the turbulence of the unsettled world: at once you will either laugh or pity, and so on." Explanation: Cyprian, To Donatus 6. The checked passage invites pity and gratitude for escape from the world; Burton's alternative of laughter is an addition, not a literal quotation of that passage.

[357] Editor. Jerome, Letter 22.7 to Eustochium, recalls imagining the pleasures of Rome and groups of young women while living in the desert. Burton converts this recollection into an example of vivid imaginative seeing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and if thou shalt either conceive, or clime to see, thou shalt soon perceive that all the world is mad, that it is melancholy, dotes: that it is (which Epichthonius Cosmopolites expressed not many years since in a map) made like a fools head (with that Motto, Caput helleboro dignum) a crased head, cavea stultorum, a fools paradise, or as Apollonius, a common prison of guls, cheaters, flatterers, &c. and needs to be reformed.	and whether you picture the view or climb up to see it, you will soon perceive that the whole world is mad, melancholy, and deluded. It is shaped like a fool's head—as Epichthonius Cosmopolites showed some years ago in a map bearing the motto "A head deserving hellebore"—a deranged head, "a cage of fools," a fool's paradise; or, as Apollonius calls it, a common prison of dupes, cheats, flatterers, and so on. It needs reform.[358]
Source page 17–18 Strabo in the ninth book of his geographie, compares Greece to the picture of a man, which comparison of his, Nic. Gerbelius in his exposition of Sophianus map, approves; The breast lies open from those Acroceraunian hils in Epirus, to the Sunian promontory in Attica; Pagæ and Megara are the two shoulders, that Istmos of Corinth the neck; and Peloponnesus the head. If this allusion hold, tis sure a mad head, Morea may be Moria; and to speak what I think, the inhabitants of moderne Greece, swerve as much from reason, & true religion at this day, as that Morea doth from the picture of a man.	In the ninth book of his Geography, Strabo compares Greece to the outline of a man, a comparison Nicolaus Gerbelius approves in his explanation of Sophianus's map. The chest stretches from the Acroceraunian Mountains in Epirus to Cape Sunium in Attica; Pagae and Megara are the two shoulders, the Isthmus of Corinth the neck, and the Peloponnese the head. If this comparison holds, it is certainly a mad head: Morea might be Moria—"folly." And, to say what I think, the inhabitants of modern Greece depart as far from reason and true religion today as Morea departs from the shape of a man.[359]

[358] Editor. The Fool's Cap map places the world inside a jester's head; Library and Archives Canada records a surviving engraving under O caput elleboro dignum. Burton's name for its maker is retained without resolving authorship. Hellebore was associated with purging and the treatment of madness. "Cavea" is a cage or enclosure; Burton follows it with his own "fool's paradise." The precise Apollonius passage remains unlocated.

[359] Editor. Morea is a name for the Peloponnese; moria is Greek for folly. The pun turns geography into moral satire, followed by Burton's own religious judgement. Strabo 9.1.1–2 discusses the line from the Ceraunian Mountains to Sunium, but the full human-body comparison has not been verified there. Gerbelius's exposition of Sophianus's map requires direct collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 18 Examine the rest in like sort, and you shall finde that kingdoms and Provinces are melancholy, cities and families, all creatures, vegetal, sensible, and rational, that all sorts, sects, ages, conditions, are out of tune, as in Cebes table, omnes errorem bibunt, before they come into the world, they are intoxicated by errors cup, from the highest to the lowest, have need of Physick, and those particular actions in [360]Seneca, where father & son prove one another mad, may be general: Porcius Latro shall plead against us all.	Examine the rest in the same way and you will find that kingdoms and provinces are melancholy, as are cities and families, and all living things—plants, creatures with sensation, and rational beings. Every class, sect, age, and condition is out of tune. As in the Tablet of Cebes, "everyone drinks error" before entering the world: they are intoxicated by error's cup, and all, from highest to lowest, need medicine.[361] Those particular cases in Seneca, where father and son each prove the other mad, may apply to everyone: Porcius Latro will plead against us all.

[360] Burton. Printed p. 18, u: "Controv. l. 2. cont. 7. & l. 6. cont." Explanation: Seneca the Elder's Controversiae are rhetorical exercises on imagined legal cases. Porcius Latro was a celebrated declaimer. The second reference is incomplete as printed; Burton's editions and case numbering remain to be checked.

[361] Editor. The Tablet of Cebes is an allegorical description of a picture of human life. In §§5–6, those entering life receive a drink of ignorance and error from Deceit. "Vegetal, sensible, and rational" distinguishes vegetative life, sensation, and reason; Burton deliberately extends his diagnosis beyond individual people.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For indeed who is not a fool, melancholy, mad? —[362]Qui nil molitur inepte, who is not brain-sick? Folly, melancholy, madnes, are but one disease, Delirium is a common name to all. Alexander, Gordonius, Jason Pratensis, Savanarola, Guianerius, Montaltus, confound them as differing secundum magis & minus; so doth David, Psal. 37. 5. I said unto the fools, deal not so madly, & twas an old Stoicall Paradox, omnes stultos insanire,[363] all fools are mad, though some madder then others.	For who, indeed, is not foolish, melancholy, or mad? "Who undertakes nothing foolishly?" Who is not sick in the mind? Folly, melancholy, and madness are only one disease: "delirium" is a name common to them all. Alexander, Gordonius, Jason Pratensis, Savonarola, Guianerius, and Montaltus treat them together as differing "in degree."[364] So does David, Psalm 37:5: "I said to the fools, do not act so madly." And it was an old Stoic paradox that "all fools are mad"—all fools are mad, though some are madder than others.[365]

[362] Burton. Printed p. 18, x: "Horatius." Explanation: Horace, Ars poetica 140. There qui is relative, describing Homer as one who attempts nothing ineptly; Burton turns it into a question about humanity.

[363] Burton. Printed p. 18, y: "idem Hor. l. 2. Satyra 3. Damasippus Stoicus probat omnes stultos insanire." Translation: "The same author, Horace, book 2, satire 3. Damasippus the Stoic proves that all fools are mad." Explanation: Horace, Satires 2.3, especially 43–48. Damasippus reports the teaching of Stertinius; the satire stages and tests the Stoic equation of folly with madness.

[364] Editor. This is Burton's expansive historical use of melancholy and madness, drawing together medical, moral, and religious categories. The names are medical authorities; their precise works and the claimed agreement among them remain to be checked. "Delirium" here means mental derangement broadly, not a single modern diagnosis.

[365] Editor. The quotation corresponds to Psalm 75:4 in the King James Version, not the printed 37:5. Burton's references and his wording are preserved in both columns; the notes supply modern locations rather than replacing his quotations with a different Bible translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And who is not a fool, who is free from melancholy? Who is not touched more or lesse in habit or disposition? If in disposition, ill dispositions beget habits, if they persevere, saith [366]Plutarch, habits either are, or turn to diseases. Tis the same which Tully maintains in the second of his Tusculanes, omnium insipientum animi in morbo sunt, & perturbatorum, Fools are sick, and all that are troubled in minde:	And who is not a fool? Who is free from melancholy? Who is not affected by it, more or less, as an established condition or a passing disposition? If it is a disposition, bad dispositions become habits when they persist, says Plutarch; habits either are diseases or turn into them. Cicero maintains the same thing in the second book of his Tusculan Disputations: "The minds of all the unwise, and of all the disturbed, are diseased." Fools are sick, and so is everyone troubled in mind;[367]

[366] Burton. Printed p. 18, z: "Tom. 2. Sympos. lib. 5. c. 6. Animi affectiones, si diutius inhæreant, pravos generant habitus." Translation: "Volume 2, Table Talk, book 5, chapter 6. Affects of the mind, if they persist too long, produce bad habits." Explanation: Burton attributes the statement to Plutarch's Table Talk, book 5, chapter 6. The exact wording and location remain to be collated.

[367] Editor. "Habit" is an established condition; "disposition" can be a less settled state. The Cicero passage is Tusculan Disputations 3.4.9, not book 2. It says that all unwise minds are diseased; Burton adds the formulation about disturbed minds. Cicero subsequently distinguishes broad irrationality from violent frenzy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
for what is sickness, but as [368]Gregorie Tholosanus defines it, A dissolution or perturbation of the bodily league, which health combines: And who is not sick, or ill disposed? in whom doth not passion, anger, envy, discontent, fear and sorrow raign? Who labours not of this disease? Give me but a little leave, & you shall see by what testimonies, confessions, arguments I wil evince it, that most men are mad, that they had as much need to go a pilgrimage to the Anticyræ (as in [369]Strabos time they did) as in our daies they run to Compostella, our Lady of Sichem, or Lauretta, to seek for help; that it is like to be as prosperous a voyage as that of Guiana, and that there is much more need of Hellebor then of Tobacco.	for what is sickness but, as Gregorius of Toulouse defines it, a breaking or disturbing of the bodily alliance that health holds together? And who is not sick or unwell? In whom do passion, anger, envy, discontent, fear, and sorrow not rule? Who does not suffer from this disease? Give me a little time and you will see the evidence, admissions, and arguments by which I shall prove that most people are mad. They need to make a pilgrimage to the Anticyras—as people did in Strabo's time—as much as people now hurry to Compostela, Our Lady of Sichem, or Loreto for help. The voyage is likely to be as successful as the voyage to Guiana; and there is far more need for hellebore than for tobacco.[370]

[368] Burton. Printed p. 18, a: "Lib. 28 cap. 1. Synt. art. mir. Morbus nihil est aliud quam dissolutio quædam ac perturbatio fœderis in corpore existentis, sicut & sanitas est consentientis bene corporis consummatio quædam." Translation: "Book 28, chapter 1, Syntaxis artis mirabilis. Disease is nothing but a dissolution and disturbance of the alliance existing in the body, just as health is a kind of fulfilment of the body in harmonious agreement." Explanation: Gregorius Tholosanus is Pierre Grégoire of Toulouse; the abbreviated title refers to his Syntaxis artis mirabilis. The exact edition and quotation remain to be collated.

[369] Burton. Printed p. 18, b: "Lib. 9. Georg. Plures olim gentes navigabant illuc sanitatis causa." Translation: "Book 9, Geography. Formerly many people sailed there for their health." Explanation: Strabo, Geography 9.3.3, describes visitors seeking purgation and cure at Anticyra and the preparation of hellebore. "Georg." is retained as printed.

[370] Editor. The Anticyras were Greek places associated with hellebore. Compostela, Sichem, and Loreto are pilgrimage destinations. The passage compares travel for religious aid, medical purgation, and overseas discovery. "As prosperous" may be ironic; the exact Guiana expedition and force of the tobacco comparison remain to be established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That men are so misaffected, melancholy, mad, giddy-headed, hear the testimony of Solomon, Eccl. 2. 12. And I turned to behold wisdom, madness and folly, &c. And ver. 23. All his dayes are sorrow, his travel grief, and his heart taketh no rest in the night. So that take melancholy in what sense you will, properly or improperly, in disposition or habit, for pleasure or for pain, dotage, discontent, fear, sorrow, madnes, for part, or all, truly, or metaphorically, tis all one. Laughter it self is madnes according to Solomon, and as S. Paul hath it, worldly sorrow brings death. The hearts of the sons of men are evil, and madness is in their hearts while they live, Eccl. 9. 3.	To show that people are so disordered, melancholy, mad, and giddy-headed, hear Solomon's testimony, Ecclesiastes 2:12: "And I turned to consider wisdom, madness, and folly," and so on. And verse 23: "All his days are sorrow, his labour grief, and his heart takes no rest at night." So take melancholy in whatever sense you like—strictly or loosely, as a disposition or an established condition, involving pleasure or pain, delusion, discontent, fear, sorrow, or madness; for part of this or all of it, literally or metaphorically—it comes to the same thing. Laughter itself is madness, according to Solomon; and, as Saint Paul says, "Worldly sorrow brings death." "Human hearts are evil, and madness is in their hearts while they live," Ecclesiastes 9:3.[371]
Source page 18–19 Wise men themselves are no better, Ecc. 1. 18. In the multitude of wisdom is much grief, and he that increaseth wisdom increaseth sorrow. Cap. 2. 17. He hated life it self, nothing pleased him, he hated his labor, all, as [372]he concludes, is sorrow, grief, vanity, vexation of spirit. And though he were the wisest man in the world, sanctuarium sapientiæ, and had wisdom in abundance, he wil not vindicate himself, or justifie his own actions. Surely I am more foolish then any man, and have not the understanding of a man in me, Pro. 30. 2. Be they Solomons words, or the words of Agur the son of Jakeh, they are canonicall.	Wise people themselves are no better: Ecclesiastes 1:18, "In much wisdom there is much grief, and whoever increases wisdom increases sorrow." Chapter 2:17: he hated life itself; nothing pleased him; he hated his labour. Everything, he concludes, is sorrow, grief, emptiness, and vexation of spirit. And although he was the wisest man in the world, "a sanctuary of wisdom," possessing wisdom in abundance, he will not defend himself or justify his own actions. "Surely I am more foolish than anyone, and I do not have a human being's understanding," Proverbs 30:2. Whether these are Solomon's words or those of Agur son of Jakeh, they belong to the canon of Scripture.[373]

[371] Editor. The unnamed sayings are Ecclesiastes 2:2, on laughter, and 2 Corinthians 7:10, on worldly sorrow. Burton moves between literal illness and figurative folly; "tis all one" asserts the breadth of his argument rather than a careful medical distinction.

[372] Burton. Printed p. 18, c: "Eccles. 1. 24." Explanation: Ecclesiastes 1 has no verse 24 in standard modern numbering. The surrounding material corresponds to 1:18 and 2:17–23. The erroneous reference is retained.

[373] Editor. Ecclesiastes 2:18 concerns hatred of one's labour; 2:23 supplies sorrow and grief. Proverbs 30:1 names Agur, and 30:2 contains the confession Burton quotes. He acknowledges the difference of speaker but treats scriptural authority as decisive.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 19 David a man after Gods own heart, confesseth as much of himself, Psal. 37. 21, 22. So foolish was I and ignorant, I was even as a beast before thee. And condemns all for fools, Ps. 93. & 32. 9. & 49. 20. He compares them to beasts, horses, and mules, in which there is no understanding. The Apostle Paul accuseth himself in like sort, 2 Cor. 11. 21. I would you would suffer a little my foolishness, I speak foolishly. The whole head is sick saith Esay, and the heart is heavy, Cap. 1. 5. And makes slighter of them then of Oxen and Asses, The ox knows his owner, &c. reade Deut. 32. 6. Jer. 4. Amos 3. 1. Ephes. 5. 6. Be not mad, be not deceived, foolish Galatians, who hath bewitched you? How often are they branded with this Epithet of madnesse and folly? No word so frequent amongst the fathers of the Church and Divines; you may see what an opinion they had of the world, and how they valued mens actions.	David, a man after God's own heart, admits as much of himself, Psalm 37:21–22: "I was so foolish and ignorant; I was like a beast before you." He condemns everyone as foolish in Psalms 93, 32:9, and 49:20, comparing them to beasts, horses, and mules without understanding.[374] The apostle Paul accuses himself similarly, 2 Corinthians 11:21: "I wish you would bear with a little foolishness from me; I speak foolishly." "The whole head is sick," says Isaiah, "and the heart is heavy," chapter 1:5. He makes less of them than of oxen and donkeys: "The ox knows its owner," and so on. Read Deuteronomy 32:6, Jeremiah 4, Amos 3:1, Ephesians 5:6. "Do not be mad; do not be deceived. Foolish Galatians, who has bewitched you?" How often they are branded as mad and foolish! No word occurs more frequently among the Church Fathers and theologians; you can see their opinion of the world and their estimate of human conduct.[375]

[374] Editor. "Psalm 37:21–22" should point to Psalm 73:21–22; the confession occurs at verse 22. The "Psalm 93" reference may point to 94:8, which addresses fools, but remains uncertain. Psalms 32:9 and 49:20 contain the animal comparisons. Psalm 73's heading names Asaph; Burton calls its speaker David.

[375] Editor. The Pauline quotation combines 2 Corinthians 11:1 with 11:21. Isaiah 1:3 supplies the ox and donkey, and 1:5 the sick head and faint heart. The final appeal includes Galatians 3:1; Ephesians 5:6 concerns deception. Burton's abbreviated chain is retained without pretending that every phrase comes from the immediately preceding reference.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I know that we think far otherwise, and hold them most part wise men that are in authority, princes, magistrates, [376]rich men, they are wise men born, all Politicians and State-men must needs be so, for who dare speak against them? And on the other, so corrupt is our judgment, we esteem wise and honest men fools. Which Democritus wel signified in an Epistle of his to Hyppocrates: [377]The Abderites account vertue madnesse, and so do most men living.	I know we think very differently. We generally consider those in authority—princes, magistrates, rich men—to be wise: they are born wise! All politicians and statesmen must be so, for who dares speak against them? On the other hand, our judgement is so corrupt that we consider wise and honest people fools. Democritus expressed this well in a letter to Hippocrates: "The people of Abdera consider virtue madness"—and so do most people alive.[378]

[376] Burton. Printed p. 19, d: "Jure hereditario sapere jubentur. Euphormio Satyr." Translation: "They are ordered to be wise by hereditary right. Euphormio, Satire." Explanation: The abbreviated citation points to Euphormio's satire; the precise passage is not yet located.

[377] Burton. Printed p. 19, e: "Apud quos virtus, insania & furor esse dicitur." Translation: "Among them virtue is said to be madness and frenzy." Explanation: A quotation attributed in the body to Democritus's letter to Hippocrates; the exact Latin version and letter remain to be located.

[378] Editor. The letters between Hippocrates and Democritus belong to the ancient pseudonymous Hippocratic correspondence, rather than secure surviving letters by those historical figures. Burton uses them as part of the literary tradition of the laughing philosopher; the exact letter behind this sentence remains to be established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Shall I tell you the reason of it? [379]Fortune and Vertue, Wisdom and Folly, their seconds, upon a time contended in the Olympicks; Every man thought that fortune and folly would have the worst, and pitied their cases. But it fell out otherwise. Fortune was blind and cared not where she stroke, nor whom, without laws, Andabatarum instar, &c. Folly rash and inconsiderate, esteemed as little what she said or did. Vertue and Wisdom gave [380]place, were hissed out, and exploded by the common people: folly and fortune admired, and so are all their followers ever since: knaves and fools commonly fare and deserve best in worldlings eyes & opinions.	Shall I tell you why? Fortune and Virtue once competed at the Olympic Games, with Wisdom and Folly as their seconds. Everyone thought Fortune and Folly would lose, and pitied them. But it turned out otherwise. Fortune was blind and cared neither where nor whom she struck, following no rules, "like blindfolded gladiators." Folly, rash and thoughtless, cared as little what she said or did. Virtue and Wisdom gave way; the crowd hissed and jeered them off. Folly and Fortune were admired, as all their followers have been ever since: rogues and fools generally prosper most and, in worldly people's eyes and opinions, deserve most.[381]

[379] Burton. Printed p. 19, f: "Calcagninus Apol. omnes mirabantur, putantes illusam iri stultitiam. Sed præter expectatione res evenit, Audax stultitia in eam irruit, &c. illa cedit irrisa, & plures hinc habet sectatores stultitia." Translation: "Calcagnini, Apologues. Everyone marvelled, thinking Folly would be made a laughingstock. But things turned out contrary to expectation: bold Folly rushed upon her, and so on; she withdrew, mocked, and hence Folly has more followers." Explanation: Attributed to Celio Calcagnini's Apologues. The exact apologue remains to be collated; the printed "expectatione" is retained.

[380] Burton. Printed p. 19, g: "Non est respondendum stulto secundum stultitiam." Translation: "One should not answer a fool according to his folly." Explanation: Compare Proverbs 26:4. The next verse gives the contrasting instruction to answer a fool according to his folly; Burton uses the first maxim.

[381] Editor. The sequence of names is retained as printed; the tale pairs Fortune with Folly and Virtue with Wisdom. "Andabatae" are conventionally described as gladiators fighting without sight. "Exploded" means driven off by noisy disapproval, not blown up. The crowd's acclaim reverses the expected relation between merit and success.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many good men have no better fate in their ages: Achish, 1 Sam. 21. 14. held David for a mad-man. [382]Elisha & the rest were no otherwise esteemed. David was derided of the common people, Ps. 9. 7. I am become a monster to many. And generally we are accounted fools for Christ, 1 Cor. 14. We fools thought his life madnesse, and his end without honour, Wisd. 5. 4. Christ and his Apostles were censured in like sort, John 10. Mark 3. Acts 26. And so were all christians in [383]Pliny's time, fuerunt & alii similis dementiæ, &c. And called not long after, [384]Vesaniæ sectatores, eversores hominum, polluti novatores, fanatici, canes, malefici, venefici, Galilæi homunciones, &c.	Many good men fare no better in their own times. Achish, 1 Samuel 21:14, took David for a madman. Elisha and the others were regarded in the same way. David was mocked by the common people, Psalm 9:7: "I have become a monster to many." Generally, we are considered fools for Christ, 1 Corinthians 14. "We fools thought his life madness, and his end without honour," Wisdom 5:4. Christ and his apostles were judged similarly: John 10, Mark 3, Acts 26.[385] So were all Christians in Pliny's time: "There were others too with the same madness," and so on. Not long afterwards they were called "followers of madness, destroyers of humankind, polluted innovators, fanatics, dogs, evildoers, poisoners, insignificant Galileans," and so on.

[382] Burton. Printed p. 19, h: "2 Reg. 7." Explanation: "Reg." abbreviates Kings. The explicit insult "mad fellow" directed at a prophetic messenger occurs at 2 Kings 9:11, not chapter 7. Burton's printed reference is preserved.

[383] Burton. Printed p. 19, i: "Lib. 10. ep. 97." Explanation: Pliny's letter to Trajan on Christians is 10.96 in the numbering consulted, with the relevant words at §4: fuerunt alii similis amentiae. Burton prints dementiæ and adds et ("also"). Letter 10.97 is Trajan's reply; earlier numbering may differ.

[384] Burton. Printed p. 19, k: "Aug. ep. 178." Explanation: Augustine, Letter 178, as numbered by Burton. The edition, modern correspondence, and source of this catalogue of insults remain unverified. "Venefici" may mean poisoners or sorcerers; the modern column chooses the former.

[385] Editor. "Psalm 9:7" corresponds to Psalm 71:7, where the speaker is a wonder to many. "Fools for Christ" is 1 Corinthians 4:10, not chapter 14. Relevant accusations occur at John 10:20, Mark 3:21, and Acts 26:24. "Monster" is preserved as Burton's more strongly charged wording; his citations remain visible as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tis an ordinary thing with us, to account honest, devout, orthodox, divine, religious, plain-dealing men, idiots, asses, that cannot, or will not ly and dissemble, shift, flatter, accommodare se ad eum locum ubi nati sunt, make good bargains, supplant, thrive, patronis inservire; solennes ascendendi modos apprehendere, leges, mores, consuetudines recte observare, candide laudare, fortiter defendere, sententias amplecti, dubitare de nullis, credere omnia, accipere omnia, nihil reprehendere, cæteraque quæ promotionem ferunt & securitatem, quæ sine ambage fœlicem reddunt hominem, & vere sapientem apud nos; That cannot temporize as other men do, [386]hand and take bribes, &c. but fear God, and make a conscience of their doings.	We commonly count honest, devout, orthodox, godly, religious, plain-dealing people as idiots and asses if they cannot or will not lie, dissemble, scheme, flatter, "adapt themselves to the place where they were born," strike good bargains, push others aside, prosper, "serve patrons, learn the customary ways of rising, duly observe laws, manners, and customs, praise wholeheartedly, defend stoutly, embrace opinions, doubt nothing, believe everything, accept everything, criticize nothing, and do all the other things that bring advancement and security, that unfailingly make a person fortunate and truly wise in our estimation." They cannot trim their conduct to circumstances as others do, give and take bribes, and so on, but fear God and act conscientiously.[387]
Source page 19–20 But the holy Ghost that knowes better how to judge, he cals them fools. The fool hath said in his heart, Psal. 53. 1. And their wayes utter their folly, Psal. 49. 14. [388]For what can be more mad, than for a litle worldly pleasure to procure unto themselves eternall punishment? As Gregorie and others inculcate unto us.	But the Holy Spirit, who knows better how to judge, calls those worldly people fools. "The fool has said in his heart," Psalm 53:1; "And their ways reveal their folly," Psalm 49:14.[389] For what could be madder than to bring eternal punishment upon themselves for a little worldly pleasure? As Gregory and others repeatedly teach us.

[386] Burton. Printed p. 19, l: "Quis nisi mentis inops, &c." Translation: "Who, unless lacking sense, and so on." Explanation: No author or work is supplied. The fragment gives an ironic rationale for accommodating oneself to worldly advancement.

[387] Editor. The catalogue is ironic: society calls accommodating opportunists wise and conscientious people foolish. "Hand and take bribes" is interpreted as giving and receiving bribes. The Latin list is translated in full; its source, if it is a quotation rather than Burton's composition, remains unlocated.

[388] Burton. Printed p. 20, m: "Quid insanius quam pro momentanea felicitate æternis te mancipare suppliciis?" Translation: "What could be madder than to give yourself over to eternal punishments for momentary happiness?" Explanation: The body attributes the maxim to Gregory and others, without a work or passage number. The precise source remains unlocated.

[389] Editor. "Them" refers back to the worldly people admired for success, not the conscientious people they ridicule. Psalm 53:1 continues by denying God; Burton quotes only its opening. "Their ways utter their folly" corresponds to Psalm 49:13 in modern King James numbering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 20 Yea even all those great Philosophers, the world hath ever had in admiration, whose works we do so much esteem, that gave precepts of wisdom to others, inventers of Arts and Sciences, Socrates the wisest man of his time by the Oracle of Apollo, whom his two Scholars [390]Plato and [391]Xenophon so much extol and magnifie with those honourable titles best and wisest of all mortal men, the happiest, and most just; and as [392]Alcibiades incomparably commends him; Achilles was a worthy man, but Brasides and others were as worthy as himself; Antenor and Nestor were as good as Pericles, and so of the rest, but none present, before, or after Socrates, nemo veterum neque eorum qui nunc sunt, were ever such, will match, or come neer him.	Yes, even all those great philosophers whom the world has always admired, whose works we value so highly, who gave others rules of wisdom and invented arts and sciences: Socrates, judged by Apollo's oracle the wisest man of his time, whom his two pupils Plato and Xenophon so greatly praise and exalt with such honourable titles as best and wisest of all mortals, happiest and most just; whom Alcibiades praises as beyond comparison. Achilles was a worthy man, but Brasidas and others were just as worthy; Antenor and Nestor were as good as Pericles, and so with the rest. But no one now, before, or after Socrates —"no one among the ancients or those now living"—ever was, will be, or comes close to his equal.

[390] Burton. Printed p. 20, n: "In fine Phædonis. Hic finis fuit amici nostri, ô Eucrates, nostro quidem judicio omnium quos experti sumus optimi, & apprime sapientissimi, & justissimi." Translation: "At the end of the Phaedo. This was the end of our friend, O Eucrates, who in our judgement was the best of all we have known, and supremely wise and just." Explanation: Plato, Phaedo 118a. The addressee is Echecrates, not the printed "Eucrates." The note's Latin is retained.

[391] Burton. Printed p. 20, o: "Xenop. l. 4. de dictis Socratis ad finem, talis fuit Socrates quem omnium optimum & felicissimum statuam." Translation: "Xenophon, book 4, On the Sayings of Socrates, at the end: such was Socrates, whom I would judge the best and happiest of all." Explanation: Xenophon, Memorabilia, end of book 4. The exact Latin translator remains to be identified.

[392] Burton. Printed p. 20, asterisk: "Lib. 25. Platonis Convivio." Explanation: The comparison is in Alcibiades's speech in Plato's Symposium, 221c–d. "Lib. 25." is retained; its numbering has not been reconciled.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Those seven wise men of Greece, those Britain Druides, Indian Brachmanni, Æthiopian Gymnosophists, Magi of the Persians, Apollonius, of whom Philostratus, Non doctus sed natus sapiens, wise from his cradle, Epicurus so much admired by his Scholar Lucretius; Qui genus humanum ingenio superavit, & omnes Perstrinxit Stellas exortus ut ætherius Sol. Whose wit excel'd the wits of men as far, As the Sun rising doth obsure a Star. Or that so much renowned Empedocles, [393]Ut vix humana videatur stirpe creatus.	Those Seven Sages of Greece, those British Druids, Indian Brahmans, Ethiopian naked philosophers, Persian Magi; Apollonius, of whom Philostratus says, "Not taught to be wise, but born wise"—wise from his cradle; Epicurus, so admired by his disciple Lucretius: Who surpassed humankind in intellect, and dazzled all the stars like the rising heavenly sun. Whose wit surpassed the wits of men as far as the rising sun obscures a star. Or that celebrated Empedocles: So that he scarcely seems born of human stock.[394]

[393] Burton. Printed p. 20, asterisk: "Lucretius." Explanation: On the Nature of Things 1.733, in praise of Empedocles. The preceding verses praising Epicurus are 3.1043–1044; the consulted Latin reads restinxit ("extinguished"), whereas Burton prints Perstrinxit ("dazzled").

[394] Editor. "Gymnosophists" literally means naked philosophers; Burton applies the term to Ethiopian sages. Lucretius lived after Epicurus: "Scholar" here means an intellectual disciple. Both the translated Latin couplet and Burton's following English couplet are retained. The original prints "obsure," understood as "obscure." The Philostratus wording has not yet been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All those, of whom we read such [395]Hyperbolicall elogiums; as of Aristotle, that he was wisdom it self in the abstract, a Miracle of nature, breathing libraries, as Eunapius of Longinus, lights of nature, gyants for wit, quintessence of wit, divine spirits, eagles in the clouds, faln from heaven, gods, spirits, lamps of the world, dictators, Nulla ferant talem secla futura virum: Monarchs, miracles, superintendents of wit and learning, [396]Oceanus, Phœnix, Atlas, Monstrum, portentum hominis, orbis universi musæum, ultimus humanæ naturæ conatus, naturæ maritus, ———merito cui doctior orbis Submissis defert fascibus imperium.	All those of whom we read such extravagant praises: Aristotle, for example, said to be wisdom itself in the abstract, a miracle of nature; breathing libraries, as Eunapius calls Longinus; lights of nature, giants of intellect, the pure essence of wit, divine spirits, eagles in the clouds, fallen from heaven, gods, spirits, lamps of the world, dictators— May no future age bring forth such a man: monarchs, miracles, overseers of intellect and learning, an ocean, a phoenix, an Atlas, a marvel, a prodigy of a man, a treasury of the whole world, human nature's ultimate achievement, nature's husband— to whom the learned world rightly yields command, lowering its rods of office.[397]

[395] Burton. Printed p. 20, p: "Anaxagoras olim mens dictus ab antiquis." Translation: "Anaxagoras was formerly called Mind by the ancients." Explanation: Anaxagoras's epithet "Mind" is added in the margin to the catalogue of exaggerated praise. No work is cited.

[396] Burton. Printed p. 20, q: "Regula naturæ, naturæ miraculum, ipsa eruditio, dæmonium hominis, sol scientiarum, mare, Sophia, antistes literarum & sapientiæ, ut Scioppius olim de Scal. & Hensius, Aquila in nubibus, Imperator literatorum, columen literarum, abyssus eruditionis, ocellus Europæ, Scaliger." Translation: "Nature's rule, nature's miracle, learning itself, a prodigy of a man, the sun of the sciences, a sea, Wisdom, high priest of letters and wisdom—as Scioppius once said of Scaliger, and Heinsius—an eagle in the clouds, emperor of scholars, pillar of letters, abyss of learning, Europe's darling: Scaliger." Explanation: An additional catalogue of learned praise, mentioning Scioppius, Scaliger, and Heinsius. The allocation of each epithet and the exact sources remain to be checked; Sophia is Greek for wisdom.

[397] Editor. The catalogue mixes classical and Renaissance praise. Atlas bears the heavens; the phoenix is a singular marvellous bird. The fasces were bundles of rods signifying Roman authority; lowering them represents submission. The sources of the two verse passages and the precise Eunapius wording remain to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As Ælian writ of Protagoras and Gorgias, we may say of them all, tantum à sapientibus abfuerunt, quantum à viris pueri, they were children in respect, infants, not eagles but kites; novices, illiterate, Eunuchi sapientiæ. And although they were the wisest, and most admired in their ages, as he censured Alexander, I do them, there were 10000 in his army as worthy Captains (had they been in place of command) as valiant as himself; there were Myriades of men wiser in those dayes, & yet all short of what they ought to be.	As Aelian wrote of Protagoras and Gorgias, we may say of them all: "They were as far from wise men as boys are from grown men." By comparison they were children, infants; not eagles but kites; beginners, uneducated, "eunuchs of wisdom." And although they were the wisest and most admired people of their times, I judge them as he judged Alexander: ten thousand men in his army could have been equally capable commanders, if placed in command, and just as brave. There were countless wiser men in those days, and yet all fell short of what they ought to have been.[398]

[398] Editor. "Kites" are birds contrasted disparagingly with eagles. "Eunuchs of wisdom" is an insult suggesting intellectual sterility. Aelian's statements about the sophists and Alexander have not yet been located precisely; the argument is presented as Burton's use of them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[399]Lactantius in his book of wisdom, proves them to be dizards, fools, asses, mad-men, so full of absurd and ridiculous tenents, and brain-sick positions, that to his thinking never any old woman or sick person doted worse. [400]Democritus took all from Leucippus, and left, saith he, the inheritance of his folly to Epicurus, [401]insanienti dum sapientiæ, &c. The like he holds of Plato, Aristippus, and the rest, making no difference [402]betwixt them and beasts, saving that they could speak.	In his book on wisdom, Lactantius proves them to be simpletons, fools, asses, and madmen, so full of absurd and ridiculous doctrines and deranged propositions that, in his view, no old woman or sick person ever wandered further in their thinking. Democritus learned everything from Leucippus and, he says, left the inheritance of his folly to Epicurus, "while straying into mad philosophy," and so on. He thinks the same of Plato, Aristippus, and the rest, finding no difference between them and beasts, except that they could speak.[403]

[399] Burton. Printed p. 20, r: "Lib. 3. de sap. c. 17. & 20. omnes Philosophi, aut stulti, aut insani; nulla anus, nullus æger ineptius deliravit." Translation: "Book 3, On Wisdom, chapters 17 and 20. All philosophers are either fools or madmen; no old woman or sick person ever raved more foolishly." Explanation: Lactantius, Divine Institutes, book 3, On False Wisdom, chapters 17 and 20. The consulted translation confirms the attack on philosophical systems; exact Latin collation remains outstanding.

[400] Burton. Printed p. 20, s: "Democritus à Leucippo doctus, hereditatem stultitiæ reliquit Epic." Translation: "Democritus, taught by Leucippus, left Epicurus the inheritance of his folly." Explanation: Lactantius, Divine Institutes 3.17, explicitly gives this succession in his attack on atomism.

[401] Burton. Printed p. 20, t: "Hor. car. lib. 1. od. 34. 1. epicur." Explanation: Horace, Odes 1.34.2–3: insanientis dum sapientiae consultus erro. Burton prints the incomplete and grammatically difficult "insanienti dum sapientiæ." The modern rendering supplies the sense from the fuller line; the original is not silently corrected. The trailing "1. epicur." is preserved without confident expansion.

[402] Burton. Printed p. 20, u: "Nihil interest inter hos & bestias nisi quod loquantur. de sal. 26. c. 8." Translation: "There is no difference between these men and beasts except that they speak." Explanation: The Latin repeats the body's comparison. The abbreviated reference is retained as printed and remains unresolved.

[403] Editor. Burton adopts the polemical vocabulary of Lactantius's Christian attack on pagan philosophy, then inserts Horace into that argument. "Old woman" and the animal comparison are inherited terms of disparagement, not neutral descriptions of intellectual capacity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 20–21 [404]Theodoret in his tract De cur. græc. affect. manifestly evinces as much of Socrates, whom though that Oracle of Apollo confirmed to be the wisest man then living, and saved him from the plague, whom 2000 years have admired, of whom some will as soon speak evil as of Christ, yet re vera he was an illiterate idiot, as [405]Aristophanes cals him, irrisor & ambitiosus, as his Master Aristotle terms him, scurra Atticus, as Zeno, an [406]enemy to all arts & sciences, as Atheneus, to Philosophers & Travellers, an opinative asse, a caviller, a kinde of Pedant; for his manners, as Theod. Cyrensis describes him, a [407]Sodomite, an Athiest, (so convict by Anytus) iracundus & ebrius, dicax, &c. a pot-companion, by Plato's* own confession, a sturdy drinker; and that of all others he was most sottish, a very mad-man in his actions and opinions.	In his treatise The Cure of Greek Maladies, Theodoret plainly demonstrates as much about Socrates. Apollo's oracle declared him the wisest man alive and saved him from the plague; two thousand years have admired him, and some would as readily speak ill of Christ as of him. Yet "in truth" he was an uneducated idiot, as Aristophanes calls him; "a mocker and an ambitious man," as his master Aristotle calls him; "an Attic buffoon," according to Zeno; an enemy of all arts and sciences, according to Athenaeus, and of philosophers and travellers; an opinionated ass, a quibbler, a sort of pedant.[408] As for his conduct, Theodoret of Cyrrhus describes him as a sodomite and an atheist—convicted as such by Anytus—"angry, drunken, sharp-tongued," and so on; a drinking companion, a mighty drinker by Plato's own admission; the most foolish of all, thoroughly mad in his actions and opinions.[409]

[404] Burton. Printed p. 20, x: "Cap. de virt." Explanation: "Chapter on virtue," referring to Theodoret's Cure of Greek Maladies. The precise section and Burton's Latin edition remain to be collated.

[405] Burton. Printed p. 21, y: "Neb. & Ranis" Explanation: Aristophanes, Clouds and Frogs. Burton gives titles but no lines; the exact basis for his characterization remains to be established.

[406] Burton. Printed p. 21, z: "Omnium disciplinarum ignarus." Translation: "Ignorant of all branches of learning." Explanation: The marginal wording says "ignorant," whereas the body says "enemy"; both are preserved.

[407] Burton. Printed p. 21, asterisk: "Pulchrorum adolescentum caussa frequenter gymnasium obibat, &c." Translation: "He frequently visited the gymnasium for the sake of handsome young men, and so on." Explanation: Attached to the hostile sexual allegation about Socrates. Another asterisk precedes "Plato's own confession" in the body, but no separate marginal entry is visible there; that asterisk is retained in the original column.

[408] Editor. The hostile catalogue is retained as Burton's account of other writers. Aristotle was born after Socrates died, so "his Master Aristotle" cannot describe an actual teacher–pupil relationship. The phrase is retained; its intended force still needs clarification.

[409] Editor. "Sodomite" and "atheist" are accusations in Burton's polemic. Plato's Symposium 214a and 220a portrays Socrates as able to drink much without becoming drunk; Burton makes this serve a hostile account. The exact Theodoret and other source passages require collation before their assertions can be accepted as biographical evidence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 21 Pythagoras was part philosopher, part magician, or part witch. If you desire to hear more of Apollonius a great wise man, sometime parallel'd by Julian the apostate to Christ, I refer you to that learned tract of Eusebius against Hyerocles, and for them all to Lucians Piscator, Icaromenippus, Necyomantia: their actions, opinions in general were so prodigious, absurd, ridiculous, which they broached and maintained, their books and elaborate Treatises were full of dotage, which Tully ad Atticum, long since observed, delirant plerumque scriptores in libris suis, their lives being opposite to their words, they commended poverty to others, and were most covetous themselves, extolled love and peace, and yet persecuted one another with virulent hate and malice.	Pythagoras was part philosopher, part magician —or part witch. If you want to hear more about Apollonius, a great sage whom Julian the Apostate once compared with Christ, I refer you to Eusebius's learned treatise against Hierocles; and for all of them, to Lucian's The Fisherman, Icaromenippus, and Necyomancy.[410] Their actions and the opinions they put forward and defended were generally so monstrous, absurd, and ridiculous; their books and elaborate treatises were full of delusion. Cicero observed this long ago in his letters to Atticus: "Writers generally rave in their books." Their lives contradicted their words: they recommended poverty to others while being supremely greedy themselves, praised love and peace, yet persecuted one another with bitter hatred and malice.[411]

[410] Editor. Eusebius's Against Hierocles answers Hierocles's comparison of Apollonius with Jesus. That checked connection does not verify Burton's separate attribution of such a comparison to Julian. Lucian's named works ridicule philosophical pretensions; the exact passages intended here remain to be traced.

[411] Editor. The precise passage in Cicero's Letters to Atticus remains unlocated. Burton's contrast is between professed ethical principles and the philosophers' alleged conduct; the translation retains his sweeping claim.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They could give precepts for verse and prose, but not a man of them (as [412]Seneca tels them home) could moderate his affections. Their musick did shew us flebiles modos, &c. how to rise and fall, but they could not so contain themselves as in adversity not to make a lamentable tone. They will measure ground by Geometrie, set down limits, divide and subdivide, but cannot yet prescribe quantum homini satis, or keep within compasse of reason and discretion. They can square circles, but understand not the state of their own souls, describe right lines, and crooked, &c. but know not what is right in this life, quid in vita rectum sit, ignorant; so that as he said, Nescio an Anticyram ratio illis destinet omnem. I think all the Anticyræ will not restore them to their wits;	They could give rules for verse and prose, but not one of them—as Seneca tells them bluntly—could control his feelings. Their music taught us "plaintive melodies," and how to rise and fall, yet they could not restrain themselves from striking a lamentable note in adversity. They measure land by geometry, mark boundaries, divide and subdivide, yet cannot determine "how much is enough for a person," or keep within the bounds of reason and judgement. They can square circles, but do not understand the condition of their own souls; draw straight and crooked lines, but do not know what is right in life: "they do not know what is right in life." So, as the poet said, I wonder whether reason would allot them all Anticyra. I think all the Anticyras will not bring them to their senses;[413]
[414]if these men now, that held [415]Xenodotus heart, Crates liver, Epictetus lanthorn, were so sottish, and had no more brains then so many beetles, what shall we think of the commonalty? what of the rest?	if these men, who possessed Xenodotus's heart, Crates's liver, and Epictetus's lamp, were so foolish, with no more brains than so many beetles, what should we think of ordinary people? What of everyone else?[416]

[412] Burton. Printed p. 21, unlettered: "Seneca. Scis rotunda metiri, sed non tuum animum." Translation: "Seneca. You know how to measure round objects, but not your own mind." Explanation: Seneca, Letters 88.9–13, supplies the music and geometry comparisons. This marginal sentence compresses his discussion rather than reproducing one complete sentence.

[413] Editor. Seneca, Letters 88.9–13, contrasts technical accomplishments with the art of living well. The final line is Horace, Satires 2.3.83, assigning all Anticyra's hellebore to the greedy. Burton's own following English strengthens this into the claim that even all the Anticyras would not cure them; both versions are retained.

[414] Burton. Printed p. 21, a: "Ab uberibus sapientiæ lactati cæcutire non possunt." Translation: "Those suckled at wisdom's breasts cannot be dim-sighted." Explanation: The claim is used ironically: intellectual nurture is supposed to guarantee sound judgement.

[415] Burton. Printed p. 21, b: "Cor Xenodoti & jecur Cratetis." Translation: "Xenodotus's heart and Crates's liver." Explanation: The heart and liver stand for intellectual gifts; Burton gives no source. The exact proverbial reference and the name-form Xenodotus remain to be traced.

[416] Editor. The combination imagines possession of proverbial intellectual gifts and a philosopher's equipment. Lucian, The Ignorant Book Collector 13, mocks a buyer who hoped Epictetus's lamp would confer wisdom. This is a relevant parallel, not proof of Burton's exact source for the whole list.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yea, but will you infer, that is true of heathens, if they be conferred with Christians, 1 Cor. 3. 19. The wisdom of this world is foolishnesse with God, earthly and devillish, as James cals it, 3. 15. They were vain in their imaginations, and their foolish heart was full of darknesse, Rom. 1. 21, 22. When they professed themselves wise, became fools. Their witty works are admired here on earth, whilest their souls are tormented in hell fire.	Yes, but you will object: that is true of pagans when compared with Christians. First Corinthians 3:19: "The wisdom of this world is foolishness with God"—"earthly and devilish," as James calls it, 3:15. "Their thinking became futile, and their foolish hearts were filled with darkness," Romans 1:21–22. "Professing themselves wise, they became fools." Their ingenious works are admired here on earth while their souls are tormented in hellfire.
Source page 21–22 In some sense, Christiani Crassiani, Christians are Crassians, & if compared to that wisdom, no better then fools. Quis est sapiens? Solus Deus, Pythagoras* replies, God is only wise, Rom. 16. Paul determines only good, as [417]Austine well contends, and no man living can be justified in his sight. God looked down from heaven upon the children of men, to see if any did understand, Psalm 53. 2, 3. but all are corrupt, erre. Rom. 3. 12. None doth good, no not one. Job aggravates this, 4. 18. Behold he found no stedfastnesse in his servants, and laid folly upon his angels, 19. How much more on them that dwell in houses of clay? In this sense we are all as fools, and the [418]Scripture alone is arx Minervæ, we and our writings are shallow and unperfect.	In one sense, "Christians are Crassians"—Christians are dullards—and, compared with that wisdom, no better than fools. "Who is wise? God alone," Pythagoras replies. "God alone is wise," Paul declares in Romans 16; alone good, as Augustine rightly argues; "and no living person can be justified in his sight."[419] "God looked down from heaven upon humankind to see whether anyone understood," Psalm 53:2–3; but all are corrupt and go astray. Romans 3:12: "No one does good, not even one." Job intensifies this, 4:18: "Look: he found no constancy in his servants, and charged his angels with folly," and verse 19: "How much more those who dwell in houses of clay?" In this sense we are all fools, and Scripture alone is "Minerva's citadel"; we and our writings are shallow and imperfect.[420]

[417] Burton. Printed p. 21, asterisk: "Lib. de nat. boni." Explanation: Augustine, On the Nature of Good, chapter 1, describes God as the highest, unchangeable good and created goods as deriving from him. The printed asterisk stands before Pythagoras, but the title fits the ensuing Augustine reference; its placement is retained on the left and the note attached here for clarity.

[418] Burton. Printed p. 22, c: "Hic profundissimæ Sophiæ fodinæ." Translation: "Here are the deepest mines of wisdom." Explanation: Sophia means wisdom; the mining image develops Scripture as its inexhaustible source.

[419] Editor. "Crassians" is rendered here as "dullards," taking the wordplay on Christians to evoke Latin crassus, thick or dull; its precise literary source remains unlocated. Romans 16:27 calls God alone wise, and Psalm 143:2 says no living person is justified in God's sight. The Pythagoras saying remains to be traced.

[420] Editor. Job 4:18–19 occurs in Eliphaz's speech, not a speech by Job. Burton's "Job" may name the biblical book. "Minerva's citadel" turns the classical goddess of wisdom into an image of scriptural authority. The block ends before Burton insists that folly is universal even in ordinary dealings, not only in comparison with God.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 22 But I do not so mean; even in our ordinary dealings, we are no better then fools. All our actions, as [421]Pliny told Trajan, upbraid us of folly, our whole course of life is but matter of laughter: we are not soberly wise; and the world it self, which ought at least to be wise by reason of his antiquity, as [422]Hugo de Prato Florido will have it, semper stultizat; is every day more foolish then other; the more it is whipped, the worse it is, and as a child, will still be crowned with roses and flowers. We are apish in it, asini bipedes, and every place is full inversorum Apuleiorum, of metamorphosed and two-legged asses, inversorum Silenorum, childish, pueri instar bimuli, tremulâ patris dormientis in ulnâ.	But that is not all I mean: even in our everyday dealings, we are no better than fools. All our actions, as Pliny told Trajan, reproach us for our folly; the whole course of our lives is material for laughter. We lack sober judgement. The world itself, which should at least have grown wise with age, as Hugo de Prato Florido maintains, "keeps acting foolishly": it grows more foolish every day; the more it is whipped, the worse it becomes, and like a child it still wants a crown of roses and flowers. We play the ape in it, "two-legged asses," and everywhere is full "of Apuleiuses turned upside down"—transformed, two-legged asses—"of reversed Silenuses," childish, "like a two-year-old child sleeping in his father's rocking arm."[423]

[421] Burton. Printed p. 22, d: "Panegyr. Trajano omnes actiones exprobrare stultitiam videntur." Translation: "All actions seem to reproach us for our folly." Explanation: Pliny, Panegyric to Trajan. The exact passage has not been located in the Latin text consulted; the attribution remains provisional.

[422] Burton. Printed p. 22, e: "Ser. 4. in domi Pal. Mundus qui ob antiquitatem deberet esse sapiens, semper stultizat, & nullis flagellis alteratur, sed ut puer vult rosis & floribus coronari." Translation: "The world, which ought to be wise because of its age, always acts foolishly and is changed by no scourging, but like a child wants to be crowned with roses and flowers." Explanation: Hugo de Prato Florido; the abbreviation appears to mean sermon 4 for Palm Sunday. The precise sermon and wording await collation.

[423] Editor. Apuleius's Golden Ass transforms its narrator Lucius into an ass; Burton uses the author's name for his creature. The reversed transformation suggests human exteriors with asinine minds. Silenus figures, compared with Socrates in Plato's Symposium 215a–b, conceal divine images inside an unprepossessing exterior; "reversed" figures invert that contrast. The child quotation is Catullus 17.12–13.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Jovianus Pontanus, Antonio Dial, brings in some laughing at an old man, that by reason of his age was a little fond; but as he admonisheth there, Ne mireris mi hospes de hoc sene, marvel not at him only, for tota hæc civitas delirium, all our Town dotes in like sort. [424]we are a company of fools. Ask not with him in the Poet, [425]Larvæ hunc intemperiæ insaniæque agitant senem? What madnesse ghosts this old man, but what madnesse ghosts us all? For we are ad unum omnes, all mad, semel insanivimus omnes, not once, but alway so, & semel, & simul, & semper, ever and altogether as bad as he; and not senex bis puer, delira anus, but say it of us all, semper pueri, yong and old, all dote as Lactantius proves out of Seneca;	In his dialogue Antonius, Giovanni Pontano presents some people laughing at an old man whose age had made him a little foolish. But, as he warns there, "Do not wonder, my guest, at this old man"—do not marvel at him alone, for "this whole city is delirium": our whole town is equally deluded. We are a company of fools.[426] Do not ask, with the character in the poet, "Do ghosts, frenzy, and madness torment this old man?" What madness haunts this old man? Ask what madness haunts us all. For we are "every last one of us" mad; "we have all been mad once"—not once, but always, "once, and together, and always", continually and collectively as bad as he is. Do not say "an old man is twice a child" or "a doting old woman," but say of us all, "always children": young and old are all deluded, as Lactantius demonstrates from Seneca;[427]

[424] Burton. Printed p. 22, f: "Insanum te omnes pueri, clamantque puellæ. Hor." Translation: "All the boys and girls cry that you are mad." Explanation: Horace, Satires 2.3.130; the text consulted has clamentque, where Burton prints clamantque.

[425] Burton. Printed p. 22, g: "Plautus Aubular." Explanation: The printed title is retained. The body quotation comes from Plautus, Aulularia, act 4, scene 4, line 642. Burton omits atque after hunc and gives the statement a question mark.

[426] Editor. Jovianus Pontanus is Giovanni Pontano. "Fond" means foolish here. The unusual noun delirium in "tota hæc civitas delirium" is retained and translated literally; it is not silently changed to a verb meaning "raves." The precise dialogue passage remains to be checked.

[427] Editor. Lactantius, Divine Institutes 2.4, quotes Seneca to argue that adults still play like children, only on a larger scale. Burton extends a proverbial "second childhood" into lifelong folly. "Ghosts" in his English question is a verb: haunts or frightens. The successive Latin phrases and his own restatements are all preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and no difference betwixt us and children, saving that, majora ludimus, & grandioribus pupis, they play with babies of clouts & such toyes, we sport with greater babies. We cannot accuse or condemn one another, being faulty our selves, deliramenta loqueris, you talk idly, or as [428]Mitio upbraided Demea, insanis, auferte, for we are as mad our own selves, and it is hard to say which is the worst. Nay tis universally so, [429]Vitam regit fortuna, non sapientia.	there is no difference between us and children except that "we play bigger games, and with bigger dolls." They play with rag dolls and such toys; we amuse ourselves with larger dolls. We cannot accuse or condemn one another when we are at fault ourselves: "You talk nonsense"—you talk foolishly—or, as Micio reproached Demea, "You are mad; go away." We are just as mad ourselves, and it is hard to say who is worst. Indeed, this holds everywhere: "Fortune governs life, not wisdom."[430]

[428] Burton. Printed p. 22, h: "Adelph. act. 5. scen. 8." Explanation: Terence, Adelphoe (The Brothers), act 5, scene 8. See the editorial note on the speakers.

[429] Burton. Printed p. 22, i: "Tully Tusc. 5." Explanation: Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 5.9.25: the maxim about fortune occurs in a report of Theophrastus's position, not as a simple endorsement by Cicero.

[430] Editor. In Terence's exchange, Micio's "You are mad; go away" follows Aeschinus's appeal that he marry; Demea also participates. Burton compresses the speakers and names Demea as the addressee. The scan's auferte is interpreted as aufer te, "go away," from the underlying dialogue. In Cicero, the fortune maxim illustrates a view associated with Theophrastus and criticized by others.

Original text 1651	Modern English
When [431]Socrates had taken great pains to finde out a wise man, and to that purpose had consulted with philosophers, poets, artificers, he concludes all men were fools; and though it procured him both anger and much envy, yet in all companies he would openly professe it. When [432]Supputius in Pontanus had travelled all over Europe to conferre with a wise man, he returned at last without his errand, and could finde none. [433]Cardan concurs with him, Few there are (for ought I can perceive) well in their wits. So doth [434]Tully, I see every thing to be done foolishly and unadvisedly.	After Socrates had taken great pains to find a wise man, consulting philosophers, poets, and craftsmen for that purpose, he concluded that everyone was foolish. Although this provoked anger and much resentment against him, he would openly declare it in every company.[435] In Pontano, Supputius travelled throughout Europe to converse with a wise man, but eventually returned with his mission unfulfilled: he could find none. Cardano agrees with him: "Few people, as far as I can see, are in their right minds." So does Cicero: "I see everything being done foolishly and without proper thought."

[431] Burton. Printed p. 22, k: "Plato Apologia Socratis." Explanation: Plato, Apology 21b–23b. Burton summarizes the inquiry into reputed wisdom; see the editorial qualification.

[432] Burton. Printed p. 22, l: "Ant. Dial." Explanation: Pontano, Antonius. The Supputius episode still requires direct comparison with the dialogue.

[433] Burton. Printed p. 22, m: "Lib. 3. de sap. pauci ut video sanæ mentis sunt." Translation: "Few, as I see it, are of sound mind." Explanation: Girolamo Cardano, De sapientia (On Wisdom), book 3; exact passage not yet collated.

[434] Burton. Printed p. 22, n: "Stultè & incautè omnia agi video." Translation: "I see everything being done foolishly and incautiously." Explanation: Attributed to Cicero in the body; the exact passage has not yet been established.

[435] Editor. Plato's Apology 21b–23b gives a more discriminating account: Socrates acknowledges the craftsmen's real expertise but challenges their claim to wisdom beyond it. Burton's sweeping conclusion that everyone is a fool is his summary, rather than a precise statement of Plato's argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ille sinistrorsum, hic dextrorsum, unus utrique Error, sed variis illudit partibus omnes. One reels to this, another to that wall. Tis the same error that deludes them all. [436]They dote all, but not alike, Μανία οὐ πᾶσιν ὁμοία, not in the same kinde, One is covetous, a second lascivious, a third ambitious, a fourth envious, &c. as Damasippus the Stoick hath well illustrated in the poet, [437]Desipiunt omnes æquè ac tu.	One goes left, another right; the same error catches both, but plays its tricks on everyone in different ways. One reels towards this wall, another towards that; the same error deceives them all. They are all deluded, but not alike: "Madness is not the same in everyone"—not of the same kind. One is greedy, a second lustful, a third ambitious, a fourth envious, and so on. Damasippus the Stoic has illustrated this well in the poet: They are all just as foolish as you.[438]

[436] Burton. Printed p. 22, o: "Insania non omnibus eadem. Erasm. chil. 3. cent. 10. nemo mortalium qui non aliqua in re desipit, licet alius alio morbo laboret, hic libidinis, ille avaritiæ, ambitionis, invidiæ." Translation: "Madness is not the same in everyone. No mortal fails to act foolishly in some respect, though different people suffer from different diseases: lust, greed, ambition, envy." Explanation: Erasmus, Adagia 3.10.97, "Madness is not the same in everyone." The heading is verified; Burton's full Latin wording still needs collation against an appropriate edition.

[437] Burton. Printed p. 22, p: "Hor. l. 2. sat. 3." Explanation: Horace, Satires 2.3.47. The consulted text has desipiant, "are foolish," in its sentence; Burton prints desipiunt. Damasippus reports the teachings of the Stoic Stertinius.

[438] Editor. The opening verse adapts Horace, Satires 2.3.50–51, omitting abit and reshaping the ending. The dialogue of that satire develops the Stoic paradox that all who lack wisdom are mad. Burton's Latin verse, his English couplet, the Greek proverb, and the final Latin line are each rendered separately; their deliberate repetitions remain.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 22–23 Tis an inbred maladie in every one of us, there is seminarium stultitiæ, a seminarie of folly, which if it be stirred up, or get a head, will run in infinitum, & infinitely varies, as we our selves are severally addicted, saith [439]Balthazar Castilio: and cannot so easily be rooted out, it takes such fast hold, as Tully holds, altæ radices stultitiæ, [440]so we are bred, and so we continue. Some say there be two main defects of wit, error and ignorance, to which all others are reduced; by ignorance we know not things necessary, by error we know them falsly. Ignorance is a privation, error a positive act. From ignorance comes vice, from error heresie, &c. But make how many kinds you will, divide and subdivide, few men are free, or that do not impinge on some one kinde or other. [441]Sic plerumque agitat stultos inscitia, as he that examines his own and other mens actions, shall finde.	It is an inborn illness in every one of us. There is "a seedbed of folly"—a nursery of foolishness—which, if stirred up or allowed to gain strength, will grow "without limit," and varies endlessly according to our individual inclinations, says Baldassare Castiglione. It cannot easily be uprooted, for it takes such a firm hold; as Cicero puts it, "the deep roots of folly." So we are brought up, and so we remain.[442] Some distinguish two principal defects of understanding, error and ignorance, under which all others fall. Through ignorance we do not know what we need to know; through error we know it falsely. Ignorance is an absence, error a positive act. From ignorance comes vice; from error, heresy, and so on. But make as many kinds as you like, divide and subdivide them: few people escape or avoid falling into one kind or another. "So ignorance commonly drives fools," as anyone who examines his own actions and other people's will find.

[439] Burton. Printed p. 23, q: "Lib. 1. de aulico. Est in unoquoque nostrûm seminarium aliquod stultitiæ, quod si quando excitetur, in infinitum facile excrescit." Translation: "In each of us there is a seedbed of folly which, if ever stirred up, readily grows without limit." Explanation: Baldassare Castiglione, The Book of the Courtier, book 1. The seed-of-folly comparison is identifiable; this Latin rendering has not been collated with the edition Burton used.

[440] Burton. Printed p. 23, r: "Primaque lux vitæ prima furoris erat." Translation: "The first light of life was also the first light of madness." Explanation: No author is supplied here; exact source not yet established.

[441] Burton. Printed p. 23, s: "Tibullus, stulti prætereunt dies, their wits are a wool-gathering. So fools commonly dote." Translation: "Fools let their days slip by." Explanation: This takes stulti as "fools" and dies as the object of prætereunt, fitting the adjoining English glosses. "Foolish days go by" is another possible construction. Burton's attribution is retained; the precise sources of the Latin in the body and margin remain unlocated. Wool-gathering means absent-minded wandering of the thoughts.

[442] Editor. "Seminary" means a seedbed or nursery, not a theological college. "Wit" here means understanding; "privation" is the absence of something, contrasted with the positive act of judging falsely. Castiglione's image turns folly into something cultivated within everyone. The abbreviated Cicero phrase about deep roots has not yet been securely located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 23 [443]Charon in Lucian, as he wittily faigns, was conducted by Mercury to such a place, where he might see all the world at once: after he had sufficiently viewed, and looked about, Mercury would needs know of him what he had observed: He told him, that he saw a vast multitude, and a promiscuous, their habitations like mole-hils, the men as emmets, he could discern cities like so many hives of Bees, wherein every Bee had a sting, and they did nought else but sting one another, some domineering like Hornets bigger then the rest, some like filching Wasps, others as drones. Over their heads were hovering a confused companie of perturbations, hope, fear, anger, avarice, ignorance, &c. and a multitude of diseases hanging, which they still pulled on their pates. Some were Brawling, some fighting, riding, running, sollicite ambientes, callide litigantes, for toyes, and trifles, and such momentanie things.	In Lucian's ingenious fiction, Mercury led Charon to a place where he could see the whole world at once. After Charon had looked around sufficiently, Mercury insisted on hearing what he had noticed. He replied that he saw an immense, jumbled crowd, their homes like molehills and the people like ants. He could make out cities like so many beehives, where every bee had a sting and did nothing but sting its neighbours; some lorded it over the others like larger hornets, some were thieving wasps, others drones. Above their heads hovered a confused swarm of disturbing passions—hope, fear, anger, greed, ignorance, and so on—and a multitude of diseases hung over them, which they continually pulled down on their own heads. Some brawled, some fought, rode, or ran, "anxiously canvassing for advancement, cunningly pursuing lawsuits," for toys, trifles, and things that lasted only a moment.[444]
There Towns and Provinces meer factions, rich against poor, poor against rich, nobles against artificers, they against nobles, and so the rest. In conclusion, he condemned them all for mad-men, fools, idiots, asses, O stulti, quænam hæc est amentia? O fools, O mad-men he exclaims, insana studia, insani labores, &c. Mad endeavors, mad actions, mad, mad, mad, [445]O seclum insipiens & infacetum, a giddy-headed age.	Their towns and provinces were nothing but factions: rich against poor, poor against rich, nobles against craftsmen, craftsmen against nobles, and so on. In the end, he condemned them all as madmen, fools, idiots, and asses: "O fools, what madness is this?" O fools, O madmen, he exclaims; "mad pursuits, mad labours," and so on. Mad efforts, mad actions, mad, mad, mad: "O foolish and witless age"—a giddy-headed age.

[443] Burton. Printed p. 23, *: "Dial. contemplantes, Tom. 2." Explanation: Lucian, Charon, also called The Inspectors or Contemplantes; especially sections 5, 15–17, and 20. Burton condenses the dialogue and combines observations made by both speakers.

[444] Editor. Charon ferries the dead in Greek mythology; Mercury is Hermes. In Lucian's Charon the elevated view reduces human power and ambition to tiny, transient movements. "Emmets" are ants; "perturbations" are disturbing passions. Burton's summary draws together several passages and should not be mistaken for a continuous quotation.

[445] Burton. Printed p. 23, t: "Catullus." Explanation: Catullus 43.8. The consulted Latin text has insapiens; Burton prints insipiens. The poem protests a comparison of another woman with Lesbia.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Heraclitus the Philosopher, out of a serious meditation of mens lives, fell a weeping, and with continual tears bewailed their misery, madnes, and folly. Democritus on the other side burst out a laughing, their whole life seemed to him so ridiculous, & he was so far carried with this ironical passion, that the Citizens of Abdera took him to be mad, and sent therefore Embassadors to Hyppocrates the Physitian, that he would exercise his skill upon him. But the story is set down at large by Hyppocrates, in his epistle to Damagetus, which because it is not impertinent to this discourse, I will insert verbatim almost, as it is delivered by Hyppocrates himself, with all the circumstances belonging unto it.	The philosopher Heraclitus reflected seriously on human lives, then began to weep, continually lamenting their misery, madness, and folly. Democritus, on the other hand, burst out laughing: their entire lives seemed so ridiculous to him. This mocking emotion carried him so far that the citizens of Abdera thought he was mad and sent envoys to Hippocrates the physician, asking him to treat him. Hippocrates tells the story at length in his letter to Damagetus. Since it is relevant to this discussion, I shall insert it almost "word for word," as Hippocrates himself relates it, with all its accompanying circumstances.[446]

[446] Editor. This is the later, pseudonymous correspondence circulated under Hippocrates's name, especially letter 17 to Damagetus, not authenticated correspondence between the historical physician and Democritus. Burton's "verbatim almost" introduces his own English retelling, accompanied by quotations and later authorities in the margins. Identifying the exact Latin edition behind it remains part of the textual work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 23–24 When Hyppocrates was now come to Abdera, the people of the City came flocking about him, some weeping, some intreating of him, that he would do his best. After some little repast, he went to see Democritus, the people following him, whom he found (as before) in his garden in the suburbs all alone, [447]sitting upon a stone under a plane tree, without hose or shoes, with a book on his knees, cutting up severall beasts, and busie at his study. The multitude stood gazing round about to see the congresse. Hyppocrates after a little pause, saluted him by his name, whom he resaluted, ashamed almost that he could not call him likewise by his, or that he had forgot it.	When Hippocrates reached Abdera, the townspeople flocked around him, some weeping, some begging him to do his best. After a light meal he went to see Democritus, with the people following. As described earlier, he found him alone in his garden outside the town, sitting on a stone beneath a plane tree, without stockings or shoes, a book on his knees, dissecting several animals and busy with his studies. The crowd stood around watching the meeting. After a short pause, Hippocrates greeted him by name. Democritus returned the greeting, almost ashamed that he could not address Hippocrates by name in turn, or that he had forgotten it.[448]

[447] Burton. Printed p. 23, u: “Sub ramosa platano sedentem, solum, discalceatum, super lapidem, valde pallidum ac macilentum, promissâ barba, librum super genibus habentem.” Translation: “Sitting alone on a stone beneath a spreading plane tree, barefoot, very pale and thin, with an untrimmed beard and a book on his knees.” Explanation: From the tradition of the pseudonymous Hippocratic letter 17; the exact Latin version used by Burton remains to be identified.

[448] Editor. Burton returns to the garden portrait already introduced in Block 001. “Hose” means stockings; “congresse” means the meeting. The crowd’s tears and Democritus’s laughter frame the reversal in which the supposed patient instructs the physician.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 24 Hyppocrates demanded of him what he was doing: He told him that he was [449]busie in cutting up several beasts, to finde out the cause of madness and melancholy. Hyppocrates commended his work, admiring his happinesse and leasure. And why, quoth Democritus, have not you that leasure? Because, replied Hyppocrates, domesticall affairs hinder, necessary to be done, for our selves, neighbors, friends; expenses, diseases, frailties and mortalities which happen; wife, children, servants, and such businesses which deprive us of our time. At this speech Democritus profusely laughed, (his friends and the people standing by, weeping in the mean time, and lamenting his madnes.)	Hippocrates asked what he was doing. Democritus told him that he was busy dissecting several animals to discover the cause of madness and melancholy. Hippocrates praised his work, admiring his good fortune and leisure. "Why," said Democritus, "do you not have that leisure?" "Because," Hippocrates replied, "household affairs get in the way: things that must be done for ourselves, neighbours, and friends; expenses, illnesses, infirmities, and deaths that occur; wife, children, servants, and the business that takes up our time." At this Democritus laughed abundantly, while his friends and the people standing nearby wept and lamented his madness.[450]

[449] Burton. Printed p. 24, x: "De furore, mania melancholia scribo, ut sciam quo pacto in hominibus gignatur, fiat, crescat, cumuletur, minuatur; hæc inquit animalia quæ vides propterea seco, non Dei opera perosus, sed fellis bilisque naturam disquirens." Translation: "I write about frenzy, mania, melancholy, to learn how it arises in people, develops, grows, accumulates, and diminishes. That is why, he says, I dissect these animals you see: not because I hate God's works, but to investigate the nature of gall and bile." Explanation: The Latin describes the investigation summarized in the body. The precise edition behind this quotation awaits collation.

[450] Editor. The dissection joins the book's governing metaphor, anatomy, to an inquiry into mental disturbance. The marginal reference to gall and bile belongs to the historical medical account presented in the letter. "Happinesse" here means good fortune or a favourable condition, as well as contentment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hyppocrates asked the reason why he laughed. He told him, at the vanities and fopperies of the time, to see men so empty of all vertuous actions, to hunt so far after gold, having no end of ambition; to take such infinite pains for a little glory, and to be favored of men; to make such deep mines into the earth for gold, and many times to finde nothing, with losse of their lives and fortunes. Some to love dogs, others horses, some to desire to be obeyed in many Provinces, [451]and yet themselves will know no obedience. [452]Some to love their wives dearly at first, and after a while to forsake & hate them, begetting children, with much care and cost for their education, yet when they grow to mans estate, [453]to despise, neglect, and leave them naked to the worlds mercy.	Hippocrates asked why he laughed. He said it was at the vanities and follies of the age: to see people so devoid of virtuous actions, searching so far for gold, with no end to their ambition; taking endless trouble for a little glory and human favour; digging so deep into the earth for gold, often finding nothing and losing their lives and fortunes. Some love dogs, others horses; some want obedience throughout many provinces, yet will obey no one themselves. Some love their wives dearly at first, then abandon and hate them. They have children, spend much care and money on their education, yet when they reach adulthood despise and neglect them, leaving them exposed to the world's mercy.

[451] Burton. Printed p. 24, y: "Aust. l. 1. in Gen. Jumenti & servi tui obsequium rigide postulas, & tu nullum præstas aliis, nec ipsi Deo." Translation: "You strictly demand obedience from your beast of burden and your servant, yet offer none to others, not even to God himself." Explanation: The abbreviation attributes the saying to Augustine, book 1 on Genesis. The precise work and passage have not yet been established.

[452] Burton. Printed p. 24, z: "Uxores ducunt, mox foras ejiciunt." Translation: "They marry wives, then soon cast them out."

[453] Burton. Printed p. 24, a: "Pueros amant, mox fastidiunt." Translation: "They love their children, then soon disdain them."

Original text 1651	Modern English
[454]Do not these behaviours expresse their intolerable folly? When men live in peace, they covet war, detesting quietness, [455]deposing Kings, and advancing others in their stead, murdering some men to beget children of ther wives. How many strange humors are in men? When they are poor and needy, they seek riches, and when they have them, they do not enjoy them, but hide them under ground, or else wastfully spend them. O wise Hyppocrates, I laugh at such things being done, but much more when no good comes of them, and when they are done to so ill purpose.	Do these actions not reveal their intolerable folly? When people live in peace, they long for war and hate tranquillity, deposing kings and putting others in their place, murdering men so that they can father children with their wives. How many strange impulses people have! When poor and needy, they seek wealth; when they have it, they do not enjoy it but bury it underground or squander it. O wise Hippocrates, I laugh at these actions, but still more when no good comes of them and when they serve such bad ends.[456]

[454] Burton. Printed p. 24, b: “Quid hoc ab insania deest?” Translation: “How does this fall short of madness?”

[455] Burton. Printed p. 24, c: “Reges eligunt, deponunt.” Translation: “They choose kings, then depose them.”

[456] Editor. “Humors” here denotes changing impulses or dispositions; the passage does not assign each action to one of the four bodily humours. The repeated reversals—peace into war, attachment into rejection, poverty into wealth without enjoyment—supply Democritus’s reasons for laughing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
There is no truth or justice found amongst them, for [457]they daily plead one against another, the son against the father and the mother, brother against brother, kinred & friends of the same quality, and all this for riches, whereof after death they cannot be possessors. And yet notwithstanding they wil defame & kil one another, commit all unlawfull actions, contemning God and men, friends and countrey. They make great account of many senslesse things, esteeming them as a great part of their treasure, statues, pictures, and such like moveables, dear bought, & so cunningly wrought, as nothing but speech wanteth in them,[458] [459]and yet they hate living persons speaking to them.	There is no truth or justice among them. Every day they sue one another: son against father and mother, brother against brother, relations and friends doing the same—all for riches they cannot possess after death. Yet they slander and kill one another, commit every unlawful act, and show contempt for God and humankind, friends and country. They prize many lifeless things, counting them among their greatest treasures: statues, pictures, and other possessions, bought at great cost and made so skilfully that they lack only speech; yet they hate living people who speak to them.[460]

[457] Burton. Printed p. 24, d: “Contra parentes, fratres, cives perpetuo rixantur, & inimicitias agunt.” Translation: “They constantly quarrel with parents, brothers, and fellow citizens, and pursue their enmities.”

[458] Burton. Printed p. 24, *: “Credo equidem vivos ducent è marmore vultus.” Translation: “They will, I indeed believe, draw living faces from marble.” Explanation: Virgil, Aeneid 6.848: part of Anchises’s comparison of other peoples’ arts with Rome’s vocation. The unlettered marginal quotation is attached here to the speaking likenesses it illustrates; no distinct corresponding body marker is legible.

[459] Burton. Printed p. 24, e: “Idola inanimata amant, animata odio habent, sic pontificii.” Translation: “They love lifeless images and hate living ones; so do adherents of the pope.” Explanation: The final words are Burton’s anti-Catholic application, not a remark attributable to an ancient Greek speaker.

[460] Editor. “Senslesse” means without sensation, hence lifeless, and “moveables” means movable possessions. The contrast between affection for images and hatred of people attracts Burton’s anti-Catholic addition in the margin. That application is distinguished from the ancient narrative.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Others affect difficult things; if they dwel on firm Land, they wil remove to an Iland, and thence to land again, being no way constant to their desires. They commend courage & strength in wars, & let themselves be conquered by lust & avarice; they are in brief, as disordered in their minds, as Thersites was in his body. And now me thinks, O most worthy Hyppocrates, you should not reprehend my laughing, perceiving so many fooleries in men; [461]for no man will mock his own folly, but that which he seeth in a second, and so they justly mock one another. The drunkard cals him a glutton, whom he knows to be sober. Many men love the sea, others husbandry; briefly, they cannot agree in their own trades and professions, much lesse in their lives and actions.	Others seek out difficulties: if they live on the mainland, they move to an island, then back to the mainland, never remaining constant in their desires. They praise courage and strength in war, yet let lust and greed conquer them. In short, their minds are as misshapen as Thersites's body.[462] Surely now, most worthy Hippocrates, you should not blame my laughter when you see so much foolishness in people. No one mocks his own folly, only the folly he sees in someone else; thus they rightly mock one another. A drunkard calls someone a glutton whom he knows to be sober. Many love the sea, others farming: in short, they cannot agree even in their trades and occupations, still less in their lives and actions.

[461] Burton. Printed p. 24, f: "Suam stultitiam perspicit nemo, sed alter alterum deridet." Translation: "No one sees his own folly, but each mocks the other." Explanation: The scan abbreviates the final nasal in Suam; it is expanded here.

[462] Editor. Thersites is the Greek soldier described as physically misshapen in Iliad 2.211–219. Burton turns that bodily description into a comparison with disordered minds. The judgement is preserved as part of his rhetoric. "Sober" in the following sentence refers to sobriety in drinking, not necessarily moderation in eating.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 25 When Hyppocrates heard these words so readily uttered, without premeditation, to declare the worlds vanity, full of ridiculous contrariety, he made answer, That necessity compelled men to many such actions, & divers wils ensuing from divine permission, that we might not be idle, being nothing is so odious to them as sloth and negligence. Besides, men cannot foresee future events, in this uncertainty of humane affairs; they would not so marry, if they could foretell the causes of their dislike and separation; or parents, if they knew the hour of their childrens death, so tenderly provide for them; or an husbandman sowe, if he thought there would be no increase; or a merchant adventure to sea, if he foresaw shipwrack; or be a Magistrate, if presently to be deposed. Alas, worthy Democritus, every man hopes the best, and to that end he doth it, and therefore no such cause, or ridiculous occasion of laughter.	When Hippocrates heard this fluent, unpremeditated account of the world's vanity and ridiculous contradictions, he replied that necessity forced people into many such actions, along with the various inclinations arising by divine permission, so that we might not be idle, since nothing is so hateful to them as sloth and negligence.[463] Besides, amid the uncertainty of human affairs, people cannot foresee what will happen. They would not marry as they do if they could foresee the causes of their aversion and separation. Parents would not provide so tenderly for children if they knew the hour of their death; a farmer would not sow if he expected no crop; a merchant would not risk the sea if he foresaw shipwreck; nor would anyone become a magistrate if he were about to be deposed. Alas, worthy Democritus, everyone hopes for the best and acts with that in view; there is therefore no such cause or ridiculous occasion for laughter.

[463] Editor. The scan reads "divers wils," retained on the left. "Various inclinations" provisionally interprets wils as wills; the syntax and the antecedent of "them" remain uncertain. The corresponding speech in Littré's French translation of the pseudonymous Hippocratic Letter 17 also defends necessary activity and explains that people cannot foresee failure. That comparison does not establish Burton's "divine permission" or resolve his pronoun. The precise Latin version behind Burton's retelling remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Democritus hearing this poor excuse, laughed again aloud, perceiving he wholly mistook him, and did not well understand what he had said concerning perturbations, and tranquility of the minde. Insomuch, that if men would govern their actions by discretion and providence, they would not declare themselves fools, as now they do, and he should have no cause of laughter; but (quoth he) they swell in this life, as if they were immortal, and demi-gods, for want of understanding. It were enough to make them wise, if they would but consider the mutability of this world, and how it wheels about, nothing being firm and sure. He that is now above, to morrow is beneath; he that sate on this side to day, to morrow is hurled on the other: and not considering these matters, they fall into many inconveniences and troubles, coveting things of no profit, and thirsting after them, tumbling headlong into many calamities.	Hearing this poor excuse, Democritus laughed aloud again. He saw that Hippocrates had entirely misunderstood him and what he had said about disturbing passions and peace of mind. If people governed their actions with judgement and foresight, they would not show themselves to be fools as they now did, and he would have no cause to laugh. But, he said, they puff themselves up in this life as though they were immortal demigods, because they lack understanding. It would be enough to make them wise if they considered how changeable the world is and how it turns about, with nothing firm or certain. Whoever is on top today is underneath tomorrow; whoever sits on this side today is hurled to the other tomorrow. By ignoring this, they fall into many difficulties and troubles, coveting and thirsting for useless things, tumbling headlong into calamity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So that if men would attempt no more then what they can bear, they should lead contented lives, and learning to know themselves, would limit their ambition, [464]they would perceive then that Nature hath enough without seeking such superfluities, & unprofitable things, which bring nothing with them but grief and molestation. As a fat body is more subject to diseases, so are rich men to absurdities and fooleries, to many casualties and crosse inconveniences. There are many that take no heed what happeneth to others by bad conversation, and therefore overthrow themselves in the same manner through their own fault, not foreseeing dangers manifest.	If people attempted no more than they could bear, they would lead contented lives. Learning to know themselves, they would set limits to their ambition and see that nature has enough without pursuing excess and useless things that bring only grief and distress. Just as a fat body is more prone to disease, so the rich are prone to absurdities and follies, to many misfortunes and vexing troubles. Many ignore what happens to others through bad conduct and bring themselves down in the same way, through their own fault, failing to foresee obvious dangers.[465]

[464] Burton. Printed p. 25, f: “Denique sit finis querendi, cumque habeas plus, pauperiem metuas minus, & finire laborem incipias, partis quod avebas, utere. Hor.” Translation: “At last let there be an end to getting; since you have more, fear poverty less, begin to end your labour, and enjoy the possessions you longed for.” Explanation: Adapted from Horace, Satires 1.1.92–94. The consulted text has parto, and continues ne facias quod rather than Burton’s utere; Burton’s reshaped ending is retained and translated.

[465] Editor. “Conversation” means conduct or manner of life; “casualties” means events that happen by chance, here misfortunes. “Molestation” is distress or trouble. The bodily comparison and the claim about the rich belong to Democritus’s argument in Burton’s retelling.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 25–26 These are things (O more then mad, quoth he) that give me matter of laughter, by suffering the pains of your impieties, as your avarice, envy, malice, enormous villanies, mutinies, unsatiable desires, conspiracies, and other incurable vices; besides, your [466]dissimulation and hypocrisie, bearing deadly hatred one to the other, and yet shadowing it with a good face, flying out into all filthy lusts, and transgressions of all laws, both of nature and civility. Many things which they have left off, after a while they fall to again, husbandry, navigation; and leave again, fickle and unconstant as they are. When they are yong, they would be old, and old, yong. [467]Princes commend a private life, private men itch after honour: a Magistrate commends a quiet life, a quiet man would be in his office, and obeyed as he is: and what is the cause of all this, but that they know not themselves.	These are the things, he said—O people more than mad—that give me matter for laughter: you suffer the penalties of your own wickedness, your greed, envy, malice, monstrous crimes, rebellions, insatiable desires, conspiracies, and other incurable vices. Add your deceit and hypocrisy: you bear one another deadly hatred, yet conceal it behind a friendly face, breaking out into filthy lusts and violating every law of nature and civil life. After giving things up—farming or seafaring, for example—they return to them, then abandon them again, fickle and changeable as they are. When young, they want to be old; when old, young. Princes praise private life; private people long for honours. A magistrate praises a quiet life; someone living quietly wants his office and the obedience he commands. What causes all this but their failure to know themselves?[468]

[466] Burton. Printed p. 25, g: “Astutam vapido servat sub pectore vulpem. Et cum vulpo positus pariter vulpinari. Cretizandum cum Crete.” Translation: “He keeps a cunning fox beneath his stale heart. And, when placed with a fox, to play the fox likewise. One must play the Cretan with a Cretan.” Explanation: The first sentence adapts Persius 5.117, which has servas in rather than servat sub. The following fox and Cretan sayings concern meeting cunning with cunning; their exact intermediary sources remain open. The printed vulpo is retained.

[467] Burton. Printed p. 25, h: “Qui fit Mæcenas ut nemo quam sibi sortem, Seu ratio dederit, seu fors adjecerit, illâ contentus vivat, &c. Hor.” Translation: “How is it, Maecenas, that no one lives content with the lot that either choice has given him or chance has brought him, and so on?” Explanation: Horace, Satires 1.1.1–3. The consulted text has obiecerit where Burton prints adjecerit.

[468] Editor. The report shifts into direct rebuke—“your” vices—and back into third-person examples. That change is retained. The examples of dissatisfied rulers and private people echo the opening of Horace’s first satire, quoted in the margin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 26 Some delight to destroy, [469]one to build, another to spoil one countrey to enrich another and himself. [470]In all these things they are like children, in whom is no judgment or councel, and resemble beasts, saving that beasts are better then they, as being contented with nature. [471]When shall you see a Lion hide gold in the ground, or a Bul contend for a better pasture? when a Boar is thirsty, he drinks what will serve him, and no more: and when his belly is ful, he ceaseth to eat: But men are immoderate in both; as in lust, they covet carnal copulation at set times; men always, ruinating thereby the health of their bodies.	Some delight in destruction, another in building, another in plundering one country to enrich a second and himself. In all this they resemble children without judgement or reason, and beasts—except that beasts are better, because they are content with what nature requires. When do you see a lion bury gold, or a bull struggle for a better pasture? A thirsty boar drinks only what he needs, and stops eating when his belly is full. People are immoderate in both. The same holds in lust: animals want sexual intercourse at fixed seasons, people always, thereby ruining their bodily health.[472]

[469] Burton. Printed p. 26, i: “Diruit, ædificat, mutat quadrata rotundis. Trajanus pontem struxit super Danubium, quem successor ejus Adrianus statim demolitus.” Translation: “He tears down, builds, exchanges square things for round. Trajan built a bridge over the Danube, which his successor Hadrian immediately demolished.” Explanation: The verse is Horace, Epistles 1.1.100. Compare Cassius Dio 68.13.5–6: Hadrian removed the bridge’s superstructure from fear of invasion, while its piers remained. Burton’s “at once” is not established by that account.

[470] Burton. Printed p. 26, k: “Quâ quid in re ab infantibus differunt, quibus mens & sensus sine ratione inest, quicquid sese his offert volupe est.” Translation: “In this, how do they differ from infants, who have mind and sensation without reason, and find pleasure in whatever presents itself?” Explanation: The awkward opening is retained as printed and rendered according to the comparison in the body.

[471] Burton. Printed p. 26, l: “Idem Plut.” Explanation: “The same in Plutarch.” The particular passage behind this abbreviated cross-reference has not yet been securely identified.

[472] Editor. “They” in the comparison of sexual seasons refers to animals; the modern version makes that antecedent explicit. The argument idealizes animal appetite as naturally limited, in contrast with human excess; it is part of the speaker’s moral comparison.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And doth it not deserve laughter, to see an amorous fool torment himself for a wench; weep, howl for a mis-shapen slut, a dowdy, sometimes that might have his choice of the finest beauties? Is there any remedy for this in physick? I do anatomize and cut up these poor beasts, [473]to see these distempers, vanities, and follies, yet such proof were better made on mans body, if my kinde nature would indure it: [474]Who from the hour of his birth is most miserable, weak and sickly; when he sucks he is guided by others; [475]when he is grown great practiseth unhappinesse, and is sturdy, and when old, a childe again, and repenteth him of his life past.	Does it not deserve laughter to see a lovesick fool torment himself over a girl, weeping and howling for a misshapen slattern, a dowdy woman—sometimes a man who could choose the finest beauties? Is there any medical remedy for this? I dissect and cut up these poor animals to investigate these disorders, vanities, and follies; yet the investigation would be better made on the human body, if my kindly nature could bear it.[476] A human being is wretched, weak, and sickly from birth: while at the breast, directed by others; when grown, practising mischief and being headstrong; when old, a child again, regretting the life he has lived.

[473] Burton. Printed p. 26, m: “Ut insaniæ causam disquiram bruta macto & seco, cum hoc potius in hominibus investigandum esset.” Translation: “To investigate the cause of madness I slaughter and dissect animals, though this should rather be investigated in human beings.”

[474] Burton. Printed p. 26, n: “Totus à nativitate morbus est.” Translation: “From birth he is wholly disease.”

[475] Burton. Printed p. 26, o: “In vigore furibundus, quum decrescit insanabilis.” Translation: “In his prime he is frenzied; as he declines, incurable.”

[476] Editor. “Physick” is medicine; “unhappinesse” here means bad behaviour or mischief, and “sturdy” headstrong or unruly. “Slut” and “dowdy” are disparaging terms for an unkempt woman; their contempt remains visible in the modern version. The proposed human dissection is immediately qualified by the speaker’s professed kindness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And here being interrupted by one that brought books, he fell to it again, that all were mad, carelesse, stupid. To prove my former speeches, look into courts, or private houses. [477]Judges give judgement according to their own advantage, doing manifest wrong to poor innocents, to please others. Notaries alter sentences, and for money lose their Deeds. Some make false moneys, others counterfeit false weights. Some abuse their parents, yea corrupt their own sisters, others make long libels and pasquils, defaming men of good life, and extol such as are lewd and vicious. Some rob one, some another; [478]Magistrates make laws against theeves, and are the veriest theeves themselves. Some kill themselves, others despair, not obtaining their desires. Some dance, sing, laugh, feast and banquet, whilest others sigh, languish, mourn and lament, having neither meat, drink, nor clothes.	Here someone bringing books interrupted him. Then he resumed: everyone was mad, heedless, and senseless. To prove what I have said, look into courts or private houses. Judges decide cases for their own benefit, plainly wronging poor innocent people to please others. Notaries alter judgements and, for money, make their documents disappear. Some counterfeit coins; others falsify weights. Some mistreat their parents, even sexually corrupt their own sisters. Others write lengthy libels and lampoons, slandering people who live well and praising the depraved and vicious. Some rob one person, some another. Magistrates make laws against thieves and are themselves the greatest thieves. Some kill themselves; others despair because they cannot obtain what they want. Some dance, sing, laugh, feast, and banquet while others sigh, waste away, mourn, and lament, without food, drink, or clothing.[479]

[477] Burton. Printed p. 26, p: “Cyprian. ad Donatum. Qui sedet crimina judicaturus, &c.” Translation: “He who sits to judge crimes, and so on.” Explanation: Cyprian, To Donatus 10, on judges who commit the crimes they sit to punish.

[478] Burton. Printed p. 26, q: “Tu pessimus omnium latro es, as a thief told Alexander in Curtius. damnat foras judex, quod intus operatur, Cyprian.” Translation: “You are the worst robber of all. The judge condemns outside what he practises within.” Explanation: The Curtius attribution remains unverified. A related pirate-and-Alexander anecdote occurs in Augustine, City of God 4.4. The Cyprian parallel is To Donatus 9, condemning public accusers who privately commit the same offences.

[479] Editor. Notaries are officials or clerks who authenticate and record legal business; “sentences” means judgements and “Deeds” legal documents. “Libels and pasquils” are defamatory writings and lampoons. The catalogue opposes institutions’ declared purposes to the behaviour of those who operate them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[480]Some prank up their bodies, and have their mindes full of execrable vices. Some trot about to bear false witnesse, and say any thing for money; [481]and though Judges know of it, yet for a bribe they wink at it, and suffer false Contracts to prevail against Equity. Women are all day a dressing, to pleasure other men abroad, and go like sluts at home, not caring to please their own husbands whom they should. Seeing men are so fickle, so sottish, so intemperate, why should not I laugh at those, to whom [482]folly seems wisdom, will not be cured, and perceive it not?	Some dress their bodies splendidly while their minds are full of abominable vices. Others run about giving false testimony, ready to say anything for money. Although judges know this, a bribe makes them turn a blind eye and allow fraudulent contracts to defeat justice. Women spend all day dressing to please other men outside the home, then go about untidily at home, taking no care to please their own husbands, as they should. Since people are so fickle, foolish, and unrestrained, why should I not laugh at those to whom folly seems wisdom, who refuse a cure and do not recognize their condition?[483]

[480] Burton. Printed p. 26, r: “Vultus magna cura, magna animi incuria. Am. Marcel.” Translation: “Great care for the face, great neglect of the mind.” Explanation: Attributed to Ammianus Marcellinus; precise passage not yet located.

[481] Burton. Printed p. 26, s: “Horrenda res est, vix duo verba sine mendacio proferuntur: & quamvis solenniter homines ad veritatem dicendam invitentur, pejerare tamen non dubitant, ut ex decem testibus vix unus verum dicat. Calv. in 8. John. Serm. 1.” Translation: “It is a dreadful thing: scarcely two words are spoken without a lie; and although people are solemnly called upon to tell the truth, they do not hesitate to perjure themselves, so that scarcely one witness in ten speaks the truth.” Explanation: Burton cites Calvin, first sermon on John 8. The precise sermon and Latin wording remain to be collated.

[482] Burton. Printed p. 26, t: “Sapientiam insaniam esse dicunt.” Translation: “They say that wisdom is madness.” Explanation: The margin states the converse of the body’s complaint that folly seems wisdom; both are retained.

[483] Editor. “Prank up” means adorn or dress splendidly. In the complaint about women, “sluts” emphasizes untidiness; it need not carry the specifically sexual sense common today. The hostile generalization is retained as the speaker’s claim. Burton’s accompanying Calvin citation adds another later voice to the classical scene.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It grew late, Hyppocrates left him, and no sooner was he come away, but all the Citizens came about flocking, to know how he liked him. He told them in brief, that notwithstanding those small neglects of his attire, body, diet, [484]the world had not a wiser, a more learned, a more honest man, and they were much deceived to say that he was mad.	It grew late, and Hippocrates left him. As soon as he came away, the townspeople crowded around to ask what he thought of him. He told them briefly that, despite those small neglects of dress, body, and diet, there was no wiser, more learned, or more upright man in the world: they were greatly mistaken in calling him mad.[485]
Source page 27 Thus Democritus esteemed of the World in his time, and this was the cause of his laughter: and good cause he had. [486]Olim jure quidem, nunc plus Democrite ride; Quin rides? vita hæc nunc mage ridicula est. Democritus did well to laugh of old, Good cause he had, but now much more, This life of ours is more ridiculous Then that of his, or long before.	That was Democritus's opinion of the world in his time, and that was why he laughed. And he had good reason. You laughed with justice then; laugh more now, Democritus. Why do you not laugh? Life now is more ridiculous. Democritus was right to laugh in former times; he had good reason then, but far more now. Our life is more ridiculous than life in his time, or long before.[487]

[484] Burton. Printed p. 26, u: "Siquidem sapientiæ suæ admiratione me complevit, offendi sapientissimum virum, qui salvos potest omnes homines reddere." Translation: "Indeed, he filled me with admiration for his wisdom: I encountered a supremely wise man who can restore everyone to health." Explanation: The conclusion of the Hippocratic-letter episode. Salvos reddere can mean making people safe or restoring them to health; its medical sense is kept here.

[485] Editor. The reversal is complete: the townspeople's apparent madman becomes the wisest man, and the physician leaves instructed. This is the verdict within the literary letter tradition, not an independently documented medical assessment. The block ends here, before Burton begins applying Democritus's judgement to his own age.

[486] Burton. Printed p. 27, x: "E Græc. epig." Translation: "From a Greek epigram." Explanation: Burton identifies a Greek epigram but names neither its author nor his Latin translator; the precise source remains to be established.

[487] Editor. Burton follows the Latin couplet with his own English verse. Both are retained and modernized separately, so the repeated thought is intentional. His marginal description, "from a Greek epigram," has not yet yielded a secure identification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Never so much cause of laughter, as now, never so many fools and mad men. Tis not one [488]Democritus wil serve turn to laugh in these days, we have now need of a Democritus to laugh at Democritus, one Jester to flout at another, one fool to flear at another. A great Stentorian Democritus, as big as that Rhodian Colossus.	Never has there been so much to laugh at as now, never so many fools and madmen. One Democritus will not be enough to laugh in these times: we need a Democritus to laugh at Democritus, one jester to mock another, one fool to sneer at another. A great, thunder-voiced Democritus, as huge as the Colossus of Rhodes.[489]
For now, as [490]Salisburiensis said in his time, totus mundus histrionem agit, the whole world playes the fool; we have a new theatre, a new scene, a new comedie of errors, a new company of personate actors, volupiæ sacra (as Calcagninus wittily feigns in his Apologs) are celebrated all the world over, [491]where all the actors were mad men and fools, and every hour changed habits, or took that which came next. He that was a Marriner to day, is an Apothecary to morrow; a smith one while, a philosopher another, in his volupiæ ludis; a king now with his crown, robes, scepter, attendants; by and by drove a loaded asse before him like a carter, &c.	For now, as John of Salisbury said in his own time, "the whole world plays the actor"—the whole world plays the fool. We have a new theatre, a new scene, a new comedy of errors, a new company of actors playing assumed parts. "The rites of Pleasure", as Calcagnini wittily imagines them in his fables, are celebrated everywhere: all the actors were madmen and fools, changing costumes every hour or taking whatever came to hand. Today's sailor is tomorrow's apothecary; at one moment a smith, at another a philosopher, "in these games of Pleasure"; now a king with crown, robes, sceptre, and attendants, then driving a loaded donkey before him like a carter, and so on.[492]

[488] Burton. Printed p. 27, y: "Plures Democriti nunc non sufficiunt, opus Democrito qui Democritum rideat. Eras. Moria." Translation: "Several Democrituses are now insufficient; we need a Democritus to laugh at Democritus." Explanation: Erasmus, Praise of Folly: the passage imagines a thousand Democrituses, with another to laugh at them.

[489] Editor. Stentorian means extraordinarily loud: Homer's Stentor has the voice of fifty men (Iliad 5.785–86). The Colossus of Rhodes was a gigantic statue. Burton magnifies Democritus in voice and body until he can match the world's increased folly.

[490] Burton. Printed p. 27, z: "Polycrat. lib. 3. cap. 8. è Petron." Translation: "Policraticus, book 3, chapter 8, from Petronius." Explanation: John of Salisbury, Policraticus, book 3, chapter 8; Burton says the phrase comes from Petronius. The precise transmission has not been collated.

[491] Burton. Printed p. 27, *: "Ubi omnes delirabant, omnes insani, &c. hodie nauta, cras philosophus; hodie faber, cras pharmacopola; hic modo regem agebat multo satellitio, tiara & sceptro ornatus, nunc vili amictus centiculo, asinum clitellarium impellit." Translation: "Where everyone raved, everyone was mad, and so on: today a sailor, tomorrow a philosopher; today a smith, tomorrow an apothecary. This man lately played a king, with a large retinue, adorned with crown and sceptre; now, wrapped in a shabby garment, he drives a pack-ass." Explanation: The printed centiculo is retained; the sense is a poor or patched garment. The order of professions differs from Burton's English retelling.

[492] Editor. Salisburiensis is John of Salisbury. Histrionem agit literally means "plays the actor"; Burton turns acting into fool-playing. Volupia is personified Pleasure. In Calcagnini's allegory, changing costume exposes the instability of the roles people assume; the Latin margin and English body vary the examples.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If Democritus were alive now, he should see strange alterations, a new company of counterfeit vizards, whiflers, Cumane asses, maskers, mummers, painted Puppets, outsides, phantastick shadows, guls, monsters, giddy-heads, butter-flies. And so many of them are indeed ([493]if all be true that I have read) For when Jupiter & Juno's wedding was solemnized of old, the gods were all invited to the feast, and many noble men besides: Amongst the rest came Crysalus a Persian prince, bravely attended, rich in golden attires, in gay robes, with a majesticall presence, but otherwise an asse.	If Democritus were alive now, he would see strange transformations: a new company of false faces, triflers, asses of Cumae, masked performers, mummers, painted puppets, mere exteriors, fantastic shadows, dupes, monsters, scatterbrains, butterflies. And many of them really are butterflies, if everything I have read is true. For when Jupiter and Juno celebrated their wedding long ago, all the gods were invited to the feast, and many noblemen besides. Among them came Crysalus, a Persian prince, splendidly attended, richly dressed in gold and fine robes, with a majestic bearing—but otherwise an ass.[494]
The gods seeing him come in such pomp and state, rose up to give him place, ex habitu hominem metientes; [495]but Jupiter perceiving what he was, a light, phantastick, idle fellow, turned him and his proud followers into butter-flies: and so they continue still (for ought I know to the contrary) roving about in pied-coats, and are called Chrysalides by the wiser sort of men: that is, golden outsides, drones, flies, and things of no worth. Multitudes of such, &c. ——ubique invenies Stultos avaros, sycophantas prodigos.	Seeing him arrive in such pomp and state, the gods rose to make room for him, "judging the man by his dress." But Jupiter recognized him for what he was—a frivolous, fanciful, worthless fellow—and turned him and his proud followers into butterflies. So they remain, as far as I know, flitting about in many-coloured coats. Wiser people call them Chrysalides: golden exteriors, drones, flies, worthless things. There are multitudes of them, and so on.[496] Everywhere you will find fools, misers, swindlers, spendthrifts.

[493] Burton. Printed p. 27, y: "Calcagninus Apol. Crysalus è cæteris auro dives, manicato peplo & tiara conspicuus, levis alioquin & nullius consilii, &c. magno fastu ingredienti assurgunt dii, &c." Translation: "Calcagnini, Fables. Among the others, Crysalus was rich in gold, conspicuous in a sleeved robe and crown, but otherwise frivolous and without judgement, and so on. The gods rise as he enters with great pomp, and so on." Explanation: Celio Calcagnini's fables; exact item not yet collated.

[494] Editor. Whiflers are triflers or fickle people; vizards are masks, extended here to false faces; mummers are masked performers. The Cumaean ass is the proverbial ass disguised in a lion's skin. The prince's outward majesty contrasts with his lack of judgement.

[495] Burton. Printed p. 27, z: "Sed hominis levitatem Jupiter perspiciens, at tu (inquit) esto bombilio, &c. protinusque vestis illa manicata in alas versa est, & mortales inde Chrysalides vocant hujusmodi homines." Translation: "But Jupiter, seeing through the man's frivolity, said, "Then become a buzzing insect," and so on. At once that sleeved garment turned into wings, and mortals thereafter call men of this kind Chrysalides." Explanation: The scan reads bombilio, a buzzing insect; Burton's English specifies butterflies.

[496] Editor. Crysalus and Chrysalides evoke gold and the chrysalis, continuing the contrast between gilded appearance and inner worth. The transformation is Calcagnini's fable as Burton retells it. The source of the final Latin couplet is not identified in this passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many additions, much increase of madnesse, folly, vanity, should Democritus observe, were he now to travel, or could get leave of Pluto to come see fashions, as Charon did in Lucian to visit our cities of Moronia Pia, and Moronia Fælix, sure I think he would break the rim of his belly with laughing. [497]Si foret in terris rideret Democritus, seu, &c. A satyrical Roman in his time, thought all vice, folly, and madnesse were all at full sea, [498]Omne in præcipiti vitium stetit. ——	Democritus would find many additions and a great increase in madness, folly, and vanity if he travelled now—or could get Pluto's permission to come and see the fashions, as Charon does in Lucian—and visited our cities of Pious Fool-land and Fortunate Fool-land. I am sure he would split his sides laughing.[499] If Democritus were here on earth, he would laugh, whether, and so on. A Roman satirist thought in his own time that every vice, folly, and madness had reached high tide: Every vice stood at the brink.[500]

[497] Burton. Printed p. 27, a: "Juven." Explanation: The attribution to Juvenal is mistaken: the words are Horace, Epistles 2.1.194. Burton breaks off after "whether."

[498] Burton. Printed p. 27, b: "Juven." Explanation: Juvenal, Satire 1.149: vice has reached its extreme; the next line says posterity can add nothing further.

[499] Editor. Pluto rules the underworld, and Charon ferries the dead. Lucian's Charon brings the ferryman to the living world to inspect human affairs. Moronia suggests Greek mōros, "foolish"; pia and fælix mean "pious" and "fortunate" or "happy." "Break the rim of his belly" means split his sides laughing.

[500] Editor. The first quotation is Horace, despite the printed attribution to Juvenal; the second is Juvenal. "At full sea" means at its highest tide. Burton first says folly has increased, then argues that its symptoms remain constant: the tension belongs to his rhetoric and has been preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 28 [501]Josephus the historian taxeth his countrey-men Jews for bragging of their vices, publishing their follies, and that they did contend amongst themselves, who should be most notorious in villanies; but we flow higher in madnesse, far beyond them, [502]Mox daturi progeniem vitiosiorem, and the latter end (you know whose oracle it is) is like to be worst.	The historian Josephus rebukes his Jewish countrymen for boasting of their vices, advertising their follies, and competing to be the most notorious villains. But our madness rises higher, far beyond theirs: Soon to produce a still more vicious generation. And the final state—you know whose pronouncement this is—is likely to be the worst.[503]

[501] Burton. Printed p. 28, *: “De bello Jud. l. 8. c. 11. Iniquitates vestræ neminem latent, inque dies singulos certamen habetis quis pejor sit.” Translation: “Your wicked deeds are hidden from no one, and every day you compete to see who can be worse.” Explanation: Josephus, Jewish War, book 8, chapter 11 as cited. This numbering has not been matched to Burton’s edition; the work is usually divided into seven books.

[502] Burton. Printed p. 28, c: “Hor.” Explanation: Horace, Odes 3.6.47–48. Burton changes the grammatical form daturos to daturi when extracting the phrase.

[503] Editor. The quoted judgement is presented as Josephus’s criticism of his own countrymen, then turned against Burton’s contemporaries. “The latter end” appears to recall Christ’s warning that a person’s last state may be worse than the first (Matthew 12:45; Luke 11:26).

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tis not to be denied, the world alters every day, Ruunt urbes, regna transferuntur, &c. variantur habitus, leges innovantur, as [504]Petrarch observes, we change language, habits, laws, customs, manners, but not vices, not diseases, not the symptoms of folly and madnesse, they are still the same. And as a River we see, keeps the like name and place, but not water, and yet ever runs, [505]Labitur & labetur in omne volubilis ævum; Our times and persons alter, vices are the same, and ever will be; look how Nightingals sang of old, Cocks crowed, Kine lowed, Sheep bleated, Sparrows chirped, Dogs barked, so they do still; we keep our madnesse still, play the fools still, nec dum finitus Orestes, we are of the same humors and inclinations as our predecessors were, you shall finde us all alike, much at one, we and our sons, Et nati natorum, & qui nascuntur ab illis, And so shall our posterity continue to the last. But to speak of times present.	There is no denying that the world changes every day: "Cities fall, kingdoms change hands, and so on; dress changes, laws are remade," as Petrarch observes. We change our language, clothing, laws, customs, and manners, but not our vices or diseases, or the symptoms of folly and madness: those remain the same. A river, as we see, keeps its name and place, though not its water, and still flows: It flows and will flow, rolling on for all time. Our times and individual persons change; our vices remain the same and always will. Nightingales sang, cocks crowed, cattle lowed, sheep bleated, sparrows chirped, and dogs barked long ago; they still do. We keep our madness and still play the fool: "Orestes is not finished yet." We have the same dispositions and inclinations as our predecessors. You will find us all alike, much the same, ourselves and our sons, and our sons' sons, and those born of them. Our descendants will continue so to the end. But let us speak of the present.[506]

[504] Burton. Printed p. 28, d: "Lib. 5 Epist. 8." Translation: "Book 5, letter 8." Explanation: Petrarch, book 5, letter 8 as cited; collection and precise wording remain to be established.

[505] Burton. Printed p. 28, *: "Hor." Explanation: Horace, Epistles 1.2.43: the river flows without end while a rustic waits for it to run out.

[506] Editor. "Orestes is not finished yet" recalls Juvenal, Satire 1.6: an interminable recitation of an Orestes poem. Here folly likewise never ends. The line about descendants adapts Virgil, Aeneid 3.98, where the usual text has nascentur, "will be born," for Burton's nascuntur. Petrarch's Latin and Burton's fuller English restatement are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If Democritus were alive now, and should but see the superstition of our age, our [507]religious madnesse, as [508]Meteran cals it, Religiosam insaniam, so many professed Christians, yet so few imitators of Christ, so much talk of religion, so much science, so little conscience, so much knowledge, so many preachers, so little practice; such variety of sects, such have and hold of all sides, ——[509]obvia signis Signa, &c. such absurd and ridiculous traditions and ceremonies:	If Democritus were alive now and could see the superstition of our age, our religious madness—as Meteren calls it, "religious insanity"—so many professed Christians, yet so few imitators of Christ; so much talk of religion, so much learning, so little conscience, so much knowledge, so many preachers, so little practice; such a variety of sects, such wrangling on every side, "standards confronting standards," and so on; such absurd and ridiculous traditions and ceremonies;[510]

[507] Burton. Printed p. 28, e: "Superstitio est insanus error." Translation: "Superstition is a mad error." Explanation: An unattributed definition in this margin; its precise source remains unlocated.

[508] Burton. Printed p. 28, f: "Lib. 8. hist. Belg." Translation: "Book 8 of the history of the Low Countries." Explanation: The cited author is Emanuel van Meteren; the exact edition and passage have not been collated.

[509] Burton. Printed p. 28, *: "Lucan." Explanation: Civil War 1.6–7: opposing Roman standards and equal eagles confront one another. Burton applies the image of civil war to religious division.

[510] Editor. Science here means knowledge or learning, which makes the contrast with conscience sharper. "Have and hold" is rendered as wrangling in this context. Burton's attack first targets Catholic practices, then turns against rigid separatists, opportunistic conformists, and people seeking Church property.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If he should meet a Capuchin, a Franciscan, a Pharisaical Jesuite, a man-serpent, a shave-crowned Monk in his robes, a begging Frier, or see their three crown'd Soveraign Lord the Pope, poor Peters successor, servus servorum Dei, to depose Kings with his foot, to tread on Emperors necks, make them stand bare foot and bare-legg'd at his gates, hold his bridle and stirrup, &c. (O that Peter and Paul were alive to see this!) If he should observe a [511]Prince creep so devoutly to kiss his toe, and those Red-cap Cardinals, poor parish priests of old, now Princes companions; what would he say?	if he met a Capuchin, a Franciscan, a Pharisaical Jesuit, a man-serpent, a tonsured monk in his robes, a begging friar; or saw their sovereign lord the pope, with his triple crown, poor Peter's successor, "servant of the servants of God," deposing kings with his foot, treading on emperors' necks, making them stand barefoot and bare-legged at his gates, hold his bridle and stirrup, and so on—if only Peter and Paul were alive to see it!—if he saw a prince creep up so devoutly to kiss his toe, and those red-capped cardinals, once poor parish priests and now the companions of princes: what would he say?[512]

[511] Burton. Printed p. 28, h: "Si cui intueri vacet quæ patiuntur superstitiosi, invenies tam indecora honestis, tam indigna liberis, tam dissimilia sanis, ut nemo fuerit dubitaturus furere eos, si cum paucioribus furerent. Senec." Translation: "If anyone has time to observe what the superstitious endure, he will find things so unbecoming to honourable people, so unworthy of the freeborn, so unlike the conduct of the sane, that no one would doubt they were mad, if fewer people shared their madness." Explanation: Seneca's criticism of superstition, preserved by Augustine, City of God 6.10.

[512] Editor. Capuchins and Franciscans are religious orders; "shave-crowned" describes the tonsure. The papal triple crown and the Latin title "servant of the servants of God" sharpen the contrast between humility and power. This is a polemical collection of papal humiliations of rulers; the individual episodes are not authenticated here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 28–29 Had he met some of our devout pilgrims [513]going barefoot to Jerusalem, our lady of Lauretto, Rome, S. Iago, S. Thomas Shrine, to creep to those counterfeit & Maggot-eaten Reliques. Had he been present at a Masse, and seen such kissing of Paxes, crucifixes, cringes, duckings, their several attires and ceremonies, pictures of saints, [514]indulgences, pardons, vigils, fasting, feasts, crossing, knocking, kneeling at Ave-Maries, bels, with many such; ——jucunda rudi spectacula plebi, praying in Gibberish, and mumbling of beads. Had he heard an old woman say her prayers in latine, their sprinkling of holy water, and going a Procession, ——[515]incedunt monachorum agmina mille; Quid memorem vexilla, cruces, idolaque culta, &c.	Suppose he met some of our devout pilgrims walking barefoot to Jerusalem, Our Lady of Loreto, Rome, Santiago, or Saint Thomas's shrine, crawling to those counterfeit, worm-eaten relics. Suppose he attended Mass and saw the kissing of pax tablets and crucifixes, the bows and bobbing heads, their various vestments and ceremonies, pictures of saints, indulgences, pardons, vigils, fasts, feasts, signs of the cross, beating of breasts, kneeling at Hail Marys and bells, and much else: Delightful spectacles for an untaught crowd; praying in gibberish and mumbling over beads. Suppose he heard an old woman pray in Latin, or witnessed their sprinkling of holy water and their processions: A thousand companies of monks march past; why should I recount the banners, crosses, and revered images, and so on?[516]

[513] Burton. Printed p. 28, g: "Father Angelo, the Duke of Joyeux going bare-foot over the Alps to Rome, &c." Explanation: The example names a nobleman turned friar. No corresponding body marker is clearly legible; this note is placed at the reference to barefoot pilgrims.

[514] Burton. Printed p. 28, i: "Quid dicam de eorum indulgentiis, oblationibus, votis, solutionibus, jejuniis, cœnobiis, somniis, horis, organis, cantilenis, campanis, simulachris, missis, purgatoriis, mitris, breviariis, bullis, lustralibus aquis, rasuris, unctionibus, candelis, calicibus, crucibus, mappis, cereis, thuribulis, incantationibus, exorcismis, sputis, legendis, &c. Baleus de actis Rom. Pont." Translation: "What shall I say of their indulgences, offerings, vows, payments, fasts, monasteries, dreams, canonical hours, organs, songs, bells, images, Masses, purgatories, mitres, breviaries, bulls, purifying waters, tonsures, anointings, candles, chalices, crosses, cloths, wax tapers, censers, incantations, exorcisms, spittings, legends, and so on?" Explanation: John Bale, on the acts of the Roman pontiffs. The entry continues along the foot of the printed page. Its hostile catalogue mixes objects, rites, institutions, and beliefs.

[515] Burton. Printed p. 29, *: "Th. Naogeor." Explanation: Thomas Naogeorgus is the cited poet. The precise work and location of these lines have not yet been verified.

[516] Editor. S. Iago is Santiago, associated with Saint James; S. Thomas's shrine is the shrine of Thomas Becket at Canterbury. A pax was a tablet or other object kissed in a ritual sign of peace. "Knocking" means beating the breast; beads count prayers. "Gibberish" is Burton's contemptuous description of unfamiliar liturgical language.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 29 Their Breviaries, buls, hallowed beans, exorcisms, pictures, curious crosses, fables, and babies. Had he read the Golden Legend, the Turks Alcoran, or Jews Talmud, the Rabbins Comments, what would he have thought? How doest thou think he might have been affected?	Their breviaries, papal bulls, blessed beans, exorcisms, pictures, elaborate crosses, fables, and dolls. If he had read the Golden Legend, the Turks' Qur'an, the Jews' Talmud, or the rabbis' commentaries, what would he have thought? How do you think he would have reacted?[517]
Had he more particularly examined a Jesuits life amongst the rest, he should have seen an hypocrite professe povertie, [518]and yet possess more goods & lands then many princes, to have infinite treasures and revenues; teach others to fast, and play the gluttons themselves; like watermen, that rowe one way, and look another. [519]Vow virginity, talk of holinesse, and yet indeed a notorious Bawd, and famous fornicator, lascivum pecus, a very goat.	If he had singled out a Jesuit's life for closer examination, he would have seen a hypocrite professing poverty yet owning more property and land than many princes, possessing limitless treasure and income; teaching others to fast while gorging himself, like boatmen who row one way and look the other. Vowing chastity and talking of holiness, yet in reality a notorious procurer and an infamous fornicator, "a lustful beast," a very goat.[520]

[517] Editor. A breviary contains the daily offices; a papal bull is a formal document authenticated by a seal. "Babies" here means dolls or small images. The Golden Legend is Jacobus de Voragine's collection of saints' lives. Burton's grouping of it with the Qur'an, Talmud, and rabbinic commentaries expresses his religious hostility, not an equivalence of their contents.

[518] Burton. Printed p. 29, i: "Dum simulant spernere, acquisiverunt sibi 30 annorum spatio bis centena millia librarum annua. Arnold." Translation: "While pretending to despise it, within thirty years they acquired for themselves an annual income of two hundred thousand pounds." Explanation: The abbreviated authority Arnold. and the financial allegation remain unverified.

[519] Burton. Printed p. 29, k: "Et quum interdiu de virtute loquuti sunt, sero in latibulis clunes agitant labore nocturno, Agrippa." Translation: "And when they have talked of virtue during the day, late in their hiding places they work their buttocks in nocturnal labour." Explanation: Attributed to Agrippa; exact location not yet established. The Latin is a sexual accusation.

[520] Editor. These sweeping accusations of wealth, gluttony, and sexual misconduct are Burton's polemic. They have not been established as facts about Jesuits generally. Bawd means a procurer. "Vow virginity" refers here to a vow of chastity; the contrast is between the professed vow and alleged behaviour.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Monks by profession, such as give over the world, and the vanities of it, and yet a Machivilian rout [521]interested in all maner of state: holy men, peace-makers, and yet composed of envy, lust, ambition, hatred and malice, fire-brands, adulta patriæ pestis, traitors, assassinats, hâc itur ad astra, and this is to supererogate, and merit heaven for themselvs and others.[522]	Monks by profession, renouncing the world and its vanities, yet a Machiavellian gang entangled in every kind of state affair; holy men, peacemakers, yet made up of envy, lust, ambition, hatred, and malice; incendiaries, "a full-grown plague upon their country," traitors, assassins. "This is the way to the stars!" And this is to perform works beyond duty, earning heaven for themselves and others.[523]

[521] Burton. Printed p. 29, m: "Benignitatis sinus solebat esse, nunc litium officina curia Romana. Budæus." Translation: "The Roman Curia used to be the bosom of kindness; now it is a workshop of lawsuits." Explanation: Attributed to Guillaume Budé; precise location unverified.

[522] Burton. Printed p. 29, l: "1 Tim. 3.13. But they shall prevail no longer, their madnesse shall be known to all men." Explanation: The reference is misprinted: the saying corresponds to 2 Timothy 3:9. No body marker is clearly legible; placed at the end of the attack on the religious orders. Burton's English wording is retained.

[523] Editor. Machivilian invokes the stereotype of calculating, unscrupulous statecraft associated with Machiavelli. To supererogate is to perform good works beyond what duty requires. "This is the way to the stars" sarcastically recasts their alleged crimes as a means of earning heaven.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Had he seen on the adverse side, some of our nice & curious schismaticks in another extream, abhor all ceremonies, and rather lose their lives and livings, then do or admit any thing Papists have formerly used, though in things indifferent (they alone are the true Church, sal terræ, cum sint omnium insulsissimi.) Formalists, out of fear and base flattery, like so many weather-cocks turn round, a rout of temporisers, ready to embrace and maintain all that is, or shall be proposed in hope of preferment: Another Epicurean company, lying at lurch as so many vultures, watching for a prey of Church goods, and ready to rise by the down fall of any: as [524]Lucian said in like case, what dost thou think Democritus would have done, had he been spectator of these things?	Suppose he had seen, on the opposing side, some of our over-scrupulous schismatics at the other extreme, abhorring every ceremony and willing to lose their lives and livelihoods rather than perform or accept anything Catholics had previously used, even in matters neither required nor forbidden by religion. They alone are the true Church, "the salt of the earth, though they are the most tasteless of all." Conformists turn like weathercocks out of fear and servile flattery: a gang of opportunists, ready to embrace and defend whatever is or will be proposed, hoping for advancement. Another pleasure-seeking company lies in wait like vultures, looking to seize Church property and profit from anyone's downfall. As Lucian said in a similar case, what do you think Democritus would have done if he had witnessed all this?[525]
Or had he but observed the common people follow like so many sheep one of their fellows drawn by the horns over a gap, some for zeal, some for fear, quò se cunque rapit tempestas, to credit all, examine nothing, and yet ready to dye before they will abjure any of those ceremonies, to which they have been accustomed; others out of hypocrisie frequent sermons, knock their brests, turn up their eyes, pretend zeal, desire reformation, and yet professed usurers, gripers, monsters of men, harpies, devils, in their lives to expresse nothing lesse.	Or suppose he had simply watched ordinary people following like sheep after one of their flock pulled by the horns over a gap: some from zeal, some from fear, "wherever the storm carries them," believing everything, examining nothing, yet ready to die before renouncing any ceremony they are used to. Others hypocritically attend sermons, beat their breasts, turn their eyes heavenwards, profess zeal, and call for reform, yet openly practise usury and extortion—monstrous people, harpies, devils—whose lives express anything but what they profess.[526]

[524] Burton. Printed p. 29, n: "Quid tibi videtur facturus Democritus, si horum spectator contigisset?" Translation: "What do you think Democritus would have done if he had happened to witness these things?" Explanation: Attributed to Lucian in the body; the precise passage and Latin intermediary remain unlocated.

[525] Editor. Nice and curious mean over-scrupulous or excessively exacting. "Things indifferent" are practices not in themselves religiously obligatory or forbidden. The Latin plays on salt: insulsus means both unsalted and foolish. "Formalists" conform to prescribed forms; "Epicurean" is a hostile label for pleasure-seeking. "Lying at lurch" means lying in wait.

[526] Editor. The storm phrase adapts Horace, Epistles 1.1.15, changing "me" to "themselves." Harpies are mythical snatchers of food, hence rapacious people; gripers are extortioners. The final phrase means that their conduct displays the opposite of their professed zeal.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 29–30 What would he have said to see, hear, and reade so many bloudy battels, so many thousands slain at once, such streams of blood able to turn Mils: unius ob noxam furiasque, or to make sport for princes, without any just cause, [527]for vain titles (saith Austin) precedency, some wench, or such like toy, or out of desire of domineering, vain-glory, malice, revenge, folly, madnesse, (goodly causes all, ob quas universus orbis bellis & cædibus misceatur) whilst Statesmen themselves in the mean time are secure at home, pampered with all delights & pleasures, take their ease, and follow their lusts, not considering what intolerable misery poor soldiers endure, their often wounds, hunger, thirst, &c. the lamentable cares, torments, calamities & oppressions that accompany such proceedings, they feel not, take no notice of it.	What would he have said on seeing, hearing, and reading of so many bloody battles, so many thousands killed at once, streams of blood enough to turn mills, "because of one man's wrongdoing and fury," or for princes' amusement, without any just cause: for empty titles, as Augustine says, precedence, some girl or similar trifle, or from a desire to dominate, vainglory, malice, revenge, folly, or madness? Fine reasons, all of them, "for throwing the whole world into warfare and slaughter!" Meanwhile the statesmen themselves remain safe at home, pampered with every delight and pleasure, taking their ease and indulging their appetites. They give no thought to the unbearable misery of poor soldiers, their repeated wounds, hunger, thirst, and so on. They neither feel nor notice the pitiful anxieties, torments, disasters, and oppression that accompany such proceedings.[528]

[527] Burton. Printed p. 29, *: "Ob inanes ditionum titulos, ob prereptum locum, ob interceptam mulierculam, vel quod è stultitia natum, vel è malitia, quod cupido dominandi, libido nocendi, &c." Translation: "For empty titles to dominion, for a place of precedence seized, for some woman taken away, or something born of folly or malice, or a desire to dominate, a lust to do harm, and so on." Explanation: The body attributes the argument to Augustine. The exact source of this composite wording remains unverified.

[528] Editor. "Because of one man's wrongdoing and fury" adapts Virgil, Aeneid 1.41, originally about Ajax son of Oileus. "Austin" means Augustine. Burton's catalogue sets rulers' comfort against soldiers' suffering; the precise Augustinian source of the list of motives remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 30 So wars are begun, by the perswasion of a few deboisthed, hair-brain, poor, dissolute, hungry captains, parasiticall fawners, unquiet hotspurs, restlesse innovators, green heads, to satisfie one mans private spleen, lust, ambition, avarice, &c. tales rapiunt scelerata in prælia causæ. Flos hominum, Proper men, well proportioned, carefully brought up, able both in body and minde, sound, led like so many [529]beasts to the slaughter in the flower of their years, pride, and full strength, without all remorse and pity, sacrificed to Pluto, killed up as so many sheep, for devils food, 40000 at once. At once, said I, that were tollerable, but these wars last alwayes, and for many ages; nothing so familiar as this hacking and hewing, massacres, murders, desolations.	So wars begin at the urging of a few debauched, reckless, impoverished, dissolute, hungry captains, parasitic flatterers, turbulent hotheads, restless agitators, and inexperienced youths, to satisfy one man's private spite, lust, ambition, greed, and so on. "Such causes sweep people into criminal battles." "The flower of humankind"—fine, well-proportioned men, carefully raised, capable in body and mind, healthy—are led like animals to slaughter in the bloom of youth, their prime and full strength, without the least compassion or pity. They are sacrificed to Pluto, killed like sheep, food for devils: forty thousand at once. At once, did I say? That would be tolerable; but these wars go on continually, for generations. Nothing is more familiar than this hacking and hewing, massacres, murders, and devastation.[530]

[529] Burton. Printed p. 30, p: "Bellum rem plane belluinam vocat Morus. Utop. lib. 2." Translation: "More calls war an altogether beastly thing. Utopia, book 2." Explanation: Thomas More, Utopia, book 2; bellum (war) is linked with bellua (beast).

[530] Editor. Deboisthed means debauched; green heads are inexperienced young people; spleen is spite or anger. Pluto is the ruler of the dead. The forty thousand are part of Burton's denunciatory catalogue, not tied here to a specified battle. The source of tales rapiunt has not yet been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
——ignoto cœlum clangore remugit, they care not what mischief they procure, so that they may enrich themselves for the present; they will so long blow the coals of contention, till all the world be consumed with fire. The [531]siege of Troy lasted ten years eight months, there died 870000 Grecians, 670000 Trojans, at the taking of the City, and after were slain 276000 men, women, and children of all sorts. Cæsar killed a million, [532]Mahomet the second Turk 300000 persons:	"The sky bellows with an unfamiliar clash." They care nothing for the harm they cause, provided they enrich themselves for the moment. They will keep fanning the embers of conflict until the whole world burns. The siege of Troy lasted ten years and eight months: 870,000 Greeks and 670,000 Trojans died; at the city's capture and afterwards, 276,000 men, women, and children of every kind were killed. Caesar killed a million; the Ottoman ruler Mehmed II, 300,000.[533]

[531] Burton. Printed p. 30, a: "Munster. Cosmog. l. 5. c. 3. E Dict. Cretens." Translation: "Münster, Cosmography, book 5, chapter 3, from Dictys of Crete." Explanation: Sebastian Münster, Cosmography, book 5, chapter 3, citing Dictys of Crete. The figures are transmitted literary claims about the Trojan War; Burton's precise source has not been collated.

[532] Burton. Printed p. 30, b: "Jovius. vit. ejus." Translation: "Giovio, his life." Explanation: Paolo Giovio's life of Mehmed II is cited; the figure has not been independently verified.

[533] Editor. These enormous numbers are Burton's transmitted claims, not independently verified death tolls. The Trojan material belongs to the later literary history of the war. "Turk" here denotes the Ottoman ruler Mehmed II. The source of the opening line about the sky's clash remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sicinius Dentatus fought in an hundred battels, eight times in single combat he overcame, had forty wounds before, was rewarded with 140 crowns, triumphed nine times for his good service. M. Sergius had 32 wounds; Scæva the Centurion I know not how many; every nation hath their Hectors, Scipio's, Cæsars and Alexanders. Our [534]Edward the fourth was in 26 battels afoot: and as they do all, he glories in it, tis related to his honor. At the siege of Hierusalem 1100000 died with sword and famine. At the battel of Cannas, 70000 men were slain, as [535]Polibius records, and as many at battel Albye with us; and tis no news to fight from sun to sun, as they did, as Constantine and Licinius, &c.	Sicinius Dentatus fought in a hundred battles, won eight single combats, received forty wounds on the front of his body, earned 140 crowns, and triumphed nine times for his service. Marcus Sergius suffered thirty-two wounds; the centurion Scaeva, I do not know how many. Every nation has its Hectors, Scipios, Caesars, and Alexanders. Our Edward IV fought on foot in twenty-six battles. Like all of them, he glories in it, and the story is told to his honour. At the siege of Jerusalem, 1,100,000 died by the sword and famine. At Cannae, 70,000 were killed, as Polybius records, and as many at our battle of Albye. Fighting from dawn to dusk is nothing new: Constantine and Licinius did so, and others.[536]

[534] Burton. Printed p. 30, c: "Comineus." Explanation: Philippe de Commynes. The body marker is indistinct; placed beside Edward IV's alleged battle record. The claim has not yet been matched to a passage in Commynes.

[535] Burton. Printed p. 30, *: "Lib. 3." Translation: "Book 3." Explanation: Polybius, Histories, book 3, as named in the body. This identifies Burton's stated authority without validating the casualty total.

[536] Editor. The figures do not consistently agree with the ancient accounts. Pliny, Natural History 7.101–106 (older chapter 29), gives Dentatus 120 battles and 45 frontal wounds, and Sergius 23 wounds; Burton has 100, 40, and 32. Burton's text is retained. "Albye" has not been securely identified, and the Edward IV figure remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
At the siege of Ostend (the devils Academie) a poor town in respect, a small fort, but a great grave, 120000 men lost their lives, besides whole towns, dorpes, and hospitals, full of maimed souldiers; there were engines, fire-works, and whatsoever the devil could invent to do mischief with 2500000 iron bullets shot of 40 pound weight, three or four millions of gold consumed. [537]Who (saith mine Author) can be sufficiently amazed at their flinty hearts, obstinacy, fury, blindnesse, who without any likelyhood of good successe, hazard poor souldiers, and lead them without pitty to the slaughter, which may justly be called the rage of furious beasts, that run without reason upon their own deaths:	At the siege of Ostend—the devil's academy—a comparatively insignificant town, a small fort but a great grave, 120,000 men died, besides whole towns, villages, and hospitals full of maimed soldiers. There were siege engines, explosive devices, and every instrument of harm the devil could devise; 2,500,000 iron cannonballs weighing forty pounds were fired, and three or four million in gold spent. Who, my author asks, can be astonished enough at the stony hearts, stubbornness, fury, and blindness of those who risk poor soldiers' lives without any prospect of success and pitilessly lead them to slaughter? This may rightly be called the rage of furious beasts rushing senselessly to their own deaths.[538]
[539]quis malus genius, quæ furia, quæ pestis, &c. what plague, what fury brought so devilish, so brutish a thing as war first into mens minds? Who made so soft and peaceable a creature, born to love, mercy, meeknesse, so to rave, rage like beasts, & run on to their own destruction? how may nature expostulate with mankinde, Ego te divinum animal finxi, &c. I made thee an harmlesse, quiet, a divine creature: how may God expostulate, and all good men?	"What evil spirit, what fury, what plague," and so on—what plague, what fury first put so devilish and brutish a thing as war into human minds? Who made so gentle and peaceable a creature, born for love, mercy, and meekness, rave and rage like beasts and rush to its own destruction? How nature might reproach humankind: "I fashioned you a divine creature," and so on. I made you harmless, peaceful, divine. How God and every good person might remonstrate![540]

[537] Burton. Printed p. 30, d: "Hist. of the siege of Ostend. fol. 23." Explanation: The cited history and edition remain to be established. Figures and quotation are reproduced as Burton's report.

[538] Editor. The siege of Ostend lasted from 1601 to 1604. Dorpes means villages; fire-works here are military incendiary or explosive devices. The cannonball weights, numbers, expenditure, and deaths remain Burton's reported figures. The denomination of the "millions of gold" is not specified, so none has been supplied.

[539] Burton. Printed p. 30, *: "Erasmus de bello, ut placidum illud animal benevolentiæ natum tam ferina vecordia in mutuam rueret perniciem." Translation: "Erasmus on war: that this gentle creature, born for goodwill, should rush with such beastlike madness to mutual destruction." Explanation: Erasmus's argument against war compares human sociability with the savagery of combat; see Dulce bellum inexpertis. The precise Latin edition is uncollated.

[540] Editor. Erasmus argues that war contradicts the sociability nature has given humanity. Burton preserves both the Latin cue and his English expansion. This denunciation will be qualified in the ensuing discussion: he goes on to defend some wars and soldiers, so the present passage should not stand as his complete position.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 30–31 yet, horum facta (as [541]one condoles) tantum admirantur, & heroum numero habent: these are the brave spirits, the gallants of the world, these admired alone, triumph alone, have statues, crowns, piramids, obelisks to their eternal fame, that immortall Genius attends on them, hâc itur ad astra. When Rhodes was besieged, [542]fossæ urbis cadaveribus repletæ sunt, the ditches were full of dead carcases; and as when the said Solyman great Turk beleagred Vienna, they lay level with the top of the wals.	Yet, as one writer laments, "it is only their deeds that people admire, and they count them among the heroes." These are the brave spirits, the gallants of the world. They alone are admired and triumph; statues, crowns, pyramids, and obelisks perpetuate their fame. The spirit of immortality attends them: "this is the way to the stars." When Rhodes was besieged, "the city's ditches were filled with corpses"—the ditches were full of dead bodies. And when the same Ottoman ruler Suleiman besieged Vienna, the bodies lay level with the tops of the walls.[543]

[541] Burton. Printed p. 30, *: "Rich. Dinoth. præfat. Belli civilis Gal." Translation: "Richard Dinoth, preface to the French Civil War." Explanation: Richard Dinoth, preface to his account of the French civil war; exact edition uncollated.

[542] Burton. Printed p. 30, e: "Jovius." Explanation: Paolo Giovio. The reports of corpses filling ditches or reaching wall-height are retained as Burton's claims, not independently established measurements.

[543] Editor. Burton's monuments and "way to the stars" are bitterly ironic: violence receives the rewards of heroic virtue. The sieges alluded to are Suleiman's attacks on Rhodes and Vienna. The image of piled corpses is reproduced as his report; its scale has not been historically verified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 31 This they make a sport of, and will do it to their friends and confederates, against oaths, vows, promises, by trechery or otherwise. ——[544]dolus an virtus? quis in hoste requirat? leagues and laws of arms, ([545]silent leges inter arma) for their advantage, omnia jura, divina, humana, proculcata plerumque sunt; Gods and mens laws are trampled under foot; the sword alone determines all; to satisfie their lust and spleen, they care not what they attempt, say, or do, [546]Rara fides, probitasque viris qui castra sequuntur,	They make a sport of this, and will inflict it on friends and allies too, violating oaths, vows, and promises, by treachery or otherwise: "Deceit or courage—who asks which, against an enemy?" Treaties and the laws of war are broken for their advantage—"laws fall silent amid arms"—and "all laws, divine and human, are generally trampled underfoot." The laws of God and humankind are trodden down. The sword alone settles everything. To satisfy their lust and spite, they care nothing what they attempt, say, or do: Loyalty and honesty are rare among men who follow the camp.[547]

[544] Burton. Printed p. 31, z: "Dolus, asperitas, injustitia propria bellorum negotia. Tertul." Translation: "Deceit, harshness, and injustice are the proper business of wars." Explanation: Attributed to Tertullian; precise location not established. The adjacent body quotation about deceit and courage is Virgil, Aeneid 2.390.

[545] Burton. Printed p. 31, f: "Tully." Explanation: Cicero, Pro Milone 11; the quoted maxim abbreviates silent enim leges inter arma, "for laws are silent amid arms."

[546] Burton. Printed p. 31, g: "Lucan." Explanation: Adapted from Civil War 10.407. The consulted text reads nulla fides pietasque, "no loyalty or piety"; Burton prints rara and probitas, "rare" and "honesty." His wording is retained.

[547] Editor. The original syntax leaves "leagues and laws of arms" without an explicit governing verb; "are broken" supplies the sense in modern English. Virgil's deceit-or-courage line and Cicero's maxim about laws in wartime are distinct quotations. The concluding Lucan line is adapted; see the explanation added to Burton's marginal citation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nothing so common as to have [548]father fight against the son, brother against brother, kinsman against kinsman, kingdom against kingdom, province against province, christians against christians: à quibus nec unquam cogitatione fuerunt læsi, of whom they never had offence in thought, word or deed. Infinite treasures consumed, towns burned, flourishing cities sacked and ruinated, quodque animus meminisse horret, goodly countries depopulated and left desolate, old inhabitants expelled, trade and traffick decayed, maids defloured, Virgines nondum thalamis jugatæ, Et comis nondum positis ephebi;	Nothing is more common than father fighting son, brother fighting brother, relation fighting relation, kingdom fighting kingdom, province fighting province, Christians fighting Christians, "by whom they have never been harmed even in thought"—people who have never offended them in thought, word, or deed. Limitless wealth is spent, towns burned, flourishing cities sacked and ruined; and, "what the mind shudders to recall," fine countries are emptied of people and left desolate, their old inhabitants driven out, trade and commerce ruined, young women raped: maidens not yet joined in marriage, and youths whose locks have not yet been cut.[549]

[548] Burton. Printed p. 31, h: "Pater in filium, affinis in affinem, amicus in amicum, &c. Regio cum regione, regnum regno colliditur: Populus populo in mutuam perniciem, belluarum instar sanguinolente ruentium." Translation: "Father against son, relation against relation, friend against friend, and so on. Region clashes with region, kingdom with kingdom; people against people, rushing bloodily like beasts to mutual destruction." Explanation: No author is given here. The Latin catalogue differs slightly from the English one.

[549] Editor. The mind's shudder recalls Virgil, Aeneid 2.12. The two verse lines are Seneca, Hercules Furens 852–53, describing the young among the dead; uncut hair marks youth. "Defloured" here denotes rape in war.

Original text 1651	Modern English
chast matrons cry out with Andromache, [550]Concubitum mox cogar pati ejus, qui interemit Hectorem, they shall be compelled peradventure to ly with them that erst kil'd their husbands: to see rich, poor, sick, sound, Lords, servants, eodem omnes incommodo macti, consumed all or maimed, &c. Et quicquid gaudens scelere animus audet, & perversa mens, saith Cyprian, and whatsoever torment, misery, mischief, hell it self, the devill, [551]fury and rage can invent to their own ruin and destruction; so abominable thing is [552]war, as Gerbelius concludes, adeo fœda & abominanda res est bellum, ex quo hominum cædes, vastationes, &c. the scourge of God, cause, effect, fruit and punishment of sin, and not tonsura humani generis, as Tertullian cals it, but ruina.	Chaste wives cry out with Andromache, "Soon I shall be forced to submit to the embraces of the man who killed Hector": perhaps they will be forced to sleep with those who killed their husbands. To see rich and poor, sick and healthy, masters and servants, "all stricken by the same calamity," destroyed or maimed, and so on; "and whatever a spirit delighting in crime and a perverted mind dare," as Cyprian says; and every torment, misery, and outrage that hell itself, the devil, fury, and rage can devise for their own ruin and destruction! War is so abominable, as Gerbelius concludes: "War is so foul and detestable a thing, bringing human slaughter, devastation," and so on. It is God's scourge, the cause, effect, fruit, and punishment of sin; not "a pruning of humankind," as Tertullian calls it, but "its ruin."[553]

[550] Burton. Printed p. 31, *: "Libanii declam." Translation: "A declamation of Libanius." Explanation: Libanius's declamations are cited for Andromache's lament. The specific declamation and intermediary have not yet been verified.

[551] Burton. Printed p. 31, i: "Ira enim & furor Bellonæ consultores, &c. dementes sacerdotes sunt." Translation: "For anger and rage are Bellona's counsellors, and so on; they are mad priests." Explanation: Bellona is the Roman goddess of war; no author is named in this entry.

[552] Burton. Printed p. 31, k: "Bellum quasi bellua & ad omnia scelera furor immissus." Translation: "War is like a beast, a fury let loose upon every crime." Explanation: The wordplay associates bellum, war, with bellua, a beast. The body names Gerbelius; the work and precise passage remain unverified.

[553] Editor. Andromache, Hector's widow, represents the captive wife subjected to her conquerors. Burton's attributed wording is translated as printed; its Libanian source remains unverified. Tertullian, On the Soul 30, treats war and other calamities as a pruning of an overcrowded human race; Burton pointedly replaces pruning with ruin. The precise Cyprian and Gerbelius passages remain unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Had Democritus been present at the late civill wars in France, those abominable wars, ——bellaque matribus detestata, [554]Where in lesse then ten years, ten hundred thousand men were consumed, saith Collignius, 20 thousand Churches overthrown; nay, the whole kingdom subverted (as [555]Richard Dinoth adds.) So many myriades of the Commons were butchered up, with sword, famine, war, tanto odio utrinque ut barbari ad abhorrendam lanienam obstupescerent, with such ferall hatred, the world was amazed at it:	Suppose Democritus had witnessed the recent civil wars in France, those abominable wars, wars hated by mothers, in which, Coligny says, a million people perished in less than ten years and twenty thousand churches were destroyed—indeed, the whole kingdom overturned, as Richard Dinoth adds. So many tens of thousands of ordinary people were butchered by the sword, famine, and war, "with such hatred on both sides that even barbarians were stunned by the dreadful slaughter": such savage hatred that the world stood amazed.[556]

[554] Burton. Printed p. 31, l: "Gallorum decies centum millia ceciderunt, Ecclesiarum 20 millia fundamentis excisa." Translation: "A million French people fell; twenty thousand churches were razed to their foundations." Explanation: The body attributes these totals to Coligny. They are reported claims, not verified casualty or destruction counts.

[555] Burton. Printed p. 31, m: "Belli civilis gal. l. 1. hoc ferali bello & cædibus omnia repleverunt, & regnum amplissimum a fundamentis pene everterunt, plebis tot myriades gladio, bello, fame miserabiliter perierunt." Translation: "They filled everything with this savage war and slaughter, and almost overthrew that vast kingdom from its foundations; so many tens of thousands of common people perished miserably by sword, war, and famine." Explanation: Richard Dinoth, French Civil War, book 1; precise edition and passage uncollated.

[556] Editor. "Recent" is relative to Burton's lifetime: he refers to the sixteenth-century French religious wars. The line about wars hated by mothers is Horace, Odes 1.1.24–25. "Commons" means ordinary people; myriades means tens of thousands. Burton attributes the numerical totals to Coligny and the devastation to Richard Dinoth; the totals remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
or at our late Pharsalian fields, in the time of Henry the sixt, betwixt the houses of Lancaster and York, an hundred thousand men slain, [557]one writes, [558]another, ten thousand families were rooted out, that no man can but marvel, saith Comineus, at that barbarous immanitie, ferall madnesse, committed betwixt men of the same nation, language and religion. [559]Quis furor O cives? Why do the Gentiles so furiously rage, saith the Prophet David, Psal. 2. 1. But we may ask, why do the Christians so furiously rage? [560]Arma volunt, quare poscunt, rapiuntque juventus?	Or suppose he had witnessed our own recent fields of Pharsalus, in Henry VI's time, between the houses of Lancaster and York: one writer says a hundred thousand people were killed; another, that ten thousand families were wiped out. No one can help marvelling, says Commynes, at the barbarous brutality and savage madness practised between people of the same nation, language, and religion. "What madness is this, citizens?" "Why do the nations rage so furiously?" asks the prophet David, Psalm 2:1. But we may ask: why do Christians rage so furiously? Why do the young men want weapons, demand them, and seize them?[561]

[557] Burton. Printed p. 31, *: "Pont. Huterus." Explanation: Pontus Heuterus is the authority cited for the hundred thousand dead; precise work and location unverified.

[558] Burton. Printed p. 31, n: "Comineus. Ut nullus non execretur & admiretur crudelitatem & barbaram insaniam, quæ inter homines eodem sub cœlo natos ejusdem linguæ, sanguinis, religionis exercebatur." Translation: "So that everyone must curse and marvel at the cruelty and barbarous madness practised among people born beneath the same sky, of the same language, blood, and religion." Explanation: Philippe de Commynes. The entry continues across the foot of the printed page; exact source wording uncollated.

[559] Burton. Printed p. 31, o: "Lucan." Explanation: Civil War 1.8: Lucan challenges the citizens of Rome about their madness in civil war.

[560] Burton. Printed p. 31, *: "Virg." Explanation: An adaptation of Virgil, Aeneid 7.340. Juno there orders the Fury Allecto to make the young men want, demand, and seize weapons. Burton recasts the line as a question.

[561] Editor. The English "Pharsalian fields" are a comparison with Roman civil war, applied to the fifteenth-century struggles of Lancaster and York. Immanitie means monstrous cruelty. Psalm 2:1 supplies the challenge about raging nations, which Burton redirects at Christians. His Virgil adaptation turns an order to incite war into a question about its madness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 31–32 Unfit for Gentiles, much lesse for us so to tyranize, as the Spaniards in the West Indies, that killed up in 42 years (if we may believe [562]Bartholomæus à Casa their own bishop) 12 millions of men, with stupend & exquisite torments; neither should I ly (said he) if I said 50 millions. I omit those French Massacres, Sicilian Evensongs, [563]the Duke of Alvas tyrannies, our gunpowder machinations, and that fourth fury, as [564]one cals it, the Spanish inquisition, which quite obscures those ten persecutions, [565]——sævit toto Mars impius orbe,	Such tyranny is unfit for non-Christians, still less for us: consider the Spaniards in the Americas, who in forty-two years killed twelve million people with appalling, elaborate tortures, if we may believe their own bishop, Bartolomé de las Casas. Nor would I be lying, he said, if I put the number at fifty million. I pass over the French massacres, the Sicilian Vespers, the Duke of Alba's tyrannies, our Gunpowder Plot, and that fourth Fury, as one writer calls it, the Spanish Inquisition, which quite overshadows those ten persecutions: Impious Mars rages throughout the world.[566]

[562] Burton. Printed p. 31, p: "Bishop of Cusco an eye-witness." Explanation: Las Casas was bishop of Chiapas, not Cusco. Burton's description of him as an eyewitness does not establish that he personally witnessed every event or validated the totals reported here.

[563] Burton. Printed p. 32, q: "Read Meteran of his stupend cruelties." Explanation: Emanuel van Meteren on the Duke of Alba. Stupend means astounding or appalling; exact passage uncollated.

[564] Burton. Printed p. 32, r: "Hensius Austriaco." Explanation: Apparently Daniel Heinsius's Austriacus; the abbreviated title and precise passage require collation.

[565] Burton. Printed p. 32, s: "Virg. Georg." Explanation: Virgil, Georgics 1.511. Mars, the god of war, stands for warfare.

[566] Editor. Burton's fifty million is preserved. The Spanish Brief Account gives twelve million, then more than fifteen; the 1689 English translation available through Project Gutenberg gives fifty, showing a discrepancy in transmission rather than establishing Burton's intermediary. These are historical claims, not audited totals. "Sicilian Evensongs" is the Sicilian Vespers; "gunpowder machinations" is the Gunpowder Plot. The fourth Fury adds the Inquisition to the three mythological Furies; the "ten persecutions" invokes a traditional Christian reckoning.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 32 Is not this [567]Mundus furiosus, a mad world, as he terms it, insanum bellum? are not these mad men, as [568]Scaliger concludes, qui in prælio acerbâ morte, insaniæ suæ memoriam pro perpetuo teste relinquunt posteritati; which leave so frequent battels, as perpetual memorials of their madnesse to all succeeding ages? Would this, think you, have enforced our Democritus to laughter, or rather made him turn his tune, alter his tone, and weep with [569]Heraclitus, or rather howl, [570]roar, and tear his hair in commiseration, stand amazed; or as the Poets faign, that Niobe was for grief quite stupified, and turned to a stone?	Is this not "a world gone mad", as he calls it—a mad world, "insane war"? Are these not madmen, as Scaliger concludes, "who, by a bitter death in battle, leave to posterity the memory of their madness as an everlasting witness"—who leave so many battles as lasting memorials of their madness to every succeeding age? Would this, do you think, have driven our Democritus to laughter? Or would it have made him change his tune, alter his tone, and weep with Heraclitus—or rather howl, roar, tear his hair in pity, and stand appalled; or, as the poets imagine of Niobe, become utterly numb with grief and turn to stone?[571]

[567] Burton. Printed p. 32, t: "Jansenius Gallobelgicus 1596. Mundus furiosus, inscriptio libri." Translation: "Jansenius Gallobelgicus, 1596. A World Gone Mad, the title of the book." Explanation: The author, edition, and relationship of this title to the Gallobelgicus citation remain unresolved.

[568] Burton. Printed p. 32, *: "Exercitat. 250. serm. 4." Translation: "Exercise 250, discourse 4." Explanation: Scaliger's Exercises, 250, discourse 4, as cited. The body names Scaliger; the precise edition and wording remain uncollated.

[569] Burton. Printed p. 32, u: "Fleat Heraclitus an rideat Democritus." Translation: "Should Heraclitus weep, or Democritus laugh?" Explanation: The traditional contrast is between the weeping Heraclitus and the laughing Democritus.

[570] Burton. Printed p. 32, x: "Curæ leves loquuntur, ingentes stupent." Translation: "Small griefs speak; great ones are struck dumb." Explanation: Seneca, Phaedra 607.

[571] Editor. The Latin attributed to Scaliger speaks of a bitter death in battle; Burton's English expansion speaks of battles as memorials. Both are retained. Niobe, bereaved of her children, becomes stone in Ovid, Metamorphoses 6.301–312. "Stupified" means numbed or struck senseless by grief. The passage tests whether satirical laughter can survive the spectacle of mass suffering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I have not yet said the worst, that which is more absurd and [572]mad, In their tumults, seditions, civil & unjust wars, [573]quod stultè suscipitur, impiè geritur, miserè finitur, such wars I mean, for all are not to be condemned, as those phantastical Anabaptists vainly conceive. Our Christian Tacticks are all out as necessary as the Roman Acies, or Grecian Phalanx; to be a souldier is a most noble and honorable profession (as the world is) not to be spared, they are our best wals and bulwarks,	I have not yet said the worst, what is more absurd and mad: in their tumults, rebellions, civil and unjust wars—"what is foolishly undertaken, impiously conducted, and miserably ended." Those are the wars I mean, for we should not condemn them all, as those deluded Anabaptists foolishly imagine. Our Christian military formations are every bit as necessary as the Roman battle line or the Greek phalanx. Soldiering is a most noble and honourable profession, given the state of the world, and we cannot do without it. Soldiers are our best walls and defences.[574]

[572] Burton. P. 32, y: "Arma amens capio, nec sat rationis in armis." Translation: "Madly I take up arms; there is not enough reason in taking arms." Virgil, Aeneid 2.314, where Aeneas reacts to the sack of Troy.

[573] Burton. P. 32, z: "Erasmus." This attribution accompanies the three-part judgement on war. The exact passage and wording have not yet been located.

[574] Editor. Burton now limits the preceding indictment to unjust warfare and explicitly defends soldiering "as the world is." His reference to Anabaptists targets their rejection of military service; the hostile generalization belongs to his polemic. Acies is a battle line; a phalanx is a close formation of infantry. The opening deliberately resumes the unfinished argument of Block 009.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and I do therefore acknowledg that of [575]Tully to be most true. All our civil affairs, all our studies, all our pleading, industrie and commendation lies under the protection of warlike vertues, and whensoever there is any suspition of tumult, all our arts cease; wars are most behovefull & bellatores agricolis civitati sunt utiliores, as [576]Tyrius defends: and valor is much to be commended in a wise man, but they mistake most part, auferre, trucidare, rapere, falsis nominibus virtutem vocant, &c. ('Twas Galgacus observation in Tacitus) they term theft, murder, and rapine, vertue, by a wrong name, rapes, slaughters, massacres, &c. jocus & ludus, are pretty pastimes, as Ludovicus Vives notes.	I therefore acknowledge the complete truth of Cicero's words: All our civil affairs, all our studies, all our pleading, industry, and distinction lie under the protection of military courage; whenever there is any fear of unrest, all our arts fall silent. Wars are most useful, and "soldiers are more useful to the state than farmers," as Maximus of Tyre argues. Courage in a wise man deserves great praise. But people usually get this wrong: "Stealing, slaughtering, plundering—they give these the false name of virtue," and so on. This was Calgacus's observation in Tacitus. They wrongly call theft, murder, and plunder virtue; rapes, slaughters, massacres, and so on become "fun and games," pleasant pastimes, as Juan Luis Vives observes.[577]

[575] Burton. P. 32, first *: "Pro Murena. Omnes urbanæ res, omnia studia, omnis forensis laus & industria latet in tutela & præsidio bellicæ virtutis, & simul atque increpuit suspicio tumultus, artes illico nostræ conticescunt." Translation: "All civil affairs, all studies, all distinction and industry in the courts lie under the protection and defence of military courage; as soon as the suspicion of unrest sounds, our arts immediately fall silent." Located in Cicero, Pro Murena 22; Burton abbreviates its wording.

[576] Burton. P. 32, second *: "Ser. 13." A reference to a discourse of Maximus of Tyre. Burton's numbering and the precise Latin version remain to be checked; the assertion in the body is translated without treating it as an independently verified quotation.

[577] Editor. Tacitus, Agricola 30, gives Calgacus's attack on Roman conquest: the conquerors call plunder and slaughter imperium, "empire" or "dominion." Burton substitutes virtutem, "virtue," adapting the quotation to his argument about false honour. The modern column follows Burton's version. The precise Vives passage remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[578]They commonly call the most hair-brain blood-suckers, strongest theeves, the most desperate villains, trecherous rogues, inhumane murderers, rash, cruel and dissolute caitiffs, couragious and generous spirits, heroical and worthy Captains, [579]brave men at arms, valiant and renowned souldiers, possessed with a brute perswasion of false honour, as Pontus Huter in his Burgundian historie complains.	As Pontus Heuterus complains in his history of Burgundy, they commonly call the most reckless bloodsuckers, the strongest thieves, the most desperate villains, treacherous rogues, inhuman murderers, rash, cruel, and dissolute scoundrels "courageous and noble spirits," "heroic and worthy commanders"—brave men-at-arms, valiant and renowned soldiers, possessed by a brutish belief in false honour.
By means of which it comes to passe that daily so many voluntaries offer themselves, leaving their sweet wives, children, friends, for six pence (if they can get it) a day, prostitute their lives and limbs, desire to enter upon breaches, ly sentinel, perdue, give the first onset, stand in the fore-front of the battell, marching bravely on, with a cheerful noise of drums and trumpets, such vigor and alacrity, so many banners streaming in the ayr, glittering armours, motions of plumes, woods of pikes, and swords, variety of colours, cost and magnificence, as if they went in triumph, now victors to the Capitol, and with such pomp, as when Darius army marched to meet Alexander at Issus.	That is why so many volunteers offer themselves every day, leaving their dear wives, children, and friends to sell their lives and limbs for sixpence a day, if they can get it. They long to storm breaches, stand sentry, lie at an exposed outpost, make the first assault, stand in the very front of battle. They march splendidly onward to the cheerful sound of drums and trumpets, with such vigour and eagerness, so many banners streaming in the air, glittering armour, waving plumes, forests of pikes and swords, such varied colours, expense, and magnificence, as though already victorious and marching in triumph to the Capitol, with all the pomp of Darius's army marching to meet Alexander at Issus.[580]

[578] Burton. P. 32, a: "Crudelissimos sævissimosque latrones, fortissimos haberi propugnatores, fidissimos duces habent, bruta persuasione donati." Translation: "They regard the cruellest and most savage robbers as the bravest defenders and most trustworthy leaders, endowed with a brutish conviction." The body attributes this complaint to Pontus Heuterus's Burgundian history; its exact location remains unresolved.

[579] Burton. P. 32, b: "Eobanus Hessus. Quibus omnis in armis vita placet, non ulla juvat nisi morte, nec ullam esse putant vitam, quæ non assueverit armis." Translation: "Men who delight in a whole life under arms, whom no life pleases except through death, and who think no life worth calling life unless it is accustomed to arms." Attribution to the humanist poet Eobanus Hessus retained; the precise work and the awkward middle clause remain unverified.

[580] Editor. "Perdue" denotes a soldier posted in an especially exposed position. A breach is a gap forced in a fortification. The Capitol evokes a Roman triumphal procession; the comparison with Darius's imposing army is pointed because it marched toward defeat at Issus. The sixpence is Burton's stated daily pay, qualified by his doubt that it will be received.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 32–33 Void of all fear they run into eminent dangers, Canons mouth, &c. ut vulneribus suis ferrum hostium hebetent, saith [581]Barletius, to get a name of valour, honour and applause, which lasts not neither, for it is but a meer flash this fame, and like a rose, intra diem unum extinguitur, tis gone in an instant. Of 15000 proletaries slain in a battel, scarce fifteen are recorded in history, or one alone, the General perhaps, and after a while his and their names are likewise blotted out, the whole battel itself is forgotten.	Without a trace of fear they rush into immediate dangers, into the cannon's mouth, and so on, "to blunt the enemy's swords with their wounds," as Barleti says, seeking a reputation for courage, honour, and applause. That does not last either: this fame is only a flash, and, like a rose, "dies within a single day"; it is gone in an instant. Of fifteen thousand common soldiers killed in a battle, scarcely fifteen are recorded in history, or perhaps just one, the general. After a while his name and theirs are erased as well, and the whole battle itself is forgotten.[582]
Source page 33 Those Grecian Orators, summa vi ingenii & eloquentiæ, set out the renowned overthrows at Thermopylæ, Salamina, Marathro, Micale, Mantinea, Cheronæa, Platæa: The Romans record their battel at Cannas, and Pharsalian fields, but they do but record, and we scarce hear of them. And yet this supposed honor, popular applause, desire of immortality by this means, pride and vain-glory spurs them on many times rashly and unadvisedly, to make away themselves and multitudes of others.	Those Greek orators, "with all the power of their genius and eloquence," describe the famous defeats at Thermopylae, Salamis, Marathon, Mycale, Mantinea, Chaeronea, and Plataea. The Romans record their battles at Cannae and on the fields of Pharsalus. But they merely record them, and we scarcely hear of them. Yet this supposed honour, popular applause, hope of immortality through war, pride, and vainglory often spur men rashly and thoughtlessly to destroy themselves and multitudes of others.[583]

[581] Burton. P. 32, c: "Lib. 10. vit. Scanderbeg." Marin Barleti's life of Skanderbeg, book 10. The main-text Latin is translated on the right; its exact passage in Barleti has not been independently collated.

[582] Editor. "Proletaries" here means soldiers drawn from the common people, not the later political category "proletariat." The fifteen-thousand-to-fifteen comparison is Burton's rhetorical illustration of anonymity, not a documented casualty calculation. "Eminent" is understood here in the sense of immediately threatening.

[583] Editor. "Overthrows" means defeats or routs; Burton does not say that the Greeks won every battle he lists. The modern column regularizes familiar place-names, including printed Marathro as Marathon, Cannas as Cannae, and Pharsalian fields as Pharsalus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Alexander was sorry, because there were no more worlds for him to conquer, he is admired by some for it, animosa vox videtur, & regia, 'twas spoken like a Prince, but as wise [584]Seneca censures him, 'twas vox inquissima & stultissima, 'twas spoken like a bedlam fool: and that sentence which the same [585]Seneca appropriates to his father Philip and him, I apply to them all, Non minores fuere pestes mortalium quàm inundatio, quàm conflagratio, quibus, &c. they did as much mischief to mortall men as fire and water, those mercilesse elements when they rage.	Alexander grieved because there were no more worlds for him to conquer, and some admire him for it: "It seems a spirited and kingly utterance"; he spoke like a prince. But, as wise Seneca rebukes him, it was "a most unjust and foolish utterance"; he spoke like a mad fool. And I apply to them all the judgement that Seneca passes on Alexander and his father Philip: "They were no less a plague to humanity than a flood or a conflagration, by which," and so on. They did as much harm to human beings as fire and water, those merciless elements when they rage.[586]

[584] Burton. P. 33, d: "Nulli beatiores habiti, quàm qui in præliis cecidissent. Brisonius de rep. Persarum. l. 3. fol. 3. 44. Idem Lactantius de Romanis & Græcis. Idem Ammianus lib. 23. de Parthis. Judicatur is solus beatus apud eos, qui in prælio fuderit animam. De Benef. lib. 2. c. 1." Translation of the Latin: "None were considered happier than those who had fallen in battle. Brisson, On the Persian Commonwealth, book 3, fol. 3. 44. The same in Lactantius on the Romans and Greeks; likewise Ammianus, book 23, on the Parthians. Among them, only one who has poured out his life in battle is judged blessed." The printed entry combines material about death in battle with a final Seneca reference; its body marker d is beside Seneca. The relevant Alexander passage is On Benefits 2.16, not the printed 2.1. The Brisson folio figures are retained as printed; those cross-references remain uncollated.

[585] Burton. P. 33, e: "Nat. quæst. lib. 3." Seneca, Natural Questions 3, preface 5: the comparison of conquerors to flood and fire is located there. Burton compresses the passage.

[586] Editor. Burton joins different Alexander anecdotes. Seneca, On Benefits 2.16, calls Alexander's answer about giving away a city foolish: the rebuke is not about having no more worlds to conquer. Burton's printed De Benef. 2.1 and inquissima are retained; the latter is understood as iniquissima, "most unjust." The comparison with destructive elements is separately located in Natural Questions 3, preface 5. "Bedlam" is used as an abusive shorthand for madness, not a diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[587]Which is yet more to be lamented, they perswade them, this hellish course of life is holy, they promise heaven to such as venture their lives bello sacro, and that by these bloody wars, as Persians, Greeks, and Romans of old, as modern Turks do now their Commons, to encourage them to fight, ut cadant infeliciter, If they dy in the field, they go directly to heaven, and shall be canonized for saints, (O diabolical invention!) put in the Chronicles, in perpetuam rei memoriam, to their eternal memorie:	More lamentable still, they persuade men that this hellish way of life is holy. They promise heaven to those who risk their lives "in a holy war", and say that through these bloody wars—as the Persians, Greeks, and Romans told their people long ago, and the Turks tell theirs now, to encourage them to fight, "so that they may fall miserably"—if they die on the battlefield, they go straight to heaven and will be canonized as saints. What a diabolical invention! They will be entered in the chronicles "as a perpetual memorial of the event," so that they are remembered for ever.[588]

[587] Burton. P. 33, f: "Boterus Amphitridion. Busbequius Turc. hist. Per cædes & sanguinem parare hominibus ascensum in cœlum putant, Lactan. de falsa relig. l. 1. cap. 8." Translation of the Latin sentence: "They think that slaughter and bloodshed prepare men an ascent to heaven." The note names Botero, Busbecq's account of the Turks, and Lactantius, On False Religion, book 1, chapter 8. The abbreviated title Amphitridion is retained; the exact passages and transmission remain unresolved.

[588] Editor. Burton groups different religious traditions under his Christian language of heaven, sainthood, and canonization. This is his polemical description of incentives to fight, not an editorial account of what all these traditions teach. The grammatical thread is that authorities encourage soldiers with promises of salvation and enduring fame.

Original text 1651	Modern English
when as in truth, as [589]some hold, it were much better (since wars are the scourge of God for sin, by which he punisheth mortal mens peevishnes and folly) such brutish stories were suppressed, because ad morum institutionem nihil habent, they conduce not at all to maners, or good life. But they will have it thus neverthelesse, & so they put a note of [590]divinity upon the most cruel, and pernicious plague of humane kinde, adore such men with grand titles, degrees, statues, images, [591]honor, applaud and highly reward them for their good service, no greater glory then to die in the field.	Yet in truth, as some hold, it would be much better to suppress such brutal histories, since wars are God's scourge for sin, with which he punishes human perversity and folly. For "they contribute nothing to moral education"; they do nothing to improve conduct or teach a good life. Nevertheless, people insist on it, and so they place the mark of divinity on the cruellest and most destructive plague of humanity. They worship such men with grand titles, ranks, statues, and portraits; honour, applaud, and richly reward them for their good service. There is no greater glory, they say, than to die in battle.

[589] Burton. P. 33, g: "Quoniam bella acerbissima dei flagella sunt quibus hominum pertinaciam punit, ea perpetua oblivione sepelienda potius quàm memoriæ mandanda plerique judicant. Rich Dinoth. præf. hist. Gall." Translation: "Because wars are God's bitterest scourges, with which he punishes human obstinacy, many judge that they should be buried in perpetual oblivion rather than committed to memory." Attributed to Richard Dinoth's preface to his history of France; exact wording not independently located.

[590] Burton. P. 33, h, continued across the foot of the page: "Cruentam humani generis pestem, & perniciem divinitatis notâ insigniunt." Translation: "They mark the bloody plague and destruction of humankind with the badge of divinity." No separate source is named in this entry.

[591] Burton. P. 33, i, at the foot of the page: "Et quod dolendum, applausum habent & occursum viri tales." Translation: "And, lamentably, men of this kind receive applause and welcoming crowds." No separate source is named.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So Africanus is extolled by Ennius: Mars, and [592]Hercules, & I know not how many besides of old were deified, went this way to heaven, that were indeed bloody butchers, wicked destroyers, and troublers of the world, prodigious monsters, hel-hounds, feral plagues, devourers, common executioners of human kinde, as Lactantius truely proves, & Cyprian to Donat, such as were desperate in wars, and precipitately made away themselves (like those Celtes in Damascen, with ridiculous valour, ut dedecorosum putarent muro ruenti se subducere, a disgrace to run away for a rotten wall, now ready to fall on their heads) such as will not rush on a swords point, or seek to shun a canons shot, are base cowards, & no valiant men.	Thus Ennius praises Scipio Africanus. Mars, Hercules, and I do not know how many others in ancient times were made gods and reached heaven by this route, though they were really bloody butchers, wicked destroyers and disturbers of the world, monstrous prodigies, hellhounds, deadly plagues, devourers, public executioners of humankind, as Lactantius truly demonstrates, and Cyprian in his address to Donatus. Such men were reckless in war and rushed headlong to their deaths, like the Celts described by Nicolaus of Damascus, whose courage was so absurd "that they thought it disgraceful to get out of the way of a falling wall"—a disgrace to run from a rotten wall about to fall on their heads. Anyone who will not rush onto a sword's point, or who tries to avoid a cannon shot, is a base coward, they say, and no brave man.[593]

[592] Burton. P. 33, k, at the foot of the page: "Herculi eadem porta ad cœlum patuit, qui magnam generis humani partem perdidit." Translation: "The same gate to heaven opened to Hercules, who destroyed a great part of humankind." The exact source of these words remains unlocated.

[593] Editor. Africanus is Scipio Africanus; Ennius is the Roman poet. Burton's sentence runs awkwardly from ancient deification to modern accusations of cowardice; "they say" in the modern column makes the latter accusation's reported status clear. Damascen is understood as Nicolaus of Damascus, but the exact passage about the Celts has not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 33–34 By which means, Madet orbis mutuo sanguine, the earth wallows in her own blood, [594]Sævit amor ferri & scelerati insania belli, and for that, which if it be done in private, a man shall be rigorously executed, [595]and which is no lesse then murder it self, if the same fact be done in publike in wars, it is called manhood, and the party is honored for it. —— [596]prosperum & fœlix scelus Virtus vocatur ——— We measure all as Turks do, by the event, and most part, as Cyprian notes, in all ages, countreys, places, sævitiæ magnitudo impunitatem sceleris acquirit, the foulnesse of the fact vindicates the offender.	As a result, "the world is drenched in the blood men shed of one another"; the earth wallows in her own blood. "Love of the sword rages, and the madness of criminal war." For an act that would bring a man stern execution if done privately, and that is nothing less than murder itself, becomes courage when done publicly in war, and its perpetrator is honoured. "Successful and fortunate crime is called virtue." Like the Turks, we judge everything by the outcome. And generally, as Cyprian observes, in every age, country, and place, "the enormity of the cruelty secures impunity for the crime"; the very horror of the act protects the offender.[597]

[594] Burton. P. 33, a, at the foot of the page: "Virg. Æneid. 7." Virgil, Aeneid 7.461. The consulted text reads scelerata insania belli, "the criminal madness of war"; Burton prints scelerati insania belli, "the madness of criminal war," which is retained and translated here.

[595] Burton. P. 33, b, at the foot of the page: "Homicidium quum committunt singuli, crimen est, quum publicè geritur, virtus vocatur. Cyprianus." Translation: "When individuals commit homicide it is a crime; when it is done publicly it is called virtue." Located in Cyprian, To Donatus 6, alongside the images of mutual bloodshed and impunity for great cruelty.

[596] Burton. P. 34, c: "Seneca." Hercules Furens, in Amphitryon's speech about Lycus's usurpation; the line begins prosperum ac felix scelus in the consulted text. Burton's & is equivalent to "and."

[597] Editor. Cyprian, To Donatus 6, supplies the connected sequence of worldwide bloodshed, murder renamed virtue, and cruelty protected by its scale. Burton interweaves it with Virgil and Seneca. His comparison with Turks is part of his own hostile rhetoric; the force of "we" makes the accusation turn back on his own society.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 34 [598]One is crowned for that which another is tormented: Ille crucem sceleris precium tulit, hic diadema. made a Knight, a Lord, an Earl, a great Duke, (as [599]Agrippa notes) for which another should have hung in gibbets, as a terror to the rest, [600]& tamen alter, Si fecisset idem, caderet sub judice morum.	One is crowned for what brings another torment: For his crime one received a cross, another a crown. One is made a knight, a lord, an earl, a great duke, as Agrippa observes, for a deed that would have left another hanging from a gibbet as a warning to the rest: And yet another man, if he had done the same, would fall before the judge of morals.[601]
A poor sheep-stealer is hanged for stealing of victuals, compelled peradventure by necessity of that intollerable cold, hunger, and thirst, to save himself from starving: but a [602]great man in office, may securely rob whole provinces, undo thousands, pill and pole, oppresse ad libitum, flea, grinde, tyrannize, enrich himself by spoils of the Commons, be uncontroleable in his actions, and after all, be recompensed with turgent titles, honored for his good service, and no man dare finde fault, or [603]mutter at it.	A poor sheep thief is hanged for stealing food, driven perhaps by intolerable cold, hunger, and thirst to save himself from starvation. But a great man in office may safely rob whole provinces, ruin thousands, pillage and fleece them, oppress "at will," strip, grind down, and tyrannize over people, enrich himself by plundering the common people, and act beyond anyone's control. After all that, he is rewarded with swelling titles and honoured for his good service, and no one dares find fault or even mutter about it.[604]

[598] Burton. P. 34, d: "Juven." Juvenal, Satire 13.105. The line contrasts crucifixion and a crown as rewards for the same crime.

[599] Burton. P. 34, e: "De vanit. scient. de princip. nobilitatis." Cornelius Agrippa, On the Vanity of the Sciences, the discussion of the origin of nobility. Exact chapter and passage remain to be collated.

[600] Burton. P. 34, f: "Juven. Sat. 4." Juvenal, Satire 4.11–12. The judge of morals is the censor; Burton applies the contrast to unequal punishment.

[601] Editor. The cross in Juvenal is an instrument of execution; the diadem is a royal crown. A gibbet is a gallows or a structure for displaying an executed body. Burton joins several quotations to show social rank transforming the treatment of the same conduct.

[602] Burton. P. 34, g: "Pausa rapit, quod Natta reliquit. Tu pessimus omnium latro es, as Demetrius the Pirat told Alexander in Curtius." Translation: "Pausa steals what Natta left. You are the worst robber of all." The first name is printed Pausa; the familiar line in Juvenal 8.96 reads Pansa. The pirate's rebuke of Alexander also appears in Augustine, City of God 4.4, but that account does not establish Burton's name Demetrius or his Curtius attribution. Those details remain unverified.

[603] Burton. P. 34, h: "Non ausi mutire, &c. Æsop." Translation: "Not daring to mutter," and so on. Burton names Aesop; the particular fable and version remain unidentified.

[604] Editor. "Pill and pole" means pillage and strip people of their possessions; "flea" here means flay or fleece. The accumulating verbs compare extortion with skinning and grinding. "Turgent" means swollen or inflated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
How would our Democritus have been affected, to see a wicked caitiffe, or [605]fool, a very idiot, a funge, a golden ass, a monster of men, to have many good men, wise men, learned men to attend upon him with all submission, as an appendix to his riches, for that respect alone, because he hath more wealth and money, [606]and to honour him with divine titles, and bumbast Epithets, to smother him with fumes and eulogies, whom they know to be a dizard, a fool, a covetous wretch, a beast, &c. because he is rich? To see sub exuviis leonis onagrum, a filthy lothsome carcasse, a Gorgons head puffed up by parasites, assume this unto himself, glorious titles, in worth an infant, a Cuman asse, a painted sepulchre, an Egyptian temple?	How would our Democritus have felt to see a wicked scoundrel or fool, a complete idiot, a brainless lump, a gilded ass, a human monster, attended with utter submission by many good, wise, and learned men, as though they were accessories to his riches, for the sole reason that he has more wealth and money? To see them honour him with divine titles and inflated epithets, smothering him in clouds of praise, though they know he is a dolt, a fool, a greedy wretch, a beast, and so on, simply because he is rich? To see "a wild ass under a lion's skin," a filthy, loathsome carcass, a Gorgon's head swollen by flatterers, claim these glorious titles for himself, though in worth he is an infant, an ass of Cumae, a painted tomb, an Egyptian temple?[607]

[605] Burton. P. 34, i: "Improbum & stultum, si divitem multos bonos viros in servitutem habentem, ob id duntaxat quod ei contingat aureorum numismatum cumulus, ut appendices, & additamenta numismatum. Morus Utopia." Translation of the compressed fragment: "A wicked and foolish man, if rich, holding many good men in servitude, merely because a heap of gold coins happens to belong to him—as appendages and additions to the coins." The passage is located in book 2 of Thomas More's Utopia, in the discussion of gold and social esteem. Burton adapts its wording.

[606] Burton. P. 34, k: "Eorumque detestantur Utopienses insaniam, qui divinos honores iis impendunt, quos sordidos & avaros agnoscunt; non alio respectu honorantes, quam quod dites sint. Idem. lib. 2." Translation: "The Utopians detest the madness of those who bestow divine honours on men whom they know to be base and greedy, honouring them for no other reason than that they are rich." Located in the same discussion in Utopia, book 2.

[607] Editor. "Funge," literally a fungus or mushroom, is an insult for a dull, worthless person; "dizard" means fool. The ass under a lion's skin and the Cumaean ass expose pretended greatness. A painted tomb suggests outward splendour concealing corruption. The Egyptian-temple comparison likewise contrasts a magnificent exterior with an animal within; compare Clement of Alexandria, The Instructor 3.2. That parallel does not establish Burton's immediate source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To see a withered face, a diseased, deformed, canckred complexion, a rotten carcass, a viperous minde, and Epicurean soul set out with orient pearls, jewels, diadems, perfumes, curious elaborate works, as proud of his clothes, as a childe of his new coats; and a goodly person, of an angelike divine countenance, a saint, an humble minde, a meek spirit clothed in rags, beg, and now ready to be starved? To see a silly contemptible sloven in apparel, ragged in his coat, polite in speech, of a divine spirit, wise? another neat in clothes, spruce, full of curtesie, empty of grace, wit, talk non-sense?	To see a withered face, a diseased, deformed, ulcerated complexion, a rotten carcass, a venomous mind, and a pleasure-loving soul adorned with lustrous pearls, jewels, crowns, perfumes, and exquisitely intricate workmanship, as proud of his clothes as a child of a new coat; while a fine person with an angelic, divine face, a saint with a humble mind and gentle spirit, goes begging in rags and is close to starvation? To see a poor, despised man, slovenly in dress and ragged in his coat, yet polished in speech, noble in spirit, and wise; and another neatly dressed, smart, full of courtesy, empty of grace and intelligence, talking nonsense?[608]

[608] Editor. "Epicurean" is Burton's conventional polemical term for devotion to pleasure, not a balanced account of Epicurus's philosophy. "Orient" means lustrous; "curious" means finely or elaborately worked. "Silly" here suggests a poor, insignificant person rather than lack of intelligence—the man is expressly called wise.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To see so many lawyers, advocates, so many tribunals, so little Justice; so many Magistrates, so little care of common good; so many Laws, yet never more disorders; Tribunal litium segetem, the Tribunal a Labyrinth, so many thousand suits in one court sometimes, so violently followed? To see injustissimum sæpè juri præsidentem, impium religioni, imperitissimum eruditioni, otiosissimum labori, monstrosum humanitati? To see a lamb [609]executed, a woolf pronounce sentence, latro arraigned, and fur sit on the bench, the Judge severely punish others, and do worse himself, [610]eundem furtum facere & punire, [611]rapinam plectere, quum sit ipse raptor?	To see so many lawyers and advocates, so many courts, so little justice; so many magistrates, so little care for the common good; so many laws, yet more disorder than ever? "The court a crop of lawsuits"—the court a labyrinth, sometimes with many thousands of cases in a single court, pursued with such fury? To see "the most unjust man often presiding over justice, the impious over religion, the most ignorant over learning, the idlest over labour, the monstrous over humanity"? To see a lamb executed and a wolf passing sentence, a "robber" arraigned and a "thief" sitting on the bench; the judge punishing others severely while doing worse himself, "committing and punishing the same theft," "punishing robbery while being a robber himself"?

[609] Burton. P. 34, l: "Cyp. 2. ad Donat. ep. Ut reus innocens pereat, fit nocens. Judex damnat foras, quod intus operatur." Translation: "So that an innocent defendant may perish, the judge becomes guilty. The judge condemns publicly what he practises privately." Compare Cyprian, To Donatus 10, on the guilty judge, and 9, on condemning publicly what one practises privately. The printed epistle numbering is preserved.

[610] Burton. P. 34, m: "Sidonius Apo." Sidonius Apollinaris; Burton gives no work or passage. The precise attribution of "committing and punishing the same theft" remains unlocated.

[611] Burton. P. 34, n: "Salvianus l. 3 de providen." Salvian, book 3 of the work cited as On Providence, generally known as On the Government of God. The exact passage and form of the quotation remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 34–35 Laws altered, misconstrued, interpreted pro and con, as the [612]Judge is made by friends, bribed, or otherwise affected as a nose of wax, good to day, none to morrow; or firm in his opinion, cast in his? Sentence prolonged, changed, ad arbitrium judicis, still the same case, [613]one thrust out of his inheritance, another falsly put in by favor, false forged deeds or wils. Incisæ leges negliguntur, laws are made and not kept; or if put in execution, [614]they be some silly ones that are punished.	Laws altered, misconstrued, interpreted for or against, according to the way the judge is swayed by friends, bribed, or otherwise influenced—moulded like a nose of wax, valid today, worthless tomorrow. Or he holds firmly to his opinion, while the litigant loses on his. Judgement delayed or changed "at the judge's discretion," though the case remains the same; one person dispossessed of his inheritance, another wrongfully installed through favour, forged deeds, or wills. "Engraved laws are disregarded": laws are made and not observed. And if they are enforced, it is some powerless wretches who are punished.[615]

[612] Burton. P. 34, o: "Ergo judicium nihil est nisi publica merces. Petronius. Quid faciant leges ubi sola pecunia regnat? Idem." Translation: "Judgement, then, is nothing but merchandise sold in public. What can laws do where money alone rules?" Both are located in Petronius, Satyrica 14; Burton reverses their order.

[613] Burton. P. 35, p: "Hic arcentur hæreditatibus liberi; hic donatur bonis alienis, falsum consulit, alter testamentum corrumpit, &c. Idem." Translation: "Here children are excluded from their inheritances; here a man is presented with another's goods; one contrives a fraud, another corrupts a will," and so on. Although Idem follows a Petronius note, this catalogue corresponds to Cyprian, To Donatus 10. The compressed and irregular printed wording is retained.

[614] Burton. P. 35, q: "Vexat censura columbas." Translation: "Censure harasses the doves." Juvenal, Satire 2.63; the preceding words in Juvenal say that it pardons the ravens. The contrast is between persecuted harmless people and favoured predators.

[615] Editor. "A nose of wax" is something moulded at will. The printed phrase "or firm in his opinion, cast in his?" is compressed and uncertain. The modern version provisionally takes the first possessive as the judge's and the second as the litigant's, with "cast" meaning defeated in court; it is an interpretation, not an emendation of the left column. "Incisæ leges" evokes laws publicly engraved, as in Cyprian's description of the courts.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 35 As put case it be fornication, the father will disinherit or abdicate his child, quite casheer him, (out villain be gone, come no more in my sight) a poor man is miserably tormented with losse of his estate perhaps, goods, fortunes, good name, for ever disgraced, forsaken, and must do penance to the utmost; a mortal sin, and yet make the worst of it, nunquid aliud fecit, saith Tranio in the [616]poet, nisi quod faciunt summis nati generibus? he hath done no more then what Gentlemen usually do. [617]Neque novum, neque mirum, neque secus quam alii solent.	Suppose the offence is fornication. A father will disinherit or disown his child and dismiss him outright: "Out, villain! Be gone! Never let me see you again!" A poor man is miserably punished, perhaps losing his estate, possessions, prospects, and good name, disgraced for ever, abandoned, and required to undergo penance to the full. A mortal sin! Yet even at its worst, "Has he done anything," as Tranio says in the play, "except what men of the highest birth do?" He has done no more than gentlemen commonly do. Nothing new, nothing surprising, nothing different from other people's usual practice.[618]
For in a great person, right worshipfull Sir, a right honorable Grandy, tis not a venial sin, no not a peccadillo, tis no offence at all, a common and ordinary thing, no man takes notice of it; he justifies it in publike, and peradventure brags of it, [619]Nam quod turpe bonis, Titio, Seioque, decebat Crispinum ———	For a great person, a right worshipful sir, a right honourable grandee, it is not even a venial sin, not so much as a peccadillo; it is no offence at all, just an everyday occurrence that no one notices. He defends it publicly and perhaps even boasts of it: For what disgraced good men, Titius and Seius, became Crispinus well.[620]

[616] Burton. P. 35, r: "Plaut. mostel." Plautus, Mostellaria 1141. Tranio defends the son's drinking, purchase of his mistress's freedom, and borrowing; Burton applies the excuse to sexual misconduct.

[617] Burton. P. 35, s: "Idem." The line is adapted from the epilogue of Plautus's Asinaria, rather than from the Mostellaria just cited. The epilogue excuses an old man's indulgence behind his wife's back.

[618] Editor. Fornication means sexual intercourse outside marriage. "Abdicate" here is disown, and "casheer" is dismiss. Burton's examples join family sanctions, material loss, shame, and religious penance; the note does not imply that every listed consequence followed automatically from one uniform legal procedure. Tranio is the clever slave in Plautus's Mostellaria.

[619] Burton. P. 35, t: "Juven. Sat. 4." Juvenal, Satire 4.13–14. Titius and Seius are conventional names for ordinary people; Crispinus is the object of Juvenal's satire.

[620] Editor. A mortal sin is contrasted with a venial, or lesser, sin; "peccadillo" is a small fault. Burton intensifies the irony: the socially powerful person's act is treated as no fault at all. The two lines come immediately after the earlier Juvenal quotation about the judge of morals, though Burton separates them in his own argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[621]Many poor men, yonger brothers, &c. by reason of bad policie, and idle education (for they are likely brought up in no calling,) are compelled to beg or steal, and then hanged for theft; then which, what can be more ignominious, non minus enim turpe principi multa supplicia, quàm medico multa funera, tis the governours fault. Libentius verberant quàm docent, as School-masters do rather correct their pupils, then teach them when they do amisse: [622]They had more need provide there should be no more theeves and beggers, as they ought with good policy, and take away the occasions, then let them run on, as they do to their own destruction: root out likewise those causes of wrangling, a multitude of lawyers, and compose controversies, lites lustrales & seculares, by some more compendious means.	Many poor men, younger sons, and so on, are driven to beg or steal by bad government and an idle upbringing, since they are generally trained for no occupation, and then hanged for theft. What could be more disgraceful? "Many executions are no less shameful to a ruler than many funerals to a physician." The fault lies with the governors. "They beat more readily than they teach," like schoolmasters who would rather punish pupils than teach them when they go wrong. They should take far greater care, through good government, to prevent theft and begging and remove their causes, instead of letting people continue to their destruction, as they do. They should likewise root out the causes of wrangling—the multitude of lawyers—and settle disputes, "lawsuits that last five years or a century," by some shorter method.[623]

[621] Burton. P. 35, u: "Quod tot sint fures & mendici, magistratuum culpa fit, qui malos imitantur præceptores, qui discipulos libentius verberant quam docent. Morus Utop. lib. 1." Translation: "That there are so many thieves and beggars is the magistrates' fault: they imitate bad teachers, who beat their pupils more readily than they teach them." The argument is located in Raphael Hythloday's account of England in Utopia, book 1; Burton condenses it.

[622] Burton. P. 35, x: "Decernuntur furi gravia & horrenda supplicia, quum potius providendum multò foret ne fures fiant, ne cuiquam tam dira furandi aut pereundi sit necessitas. Idem." Translation: "Harsh and terrible punishments are decreed for the thief, when far more care should be taken to prevent people becoming thieves, so that no one is driven to the dreadful necessity of stealing or perishing." The argument is located in Utopia, book 1.

[623] Editor. "Policie" means government or public administration; a "calling" is an occupation. Younger sons could lack the family estate inherited by an eldest son. The contrast between prevention and punishment draws on Utopia, book 1. The comparison of executions with funerals is adapted from Seneca, On Clemency 1.24.1. Lustral and secular lawsuits are exaggeratedly long cases: a lustrum is five years, a saeculum an age or century.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whereas now for every toy and trifle they go to law, [624]Mugit litibus insanum forum, & sævit invicem discordantium rabies, they are ready to pull out one anothers throats; and for commodity [625]to squieze blood, saith Hierom, out of their brothers heart, defame, lie, disgrace, backbite, rail, bear false witnesse, swear, forswear, fight and wrangle, spend their goods, lives, fortunes, friends, undo one another, to enrich an Harpy advocate, that preys upon them both, and cryes Eia Socrates, Eia Xantippe; or some corrupt Judg, that like the [626]Kite in Æsop, while the mouse & frog fought, carried both away.	As it is, they go to law over every toy and trifle. "The maddened court bellows with lawsuits, and the fury of the disputants rages against each other." They are ready to tear one another's throats out, and, for profit, "to squeeze blood," as Jerome says, "from their brother's heart"; to slander, lie, disgrace, backbite, abuse, bear false witness, swear oaths and break them, fight and wrangle, spend their possessions, lives, fortunes, and friendships, and ruin one another. All to enrich some harpy of a lawyer who preys on both sides and cries, "Go on, Socrates! Go on, Xanthippe!" Or some corrupt judge who, like the kite in Aesop, carries off both the mouse and the frog while they fight.[627]

[624] Burton. P. 35, y: "Boterus de augment. urb. lib. 3. cap. 3." Giovanni Botero, On the Greatness of Cities, book 3, chapter 3, as cited by Burton. The courtroom imagery also occurs in Cyprian, To Donatus 10; Botero's role as intermediary remains unverified.

[625] Burton. P. 35, z: "E fraterno corde sanguinem eliciunt." Translation: "They draw blood from a brother's heart." Burton attributes the expression to Jerome in the body; its exact location remains unresolved.

[626] Burton. P. 35, a: "Milvus rapit ac deglubit." Translation: "The kite seizes and skins them." A version of the Aesopic fable of the mouse and frog, with the predator benefiting from their struggle. Burton's particular version has not been identified.

[627] Editor. A harpy is a ravenous mythological creature. The lawyer urges on both Socrates and Xanthippe, his traditionally quarrelsome wife, profiting whichever side wins. The mouse-and-frog story supplies a second image of a third party benefiting from conflict. "Commodity" here means profit or advantage; "forswear" means swear falsely or break an oath.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Generally they prey one upon another as so many ravenous birds, brute beasts, devouring fishes, no medium, omnes [628]hic aut captantur aut captant; aut cadavera quæ lacerantur, aut corvi qui lacerant, either deceive or be deceived; tear others, or be torn in pieces themselves; like so many buckets in a Well, as one riseth another falleth, one's emptie, another's full; his ruine is a ladder to the third; such are our ordinary proceedings.	In general, they prey on one another like ravenous birds, savage beasts, or voracious fish. "There is no middle course: everyone here is either hunted or a hunter, either a corpse being torn apart or a raven doing the tearing." Deceive or be deceived; tear others apart or be torn apart yourself. Like buckets in a well: as one rises, another falls; one is empty, another full. One man's ruin is a ladder for a third. Such is our ordinary way of doing things.[629]
Source page 35–36 What's the market? A place according to [630]Anacharsis, wherein they cozen one another, a trap; nay, what's the world it self? [631]A vast Chaos, a confusion of manners, as fickle as the air, domicilium insanorum, a turbulent troop full of impurities, a mart of walking spirits, goblins, the theatre of hypocrisie, a shop of knavery, flattery, a nursery of villanie, the scene of babling, the school of giddinesse, the academie of vice; a warfare, ubi velis nolis pugnandum, aut vincas aut succumbas, in which kill or be killed; wherein every man is for himself, his private ends, and stands upon his own guard.	What is the marketplace? A place, according to Anacharsis, where people cheat one another—a trap. Indeed, what is the world itself? A vast chaos, a confusion of conduct, as changeable as the air, "a dwelling place of madmen," a disorderly crowd full of corruption, a market of wandering spirits and goblins, a theatre of hypocrisy, a shop of knavery and flattery, a nursery of villainy, a stage for babbling, a school of fickleness, an academy of vice; a war "in which you must fight, willing or unwilling, and either conquer or succumb"—kill or be killed; where everyone pursues his own private ends and stands on guard for himself.

[628] Burton. P. 35, b: "Petronius de Crotone civit." Petronius on the city of Croton: Satyrica 116. Burton compresses the passage, which describes legacy hunters and the rich, childless people they pursue.

[629] Editor. In Petronius's Croton episode, the hunters seek inheritances by cultivating rich people without heirs. Burton broadens that particular satire into a description of society at large. The shifting buckets then give a mechanical image of one person's rise depending on another's fall.

[630] Burton. P. 35, c: "Quid forum? locus quo alius alium circumvenit." Translation: "What is the marketplace? A place where one person cheats another." The saying is ascribed to Anacharsis in the body; the precise source used by Burton remains unverified.

[631] Burton. P. 35, d: "Vastum chaos, larvarum emporium, theatrum hypocrisios, &c." Translation: "A vast chaos, a marketplace of spectres, a theatre of hypocrisy," and so on. No separate source is named.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 36 No charity, [632]love, friendship, fear of God, alliance, affinitie, consanguinitie, Christianitie can contain them, but if they be any ways offended, or that string of commodity be touched, they fall foul. Old friends become bitter enemies on a suddain, for toyes and small offences, and they that erst were willing to do all mutual offices of love and kindnes, now revile, & persecute one another to death, with more then Vatinian hatred, & will not be reconciled.	No charity, love, friendship, fear of God, alliance, marriage tie, blood relationship, or Christian faith can restrain them. If they are offended in any way, or their self-interest is touched, they turn vicious. Old friends suddenly become bitter enemies over trifles and small offences. Those who once willingly performed every mutual act of love and kindness now abuse and persecute one another to death, with more than Vatinian hatred, and refuse reconciliation.[633]

[632] Burton. P. 36, e: “Nemo cœlum, nemo jusjurandum, nemo Jovem pluris facit, sed omnes apertis oculis bona sua computant. Petron.” Translation: “No one values heaven, an oath, or Jupiter any more highly; everyone counts his possessions with open eyes.” This adapts Petronius, Satyrica 44. The consulted Latin instead mentions keeping a fast, caring not a hair for Jupiter, and counting with covered eyes. Burton’s wording remains unchanged.

[633] Editor. “Vatinian hatred” is a proverbial expression for bitter hatred, found, for example, in Catullus 14.3. “Affinitie” is kinship by marriage; “consanguinitie,” by blood. The “string of commodity” makes self-interest a sensitive string that provokes a response when touched.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So long as they are behoveful, they love, or may bestead each other, but when there is no more good to be expected, as they do by an old dog, hang him up or casheer him: which [634]Cato counts a great indecorum, to use men like old shoes or broken glasses, which are flung to the dunghil; he could not finde in his heart to sell an old Ox, much lesse to turn away an old servant: but they in stead of recompense, revile him, and when they have made him an instrument of their villany, as [635]Bajazet the second Emperor of the Turks, did by Acomethes Bassa, make him away, or in stead of [636]reward, hate him to death, as Silius was served by Tiberius.	They love one another as long as they are useful, or can serve each other's purposes. But when there is no further benefit to be expected, they hang a man or dismiss him, as they would an old dog. Cato considers it a great "impropriety" to treat people like old shoes or broken glasses thrown onto the rubbish heap. He could not bring himself to sell an old ox, much less dismiss an old servant. Yet these men abuse their servant instead of rewarding him; once they have made him an instrument of their wickedness, they kill him, as Bayezid II, emperor of the Turks, did Ahmed Pasha, or repay him with deadly hatred, as Tiberius treated Silius.[637]

[634] Burton. P. 36, f: "Plutarch. vit. ejus. Indecorum animatis ut calceis uti aut vitris, quæ ubi fracta abjicimus, nam ut de meipso dicam, nec bovem senem venderem, nedum hominem ætate grandem laboris socium." Translation: "Plutarch, his Life. It is improper to use living creatures like shoes or glass vessels which we throw away when broken; speaking for myself, I would not sell an old ox, much less an elderly person who had shared my labour." Located in Plutarch's Life of Cato the Elder, in his criticism of Cato's treatment of worn-out slaves and animals. The sentiments belong to Plutarch; see the editorial note.

[635] Burton. P. 36, g: "Jovius. Cum innumera, illius beneficia rependere non posset aliter, interfici jussit." Translation: "Since he could not otherwise repay his innumerable services, he ordered him killed." Giovio is cited, but the exact passage remains unlocated.

[636] Burton. P. 36, h: "Beneficia eo usque læta sunt dum videntur solvi posse, ubi multum antevenere pro gratia odium redditur. Tac." Translation: "Benefits are welcome as long as they seem capable of repayment; when they far exceed that, hatred is returned instead of gratitude." Located in Tacitus, Annals 4.18, on Silius's services to Tiberius.

[637] Editor. The humane speech belongs to Plutarch, not Cato. In the Life of Cato the Elder, Plutarch criticizes Cato's willingness to sell aged slaves and discard animals, then says that he himself would not sell an old ox or old servant. Burton reverses the attribution; both columns retain his claim, with the correction here. Acomethes Bassa is understood as Gedik Ahmed Pasha; Burton's exact Giovio source remains unresolved. The Silius example is independently supported by Tacitus, Annals 4.18–19.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In a word, every man for his own ends. Our summum bonum is commodity, and the goddesse we adore Dea moneta, Queen money, to whom we daily offer sacrifice, which steers our hearts, hands, [638]affections, all: that most powerful goddess, by whom we are reared, depressed, elevated, [639]esteemed, the sole commandresse of our actions, for which we pray, run, ride, go, come, labor, and contend as fishes do for a crum that falleth into the water.	In a word, everyone pursues his own ends. Our "highest good" is profit, and the goddess we worship is "the goddess Money," Queen Money, to whom we sacrifice daily. She directs our hearts, hands, affections—everything. This most powerful goddess raises us up, casts us down, promotes us, gives us standing; she alone commands our actions. For money we pray, run, ride, go, come, labour, and compete like fish for a crumb dropped into the water.[640]

[638] Burton. P. 36, i: "Paucis charior est fides quam pecunia. Salust." Translation: "Few value good faith more than money." Adapted from Sallust, The Jugurthine War 16, where Jugurtha corrupts the Roman commissioners.

[639] Burton. P. 36, k: "Prima fere vota & cunctis &c." Translation: "The first prayers, for almost everyone," and so on. The source is Juvenal, Satire 10.23–25, on the prayer for growing wealth; Burton gives only a fragment.

[640] Editor. Summum bonum is the philosophical "highest good," here reduced to personal gain. Dea moneta personifies money as a goddess. Burton develops the image of worship through prayers, sacrifice, and obedience.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Its not worth, vertue, ([641]that's bonum theatrale) wisdom, valor, learning, honesty, religion, or any sufficiency for which we are respected, but money, greatnesse, office, honour, authority: honesty is accounted folly; knavery, policie; [642]men admired out of opinion, not as they are, but as they seem to be: such shifting, lying, cogging, ploting, counterploting, temporizing, flattering, cozening, dissembling, [643]that of necessity one must highly offend God if he be conformable to the world, Cretizare cum Crete, or else live in contempt, disgrace, and misery.	We are respected for money, greatness, office, rank, and authority, rather than worth, virtue—which is "a good fit for the stage"—wisdom, courage, learning, honesty, religion, or any ability. Honesty is counted folly; knavery, shrewdness. People are admired on the strength of reputation, for what they seem rather than what they are. There is such evasion, lying, cheating, plotting, counterplotting, trimming, flattery, fraud, and pretence that a person who conforms to the world must gravely offend God, "playing the Cretan with a Cretan," or else live in contempt, disgrace, and misery.[644]

[641] Burton. P. 36, l: "Et genus & formam regina pecunia donat. Quantum quisque sua nummorum servat in arca, tantum habet & fidei." Translation: "Queen Money bestows both birth and beauty. Each man has as much credit as the money he keeps in his chest." The first sentence is Horace, Epistles 1.6.37; the second, Juvenal, Satire 3.143–144.

[642] Burton. P. 36, m: "Non à peritia sed ab ornatu & vulgi vocibus habemur excellentes. Cardan. l. 2. de cons." Translation: "We are held excellent not for our skill but for our adornment and the crowd's acclaim." Girolamo Cardano, book 2 of the work abbreviated de cons., likely On Consolation; exact title and passage remain to be checked.

[643] Burton. P. 36, n, continued at the foot of the page: "Perjurata suo postponit numina lucro, Mercator. Ut necessarium sit vel Deo displicere, vel ab hominibus contemni, vexari, negligi." Translation: "The merchant puts divine powers, by whom he has sworn falsely, below his own profit. So that one must either displease God or be despised, harassed, and neglected by people." The verse and the following prose are not attributed here; their precise sources remain unresolved.

[644] Editor. Bonum theatrale calls virtue a good admired as a spectacle rather than rewarded in ordinary life. "Policie" here means shrewd calculation, unlike its public-governance sense above. To "Cretize with a Cretan" invokes the proverbial association of Cretans with deception: to meet trickery with trickery. The exact proverbial source used by Burton has not been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
One takes upon him temperance, holinesse, another austeritie, a third an affected kinde of simplicity, when as indeed he, and he, and he, and the rest are [645]hypocrites, ambodexters, [646]out sides, so many turning pictures, a lyon on the one side, a lamb on the other. How would Democritus have been affected to see these things?	One assumes an air of temperance and holiness, another of austerity, a third of studied simplicity, when in fact he, and he, and he, and all the rest are hypocrites, double-dealers, mere exteriors, so many pictures that change as you turn them: a lion on one side, a lamb on the other. How would Democritus have felt at the sight of these things?[647]
To see a man turn himself into all shapes like a Camelion, or as Proteus, omnia transformans sese in miracula rerum, to act twenty parts and persons at once, for his advantages temporize & vary like Mercurie the Planet, good with good, bad with bad; having a several face, garb, & character for every one he meets; of all religions, humors, inclinations; to fawn like a Spaniel, mentitis & mimicis obsequiis, rage like a lion, bark like a Cur, fight like a dragon, sting like a serpent, as meek as a lamb, & yet again grin like a tygre, weep like a crocodile, insult over some, & yet others domineer over him, here command, there crouch, tyrannize in one place, be baffled in another, a wise man at home, a fool abroad to make others merry.	To see a man assume every shape like a chameleon, or like Proteus, "transforming himself into every monstrous form," playing twenty roles and persons at once; shifting with circumstances for his own advantage and changing like the planet Mercury, good among the good, bad among the bad; with a different face, manner, and character for everyone he meets, accommodating every religion, temperament, and inclination; fawning like a spaniel "with false and mimicked deference," raging like a lion, barking like a cur, fighting like a dragon, stinging like a serpent; meek as a lamb, then baring his teeth like a tiger, weeping like a crocodile; lording it over some while others lord it over him, commanding here, cringing there, tyrannizing in one place and being humiliated in another; a wise man at home, a fool abroad to make others laugh.[648]

[645] Burton. P. 36, a, at the foot of the page: "Qui Curios simulant & Bacchanalia vivunt." Translation: "They pretend to be men like Curius but live lives of Bacchic revelry." Juvenal, Satire 2.3: stern Roman rectitude is contrasted with riotous indulgence.

[646] Burton. P. 36, b, at the foot of the page: "Tragelapho similes vel centauris, sursum homines, deorsum equi." Translation: "Like a goat-stag or centaurs: human above, horses below." Hybrid creatures figure the double nature of these pretenders. No separate source is named.

[647] Editor. "Ambodexters" are people who serve both sides for advantage. "Turning pictures" makes the same person display opposed faces according to the angle of view; the literal optical device, if any, is unspecified. The goat-stag and centaurs in Burton's margin extend the imagery of incompatible forms combined in one body.

[648] Editor. Proteus is the shape-changing sea-god. Burton adapts Virgil, Georgics 4.441, changing transformat to transformans. Chameleon and Mercury likewise figure changeability. "Humors" means dispositions; "insult over" means domineer or exult over another, and "baffled" can mean publicly disgraced. Crocodile tears are feigned sorrow. The precise source, if any, of mentitis et mimicis obsequiis remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 37 To see so much difference betwixt words and deeds, so many parasanges betwixt tongue and heart, men like stage-players act variety of parts, [649]give good precepts to others, sore aloft, whilest they themselves grovel on the ground.	To see such a difference between words and deeds, so many leagues between tongue and heart; men playing all kinds of roles like actors, giving others good advice, soaring aloft while they themselves crawl on the ground.[650]
To see a man protest friendship, kisse his hand, [651]quem mallet truncatum videre [652]smile with an intent to do mischief, or cozen him whom he salutes; [653]magnifie his friend unworthy with hyperbolical elogiums; his enemy albeit a good man, to vilifie and disgrace him, yea all his actions, with the utmost livor and malice can invent.	To see a man profess friendship and kiss the hand of someone "he would rather see mutilated"; smile while intending harm, or cheat the man he greets; heap extravagant praise on an unworthy friend, yet vilify and disgrace an enemy, however good a man, and all his actions, with the worst that envy and malice can invent.

[649] Burton. [p. 37, c] Præceptis suis cœlum promittunt, ipsi interim pulveris terreni vilia mancipia. Editor: "With their precepts they promise heaven, while they themselves are worthless slaves of earthly dust." No author is named.

[650] Editor. A parasang is an ancient Persian measure of distance, used here figuratively for a vast separation. "Leagues" preserves the image without imposing an exact conversion. Burton continues the satirical catalogue begun earlier; its repeated "To see" is deliberately retained.

[651] Burton. [p. 37, d] Æneas Silv. Editor: Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini, later Pope Pius II. The particular work behind "whom he would rather see mutilated" has not been located.

[652] Burton. [p. 37, e] Arridere homines ut sæviant, blandiri ut fallant. Cyp. ad Donatum. Editor: "To smile at people in order to attack them, to flatter in order to deceive." Compare Cyprian, To Donatus 13, on the treachery of powerful men.

[653] Burton. [p. 37, first *] Love & hate are like the two ends of a perspective glass, the one multiplies, the other makes less. Editor: A telescope makes things appear larger through one end and smaller through the other. The comparison concerns the distortion of judgement by affection.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To see a [654]servant able to buy out his Master, him that carries the mace more worth then the Magistrate, which Plato lib. 11. de leg. absolutely forbids, Epictetus abhors. An horse that tils the [655]land fed with chaff, an idle jade have provender in abundance; him that makes shoes go bare-foot himself, him that sels meat almost pined; a toiling drudge starve, a drone flourish.	To see a servant rich enough to buy out his master, the mace-bearer worth more than the magistrate—a thing Plato absolutely forbids in book 11 of the Laws, and Epictetus abhors. A horse that tills the land is fed on chaff, while an idle nag has feed in abundance; the shoemaker goes barefoot, the food seller is nearly starved; the labouring drudge wastes away, while the idle drone prospers.[656]
To see men buy smoke for wares, castles built with fools heads, men like apes follow the fashions in tires, gestures, actions: if the King laugh, all laugh; [657]Rides? majore chachinno Concutitur, flet si lachrymas conspexit amici. [658]Alexander stooped, so did his Courtiers; Alphonsus turned his head, and so did his parasites. [659]Sabina Poppea, Nero's wife, wore amber-colour'd hair, so did all the Roman Ladies in an instant, her fashion was theirs.	To see men buy smoke instead of goods, castles built from fools' heads, men aping the fashions in dress, gestures, and conduct: if the king laughs, everyone laughs. You laugh? He shakes with louder laughter; he weeps if he sees his friend in tears. Alexander bent his head; so did his courtiers. Alfonso turned his head; so did his flatterers. Poppaea Sabina, Nero's wife, wore amber-coloured hair; in an instant, so did all the Roman ladies. Her fashion became theirs.[660]

[654] Burton. [p. 37, f] Ministri locupletiores iis quibus ministratur, servus majores opes habens quam patronus. Editor: "Servants richer than those they serve; a servant with greater wealth than his master." The exact passages in Plato and Epictetus cited in the body remain unlocated.

[655] Burton. [p. 37, g] Qui terram colunt equi paleis pascuntur, qui otiantur caballi avenâ saginantur, discalceatus discurrit qui calceos aliis facit. Editor: "Horses that till the soil are fed on chaff; idle nags are fattened on oats; the man who makes shoes for others runs about barefoot." No author is given.

[656] Editor. A mace-bearer carries an emblem of a magistrate's authority. Burton's contrast depends on the servant's supposedly subordinate place: he attacks a world in which work, reward, and rank do not correspond. A drone is the non-working male bee, conventionally an image of the idle consumer.

[657] Burton. [p. 37, h] Juven. Editor: Juvenal, Satires 3.100–101: a flatterer outdoes his patron in laughter or tears. The left column retains chachinno, where the consulted Latin text has cachinno.

[658] Burton. [p. 37, i] Bodin lib. 4. de repub. cap. 6. Editor: Jean Bodin, Six Books of the Commonwealth 4.6. The two courtly anecdotes have not yet been collated against that work; Burton does not identify which Alfonso he means.

[659] Burton. [p. 37, k] Plinius l. 37. cap. 3. capillos habuit succineos, exinde factum ut omnes puellæ Romanæ colorem illum affectarent. Editor: "She had amber-coloured hair; hence all the Roman girls came to desire that colour." Pliny, Natural History 37.50 in modern section numbering, says Nero gave Poppaea's hair its amber designation in a poem, which then made the colour fashionable. Burton's chapter reference is retained.

[660] Editor. "Buy smoke" means to buy something worthless or illusory; the castles suggest fortunes built on other people's folly. Tires are dress or adornments. The court anecdotes make imitation an act of flattery; they are presented as Burton tells them, rather than as independently established biography.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To see men wholly led by affection, admired and censured out of opinion without judgement: an inconsiderate multitude, like so many dogs in a village, if one bark all bark without a cause: as fortunes fan turns, if a man be in favor, or commended by some great one, all the world applauds him; [661]if in disgrace, in an instant al hate him, & as at the Sun when he is eclipsed, that erst took no notice, now gaze, and stare upon him.	To see people wholly governed by their feelings, admired or condemned on the strength of opinion without judgement; a thoughtless crowd, like the dogs in a village—if one barks, they all bark for no reason. As fortune's fan turns, if a man is in favour or praised by someone powerful, the whole world applauds him. If he falls into disgrace, they all hate him at once. Like people watching an eclipse of the sun, those who previously paid him no attention now gaze and stare.[662]

[661] Burton. [p. 37, l] Odit damnatos. Juv. Editor: "It hates those condemned." Juvenal, Satires 10.73–74, describing the crowd's abandonment of Sejanus.

[662] Editor. "Affection" means an emotion or partiality; "opinion" here is unexamined reputation. Fortune's turning fan conveys instability. The eclipse comparison makes public disgrace a spectacle watched by people previously indifferent to the victim.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To see a man [663]were his brains in his belly, his guts in is head, an hundred oaks on his back, to devour 100 oxen at a meal, nay more, to devour houses and towns, or as those Anthropophagi, [664]to eat one another. To see a man roll himself up like a snow ball, from base beggery to right worshipfull and right honourable titles, injustly to screw himself into honours and offices; another to starve his genius, damn his soul to gather wealth which he shall not enjoy, which his prodigall son [665]melts and consumes in an instant.	To see a man wear his brains in his belly, his guts in his head, a hundred oaks on his back; devour a hundred oxen at a meal, or more—devour houses and towns, or, like those "man-eaters," eat other people. To see a man swell like a rolling snowball from abject poverty into worshipful and honourable titles, forcing his way unjustly into honours and offices; another deny himself every pleasure and damn his soul to accumulate wealth he will never enjoy, only for his wasteful son to dissolve and consume it in an instant.[666]
To see the κακοζηλίαν of our times, a man bend all his forces, means, time, fortunes, to be a favorites, favorites, favorite, &c. a parasites, parasites, parasite, that may scorn the servile world as having enough already.	To see the "misguided imitation" of our times: a man bending all his strength, resources, time, and fortune to become a favourite's favourite's favourite, and so on—a flatterer's flatterer's flatterer—so that, having enough already, he can scorn the servile world.[667]

[663] Burton. [p. 37, m] Agrippa ep. 28. l. 7. Quorum cerebrum est in ventre, ingenium in patinis. Editor: "Whose brain is in their belly, whose intelligence is in their dishes." Agrippa, Letters, book 7, letter 28, as Burton cites it; the passage has not been independently located.

[664] Burton. [p. 37, n] Psal. They eat up my people as bread. Editor: Compare Psalms 14:4 and 53:4. The biblical image makes social exploitation a form of cannibalism.

[665] Burton. [p. 37, o] Absumit hæres cæcuba dignior servata centum clavibus, & mero distinguet pavimentis superbo, pontificum potiore cœnis. Hor. Editor: Horace, Odes 2.14.25–28: an heir more worthy of the Caecuban wine will consume what was kept under a hundred locks and splash the floor with wine finer than that at the pontiffs' banquets. This gives the sense of the Horatian passage; the note's altered and grammatically irregular wording, including Absumit and distinguet pavimentis, is retained above.

[666] Editor. The left preserves were for "wear" and the printed "his guts in is head," understood as "his guts in his head"; the second possessive lacks its initial h. The hundred oaks suggest woodland wealth spent on clothing; eating houses and towns turns consumption into ruinous expenditure or exploitation. To "starve his genius" is to deny his own appetite or pleasure. "Worshipful" and "honourable" are ranks of address, not guarantees of virtue.

[667] Editor. The Greek κακοζηλίαν (kakozēlian) denotes misguided or perverse emulation. The repeated possessives make a chain of dependence: one hopes to become the favourite of someone who is himself another person's favourite.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To see an hirsute beggars brat, that lately fed on scraps, crept and whin'd, crying to all, and for an old jerkin ran of errands, now ruffle in silk and satten, bravely mounted, jovial and polite, now scorn his old friends and familiars, neglect his kindred, insult over his betters, domineer over all.	To see a shaggy beggar's child, who lately lived on scraps, crawled and whined, begged from everyone, and ran errands for an old jacket, now swagger in silk and satin, splendidly mounted, jovial and polished; now scorn his old friends and companions, neglect his relatives, lord it over his betters, and domineer over everyone.[668]
Source page 37–38 To see a scholar crouch and creep to an illiterate pesant for a meals meat; a scrivener better paid for an obligation; a faulkner receive greater wages then a student: a lawyer get more in a day then a philosopher in a year, better reward for an hour, then a scholar for a twelve moneths studie; him that can [669]paint Thais, play on a fiddle, curl hair, &c. sooner get preferment then a philologer or a poet.	To see a scholar cringe and crawl to an illiterate peasant for a meal; a clerk paid better for drawing up a bond; a falconer earning more than a scholar; a lawyer making more in a day than a philosopher in a year, better rewarded for an hour than a scholar for twelve months' study; someone who can paint Thais, play the fiddle, curl hair, and so on, advancing sooner than a student of literature or a poet.[670]

[668] Editor. Hirsute means hairy or shaggy; a jerkin is a short jacket; to ruffle is to swagger. "Polite" means polished in manners. The ascent from begging to display exposes ingratitude and domination in Burton's account.

[669] Burton. [p. 38, first *] Qui Thaidem pingere, inflare tibiam, crispare crines. Editor: "[One who can] paint Thais, blow the flute, curl hair." Thais is a conventional courtesan's name. Burton's body substitutes a fiddle for the flute. No author is named.

[670] Editor. An obligation is a written bond or formal acknowledgement of debt. A philologer studies language and literature. "Paint Thais" may refer to portraying or cosmetically adorning a courtesan; the wording does not settle which. The list contrasts useful or fashionable services with poorly rewarded scholarship.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 38 To see a fond mother like Æsops ape, hug her child to death, a [671]wittal wink at his wives honesty, and too perspicuous in all other affairs; one stumble at a straw, and leap over a block; rob Peter, and pay Paul; scrape unjust sums with one hand, purchase great Mannors by corruption, fraud and cozenage, and liberally to distribute to the poor with the other, give a remnant to pious uses, &c. Peny wise, pound foolish; Blind men judge of colours; wise men silent, fools talk; [672]finde fault with others, and do worse themselves; [673]denounce that in publike which he doth in secret; and which Aurelius Victor gives out of Augustus, severely censure that in a third, of which he is most guilty himself.	To see a foolishly doting mother, like Aesop's ape, hug her child to death; a willing cuckold turn a blind eye to his wife's chastity while being all too sharp-sighted in everything else; someone stumble over a straw and leap over a block; rob Peter to pay Paul; rake in ill-gotten money with one hand, acquiring great estates through corruption, fraud, and cheating, while giving generously to the poor with the other, setting aside a remnant for pious purposes, and so on. Penny wise, pound foolish; blind men judging colours; wise men silent, fools talking; people finding fault with others while doing worse themselves; publicly denouncing what they do in secret; and, as Aurelius Victor says of Augustus, severely condemning in a third party what they themselves are most guilty of.[674]

[671] Burton. [p. 38, s] Doctus spectare lacunar. Editor: "Skilled at looking at the ceiling." Juvenal, Satires 1.56: the man profits by pretending not to see adultery.

[672] Burton. [p. 38, t] Tullius. Est enim proprium stultitiæ aliorum cernere vitia, oblivisci suorum. Idem Aristippus Charidemo apud Lucianum. Omnino stultitiæ cujusdam esse puto, &c. Editor: "Cicero: for it is characteristic of folly to see others' faults and forget one's own. Likewise Aristippus to Charidemus in Lucian: I consider it altogether a kind of folly, etc." The first sentence is Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 3.73. The Lucian attribution has not been securely located.

[673] Burton. [p. 38, second *] Execrari publice quod occultè agat. Salvianus lib. de pro. acres ulciscendis vitiis quibus ipsi vehementer indulgent. Editor: "To denounce publicly what one does secretly"; "zealous in punishing vices in which they themselves eagerly indulge." Burton cites Salvian with an abbreviated title; the exact passage remains unlocated.

[674] Editor. A wittal knows and tolerates his wife's adultery; "honesty" here means sexual fidelity. The doting ape and the proverbial contrasts expose affection or convenience overriding judgement. Burton's particular Aurelius Victor reference about Augustus remains to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To see a poor fellow, or an hired servant venture his life for his new Master that will scarce give him his wages at years end; A country colone toil and moil, till and drudg for a prodigal idle drone, that devours all the gain, or lasciviously consumes with phantastical expences; A noble man in a bravado to encounter death, and for a small flash of honor to cast away himself: A worldling tremble at an Executor, and yet not fear hel-fire; To wish and hope for immortality, desire to be happy, and yet by all means avoyd death, a necessary passage to bring him to it.	To see a poor fellow or hired servant risk his life for a new master who will scarcely pay his wages at the year's end; a country tenant toil and sweat, plough and drudge for a wasteful, idle drone who devours all the profit or dissipates it in extravagant pleasures; a nobleman defy death in a show of bravado and throw his life away for a brief flash of honour; a worldly man tremble at an executor, yet have no fear of hellfire; someone wish and hope for immortality and happiness, yet do everything to avoid death, the necessary passage to it.[675]
To see a fool-hardy fellow like those old Danes, [676]qui decollari malunt quam verberari, die rather then be punished, in a sottish humor imbrace death with alacrity, yet scorn to lament his own sins and miseries, or his dearest friends departures.	To see a reckless fellow, like those Danes of old "who would rather be beheaded than flogged," die rather than be punished, embracing death eagerly in his foolishness, yet disdaining to mourn his own sins and miseries or the deaths of his dearest friends.

[675] Editor. Colone means a tenant farmer or cultivator. The worldly man's fear of an executor invokes the prospect of death and the administration of his estate; the capital letter is retained in the original. Burton contrasts immediate worldly fears with professed belief in an afterlife.

[676] Burton. [p. 38, u] Adamus eccl. hist. cap. 212. Siquis damnatus fuerit, lætus esse gloria est; nam lachrymas & planctum cæteraque compunctionum genera quæ nos salubria censemus, ita abominantur Dani, ut nec pro peccatis nec pro defunctis amicis ulli flere liceat. Editor: "If anyone is condemned, it is a glory to be cheerful; for the Danes so abhor tears, lamentation, and the other expressions of contrition we consider wholesome that no one may weep either for sins or for dead friends." Adam of Bremen's ecclesiastical history, chapter 212 in Burton's citation; the edition and passage are uncollated. This is the judgement of the Christian authority Burton invokes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To see wise men degraded, fools preferred, one govern Towns and Cities, and yet a silly woman over-rules him at home; [677]Command a Province, and yet his own servants or children prescribe laws to him, as Themistocles son did in Greece; [678]What I will (said he) my mother will, and what my mother will, my father doth.	To see wise men demoted and fools promoted; a man governing towns and cities, yet ruled at home by an insignificant woman; commanding a province, yet taking orders from his own servants or children, as Themistocles did from his son in Greece: "What I want," said the boy, "my mother wants, and what my mother wants, my father does."[679]
To see horses ride in a Coach, men draw it; dogs devour their masters; towers build masons; children rule; old men go to school; women wear the breeches; [680]sheep demolish towns, devour men, &c. And in a word, the world turned upside downward. O viveret Democritus. [681]To insist in every particular were one of Hercules labors, there's so many ridiculous instances, as motes in the Sun. Quantum est in rebus inane? And who can speak of all? Crimine ab uno disce omnes, take this for a taste.	To see horses riding in coaches and men pulling them; dogs devouring their masters; towers building masons; children ruling; old men going to school; women wearing the breeches; sheep demolishing towns and devouring people, and so on. In a word, the world turned upside down. "If only Democritus were alive!" To dwell on every particular would be one of Hercules' labours: the ridiculous examples are as countless as motes in a sunbeam. "How much emptiness there is in things!" Who could speak of them all? "From one crime, learn what they all are": take this as a sample.[682]

[677] Burton. [p. 38, third *] Orbi dat leges foras, vix famulum regit sine strepitu domi. Editor: "Abroad he gives laws to the world; at home he can scarcely govern a servant without an uproar." No author is named.

[678] Burton. [p. 38, x] Quicquid ego volo hoc vult mater mea, & quod mater vult, facit pater. Editor: "Whatever I want, my mother wants; and what my mother wants, my father does." Burton repeats the saying in the body. Compare Plutarch, Themistocles 18.5; the anecdote there is told by Themistocles about his son.

[679] Editor. "Silly" can mean insignificant or contemptible here. The suggestion that being governed by a woman or child reverses the proper order belongs to Burton's patriarchal satire; the modern column retains the judgement.

[680] Burton. [p. 38, y] Oves, olim mite pecus, nunc tam indomitum & edax ut homines devorent, &c. Morus Utop. lib. 1. Editor: "Sheep, once a gentle animal, now so wild and voracious that they devour people, etc." Thomas More, Utopia, book 1, on people displaced when land is enclosed for sheep pasture.

[681] Burton. [p. 38, z] Diversos variis tribuit natura furores. Editor: "Nature assigns different kinds of madness to different people." The source of this line has not been identified.

[682] Editor. The sheep that devour people refer to enclosure, through More's Utopia. "If only Democritus were alive" calls back the laughing philosopher. Quantum est in rebus inane opens Persius's first satire; Crimine ab uno disce omnes adapts Virgil, Aeneid 2.65–66, where one Greek's deceit is offered as evidence against all. Hercules' labours supply the image of an impossibly demanding task.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 38–39 But these are obvious to sense, trivial and well known, easie to be discerned. How would Democritus have been moved, had he seen [683]the secrets of their hearts? If every man had a window in his brest, which Momus would have had in Vulcans man, or that which Tully so much wisht it were written in every mans forehead, Quid quisque de republicâ sentiret, what he thought; or that it could be effected in an instant, which Mercurie did by Charon in Lucian, by touching of his eyes, to make him discern semel & simul rumores & susurros. Spes hominum cæcas, morbos, votumque labores, Et passim toto volitantes æthere curas. Blinde hopes and wishes, their thoughts and affairs, Whispers and rumors, and those flying cares.	But these things are plain to the senses, commonplace, familiar, and easy to see. How would Democritus have felt if he could have seen the secrets of their hearts? If every man had a window in his breast, as Momus wanted in the man Vulcan made; or if, as Cicero so wished, every man had written on his forehead "what he thought about the commonwealth"—what he thought; or if what Mercury did for Charon in Lucian could be achieved in an instant, touching his eyes to let him discern "rumours and whispers, all at once and together": Men's blind hopes, their maladies, the labours of their prayers, and cares flying everywhere through all the air. Blind hopes and wishes, their thoughts and affairs, whispers and rumours, and those flying cares.[684]

[683] Burton. [p. 38, fourth *; continued at foot] Democrit. ep. præd. Hos devorantes & potantes deprehendet, hos vomentes, illos litigantes, insidias molientes, suffragantes, venena miscentes, in amicorum accusationem subscribentes, hos gloria, illos ambitione, cupiditate, mente captos, &c. Editor: "Democritus, in the letter mentioned above. He will catch some gorging and drinking, some vomiting, others litigating, laying plots, canvassing, mixing poisons, joining in accusations against friends; some crazed by glory, others by ambition or greed, etc." Burton returns to the purported correspondence of Hippocrates and Democritus used earlier in the preface. These literary letters are not authenticated correspondence of the historical men; this extract's precise location remains to be collated.

[684] Editor. Momus is the fault-finding god who wanted a window into a person's thoughts. Burton combines imagined ways of seeing hidden motives. The exact Cicero saying, the wording attributed to Lucian's Charon, and the two Latin verse lines remain unlocated. The Latin couplet is translated before Burton's own English restatement, which is also retained; votum is understood as a contracted genitive plural, "of prayers" or "wishes."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 39 That he could cubiculorum obductas foras recludere, & secreta cordium penetrare, which [685]Cyprian desired, open doors and locks, shoot bolts, as Lucians Gallus did with a feather of his tail: or Gyges invisible ring; or some rare perspective glasse, or Otacousticon, which would so multiply species, that a man might hear and see all at once (as [686]Martianus Capellas Jupiter did in a spear, which he held in his hand, which did present unto him all that was daily done upon the face of the earth; observe cuckolds horns, forgeries of alcumists, the philosophers stone, new projectors, &c. and all those works of darknesse, foolish vows, hopes, fears and wishes, what a deal of laughter would it have afforded? He should have seen Wind-mils in one mans head, an Hornets nest in another.	If he could "unbar the closed doors of bedrooms and penetrate the secrets of hearts," as Cyprian wished; open doors and locks and slide back bolts, as Lucian's cock did with a feather from his tail; or use Gyges' ring of invisibility, or some extraordinary optical glass or listening instrument that so amplified impressions that a man could hear and see everything at once—as Martianus Capella's Jupiter did in a sphere held in his hand, which showed him everything done each day upon the earth; observe cuckolds' horns, alchemists' frauds, the philosophers' stone, new schemers, and so on, and all those deeds of darkness, foolish vows, hopes, fears, and wishes—what laughter it would have afforded! He would have seen windmills in one man's head and a hornets' nest in another.[687]

[685] Burton. [p. 39, y] Ad Donat. ep. 2. l. 1. O si posses in specula sublimi constitutus, &c. Editor: "To Donatus, book 1, letter 2. Oh, if you could be stationed on a high watchtower, etc." The elevated survey is in Cyprian, To Donatus 6; the opening of closed bedrooms in 9. Burton's older letter numbering is retained.

[686] Burton. [p. 39, z] Lib. 1. de nup. Philol. in qua quid singuli nationum populi quotidianis motibus agitarent, relucebat. Editor: "Book 1, On the Marriage of Philology: in it was reflected what the various peoples of the nations were doing in their daily activities." Martianus Capella, The Marriage of Philology and Mercury; the exact location and wording have not been collated.

[687] Editor. The left retains spear, understood here as "sphere." A perspective glass is an optical instrument; an otacousticon is a listening instrument. Species are impressions conveyed to the senses, rather than biological species. Cuckolds' horns signify marital infidelity. Projectors propose schemes, often speculative ones. The invisible ring and the cock's feather allow secret observation; the exact Martianus passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or had he bin present with Icaromenippus in Lucian at Jupiters whispering place, [688]and heard one pray for rain, another for fair weather; one for his wives, another for his fathers death, &c. to ask that at Gods hand which they are abashed any man should hear: How would he have been confounded? Would he, think you, or any man else, say that these men were well in their wits? Hæc sani esse hominis quis sanus juret Orestes? Can all the Hellebor in the Anticyræ cure these men? No sure, [689]an acre of Hellebor will not do it.	Or if he had been with Lucian's sky-travelling Menippus at Jupiter's listening place, hearing one man pray for rain and another for fine weather, one for his wife's death and another for his father's, and so on—asking God for things they would be ashamed to let any human hear— how bewildered he would have been! Do you think he, or anyone else, would say these men were in their right minds? "What sane Orestes would swear that this is a sane man's conduct?" Could all the hellebore in the Anticyras cure these men? Surely not: an acre of hellebore would not do it.[690]

[688] Burton. [p. 39, a] O Jupiter contingat mihi aurum, hæreditas, &c. Multos da Jupiter annos, Dementia quanta est hominum, turpissima vota diis insusurrant, si quis admoverit aurem, conticescunt; & quod scire homines nolunt, Deo narrant. Seneca ep. 10. l. 1. Editor: "O Jupiter, let gold, an inheritance, etc., fall to me! Give me many years, Jupiter! How great is human madness: people whisper their foulest prayers to the gods; if someone puts an ear near, they fall silent; what they do not want people to know, they tell God." The concluding argument is Seneca, Letters 10.5; the opening examples are not part of that passage.

[689] Burton. [p. 39, *] Plautus Menech. non potest hæc res Hellebori jugere obtinerier. Editor: "This business cannot be managed with an acre of hellebore." Plautus, Menaechmi 913, spoken by the doctor. The consulted text marks a difficulty at the word corresponding to Burton's jugere; his wording and acre comparison are retained.

[690] Editor. Lucian's Icaromenippus imagines a journey to heaven, where contradictory prayers reach Zeus. Burton recasts Persius, Satires 3.118, where even mad Orestes would swear such conduct was not a sane man's. Burton turns this into a question about a sane Orestes; the 1651 wording is preserved and translated. The Anticyras were proverbial destinations for hellebore treatment, a traditional purge associated with madness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That which is more to be lamented, they are mad like Seneca's blind woman, and will not acknowledge, or [691]seek for any cure of it, for pauci vident morbum suum, omnes amant, [692]If our leg or arm offend us, we covet by all means possible to redresse it; [693]and if we labor of a bodily disease, we send for a physician; but for the diseases of the minde we take no notice of them:	More lamentable still, they are mad like Seneca's blind woman and will neither acknowledge it nor seek a cure, for "few see their own disease; everyone loves it." If a leg or arm troubles us, we do everything possible to relieve it; if we suffer a bodily illness, we send for a physician. But we pay no attention to diseases of the mind.[694]
Lust harrows us on the one side, envy, anger, ambition on the other. We are torn in pieces by our passions, as so many wild horses; one in disposition, another in habit; one is melancholy, another mad; [695]and which of us all seeks for help, doth acknowledge his error, or knows he is sick? As that stupid fellow put out the Candle, because the biting fleas should not finde him; he shrouds himself in an unknown habit, borrowed titles, because no body should discern him.	Lust harrows us on one side, envy, anger, and ambition on the other. Our passions tear us apart like wild horses. In one person the trouble is a passing disposition, in another an established condition; one is melancholy, another mad. Yet who among us seeks help, admits his error, or knows he is ill? Like the stupid fellow who put out the candle so the biting fleas could not find him, a man hides behind an unfamiliar guise and borrowed titles so that no one will recognize him.[696]

[691] Burton. [p. 39, b] Eoque gravior morbus quo ignotior periclitanti. Editor: "The disease is the worse, the less the person in danger recognizes it." No author is named.

[692] Burton. [p. 39, c] Quæ lædunt oculos festinas demere; si quid Est animum, differs curandi tempus in annum. Hor. Editor: "You hasten to remove what hurts your eyes; if something eats at your mind, you put off treatment for a year." Horace, Epistles 1.2.38–39. Est here means "eats," not "is." The note's body anchor is indistinct; its position is supplied from the subject.

[693] Burton. [p. 39, d] Si caput, crus dolet, brachium &c. Medicum accersimus, rectè & honestè, si par etiam industria in animi morbis poneretur. Joh. Peletius Jesuita. lib. 2. de hum. affec. morborumque cura. Editor: "If the head, leg, arm, etc. hurts, we summon a doctor—rightly and properly, if only equal care were also applied to diseases of the mind." Burton names the Jesuit Joh. Peletius and book 2 of a work on human affections and their cure. The author's identity and passage need verification. The anchor is supplied from the subject.

[694] Editor. In Seneca, Letters 50.2–4, Harpaste has lost her sight but blames the darkness of the house; Seneca makes her an image of people who fail to recognize their own faults. Burton's "diseases of the mind" here include moral failings and passions, as well as conditions he calls melancholy or madness.

[695] Burton. [p. 39, e; continued at foot] Et quotusquisque tamen est qui contra tot pestes medicum requirat vel ægrotare se agnoscat? ebullit ira, &c. Et nos tamen ægros esse negamus. Incolumes medicum recusant. Præsens ætas stultitiam priscis exprobrat. Bud. de affec. lib. 5. Editor: "Yet how few seek a physician against so many plagues, or admit that they are ill! Anger boils over, etc. Yet we deny we are sick. Thinking themselves well, they refuse the doctor. The present age reproaches the ancients with folly." The abbreviated attribution Bud. de affec. lib. 5. remains unresolved. The anchor is supplied from the subject.

[696] Editor. "Disposition" and "habit" distinguish a passing tendency from a settled condition. "Habit" then changes sense to dress or outward guise in the candle-and-fleas anecdote. The modern English makes both senses explicit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Every man thinks with himself Egomet videor mihi sanus, I am well, I am wise, and laughs at others. And tis a generall fault amongst them all, that which our forefathers have approved, diet, apparel, opinions, humors, customs, manners, we deride and reject in our time as absurd. [697]Old men account Juniors all fools, when they are meer dizards; and as to sailers —— terræque urbesque recedunt —— they move, the land stands still, the world hath much more wit, they dote themselves.	Everyone thinks to himself, "To my own eyes, I am sane"—I am well, I am wise—and laughs at others. This is a common fault among them all: the food, clothing, opinions, inclinations, customs, and manners our forefathers approved, we now deride and reject as absurd. Old men think all younger people fools, though they themselves are mere dolts. As sailors think "the lands and cities are receding," when it is they who move and the land stands still, so these men are themselves deluded, while the world has much more sense.[698]

[697] Burton. [p. 39, f, at foot] Senes pro stultis habent juvenes. Balth. Cast. Editor: "Old men regard the young as fools." Balth. Cast. names Baldassare Castiglione; the precise passage remains unlocated. The anchor is supplied from the subject.

[698] Editor. Egomet videor mihi sanus echoes Horace, Satires 2.3.302: "I seem sane to myself." Terræque urbesque recedunt is Virgil, Aeneid 3.72: "lands and cities recede." Sailors seem to see the shore move; similarly, the old men blame the world for a change in themselves.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Turks deride us, we them; Italians Frenchmen, accounting them light headed fellows; the French scoffe again at Italians, and at their several customs; Greeks have condemned all the world but themselves of barbarism, the world as much vilifies them now; we account Germans heavy, dull fellows, explode many of their fashions; they as contemptibly think of us; Spaniards laugh at all, and all again at them.	The Turks mock us, and we mock them; Italians mock the French, considering them frivolous, and the French in turn scoff at Italians and their various customs. Greeks have condemned everyone but themselves as barbarians; the world now holds them in equal contempt. We think Germans slow and dull, and ridicule many of their customs; they think just as contemptuously of us. Spaniards laugh at everyone, and everyone in turn laughs at them.[699]

[699] Editor. "Explode" means to hiss down or reject contemptuously. The national caricatures are Burton's examples of reciprocal prejudice; his point is that every group reserves wisdom for itself.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 40 So are we fools and ridiculous, absurd in our actions, carriages, dyet, apparel, customs and consultations; we [700]scoffe and point one at another, when as in conclusion all are fools, [701]and they the veriest asses that hide their ears most. A private man if he be resolved with himself, or set on an opinion, accounts all idiots and asses that are not affected as he is, [702]—— nil rectum, nisi quod placuit sibi, ducit, that are not so minded, [703](quodque volunt homines se bene velle putant) all fools that think not as he doth: he will not say with Atticus, Suam quisque sponsam, mihi meam, let every man enjoy his own spouse; but his alone is fair, suus amor, &c.	So we are foolish and ridiculous, absurd in our actions, behaviour, food, clothing, customs, and deliberations. We mock and point at one another, though in the end we are all fools, and the greatest asses are those who take most care to hide their ears. An individual, once convinced or fixed in an opinion, counts everyone who does not share his feelings an idiot and an ass: "He considers nothing right except what pleases him." Those who think differently are all fools in his eyes, for "people think whatever they want is right to want." He will not say with Atticus, "To each his own bride; to me, mine"—let everyone enjoy his own spouse. His alone is beautiful, "his own love," and so on.[704]

[700] Burton. [p. 40, h] Clodius accusat mæchos. Editor: "Clodius accuses adulterers." Adapted from Juvenal, Satires 2.27: the charge is absurd because the accuser is guilty of the same offence.

[701] Burton. [p. 40, first *] Omnium stultissimi qui auriculas studiosè tegunt. Sat. Menip. Editor: "The most foolish of all are those who carefully cover their ears." Asses' ears betray foolishness. The reference to a Menippean satire has not been securely identified.

[702] Burton. [p. 40, i] Hor. Epist. 2. Editor: Horace, Epistles 2.1.83. Burton changes the plural ducunt, "they consider," to ducit, "he considers."

[703] Burton. [p. 40, k] Prosper. Editor: Burton attributes the saying about people approving their own desires to Prosper. The exact work has not been located.

[704] Editor. Consultations are deliberations. The hidden ears reveal an ass beneath a pretence of wisdom. The bride comparison admits that preference need not be universal, whereas Burton's dogmatist insists his own taste must govern everyone. The Atticus saying and the fragment suus amor have not been securely traced.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and scorns all in respect of himself, wil imitate none, [705]hear none but himself, as Pliny said, a law and example to himself. And that which Hippocrates in his epistle to Dyonysius, reprehended of old, is verified in our times, Quisque in alio superfluum esse censet, ipse quod non habet nec curat, that which he hath not himself or doth not esteem, he accounts superfluity, an idle quality, a meer foppery in another: like Æsops fox, when he had lost his tail, would have all his fellow foxes cut off theirs.	He despises everyone in comparison with himself, will imitate no one and listen to no one but himself: as Pliny said, he is his own law and example. What Hippocrates long ago rebuked in his letter to Dionysius is borne out in our own time: "Everyone considers superfluous in another what he himself neither possesses nor values." Whatever he lacks or does not esteem, he calls unnecessary, useless, mere foolishness in someone else—like Aesop's fox, who, after losing his tail, wanted all the other foxes to cut theirs off.[706]

[705] Burton. [p. 40, l] Statim sapiunt, statim sciunt, neminem reverentur, neminem imitantur, ipsi sibi exemplo. Plin. epist. lib. 8. Editor: "At once they are wise, at once they know; they respect no one, imitate no one, and are their own example." Pliny, Letters 8.23.3, contrasts the respectful young Avitus with presumptuous contemporaries. Burton adapts the wording.

[706] Editor. The letter attributed to Hippocrates belongs to the literary correspondence discussed earlier in this edition; its exact passage needs collation. The fox without a tail is the Aesopic example of someone making a general rule out of his own disadvantage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[707]The Chinezes say that we Europeans have one eye, they themselves two, all the world else is blinde: (though [708]Scaliger accounts them Brutes too, merum pecus,) so thou and thy sectaries are only wise, others indifferent, the rest beside themselves, meer idiots and asses. Thus not acknowledging our own errors, and imperfections, we securely deride others, as if we alone were free, and spectators of the rest, accounting it an excellent thing, as indeed it is, Aliena optimum frui insaniâ, to make our selves merry with other mens obliquities, when as he himself is more faulty then the rest:	The Chinese say that we Europeans have one eye, they themselves two, and everyone else is blind—though Scaliger counts them beasts too, "nothing but cattle." Just so, you and your followers are the only wise people, others are middling, and the rest out of their minds, mere idiots and asses. Failing to acknowledge our own errors and imperfections, we confidently ridicule others, as though we alone were exempt and merely watching everyone else. We think it a fine thing—as indeed it is—"to enjoy other people's madness," amusing ourselves with their crooked ways, though the man who laughs is more at fault than the rest.[709]

[707] Burton. [p. 40, m] Nulli alteri sapere concedit, ne desipere videatur. Agrip. Editor: "He allows no one else to be wise, lest he himself seem foolish." Attributed to Agrippa; the exact passage is unlocated. No clear matching anchor is visible in the scan. This note is placed at the transition to the Chinese example, near its marginal position; that attachment is editorial.

[708] Burton. [p. 40, second *] Omnis orbis persuasio a persis ad Lusitaniam. Editor: "The belief of the whole world, from Persia to Portugal." The marginal asterisk accompanies Scaliger's name. Burton specifies no work, and the precise connection of this remark to the body has not been established.

[709] Editor. "Indifferent" here means middling, between the supposedly wise and the fools. "Securely" means confidently or without fear; "obliquities" are deviations from right conduct. The Chinese saying and Scaliger's contempt are paired instances of competing claims to superiority. Their precise sources remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
mutato nomine, de te fabula narratur, he may take himself by the nose for a fool; and which one cals maximum stultitiæ specimen, to be ridiculous to others, and not to perceive or take notice of it, as Marsyas was when he contended with Apollo, non intelligens se deridiculo haberi, saith [710]Apuleius; tis his own cause, he is a convict madman, as [711]Austin wel infers, In the eyes of wise men and Angels he seems like one, that to our thinking walks with his heels upward.	"Change the name, and the story is about you." He might take himself by the nose for a fool. What one writer calls "the greatest proof of foolishness" is to be ridiculous to others without noticing it, as Marsyas was when he competed with Apollo, "not realizing he was being made a laughing-stock," as Apuleius says. The case is his own; he stands convicted of madness. As Augustine aptly concludes, in the eyes of the wise and of angels, he looks like someone who, to our eyes, walks upside down.[712]
So thou laughest at me, and I at thee, both at a third; and he returns that of the poet upon us again, [713]Hei mihi, insanire me aiunt, quum ipsi ultro insaniant. We accuse others of madnesse, of folly, and are the veriest dizards our selves. For it is a great sign and propertie of a fool (which Eccl. 10. 3. points at) out of pride and self-conceit to insult, vilifie, condemn, censure, and call other men fools (Non videmus manticæ quod à tergo est) to tax that in others, of which we are most faulty; teach that which we follow not our selves:	So you laugh at me, I at you, and both of us at a third, who turns the poet's words back upon us: "Alas! They say I am mad, when they themselves are mad." We accuse others of madness and folly while being the greatest fools ourselves. For it is a chief sign and characteristic of a fool, as Ecclesiastes 10:3 indicates, to domineer, vilify, condemn, criticize, and call others fools out of pride and self-conceit—"we do not see the part of the knapsack behind our backs"—to rebuke in others the faults we are most guilty of, and teach what we do not practise ourselves.[714]

[710] Burton. [p. 40, third *] 2 Florid. Editor: Apuleius, Florida 3 in the consulted text, not 2. The passage describes Marsyas competing with Apollo; both "the greatest proof of foolishness" and "not realizing he was being made a laughing-stock" come from it. Burton's printed reference is retained.

[711] Burton. [p. 40, n] August. Qualis in oculis hominum qui inversis pedibus ambulat, talis in oculis sapientum & angelorum qui sibi placet, aut cui passiones dominantur. Editor: "As someone walking upside down appears in human eyes, so in the eyes of the wise and of angels appears someone pleased with himself or ruled by his passions." Burton attributes this to Augustine; the exact work remains unlocated.

[712] Editor. "Change the name" is Horace, Satires 1.1.69–70, turning a story back upon its hearer. Marsyas, who challenges Apollo in music, exemplifies self-ignorance. A "convict madman" is one proved to be mad, not necessarily an imprisoned person.

[713] Burton. [p. 40, o] Plautus Menechmi. Editor: Menaechmi 843: the supposed madman says his accusers are mad. Burton alters the wording; the line is bracketed in the consulted Latin text.

[714] Editor. Ecclesiastes 10:3 describes the fool betraying his own foolishness; Burton draws from it his rebuke to those who call others fools. The knapsack saying adapts Persius, Satires 4.24: people cannot see the faults carried behind their own backs.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For an inconstant man to write of constancy, a prophane liver prescribe rules of sanctity and piety, a dizard himself make a treatise of wisdom, or with Salust to rail down right at spoilers of countreys, and yet in [715]office to be a most grievous poler himself. This argues weakness, and is an evident sign of such parties indiscretion. [716]Peccat uter nostrum cruce dignius? Who is the fool now?	For a fickle man to write about constancy, an irreligious man lay down rules of holiness and piety, a fool write a treatise on wisdom, or, like Sallust, fiercely denounce those who plunder countries while being a most oppressive extortioner in office himself—this betrays weakness and plainly shows such people's lack of judgement. "Which of us sins in a way more worthy of crucifixion?" Who is the fool now?[717]
Source page 40–41 Or else peradventure in some places we are all mad for company, and so tis not seen, Satietas erroris & dementiæ, pariter absurditatem & admirationem tollit. Tis with us, as it was of old (in [718]Tullies censure at least) with C. Fimbria in Rome, a bold, hair-brain, mad fellow, and so esteemed of all, such only excepted, that were as mad as himself: now in such a case there is [719]no notice taken of it. Nimirum insanus paucis videatur, eò quod Maxima pars hominum morbo jactatur eodem. When all are mad, where all are like opprest, Who can discern one mad man from the rest?	Or perhaps in some places we are all mad together, so no one notices: "A surfeit of error and madness removes both the absurdity and the astonishment." We are like Gaius Fimbria in ancient Rome, at least in Cicero's judgement: a bold, reckless madman, regarded as such by everyone except those as mad as himself. In such a case, no one takes any notice. No doubt he will seem mad to few, for most people suffer from the same disease. When all are mad, all equally oppressed, who can tell one madman from the rest?[720]

[715] Burton. [p. 40, fourth *] Governor of Africk by Cæsars appointment. Editor: Burton means Sallust's governorship in Africa. The accompanying accusation of extortion is retained as Burton's claim; its historical basis has not been adjudicated here.

[716] Burton. [p. 40, p] Nunc sanitatis patrocinium est insanientium turba. Sen. Editor: "Now the crowd of the insane is the defence of sanity." Seneca's lost work Against Superstition, quoted by Augustine, City of God 6.10. The source anchor stands before the Horatian question, although the note's thought anticipates the following discussion of collective madness.

[717] Editor. A poler is one who strips others of their possessions or extorts from them. The question about crucifixion is Horace, Satires 2.7.47, where the slave Davus challenges his master's moral superiority. Burton's marginal Seneca quotation belongs to the theme of shared madness rather than being the source of that verse.

[718] Burton. [p. 40, a] Pro Roscio Amerino, & quod inter omnes constat insanissimus, nisi inter eos, qui ipsi quoque insaniunt. Editor: "For Roscius of Ameria: and, as everyone agrees, utterly mad—except those who are themselves also mad." Cicero, Pro Sexto Roscio Amerino 33; Burton abbreviates and rearranges the sentence.

[719] Burton. [p. 40, b] Necesse est cum insanientibus furere, nisi solus relinquaris. Petronius. Editor: "One must go mad with the mad, unless one is to be left alone." Petronius, Satyrica 3: a teacher must indulge pupils' tastes or lose his audience.

[720] Editor. The Latin couplet is Horace, Satires 2.3.120–121. Its translation is followed by Burton's own English verse, preserving his deliberate repetition. The preceding maxim about a "surfeit" of error has not been traced to a secure source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 41 But put case they do perceive it, and some one be manifestly convict of madnes, [721]he now takes notice of his folly, be it in action, gesture, speech, a vain humor he hath in building, bragging, jangling, spending, gaming, courting, scribling, prating, for which he is ridiculous to others, [722]on which he dotes, he doth acknowledge as much: yet with all the Rhetorick thou hast, thou canst not so recall him, but to the contrary notwithstanding, he will persevere in his dotage.	But suppose they do notice, and someone is plainly shown to be mad. He now recognizes his folly, whether in action, gesture, speech, or some foolish obsession with building, boasting, quarrelling, spending, gambling, courting, scribbling, or babbling, which makes him ridiculous to others and on which he dotes. He admits as much; yet all your eloquence cannot reclaim him. Despite everything said against it, he will persist in his folly.

[721] Burton. [p. 41, c] Quoniam non est genus unum stultitiæ qua me insanire putas; Editor: “Since there is more than one kind of folly, by which do you think me mad?” Rearranged from Horace, Satires 2.3.301–302.

[722] Burton. [p. 41, d] Stultum me fateor, liceat concedere verum, Atque etiam insanum. Hor. Editor: “I admit I am a fool—let truth be conceded—and mad as well.” Horace, Satires 2.3.305–306, with verum substituted for veris.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tis amabilis insania, & mentis gratissimus error, so pleasing, so delicious, that he [723]cannot leave it. He knows his error, but will not seek to decline it, tell him what the event will be, beggery, sorrow, sicknesse, disgrace, shame, losse, madnesse; yet [724]an angry man will prefer vengeance, a lascivious his whore, a thief his booty, a glutton his belly before his welfare. Tell an Epicure, a covetous man, an ambitious man of his irregular course, wein him from it a little, pol me occidistis amici, he cries anon, you have undone him, and as [725]a dog to his vomit, he returns to it again:	It is "a lovable madness, a most welcome delusion of the mind," so pleasing, so delicious that he cannot give it up. He knows his error but makes no effort to escape it. Tell him what it will lead to—beggary, sorrow, illness, disgrace, shame, loss, madness—yet the angry man will prefer revenge, the lustful man his prostitute, the thief his loot, the glutton his belly, to his own welfare. Warn a pleasure-seeker, a miser, or an ambitious man about his wayward course, wean him from it a little, and immediately he cries, "By heaven, my friends, you have killed me!" You have ruined him; and, like a dog returning to its vomit, he goes back to it again.[726]

[723] Burton. [p. 41, e] Odi nec possum cupiens nec esse quod odi. Ovid. Errore grato libenter omnes insanimus. Editor: Ovid, Amores 2.4.5: "I hate it, yet, though I wish to, I cannot cease to be what I hate." That translation follows Ovid's non esse; Burton prints nec esse, which obscures the sense. The added sentence means "We all willingly go mad in a pleasing error"; its separate source is unestablished.

[724] Burton. [p. 41, f] Amator scortum vitæ præponit, iracundus vindictam; fur prædam, parasitus gulam, ambitiosus honores, avarus opes, &c. odimus hæc & accersimus. Cardan. l. 2. de conso. Editor: "The lover puts his prostitute before life; the angry man, revenge; the thief, plunder; the parasite, gluttony; the ambitious man, honours; the miser, riches, etc. We hate these things and summon them." Cardano, On Consolation, book 2, as cited by Burton; the exact passage remains uncollated.

[725] Burton. [p. 41, g] Prov. 26. 11. Editor: Proverbs 26:11 compares a fool repeating his folly to a dog returning to its vomit.

[726] Editor. The welcome delusion and "you have killed me" evoke Horace, Epistles 2.2.128–140: an Argive enjoys imaginary performances in an empty theatre and resents his cure. Amabilis insania also recalls Horace, Odes 3.4.5–6. An Epicure here is a pleasure-seeker, not a precise description of Epicurean philosophy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
no perswasion will take place, no counsell, say what thou canst, Clames licet & mare cœlo —— Confundas, surdo narras, demonstrate as Ulysses did to [727]Elpenor and Gryllus, and the rest of his companions those swinish men, he is irrefragable in his humor, he will be a hog still; bray him in a morter, he will be the same.	No persuasion, no advice will have any effect. Say what you will: You may shout and mingle sea with sky— you are speaking to the deaf. Demonstrate your case as Ulysses did to Elpenor, Gryllus, and the rest of his companions, those swinish men: he is immovable in his disposition. A hog he will remain; pound him in a mortar, and he will still be the same.[728]
If he be in an heresie, or some perverse opinion, setled as some of our ignorant Papists are, convince his understanding, shew him the several follies, and absurd fopperies of that sect, force him to say, [729]veris vincor, make it as clear as the Sun, he will erre still, peevish and obstinate as he is; and as he said [730]si in hoc erro, libenter erro, nec hunc errorem auferri mihi volo; I will do as I have done, as my predecessors have done, [731]and as my friends now do: I will dote for company.	If he is fixed in a heresy or some perverse opinion, as some of our ignorant Papists are, convince his understanding, show him that sect's various follies and absurdities, force him to say "I am defeated by the truth," make it as clear as the sun: he will persist in error, perverse and obstinate as ever. As the saying goes, "If I am mistaken in this, I am gladly mistaken, and I do not want this error taken from me." I will do as I have done, as my predecessors did, and as my friends now do: I will be a fool for company.[732]

[727] Burton. [p. 41, h] Plutarch. Gryllo. suilli homines sic. Clem. Alex. vo. Editor: Plutarch, Gryllus (also titled Beasts Are Rational): Gryllus argues against becoming human again. Suilli homines means "pig-like people." The abbreviated Clement of Alexandria reference, including its obscure final vo., is retained and remains unresolved. Elpenor is named by Burton but is not a speaker in Plutarch's dialogue.

[728] Editor. Burton presents the refusal to become human as stubborn attachment to a degraded life. Plutarch's Gryllus instead gives the pig an extended argument for animal superiority. "Bray" means pound or crush; compare Proverbs 27:22 on the folly that cannot be pounded out of a fool. The exact source of the Latin lines about speaking to the deaf remains unlocated.

[729] Burton. [p. 41, i] Non persuadebis, etiamsi persuaseris. Editor: "You will not persuade me, even if you have persuaded me." Burton names no source for this paradox of wilful refusal.

[730] Burton. [p. 41, k] Tully. Editor: Cicero, On Old Age 85. Cato says he would gladly be mistaken in believing the soul immortal. Burton transfers the saying to a defender of what he calls religious error.

[731] Burton. [p. 41, l] Malo cum illis insanire, quam cum aliis bene sentire. Editor: "I would rather be mad with them than think rightly with others." No source is specified.

[732] Editor. "Papists" is Burton's derogatory Protestant term for Roman Catholics. His polemical example is retained. "Peevish" here means perverse or obstinately contrary. The Cicero quotation originally concerns belief in immortality, not adherence to Catholicism.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Say now, are these men [733]mad or no, [734]Heus age responde? are they ridiculous? cedo quemvis arbitrum, are they sanæ mentis, sober, wise, and discreet? have they common sense? —— [735]uter est insanior horum?	Tell me now: are these men mad or not? "Come, answer!" Are they ridiculous? "Name any judge you like." Are they "of sound mind," sober, wise, and sensible? Have they common sense? Which of these is the madder?
I am of Democritus opinion for my part, I hold them worthy to be laughed at; a company of brain-sick disards, as mad as [736]Orestes and Athamas, that they may go ride the ass, & all sail along to the Anticyræ, in the ship of fools for company together. I need not much labor to prove this which I say otherwise then thus, make any solemn protestation, or swear, I think you will beleeve me without an oath; say at a word, are they fools? I refer it to you, though you be likewise fools and madmen your selves, and I as mad to ask the question; for what said our comical Mercurie? [737]Justum ab injustis petere insipientia est. Ile stand to your censure yet, what think you?	For my part, I agree with Democritus: I think they deserve to be laughed at, a company of brain-sick fools, as mad as Orestes and Athamas. Let them ride the ass and all sail off together to the Anticyras in the ship of fools. I need take little further trouble to prove what I say, make no solemn declaration or swear to it; I think you will believe me without an oath. In a word, are they fools? I leave it to you, though you too are fools and madmen, and I am just as mad to ask. For what did Mercury say in the comedy? It is foolish to ask justice of the unjust. Still, I will accept your judgement: what do you think?[738]

[733] Burton. [p. 41, m] Qui inter hos enutriuntur, non magis sapere possunt, quàm qui in culinâ bene olere. Petron. Editor: "Those brought up among these people can no more be wise than someone in a kitchen can smell sweet." Adapted from Petronius, Satyrica 2, where the attack is on the artificial education given by rhetorical schools.

[734] Burton. [p. 41, n] Persius. Editor: Persius, Satires 2.17: "Come, answer!"

[735] Burton. [p. 41, o] Hor. 2. ser. Editor: Horace, Satires 2.3.102: "Which of these is the madder?"

[736] Burton. [p. 41, p] Vesanum exagitant pueri, innuptæque puellæ. Editor: "Boys and unmarried girls torment the madman." No author is printed here. The exact source remains unlocated; Horace's picture of boys pursuing a mad poet in Ars Poetica 455–456 is a parallel, not the same line.

[737] Burton. [p. 41, q] Plautus. Editor: Amphitruo, prologue 36, spoken by Mercury. Burton's singular Justum replaces Plautus's plural iusta; the meaning remains that seeking justice from the unjust is foolish.

[738] Editor. Orestes and Athamas are familiar figures of madness in classical myth. Riding the ass suggests public ridicule; the ship of fools belongs to a long satirical tradition of collective folly. Burton then implicates both reader and author: even asking who is mad cannot establish the speaker's exemption. "Censure" means judgement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 41–42 But for as much as I undertook at first, that Kingdoms, Provinces, families, were melancholy as well as private men, I will examin them in particular, and that which I have hitherto dilated at random, in more general terms, I will particularly insist in, prove with more special and evident arguments, testimonies, illustrations, and that in brief. [739]Nunc accipe quare desipiant omnes æque ac tu.	But since I undertook at the outset to show that kingdoms, provinces, and families were melancholy as well as individuals, I will examine them separately. What I have so far discussed at large, in general terms, I will now consider in detail and prove with more specific and evident arguments, testimonies, and illustrations—and do so briefly. Now hear why everyone is as foolish as you.
Source page 42 My first argument is borrowed from Solomon, an arrow drawn out of his sententious quiver, Pro. 3.7. Be not wise in thine own eyes. And 26.12. Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? more hope is of a fool then of him. Isay pronounceth a woe against such men. cap. 5.21. that are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight. For hence we may gather, that it is a great offence, and men are much deceived that think too well of themselves, an especial argument to convince them of folly.[740]	My first argument comes from Solomon, an arrow drawn from his quiver of maxims. Proverbs 3:7: "Do not be wise in your own eyes." And 26:12: "Do you see a man wise in his own opinion? There is more hope for a fool than for him." Isaiah pronounces woe upon such people, in 5:21: those "who are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight." From this we may gather that self-conceit is a serious fault, and that people who think too well of themselves are badly deceived: a particularly strong argument for proving their folly.

[739] Burton. [p. 42, a] Hor. l. 2. sat. 2. Editor: The line is from Horace, Satires 2.3.46–47, rather than 2.2. It introduces the claim that the people who call someone mad are equally foolish.

[740] Burton. [p. 42, unlettered] Superbam stultitiam Plinius vocat. 7. epist. 21. quod semel dixi, fixum ratumque sit. Editor: "Pliny calls it arrogant folly: let what I have once said remain fixed and settled." The quotation is actually found in Seneca, On Benefits 4.38.1; the cited Pliny letter concerns his eyesight. No body anchor is visible; the note is attached here by subject.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many men (saith [741]Seneca) had been without question wise, had they not had an opinion that they had attained to perfection of knowledge already, even before they had gone half way, too forward, too ripe, præproperi, too quick and ready, [742]cito prudentes, cito pii, cito mariti, cito patres, cito sacerdotes, cito omnis officii capaces & curiosi,	Many people, says Seneca, would undoubtedly have been wise if they had not imagined they had already reached perfect knowledge before they were even halfway there. Too forward, too ripe, too hasty, too quick and ready: wise too soon, pious too soon, husbands too soon, fathers too soon, priests too soon, too soon qualified for every office and eager to undertake it.
they had too good a conceipt of themselves, and that marred all; of their worth, valour, skil, art, learning, judgement, eloquence, their good parts; all their geese are swans, and that manifestly proves them to be no better then fools. In former times they had but seven wise men, now you can scarce finde so many fools.	They thought too highly of themselves—of their worth, courage, skill, expertise, learning, judgement, eloquence, and good qualities—and that ruined everything. All their geese are swans; this plainly proves that they are no better than fools. In former times there were only seven wise men; now you can scarcely find as many fools.[743]
Thales sent the golden Tripos, which the Fishermen found, & the oracle commanded to be [744]given to the wisest, to Bias, Bias to Solon, &c. If such a thing were now found, we should all fight for it, as the three goddesses did for the golden apple, we are so wise:	Thales sent the golden tripod that the fishermen found, and that the oracle ordered to be "given to the wisest," to Bias; Bias sent it to Solon, and so on. If such a thing were found now, we would all fight over it, as the three goddesses did over the golden apple: we are so wise![745]

[741] Burton. [p. 42, b] Multi sapientes proculdubio fuissent, si se non putassent ad sapientiæ summum pervenisse. Editor: "Many would undoubtedly have been wise if they had not thought they had reached the summit of wisdom." Compare Seneca, On Tranquillity of Mind 1.17 (1.16 in some editions), spoken by Serenus to Seneca.

[742] Burton. [p. 42, c] Idem. Editor: "The same author": Seneca. The exact source of the ensuing repeated cito ("too soon") has not been located.

[743] Editor. "All their geese are swans" means that they overvalue everything belonging to them. The next sentence is ironic: everyone now claims wisdom, so few will admit to being fools. The seven wise men are the traditional Seven Sages of Greece.

[744] Burton. [p. 42, *] Plutarchus Solone. Detur sapientiori. Editor: "Plutarch, Solon. Let it be given to the wiser." Life of Solon 4.1–4 tells how the sages repeatedly passed on the tripod, each declining the honour.

[745] Editor. The tripod was a valuable three-legged vessel or stand. The golden apple, marked for the fairest, provoked the rivalry of Hera, Athena, and Aphrodite and the judgement of Paris. Burton contrasts the sages' modesty with a contest for precedence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
we have women-politicians, children metaphysitians; every silly fellow can square a circle, make perpetual motions, finde the philosophers stone, interpret Apocalypsis, make new Theoricks, a new systeme of the world, new Logick, new Philosophie, &c.	We have women practising statecraft and children practising metaphysics. Every simpleton can square the circle, invent perpetual motion, find the philosopher's stone, interpret Revelation, devise new theories, a new system of the universe, a new logic, a new philosophy, and so on.[746]
Nostra utique regio, saith [747]Petronius, our countrey is so full of deified spirits, divine souls, that you may sooner finde a God than a man amongst us, we think so well of our selves, and that is an ample testimony of much folly.	"Our country, indeed," says Petronius, "is so full of deified spirits, divine souls, that you may sooner find a god than a man among us." We think so well of ourselves, and that is abundant evidence of great folly.
My second argument is grounded upon the like place of Scripture, which though before mention'd in effect, yet for some reasons is to be repeated (& by Plato's good leave, I may do it, [748]δὶς τὸ καλὸν ῥηθὲν οὐδὲν βλάπτει) Fools (saith David) by reason of their transgressions, &c. Psal. 107.17. Hence Musculus infers all transgressors must needs be fools.	My second argument rests on a similar passage of Scripture. Although I have already mentioned its substance, there are reasons to repeat it—and, with Plato's permission, I may: "There is no harm in saying a good thing twice." "Fools," says David, "because of their transgressions," and so on, Psalm 107:17. From this Musculus infers that all transgressors must necessarily be fools.[749]

[746] Editor. The catalogue mocks claims to knowledge beyond one's competence. It includes mathematical construction, machines that run perpetually, alchemical transformation, biblical prophecy, and new cosmologies. The inclusion of women in statecraft reflects Burton's assumptions about who should exercise intellectual and political authority.

[747] Burton. [p. 42, d] Tam præsentibus plena est numinibus, ut facilius possis Deum quam hominem invenire. Editor: "So full of present divinities that you could more easily find a god than a man." Petronius, Satyrica 17. Burton turns Quartilla's claim about local gods into a joke about people who consider themselves divine.

[748] Burton. [p. 42, e] Pulchrum bis dicere non nocet. Editor: "It does no harm to say a fine thing twice." This renders the Greek proverb in the body. Compare Plato, Gorgias 498e–499a, on repeating and reconsidering fine things.

[749] Editor. Musculus is Wolfgang Musculus, the Protestant biblical commentator. Burton develops a moral argument from Psalm 107:17, whose fools suffer because of wrongdoing; his conclusion concerns the universality of sin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So we reade Rom. 2. Tribulation and anguish on the soul of every man that doth evil; but all do evil. And Isay 65.14. My servants shall sing for joy, and [750]ye shall cry for sorrow of heart, and vexation of minde. Tis ratified by the common consent of all philosophers. Dishonesty (saith Cardan) is nothing else but folly and madnesse. [751]Probus quis nobiscum vivit? Shew me an honest man. Nemo malus qui non stultus, tis Fabius aphorism to the same end. If none honest, none wise, then all fools.	So we read in Romans 2: "Tribulation and anguish upon the soul of everyone who does evil"; but everyone does evil. And Isaiah 65:14: "My servants shall sing for joy, and you shall cry out in sorrow of heart and distress of mind." The common agreement of all philosophers confirms it. "Wickedness," says Cardan, "is nothing but folly and madness." What upright man lives among us? Show me an honest man. "No one is wicked without being foolish": that is Fabius's maxim to the same effect. If none is honest, none is wise; then all are fools.[752]
And well may they be so accounted: for who will account him otherwise, Qui iter adornat in occidentem, quum properaret in orientem? that goes backward all his life, westward, when he is bound to the east? or hold him a wise man (saith [753]Musculus) that prefers momentany pleasures to eternity, that spends his masters goods in his absence, forthwith to be condemned for it? Nequicquam sapit qui sibi non sapit,	And they may well be considered fools. Who could judge otherwise of someone who prepares to travel west when he should be hurrying east—who goes backwards all his life, westward when he is bound east? Or who could think a man wise, asks Musculus, if he prefers momentary pleasures to eternity, or spends his master's property in his absence, only to be condemned for it at once? Wisdom is useless in someone who cannot be wise for himself.

[750] Burton. [p. 42, f] Malefactors. Editor: Burton identifies the people addressed by "ye" in Isaiah 65:14 as wrongdoers.

[751] Burton. [p. 42, g] Who can finde a faithful man? Pro. 20.6. Editor: Proverbs 20:6 supplies a biblical parallel to the Latin question.

[752] Editor. Romans 2:9 is the first reference. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano; Fabius is Marcus Fabius Quintilian. Their exact sources for these maxims have not been located. "Honest" here means morally upright, not merely truthful. The movement from everyone's sinfulness to everyone's folly is Burton's argument.

[753] Burton. [p. 42, h] In Psal. 49. Qui momentanea sempiternis, qui delapidat heri absentis bona, mox in jus vocandus & damnandus. Editor: "On Psalm 49. He who [prefers] passing things to eternal things, who squanders his absent master's goods, soon to be summoned for judgement and condemned." Burton cites Wolfgang Musculus's commentary; the precise passage remains to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 42–43 Who will say that a sick man is wise, that eats & drinks to overthrow the temperature of his body? Can you account him wise or discreet that would willingly have his health, and yet wil do nothing that should procure or continue it? [754]Theodoret out of Plotinus the Platonist, holds it a ridiculous thing for a man to live after his own laws, to do that which is offensive to God, and yet to hope that he should save him: and when he voluntarily neglects his own safety, and contemns the means, to think to be delivered by another: who will say these men are wise?	Who will call a sick man wise when he eats and drinks in ways that upset his body's balance? Can you call someone wise or sensible who wants his health but will do nothing to obtain or preserve it?[755] Theodoret, drawing on the Platonist Plotinus, thinks it ridiculous for a man to live by his own rules, do what offends God, and yet hope that God will save him; or, when he wilfully neglects his own safety and despises the means of securing it, expect someone else to deliver him. Who will call such people wise?
Source page 43 A third argument may be derived from the precedent, [756]all men are carried away with passion, discontent, lust, pleasures, &c. they generally hate those vertues they should love, and love such vices they should hate. Therefore more then melancholy, quite mad, bruit beasts, and void of reason, so Chrysostome contends; or rather dead and buried alive, as [757]Philo Judæus concludes it for a certainty, of all such that are carried away with passions, or labour of any disease of the minde.	A third argument follows from the preceding one. Everyone is carried away by passion, discontent, lust, pleasures, and so forth; people generally hate the virtues they ought to love and love the vices they ought to hate. They are therefore more than melancholy: quite mad, brute beasts, without reason—so Chrysostom argues. Or rather, they are dead and buried alive, as Philo the Jew concludes with certainty of all who are carried away by passions or suffer from any disease of the mind.[758]

[754] Burton. [p. 43, i] Perquam ridiculum est homines ex animi sententia vivere, & quæ Diis ingrata sunt exequi, & tamen à solis Diis velle salvos fieri, quum propriæ salutis curam abjecerint. Theod. c. 6. de provid. lib. de curat. græc. affect. Editor: "It is very ridiculous for people to live as they please, do what displeases the gods, and yet expect the gods alone to save them, when they have abandoned care for their own safety." Theodoret, Cure of the Greek Maladies, discourse 6, on providence. Burton's English changes the plural gods to the Christian God. The exact Latin edition has not been identified.

[755] Editor. "Temperature" means the balance or constitution of the body, especially its mixture of qualities and humours, rather than its measured heat. Burton uses the pursuit of bodily health as an analogy for care of the soul.

[756] Burton. [p. 43, k] Sapiens sibi qui imperiosus, &c. Hor. 2. ser. 7. Editor: "The wise man who commands himself," and so on: Horace, Satires 2.7.83. Burton quotes the passage more fully below.

[757] Burton. [p. 43, l] Conclus. lib. de vic. offer. certum est animi morbis laborantes pro mortuis censendos. Editor: "At the conclusion of the book On Offering Victims: it is certain that those suffering diseases of the mind should be counted as dead." Burton's abbreviated title refers to a sacrificial treatise of Philo; the precise passage remains unlocated.

[758] Editor. "Passion" here means an emotion or desire that carries a person beyond rational self-command. Burton moves among moral failure, spiritual death, melancholy, and madness; these terms do not have one fixed medical meaning throughout the preface.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Where is fear and sorrow, there [759]Lactantius stiffely maintains, wisdom cannot dwell. ——qui cupiet, metuet quoque porro, Qui metuens vivit, liber mihi non erit unquam. Seneca & the rest of the Stoicks are of opinion, that where is any the least perturbation, wisdom may not be found.	Where there is fear and sorrow, Lactantius firmly maintains, wisdom cannot dwell. Whoever desires will also fear; Whoever lives in fear will never, to my mind, be free.[760] Seneca and the other Stoics hold that wisdom cannot be found wherever there is even the slightest disturbance of the emotions.
What more ridiculous, as [761]Lactantius urgeth, then to hear how Xerxes whipped the Hellespont, threatened the Mountain Athos, and the like. To speak ad rem, who is free from passion? [762]Mortalis nemo est quem non attingat dolor, morbusve, as [763]Tully determins out of an old Poem, no mortal men can avoid sorrow & sicknes, and sorrow is an unseparable companion of melancholy.	What could be more ridiculous, as Lactantius asks, than to hear how Xerxes whipped the Hellespont, threatened Mount Athos, and so on?[764] To come to the point, who is free from passion? “There is no mortal whom pain or sickness does not touch,” as Cicero declares, quoting an old poem. No mortal can avoid sorrow and sickness, and sorrow is melancholy’s inseparable companion.

[759] Burton. [p. 43, m] Lib. de sap. Ubi timor adest, sapientia adesse nequit. Editor: “Book on wisdom. Where fear is present, wisdom cannot be present.” The reference to Lactantius is incomplete; an exact location has not been established.

[760] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.16.65–66. The Latin links desire to fear and therefore to servitude. Burton’s vivit (“lives”) replaces the consulted text’s vivet (“will live”). “Perturbation” is the Stoic term for a disordered passion.

[761] Burton. [p. 43, n] Quid insanius Xerxe Hellespontum verberante, &c. Editor: “What could be madder than Xerxes whipping the Hellespont?” The attribution to Lactantius remains unlocated.

[762] Burton. [p. 43, o] Eccl. 21.12. Where is bitternesse, there is no understanding. Prov. 12.16. An angry man is a fool. Editor: Eccl. here means Ecclesiasticus (Sirach), not Ecclesiastes, which has only twelve chapters. Sirach 21:12 joins lack of wisdom to bitterness; Proverbs 12:16 describes the fool who immediately shows his anger.

[763] Burton. [p. 43, p] 3. Tusc. Iniuria in sapientem non cadit. Editor: “Tusculan Disputations, book 3. Injury does not befall the wise man.” The body’s verses are in Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 3.59, where they are ascribed to Euripides. Burton prints morbusve (“or sickness”) for morbusque (“and sickness”); his reading is retained. The further maxim in the margin is not the quoted verse.

[764] Editor. The Hellespont is the strait now called the Dardanelles. Herodotus, Histories 7.35, tells how Xerxes ordered its waters scourged after a storm broke his bridge. Burton’s additional threat to Mount Athos is not verified here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[765]Chrysostome pleads farther yet, that they are more then mad, very beasts, stupified and void of common sense: For how (saith he) shall I know thee to be a man, when thou kickest like an ass, neighest like an horse after women, ravest in lust like a bull, ravenest like a bear, stingest like a scorpion, rakest like a wolf, as subtile as a fox, as impudent as a dog? Shall I say thou art a man, that hast all the symptomes of a beast? How shall I know thee to be a man? by thy shape? That affrights me more, when I see a beast in likenesse of a man.	Chrysostom goes further still: they are more than mad, actual beasts, stupefied and without common sense. “How,” he asks, “am I to recognise you as a man when you kick like an ass, neigh after women like a horse, rage with lust like a bull, gorge like a bear, sting like a scorpion, prey like a wolf, and are as cunning as a fox and as shameless as a dog? Shall I call you a man when you show every sign of a beast? How shall I recognise you as a man? By your shape? That frightens me still more, to see a beast in the likeness of a man.”
[766]Seneca cals that of Epicurus, magnificam vocem, an heroical speech, A fool still begins to live, and accounts it a filthy lightnesse in men, every day to lay new foundations of their life, but who doth otherwise? One travels, another builds; one for this, another for that busines, and old folks are as far out as the rest; O dementem senectutem, Tully exclaims. Therefore yong, old, middle age, all are stupid, and dote.	Seneca calls that saying of Epicurus a magnificent utterance, a heroic speech: “A fool is always beginning to live.” He considers it shameful fickleness to lay new foundations for one’s life every day. But who does otherwise? One travels, another builds; one pursues this business, another that, and old people are as far astray as the rest. “O foolish old age!” Cicero exclaims. Thus young, old, and middle-aged are all senseless and foolish.[767]

[765] Burton. [p. 43, q and foot of page] Hom. 6. in 2. Epist. ad Cor. Hominem te agnoscere nequeo, cum tanquam asinus recalcitres, lascivias ut taurus, hinnias ut equus post mulieres, ut ursus ventri indulgeas, quum rapias ut lupus, &c. at inquis formam hominis habeo, Id magis terret, quum feram humana specie videre me putem. Editor: “Homily 6 on 2 Corinthians. I cannot recognise you as a man when you kick like an ass, lust like a bull, neigh after women like a horse, indulge your belly like a bear, and prey like a wolf, etc. But, you say, I have a human shape. That frightens me more, since I seem to see a beast in human form.” Compare Chrysostom, Homily 6 on 2 Corinthians, §3; a related animal catalogue appears in Homily 4 on Matthew, §15. Burton adapts the catalogue.

[766] Burton. [p. 43, r and foot of page] Epist. lib. 2. 13. Stultus semper incipit vivere, fæda hominum levitas, nova quotidie fundamenta vitæ ponere, novas spes, &c. Editor: “Letters, book 2, 13. A fool is always beginning to live: shameful human fickleness, to lay new foundations of life every day, new hopes, etc.” Seneca, Letter 13.16–17, quoting Epicurus.

[767] Editor. “Still” means continually: the fool is forever preparing to live instead of living. The exclamation attributed to Cicero, “O foolish old age,” remains unlocated; it is not silently supplied with a conjectural reference.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[768]Æneas Sylvius amongst many other, sets down three special wayes to finde a fool by. He is a fool that seeks that he cannot finde: He is a fool that seeks that, which being found will do him more harm then good: He is a fool, that having variety of wayes to bring him to his jorneys end, takes that which is worst. If so, me thinks most men are fools; examine their courses, and you shal soon perceive what dizards and mad men the major part are.	Among many others, Aeneas Sylvius sets down three particular ways to recognise a fool. He is a fool who seeks what he cannot find; he is a fool who seeks something that, once found, will do him more harm than good; and he is a fool who, having several routes to his journey's end, chooses the worst. If so, it seems to me that most people are fools. Examine their conduct and you will soon see what simpletons and madmen the greater part of them are.
Source page 44 Beroaldus will have drunkards, afternoon men, and such as more then ordinarily delight in drink, to be mad. The first pot quencheth thirst, so Panyasis the Poet determins in Athenæus, secunda gratiis, horis & Dyonisio: the second makes merry, the third for pleasure, quarta ad insaniam, the fourth makes them mad. If this position be true, what a catalogue of mad men shall we have? what shall they be that drink four times four? Nonne supra omnem furorem, supra omnem insaniam reddunt insanissimos? I am of his opinion, they are more then mad, much worse then mad.	Beroaldus considers drunkards, afternoon drinkers, and those who take more than ordinary pleasure in drink to be mad. The first cup quenches thirst, as the poet Panyasis declares in Athenaeus; "the second belongs to the Graces, the Hours, and Dionysus." The second makes people merry, the third is for pleasure, "the fourth for madness": the fourth drives them mad. If this proposition is true, what a catalogue of madmen we shall have! What must we call those who drink four times four? Do they not make themselves utterly mad, beyond every frenzy, beyond all madness? I agree with him: they are more than mad, much worse than mad.[769]

[768] Burton. [p. 43, * and foot of page] De curial. miser. Stultus, qui quærit quod nequit invenire, stultus qui quærit quod nocet inventum, stultus qui cum plures habet calles, deteriorem deligit. Mihi videntur omnes deliri, amentes, &c. Editor: "On the Misery of Courtiers. A fool is one who seeks what he cannot find; one who seeks what harms him when found; one who, having several paths, chooses the worse. To me they all seem deluded, mad, etc." Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini, later Pope Pius II. The exact passage in the cited work remains to be collated.

[769] Editor. Beroaldus is Filippo Beroaldo; his precise passage is unlocated. Athenaeus, Deipnosophists 2.36d–f, preserves Panyasis's sequence: the first round for the Graces, Hours, and Dionysus; the second for Aphrodite and Dionysus; the third for Violence and Ruin. Burton's four-stage sequence differs. The Hours are divine personifications of ordered seasons.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The [770]Abderites condemned Democritus for a mad man, because he was sometimes sad, and sometimes again profusely merry. Hâc Patriâ (saith Hyppocrates) ob risum furere & insanire dicunt, his countrey men hold him mad because he laughs; & therefore he desires him to advise all his friends at [771]Rodes, that they do not laugh too much, or be over sad. Had those Abderites been conversant with us, and but seen what fleering and grining there is in this age, [772]they would certainly have concluded, we had been all out of our wits.	The people of Abdera judged Democritus mad because he was sometimes sad and at other times extravagantly merry. "In this country," says Hippocrates, "they say that he raves and is mad because he laughs": his countrymen think him mad because he laughs. He therefore asks his correspondent to warn all his friends at Rhodes neither to laugh too much nor to be excessively sad. Had those Abderites lived among us and merely seen the sneering and grinning of our age, they would certainly have concluded that we were all out of our minds.
Aristotle in his Ethicks holds, fælix idemque sapiens, to be wise and happy are reciprocal terms, bonus idemque sapiens honestus. Tis Tullies paradox, wise men are free, but fools are slaves, [773]liberty is a power to live according to his own Laws, as we wil our selves: who hath this liberty? who is free?	Aristotle holds in his Ethics that the happy man is also the wise man: to be wise and to be happy are interchangeable terms; the good man is likewise wise and honourable.[774] Cicero's paradox is that wise men are free, but fools are slaves. Freedom is the power to live by our own laws, as we ourselves wish. Who has this freedom? Who is free?

[770] Burton. [p. 44, b] Ep. Demageto. Editor: "Letter to Demagetus [Damagetus]." This belongs to the literary correspondence attributed to Hippocrates about Democritus; it is not secure eyewitness testimony by the historical physician. The particular early edition used by Burton is unresolved.

[771] Burton. [p. 44, c] Amicis nostris Rhodi dicito, ne nimium rideant, aut nimium tristes sint. Editor: "Tell our friends at Rhodes not to laugh too much or be excessively sad." This continues the preceding letter reference.

[772] Burton. [p. 44, d] Per multum risum poteris cognoscere stultum. Offic. 3. c. 9. Editor: "By much laughter you will be able to recognise a fool." The work behind Offic. 3.9 has not been securely identified. The body anchor is unclear; the note is placed beside the preceding account of excessive laughter.

[773] Burton. [p. 44, e] Sapientes liberi, stulti servi, libertas est potestas, &c. Editor: "The wise are free, fools slaves; liberty is the power," etc. Cicero, Stoic Paradoxes 5.33–34: moral self-government, rather than legal freedom, is meant.

[774] Editor. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 10.7–8, places the highest happiness in contemplative activity and calls the philosopher especially happy. Burton compresses the relation into an equivalence useful to his argument; this sentence is not a direct quotation from Aristotle.

Original text 1651	Modern English
——[775]sapiens sibique imperiosus, Quem neque pauperies, neque mors, neque vincula terrent, Responsare cupidinibus, contemnere honores Fortis, & in seipso totus teres atque rotundus. He is wise that can command his own will, Valiant and constant to himself still, Whom poverty nor death, nor bands can fright, Checks his desires, scorns honours, just and right.	The wise man who commands himself, Whom neither poverty nor death nor chains can frighten, Strong enough to resist desires and scorn honours, Complete in himself, smooth and round. He is wise who can command his own will, Brave and always steadfast in himself, Whom neither poverty, death, nor chains can frighten, Who checks his desires, scorns honours, and is just and upright.[776]
But where shall such a man be found? If no where, then e diametro, we all are slaves, senslesse, or worse. Nemo malus fælix. But no man is happy in this life, none good, therefore no man wise. Rari quippe boni——[777] For one vertue you shall finde ten vices in the same party; pauci Promethei, multi Epimethei.	But where is such a man to be found? If nowhere, then, at the opposite extreme, we are all slaves, senseless or worse. “No wicked man is happy.” But no one is happy in this life, no one good; therefore no one is wise. For good people are rare. For one virtue you will find ten vices in the same person: few Prometheuses, many Epimetheuses.[778]

[775] Burton. [p. 44, f] Hor. 2. ser. 7. Editor: Horace, Satires 2.7.83–86. The slave Davus applies this Stoic definition of freedom against his master. Burton prints sibique where the consulted text has sibi qui.

[776] Editor. The first four lines translate Horace; the next four preserve Burton’s own English restatement. The “smooth and round” wise man is complete in himself, offering fortune no place to catch hold: an image of moral independence.

[777] Burton. [p. 44, unlettered] Juven. Editor: Juvenal, Satire 13.26: good people are rare. The preceding Nemo malus fælix (“No wicked man is happy”) is also Juvenalian: Satire 4.8.

[778] Editor. Prometheus suggests foresight and Epimetheus afterthought: few think ahead, many understand only after the event. Burton is making a verbal and mythological contrast, not counting literal figures.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We may peradventure usurp the name, or attribute it to others for favor, as Carolus Sapiens, Philippus Bonus, Lodovicus Pius, &c. & describe the properties of a wise man, as Tully doth an Orator, Xenophon Cyrus, Castilio a Courtier, Galen Temperament, An aristocrasie is described by Politicians. But where shall such a man be found?	We may perhaps claim the title for ourselves or bestow it upon others as a favour—Charles the Wise, Philip the Good, Louis the Pious, and so on. We may describe the qualities of a wise man, as Cicero describes an orator, Xenophon Cyrus, Castiglione a courtier, or Galen a balanced bodily constitution, and as political writers describe an aristocracy. But where is such a man to be found?[779]
Vir bonus & sapiens, qualem vix repperit unum Millibus è multis hominum consultus Apollo. A wise, a good man in a million, Apollo consulted could scarce finde one. A man is a miracle of himself, but Trismegistus adds, Maximum miraculum homo sapiens, a wise man is a wonder: multi Thirsigeri, pauci Bacchi.	A good and wise man, such as Apollo, when consulted, Could scarcely find one among many thousands. A wise and good man in a million: Apollo, when consulted, could scarcely find one.[780] A human being is a marvel in himself, but Trismegistus adds, “The greatest marvel is a wise man”: a wise man is a wonder. Many carry the thyrsus; few are true initiates of Bacchus.[781]

[779] Editor. The examples are ideal portraits: the accomplished speaker, ruler, courtier, balanced body, and government by the best. “Temperament” is bodily constitution. Burton asks whether any actual person fulfils the ideal; the honorific royal names need not prove the qualities they proclaim.

[780] Editor. The couplet opens De viro bono, transmitted among Ausonius’s poems and also in the Appendix Vergiliana as De institutione viri boni. The consulted text has e cunctis (“out of all”) where Burton prints e multis (“out of many”). His own following couplet heightens “many thousands” to “a million.” Both versions remain.

[781] Editor. Trismegistus is Hermes Trismegistus, the legendary authority of the Hermetic writings; the exact source of this maxim is unverified. The following saying occurs in Plato, Phaedo 69c. A thyrsus is the ritual staff of Bacchus’s followers; carrying the emblem does not make someone a true initiate.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 44–45 Alexander when he was presented with that rich and costly casket of King Darius, and every man advised him what to put in it, he reserved it to keep Homers works, as the most precious Jewell of humane wit, and yet [782]Scaliger upbraids Homers Muse, Nutricem insanæ sapientiæ, a nurserie of madnesse, [783]impudent as a Court Lady, that blushes at nothing.	When Alexander was presented with King Darius's rich and costly casket, and everyone advised him what to put in it, he kept it for Homer's works, as the most precious jewel of human genius.[784] Yet Scaliger attacks Homer's Muse as "the nurse of mad wisdom," a nursery of madness, as shameless as a lady at court who blushes at nothing.
Source page 45 Jacobus Mycillus, Gilbertus Cognatus, Erasmus, and almost all posterity admire Lucians luxuriant wit, yet Scaliger rejects him in his censure, and cals him the Cerberus of the Muses. Socrates whom all the world so much magnified, is by Lactantius and Theodoret condemned for a fool. Plutarch extols Seneca's wit beyond all the Greeks, nulli secundus, yet [785]Seneca saith of himself, when I would solace my self with a fool, I reflect upon my self, and there I have him.	Jacobus Micyllus, Gilbertus Cognatus, Erasmus, and almost all later generations admire Lucian's exuberant wit. Yet Scaliger rejects him in his critical judgement and calls him the Cerberus of the Muses. Socrates, whom the whole world praised so highly, is condemned as a fool by Lactantius and Theodoret. Plutarch praises Seneca's genius above that of all the Greeks, "second to none"; yet Seneca says of himself, "When I want to amuse myself with a fool, I turn to myself, and there I have him."[786]

[782] Burton. [p. 45, a] Hypocrit. Editor: An abbreviated reference to the critical portion of Julius Caesar Scaliger's Poetics, the Hypocriticus. The precise passage has not been collated. Nutricem means "nurse" or "fosterer"; Burton's own English recasts it as a nursery.

[783] Burton. [p. 45, b] Ut mulier aulica nullius pudens. Editor: "Like a court woman ashamed of nothing." The comparison belongs to Burton's reported attack on Homer; it also carries a disparaging stereotype of women at court.

[784] Editor. Plutarch, Life of Alexander 26.1–2, relates the choice of Darius's coffer to hold the Iliad. Burton makes it the setting for a reversal: the author Alexander treasured is the author Scaliger attacks.

[785] Burton. [p. 45, c] Epist. 33. Quando fatuo delectari volo, non est longe quærendus, me video. Editor: "Letter 33. When I wish to amuse myself with a fool, I need not look far: I see myself." The passage is Seneca, Letter 50.2, which ends me rideo ("I laugh at myself"), not me video. Burton's wording and reference are retained.

[786] Editor. Cerberus is the monstrous guardian of the underworld: the title is an insult to Lucian. The claimed praise of Seneca by Plutarch is unlocated. Lactantius's criticism of Socrates can be compared with Divine Institutes 3.20; the other judgements in this catalogue require further collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cardan in his 16 book of Subtilties, reckons up twelve supereminent, acute Philosophers, for worth, subtletie, & wisdom: Archimedes, Galen, Vitruvius, Architas Tarentinus, Euclide, Geber, that first inventer of Algebra, Alkindus the Mathematician, both Arabians, with others. But his triumviri terrarum far beyond the rest, are Ptolomæus, Plotinus, Hyppocrates.	In the sixteenth book of On Subtlety, Cardan lists twelve outstanding and penetrating philosophers for their merit, subtlety, and wisdom: Archimedes, Galen, Vitruvius, Archytas of Tarentum, Euclid, Geber, the first inventor of algebra, and al-Kindi the mathematician—the last two both Arabs—among others. But his "three rulers of the world," far above the rest, are Ptolemy, Plotinus, and Hippocrates.[787]
Scaliger exercitat. 224. scoffs at this censure of his, cals some of them carpenters, and mechanitians, he makes Galen fimbriam Hyppocratis, a skirt of Hyppocrates: and the said [788]Cardan himself elsewhere condemns both Galen and Hyppocrates for tediousnesse, obscurity, confusion. Paracelsus will have them both meer idiots, infants in physick and philosophie.	In Exercise 224, Scaliger mocks this judgement of Cardan's, calls some of these men carpenters and artisans, and makes Galen "the fringe of Hippocrates," a mere hem of Hippocrates's garment. Elsewhere Cardan himself condemns both Galen and Hippocrates for tediousness, obscurity, and confusion. Paracelsus considers them both utter ignoramuses, infants in medicine and philosophy.

[787] Editor. This is Burton's report of Cardan's ranking. The claim that Geber first invented algebra is retained as part of that report, not adopted as an editorial conclusion. The exact wording and identity intended under Geber need further verification.

[788] Burton. [p. 45, first d] Primo contradicentium. Editor: "In the first [book] of Contradictions": Cardan's work on medical contradictions. The particular passage behind Burton's summary has not been verified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Scaliger and Cardan admire Suisset the Calculator, qui pene modum excessit humani ingenii, and yet [789]Lod. Vives cals them nugas Suisseticas: and Cardan opposite to himself in another place, contemns those ancients in respect of times present, [790]Majoresque nostros ad præsentes collatos, juste pueros appellari.	Scaliger and Cardan admire Suisset the Calculator, "who almost exceeded the limits of human intelligence," yet Luis Vives calls his work "Suisset's trifles." And Cardan contradicts himself elsewhere, disparaging the ancients in comparison with the present age: "Our predecessors, compared with people today, may justly be called children."[791]
In conclusion the said [792]Cardan, and Saint Bernard will admit none into this Catalogue of wise men, [793]but only Prophets and Apostles; how they esteem themselves, you have heard before. We are worldly-wise, admire our selves, and seek for applause: but hear Saint [794]Bernard, quanto magis foras es sapiens, tanto magis intus stultus efficeris, &c. in omnibus es prudens, circa teipsum insipiens: the more wise thou art to others, the more fool to thy self.	In the end, Cardan and Saint Bernard will admit no one to this catalogue of wise men except prophets and apostles. You have already heard what they think of themselves. We are wise in worldly matters, admire ourselves, and seek applause. But listen to Saint Bernard: "The wiser you are outwardly, the more foolish you become inwardly," and so on; "you are prudent in everything, but foolish about yourself." The wiser you are for others, the greater fool you are for yourself.

[789] Burton. [p. 45, second d; body e] Lib. de causis corrupt. artium. Editor: "Book on the causes of the corruption of the arts": Vives's De causis corruptarum artium. The margin repeats the letter d, although the body uses e. The exact passage remains unlocated.

[790] Burton. [p. 45, f] Actione ad subtil. in Scal. fol. 1226. Editor: An abbreviated reference to Cardan's response to Scaliger concerning De subtilitate. The printed locator 1226 is retained; its edition and pagination remain unresolved.

[791] Editor. Suisset is a form of the name Richard Swineshead, the medieval scholar known as the Calculator. His calculations entered debates about natural philosophy. Burton contrasts celebrated ingenuity with Vives's dismissal of scholastic subtleties.

[792] Burton. [p. 45, g] Lib. 1. de sap. Editor: "Book 1, On Wisdom": Cardan's De sapientia. The precise passage has not been collated.

[793] Burton. [p. 45, h] Vide miser homo, quia totum est vanitas, totum stultitia, totum dementia, quicquid facis in hoc mundo, præter hoc solum quod propter Deum facis. Ser. de miser. hom. Editor: "See, wretched man, that everything you do in this world is vanity, folly, and madness, except only what you do for God." A sermon On Human Misery, ascribed here to Bernard; the exact source and authorship remain unverified.

[794] Burton. [p. 45, i] In 2 Platonis dial. 1. de justo. Editor: "On Plato's second dialogue, first [book?], on justice." This does not readily match the body's attribution to Bernard. It may belong with the neighbouring material on Ficino, but that reassignment has not been established. The printed attachment to Bernard is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I may not deny but that there is some folly approved, a divine furie, a holy madnesse, even a spiritual drunkennesse in the Saints of God themselves; Sanctam insaniam Bernard cals it (though not as blaspheming [795]Vorstius, would infer it as a passion incident to God himself, but) familiar to good men, as that of Paul, 2 Cor. he was a fool, &c. and Rom. 9. he wisheth himself to be anathematized for them.	I cannot deny that some folly is approved: a divine frenzy, a holy madness, even a spiritual drunkenness in God's saints themselves. Bernard calls it "holy madness"—not a passion affecting God himself, as the blasphemous Vorstius would infer, but a familiar experience of good people. So Paul, in 2 Corinthians, says that he was a fool, and so on; and in Romans 9 he wishes himself accursed for their sake.[796]
Such is that drunkennesse which Ficinus speaks of, when the soul is elevated and ravished with a divine tast of that heavenly Nectar, which poets deciphered by the sacrifice of Dionysius, and in this sense with the Poet [797]insanire lubet, as Austin exhorts us, ad ebrietatem se quisque paret, let's all be mad and [798]drunk. But we commonly mistake, and go beyond our commission, we reel to the opposite part, [799]we are not capable of it,	Such is the drunkenness Ficino speaks of, when the soul is lifted up and transported by a divine taste of that heavenly nectar, which poets represented through the rites of Dionysus. In this sense, with the poet, "I long to run mad"; as Augustine exhorts us, "Let everyone prepare himself for drunkenness." Let us all be mad and drunk. But we commonly misunderstand and overstep our commission; we reel towards the opposite extreme and cannot receive this spiritual intoxication.

[795] Burton. [p. 45, k] Dum iram & odium in Deo revera ponit. Editor: "Since he actually attributes anger and hatred to God." Burton's charge against Conrad Vorstius concerns whether passions can be attributed to God. "Blaspheming" is Burton's polemical judgement; Vorstius's precise position has not been independently established here.

[796] Editor. Compare 2 Corinthians 12:11 ("I am become a fool") and Romans 9:3, where Paul wishes himself accursed for his fellow Israelites. "Anathematized" means placed under a curse or excluded. Burton distinguishes approved spiritual transport from the folly he condemns, while maintaining his objection to attributing passions to God.

[797] Burton. [p. 45, l] Virg. 1. Eccl. 3. Editor: Virgil, Eclogue 3.36: insanire libet quoniam tibi ("since you feel like behaving madly"). Burton takes the phrase out of a quarrel over a singing contest and applies it to spiritual enthusiasm.

[798] Burton. [p. 45, m] Ps. inebriabuntur ab ubertate domus. Editor: "Psalm: they will be intoxicated by the abundance of [your] house." Psalm 35:9 in the Vulgate numbering, 36:8 in most English Bibles. The Latin language of intoxication supports the spiritual metaphor.

[799] Burton. [p. 45, n] In Psal. 104. Austin. Editor: Augustine, on Psalm 104. This marginal entry sits beside "we are not capable of it"; by subject it also relates to the preceding exhortation attributed to Augustine. The precise passage and numbering remain to be verified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[800]and as he said of the Greeks, Vos Græci semper pueri, vos Britanni, Galli, Germani, Itali, &c. you are a company of fools.	And, as he said of the Greeks, "You Greeks are always children"—you Britons, French, Germans, Italians, and the rest: you are a company of fools.
Source page 45–46 Proceed now à partibus ad totum, or from the whole to parts, and you shall finde no other issue, the parts shall be sufficiently dilated in this following Preface. The whole must needs follow by a Sorites or induction. Every multitude is mad, [801]bellua multorum capitum, precipitate and rash without judgement, stultum animal, a roaring rout. [802]Roger Bacon proves it out of Aristotle, Vulgus dividi in oppositum contra sapientes, quod vulgo videtur verum, falsum est; that which the commonalty accounts true, is most part false, they are still opposite to wise men,	Proceed now from the parts to the whole—or from the whole to the parts—and you will find no different result. The parts will be discussed sufficiently in the remainder of this preface. The conclusion about the whole must follow through a chain of reasoning or induction.[803] Every crowd is mad: a many-headed beast, hasty and rash, without judgement, a stupid animal, a roaring mob. Roger Bacon proves it from Aristotle: "The common people are set in opposition to the wise; what seems true to the common people is false." What the common people consider true is mostly false; they are always opposed to the wise.

[800] Burton. [p. 45, o] In Platonis Tim. sacerdos Ægyptius. Editor: "An Egyptian priest, in Plato's Timaeus." At Timaeus 22b, the priest tells Solon that Greeks remain children because they lack Egypt's ancient historical memory. Burton extends the rebuke to other nations.

[801] Burton. [p. 45, p] Hor. vulgus insanum. Editor: "Horace: the mad crowd." The image of the many-headed beast is in Horace, Epistles 1.1.76. The exact source intended for vulgus insanum remains uncertain.

[802] Burton. [pp. 45–46, q] Patet ea diviso probabilis, &c. ex Arist. Top. lib. 1. c. 8. Rog. Bac. Epist. de secret. art. & nat. c. 8. non est judicium in vulgo. Editor: The opening is a compressed reference to a division of probable or accepted opinion; diviso is the apparent printed reading. Burton cites Aristotle's Topics and Roger Bacon's Letter on the Secrets of Art and Nature, chapter 8. Non est judicium in vulgo means "There is no judgement in the crowd." Compare Topics 1.11, which describes disagreement between popular and wise opinion without declaring popular opinion invariably false. Bacon's exact passage remains unverified.

[803] Editor. The Latin à partibus ad totum means "from the parts to the whole"; the printed English immediately reverses it. The modernization retains both directions and marks the transition explicitly. A sorites is a chain of linked propositions; induction moves from particular instances to a general conclusion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 46 but all the world is of this humor (vulgus) and thou thy self art de vulgo, one of the Commonalty; and he, and he, and so are all the rest; and therefore, as Phocion concludes, to be approved in nought you say or do, meer idiots and asses. Begin then where you will, go backward or forward, choose out of the whole pack, wink and choose, you shall finde them all alike, never a barrell better herring.	But the whole world has this disposition—the crowd—and you yourself belong to it, one of the common people. So does he, and he, and everyone else. Therefore, as Phocion concludes, you deserve approval in nothing you say or do: mere idiots and asses.[804] Begin wherever you please, go backwards or forwards, choose from the whole pack, shut your eyes and choose: you will find them all alike, no barrel with better herrings than another.
Copernicus, Atlas his successor, is of opinion, the earth is a planet, moves and shines to others, as the Moon doth to us. Digges, Gilbert, Keplerus, Origanus, and others, defend this hypothesis of his in sober sadnesse, and that the Moon is inhabited: if it be so that the Earth is a Moon, then are we also giddy, vertigenous and lunatick within this sublunary Maze.	Copernicus, the successor of Atlas, holds that the earth is a planet, moving and shining for others as the moon does for us. Digges, Gilbert, Kepler, Origanus, and others defend his hypothesis in all seriousness, and maintain that the moon is inhabited. If the earth is a moon, then we too are dizzy, spinning, and moonstruck within this maze beneath the moon.[805]
I could produce such arguments till dark night: If you should hear the rest, Ante diem clauso componet vesper Olympo: but according to my promise, I will descend to particulars.	I could produce arguments like these until nightfall. If you heard the rest, Evening would close heaven's gates and lay the day to rest first.[806] But, as I promised, I will come down to particulars.

[804] Editor. Compare Plutarch, Life of Phocion 8.3, on Phocion's distrust of popular approval. Burton turns this attitude into a general condemnation of the crowd. "Wink" means shut the eyes; the herring proverb says that none of the available choices is better.

[805] Editor. Atlas is the mythical bearer of the heavens; Copernicus is called his successor as a describer of the universe. Burton groups Thomas Digges, William Gilbert, Johannes Kepler, and David Origanus under a broad account of new cosmology; their separate commitments are not established by this sentence. "Lunatick" supplies the pun on the moon, while "sublunary" means beneath it.

[806] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 1.374: Aeneas says that evening would arrive before he could finish recounting his troubles. Burton prints componet ("will lay to rest") where the consulted text has componat ("would lay to rest"). The modern rendering follows the conditional sense of the surrounding sentence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'This melancholy extends it self not to men only, but even to vegetals and sensibles. I speak not of those creatures which are Saturnine, melancholy by nature, as Lead, and such like Minerals, or those Plants, Rue, Cypresse, &c. and Hellebor it self, of which [807]Agrippa treats, Fishes, Birds, and Beasts, Hares, Conies, Dormice, &c. Owls, Bats, Nightbirds, but that artificial, which is perceived in them all. Remove a plant, it will pine away, which is especially perceived in Date trees, as you may reade at large in Constantines husbandry, that antipathy betwixt the Vine and the Cabbage, Vine and Oyl.	'This melancholy extends beyond human beings to plants and creatures with senses. I do not mean those things that belong to Saturn and are melancholy by nature—lead and similar minerals; plants such as rue, cypress, and hellebore itself, of which Agrippa writes; fishes, birds, and beasts, hares, rabbits, dormice, owls, bats, and night birds. I mean the melancholy brought about by circumstances, which is observable in them all.[808] Move a plant and it will waste away. This is particularly noticeable in date palms, as you can read at length in Constantine's book on husbandry; so too is the antagonism between vine and cabbage, or vine and oil.
'Put a bird in a cage, he wil dye for sullennesse, or a beast in a pen, or take his yong ones or companions from him, and see what effect it wil cause. But who perceivs not these common passions of sensible creatures, fear, sorrow, &c. Of all other, dogs are most subject to this maladie, in so much some hold they dream as men do, and through violence of melancholy, run mad; I could relate many stories of dogs, that have dyed for grief, and pined away for loss of their Masters, but they are common in every [809]Author.	'Put a bird in a cage and it will die of despondency; put a beast in a pen, or take away its young or companions, and see what effect this has. Who does not observe these common passions in creatures with senses: fear, sorrow, and so forth? Dogs are more subject to this malady than any others, so much so that some maintain they dream as people do and go mad through the violence of melancholy. I could tell many stories of dogs that have died of grief or wasted away after losing their masters, but such stories are common in every author.

[807] Burton. [p. 46, a] De occult. Philosop. l. 1. c. 25 & 19. ejusd. l. Lib 10. cap. 4. Editor: Agrippa, Occult Philosophy 1.25 lists things associated with Saturn; 1.19 discusses properties belonging to species or individuals. The final abbreviated locator "Book 10, chapter 4" cannot refer to this three-book work and may concern the following agricultural reference. Its attachment remains unresolved.

[808] Editor. "Vegetals" are plants; "sensibles" are beings capable of sensation. "Saturnine" refers to astrological correspondences, including Saturn's association with melancholy. "Artificial" here contrasts with innate qualities and is rendered as brought about by circumstances. "Constantine's husbandry" denotes the agricultural compilation associated with Constantine VII; its detailed passages remain to be checked.

[809] Burton. [p. 46, b] See Lipsius epist. Editor: An unspecified letter of Justus Lipsius; its exact location has not been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Kingdoms, Provinces, and politick bodies are likewise sensible and subject to this disease, as [810]Boterus in his politicks hath proved at large. As in humane bodies (saith he) there be divers alterations proceeding from humors, so there be many diseases in a common-wealth, which do as diversly happen from several distempers, as you may easily perceive by their particular symptomes.	Kingdoms, provinces, and political bodies likewise have feeling and are subject to this disease, as Botero has argued at length in his political writings. “Just as various changes arise from humours in human bodies,” he says, “so a commonwealth has many diseases, arising in different ways from various disorders.” You can readily recognise them by their particular symptoms.[811]
For where you shall see the people civil, obedient to God and Princes, judicious, peaceable and quiet, rich, fortunate, [812]and flourish, to live in peace, in unity and concord, a Country well tilled, many fair built and populous Cities, ubi incolæ nitent, as old [813]Cato said, the people are neat, polite and terse, ubi bene, beateque vivunt, which our Politicians make the chief end of a Common-wealth;	For wherever you see people civil, obedient to God and their rulers, sensible, peaceable and quiet, rich, fortunate, and flourishing; living in peace, unity, and harmony; a country well cultivated, with many handsomely built and populous cities, “where the inhabitants thrive,” as old Cato said—the people neat, polished, and well kept—“where they live well and happily,” which our political writers make the chief end of a commonwealth;

[810] Burton. [p. 46, c] De politia illustrium lib. 1. cap. 4. ut in humanis corporibus variæ accidunt mutationes corporis, animique, sic in republica, &c. Editor: Book 1, chapter 4: “As various changes of body and mind occur in human beings, so also in a commonwealth,” etc. Burton attributes this comparison to Botero; the precise work and edition behind his abbreviated title remain uncollated.

[811] Editor. A body politick is a community understood as a single organised body. Common-wealth here means a political community, including a monarchy. “Sensible” means capable of feeling: Burton carries the preceding discussion of melancholy in living creatures into political life.

[812] Burton. [p. 46, d] Ubi reges philosophantur, Plato. Editor: “Where kings philosophise.” Compare Plato, Republic 5, 473c–e, on the union of political power and philosophy.

[813] Burton. [p. 46, e] Lib de re rust. Editor: Cato, On Agriculture 1.2, advises a prospective purchaser to observe how the neighbours thrive. Burton transfers this test of a farm’s surroundings to the health of a country.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 46–47 and which [814]Aristotle Polit. lib. 3. cap. 4. calls Commune bonum, Polybius lib. 6. optabilem & selectum statum, That countrey is free from melancholy. As it was in Italy in the time of Augustus, now in China, now in many other flourishing kingdoms of Europe.	and which Aristotle, in his Politics, book 3, chapter 4, calls “the common good,” and Polybius, book 6, “a desirable and choice condition”: that country is free from melancholy. So it was in Italy under Augustus; so it is now in China and in many other flourishing kingdoms of Europe.[815]
Source page 47 But whereas you shall see many discontents, common grievances, complaints, poverty, barbarism, beggery, plagues, wars, rebellions, seditions, mutinies, contentions, idlenesse, riot, epicurism, the land ly untilled, waste, full of bogs, fens, desarts, &c. cities decayed, base and poor towns, villages depopulated, the people squalid, ougly, uncivil; that kingdom, that country, must needs be discontent, melancholy, hath a sick body, and had need to be reformed.	But wherever you see widespread discontent, public grievances, complaints, poverty, barbarism, begging, plagues, wars, rebellions, sedition, mutinies, disputes, idleness, excess, and self-indulgence; land lying untilled and waste, full of bogs, fens, deserts, and so on; decaying cities, mean and impoverished towns, depopulated villages, and people dirty, ugly, and uncivilised: that kingdom, that country, must be discontented and melancholy. Its body is sick and needs reform.[816]

[814] Burton. [p. 46, f] Vel publicam utilitatem: salus publica suprema lex esto. Beata civitas non ubi pauci beati, sed tota civitas beata. Plato quarto de republica. Editor: “Or public advantage: let the public welfare be the supreme law. A happy city is not one where a few are happy, but where the whole city is happy. Plato, Republic, book 4.” Compare Cicero, On the Laws 3.8, and Plato, Republic 4, 420b–c. The exact Aristotle and Polybius passages cited in the body remain to be collated.

[815] Editor. “Now” belongs to Burton’s historical present and to the reports he uses, not to the reader’s own time. The ideal of a healthy state brings material prosperity, cultivated land, civic order, and religious obedience together.

[816] Editor. Epicurism and Epicure are Burton’s usual hostile terms for a life devoted to pleasure. They do not offer a careful account of Epicurus’ philosophy. The judgements “barbarous” and “uncivil” likewise express the standards of Burton and his cited authorities.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now that cannot well be effected, till the causes of these maladies be first removed, which commonly proceed from their own default, or some accidental inconvenience: as to be site in a bad clime, too far North, steril, in a barren place, as the desart of Lybia, desarts of Arabia, places void of waters, as those of Lop and Belgian in Asia, or in a bad ayr, as at Alexandretta, Bantam, Pisa, Durazzo, S. Iohn de Vllua, &c.	This cannot properly be achieved until the causes of these maladies are removed. They commonly arise from the inhabitants' own failings or from some disadvantage of circumstance: being situated in an unfavourable climate, too far north, infertile, in a barren region such as the desert of Libya or the deserts of Arabia; in places without water, such as those of Lop and Belgian in Asia; or in unhealthy air, as at Alexandretta, Bantam, Pisa, Durazzo, San Juan de Ulúa, and elsewhere.[817]
or in danger of the seas continual inundations, as in many places of the Low-countries and elsewhere, or neer some bad neighbors, as Hungarians to Turks, Podolians to Tartars, or almost any bordering countries, they live in fear still, and by reason of hostile incursions are oftentimes left desolate.	Or they are in danger of repeated flooding by the sea, as in many parts of the Low Countries and elsewhere; or they lie near hostile neighbours, as the Hungarians do beside the Turks, or the Podolians beside the Tatars. Almost any countries sharing such borders live in constant fear and are often left desolate by hostile raids.
So are cities by reason [818]of wars, fires, plagues, inundations, [819]wilde beasts, decay of trades, barred havens, the seas violence, as Antwerp may witnes of late, Syracuse of old, Brundusium in Italy, Rhye and Dover with us, and many that at this day suspect the seas fury and rage, and labor against it as the Venetians to their inestimable charge.	Cities are likewise laid waste by wars, fires, plagues, floods, wild beasts, declining trade, blocked harbours, and the sea's violence. Antwerp can bear witness in recent times, Syracuse in ancient times, Brindisi in Italy, and Rye and Dover here at home; so can many cities that today fear the sea's fury and struggle against it, as the Venetians do, at immense expense.

[817] Editor. "Site" means situated; "bad ayr" means air believed unhealthy. The geographical list is retained as Burton gives it. In particular, "Belgian" is printed as an Asian place-name; its intended identification remains unresolved and it has not been silently replaced by Belgium.

[818] Burton. [p. 47, a] Mantua væ miseræ nimium vicina Cremonæ. Editor: "Mantua, alas, too close to unhappy Cremona!" Virgil, Eclogue 9.28. The poem connects neighbouring lands with dispossession; Burton applies its lament to cities ruined by war.

[819] Burton. [p. 47, b] Interdum à feris, ut olim Mauritania, &c. Editor: "Sometimes by wild beasts, as formerly Mauretania," etc. No authority is supplied for this particular example.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But the most frequent maladies are such as proceed from themselves, as first when religion and Gods service is neglected, innovated or altered, where they do not fear God, obey their prince, where Atheism, Epicurism, Sacriledg, Simony, &c. And all such impieties are freely committed, that countrey cannot prosper. When Abraham came to Gerar, and saw a bad land, he said, sure the fear of God was not in that place.	But the commonest maladies arise from the people themselves: first, when religion and the worship of God are neglected, changed by innovations, or altered; where people neither fear God nor obey their ruler; where atheism, self-indulgence, sacrilege, simony, and all such impieties are freely practised, that country cannot prosper. When Abraham came to Gerar and saw a wicked land, he said that surely there was no fear of God in that place.[820]
[821]Cyprian Echovius a Spanish Chorographer, above all other Cities of Spain, commends Borcino, in which there was no begger, no man poor, &c. but all rich & in good estate, and he gives the reason, because they were more religious then their neighbors: why was Israel so often spoiled by their enemies, led into captivity, &c. but for their idolatry, neglect of Gods word, for sacriledge, even for one Achans fault? And what shall we expect that have such multitudes of Achans, church robbers, simoniacal Patrons, how can they hope to flourish, that neglect divine duties, that live most part like Epicures?	Cyprian Echovius, a Spanish writer on places, praises Borcino above all other Spanish cities: "There was no beggar there, no poor person, and so on, but everyone was rich and prosperous." He gives the reason: "They were more religious than their neighbours." Why was Israel so often plundered by its enemies and carried into captivity, if not for idolatry, neglect of God's word, and sacrilege—even for the fault of a single Achan? What, then, should we expect, with our multitudes of Achans, church robbers, and patrons who sell church appointments? How can people hope to flourish when they neglect their religious duties and live, for the most part, in self-indulgence?[822]

[820] Editor. Genesis 20:11 gives Abraham's fear that the inhabitants will kill him for his wife. Burton turns this into a judgement on the land's religious condition. Simony is the buying or selling of spiritual offices or benefits; a patron's sale of a church appointment is the example that follows.

[821] Burton. [p. 47, c] Deliciis Hispaniæ Anno 1604. Nemo malus, nemo pauper, optimus quisque atque ditissimus. Pie, sancteque vivebant summaque cum veneratione, & timore divino cultui, sacrisque rebus incumbunt. Editor: "In the Delights of Spain, 1604. No one wicked, no one poor; everyone excellent and very rich. They lived piously and holily, and devote themselves with the greatest reverence and fear to divine worship and sacred matters." The change of tense is in the Latin. The exact Echovius passage remains uncollated.

[822] Editor. In Joshua 7, Achan secretly takes forbidden spoils, and Israel's defeat is attributed to the resulting collective guilt. Burton extends this model to those who take church property and profit from the right to nominate clergy. His conclusion about the religious cause of a country's prosperity is part of the argument being translated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Other common grievances are generally noxious to a body politick; alteration of laws and customs, breaking priviledges, generall oppressions, seditions, &c. observed by [823]Aristotle, Bodin, Boterus, Iunius, Arniscus, &c. I will only point at some of the chiefest. [824]Impotentia gubernandi, ataxia, confusion, ill government, which proceeds from unskilful, slothful, griping, covetous, unjust, rash, or tyrannizing magistrates, when they are fools, idiots, children, proud, wilful, partial, indiscreet, oppressors, giddy heads, tyrants, not able or unfit to mannage such offices:	Other public grievances harm the political body as a whole: changes in laws and customs, violations of privileges, widespread oppression, sedition, and so on, as Aristotle, Bodin, Botero, Junius, Arniscus, and others observe. I will only touch on the chief ones. “Inability to govern,” “disorder,” confusion, bad government: these arise from unskilled, idle, grasping, greedy, unjust, reckless, or tyrannical magistrates—from fools, ignoramuses, children, the proud, wilful, biased, and imprudent; oppressors, scatterbrains, and tyrants, unable or unfit to administer such offices.
Source page 47–48 [825]many noble cities and flourishing kingdoms by that means are desolate, the whole body grones under such heads, and all the members must needs be misaffected; as at this day those goodly provinces in Asia Minor, &c. grone under the burthen of a Turkish government; and those vast kingdoms of Muscovia, Russia, [826]under a tyrannizing Duke.	Many noble cities and flourishing kingdoms are laid waste in this way. The whole body groans beneath such heads, and all its members must suffer—as those fine provinces in Asia Minor and elsewhere groan today beneath the burden of Turkish government, and the vast kingdoms of Muscovy and Russia beneath a tyrannical duke.[827]

[823] Burton. [p. 47, d] Polit. l. 5 c. 3. Editor: Aristotle, Politics 5.3, as numbered in Burton’s reference. The precise edition and passage have not been established.

[824] Burton. [p. 47, e] Boterus polit. lib. 1. c. 1. Cum nempe princeps rerum gerendarum imperitus, segnis, oscitans, suique muneris immemor, aut fatuus est. Editor: “Botero, political writings, book 1, chapter 1. When, namely, the ruler is unskilled in conducting affairs, idle, inattentive, forgetful of his duty, or foolish.” Exact edition uncollated.

[825] Burton. [p. 47, f] Non viget respublica cujus caput infirmatur. Salisburiensis c. 22. Editor: “A commonwealth cannot flourish when its head is ailing. John of Salisbury, chapter 22.” The work and book needed to locate this chapter are not specified here.

[826] Burton. [p. 48, g] See D. Fletchers relation, and Alexander Gagninus historie. Editor: Burton refers to accounts associated with Fletcher and Alessandro Guagnini; neither exact passage has yet been collated.

[827] Editor. Muscovy and Russia are overlapping geographical and political names in this passage. Burton’s account of Turkish rule is an accusation within his argument against tyranny; this edition preserves the accusation without treating the sweeping account of regional decline as independently established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 48 Who ever heard of more civil and rich populous countreys then those of Greece, Asia Minor, [828]abounding with all wealth, multitude of inhabitants, force, power, splendor and magnificence? and that miracle of countrys, [829]the Holy land, that in so small a compass of ground could maintain so many Towns, Cities, produce so many fighting men? Egypt another Paradise, now barbarous and desart, and almost waste, by the despotical government of an imperious Turk, intolerabili servitutis jugo premitur ([830]one saith)	Who ever heard of more civilised, wealthy, and populous countries than Greece and Asia Minor, "abounding in every kind of wealth, in inhabitants, strength, power, splendour, and magnificence"? Or that marvel among countries, the Holy Land, which in so small an area could sustain so many towns and cities and supply so many fighting men? Egypt, another paradise, is now barbarous, deserted, and almost waste under the despotic government of an imperious Turk: "It is crushed beneath an intolerable yoke of slavery," as one writer says.
not only fire and water, goods or lands, sed ipse spiritus ab insolentissimi victoris pendet nutu, such is their slavery, their lives and souls depend upon his insolent will and command. A tyrant that spoyls all wheresoever he comes, insomuch that an [831]Historian complains, if an old inhabitant should now see them, he would not know them, if a traveller, or stranger, it would grieve his heart to behold them.	Not only fire and water, goods and lands, "but life itself depends on the nod of a most insolent conqueror." Such is their slavery: their lives and souls depend on his arrogant will and command. He is a tyrant who ruins everything wherever he goes, so that a historian complains: "If a former inhabitant saw these places now, he would not recognise them; if a traveller or stranger saw them, his heart would grieve at the sight."

[828] Burton. [p. 48, h] Abundans omni divitiarum affluentia, incolarum multitudine splendore ac potentia. Editor: "Abounding in every abundance of riches, in numbers of inhabitants, splendour, and power." No author is named in this entry.

[829] Burton. [p. 48, a] Not above 200. miles in length, 60 in breadth, according to Adricomius. Editor: A measurement attributed to Adrichomius, retained as part of Burton's report; its geographical boundaries and underlying passage have not been verified.

[830] Burton. [p. 48, b] Romulus Amasæus. Editor: Romolo Amaseo is the authority named for the preceding Latin description. Burton supplies no title or precise location.

[831] Burton. [p. 48, e; body anchor c] Sabellicus. Si quis incola vetus, non agnosceret, si quis peregrinus ingemisceret. Editor: "Sabellicus. If a former inhabitant saw it, he would not recognise it; if a traveller did, he would groan." The marginal letter appears as e although its body anchor is c; a further e occurs below. Exact passage unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whereas [832]Aristotle notes, Novæ exactiones, nova onera imposita, new burdens and exactions daily come upon them, like those of which Zosimus lib. 2. so grievous, ut viri uxores, patres filios prostituerent ut exactoribus è quæstu, &c. they must needs be discontent, hinc civitatum gemitus & ploratus, as [833]Tully holds, hence come those complaints and tears of Cities, poor, miserable, rebellious, and desperate subjects, as [834]Hippolitus adds:	Where, as Aristotle observes, "new exactions, new burdens are imposed," new demands and burdens fall on people every day—like those described by Zosimus in book 2, so grievous "that husbands prostituted their wives and fathers their children to pay the collectors from the earnings," and so on—they must be discontented. "Hence the groans and weeping of cities," as Cicero says: hence those complaints and tears of cities, and "poor, miserable, rebellious, and desperate subjects," as Hippolytus adds.[835]
& as [836]a judicious countrey-man of ours observed not long since in a survay of that great Dutchy of Tuscany, the people lived much grieved and discontent, as appeared by their manifold and manifest complainings in that kinde. That the State was like a sick body which had lately taken physick, whose humors are not yet well setled, and weakened so much by purging, that nothing was left but melancholy.	And as a discerning countryman of ours observed not long ago in his survey of the great Duchy of Tuscany, the people lived in deep grievance and discontent, as their many open complaints made clear. "The state was like a sick body that had recently taken medicine, whose humours had not yet settled properly, and which had been so weakened by purging that nothing was left but melancholy."

[832] Burton. [p. 48, d] Polit. l. 5. c. 6. Crudelitas principum, impunitas scelerum, violatio legum peculatus pecuniæ publicæ, &c. Editor: "Politics 5.6. The cruelty of rulers, impunity for crimes, violation of laws, embezzlement of public money," etc. Exact correspondence with Aristotle's text remains uncollated.

[833] Burton. [p. 48, e] Epist. Editor: "Letters." Burton's reference to Cicero is too abbreviated to locate this quotation securely.

[834] Burton. [p. 48, f] De increm. urb. cap. 20. subditi miseri, rebelles, desperati, &c. Editor: "On the growth of cities, chapter 20: subjects poor, rebellious, desperate," etc. The precise work and identity intended by the body's "Hippolitus" remain unresolved.

[835] Editor. Compare Zosimus, New History, book 2, in the account of Constantine's taxation: mothers part with their children and fathers prostitute their daughters to meet the collectors' demands. Burton's Latin instead speaks of husbands and wives, fathers and children; that wording is translated here without replacing it from Zosimus.

[836] Burton. [p. 48, g] R. Dallington, 1596. conclusio libri. Editor: "Robert Dallington, 1596, the conclusion of the book." His Survey of the Great Dukes State of Tuscany was published in 1605 and describes the state in 1596. The date here is therefore not its publication date. The precise wording of Burton's quotation remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whereas the Princes and Potentates are immoderate in lust, Hypocrites, Epicures, of no religion, but in shew: Quid hypocrisi fragilius? what so brittle and unsure? what sooner subverts their estates then wandring & raging lusts, on their subjects wives, daughters? to say no worse. They that should facem præferre, lead the way to all vertuous actions, are the ringleaders oftentimes of all mischief and dissolute courses, and by that means their countries are plagued,	Where rulers and potentates are unrestrained in lust, hypocrites, pleasure-seekers, religious only in appearance—"What is more fragile than hypocrisy?" What is so brittle and insecure? What more quickly overthrows their power than their roaming, raging desires for their subjects' wives and daughters, to say nothing worse? Those who should "carry the torch before others," leading the way in every virtuous action, often lead them instead into every kind of wrongdoing and debauchery, bringing calamity upon their countries.
[837]and they themselves often ruined, banished or murdered by conspiracy of their subjects, as Sardanapalus was, Dionysius Junior, Heliogabalus, Periander, Pisistratus, Tarquinius, Timocrates, Childericus, Appius Claudius, Andronicus, Galeacius Sforsia, Alexander Medices, &c.	"And they themselves are often ruined, banished, or murdered through a conspiracy of their subjects," as were Sardanapalus, Dionysius the Younger, Elagabalus, Periander, Peisistratus, Tarquin, Timocrates, Childeric, Appius Claudius, Andronicus, Galeazzo Sforza, Alessandro de' Medici, and others.[838]
Whereas the Princes or great men are malicious, envious, factious, ambitious, emulators, they tear a Common-wealth asunder, as so many Guelfes and Gebellines disturb the quietnesse of it, [839]and with mutuall murders let it bleed to death; our histories are too full of such barbarous inhumanities, and the miseries that arise from them.	Where rulers or great men are malicious, envious, factional, ambitious rivals, they tear a commonwealth apart. Like so many Guelphs and Ghibellines, they disturb its peace and, by killing one another, let it bleed to death. Our histories are all too full of such barbarous cruelties and the miseries that follow them.[840]

[837] Burton. [p. 48, h] Boterus l. 9. c. 4. Polit. Quo fit ut aut rebus desperatis exulent, aut conjuratione subditorum crudelissime tandem trucidentur. Editor: "Botero, political writings 9.4. Hence, when affairs are desperate, they either go into exile or are at last most cruelly slaughtered through a conspiracy of their subjects." Exact edition uncollated.

[838] Editor. The catalogue groups legendary and historical rulers under the broad warning that vice ruins those in power. It should not be read as establishing that every named person met the same fate. Burton's individual identifications and examples remain to be checked in the fuller historical annotation.

[839] Burton. [p. 48, i] Mutuis odiis & cædibus exhausti, &c. Editor: "Exhausted by mutual hatreds and slaughter," etc. No author is named.

[840] Editor. The Guelphs and Ghibellines supply Burton with names for warring factions. He sustains the bodily metaphor: political rivals tear the community apart and let it bleed to death.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whereas they be like so many horse-leeches, hungry, griping, corrupt, [841]covetous, avaritiæ mancipia, ravenous as wolves, for as Tully writes; qui præest prodest, & qui pecudibus præest, debet eorum utilitati inservire: or such as prefer their private before the publick good. For as [842]he said long since, res privatæ publicis semper officere.	Where they are like so many horse-leeches, hungry, grasping, corrupt, greedy, "slaves to avarice," ravenous as wolves—for, as Cicero writes, "Whoever governs benefits others, and whoever tends cattle should serve their welfare"—or where they put private advantage before the public good. For, as was said long ago, "Private interests always obstruct public ones."[843]
Source page 48–49 Or whereas they be illiterate, ignorant, Empericks in policie, ubi deest facultas, [844]virtus (Aristot. pol. 5. cap. 8.) & scientia, wise only by inheritance, and in authority by birth-right, favour, or for their wealth and titles; there must needs be a fault, [845]a great defect: because as an [846]old Philosopher affirms, such men are not alwayes fit. Of an infinite number, few alone are Senators, and of those few, fewer good, and of that small number of honest good and noble men, few that are learned, wise, discreet and sufficient, able to discharge such places, it must needs turn to the confusion of a State.	Or where they are uneducated, ignorant, untrained practitioners of politics, "where ability, virtue, and knowledge are lacking" (Aristotle, Politics 5.8), wise only by inheritance and holding authority through birthright, favour, wealth, or titles: there must be something wrong, a grave defect. For, as an ancient philosopher affirms, such men are not always qualified. "Out of countless people only a few are senators; of those few, fewer are good; and of that small number of honourable, good, and noble men, few are learned, wise, sensible, and competent to discharge such offices." The result must be the disorder of the state.

[841] Burton. [p. 48, k] Lucra ex malis, sceleratisque causis. Editor: "Profits from evil and criminal causes." No author is named.

[842] Burton. [p. 48, l] Salust: Editor: Sallust. The exact source of the maxim about private and public interests has not been securely located.

[843] Editor. Horse-leeches are an image of insatiable extraction. The scan reads "qui præest prodest," literally "whoever governs benefits [others]"; the modern text preserves that indicative wording. The maxim describes the ruler's proper purpose, in contrast with the greedy rulers under attack. Its exact Ciceronian source remains unlocated.

[844] Burton. [p. 48, m; continuing along the foot] For most part we mistake the name of Politicians, accounting such as reade Machiavel and Tacitus, great statesmen, that can dispute of political precepts, supplant and overthrow their adversaries, enrich themselves, get honours, dissemble; but what is this to the bene esse, or preservation of a Common-wealth? Editor: Bene esse means "well-being." Burton distinguishes the welfare of the community from the political skill of advancing oneself.

[845] Burton. [p. 49, n] Imperium suapte sponte corruit. Editor: "Political power collapses of its own accord." No author is named.

[846] Burton. [p. 49, o] Apul. Prim. Flor. Ex innumerabilibus, pauci Senatores genere nobiles, è consularibus pauci boni, è bonis adhuc pauci eruditi. Editor: "Apuleius, first book of the Florida. Out of countless people, few senators noble by birth; of men of consular rank, few good; of the good, still fewer learned." Compare Florida 8. Burton compresses and adapts its progression through increasingly select groups; his body text expands it again.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 49 For as the [847]Princes are, so are the people: Qualis Rex, talis grex: and which [848]Antigonus right well said of old, qui Macedoniæ regem erudit, omnes etiam subditos erudit, he that teacheth the King of Macedon, teacheth all his subjects, is a true saying still. For Princes are the glass, the school, the book, Where subjects eyes do learn, do reade, do look,	For as the rulers are, so are the people: "As the king, so the flock." What Antigonus rightly said long ago remains true: "Whoever educates the king of Macedon educates all his subjects too." He who teaches the king of Macedon teaches all his subjects. For rulers are the mirror, school, and book Where subjects' eyes learn, read, and look.[849]
[850]——Velocius & citius nos Corrumpunt vitiorum exemplа domestica, magnis Cum subeant animos authoribus—— their examples are soonest followed, vices entertained, if they be prophane, irreligious, lascivious, riotous, Epicures, factious, covetous, ambitious, illiterate, so will the commons most part be, idle, unthrifts, prone to lust, drunkards, and therefore poor and needy ([851]ἡ πενία στάσιν ἐμποιεῖ καὶ κακουργίαν, for poverty begets sedition and villany)	Examples of vice at home corrupt us More swiftly and quickly, entering our minds With powerful authorities behind them. Their examples are the first to be followed, their vices the first to be adopted. If rulers are profane, irreligious, lecherous, extravagant pleasure-seekers, factional, greedy, ambitious, and uneducated, most of the common people will be so too: idle, wasteful, lustful, drunken, and therefore poor and needy. ("Poverty produces civil strife and wrongdoing": for poverty breeds sedition and villainy.)

[847] Burton. [p. 49, a] Non solum vitia concipiunt ipsi principes, sed etiam infundunt in civitatem, plusque exemplo quam peccato nocent. Cic. 1. de legibus. Editor: "Rulers not only conceive vices themselves but pour them into the community, doing more harm by their example than by their sin." The passage is Cicero, On the Laws 3.32, rather than the printed book 1.

[848] Burton. [p. 49, b] Epist. ad Zen. Editor: "Letter to Zeno." Antigonus' invitation to the philosopher is preserved in Diogenes Laertius, Lives of Eminent Philosophers 7.7; educating a king also benefits those he rules.

[849] Editor. The couplet adapts Shakespeare's The Rape of Lucrece, lines 615–616. Lucrece appeals to Tarquin by arguing that people learn from their princes. "Glass" means a mirror. Burton supplies no Shakespeare attribution here.

[850] Burton. [p. 49, unlettered] Juven. Sat. 4. Editor: Juvenal's lines occur in Satire 14.31–33, not Satire 4. Their immediate subject is the corrupting example of parents; Burton applies the principle to rulers.

[851] Burton. [p. 49, unlettered] Paupertas seditionem gignit & maleficium, Arist. pol. 2. c. 7. Editor: "Poverty produces civil strife and wrongdoing. Aristotle, Politics 2.7." The parallel is at 1265b, in book 2, chapter 6 in many modern divisions. The Greek in the body and Burton's following English restatement both remain represented on the right.

Original text 1651	Modern English
upon all occasions ready to mutine and rebel, discontent still, complaining, murmuring, grudging, apt to all outrages, thefts, treasons, murders, innovations, in debt, shifters, cozeners, outlaws, Profligatæ famæ ac vitæ. It was an old [852]Politicians Aphorism, They that are poor and bad, envie rich, hate good men, abhor the present government, wish for a new, and would have all turned topsie turvie. When Cateline rebelled in Rome, he got a company of such deboshed rogues together, they were his familiars and coadjutors, and such have been your rebels most part in all ages, Jack Cade, Tom Straw, Kette, & his companions.	They are ready on any occasion to mutiny and rebel; always discontented, complaining, muttering, and resentful; prone to every outrage, theft, treason, murder, and upheaval; in debt, schemers, cheats, outlaws, "ruined in reputation and way of life." An ancient political writer had this maxim: "The poor and wicked envy the rich, hate good men, detest the present government, wish for another, and want everything turned upside down." When Catiline rebelled at Rome, he gathered such a company of debauched rogues: these were his intimates and accomplices. Such, for the most part, have been your rebels in every age—Jack Cade, Tom Straw, Kett and his companions.[853]
Where they be generally riotous and contentious, where there be many discords, many laws, many law-suits, many Lawyers, and many Physitians, it is a manifest sign of a distempered, melancholy state, as [854]Plato long since maintained: for where such kinde of men swarm, they will make more work for themselves, and that body politick diseased, which was otherwise sound.	Where people are generally disorderly and quarrelsome, where there are many disputes, many laws, many lawsuits, many lawyers, and many physicians, this clearly signals a disordered, melancholy state, as Plato maintained long ago. For where such men swarm, they will create more work for themselves and make a political body sick that would otherwise have been healthy.

[852] Burton. [p. 49, c] Salust. Semper in civitate quibus opes nullæ sunt bonis invident, vetera odere, nova exoptant, odio suarum rerum mutari omnia petunt. Editor: "Sallust. In a community those without resources always envy the prosperous, hate the old order, long for the new, and in hatred of their own circumstances seek to change everything." Adapted from The War with Catiline 37.3; Burton omits a clause and changes some wording.

[853] Editor. Burton moves from poverty to criminality and rebellion through Sallust's hostile portrait of Catiline's followers. The English names extend that judgement to domestic rebels. "Tom Straw" is the name printed here and is retained; its intended identification has not been silently corrected.

[854] Burton. [p. 49, d] De legibus. Profligatæ in repub. disciplinæ est indicium jurisperitorum numerus, & medicorum copia. Editor: "On the Laws. A sign of ruined discipline in a commonwealth is the number of legal experts and the abundance of physicians." The clear parallel is Plato, Republic 3, 405a–b: proliferating courts and medical practices indicate disorder. Burton adds the claim that practitioners themselves create more work and disease.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A generall mischief in these our times, an unsensible plague, and never so many of them: which are now multiplyed (saith Mat. Geraldus, [855]a Lawyer himself,) as so many Locusts, not the parents, but the plagues of the Country, and for the most part a supercilious, bad, covetous, litigious generation of men. [856]Crumenimulga natio, &c. A purse-milking nation, a clamorous company, gowned vultures, [857]qui ex injuria vivunt & sanguine civium, theeves and Seminaries of discord;	It is a general evil in our times, an unnoticed plague; never have there been so many of them. They "have now multiplied like locusts," says Mat. Geraldus, himself a lawyer: "They are not the fathers of their country but its plagues, and mostly an arrogant, wicked, greedy, quarrelsome breed." "A purse-milking nation," and so on: a nation that milks purses, a noisy company, vultures in gowns, "who live on injustice and the blood of citizens"; thieves and breeding grounds of discord.

[855] Burton. [p. 49, e] In præf. stud. juris. Multiplicantur nunc in terris ut locustæ non patriæ parentes, sed pestes, pessimi homines, majore ex parta superciliosi, contentiosi &c. licitum latrocinium exercent. Editor: "In the preface to the study of law. They now multiply on earth like locusts: not fathers of their country but its plagues, very wicked men, mostly arrogant and contentious," etc.; "they practise licensed robbery." The printed parta is understood as parte, "part." The work and the identification of "Mat. Geraldus" remain to be established.

[856] Burton. [p. 49, f] Dousa epid. loqueleia turba, vultures togati. Editor: "Dousa, epid.; a chattering crowd, vultures in gowns." The abbreviation and precise poem remain unresolved; the unusual printed form loqueleia is retained.

[857] Burton. [p. 49, g] Barc. Argen. Editor: Barclay, Argenis. The exact passage behind this reference has not yet been located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 49–50 worse then any polers by the high way side, auri accipitres, auri exterebronides, pecuniarum hamiolæ, quadruplatores, Curiæ harpagones, fori tintinabula, monstra hominum, mangones, &c. that take upon them to make peace, but are indeed the very disturbers of our Peace, a company of irreligious Harpies, scraping, griping catch-poles (I mean our common hungry Pettefoggers, rabulas forenses, love and honour in the mean time, all good laws, and worthy Lawyers, that are so many [858]Oracles[859] and Pilots of a well governed common-wealth.)	Worse than any roadside extortioners: hawks for gold, borers after gold, money-hooks, bounty-hunting informers, court-grabbers, courtroom bells, human monsters, fraudulent dealers, and so on. They profess to make peace but are the very disturbers of our peace: a company of irreligious Harpies, scraping, grasping bailiffs. I mean our ordinary hungry pettifoggers, "courtroom ranters"; meanwhile I love and honour all good laws and worthy lawyers, who are so many oracles and pilots of a well-governed commonwealth.[860]

[858] Burton. [p. 49, k] Lib. 3. Editor: "Book 3." The printed k stands before "Oracles," but this entry identifies neither an author nor a work. Its reference remains unresolved.

[859] Burton. [p. 49, i] Iuris consulti domus oraculum civitatis. Tully. Editor: "The jurist's house is the oracle of the community. Cicero." Compare On the Orator 1.200, where citizens seek a legal expert's authoritative advice. No body i is clearly visible; its attachment to "Oracles" is supplied from the wording of the note.

[860] Editor. Pettifoggers are lawyers who wrangle over technicalities or conduct petty, disreputable business. Harpies evoke rapacious mythological creatures. The Latin catalogue piles up images of extracting money; quadruplatores evokes informers seeking a share of penalties. Burton expressly exempts worthy lawyers from his attack.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 50 Without Art, without Judgement, that do more harm, as [861]Livy said, quam bella externa, fames, morbive, then sicknesse, wars, hunger, diseases; and cause a most incredible destruction of a Common-wealth, saith [862]Sesellius, a famous civilian sometimes in Paris. As Ivie doth by an Oke, imbrace it so long, untill it hath got the heart out of it, so do they by such places they inhabite; no counsel at all, no justice, no speech to be had, nisi eum præmulseris, he must be feed still, or else he is as mute as a fish, better open an Oyster without a knife.	Without skill or judgement, they do more harm, as Livy said, “than foreign wars, famine, or disease”—than sickness, wars, hunger, diseases—and “bring almost unbelievable destruction upon a commonwealth,” says Seyssel, a celebrated civil lawyer formerly in Paris. Just as ivy embraces an oak until it has eaten out its heart, so they treat the places where they live. No advice, no justice, no speech is to be had “unless you have first soothed him”: he must constantly be paid, or he is as mute as a fish. You would do better opening an oyster without a knife.
Experto crede (saith [863]Salisburiensis) in manus eorum millies incidi, & Charon immitis qui nulli pepercit unquam, his longè clementior est; I speak out of experience, I have been a thousand times amongst them, and Charon himself is more gentle then they: [864]he is contented with his single pay, but they multiply still, they are never satisfied:	“Believe one who knows,” says John of Salisbury. “I have fallen into their hands a thousand times, and harsh Charon, who never spared anyone, is far more merciful than they.” I speak from experience: I have been among them a thousand times, and Charon himself is gentler than they are. He is content with his single payment, but they keep multiplying theirs; they are never satisfied.

[861] Burton. [p. 50, a] Lib. 3. Editor: “Book 3.” The quoted comparison occurs in Livy, History of Rome 4.9, where factional struggles destroy more peoples than foreign wars, famine, or disease. Burton redirects it against bad lawyers; the printed book number is retained.

[862] Burton. [p. 50, b] Lib. 1. de rep. Gallorum, incredibilem reipub. perniciem afferunt. Editor: “Book 1 on the commonwealth of the French: they bring unbelievable destruction upon the commonwealth.” Burton names Seyssel in the body; the exact edition and passage remain uncollated. Civilian here means a scholar or practitioner of civil law.

[863] Burton. [p. 50, c] Polycrat. lib. Editor: John of Salisbury, Policraticus 5.10. Charon is the mythological ferryman who carries the dead across to the underworld; the comparison makes the lawyers’ charges more pitiless than his.

[864] Burton. [p. 50, d] Is stipe contentus, & hi asses integros sibi multiplicari jubent. Editor: “He is content with a small fee, while they order whole coins to be multiplied for themselves.” This continues the Charon comparison in Policraticus 5.10.

Original text 1651	Modern English
besides, they have damnificas linguas, as he terms it, nisi funibus argenteis vincias, they must be feed to say nothing, and [865]get more to hold their peace, then we can to say our best. They will speak their clients fair, and invite them to their tables, but as he follows it, [866]of all injustice, there is none so pernicious as that of theirs, which when they deceive most, will seem to be honest men.	Besides, they have "harmful tongues," as he calls them, "unless you bind them with silver cords": they must be paid to say nothing, and receive more for keeping quiet than we can for saying our best. They speak pleasantly to their clients and invite them to dine; but, as he goes on to say, "Of all injustice, none is so pernicious as that of people who strive to appear honest precisely when they are most deceitful."
They take upon them to be peace-makers, & fovere causas humilium, to help them to their right, patrocinantur afflictis, but all is for their own good, [867]ut loculos pleniorum exhauriant, they plead for poor men gratis, but they are but as a stale to catch others.	They profess to be peacemakers and "to support the cases of the lowly," helping them obtain their rights; "they champion the afflicted." But it is all for their own advantage, "to empty the purses of the wealthier." They plead for poor people without charge, but use them only as decoys to catch others.[868]

[865] Burton. [p. 50, *] Plus accipiunt tacere, quàm nos loqui. Editor: "They receive more for keeping silent than we for speaking." The argument continues in Policraticus 5.10.

[866] Burton. [p. 50, e] Totius injustitiæ nulla capitalior, quàm eorum qui cùm maxime decipiunt, id agunt, ut boni viri esse videantur. Editor: "Of all injustice, none is more deadly than that of those who, precisely when they deceive most, strive to appear good men." Cicero, On Duties 1.41, quoted by John of Salisbury in Policraticus 5.10.

[867] Burton. [p. 50, f] Nam quocunque modo causa procedat, hoc semper agitur, ut loculi impleantur, etsi avaritia nequit satiari. Editor: "For whichever way the case proceeds, the aim is always to fill their purses, although greed cannot be satisfied." The exact source of this wording remains unlocated.

[868] Editor. A stale is a decoy. The lawyers' apparently charitable work is represented as bait for wealthier clients. In the earlier comparison with ivy, præmulseris means having first soothed or stroked someone; Burton immediately explains the inducement as a fee.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If there be no jar, [869]they can make a jar, out of the law it self finde still some quirk or other, to set them at odds, and continue causes so long, lustra aliquot, I know not how many years before the cause is heard, and when tis judged and determined by reason of some tricks and errors, it is as fresh to begin, after twice seven years sometimes, as it was at first; and so they prolong time, delay suits till they have enriched themselves, and beggered their clients.	If there is no quarrel, they can make one, always finding some quibble in the law itself to set people against each other. They drag cases out so long—"several five-year periods," I do not know how many years—before a hearing; and even after judgement, some manoeuvre or error makes the case as ready to begin again, sometimes after fourteen years, as it was at first. So they stretch out time and delay suits until they have enriched themselves and beggared their clients.
And as [870]Cato inveighed against Isocrates Scholars, we may justly tax our wrangling Lawyers, they do consenescere in litibus, are so litigious and busie here on earth, that I think they will plead their clients causes hereafter, some of them in hell. [871]Simlerus complains amongst the Switzers of the Advocates in his time, that when they should make an end, they began controversies, and protract their causes many years, perswading them their title is good, till their patrimonies be consumed, and that they have spent more in seeking then the thing is worth, or they shall get by the recovery.	And just as Cato attacked Isocrates' pupils, we may rightly accuse our wrangling lawyers: they "grow old in lawsuits," and are so quarrelsome and busy here on earth that I think some will go on pleading their clients' cases in hell. Simler complains of the advocates among the Swiss in his day: "When they should end disputes, they begin them and prolong their clients' cases for years, persuading them that their claim is sound until their inherited estates are consumed, and they have spent more pursuing the thing than it is worth or than they will gain by recovering it."

[869] Burton. [p. 50, g] Camden in Norfolk: qui si nihil sit litium è juris apicibus lites tamen severe callent. Editor: "Camden, in Norfolk: even if there are no lawsuits, they know well how to sow lawsuits from the fine points of law." The exact Camden passage remains uncollated.

[870] Burton. [p. 50, h] Plutarch. vit. Cat. causas apud inferos quas in suam fidem receperunt, patrocinio suo tuebuntur; Editor: "Plutarch, Life of Cato. They will defend in the underworld the cases entrusted to their care." In Cato the Elder 23.2, Cato jokes that Isocrates' pupils will practise before Minos below: they have taken so long to learn. Burton reapplies the joke to lawyers who grow old in litigation.

[871] Burton. [p. 50, i; continuing along the foot] Lib. 2. de Helvet. repub. non explicandis, sed moliendis controversiis operam dant, ita ut lites in multos annos extrahantur summa cum molestia utriusque partis & dum interea patrimonia exhauriantur. Editor: "Book 2 on the Swiss commonwealth. They work not to resolve disputes but to contrive them, so that lawsuits are drawn out for many years, with the greatest trouble to both parties, while their estates are drained away." Exact Simler passage uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So that he that goes to law as the proverb is, [872]holds a wolfe by the ears,[873] or as a sheep in a storm runs for shelter to a brier, if he prosecute his cause he is consumed, if he surcease his suit he loseth all; what difference? they had wont heretofore, saith Austin, to end matters, per communes arbitros;	So anyone who goes to law, as the proverb says, holds a wolf by the ears, or is like a sheep running to a briar for shelter in a storm. If he pursues his case he is ruined; if he abandons it he loses everything. What difference is there? In former times, says Augustine, people used to settle matters "through arbitrators agreed upon by both sides."[874]
and so in Switzerland, (we are informed by [875]Simlerus,) they had some common arbitrators, or dayesmen in every Town, that made a friendly composition betwixt man and man, and he much wonders at their honest simplicity, that could keep peace so well, and end such great causes by that means.	And so in Switzerland, Simler tells us, "they had public arbitrators, or mediators, in every town, who made an amicable settlement between one person and another." He greatly admires their honest simplicity, which could preserve peace so well and settle such substantial cases in this way.

[872] Burton. [p. 50, k] Lupum auribus tenent. Editor: "They hold a wolf by the ears." Neither maintaining one's grip nor letting go is safe.

[873] Burton. [p. 50, l] Hor. Editor: "Horace." No corresponding body letter is clearly visible. This reference follows the wolf proverb in the margin and is provisionally attached here to the proverbial sequence. The intended Horatian passage remains unresolved.

[874] Editor. The wolf and briar images make litigation dangerous whichever course is chosen: holding on or releasing, pursuing a claim or abandoning it. A sheep seeking protection in thorns may lose its wool. Burton's exact source for Augustine's statement about arbitration remains unlocated.

[875] Burton. [p. 50, m; continuing along the foot] Lib. de Helvet. repub. Iudices quocunque pago constituunt qui amica aliqua transactione si fieri possit, lites tollant. Ego majorum nostrorum simplicitatem admiror, qui sic causas gravissimas composuerint, &c. Editor: "On the Swiss commonwealth. They appoint judges in every district to end lawsuits by an amicable settlement, if possible. I admire the simplicity of our ancestors, who settled such weighty cases in this way," etc. Exact Simler passage uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 50–51 At [876]Fez in Africk, they have neither Lawyers nor Advocates; but if there be any controversies amongst them, both parties plaintiff and defendant come to their Alfakins or chief Judge, and at once without any farther appeals, or pitifull delays, the cause is heard and ended.	At Fez in Africa they have neither lawyers nor advocates; if a dispute arises, both parties, plaintiff and defendant, come before their Alfakins, or chief judge, “and the case is heard and settled at once, without further appeals or distressing delays.”[877]
Source page 51 Our forefathers, as [878]a worthy Corographer of ours observes, had wont pauculis cruculis aureis, with a few golden crosses, and lines in verse, make all conveyances, assurances. And such was the candor & integrity of succeeding ages, that a Deed (as I have oft seen) to convey a whole Manor, was implicite contained in some twenty lines, or thereabouts;	Our forefathers, as a distinguished writer on our country observes, used to make all transfers of property and guarantees with “a few small golden crosses”—a few golden crosses and lines of verse. Such was the honesty and integrity of succeeding ages that a deed conveying an entire manor—as I have often seen—was comprised in some twenty lines or thereabouts.[879]

[876] Burton. [p. 50, n; continuing along the foot] Clenard l. 1. ep. Si quæ controversiæ utraque pars judicem adit, is semel & simul rem transigit, audit: nec quid sit appellatio, lachrymosæque moræ norunt. Editor: “Clenard, Letters, book 1. If any disputes arise, both sides approach the judge; he settles and hears the matter in a single sitting. They do not know what an appeal or distressing delays are.” The inverted order “settles and hears” is retained in translating the note. Exact letter uncollated.

[877] Editor. Burton presents Fez as an example of swift settlement through a judge. “Alfakins” and “chief Judge” are his designation and gloss; this brief report has not been independently verified as a full description of the city’s legal institutions.

[878] Burton. [p. 51, o] Camden. Editor: The precise Camden passage behind this description of early conveyances remains to be located.

[879] Editor. Assurances are instruments securing property or title. “Implicite” is retained in the original and understood here as contained or comprised. The meaning of the “golden crosses” requires collation with Camden; the translation preserves the image without specifying whether it refers to marks, objects, or payments.

Original text 1651	Modern English
like that scede or Sytala Laconica, so much renowned of old in all contracts, which [880]Tully so earnestly commends to Atticus. Plutarch in his Lysander, Aristotle polit: Thucidides lib. 1. [881]Diodorus and Suidas approve and magnifie, for that Laconick brevity in this kind, and well they might, for according to [882]Tertullian, certa sunt paucis, there is much more certainty in fewer words.	Like that written slip, or "Laconian scytale," so celebrated of old in agreements, which Cicero so warmly commends to Atticus. Plutarch in his Lysander, Aristotle in his Politics, Thucydides in book 1, Diodorus, and Suidas praise and extol it for its Spartan brevity in such matters; and well they might, for, as Tertullian says, "Certainties lie in few words": there is much greater certainty in fewer words.[883]

[880] Burton. [p. 51, p] Lib. 10. epist. ad Atticum, epist. 11. Editor: "Letters to Atticus, book 10, letter 11." The expression "Laconian scytale" occurs at 10.10.3 in the text consulted, after Cicero copies Antony's letter. Burton's printed number and his interpretation as praise of brevity are preserved.

[881] Burton. [p. 51, q] Biblioth. l. 3. Editor: Diodorus, Library of History, book 3, as printed. The precise passage intended here, and the other unlocated references in this catalogue, remain unresolved.

[882] Burton. [p. 51, r] Lib. de Anim. Editor: Tertullian, On the Soul 2, where certainty expressed in few words is contrasted with the expansiveness of speculation. Burton applies the maxim to the drafting of legal documents.

[883] Editor. A scede is a written slip. The printed "Sytala" is rendered by the usual term scytale: a Spartan message associated with a rod. Plutarch, Lysander 19.5–7, describes a strip wound round matching rods to conceal and recover its writing. Burton draws the comparison toward laconic brevity; it is not simply a description of a short property deed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And so was it of old throughout: but now many skins of parchment will scarce serve turn, he that buys and sells a house, must have a house full of writings, there be so many circumstances, so many words, such tautological repetitions of all particulars (to avoid cavillation they say) but we finde by our woful experience, that to subtle wits it is a cause of much more contention and variance, and scarce any conveyance so accurately penned by one, which another will not find a crack in, or cavil at, if any one word be misplaced, any little error, all is disannulled.	And that was formerly the practice everywhere. Now many skins of parchment scarcely suffice: anyone buying or selling a house must have a houseful of documents. There are so many qualifications, so many words, such repetitive restatements of every detail—to prevent quibbling, they say. Yet we find to our cost that for ingenious minds this causes far more dispute and disagreement. Hardly any deed is drafted so precisely by one person that another cannot find a flaw or pick a quarrel with it. One misplaced word, one tiny error, and the whole thing is annulled.
That which is law to day, is none to morrow, that which is sound in one mans opinion, is most faulty to another; that in conclusion, here is nothing amongst us but contention and confusion, we bandie one against another.	What is law today is no law tomorrow; what one person thinks sound another considers deeply flawed. The result is that we have nothing among us but contention and confusion, each taking sides against the other.
And that which long since [884]Plutarch complained of them in Asia, may be verified in our times. These men here assembled, come not to sacrifice to their gods, to offer Iupiter their first fruits, or merriments to Bacchus; but an yearly disease exasperating Asia hath brought them hither, to make an end of their controversies and law suits. Tis multitudo perdentium & pereuntium, a destructive rout, that seek one anothers ruine.	What Plutarch long ago lamented about the people of Asia holds true in our time: “These men assembled here have not come to sacrifice to their gods, offer Jupiter their first fruits, or hold revels for Bacchus. An annual disease tormenting Asia has brought them here to conclude their disputes and lawsuits.” It is “a multitude destroying and being destroyed,” a destructive mob seeking one another’s ruin.

[884] Burton. [p. 51, s] Lib. major morb. corp. an animi. Hi non convenerunt ut diis more majorum sacra faciant, non ut Iovi primitias offerant, aut Baccho commessationes, sed anniversarius morbus exasperans Asiam huc eos coegit, ut contentiones hic peragant. Editor: “On whether the diseases of body or soul are worse. These men have not assembled to sacrifice to the gods in ancestral fashion, offer first fruits to Jupiter, or revels to Bacchus; an annual disease tormenting Asia has driven them here to pursue their disputes.” Compare Plutarch, Moralia 501e–502a, chapter 4 of that essay.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such most part are our ordinary suiters, termers, clients, new stirs every day, mistakes, errors, cavils, and at this present, as I have heard in some one Court, I know not how many thousand causes: no person free, no title almost good, with such bitternesse in following, so many slights, procrastinations, delayes, forgery, such cost (for infinite sums are inconsiderately spent) violence and malice, I know not by whose fault, lawyers, clients, laws, both or all:	Such, for the most part, are our ordinary litigants, court-term attenders, and clients: fresh disturbances every day, mistakes, errors, quibbles, and, at this very moment, I hear, who knows how many thousand cases in a single court. No person is free of it, scarcely any title to property secure. Cases are pursued with such bitterness, so many tricks, postponements, delays, forgeries, such expense—for enormous sums are spent without thought—such violence and malice. Whose fault it is I do not know: the lawyers', the clients', the laws', both parties', or everyone's.[885]
but as Paul reprehended the [886]Corinthians long since, I may more appositely infer now: There is a fault amongst you, & I speak it to your shame, Is there not a [887]wise man amongst you, to judge between his brethren? but that a brother goes to law with a brother. And * Christs counsel concerning Law-suits, was never so fit to be inculcated, as in this age: [888]Agree with thine adversary quickly, &c. Matth 5.25.	But the rebuke Paul gave the Corinthians long ago applies still more aptly now: "There is a fault among you, and I say it to your shame: is there no wise man among you to judge between his brothers, instead of one brother going to law against another?" And Christ's counsel on lawsuits never needed repeating more than in this age: "Come to terms quickly with your adversary," and so on, Matthew 5:25.

[885] Editor. Suiters are litigants; termers attend the courts during legal terms. "Title" here means a claim to property. Burton leaves responsibility divided among the lawyers, their clients, and the laws themselves before turning to Paul's appeal for internal reconciliation.

[886] Burton. [p. 51, t] 1 Cor. 6. 5, 6. Editor: Burton's compressed paraphrase also draws on verse 7, with its rebuke of Christians for going to law against one another.

[887] Burton. [p. 51, u] Stulti quando demum sapietis? Ps. 49. 8. Editor: "Fools, when at last will you be wise?" Compare Psalm 94:8 in standard English numbering, rather than the printed Psalm 49:8.

[888] Burton. [p. 51, x] Of which Text read two learned Sermons, * so intituled, and preached by our Regius Professor, D. Prideaux: printed at London by Fælix Kingston, 1621. Editor: John Prideaux's Christ's Counsell for Ending Law Cases. The star links the title to the body's "Christs counsel." The title is also recorded among Prideaux's collected sermons by Anthony Wood; the particular 1621 printing named here has not yet been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I could repeat many such particular grievances, which must disturb a body politick; To shut up all in brief, where good government is, prudent and wise Princes, there all things thrive and prosper, peace and happinesse is in that Land: where it is otherwise, all things are ugly to behold, incult, barbarous, uncivil, a Paradise is turned to a wildernesse.	I could list many more particular grievances that must disturb a political community. To sum it all up briefly: where there is good government and prudent, wise rulers, everything thrives and prospers; that land enjoys peace and happiness. Where it is otherwise, everything is ugly to behold, uncultivated, barbarous, uncivilised: a paradise is turned into a wilderness.
Source page 51–52 This Iland amongst the rest, our next neighbors the French and Germanes, may be a sufficient witnesse, that in a short time by that prudent policy of the Romans, was brought from barbarism: see but what Cæsar reports of us, and Tacitus of those old Germans, they were once as uncivil as they in Virginia, yet by planting of Colonies and good laws, they became from barbarous outlaws, [889]to be full of rich and populous cities, as now they are, and most flourishing Kingdoms.	This island, among others, and our near neighbours France and Germany, bear sufficient witness: Roman prudence in government brought them out of barbarism in a short time. Just read what Caesar reports of us, and Tacitus of the ancient Germans: they were once as uncivilised as the people of Virginia. Yet through the establishment of colonies and good laws, they passed from a condition of barbarous lawlessness to countries full of rich and populous cities, as they are now, and became flourishing kingdoms.[890]

[889] Burton. p. 52, a: “Sepius bona materia cessat sine artifice. Sabellicus de Germania. Si quis videret Germaniam urbibus hodie excultam, non diceret ut olim tristem cultu, asperam cælo, terram informem.” Editor: “Good material often lies unused without a craftsman. Sabellicus, On Germany. If anyone saw Germany adorned with cities today, he would not call it, as formerly, bleak in its cultivation, harsh in climate, an unshapely land.” Exact passage unlocated; the closing description recalls Tacitus, Germania 2.

[890] Editor. Burton applies “barbarous” and “uncivil” within an argument favouring Roman rule and English colonial settlement. These are his judgements. His grouping of Britain, France, and Germany compresses very different histories; Tacitus’s Germania 2 supplies the description echoed in his marginal note, not proof of the whole argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 52 Even so might Virginia, and those wild Irish have been civilized long since, if that order had been heretofore taken, which now begins, of planting Colonies, &c. I have read a [891]discourse, printed Anno 1612. Discovering the true causes, why Ireland was never intirely subdued, or brought under obedience to the Crown of England, untill the beginning of his Majesties happy reign. Yet if his reasons were throughly scanned by a judicious Politician, I am afraid he would not altogether be approved, but that it would turn to the dishonor of our Nation, to suffer it to lye so long waste.	In the same way, Virginia and those wild Irish might have been civilised long ago, if the policy now beginning—of establishing colonies, and so on—had been adopted earlier. I have read a discourse printed in 1612, Discovering the True Causes Why Ireland Was Never Entirely Subdued, or Brought under Obedience to the Crown of England, until the Beginning of His Majesty's Happy Reign. Yet if a discerning political thinker thoroughly examined the author's reasons, I fear they would not meet with complete approval: allowing Ireland to lie waste for so long would instead bring dishonour upon our nation.[892]
Yea, and if some travellers should see (to come neerer home) those rich, united Provinces of Holland, Zealand, &c. over against us, those neat cities and populous towns, full of most industrious artificers, [893]so much land recovered from the Sea, and so painfully preserved by those artificial inventions, so wonderfully approved, as that of Bemster in Holland, ut nihil huic par aut simile invenias in toto orbe, saith Bertius the Geographer, all the world cannot match it,	Indeed, to come nearer home, if travellers saw those wealthy United Provinces of Holland, Zeeland, and the rest, across the sea from us; their neat cities and populous towns, full of hardworking craftspeople; so much land reclaimed from the sea and maintained with such labour by ingenious devices, so wonderfully successful—as at Beemster in Holland, "so that you could find nothing equal or similar to it in the whole world," says the geographer Bertius: the whole world cannot match it;[894]

[891] Burton. p. 52, b: "By his Majesties Attorney General there." Editor: Sir John Davies. The Folger catalogue confirms the title and 1612 publication; Burton paraphrases the title.

[892] Editor. "Planting colonies" means establishing settler communities, here in Virginia and Ireland. Burton approves that policy and faults its delay. His objection to Davies's account concerns the honour and effectiveness of English government; it is not a rejection of colonisation.

[893] Burton. p. 52, c: "As Zeipland, Bemster in Holland, &c." Editor: Dutch reclaimed lands, including Beemster. The printed c stands before "so much land recovered from the Sea"; the note is attached there. It does not refer to the English fens mentioned later.

[894] Editor. Beemster is a Dutch polder, land enclosed by dykes and drained. Lake Beemster was drained in 1612. "Artificial" means produced by human skill; "painfully" means laboriously. The precise Bertius quotation remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[895]so many navigable chanels from place to place, made by mens hands, &c. and on the other side so many thousand acres of our fens lie drowned, our cities thin, and those vile, poor, and ugly to behold in respect of theirs, our trades decayed, our still running rivers stopped, and that beneficiall use of transportation, wholly neglected, so many Havens voyd of ships and towns, so many Parks and Forrests for pleasure, barren Heaths, so many Villages depopulated, &c. I think sure he would finde some fault.	so many navigable canals made by human hands from place to place; and, on our side, so many thousands of acres of fenland lying flooded; our cities sparsely populated, and mean, poor, and ugly beside theirs; our trades decayed; our ever-flowing rivers obstructed and their useful role in transport wholly neglected; so many harbours without ships or towns, so many parks and forests kept for pleasure, barren heaths, and depopulated villages—I think such a traveller would certainly find something to criticise.[896]
I may not deny but that this Nation of ours, doth bene audire apud exteros, is a most noble, a most flourishing kingdom, by common consent of all [897]Geographers, Historians, Politicians, tis unica velut arx, and which Quintius in Livy said of the inhabitants of Peloponesus, may be wel applied to us, we are testudines testâ suâ inclusi, like so many Tortoises in our shels, safely defended by an angry Sea, as a wall on all sides;	I cannot deny that our nation "has a good reputation abroad": by the common consent of geographers, historians, and political writers, it is a most noble and flourishing kingdom, "like a single fortress." What Quinctius says in Livy about the inhabitants of the Peloponnese applies well to us: we are "tortoises enclosed in their own shells," like so many tortoises in our shells, safely defended by an angry sea that forms a wall on every side.[898]

[895] Burton. p. 52, d: "From Gaant to Sluce, from Bruges to the Sea, &c." Editor: Ghent to Sluis, and Bruges to the sea.

[896] Editor. "Still running" means continually flowing. Burton criticises obstructed navigation, flooded fenland, and land reserved for recreation. His marginal c names Dutch reclamations and is attached at its printed marker before "so much land recovered from the Sea."

[897] Burton. p. 52, e: "Ortelius, Boterus, Mercator, Meteranus, &c." Editor: Abraham Ortelius, Giovanni Botero, Gerard Mercator, and Emanuel van Meteren. No precise passages are given.

[898] Editor. Livy 36.32.6–8: Titus Quinctius Flamininus likens the Achaeans, safe inside the Peloponnese but exposed beyond it, to a tortoise within its shell. Burton transfers the image to Britain's maritime defences. His Latin is a compressed restatement, not Livy's exact wording.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Our Iland hath many such honorable Elogiums; and as a learned countrey-man of ours right well hath it, [899]Ever since the Normans first coming into England, this country both for military matters, and all other of civility, hath been parallel'd with the most flourishing kingdoms of Europe, and our Christian world, a blessed, a rich countrey, and one of the fortunate Isles:	Our island has received many such honourable tributes. As a learned countryman of ours puts it very well: "Ever since the Normans first came into England, this country, in military matters and every other aspect of civil life, has stood alongside the most flourishing kingdoms of Europe and our Christian world." It is a blessed and wealthy country, one of the Fortunate Isles.
and for some things [900]preferred before other countries, for expert seamen, our laborious discoveries, art of navigation, true Merchants, they carry the bel away from all other Nations, even the Portugals and Hollanders themselves; [901]without all fear, saith Boterus, furrowing the Ocean Winter and Summer, and two of their Captains, with no lesse valor then fortune, have sailed round about the world.	In some respects it is ranked above other countries: for skilled seamen, our laborious voyages of discovery, the art of navigation, and genuine merchants. They take the prize over every other nation, even the Portuguese and the Dutch themselves: "Fearlessly," says Botero, "ploughing the ocean in winter and summer; and two of their captains, with as much courage as good fortune, have sailed around the world."[902]

[899] Burton. p. 52, f: "Iam inde non belli gloria, quàm humanitatis cultu inter florentissimas orbis Christiani gentes imprimis floruit. Camden. Brit. de Normannis." Editor: "From then on it flourished among the foremost peoples of the Christian world, no less through military glory than through the cultivation of civil life." William Camden, Britannia (1607), Normanni 18, reads "non minus belli gloria"; Burton's margin omits minus. The translation supplies that comparison, which agrees with Burton's English. The printed Latin is retained; the edition of Camden used by Burton is not established.

[900] Burton. p. 52, g: "Geog. Kecker." Editor: Keckermann's geography; the abbreviated reference has not been precisely located.

[901] Burton. p. 52, h: "Tam hieme quàm æstate intrepidè sulcant Oceanum, & duo illorum duces non minore audacia quàm fortunâ totius orbem terræ circumnavigarunt. Amphitheatro Boterus." Editor: "In winter as in summer they fearlessly plough the ocean, and two of their captains have sailed around the whole globe with no less daring than good fortune." The printed "totius orbem" is grammatically irregular; Botero's exact passage and the meaning of the bibliographical abbreviation remain unverified.

[902] Editor. "Carry the bell away" means take the prize. Botero's two captains are apparently Francis Drake and Thomas Cavendish, who completed circumnavigations in 1580 and 1588 respectively; the identification is inferred from the context.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 52–53 [903]We have besides many particular blessings, which our neighbors want, the Gospel truly preached, Church discipline established, long peace and quietnesse free from exactions, forraign fears, invasions, domesticall seditions, well manured, [904]fortified by Art, and Nature, and now most happy in that fortunate union of England and Scotland, which our forefathers have labored to effect, and desired to see: But in which we excell all others, a wise, learned, Religious King, another Numa, a second Augustus, a true Iosiah, most worthy Senators, a learned Clergy, an obedient Commonalty, &c.	Besides, we have many particular blessings that our neighbours lack: the Gospel rightly preached; church discipline established; long peace and tranquillity, free from oppressive levies, foreign threats, invasions, and civil unrest; a well-cultivated country, fortified by human skill and nature; and now, happiest of all, that fortunate union of England and Scotland which our forefathers worked to achieve and longed to see. But what raises us above everyone else is a wise, learned, religious king—another Numa, a second Augustus, a true Josiah—most worthy councillors, a learned clergy, an obedient people, and so on.[905]
Source page 53 Yet amongst many roses, some thistles grow, some bad weeds and enormities, which much disturb the peace of this body politick, eclipse the honour and glory of it, fit to be rooted out, and with all speed to be reformed.	Yet among the many roses grow some thistles: noxious weeds and abuses that seriously disturb the peace of this political body and dim its honour and glory. They deserve to be rooted out and reformed without delay.

[903] Burton. p. 52, i: “A fertile soil, good air, &c. Tin. Lead, Wool, Saffron, &c.” Editor: Both parts of the marginal entry are retained.

[904] Burton. p. 52, k: “Tota Britannia unica velut arx. Boter.” Editor: “All Britain is like a single fortress.” Botero; exact passage unlocated.

[905] Editor. The king is James VI of Scotland and I of England, and the union is the union of the crowns in 1603, not the parliamentary union of 1707. The praise of peace and monarchy preserves a Jacobean setting in this 1651 printing. Numa, Augustus, and the biblical Josiah offer models of religious order, peace, and reform; “Senators” means leading councillors or statesmen.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The first is idlenesse, by reason of which we have many swarms of rogues and beggers, theeves, drunkards, and discontented persons (whom Lycurgus in Plutarch calls morbos reipub. the boils of the commonwealth) many poor people in all our Towns, Civitates ignobiles, as [906]Polydore calls them, base built cities, inglorious, poor, small, rare in sight, ruinous, and thin of inhabitants.	The first is idleness. Because of it, we have swarms of rogues and beggars, thieves, drunkards, and discontented people—whom Lycurgus, in Plutarch, calls "diseases of the commonwealth," the boils of the commonwealth —and many poor people in all our towns: "undistinguished cities," as Polydore calls them, meanly built, inglorious, poor, small, few and far between, dilapidated, and sparsely inhabited.[907]
Our land is fertile we may not deny, full of all good things, and why doth it not then abound with cities, as well as Italy, France, Germany, the Low-countreys? because their policy hath been otherwise, and we are not so thrifty, circumspect, industrious; Idleness is the malus Genius of our nation. For as [908]Boterus justly argues, fertility of a countrey is not enough, except Art and Industry be joyned unto it, according to Aristotle, riches are either natural or artificial; natural are good land, fair mines, &c. artificial, are manufactures, coines, &c.	We cannot deny that our land is fertile and full of good things. Why, then, does it not abound in cities like Italy, France, Germany, and the Low Countries? Because their policies have been different, and we are not so thrifty, careful, or industrious. Idleness is our nation's "evil spirit." As Botero rightly argues, a country's fertility is not enough unless skill and industry accompany it. According to Aristotle, wealth is either natural or made by human skill: natural wealth consists of good land, rich mines, and so on; wealth made by human skill consists of manufactured goods, coins, and the like.[909]

[906] Burton. p. 53, a: "Lib. 1. hist." Editor: Polydore Vergil, English History, book 1. "Civitates ignobiles" means "undistinguished cities"; the precise wording is not independently collated here.

[907] Editor. Compare Plutarch, Lycurgus 8.1–2: the "diseases" include insolence, envy, crime, luxury, poverty, and wealth. Burton redirects the medical metaphor towards the groups in his own list. The phrase does not constitute an exact speech by Lycurgus about English beggars.

[908] Burton. p. 53, b: "Increment. urb. l. 1. cap. 9." Editor: Botero, On the Causes of the Greatness of Cities, book 1, chapter 9. The printed reference is retained; exact passage uncollated.

[909] Editor. "Art" means practical skill; "industry," diligent work. "Artificial" does not mean counterfeit. Aristotle distinguishes natural acquisition from money-making in Politics 1.8–9, but Burton's list of land, mines, manufactures, and coins is not established here as a direct quotation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many kingdoms are fertile, but thin of inhabitants, as that Dutchy of Piedmont in Italy, which Leander Albertus so much magnifies for Corn, Wine, Fruits, &c. yet nothing neer so populous as those which are more barren: [910]England, saith he (London only excepted) hath never a populous City, and yet a fruitfull Countrey.	Many kingdoms are fertile but sparsely inhabited, such as the duchy of Piedmont in Italy, which Leandro Alberti praises so highly for its grain, wine, fruit, and so on; yet they are nowhere near as populous as less fertile countries. "England," he says, "London alone excepted, has not a single populous city, yet it is a fertile country."
I finde 46 cities and walled towns in Alsatia, a small Province in Germany, 50 castles, an infinite number of Villages, no ground idle, no not rocky places, or tops of hils are untilled, as [911]Munster informeth us. In [912]Greichgea a small territory on the Necker, 24 Italian miles over, I reade of 20 walled towns, innumerable villages, each one containing 150 houses most part, besides castles and Noblemens Palaces.	I find 46 cities and walled towns in Alsace, a small province of Germany, 50 castles, and countless villages. No land lies idle: even rocky places and hilltops are cultivated, as Münster tells us. In Kraichgau, a small territory on the Neckar, 24 Italian miles across, I read of 20 walled towns and innumerable villages, most containing 150 houses apiece, besides castles and noblemen's palaces.[913]

[910] Burton. p. 53, c: "Anglia, excepto Londino, nulla est civitas memorabilis, licet ea natio rerum omnium copia abundet." Editor: "In England, apart from London, there is no noteworthy city, although that nation abounds in everything." Burton's "saith he" does not securely establish which of the preceding authorities supplies this sentence.

[911] Burton. p. 53, d: "Cosmog. lib. 3. cap. 119. Villarum non est numerus, nullus locus otiosus aut incultus." Editor: Münster, Cosmography, book 3, chapter 119: "The villages are beyond number; no place lies idle or uncultivated." Exact edition and figures uncollated.

[912] Burton. p. 53, e: "Chytræus orat. edit. Francof. 1583." Editor: Chytraeus, orations, Frankfurt edition, 1583; the specific oration remains unidentified.

[913] Editor. Burton's figures are retained as reported, not treated as a consistent census. "Cities," "towns," "villages," and "parishes" are different categories, and regional miles differ. "Dutchland" means Germany. The Portuguese name in the next passage means the region between the Douro and Minho rivers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I observe in [914]Turinge in Dutchland (twelve miles over by their scale) 12 counties, and in them 144 cities, 2000 villages, 144 towns, 250 castles. In [915]Bavaria 34 cities, 46 towns, &c. [916]Portugallia interamnis, a small plot of ground hath 1460 parishes, 130 monasteries, 200 bridges. Malta a barren Iland, yeelds 20000 inhabitants.	In Thuringia in Germany, twelve miles across by their measure, I find 12 counties containing 144 cities, 2,000 villages, 144 towns, and 250 castles. In Bavaria there are 34 cities, 46 towns, and so on. Entre-Douro-e-Minho in Portugal, a small tract of land, has 1,460 parishes, 130 monasteries, and 200 bridges. Malta, a barren island, supports 20,000 inhabitants.
But of all the rest, I admire Lues Guicciardines relations of the Low-countries. Holland hath 26 cities, 400 great villages: Zeland 10 cities, 102 parishes. Brabant 26 cities, 102 parishes. Flanders 28 cities, 90 towns, 1154 villages, besides Abbies, castles, &c. The Low-countries generally have three cities at least for one of ours, and those far more populous and rich: and what is the cause, but their industry & excellency in all maner of trades?	But above all these, I admire Lodovico Guicciardini's accounts of the Low Countries. Holland has 26 cities and 400 large villages; Zeeland, 10 cities and 102 parishes; Brabant, 26 cities and 102 parishes; Flanders, 28 cities, 90 towns, and 1,154 villages, besides abbeys, castles, and so forth. The Low Countries generally have at least three cities for every one of ours, and theirs are far more populous and wealthy. What causes this but their industry and excellence in every kind of trade?

[914] Burton. p. 53, f: "Maginus Geog." Editor: Magini's geography; exact passage unlocated.

[915] Burton. p. 53, g: "Ortelius è Vaseo & Pet. de Medina." Editor: "Ortelius, from Vaseus and Pedro de Medina." The note is printed beside the Bavarian item, but Ortelius's text on Portugal supplies the following Portuguese figures. Ortelius gives approximately 1,460 parishes, more than 130 monasteries, and almost 200 bridges. His author citations name Vaseus and, in later editions, Medina.

[916] Burton. p. 53, h: "An hundred families in each." Editor: This qualifying note accompanies Burton's Portuguese parish count.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 53–54 Their commerce, which is maintained by a multitude of Tradesmen, so many excellent chanels made by art, and opportune havens, to which they build their Cities: all which we have in like measure, or at least may have. But their chiefest Lodestone which draws all maner of commerce and merchandize, which maintains their present estate, is not fertility of soyl, but industry that enricheth them, the gold mines of Peru, or Nova Hispania may not compare with them.	Their commerce is sustained by a multitude of tradespeople, so many excellent artificial waterways, and conveniently placed harbours beside which they build their cities. We have all these advantages in equal measure, or at least could have them. But the chief magnet drawing every kind of commerce and merchandise, and sustaining their present prosperity, is industry: that, rather than fertile soil, enriches them. The gold mines of Peru or New Spain cannot compare with them.[917]
Source page 54 They have neither gold nor silver of their own, wine nor oyl, or scarce any corn growing in those united Provinces, little or no Wood, Tin, Lead, Iron, Silk, Wooll, any stuff almost, or Mettle; and yet Hungary, Transilvania, that brag of their mines, fertile England cannot compare with them.	Those United Provinces have no gold or silver of their own, no wine or oil, scarcely any grain growing there, little or no timber, tin, lead, iron, silk, wool, or almost any other material or metal. Yet Hungary and Transylvania, which boast of their mines, and fertile England cannot compare with them.
I dare boldly say, that neither France, Tarentum, Apulia, Lombardy, or any part of Italy, Valence in Spain, or that pleasant Andalusia, with their excellent fruits, Wine and Oyl, two Harvests, no not any part of Europe is so flourishing, so rich, so populous, so full of good ships, of wel built cities, so abounding with all things necessary for the use of man. Tis our Indies, an Epitome of China, and all by reason of their industry, good policy, and commerce.	I dare say boldly that neither France, Taranto, Apulia, Lombardy, nor any other part of Italy, nor Valencia in Spain, nor pleasant Andalusia—with their excellent fruit, wine, oil, and two harvests—indeed, no part of Europe is so flourishing, so rich, so populous, so full of good ships and well-built cities, or so abundant in everything people need. It is our Indies, a China in miniature, all because of industry, good government, and commerce.

[917] Editor. "Lues Guicciardines" is Lodovico Guicciardini, whose account concerns the Low Countries. "Lodestone" is naturally magnetised stone, hence a magnet. New Spain is Spain's American viceroyalty centred on Mexico. Burton's use of "Low Countries" ranges more widely than the United Provinces; the list just given includes Brabant and Flanders.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Industry is a Load-stone to draw all good things; that alone makes countries flourish, cities populous, [918]and will enforce by reason of much manure, which necessarily follows, a barren soyl to be fertile and good, as Sheep, saith [919]Dion, mend a bad pasture.	Industry is a magnet that draws every good thing to it. That alone makes countries flourish and cities populous. Through the intensive cultivation that necessarily follows, it will make barren soil fertile and good, just as sheep, says Dio, improve poor pasture.[920]
Tell me Politicians, why is that fruitfull Palestina, noble Greece, Ægypt, Asia Minor, so much decayed, and (meer carcasses now) faln from that they were? The ground is the same, but the government is altered, the people are grown sloathfull, idle, their good husbandry, policy, and industry is decayed. Non fatigata aut effœta humus, as [921]Columella well informs Sylvinus, sed nostrâ fit inertiâ, &c.	Tell me, political thinkers: why have fertile Palestine, noble Greece, Egypt, and Asia Minor declined so greatly, fallen so far from what they were, until they are mere carcasses? The soil is the same, but government has changed; the people have become slothful and idle, and their good farming, government, and industry have decayed. “The soil is not worn out or exhausted,” as Columella rightly tells Silvinus; “our idleness causes it,” and so on.

[918] Burton. p. 54, a: “Populi multitudo diligenti cultura fœcundat solum. Boter. l. 8. c. 3.” Editor: “A large population makes the soil fertile through diligent cultivation.” Botero, book 8, chapter 3, as printed; work and location unverified.

[919] Burton. p. 54, b: “Orat. 35. Terra ubi oves stabulantur optima agricolis ob stercus.” Editor: “Land where sheep are penned is excellent for farmers because of the dung.” Dio Chrysostom, Discourse 35.16, uses dung-enriched pasture as an analogy for a city enriched by crowds of visitors.

[920] Editor. “Manure” here carries the older sense of cultivation or improvement of land. The following example of sheep also introduces the narrower sense of fertilisation by dung.

[921] Burton. p. 54, c: “De re rust. l. 2. cap. 1.” Editor: Columella, On Agriculture 2.1.1–7 rejects the claim that age has exhausted the soil and ends by blaming human indolence. Burton compresses this argument rather than quoting a continuous sentence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
May a man believe that which Aristotle in his politicks, Pausanias, Stephanus, Sophianus, Gerbelius relate of old Greece? I find heretofore 70 Cities in Epirus overthrown by Paulus Æmilius, a goodly Province in times past, [922]now left desolate of good towns and almost inhabitants. 62 Cities in Macedonia in Strabo's time. I finde 30 in Laconia, but now scarce so many Villages, saith Gerbelius.	Can one believe what Aristotle in his Politics, Pausanias, Stephanus, Sophianus, and Gerbelius relate about ancient Greece? I find that 70 cities in Epirus were once overthrown by Aemilius Paulus: a fine province in former times, now left without good towns and almost without inhabitants. There were 62 cities in Macedonia in Strabo's time. I find 30 in Laconia; now, Gerbelius says, there are scarcely that many villages.[923]
If any man from Mount Taigetus should view the countrey round about, and see tot delicias, tot urbes per Peloponesum dispersas, so many delicate and brave built cities with such cost and exquisite cunning, so neatly set out in Peloponesus, [924]he should perceive them now ruinous and overthrown, burnt, waste, desolate, and laid level with the ground. Incredibile dictu, &c.	If anyone looked out from Mount Taygetus over the surrounding country and saw "so many delights, so many cities scattered throughout the Peloponnese"—so many delightful, splendidly built cities, created at such cost and with such exquisite skill, so beautifully arranged across the Peloponnese—he would now find them ruined and overthrown, burnt, wasted, desolate, and levelled to the ground. "Incredible to tell," and so on.
And as he laments, Quis talia fando Temperet a lachrymis? Quis tam durus aut ferreus, (so he prosecutes it) Who is he that can sufficiently condole and commiserate these ruines? Where are those 4000 cities of Ægypt, those 100 cities in Crete? Are they now come to two?	And, as he laments, "Who, in telling such things, could restrain his tears? Who is so hard, so made of iron"—so he continues—who can adequately mourn and pity these ruins? Where are those 4,000 cities of Egypt, those 100 cities of Crete? Have they now dwindled to two?[925]

[922] Burton. p. 54, d: "Hodie urbibus desolatur, & magna ex parte incolis destituitur. Gerbelius desc. Græciæ lib. 6." Editor: "Today it is bereft of towns and largely deprived of inhabitants." Gerbelius, Description of Greece, book 6; exact wording uncollated.

[923] Editor. Plutarch, Aemilius Paulus 29.4, reports the destruction of seventy Epirote cities. Burton's other totals and his account of subsequent decline remain the claims of his cited authorities; they have not been independently verified as population history.

[924] Burton. p. 54, e: "Videbit eas fere omnes aut eversas, aut solo æquatas, aut in rudera fœdissime dejectas. Gerbelius." Editor: "He will see almost all of them overthrown, levelled to the ground, or most foully reduced to ruins." Gerbelius; exact passage uncollated.

[925] Editor. "Who, in telling such things, could restrain his tears?" adapts Virgil, Aeneid 2.6–8, where Aeneas begins the story of Troy's destruction. Burton presents it within Gerbelius's lament. The Latin question and Burton's subsequent English restatement are both preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What saith Pliny and Ælian of old Italy? There were in former ages 1166 cities: Blondus and Machiavel, both grant them now nothing neer so populous, and full of good towns as in the time of Augustus (for now Leander Albertus can finde but 300 at most) and if we may give credit to [926]Livy, not then so strong and puissant as of old: They mustered 70 Legions in former times, which now the known world will scarce yeeld.	What do Pliny and Aelian say about ancient Italy? In former ages it had 1,166 cities. Biondo and Machiavelli both allow that it is now nowhere near as populous, or as full of good towns, as it was under Augustus—for now Leandro Alberti can find no more than 300. And if we may trust Livy, even then it was not as strong and powerful as formerly: "They mustered 70 legions in earlier times, a number the known world would now scarcely supply."

[926] Burton. p. 54, f: "Lib. 7. Septuaginta olim legiones scriptæ dicuntur: quas vires hodie, &c." Editor: "Book 7. Seventy legions are said to have been enrolled formerly: what forces today, etc." Compare Livy 7.25.8–9: he reports ten legions, not seventy, and contrasts that levy with the difficulty of raising a new army in his own day. Burton's larger number is retained in both text and note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 54–55 Alexander built 70 cities in a short space for his part, our Sultans and Turks demolish twice as many, and leave all desolate. Many will not beleeve but that our Iland of Great Britain is now more populous then ever it was; yet let them read Bede, Leland, and others, they shall finde it most flourished in the Saxon Heptarchy, and in the Conquerors time was far better inhabited, then at this present. See that Domesday-Book, and shew me those thousands of Parishes, which are now decayed, cities ruined, Villages depopulated, &c.	Alexander, for his part, built 70 cities in a short time; the sultans and Turks of our day demolish twice as many and leave everything desolate. Many insist that our island of Great Britain is more populous now than ever. Yet let them read Bede, Leland, and others: they will find that it flourished most under the Saxon Heptarchy and was much more densely inhabited in the Conqueror's time than now. Look at Domesday Book and show me those thousands of parishes now decayed, those ruined cities and depopulated villages.[927]
Source page 55 The lesser the Territory is, commonly the riches it is. Parvus sed bene cultus ager. As those Athenian, Lacedæmonian, Arcadian, Aelian, Sycionian, Messenian, &c. Common-wealths of Greece make ample proof, as those Imperial Cities, and free States of Germany may witnesse, those Cantons of Switzers, Rheti, Grisons, Walloons, Territories of Tuscanie, Luke and Senes of old, Piedmont, Mantua, Venice in Italy, Raguse, &c.	The smaller the territory, generally the richer it is: "a small but well-cultivated field." The Greek commonwealths of Athens, Sparta, Arcadia, Elis, Sicyon, Messenia, and the rest give ample proof. So do Germany's imperial cities and free states; the cantons of the Swiss, Rhaetians, Grisons, and Walloons; the territories of Tuscany, Lucca, and Siena in former times; Piedmont, Mantua, and Venice in Italy; Ragusa, and others.[928]

[927] Editor. "Heptarchy" is the conventional grouping of seven early English kingdoms; "the Conqueror" is William I. Domesday Book records the survey made in 1086. Burton's claim that Britain was then more densely inhabited is an argument requiring scrutiny, not a conclusion established by naming that survey.

[928] Editor. The printed "riches" is understood as "richest." "Luke" and "Senes" are Lucca and Siena; Ragusa is Dubrovnik. Burton's mixed list of peoples, cities, regions, and states is retained, including the awkward grouping of "Walloons" with cantons; it is not silently regularised into a modern political map.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That Prince therefore as, [929]Boterus adviseth, that will have a rich Countrey, and fair Cities, let him get good Trades, Priviledges, painfull inhabitants, Artificers, and suffer no rude Matter unwrought, as tin, Iron, Wool, Lead, &c. to be transported out of his Country. [930]A thing in part seriously attempted amongst us, but not effected.	Therefore, as Botero advises, a prince who wants a wealthy country and fine cities should secure good trades, privileges, hardworking inhabitants, and skilled craftspeople. He should allow no unworked raw material—tin, iron, wool, lead, and so on—to be exported from his country. This has been seriously attempted here in part, but not carried through.
And because industry of men, and multitude of Trade so much avails to the ornament and enriching of a Kingdom; Those ancient [931]Massilians would admit no man into their city that had not some Trade. Selym the first Turkish Emperor procured a thousand good Artificers to be brought from Tauris to Constantinople.	Because human industry and abundant trade do so much to adorn and enrich a kingdom, the ancient people of Massilia would admit no one into their city who had no trade. Selim I, the Turkish emperor, had a thousand skilled craftspeople brought from Tabriz to Constantinople.[932]

[929] Burton. p. 55, g: “Polit. l. 3. c. 8.” Editor: Botero’s political writings, book 3, chapter 8; precise passage uncollated.

[930] Burton. p. 55, h: “For dying of cloaths, and dressing, &c.” Editor: Dyeing and finishing cloth. The particular English policy is not named.

[931] Burton. p. 55, i: “Valer. l. 2. c. 1.” Editor: Valerius Maximus, book 2, chapter 1, as printed. The closer parallel is 2.6.7, which says Massilia shut its gates to people supporting idleness by a pretence of religion. Burton broadens this into a rule excluding everyone without a trade; the printed chapter reference is retained.

[932] Editor. Massilia is Marseille; Tauris is Tabriz. “Selym the first Turkish Emperor” is understood as “Selim I, the Turkish emperor,” not as a claim that Selim founded the Ottoman dynasty. The reported number of transplanted craftspeople remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Polanders indented with Henry Duke of Anjou, their new chosen King, to bring with him an hundred Families of Artificers into Poland. James the first in Scotland (as [933]Buchanan writes) sent for the best Artificers he could get in Europe, and gave them great rewards to teach his Subjects their severall Trades. Edward the third, our most renowned King to his eternal memory, brought clothing first into this Iland, transporting some families of Artificers from Gaunt hither.	The Poles made a contract with Henry, duke of Anjou, their newly elected king, requiring him to bring a hundred families of craftspeople into Poland. James I of Scotland, as Buchanan writes, sent for the best craftspeople he could find in Europe and gave them generous rewards to teach his subjects their various trades. Edward III, our most renowned king—may his memory endure for ever—first brought cloth manufacture to this island by bringing over some families of craftspeople from Ghent.[934]
How many goodly cities could I reckon up, that thrive wholly by Trade, where thousands of Inhabitants live singular wel by their fingers ends: As Florence in Italy by making cloth of Gold; great Millan by Silke, and all curious Wroks; Arras in Artois by those fair Hangings; many cities in Spain, many in France, Germany, have none other maintenance, especially those within the Land.	How many splendid cities I could name that thrive entirely through trade, where thousands of inhabitants make an excellent living by the work of their fingers: Florence in Italy by making cloth of gold; great Milan by silk and all kinds of fine craftsmanship; Arras in Artois by its beautiful tapestries. Many cities in Spain, France, and Germany have no other livelihood, especially those inland.
[935]Mecha in Arabia Petræa, stands in a most unfruitfull country, that wants water, amongst the Rocks (as Vertomannus describes it) and yet it is a most elegant and pleasant city, by reason of the traffick of the East and West. Ormus in Persia is a most famous Mart-Town, hath nought else but the opportunity of the haven to make it flourish.	Mecca in Arabia Petraea stands among rocks in a most barren country that lacks water, as Varthema describes it; yet it is a beautiful and pleasant city because of trade between East and West. Hormuz in Persia is a celebrated trading town: nothing but its conveniently placed harbour makes it flourish.[936]

[933] Burton. p. 55, k: “Hist. Scot. lib. 10. Magnis propositis præmiis, ut Scoti ab iis edocerentur.” Editor: Buchanan, History of Scotland, book 10: “Great rewards were offered so that the Scots might be taught by them.” Exact passage uncollated.

[934] Editor. “Indented” means contracted by indenture. This James I is the fifteenth-century Scottish king, distinct from James VI and I praised earlier. “Clothing” means cloth manufacture. Burton credits Edward III with its first introduction; the wording is preserved as his historical claim, not silently turned into a claim merely of expansion.

[935] Burton. p. 55, l: “Munst. cosm. l. 5. c. 74. Agro omnium rerum infœcundissimo aqua indigente inter saxeta, urbs tamen elegantissima, ob Orientis negotiationes & Occidentis.” Editor: Münster, Cosmography, book 5, chapter 74: “In land barren of everything, lacking water, among rocks, yet a most beautiful city because of the commerce of East and West.” Exact passage uncollated.

[936] Editor. Mecca is in the Hejaz; Burton’s “Arabia Petraea” is retained rather than silently corrected. Varthema is the traveller Ludovico di Varthema. “Opportunity” here means a favourable situation, especially access for shipping.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Corinth a noble city (Lumen Græciæ, Tully calls it) the Eye of Greece, by reason of Cenchreas and Lecheus, those excellent Ports, drew all that traffick of the Ionian and Ægean seas to it; & yet the country about it was curva & superciliosa, as [937]Strabo terms it, rugged and harsh. We may say the same of Athens, Actium, Thebes, Sparta, and most of those towns in Greece.	Corinth, a noble city—Cicero calls it "the light of Greece," the eye of Greece—drew all that traffic of the Ionian and Aegean seas to itself through its excellent ports, Cenchreae and Lechaeum. Yet the surrounding country was "uneven and beetling," as Strabo describes it, rugged and harsh. We may say the same of Athens, Actium, Thebes, Sparta, and most Greek towns.[938]
Noremberg in Germany is sited in a most Barren soil, yet a noble Imperial city, by the sole industry of Artificers, and cunning Trades, they draw the riches of most countries to them, so expert in Manufactures, that as Salust long since gave out of the like, Sedem animæ in extremis digitis habent, their soul, or intellectus agens, was placed in their fingers ends; & so we may say of Basil, Spire, Cambray, Francfurt, &c.	Nuremberg in Germany stands on very barren soil, yet it is a noble imperial city. Through the industry of its craftspeople and their skilled trades alone, its people draw the wealth of most countries to themselves. They are so expert in manufacture that, as Sallust said long ago of others like them, "the seat of their soul is in their fingertips": their soul, or "active intellect," was lodged in the ends of their fingers. We may say the same of Basel, Speyer, Cambrai, Frankfurt, and others.[939]

[937] Burton. p. 55, m: "Lib. 8. Geogr. ob asperum situm." Editor: "Geography, book 8: because of its rough situation." Strabo 8.6.20 and 23 contrasts Corinth's rocky, uneven territory with the commercial advantages of its two harbours; Burton gives Latin wording rather than Strabo's Greek.

[938] Editor. Cicero, On Pompey's Command 11, calls Corinth "the light of all Greece"; Burton renders lumen as "Eye." Both the literal translation and his English restatement appear here. Strabo 8.6.20 and 23 discusses its two ports and uneven, rocky land.

[939] Editor. "Intellectus agens" is "active intellect," a philosophical term for the mind's active power of understanding. Burton turns it into a joke about practical skill. His attribution of the fingertip saying to Sallust has not been located and remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 55–56 It is almost incredible to speak what some write of Mexico, and the Cities adjoyning to it, no place in the world at their first discovery more populous. [940]Mat. Riccius the Jesuite and some others, relate of the industry of the Chinaes most populous countreys, not a begger, or an idle person to be seen, and how by that means they prosper and flourish.	What some writers report of Mexico and its neighbouring cities is almost incredible: at the time of their first discovery, no place in the world was more populous. Matteo Ricci the Jesuit and others describe the industry of the Chinese in their densely populated country: not a beggar or an idle person to be seen, and how, by these means, they prosper and flourish.[941]
Source page 56 We have the same means, able bodies, pliant wits, matter of all sorts, Wool, Flax, Iron, Tin, Lead, Wood, &c. many excellent subjects to work upon, only industry is wanting. We send our best commodities beyond the seas, which they make good use of to their necessities, set themselves a work about, and severally improve, sending the same to us back at dear rates, or else make toyes and bables of the Tails of them, which they sell to us again, at as great a reckoning as they bought the whole.	We have the same resources: able bodies, adaptable minds, and materials of every kind—wool, flax, iron, tin, lead, timber, and so on—plenty of excellent things to work on. Only industry is lacking. We send our best commodities overseas, where people put them to good use for their needs, set to work on them, and improve each in its own way, then send them back to us at high prices. Or they make toys and trinkets from the scraps and sell these back to us for as much as they paid for the whole.
In most of our cities, some few excepted, like [942]Spanish loyterers, we live wholly by Tipling-Inns and Ale-houses; Malting are their best ploughs, their greatest traffick to sell ale.	In most of our cities, with a few exceptions, we live entirely by drinking inns and alehouses, like Spanish idlers. Malt-making is their most profitable “plough”; their chief trade is selling ale.[943]

[940] Burton. p. 55, n: “Lib. Edit. à Nic. Tregant. Belg. A. 1616. expedit. in Sinas.” Editor: A book issued by Nicolas Trigault, a Belgian, in 1616, on the mission to China: De Christiana expeditione apud Sinas, based on Matteo Ricci’s account. A 1616 Lyon edition is bibliographically confirmed. The printed “Tregant.” is retained; this exact statement on begging has not been collated.

[941] Editor. “First discovery” describes European encounter with Mexico, not the beginning of its inhabitants’ knowledge of their own cities. Burton uses reports of Mexico and China to argue for productive labour; the sweeping claim that no beggars could be seen in China remains an attributed report.

[942] Burton. p. 56, o: “Ubi nobiles probri loco habent artem aliquam profiteri. Cleonard. ep. l. 1.” Editor: “Where nobles regard practising any trade as a disgrace.” Clenardus, Letters, book 1; exact letter unlocated.

[943] Editor. Malting prepares grain for brewing. “Ploughs” figuratively means a means of earning a living: Burton complains that brewing and drinking dominate urban employment. His national generalisations about Spaniards and English workers remain his polemic.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[944]Meteran and some other object to us, that we are no whit so industrious as the Hollanders: Manual trades (saith he) which are more curious or troublesome, are wholly exercised by strangers: they dwell in a Sea full of Fish, but they are so idle, they will not catch so much as shall serve their own turns, but buy it of their neighbors. Tush [945]Mare liberum, they fish under our noses, and sell it to us when they have done, at their own prices.	Meteren and others reproach us for being nowhere near as industrious as the Dutch. "The more intricate or laborious manual trades," he says, "are practised entirely by foreigners. They live in a sea full of fish, yet are so idle that they will not catch enough for their own needs, but buy it from their neighbours." Bah, "the free sea"! They fish under our noses, then sell us the catch at their own prices.
— Pudet hæc opprobria nobis Et dici potuisse, & non potuisse refelli. I am ashamed to hear this objected by strangers, and know not how to answer it.	"It shames us that these reproaches could be made And could not be refuted."[946] I am ashamed to hear foreigners bring this charge against us, and I do not know how to answer it.

[944] Burton. p. 56, p: "Lib. 13. Belg. Hist. non tam laboriosi ut Belgæ, sed ut Hispani otiatores vitam utplurimum otiosam agentes: artes manuariæ quæ plurimum habent in se laboris & difficultatis, majoremque requirunt industriam, à peregrinis & exteris exercentur; habitant in piscosissimo mari, interea tantum non piscantur quantum insulæ sufficeret sed à vicinis emere coguntur." Editor: Meteren, Belgian History, book 13: "Not as industrious as the Belgians, but idlers like the Spaniards, generally leading an idle life; manual trades involving much labour and difficulty and requiring greater industry are practised by strangers and foreigners. They live in a sea teeming with fish, yet do not catch enough for the island and are obliged to buy from their neighbours." Exact edition and passage uncollated; "Belgians" here refers broadly to the Low Countries.

[945] Burton. p. 56, q: "Grotii Liber." Editor: "Grotius's book": Mare liberum, The Free Sea, published in 1609, arguing for freedom of navigation and commerce. Burton invokes its title in his complaint about Dutch fishing.

[946] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.758–759. Phaethon is ashamed that Epaphus's taunts about his parentage went unanswered. Burton applies the couplet to criticism of England, then supplies his own English restatement; both are retained on the modern side.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Amongst our Towns, there is only [947]London that bears the face of a City, [948]Epitome Britanniae, a famous Emporium, second to none beyond Seas, a noble Mart: But sola crescit, decrescentibus aliis; and yet in my slender judgement, defective in many things.	Among our towns, London alone has the appearance of a city: "Britain in miniature," a famous centre of commerce, second to none overseas, a noble marketplace. But "she alone grows while the others decline"; and even she, in my humble judgement, is deficient in many things.
The rest ([949]some few excepted) are in mean estate, ruinous most part, poor and full of beggers, by reason of their decayed trades, neglected or bad policy, idlenesse of their Inhabitants, riot, which had rather beg or loyter, and be ready to starve, then work.	The rest, with a few exceptions, are in a sorry condition, mostly dilapidated, poor, and full of beggars. Their trades have declined; their government is neglectful or bad; their inhabitants are idle and dissolute, preferring to beg or loiter, and verge on starvation, rather than work.[950]

[947] Burton. p. 56, r: "Urbs animis numeroque potens, & robore gentis. Scaliger." Editor: "A city powerful in spirit, in numbers, and in the strength of its people." Attributed to Scaliger; the precise passage remains unlocated.

[948] Burton. p. 56, s: "Camden." Editor: William Camden is cited for the description of London as Britain in miniature; no work or section is specified.

[949] Burton. p. 56, t: "York, Bristow, Norwich, Worcester, &c." Editor: "Bristow" is Bristol.

[950] Editor. "Riot" here means extravagant or dissolute living, rather than a public disturbance. Burton places blame on government and economic decline as well as on the poor, whom he repeatedly portrays as idle.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I cannot deny but that something may be said in defence of our Cities, [951]that they are not so fair built, (for the sole magnificence of this Kingdom (concerning buildings) hath been of old in those Norman Castles and Religious Houses) so rich, thick sited, populous, as in some other countries; besides the reasons Cardan gives, Subtil. Lib. 11. we want Wine and Oyl, their two Harvests, we dwell in a colder Air, and for that cause must a little more liberally [952]feed of Flesh, as all Northern Countries do: Our provision will not therefore extend to the maintenance of so many:	I cannot deny that something can be said in defence of our cities for being less finely built, less wealthy, less closely spaced, and less populous than those in some other countries. For in earlier times this kingdom's architectural splendour was confined to its Norman castles and religious houses. Besides the reasons Cardan gives in On Subtlety, Book 11, we lack wine and oil, their two harvests; we live in a colder climate and must therefore eat somewhat more meat, as all northern countries do. Our food supply will consequently not support so many people.
yet notwithstanding we have matter of all sorts, an open sea for traffick, as well as the rest, goodly Havens. And how can we excuse our negligence, our riot, drunkennesse, &c. and such enormities that follow it? We have excellent laws enacted, you will say, severe statutes, houses of correction, &c. to small purpose it seems, it is not houses will serve, but cities of correction, [953]our trades generally ought to be reformed, wants supplied.	Yet we have raw materials of every kind, an open sea for trade as others do, and fine harbours. How can we excuse our negligence, our excesses and drunkenness, and all the abuses that follow? We have passed excellent laws, you will say: strict statutes, houses of correction, and so forth. To little purpose, it seems. Houses will not be enough: we need cities of correction. Our trades as a whole should be reformed and their deficiencies supplied.[954]

[951] Burton. p. 56, u: "M. Gainsfords Argument: Because Gentlemen dwell with us in the Country villages, our Cities are lesse, is nothing to the purpose: put three hundred or four hundred villages in a Shire, and every village yeeld a Gentleman, what is four hundred families to encrease one of our Cities, or to contend with theirs, which stand thicker? And whereas ours usually consists of seven thousand, theirs consists of forty thousand inhabitants." Editor: Burton rejects Gainsford's explanation that English gentlemen's rural residence accounts for smaller cities. The comparative totals remain his claims.

[952] Burton. p. 56, x: "Maxima pars victus in carne consistit. Polyd. Lib. 1. Hist." Editor: "The greatest part of their food consists of meat." Polydore Vergil, History, Book 1; the exact passage is not yet collated.

[953] Burton. p. 56, y: "Refrænate monopolii licentiam, pauciores alantur otio, redintegretur agricolatio, lanificium instauretur, ut sit honestum negotium quo se exerceat otiosa illa turba. Nisi his malis medentur, frustra exercent justitiam. Mor. Utop. Lib. 1." Editor: "Restrain the licence of monopoly; let fewer be maintained in idleness; restore farming and revive wool-working, so that the idle multitude may have an honest occupation. Unless they remedy these evils, they administer justice in vain." An abridgement and adaptation of More's Utopia, Book 1, in the discussion of theft and punishment.

[954] Editor. Houses of correction combined confinement with compulsory work. The change from houses to whole cities is satirical exaggeration. More's marginal passage stresses the creation of livelihoods before the punishment of theft.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 56–57 In other countries they have the same grievances, I confesse, but that doth not excuse us, [955]wants, defects, enormities, idle drones, tumults, discords, contention, Law-suits, many Laws made against them to represse those innumerable brawls and Law-suits, excesse in Apparel, Diet, decay of Tillage, Depopulations, [956]especially against Rogues, Beggars, Ægyptian vagabonds (so termed at least) which have [957]swarmed all over Germany, France, Italy, Poland, as you may reade in [958]Munster, Cranzius, and Aventinus; as those Tartars and Arabians at this day do in the Eastern countries:	Other countries have the same grievances, I admit, but that does not excuse us: shortages, defects, abuses, idle drones, riots, discord, disputes, lawsuits. Many laws have been made to suppress those countless brawls and lawsuits, extravagance in dress and food, the decline of tillage, and depopulation; especially laws against rogues, beggars, and “Egyptian” vagabonds—so called, at least—who have swarmed throughout Germany, France, Italy, and Poland, as you may read in Münster, Krantz, and Aventinus, just as those Tartars and Arabs do today in the eastern countries.[959]

[955] Burton. p. 56, z: “Mancipiis locuples eget æris Cappadocum rex. Hor.” Editor: “The king of the Cappadocians, rich in slaves, lacks money.” Horace, Epistles 1.6.39. Wealth of one kind may coexist with poverty of another.

[956] Burton. p. 57, *: “Regis dignitatis non est exercere imperium in mendicos sed in opulentos. Non est regni secus, sed carceris esse custos. Idem.” Editor: In sense: “Royal dignity consists in ruling prosperous people, not beggars. This is to be a prison’s keeper, not a kingdom’s.” The reference is again to More, Utopia, Book 1. The irregular printed “regni secus” is retained; the translation follows the contrast made in the located passage, which reads “hoc non est regni, sed carceris esse custodem.”

[957] Burton. p. 57, a: “Colluvies hominum mirabiles excocti solo, immundi vestes fœdi visu, furti imprimis acres, &c.” Editor: Approximately, allowing for the irregular Latin: “A motley rabble of people, strange, sun-scorched, dirty in dress, foul to look at, particularly eager for theft, and so on.” “Solo” is printed where the sense suggests “sole,” by the sun. This hostile description is preserved as Burton’s marginal quotation; its precise source remains unlocated.

[958] Burton. p. 57, b: “Cosmog. l. 3. cap. 5.” Editor: Münster’s Cosmographia, Book 3, chapter 5. The cited edition and passage remain to be checked.

[959] Editor. “Egyptians” was an early modern name for Roma, based on an erroneous association with Egypt. The contemptuous generalisations in the text and margin are Burton’s. “Tartars” is his broad historical label for northern and central Asian peoples.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 57 Yet such hath been the iniquity of all ages, as it seems to small purpose. Nemo in nostrâ civitate mendicus esto, saith Plato, he will have them purged from a [960]Common-wealth, [961]as a bad humor from the body, that are like so many Ulcers and Boils, and must be cured before the Melancholy body can be eased.	Yet wrongdoing has been so great in every age that these measures seem to achieve little. “Let there be no beggar in our state,” says Plato. He would have them purged from a commonwealth, like a corrupt humour from the body: they are like so many ulcers and boils, which must be cured before the melancholy body can find relief.[962]
What Carolus Magnus, the Chinese, the Spaniards, the Duke of Saxony, and many other states have decreed in this case, reade Arniseus cap. 19. Boterus libro 8. cap. 2. Osorius de Rebus gest. Eman. lib. 11. When a countrey is over-stored with people, as a pasture is oft overlaid with cattle, they had wont in former times to disburden themselves, by sending out colonies, or by wars, as those old Romans, or by employing them at home about some publike buildings, as Bridges, Rode-waies, for which those Romans were famous in this Iland:	For the measures taken in this matter by Charlemagne, the Chinese, the Spaniards, the Duke of Saxony, and many other states, read Arnisaeus, chapter 19; Botero, Book 8, chapter 2; and Osório, The Deeds of King Manuel, Book 11. When a country has too many people, as a pasture often has too many cattle, it used in former times to relieve itself by sending out colonies or by wars, like the ancient Romans; or by employing people at home on public works, such as bridges and roads, for which those Romans were famous on this island.

[960] Burton. p. 57, c: “Seneca. Haud minus turpia principi multa supplicia, quàm medico multa funera.” Editor: “Many punishments are no less shameful to a ruler than many funerals to a physician.” Compare Seneca, On Clemency 1.24.1; Burton slightly changes the wording.

[961] Burton. p. 57, d: “Ac pituitam & bilem a corpore (11. de leg.) omnes vult exterminari.” Editor: “He wishes them all expelled, like phlegm and bile from the body (Laws, Book 11).” Plato, Laws 936c, orders beggars expelled; the explicit comparison with bodily humours belongs to Burton’s presentation.

[962] Editor. Burton extends his medical analogy to the state, representing people who beg as pathological matter to be expelled. Plato’s Laws 936b–c first assumes that a reasonably governed state would not let a virtuous person fall into destitution; Burton compresses that argument into a purge.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As Augustus Cæsar did in Rome, the Spaniards in their Indian Mines, as at Potosa in Peru, where some 30000 men are still at work, 6000 Furnaces ever boyling, &c. [963]Aqueducts, Bridges, Havens, those stupend works of Trajan, Claudius at [964]Ostium, Dioclesiani Thermæ, Fucinus Lacus, that Pireum in Athens, made by Themistocles, Ampitheatrums of curious Marble, as at Verona, Civitas Philippi, and Heraclea in Thrace, those Appian and Flaminian wayes, prodigious works all may witnesse;	as Augustus Caesar did at Rome, and the Spaniards in their mines in the Indies, for example at Potosí in Peru, where some 30,000 men are continually at work and 6,000 furnaces constantly blaze. Aqueducts, bridges, harbours, those astonishing works of Trajan, Claudius's at Ostia, the Baths of Diocletian, Lake Fucinus, the Piraeus at Athens built by Themistocles, amphitheatres of finely worked marble at Verona, Philippi, and Heraclea in Thrace, and the Appian and Flaminian Ways—all these prodigious works bear witness.[965]
And rather then they should be [966]idle, as those [967]Ægyptian Pharaohs, Mæris and Sesostris did, to task their subjects to build unnecessary Pyramides, Obelisks, Labyrinths, Chanels, Lakes, Gigantian works all, to divert them from Rebellion, Riot, Drunkennesse, [968]Quo scilicet alantur, & ne vagando laborare desuescant.	And rather than let them remain idle, rulers should act as those Egyptian pharaohs, Moeris and Sesostris, did: set their subjects to build unnecessary pyramids, obelisks, labyrinths, canals, and lakes, all gigantic works, to turn them away from rebellion, dissipation, and drunkenness—"so that they may be fed and may not, through wandering about, lose the habit of work."

[963] Burton. p. 57, e: "See Lipsius Admiranda." Editor: Justus Lipsius's Admiranda, on the greatness of Rome. No particular passage is specified.

[964] Burton. p. 57, f: "De quo Suet. in Claudio, & Plinius c. 36." Editor: "On which, Suetonius in Claudius, and Pliny, c. 36." Suetonius, Claudius 20, describes the harbour at Ostia and the drainage of Lake Fucinus. Burton's Pliny reference is retained in its abbreviated form.

[965] Editor. Potosí is in present-day Bolivia, then part of Spanish Peru. Burton presents its mines as a model of employment and does not discuss their coercive labour system. His workforce and furnace totals are reproduced as reported figures. "Fucinus Lacus" refers to the drainage works at Lake Fucinus.

[966] Burton. p. 57, g: "Ut egestati simul & ignaviæ occurratur, opificia condiscantur, tenues subleventur. Bodin. l. 6. c. 2. num. 6, 7." Editor: "To counter both poverty and idleness, let trades be learned and the poor supported." Jean Bodin, Book 6, chapter 2, sections 6–7; edition and wording not yet collated.

[967] Burton. p. 57, h: "Amasis Ægypti Rex legem promulgavit, ut omnes subditi quotannis rationem redderent unde viverent." Editor: "Amasis, king of Egypt, issued a law that every subject should give a yearly account of how he earned his living." Compare Herodotus 2.177. This note introduces Amasis, distinct from the pharaohs named in the body.

[968] Burton. p. 57, i: "Buscoldus discursu polit. cap. 2." Editor: A political discourse, chapter 2; the author is probably Christoph Besold. The printed name and abbreviation are retained; the exact work and passage remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Another eye-sore is that want of conduct and navigable rivers, a great blemish as [969]Boterus, [970]Hippolitus a Collibus, and other Politicians hold, if it be neglected in a Common wealth. Admirable cost and charge is bestowed in the Low-Countries on this behalf, in the Dutchy of Millan, Territory of Padua in [971]France, Italy, China, and so likewise about corrivations of Waters to moisten and refresh barren Grounds, to drean Fens, Bogs, and Moors.	Another eyesore is the lack of water channels and navigable rivers: political writers such as Botero and Hippolytus a Collibus consider neglect of these a serious defect in a commonwealth. Astonishing sums are spent on them in the Low Countries, the Duchy of Milan, the territory of Padua, in France, Italy, and China; likewise on diverting water to irrigate and refresh barren land, and to drain fens, bogs, and marshes.[972]
Massinissa made many inward parts of Barbarie, and Numidia in Africk before his time incult and horrid, fruitful and bearable by this means. Great industry is generally used all over the Eastern Countries in this kinde, especially in Ægypt, about Babylon and Damascus, as Vertomannus and [973]Gotardus Arthus relate; about Barcelona, Segovia, Murtia, and many other places of Spain, Millan in Italy, by reason of which, their Soil is much impoverished, and infinite commodities arise to the Inhabitants.	By these means Masinissa made many inland parts of Barbary and Numidia in Africa fruitful and productive, where before his time they had been uncultivated and forbidding. Great efforts of this kind are made throughout the eastern countries, especially in Egypt, around Babylon and Damascus, as Varthema and Gotthard Arthus report; around Barcelona, Segovia, Murcia, and many other places in Spain, and Milan in Italy. As a result their soil is greatly enriched, and countless benefits accrue to the inhabitants.[974]

[969] Burton. p. 57, k: “Lib. 1. de increm. Urb. cap. 6.” Editor: Botero, On the Growth of Cities, Book 1, chapter 6; precise edition and wording uncollated.

[970] Burton. p. 57, l: “Cap. 5. de increm urb. Quas flumen, lacus, aut mare alluit.” Editor: “Chapter 5, on the growth of cities: those which a river, lake, or sea washes.” The anchor stands at Hippolytus a Collibus in the body; the abbreviated title resembles the adjacent Botero reference. Its exact attribution needs collation.

[971] Burton. p. 57, m: “Incredibilem commoditatem, vecturâ mercium tres fluvii navigabiles, &c. Boterus de Gallia.” Editor: In sense: “Three navigable rivers provide an extraordinary advantage in transporting goods, and so on. Botero on France.” The printed Latin is elliptical.

[972] Editor. “Conduct” and “corrivations” concern the channeling and diversion of water. The modern punctuation separates the territory of Padua from France; Burton is listing several regions, not placing Padua in France.

[973] Burton. p. 57, n: “Herodotus.” Editor: This anchor is printed at Gotardus Arthus, although the citation more naturally supports the following account of an Egyptian canal. The n and o references appear exchanged; their printed attachments are retained.

[974] Editor. The 1651 text plainly reads “impoverished,” although the argument concerns irrigation making land productive. The modern column reads “enriched” as the apparent intended sense; the original reading is preserved for collation. “Bearable” here means capable of bearing crops.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 57–58 The Turks of late attempted to cut that Istmos betwixt Africk and Asia, which [975]Sesostris and Darius, and some Pharaohs of Ægypt had formerly undertaken, but with ill successe, as [976]Diodorus Siculus records, and Pliny, for that Red-sea being three [977]cubits higher then Ægypt, would have drowned all the country, cœpto destiterant, they left off; yet as the same [978]Diodorus writes, Ptolomy renewed the work many years after, and absolved it in a more opportune place.	The Turks recently attempted to cut through the isthmus between Africa and Asia. Sesostris, Darius, and some of the pharaohs of Egypt had undertaken this before, but unsuccessfully, as Diodorus Siculus and Pliny record. For the Red Sea, being three cubits higher than Egypt, would have flooded the whole country: “they abandoned the undertaking,” they left off. Yet, as the same Diodorus writes, Ptolemy resumed the work many years later and completed it at a more suitable place.[979]

[975] Burton. p. 57, o: “Ind. Orient. cap. 2. Rotam in medio flumine constituunt, cui ex pellibus animalium consutos uteres appendant, hi dum rota movetur, aquam per canales, &c.” Editor: “East Indies, chapter 2. They set a wheel in the middle of the river, to which they hang bags sewn from animal skins; while the wheel turns, these [convey] water through channels, and so on.” Printed at Sesostris; its irrigation apparatus suits the preceding Arthus reference. See the note on n.

[976] Burton. p. 57, p: “Centum pedes lata fossa 30. alta.” Editor: “A trench a hundred feet wide and thirty deep.” The scan reads 30. These dimensions are retained as Burton’s report.

[977] Burton. p. 58, q: “Contrary to [that] of Archimedes, who holds the superficies of all waters even.” Editor: “Superficies” means surfaces. The faded word “that” is supplied with support from the Penguin transcription of this note. Burton himself questions the claim about unequal water levels; this is not a modern endorsement of the ancient canal account.

[978] Burton. p. 58, r: “Lib. 1. cap. 3.” Editor: The relevant account is Diodorus Siculus 1.33.8–12 in modern numbering: a canal from the Nile towards the Red Sea, and Ptolemy II’s completion of it with a device controlling the passage of water.

[979] Editor. This is the ancient Nile–Red Sea canal tradition, not the modern Suez Canal. Diodorus 1.33.8–12 attributes its beginning to Necho, its interruption to Darius’s fear of flooding Egypt, and its completion to Ptolemy II. Burton combines authorities; his chronology and water-level figures are historical reports.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 58 That Istmos of Corinth was likewise undertaken to be made navigable by Demetrius, by Julius Cæsar, Nero, Domitian, Herodes Atticus, to make a speedy [980]passage, and lesse dangerous, from the Ionian and Ægean seas; but because it could not be so well effected, the Peloponesians built a wall like our Pict's wall about Schænute, where Neptunes Temple stood, and in the shortest cut over the Istmos, of which Diodorus lib. 11. Herodotus lib. 8. Vran.	Demetrius, Julius Caesar, Nero, Domitian, and Herodes Atticus likewise attempted to make the Isthmus of Corinth navigable, to provide a quicker and less dangerous passage between the Ionian and Aegean seas. But as this could not readily be done, the Peloponnesians built a wall like our Picts' Wall near Schoenus, where Neptune's temple stood, across the narrowest part of the isthmus. Diodorus mentions it in Book 11, and Herodotus in Book 8, Urania.[981]
Our latter writers call it Hexamilium, which Amurath the Turk demolished, the Venetians anno 1453. repaired in 15 daies with 30000 men. Some, saith Acosta, would have a passage cut from Panama to Nombre de Dios in America, but Thuanus & Serres the French historians speak of a famous Aqueduct in France, intended in Henry the fourths time, from the Loyr to the Seine, and from Rodanus to Loyr.	Our more recent writers call it the Hexamilion. Murad the Turk demolished it; the Venetians repaired it in 1453, in fifteen days, with 30,000 men. Some people, says Acosta, would have a passage cut from Panama to Nombre de Dios in America. The French historians de Thou and de Serres, meanwhile, speak of a remarkable waterway planned in France under Henry IV, from the Loire to the Seine and from the Rhône to the Loire.
The like to which, was formerly assayed by Domitian the Emperor, [982]from Arar to Mosella, which Cornelius Tacitus speaks of in the 13 of his Annals, after by Charls the great and others.	A similar scheme, from the Saône to the Moselle, had previously been attempted by the emperor Domitian, as Cornelius Tacitus relates in Book 13 of his Annals, and afterwards by Charlemagne and others.[983]

[980] Burton. p. 58, a: "Dion. Pausanias, & Nic. Gerbelius. Munster. Cosm. lib. 4. cap. 36. Ut brevior foret navigatio & minus periculosa." Editor: "Dio, Pausanias, and Nicolaus Gerbelius. Münster, Cosmographia, Book 4, chapter 36. So that the voyage might be shorter and less dangerous." These abbreviated references remain to be collated.

[981] Editor. "Pict's wall" invokes the ancient northern British frontier wall as a comparison. Hexamilion means "six-mile" wall. The proposed Corinthian canal and the defensive wall are different works: Burton's sequence is not a secure chronology of either. His date and labour total in the following passage remain unverified.

[982] Burton. p. 58, b: "Charles the great went about to make a chanel from Rhine to Danubius. Bil. Pirki-merus descript. Ger. the ruines are yet seen about Wessenberg, from Red-nich to Alti-mul. Ut navigabilia inter se Occidentis & Septentrionis littora fierent" Editor: The final Latin means "so that the western and northern coasts might become accessible to one another by water." The reference is to Willibald Pirckheimer's description of Germany. Burton's forms of the place names and the hyphenated names are retained.

[983] Editor. Tacitus, Annals 13.53, places the Saône–Moselle scheme under Nero and attributes it to Lucius Vetus, not Domitian. Both columns preserve Burton's attribution. "Arar" is the Saône; "Mosella" the Moselle.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Much cost hath in former times been bestowed in either new making or mending chanels of rivers, and their passages, (as Aurelianus did by Tybur to make it navigable to Rome, to convey corn from Ægypt to the city, vadum alvei tumentis effodit saith Vopiscus, & Tyburis ripas extruxit, he cut fords, made banks, &c.) decayed havens, which Claudius the Emperor with infinite pains and charges attempted at Ostia, as I have said, The Venetians at this day to preserve their City;	In former times great sums were spent on cutting or repairing river channels and passages. Aurelian did this on the Tiber, making it navigable to Rome to bring grain from Egypt to the city: "he dug out the shallows of its rising bed," says Vopiscus, "and built up the banks of the Tiber"; he deepened fords, built banks, and so on. Dilapidated harbours were also restored, as the emperor Claudius attempted at Ostia with immense effort and expense, as I have said, and as the Venetians do today to preserve their city.[984]

[984] Editor. Compare the Historia Augusta, Aurelian 47.3, traditionally attributed to Vopiscus. It describes deepening the Tiber's bed and strengthening its banks for the grain supply. "Tybur" and "Tyburis" here refer to the Tiber, not the town of Tibur; the modern column makes the river explicit. Burton's Latin and his English restatement are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
many excellent means to enrich their Territories, have been fostered, invented in most Provinces of Europe, as planting some Indian plants amongst us, Silk-worms, [985]the very Mulberry leaves in the Plaines of Granado, yeeld 30000 crowns per annum to the King of Spains coffers, besides those many trades and artificers that are busied about them in the kingdom of Granado, Murcia, and all over Spain. In France a great benefit is raised by salt, &c.	In most regions of Europe, many excellent ways of enriching their territories have been encouraged and devised: introducing plants from the Indies among us, for example, and silkworms. The mulberry leaves alone on the plains of Granada bring 30,000 crowns a year into the King of Spain's treasury, besides supporting the many trades and craftspeople employed in this work in the kingdom of Granada, Murcia, and throughout Spain. In France, salt brings in a great revenue, and so forth.
whether these things might not be as happily attempted with us, and with like successe, it may be controverted, Silk-worms (I mean) Vines, Fir trees, &c. Cardan exhorts Edward the sixth to plant Olives, and is fully perswaded they would prosper in this Iland.	Whether such things might be undertaken as successfully here is open to debate: silkworms, I mean, vines, fir trees, and so on. Cardan urges Edward VI to plant olives, and is fully persuaded that they would thrive on this island.
With us, navigable rivers are most part neglected; our streams are not great, I confesse, by reason of the narrownesse of the Iland, yet they run smoothly and even, not headlong, swift, or amongst rocks and shelves, as foming Rhodanus and Loyre in France, Tygris in Mesopotamia, violent Durius in Spain, with cataracts and whirl-pools, as the Rhine, and Danubius, about [986]Shaphausen, Laufenburgh, Linz, and Cremmes, to endanger navigators; or broad shallow, as Neckar in the Palatinat, Tibris in Italy;	Here, navigable rivers are mostly neglected. Our streams are not large, I admit, because the island is narrow; but they run smoothly and evenly, not headlong, swift, or among rocks and shallows like the foaming Rhône and Loire in France, the Tigris in Mesopotamia, or the violent Douro in Spain. Nor do they have cataracts and whirlpools like the Rhine and Danube around Schaffhausen, Laufenburg, Linz, and Krems, endangering those who sail them; nor are they broad and shallow like the Neckar in the Palatinate or the Tiber in Italy.

[985] Burton. p. 58, c: "Maginus Geogr." Editor: Giovanni Antonio Magini's Geography; the precise passage for this revenue claim remains unlocated.

[986] Burton. p. 58, unlettered: "Simlerus de rep. Helvet. lib. 1. describit." Editor: "Simler describes it in On the Swiss Commonwealth, Book 1." This entry appears below the Magini note, without a clear body anchor. It is provisionally attached to the Swiss river hazards; the attachment requires collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but calm and fair as Arar in France, Hebrus in Macedonia, Eurotes in Laconia, they gently slide along, and might as well be repaired many of them (I mean Wie, Trent, Ouse, Thamisis at Oxford, the defect of which we feel in the mean time) as the river of Lee from Ware to London.	Instead, calm and fair like the Saône in France, the Hebrus in Macedonia, or the Eurotas in Laconia, they glide gently along. Many could be improved as readily as the River Lea from Ware to London: I mean the Wye, Trent, Ouse, and Thames at Oxford, whose shortcomings we suffer meanwhile.[987]
Source page 58–59 B. Atwater of old, or as some will Henry 1. [988]made a channel from Trent to Lincoln, navigable; which now, saith Mr. Camden is decayed, and much mention is made of anchors, & such like monuments found about old [989]Verulamium, good ships have formerly come to Exeter, and many such places, whose Chanels, Havens, Ports are now barred and rejected.	Long ago Bishop Atwater—or, according to some, Henry I—made a navigable channel from the Trent to Lincoln; it is now in decay, says Mr Camden. Much is said of anchors and similar remains found around ancient Verulamium. Substantial ships once reached Exeter and many other places whose channels, harbours, and ports are now blocked and abandoned.
Source page 59 We contemn this benefit of carriage by waters, & are therefore compelled in the inner parts of this Iland, because portage is so dear, to eat up our commodities our selves, & live like so many boars in a sty, for want of vent and utterance.	We disregard the benefit of transport by water, and consequently, in the interior of this island, where carriage is so expensive, we are forced to consume our own produce and live like so many boars in a sty, for want of markets and outlets.
We have many excellent havens, royal havens, Falmouth, Portsmouth, Milford, &c. equivalent, if not to be preferred to that Indian Havana, old Brundusium in Italy, Aulis in Greece, Ambracia in Acarnania, Suda in Crete, which have few ships in them, little or no traffick or trade, which have scarce a village on them, able to bear great cities, sed viderint politici.	We have many excellent, magnificent harbours—Falmouth, Portsmouth, Milford, and others—equal, if not superior, to Havana in the Indies, ancient Brundisium in Italy, Aulis in Greece, Ambracia in Acarnania, or Suda in Crete. Yet they contain few ships and little or no commerce or trade; they scarcely have a village beside them, though they could support great cities. “But let the statesmen see to that.”

[987] Editor. “Repaired” means made serviceable or improved for navigation. The Hebrus, now the Maritsa, is conventionally associated with Thrace; Burton’s “Macedonia” is retained. His comparisons of river conditions express the case for improvement, rather than a systematic survey.

[988] Burton. p. 58, d: “Camden in Lincolnshire. Fossdike.” Editor: Camden’s Britannia, Lincolnshire; the Foss Dyke between the Trent and Lincoln. Burton’s alternative attribution to Bishop Atwater is retained and not independently resolved here.

[989] Burton. p. 58, *: “Near S. Albons.” Editor: Verulamium lay near St Albans.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I could here justly tax many other neglects, abuses, errors, defects among us, and in other countries, depopulations, riot, drunkennesse, &c. & many such, quæ nunc in aurem susurrare non libet. But I must take heed, ne quid gravius dicam, that I do not overshoot my self, Sus Minervam, I am forth of my element, as you peradventure suppose; and sometimes veritas odium parit, as he said, verjuice and oatmeal is good for a Parret.	I could justly censure many other instances of neglect, abuse, error, and deficiency, here and abroad: depopulation, dissipation, drunkenness, and many more, "which I do not now care to whisper in anyone's ear." But I must take care "not to say anything too harsh," not to go too far. "A pig teaching Minerva": perhaps you think I am out of my element. And sometimes "truth breeds hatred." As the saying goes, verjuice and oatmeal are good for a parrot.[990]
For as Lucian said of an Historian, I say of a Politician. He that will freely speak and write, must be for ever no subject, under no prince or law, but lay out the matter truly as it is, not caring what any can, will, like or dislike.	For what Lucian said of a historian I say of a political writer: whoever means to speak and write freely must remain no one's subject, under no prince or law, but set out the matter truthfully as it stands, regardless of what anyone can do, intends, approves, or dislikes.[991]
We have good laws, I deny not, to rectifie such enormities, and so in all other countries, but it seems not alwayes to good purpose. We had need of some general visitor in our age, that should reform what is amisse; a just army of Rosie crosse men, for they wil amend all matters, (they say) religion, policy, maners, with arts, sciences, &c.	We have good laws, I do not deny it, to correct such abuses, as do all other countries; but they do not always seem to achieve much. Our age needs some universal inspector to reform what is wrong: a whole army of Rosicrucians, for they will set everything right, they say—religion, government, morals, arts, sciences, and all the rest.[992]

[990] Editor. "Sus Minervam" abbreviates the proverb of a pig presuming to teach Minerva, goddess of wisdom. "Truth breeds hatred" is Terence, The Girl from Andros 68. Verjuice is sour juice from unripe fruit; the parrot saying works here as a warning to a talkative critic. Its precise provenance remains unresolved.

[991] Editor. Lucian, How to Write History 41, describes a writer independent of political allegiance who reports events without courting favour. Burton transfers that ideal to political criticism, just after hesitating over the dangers of speaking freely.

[992] Editor. The Rosicrucian Fama Fraternitatis, first printed in 1614, announced a brotherhood devoted to reform in learning and religion. "They say" keeps Burton at an ironic distance from its promises. "Visitor" means an inspector with authority to investigate and reform.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Another Attila, Tamberlane, Hercules, to strive with Achelous, Augeæ stabulum purgare, to subdue tyrants, as [993]he did Diomedes and Busiris: to expel theeves, as he did Cacus and Lacinius: to vindicate poor captives, as he did Hesione: to passe the Torrid Zone, the deserts of Lybia, and purge the world of monsters and Centaures:	Another Attila, Tamerlane, Hercules: to wrestle with Achelous, "clean out the stable of Augeas," subdue tyrants as Hercules subdued Diomedes and Busiris, drive out thieves as he drove out Cacus and Lacinius, rescue poor captives as he rescued Hesione, cross the torrid zone and the deserts of Libya, and purge the world of monsters and centaurs.[994]
Or another Theban Crates to reform our maners, to compose quarrels and controversies, as in his time he did, and was therefore adored for a god in Athens. As Hercules [995]purged the world of Monsters, & subdued them, so did he fight against envy, lust, anger, avarice, &c. and al those feral vices and monsters of the minde.	Or another Crates of Thebes, to reform our conduct and settle quarrels and disputes, as he did in his own time, for which he was worshipped as a god at Athens. As Hercules purged the world of monsters and subdued them, so Crates fought envy, lust, anger, greed, and all those savage vices and monsters of the mind.

[993] Burton. p. 59, e: "Lilius Girald. Nat. comes." Editor: The mythographers Lilio Gregorio Giraldi and Natale Conti. No work or chapter is specified.

[994] Editor. Hercules' feats supply a vocabulary for universal reform: Achelous is the river god he wrestled, the Augean stable a vast cleansing task, and Hesione a captive he rescued. The list begins, disconcertingly, with the conquerors Attila and Tamerlane; the imagined remedy includes overwhelming force.

[995] Burton. p. 59, f: "Apuleius lib. 4. Flor. Lar familiaris inter homines ætatis suæ cultus est, litium omnium & jurgiorum inter propinquos arbiter & disceptator. Adversus iracundiam, invidiam, avaritiam, libidinem, cæteraque animi humani vitia & monstra. Philosophus iste Hercules fuit. Pestes eas mentibus exegit omnes, &c." Editor: "He was honoured among the people of his age as a household god, an arbiter and judge of every lawsuit and quarrel among relations. Against anger, envy, greed, lust, and the other vices and monsters of the human mind, this philosopher was a Hercules. He drove all those plagues from their minds, and so on." An abridgement of Apuleius, Florida 22 in modern numbering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It were to be wished we had some such visitor, or if wishing would serve, one had such a ring or rings, as Timolaus desired in [996]Lucian, by vertue of which he should be as strong as 10000 men, or an army of gyants, go invisible, open gates & castle doors, have what treasure he would, transport himself in an instant, to what place he desired, alter affections, cure all maner of diseases, that he might range over the world, and reform all distressed states and persons, as he would himself.	We might wish for such an inspector; or, if wishing could do it, that someone had a ring or rings like those Timolaus desired in Lucian. They would make him as strong as 10,000 men or an army of giants, enable him to go unseen, open gates and castle doors, possess whatever treasure he wanted, travel instantly wherever he wished, change people's feelings, and cure every kind of disease. Then he could roam the world, reforming every troubled state and person as he pleased.[997]
He might reduce those wandring Tartars in order, that infest China on the one side, Muscovy, Poland on the other; and tame the vagabond Arabians that rob and spoil those Eastern countries, that they should never use more Caravans, or Janisaries to conduct them.	He could bring to order those wandering Tartars who plague China on one side and Muscovy and Poland on the other; and tame the wandering Arabs who rob and plunder those eastern countries, so that travellers would no longer need caravans or Janissaries to escort them.
Source page 59–60 He might root out Barbarism out of America, and fully discover Terra Australis Incognita, find out the North-east, and North-west passages, drean those mighty Mæotian fens, cut down those vast Hircinian woods, irrigate those barren Arabian deserts, &c. cure us of our Epidemical diseases, Scorbutum, Plica, morbus Neapolitanus, &c. end all our idle controversies, cut off our tumultuous desires, inordinate lusts, root out athiesm, impiety, heresie, schism and superstition, which now so crucifie the world,	He could root barbarism out of America, fully explore the Unknown Southern Land, discover the Northeast and Northwest Passages, drain the vast Maeotian marshes, cut down the immense Hercynian forests, irrigate the barren Arabian deserts, and so on; cure us of our epidemic diseases—scurvy, plica, the Neapolitan disease, and the rest; end our pointless disputes, cut off our unruly desires and excessive lusts, and root out atheism, impiety, heresy, schism, and superstition, which now so torment the world;[998]

[996] Burton. p. 59, g: "Votis Navig." Editor: Lucian, The Ship, or The Wishes, especially sections 42–45. Burton reshapes Timolaus's wish for magical rings into the fantasy of a universal reformer.

[997] Editor. Lucian's Timolaus imagines bodily invulnerability, invisibility, immense strength, flight, irresistible attraction, and power to help his friends or punish his enemies. Burton redirects these private fantasies towards public reform, while retaining the wish to make others conform to one man's will.

[998] Editor. The Maeotian marshes lie around the Sea of Azov; "Hircinian" points to the Hercynian forests of central Europe. "Plica" is pathological matting of the hair, historically treated as a disease; the "Neapolitan disease" is syphilis. "Unknown Southern Land" names a conjectural continent. Burton's fantasy combines exploration, engineering, coercive "civilisation," and religious uniformity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 60 catechise grosse ignorance, purge Italy of luxury and riot; Spain of superstition and jealousie, Germany of drunkennesse, all our Northern country of gluttony and intemperance, castigate our heard-hearted parents, masters, tutors; lash disobedient children, negligent servants, correct these spendthrifts and prodigall sons, enforce idle persons to work, drive drunkards off the alehouse, represse theeves, visit corrupt and tyrannizing magistrates, &c.	instruct the grossly ignorant in religion; purge Italy of lust and dissipation, Spain of superstition and jealousy, Germany of drunkenness, and all our northern country of gluttony and excess; chastise our hard-hearted parents, masters, and tutors; whip disobedient children and negligent servants, correct these spendthrifts and prodigal sons, force idle people to work, drive drunkards from the alehouse, suppress thieves, and call corrupt and tyrannical magistrates to account.
But as L. Licinius taxed Timolaus, you may us. These are vain, absurd and ridiculous wishes not to be hoped: all must be as it is, [999]Bocchalinus may cite Common-wealths to come before Apollo, and seek to reform the world it self by Commissioners, but there is no remedy, it may not be redressed, desinent homines tum demum stultescere quando esse desinent, so long as they can wag their beards, they will play the knaves and fools.	But you may rebuke us as L. Licinius rebuked Timolaus: these are vain, absurd, ridiculous wishes, with no hope of fulfilment. Everything must remain as it is. Boccalini may summon commonwealths before Apollo and seek to reform the world itself through commissioners, but there is no remedy; it cannot be put right. "People will cease to act foolishly only when they cease to exist": as long as they can wag their beards, they will play the knaves and fools.[1000]
Because therefore it is a thing so difficult, impossible, and far beyond Hercules labours to be performed; let them be rude, stupid, ignorant, incult, lapis super lapidem sedeat, and as the [1001]Apologist will, Resp. tussi, & graveolentia laboret, mundus vitio, let them be barbarous as they are,	Since, then, this is so difficult, impossible to accomplish, and far beyond the labours of Hercules, let them remain rude, stupid, ignorant, uncultivated: "let one stone sit upon another." And, as the writer of fables would have it, "let the commonwealth suffer from a cough and a foul smell, and the world from vice." Let them remain as barbarous as they are.

[999] Burton. p. 60, h: "Raggnalios part 2. cap. 2. & part 3. c. 17." Editor: Traiano Boccalini's Reports from Parnassus. The printed references are retained; their relation to the reform commission described in the body remains to be collated.

[1000] Editor. The critic in Lucian's The Ship, or The Wishes is Lycinus; Burton prints "L. Licinius," retained in both columns. Boccalini's satirical Apollo presides over the world of learning and politics. The shift from omnipotent reform to despair prepares Burton's turn to an imaginary state.

[1001] Burton. p. 60, i: "Velent. Andreæ, Apolog. manip. 604." Editor: Johann Valentin Andreae's apologues, or moral fables. The printed abbreviation and number are retained; the exact passage behind the Latin in the body remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
let them [1002]tyrannize, epicurize, oppresse, luxuriate, consume themselves with factions, superstitions, law-suits, wars and contentions, live in riot, poverty, want, misery; rebel, wallow as so many swine in their own dung, with Ulysses companions, stultos jubeo esse libenter.	Let them tyrannise, pursue pleasure, oppress, indulge themselves, consume themselves in factions, superstitions, lawsuits, wars, and disputes; live in dissipation, poverty, want, and misery; rebel; and, like Ulysses' companions, wallow like so many pigs in their own dung. "I gladly bid them be fools."[1003]
I wil yet to satisfie and please my self, make an Utopia of mine own, a new Atlantis, a poetical Common-wealth of mine own, in which I will freely domineer, build cities, make laws, statutes, as I list my self. And why may I not?	Yet, to satisfy and please myself, I will make a Utopia of my own, a new Atlantis, an imagined commonwealth of my own, in which I will rule freely, build cities, and make laws and statutes just as I please. And why should I not?[1004]
— [1005]Pictoribus atque Poetis, &c. You know what liberty Poets ever had, and besides, my predecessor Democritus was a Politician, a Recorder of Abdera, a law-maker as some say, and why may not I presume so much as he did? Howsoever I will adventure.	"Painters and poets," and so forth. You know the freedom poets have always enjoyed. Besides, my predecessor Democritus was a political thinker, a recorder of Abdera, a lawgiver, some say. Why should I not presume as much as he did? At any rate, I will venture it.

[1002] Burton. p. 60, k: "Qui sordidus est, sordescat adhuc." Editor: "Let whoever is filthy become filthier still." An echo of Revelation 22:11; Burton uses its permissive wording as a bitter dismissal.

[1003] Editor. Ulysses' companions were transformed into swine by Circe in the Odyssey, Book 10. "Epicurize" is used in the conventional hostile sense of indulging pleasure, not as a precise account of Epicurus's philosophy. No secure source has yet been assigned to the final Latin sentence.

[1004] Editor. "Utopia" invokes Thomas More's invented commonwealth; "Atlantis" evokes the tradition of an imagined island society. "Poetical" means made by imaginative invention. The promise to "domineer" preserves an uneasy overlap between artistic freedom and arbitrary rule.

[1005] Burton. p. 60, l: "Hor." Editor: Horace, Art of Poetry 9–10. The abbreviated quotation begins "Painters and poets"; the full sentence asserts their equal freedom to venture anything. Burton invokes artistic licence for his invented commonwealth.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For the site, if you will needs urge me to it, I am not fully resolved, it may be in Terra Australi Incognita, there is room enough (for of my knowledge neither that hungry Spaniard,[1006] nor Mercurius Britannicus, have yet discovered half of it) or else one of those floting Islands in Mare del Zur, which like the Cyanian Isles in the Euxine sea, alter their place, and are accessible only at set times, and to some few persons;	As for its location, if you insist on pressing me, I have not quite decided. It may be in the Unknown Southern Land: there is room enough, for as far as I know neither that hungry Spaniard nor Mercurius Britannicus has yet discovered half of it. Or it may be one of those floating islands in the South Sea, which, like the Cyanean Isles in the Black Sea, change their position and can be reached only at certain times, and by only a few people.[1007] or one of the Fortunate Isles, for who knows yet where, or which they are? there is room enough in the inner parts of America, and northern coasts of Asia. But I will chuse a site, whose latitude shall be 45 degrees (I respect not minutes) in the midst of the temperate Zone, or perhaps under the Æquator, that [1008]Paradise of the world, ubi semper virens laurus, &c. where is a perpetual Spring: the longitude for some reasons I will conceal.	Or one of the Fortunate Isles, for who yet knows where or which they are? There is room enough in the interior of America and on the northern coasts of Asia. But I will choose a site at 45 degrees latitude—I will not trouble about the minutes—in the middle of the temperate zone; or perhaps on the equator, that paradise of the world, "where the laurel is always green," and so forth, where spring is perpetual. For certain reasons I will conceal the longitude.

[1006] Burton. p. 60, unlettered: "Ferdinando Quir. 1612." Editor: Pedro Fernández de Quirós, Portuguese-born and in Spanish service, whose memorials promoted a southern discovery. Markham's bibliography records Amsterdam printings in 1612; Burton does not specify the language. See also Block 006. The note is attached here to "that hungry Spaniard."

[1007] Editor. Mercurius Britannicus is the name under which Joseph Hall's satirical Mundus alter et idem appeared. Burton sets its imaginary southern voyage beside Quirós's claimed discovery. "Mare del Zur," the South Sea, is the Pacific; the Cyanean Isles evoke the moving or clashing rocks of Greek legend.

[1008] Burton. p. 60, *: "Vide Acosta & Laiet." Editor: "See Acosta and Laet": José de Acosta and Joannes de Laet. The exact passages supporting the praise of the equatorial climate remain unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yet be it known to all men by these presents, that if any honest gentleman will send in so much money, as Cardan allows an Astrologer for casting a Nativity, he shall be a sharer, I will acquaint him with my project, or if any worthy man will stand for any temporal or spiritual office or dignity, (for as he said of his Archbishoprick of Utopia, tis sanctus ambitus, and not amisse to be sought after) it shall be freely given without all intercessions, bribes, letters, &c. his own worth shal be the best spokesman;	Yet let all men know by this declaration that if any honest gentleman will send as much money as Cardan allows an astrologer for casting a birth horoscope, he shall have a share: I will acquaint him with my project. Or if any worthy man seeks a civil or ecclesiastical office or dignity—for, as someone said of his archbishopric of Utopia, it is "holy ambition," and may properly be sought—it shall be given freely, without anyone's intercession, bribes, letters of recommendation, or the like. His own merit shall be his best advocate.[1009]
Source page 60–61 & because we shal admit of no deputies or advousons, if he be sufficiently qualified, and as able as willing to execute the place himself, he shall have present possession.	And because we shall allow neither deputies nor rights of patronage over appointments, if he is sufficiently qualified, and as able as he is willing to perform the duties himself, he shall take possession immediately.[1010]
Source page 61 It shall be divided into 12 or 13 Provinces, and those by hils, rivers, rode-wayes, or some more eminent limits exactly bounded. Each province shall have a Metropolis, which shall be so placed as a center almost in a circumference, and the rest at equal distances, some 12 Italian miles asunder, or thereabout,	It shall be divided into twelve or thirteen provinces, precisely bounded by hills, rivers, roads, or other conspicuous landmarks. Each province shall have a capital, placed roughly at the centre of a circle, with the other cities at equal distances, about twelve Italian miles apart,

[1009] Editor. More's prefatory letter to Peter Giles describes an unnamed theologian eager to become bishop of Utopia, defending his ambition as pious rather than profitable. Burton makes it an archbishopric. "Sanctus ambitus" is also a marginal heading in More. Cardan's particular fee remains unlocated; Burton's offer parodies the language of a subscription or speculative venture.

[1010] Editor. An advowson is a patron's right to present a candidate to a church living. Burton excludes patronage rights and substitutes as he promises appointment by personal merit and actual performance of the duties. "Present" means immediate.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and in them shall be sold all things necessary for the use of man; statis horis & diebus, no market towns, markets or fairs, for they do but beggar cities (no village shall stand above 6, 7, or 8 miles from a city) except those Emporiums which are by the seaside, generall Staples, Marts, as Antwerp, Venice, Bergen of old, London, &c.	and in them all the necessities of human life shall be sold at appointed hours and on appointed days. There shall be no market towns, markets, or fairs, since they only impoverish cities; no village shall be more than six, seven, or eight miles from a city. The exceptions shall be the great trading centres by the sea, general depots and marts such as Antwerp, Venice, Bergen in former times, London, and so on.[1011] cities most part shal be situat upon navigable rivers or lakes, creeks, havens, and for their form, regular, round, square, or long square, [1012] with fair, broad, and strait [1013] streets, houses uniform, built of brick and stone, like Bruges, Bruxels, Rhegium Lepidi, Berna in Switzerland, Millan, Mantua, Crema, Cambalu in Tartary described by M. Polus, or that Venetian Palma.	Most cities shall stand on navigable rivers or lakes, creeks, or harbours. Their shape shall be regular: circular, square, or rectangular, with handsome, broad, straight streets and uniform houses of brick and stone, like Bruges, Brussels, Reggio Emilia, Bern in Switzerland, Milan, Mantua, Crema, Cambalu in Tartary as described by Marco Polo, or the Venetian town of Palma.[1014]
I wil admit very few or no suburbs, & those of baser building, wals only to keep out man & horse, except it be in some frontier towns, or by the sea side, and those to be fortified [1015] after the latest maner of fortification, and site upon convenient havens, or opportune places.	I will allow very few suburbs, or none, and any there are shall have humbler buildings, with walls sufficient only to keep out people and horses. The exceptions shall be certain frontier towns and coastal towns, fortified according to the latest methods and situated at suitable harbours or other advantageous places.

[1011] Editor. Burton concentrates ordinary trade in the cities and makes exceptions for major seaports. His later provision of urban marketplaces shows that the ban concerns competing markets outside this plan. An Italian mile is retained as his unit, without imposing a single modern conversion.

[1012] Burton. p. 61, m: “Vide Patritium lib. 8. tit. 10. de Instit. Reipub.” Editor: “See Patrizi, On the Institution of a Republic, book 8, title 10.” The precise passage remains uncollated.

[1013] Burton. p. 61, n: “Sic olim Hippodamus Milesius Arist. polit. cap. 11. & Vitruvius l. 1. c. ult.” Editor: “So formerly Hippodamus of Miletus: Aristotle, Politics, chapter 11; and Vitruvius, book 1, final chapter.” The printed chapter references are retained.

[1014] Editor. Rhegium Lepidi is Reggio Emilia; Berna is Bern. Palma refers to Palmanova, the planned Venetian fortress town. Burton’s examples illustrate his preference for regular streets and buildings; the list does not establish that every city had the same plan.

[1015] Burton. p. 61, o: “With wals of earth, &c.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
In every so built city, I will have convenient churches, and separate places to bury the dead in, not in churchyards; a citadella (in some, not all) to comand it, prisons for offenders, opportune market places of all sorts, for corn, meat, cattel, fuel, fish, &c. commodious courts of Justice, publike hals for all societies, burses, meeting places, armories, [1016] in which shall be kept engines for quenching of fire,	In every city built in this way, I will have suitable churches and separate burial grounds, away from churchyards; a citadel in some cities, though not all, to command them; prisons for offenders; conveniently placed markets of every kind, for grain, meat, livestock, fuel, fish, and so on; well-appointed courts of justice; public halls for all associations; exchanges; meeting places; and armouries in which equipment for putting out fires shall be kept,

[1016] Burton. p. 61, p: “De his Plin. epist. 42. lib. 2. & Tacit. Annal. 13. lib.” Editor: “On these matters, Pliny, letter 42, book 2; and Tacitus, Annals, book 13.” The Pliny reference is printed thus. A relevant discussion of firefighting equipment occurs in Letters 10.33–34; this is a located parallel, not a silent correction of the citation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
artillery gardens, publike walks, theaters, and spacious fields allotted for all gymnicks, sports, and honest recreations, hospitals of all kinds, for children, orphans, old folks, sick men, mad men, souldiers, pest-houses, &c. not built precario, or by gowty benefactors, who, when by fraud and rapin they have extorted all their lives, oppressed whole provinces, societies, &c. give something to pious uses, build a satisfactory alms-house, school, or bridge, &c. at their last end, or before perhaps,	grounds for military exercises, public walks, theatres, and spacious fields set aside for physical exercise, sports, and wholesome recreation; institutions of every kind for children, orphans, old people, the sick, the mad, and soldiers; plague hospitals, and so on. These shall not be built by begging, or by gouty benefactors who have spent their lives extorting money by fraud and plunder and oppressing whole provinces and communities, then give something to charitable uses, building an almshouse, school, or bridge to make amends at the end of their lives, or perhaps a little earlier.[1017]
which is no otherwise then to steal a goose, and stick down a feather, rob a thousand to relieve ten: And those hospitals so built and maintained, not by collections, benevolences, donaries, for a set number (as in ours) just so many and no more at such a rate, but for all those who stand in need, be they more or lesse, and that ex publico ærario, and so still maintained, non nobis solùm nati sumus, &c.	This is simply to steal a goose and leave a feather behind, to rob a thousand people to relieve ten. These institutions shall be built and maintained, not by collections, charitable contributions, or gifts for a fixed number of people, as ours are—so many and no more, at a specified allowance—but for everyone in need, however many or few. They shall be funded from the public treasury and continually maintained from it: we are not born for ourselves alone, and so on.[1018]

[1017] Editor. Hospitals here include charitable residences and institutions of care, not only medical wards. Precario indicates dependence on entreaty or another's favour; satisfactory means making satisfaction or atonement. Artillery gardens are grounds for practising arms. Burton's gouty benefactor is a satirical figure of wealth and indulgence.

[1018] Editor. "We are not born for ourselves alone" is from Cicero, On Duties 1.22, where it introduces obligations to country, friends, and human society. Burton uses it to support continuing public provision according to need.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I will have conduits of sweet and good water, aptly disposed in each town, common [1019] granaries, as at Dresden in Misnia, Stetein in Pomerland, Noremberg, &c. Colledges of mathematicians, musicians, and actors, as of old at Labedum in Ionia, [1020] alcumists, physicians, artists, and philosophers; that all arts and sciences may sooner be perfected & better learned;	I will have conduits supplying fresh, wholesome water, suitably placed in every town; public granaries, as at Dresden in Meissen, Stettin in Pomerania, Nuremberg, and elsewhere; and colleges of mathematicians, musicians, and actors, as in ancient times at Lebedus in Ionia, as well as alchemists, physicians, practitioners of the arts, and philosophers, so that every art and science may be brought to perfection sooner and learned more thoroughly; and publick historiographers, as amongst those ancient [1021] Persians, qui in commentarios referebant quæ memoratu digna gerebantur, informed and appointed by the state to register all famous acts, & not by each insufficient scribler, partial or parasitical pendants, as in our times.	and public historians, as among the ancient Persians, who entered in their records whatever happened that was worth remembering. They shall be supplied with information and appointed by the state to record all notable deeds, instead of leaving this to every incompetent scribbler and biased or parasitical pedant, as we do today.[1022]

[1019] Burton. p. 61, q: “Vide Brisonium de regno Persæ lib. 3. de his & Vegetium lib. 2. cap. 3. de Annona.” Editor: “On these matters see Brisson, On the Persian Kingdom, book 3, and Vegetius, book 2, chapter 3, on the grain supply.” References retained; exact passages uncollated.

[1020] Burton. p. 61, r: “Not to make gold, but for matters of physick.” Editor: Physick means medicine. Burton specifies medical alchemy.

[1021] Burton. p. 61, s: “Bresonius Iosephus lib. 21. antiquit. Iud. cap. 6. Herod. lib. 3.” Editor: Brisson; Josephus, Jewish Antiquities, book 21, chapter 6; Herodotus, book 3. The printed 21 is retained although Jewish Antiquities has twenty books. The intended Josephus reference remains unresolved.

[1022] Editor. The original prints pendants. The modern column reads pedants, the apparent intended word in this attack on incompetent, partisan, and flattering writers; the original reading remains on the left.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 61–62 I will provide publike schools of all kinds, singing, dancing, fencing, &c. especially of Grammar & languages, not to be taught by those tedious precepts ordinarily used, but by use, example, conversation, as travelers learn abroad, & nurses teach their children:[1023] as I wil have all such places, so will I ordain [1024] publike governors, fit officers to each place, Treasurers, Ædiles, Questors, Overseers of pupils, widows goods, and all publike houses, &c.	I will provide public schools of every kind, for singing, dancing, fencing, and so on, especially for grammar and languages. These shall be taught through practice, example, and conversation, as travellers learn abroad and nurses teach their children, instead of the tedious rules ordinarily used. Just as I will provide all these institutions, I will appoint public administrators and suitable officers for each: treasurers, aediles, quaestors, guardians of wards and widows' property, and overseers of all public establishments, and so on.[1025]
Source page 62 and those once a year to make strict accounts of all receipts, expences, to avoid confusion, & sic fiet ut non absumant (as Pliny to Trajan,) quod pudeat dicere. They shall be subordinate to those higher officers, and governors of each City, which shall not be poor Tradesmen and mean Artificers, but Noblemen and Gentlemen, which shal be tied to residence in those towns they dwel next, at such set times and seasons:	Once a year they shall render exact accounts of every receipt and expense, to prevent disorder; and in this way they will not spend sums they would be ashamed to disclose, as Pliny says to Trajan.[1026] They shall answer to the higher officers and governors of each city. These shall be noblemen and gentlemen, rather than poor tradesmen and lowly craftsmen, and shall be required to reside in the towns nearest their homes at specified times and seasons;

[1023] Burton. p. 61, t: "So Lod. Vives thinks best, Comminius, and others." Editor: Vives is Juan Luis Vives. Comminius is retained as printed and not securely identified here. No clear t anchor is visible in the body; the note is provisionally attached to the account of language learning beside it.

[1024] Burton. p. 62, u: "Plato 3. de leg. Ædiles creari vult, qui fora, fontes, vias, portus, plateas, & id genus alia procurent. Vide Isaacum Pontanum de civ. Amstel. hæc omnia, &c. Gotardum & alios." Editor: "Plato, Laws, book 3, wishes aediles to be appointed to take care of markets, fountains, roads, harbours, streets, and other things of that kind. On all this see Isaac Pontanus on the city of Amsterdam, etc.; Gotardus and others." The references and numbering are retained.

[1025] Editor. Colleges can mean organised bodies of practitioners. Aediles are civic officials concerned with public amenities; quaestors are financial officers. Pupils here means minors under guardianship, not schoolchildren. Overseers also protect widows' property.

[1026] Editor. The source is Pliny's Panegyric to Trajan 20, where the emperor is urged to publish his expenses: "Ita fiet, ut non absumat, quod pudeat dicere," meaning that he will then not spend what he would be ashamed to disclose. Burton adapts the singular absumat to plural absumant for his public officials and changes the opening to & sic fiet. Letters 10.17–18 supply related material on municipal accounts, but are not the source of this wording.

Original text 1651	Modern English
for I see no reason (which [1027] Hippolitus complains of (that it should be more dishonourable for Noblemen to govern the City, then the Country, or unseemly to dwell there now, then of old. [1028] I will have no bogs, fens, marishes, vast woods, desarts, heaths, commons, but all inclosed; (yet not depopulated, and therefore take heed you mistake me not) for that which is common, and every mans, is no mans;	for I see no reason, as Hippolitus also complains, why it should be less honourable for noblemen to govern a city than the countryside, or less fitting for them to live there now than in former times. I will have no bogs, fens, marshes, vast forests, wastelands, heaths, or commons: everything shall be enclosed, though the inhabitants must not be driven out—take care not to misunderstand me here. For what is common property, belonging to everyone, belongs to no one;[1029]
the richest countries are still inclosed, as Essex, Kent, with us, &c. Spain, Italy; and where inclosures are least in quantity, they are best [1030] husbanded, as about Florence in Italy, Damascus in Syria, &c. which are liker gardens then fields.	the richest regions are always enclosed, as Essex and Kent are with us, and Spain and Italy elsewhere. Where enclosed plots are smallest, they are cultivated best, as around Florence in Italy and Damascus in Syria, where they look more like gardens than fields.

[1027] Burton. p. 62, x: “De Increm. urb. cap. 13. Ingenuè fateor me non intelligere cur ignobilius sit urbes bene munitas colere nunc quàm olim, aut casæ rusticæ præesse quam urbi. Idem Ubertus Foliot, de Neapoli.” Editor: “On the Growth of Cities, chapter 13. I frankly confess that I do not understand why it should be less honourable to inhabit well-fortified cities now than formerly, or to preside over a country house than over a city. The same in Ubertus Foliot, on Naples.” The second comparison is awkward in the printed Latin; Burton’s body text makes his intended defence of urban government clear. Exact sources remain uncollated.

[1028] Burton. p. 62, y: “Ne tantillum quidem soli incultum relinquitur, ut verum sit ne pollicem quidem agri in his regionibus sterilem aut infœcundum reperiri. Marcus Hemingius Augustanus de regno Chinæ l. 1. c. 3.” Editor: “Not even the smallest bit of soil is left uncultivated, so that it is true that not an inch of land in these regions is found barren or unfruitful.” Marcus Hemingius of Augsburg, On the Kingdom of China, book 1, chapter 3. This is Burton’s cited idealising report.

[1029] Editor. Enclosure divides and bounds land previously open or held in common. Burton insists on enclosure while explicitly rejecting the removal of inhabitants. His later limits on consolidation and arbitrary landlord demands qualify the scheme.

[1030] Burton. p. 62, z: “M. Carew in his Survey of Cornwall, saith that before that country was inclosed, the husbandmen drank water, did eat little or no bread fol 66. lib. 1. their apparel was course, they went bare-legged, their dwelling was correspondent; but since inclosure, they live decently, and have money to spend (fol. 23.) when their fields were common, their wooll was course, Cornish hair; but since inclosure, it is almost as good as Cotswol, and their soil much mended. Tusser. cap. 52. of his husbandry, is of his opinion, one acre inclosed, is worth three common. The country inclosed I praise: The other delighteth not me, For nothing of wealth it doth raise, &c.” Editor: Husbandmen are farmers; course means coarse; Cotswol refers to Cotswold wool. Carew’s and Tusser’s claims are reproduced, not independently verified here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I will not have a barren acre in all my Territories, not so much as the tops of mountains: where nature fails, it shall be supplied by art: [1031] lakes and rivers shall not be left desolate. All common high-wayes, bridges, banks, corrivations of waters, aqueducts, chanels, publike works, building, &c. out of a [1032] common stock, curiously maintained and kept in repair;	I will not have a single barren acre in all my territories, even on the mountaintops. Where nature falls short, human skill shall make up the deficiency; lakes and rivers shall not be left unused. All public roads, bridges, embankments, water diversions, aqueducts, channels, public works, buildings, and so on shall be carefully maintained and kept in repair from a common fund;
no depopulations, ingrossings, alterations of wood, arable, but by the consent of some supervisors that shall be appointed for that purpose, to see what reformation ought to be had in all places, what is amisse, how to help it, Et quid quæque ferat regio, & quid quæque recuset,[1033] what ground is aptest for wood, what for corn, what for cattle, gardens, orchards, fishponds, &c. with a charitable division in every Village, (not one domineering house greedily to swallow up all, which is too common with us) what for Lords, what for tenants:	there shall be no removal of inhabitants, consolidation of holdings, or conversion of woodland or arable land without the consent of supervisors appointed to determine what improvements each place needs, what is wrong, and how to remedy it, And what each region will produce, and what it will refuse; what land is best for woods, grain, livestock, gardens, orchards, fishponds, and so on. In every village there shall be a fair and considerate division between lords and tenants, rather than one domineering household greedily swallowing everything, as happens all too often among us.

[1031] Burton. p. 62, a: “Incredibilis navigiorum copia, nihilo pauciores in aquis, quàm in continenti commorantur. M. Ricceus expedit. in Sinas, l. 1. c. 3.” Editor: “An incredible abundance of boats: no fewer people live on the waters than on the land.” Matteo Ricci, Expedition into China, book 1, chapter 3. Burton’s abbreviated citation is retained.

[1032] Burton. p. 62, b: “To this purpose, Arist. polit. 2. c. 6. allows a third part of their revenews, Hippodamus half.” Editor: The allocations and reference are reproduced as Burton gives them; the precise derivation remains unresolved.

[1033] Burton. p. 62, asterisk: “Virg.” Editor: Virgil. The footer note has no clearly visible corresponding asterisk in the body; it is attached here to the otherwise uncredited verse, located in Georgics 1.53. The following English catalogue is Burton’s own elaboration and is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and because they shall be better incouraged to improve such lands they hold, manure, plant trees, drean, fence, &c. they shall have long leases, a known rent, and known fine to free them from those intollerable exactions of tyranizing Landlords.	To give tenants a stronger incentive to improve the land they hold—to cultivate it, plant trees, drain it, fence it, and so on—they shall have long leases, a fixed rent, and a fixed lease premium, freeing them from the intolerable demands of tyrannical landlords.[1034]
These supervisors shall likewise appoint what quantity of land in each mannor is fit for the Lords Demesns, [1035] what for holding of Tenants, how it ought to be husbanded, Vt [1036] Magnetis equis, Minyæ gens cognita remis, how to be manured, tilled, rectified, [1037] hic segetes veniunt, illic fælicius uvæ, Arborei fætus alibi, atque injussa virescunt Gramina,	These supervisors shall also determine how much land in each manor is suitable for the lord's own estate, how much for tenants' holdings, and how it ought to be farmed: As the Magnetes are known for horses, the Minyans for oars; how it should be cultivated, tilled, and improved: here grain grows, there grapes thrive better; elsewhere trees bear fruit and grass grows green unbidden;

[1034] Editor. A fine here is a payment for obtaining or renewing a lease, not a penalty for wrongdoing. Manure can mean cultivate or improve land generally. Demesne is land retained for a lord's own use, as distinct from tenants' holdings.

[1035] Burton. p. 62, c: "Ita lex Agraria olim Romæ." Editor: "So the agrarian law formerly at Rome." Burton does not identify a particular enactment.

[1036] Burton. p. 62, e: "Lucanus l. 6." Editor: Lucan, book 6. The parallel is Civil War 6.385, which reads et Magnetes equis, Minyae gens cognita remis. Burton's Vt Magnetis is retained on the left; the right gives the apparent intended comparison. The Magnetes and Minyans are peoples associated here with horsemanship and rowing.

[1037] Burton. p. 62, d: "Hic segetes, illic veniunt fælicius uvæ, Arborei fætus alibi, atq; injussa virescunt Gramina. Virg. 1. Georg." Editor: "Here grain, there grapes thrive better; elsewhere trees bear fruit and grass grows green unbidden." Virgil, Georgics 1.54–56. Burton repeats the quotation in the margin, with a different placement of veniunt; both versions are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 62–63 and what proportion is fit for all callings, because private professors are many times idiots, ill husbands, oppressors, covetous, and know not how to improve their own, or else wholly respect their own, and not publike good. Utopian parity is a kinde of government, to be wished for, [1038] rather then effected, Respub. Christianopolitana, Campanella's city of the Sun, and that new Atlantis, witty fictions, but meer Chimera's and Platoes community in many things is impious, absurd and ridiculous, it takes away all splendor and magnificence.	and what share is appropriate to each occupation. For private landholders are often ignorant, poor managers, oppressive, or covetous: they do not know how to improve their own property, or else care only for their own advantage and disregard the public good. Utopian equality is a form of government to wish for rather than put into practice. The Christianopolitan Republic, Campanella's City of the Sun, and that New Atlantis are ingenious fictions, but mere chimeras; and Plato's communal arrangements are in many respects impious, absurd, and ridiculous. They take away all splendour and magnificence.[1039]
Source page 63 I will have several orders, degrees of nobility, and those hereditary, not rejecting yonger brothers in the mean time, for they shall be sufficiently provided for by pensions, or so qualified, brought up in some honest calling, they shal be able to live of themselves. I wil have such a proportion of ground belonging to every Barony, he that buyes the land, shall buy the Barony,[1040] he that by riot consumes his patrimony, & ancient demeans, shall forfeit his honours.	I will have different orders and ranks of nobility, and these shall be hereditary. Meanwhile, younger brothers shall not be cast aside: they shall be adequately provided for by pensions, or trained in some honourable occupation so that they can support themselves. A specified amount of land shall belong to every barony: whoever buys the land shall buy the barony. Anyone who squanders his inheritance and ancestral estates through extravagance shall forfeit his honours.

[1038] Burton. p. 62, f: "Ioh. Valent. Andreas, Lord Verulam." Editor: Johann Valentin Andreae and Francis Bacon, Lord Verulam; the names connect with Christianopolis and New Atlantis in the following sentence.

[1039] Editor. Private professors is retained on the left; the context concerns private landholders, the sense used on the right. Utopian parity alludes to More's commonwealth. The following works are Andreae's Christianopolis, Campanella's City of the Sun, and Bacon's New Atlantis. Burton borrows from utopian writing while rejecting complete equality and defending rank and magnificence. Plato's community refers to communal arrangements in his political philosophy, not a modern municipality.

[1040] Burton. p. 62, g: "So is it in the kingdom of Naples and France." Editor: This note is printed at the foot of p. 62 without a clearly visible body anchor. It is provisionally attached to the purchase of the barony with its land on p. 63. Its precise intended placement requires further collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As some dignities shall be hereditary, so some again by election, or by gift (besides free offices, pensions, annuities) like our Bishopricks, Prebends, the Bassa's palaces in Turky, the [1041] Procurators houses, & offices in Venice, which like the golden Apple, shall be given to the worthiest, & best deserving both in war and peace, as a reward of their worth and good service, as so many goals for all to aim at, (honos alit artes) and encouragements to others.	While some dignities shall be hereditary, others shall be bestowed by election or grant, besides freely bestowed offices, pensions, and annuities: appointments like our bishoprics and prebends, the pashas' palaces in Turkey, and the procurators' houses and offices in Venice. Like the golden apple, these shall go to the worthiest and most deserving, in war and peace alike, rewarding merit and good service and setting goals for everyone to aim at—honour nourishes the arts—and encouraging others.[1042]
For I hate these severe, unnatural, harsh, German, French, and Venetian Decrees, which exclude Plebeians from honors, be they never so wise, rich, vertuous, valiant, and well qualified, they must not be Patritians, but keep their own rank, this is naturæ bellum inferre, odious to God and men, I abhor it. My form of government shall be Monarchical. [1043] — nunquam libertas gratior extat, Quam sub Rege pio, &c. few lawes, but those severely kept, plainly put down, and in the mother tongue, that every man may understand.	For I hate those severe, unnatural, harsh German, French, and Venetian decrees that exclude commoners from honours. However wise, rich, virtuous, courageous, and well qualified they may be, they must not become patricians but must remain in their own rank. This is to wage war on nature, hateful to God and humanity. I abhor it. My form of government shall be monarchical: Never is liberty more welcome Than under a just king, and so on. There shall be few laws, but they shall be strictly observed, plainly written, and in the mother tongue, so that everyone can understand them.

[1041] Burton. p. 63, h: "See Contarenus and Osorius de rebus gestis Emanuelis." Editor: Contarini, and Osório's account of the deeds of King Manuel. The precise passages remain uncollated.

[1042] Editor. A prebend is an endowed ecclesiastical position; a pasha an Ottoman dignitary; a procurator a high Venetian officer. The golden apple evokes the prize contested in the judgement of Paris, redirected here toward merit. "Honour nourishes the arts" is Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 1.4.

[1043] Burton. p. 63, asterisk: "Claudian l. 7." Editor: Claudian, On Stilicho's Consulship 3.114–115 is the located parallel. Burton's printed reference is retained. Pius describes a ruler who fulfils his moral obligations; "just" conveys the political sense here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Every city shall have a peculiar trade or priviledge, by which it shall be chiefly maintained: [1044] and Parents shal teach their children, one of three at least, bring up and instruct them in the mysteries of their own trade.	Every city shall have a particular trade or privilege that chiefly supports it. Parents shall teach their children—at least one in three—bringing them up and instructing them in the skills of their own trade.
In each town these several tradesmen shall be so aptly disposed, as they shall free the rest from danger or offence: Fire-trades, as Smiths, Forge-men, Brewers, Bakers, Metal-men, &c. shall dwell apart by themselves: Dyars, Tanners, Fel-mongers, and such as use water in convenient places by themselves: noysom or fulsome for bad smels, as Butchers slaughter-houses, Chandlers, curriers, in remote places, & some back lanes.	In every town, the different trades shall be so carefully located that the rest of the inhabitants are spared danger or nuisance. Trades that use fire—smiths, forge workers, brewers, bakers, metalworkers, and the like—shall occupy a separate quarter. Dyers, tanners, dealers in hides, and others who use water shall have suitable places of their own. Trades offensive because of their smells—butchers' slaughterhouses, candle makers, and leather dressers—shall be placed out of the way, in back lanes.
Fraternities and companies, I approve of, as Merchants Burses, Colledges of Druggers, Physicians, Musicians, &c. but all trades to be rated in the sale of wares, as our Clerks of the market do Bakers and Brewers: Corn it self, what scarcity soever shall come, not to exceed such a price.	I approve of guilds and companies: merchants' exchanges and colleges of druggists, physicians, musicians, and so on. But the prices charged by every trade shall be regulated, as our market officers regulate those of bakers and brewers. Grain itself shall not exceed a set price, however severe the shortage.

[1044] Burton. p. 63, i: "Herodotus Erato lib 6. Cum Ægyptiis Lacedemonii in hoc congruunt, quod eorum Præcones, tibicines, coqui, & reliqui artifices, in paterno artificio succedunt, & coquus à coquo gignitur, & paterno opere perseverat. Idem Marcus polus de Quinzay. Idem Osorius de Emanuele rege Lusitano. Riccius de Sinis." Editor: "Herodotus, Erato, book 6. The Spartans agree with the Egyptians in this: their heralds, flute players, cooks, and other craftsmen succeed to their fathers' trades; a cook is born to a cook and continues his father's work. The same in Marco Polo on Quinzay, Osório on Manuel king of Portugal, and Ricci on the Chinese." Herodotus's relevant passage is 6.60; the other references remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of such wares as are transported or brought in, [1045] if they be necessary, commodious, and such as neerly concern mans life, as corn, wood, cole, &c. & such provision we cannot want, I will have little or no custom paid, no taxes; but for such things as are for pleasure, delight, or ornament, as wine, spice, tobacco, silk, velvet, cloth of gold, lace, jewels, &c. a greater impost.	Goods exported or imported that are necessary, useful, and closely connected with human subsistence—grain, wood, coal, and other supplies we cannot do without—shall pay little or no customs duty, and no taxes. But goods for pleasure, enjoyment, or adornment—wine, spices, tobacco, silk, velvet, cloth of gold, lace, jewels, and so on—shall bear a heavier duty.
Source page 63–64 I will have certain ships sent out for new discoveries every year, [1046] & some discreet men appointed to travel into all neighbor kingdoms by land, which shall observe what artificial inventions, and good laws are in other Countries, customes, alterations, or ought else, concerning war or peace, which may tend to the common good. Ecclesiastical discipline, penes Episcopos, subordinate as the other.	I will send out a number of ships every year to make new discoveries, and appoint judicious men to travel overland through all neighbouring kingdoms. They shall observe useful inventions, good laws, customs, changes, and anything else in other countries, in war or peace, that may serve the common good. Church discipline shall be in the hands of bishops, with a hierarchy like that of the other officials.
Source page 64 No impropriations, no lay patrons of church livings, or one private man, but common societies, corporations, &c. and those Rectors of benefices to be chosen out of the Universities, examined and approved as the literati in China. No Parish to contain above a thousand Auditors.	There shall be no church revenues appropriated to lay ownership, and no lay patrons or individual private patrons of church livings: patronage shall belong to collective societies, corporations, and the like. Rectors appointed to benefices shall be chosen from the universities, examined and approved like the learned officials of China. No parish shall contain more than a thousand hearers.[1047]

[1045] Burton. p. 63, k: “Hippol. à collibus de increm. urb. c. 20. Plato idem 7. de legibus, quæ ad vitam necessaria, & quibus carere non possumus, nullum dependi vectigal, &c.” Editor: “Hippolytus a Collibus, On the Growth of Cities, chapter 20. Plato likewise, Laws, book 7: no duty should be paid on necessities of life and things we cannot do without, etc.” Printed numbering retained; exact passages uncollated.

[1046] Burton. p. 63, l: “Plato 12. de legibus, 40. annos natos vult, ut si quid memorabile viderent apud exteros, hoc ipsum in rempub. recipiatur.” Editor: “Plato, Laws, book 12, requires them to be forty years old, so that if they see anything noteworthy abroad, it may be adopted in the commonwealth.” Compare Laws 951a–d on observers sent abroad: that passage specifies men over fifty. The forty-year threshold occurs in the preceding general restriction on travel; Burton appears to combine the provisions.

[1047] Editor. A church living or benefice is an ecclesiastical office with its income. Impropriation places church revenues in lay hands; patronage confers a right to nominate a cleric. Burton prefers collective patronage and examined candidates. Auditors means hearers, the congregation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If it were possible, I would have such priests as should imitate Christ, charitable lawyers should love their neighbors as themselvs, temperate and modest Physicians, Politicians should contemn the world, Philosophers should know themselves, Noblemen live honestly, Tradesmen leave lying and cosening, Magistrates corruption, &c. but this is unpossible, I must get such as I may.	If it were possible, I would have priests who imitate Christ; charitable lawyers who love their neighbours as themselves; temperate, modest physicians; statesmen who despise worldly things; philosophers who know themselves; noblemen who live honestly; tradesmen who give up lying and cheating; and magistrates who abandon corruption. But this is impossible. I must take such people as I can get.
I will therefore have [1048] of lawyers, judges, advocates, physicians, chirurgions, &c. a set number, [1049] and every man, if it be possible, to plead his own cause, to tell that tale to the judge, which he doth to his advocate, as at Fez in Africk, Bantam, Aleppo, Raguse, suam quisque causam dicere tenetur.	I will therefore allow a fixed number of lawyers, judges, advocates, physicians, surgeons, and so on. Wherever possible, everyone shall plead his own case, telling the judge the story he now tells his advocate, as at Fez in Africa, Bantam, Aleppo, and Ragusa: each person is required to plead his own case.
Those Advocate, Chirurgions and [1050] Physicians, which are allowed to be maintained out of the [1051] common treasure, no fees to be given or taken upon pain of losing their places; or if they do, very small fees, and when the [1052] cause is fully ended.	The advocates, surgeons, and physicians who are authorised to practise shall be maintained from the public treasury. No fees shall be given or accepted, on pain of dismissal; or, if fees are permitted, they shall be very small and payable only when the case is completely finished.

[1048] Burton. p. 64, m: “Simlerus in Helvetia.” Editor: Simler on Switzerland. Exact passage uncollated.

[1049] Burton. p. 64, n: “Utopienses causidicos excludunt, qui causas callide & vafre tractent & disputent. Iniquissimum censent hominem ullis obligari legibus, quæ aut numerosiores sunt, quàm ut perlegi queant, aut obscuriores quàm ut à quovis possint intelligi. Volunt ut suam quisq; causam agat, eamq; referat Judici quam narraturus fuerat patrono, sic minus erit ambagum, & veritas facilius elicitur. Mor. Utop. l. 2.” Editor: “The Utopians exclude lawyers who handle and argue cases craftily and cunningly. They consider it most unjust to bind anyone by laws too numerous to be read through, or too obscure for anyone to understand. They wish each person to plead his own case, telling the judge what he would have told his advocate; thus there will be fewer complications, and the truth is more easily brought out.” More, Utopia, book 2, in the discussion of laws. Burton condenses and rearranges More’s argument.

[1050] Burton. p. 64, o: “Medici ex publico victum sumunt. Boter. l. 1. c. 5. de Ægyptiis.” Editor: “Physicians receive their maintenance from public funds.” Botero, book 1, chapter 5, on the Egyptians; exact passage uncollated.

[1051] Burton. p. 64, p: “De his lege Patrit. l. 3 tit. 8 de reip. Instit.” Editor: “On these matters read Patrizi, On the Institution of a Republic, book 3, title 8.” Exact passage uncollated.

[1052] Burton. p. 64, q: “Nihil à clientibus patroni accipiant, priusquam lis finita est. Barcl. Argen. lib. 3.” Editor: “Advocates should accept nothing from their clients before the suit is finished.” Barclay, Argenis, book 3; exact passage uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1053] He that sues any man shall put in a pledge, which if it be proved he hath wrongfully sued his adversary, rashly or maliciously, he shall forfeit, and lose. Or else before any suit begin, the plaintiff shall have his complaint approved by a set delegacy to that purpose; if it be of moment he shall be suffered as before, to proceed, if otherwise they shall determine it. All causes shall be pleaded suppresso nomine, the parties names concealed, if some circumstances do not otherwise require.	Anyone who brings a lawsuit shall lodge a deposit, which he shall forfeit if it is proved that he has sued his opponent wrongfully, rashly, or maliciously. Alternatively, before proceedings begin, the plaintiff shall have his complaint approved by a commission appointed for that purpose. If it is substantial, he shall be allowed to proceed as described; otherwise the commissioners shall settle it. All cases shall be pleaded with names suppressed—the parties' names concealed—unless particular circumstances require otherwise.
Judges and other officers shall be aptly disposed in each Province, Villages, Cities, as common arbitrators to hear causes, and end all controversies, and those not single, but three at least on the bench at once, to determine or give sentence and those again to sit by turns or lots, and not to continue still in the same office.	Judges and other officers shall be suitably distributed throughout each province, its villages and cities, serving as public arbitrators to hear cases and settle every dispute. They shall not sit alone: at least three shall sit on the bench together to decide a case or pass sentence. They shall serve in rotation or by lot, and shall not remain permanently in the same office.

[1053] Burton. p. 64, r: "It is so in most free cities in Germany." Editor: The anchor precedes the required deposit by a plaintiff; it is retained there.

Original text 1651	Modern English
No controversie to depend above a year, but without all delays and further appeals to be speedily dispatched, and finally concluded in that time allotted. These and all other inferior Magistrates, to be chosen [1054] as the Literati in China, or by those exact suffrages of the [1055] Venetians, and such again shall not be eligible, or capable of magistracies, honours, offices, except they be sufficiently [1056] qualified for learning, maners, and that by the strict approbation of deputed examinators:	No dispute shall remain pending for more than a year: without delays or further appeals, it shall be swiftly dealt with and finally settled within that time. These and all other lower magistrates shall be selected like the learned officials of China, or by the Venetians' scrupulous voting procedures. No one shall be eligible for magistracies, honours, or offices without sufficient learning and good character, confirmed by a rigorous examination conducted by appointed examiners;
[1057] first Scholars to take place, then Souldiers; for I am of Vigetius his opinion, a Scholar deserves better then a Souldier, because Vnius ætatis sunt quæ fortiter fiunt, quæ vero pro utilitate Reipub. scribuntur, æterna: a Souldiers work lasts for an age, a Scholars for ever.	scholars shall take precedence, then soldiers. For I share Vegetius's opinion: a scholar deserves more than a soldier, because brave deeds belong to a single age, but writings for the benefit of the commonwealth endure for ever. A soldier's work lasts for an age, a scholar's for ever.[1058]

[1054] Burton. p. 64, s: "Mat. Riccius expedit. in Sinas l. 1. c. 5. de examinatione electionum copiosè agit, &c." Editor: "Matteo Ricci, Expedition into China, book 1, chapter 5, treats examinations and selections at length, etc."

[1055] Burton. p. 64, t: "Contar. de repub. Venet. l. 1." Editor: Contarini, On the Republic of Venice, book 1; exact passage uncollated.

[1056] Burton. p. 64, u: "Osor l. 11. de reb. gest. Eman. Qui in literis maximos progressus fecerint maximis honoribus afficiuntur: secundus honoris gradus militibus assignatur, postremi ordinis mechanicis, doctorum hominum judiciis in altiorem locum quisq; præfectus, & qui a plurimis approbatur, ampliores in rep. dignitates consequitur. Qui in hoc examine primas habet, insigni per totam vitam dignitate insignitur, marchioni similis, aut duci apud nos." Editor: "Osório, Deeds of Manuel, book 11. Those who have made the greatest progress in learning receive the highest honours; the second rank is assigned to soldiers, the lowest to artisans. Each is promoted to a higher position by the judgement of learned men, and whoever wins most approval receives higher public dignities. Whoever comes first in this examination is distinguished for life by an eminent rank, like a marquis or duke among us." The report and comparison are Burton's cited account, not an independently established description of Chinese institutions.

[1057] Burton. p. 64, x: "Cedant arma togæ." Editor: "Let arms yield to the toga": military force to civil authority. Compare Cicero, On Duties 1.77, quoting his own verse.

[1058] Editor. Vegetius, Epitome of Military Science 2.3, contrasts deeds limited to one age with writings of lasting public usefulness. Burton broadens this into a claim for the precedence of scholars. Both the Latin proposition and his English restatement are translated here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 64–65 If they [1059] misbehave themselves, they shal be deposed, and accordingly punished, & whether their offices be annuall [1060]or otherwise, once a year they shall be called in question, and give an account; for men are partial and passionate, mercilesse, covetous, corrupt, subject to love, hate, fear, favor, &c. omne sub regno graviore regnum: like Solons Areopagites, or those Roman Censors, some shall visit others, and [1061] be visited invicem themselves,	If they misconduct themselves, they shall be removed from office and punished accordingly. Whether their appointments are annual or otherwise, they shall be examined and required to render an account once a year. For people are biased and passionate, merciless, covetous, corrupt, swayed by love, hatred, fear, favour, and so on: every sovereignty is subject to a greater sovereignty. Like Solon's Areopagites or the Roman censors, some shall inspect others and in turn be inspected themselves;[1062]

[1059] Burton. p. 64, y: "As in Berna, Lucerne, Friburge in Switzerland, a vitious liver is uncapable of any office; if a Senator, instantly deposed. Simlerus." Editor: A vitious liver is a person who lives viciously. The reference to Simler remains uncollated.

[1060] Burton. p. 64, z: "Not above three years, Arist. polit. 5. c. 8." Editor: The printed z follows "annuall," before "or otherwise"; the note is attached there. It concerns the length of office, which Burton distinguishes from the annual review that follows. The Aristotle reference is retained; its exact passage remains uncollated.

[1061] Burton. p. 64, a: "Nam quis custodiet ipsos custodes?" Editor: "For who will guard the guardians themselves?" Compare Juvenal, Satire 6.347–348. Burton answers with reciprocal inspection.

[1062] Editor. "Every sovereignty is subject to a greater sovereignty" is Seneca, Thyestes 612, with the final est omitted by Burton. The Areopagus is the Athenian council invoked as a guardian of conduct; Roman censors also scrutinised public morals. Visit here means inspect, not pay a social call.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 65 [1063] they shall oversee that no proling officer, under colour of authority shall insult over his inferiors, as so many wild beasts, oppresse, domineer, flea, grinde, or trample on, be partial or corrupt, but that there be æquabile jus, justice equally done, live as friends & brethren together;	they shall see that no predatory official, using authority as a pretext, treats his subordinates like wild beasts, oppressing them, lording it over them, fleecing, grinding down, or trampling on them, or acts with partiality or corruption. There shall instead be equal justice—justice impartially administered—and people shall live together as friends and brothers;
and which [1064] Sesellius would have and so much desires in his kingdom of France, a diapason and sweet harmony of Kings, Princes, Nobles, and Plebeians so mutually tied and involved in love, as well as laws and authority, as that they never disagree, insult or incroach one upon another. If any man deserve well in his office he shall be rewarded. — quis enim virtutem amplectitur ipsam, præmia si tollas? —	there shall be what Sesellius so earnestly wishes for in his kingdom of France: a full and sweet harmony of kings, princes, nobles, and commoners, so closely bound together by affection as well as by law and authority that they never fall out, lord it over one another, or encroach on one another. Anyone who serves well in office shall be rewarded. For who embraces virtue for its own sake If you take away the rewards?[1065]

[1063] Burton. p. 65, b: “Cytreus in Greisgeia. Qui non ex sublimi despiciant inferiores, nec ut bestias conculcent sibi subditos authoritatis nomini confisi, &c.” Editor: “Who should not look down on inferiors from on high, or trample on their subjects as if they were beasts, relying on the name of authority, etc.” The printed citation and the irregular nomini are retained; the work remains unidentified.

[1064] Burton. p. 65, c: “Sesellius de rep. Gallorum lib. 1. & 2.” Editor: Claude de Seyssel, on the French commonwealth, books 1 and 2; exact passage uncollated.

[1065] Editor. The verse is Juvenal, Satire 10.141–142. Diapason is a complete musical octave, used here for social harmony. Burton combines distinctions of rank with mutual affection and rewards for service.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He that invents any thing for publike good in any Art or Science, writes a Treatise, [1066] or performs any noble exploit, at home or abroad,[1067] shall be accordingly enriched, [1068] honored, and preferred. I say with Hannibal in Ennius, Hostem qui feriet erit mihi Carthaginensis, let him be of what condition he will, in all offices, actions, he that deserves best shall have best.	Anyone who invents something for the public good in any art or science, writes a treatise, or performs a noble exploit at home or abroad shall receive wealth, honour, and advancement accordingly. I say with Hannibal in Ennius: whoever strikes the enemy shall count as a Carthaginian to me. Whatever a person's rank, in every office and undertaking, the most deserving shall receive the best reward.[1069]
Tilianus in Philomus out of a charitable minde no doubt, wisht all his books were gold and silver, jewels and precious stones, [1070] to redeem captives, set free prisoners, and relieve all poor distressed souls that wanted means; religiously done, I deny not, but to what purpose? Suppose this were so well done, within a little after, though a man had Cræsus wealth to bestow, there would be as many more.	Tilianus, in Philomus, wished—out of charity, no doubt—that all his books were gold and silver, jewels and precious stones, so that he could ransom captives, free prisoners, and relieve every poor distressed soul without the means to live. A pious act, I do not deny it; but to what purpose? Suppose this were successfully done: before long, even if a man had Croesus's wealth to distribute, there would be just as many more in need.[1071]

[1066] Burton. p. 65, d: "Si quis egregium aut bello aut pace perfecerit. Sesel. l. 1." Editor: "If anyone has accomplished something outstanding in war or peace." Seyssel, book 1; exact passage uncollated.

[1067] Burton. p. 65, second c in the margin, e in the body: "Ad regendam rempub. soli literati admittuntur, nec ad eam rem gratia magistratum aut regis indigent, omnia explorata cujusq; scientia & virtute pendent. Riccius lib. 1. cap. 5." Editor: "Only the learned are admitted to govern the commonwealth; for this they do not need the favour of magistrates or king. Everything depends on each person's tested learning and merit." Ricci, book 1, chapter 5. The repeated marginal c and the body's e are recorded rather than silently reconciled.

[1068] Burton. p. 65, f: "In defuncti locum eum jussit subrogari, qui inter majores virtute reliquis præiret; non fuit apud mortales ullum excellentius certamen, aut cujus victoria magis esset expetenda, non enim inter celeres, celerrimo, non inter robustos robustissimo, &c." Editor: "He ordered the dead man's place to be filled by whoever, among the elders, surpassed the others in virtue. There was no nobler contest among mortals, nor one whose victory was more desirable: for it was not awarded to the swiftest among the swift, or the strongest among the strong, etc." No source is named in this marginal entry. A close parallel is Plutarch, Life of Lycurgus 26.1, on electing the best-qualified elder to fill a vacancy in the senate. Burton's immediate Latin source is not established.

[1069] Editor. The Ennius fragment is preserved in Cicero, For Balbus 51, where Hannibal promises Carthaginian status to whoever strikes the enemy. Burton adapts it to advancement by merit, whatever a person's origin or rank.

[1070] Burton. p. 65, asterisk: "Nullum videres vel in hac vel in vicinis regionibus pauperem, nullum obæratum, &c." Editor: "You would see no poor person in this or the neighbouring regions, no one burdened with debt, etc." The connection with the Tilianus passage is retained; the source remains unresolved.

[1071] Editor. The printed Tilianus in Philomus is preserved; the exact work and passage remain unresolved. Croesus, the wealthy king of Lydia, is proverbial here. Burton's objection is to relief that leaves the causes of recurrent poverty untouched; it leads into his scheme of public maintenance and compulsory work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Wherefore I will suffer no [1072] Beggers, Rogues, Vagabonds, or idle persons at all, that cannot give an account of their lives how they [1073] maintain themselves: If they be impotent, lame, blinde, and single, they shall be sufficiently maintained in several hospitals, built for that purpose;	I will therefore allow no beggars, rogues, vagrants, or idle people who cannot account for how they live and support themselves. If they are unable to work, lame, or blind, and unmarried, they shall be adequately supported in institutions built for that purpose;
if married and infirm, past work, or by inevitable losse, or some such like misfortune cast behind, by distribution of [1074] corn, house-rent free, annual pensions or money, they shall be relieved, and highly rewarded for their good service they have formerly done; if able, they shall be enforced to work.	if they are married and infirm, past work, or brought into hardship by unavoidable loss or similar misfortune, they shall receive grain, rent-free housing, annual pensions, or money, and be generously rewarded for their past good service. Those who can work shall be compelled to do so.

[1072] Burton. p. 65, g: “Nullus mendicus apud Sinas, nemini sano quamvis oculis turbatus sit mendicare permittitur, omnes pro viribus laborare coguntur, cæci molis trusatilibus versandis addicuntur, soli hospitiis gaudent, qui ad labores sunt inepti. Osor. l. 11. de reb. gest. Eman. Heming. de reg. Chin. l. 1. c. 3. Gotard. Arth. Orient. Ind. descr.” Editor: “There are no beggars among the Chinese. No one in health, even if his sight is impaired, is permitted to beg; all are compelled to work according to their strength. Blind people are assigned to turning handmills; only those unfit for work receive institutional lodging.” Osório, Deeds of Manuel, book 11; Hemingius, On China, book 1, chapter 3; Gotardus Arthus, Description of the East Indies. These are Burton’s cited claims, not independently verified facts.

[1073] Burton. p. 65, h: “Alex. ab Alex. 3. c. 12.” Editor: Alexander ab Alexandro, book 3, chapter 12; exact passage uncollated.

[1074] Burton. p. 65, i: “Sic olim Romæ Isaac. Pontan. de his optimè. Amstol. l. 2. c. 9.” Editor: “So formerly at Rome. Isaac Pontanus treats these matters very well: Amsterdam, book 2, chapter 9.” Exact passage uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1075] For I see no reason (as [1076] he said) why an Epicure or idle drone, a rich glutton, a usurer should live at ease, and do nothing, live in honor, in all manner of pleasures, and oppresse others, when as in the mean time a poor laborer, a smith, a carpenter, an husbandman that hath spent his time in continual labour, as an Asse to carry burdens, to do the Commonwealth good, and without whom we cannot live, shall be left in his old age to begge or starve, and lead a miserable life worse then a jument.	For I see no reason, as he said, why a pleasure-seeker or idle drone, a rich glutton or moneylender, should live at ease, doing nothing, enjoying honour and every kind of pleasure, and oppressing others, while a poor labourer, smith, carpenter, or farmer, who has spent his life in ceaseless toil, carrying burdens like an ass for the commonwealth's benefit, and without whom we could not live, should be left in old age to beg or starve, leading a miserable life worse than a beast of burden.

[1075] Burton. p. 65, k: "Idem Aristot. pol. 5. c. 8. Vitiosum quum soli pauperum liberi educantur ad labores nobilium & divitum in voluptatibus & deliciis." Editor: "Likewise Aristotle, Politics, book 5, chapter 8. It is wrong when only the children of the poor are brought up to labour, while those of the noble and rich are brought up in pleasures and luxuries." The printed wording and reference are retained.

[1076] Burton. p. 65, l: "Quæ hæc injustitia ut nobilis quispiam, aut fœnerator qui nihil agat, lautam & splendidam vitam agat, otio & deliciis, quum interim auriga, faber, agricola, quo respub. carere non potest, vitam adeo miseram ducat, ut pejor quam jumentorum sit ejus conditio? Iniqua resp. quæ dat parasitis, adulatoribus, inanium voluptatum artificibus, generosis & otiosis tanta munera prodigit, at contra agricolis, carbonariis, aurigis, fabris, &c. nihil prospicit, sed eorum abusa labore florentis ætatis fame penset & ærumnis Mor. Utop. l. 2." Editor: "What injustice is this, that a nobleman or moneylender who does nothing should live splendidly in leisure and pleasure, while a carter, craftsman, or farmer, whom the commonwealth cannot do without, lives so miserably that his condition is worse than a beast's? An unjust commonwealth lavishes such gifts on parasites, flatterers, providers of empty pleasures, gentlemen, and the idle, yet makes no provision for farmers, charcoal burners, carters, craftsmen, and the like; after using their labour in the prime of life, it repays them with hunger and misery." More, Utopia, book 2, near the conclusion; Burton condenses More's argument. The irregular quæ dat … prodigit is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 65–66 As [1077] all conditions shall be tied to their task, so none shall be overtired, but have their set times of recreations and holidaies, indulgere genio, feasts & merry meetings, even to the meanest artificer, or basest servant, once a week to sing or dance, (though not all at once) or do whatsoever he shall please, like [1078] that Saccarum festum, amongst the Persians, those Saturnals in Rome, as well as his master.	Just as people of every rank shall be bound to their tasks, no one shall be overworked. Everyone shall have appointed times for recreation and holidays, to indulge their inclinations, with feasts and cheerful gatherings. Even the humblest craftsman or lowest servant shall be free once a week to sing or dance—though not all at once—or do whatever he pleases, as at the Persian festival of the Sacaea or the Roman Saturnalia, with as much freedom as his master.
Source page 66 [1079] If any be drunk, he shall drink no more wine or strong drink in a twelve moneth after. A bankrupt shall be [1080] Catademiatus in Ampitheatro, publikely shamed, and he that cannot pay his debts, if by riot or negligence he have been impoverished, shal be for a twelve-month imprisoned, if in that space his creditors be not satisfied, [1081] he shall be hanged.	Anyone who gets drunk shall drink no more wine or strong drink for the next twelve months. A bankrupt shall be publicly disgraced in the amphitheatre, publicly shamed. Anyone unable to pay his debts who has impoverished himself through extravagance or negligence shall be imprisoned for twelve months; if his creditors have not been paid within that time, he shall be hanged.[1082]

[1077] Burton. p. 65, m: “In Segovia nemo otiosus, nemo mendicus nisi per ætatem aut morbum opus facere non potest: nulli deest unde victum quærat, aut quo se exerceat. Cypr. Echovius Delit. Hispan. Nullus Genevæ otiosus, ne septennis puer. Paulus Heuzner Itiner.” Editor: “In Segovia no one is idle, no one begs unless age or illness prevents work; no one lacks a means of earning a living or an occupation. Cyprian Echovius, Delights of Spain. No one in Geneva is idle, not even a boy of seven. Paul Hentzner, Itinerary.” Exact passages remain uncollated.

[1078] Burton. p. 66, n: “Atheneus l. 12.” Editor: Athenaeus, book 12, as printed. The relevant account is in The Learned Banqueters 14.44 (639c): a Babylonian festival in which masters temporarily obey slaves. The following section also discusses the Roman Saturnalia. Burton calls the Sacaea Persian.

[1079] Burton. p. 66, o: “Simlerus de repub. Helvet.” Editor: Simler, On the Swiss Commonwealth; exact passage uncollated.

[1080] Burton. p. 66, p: “Spartian. olim Romæ sic.” Editor: “Spartianus: so formerly at Rome.” The passage is Historia Augusta, Life of Hadrian 18.9, traditionally ascribed to Spartianus. It orders people who squandered their property, if legally independent, to be flogged in the amphitheatre and released; its verb is catomidiari. Burton’s printed Catademiatus in Ampitheatro is retained, and the modern column follows his own gloss, “publikely shamed,” rather than substituting the fuller punishment in the source.

[1081] Burton. p. 66, q: “He that provides not for his family, is worse then a thief. Paul.” Editor: Compare 1 Timothy 5:8, which says “worse than an infidel” in the King James Bible, not “thief.” Burton’s wording is retained.

[1082] Editor. Riot here means extravagance or dissolute living. Burton’s commonwealth combines public welfare with severe punitive rules; the modern text retains the death penalty he proposes for certain insolvent debtors.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He [1083] that commits sacriledge shall lose his hands: he that bears false-witnesse, or is of perjury convict, shall have his tongue cut out, except he redeem it with his head. Murder, [1084] adultery shall be punished by death, [1085] but not theft, except it be some more grievous offence, or notorious offenders: otherwise they shal be condemned to the gallies, mines, be his slaves whom they offended, during their lives.	Anyone who commits sacrilege shall lose his hands. Anyone who bears false witness or is convicted of perjury shall have his tongue cut out, unless he gives his head to save it. Murder and adultery shall be punished by death, but theft shall not, except in especially serious cases or where the offenders are notorious. Otherwise they shall be condemned for life to the galleys or mines, or to slavery under the person they wronged.[1086]
I hate all hereditary slaves, and that duram Persarum legem, as [1087] Brisonius cals it; or as [1088] Ammianus, impendio formidatas & abominandas leges, per quas ob noxam unius, omnis propinquitas perit, hard law that wife and children, friends and allies should suffer for the fathers offence.	I detest all hereditary slavery, and that harsh law of the Persians, as Brisson calls it; or, in Ammianus's words, those exceedingly terrible and abominable laws by which an entire family perishes for one person's offence: the harsh law that makes a wife and children, friends and relations suffer for the father's crime.

[1083] Burton. p. 66, r: "Alfredi lex. utraque manus & lingua præcidatur, nisi eam capite redemerit." Editor: "Alfred's law: let both hands and the tongue be cut off, unless he redeems it with his head." The note is attached where printed, at sacrilege; the body distributes the penalties across sacrilege and perjury. Attribution uncollated.

[1084] Burton. p. 66, s: "Si quis nuptam stuprârit, virga virilis ei præciditur; si mulier, nasus & auriculæ præcidatur. Alfredi lex. En leges ipsi Veneri Martique timendas." Editor: "If a man has illicit intercourse with a married woman, his penis is cut off; if a woman, her nose and ears are cut off. Alfred's law. Behold laws to make Venus and Mars themselves afraid." The irregular Latin agreement is retained. Exact legal source uncollated.

[1085] Burton. p. 66, t: "Pauperes non peccant, quum extrema necessitate coacti rem alienam capiunt. Maldonat. Summula quæst. 8. art. 3. Ego cum illis sentio qui licere putant à divite clam accipere qui tenetur pauperi subvenire. Emmanuel Sa. Aphor. confess." Editor: "The poor do not sin when extreme necessity compels them to take another's property. Maldonado, Summula, question 8, article 3. I agree with those who think it lawful to take secretly from a rich man who is obliged to help the poor. Manuel de Sá, Aphorisms for Confessors." Exact passages uncollated.

[1086] Editor. To "redeem it with his head" means to save the tongue by accepting execution instead. The following rejection of hereditary slavery does not cancel the lifelong penal slavery proposed here.

[1087] Burton. p. 66, u: "Lib. 2. de reg. Persarum." Editor: Brisson, on the Persian kingdom, book 2; exact passage uncollated.

[1088] Burton. p. 66, x: "Lib. 24." Editor: The passage is Ammianus Marcellinus 23.6.81, in the description of Persian laws. Burton compresses its account of terrifying laws and laws under which an offender's entire kinship group perishes. His printed book number 24 is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
No man shall marry until he [1089] be 25. no woman till she be 20. [1090] nisi aliter dispensatum fuerit. If one [1091] die, the other party shall not marry till six months after;	No man shall marry before twenty-five, and no woman before twenty, unless special permission is given. If one spouse dies, the other shall not remarry for six months; and because many families are compelled to live niggardly, exhaust and undone by great dowers, [1092] none shal be given at all, or very little, and that by supervisors rated, they that are foul shal have a greater portion; if fair, none at all, or very little: [1093] howsoever not to exceed such a rate as those supervisors shal think fit.	and because large dowries exhaust and ruin many families, forcing them to live parsimoniously, no dowries shall be given, or only small ones assessed by appointed supervisors. Women who are unattractive shall have larger portions; those who are beautiful shall have none, or very little. In every case the amount shall stay within the limit the supervisors consider appropriate.[1094]

[1089] Burton. p. 66, y: “Aliter Aristoteles, a man at 25. a woman at 20. polit.” Editor: Aliter means “otherwise.” The printed ages match Burton’s body text, despite that opening word. Aristotle, Politics 7.16, instead recommends about eighteen for women and thirty-seven for men. The discrepancy is retained.

[1090] Burton. p. 66, z: “Lex olim Licurgi, hodie Chinensium; vide Plutarchum, Riccium, Hemmingium, Arnisæum, Nevisanum, & alios de hac quæstione.” Editor: “Formerly the law of Lycurgus, today that of the Chinese; see Plutarch, Ricci, Hemmingius, Arnisaeus, Nevizanus, and others on this question.” The authorities and exact scope of the comparison remain uncollated.

[1091] Burton. p. 66, a: “Alfredus.” Editor: Alfred; exact legal source uncollated.

[1092] Burton. p. 66, b: “Apud Lacones olim virgines sine dote nubebant. Boter. l. 3. c. 3.” Editor: “Among the Spartans, maidens formerly married without dowries. Botero, book 3, chapter 3.” Exact passage uncollated.

[1093] Burton. p. 66, c: “Lege cautum non ita pridem apud Venetes, ne quis Patritius dotem excederet 1500 coron.” Editor: “Not long ago the Venetians provided by law that no patrician should exceed a dowry of 1,500 crowns.” Burton’s historical claim has not been independently established.

[1094] Editor. Dowers here means dowries or marriage portions, not specifically a widow’s dower. Foul and fair refer to perceived physical attractiveness. Burton proposes public control of marriage payments.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And when once they come to those years, poverty shall hinder no man from marriage, or any other respect, [1095] but all shall be rather inforced then hindered, [1096] except they be [1097] dismembred, or grievously deformed, infirm, or visited with some enormous hereditary disease, in body or mind; in such cases upon a great pain, or mulct, [1098] man or woman shall not marry, other order shall be taken for them to their content. If people overabound, they shall be eased by [1099] Colonies.	Once they reach those ages, poverty or any other consideration shall prevent no one from marrying; everyone shall be compelled rather than obstructed. The exceptions are those who have lost limbs, are severely deformed or infirm, or have some grave hereditary disease of body or mind. In such cases neither man nor woman shall marry, on pain of a heavy punishment or fine; other arrangements shall be made to their satisfaction. If the population grows too large, colonies shall relieve it.[1100]

[1095] Burton. p. 66, d: “Bux. Synag. Iud. Sic Iudæi. Leo Afer Africæ descript. ne sint aliter incontinentes ob reipub. bonum. Ut August. Cæsar. orat. ad cœlibes Romanos olim edocuit.” Editor: “Buxtorf, Jewish Synagogue. So the Jews. Leo Africanus, Description of Africa: lest they otherwise be unchaste, for the commonwealth’s good, as Augustus Caesar once taught in his address to unmarried Romans.” Exact passages uncollated; the generalisations are Burton’s.

[1096] Burton. p. 66, e: “Morbo laborans, qui in prolem facile diffunditur, ne genus humanum fœda contagione lædatur, juventute castratur; mulieres tales procul a consortio virorum ablegantur, &c. Hector Boethius hist. lib. 1. de vet. Scotorum moribus.” Editor: “A person suffering from a disease easily transmitted to offspring is castrated in youth, lest humankind be harmed by foul infection; women of that kind are banished far from the company of men, etc. Hector Boece, History, book 1, on the ancient customs of the Scots.” Burton’s cited account, not an independently established description.

[1097] Burton. p. 66, f: “Speciosissimi juvenes liberis dabunt operam. Plato 5. de legibus.” Editor: “The handsomest young men shall devote themselves to producing children. Plato, Laws, book 5.” Printed attribution retained; exact passage uncollated.

[1098] Burton. p. 66, g: “The Saxons exclude dumb, blinde, leprous, and such like persons from all inheritance, as we do fools.” Editor: The historical legal comparison is retained but remains uncollated. Fools here is an old legal and social designation associated with intellectual incapacity.

[1099] Burton. p. 66, h: “Ut olim Romani, Hispani hodie, &c.” Editor: “As formerly the Romans, and today the Spaniards, etc.” The comparison concerns colonies as an outlet for population.

[1100] Editor. The scheme compels marriage while excluding people on grounds of disability and supposed hereditary disease. The accompanying marginal account includes castration. These are features of Burton’s imagined polity and cited historical claims; the terms and assumptions are preserved for examination.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1101] No man shall wear weapons in any City. The same attire shall be kept, and that proper to several callings, by which they shall be distinguished. [1102] Luxus funerum shall be taken away, that intempestive expense moderated, and many others.	No one shall carry weapons in any city. People shall retain a fixed form of dress appropriate to their different occupations, so that these can be distinguished. Extravagance at funerals shall be abolished, that ill-timed expense restrained, along with many others.
Brokers, takers of pawns, biting usurers, I will not admit; yet because hic cum hominibus non cum diis agitur, we converse here with men, not with gods, and for the hardnesse of mens hearts I will tolerate some kinde of usury. If we were honest, I confesse, si probi essemus, we should have no use of it, but being as it is, we must necessarily admit it.[1103]	I will admit no brokers, pawnbrokers, or extortionate moneylenders. Yet because we are dealing here with human beings, not gods—we have to do with men, not gods—and because people's hearts are hard, I will tolerate some lending at interest. If we were honest, I confess, if we were upright people, we should have no need of it; but as things stand, we must necessarily allow it.[1104]

[1101] Burton. p. 66, i: "Riccius lib. 11. cap. 5. de Sinarum. expedit. sic Hispani cogunt Mauros arma deponere. So it is in most Italian cities." Editor: "Ricci, Expedition into China, book 11, chapter 5, as printed; so the Spaniards compel the Moors to lay down their weapons." Printed book number, exact passage, and comparisons uncollated.

[1102] Burton. p. 66, k: "Idem Plato 12. de legibus, it hath ever been immoderate vide Guil. Stuckium antiq. convival. lib. 1. cap. 26." Editor: "Likewise Plato, Laws, book 12; see Wilhelm Stucki, Antiquities of Feasting, book 1, chapter 26." Exact passages uncollated.

[1103] Burton. p. 66, l: "Plato 9. de legibus." Editor: "Plato, Laws, book 9." No clear l anchor is visible in the body. The note is provisionally attached to the discussion of lending at interest; its placement and printed book number require collation.

[1104] Editor. Usury can mean lending at interest generally, whereas biting usurers are extortionate lenders. Burton moves from rejection to a regulated exception, with approved lenders, borrowers, rates, and a common bank. Both the Latin clauses and his English restatements are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 66–67 Howsoever most Divines contradict it, Dicimus inficias, sed vox ea sola reperta est. it must be winked at by Politicians. And yet some great Doctors approve of it, Calvin, Bucer, Zanchius, P. Martyr, because by so many grand lawyers, decrees of Emperors, Princes Statutes, customs of Common-wealths, churches approbations it is permitted, &c. I wil therefore allow it.	However much most theologians oppose it— We deny it, but the denial is only words. Statesmen must turn a blind eye. Some eminent theologians nevertheless approve it: Calvin, Bucer, Zanchi, and Peter Martyr, since it is permitted by so many great jurists, imperial decrees, princely statutes, the customs of commonwealths, and the approval of churches, and so on. I will therefore allow it.[1105]
Source page 67 But to no private persons, not to every man that wil, to orphans only, maids, widows, or such as by reason of their age, sex, education, ignorance of trading, know not otherwise how to employ it, and those so approved, not to let it out apart, but to bring their money to a [1106] common bank which shall be allowed in every city, as in Genua, Geneva, Noremberg, Venice, at [1107] 5, 6, 7. not above 8 per centum, as the supervisors, or ærarii præfecti shall think fit.	But I will not permit private individuals to lend simply because they choose to. Permission shall be given only to orphans, unmarried women, widows, or those whose age, sex, education, or ignorance of trade leaves them no other way to employ their money. Even those approved shall not lend separately: they shall bring their money to a common bank authorised in every city, as at Genoa, Geneva, Nuremberg, and Venice, at five, six, or seven per cent, and never above eight, as the supervisors or treasury officials consider appropriate.

[1105] Editor. Doctors here are learned theologians. P. Martyr is Peter Martyr Vermigli. The unattributed verse beginning Dicimus inficias remains unlocated; the translation takes its force from Burton's contrast between verbal condemnation and practical toleration.

[1106] Burton. p. 67, m: "As those Lombards beyond Seas, though with some reformation, mons pietatis, or bank of charity, as Malines terms it, cap. 33. Lex mercat. part. 2. that lend money upon easie pawns, or take money upon adventure for mens lives." Editor: Lombards here are moneylenders; a mons pietatis is a charitable lending institution. Malynes, Lex Mercatoria, part 2, chapter 33, as printed; exact passage uncollated.

[1107] Burton. p. 67, n: "That proportion will make merchandise increase, land dearer, and better improved, as he hath judicially proved in his tract of usury, exhibited to the Parliament, anno 1621." Editor: The author is not named in this entry; attribution remains unresolved. The claimed effects are Burton's report, not an established economic result.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1108] And as it shall not be lawful for each man to be an Usurer that will, so shall it not be lawful for all to take up money at use, not to prodigals and spendthrifts, but to merchants, yong tradesmen, such as stand in need, or know honestly how to imploy it, whose necessity, cause and condition the said supervisors shall approve of.	Just as not everyone who wishes shall be allowed to lend at interest, neither shall everyone be allowed to borrow at interest. Permission shall go to merchants, young tradesmen, and those in need or able to employ the money honestly, rather than to prodigals and spendthrifts. The supervisors shall examine and approve their need, purpose, and circumstances.
I wil have no private monopolies, to enrich one man, and begger a multitude, [1109] multiplicity of offices, of supplying by deputies, weights and measures the same throughout, and those rectified by the Primum mobile, and Suns motion, threescore miles to a degree according to observation, 1000. Geometrical paces to a mile, five foot to a pace, twelve inches to a foot, &c. & from measures known it is an easie matter to rectifie weights &c. to cast up all, and resolve bodies by Algebra, Stereometry.	I will have no private monopolies that enrich one person and impoverish many, no accumulation of offices, and no discharge of their duties through deputies. Weights and measures shall be uniform everywhere, determined by the motion of the outermost celestial sphere and the sun: sixty miles to a degree, according to observation; a thousand geometrical paces to a mile; five feet to a pace; twelve inches to a foot; and so on. Once measures are established, it is easy to standardise weights, calculate everything, and determine the dimensions of solid bodies through algebra and solid geometry.[1110]

[1108] Burton. p. 67, o: “Hoc fere Zanchius com. in 4 cap. ad Ephes. æquissimam vocat usuram, & charitati Christianæ consentaneam, modo non exigant, &c. nec omnes dent ad fœnus, sed ii qui in pecuniis bona habent, & ob ætatem, sexum, artis alicujus ignorantiâ, non possunt uti. Nec omnibus, sed mercatoribus & iis qui honestè impendent, &c.” Editor: “Zanchi, commentary on Ephesians chapter 4, calls approximately this form of interest entirely just and consistent with Christian charity, provided they do not exact it, etc.; not everyone should lend, but those whose wealth is in money and who cannot otherwise use it because of age, sex, or ignorance of a trade. Nor should loans go to everyone, but to merchants and those who will spend honestly, etc.” Printed ellipses and irregular construction retained; exact passage uncollated.

[1109] Burton. p. 67, p: “Idem apud Persas olim, lege Brisonium.” Editor: “Likewise among the Persians formerly; read Brisson.” Exact passage uncollated.

[1110] Editor. Primum mobile is the outermost moving sphere in an older model of the heavens. Burton seeks common units based on astronomical and geometrical measurement; his figures are retained rather than converted into modern miles. Stereometry is the measurement of solids.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I hate wars if they be not ad populi salutem, upon urgent occasion, Odimus accipitrem, quia semper vivit in armis. [1111] offensive wars, except the cause be very just, I will not allow of.	I detest wars unless they serve the people's safety and arise from urgent necessity. We hate the hawk because it always lives at war. I will permit no offensive war unless its cause is entirely just.[1112]
For I do highly magnifie that saying of Hannibal to Scipio, in [1113] Livy, It had been a blessed thing for you and us, if God had given that minde to our predecessors, that you had been content with Italy, we with Africk. For neither Sicily, nor Sardinia are worth such cost and pains, so many fleets and armies, or so many famous Captains lives.	For I greatly admire what Hannibal says to Scipio in Livy: it would have been a blessing for both you and us if God had inclined our predecessors to be content, you with Italy and we with Africa. Neither Sicily nor Sardinia is worth such expense and suffering, so many fleets and armies, or the lives of so many famous commanders.
Omnia prius tentanda, fair means shall first be tried. [1114] Peragit tranquilla potestas, Quod violenta nequit. I will have them proceed with all moderation: but hear you, Fabius my General, not Minutius, nam [1115] qui Consilio nititur plus hostibus nocet, quam qui sine animi ratione, viribus:	Everything must first be tried: peaceful means shall be tried first. Calm authority achieves what violence cannot. I will have them proceed with the utmost moderation. But listen: Fabius shall be my general, not Minutius, for a man who relies on judgement harms the enemy more than one who relies on strength without using his reason;[1116]

[1111] Burton. p. 67, q: "Idem Plato de legibus." Editor: "Likewise Plato, Laws." Exact passage uncollated.

[1112] Editor. The hawk verse is Ovid, The Art of Love 2.147. Its original context favours gentleness in love; Burton applies it to warfare.

[1113] Burton. p. 67, r: "Lib. 30. Optimum quidem fuerat eam patribus nostris mentem a diis datam esse, ut vos Italiæ, nos Africæ imperio contenti essemus. Neque enim Sicilia aut Sardinia satis digna precia sunt pro tot classibus, &c." Editor: "Book 30. It would have been best if the gods had given our fathers such a mind that you were content with dominion over Italy and we over Africa. For Sicily or Sardinia are not a sufficient price for so many fleets, etc." Livy 30.30, Hannibal's appeal to Scipio. Burton's English changes the plural gods to God and expands the abbreviated marginal quotation.

[1114] Burton. p. 67, s: "Claudian." Editor: Claudian, Panegyric on the Consulship of Manlius Theodorus 239–240. The maxim is repeated in marginal note x below.

[1115] Burton. p. 67, asterisk at qui Consilio: "Thucidides." Editor: Thucydides; the precise source of this Latin formulation remains unlocated.

[1116] Editor. Fabius and Minutius represent contrasting approaches to command: caution and rash engagement. Compare Livy, book 22, especially the disputes and rescue described in chapters 23–30. Both the Latin Omnia prius tentanda and Burton's more specific English restatement are translated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And in such wars to abstain as much as is possible from [1117] depopulations, burning of towns, massacring of infants, &c. For defensive wars, I will have forces still ready at a small warning, by land and sea, a prepared Navy, souldiers in procinctu, & quam [1118] Bonfinius apud Hungaros suos vult, virgam ferream, and money which is nervus belli, still in a readinesse,	and in such wars they shall refrain as far as possible from laying waste to inhabited lands, burning towns, massacring infants, and the like. For defensive wars, I will have forces on land and sea always ready at short notice: a fleet prepared, soldiers equipped for action, and that iron rod which Bonfini wishes for among his Hungarians; money too, the sinew of war, shall always be ready; and a sufficient revenue, a third part as in old [1119][1120] Rome and Egypt, reserved for the Common-wealth; to avoid those heavy taxes and impositions, as well to defray this charge of wars, as also all other publike defalcations, expences, fees, pensions, reparations, chast sports, feasts, donaries, rewards, and entertainments.	and sufficient revenue shall be reserved for the commonwealth—a third part, as in ancient Rome and Egypt—to avoid heavy taxes and levies. It shall cover the cost of war and every other public disbursement: expenses, fees, pensions, repairs, innocent sports, feasts, gifts, rewards, and hospitality.[1121]

[1117] Burton. p. 67, t: “A depopulatione, agrorum incendiis, & ejusmodi factis immanibus. Plato.” Editor: “From depopulation, burning fields, and monstrous acts of this kind. Plato.” Exact passage uncollated.

[1118] Burton. p. 67, asterisk at Bonfinius: “Hungar. dec. 1. lib. 9.” Editor: Bonfini, Hungarian History, decade 1, book 9. Virgam ferream means “an iron rod,” an image of coercive force; exact passage uncollated.

[1119] Burton. p. 67, u: “Sesellius lib. 2. de repub. Gal. valde enim est indecorum, ubi quod præter opinionem accidit dicere, Non putaram, præsertim si res præcaveri potuerit.” Editor: “Seyssel, on the French commonwealth, book 2. For it is deeply shameful, when something unexpected happens, to say ‘I had not thought of that,’ especially if it could have been prevented.” The u is printed before Rome; the note is restored there. Its subject suits the later “maturely done”; the mismatch is retained. Seyssel’s exact passage remains uncollated.

[1120] Burton. p. 67, unlettered entry after u: “Livius lib. 1. Dion. lib. 2. Diodorus Siculus lib. 2.” Editor: Livy, book 1; Dionysius, book 2; Diodorus Siculus, book 2. The body u belongs to Seyssel. This unlettered entry is supplied beside Rome and Egypt; its passages, numbers and the expansion of Dion. as Dionysius of Halicarnassus remain uncollated.

[1121] Editor. Defalcations here means deductions or disbursements from revenue, not the modern sense of embezzlement. Burton does not specify a modern accounting basis for the “third part”; the numerical proposal is left as he states it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 67–68 All things in this nature especially I will have maturely done, and with great [1122] deliberation: ne quid [1123] temerè, ne quid remissè ac timidè fiat. Sed quò feror hospes? To prosecute the rest would require a volume. Manum de tabella, I have been overtedious in this subject; I could have here willingly ranged, but these straits wherein I am included will not permit.	Above all, I will have matters of this kind carried out with due consideration and great deliberation, so that nothing is done rashly, nothing slackly or timidly. But where am I being carried, a stranger here? To pursue the rest would take a whole volume. Take your hand from the picture: I have dwelt too long on this subject. I would gladly have wandered further here, but the narrow limits within which I am confined will not allow it.[1124]
Source page 68 From Common-wealths and cities, I will descend to Families, which have as many corsives & molestations, as frequent discontents as the rest. Great affinity there is betwixt a Political and Oeconomical body; they differ only in magnitude and proportion of businesse (so Scaliger [1125] writes) as they have both likely the same period, as [1126] Bodin and [1127] Peucer hold, out of Plato, six or seven hundred years, so many times they have the same means of their vexation and overthrows;	From commonwealths and cities I will come down to households, which have as many corrosive troubles and vexations, and discontents as frequent, as the rest. A political body and a household body are closely akin: they differ only in size and the scale of their affairs, as Scaliger writes. Just as both apparently have the same lifespan—six or seven hundred years, according to Bodin and Peucer, drawing on Plato—so they often suffer distress and ruin from the same causes;[1128]

[1122] Burton. p. 67, x: “peragit tranquilla potestas, Quod violenta nequit. — Claudian.” Editor: “Calm authority achieves what violence cannot.” Claudian, Panegyric on the Consulship of Manlius Theodorus 239–240. This repeats the maxim cited earlier; both occurrences are retained.

[1123] Burton. p. 67, y: “Bellum nec timendum nec provocandum. Plin. Panegyr. Trajano.” Editor: “War should neither be feared nor provoked. Pliny, Panegyric to Trajan.” Exact passage uncollated.

[1124] Editor. Manum de tabella, “hand from the picture,” is a proverbial command to stop working at a painting. Burton uses it to end his digression. The formulation Sed quò feror hospes? is retained and translated as an address to himself as a stranger to this field; its precise source remains unlocated.

[1125] Burton. p. 68, a: “Lib. 3 poet. cap. 19.” Editor: Scaliger, Poetics, book 3, chapter 19; exact passage uncollated.

[1126] Burton. p. 68, b: “Lib. 4. de repub. cap. 2.” Editor: Bodin, On the Commonwealth, book 4, chapter 2; exact passage uncollated.

[1127] Burton. p. 68, c: “Peucer. lib. 1. de divinat.” Editor: Peucer, On Divination, book 1; exact passage uncollated.

[1128] Editor. Family includes a household and its dependants, as well as a lineage. Oeconomical concerns household government, not economics in its modern disciplinary sense. Corsives are corrosive troubles. The alleged six- or seven-century lifespan is Burton’s report of his authorities, not an established historical law.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as namely, riot, a common ruine of both, riot in building, riot in profuse spending, riot in apparel, &c. be it in what kinde soever, it produceth the same effects. A [1129] Corographer of ours speaking obiter of ancient families, why they are so frequent in the North, continue so long, are so soon extinguished in the South, and so few; gives no other reason but this, luxus omnia dissipavit, riot hath consumed all,	extravagance, for example, ruins both alike: extravagance in building, lavish expenditure, clothing, and so on. Whatever form it takes, it produces the same effects. One of our writers on regional geography, speaking in passing of old families and asking why they are so numerous and long-lasting in the north, yet so few and so quickly extinguished in the south, gives only this explanation: luxury has squandered everything; extravagance has consumed it all.
fine cloaths and curious buildings came into this Iland, as he notes in his Annals, not so many years since; non sine dispendio hospitalitatis, to the decay of hospitality. Howbeit many times that word is mistaken, and under the name of bounty and hospitality, is shrowded riot and prodigality and that which is commendable in it self well used, hath been mistaken heretofore, is become by his abuse, the bane & utter ruin of many a noble family.	Fine clothes and elaborate buildings came to this island, as he observes in his Annals, not many years ago, at no small cost to hospitality: hospitality declined. Yet that word is often misunderstood. Extravagance and waste shelter under the names of generosity and hospitality; what is commendable in itself when properly practised has long been misconceived, and through its abuse has become the bane and complete ruin of many noble families.

[1129] Burton. p. 68, d: “Camden in Cheshire.” Editor: William Camden, his account of Cheshire in Britannia. The body subsequently invokes his Annals. Exact passages uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For some men live like the rich glutton, consuming themselves and their substance by continual feasting and invitations, with [1130] Axilon in Homer, keep open house for all comers, giving entertainment to such as visit them, [1131] keeping a table beyond their means, and a company of idle servants (though not so frequent as of old) are blown up on a sudden; and as Actæon was by his hounds, devoured by their kinsmen, friends, and multitude of followers.	Some men live like the rich glutton, consuming themselves and their wealth in ceaseless feasting and invitations. Like Axylus in Homer, they keep open house for all comers and entertain everyone who visits. Maintaining a table beyond their means and a retinue of idle servants, though this is less common than formerly, they are suddenly ruined: their relations, friends, and numerous dependants devour them, as Actaeon was devoured by his hounds.[1132]

[1130] Burton. p. 68, e: “Iliad. 6. lib.” Editor: Homer, Iliad, book 6. Axylus, son of Teuthras, appears at 6.12–19: he welcomed all travellers, but no guest stood beside him to avert his death. The original Axilon is rendered Axylus on the right.

[1131] Burton. p. 68, f: “Vide Puteani Comum, Goclenium de portentosis cœnis nostrorum temporum.” Editor: “See Puteanus’s Comus and Goclenius on the monstrous dinners of our times.” Exact works and passages remain uncollated.

[1132] Editor. The rich glutton evokes the rich man in Luke 16:19–31. Actaeon, transformed into a stag and killed by his own hounds, furnishes the image of a host consumed by his dependants; compare Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.138–252. Blown up here means suddenly ruined.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1133] It is a wonder that Paulus Jovius relates of our Northern Countreys, what an infinite deal of meat we consume on our tables: that I may truly say, tis not bounty, not hospitality, as it is often abused, but riot in excesse, gluttony and prodigality; a meer vice; it brings in debt, want and beggery, hereditary diseases, consumes their fortunes, and overthrows the good temperature of their bodies.	Paolo Giovio tells an astonishing story about our northern countries: the immense amount of food consumed at our tables. I can truly say that, as it is so often abused, this is neither generosity nor hospitality, but excessive luxury, gluttony, and waste: sheer vice. It brings debt, want, beggary, and hereditary diseases, consumes people's fortunes, and destroys the healthy balance of their bodies.
To this I might here well add their inordinate expence in building, those phantastical houses, turrets, walks, parks, &c. gaming, excesse of pleasure, and that Prodigious riot in apparel, by which means they are compelled to break up house, and creep into holes.	To this I might add their excessive spending on buildings—those fanciful houses, turrets, walks, and parks—on gambling, extravagant pleasures, and that prodigious luxury in clothing. In the end they are forced to dissolve their households and creep into holes.
Sesellius in his common-wealth of [1134] France, gives three reasons why the French Nobility were so frequently bankrupts: First because they had so many law-suits and contentions, one upon another, which were tedious and costly: by which means it came to passe, that commonly lawyers bought them out of their possessions.	Seyssel, in his account of the commonwealth of France, gives three reasons why the French nobility so often went bankrupt. First, they pursued so many lawsuits and disputes, one after another, that the length and expense commonly enabled lawyers to buy them out of their estates.

[1133] Burton. p. 68, g: "Mirabile dictu est, quantum opsoniorum una domus singulis diebus absumat, sternuntur mensæ in omnes pene horas calentibus semper edulibus. descript. Britan." Editor: "It is astonishing to say how much food a single household consumes every day; tables are laid at almost every hour, with dishes always hot. Description of Britain." Giovio's exact passage remains uncollated.

[1134] Burton. p. 68, h: "Lib. 1. de rep. Gallorum; quod tot lites & causæ forenses, aliæ serantur ex aliis, in immensum producantur, & magnos sumptus requirant unde fit ut juris administri plerunque nobilium possessiones adquirant, tum quod sumptuosè vivant, & à mercatoribus absorbentur & splendidissimè vestiantur, &c." Editor: "Book 1, On the French Commonwealth: so many lawsuits and legal cases spring from one another, extend to enormous lengths, and require great expense that lawyers commonly acquire the nobles' estates; then, because the nobles live expensively, are swallowed up by merchants, and dress with the utmost splendour, etc." Seyssel; exact passage uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A second cause was their riot, they lived beyond their means, and were therefore swallowed up by merchants. (La-Nove a French writer, yeelds five reasons of his countrey-mens poverty, to the same effect almost, and thinks verily if the Gentry of France were divided into ten parts, eight of them would be found much impaired, by sales, morgages, and debts, or wholly sunk in their estates.)	The second cause was extravagance: they lived beyond their means and were therefore swallowed up by merchants. La Noue, a French writer, gives five reasons for his countrymen's poverty, much to the same effect. He believes that if the French gentry were divided into ten parts, eight would be found to have seriously diminished their estates through sales, mortgages, and debts, or to have lost them entirely.
Source page 68–69 The last was immoderate excesse in apparel, which consumed their revenues. How this concerns and agrees with our present state, look you. But of this elsewhere. As it is in a mans body, if either head, hart, stomack, liver, spleen, or any one part be misaffected, all the rest suffer with it: so is it with this Oeconomical body.	The last was excessive spending on clothes, which consumed their revenues. You may judge how this bears on our own present condition. But more of that elsewhere. In a person's body, if the head, heart, stomach, liver, spleen, or any other part is diseased, all the rest suffer with it. So it is with this household body.
Source page 69 If the head be naught, a spendthrift, a drunkard, a whore-master, a gamester, how shall the family live at ease? [1135] Ipsa si capiat salus servare, prorsus non potest hanc familiam, as Demea said in the Comedy, safety her self cannot save it.	If its head is worthless—a spendthrift, drunkard, womaniser, or gambler—how can the household live at ease? Even Safety herself, if she wished to save this household, could not possibly do so, as Demea says in the comedy: Safety herself cannot save it.
A good, honest, painful man many times hath a shrew to his wife, a sickly, dishonest, slothful, foolish, carelesse woman to his mate, a proud, peevish flirt, a liquorish, prodigal quean, and by that means all goes to ruine:	A good, honest, hardworking man often has a shrew for his wife: a sickly, unchaste, lazy, foolish, careless partner, a proud, ill-tempered hussy, a lustful, extravagant woman; and through her everything goes to ruin;[1136]

[1135] Burton. p. 69, i: "Ter." Editor: Terence, The Brothers 761–762. The 1651 body prints capiat; the cited passage has cupiat, "should wish," the sense followed in the modern column. Salus, Safety or Salvation, is personified. Burton's English restatement is also retained.

[1136] Editor. Painful means painstaking or hardworking; dishonest here suggests sexual unchastity; liquorish means lustful or appetitive. Quean is an insulting term for a woman. The passage's one-sided catalogue of wives' faults belongs to Burton's satirical rhetoric.

Original text 1651	Modern English
or if they differ in nature, he is thrifty, she spends all, he wise, she sottish and soft; what agreement can there be? what friendship? Like that of the Thrush and Swallow in Æsop, in stead of mutual love, kind compellations, whore and thief is heard, they fling stools at one anothers heads. [1137] Quæ intemperies vexat hanc familiam?	or if their natures differ—he is thrifty, she spends everything; he is wise, she is stupid and weak-minded—what harmony can there be, what friendship? Like the thrush and swallow in Aesop, instead of mutual love and affectionate names, there are cries of "whore" and "thief"; they throw stools at each other's heads. What madness torments this household?
All enforced marriages commonly produce such effects, or if on their behalfs it be well, as to live and agree lovingly together, they may have disobedient & unruly children, that take ill courses to disquiet them, [1138] their son is a thief, a spend-thrift, their daughter a whore; a step [1139] mother, or a daughter in law distempers all;	Forced marriages commonly produce such results. Or, if all is well between the couple and they live together in loving harmony, they may have disobedient and unruly children whose bad behaviour torments them: their son is a thief or spendthrift, their daughter a whore; a stepmother or daughter-in-law throws everything into disorder;

[1137] Burton. p. 69, k: "Amphitruo. Plaut." Editor: Plautus, Amphitryon. The exact form of Burton's question remains uncollated.

[1138] Burton. p. 69, l: "Paling. Filius aut fur." Editor: "Palingenius: a son either a thief …" The abbreviated citation and incomplete Latin are retained; exact passage uncollated.

[1139] Burton. p. 69, m: "Catus cum mure, duo galli simul in æde, Et glotes binæ nunquam vivunt sine lite." Editor: "A cat with a mouse, two cocks together in one house, and two gossips never live without a quarrel." The unusual glotes is retained and understood as talkers or tongues. Exact source unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
or else for want of means,[1140] many torturers arise, debts, dues, fees, dowries, joynters, legacies to be paid, annuities issuing out, by means of which, they have not wherewithal to maintain themselves in that pomp as their Predecessors have done, bring up or bestow their children to their callings, to their birth and quality, [1141] and will not descend to their present fortunes.	or a lack of money brings many tormentors: debts, dues, fees, dowries, jointures, and legacies to be paid, with annuities draining away their income. These leave them unable to maintain the splendour of their predecessors, or to educate and establish their children in occupations suited to their birth and rank; yet they refuse to bring their way of life down to match their present means.[1142]
Oftentimes too, to aggravate the rest, concur many other inconveniences, unthankful friends, decayed friends, bad neigbors, negligent servants [1143] servi furaces, Versipelles, callidi, occlusa sibi mille clavibus reserant, furtimque raptant, consumunt, liguriunt;	Other troubles often combine to make the rest worse: ungrateful friends, impoverished friends, bad neighbours, negligent servants—thieving servants, slippery and cunning, who open things locked against them with a thousand keys, secretly pilfer, consume, and gorge themselves; casualties, taxes, mulcts, chargeable offices, vain expenses, entertainments, losse of stock, enmities, emulations, frequent invitations, losses, suretiship, sicknesse, death of friends, and that which is the gulf of all, improvidence, ill husbandry, disorder and confusion, by which means they are drenched on a sudden in their estates, and at unawares precipitated insensibly into an inextricable labyrinth of debts, cares, woes, want, grief, discontent, and melancholy it self.	accidents, taxes, fines, costly offices, wasteful expenditure, entertaining, loss of stock, enmities, rivalries, frequent invitations, losses, standing surety, sickness, the death of friends, and that gulf which swallows everything: lack of foresight, bad management, disorder, and confusion. Through these their fortunes suddenly founder, and before they realise it they are plunged into an inescapable labyrinth of debts, cares, sorrows, want, grief, discontent, and melancholy itself.

[1140] Burton. p. 69, n: “Res angusta domi.” Editor: “Straitened means at home.” No clear n anchor is visible; provisionally attached to “want of means.” Compare Juvenal, Satire 3.164–165.

[1141] Burton. p. 69, o: “When pride and beggery meet in a family, they roar and howl, and cause as many flashes of discontents, as fire and water, when they concur, make thunder-claps in the skies.” Editor: Burton’s comparison invokes a contemporary account of thunder; it is retained as part of his imagery.

[1142] Editor. A jointure is property or income settled for a wife, especially for her widowhood. Bestow children means establish or place them, for instance in an occupation or marriage. The financial charges concern maintaining a household and inherited social rank.

[1143] Burton. p. 69, p: “Plautus Aulular.” Editor: Plautus, The Pot of Gold. The body’s complaint about servants has not been located in the consulted text. Burton’s attribution is retained without assigning a passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I have done with families, and will now briefly run over some few sorts and conditions of men. The most secure, happy, jovial and merry in the worlds esteem are Princes and great men, free from melancholy: but for their cares, miseries, suspicions, jealousies, discontents, folly and madnesse, I refer you to Xenophons Tyrannus, where King Hieron discourseth at large with Simonides the Poet, of this subject.	I have finished with households, and will now briefly survey a few kinds and conditions of people. The world considers princes and great men the safest, happiest, most cheerful and merry of all, free from melancholy. But for their cares, miseries, suspicions, jealousies, discontents, folly, and madness, I refer you to Xenophon's Tyrant, where King Hiero discusses this subject at length with the poet Simonides.[1144]
Of all others they are most troubled with perpetual fears, anxieties, insomuch, that as he said in [1145] Valerius, If thou knewest with what cares and miseries this robe were stuffed, thou wouldst not stoop to take it up.	More than anyone else, they are troubled by perpetual fears and anxieties, so much so that, as the speaker in Valerius says, if you knew what cares and miseries were packed into this robe, you would not stoop to pick it up.
Or put case they be secure and free from fears and discontents, yet they are void [1146] of reason too oft, and precipitate in their actions; reade all our histories, quos de stultis prodidere stulti, Iliades, Æneides, Annales, and what is the subject? Stultorum regum, & populorum continet æstus.	Or suppose they are secure and free from fear and discontent: even then they are too often without reason and rash in their actions. Read all our histories, the accounts fools have handed down about fools—our Iliads, Aeneids, and annals—and what is their subject? The passions of foolish kings and peoples.[1147]
Source page 69–70 How mad they are, how furious, and upon small occasions, Rash and inconsiderate in their proceedings, how they dote, every page almost will witnesse, — delirant reges, plectuntur Achivi.	Almost every page bears witness to their madness and fury, their rash and thoughtless actions over trifles, their folly: kings rave, and the Greeks are punished.

[1144] Editor. Xenophon's dialogue is now usually called Hiero, or On Tyranny. Hiero argues that a ruler's apparent advantages are undermined by fear and insecurity; Burton extends that argument to melancholy.

[1145] Burton. p. 69, q: "Lib. 7. cap. 6." Editor: Valerius Maximus, book 7, chapter 6, as printed. The reference number and Burton's version of the royal robe anecdote require further collation.

[1146] Burton. p. 69, r: "Pellitur in bellis sapientia, vi geritur res. Vetus proverbium, aut regem aut fatuum nasci oportere." Editor: "In wars wisdom is driven out, and affairs are settled by force. An old proverb: one ought to be born either a king or a fool." Exact textual sources uncollated.

[1147] Editor. The verse is adapted from Horace, Epistles 1.2.8; æstus means passions or turbulent impulses. The following line, "kings rave, and the Greeks are punished," abbreviates Epistles 1.2.14. Burton makes historical writing a record of rulers' folly and its consequences for others.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 70 Next in place, next in miseries and discontents, in all manner of hair-brain-actions are great men, procul a Jove, procul a fulmine, the nearer the worse. If they live in Court, they are up and down, ebb and flow with their Princes favors, Ingenium vultu statque caditque suo, now aloft, to morrow down, as [1148] Polybius describes them, like so many casting Counters, now of gold, to morrow of silver, that vary in worth as the computant will; now they stand for mites, to morrow for thousands; now before all, and anon behinde.	Next in rank, and next in misery, discontent, and every kind of reckless behaviour, come the great men. Far from Jupiter, far from the thunderbolt: the nearer, the worse. If they live at court, they rise and fall, ebb and flow with their prince's favour. Their talent stands or falls with his expression: up today, down tomorrow. As Polybius describes them, they are like reckoning counters, gold today and silver tomorrow, worth whatever the person calculating chooses: now small coins, tomorrow thousands; now ahead of everyone, and a moment later behind.[1149]
Beside they torment one another with mutual factions, emulations: one is ambitious, another enamoured, a third in debt, a prodigal, over-runs his fortunes, a fourth solicitous with cares, gets nothing, &c. But for these mens discontents, anxieties, I refer you to Lucians Tract, de mercede conductis, [1150] Æneas Sylvius (libidinis & stultitiæ servos, he cals them) Agrippa, and many others.	They also torment one another with factions and rivalries: one is ambitious, another in love, a third in debt, a prodigal outrunning his fortune, a fourth distracted by cares and gaining nothing, and so on. For their discontents and anxieties, I refer you to Lucian's treatise On Salaried Posts, Aeneas Sylvius, who calls them slaves of desire and folly, Agrippa, and many others.

[1148] Burton. p. 70, r: "Lib. 1. hist. Rom. similes abaculorum calculis, secundùm computantis arbitrium, modò ærei sunt, modò aurei; ad nutum regis nunc beati sunt nunc miseri." Editor: "Book 1, Roman History. Like counters on a reckoning board, at the calculator's discretion they are now copper, now gold; at the king's nod they are now fortunate, now miserable." The comparison is in Polybius, Histories 5.26.12–13. The printed book number and the body's differing gold and silver comparison are retained.

[1149] Editor. The proverb about Jupiter turns proximity to power into exposure to danger. Ingenium vultu statque caditque suo adapts Ovid, Fasti 1.18, which has tuo, "your," addressing the patron. Burton's context makes the prince's favour decisive. Casting counters are movable reckoning tokens, whose value depends on their assigned position.

[1150] Burton. p. 70, s: "Ærumnosique; Solones in Sa. 3 De miser. curialium." Editor: "And wretched Solons … On the Miseries of Courtiers." The abbreviated middle reference, in Sa. 3, is retained without a confident expansion. The body names Aeneas Sylvius; exact passage uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of Philosophers and Scholars, priscæ sapientiæ dictatores, I have already spoken in general terms, those superintendents of wit and learning, men above men, those refined men, Minions of the Muses, — [1151] mentemque habere queis bonam Et esse [1152] a corculis datum est. —	I have already spoken in general of philosophers and scholars, those arbiters of ancient wisdom, those overseers of intellect and learning, men above other men, those refined souls, the Muses' favourites, To whom it has been granted to have good minds And to rank among the wise.
[1153] These acute & subtil Sophisters, so much honored, have as much need of Hellebor as others. — [1154] ô Medici mediam pertundite venam. Reade Lucians Piscator, and tell how he esteemed them; Agrippa's Tract of the vanity of Sciences; nay read their own works, their absurd tenets, prodigious paradoxes, & risum teneatis amici?	These much-honoured, sharp and subtle disputants need hellebore as much as anyone else. Physicians, open the middle vein! Read Lucian's Fisherman and see what he thought of them, or Agrippa's treatise on the vanity of the sciences. Better still, read their own works, their absurd doctrines and monstrous paradoxes: can you keep from laughing, friends?[1155]
You shall finde that of Aristotle true, nullum magnum ingenium sine mixtura dementiæ, they have a worm as well as others; you shall finde a phantastical strain, a fustian, a bumbast, a vainglorious humor, an affected stile, &c. like a prominent thred in an uneven woven cloth, run parallel throughout their works.	You will find Aristotle's saying true: there is no great intellect without an admixture of madness. They have a worm in the head like everyone else. You will find some fanciful streak, inflated rhetoric, bombast, vanity, or affected style running through their works like a raised thread in unevenly woven cloth.[1156]

[1151] Burton. p. 70, t: "F. Dousæ Epid. lib. 1. c. 13." Editor: Printed abbreviated reference retained; its precise work and passage remain unidentified.

[1152] Burton. p. 70, u: "Hoc cognomento cohonestati Romæ, qui cæteros mortales sapientiâ præstarent, testis Plin. lib. 7. cap. 34." Editor: "At Rome those who surpassed other mortals in wisdom were honoured with this surname; Pliny, book 7, chapter 34, is witness." Compare Natural History 7.118 on the names Catus and Corculum. Burton's chapter numbering is retained; corculum suggests a wise or keen mind.

[1153] Burton. p. 70, x: "Insanire parant certa ratione modoque, mad by the book they." Editor: "They prepare to go mad by a fixed method and rule." Compare Horace, Satires 2.3.271; Burton adapts the saying to scholars.

[1154] Burton. p. 70, y: "Juvenal." Editor: Juvenal, Satire 6.46. Burton reads mediam, "middle," of the vein, a reading found in older editions; the consulted Latin text has nimiam. The modern translation follows Burton's reading. The image is bloodletting.

[1155] Editor. Hellebore was associated with purging and the treatment of madness. Burton's medical imagery here mocks intellectual pretension. Piscator is Lucian's The Fisherman; "can you keep from laughing, friends?" comes from Horace, The Art of Poetry 5.

[1156] Editor. The maxim attributed to Aristotle is transmitted by Seneca, On Tranquillity of Mind 17.10. A worm in the head signifies a strain of folly or eccentricity. Fustian and bombast describe inflated writing as well as recalling coarse fabric and stuffing, which lead into Burton's woven-cloth comparison.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And they that teach wisdom, patience, meeknesse, are the veriest dizards, hairbrains, and most discontent. [1157] In the multitude of wisdom is grief, and he that encreaseth wisdom, encreaseth sorrow. I need not quote mine author; they that laugh and contemn others, condemn the world of folly, deserve to be mocked, are as giddy-headed, and lie as open as any other.	Those who teach wisdom, patience, and meekness are the greatest fools, scatterbrains, and malcontents. In much wisdom there is grief, and whoever increases wisdom increases sorrow. I need not name my authority. Those who laugh at and despise others, condemning the world for its folly, deserve to be mocked themselves: they are as flighty and as open to attack as anyone.
[1158] Democritus that common flouter of folly, was ridiculous himself, barking Menippus, scoffing Lucian, satyrical Lucilius, Petronius, Varro, Persius, &c. may be censured with the rest, Loripedem rectus derideat, Æthiopem albus.	Democritus, that habitual mocker of folly, was himself ridiculous. Barking Menippus, scoffing Lucian, the satirists Lucilius, Petronius, Varro, Persius, and the rest may all be criticised with the others. Let the straight-legged man mock the cripple, and the white man the Ethiopian.[1159]
Bale, Erasmus, Hospinian, Vives, Kemnisius, explode as a vast Ocean of Obs and Sols, School divinity, [1160] A labyrinth of intricable questions, unprofitable contentions, incredibilem delirationem, one cals it.	Bale, Erasmus, Hospinian, Vives, and Chemnitz denounce scholastic theology as a vast ocean of objections and solutions, a labyrinth of tangled questions and fruitless disputes; one calls it incredible delirium.

[1157] Burton. p. 70, a: “Salomon.” Editor: Solomon. Ecclesiastes 1:18; Burton repeats wisdom where the King James Bible’s second clause has knowledge.

[1158] Burton. p. 70, b: “Communis irrisor stultitiæ.” Editor: “The general mocker of folly.” This gloss describes Democritus.

[1159] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 2.23, uses bodily and racial difference as insulting comparisons in an argument about who has standing to mock another. Burton turns the line against satirists who are themselves vulnerable to censure. Its language is retained rather than converted into a neutral modern proverb.

[1160] Burton. p. 70, c: “Wit whither wilt?” Editor: An exclamation at intellect wandering without restraint.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If School divinity be so censured, subtilis [1161] Scotus lima veritatis, Occam irrefragabilis, cujus ingenium vetera omnia ingenia subvertit, &c. Baconthrope, Dr. Resolutus, and Corculum Theologiæ, Thomas himself, Doctor [1162] Seraphicus, cui dictavit Angelus, &c. what shall become of humanity? Ars stulta, what can she plead? what can her followers say for themselves?	If scholastic theology is judged so harshly—subtle Scotus, the file that sharpens truth; irrefutable Ockham, whose intellect overturned all earlier intellects; Baconthorpe, the Resolute Doctor and keen mind of theology; Thomas himself, the Seraphic Doctor, to whom an angel dictated—what will become of humanistic learning? Foolish art, what can she plead? What can her followers say in their defence?[1163]
Source page 70–71 Much learning [1164] cere-diminuit-brum, hath crackt their skonce, and taken such root, that tribus Anticyris caput insanabile, Hellebor it self can do no good, nor that renowned [1165] Lanthorn of Epictetus, by which if any man studied, he should be as wise as he was.	Much learning has broken their brains apart, cracked their skulls, and taken such deep root that the head cannot be cured by three Anticyras. Hellebore itself can do no good, nor even that celebrated lamp of Epictetus, by whose light anyone who studied was supposed to become as wise as he was.[1166]

[1161] Burton. p. 70, d: “Scaliger exercitat. 324.” Editor: Scaliger, Exercises, no. 324; exact passage uncollated.

[1162] Burton. p. 70, e: “Vit. ejus.” Editor: “His life,” referring to a biography of Thomas. The particular work is unidentified.

[1163] Editor. Obs and Sols abbreviates objections and solutions in scholastic disputation. Humanity here means humanistic learning. The catalogue names Duns Scotus, William of Ockham, John Baconthorpe, and Thomas Aquinas. Burton calls Thomas Seraphicus; the usual distinction is Thomas the Angelic Doctor and Bonaventure the Seraphic Doctor. The printed title is retained.

[1164] Burton. p. 70, f: “Ennius.” Editor: The body splits cerebrum, “brain,” around diminuit, “diminished” or “broke apart.” Compare the grammatical example saxo cere comminuit brum, traditionally attributed to Ennius. Donatus transmits the split-word example; Burton’s wording and attribution are retained, without treating the attribution as secure.

[1165] Burton. p. 70, g: “Lucian. Ter mille drachmis olim empta; studens inde sapientiam adipisceretur.” Editor: “Lucian. Once bought for three thousand drachmas; by studying by it he would acquire wisdom.” The Ignorant Book Collector 13 tells of a purchaser who supposed that reading by Epictetus’s lamp would make him wise. The story satirises that supposition.

[1166] Editor. Burton’s broken Latin word cere-diminuit-brum makes the brain appear split on the page; the modern text conveys the sense, and his following skull image is retained. “A head incurable by three Anticyras” is from Horace, The Art of Poetry 300, invoking the place associated with hellebore. The lamp anecdote continues the satire of mistaking the outward signs of learning for wisdom.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 71 But all wil not serve; Rhetoricians, in ostentationem loquacitatis multa agitant, out of their volubility of tongue, will talk much to no purpose, Orators can perswade other men what they will, quo volunt, unde volunt, move, pacifie, &c. but cannot settle their own brains, what saith Tully? Malo indisertam prudentiam, quam loquacem stultitiam; and as [1167] Seneca seconds him, a wise mans Oration should not be polite or solicitous.	But none of this will do. Rhetoricians discuss all sorts of things to show off their fluency; their nimble tongues talk at length to no purpose. Orators can persuade others of whatever they please, lead them wherever they wish and from wherever they wish, stir them up, calm them down, and so on; yet they cannot settle their own minds. What does Cicero say? I prefer wisdom without eloquence to eloquent folly. Seneca supports him: a wise person's speech should not be elaborately polished or anxiously contrived.[1168]
[1169] Fabius esteems no better of most of them, either in speech, action, gesture, then as men beside themselves, insanos declamatores; so doth Gregory, Non mihi sapit qui sermone, sed qui factis sapit. Make the best of him, a good Orator is a turn-coat, an evil man, bonus Orator pessimus vir, his tongue is set to sale, he is a meer voice, as [1170] he said of a Nightingale, dat sine mente sonum, an hyperbolical liar, a flatterer, a parasite,	Fabius thinks most of them no better, in speech, performance, or gesture, than men out of their minds: mad declaimers. Gregory agrees: I call wise the person whose wisdom lies in deeds, not words. Make the best of him: a good orator is a turncoat, a bad man; an excellent speaker, a thoroughly wicked man. His tongue is for sale. He is nothing but a voice, as someone said of a nightingale: he makes sounds without thought; an extravagant liar, a flatterer, a parasite;[1171]

[1167] Burton. p. 71, h: "Epist. 21. 1. lib. Non oportet orationem sapientis esse politam aut solicitam." Editor: "A wise person's speech ought not to be polished or anxiously contrived." The printed reference is retained. Compare Seneca, Letters 115.2, on over-polished speech; this is a parallel, not a verification of Burton's exact wording.

[1168] Editor. Tully is Marcus Tullius Cicero. Compare De oratore 3.142: if forced to choose, the speaker prefers ineloquent wisdom to eloquent folly, though the larger argument seeks wisdom joined with eloquence. Burton extracts the preference for his satire.

[1169] Burton. p. 71, i: "Lib. 3. cap. 13. multo anhelitu jactatione furentes pectus, frontem cædentes, &c." Editor: "Raging with much panting and gesticulation, beating their breasts and foreheads, and so on." The matching description is in Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 2.12.9–10; Burton's printed reference is retained.

[1170] Burton. p. 71, k: "Lipsius, voces sunt, præterea nihil." Editor: "They are voices, and nothing more." Justus Lipsius is cited without a work or passage; the precise source remains unlocated.

[1171] Editor. Fabius is Quintilian, whose full name was Marcus Fabius Quintilianus. "Action" includes an orator's delivery and bodily performance. "A good orator, a very bad man" reverses the ideal union of eloquence and moral character. The Gregory quotation is not securely located; the name is left unexpanded.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and as [1172] Ammianus Marcellinus will, a corrupting cosener, one that doth more mischief by his fair speeches, then he that bribes by mony: for a man may with more facility avoid him that circumvents by money, then him that deceives with glosing terms; which made [1173] Socrates so much abhor and explode them.	and, as Ammianus Marcellinus has it, a corrupting cheat, who does more harm through fine speeches than another does through bribes. It is easier to avoid someone who traps you with money than someone who deceives you with flattering words. This made Socrates detest and denounce them so strongly.
[1174] Fracastorius, a famous Poet, freely grants all Poets to be mad; so doth [1175] Scaliger; and who doth not? Aut insanit homo, aut versus facit, Hor. Sat. 7. l. 2. Insanire lubet, i. versus componere. Virg. 3. Egl. so Servius interprets it, all Poets are mad, a company of bitter Satyrists, detractors, or else parasitical applauders;	Fracastoro, a famous poet, freely admits that all poets are mad; so does Scaliger, and who does not? "The fellow is either mad or writing verses," says Horace, Satires, book 2, satire 7. "I feel like going mad"—that is, composing verses—says Virgil, Eclogue 3, as Servius interprets it. All poets are mad: a company of bitter satirists and slanderers, or else fawning applauders;[1176]

[1172] Burton. p. 71, l: "Lib. 30. plus mali facere videtur qui oratione quàm qui precio quemvis corrumpit: nam, &c." Editor: "Someone who corrupts another through speech seems to do more harm than someone who does so for a price; for, etc." Ammianus Marcellinus 30.4.10 quotes Cicero here. His text has iudicem, "a judge," where Burton has the broader quemvis, "anyone."

[1173] Burton. p. 71, m: "In Gorg. Platonis." Editor: "In Plato's Gorgias." Burton invokes the dialogue's criticism of rhetoric; he supplies no section number.

[1174] Burton. p. 71, n: "In naugerio." Editor: "In Naugerius." Fracastoro's dialogue on poetry is meant; the precise passage has not been collated.

[1175] Burton. p. 71, o: "Si furor sit Lyæus, &c. quoties furit, furit, furit, amans, bibens, & Poeta, &c." Editor: "If Lyaeus is madness, etc., how often he rages, rages, rages—as lover, drinker, and poet, etc." Lyaeus is a name of Bacchus, associated here with wine. Burton's excerpt is fragmentary; the Scaliger passage remains unlocated.

[1176] Editor. Horace's line is Satires 2.7.117. Virgil, Eclogue 3.36, has "since you feel like going mad" in a competitive singing match; Burton quotes a shortened form. His appeal to Servius's interpretation is preserved but has not been independently collated. "Mad" ranges here between inspired, excessive, foolish, and mentally disordered.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and what is Poetry it self, but as Austin holds, vinum erroris ab ebriis doctoribus propinatum? You may give that censure of them in general, which Sir Thomas Moore once did of Germanus Brixius Poems in particular. ——vehuntur. In rate stultitiæ, sylvam habitant Furiæ.	and what is poetry itself but, as Augustine says, the wine of error poured out by drunken teachers? You may pass on them all the judgement that Sir Thomas More once passed on the poems of Germanus Brixius: Follies sail aboard the ship; The Furies inhabit the wood.[1177]
Budæus in an Epistle of his to Lupsetus, will have civil Law to be the tower of wisdom; another honours physick, the Quintessence of Nature; a third tumbles them both down, and sets up the flag of his own peculiar science.	Budé, in a letter to Lupset, makes civil law the tower of wisdom. Another honours medicine as the quintessence of nature. A third pulls both down and raises the flag of his own particular discipline.[1178]
Your supercilious Criticks, Grammatical triflers, Note-makers, curious Antiquaries, finde out all the ruines of wit, ineptiarum delicias, amongst the rubbish of old writers; [1179] Pro stultis habent nisi aliquid sufficiant invenire, quod in aliorum scriptis vertant vitio, all fools with them that cannot find fault; they correct others, & are hot in a cold cause,	Your haughty critics, grammatical triflers, annotators, and meticulous antiquaries discover every ruined fragment of learning, their cherished absurdities, among the rubbish of old writers. They reckon people fools unless they can find something to blame in another's writing: anyone who cannot find fault is a fool to them. They correct others and grow heated over a cold cause;

[1177] Editor. Augustine, Confessions 1.16.22, distinguishes language itself from the intoxicating errors conveyed through it. More, Epigram 267, mocks Germanus Brixius's Chordigera, a poem about a ship, and Antimorus silva, a "wood" attacking More. Thus the ship and wood refer to particular books. Stultitiæ is the plural subject, "follies," sailing in the ship; the Furies occupy the wood.

[1178] Editor. Budæus is Guillaume Budé; Lupsetus is Thomas Lupset. "Civil law" means the learned Roman-law tradition; "physick" means medicine. "Quintessence," literally a fifth essence, suggests the purest or most concentrated part. The precise letter has not been identified.

[1179] Burton. p. 71, p: "Morus Utop. lib. 11." Editor: More, Utopia; "lib. 11" is retained as printed. The exact passage behind the attack on fault-finding has not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
puzzle themselves to finde out how many streets in Rome, houses, gates, towers, Homers countrey, Æneas mother, Niobes daughters, an Sapho publica fuerit? ovum [1180] prius extiterit an gallina? &c. & alia quæ dediscenda essent scire, si scires, as [1181] Seneca holds.	they torment themselves finding out how many streets, houses, gates, and towers Rome had; where Homer came from; who Aeneas's mother was; about Niobe's daughters; whether Sappho was a prostitute; whether the egg or the hen came first; and other things which, as Seneca says, you ought to unlearn if you knew them.[1182]
What clothes the Senators did wear in Rome, what shoes, how they sat, where they went to the close-stool, how many dishes in a messe, what sauce; which for the present for an historian to relate, according to [1183] Lodovic. Vives, is very ridiculous, is to them most precious elaborate stuff, they admired for it, and as proud, as triumphant in the mean time for this discovery, as if they had won a city, or conquered a province; as rich as if they had found a Mine of Gold ore.	What clothes the Roman senators wore, what shoes, how they sat, where they relieved themselves, how many dishes were served at a meal, and with what sauce: details which, according to Luis Vives, it is thoroughly ridiculous for a historian to recount on such an occasion are to these men precious material for painstaking study. They are admired for it, and feel as proud and triumphant over their discovery as if they had captured a city or conquered a province, as rich as if they had found a gold mine.

[1180] Burton. p. 71, q: "Macrob. Satur. 7. 16." Editor: Macrobius, Saturnalia 7.16, on the priority of the egg or the hen; Burton's reference, not a newly collated text.

[1181] Burton. p. 71, r: "Epist. 16." Editor: Seneca. The questions about Homer, Aeneas's mother, and Sappho, and the claim that such things should be unlearned, occur in Letters 88.37. The printed "16" is retained.

[1182] Editor. These are examples of questions Burton ridicules, not claims that the doubtful premises are true. In particular, the question about Sappho derives from Seneca's attack on antiquarian trivia; it is not biographical evidence that she was a prostitute. Niobe's children belong to Greek myth.

[1183] Burton. p. 71, s: "Lib. de causis corrup. artium." Editor: Luis Vives, On the Causes of the Corruption of the Arts. Burton gives no more precise location; the passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 71–72 Quosvis authores absurdis commentis suis percacant & stercorant, one saith, they bewray and dawb a company of books and good Authors, with their absurd Comments, correctorum sterquilinia [1184] Scaliger cals them, and shew their wit in censuring others, a company of foolish note-makers, humble-bees, dors or beetles, inter stercora ut plurimum versantur,	They shit on and befoul every author with their absurd commentaries, as someone says; they soil and smear a whole company of books and good authors with their ridiculous comments. Scaliger calls these the dungheaps of textual correctors. They show their wit by censuring others, a company of foolish annotators, bumblebees, dor-beetles, or other beetles, spending most of their time among dung;[1185]
Source page 72 they rake over all those rubbish and dunghils, and prefer a manuscript many times before the Gospel it self, [1186] thesaurum criticum, before any treasure, and with their deleatur, alii legunt sic, meus codex sic habet, with their postremæ editions, annotations, castigations, &c. make books dear, themselves ridiculous, and do no body good,	they rake through all that rubbish and those dungheaps, often valuing a manuscript above the Gospel itself and a treasury of textual criticism above any treasure. With their "delete this," "others read it this way," "my manuscript has this," their latest editions, annotations, corrections, and so on, they make books expensive and themselves ridiculous, and benefit nobody;[1187]

[1184] Burton. p. 71, t: "Lib. 2. in Ausonium, cap. 19. & 32." Editor: Scaliger on Ausonius, book 2, chapters 19 and 32, as cited by Burton. The identity of the edition and exact passages remain to be established.

[1185] Editor. "Bewray" here means soil or befoul, and "dawb" means smear. A dor is a buzzing beetle. The explicitly scatological Latin supplies the force of the first modern sentence; Burton then repeats it more obliquely in English. Both statements are retained.

[1186] Burton. p. 72, z: "Edit. 7. volum. Jano Gutero." Editor: A reference to a seven-volume publication associated with Janus Gruter. The printed name and abbreviated description are retained; the edition has not been bibliographically verified.

[1187] Editor. Critics here are textual scholars who compare manuscripts and propose readings. Deleatur is the instruction "let it be deleted"; castigations are corrections. "Dear" means expensive. The attack is self-implicating: Burton's own book depends on manuscripts, editions, quotations, and annotations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
yet if any dare oppose or contradict, they are mad, up in arms on a sudden, how many sheets are written in defence, how bitter invectives, what apologies? [1188] Epiphillides hæ sunt ut meræ nugæ. But I dare say no more of, for, with, or against them, because I am liable to their lash, as well as others.	yet if anyone dares oppose or contradict them, they go mad and spring to arms. How many sheets they write in their defence, what bitter attacks, what apologies! These are mere gleanings, sheer trifles. But I dare say no more about them, for them, with them, or against them, since I am as exposed to their lash as anyone.[1189]
Of these and the rest of our Artists and Philosophers, I wil generally conclude they are a kind of mad men, as [1190] Seneca esteems of them, to make doubts & scruples, how to read them truly, to mend old authors, but will not mend their own lives, or teach us ingenia sanare, memoriam officiorum ingerere, ac fidem in rebus humanis retinere, to keep our wits in order or rectifie our manners.	Of these men and the rest of our learned practitioners and philosophers, I will conclude in general that they are a kind of madmen, as Seneca judges them. They raise doubts and quibbles over how to read old authors correctly, and amend their texts, yet will not amend their own lives or teach us to heal our minds, remember our duties, and maintain good faith in human affairs: to keep our wits in order or correct our conduct.

[1188] Burton. p. 72, a: “Aristophanis Ranis.” Editor: “In Aristophanes’ Frogs.” Compare Frogs 92 and its ancient scholia: epiphyllides are small, leftover bunches of grapes, hence paltry gleanings.

[1189] Editor. Epiphillides transliterates a Greek word for small grapes left after harvest; “gleanings” preserves the image of poor scraps. “Apologies” are written defences. Burton’s sudden retreat anticipates the mock exemptions for powerful people at the block’s close.

[1190] Burton. p. 72, b: “Lib. de beneficiis.” Editor: Seneca, On Benefits. The phrases about healing minds, good faith, and remembering duties are found in 1.4; Burton rearranges their order.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nunquid tibi demens videtur, si istis operam impenderit? is not he mad that draws lines with Archimedes, whiles his house is ransacked, and his city besieged, when the whole world is in combustion, or we whilst our souls are in danger, mors sequitur, vita fugit, to spend our time in toyes, idle questions, and things of no worth?[1191]	Does someone seem mad to you if he devotes his efforts to these things? Is he not mad who draws geometrical figures with Archimedes while his house is being plundered and his city besieged, while the whole world is ablaze? Or are we not mad, while our souls are in danger—death pursues us, life escapes—to waste our time on trifles, idle questions, and worthless things?[1192]
That Lovers are mad, I think no man will deny, Amare simul & sapere, ipsi Iovi non datur, Jupiter himself cannot intend both at once, [1193] Non bene conveniunt, nec in unâ sede morantur Majestas & amor.	That lovers are mad, I think no one will deny. Even Jupiter is not granted the power to love and be wise at once: Jupiter himself cannot attend to both together. Majesty and love do not agree, Nor dwell together in one place.
Tully when he was invited to a second marriage, replied, he could not simul amare & sapere, be wise and love both together. [1194] Est orcus ille, vis est immedicabilis, est rabies insana, Love is madnesse, a hell, an incurable disease; impotentem & insanam libidinem [1195] Seneca cals it, an impotent and raging lust. I shall dilate this subject apart: in the mean time let Lovers sigh out the rest.	When Cicero was urged to marry again, he answered that he could not love and be wise at the same time: be wise and love together. Love is a hell, an incurable force, a mad frenzy; love is madness, a hell, an incurable disease. Seneca calls it ungovernable and insane desire, an uncontrolled and raging lust. I shall discuss this subject separately; meanwhile, let lovers sigh out the rest.[1196]

[1191] Burton. p. 72, c: “Delirus & amens dicatur merit. Hor. Seneca.” Editor: “Let him rightly be called deranged and out of his mind. Horace. Seneca.” No clear matching letter is visible in the body. Placed provisionally after the paragraph on futile learning; the exact source of the wording remains unlocated.

[1192] Editor. Archimedes is the mathematician traditionally represented as absorbed in geometrical work during the capture of Syracuse. Burton enlarges the anecdote into a warning against attending to scholarly trifles during public crisis or spiritual danger; this wording is not treated as a precise historical account.

[1193] Burton. p. 72, d: “Ovid. Met.” Editor: Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.846–847. Jupiter abandons divine majesty and takes the shape of a bull in his pursuit of Europa.

[1194] Burton. p. 72, e: “Plutarch. Amatorio est amor insanus.” Editor: “Plutarch, On Love: love is madness.” The wording and its relationship to the following Latin quotation have not been collated.

[1195] Burton. p. 72, f: “Epist. 39.” Editor: Seneca, Letter 39, as cited. Impotens here means unable to govern or restrain itself, not sexually impotent; the precise wording remains uncollated.

[1196] Editor. Burton announces the later treatment of love melancholy. “Impotent” here means ungoverned or beyond self-control. The repeated Latin proposition and English explanation remain distinct. The particular Cicero remarriage anecdote has not been securely located for this draft.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1197] Nevisanus the Lawyer holds it for an axiome, most women are fools, [1198] consilium fæminis invalidum; Seneca men, be they yong or old; who doubts it, youth is mad as Elius in Tully, Stulti adolescentuli, old age little better, deliri senes, &c.	Nevizanus the jurist treats it as an axiom that most women are fools: women's judgement is weak. Seneca says as much of men, young or old. Who doubts it? Youth is mad, as Elius says in Cicero: foolish young men; old age is scarcely better: doting old men, and so on.[1199]
Theophrastes in the 107. year of his age, said he then began to be wise, tum sapere cæpit, and therefore lamented his [1200] departure. If wisdom come so late, where shall we finde a wise man? our old ones dote at threescore and ten. I would cite more proofs, and a better Author, but for the present, let one fool point at another.	Theophrastus, in his hundred and seventh year, said that he was only then beginning to be wise—only then did his wisdom begin—and therefore lamented his departure. If wisdom comes so late, where shall we find a wise man? Our old people dote at seventy. I would cite more proofs and a better authority, but for now let one fool point at another.[1201]

[1197] Burton. p. 72, g: "Sylvæ nuptialis l. 1. num. 11. Omnes mulieres ut plurimum stultæ." Editor: "Nuptial Forest, book 1, number 11. All women, for the most part, are foolish." Burton's qualification sits awkwardly with "all"; it is retained. The passage in Nevizanus has not been collated.

[1198] Burton. p. 72, h: "Aristotle." Editor: No work or passage is supplied. This marginal attribution stands beside the claim about women's judgement; no precise passage has been established.

[1199] Editor. Nevizanus is the jurist Giovanni Nevizzano. The passage assembles misogynistic commonplaces before extending the charge of folly to men and every age. The compressed "Seneca men" is read as "Seneca [holds the same opinion of] men," shifting the charge from women to men. "Elius" is retained without a conjectural identification. "Dote" means lose sound judgement, not show affection.

[1200] Burton. p. 72, i: "Dolere se dixit quod tum vita egrederetur." Editor: "He said he regretted having to leave life just then." No additional source is named.

[1201] Editor. The age of 107 belongs to a transmitted anecdote, not a verified lifespan. Compare Jerome, Letter 52.3, which tells the same late-wisdom story; the consulted English text names Themistocles, while Burton names Theophrastus. The differing names require further textual collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1202] Nevisanus hath as hard an opinion of [1203] rich men, wealth and wisdom cannot dwell together, stultitiam patiuntur opes, and they do commonly [1204] infatuare cor hominis, besot men; and as we see it, fools have fortune:[1205] [1206] Sapientia non invenitur in terra suaviter viventium.	Nevizanus has an equally harsh opinion of rich men: wealth and wisdom cannot live together; riches admit folly, and commonly make the human heart foolish, stupefying people. As we see for ourselves, fools are lucky. Wisdom is not found in the land of those who live at ease.
Source page 72–73 For beside a natural contempt of learning, which accompanies such kinde of men, innate idlenesse, (for they will take no pains) and which [1207] Aristotle observes, ubi mens plurima, ibi minima fortuna, ubi plurima fortuna, ibi mens perexigua, great wealth and little wit go commonly together: they have as much brains some of them in their heads as in their heels; besides this inbred neglect of liberal sciences, and all Arts, which should excolere mentem, polish the minde, they have most part some gullish humor or other, by which they are led;	Besides the natural contempt for learning and inborn idleness of such men, who will take no pains, there is Aristotle's observation: where intelligence is greatest, fortune is least; where fortune is greatest, intelligence is very small. Great wealth and little wit commonly go together. Some have as much brain in their heads as in their heels. Besides this ingrained neglect of the liberal sciences and all the arts that should cultivate the mind, polish it, most have some foolish whim or other that governs them;

[1202] Burton. p. 72, k: "Lib. 1. num. 11 sapientia & divitiæ vix simul possideri possunt." Editor: "Book 1, number 11: wisdom and riches can scarcely be possessed together." The reference continues the citation of Nevizanus; not independently collated.

[1203] Burton. p. 72, l: "They get their wisdom by eating Piecrust some." Editor: A sarcastic suggestion that some acquire their supposed wisdom simply through eating well; the particular proverbial source remains unlocated.

[1204] Burton. p. 72, m: "Χρήματα τοῖς θνητοῖς γίνεται ἀφροσύνη. Opes quidem mortalibus sunt amentia. Theognis." Editor: "Wealth becomes folly for mortals"; the Latin restates, "Riches indeed are madness for mortals." Greek accents and letterforms are regularized; the tiny printed article before θνητοῖς is read provisionally as τοῖς. The quotation requires collation with Theognis.

[1205] Burton. p. 72, n: "Fortuna nimium quem fovet, stultum facit." Editor: "Fortune makes a fool of the person she favours too much." No source is named. With no clear matching body letter, this is provisionally attached to "fools have fortune."

[1206] Burton. p. 72, o: "Job. 28." Editor: Compare Job 28:13. Burton's wording takes wisdom to be absent from the land of those living comfortably; the modern rendering follows his Latin. Biblical editions differ here, and the consulted Nova Vulgata has simply "the land of the living."

[1207] Burton. p. 72, p: "Mag. moral. lib. 2. & lib. 1. sat. 4." Editor: Magna Moralia, book 2, attributed to Aristotle; the appended "book 1, satire 4" belongs to a different kind of work and anticipates the Horace reference repeated on p. 73. The composite entry is retained; the Aristotle passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 73 one is an Epicure, an Atheist, a second a gamester, a third a whoremaster, (fit subjects all for a Satyrist to work upon,) ——[1208] Hic nuptarum insanit amoribus, hic puerorum, [1209] one is mad of hawking, hunting, cocking; another of carousing, horse-riding, spending; a fourth of building, fighting, &c.	one is a sensualist or atheist, a second a gambler, a third a womaniser, all fit subjects for a satirist: One is mad with desire for married women, another for boys. One is mad about hawking, hunting, and cockfighting; another about carousing, riding, and spending; a fourth about building or fighting, and so on.[1210]
Insanit veteres statuas Damasippus emendo, Damasippus hath an humor of his own, to be talkt of: [1211] Heliodorus the Carthaginian another. In a word, as Scaliger concludes of them all, they are Statuæ erectæ stultitiæ, the very statues or pillars of folly.	Damasippus goes mad buying old statues. He has a whim of his own that makes him talked about; Heliodorus the Carthaginian has another. In a word, as Scaliger concludes of them all, they are statues erected to folly, the very statues or pillars of foolishness.[1212]

[1208] Burton. p. 73, q: “Hor. ser. 1. sat. 4.” Editor: Horace, Satires 1.4.27, the line contrasting desire for married women and for boys.

[1209] Burton. p. 73, r: “Insana gula, insanæ obstructiones, insanum venandi studium discordia demens. Virg. Æn.” Editor: “Mad gluttony, mad obstructions, a mad passion for hunting, demented discord. Virgil, Aeneid.” The printed obstructiones is retained. No book or line is given; the entry gathers several phrases whose individual sources remain uncollated.

[1210] Editor. “Epicure” is Burton’s polemical term for a person devoted to sensual pleasure. “Cocking” is cockfighting. The Horace line uses puerorum, “of boys”; the modern version retains its age-specific wording.

[1211] Burton. p. 73, s: “Heliodorus Carthaginensis ad extremum orbis sarcophago testamento me hic jussi condier, & ut viderem an quis insanior ad me visendii usq. ad hæc loca penetraret. Ortelius in Gad.” Editor: “I, Heliodorus the Carthaginian, ordered in my will that I be buried here in a sarcophagus at the world’s end, to see whether anyone madder would make his way to these places to visit me.” Ortelius’s Gades map text, on Cadiz, contains the purported inscription; the consulted transcription has visendum. Burton’s doubtful visendii is retained. Locating the literary source does not authenticate the inscription.

[1212] Editor. Damasippus’s compulsive statue-buying appears in Horace, Satires 2.3.64. The marginal epitaph makes Heliodorus’s remote burial a challenge to the next fool willing to travel there. The following “statues of folly” turns the collector’s objects into an image of the collectors themselves.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Chuse out of all stories him that hath been most admired, you shall still find, multa ad laudem, multa ad vituperationem magnifica, as [1213] Berosus of Semiramis; omnes mortales militia, triumphis, divitiis, &c. tum & luxu, cæde, cæterisque vitiis antecessit, as she had some good, so had she many bad parts.	Choose from all history the most admired person, and you will still find great things to praise and great things to condemn. As Berosus says of Semiramis, she surpassed all mortals in warfare, triumphs, and riches, and also in luxury, slaughter, and other vices. She had some good qualities, and many bad ones.
Alexander, a worthy man, but furious in his anger, overtaken in drink: Cæsar and Scipio valiant and wise, but vain-glorious, ambitious: Vespasian a worthy Prince, but covetous: [1214] Hannibal, as he had mighty vertues, so had he many vices; unam virtutem mille vitia comitantur, as Machiavel of Cosmus Medices, he had two distinct persons in him.	Alexander was a worthy man, but violent in his anger and overcome by drink. Caesar and Scipio were brave and wise, but vain and ambitious. Vespasian was a worthy ruler, but avaricious. Hannibal had great virtues and many vices: a thousand vices accompany one virtue. As Machiavelli says of Cosimo de' Medici, he had two distinct persons within him.
I will determine of them all, they are like these double or turning pictures, stand before you see a fair maid, on the one side an ape, on the other an owl: look upon them at the first sight all is wel, but farther examine, you shall finde them wise on the one side, and fools on the other; in some few things praise worthy, in the rest incomparably faulty. I will say nothing of their diseases, emulations, discontents, wants, and such miseries; let poverty plead the rest in Aristophanes Plutus.	My verdict on them all is that they resemble those changing pictures: stand in front and you see a pretty girl; from one side, an ape; from the other, an owl. At first glance all looks well, but examine them further and you find wisdom on one side and folly on the other, a few things deserving praise and the rest faulty beyond comparison. I will say nothing of their diseases, rivalries, discontents, wants, and similar miseries; let Poverty plead the rest in Aristophanes' Wealth.[1215]

[1213] Burton. p. 73, t: "If it be his work, which Gasper Veretus suspects." Editor: Burton himself questions the attribution to Berosus. The identity and passage of "Gasper Veretus" remain unresolved; no authentic work by Berosus is asserted here.

[1214] Burton. p. 73, u: "Livy. Ingentes virtutes ingentia vitia." Editor: "Great virtues, great vices." Burton cites Livy for the contrast in Hannibal's character; the precise wording has not been collated.

[1215] Editor. The "turning pictures" display different images from different viewing angles; Burton makes their changing appearance a figure for mixed character. In Aristophanes' Plutus, or Wealth, Poverty argues her own case. Burton lets her carry forward the criticism he leaves unfinished.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Covetous men amongst others, are most mad, [1216] they have all the Symptoms of melancholy, fear, sadnesse, suspition, &c. as shall be proved in his proper place, Danda est Hellebori multo pars maxima avaris.	Among all these, the avaricious are the maddest. They have all the symptoms of melancholy—fear, sadness, suspicion, and so on—as will be demonstrated in its proper place. By far the largest dose of hellebore must go to the greedy.[1217]
And yet me thinks prodigals are much madder then they, be of what condition they will, that bear a publick, or private purse; as a [1218] Dutch writer censured Richard the rich Duke of Cornwal, suing to be Emperor, for his profuse spending, qui effudit pecuniam ante pedes principum Electorum sicut aquam, that scattered mony like water;	And yet I think spendthrifts are much madder, whatever their station, whether they manage public money or their own. A German writer censured Richard, the rich Duke of Cornwall, when he sought to become emperor, for his lavish spending: he poured money like water at the feet of the prince-electors; he scattered money like water;[1219]
I do censure them, Stulta Anglia (saith he) quæ tot denariis sponte est privata, stulti principes Alemaniæ, qui nobile jus suum pro pecuniâ vendiderunt: spend-thrifts, bribers, and bribe takers are fools, and so are [1220] all they that cannot keep, disburse, or spend their moneys well.	I condemn them. “Foolish England,” he says, “which willingly deprived herself of so much money; foolish princes of Germany, who sold their noble right for money.” Spendthrifts, those who offer bribes, and those who take them are fools; so are all who cannot save, disburse, or spend their money properly.

[1216] Burton. p. 73, x: “Hor. Quisquis ambitione mala aut argenti pallet amore, Quisquis luxuria, tristitia, superstitione. Per.” Editor: “Whoever grows pale with wicked ambition or love of money; whoever [suffers] from luxury, sadness, superstition.” Compare Horace, Satires 2.3.77–80. Burton’s tristitia turns the source’s adjective tristi, “gloomy,” into a separate noun. The appended “Per.” is retained without assigning the whole entry to Persius.

[1217] Editor. The verse is Horace, Satires 2.3.82. Hellebore was associated in ancient medicine and satire with purging madness. Burton applies that inherited medical image to greed; the line belongs to his historical account, not a proposed treatment.

[1218] Burton. p. 73, y: “Cronica Slavonica ad annum 1257. de cujus pecunia jam incredibilia dixerunt.” Editor: “Slavonic Chronicle, under the year 1257: of whose money they have already told incredible things.” The chronicle’s exact identity and passage have not been established.

[1219] Editor. Richard (1209–1272) was Earl of Cornwall, not duke; Burton’s title is retained in both columns. He was elected King of the Romans in 1257 but did not become Holy Roman Emperor. “Dutch” here has the broader early modern sense encompassing German. The financial accusation remains the quoted chronicler’s claim.

[1220] Burton. p. 73, z: “A fool and his money are soon parted.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
I might say the like of angry, peevish, envious, ambitious; [1221] Anticyras melior sorbere meracas; Epicures, Atheists, Schismaticks, Hereticks; omnes habent imaginationem læsam (saith Nymannus) and their madnesse shall be evident, 2 Tim. 3.9.	I might say the same of the angry, ill-tempered, envious, and ambitious: better for them to swallow undiluted Anticyra; of sensualists, atheists, schismatics, and heretics. All have disordered imaginations, says Nymannus, and their madness shall be evident, 2 Timothy 3:9.[1222]
Source page 73–74 [1223] Sabatus an Italian, holds sea-faring men all mad; the ship is mad, for it never stands still: the mariners are mad, to expose themselves to such imminent dangers: the waters are raging mad, in perpetual motion: the winds are as mad as the rest, they know not whence they come, whither they would go: and those men are maddest of all that go to sea; for one fool at home, they finde forty abroad. He was a mad man that said it, and thou peradventure as mad to reade it.	Sabatus, an Italian, considers all seafarers mad. The ship is mad because it never stands still; the sailors are mad to expose themselves to such immediate dangers; the waters are raging mad, perpetually moving; the winds are as mad as the rest, knowing neither where they come from nor where they want to go; and maddest of all are those who go to sea, for they find forty fools abroad for every one at home. The man who said it was mad, and perhaps you are just as mad to read it.

[1221] Burton. p. 73, a: “O ut de imag. mbitiosus & audax naviget Anticyras.” Editor: The opening “O ut de imag.” is an uncertain, abbreviated reading; de imag. may point to the nearby discussion of imagination. The next word appears to lack its initial a; taking it as ambitiosus gives “let the ambitious and bold sail to Anticyra.” Compare Horace, Satires 2.3.165–166, which has ambitiosus and singular Anticyram. The doubtful printed text is preserved.

[1222] Editor. “Swallow undiluted Anticyra” comes from Persius 4.16: the place-name stands for its proverbial hellebore. Burton then joins Nymannus’s language of injured imagination to religious polemic and 2 Timothy 3:9. These categories belong to his argument, not to a modern diagnosis of religious disagreement. The exact Nymannus source remains unresolved.

[1223] Burton. p. 73, b: “Navis stulta, quæ continuo movetur, nautæ stulti qui se periculis exponunt, aqua insana quæ sic fremit, &c. aër jactatur, &c. qui mari se committit stolidum unum terra fugiens, 40. mari invenit. Gaspar Ens Moros.” Editor: “The ship is foolish, constantly moving; the sailors foolish, exposing themselves to danger; the water mad, roaring so, etc.; the air is tossed about, etc. Whoever entrusts himself to the sea, fleeing one fool on land, finds forty at sea.” Moros. probably abbreviates Caspar Ens’s Morosophia (Cologne, 1620). The work is bibliographically identified; the quoted passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 74 [1224] Felix Platerus is of opinion all Alchemists are mad, out of their wits; [1225] Atheneus saith as much of Fidlers, & musarum luscinias, [1226] Musicians, omnes tibicines insaniunt, ubi semel efflant, avolat illico mens, in comes musick at one ear, out goes wit at another.	Felix Platter thinks all alchemists mad, out of their wits. Athenaeus says as much of fiddlers and the Muses' nightingales, musicians: all pipers go mad; the moment they blow, their minds fly away. Music comes in at one ear and wit goes out at the other.
Proud and vain glorious persons are certainly mad; and so are [1227] lascivious; I can feel their pulses beat hither, horn mad some of them, to let others lie with their wives, and wink at it.	The proud and vain are certainly mad, and so are the lustful. I can feel their pulses beating from here. Some are mad enough to wear cuckolds' horns: they let others sleep with their wives and turn a blind eye.[1228]

[1224] Burton. p. 74, d: "Cap. de alien. mentis." Editor: "Chapter on mental derangement." The reference accompanies Felix Platter; the exact edition and passage remain uncollated.

[1225] Burton. p. 74, e: "Dipnosophist. lib. 8." Editor: Athenaeus, Deipnosophists, book 8. The name means "the learned diners"; the precise passage remains uncollated.

[1226] Burton. p. 74, f: "Tibicines mente capti. Erasm. Chil. 4. cen. 7." Editor: "Pipers out of their minds. Erasmus, fourth thousand, seventh hundred." Burton gives this division of the Adages without an individual adage number; exact text uncollated.

[1227] Burton. p. 74, g: "Prov 30. Insana libido, Hic rogo non furor est, non est hæc mentula demens. Mart. ep. 74. l. 3." Editor: "Proverbs 30. Mad lust. Is this not madness, I ask? Is this not an insane prick? Martial, epigram 74, book 3." The crude anatomical joke is retained in translation. Burton's biblical and epigram references have not been reconciled with exact passages.

[1228] Editor. "Horn mad" plays on both extreme madness and the proverbial horns of a cuckold. Burton specifically targets husbands who knowingly tolerate their wives' affairs. "Wink at" means deliberately overlook.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To insist in all particulars, were an Herculean task, to [1229] reckon up [1230] insanas substructiones, insanos labores, insanum luxum, mad labors, mad books, endeavors, cariages, grosse ignorance, ridiculous actions, absurd gestures; insanam gulam, insaniam villarum, insana jurgia, as Tully terms them, madnesse of villages,	To dwell on every particular would be a Herculean task: to enumerate mad building works, mad exertions, mad luxury; mad labours, mad books, undertakings and conduct, gross ignorance, ridiculous actions, absurd gestures; mad gluttony, the madness of country houses, mad quarrels, as Cicero calls them: the madness of villages;[1231]
stupend structures, as those [1232] Ægyptian Pyramids, Labyrinths and Sphinges, which a company of crowned asses, ad ostentationem opum, vainly built, when neither the Architect nor King that made them, or to what use and purpose, are yet known:	astounding structures such as the Egyptian pyramids, labyrinths, and sphinxes, which a company of crowned asses vainly built to display their wealth, though neither the architect nor the king responsible, nor their use or purpose, is yet known;[1233]

[1229] Burton. p. 74, h: “Mille puellarum & puerorum mille furores.” Editor: “A thousand frenzies of girls and a thousand of boys.” No source is specified.

[1230] Burton. p. 74, i: “Uter est insanior horum. Hor. Ovid. Virg. Plin.” Editor: “Which of these is the madder? Horace. Ovid. Virgil. Pliny.” The entry combines a question and a list of authors; no exact locations are supplied.

[1231] Editor. “Herculean” means requiring the enormous labour of Hercules. Substructiones are foundations or supporting works, hence “building works”; “carriages” here are conduct. Insaniam villarum refers to the extravagance of country houses, while Burton’s following English says “madnesse of villages.” Both readings are preserved rather than made artificially identical.

[1232] Burton. p. 74, k: “Plin. lib. 36.” Editor: Pliny, Natural History 36, especially 75–83 on Egyptian pyramids and 84 onward on labyrinths. Pliny criticizes royal expenditure and discusses conflicting accounts of pyramid builders.

[1233] Editor. Burton’s “yet known” belongs to his own historical viewpoint. Pliny, Natural History 36.75–83, attacks the vanity of pyramid-building and remarks on disagreement over the builders, while also reporting names and measurements. Burton’s sweeping dismissal should not be read as a statement of present archaeological knowledge.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To insist in their hypocrisie, inconstancie, blindnesse, rashnesse, dementem temeritatem, fraud, cosenage, malice, anger, impudence, ingratitude, ambition, grosse superstition, [1234] tempora infecta & adulatione sordida, as in Tiberius times, such base flattery, stupend, parasitical fawning and colloguing, &c. brawles, conflicts, desires, contentions, it would ask an expert Vesalius to anatomise every member.	to dwell on their hypocrisy, fickleness, blindness, rashness, insane recklessness, fraud, cheating, malice, anger, shamelessness, ingratitude, ambition, gross superstition; an age corrupted and filthy with flattery, as in the time of Tiberius; such base flattery, astonishing, parasitical fawning and wheedling, brawls, conflicts, desires, and disputes: it would take an expert Vesalius to dissect every part.[1235]
Shall I say? Jupiter himself, Apollo, Mars, &c. doted; and monster-conquering Hercules that subdued the world, & helped others, could not relieve himself in this, but mad he was at last. And where shall a man walk, converse with whom, in what Province, City, and not meet whith Signior Deliro, or Hercules Furens, Mænades, and Corybantes?	Shall I say it? Jupiter himself, Apollo, Mars, and the rest were foolish; and Hercules, conqueror of monsters, who subdued the world and helped others, could not help himself in this: he too went mad in the end. Where can anyone walk, whom can he speak with, in what province or city, without meeting Mr Delirious, Hercules Raging, Maenads, and Corybants?[1236]

[1234] Burton. p. 74, z: “Tacitus 3. Annal.” Editor: Tacitus, Annals 3.65, on a period corrupted by competitive flattery of Tiberius.

[1235] Editor. Andreas Vesalius was an anatomist. Burton invokes anatomical dissection to imagine taking the whole corrupt social body apart, member by member. “Colloguing” means coaxing or wheedling with flattery. Tacitus’s historical setting supplies an analogy for Burton’s much wider indictment.

[1236] Editor. Hercules Furens means “Hercules Raging” and is also the title of Seneca’s tragedy about the hero’s madness. Maenads are frenzied followers of Dionysus; Corybants are ecstatic attendants associated with the cult of the Great Mother. Signior Deliro is a comic name, “Mr Delirious.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
Their speeches say no lesse. [1237] E fungis nati homines, or else they fetched their pedigree from those that were struck by Sampson with the jawbone of an asse. Or from Deucalion and Pyrrha's stones, for durum genus sumus, [1238] marmorei sumus, we are stony hearted, and savour too much of the stock,	Their speech tells the same story: people born from mushrooms; or else they trace their ancestry to those whom Samson struck with an ass's jawbone, or to the stones of Deucalion and Pyrrha. For we are a hard race, we are marble; we are stone-hearted and show too much of our parent stock;[1239]
as if they had all heard that inchanted horn of Astolpho that English Duke in Ariosto, which never sounded but all his auditors were mad, & for fear ready to make away themselves; [1240] or landed in the mad haven in the Euxine sea of Daphnis insana, which had a secret quality to dementate;	as though they had all heard the enchanted horn of Astolfo, the English duke in Ariosto, whose every blast drove its hearers mad and left them ready to kill themselves from fear; or had landed at the mad harbour in the Black Sea, Mad Daphne, with its hidden power to derange the mind;[1241]

[1237] Burton. p. 74, a: "Ovid. 7. met. E fungis nati homines ut olim Corinthi primævi illius loci accolæ, quia stolidi & fatui fungis nati dicebantur, idem & alibi dicens." Editor: "Ovid, Metamorphoses 7. People born from mushrooms, as once at Corinth: the earliest inhabitants of that place were said to have sprung from mushrooms because they were stupid and foolish; he says the same elsewhere." Burton's explanatory claim and unspecific "elsewhere" remain unverified.

[1238] Burton. p. 74, b: "Famian. Stradæ de bajulis, de marmore semisculpti." Editor: "Famiano Strada on porters: half-carved from marble." The exact passage remains unlocated.

[1239] Editor. Samson kills men with an ass's jawbone in Judges 15:15; Burton's imagined ancestry adds the ass's proverbial stupidity. In Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.399–415, Deucalion and Pyrrha repopulate the earth by throwing stones which become people. "A hard race" becomes a joke about hard hearts and about resembling one's original material.

[1240] Burton. p. 74, c: "Arianus periplo maris Euxini portus ejus meminit, & Gillius l. 3. de Bospher. Thracio & laurus insana quæ allata in convivium convivas omnes insania affecit. Guliel. Stucchius comment, &c." Editor: "Arrian mentions this harbour in his Periplus of the Black Sea; and Gillius in book 3 on the Thracian Bosporus; also the mad laurel, which, brought into a banquet, drove all the guests mad. Wilhelm Stucki's commentary, etc." These abbreviated references have not been independently collated.

[1241] Editor. Astolfo's horn is introduced in Ariosto's Orlando furioso 15.14–15: its terrible sound makes everyone flee. This locates the central allusion; Burton's added language of madness and self-destruction is not established by those stanzas. "Euxine" means the Black Sea. The harbour name and the marginal "mad laurel" remain unresolved transmitted marvels.

Original text 1651	Modern English
they are a company of giddy-heads, afternoon-men, it is Midsomer moon still, and the Dogdaies last all the year long, they are all mad. Whom shall I then except? Vlricus Huttenus [1242] nemo, nam, nemo omnibus horis sapit, Nemo nascitur sine vitiis, Crimine Nemo caret, Nemo sorte sua vivit contentus, Nemo in amore sapit, Nemo bonus, Nemo sapiens, Nemo, est ex omni parte beatus, &c.	They are a company of scatterbrains and afternoon drunkards; it is always the midsummer moon, and the dog days last all year. They are all mad. Whom, then, shall I except? Ulrich von Hutten's Nobody. For nobody is wise at every hour; nobody is born without faults; nobody is free of guilt; nobody lives content with his lot; nobody is wise in love; nobody is good; nobody is wise; nobody is happy in every respect; and so on.[1243] and therefore Nicholas Nemo, or Monsieur Nobody shall go free, Quid veleat nemo, Nemo referre potest? But whom shall I except in the second place? such as are silent, vir sapit qui pauca loquitur; [1244] no better way to avoid folly and madnesse, then by taciturnity.	So Nicholas Nobody, or Monsieur Nobody, shall go free. What Nobody can do, nobody can tell. Whom shall I except next? Those who keep silent: the person who says little is wise. There is no better way to avoid folly and madness than keeping quiet.
Whom in a third? all Senators, Magistrates: for all fortunate men are wise, and conquerors valiant, and so are all great men, non est bonum ludere cum diis, they are wise by authority, good by their office and place, his licet impune pessimos esse, (some say) we must not speak of them, neither is it fit; per me sint omnia protinus alba, I will not think amisse of them.	Whom third? All senators and magistrates; for all fortunate men are wise, and conquerors brave, and so are all great men. It is no good playing with gods. They are wise by authority, good by office and rank; they may be thoroughly wicked with impunity, some say. We must not speak about them; it would not be proper. As far as I am concerned, let everything be white from this moment: I will think no ill of them.[1245]

[1242] Burton. p. 74, d: "Lepidum poema sic inscriptum." Editor: "A witty poem with this title"—Nemo, "Nobody," by Ulrich von Hutten. The CAMENA text, pp. 111–113, contains several of Burton's phrases, including Nemo in amore sapit and the closing Quid valeat Nemo, Nemo referre potest. Burton selects and rearranges sayings; his entire sequence is not a continuous quotation from the consulted poem.

[1243] Editor. "Afternoon-men" are habitual afternoon drinkers. The midsummer moon and dog days evoke the supposed frenzy of summer heat. The joke repeatedly turns nemo, "nobody," into a person's name: only Nobody qualifies as wise or blameless. "Nicholas Nemo" extends it into a mock personal name. The following veleat is retained as printed; the sense is valeat, "can do" or "has power."

[1244] Burton. p. 74, e: "Stultitiam simulare non potes nisi taciturnitate." Editor: Literally, "You cannot feign folly except through silence." This conflicts with the body's advice to avoid folly by keeping silent. Dissimulare, "conceal," would suit that argument, but simulare is the printed reading and is not silently emended.

[1245] Editor. These exemptions are ironic: power confers an official appearance of wisdom and makes criticism dangerous. The closing Latin adapts Persius 1.110, where the satirist answers pressure to stop offending the great. "Let everything be white" means to count everything blameless, an ostentatious surrender of judgement rather than an earnest endorsement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 74–75 Whom next? Stoicks? Sapiens Stoicus, and he alone is subject to no perturbations, as [1246] Plutarch scoffs at him, he is not vexed with torments, or burnt with fire, foiled by his adversary, sold of his enemy: though he be wrinckled, sand-blinde, toothlesse and deformed; yet he is most beautifull, and like a god, a king in conceit, though not worth a groat.	Whom next? The Stoics? The Stoic sage, and he alone, is subject to no disturbance of mind. As Plutarch mockingly describes him, torture does not trouble him, fire does not burn him, his adversary cannot defeat him, his enemy cannot sell him. Though wrinkled, half-blind, toothless, and deformed, he is supremely beautiful and godlike, a king in his own imagination, though not worth a groat.[1247]
Source page 75 He never dotes, never mad, never sad, drunk, because vertue cannot be taken away, as [1248] Zeno holds, by reason of strong apprehension, but he was mad to say so. [1249] Anticyræ cœlo huic est opus aut dolabrâ, he had need to be bored, and so had all his fellows, as wise as they would seem to be.	He never loses his judgement, never goes mad, never becomes sad or drunk, because virtue cannot be taken away: so Zeno maintains, on account of the firmness of his understanding. But he was mad to say so. This fellow needs Anticyra's chisel or a pickaxe; he needs a hole bored in his head, and so do all his companions, however wise they would like to seem.[1250]

[1246] Burton. p. 75, f: "Extortus non cruciatur, ambustus non læditur, Prostratus in luctâ, non vincitur; non fit captivus ab hoste venundatus. Et si rugosus, senex edentulus, luscus, deformis, formosus tamen, & deo similis, felix, dives, rex nullius egens, et si denario non sit dignus." Editor: "Tortured, he is not tormented; burned, he is not hurt; thrown in wrestling, he is not defeated; sold by an enemy, he does not become a captive. Though wrinkled, old, toothless, one-eyed, deformed, he is nevertheless handsome, godlike, happy, rich, a king needing nothing, though not worth a penny." Burton names Plutarch; the precise passage remains unlocated.

[1247] Editor. Burton continues the ironic list of exceptions to universal folly. The Stoic sage is an ideal of perfect wisdom, not every adherent of Stoicism. "Perturbations" are disturbances of mind or passion; "sand-blind" means partly blind. A groat was a coin worth four pence.

[1248] Burton. p. 75, g: "Illum contendunt non injuria affici, non insania, non inebriari, quia virtus non eripitur ob constantes comprehensiones. Lips. phys. Stoic. lib. 3. diss. 18." Editor: "They maintain that he is unaffected by injury or madness and does not become drunk, because virtue cannot be taken away, owing to firm apprehensions." Lipsius, Physiology of the Stoics, book 3, dissertation 18, as printed; passage uncollated.

[1249] Burton. p. 75, h: "Tarreus Hebus epig. 102. l. 8." Editor: The first name is a doubtful reading of the small print; the author and epigram have not been securely identified. The body's cœlo is interpreted as cælo, "chisel," rather than cælo, "sky"; dolabra is a pickaxe or similar cutting tool. The grotesque surgical image is reinforced by Burton's "bored."

[1250] Editor. Anticyra was proverbial for hellebore, a purgative associated with madness. Here the imagery escalates to boring or cutting the head. "Strong apprehension" means secure intellectual grasp. Compare Diogenes Laertius 7.127, which contrasts Chrysippus with Cleanthes, rather than Zeno, over whether virtue can be lost. Burton's Zeno is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Chrysippus himself liberally grants them to be fools as well as others, at certain times, upon some occasions, amitti virtutem ait per ebrietatem, aut atrabilarium morbum, it may be lost by drunkennesse or melancholy, he may be sometimes crased as well as the rest: [1251] ad summum sapiens nisi quum pituita molesta.	Chrysippus himself freely concedes that at certain times and on certain occasions they are fools like everyone else: he says that virtue can be lost through drunkenness or melancholy. It may be lost through drunkenness or melancholy; the wise man may sometimes be mentally unsettled like the rest: supremely wise, except when troublesome phlegm gets in the way.[1252]
I should here except some Cynicks, Menippus, Diogenes, that Theban Crates; or to descend to these times, that omniscious, only wise fraternity [1253] of the Rosie Crosse, those great Theologues, Politicians, Philosophers, Physitians, Philologers, Artists, &c. of whom S. Bridget, Abbas Joacchimus, Leicenbergius, and such divine spirits have prophesied, & made promise to the world,	I ought here to except some Cynics: Menippus, Diogenes, and Crates of Thebes. Or, coming down to our own times, that all-knowing brotherhood of the Rosy Cross, the only people who are wise: those great theologians, statesmen, philosophers, physicians, scholars of language, practitioners of the arts, and so on, whom Saint Bridget, Abbot Joachim, Leicenbergius, and such inspired spirits have prophesied and promised to the world;[1254]

[1251] Burton. p. 75, i: "Hor." Editor: Horace, Epistles 1.1.106–108. Burton compresses the passage, which describes the wise man as inferior only to Jupiter and especially healthy, unless troubled by phlegm. Printed summum is retained rather than changed to Horace's summam.

[1252] Editor. The Latin literally refers to a disease of black bile. Phlegm and black bile belong to humoral accounts of body and mind. Burton's shortened Horace quotation allows bodily disturbance to puncture the sage's claim to unshakable wisdom. Both the Latin claim and Burton's English repetition are retained in modern English.

[1253] Burton. p. 75, k: "Fratres sanct. Roseæ crucis." Editor: "Brothers of the holy Rosy Cross."

[1254] Editor. Menippus, Diogenes, and Crates belong to the ancient Cynic tradition. "Artists" here includes practitioners of learned or technical arts. The Rosy Cross passage moves between admiration, extravagant praise, and doubt; it does not establish that a brotherhood possessing this knowledge actually existed. The identities and particular prophecies behind Leicenbergius and the other visionary names remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
if at least there be any such (Hen. [1255] Neuhusius makes a doubt of it, [1256] Valentinus Andreas and others) or an Elias artifex their Theophrastian master; whom though Libavius & many deride and carp at, yet some will have to be the [1257] renewer of all arts & sciences, reformer of the world, & now living,	if, that is, any such people exist—Heinrich Neuhusius doubts it, as do Valentinus Andreae and others—or if there is an Elijah the Artificer, their Paracelsian master. Though Libavius and many others ridicule and criticize him, some insist that he is the renewer of all the arts and sciences, the reformer of the world, and alive at this very moment;[1258]
for so Johannes Montanus Strigoniensis that great Patron of Paracelsus contends, and certainly avers [1259] a most divine man, & the quintessence of wisdom wheresoever he is; for he, his fraternity, friends, &c. are all [1260] betrothed to wisdom, if we may believe their disciples and followers.	for so Johannes Montanus Strigoniensis, that great champion of Paracelsus, argues and confidently asserts: a supremely godlike man, the very essence of wisdom, wherever he may be. For he, his brotherhood, his friends, and the rest are all betrothed to wisdom, if we may believe their disciples and followers.
I must needs except Lipsius & the Pope, and expunge their name out of the catalogue of fools. For besides that parasitical testimony of Dousa, A Sole exoriente Mæotidas usque paludes, Nemo est qui justo se æquiparare queat.	I must of course except Lipsius and the Pope, and strike their names from the catalogue of fools. For besides Dousa's flattering testimony— From the rising sun to the Maeotian marshes, No one can claim to equal Justus—[1261]

[1255] Burton. p. 75, l: "An sint, quales sint, unde nomen illud asciverint." Editor: "Whether they exist, what sort of people they are, and where they adopted that name from." The reference accompanies Neuhusius; the precise text remains uncollated.

[1256] Burton. p. 75, m: "Turris Babel." Editor: "The Tower of Babel," cited here as Andreae's title; this work has not been independently collated.

[1257] Burton. p. 75, n: "Omnium artium & scientiarum instaurator." Editor: "Restorer of all the arts and sciences."

[1258] Editor. Elias artifex means "Elijah the Artificer," a figure of expected reform in the arts and sciences. "Theophrastian" here points to Paracelsus, also named Theophrastus, rather than to the ancient Greek philosopher. Burton's syntax leaves some uncertainty over the relation between this figure, the brotherhood, and the next endorsement; the modern version retains that uncertainty.

[1259] Burton. p. 75, o: "Divinus ille vir author notarum. in epist. Rog. Bacon. ed. Hambur. 1608." Editor: "That divine man, author of the notes on Roger Bacon's letter, Hamburg edition, 1608." The abbreviated bibliographical identification is retained; attribution and exact passage remain unverified.

[1260] Burton. p. 75, p: "Sapientiæ desponsati." Editor: "Betrothed to wisdom."

[1261] Editor. Dousa is the Latin name used by Jan van der Does; the particular author and occasion of these lines require collation. Justo plays on the first name of Justus Lipsius and can also suggest "the just man." The Maeotian marshes are the region of the Sea of Azov. The geographical sweep is extravagant praise, not a precise measure of Lipsius's influence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Lipsius saith of himself, that he was [1262] humani generis quidem pædagogus voce & stylo, a grand Signior, a Master, a Tutor of us all, and for 13 years he brags, how he sowed wisdom in the Low countries, as Ammonius the philosopher sometimes did in Alexandria, [1263] cum humanitate literas & sapientiam cum prudentia: antistes sapientiæ, he shall be Sapientum Octavus.	Lipsius says of himself that he was indeed the teacher of the human race, through speech and writing: a grand lord, a master, a tutor to us all. He boasts of how, for thirteen years, he sowed wisdom in the Low Countries, as the philosopher Ammonius once did in Alexandria: literature together with humane learning, and wisdom with practical judgement. High priest of wisdom, he shall be the eighth sage.[1264]
The Pope is more then a man, as [1265] his parats often make him, a demi-god, and besides his holinesse cannot erre, in Cathedrâ belike: and yet some of them have been Magicians, Hereticks, Atheists, children, and as Platina saith of John 22. Etsi vir literatus, multa stoliditatem & lævitatem præ se ferentia egit, stolidi & socordis vir ingenii, a scholar sufficient, yet many things he did foolishly, lightly.	The Pope is more than a man, a demigod, as his parrots often make him out to be; besides, His Holiness cannot err—when speaking from his official chair, presumably. Yet some popes have been magicians, heretics, atheists, or children. As Platina says of John XXII: though a learned man, he did many things that showed stupidity and frivolity, being a man of foolish and sluggish intelligence. A competent scholar, yet he did many things foolishly and frivolously.[1266]

[1262] Burton. p. 75, q: “Solus hic est sapiens alii volitant velut umbræ.” Editor: “He alone is wise; the others flit about like shadows.” This marginal praise stands beside Lipsius’s claim to teach humanity.

[1263] Burton. p. 75, r: “In ep. ad Balthas. Moretum.” Editor: “In a letter to Balthasar Moretus.” Burton supplies no date or letter number; the passage remains unlocated.

[1264] Editor. “Eighth sage” mockingly adds Lipsius to the traditional Seven Sages. “Grand Signior” was a title associated with the Ottoman ruler; here it inflates the scholar’s authority. The particular Ammonius intended and the Lipsius letter remain unlocated. Humanitas can combine humane cultivation and literary learning.

[1265] Burton. p. 75, s: “Rejectiunculæ ad Patavum. Felinus cum reliquis.” Editor: Approximately, “Little rebuttals to Patavus. Felinus with the others.” The short titles and names have not been securely resolved; no expanded identification is imposed.

[1266] Editor. “His parrots” means those who repeat extravagant claims for papal authority. In cathedra literally means “in the chair,” here the official teaching seat. Burton’s polemic and his attribution to Platina are preserved as claims made by the text; the catalogue and the John XXII passage have not been independently established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I can say no more then in particular, but in general terms to the rest, they are all mad, their wits are evaporated, and as Ariosto faigns l. 34. kept in jars above the Moon. Some lose their wits with love, some with ambition, Some following [1267] Lords and men of high condition. Some in fair jewels rich and costly set, Others in Poetry their wits forget. Another thinks to be an Alcumist, Till all be spent, and that his number's mist.	I can say no more, then, of particular people; but of the rest I can say in general that they are all mad. Their wits have evaporated and, as Ariosto imagines in book 34, are kept in jars above the moon. Some lose their wits to love, some to ambition, Some serving lords and men of high position; Some in fine jewels richly, dearly set, Others in poetry their wits forget. Another dreams of being an alchemist, Until all's spent and his reckoning goes amiss.[1268]
Source page 75–76 Convict fools they are, mad men upon record; and I am afraid past cure many of them, [1269] crepunt inguina, the Symptomes are manifest, they are all of Gotam parish: [1270] Quum furor haud dubius, quum sit manifesta phrenesis, what remains then [1271] but to send for Lorarios, these Officers to carry them all together for company to Bedlam, and set Rablais to be their physitian.	They are convicted fools, certified madmen, and many of them, I fear, beyond cure. Their groins rumble; the symptoms are obvious. They all belong to Gotham parish: Since madness is beyond doubt, and frenzy plain to see, what remains but to send for the lash-bearing attendants, those officers who can take them all off together to Bedlam for company, and appoint Rabelais their physician?[1272]

[1267] Burton. p. 75, t: "Magnum virum sequi est sapere, some think; others desipere. Catul." Editor: "To follow a great man is to be wise," some think; others, "to be foolish." The appended Catul. is preserved without claiming a verified Catullus passage.

[1268] Editor. The English verse matches John Harington's Orlando furioso, book 34, stanza 84 in the consulted digital transcription. Burton omits two lines and alters wording; that witness ends "and he his number mist." An early printed Harington copy remains to be collated. "His number's mist" is still obscure; "his reckoning goes amiss" remains a provisional rendering.

[1269] Burton. p. 75, *: "Plaut. Menec." Editor: Compare Plautus, Menaechmi 925–926, where the physician asks whether the patient's intestines rumble; he answers that they do when he is hungry. Burton prints crepunt inguina, literally a rumbling or cracking of the groins. The modern version preserves that odd anatomy instead of silently substituting Plautus's intestina.

[1270] Burton. p. 76, u: "In Sat. 14." Editor: Juvenal, Satire 14.136, on the madness of living in poverty in order to die rich.

[1271] Burton. p. 76, x: "Or to send for a cook to the Anticyræ to make Hellebor pottage, settle brain pottage." Editor: Anticyra and hellebore recur as conventional images of purging madness. "Pottage" is a thick soup; the proposed menu is a satirical joke.

[1272] Editor. Gotham's inhabitants were proverbial fools; Burton assigns everyone to their parish. Bedlam is Bethlem Hospital in London. Lorarii were attendants associated with lashes or straps. Rabelais, the comic writer and physician, makes the imagined treatment itself part of the satire.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 76 If any man shall ask in the mean time, who I am that so boldly censure others, tu nullane habes vitia? have I no faults? [1273] Yes more then thou hast, whatsoever thou art. Nos numerus sumus, I confesse it again, I am as foolish, as mad as any one. [1274] Insanus vobis videor, non deprecor ipse, Quo minus insanus,——	If anyone meanwhile asks who I am to judge others so boldly—do you have no faults yourself? Have I no faults? Yes, more than you have, whoever you are. We are part of the crowd. I confess it again: I am as foolish, as mad, as anyone. I seem mad to you; I do not myself ask To be spared the name of madman.[1275]
I do not deny it, demens de populo dematur. My comfort is, I have more fellows, and those of excellent note. And though I be not so right, or so discreet as I should be, yet not so mad, so bad neither as thou perhaps takest me to be.	I do not deny it: let one madman be taken out of the crowd. My comfort is that I have plenty of companions, including some very distinguished ones. And though I am not as sound in mind or as judicious as I ought to be, I am not as mad, or as bad either, as you perhaps suppose.
To conclude, this being granted, that all the world is melancholy, or mad, dotes, and every member of it, I have ended my task, and sufficiently illustrated that which I took upon me to demonstrate at first. At this present I have no more to say; His sanam mentem Democritus, I can but wish my self, & them a good Physitian, and all of us a better minde.	To conclude: once it is granted that the whole world, and every member of it, is melancholy, mad, or foolish, I have finished my task and sufficiently illustrated what I first undertook to demonstrate. For now I have no more to say. Democritus wishes them a sound mind. I can only wish myself and them a good physician, and all of us a better state of mind.

[1273] Burton. p. 76, y: “Aliquantulum tamen inde me solabor, quod unà cum multis & sapientibus & celeberrimis viris ipse insipiens sim, quod se Menippus Luciani in Necyomantia.” Editor: “Yet I shall take some comfort from being a fool myself in company with many wise and very celebrated men, as Lucian’s Menippus [says of] himself in the Necyomantia.” The printed quod se is compressed or defective; the supplied words clarify the sense. Exact passage uncollated.

[1274] Burton. p. 76, z: “Petronius in Catalect.” Editor: A collection of shorter poems attributed to Petronius. The exact poem and its attribution remain unverified; the fragment’s syntax is completed minimally in the modern version.

[1275] Editor. Nos numerus sumus is Horace, Epistles 1.2.27: “we make up the numbers,” here rendered as belonging to the crowd. The next demens de populo dematur, “let a madman be taken from the people,” has no source supplied and is left without a conjectural attribution. Burton both includes himself in universal folly and resists the reader’s harshest judgement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And although for the abovenamed reasons, I had a just cause to undertake this subject, to point at these particular species of dotage, that so men might acknowledg their imperfections, and seek to reform what is amisse; yet I have a more serious intent at this time; and to omit all impertinent digressions, to say no more of such as are improperly melancholy, or metaphorically mad, lightly mad, or in disposition,	And although the reasons already given justified my taking up this subject and pointing to these particular kinds of folly, so that people might acknowledge their failings and try to correct what is wrong, I now have a more serious purpose. To leave aside all irrelevant digressions, and say no more about those who are melancholy only in a loose sense, mad metaphorically, slightly mad, or merely disposed that way—[1276]
as stupid, angry, drunken, silly, sottish, sullen, proud, vain glorious, ridiculous, beastly, peevish, obstinate, impudent, extravagant, dry, doting, dull, desperate, harebrain, &c. mad, frantick, foolish, hetoroclites, which no new [1277] Hospitall can hold, no physick help:	the stupid, angry, drunken, silly, brutish, sullen, proud, boastful, ridiculous, bestial, ill-tempered, stubborn, shameless, erratic, barren of wit, foolish, dull, desperate, harebrained, and so on; mad, frantic, foolish, irregular specimens whom no new hospital can hold and no medicine help —[1278]
my purpose and endeavor is, in the following discourse to anatomize this humor of melancholy, through all his parts and species, as it is an habit, or an ordinary disease, and that philosophically, medicinally, to shew the causes, symptoms, and severall cures of it, that it may be the better avoyded.	my purpose and endeavour in the following discussion is to dissect this humour of melancholy in all its parts and varieties, as a settled condition or a disease in the usual sense. I shall examine it philosophically and medically, showing its causes, symptoms, and various cures, so that it may be better avoided.

[1276] Editor. This is the explicit turn from folly as a moral and satirical metaphor to melancholy as an established illness. “In disposition” indicates a tendency or temporary state; “habit” in the following passage is an enduring condition. “Ordinary disease” means disease properly understood, not necessarily a mild one.

[1277] Burton. p. 76, a: “That I mean of Andr. Vale. Apolog. manip. l. 1. & 26. Apol.” Editor: The hospital is connected with this abbreviated literary reference; its author, title, and numbering remain unresolved.

[1278] Editor. Heteroclites are irregular forms in grammar, transferred here to irregular people. “Dry” is rendered “barren of wit” in this list of deficiencies, rather than suggesting dry humour. The precise force remains uncertain, and a humoral suggestion is also possible. Burton’s long list is retained without treating its moral insults as modern diagnoses.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Moved thereunto for the generality of it, and to do good, it being a disease so frequent, as [1279] Mercurialis observes, in these our dayes; so often happening, (saith [1280] Laurentius, in our miserable times, as few there are that feel not the smart of it. Of the same minde is Ælian Montalus, [1281] Melancton, and others;	I am moved to do this by its widespread presence and by a desire to do good. It is a disease so frequent in our own days, as Mercurialis observes, so often occurring in our miserable times, as Laurentius says, that few escape its pain. Aelian Montalto, Melanchthon, and others are of the same opinion;[1282]
[1283] Julius Cæsar Claudinus cals it the fountain of all other diseases, and so common in this crased age of ours, that scarce one of a thousand is free from it: and that Splenetick Hypocondriacal winde especially, which proceeds from the spleen and short ribs.	Giulio Cesare Claudini calls it the source of all other diseases, so common in this disordered age of ours that scarcely one person in a thousand is free of it—especially that splenic, hypochondriacal wind which arises from the spleen and the region beneath the lower ribs.[1284]
Being then it is a disease so grievous, so common, I know not wherein to do a more generall service, and spend my time better, then to prescribe means how to prevent and cure so universall a malady, an Epidemical disease, that so often, so much crucifies the body and minde.	Since it is so grievous and so common a disease, I know no way to serve people more widely or spend my time better than by setting out ways to prevent and cure so universal a malady, so widespread a disease, which so often and so severely torments body and mind.

[1279] Burton. p. 76, b: “Hæc affectio nostris temporibus frequentissima.” Editor: “This condition is extremely frequent in our times.”

[1280] Burton. p. 76, c: “Cap. 15. de Mel.” Editor: “Chapter 15, on melancholy.” This accompanies Laurentius; the cited chapter has not been independently collated.

[1281] Burton. p. 76, d: “De anima, nostro hoc sæculo morbus frequentissimus.” Editor: “On the Soul: a disease extremely frequent in this age of ours.” Burton cites Melanchthon; exact passage uncollated.

[1282] Editor. The names are conventionally identified with Girolamo Mercuriale, André du Laurens, Elijah (Aelian) Montalto, and Philipp Melanchthon. Their quoted prevalence claims belong to Burton’s historical argument. The individual editions and passages need further bibliographical collation.

[1283] Burton. p. 76, e: “Consult. 98. adeo nostris temporibus frequenter ingruit ut nullus fere ab ejus labe immunis reperiatur & omnium fere morborum occasio existat.” Editor: “Consultation 98: it attacks so frequently in our times that almost no one is found free from its taint, and it is the occasion of almost every disease.” Claudini’s wording is preserved as Burton’s quotation, not as a modern prevalence estimate.

[1284] Editor. “Hypochondriacal” here refers to the upper abdominal region beneath the ribs, especially in connection with the spleen and supposed wind or vapours. It does not simply mean modern health anxiety. “Short ribs” are the lower ribs. “Epidemical” in the next passage stresses widespread occurrence; Burton is not thereby claiming contagious transmission.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 76–77 If I have overshot my self in this which hath been hitherto said, or that it is, which I am sure some will object, too phantastical, too light and comicall for a Divine, too satyricall for one of my profession, I will presume to answer with [1285] Erasmus, in like case, Tis not I, but Democritus, Democritus dixit:	If I have gone too far in what I have said so far, or if it is—as some, I am sure, will object—too fanciful, too light and comic for a clergyman, too satirical for someone of my profession, I shall venture to answer as Erasmus did in a similar case: it is not I, but Democritus. Democritus said it.[1286]
Source page 77 you must consider what it is to speak in ones own or anothers person, an assumed habit and name; a difference betwixt him that affects or acts a Princes, a Philosophers, a Magistrates, a Fools part, and him that is so indeed; and what liberty those old Satyrists have had, it is a Cento collected from others, not I, but they that say it.	You must consider the difference between speaking in one's own person and speaking in another's, wearing an assumed costume and name; between someone who puts on or acts the part of a prince, philosopher, magistrate, or fool, and someone who really is one. Remember, too, the freedom the ancient satirists enjoyed. This is a patchwork collected from other writers: they say it, not I.[1287]
[1288] Dixero si quid fortè jocosius, hoc mihi juris Cum veniâ dabis—— Take heed you mistake me not. If I do a little forget my self, I hope you will pardon it. And to say truth, why should any man be offended, or take exceptions at it?	If I happen to say something rather too playful, You will pardon me and allow me that liberty. Take care not to misunderstand me. If I forget myself a little, I hope you will forgive it. And, to tell the truth, why should anyone be offended or object?

[1285] Burton. p. 76, f: "Mor. Encom. si quis calumnietur lusus esse quam decet Theologum, aut mordacius quam deceat Christianum." Editor: "Praise of Folly: if anyone objects that the joking exceeds what befits a theologian, or is more biting than befits a Christian." Burton compresses Erasmus's dedicatory letter to Thomas More, which anticipates both objections. Printed lusus esse is retained; Burton's Latin is not a verbatim quotation of the consulted text.

[1286] Editor. Burton is an Anglican clergyman; "Divine" means a theologian or cleric. Erasmus's Praise of Folly supplies a precedent for attributing provocative speech to a dramatic speaker. Burton's defence simultaneously invokes his chosen Democritus persona and the authority of earlier writers.

[1287] Editor. A cento is a literary patchwork made from other texts. "Habit" here means costume or assumed outward appearance, unlike the medical sense a few paragraphs earlier. The theatre analogy separates an actor's role from the actor, although Burton's own voice repeatedly crosses that boundary.

[1288] Burton. p. 77, g: "Hor. Sat. 4. l. 1." Editor: Horace, Satires 1.4.103–105; Burton abbreviates and rearranges the opening.

Original text 1651	Modern English
——Licuit, semperque licebit, Parcere personis, dicere de vitiis. It lawfull was of old, and still will be, To speak of vice, but let the name go free: I hate their vices, not their persons.	It has been allowed, and always will be, To spare the people and speak of their vices. It was allowed of old, and still will be, To speak of vice, but leave the person free: I hate their vices, not the people themselves.[1289]
If any be displeased, or take ought unto himself, let him not expostulate or cavil with him that said it (so did [1290] Erasmus excuse himself to Dorpius, si parva licet componere magnis) and so do I, but let him be angry with himself, that so betrayed and opened his own faults in applying it to himself:	If anyone is displeased or takes anything personally, let him not argue or find fault with the person who said it. Erasmus defended himself this way to Dorpius—if small things may be compared with great—and so do I. Let the offended man be angry with himself, for betraying and exposing his own faults by applying the words to himself;
[1291] If he be guilty and deserve it, let him amend whoever he is, and not be angry. He that hateth correction is a fool, Prov. 12. 1. If he be not guilty, it concerns him not; it is not my freenesse of speech, but a guilty conscience, a gauled back of his own that makes him winch.	if he is guilty and deserves it, let him reform, whoever he is, instead of growing angry. Whoever hates correction is a fool: Proverbs 12:1. If he is innocent, it does not concern him. It is not my freedom of speech that makes him flinch, but his guilty conscience, a sore on his own back.[1292]

[1289] Editor. The second Latin line appears in Martial, Epigrams 10.33.10. Burton supplies a different lead-in from the consulted Martial text. His following English couplet is retained as a separate restatement rather than silently removed as repetition.

[1290] Burton. p. 77, h: “Epi. ad Dorpium de Moria: si quispiam offendatur & sibi vindicet, non habet quod expostulet cum eo qui scripsit, ipse si volet, secum agat injuriam, utpote sui proditor, qui declaravit hoc ad se proprie pertinere.” Editor: “Letter to Dorpius on Folly: if someone is offended and claims it applies to him, he has no grounds to protest against the writer; if he wishes, let him take up the injury with himself, having betrayed himself by declaring that it applies particularly to him.” Burton’s wording is retained; the letter has not been collated for this draft.

[1291] Burton. p. 77, i: “Si quis se læsum clamabit, aut conscientiam prodit suam, aut certe metum Phædr. lib. 3. Æsop. Fab.” Editor: “If anyone cries out that he is injured, he betrays either his conscience or at least his fear. Phaedrus, book 3 of Aesop’s Fables.” This prose closely matches Erasmus’s dedicatory letter to Thomas More in Praise of Folly. The following verse is Phaedrus’s book 3 prologue. The printed attribution remains; the route by which Burton combined the passages is not established.

[1292] Editor. A “gauled back” is a back rubbed sore, like an animal’s under harness. The sufferer flinches because the remark touches an existing fault. This is Burton’s defence of satire: the offended reader supposedly identifies himself by protesting.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Suspitione si quis errabit suâ, Et rapiet ad se, quod erit commune omnium, Stultè nudabit animi conscientiam. I deny not this which I have said savors a little of Democritus; [1293] Quamvis ridentem dicere verum quid vetat; one may speak in jest, and yet speak truth.	If anyone, misled by his own suspicion, Takes personally what applies to everyone, He foolishly lays bare his guilty conscience. I do not deny that what I have said has something of Democritus about it. Yet what prevents a laughing man from speaking the truth? One may speak in jest and still speak truth.[1294]
It is somewhat tart, I grant it; acriora orexim excitant embammata, as he said, sharp sauces increase appetite, [1295] Nec cibus ipse juvat morsu fraudatus aceti. Object then and cavil what thou wilt, I ward all with [1296] Democritus buckler, his medicine shall salve it; strike where thou wilt, and when: Democritus dixit, Democritus will answer it.	It is somewhat sharp, I admit. Pungent sauces stimulate the appetite, as someone said: sharp sauces increase appetite. Even food gives no pleasure without vinegar's bite. Object and quibble as you please: I fend it all off with Democritus's shield; his medicine will heal the wound. Strike wherever and whenever you like: Democritus said it, and Democritus will answer for it.
It was written by an idle fellow, at idle times, about our Saturnalian or Dyonisian feasts, when as he said, nullum libertati periculum est, servants in old Rome had liberty to say and do what them list.	It was written by an idle fellow in idle hours, around the time of our Saturnalian or Dionysian feasts, when, as someone said, freedom is in no danger: servants in ancient Rome were free to say and do whatever they pleased.[1297]

[1293] Burton. p. 77, k: "Hor." Editor: Horace, Satires 1.1.24–25. Burton prints Quamvis, where the consulted Latin text has quamquam.

[1294] Editor. Compare Phaedrus, Fables 3, prologue 45–47. Burton changes the second line's construction but preserves the claim that personal application exposes the reader's conscience. His laughing truth-teller then joins the Horatian defence of comic moral instruction.

[1295] Burton. p. 77, l: "Mart. l. 7. 22." Editor: The line is Martial, Epigrams 7.25.5 in the consulted numbering. Burton's printed 22 is retained.

[1296] Burton. p. 77, m: "Ut lubet feriat, abstergant hos ictus Democriti pharmacos." Editor: Approximately, "Let him strike as he pleases; let Democritus's remedies wipe away these blows." The printed pharmacos does not fit the construction straightforwardly; the rendering follows Burton's adjacent shield-and-medicine explanation. Exact source unresolved.

[1297] Editor. The Saturnalia and festivals of Dionysus stand for licensed festivity and temporary freedom of speech. Burton applies their names to "our" celebrations. The passage is a literary excuse for frankness, not a securely dated account of when these pages were composed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
When our countrymen sacrificed to their goddesse [1298] Vacuna, and sat tipling by their Vacunall fires, I writ this, and published this οὔτις ἔλεγεν, it is neminis nihil. The time, place, persons, and all circumstances apologize for me, and why may I not then be idle with others? speak my minde freely? If you deny me this liberty, upon these presumptions I will take it: I say again, I will take it.	While our countrymen sacrificed to their goddess Vacuna and sat drinking by their Vacunalian fires, I wrote and published this: Nobody was speaking; it is nothing by Nobody. The time, place, people, and every circumstance speak in my defence. Why, then, may I not be idle with the rest and speak my mind freely? If you deny me this liberty, I shall take it on these grounds. I say again: I shall take it.[1299]
[1300] Si quis est qui dictum in se inclementius Existimavit esse, sic existimet. If any man take exceptions, let him turn the buckle of his girdle, I care not. I owe thee nothing (Reader) I look for no favor at thy hands, I am independent, I fear not.	If anyone thinks that I have spoken Too harshly against him, let him think so. If anyone objects, let him turn his belt buckle around; I do not care. I owe you nothing, reader. I look for no favour from you. I depend on no one. I am not afraid.[1301]
Source page 78 No, I recant, I will not, I care, I fear, I confesse my fault, acknowledg a great offence, ——motos præstat componere fluctus, I have overshot my self, I have spoken foolishly, rashly, unadvisedly, absurdly, I have anatomized mine own folly.	No, I take it back; I will not. I do care, I am afraid. I confess my fault and acknowledge a great offence: better to calm the troubled waves. I have gone too far. I have spoken foolishly, rashly, thoughtlessly, absurdly. I have dissected my own folly.[1302]

[1298] Burton. p. 77, n: “Rusticorum dea præesse vacantibus & otiosis putabatur, cui post labores agricolæ sacrificabant. Plin. l. 3. c. 12. Ovid. l. 6. Fast. Jam quoque, cum fiunt antiquæ sacra Vacunæ, Ante Vacunales stantque sedentque focos. Rosinus.” Editor: “A goddess of country people, thought to preside over those at leisure and idle, to whom farmers sacrificed after their labours. Pliny, book 3, chapter 12. Ovid, Fasti 6: Even now, when the rites of ancient Vacuna are performed, they stand and sit before the Vacunalian hearths. Rosinus.” The Ovid lines are 6.307–308; the Pliny and Rosinus passages remain uncollated.

[1299] Editor. Vacuna is represented in the margin as a rural goddess of leisure. The Greek οὔτις ἔλεγεν means “Nobody was speaking”; neminis nihil means “nothing of Nobody.” These phrases resume the earlier joke about Nemo, or Nobody, and let the author play at disclaiming authorship. Greek accents are regularized in the transcription.

[1300] Burton. p. 77, o: “Ter. prol. Eunuch.” Editor: Terence, Eunuchus, prologue 4–5. Burton stops before the next line, which explains that the supposed attack was a reply to an earlier injury.

[1301] Editor. Turning the buckle of one’s girdle is a dismissive expression: the offended person can do as he pleases. The physical image is retained. Burton’s truncated Terence quotation is followed by a declaration of independence that the very next sentence overturns.

[1302] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 1.135: Neptune interrupts his threat against the winds to calm the sea first. Burton borrows the self-interruption for his own sudden retreat. “Anatomized mine own folly” turns his whole examination back upon its author.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And now me thinks upon a sudden I am awaked as it were out of a dream, I have had a raving fit, a phantastical fit, ranged up and down, in and out, I have insulted over most kinde of men, abused some, offended others, wronged my self;	And now, suddenly, I seem to have woken from a dream. I have had a raving fit, a fit of wild fancy, wandered up and down, in and out, jeered at most kinds of people, abused some, offended others, and done myself harm; and now being recovered, and perceiving mine error, cry with [1303] Orlando, Solvite me, pardon (o boni) that which is past, and I will make you amends in that which is to come; I promise you a more sober discourse in my following Treatise.	and now, recovered and aware of my error, I cry with Orlando, "Untie me!" Good people, pardon what is past, and I will make amends in what follows. I promise you a more sober discussion in the treatise to come.
If through weaknesse, folly, passion, [1304] discontent, ignorance, I have said amisse, let it be forgotten and forgiven. I acknowledg that of [1305] Tacitus to be true, Asperæ facetiæ ubi nimis ex vero traxere, acrem sui memoriam relinquunt, a bitter jest leaves a sting behinde it: and as an honorable man observes, [1306] They fear a Satyrist's wit, he their memories.	If weakness, folly, passion, discontent, or ignorance has made me say anything wrong, let it be forgotten and forgiven. I acknowledge the truth of Tacitus's observation: biting jokes, when they come too close to the truth, leave an acrid memory behind. A bitter jest leaves a sting; and, as an honourable man observes, people fear a satirist's wit, while he fears their memories.[1307]

[1303] Burton. p. 78, o: "Ariost. l. 39. Staf. 58." Editor: The abbreviation appears as Staf. Ariosto's Orlando furioso 39.58 compares Orlando's recovery to waking from a nightmare; 39.59 shows him discovering his bonds, and 39.60 gives his request, Solvite me, "Release me." Burton's printed stanza 58 is retained and distinguished from the location of those words.

[1304] Burton. p. 78, p: "Ut enim ex studiis gaudium sic studia ex hilaritate proveniunt. Plinius Maximo suo, ep. lib. 8." Editor: "For as joy comes from study, so study comes from cheerfulness." Pliny, Letters 8.19, addressed to Maximus. The final nasal of gaudium is abbreviated in the scan; the expansion is supported by Pliny's text. Burton varies the wording slightly.

[1305] Burton. p. 78, q: "Annal. 15." Editor: Tacitus, Annals 15, as printed. The precise passage has not been independently collated for this draft.

[1306] Burton. p. 78, r: "Sir Francis Bacon in his Essayes, now Viscount S. Albanes." Editor: Bacon's point is that the people mocked remember and may retaliate; the satirist's cleverness carries this risk. Exact wording uncollated.

[1307] Editor. "Their memories" means the offended people's lasting recollection of an injury, with the possibility of revenge. The long Latin quotation and Burton's shorter English explanation are both retained. His apparent confession remains entangled with the wish to avoid retaliation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I may justly suspect the worst; and though I hope I have wronged no man, yet in Medeas words I will crave pardon, ——Illud jam voce extrema peto, Ne si qua noster dubius effudit dolor, Maneant in animo verba, sed melior tibi Memoria nostri subeat, hæc iræ data Obliterentur——	I have good reason to fear the worst. Though I hope I have wronged no one, I shall ask forgiveness in Medea's words: This I ask in my final words: If my troubled grief has poured out anything, Do not let those words remain in your mind. Let a kinder memory of me take their place; Let these words, given to anger, be erased.[1308]
And in my last words this I do desire, That what in passion I have said, or ire, May be forgotten, and a better minde Be had of us, hereafter as you finde. I earnestly request every private man, as Scaliger did Cardan, not to take offence.	And in my final words I ask That what I said in passion or in anger Be forgotten, and that you think better of me As you judge what follows. I earnestly ask every individual reader, as Scaliger asked Cardan, not to take offence.
I will conclude in his lines, Si me cognitum haberes, non solum donares nobis has facetias nostras, sed etiam indignum duceres, tam humanum animum, lene ingenium, vel minimam suspitionem deprecari oportere. If thou knewest my [1309] modesty and simplicity, thou wouldst easily pardon and forgive what is here amiss, or by thee misconceived.	I shall conclude with his words: if you knew me, you would not only forgive these jests of mine; you would even think it unworthy that so humane a spirit, so gentle a nature, should have to plead against the slightest suspicion. If you knew my modesty and plain dealing, you would readily pardon and forgive whatever is wrong here, or whatever you have misunderstood.[1310]

[1308] Editor. Compare Seneca, Medea 553–557. Burton's Latin differs in several words from the consulted text. In the tragedy Medea's conciliatory speech conceals her intentions, which makes this a pointedly unstable model for an apology. The modern version translates Burton's wording, then preserves his English verse restatement.

[1309] Burton. p. 78, *: "Quod Probus Persii βιογράφος virginali verecundia Persium fuisse dicit, ego, &c." Editor: "What Probus, Persius's biographer, says—that Persius possessed a maidenly modesty—I [say of myself], etc." The ellipsis is Burton's. The biographical attribution has not been independently collated.

[1310] Editor. Scaliger and Cardan are Julius Caesar Scaliger and Girolamo Cardano. The exact source of the quoted appeal remains unlocated. "Simplicity" means plain or unassuming conduct here; it does not mean lack of intelligence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If hereafter anatomizing this surly humor, my hand slip, as an unskilfull prentise I launce too deep, and cut through skin and all at unawares, make it smart, or cut awry, [1311] pardon a rude hand, an unskilfull knife, tis a most difficult thing to keep an even tone, a perpetual tenor, and not sometimes to lash out;	If, as I go on dissecting this surly humour, my hand slips—if, like an unskilled apprentice, I make too deep an incision, cut through skin and all unawares, cause pain, or cut crookedly—forgive a clumsy hand and an unskilled knife. It is extremely difficult to keep an even tone, a constant course, without sometimes lashing out;[1312]
difficile est Satyram non scribere, there be so many objects to divert, inward perturbations to molest, and the very best may sometimes erre; aliquando bonus dormitat Homerus, it is impossible not in so much to overshoot: ——opere in longo fas est obrepere somnum.	It is difficult not to write satire. There are so many things to distract us, so many inner disturbances to trouble us, and even the best may sometimes err: good Homer nods occasionally. In so much writing, some lapses are inevitable: In a long work, sleep may be allowed to creep in.[1313]
But what needs all this? I hope there will no such cause of offence be given; if there be, [1314] Nemo aliquid recognoscat, nos mentimur omnia. Ile deny all (my last refuge) recant all, renounce all I have said, if any man except, and with as much facility excuse, as he can accuse;	But why is all this necessary? I hope no such cause for offence will arise. If it does, let no one recognize anything: we are making it all up. I shall deny everything—my last refuge—take everything back, disown everything I have said if anyone objects, and defend myself as easily as he can accuse me;
but I presume of thy good favor, and gratious acceptance (gentle reader) Out of an assured hope and confidence thereof, I will begin.	but I count on your goodwill and gracious reception, gentle reader. With firm hope and confidence in that, I shall begin.

[1311] Burton. p. 78, †: “Quas aut incuria fudit, aut humana parum cavit natura. Hor.” Editor: “[Blemishes] which carelessness has scattered, or against which human nature has insufficiently guarded.” Horace, Art of Poetry 352–353; the antecedent “blemishes” is supplied from the preceding line.

[1312] Editor. The dissection metaphor becomes an apology for verbal injury. “Humour” is both the melancholy under examination and, in “surly,” a difficult temperament. Burton presents the book’s possible faults as a novice anatomist’s slips of the knife.

[1313] Editor. “It is difficult not to write satire” is Juvenal, Satire 1.30. The last two quotations adapt Horace, Art of Poetry 359–360. Burton writes aliquando for quandoque and opere in longo for operi longo; his forms are preserved on the left. The first names Homer as an example of occasional failure, the second excuses lapses in a long work.

[1314] Burton. p. 78, t: “Prol. quer. Plaut.” Editor: An abbreviated reference to the prologue of Querolus, transmitted under Plautus’s name. The passage and attribution require further collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 95 Lectori male feriato.	To the reader who misuses his leisure.[1315]
Tu vero cavesis edico quisquis es, ne temere sugilles Authorem hujusce operis, aut cavillator irrideas. Imo ne vel ex aliorum censura tacite obloquaris (vis dicam verbo) nequid nasutulus inepte improbes, aut falso fingas.	But you, whoever you are, take care, I warn you, not to attack the author of this work rashly or mock him like a fault-finder. Indeed, do not even join silently in other people's condemnation; to put it plainly, do not turn up your nose and foolishly find fault, or invent false charges.
Nam si talis revera sit, qualem præ se fert Junior Democritus, seniori Democrito saltem affinis, aut ejus Genium vel tantillum sapiat; actum de te, censorem æque ac delatorem [1316]aget econtra (petulanti splene cum sit) sufflabit te in jocos, comminuet in sales, addo etiam, & deo risui te sacrificabit.	For if Democritus Junior really is what he claims to be—at least a kinsman of the elder Democritus, or possessed of even a little of his spirit—you are done for. He will turn critic and accuser against you in return. With his mischievous spleen, he will blow you into a jest, grind you into grains of wit, and, I may add, sacrifice you to the god of laughter.[1317]

[1315] Editor. Male feriatus suggests leisure spent badly or mischievously. The Latin postscript abruptly renews the confrontation with the reader after the conciliatory ending of the English address.

[1316] Burton. Unnumbered postscript, PDF 95, a: "Si me commôrit, melius non tangere clamo. Hor." Editor: "If someone provokes me, I cry, better not touch!" Adapted from Horace, Satires 2.1.45; Horace's text has "qui me conmorit" ("whoever provokes me").

[1317] Editor. Spleen carries the associations of laughter and ill temper. Sales literally means "salts" and figuratively "witticisms"; the rendering retains the image of grinding the victim down. The sacrifice to laughter continues the mock threat.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Iterum moneo, ne quid cavillere, ne dum Democritum Juniorem conviciis infames, aut ignominiose vituperes, de te non male sentientem, tu idem audias ab amico cordato, quod olim vulgus Abderitanum ab [1318]Hyppocrate, concivem bene meritum & popularem suum Democritum, pro insano habens. Ne tu Democrite sapis, stulti autem & insani Abderitæ.	Again I warn you: do not carp. If you abuse and disgrace Democritus Junior, who thinks no ill of you, a sensible friend may say to you what Hippocrates once said to the people of Abdera when they took their worthy fellow citizen Democritus for a madman: "You, Democritus, are indeed wise; the Abderites are the fools and madmen."[1319]
[1320]Abderitanæ pectora plebis habes. Hæc te paucis admonitum volo (male feriate Lector) abi.	"You have the wits of the Abderite mob." I wanted to give you this brief warning, reader who misuses his leisure. Be off.
Source page 96 Heraclite fleas, misero sic convenit ævo, Nil nisi turpe vides, nil nisi triste vides. Ride etiam, quantumque lubet, Democrite ride Non nisi vana vides, non nisi stulta vides.	Weep, Heraclitus: it befits this wretched age; You see nothing but shame, nothing but sorrow. Laugh too, Democritus, laugh as much as you please: You see nothing but vanity, nothing but folly.[1321]
Is fletu, hic risu modo gaudeat, unus utrique Sit licet usque labor, sit licet usque dolor.	Let one find pleasure in tears, the other in laughter, Though both share the same endless labour and pain.

[1318] Burton. Unnumbered postscript, PDF 95, b: "Hippoc. epist. Damageto, accersitus sum ut Democritum tanquam insanum curarem, sed postquam conveni, non per Jovem desipientiæ negotium, sed rerum omnium receptaculum deprehendi, ejusque ingenium admiratus sum. Abderitanos vero tanquam non sanos accusavi, veratri potione ipsos potius eguisse dicens." Editor: "Hippocrates, letter to Damagetus. I was summoned to treat Democritus as a madman; but when I met him, I found, by Jupiter, not a case of folly but a storehouse of all knowledge, and I admired his intellect. I accused the Abderites themselves of being unsound, saying that they were the ones who needed a draught of hellebore." Burton's Latin wording is transcribed here; its precise relation to a particular edition of the letter remains uncollated.

[1319] Editor. This returns to the pseudonymous Hippocratic correspondence discussed in Blocks 001–002. The supposedly mad philosopher proves wiser than the citizens who summoned the doctor. Burton's retelling is preserved; this is not authenticated correspondence between the historical men.

[1320] Burton. Unnumbered postscript, PDF 95, c: "Mart." Editor: Martial, Epigrams 10.25.4. The line is translated in the modern column. Abdera supplies the proverbial example of stupidity.

[1321] Editor. Heraclitus weeps and Democritus laughs at human conduct, the contrasting responses repeatedly invoked in the address. The ten Latin lines are rendered as ten lines of unrhymed English, divided here only for alignment. No author is identified on this page.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nunc opus est (nam totus eheu jam desipit orbis) Mille Heraclitis, milleque Democritis. Nunc opus est (tanta est insania) transeat omnis Mundus in Anticyras, gramen in Helleborum.	Now we need—for, alas, the whole world has gone mad— A thousand Heraclituses, a thousand Democrituses. Now, so great is the madness, we need the whole World turned into Anticyras, and all grass into hellebore.[1322]

[1322] Editor. Anticyra and hellebore recur in Block 019: the place and its purgative are conventional images of a cure for madness. The plural Anticyras imagines the whole earth transformed into places supplying the remedy. The poem's independent source has not been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 97 THE SYNOPSIS OF THE FIRST PARTITION.	Outline of the First Partition.[1323]
In diseases consider Sect. 1. Memb. 1.	In considering diseases: Section 1, Member 1. Sections: 1.1.1.
Their Causes. Subs. 1. Impulsive; sinne, concupiscence, &c. Instrumentall; intemperance, all second causes, &c.	Their causes. Subsection 1. Impelling causes: sin, disordered desire, etc. Instrumental causes: intemperance and all secondary causes, etc.[1324] Sections: 1.1.1.1.
Or Definition, Member, Division, Subsect. 2. Of the body 300. which are Epidemicall; as Plague, Plica, &c. Or Particular; as Gout, Dropsie, &c.	Or their definition, number, and classification. Subsection 2.[1325] Of the body, 300 diseases, which are: Epidemic, such as plague, plica, etc. Or particular, such as gout, dropsy, etc.[1326] Sections: 1.1.1.2.
Or of the head or minde. Subs. 3. In disposition; as all perturbations, evil affection, &c.	Or of the head or mind. Subsection 3. As a passing disposition: all disturbances, harmful affections, etc.[1327] Sections: 1.1.1.3.

[1323] Editor. The four-page branching synopsis is reset as an indented outline. The original column preserves its printed references; the modern references follow the corresponding body headings. “Member” is a subdivision below a section. Zodiac signs serve as navigational marks and are replaced on the right by verbal destinations. Subsection numbers omitted from the outline are supplied for species (1.1.3.4), hypochondriacal causes (1.2.5.4) and symptoms in women (1.3.2.4). Locators here give partition, section, member and subsection in that order.

[1324] Editor. “Impulsive” names the prompting cause; “instrumental” names the means through which an effect occurs. The distinction links sin to the subsequent account of bodily and environmental causes. Concupiscence is disordered desire, broader than sexual desire alone.

[1325] Editor. The synopsis prints “Definition, Member, Division.” The modern “number” is an editorial emendation supported by the corresponding chapter heading, “The Definition Number Division of Diseases,” in Part 1, Section 1, Member 1, Subsection 2 (printed p. 6; PDF p. 106). The left column preserves Member.

[1326] Editor. Plica is the disorder associated with matted or felted hair, often called Polish plait. Dropsy names swelling through accumulated fluid. These are historical groupings within Burton’s outline; “300” is his stated count of bodily diseases.

[1327] Editor. “Disposition” is contrasted with “habit”: a passing state against an established condition. “Affection” means a state or disturbance affecting body or mind, not specifically fondness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or Habits, as Subs. 4. Dotage. Phrensie. Madnesse. Extasie. Lycanthropia. Chorus sancti Viti. Hydrophobia. Possession or obsession of Devils. Melancholy. See ♈	Or as settled conditions. Subsection 4. Mental decay. Frenzy. Madness. Trance. Lycanthropy. St Vitus's dance. Hydrophobia. Possession or harassment by devils. Melancholy: see the outline below.[1328] Sections: 1.1.1.4.

[1328] Editor. These historical labels do not map neatly onto current diagnoses. Lycanthropy concerns imagining oneself a wolf; Chorus sancti Viti is St Vitus's dance; hydrophobia literally means fear of water. "Obsession" means an external assault or harassment by devils, distinguished here from possession.

Original text 1651	Modern English
♒ Melancholy: in which consider Its Æquivocations, in Disposition, Improper, &c. Subsect. 5.	Melancholy: consider Its different meanings: as a disposition, in a figurative sense, etc. Subsection 5. Sections: 1.1.1.5.
Memb. 2. To its explication, a digression of anatomy, in which observe parts of Subs. 1. Body hath parts Subs. 1.	Member 2. To explain it, a digression on anatomy, considering the constituent parts. Subsection 1. The body has parts. Subsection 2. Sections: 1.1.2.1; 1.1.2.2.
contained as Humours, 4. Bloud, Phlegme, &c. Spirits; vitall, naturall, animall.	Parts contained within it: The four humours: blood, phlegm, etc. The spirits: vital, natural, animal.[1329] Sections: 1.1.2.2.
or containing Similar; spermaticall, or flesh, bones, nerves, &c. Dissimilar; braine, heart, liver, &c. Subs. 4.	Or parts that contain them: Uniform parts: those formed from seed, or flesh, bones, nerves, etc. Subsection 3. Composite parts: brain, heart, liver, etc. Subsection 4.[1330] Sections: 1.1.2.3; 1.1.2.4.
Or Soule and his faculties, as Vegetall. Subs. 5. Sensible. Subs. 6, 7, 8. Rationall. Subsect. 9, 10, 11.	Or the soul and its faculties: Nutritive and reproductive. Subsection 5. Sensitive. Subsections 6, 7, 8. Rational. Subsections 9, 10, 11.[1331] Sections: 1.1.2.5; 1.1.2.6; 1.1.2.7; 1.1.2.8; 1.1.2.9; 1.1.2.10; 1.1.2.11.

[1329] Editor. The humours are the bodily fluids of humoral physiology: blood, phlegm, yellow bile and black bile. The three kinds of "spirits" are subtle bodily agents associated with life, nutrition, sensation and movement, not the supernatural spirits listed later.

[1330] Editor. "Similar" parts are uniform in substance, while "dissimilar" parts are organs composed of differing tissues. "Spermatical" denotes parts thought to originate from generative seed. The synopsis compresses these categories awkwardly; the modern column preserves that compression. The body places parts contained within the body in 1.1.2.2, uniform parts in 1.1.2.3 and composite parts in 1.1.2.4. The modern outline corrects the repeated 1 and supplies the omitted 3 accordingly.

[1331] Editor. The traditional hierarchy distinguishes the functions of nutrition, growth and reproduction; sensation and associated powers; and reason. "Animal" spirits above refers to the soul or animate functions, not specifically to nonhuman animals.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Memb. 3. Its definition, name, difference, Sub. 1. The part and parties, affected, affection, &c. Sub. 2. The matter of melancholy, natural, unnaturall, &c. Sub. 4.	Member 3. Its definition, name, and distinguishing characteristics. Subsection 1. The part and persons affected; the condition itself, etc. Subsection 2. The material of melancholy, natural and unnatural, etc. Subsection 3.[1332] Sections: 1.1.3.1; 1.1.3.2; 1.1.3.3.
Species, or kindes, which are Proper to parts, as Of the head alone, Hypocondriacall, or windy melancholy. Of the whole Body with their severall causes, symptomes, prognosticks, cures. Or Indefinite; as Love melancholy, the subject of the third partition.	Its species, or kinds. Subsection 4: Those associated with bodily regions: Melancholy of the head alone; hypochondriacal, or windy, melancholy; melancholy of the whole body. Each has its own causes, symptoms, prognoses, and cures. Or those not restricted in this way, such as love melancholy, the subject of the Third Partition.[1333] Sections: 1.1.3.4; 3.
Its Causes in generall. Sect. 2. A. Its Symptomes or signes. Sect. 3. B. Its Prognosticks or indications. Sect. 4. 4. Its Cures; the subject of the second Partition.	Its causes in general. Section 2: A. Its symptoms or signs. Section 3: B. Its prognoses or indications. Section 4: C. Its cures: the subject of the Second Partition.[1334] Sections: 1.2; 1.3; 1.4; 2.

[1332] Editor. The synopsis prints Subsection 4 for "the matter of melancholy"; the body heading is 1.1.3.3, followed by species in 1.1.3.4. The modern outline follows those headings, while the original preserves 4. "Matter" is the bodily substance held to produce the condition.

[1333] Editor. Hypochondriacal melancholy concerns the upper abdominal organs beneath the ribs; "windy" refers to wind or vapours. It is not silently converted into the modern meaning of anxiety about illness.

[1334] Editor. The source prints "Sect. 4. 4." The second 4 is rendered C, matching the synopsis's final heading "C. Prognosticks of melancholy."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 98 A Sect. 2. Causes of Melancholy are neither	A Section 2. Causes of melancholy are either:[1335] Sections: 1.2.
General, as Memb. 1. Supernaturall As from God immediately, or by second causes, Sub. 1. Or from the devil immediately, with a digression of the nature of spirits and devils, Sub. 2. Or mediately by Magicians, Witches, Sub. 3.	General. Member 1. Supernatural: From God directly, or through secondary causes. Subsection 1. Or from the devil directly, with a digression on the nature of spirits and devils. Subsection 2. Or indirectly through magicians and witches. Subsection 3. Sections: 1.2.1.1; 1.2.1.2; 1.2.1.3.
Or Natural Primary as stars, proved by Aphorisms, signs from Physiognomy, Metoposcopy, Cheiromancy, Subs. 4.	Or natural: Primary causes, such as the stars, demonstrated by aphorisms and signs drawn from physiognomy, reading the forehead, and palmistry. Subsection 4.[1336] Sections: 1.2.1.4.
Secondary, as Congenite, inward from Old age, temperament, Sub. 5. Parents, it being an hereditary disease, Sub. 6.	Secondary causes: Inborn, internal causes arising from: Old age and bodily constitution. Subsection 5. Parents, since it is a hereditary disease. Subsection 6. Sections: 1.2.1.5; 1.2.1.6.
or Outward, or adventitious, which are Evident, outward, remote, adventitious, as, Necessary, see ♉	Or external or acquired causes, which are: Evident, external, remote, acquired causes: Necessary causes: see “Necessary causes” below. Sections: 1.2.2; 1.2.3.

[1335] Editor. The scan plainly prints “are neither.” The branching division requires “either,” adopted on the right. The left preserves the apparent error.

[1336] Editor. Physiognomy interprets bodily appearance; metoposcopy interprets markings of the forehead; cheiromancy reads the hand. The claim of demonstration belongs to Burton’s historical classification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Not necessary, as M. 4. S. 2. Nurses, Sub. 1. Education, Sub. 2. Terrors, affrights, Sub. 3. Scoffs, calumnies, bitter jests, Sub. 4. Loss of liberty, servitude, imprisonment, Sub. 5. Poverty and want, Sub. 6. An heap of other accidents, death of friends, losse, &c. Sub. 7.	Causes not necessary. Section 2, Member 4. Nurses. Subsection 1. Upbringing. Subsection 2. Terrors and frights. Subsection 3. Mockery, slander, cruel jokes. Subsection 4. Loss of freedom, servitude, imprisonment. Subsection 5. Poverty and deprivation. Subsection 6. A multitude of other misfortunes: the death of friends, loss, etc. Subsection 7. Sections: 1.2.4.1; 1.2.4.2; 1.2.4.3; 1.2.4.4; 1.2.4.5; 1.2.4.6; 1.2.4.7.
Or Contingent inward, antecedent, nearest. Memb. 5. Sect. 2. In which the body works on the mind, and this malady is caused by precedent diseases; as agues, pox, &c. or temperature innate, Sub. 1. Or by particular parts distempered, as brain, heart, spleen, liver, Mesentery, Pylorus, stomack, &c. Sub. 2.	Or incidental internal causes, antecedent and most immediate. Section 2, Member 5. In these, the body acts on the mind, and the malady is caused by previous diseases, such as fevers, pox, etc., or by an innate constitution. Subsection 1. Or by disorders of particular parts: brain, heart, spleen, liver, mesentery, pylorus, stomach, etc. Subsection 2.[1337] Sections: 1.2.5.1; 1.2.5.2.
Particular to the three species. See ♊	Or causes particular to the three species: see the following outline. Sections: 1.2.5.3; 1.2.5.4; 1.2.5.5.

[1337] Editor. The mesentery supports and connects the intestines; the pylorus is the stomach's outlet. "Distempered" means disordered in constitution or balance. "Temperature" means bodily constitution, not a thermometer reading. The source groups these internal causes under the acquired branch.

Original text 1651	Modern English
♊ Particular causes. Sect. 2. Memb. 5. Of head-Melancholy are. Sub. 3. Inward Innate humor, or from distemperature adust. A hot braine, corrupted bloud in the braine. Excesse of Venery, or defect. Agues, or some precedent disease. Fumes arising from the stomack, &c.	Particular causes. Section 2, Member 5. Of head melancholy. Subsection 3. Internal: An innate humour, or one scorched by a disordered constitution. A hot brain; corrupted blood in the brain. Excessive or insufficient sexual activity. Fevers or some previous disease. Vapours rising from the stomach, etc.[1338] Sections: 1.2.5.3.
Or Outward Heat of the Sunne immoderate. A blow on the head. Overmuch use of hot wines, spices, garlick, onions, hot baths, overmuch waking, &c. Idlenesse, solitarinesse, or overmuch study. vehement labour, &c. Passions, perturbations, &c.	Or external: Excessive heat from the sun. A blow to the head. Excessive use of heating wines, spices, garlic, onions, hot baths; too much wakefulness, etc. Idleness, solitude, excessive study, strenuous labour, etc. Passions, disturbances, etc. Sections: 1.2.5.3.
Of hypocondriacall, or windie melancholy are, Inward Default of spleen, belly, bowels, stomack, mesentery, miseriack veins, liver, &c. Months, or hemrods stopt, or any other ordinary evacuation. Or Outward Those six non-naturall things abused.	Of hypochondriacal, or windy, melancholy. Subsection 4: Internal: Disorders of the spleen, abdomen, bowels, stomach, mesentery, mesenteric veins, liver, etc. Suppressed menstrual periods, bleeding from haemorrhoids, or any other customary discharge. Or external: Mismanagement of the six non-natural things.[1339] Sections: 1.2.5.4.

[1338] Editor. “Adust” means scorched or burnt by excessive internal heat in humoral theory. “Hot” can describe a supposed humoral quality as well as physical heat. Venery means sexual activity. Fumes are bodily vapours thought capable of affecting the brain.

[1339] Editor. “Months” means menstrual periods; “hemrods stopt” refers to suppression of haemorrhoidal bleeding. “Miseriack” is mesenteric. The six non-naturals are expanded in the following outline.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Over all the body are, Subs. 5. Inward Liver distempered, stopped, over-hot, apt to ingender melancholy, temperature innate. Or Outward Bad diet, suppression of hemrods, &c. and such evacuations, passions, cares, &c. those six non-naturall things abused.	Of melancholy throughout the body. Subsection 5. Internal: A disordered, obstructed, overheated liver, liable to generate melancholy; an innate constitution. Or external: Bad diet, suppression of bleeding from haemorrhoids and similar discharges, passions, cares, etc.; mismanagement of the six non-natural things. Sections: 1.2.5.5.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 99 ♉ Necessary causes, as those six non-naturall things which are, Sect. 2. Memb. 2.	Necessary causes: the six non-natural things. Section 2, Member 2.[1340] Sections: 1.2.2.
Diet offending in Sub. 3. Substance Bread; course and black, &c. Drink; thick, thin, sowr, &c. Water unclean, milk, oyl, vineger, wine, spices, &c.	Diet harmful in its: Subsection 1. Substance: Bread: coarse and dark, etc. Drink: thick, thin, sour, etc. Unclean water, milk, oil, vinegar, wine, spices, etc.[1341] Sections: 1.2.2.1.
Flesh Parts; heads, feet, entrals, fat, bacon, blood, &c. Kindes: Beef, Pork, Venision, Hares, Goats, Pigeons, Peacocks, Fen-fowl, &c.	Meat: Parts: heads, feet, entrails, fat, bacon, blood, etc. Kinds: beef, pork, venison, hares, goats, pigeons, peacocks, marsh birds, etc. Sections: 1.2.2.1.
Herbs, Fish, &c. Of fish; all shell-fish, hard and slimy fish, &c. Of herbs; pulse, cabbage, mellons, garlick, onions, &c. All roots, raw fruits, hard and windy meats.	Vegetables, fish, etc. Fish: all shellfish; tough and slimy fish, etc. Vegetables: pulses, cabbage, melons, garlic, onions, etc. All roots, raw fruits, indigestible foods and foods that produce wind. Sections: 1.2.2.1.
Quality, as in Preparing, dressing, sharp sauces, salt meats, indurate, sowced, fried, broyled, or made-dishes &c.	Quality, as in: Preparation and cooking; sharp sauces; salted, hardened, pickled, fried, or broiled foods; elaborate mixed dishes, etc. Sections: 1.2.2.1.

[1340] Editor. “Non-natural” is a technical category for factors affecting health: diet, retention and evacuation, air, exercise and rest, sleep and waking, and passions. “Necessary” here denotes unavoidable conditions of life; these are distinguished from incidental circumstances such as poverty or imprisonment.

[1341] Editor. The synopsis prints Sub. 3 beside the opening diet entry. The body treats diet in substance at 1.2.2.1, disorder in eating at 1.2.2.2 and altered custom at 1.2.2.3. The modern outline therefore corrects the first number to 1. “Meats” can mean foods generally.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Quantity Disorder in eating, immoderate eating, or at unseasonable times, & Subsec. 2. Custom; delight, appetite, altered, &c. Sub. 3.	Quantity: Irregular or excessive eating, or eating at unsuitable times, etc. Subsection 2. Changes in habit, enjoyment, appetite, etc. Subsection 3. Sections: 1.2.2.2; 1.2.2.3.
Retention and evacuation, Subs. 4. Costivenesse, hot baths, sweating, issues stopped, Venus in excesse, or in defect, phlebotomy, purging, &c.	Retention and evacuation. Subsection 4. Constipation, hot baths, sweating, blocked discharges, excessive or insufficient sexual activity, bloodletting, purging, etc. Sections: 1.2.2.4.
Aire; hot, cold, tempestuous, dark, thick, foggy, moorish, &c. Subs. 5. Exercise, Sub. 6. Unseasonable, excessive or defective of body or minde, solitarinesse, idlenesse, a life out of action, &c. Sleep and waking, unseasonable, inordinate, overmuch, overlittle, &c. Subs. 7.	Air: hot, cold, stormy, dark, thick, foggy, marshy, etc. Subsection 5. Exercise. Subsection 6. Ill-timed, excessive or insufficient exercise of body or mind; solitude, idleness, an inactive life, etc. Sleep and wakefulness: ill-timed, irregular, too much, too little, etc. Subsection 7. Sections: 1.2.2.5; 1.2.2.6; 1.2.2.7.
Memb. 3. Sect. 2. Passions and perturbations of the minde, Subs. 2. With a digression of the force of imagination, Su. 2. and division of passions into Sub. 3.	Section 2, Member 3. Passions and disturbances of the mind. Subsection 1. With a digression on the power of imagination, Subsection 2, and a division of the passions into the following kinds, Subsection 3.[1342] Sections: 1.2.3.1; 1.2.3.2; 1.2.3.3.

[1342] Editor. The synopsis gives Subsection 2 both for passions and for imagination. The body begins passions at 1.2.3.1 and imagination at 1.2.3.2; the modern outline follows those headings. In the traditional division, irascible passions involve opposition or difficulty, and concupiscible passions involve attraction and desire. Burton's lists and classifications are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Irascible Sorrow, cause and symptome, Sub. 4. Fear, cause and symptome, Sub. 5. Shame, repulse, disgrace, &c. Sub. 6. Envy and malice, Sub. 7. Emulation, hatred, faction, desire of revenge, Sub. 8. Anger a cause, Sub. 9. Discontents, cares, miseries, &c. Sub. 10.	Irascible passions: Sorrow, as cause and symptom. Subsection 4. Fear, as cause and symptom. Subsection 5. Shame, rejection, disgrace, etc. Subsection 6. Envy and malice. Subsection 7. Rivalry, hatred, faction, desire for revenge. Subsection 8. Anger as a cause. Subsection 9. Discontents, cares, miseries, etc. Subsection 10. Sections: 1.2.3.4; 1.2.3.5; 1.2.3.6; 1.2.3.7; 1.2.3.8; 1.2.3.9; 1.2.3.10.
Or concupiscible Vehement desires, ambition, Sub. 11. Covetousness, φιλαργυρίαν, Sub. 12. Love of pleasures, gaming in excess, &c. Sub. 13. Desire of praise, pride, vain-glory, &c. Sub. 14. Love of learning, study in excesse, with a digression of the misery of Scholars, and why the Muses are melancholy Sub. 15.	Or concupiscible passions: Violent desires, ambition. Subsection 11. Covetousness, the love of money. Subsection 12. Love of pleasure, excessive gambling, etc. Subsection 13. Desire for praise, pride, vainglory, etc. Subsection 14. Love of learning, excessive study, with a digression on the misery of scholars and why the Muses are melancholy. Subsection 15. Sections: 1.2.3.11; 1.2.3.12; 1.2.3.13; 1.2.3.14; 1.2.3.15.
B. Symptomes of melancholy are either Sect. 3. General, as of Memb. 1. Body, as ill digestion, crudity, winde, dry brains, hard belly, thick blood, much waking, heavinesse and palpitation of heart, leaping in many places, &c. Sub. 1.	B. Symptoms of melancholy. Section 3. Either general. Member 1. Bodily symptoms: poor digestion, undigested matter, wind, dryness of the brain, constipation, thick blood, excessive wakefulness, heaviness and palpitation of the heart, twitching in various places, etc. Subsection 1. Sections: 1.3.1.1.
or Minde Common to all or most Fear and sorrow without a just cause, suspition, jealousie, discontent, solitarinesse, irksomnesse, continual cogitations, restlesse thoughts, vain imaginations, &c. Subs. 2.	Or mental symptoms: Common to all or most: Fear and sorrow without sufficient cause, suspicion, jealousy, discontent, solitude, weariness, incessant thinking, restless thoughts, groundless imaginings, etc. Subsection 2. Sections: 1.3.1.2.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or Particular to private persons, according to Su. 3. 4.	Or peculiar to individuals, varying according to the following factors. Subsections 3 and 4. Sections: 1.3.1.3; 1.3.1.4.
Celestiall influences, as ♄ ♃ ♂ &c. parts of the body, heart, brain, liver, spleen, stomack, &c.	Celestial influences, such as Saturn, Jupiter, Mars, etc.; parts of the body: heart, brain, liver, spleen, stomach, etc. Sections: 1.3.1.3.
Humours Sanguine are merry still, laughing, pleasant, meditating on playes, women, musick, &c. Phlegmatick, slothful, dull, heavie, &c. Cholerick, furious, impatient, subject to hear and see strange apparitions, &c. Black, solitary, sad, they think they are bewitcht, dead, &c. Or mixt of these four humors adust, or not adust, infinitely varied.	Humours: The sanguine are always merry, laughing and cheerful, thinking of plays, women, music, etc. The phlegmatic are idle, dull, sluggish, etc. The choleric are furious, impatient, liable to hear and see strange apparitions, etc. Those with black bile are solitary and sad; they think they are bewitched, dead, etc. Or mixtures of these four humours, scorched or unscorched, in endless variations. Sections: 1.3.1.3.
Their severall customs, conditions, inclinations, discipline, &c. Ambitious thinks himself a King, a Lord; covetous runs on his money, lascivious on his mistris; religious, hath revelations, visions, is a Prophet, or troubled in minde, a scholar on his book, &c.	Their various habits, circumstances, inclinations, training, etc. The ambitious man thinks himself a king or a lord; the covetous man dwells on his money, the lustful man on his mistress. The religious man has revelations and visions, is a prophet, or is troubled in mind; the scholar dwells on his book, etc. Sections: 1.3.1.4.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Continuance of time, as the humor is intended or remitted, &c. Pleasant at first, hardly discerned, afterwards harsh and intolerable, if inveterate. Hence some make three degrees, 1. Falsa cogitatio. 2. Cogitata loqui. 3. Exequi loquutum. By fits, or continuate, as the object varies, pleasing or displeasing.	The passage of time, as the humour grows stronger or weaker, etc. Pleasant at first and scarcely noticed; later harsh and unbearable if deeply established. Hence some distinguish three degrees: 1. False thinking. 2. Saying what one thinks. 3. Carrying out what one has said. In fits or continuously, as the object changes and gives pleasure or displeasure. Sections: 1.3.1.4.
Simple, or as it is mixt with other diseases, Apoplexies, Gout, Caninus appetitus, &c. so the symptomes are various.	Or uncomplicated, or mixed with other diseases—apoplexies, gout, ravenous appetite, etc.—with symptoms varying accordingly.[1343] Sections: 1.3.1.4.

[1343] Editor. "Simple" means occurring without admixture of another disease. Apoplexy is a historical label for sudden loss of consciousness or bodily function; Caninus appetitus literally means "dog-like appetite," rendered ravenous appetite.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 100 ♋ Particular symptomes to the three distinct species. Sect. 3. Memb. 2.	Symptoms particular to the three distinct species. Section 3, Member 2. Sections: 1.3.2.
Head-melancholy. Sub. 1. In body Headach, binding, heavinesse, vertigo, lightnesse, singing of the ears, much waking, fixed eyes, high colour, red eyes, hard belly, dry body, no great sign of melancholy in the other parts. Or In mind Continual fear, sorrow, suspition, discontent, superfluous cares, solicitude, anxiety, perpetual cogitation of such toyes they are possessed with, thoughts like dreams, &c.	Head melancholy. Subsection 1. In the body: Headache, constriction,[1344] heaviness, dizziness, light-headedness, ringing in the ears, excessive wakefulness, staring eyes, a flushed complexion, red eyes, constipation, bodily dryness, little sign of melancholy in other parts. Or in the mind: Constant fear, sorrow, suspicion, discontent, unnecessary cares, worry, anxiety, perpetual brooding over the fancies that possess them, thoughts like dreams, etc. Sections: 1.3.2.1.
Hypocondriacal or windie melancholy. Sub. 2. In body Winde, rumbling in the guts, belly-ake, heat in the bowels, convulsions, crudities, short winde, sowr and sharp belchings, cold sweat, pain in the left side, suffocation, palpitation, heavinesse of the heart, singing in the ears, much spittle, and moist, &c.	Hypochondriacal, or windy, melancholy. Subsection 2. In the body: Wind, rumbling in the intestines, abdominal pain, heat in the bowels, convulsions, undigested matter, shortness of breath, sour and acrid belching, cold sweat, pain in the left side, choking, palpitation, heaviness of the heart, ringing in the ears, abundant watery saliva, etc. Sections: 1.3.2.2.
Or In mind Fearful, sad, suspicious, discontent, anxiety, &c. Lascivious by reason of much winde, troublesome dreams, affected by fits, &c.	Or in the mind: Fearfulness, sadness, suspicion, discontent, anxiety, etc.; lustfulness because of excessive wind; disturbing dreams; symptoms occurring in fits, etc. Sections: 1.3.2.2.

[1344] Editor. “Binding” is rendered “constriction.” Compare Burton’s later “a binding heavinesse” among the symptoms of head melancholy (printed p. 179; PDF p. 283). The sense is tightness; the synopsis separately lists “hard belly,” rendered constipation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Over all the body. Sub. 3. In body Black, most part lean, broad veins, grosse, thick blood, their hemrods commonly stopped, &c. Or In mind Fearful, sad, solitary, hate light, averse from company, fearful dreams, &c.	Melancholy throughout the body. Subsection 3. In the body: A dark complexion, generally thin, prominent veins, coarse, thick blood; bleeding from haemorrhoids usually suppressed, etc. Or in the mind: Fearful, sad, solitary; they hate light, avoid company, have frightening dreams, etc. Sections: 1.3.2.3.
Symptoms of Nuns, Maids, and widows melancholy, in body and minde, &c.	Bodily and mental symptoms of melancholy in nuns, unmarried women, and widows, etc. Subsection 4. Sections: 1.3.2.4.
A reason of these symptome. Memb. 3. Why they are so fearful, sad, suspitious without a cause, why solitary, why melancholy men are witty, why they suppose they hear and see strange voices, visions, apparitions. Why they prophesie, and speak strange languages, whence comes their crudity, rumbling, convulsions, cold sweat, heavinesse of heart, palpitation, cardiaca, fearful dreams, much waking, prodigious phantasies.	An explanation of these symptoms. Member 3. Why they are so fearful, sad, suspicious without cause, and solitary; why melancholy people are intellectually gifted; why they believe they hear strange voices and see visions and apparitions. Why they prophesy and speak unfamiliar languages; what causes their undigested matter, rumbling, convulsions, cold sweat, heaviness of the heart, palpitation, pain at the upper opening of the stomach, frightening dreams, excessive wakefulness, and extraordinary fancies.[1345] Sections: 1.3.3.

[1345] Editor. “Witty” here means intellectually gifted or acute. Burton later explains cardiaca passio as pain at the “mouth of the stomack” which makes patients think the heart itself aches (printed p. 200, PDF 304). That explanation guides the rendering here; the historical label is not equated with a modern diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
C Prognosticks of melancholy. Sect. 4. Tending to good, as Morphew, Scabs, Itch, Breaking out, &c. Black Jandise. If the Hemrods voluntarily open. If varices appear.	C Prognoses of melancholy. Section 4. Favourable signs: Discoloured patches of skin, scabs, itching, eruptions, etc. Black jaundice. If haemorrhoids begin to bleed spontaneously. If varicose veins appear.[1346] Sections: 1.4.1.
Tending to evil, as Leannesse, drinesse, hollow-eyed, &c. Inveterate melancholy is incurable. If cold, it degenerates often into Epilepsie, Apoplexy, dotage, or into blindnesse. If hot, into madnesse, despair, and violent death.	Unfavourable signs: Thinness, dryness, sunken eyes, etc. Deeply established melancholy is incurable. If cold, it often develops into epilepsy, apoplexy, mental decay, or blindness. If hot, into madness, despair, and violent death. Sections: 1.4.1.
Corollaries and questions. The grievousnesse of this above all other diseases. The diseases of the minde are more grievous then those of the body. Whether it be lawful in this case of melancholy, for for a man to offer violence to himself. Neg. How a melancholy or mad man offering violence to himself, is to be censured.	Consequences and questions. The severity of this disease above all others. Diseases of the mind are more grievous than those of the body. Whether a man suffering from melancholy may lawfully do violence to himself. No. How to judge a melancholy or mad person who does violence to himself.[1347] Sections: 1.4.1.

[1346] Editor. Morphew denotes discoloured patches of skin; varices are enlarged veins. The signs are favourable within the historical account of humours being diverted or discharged. “Voluntarily” means spontaneously. Burton’s classifications, including black jaundice, are preserved as printed.

[1347] Editor. “Censured” means judged or assessed; it need not mean condemned. Neg. abbreviates the negative answer to the preceding question. The original repeats “for”; the modern column removes the duplication. The synopsis announces a later discussion rather than supplying its reasoning here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 1 THE FIRST PARTITION.	The First Partition.
The First Section. Member. Subsection.	Section 1. Member 1. Subsection 1.
Mans Excellency, Fall, Miseries, Infirmities; The causes of them.	Human excellence, the Fall, miseries and infirmities; their causes.[1348]
[1349]MAN, the most excellent and noble creature of the World, the principal and mighty work of God, wonder of Nature, as Zoroastes cals him; audacis naturæ miraculum, the [1350]marvail of marvails, as Plato; the [1351]Abridgment and Epitome of the World, as Pliny; Microcosmus, a little world, a model of the world,	MAN, the most excellent and noble creature in the world, God's chief and mighty work, the wonder of nature, as Zoroaster calls him; "the miracle of daring nature," the marvel of marvels, as Plato says; the summary and epitome of the world, as Pliny says; a microcosm, a little world, a model of the world;[1352]

[1348] Editor. The First Partition opens with a theological account of disease before turning to its medical classification. "Man" here usually means humanity. Burton's explanation of illness through the Fall and sin is retained as his argument. The printed brace makes "The First" apply to Section, Member and Subsection alike.

[1349] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Mans excellency."

[1350] Burton. a. "Magnum miraculum." A great miracle.

[1351] Burton. b. "Mundi epitome, naturæ delitiæ." The epitome of the world, nature's delight.

[1352] Editor. Microcosm means a world in miniature: the human body and soul mirror the larger creation. Burton strings together traditional praises with compressed attributions. His exact sources for Zoroaster, Plato and Pliny in this opening sequence have not been independently established; the names are not silently reassigned.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1353]Soveraign Lord of the Earth, Viceroy of the World, sole Commander and Governor of all the Creatures in it: to whose Empire they are subject in particular, and yield obedience; far surpassing all the rest, not in body only, but in soul; [1354]Imaginis Imago, created to [1355]Gods own [1356]Image, to that immortal and incorporeal substance, with all the faculties and powers belonging unto it;	sovereign lord of the earth, viceroy of the world, sole commander and governor of all its creatures, each of which is subject to his rule and yields obedience; far surpassing all the rest, in soul as well as body; "the image of the Image," created in God's own image, in the likeness of that immortal, immaterial being, with all the faculties and powers belonging to it;[1357]
was at first pure, divine, perfect, happy, [1358]Created after God in true holinesse and righteousnesse; Deo congruens, free from all manner of infirmities, and put in Paradise, to know God, to praise and glorifie him, to do his will,	was at first pure, divine, perfect and happy, "created after God in true holiness and righteousness"; like God, free from every kind of infirmity, and placed in Paradise to know God, praise and glorify him, and do his will,
Ut diis consimiles parturiat deos.	That, like the gods, he might bring forth gods.

[1353] Burton. c. "Finis rerum omnium, cui sublunaria serviunt. Scalig. exercit. 365. sec. 3. Vales. de sacr. Phil. c. 5." The end for which all things exist, whom things below the moon serve. References to Scaliger, Exercitations 365.3, and Valesius, Sacred Philosophy, chapter 5.

[1354] Burton. d. "Ut in numismate Cæsaris imago, sic in homine Dei." As Caesar's image is on a coin, so God's is in a human being.

[1355] Burton. e. "Gen. 1." Genesis 1.

[1356] Burton. f. "Imago mundi in corpore, Dei in anima. Exemplumque dei quisque est in imagine parva." An image of the world in the body, of God in the soul; each person is a likeness of God in a small image.

[1357] Editor. "Imaginis Imago" is literally "image of the image"; its precise theological referent is not specified here. "Created to" means created in the likeness of. The marginal notes distinguish the body's likeness to the world from the soul's likeness to God.

[1358] Burton. g. "Eph. 4.24." Ephesians 4:24.

Original text 1651	Modern English
(as an old Poet saith) to propagate the Church. But this most noble creature, Heu tristis, & lachrymosa commutatio ([1359]one exclaims) O pitiful change! is fallen from that he was, and forfeited his estate, become miserabilis homuncio, a castaway, a caitiff, one of the most miserable creatures of the world, if he be considered in his own nature, an unregenerate man,	as an old poet says: to increase the Church.[1360] But this most noble creature—"Alas, what a sad and tearful transformation!" someone exclaims; oh, pitiable change!—has fallen from what he was and forfeited his former condition. He has become a wretched little man, an outcast, a miserable wretch, one of the most unhappy creatures in the world, if considered in his own nature, without spiritual rebirth;
Source page 1–2 and so much obscured by his fall (that some few reliques excepted) he is inferiour to a beast, [1361]Man in honor that understandeth not, is like unto beasts that perish, so David esteems him: [1362]a monster by stupend Metamorphosis, [1363]a fox, a dog, a hog, what not? Quantum mutatus ab illo? How much altered from that he was; before blessed and happy, now miserable and accursed: [1364]He must eat his meat in sorrow, subject to death and all manner of infirmities, all kinde of calamities.	and his fall has so darkened him that, apart from a few surviving remnants, he is lower than a beast. "Man in honour who has no understanding is like the beasts that perish": that is David's estimate of him. By an astonishing transformation he has become a monster—a fox, a dog, a pig, what is he not? "How changed from what he was!" Once blessed and happy, now miserable and accursed, he must eat his food in sorrow, subject to death, every kind of infirmity and every sort of calamity.[1365]

[1359] Burton. h. "Palanterius." No title or location is supplied.

[1360] Editor. Angus Gowland identifies this line with Ludovico Lazzarelli's Crater Hermetis 27.1. Direct collation with that work remains pending. The verse is translated literally; Burton applies its language of divine offspring to the propagation of the Christian Church. The quotation ascribed to "Palanterius" remains unlocated.

[1361] Burton. i. "Psal. 49.20." Psalm 49:20.

[1362] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Mans fall and misery."

[1363] Burton. k. "Lascivia superat equum, impudentia canem, astu vulpem, furore leonem. Chrys. 23. Gen." In lust he surpasses a horse, in shamelessness a dog, in cunning a fox, in fury a lion. Chrysostom, homily 23 on Genesis.

[1364] Burton. l. "Gen. 3.13." Genesis 3:13, as printed.

[1365] Editor. "Quantum mutatus ab illo" recalls Virgil, Aeneid 2.274, where the dead Hector is changed from his former appearance. "Stupend" means astonishing. The quotation about eating in sorrow belongs to Genesis 3:17, not the marginal 3:13. Burton's Latin and its immediately repeated English gloss are combined here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 2 [1366]Great travel is created for all men, and an heavy yoke on the sons of Adam, from the day that they go out of their mothers womb, unto that day they return to the mother of all things. Namely their thoughts, and fear of their hearts, and their imagination of things they wait for, and the day of death. From him that sitteth in the glorious throne, to him that sitteth beneath in the earth and ashes, From him that is clothed in blue silk, and weareth a Crown, to him that is clothed in simple linnen.	"Great toil is ordained for all people, and a heavy yoke for the children of Adam, from the day they leave their mother's womb until the day they return to the mother of all things: their thoughts, their hearts' fears, their imaginings about what awaits them, and the day of death. From the man who sits on a glorious throne to the man who sits low in earth and ashes; from the man dressed in blue silk and wearing a crown to the man dressed in plain linen."[1367]
[1368]Wrath, envy, trouble, and unquietnesse, and fear of death, and rigor, and strife, and such things come to both man and beast, but sevenfold to the ungodly. All this befals him in this life, and peradventure eternal misery in the life to come.	"Anger, envy, trouble, unrest, fear of death, harshness and strife: such things come to both humans and beasts, but sevenfold to the ungodly." All this befalls him in this life, and perhaps eternal misery in the life to come.

[1366] Burton. m. "Ecclus. 4.1. 2,3,4,5,8." Ecclesiasticus, chapter 4, as printed.

[1367] Editor. Ecclesiasticus, also called Sirach, 40:1–5 and 8 supplies this passage; the margin prints chapter 4. "Travel" means travail or toil. The "mother of all things" is the earth. The modern text follows Burton's wording, including blue silk, rather than substituting a different Bible translation.

[1368] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "A description of melancholy."

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1369]The impulsive cause of these miseries in man, this privation or destruction of Gods image, the cause of death & diseases, of al temporal and eternal punishments, was the sin of our first parent Adam, [1370]in eating of the forbidden fruit, by the devils instigation and allurement. His disobedience, pride, ambition, intemperance, incredulity, curiosity; from whence proceeded original sin, and that general corruption of mankind, as from a fountain flowed all bad inclinations, and actual transgressions, which cause our several calamities inflicted upon us for our sins.	The impelling cause of these human miseries, this loss or destruction of God's image, the cause of death and diseases, of all punishments in this world and the next, was the sin of our first parent Adam: eating the forbidden fruit at the devil's instigation and enticement. His disobedience, pride, ambition, intemperance, unbelief and curiosity gave rise to original sin and the general corruption of humankind. From this, as from a spring, flowed all evil inclinations and actual transgressions, which bring upon us the various calamities inflicted for our sins.[1371]
And this belike is that which our fabulous Poets have shadowed unto us in the tale of [1372]Pandora's box, which being opened through her curiosity, filled the world full of all manner of diseases. It is not curiosity alone, but those other crying sins of ours, which pull these several plagues & miseries upon our heads. For Ubi peccatum, ibi procella, as [1373]Chrysostom well observes.	And this, it seems, is what our poets of fable have represented figuratively in the story of Pandora's box, which she opened out of curiosity, filling the world with every kind of disease.[1374] It is not curiosity alone, but our other sins that cry out for punishment, that draw these various plagues and miseries down upon our heads. For "where there is sin, there is a storm," as Chrysostom aptly observes.

[1369] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Impulsive cause of mans misery and infirmities."

[1370] Burton. n. "Gen. 3.17." Genesis 3:17.

[1371] Editor. An "impulsive" cause is an impelling or originating cause, distinguished below from the instruments through which harm occurs. Burton distinguishes inherited original sin from "actual" sins, meaning acts committed by individuals. "Curiosity" here carries the sense of a presumptuous desire for forbidden knowledge.

[1372] Burton. o. "Illa cadens tegmen manibus decussit, & una Perniciem immisit miseris mortalibus atram. Hesiod. 1. oper." Literally, with the uncertain printed reading cadens: "Falling, she knocked off the lid with her hands and at once released dark destruction among unhappy mortals." Hesiod, Works and Days, book 1. The scan reads decussit, correcting this edition's earlier declusit.

[1373] Burton. p. "Hom. 5. ad pop. Antioch." Chrysostom, homily 5 to the people of Antioch.

[1374] Editor. Burton reads the Pandora story as a pagan analogue of the Fall. The traditional "box" is retained. The marginal Latin has the awkward reading cadens; the particular Latin version of Hesiod and that reading still require collation. The verb decussit, "knocked off," has been checked against the scan.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1375]Fools by reason of their transgression, and because of their iniquities are afflicted. [1376]Fear cometh like sudden desolation, and destruction like a whirlwinde, affliction and anguish, because they did not fear God. [1377]Are you shaken with wars? as Cyprian well urgeth to Demetrius, are you molested with dearth and famine? is your health crushed with raging diseases? is mankinde generally tormented with Epidemicall maladies? tis all for your sins, Hag. 1.9,10. Amos 1. Ier. 7.	"Fools are afflicted for their transgressions and their wickedness." "Fear comes like sudden devastation, and destruction like a whirlwind, with affliction and anguish," because they did not fear God. "Are you shaken by wars?" as Cyprian forcefully asks Demetrius. "Are you troubled by scarcity and famine? Is your health shattered by raging diseases? Is humankind everywhere tormented by epidemics? It is all for your sins." Haggai 1:9–10; Amos 1; Jeremiah 7.[1378]
God is angry, punisheth, and threatneth, because of their obstinacy and stubbornnesse, they will not turn unto him. [1379]If the earth be barren then for want of rain, if dry and squalid, it yield no fruit, if your fountains be dried up, your wine, corn, and oyl blasted, if the air be corrupted, and men troubled with diseases, tis by reason of their sins: which like the blood of Abel cry loud to heaven for vengeance, Lam. 5.15. That we have sinned, therefore our hearts are heavy, Isa. 59.11,12. We roar like Bears, and mourn like Doves, and want health, &c. for our sins and trespasses.	God is angry, punishes and threatens because of their obstinacy and stubbornness: they will not turn to him. "If the earth is barren for lack of rain, if it lies dry and parched and produces no fruit, if your springs dry up, your wine, grain and oil are blighted, if the air is corrupted and people are afflicted with disease, it is because of their sins." Like Abel's blood, those sins cry aloud to heaven for vengeance. Lamentations 5:15: "We have sinned, and therefore our hearts are heavy." Isaiah 59:11–12: "We roar like bears and mourn like doves, and lack deliverance," and so on, "because of our sins and trespasses."[1380]

[1375] Burton. q. "Psal. 107.17." Psalm 107:17.

[1376] Burton. r. "Pro. 1.27." Proverbs 1:27.

[1377] Burton. s. "Quod autem crebrius bella concutiant, quod sterilitas & fames sollicitudinem cumulent, quod sævientibus morbis valetudo frangitur, quod humanum genus luis populatione vastatur; ob peccatum omnia. Cypr." That wars shake us more frequently, that barrenness and famine increase our anxiety, that raging diseases shatter our health, that pestilence ravages humankind: all is because of sin. Cyprian.

[1378] Editor. Cyprian's Address to Demetrianus, especially §§5–7, underlies this passage. Burton calls the addressee Demetrius and condenses Cyprian's argument that pagan impiety, rather than Christian refusal to worship pagan gods, causes disasters. The translated text retains Burton's name and wording.

[1379] Burton. t. "Si raro desuper pluvia descendat, si terra situ pulveris squalleat, si vix jejunas & pallidas herbas sterilis gleba producat, si turbo vineam debilitet, &c. Cypr." If rain seldom falls from above, if the earth lies foul with dust, if the barren soil scarcely produces starved and pallid grass, if a storm damages the vine, etc. Cyprian.

[1380] Editor. The Lamentations wording draws on 5:16–17, rather than the printed 5:15. In Isaiah 59:11, "health" means salvation or deliverance; Burton applies the passage within his discussion of bodily illness. Abel's blood crying for vengeance recalls Genesis 4:10.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But this we cannot endure to hear, or to take notice of, Ier. 2.30. We are smitten in vain, & receive no correction; and cap. 5.3. Thou hast stricken them, but they have not sorrowed, they have refused to receive correction, they have not returned. Pestilence he hath sent, but they have not turned to him, Amos 4. [1381]Herod could not abide John Baptist, nor [1382]Domitian endure Apollonius to tell the causes of the plague at Ephesus, his injustice, incest, adultery, and the like.	But we cannot bear to hear or acknowledge this. Jeremiah 2:30: "We are struck in vain and accept no correction"; and chapter 5:3: "You have struck them, but they have not grieved; they have refused correction and have not returned." He has sent pestilence, but they have not turned to him: Amos 4. Herod could not endure John the Baptist, nor could Domitian bear Apollonius telling him the causes of the plague at Ephesus: his injustice, incest, adultery and the like.[1383]
Source page 3 To punish therefore this blindnesse and obstinacy of ours, as a concomitant cause, & principal agent, is Gods just judgement, in bringing these calamities upon us, to chastise us, I say for our sinnes, and to satisfie Gods wrath. For the law requires obedience or punishment, as you may read at large, Deut. 28.15. If they will not obey the Lord, and keep his Commandments and ordinances, then all these curses shall come upon them.	Thus, alongside our blindness and obstinacy, comes God's just judgement, as a concurrent cause and chief agent, bringing these calamities upon us to punish us, I say, for our sins and to satisfy God's wrath. For the law requires obedience or punishment, as you may read at length in Deuteronomy 28:15: "If they will not obey the Lord and keep his commandments and ordinances, then all these curses shall come upon them."

[1381] Burton. u. "Mat. 14.3." Matthew 14:3.

[1382] Burton. x. "Philostratus lib. 8. vit. Apollonii: Injustitiam ejus, & sceleratas nuptias, & cætera quæ præter rationem fecerat, morborum causas dixit." Philostratus, Life of Apollonius, book 8: he named the emperor's injustice, wicked marriage and other irrational deeds as causes of diseases.

[1383] Editor. Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 8.5, reports Domitian stopping an explanation of plague because he feared that his own offences would be named as causes. Burton's marginal paraphrase makes that anticipated accusation sound as though it had been delivered.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1384]Cursed in the towne and in the field, &c. [1385]Cursed in the fruit of the body, &c. [1386]The Lord shall send thee trouble and shame, because of thy wickednesse. And a little after, [1387]The Lord shall smite thee with the botch of Egypt, and with emrods, and scab, and itch, and thou canst not be healed. [1388]With madnesse, blindnesse, and astonishing of heart. This Paul seconds, Rom. 2.9. Tribulation and anguish on the soul of every man that doth evil.	"Cursed in the town and in the field," and so on; "cursed in the fruit of the body," and so on. "The Lord shall send you trouble and shame because of your wickedness." A little later: "The Lord shall strike you with the boils of Egypt, with haemorrhoids, scabs and itching, and you shall not be healed"; "with madness, blindness and bewilderment of heart." Paul confirms this in Romans 2:9: "Tribulation and anguish upon the soul of everyone who does evil."[1389]
[1390]Or else these chastisements are inflicted upon us for our humiliation, to exercise and try our patience here in this life to bring us home, to make us to know God our selves, to informe and teach us wisdome. [1391]Therefore is my people gone into captivity, because they had no knowledge, therefore is the wrath of the Lord kindled against his people, and he hath stretched out his hand upon them.	Or these chastisements are inflicted to humble us, to exercise and test our patience here in this life, to bring us home, to make us know God and ourselves, and to instruct us in wisdom. "Therefore my people have gone into captivity, because they had no knowledge; therefore the Lord's wrath is kindled against his people, and he has stretched out his hand against them."[1392]

[1384] Burton. y. "16." Deuteronomy 28:16.

[1385] Burton. z. "18." Deuteronomy 28:18.

[1386] Burton. a. "20." Deuteronomy 28:20.

[1387] Burton. b. "Verse 17." Deuteronomy 28:17, as printed.

[1388] Burton. c. "28." Deuteronomy 28:28.

[1389] Editor. The Egyptian boils, haemorrhoids, scab and itch occur in Deuteronomy 28:27; Burton's margin prints verse 17. "Astonishing of heart" means stupefaction or bewilderment. These are scriptural categories, retained without assigning modern diagnoses.

[1390] Burton. Unlettered: "Deus quos diligit, castigat." God chastises those he loves.

[1391] Burton. d. "Isa. 5.13. Verse 15." Isaiah 5:13 and 15, as printed.

[1392] Editor. The joined quotations are Isaiah 5:13 and 5:25. The margin gives 15 for the second verse. This alternative explanation of suffering—as correction or a trial of patience—qualifies the preceding emphasis on punishment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He is desirous of our salvation, [1393]Nostræ salutis avidus, saith Lemnius, and for that cause puls us by the eare many times, to put us in minde of our duties: That they which erred might have understanding, (as Isay speakes 29.21.) and so to be reformed. I am afflicted, and at the point of death, so David confesseth of himself, Psal. 88.15. v.9. Mine eyes are sorrowfull through mine affliction: And that made him turne unto God.	He desires our salvation—"eager for our salvation," says Lemnius—and therefore often pulls us by the ear to remind us of our duties: "so that those who erred might gain understanding," as Isaiah says, 29:21, and so be reformed. "I am afflicted and at the point of death," David confesses of himself in Psalm 88:15; and in verse 9, "My eyes are sorrowful through my affliction." That made him turn to God.[1394]
Great Alexander in the midst of all his prosperity, by a company of parasites deified, and now made a God, when he saw one of his wounds bleed, [1395]remembred that he was but a man, and remitted of his pride. In morbo recolligit se animus, as [1396]Pliny well perceived, In sicknesse the minde reflects upon it selfe, with judgement survayes it selfe, and abhorres its former courses; insomuch that he concludes to his friend Marius, [1397]that it were the period of all philosophy, if we could so continue sound, or perform but a part of that which we promised to doe, being sick.	Alexander the Great, at the height of his prosperity, had been deified by a band of flatterers and made a god. But when he saw one of his wounds bleeding, he remembered that he was only a man and abated his pride. "In sickness the mind gathers itself together," as Pliny aptly perceived: in sickness the mind reflects on itself, judges itself and detests its former ways. He therefore concludes to his friend Marius that the consummation of all philosophy would be to remain in health as we were in sickness, or to fulfil even part of what we promised to do when ill.[1398]

[1393] Burton. e. "Nostræ salutis avidus, continenter aures vellicat, ac calamitate subinde nos exercet. Levinus Lemn. l. 2. c. 29. de occult. nat. mir." Eager for our salvation, he continually pulls our ears and from time to time exercises us through calamity. Levinus Lemnius, On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, 2.29.

[1394] Editor. The passage about those who erred gaining understanding is Isaiah 29:24, not 29:21. Psalm 88:9 and 15 are cited correctly, although the psalm's superscription names Heman the Ezrahite rather than David. Burton's attribution to David is retained.

[1395] Burton. Asterisked: "Vexatio dat intellectum. Esay 28.19." Affliction gives understanding. Isaiah 28:19.

[1396] Burton. f. "Lib. 7. Cum judicio, mores & facta recognoscit, & se intuetur. Dum fero languorem, fero religionis amorem: Expers languoris non sum memor hujus amoris." Book 7. With judgement it reviews its character and actions and examines itself. "While I endure illness, I harbour love of religion; free of illness, I forget this love."

[1397] Burton. g. "Summum esse totius Philosophiæ, ut tales esse perseveremus, quales nos futuros esse infirmi profitemur." The highest point of all philosophy is to remain as we profess, when ill, that we will be.

[1398] Editor. Pliny the Younger, Letters 7.26.4, urges us, when well, to remain the people we promise to become while ill. The letter is addressed to Maximus, not Burton's Marius. Burton paraphrases freely; the Latin beginning In morbo and the rhyming lines in his margin are not found in this letter. "Period" means culmination or consummation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Who so is wise then, will consider these things, as David did (Psal. 144. verse last) And whatsoever fortune befall him, make use of it. If he be in sorrow, need, sicknesse, or any other adversity, seriously to recount with himself, why this or that malady, misery, this or that incurable disease is inflicted upon him; it may be for his good, [1399]sic expedit, as Peter said of his daughters ague. Bodily sicknesse is for his soules health, periisset nisi periisset, had he not been visited, he had utterly perished; for [1400]the Lord correcteth him whom he loveth, even as a father doth his childe in whom he delighteth.	Whoever is wise, then, will consider these things, as David did—Psalm 144, last verse—and make use of whatever fortune befalls him.[1401] If he suffers sorrow, poverty, sickness or any other adversity, let him seriously consider why this or that affliction, misery or incurable disease has been inflicted on him. It may be for his good: "It is for the best," as Peter said of his daughter's fever.[1402] Bodily sickness serves the soul's health: "He would have perished had he not perished"—had he not been afflicted, he would have been utterly lost. For "the Lord corrects those he loves, as a father corrects the child in whom he delights."
If he be safe and sound on the other side, and free from all manner of infirmity; [1403]& cui	If, on the other hand, he is safe and sound, free from every kind of infirmity, "and has
Gratia, forma, valetudo contingat abunde Et mundus victus, non deficiente crumena.	Favour, beauty and health in abundance, And wholesome fare, with a purse that never fails."[1404]
And that he have grace, beauty, favour, health, A cleanly diet, and abound in wealth.	And has grace, beauty, favour, health, Wholesome food and abundant wealth.

[1399] Burton. h. "Petrarch."

[1400] Burton. i. "Prov. 3.12." Proverbs 3:12.

[1401] Editor. "Who so is wise … will consider these things" is Psalm 107:43. Burton instead prints "Psal. 144. verse last"; that reference remains in the modern column so that the correction is explicit here.

[1402] Editor. Burton gives only "Petrarch" for the anecdote of Peter and his daughter; the exact passage has not been located for this draft. "Ague" means a fever, often recurring. The repeated "perished" distinguishes bodily affliction from spiritual ruin.

[1403] Burton. k. "Hor. Epist. lib. 1.4." Horace, Epistles 1.4.

[1404] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.4.9–11. Burton prints forma, beauty, where the consulted Latin text has fama, reputation; the modern version follows Burton. His own English couplet follows the new translation of the Latin and is also retained, so the deliberate repetition remains.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yet in the midst of his prosperity, let him remember that caveat of Moses, [1405]Beware that he do not forget the Lord his God; that he be not [1406]puffed up, but acknowledge them to be his good gifts and benefits, and [1407]the more he hath, to be more thankful, (as Agapetianus adviseth) and use them aright,	Yet in the midst of his prosperity let him remember Moses's warning: "Take care not to forget the Lord your God." Let him not swell with pride, but acknowledge these as God's good gifts and blessings; the more he has, the more thankful he should be, as Agapetianus advises, and he should use them rightly.
Source page 3–4 [1408]Now the instrumental causes of these our infirmities, are as diverse, as the infirmities themselves; Starrs, heavens, elements, &c. And all those creatures which God hath made, are armed against sinners. They were indeed once good in themselves, & that they are now many of them pernicious unto us, is not in their nature, but our corruption, which hath caused it. For from the fall of our first parent Adam, they have been changed, the earth accursed, the influence of Stars altered, the four Elements, Beasts, Birds, Plants, are now ready to offend us.	Now the instrumental causes of our infirmities are as varied as the infirmities themselves: stars, heavens, elements and so on.[1409] All the creatures God has made are armed against sinners. They were indeed once good in themselves; that many are now harmful to us is caused by our corruption, not by their nature. For since the fall of our first parent Adam they have changed: the earth has been cursed, the influence of the stars altered, and the four elements, beasts, birds and plants are now ready to hurt us.

[1405] Burton. l. "Deut. 8.11." Deuteronomy 8:11.

[1406] Burton. Unlettered: "Qui stat videat ne cadat." Let him who stands take care not to fall.

[1407] Burton. Asterisked: "Quanto majoribus beneficiis a Deo cumulatur, tanto obligatiorem se debitorem fateatur." The greater the blessings God heaps on someone, the greater the debt he should acknowledge.

[1408] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Instrumental causes of our infirmities."

[1409] Editor. Instrumental causes are the means through which an effect is brought about. Burton's four elements are earth, water, air and fire; his scheme connects physical agents with the theological cause already given.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 4 The principall things for the use of man, are Water, Fire, Iron, Salt, Meale, Wheat, Hony, Milk, Oile, Wine, Clothing, good to the godly, to the sinners turned to evil, Ecclus. 39.26. Fire, and Haile, and Famine, and Dearth, all these are created for vengeance, Ecclus. 39.29. The Heavens threaten us with their Comets, Stars, Planets, with their great conjunctions, Eclipses, Oppositions, Quartiles, and such unfriendly Aspects.	"The chief things for human use are water, fire, iron, salt, meal, wheat, honey, milk, oil, wine and clothing: good for the godly, but turned to evil for sinners." Ecclesiasticus 39:26. "Fire, hail, famine and scarcity: all these are created for vengeance." Ecclesiasticus 39:29.[1410] The heavens threaten us with their comets, stars and planets, their great conjunctions, eclipses, oppositions, quartiles and other hostile aspects.[1411]
The Air with his Meteors, Thunder and Lightning, intemperate heat & cold, mighty windes, tempests, unseasonable weather; from which proceed dearth, famine, plague, and all sorts of Epidemical diseases, consuming infinite myriads of men. At Cayro in Egypt, every third year, (as it is related by [1412]Boterus, and others) 300000. dye of the plague; and 200000. in Constantinople, every fift or seventh at the utmost.	The air threatens us with its atmospheric disturbances, thunder and lightning, excessive heat and cold, mighty winds, storms and unseasonable weather. These bring scarcity, famine, plague and every sort of epidemic disease, consuming countless multitudes. In Cairo in Egypt, every third year, as Botero and others report, 300,000 die of plague; and 200,000 in Constantinople every fifth year, or every seventh at the latest.[1413]

[1410] Editor. These are condensed quotations from Ecclesiasticus 39:26–30 in the numbering Burton uses. The catalogue of useful things and the claim that they become harmful to sinners span more than the single verse he first cites.

[1411] Editor. An astrological aspect is an angular relation between celestial bodies: conjunction, together; opposition, 180 degrees apart; quartile or square, 90 degrees apart. "Meteors" below has the broader older meaning of phenomena in the atmosphere. Burton's account includes astrological and early medical assumptions.

[1412] Burton. m. "Boterus de Inst. urbium." Botero; an abbreviated reference to his work on cities.

[1413] Editor. The death totals and recurrence intervals are Burton's reports from earlier authorities, not independently verified statistics. Cairo modernizes Cayro; Constantinople is the historical name he uses for present-day Istanbul.

Original text 1651	Modern English
How doth the Earth terrifie and oppresse us with terrible Earthquakes, which are most frequent in [1414]China, Japan, and those Easterne Climes, swallowing up sometimes six Cities at once? How doth the water rage with his inundations, irruptions, flinging down Townes, Cities, Villages, Bridges, &c. besides shipwracks; whole Ilands are sometimes suddenly over-whelmed with all their inhabitants in [1415]Zeland, Holland, and many parts of the Continent drowned, as the [1416]Lake Erno in Ireland? [1417]Nihilque præter arcium cadavera Patenti cernimus freto.	How the earth terrifies and crushes us with dreadful earthquakes, most frequent in China, Japan and those eastern regions, sometimes swallowing six cities at once! How the water rages in floods and incursions, overthrowing towns, cities, villages and bridges, besides causing shipwrecks! Whole islands in Zeeland and Holland are sometimes suddenly overwhelmed with all their inhabitants, and many parts of the mainland drowned, as at Lake Erne in Ireland. “And in the open strait we see nothing but the corpses of citadels.”[1418]

[1414] Burton. n. “Lege hist. relationem Lod. Frois de rebus Iaponicis ad annum 1596.” Read the historical account by Luís Fróis of events in Japan, to the year 1596.

[1415] Burton. o. “Guicciard. descript. Belg. anno 1421.” Guicciardini, Description of the Low Countries, the year 1421.

[1416] Burton. p. “Giraldus Cambrens.” Gerald of Wales.

[1417] Burton. q. “Ianus Dousa ep. lib. 1. car. 10.” Janus Dousa, ep., book 1, poem 10. The abbreviated title remains unresolved.

[1418] Editor. The flood examples retain Burton’s places, dates and authorities. Lake Erno is Lake Erne. The Latin line attributed to Dousa means that ruined fortifications remain visible in the water. The underlying histories and the precise Dousa passage have not been independently collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In the Fennes of Freesland 1230. by reason of tempests, [1419]the Sea drowned multa hominum millia, & jumenta sine numero, all the countrey almost, men and cattle in it. How doth the Fire rage, that mercilesse Element, consuming in an instant whole Cities? What towne of any antiquity or note, hath not been once, again and again, by the fury of this mercilesse element, defaced, ruinated, and left desolate? In a word,	In the marshes of Friesland in 1230, storms caused the sea to drown “many thousands of people, and beasts beyond number”—almost the whole country, with its people and cattle. How fire rages, that merciless element, consuming entire cities in an instant! What town of any age or importance has not, once and again, been disfigured, ruined and left desolate by its fury? In a word,
[1420]Ignis pepercit, unda mergit, aëris Vis pestilentis æquori ereptum necat, Bello superstes, tabidus morbo perit.	The wave drowns him whom fire has spared; The force of pestilent air kills him snatched from the sea; The survivor of war wastes away and dies of disease.[1421]
Whom Fire spares, Sea doth drowne; whom Sea, Pestilent Ayre doth send to clay, Whom War scapes, sicknesse takes away.	Whom fire spares, the sea drowns; whom the sea spares, Pestilent air sends to the grave; Whom war lets escape, sickness carries away.
To descend to more particulars, how many creatures are at deadly feud with men? Lions, Wolves, Beares, &c. Some with hoofes, hornes, tuskes, teeth, nailes: How many noxious Serpents and venemous creatures, ready to offend us with stings, breath, sight, or quite kill us? How many pernicious fishes, plants, gummes, fruits, seeds, flowers, &c. could I reckon up on a sudden, which by their very smell many of them, touch, taste, cause some grievous malady, if not death it self? Some make mention of a thousand several poysons: but these are but trifles in respect.	To come to particulars: how many creatures are at deadly enmity with us—lions, wolves, bears and so on? Some attack with hooves, horns, tusks, teeth or claws. How many harmful serpents and venomous creatures stand ready to hurt us with their sting, breath or gaze, or to kill us outright? How many dangerous fish, plants, gums, fruits, seeds and flowers could I name at once, many of which cause grievous illness, if not death itself, merely through smell, touch or taste? Some speak of a thousand different poisons. Yet these are trifles by comparison.

[1419] Burton. r. “Munster l. 3. Cos. cap. 462.” Münster, Cosmography 3.462.

[1420] Burton. s. “Buchanan. Baptist.” George Buchanan, Baptistes.

[1421] Editor. Burton attributes the Latin triplet to Buchanan’s Baptistes. A new unrhymed translation is followed by a modernization of Burton’s own English triplet. Both are retained; the precise Latin passage remains to be collated in a separate edition of Buchanan.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 4–5 The greatest enemy to man, is man, who by the Devils instigation, is still ready to do mischief, his own executioner, a Wolfe, a Devil to himself, and others. [1422]We are all brethren in Christ, or at least should be, members of one body, servants of one Lord, and yet no fiend can so torment, insult over, tyrannize, vex, as one man doth another. Let me not fall therefore, (saith David, when wars, plague, famine were offered) into the hands of men, mercilesse, and wicked men:	The greatest enemy of humanity is humanity itself. At the devil's instigation, a person is always ready to do harm: his own executioner, a wolf, a devil to himself and others. We are all brothers in Christ, or at least should be, members of one body, servants of one Lord; yet no fiend can torment, trample on, tyrannize over or harass people as one human being does another. "Do not let me fall," therefore, says David, when offered war, plague or famine, "into human hands"—the hands of merciless, wicked people:[1423]
Source page 5 [1424]——Vix sunt homines hoc nomine digni, Quamque lupi, sævæ plus feritatis habent.	They are scarcely human, scarcely worthy of the name, And have more savage cruelty than wolves.[1425]
We can most part foresee these Epidemicall diseases, and likely avoid them; Dearths, tempests, plagues, our Astrologers foretel us; Earth-quakes, inundations, ruines of houses, consuming fires, come by little and little, or make some noise before-hand; but the knaveries, impostures, injuries and villanies of men no art can avoid. We can keep our professed enemies from our cities, by gates, walls and towers, defend our selves from theeves and robbers by watchfulnesse and weapons; but this malice of men, and their pernicious endeavours, no caution can divert, no vigilancy foresee. We have so many secret plots and devices to mischief one another.	For the most part we can foresee these epidemic diseases, and probably avoid them. Our astrologers predict scarcity, storms and plagues; earthquakes, floods, collapsing houses and consuming fires come gradually, or give some warning sound beforehand. But no skill can avert human knavery, deceit, injustice and villainy. We can keep avowed enemies out of our cities with gates, walls and towers, and defend ourselves against thieves and robbers with vigilance and weapons. Yet no precaution can turn aside this human malice and its harmful schemes; no watchfulness can foresee them. We have so many secret plots and devices for hurting one another.

[1422] Burton. Unlettered: "Homo homini lupus, homo homini dæmon." A human being is a wolf to another human being, a demon to another human being.

[1423] Editor. The allusion is to David choosing among famine, defeat by enemies and pestilence in 2 Samuel 24:12–14. Burton's point is that divine mercy may be hoped for more readily than human mercy.

[1424] Burton. Unlettered: "Ovid de Trist. l. 5. Eleg. 7." Ovid, Tristia 5.7.

[1425] Editor. Ovid, Tristia 5.7.45–46, describing the people among whom he lives in exile. Burton removes the opening conditional phrase and turns the complaint into a general statement about human cruelty.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sometimes by the Devils help, as Magicians, [1426]Witches: sometimes by impostures, mixtures, poysons, stratagems, single combats, wars, we hack and hew, as if we were ad internecionem nati, like Cadmus souldiers borne to consume one another. 'Tis an ordinary thing to read of a hundred and two hundred thousand men slaine in a battle. Besides all manner of tortures, brasen bulls, rackes, wheeles, strappadoes, gunnes, engines, &c. [1427]Ad unum corpus humanum supplicia plura, quam membra: We have invented more torturing instruments, then there be severall members in a mans body, as Cyprian well observes.	Sometimes with the devil's help, as magicians and witches do; sometimes through deceptions, potions, poisons, stratagems, duels and wars, we hack and hew as though we were "born for mutual destruction," like Cadmus's soldiers, born to kill one another.[1428] It is commonplace to read of a hundred or two hundred thousand men killed in a battle. Besides these are all kinds of torture: bronze bulls, racks, wheels, strappadoes, guns, devices and so on.[1429] "For one human body there are more tortures than limbs." We have invented more instruments of torture than the body has separate members, as Cyprian aptly observes.

[1426] Burton. r. "Miscent aconita novercæ." Stepmothers mix aconite poisons.

[1427] Burton. s. "Lib. 2. Epist. 2. ad Donatum." Book 2, letter 2, to Donatus. Burton's numbering is retained.

[1428] Editor. Cadmus's soldiers are the warriors who spring from sown dragon's teeth and fight one another. The marginal line on poisoning stepmothers recalls Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.147; it supplies another conventional literary image of domestic treachery.

[1429] Editor. A bronze bull was an execution device; racks, breaking wheels and the strappado were instruments or forms of torture. "Engines" means contrivances or machines. Cyprian's comparison of tortures with body parts occurs in To Donatus §10; numbering differs from Burton's cited collection.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To come nearer yet, our own parents by their offences, indiscretion and intemperance, are our mortall enemies. [1430]The Fathers have eaten sowre grapes, and the childrens teeth are set on edge. They cause our griefe many times, and put upon us hereditary diseases, inevitable infirmities: They torment us, and we are ready to injure our posterity; ——[1431]mox daturi progeniem vitiosiorem, and the latter end of the world, as [1432]Paul foretold, is still like to be worst. We are thus bad by nature, bad by kinde, but farre worse by art, every man the greatest enemy unto himself.	To come nearer still: through their offences, lack of judgement and intemperance, our own parents are our mortal enemies. “The fathers have eaten sour grapes, and the children’s teeth are set on edge.”[1433] They often cause our suffering, passing on hereditary diseases and inescapable infirmities. They torment us, and we in turn are ready to injure our descendants, “soon to produce a still more vicious generation.”[1434] As Paul foretold, the world’s last days are likely to be the worst. We are thus bad by nature, bad by birth, but far worse through our own contrivance, each person his own greatest enemy.
We study many times to undo our selves, abusing those good gifts which God hath bestowed upon us, Health, Wealth, Strength, Wit, Learning, Art, Memory to our own destruction, [1435]Perditio tua ex te. As [1436]Iudas Maccabeus killed Apollonius with his owne weapons, we arme our selves to our own overthrows; and use Reason, Art, Judgement, all that should help us, as so many instruments to undo us.	We often take pains to ruin ourselves, abusing God’s good gifts—health, wealth, strength, intelligence, learning, skill and memory—to bring about our own destruction. “Your destruction comes from yourself.”[1437] As Judas Maccabaeus killed Apollonius with Apollonius’s own weapons, we arm ourselves for our own overthrow, using reason, skill and judgement—all that should help us—as instruments of our ruin.[1438]

[1430] Burton. t. “Ezech. 18.2.” Ezekiel 18:2.

[1431] Burton. u. “Hor. l. 3. Od. 6.” Horace, Odes 3.6.

[1432] Burton. x. “2 Tim. 3.2.” 2 Timothy 3:2.

[1433] Editor. Burton quotes the proverb in Ezekiel 18:2 to illustrate inherited harm. The surrounding chapter rejects that proverb as a rule of divine judgement and stresses individual responsibility; Burton does not reproduce that qualification.

[1434] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.6.48: mox daturos progeniem vitiosiorem in the consulted text. Burton’s daturi adapts the quotation to his own syntax. “Art” in this paragraph means human skill or deliberate contrivance, not the fine arts.

[1435] Burton. y. “Ezec. 18.31.” Ezekiel 18:31.

[1436] Burton. z. “1 Macc. 3.12.” 1 Maccabees 3:12.

[1437] Editor. The Latin “Perditio tua ex te” corresponds to the Vulgate tradition of Hosea 13:9, rather than being the wording of the cited Ezekiel 18:31. Ezekiel nevertheless supplies a related appeal to abandon transgressions and not die.

[1438] Editor. In 1 Maccabees 3:11–12 Judas kills Apollonius and then takes his sword for later use. The text does not say that Judas kills him with his own weapon. Burton’s compressed version is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hector gave Ajax a sword, which so long as he fought against enemies, served for his help and defence; but after he began to hurt harmlesse creatures with it, turned to his own hurtlesse bowels. Those excellent meanes, God hath bestowed on us, well imployed, cannot but much availe us; but if otherwise perverted, they ruine & confound us: and so by reason of our indiscretion and weaknesse, they commonly do: we have too many instances.	Hector gave Ajax a sword which helped and defended him as long as he fought his enemies; but after he began to harm innocent creatures with it, it turned against his own innocent entrails.[1439] Those excellent resources God has given us, if well employed, cannot fail to benefit us greatly; but if misused, they ruin and destroy us. Through our lack of judgement and weakness, that is what they commonly do: we have all too many examples.
Source page 5–6 This S. Austin acknowledged of himself in his humble confessions, promptnesse of Wit, Memory, Eloquence, they were Gods good gifts, but he did not use them to his glory. If you will particularly know how, and by what meanes, consult Physicians, & they will tell you, that it is in offending in some of those six non-natural things, of which I shall after dilate more at large; they are the causes of our infirmities, our surfetting, and drunkennesse, our immoderate insatiable lust, and [1440]prodigious riot.	St Augustine acknowledged this of himself in his humble Confessions: quickness of mind, memory and eloquence were God's good gifts, but he did not use them for God's glory.[1441] If you want to know precisely how and by what means we do this, consult physicians. They will tell you that it comes from mismanaging one or another of the six "non-natural" things, which I shall discuss more fully later. These are the causes of our infirmities: our overeating and drunkenness, our immoderate, insatiable lust and our monstrous excess.[1442]

[1439] Editor. Burton alludes to Ajax's madness, his killing of harmless animals and his suicide. "Hurtlesse" means harmless; the modern wording retains its pointed application to Ajax's own body.

[1440] Burton. a. "Part. 1. Sec. 2. Memb. 2." A forward reference to the discussion of the six non-natural things.

[1441] Editor. Compare Augustine, Confessions 1.20.31, on memory and speech as divine gifts misused in seeking pleasure and honour among created things. Burton gives a summary rather than a literal quotation.

[1442] Editor. The six "non-natural" things are conditions requiring regulation: air; food and drink; exercise and rest; sleep and waking; retention and evacuation; and passions of the mind. "Non-natural" is a historical medical term, not a synonym for unnatural. Burton discusses them in First Partition, Section 2, Member 2.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 6 Plures crapula, quam gladius, is a true saying, the board consumes more then the sword. Our intemperance it is, that pulls so many several incurable diseases upon our heads, that hastens [1443]old age, perverts our temperature, & brings upon us sudden death. And last of all, that which crucifies us most, is our own folly, madnesse, (quos Iupiter perdit, dementat; by substraction of his assisting grace God permits it) weaknesse, want of government, our facility and pronenesse in yeelding to severall lusts, in giving way to every passion and perturbation of the minde: by which meanes we metamorphize our selves, and degenerate into beasts.	"More by gluttony than by the sword" is a true saying: the table consumes more lives than the sword. It is our intemperance that brings so many different incurable diseases upon us, hastens old age, disrupts our bodily constitution and brings sudden death.[1444] And last of all, what torments us most is our own folly, madness —"those whom Jupiter destroys, he drives mad"; God permits it by withdrawing his assisting grace —weakness, lack of self-control, and readiness to yield to every sort of desire, giving way to every passion and disturbance of the mind. By these means we transform ourselves and degenerate into beasts.
All which that Prince of [1445]Poets observed of Agamemnon, that when he was well pleased, and could moderate his passion, he was—os oculosque Jovi par: like Jupiter in feature, Mars in valour, Pallas in wisdom, another God; but when he became angry, he was a Lyon, a Tiger, a Dogge, &c. there appeared no signe or likenesse of Jupiter in him;	All this the prince of poets observed in Agamemnon: when content and able to govern his passions, he was "like Jupiter in face and eyes"—Jupiter in appearance, Mars in courage, Pallas in wisdom, another god. But when he grew angry he was a lion, a tiger, a dog and so on: no sign or likeness of Jupiter appeared in him.[1446]

[1443] Burton. b. "Nequitia est quæ te non sinet esse senem." It is your wickedness that will not let you be an old man.

[1444] Editor. "Temperature" means the balance or constitution of the body. The margin adapts Ovid, Fasti 1.414, changing sinit to sinet. Ovid's line jokes that Silenus's lust prevents him from acting his age; Burton places it beside a warning that vice prevents survival to old age.

[1445] Burton. c. "Homer. Iliad." Homer's Iliad.

[1446] Editor. Homer, Iliad 2.478–479, compares Agamemnon's head and eyes to Zeus's, his waist to Ares's and his chest to Poseidon's. Burton's comparison to Pallas in wisdom, and his contrast with the angry Agamemnon, are an interpretative expansion rather than a literal rendering of those lines.

Original text 1651	Modern English
so we, as long as we are ruled by reason, correct our inordinate appetite, and conforme our selves to Gods word, are as so many living Saints: but if we give reines to Lust, Anger, Ambition, Pride, and follow our own wayes, we degenerate into beasts, transforme our selves, overthrow our constitutions, [1447]provoke God to anger, and heap upon us this of Melancholy, and all kinds of incurable diseases, as a just and deserved punishment of our sinnes.	So we, as long as we are governed by reason, restrain our disordered appetites and conform to God's word, are like so many living saints. But if we give free rein to lust, anger, ambition and pride, and follow our own ways, we degenerate into beasts, transform ourselves, ruin our constitutions, provoke God to anger, and heap upon ourselves this disease of melancholy and every kind of incurable illness, as the just and deserved punishment of our sins.

[1447] Burton. d. "Intemperantia, luxus, ingluvies, & infinita hujusmodi flagitia, quæ divinas pœnas merentur. Crato." Intemperance, extravagance, gluttony and countless offences of this kind, which deserve divine punishments. Crato.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 2. The Definition Number Division of Diseases.	Subsection 2. The definition, number and classification of diseases.
What a Disease is, almost every Physician defines. [1448]Fernelius calleth it an Affection of the body, contrary to Nature. [1449]Fuschius and Crato an hinderance, hurt, or alteration of any action of the body, or part of it. [1450]Tholosanus, a dissolution of that league which is between body and soule, and a perturbation of it: as health the perfection, and makes to the preservation of it. [1451]Labeo in Agellius, an ill habit of the body, opposite to nature, hindering the use of it. Others otherwise, all to this effect.	Almost every physician offers a definition of disease. Fernel calls it a condition of the body contrary to nature. Fuchs and Crato call it an obstruction, impairment or alteration of any function of the body or one of its parts. Tholosanus calls it a dissolution and disturbance of the bond between body and soul, just as health perfects and helps preserve that bond. Labeo, quoted in Aulus Gellius, calls it an unhealthy condition of the body, contrary to nature and hindering its use. Others put it differently, but all mean much the same.[1452]
[1453]How many diseases there are, is a question not yet determined; [1454]Pliny reckons up 300. from the crown of the head, to the sole of the foot: elsewhere he saith, morborum infinita multitudo, their number is infinite. Howsoever it was in those times, it boots not; in our daies I am sure the number is much augmented:	How many diseases there are remains an unsettled question. Pliny counts 300, from the crown of the head to the sole of the foot; elsewhere he speaks of "an infinite multitude of diseases." Whatever the case in those days, it makes no difference: in our own, I am sure, their number has greatly increased.

[1448] Burton. e. "Fern. Path. l. 1. c. 1. Morbus est affectus contra naturam corpori insidēs." Fernel, Pathology 1.1: disease is a condition contrary to nature residing in the body. The final word abbreviates insidens.

[1449] Burton. f. "Fusch. Instit. l. 3. Sect. 1. c. 3. à quo primùm vitiatur actio." Fuchs, Institutes 3.1.3: that by which a function is primarily impaired.

[1450] Burton. g. "Dissolutio fæderis in corpore, ut sanitas est consummatio." A dissolution of the covenant in the body, as health is its fulfilment.

[1451] Burton. h. "Lib. 4. cap. 2. Morbus est habitus contra naturam qui usu ejus, &c." Book 4, chapter 2: disease is a condition contrary to nature which affects its use, etc. The printed Latin is abbreviated; the full definition is discussed in the editorial note.

[1452] Editor. "Contrary to nature" means contrary to the body's normal constitution or functioning. "Affection" means a condition, and "habit" a state or disposition, not a repeated custom. The Labeo definition is reported through Caelius Sabinus in Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights 4.2.3; the full Latin ends qui usum eius facit deteriorem, "which makes its use worse."

[1453] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Number of diseases."

[1454] Burton. i. "Cap. 11. lib. 7." Chapter 11, book 7. The printed reference is retained. Pliny's Natural History 26.6, section 9, says that there were more than three hundred kinds of disease. This locates the numerical claim, but not Burton's description of a catalogue running from head to foot.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1455]macies, & nova febrium Terris incubuit cohors.	Wasting sickness and a new troop of fevers Have descended upon the earth.[1456]
For besides many Epidemicall diseases unheard of, and altogether unknown to Galen and Hippocrates, as Scorbutum, Small pox, Plica, Sweating sickness, Morbus Gallicus, &c. We have many proper and peculiar almost to every part. [1457]No man amongst us so sound, of so good a constitution, that hath not some impediment of Body or Minde. Quisque suos patimur manes, we have all our infirmities, first or last, more or lesse.	For besides many epidemic diseases unheard of and entirely unknown to Galen and Hippocrates —scurvy, smallpox, plica, sweating sickness, the French disease and so on—we have many peculiar to almost every part of the body.[1458] None of us is so sound, or has so good a constitution, as to have no impairment of body or mind. "Each of us suffers his own lot": we all have our infirmities, sooner or later, in greater or lesser measure.[1459]

[1455] Burton. Asterisked: "Horat." Horace.

[1456] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.3.30–31. The lines follow the theft of fire from heaven by Prometheus; Burton applies them to the multiplication of diseases. Both the Latin here and the later Greek are newly translated; Burton's own following English couplet is also retained in modernized form.

[1457] Burton. Unlettered heading: "No man free from some disease or other."

[1458] Editor. Scorbutum is scurvy; plica denotes a condition involving severely matted hair; Morbus Gallicus, "the French disease," usually denotes syphilis in this period. Burton's claim that these diseases were unknown to Galen and Hippocrates is his historical judgement, not a statement that their first occurrence has been established.

[1459] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 6.743, in Anchises's explanation of the purification of souls after death. Burton's following gloss applies the line to everyone's individual infirmities; "his own lot" follows that use without substituting a modern psychiatric sense of "demons."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 6–7 There will be peradventure in an age, or one of a thousand, like Zenophilus the Musician in [1460]Pliny, that may happely live 105. yeares without any manner of impediment; A Pollio Romulus, that can preserve himself [1461]with wine and oyle; A man as fortunate as Q. Metellus, of whom Valerius so much braggs; A man as healthful as Otto Herwardus, a Senator of Ausborrow in Germany, whom [1462]Leovitius the Astrologer brings in for an example and instance of certainty in his art; who because he had the significators in his geniture fortunate, and free from the hostile aspects of Saturne and Mars, being a very cold man, [1463]could not remember that ever he was sick.	Perhaps once in an age, or one in a thousand, someone like Zenophilus the musician in Pliny may happen to live for 105 years without any infirmity; or a Pollio Romulus may preserve himself with wine and oil; or someone may be as fortunate as Quintus Metellus, whom Valerius praises so extravagantly.[1464] Or he may be as healthy as Otto Herwardus, a senator of Augsburg in Germany, whom the astrologer Leovitius offers as proof of his art's certainty: because the significators in his birth chart were fortunate and free from the hostile aspects of Saturn and Mars, this man of a very cold constitution could not remember ever having been ill.[1465]

[1460] Burton. k. "Cap. 50 lib. 7. Centū et quinq; vixit annos sine ullo incommodo." Chapter 50, book 7. He lived one hundred and five years without any infirmity. The printed abbreviations stand for centum et quinque.

[1461] Burton. m. "Intus mulso, foras oleo." Honeyed wine within, oil without.

[1462] Burton. n. "Exemplis genitur. præfixis Ephemer. cap. de infirmitat." In the examples of birth charts prefixed to the Ephemerides, chapter on infirmities.

[1463] Burton. o. "Qui, quoad pueritiæ ultimam memoriam recordari potest, non meminit se ægrotum decubuisse." As far back as his earliest childhood memories reach, he cannot remember having lain ill.

[1464] Editor. Pliny's Natural History 7.50 in Holland's 1601 chapter scheme reports Xenophilus's 105 years without infirmity; Burton prints Zenophilus. At 22.53, section 114, Pliny names Pollio Romilius, over a hundred, and gives his answer to Augustus: intus mulso, foris oleo, honeyed wine within, oil without. Burton's Romulus and foras remain. These locate literary reports, not independent verification of longevity or medical benefit.

[1465] Editor. "Geniture" is a nativity or birth chart; "significators" are the celestial factors taken to signify a person or condition. "Cold" describes the man's bodily temperament within historical medicine. The causal link asserted here is astrological. Ausborrow is Augsburg.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 7 [1466]Paracelsus may bragge, that he could make a man live 400 years or more, if he might bring him up from his infancy, and diet him as he list; and some Physicians hold, that there is no certaine period of mans life: but it may still by temperance and physick be prolonged. We finde in the meane time, by common experience, that no man can escape, but that of [1467]Hesiod is true:	Paracelsus may boast that he could make a man live for 400 years or more, if he could rear him from infancy and regulate his diet as he pleased. Some physicians hold that human life has no fixed limit, but may continually be prolonged by moderation and medicine. Meanwhile, ordinary experience shows us that no one can escape, and that Hesiod's words are true:
Πλείη μὲν γὰρ γαῖα κακῶν, πλείη δὲ θάλασσα, Νοῦσοι δ' ἀνθρώποισιν ἐφ' ἡμέρῃ, ἠδ' ἐπὶ νυκτὶ Αὐτόματοι φοιτῶσι.——	For the earth is full of evils, and the sea is full; Diseases visit humankind by day and by night, Coming of their own accord.[1468]
Th' earth's full of maladies, and full the sea, Which set upon us both by night and day.	The earth is full of maladies, and so the sea, Which fall upon us both by night and day.

[1466] Burton. p. "Lib. de vita longa." Book on long life.

[1467] Burton. r. "Oper. & dies." Works and Days.

[1468] Editor. Hesiod, Works and Days 101–103, cut off after "come of their own accord." Greek ligatures and accents are regularized. The 1651 text has ἠδ', "and," where the consulted Greek edition has αἳ δ', "and others." Burton's English couplet compresses the three quoted lines. The cramped setting of ἀνθρώποισιν merits further collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1469]If you require a more exact division of these ordinary Diseases which are incident to men, I refer you to Physicians; they will tell you of [1470]Acute and Chronick, First and Secundary, Lethales, Salutares, Errant, Fixed, Simple, Compound, Connexed, or Consequent, belonging to parts or the whole, in Habit or in Disposition, &c. My division at this time (as most befitting my purpose) shall be into those of the Body and Minde.	If you want a more precise classification of the ordinary diseases to which people are subject, I refer you to physicians. They will tell you of acute and chronic diseases; primary and secondary; fatal and nonfatal; wandering and fixed; simple, compound, associated or consequent; affecting a part or the whole; established as a habit or present as a disposition, and so on.[1471] For now, the division best suited to my purpose is into diseases of the body and diseases of the mind.
For them of the Body, a briefe Catalogue of which Fuschius hath made, Institut lib. 3. sect. 1. cap. 11. I refer you to the voluminous Tomes of Galen, Areteus, Rhasis, Avicenna, Alexander, Paulus Ætius, Gardonerius: And those exact Neotericks, Savanarola, Capivaccius, Donatus Altomarus, Hercules de Saxonia, Mercurialis, Victorius Faventinus, Wecker, Piso, &c. that have methodically and elaborately written of them all. Those of the minde and Head I will briefly handle, and apart.	For diseases of the body, briefly catalogued by Fuchs in his Institutes, book 3, section 1, chapter 11, I refer you to the massive volumes of Galen, Aretaeus, Rhazes, Avicenna, Alexander, Paulus, Aetius and Gardonerius; and to those meticulous modern writers Savonarola, Capivaccius, Donatus Altomarus, Hercules de Saxonia, Mercurialis, Victorius Faventinus, Wecker, Piso and others, who have treated them all systematically and at length. I shall deal briefly and separately with diseases of the mind and head.[1472]

[1469] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Division of Diseases.”

[1470] Burton. s. “See Fernelius Path. lib. 1. cap. 9, 10, 11, 12. Fuschius instit. l. 3. sect. 1. c. 7. Wecker. Synt.” See Fernel, Pathology 1.9–12; Fuchs, Institutes 3.1.7; Wecker, Syntaxis.

[1471] Editor. “Habit” is an established condition; “disposition” a less settled state. Burton develops this distinction in the next subsection. “Errant” diseases wander or shift their location; “fixed” remain in one place. Salutares here contrasts with lethal diseases and is rendered “nonfatal.” These are historical classifications.

[1472] Editor. “Neotericks” means more recent or modern writers, relative to Burton. These names range across ancient, medieval and Renaissance medicine. Familiar forms of names are used selectively in the modern column; the original forms remain available on the left. A missing separator between Paulus and Aetius is supplied in modern English.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 3. Division of the diseases of the Head.	Subsection 3. Classification of diseases of the head.
These Diseases of the Minde, forasmuch as they have their chief seat and organs in the head, which are commonly repeated amongst the diseases of the head, which are divers, and vary much according to their site. For in the head, as there be several parts, so there be divers grievances, which according to that division of [1473]Heurnius, (which he takes out of Arculanus) are inward or outward (to omit all others which pertaine to Eyes & Eares, Nostrils, Gums, Teeth, Mouth, Palate, Tongue, Wesel, Chops, Face, &c.) belonging properly to the brain, as baldness, falling of haire, furfaire, lice, &c.	These diseases of the mind, because their chief seat and organs are in the head, are commonly listed among diseases of the head, which are various and differ greatly according to their location. Just as the head has several parts, so it has various ailments. According to Heurnius's classification, taken from Arculanus, these are internal or external—leaving aside all those affecting the eyes and ears, nostrils, gums, teeth, mouth, palate, tongue, windpipe, jaws, face and so on. Those belonging specifically to the brain include baldness, loss of hair, dandruff, lice and the like.[1474]

[1473] Burton. t. "Præfat de morbis capitis. In capite ut variæ habitant partes, ita variæ querelæ ibi eveniunt." Preface to On Diseases of the Head. Just as different parts are situated in the head, so different complaints occur there.

[1474] Editor. "Wesel" is the windpipe; "chops" the jaws; "furfaire" dandruff or scurf. The printed sentence begins awkwardly and calls even baldness and lice ailments belonging to the brain. Its general anatomical classification is preserved rather than silently rewritten to match current anatomy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 7–8 [1475]Inward belonging to the skins next to the Brain, called dura and pia mater, as all head-aches, &c. or to the Ventricles, Caules, Kels, Tunicles, Creeks, and parts of it, and their passions, as Caro, Vertigo, Incubus, Apoplexie, Falling sickness. The diseases of the Nerves; Crampes, Stupor, Convulsion, Tremor, Palsie: or belonging to the excrements of the brain, Catarrhes, Sneezing, Rheumes, Distillations: or else those that pertaine to the substance of the brain it self, in which are conceived, Frensie, Lethargie, Melancholy, madness, weake memory, Sopor, or Coma Vigilia & vigil Coma.	Internal diseases affect the membranes next to the brain, called the dura mater and pia mater, as do headaches and the like; or its ventricles, coverings, membranes, recesses and other parts, with their disorders, such as profound stupor, vertigo, nightmare oppression, apoplexy and the falling sickness.[1476] Diseases of the nerves include cramps, numbness, convulsions, tremor and paralysis. Others concern the brain's waste matter: catarrhs, sneezing, rheums and dripping discharges.[1477] Still others affect the substance of the brain itself, where frenzy, lethargy, melancholy, madness, weak memory, sopor, coma vigilia and vigil coma are thought to arise.[1478]

[1475] Burton. u. "Of which reade Heurnius, Montaltus, Hildesheim, Quercetan, Iason Pratensis, &c."

[1476] Editor. The dura mater and pia mater are membranes covering the brain. Caules, kels and tunicles overlap in referring to coverings or membranes; "creeks" are recesses. Caro is a historical term for profound stupor; incubus for oppressive nightmare experiences; apoplexy for sudden disabling collapse; and falling sickness for epilepsy. These labels should not be assumed to map exactly onto present diagnostic categories.

[1477] Editor. "Stupor" here can mean numbness or loss of sensation, distinct from its modern dominant sense. "Excrements" means material expelled or left over. Rheums and distillations belong to a theory in which humours drain down from the head; the translation retains that theory as Burton's account.

[1478] Editor. Sopor denotes a state of heavy sleep or stupor. Coma vigilia and vigil coma are retained as printed Latin labels for disturbed states of sleeping and waking; the terminology and its relation to later meanings of "coma" require caution. These are not supplied as modern diagnoses.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 8 Out of these again I will single such as properly belong to the Phantasie, or Imagination, or Reason it self, which [1479]Laurentius calls the diseases of the minde, & Hildisheim, morbos Imaginationis, aut Rationis læsæ, which are three or four in number, Frensie, Madness, Melancholy, Dotage & their kindes: as Hydrophobia, Lycanthropia, Chorus sancti viti, morbi dæmoniaci: which I will briefly touch and point at, insisting especially in this of Melancholy, as more eminent then the rest, and that through all his kinds, causes, symptomes, prognosticks, cures: As Lonicerus hath done de Apoplexia, and many other of such particular diseases.	From these I shall select those that specifically affect fantasy or imagination, or reason itself. Laurentius calls them diseases of the mind, and Hildesheim "diseases of impaired imagination or reason." There are three or four: frenzy, madness, melancholy and mental impairment, with their varieties, such as hydrophobia, lycanthropy, St Vitus's dance and demonic disorders.[1480] I shall touch briefly on these, concentrating on melancholy as the most prominent of them, and following all its kinds, causes, symptoms, prognoses and cures, as Lonicerus has done with apoplexy and many others with particular diseases.

[1479] Burton. x. "Cap. 2. de melanchol." Chapter 2, on melancholy.

[1480] Editor. "Fantasy" and "imagination" name mental faculties. Dotage is rendered according to context as mental impairment or confusion; it is not restricted to old age. "Prognosticks" concerns the anticipated course and outcome of disease. The following subsection explains the named conditions in Burton's own terms.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Not that I finde fault with those which have written of this subject before, as Iason Pratensis, Laurentius, Montaltus, T. Bright, &c. they have done very well in their several kinds & methods; yet that which one omits, another may happely see; that which one contracts, another may inlarge. To conclude with [1481]Scribanius, that which they had neglected, or perfunctorily handled, we may more thoroughly examine; that which is obscurely delivered in them, may be perspicuously dilated and amplified by us: and so made more familiar and easie for every mans capacity, and the common good; which is the chief end of my Discourse.	I do not mean to find fault with earlier writers on this subject, such as Jason Pratensis, Laurentius, Montaltus, Timothy Bright and others. They have done very well in their different forms and methods. Yet what one omits another may happen to notice, and what one compresses another may expand. To conclude with Scribanius: what they neglected or treated superficially, we may examine more thoroughly; what they expressed obscurely, we may set out and develop clearly. In this way it may become more familiar and easier for everyone to understand, and serve the common good, which is the chief aim of my discourse.[1482]

[1481] Burton. y. "Cap. 2. de Physiologia sagarum; Quod alii minus rectè fortasse dixerint, nos examinare, melius dijudicare, corrigere studeamus." Chapter 2, On the Physiology of Witches. Let us endeavour to examine, judge better and correct what others may have stated less accurately.

[1482] Editor. The marginal Latin says, more briefly, that others' less accurate statements should be examined, judged and corrected. Burton's English develops this into a programme of clarification and expansion. The cited edition of Scribanius remains to be collated; the name and abbreviated title are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 4. Dotage, Phrensie, Madness, Hydrophobia, Lycanthropia, Chorus sancti Viti, Extasis.	Subsection 4. Mental impairment, frenzy, madness, hydrophobia, lycanthropy, St Vitus's dance and ecstasy.
[1483]Dotage, Fatuity, or Folly, is a common name to all the following Species, as some will have it. [1484]Laurentius and [1485]Altomarus comprehended Madness, Melancholy, and the rest under this name, and call it the summum genus of them all. If it be distinguished from them, it is naturall or ingenite, which comes by some defect of the organs, and over-much brain, as we see in our common fooles; and is for the most part intended or remitted in particular men, and thereupon some are wiser then others: or else it is acquire, an appendix or symptome of some other disease, which comes or goes; or if it continue, a signe of Melancholy it self.	Mental impairment, fatuity or folly is, according to some, a general name for all the following kinds. Laurentius and Altomarus include madness, melancholy and the rest under this name, calling it their highest genus. If distinguished from them, it is either natural or inborn, arising from some defect in the organs and an excess of brain matter, as we see in ordinary fools; its severity generally varies from person to person, and accordingly some have more understanding than others. Or it is acquired, an accompanying condition or symptom of another disease, which comes and goes; if it persists, it is a sign of melancholy itself.[1486]

[1483] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Delirium Dotage." Delirium; mental impairment.

[1484] Burton. z. "Cap. 4. de mel." Chapter 4, on melancholy.

[1485] Burton. a. "Art. med. c. 7." Medical Art, chapter 7.

[1486] Editor. "Highest genus" is the broadest class in a logical classification. "Intended or remitted" means intensified or diminished. "Ingenite" means inborn; "acquire" acquired. Burton's account combines conditions now distinguished from one another; his "fools" is a historical, disparaging term, retained to preserve the character of the passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1487]Phrenitis, which the Greeks derive from the word φρὴν, is a Disease of the Minde, with a continual Madness or Dotage, which hath an acute feaver annexed, or else an inflammation of the Brain, or the Membranes or Kels of it, with an acute feaver, which causeth Madness and Dotage. It differs from Melancholy and Madness, because their dotage is without an ague: this continual, with waking, or Memory decayed, &c. Melancholy is most part silent, this clamorous; and many such like differences are assigned by Physicians.	Phrenitis, which the Greeks derive from the word phrēn, is a disease of the mind involving continual madness or mental confusion accompanied by an acute fever; or it is an inflammation of the brain or its membranes, with an acute fever, that causes madness and confusion. It differs from melancholy and madness because their confusion occurs without a fever. In phrenitis it is continual, with sleeplessness, impaired memory and so on. Melancholy is generally silent; this is clamorous. Physicians identify many other such differences.[1488]

[1487] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Phrensie.”

[1488] Editor. Greek phrēn can mean the diaphragm, heart or mind. Phrenitis is the historical fever-associated disorder Burton describes here; “frenzy” in this edition translates his phrensie or frensie, not simply strong excitement. “Ague” here means fever, and “waking” sleeplessness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 8–9 [1489]Madness, Frensie, and Melancholy are confounded by Celsus, and many Writers: others leave out Frensie, and make Madness and Melancholy but one disease, which [1490]Iason Pratensis especially labours, and that they differ only secundum majus or minus, in quantity alone, the one being a degree to the other, and both proceeding from one cause. They differ intenso & remisso gradu, saith [1491]Gordonius, as the humor is intended or remitted. Of the same minde is [1492]Areteus, Alexander Tertullianus, Guianerius, Savanarola, Heurnius; and Galen himself writes promiscuously of them both by reason of their affinity: but most of our neotericks do handle them apart, whom I will follow in this Treatise.	Celsus and many other writers group madness, frenzy and melancholy together. Others leave frenzy aside and make madness and melancholy a single disease—a position Jason Pratensis argues at particular length. They hold that the difference is only one of degree, of more or less, one being a stage of the other and both arising from the same cause. They differ “in a greater or lesser degree,” Gordonius says, as the humour is intensified or diminished. Aretaeus, Alexander Tertullianus, Guianerius, Savonarola and Heurnius hold the same view; Galen himself discusses the two together because of their affinity. But most modern writers treat them separately, and I shall follow them in this treatise.[1493]

[1489] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Madnesse.”

[1490] Burton. b. “Plerique medici uno complexu perstringunt hos duos morbos, quod ex eadem causa oriantur, quodque magnitudine & modo solùm distent, et alter gradus ad alterum existat. Iason Pratens.” Most physicians treat these two diseases together, because they arise from the same cause, differ only in magnitude and manner, and one forms a step towards the other. Jason Pratensis.

[1491] Burton. c. “Lib. Med.” Medical book.

[1492] Burton. d. “Pars maniæ mihi videtur.” It seems to me a part of madness.

[1493] Editor. Burton reports disagreement over whether melancholy and madness differ in kind or only in degree. “Promiscuously” means together or without strict separation. The printed Alexander Tertullianus appears to mean the physician Alexander of Tralles; the unusual form is retained for later collation. “Madness” here is Burton’s category, not a precise modern diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 9 Madness is therefore defined to be a vehement Dotage; or raving without a Fever, far more violent then Melancholy, full of anger and clamor, horrible looks, actions, gestures, troubling the patients with far greater vehemency both of body and minde; without all fear and sorrow, with such impetuous force and boldness, that sometimes three or four men cannot hold them. Differing only in this from Phrensie, that it is without a Fever, and their memory is most part better.	Madness is therefore defined as severe mental derangement, or raving without fever, far more violent than melancholy: full of anger and clamour, with alarming looks, actions and gestures, disturbing patients much more violently in both body and mind, without fear or sorrow, and with such headlong force and boldness that sometimes three or four men cannot restrain them. It differs from frenzy only in lacking fever and in the patients' generally having better memory.
It hath the same causes as the other, as Choler adust, & bloud incensed, Brains inflamed, &c. [1494]Fracastorius addes, a due time, and full age to this definition, to distinguish it from children, and will have it a confirmed Impotency, to separate it from such as accidently come & go again, as by taking Henbane, Nightshade, Wine, &c.	It has the same causes as the other disorders: scorched choler, overheated blood, an inflamed brain and so on. Fracastorius adds an appropriate duration and mature age to this definition, to distinguish it from the condition of children. He requires it to be an established incapacity, to separate it from passing disturbances that arise accidentally and disappear again, as after taking henbane, nightshade, wine and the like.[1495]

[1494] Burton. e. "Insanus est, qui ætate debitâ, & tempore debito per se, non momentaneam & fugacem, ut vini, solani, Hyoscyami, sed confirmatam habet impotentiam bene operandi circa intellectum. lib. 2. de intellectione." A mad person is one who, at the appropriate age and for the appropriate duration, has in himself an established inability to exercise the understanding properly, rather than a momentary and fleeting one, such as that caused by wine, nightshade or henbane. Book 2, On Understanding.

[1495] Editor. Choler is yellow bile in humoral medicine; "adust" means scorched or burnt. "Incensed" means heated. Fracastorius's "impotency" is inability to exercise the understanding, not sexual impotence. Henbane and nightshade are cited as causes of temporary derangement. The translation does not identify a particular nightshade species.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of this fury there be divers kindes: Extasie, which is familiar with some persons, as Cardan saith of himself, he could be in one when he list; in which the Indian priests deliver their Oracles, & the witches in Lapland, as Olaus Magnus writeth, l. 3. cap. 18. Extasi omnia prædicere, answer all questions in an Extasis you will ask; what your friends do, where they are, how they fare, &c.	This madness has several kinds. One is ecstasy, a familiar state for some people: Cardan says he could enter it whenever he pleased. In this state Indian priests deliver their oracles, and the witches of Lapland, as Olaus Magnus writes in book 3, chapter 18, "foretell everything in ecstasy," answering whatever you ask—what your friends are doing, where they are, how they fare and so on.[1496]
The other [1497]species of this fury are Enthusiasmes, Revelations, and Visions, so often mentioned by Gregory and Beda in their works; Obsession or possession of devils, Sibylline Prophets, and Poetical Furies; such as come by eating noxious Herbs, Tarantulas stinging, &c. which some reduce to this. The most known are these, Lycanthropia, Hydrophobia, Chorus sancti Viti.	Other kinds of this madness are inspired transports, revelations and visions, so often mentioned by Gregory and Bede; demonic harassment or possession; Sibylline prophecy and poetic frenzy; and states produced by eating poisonous herbs, by tarantula stings and so on, which some place in this category. The best known are lycanthropy, hydrophobia and St Vitus's dance.[1498]

[1496] Editor. "Ecstasy" means a trance or state of being outside ordinary consciousness, not intense happiness. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. "When he list" means whenever he wished. The accounts of divination are presented as Burton's reports of his authorities.

[1497] Burton. f. "Of which read Felix Plater cap. 3. de mentis alienatione." On mental derangement, chapter 3.

[1498] Editor. "Enthusiasm" here means a state claimed to arise from divine inspiration. "Obsession" means harassment or assault by a spirit; it does not carry the modern psychiatric meaning of an intrusive recurring thought. The Sibyls were prophetic figures. "Reduce to" means classify under.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1499]Lycanthropia, which Avicenna calls Cucubuth, others Lupinam insaniam, or Wolf-madness, when men run howling about graves and fields in the night, and will not be perswaded but that they are Wolves, or some such beasts. [1500]Ætius and [1501]Paulus call it a kinde of Melancholy, but I should rather refer it to Madness, as most do.	Lycanthropy, which Avicenna calls cucubuth and others "wolf-madness," occurs when people run howling around graves and fields at night and cannot be persuaded that they are anything but wolves or similar beasts. Aetius and Paulus call it a kind of melancholy, but I would rather place it under madness, as most writers do.[1502]
Some make a doubt of it whether there be any such disease. [1503]Donat ab Altomari saith, that he saw two of them in his time: [1504]Wierus tells a story of such a one at Padua 1541. that would not believe to the contrary, but that he was a Wolf. He hath another instance of a Spaniard, who thought himself a Beare: [1505]Forrestus confirms as much by many examples; one amongst the rest of which he was an eye-witness, at Alcmaer in Holland, a poor Husbandman that still hunted about graves, & kept in Churchyards, of a pale, black, ugly, & fearful look.	Some doubt whether any such disease exists. Donatus Altomarus says that he saw two such patients in his lifetime. Wierus tells of a man at Padua in 1541 who could not be made to believe that he was anything other than a wolf. He gives another example of a Spaniard who thought himself a bear. Forestus supports this with many cases, including one he witnessed at Alkmaar in Holland: a poor farm worker who continually prowled around graves and stayed in churchyards, with a pale, dark, ugly and frightening appearance.

[1499] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Lycanthropia." Lycanthropy.

[1500] Burton. g. "Lib. 6. cap. 11." Book 6, chapter 11.

[1501] Burton. h. "Lia. 3. cap. 16." As printed; evidently book 3, chapter 16.

[1502] Editor. Lycanthropy literally concerns the wolf-man; Burton describes a belief that one has become an animal rather than affirming a bodily transformation. Cucubuth is retained as the printed name attributed to Avicenna. The dispute here concerns classification under melancholy or madness.

[1503] Burton. i. "Cap. 9. Art. med." Chapter 9, Medical Art.

[1504] Burton. k. "De præstig. Dæmonum. l. 3. cap. 21." On the Deceptions of Demons 3.21.

[1505] Burton. l. "Observat. lib. 10 de morbis cerebri, cap. 15." Observations, book 10, on diseases of the brain, chapter 15.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such belike or little better, were King Prætus [1506]daughters, that thought themselves kine. And Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel, as some interpreters hold, was only troubled with this kinde of Madness. This disease perhaps gave occasion to that bold assertion of [1507]Pliny, some men were turned into wolves in his time, and from wolves to men again: and to that fable of Pausanias, of a man that was ten years a Wolf, & afterwards turned to his former shape: to [1508]Ovids tale of Lycaon, &c.	King Proetus's daughters, who thought themselves cows, were probably in much the same condition. According to some interpreters, Nebuchadnezzar in Daniel suffered only from this kind of madness.[1509] This disease may have prompted Pliny's bold assertion that some men in his time were changed into wolves and back into men again; Pausanias's fable of a man who was a wolf for ten years before returning to his former shape; and Ovid's story of Lycaon, among others.[1510]
Source page 9–10 He that is desirous to hear of this Disease, or more examples, let him read Austin in his 18. book de Civitate Dei, cap. 5. Mizaldus cent. 5. 77. Sckenkius lib. 1. Hildesheim spicel. 2. de Mania. Forrestus lib. 10. de morbis cerebri. Olaus Magnus, Vincentius Bellavicensis, spec. met. lib. 31. c. 122. Pierius, Bodine, Zuinger, Zeilger, Peucer, Wierus, Spranger, &c.	Anyone wishing to learn more about this disease or read further examples should consult Augustine's City of God, book 18, chapter 5; Mizaldus, fifth century, item 77; Schenck, book 1; Hildesheim's second collection, on madness; Forestus, book 10, on diseases of the brain; Olaus Magnus; Vincent of Beauvais, spec. met., book 31, chapter 122; Pierius, Bodin, Zwinger, Zeilger, Peucer, Wierus, Spranger and others.[1511]

[1506] Burton. m. "Hippocrates lib. de insania." Hippocrates, book on madness.

[1507] Burton. n. "Lib. 8. cap. 22 homines interdum lupos fieri; & contra." Book 8, chapter 22: men sometimes become wolves, and vice versa.

[1508] Burton. o. "Met. lib. 1." Metamorphoses, book 1.

[1509] Editor. Kine means cows. Daniel 4 describes Nebuchadnezzar living away from human society and eating grass like oxen. The interpretation as lycanthropy or a related disorder belongs to the interpreters Burton mentions; it is not a diagnosis supplied by the biblical text.

[1510] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 8.34 (22 in Burton's chapter numbering), expressly rejects literal changes between humans and wolves before recounting the stories. Burton reverses that qualification. Pausanias 6.8.2 likewise disbelieves the transformation story about Damarchus; the consulted English translation says nine years, against Burton's ten. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.209–239, narrates Lycaon's transformation as myth.

[1511] Editor. Augustine discusses transformation stories in City of God 18.17–18, not the printed 18.5; the latter concerns Apis. "Century" here means a collection of one hundred items. The abbreviation spec. met. attached to Vincent of Beauvais is retained without conjectural expansion. The remaining abbreviated references await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 10 This malady, saith Avicenna, troubleth men most in Februarie, and is now adaies frequent in Bohemia and Hungary, according to [1512]Heurnius. Schernitzius will have it common in Livonia. They lye hid most part all day, and go abroad in the night, barking, howling, at graves and deserts; [1513]they have usually hollow eyes, scabbed legs and thighes, very dry and pale, [1514]saith Altomarus; he gives a reason there of all the symptomes, and sets down a brief cure of them.	This malady, Avicenna says, troubles people most in February; according to Heurnius, it is now frequent in Bohemia and Hungary. Schernitzius says it is common in Livonia. Those affected usually hide all day and go out at night, barking and howling around graves and deserted places. They generally have sunken eyes, scabbed legs and thighs, and are very dry and pale, Altomarus says. He explains all the symptoms there and gives a brief account of their treatment.[1515]
[1516]Hydrophobia, is a kinde of madness, well known in every village, which comes by the biting of a mad dog, or scratching, saith [1517]Aurelianus; touching, or smelling alone sometimes as [1518]Sckenkius proves, and is incident to many other creatures as well as men: so called, because the parties affected cannot endure the sight of water, or any liquor, supposing still they see a mad dog in it.	Hydrophobia is a kind of madness well known in every village. It comes from the bite of a mad dog, or from scratching, Aurelianus says; sometimes merely from touching or smelling, as Schenck demonstrates. It affects many other creatures as well as humans. It takes its name from the sufferers' inability to bear the sight of water or any other liquid, in which they continually imagine they see a mad dog.[1519]

[1512] Burton. p. "Cap. de Man." Chapter on madness.

[1513] Burton. Asterisked: "Ulcerata crura, sitis ipsis adest immodica, pallidi, lingua sicca." Ulcerated legs; they suffer excessive thirst; they are pale, with a dry tongue.

[1514] Burton. q. "Cap. 9. art." Chapter 9 of the Medical Art; continues the Altomarus reference.

[1515] Editor. Livonia was a Baltic region. "Deserts" means uninhabited or deserted places. The Latin marginal note specifies excessive thirst, while the prose says "very dry"; this is preserved. The regional reports, clinical observations and proposed cure are Burton's received claims, not independently verified cases.

[1516] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Hydrophobia."

[1517] Burton. r. "Lib. 3. Cap. 9." Book 3, chapter 9.

[1518] Burton. s. "Lib. 7. de Venenis." Book 7, on poisons.

[1519] Editor. Hydrophobia here denotes rabies, named from its characteristic difficulty with water. Modern medicine identifies a viral infection transmitted chiefly through infected saliva, usually in bites or scratches; mere smell is not a recognized route. The imagined dog in the water is Burton's reported explanation. See the World Health Organization's rabies account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And which is more wonderful; though they be very dry, (as in this malady they are) they will rather die then drink: [1520]Cælius Aurelianus, an ancient writer, makes a doubt whether this Hydrophobia be a passion of the body or the minde. The part affected is the Brain: the cause, poyson that comes from the mad dog, which is so hot & dry, that it consumes all the moisture in the body. [1521]Hildesheim relates of some that die so mad; and being cut up, had no water, scarce bloud, or any moisture left in them.	More remarkably, although they are very thirsty, as sufferers from this disease are, they would rather die than drink. The ancient writer Caelius Aurelianus questions whether hydrophobia is a disorder of the body or of the mind. The affected part is the brain; the cause is poison from the mad dog, so hot and dry that it consumes all the body's moisture. Hildesheim tells of people who died in this madness and, when dissected, had no water, scarcely any blood, or any moisture left in them.[1522]
To such as are so affected, the fear of water begins at 14. dayes after they are bitten, to some again not till 40. or 60. dayes after: commonly saith Heurnius, they begin to rave, flye water, and glasses, to look red, and swell in the face, about 20. dayes after (if some remedy be not taken in the meane time) to lye awake, to be pensive, sad, to see strange visions, to bark and howl, to fall into a swoun, and oftentimes fits of the falling sickness. [1523]Some say, little things like whelps will be seen in their urines. If any of these signes appear, they are past recovery.	In those affected, the fear of water begins fourteen days after the bite, though in some it does not begin until forty or sixty days later. Usually, Heurnius says, about twenty days after the bite—unless some remedy has been taken meanwhile—they begin to rave, avoid water and mirrors, grow red and swollen in the face, lie awake, become troubled and sad, see strange visions, bark and howl, faint, and often have fits of the falling sickness. Some say little things resembling puppies can be seen in their urine. If any of these signs appear, they are beyond recovery.[1524]

[1520] Burton. t. "Lib. 3. Cap. 13 de morbis acutis." On Acute Diseases 3.13.

[1521] Burton. u. "Spicel. 2." Second collection.

[1522] Editor. "Dry" here means thirsty. The idea of a hot, dry poison consuming bodily moisture belongs to historical humoral explanation. Modern accounts connect the difficulty drinking to painful spasms; Burton's dissection report is retained as a report, not accepted as the mechanism of rabies.

[1523] Burton. x. "Sckenkius 7. lib. de Venenis." Schenck, book 7, on poisons. The text uses an asterisk at the anchor, while the margin gives x.

[1524] Editor. "Glasses" is read here as mirrors. The supposed puppy-shaped objects in urine are an unverified historical claim. The marginal reference has x although the body uses an asterisk. The incubation periods and absolute prognosis in these paragraphs are reproduced as Burton's account, not as present clinical guidance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many times these symptoms will not appear till six or seven months after, saith [1525]Codronchus; and some times not till 7. or 8. years, as Guianerius; 12. as Albertus 6. or 8. months after, as Galen holds. Baldus the great lawyer died of it: an Augustin Frier, and a woman in Delph, that were [1526]Forrestus patients, were miserably consumed with it.	Often these symptoms do not appear until six or seven months afterwards, Codronchus says; sometimes not for seven or eight years, according to Guianerius; twelve years, according to Albertus; or six or eight months, as Galen holds. Baldus, the great jurist, died of it. An Augustinian friar and a woman in Delft, both patients of Forestus, were miserably destroyed by it.
The common cure in the country (for such at least as dwell neer the sea side) is to duck them over head and eares in sea water; some use charmes; every good wife can prescribe medicines. But the best cure to be had in such cases, is from the most approved Physicians; they that will read of them, may consult with Dioscorides lib. 6. c. 37. Heurnius, Hildesheim, Capivaccius, Forrestus, Sckenkius, and before all others Codronchus an Italian, who hath lately written two exquisite books of this subject.	The usual country cure, at least for people living near the coast, is to immerse them completely in seawater. Some use charms; every housewife can prescribe medicines. But the best treatment for such cases comes from the most reputable physicians. Readers who want to learn about these treatments may consult Dioscorides, book 6, chapter 37; Heurnius, Hildesheim, Capivaccius, Forestus and Schenck; and above all the Italian Codronchus, who has recently written two excellent books on the subject.[1527]

[1525] Burton. y. “Lib. de Hydrophobia.” Book on hydrophobia.

[1526] Burton. z. “Observat. lib. 10. 25.” Observations, book 10, item 25.

[1527] Editor. The seawater immersion and charms are historical practices. Modern prevention after exposure relies on prompt medical care and post-exposure prophylaxis; neither immersion nor charms substitutes for it. “Approved” means tried or reputable. “Exquisite” means carefully worked or excellent.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1528]Chorus sancti Viti, or S. Vitus dance; the lascivious dance, [1529]Paracelsus cals it, because they that are taken from it, can do nothing but dance till they be dead, or cured. It is so called, for that the parties so troubled were wont to go to S. Vitus for help, & after they had danced there a while, they were [1530]certainly freed.	Chorus sancti Viti, or St Vitus's dance—Paracelsus calls it the lascivious dance—is so named because those seized by it can do nothing but dance until they die or are cured. The name comes from the sufferers' former custom of going to St Vitus for help; after dancing there for a while, they were certainly relieved.[1531]
Source page 10–11 Tis strange to hear how long they will dance, & in what manner, over stooles, formes, tables, even great bellied women sometimes (and yet never hurt their children) will dance so long that they can stir neither hand nor foot, but seem to be quite dead. One in red clothes they cannot abide. Musick above all things they love, & therefore Magistrates in Germany will hire Musicians to play to them, & some lusty sturdy companions to dance with them.	It is astonishing to hear how long they dance, and in what manner: over stools, benches and tables. Even heavily pregnant women will sometimes dance so long—yet without ever harming their children—that they can move neither hand nor foot and seem quite dead. They cannot bear someone dressed in red. Above all, they love music, so magistrates in Germany hire musicians to play for them and strong, vigorous companions to dance with them.

[1528] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Chorus sancti Viti." St Vitus's dance.

[1529] Burton. a. "Lascivam Choream. To. 4. de morbis amentium. Tract. 1." Lascivious dance. Volume 4, On Diseases of the Mentally Deranged, treatise 1.

[1530] Burton. b. "Eventu ut plurimum rem ipsam comprobante." The outcome usually confirming the fact itself.

[1531] Editor. This passage describes reported compulsive or epidemic dancing, rather than establishing a single diagnosis. St Vitus's dance has been used for different conditions. The original "taken from it" is read as "seized by it"; the following account concerns visiting the saint's place of veneration for relief. Burton's "certainly" is qualified by the margin's "usually."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 11 This disease hath been very common in Germany, as appears by those relations of [1532]Sckenkius, & Paracelsus is his book of Madness, who brags how many several persons he hath cured of it. Fælix Platerus de mentis alienat. cap. 3. reports of a woman in Basil whom he saw, that danced a whole month together. The Arabians call it a kinde of Palsie. Bodine in his 5. Book de Repub. cap. 1. speakes of this infirmity; Monavius in his last Epistle to Scoltizius, and in another to Dudithus, where you may read more of it.	This disease has been very common in Germany, as the accounts of Schenck and of Paracelsus in his book on madness show; Paracelsus boasts of the many people he has cured. Felix Plater, in chapter 3 of his work on mental derangement, reports seeing a woman in Basel who danced for a whole month. The Arabian physicians call it a kind of palsy. Bodin discusses the disorder in book 5, chapter 1 of his Republic, as does Monavius in his last letter to Scoltizius and in another to Dudithus, where you may read more about it.
The last kinde of madness or melancholy, is that demoniacal (if I may so call it) obsession or possession of devils, which Platerus & others would have to be preternatural: stupend things are said of them, their actions, gestures, contortions, fasting, prophesying, speaking languages they were never taught, &c. many strange stories are related of them, which because some will not allow, (for Deacon and Darrel have written large volumes of this subject pro & con.) I voluntarily omit.	The last kind of madness or melancholy is demonic, if I may call it that: harassment or possession by devils, which Plater and others consider beyond nature. Astonishing things are told of those affected—their actions, gestures, contortions, fasting, prophecies, speaking languages they were never taught and so on. Many strange stories are related about them, but since some people reject these accounts—Deacon and Darrel have written substantial volumes on opposing sides of the question—I choose to omit them.[1533]

[1532] Burton. c. "Lib. 1. cap. de Mania." Book 1, chapter on madness.

[1533] Editor. "Preternatural" means beyond the ordinary course of nature. Burton alludes to the controversy between John Deacon and John Darrel: Deacon and John Walker's Dialogicall Discourses of Spirits and Divels appeared in 1601; Darrel's Survey answering them appeared in 1602. Burton's choice to omit the disputed stories is explicit, although he has just listed their alleged features.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Fuschius institut. lib. 3. sect. 1. cap. 11. [1534]Felix Plater, [1535]Laurentius adde to these another Fury that proceeds from Love, & another from Study, another divine or religious fury; but these more properly belong to Melancholy; of all which I will speak [1536]apart, intending to write a whole book of them.	Fuchs, in his Institutes, book 3, section 1, chapter 11, Felix Plater and Laurentius add another frenzy arising from love, another from study, and another divine or religious frenzy. These, however, belong more properly to melancholy. I shall discuss them separately, intending to devote a whole book to them.[1537]

[1534] Burton. d. "Cap. 3. de mentis alienat." Chapter 3, on mental derangement.

[1535] Burton. e. "Cap. 4. de mel." Chapter 4, on melancholy.

[1536] Burton. Asterisked: "PART 3." The Third Partition.

[1537] Editor. The margin points to the Third Partition, whose synopsis includes love melancholy and religious melancholy. The inclusion of study in the preceding list should not be taken to mean that the Third Partition is a separate treatise on scholarly melancholy; Burton discusses its causes earlier as well.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 5. Melancholy in disposition, improperly so called, *Æ*quivocations.	Subsection 5. Melancholy as a passing state, loosely so called; the different meanings of the word.
Melancholy, the subject of our present Discourse, is either in Disposition, or Habit. In Disposition, is that transitory Melancholy which goes and comes upon every smal occasion of sorrow, need, sickness, trouble, fear, grief, passion, or perturbation of the minde, any manner of care, discontent, or thought, which causeth anguish, dulness, heaviness and vexation of spirit, any wayes opposite to pleasure, mirth, joy, delight, causing frowardness in us, or a dislike. In which equivocal & improper sense, we cal him melancholy, that is dull, sad, sowre, lumpish, ill disposed, solitary, any way moved, or displeased.	Melancholy, the subject of our present discussion, is either a passing state or an established condition. As a passing state, it is the temporary melancholy that comes and goes with every small occasion of sorrow, want, sickness, trouble, fear, grief, passion or disturbance of mind: any sort of care, discontent or anxious thought that causes anguish, dullness, heaviness and distress of spirit, opposing pleasure, mirth, joy and delight, and making us peevish or dissatisfied. In this loose and imprecise sense, we call someone melancholy who is dull, sad, sour, listless, out of sorts, solitary, or in any way upset or displeased.[1538]
And from these Melancholy Dispositions, [1539]no man living is free, no Stoick, none so wise, none so happy, none so patient, so generous, so godly, so divine that can vindicate himself; so well composed, but more or less, sometime or other he feeles the smart of it. Melancholy in this sense is the character of Mortality. [1540]Man that is borne of a woman, is of short continuance, and full of trouble.	No living person is free from these melancholy states: no Stoic, no one so wise, happy, patient, noble-minded, godly or holy that he can claim exemption; no one so composed that he does not, sooner or later, feel its sting in some degree. Melancholy in this sense is the mark of mortality. “Man born of woman is short-lived and full of trouble.”[1541]

[1538] Editor. “Disposition” and “habit” distinguish a temporary state from an enduring condition, not merely a mood from a repeated behaviour. “Equivocations” concerns different senses of the word melancholy, rather than deliberate deception. Burton’s historical category is broader than a modern diagnosis of depression; his moral language and causal account are preserved.

[1539] Burton. f. “De quo homine securitas, de quo certũ gaudium? quocunq; se convertit, in terrenis rebus amaritudinem animi inveniet. Aug. in psal. 8.5.” From what person comes security, from whom sure joy? Wherever he turns, he will find bitterness of spirit in earthly things. Augustine on the Psalms. The printed reference is discussed in the editorial note.

[1540] Burton. Asterisked: “Job 1.14.” The printed numbers are retained; the passage is Job 14:1.

[1541] Editor. The biblical passage is Job 14:1; the margin reverses its numbers. The Augustine quotation in the preceding marginal note corresponds to Exposition of Psalm 85.7, commenting on verse 5 (Psalm 86 in most English Bibles). The printed “8.5” is retained. “Character” here means a distinguishing mark; “generous” means noble or high-minded.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Zeno, Cato, Socrates himself, whom [1542]Ælian so highly commends for a moderate temper, that nothing could disturb him, but going out, and coming in, still Socrates kept the same serenity of countenance, what misery soever befell him, (if we may believe Plato his Disciple) was much tormented with it.	Zeno, Cato, even Socrates—whom Aelian praises so highly for a balanced temper that nothing could disturb him, always keeping the same serene expression whether coming in or going out, whatever misfortune befell him—were greatly tormented by it, if we may believe Socrates's disciple Plato.[1543]
Q. Metellus, in whom [1544]Valerius gives instance of all happiness, the most fortunate man then living, borne in that most flourishing city of Rome, of noble parentage, a proper man of person, well qualified, healthful, rich, honourable, a Senatour, a Consul, happy in his wife, happy in his children, &c. yet this man was not void of Melancholy, he had his share of sorrow.	Quintus Metellus, whom Valerius presents as an example of complete happiness, was the most fortunate man then living: born in the flourishing city of Rome, of noble parentage, handsome, accomplished, healthy, rich and honoured; a senator and consul, fortunate in his wife and children, and so on. Yet even he was not free from melancholy: he had his share of sorrow.[1545]

[1542] Burton. g. "Omni tempore Socratẽ eodem vultu videri, sive domũ rediret, sive domo egrederetur." Socrates was always seen with the same expression, whether returning home or going out. Printed abbreviations stand for Socratem and domum.

[1543] Editor. Zeno, the Stoic founder, and Cato are conventional examples of self-command. Aelian, Various History 9.7, reports Xanthippe's account of Socrates keeping the same expression when leaving and returning home. Burton's contrasting claim that Socrates suffered distress supports his argument that no one escapes sorrow. Its attribution to Plato remains unverified; it is not an established retrospective diagnosis.

[1544] Burton. h. "Lib. 7. cap. 1. Natus in florentissima totius orbis civitate, nobilissimis parentibus, corporis vires habuit & rarissimas animi dotes, uxorem conspicuam, pudicam, felices liberos, consulare decus, sequentes triumphos, &c." Book 7, chapter 1. Born in the most flourishing city in the world, of the noblest parents, he possessed bodily strength and exceptional gifts of mind, a distinguished and chaste wife, fortunate children, consular honours and successive triumphs, etc.

[1545] Editor. Valerius Maximus 7.1.1 describes Metellus's remarkable good fortune and peaceful death, explicitly presenting his family history as free of bereavement and cause for grief. Burton adds his own insistence that even this exemplary life included sorrow; the addition is not Valerius's conclusion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 11–12 [1546]Polycrates Samius, that flung his ring into the sea, because he would participate of discontent with others, and had it miraculously restored to him again shortly after, by a fish taken as he angled, was not free from Melancholy dispositions.	Polycrates of Samos, who threw his ring into the sea so that he might share in other people's unhappiness, and miraculously recovered it soon afterwards in a fish caught while he was angling, was not free from melancholy states.[1547]
Source page 12 No man can cure himself; the very gods had bitter pangs, & frequent passions, as their own [1548]Poets put upon them. In general, [1549]as the heaven, so is our life, sometimes fair, sometimes overcast, tempestuous, and serene; as in a rose, flowers and prickles; in the year it self, a temperate summer sometimes, a hard winter, a drowth, and then again pleasant showrs: so is our life intermixt with joyes, hopes, feares, sorrowes, calumnies: Invicem cedunt dolor & voluptas, there is a succession of pleasure and paine.	No one can cure himself; even the gods had bitter pangs and frequent passions, as their own poets portray them. In general, our life is like the sky: sometimes fair, sometimes overcast, stormy and calm. As a rose has flowers and thorns, and the year brings a mild summer, a harsh winter, drought and then refreshing showers, so our life is interwoven with joys, hopes, fears, sorrows and slanders. Pleasure and pain follow one another in turn.
[1550]——medio de fonte leporum, Surgit amari aliquid in ipsis floribus angat.	From the very fountain of delights Something bitter rises to sting amid the flowers.[1551]

[1546] Burton. i. "Ælian." Aelian; no book or chapter supplied.

[1547] Editor. Burton names Aelian without a location. In the familiar account in Herodotus, Histories 3.40–43, a fisherman catches the fish and gives it to Polycrates; Polycrates does not catch it himself. The ring is found when servants prepare the fish. Burton's different version remains in both columns; the exact Aelian source has not been established.

[1548] Burton. k. "Homer. Iliad." Homer, Iliad.

[1549] Burton. l. "Lipsius cent. 3 ep. 45. ut cælum, sic nos homines sumus: illud ex intervallo nubibus obducitur & obscuratur. In rosario flores spinis intermixti. Vita similis aeri, udum modo, sudum, tempestas, serenitas: ita vices rerum sunt, præmia gaudiis, & sequaces curæ." Lipsius, third century of letters, letter 45. We humans are like the sky, which is at intervals covered and darkened by clouds. In a rose garden flowers mingle with thorns. Life is like the weather: now wet, now dry, storm and calm. So things alternate: rewards bring joys, and cares follow.

[1550] Burton. m. "Lucretius l. 4. 1124." Lucretius, book 4, line 1124 as printed. See the editorial note for the present line numbering.

[1551] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 4.1133–34, in a passage on the troubles of erotic desire. The printed margin gives 1124. Burton omits "quod" before "in ipsis floribus"; the original column follows his shorter quotation. The translation is new.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Even in the midst of laughing there is sorrow, (as [1552]Solomon holds:) even in the midst of all our feasting and jollity, as [1553]Austin infers in his Com. on the 41. Psal. there is grief and discontent. Inter delitias semper aliquid sævi nos strangulat, for a pinte of hony thou shalt here likely find a gallon of gaul, for a dram of pleasure a pound of pain, for an inch of mirth an ell of mone; as Ivie doth an Oke, these miseries encompass our life.	"Even in the midst of laughter there is sorrow," as Solomon says. Even amid all our feasting and merriment, as Augustine concludes in his commentary on Psalm 41, there is grief and discontent. "Among our delights, something cruel is always choking us." Here, for a pint of honey you will probably find a gallon of gall; for a dram of pleasure, a pound of pain; for an inch of mirth, an ell of mourning. These miseries wind around our life as ivy winds around an oak.[1554]
And 'tis most absurd & ridiculous, for any mortal man to look for a perpetual tenor of happiness in his life. Nothing so prosperous & pleasant, but it hath [1555]some bitterness in it, some complaining, some grudging; 'tis all γλυκὺπικρον, a mixt passion, and like a Chequer table black and white, men, families, cities, have their falls & wanes, now trines, sextiles, then quartiles and oppositions.	It is utterly absurd and ridiculous for any mortal to expect an uninterrupted course of happiness in life. Nothing is so prosperous and pleasant that it contains no bitterness, no cause for complaint or discontent. Everything is bittersweet, a mixture of feelings, like the black and white squares of a chessboard. People, families and cities have their falls and declines: now trines and sextiles, then squares and oppositions.[1556]

[1552] Burton. n. "Prov. 14.3. Extremum gaudii luctus occupat." Proverbs 14:3 as printed: sorrow takes possession of the end of joy. The relevant verse is Proverbs 14:13.

[1553] Burton. o. "Natalitia inquit celebrantur, nuptiæ hic sunt; at ibi quid celebratur quod non dolet, quod non transit?" Birthdays, he says, are celebrated; here there are weddings. But there, what is celebrated that does not grieve, that does not pass away? The quotation is compressed and awkward as printed; compare Augustine, Exposition of Psalm 41.9, on earthly festivals and the unending festival in God's house.

[1554] Editor. The proverb is Proverbs 14:13, not the printed 14:3. Augustine's Exposition of Psalm 41.9 contrasts passing earthly celebrations with the permanent joy of God's house; Burton abbreviates it. An ell is a cloth measure much longer than an inch. A dram is a small weight. The accumulating mismatched measures exaggerate the excess of pain over pleasure. The source of "Inter delitias…" remains unlocated.

[1555] Burton. p. "Apuleius 4. florid. Nihil quicquid homini tam prosperum divinitus datum, quin ei admixtum sit aliquid difficultatis ut etiam amplissima quaque lætitiâ, subsit quæpiam vel parva querimonia conjugatione quadam mellis, & fellis." Apuleius, Florida, book 4 as cited. Nothing so fortunate is bestowed on a person by divine power that no difficulty is mixed with it; even the greatest joy contains some complaint, however small, in a mingling of honey and gall. The passage appears in Florida 18 in the text consulted.

[1556] Editor. The Greek means "bittersweet." A chequer table is a chequered gaming board. Trines and sextiles are astrological aspects conventionally regarded as favourable; squares and oppositions are unfavourable. "Falls & wanes" is the wording of the scan, retained rather than silently changed to a more symmetrical expression.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We are not here as those Angels; celestiall powers and Bodies, Sunne and Moone, to finish our course without all offence, with such constancy, to continue for so many ages: but subject to infirmities, miseries, interrupt, tossed and tumbled up and down, carried about with every small blast, often molested and disquieted upon each slender occasion, [1557]uncertain, brittle, and so is all that we trust unto.	We are not here like the angels, the celestial powers and heavenly bodies, the sun and moon, completing our course without mishap and continuing steadily for so many ages. We are subject to infirmities and miseries, interrupted, tossed and tumbled up and down, blown about by every little gust, often troubled and unsettled by the slightest occasion: uncertain and fragile, as is everything we trust in.
[1558]And he that knows not this, & is not armed to endure it, is not fit to live in this world (as one condoles our time) he knows not the condition of it, where with a reciprocalty, pleasure and paine are still united, and succeed one another in a ring. Exi è mundo, get thee gone hence if thou canst not brook it;	Anyone who does not know this, and is not prepared to endure it, is unfit to live in this world —as one writer laments of our times. He does not understand its nature: pleasure and pain are always linked, following one another in a circle. Leave the world, then; be gone from here if you cannot bear it.
There is no way to avoid it, but to arme thy self with patience, with magnanimity, to [1559]oppose thy self unto it, to suffer affliction as a good souldier of Christ; as [1560]Paul adviseth constantly to bear it.	There is no escaping it: you must arm yourself with patience and courage, stand firm against it, and endure hardship as a good soldier of Christ, as Paul advises, bearing it steadfastly.[1561]

[1557] Burton. q. “Caduca nimirum & fragilia, & puerilibus consentanea crepundiis sunt ista quæ vires & opes humanæ vocantur, affluunt subito, repente delabuntur, nullo in loco, nulla in persona, stabilibus nixa radicibus consistunt, sed incertissimo flatu fortunæ quos in sublime extulerunt improviso recursu destitutos in profundo miseriarum valle miserabiliter immergunt. Valerius lib. 6. cap. 11.” What we call human strength and riches is perishable, fragile, like children’s toys: suddenly it pours in, abruptly slips away, and takes firm root in no place or person. Those it has lifted high on fortune’s most uncertain breath it abandons in an unforeseen reversal, plunging them wretchedly into the deep valley of misery. Valerius, book 6, chapter 11 as printed. The passage corresponds to the concluding paragraph of 6.9 in the consulted Latin text.

[1558] Burton. r. “Huic seculo parum aptus es, aut potius omnium nostrorum conditionem ignoras, quibus reciproco quodam nexu, &c. Lorchanus Gallobelgicus lib. 3. ad annum 1598.” You are ill suited to this age, or rather you do not know the condition of us all, for whom, by a certain reciprocal bond, etc. Lorchanus Gallobelgicus, book 3, under the year 1598; the exact source remains to be identified.

[1559] Burton. s. “Horsum omnia studia dirigi debent, ut humana fortiter feramus.” All our efforts should be directed towards bearing the human condition bravely.

[1560] Burton. t. “2 Tim. 2 3.” 2 Timothy 2:3.

[1561] Editor. 2 Timothy 2:3 supplies the image of enduring hardship as a soldier of Christ. Burton’s abrupt “Leave the world” is part of his rhetorical demand that readers accept mortal suffering; the paragraph immediately turns to endurance and patience.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But forasmuch as so few can embrace this good counsel of his, or use it aright, but rather as so many bruit beasts, give a way to their passion, voluntary subject & precipitate themselves into a Labyrinth of cares, woes, miseries, & suffer their souls to be overcome by them, cannot arme themselves with that patience as they ought to do, it falleth out oftentimes that these Dispositions become Habits,	But so few can accept this good counsel or put it into practice. Instead, like so many brute beasts, they give way to their passions, willingly subjecting themselves to them and plunging into a labyrinth of cares, woes and miseries. They allow these to overwhelm their souls and cannot arm themselves with the patience they should. It therefore often happens that these passing states become established conditions.
Source page 12–13 and many Affects contemned (as [1562]Seneca notes) make a disease. Even as one Distillation, not yet grown to custome, makes a cough, but continual and inveterate causeth a consumption of the lungs: so do these our melancholy provocations: and according as the humor it self is intended, or remitted in men, as their temperature of body, or Rational soul is better able to make resistance: so are they more or less affected.	As Seneca observes, repeated emotional disturbances, when neglected, become a disease. Just as a single catarrhal discharge, not yet habitual, produces a cough, while a persistent and long-standing one causes a wasting disease of the lungs, so do these provocations to melancholy. People are affected more or less according to the strength or weakness of the humour itself, and the ability of their bodily constitution or rational soul to resist it.[1563]

[1562] Burton. u. “Epist. 96. lib. 10. affectus frequentes contemptiq; morbum faciunt. Distillatio una nec adhuc in morem adaucta, tussim facit, assidua & violenta pthisim.” Letter 96, book 10 as printed. Repeated and disregarded passions produce disease. One discharge of rheum, not yet habitual, produces a cough; a persistent and violent one produces consumption. The printed abbreviation expands to contemptique; the underlying passage is Seneca, Letter 75.12.

[1563] Editor. The comparison occurs in Seneca, Moral Letters 75.12, where repeated and neglected passions become lasting disorders. Burton’s marginal numbering and some Latin wording differ from the consulted text. “Distillation” means a flow of rheum or catarrhal fluid; “consumption” means wasting illness. “Temperature” is the body’s mixture of qualities, and “intended” means intensified. The analogy belongs to historical medicine.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 13 For that which is but a flea-biting to one, causeth insufferable torment to another; & which one by his singular moderation, and well composed carriage can happily overcome, a second is no whit able to sustaine; but upon every small occasion of misconceived abuse, injury, grief, disgrace, loss, cross, rumor, &c. (if solitary, or idle) yeelds so far to passion, that his complexion is altered, his digestion hindred, his sleepe gone, his spirits obscured, and his heart heavy, his Hypocondries misaffected; winde, crudity, on a sudden overtake him, and he himself overcome with Melancholy.	What is no more than a flea bite to one person causes unbearable torment to another. What one can readily overcome through exceptional moderation and composure, another cannot endure at all. At the slightest occasion of supposed insult, injury, grief, disgrace, loss, setback, rumour and the like—especially if solitary or idle—he gives way so far to emotion that his bodily constitution changes, his digestion is impaired, his sleep disappears, his spirits grow clouded, his heart heavy, and the regions beneath his ribs become disordered. Wind and indigestion suddenly assail him, and melancholy overwhelms him.[1564]
As it is with a man imprisoned for debt, if once in the goale, every Creditor will bring his action against him, and there likely hold him: If any discontent seize upon a patient, in an instant all other perturbations (for — qua data porta ruunt) will set upon him, and then like a lame dog or broken winged goose he droops and pines away, and is brought at last to that ill habit or malady of melancholy it self.	It is like a man imprisoned for debt: once he is in jail, every creditor will bring a claim against him and probably keep him there. If any discontent takes hold of a sufferer, all other disturbances immediately attack him—for “they rush through the opening they are given.” Then, like a lame dog or a goose with a broken wing, he droops and wastes away, until he is brought into that unhealthy established condition, the disease of melancholy itself.[1565]

[1564] Editor. “Complexion” means bodily constitution, not facial colour. The hypochondria are the upper abdominal regions beneath the ribs, not the modern condition called hypochondria. “Crudity” means insufficient digestion. “Misconceived abuse” is rendered “supposed insult,” preserving Burton’s suggestion that the perceived offence may have been misunderstood.

[1565] Editor. The Latin is from Virgil, Aeneid 1.83: the winds rush through the opening made by Aeolus. Burton applies that image to emotions entering together once a breach has opened. “Habit” again means a settled condition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So that as the Philosophers make [1566]eight degrees of heat and cold: we may make 88. of Melancholy; as the parts affected are diversly seized with it, or have been plunged more or less into this infernal gulf, or waded deeper into it.	Thus, just as the philosophers distinguish eight degrees of heat and cold, we may distinguish eighty-eight of melancholy, according to the different ways the affected parts are seized by it, or have been plunged more or less deeply into this hellish gulf, or have waded further into it.[1567]
But all these Melancholy fits, howsoever pleasing at first, or displeasing, violent & tyrannizing over those whom they seize on for the time; yet these fits I say, or men affected, are but improperly so called, because they continue not, but come and go, as by some objects they are moved. This Melancholy of which we are to treat, is an habit, morbus sonticus, or Chronicus, a Chronick or continuate disease, a setled humor, as [1568]Aurelianus, and [1569]others call it, not errant, but fixed; and as it was long increasing, so now being (pleasant, or painful) grown to an habit, it will hardly be removed.	But all these melancholy fits—however pleasing at first, or displeasing, violent and tyrannical towards those they seize for a time—are called melancholy only in a loose sense, as are the people affected by them. They do not last, but come and go as particular things provoke them. The melancholy we shall examine is an established condition, a serious or chronic illness: a lasting disease, a settled humour, as Aurelianus and others call it, fixed rather than wandering. Just as it took a long time to develop, so now, whether pleasant or painful, having become established, it will be hard to remove.[1570]

[1566] Burton. x. “Calidum ad octo: frigidum ad octo. Una hirundo non facit æstatem.” Hot to the eighth degree; cold to the eighth degree. One swallow does not make a summer.

[1567] Editor. The eighty-eight degrees are Burton’s rhetorical multiplication of the philosophers’ eight, not a numbered diagnostic scale. The appended proverb about one swallow reinforces his distinction between a passing occurrence and a lasting state.

[1568] Burton. y. “Lib. 1. c. 6.” Book 1, chapter 6.

[1569] Burton. z. “Fuschius. l. 3. sec. cap. 7. Hildesheim fol. 130.” Fuchs, book 3, section, chapter 7, as printed; Hildesheim, folio 130.

[1570] Editor. “Morbus sonticus” means a serious or disabling disease; “chronicus” means chronic. “Errant” describes a wandering or unfixed condition. Burton allows that melancholy may be experienced as pleasant as well as painful, a qualification retained here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SECT. 1. MEMB. 1. SUBSEC. 4. Digression of Anatomy.	Section 1. Member 2. Subsection 1. A digression on anatomy.[1571]
Before I proceed to define the Disease of Melancholy, what it is, or to discourse farther of it, I hold it not impertinent to make a brief Digression of the anatomy of the body and faculties of the soul, for the better understanding of that which is to follow; because many hard words will often occur, as Myrache, Hypocondries, Hemrods, &c. Imagination, Reason, Humors, Spirits, Vital, Natural, Animal, Nerves, Veines, Arteries, Chylus, Pituita; which of the vulgar will not so easily be perceived, what they are, how sited, and to what end they serve.	Before defining the disease of melancholy or discussing it further, I think it appropriate to make a brief digression on the anatomy of the body and the faculties of the soul, to make what follows easier to understand. Many difficult words will recur: myrache, hypochondria, haemorrhoids, imagination, reason, humours, vital, natural and animal spirits, nerves, veins, arteries, chyle and phlegm. Ordinary readers will not readily understand what these are, where they are situated or what purpose they serve.[1572]

[1571] Editor. The heading in the scan reads “Sect. 1. Memb. 1. Subsec. 4.” Its place in the work, the page’s running head “Memb. 2. Subf. 1,” and the following subsections identify it as Member 2, Subsection 1. The original column preserves the printed error; the modern heading corrects it.

[1572] Editor. “Myrache” is an old anatomical term for the abdominal covering; “hypochondria” are the regions beneath the ribs. “Hemrods” can refer here to haemorrhoidal veins, named later in the subsection on veins. “Vulgar” means ordinary or unlearned readers. Burton is establishing the vocabulary of his inherited physiology, not offering a modern account of bodily function.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 13–14 And besides, it may peradventure give occasion to some men, to examine more accurately, search farther into this most excellent subject, and thereupon with that Royal [1573]Prophet to praise God, (for a man is fearfully and wonderfully made, and curiously wrought) that have time and leisure enough, & are sufficiently informed in all other worldly businesses, as to make a good bargain, buy and sell, to keep and make choice of a faire Hauke, Hound, Horse, &c. But for such matters as concerne the knowledge of themselves, they are wholly ignorant and careless, they know not what this Body and Soul are, how combined, of what parts and faculties they consist, or how a man differs from a Dog.	Besides, this may encourage some people to examine this excellent subject more closely, investigate it further, and, with the royal prophet, praise God—for man is fearfully and wonderfully made, and intricately fashioned. These people have time and leisure enough, and know all about other worldly affairs: how to strike a good bargain, buy and sell, or choose and keep a fine hawk, hound or horse. Yet in matters concerning knowledge of themselves, they are completely ignorant and careless. They do not know what body and soul are, how they are joined, what parts and faculties they possess, or how a human being differs from a dog.[1574]
Source page 14 And what can be more ignominious and filthy (as [1575]Melancthon well inveighes) then for a man not to know the structure and composition of his own body, especially since the knowledge of it tends so much to the preservation of his health, and information of his manners?	What could be more shameful and disgraceful, as Melanchthon rightly protests, than not knowing the structure and composition of one's own body, especially when that knowledge contributes so much to preserving health and shaping conduct?

[1573] Burton. Asterisked: "Psal. 139.13." Psalm 139:13 as printed; the quoted wording is in verses 14–15.

[1574] Editor. The royal prophet is the psalmist David. Burton cites Psalm 139:13, but "fearfully and wonderfully made" and "curiously wrought" occur in verses 14–15. "Curiously" means intricately or skilfully. His contrast is between expertise in worldly pursuits and ignorance of one's own body and soul.

[1575] Burton. a. "De Anima. Turpe enim est homini ignorare sui corporis (ut ita dicam) ædificium, præsertim cum ad valetudinem et mores hæc cognitio plurimum conducat." On the Soul. It is shameful for a person to be ignorant of the architecture, so to speak, of his own body, especially since this knowledge contributes greatly to health and conduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To stir them up therefore to this study, to peruse those elaborate workes of [1576]Galen, Bauhinus, Plater, Vesalius, Falopius, Laurentius, Remelinus, &c. which have written copiously in Latine; or that which some of our industrious Countrimen have done in our mother tongue, not long since, as that translation of [1577]Columbus, and [1578]Microcosmographia, in 13. bookes, I have made this brief digression.	I have therefore made this brief digression to encourage them to study the subject: to read the extensive works of Galen, Bauhin, Plater, Vesalius, Falloppio, Laurentius, Remmelin and others who have written at length in Latin; or the recent work of some of our industrious countrymen in our own language, such as the translation of Columbus and the thirteen books of Microcosmographia.[1579]
Also because [1580]Wecker, [1581]Melancthon, [1582]Fernelius, [1583]Fuschius, and those tedious Tracts de Animâ (or such have more compendiously handled & written of this matter) are not at all times ready to be had, to give them some small tast, or notice of the rest, let this Epitome suffice.	Moreover, because Wecker, Melanchthon, Fernel, Fuchs and those lengthy treatises on the soul—or writers who have treated this subject more briefly—are not always readily available, let this summary suffice to give readers a small taste or an indication of the rest.

[1576] Burton. b. “De usu part.” On the Use of the Parts, Galen’s work on bodily structures and their functions.

[1577] Burton. c. “History of man.” See the editorial note on the English anatomical works.

[1578] Burton. d. “D. Crooke.” Doctor Crooke.

[1579] Editor. “Columbus” is Realdo Colombo. “History of man” probably means John Banister’s The Historie of Man (1578). Its title describes a compilation; in book 1, folio 14, Banister explicitly draws on both Vesalius and Colombo. This supports the identification without establishing Burton’s precise basis for calling it a translation. Crooke’s Microcosmographia (1615) names Bauhin and Laurentius among its chief sources.

[1580] Burton. e. “In Syntaxi.” In the Syntaxis.

[1581] Burton. f. “De Anima.” On the Soul.

[1582] Burton. g. “Instit. lib. 1.” Institutes, book 1.

[1583] Burton. h. “Physiol. l. 1, 2.” Physiology, books 1 and 2.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 2. Division of the Body, Humours, Spirits.	Subsection 2. Divisions of the body, humours and spirits.
Of the parts of the Body, there be many divisions: The most approved is that of [1584]Laurentius, out of Hippocrates: which is, into parts contained, or containing. Contained, are either Humors, or Spirits.	There are many ways of dividing the parts of the body. The most widely accepted is Laurentius's, taken from Hippocrates: into what the body contains and the parts that contain it. What it contains consists of humours or spirits.[1585]
[1586]A humor is a liquid or fluent part of the body, comprehended in it, for the preservation of it; and is either innate or borne with us, or adventitious and acquisite. The radical or innate, is daily supplied by nourishment, which some call Cambium, and make those secundary humors of Ros and Gluten to maintaine it: or acquisite, to maintain these four first primary Humors, coming and proceeding from the first concoction in the Liver, by which meanes Chylus is excluded.	A humour is a liquid or flowing part of the body, contained within it for its preservation. It is either innate, present from birth, or acquired. The radical, or innate, humour is replenished daily by nourishment, which some call cambium; they hold that the secondary humours ros and gluten sustain it. Acquired humour sustains the four primary humours, which arise from the first digestive processing in the liver, by which chyle is separated out.[1587]

[1584] Burton. i. "Anat. l. 1. c. 18." Anatomy, book 1, chapter 18.

[1585] Editor. "Contained" parts are the fluids and spirits; "containing" parts are the more solid structures treated next. Humours here are bodily fluids, while spirits are subtle material intermediaries used to explain the body's operations. These words do not carry their usual modern conversational meanings.

[1586] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Humors."

[1587] Editor. This compressed account of nutrition is syntactically difficult. The modern version separates innate from acquired humour while preserving Burton's stated sequence. Cambium, ros ("dew") and gluten ("glue") are technical names in historical theories of nourishment; gluten here is not the modern food protein. "Concoction" is digestive transformation. The reference to a first concoction in the liver is retained alongside the subsequent description of chyle as the product of stomach digestion. Collation with his medical sources remains pending.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some divide them into profitable, and excrementitious. But [1588]Crato out of Hippocrates will have all four to be juyces, and not excrements, without which no living creature can be sustained: which four, though they be comprehended in the mass of Blood, yet they have their several affections, by which they are distinguished from one another, and from those adventitious, peccant, or [1589]diseased humors, as Melancthon calls them.	Some divide humours into useful fluids and waste products. But Crato, following Hippocrates, considers all four to be juices rather than waste, indispensable to the life of every creature. Although all four are included in the mass of blood, each has distinct properties by which it is distinguished from the others, and from the acquired, faulty or diseased humours, as Melanchthon calls them.
[1590]Bloud, is a hot, sweet, temperate, red humor, prepared in the Meseraicke veines, and made of the most temperate parts of the Chylus in the Liver, whose office is to nourish the whole body, to give it strength and colour, being dispersed by the veines, through every part of it. And from it Spirits are first begotten in the heart, which afterwards by the Arteries are communicated to the other parts.	Blood is a hot, sweet, temperate, red humour, prepared in the mesenteric veins and made in the liver from the most temperate parts of the chyle. Its function is to nourish the whole body and give it strength and colour, being distributed through every part by the veins. From it, spirits are first generated in the heart and then conveyed through the arteries to the other parts.[1591]
Pituita, or Phlegme, is a cold and moist humor, begotten of the colder part of the Chylus, (or white juyce coming out of the meat digested in the stomack) in the Liver; his office is to nourish and moisten the members of the body, which as the tongue, are moved, that they be not over dry.	Pituita, or phlegm, is a cold, moist humour generated in the liver from the colder part of the chyle—the white juice derived from food digested in the stomach. Its function is to nourish and moisten the moving parts of the body, such as the tongue, so that they do not become too dry.
Choler, is hot and dry, bitter, begotten of the hotter parts of the Chylus, and gathered to the Gall: it helps the natural heat and senses, and serves to the expelling of excrements.	Choler is hot, dry and bitter, generated from the hotter parts of the chyle and collected in the gallbladder. It assists the body's natural heat and senses, and helps expel waste.

[1588] Burton. k. "In Micro. succos, sine quibus animal sustentari non potest." In the Micro[...]. Juices without which a living creature cannot be sustained. The work-title abbreviation is left unexpanded.

[1589] Burton. l. "Morbosos humores." Diseased humours.

[1590] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Bloud."

[1591] Editor. The meseraic or mesenteric veins serve the intestinal region. "Temperate" means balanced in qualities. This is a humoral account in which the liver prepares blood and the heart generates spirits; the statement is preserved as historical physiology.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 15 [1592]Melancholy, cold and dry, thick, black, and sowre, begotten of the more fæculent part of nourishment, and purged from the spleen, is a bridle to the other two hot humours, Bloud and Choler, preserving them in the Bloud, and nourishing the bones. These four humors have some analogy with the four Elements, and to the four ages in man.	Melancholy is cold and dry, thick, black and sour, generated from the more sedimentary part of nourishment and purged from the spleen. It restrains the two hot humours, blood and choler, preserving them within the blood and nourishing the bones. These four humours have certain correspondences with the four elements and the four ages of human life.[1593]
To these humors you may adde [1594]Serum, which is the matter of Urine, and those excrementitious humors of the third Concoction, Sweat, and Teares.	To these humours you may add serum, the substance from which urine is made, and sweat and tears, the waste humours produced by the third stage of digestive processing.[1595]
[1596]Spirit is a most subtile vapour, which is expressed from the Bloud, & the instrument of the soule, to perform all his actions; a common tye or medium betwixt the body and the soul, as some will have it; or as [1597]Paracelsus, a fourth soul of it self. Melancthon holds the fountain of these spirits to be the Heart, begotten there; and afterward convayed to the Brain, they take another nature to them.	Spirit is an extremely fine vapour extracted from the blood, the soul's instrument for carrying out all its actions. Some consider it a shared link or medium between body and soul; Paracelsus considers it a fourth soul in its own right. Melanchthon holds that these spirits originate in the heart: generated there and then conveyed to the brain, they acquire a different nature.[1598]

[1592] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Melancholy."

[1593] Editor. Here "melancholy" names black bile, one of the four humours, rather than an emotion or disease. "Choler" is yellow bile. The other two are blood and phlegm. "Fæculent" means dreggy or sedimentary. The elements and ages are correspondences within this system, not chemical or biological identities.

[1594] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Serum, Sweat, Teares."

[1595] Editor. "Serum" here is the watery constituent associated with urine, not a precise equivalent of modern laboratory serum. The third concoction is the final processing of nourishment in the bodily parts. Burton's anatomical vocabulary is retained while its historical sense is explained.

[1596] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Spirits."

[1597] Burton. a. "Spiritalis anima." A spiritual soul. The printed label returns to a here.

[1598] Editor. "Subtile" means exceedingly fine in substance. The spirits are conceived as material vapours mediating between soul and body. Paracelsus's "fourth soul" is reported without a work or passage; its exact reference remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of these spirits there be three kinds, according to the three principall parts, Brain, Heart, Liver; Natural, Vital, Animal. The Natural are begotten in the Liver, and thence dispersed through the Veins, to perform those natural actions. The Vital Spirits are made in the Heart of the Natural, which by the Arteries are transported to all the other parts: if these Spirits cease, then life ceaseth, as in a Syncope or Swouning. The Animal spirits formed of the Vital, brought up to the Brain, and diffused by the Nerves, to the subordinate Members, give sense and motion to them all.	There are three kinds of spirit, corresponding to the three principal organs—the brain, heart and liver: natural, vital and animal. Natural spirits are generated in the liver and distributed through the veins to carry out the natural functions. Vital spirits are made in the heart from the natural spirits and conveyed through the arteries to all the other parts. If these spirits cease, life ceases, as in syncope or fainting. Animal spirits, formed from the vital spirits, are carried up to the brain and distributed through the nerves to the parts under its control, giving sensation and movement to them all.[1599]

[1599] Editor. Natural, vital and animal spirits correspond respectively to liver, heart and brain; Burton's opening lists put the organs in a different order. "Animal" concerns the animate soul's powers of sensation and movement, not animals as opposed to humans. The equation between cessation of life and fainting belongs to this historical explanatory model.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 3. Similar parts.	Subsection 3. Uniform parts.
[1600]Containing parts, by reason of their more solid substance, are either Homogeneal, or Heterogeneal, Similar, or Dissimilar; so Aristotle divides them, lib. 1. cap. 1. de hist. Animal. Laurentius cap. 20. lib. 1. Similar, or Homogeneal, are such, as if they be divided, are still severed into parts of the same nature, as water into water. Of these some be Spermatical, some Fleshie, or Carnal.	The containing parts, being more solid in substance, are either homogeneous or heterogeneous, uniform or non-uniform. Aristotle divides them in this way in his History of Animals, book 1, chapter 1, as does Laurentius in book 1, chapter 20. Uniform, or homogeneous, parts are those which, when divided, yield parts of the same nature, as water divides into water. Some of these derive from seed; others are fleshy.[1601]
[1602]Spermatical are such as are immediately begotten of the Seed, which are Bones, Gristles, Ligaments, Membranes, Nerves, Arteries, Veines, Skins, Fibers or strings, Fat.	Parts derived from seed are those generated directly from it: bones, cartilage, ligaments, membranes, nerves, arteries, veins, skin, fibres or strands, and fat.[1603]
The [1604]bones are dry and hard, begotten of the thickest of the seed, to strengthen and sustaine other parts: some say there be 304. some 307. or 313. in Mans body. They have no Nerves in them, and are therefore without sense.	Bones are dry and hard, generated from the thickest part of the seed to strengthen and support the other parts. Some say there are 304 in the human body, others 307 or 313. They contain no nerves and therefore have no sensation.[1605]

[1600] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Similar parts.”

[1601] Editor. “Similar” means uniform in composition: a piece remains the same kind of substance. A “dissimilar” part, such as a hand, consists of different substances. This distinction appears at the opening of Aristotle’s History of Animals 1.1. “Uniform” and “non-uniform” make the technical contrast explicit in modern English.

[1602] Burton. m. “Laurentius cap. 20. lib. 1. Anat.” Laurentius, Anatomy, book 1, chapter 20.

[1603] Editor. “Spermatical” belongs to an older account of generation in which certain tissues derive directly from generative seed. The list is translated without replacing that account with modern embryology.

[1604] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Bones.”

[1605] Editor. The bone counts and the assertion that bones lack nerves are retained as historical claims. Modern anatomical research demonstrates sensory nerve fibres in bone and its surrounding periosteum; see the study by Castañeda-Corral and colleagues cited in the source record. “Without sense” here means without sensation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A Gristle, is a substance softer then bone, and harder then the rest, flexible, and serves to maintaine the parts of motion. Ligaments, are they that tye the bones together, and other parts to the bones, with their subserving tendons: Membranes office is to cover the rest.	Cartilage is a flexible substance, softer than bone and harder than the other tissues, which supports the parts used in movement. Ligaments bind the bones together and other parts to the bones, with the tendons that assist them. The function of membranes is to cover the other parts.
Source page 15–16 Nerves or sinews, are Membranes without, and full of marrow within, they proceed from the Brain, & carry the Animal spirits for sense & motion. Of these some be harder, some softer; the softer serve the senses, and there be 7. pair of them. The first be the Optick Nerves, by which we see; the second move the eyes; the third pair serve for the tongue to taste; the fourth pair for the taste in the Palat; the fift belong to the Ears; the sixt pair is most ample, and runs almost over all the Bowels; the seventh pair moves the Tongue.	Nerves, or sinews, have membranes on the outside and are full of marrow within. They arise from the brain and carry the animal spirits responsible for sensation and movement. Some are harder, some softer. The softer ones serve the senses, and there are seven pairs. The first are the optic nerves, by which we see; the second move the eyes; the third enable the tongue to taste; the fourth serve taste in the palate; the fifth belong to the ears; the sixth pair is very extensive and runs through almost all the internal organs; the seventh moves the tongue.[1606]
Source page 16 The harder sinews serve for the motion of the inner parts, proceeding from the Marrow in the back, of whom there be thirty combinations; seven of the Neck, twelve of the Breast, &c.	The harder nerves serve to move the inner parts and arise from the spinal cord. There are thirty pairs of these: seven in the neck, twelve in the chest, and so on.

[1606] Editor. Burton's seven pairs of cranial nerves and thirty pairs arising from the spinal cord belong to the classification he is summarizing. "Sinew" is used broadly for nerve, and "marrow" for its supposed inner substance. "Bowels" here means internal organs more broadly than the intestines.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1607]Arteries are long and hollow, with a double skin to convey the vital spirits; to discern which the better, they say that Vesalius the Anatomist was wont to cut up men alive. [1608]They arise in the left side of the heart, & are principally two, from which the rest are derived, Aorta, and Venosa; Aorta is the root of all the other, which serve the whole body; the other goes to the Lungs, to fetch ayr to refrigerate the Heart.	Arteries are long and hollow, with a double covering, and convey the vital spirits. To observe these more clearly, they say, the anatomist Vesalius used to dissect living people. Arteries arise from the left side of the heart, and there are two principal ones from which the rest branch: the aorta and the venosa. The aorta is the root of all the others that serve the whole body; the other goes to the lungs to draw in air and cool the heart.[1609]
[1610]Veins are hollow and round like pipes, arising from the Liver, carrying bloud and natural spirits, they feed all the parts. Of these there be two chief, Vena porta, and Vena cava, from which the rest are corrivated. That Vena porta is a Vein coming from the concave of the Liver, and receiving those meseraical Veins, by whom he takes the Chylus from the stomack and guts, and conveys it to the Liver.	Veins are hollow and round like pipes. Arising from the liver and carrying blood and natural spirits, they nourish all the parts. There are two principal veins, the portal vein and the vena cava, from which the rest branch. The portal vein comes from the concave surface of the liver and receives the mesenteric veins, through which it takes chyle from the stomach and intestines and conveys it to the liver.
The other derives bloud from the Liver to nourish all the other dispersed Members. The branches of that Vena porta are the Meseraical and Hæmorrhoides. The branches of the Cava are inward or outward. Inward, seminal or emulgent. Outward, in the head, arms, feet, &c. and have several names.	The other carries blood from the liver to nourish all the parts distributed throughout the body. The branches of the portal vein are the mesenteric and haemorrhoidal veins. The branches of the vena cava are internal or external: internally, the seminal or renal veins; externally, those in the head, arms, feet and so on, which have various names.[1611]

[1607] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Arteries.”

[1608] Burton. n. “In these they observe the beating of the pulse.”

[1609] Editor. The allegation about Vesalius is expressly hearsay: “they say.” No supporting source is supplied, and it should not be treated as a verified biographical fact. “Venosa” is the historical arteria venosa, corresponding to the pulmonary vein. The account of drawing air to cool the heart is preserved without converting it into modern circulation physiology.

[1610] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Veines.”

[1611] Editor. “Corrivated” suggests streams branching from a common source. The haemorrhoidal veins concern the rectal region; seminal veins concern the reproductive organs; “emulgent” means renal. Burton’s description of all veins as arising from the liver belongs to his inherited anatomical system.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1612]Fibræ are strings, white and solid, dispersed through the whole member, and right, oblique, transvers, all which have their several uses. Fat is a similar part, moyst, without bloud, composed of the most thick and unctious matter of the bloud. The [1613]skin covers the rest, and hath Cuticulam, or a little skin under it. Flesh is soft and ruddy, composed of the congealing of bloud, &c.	Fibres are white, solid strands distributed throughout a bodily part. They run straight, obliquely or across, each direction having its own use. Fat is a uniform part, moist and bloodless, made from the thickest and oiliest matter of the blood. The skin covers the other parts and has a cuticle, or little skin, beneath it. Flesh is soft and reddish, formed from congealed blood, and so on.[1614]

[1612] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Fibræ, Fat, Flesh.”

[1613] Burton. o. “Cujus est pars similaris à vi cutifica ut interiora muniat. Capivac. Anat. pag. 252.” The skin is a uniform part produced by a skin-forming power to protect the internal parts. Capivaccius, Anatomy, page 252. The elliptical printed Latin is retained; the translation gives its contextual sense.

[1614] Editor. “Similar” again means uniform in composition. The claims that fat derives from the thickest blood, flesh from congealed blood, and the cuticle lies beneath the skin remain as printed. They are historical descriptions, not silently corrected modern anatomy. The final Latin marginal note is elliptical and remains a point for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 4. Dissimilar parts.	Subsection 4. Composite parts.
Dissimilar parts, are those which we call Organical, or Instrumental, and they be Inward, or Outward. The chiefest outward parts are situate forward or backward. Forward, the crown and foretop of the head, skull, face, forehead, temples, chin, eyes, ears, nose, &c. neck, brest, chest, upper and lower part of the belly, hypocondries, navel, groyn, flank, &c. Backward, the hinder part of the head, back, shoulders, sides, loyns, hipbones, os sacrum, buttocks, &c. Or joynts, arms, hands, feet, legs, thighs, knees, &c. Or common to both, which because they are obvious and well known, I have carelesly repeated, eaque præcipua & grandiora tantum: quod reliquum, ex libris de animâ, qui volet, accipiat.	Composite parts are those we call organs, or instruments; they are internal or external. The principal external parts lie at the front or back. At the front are the crown and forepart of the head, skull, face, forehead, temples, chin, eyes, ears, nose, and so on; the neck, breast, chest, upper and lower abdomen, regions beneath the ribs, navel, groin, flank, and so on. At the back are the back of the head, back, shoulders, sides, loins, hipbones, sacrum, buttocks, and so on. There are also the joints, arms, hands, feet, legs, thighs and knees, and parts common to both front and back. Because these are obvious and familiar, I have listed them casually, and only the principal and larger ones: anyone who wishes may learn the rest from books on the soul.[1615]

[1615] Editor. “Dissimilar” means composed of unlike tissues, as opposed to the uniform parts discussed in Block 023. “Organical” and “instrumental” refer to parts that perform particular functions. Hypochondries are the regions below the ribs; the os sacrum is the sacrum. Books “on the soul” could include anatomy because bodily organs were understood as instruments of the soul’s faculties.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 16–17 Inward Organical parts which cannot be seen, are divers in number, and have several names, functions, & divisions; but that of [1616]Laurentius is most notable, into Noble, or Ignoble parts. Of the Noble there be three principal parts, to which all the rest belong, and whom they serve, Brain, Heart, Liver, According to whose site, three Regions, or a threefold division is made of the whole body. As first of the Head, in which the animal Organs are contained, and brain it self, which by his nerves give sense and motion to the rest, and is (as it were) a privy Counsellor, and Chancellor to the Heart.	The internal organs, which cannot be seen, are numerous, with various names, functions and classifications. The most notable division is Laurentius's, into noble and lesser parts. Among the noble parts are three principal organs, on which all the rest depend and which they serve: the brain, heart and liver. Their positions determine three regions, or a threefold division of the whole body. First comes the head, containing the organs of sensation and movement and the brain itself. Through its nerves, the brain gives sensation and movement to the other parts, and serves, so to speak, as the heart's privy councillor and chancellor.[1617]
Source page 17 The second Region is the Chest, or middle Belly, in which the Heart as King keeps his court, and by his Arteries communicates life to the whole body. The third Region is the lower Belly, in which the Liver resides as a Legat à latere, with the rest of those naturall Organs, serving for concoction, nourishment, expelling of excrements.	The second region is the chest, or middle cavity, where the heart holds court as king and communicates life to the whole body through its arteries. The third region is the lower abdomen, where the liver resides as a specially appointed legate, together with the other organs that perform the natural functions of digestion, nourishment and expelling waste.[1618]

[1616] Burton. p. "Anat. lib. 1. c. 19. Celebris est & pervulgata partium divisio in principes & ignobiles partes." Anatomy, book 1, chapter 19. The division of the parts into principal and lesser parts is familiar and widespread.

[1617] Editor. Laurentius is André du Laurens. "Animal" here concerns sensation and movement, not a contrast between humans and other animals. The hierarchy of noble and subordinate organs develops into a political analogy: heart as king, brain as councillor, liver as legate.

[1618] Editor. A legatus a latere is literally a legate sent "from the side" of the appointing authority, with delegated powers. "Belly" can mean a major bodily cavity, including the chest. Natural functions here mean the nutritive operations assigned to the liver in Burton's inherited physiology.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This lower Region is distinguished from the upper by the Midriffe, or Diaphragma, and is subdivided again by some into three concavities, or Regions, upper, middle, and lower. [1619]The upper of the Hypocondries, in whose right side is the Liver, the left the Spleen: From which is denominated Hypocondriacal Melancholy. The second of the Navel and Flanks, divided from the first by the Rim. The last of the water-course, which is again subdivided into three other parts. The Arabians make two parts of this Region, Epigastrium, and Hypogastrium; upper, or lower. Epigastrium they call Mirach, from whence comes Mirachialis Melancholia, sometimes mentioned of them. Of these several Regions I will treat in brief apart: and first of the third Region, in which the natural Organs are contained.	This lower region is separated from the upper by the midriff, or diaphragm. Some subdivide it into three cavities or regions: upper, middle and lower. The upper comprises the regions beneath the ribs, with the liver on the right and spleen on the left; from this region hypochondriacal melancholy takes its name. The second comprises the navel and flanks, separated from the first by the abdominal membrane. The last is the urinary region, itself subdivided into three parts. The Arab writers divide this region into two parts, the epigastrium and hypogastrium, upper and lower. They call the epigastrium mirach, from which comes the term mirachial melancholy, sometimes mentioned by them. I will treat these regions briefly and separately, beginning with the third, which contains the organs of the natural functions.[1620]
But you that are Readers in the mean time, [1621]Suppose you were now brought into some sacred Temple, or Majestical Palace (as [1622]Melancthon saith) to behold not the matter only, but the singular Art, Workmanship, and counsel of this our great Creator. And 'tis a pleasant and profitable speculation, if it be considered aright.	Meanwhile, readers, imagine that you have been brought into a sacred temple or majestic palace, as Melanchthon says, to contemplate not merely the material but the extraordinary art, workmanship and design of our great Creator. Properly considered, this is a pleasant and profitable subject for reflection.[1623]

[1619] Burton. q. "D. Crook out of Galen and others." Helkiah Crooke, drawing on Galen and other authorities.

[1620] Editor. Hypochondriacal melancholy is a historical bodily classification associated with the upper abdomen; the term does not mean merely anxiety about illness. "Rim" denotes an abdominal membrane or lining. Burton's identifications and divisions of epigastrium, hypogastrium and mirach are retained; these historical usages do not map neatly onto current regional terminology.

[1621] Burton. Unlettered source heading: "De anima." On the Soul; it belongs to the adjacent citation of Melanchthon.

[1622] Burton. r. "Vos vero veluti in templum ac sacrarium quoddam vos duci putetis, &c. Suavis & utilis cognitio." Imagine that you are being led into a temple and sanctuary, and so on. Pleasant and useful knowledge. The repeated vos is retained.

[1623] Editor. The passage frames anatomical inquiry as contemplation of divine workmanship. Melanchthon is cited as its source; the full wording and location in his On the Soul remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1624]The parts of this Region, which present themselves to your consideration and view, are such as serve to nutrition, or generation. Those of nutrition serve to the first or second concoction: as the æsophagus or gullet, which brings meat and drink into the Stomack. The Ventricle or Stomack, which is seated in the midst of that part of the belly beneath the Midriffe, the kitchin (as it were) of the first concoction, and which turns our meat into Chylus: It hath two mouthes, one above, another beneath. The upper is sometimes taken for the stomack it self; the lower and nether door (as Wecker calls it) is named Pylorus. This stomack is sustained by a large Kell or Kaull, called Omentum; which some will have the same with Peritoneum, or Rim of the belly.	The parts of this region now offered for your consideration serve nutrition or reproduction. Those serving nutrition perform the first or second stage of digestion. They include the oesophagus, or gullet, which carries food and drink into the stomach. The ventricle, or stomach, lies centrally in the part of the abdomen below the diaphragm. It is, so to speak, the kitchen of the first stage of digestion, turning our food into chyle. It has two openings, one above and one below. The upper is sometimes understood as the stomach itself; the lower, its bottom door, as Wecker calls it, is named the pylorus. The stomach is supported by a large caul called the omentum, which some identify with the peritoneum, or lining of the abdomen.[1625]

[1624] Burton. Unlettered heading: "The lower Region. Natural Organs."

[1625] Editor. "Ventricle" can mean the stomach or another bodily cavity. Chyle retains its historical sense of nourishment processed from food. Burton inconsistently identifies omentum and peritoneum. Crooke, Microcosmographia (1615), book 2, chapter 10, treats the peritoneum or rim; book 3, chapter 2, separately treats the omentum or kall. Burton's compressed terminology is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
From the Stomack to the very fundament, are produced the Guts, or Intestina, which serve a little to alter and distribute the Chylus, and convey away the excrements. They are divided into small and great, by reason of their site and substance, slender or thicker: the slender is Duodenum, or whole gut, which is next to the stomack, some twelve inches long, (saith [1626]Fuschius.) Jejunum or empty gut, continuate to the other, which hath many Meseraick veines annexed to it, which take part of the Chylus to the Liver from it. Ilion the third, which consists of many crinckles, which serves with the rest to receive, keep, and distribute the chylus from the stomack.	The intestines extend from the stomach to the anus. They help to transform and distribute the chyle and carry away waste. They are divided into small and large according to their position and substance, thinner or thicker. Among the small intestines is the duodenum, or whole gut, next to the stomach and about twelve inches long, according to Fuchs. The jejunum, or empty gut, continues from it and has many mesenteric veins attached, which carry part of the chyle from it to the liver. Third comes the ileum, with its many folds, which joins the others in receiving, holding and distributing chyle from the stomach.[1627]
Source page 17–18 The thick guts are three, the Blinde gut, Colon, and Right gut. The blinde is a thick & short gut, having one mouth, in which the Ilion and Colon meet: it receives the excrements, and conveyes them to the Colon. This Colon hath many windings, that the excrements pass not away too fast: the Right gut is straight, and conveys the excrements to the fundament, whose lower part is bound up with certain Muscles, called Sphincteres, that the excrements may be the better contained, until such time a man be willing to go to the stool. In the midst of these guts is situated the Mesenterium or Midriffe, composed of many veins, Arteries, & much fat, serving chiefly to sustain the guts. All these parts serve the first concoction.	There are three large intestines: the blind gut, colon and straight gut. The blind gut is thick and short, with one opening where the ileum and colon meet. It receives waste and passes it to the colon. The colon has many windings so that waste does not pass through too quickly. The straight gut leads the waste to the anus; its lower part is closed by muscles called sphincters, which hold it in until a person wishes to empty his bowels. Amid the intestines lies the mesentery, here called the midriff, composed of many veins and arteries and much fat, chiefly serving to support the intestines. All these parts serve the first stage of digestion.[1628]

[1626] Burton. s. “Lib. 1. cap. 12. Sect. 5.” Book 1, chapter 12, section 5; attached to Fuchs.

[1627] Editor. “Whole gut” is retained because it is what the 1651 page prints; it is not a translation of duodenum. The name refers to a measure of twelve finger-breadths. Burton instead gives twelve inches. His route of chyle through mesenteric veins to the liver is retained as part of the historical account.

[1628] Editor. The blind gut is the caecum; the right or straight gut is the rectum. “Fundament” means the anus. The use of “midriff” for the mesentery is preserved and made explicit, although Burton also uses the word for the diaphragm. His terminology should not be made artificially consistent.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 18 To the second, which is busied either in refining the good nourishment, or expelling the bad, is chiefly belonging to the liver, like in colour to congealed bloud, the shop of bloud, situate in the right Hypocondry, in figure like to an halfe Moone, Generosum membrum, Melancthon stiles it, a generous part; it serves to turne the Chylus to bloud, for the nourishment of the Body. The excrements of it are either Cholerick or Watery, which the other subordinate parts convey.	The second stage, concerned with refining useful nourishment or expelling the useless, belongs chiefly to the liver. The colour of congealed blood and shaped like a half-moon, it lies beneath the ribs on the right and is the workshop of blood. Melanchthon calls it a noble organ. It turns chyle into blood to nourish the body. Its waste is either bilious or watery, and is carried away by the subordinate organs.[1629]
The Gall placed in the concave of the Liver, extracts Choler to it: the Spleen, Melancholy; which is situate on the left side, over against the Liver, a spungy matter, that drawes this black Choler to it by a secret vertue, and feeds upon it, conveying the rest to the bottom of the stomack, to stir up appetite, or else to the guts as an excrement. That watery matter the two Kidnies expurgate, by those emulgent veines, and Ureteres. The emulgent draw this superfluous moisture from the bloud; the two Ureteres convey it to the Bladder, which by reason of his site in the lower belly, is apt to receive it, having two parts, necke and bottom: the bottom holds the water, the necke is constringed with a muscle, which as a Porter, keeps the water from running out against our will.	The gallbladder, placed in the hollow of the liver, draws yellow bile into itself; the spleen draws black bile. The spleen lies on the left, opposite the liver. It is a spongy substance that attracts this black bile by a hidden power and feeds on it, sending the rest to the bottom of the stomach to stimulate appetite, or to the intestines as waste. The two kidneys remove the watery matter through the renal veins and ureters. The renal veins draw this surplus moisture from the blood, and the two ureters carry it to the bladder, whose position in the lower abdomen fits it to receive it. The bladder has two parts, the neck and the base. The base holds the urine; a muscle constricts the neck and, like a porter, prevents the urine from escaping against our will.[1630]
Members of generation are common to both sexes, or peculiar to one; which because they are impertinent to my purpose, I do voluntarily omit.	The reproductive organs are either common to both sexes or peculiar to one. Since they are irrelevant to my purpose, I deliberately leave them out.

[1629] Editor. The liver as the workshop converting chyle into blood belongs to the humoral physiology described here. "Generous" translates generosum in the sense of noble or eminent, not liberal in giving.

[1630] Editor. "Gall" means the gallbladder; choler means yellow bile, while melancholy here means black bile. The account of the spleen feeding on black bile, and of the renal veins extracting watery waste, is Burton's historical explanation. "Secret virtue" means an unseen power of action; "water" in the bladder is urine.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1631]Next in order is the middle Region, or chest, which comprehends the vital faculties & parts: which (as I have said) is separated from the lower belly, by the Diaphragma or Midriffe, which is a skin consisting of many nerves, membranes: and amongst other uses it hath, is the instrument of laughing. There is also a certain thin membrane, full of sinews, which covereth the whole chest within, and is called Pleura, the seat of the disease called Pleurisie, when it is inflamed; some adde a third skin, which is termed Mediastinus, which divides the chest into two parts, right & left:	Next comes the middle region, or chest, containing the vital faculties and organs. As I have said, it is separated from the lower abdomen by the diaphragm, or midriff, a sheet consisting of many nerves and membranes, which, among its other functions, is the instrument of laughter. A thin, sinewy membrane called the pleura also lines the whole chest; when inflamed, it is the seat of the disease called pleurisy. Some add a third membrane, called the mediastinum, dividing the chest into right and left parts.[1632]
of this region the principal part is the Heart, which is the seat and fountain of life, of heat, of spirits, of pulse and respiration; the Sun of our Body, the King and sole commander of it: the seat and Organ of all passions and affections. Primum vivens, ultimum moriens, it lives first, and dies last in all creatures: Of a pyramidical forme, and not much unlike to a Pine-apple; a part worthy of admiration, that can yeild such variety of affections, by whose motion it is dilated or contracted, to stir & command the humors in the body: As in [1633]sorrow, melancholy; in anger, choler; in joy, to send the bloud outwardly; in sorrow, to call it in; moving the humors, as Horses do a Chariot.	The principal organ of this region is the heart, the seat and fountain of life, heat, spirits, pulse and breathing; the sun of our body, its king and sole commander, the seat and organ of all passions and feelings. In every creature it is the first to live and the last to die. Pyramidal in shape, rather like a pine cone, it deserves admiration for producing such a variety of feelings. Through their movements it expands or contracts, stirring and directing the body's humours: black bile in sorrow, yellow bile in anger, sending blood outward in joy and drawing it inward in sorrow, moving the humours as horses move a chariot.[1634]

[1631] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Middle Region."

[1632] Editor. "Skin" is used broadly for a membrane; "sinews" can denote nerves or fibrous structures. The diaphragm as the instrument of laughter and the description of mediastinum as a third membrane are retained without replacing Burton's account with a present-day anatomical one.

[1633] Burton. t. "Hæc res est præcipuè digna admiratione, quod tanta affectuum varietate cietur cor, quod omnes res tristes & lætæ statim corda feriunt & movent." This is especially worthy of wonder: that the heart is stirred by so many different feelings, and that all sad and joyful things immediately strike and move our hearts.

[1634] Editor. "Pine-apple" is understood in its older sense of pine cone, fitting the comparison with a pyramid. Melancholy and choler here are humours moved by feelings. The claim that the heart lives first and dies last belongs to the physiological tradition being summarized, as does its role as the bodily seat of the passions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 18–19 This heart, though it be one sole member, yet it may be divided into two creeks right & Left. The right is like the Moone increasing, bigger then the other part, & receives bloud from Vena cava, distributing some of it to the Lungs to nourish them, the rest to the left side, to ingender spirits. The left creeke hath the forme of a Cone, & is the seat of life, which as a torch doth oyl, draws bloud unto it, begetting of it spirits & fire; and as fire in a torch, so are spirits in the bloud, & by that great Artery called Aorta, it sends vital spirits over the body, & takes aire from the Lungs, by that Artery which is called Venosa; So that both Creeks have their Vessels; the Right two Veines; the left two Arteries, besides those two common anfractuous ears, which serve them both; the one to hold bloud, the other aire, for several uses.	Although the heart is a single organ, it can be divided into two chambers, right and left. The right resembles a waxing moon and is larger than the other. It receives blood from the vena cava, sending some to the lungs to nourish them and the rest to the left side to generate spirits. The left chamber is cone-shaped and is the seat of life. It draws blood to itself as a torch draws oil, producing spirits and fire from it. Spirits are in the blood as fire is in a torch. Through the great artery called the aorta, the heart sends vital spirits throughout the body, and through the artery called the venosa it draws air from the lungs. Both chambers therefore have their vessels: the right has two veins, the left two arteries, besides the two folded, ear-like appendages that serve them both, one to hold blood and the other air for their different uses.[1635]

[1635] Editor. “Creeks” are cavities or chambers; the “ears” are auricular appendages. Arteria venosa is the historical name for the pulmonary vein, a terminology discussed by Harvey in his introduction to On the Motion of the Heart and Blood. Burton’s allocation of blood and air, and his account of spirits and cooling, are preserved; they are not a description of modern circulatory physiology.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 19 The Lungs is a thin spungy part, like an Oxe hoof, (saith [1636]Fernelius) the Town-Clark, or Cryer ([1637]one termes it) the instrument of voice, as an Orator to a King; annexed to the heart, to express their thoughts by voice. That it is the instrument of voice, is manifest, in that no creature can speak, or utter any voice, which wanteth these lights. It is besides the instrument of respiration, or breathing; & its office is to cool the heart, by sending ayre unto it, by the Venosal Artery, which veine comes to the lungs by that aspera arteria, which consists of many gristles, membranes, nerves, taking in ayre at the nose and mouth, and by it likewise, exhales the fumes of the Heart.	The lungs are a thin, spongy organ shaped like an ox's hoof, according to Fernel. One writer calls them the town clerk or crier. They are the instrument of voice, joined to the heart like an orator to a king, giving voice to its thoughts. That they are the instrument of voice is evident, since no creature lacking lungs can speak or utter any sound. They are also the instrument of respiration, or breathing, and their function is to cool the heart by sending air to it through the venosal artery. This vein reaches the lungs by way of the windpipe, which consists of many pieces of cartilage, membranes and nerves; it takes in air through the nose and mouth and likewise breathes out the heart's fumes.[1638]

[1636] Burton. u. "Physio. l. 1. c. 8." Physiology, book 1, chapter 8; attached to Fernel.

[1637] Burton. x. "Ut orator regi: sic pulmo vocis instrumentum annectitur cordi, &c. Melancth." As an orator to a king, so the lung, the instrument of voice, is joined to the heart, and so on. Melanchthon.

[1638] Editor. "Lights" means lungs; aspera arteria, "rough artery," means windpipe. Crooke, Microcosmographia (1615), book 6, chapter 18, page 390, says that windpipe branches join mouths with the venal artery to admit air to the heart's left ventricle. This historical account helps explain Burton's compressed connection. The modern column preserves his syntax and his general assertion about voice and lungs.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In the upper Region serving the animal faculties, the chief Organ is the Brain, which is a soft, marrowish, & white substance, ingendred of the purest part of seed and spirits, included by many skins, and seated within the skull or brain pan, and it is the most noble Organ under heaven, the dwelling house and seat of the Soul, the habitation of wisdom, memory, judgement, reason, & in which man is most like unto God: and therefore nature hath covered it with a skull of hard bone, and two skins or membranes, whereof the one is called dura mater, or meninx, the other pia mater. The dura mater is next to the skull, above the other, which includes & protects the brain. When this is taken away, the pia mater is to be seen, a thin membrane, the next and immediate cover of the brain, and not covering only, but entring into it.	In the upper region, which serves the faculties of sensation and movement, the chief organ is the brain: a soft, white, marrow-like substance generated from the purest part of the seed and spirits, enclosed by several coverings and seated within the skull. It is the noblest organ under heaven, the dwelling and seat of the soul, the home of wisdom, memory, judgement and reason, and the part in which man most resembles God. Nature has therefore covered it with a hard bony skull and two membranes: the dura mater, or meninx, and the pia mater. The dura mater lies next to the skull, above the other membrane, enclosing and protecting the brain. When it is removed, the pia mater appears: a thin membrane immediately covering the brain and also entering into it.[1639]
The Brain it self is divided into two parts, the fore and hinder part; the fore part is much bigger then the other, which is called the little brain in respect of it. This fore part hath many concavities distinguished by certain ventricles, which are the receptacles of the spirits, brought hither by the arteries from the heart, and are there refined to a more heavenly nature, to performe the actions of the soul. Of these ventricles there be three, Right, Left, & Middle. The Right & Left answer to their site, and beget animal spirits; if they be any way hurt, sense and motion ceaseth. These ventricles moreover, are held to be the seat of the common sense.	The brain itself is divided into front and rear parts. The front is much larger than the other, which is accordingly called the little brain. The front part has various cavities arranged into ventricles, receptacles for the spirits brought here from the heart through the arteries. Here the spirits are refined into a more heavenly substance to perform the soul's actions. There are three of these ventricles: right, left and middle. The right and left are named from their positions and generate animal spirits. If they are injured, sensation and movement cease. These ventricles are also held to be the seat of the common sense.[1640]

[1639] Editor. The claim that the brain develops from seed and spirits is part of the historical embryology. Dura mater and pia mater name its outer and delicate inner coverings; meninx means a membrane. Burton lists two coverings here. No additional modern structure has been inserted.

[1640] Editor. "Common sense" is the faculty that receives and combines the information of the separate senses, not ordinary practical judgement. The account places faculties and animal spirits in the brain's cavities. "Animal spirits" are subtle bodily substances in this system, not moods or supernatural beings.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Middle ventricle, is a common concourse, & cavity of them both; and hath two passages; the one to receive Pituita, & the other extends it self to the fourth creek: in this they place Imagination and Cogitation, and so the three ventricles of the fore part of the Brain are used. The fourth Creek behind the head, is common to the Cerebel or little brain, and marrow of the back-bone, the last, and most solid of all the rest, which receives the animal spirits from the other ventricles, & conveys them to the marrow in the back, and is the place where they say the memory is seated.	The middle ventricle is a shared cavity where the other two meet. It has two passages: one receives phlegm, while the other extends to the fourth chamber. Here they place imagination and thought. Such are the uses of the three ventricles in the front part of the brain. The fourth chamber, at the back of the head, belongs jointly to the cerebellum, or little brain, and the spinal cord. It is the last and most solid of them all, receiving animal spirits from the other ventricles and conveying them to the spinal cord. Here, they say, memory is seated.[1641]

[1641] Editor. Pituita is phlegm. The location of imagination, thought and memory in particular ventricles is a historical theory of the internal senses. “They place” and “they say” retain Burton’s attribution to the writers he is summarizing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 2. Of the Soul and her Faculties.	Subsection 5. The soul and its faculties.[1642]
Source page 19–20 According to [1643]Aristotle, the Soul is defined to be ἐντελέχεια, perfectio & actus primus corporis Organici, vitam habentis in potentia: the perfection or first act of an Organical body, having power of life, which most [1644]Philosophers approve. But many doubts arise about the Essence, Subject, Seat, Distinction, and subordinate faculties of it.	Following Aristotle, the soul is defined as the fulfilment or first actuality of an organized body with the capacity for life, a definition most philosophers accept. But many questions arise about its essence, its underlying subject, its seat, its divisions and its subordinate faculties.[1645]

[1642] Editor. The heading is printed “Subsec. 2.” It is Subsection 5 in the sequence, as the running heads on printed pages 19–20 also show. The original column preserves the error; the modern heading supplies 5.

[1643] Burton. y. “De anim. c. 1.” On the Soul, chapter 1. The definition is in Aristotle, book 2, chapter 1, 412a–b.

[1644] Burton. z. “Scalig. exerc. 307. Tolet. in lib. de anima. cap. 1. &c.” Scaliger, Exercise 307; Toledo, commentary on On the Soul, chapter 1, and so on.

[1645] Editor. Aristotle, On the Soul 2.1, 412a–b. Entelecheia means actuality or fulfilment. “First actuality” is the possession of the capacity for living activity, even when that activity is not being exercised; Aristotle compares having knowledge with actively using it. “Subject” here means the underlying bearer of the soul, not the topic of discussion. Burton’s Greek and Latin restatements are combined with his English gloss in the modern column.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 20 For the Essence and particular knowledge, of all other things it is most hard (be it of Man or Beast) to discerne, as [1646]Aristotle himself, [1647]Tully, [1648]Picus Mirandula, [1649]Tolet, and other Neoterick Philosophers confess. [1650]We can understand all things by her, but what she is we cannot apprehend. Some therefore make one Soul, divided into three principal faculties; others, three distinct Soules. Which question of late hath been much controverted by Piccolomineus, and Zabarel.	Of all things, the soul's essence and precise nature, whether in humans or animals, are the hardest to discern, as Aristotle himself, Cicero, Pico della Mirandola, Toledo and other more recent philosophers admit. We understand everything through the soul, yet cannot grasp what the soul itself is. Some therefore posit one soul divided into three principal faculties; others posit three distinct souls. Piccolomini and Zabarella have recently debated this question at length.[1651]

[1646] Burton. a. "1. De anima. cap. 1." On the Soul, book 1, chapter 1.

[1647] Burton. b. "Tuscul. quæst." Tusculan Disputations. Cicero surveys disagreements about the soul in book 1, sections 18–23.

[1648] Burton. c. "Lib. 6. Doct. Val. Gentil. c. 13, pag. 1216." Book 6 of Gianfrancesco Pico's Examination of the Vanity of Pagan Learning, chapter 13, page 1216. The full title and author are identifiable; the cited passage and pagination remain to be collated.

[1649] Burton. d. "Aristot." Aristotle; a compressed reference attached to Toledo, presumably his Aristotelian commentary.

[1650] Burton. e. "Animâ quæq; intelligimus, et tamen quæ sit ipsa intelligere non valemus." Through the soul we understand everything, yet we cannot understand what the soul itself is. The printed abbreviation quæq; is retained.

[1651] Editor. Aristotle acknowledges the difficulty of knowing the soul at On the Soul 1.1, 402a; Cicero surveys rival accounts in Tusculan Disputations 1.18–23. "Neoteric" means comparatively recent. Piccolomini and Zabarella are cited for the debate over one soul with several powers or multiple souls; their precise passages, and those of Pico and Toledo, remain to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1652]Paracelsus will have four Soules, adding to the three granted faculties, a Spiritual soul: which opinion of his, Campanella in his book de [1653]Sensu rerum, much labours to demonstrate and prove, because Carkasses bleed at the sight of the murderer; with many such arguments: And [1654]some again, one soul of all Creatures whatsoever, differing only in Organs; & that beasts have reason as well as men, though for some defect of Organs, not in such measure. Others make a doubt, whether it be all in all, and all in every part; which is amply discussed in Zabarel amongst the rest.	Paracelsus maintains that there are four souls, adding a spiritual soul to the three accepted faculties. Campanella, in his book On the Sense of Things, works hard to demonstrate and prove this opinion, arguing that corpses bleed in the murderer's presence, and offering many similar arguments. Others hold that all creatures have the same kind of soul and differ only in their organs; animals possess reason just as humans do, though in a smaller measure because of some deficiency in their organs. Others question whether the soul is wholly present in the whole body and wholly present in every part. Zabarella, among others, discusses this at length.[1655]

[1652] Burton. f. "Spiritualem animam a reliquis distinctam tuetur, etiam in cadavere inhærentem post mortem per aliquot menses." He maintains a spiritual soul distinct from the others, remaining even in the corpse for several months after death.

[1653] Burton. Asterisked citation: "Lib. 3. cap. 31." The printed reference is retained. In Campanella's De sensu rerum (1620), the murdered body's bleeding is discussed in book 4, chapter 9, page 296; book 3 has only fourteen chapters.

[1654] Burton. g. "Cælius lib. 2. c. 31. Plutarch. in Grillo Lips. Cen. 1 ep. 50, Jossius de Risu & Fletu, Averroes, Campanella, &c." Caelius, book 2, chapter 31; Plutarch, Gryllus; Lipsius, first century of letters, letter 50; Jossius, On Laughter and Tears; Averroes; Campanella; and others. A century here is a collection of one hundred letters.

[1655] Editor. "At the sight of" is rendered as "in the presence of." Campanella, De sensu rerum 4.9, reports murdered bodies bleeding before their killers and jurists using this as evidence. This locates the historical claim without verifying the phenomenon. "One soul" is read as one kind shared by creatures. Plutarch's Gryllus argues for animal reason; the remaining authorities and the Paracelsian four-soul account still require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The [1656]common division of the Soul, is into three principall faculties, Vegetal, Sensitive, and Rational; which make three distinct kinde of living Creatures: Vegetal Plants, Sensible Beasts, Rational Men. How these three principal faculties are distinguished and connected, Humano ingenio inaccessum videtur, is beyond humane capacity, as [1657]Taurellus, Philip, Flavius & others suppose. The inferiour may be alone, but the superiour cannot subsist without the other; so Sensible includes Vegetal, Rational both; which are contained in it (saith Aristotle) ut trigonus in tetragono, as a Triangle in a Quadrangle.	The usual division of the soul is into three principal faculties: vegetative, sensitive and rational, giving three distinct kinds of living creature—vegetative plants, sensitive animals and rational humans. How these three principal faculties are distinguished and connected seems beyond human understanding, as Taurellus, Philip, Flavius and others suppose. The lower faculty can exist alone, but the higher cannot exist without it. Thus the sensitive includes the vegetative, and the rational includes both, which are contained within it, as Aristotle says, like a triangle within a quadrilateral.[1658]

[1656] Burton. h. “Philip. de anima. ca. 1. Cælius 20. antiq. cap. 3. Plutarch. de placit. philos.” Philip Melanchthon, On the Soul, chapter 1; Caelius, Antiquities, book 20, chapter 3; the work On the Opinions of the Philosophers transmitted under Plutarch’s name.

[1657] Burton. i. “De vit. & mort. part. 2. c. 3. prop. 1. de vit et mort. 2. c. 22.” On Life and Death, part 2, chapter 3, proposition 1; On Life and Death, 2, chapter 22. The abbreviated references remain to be collated.

[1658] Editor. “Vegetative” denotes nutrition, growth and reproduction; “sensitive” denotes the capacity for sensation. The geometrical comparison is in Aristotle, On the Soul 2.3, 414b–415a: the earlier capacity is potentially included in the later, as a triangle is contained in a quadrilateral. Philip is Melanchthon; the identification intended by “Flavius” remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1659]Vegetal, the first of the three distinct faculties, is defined to be a substantial act of an organical body, by which it is nourished, augmented, and begets another like unto it self. In which definition, three several operations are specified, Altrix, Auctrix, Procreatrix; the first is [1660]Nutrition, whose object is nourishment, meat, drink, and the like; his Organ the Liver in sensible creatures; in Plants, the root or sap. His office it to turne the nutriment into the substance of the body nourished, which he performes by natural heat. This nutritive operation hath four other subordinate functions, or powers belonging to it, Attraction, Retention, Digestion, Expulsion.	The vegetative faculty, the first of the three, is defined as a substantial actuality of an organized body by which it is nourished, grows and produces another like itself. This definition specifies three operations: nourishment, growth and reproduction. The first is nutrition. Its object is nourishment—food, drink and the like—and its organ is the liver in creatures with sensation, or the root or sap in plants. Its function is to turn nutriment into the substance of the body being nourished, which it does through natural heat. Four subordinate functions or powers belong to nutrition: attraction, retention, digestion and expulsion.[1661]
[1662]Attraction[1663] is a ministring facultie, which as a Loadstone doth Iron, drawes meat into the stomack, or as a lamp doth oyle; and this attractive power is very necessary in Plants, which suck up moisture by the root, as another mouth, into the sap, as a like stomack. [1664]Retention keeps it, being attracted unto the stomack, untill such time it be concocted; for if it should pass away straight, the body could not be nourished.	Attraction is an assisting faculty that draws food into the stomach as a lodestone draws iron, or a lamp draws oil. This attractive power is essential in plants, which suck moisture through their roots as through a mouth, into the sap as into a stomach. Retention holds the food once it has been drawn into the stomach, until it is digested; if it passed straight through, the body could not be nourished.

[1659] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Vegetal soul. Subsect. 2.” The additional subsection designation is printed in the margin, not as a new body heading; it is preserved here.

[1660] Burton. k. “Nutritio est alimenti transmutatio, viro naturalis. Scal. exerc. 101. sect. 17.” Nutrition is the transformation of nourishment; Scaliger, Exercise 101, section 17. The printed viro naturalis is problematic, perhaps a corruption of vi naturali, “by natural power”; that reading is conjectural and is not substituted into the Latin.

[1661] Editor. “Substantial act” is a scholastic expression for an actuality that constitutes a living being. Altrix, auctrix and procreatrix mean nourishing, increasing and reproducing. The vegetative faculty belongs to animals and humans as well as plants; it is not a claim that plants alone possess these functions.

[1662] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Attraction.”

[1663] Burton. l. “See more of Attraction in Scal. exer. 343.” Scaliger, Exercise 343.

[1664] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Retention.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1665]Digestion is performed by natural heat; for as the flame of a torch consumes oyle, wax, tallow: so doth it alter and digest the nutritive matter. Indigestion is opposite unto it, for want of natural heat. Of this Digestion there be three differences, Maturation, Elixation, Assation.	Digestion is performed by natural heat: as a torch's flame consumes oil, wax or tallow, so natural heat transforms and digests the nutritive matter. Its opposite is indigestion, caused by insufficient natural heat. There are three kinds of digestion: ripening, boiling and roasting.[1666]
[1667]Maturation, is especially observed in the fruits of trees: which are then said to be ripe, when the seeds are fit to be sowne again. Cruditie is opposed to it, which Gluttons, Epicures, and idle persons are most subject unto, that use no exercise to stir up natural heat, or else choke it, as too much wood puts out a fire.	Ripening is especially evident in the fruit of trees, which is said to be ripe when its seeds are ready to be sown again. Its opposite is rawness or incomplete digestion, to which gluttons, lovers of luxury and idle people are especially prone. They take no exercise to kindle their natural heat, or else smother it as too much wood puts out a fire.[1668]
Source page 20–21 [1669]Elixation is the seething of meat in the stomack, by the said natural heat, as meat is boyled in a pot; to which corruption or putrefaction is opposite. [1670]Assation is a concoction of the inward moisture by heat; his opposite is Semiustulation.	Boiling is the simmering of food in the stomach through this natural heat, as food boils in a pot; its opposite is corruption or putrefaction. Roasting is the processing of internal moisture by heat; its opposite is incomplete roasting.[1671]

[1665] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Digestion."

[1666] Editor. The threefold division is comparable to Aristotle, Meteorology 4.2–3, where ripening, boiling and roasting are forms of concoction. The kitchen vocabulary is explanatory: natural heat was thought to process and perfect nutritive matter. It should not be read as literal cooking by fire inside the body.

[1667] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Maturation." Ripening.

[1668] Editor. "Crudity" joins the ideas of rawness, unripeness and incomplete digestion. "Epicures" here means people devoted to bodily pleasure or luxurious eating, without requiring membership in the ancient philosophical school. The judgement about idleness and indulgence is Burton's.

[1669] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Elixation." Boiling.

[1670] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Assation." Roasting.

[1671] Editor. Elixation is boiling; assation is roasting. Semiustulation literally suggests partial burning and here denotes incomplete roasting, the failed counterpart of the process. Compare the account of imperfect roasting in Aristotle, Meteorology 4.3. The terms name a historical theory of transformation by heat.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 21 [1672]Besides these three several operations of Digestion, there is a fourfold order of concoction: Mastication, or chewing in the mouth; Chilification of this so chewed meat in the stomack; the third is in the Liver, to turne this Chylus into bloud, called Sanguification; the last is Assimulation, which is in every part. [1673]Expulsion is a power of Nutrition, by which it expels all superfluous excrements, and reliques of meat and drink, by the guts, bladder, pores; as by purging, vomiting, spitting, sweating, urine, haires, nailes, &c.	Besides these three operations of digestion, there is a fourfold sequence of digestive processing: mastication, or chewing in the mouth; the conversion of chewed food into chyle in the stomach; third, its conversion in the liver from chyle into blood, called sanguification; and last, assimilation, which takes place in every part. Expulsion is the power of nutrition that eliminates all surplus waste and remnants of food and drink through the intestines, bladder and pores: by purging, vomiting, spitting, sweating, urine, hair, nails and so on.[1674]
[1675]As this Nutritive facultie serves to nourish the body, so doth the Augmenting facultie (the second operation or power of the Vegetal facultie) to the increasing of it in quantity, according to all Dimensions, long, broad, thick, and to make it grow till it come to his due proportion and perfect shape: which hath his period of augmentation, as of consumption: and that most certaine, as the Poet observes:	As the nutritive faculty nourishes the body, so the faculty of growth—the second operation or power of the vegetative faculty—increases its size in every dimension, length, breadth and thickness, until it reaches its proper proportions and complete form. It has its appointed period of growth, as it does of decline, and that is certain, as the poet observes:
Stat sua cuique dies, breve & irreparabile tempus Omnibus est vitæ;——	Each has his appointed day; for everyone The time of life is brief and cannot be restored.[1676]
A terme of life is set to every man; Which is but short, and pass it no one can.	A span of life is set for everyone; It is but short, and none can live beyond it.

[1672] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Order of concoction four-fold.”

[1673] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Expulsion.”

[1674] Editor. Chilification produces chyle; sanguification produces blood; assimilation incorporates nourishment into each part. The four stages here include chewing, whereas earlier passages counted stages differently. Hair and nails are listed among products by which excess matter is discharged; the historical classification is preserved.

[1675] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Augmentation.” Growth.

[1676] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 10.467–468: Jupiter speaks to Hercules as Pallas faces death. The Latin is translated anew. Burton’s following English couplet is also retained and modernized, since it is a separate authorial verse gloss rather than simply omitted as repetition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1677]The last of these Vegetal faculties is Generation, which begets another by meanes of seed, like unto it self, to the perpetual preservation of the Species. To this faculty they ascribe three subordinate operations: The first to turne nourishment into seed, &c.	The last of these vegetative faculties is reproduction, which through seed produces another like itself, perpetually preserving the species. They assign three subordinate operations to this faculty, the first being to turn nourishment into seed, and so on.[1678]
[1679]Necessary concomitants or affections of this Vegetal facultie, are life, & his privation, death. To the preservation of life the natural heat is most requisite, though siccity and humidity, and those first qualities, be not excluded. This heat is likewise in Plants, as appeares by their increasing, fructifying, &c. though not so easily perceived. In all bodies it must have radicall [1680]moisture to preserve it, that it be not consumed; to which preservation our clime, country, temperature, and the good or bad use of those six non-natural things availe much.	Necessary accompaniments or conditions of this vegetative faculty are life and its absence, death. Natural heat is essential to preserving life, though dryness, moisture and the other primary qualities also play a part. This heat exists in plants too, as their growth and fruiting show, although it is harder to perceive. In every body it needs innate moisture to sustain it and prevent its exhaustion. Our climate, country, bodily constitution, and good or bad management of the six non-natural things contribute greatly to its preservation.[1681]
For as this natural heat and moisture decayes, so doth our life it selfe: and if not prevented before by some violent accident, or interrupted through our own default, is in the end dryed up by old age, and extinguished by death for want of matter, as a Lampe for defect of oyl to maintain it.	For as this natural heat and moisture diminish, so does life itself. Unless cut short beforehand by some violent accident or interrupted through our own fault, it is finally dried up by old age and extinguished in death for want of fuel, like a lamp without oil to sustain it.

[1677] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Generation.” Reproduction.

[1678] Editor. “Seed” is generative material. Burton announces three subordinate operations but names only the first, ending with “&c.” The modern text preserves that incompleteness rather than supplying the other two.

[1679] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Life and death concomitants of the Vegetal faculties.”

[1680] Burton. m. “Vita consistit in calido & humido.” Life consists in heat and moisture.

[1681] Editor. “Radical” means rooted or innate; the moisture is imagined as sustaining vital heat as oil sustains a lamp. “Temperature” means bodily constitution or the balance of qualities. The six non-natural things are the traditional conditions affecting health: air; food and drink; movement and rest; sleep and waking; retention and evacuation; and the passions. “Non-natural” is a technical classification, not a synonym for unnatural.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 6. Of the sensible Soul.	Subsection 6. The sensitive soul.
Next in order is the Sensible Faculty, which is as far beyond the other in dignity, as a Beast is preferred to a Plant, having those Vegetal powers included in it. 'Tis defined an Act of an organical body by which it lives, hath sense, appetite, judgment, breath and motion. His object in general is a sensible or passible quality, because the sense is affected with it. The general Organ is the Brain, from which principally the sensible operations are derived.	Next in order comes the sensitive faculty, which exceeds the other in dignity as much as an animal ranks above a plant, since it includes those vegetative powers. It is defined as the actuality of an organized body by which that body lives, senses, desires, judges, breathes and moves. Its object in general is a perceptible or "passible" quality, since the sense is affected by it. Its common organ is the brain, from which the operations of sensation principally arise.[1682]
Source page 21–22 This Sensible Soul is divided into two parts, Apprehending or Moving. By the Apprehensive power we perceive the Species of sensible things present, or absent, and retaine them as waxe doth the print of a seale. By the Moving, the Body is outwardly carried from one place to another: or inwardly moved by spirits & pulse.	This sensitive soul is divided into two powers: perception and movement. Through the perceptive power we apprehend the sensory forms of things present or absent, and retain them as wax retains the impression of a seal. Through the moving power, the body is carried externally from one place to another, or moved internally by the spirits and the pulse.[1683]
Source page 22 The Apprehensive faculty is subdivided into two parts, Inward, or Outward. Outward, as the five senses, of Touching, Hearing, Seeing, Smelling, Tasting; to which you may adde Scaligers sixt sense of Titillation, if you please; or that of Speech, which is the sixt external sense, according to Lullius. Inward are three; Common sense, Phantasie, Memory.	The perceptive faculty is subdivided into two parts, internal and external. The external senses are the five of touch, hearing, sight, smell and taste. To these you may add Scaliger's sixth sense of tickling, if you please, or speech, which Lullius considers the sixth external sense. There are three internal senses: common sense, imagination and memory.[1684]

[1682] Editor. "Sensible" and "sensitive" mean capable of sensation, not sensible in the modern sense of reasonable. "Act" continues the scholastic use of actuality explained in Block 024. "Passible" is retained as a technical term: Burton explains the object through its effect on a sense. "Organical" means furnished with organs.

[1683] Editor. "Species" are the forms or representations through which objects are apprehended, not biological species. "Spirits" are subtle bodily agents in the historical physiology. The wax and seal express the reception and retention of an impression.

[1684] Editor. Titillation is tickling or pleasurable tactile stimulation. Lullius is Ramon Llull. "Common sense" is the internal faculty that coordinates sensory information, not practical good judgement. Burton's attributions of additional senses to Scaliger and Llull are retained; their exact source passages remain to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Those five outward senses have their object in outward things only, & such as are present, as the eye sees no colour except it be at hand, the ear sound. Three of these senses are of commodity, Hearing, Sight, and Smell: two of necessity, Touch, and Taste, without which we cannot live.	The five external senses have as their objects only external things that are present: the eye sees no colour unless it is within reach, nor does the ear hear a sound. Three of these senses—hearing, sight and smell—are useful; two—touch and taste—are necessary, and without them we cannot live.
Besides the Sensitive power is Active or Passive. Active in sight, the eye sees the colour; Passive when it is hurt by his object, as the eye by the sunne beames: According to that Axiom, Visibile forte destruit sensum. Or if the object be not pleasing, as a bad sound to the ear, a stinking smell to the nose, &c.	Moreover, the sensitive power is active or passive. It is active in sight when the eye sees a colour; passive when its object harms it, as the sun's rays harm the eye. Hence the axiom: an excessively powerful visible object destroys the sense. Or the object may be unpleasant, as a disagreeable sound is to the ear, a stench to the nose, and so on.[1685]
[1686]Of these five senses, Sight is held to be most precious, and the best, and that by reason of his object, it sees the whole body at once; by it we learn, & discerne all things, a sense most excellent for use, to the Sight three things are required, the object, the Organ, and the Medium. The object in general is Visible, or that which is to be seen, as colours, and all shining bodies.	Of these five senses, sight is considered the most precious and the best because of its object: it sees the whole body at once. Through it we learn and distinguish all things; it is a sense of outstanding usefulness. Sight requires three things: the object, the organ and the medium. Its object in general is the visible, or whatever can be seen, such as colours and all shining bodies.

[1685] Editor. The Latin maxim is translated directly. Compare Aristotle, On the Soul 2.12, on an excessive sensible object damaging the sense organ. Burton's contrast here concerns both the exercise of a sense and its being acted upon, injured or displeased.

[1686] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Sight."

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Medium is the illumination of the ayre, which comes from [1687]light, commonly called Diaphanum; for in dark we cannot see. The Organ is the eye, & chiefly the apple of it; which by those Optick Nerves, concurring both in one, conveys the sight to the common sense. Betwixt the Organ and Object a true distance is required, that it be not too near, or too far off.	The medium is the illumination of the air by light, commonly called the transparent medium, for we cannot see in the dark. The organ is the eye, especially its pupil, which conveys sight to the common sense through the two optic nerves, meeting in one. A suitable distance is needed between organ and object: the object must be neither too near nor too far away.[1688]
Many excellent questions appertain to this sense, discussed by Philosophers: as whether this sight be caused intra mittendo, vel extra mittendo, &c. by receiving in the visible species, or sending of them out; which [1689]Plato, [1690]Plutarch, [1691]Macrobius, [1692]Lactantius, and others dispute. And besides it is the subject of the Perspectives, of which Alhazen the Arabian, Vitellio, Roger Bacon, Baptista Porta, Guidus Vbaldus, Aquilonius, &c. have written whole volumes.	Philosophers discuss many excellent questions concerning this sense: whether sight is produced by taking in visible forms or sending them out, for instance, a matter debated by Plato, Plutarch, Macrobius, Lactantius and others. It is also the subject of optics, on which the Arab Alhazen, Witelo, Roger Bacon, Giambattista della Porta, Guidobaldo and Aguilonius, among others, have written whole volumes.[1693]

[1687] Burton. n. “Lumen est actus perspicui. Lumen a luce provenit, lux est in corpore lucido.” Illumination is the actuality of the transparent. Illumination proceeds from light; light is in the luminous body. The Latin distinguishes lumen, illumination in the medium, from lux, light at its source.

[1688] Editor. Diaphanum means the transparent medium. The sentence compresses the distinction between the air, its illumination and light; the marginal note makes the lumen/lux distinction explicit. Compare Aristotle, On the Soul 2.7, 418b, on light as the actuality of the transparent. “Apple” means the pupil. The optic-nerve account is retained as given.

[1689] Burton. o. “Satur. 7. c. 14.” Saturnalia, book 7, chapter 14. The marker stands before Plato, although the title is Macrobius’s; the printed attachment is retained.

[1690] Burton. p. “In phædon.” In the Phaedo. The marker stands before Plutarch, although Phaedo is a dialogue of Plato; the attachment is retained.

[1691] Burton. q. “Lac. cap. 8. de opif. Dei 1.” Lactantius, chapter 8 of On the Workmanship of God; the final printed 1 is retained. The marker stands before Macrobius, although the abbreviation names Lactantius.

[1692] Burton. r. “De pract. Philos. 4.” The printed abbreviation and marker before Lactantius are retained. Compare the work transmitted under Plutarch as De placitis philosophorum, book 4, chapter 13, on theories of vision. This is a plausible identification, not an established correction or reassignment of the marker.

[1693] Editor. “Perspectives” means the science of optics. The Latin contrasts reception and emission theories of vision. The four printed citation markers do not match the adjacent names consistently: Macrobius, Saturnalia 7.14, and Lactantius, On the Workmanship of God 8, discuss vision, but their references stand by other authors. No silent reassignment is made. The optical writers include Ibn al-Haytham (Alhazen), Witelo, Guidobaldo del Monte and François d’Aguilon (Aguilonius).

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1694]Hearing, a most excellent outward sense, by which we learne and get knowledge. His object is sound, or that which is heard; the Medium, ayre; Organ the ear. To the sound, which is a collision of the ayre, three things are required: a body to strike, as the hand of a musician; the body strucken, which must be solid and able to resist, as a bell, lute-string; not wooll, or spunge; the Medium, the ayre: which is Inward, or Outward;	Hearing is an excellent external sense through which we learn and gain knowledge. Its object is sound, or what is heard; its medium, air; its organ, the ear. Sound, which is a collision of air, requires three things: a body to strike, such as a musician's hand; a body to be struck, which must be solid and offer resistance, such as a bell or lute string, not wool or sponge; and the medium, air, which is internal or external.
the outward being struck or collided by a solid body, still strikes the next ayre, untill it come to that inward natural ayre, which as an exquisite organ is contained in a little skin formed like a drum head, and struck upon by certaine small instruments like drum stickes, conveyes the sound by a pair of Nerves, appropriated to that use, to the common sense, as to a judge of sounds. There is great variety and much delight in them; for the knowledge of which, consult with Boethius, and other Musicians.	External air, struck or driven together by a solid body, strikes the air next to it in succession until it reaches the natural air within. This internal air is contained, as a finely sensitive instrument, in a small membrane shaped like a drumhead. Struck by certain little instruments like drumsticks, it conveys sound through a pair of nerves assigned to that purpose to the common sense, the judge of sounds. Sounds have great variety and offer much delight; for knowledge of them, consult Boethius and other writers on music.[1695]

[1694] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Hearing."

[1695] Editor. The drumhead and drumstick analogy belongs to Burton's inherited account of hearing; it has not been replaced with a modern description. Compare Aristotle, On the Soul 2.8, on external air moving the air within the ear. Boethius is invoked as an authority on musical theory, rather than merely a performer.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 22–23 [1696]Smelling, is an outward sense which apprehends by the Nostrils drawing in aire; And of all the rest it is the weakest sense in men. The Organ is the nose, or two small hollow pieces of flesh a little above it: The Medium the ayre to men as water to fish: The object, Smell, arising from a mixt body resolved, which whether it be a quality, fume, vapour, or exhalation, I will not now dispute, or of their differences, and how they are caused.	Smell is an external sense that perceives through the nostrils drawing in air. Of all the senses it is the weakest in human beings. Its organ is the nose, or two small hollow pieces of flesh a little above it; its medium is air for humans, as water is for fish. Its object is odour, arising from a compound body as it breaks down. Whether this is a quality, fume, vapour or exhalation, and how these differ or are produced, I will not now discuss.[1697]
Source page 23 This sense is an Organ of health, as Sight and Hearing, saith [1698]Agellius, are of discipline; and that by avoiding bad smels, as by choosing good, which do as much alter and affect the body many times, as Diet it self.	This sense is an instrument of health, as sight and hearing, says Aulus Gellius, are instruments of learning. It serves health by avoiding bad smells and choosing good ones, which often alter and affect the body as much as diet itself.[1699]

[1696] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Smelling.”

[1697] Editor. A “mixt body” is matter composed of different constituents; “resolved” means broken down or separated. Burton deliberately leaves open the nature of the emanation that produces smell. The two pieces of flesh are retained without imposing a precise present-day anatomical identification.

[1698] Burton. s. “Lib. 19. cap. 2.” Book 19, chapter 2 of Aulus Gellius’s Attic Nights.

[1699] Editor. “Discipline” means instruction or learning. Burton cites Attic Nights 19.2, a discussion distinguishing pleasures of the senses and those shared with beasts. His particular formulation about smell as an instrument of health is absent from that chapter; the immediate source remains to be identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1700]Taste, a necessary sense, which perceives all savours by the Tongue and Palat, and that by meanes of a thin spittle, or watery juice. His Organ is the Tongue with his tasting nerves; the Medium, a watery juice; the object Taste, or savor, which is a quality in the juice, arising from the mixture of things tasted. Some make eight species or kindes of savor, bitter, sweet, sharp, salt, &c. all which sick men (as in an ague) cannot discerne, by reason of their organs misaffected.	Taste is a necessary sense that perceives all flavours through the tongue and palate, by means of thin saliva or a watery fluid. Its organ is the tongue with its nerves of taste; its medium, a watery fluid; its object, taste or flavour, a quality in the fluid arising from the mixture of things tasted. Some distinguish eight kinds of flavour: bitter, sweet, sharp, salty, and so on. Sick people, as in a fever, cannot distinguish all these because their organs are impaired.[1701]
[1702]Touch, the last of the senses, and most ignoble, yet of as great necessity as the other, and of as much pleasure. This sense is exquisite in men, and by his Nerves dispersed all over the body, perceives any tactile quality. His Organ, the Nerves; his object those first qualities, hot, dry, moist, cold; and those that follow them, hard, soft, thick, thin, &c. Many delightsome questions are moved by Philosophers about these five senses; their Organs, Objects, Mediums, which for brevity I omit.	Touch is the last and least noble of the senses, yet as necessary and pleasurable as the other. This sense is finely developed in humans and perceives every tangible quality through its nerves, distributed throughout the body. Its organ is the nerves; its objects are the primary qualities—hot, dry, moist and cold—and the qualities that follow from them, such as hard, soft, thick and thin. Philosophers raise many delightful questions about these five senses, their organs, objects and media, which I omit for brevity.[1703]

[1700] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Taste.”

[1701] Editor. An “ague” is a fever, often an intermittent fever. Burton announces eight flavours but supplies only four examples and “&c.”; the other four have not been added. “Sharp” retains a broader historical range than a single modern taste category.

[1702] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Touching.”

[1703] Editor. The primary qualities—hot, cold, moist and dry—belong to the elemental and humoral account underlying this anatomy. “Ignoble” denotes a low rank in the hierarchy of senses; it does not mean touch is unnecessary. The ranking and the claim about necessity are Burton’s.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 7. Of the Inward Senses.	Subsection 7. The internal senses.
[1704]Inner Senses are three in number, so called, because they be within the brain-pan, as Common Sense, Phantasie, Memory. Their objects are not only things present, but they perceive the sensible species of things to Come, Past, Absent, such as were before in the sense. This Common sense is the Judge or Moderator of the rest, by whom we discerne all differences of objects; for by mine eye I do not know that I see, or by mine eare that I hear, but by my Common sense, who judgeth of Sounds and Colours: they are but the Organs to bring the Species to be censured; so that all their objects are his, and all their offices are his: The fore-part of the Brain is his Organ or seat.	There are three internal senses, so called because they are within the skull: common sense, imagination and memory. Their objects are not merely things present; they also perceive the sensory forms of future, past and absent things, forms previously received through the senses. This common sense is the judge or governor of the others, by which we distinguish all differences between objects. It is not through my eye that I know I see, nor through my ear that I know I hear, but through my common sense, which judges sounds and colours. The others are merely the organs that bring sensory forms to be assessed; all their objects and all their functions therefore belong to it. Its organ or seat is the front of the brain.[1705]

[1704] Burton. Unlettered heading: “Common sense.”

[1705] Editor. “Brain-pan” means the skull. Common sense is pictured as a judge receiving evidence from the external senses. “Censured” means assessed, not condemned. Future or absent objects are represented through forms previously received, not described here as directly sensed at a distance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1706]Phantasie, or Imagination, which some call Æstimative, or Cogitative, (confirmed, saith [1707]Fernelius, by frequent meditation) is an inner sense which doth more fully examine the species perceived by Common sense, of things present or absent, and keeps them longer, recalling them to minde again, or making new of his own. In time of sleep this faculty is free, and many times conceives strange, stupend, absurd shapes, as in sick men we commonly observe. His organ is the middle cell of the Brain; his objects all the Species communicated to him by the Common sense, by comparison of which he faines infinite other unto himself.	Fancy, or imagination, which some call the estimative or cogitative faculty, is strengthened, Fernel says, by frequent reflection. It is an internal sense that examines more fully the forms of present or absent things perceived by common sense, and retains them longer, recalling them to mind or inventing new ones of its own. During sleep this faculty is free, and often conceives strange, astonishing and absurd shapes, as we commonly observe in sick people. Its organ is the brain's middle chamber; its objects are all the forms communicated to it by common sense, which it compares to invent countless others for itself.[1708]
Source page 23–24 In Melancholy men this faculty is most powerful and strong, and often hurts, producing many monstrous and prodigious things, especially if it be stirred up by some terrible object, presented to it from Common sense, or Memory. In Poets and Painters Imagination forcibly workes, as appears by their several Fictions, Anticks, Images: as Ovids house of sleep, Psyches palace in Apuleius, &c. In men it is subject and governed by Reason, or at least should be; but in brutes it hath no superiour, and is ratio brutorum, all the reason they have.	In people with melancholy this faculty is especially powerful and strong, and often does harm, producing many monstrous and extraordinary things, particularly when stirred by some terrifying object presented by common sense or memory. Imagination works forcefully in poets and painters, as their various inventions, grotesques and images show: Ovid's house of Sleep, Psyche's palace in Apuleius, and so on. In humans it is subject to reason's government, or at least should be; in other animals it has no superior and is their reason—all the reason they possess.[1709]

[1706] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Phantasie."

[1707] Burton. t. "Physi. l. 5. c. 8." Jean Fernel, Physiology, book 5, chapter 8.

[1708] Editor. "Estimative" and "cogitative" name powers of estimation or thought in the older psychology; Burton groups them under imagination. "Meditation" means sustained reflection. The assignment of faculties to chambers of the brain is the historical ventricular model described in Block 024.

[1709] Editor. "Anticks" are grotesque figures or fanciful designs, not simply playful behaviour. Ovid describes the dwelling of Sleep in Metamorphoses 11.592–615; Psyche discovers the marvellous palace in Apuleius, Metamorphoses (The Golden Ass) 5.1–2. These examples connect the dangerous inventions of melancholy with artistic creation. The contrast between human and animal reason is Burton's stated position here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 24 [1710]Memory layes up all the species which the senses have brought in, and records them as a good Register, that they may be forth-coming when they are called for by Phantasie and Reason. His object is the same with Phantasie, his seat and Organ the back part of the brain.	Memory stores all the forms brought in by the senses and records them like a good clerk, so that they are available when imagination and reason call for them. Its object is the same as imagination's; its seat and organ is the back of the brain.[1711]
[1712]The affections of these senses, are Sleepe and Waking, common to all sensible creatures. Sleep is a rest or binding of the outward Senses, and of the common sense, for the preservation of Body and Soul, (as [1713]Scaliger defines it) For when the common sense resteth, the outward senses rest also. The Phantasie alone is free, and his commander, Reason: as appeares by those imaginarie Dreames, which are of divers kinds, Natural, Divine, Dæmoniacall &c. which vary according to humors, diet, actions, objects, &c. of which, Artemidorus, Cardanus, and Sambucus, with their several Interpretors, have written great volumes.	The states of these senses are sleep and waking, common to all creatures capable of sensation. Sleep, as Scaliger defines it, is a rest or suspension of the external senses and common sense, for the preservation of body and soul. When common sense rests, the external senses rest too. Imagination alone is free, together with its commander, reason, as is evident from dreams. These are of various kinds—natural, divine, demonic, and so on—and vary with the humours, diet, actions, objects of perception and other circumstances. Artemidorus, Cardano and Sambucus, with their respective interpreters, have written large volumes about them.[1714]

[1710] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Memory."

[1711] Editor. "Register" means a recorder or recording officer, fitting the personification of memory as a keeper of records. The placement at the back of the brain belongs to the same ventricular account as the preceding passage.

[1712] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Affections of the senses, sleep, and waking."

[1713] Burton. u. "Exercit. 280." Julius Caesar Scaliger, Exercise 280.

[1714] Editor. Here "affections" are states of the senses, not emotions. The apparent tension between "imagination alone" and the addition of reason is retained. "Divine" and "demonic" identify historical categories of dreams. Cardanus is Girolamo Cardano; the precise works intended by the grouped references, including Sambucus, remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This ligation of senses, proceeds from an inhibition of spirits, the way being stopped by which they should come; this stopping is caused of vapours arising out of the stomack, filling the Nerves, by which the spirits should be conveyed. When these vapours are spent, the passage is open, and the spirits performe their accustomed duties; so that Waking is the action and motion of the Senses, which the Spirits dispersed over all parts, cause.	This suspension of the senses comes from a checking of the spirits, whose passage is blocked. The blockage is caused by vapours rising from the stomach and filling the nerves through which the spirits should travel. When these vapours have dispersed, the passage opens and the spirits perform their usual duties. Waking, then, is the activity and movement of the senses caused by the spirits distributed throughout the body.[1715]

[1715] Editor. "Ligation" means binding or suspension. Vapours obstructing the passage of bodily spirits supply the mechanism in this historical explanation of sleep; nerves are treated as passages conveying those spirits. The modern column preserves the theory rather than substituting a present-day account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 8. Of the Moving faculty.	Subsection 8. The moving faculty.
This Moving Faculty, is the other power of the Sensitive Soul, which causeth all those Inward and Outward animal motions in the body. It is divided into two faculties, the power of Appetite, and of moving from place to place. [1716]This of appetite is threefold, so some will have it; Natural, as it signifies any such inclination, as of a stone to fall downward, and such actions as Retention, Expulsion, which depend not of sense, but are Vegetal, as the Appetite of meat and drink; hunger and thirst. Sensitive is common to men and brutes.	This moving faculty is the other power of the sensitive soul, causing all those internal and external animal movements in the body. It is divided into two faculties: appetite and movement from place to place. Some hold that appetite is threefold. Natural appetite means an inclination such as a stone's to fall downwards, or such actions as retention and expulsion, which depend on vegetative powers rather than sensation; it includes the appetite for food and drink, hunger and thirst. Sensitive appetite is common to humans and other animals.[1717]
Voluntary, the third, or intellective, which commands the other two in men, and is a curb unto them, or at least should be; but for the most part is captivated and over-ruled by them: and men are led like beasts by sense, giving reines to their concupiscence and several lusts.	The third is voluntary or intellectual appetite, which commands the other two in humans and restrains them, or at least should do. Yet it is usually held captive and overruled by them, and people are led like beasts by their senses, giving free rein to their cravings and various desires.
For by this Appetite the soul is led or inclined to follow that good which the Senses shall approve, or avoid that which they hold evil: his object being good or evil, the one he imbraceth, the other he rejecteth: according to that Aphorisme, Omnia appetunt bonum, all things seek their own good, or at least seeming good. This power is inseparable from sense; for where sense is, there is likewise pleasure and pain.	Through appetite the soul is led or inclined to pursue what the senses approve as good, or avoid what they consider evil. Its object is good or evil: it embraces one and rejects the other, according to the maxim that all things seek their own good, or at least what appears good. This power is inseparable from sensation, for wherever there is sensation there is also pleasure and pain.

[1716] Burton. Unlettered heading: "Appetite."

[1717] Editor. "Appetite" covers inclinations and desires far beyond hunger. "Animal" concerns powers of sensation and movement. Burton's natural appetite includes inanimate tendencies and vegetative operations; sensitive and intellectual appetites extend the hierarchy. "Retention" and "expulsion" were discussed among the nutritive functions in Block 024.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 24–25 His Organ is the same with the Common sense, and is divided into two powers, or inclinations, Concupiscible or Irascible: or (as [1718]one translates it) Coveting, Anger invading, or Impugning. Concupiscible covets alwayes pleasant and delightsome things, and abhorres that which is distastful, harsh and unpleasant. Irascible, [1719]quasi aversans per iram & odium, as avoiding it with anger and indignation.	Its organ is the same as that of common sense. It is divided into two powers or inclinations, the concupiscible and the irascible—or, as one writer translates them, coveting, and anger that attacks or resists. The concupiscible always desires pleasant and delightful things and recoils from what is disagreeable, harsh or unpleasant. The irascible turns away through anger and hatred, avoiding the object with anger and indignation.[1720]
Source page 25 All affections and perturbations arise out of these two fountaines, which although the Stoickes make light of, we hold natural, and not to be resisted. The good affections are caused by some object of the same nature; And if present, they procure joy, which dilates the heart, & preserves the body: if absent, they cause Hope, Love, Desire, and Concupiscence. The Bad are Simple or mixt: Simple for some bad object present, as sorrow, which contracts the Heart, macerates the Soule, subverts the good estate of the Body, hindering all the operations of it, causing Melancholy, and many times death it self: or future, as Fear.	All emotions and disturbances arise from these two springs. Although the Stoics make little of them, we regard them as natural and not to be resisted. Good emotions are caused by an object that is itself good. If present, it produces joy, which expands the heart and preserves the body; if absent, it causes hope, love, desire and longing. Bad emotions are simple or mixed. Simple ones concern some evil object present, as sorrow does: it contracts the heart, torments the soul, undermines the body's well-being and hinders all its operations, causing melancholy and often death itself. Or they concern some future evil, as fear does.[1721]

[1718] Burton. x. "T. W. Jesuite in his Passions of the Minde." Thomas Wright, The Passions of the Mind in General (1604), book 1, chapter 5, page 19, gives the terms coveting, desiring, wishing, and anger, invading, impugning. He describes one faculty with two inclinations, matching Burton's distinction.

[1719] Burton. y. "Velcurio." The cited authority is Johannes Velcurio; no location is supplied here.

[1720] Editor. The concupiscible power seeks pleasure and avoids what is unpleasant; the irascible responds through resistance or anger. The old technical names are retained and explained in the text. Concupiscence and lust can mean desire broadly, without an exclusively sexual meaning. The Latin aversans per iram & odium and Burton's English gloss differ slightly: hatred in the Latin becomes indignation in the gloss; both are represented.

[1721] Editor. "Affections," "perturbations" and "passions" here concern emotions and their disturbances. The account of expanding or contracting the heart makes feeling a bodily event. Burton's judgement about the Stoics and his phrase "not to be resisted" are preserved; they sit beside his earlier insistence that reason should govern appetite.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Out of these two arise those mixt affections and passions of Anger, which is a desire of revenge; Hatred, which is inveterate anger; Zeal, which is offended with him who hurts that he loves; and ἐπιχαιρεκακία, a compound affection of Joy and Hate, when we rejoyce at other mens mischief, and are grieved at their prosperity; Pride, Self-love, Emulation, Envie, Shame, &c. of which elsewhere.	From these two arise the mixed emotions and passions: anger, a desire for revenge; hatred, inveterate anger; zeal, which takes offence at anyone who harms what it loves; and malicious joy, a compound of joy and hatred, when we rejoice in other people's misfortunes and grieve at their prosperity. There are also pride, self-love, rivalry, envy, shame, and others, of which I speak elsewhere.[1722]
Moving from place to place, is a faculty necessarily following the other. For in vaine were it otherwise to desire and to abhor, if we had not likewise power to prosecute or eschue, by moving the body from place to place: By this faculty therefore we locally move the body, or any part of it, and go from one place to another. To the better performance of which, three things are requisite: That which moves; by what it moves; that which is moved.	Movement from place to place is a faculty that necessarily follows the other. Desire and aversion would otherwise be pointless if we had no power to pursue or avoid their objects by moving the body from place to place. Through this faculty, therefore, we move the body or any of its parts, and go from one place to another. To carry this out properly, three things are required: what causes movement, the means by which it moves, and what is moved.
That which moves, is either the Efficient cause, or End. The end is the object, which is desired or eschued; as in a dog to catch a hare, &c. The efficient cause in man is Reason, or his subordinate Phantasie, which apprehends good or bad objects: in brutes Imagination alone, which moves the Appetite, the Appetite this faculty, which by an admirable league of Nature, and by mediation of the spirit commands the Organ by which it moves:	What causes movement is either its efficient cause or its end. The end is the object desired or avoided, as when a dog seeks to catch a hare. The efficient cause in humans is reason, or imagination acting under it, which perceives good or bad objects. In other animals it is imagination alone, which moves appetite; appetite moves this faculty, which, through a wonderful bond established by nature and through the mediation of the spirit, commands the organ by which it acts.[1723]

[1722] Editor. The Greek epichairekakia means delight in another's misfortune, rendered "malicious joy." Burton adds grief at another's prosperity to his description; this fuller definition is retained. "Emulation" means competitive rivalry here, not merely copying an example. His "these two" follows the pairing of sorrow and fear.

[1723] Editor. An efficient cause is the agent or source that brings an action about; its end is the aim for the sake of which it occurs. Burton traces movement from an apprehended object through reason or imagination, appetite and the bodily organs. The word "spirit" remains a physiological term.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and that consists of Nerves, Muscles, Cords, dispersed through the whole body, contracted and relaxed as the spirits will, which move the Muscles, or [1724]Nerves in the midst of them, and draw the cord, and so per consequens the joynt, to the place intended. That which is moved, is the body or some member apt to move.	That organ consists of nerves, muscles and tendons distributed throughout the body, contracting and relaxing as the spirits direct. The spirits move the muscles, or the nerves within them, and draw the tendon—and consequently the joint—to the intended position. What is moved is the body or some part capable of movement.[1725]
The motion of the body is divers, as going, running, leaping, dancing, sitting, & such like, referred to the predicament of Situs. Wormes creep, Birds flie, Fishes swim; and so of parts, the chief of which is Respiration or breathing, and is thus performed.	The body's movements are various: walking, running, leaping, dancing, sitting and the like, referred to the category of bodily position. Worms creep, birds fly and fish swim. There are also movements of the parts, the chief being respiration, or breathing, which takes place as follows.[1726]
The outward aire is drawn in by the vocall Artery, and sent by mediation of the Midrife to the Lungs which dilating themselves as a pair of bellowes, reciprocally fetch it in, and send it out to the heart to coole it: and from thence now being hot, convey it again, still taking in fresh. Such a like motion is that of the Pulse, of which, because many have written whole bookes, I will say nothing.	The outside air is drawn in through the windpipe and sent, through the action of the diaphragm, to the lungs. Expanding like a pair of bellows, they alternately draw it in and send it out to the heart to cool it; then they carry it back from there, now warmed, continually taking in fresh air. The pulse has a similar movement, about which I will say nothing, since many have written whole books on it.[1727]

[1724] Burton. z. "Nervi à spiritu moventur, spiritus ab anima. Melanct." The nerves are moved by the spirit; the spirit by the soul. Melanchthon.

[1725] Editor. "Cords" are tendons or sinews. Burton's terminology overlaps structures that later anatomy distinguishes more sharply. The directing spirits and Melanchthon's soul–spirit–nerve sequence are retained as the passage's explanation of movement.

[1726] Editor. A "predicament" is a logical category; situs is position or posture. Burton includes sitting among movements and refers the group to this category. The classification is preserved rather than made mechanically consistent with modern usage.

[1727] Editor. "Vocall artery" means the windpipe, and "midriff" here means the diaphragm. The bellows comparison accompanies a historical account in which air is sent to cool the heart. The reference to cooling, and the return of the heated air, have not been replaced with modern respiratory physiology.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 26 SUBSEC. 9. Of the Rational Soul.	Subsection 9. The Rational Soul
In the precedent Subsections I have anatomized those inferior faculties of the soul; the Rational remaineth, a pleasant, but a doubtful subject (as [1728]one termes it) and with the like brevity to be discussed. Many erronious opinions are about the essence and original of it; whether it be fire, as Zeno held; harmony, as Aristoxenus; number as Xenocrates; whether it be organical, or inorganical; seated in the brain, heart or bloud; mortal or immortal; how it comes into the body.	In the preceding subsections I have dissected the lower faculties of the soul. The rational faculty remains: a pleasant but uncertain subject, as one writer calls it, to be discussed with the same brevity. Many mistaken opinions concern its essence and origin: whether it is fire, as Zeno held; harmony, as Aristoxenus thought; or number, as Xenocrates maintained; whether it depends on bodily organs or is independent of them; whether it is seated in the brain, heart or blood; whether it is mortal or immortal; and how it enters the body.[1729]
Some holde that it is ex traduce, as Phil. 1. de Animâ, Tertullian, Lactantius de opific. Dei cap. 19. Hugo lib. de Spiritu & Animâ, Vincentius Bellavic. spec. natural. lib. 23. cap. 2. & 11. Hippocrates, Avicenna, and many [1730]late writers; that one man begets another, body and soul: or as a candle from a candle, to be produced from the seed:	Some hold that it is propagated from the parent, including Philip in book 1 of On the Soul; Tertullian; Lactantius in chapter 19 of On the Workmanship of God; Hugh in On the Spirit and the Soul; Vincent of Beauvais in the Mirror of Nature, book 23, chapters 2 and 11; Hippocrates; Avicenna; and many recent writers. One person begets another, body and soul: the soul is produced from the seed as one candle is lit from another.[1731]

[1728] Burton. a. “Velcurio. Iucundum & anceps subjectum.” Velcurio: a pleasant and doubtful subject.

[1729] Editor. “Original” means origin. “Organical” and “inorganical” concern dependence on bodily organs, not the modern distinction between organic and inorganic matter. The ensuing catalogue reports positions as Burton groups them; it is not a verified history of each philosopher’s doctrine.

[1730] Burton. b. “Goclenius in Ψυχολ. pag. 302. Bright in Phys. Scrib. l. 1. David Crusius, Melancton, Hippius Hernius, Levinus Lemnius, &c.” Goclenius in his Psychology, p. 302; Bright in his Physics; Scribonius, book 1; and the other named authorities. The printed grouping “Hippius Hernius” is retained without supplying punctuation or resolving the names.

[1731] Editor. Ex traduce means by propagation or transmission from the parent, the theory called traducianism. “Phil.” is expanded as Philip, conventionally Melanchthon. Burton’s inherited attribution of On the Spirit and the Soul to Hugh is retained; this and the individual references await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
otherwise, say they, a man begets but half a man, and is worse then a beast that begets both matter and forme; and besides the three faculties of the soule must be together infused, which is most absurd as they hold, because in beasts they are begot, the two inferior I meane, and may not be well separated in men. [1732]Galen suposeth the soul crasin esse, to be the Temperature it self;	Otherwise, they say, a person begets only half a person and is worse off than a beast, which begets both matter and form. Moreover, all three faculties of the soul would have to be infused together. This they consider utterly absurd, since in beasts the two lower faculties, which I mean here, are begotten, and in human beings they cannot properly be separated. Galen supposes the soul to be the bodily temperament itself.[1733]
Trismegistus, Musæus, Orpheus, Homer, Pindarus, Phærecides Syrus, Epictetus, with the Chaldees and Ægyptians, affirmed the soul to be immortal, as did those Britan [1734]Druides of old. The [1735]Pythagorians defend Metempsychosis, and Palingenesia, that soules go from one body to another, epotâ prius Lethes undâ, as men into Wolves, Beares, Dogs, Hogs, as they were inclined in their lives, or participated in conditions.	Trismegistus, Musaeus, Orpheus, Homer, Pindar, Pherecydes of Syros and Epictetus, along with the Chaldeans and Egyptians, affirmed that the soul is immortal, as did the ancient British Druids. The Pythagoreans defend transmigration and rebirth: souls pass from one body into another after first drinking the water of Lethe. Human beings thus become wolves, bears, dogs or pigs, according to the inclinations they had during their lives or the traits they shared with those animals.[1736]
— [1737]inque ferinas Possumus ire domus, pecudumque in corpora condi.	We may pass into the dwellings of wild beasts And be lodged within the bodies of cattle.[1738]

[1732] Burton. c. “Lib. an mores sequantur, &c.” Galen’s work on whether the dispositions of the soul follow the bodily temperament.

[1733] Editor. Matter and form name the constituents of a living being in the Aristotelian account. “Infused” means introduced into the body as a separately created soul. Crasin esse means to be the mixture or temperament; “temperature” here is the bodily constitution, not a thermometer reading.

[1734] Burton. *. “Cæsar. 6. com.” Caesar, Commentaries, book 6. Compare Gallic War 6.14 on the Druids and the passage of souls into other bodies.

[1735] Burton. d. “Read Æneas Gazæus dial. of the immortality of the Soul.” Aeneas of Gaza’s dialogue on the immortality of the soul.

[1736] Editor. Metempsychosis is transmigration of souls; palingenesia, rebirth. Lethe is the water of forgetfulness. Burton combines traditions about rebirth, forgetfulness and resemblance between human and animal character. Trismegistus means Hermes Trismegistus.

[1737] Burton. *. “Ovid met. 15.” Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 15.

[1738] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 15.457–458. Burton prints domus and corpora where the consulted Latin text has domos and pectora. His wording is retained and translated, including “bodies.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1739]Lucians Cock was first Euphorbus a Captaine:	Lucian's cock was first Euphorbus, a captain:
Ille ego (nam memini) Trojani tempore belli, Panthoides Euphorbus eram,	I was Euphorbus, son of Panthus, In the days of the Trojan War—for I remember.[1740]
a horse, a man, a spunge. [1741]Julian the Apostata thought Alexanders soul was descended into his body: Plato in Timæo, and in his Phædon (for ought I can perceive) differs not much from this opinion, that it was from God at first, and knew all, but being inclosed in the body, it forgets, and learnes anew, which he calls reminiscentia, or recalling, and that it was put into the body for a punishment,	Then a horse, a man, a sponge. Julian the Apostate thought Alexander's soul had descended into his body. Plato, in the Timaeus and Phaedo, differs little from this opinion, so far as I can see: the soul came originally from God and knew everything, but once enclosed in the body it forgets and learns anew, which he calls recollection or remembering; and it was placed in the body as a punishment.[1742]
and thence it goes into a beasts or mans, as appeares by his pleasant fiction de sortitione animarum, lib. 10. de rep. and after [1743]10000. yeares is to returne into the former body again,	From there it passes into the body of a beast or a human being, as appears in his delightful fiction about souls drawing lots in book 10 of the Republic; and after ten thousand years it is to return to its former body again.[1744]

[1739] Burton. e. "In Gallo. Idem." In The Cock; the same author. The marginal wording is retained.

[1740] Editor. The verse is Ovid, Metamorphoses 15.160–161, spoken by Pythagoras about his earlier life as Euphorbus. Burton prints Ille ego where the consulted text has ipse ego. His surrounding reference to Lucian connects two treatments of the transmigration story; it does not make this Latin verse a quotation from Lucian.

[1741] Burton. f. "Nicephorus hist. lib. 10. c. 35." Nicephorus, History, book 10, chapter 35.

[1742] Editor. The scan reads "spunge," retained as "sponge." Lucian's Cock includes Euphorbus, Pythagoras, Aspasia and Crates, then a king, pauper, satrap, horse, jackdaw and frog. The consulted Fowler translation does not establish Burton's sponge or his shortened sequence; its immediate source remains unresolved. Julian is the emperor called "the Apostate" in Christian tradition. Reminiscentia means recollection.

[1743] Burton. g. "Phædro." In the Phaedrus.

[1744] Editor. Burton combines Platonic narratives. De sortitione animarum refers to the allotment of lives in Republic 10's myth of Er. Timaeus describes souls allotted to stars and subsequent rebirth according to conduct. Phaedrus 248e–249a, cited for the ten-thousand-year interval, describes return to the soul's place of origin, not specifically its former body. These parallels do not establish every detail of Burton's composite account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
— [1745]post varios annos, per mille figuras, Rursus ad humanæ fertur primordia vitæ.	After many years, through a thousand forms, It is brought back to the beginnings of human life.[1746]
Others deny the immortality of it, which Pomponatus of Padua decided out of Aristotle not long since, Plinius Avunculus cap. 7. lib. 2. & lib. 7. cap. 55. Seneca lib. 7. epist. ad Lucilium epist. 55. Dicæarchus in Tull. Tusc. Epicurus, Aratus, Hippocrates, Galen, Lucretius lib. 1.	Others deny its immortality, a question Pomponazzi of Padua settled from Aristotle not long ago: Pliny the Elder, book 2, chapter 7, and book 7, chapter 55; Seneca, book 7 of the Letters to Lucilius, letter 55; Dicaearchus in Cicero's Tusculan Disputations; Epicurus, Aratus, Hippocrates, Galen and Lucretius, book 1—[1747]
Source page 27 (Prætereà gigni pariter cum corpore, & unà Crescere sentimus, pariterque senescere mentem)	Moreover, we perceive that the mind is born with the body, Grows with it, and grows old along with it—[1748]

[1745] Burton. *. "Claudian lib. 1. de rap. Proserp." Claudian, The Rape of Proserpine, book 1.

[1746] Editor. The soul is the understood subject. Burton's verses adapt Claudian, Against Rufinus 2.491–493, rather than The Rape of Proserpine 1 named in the margin. Claudian describes three thousand years of changing forms, purification in Lethe and return to human form. Burton abbreviates and changes the wording; his printed quotation and reference are retained.

[1747] Editor. "Plinius Avunculus" distinguishes Pliny the Elder from his nephew. "Neotericks" below means more recent writers. Pomponatus is Pietro Pomponazzi. This polemical list compresses distinct positions about the soul; the edition does not silently turn it into a uniform statement of belief by all the named authors.

[1748] Editor. The quotation is from Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 3.445–446, although Burton gives book 1. The source reference is retained on the left and the correction recorded here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Averroes, and I know not how many Neotericks. [1749]This question of the immortality of the Soul, is diversly and wonderfully impugned and disputed, especially amongst the Italians of late, saith Iab. Colerus lib. de immort. animæ, cap. 1. The Popes themselves have doubted of it, Leo Decimus that Epicurean Pope, as [1750]some record of him, caused this question to be discussed pro and con before him, and concluded at last, as a prophane and atheisticall Moderator, with that verse of Cornelius Gallus,	Averroes, and I do not know how many modern writers. This question of the soul's immortality has been attacked and debated in many extraordinary ways, especially among the Italians of late, says Jacob Colerus in chapter 1 of On the Immortality of the Soul. The popes themselves have doubted it. Leo X, that Epicurean pope, according to some accounts, had the question debated before him on both sides and finally concluded, like an irreligious and atheistical presiding judge, with that line of Cornelius Gallus:[1751]
Et redit in nihilum, quod fuit ante nihil.	And what was nothing before returns to nothing.[1752]
It began of nothing, and in nothing it ends. Zeno and his Stoicks as [1753]Austin quotes him, supposed the Soul so long to continue, till the Body was fully putrified, and resolved into materia prima: but after that, in fumos evanescere; to be extinguished and vanish; and in the meane time, whilst the body was consuming, it wandred all abroad, & è longinquo multa annunciare, and (as that Clazomenian Hermotimus averred) saw pretty visions, and suffered I know not what.	It began from nothing and ends in nothing. Zeno and his Stoics, as Augustine cites him, supposed the soul to last until the body had completely decayed and been dissolved into prime matter. After that it vanished into smoke, extinguished and gone. Meanwhile, as the body wasted away, it wandered far and wide, reporting many things from a distance, and, as Hermotimus of Clazomenae claimed, saw curious visions and underwent I know not what.[1754]

[1749] Burton. Unlettered Latin marginalium: "Hæc quæstio multos per annos varie, ac mirabiliter impugnata, &c." This question has for many years been attacked in various and remarkable ways, etc.

[1750] Burton. *. "Colerus ibid." Colerus, in the same work.

[1751] Editor. Burton expressly presents the Leo X story as a report and cites Colerus. "Epicurean," "prophane" and "atheisticall" are his polemical descriptions. The alleged debate and conclusion have not been independently verified.

[1752] Editor. The line occurs in Maximianus, Elegy 1.222, with ad nihilum rather than Burton's in nihilum. Burton's attribution to Cornelius Gallus is retained in the body. His following English gloss is also retained as a separate sentence.

[1753] Burton. *. "De eccles. dog. cap. 16." On Ecclesiastical Doctrines, chapter 16. The attribution to Augustine in the body is retained; the cited work and chapter need bibliographical collation.

[1754] Editor. "Austin" is Augustine; "materia prima," prime or first matter, the underlying matter remaining when particular forms are lost. The Latin phrases about smoke and reports from afar are incorporated into the modern prose. "Pretty" here means curious or remarkable. Burton's account of Zeno and Hermotimus remains to be collated with its immediate sources.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1755]Errant exangues sine corpore & ossibus umbræ.	Bloodless shades wander, without bodies or bones.[1756]
Others grant the immortality thereof, but they make many fabulous fictions in the meantime of it, after the departure from the body: like Plato's Elisian fields, and that Turkie Paradise. The soules of good men they deified; the bad (saith [1757]Austin) became devils, as they supposed; with many such absurd tenents, which he hath confuted.	Others grant its immortality, but invent many fabulous stories about it after it leaves the body, such as Plato's Elysian fields and that Turkish paradise. They deified the souls of good people; the souls of the wicked, says Augustine, supposedly became devils. He has refuted these and many similarly absurd doctrines.[1758]
Hierome, Austin, and other Fathers of the church, hold that the Soul is immortal, created of nothing, and so infused into the childe or Embrio in his mothers wombe [1759]six moneths after the Conception; not as those of brutes, which are ex traduce, and dying with them vanish into nothing. To whose divine treaties, and to the Scriptures themselves, I rejourne all such Atheistical spirits, as Tully did Atticus, doubting of this point, to Plato's Phædon.	Jerome, Augustine and other Church Fathers hold that the soul is immortal, created from nothing and then infused into the child or embryo in its mother's womb six months after conception. It differs from the souls of beasts, which are propagated from their parents and vanish into nothing when they die. To those holy treatises and to Scripture itself I refer all such atheistical spirits, just as Cicero referred Atticus, who doubted this point, to Plato's Phaedo.[1760]

[1755] Burton. Unlettered reference: "Ovid. 4. Met." Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 4.

[1756] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.443, describing the underworld. The line serves as a poetic illustration rather than evidence for the particular doctrine Burton has just described.

[1757] Burton. h. "Bonorum lares, malorum verò larvas & lemures." The souls of the good became household gods; those of the wicked, spectres and ghosts.

[1758] Editor. Elysian fields are a blessed afterlife in classical tradition. "Turkie Paradise" is Burton's dismissive reference to the Muslim paradise. His evaluation is retained as part of the historical argument. The marginal Latin distinguishes benevolent household spirits from frightening ghosts; the body compresses the latter into "devils."

[1759] Burton. i. "Some say at 3. dayes, some 6. weekes, others otherwise." The conflicting times are Burton's marginal qualification to the six months stated in the body.

[1760] Editor. The infusion and timing of the soul are historical theological claims, not statements of embryology. Burton himself records conflicting dates in the margin. The blanket attribution to the Church Fathers is retained without being endorsed as a precise account of each writer. "Rejourne" here means refer or send back.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or if they desire Philosophical proofs and demonstrations, I refer them to Niphus, Nic. Faventinus tracts of this subject. To Fran. and John Picus in digress: sup. 3. de Animâ, Tholosanus, Eugubinus, To. Soto, Canas, Thomas, Peresius, Dandinus, Colerus, to that elaborate tract in Zanchius, to Tolets 60. reasons, and Lessius 22. arguments, to prove the immortality of the soul.	Or, if they want philosophical proofs and demonstrations, I refer them to the treatises on this subject by Niphus and Nic. Faventinus; to Francis and John Pico, in the digressions on book 3 of On the Soul; to Tholosanus, Eugubinus, To. Soto, Canas, Thomas, Peresius, Dandinus and Colerus; to that elaborate treatise in Zanchius; and to Toletus's sixty reasons and Lessius's twenty-two arguments proving the soul's immortality.[1761]
Campanella lib. de sensu rerum, is large in the same discourse, Albertinus the Schoolman, Iacob. Naclantus, Tom. 2. op. handleth it in four questions, Antony Brunus, Aonius Palearius, Marinus Marcennus, with many others.	Campanella treats the same subject at length in On the Sense of Things; so do Albertinus the schoolman; Jacob Naclantus, who handles it in four questions in volume 2 of his works; Antony Brunus; Aonius Palearius; Marin Mersenne; and many others.
This Reasonable Soul, which Austin calls a spiritual substance moving it self, is defined by Philosophers to be the first substantial act of a Natural, Humane, Organical Body, by which a man lives, perceives, and understands, freely doing all things, and with election. Out of which definition we may gather, that this Rational Soul includes the powers, and performes the duties of the two other, which are contained in it, and all three faculties make one Soul, which is inorganical of it self, although it be in all parts, and incorporeal, using their Organs, and working by them.	This rational soul, which Augustine calls a spiritual substance that moves itself, is defined by philosophers as the first substantial actuality of a natural human body furnished with organs, through which a person lives, perceives and understands, acting freely and by choice. From this definition we may gather that the rational soul includes the powers and performs the functions of the other two, which it contains. All three faculties make one soul. In itself it is independent of organs and incorporeal, although it is present in every part, using the organs and working through them.[1762]

[1761] Editor. The compressed catalogue preserves uncertain names and abbreviations rather than replacing them with conjectural identifications. "Tolet" is rendered Toletus; "Marcennus" below is Marin Mersenne. The scan reads twenty-two arguments for Lessius and volume 2 for Naclantus. Verification of the individual treatises and numerical claims remains pending.

[1762] Editor. "First substantial act" is rendered "first substantial actuality," continuing the philosophical use of act explained in Block 024. "With election" means by choice. The apparent tension between an incorporeal soul independent of organs and its operation through organs is part of the account, not a textual error.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is divided into two chief parts, differing in office only, not in essence. The understanding, which is the Rational power apprehending; the will, which is the Rational power moving: to which two, all the other Rational powers are subject and reduced.	It is divided into two principal parts, differing only in function, not in essence: understanding, the rational power of apprehension; and will, the rational power of movement. All the other rational powers are subordinate to these two and fall under them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 28 SUBSEC. 10. Of the Vnderstanding.	Subsection 10. Understanding
Understanding is a power of the Soul, [1763]by which we perceive, know, remember, and judge as well singulars, as universals, having certain innate notices or beginnings of arts, a reflecting action, by which it judgeth of his own doings, and examines them. Out of this definition (besides his chief office, which is to apprehend, judge all that he performes, without the help of any Instruments or Organs) three differences appear betwixt a man and a beast.	Understanding is a power of the soul through which we perceive, know, remember and judge both particular and universal things. It possesses certain inborn notions or rudiments of the arts and a reflective activity through which it judges and examines its own operations. Besides identifying its chief function—to apprehend and judge all that it does without the help of instruments or organs—this definition reveals three differences between a human being and a beast.[1764]
As first, the sense only comprehends Singularities, the Understanding Universalities. Secondly the sense hath no innate notions. Thirdly, brutes cannot reflect upon themselves. Bees indeed make neat and curious works and many other creatures besides; but when they have done, they cannot judge of them. His object is God, Ens, all nature, and whatsoever is to be understood: which successively it apprehends.	First, sense comprehends only particulars, while understanding comprehends universals. Second, sense has no innate notions. Third, beasts cannot reflect upon themselves. Bees and many other creatures do indeed make neat and intricate works, but once they have finished, they cannot judge them. The object of understanding is God, being, all nature and whatever can be understood; it apprehends these successively.

[1763] Burton. k. “Melancthon.” Philip Melanchthon.

[1764] Editor. “Notices” are notions or elements of knowledge; “arts” includes learned skills and disciplines. The distinction between particulars and universals contrasts an individual perceived thing with a general kind or concept. The claims about animal reflection and organ-independent understanding are Burton’s philosophical account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The object first moving the Understanding, is some sensible thing; after by discoursing, the minde findes out the corporeal substance, and from thence the spiritual. His actions (some say) are Apprehension, Composition, Division, Discoursing, Reasoning, Memory, which some include in Invention, and Judgment. The common divisions are of the understanding, Agent, and Patient; Speculative, and Practick, in Habit, or in Act; Simple, or Compound.	The object that first stirs understanding is something perceptible to the senses. Afterwards, by reasoning, the mind discovers corporeal substance and proceeds from there to spiritual substance. Its activities, some say, are apprehension, combination, separation, discursive thought, reasoning and memory; some include these under discovery and judgement. Understanding is commonly divided into active and passive, speculative and practical, habitual and actual, simple and compound.[1765]
The Agent is that which is called the Wit of man, acumen or subtilty, sharpness of invention, when he doth invent of himself without a teacher, or learns anew, which abstracts those intelligible Species from the Phantasie, and transferres them to the passive understanding, [1766]because there is nothing in the understanding, which was not first in the sense.	The active understanding is what we call human wit: acuteness, subtlety or sharpness of discovery, exercised when someone discovers something independently, without a teacher, or learns something new. It abstracts intelligible forms from the imagination and transfers them to the passive understanding, because nothing is in the understanding that was not first in the senses.[1767]
That which the imagination hath taken from the sense, this Agent judgeth of, whether it be true or false; & being so judged he commits it to the Passible to be kept. The Agent is a Doctor or Teacher, the Passive a scholar; and his office is to keep and farther judge of such things as are committed to his charge: as a bare and rased table at first, capable of all formes and notions.	The active understanding judges whether what imagination has taken from the senses is true or false. Having judged it, it entrusts it to the passive understanding for safekeeping. The active understanding is a teacher; the passive is a pupil, whose function is to preserve and further judge what is entrusted to it. At first it is like a blank tablet wiped clean, capable of receiving every form and notion.

[1765] Editor. Ens is being, or that which is. “Discoursing” means reasoning through successive steps, not conversation. Composition and division concern combining or separating concepts in judgement. “In habit” means possessed as an enduring capacity; “in act” means being exercised.

[1766] Burton. l. “Nihil in intellectu, quod non prius fuerat in sensu.” Nothing is in the understanding that was not previously in the senses.

[1767] Editor. Agent and patient/passible understanding are rendered active and passive. “Species” means intelligible forms or representations, not biological species. “Invention” means discovery. The sensory maxim and the ensuing account of innate notions are both retained; the modern text does not attempt to reconcile the different schemes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now these Notions are two fold, Actions or Habits: Actions, by which we take Notions of, and perceive things; Habits, which are durable lights and notions, which we may use when we will. Some reckon up eight kinds of them, Sense, Experience, Intelligence, Faith, Suspicion, Error, Opinion, Science; to which are added Art, Prudency, Wisedom: as also [1768]Synteresis, Dictamen rationis, Conscience, so that in all there be 14. species of the understanding[1769], of which some are innate, as the three last mentioned; the other are gotten by doctrine, learning, and use.	These notions are of two kinds: acts and habits. Acts are those through which we form notions of things and perceive them; habits are lasting illuminations and notions that we can use when we choose. Some reckon eight kinds: sense, experience, intelligence, faith, suspicion, error, opinion and certain knowledge. To these are added art, prudence and wisdom, together with synderesis, the dictate of reason and conscience. Thus there are fourteen kinds of understanding in all. Some, such as the last three, are innate; the others are acquired through instruction, learning and practice.[1770]
Source page 28–29 Plato will have all to be innate: Aristotle reckons up but five intellectual habits, two practick, as Prudency, whose end is to practise; to fabricate; Wisedom to comprehend the use and experiments of all notions and habits whatsoever. Which division of Aristotle (if it be considered aright) is all one with the precedent, for three being innate, and five acquisite, the rest are improper, imperfect, and in a more strict examination excluded. Of all these I should more amply dilate, but my subject will not permit. Three of them I will onely point at, as more necessary to my following discourse.	Plato holds that all are innate. Aristotle reckons only five intellectual habits, two of them practical: prudence, whose end is action, and art, whose end is making; wisdom comprehends the use and experience of all notions and habits whatsoever. Properly considered, this division of Aristotle agrees with the preceding one: three are innate and five acquired, while the rest are improperly named or imperfect, and excluded on closer examination. I ought to discuss all these more fully, but my subject will not allow it. I shall touch only on three, which are more necessary to the discussion that follows.[1771]

[1768] Burton. m. “The pure part of the conscience.” A gloss on Synteresis.

[1769] Burton. Unlettered reference: “Velcurio.” The reference accompanies this enumeration of intellectual powers; no further location is given.

[1770] Editor. “Habit” here is an enduring intellectual disposition, not merely repeated behaviour. “Science” means certain or demonstrative knowledge; “prudency,” practical judgement. Synteresis is modernized to synderesis, the innate grasp of moral principles, and Dictamen rationis to the dictate of reason. Burton explains the last three terms in the following paragraph.

[1771] Editor. The 1651 text has “Prudency, whose end is to practise; to fabricate.” The 1621 edition, page 42, reads “to practise, Art to fabricate” and also includes two speculative habits omitted here. The modern column’s supplied “art, whose end is” is thus supported by an earlier witness and Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 6.3–5. The 1651 wording and its compressed five-habit reconciliation otherwise remain.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 29 Synteresis, or the purer part of the conscience is an innate habit, and doth signifie a conservation of the knowledge of the law of God and Nature, to know good or evil: And (as our Divines hold) it is rather in the understanding, then in the will. This makes the major proposition in a practicke Syllogisme. The Dictamen rationis is that which doth admonish us to doe good or evil, and is the minor in the Syllogisme. The Conscience is that which approves good or evill, justifying or condemning our actions, and is the conclusion of the Syllogisme:	Synderesis, or the purer part of conscience, is an innate habit: the preservation of knowledge of the law of God and nature, enabling us to distinguish good from evil. As our theologians hold, it belongs to the understanding rather than the will. It supplies the major proposition in a practical syllogism. The dictate of reason prompts us to do good or evil and supplies the minor proposition. Conscience judges good or evil, justifying or condemning our actions, and supplies the conclusion.[1772]
as in that familiar example of Regulus the Roman, taken prisoner by the Carthaginians, and suffered to goe to Rome, on that condition he should returne againe, or pay so much for his ransome. The Synteresis proposeth the question; his word, oath, promise, is to be religiously kept, although to his enemy, and that by the law of nature. [1773]Doe not that to another, which thou wouldest not have done to thy self.	Take the familiar example of the Roman Regulus, captured by the Carthaginians and allowed to go to Rome on condition that he return or pay a stipulated ransom. Synderesis lays down the principle: his word, oath or promise must be scrupulously kept, even when given to an enemy, as the law of nature requires. Do not do to another what you would not want done to yourself.[1774]
Dictamen applies it to him, and dictates this or the like: Regulus, thou wouldst not another man should falsifie his oath, or break promise with thee: Conscience concludes, therefore Regulus, thou dost well to performe thy promise, and oughtest to keepe thine oath. More of this in Religious Melancholy.	The dictate of reason applies this to him and says something like: “Regulus, you would not want another person to falsify his oath or break a promise made to you.” Conscience concludes: “Therefore, Regulus, you do right to fulfil your promise, and you ought to keep your oath.” More on this in Religious Melancholy.

[1772] Editor. A syllogism links a general premise, a particular premise and a conclusion. Burton presents moral judgement in this form. His phrase “admonish us to doe good or evil” is preserved as “prompts us to do good or evil”; it is not silently changed into an instruction always to choose good.

[1773] Burton. n. “Quod tibi fieri non vis, alteri ne feceris.” Do not do to another what you do not wish done to yourself.

[1774] Editor. Regulus is used as the traditional Roman example of fidelity to an oath given to an enemy. The argument concerns the duty of keeping a promise; this is Burton’s version of the narrative, including the ransom alternative. Religious Melancholy is the later section of the book to which he refers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 11. Of the will.	Subsection 11. The Will
Will, is the other power of the rationall soul, [1775]which covets or avoids such things as have been before judged, and apprehended by the understanding. If good, it approves; if evill, it abhorres it: so that his object is either good or evill. Aristotle cals this our rationall Appetite; for as in the Sensitive we are moved to good or bad by our Appetite, ruled & directed by Sense; so in this we are carried by Reason. Besides, the Sensitive Appetite hath a particular object, good or bad; this an universall, immateriall: That respects onely things delectable and pleasant, this honest.	Will is the other power of the rational soul. It desires or avoids things that the understanding has already apprehended and judged. If they are good, it approves them; if evil, it rejects them. Its object is therefore good or evil. Aristotle calls it our rational appetite: just as, in the sensitive soul, appetite moves us towards good or bad under the guidance and direction of sense, so here reason moves us. Moreover, sensitive appetite has a particular object, good or bad, while the will has a universal, immaterial object. The former concerns only what is delightful and pleasant; the latter, what is morally honourable.[1776]
Againe, they differ in liberty. The Sensuall appetite seeing an object, if it be a convenient good, cannot but desire it; if evill, avoid it: but this is free in his essence, [1777]much now depraved, obscured, and falne from his first perfection; yet in some of his operations still free, as to goe, walke, move at his pleasure, and to choose whether it will do, or not do, steale, or not steale. Otherwise in vaine were Laws, Deliberations, Exhortations, Counsels, Precepts, Rewards, Promises, Threats and Punishments: and God should be the author of sin.	They also differ in freedom. When sensitive appetite encounters an object, it cannot help desiring it if it is a good suited to it, or avoiding it if it is evil. The will, however, is free in its essence. Though now greatly corrupted, clouded and fallen from its original perfection, it remains free in some of its operations: to go, walk or move as it pleases; to choose whether to act or refrain, to steal or not to steal. Otherwise laws, deliberations, exhortations, advice, precepts, rewards, promises, threats and punishments would be useless, and God would be the author of sin.[1778]

[1775] Burton. o. “Res ab intellectu monstratas recipit, vel rejicit; approbat, vel improbat, Philip. Ignoti nulla cupido.” It accepts or rejects, approves or disapproves, things presented by the understanding. Philip [Melanchthon]. There is no desire for what is unknown.

[1776] Editor. “Honest” means morally honourable, not simply truthful. “Appetite” again includes desire generally. “Sensitive” names the faculty governed by sensation; it does not mean emotionally delicate.

[1777] Burton. p. “Melancthon. Operationes plerumque feræ, etsi libera sit illa in essentia sua.” Melanchthon: its operations are mostly wild, although it is free in its essence.

[1778] Editor. “Convenient” means suitable or fitting. Burton distinguishes the will’s essential freedom from its corruption after the Fall. His appeal to laws, rewards and punishment argues for responsibility in ordinary choices; the next passage limits freedom in spiritual matters.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But in [1779]Spiritual things we will no good, prone to evil (except we be regenerate, and led by the Spirit) we are egged on by our natural concupiscence, and there is ἀταξία, a confusion in our powers; [1780]our whole will is averse from God and his law, not in natural things only, as to eat and drink, lust, to which we are led headlong by our temperature and inordinate appetite,	But in spiritual matters we will no good and incline to evil, unless we are born again and led by the Spirit. Our natural concupiscence urges us on, and there is disorder—a confusion in our powers. Our whole will turns away from God and his law, not only in natural matters such as eating, drinking and sexual desire, towards which our temperament and unruly appetite drive us headlong:[1781]
[1782]Nec nos obniti contra, nec tendere tantum Sufficimus, —	We have not strength enough to struggle against it Or to exert ourselves so far.[1783]
Source page 29–30 we cannot resist, our concupiscence is originally bad, our heart evil, the seat of our affections, captivates and enforceth our will. So that in voluntary things we are averse from God and goodnesse, bad by nature, by [1784]ignorance worse, by Art, Discipline, Custom, we get many bad habits: suffering them to domineer and tyrannize over us; and the devil is still ready at hand with his evil suggestions, to tempt our depraved will to some ill disposed action, to precipitate us to destruction,	We cannot resist. Our concupiscence is bad from its origin; our evil heart, the seat of our emotions, enslaves and compels our will. Thus, in voluntary actions we turn away from God and goodness: bad by nature, worse through ignorance. Through art, training and custom we acquire many bad habits and allow them to dominate and tyrannize over us. The devil is always at hand with his evil suggestions, ready to tempt our corrupted will into some wicked action and plunge us into destruction, [1779] Burton. q. “In civilibus libera, sed non in spiritualibus. Osiander.” Free in civil matters, but not in spiritual ones. Osiander.

[1780] Burton. r. “Tota voluntas aversa à Deo: Omnis homo mendax.” The whole will is turned away from God; every human being is a liar.

[1781] Editor. Concupiscence is disordered desire in this theological context, broader than sexual appetite alone. The Greek ataxia means disorder. The distinction between civil and spiritual freedom is made explicit in the Osiander marginal note. “Temperature” again means bodily temperament.

[1782] Burton. s. “Virg.” Virgil.

[1783] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 5.21–22. Palinurus speaks of being unable to contend against the winds; Burton applies the language of helpless resistance to desire.

[1784] Burton. t. “Vel propter ignorantiam, quod bonis studiis non sit instructa mens ut debuit, aut divinis præceptis exculta.” Or through ignorance, because the mind has not been instructed in good studies as it ought, or cultivated by divine precepts.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 30 except our Will be swayed and counterpoised again with some divine precepts, and good motions of the spirit, which many times restrain, hinder and check us, when we are in the full career of our dissolute courses. So David, corrected himself, when he had Saul at a vantage. Revenge and Malice were as two violent oppugners on the one side; but Honesty, Religion, Fear of God, with-held him on the other.	unless our will is brought back into balance by divine precepts and good impulses from the Spirit. These often restrain, obstruct and check us when we are rushing at full speed along our dissolute course. Thus David checked himself when he had Saul at his mercy. Revenge and malice pressed violently upon him on one side; moral integrity, religion and the fear of God held him back on the other.[1785]
The actions of the Will are Velle and Nolle, to well and nill, which two words comprehend all, and they are good or bad, accordingly as they are directed: and some of them freely performed by himself; although the Stoicks absolutely deny it, and will have all things inevitably done by Destiny, imposing a fatal necessity upon us, which we may not resist: yet we say that our will is free in respect of us, and things contingent, howsoever in respect of Gods determinate counsel, they are inevitable and necessary.	The will's acts are willing and refusing: these two words cover them all. They are good or bad according to their direction, and some are freely performed by the will itself. The Stoics deny this absolutely, holding that everything occurs inevitably through destiny, which imposes an inescapable necessity upon us. Yet we say that our will is free in relation to ourselves and to contingent things, however inevitable and necessary they may be in relation to God's fixed purpose.[1786]

[1785] Editor. Compare the accounts of David sparing Saul in 1 Samuel 24 and 26. Burton does not specify which episode. "Oppugners" are assailants or opponents; "career" evokes a headlong course or charge.

[1786] Editor. Velle and nolle mean to will and not to will. The scan's "well and nill" is retained in the original column and rendered by meaning. "Contingent" describes what may happen otherwise, contrasted here with necessity from the standpoint of God's determined counsel. The summary of Stoic determinism is Burton's.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some other actions of the will are performed by the inferiour powers, which obey him, as the Sensitive and Moving Appetite; as to open our eyes, to go hither and thither, not to touch a book, to speak fair or foule: but this Appetite is many times rebellious in us, and will not be contained within the lists of sobriety and temperance. It was (as I said) once well agreeing with reason, and there was an excellent content and harmony betwixt them, but that is now dissolved, they often jar; Reason is overborne by Passion:	Other acts of the will are performed by the lower powers that obey it, such as sensitive appetite and the appetite that moves the body: opening our eyes, going here and there, not touching a book, speaking courteously or abusively. But this appetite often rebels in us and refuses to stay within the bounds of sobriety and self-restraint. As I said, it once agreed well with reason, and an excellent accord and harmony existed between them. That harmony has now dissolved; they often clash, and passion overpowers reason:
Fertur equis auriga, nec audit currus habenas,	The horses carry the driver away; the chariot ignores the reins.[1787]
as so many wilde horses run away with a chariot, and will not be curbed. We know many times what is good, but will not do it, as she said,	As wild horses run away with a chariot and refuse the curb. We often know what is good but will not do it, as she said:
[1788]Trahit invitum nova vis, aliudque cupido, Mens aliud suadet. —	A new force drags me on against my will; Desire urges one course, reason another.[1789]
Lust counsels one thing, reason another, there is a new reluctancy in men.	Lust advises one thing, reason another; a new struggle arises within us.
[1790]Odi, nec possum, cupiens non esse, quod odi.	I hate what I am, yet cannot cease to be it, though I long to.[1791]

[1787] Editor. Virgil, Georgics 1.514. Burton prints nec where the consulted Latin has neque. His following chariot gloss is retained. “Lists” in the preceding paragraph means bounds or limits.

[1788] Burton. u. “Medea Ovid.” Medea in Ovid.

[1789] Editor. Medea in Ovid, Metamorphoses 7.19–20. Burton’s invitum is masculine; the consulted text has invitam, agreeing with the female speaker. The English preserves the first-person struggle without reproducing that grammatical mismatch. “Reluctancy” in Burton’s gloss means inward resistance or conflict.

[1790] Burton. *. “Ovid.” Ovid.

[1791] Editor. Ovid, Amores 2.4.5. The speaker hates his own conduct but cannot escape it despite wishing to change. The translation supplies the implicit object of odi from the rest of the line.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We cannot resist, but as Phædra confessed to her Nurse, [1792]Quæ loqueris, vera sunt, sed furor suggerit sequi pejora: she said well and true, she did acknowledge it, but headstrong passion and fury made her to do that which was opposite. So David knew the filthiness of his fact, what a lothsome, foule, crying sin adultery was, yet notwithstanding he would commit murther, and take away another mans wife, enforced against Reason, Religion, to follow his Appetite.	We cannot resist. As Phaedra confessed to her nurse, "What you say is true, but passion urges me to follow the worse course." She acknowledged that the nurse spoke well and truly, yet headstrong passion and frenzy made her do the opposite. So David knew the vileness of his deed and what a loathsome, foul, flagrant sin adultery was. Nevertheless, he would commit murder and take another man's wife, compelled to follow his appetite against reason and religion.[1793]
Those natural and vegetal powers are not commanded by Will at all; for who can adde one cubit to his stature? These other may, but are not: and thence come all those headstrong passions, violent perturbations of the Minde; and many times vitious habits, customs, feral diseases; because we give so much way to our Appetite, and follow our inclination, like so many beasts. The principal Habits are two in number, Vertue and Vice, whose peculiar definitions, descriptions, differences, and kinds, are handled at large in the Ethicks, and are indeed the subject of Moral Philosophy.	The natural and vegetative powers are not commanded by the will at all—for who can add a cubit to his height? The other powers can be governed, but are not. Hence come all those headstrong passions and violent disturbances of the mind, and often vicious habits, customs and deadly diseases, because we give such free rein to our appetite and follow our inclinations like so many beasts. There are two principal habits, virtue and vice. Their particular definitions, descriptions, distinctions and kinds are discussed at length in ethics and are indeed the subject of moral philosophy.[1794]

[1792] Burton. x. "Seneca. Hipp." Seneca, Hippolytus, the tragedy commonly titled Phaedra.

[1793] Editor. Burton paraphrases Phaedra's response to her nurse in Seneca, Phaedra 177–179; his Latin is translated as printed. David's adultery with Bathsheba and his arrangement of Uriah's death are narrated in 2 Samuel 11. "Fact" means deed. Burton brings pagan drama and biblical narrative together as examples of knowing the good but following desire.

[1794] Editor. The question about adding a cubit to one's stature echoes Matthew 6:27 in the English biblical tradition. The vegetative powers are nutrition and growth, discussed earlier. "Feral" is read in its older death-related sense as deadly; it does not here describe an animal that has escaped domestication. "Ethicks" denotes the study of moral conduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 31 MEMB. 3. SUBSEC. 1. Definition of Melancholy, Name, Difference.	Member 3 Subsection 1. The Definition of Melancholy Its Name and Distinctions
Having thus briefly anatomized the body and soul of man, as a preparative to the rest; I may now freely proceed to treat of my intended object, to most mens capacity; and after many ambages, perspicuously define what this Melancholy is, shew his Name, and Differences.	Having thus briefly dissected the human body and soul in preparation for what follows, I may now proceed freely to my intended subject in a way most people can understand. After many digressions, I can clearly define what melancholy is, explain its name and distinguish its forms.
The Name is imposed from the matter, and Disease denominated from the material cause: as Bruel observes, Μελαγχολία, quasi Μελαναχόλη, from black Choler. And whether it be a cause or an effect, a Disease, or symptome, let Donatus Altomarus, and Salvianus decide, I will not contend about it. It hath severall Descriptions, Notations, and Definitions.	Its name comes from its substance: the disease is named after its material cause. As Bruel observes, the Greek word melancholia means, in effect, "black bile." Whether it is a cause or an effect, a disease or a symptom, I leave Donatus Altomarus and Salvianus to decide; I will not argue about it. It has various descriptions, explanations of its name and definitions.[1795]
[1796]Fracastorius in his second book of intellect, calls those Melancholy, whom abundance of that same depraved humor of black Choler hath so misaffected, that they become mad thence, and dote in most things, or in all, belonging to election, will, or other manifest operations of the understanding.	Fracastorius, in his second book on intellect, calls those people melancholic whom an abundance of this corrupted humour of black bile has so afflicted that it drives them mad and deranges their judgement in most or all matters involving choice, will or other evident operations of the understanding.[1797]

[1795] Editor. Melancholy here can mean black bile, the temperament associated with it, or the illness attributed to it. "Material cause" means the substance from which something arises. These distinctions belong to humoral medicine; the term should not simply be replaced by a present-day diagnostic label.

[1796] Burton. Margin y: "Melancholicos vocamus, quos exuperantia vel pravitas Melancholiæ ita male habet, ut inde insaniant vel in omnibus, vel in pluribus iisq; manifestis sive ad rectam rationem, voluntatem pertinent, vel electionem, vel intellectus operationes." We call those people melancholic whom excess or corruption of melancholy so afflicts that they lose their reason in all or most evident matters concerning right reason, will, choice or the operations of intellect.

[1797] Editor. "Dote" and "dotage" here mean disordered thought or judgement, not specifically the decline associated with old age. "Election" is choice. Burton's categories are kept distinct without imposing modern diagnoses on them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1798]Melanelius out of Galen, Ruffus, Ætius, describe it to be a bad and peevish disease, which makes men degenerate into beasts: Galen, a privation or infection of the middle cell of the Head, &c. defining it from the part affected, which [1799]Hercules de Saxoniâ approves, lib. 1. cap. 16. calling it a depravation of the principall function: Fuschius lib. 1. cap. 23, Arnoldus Breviar. lib. 1. cap. 18. Guianerius, and others: By reason of black Choler, Paulus addes.	Melanelius, drawing on Galen, Rufus and Aetius, describes it as a bad and obstinate disease that reduces human beings to beasts. Galen calls it a loss of function or an impairment of the head's middle cavity, and so forth, defining it by the part affected. Hercules de Saxonia approves this in book 1, chapter 16, calling it a derangement of the principal function; so do Fuchs in book 1, chapter 23, Arnold in his Breviary, book 1, chapter 18, Guianerius and others. Paulus adds: "caused by black bile."[1800]
Halyabbas simply calls it a commotion of the minde. Areteus, [1801]a perpetual anguish of the soul, fastned on one thing, without an ague; which definition of his, Mercurialis de affect. cap. lib. 1. cap. 10. taxeth: but Ælianus Montaltus defends, lib. de morb. cap. 1. de Melan for sufficient and good.	Haly Abbas simply calls it a disturbance of the mind. Aretaeus calls it a persistent anguish of the soul, fixed on one thing, without fever. Mercurialis criticizes this definition in On Diseases of the Head, book 1, chapter 10; but Aelianus Montalto defends it as sound and sufficient in chapter 1 on melancholy in his book on diseases.[1802]

[1798] Burton. Margin z: "Pessimum & pertinacissimum morbum qui homines in bruta degenerare cogit." A very bad and stubborn disease that forces human beings to degenerate into beasts.

[1799] Burton. Margin a: "Path. Med." Medical Pathology.

[1800] Editor. "Peevish" here conveys troublesome or obstinate. The "middle cell" belongs to the older scheme locating mental faculties in the brain's cavities, discussed in the preceding anatomy. "Infection" can mean impairment or corruption, rather than transmission of a pathogen.

[1801] Burton. Margin b: "Angor animi in una contentione, defixus, absq; febre." Anguish of mind fixed on a single preoccupation, without fever.

[1802] Editor. Compare Aretaeus, Causes and Symptoms of Chronic Diseases 1.5, "On Melancholy," in Francis Adams's translation: a persistent mental preoccupation without fever. Aretaeus treats melancholy as a beginning or part of mania. Burton's compilation preserves disagreement over precisely this boundary.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The common sort define it to be a kinde of dotage without a fever, having for his ordinary companions, fear, and sadness, without any apparent occasion. So doth Laurentius cap. 4. Piso, lib. 1. cap. 43. Donatus Altomarus, cap. 7. art. medic. Iacchinus in com. in lib. 9. Rhasis ad Almansor cap. 15. Valesius exerc. 17. Fuschius institut. 3. sec. 1. c. 11. &c.	The usual definition is a kind of mental derangement without fever, ordinarily accompanied by fear and sadness for no apparent reason. Laurentius defines it so in chapter 4; Piso in book 1, chapter 43; Donatus Altomarus in chapter 7 of The Medical Art; Iacchinus in his commentary on book 9 of Rhazes's To Almansor, chapter 15; Valesius in exercise 17; Fuchs in Institutions, book 3, section 1, chapter 11; and others.
which common definition, howsoever approved by most, [1803]Hercules de Saxonia will not allow of, nor David Crusius, Theat. morb. Herm. lib. 2. cap. 6. holds it insufficient: as [1804]rather shewing what it is not, then what it is: as omitting the specifical difference, the Phantasie and Brain: but I descend to particulars.	But however widely this common definition is accepted, Hercules de Saxonia will not admit it, nor will David Crusius, who finds it inadequate in Theatrum morborum Hermetis, book 2, chapter 6. It shows what the disease is not rather than what it is, omitting its distinctive features: imagination and the brain. But let me turn to the details.[1805]

[1803] Burton. Margin c: "Cap. 16 l. 1." Chapter 16, book 1.

[1804] Burton. Margin d: "Eorum definitio morbus quid non sit potius quam quid sit, explicat." Their definition explains what the disease is not rather than what it is. The printed Latin has morbus where the construction calls for morbum.

[1805] Editor. A "specifical difference" is the feature distinguishing a species within its broader genus. Burton's objection is logical as well as medical: excluding fever and naming accompanying emotions does not sufficiently identify the faculty or organ affected. Crusius's abbreviated title is retained in expanded Latin pending bibliographical collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The summum genus is Dotage, or Anguish of the minde, saith Areteus, of a principall part; Hercules de Saxonia addes, to distinguish it from Cramp and Palsie, and such diseases as belong to the outward sense and motions [depraved] [1806]to distinguish it from Folly and Madness (which Montaltus makes angor animi, to separate) in which those functions are not depraved, but rather abolished,	The highest general category is mental derangement—or anguish of mind, as Aretaeus says. Hercules de Saxonia adds "of a principal part" to distinguish it from cramp, palsy and diseases affecting the external senses and movement. "Deranged" distinguishes it from intellectual incapacity and madness—Montalto makes the distinction by using "anguish of mind"—in which those functions are not deranged but rather abolished.[1807]
[without an ague] is added by all, to sever it from Phrensie, and that Melancholy which is in a pestilent Fever. (Fear and Sorrow) make it differ from Madness: [without a cause] is lastly inserted to specifie it from all other ordinary passions of [Fear and Sorrow.]	All add "without fever" to distinguish it from delirium and from the melancholy found in a pestilential fever. "Fear and sorrow" distinguish it from madness. Finally, "without a cause" distinguishes it from all the ordinary emotions of fear and sorrow.[1808]
Source page 31–32 We properly call that Dotage, as [1809]Laurentius interprets it, when some one principal facultie of the minde, as imagination, or reason is corrupted, as all melancholy persons have. It is without a fever, because the humor is most part cold and dry, contrary to putrefaction.	Properly speaking, as Laurentius explains it, we call a condition mental derangement when one of the mind's principal faculties, such as imagination or reason, is impaired—as it is in all melancholic people. It occurs without fever because the humour is usually cold and dry, qualities opposed to putrefaction.

[1806] Burton. Starred margin: "Animæ functiones imminuuntur in fatuitate, tolluntur in mania, depravantur solum in melancholia. Herc. de Sax. cap. 1. tract. de Melanch." The soul's functions are diminished in intellectual incapacity, abolished in mania and merely deranged in melancholy. Hercules de Saxonia, Treatise on Melancholy, chapter 1.

[1807] Editor. Summum genus is the highest or broadest class in a logical definition. "Folly" in this medical contrast means intellectual incapacity. The marginal distinction is more precise than the body: it says functions are diminished in fatuitas, abolished in mania and deranged in melancholy.

[1808] Editor. "Ague" can mean fever generally, not only an intermittent fever. "Phrensie" is the older febrile mental disturbance called phrenitis, here rendered "delirium." The later qualifications show that fear, sadness and absence of an apparent cause are disputed features, not a universally accepted definition.

[1809] Burton. Margin e: "Cap. 4. de melanch." On Melancholy, chapter 4.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 32 Fear and Sorrow are the true Characters, and inseparable companions of most Melancholy, not all, as Her. de Saxonia, Tract. posthumo de Melancholia, cap. 2. well excepts; for to some it is most pleasant, as to such as laugh most part; some are bold again, and free from all manner of fear and grief, as hereafter shall be declared.	Fear and sorrow are the defining marks and inseparable companions of most melancholy, though not all, as Hercules de Saxonia rightly points out in chapter 2 of his posthumous Treatise on Melancholy. For some it is very pleasant, as with those who spend most of their time laughing. Others are bold and free from every kind of fear and grief, as I shall explain later.[1810]

[1810] Editor. Burton immediately qualifies the definition he has just analysed. Pleasant, laughing or bold cases stretch "melancholy" beyond ordinary sadness. His reference is to Hercules de Saxonia's posthumous treatise, distinct from the earlier work cited above.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 2. Of the part affected. Affection. Parties affected.	Subsection 2. The Part Affected The Faculty Affected and the People Affected
Some difference I finde amongst Writers, about the principal part affected in this disease, whether it be the Brain, or Heart, or some other Member. Most are of opinion that it is the Brain: for being a kinde of Dotage, it cannot otherwise be, but that the Brain must be affected, as a similar part, be it by [1811]consent or essence, not in his ventricles, or any obstructions in them, for then it would be an Apoplexie, or Epilepsie, as [1812]Laurentius well observes,	I find some disagreement among writers about the principal part affected by this disease: whether it is the brain, the heart or some other organ. Most think it is the brain. Since the disease is a kind of mental derangement, the brain must necessarily be affected in its substance, whether secondarily or in itself. The trouble is not in its ventricles or in any blockage within them, for that would produce apoplexy or epilepsy, as Laurentius rightly observes.[1813]
but in a cold dry distemperature of it in his substance, which is corrupt and become too cold, or too dry, or else too hot, as in mad-men, and such as are inclined to it: and this [1814]Hippocrates confirms. Galen, Arabians, and most of our new Writers.	Instead, it lies in a cold, dry imbalance of the brain's substance, which has become impaired and too cold, too dry or else too hot, as in mad people and those inclined to madness. Hippocrates confirms this, as do Galen, the Arab physicians and most of our recent writers.

[1811] Burton. Starred margin: "Per consensum sive per essentiam." Through sympathy with another part or in itself.

[1812] Burton. Margin f: "Cap. 4. de mel." On Melancholy, chapter 4.

[1813] Editor. A "similar part" is bodily substance considered as homogeneous tissue, rather than as an organ's arrangement of different parts. Per essentiam means the disorder originates in the part itself; per consensum means it is affected through another part. "Apoplexy" is retained as a historical category, not equated exactly with a modern stroke diagnosis.

[1814] Burton. Margin g: "Sec. 7. de mor. vulgar. lib. 6." Epidemics, book 6, section 7.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Marcus de Oddis (in a consultation of his, quoted by [1815]Hildesheim) and five others there cited are of the contrary part, because fear and sorrow, which are passions, be seated in the Heart. But this objection is sufficiently answered by [1816]Montaltus, who doth not deny that the heart is affected (as [1817]Melanelius, proves out of Galen) by reason of his vicinity; and so is the midriffe and many other parts: They do compati, & have a fellow-feeling by the Law of nature:	Marcus de Oddis, in a consultation quoted by Hildesheim, and five others cited there take the opposite view, because fear and sorrow are emotions seated in the heart. But Montalto adequately answers this objection. He does not deny that the heart is affected through its proximity, as Melanelius proves from Galen; so too are the diaphragm and many other parts. By nature's law, they suffer together and share one another's feelings.
but for as much as this malady is caused by precedent Imagination, with the Appetite, to whom spirits obey, and are subject to those principal parts: the Brain must needs primarily be misaffected, as the seat of Reason; and then the Heart, as the seat of Affection.	But since this disease is caused by an antecedent act of imagination together with appetite, and the spirits obey these powers and are subordinate to the principal organs, the brain must first be affected as the seat of reason, and then the heart as the seat of emotion.[1818]

[1815] Burton. Margin h: "Spicel. de melancholia." Spicilegium on melancholy.

[1816] Burton. Margin i: "Cap. 3. de mel. pars affecta cerebrum sive per consensum, sive per cerebrum contingat, et procerum auctoritate & ratione stabilitur." On Melancholy, chapter 3: the affected part is the brain, whether the disease occurs through sympathy or through the brain itself; this is established by the authority of eminent writers and by reasoning.

[1817] Burton. Margin k: "Lib de Mel. Cor vero vicinitatis ratione unà afficitur, acceptum transversum ac stomachus cum dorsali spina, &c." On Melancholy: the heart is affected along with it through proximity, as are the diaphragm and stomach, with the backbone, etc. The translation conjecturally reads printed acceptum transversum as ac septum transversum, "and the diaphragm"; comparison with the cited medical source has not established this repair.

[1818] Editor. Imagination presents an object, appetite responds to it, and the bodily spirits transmit the action. Burton is reasoning within the psychology described earlier. The compressed original leaves the relations among powers, spirits and organs awkward; the modern wording makes that inferred sequence explicit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1819]Capivaccius and Mercurialis have copiously discussed this question, and both conclude the subject is the inner Brain, and from thence it is communicated to the Heart, and other inferior parts, which sympathize and are much troubled, especially when it comes by consent, and is caused by reason of the Stomack; or myrache, as the Arabians terme it, whole body, Liver, or [1820]Spleen, which are seldome free, Pylorus, Meseraick veines, &c.	Capivaccius and Mercurialis discuss this question at length. Both conclude that the seat of the disease is the interior of the brain. From there it is communicated to the heart and other lower parts, which suffer with it and are greatly disturbed—especially when it arises through the influence of another part: the stomach; the myrach, as the Arab physicians call it; the whole body; the liver or spleen, which are seldom unaffected; the pylorus; the mesenteric veins; and so on.[1821]
For our body is like a Clock, if one wheele be amisse, all the rest are disordered, the whole fabrick suffers: with such admirable art and harmony is a man composed, such excellent proportion, as Lodovicus Vives in his Fable of man hath elegantly declared.	For our body is like a clock: if one wheel goes wrong, all the others are thrown out of order and the whole mechanism suffers. A human being is composed with such admirable workmanship, harmony and exquisite proportion, as Ludovicus Vives elegantly explains in his Fable of Man.[1822]

[1819] Burton. Margin l: “Lib. 1. cap. 10. Subjectum est cerebrum interius.” Book 1, chapter 10: the seat is the interior of the brain.

[1820] Burton. Margin m: “Rarò quisquam tumorem effugit lienis, qui hoc morbo afficitur. Piso.” Anyone affected by this disease seldom escapes swelling of the spleen. Piso.

[1821] Editor. Myrach is an Arabic-derived anatomical term for the abdomen or its containing wall; it is broader than the modern stomach. Burton’s “Stomack; or myrache” is imprecise, so the older term is retained. The pylorus is the stomach’s outlet; “meseraick” means mesenteric, belonging to the supporting tissues and vessels of the intestines. Compare the historical anatomical vocabulary recorded in Encyclopædia Britannica, ninth edition, volume 1, p. 805.

[1822] Editor. Vives, Fable of Man §§32–34, describes the human body’s beauty and fitness; §34 says that adding, removing or changing a part destroys its harmony and usefulness. This supports Burton’s account of interdependence. The compared passage does not use a clock or wheels: that illustration belongs to Burton’s presentation of the argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As many doubts almost arise about the Affection[1823]: whether it be Imagination or Reason alone, or both. Hercules de Saxonia proves it out of Galen, Ætius, and [1824]Altomarus, that the sole fault is in [1825]Imagination. Bruel is of the same minde: Montaltus in his 2. cap. of Melancholy, confutes this tenent of theirs, and illustrates the contrary by many examples:	Almost as many doubts arise about the faculty affected: whether imagination alone, reason alone or both. Hercules de Saxonia argues from Galen, Aetius and Altomarus that the fault lies entirely in imagination. Bruel agrees. Montalto, in his second chapter on melancholy, refutes their doctrine and illustrates the contrary view with many examples:
Source page 32–33 as of him that thought himself a shel-fish; of a Nun, and of a desperate Monk that would not be perswaded but that he was damned; reason was in fault as well as Imagination, which did not correct this error; they make away themselves oftentimes, and suppose many absurd & ridiculous things. Why doth not Reason detect the Fallacy, settle and perswade, if she be free?	the man who thought himself a shellfish; a nun; and a despairing monk who could not be persuaded that he was not damned. Reason was at fault as well as imagination, since it failed to correct this error. Such people often kill themselves and believe many absurd and ridiculous things. If reason is unimpaired, why does it not expose the error, calm them and persuade them?[1826]

[1823] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: “Quis affectus.” Which faculty is affected.

[1824] Burton. Margin n: “See Donat. ab Altomar.” See Donatus Altomarus.

[1825] Burton. Margin o: “Facultas imaginandi, non cogitandi, nec memorandi læsa hic.” The faculty of imagination is injured here, not those of thought or memory.

[1826] Editor. “Desperate” means despairing; “make away themselves” means kill themselves. Burton uses these reported cases to argue that imagination alone cannot account for persistent false conviction if reason remains fully capable of correcting it. The individual reports in Montalto remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 33 [1827]Avicenna therefore holds both corrupt, to whom most Arabians subscribe. The same is maintained by [1828]Areteus, Gorgonius, Guianerius, &c.[1829] To end the controversie, no man doubts of Imagination, but that it is hurt and misaffected here; for the other I determine with [1830]Albertinus Bottonus a Dr of Padua; that it is first in Imagination, and afterwards in reason; if the disease be inveterate, or as it is more or less of continuance:	Avicenna therefore holds that both are impaired, and most Arab physicians agree. Aretaeus, Gorgonius, Guianerius and others maintain the same view. To settle the controversy: no one doubts that imagination is damaged and disordered here. As for reason, I agree with Albertinus Bottonus, a doctor of Padua: the disorder begins in imagination and afterwards reaches reason if the disease becomes established, according to how long it has lasted.
but by accident, as [1831]Herc. de Saxonia adds; faith, opinion, discourse, ratiocination, are all accidentally depraved by the default of imagination.	But this happens indirectly, as Hercules de Saxonia adds: belief, opinion, discursive thought and reasoning are all impaired as a consequence of the failure of imagination.[1832]

[1827] Burton. Margin p: “Lib. 3. Fen. 1. Tract. 4. cap. 8.” Book 3, fen 1, treatise 4, chapter 8.

[1828] Burton. Margin q: “Lib. 3. cap. 5.” Book 3, chapter 5.

[1829] Burton. Margin r: “Lib. Med. cap. 19 part. 2. Tract. 15 cap. 2.” Book of Medicine, chapter 19, part 2; treatise 15, chapter 2. The margin has no clearly corresponding r anchor in the body; its sequence places it with the preceding list of authorities.

[1830] Burton. Margin s: “Hildesheim spicel. 2. de Melanc. fol. 207. et fol. 127. Quandoq; etiam Rationalis si affectus inveteratus sit.” Hildesheim, Spicilegium 2, on melancholy, folios 207 and 127: sometimes the rational faculty too, if the disorder is long established.

[1831] Burton. Starred margin: “Lib. posthumo de Melanc. edit. 1620 depravatur fides, discursus, opinio &c. per vitium Imaginationes. ex Accidenti.” Posthumous book on melancholy, published 1620: belief, discursive thought, opinion, etc., are impaired indirectly through a defect of imagination. Imaginationes is retained as printed.

[1832] Editor. “By accident” means indirectly or as a secondary consequence, not by chance. “Faith” here is belief, alongside opinion and reasoning. The argument distinguishes the first faculty affected from those subsequently impaired.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To the part affected, I may here adde the parties, which shall be more opportunely spoken of elsewhere, now only signified.[1833] Such as have the Moone, Saturne, Mercury misaffected in their genitures, such as live in over-cold, or over-hot Climes: such as are born of melancholy parents: as offend in those six non-natural things, are black, or of an high sanguine complexion, [1834]that have little heads, that have a hot heart, moist Brain; hot Liver and cold stomack, have been long sick:	To the part affected I may here add the people affected. There will be a more suitable place to discuss them elsewhere; for now I merely identify them. Those whose birth charts show the Moon, Saturn or Mercury adversely placed; those who live in excessively cold or hot climates; those born to melancholic parents; those who mismanage the six non-natural things; those of a dark or strongly sanguine complexion; those with small heads, a hot heart, a moist brain, a hot liver and a cold stomach; those who have long been ill —[1835] such as are solitary by nature, great Students, given to much contemplation, lead a life out of action, or most subject to melancholy. Of sexes both, but men more often; yet [1836]women misaffected are far more violent, and grievously troubled. Of seasons of the year, the Autumne is most melancholy.	those who are solitary by nature, study intensely, devote themselves to contemplation and lead inactive lives are most subject to melancholy. It affects both sexes, though men more often; yet affected women are far more violent and severely troubled. Of the seasons, autumn is the most melancholy.[1837]

[1833] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: “Parties affected.”

[1834] Burton. Margin t: “Qui parvum caput habent, insensati plerúmq; sunt. Arist. in physiognomia.” Those with small heads are generally senseless. Aristotle, Physiognomonics.

[1835] Editor. “Genitures” are astrological birth charts. The six non-natural things are the traditional factors of regimen: air; food and drink; exercise and rest; sleep and waking; evacuation and retention; and the passions. “Complexion” chiefly means bodily constitution, though Burton also invokes visible colouring. These alleged predispositions belong to his inherited theories.

[1836] Burton. Margin u: “Areteus lib. 3. cap. 5.” Aretaeus, book 3, chapter 5.

[1837] Editor. The source prints “or most subject,” read as “are most subject” in context. Aretaeus, Chronic Diseases 1.5, specifically says women are worse affected by mania; Burton applies the comparison within his discussion of melancholy. His sex and temperament generalizations are retained as historical claims.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of peculiar times; old age, from which natural Melancholy is almost an inseparable accident; but this artificial Malady is more frequent in such as are of a [1838]middle age. Some assigne 40 years, Gariopontus 30.[1839] Iubertus excepts neither young nor old from this adventitious. Daniel Sennertus[1840] involves all of all sorts, out of common experience, in omnibus omnino Corporibus cujuscunq; constitutionis dominatur.	Of the stages of life, old age has natural melancholy as an almost inseparable accompaniment; but the acquired disease is more frequent in middle age. Some specify forty years, Gariopontus thirty. Joubert exempts neither young nor old from this acquired condition. Daniel Sennertus, drawing on common experience, includes people of every kind: "It prevails in absolutely every body, whatever its constitution."[1841]
Ætius, and Aretius, ascribe into the number not only [1842]discontented, passionate, and miserable persons, swarthy, black; but such as are most merry and pleasant, scoffers, and high coloured. Generally, saith Rhasis, [1843]the finest wits, and most generous spirits, are before other obnoxious to it;	Aetius and Aretaeus include not only discontented, emotional and miserable people of dark or swarthy complexion, but also the merriest and most cheerful, mockers and people with ruddy faces. In general, says Rhazes, the keenest minds and noblest spirits are more susceptible to it than others.

[1838] Burton. Margin x: "Qui propè statum sunt. Aret. Mediis convenit ætatibus Piso." Those near their prime. Aretaeus. It occurs in middle age. Piso.

[1839] Burton. Margin y: "De quartano." On quartan fever. No clear y anchor appears in the body; the reference is placed with the age discussion, near Gariopontus, pending source collation.

[1840] Burton. Starred margin: "Lib. 1. part 2. cap. 11." Book 1, part 2, chapter 11.

[1841] Editor. "Artificial" and "adventitious" contrast acquired disease with the naturally cold, dry humour or disposition associated with old age; they do not mean pretended illness. The missing marginal anchor for De quartano and the reference behind Gariopontus's age limit remain unresolved.

[1842] Burton. Margin z: "Primus ad Melancholiam non tam mæstus sed et hilares, jocosi, cachinnantes, irrisores, et, qui plerumq; præ rubri sunt." Not only the sorrowful, but also the cheerful, playful, loud-laughing and mocking, and those commonly very ruddy. The opening Primus ad Melancholiam is syntactically uncertain; retained here for later collation.

[1843] Burton. Margin a: "Qui sunt subtilis ingenii, et multæ perspicacitatis de facili incidunt in Melancholiam lib. 1. cont. Tract 9." Those of subtle intelligence and great discernment readily fall into melancholy. Continens, book 1, treatise 9.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I cannot except any complexion, any condition, sexe, or age, but [1844]fools and Stoicks, which according to [1845]Synesius, are never troubled with any manner of passion, but as Anacreons cicada sine sanguine & dolore, similes ferè diis sunt.	I can exempt no constitution, condition, sex or age, except fools and Stoics, who, according to Synesius, are never disturbed by any emotion. Like Anacreon's cicada, without blood or pain, they are almost like gods.[1846]
Erasmus vindicates fools from this Melancholy Catalogue, because they have most part moist brains, and light hearts, [1847]they are free from ambition, envy, shame and fear, they are neither troubled in conscience, nor macerated with cares, to which our whole life is most Subject.	Erasmus releases fools from this melancholy catalogue because they generally have moist brains and light hearts. They are free from ambition, envy, shame and fear, neither troubled in conscience nor worn down by the cares to which our whole life is so subject.[1848]

[1844] Burton. Margin b: "Nunquam sanitate mentis excidit, aut dolore capitis. Erasm." Never loses soundness of mind, or [suffers] headache. Erasmus. The second clause is elliptical in print.

[1845] Burton. Margin c: "In laud. calvit." In Praise of Baldness.

[1846] Editor. The exemption of "fools" and the emotionally untroubled Stoic is a literary and philosophical conceit. The cicada's divine freedom from suffering is the point of the poem traditionally attributed to Anacreon. Burton's exact link to Synesius's Praise of Baldness remains unlocated; it is not presented here as a verified quotation from that work.

[1847] Burton. Margin d: "Vacant conscientiæ carnificina, nec pudefiunt, nec verentur, nec dilacerantur millibus curarum, quibus tota vita obnoxia est." They are free from the torture of conscience; they feel neither shame nor fear and are not torn apart by the thousands of cares to which the whole of life is exposed.

[1848] Editor. In Praise of Folly §35, Erasmus's personified Folly claims that those labelled fools escape fear, remorse, ambition and other torments of the supposedly wise. Burton adapts its wording in margin d. This passage supports the satire behind his medical-sounding exemption, but does not establish the separate elliptical headache clause in margin b.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSEC. 3. Of the matter of Melancholy.	Subsection 3. The Material of Melancholy
Of the Matter of Melancholy, there is much question betwixt Avicen & Galen, as you may read in [1849]Cardans Contradictions, [1850]Valesius controversies, Montanus, Prosper Calenus, Capivaccius, [1851]Bright, [1852]Ficinus, that have written either whole Tracts, or copiously of it, in their several Treatises of this subject.	There is much disagreement between Avicenna and Galen about the material of melancholy. You may read about it in Cardan's Contradictions, Valesius's Controversies, Montanus, Prosper Calenus, Capivaccius, Bright and Ficino. They have devoted either whole treatises or extensive discussions to it in their various works on this subject.[1853]
Source page 33–34 [1854]What this humor is, or whence it proceeds, how it is ingendred in the body, neither Galen, nor any old Writer hath sufficiently discussed, as Iacchinus thinks: the Neotericks cannot agree. Montanus in his consultations, holds Melancholy to be materiall or immateriall: and so doth Arculanus: the materiall is one of the four humors before mentioned, and natural.	What this humour is, where it comes from and how it is generated in the body have not been adequately discussed by Galen or any ancient writer, Iacchinus thinks; nor can recent writers agree. Montanus, in his consultations, holds melancholy to be either material or immaterial, and Arculanus agrees. Material melancholy is natural: it is one of the four humours already mentioned.

[1849] Burton. Margin e: "Lib. 1. tract. 3. contradic. 18." Book 1, treatise 3, contradiction 18.

[1850] Burton. Margin f: "Lib. 1. cont. 21." Book 1, controversy 21.

[1851] Burton. Margin g: "Bright ca. 16." Bright, chapter 16.

[1852] Burton. Margin h: "Lib. 1. cap. 6. de sanit. tuenda." On Preserving Health, book 1, chapter 6.

[1853] Editor. "Matter" means the bodily substance thought to produce the disease, not merely its subject matter. Timothie Bright and Marsilio Ficino appear alongside the medical authorities. Burton's individual chapter references are preserved, not silently harmonized.

[1854] Burton. Margin i: "Quisve aut qualis sit humor aut quæ istius differentiæ, et quomodo gignatur in corpore, scrutandum; hic enim re multi veterum laboraverunt, nec facile accipere ex Galeno sententiam ob loquendi varietatem. Leon. Iacch. com. in 9. Rhasis cap 15. cap. 16. in 9. Rhasis." What this humour is, what its qualities and distinctions are, and how it is generated in the body must be investigated. Many ancient writers laboured over this matter, and Galen's meaning is not easily grasped because of his varying expressions. Leon. Iacchinus, commentary on book 9 of Rhazes, chapter 15; chapter 16 on book 9 of Rhazes. The apparent hic enim re is retained as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 34 The immateriall or adventitious, acquisite, redundant, unnatural, artificial: which [1855]Hercules de Saxonia will have reside in the spirits alone, and to proceed from an hot, cold, dry, moist distemperature, which without matter, alter the Brain and functions of it. Paracelsus wholly rejects and derides this division of four humors and complexions, but our Galenists generally approve of it, subscribing to this opinion of Montanus.	Immaterial melancholy is adventitious, acquired, excessive, unnatural or artificially produced. Hercules de Saxonia places it in the spirits alone and derives it from an imbalance of heat, cold, dryness or moisture that alters the brain and its functions without material substance. Paracelsus entirely rejects and mocks this division into four humours and temperaments, but our Galenists generally approve it and subscribe to Montanus's opinion.[1856]
This materiall Melancholy is either simple, or mixt; offending in Quantity or quality, varying according to his place, where it setleth, as Brain, spleen, Meseriack veins, Heart, Womb, & Stomack: or differing according to the mixture of those natural humors amongst themselves, or four unnatural adust humors, as they are diversly tempered and mingled.	Material melancholy is either simple or mixed. It causes harm through its quantity or quality and varies according to where it settles—the brain, spleen, mesenteric veins, heart, womb or stomach. Or it differs according to the mixture of the natural humours with one another, or of the four unnatural, burnt humours, as these are blended in different proportions.[1857]

[1855] Burton. Starred margin: "Tract. posthum. de Melan. edit. Venetiis 1620. cap. 7 & 8. Ab intemperie calida, humida, &c." Posthumous Treatise on Melancholy, Venice, 1620, chapters 7 and 8: from an imbalance of heat, moisture, etc.

[1856] Editor. "Immaterial" here locates the disorder in the bodily spirits rather than in a gross humour; it does not simply mean an incorporeal mind. Burton then returns to material melancholy and includes burnt or altered humours within it. The competing schemes do not form one entirely consistent classification.

[1857] Editor. Adust means burnt or scorched: an altered humour thought to result from excessive heat. In this scheme it can arise from any of the four humours, although the inclusion of phlegm is disputed below. "Quality" concerns its hot, cold, moist or dry character; "quantity," how much is present.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If natural melancholy abound in the body, which is cold & dry, so that it be more [1858]than the Body is wel able to bear, it must needs be distempered, saith Faventinus, & diseased: & so the other, if it be depraved, whether it arise from that other Melancholy of Choler adust, or from Blood, produceth the like effects, and is, as Montaltus contends, if it come by adustion of humors, most part hot and dry.	If natural melancholy, which is cold and dry, abounds in the body beyond what it can comfortably bear, the body must become disordered and diseased, says Faventinus. The other kind, if corrupted, produces similar effects, whether it arises from that other melancholy of burnt choler or from blood. As Montalto argues, if it comes from the burning of humours, it is usually hot and dry.
Some difference I find, whether this melancholy matter may be ingendred of all four humors, about the colour and temper of it. Galen holds it may be ingendred of three alone, excluding Flegme, or Pituita, whose true assertion, [1859]Valesius and Menardus stiffly maintain, and so doth [1860]Fuchsius, Montaltus, [1861]Montanus. How (say they) can white become black? But Hercules de Saxonia l. post. de mela. c. 8. & Cardan[1862] are of the opposite part	I find some disagreement about whether this melancholy substance can be generated from all four humours, and about its colour and temperament. Galen holds that it can be generated from only three, excluding phlegm. Valesius and Menardus firmly uphold his assertion as true, as do Fuchs, Montalto and Montanus. How, they ask, can white become black? But Hercules de Saxonia, in chapter 8 of his posthumous book on melancholy, and Cardan take the opposite side.

[1858] Burton. Margin k: “Secundùm magis aut minus si in corpore fuerit, ad intemperiē plusquam corpus salubriter ferre poterit: inde corpus morbosum efficitur.” If it is present in the body to a greater or lesser degree, producing an imbalance beyond what the body can bear in health, the body becomes diseased.

[1859] Burton. Margin l: “Lib. 1. controvers. cap. 21.” Controversies, book 1, chapter 21.

[1860] Burton. Margin m: “Lib. 1. sect. 4. cap. 4.” Book 1, section 4, chapter 4.

[1861] Burton. Margin n: “Concil. 26.” Consultation 26.

[1862] Burton. Margin o: “Lib. 2. contradic. cap. 11.” Contradictions, book 2, chapter 11. The o anchor is not clear in the body; placed with Cardan according to the cited work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
(it may be ingendred of Flegme, etsi rarò contingat, though it seldom come to pass) so is [1863]Guianerius and Laurentius c. 1. with Melanct. in his Book de Anima, and Chap. of humors; he cals it Asininam, dull, swinish Melancholy, and saith that he was an eye witness of it: so is [1864]Wecker.	It can be generated from phlegm, though this rarely happens. Guianerius and Laurentius, chapter 1, agree, as does Melanchthon in the chapter on humours in his book On the Soul. He calls it asinine—dull, swinish melancholy—and says that he has seen it himself. Wecker takes the same view.[1865]
From melancholy adust ariseth one kind, from Choler another, which is most brutish: another from Flegme, which is dull; and the last from blood, which is best. Of these some are cold and dry, others hot and dry, varying according to their [1866]mixtures, as they are intended, & remitted.	One kind arises from burnt black bile; another, the most brutish, from choler; another, dull in character, from phlegm; and the last, the best, from blood. Some are cold and dry, others hot and dry, varying with their mixtures as these are intensified or weakened.
And indeed as Rodericus à Fons. cons. 12. l. determines, ichores & those serous matters being thickned become flegme, and flegme degenerates into choler, choler adust becomes æruginosa melancholia, as vinegar out of pure wine putrified or by exhalation of purer spirits is so made and becomes sowre and sharp: and from the sharpness of this humor proceed much waking, troublesome thoughts & dreams, &c.	Indeed, as Rodericus a Fonseca concludes in his twelfth consultation, ichors and watery fluids become phlegm when thickened; phlegm degenerates into choler, and burnt choler becomes verdigris-coloured melancholy. In the same way, pure wine becomes vinegar through decay or through the evaporation of its finer spirits, turning sour and sharp. From the sharpness of this humour come much sleeplessness, disturbing thoughts and dreams, and so forth.[1867]

[1863] Burton. Margin p: “De feb. tract. diff. 2 cap. 1. non est negandum ex hac fieri Melancholicos.” Treatise on Fevers, distinction 2, chapter 1: it must not be denied that people become melancholic from this.

[1864] Burton. Margin q: “In Syntax.” In the Syntaxis.

[1865] Editor. Asininam literally means “asinine” or “ass-like.” Burton adds “dull, swinish,” preserving the degrading animal comparisons of this medical vocabulary. The alleged eyewitness evidence is Melanchthon’s, as reported by Burton, and has not been independently collated.

[1866] Burton. Margin r: “Variè aduritur & miscetur, unde variæ amentium species. Melanct.” It is burnt and mixed in various ways, hence the different kinds of mental derangement. Melanchthon.

[1867] Editor. Ichores are thin or watery fluids; serous likewise means watery. Æruginosa means verdigris-coloured or copper-rust-like. “Spirits” in the wine analogy are its finer volatile components. The isolated “l.” after cons. 12 in the source is an incomplete bibliographical cue, left unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
so that I conclude as before. If the humor be cold, it is saith [1868]Faventinus, a cause of dotage, & produceth milder symptomes: if hot, they are rash, raving mad, or inclining to it. If the brain be hot, the animal spirits are hot, much madness follows with violent actions: if cold, fatuity & sottishness, [1869]Capivaccius.	So I conclude as before: if the humour is cold, Faventinus says, it causes mental derangement with milder symptoms; if hot, the sufferers are reckless, raving mad or inclined that way. If the brain is hot, the animal spirits are hot, and great madness follows, with violent actions; if cold, intellectual incapacity and dullness follow, according to Capivaccius.
The colour of this mixture varies likewise according to the mixture, be it hot or cold, 'tis sometimes black, sometimes not, [1870]Altomarus. The same [1871]Melanelius proves out of Galen and Hippocrates in his book of Melancholy (if at least it be his) giving instance in a burning coal, which when it's hot, shines; when it is cold, looks black, and so doth the humor.	The colour of this blend likewise varies with its mixture, whether hot or cold: sometimes it is black, sometimes not, says Altomarus. Melanelius proves the same from Galen and from Hippocrates's book on melancholy—if it is indeed his—using the example of a burning coal: when hot, it shines; when cold, it looks black. So does the humour.[1872]

[1868] Burton. Margin s: "Humor frigidus delirii causa, furoris calidus &c." A cold humour causes derangement; a hot one, frenzy, etc.

[1869] Burton. Margin t: "Lib. 1. cap. 10. de affect. cap." On Diseases of the Head, book 1, chapter 10.

[1870] Burton. Margin u: "Nigrescit hic humor, aliquando supercalefactus, aliquando superfrigefactus, ca. 7." This humour turns black, sometimes through excessive heating and sometimes through excessive cooling. Chapter 7.

[1871] Burton. Margin x: "Humor hic niger aliquando præter modum calefactus, & alias refrigeratus evadit: nam recentibus carbonibus ei quid simile accidit, qui durante flamma pellucidissime candent, eâ extinctâ prorsus nigrescunt. Hippocrates." This humour sometimes becomes black through excessive heating, at other times through cooling. Something similar happens to fresh coals: while the flame lasts they glow brightly, but when it is extinguished they turn entirely black. Hippocrates.

[1872] Editor. Burton himself questions the authorship of the book attributed to Hippocrates. The coal comparison is an explanation within the older theory of black bile, not an observation establishing that theory. The passage is preserved without resolving its disputed attribution.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This diversity of Melancholy matter, produceth diversity of effects. If it be within the body, and not putrified, it causeth black Jaundise; if putrified, a Quartan Ague; if it break out to the skin, Leprosie; if to parts, severall Maladies, as scurvie, &c. If it trouble the mind, as it is diversly mixt, it produceth severall kinds of Madness and Dotage: of which in their place.[1873]	This variety of melancholy substance produces a variety of effects. If it remains inside the body without putrefying, it causes black jaundice; if it putrefies, a quartan fever. If it breaks out onto the skin, it causes leprosy; if into particular parts, various diseases such as scurvy. If it disturbs the mind, its different mixtures produce different kinds of madness and mental derangement. I shall discuss these in their proper place.[1874]

[1873] Burton. Margin y: "Guianerius diff. 2 cap. 7." Guianerius, distinction 2, chapter 7.

[1874] Editor. A quartan fever recurs on every fourth day by inclusive counting, about a seventy-two-hour interval. Black jaundice, leprosy and scurvy are historical disease names used within Burton's proposed humoral explanation; they are not being identified with a single modern pathological process.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 35 SUBSEC. 4. Of the species or kindes of Melancholy.	Subsection 4. The Species or Kinds of Melancholy
When the matter is divers and confused, how should it otherwise be, but that the species should be divers and confused? Many new and old writers have spoken confusedly of it, confounding Melancholy and Madness, as [1875]Heurnius, Guianerius, Gordonius, Salustius, Salvianus, Iason Pratensis, Savanarola, that will have Madness no other then Melancholy in extent, differing (as I have said) in degrees.	When the material is varied and confused, how could the species be anything but varied and confused too? Many ancient and recent writers have discussed it confusedly, mixing up melancholy and madness. Heurnius, Guianerius, Gordonius, Salustius, Salvianus, Jason Pratensis and Savonarola maintain that madness is simply melancholy carried further, differing, as I have said, only in degree.
Some make two distinct species, as Ruffus Ephesius and old writer, Constantinus Africanus, Areteus, [1876]Aurelianus, Paulus Ægineta: others acknowledge a multitude of kinds, and leave them indefinite, as [1877]Ætius in his Tetrabiblos, [1878]Avicenna lib. 3. Fen. 1. Tract. 4. cap. 18. Arculanus cap. 16. in 9. Rasis. Montanus med. part. 1.	Some make them two distinct species, including Rufus of Ephesus, an ancient writer, Constantine the African, Aretaeus, Aurelianus and Paul of Aegina. Others acknowledge a multitude of kinds and leave their number undefined: Aetius in his Tetrabiblos; Avicenna in book 3, fen 1, treatise 4, chapter 18; Arculanus in chapter 16 of his commentary on book 9 of Rhazes; and Montanus, Medicine, part 1.[1879]

[1875] Burton. Margin z: “Non est Mania, nisi extensa melancholia.” Mania is nothing but melancholy extended.

[1876] Burton. Margin a: “Cap. 6. lib. 1.” Chapter 6, book 1.

[1877] Burton. Margin b: “2. Ser. 2. cap. 9 Morbus hic est omnifarius.” Book 2, discourse 2, chapter 9: this disease takes every form.

[1878] Burton. Margin c: “Species indefinitæ sunt.” The species are indefinite.

[1879] Editor. The source reads “and old writer” after Rufus of Ephesus; the modern column reads “an ancient writer.” Fen is a subdivision in the Latin Avicennian tradition. “Species” means a medically distinguished kind, and need not correspond to a present-day disease category.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1880]If naturall Melancholy be adust, it maketh one kinde; if blood, another; if choler, a third, differing from the first; and so many severall opinions there are about the kindes, as there be men themselves. [1881]Hercules de Saxonia sets down two kinds, materiall and immateriall; one from spirits alone, the other from humors and spirits.	If natural black bile is burnt, it produces one kind; if blood is burnt, another; if choler, a third, different from the first. There are as many opinions about the kinds as there are men to hold them. Hercules de Saxonia sets out two kinds, material and immaterial: one from spirits alone, the other from humours and spirits.
Savonarola Rub. 11. Tract. 6. cap. 1. de ægritud. capitis, will have the kindes to be infinite; one from the myrach, called myrachialis of the Arabians; another stomachalis, from the stomack; another from the liver, heart, wombe, hemrods; [1882]one beginning, another consummate.	Savonarola, rubric 11, treatise 6, chapter 1, On Diseases of the Head, holds that the kinds are infinite: one from the myrach, called myrachial by the Arab physicians; another, gastric, from the stomach; others from the liver, heart, womb or haemorrhoids; one beginning, another fully developed.
Melancthon seconds him, [1883]as the humor is diversly adust and mixt, so are the species divers: but what these men speak of species, I think ought to be understood of symptomes, and so doth [1884]Arculanus interpret himself: infinite species, id est, symptomes; and in that sense, as Io. Gorrheus acknowledgeth in his medicinal definitions, the species are infinite, but they may be reduced to three kindes, by reason of their seat, Head, Body, and Hypocondries.	Melanchthon supports him: as the humour is burnt and mixed in different ways, so the species differ. But what these writers say about species should, I think, be understood as referring to symptoms. Arculanus interprets his own words that way: infinite species, that is, symptoms. In that sense, as Johannes Gorrheus acknowledges in his Medical Definitions, the species are infinite. Yet according to their location they may be reduced to three kinds: head, body and hypochondria.[1885]

[1880] Burton. Margin d: “Si aduratur naturalis melancholia, alia fit species, si sanguis alia, si flava bilis alia, diversa à primis: maxima est inter has differentia, & tot Doctorum sententiæ, quot ipsi numero sunt.” If natural black bile is burnt, it makes one species; if blood, another; if yellow bile, another different from the first. The difference between them is very great, and there are as many opinions as there are doctors.

[1881] Burton. Starred margin: “Tract. de mel. cap. 7.” Treatise on Melancholy, chapter 7.

[1882] Burton. Margin e: “Quædam incipiens quædam consummata.” Some beginning, some fully developed.

[1883] Burton. Margin f: “Cap. de humor. lib. de anima. variè aduritur & miscetur ipsa melancholia, unde variæ amentium species.” On the Soul, chapter on humours: melancholy itself is burnt and mixed in various ways, hence the different kinds of mental derangement.

[1884] Burton. Margin g: “Cap. 16. in 9. Rasis.” Chapter 16, on book 9 of Rhazes.

[1885] Editor. Burton proposes that some authors’ supposedly innumerable species are really differences of symptoms. Hypochondries are the upper abdominal regions beneath the ribs. The name here describes an anatomical seat, rather than the modern sense of excessive worry about illness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This threefold division is approved by Hippocrates in his book of Melancholy, (if it be his, which some suspect) by Galen lib. 3. de loc. affectis cap. 6. by Alexander lib. 1. cap. 16. Rasis lib. 1. Continent. Tract. 9. lib. 1. cap. 16. Avicenna, and most of our new writers. Th. Erastus makes two kindes; one perpetual, which is Head melancholy; the other interrupt, which comes and goes by fits, which he subdivides into the other two kindes, so that all comes to the same pass.	This threefold division is approved by Hippocrates in his book on melancholy, if it is his, which some doubt; by Galen in On the Affected Parts, book 3, chapter 6; by Alexander in book 1, chapter 16; by Rhazes in the Continens, book 1, treatise 9, book 1, chapter 16; by Avicenna; and by most of our recent writers. Thomas Erastus makes two kinds: one continuous, which is head melancholy, and the other intermittent, coming and going in attacks. He subdivides the latter into the other two kinds, so that it all amounts to the same thing.[1886]
Some again make four or five kindes with Rodericus à Castro de morbis mulier. lib. 2. cap. 3. and Lod. Mercatus, who in his second book de mulier. affect. cap. 4. will have that melancholy of Nuns, Widowes, and more ancient maids, to be a peculiar species of Melancholy differing from the rest: some will reduce Enthusiasts, extaticall and dæmoniacall persons to this rank, adding [1887]Love melancholy to the first, and Lycanthropia.	Others make four or five kinds, with Rodericus a Castro in On the Diseases of Women, book 2, chapter 3, and Ludovicus Mercatus, who in his second book On the Disorders of Women, chapter 4, considers the melancholy of nuns, widows and older unmarried women a distinct species. Some place those who claim divine inspiration, those in ecstatic trances and those possessed by demons in this category, adding love melancholy and lycanthropy to the first kind.[1888]

[1886] Editor. The Rhazes citation repeats “lib. 1.” and shifts between treatise and chapter numbers. Both sequences are preserved pending collation. “Interrupt” means intermittent; the episodes are contrasted with a continuous condition.

[1887] Burton. Margin h: “Laurentius cap. 4. de mel.” Laurentius, On Melancholy, chapter 4.

[1888] Editor. “Enthusiasts” means people claiming divine inspiration, not simply keen or eager people. “Extaticall” refers to trance or rapture; “dæmoniacall” to supposed demonic possession. Lycanthropy is the reported condition of believing oneself a wolf or behaving as one. Burton reports rival classifications without separating them into modern medical categories.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The most received division is into three kindes. The first proceeds from the sole fault of the Brain, and is called Head melancholy: the second sympathetically proceeds from the whole body, when the whole temperature is Melancholy: The third ariseth from the Bowels, Liver, Spleen, or Membrane, called Mesenterium named Hypocondriacal, or windy Melancholy, which [1889]Laurentius subdivides into three parts, from those three Members, Hepatick, Splenatick, Meseraick.	The most widely accepted division is into three kinds. The first arises solely from a disorder of the brain and is called head melancholy. The second arises through the influence of the whole body, when the entire temperament is melancholic. The third arises from the abdominal organs—the liver, spleen or membrane called the mesentery—and is named hypochondriacal or windy melancholy. Laurentius subdivides it according to those three organs into hepatic, splenic and mesenteric melancholy.[1890]
Source page 35–36 Love melancholy, which Avicenna calls Ilishi: and Lycanthropia, which he cals Cucubuthe, are commonly included in head Melancholy: but of this last, which Gerardus de Solo cals Amoreos, and most Knight melancholy, with that of Religious melancholy, Virginum, & Viduarum, maintained by Rod. a Castro and Mercatus, and the other kinds of Love melancholy, I will speak apart by themselves in my third Partition.	Love melancholy, which Avicenna calls Ilishi, and lycanthropy, which he calls Cucubuthe, are commonly included in head melancholy. But love melancholy, which Gerardus de Solo calls Amoreos and most call knight's melancholy, together with religious melancholy, the melancholy of virgins and widows described by Rodericus a Castro and Mercatus, and the other kinds of love melancholy, I shall discuss separately in my Third Partition.[1891]
Source page 36 The three precedent species are the subject of my present discourse, which I will anatomize, and treat of, through all their causes, symptomes, cures, together, and apart; that every man that is in any measure affected with this malady, may know how to examine it in himself, and apply remedies unto it.	The three preceding species are the subject of my present discussion. I shall dissect them and treat all their causes, symptoms and cures, together and separately, so that everyone affected by this disease in any degree may know how to examine it in himself and apply remedies.

[1889] Burton. Margin i: "Cap. 13." Chapter 13.

[1890] Editor. The threefold scheme distinguishes a disorder originating in the brain, one affecting the brain through the body's general temperament, and one arising from the abdominal organs. "Windy" refers to wind or vapours. Hepatic, splenic and mesenteric mean associated with the liver, spleen and mesentery respectively.

[1891] Editor. Although "this last" follows lycanthropy, Amoreos, "Knight melancholy" and the Third Partition point back to love melancholy; the modern text names it to clarify the antecedent. Compare Part 3, Section 2, Member 1, Subsection 2, printed p. 444, where Burton calls love before marriage "Heroicall melancholy." The medical forms Ilishi, Cucubuthe and Amoreos, and the source history of "Knight melancholy," remain unverified. Virginum et viduarum means "of virgins and widows."

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is a hard matter, I confess, to distinguish these three species one from the other, to express their several causes, symptomes, cures, being that they are so often confounded amongst themselves, having such affinity, that they can scarce be discerned by the most accurate Physicians; & so often intermixt with other diseases, that the best experienced have been plunged.	It is difficult, I confess, to distinguish these three species from one another and describe their respective causes, symptoms and cures. They are so often confused with one another and so closely related that even the most exact physicians can scarcely tell them apart. They are also so often mixed with other diseases that the most experienced physicians have been baffled.
Montanus consil. 26. names a patient that had this disease of Melancholy & Caninus Appetitus both together: And consil. 23. with Vertigo. [1892]Iulius Cæsar Claudinus with Stone, Gout, Jandice. Trincavellius with an Ague, Jandice, Caninus Appetitus, &c. [1893]Paulus Regoline, a great Doctor in his time, consulted in this case, was so confounded with a confusion of symptomes, that he knew not to what kinde of Melancholy to refer it.	Montanus, in consultation 26, mentions a patient who had melancholy and ravenous hunger together, and in consultation 23, melancholy with vertigo. Julius Caesar Claudinus describes it with stone, gout and jaundice; Trincavellius with fever, jaundice, ravenous hunger and so forth. Paulus Regoline, a distinguished doctor of his day, was consulted about such a case and found the tangle of symptoms so bewildering that he did not know which kind of melancholy it belonged to.[1894]
[1895]Trincavellius, Fallopius, and Francanzanus, famous doctors in Italy, all three conferred with about one party, at the same time, gave three different opinions. And in another place, Trincavellius being demanded what he thought of a melancholy young man, to whom he was sent for, ingenuously confessed, that he was indeed melancholy, but he knew not to what kinde to reduce it. In his 17. consultation, there is the like disagreement about a melancholy Monke.	Trincavellius, Fallopius and Francanzanus, famous physicians in Italy, were all consulted about the same patient at the same time and gave three different opinions. Elsewhere, asked for his view of a melancholic young man whom he had been called to see, Trincavellius frankly admitted that the man was indeed melancholic but that he did not know which kind to assign him to. His seventeenth consultation contains a similar disagreement about a melancholic monk.

[1892] Burton. Margin l: “480. & 116. consult. consil. 12.” These numerals are clear in the 1651 scan, with the body marker before Julius Caesar Claudinus. Their allocation among the adjacent authors and consultations remains unverified.

[1893] Burton. Margin m: “Hildisheim. spicel. 2. fol. 166.” Hildesheim, Spicilegium 2, folio 166.

[1894] Editor. Caninus appetitus literally means “dog-like appetite,” rendered “ravenous hunger.” “Stone” denotes calculous disease without specifying a site. These are reported consultation cases; the compressed marginal numerals have not been resolved into reliable source locations.

[1895] Burton. Margin n: “Trincavellius tom. 2. consil. 15. & 16.” Trincavellius, volume 2, consultations 15 and 16.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The symptomes, which others ascribe to misaffected parts and humors, [1896]Herc. de Saxonia attributes wholly to distempered spirits, & those immaterial, as I have said. Sometimes they cannot well discerne this Disease from others. In Reinerus Solinanders counsels, Sect. consil. 5. he and Dr. Brande both agreed, that the patients disease was hypocondriacal melancholy. Dr. Matholdus said it was Astma, and nothing else.	The symptoms that others attribute to disordered organs and humours, Hercules de Saxonia attributes entirely to disordered spirits, and those immaterial, as I have said. Sometimes physicians cannot readily distinguish this disease from others. In Reinerus Solenander's consultations, section, consultation 5, he and Dr Brande agreed that a patient had hypochondriacal melancholy. Dr Matholdus said it was asthma and nothing else.[1897]
[1898]Solinander and Guarionius, lately sent for to the melancholy Duke of Cleve, with others could not define what species it was, or agree amongst themselves. The species are so confounded, as in Cæsar Claudinus his 44. consultation for a Polonian Count, in his judgment [1899]he laboured of head melancholy, and that which proceeds from the whole temperature both at once. I could give instance of some that have had all three kindes semel & simul, and some successively.	Solenander and Guarionius, recently called with other physicians to the melancholic Duke of Cleves, could neither determine the species nor agree among themselves. The species are so entangled that in Caesar Claudinus's forty-fourth consultation, concerning a Polish count, he judged that the patient suffered at once from head melancholy and from the kind arising from the whole temperament. I could give examples of people who have had all three kinds at once, and others who have had them successively.

[1896] Burton. Starred margin: "cap. 13 tract. posth. de melan." Posthumous Treatise on Melancholy, chapter 13.

[1897] Editor. "Sect. consil. 5." lacks a section number in this printing and is not silently completed. The disagreement with Matholdus is retained as Burton reports it; the underlying consultations and the spelling of personal names still need comparison with their editions.

[1898] Burton. Margin o: "Guarion. cons. med. 2." Guarionius, Medical Consultations, 2.

[1899] Burton. Margin p: "Laboravit per essentiam, & à toto corpore." He suffered from the disease in itself and from the whole body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So that I conclude of our melancholy species, as [1900]many Politicians do of their pure formes of Commonwealths, Monarchies, Aristocracies, Democracies, are most famous in contemplation, but in practice they are temperate and usually mixt, (so [1901]Polybius enformeth us) as the Lacedæmonian, the Roman of old, German now, and many others.	So I conclude about our species of melancholy as many political writers do about their pure forms of government. Monarchies, aristocracies and democracies are most prominent in theory, but in practice they are modified and usually mixed, as Polybius tells us: the Spartan and ancient Roman states, the German state today, and many others.[1902]
Source page 36–37 What Physicians say of distinct species in their books, it much matters not, since that in their patients bodies they are commonly mixt. In such obscurity therefore, variety and confused mixture of symptomes, causes, how difficult a thing is it to treat of several kindes apart; to make any certainty or distinction among so many casualties, distractions, when seldome two men shall be like affected per omnia?	What physicians say in their books about distinct species matters little, since these are usually mixed in their patients' bodies. Amid such obscurity, variety and confused combinations of symptoms and causes, how difficult it is to discuss the several kinds separately, or establish anything certain and distinct among so many contingencies and complications, when scarcely two people are affected alike in every respect!
Source page 37 'Tis hard, I confess, yet nevertheless I will adventure through the midst of these perplexities, & led by the clue or thread of the best writers, extricate my self out of a labyrinth of doubts and errors, and so proceed to the Causes.	It is hard, I confess. Nevertheless, I shall venture into these perplexities and, guided by the thread supplied by the best writers, find my way out of this labyrinth of doubts and errors and proceed to the causes.[1903]

[1900] Burton. Starred margin: "Machiavel, &c. Smithus de rep. Angl. cap. 8. lib. 1. Buscoldus discur. polit. discurs. 5. cap. 7. Arist. l. 3. polit. cap. ult. Keckerm. alii, &c." Machiavelli, etc.; Smith, On the English Commonwealth, book 1, chapter 8; Buscoldus, Political Discourses, discourse 5, chapter 7; Aristotle, Politics, book 3, final chapter; Keckermann and others.

[1901] Burton. Starred margin: "Lib. 6." Book 6.

[1902] Editor. Compare Polybius, Histories 6.3 and 6.11–18, on the mixed constitutions of Sparta and Rome. Burton extends the comparison to the German polity of his own time. "Temperate" here means modified or blended, not mild in temperament. Pure diagnostic kinds, like pure constitutions, are easier to separate in theory than in practice.

[1903] Editor. "Clue" originally means a ball of thread. The phrase evokes the thread used to escape a labyrinth and gives Burton an image for following earlier writers through competing explanations. This completes Section 1 of the First Partition; Section 2 turns to causes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SECT. II. MEMB. 1. SUBSEC. 1. Causes of Melancholy. God a cause.	SECTION 2 MEMBER 1 SUBSECTION 1 Causes of melancholy God as a cause
It is in vain to speak of cures, or think of remedies, untill such time as we have considered of the causes, so [1904]Galen prescribes Glauco: and the common experience of others confirms, that those cures must be unperfect, lame, and to no purpose, wherein the causes have not first been searched, as [1905]Prosper Calenius well observes in his tract de atra bile to Cardinal Cæsius.	It is useless to speak of cures or think of remedies until we have considered the causes: this is Galen's advice to Glaucon. The common experience of others confirms that treatments must be incomplete, deficient and ineffective when the causes have not first been investigated, as Prosper Calenius rightly observes in his treatise On Black Bile, addressed to Cardinal Cesi.
Insomuch that [1906]Fernelius puts a kinde of necessity in the knowledge of the causes, and without which it is impossible to cure or prevent any manner of disease. Empericks may ease, and sometimes help, but not throughly root out: sublatâ causâ tollitur effectus, as the saying is, if the cause be removed, the effect is likewise vanquished.	Indeed, Fernel makes knowledge of the causes a kind of necessity: without it, no disease can be cured or prevented. Empirical practitioners may relieve a disease, and sometimes give help, but cannot root it out completely.[1907] As the saying goes, "Remove the cause and the effect disappears": once the cause is removed, the effect is overcome as well.

[1904] Burton. Margin q: "Primo artis curativæ." Book 1 of the art of healing; the body identifies Galen's work addressed to Glaucon.

[1905] Burton. Margin r: "Nostri primùm sit propositi affectionum causas indagare; res ipsa hortari videtur, nam alioqui earum curatio manca et inutilis esset." Let our first purpose be to investigate the causes of disorders; the subject itself seems to urge this, since otherwise their treatment would be deficient and useless.

[1906] Burton. Margin s: "Path. lib. 1. cap. 11. Rerum cognoscere causas, medicis imprimis necessarium, sine qua nec morbum curare, nec præcavere licet." Pathology 1.11: knowledge of causes is especially necessary for physicians; without it disease can neither be cured nor prevented.

[1907] Editor. "Empericks" are practitioners relying on experience or particular remedies rather than a systematic account of causes. Burton's contrast is between schools of medicine, not between modern evidence-based medicine and untested treatment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is a most difficult thing (I confess) to be able to discern these causes whence they are, and in such [1908]variety to say what the beginning was. [1909]He is happy that can performe it aright. I will adventure to guess as neer as I can, and rip them all up, from the first to the last, generall and particular, to every species, that so they may the better be descried.	I admit that it is extremely difficult to distinguish these causes and their origins, and, amid such variety, to say where the disease began. Happy is the person who can do this correctly. I shall venture to come as close as I can, laying them all open, from first to last, general and particular, for every kind of the disease, so that they may be more clearly understood.
Generall causes, are either supernaturall, or naturall. Supernaturall are from God and his angels, or by Gods permission from the devil and his ministers. That God himself is a cause for the punishment of sin, and satisfaction of his Justice, many examples & testimonies of holy Scriptures make evident unto us, Ps. 107.17. Foolish men are plagued for their offence, and by reason of their wickedness.	General causes are either supernatural or natural. Supernatural causes come from God and his angels, or, with God's permission, from the devil and his servants. Many examples and testimonies in Holy Scripture make it clear to us that God himself causes disease to punish sin and satisfy his justice: Psalm 107:17, "Foolish people are afflicted for their offences and because of their wickedness."[1910]
Gehazi was strucken with leprosie, 2 Reg. 5.27. Iehoram with dysentery and flux, and great diseases of the bowels, 2 Chron. 21.15. David plagued for numbring his people, 1 Par. 21. Sodom and Gomorrah swallowed up. And this disease is peculiarly specified, Psalme 127.12. He brought down their heart through heaviness. Deut. 28.28. He stroke them with madness, blindness, and astonishment of heart.	Gehazi was struck with leprosy, 2 Kings 5:27; Jehoram with dysentery, diarrhoea and severe bowel disease, 2 Chronicles 21:15; David with a plague for taking a census of his people, 1 Chronicles 21. Sodom and Gomorrah were swallowed up. And this particular disease is expressly mentioned in Psalm 107:12: "He brought their hearts low through distress"; and in Deuteronomy 28:28: "He struck them with madness, blindness and bewilderment of heart."[1911]

[1908] Burton. Margin t: "Tanta enim morbi varietas ac differentia ut non facile dignoscatur, unde initium morbus sumpserit. Melanelius è Galeno." The disease has such variety and diversity that it is not easy to discern where it began. Melanelius, from Galen.

[1909] Burton. Margin u: "Felix qui potuit rerum cognoscere causas." Happy is he who has been able to know the causes of things. Virgil, Georgics 2.490.

[1910] Editor. This subsection presents Burton's theological explanation of illness. The claim that melancholy punishes sin is part of his historical argument; it is not a medical conclusion of this edition.

[1911] Editor. The original prints "Psalme 127.12"; the passage is Psalm 107:12, corrected in the modern column. "2 Reg." means 2 Kings; "1 Par." means 1 Chronicles, from Paralipomenon. "Astonishment" here means bewilderment or terror. Burton groups different biblical afflictions under his broad account of melancholy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1912]An evil spirit was sent by the Lord upon Saul, to vex him. [1913]Nebuchadnezzar did eat grass like an oxe, and his heart was made like the beasts of the field. Heathen stories are full of such punishments. Lycurgus, because he cut down the Vines in the country, was by Bacchus driven into madness: so was Pentheus and his mother Agave for neglecting their sacrifice.	An evil spirit was sent upon Saul by the Lord to torment him. Nebuchadnezzar ate grass like an ox, and his mind became like that of the beasts of the field. Pagan stories are full of such punishments. Bacchus drove Lycurgus mad because he cut down the vines in the country; Pentheus and his mother Agave were likewise driven mad for neglecting their sacrifice.
[1914]Censor Fulvius ran mad for untiling Iuno's Temple, to cover a new one of his own, which he had dedicated to Fortune, [1915]and was confounded to death, with grief and sorrow of heart. When Xerxes would have spoiled [1916]Apollo's Temple at Delphos, of those infinite riches it possessed, a terrible thunder came from Heaven and struck 4000. men dead, the rest ran mad. [1917]A little after, the like happened to Brennus, lightning, thunder, Earthquakes, upon such a sacrilegious occasion.	The censor Fulvius went mad after taking the roof tiles from Juno's temple to cover a new temple of his own, dedicated to Fortune; grief and anguish overwhelmed him and brought him to his death. When Xerxes tried to plunder Apollo's temple at Delphi of its immense riches, terrible thunder came from heaven and struck four thousand men dead; the rest went mad. A little later, Brennus met with lightning, thunder and earthquakes on a similarly sacrilegious undertaking.[1918]

[1912] Burton. Margin x: "1 Sam 16.14." First Samuel 16:14.

[1913] Burton. Margin y: "Dan. 5.21." Daniel 5:21.

[1914] Burton. Margin z: "Lactant. instit. lib. 2. cap. 8." Lactantius, Divine Institutes 2.8.

[1915] Burton. Margin a: "Mente captus, & summo animi mærore consumptus." Deprived of reason and consumed by extreme grief of mind.

[1916] Burton. Margin *: "Munster. cosmog. lib. 4. cap. 43. de cœlo substernebantur, tanquam insani de saxis præcipitati &c." Münster, Cosmography 4.43: they were struck down from heaven, hurled from the rocks as if mad, and so on. The compressed Latin is retained as printed; its precise relation to Münster awaits collation.

[1917] Burton. Margin b: "Livius lib. 38." Livy, book 38.

[1918] Editor. These examples combine myth, sacred history and reported punishment for sacrilege. Lactantius, Divine Institutes 2.8, relates Fulvius's removal of Juno's roof tiles, loss of reason and fatal grief; he also mentions the loss of two sons, which Burton omits. Xerxes and Brennus belong roughly two centuries apart, so "a little later" is loose chronology. Münster's account, the figure of four thousand and the precise support in Livy remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 37–38 If we may believe our Pontificiall Writers, they will relate unto us many strange and prodigious punishments in this kinde, inflicted by their Saints. How [1919]Clodoveus sometime King of France, the son of Dogebert, lost his wits for uncovering the body of S. Denis: and how a [1920]sacrilegious Frenchman, that would have stolne away a silver image of S. John, at Birgburge, became frantick on a suddain, raging, and tyrannizing over his own flesh:	If we may believe our papal writers, they tell us of many strange and extraordinary punishments of this kind inflicted by their saints.[1921] They tell how Clovis, once king of France, the son of Dagobert, lost his reason for uncovering the body of Saint Denis; and how a sacrilegious Frenchman who tried to steal a silver image of Saint John at Birgburg suddenly went mad, raging and savaging his own flesh;
Source page 38 Of a [1922]Lord of Rhadnor, that coming from hunting late at night, put his dogs into S. Avans Church, (Llan Avan they called it) and rising betimes next morning, as hunters use to do, found all his Dogs mad, himself being suddenly strucken blinde. Of Tyridates an [1923]Armenian King, for violating some holy Nuns, that was punished in like sort, with loss of his wits.	of a lord of Radnor who, returning late at night from hunting, put his dogs in Saint Avan's church, which they called Llan Avan, and, rising early the next morning as hunters do, found all his dogs mad and himself suddenly struck blind; and of Tiridates, an Armenian king, who was similarly punished with the loss of his reason for violating some holy nuns.[1924]

[1919] Burton. Margin b on the new page: "Gaguin. l. 3. c. 4. quod Dionysii corpus discooperuerat, in insaniam incidit." Gaguin 3.4: because he had uncovered the body of Denis, he fell into madness.

[1920] Burton. Margin c: "Idem lib. 9. sub. Carol. 6. sacrórum contemptor, templi foribus effractis, dum D. Johannis argenteum simulachrum rapere contendit, simulachrum aversa facie dorsum ei versat, nec mora sacrilegus mentis inops, atque in semet insaniens in proprios artus desævit." The same author, book 9, under Charles VI: a despiser of sacred things broke the temple doors and tried to steal a silver image of Saint John; the image turned its face away and its back towards him. Immediately the sacrilegious man lost his reason and, raging against himself, attacked his own limbs.

[1921] Editor. "Pontificiall" and "Papists" refer polemically to Roman Catholic writers and believers. Burton's scepticism about their saints' miracles accompanies his own strong belief in divine punishment; the contrast is part of his Protestant argument.

[1922] Burton. Margin d: "Giraldus Cambrensis lib. 1. c. 1. Itinerar. Cambriæ." Gerald of Wales, Journey Through Wales 1.1. The marginal citation is attached here by context; no distinct d anchor is legible beside the Radnor story in this scan.

[1923] Burton. Margin e: "Delrio tom. 3. lib. 6. sect. 3. quæst. 3." Del Rio, volume 3, book 6, section 3, question 3.

[1924] Editor. Gerald of Wales, Journey Through Wales 1.1, tells the Radnor story and specifies that the lord spent the night in the church with his hounds. "Violating" the nuns can imply sexual assault or profanation; Burton's wording is retained without assigning a more specific act than this passage establishes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But Poets and Papists may go together for fabulous tales; let them flee their own credits: Howsoever they faine of their Nemesis, and of their Saints, or by the devils means may be deluded; we finde it true, that ultor à tergo Deus, [1925]He is God the avenger, as David stiles him: and that it is our crying sins that pull this and many other maladies on our own heads.	But poets and papists may be classed together as tellers of fables; let them put their own credit at risk.[1926] Whatever stories they invent about their Nemesis and their saints, or however the devil may deceive them, we find it true that "God the avenger follows close behind." "He is God the avenger," as David calls him; and it is our flagrant sins that bring this and many other diseases down upon our own heads.
That he can by his Angels, which are his Ministers, strike and heal (saith [1927]Dionysius) whom he will; that he can plague us by his Creatures, Sun, Moone, and Stars, which he useth as his instruments, as a Husbandman (saith Zanchius) doth an Hatchet: Hail, Snow, Windes, &c.	Through his angels, who are his servants, he can strike and heal whomever he chooses, says Dionysius.[1928] He can afflict us through his creations—the sun, moon and stars—which he uses as tools, as a farmer uses a hatchet, says Zanchi; through hail, snow, winds and so on:
[1929]Et conjurati veniunt in classica venti:	And the winds, sworn allies, answer the battle trumpets:

[1925] Burton. Margin f: "Psal. 44.1." The wording about God the avenger points to Psalm 94:1, not 44:1; the printed number is retained here.

[1926] Editor. The scan reads "flee their own credits." The modern rendering takes this as an appeal to the narrators' own reputations or credibility; the precise idiom or possible printing error remains unresolved. Nemesis is the personification of divine retribution.

[1927] Burton. Margin g: "Lib. 8. cap. de Hierar." The printed reference is retained. It points to the discussion of heavenly powers associated with Dionysius; the numbering requires collation.

[1928] Editor. Dionysius is the author conventionally called Pseudo-Dionysius, whose writings on celestial hierarchies circulated under the name of Dionysius the Areopagite. "Husbandman" means farmer; "Ministers" means agents or servants.

[1929] Burton. Margin h: "Claudian." The verse is Claudian, On the Third Consulship of Honorius 98. The compared Latin text reads ad classica, "at the trumpet calls," where Burton prints in classica. The original column preserves Burton's variant.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as in Ioshuas time, as in Pharaohs reign in Egypt; they are but as so many executioners of his justice. He can make the proudest spirits stoop, and cry out with Iulian the Apostate, Vicisti Galilæe: or with Apollo's Priest in [1930]Chrysostome, O cœlum! ô terra! unde hostis hic? What an enemy is this?	as in Joshua's time, as in Pharaoh's reign in Egypt. They are simply so many agents carrying out his justice. He can humble the proudest spirits and make them cry out with Julian the Apostate, "You have conquered, Galilean!" or with Apollo's priest in Chrysostom, "O heaven! O earth! Where has this enemy come from?" What an enemy is this![1931]
And pray with David, acknowledging his power, I am weakned and sore broken, I roar for the grief of mine heart, mine heart panteth, &c. Psal. 38.8. O Lord rebuke me not in thine anger, neither chastise me in thy wrath, Ps. 38.1. Make me to hear joy and gladness, that the bones which thou hast broken, may rejoyce, Psal. 51.8. & verse 12. Restore to me the joy of thy salvation, and stablish me with thy free spirit.	And make them pray with David, acknowledging his power: "I am weak and utterly broken; I cry aloud from the anguish of my heart; my heart pounds," and so on, Psalm 38:8. "O Lord, do not rebuke me in your anger or punish me in your wrath," Psalm 38:1. "Let me hear joy and gladness, so that the bones you have broken may rejoice," Psalm 51:8; and verse 12, "Restore to me the joy of your salvation, and sustain me with your generous spirit."[1932]
For these causes belike [1933]Hippocrates would have a Physician take special notice whether the disease come not from a divine supernatural cause, or whether it follow the course of Nature. But this is farther discussed by Fran: Valesius de sacr. philos. cap. 8. [1934]Fernelius, and [1935]I. Cæsar Claudinus, to whom I refer you, how this place of Hippocrates is to be understood.	For these reasons, presumably, Hippocrates would have a physician pay particular attention to whether a disease comes from a divine, supernatural cause or follows the course of nature. How this passage in Hippocrates should be understood is discussed further by Francisco Vallés in chapter 8 of his Sacred Philosophy, by Fernel and by Giovanni Cesare Claudini; I refer you to them.

[1930] Burton. Margin i: "De babilâ Martyre." On the martyr Babylas; the citation refers to Chrysostom's account of the silencing of Apollo's oracle.

[1931] Editor. "Galilean" addresses Christ. Julian's reported dying words belong to the Christian tradition about the emperor, who rejected Christianity; they are not presented here as independently authenticated speech. Burton's following allusion concerns Apollo's oracle and the martyr Babylas.

[1932] Editor. The first quotation combines Psalm 38:8 with "my heart panteth" from verse 10. The "free spirit" in Psalm 51:12 is rendered "generous spirit," preserving the older sense of free as willing or liberal, rather than freedom from restraint.

[1933] Burton. Margin k: "Lib. cap. 5. prog." The abbreviated reference to the Prognostics is retained as printed; its numbering and Burton's interpretation require collation.

[1934] Burton. Margin l: "Lib. 1. de Abditis rerum causis." Book 1 of On the Hidden Causes of Things.

[1935] Burton. Margin m: "Respons. med. 12. resp." Medical Responses, response 12.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Paracelsus is of opinion, that such spiritual diseases (for so he cals them) are spiritually to be cured, and not otherwise. Ordinary means in such cases will not avail: Non est reluctandum cum Deo. When that monster-taming Hercules overcame all in the olympicks, Iupiter at last in an unknown shape wrestled with him; the victory was uncertain, till at length Iupiter descryed himself, and Hercules yielded. No striving with supreme powers.	Paracelsus believes that such spiritual diseases—for so he calls them—must be cured by spiritual means, and by no others. Ordinary means will do no good in such cases: "There must be no struggling against God." When the monster-taming Hercules defeated everyone at the Olympic games, Jupiter finally wrestled with him in an unfamiliar shape. The outcome was uncertain until Jupiter at last revealed himself, and Hercules yielded. There is no contending with supreme powers.
Nil juvat immensos Cratero promittere montes,	It is no use promising Craterus enormous mountains of wealth,[1936]
Physicians and Physick can do no good, [1937]we must submit our selves under the mighty hand of God, acknowledg our offences, call to him for mercy. If he strike us, una eademque manus vulnus opemque feret, as it is with them that are wounded with the spear of Achilles, he alone must help; otherwise our diseases are incurable, and we not to be relieved.	Physicians and medicine can do no good: we must submit ourselves beneath the mighty hand of God, acknowledge our offences and call on him for mercy. If he strikes us, "one and the same hand will bring the wound and its relief." As with those wounded by Achilles' spear, he alone must help; otherwise our diseases cannot be cured, and we cannot be relieved.[1938]

[1936] Editor. An adaptation of Persius, Satire 3.65, whose text asks what use there is in promising Craterus great mountains. Craterus stands for the physician; the mountains are extravagant promised payment. Burton changes the wording to fit his claim about divine causes.

[1937] Burton. Margin *: "1 Pet. 5.6." First Peter 5:6.

[1938] Editor. Compare Ovid, Remedies for Love 43–48: the teacher who wounded also provides a cure, followed by the spear that healed the wound it had made. Burton adapts this motif to God. In the associated story, Achilles' spear both wounds and cures Telephus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 39 SUBSEC. 2. A Digression of the nature of Spirits, bad Angels, or Devils, and how they cause Melancholy.	SUBSECTION 2 A digression on the nature of spirits Evil angels or devils and how they cause melancholy
How far the power of Spirits and Devils doth extend, and whether they can cause this, or any other Disease, is a serious question, and worthy to be considered: for the better understanding of which, I will make a brief digression of the nature of Spirits.	How far the power of spirits and devils extends, and whether they can cause this or any other disease, is a serious question worth considering. To make it better understood, I shall briefly digress on the nature of spirits.
And although the question be very obscure, according to [1939]Postellus, full of controversie and ambiguity: beyond the reach of humane capacity, fateor excedere vires intentionis meæ, saith [1940]Austin, I confess I am not able to understand it, finitum de infinito non potest statuere, we can sooner determine with Tully de nat. deorum, quid non sint, quam quid sint,	The question is extremely obscure—full of controversy and uncertainty, according to Postel—and beyond human understanding. "I confess that it exceeds the powers of my inquiry," says Augustine; I admit that I cannot understand it.[1941] The finite cannot pass judgement on the infinite. With Cicero, in On the Nature of the Gods, we can more readily determine what spirits are not than what they are.
our subtle Schoolmen, Cardans, Scaligers, profound Thomists, Fracastoriana & Ferneliana acies, are weak, dry, obscure, defective in these mysteries: and all our quickest wits, as an owles eyes at the Suns light, wax dull, and are not sufficient to apprehend them, yet as in the rest, I will adventure to say something to this point.	Our subtle scholastics, our Cardanos and Scaligers, our profound Thomists, the penetrating intellects of Fracastoro and Fernel, are weak, barren, obscure and inadequate when faced with these mysteries. All our sharpest minds grow dim, like an owl's eyes in sunlight, and cannot grasp them. Yet, as with the other subjects, I shall venture to say something about this one.[1942]

[1939] Burton. Margin n: "Lib. 1. c. 7. de orbis concordia. In nulla re major fuit altercatio, major obscuritas, minor opinionum concordia, quàm de dæmonibus & substantiis separatis." On the Concord of the World 1.7: on no subject has there been greater dispute, greater obscurity or less agreement of opinions than on demons and separate substances.

[1940] Burton. Margin *: "Lib. 3. de Trinit. cap. 1." On the Trinity 3.1.

[1941] Editor. Augustine, On the Trinity 3.1.5, declines to decide precisely how angels assume or transform visible bodies. Burton broadens that local admission of uncertainty into a warning about the limits of inquiry into spirits.

[1942] Editor. "Schoolmen" means scholastic theologians and philosophers; Thomists follow Thomas Aquinas. The Latin acies suggests penetrating sight or intellectual sharpness. The plurals "Cardans" and "Scaligers" treat those writers as examples of an intellectual type.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In former times, as we reade Acts. 23. the Sadduces denied that there were any such Spirits, Devils, or Angels. So did Galen the Physitian, the Peripateticks, even Aristotle himself, as Pomponatius stoutly maintains, and Scaliger in some sort grants. Though Dandinus the Jesuit, com. in lib. 2. de anima, stifly denies it;	In former times, as we read in Acts 23, the Sadducees denied the existence of such spirits, devils or angels. So did the physician Galen, the Peripatetics and even Aristotle himself, as Pomponazzi firmly maintains and Scaliger to some extent concedes—although the Jesuit Dandini strongly denies this in his commentary on book 2 of On the Soul.[1943]
substantiæ separatæ and intelligences, are the same which Christians call Angels, and Platonists Devils, for they name all the Spirits, dæmones, be they good or bad Angels, as Iulius Pollux Onomasticon, lib. 1. cap. 1. observes. Epicures and Atheists are of the same minde in generall, because they never saw them.	Separate substances and intelligences are the same beings that Christians call angels and Platonists call demons: they give all spirits the name daimones, whether good or evil angels, as Julius Pollux observes in book 1, chapter 1 of his Onomasticon. Epicureans and atheists generally share the view that they do not exist, because they have never seen them.[1944]
Plato, Plotinus, Porphyrius, Iamblicus, Proclus, insisting in the steps of Trismegistus, Pythagoras and Socrates, make no doubt of it: Nor Stoicks, but that there are such spirits, though much erring from the truth.	Plato, Plotinus, Porphyry, Iamblichus and Proclus, following in the footsteps of Trismegistus, Pythagoras and Socrates, have no doubt that such spirits exist. Neither do the Stoics, although they stray far from the truth.

[1943] Editor. The explicit biblical statement is Acts 23:8. Peripatetics are followers of Aristotle. Burton reports a dispute about whether Aristotelian separate intelligences amount to angels; the sentence should not be taken as an uncontested account of Aristotle's beliefs.

[1944] Editor. The Greek daimōn can designate a divine or intermediary spirit and need not mean an evil devil. "Separate substances" are beings conceived as existing apart from matter; "intelligences" are intellectual beings. Here "of the same mind" resumes denial of spirits, rather than the immediately preceding classification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Concerning the first beginning of them, the [1945]Thalmudists say that Adam had a wife called Lilis, before he marryed Eve, and of her he begat nothing but Devils. The Turks [1946]Alcoran is altogether as absurd and ridiculous in this point: but the Scripture informs us Christians; how Lucifer the chief of them with his associates, [1947]fell from heaven for his pride, and ambition;	As for their first origin, the Talmudists say that Adam had a wife called Lilith before he married Eve, and that by her he fathered nothing but devils.[1948] The Turks' Koran is just as absurd and ridiculous on this point.[1949] But Scripture informs us Christians how Lucifer, their chief, fell from heaven with his companions because of his pride and ambition;
created of God, placed in heaven, and sometimes an Angel of light, now cast down into the lower aeriall sublunary parts, or into Hell, and delivered into chains of darkness (2 Pet. 2.4.) to be kept unto damnation.	created by God, placed in heaven and once an angel of light, he is now cast down into the lower regions of air beneath the moon, or into hell, and "handed over to chains of darkness," 2 Peter 2:4, to be held until condemnation.[1950]

[1945] Burton. Margin o: "Pererius in Genesin. lib. 4. in cap. 3. v. 23." Pererius on Genesis, book 4, commenting on chapter 3, verse 23.

[1946] Burton. Margin p: "See Streozzius Cicogna omnifaria. Mag. lib. 2. c. 15. 10. 14. Aubsanus, Bredenbachius." The sequence of chapter numbers and the name read here as "Aubsanus" are retained provisionally from the scan; this compressed citation needs collation.

[1947] Burton. Margin q: "Angelus per superbiam separatus à Deo, qui in veritate non stetit. Austin." An angel separated from God through pride, who did not stand firm in the truth. Augustine.

[1948] Editor. "Lilis" is Lilith. A story of Lilith as Adam's first wife appears in the Alphabet of Ben Sira; the Talmud also contains distinct traditions about Adam fathering spirits. Burton's collective label "Thalmudists," mediated through Pererius, compresses these traditions and should not be read as a precise citation.

[1949] Editor. "Alcoran" is the Koran, or Qur'an. "The Turks" is Burton's habitual identification of Islam through the Ottoman world. His dismissive comparison is preserved as his own judgement; no particular Qur'anic verse is supplied.

[1950] Editor. "Sometimes" means formerly. "Sublunary" means below the moon, the lower, changeable region of the traditional cosmos. Second Peter 2:4 refers to sinning angels held for judgement; Burton joins it to the broader Christian account of Lucifer's fall.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 39–40 There is a foolish opinion which some hold, that they are the [1951]souls of men departed; good and more noble were deified, the baser groveled on the ground, or in the lower parts: and were devils, the which with Tertullian, Porphyrius the Philosopher, M. Tyrius ser. 27. maintaines. These spirits, he [1952]saith, which we call Angels and Devils, are nought but souls of men departed, which either through love and pity of their friends yet living, help and assist them, or else persecute their enemies, whom they hated, as Dido threatned to persecute Æneas:	Some hold the foolish opinion that these spirits are the souls of the dead: the good and nobler souls were made gods, while the baser ones grovelled on the ground or in the lower regions and became devils. Tertullian, the philosopher Porphyry and Maximus of Tyre, in Discourse 27, maintain this. These spirits that we call angels and devils, he says, are nothing but the souls of the dead, who either help and support their surviving friends through love and pity, or persecute the enemies they hated, as Dido threatened to persecute Aeneas:
Source page 40 Omnibus umbra locis adero: dabis improbe pœnas.	Everywhere my ghost will haunt you; you villain, you will pay.[1953]
They are (as others suppose) appointed by those higher Powers to keep men from their nativity, and to protect, or punish them as they see cause: and are called boni and mali Genii by the Romans. Heroes, Lares, if good, Lemures or Larvæ if bad, by the Stoicks, governours of Countries, Men, Cities, saith [1954]Apuleius,	Others suppose that the higher powers appoint them to watch over people from birth, and to protect or punish them as they see fit. The Romans call them good and evil guardian spirits. The Stoics call the good ones Heroes or Lares, and the bad ones Lemures or Larvae: governors of countries, people and cities, says Apuleius.[1955]

[1951] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading at the foot of printed page 39: “Nature of Devils.” Placed here at the beginning of the discussion it labels.

[1952] Burton. Margin *: “Nihil aliud sunt Dæmones quàm nudæ animæ quæ corpore deposito priorem miserati vitam, cognatis succurrunt commoti misericordia, &c.” Demons are nothing but disembodied souls which, having laid aside the body and feeling pity for their former life, help their kin, moved by compassion, and so on.

[1953] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.386. Dido threatens Aeneas with her continuing presence after death. The rendering is from the Latin printed by Burton.

[1954] Burton. Margin *: “De Deo Socratis.” On the God of Socrates.

[1955] Editor. Genii are attendant or tutelary spirits. Lares, Lemures and Larvae are Roman terms for classes of spirits or ghosts; their meanings overlap and vary. Burton’s compact classification is preserved without imposing a single uniform system on his several ancient authorities.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Deos appellant qui ex hominum numero juste ac prudenter vitæ curriculo gubernato, pro numine, postea ab hominibus præditi fanis & ceremoniis vulgo admittuntur, ut in Ægypto Osyris, &c. Præstites, Capella calls them, which protected particular men as well as Princes,	"They call gods those who, having lived justly and wisely as human beings, are afterwards generally acknowledged as divinities and honoured by people with temples and ceremonies: Osiris in Egypt, for example." Capella calls them protecting spirits, who guard private individuals as well as princes.
Socrates had his Dæmonium Saturninum & ignium, which of all spirits is best, ad sublimes cogitationes animum erigentem, as the Platonists supposed; Plotinus his; and we Christians our assisting Angel, as Andreas Victorellus, a copious writer of this subject, Lodovicus de La-Cerda the Jesuit in his Voluminous Tract de Angelo Custode, Zanchius, and some Divines think. But this absurd Tenent of Tyreus, Proclus confutes at large in his book de Animâ & dæmone.	Socrates had his Saturnine and fiery spirit, the best of all spirits, which raises the mind to lofty thoughts, as the Platonists supposed;[1956] Plotinus had his; and we Christians have our assisting angel, as Andrea Vittorelli, who writes extensively on this subject, the Jesuit Luis de la Cerda in his lengthy treatise On the Guardian Angel, Zanchi and some theologians believe. But Proclus refutes this absurd doctrine of Maximus of Tyre at length in his book On the Soul and the Daemon.[1957]

[1956] Editor. "Saturnine" here belongs to a philosophical and astrological classification of spirits. It does not simply mean gloomy. The source prints ignium, "of fires"; the modern rendering understands it as "fiery," coordinated with Saturninum. The underlying citation needs collation.

[1957] Editor. "Tyreus" refers back to Maximus of Tyre. Burton's return to that "absurd doctrine" after a passage about guardian spirits leaves the immediate scope of the rejection ambiguous; it probably points back to spirits understood as departed human souls. The Proclus reference requires collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[1958]Psellus a Christian, and sometimes Tutor (saith Cuspinian) to Michael Parapinatus, Emperour of Greece, a great observer of the nature of Devils, holds they are [1959]corporeal, and have aeriall bodies, that they are mortall, live and dye, (which Martianus Capella likewise maintaines, but our Christian Philosophers explode) that they are [1960]nourished and have excrements,	Psellus, a Christian and formerly tutor, according to Cuspinian, to Michael Parapinaces, emperor of the Greeks, was a close observer of the nature of devils. He holds that they are corporeal and have bodies made of air; that they are mortal, live and die—a view Martianus Capella also maintains, but which our Christian philosophers reject—and that they take nourishment and produce excrement.[1961]
that they feele paine if they be hurt (which Cardan confirmes, and Scaliger justly laughs him to scorne for; Si pascantur aere, cur non pugnant ob puriorem aera? &c.) or stricken: and if their bodyes be cut, with admirable celerity they come together again.	They feel pain if injured or struck, a claim Cardano confirms and Scaliger rightly ridicules: “If they feed on air, why do they not fight for purer air?” and so on. If their bodies are cut apart, they join together again with astonishing speed.
Austin in Gen. lib. 3. lib. arbit. approves as much, mutata casu corpora in deteriorem qualitatem aëris spissioris, so doth Hierome, Comment. in epist. ad Ephes. cap. 3. Origen, Tertullian, Lactantius, and many ancient Fathers of the Church: That in their fall their bodyes were changed into a more aerial and gross substance.	Augustine, in On Genesis, book 3, and On Free Choice, supports a similar view: “Their bodies were changed by the fall into the inferior condition of denser air.” So do Jerome, in his commentary on chapter 3 of the Epistle to the Ephesians, Origen, Tertullian, Lactantius and many ancient Fathers of the Church: at their fall, their bodies were changed into a more airy and coarse substance.[1962]

[1958] Burton. Margin r: “He lived 500 years since.” Burton’s relative dating of Psellus is preserved; it belongs to the author’s own time.

[1959] Burton. Margin s: “Apuleius: spiritus animalia sunt animo passibilia, mente rationalia, corpore aëria, tempore sempiterna.” Apuleius: spirits are living beings, subject to passions in soul, rational in mind, airy in body and everlasting in time. The margin has no clearly discernible s anchor; placed by context at “corporeal.” Its everlasting spirits do not agree with the adjacent claim that spirits are mortal.

[1960] Burton. Margin t: “Nutriuntur, et excrementa habent quod pulsata doleant solido percussa corpore.” They are nourished and have excrement; they feel pain when struck, being hit by a solid body. The Latin syntax is compressed, and the reading of its connective remains uncertain.

[1961] Editor. Psellus is Michael Psellus, the Byzantine writer; Michael VII was known as Parapinaces. “Corporeal” means having a body, even one imagined as made of air. “Explode” means reject or dismiss. Burton’s account moves among conflicting authorities; it does not give a single consistent doctrine of spirits.

[1962] Editor. The Latin says “denser air”; the following English says “more aerial and gross.” Both are retained rather than harmonized. “Gross” means coarse or dense. The abbreviated Augustine references and the list of supporting Fathers have not yet been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Bodine lib. 4. Theatri Naturæ, and David Crusius Hermeticæ Philosophiæ lib. 1. cap. 4. by several arguments proves Angels and Spirits to be Corporeal: quicquid continetur in loco Corporeum est: At spiritus continetur in loco, ergo. Si Spiritus sunt quanti, erunt Corporei: At sunt quanti, ergo. Sunt finiti, ergo quanti, &c.	Bodin, in book 4 of his Theatre of Nature, and David Crusius, in book 1, chapter 4 of his Hermetic Philosophy, offer several arguments to prove that angels and spirits have bodies: "Whatever is contained in a place is corporeal. But a spirit is contained in a place; therefore it is corporeal. If spirits have dimensions, they must be corporeal. But they do have dimensions; therefore they are corporeal. They are finite, and therefore have dimensions," and so on.
Source page 40–41 Bodine goes farther yet, and will have these, [1963]Animæ separatæ genii, Spirits, Angels, Devils, and so likewise soules of men departed, if Corporeal (which he most eagerly contends) to be of some shape, and that absolutely round, like Sun and Moone, because that is the most perfect forme, quæ nihil habet asperitatis, nihil angulis incisum, nihil anfractibus involutum, nihil eminens, sed inter corpora perfecta est perfectissimum; therefore all spirits are corporeal he concludes, & in their proper shapes round.	Bodin goes further still. He holds that these disembodied souls, guardian spirits, angels and devils, and likewise the souls of the dead, if corporeal—as he strongly insists they are—must have some shape. That shape must be perfectly round, like the sun and moon, because this is the most perfect form: "It has no roughness, no indenting angles, no winding folds, no projections, but among perfect bodies is the most perfect." He therefore concludes that all spirits are corporeal and round in their natural shapes.

[1963] Burton. Unlettered citation beginning with a printed "4.": "4. Lib. 4. Theol. nat. fol. 535." Book 4, folio 535. The title abbreviation appears as "Theol. nat." in the margin; the body identifies Bodin's Theatrum naturæ. Placed at Bodin's argument by context.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 41 That they can assume other aerial bodies, all manner of shapes at their pleasures, appear in what likeness they will themselves, that they are most swift in motion, can pass many miles in an instant, & so likewise [1964]transform bodies of others into what shape they please, and with admirable celerity remove them from place to place;	Most writers on this subject regard it as credible that spirits can assume other bodies made of air and every kind of shape at will; appear in whatever likeness they choose; move with extraordinary speed and cover many miles in an instant; and likewise transform the bodies of others into any shape they please and move them from place to place with astonishing speed;
(as the Angel did Habacuck to Daniel, and as Philip the Deacon was carried away by the Spirit, when he had baptized the Eunuch; so did Pythagoras and Apollonius remove themselves and others, with many such feats) that they can represent castles in the ayre, pallaces, armies, spectrums, prodigies, and such strange objects to mortal mens eyes, [1965]cause smels, savors, &c. deceive all the senses; most Writers of this subject credibly believe;	as the angel carried Habakkuk to Daniel, and as Philip the deacon was carried away by the Spirit after baptizing the eunuch. Pythagoras and Apollonius likewise transported themselves and others, among many similar feats.[1966] These writers also believe that spirits can show mortal eyes castles in the air, palaces, armies, apparitions, portents and other strange sights; produce smells, tastes and so on; and deceive all the senses.[1967]

[1964] Burton. Margin u: “Cyprianus in Epist. montes etiam et animalia transferri possunt: as the devill did Christ to the top of the Pinacle: and Witches are often translated. See more in Streozzius Cicogna. lib. 3. cap. 4. omnif. mag. Per aëra subducere & in sublime corpora ferre possunt, Biarmanus. Percussi dolent et uruntur, in conspicuos cineres, Agrippa, lib. 3. cap. de occul. Philos.” Cyprian, in an epistle: even mountains and living creatures can be transported; the following English examples mean bodily transport. Cicogna, Universal Magic 3.4; they can carry bodies through the air and raise them aloft, “Biarmanus” (name read provisionally); when struck they feel pain and are burnt into visible ashes, Agrippa, book 3 of Occult Philosophy (chapter number omitted in print).

[1965] Burton. Margin *: “Agrippa. de occult. Philos. lib. 3. cap. 18.” Agrippa, Occult Philosophy 3.18.

[1966] Editor. Habakkuk’s transportation appears in Bel and the Dragon 33–39, an addition to Daniel; Philip’s is in Acts 8:39. Apollonius is Apollonius of Tyana. Burton places biblical and philosophical wonder stories beside one another as examples of rapid bodily transport.

[1967] Editor. “Savors” means tastes or flavours; the long s can resemble f in the scan. “Spectrums” are apparitions, and “prodigies” are extraordinary portents. “Credibly believe” is understood here as accepting these accounts as credible, not as an independent verification of them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and that they can foretell future events, and do many strange miracles. Iunos image spake to Camillus, and Fortunes statue to the Romane matrons, with many such. Zanchius, Bodine, Spondanus and others are of opinion that they cause a true Metamorphosis, as Nabuchadnezer was really translated into a beast, Lots wife into a pillar of Salt; Vlysses companions into Hogs and Dogs, by Circes charmes;	They believe, too, that spirits can foretell future events and perform many strange miracles. Juno's image spoke to Camillus, and Fortune's statue to the Roman matrons, among many such cases. Zanchi, Bodin, Spondanus and others think that spirits produce real transformations: Nebuchadnezzar was actually changed into a beast, Lot's wife into a pillar of salt, and Ulysses' companions into pigs and dogs by Circe's spells.
Turn themselves and others, as they do Witches into Cats, Dogs, Hares, Crowes, &c. Streozzius Cicogna hath many examples lib. 3. omnif. mag. cap. 4. & 5. which he there confutes, as Austin likewise doth de civ. Dei lib. 18.	They change themselves and others, as they turn witches into cats, dogs, hares, crows and so on. Strozzi Cicogna gives many examples in book 3, chapters 4 and 5 of his Universal Magic, and there refutes them; Augustine does the same in book 18 of The City of God.[1968]
That they can be seen when and in what shape, and to whom they will, saith Psellus, Tametsi nil tale viderim, nec optem videre, though he himself never saw them nor desired it; and use sometimes carnal copulation (as elsewhere I shall [1969]prove more at large) with women and men.	Psellus says that they can be seen whenever they choose, in whatever form they choose and by whomever they choose—"although I have never seen anything of the kind, nor wish to see it." They sometimes have sexual intercourse with women and men, as I shall demonstrate more fully elsewhere.
Many will not believe they can be seene, and if any man shall say, sweare, and stifly maintain, though he be discreet and wise, judicious and learned, that he hath seen them, they accompt him a timorous foole, a melancholy dizard, a weak fellow, a dreamer, a sick or a mad man, they contemn him, laugh him to scorne, and yet Marcus of his credit told Psellus that he had often seen them.	Many people will not believe that spirits can be seen. If anyone says, swears and firmly insists that he has seen them, however sensible, wise, judicious and learned he may be, they consider him a timid fool, a melancholic simpleton, a weak-minded fellow, a dreamer, a sick man or a madman. They despise him and laugh him to scorn; yet Marcus assured Psellus on his word that he had often seen them.

[1968] Editor. Augustine, City of God 18.17–18, discusses apparent transformations into animals and denies that demons can truly change a human being's nature into that of a beast. His explanation allows deception of perception; it is not a blanket denial of every supernatural occurrence.

[1969] Burton. Margin x: "Part. 3. sect. 2. Mem. 1. Sub. 1. Love Melancholy." The reference agrees with Third Partition, Section 2, Member 1, Subsection 1, on the extent of love. Its discussion of incubi, succubi and intercourse between witches and devils appears at printed pp. 437–438, with objections continuing thereafter. Related passage: 3.2.1.1 (confirmed printed locator).

Original text 1651	Modern English
And Leo Suavius, a Frenchman, §. 8. in Commentar. l. 1. Paracelsi de vita longa, out of some Platonists will have the ayre to be as full of them as snow falling in the skies, and that they may be seen, and withall sets down the means how men may see them; Si irreverberatis oculis sole splendente versus cœlum continuaverint obtutus, &c. and saith moreover he tryed it, præmissorum feci experimentum, & it was true, that the Platonists said.	And the Frenchman Leo Suavius, in section 8 of his commentary on book 1 of Paracelsus's On Long Life, follows certain Platonists in holding that the air is as full of spirits as the sky is of falling snow, and that they can be seen. He also explains how people may see them: "If they keep their eyes steadily fixed upon the sky while the sun is shining," and so on. He adds that he tried it—"I tested the things just described"—and found the Platonists' statement true.[1970]
Paracelsus confesseth that he saw them divers times, and conferred with them, & so doth [1971]Alexander ab Alexandro, that he so found it by experience, when as before he doubted of it. Many deny it, saith Lavater de spectris, part. 1. c. 2. & part. 2. c. 11. because they never saw them themselves;	Paracelsus states that he saw them several times and talked with them; so does Alessandro d'Alessandro, who says that experience established what he had previously doubted. Many deny it, says Lavater in On Apparitions, part 1, chapter 2, and part 2, chapter 11, because they have never seen spirits themselves.
But as he reports at large all over his book, especially c. 19. part. 1. they are often seen and heard, & familiarly converse with men, as Lod. Vives assureth us, innumerable Records, Histories, and testimonies evince in all ages, times, places, and [1972]all travellers besides; in the West Indies and our Northerne climes, Nihil familiarius quam in agris & urbibus spiritus videre, audire qui vetent, jubeant, &c.	But as he reports at length throughout his book, especially in part 1, chapter 19, they are often seen and heard, and associate familiarly with human beings. Vives assures us of this; innumerable records, histories and testimonies demonstrate it in every age, time and place, as do all travellers. In the West Indies and our northern regions, "Nothing is more common than to see spirits in the countryside and towns, and to hear them forbidding and commanding," and so on.

[1970] Editor. Leo Suavius is the name used here for the commentator Jacques Gohory. Irreverberatis oculis suggests a steady or undiverted gaze; "steadily fixed" is an interpretive rendering. The report is part of Burton's history of alleged sightings. The printed Latin describing the experiment is read as præmissorum feci experimentum, "I tested the foregoing."

[1971] Burton. Margin y: "Genial. dierum. Ita sibi visum et compertum quum prius an essent ambigeret Fidem suam liberet." Miscellaneous Days: he had seen and ascertained this for himself, although previously he doubted their existence. Let him make good his word. Editor: The final clause is read as a jussive, leaving responsibility for the report with its author; liberare fidem means to make good one's word (Lewis and Short, s.v. libero, II.A.b). Its precise relationship to Alessandro's text has not been verified.

[1972] Burton. Margin z: "Li. 1. de verit. Fidei. Benzo. &c." Book 1 of On the Truth of the Faith; Benzoni, and others. The Vives citation is printed beside this later part of the sentence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hieronymus vita Pauli, Basil ser. 40. Nicephorus, Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomenus, [1973]Iacobus Boissardus in his tract de spirituum apparitionibus, Petrus Loyerus l. de spectris, Wierus l. 1. have infinite varity of such examples of apparitions of spirits, for him to read that farther doubts, to his ample satisfaction.	Jerome in his Life of Paul, Basil in Sermon 40, Nicephorus, Eusebius, Socrates, Sozomen, Jean-Jacques Boissard in his treatise On Apparitions of Spirits, Pierre Le Loyer in his book On Apparitions, and Weyer in book 1 offer an endless variety of examples of such appearances of spirits. Anyone who still doubts may read them and find ample satisfaction.[1974]
Source page 41–42 One alone I will briefly insert. A noble man in Germany was sent Embassador to the King of Sueden (for his name, the time, and such circumstances, I refer you to Boissardus mine [1975]Author) after he had done his businesse, he sailed to Livonia, on set purpose to see those familiar spirits, which are there said to be conversant with men, and do their drudgery works.	I shall briefly include just one example. A German nobleman was sent as ambassador to the king of Sweden—for his name, the date and similar details, I refer you to Boissard, my source. When his business was finished, he sailed to Livonia expressly to see those familiar spirits that are said to associate with people there and do their menial work.[1976]
Source page 42 Amongst other matters, one of them told him where his wife was, in what roome, in what cloathes, what doing, & brought him a Ring from her, which at his return non sine omnium admiratione, he found to be true; and so believed that ever after, which before he doubted of.	Among other things, one of them told him where his wife was, which room she was in, what she was wearing and what she was doing, and brought him a ring from her. On his return he found the account true, to everyone's considerable astonishment; and from then on he believed what he had previously doubted.

[1973] Burton. Margin *: "Lib. de Divinatione et magia." A book On Divination and Magic. Printed beside the Boissard reference; the relation between the titles still needs collation.

[1974] Editor. Socrates in this list is the church historian, not the Greek philosopher mentioned earlier. "Converse" means associate or have dealings with, as well as speak. The long catalogue records Burton's cited witnesses; it does not establish the reported apparitions as facts.

[1975] Burton. Margin a: "Cap.8. Transportavit in Livoniam cupiditate videndi, &c." Chapter 8: he crossed to Livonia out of a desire to see them, etc. The reference is to Boissard.

[1976] Editor. Livonia was a Baltic region embracing parts of present-day Latvia and Estonia. A "familiar" is an attending or companion spirit. Burton repeats Boissard's report; the narrative is not independent verification of the event.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cardan l.19. de subtil. relates of his father Facius Cardan, that after the accustomed solemnities, An.1491.13. August, he conjured up 7. Devils in Greek apparel, about 40. years of age, some ruddy of complexion, and some pale, as he thought; he asked them many questions, and they made ready answer, that they were aerial Devils, that they lived and died as men did, save that they were far longer liv'd, (7. or 800. [1977]yeares)	Cardano, in book 19 of On Subtlety, relates that his father, Fazio Cardano, after performing the customary rites on 13 August 1491, summoned seven devils in Greek clothing. They appeared to him about forty years old, some ruddy in complexion and some pale. He asked them many questions, and they readily answered that they were spirits of the air, living and dying like humans, except that their lives were much longer —seven or eight hundred years.
they did as much excel men in dignity, as we do juments, and were as far excelled again of those that were above them: our [1978]governors and keepers they are moreover, which [1979]Plato in Critias delivered of old, and subordinate to one another, Ut enim homo homini, sic dæmon dæmoni dominatur, they rule themselves as well as us,	They surpassed humans in rank as much as we surpass beasts of burden, and those above them surpassed them by the same degree. Moreover, they are our rulers and guardians, as Plato taught long ago in the Critias, and they are subordinate to one another: "Just as one human rules another, so one spirit rules another." They govern their own kind as well as us.[1980] and the spirits of the meaner sort had commonly such offices, as we make horse-keepers, neat-heards, & the basest of us, overseers of our cattle; and that we can no more apprehend their natures and functions, then an horse a mans. They knew all things, but might not reveal them to men; & ruled and domineered over us, as we do over our horses; the best Kings amongst us, & the most generous spirits, were not comparable to the basest of them.	The lower spirits commonly held the sorts of posts that we assign to grooms, cowherds and the lowest among us, setting them over our livestock. We can no more understand their natures and duties than a horse can understand a human's. They knew everything but were not allowed to reveal it to people, and ruled and exercised authority over us as we do over our horses. Our best kings and noblest minds could not compare with the lowest of them.

[1977] Burton. Margin b: "Sic Hesiodus de Nymphis vivere dicit. 10 ætates phœnicum vel 9.7.20". Thus Hesiod says nymphs live ten phoenix lifetimes, or "9.7.20". The figures correspond to 9,720 in Plutarch, On the Failure of Oracles 11–12 (415c–416c). Cleombrotus obtains years by taking a "generation" as one year; Demetrius disputes this. Burton compresses a contested calculation, not an agreed lifespan.

[1978] Burton. Asterisked margin: "Custodes hominum & provinciarum, &c tanto meliores hominibus, quanto hi brutis animantibus." Guardians of people and provinces, etc., as much superior to humans as humans are to brute animals.

[1979] Burton. Asterisked margin: "Præsides, Pastores, Gubernatores hominum, et illi animalium." Presidents, shepherds and rulers of humans, as humans are of animals.

[1980] Editor. "Juments" are beasts of burden; "neat" means cattle. Plato, Critias 109b–c, compares gods tending human communities to shepherds tending flocks. Burton's much fuller hierarchy comes through his later authorities, not solely from that passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sometimes they did instruct men, & communicate their skil, reward & cherish, and sometimes again terrifie & punish, to keep them in awe, as they thought fit. Nihil magis cupientes (saith Lipsius, Phil. Stoicorum:) quam adorationem hominum.	Sometimes they taught people and shared their knowledge, rewarded and fostered them; at other times they frightened and punished them to keep them in awe, as they saw fit: "Desiring nothing more," says Lipsius in his Philosophy of the Stoics, "than human worship."
The same Author Cardan in his Hyperchen, out of the doctrine of Stoicks, wil have some of these Genii (for so he cals them) to be [1981]desirous of mens company, very affable, and familiar with them, as Dogs are; others again to abhor as serpents, and care not for them. The same belike Tritemius cals Ignios & sublunares, qui nunquam demergunt ad inferiora, aut vix ullum habent in terris commercium:	The same author, Cardano, drawing on Stoic teaching in his Hyperchen, maintains that some of these genii, as he calls them, desire human company and are very friendly and familiar with people, like dogs; others, like serpents, loathe people and want nothing to do with them. Presumably these are the same beings Trithemius calls "fiery and sublunary spirits, who never descend to the lower regions, or have scarcely any dealings on earth."[1982]
[1983]Generally they far excel men in worth, as a man the meanest worme; though some of them are inferior to those of their own rank in worth, as the black guard in a Princes Court, and to men again, as some degenerate, base, rational creatures, are excelled of brute beasts.	Generally they far surpass humans in worth, as a human surpasses the humblest worm. Yet some are inferior in worth to others of their own kind, like the lowest servants in a prince's court, and even inferior to humans, just as some degraded, base creatures endowed with reason are surpassed by beasts.[1984]

[1981] Burton. Margin a: "Natura familiares ut canes hominibus, multi aversantur & abhorrent." Naturally familiar with humans, like dogs; many turn away from them and loathe them.

[1982] Editor. Genii is the plural of genius, a guardian or attendant spirit. Sublunary means below the moon. Burton's wording about "fiery and sublunary" beings that never descend is compressed; its attribution to Trithemius remains to be collated. The original title Hyperchen reappears below as Hipperchen.

[1983] Burton. Margin b: "Ab homine plus distant quam homo ab ignobilissimo verme, & tamen quidam ex his ab hominibus superantur ut homines à feris, &c." They are farther removed from humans than a human is from the lowest worm; yet some are surpassed by humans, as humans are by wild beasts, etc.

[1984] Editor. "Black guard" here refers to the lowest court or household servants, traditionally associated with kitchen and menial work; it is not the name of a military formation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That they are mortal, besides these testimonies of Cardan, Martianus, &c. many other Divines & Philosophers hold, post prolixum tempus moriuntur omnes; The [1985]Platonists and some Rabbines, Porphyrius and Plutarch, as appeares by that relation of Thamus: [1986]The great God Pan is dead: Apollo Pythius ceased; & so the rest.	Besides these statements by Cardano, Martianus and others, many other theologians and philosophers hold that spirits are mortal: “After a long time they all die.” So do the Platonists and some rabbis, Porphyry and Plutarch, as appears from the story of Thamus: “The great god Pan is dead.” Pythian Apollo fell silent, and so did the others.[1987]
S. Hierome in the life of Paul the Ermite tels a story how one of them appeared to S. Antony in the wildernesse, and told him as much. [1988]Paracelsus of our late Writers stifly maintaines that they are mortal, live and die, as other creatures do. Zozimus l.2. farther adds, that religion and policy dies and alters with them.	In his Life of Paul the Hermit, Saint Jerome tells how one of them appeared to Saint Antony in the wilderness and told him the same.[1989] Among our recent writers, Paracelsus firmly maintains that they are mortal, living and dying as other creatures do. Zosimus, in book 2, further adds that religion and government die and change with them.

[1985] Burton. Margin c: “Cibo & potu uti & venere cum hominibus, ac tandem mori, Cicogna.1.part.lib.2.c.3.” They take food and drink, have sexual intercourse with humans, and finally die. Cicogna, part 1, book 2, chapter 3. Attached to “Platonists” by the printed anchor.

[1986] Burton. Margin d: “Plutarch. de defect. oraculorum.” Plutarch, On the Failure of Oracles.

[1987] Editor. Plutarch, On the Failure of Oracles 17, tells of Thamus, a ship’s pilot instructed by a mysterious voice to announce Pan’s death. Burton joins this report to the cessation of oracles. “Apollo Pythius” is Apollo of Delphi.

[1988] Burton. Margin e: “Lib. de Zilphis & Pigmeis.” Book on Sylphs and Pygmies.

[1989] Editor. Jerome, Life of Paul 8, describes a horned, goat-footed creature that calls itself mortal and says pagans worship its kind as fauns, satyrs and incubi. Burton uses the story as evidence within the historical debate about spirits’ mortality.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 42–43 The [1990]Gentiles gods, he saith, were expelled by Constantine, & together with them, Imperii Romani majestas, & fortuna interiit, & profligata est: The Fortune & Majesty of the Roman Empire, decayed and vanished, as that Heathen in [1991]Minutius formerly bragged when the Jews were overcome by the Romans, the Jews god was likewise captivated by that of Rome, and Rabsakeh to the Israelites, no god should deliver them out of the hands of the Assyrians.	The pagan gods, he says, were driven out by Constantine, and with them "the majesty and good fortune of the Roman Empire perished and were overthrown": the empire's fortune and majesty declined and disappeared. Similarly, the pagan in Minucius had earlier boasted that, when the Romans conquered the Jews, the Jews' god was also taken captive by Rome's; and Rabshakeh told the Israelites that no god would deliver them from the Assyrians' hands.[1992]
Source page 43 But these paradoxes of their power, corporeity, mortality, taking of shapes, transposing bodies, and carnal copulations, are sufficiently confuted by Zanch. c.10. l.4. Pererius in his comment, and Tostatus questions on the 6. of Gen. Th. Aquin. S. Austin, Wierus, Th. Erastus, Delrio, Tom.2. l.2. quæst.29. Sebastian Michaelis, cap.2. de spiritibus, D. Reinolds Lect.47.	But these paradoxical claims about their power, bodily existence, mortality, assumption of shapes, transportation of bodies and sexual intercourse are adequately refuted by Zanchi, book 4, chapter 10; Pererius in his commentary and Tostatus in his questions on Genesis 6; Thomas Aquinas; Saint Augustine; Weyer; Thomas Erastus; Del Rio, volume 2, book 2, question 29; Sébastien Michaëlis, chapter 2 of On Spirits; and Dr Rainolds, lecture 47.

[1990] Burton. Margin f: "Dii gentium à Constantino profligati sunt, &c." The gods of the pagans were driven out by Constantine, etc.

[1991] Burton. Asterisked margin: "Octavian. dial. Judæorum deum fuisse Romanorum numinibus una cum gente captivum." The dialogue Octavius: the Jews' god had been taken captive by Rome's deities together with his people. "Octavian." is the printed abbreviation.

[1992] Editor. "Policy" means political order or government. Minucius Felix's Octavius stages a debate between a pagan and a Christian; Burton identifies this as the pagan speaker's boast. Rabshakeh's challenge is narrated in 2 Kings 18–19 and Isaiah 36–37.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They may deceive the eyes of men, yet not take true bodies, or make a reall metamorphosis: but as Cicogna proves at large, they are [1993]Illusoriæ & præstigiatrices transformationes, omnif. mag. lib.4. cap.4. meere illusions and cozenings, like that tale of Pasetis obulus in Suidas, or that of Autolicus, Mercuries son that dwelt in Pernasus, who got so much treasure by cozenage and stealth.	They may deceive people's eyes, but cannot assume real bodies or bring about an actual transformation. As Cicogna demonstrates at length in book 4, chapter 4 of his All Kinds of Magic, these are "illusory and deceptive transformations," mere illusions and tricks, like the story in the Suda of Pases' coin, or that of Autolycus, Mercury's son, who lived on Parnassus and acquired so much wealth by fraud and theft.[1994]
His father Mercury, because he could leave him no wealth, taught him many fine tricks to get meanes, [1995]for he could drive away mens cattel, and if any pursued him, turne them into what shapes he would, and so did mightily inrich himself, hoc astu maximam prædam est adsequuntus. This no doubt is as true as the rest;	Since his father Mercury could leave him no money, he taught him many clever tricks for making a living: he could drive people's cattle away and, if anyone pursued him, change them into whatever shapes he pleased. In this way he made himself very rich: "By this trick he acquired an enormous haul." No doubt this is as true as the rest;

[1993] Burton. Margin o (as printed): "Omnia spiritibus plena, & ex eorum concordia & discordia omnes boni & mali effectus promanant, omnia humana reguntur: paradoxa veterum de quo Cicogna. omnif. mag. l.2.c.3." Everything is full of spirits; from their agreement and disagreement all good and evil effects flow, and all human affairs are governed: paradoxes of the ancients, discussed by Cicogna, All Kinds of Magic 2.3.

[1994] Editor. The Suda, formerly often treated as the work of "Suidas," is a Byzantine encyclopaedia. The Suda, entry pi 752, describes Pases' half-obol as a coin that could return to him after he spent it; Burton calls it an obol. Autolycus is the mythic thief and son of Hermes, here called by the Roman name Mercury. Burton treats these as tales of deception.

[1995] Burton. Asterisked margin: "Oves quas abacturus erat in quascunque formas vertebat Pausanias, Hyginus." He changed the sheep he was about to drive off into whatever shapes he pleased. Pausanias; Hyginus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
yet thus much in general, Thomas, Durand, and others grant that they have understanding far beyond men, can probably conjecture, and [1996]foretel many things; they can cause and cure most diseases, deceive our senses, they have excellent skil in all Arts and Sciences: and that the most illiterate Divel is quovis homine scientior, as [1997]Cicogna maintaines out of others.	yet Thomas Aquinas, Durand and others generally concede this much: spirits have understanding far beyond ours; they can make likely conjectures and foretell many things; they can cause and cure most diseases and deceive our senses; they are highly skilled in every art and science; and even the least learned devil is "more knowledgeable than any human," as Cicogna maintains on the authority of others.
They know the vertues of Hearbs, Plants, stones, Minerals, &c. of all Creatures, Birds, Beasts, the four Elements, Stars, Planets, can aptly apply and make use of them as they see good, perceiving the causes of all Meteors, and the like:	They know the properties of herbs, plants, stones, minerals and so on, of every creature, birds, beasts, the four elements, stars and planets. They can apply and use them skilfully as they see fit, understanding the causes of all atmospheric phenomena and the like.[1998]
Dant se coloribus (as [1999]Austin hath it) accommodant se figuris, adhærent sonis, subjiciunt se odoribus, infundunt se saporibus, omnes sensus etiam ipsam intelligentiam dæmones fallunt, they deceive all our senses, even our understanding it self at once.	"They lend themselves to colours," as Augustine puts it, "adapt themselves to shapes, attach themselves to sounds, place themselves beneath smells, pour themselves into flavours: demons deceive all the senses, even the understanding itself." They deceive all our senses, even our understanding, at the same time.

[1996] Burton. Margin h: "Austin in l.2. de Gen. ad literam cap.17. Partim quia subtilioris sensus acumine, partim scientia calidiore vigent et experientia propter magnam longitudinem vitæ, partim ab Angelis discunt, &c." Augustine, Literal Commentary on Genesis 2.17: partly because they excel in keenness of perception, partly through more penetrating knowledge and experience from their great longevity, partly because they learn from angels, etc. The scan reads "calidiore"; "more penetrating" gives the contextual sense without silently replacing the Latin.

[1997] Burton. Margin i: "Lib.3. omnif. mag. cap.3." All Kinds of Magic, book 3, chapter 3.

[1998] Editor. "Virtues" means effective properties or powers. "Meteors" in this period includes a broad range of phenomena in the atmosphere, not only the shooting stars covered by that word today. The four elements are earth, water, air and fire.

[1999] Burton. Asterisked margin: "L.18. quæst." The abbreviated citation is retained; its exact work and division require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2000]They can produce miraculous alterations in the ayre, and most wonderful effects, conquer armies, give victories, help, further, hurt, crosse and alter humane attempts and projects (Dei permissu) as they see good themselves. [2001]When Charls the great intended to make a channel betwixt the Rhene and Danubius, look what his workmen did in the day, these spirits flung down in the night, Ut conatu Rex desisteret, pervicere. Such feats can they do.	They can bring about miraculous changes in the air and extraordinary effects, defeat armies, grant victories, help, advance, harm, frustrate and alter human undertakings and plans—with God's permission—as they themselves see fit. When Charlemagne proposed to dig a canal between the Rhine and the Danube, these spirits knocked down at night whatever his workers had done during the day: "They succeeded in making the king abandon the attempt." Such feats they can perform.[2002]
But that which Bodine l.4. Theat. nat. thinks, (following Tyrius belike and the Platonists) they can tell the secrets of a mans heart, aut cogitationes hominum, is most false; his reasons are weak, and sufficiently confuted by Zanch. lib.4. cap.9. Hierom. lib.2. com. in Mat. ad cap.15. Athanasius quæst.27. ad Antiochum Principem, and others.	But Bodin's belief, in book 4 of his Theatre of Nature—following Maximus of Tyre and the Platonists, presumably—that they can discover the secrets of a person's heart or people's thoughts is utterly false. His arguments are weak and adequately refuted by Zanchi, book 4, chapter 9; Jerome, book 2 of his commentary on Matthew, at chapter 15; the Questions to Prince Antiochus attributed to Athanasius, question 27; and others.

[2000] Burton. Margin k: "Quum tanti sit et tam profunda spirituum scientia, mirum non est tot tantasq; res visu admirabiles ab ipsis patrari, & quidem rerum naturalium ope quas multo melius intelligunt, multoq; peritius suis locis et temporibus applicare norunt, quam homo, Cicogna". Since spirits' knowledge is so great and deep, it is no wonder that they accomplish so many great and astonishing things, using natural things which they understand far better and know how to apply at the right times and places far more skilfully than a human. Cicogna.

[2001] Burton. Asterisked margin, placed low on the page: "Aventinus, quicquid interdiu exhauriebatur, noctu explebatur. Inde pavefacti curatores, &c." Aventinus: whatever was dug out during the day was filled in at night; hence the supervisors were terrified, etc.

[2002] Editor. The historical project was the Fossa Carolina, begun in 793 to connect the Rhine and Danube drainage systems. The Royal Frankish Annals describe wet ground and rain causing excavated earth to slip back at night. Burton gives Aventinus' supernatural account; archaeological research confirms the canal works, not the spirits.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2003]As for those orders of good & bad Devils, which the Platonists hold, is altogether erroneous, and those Ethnicks boni and mali Genii, are to be exploded: these heathen writers agree not in this point among themselves, as Dandinus notes, An sint [2004]mali non conveniunt,	As for the orders of good and evil demons maintained by the Platonists, the idea is entirely mistaken, and the pagans' good and evil genii must be rejected. These pagan writers do not agree among themselves on this point, as Dandini observes: "They do not agree on whether any are evil."[2005]
some wil have all spirits good or bad to us by a mistake, as if an Oxe or Horse could discourse, he would say the Butcher was his enemy because he killed him, the Grasier his friend because he fed him; an Hunter preserves and yet kils his game, and is hated neverthelesse of his game; nec piscatorem piscis amare potest, &c.	Some hold that we mistakenly call spirits good or evil in relation to ourselves. If an ox or horse could reason, it would say that the butcher was its enemy because he killed it, and the grazier its friend because he fed it. A hunter preserves his game yet also kills it, and his game hates him nonetheless; "nor can a fish love the fisherman," and so on.
Source page 43–44 But Iamblicus, Psellus, Plutarch, & most Platonists acknowledg bad, & ab eorum maleficiis cavendum, for they are enemies of man-kinde, & this Plato learned in Ægypt, that they quarelled with Jupiter, and were driven by him [2006]down to hell.	But Iamblichus, Psellus, Plutarch and most Platonists acknowledge evil spirits, "and that we must guard against their harmful acts," since they are enemies of humankind. Plato learned in Egypt, they say, that these spirits quarrelled with Jupiter and were driven down by him into hell.

[2003] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Orders." Attached here by context.

[2004] Burton. Asterisked margin continuing on page 44: "In lib.2. de Anima text.29 Homerus discriminatim omnes spiritus dæmones vocat." On the Soul, book 2, passage 29: Homer calls all spirits daemons. The printed "discriminatim" means "with distinction"; its force here is unclear and the underlying passage needs checking.

[2005] Editor. "Devil" is unstable in this discussion: Burton uses it both for Christian evil spirits and for the broader classical daemon. "Orders" are ranks or classes. "Exploded" means rejected or discredited, not physically blown apart.

[2006] Burton. Asterisked margin: "A Jove ad Inferos pulsi, &c." Driven by Jupiter down to the underworld, etc. No clear body asterisk survives here; attached by context.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 44 That which [2007]Apuleius, Xenophon, and Plato contend of Socrates Dæmonium, is most absurd: That which Plotinus of his, that he had likewise Deum pro Dæmonio: and that which Porphiry concludes, of them all in general, if they be neglected in their sacrifice they are angry, nay more, as Cardan in his Hipperchen will, they feed on mens souls,	What Apuleius, Xenophon and Plato maintain about Socrates' divine spirit is utterly absurd; so is the claim about Plotinus' spirit, that he likewise had "a god in place of a daemon"; and so is Porphyry's conclusion about them all in general, that they grow angry if their sacrifices are neglected. Cardano goes further in his Hipperchen, maintaining that they feed on human souls.[2008]
Elementa sunt plantis elementum, animalibus plantæ, hominibus animalia, erunt & homines aliis, non autem diis, nimis enim remota est eorum natura à nostra, quapropter dæmonibus: and so belike that we have so many battels fought in all ages, countries, is to make them a feast, and their sole delight:	"The elements sustain plants, plants sustain animals, and animals sustain humans; humans, too, will sustain other beings—not gods, since their nature is too far removed from ours, but therefore demons." So, presumably, the reason for all the battles fought in every age and country is to provide them with a feast, their sole delight.
but to return to that I said before, if displeased they fret and chafe, (for they feed belike on the souls of beasts, as we do on their bodies) and send many plagues amongst us; but if pleased, then they do much good; is as vain as the rest and confuted by Austin l.9. c.8. de Civ. Dei. Euseb. l.4. præpar. Evang. c.6. & others.	But to return to my earlier point: the claim that, when displeased, they fume and rage—for they presumably feed on the souls of beasts as we do on their bodies—and send many plagues among us, but do much good when pleased, is as empty as the rest. It is refuted by Augustine, City of God, book 9, chapter 8; Eusebius, Preparation for the Gospel, book 4, chapter 6; and others.[2009]

[2007] Burton. Margin h: "De Deo Socratis adest mihi divina sorte Dæmonium quoddam à prima pueritia me sequutum, sæpe dissuadet, impellit nonnunquam instar ovis, Plato." On the God of Socrates. By divine dispensation a certain spiritual sign is with me, following me from earliest childhood; it often dissuades and sometimes urges, like a voice. Plato. The scan reads "instar ovis," literally "like a sheep"; "like a voice" interprets this as a likely misprint for "instar vocis." The abbreviated heading and attribution are retained.

[2008] Editor. Socrates' daimonion is a divine sign or warning. Burton's margin says it sometimes urges action; Plato, Apology 31d, says it restrains him and never urges him on. The Plotinus episode is Porphyry, Life of Plotinus 10: an Egyptian priest at Rome evokes his guardian in the temple of Isis, and a god appears in place of a daemon. Burton abbreviates the story.

[2009] Editor. Augustine, City of God 9.8, criticizes demons' passions and moral standing, without describing them eating human souls. Eusebius, Preparation for the Gospel 4.22, quotes Porphyry on spirits nourished by sacrificial vapours from blood and flesh. Burton's printed reference 4.6 introduces Porphyry as a witness but lacks that passage. These texts do not establish his further soul-feeding narrative, whose Cardano reference remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yet thus much I finde, that our School-men & other [2010]Divines make nine kinds of bad Spirits, as Dionysius hath done of Angels, In the first rank are those false gods of the Gentiles, which were adored heretofore in several Idols, and gave Oracles at Delphos, and elsewhere; whose Prince is Beelzebub.	Yet I find that our scholastics and other theologians distinguish nine kinds of evil spirits, as Dionysius did of angels. In the first rank are the pagans' false gods, formerly worshipped in various idols, which gave oracles at Delphi and elsewhere. Their prince is Beelzebub.[2011]
The second rank is of Lyars, and Æquivocators, as Apollo, Pythius, and the like. The third are those vessels of anger, inventers of all mischief, as that Theutus in Plato; Esay cals them [2012]vessels of fury; their Prince is Belial. The fourth are malicious revenging Devils; & their Prince is Asmodeus.	The second rank consists of liars and equivocators, such as Pythian Apollo and the like. The third comprises those vessels of wrath, the inventors of every evil, such as Theuth in Plato; Isaiah calls them vessels of fury. Their prince is Belial. The fourth consists of malicious, vengeful devils, and their prince is Asmodeus.[2013]
The fift kinde are cozeners, such as belong to Magicians and Witches; their Prince is Satan. The sixt are those aerial devils that [2014]corrupt the aire and cause plagues, thunders, fires, &c; spoken of in the Apocalyps, and Paul to the Ephesians names them the Princes of the ayre; Meresin is their Prince.	The fifth kind are deceivers, those associated with magicians and witches; their prince is Satan. The sixth are the spirits of the air that corrupt it and cause plagues, thunder, fires and so on. They are mentioned in Revelation, and Paul, writing to the Ephesians, calls them the princes of the air. Meresin is their prince.

[2010] Burton. Margin i: "Agrippa lib.3 de occul.ph.c.18. Zanch. Pictorius, Pererius Cicogna. l.3.cap.1." Agrippa, Occult Philosophy 3.18; Zanchi; Pictorius; Pererius; Cicogna 3.1.

[2011] Editor. Dionysius here is the Christian author conventionally called Pseudo-Dionysius, associated with nine orders of angels. Burton reports a corresponding scheme of evil spirits from a mixed body of later authorities. The list is a historical taxonomy, not a single biblical classification.

[2012] Burton. Margin k: "Vasa iræ. c.13." Vessels of wrath, chapter 13; the body names Isaiah.

[2013] Editor. Apollo and Pythius designate the same god, so the modern text removes the misleading comma. Theuth is the Egyptian inventor in Plato's Phaedrus; the characterization as an inventor of evil belongs to this later demonological scheme. "Vessels of fury" points to Isaiah 13:5, an image Burton applies to demons.

[2014] Burton. Margin l: "Quibus datum est nocere terræ & mari, &c." To whom power was given to harm the earth and sea, etc. Compare Revelation 7:2.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The seventh is a destroyer, Captain of the Furies, causing warres, tumults, combustions, uproares, mentioned in the Apocalyps and called Abaddon. The eight is that accusing or calumniating Devil, whom the Greeks call διάβολος, that drives men to despaire. The ninth are those tempters in several kinds, and their Prince is Mammon.	The seventh is a destroyer, captain of the Furies, causing wars, riots, upheavals and disturbances, mentioned in Revelation and called Abaddon. The eighth is the accusing or slandering devil whom the Greeks call diabolos, who drives people to despair. The ninth consists of tempters of various kinds, and their prince is Mammon.[2015]
Psellus makes six kinds, yet none above the Moon; Wierus in his Pseudomonarchia Dæmonis, out of an old book, makes many more divisions and subordinations, with their several names, numbers, offices, &c. but Gazæus cited by [2016]Lipsius will have all places full of Angels, Spirits, and Devils, above and beneath the Moon, ætherial and aerial, which Austin cites out of Varro l.7. de Civ. Dei c.6.	Psellus distinguishes six kinds, though none above the moon. Weyer, in his False Monarchy of Demons, drawing on an old book, makes many more divisions and subordinate ranks, with their respective names, numbers, offices and so forth. But Gazaeus, quoted by Lipsius, maintains that every region is full of angels, spirits and devils, above and below the moon, in the ether and in the air, as Augustine reports from Varro in book 7, chapter 6 of the City of God.
The cœlestial Devils above, and aerial beneath, or as some will, gods above, Semidei or half gods beneath, Lares, Heroes, Genii, which clime higher, if they lived well, as the Stoicks held; but grovel on the ground as [2017]they were baser in their lives, nearer to the earth: and are Manes, Lemures, Lamiæ, &c.	Celestial spirits are above and aerial spirits below; or, as some have it, gods above and demigods below—lares, heroes and genii—which rise higher if they have lived well, as the Stoics held, but grovel on the ground, nearer the earth, if their lives were more base: these are manes, lemures, lamiae and so on.[2018]

[2015] Editor. Abaddon appears in Revelation 9:11 as the name of the angel of the abyss. Greek diabolos means slanderer or accuser. Mammon personifies wealth. Burton's list shifts between classes of beings and their individual rulers; that shift is retained.

[2016] Burton. Margin m: "Physiol. Stoicorum è Senec. lib.1.cap.28." Physiology of the Stoics, from Seneca, book 1, chapter 28.

[2017] Burton. Margin n: "Usque ad lunam animas esse æthereas vocarique heroas, lares, genios." As far as the moon the souls are ethereal, and are called heroes, lares and genii.

[2018] Editor. These names overlap rather than form a stable ancient classification: lares and genii are guardian spirits; heroes are exalted or deceased figures; manes and lemures are spirits of the dead; lamiae are frightening, often devouring female beings. Burton combines traditions and interpreters.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2019]They will have no place void but all full of Spirits, Devils, or some other inhabitants: Plenum Cœlum, aer, aqua, terra, & omnia sub terra, saith [2020]Gazæus; though Anthony Rusca in his book de Inferno, lib.5. cap.7. would confine them to the middle Region, yet they wil have them every where. Not so much as an haire breadth empty in heaven, earth, or waters, above or under the earth.	They insist that no place is empty, but that everywhere is filled with spirits, devils or other inhabitants: "Heaven, air, water, earth and everything beneath the earth are full," says Gazaeus. Although Antonio Rusca, in book 5, chapter 7 of On Hell, would confine them to the middle region of the air, these writers will have them everywhere: not so much as a hair's breadth left empty in heaven, earth or water, above or below the earth.
Source page 44–45 The air is not so full of flies in summer, as it is at all times of invisible devils: this [2021]Paracelsus stiffely maintaines, and that they have every one their several Chaos, others will have infinite worlds, and each world his peculiar Spirits, Gods, Angels, and Devils to governe and punish it.	The air is less full of flies in summer than it is of invisible devils at all times. Paracelsus firmly maintains this, and says that each has its own particular elemental realm. Others will have infinitely many worlds, each with its own spirits, gods, angels and devils to govern and punish it.[2022]
Source page 45 Singula [2023]nonnulli credunt quoque sydera posse Dici orbes, terramque appellant sydus opacum, Cui minimus divum præsit ——	Some believe that every star may itself Be called a world; they call the earth a darkened star Over which the least of the gods presides—

[2019] Burton. Margin o: "Mart. Capella." Martianus Capella.

[2020] Burton. Margin p: "Nihil vacuum ab his ubi vel capillum in aëre vel aqua jaceas." No place is empty of them, wherever you might cast even a hair into air or water.

[2021] Burton. Margin q: "Lib. de Zilp." Book on Sylphs.

[2022] Editor. "Their several Chaos" means their respective elemental environments or native realms, not personal disorder. The translation follows that contextual sense; a full comparison with Paracelsus' elemental beings remains pending.

[2023] Burton. Asterisked margin: "Palingenius." The lines occur in Marcellus Palingenius, Zodiacus vitae, book 7, Libra (1719 edition, p. 158). The inspected page confirms the quotation, with sidera and sidus for Burton's sydera and sydus; Burton stops partway through the third verse. The continuation assigns the lowest god dominion below the clouds, then admits that humans lack certainty about these divine arrangements.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2024]Gregorius Tholosanus makes seven kindes of ætherial Spirits or Angels, according to the number of the seven Planets; Saturnine, Jovial, Martial, of which Cardan discourseth lib.20. de subtil. he cals them substantias primas, Olympicos dæmones Tritemius, qui præsunt Zodiaco, &c. and will have them to be good Angels above, Devils beneath the Moon,	Grégoire of Toulouse distinguishes seven kinds of ethereal spirits or angels, corresponding to the seven planets: Saturnian, Jovian, Martian and so on. Cardano discusses them in book 20 of On Subtlety, calling them "primary substances"; Trithemius calls them "Olympian spirits, who preside over the zodiac," and so forth, and holds that they are good angels above the moon and devils below it.[2025]
their several names and offices he there sets down, and which Dionysius of Angels, will have several spirits for several countries, men, offices, &c. which live about them, & as so many assisting powers cause their operations, will have in a word, innumerable, as many of them as there be Stars in the Skies.	He sets out their respective names and offices there, and, like Dionysius on angels, assigns different spirits to different countries, people, offices and so forth. They live around them and, as so many assisting powers, bring about their activities. In a word, he makes their number countless, as many as the stars in the sky.[2026]
[2027]Marcilius Ficinus seems to second this opinion, out of Plato, or from himself, I know not, (still ruling their inferiours, as they do those under them again, all subordinate, and the nearest to the earth rule us, whom we subdivide into good and bad angels, call Gods or Devils, as they help or hurt us, and so adore, love or hate)	Marsilio Ficino seems to support this view—whether from Plato or on his own authority, I do not know. These spirits continually rule their inferiors, who in turn rule those beneath them, all in a chain of subordination. Those nearest the earth rule us; we divide them into good and evil angels, call them gods or devils according to whether they help or harm us, and accordingly worship, love or hate them.

[2024] Burton. Margin r: "Lib.7.cap.34 et 5. Syntax. art. mirab." Syntaxis of the Wondrous Art, book 7, chapters 34 and 5, as provisionally read. The last figure in the first chapter number is ink-obscured; the citation has not been silently repaired.

[2025] Editor. The seven planets of traditional astronomy are the Moon, Mercury, Venus, the Sun, Mars, Jupiter and Saturn. "Jovial" and "Martial" here mean belonging to Jupiter and Mars, not cheerful and warlike.

[2026] Editor. The source reads "and which Dionysius of Angels," an awkward construction. "Like Dionysius on angels" supplies the comparison required by the sentence. The original wording remains in the left column; the chain of pronouns and attributions is compressed.

[2027] Burton. Asterisked margin: "Comment in dial. Plat. de amore cap.5. Ut sphæra quælibet super nos, ita præstantiores habent habitatores suæ sphæræ consortes, ut habet nostra." Commentary on Plato's dialogue on love, chapter 5: as each sphere lies above us, so it has more excellent inhabitants belonging to that sphere, as ours has its own.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but it is most likely from Plato, for he relying wholly on Socrates, quem mori potius quam mentiri voluisse scribit, out of Socrates authority alone, made nine kindes of them: which opinion belike Socrates took from Pythagoras, & he from Trismegistus, he from Zoroaster, first God, secondly Ideæ, 3. Intelligences, 4. Arch-Angels, 5. Angels, 6. Devils, 7. Heroes, 8. Principalities, 9. Princes:	Most likely, though, he takes it from Plato, who, relying entirely on Socrates—"who, he writes, preferred death to falsehood"—distinguished nine kinds on Socrates' authority alone. Presumably Socrates took this view from Pythagoras, Pythagoras from Trismegistus, and Trismegistus from Zoroaster: first God; second, Ideas; third, Intelligences; fourth, Archangels; fifth, Angels; sixth, Demons; seventh, Heroes; eighth, Principalities; ninth, Princes.[2028]
of which some were absolutely good, as Gods, some bad, some indifferent inter deos & homines, as heroes and dæmones, which ruled men, and were called genii, or as [2029]Proclus and Iamblicus will, the middle betwixt God and men, Principalities and Princes, which commanded & swayed Kings & countries; and had several places in the Spheares perhaps, for as every spheare is higher, so hath it more excellent inhabitants:	Some of these were absolutely good, such as gods; some evil; some neither, "between gods and humans," such as heroes and daemons, which governed people and were called genii. Or, as Proclus and Iamblichus maintain, they are intermediaries between God and humans: Principalities and Princes that commanded and ruled kings and countries. Perhaps they had different places in the spheres, since the higher each sphere stands, the more excellent its inhabitants are.

[2028] Editor. "Ideas" are intelligible forms and "Intelligences" are incorporeal minds. Burton presents a supposed chain of ancient teaching; it should not be taken as an established history of transmission or as a direct ninefold list extracted from Plato.

[2029] Burton. Asterisked margin: "Lib. de Amicâ et dæmone med. inter deos & homines, dico ad nos & nostra æqualiter ad deos ferunt.]" Book on friendship and the daemon intermediate between gods and humans: "I say, they convey [divine things] to us and equally our things to the gods." The title is provisionally read as "Amicâ"; "dico" and the closing bracket are retained; the supplied object in translation is contextual. Citation unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
which belike is that Galilæus à Galileo and Kepler aimes at in his nuncio Syderio, when he will have [2030]Saturnine and Jovial inhabitants: And which Tycho Brahe doth in some sort touch or insinuate in one of his Epistles: but these things [2031]Zanchius justly explodes, cap.3. lib.4. P. Martyr. in 4. Sam.28.	Presumably this is what Galileo Galilei and Kepler are aiming at in the Starry Messenger, with its inhabitants of Saturn and Jupiter; and what Tycho Brahe touches on or hints at in one of his letters. But Zanchi rightly rejects these ideas, in book 4, chapter 3; so does Peter Martyr in his commentary on Samuel 28.[2032]

[2030] Burton. Margin t: “Saturninas & Joviales accolas.” Inhabitants of Saturn and Jupiter.

[2031] Burton. Asterisked margin: “In loca detrusi sunt infra cœlestes orbes in aërem scilicet & infra ubi Judicio generali reservantur.” They have been thrust into places below the celestial spheres, namely into the air and below, where they are held for the Last Judgement.

[2032] Editor. Galileo’s Sidereus nuncius (Starry Messenger, 1610) and Kepler’s Dissertatio cum nuncio sidereo (Conversation with the Starry Messenger, 1610) are distinct works. Burton compresses them into one phrase. Kepler does speculate about inhabitants of Jupiter and Saturn; that does not by itself identify them as Burton’s spirits. The printed “in 4. Sam.28” is corrupt or compressed; “Samuel 28” is a cautious reading, likely referring to 1 Samuel 28.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So that according to these men the number of ætherial Spirits must needs be infinite: For if that be true that some of our Mathematicians say: if a stone could fall from the starry heaven, or eight Spear, and should passe every houre an hundred miles, it would be 65 yeares, or more, before it would come to ground,	Thus, according to these men, the number of ethereal spirits must necessarily be infinite. For if what some of our mathematicians say is true—if a stone could fall from the starry heaven, or eighth sphere, travelling a hundred miles every hour, it would take sixty-five years or more to reach the ground, by reason of the great distance of heaven from earth, which contains as some say 170 Millions 803 miles, besides those other heavens, whether they be Crystalline or watery which Maginus addes, which peradventure holds as much more, how many such spirits may it containe? And yet for all this [2033]Thomas, Albertus, and most hold that there be far more Angels then Devils.	because of the great distance between heaven and earth, which some put at 170,000,803 miles —then, besides the further heavens, whether crystalline or watery, which Magini adds and which perhaps contain as much space again, how many such spirits could it hold?[2034] Yet for all this, Thomas Aquinas, Albertus and most others hold that there are far more angels than devils.
[2035]But be they more or lesse, Quod supra nos nihil ad nos. Howsoever as Martianus foolishly supposeth, Ætherii Dæmones non curant res humanas, they care not for us, do not attend our actions, or looke for us, those ætheriall spirits have other worlds to raigne in belike or businesse to follow.	But whether there are more or fewer, “What is above us is no concern of ours.” However, as Martianus foolishly supposes, “Ethereal spirits do not concern themselves with human affairs”: they do not care about us, attend to our actions or look after us. Presumably those ethereal spirits have other worlds to reign over or business to attend to.

[2033] Burton. Margin u: “q.36. art.9.” The figures are printed in this order. The relevant passage is Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae I, question 63, article 9, which argues that more angels remained faithful than sinned.

[2034] Editor. “Eight Spear” means eighth sphere, the sphere of the fixed stars in the traditional model. The figures are retained, but they do not agree: at 100 miles per hour, 65 years of 365 days gives 56,940,000 miles, not 170,000,803. The crystalline and watery heavens are further cosmological spheres, not modern astronomical distances.

[2035] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: “Sublunary devils, and their kindes.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 45–46 We are onely now to speak in brief of these sublunary Spirits or Devils: for the rest, our Divines determine that the Devil had no power over stars, or heavens; [2036]Carminibus cœlo possunt deducere lunam. &c. Those are poetical fictions, and that they can [2037]sistere aquam fluviis, & vertere sydera retro, &c. as Canidia in Horace, 'tis all false.	For now we need speak only briefly of the spirits or devils beneath the moon. As for the rest, our theologians conclude that the devil has no power over the stars or heavens. "With spells they can draw the moon down from heaven," and so on: these are poetic fictions. That they can "halt the water in rivers and turn the stars backwards," as Canidia does in Horace—it is all false.[2038]
Source page 46 [2039]They are confined until the day of judgement, to this sublunary world, and can work no farther then the four Elements, and as God permits them. Wherefore of these sublunary Devils, though others divide them otherwise according to their several places and offices, Psellus makes six kinds, fiery, aerial, terrestrial, Watery, and subterranean Devils, besides those Fairies, Satyrs, Nymphs, &c.	They are confined to this world beneath the moon until Judgement Day, and can act only within the four elements and as God permits. Therefore, although others classify these sublunary devils differently according to their respective places and offices, Psellus distinguishes six kinds: fiery, aerial, terrestrial, watery and subterranean devils, besides fairies, satyrs, nymphs and so forth.[2040]
Fiery spirits or devils are such as commonly work by blazing Stars, Firedrakes, or Ignes fatui; which lead men often in flumina, aut præcipitia, saith Bodine, lib.2. Theat. naturæ fol.221.	Fiery spirits or devils commonly act through comets, fiery dragons or will-o'-the-wisps, which often lead people "into rivers or over precipices," says Bodin, book 2 of his Theatre of Nature, folio 221.[2041]

[2036] Burton. Margin x: "Virg.8.Eg." Virgil, Eclogue 8.

[2037] Burton. Margin y: "Æn.4." Virgil, Aeneid 4.

[2038] Editor. The first quotation adapts Virgil, Eclogue 8.69, whose received Latin begins Carmina vel caelo. The second is Aeneid 4.489. Canidia is a witch in Horace; Burton moves from the two Virgil quotations to her as another poetic example. The verse fragments remain inline as they are in the source.

[2039] Burton. Margin z: "Austin: hoc dixi, ne quis existimet habitare ibi mala dæmonia ubi Solem et Lunam & Stellas Deus ordinavit, et alibi nemo arbitraretur Dæmonem cœlis habitare cum Angelis suis unde lapsum credimus. Idem Zanch. l.4.c.3. de Angel. malis. Pererius in Gen. cap.6. lib.8. in ver.2." Augustine: I said this lest anyone suppose evil demons live where God placed the sun, moon and stars; and elsewhere, let no one suppose the devil lives with his angels in the heavens from which we believe he fell. Likewise Zanchi, On Evil Angels 4.3; Pererius on Genesis 6, book 8, on verse 2.

[2040] Editor. Burton says six kinds but explicitly names five elemental or spatial groups before adding fairies, satyrs and nymphs. The modern text preserves that uneven enumeration; it does not silently add a sixth group.

[2041] Editor. "Blazing stars" are comets. "Firedrakes" are fiery dragon-like appearances or streaks in the sky. Ignes fatui, literally "foolish fires," are will-o'-the-wisps. Burton groups different reported lights under one supernatural category.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Quos inquit arcere si volunt viatores, clara voce Deum appellare aut pronam facie terram contingente adorare oportet, & hoc Amuletum majoribus nostris acceptum ferre debemus, &c. likewise they counterfeit Suns and Moons, Stars oftentimes, and sit on Ship Masts: In navigiorum summitatibus visuntur; and are called Dioscuri,	"If travellers wish to ward them off," he says, "they must call loudly upon God or worship lying face down with their face touching the ground; and for this protective charm we must give our ancestors credit," and so on. They also counterfeit suns, moons and often stars, and settle on ships' masts: "They are seen at the tops of ships," and are called the Dioscuri.[2042]
as Eusebius l. contra Philosophos c.48. informeth us, out of the authority of Zenophanes; or little Clouds, ad motum nescio quem volantes; which never appear, saith Cardan, but they signify some mischief or other to come unto men, though some again will have them to pretend good, and victory to that side they come towards in Sea fights,	So Eusebius informs us in chapter 48 of his book Against the Philosophers, on Xenophanes' authority; or they are little clouds, "flying with some movement I cannot explain." They never appear, says Cardano, without signifying that some harm or other is coming to people; though others hold that they portend good, and victory for the side towards which they move in sea battles.
St. Elmes fires they commonly call them, & they do likely appear after a Sea storme; [2043]Radzivilius the Polonian Duke cals this apparition, Sancti Germani sydus; and saith moreover that he saw the same after in a storme, as he was sayling, 1582, from Alexandria to Rhodes.	They are commonly called Saint Elmo's fires and usually appear after a storm at sea.[2044] The Polish duke Radziwiłł calls this apparition "Saint Germanus' star," and adds that he afterwards saw the same thing in a storm while sailing from Alexandria to Rhodes in 1582.[2045]

[2042] Editor. The Dioscuri are Castor and Pollux, twin protectors of sailors. The sentence offers competing descriptions of mast lights, spirits or little clouds. The precise Eusebius title and chapter reference require collation.

[2043] Burton. Asterisked margin: "Perigrin. Hierosol." Pilgrimage to Jerusalem; the travel account cited for Radziwiłł.

[2044] Editor. Saint Elmo's fire is now understood as a luminous electrical discharge in strong electric fields around pointed objects, including ships' masts. This explanation concerns that phenomenon; it does not make all the lights in Burton's catalogue one and the same.

[2045] Editor. The cited traveller is Mikołaj Krzysztof Radziwiłł. The year 1582 and the awkward "after in a storme" are retained from this printing; the voyage date and exact wording need collation against his pilgrimage account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Our Stories are full of such apparations in all kinds. Some think they keep their residence in that Hecla, a mountain in Island, Ætna in Sicely, Lypera, Vesuvius, &c. These Devils were worshiped heretofore by that superstitious Πυρομαντεία, and the like.	Our histories are full of such apparitions of every kind. Some think these spirits have their homes in Hekla, a mountain in Iceland, in Etna in Sicily, Lipari, Vesuvius and so on. These devils were formerly worshipped through that superstitious practice of divination by fire, and the like.[2046]
Aerial Spirits or Devils, are such as keep quarter most part in the aire,[2047] cause many tempests, thunder, and lightnings, tear Oakes, fire Steeples, Houses, strike men and beasts, make it raine stones, as in Livies time, wool, Frogs, &c.	Spirits or devils of the air are those that lodge chiefly in the air. They cause many tempests, thunder and lightning, split oaks, set steeples and houses on fire, strike people and animals, and make it rain stones—as in Livy's time—wool, frogs, and so on.
Counterfeit Armies in the air, strange noyses, swords, &c. as at Vienna, before the coming of the Turks, and many times in Rome, as Scheretzius l. de spect. c. 1. part. 1. Lavater de spect. part. 1. c. 17. Julius obsequens, an old Roman, in his book of prodigies, ab urb. cond. 505. Machiavel[2048] hath illustrated by many examples, and Josephus in his book de bello Judaico, before the destruction of Jerusalem.	They produce phantom armies in the air, strange noises, swords, and the like—as at Vienna before the Turks came, and often at Rome. Scheretzius, On Apparitions, part 1, chapter 1; Lavater, On Apparitions, part 1, chapter 17; Julius Obsequens, an ancient Roman, in his Book of Prodigies, under the year 505 from Rome's foundation; and Machiavelli supply many examples. So does Josephus in The Jewish War, describing the time before Jerusalem's destruction.[2049]

[2046] Editor. "Island" means Iceland. Hekla, Etna and Vesuvius are volcanoes; Lipari is in the volcanic Aeolian island group. Greek pyromanteia means divination by fire. Burton describes it as worship of these spirits; divination and worship are not synonyms.

[2047] Burton. Margin a: "Domus diruunt, muros dejiciunt, immiscent se turbinibus & procellis, & pulverem instar columnæ evehunt. Cicogna l. 5. c. 5." They demolish houses, throw down walls, mingle with whirlwinds and storms, and raise dust like a column. Cicogna, book 5, chapter 5.

[2048] Burton. Margin b: "Quæst. in Liv." Questions on Livy; the abbreviated reference is retained.

[2049] Editor. Burton assembles prodigy reports from different periods and authors. "Ab urbe condita" dates from the founding of Rome. The crowded list and its numeral 505 are retained; the precise Julius Obsequens reference remains to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All which Guil. Postellus in his first book c. 7. de orbis concordia useth as an effectual argument (as indeed it is) to perswade them that will not believe there be Spirits or Devils. They cause whirlewindes on a sudden, and tempestuous stormes; which though our Meteorologists generally refer to natural causes, yet I am of Bodines minde Theat. Nat. l. 2. they are more often caused by those aerial devils, in their several quarters;	Guillaume Postel uses all this in On the Harmony of the World, book 1, chapter 7, as an effective argument—as indeed it is—to convince those who refuse to believe that spirits or devils exist. These beings cause sudden whirlwinds and violent storms. Though our writers on atmospheric phenomena generally attribute these to natural causes, I agree with Bodin, Theatre of Nature, book 2, that they are more often caused by these devils of the air in their respective regions.[2050]
for Tempestatibus se ingerunt, saith Rich. Argentine;[2051] as when a desperate man makes away himself, which by hanging or drowning they frequently do, as Kornmannus observes, de mirac. mort. part. 7. c. 76. tripudium agentes, dancing & rejoycing at the death of a sinner.	For "they thrust themselves into storms," says Richard Argentine—for instance, when a desperate person takes his own life, as people often do by hanging or drowning. Then, as Kornmann observes in Wonders of the Dead, part 7, chapter 76, the devils "dance in triumph," dancing and rejoicing at a sinner's death.[2052]
Source page 46–47 These can corrupt the Aire, and cause plagues, sickness, stormes, shipwracks, fires, inundations. At Mons Draconis in Italy, there is a most memorable example in Jovianus Pontanus:[2053] And nothing so familiar (if we may believe those relations of Saxo Grammaticus, Olaus Magnus, Damianus A. Goes) as for Witches & Sorcerers, in Lapland, Lituania, and all over Scandia, to sell windes to Marriners, and cause tempests, which Marcus Paulus the Venetian relates likewise of the Tartars.	They can corrupt the air and cause plagues, sickness, storms, shipwrecks, fires and floods. Jovianus Pontanus records a most memorable example at Mons Draconis in Italy. And nothing is more common—if we may believe the accounts of Saxo Grammaticus, Olaus Magnus and Damião de Góis—than for witches and sorcerers in Lapland, Lithuania and throughout Scandinavia to sell winds to mariners and raise storms. Marco Polo the Venetian tells the same story of the Tartars.

[2050] Editor. "Meteorologists" here means writers on atmospheric phenomena within natural philosophy. Burton explicitly chooses a demonic explanation over the natural explanations he reports; this is his historical argument.

[2051] Burton. Starred margin: "De præstigiis dæmonum. c. 16. Convelli culmina videmus, prosterni sata, &c." On the Deceptions of Demons, chapter 16: we see roofs torn away and crops laid flat, and so on.

[2052] Editor. The grammar moves awkwardly from the desperate person's death to the devils' dancing. The modern rendering makes those subjects explicit, retaining Burton's theological description of the death.

[2053] Burton. Margin c: "De bello Neopolitano, lib. 5." On the Neapolitan War, book 5.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 47 These kinde of Devils are much delighted in Sacrifices,[2054] (saith Porphyry) held all the world in awe, and had several names, Idols, Sacrifices, in Rome, Greece, Ægypt, and at this day tyrannize over, and deceive those Ethnicks, and Indians, being adored and worshipped for gods.[2055]	This kind of devil takes great delight in sacrifices, says Porphyry. They held the whole world in awe and had different names, idols and sacrifices in Rome, Greece and Egypt. They still tyrannize over and deceive those pagans and Indians, who adore and worship them as gods.[2056]
For the Gentiles gods were Devils (as Trismegistus[2057] confesseth in his Asclepius) and he himself could make them come to their Images by Magick spels: and are now as much respected by our Papists, (saith Pictorius)[2058] under the name of Saints.	For the gods of the pagans were devils—as Trismegistus admits in his Asclepius—and he himself could summon them into their images with magic spells. "And now," says Pictorius, "they are just as highly honoured by our papists under the name of saints."[2059]
These are they which Cardan thinks, desire so much carnal copulation with Witches, (Incubi and Succubi) transform bodies, and are so very cold, if they be touched; and that serve Magicians. His father had one of them (as he is not ashamed to relate[2060]) an aerial devil bound to him for twenty and eight years.	These are the beings that Cardan believes so greatly desire sexual intercourse with witches—the incubi and succubi—that transform bodies, feel so very cold to the touch, and serve magicians.[2061] His father had one of them, a devil of the air, bound to him for twenty-eight years, as Cardan is not ashamed to relate.

[2054] Burton. Margin d: "Suffitibus gaudent. Idem Just. Mart. Apol. pro Christianis." They delight in incense offerings. Justin Martyr says the same in his Apology for the Christians.

[2055] Burton. Margin e: "In Dei imitationem, saith Eusebius." In imitation of God, says Eusebius.

[2056] Editor. "Ethnicks" means non-Christians or pagans. "Indians" is geographically imprecise here. Burton is grouping diverse non-Christian religions within his demonological argument, not identifying a single people or a shared self-description.

[2057] Burton. Starred margin: "Dii gentium Dæmonia &c. ego in eorum statuas pellexi." The gods of the nations are demons, etc.; I drew them into their statues. Burton combines the language of a Christian denunciation with the Hermetic account of animated statues; see the Editor's note.

[2058] Burton. Margin f: "Et nunc sub divorum nomine coluntur à Pontificiis." And now they are worshipped by the adherents of the pope under the name of saints.

[2059] Editor. The Hermetic Asclepius describes spirits drawn into statues; Augustine discusses and attacks this account in City of God 8.23–24. Burton presents it through Christian polemic. "Papists" is the hostile Protestant term for Roman Catholics; the claim equating saints with demons remains Pictorius's quoted accusation.

[2060] Burton. Margin g: "Lib. 11. de rerum ver." Book 11; the title is printed in this abbreviated form, apparently referring to Cardan's De rerum varietate.

[2061] Editor. In demonological writing an incubus is a spirit imagined as taking the male sexual role, a succubus the female role. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. These are reported beliefs, not descriptions endorsed by this edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As Agrippa's dog had a devil tyed to his coller; some think that Paracelsus (or else Erastus belies him) had one confined to his sword pummel; others wear them in Rings, &c.	Just as Agrippa's dog had a devil tied to its collar, some believe that Paracelsus had one shut inside the pommel of his sword—unless Erastus is slandering him. Others wear them in rings, and so on.[2062]
Jannes and Jambres did many things of old by their help; Simon Magus, Cinops, Apollonius Tianeus, Jamblicus, and Tritemius of late, that shewed Maximilian the Emperor his wife, after she was dead: Et verrucam in collo ejus (saith Godolman[2063]) so much as the Wart in her neck. Delrio lib. 2. hath divers examples of their feats: Cicogna lib. 3. cap. 3. and Wierus in his book de præstig. dæmonum. Boissardus de magis & veneficis.	Long ago Jannes and Jambres accomplished much with their help; so did Simon Magus, Cinops, Apollonius of Tyana and Iamblichus. More recently, Trithemius showed Emperor Maximilian his wife after her death, "even the wart on her neck," says Godelmann.[2064] Delrio, book 2, gives various examples of their feats, as do Cicogna, book 3, chapter 3; Weyer in On the Deceptions of Demons; and Boissard in On Magicians and Poisoners.
Water-devils are those Naiades or water Nymphs which have been heretofore conversant about waters and rivers. The water (as Paracelsus thinks) is their Chaos, wherein they live; some call them Fairies, and say that Habundia is their Queen;	Water devils are those Naiads or water nymphs that in former times frequented waters and rivers. Water, Paracelsus thinks, is their Chaos—the realm in which they live.[2065] Some call them fairies and say that Habundia is their queen.

[2062] Editor. "Belies" means falsely accuses or slanders; the pommel is the knob at the end of a sword's hilt. Burton leaves the truth of Erastus's allegation expressly open.

[2063] Burton. Margin h: "Lib. 3. cap. 3. de magis & veneficis. &c. Nereides." Book 3, chapter 3, On Magicians and Poisoners, etc. Nereids. The final word is clearly printed beside the transition to water nymphs, but has no distinct body anchor; its placement is retained here.

[2064] Editor. Jannes and Jambres are the opponents of Moses named in 2 Timothy 3:8; Simon the magician appears in Acts 8. Burton then gathers figures from ancient and later magical traditions. His "of late" marks the comparatively recent Trithemius story.

[2065] Editor. "Chaos" here denotes an elemental home or medium, not disorder. Burton's water nymphs, fairies and succubi overlap despite his attempt to classify spirits by their habitats.

Original text 1651	Modern English
these cause Inundations, many times shipwracks, and deceive men divers wayes, as Succuba, or otherwise, appearing most part (saith Tritemius) in womens shapes. Paracelsus[2066] hath several stories of them that have lived and been married to mortal men, and so continued for certain years with them, and after upon some dislike, have forsaken them.	They cause floods and often shipwrecks, and deceive men in various ways, as succubi or otherwise, appearing chiefly in women's shapes, says Trithemius. Paracelsus has several stories of them living with mortal men as their wives for a number of years, then abandoning them after some displeasure.
Such a one as Ægeria, with whom Numa was so familiar, Diana, Ceres, &c. Olaus Magnus[2067] hath a long narration of one Hotherus a King of Sweden, that having lost his company, as he was hunting one day, met with these water Nymphs or Fairies, and was feasted by them;	Such beings were Egeria, with whom Numa was so intimate, Diana, Ceres, and others.[2068] Olaus Magnus gives a long account of a certain Hotherus, a king of Sweden, who lost his companions while hunting one day, met these water nymphs or fairies, and was entertained at a feast by them.
and Hector Boethius, or Mackbeth, and Banco, two Scottish Lords, that as they were wandring in the Woods, had their Fortunes told them by three strange women. To these heretofore they did use to Sacrifice, by that ὑδρομαντεία, or divination by waters.	And Hector Boece tells of Macbeth and Banquo, two Scottish lords, who had their fortunes told by three strange women as they wandered in the woods.[2069] People formerly used to sacrifice to these beings in the practice of hydromancy, or divination by water.

[2066] Burton. Margin i: "Lib. de Zilphis." Book on sylphs.

[2067] Burton. Margin k: "Lib. 3." Book 3.

[2068] Editor. Egeria was the divine counsellor and companion of Numa, Rome's legendary second king. Burton places her beside Diana and Ceres as analogues within this category, without maintaining their distinct classical identities.

[2069] Editor. The source prints "and Hector Boethius, or Mackbeth". The modern reading supplies "and Hector Boece tells of Macbeth", an editorial repair of the syntax. Compare Boece, History of the Scots 12.9: Macbeth and Banquo encounter three female figures while walking through fields and woods. This confirms the episode, not the cause of Burton's awkward wording.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Terrestrial devils, are those Lares, Genii, Faunes, Satyrs,[2070] Wood-nymphs,[2071] Foliots, Fairies, Robin Goodfellowes, Trulli, &c. which as they are most conversant with men, so they do them most harme.	Earthly devils are the Lares, genii, fauns, satyrs, wood nymphs, foliots, fairies, Robin Goodfellows, trulli, and so on. As they associate most closely with human beings, so they do them the most harm.[2072]
Some think it was they alone that kept the Heathen people in awe of old, and had so many Idols and Temples erected to them. Of this range was Dagon amongst the Philistines, Bell amongst the Babylonians, Astartes amongst the Sydonians, Baal amongst the Samaritans, Isis and Osyres amongst the Ægyptians, &c.	Some think that these alone held the heathen peoples in awe in ancient times, and had so many idols and temples erected in their honour. To this class belonged Dagon among the Philistines, Bel among the Babylonians, Astarte among the Sidonians, Baal among the Samaritans, and Isis and Osiris among the Egyptians, and others.
Source page 47–48 some put our Fairies[2073] into this rank, which have been in former times adored with much superstition, with sweeping their houses, and setting of a pail of cleane water, good victuals, and the like, and then they should not be pinched, but finde money in their shoos, and be fortunate in their enterprizes.	Some put our fairies in this class. In former times people worshipped them with great superstition, sweeping their houses and setting out a pail of clean water, good food, and the like. Then, they believed, they would escape being pinched, find money in their shoes, and enjoy good fortune in their undertakings.

[2070] Burton. Margin l: “Pro salute hominum excubare se simulant, sed in eorum perniciem omnia moliuntur. Aust.” They pretend to keep watch for humanity’s safety, but direct all their efforts towards its destruction. Augustine.

[2071] Burton. Starred margin: “Dryades, Oriades, Hamadryades.” Dryads, oreads and hamadryads: nymphs of woods, mountains and individual trees respectively.

[2072] Editor. Lares are household or local guardian spirits; genii are tutelary spirits. “Foliots”, “Trulli” and “Robin Goodfellows” are names for familiar or goblin-like beings. Burton combines Roman religious terms with regional folklore.

[2073] Burton. Starred margin: “Elvas Olaus vocat lib. 3.” Olaus calls them Elvae, book 3.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 48 These are they that dance on Heathes and Greens, as Lavater[2074] thinks with Tritemius, and as Olaus Magnus[2075] addes, leave that green circle, which we commonly finde in plain fields, which others hold to proceed from a Meteor falling, or some accidental rankness of the ground, so Nature sports her self, they are sometimes seen by old women and children.	These are the beings that dance on heaths and village greens, as Lavater and Trithemius think. Olaus Magnus adds that they leave those green circles we commonly find in open fields. Others attribute the circles to a falling meteor or some chance patch of exceptional fertility in the soil: nature amusing herself in this way. Old women and children sometimes see these beings.[2076]
Hierom. Pauli. in his description to the City of Bercino in Spain, relates how they have been familiarly seen near that town, about fountains and hils; Nonnumquam (saith Tritemius) in sua latibula montium simpliciores homines ducant, stupenda mirantibus ostentes miracula, nolarum sonitus, spectacula, &c. Giraldus Cambrensis gives instance in a Monk of Wales that was so deluded.	Jeroni Pau, in his description of the Spanish city of Barcelona, relates how they have often been seen near the town, around springs and hills. "Sometimes," says Trithemius, "they lead simple people into their mountain hiding places, showing the astonished visitors marvellous wonders, ringing bells, spectacles, and the like." Gerald of Wales gives the example of a Welsh monk who was deceived in this way.[2077]

[2074] Burton. Margin m: "Part 1. cap. 19." Part 1, chapter 19.

[2075] Burton. Margin n: "Lib. 3. cap. 11. Elvarum choreas Olaus lib. 3. vocat saltum adeo profundè in terras imprimunt, ut locus insigni deinceps virore orbicularis sit, et gramen pereat." Book 3, chapter 11. Olaus, book 3, calls them dances of elves; they stamp their dance so deeply into the earth that the place afterwards forms a circle of remarkable greenness, and the grass dies. The apparently conflicting effects are both retained.

[2076] Editor. "Rankness" means luxuriant growth or fertility. The passage offers competing explanations of the circles rather than a single settled account. The marginal statement that the grass dies sits awkwardly beside its description of conspicuous greenness.

[2077] Editor. Bercino is Barcelona; Hieronymus Pauli is Jeroni Pau. "Ostentes" is retained, with the intended sense "showing". A probable parallel for the Welsh story is Gerald, Journey through Wales 1.8: Elidorus enters an underground country as a boy and later becomes a priest. Burton calls his figure a monk; the identification remains qualified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Paracelsus[2078] reckons up many places in Germany, where they do usually walk in little coates some two foot long. A bigger kinde there is of them, called with us Hobgoblins, & Robin Goodfellowes, that would in those superstitious times, grinde corne for a mess of milk, cut wood, or do any maner of drudgery work. They would mend old Irons in those Æolian Iles of Lypara, in former ages, and have been often seen and heard.	Paracelsus lists many places in Germany where they commonly walk about in little coats some two feet long. There is a larger kind, which we call hobgoblins and Robin Goodfellows. In those superstitious times they would grind grain for a bowl of milk, cut wood, or do any sort of menial work. In former ages they would repair old ironwork in the Aeolian Islands of Lipari, and they have often been seen and heard.
Tholosanus[2079] cals them Trullos and Getulos, and saith, that in his dayes they were common in many places of France. Dithmarus Bleskenius in his description of Island, reports for a certainty, that almost in every family they have yet some such familiar spirits; & Fælix Malleolus in his book de crudel. dæmon. affirmes as much, that these Trolli, or Telchines, are very common in Norwey, and seen to do drudgery work;[2080] to draw water, saith Wierus lib. 1. cap. 32. dress meat, or any such thing.	Tholosanus calls them Trulli and Getuli, and says that in his day they were common in many parts of France. Dithmar Blefken, in his description of Iceland, reports as a certainty that almost every household still has some such familiar spirit. Felix Malleolus, in On the Cruelty of Demons, similarly affirms that these trolls, or Telchines, are very common in Norway and are seen doing menial work: drawing water, says Weyer, book 1, chapter 32, preparing food, and similar tasks.[2081]

[2078] Burton. Margin o: “Lib. de Zilph. et Pigmæis. Olaus lib. 3.” Book on sylphs and pygmies; Olaus, book 3.

[2079] Burton. Margin p: “Lib. 7. cap. 14. qui et in famulitio viris et fæminis inserviunt, conclavia scopis purgant, patinas mundant, ligna portant, equos curant, &c.” Book 7, chapter 14: they also serve men and women as domestics, sweep rooms, clean dishes, carry wood, tend horses, and so on.

[2080] Burton. Margin q: “Ad ministeria utuntur.” They are employed for services.

[2081] Editor. “Dress meat” means prepare food, not specifically butcher or cook flesh. Familiar spirits here are beings attached to a household or individual. The many local names are retained without forcing them into a uniform taxonomy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Another sort of these there are, which frequent forlorn houses,[2082] which the Italians call Foliots, most part innoxious, Cardan[2083] holds; They will make strange noyses in the night, howle sometimes pittifully, and then laugh again, cause great flame and sudden lights, fling stones, rattle chaines, shave men, open doores, and shut them, fling down platters, stooles, chests, sometime appear in the likeness of Hares, Crowes, black Dogs, &c.	There is another sort that frequents abandoned houses, which the Italians call foliots. Cardan considers them mostly harmless. They make strange noises at night, sometimes howl pitifully and then laugh, produce great flames and sudden lights, throw stones, rattle chains, shave people, open and shut doors, knock down platters, stools and chests, and sometimes appear as hares, crows, black dogs, and the like.[2084]
of which reade Pet. Thyræus[2085] the Jesuite in his Tract, de locis infestis, part 1. & cap. 4. who will have them to be Devils, or the souls of damned men that seek revenge, or else souls out of Purgatory that seek ease; for such examples peruse Sigismundus Scheretzius[2086] lib. de spectris, part. 1. c. 1. which he saith he took out of Luther most part; there be many instances.	Read about them in the Jesuit Peter Thyraeus's treatise On Haunted Places, part 1, chapter 4. He holds that they are devils, the souls of the damned seeking revenge, or souls from purgatory seeking relief. For examples, consult Sigismund Scherertz's On Apparitions, part 1, chapter 1, which he says he drew chiefly from Luther. There are many instances.[2087]

[2082] Burton. Margin r: "Where treasure is hid (as some think) or some murder, or such like villany, committed."

[2083] Burton. Starred margin: "Lib. 16. de rerum varietat." On the Variety of Things, book 16.

[2084] Editor. "Shave men" is retained literally. Pliny's Letters 7.27.12–14 includes stories of mysterious nocturnal hair cutting, showing that the action belongs to this repertoire of apparition stories.

[2085] Burton. Margin s: "Vel spiritus sunt hujusmodi damnatorum, vel è purgatorio, vel ipsi dæmones, c. 4." Spirits of this kind are either of the damned, or from purgatory, or demons themselves. Chapter 4.

[2086] Burton. Margin t: "Quidam lemures domesticis instrumentis noctu ludunt: patinas, ollas, cantharas, et alia vasa dejiciunt, et quidam voces emittunt, ejulant, risum emittunt, &c. ut canes nigri, feles, variis formis, &c." Some ghosts play with household utensils at night, throwing down dishes, pots, jugs and other vessels; some make noises, wail, laugh, and so on, in various forms, such as black dogs and cats.

[2087] Editor. Purgatory is the state of purification after death in Catholic teaching. Burton preserves the Jesuit Thyraeus's alternatives beside examples attributed to Luther; his anthology draws on authors divided by confessional disputes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Plinius secundus[2088] remembers such a house at Athens, which Athenodorus the Philosopher hired, which no man durst inhabit for fear of Devils. Austin de Civ. Dei. lib. 22. cap. 8. relates as much of Hesperius the Tribunes house at Zubeda near their City of Hippos, vexed with evil spirits, to his great hinderance, Cum afflictione animalium & servorum suorum.	Pliny the Younger recalls such a house at Athens, which the philosopher Athenodorus rented, although no one dared live in it for fear of devils.[2089] Augustine, City of God, book 22, chapter 8, tells a similar story of the tribune Hesperius's house at Zubeda, near their city of Hippo. It was troubled by evil spirits, to his great loss, "with suffering inflicted on his animals and servants."[2090]
Many such instances are to be read in Niderius Formicar. lib. 5. cap. 12. 3. &c. Whether I may call these Zim and Ophim, which Isay cap. 13. 21. speakes of, I make a doubt. See more of these in the said Scheretz. lib. 1. de spect. cap. 4. he is full of examples.	Many such instances can be read in Nider's Ant-Hill, book 5, chapters 12, 3, and elsewhere. I am uncertain whether I may call these the Zim and Ophim of which Isaiah 13:21 speaks.[2091] For more, see the same Scherertz, On Apparitions, book 1, chapter 4; he is full of examples.

[2088] Burton. Margin u: "Epist. lib. 7." Letters, book 7.

[2089] Editor. Pliny the Younger, Letters 7.27.5–11. Athenodorus rents the haunted house and follows its chained apparition to a spot where human remains are found; proper burial ends the haunting. Burton gives only the opening of the story.

[2090] Editor. City of God 22.8 describes Hesperius as belonging to a tribunitian family and calls his estate Zubedi, in the Fussalian district. Burton simplifies this to "the tribune" and places it near Hippo. His forms are retained.

[2091] Editor. Burton retains the names "Zim and Ophim" while doubting their identification as these spirits. They refer to the disputed creatures in Isaiah's description of ruined Babylon. The spellings are not silently replaced; their textual derivation remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 48–49 These kinde of Devils many times appear to men, and affright them out of their wits, sometimes walking at noone day,[2092] sometimes at nights, counterfeiting dead mens Ghosts, as that of Caligula, which (saith Suetonius) was seen to walk in Lavinia's garden, where his body was buried, spirits haunted, and the house where he dyed, Nulla nox sine terrore transacta, donec incendio consumpta;[2093] every night this happened, there was no quietness, til the house was burned.	This kind of devil often appears to people and frightens them out of their wits, sometimes walking at midday and sometimes at night, impersonating the ghosts of the dead. Such was Caligula's ghost, which Suetonius says was seen walking in Lavinia's garden. Spirits haunted the place where his body was buried, and in the house where he died "no night passed without terror until it was consumed by fire." This happened every night: there was no peace until the house burned down.[2094]
Source page 49 About Hecla in Island Ghosts commonly walk, animas mortuorum simulantes, saith Joh. Anan. lib. 3. de nat. dæm. Olaus lib. 2. cap. 2. Natal. Tallopid. lib. de apparit. spir. Kornmannus de mirac. mort. part. 1. cap. 44. such sights are frequently seen circa Sepulchra & Monasteria, saith Lavat. lib. 1. cap. 19. in Monasteries, and about Church-yards, loca paludinosa, ampla ædificia, solitaria, & cæde hominum notata, &c.	Ghosts commonly walk around Hekla in Iceland, "impersonating the souls of the dead," says Johannes Ananias, On the Nature of Demons, book 3; so too Olaus, book 2, chapter 2; Natalis Taillepied, On Apparitions of Spirits; and Kornmann, Wonders of the Dead, part 1, chapter 44. Such sights are frequently seen "around graves and monasteries," says Lavater, book 1, chapter 19—in monasteries and around churchyards, "marshy places, large isolated buildings, and places marked by murder," and so on.

[2092] Burton. Margin x: "Meridionales Dæmones Cicogna cals them or Alastores l. 3. cap. 9." Cicogna calls them midday demons, or avenging spirits, book 3, chapter 9.

[2093] Burton. Margin y: "Sueton. c. 69. in Caligula." Suetonius, Caligula, chapter 69. The relevant chapter is 59; see the Editor's note.

[2094] Editor. The relevant passage is Suetonius, Caligula 59, not the marginal 69. Suetonius names the Lamian gardens, not "Lavinia's garden", and distinguishes the haunting at the burial site from that in the house of death. Burton's wording remains in both columns; these differences are recorded here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thyræus adds, ubi gravius peccatum est commissum, impii, pauperum oppressores & nequiter insignes habitant. These spirits often foretell mens deaths, by several signes, as knocking, groanings, &c. though[2095] Rich. Argentine c. 18. de præstigiis dæmonum, will ascribe these predictions to good Angels, out of the authority of Ficinus and others;	Thyraeus adds, "where some grave sin has been committed, where the impious, oppressors of the poor, and people notorious for wickedness live." These spirits often foretell people's deaths by various signs—knocking, groaning, and the like—though Richard Argentine, On the Deceptions of Demons, chapter 18, attributes these predictions to good angels, on the authority of Ficino and others.
prodigia in obitu principum sæpius contingunt, &c. as in the Laterane Church in Rome,[2096] the Popes deaths are foretold by Sylvesters tombe. Near Rupes nova in Finland, in the Kingdome of Sweden, there is a Lake, in which, before the Governor of the Castle dies, a spectrum, in the habit of Arion with his Harp appears, and makes excellent musick,	"Portents occur more frequently at the deaths of princes," and so on. Thus, in the Lateran church in Rome, popes' deaths are foretold by Sylvester's tomb. Near Rupes Nova in Finland, in the kingdom of Sweden, there is a lake where, before the governor of the castle dies, an apparition dressed as Arion with his harp appears and plays exquisite music.[2097]
like those blocks in Cheshire, which (they say) presage death to the Master of the family; or that Oake[2098] in Lanthadran Park in Cornwall, which foreshewes as much. Many families in Europe are so put in minde of their last, by such predictions, and many men are forewarned (if we may believe Paracelsus) by familiar spirits, in divers shapes, as Cocks, Crowes, Owles, which often hover about sick mens chambers,	The same is true of those logs in Cheshire which, they say, foretell the death of the head of the family, or that oak in Lanthadran Park in Cornwall which foretells the same.[2099] Many European families are reminded of their end by such predictions, and many people are forewarned—if we may believe Paracelsus—by familiar spirits in various forms, such as cocks, crows and owls, which often hover around sick people's rooms.

[2095] Burton. Starred margin: "Strozzius Cicogna lib. 3. mag. cap. 5." Strozzi Cicogna, Magic, book 3, chapter 5.

[2096] Burton. Starred margin: "Idem, c. 18." The same, chapter 18. The antecedent is not entirely clear between the adjoining citations.

[2097] Editor. Arion is the legendary musician associated with a lyre; Burton calls the instrument a harp. "Spectrum" here means an apparition. The exact identification of Rupes Nova and the source of this death omen remain for collation.

[2098] Burton. Margin z: "M. Cary. Survey of Cornwall. lib. 2. folio 140." Mr Carew's Survey of Cornwall, book 2, folio 140.

[2099] Editor. "Blocks" means logs. Carew, Survey of Cornwall, book 2, pp. 140–141, names Lanhadron: its oak normally has white-speckled leaves, but uniformly coloured leaves reportedly foretell the owner's son's death. Carew explicitly leaves that hearsay to others to confirm. Burton compresses the account and prints "Lanthadran". The Cheshire omen remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
vel quia morientium fœditatem sentiunt, as Baracellus[2100] conjectures, & ideo super tectum infirmorum crocitant, because they smell a Coarse; or for that (as Bernardinus de Bustis[2101] thinketh) God permits the Devil to appear in the forme of Crows, and such like creatures, to scare such as live wickedly here on earth.	It may be "because they smell the foulness of the dying," as Baracellus conjectures, "and therefore caw above the roofs of the sick"—because they smell a corpse. Or it may be because, as Bernardino de' Busti thinks, God allows the Devil to appear in the form of crows and similar creatures to frighten those who live wickedly here on earth.
A little before Tullies death (saith Plutarch) the Crowes made a mighty noyse about him, tumultuose perstrepentes, they pulled the pillow from under his head. Rob. Gaguinus hist. Franc. lib. 8. telleth such another wonderfull story at the death of Johannes de Monteforti a French Lord, Anno 1345. tanta Corvorum multitudo ædibus morientis insedit, quantam esse in Gallia nemo judicasset.	Shortly before Cicero's death, says Plutarch, crows made a tremendous noise around him, "clamouring tumultuously"; they pulled the pillow from beneath his head.[2102] Robert Gaguin's History of France, book 8, tells another such marvellous story about the death in 1345 of Jean de Montfort, a French lord: "So great a multitude of crows settled on the dying man's house that no one would have believed there were that many in all France."
Such prodigies are very frequent in Authors. See more of these in the said Lavater, Thyræus de locis infestis, part. 3. cap. 58. Pictorius, Delrio, Cicogna, lib. 3. cap. 9. Negromancers take upon them, to raise and lay them at their pleasures:	Such portents are very common in the authors. See further instances in the same Lavater; Thyraeus, On Haunted Places, part 3, chapter 58; Pictorius; Delrio; and Cicogna, book 3, chapter 9. Necromancers claim to summon and dismiss these spirits at will.

[2100] Burton. Margin a: "Horto Geniali folio 137." In Hortus genialis, folio 137.

[2101] Burton. Margin b: "Part. 1. c. 19. Abducunt eos à rectâ via, & viam iter facientibus intercludunt." Part 1, chapter 19: they lead people off the right road and block travellers' way. Its body anchor stands at Bernardino de' Busti, while the content fits Lavater's wandering spirits below. Direct collation with Lavater remains pending.

[2102] Editor. Tully is Marcus Tullius Cicero. Plutarch, Life of Cicero 47.8–10, describes crows around the ship and house; at 47.9 one pulls at the garment covering Cicero's face. Burton says they pulled out his pillow. That difference is preserved rather than silently corrected.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And so likewise those which Mizaldus cals Ambulones, that walk about midnight on great Heaths and desart places, which (saith Lavater[2103]) draw men out of the way, and lead them all night a by-way, or quite bar them of their way; these have several names in several places; we commonly call them Pucks.	They claim the same power over those whom Mizaldus calls Ambulones, “wanderers,” that walk about at midnight on vast heaths and in deserted places. These, says Lavater, draw people off the road and lead them along a wrong path all night, or entirely block their way. They have different names in different places; we commonly call them Pucks.[2104]
In the Desarts of Lop in Asia, such illusions of walking spirits are often perceived, as you may read in M. Paulus the Venetian his travels; If one lose his company by chance, these devils will call him by his name, and counterfeit voyces of his companions to seduce him.	In the deserts of Lop in Asia, such apparitions of wandering spirits are often perceived, as you may read in the travels of Marco Polo the Venetian. If someone happens to lose his companions, these devils call him by name and imitate his companions’ voices to lead him astray.[2105]
Hieronym. Pauli in his book of the hils of Spaine, relates of a great mount[2106] in Cantabria, where such spectrums are to be seen: Lavater and Cicogna have variety of examples of spirits & walking devils in this kinde.	Jeroni Pau, in his book on the mountains of Spain, tells of a great mountain in Cantabria where such apparitions may be seen. Lavater and Cicogna give a variety of examples of spirits and wandering devils of this kind.

[2103] Burton. Margin c: “Lib. 1. cap. 44. Dæmonum cernuntur & audiuntur ibi frequentes illusiones, unde viatoribus cavendum ne se dissocient, aut à tergo maneant, voces enim fingunt sociorum, ut à recto itinere abducant. &c.” Book 1, chapter 44: illusions of demons are often seen and heard there; travellers should not separate or lag behind, since voices imitate companions to lure them astray. The anchor stands at Lavater, but the content fits the following Marco Polo account of Lop. This is not resolved by simply exchanging b and c.

[2104] Editor. To “lay” a spirit is to quiet or dismiss it. “Negromancers” is an older form of necromancers. Puck here is a type of mischievous spirit, not necessarily one uniquely named individual.

[2105] Editor. Marco Polo’s account of the desert of Lop describes spirits imitating companions and calling travellers by name when they become separated. It appears in chapter 39 of the Yule–Cordier volume consulted; Burton’s marginal chapter 44 belongs to a different or unverified numbering.

[2106] Burton. Margin d: “Mons sterilis & nivosus, ubi intempesta nocte umbræ apparent.” A barren, snowy mountain where shades appear in the dead of night.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 49–50 Sometimes they sit by the high way side, to give men fals, and make their horses stumble and start as they ride, (if you will believe the relation of that holy man Ketellus in Nubrigensis,[2107] that had an especiall grace to see Devils, Gratiam divinitus collatam, & talk with them, Et impavidus cum spiritibus sermonem miscere, without offence, & if a man curse or spur his horse for stumbling, they do heartily rejoyce at it: with many such pretty feats.	Sometimes they sit beside the highway to make people fall and their horses stumble and shy as they ride—if you believe the account of that holy man Ketell in William of Newburgh. Ketell had received a special, divinely bestowed gift of seeing devils and "conversing fearlessly with spirits," without harm.[2108] If a man curses or spurs his horse for stumbling, they rejoice heartily at it. They play many such pretty tricks.

[2107] Burton. Starred margin: "Lib. 2. cap. 21. Offendicula faciunt transeuntibus in via & petulanter rident cum vel hominem vel jumentum ejus pedes atterere faciant, & maximè si homo maledictis & calcaribus sæviat." Book 2, chapter 21: they put stumbling blocks in travellers' paths and laugh impudently when they make a man or his beast strike its feet, especially if the man rages with curses and spurs.

[2108] Editor. William of Newburgh, History of English Affairs 2.21, tells of Ketell, a Yorkshire countryman able to see and converse with spirits. His story includes demons tripping travellers or their horses and laughing especially when the riders curse and use their spurs.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 50 Subterranean Devils are as common as the rest, & do as much harme. Olaus Magnus, lib. 6. cap. 19. makes six kindes of them, some bigger, some less. These (saith Munster[2109]) are commonly seen about Mines of metals, and are some of them noxious, some again do no harme. The mettal-men in many places account it good luck, a signe of treasure, & rich ore when they see them.	Underground devils are as common as the rest and do as much harm. Olaus Magnus, book 6, chapter 19, distinguishes six kinds, some larger and some smaller. These, says Münster, are commonly seen around metal mines. Some are harmful; others do no harm. In many places miners consider the sight of them good luck, a sign of treasure and rich ore.
Georgius Agricola, in his book de subterraneis animantibus, cap. 37. reckons two more notable kindes of them, which he cals Getuli and Cobali,[2110] both are cloathed after the manner of Metall-men, and will many times imitate their works. Their office, as Pictorius and Paracelsus think, is to keep treasure in the earth, that it be not all at once revealed;	Georgius Agricola, in On Creatures Living Underground, chapter 37, identifies two especially notable kinds, which he calls Getuli and Cobali. Both dress like miners and often imitate their work. Their task, Pictorius and Paracelsus think, is to guard the treasure in the earth so that it is not all discovered at once.
and besides, Cicogna[2111] averrs, that they are the frequent causes of those horrible Earth-quakes, which often swallow up, not onely houses, but whole Ilands and Cities; in his third book cap. 11. he gives many instances.	Besides this, Cicogna asserts that they frequently cause those terrible earthquakes which often swallow up not only houses but entire islands and cities. He gives many instances in his third book, chapter 11.

[2109] Burton. Margin z: “In Cosmogr.” In the Cosmography.

[2110] Burton. Margin a: “Vestiti more metallicorum, gestus & opera eorum imitantur.” Dressed like miners, they imitate their movements and work.

[2111] Burton. Margin b: “Immisso in terræ carceres vento horribiles terræ motus efficiunt, quibus sæpe non domus modo & turres, sed civitates integræ & insulæ haustæ sunt.” By driving wind into the earth’s prisons, they cause terrible earthquakes which have often swallowed up not only houses and towers but entire cities and islands.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The last are conversant about the Center of the earth to torture the souls of damned men to the day of Judgment, their egress and regress some suppose to be about Ætna, Hypara, Mons Hecla in Island, Versuvius, Terra del Fuego, &c. because many shreeks and fearfull cries are continually heard thereabouts, and familiar apparitions of dead men, Ghosts and Goblins.	The last kind inhabits the region around the earth's centre, to torture the souls of the damned until Judgment Day. Some suppose that they enter and leave through places around Etna, Lipari, Mount Hekla in Iceland, Vesuvius, Tierra del Fuego, and the like, because many shrieks and fearful cries are continually heard thereabouts, and apparitions of dead people, ghosts and goblins commonly appear.[2112]
Thus the Devil raigns,[2113] and in a thousand several shapes, As a roaring Lion still seeks whom he may devour, 1. Pet. 5. by Earth, Sea, Land, Ayre, as yet unconfined, though some[2114] will have his proper place the ayre, all that space betwixt us and the Moon, for them that trangressed least, and hell for the wickedest of them,	Thus the Devil reigns, and in a thousand different shapes, "like a roaring lion, continually seeks someone to devour," 1 Peter 5.[2115] Through earth, sea, land and air he remains as yet unconfined. Some, however, hold that his proper dwelling is the air—all the space between us and the moon—for those spirits that transgressed least, and hell for the wickedest.
Hic velut in carcere ad finem mundi, tunc in locum funestiorem trudendi, as Austin holds de Civit. Dei c. 22. lib. 14. cap. 3. & 23. but be where he will, he rageth while he may to comfort himself, as Lactantius[2116] thinks, with other mens fals, he labours all he can to bring them into the same pit of perdition with him.	"Here they are held as if in prison until the end of the world, then to be thrust into a more dreadful place," as Augustine holds in City of God, chapter 22; book 14, chapters 3 and 23.[2117] But wherever he may be, he rages while he can. To comfort himself with other people's falls, as Lactantius thinks, he does all he can to bring them into the same pit of destruction as himself.

[2112] Editor. The source's "Hypara" is taken as Lipari, consistently with the earlier Lypara references, and "Versuvius" as Vesuvius. These are disclosed normalizations in the modern column. The association of volcanic regions with entrances to hell belongs to the tradition Burton reports.

[2113] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Their offices, operations, study." Their duties, activities and aims.

[2114] Burton. Starred margin: "Hieron. in 3. Ephes. Idem Michaelis c. 4. de spiritibus. Idem Thyræus de locis infestis." Jerome on Ephesians 3; Michaelis, On Spirits, chapter 4, and Thyraeus, On Haunted Places, say the same.

[2115] Editor. The biblical allusion is 1 Peter 5:8. The unlettered marginal heading marks a shift from kinds and habitats of spirits to their activities; it is preserved among Burton's notes, rather than inserted as an authorial body heading.

[2116] Burton. Margin c: "Lactantius 2. de origine erroris cap. 15. hi maligni spiritus per omnem terram vagantur, & solatium perditionis suæ perdendis hominibus operantur." Lactantius, On the Origin of Error, book 2, chapter 15: these malignant spirits wander throughout the earth and seek consolation for their own ruin by ruining human beings.

[2117] Editor. The sequence "c. 22. lib. 14. cap. 3. & 23" is ambiguous and is retained. City of God 8.22 provides a clear parallel for the image of the air as the demons' prison; it does not resolve every part of Burton's compressed citation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For mens miseries, calamities and ruines, are the Devils banqueting dishes.[2118] By many temptations and several Engines, he seeks to captivate our souls. The Lord of lyes, saith Austin,[2119] as he was deceived himself, he seeks to deceive others, the Ring-leader to all naughtiness, as he did by Eve and Cain, Sodome, and Gomorah, so would he do by all the world.	For human misery, calamity and ruin are the Devil's banquet dishes. Through many temptations and various devices he seeks to enslave our souls. The lord of lies, says Augustine, himself deceived, seeks to deceive others. The ringleader of all wickedness, he would treat the whole world as he treated Eve and Cain, Sodom and Gomorrah.
Sometimes he tempts by covetousness, drunkenness, pleasure, pride, &c. erres, dejects, saves, kils, protects, and rides some men, as they do their horses. He studies our overthrow, and generally seeks our destruction;	Sometimes he tempts through greed, drunkenness, pleasure, pride, and so on; he leads astray, casts down, saves, kills, protects, and rides some people as they ride their horses.[2120] He plans our overthrow and seeks our destruction in every way.

[2118] Burton. Margin d: "Mortalium calamitates epulæ sunt malorum dæmonum, Synesius." Mortal calamities are feasts for evil demons. Synesius.

[2119] Burton. Margin e, continuing across the foot of page 50: "Dominus mendacii à seipso deceptus, alios decipere cupit, adversarius humani generis, Inventor mortis, superbiæ institutor, radix malitiæ, scelerum caput, princeps omnium vitiorum, fuit ind: in Dei contumeliam, hominum perniciem: de horum conatibus & operationibus lege Epiphanium. 2. Tom. lib. 2. Dionysium. c. 4. Ambros. Epistol. lib. 10. ep. & 84. August. de civ. Dei lib. 5. c. 9. lib. 8. cap. 22. lib. 9. 18. lib. 10. 21. Theophil. in 12. Mat. Basil. ep. 141. Leonem Ser. Theodoret. in 11. Cor. ep. 22. Chrys. hom. 53. in 12. Gen. Greg. in 1. c. John. Barthol. de prop. l. 2 c. 20. Zanch. l. 4. de malis angelis. Perer. in Gen. l. 8. in c. 6. 2 Origen. sæpe præliis intersunt, itinera & negotia nostra quæcunque dirigunt, clandestinis subsidiis optatos sæpe præbent successus, Pet. Mar. in Sam. &c. Ruscam de Inferno." The lord of lies, himself deceived, desires to deceive others: humanity's adversary, inventor of death, founder of pride, root of malice, head of crimes and chief of all vices, hence bringing dishonour to God and destruction to humanity. For their attempts and operations, read the listed works of Epiphanius, Dionysius, Ambrose, Augustine, Theophylact, Basil, Leo, Theodoret, Chrysostom, Gregory, Bartholomaeus, Zanchi, Pereira and Origen. They often take part in battles, direct our journeys and all our affairs, and by secret assistance often bring about desired successes: Peter Martyr on Samuel, and Rusca on Hell. The compressed and sometimes ambiguous bibliographical numbering is retained for collation.

[2120] Editor. The source prints "erres". The modern "leads astray" takes this in the causative sense of making someone err; the reading remains uncertain and requires comparison with other copies or editions. "Naughtiness" in the preceding unit means wickedness, not mild misbehaviour.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 50–51 and although he pretend many times humane good, and vindicate himself for a god, by curing of several diseases, ægris sanitatem, & cæcis luminis usum restituendo, as Austin declares, lib. 10. de civit. Dei cap. 6. as Apollo, Æsculapius, Isis, of old have done; divert plagues, assist them in wars, pretend their happiness, yet nihil his impurius, scelestius, nihil humano generi infestius, nothing so impure, nothing so pernicious,	Although he often professes to benefit humanity and claims to be a god by curing various diseases, "restoring health to the sick and sight to the blind," as Augustine declares, City of God, book 10, chapter 6—as Apollo, Aesculapius and Isis did in ancient times—though he turns plagues aside, helps people in war and professes to promote their happiness, still "nothing is more impure or criminal, nothing more hostile to the human race": nothing so impure, nothing so pernicious.[2121]
Source page 51 as may wel appear by their tyrannicall, and bloody sacrifices of men to Saturne and Moloch, which are still in use amongst those Barbarous Indians, their severall deceits and cozenings to keep men in obedience, their false Oracles, sacrifices, their superstitious impositions of fasts, penury, &c. Heresies, superstitious observations of meats, times, &c.	This is plain enough from their tyrannical and bloody human sacrifices to Saturn and Moloch, which are still practised among those barbarous Indians; from their various deceits and frauds to keep people obedient; their false oracles and sacrifices; their superstitious imposition of fasting, poverty, and the like; their heresies; and their superstitious observance of rules about foods and times.[2122]

[2121] Editor. "Vindicate himself for a god" means claim or establish divine status; "pretend" here means profess or allege. Burton's reference to City of God 10.6 is retained, but the exact support for this catalogue has not been established; it is recorded for collation.

[2122] Editor. Burton's polemic links ancient human sacrifice with his unspecific category of "Indians", then with religious disciplines he condemns as superstition. "Meats" means foods. The modern column preserves his rhetoric and claims without adding a geographical identification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
by which they crucifie[2123] the souls of mortal men, as shall be shewed in our Treatise of Religious Melancholy. Modico adhuc tempore sinitur malignari, as Bernard[2124] expresseth it, by Gods permission he rageth a while, hereafter to be confined to hell and darkness, Which is prepared for him and his Angels, Mat. 25.	By these means they crucify mortal souls, as will be shown in our treatise on religious melancholy. "He is permitted to do evil for a little while yet," as Bernard puts it. By God's permission he rages for a time, later to be confined to hell and darkness, "which is prepared for him and his angels," Matthew 25.[2125]
How far their power doth extend, it is hard to determine, what the Ancients held of their effects, force and operations, I will briefly shew you: Plato in Critias, and after him his followers, gave out that these spirits or Devils, Were mens governors and keepers, our Lords and masters, as we are of our cattle.	How far their power extends is hard to determine. I will briefly show you what the ancients believed about their effects, strength and workings. Plato in the Critias, and his followers after him, declared that these spirits or devils were humanity's rulers and guardians, our lords and masters, as we are of our cattle.[2126]
They govern Provinces & Kingdoms by Oracles, auguries, dreams, rewards & punishments, prophesies, inspirations, sacrifices, and religious superstitions, varied in as many formes, as there be diversity of spirits,[2127] they send wars, plagues, peace, sickness, health, dearth, plenty, Adstantes hic jam nobis, spectantes & arbitrantes, &c.[2128]	They govern provinces and kingdoms through oracles, omens, dreams, rewards and punishments, prophecies, inspirations, sacrifices and religious superstitions, which take as many forms as there are kinds of spirits. They send war, plague, peace, sickness, health, scarcity and plenty, "standing here beside us even now, watching and judging," and so on.

[2123] Burton. Margin f: "Et velut mancipia circumfert Psellus." And he drives them about like slaves. Psellus.

[2124] Burton. Margin g: "Lib. de trans. mut. Malac. ep." The abbreviation is retained. Compare Bernard, First Sermon on the Passing of St Malachy §4: the Devil is not yet consigned to the fire prepared for him, but is allowed a little time to work evil.

[2125] Editor. The promised treatment belongs to the Third Partition's religious melancholy. The biblical allusion is Matthew 25:41. Bernard's First Sermon on the Passing of St Malachy §4 supplies the argument that the Devil is permitted to act for a time before punishment; Burton condenses it.

[2126] Editor. Critias 109b–c describes gods allotting territories and tending humanity as herdsmen. Burton assimilates these gods to spirits or devils within his Christian demonology; "devils" is his interpretative framing, not Plato's wording.

[2127] Burton. Margin h: "Custodes sunt hominum, & eorum, ut nos animalium: tum & provinciis præpositi, regunt auguriis, somniis, oraculis, præmiis, &c." They are guardians of people, as we are of animals; set over provinces, they govern through omens, dreams, oracles, rewards, and so forth.

[2128] Burton. Margin i: "Lypsius Physiol. Stoic. lib. 1. cap. 19." Lipsius, The Natural Philosophy of the Stoics, book 1, chapter 19.

Original text 1651	Modern English
as appears by those histories of Thucydides, Livius, Dionysius Halicarnassus, with many others that are full of their wonderfull stratagems, and were therefore by those Roman and Greek common-wealths adored and worshipped for gods, with prayers, and sacrifices, &c. In a word, Nihil magis quærunt quam metum & admirationem hominum;[2129] and as another hath it, Dici non potest, quam impotenti ardore in homines dominium, & Divinos cultus maligni spiritus affectent.	This appears in the histories of Thucydides, Livy and Dionysius of Halicarnassus, and in many others full of their astonishing stratagems. The Roman and Greek states therefore adored and worshipped them as gods, with prayers, sacrifices, and so forth. In a word, "They seek nothing more than human fear and wonder." As another writer puts it, "Words cannot express the ungovernable passion with which evil spirits covet dominion over humanity and divine worship."
Tritemius in his book de septem secundis, assignes names to such Angels, as are Governors of particular Provinces, by what authority I know not, and gives them several jurisdictions. Asclepiades a Grecian, Rabbi Achiba the Jew, Abraham Avenezra, and Rabbi Azariel, Arabians, (as I finde them cited by Cicogna)[2130] farther adde, that they are not our Governors only, Sed ex eorum concordia & discordia, boni & mali affectus promanant,	In his book On the Seven Secondary Intelligences, Trithemius gives names to angels who govern particular provinces—by what authority I do not know—and assigns them separate jurisdictions. Asclepiades, a Greek; Rabbi Akiba, the Jew; Abraham Avenezra and Rabbi Azariel, Arabians, as I find them cited by Cicogna, add that these beings are not merely our governors: "From their harmony and discord flow good and evil dispositions."[2131]

[2129] Burton. Margin k: "Leo Suavis. idem & Tritemius." Leo Suavis; Trithemius says the same.

[2130] Burton. Margin l: "Omnif. mag. lib. 2. cap. 23." Cicogna, Omnifaria magia, book 2, chapter 23.

[2131] Editor. Avenezra is Abraham ibn Ezra; Azariel is a rabbinic name usually associated here with Azriel. Burton's label "Arabians" is retained rather than silently substituting a modern ethnic description. The exact authorities and the mediation through Cicogna remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but as they agree, so do we and our Princes, or disagree, stand or fall. Juno was a bitter enemy to Troy, Apollo a good friend, Jupiter indifferent, Æqua Venus Teucris, Pallas iniqua fuit; some are for us still, some against us, Premente Deo, fert Deus alter opem. Religion, policy, publike and private quarrels, wars are procured by them, and they are delighted[2132] perhaps to see men fight, as men are with Cocks, Buls and Dogs, Bears, &c.	As they agree or disagree, so do we and our princes; as they stand or fall, so do we. Juno was a bitter enemy of Troy, Apollo a good friend, Jupiter neutral: "Venus favoured the Trojans; Pallas was hostile." Some are always for us, others against us: "When one god presses us hard, another brings help."[2133] They bring about religion, statecraft, public and private quarrels, and wars. Perhaps they delight in watching men fight, as men delight in fights between cocks, bulls and dogs, bears, and so on.
plagues, dearths depend on them, our bene and male esse, and almost all our other peculiar actions, (for as Anthony Rusca contends lib. 5. cap. 18. every man hath a good and a bad Angell attending of him in particular, all his life long, which Jamblicus cals dæmonem) preferments, losses, weddings, deaths, rewards & punishments, and as Proclus[2134] will, all offices whatsoever, alii genetricem, alii opificem potestatem habent, &c. & several names they give them according to their offices, as Lares, Indegites, Præstites, &c.	Plagues and shortages depend on them, as do our well-being and misfortune and almost all our individual affairs. For, as Anthony Rusca maintains in book 5, chapter 18, everyone has a good and a bad angel attending personally throughout life—what Iamblichus calls a daemon. These beings oversee promotions, losses, weddings, deaths, rewards and punishments, and, according to Proclus, every kind of function: "Some have generative power, others formative power," and so forth. They are given different names according to their functions: Lares, Indigetes, Praestites, and the like.[2135]

[2132] Burton. Margin m: "Ludus deorum sumus." We are the plaything of the gods.

[2133] Editor. Both Latin phrases are from Ovid, Tristia 1.2. Teucri are Trojans; Pallas is Athena. Burton uses Ovid's divided divine allegiances to illustrate conflicting supernatural patrons.

[2134] Burton. Margin n: "Lib. de animæ & dæmone." The abbreviated title is printed thus; a book concerning the soul and daemon.

[2135] Editor. A daemon in ancient philosophy can be a guardian or intermediary spirit, not necessarily an evil being. Lares are protective deities; Indigetes denotes a class of Roman gods or deified figures; Praestites means guardians or protectors. The modern column regularizes the printed Indegites.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 51–52 When the Arcades in that battel at Cheronæa, which was fought against King Philip for the liberty of Greece, had deceitfully carried themselves, long after, in the very same place, Diis Græciæ ultoribus (saith mine Author) they were miserably slain by Metellus the Roman. So likewise, in smaller matters, they will have things fall out, as these boni and mali Genii favour or dislike us: Saturni non conveniunt Jovialibus, &c. He that is Saturninus, shall never likely be preferred.	When the Arcadians acted treacherously at the battle of Chaeronea, fought against King Philip for Greece's liberty, they were, long afterwards, wretchedly slaughtered on the very same spot by the Roman Metellus, "the gods of Greece exacting vengeance," as my author says. In smaller matters too, these writers hold that events turn out according to whether these good and evil guardian spirits favour or dislike us: "Those of Saturn do not agree with those of Jupiter," and so on. A man under Saturn is unlikely ever to gain advancement.[2136]
Source page 52 That base fellowes are often advanced, undeserving Gnathoe's, and vicious parasites, whenas discreet, wise, vertuous, and worthy men are neglected, and unrewarded, they refer to those domineering spirits, or subordinate Genii,[2137] as they are inclined, or favour men, so they thrive, are ruled and overcome, for as Libanius[2138] supposeth, in our ordinary conflicts and contentions, Genius Genio cedit & obtemperat, one Genius yields and is overcome by another.	They attribute the frequent promotion of base fellows—undeserving Gnathos and vicious parasites—while prudent, wise, virtuous and worthy men are neglected and unrewarded, to these ruling spirits or subordinate guardian spirits. According to their dispositions and the favour they show, people prosper, are governed or are overpowered. For, as Libanius supposes, in our ordinary conflicts and disputes "one guardian spirit yields and submits to another": one spirit gives way and is overcome by another.[2139]

[2136] Editor. Saturn and Jupiter designate astrological dispositions as well as their associated spirits. "Saturnine" here concerns a person's supposed planetary affiliation, not simply a gloomy mood. Burton's compressed account of Arcadian conduct and retribution requires collation with his intermediary source.

[2137] Burton. Margin o: "Quoties fit, ut Principes novitium aulicum divitiis & dignitatibus pene obruant, & multorum annorum ministrum, qui non semel pro hero periculum subiit, ne teruntio donent, &c. Idem. Quod Philosophi non remunerentur, cum scurra & ineptus ob insulsum jocum sæpe præmium reportet, inde fit, &c." How often princes almost overwhelm a new courtier with wealth and honours, yet give not a farthing to a servant of many years who has repeatedly risked danger for his master! The same author. Hence philosophers go unrewarded while a buffoon or fool often receives a prize for a tasteless joke, and so on.

[2138] Burton. Margin p: "Lib. de cruent. Cadaver." Book on the bleeding corpse.

[2139] Editor. Gnatho, the parasite in Terence's Eunuch, supplies a name for a flatterer. "Libanius" here means Andreas Libavius: De cruentatione cadaverum, in Tractatus duo physici (1594), p. 383, §286, reads "genius genio cedat & obtemperet". Burton makes this a direct assertion, "cedit & obtemperat"; Libavius presents it among possible explanations for inhibition in another person's presence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All particular events almost they refer to these private spirits; & (as Paracelsus addes) they direct, teach, inspire, and instruct men: Never was any man extraordinarily famous in any Art, action, or great Commander, that had not familiarem dæmonem, to inform him, as Numa, Socrates, and many such, as Cardan illustrates, cap. 128. Arcanis prudentiæ civilis, Speciali siquidem gratia, se à Deo donari asserunt magi, à Geniis cœlestibus instrui, ab iis doceri.[2140]	They attribute almost every individual event to these personal spirits; and, as Paracelsus adds, the spirits direct, teach, inspire and instruct people. No man was ever extraordinarily famous in any art or achievement, or became a great commander, without a familiar spirit to instruct him: Numa, Socrates, and many others, as Cardan illustrates in Secrets of Political Prudence, chapter 128. “Magicians indeed claim that God bestows a special grace upon them, that heavenly spirits instruct and teach them.”[2141]
But these are most erroneous paradoxes, ineptæ & fabulosæ nugæ, rejected by our Divines, and Christian Churches. Tis true, they have by Gods permission, power over us, and we finde by experience, that they can hurt[2142] not our fields only, cattel, goods, but our bodies and mindes. At Hammel in Saxony, An. 1484. 20. Junii, the Devil in likeness of a pied Piper, carried away 130 Children, that were never after seen.	But these are utterly erroneous paradoxes, “foolish, fabulous nonsense,” rejected by our theologians and Christian churches. It is true that, with God’s permission, they have power over us, and experience shows that they can harm not only our fields, cattle and possessions, but also our bodies and minds. At Hamelin in Saxony, on 20 June 1484, the Devil, in the likeness of a piper in multicoloured clothes, carried away 130 children who were never seen again.[2143]

[2140] Burton. Margin q: “Boissardus c. 6. magia.” Boissard, Magic, chapter 6.

[2141] Editor. A familiar is an attending spirit. Numa is the legendary Roman king associated with Egeria; Socrates described a divine sign that restrained him. Burton groups different traditions under the category of spirit instruction.

[2142] Burton. Margin r: “Godelmanus cap. 3. lib. 1. de Magis. idem Zanchius lib. 4. cap. 10. & 11. de malis angelis.” Godelmann, On Magicians, book 1, chapter 3; likewise Zanchi, On Evil Angels, book 4, chapters 10 and 11.

[2143] Editor. Burton prints 20 June 1484. The early modern inscription on Hamelin’s Pied Piper house, reproduced by the town museum, instead dates the disappearance of 130 children to 26 June 1284. The source date is preserved in both columns; the discrepancy concerns the legend’s recorded dating, not proof of its supernatural explanation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many times men are affrighted[2144] out of their wits, carried away quite, as Sheretzius illustrates, lib. 1. c. 4. and severally molested by his means. Plotinus the Platonist lib. 14. advers. Gnost. laughs them to scorne, that hold the Devil or Spirits can cause any such diseases. Many think he can work upon the body, but not upon the minde. But experience pronounceth otherwise, that he can work both upon body and minde.	People are often frightened out of their wits, carried off altogether, as Scheretzius illustrates in book 1, chapter 4, and tormented in various ways through his agency. Plotinus the Platonist, in Against the Gnostics, book 14, laughs to scorn those who believe that the Devil or spirits can cause such diseases.[2145] Many think he can act upon the body but not the mind. Experience declares otherwise: he can act upon both body and mind.
Tertullian is of this opinion, c. 22. That he can cause both sickness and health,[2146] & that secretly. Taurellus adds by clancular poysons he can infect the bodies, and hinder the operations of the bowels, though we perceive it not,[2147] closely creeping into them, saith Lipsius,[2148] and so crucifie our souls: Et nociva melancholia furiosos efficit.	Tertullian holds this opinion in chapter 22: he can cause both sickness and health, and do so secretly. Taurellus adds that by hidden poisons he can infect our bodies and obstruct the workings of our internal organs without our perceiving it, "stealthily creeping into them," says Lipsius, and so torment our souls: "And by harmful melancholy he drives people mad."[2149]

[2144] Burton. Margin s: "Nociva Melancholia furiosos efficit, & quandoque penitus interficit. G. Picolomineus. Idemque Zanch. cap. 10. lib. 4. si Deus permittat, corpora nostra movere possunt, alterare, quovis morborum & malorum genere afficere, imo & in ipsa penetrare & sævire." Harmful melancholy drives people mad and sometimes kills them outright. G. Piccolomini. Zanchi likewise, book 4, chapter 10: if God permits, they can move and change our bodies, afflict them with every sort of disease and evil, even penetrate them and rage within.

[2145] Editor. The identifiable passage is Plotinus, Enneads II.9, Against the Gnostics, section 14. Plotinus criticizes exorcistic accounts of disease and argues for physical causes and remedies. Burton's "lib. 14" appears to misstate a section number as a book.

[2146] Burton. Margin t: "Inducere potest morbos & sanitates." He can bring on disease and health.

[2147] Burton. Margin u: "Viscerum actiones potest inhibere latenter, & venenis nobis ignotis corpus inficere." He can secretly obstruct the workings of the internal organs and infect the body with poisons unknown to us.

[2148] Burton. Margin x: "Irrepentes corporibus occultò morbos fingunt, mentes terrent, membra distorquent. Lips. Phil. Stoic. l. 1. c. 19." Creeping into bodies unseen, they create diseases, frighten minds and twist limbs. Lipsius, Stoic Philosophy, book 1, chapter 19.

[2149] Editor. Tertullian's Apology 22 describes demons injuring bodies and disturbing minds; chapter 23 explains their supposed cures as withdrawal of injuries they themselves caused. "Clancular" means secret or concealed; "bowels" here means internal organs more broadly than intestines.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For being a spirituall body, he struggles with our spirits, saith Rogers, and suggests (according to Cardan,[2150] verba sine voce, species sine visu, envie, lust, anger, &c.) as he sees men inclined.	For, being a spiritual body, he struggles with our spirits, says Rogers, and suggests—as Cardan puts it—"words without a voice, images without sight," envy, lust, anger, and so on, according to the inclinations he sees in people.[2151]
The manner how he performes it, Biarmannus in his Oration against Bodine, sufficiently declares, He begins first with the phantasie, and moves that so strongly, that no reason is able to resist.[2152] Now the Phantasie he moves by mediation of humors; although many Physitians are of opinion, that the Devil can alter the minde, and produce this disease of himself. Quibusdam medicorum visum, saith Avicenna,[2153] quod Melancholia contingat à dæmonio.	Biarmannus explains adequately how he does this in his Oration against Bodin: he begins with the imagination and stirs it so powerfully that reason cannot resist. He acts upon the imagination through the humours, although many physicians think the Devil can alter the mind and produce this disease by himself. "Some physicians have thought," says Avicenna, "that melancholy arises from a demon."[2154]

[2150] Burton. Margin y: "De rerum var. l. 16. c. 93." On the Variety of Things, book 16, chapter 93.

[2151] Editor. "Spirits" here can mean the subtle bodily agencies of historical physiology as well as supernatural beings. The argument depends on contact between these two kinds of spirit; "spiritual body" should not be reduced to the modern idea of a disembodied mind.

[2152] Burton. Margin z, continued across the foot of page 52: "Quum mens immediatè decipi nequit, primùm movit phantasiam, & ita obfirmat vanis conceptibus aut ut ne quem facultati æstimativæ rationi locum relinquat. Spiritus malus invadit animam, turbat sensus, in furorem conjicit. Austin. de vit. Beat." Since the mind cannot be deceived directly, he first stirs the imagination and so fixes it upon empty notions that he leaves no room for the judging faculty or reason. An evil spirit invades the soul, disturbs the senses and throws it into frenzy. Augustine, On the Happy Life. The awkward "aut ut" and compressed syntax are retained in the Latin.

[2153] Burton. Margin a: "Lib. 3. Fen. 1. Tract. 4. c. 18." Book 3, fen 1, treatise 4, chapter 18. Fen is a major division of Avicenna's Canon.

[2154] Editor. Phantasy means imagination, an internal mental faculty; bodily "spirits" in this account differ from demons. Augustine, On the Happy Life 3.18, distinguishes an external spirit disturbing the senses from a soul made impure by vice. Burton's final marginal sentence condenses the former. It does not establish Biarmannus's preceding account of imagination, whose malformed Latin remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of the same minde is Psellus & Rhasis the Arab. lib. 1. Tract. 9. Cont. That this disease proceeds especially from the Devil, and from him alone.[2155] Arculanus cap. 6. in 9. Rhasis, Ælianus Montaltus in his 9. cap. Daniel Sennertus lib. 1. part. 2. cap. 11. confirm as much, that the Devil can cause this disease, by reason many times that the parties affected prophesie, speak strange language,	Psellus and Rhazes the Arab, in the Continens, book 1, treatise 9, share the opinion that this disease proceeds especially from the Devil, and from him alone. Arculanus, chapter 6 of his commentary on Rhazes's ninth book; Elianus Montalto, chapter 9; and Daniel Sennert, book 1, part 2, chapter 11, likewise affirm that the Devil can cause this disease, because those affected often prophesy or speak unfamiliar languages.
Source page 52–53 but non sine interventu humoris, not without the humor, as he interprets himself; no more doth Avicenna, si contingat à dæmonio, sufficit nobis ut convertat complexionem ad choleram nigram, & sit causa ejus propinqua cholera nigra; the immediate cause is choler adust, which Pomponatius[2156] likewise labors to make good:	But this is "not without the intervention of a humour," as he himself explains; nor does Avicenna mean otherwise: "If it arises from a demon, it is enough for us that the demon changes the bodily constitution towards black bile, and that its immediate cause is black bile." The immediate cause is burnt choler, a claim that Pomponazzi also labours to establish.[2157]
Source page 53 Galgerandus of Mantua a famous Physitian, so cured a dæmoniacall woman in his time, that spake all languages, by purging black choler, and thereupon belike this humor of Melancholy, is called Balneum Diaboli, the devils Bath; the devil spying his opportunity of such humors drives them many times to despair, fury, rage, &c. mingling himself amongst these humors.	Galgerandus of Mantua, a famous physician, in this way cured a possessed woman of his time who spoke every language: he purged her black bile. Hence, presumably, this humour of melancholy is called "the Devil's bath." Seeing his opportunity in such humours, the Devil often drives people to despair, fury, rage, and so forth, mingling himself among these humours.

[2155] Burton. Margin b: "A Dæmone maxime proficisci, & sæpe solo." It proceeds chiefly from a demon, and often from a demon alone.

[2156] Burton. Starred margin: "Lib. de incant." Book on incantations.

[2157] Editor. Complexion means the body's humoral constitution. Adust choler is choler thought to have been burnt or excessively heated into a harmful residue. Burton distinguishes an alleged remote demonic cause from a bodily immediate cause; he does not discard humoral medicine here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This is that which Tertullian averres, Corporibus infligunt acerbos casus, animæque repentinos, membra distorquent, occulte repentes, &c. and which Lemnius goes about to prove, Immiscent se mali Genii pravis humoribus, atque atra bili, &c.	This is what Tertullian asserts: “They inflict grievous afflictions on bodies and sudden assaults on the soul; they twist the limbs, creeping in unseen,” and so on. It is also what Lemnius undertakes to prove: “Evil spirits mingle with corrupted humours and black bile,” and so forth.
And Jason Pratensis,[2158] that the devil being a slender incomprehensible spirit, can easily insinuate and winde himself into humane bodies, and cunningly couched in our bowels, vitiate our healths, terrifie our souls with fearful dreams, and shake our minde with furies. And in another place, These unclean spirits setled in our bodies, and now mixt with our melancholy humors, do triumph as it were, and sport themselves, as in another Heaven.	And Jason Pratensis says that the Devil, being a subtle spirit that cannot be grasped, can easily slip and wind his way into human bodies and, cunningly lodged in our internal organs, damage our health, terrify our souls with frightening dreams and shake our minds with fits of frenzy. Elsewhere he says: “These unclean spirits, settled in our bodies and now mixed with our melancholy humours, seem to triumph and play as though in another heaven.”
Thus he argues, and that they goe in and out of our bodies, as Bees do in a Hive, and so provoke and tempt us as they perceive our temperature inclined of it self, and most apt to be deluded. Agrippa[2159] and Lavater[2160] are perswaded, that this humor invites the devil to it, wheresoever it is in extremity, and of all other, melancholy persons are most subject to diabolical temptations, and illusions, and most apt to entertain them, and the Devil best able to work upon them.	So he argues, adding that they enter and leave our bodies as bees do a hive, provoking and tempting us according to the natural inclinations of our bodily constitution, wherever it is most susceptible to deception. Agrippa and Lavater are convinced that this humour invites the Devil wherever it exists in excess; that melancholy people are more exposed than anyone else to diabolical temptations and illusions, more ready to receive them, and most easily acted upon by the Devil.

[2158] Burton. Margin r: “Cap. de mania lib. de morbis cerebri; Dæmones, quum sint tenues & incomprehensibiles spiritus, se insinuare corporibus humanis possunt, & occulte in visceribus operti, valetudinem vitiare, somniis animas terrere & mentes furoribus quatere. Insinuant se melancholicorum penetralibus, intus ibique considunt & deliciantur tanquam in regione clarissimorum siderum, coguntque animum furere.” Chapter on mania in the book On Diseases of the Brain. Demons, being subtle and ungraspable spirits, can enter human bodies and, hidden within the organs, damage health, terrify souls with dreams and shake minds with frenzies. They slip into the innermost parts of melancholy people, settle there, delight as though in the realm of the brightest stars, and force the mind into frenzy.

[2159] Burton. Margin s: “Lib. 1. cap. 6. occult. Philos.” Occult Philosophy, book 1, chapter 6.

[2160] Burton. Margin t: “Part. 1. cap. 1. de spectris.” On Apparitions, part 1, chapter 1.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But whether by obsession, or possession, or otherwise, I will not determine, tis a difficult question. Delrio the Jesuite, Tom. 3. lib. 6. Springer and his colleague, mall. malef. Pet. Thyreus the Jesuite, lib. de dæmoniacis, de locis infestis, de Terrificationibus nocturnis, Hieronymus Mengus Flagel. dæm. and others of that ranke of Pontificiall writers, it seems, by their exorcismes and conjurations approve of it, having forged many stories to that purpose.	But whether this happens through external demonic assault, possession or some other means, I will not decide: it is a difficult question.[2161] Delrio the Jesuit, volume 3, book 6; Sprenger and his colleague in The Hammer of Witches; Peter Thyraeus the Jesuit, in his books On the Possessed, On Haunted Places and On Night Terrors; Girolamo Menghi in The Scourge of Demons; and other papal writers of that sort appear to confirm it by their exorcisms and conjurations, having fabricated many stories for the purpose.[2162]
A Nun did eat a Lettice without Grace, or signing it without the signe of the Cross,[2163] and was instantly possessed. Durand. lib. 6. Rationall. c. 86. num. 8. relates that he saw a wench possessed in Bononia with two devils, by eating an unhallowed Pomegranate, as she did afterwards confess, when she was cured by exorcismes.	A nun ate a lettuce without saying grace or making the sign of the cross over it, and was instantly possessed.[2164] Durandus, Rationale, book 6, chapter 86, section 8, relates that at Bologna he saw a young woman possessed by two devils after eating an unblessed pomegranate, as she afterwards confessed when cured by exorcism.

[2161] Editor. "Obsession" in this context means a demon's surrounding or external assault, contrasted with its occupation of the person in possession. It does not carry the modern psychiatric sense of a recurrent intrusive thought.

[2162] Editor. The Hammer of Witches is the Malleus maleficarum. Burton's conventional attribution to Sprenger and a colleague is retained. "Pontifical" and "papists" are his polemical terms for Roman Catholics, and the accusation that they fabricated stories is his assertion.

[2163] Burton. The margin appears to repeat t, although the body anchor is u: "Sine cruce & sanctificatione sic à dæmone obsessa. dial. Greg. pag. c. 9." Without the cross and blessing she was thus possessed by a demon. Gregory's Dialogues; the closing locator is retained as printed. See the Editor's note for the identifiable passage.

[2164] Editor. Gregory the Great's Dialogues 1.4 contains the lettuce story: the nun forgets to bless it with the sign of the cross. The original's "or signing it without the signe" is a malformed expression; the modern column restores the sense indicated by the margin and Gregory. "Wench" in the following sentence means a young woman.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And therefore our Papists do signe themselves so often with the signe of the Cross, Ne dæmon ingredi ausit, and exorcise all manner of meats, as being unclean or accurst otherwise, as Bellarmine defends. Many such Stories I finde amongst Pontifical writers, to prove their assertions, let them free their own credits; some few I will recite in this kinde out of most-approved Physitians.	For this reason our papists so often cross themselves, “lest a demon dare to enter,” and exorcise every kind of food as otherwise unclean or accursed—a practice Bellarmine defends. I find many such stories among papal writers to prove their assertions; let them vindicate their own credibility. I will cite a few of this kind from physicians of the highest reputation.
Cornelius Gemma lib. 2. de nat. mirac. c. 4. relates of a young maid, called Katherine Gualter a Coupers daughter, An. 1571. that had such strange passions and convulsions, three men could not sometimes hold her, she purged a live Eele, which he saw a foot and a half long, and touched himself, but the Eele afterward vanished,	Cornelius Gemma, On the Divine Signs of Nature, book 2, chapter 4, relates that in 1571 a young woman called Katherine Gualter, a cooper’s daughter, suffered such strange attacks and convulsions that sometimes three men could not hold her. She passed a live eel, a foot and a half long, which he saw and touched himself; but afterwards the eel vanished.[2165]
Source page 53–54 she vomited some 24 pounds of fulsome stuffe of all colours, twice a day for 14 dayes; and after that she voided great bals of haire, peeces of wood, Pigeons dung, Parchment, Goose dung, coals; and after them two pound of pure blood, and then again coals and stones, of which some had inscriptions bigger than a walnut, some of them pieces of glass, brass, &c. besides paroxysmes of laughing, weeping and extasies, &c. Et hoc (inquit) cum horrore vidi, this I saw with horror.	She vomited some twenty-four pounds of foul matter of every colour twice a day for fourteen days. Afterwards she expelled great balls of hair, pieces of wood, pigeon droppings, parchment, goose droppings and coals; then two pounds of pure blood; then coals and stones again, some bearing inscriptions and larger than a walnut, and some pieces of glass, brass, and so on. Besides this she had fits of laughter, weeping and trance. “And this,” he says, “I saw with horror”—I saw it with horror.[2166]

[2165] Editor. A cooper makes wooden barrels. “Passions” means attacks or episodes of illness; “purged” here means discharged from the body. These are Burton’s reports of historical case narratives, including their claims of eyewitness testimony, not independently established clinical observations.

[2166] Editor. The original’s compressed phrase puts “bigger than a walnut” after “inscriptions.” The modern rendering takes size to describe the stones, while retaining that some bore inscriptions. “Ecstasies” here denotes trance-like states or withdrawal of ordinary awareness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 54 They could do no good on her by Physick, but left her to the Clergy. Marcellus Donatus lib. 2. c. 1. de med. mirab. hath such another story of a countrey fellow, that had four knives in his belly, Instar serræ dentatos, indented like a Saw, every one a span long, and a wreath of hair like a globe, with much baggage of like sort, wonderfull to behold: how it should come into his Guts, he concludes, Certè non alio quam dæmonis astutiâ & dolo.	They could do nothing for her with medicine and left her to the clergy. Marcellus Donatus, Medical Wonders, book 2, chapter 1, has a similar story of a countryman who had four knives in his belly, "toothed like a saw"—serrated like a saw—each a span long, and a coil of hair in the shape of a ball, with much similar rubbish, astonishing to see. As for how it entered his guts, he concludes: "Certainly by nothing other than a demon's cunning and deceit."[2167]
Langius Epist. med. lib. 1. Epist. 38. hath many relations to this effect, and so hath Christophorus à Vega: Wierus, Skenkius, Scribonius, all agree that they are done by the subtilty and illusion of the Devill. If you shall ask a reason of this, tis to exercise our patience; for as Tertullian[2168] holds, Virtus non est virtus, nisi comparem habet aliquem, in quo superando vim suam ostendat,	Lange, Medical Letters, book 1, letter 38, has many accounts of this kind, as does Cristóbal de Vega. Weyer, Schenck and Scribonius all agree that these things are done through the Devil's cunning and illusion. If you ask why, it is to exercise our patience. For, as Tertullian maintains, "Virtue is not virtue unless it has an opponent to overcome and thereby display its strength."[2169]
tis to trie us and our faith, tis for our offences, and for the punishment of our sins, by Gods permission they do it, Carnifices vindictæ justæ Dei, as Tolosanus stiles them,[2170] Executioners of his will; or rather as David, Ps. 78. ver. 49. He cast upon them the fierceness of his anger, indignation, wrath, and vexation, by sending out of evill Angels:	It is to test us and our faith, because of our offences and as punishment for our sins. They do it with God's permission: "executioners of God's just vengeance," as Tolosanus calls them—executioners of his will. Or rather, as David says in Psalm 78, verse 49: "He unleashed upon them his fierce anger, indignation, wrath and distress, by sending out evil angels."

[2167] Editor. A span is the distance across an outstretched hand from thumb to little finger. "Baggage" here means miscellaneous rubbish or material, not luggage. Burton's source attributes the objects to demonic deception.

[2168] Burton. Starred margin: "Penult. de opific. Dei." The penultimate chapter of On the Workmanship of God. The author attribution in the body requires further collation.

[2169] Editor. The body names Tertullian; the margin cites the penultimate chapter of On the Workmanship of God, associated with Lactantius. Chapter 19 did not establish the quotation. Lactantius, Divine Institutes 3.29.16, offers a thematic parallel: virtue needs an adversary. Its wording differs, so it does not resolve Burton's attribution or title.

[2170] Burton. Margin u: "Lib. 28. cap. 26. Tom. 2." Volume 2, book 28, chapter 26. Placed beside the Tolosanus reference without a clear surviving body anchor.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So did he afflict Job, Saul, the Lunaticks and dæmoniacall persons whom Christ cured, Mat. 4. 8. Luk. 4. 11. Luk. 13. Mark 9. Tobit. 8. 3. &c. This, I say, happeneth for a punishment of sin, for their want of faith, incredulity, weakness, distrust, &c.	So he afflicted Job, Saul, the lunatics and possessed people whom Christ cured: Matthew 4 and 8; Luke 4 and 11; Luke 13; Mark 9; Tobit 8:3; and so forth.[2171] This, I say, happens as punishment for sin, for their lack of faith, unbelief, weakness, distrust, and the like.[2172]

[2171] Editor. The compressed sequence "Mat. 4. 8. Luk. 4. 11." is read as lists of chapters, not Matthew 4:8 or Luke 4:11. Tobit 8:3 concerns the binding of the demon Asmodeus. "Lunatics" is the historical designation used in the source; it is not adopted here as a present-day diagnosis.

[2172] Editor. The explanation of illness as punishment or defective faith is Burton's theological claim. His categories mix bodily illness, mental disturbance and alleged possession; they do not map directly onto modern diagnoses.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsec. 3. Of Witches and Magicians, how they cause Melancholy.	Subsection 3 Witches and magicians: how they cause melancholy
You have heard what the Devill can do of himself, now you shall hear what he can perform by his instruments, who are many times worse (if it be possible) then he himself, and to satisfie their revenge and lust, cause more mischief, Multa enim mala non egisset dæmon, nisi provocatus à Sagis, as Erastus[2173] thinks; much harm had never been done, had he not been provoked by Witches to it.	You have heard what the Devil can do by himself. Now you shall hear what he can accomplish through his instruments, who are often worse—if that is possible—than he is, and cause more mischief to satisfy their revenge and desire. "For the demon would not have committed many evils had witches not provoked him," as Erastus thinks: much harm would never have been done if witches had not goaded him into it.
He had not appeared in Samuels shape, if the Witch of Endor had let him alone; or represented those Serpents in Pharos presence, had not the Magicians urged him unto it: Nec morbos vel hominibus, vel brutis infligeret (Erastus maintains) si Sagæ quiescerent; Men and cattle might goe free, if the Witches would let him alone.	He would not have appeared in Samuel's shape if the witch of Endor had left him alone, or displayed those serpents before Pharaoh had the magicians not urged him to it.[2174] "Nor would he inflict diseases on people or animals," Erastus maintains, "if witches kept quiet." People and cattle might escape if witches would leave him alone.
Many deny Witches at all, or if there be any, they can do no harme; of this opinion is Wierus, lib. 3. cap. 53. de præstig. dæm. Austin Lerchemer a Dutch Writer, Biarmanus, Ewichius, Euwaldus, our Countrey-man Scot, with him in Horace,	Many deny that witches exist at all, or believe that, if they do exist, they can do no harm. Of this opinion are Weyer, On the Deceptions of Demons, book 3, chapter 53; Augustin Lercheimer, a German writer; Biarmannus, Ewichius, Euwaldus and our countryman Scot. Like the man in Horace, they greet with laughter —[2175]

[2173] Burton. Starred margin: "De Lamiis." On Witches.

[2174] Editor. The narratives are 1 Samuel 28 and Exodus 7. Burton interprets the apparition at Endor as the Devil in Samuel's shape and the Egyptian magicians' serpents as demonic displays. Those explanations are his reading of the biblical episodes.

[2175] Editor. "Dutch" could mean German, as it does here. Augustin Lercheimer is a name used by Hermann Witekind. Burton groups writers with differing objections to witch prosecution under a broad sceptical category; the list should not be taken as evidence that they all denied spirits or every kind of magic.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Somnia, terrores Magicos, miracula, sagas, Nocturnos Lemures, portentaque Thessala risu Excipiunt ——[2176]	Dreams, magic terrors, marvels, witches, Ghosts abroad at night, and Thessalian wonders— They greet them all with laughter.[2176]
Source page 54–55 They laugh at all such Stories, but on the contrary are most Lawyers, Divines, Physitians, Philosophers, Austin, Hemingius, Danæus, Chytræus, Zanchius, Aretius, &c. Delrio, Springer, Niderius lib. 5. Fornicar.[2177] Cuiatius, Bartolus, consil. 6. tom. 1. Bodine dæmonant. lib. 2. cap. 8. Godelman, Damhoderius, &c. Paracelsus, Erastus, erbanius, Camerarius, &c.	They laugh at all such stories; but most lawyers, theologians, physicians and philosophers take the opposite view: Augustine, Hemmingsen, Daneau, Chytraeus, Zanchi, Aretius, and so on; Delrio, Sprenger, Nider, book 5 of the Formicarius; Cujas, Bartolus, Legal Opinions, volume 1, opinion 6; Bodin, Demonomania, book 2, chapter 8; Godelmann, Damhouder, and others; Paracelsus, Erastus, Erbanius, Camerarius, and so on.[2178]
Source page 55 The parties by whom the Devil deals, may be reduced to these two, such as command him in shew at least, as Conjurers, and Magicians, whose detestable and horrid mysteries are contained in their book called Arbatell:[2179] dæmones enim advocati præsto sunt, seque exorcismis & conjurationibus quasi cogi patiuntur, ut miserum magorum genus in impietate detineant.	The people through whom the Devil operates may be reduced to two classes. First are those who command him, at least in appearance, such as conjurers and magicians, whose detestable and dreadful mysteries are contained in their book called Arbatel: “For demons appear when summoned and allow themselves to seem compelled by exorcisms and conjurations, so as to keep the wretched race of magicians in impiety.”

[2176] Editor. Horace, Epistles 2.2.208–209, supplies the catalogue; Burton changes the second-person question rides, “do you laugh?”, to the plural “they greet with laughter.” Thessaly was conventionally associated with witchcraft in classical literature. The modern verse preserves the list and its concluding gesture of laughter without imposing rhyme.

[2177] Burton. Starred margin: “Et quomodo venefici fiant enarrat.” He also explains how people become sorcerers.

[2178] Editor. Nider’s title is Formicarius, “The Ant-Hill”; the source prints Fornicar. The name printed “erbanius” is retained provisionally as Erbanius and requires identification. The original’s long sequence names authorities, not additional evidence from each work.

[2179] Burton. Starred margin: “De quo plura legas in Boissardo lib. 1. de præstig.” Read more about it in Boissard, On Deceptions, book 1.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or such as are commanded, as Witches, that deale ex parte implicite, or explicite, as the King[2180] hath well defined; many subdivisions there are, and many several species of Sorcerers, Witches, Inchanters, Charmers, &c.	The second class consists of those who are commanded, such as witches, who act through an implicit or explicit pact, as the King has aptly defined them.[2181] There are many subdivisions and many different kinds of sorcerers, witches, enchanters, charmers, and so forth.
They have been tolerated heretofore some of them; and Magick hath been publikely professed in former times, in Salamanca,[2182] Cracovia,[2183] and other places, though after censured by several Universities,[2184] and now generally contradicted, though practised by some still, maintained and excused, Tanquam res secreta quæ non nisi viris magnis & peculiari beneficio de Cœlo instructis communicatur (I use Boissardus[2185] his words)	Some of them have been tolerated in the past, and magic was publicly taught in former times at Salamanca, Kraków and elsewhere, though later condemned by several universities. It is now generally opposed, although some still practise, defend and excuse it "as a secret art communicated only to great men endowed with a special gift from heaven"—I use Boissard's words.
and so far approved by some Princes, Ut nihil ausi aggredi in politicis, in sacris, in consiliis, sine eorum arbitrio; they consult still with them, and dare indeed do nothing without their advise. Nero and Heliogabalus, Maxentius, and Julianus Apostata, were never so much addicted to Magick of old, as some of our modern Princes and Popes themselves are now adayes.	Some princes approve of them so thoroughly "that they dare undertake nothing in politics, religion or counsel without their judgment." They consult them continually and indeed dare do nothing without their advice. Nero and Elagabalus, Maxentius and Julian the Apostate, were never so addicted to magic in ancient times as some of our modern princes and even popes are nowadays.

[2180] Burton. Margin y: "Rex Jacobus Dæmonol. l. 1. c. 3." King James, Daemonologie, book 1, chapter 3.

[2181] Editor. The print reads "ex parte," literally "in part"; the context calls for ex pacto, "by a pact," and the modern column makes that provisional repair. King James VI and I's Daemonologie 1.3 contrasts magicians, whose spirits seem to serve them, with witches who serve spirits. His authority is part of Burton's argument.

[2182] Burton. Margin z: "An University in Spaine in old Castile."

[2183] Burton. Starred margin: "The chief Town in Poland."

[2184] Burton. Margin a: "Oxford and Paris, see finem P. Lumbardi." See the end of Peter Lombard.

[2185] Burton. Starred margin: "Præfat. de magis & veneficis. ib." Preface to On Magicians and Poisoners, in the same work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Erricus King of Sweden, had an inchanted Cap,[2186] by vertue of which, and some magicall murmur or whispering termes he could command spirits, trouble the ayre, and make the winde stand which way he would, insomuch that when there was any great winde or storme, the common people were wont to say, the King now had on his conjuring Cap. But such examples are infinite.	Eric, king of Sweden, had an enchanted cap. Through its power, and through some magical murmuring or whispered words, he could command spirits, disturb the air and make the wind blow whichever way he wished. Whenever there was a great wind or storm, the common people used to say that the king had his conjuring cap on. But such examples are endless.[2187]
That which they can do, is as much almost as the devil himself, who is still ready to satisfie their desires, to oblige them the more unto him. They can cause tempests, stormes, which is familiarly practised by Witches in Norwey, Island, as I have proved. They can make friends enemies, and enemies friends by philters; Turpes amores conciliare,[2188] enforce love,	They can do almost as much as the Devil himself, who is always ready to satisfy their desires and so bind them more firmly to him. They can raise tempests and storms, a familiar practice among witches in Norway and Iceland, as I have shown. By love potions they can turn friends into enemies and enemies into friends, “bring about shameful loves,” and compel affection.
tell any man where his friends are, about what employed, though in the most remote places; and if they will, Bring their sweet hearts to them by night, upon a Goats back flying in the ayre.[2189] Sigismund Scheretzius, part. 1. cap. 9. de spect. reports confidently, that he conferred with sundry such, that had been so carried many miles, and that he heard Witches themselves confess as much,	They can tell anyone where his friends are and what they are doing, even in the remotest places, and, if they wish, bring their sweethearts to them at night on the back of a goat flying through the air. Sigismund Scheretzius, On Apparitions, part 1, chapter 9, confidently reports that he spoke with several people who had been carried many miles in this way, and heard witches themselves confess as much.

[2186] Burton. Starred margin: “Rotatum Pileum habebat, quo ventos violentos cieret, aerem turbaret, & in quam partem, &c.” He had a cap which he turned to stir violent winds, disturb the air, and direct them whichever way, and so on.

[2187] Editor. Ericus is regularized as Eric. The enchanted cap belongs to the legendary northern material Burton collects; the narrative is preserved without treating the magical explanation as established history.

[2188] Burton. Margin b: “Erastus.”

[2189] Burton. Starred margin: “Ministerio hirci nocturni.” Through the service of a nocturnal goat.

Original text 1651	Modern English
hurt, and infect men and beasts, Vines, Corne, Cattle, Plants, make Women abortive, not to conceive, barren,[2190] men and women unapt and unable, married and unmarryed, fifty several wayes, saith Bodine lib. 2. c. 2. flie in the ayre, meet when and where they will, as Cicogna proves, & Lavat. de spect. part. 2. c. 17.	They can harm and infect people and animals, vines, grain, cattle and plants; cause women to miscarry, fail to conceive or become barren; and make men and women, married or unmarried, sexually incapable in fifty different ways, says Bodin, book 2, chapter 2. They can fly through the air and meet when and where they please, as Cicogna demonstrates, and Lavater in On Apparitions, part 2, chapter 17.
steale young children out of their cradles, ministerio dæmonum, and put deformed in their roomes, which we call Changelings, saith Scheretzius, part. 1. c. 6.[2191] make men victorious, fortunate, eloquent; & therefore in those ancient Monomachies and combats they were searched of old, they had no Magical charmes;[2192]	They can steal young children from their cradles "through the agency of demons" and put deformed ones in their places, whom we call changelings, says Scheretzius, part 1, chapter 6.[2193] They can make men victorious, fortunate and eloquent. For this reason, in those ancient single combats and duels, men were searched beforehand to make sure they had no magical charms.

[2190] Burton. Starred margin: "Steriles nuptos & inhabiles. vide Petrum de Palude lib. 4. distinct. 34. Paulum Guiclandum." Married people made sterile and incapable. See Peter of Palude, book 4, distinction 34; Paolo Grillando, whose name is printed Guiclandum here.

[2191] Burton. Starred margin: "Infantes matribus suffurantur, aliis suppositivis in locum verorum conjectis." They steal infants from their mothers, putting substitutes in the place of the true children.

[2192] Burton. Margin c: "Milles." The abbreviated author reference is retained.

[2193] Editor. The changeling story presents bodily difference through the historical belief that a child had been replaced by a supernatural substitute. The attribution of disability or difference to demonic exchange belongs to that belief, not to this edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 55–56 they can make stick frees,[2194] such as shall endure a Rapiers point, Musket shot, and never be wounded: of which reade more in Boissardus cap. 6. de Magia, the manner of the adjuration, and by whom tis made, where and how to be used in expeditionibus bellicis, præliis, duellis, &c. with many peculiar instances and examples;	They can make people proof against stabbing, able to withstand a rapier's point or a musket shot without being wounded.[2195] Read more about this in Boissard, On Magic, chapter 6: the form of the invocation, who makes it, and where and how it is to be used "in military expeditions, battles, duels," and so forth, with many particular instances and examples.
Source page 56 they can walk in fiery furnaces, make men feel no pain on the Wrack, aut alias torturas sentire; they can stanch blood, represent dead mens shapes,[2196] alter and turn themselves and others into severall formes, at their pleasures. Agaberta[2197] a famous Witch in Lapland, would do as much publickly to all spectators, Modò Pusilla, modò anus, modò procera ut quercus, modò vacca, avis, coluber, &c.	They can walk through fiery furnaces, make people feel no pain on the rack or under other tortures, stop bleeding, display the shapes of the dead, and change themselves and others into various forms at will. Agaberta, a famous witch in Lapland, would do as much openly before all spectators: "Now a little girl, now an old woman, now tall as an oak, now a cow, a bird, a snake," and so on.[2198]

[2194] Burton. Margin d: "D. Luther, in primum præceptum, & Leon. Varius lib. 1. de Fascino." Dr Luther, on the first commandment; and Leonardo Vairo, On Enchantment, book 1.

[2195] Editor. "Stick-free" means protected from stabbing or piercing. "Monomachies" are single combats. The searches in the preceding sentence were intended to detect protective charms before combat.

[2196] Burton. Margin e: "Lavat. Cicog." Lavater; Cicogna.

[2197] Burton. Starred margin: "Boissardus de Magis." Boissard, On Magicians.

[2198] Editor. The Latin "aut alias torturas sentire" literally means "or feel other tortures"; the English negative is carried across it in the modern rendering. Pusilla can mean a little or young girl; Burton's following gloss supplies "young." Both the Latin sequence and his expanded English list are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now young, now old, high, low, like a Cow, like a Bird, a Snake, and what not? she could represent to others what formes they most desired to see, shew them friends absent, reveal secrets, maxima omnium admiratione, &c. And yet for all this subtilty of theirs, as Lipsius well observes, Physiolog. Stoicor. lib. 1. cap. 17. neither these Magicians nor devils themselves, can take away Gold or Letters out of mine or Crassus Chest, & Clientelis suis largiri,	Now young, now old, tall, short, like a cow, a bird, a snake—what could she not become? She could display whatever forms people most wished to see, show them absent friends and reveal secrets, "to everyone's greatest astonishment," and so forth. Yet, for all their cunning, as Lipsius aptly observes in The Natural Philosophy of the Stoics, book 1, chapter 17, neither these magicians nor the devils themselves can take gold or letters out of my chest or Crassus's and "distribute them to their clients."[2199]
for they are base, poore, contemptible fellows most part; as Bodine[2200] notes, they can do nothing in Judicum decreta aut pœnas, in regum Concilia vel arcana, nihil in rem nummariam aut thesauros, they cannot give money to their Clients, alter Judges decrees, or Councels of Kings, these minuti Genii cannot do it, altiores Genii hoc sibi adservarunt, the higher powers reserve these things to themselves.	For they are mostly base, poor, contemptible fellows. As Bodin notes, they can do nothing "about judges' decrees or punishments, kings' counsels or secrets, money or treasures." They cannot give their clients money, change judges' decrees or alter kings' counsels. These "lesser spirits" cannot do it: "Higher spirits have reserved this for themselves"—the higher powers keep these matters in their own hands.

[2199] Editor. Crassus serves as a type of immense wealth. "Letters" means written communications or documents. Burton's concession limits supernatural power while preparing the distinction between ordinary magicians and exceptional figures.

[2200] Burton. Starred margin: "Dæmon. lib. 3. cap. 3." Demonomania, book 3, chapter 3.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now and then peradventure there may be some more famous Magicians like Simon Magus, Apollonius Tyaneus,[2201] Pasetes,[2202] Jamblicus, Odo de stellis,[2203] that for a time can build Castles in the aire, represent armies, &c.[2204] as they are said[2205] to have done, command wealth and treasure, feed thousands with all variety of meats upon a sudden,	Now and then, perhaps, there may be more celebrated magicians—Simon Magus, Apollonius of Tyana, Pasetes, Iamblichus, Odo de Stellis—who can for a time build castles in the air, display armies, and so on, as they are said to have done; command wealth and treasure; suddenly feed thousands with every variety of food;[2206]
protect themselves and their followers from all Princes persecutions, by removing from place to place in an instant, reveal secrets, future events, tell what is done in far Countries, make them appear that dyed long since, &c. and do many such miracles, to the worlds terror, admiration and opinion of Deity to themselves, yet the Devil forsakes them at last, they come to wicked ends, and rarò aut nunquam such Impostors are to be found.	protect themselves and their followers from every prince's persecution by moving instantly from place to place; reveal secrets and future events; tell what is happening in distant countries; make those long dead appear; and perform many similar miracles, terrifying and astonishing the world and winning a reputation as gods. Yet the Devil abandons them in the end, and they come to evil ends. Such impostors are found "rarely or never."

[2201] Burton. Starred margin: "Vide Philostratum vita ejus Boissardum de Magis." See Philostratus's life of him; Boissard, On Magicians.

[2202] Burton. Starred margin: "Vide Suidam de Paset." See the Suda on Pasetes. This reference stands lower in the margin without a clear corresponding star at Pasetes in the body; it is attached here by its named subject.

[2203] Burton. Starred margin: "Nubrigenses lege lib. 1. c. 19." Read William of Newburgh, book 1, chapter 19; the author's name is printed Nubrigenses.

[2204] Burton. An additional starred margin on page 56 reads "De Cruent. Cadaver." On the Bleeding Corpse. No unequivocal body anchor identifies its attachment. It is retained here beside the adjoining authorities rather than silently omitted; its precise reference remains unresolved.

[2205] Burton. Margin f: "Erastus. Adolphus Scribanius."

[2206] Editor. Odo de Stellis is the figure discussed by William of Newburgh in Historia rerum Anglicarum 1.19, also known as Eon de l'Étoile. Pasetes is accompanied by a Suda reference displaced in the margin. Another displaced reference, On the Bleeding Corpse, is retained separately because its exact anchor is uncertain.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The vulgar sort of them can work no such feats. But to my purpose, they can, last of all, cure and cause most diseases to such as they love or hate, & this of Melancholy[2207] amongst the rest. Paracelsus Tom. 4. de morbis amentium, Tract. 1. in express words affirmes; Multi fascinantur in melancholiam, many are bewitched into melancholy, out of his experience.	The ordinary sort can perform no such feats. But to return to my subject: lastly, they can cure and cause most diseases in those they love or hate, and melancholy among the rest. Paracelsus, On the Diseases of the Mentally Disturbed, volume 4, treatise 1, expressly affirms from his own experience: "Many are bewitched into melancholy"—many are driven into melancholy by witchcraft.
The same, saith Danæus lib. 3. de sortiariis, Vidi, inquit, qui Melancholicos morbos gravissimos induxerunt: I have seen those that have caused Melancholy in the most grievous manner, dryed up womens Paps, cured Gout, Palsie; this and Apoplexy, Falling-sickness, which no Physick could help, solo tactu, by touch alone.[2208]	Daneau says the same in On Sorcerers, book 3: "I have seen people who brought on the most grievous melancholic diseases." I have seen those who caused melancholy in its gravest form, dried up women's breast milk, cured gout and palsy—these, together with apoplexy and epilepsy, which no medicine could relieve—"by touch alone."[2209]

[2207] Burton. Margin g: "Virg. Æneid. 4. Incantatricem describens: Hæc se carminibus promittit solvere mentes / Quas velit, ast aliis duras immittere curas." Virgil, Aeneid 4, describing an enchantress: she promises by her spells to free whatever minds she wishes, but to inflict cruel anxieties on others.

[2208] Burton. Margin h: "Godelmannus cap. 7. lib. 1. nutricum mammas præsiccant, solo tactu podagram, Apoplexiam, Paralysin & alios morbos, quos medicina curare non poterat." Godelmann, book 1, chapter 7: they dry up nurses' breasts; by touch alone [cure] gout, apoplexy, paralysis and other diseases which medicine could not cure. The Latin's omitted verb is supplied from the body.

[2209] Editor. "Paps" means breasts; drying them up means stopping lactation. "Falling-sickness" is epilepsy. "Palsy" and "apoplexy" are historical symptom categories with wider and shifting meanings; the modern column does not impose an exact retrospective diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ruland in his 3. Cent. Cura 91. gives an instance of one David Helde a young man, who by eating Cakes which a Witch gave him, mox delirare cœpit, began to dote on a sudden, and was instantly mad: F. H. D. in Hildesheim,[2210] consulted about a Melancholy man, thought his disease was partly Magicall, and partly naturall, because he vomited pieces of iron and lead, and spake such Languages, as he had never been taught; but such examples are common in Scribanius, Hercules de Saxonia, and others.	Ruland, in his third Hundred Cures, case 91, gives the example of a young man, David Helde, who ate cakes a witch had given him and "soon began to rave": he suddenly lost his reason and immediately went mad. F. H. D., in Hildesheim, consulted about a melancholy man, thought the disease partly magical and partly natural, because the man vomited pieces of iron and lead and spoke languages he had never been taught. Such examples are common in Scribanius, Hercules of Saxony and others.[2211]
Source page 56–57 The means by which they work, are usually Charmes, Images, as that in Hector Boethius of King Duffe; characters stamped of sundry metals, and at such and such constellations, knots, amulets, words, Philters, &c. which generally make the parties affected, melancholy; as Monavius[2212] discourseth at large in an Epistle of his to Acolsius, giving instance in a Bohemian Baron that was so troubled by a Philter taken.	They usually work through charms; images, like that of King Duff in Hector Boece; signs stamped on various metals under particular constellations; knots, amulets, words, love potions, and so forth. These generally make the people affected melancholy, as Monavius explains at length in a letter to Acolsius, citing a Bohemian baron so afflicted after taking a love potion.[2213]

[2210] Burton. Margin i: "Factus inde Maniacus, spic. 3. fol. 147." Thereupon he became mad. Spicilegium 3, folio 147. The source image reads 3, not the OCR's 2.

[2211] Editor. "Dote" here means lose reason or become delirious. The initials F. H. D. are retained without speculative expansion. The printed marginal locator is Spicilegium 3, folio 147. The individual reports and identities remain unverified.

[2212] Burton. Margin k: "Omnia Philtra etsi inter se differant, hoc habent commune, quod hominem efficiant melancholicum epist. 231. Scholtzii." All love potions, however they differ, have this in common: they make a person melancholy. Letter 231 in Scholtz's collection.

[2213] Editor. The image of Duff is a magical likeness used to harm the Scottish king in Boece's narrative. "Characters" are magical signs or symbols; "philters" are love potions. The metal signs are made under chosen astrological configurations, not representations of the constellations themselves.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 57 Not that there is any power at all in those spels, charmes, characters, and barbarous words; but that the Devil doth use such meanes to delude them. Ut fideles inde magos (saith Libanius) in officio retineat, tum in consortium malefactorum vocet.[2214]	It is not that these spells, charms, signs and barbarous words have any power in themselves; the Devil uses such means to deceive them, "so that he may thereby keep magicians faithful in his service," says Libanius, "and then draw them into a fellowship of evildoers."[2215]

[2214] Burton. Starred margin: "De cruent. Cadaver." On the Bleeding Corpse.

[2215] Editor. "Barbarous words" means foreign or unintelligible formulae. Libavius, De cruentatione cadaverum (1594), p. 386, §295, says the Devil makes followers credit ceremonies and materials for his own deeds, keeping them loyal and drawing them into wrongdoing. Burton condenses the passage, adds "inde magos" to its Latin and rearranges the final words. The extra page-56 citation still lacks a secure anchor.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsect. 4. Stars a cause. Signes from Physiognomy, Metoposcopy, Chiromancy.	Subsection 4. The stars as a cause. Signs from physiognomy, metoposcopy and chiromancy.[2216]
Natural causes, are either Primary and Universal, or Secundary, and more Particular. Primary causes are the Heavens, Planets, Stars, &c. by their influence (as our Astrologers hold) producing this and such like effects. I will not here stand to discusse obiter, whether Stars be causes, or Signes; or to apologize for judicial Astrology.	Natural causes are either primary and universal, or secondary and more particular. Primary causes are the heavens, planets, stars, and so forth, which by their influence—as our astrologers maintain—produce this and similar effects. I will not pause here to discuss in passing whether stars are causes or signs, or to defend judicial astrology.[2217]
If either Sextus Empericus, Picus Mirandula, Sextus ab Heminga, Pererius, Erastus, Chambers, &c. have so far prevailed with any man, that he will attribute no vertue at all to the Heavens, or to Sun, or Moon, more then he doth to their signes at an Inne-keepers post, or tradesmans shop, or generally condemne all such Astrological Aphorismes approved by experience: I refer him to Bellantius, Pirovanus, Marascallerus, Goclenius, Sr Christopher Heidon, &c.	If Sextus Empiricus, Pico della Mirandola, Sixtus ab Hemminga, Pererius, Erastus, Chambers or the others have so persuaded anyone that he attributes no more power to the heavens, sun or moon than to their pictures on an innkeeper's signpost or a tradesman's shop, or indiscriminately condemns all such astrological rules confirmed by experience, I refer him to Bellantius, Pirovanus, Marascallerus, Goclenius, Sir Christopher Heydon, and the rest.
If thou shalt aske me what I think; I must answer, nam & doctis hisce erroribus versatus sum, they do incline, but not compel; no necessity at all: agunt non cogunt:[2218] and so gently incline, that a wise man may resist them; sapiens dominabitur astris: they rule us, but God rules them.	If you ask what I think, I must answer—for I too have been occupied with these learned errors—that they incline us but do not compel us: there is no necessity at all. "They act upon us; they do not force us." Their influence is so gentle that a wise man can resist it: "The wise man will master the stars." They rule us, but God rules them.

[2216] Editor. Physiognomy infers character or constitution from bodily appearance; metoposcopy reads the lines of the forehead; chiromancy reads the hand. Burton treats these as related to astrology. Their supposed diagnostic power belongs to the historical argument of this section.

[2217] Editor. Judicial astrology judges human dispositions and events from celestial configurations. Apologize means defend; vertue in the next sentence means effective power. Burton's distinction between causes and signs asks whether celestial bodies produce events or merely indicate them.

[2218] Burton. Margin m: "Astra regunt homines, & regit astra Deus." The stars govern people, and God governs the stars.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All this (methinks) Joh. de Indagine[2219] hath comprized in brief, Quæris à me quantum in nobis operantur astra? &c. Wilt thou know how far the stars work upon us? I say they do but incline, and that so gently, that if we will be ruled by reason, they have no power over us; but if we follow our own nature, and be led by sense, they do as much in us, as in brute beasts, and we are no better.	John of Indagine, I think, has briefly summed this all up: "You ask me how far the stars act upon us?" and so forth. Do you want to know how far the stars work upon us? I say that they merely incline us, and so gently that, if we let reason rule us, they have no power over us. But if we follow our own nature and let the senses lead us, they act upon us as much as upon brute beasts, and we are no better.
So that, I hope, I may justly conclude with Cajetan,[2220] Cœlum is vehiculum divinæ virtutis, &c. that the heaven is Gods instrument, by mediation of which he governs and disposeth these elementary bodies; or a great book, whose letters are the Stars, (as one cals it) wherein are written many strange things for such as can read, or an excellent harp, made by an eminent workman, on which, he that can but play, will make most admirable musick.[2221] But to the purpose.	So I hope I may rightly conclude with Cajetan that "the heavens are the vehicle of divine power": heaven is God's instrument, through which he governs and orders these bodies composed of the elements. Or it is a great book whose letters are the stars, as one writer calls it, containing many wonders for those who can read; or a fine harp, made by a master craftsman, on which anyone who knows how to play will produce marvellous music. But to the point.

[2219] Burton. Margin n: "Chirom. lib. Quæris à me quantum operantur astra? dico, in nos nihil astra urgere, sed animos proclives trahere: qui sic tamen liberi sunt, ut si ducem sequantur rationem, nihil efficiant, sin vero naturam, id agere quod in brutis fere." Book on chiromancy. You ask how far the stars act? I say they force nothing upon us but draw minds already inclined; these remain so free that, if they follow reason as guide, the stars accomplish nothing, but if they follow nature, the stars act almost as they do upon beasts.

[2220] Burton. Margin o: "Cœlum vehiculum divinæ virtutis, cujus mediante motu, lumine & influentia, Deus elementaria corpora ordinat & disponit. Th. de Vio. Cajetanus in Psa. 104." Heaven is the vehicle of divine power, through whose motion, light and influence God orders and disposes bodies composed of the elements. Thomas de Vio, Cajetan, on Psalm 104.

[2221] Burton. Margin p: "Mundus iste quasi lyra ab excellentissimo quodam artifice concinnata, quem qui norit mirabiles eliciet harmonias. J. Dee. Aphorismo 11." This world is like a lyre fashioned by a supreme craftsman; one who understands him will draw forth marvellous harmonies. John Dee, aphorism 11. The printed quem is retained; Burton's English turns the image towards playing the instrument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 57–58 Paracelsus[2222] is of opinion, that a Physitian without the knowledge of Stars, can neither understand the cause or cure of any disease, either of this, or Gout, not so much as Tooth-ache: except he see the peculiar geniture and Scheme of the party affected. And for this proper malady, he will have the principal and primary cause of it proceed from the Heaven, ascribing more to Stars then humors, & that the constellation alone many times, produceth melancholy, all other causes set apart.[2223] He gives instance in Lunatick persons, that are deprived of their wits by the Moones motion;	Paracelsus believes that a physician who does not know the stars can understand neither the cause nor the cure of any disease—this one, gout, or even toothache—unless he examines the particular birth configuration and astrological chart of the patient. For this specific illness, he insists that the chief and primary cause comes from heaven, giving the stars more weight than the humours: often the constellation alone produces melancholy, apart from every other cause. He cites people with lunacy, deprived of their reason by the moon's motion;[2224]

[2222] Burton. Margin q, continuing across the foot of page 57: "Medicus sine cœli peritia nihil est, &c. nisi genesim sciverit, ne tantillum poterit. lib. de podag." A physician without knowledge of the heavens is nothing; unless he knows the nativity, he will not be able to do even the smallest thing. Book on gout.

[2223] Burton. Margin r: "Constellatio in causa est: & influentia cœli morbum hunc movet, interdum omnibus aliis amotis. Et alibi. Origo ejus à Cœlo petenda est. Tr. de morbis amentium." The constellation is the cause, and heaven's influence brings on this disease, sometimes with all other causes removed. Elsewhere: its origin must be sought in heaven. Treatise on the diseases of the mentally disturbed.

[2224] Editor. Geniture is the celestial configuration at birth; scheme is its chart. Lunatick invokes a supposed link between disturbed reason and the moon, which the sentence explicitly asserts. The term is translated historically, without assigning a present-day diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 58 and in another place, referres all to the Ascendent, and will have the true and chief cause of it to be sought from the Stars. Neither is it his opinion only, but of many Galenists and Philosophers, though they not so stifly and peremptorily maintain as much. This variety of Melancholy symptomes, proceeds from the Stars, saith Melancthon:[2225] The most generous melancholy, as that of Augustus, comes from the conjunction of Saturne & Jupiter in Libra: the bad, as that of Catilines, from the meeting of Saturne and the Moon in Scorpio.	and elsewhere he attributes everything to the ascendant and insists that its true and chief cause must be sought in the stars. Nor is this his opinion alone: many Galenists and philosophers share it, though they maintain it less rigidly and dogmatically. This variety of melancholic symptoms comes from the stars, says Melanchthon. The noblest melancholy, such as Augustus's, comes from the conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter in Libra; the bad kind, such as Catiline's, from Saturn meeting the moon in Scorpio.[2226]
Jovianus Pontanus in his 10. book, and 13. Chap. de rebus cœlestibus, discourseth to this purpose at large. Ex atra bile varii generantur morbi, &c. many diseases proceed from black choler, as it shall be hot or cold; and though it be cold in its own nature, yet it is apt to be heated, as water may be made to boyle, and burn as bad as fire; or made cold as Ice: and thence proceed such variety of symptomes, some mad, some solitary, some laugh, some rage, &c.[2227]	Giovanni Pontano discusses this at length in On Heavenly Things, book 10, chapter 13. "Various diseases arise from black bile," and so forth: many diseases come from black bile according to whether it is hot or cold. Although naturally cold, it can readily be heated, just as water can be made to boil and burn as fiercely as fire, or be made as cold as ice. Hence the variety of symptoms: some people go mad, some seek solitude, some laugh, some rage, and so on.

[2225] Burton. Margin s: "Lib. de anima cap. de humorib. Ea varietas in Melancholia, habet cœlestes causas ☌ ♄ et ♃ in □ ☌ ♂ et ☾ in ♏." On the Soul, chapter on humours. This variety in melancholy has heavenly causes. The printed symbols indicate conjunction, Saturn and Jupiter, then a square, conjunction, Mars and the moon in Scorpio. This compressed formula differs from the body's Saturn–Jupiter in Libra and Saturn–moon in Scorpio; it is not silently reconciled.

[2226] Editor. The ascendant is the zodiacal degree rising at the eastern horizon. Augustus supplies an example of noble melancholy, Catiline of its destructive kind. The marginal symbol sequence is inconsistent with the English account; see Burton's note. The body's readings are retained.

[2227] Burton. Margin t: "Ex atra bile varii generantur morbi perinde ut ipsa multum calidi aut frigidi in se habuerit, quum utrique suscipiendo quam aptissima sit, tam etsi suapte natura frigida sit. Annon aqua sic afficitur a calore ut ardeat; et a frigore, ut in glaciem concrescat? et hæc varietas distinctionum, alii flent, rident, &c." Various diseases arise from black bile according as it contains much heat or cold, since it readily receives either, although naturally cold. Is not water so affected by heat that it burns, and by cold that it freezes into ice? Hence these different states: some weep, some laugh, and so on.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The cause of all which intemperance, he wil have chiefly & primarily proceed from the Heavens: from the position of Mars, Saturne, and Mercury.[2228] His Aphorismes be these, Mercury in any geniture, if he shall be found in Virgo, or Pisces his opposite signe, and that in the Horoscope, irradiated by those quartile aspects of Saturne or Mars, the childe shall be mad or melancholy.[2229]	He maintains that the cause of all this imbalance comes chiefly and primarily from the heavens: from the positions of Mars, Saturn and Mercury. His rules are these: if, in any birth chart, Mercury is found in Virgo or its opposite sign, Pisces, and at the ascendant, receiving the rays of Saturn or Mars in a square aspect, the child will be mad or melancholy.[2230]
Again, He that shall have Saturne or Mars, the one culminating, the other in the 4. house, when he shall be borne, shall be melancholy, of which he shall be cured in time, if Mercury behold them.[2231] If the Moon be in conjunction or opposition at the birth time with the Sun, Saturne or Mars, or in a quartile aspect with them, (è malo cœli loco, Leovitius adds) many diseases are signified, especially the Head and Brain is like to be mis-affected with pernicious humors, to be melancholy, lunatick, or mad,[2232]	Again: anyone born with Saturn and Mars, one at the midheaven and the other in the fourth house, will be melancholy, but will in time recover if Mercury is in aspect with them.[2233] If at birth the moon is in conjunction or opposition with the sun, Saturn or Mars, or in a square aspect with them—"from an unfavourable place in the heavens," Leovitius adds—many diseases are indicated, especially harmful humours affecting the head and brain, producing melancholy, lunacy or madness.

[2228] Burton. Margin u: "Hanc ad intemperantiam gignendam plurimum confert ♂ et ♄ positus, &c." The position of Mars and Saturn contributes greatly to producing this imbalance, and so forth.

[2229] Burton. Margin x: "☿ Quoties alicujus genitura in ♍ et ♓ adverso signo positus, horoscopum partiliter tenuerit, atque etiam a ♂ vel ♄ □ radio percussus fuerit, natus ab insania vexabitur." Whenever Mercury in a nativity, placed in Virgo and its opposite sign Pisces, occupies the ascendant by exact degree and is struck by a square ray from Mars or Saturn, the native will be afflicted by madness. The compressed Latin uses et, and, where the English body gives the alternative Virgo or Pisces.

[2230] Editor. Here Horoscope means the ascendant, rather than the whole chart. Quartile is a square aspect, an angular separation of 90 degrees; a conjunction is a meeting in zodiacal longitude, an opposition a separation of 180 degrees. Intemperance here means imbalance in qualities, not excessive drinking.

[2231] Burton. Margin y: "Qui ♄ et ♂ habet, alterum in culmine, alterum imo cœlo, cum in lucem venerit, melancholicus erit, à qua sanabitur, si ☿ illos irradiavit." Whoever at birth has Saturn and Mars, one at the midheaven and the other at the bottom of the heavens, will be melancholy, from which he will recover if Mercury has cast its rays upon them.

[2232] Burton. Margin z, continuing at the foot of page 58: "Hac configuratione natus, Aut Lunaticus, aut mente captus." One born under this configuration will be either lunatic or deprived of reason.

[2233] Editor. Culminating means at the upper meridian or midheaven; the fourth house corresponds to the lower angle, opposite it. The body prints Saturne or Mars, though "the one … the other" and the marginal et require the pair. The modern column therefore reads Saturn and Mars. Behold means be in astrological aspect.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cardan adds, quartâ lunâ natos Eclipses, Earthquakes. Garcæus and Leovitius will have the chief Judgment to be taken from the Lord of the geniture, or when there is an aspect betwixt the Moon and Mercury, and neither behold the Horoscope, or Saturne and Mars shall be Lord of the present conjunction or opposition in Sagittary or Pisces, of the Sun or Moon, such persons are commonly Epileptick, dote, Dæmoniacal, Melancholy:	Cardan adds those born on the fourth day of the moon, eclipses and earthquakes.[2234] Garcaeus and Leovitius hold that the chief judgement must be drawn from the ruler of the birth chart. Or, when the moon and Mercury are in aspect and neither is in aspect with the ascendant, or Saturn and Mars govern the current conjunction or opposition of the sun or moon in Sagittarius or Pisces, such people are commonly epileptic, deranged, demon-possessed or melancholy.[2235]
but see more of these Aphorismes in the above-named Pontanus. Garcæus cap. 23. de Jud. genitur. Schoner. lib. 1. cap. 8. which he hath gathered out of Ptolomy,[2236] Albubater, and some other Arabians, Junctine, Ranzovius, Lindhout, Origan, &c. but these men you will reject peradventure, as Astrologers, and therefore partial Judges; then hear the testimony of Physitians, Galenists themselves,	But see more of these rules in the Pontano already mentioned; Garcaeus, On Judging Nativities, chapter 23; Schöner, book 1, chapter 8, which he compiled from Ptolemy, Albubater and other Arab writers; Junctinus, Rantzau, Lindhout, Origanus, and so forth. Perhaps you will reject these men as astrologers and therefore biased judges. Then listen to the testimony of physicians, Galenists themselves.

[2234] Editor. This is an elliptical list in the source. Quartâ lunâ natos means those born on the fourth lunar day; eclipses and earthquakes follow without a verb specifying their connection. The modern text preserves the list rather than supplying an unsupported causal claim.

[2235] Editor. The Lord of the geniture is the planet judged to govern the nativity. Compare Ptolemy, Tetrabiblos III.14, on the moon, Mercury, the horizon, Saturn and Mars in disorders of the soul. That passage speaks of the moon and Mercury being unrelated; Burton here prints an aspect between them. No silent correction has been made. His historical categories overlap and are not modern diagnoses.

[2236] Burton. Margin a: “Ptolomæus centiloquio, & quadripartito tribuit omnium melancholicorum symptomata syderum influentiis.” Ptolemy, in the Centiloquium and Quadripartitum, attributes all melancholic symptoms to stellar influences.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Carto[2237] confesseth the influence of Stars to have a great hand to this peculiar disease, so doth Jason Pratensis, Lonicerius præfat. de Apoplexiâ, Ficinus, Fernelius, &c. P. Cnemander[2238] acknowledgeth the Stars an universal cause, the particular from parents, and the use of the six non-natural things. Baptista Port. mag. l. 1. c. 10, 12, 15. will have them causes to every particular individuum.	Carto acknowledges that the stars' influence plays a major part in this particular disease, as do Jason Pratensis, Lonicerius in his preface to On Apoplexy, Ficino, Fernel, and others. P. Cnemander acknowledges the stars as a universal cause, while particular causes arise from parents and the management of the six non-natural things.[2239] Giambattista Porta, Magic, book 1, chapters 10, 12 and 15, holds that they are causes affecting every single individual.
Source page 58–59 Instances and examples, to evince the truth of those Aphorisms, are common amongst those Astrologian Treatises. Cardan in his 37. geniture, gives instance in Math. Bolognius. Camerar. hor. natalit. centur. 7. genit. 6, & 7. of Daniel Gare, and others; but see Græcus cap. 33. Luc. Gauricus. Tract. 6. de Azemenis, &c.	Cases and examples offered as proof of these rules abound in those astrological treatises. Cardan, in his thirty-seventh nativity, gives the example of Math. Bolognius; Camerarius, in his seventh hundred birth horoscopes, nativities 6 and 7, gives Daniel Gare and others. But see Græcus, chapter 33, and Luca Gaurico, treatise 6, On Bodily Defects, and so forth.[2240]

[2237] Burton. Margin b: "Arte Medica. accedunt ad has causas affectiones syderum. Plurimum incitant & provocant influentiæ cœlestes. Velcurio lib. 4. cap. 15." Medical Art: the influences of the stars are added to these causes. Heavenly influences greatly stimulate and provoke. Velcurio, book 4, chapter 15. The body prints Carto, retained here without emendation.

[2238] Burton. Margin c: "Hildesheim spicel. 2. de mel." Hildesheim, second gleaning, on melancholy.

[2239] Editor. The six non-naturals are air; food and drink; exercise and rest; sleep and waking; retention and evacuation; and the emotions. In this medical vocabulary they are conditions of life that can preserve or disturb health, rather than unnatural things. Carto and P. Cnemander remain as printed pending identification.

[2240] Editor. A geniture can mean either a birth configuration or its written judgement. Azemeni or azimene are astrological terms associated with bodily defects. The abbreviated names and particular cases in this catalogue still require comparison with the cited editions; Græcus is retained as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 59 the time of this melancholy is, when the significators of any geniture are directed according to Art, as the Hor: Moon, Hylech, &c. to the hostile beames or termes of ♄ and ♂ especially, or any fixed Star of their nature, or if ♄ by his revolution, or transitus, shall offend any of those radical promissors in the geniture.	This melancholy occurs when the significators in a birth chart—the ascendant, moon, hyleg, and so forth—are directed according to the art towards hostile rays or terms, especially those of Saturn and Mars, or towards any fixed star of their nature; or when Saturn, by its revolution or transit, adversely affects any of those natal promissors in the chart.[2241]
Other signes there are taken from Physiognomy, Metoposcopy, Chiromancy, which because Joh. de Indagine, and Rotman the Landgrave of Hassia his Mathematician, not longe since in his Chiromancy; Baptista Porta in his celestial Physiognomy, have proved to hold great affinity with Astrology, to satisfie the curious, I am the more willing to insert.	Other signs are drawn from physiognomy, metoposcopy and chiromancy. John of Indagine, Rothmann—the Landgrave of Hesse's mathematician—in his recent Chiromancy, and Giambattista Porta in his Celestial Physiognomy have shown these to be closely related to astrology. I am therefore more willing to include them to satisfy the curious.
The general notions Physiognomers[2242] give, be these; Black colour, argues natural melancholy; so doth leanness, hirsuitness, broad veines, much hair on the browes, saith Gratanarolus[2243] cap. 7. and a little Head, out of Aristotle, high sanguine, red colour shewes head melancholy; they that stutter and are bald, will be soonest melancholy, (as Avicenna supposeth) by reason of the drynes of their brains,	The general principles physiognomists give are these: a dark complexion indicates natural melancholy, as do thinness, hairiness, prominent veins and bushy eyebrows, says Gratarolo in chapter 7; and, following Aristotle, a small head. A deep, ruddy complexion indicates melancholy of the head. Those who stutter and are bald will most readily become melancholy, Avicenna supposes, because their brains are dry.[2244]

[2241] Editor. Significators are chart points used to represent the matter judged; the hyleg is a planet or point assigned to signify life. Direction is a calculated advance used to time events; promissors are the natal positions or aspects that promise those events. Terms are subdivisions of zodiacal signs assigned to planets. Revolution and transit concern later celestial positions compared with the nativity. Compare Lilly, Christian Astrology, III, p. 527 and chapters on directions. The printed planet symbols are expanded in the modern column.

[2242] Burton. Margin d: "Joh. de Indag. cap. 9. Montaltus cap. 22." John of Indagine, chapter 9; Montalto, chapter 22.

[2243] Burton. Margin e: "Caput parvum qui habent, cerebrum & spiritus plerumque angustos, facile incident in Melancholiam rubicundi. Ætius Idem Montaltus c. 21. è Galeno." Those with small heads generally have a confined brain and spirits; ruddy people readily fall into melancholy. Aëtius; likewise Montalto, chapter 21, from Galen. The compressed punctuation is retained; the relation of rubicundi to the preceding clause is uncertain.

[2244] Editor. Natural melancholy here refers to the ordinary melancholic humour or constitution; head melancholy is a medical category located chiefly in the head. The supposed links with complexion, head size, stuttering and baldness are the physiognomists' claims, reproduced by Burton.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but he that will know more of the several signes of humors and wits out of Physiognomy, let him consult with old Adamantus and Polemus, that comment, or rather paraphrase upon Aristotles Physiognomy, Baptista Porta's four pleasant books, Michael Scot de secretis naturæ, John de Indagine, Montaltus, Antony Zara. anat. ingeniorum. sect. 1. memb. 13. & lib. 4.	Anyone wishing to learn more about the various signs of humours and mental capacities supplied by physiognomy should consult the ancient Adamantius and Polemon, who comment—or rather paraphrase—upon Aristotle's Physiognomy; Giambattista Porta's four entertaining books; Michael Scot, On the Secrets of Nature; John of Indagine; Montalto; and Antonio Zara's Anatomy of Minds, section 1, member 13, and book 4.
Chiromancy hath these Aphorismes to foretel melancholy. Tasneir. lib. 5. cap. 2. who hath comprehended the sum of John de Indagine: Tricassus, Corvinus, and others in his book, thus hath it; The Saturnine line going from the Rascetta through the hand, to Saturnes mount, and there intersected by certain little lines, argues melancholy;[2245] so if the vital and natural make an acute angle.	Chiromancy has these rules for predicting melancholy. Taisnier, book 5, chapter 2, who has gathered into his book the substance of John of Indagine, Tricassus, Corvinus and others, puts it thus: the line of Saturn, running from the wrist crease through the hand to the mount of Saturn, and crossed there by certain little lines, indicates melancholy. So does an acute angle between the life line and the natural line.[2246]

[2245] Burton. Margin f: "Saturnina à Rascetta per mediam manum decurrens, usque ad radicem montis Saturni, à parvis lineis intersecta, arguit melancholicos. Aphoris. 78." The Saturnine line, running from the wrist crease through the middle of the hand to the root of Saturn's mount, crossed by little lines, indicates melancholy people. Aphorism 78.

[2246] Editor. Rascetta is the wrist crease or bracelet line; Saturn's mount is the area below the middle finger. Vital, natural and hepatic are traditional names for lines used in palmistry; hepatic means associated with the liver. The traditional names are retained without imposing a modern palm-reading system on them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Aphorisme 100. The Saturnine, Epatick and natural lines, making a grosse triangle in the hand, argue as much; which Goclenius cap. 5. Chiros. repeats verbatim out of him. In general they conclude all, that if Saturnes mount be full of many small lines & intersections such men are most part melancholy, miserable and full of disquietnesse, care and trouble, continually vexed with anxious and bitter thoughts, alway sorrowful, fearful, suspitious; they delight in husbandry, buildings, pooles, Marshes, springs, woods, walkes, &c.[2247]	Aphorism 100: the Saturnine, hepatic and natural lines, forming a large triangle in the hand, indicate the same. Goclenius, Chiromancy, chapter 5, repeats this word for word. In general, they all conclude that if the mount of Saturn is covered with many small lines and crossings, such people are mostly melancholy, miserable and full of uneasiness, anxiety and trouble, continually tormented by anxious and bitter thoughts, always sorrowful, fearful and suspicious. They delight in farming, buildings, pools, marshes, springs, woods, walks, and so on.
Thaddæus Haggesius in his Metoposcopia, hath certain Aphorisms derived from Saturnes lines in the fore-head, by which he collects a melancholy disposition; and Baptista Porta[2248] makes observations from those other parts of the body, as if a spot be over the spleen; or in the nailes, if it appear black, it signifieth much care, grief, contention, and Melancholy;[2249]	Thaddeus Hagecius, in his Metoposcopy, gives certain rules drawn from the lines of Saturn in the forehead, from which he infers a melancholic disposition. Giambattista Porta makes observations from other parts of the body: for example, a spot over the spleen, or a black spot appearing in the nails, signifies much anxiety, grief, conflict and melancholy.

[2247] Burton. Margin g: “Agitantur miseriis, continuis inquietudinibus, neque unquam à solicitudine liberi sunt, anxie affliguntur amarissimis intra cogitationibus, semper tristes, suspitiosi, meticulosi: cogitationes sunt, velle agrum colere, stagna amant & paludes, &c. Jo. de Indagine lib. 1.” They are harassed by miseries and continual unrest, never free from anxiety, inwardly tormented by bitter thoughts, always sad, suspicious and fearful. Their thoughts turn to cultivating the land; they love pools and marshes, and so on. John of Indagine, book 1.

[2248] Burton. Margin h: “Cœlestis Physiognom. lib. 10.” Celestial Physiognomy, book 10.

[2249] Burton. Margin i: “Cap. 14. lib. 5. Idem maculæ in unguibus nigræ, lites, rixas, melancholiam significant, ab humore in corde tali.” Book 5, chapter 14. The same author: black spots in the nails signify lawsuits, quarrels and melancholy, from a humour of this kind in the heart.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The reason he refers to the humors, and gives instance in himself, that for seven years space he had such black spots in his nailes, and all that while was in perpetual Law-sutes, controversies for his inheritance, fear, loss of honor, banishment, grief, care, &c. and when his miseries ended, the black spots vanished. Cardan in his book de libris propriis, tels such a story of his own person, that a little before his sons death, he had a black spot, which appeared in one of his nailes; and dilated it self as he came nearer to his end.	He attributes the cause to the humours and cites himself as an example: for seven years he had such black spots in his nails, and throughout that time was caught in continual lawsuits, disputes over his inheritance, fear, loss of honour, banishment, grief, anxiety, and so forth. When his miseries ended, the black spots vanished. Cardan, in his book On His Own Books, tells a similar story about himself: shortly before his son's death, a black spot appeared in one of his nails and grew larger as his son approached his end.[2250]
Source page 59–60 But I am overtedious in these toyes, which howsoever, in some mens too severe censures, they may be held absurd and ridiculous, I am the bolder to insert, as not borrowed from circumforanean Rogues and Gipsies, but out of the writings of worthy Philosophers, and Physitians, yet living some of them, and religious Professors in famous Universities, who are able to patronize that which they have said, and vindicate themselves from all cavillers and ignorant persons.	But I have dwelt too long on these trifles. Though some people, judging too severely, may call them absurd and ridiculous, I include them more boldly because I have borrowed them from the writings of worthy philosophers and physicians—some still alive—and devout professors at famous universities, rather than from roving rogues and Gypsies. These men can defend what they have said and vindicate themselves against all quibblers and ignorant critics.[2251]

[2250] Editor. Porta's and Cardan's experiences are offered as corroborating anecdotes. The wording about approaching "his end" refers to Cardan's son; the modern text makes that reference explicit. These particular passages have not yet been collated against the cited works.

[2251] Editor. Circumforanean means roaming marketplaces or fairs. Burton's dismissal of "Gipsies" draws on an ethnic stereotype concerning Roma people and fortune-telling. His appeal is to the scholarly and religious status of his sources, despite calling the subject toyes, or trifles.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 60 Subsect. 5. Old age a cause	Subsection 5. Old age as a cause
Secundary peculiar causes efficient, so called in respect of the other precedent, are either congenitæ, internæ, innatæ as they terme them, inward, innate, inbred; or else outward and adventitious, which happen to us, after we are borne: congenite or borne with us, are either natural, as old age, or præter naturam (as Fernelius[2252] cals it) that distemperature, which we have from our Parents seed, it being an hereditary disease.	Secondary, particular efficient causes—so called in relation to the preceding causes—are either "congenital, internal, innate," as they term them: inward, native, inborn; or else outward and acquired, arising after birth. Those congenital or born with us are either natural, such as old age, or "contrary to nature," as Fernel calls it: the disordered constitution we inherit from our parents' seed, since this is a hereditary disease.[2253]
The first of these, which is natural to all, and which no man living can avoid, is old age,[2254] which being cold and drie, and of the same qualitie as Melancholy is, must needs cause it, by diminution of spirits and substance, and increasing of adust humors; Therefore Melancthon[2255] avers out of Aristotle, as an undoubted truth, Senes plerunque delirasse in senecta, that old men familiarly dote, ob atram bilem, for black choler, which is then superabundant in them:	The first of these, natural to everyone and unavoidable by any living person, is old age. Being cold and dry, and thus of the same quality as melancholy, it must necessarily cause it by diminishing the spirits and bodily substance and increasing the burnt humours. Accordingly, Melanchthon, following Aristotle, asserts as an unquestionable truth that "old people generally lose their reason in old age": they commonly become confused "because of black bile," which is then excessively abundant in them.[2256]

[2252] Burton. Margin b: "Lib. 1. Path. cap. 11." Pathology, book 1, chapter 11.

[2253] Editor. An efficient cause is an agency that produces an effect. Burton classifies old age as inborn because the capacity to age belongs to our nature, even though old age itself comes later. Præter naturam marks an abnormal condition within this medical scheme; seed is reproductive material.

[2254] Burton. Margin c: "Venit enim properata malis inopina senectus: et dolor ætatem jussit inesse meam. Boethius met. 1 de consol. Philos." Unexpected old age has come, hastened by troubles, and grief has bidden my age be in me. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy, poem 1. The last word is meam in this printing; compare the Editor's note.

[2255] Burton. Margin d: "Cap. de humoribus, lib. de Anima." On the Soul, chapter on humours.

[2256] Editor. These claims follow humoral medicine: melancholy and old age share the qualities cold and dry, while adust humours have supposedly been overheated or burnt. They are not equivalent to a modern account of ageing. In the Boethius note, Consolation I, poem 1, lines 9–10 has suam, not the printed meam: grief has forced its own age upon the speaker. Burton's divergent marginal reading is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and Rhasis that Arabian Physitian in his Cont. lib. 1. cap. 9. cals it a necessary and inseparable accident, to all old and decrepit persons.[2257] After 70 years (as the Psalmist saith) all is trouble and sorrow;[2258] and common experience confirmes the truth of it in weak and old persons, especially in such as have lived in action all their lives, had great imployment, much business, much command, and many servants to over-see, and leave off ex abrupto;	Rhazes, that Arab physician, in his Comprehensive Book, book 1, chapter 9, calls it a necessary and inseparable condition of all old and frail people. After seventy years, as the Psalmist says, all is trouble and sorrow.[2259] Common experience confirms this in weak and elderly people, especially those who have led active lives, held important positions, conducted much business, exercised great authority and supervised many servants, and then stop abruptly;
as Charls the fift[2260] did to King Philip, resigne up all on a sudden; they are overcome with melancholy in an instant: or if they do continue in such courses, they dote at last, (senex bis puer) and are not able to manage their estates through common infirmities incident in their age;	as Charles V did in yielding to King Philip, they suddenly give everything up, and melancholy overwhelms them at once. Or, if they continue in such activities, they eventually lose their reason —"an old man is twice a child"—and can no longer manage their affairs because of the ordinary infirmities of their age.

[2257] Burton. Margin e: "Necessarium accidens decrepitis, et inseparabile." A necessary and inseparable condition of the decrepit.

[2258] Burton. Starred margin: "Psa. 90. 10." Psalm 90:10.

[2259] Editor. Psalm 90:10 gives a lifespan of seventy years, or eighty with strength, and describes its labour and sorrow. Burton compresses this into a claim about the years after seventy. Accident is a condition or attribute, not an unforeseen mishap.

[2260] Burton. Margin f: "Meteran. Belg. hist. lib. 1." Van Meteren, History of the Low Countries, book 1.

Original text 1651	Modern English
full of ache, sorrow and grief, Children again, dizards, they Carle many times as they sit, and talk to themselves, they are angry, waspish, displeased with every thing, suspitious of all, wayward, covetous, hard, (saith Tully)[2261] selfe-willed, superstitious, selfe-conceited, braggers and admirers of themselves, as Balthasar Castalio[2262] hath truly noted of them.	Full of aches, sorrow and grief, children again, fools, they often behave sullenly as they sit and talk to themselves.[2263] They are angry, irritable, displeased with everything, suspicious of everyone, contrary, greedy and hard, says Cicero;[2264] stubborn, superstitious, conceited, boastful and admiring of themselves, as Baldassare Castiglione has truly observed.
This natural infirmity is most eminent in old women, and such as are poor, solitary, live in most base esteem and beggery, or such as are Witches; Insomuch that Wierus,[2265] Baptista Porta, Ulricus Molitor, Edwicus, do refer all that witches are said to do, to Imagination alone, and this humor of melancholy.	This natural infirmity is most conspicuous in old women, especially those who are poor, live alone, are held in the lowest esteem and live in beggary, or those who are witches. So much so that Weyer, Giambattista Porta, Ulrich Molitor and Edwicus attribute everything witches are said to do solely to imagination and this humour of melancholy.[2266]

[2261] Burton. Margin g: “Sunt morosi, anxii, et iracundi et difficiles senes, si quærimus, etiam avari. Tull de senectute.” Old people are ill-tempered, anxious, irascible and difficult; if we look into it, greedy too. Cicero, On Old Age.

[2262] Burton. Margin h: “Lib. 2. de Aulico. Senes avari, morosi, jactabundi, philauti, deliri, superstitiosi, suspitiosi, &c.” The Courtier, book 2. Old people are greedy, ill-tempered, boastful, self-loving, doting, superstitious, suspicious, and so forth. The body repeats anchor g at Castiglione; this h belongs to that citation.

[2263] Editor. Carle is used as a verb: to behave like a churl, that is, rudely or sullenly; compare Webster’s 1828 dictionary, carle. The modern column renders it “behave sullenly.” Dizards means fools or simpletons. Burton’s catalogue combines infirmity with hostile moral characterizations of old people.

[2264] Editor. Cicero, On Old Age 65, introduces these complaints only to answer that they are faults of character, not of old age. Burton’s quotation stops before that qualification. Tully is Marcus Tullius Cicero.

[2265] Burton. Unlettered citation below margin h: “Lib. 3 de Lamiis, cap. 17. et 18.” Literally, On Witches, book 3, chapters 17 and 18. Provisionally assigned to Weyer in the following sentence; the scan gives no matching body letter. The work intended by this abbreviated title, and its chapter numbering, remain unverified.

[2266] Editor. The argument returns to the preceding witchcraft debate. Here the writers attribute alleged feats to disordered imagination, linking suspicion of witchcraft with old age, poverty and isolation. This is Burton’s characterization of their positions; the individual references have not all been independently verified. Edwicus remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 60–61 And whereas it is controverted, whether they can bewitch cattle to death, ride in the ayre upon a Coulstaffe out of a Chimney-top, transforme themselves into Cats, Dogs, &c. translate bodies from place to place, meet in companies, and dance, as they do, or have carnal copulation with the Devil, they ascribe all to this redundant melancholy, which domineers in them, to somniferous potions,[2267] and naturall causes, the Devils policy.	And whereas it is disputed whether they can bewitch cattle to death, ride through the air out of a chimney on a carrying pole, transform themselves into cats, dogs and so on, transport bodies from place to place, meet in groups and dance as they do, or have sexual intercourse with the Devil, these writers attribute it all to the excessive melancholy that rules them, to sleep-inducing potions and natural causes, and to the Devil's cunning.[2268]
Source page 61 Non lædunt omnino (saith Wierus) aut quid mirum faciunt (de Lamiis lib. 3. cap. 36.) ut putatur, solam vitiatam habent phantasiam; they do no such wonders at all, only their Braines are crazed.[2269] They think they are Witches, and can do hurt, but do not.[2270]	"They do no harm at all," says Weyer, On Witches, book 3, chapter 36, "nor perform any wonder, as people suppose; their imagination alone is impaired." They perform no such wonders at all; their minds are merely disordered. They think they are witches and can do harm, but do not.

[2267] Burton. Margin k: "Solanum, opium, lupi adeps, lac asini &c. sanguis infantum, &c." Nightshade, opium, wolf's fat, ass's milk, infants' blood, and so on. These are ingredients alleged in the historical account.

[2268] Editor. A coulstaff is a pole used for carrying a tub or similar load. Translate here means transport. These explanations still allow the Devil a deceptive role; the contrast is between imagined feats and deeds supposedly performed, not a complete rejection of supernatural agency.

[2269] Burton. Margin l: "Corrupta est iis ab humore Melancholico phantasia. Nymanus." Their imagination is corrupted by the melancholic humour. Nyman.

[2270] Burton. Margin m: "Putant se lædere quando non lædunt." They think they do harm when they do not.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But this opinion Bodine, Erastus, Danæus, Scribanius, Sebastian Michaelis, Campanella de Sensu rerum lib. 4. cap. 9. Dandinus[2271] the Jesuit, lib. 2. de Animâ explode; Cicogna[2272] confutes at large. That Witches are melancholy, they deny not, but not out of corrupt phantasie alone, so to delude themselves and others, or to produce such effects.	But Bodin, Erastus, Daneau, Scribanius, Sébastien Michaëlis, Campanella in On the Sense of Things, book 4, chapter 9, and the Jesuit Dandini in On the Soul, book 2, reject this opinion; Cicogna refutes it at length. They do not deny that witches are melancholy, but deny that an impaired imagination alone can so deceive themselves and others or produce such effects.

[2271] Burton. Starred margin: “Qui hæc in Imaginationis vim referre conati sunt, aut atræ bilis, inanem prorsus laborem susceperunt.” Those who have tried to attribute these things to the power of imagination or black bile have undertaken a wholly fruitless labour.

[2272] Burton. Margin n: “Lib. 3. cap. 4. omnif. mag.” Omnifaria magia, book 3, chapter 4.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsect. 6. Parents a cause by propagation.	Subsection 6. Parents as a cause through inheritance.
That other inward inbred cause of Melancholy, is our temperature, in whole or part, which we receive from our Parents, which Fernelius[2273] cals Præter naturam, or unnatural, it being an hereditary disease; for as he justifies, Quale parentum maxime patris semen obtigerit, tales evadunt similares spermaticæque partes, quocunque etiam morbo Pater quum generat tenetur, cum semine transfert in Prolem:[2274]	The other inward, inborn cause of melancholy is the constitution, wholly or partly, that we receive from our parents. Fernel calls it "contrary to nature," or unnatural, since it is a hereditary disease. As he maintains: "As is the seed of the parents, especially the father, so become the uniform tissues and parts formed from the seed; whatever disease the father suffers when he begets a child, he passes on with the seed to his offspring."[2275] such as the temperature of the father is, such is the sons, and look what disease the father had when he begot him, his son will have after him, and is as well inheritour of his infirmities, as of his lands.[2276] And where the complexion and constitution of the father is corrupt, there (saith Roger Bacon)[2277] the complexion and constitution of the son must needs be corrupt, and so the corruption is derived from the father to the son.	As the father's constitution is, so is the son's; whatever disease the father had when he fathered him, the son will have after him, inheriting his infirmities as surely as his lands. Where the father's temperament and constitution are corrupt, says Roger Bacon, the son's temperament and constitution must likewise be corrupt, and so the corruption passes from father to son.

[2273] Burton. Starred margin: "Lib. 1. cap. 11. path." Pathology, book 1, chapter 11.

[2274] Burton. Margin o: "Ut arthritici Epilep. &c." As with the gouty, epileptics, and so forth.

[2275] Editor. Temperature means the balance of qualities constituting the body. In Galenic terminology, similar parts are relatively uniform tissues; spermatic parts are those thought to develop from reproductive seed. These are historical accounts of generation, not terms of modern genetics. The sweeping statement that a father transmits whatever disease he has remains Fernel's claim as quoted by Burton.

[2276] Burton. Margin p: "Ut filii non tam possessionum quam morborum hæredes sint." So that children are heirs not so much of possessions as of diseases.

[2277] Burton. Margin q: "Epist. de secretis artis et naturæ c. 7. nam in hoc quod patres corrupti sunt, generant filios corruptæ complexionis, et compositionis, et filii eorum eadem de causa se corrumpunt, et sic derivatur corruptio à patribus ad filios." Letter on the Secrets of Art and Nature, chapter 7. Because fathers are corrupt, they beget children of corrupt temperament and structure; their children corrupt themselves for the same reason, and thus corruption passes from fathers to children.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now this doth not so much appear in the composition of the Body, according to that of Hippocrates, in habit, proportion, scarres, and other lineaments;[2278] but in manners and conditions of the Minde,	Now this appears less in the body's structure—according to the saying of Hippocrates—in build, proportions, scars and other features, than in the mind's manners and dispositions:
Et patrum in natos abeunt cum semine mores.	And with the seed, fathers' ways pass to their sons.
Seleucus had an anchor on his thigh, so had his posterity, as Trogus records l. 15. Lepidus in Pliny l. 7. c. 17. was purblinde, so was his son. That famous family of Ænobarbi, were known of old and so surnamed from their red beards, the Austrian lip, and those Indians flat noses are propagated, the Bavarian chin, and goggle eyes amongst the Jews, as Buxtorfius[2279] observes;	Seleucus had an anchor-shaped mark on his thigh, and so did his descendants, as Trogus records in book 15. Lepidus, in Pliny, book 7, chapter 17, had poor eyesight, and so did his son. The famous family of the Ahenobarbi were known in antiquity, and took their surname, from their red beards.[2280] The Austrian lip and those Indians' flat noses are inherited, as are the Bavarian chin and prominent eyes among Jews, as Buxtorf observes.[2281]

[2278] Burton. Margin s: "Non tam (inquit Hippocrates) gibbos et cicatrices oris et corporis habitum agnoscis ex iis, sed verum incessum gestus, mores, morbos, &c." You recognize in them, says Hippocrates, not so much humps, facial scars and bodily build as, rather, their gait, gestures, character, diseases, and so forth. The printed sed verum is retained.

[2279] Burton. Margin t: "Synagog. Jud." The Jewish Synagogue.

[2280] Editor. The Seleucus story is in Justin's epitome of Pompeius Trogus, XV.4.5–9, as part of a legend of descent from Apollo. Suetonius, Nero 1, similarly tells how the bronze-red beard gave the Ahenobarbi their family name and recurred in their descendants. These are ancient exemplary narratives used here as evidence of inheritance.

[2281] Editor. Austrian lip alludes to the conspicuous lip or jaw associated with the Habsburg dynasty. Burton places family traits beside broad ethnic stereotypes, including the anti-Jewish claim attributed to Buxtorf. Such generalizations are preserved as part of his historical argument, without treating them as biological descriptions of whole populations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
their voyce, pace, gesture, lookes is likewise derived with all the rest of their conditions and infirmities; such a mother, such a daughter; their very affections Lemnius contends to follow their seed, and the malice & bad conditions of children are many times wholly to be imputed to their parents;[2282] I need not therefore make any doubt of Melancholy, but that it is an hereditary disease.	Their voice, gait, gestures and looks are likewise passed down, with all their other qualities and infirmities: like mother, like daughter. Lemnius maintains that their very emotions follow their seed, and that children's malice and bad dispositions must often be blamed entirely on their parents. I therefore need have no doubt that melancholy is a hereditary disease.
Source page 61–62 Paracelsus[2283] in express words affirmes it lib. de morb. amentium To. 4. Tr. 1. so doth Crato[2284] in an Epistle of his to Monavius. So doth Bruno Seidelius in his book de morbo incurab. Montaltus proves cap. 11. out of Hippocrates and Plutarch, that such hereditary dispositions are frequent, & hanc (inquit) fieri reor ob participatam melancholiam intemperantiam (speaking of a patient) I think he became so by participation of Melancholy.	Paracelsus expressly affirms it in On the Diseases of the Mentally Disturbed, volume 4, treatise 1; so does Crato in a letter to Monavius, and Bruno Seidel in his book On Incurable Disease. Montalto, chapter 11, argues from Hippocrates and Plutarch that such hereditary dispositions are common. Speaking of a patient, he says: "I believe this comes about from an inherited melancholic imbalance." I think he became so by sharing in melancholy.[2285]

[2282] Burton. Margin u, continued across the foot of page 61: "Affectus parentum in fœtus transeunt, et puerorum malicia parentibus imputanda, lib. 4. cap. 3. de occult. nat. mirac." Parents' dispositions pass into their offspring, and children's malice is to be blamed on their parents. On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 4, chapter 3.

[2283] Burton. Margin x: "Ex Pituitosis pituitosi, ex biliosis biliosi, ex Lienosis et melancholicis melancholici." From phlegmatic parents come phlegmatic children; from bilious parents, bilious children; from those with spleen disorders and melancholy, melancholy children.

[2284] Burton. Margin y on page 62: "Epist. 174. in Scoltz. nascitur nobiscum illa aliisque & unà cum parentibus habemus malum hunc assem. Jo. Pelesius lib. 2. de cura humanorum affectuum." Letter 174 in Scholtz. It is born with us, and together with our parents and others we possess this bad penny. Jo. Pelesius remains unidentified; the printed reference is retained: book 2, On the Treatment of Human Affections.

[2285] Editor. The 1651 scan clearly prints melancholiam intemperantiam. The modern version conjecturally reads melancholicam intemperantiam, "a melancholic imbalance", with participatam referring to an inherited constitution. Burton's English gloss is retained. This grammatical repair is not a verified reading from Montalto; direct collation is still required.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 62 Daniel Sennertus lib. 1. part. 2. cap. 9. will have his melancholy constitution derived not only from the father to the son, but to the whole familie sometimes; Quandoque totis familiis hereditativam. Forestus[2286] in his medicinal observations, illustrates this point, with an example of a merchant his Patient, that had this infirmity by inheritance; so doth Rodericus à Fonseca, Tom. 1. consult. 69. by an instance of a young man that was so affected ex matre melancholica, had a melancholy Mother, & victu melancholico, and bad diet together.	Daniel Sennert, book 1, part 2, chapter 9, maintains that this melancholic constitution passes not only from father to son but sometimes through the whole family: “Sometimes hereditary in entire families.” Forestus, in his Medical Observations, illustrates the point with a merchant, his patient, who had inherited this infirmity. So does Rodrigo de Fonseca, volume 1, consultation 69, with the case of a young man affected “through a melancholy mother”—he had a melancholy mother—“and a melancholy-producing diet,” a bad diet as well.
Lodovicus Mercatus, a Spanish Physitian, in that excellent Tract, which he hath lately written of hereditary diseases Tom. 2. oper. lib. 5. reckons up Leprosie, as those Gaibots[2287] in Gascony, hereditary Lepers, Pox, Stone, Gout, Epilepsie, &c. Amongst the rest, this and Madness after a set time comes to many, which he cals a miraculous thing in nature, and sticks for ever to them as an incurable habit.	Luis Mercado, a Spanish physician, in the excellent treatise he has recently written on hereditary diseases, Works, volume 2, book 5, lists leprosy—as among those Gaibots in Gascony, hereditary lepers—pox, stone, gout, epilepsy, and so forth.[2288] Among the rest, melancholy and madness come upon many people after a certain time—something he calls a marvel of nature—and remain with them for ever as an incurable condition.

[2286] Burton. Margin z: “Lib. 10. observat. 15.” Book 10, observation 15.

[2287] Burton. Margin a: “Maginus Geog.” Maginus, Geography.

[2288] Editor. Gaibots is retained as printed for the community Burton describes in Gascony. His label “hereditary lepers” is part of that stigmatizing historical account, not a diagnosis established here. Pox generally denotes the great pox or syphilis in this context; stone denotes urinary calculi. The claimed inheritance of all these diseases reflects the medical theory being reported.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And that which is more to be wondered at, it skips in some families the father, and goes to the son, or takes every other, and sometimes every third in a lineall descent, and doth not alwayes produce the same, but some like, and a symbolizing disease.[2289] These secundary causes hence derived, are commonly so powerful, that (as Wolphius[2290] holds) sæpe mutant decreta syderum, they do often alter the primary causes, and decrees of the heavens.	More astonishing still, in some families it skips the father and passes to the son, or affects every second and sometimes every third generation in the direct line of descent. It does not always produce the same disease, but a similar or corresponding one. These secondary causes, derived in this way, are commonly so powerful that, as Wolphius holds, "they often change the decrees of the stars": they often alter the primary causes and the decrees of heaven.
For these reasons belike the Church and common-wealth, humane and divine laws, have conspired to avoid hereditary diseases, forbidding such marriages as are any whit allyed; and as Mercatus adviseth all families, to take such, si fieri possit quæ maximè distant natura, and to make choice of those that are most differing in complexion from them; if they love their own, and respect the common good.	Presumably for these reasons, Church and state, human and divine law, have united to prevent hereditary diseases by forbidding marriages between people related in any degree. Mercado advises every family to choose partners, "if possible, whose natures differ most": to select those whose constitutions differ most from their own, if they love their families and care about the common good.[2291]

[2289] Burton. Margin b: "Sæpe non eundem, sed similem producit effectum, & illæso parente transit in nepotem." It often produces not the same effect but a similar one, and, leaving the parent unaffected, passes to a grandchild.

[2290] Burton. Margin c: "Dial. præfix. genituris Leovitii." Dialogue prefixed to Leovitius's nativities.

[2291] Editor. Burton proposes a medical rationale for restrictions on marriages between relatives and reports Mercado's preference for spouses of differing bodily constitutions. His description of divine and human law is a historical generalization, not a precise account of any one jurisdiction or a present-day recommendation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And sure, I think, it hath been ordered by Gods especial providence, that in all ages there should be (as usually there is) once in 600. years,[2292] a transmigration of Nations, to amend and purifie their blood, as we alter seed upon our land; and that there should be as it were an inundation of those Northern Goths and Vandals, and many such like people which came out of that Continent of Scandia, and Sarmatia (as some suppose) and over-ran as a deluge, most part of Europe & Africk,	Indeed, I think God's special providence has ordained that in every age there should be—as there usually is—once in six hundred years, a migration of nations to improve and purify their blood, just as we change the seed sown on our land. Hence the flood, as it were, of those northern Goths and Vandals, and many similar peoples who came from the lands of Scandinavia and Sarmatia, as some suppose, and swept like a deluge over most of Europe and Africa,[2293]
to alter for our good, our complexions, which were much defaced with hereditary infirmities, which by our lust and intemperance we had contracted. A sound generation of strong and able men were sent amongst us, as those Northern men usually are, innocuous, free from riot, and free from diseases; to qualifie and make us as those poor naked Indians are generally at this day;	to change for the better our constitutions, badly damaged by the hereditary infirmities we had contracted through lust and intemperance. A healthy race of strong, able men was sent among us, such as those northern men generally are: harmless, free from excess and free from disease, to temper us and make us like those poor naked Indians generally are today;

[2292] Burton. Margin d: "Bodin. de rep. cap. de periodis reip." Bodin, On the Commonwealth, chapter on the cycles of states.

[2293] Editor. Scandia is Scandinavia; Sarmatia is an ancient name for a broad region of eastern Europe and western Asia. Burton interprets migration through providence, bodily constitution and agricultural seed renewal. The six-hundred-year cycle and the imagined purification of peoples belong to that argument, rather than to an established historical or biological pattern.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and those about Brasile as a late Writer observes;[2294] in the Isle of Maragnan, free from all hereditary diseases, or other contagion, whereas without help of Physick they live commonly 120 years or more; as in the orchades and many other places. Such are the common effects of temperance, and intemperance, but I will descend to particulars, and shew by what means, and by whom especially this Infirmity is derived unto us.	and like the people around Brazil, as a recent writer observes, on the island of Maranhão: free from all hereditary diseases and other contagion, commonly living for a hundred and twenty years or more without medicine, as in the Orkneys and many other places.[2295] Such are the usual effects of temperance and intemperance. But I will turn to particulars and show by what means, and especially through whom, this infirmity is passed down to us.
Source page 63 Filii ex senibus nati, raro sunt firmi temperamenti, old mens children are seldom of a good temperament, as Scoltzius supposeth, consult. 177, and therefore most apt to this disease; and as [2296]Levinus Lemnius farther addes, old men beget most part wayward, peevish, sad, melancholy sons, and seldom merry.	"Children born to old men seldom have a sound constitution." Old men's children seldom have a good temperament, as Scoltzius supposes in consultation 177, and are therefore particularly prone to this disease. As Levinus Lemnius further adds, old men generally father wayward, irritable, sad, melancholy sons, and seldom cheerful ones.[2297]

[2294] Burton. Margin e: "Claudius Abaville Capuchion in his voyage to Maragnan. 1614. cap. 45. Nemo fere ægrotus, sano omnes & robusto corpore, vivunt annos, 120, 140. sine Medicina. Idem Hector Boethius de insulis Orchad. & Damianus à Goes de Scandia." Claude d'Abbeville, a Capuchin, in his voyage to Maranhão, 1614, chapter 45. Almost no one is ill; all have healthy, robust bodies and live 120 or 140 years without medicine. Likewise Hector Boece on the Orkney Islands, and Damião de Góis on Scandinavia.

[2295] Editor. Maranhão is in northeastern Brazil; Orchades are the Orkney Islands. Burton's reports of freedom from disease and lifespans of 120–140 years are preserved as travellers' claims. The cited passages in d'Abbeville, Boece and Góis remain to be collated; the figures have not been independently established.

[2296] Burton. Printed f: Lib. 4. c. 3. de occult. nat. mir. Tetricos plerunque filios senes progenerant, & tristes, rarius exhilaratos. "On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 4, chapter 3. Old men generally beget gloomy, sad sons, more rarely cheerful ones."

[2297] Editor. Temperament here means the body's supposed balance of humours, not simply personality. Burton is continuing the subsection on parental transmission begun in Block 032. The sweeping hereditary judgements in this passage belong to his historical medical framework.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He that begets a childe on a full stomack, will either have a sick childe, or a crazed son (as [2298]Cardan thinks) contradict. med. lib. 1. contradict. 18. or if the parents be sick or have any great pain of the head, or megrim, headach, ([2299]Hieronimus Wolfius doth instance in a childe of Sebastian Castalio's)	A man who fathers a child on a full stomach will have either a sick child or a mentally impaired son, as Cardan thinks in Medical Contradictions, book 1, contradiction 18. The same applies if the parents are ill or have a severe pain in the head, a migraine or headache; Hieronymus Wolf gives the example of a child of Sebastian Castellio.
or if a drunken man get a childe, it will never likely have a good brain, as Gellius argues, lib. 12. cap. 1. Ebrii gignunt Ebrios, one drunkard begets another, saith [2300]Plutarch, symp. lib. 1. quest. 5. whose sentence [2301]Lemnius approves, l. 1. c. 4. Alsarius Crutius Gen. de qui sit med. cent. 3. fol. 182. Macrobius lib. 1. Avicenna lib. 3. Fen. 21. Tract. 1. cap. 8 and Aristotle himself sect. 2. prob. 4.	Or if a drunken man fathers a child, the child is unlikely ever to have a sound brain, as Gellius argues in book 12, chapter 1. "Drunkards beget drunkards": one drunkard fathers another, says Plutarch, Table Talk, book 1, question 5.[2302] Lemnius endorses this judgement in book 1, chapter 4; so do Alsarius Crutius, Gen. de qui sit med., century 3, folio 182; Macrobius, book 1; Avicenna, book 3, fen 21, tract 1, chapter 8; and Aristotle himself, section 2, problem 4.
foolish, drunken, or hair-brain women, most part bring forth children like unto themselves, morosos & languidos, and so likewise he that lies with a menstruous woman.	Foolish, drunken or flighty women generally bear children like themselves, "ill-tempered and feeble"; and the same applies to a man who sleeps with a menstruating woman.

[2298] Burton. Printed g: Coitus super repletionem pessimus, & filii qui tum gignuntur, aut morbosi sunt, aut stolidi. "Intercourse after repletion is very bad; children conceived then are either sickly or stupid."

[2299] Burton. Printed h: Dial. præfix. Leovitio. "Dialogue prefixed to Leovitius."

[2300] Burton. Printed i: L. de e. liberis. "Book on the education of children."

[2301] Burton. Printed k: De occult. nat. mir. temulentæ & stolidæ mulieres liberos plerunque producunt sibi similes. "On the Hidden Wonders of Nature. Drunken and foolish women generally produce children like themselves."

[2302] Editor. The body cites Table Talk 1.5, but the margin points to The Education of Children, now generally treated as pseudo-Plutarch. Its section 3 advises sobriety at conception and gives Diogenes' remark about a youth's drunken father. Gellius, Attic Nights 12.1, discusses breastfeeding and a nurse's character, including drunkenness; that chapter does not directly establish the same claim about paternal drunkenness. Burton's references are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Intemperantia veneris, quam in nautis præsertim insectatur [2303]Lemnius, qui uxores ineunt, nulla menstrui decursus ratione habita, nec observato interlunio, præcipua causa est, noxia, pernitiosa, concubitum hunc exitialem ideò, & pestiferum vocat. Rodoricus à Castro Lusitanus,[2304] detestantur ad unum omnes medici,	Sexual intemperance is a principal cause—harmful and destructive—which Lemnius attacks especially in sailors who have intercourse with their wives without taking account of the menstrual flow or observing the time of the new moon. The Portuguese Roderigo de Castro therefore calls such intercourse deadly and pestilential; all physicians, without exception, condemn it.[2305]
tum & quartâ lunâ concepti, infelices plerunque & amentes, deliri, stolidi, morbosi, impuri, invalidi, tetrâ lue sordidi, minimè vitales, omnibus bonis corporis atque animi destituti: ad laborem nati, si seniores, inquit Eustathius, ut Hercules, & alii.	Moreover, those conceived on the fourth day of the moon are generally unfortunate and mad, delirious, stupid, sickly, unclean, weak, tainted with a foul disease, scarcely capable of surviving, and deprived of every good quality of body and mind. If they live to grow older, says Eustathius, they are born to toil, like Hercules and others.[2306]

[2303] Burton. Printed l: Lib. 2. c. 8. de occult. nat. mir. Good Master Schoolmaster do not English this. “On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 2, chapter 8. Good Master Schoolmaster, do not translate this into English.”

[2304] Burton. Printed asterisk: De nat. mul. lib. 3. cap. 4. “On the Nature of Women, book 3, chapter 4.” The margin supplies the reference to Castro; its anchor is not apparent in the body and is placed here beside his name.

[2305] Editor. Burton switches into Latin for the discussion of intercourse during menstruation. The modern column translates it in full, including his later refusal to translate it. The wording combines menstrual and lunar timing. Its claims of uncleanness, disease and damaged offspring express the cited historical theories, not an established causal account.

[2306] Editor. Quartâ lunâ means the fourth day of the moon. The adage Quarta luna nati in Manuzio’s expurgated Adagia (1603), p. 63, associates an unlucky birth date with Hercules’ laborious life and cites Eustathius on Iliad 2. It concerns birth, not conception. This narrows the source trail without locating Eustathius directly. The rendering of si seniores as surviving to an older age remains provisional.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2307]Judæi maximè insectantur fœdum hunc & immundum apud Christianos Concubitum, ut illicitum abhorrent, & apud suos prohibent; & quod Christiani toties leprosi, amentes, tot morbidi, impetigines, alphi, psoræ, cutis & faciei decolorationes, tam multi morbi Epidemici, acerbi, & venenosi sint, in hunc immundum concubitum rejiciunt, & crudeles in pignora vocant, qui quartâ lunâ profluente hac mensium illuvie concubitum hunc non perhorrescunt.	The Jews particularly attack this foul and unclean intercourse among Christians: they abhor it as unlawful and forbid it among themselves. They blame this unclean intercourse for Christians' frequent leprosy and madness, their many sick people, skin eruptions, white patches, scabs, discolorations of skin and face, and so many widespread, painful and poisonous diseases. They call those men cruel to their offspring who do not recoil from such intercourse on the fourth day of the moon, while this menstrual filth is flowing.[2308]
Damnavit olim divina Lex, & morte mulctavit hujusmodi homines, Lev. 18. 20. & inde nati, siqui deformes aut mutili, pater dilapidatus, quod non contineret ab [2309]immunda muliere.	The divine Law formerly condemned such men and punished them with death—Leviticus 18 and 20. If any children born from such intercourse were deformed or maimed, the father was stoned because he had not kept away from an unclean woman.[2310]

[2307] Burton. Printed m: Buxtorphius l. 31. Synag. Jud. Ezek. 18. "Buxtorf, l. 31, Jewish Synagogue; Ezekiel 18." The printed locator l. 31 is retained without correction.

[2308] Editor. Burton reports a polemical account of Jewish objections through the Christian writers cited in his margins. It should not be treated as an unmediated statement of Jewish practice. The disease names are broad historical categories: alphi denotes white skin patches and psoræ scabby eruptions; modern diagnoses would be misleading.

[2309] Burton. Printed n: Drusius obs. lib. 3. cap. 20. "Drusius, Observations, book 3, chapter 20."

[2310] Editor. The printed Lev. 18. 20. is read as chapters 18 and 20. Leviticus 18:19 prohibits intercourse during menstrual uncleanness; 20:18 says both parties are to be cut off from their people. Neither verse specifies stoning a father because a child is born with a deformity. Burton adds the Drusius reference at that claim, which requires separate collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Gregorius Magnus, petenti Augustino nunquid apud [2311]Britannos hujusmodi concubitum toleraret, severe prohibuit viris suis tum misceri fæminas in consuetis suis menstruis, &c. I spare to English this which I have said.	When Augustine asked Gregory the Great whether he should tolerate such intercourse among the Britons, Gregory strictly forbade women to have intercourse with their husbands during their customary monthly periods, and so on. I refrain from putting what I have said into English.[2312]
Another cause some give, inordinate Diet, as if a man eat Garlick, Onyons, fast overmuch, study too hard, be over-sorrowful, dull, heavy, dejected in minde, perplexed in his thoughts, fearful, &c. their children (saith [2313]Cardan subtil. lib. 18.) will be much subject to madness and melancholy:	Some give another cause: an unregulated diet. If a man eats garlic or onions, fasts too much, studies too hard, is excessively sorrowful, dull, heavy, depressed in spirit, troubled in his thoughts, fearful, and so on, his children, says Cardan in On Subtlety, book 18, will be very prone to madness and melancholy.
for if the spirits of the brain be fusted, or mis-affected by such meanes, at such a time, their children will be fusted in the brain; they will be dull, heavy, timerous, discontented all their lives.	For if the spirits of the brain are tainted or disordered by such means at the time of conception, their children's brains will be tainted too: they will be dull, heavy, timid and discontented all their lives.[2314]

[2311] Burton. Printed o: Beda. Eccl. hist. lib. 1. c. 27. respons. 10. "Bede, Ecclesiastical History, book 1, chapter 27, response 10."

[2312] Editor. Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.27, preserves Gregory's answers to Augustine of Canterbury. The consulted edition places the menstruation discussion under Augustine's eighth question, not Burton's response 10. Gregory prohibits intercourse during menstruation but permits church attendance and communion. Burton quotes the prohibition without these latter qualifications; the cause of the numbering difference remains unverified.

[2313] Burton. Printed p: Nam spiritus cerebri si tum male afficiantur, tales procreant, & quales fuerint affectus, tales filiorum: ex tristibus tristes, ex jucundis jucundi nascuntur, &c. "For if the spirits of the brain are then adversely affected, they produce offspring of that sort; whatever the parents' dispositions were, so are their children's: sad children are born from sad parents, cheerful ones from cheerful parents, and so on."

[2314] Editor. Fusted means musty or tainted, applied figuratively to the brain and its spirits; compare Webster's historical entry. The spirits are the subtle bodily substances of older physiology.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some are of opinion and maintain that paradox, or problem, that wise men beget commonly fools; Suidas gives instance in Aristarchus the Grammarian, duos reliquit filios Aristarchum & Aristachorum, ambos stultos, and which [2315]Erasmus urgeth in his Moria, fools beget wise men.	Some hold and defend the paradox, or proposition, that wise men generally father fools. Suidas gives the example of Aristarchus the grammarian: “He left two sons, Aristarchus and Aristachorus, both fools.” And, as Erasmus argues in his Praise of Folly, fools father wise men.[2316]
Source page 63–64 Card. subt. l. 12. gives this cause, Quoniam spiritus sapientum ob studium resolvuntur, & in cerebrum feruntur à corde: because their natural spirits are resolved by study, and turned into animal; drawn from the heart, and those other parts to the brain,	Cardan, On Subtlety, book 12, gives this explanation: “Because the spirits of wise men are dissipated by study and carried from the heart into the brain.” Their natural spirits are broken down by study and changed into animal spirits, drawn from the heart and the other parts into the brain.[2317]
Source page 64 Lemnius subscribes to that of Cardan, and assignes this reason, Quod persolvant debitum languide & obscitanter, unde fœtus à parentum generositate desciscit: they pay their debt (as Paul cals it) to their wives remissely, by which meanes their Children are weaklings, and many times ideots and fooles.	Lemnius agrees with Cardan and gives this reason: “Because they discharge the debt listlessly and inattentively, so that their offspring fall away from their parents’ excellence.” They pay their debt to their wives, as Paul calls it, without vigour; consequently their children are weaklings, and often idiots and fools.[2318]

[2315] Burton. Printed q: Fol. 129. mor. Socrates Children were fooles. S. b. l. “Folio 129 of the Moria. Socrates’ children were fools.” The final abbreviation S. b. l. is retained as printed; its expansion is unresolved.

[2316] Editor. Suidas names the Byzantine lexicon now generally called the Suda. In Erasmus’s Praise of Folly, the personified Folly mocks learned fathers who produce foolish children, citing Cicero and Socrates. This supports that half of Burton’s claim, not by itself the converse that fools beget wise children. Burton turns satire into physiological evidence; the marginal S.b.l. remains unresolved.

[2317] Editor. Natural and animal spirits are distinct categories in Galenic physiology. Animal here concerns the functions of sensation and movement, not nonhuman animals. Burton compresses their proposed conversion and diversion during study.

[2318] Editor. The marital debt alludes to 1 Corinthians 7:3, which states a reciprocal duty between spouses. The claim about weak offspring is the medical author’s addition. A raised r appears before Lemnius on page 64, but no corresponding r marginal item is visible on that page; no missing note has been invented.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some other causes are given, which properly pertain, and do proceed from the mother: If she be over-dul, heavy, angry, peevish, discontented, and melancholy, not only at the time of conception, but even all the while she carries the childe in her wombe (saith Fernelius path. l. 1. 11.) her son wil be so likewise affected, and worse, as [2319]Lemnius adds, l. 4. c. 7.	Other causes are given that belong specifically to the mother and originate in her. If she is excessively dull, heavy, angry, irritable, discontented and melancholy, not only at conception but throughout the time she carries the child in her womb, says Fernel, Pathology, book 1, chapter 11, her son will suffer the same affections, and worse, as Lemnius adds in book 4, chapter 7.
if she grieve overmuch, be disquieted, or by any casualty be affrighted and terrified by some fearful object, heard or seen, she endangers her childe, and spoiles the temperature of it; for the strange imagination of a woman, workes effectually upon her infant, that as Baptista Porta proves Physiog. cœlestis l. 5. c. 2. she leaves a mark upon it, which is most especially seen in such as prodigiously long for such & such meats,[2320] the childe wil love those meates, saith Fernelius, and be addicted to like humors:	If she grieves too much, is troubled, or happens to be frightened and terrified by some fearful thing she hears or sees, she endangers her child and spoils its humoral balance. A woman's extraordinary imagination acts powerfully upon her infant, so that, as Baptista Porta demonstrates in Celestial Physiognomy, book 5, chapter 2, she leaves a mark upon it.[2321] This is particularly apparent in women who have extraordinary cravings for particular foods: the child will love those foods, says Fernel, and be inclined to similar tastes.

[2319] Burton. Printed s: De occult. nat. mir. "On the Hidden Wonders of Nature."

[2320] Burton. Unlettered marginal item: Pica morbus mulierum. "Pica, a disorder of women."

[2321] Editor. This is the historical theory of maternal impressions: a pregnant woman's sights, fears or cravings were thought to imprint corresponding features on her unborn child. The following anecdotes illustrate that theory, rather than establish their alleged causes. Harelip is Burton's term for a cleft upper lip.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2322]If a great-bellied woman see a Hare, her Childe will often have an Harelip, as we call it. Garcæus de Judiciis geniturarum cap. 33. hath a memorable example of one Thomas Nickell borne in the City of Brandeburge, 1551. [2323]that went reeling and staggering all the dayes of his life, as if he would fall to the ground, because his mother being great with childe saw a drunken man reeling in the street.	If a pregnant woman sees a hare, her child will often have what we call a harelip. Garcæus, On Judgements of Nativities, chapter 33, gives a memorable example: Thomas Nickell, born in the city of Brandenburg in 1551, reeled and staggered all his life as though about to fall to the ground, because his mother, while pregnant, saw a drunken man staggering in the street.
Such an other I finde in Martin Wenrichius com: de ortu monstrorum c. 17. I saw (saith he) at Wittenberge in Germany, a Citizen that looked like a carkass;[2324] I asked him the cause, he replyed, His Mother when she bore him in her wombe, saw a carkasse by chance, and was so sore affrighted with it, that ex eo fœtus ei assimilatus, from a ghastly impression the childe was like it.	I find another such case in Martin Weinrich's Commentary on the Origin of Monstrosities, chapter 17. "I saw," he says, "a citizen at Wittenberg in Germany who looked like a corpse. I asked him why. He replied that his mother, while carrying him in her womb, happened to see a corpse and was so badly frightened that 'as a result the child was made like it.'" That ghastly impression made the child resemble the corpse.

[2322] Burton. Printed t: Baptista Porta loco præd. Ex leporum intuitu pleriq. infantes edunt bifido superiore labello. "Baptista Porta, at the place cited. After looking at hares, many produce infants with a divided upper lip." The printed abbreviation pleriq. is retained; the implied subject is not specified.

[2323] Burton. Printed u: Quasi mox in terram collapsurus, per omne vitam incedebat cum mater gravida ebrium hominem sic incedentem viderat. "He walked all his life as though about to collapse to the ground, since his pregnant mother had seen a drunken man walking in that way." The apparently printed omne vitam is retained despite its irregular case ending.

[2324] Burton. Printed asterisk: Civem facie cadaverosa, qui dixit, &c. "A citizen with a corpse-like face, who said, and so on."

Original text 1651	Modern English
So many several wayes are we plagued and punished for our fathers defaults; in so much that as Fernelius truly saith, [2325]It it is the greatest part of our felicity to be wel-born, and it were happy for humane kinde, if only such parents as are sound of body and minde, should be suffered to marry.	In so many different ways are we afflicted and punished for our fathers' failings, so that, as Fernel truly says, the greatest part of our happiness is to be well born; and it would be fortunate for humankind if only parents sound in body and mind were allowed to marry.[2326]
An husbandman wil sow none but the best & choisest seed upon his land, he wil not rear a Bull or an Horse, except he be right shapen in all parts, or permit him to cover a Mare, except he be well assured of his breed; we make choice of the best Rams for our sheep, reare the neatest Kine, and keep the best dogs. Quanto id diligentius in procreandis liberis observandum? And how careful then should we be in begetting of our children?	A farmer will sow only the best and choicest seed on his land. He will not rear a bull or a horse unless every part is properly formed, or let a horse cover a mare unless he is sure of its breeding. We choose the best rams for our sheep, rear the finest cattle and keep the best dogs. "How much more carefully should this be observed in producing children?" How careful, then, should we be in fathering our children?
In former times some Countries have been so chary in this behalf, so stern, that if a childe were crooked or deformed in body or minde, they made him away;[2327] so did the Indians of old by the relation of Curtius, & many other wel-governed commonwealths, according to the discipline of those times.	In former times some countries were so scrupulous in this matter, so severe, that if a child was crooked or deformed in body or mind, they killed it. The ancient Indians did so, according to Curtius, as did many other well-governed commonwealths, following the discipline of those times.

[2325] Burton. Printed x: Optimum bene nasci, maxima pars fælicitatis nostræ bene nasci: quamobrem præclare humano generi consultum videretur, si soli parentes bene habiti et sani, liberis operam darent. "To be well born is best; the greatest part of our happiness is to be well born. Therefore humankind would seem to be admirably provided for if only parents in good condition and health applied themselves to having children."

[2326] Editor. Well born here principally means born to parents considered physically and mentally sound. Burton moves from medical inheritance to restricting marriage and reproduction. The original's repeated It is retained in the transcription and removed in the modern column.

[2327] Burton. Printed y: Infantes infirmi præcipitio necati. Bohemus lib. 3. c. 3. Apud Lacones olim. Lypsius epist. 85. cent. ad Belgas, Dionysio Villerio, si quos aliqua membrorum parte inutiles notaverint, necari jubent. "Infirm infants killed by being thrown from a height. Boemus, book 3, chapter 3: formerly among the Spartans. Lipsius, letter 85 of the century of letters to the Belgians, to Dionysius Villerius: if they observe anyone disabled in any part of the body, they order them killed."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 64–65 Heretofore in Scotland, saith [2328]Hect. Boethius, if any were visited with the falling sicknesse, madnesse, gout, leprosie, or any such dangerous disease, which was likely to be propagated from the father to the son, he was instantly gelded; a woman kept from all company of men; and if by chance having some such disease, she were found to be with childe, she with her brood were buried alive: And this was done for the common good, lest the whole Nation should be injured or corrupted.	Formerly in Scotland, says Hector Boece, anyone afflicted with the falling sickness, madness, gout, leprosy or another dangerous disease likely to pass from father to son was immediately castrated; a woman was kept away from all company of men. If a woman with such a disease happened to be found pregnant, she and her unborn child were buried alive. This was done for the common good, lest the whole nation be harmed or corrupted.[2329]
Source page 65 A severe doom you will say, and not to be used amongst Christians, yet more to be looked into then it is. For now by our too much facility in this kinde, in giving way for all to marry that will, too much liberty and indulgence in tolerating all sorts, there is a vast confusion of hereditary diseases, no family secure, no man almost free from some grievous infirmity or other,	A harsh sentence, you will say, and one that Christians should not employ; yet the matter deserves closer attention than it receives. For now our excessive leniency in this respect—allowing everyone who wishes to marry, giving too much freedom and indulgence to all sorts of people—has produced an immense confusion of hereditary diseases. No family is secure, scarcely anyone free of some grievous infirmity or other.

[2328] Burton. Printed z, continued across the page foot: Lib. 1. De veterum Scotorum moribus. Morbo comitiali, dementia, mania, lepra, &c. aut simili labe, quæ facile in prolem transmittitur, laborantes inter eos, ingenti factâ indagine, inventos, ne gens fœda contagione læderetur, ex iis nata, castraverunt, mulieres hujusmodi procul à virorum consortio ablegarunt, quod si harum aliqua concepisse inveniebatur, simul cum fœtu nondum edito, defodiebatur viva. “Book 1, on the customs of the ancient Scots. After an extensive search, those found among them suffering from epilepsy, mental derangement, madness, leprosy or a similar affliction easily transmitted to offspring were castrated, lest the nation be harmed by a foul infection arising from them. Such women were banished far from the company of men; if any was found to have conceived, she was buried alive with her unborn child.”

[2329] Editor. The falling sickness is epilepsy. Hector Boece’s prefatory On the Ancient Customs of the Scots §6 reports the coercive practices. His list includes epilepsy, mental derangement and mania; Burton adds gout and rearranges the reference to leprosy. This locates Boece’s report, not independent proof of Scottish law. Burton rejects such measures among Christians while advocating closer control of marriage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
when no choice is had, but still the eldest must marry, as so many stallions of the race, or if rich, be they fools or dizzards, lame or maimed, unable, intemperate, dissolute, exhaust through riot, as he said, [2330]jure hæreditario sapere jubentur; they must be wise and able by inheritance:	There is no selection: the eldest sons must always marry, like so many breeding stallions; or men must marry if they are rich, whether fools or simpletons, lame or maimed, impotent, intemperate, dissolute or worn out by debauchery. As the writer says, “They are commanded to be wise by hereditary right”: they must possess wisdom and ability by inheritance.[2331]
It comes to pass that our generation is corrupt, we have many weak persons, both in body and minde, many feral diseases raging amongst us, crased families, parentes, peremptores; our fathers bad, and we are like to be worse.	The result is that our offspring are corrupted. We have many people weak in body and mind, many deadly diseases raging among us, families in broken health: “parents, destroyers.” Our fathers are bad, and we are likely to be worse.

[2330] Burton. Printed a: Euphormio Satyr. “Euphormio’s Satire.”

[2331] Editor. Euphormio’s Satire is John Barclay’s Euphormionis Lusinini Satyricon. The remark mocks the idea that wealth or hereditary standing guarantees competence. Parentes, peremptores below plays on the similar sounds of the Latin words for parents and destroyers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Memb. 2.	Member 2
Subsect. 1. Bad diet a cause. Substance. Quality of meats.	Subsection 1 Bad diet as a cause. Substance. The quality of foods.
According to my proposed method, having opened hitherto these secondary causes, which are inbred with us: I must now proceed to the outward and adventitious, which happen unto us after we are born. And those are either Evident, Remote; or inward, Antecedent, and the nearest: Continent causes some call them.	Following my proposed method, having so far explained those secondary causes that are born with us, I must now proceed to the external and acquired causes that affect us after birth. These are either evident and remote, or internal, antecedent and immediate; some call the latter containing causes.[2332]
These outward, remote, precedent causes are subdivided again, into necessary and not necessary. Necessary (because we cannot avoyd them, but they will alter us, as they are used, or abused) are those six non-natural things, so much spoken of amongst Physitians, which are principal causes of this disease.	The external, remote, preceding causes are further divided into necessary and unnecessary. The necessary ones—because we cannot avoid them, and they will change us according to their use or misuse—are the six non-natural things so often discussed by physicians, which are principal causes of this disease.[2333]

[2332] Editor. This is a technical classification of causes. Remote or evident causes act externally; antecedent causes prepare an internal condition, and continent or containing causes sustain the disease directly. Burton's compressed sentence groups the categories loosely; the translation retains that sequence.

[2333] Editor. The six non-naturals are conditions of life that may support or disturb health. Non-natural does not mean unnatural. Burton's enumeration pairs retention with evacuation and sleeping with waking; exercise stands for the usual pair of motion and rest. These pairings account for his total of six.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For almost in every consultation, whereas they shall come to speak of the causes, the fault is found, and this most part objected to the patient; Peccavit circa res sex non naturales: He hath still offended in one of those six. Montanus, consil. 22. consulted about a melancholy Jew, gives that sentence, so did Frisemelica in the same place; and in his 244. counsel, censuring a melancholy souldier, assigns that reason of his malady, [2334]He offended in all those six non-natural things, which were the outward causes, from which came those inward obstructions; and so in the rest.	In almost every consultation, when physicians discuss the causes, they find a fault and usually bring this charge against the patient: "He has offended in the six non-natural things." He has invariably gone wrong in one of the six. Montanus, consulted about a melancholy Jew in consultation 22, pronounces that judgement, as does Frisemelica in the same case. In consultation 244, assessing a melancholy soldier, he assigns this reason for the illness: "He offended in all six non-natural things, which were the external causes from which those internal obstructions arose." The same holds for the other cases.
These six non-natural things, are Dyet, Retention, and Evacuation, which are more material then the other, because they make new matter, or else are conversant in keeping or expelling of it. The other four are, Air, Exercise, Sleeping, Waking, and perturbations of the minde, which onely alter the matter.	Of these six non-natural things, diet and retention and evacuation are more directly material than the others, because they create new matter or concern its retention or expulsion. The other four are air, exercise, sleeping and waking, and disturbances of the mind, which only alter the matter.

[2334] Burton. Printed b: Fecit omnia delicta quæ fieri possunt circa res sex non naturales, & eæ fuerunt causæ extrinsecæ, ex quibus postea ortæ sunt obstructiones. "He committed every fault that can be committed concerning the six non-natural things; these were the external causes from which obstructions subsequently arose."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 65–66 The first of these is Diet, which consists in meat and drink, and causeth melancholy, as it offends in Substance, or Accidents, that is, Quantity, quality, or the like. And well it may be called a material cause, since that as [2335]Fernelius holds, It hath such a power in begetting of diseases, and yields the matter and sustenance of them; for neither air, nor perturbations, nor any of those other evident causes take place, or work this effect, except the constitution of body, and preparation of humors do concur. That a man may say, this Diet is the mother of diseases, let the father be what he will, and from this alone, Melancholy and frequent other maladies arise.	The first is diet, consisting of food and drink. It causes melancholy when it is at fault in substance or in its attributes—that is, quantity, quality or the like. It may well be called a material cause, since, as Fernel holds, it has such power to generate diseases and supply their matter and nourishment. Neither air nor disturbances of the mind nor any other evident causes take effect or produce this result unless the bodily constitution and disposition of the humours cooperate. One may therefore say that diet is the mother of diseases, whoever their father may be; from this alone melancholy and many other illnesses arise.
Source page 66 Many Physitians, I confess, have written copious volumes of this one subject, of the nature and qualities of all maner of meats; as namely, Galen, Isaac the Jew, Halyabbas; Avicenna, Mesue also four Arabians: Gordonius, Villanovanus, Wecker, Johannes Bruerinus sitologia de Esculentis & Poculentis, Michael Savanarola, Tract. 2. c. 8. Anthony Fumanellus, lib. de regimine senum, Curio in his Comment on Schola Salerna,	Many physicians, I admit, have written extensive volumes on this single subject, the nature and qualities of every kind of food: Galen; Isaac the Jew, Haly Abbas, Avicenna and Mesue, four Arab writers; Gordonius; Villanovanus; Wecker; Jean Bruyérin, in his treatise on food and drink; Michele Savonarola, tract 2, chapter 8; Antonio Fumanelli, in his book on the regimen of the elderly; and Curio, in his commentary on the School of Salerno.[2336]

[2335] Burton. Printed c: Path. l. 1. c. 2. Maximam in gignendis morbis vim obtinet, pabulum, materiamque morbi suggerens: nam nec ab aëre, nec à perturbationibus, vel aliis evidentibus causis morbi sunt, nisi consentiat corporis præparatio, & humorum constitutio. Ut semel dicam, una gula est omnium morborum mater, etiamsi alius sit genitor. Ab hac morbi sponte sæpe emanant, nulla alia cogente causa. "Pathology, book 1, chapter 2. It has the greatest power in generating diseases, supplying their nourishment and material; diseases do not arise from air, disturbances or other evident causes unless the body's disposition and the constitution of the humours cooperate. To put it once for all, appetite alone is the mother of every disease, even if another cause is the father. Diseases often arise from it spontaneously, with no other impelling cause."

[2336] Editor. Meats means foods, not just animal flesh. Burton groups Isaac Israeli, Haly Abbas, Avicenna and Mesue as four Arabians within the Arabic medical tradition, after naming Galen. The list mixes authorities, compendia and regimens; the abbreviated titles and many chapter references have not been fully identified and checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Godefridus Stekius arte med. Marsilius cognatus, Ficinus, Ranzovius, Fonseca, Lessius, Magninus, regim. sanitatis, Frietagius, Hugo Fridevallius, &c. besides many other in [2337]English, and almost every peculiar Physitian, discourseth at large of all peculiar meats in his Chapter of Melancholy:	There are also Godefridus Stekius, in The Art of Medicine; Marsilius Cognatus; Ficino; Ranzovius; Fonseca; Lessius; Magninus, in his Regimen of Health; Frietagius; Hugo Fridevallius; and others, besides many writers in English. Almost every individual physician discusses particular foods at length in his chapter on melancholy.
Yet because these Books are not at hand to every man, I will briefly touch what kinde of meats ingender this humor, through their several species, and which are to be avoyded. How they alter and change the matter, spirits first, and after humors, by which we are preserved, and the constitution of our body, Fernelius and others will shew you. I hasten to the thing it self: And first of such Diet as offends in substance:	But because these books are not available to everyone, I will briefly indicate which kinds of food, in their several varieties, generate this humour and which should be avoided. Fernel and others will show you how they alter and change the matter—first the spirits and then the humours by which we are sustained—and our bodily constitution. I hurry on to the subject itself, beginning with food that is harmful in its substance.
[2338]Beef, a strong and hearty meat (cold in the first degree, dry in the second saith Gal. l. 3. c. 1. de alim. fac.) is condemned by him, and all succeeding Authors, to breed gross melancholy blood: Good for such as are sound, and of a strong constitution, for laboring men, if ordered aright, corned, young, of an Ox (for all gelded meats in every species are held best) or if old, [2339]such as have been tired out with labor, are preferred.	Beef, a strong and substantial food—cold in the first degree and dry in the second, says Galen in On the Powers of Foods, book 3, chapter 1—is condemned by him and all subsequent authors as producing thick, melancholic blood.[2340] It is good for healthy people with strong constitutions and for labourers, if properly prepared: salted, from a young animal, and from an ox, since in every species the meat of castrated animals is considered best. If the animal is old, those worn out by work are preferred.

[2337] Burton. Printed d: Cogan, Eliot, Vaughan, Vener.

[2338] Burton. Marginal heading: Beef.

[2339] Burton. Printed e: Frietagius.

[2340] Editor. Cold and dry in stated degrees describe Galenic qualities and their intensity, not serving temperature or moisture measured in modern terms. Corned means preserved with salt. The dietary judgements that follow belong to this humoral system.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Aubanus and Sabellicus commend Portugal Beef to be the most savory, best, and easiest of digestion: we commend ours: but all is rejected, and unfit for such as lead a resty life, any ways inclined to Melancholy, or dry of complexion: Tales (Galen thinks) de facile melancholicis ægritudinibus capiuntur.	Aubanus and Sabellicus praise Portuguese beef as the tastiest, best and easiest to digest; we praise our own. But all beef is rejected as unsuitable for those who lead an inactive life, have any inclination towards melancholy or have a dry temperament. “Such people,” Galen thinks, “easily fall prey to melancholic illnesses.”
[2341]Pork, of all meats is most nutritive in his own nature,[2342] but altogether unfit for such as live at ease, are any ways unsound of Body or Minde: Too moyst, full of humors, and therefore noxia delicatis, saith Savanarola, ex earum usu ut dubitetur an febris quartana generetur: Naught for queasie stomacks, in so much, that frequent use of it may breed a quartan ague.	Pork is by nature the most nourishing of all meats, but wholly unsuitable for people who live at ease or are in any way unsound in body or mind. It is too moist, full of humours, and therefore “harmful to the delicate,” says Savonarola, “so that one may suspect that eating it produces a quartan fever.” It is bad for queasy stomachs, so much so that frequent use may produce a quartan ague.[2343]
[2344]Savanarola discommends Goats flesh, and so doth [2345]Bruerinus, l. 13. c. 19. calling it a filthy beast, and ramish; and therefore supposeth it will breed rank and filthy substance: yet Kid, such as are young, and tender, Isaac accepts, Bruerinus and Galen, l. 1. c. 1. de alimentorum facultatibus.	Savonarola advises against goat meat, as does Bruyérin, book 13, chapter 19. He calls the animal filthy and rank-smelling, and therefore supposes its meat will produce rank and filthy matter. Yet Isaac approves young, tender kid, as do Bruyérin and Galen, On the Powers of Foods, book 1, chapter 1.

[2341] Burton. Marginal heading: Pork.

[2342] Burton. Unlettered marginal reference beneath Pork: Isaac.

[2343] Editor. A quartan ague is a recurring fever whose attacks come on the fourth day by inclusive counting, roughly every seventy-two hours. The statement that pork produces it is the historical author’s claim. The Latin’s suspicion is retained rather than strengthened into certainty.

[2344] Burton. Marginal heading: Goat.

[2345] Burton. Printed f: Non laudatur quia melancholicum præbet alimentum. “It is not commended, because it supplies melancholic nourishment.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2346]Hart and Red Deer [2347]hath an evil name, it yields gross nutriment; a strong and great grained meat, next unto a Horse. Which although some Countries eat, as Tartars, and they of China; yet [2348]Galen condemns.	Hart and red deer have a bad reputation: they yield coarse nourishment, a strong and coarsely textured meat, next to horseflesh. Although some peoples eat horse—the Tartars and the Chinese, for example—Galen condemns it.
Young Foals are as commonly eaten in Spain, as Red Deer, and to furnish their Navies, about Malaga especially, often used; but such meats ask long baking or seething to qualifie them, and yet all will not serve.	Young foals are as commonly eaten in Spain as red deer, and are often used to provision their fleets, especially around Málaga. But such meats require long baking or boiling to temper their qualities, and even that will not suffice.
Source page 66–67 [2349]All Venison is melancholy, and begets bad blood; a pleasant meat: in great esteem with us, (for we have more Parks in England, then there are in all Europe besides) in our solemn feasts. 'Tis somewhat better hunted then otherwise, and well prepared by cookery; but generally bad, and seldom to be used.	All venison produces melancholy and bad blood. It is a pleasant food, highly prized at our ceremonial feasts—for we have more deer parks in England than in all the rest of Europe.[2350] It is somewhat better when the animal has been hunted and the meat is well prepared by cooking; but it is generally bad and should seldom be eaten.

[2346] Burton. Marginal heading: Hart. A male deer.

[2347] Burton. Printed g: Malè alit cervina (inquit Frietagius) crassissimum & atribiliarium suppeditat alimentum. "Venison nourishes badly, says Frietagius; it supplies very coarse nourishment productive of black bile."

[2348] Burton. Printed h: Lib. de subtiliss. dieta. Equina caro & asinina equinis danda est hominibus & asininis. "Book on the most refined diet. Horse and ass meat should be given to horse-like and asinine people." The jest is preserved; the abbreviated book title requires final identification.

[2349] Burton. Marginal heading: Venison, Fallow Deer.

[2350] Editor. Parks here are enclosed deer parks. The comparison with the rest of Europe is Burton's assertion, not a verified count. The marginal label narrows this paragraph's venison to fallow deer, after the preceding discussion of red deer.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 67 [2351]Hare, a black meat, melancholy, and hard of digestion, it breeds Incubus, often eaten, and causeth fearful dreams, so doth all Venison, and is condemned by a Jury of Physitians. Mizaldus and some others, say, That Hare is a merry meat, and that it will make one fair, as Martials Epigram testifies to Gellia; but this is per accidens, because of the good sport it makes, merry company, and good discourse that is commonly at the eating of it, and not otherwise to be understood.	Hare is a dark meat, productive of melancholy and hard to digest. Frequently eaten, it brings on the nightmare and causes terrifying dreams, as does all venison; a whole jury of physicians condemns it.[2352] Mizaldus and some others say that hare is a cheerful food and will make a person good-looking, as Martial's epigram to Gellia attests. But this is incidental: it comes from the good sport it provides, the merry company and the pleasant conversation that usually accompany eating it, and must be understood in no other way.[2353]
[2354]Conies are of the nature of Hares,[2355] Magninus compares them to Beef, Pig, and Goat, Reg. sanit. part. 3. c. 17. yet young Rabbets by all men, are approved to be good.	Conies are similar in nature to hares. Magninus compares them to beef, pork and goat in his Regimen of Health, part 3, chapter 17. Yet everyone approves young rabbits as good.[2356]
Generally, all such meats as are hard of digestion, breed melancholy, Areteus, lib. 7. cap. 5. reckons up heads and feet, [2357]bowels, brains, entrals, marrow, fat, blood, skins, and those inward parts, as heart, lungs, liver, spleen, &c. They are rejected by Isaac, lib. 2. part. 3. Magninus, part 3. cap. 17. Bruerinus, lib. 12. Savanarola, Rub. 32. Tract. 2.	Generally, all foods that are difficult to digest produce melancholy. Aretaeus, book 7, chapter 5, lists heads and feet, bowels, brains, entrails, marrow, fat, blood, skins, and internal organs such as the heart, lungs, liver and spleen. These are rejected by Isaac, book 2, part 3; Magninus, part 3, chapter 17; Bruyérin, book 12; and Savonarola, rubric 32, tract 2.

[2351] Burton. Marginal heading: Hare.

[2352] Editor. Incubus here denotes the nightmare, understood as an oppressive nocturnal experience. It is translated in that historical sense without assigning a modern diagnosis.

[2353] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 5.29, jokes that eating hare makes a person handsome for seven days and concludes that Gellia must never have eaten any. Burton's explanation by the pleasures of the hunt and meal is his own contextual gloss.

[2354] Burton. Marginal heading: Conies. Rabbits.

[2355] Burton. Printed i: Parum absunt à natura Leporum. Bruerinus, l. 13. cap. 25. pullorum tenera & optima. "They differ little from the nature of hares. Bruyérin, book 13, chapter 25. The flesh of the young is tender and excellent."

[2356] Editor. Conies are rabbits; the distinction here is between the grown animal and young rabbits, not between two modern species.

[2357] Burton. Printed k: Illaudabilis succi nauseam provocant. "Of unwholesome juice, they provoke nausea."

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2358]Milk, and all that comes of Milk, as Butter and Cheese, Curds, &c. increase melancholy (Whey onely excepted, which is most wholsom:) [2359]some except Asses Milk. The rest, to such as are sound, is nutritive and good, especially for young children, but because soon turned to corruption, [2360]not good for those that have unclean stomacks, are subject to headach, or have green wounds, Stone, &c.	Milk and everything made from it—butter, cheese, curds and so on—increase melancholy. Only whey is excepted, as particularly wholesome; some also except asses' milk. The rest is nourishing and good for healthy people, especially young children, but because it quickly turns corrupt, it is bad for those whose stomachs contain foul matter, who are prone to headaches or who have fresh wounds, urinary stones and the like.[2361]
Of all Cheeses, I take that kinde which we call Banbury cheese to be the best, ex vetustis pessimus, the older, stronger, and harder, the worst, as Langius discourseth in his Epistle to Melancthon, cited by Mizaldus, Isaac, p. 5. Gal. 3. de cibis boni succi, &c.	Of all cheeses, I consider the kind we call Banbury cheese the best. "Of the old cheeses, the worst": the older, stronger and harder a cheese is, the worse it is, as Langius discusses in his letter to Melanchthon, cited by Mizaldus; see also Isaac, part 5, and Galen, book 3, On Foods of Good Juice, and others.[2362]

[2358] Burton. Marginal heading: Milk.

[2359] Burton. Printed l: Piso, Altomar.

[2360] Burton. Printed m: Curio. Frietagius. Magninus. part 3. cap. 17. Mercurialis, de affect. lib. 1. c. 10. Excepts all milk meats in Hypocondriacal Melancholy. "Curio; Frietagius; Magninus, part 3, chapter 17; Mercurialis, On Affections, book 1, chapter 10. Excludes all milk foods in hypochondriacal melancholy."

[2361] Editor. Green wounds are fresh or unhealed wounds. Stone refers to urinary calculi. Unclean stomachs belongs to the passage's account of retained or corrupted matter, not to personal hygiene. Milk meats in the margin means dairy foods.

[2362] Editor. The printed ex vetustis pessimus is grammatically compressed; its sense is retained without silently replacing the Latin. Burton's following English explains the judgement against old, strong, hard cheese. Good juice is a category of nourishment in the older dietetic vocabulary.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2363]Amongst Fowl, [2364]Peacocks and Pigeons, all fenny Fowl are forbidden, as Ducks, Geese, Swans, Herns, Cranes, Coots, Didappers, Waterhens, with all those Teals, Curs, Sheldrakes, and peckled Fowls, that come hither in winter out of Scandia, Muscovy, Greenland, Friezland, which half the yeer are covered all over with snow, and frozen up.	Among birds, peacocks and pigeons are forbidden, as are all marsh birds: ducks, geese, swans, herons, cranes, coots, little grebes and moorhens, together with all the teal, curs, shelducks and speckled birds that come here in winter from Scandinavia, Muscovy, Greenland and Friesland, lands entirely covered with snow and frozen over for half the year.[2365]
Though these be fair in feathers, pleasant in taste, and have a good out-side, like Hypocrites, white in plumes, and soft, their flesh is hard, black, unwholsome, dangerous, melancholy meat; Gravant & putrefaciunt stomachum, saith Isaac, part 5. de vol. their young ones are more tolerable, but young Pigeons he quite disproves.	Although their feathers are beautiful, their taste pleasant and their outward appearance attractive —like hypocrites, white-plumed and soft—their flesh is tough, dark, unwholesome, dangerous food that produces melancholy. “They burden the stomach and cause putrefaction in it,” says Isaac, part 5, on birds. Their young are more tolerable, but he rejects young pigeons altogether.
[2366]Rhasis and [2367]Magninus discommend all Fish, and say, They breed viscosities, slimy nutriment, little and humorous nourishment. Savanarola addes cold, moyst, and phlegmatick, Isaac; and therefore unwholsom for all cold and melancholy complexions:	Rhazes and Magninus advise against all fish, saying that they produce viscous matter and slimy nourishment, giving little sustenance but many humours. Savonarola adds that they are cold, moist and phlegmatic; so does Isaac. They are therefore unwholesome for all cold and melancholic temperaments.

[2363] Burton. Marginal heading: Fowl.

[2364] Burton. Printed n: Wecker Syntax. theor. p. 2. Isaac, Bruer. lib. 15. cap. 30. & 31. “Wecker, Theoretical Compendium, part 2; Isaac; Bruyérin, book 15, chapters 30 and 31.”

[2365] Editor. Herns are herons, didappers small diving birds or little grebes, and waterhens moorhens. Curs is retained because its precise bird identification has not been securely established. Scandia is Scandinavia; Muscovy denotes the Russian territories. The geographical generalization is Burton’s.

[2366] Burton. Marginal heading: Fishes.

[2367] Burton. Printed o: Cap. 18. parte 3. “Chapter 18, part 3.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
others make a difference, rejecting onely amongst fresh-water fish, Eel, Tench, Lamprey, Crawfish (which Bright approves, cap. 6.) and such as are bred in muddy and standing waters, and have a taste of mud, as Franciscus Bonsoetus poetically defines, Lib. de aquatilibus.	Others distinguish between them, rejecting only these freshwater kinds: eel, tench, lamprey, crayfish—which Bright approves in chapter 6—and fish bred in muddy, stagnant water that taste of mud, as François Boussuet puts it in verse in his book On Aquatic Creatures:
Nam pisces omnes, qui stagna, lacusque frequentant, Semper plus succi deterioris habent.	For all the fish that dwell in pools and lakes Always contain more juice of poorer quality.
All fish, that standing Pools, and Lakes frequent, Do ever yield bad juyce and nourishment.	All fish that live in stagnant pools and lakes Always yield bad juices and nourishment.
Source page 68 Lampreyes, Paulus Jovius, c. 34. de piscibus fluvial. highly magnifies, and saith, None speak against them, but inepti and scrupulosi, some scrupulous persons; but [2368]Eels, c. 33. he abhorreth in all places, at all times, all Physitians detest them, especially about the Solstice.	Paolo Giovio, in chapter 34 of On River Fish, highly praises lampreys, and says that no one speaks against them except "fools and over-scrupulous people"—some excessively fussy persons. But in chapter 33 he loathes eels: everywhere, at all times, all physicians detest them, especially around the solstice.[2369]

[2368] Burton. p. "Omni loco & omni tempore medici detestantur anguillas præsertim circa solstitium. Damnantur tum sanis tum ægris." Everywhere and at every time physicians detest eels, especially around the solstice. They are condemned for both the healthy and the sick.

[2369] Editor. The debate that follows belongs to humoral dietetics: foods were judged to generate particular bodily humours and to suit or harm particular constitutions. "Melancholy" here retains that wider historical sense, including black bile and bodily as well as mental illness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Gomesius, lib. 1. c. 22. de sale, doth immoderately extol Sea-fish, which others as much vilifie, and above the rest, dryed, sowced, indurate fish, as Ling, Fumados, Red-herrings, Sprats, Stock-fish, Haberdine, Poor-John, all Schell-fish. [2370]Tim. Bright excepts Lobstar and Crab. Messarius commends Salmon, which Bruerinus contradicts, Lib. 22. c. 17. Magninus rejects Congre, Sturgeon, Turbet, Mackerel, Skate.	Gomesius, in On Salt, book 1, chapter 22, praises sea fish beyond measure, while others disparage it just as much, especially dried, pickled and hardened fish: ling, smoked fish, red herrings, sprats, stockfish, salt cod, dried hake, and all shellfish.[2371] Timothy Bright makes an exception for lobster and crab. Messarius recommends salmon, but Bruyérin contradicts him in book 22, chapter 17. Magninus rejects conger eel, sturgeon, turbot, mackerel and skate.

[2370] Burton. q. “Cap. 6. in his Tract of Melancholy.” Timothy Bright, A Treatise of Melancholy, chapter 6.

[2371] Editor. Fumados are salted, smoked fish, especially pilchards; haberdine is dried salt cod; Poor-John is cheap dried fish, commonly hake. Stockfish is fish preserved by drying. The list deliberately mixes kinds of fish with forms of preparation. See the historical dictionary entries in the source record.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Carp is a fish, of which, I know not what to determine. Franciscus Bonsoetus accompts it a muddy fish. Hippolitus Salvianus in his Book de Piscium naturâ & præparatione, which was Printed at Rome in Folio, 1554. with most elegant Pictures, esteems Carp no better then a slimy watery meat.	Carp is a fish about which I do not know what to decide. Franciscus Bonsoetus considers it a muddy fish. Hippolytus Salvianus, in his book On the Nature and Preparation of Fish, printed in folio at Rome in 1554 with exceptionally fine illustrations, regards carp as no better than slimy, watery food.
Paulus Jovius on the other side, disallowing Tench, approves of it; so doth Dubravius in his Books of Fish-ponds. Frietagius [2372]extols it for an excellent, wholsom meat, and puts it amongst the Fishes of the best rank; and so do most of our Country Gentlemen, that store their Ponds almost with no other Fish.	Paolo Giovio, on the other hand, rejects tench but approves of carp; so does Dubravius in his books on fishponds. Frietagius praises it as an excellent, wholesome food and ranks it among the best fish. So do most of our country gentlemen, who stock their ponds with scarcely any other species.
But this controversie is easily decided, in my judgment, by Bruerinus, l. 22. c. 13. The difference riseth from the site and nature of Pools, [2373]sometimes muddy, sometimes sweet; they are in taste as the place is, from whence they be taken. In like maner almost we may conclude of other fresh-fish. But see more in Rondeletius, Bellonius, Oribasius, lib. 7. cap. 22. Isaac, l. 1. especially Hippolitus Salvianus, who is instar omnium solus, &c.	But in my judgement Bruyérin, book 22, chapter 13, easily settles this controversy. The difference arises from the position and nature of the ponds, some muddy and some fresh: the fish taste according to the place from which they are taken. We may reach much the same conclusion about other freshwater fish. For more, see Rondeletius, Bellonius, Oribasius, book 7, chapter 22, and Isaac, book 1; especially Hippolytus Salvianus, who "alone is worth them all," and so forth.

[2372] Burton. r. "Optimè nutrit omnium judicio inter primæ notæ pisces gustu præstanti." By everyone's judgement it nourishes exceptionally well, among the first-ranked fish, with an excellent flavour.

[2373] Burton. s. "Non est dubium, quin pro variorum situ, ac natura, magnas alimentorum sortiantur differentiæ, alibi suaviores, alibi lutulentiores." There is no doubt that, according to the situation and nature of the different places, they vary greatly as food: tastier in some, muddier in others. The compressed wording and printed differentiæ are retained; the translation follows the contextual sense.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Howsoever they may be wholsome and approved, much use of them is not good: P. Forestus in his Medicinal observations, [2374]relates, That Carthusian Fryers, whose living is most part fish, are more subject to melancholy then any other order, and that he found by experience, being sometimes their Physitian ordinary at Delph in Holland.	However wholesome and well regarded fish may be, eating much of it is not good. Pieter van Foreest, in his Medical Observations, relates that Carthusian friars, whose diet is mostly fish, are more subject to melancholy than any other religious order. He discovered this by experience, having formerly been their regular physician at Delft in Holland.[2375]
He exemplifies it with an instance of one Buscodnese, a Carthusian of a ruddy colour, and well liking, that by solitary living, and fish-eating, became so misaffected.	He illustrates this with the case of one Buscodnese, a Carthusian with a ruddy complexion and a healthy appearance, who became afflicted in this way through solitary living and eating fish.[2376]
[2377]Amongst Herbs to be eaten, I finde Gourds, Cowcumbers, Coleworts, Mellons, disallowed, but especially Cabbage. It causeth troublesome dreams, and sends up black vapors to the brain. Galen, loc. affect. l. 3. c. 6. of all Herbs condemns Cabbage; and Isaac, lib. 2. c. 1. Animæ gravitatem facit, it brings heavinesse to the soul.	Among edible plants, I find gourds, cucumbers, coleworts and melons disapproved of, but especially cabbage.[2378] It causes disturbing dreams and sends black vapours up to the brain. Of all vegetables, Galen condemns cabbage in On the Affected Parts, book 3, chapter 6; and Isaac, book 2, chapter 1, says, “It makes the soul heavy”—it brings heaviness to the soul.

[2374] Burton. t. “Observat. 16. lib. 10.” Forestus, Medical Observations, book 10, observation 16.

[2375] Editor. Carthusians are a monastic order. Burton’s “friars” is retained in the translation as his designation; his account links the order’s diet and solitude with the observed illness.

[2376] Editor. Buscodnese is the name-like form printed here and is retained without a secure identification. “Well liking” means looking healthy or well nourished, not being well liked.

[2377] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: “Herbs.”

[2378] Editor. “Herbs” includes vegetables, not merely seasonings. Coleworts are leafy plants of the cabbage group; Burton distinguishes them from cabbage in this list.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some are of opinion, That all raw Herbs and Sallets, breed melancholy blood, except Bugloss and Lettice. Crato, consil. 21. lib. 2. speaks against all Herbs and Worts, except Borrage, Bugloss, Fennel, Parsly, Dill, Bawm, Succory. Magninus, regim. sanitatis, 3. part. cap. 31. Omnes herbæ simpliciter malæ, viâ cibi. All Herbs are simply evil to feed on (as he thinks.) So did that scoffing Cook in [2379]Plautus hold,	Some hold that all raw herbs and salads produce melancholic blood, except bugloss and lettuce. Crato, consultation 21, book 2, speaks against all herbs and vegetables except borage, bugloss, fennel, parsley, dill, balm and chicory.[2380] Magninus, in his Regimen of Health, part 3, chapter 31, says, "All herbs are simply bad when used as food." All herbs are downright bad to eat, as he thinks. So, too, thought that mocking cook in Plautus:
—Non ego cœnam condio ut alii coqui solent, Qui mihi condita prata in patinis proferunt, Boves qui convivas faciunt, herbasque aggerunt.	I do not season dinner as other cooks do, Who serve me seasoned meadows on their platters, Make cattle of their guests and heap up greens.[2381]
Source page 68–69 Like other Cooks I do not Supper dress, That put whole Meadows into a Platter, And make no better of their Guests then Beeves, With Herbs and Grass to feed them fatter.	I do not cook supper like other cooks, Who put whole meadows on a platter, Treat their guests no better than cattle, And fatten them with herbs and grass.
Source page 69 Our Italians and Spaniards do make a whole dinner of Herbs and Sallets (which our said Plautus calls Cœnas Terrestres, Horace, cœnas sine sanguine) by which means, as he follows it,	Our Italians and Spaniards make an entire dinner of herbs and salads—what Plautus calls "dinners from the earth," and Horace "bloodless dinners."[2382] By this means, as the cook goes on:

[2379] Burton. u. "Pseudolus, act. 3. scen. 2." Plautus, Pseudolus, act 3, scene 2.

[2380] Editor. Borage and bugloss are plants used both as herbs and in historical medicine. Bawm is balm; succory is chicory. These exceptions show that Burton's authorities do not agree on a blanket prohibition.

[2381] Editor. Plautus, Pseudolus 810–812: the cook ridicules rivals' vegetable dinners. The consulted Latin has item in the first line and oggerunt in the third; Burton omits item, adds solent and prints aggerunt. The modern column follows Burton's wording and separately modernizes his English verse. His intervening edition remains unidentified.

[2382] Editor. Plautus, Captivi 188–190, supplies terrestris cena, a dinner from the earth: the parasite replies that a pig is an earthly animal, then objects to vegetables as food for the sick. The joke supports the vegetable-dinner sense. The exact locus of the attributed Horatian cœnas sine sanguine, "bloodless dinners", remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2383]Hic homines tam brevem vitam colunt—— Qui herbas hujusmodi in alvum suum congerunt, Formidolosum dictu, non esse modò, Quas herbas pecudes non edunt, homines edunt.	Here men live such short lives— Those who cram such herbs into their bellies, Fearful to speak of, let alone to eat: Men eat the plants that cattle will not eat.[2384]
Their lives that eat such Herbs, must needs be short, And 'tis a fearful thing for to report, That men should feed on such a kinde of meat, Which very Juments would refuse to eat.	Those who eat such herbs must have short lives; It is a fearful thing to have to tell, That men should feed upon the kind of food That even beasts of burden would refuse.
[2385]They are windy, and not fit therefore to be eaten of all men raw, though qualified with Oyl, but in Broths, or otherwise. See more of these in every [2386]Husbandman and Herbalist.	They cause wind and are therefore not suitable for everyone to eat raw, even when tempered with oil; they should be eaten in broth or prepared in some other way. See more about them in any writer on husbandry or herbs.

[2383] Burton. x. "Plautus ibid." Plautus, in the same passage.

[2384] Editor. Compare Pseudolus 822–825. The consulted text has formidulosas dictu, non essu modo: frightening even to speak of, not merely to eat. Burton's Formidolosum and esse differ, as do his shortened opening and reordered phrase about filling the belly. The modern column renders the apparent intended sense, then his separate English paraphrase. These differences are retained, not assigned to a verified Burton source edition.

[2385] Burton. y. "Quare rectius valetudini suæ quisque consulet, qui lapsus priorum parentum memor, eas plane vel omiserit vel parce degustarit. Kersleius cap. 4. de vero usu med." Therefore everyone will better consult his own health if, remembering the fall of our first parents, he either avoids these entirely or tastes them sparingly. Kersleius, On the True Use of Medicine, chapter 4.

[2386] Burton. z. "In Mizaldo de Horto P. Crescent. Herbarstein, &c." In Mizaldus, On the Garden; Pietro de' Crescenzi; Herbarstein; and others. The last printed name has not been securely identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2387]Roots, Etsi quorundam gentium opes sint, saith Bruerinus, The wealth of some Countries, and sole food, are windy and bad, or troublesome to the head; as Onyons, Garlick, Scallions, Turnups, Carrets, Radishes, Parsnips: Crato, lib. 2. consil. 11. disallows all Roots, though [2388]some approve of Parsnips and Potatoes.	Roots, "although they are the wealth of some peoples," as Bruyérin says—the wealth and sole food of some countries—cause wind and are bad for, or troublesome to, the head: onions, garlic, scallions, turnips, carrots, radishes and parsnips. Crato, book 2, consultation 11, disapproves of all roots, although some approve of parsnips and potatoes.[2389]
[2390]Magninus is of Crato's opinion, [2391]They trouble the minde, sending gross fumes to the brain, make men mad, especially Garlick, Onyons, if a man liberally feed on them a yeer together. Guianerius, tract. 15. cap. 2. complains of all maner of Roots, and so doth Bruerinus, even Parsnips themselves, which are the best, Lib. 9. cap. 14. Pastinacarum usus succos gignit improbos.	Magninus agrees with Crato: "They disturb the mind, sending thick fumes to the brain, and make people mad"—especially garlic and onions, if someone eats them freely for a whole year. Guaineri, tract 15, chapter 2, complains of every kind of root; so does Bruyérin, even of parsnips themselves, which are the best, in book 9, chapter 14: "Eating parsnips produces bad humours."

[2387] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Roots."

[2388] Burton. a. "Cap. 13. part. 3. Bright in his Tract. of Mel." Chapter 13, part 3; Bright in his Treatise of Melancholy. The first locator has no explicit author in the margin.

[2389] Editor. "Potatoes" could designate sweet potatoes in early modern usage; the precise plant intended by the cited authorities is not established here.

[2390] Burton. b. "Intellectum turbant, producunt insaniam." They disturb the understanding and produce madness.

[2391] Burton. c. "Audivi (inquit Magnin.) quod si quis ex iis per annum continuè comedat, in insaniam caderet. cap. 13." I have heard, says Magninus, that anyone who ate these continually for a year would fall into madness. Chapter 13.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2392]Crato, consil. 21. lib. 1. utterly forbids all maner of fruits, as Pears, Apples, Plums, Cherries, Strawberries, Nuts, Medlers, Serves, &c. Sanguinem inficiunt, saith Villanovanus, They infest the blood, and putrifie it, Magninus holds,[2393] and must not therefore be taken, Viâ cibi, aut quantitate magna, not to make a meal of, or in any great quantity.	Crato, consultation 21, book 1, absolutely forbids all kinds of fruit: pears, apples, plums, cherries, strawberries, nuts, medlars, service berries and so forth.[2394] "They taint the blood," says Villanovanus; they corrupt the blood and putrefy it, Magninus holds, and must therefore not be taken "as food, or in great quantity"—not made into a meal or eaten in any large amount.
[2395]Cardan makes that a cause of their continual sickness at Fessa in Africk, because they live so much on fruits, eating them thrice a day. Laurentius approves of many fruits, in his Tract of Melancholy, which others disallow, and amongst the rest Apples, which some likewise commend, Sweetings, Pairmains, Pippins, as good against Melancholy;	Cardan makes this a cause of the continual sickness at Fez in Africa: people live so largely on fruit, eating it three times a day. In his Treatise on Melancholy, Laurentius approves many fruits that others reject, including apples, which some likewise recommend—sweetings, pearmains and pippins—as good against melancholy.[2396]
but to him that is any way inclined to, or touched with this malady, [2397]Nicholas Piso in his Practicks, forbids all fruits, as windy, or to be sparingly eaten at least, and not raw. Amongst other fruits, [2398]Bruerinus out of Galen, excepts Grapes and Figs, but I finde them likewise rejected.	But for anyone at all inclined to or affected by this illness, Nicholas Piso, in his Practice of Medicine, forbids all fruit as wind-producing, or at least directs that it be eaten sparingly and never raw. Among other fruits, Bruyérin, following Galen, makes an exception for grapes and figs, but I find these rejected too.

[2392] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Fruits."

[2393] Burton. Unlettered marginal reference: "Improbi succi sunt. cap. 12." They produce bad humours. Chapter 12. Placed beside Magninus, to whose nearby opinion it appears to belong.

[2394] Editor. Medlars and service berries are fruits now less familiar at table. "Serves" means the fruit of a service tree; the translation avoids assigning an exact modern species.

[2395] Burton. d. "De rerum varietat. In Fessa plerumque morbosi, quod fructus comedant ter in die." On the Variety of Things: people in Fez are generally sickly because they eat fruit three times a day.

[2396] Editor. Sweetings, pearmains and pippins are names for kinds of apples. Burton is reporting competing judgements about the same foods, not giving one consistent list of permitted and forbidden fruit.

[2397] Burton. e. "Cap. de Mel." The chapter on melancholy.

[2398] Burton. f. "Lib. 11. 6. 3." Book 11, chapter 3 is the probable intended locator; the printed middle character resembles 6 and is retained here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2399]All Pulse are naught, Beans, Pease, Fitches, &c. they fill the Brain (saith Isaac) with gross fumes, breed black thick blood, and cause troublesome dreams. And therefore, that which Pythagoras said to his Schollars of old, may be for ever applied to Melancholy men, A fabis abstinete, Eat no Pease, nor Beans;	All pulses are bad: beans, peas, vetches and so forth. They fill the brain, says Isaac, with thick fumes, produce black, thick blood and cause disturbing dreams. Thus what Pythagoras told his pupils long ago may always be applied to melancholy people: “Abstain from beans”—eat no peas or beans.[2400]
yet to such as will needs eat them, I would give this counsel, to prepare them according to those rules that Arnaldus Villanovanus, and Frietagius prescribe, for eating, and dressing, Fruits, Herbs, Roots, Pulse, &c.	Yet to those determined to eat them I would give this advice: prepare them according to the rules that Arnaldus Villanovanus and Frietagius prescribe for eating and preparing fruit, herbs, roots, pulses and the like.
Source page 70 [2401]Spices cause hot and head melancholy, and are for that cause forbidden by our Physitians, to such men as are inclined to this malady, as Pepper, Ginger, Cinnamon, Cloves, Mace, Dates, &c. Honey and Sugar. [2402]Some except Hony, to those that are cold, it may be tolerable, but [2403]Dulcia se in bilem vertunt, they are obstructive.	Spices cause hot melancholy and melancholy of the head, and for that reason our physicians forbid them to people inclined to this illness: pepper, ginger, cinnamon, cloves, mace, dates and so forth; honey and sugar too. Some make an exception for honey, which may be tolerable for those of a cold constitution; but “sweet things turn into bile”—they cause obstructions.[2404]

[2399] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: “Pulse.”

[2400] Editor. Pulse means edible legume seeds; fitches are vetches. The Latin injunction literally forbids beans. Burton’s English gloss broadens it to peas as well. Diogenes Laertius 8.34 gives several reported explanations of the traditional Pythagorean rule, beyond Burton’s dietary application.

[2401] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: “Spices.”

[2402] Burton. g. “Bright, c. 6. excepts Hony.” Bright, chapter 6, makes an exception for honey.

[2403] Burton. h. “Hor. apud Scoltzium consil. 186.” Hor., in Scholtz, consultation 186. The abbreviated name is retained without a firm expansion.

[2404] Editor. “Hot” and “cold” describe humoral qualities and bodily constitutions. Burton’s categories overlap: dates and sweeteners appear beside the spices. Both the categorization and the claimed effects are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Crato therefore forbids all Spice, in a consultation of his, for a Melancholy Shoolmaster, Omnia aromatica, & quicquid sanguinem adurit: So doth Fernelius, consil. 45. Guianerius, tract. 15. c. 2. Mercurialis, conf. 189. To these I may adde all sharp and sowre things, luscious, and over-sweet, or fat, as Oyl, Vineger, Verjuice, Mustard, Salt; as sweet things are obstructive, so these are corrosive.	Crato therefore forbids all spices in a consultation for a melancholy schoolmaster: "All aromatics and whatever scorches the blood." So do Fernel, consultation 45; Guaineri, tract 15, chapter 2; and Mercurialis, consultation 189. To these I may add everything sharp and sour, luscious and excessively sweet, or fatty: oil, vinegar, verjuice, mustard and salt.[2405] Just as sweet things cause obstructions, these are corrosive.
Gomesius in his Books, De sale, l. 1. c. 21. highly commends Salt; so doth Codronchus in his Tract, De sale Absinthii; Lemn. l. 3. c. 9. de occult. nat. mir. yet common experience findes Salt, and Salt-meats, to be great procurers of this disease. And for that cause belike those Egyptian Priests, abstain'd from salt, even so much, as in their bread, ut sine perturbatione anima esset, saith mine Author, that their souls might be free from perturbations.	Gomesius, in On Salt, book 1, chapter 21, highly recommends salt; so does Codronchus in his treatise On Salt of Wormwood, and Lemnius in On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 3, chapter 9. Yet common experience finds salt and salted foods great causes of this disease. Perhaps this was why those Egyptian priests abstained from salt, even in their bread: "so that the soul might be undisturbed," says my author—so that their souls might be free from disturbances.
[2406]Bread that is made of baser grain, as Pease, Beans, Oats, Rye, or [2407]over-hard baked, crusty, and black, is often spoken against, as causing melancholy juyce and wind. Joh. Mayor in the first Book of his History of Scotland, contends much for the wholsomnes of Oaten Bread:	Bread made from inferior grain, such as peas, beans, oats or rye, or baked too hard, crusty and black, is often condemned for producing melancholic humours and wind. John Mair, in the first book of his History of Scotland, argues vigorously for the wholesomeness of oat bread:

[2405] Editor. Verjuice is sour juice, commonly pressed from unripe grapes or sour fruit. "Scorching" the blood invokes adustion, the supposed overheating of humours.

[2406] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Bread."

[2407] Burton. i. "Ne comedas crustam, choleram quia gignit adustam. Schol. Sal." Do not eat the crust, because it produces burnt bile. The School of Salerno. "Burnt" refers to the humoral alteration called adustion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It was objected to him then living at Paris in France, That his Countrymen fed on Oats, and base grain, as a disgrace; but he doth ingenuously confess, Scotland, Wales, and a third part of England, did most part use that kinde of Bread, that it was as wholsom as any grain, and yielded as good nourishment.	While he was living in Paris, France, people reproached him with his countrymen's eating oats and inferior grain, as though it were a disgrace. But he frankly acknowledges that Scotland, Wales and a third of England chiefly used that kind of bread, and maintains that it was as wholesome as any grain and provided just as good nourishment.
And yet Wecker out of Galen, calls it horse-meat, and fitter for juments, then men to feed on. But read Galen himself, Lib. 1. De cibis boni & mali succi, more largely discoursing of Corn and Bread.	Yet Wecker, drawing on Galen, calls it horse feed, more suitable for beasts of burden than for human beings. But read Galen himself, On Foods of Good and Bad Humours, book 1, for a fuller discussion of grain and bread.
[2408]All black Wines, over-hot, compound, strong thick drinks, as Muscadine, Malmsie, Allegant, Rumny, Brownbastard, Metheglen, and the like, of which they have thirty several kindes in Muscovy, all such made drinks are hurtful in this case, to such as are hot, or of a sanguine cholerick complexion, young, or inclined to head-melancholy.	All dark wines and excessively hot, compounded, strong, thick drinks—muscadine, malmsey, Alicante, rumney, brown bastard, metheglin and the like, of which they have thirty different kinds in Muscovy—all such prepared drinks are harmful in this case to those who are hot, of a sanguine-choleric temperament, young, or inclined to melancholy of the head.[2409]

[2408] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Wine."

[2409] Editor. Muscadine, malmsey, Alicante, rumney and brown bastard are historical wine names; metheglin is a drink made by fermenting honey and water. Burton groups them as strong or rich drinks. "Sanguine-choleric" describes a temperament associated with blood and yellow bile; Muscovy denotes Russia in his geographical vocabulary.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For many times the drinking of Wine alone causeth it. Arculanus, c. 16. in 9. Rhasis, puts in [2410]Wine for a great cause, especially if it be immoderately used. Guianerius, Tract. 15. c. 2. tells a story of two Dutchmen, to whom he gave entertainment in his house, That [2411]in one moneths space were both melancholy by drinking of Wine, one did naught but sing, the other sigh.	For often wine drinking alone causes it. Arculanus, chapter 16 of his commentary on book 9 of Rhazes, counts wine among its chief causes, especially when drunk to excess. Guaineri, tract 15, chapter 2, tells of two Germans whom he entertained in his house: within a month both became melancholy from drinking wine; one did nothing but sing, the other sigh.[2412]
Galen, l. de causis, morb. c. 3. Matthiolus on Dioscorides, and above all other Andreas Bachius, l. 3. c. 18, 19, 20. have reckoned upon those inconveniences that come by Wine: Yet notwithstanding all this, to such as are cold, or sluggish melancholy, a cup of Wine is good Physick, and so doth Mercurialis grant, consil. 25. in that case, if the temperature be cold, as to most melancholy men it is, Wine is much commended, if it be moderately used.	Galen, On the Causes of Diseases, chapter 3; Mattioli on Dioscorides; and above all Andrea Bacci, book 3, chapters 18, 19 and 20, have listed the harms that wine brings. Yet despite all this, for people with cold or sluggish melancholy a cup of wine is good medicine. Mercurialis concedes as much in consultation 25: in that case, if the temperament is cold, as it is in most melancholy people, wine is highly recommended if used in moderation.
[2413]Cider and Perry are both cold and windy drinks, and for that cause to be neglected, and so are all those hot spiced strong drinks.	Cider and perry are both cold drinks that cause wind, and should therefore be avoided, as should all those hot, spiced, strong drinks.[2414]

[2410] Burton. k. “Vinum turbidum.” Cloudy wine.

[2411] Burton. l. “Ex vini patentis bibitione, duo Alemani in uno mense melancholici facti sunt.” Through drinking wine, two Germans became melancholy in one month. Patentis is the printed reading; potentis, “strong,” may have been intended, but is not silently substituted.

[2412] Editor. “Dutchmen” could mean Germans as well as people of the Netherlands; Burton’s marginal Alemani supports “Germans” here. The contrast between singing and sighing reflects the range of behaviour included under his term melancholy.

[2413] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: “Cider, Perry.”

[2414] Editor. Perry is the fermented juice of pears, corresponding to apple cider.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 70–71 [2415]Beer, if it be over new or over stale, over strong, or not sod, smell of the cask, sharp, or sowre, is most unwholsom, frets, and gauls, &c. Henricus Ayrerus in a [2416]consultation of his, for one that labored of Hypocondriacal melancholy discommends Beer. So doth [2417]Crato in that excellent counsel of his, Lib. 2. consil. 21. as too windy, because of the Hop.	Beer, if too new or too old, too strong or insufficiently boiled, smelling of the cask, sharp or sour, is most unwholesome: it irritates and inflames, and so forth. Heinrich Ayrer, in a consultation for someone suffering from hypochondriacal melancholy, advises against beer. So does Crato in that excellent consultation of his, book 2, consultation 21, as producing too much wind because of the hops.[2418]
Source page 71 But he means belike that thick black Bohemian Beer used in some other parts of [2419]Germany,	But he probably means that thick, dark Bohemian beer drunk in some other parts of Germany:
——nil spissius illa Dum bibitur, nil clarius est dum mingitur, unde Constat, quod multas fæces in corpore linquat.	Nothing is thicker when it is drunk, Nothing clearer when it is pissed; from which It follows that it leaves much sediment in the body.
Nothing comes in so thick, Nothing goes out so thin, It must needs follow then The dregs are left within.	Nothing comes in so thick, Nothing goes out so thin; It follows, then, the dregs Must all be left within.

[2415] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: “Beer.”

[2416] Burton. m. “Hildisheim, spicel. fol. 273.” Hildesheim, Spicilegium, folio 273.

[2417] Burton. n. “Crassum generat sanguinem.” It produces thick blood.

[2418] Editor. “Sod” means boiled. Hypochondriacal melancholy was associated with the upper abdominal organs beneath the ribs; it does not simply mean modern health anxiety.

[2419] Burton. o. “About Danzich in Spruce, Hamburg, Lypsich.” Danzig (Gdańsk) in Prussia; Hamburg; Leipzig. “Spruce” is the old English name for Prussia.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As that old [2420]Poet scoffed, calling it Stygiæ monstrum conforme paludi, a monstrous drink, like the River Styx. But let them say as they list, to such as are accustomed unto it, 'Tis a most wholsom (so [2421]Polydor Virgil calleth it) and a pleasant drink, it is more subtil and better for the Hop that rarifies it, hath an especial vertue against melancholy, as our Herbalists confess, Fuchsius approves, Lib. 2. sect. 2. instit. cap. 11. and many others.	So that old poet mocked it, calling it "a monster resembling the Stygian marsh"—a monstrous drink, like the River Styx.[2422] But let them say what they please: for those accustomed to it, beer is a most wholesome drink, as Polydore Vergil calls it, and a pleasant one. It is finer and better for the hops that thin it, and has a special power against melancholy, as our herbalists acknowledge and Fuchs confirms in his Institutes, book 2, section 2, chapter 11, along with many others.
[2423]Standing Waters, thick and ill coloured, such as come forth of Pools, and Motes, where Hemp hath been steeped, or slimy fishes live, are most unwholsom, putrified, and full of mites, creepers, slimy, muddy, unclean, corrupt, impure, by reason of the Suns heat, and still standing; they cause foul distemperatures in the body and minde of man, are unfit to make drink of, to dress meat with, or to be [2424]used about men inwardly or outwardly.	Stagnant waters, thick and discoloured, such as those from pools and moats where hemp has been soaked or slimy fish live, are most unwholesome: putrefied and full of mites and crawling creatures, slimy, muddy, unclean, corrupted and impure through the sun's heat and their standing still.[2425] They cause foul imbalances in the human body and mind, and are unfit for making drink, preparing food or any internal or external use on people.

[2420] Burton. p. "Henricus Abrincensis." Henry of Avranches. Camden, Britannia, Derbyshire §4, attributes four beer verses to him. Burton moves Camden's first line to the end and gives in corpore linquat where Camden has in ventre relinquit. This locates an attributed parallel, not proof of direct borrowing or collation with Henry's original poem.

[2421] Burton. q. "Potus tum salubris tum jucundus, l. 1." A drink both wholesome and pleasant. Polydore Vergil, English History 1.14, describes barley beer as useful and pleasant to accustomed drinkers: potus certe assuetis tum utilis, tum iucundus. Burton's salubris differs from utilis. The cited passage does not itself establish his further claims about hops or melancholy.

[2422] Editor. Styx belongs to the classical underworld; the Latin calls it a marsh, while Burton's English gloss calls it a river. Both images are preserved. "Subtil" and "rarifies" mean finer or less dense in the physical and medical vocabulary of the passage.

[2423] Burton. Unlettered marginal heading: "Waters."

[2424] Burton. r. "Galen, l. 1. de san. tuend. Cavendæ sunt aquæ quæ ex stagnis hauriuntur, & quæ turbidæ & malè olentes, &c." Galen, On Preserving Health, book 1. Waters drawn from stagnant pools, and those that are cloudy and foul-smelling, should be avoided, and so forth.

[2425] Editor. Hemp stems were soaked in water to loosen their fibres, a process called retting. "Distemperatures" means disturbances in the body's proper balance of qualities; it does not refer simply to temperature.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They are good for many domestical uses, to wash horses, water cattle, &c. or in time of necessity, but not otherwise. Some are of opinion, that such fat standing waters make the best Beer, and that seething doth defecate it, as [2426]Cardan holds, Lib. 13. subtil. It mends the substance, and savor of it, but it is a paradox.	They serve many household uses, washing horses, watering cattle and so forth, or may be used in necessity, but not otherwise. Some think that such thick, stagnant waters make the best beer and that boiling clarifies it, as Cardan holds in On Subtlety, book 13: it improves its substance and flavour. But this runs against received opinion.
Such Beer may be stronger, but not so wholsom as the other, as [2427]Iobertus truly justifieth out of Galen, Paradox dec. 1. Paradox 5. that the seething of such impure waters doth not purge or purifie them, Pliny, lib. 31. c. 3. is of the same Tenent, and P. Crescentius agricult. lib. 1. & lib. 4. c. 11. & c. 45. Pamphilius Herilachus, l. 4. de nat. aquarum, such waters are naught, not to be used,	Such beer may be stronger, but it is less wholesome than other beer. As Joubert rightly establishes from Galen in his Paradoxes, decade 1, paradox 5, boiling such impure waters does not cleanse or purify them. Pliny, book 31, chapter 3, holds the same view, as do Pietro de' Crescenzi, Agriculture, book 1 and book 4, chapters 11 and 45, and Pamphilius Herilachus, On the Nature of Waters, book 4: such waters are bad and should not be used.[2428]
and by the testimony of [2429]Galen, breed Agues, Dropsies, Pleurisies, Splenetick, and melancholy Passions, hurt the Eyes, cause a bad temperature, and ill disposition of the whole body, with bad colour. This Iobertus stiffly maintains, Paradox, lib. 1. part. 5. that it causeth bleer eyes, bad colour, and many loathsome diseases to such as use it:	According to Galen, they produce fevers, dropsies, pleurisies, disorders of the spleen and melancholy, damage the eyes, and cause a bad temperament and an unhealthy condition throughout the body, with a poor complexion. Joubert firmly maintains this in his Paradoxes, book 1, part 5: such water causes bleary eyes, a poor complexion and many loathsome diseases in those who use it.[2430]

[2426] Burton. s. "Innoxium reddit & bene olentem." It makes it harmless and sweet-smelling.

[2427] Burton. t. "Contendit hæc vitia coctione non emendari." He maintains that these defects are not corrected by boiling.

[2428] Editor. The dispute concerns what boiling can remove or alter in water, within the medical and natural-philosophical framework of Burton's authorities. "Defecate" in the preceding passage means clarify or remove dregs; "paradox" means an assertion contrary to received opinion.

[2429] Burton. u. "Lib. de bonitate aquæ, hydropem auget, febres putridas, splenem, tusses, nocet oculis, malum habitum corporis & colorem." The book On the Goodness of Water: it aggravates dropsy, putrid fevers, spleen disorders and coughs; harms the eyes; and brings a bad bodily condition and complexion. The compressed final phrases are translated by sense.

[2430] Editor. Agues are fevers, often recurring; dropsy denotes abnormal fluid accumulation; pleurisy concerns inflammation around the lungs. "Passions" here means ailments or affections, including those assigned to the spleen.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This which they say, stands with good reason; for as Geographers relate, the water of Astracan breeds worms in such as drink it. [2431]Axius, or as now called Verduri, the fairest River in Macedonia, makes all Cattle black that taste of it. Aleacman now Peleca, another stream in Thessaly, turns Cattle most part white, si potui ducas.	What they say accords with sound reason: for, as geographers relate, the water of Astrakhan breeds worms in those who drink it. The Axius, now called Verduri, the finest river in Macedonia, turns all cattle black if they taste it. The Aleacman, now Peleca, another stream in Thessaly, turns cattle mostly white, "if you lead them there to drink."[2432]
I. Aubanus Bohemus refers that [2433]Struma, or Poke of the Bavarians and Styrians to the nature of their waters, as [2434]Munster doth that of the Valesians in the Alps, and [2435]Bodine supposeth the stuttering of some families in Aquitania about Labden, to proceed from the same cause, and that the filth is derived from the water to their bodies.	Johann Boemus attributes the struma, or swelling of the neck, among the Bavarians and Styrians to the nature of their waters, as Münster does among the people of Valais in the Alps. Bodin supposes that the stuttering of some families in Aquitaine around Labden comes from the same cause, and that the impurity passes from the water into their bodies.[2436]
Source page 71–72 So that they that use filthy, standing, ill-coloured, thick, muddy water, must needs have muddy, ill coloured, impure, and infirm bodies. And because the body works upon the minde, they shall have grosser understandings, dull, foggy, melancholy spirits, and be really subject to all maner of infirmities.	Thus those who use filthy, stagnant, discoloured, thick, muddy water must necessarily have muddy, discoloured, impure and weak bodies. And because the body acts upon the mind, they will have coarser understandings and dull, foggy, melancholy spirits, and be truly subject to every kind of infirmity.

[2431] Burton. x. "Mag. Nigritatem inducit si pecora biberint." Mag. It induces blackness if cattle drink it. The abbreviated source Mag. remains unidentified.

[2432] Editor. Compare Pliny, Natural History 31.10, on the Haliacmon and Axius changing cattle's colour. Burton's Aleacman, Peleca and Verduri are retained as printed rather than silently corrected, as is his placement of the former river in Thessaly. This is a transmitted natural-history claim.

[2433] Burton. y. "Aquæ ex nivibus coactæ strumosos faciunt." Waters collected from snow make people suffer from swellings of the neck.

[2434] Burton. z. "Cosmog. l. 3. cap. 36." Münster, Cosmography, book 3, chapter 36.

[2435] Burton. a. "Method. hist. cap. 5. balbutiunt Labdoni in Aquitania ob aquas, atque hi morbi ab aquis in corpora derivantur." Method of History, chapter 5: the people of Labden in Aquitaine stutter because of their waters, and these illnesses pass from the waters into their bodies.

[2436] Editor. Struma and poke describe swellings of the neck, often understood here as goitre. The claims connecting waters with these swellings and with stuttering belong to Burton's sources; the place-name Labden remains unconfirmed. The following bodily-to-mental inference is part of his argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 72 To these noxious simples, we may reduce an infinite number of compound, artificial, made dishes, of which our Cooks afford us a great variety, as Taylors do fashions in our apparel. Such are [2437]Puddings stuffed with blood, or otherwise composed, Baked meats, sowced, indurate meats, fryed, and broyled, buttered meats, condite, powdred, and over-dryed,	To these harmful single ingredients we may add an infinite number of mixed, artificially prepared dishes, of which our cooks supply as great a variety as tailors supply fashions in our clothes. Such are puddings stuffed with blood or otherwise compounded; baked dishes; pickled, hardened, fried and grilled foods; buttered foods, preserved, salted and excessively dried foods;[2438]
[2439]all Cakes, Simnels, Buns, Cracknels made with Butter, Spice, &c. Fritters, Pancakes, Pies, Sausages, and those several sawces, sharp, or over sweet, of which Scientia popinæ, as Seneca calls it, hath served those [2440]Apician tricks, and perfumed dishes, which Adrian the sixt Pope, so much admired in the accounts of his predecessor Leo decimus;[2441] and which prodigious riot, and prodigality, have invented in this age.	all cakes, simnels, buns and crisp biscuits made with butter, spices and so forth; fritters, pancakes, pies, sausages and the various sharp or excessively sweet sauces. With these, the "science of the cookshop," as Seneca calls it, has served up those Apician refinements and perfumed dishes that Pope Adrian VI found so astonishing in the accounts of his predecessor Leo X, and that monstrous excess and extravagance have invented in this age.[2442]

[2437] Burton. a. "Edulia ex sanguine & suffocato parta. Hildesheim." Foods made from blood and from animals killed by suffocation. Hildesheim. The letter a begins again on this printed page.

[2438] Editor. "Simples" means single ingredients, as opposed to compounds. Puddings can be sausage-like preparations; "baked meats" includes baked dishes or pies. "Condite" means preserved, and "powdred" here means salted.

[2439] Burton. b. "Cupedia vero, placentæ, bellaria, commentaque alia curiosa pistorum & coquorum, gustui servientium conciliant morbos tum corpori tum animo insanabiles. Philo Judæus lib. de victimis." Delicacies, cakes, sweetmeats and the other elaborate inventions of bakers and cooks who serve the palate bring incurable diseases upon both body and soul. Philo the Jew, On Sacrifices.

[2440] Burton. c. "As Lettice steeped in Wine, Birds fed with Fennel and Sugar, as a Popes Concubine used in Avignion, Stephan." Examples include lettuce soaked in wine and birds fed on fennel and sugar, as used by a pope's concubine at Avignon. Stephan. The abbreviated source is retained.

[2441] Burton. Unlettered marginal reference: "P. Jov. vita ejus." Paolo Giovio, his life. Placed with the anecdote about Leo X, whose life is the likely referent; the precise passage remains to be collated.

[2442] Editor. Simnels are fine breads or cakes; cracknels are crisp biscuits. Apician means in the manner of Apicius, the proverbial Roman gourmet. Seneca, Consolation to Helvia 10.8, uses the phrase "science of the cookshop" in condemning Apicius's influence. "Admired" means wondered at, not necessarily approved of.

Original text 1651	Modern English
These do generally ingender gross humors, fill the stomack with crudities, and all those inward parts with obstructions. Montanus, consil. 22. gives instance in a melancholy Jew, that by eating such tart sawces, made dishes, and salt meats, with which he was overmuch delighted, became melancholy, and was evil affected. Such examples are familiar and common.	These generally produce thick humours, fill the stomach with undigested matter and all the internal organs with obstructions. Montanus, consultation 22, gives the example of a melancholy Jew who became melancholy and unwell through eating such tart sauces, prepared dishes and salted foods, in which he took excessive pleasure. Such examples are familiar and common.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsect. 2. Quantity of dyet a cause.	Subsection 2 The quantity of food as a cause
There is not so much harm proceeding from the substance it self of meat, and quality of it, in ill dressing and preparing, as there is from the quantity, disorder of time and place, unseasonable use of it, [2443]intemperance, overmuch, or overlittle taking of it. A true saying it is, Plures crapula quam gladius, This gluttony kills more then the sword, this omnivorantia & homicida gula, this al-devouring and murdering gut.	Less harm comes from the substance and quality of food itself, or from poor cooking and preparation, than from its quantity, irregular times and places, eating at unsuitable hours, lack of moderation, and taking too much or too little. It is a true saying: "Gluttony kills more than the sword." This gluttony kills more than the sword—this "all-devouring appetite and murderous gullet," this all-devouring, murderous gut.
And that of [2444]Pliny is truer, Simple Dyet is the best, heaping up of several meats, is pernicious, and sawces worse, many dishes bring many diseases. [2445]Avicen cryes out, That nothing is worse then to feed on many dishes, or to protract the time of meats longer then ordinary; from thence proceed our infirmities, and 'tis the fountain of all diseases, which arise out of the repugnancy of gross humors.	And Pliny's saying is truer still: a simple diet is best; piling up different foods is harmful, and sauces are worse; many dishes bring many diseases. Avicenna declares that nothing is worse than eating many dishes or prolonging meals beyond the usual time. From this come our ailments; it is the source of all diseases arising from the conflict of thick humours.

[2443] Burton. d. "Animæ negotium illa facessit, & de templo Dei immundum stabulum facit. Peletius, 10. c." It gives the soul trouble and turns God's temple into a filthy stable. Peletius, chapter 10; the printed name is retained.

[2444] Burton. e. "Lib. 11. c. 52. Homini cibus utilissimus simplex, acervatio ciborum pestifera, & condimenta perniciosa, multos morbos multa fercula ferunt." Book 11, chapter 52. Simple food is best for people; a piling up of foods is deadly and sauces harmful; many dishes bring many diseases.

[2445] Burton. f. "31. Dec. 2. c. Nihil deterius quam si tempus justo longius comedendo protrahatur, & varia ciborum genera conjungantur: inde morborum scaturigo, quæ ex repugnantia humorum oritur." Nothing is worse than prolonging eating beyond its proper time and combining different kinds of food: hence the spring of diseases arising from the conflict of humours. The compressed locator is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thence, saith, [2446]Fernelius, come cruelties, wind, oppilations, Cacochymia, Plethora, Cachexia, Bradiopepsia, [2447]Hinc subitæ mortes, atque intestata senectus, sudden death, &c. and what not.	From this, says Fernel, come undigested matter, wind, obstructions, corrupt humours, an excess of humours, a wasted constitution and slow digestion.[2448] "Hence sudden deaths, and old age dying without a will"—sudden death, and so forth, and what else besides![2449]
As a Lamp is choaked with a multitude of Oyl, or a little fire with overmuch wood quite extinguished; so is the natural heat with immoderate eating, strangled in the Body. Pernitiosa sentina est abdomen insaturabile: One saith, An insatiable paunch is a pernicious sink, and the fountain of all diseases, both of Body and Minde.	As a lamp is choked with too much oil, or a small fire put out altogether by too much wood, so excessive eating stifles the body's natural heat. "An insatiable belly is a deadly cesspool": as one writer says, an insatiable paunch is a harmful sink and the source of every disease of body and mind.[2450]
Source page 72–73 [2451]Mercurialis will have it a peculiar cause of this private disease; Solenander, consil. 5. sect. 3. illustrates this of Mercurialis, with an example of one so melancholy, ab intempestivis commessationibus, unseasonable feasting. [2452]Crato confirms as much, in that often cited Counsel, 21. lib. 2. putting superfluous eating for a main cause.	Mercurialis regards it as a specific cause of this particular disease. Solenander, in consultation 5, section 3, illustrates Mercurialis's point with the case of someone made melancholy "by ill-timed revels"—feasting at unsuitable hours. Crato confirms this in that often-cited consultation 21, book 2, naming excessive eating as a principal cause.

[2446] Burton. g. "Path. l. 1. c. 14." Fernel, Pathology, book 1, chapter 14.

[2447] Burton. Asterisk. "Juv. Sat. 5." Juvenal, Satire 5, as printed. The quotation occurs in Satire 1.144.

[2448] Editor. The scan clearly prints cruelties. The modern "undigested matter" follows the contextual conjecture crudities; Fernel's cited passage has not yet been collated. The remaining terms are humoral: oppilations, blockages; cacochymia, bad humours; plethora, excessive bodily fullness; cachexia, a disordered or wasted state; bradiopepsia, slow digestion. They do not map exactly onto current diagnoses.

[2449] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 1.144. Intestata means without having made a will, not intestinal. Burton's marginal "Sat. 5" is retained as printed. His abbreviated English gloss follows the newly translated Latin.

[2450] Editor. Natural heat is the body's innate warmth, understood here to sustain digestion and life. The lamp and fire comparisons belong to that physiological account. "Sink" means a receptacle for filth.

[2451] Burton. h. "Nimia repletio ciborum facit melancholicum." Excessive filling with food makes a person melancholy.

[2452] Burton. i. "Comestio superflua cibi, & potus quantitas nimia." Excessive eating of food and an excessive quantity of drink.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 73 But what need I seek farther for proofs? Hear Hippocrates himself, Lib. 2. Aphorif. 10. Impure bodies the more they are nourished, the more they are hurt, [2453]for the nourishment is putrified with vicious humors.	But why should I look further for evidence? Listen to Hippocrates himself, book 2, aphorism 10: the more impure bodies are nourished, the more they are harmed, because corrupt humours putrefy their nourishment.[2454]
And yet for all this harm, which apparently follows surfetting and drunkenness, see how we luxuriate and rage in this kinde, read what Johannes Stuckius hath written lately of this subject, in his great Volumn De Antiquorum Conviviis, and of our present age; Quam [2455]portentosæ cænæ, prodigious suppers, [2456]Qui dum invitant ad cænam, efferunt ad sepulchrum, what Fagos, Epicures, Apetios, Heliogables our times afford? Lucullus ghost walks still, and every man desires to sup in Apollo: Æsops costly dish is ordinarily served up.	Yet despite all the harm that plainly follows overeating and drunkenness, see how extravagantly and madly we indulge in them. Read what Johannes Stuckius has lately written on the subject in his great volume On the Banquets of the Ancients, and about our own age: "What monstrous dinners!"—prodigious suppers; "while inviting people to dinner, they carry them out to the grave." What gluttons, Epicures, Apiciuses and Heliogabaluses our age supplies![2457] Lucullus's ghost still walks, and everyone longs to dine in the Apollo room; Aesop's costly dish is served up every day.[2458]
—[2459]Magis illa juvant, quæ pluris emuntur.—	"What costs more gives greater pleasure."

[2453] Burton. k. "Impura corpora quanto magis nutris, tanto magis lædis: putrefacit enim alimentum vitiosus humor." The more you nourish impure bodies, the more you harm them, for corrupt humour putrefies the nourishment.

[2454] Editor. Hippocrates, Aphorisms 2.10, states the relation between impure bodies, nourishment and harm. The explanation involving putrefaction is added in Burton's presentation; it is not in the consulted aphorism itself.

[2455] Burton. l. "Vid. Goclen. de portentosis cœnis, &c. puteani Com" See Goclenius, On Monstrous Dinners, and so forth; Puteani Com. The final abbreviated reference is printed without further expansion and remains unresolved.

[2456] Burton. m. "Amb. lib. de Jeju. cap. 14." Ambrose, On Fasting, chapter 14.

[2457] Editor. The list turns types and historical names into plural examples of gluttony: Fagos evokes eaters, Epicures luxurious pleasure-seekers, Apetios apparently Apiciuses, and Heliogables the emperor Heliogabalus. The original spelling Apetios is preserved; its contextual identification is made explicit in the modern text.

[2458] Editor. Plutarch, Lucullus 41, describes a lavish dining room called the Apollo. Aesop here is the Roman actor Clodius Aesopus, whose costly dish of singing or talking birds is described in Pliny, Natural History 10.141–142, not the fable writer.

[2459] Burton. n. "Juvenal." The line is in Juvenal, Satire 11.16.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The dearest Cates are best, and 'tis an ordinary thing to bestow twenty or thirty pound on a dish, some thousand Crowns upon a dinner: Mully-Hamet, King of Fez and Morocco, spent three pound on the sawce of a Capon:[2460] It is nothing in our times, we scorn all that is cheap.	The most expensive delicacies are best. It is commonplace to spend twenty or thirty pounds on one dish and some thousand crowns on a dinner. Mully-Hamet, king of Fez and Morocco, spent three pounds on the sauce for a capon. That is nothing in our day: we scorn everything cheap.
We loathe [2461]the very light (some of us, as Seneca notes) because it comes free, and we are offended with the Suns heat, and those cool blasts, because we buy them not. This air we breathe is so common, we care not for it: nothing pleaseth but what is dear.	Some of us, as Seneca observes, loathe daylight itself because it is free, and resent the sun's warmth and the cool breezes because we do not buy them. The air we breathe is so common that we think nothing of it: nothing pleases us unless it is expensive.[2462]
And if we be [2463]witty in any thing, it is ad gulam: If we study at all, it is erudito luxu, to please the palat, and to satisfie the gut. A Cook of old was a base knave (as [2464]Livy complains) but now a great man in request: Cookery is become an art, a noble science: Cooks are Gentlemen: Venter Deus:	If we show ingenuity in anything, it is "for the gullet." If we study at all, it is "with learned luxury," to please the palate and satisfy the gut. A cook used to be a lowly servant, as Livy complains, but now he is an important man in demand. Cooking has become an art, a noble science; cooks are gentlemen. "The belly is God."

[2460] Burton. o. "Guiccardin." Printed alongside the Mully-Hamet anecdote; its letter appears at the start of the following passage in the body. Placed here with the anecdote to distinguish it from Seneca's following note.

[2461] Burton. p. "Na. quæst. 4. ca. ult. fastidio est lumen gratuitum, dolet quod sole, quod spiritum emere non possimus, quod hic aër non emptus ex facili, &c. adeo nihil placet, nisi quod carum est." Natural Questions, book 4, last chapter. Free daylight disgusts us; it pains us that we cannot buy the sun, or breath, that this air is readily available without purchase, and so forth: nothing pleases unless expensive. Printed sole is retained; the contextual sense is "the sun."

[2462] Editor. On this page the body's o stands by the daylight passage, while the margin has o Guiccardin followed by p on Seneca. The notes are attached to the passages their contents identify: Guiccardin to Mully-Hamet, Seneca to free light and air. Neither marginal item is omitted.

[2463] Burton. q. "Ingeniosi ad Gulam." Ingenious in serving the gullet.

[2464] Burton. r. "Olim vile mancipium, nunc in omni æstimatione, nunc ars haberi cœpta, &c." Once a lowly slave, now held in the highest esteem; it has now begun to be considered an art, and so forth.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They wear their brains in their bellies, and their guts in their heads; as [2465]Agrippa taxed some parasites of his time, rushing on their own destruction, as if a man should run upon the point of a sword, usque dum rumpantur comedunt: [2466]All day, all night, let the Physitian say what he will, imminent danger, and feral diseases are now ready to seize upon them, that will eat till they vomit, Edunt ut vomant, vomunt ut edant, saith Seneca;	They carry their brains in their bellies and their guts in their heads, as Agrippa said in reproaching certain parasites of his day.[2467] They rush towards their own destruction like someone running onto a sword's point: "they eat until they burst." All day, all night, whatever the physician may say—though immediate danger and deadly diseases stand ready to seize them—they eat until they vomit. "They eat to vomit, and vomit to eat," says Seneca; which Dion relates of Vitellius, Solo transitu ciborum nutriri judicatus: His meat did pass through, and away: or till they burst again. [2468]Strage animantium ventrem onerant, and rake over all the world as so many [2469]slaves, belly-gods, and land-serpents, Et totus orbis ventri nimis angustus, the whole world cannot satisfie their appetite. [2470]Sea, Land, Rivers, Lakes, &c. may not give content to their raging guts.	as Dio relates of Vitellius, "he was thought to be nourished by the mere passage of food": his food passed straight through and out. Or they eat until they burst. "They load their bellies with a slaughter of living creatures," and scour the whole world like so many slaves, worshippers of the belly, and land serpents. "The whole world is too narrow for their stomachs": the whole world cannot satisfy their appetite. Sea, land, rivers, lakes and all the rest cannot content their ravenous guts.

[2465] Burton. s. "Epist. 28. l. 7. quorum in ventre ingenium, in patinis, &c." Letter 28, book 7: whose wit is in their belly, in their dishes, and so forth. The locator follows Burton's attribution to Agrippa and awaits collation.

[2466] Burton. t. "In lucem cœnat. Sertorius." Sertorius dines until daylight. The attribution/name is retained without emendation.

[2467] Editor. A parasite in classical comedy is a dependent flatterer who secures meals from a patron. Burton applies the term more widely to self-serving diners. "Feral" here means deadly or fatal, not wild.

[2468] Burton. u. "Seneca."

[2469] Burton. x. "Mancipia gulæ, dapes non sapore sed sumptu æstimantes. Seneca consol. ad Helvidium." Slaves of the gullet, valuing dishes by their cost rather than their flavour. Seneca, Consolation to Helvidius, as printed; the title probably intends the Consolation to Helvia.

[2470] Burton. y. "Sævientia guttura satiare non possunt fluvii & maria. Æneas Sylvius de miser. curial." Rivers and seas cannot satisfy ravenous gullets. Aeneas Sylvius, On the Misery of Courtiers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To make up the mess, what immoderate drinking in every place? Senem potum pota trahebat anus, how they flock to the Tavern: as if they were fruges consumere nati, born to no other end but to eat and drink, like Ofellius Bibulus, that famous Roman parasite, Qui dum vixit, aut bibit aut minxit; as so many Casks to hold wine, yea worse then a Cask, that marrs wines, and it self is not marred by it, yet these are brave men.	To complete the feast, what excessive drinking everywhere! "A drunken old woman dragged along a drunken old man." How they flock to the tavern, as though "born to consume the fruits of the earth," born for no purpose but eating and drinking, like Ofellius Bibulus, that famous Roman parasite, "who, while he lived, either drank or pissed."[2471] So many casks for holding wine—indeed, worse than a cask, which spoils wines without being spoiled itself by them. Yet these are fine fellows!
Source page 73–74 Silenus Ebrius was no braver. Et quæ fuerunt vitia, mores sunt: tis now the fashion of our times, an honour: Nunc verò res ista eò rediit (as Chrysost. serm. 30. in 5. Ephes. Comments) Ut effeminatæ ridendæque ignaviæ loco habeatur, nolle inebriari; tis now come to that pass, that hee is no Gentleman, a very milk-sop, a clown, of no bringing up, that will not drink, fit for no company;	Drunken Silenus was no finer. "What were once vices are now customs." It is the fashion of our day, an honour. As Chrysostom comments in sermon 30 on Ephesians 5: "Now it has reached the point where refusing to get drunk is treated as effeminate, laughable cowardice."[2472] Things have come to such a pass that anyone unwilling to drink is no gentleman: a milksop, an ill-bred oaf, unfit for any company.

[2471] Editor. The verse about the drunken old couple, the identification of Ofellius Bibulus and the epitaph-like Latin require further collation. The coarse bodily joke is preserved: minxit means urinated or pissed. Burton's claim is translated without treating it as independently verified biography.

[2472] Editor. Silenus is the drunken companion of the wine god Bacchus. The following quotation carries Burton's gendered language of shame. His locator for Chrysostom is preserved as given and has not yet been reconciled with modern sermon numbering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 74 he is your onely gallant that playes it off finest, no disparagement now to stagger in the streets, reel, rave, &c. but much to his fame and renown; as in like case Epidicus told Thesprio his fellow servant, in the [2473]Poet. Ædipol facinus improbum, one urged, the other replied, At jam alii fecere idem, erit illi illa res honori, 'tis now no fault, there be so many brave examples to bear one out;	The only true gallant is the man who knocks it back best. Staggering through the streets, reeling and raving no longer disgrace him: they add to his fame and renown. Compare what Epidicus said to his fellow servant Thesprio in the poet: "By Pollux, a disgraceful deed!" one protested; the other replied, "But others have done the same before; it will bring him honour."[2474] It is no fault now: so many fine examples will support a man.
'tis a credit to have a strong brain, and carry his liquor well: The sole contention who can drink most, and fox his fellow soonest. 'Tis the summum bonum of our Tradesmen, their felicity, life and soul, Tanta dulcedine affectant, saith Pliny, lib. 14. cap. 12. Ut magna pars non aliud vitæ præmium intelligat, their chief comfort, to be merry together in an Alehouse or Tavern, as our modern Muscovites do in their Mede-Inns, and Turks in their Coffa-houses, which much resemble our Taverns;	It is a credit to have a strong head and hold one's liquor. The only contest is who can drink most and get his companion drunk soonest. It is our tradesmen's "highest good," their happiness, their life and soul. "They pursue it with such delight," says Pliny, book 14, chapter 12, "that many recognise no other reward in life." Their chief comfort is making merry together in an alehouse or tavern, as present-day Muscovites do in their mead inns, and Turks in their coffeehouses, which much resemble our taverns.
they will labor hard all day long to be drunk at night, and spend totius anni labores, as S. Ambrose addes, in a tipling feast; convert day into night, as Seneca taxeth some in his times, Pervertunt officia noctis & lucis; when we rise, they commonly go to bed, like our Antipodes,	They will work hard all day to get drunk at night, and spend "a whole year's labour," as Saint Ambrose adds, on a drinking feast. They turn day into night, as Seneca reproaches some people of his time: "They reverse the duties of night and day." When we get up, they usually go to bed, like people on the opposite side of the earth:
Nosque ubi primus equis oriens afflavit anhelis, Illis sera rubens accendit lumina vesper.	When dawn first breathes on us with panting horses, For them red evening lights its late lamps.[2475]

[2473] Burton. z. "Plautus."

[2474] Editor. Plautus, Epidicus 32–33. In the comedy the exchange concerns a soldier's loss of his weapons to the enemy. Burton reuses the joke to show how precedent can turn disgrace into supposed honour; his Latin is slightly shortened.

[2475] Editor. Virgil, Georgics 1.250–251. Dawn and evening are personified; the horses draw the dawn's chariot. Burton prints Illis where the consulted Virgil text has illic; the translation follows Burton's "for them."

Original text 1651	Modern English
So did Petronius in Tacitus, Heliogabalus in Lampridius,	So did Petronius, according to Tacitus, and Heliogabalus, according to Lampridius:
—[2476]Noctes vigilabat ad ipsum Mane, diem totum stertebat.—	He stayed awake all night until the very dawn, And snored the whole day through.[2477]
Smyndiris the Sybarite, never saw the Sun rise or set, so much as once in twenty yeers. Verres, against whom Tully so much enveighs, in Winter he never was extra tectum, vix extra lectum, never almost out of bed, [2478]still wenching, and drinking; so did he spend his time, and so do Myriads in our days.	Smyndiris the Sybarite never saw the sun rise or set even once in twenty years. Verres, whom Cicero attacks so fiercely, never went "out of doors, scarcely out of bed" in winter—hardly ever out of bed, always womanising and drinking. So he spent his time, and so do myriads in our day.
They have gymnasia bibonum, schools and rendezvous; these Centaures and Lapithæ, toss pots, and bowls, as so many balls, invent new tricks, as Salsages, Anchoves, Tobacco, Caveare, pickled Oysters, Herrings, Fumadoes, &c. innumerable salt-meats to increase their appetite, and study how to hurt themselves by taking Antidotes, [2479]to carry their drink the better:	They have "training grounds for drinkers," their schools and meeting places. These Centaurs and Lapiths toss pots and bowls about like balls, invent fresh devices—sausages, anchovies, tobacco, caviar, pickled oysters, herrings, smoked fish and so forth, countless salted foods to increase their appetite—and work out ways to harm themselves by taking antidotes so they can hold their drink better.[2480]

[2476] Burton. a. "Hor." Horace.

[2477] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.3.17–18, originally about the singer Tigellius. Burton applies the lines after his examples of Petronius and Heliogabalus; they are not a quotation from Tacitus or Lampridius.

[2478] Burton. b. "Diei brevitas conviviis, noctis longitudo stupris conterebatur." The short day was spent in banquets, the long night in sexual debauchery.

[2479] Burton. c. "Et quo plus capiant, irritamenta excogitantur." Stimulants are devised so that they may take in more.

[2480] Editor. The Centaurs and Lapiths recall the mythical battle at a wedding feast. Burton's catalogue of appetite stimulants includes tobacco among foods. Fumadoes are salted, smoked fish. The "antidotes" here are supposed aids to drinking more.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2481]and when naught else serves, they will go forth, or be conveyed out to empty their gorge, that they may return to drink afresh. They make laws, insanas leges, contra bibendi fallacias, and [2482]brag of it when they have done, crowning that man that is soonest gone, as their drunken predecessors have done, —[2483]quid ego video? Pl. Cum coronâ Pseudolum ebrium tuum—.	When nothing else works, they go out—or are carried out—to empty their stomachs so that they can come back and drink again. They make rules, "mad laws against cheating at drinking," and boast of their exploits afterwards, crowning whoever gets drunk first, as their drunken predecessors did: "What do I see?"—"Your Pseudolus, drunk and wearing a crown."[2484]
And when they are dead, will have a Can of Wine with [2485]Marons old woman to be engraven on their tombs. So they triumph in villany, and justifie their wickedness; with Rablais that French Lucian, drunkenness is better for the body then Physick, because there be more old drunkards, then old Physitians.	When they die, they will have a wine jug carved on their tombs, like Maron's old woman.[2486] So they glory in vice and justify their wickedness, agreeing with Rabelais, that French Lucian, that drunkenness is better for the body than medicine because there are more old drunkards than old physicians.

[2481] Burton. d. "Fores portantur ut ad convivium reportentur, repleri ut exhauriant, & exhauriri ut bibant. Ambros." They are carried outside so they may be carried back to the feast, filled so they may empty themselves, and emptied so they may drink. Ambrose.

[2482] Burton. e. "Ingentia vasa velut ad ostentationem, &c." Enormous vessels, as if for display, and so forth.

[2483] Burton. f. "Plautus."

[2484] Editor. Plautus, Pseudolus 1286–1287: Simo sees his intoxicated slave Pseudolus wearing a festive wreath. Burton slightly rearranges the wording. The printed speech cue Pl. is retained in the original; the modern text gives the exchange without that ambiguous abbreviation.

[2485] Burton. g. "Lib. 3. Anthol. c. 20." Anthology, book 3, chapter 20. The edition and numbering require collation.

[2486] Editor. "Marons old woman" appears to refer to Maronis, the woman named in Greek Anthology 7.353 (Antipater) and 7.455 (Leonidas). The former describes a wine vessel carved on her tomb; the latter a cup standing there. Both make its emptiness her complaint rather than the loss of family. The modern possessive follows Burton; the early edition behind his Anthology 3.20 numbering remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many such frothy arguments they have, [2487]inviting and encouraging others to do as they do, and love them dearly for it (no glew like to that of good-fellowship.) So did Alcibiades in Greece, Nero, Bonosus, Heliogabalus in Rome, or Alegabalus rather, as he was stiled of old, (as [2488]Ignatius proves out of some old Coyns.) So do many great men still, as [2489]Heresbachius observes.	They have many such frothy arguments, inviting and encouraging others to follow their example, and loving them dearly for it: no glue like good fellowship. So did Alcibiades in Greece, and Nero, Bonosus and Heliogabalus in Rome—or rather Alegabalus, as he was formerly called, as Ignatius proves from some old coins.[2490] Many great men still do the same, as Heresbach observes.
Source page 74–75 When a Prince drinks till his eyes stare, like Bitias in the Poet, —([2491]ille impiger hausit Spumantem vino pateram)—and comes off cleerly, sound Trumpets, Fife and Drums, the spectators will applaud him, the [2492]Bishop himself (if he belie them not) with his Chaplain will stand by and do as much, O dignum principe haustum, 'twas done like a Prince.	When a prince drinks until his eyes stare, like Bitias in the poet—"eagerly he drained the bowl foaming with wine"—and gets through it successfully, sound trumpets, fife and drums![2493] The spectators will applaud him; the bishop himself, with his chaplain, will stand by and do as much, if Heresbach is not slandering them. "Oh, a draught worthy of a prince!" It was done like a prince.

[2487] Burton. h. "Gratiam conciliant potando." They win favour by drinking.

[2488] Burton. i. "Notis ad Cæsares." In notes on the Caesars. Burton's abbreviated title and the attribution to Ignatius are retained.

[2489] Burton. k. "Lib. de educandis principum liberis." The book On Educating Princes' Children.

[2490] Editor. Alegabalus is preserved as Burton's name variant, which also allows the English sound "ale" to colour this drinking passage. The claimed coin evidence and the printed attribution to Ignatius remain unverified.

[2491] Burton. l. "Virg." Virgil.

[2492] Burton. m. "Idem strenui potatoris Episcopi Sacellanus, cum ingentem pateram exhaurit princeps." The same: the chaplain of a hard-drinking bishop, when a prince drains an enormous bowl. The compressed marginal wording is preserved, though the body makes the bishop and chaplain both participants.

[2493] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 1.738–739: Bitias drains the bowl at Dido's feast. Burton inserts vino, "with wine," into the quoted wording. The modern translation follows his version.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 75 Our Dutchmen invite all comers with a pail and a dish, Velut infundibula integras obbas exhauriunt, & in monstrosis poculis, ipsi monstrosi monstrosius epotant, making barrels of their bellies. Incredibile dictu, as [2494]one of their own Countrymen complains: [2495]Quantum liquoris immodestissima gens capiat, &c.	Our Germans invite all comers with a pail and a bowl. “Like funnels, they drain whole jars; monstrous themselves, they drink still more monstrously from monstrous cups,” making barrels of their bellies.[2496] “Incredible to tell,” as one of their own countrymen complains, “how much liquor this utterly immoderate people can hold,” and so on.
How they love a man that will be drunk, crown him and honor him for it, hate him that will not pledg him, stab him, kill him: A most intolerable offence, and not to be forgiven. [2497]He is a mortal enemy that will not drink with him, as Munster relates of the Saxons.	How they love a man willing to get drunk, crown him and honour him for it! How they hate someone who will not drink a toast in return—stab him, kill him! An utterly intolerable offence, never to be forgiven. Anyone who will not drink with a man is his mortal enemy, as Münster relates of the Saxons.
So in Poland, he is the best servitor, and the honestest fellow, saith Alexander Gaguinus, [2498]That drinketh most healths to the honor of his master, he shall be rewarded as a good servant, and held the bravest fellow that carries his liquor best, when as a Brewers horse will bear much more then any sturdy drinker,	So in Poland, says Alexander Gaguinus, the best servant and worthiest fellow is the one who drinks most toasts in his master’s honour. He will be rewarded as a good servant, and the man who holds his liquor best will be considered the finest fellow—although a brewer’s horse will carry far more than any hardened drinker.

[2494] Burton. n. “Bohemus in Saxonia. Adeo immoderate & immodeste ab ipsis bibitur, ut in compotationibus suis non cyathis solum & cantharis sat infundere possint, sed impletum mulctrale apponant, & scutella injecta hortantur quemlibet ad libitum potare.” Boemus, on Saxony. They drink so excessively and unrestrainedly that cups and tankards cannot pour in enough at their drinking parties: they set out a full milk pail, put a bowl in it and encourage everyone to drink at will.

[2495] Burton. o. “Dictu incredibile, quantum hujusce liquoris immodesta gens capiat, plus potantem amicissimum habent, & serto coronant, inimicissimum è contra qui non vult, & cæde & fustibus expiant.” It is incredible how much of this liquor the immoderate people can hold. They count the greater drinker their dearest friend and crown him with a garland; conversely, whoever refuses is their worst enemy, and they avenge the offence with killing and clubs.

[2496] Editor. “Dutchmen” can denote Germans in early modern English. Saxony and the German writer Boemus in the margin establish that sense here. Burton’s national generalisations are part of the satirical argument.

[2497] Burton. p. “Qui potare recusat, hostis habetur, & cæde nonnunquam res expiatur.” Whoever refuses to drink is considered an enemy, and sometimes the matter is settled by killing.

[2498] Burton. q. “Qui melius bibit prò salute domini, melior habetur minister.” Whoever drinks better to his master’s health is considered the better servant.

Original text 1651	Modern English
yet for his noble exploits in this kinde, he shall be accounted a most valiant man, for [2499]Tam inter epulas fortis vir esse potest ac in bello, as much valor is to be found in feasting, as in fighting, and some of our City Captains, and Carpet Knights will make this good, and prove it. Thus they many times wilfully pervert the good temperature of their bodies, stifle their wits, strangle nature, and degenerate into beasts.	Yet for his noble exploits of this sort he will be considered a most valiant man, for "a man can show as much courage at a feast as in war"—there is as much valour in feasting as in fighting. Some of our city captains and carpet knights will uphold and prove that.[2500] Thus they often wilfully upset the healthy balance of their bodies, stifle their wits, choke nature and sink to the level of beasts.

[2499] Burton. r. "Græc. Poeta apud Stobæum, ser. 18." A Greek poet in Stobaeus, discourse 18. The passage is attributed to Panyassis in Stobaeus, Anthology 3.18.21: West, Greek Epic Fragments (2003), fragment 19, line 4, pp. 204–205. Burton's Latin compresses its comparison of vigour at a feast and in battle. His exact Latin intermediary remains unlocated.

[2500] Editor. City captains suggests officers of civic troops; carpet knights are knights of the court or ceremony, disparaged for lacking battlefield experience. The brewer's horse literally carries more liquor as cargo. "Temperature" means the balance of bodily qualities.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some again are in the other extream, and draw this mischief on their heads by too ceremonious and strict diet, being over precise, Cockney-like, and curious in their observation of meats, times, as that Medicina statica prescribes, just so many ounces at dinner, which Lessius enjoyns, so much at supper, not a little more, nor a little less, of such meat, and at such hours,	Others go to the opposite extreme and bring this harm upon themselves through an excessively formal, strict diet. They are over-particular, like pampered weaklings, and fussy about their foods and mealtimes: as that Static Medicine prescribes, exactly so many ounces at dinner, as Lessius commands, so much at supper, neither a little more nor a little less, of such-and-such a food, at such-and-such hours.[2501]
a dyet drink in the morning, Cock-broth, China-broth, at dinner, Plumb-broth, a Chicken, a Rabbet, rib of a Rack of Mutton, wing of a Capon, the Merry-thought of a Hen, &c. to sounder bodies this is too nice and most absurd.	A medicinal drink in the morning; broth of cockerel, broth of China root; at dinner, plum broth, a chicken, a rabbit, a rib from a rack of mutton, a capon's wing, a hen's wishbone portion, and so forth. For healthier bodies this is excessively fussy and utterly absurd.[2502]
Others offend in overmuch fasting: Pining adays, saith [2503]Guianerius, and waking anights, as many Moors and Turks in these our times do. Anchorites, Monks, and the rest of that superstitious rank (as the same Guianerius witnesseth, That he hath often seen to have happened in his time) through immoderate fasting, have been frequently mad.	Others err by fasting too much: starving by day, says Guaineri, and staying awake at night, as many Moors and Turks do in our own time. Hermits, monks and the rest of that superstitious order have often gone mad through excessive fasting, as the same Guaineri testifies that he has frequently seen happen in his time.[2504]

[2501] Editor. "Cockney-like" here means coddled or over-delicate, rather than a modern London accent or identity. Medicina statica points to Santorio's medicine of bodily weighing and measured intake; Lessius also advocated a regulated, restrained diet. Burton objects to an excessively exact regimen for otherwise healthy people, not only to overeating.

[2502] Editor. A diet drink is a medicinal preparation. China-broth contains China root, not simply a Chinese recipe. Plum broth is a rich broth with dried fruit. Merry-thought names the wishbone and, at table, its attached portion of meat; a capon is a castrated male chicken.

[2503] Burton. b. "Qui de die jejunant, & nocte vigilant, facile cadunt in melancholiam; & qui naturæ modum excedunt, c. 5. tract. 15. c. 2. Longa famis tolerantia, ut iis sæpe accidit qui tanto cum fervore Deo servire cupiunt per jejunium, quod maniaci efficiantur, ipse vidi sæpe." Those who fast by day and keep awake by night easily fall into melancholy, as do those who exceed nature's measure. Chapter 5; treatise 15, chapter 2. Prolonged endurance of hunger, as often happens to those who desire so fervently to serve God by fasting that they become mad: I have often seen it myself. The compressed second sentence is translated by its sense.

[2504] Editor. Anchorites are religious recluses. The description of monks as a "superstitious rank" expresses Burton's polemical voice. The references to Muslim fasting and religious asceticism are his generalisations, not neutral descriptions of those practices.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of such men belike Hippocrates speaks, 1. Aphor. 5. when as he saith, [2505]They more offend in too sparing diet, and are worse damnified, then they that feed liberally, and are ready to surfet.	Perhaps Hippocrates means such people in aphorism 1.5, when he says that those on an over-restricted diet suffer more from lapses and are more badly harmed than those who eat freely and are on the verge of overeating.[2506]

[2505] Burton. c in the body; unlettered continuation below the page. “In tenui victu ægri delinquunt, ex quo fit ut majori afficiantur detrimento, majorque sit error tenui quam pleniore victu.” Patients lapse under a scanty diet, with the result that they suffer greater harm, and a lapse is more serious under a scanty diet than a fuller one.

[2506] Editor. Hippocrates, Aphorisms 1.5, concerns the greater harm caused by departures from a very restricted diet and the danger of such a regimen for healthy people. “Offend” here involves lapsing from the regimen; it is not simply a moral condemnation of eating little.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 76 Subsect. 3. Custom of Dyet, Delight, Appetite, Necessity, how they cause or hinder.	Subsection 3 Habit in diet, pleasure, appetite and necessity How they cause or prevent melancholy
No rule is so general, which admits not some exception; to this therefore which hath been hitherto said, (for I shall otherwise put most men out of commons) and those inconveniences which proceed from the substance of meats, an intemperate or unseasonable use of them, custom somewhat detracts, and qualifies, according to that of Hippocrates 2. Aphorif. 50. [2507]Such things as we have been long customed to, though they be evill in their own nature; yet they are less offensive.	No rule is so general that it admits no exception. Habit therefore takes something away from, and qualifies, what has been said so far—otherwise I would deprive most people of their meals—and the harms arising from the substance of foods or their excessive or ill-timed use.[2508] As Hippocrates says in aphorism 2.50, things to which we have long been accustomed are less harmful, even if they are bad in themselves.
Otherwise it might well be objected, that it were a meer [2509]tyrannie to live after those strict rules of Physick; for custom [2510]doth alter nature it self, and to such as are used to them it makes bad meats wholsome, and unseasonable times to cause no disorder.	Otherwise one might well object that living by medicine's strict rules would be sheer tyranny. Habit changes nature itself: for people used to them, it makes bad foods wholesome and unsuitable mealtimes harmless.

[2507] Burton. d. "Quæ longo tempore consueta sunt, etiamsi deteriora, minus in assuetis molestare solent." Things long accustomed to, even if worse, usually cause less trouble to those accustomed to them. The printed spacing in assuetis is retained.

[2508] Editor. "Commons" means allotted or communal meals, familiar in colleges and other institutions. Burton jokes that his prohibitions would leave most people with nothing to eat. Aphorisms 2.50 also allows that habits may need changing; Burton quotes only the concession to accustomed things.

[2509] Burton. e. "Qui medicè vivit, miserè vivit." Whoever lives by medical rules lives miserably.

[2510] Burton. f. "Consuetudo altera natura." Habit is a second nature.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cider and Perry are windy drinks, so are all fruits windy in themselves, cold most part, yet in some shires of [2511]England, Normandy in France, Guipuscoa in Spain, tis their common drink, and they are no whit offended with it. In Spain, Italy, and Africk, they live most on roots, raw hearbs, Camels [2512]milk, and it agrees well with them; which to a stranger will cause much grievance.	Cider and perry produce wind, as all fruits do in themselves, being mostly cold; yet in some English counties, in Normandy in France, and in Guipuzcoa in Spain, these are the usual drinks and cause no harm. In Spain, Italy and Africa, people live chiefly on roots, raw vegetables and camel's milk, which agree with them but would cause a stranger much trouble.[2513]
In Wales, lacticiniis vescuntur, as Humfrey Lluyd confesseth, a Cambro-Brittain himself, in his elegant Epistle to Abraham Ortelius, they live most on white meats: in Holland on Fish, Roots, [2514]Butter; and so at this day in Greece, as [2515]Bellonius observes, they had much rather feed on fish then flesh. With us Maxima pars victus in carne consistit, we feed on flesh most part, saith [2516]Polydor Virgil, as all Northern countries do;	In Wales, "they feed on dairy produce," as Humphrey Llwyd, himself a Welsh Briton, acknowledges in his elegant letter to Abraham Ortelius: they live chiefly on dairy foods. In Holland they live on fish, roots and butter; and in Greece today, as Belon observes, they much prefer fish to meat. With us, "the greater part of the diet consists of meat": we feed chiefly on meat, says Polydore Vergil, as all northern countries do.

[2511] Burton. g. "Herefordshire, Glocestershire Worcestershire." Herefordshire, Gloucestershire and Worcestershire.

[2512] Burton. h. "Leo Afer. l. 1. solo camelorum lacte contenti, nil præterea deliciarum ambiunt." Leo Africanus, book 1: content with camel's milk alone, they seek no other delicacies.

[2513] Editor. "Windy" means producing gas; "cold" belongs to humoral classification. Burton compresses reports from several regions into one sentence. The modern text preserves that grouping without claiming that every listed food was staple throughout each region.

[2514] Burton. i. "Flandri vinum butyro dilutum bibunt (nauseo referens) ubique butyrum inter omnia fercula & bellaria locum obtinet. Steph. præfat. Herod." The Flemish drink wine mixed with butter—I feel sick relating it—and butter finds a place among all their dishes and sweetmeats. Stephanus, preface to Herodotus. The raised contraction in ubiq; is expanded.

[2515] Burton. Asterisk. "Delectantur Græci piscibus magis quam carnibus." The Greeks take more pleasure in fish than meat. Printed above note i, but linked by its asterisk to Belon in the body.

[2516] Burton. k. "Lib. 1. hist. Ang." History of England, book 1.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and it would be very offensive to us to live after their dyet, or they to live after ours: We drink beer, they Wine; they use Oyl, we Butter: we in the North are [2517]great eaters, they most sparing in those hotter Countries: and yet they and we following our own customs, are well pleased.	It would be very harmful for us to follow their diet, or for them to follow ours. We drink beer, they wine; they use oil, we butter. We in the north are great eaters; they are extremely sparing in those hotter countries. Yet both they and we, following our own customs, are content.
An Æthiopian of old seeing an European eat bread, wondred, quomodo stercoribus vescentes viverimus, how we could eat such kinde of meats: so much differed his Country-men from ours in dyet, that as mine [2518]Author infers, si quis illorum victum apud nos æmulari vellet; if any man should so feed with us, it would be all one to nourish, as Cicuta, Aconitum, or Hellebor it self.	An Ethiopian in ancient times, seeing a European eat bread, wondered "how we could live by feeding on dung"—how we could eat such food. So different was his countrymen's diet from ours that, as my source concludes, "if anyone among us wished to imitate their diet," eating that way here would be as nourishing as hemlock, aconite or hellebore itself.[2519]

[2517] Burton. l. "P. Jovius descrip. Britonum. they sit, eat and drink all day at dinner in Island, Muscovy, and those Northern parts." Paolo Giovio, Description of the Britons. They sit eating and drinking at dinner all day in Iceland, Muscovy and those northern regions.

[2518] Burton. Asterisk. "Suidas vict. Herod. nihilo cum eo melius quam si quis Cicutam, Aconitum, &c." Suidas vict. Herod. He fares no better with it than if someone [ate] hemlock, aconite, and so forth. The compressed references and incomplete construction are retained; the supplying of "ate" follows the body.

[2519] Editor. The Latin is sharper than Burton's English gloss: it explicitly says dung. Both are retained in modern English. The point is the claimed force of dietary difference, with poisonous or drastic medicinal plants used as a comparison; the compressed Suidas and Herodotus reference remains to be resolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
At this day in China the common people live in a maner altogether on roots and herbs, and to the wealthiest, Horse, Ass, Mule, Dogs, Cat-flesh is as delightsom as the rest, so [2520]Mat. Riccius the Jesuit relates, who lived many years amongst them. The Tartars eat raw meat, and most commonly [2521]hors-flesh, drink milk and blood, as the Nomades of old.	In China today the common people live almost entirely on roots and vegetables, and the wealthiest find horse, ass, mule, dog and cat meat as pleasing as other food, according to Matteo Ricci, the Jesuit who lived among them for many years. The Tartars eat raw meat, most commonly horseflesh, and drink milk and blood, as the nomads of old did.
Et lac concretum cum sanguine potat equino.	"And he drinks curdled milk with horses' blood."[2522]
Source page 76–77 They scoff at our Europeans for eating bread, which they call tops of weeds, and horse meat, not fit for men; and yet Scaliger accounts them a sound and witty Nation, living an hundred yeers; even in the civilest Countrey of them they do thus, as Benedict the Jesuite observed in his travels, from the great Mogors Court by Land to Paquin, which Riccius contends to be the same with Cambulu in Cataia.	They mock our Europeans for eating bread, which they call the tops of weeds and horse fodder, unfit for human beings. Yet Scaliger considers them a healthy and intelligent nation, living a hundred years. They do this even in their most civilised country, as Benedict the Jesuit observed while travelling overland from the Great Mogul's court to Paquin, which Ricci argues is the same as Cambulu in Cathay.[2523]

[2520] Burton. m. "Expedit. in Sinas lib. 1. c. 3. hortensium herbarum & olerum, apud Sinas quam apud nos longe frequentior usus, complures quippe de vulgo reperias nulla alia re vel tenuitatis, vel religionis causa vescentes. Equus, Mulus, Asellus, &c. æquè ferè vescuntur ac pabula omnia, Mat. Riccius, lib. 5. cap. 12." Expedition into China, book 1, chapter 3. Garden herbs and vegetables are used much more often among the Chinese than among us: many common people eat nothing else, because of poverty or religion. Horse, mule, ass, and so forth are eaten almost like every other food. Matteo Ricci, book 5, chapter 12. The final Latin is irregular; the translation follows Burton's accompanying sense.

[2521] Burton. n. "Tartari mulis, equis vescuntur & crudis carnibus, & fruges contemnunt, dicentes, hoc jumentorum pabulum & boum, non hominum." The Tartars eat mules, horses and raw flesh, and despise grain, saying it is fodder for beasts of burden and oxen, not people.

[2522] Editor. Virgil, Georgics 3.463, in a passage on northern peoples and horse blood. Burton places the verse after his account of the Tartars and ancient nomads. It is translated as verse independently of his prose.

[2523] Editor. Mogor means the Mughal ruler; Paquin and Cambulu are historical names associated with Beijing, and Cataia is Cathay. Benedict is the Jesuit traveller Bento de Góis. Góis reached Suzhou in Gansu and died there; Burton's wording telescopes the route to China into a journey to Paquin. The precise passage in Ricci still requires collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 77 In Scandia their bread is usually dryed fish, and so likewise in the Shetland Iles: and their other fare, as in Island, saith [2524]Dithmarus Bleskenius, Butter, Cheese, and fish; their drink, water, their lodging on the ground. In America in many places their bread is roots, their meat Palmitos, Pinas, Potatos, &c. and such fruits.	In Scandinavia dried fish generally takes the place of bread, as it also does in the Shetland Islands. Their other food, as in Iceland, says Dithmarus Bleskenius, is butter, cheese and fish; they drink water and sleep on the ground. In many parts of America roots replace bread, and their food consists of palm hearts, pineapples, potatoes and similar produce.[2525]
There be of them too that familiarly drink [2526]salt Sea-water, all their lives, eat [2527]raw meat, grass, and that with delight. With some, Fish, Serpents, Spiders; and in divers places they [2528]eat mans flesh raw, and rosted, even the Emperor [2529]MetaZuma himself.	Some of them habitually drink salt seawater throughout their lives and eat raw meat and grass with pleasure. Some eat fish, snakes and spiders; in various places they eat human flesh, raw and roasted—even the emperor Montezuma himself.[2530]

[2524] Burton. o. “Islandiæ descriptione victus eorum butyro, lacte, caseo consistit: pisces loco panis habent, potus aqua, aut serum, sic vivunt sine medicina multi ad annos 200.” In the Description of Iceland: their diet consists of butter, milk and cheese; fish takes the place of bread; their drink is water or whey. In this way many live without medicine to two hundred years. This longevity claim is Burton’s source’s report.

[2525] Editor. Scandia denotes Scandinavia and Island means Iceland. Palmitos are edible palm hearts, Pinas pineapples, and Potatos may include sweet potatoes. Burton is listing travellers’ reports of staple foods, not giving a modern dietary survey.

[2526] Burton. Asterisk. “Laet. occident. Ind. descrip. lib. 11. cap. 10. Aquam marinam bibere sueti absque noxâ.” De Laet, Description of the West Indies, book 11, chapter 10. Accustomed to drinking seawater without harm.

[2527] Burton. Asterisk. “Davies 2. voyage.” Davies’s second voyage; the precise passage remains to be collated.

[2528] Burton. p. “Patagones.” Patagonians.

[2529] Burton. q. “Benzo & Fer. Cortesius lib. novus orbis inscrip.” Benzoni and Ferdinand Cortés, in the book entitled New World. The compressed bibliographical relationship is retained.

[2530] Editor. These are transmitted European travel claims. The marginal Patagones attaches a cannibalism allegation to Patagonians; the following claim names Montezuma. Translation preserves these assertions without endorsing them, just as it preserves the claim about habitual seawater drinking. Each requires assessment against its cited travel source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In some coasts again, [2531]one tree yields them Coquernuts, meat and drink, fire, fuel, apparel; with his leaves, oyl, vinegar, cover for houses, &c. and yet these men going naked, feeding course, live commonly a hundred yeers, are seldom or never sick; all which dyet our Physitians forbid.	On some coasts, again, a single tree supplies coconuts, food and drink, fire and fuel, clothing from its leaves, oil, vinegar, roofing for houses and so forth. Yet these people, naked and living on coarse fare, commonly live a hundred years and are seldom or never ill—all on a diet our physicians forbid.
In Westphaling they feed most part on fat meats and wourts, knuckle deep, and call it [2532]cerebrum Jovis: in the Low Countries with roots, in Italy Frogs and Snails are used. The Turks, saith Busbequius, delight most in fryed meats. In Muscovy, Garlick and Onions are ordinary meat and sauce, which would be pernicious to such as are unaccustomed unto them, delightsom to others; and all is [2533]because they have been brought up unto it.	In Westphalia they mostly eat rich meats and cabbages, knuckle-deep, calling it "Jupiter's brain."[2534] In the Low Countries they eat roots; in Italy, frogs and snails. The Turks, says Busbecq, delight most in fried foods. In Muscovy garlic and onions are ordinary food and seasoning: harmful to people unaccustomed to them, delightful to others, all because they have been brought up on them.
Husbandmen and such as labor, can eat fat Bacon, salt gross meat, hard cheese, &c. (O dura messorum ilia) course bread at all times, go to bed and labor upon a full stomack, which to some idle persons would be present death, and is against the rules of Physick; so that custom is all in all.	Farm workers and other labourers can eat fatty bacon, heavy salted meat, hard cheese and so forth—"O tough stomachs of reapers!"—and coarse bread at any time, and can go to bed or work on a full stomach.[2535] This would mean immediate death to some inactive people and is against the rules of medicine. So habit is everything.

[2531] Burton. r. "Linscosten, c. 56. palmæ instar, totius orbis arboribus longe præstantior." Linschoten, chapter 56. Like a palm, far surpassing all the trees of the world.

[2532] Burton. s. "Lips. epist." Lipsius, letters.

[2533] Burton. t. "Teneris assuescere multum." Becoming accustomed while young counts for much.

[2534] Editor. Wourts means cabbage or other leafy vegetables. "Jupiter's brain" is a mock-grand name for the food, suggesting something fit for a god; Burton cites Lipsius without specifying the letter.

[2535] Editor. Horace, Epode 3.4: an exclamation about the strong stomachs of harvesters, in a poem complaining of garlic. Here it supports Burton's distinction between hard-working and inactive bodies.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Our travellers finde this by common experience when they come in far Countries, and use their diet, they are [2536]suddenly offended, as our Hollanders and Englishmen when they touch upon the coasts of Africk, those Indian Capes and Islands, are commonly molested with Calentures, Fluxes, and much distempered by reason of their fruits. [2537]Peregrina, etsi suavia, solent vescentibus perturbationes insignes adferre, strange meats, though pleasant, cause notable alterations and distempers.	Our travellers commonly find this when they reach distant countries and adopt the local diet: they are suddenly made ill. Our Dutch and English sailors, for example, when they call at the coasts of Africa and those Indian capes and islands, are often troubled by burning fevers and diarrhoea and made very ill by the fruits.[2538] "Foreign foods, though pleasant, commonly cause serious disturbances in those who eat them": unfamiliar foods, however pleasant, cause marked changes and disorders.
On the other side, use or custom mitigates or makes all good again. Mithridates by often use, which Pliny wonders at, was able to drink poyson; and a maid as Curtius records, sent to Alexander from K. Porus, was brought up with poyson from her infancy. The Turks, saith Bellonius, lib. 3. c. 15. eat Opium familiarly, a dram at once, which we dare not take in grains.	On the other hand, practice or habit lessens the harm or puts everything right again. Through repeated use, Mithridates was able to drink poison, which amazes Pliny; and a girl sent by King Porus to Alexander, as Curtius records, had been brought up on poison from infancy.[2539] The Turks, says Belon, book 3, chapter 15, habitually eat opium, a dram at a time, whereas we dare not take even grains of it.

[2536] Burton. u. "Repentinæ mutationes noxam pariunt. Hippocrat. Aphorism. 21. Epist. 6. sect. 3." Sudden changes produce harm. Hippocrates, aphorism 21; Epist. 6, section 3. The printed locator is retained without silently changing Epist. to a different work.

[2537] Burton. x. "Bruerinus, l. 1. cap. 23." Bruyérin, book 1, chapter 23.

[2538] Editor. Calentures are burning fevers, often discussed in accounts of hot climates; fluxes are bowel discharges, commonly diarrhoea or dysentery. The explanation blaming fruit belongs to Burton's sources.

[2539] Editor. Mithridates' resistance to poison and the poison-fed maiden are received stories used as evidence for habituation. Burton's attribution of the second to Curtius and its precise textual source remain unresolved; the claim is retained without modern validation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2540]Garcius ab Horto writes of one whom he saw at Goa in the East Indies, that took ten drams of Opium in three days; and yet consultò loquebatur, spake understandingly, so much can custom do. [2541]Theophrastus speaks of a Shepherd that could eat Hellebor in substance.	Garcia de Orta writes of someone he saw at Goa in the East Indies who took ten drams of opium in three days and yet "spoke coherently"—spoke with understanding. Such is the power of habit. Theophrastus speaks of a shepherd who could eat hellebore in its solid form.[2542]
And therefore Cardan concludes out of Galen, Consuetudinem utcunque ferendam, nisi valde malam, Custom is howsoever to be kept, except it be extream bad: he adviseth all men to keep their old customs, and that by the authority of [2543]Hippocrates himself, Dandum aliquid tempori, ætati, regioni, consuetudini, and therefore to [2544]continue as they began, be it diet, bathe, exercise, &c. or whatsoever else.	Cardan therefore concludes from Galen: "Habit must, in any case, be tolerated unless it is very bad." Habit should be maintained, unless extremely bad. He advises everyone to keep to their old habits, citing Hippocrates himself: "Some allowance must be made for season, age, country and habit." They should therefore continue as they began, whether in diet, bathing, exercise or anything else.[2545]

[2540] Burton. y. "Simpl. med. c. 4. l. 1." On Simple Medicines, book 1, chapter 4, as cited.

[2541] Burton. z. "Heurnius, l. 3. c. 19. prax. med." Heurnius, Medical Practice, book 3, chapter 19.

[2542] Editor. A dram is much larger than a grain in the apothecaries' weight system. These reports illustrate Burton's argument about acquired tolerance; no dose is converted into present-day units. A blemish partly obscures "three days" in this copy; the visible letters and sentence support that reading. Hellebore "in substance" means the plant material itself rather than a prepared extract.

[2543] Burton. Asterisk. "Aphorif. 17." Aphorism 17; the book is not specified.

[2544] Burton. a. "In dubiis consuetudinem sequatur adolescens, & inceptis perseveret." In doubtful matters, let the young person follow habit and persevere in what has been begun.

[2545] Editor. The printed Latin has ferendam, "to be borne" or "tolerated," followed by Burton's stronger English "to be kept." Both formulations are preserved. The qualification "unless very bad" limits this defence of established habit; the final aphorism's exact source remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 77–78 Another exception is delight, or appetite, to such and such meats: Though they be hard of digestion, melancholy; yet as Fuchsius excepts cap. 6. lib. 2. Instit. sect. 2. [2546]The stomack doth readily digest, and willingly entertain such meats we love most, and are pleasing to us, abhors on the other side such as we distast. Which Hippocrates confirms, Aphorif. 2. 38. Some cannot endure Cheese, out of a secret Antipathy, or to see a rosted Duck, which to others is a delightsom meat.	Another exception is pleasure, or a liking for particular foods. Though they are hard to digest and produce melancholy, Fuchs makes this qualification in his Institutes, book 2, section 2, chapter 6: the stomach readily digests and willingly receives the foods we like best and find pleasant, while rejecting those we dislike. Hippocrates confirms this in Aphorisms 2.38.[2547] Some people cannot bear cheese because of a hidden antipathy, or even the sight of a roast duck, which others find delicious.
Source page 78 The last exception is necessity, poverty, want, hunger, which drives men many times to do that which otherwise they are loath, or cannot endure, and thankfully to accept of it: As Beverage in ships, and in sieges of great Cities, to feed on Dogs, Cats, Rats, and Men themselves.[2548] Three outlaws in [2549]Hector Boethius, being driven to their shifts, did eat raw flesh, and flesh of such fowl as they could catch, in one of the Hebrides for some few moneths.	The last exception is necessity: poverty, want and hunger often drive people to do, and gratefully accept, what they would otherwise dislike or could not bear—as with the drink aboard ships, or eating dogs, cats, rats and even human beings during sieges of great cities.[2550] Three outlaws in Hector Boece, left to fend for themselves, ate raw flesh and the flesh of whatever birds they could catch, for a few months on one of the Hebrides.

[2546] Burton. b. “Qui cum voluptate assumuntur cibi, ventriculus avidius complectitur, expeditiusque concoquit, & quæ displicent aversatur.” The stomach receives more eagerly and digests more readily foods taken with pleasure, and turns away from those that displease it.

[2547] Editor. Hippocrates, Aphorisms 2.38, prefers food or drink that is a little less suitable but more agreeable to something better yet less agreeable. Burton uses it to qualify general prohibitions by personal appetite. “Meats” means foods; “melancholy” applied to food means thought to produce melancholy, not sad in mood.

[2548] Burton. c. “Nothing against a good stomack, as the saying is.” The saying is printed beside the passage on necessity; no clear corresponding letter appears in the body. It is attached to that passage here.

[2549] Burton. d. “Lib. 7. Hist. Scot.” History of Scotland, book 7.

[2550] Editor. “Beverage” names shipboard drink here; the passage does not specify its composition. The marginal saying means that a strong appetite can overcome objections to what is available. The siege examples and Boece anecdote illustrate necessity rather than recommended foods. The anecdote has not been located in the consulted text of Boece’s cited book 7; its attribution remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
These things do mitigate or disannul that which hath been said of melancholy meats, and make it more tolerable; but to such as are wealthy, live plenteously, at ease, may take their choice, and refrain if they will, these viands are to be forborn, if they be inclined to, or suspect melancholy, as they tender their healths: Otherwise if they be intemperate, or disordered in their diet, at their peril be it. Qui monet amat, Ave & cave.	These considerations qualify or overturn what has been said about foods that cause melancholy, and make such food more tolerable. But those who are wealthy, live in plenty and ease, and can choose what to eat or abstain if they wish, should avoid these foods if they are prone to melancholy or suspect it in themselves, as they value their health. Otherwise, if they eat immoderately or without order, let it be at their peril. “He who warns you loves you. Farewell, and beware.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsect. 4. Retention and Evacuation a cause, and how.	Subsection 4 Retention and evacuation as causes, and how they act
Of Retention and Evacuation, there be divers kindes, which are either concomitant, assisting, or sole causes many times of melancholy. [2551]Galen reduceth defect and abundance to this head; others, [2552]All that is separated, or remains. In the first rank of these, I may well reckon up Costiveness, and keeping in of our ordinary excrements, which as it often causeth other diseases, so this of Melancholy in particular.	There are several kinds of retention and evacuation, which often accompany, assist or alone cause melancholy. Galen places deficiency and excess under this heading; others include everything discharged or retained. Foremost among these I may well put constipation and the retention of our usual bodily waste, which, as it often causes other diseases, causes melancholy in particular.[2553]
[2554]Celsus, lib. 1. cap. 3. saith, It produceth inflammation of the head, dulness, cloudiness, headach, &c. Prosper Calenus, lib. de atra bile, will have it distemper not the organ only, [2555]but the minde it self by troubling of it: And sometimes it is a sole cause of Madness, as you may read in the first Book of [2556]Skenkius his Medicinal Observations.	Celsus, book 1, chapter 3, says that it produces inflammation of the head, dullness, cloudiness, headache and so forth.[2557] Prosper Calenus, in his book On Black Bile, holds that it disorders not only the bodily organ but the mind itself, by disturbing it. Sometimes it is the sole cause of madness, as you may read in the first book of Schenck's Medical Observations.

[2551] Burton. e. "30. artis." Chapter 30 of the Art of Medicine; the abbreviated citation is retained.

[2552] Burton. f. "Quæ excernuntur aut subsistunt." Things discharged or retained. The following unlettered marginal heading reads "Costiveness."

[2553] Editor. Retention and evacuation concern substances kept in or discharged from the body. They belong to the early medical regimen of the "non-naturals," factors whose management could preserve or disturb health. "Defect" means deficiency, and costiveness constipation.

[2554] Burton. g. "Ex ventre suppresso, inflationes, capitis dolores, caligines crescunt." From constipation arise swellings, headaches and dimness.

[2555] Burton. h. "Excrementa retenta mentis agitationem parere solent." Retained bodily wastes commonly produce agitation of mind.

[2556] Burton. i. "Cap. de Mel." Chapter on melancholy.

[2557] Editor. Celsus, On Medicine 1.3.25–26, associates constipation with wind, visual disturbance and headache, then cautions against frequent purgatives. Burton's body text says "inflammation"; his Latin margin has inflationes, swellings or distensions. Both readings are preserved rather than silently made identical. The "organ" is the bodily instrument of mental activity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A young Merchant going to Nordeling Fair in Germany, for ten days space never went to stool; at his return he was [2558]grievously melancholy, thinking that he was robbed, and would not be perswaded, but that all his money was gone: His friends thought he had some Philtrum given him, but Cnelinus a Physitian being sent for, found his [2559]Costiveness alone to be the cause, and thereupon gave him a Clister, by which he was speedily recovered.	A young merchant going to the fair at Nördlingen in Germany did not pass a stool for ten days. On his return he was severely melancholy, believing he had been robbed; nothing could persuade him that all his money was not gone. His friends thought someone had given him a love potion, but Cnelinus, a physician who was called in, found constipation alone to be the cause. He gave him an enema, and the merchant soon recovered.[2560]
Trincavellius, consult. 35. lib. 1. saith as much of a melancholy Lawyer, to whom he administred Physick, and Rodericus à Fonseca consult. 85. Tom. 2. [2561]of a Patient of his, that for eight days was bound, and therefore melancholy affected. Other Retentions and Evacuations there are, not simply necessary, but at some times; as Fernelius accounts them, Path. lib. 1. cap. 15. as suppression of emrods, monthly issues in women, bleeding at nose, immoderate, or no use at all of Venus; or any other ordinary issues.	Trincavellius, consultation 35, book 1, says the same of a melancholy lawyer whom he treated, and Rodrigo da Fonseca, consultation 85, volume 2, of a patient who was constipated for eight days and consequently affected by melancholy. There are other retentions and evacuations, necessary only at certain times rather than invariably, as Fernel classifies them in his Pathology, book 1, chapter 15: the suppression of haemorrhoidal bleeding, women's monthly periods or nosebleeds; excessive sexual activity or none at all; or other customary discharges.[2562]

[2558] Burton. k. "Tam delirus, ut vix se hominem agnosceret." So deranged that he scarcely recognised himself as human.

[2559] Burton. l. "Alvus astrictus causa." A constipated bowel was the cause. The printed astrictus is retained.

[2560] Editor. A philtrum is a love potion, here suspected of disturbing the mind; a clister is an enema. "Nordeling" is Nördlingen. The reported rapid cure remains Schenck's case as transmitted by Burton; the name Cnelinus has not been independently resolved.

[2561] Burton. Asterisk. "Per octo dies alvum siccum habet, & nihil reddit." For eight days he has had a dry bowel and passes nothing. Printed siccum is retained.

[2562] Editor. "Emrods" means haemorrhoids; suppression here is principally the stopping of their bleeding. "Monthly issues" means menstrual periods. Venus, the goddess of love, is used as a name for sexual intercourse. "Physick" can mean medicine or medical treatment, often including a purge.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 78–79 [2563]Detention of emrods, or monthly issues, Villanovanus Breviar. lib. 1. cap. 18. Arculanus, cap. 16. in 9. Rasis, Vittorius Faventinus, pract. mag. Tract. 2. cap. 15. Bruel, &c. put for ordinary causes. Fuchsius, l. 2. sect. 5. c. 30. goes farther, and saith, That [2564]many men unseasonably cured of the emrods, have been corrupted with melancholy, seeking to avoid Scylla, they fall into Charybdis.	Villanovanus, Abridgement, book 1, chapter 18; Arculanus, chapter 16 of his commentary on book 9 of Rhazes; Vittorius Faventinus, Great Practice, treatise 2, chapter 15; Bruel and others list the retention of haemorrhoidal bleeding or monthly periods among the usual causes. Fuchs, book 2, section 5, chapter 30, goes further, saying that many people, cured of haemorrhoids at an unsuitable time, have been afflicted with melancholy: seeking to avoid Scylla, they fall into Charybdis.[2565]
Source page 79 Galen, l. de hum. commen. 3. ad text. 26. illustrates this by an example of Lucius Martius, whom he cured of madness, contracted by this means: And [2566]Skenkius hath two other instances of two melancholy and mad women, so caused from the suppression of their moneths. The same may be said of bleeding at the nose, if it be suddenly stopt, and have been formerly used, as [2567]Villanovanus urgeth: And [2568]Fuchsius, lib. 2. sect. 5. cap. 33. stifly maintains, That without great danger, such an issue may not be stayed.	Galen, On Humours, commentary 3 on text 26, illustrates this with Lucius Martius, whom he cured of madness brought on in this way. Schenck gives two further cases of women made melancholy and mad by the suppression of their periods. The same may be said of a nosebleed that is suddenly stopped when it has previously been customary, as Villanovanus insists. Fuchs, book 2, section 5, chapter 33, firmly maintains that such a discharge cannot be stopped without great danger.

[2563] Burton. m. “Sive per nares, sive hæmorrhoides.” Whether through the nose or through haemorrhoids.

[2564] Burton. n. “Multi intempestive ab Hæmorrhoidibus curati, melancholia corrupti sunt. Incidit in Scyllam, &c.” Many cured of haemorrhoids at an unsuitable time have been afflicted with melancholy. He falls into Scylla, and so forth. The abbreviated Latin names Scylla; Burton’s English describes falling into Charybdis.

[2565] Editor. Scylla and Charybdis are the paired dangers of classical seafaring: escaping one can mean falling into the other. The medical premise is that stopping an accustomed discharge can divert or retain harmful material elsewhere in the body.

[2566] Burton. o. “Lib. 1. de Mania.” Book 1, on madness.

[2567] Burton. p. “Breviar. l. 7. c. 18.” Abridgement, book 7, chapter 18, as printed; the surrounding body citations give book 1.

[2568] Burton. q. “Non sine magno incommodo ejus, cui sanguis à naribus promanat, noxii sanguinis vacuatio impediri potest.” The discharge of harmful blood cannot be stopped without serious injury to the person whose nose is bleeding.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Venus omitted, produceth like effects. Mathiolus, epist. 5. l. penult. [2569]avoucheth of his knowledg, that some through bashfulness abstained from Venery, and thereupon became very heavy and dull, and some others that were very timorous, melancholy, and beyond all measure sad. Oribasius, med. collect. l. 6. c. 37. speaks of some, [2570]That if they do not use carnal copulation, are continually troubled with heaviness and headach; and some in the same case by intermission of it.	Abstaining from sex produces similar effects. Mattioli, letter 5 of the penultimate book, vouches from his own knowledge that some people abstained through bashfulness and consequently became very sluggish and dull, while others became very fearful, melancholy and immeasurably sad. Oribasius, Medical Collections, book 6, chapter 37, speaks of some who, unless they have sexual intercourse, are continually troubled by heaviness and headache, and of others brought to the same state by interrupting it.
Not use of it hurts many, Arculanus, c. 6. in 9. Rasis, and Magninus, part. 3. cap. 5. think, because it [2571]sends up poysoned vapors to the brain and heart. And so doth Galen himself hold, That if this natural seed be over-long kept (in some parties) it turns to poyson. Hieronymus Mercurialis in his Chapter of Melancholy, cites it for an especial cause of this malady, [2572]Priapismus, Satyriasis, &c. Haliabbas 5. Theor. c. 36. reckons up this and many other diseases.	Arculanus, chapter 6 on book 9 of Rhazes, and Magninus, part 3, chapter 5, think that abstinence harms many people because it sends poisonous vapours up to the brain and heart. Galen himself likewise holds that if natural seed is retained too long, it turns to poison in some people.[2573] Girolamo Mercuriale, in his chapter on melancholy, cites this as a particular cause of the disease, of priapism, satyriasis and so forth. Haly Abbas, Theoretical Medicine, book 5, chapter 36, lists this and many other diseases.[2574]

[2569] Burton. r. “Novi quosdam præ pudore à coitu abstinentes, torpidos, pigrosque factos: nonnullos etiam melancholicos, præter modum mæstos, timidosque.” I have known some who abstained from intercourse out of shame become sluggish and listless; others became melancholy, excessively sad and fearful.

[2570] Burton. s. “Nonnulli nisi coeant, assiduè capitis gravitate infestantur. Dicit se novisse quosdam tristes, & ita factos ex intermissione Veneris.” Some are continually troubled by heaviness of the head unless they have intercourse. He says he knew some who were sad, having become so from interruption of sexual activity.

[2571] Burton. t. “Vapores venenatos mittit sperma ad cor & cerebrum. Sperma plus diu retentum, transit in venenum.” Seed sends poisonous vapours to the heart and brain. Seed retained too long turns to poison. The printed phrase plus diu is retained.

[2572] Burton. u. “Graves producit corporis & animi ægritudines.” It produces serious illnesses of body and mind.

[2573] Editor. “Natural seed” means generative fluid. Burton’s authorities regard retained seed as capable of corruption and of emitting harmful vapours to the brain and heart. This is a humoral explanation of illness, not a modern account of sexual abstinence.

[2574] Editor. Priapism names a prolonged erection; satyriasis here means excessive or uncontrolled male sexual desire. These terms occur in a historical catalogue of supposed effects of retained seed, not as equivalent diagnoses of melancholy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Villanovanus Breviar. l. 1. c. 18. saith, He knew [2575]many Monks and Widows, grievously troubled with melancholy, and that from this sole cause. Lodovicus Mercatus l. 2. de mulierum affect. cap. 4. and Rodericus à Castro de morbis mulier. l. 2. c. 3. treat largely of this subject, and will have it produce a peculiar kinde of melancholy, in stale Maids, Nuns, and Widows, ob suppressionem mensium & venerem omissam, timidæ, mæstæ, anxiæ, verecundæ, suspitiosæ, languentes, consilii inopes, cum summa vitæ & rerum meliorum desperatione, &c. they are melancholy in the highest degree, and all for want of husbands.	Villanovanus, Abridgement, book 1, chapter 18, says he knew many monks and widows severely troubled with melancholy from this cause alone. Luis Mercado, On the Disorders of Women, book 2, chapter 4, and Rodrigo de Castro, On the Diseases of Women, book 2, chapter 3, discuss the subject at length. They hold that it produces a special kind of melancholy in ageing unmarried women, nuns and widows: "because of suppressed menstruation and abstinence from sex, they are fearful, sad, anxious, bashful, suspicious, languid and at a loss what to do, utterly despairing of life and any improvement," and so forth. They are melancholy to the highest degree, and all for want of husbands.[2576]
Ælianus Montaltus, cap. 37. de melanchol. confirms as much out of Galen; so doth Wierus, [2577]Christoferus à Vega de art. med. lib. 3. c. 14. relates many such examples, of men, and women, that he had seen so melancholy.	Aelianus Montalto, On Melancholy, chapter 37, confirms as much from Galen, as does Weyer. Cristóbal de Vega, The Art of Medicine, book 3, chapter 14, relates many such examples of men and women whom he had seen in this melancholy state.

[2575] Burton. x. "Ex spermate supra modum retento monachos, & viduas melancholicos sæpe fieri vidi." I have often seen monks and widows become melancholy from retaining seed excessively.

[2576] Editor. "Stale Maids" is Burton's disparaging phrase for older unmarried women. His conclusion about needing husbands combines inherited reproductive medicine with assumptions about women and marriage. The modern text preserves the assertion in his voice; the Latin description is translated in full.

[2577] Burton. y. "Melancholia orta à vasis seminariis in utero." Melancholy arising from the seminal vessels in the womb.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Felix Plater in the first Book of his Observations, [2578]Tells a story of an ancient Gentleman in Alsatia, that married a young wife, and was not able to pay his debts in that kinde for a long time together, by reason of his several infirmities: But she because of this inhibition of Venus, fell into a horrible fury, and desired every one that came to see her, by words, looks, and gestures, to have to do with her, &c.	Felix Plater, in the first book of his Observations, tells the story of an elderly gentleman in Alsace who married a young wife and, because of his various ailments, could not pay his conjugal debts for a long time. Deprived of sex, she fell into a terrible frenzy and, with words, looks and gestures, begged everyone who came to see her to have intercourse with her, and so forth.[2579]

[2578] Burton. z. “Nobilis senex Alsatus juvenem uxorem duxit, at ille colico dolore, & multis morbis correptus, non potuit præstare officium mariti, vix inito matrimonio ægrotus. Illa in horrendam furorem incidit, ob Venerem cohibitam ut omnium eam invisentium congressum, voce, vultu, gestu expeteret, & quum non consentirent, molossos Anglicanos magno expetiit clamore.” An elderly Alsatian nobleman married a young wife, but, afflicted with colic and many diseases, he could not perform a husband’s duty, being ill almost from the start of the marriage. Through sexual deprivation she fell into a terrible frenzy, asking with her voice, expression and gestures for intercourse with everyone who visited her; when they refused, she loudly called for English mastiffs. The printed horrendam furorem is retained.

[2579] Editor. “Pay his debts” is the conventional metaphor of marital sexual obligation. Burton abbreviates the anecdote with “&c.”; his fuller Latin marginal version, including its final claim about mastiffs, is preserved and translated in the Burton note. Neither version is an independently verified case history.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 79–80 [2580]Bernardus Paternus a Physitian, saith, He knew a good honest godly Priest, that because he would neither willingly marry, nor make use of the stews, fell into grievous melancholy fits. Hildesheim, spicel. 2. hath such another example of an Italian melancholy Priest, in a consultation had Anno 1580. Jason Pratensis gives instance in a married man, that from his wives death abstaining, [2581]after marriage, became exceeding melancholy, Rodericus à Fonseca in a young man so affected, Tom. 2. consult. 85. To these you may adde, if you please, that conceited tale of a Jew, so visited in like sort, and so cured, out of Poggius Florentinus.	Bernardus Paternus, a physician, says he knew a good, honest, godly priest who, unwilling either to marry or to visit brothels, fell into severe fits of melancholy. Hildesheim, second collection, gives a similar case of a melancholy Italian priest in a consultation of 1580. Jason Pratensis gives the example of a married man who, abstaining after his wife's death, became exceedingly melancholy after married life; Rodrigo da Fonseca gives one of a young man similarly affected, volume 2, consultation 85. To these you may add, if you please, that amusing tale in Poggio of Florence, of a Jew afflicted in the same way and thus cured.[2582]

[2580] Burton. a. "Vidi sacerdotem optimum & pium, qui quod nollet uti Venere, in melancholica symptomata incidit." I saw an excellent, devout priest who developed melancholy symptoms because he would not engage in sexual intercourse.

[2581] Burton. b. "Ob abstinentiam à concubitu incidit in melancholiam." He fell into melancholy through abstinence from intercourse.

[2582] Editor. Stews are brothels; "conceited" here means witty or amusing. The awkward "after marriage" follows the mention of a wife's death: it is rendered as after married life, without inventing a remarriage. The passage blends clinical examples with Poggio's comic storytelling; the exact tale remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 80 Intemperate Venus is all out as bad in the other extream. Galen, l. 6. de morbis popular. sect. 5. text. 26. reckons up melancholy amongst those diseases which are [2583]exasperated by Venery: so doth Avicenna 2, 3. c. 11. Oribasius, loc. citat. Ficinus, lib. 2. de sanitate tuenda, Marsilius Cognatus, [2584]Montaltus, cap. 27. Guianerius, Tract. 3. cap. 2. Magninus, cap. 5. part 3. gives the reason, because [2585]it infrigidates and dries up the body, consumes the spirits; and would therefore have all such as are cold and dry, to take heed of, and to avoyd it as a mortal enemy.	Excessive sex is just as bad at the opposite extreme. Galen, On Epidemics, book 6, section 5, text 26, lists melancholy among the diseases aggravated by sexual intercourse. So do Avicenna, 2, 3, chapter 11; Oribasius in the passage cited; Ficino, On Preserving Health, book 2; Marsilius Cognatus; Montalto, chapter 27; and Guaineri, treatise 3, chapter 2. Magninus, part 3, chapter 5, gives the reason: it cools and dries the body and consumes the spirits. He therefore advises all those of a cold, dry constitution to beware of it and avoid it as a mortal enemy.[2586]
Jachinus in 9. Rasis cap. 15. ascribes the same cause, and instanceth in a Patient of his, that married a young wife in a hot summer, [2587]and so dryed himself with chamber-work, that he became in short space from melancholy, mad: he cured him by moystening remedies. The like example I finde in Lælius à Fonte Eugubinus, consult. 129. of a Gentleman of Venice, that upon the same occasion, was first melancholy, afterwards mad. Reade in him the story at large.	Jacchinus, chapter 15 on book 9 of Rhazes, assigns the same cause. He gives the example of a patient who married a young wife in a hot summer and dried himself out so much with bedroom work that he passed in a short time from melancholy into madness; Jacchinus cured him with moistening remedies. I find a similar example in Laelius a Fonte Eugubinus, consultation 129, of a Venetian gentleman who, for the same reason, first became melancholy and then mad. Read the full story there.

[2583] Burton. c. “Quæ à coitu exacerbantur.” Which are aggravated by intercourse.

[2584] Burton. d. “Superfluum coitum causam ponunt.” They identify excessive intercourse as a cause.

[2585] Burton. e. “Exsiccat corpus, spiritus consumit, &c. caveant ab hoc sicci, velut inimico mortali.” It dries the body, consumes the spirits, and so forth; those of a dry constitution should beware of it as of a deadly enemy.

[2586] Editor. Cooling, drying and consuming the spirits are terms of humoral physiology. The opposite claims about abstinence and excess are consistent with Burton’s recurrent argument that either extreme can be harmful. Avicenna’s compressed “2, 3” locator is retained pending collation.

[2587] Burton. f. “Ita exsiccatus ut è melancholico statim fuerit insanus, ab humectantibus curatus.” So dried out that he passed straight from melancholy into madness; he was cured by moistening remedies.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Any other evacuation stopped, will cause it, as well as these above named, be it bile, [2588]ulcer, issue, &c. Hercules de Saxonia, lib. 1. c. 16. and Gordonius, verifie this out of their experience. They saw one wounded in the head, who as long as the sore was open, Lucida habuit mentis intervalla, was well; but when it was stopped, Rediit melancholia, his melancholy fit seized on him again.	Stopping any other discharge will cause it, just as with those already named, whether from a boil, ulcer, drainage sore or the like. Hercules de Saxonia, book 1, chapter 16, and Bernard of Gordon confirm this from experience.[2589] They saw someone wounded in the head who, while the sore remained open, "had lucid intervals"—was well; but when it was closed, "melancholy returned": his melancholy fit seized him again.
Artificial evacuations are much like in effect, as hot houses, baths, blood-letting, purging, unseasonably and immoderately used. [2590]Baths dry too much, if used in excess, be they natural or artificial, and offend extream hot, or cold; one dries, the other refrigerates overmuch.[2591] Montanus, consil. 137. saith, They over-heat the Liver. Joh. Struthius, Stigmat. artis, l. 4. c 9. contends, [2592]That if one stay longer then ordinary at the Bath, go in too oft, or at unseasonable times, he putrifies the humors in his body.	Artificial evacuations have much the same effect when used at unsuitable times or to excess: sweat baths, bathing, bloodletting and purging. Baths, whether natural or artificial, dry the body too much if used excessively, and do harm when extremely hot or cold: the one dries too much, the other cools too much. Montanus, consultation 137, says they overheat the liver. Johannes Struthius, Stigmat. artis, book 4, chapter 9, argues that staying longer than usual in the bath, bathing too often or at unsuitable times putrefies the body's humours.[2593]

[2588] Burton. g. "Ex cauterio & ulcere exsiccato." From a cautery sore and a dried-up ulcer.

[2589] Editor. "Bile" here is the older spelling of boil, as the following ulcer and the marginal cautery reference make clear. An "issue" can be an artificially maintained drainage sore. Burton's Latin says "lucid intervals," a more qualified claim than the following English "was well"; both are preserved.

[2590] Burton. h. "Gord. c. 10. lib. 1. Discommends cold Baths as noxious." Gordon, book 1, chapter 10: he condemns cold baths as harmful.

[2591] Burton. i. "Siccum reddunt corpus." They make the body dry. Its printed body letter is not clear; the note is attached to the drying effect.

[2592] Burton. k. "Si quis longius moretur in iis, aut nimis frequenter, aut importune utatur, humores putrefacit." If someone stays in them too long, or uses them too frequently or at an unsuitable time, he putrefies the humours.

[2593] Editor. "Hot houses" are heated bathing or sweating rooms. Natural baths may mean mineral or thermal springs, artificial baths prepared ones. The likely reference behind Stigmat. artis is Sphygmicae artis libri V (1555), catalogued under Josephus Struthius, or Józef Struś. The catalogue confirms the title and author, not the bathing passage in book 4, chapter 9. Burton's Joh. and Stigmat. are retained pending direct collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To this purpose writes Magninus, l. 3. c. 5. Guianerius, Tract. 15. c. 21. utterly disallows all hot baths in melancholy adust. [2594]I saw (saith he) a man that labored of the Gout, who to be freed of his malady, came to the Bath, and was instantly cured of his disease, but got another worse, and that was Madness. But this judgment varies as the humor doth, in hot or cold: Baths may be good for one melancholy man, bad for another; that which will cure it in this party, may cause it in a second.	Magninus, book 3, chapter 5, writes to the same effect. Guaineri, treatise 15, chapter 21, rejects all hot baths for burnt melancholy. "I saw," he says, "a man suffering from gout who came to the baths to escape his illness and was immediately cured of it, but acquired something worse: madness." This judgement, however, varies with the humour, according to whether it is hot or cold. Baths may benefit one melancholy person and harm another; what cures the condition in one may cause it in someone else.[2595]
Phlebotomy, many times neglected, may do much harm to the body, when there is a manifest redundance of bad humors, and melancholy blood; and when the humors heat and boyl, if this be not used in time, the parties affected, so inflamed, are in great danger to be mad; but if it be unadvisedly, importunely, immoderately used, it doth as much harm by refrigerating the body, dulling the spirits, and consuming them:	Neglecting bloodletting can often do much harm to the body when there is an obvious excess of corrupt humours and melancholy blood. When the humours heat and boil, if bloodletting is not used in time, those so inflamed are in great danger of going mad. But when used without judgement, at an unsuitable time or to excess, it does just as much harm by cooling the body and dulling and consuming the spirits.

[2594] Burton. l. "Ego anno superiore, quandam guttosum vidi adustum, qui ut liberaretur de gutta, ad balnea accessit, & de gutta liberatus, maniacus factus est." Last year I saw a gouty person with an overheated constitution who went to the baths to be freed of gout; freed of gout, he became mad. Printed quandam is retained.

[2595] Editor. "Adust" means burnt or scorched: melancholy conceived as altered by excessive heat. The cure described as moistening or drying is therefore relative to the patient's presumed humour, not a uniform rule for all melancholy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 80–81 As Joh. [2596]Curio in his 10. Chapter, well reprehends, such kinde of letting blood doth more hurt then good: [2597]The humors rage much more then they did before, and is so far from avoyding melancholy, that it increaseth it, and weakeneth the sight. [2598]Prosper Calenus observes as much of all Phlebotomy, except they keep a very good diet after it: Yea, and as [2599]Leonartus Jachinus speaks out of his own experience, [2600]The blood is much blacker to many men after their letting of blood, then it was at first.	As Johannes Curio rightly objects in his tenth chapter, such bloodletting does more harm than good: the humours rage much more than before, and it is so far from preventing melancholy that it increases it and weakens the sight. Prosper Calenus makes the same observation about all bloodletting unless a very good diet is followed afterwards. Indeed, as Leonartus Jacchinus says from his own experience, many people's blood is much blacker after bloodletting than it was at first.

[2596] Burton. m. "On Schola Salernitana." On the Salernitan School. The unlettered marginal heading just above reads "Phlebotomy."

[2597] Burton. n. "Calefactio & ebullitio per venæ incisionem, magis sæpe incitatur & augetur, majore impetu humores per corpus discurrunt." Heat and boiling are often further provoked and increased by opening a vein; the humours rush through the body with greater force.

[2598] Burton. o. "Lib. de flatulenta Melancholia. Frequens sanguinis missio corpus extenuat." On Flatulent Melancholy. Frequent bloodletting wastes the body.

[2599] Burton. p. "In 9 Rhasis. atram bilem parit, & visum debilitat." On book 9 of Rhazes. It produces black bile and weakens the sight.

[2600] Burton. q. "Multo nigrior spectatur sanguis post dies quosdam, quàm fuit ab initio." After some days the blood appears much blacker than it was at first.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 81 For this cause belike Salust. Salvinianus, l. 2. c. 1. will admit or hear of no blood-letting at all in this Disease, except it be manifest, it proceed from blood: He was (it appears) by his own words in that place, Master of an Hospital of mad men, [2601]and found by long experience, that this kinde of evacuation, either in head, arm, or any other part, did more harm then good.	For this reason, presumably, Salustius Salvinianus, book 2, chapter 1, will not allow or hear of any bloodletting in this disease unless it plainly proceeds from blood. He was, as appears from his own words there, in charge of a hospital for the insane, and found by long experience that this kind of evacuation, whether from the head, arm or any other part, did more harm than good.[2602]
To this opinion of his, [2603]Felix Plater is quite opposite, Though some wink at, disallow, and quite contradict all Phlebotomy in Melancholy, yet by long experience I have found innumerable so saved, after they had been twenty, nay, sixty times let blood, and to live happily after it. It was an ordinary thing of old, in Galens time, to take at once from such men six pound of blood, which now we dare scarce take in ounces: sed viderint medici, great Books are written of this subject.	Felix Plater takes the opposite view: “Though some look askance at, reject and entirely oppose all bloodletting for melancholy, I have found through long experience that countless people have been saved by it after being bled twenty, indeed sixty times, and have lived happily afterwards.” In the old days, in Galen’s time, it was usual to take six pounds of blood from such people at once, when now we scarcely dare take ounces. “But let the physicians look to that”: great books have been written on the subject.[2604]

[2601] Burton. r. “Non laudo eos qui in desipientia docent secandam esse venam frontis, quia spiritus debilitatur inde, & ego longa experientia observavi in proprio Xenodochio, quod desipientes ex Phlebotomia magis læduntur, & magis desipiunt, & melancholici sæpe fiunt inde pejores.” I do not approve of those who teach that the forehead vein should be opened in madness, because this weakens the spirit. Through long experience in my own hospital I have observed that mad people are harmed more by bloodletting and become more deranged, and that melancholics are often made worse by it.

[2602] Editor. The printed Salvinianus refers to the physician usually cited as Salvianus. His quoted Latin distinguishes his own hospital observations from the practice he criticises. “From blood” refers to the classification of melancholy by its bodily source, not simply to blood being present.

[2603] Burton. Asterisk. “De mentis alienat. cap. 3. etsi multos hoc improbasse sciam, innumeros hac ratione sanatos longa observatione cognovi, qui vigesies, sexagies venas tundendo, &c.” On Mental Derangement, chapter 3. Although I know many have disapproved of it, long observation has shown me countless people cured in this way, by opening their veins twenty, sixty times, and so forth. Printed vigesies and sexagies are retained.

[2604] Editor. Burton gives incompatible experiential claims from Salvianus and Plater, then leaves the dispute to physicians. The printed “wink at” is contextually oppositional alongside “disallow” and “contradict”; “look askance at” preserves that force. The historical quantities are left in their original units, not converted into modern treatment instructions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Purging upward and downward, in abundance of bad humors omitted, may be for the worst; so likewise as in the precedent, if overmuch, too frequent or violent, it [2605]weakneth their strength, saith Fuchsius, l. 2. sect. 2. c. 17. or if they be strong or able to endure Physick, yet it brings them to an ill habit, they make their bodies no better then Apothecaries shops, this, and such like infirmities must needs follow.	When corrupt humours abound, omitting purging upwards and downwards may be harmful. Yet, as in the previous case, purging that is excessive, too frequent or too violent weakens their strength, says Fuchs, book 2, section 2, chapter 17. Even if they are strong and can bear the medicine, it still brings them into a bad bodily condition: they make their bodies no better than apothecaries' shops, and this disease and similar infirmities must inevitably follow.[2606]

[2605] Burton. s. "Vires debilitat." It weakens the strength.

[2606] Editor. Purging "upward and downward" means inducing vomiting and bowel evacuation. An "ill habit" here is an unhealthy bodily constitution, not merely a repeated behaviour. The apothecary-shop image mocks a body continually filled with medicines.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsect. 5. Bad Air a cause of Melancholy.	Subsection 5 Bad air as a cause of melancholy
Air is a cause of great moment, in producing this, or any other Disease, being that it is still taken into our bodies by respiration, and our more inner parts. [2607]If it be impure and foggy, it dejects the spirits, and causeth Diseases by infection of the heart, as Paulus hath it, Lib. 1. c. 49. Avicenna, lib. 1. Gal. de san. tuenda. Mercurialis, Montaltus, &c.	Air is a very important cause of this or any other disease, since through breathing it is continually drawn into our bodies and their innermost parts. If impure and foggy, it depresses the spirits and causes disease by infecting the heart, as Paulus says, book 1, chapter 49; so do Avicenna, book 1; Galen, On Preserving Health; Mercurialis; Montalto and others.[2608]
[2609]Fernelius saith, A thick air thickneth the blood and humors. [2610]Lemnius reckons up two main things most profitable, and most pernitious to our bodies; Air, and Diet: And this peculiar Disease, nothing sooner causeth ([2611]Jobertus holds) then the air wherein we breathe and live. [2612]Such as is the air, such be our spirits; and as our spirits, such are our humors. It offends commonly if it be too [2613]hot and dry, thick, fuliginous, cloudy, blustering, or a tempestuous air.	Fernel says that thick air thickens the blood and humours. Lemnius identifies two principal things capable of doing our bodies the greatest good and the greatest harm: air and diet. Nothing, Joubert holds, more readily causes this particular disease than the air in which we breathe and live. As the air is, so are our spirits; as our spirits are, so are our humours. Air commonly harms us if it is too hot and dry, thick, sooty, cloudy, blustering or stormy.

[2607] Burton. t. “Impurus aër spiritus dejicit, infecto corde gignit morbos.” Impure air depresses the spirits and, by infecting the heart, produces diseases.

[2608] Editor. Air acts in this account through the heart, spirits, blood and humours. “Infection” is used in the older sense of corruption or harmful alteration; the explanation does not assume a modern germ theory. Paulus is Paul of Aegina.

[2609] Burton. u. “Sanguinem densat, & humores, P. 1. c. 13.” It thickens the blood and humours. Pathology, book 1, chapter 13.

[2610] Burton. x. “Lib. 3. cap. 3.” Book 3, chapter 3.

[2611] Burton. y. “Lib. de quartana. Ex aëre ambiente contrahitur humor melancholicus.” On Quartan Fever. Melancholy humour is contracted from the surrounding air.

[2612] Burton. Asterisk. “Qualis aër, talis spiritus: & cujusmodi spiritus, humores.” As the air is, so is the spirit; and as the spirit is, so are the humours.

[2613] Burton. z. “Ælianus Montaltus, c. 11. calidus & siccus, frigidus & siccus, paludinosus, crassus.” Aelianus Montalto, chapter 11: hot and dry; cold and dry; marshy; thick.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Bodine in his fifth Book, De repub. cap. 1, 5. of his Method of History, proves that hot Countries are most troubled with Melancholy, and that there are therefore in Spain, Africk, and Asia minor, great numbers of mad men, insomuch, That they are compelled in all Cities of note, to build peculiar Hospitals for them. Leo [2614]Afer, lib. 3. de Fessa urbe, Ortelius and Zwinger, confirm as much: They are ordinarily so cholerick in their speeches, that scarce two words pass without railing or chiding in common talk, and often quarrelling in their streets.	Bodin, in his Republic, book 5, chapter 1, and in chapter 5 of his Method of History, demonstrates that hot countries suffer most from melancholy. Consequently, Spain, Africa and Asia Minor have great numbers of mad people, so many that every important city is obliged to build special hospitals for them. Leo Africanus, book 3 on the city of Fez, Ortelius and Zwinger confirm as much. They are generally so irritable in their speech that scarcely two words of ordinary conversation pass without abuse or scolding, and they frequently quarrel in the streets.[2615]
Source page 81–82 [2616]Gordonius will have every man take notice of it: Note this (saith he) that in hot Countries it is far more familiar then in cold. Although this we have now said be not continually so, for as [2617]Acosta truly saith, under the Æquator it self, is a most temperate habitation, wholsom air, a Paradise of pleasure: The leaves ever green, cooling showres.	Bernard of Gordon wants everyone to take notice: “Observe,” he says, “that it is much more common in hot countries than in cold.” Yet what we have just said is not always so, for, as Acosta truly says, even beneath the equator itself there are places with a most temperate climate and wholesome air, a paradise of delight: leaves always green, cooling showers.[2618]

[2614] Burton. a. “Multa hic in Xenodochiis fanaticorum millia quæ strictissime catenata servantur.” Here in hospitals are many thousands of mad people, kept most closely chained. The marginal note continues at the foot of printed page 81.

[2615] Editor. Burton’s broad claims about national temperaments follow a climatic theory linking heat to anger and mental disorder. “Peculiar” hospitals means establishments specifically for these patients. His confident “proves” and the reported numbers are retained as assertions of the cited writers; they have not been established as a demographic account.

[2616] Burton. b. “Lib. med. part. 2. c. 19. Intellige, quod in calidis regionibus, frequenter accidit mania, in frigidis autem tardè.” Book of Medicine, part 2, chapter 19. Understand that madness often occurs in hot regions, but rarely in cold ones.

[2617] Burton. c. “Lib. 2.” Book 2.

[2618] Editor. Acosta, Natural and Moral History of the Indies, book 2, especially chapters 9–14, challenges the belief that the tropical zone must be unbearably hot and explains the moderating effects of rain, winds and local conditions. Burton’s exception matters: latitude alone does not determine his account of harmful heat.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 82 But it holds in such as are intemperately hot, as [2619]Johannes à Meggen, found in Cyprus, others in Malta, Apulia, and the [2620]Holy Land, where at some seasons of the yeer is nothing but dust, their Rivers dried up, the Air scorching hot, and Earth inflamed; insomuch, that many Pilgrims going barefoot for devotion sake, from Joppa to Jerusalem upon the hot sands, often run mad, or else quite overwhelmed with sand, profundis arenis, as in many parts of Africk, Arabia Deserta, Bactriana, now Charassan, when the West wind blows [2621]Involuti arenis transeuntes necantur.	But it does hold for places of excessive heat, as Johannes a Meggen found in Cyprus, and others in Malta, Apulia and the Holy Land. At certain seasons there is nothing but dust: the rivers dried up, the air scorching, the earth ablaze. Many pilgrims walking barefoot out of devotion over the hot sands from Joppa to Jerusalem often go mad, or are completely overwhelmed by sand, “in deep sands,” as happens in many parts of Africa, Arabia Deserta and Bactriana, now Charassan: when the west wind blows, “travellers are engulfed in sand and killed.”[2622]
[2623]Hercules de Saxonia a Professor in Venice, gives this cause, why so many Venetian women are melancholy, Quod diù sub sole degant, they tarry too long in the Sun. Montanus, consil. 21. amongst other causes assigns this; Why that Jew his Patient was mad, Quod tam multum exposuit se calori & frigori: He exposed himself so much to heat and cold.	Hercules de Saxonia, a professor in Venice, gives this reason for so many Venetian women being melancholy: “because they spend a long time in the sun”—they remain in the sun too long. Montanus, consultation 21, gives this among the reasons why his Jewish patient was mad: “because he exposed himself so much to heat and cold”—he exposed himself so much to heat and cold.

[2619] Burton. d. “Hodopericon, cap. 7.” Journey, chapter 7.

[2620] Burton. Asterisk. “Apulia æstivo calore maxime fervet, ita ut ante finem Maii pene exusta sit.” Apulia burns with the greatest summer heat, so that it is almost scorched up before the end of May. The note concerns Apulia although its printed body asterisk precedes Holy Land.

[2621] Burton. Asterisk. “Maginus Pers.” Magini, on Persia; the abbreviation is retained.

[2622] Editor. Joppa is Jaffa. Arabia Deserta names the Arabian desert interior. “Bactriana, now Charassan” compresses ancient Bactria and the later region of Khorasan; the modern text keeps Charassan rather than silently equating their boundaries. The desert burial report and its geographical grouping require collation with Magini.

[2623] Burton. e. “Pantheo seu Pract. med. l. 1. cap. 16. Venetæ mulieres, quæ diu sub sole vivunt, aliquando melancholicæ evadunt.” Pantheon, or Medical Practice, book 1, chapter 16. Venetian women who spend a long time in the sun sometimes become melancholy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And for that reason in Venice, there is little stirring in those brick paved streets in Summer about noon, they are most part then asleep: As they are likewise in the great Mogors Countries, and all over the East Indies. At Aden in Arabia, as [2624]Lodovicus Vertomannus relates in his travels, they keep their markets in the night, to avoid extremity of heat; and in Ormus, like cattle in a Pasture, people of all sorts lie up to the chin in water all day long.	For that reason there is little movement in Venice's brick-paved streets around noon in summer: most people are then asleep, as they are in the Great Mughal's territories and throughout the East Indies. At Aden in Arabia, as Ludovico di Varthema relates in his travels, markets are held at night to avoid the extreme heat. In Hormuz, people of every sort lie in water up to their chins all day, like cattle in a pasture.[2625]
At Braga in Portugal; Burgos in Castile; Messina in Sicily, all over Spain and Italy, their streets are most part narrow, to avoid the Sun beams. The Turks wear great Turbants ad fugandos solis radios, to refract the Sun beams; and much inconvenience, that hot air of Bantam in Java, yields to our men, that sojourn there for traffick; where it is so hot, [2626]that they that are sick of the Pox, lie commonly bleaching in the Sun, to dry up their sores.	At Braga in Portugal, Burgos in Castile and Messina in Sicily, and throughout Spain and Italy, streets are mostly narrow to keep out the sun's rays. The Turks wear large turbans "to ward off the sun's rays"—to deflect the sunlight. The hot air of Bantam in Java causes our men staying there to trade great discomfort. It is so hot that people suffering from the pox commonly lie bleaching in the sun to dry their sores.[2627]

[2624] Burton. f. "Navig. lib. 2. cap. 4. commercia nocte, hora secunda ob nimios, qui sæviunt interdiu æstus exercent." Travels, book 2, chapter 4. They conduct trade at the second hour of the night because of the excessive heats that rage during the day.

[2625] Editor. The Great Mogor is the Mughal ruler. Ormus is Hormuz. These are travel reports gathered as examples of adapting daily life to heat; their details, including the all-day immersion, remain attributed claims pending collation with Varthema.

[2626] Burton. g. "Morbo Gallico laborantes, exponunt ad solem ut morbos exsiccent." Those suffering from the French disease expose themselves to the sun to dry up their ailments.

[2627] Editor. The marginal Morbus Gallicus, "French disease," identifies the pox here as syphilis. "Bleaching" suggests lying exposed to the sun; the asserted purpose is to dry sores. "Traffick" means trade. Bantam is the historic trading centre in western Java.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such a complaint I read of those Isles of Cape Verdo, fourteen degrees from the Æquator, they do malè audire: [2628]One calls them the unhealthiest clime of the World, for fluxes, feavers, frenzies, calentures, which commonly seize on Sea-faring men that touch at them, and all by reason of a hot distemperature of the air. The hardiest men are offended with this heat, and stiffest clowns cannot resist it, as Constantine affirms, Agricult. l. 2. c. 45.	I read a similar complaint about the Cape Verde islands, fourteen degrees from the equator: “they have a bad reputation.” One writer calls them the world’s unhealthiest climate because of the diarrhoea, fevers, frenzies and burning fevers that commonly attack sailors who call there, all attributed to the air’s excessive heat. This heat harms even the hardiest men, and the toughest labourers cannot withstand it, as Constantine affirms, Agriculture, book 2, chapter 45.[2629]
They that are naturally born in such air, may not [2630]endure it, as Niger records of some part of Mesopotamia, now called Diarbecha: Quibusdam in locis sævienti æstui adeo subjecta est, ut pleræque animalia fervore solis & cœli extinguantur, ’tis so hot there in some places, that men of the Country and Cattle are killed with it: And [2631]Adricomius of Arabia felix, by reason of myrrhe, frankincense, and hot spices there growing, the air is so obnoxious to their brains, that the very inhabitants at some times cannot abide it, much less weaklings and strangers.	Even those born in such a climate may be unable to bear it, as Niger records of a part of Mesopotamia now called Diarbecha: “In some places it is so exposed to raging heat that most living creatures are killed by the burning sun and sky.” It is so hot in some places that local people and cattle die of it. Adricomius says of Arabia Felix that, because of the myrrh, frankincense and hot spices growing there, the air is so harmful to the brain that at times even the inhabitants cannot endure it, much less the weak and strangers.[2632]

[2628] Burton. Asterisk. “Sir Richard Hawkins in his Observations, sect. 13.”

[2629] Editor. Fluxes are discharges from the bowels, commonly diarrhoea or dysentery; calentures are burning fevers described especially in hot-country and maritime accounts. “Clowns” means country labourers. Hawkins, Observations section 13 (1847 reprint, pp. 45–46), reports illness on two visits and places the islands within fourteen degrees of the equator. He calls the climate one of the worst, where Burton makes it the worst; Hawkins also blames the cold breeze meeting bodies heated by the sun. Burton’s compressed claim and latitude are retained.

[2630] Burton. h. “Hippocrates, 3. Aphorismorum idem ait.” Hippocrates says the same in book 3 of the Aphorisms; no individual aphorism is specified.

[2631] Burton. Asterisk. “Idem Maginus in Persia.” Magini says the same of Persia. This marginal item follows the Mesopotamia passage; the next asterisk in the body is before Adricomius. The sequence is retained without silently assigning a new source.

[2632] Editor. Diarbecha denotes the Diyarbakır region in Burton’s geographical vocabulary; Arabia Felix denotes southern Arabia. “Hot” spices are classified by their supposed bodily qualities. The asterisked Magini and Holy Land references are not precisely aligned with their subjects in the body; the Burton notes record the printed sequence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2633]Amatus Lusitanus, cent. 1. curat. 45. reports of a young maid, that was one Vincent a Curriers daughter, some thirteen yeers of age, that would wash her hair in the heat of the day (in July) and so let it dry in the Sun, [2634]to make it yellow, but by that means tarrying too long in the heat, she inflamed her head, and made her self mad.	Amatus Lusitanus, first hundred case histories, case 45, tells of a girl of about thirteen, the daughter of a leather dresser named Vincent, who would wash her hair in the heat of the day in July, then let it dry in the sun to turn it golden. But by staying in the heat too long she inflamed her head and drove herself mad.[2635]
Source page 83 Cold air in the other extream, is almost as bad as hot, and so doth Montaltus esteem of it, c. 11. if it be dry withal. In those Northern Countries, the people are therefore generally dull, heavy, and many witches, which (as I have before quoted) Saxo Grammaticus, Olaus, Baptista Porta ascribe to melancholy. But these cold climes are more subject to natural melancholy (not this artificial) which is cold and dry: For which cause [2636]Mercurius Britannicus belike, puts melancholy men to inhabit just under the Pole.	At the other extreme, cold air is almost as bad as hot, and Montaltus judges it so in chapter 11, if it is dry as well. In those northern countries the people are therefore generally dull and sluggish, and many are witches—a condition that Saxo Grammaticus, Olaus and Giambattista della Porta attribute to melancholy, as I have already quoted.[2637] But these cold climates are more subject to natural melancholy, which is cold and dry, than to this artificial kind. That is presumably why Mercurius Britannicus places melancholy people immediately beneath the Pole.[2638]

[2633] Burton. Asterisk. “Descrip. Ter. sanctæ.” Description of the Holy Land. The title belongs with Adricomius in the preceding sentence, though the following body asterisk stands before Amatus Lusitanus. The printed placement is disclosed here.

[2634] Burton. i. “Quum ad solis radios in leone longam moram traheret, ut capillos flavos redderet, in maniam incidit.” When she stayed a long time in the sun’s rays, with the sun in Leo, to make her hair golden, she fell into madness.

[2635] Editor. A currier dresses and finishes leather. Yellow hair means golden or blond hair; the Latin margin adds that the sun was in Leo. Burton presents this as a heat-induced case, but the narrative and causal explanation remain those of his cited medical source. The body’s asterisk before Amatus has no clearly corresponding reference to him in the margin.

[2636] Burton. 83 k: Mundus alter & idem, seu Terra Australis incognita. “Another World and Yet the Same, or the Unknown Southern Land.”

[2637] Editor. “Natural” melancholy is the cold, dry black bile of the humoral system; the “artificial” kind is altered or burnt humour. Burton’s claims about northern peoples and witchcraft belong to the climatic and medical explanations he is collecting.

[2638] Editor. Mercurius Britannicus is the pseudonym used for Joseph Hall’s Mundus alter et idem, a satirical imaginary voyage, catalogued by the Folger as published around 1605. The polar inhabitants belong to literary satire. The precise passage remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The worst of the three is a [2639]thick, cloudy, misty, foggy air, or such as come from Fens, Moorish grounds, Lakes, Muckhils, Draughts, Sinks, where any carkasses, or carrion lies, or from whence any stinking fulsom smell comes: Galen, Avicenna, Mercurialis, new and old Physicians, hold that such air is unwholsom, and ingenders melancholy, plagues, and what not?	The worst of the three is thick, cloudy, misty, foggy air, or air that comes from fens, marshy ground, lakes, dunghills, privies and drains, wherever carcasses or carrion lie, or from any source of a foul, disgusting smell. Galen, Avicenna and Mercurialis, physicians ancient and modern, hold that such air is unhealthy and breeds melancholy, plagues and what not?
[2640]Alexandreta an haven town in the Mediterranean Sea, Saint John de Ullua, an haven in Nova-hispania, are much condemned for a bad air, so as Durazzo in Albania, Lituania, Ditmarsh, Pomptinæ paludes in Italy, the territories about Pisa, Ferrara, &c. Rumny Marsh with us; the Hundreds in Essex, the Fens in Lincolnshire.	Alexandretta, a port on the Mediterranean, and San Juan de Ulúa, a harbour in New Spain, are much condemned for their bad air, as are Durrës in Albania, Lithuania, Dithmarschen, the Pontine Marshes in Italy, the areas around Pisa and Ferrara, and so on; and here, Romney Marsh, the Essex Hundreds and the Lincolnshire Fens.[2641]
Cardan de rerum varietate, l. 17. c. 96. findes fault with the sight of those rich, and most populous Cities in the Low-Countries, as Bruges, Gant, Amsterdam, Leyden, Utrick, &c. the air is bad; and so at Stockholm in Sweden; Regium in Italy, Salisbury with us, Hull and Lin: They may be commodious for navigation, this new kinde of fortification, and many other good necessary uses; but are they so wholsom?	Cardano, On the Variety of Things, book 17, chapter 96, finds fault with the location of those rich and densely populated cities in the Low Countries—Bruges, Ghent, Amsterdam, Leiden, Utrecht and others. The air is bad there, and likewise at Stockholm in Sweden, Regium in Italy, and Salisbury, Hull and Lynn here.[2642] They may be convenient for navigation, this new kind of fortification, and many other useful and necessary purposes; but are they equally healthy?

[2639] Burton. 83 l: Crassus & turbidus aër, tristem efficit animam. “Thick and murky air makes the soul sad.”

[2640] Burton. 83 m: Commonly called Scandarune in Asia minor.

[2641] Editor. Alexandretta is now İskenderun; San Juan de Ulúa is at Veracruz, Mexico, in the former Spanish territory of New Spain. Dithmarschen is a North Sea coastal region. “Hundreds” are territorial divisions; Burton has the low-lying Essex districts in view. His grouping reflects the association of marshes and foul air with disease.

[2642] Editor. “Sight” means site or location. Regium is retained because the specific Italian place intended has not been securely established here. Lin is Lynn, now King’s Lynn. Burton contrasts commercial and defensive advantages with the supposed health effects of a site.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Old Rome hath descended from the hills, to the valley, 'tis the site of most of our new Cities, and held best to build in Plains, to take the opportunity of Rivers. Leander Albertus pleads hard for the air, and site of Venice, though the black Moorish Lands appear at every low water, the Sea, Fire, and Smoke (as he thinks) qualifie the air: And [2643]some suppose, that a thick foggy air helps the memory, as in them of Pisa in Italy; and our Cambden out of Plato, commends the site of Cambridg, because it is so neer the Fens.	Old Rome has descended from the hills into the valley. That is where most of our new cities stand, and building on plains is considered best, to take advantage of rivers. Leandro Alberti strongly defends the air and situation of Venice: although black marshland appears at every low tide, the sea, fire and smoke, he thinks, temper the air. Some even suppose that thick, foggy air helps the memory, as among the people of Pisa in Italy; and our Camden, drawing on Plato, commends Cambridge's situation because it is so near the Fens.
But let the site of such places be as it may, how can they be excused that have a delicious seat, a pleasant air, and all that nature can afford, and yet through their own nastiness, and sluttishness, immund, and sordid maner of life, suffer their air to putrifie, and themselves to be choked up? Many Cities in Turky do malè audire in this kinde: Constantinople it self, where commonly Carrion lies in the street. Some finde the same fault in Spain, even in Madrit, the Kings seat, a most excellent air, a pleasant site; but the inhabitants are slovens, and the streets uncleanly kept.	But whatever the situation of such places, how can we excuse people who have a delightful setting, pleasant air and everything nature can provide, yet through their own filth and slovenliness, their foul and sordid way of life, let their air become putrid and themselves be choked? Many Turkish cities "have a bad reputation" in this respect, including Constantinople itself, where carrion commonly lies in the street. Some find the same fault in Spain, even in Madrid, the king's residence: excellent air and a pleasant situation, but slovenly inhabitants and dirty streets.

[2643] Burton. 83 n: Atlas Geographicus memoria valent Pisani, quod crassiore fruantur aëre. "Geographical Atlas: the Pisans excel in memory because they enjoy thicker air."

Original text 1651	Modern English
A troublesom tempestuous air, is as bad as impure, rough and foul weather, impetuous winds, cloudy dark days, as it is commonly with us, Cœlum visu fœdum, [2644]Polydor calls it a filthy sky, & in quo facile generantur nubes; as Tullies brother Quintus wrote to him in Rome, being then Questor in Britain.	Troublesome, stormy air is as bad as impure air: rough and foul weather, violent winds, cloudy, dark days, as we commonly have here. “A sky foul to look at”—Polydore calls it a filthy sky—“and one in which clouds readily form,” as Cicero’s brother Quintus wrote to him in Rome while serving as quaestor in Britain.[2645]
[2646]In a thick and cloudy air (saith Lemnius) men are tetrick, sad, and peevish: And if the Western winds blow, and that there be a calm, or a fair sunshine day, there is a kinde of alacrity in mens mindes; it chears up men and beasts: but if it be a turbulent, rough, cloudy, stormy weather, men are sad, lumpish, and much dejected, angry, waspish, dull, and melancholy. This was [2647]Virgils experiment of old,	In thick and cloudy air, says Lemnius, people are gloomy, sad and peevish. But if the west winds blow and there is calm or a fine, sunny day, a certain liveliness enters their minds: it cheers people and animals alike. In turbulent, rough, cloudy, stormy weather, however, people are sad, sluggish and deeply dejected, angry, irritable, dull and melancholy. This was Virgil’s observation long ago:
Source page 84 Verum ubi tempestas, & cœli mobilis humor Mutavere vices, & Jupiter humidus Austro, Vertuntur species animorum, & pectore motus Concipiunt alios——	But when the weather and the sky’s shifting moisture Have changed their course, and Jupiter is wet with the south wind, The dispositions of minds change, and in the breast They conceive new impulses…[2648]

[2644] Burton. 83 o: Lib. 1. hist. “History, book 1.”

[2645] Editor. Polydor is Polydore Vergil; Tully is Marcus Tullius Cicero. Polydore’s English History 1.14 describes thick air in which clouds, rain and winds gather. Compare Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 1.19.43, on the atmosphere generally, not British weather. Neither supplies Burton’s entire quotation or verifies the attributed letter from Quintus. Caesar, Gallic War 5.24, names Quintus Cicero among legion commanders and Marcus Crassus as quaestor; Burton’s designation remains unsupported here. Lemnius’s margin mentions an east wind and Zephyr, while the body gives only western winds.

[2646] Burton. 83, unlettered continuation beneath o: lib. 2. cap. 41. Aura densa ac caliginosa tetrici homines existunt, & subtristes, & cap. 3. flante subsolano & Zephyro, maxima in mentibus hominum alacritas existit, mentisque erectio ubi cœlum solis splendore nitescit. Maxima dejectio mœrorque siquando aura caliginosa est. “Book 2, chapter 41: in thick and murky air people become gloomy and somewhat sad; and chapter 3: when the east wind and Zephyr blow, great liveliness and an uplifting of mind arise in people, when the sky shines with sunlight. Great dejection and sadness arise whenever the air is murky.”

[2647] Burton. 83 p: Geor. “Georgics.”

[2648] Editor. Virgil, Georgics 1.417–422, abridged and altered. Burton has vices, humidus Austro and pectore where the consulted Latin text has vias, uvidus austris and pectora; he also omits intervening material. The translation follows his printed version. Jupiter here figures the sky or weather. Burton’s own English verse follows and is retained separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But when the face of Heaven changed is To tempests, rain, from season fair: Our mindes are altered, and in our brests Forthwith some new conceipts appear.	But when the face of heaven turns From fair weather to storms and rain, Our minds are altered, and at once New thoughts appear within our breasts.
And who is not weather-wise against such and such conjunctions of Planets, moved in foul weather, dull and heavy in such tempestuous seasons? [2649]Gelidum contristat Aquarius annum: The time requires, and the Autumn breeds it; Winter is like unto it, ugly, foul, squalid, the Air works on all men, more or less, but especially on such as are melancholy, or inclined to it, as Lemnius holds, [2650]They are most moved with it, and those which are already mad, rave downright, either in, or against a tempest.	And who does not feel the weather approaching at one conjunction of the planets or another—disturbed in foul weather, dull and heavy in such stormy seasons? "Aquarius saddens the chilly year."[2651] The season calls for it, and autumn breeds it; winter is much the same—ugly, foul, squalid. The air acts on everyone, more or less, but especially on those who are melancholy or inclined to it. As Lemnius holds, they are most affected, and those already mad rave outright during a storm or as one approaches.
Besides, the devil many times takes his opportunity of such storms, and when the humors by the air be stirred, he goes in with them, exagitates our spirits, and vexeth our souls: as the Sea waves, so are the spirits and humors in our bodies, tossed with tempestuous winds and storms.	Besides, the devil often takes advantage of such storms: when the air stirs the humours, he enters with them, agitates our spirits and torments our souls. Like the sea's waves, the spirits and humours in our bodies are tossed by stormy winds and tempests.[2652]

[2649] Burton. 84 q: Hor. "Horace."

[2650] Burton. 84 r: Mens quibus vacillat, ab aëre cito offenduntur, & multi insani apud Belgas ante tempestates sæviunt, aliter quieti. Spiritus quoque aëris & mali genii aliquando se tempestatibus ingerunt, & menti humanæ se latenter insinuant, eamque vexant, exagitant, & ut fluctus marini, humanum corpus ventis agitatur. "Those whose minds are unstable are quickly affected by the air, and many mad people among the Netherlanders rage before storms, though otherwise quiet. Spirits of the air and evil demons sometimes enter storms and secretly insinuate themselves into the human mind, tormenting and agitating it; and like the sea's waves, the human body is stirred by the winds."

[2651] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.1.36, adapted: the consulted text has inversum, "turned" or "changed," rather than Burton's gelidum, "chilly." Aquarius marks the wintry part of the year.

[2652] Editor. The account combines bodily spirits and humours with demons or spirits of the air. These are distinct senses of "spirits," both retained in the passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To such as are melancholy therefore, Montanus, consil. 24. will have tempestuous and rough air to be avoided, and consil. 27. all night air, and would not have them to walk abroad, but in a pleasant day. Lemnius, l. 3. c. 3. discommends the South and Eastern winds, commends the North. Montanus, consil. 31. [2653]Will not any windows to be opened in the night. Consil. 229. & consil. 230. he discommends especially the South wind, and nocturnal air:	Montanus therefore advises melancholy people, in consultation 24, to avoid rough and stormy air; in consultation 27, all night air; and to walk outdoors only on a pleasant day. Lemnius, book 3, chapter 3, disapproves of south and east winds and commends the north. Montanus, consultation 31, will have no windows opened at night. In consultations 229 and 230 he particularly disapproves of the south wind and night air.
So doth [2654]Plutarch, The night and darkness makes men sad, the like do all subterranean vaults, dark houses in caves and rocks, desert places cause melancholy in an instant, especially such as have not been used to it, or otherwise accustomed. Read more of air in Hippocrates, Ætius, l. 3. à c. 171. ad 175. Oribasius, à c. 1. ad 22. Avicen. l. 1. can. Fen. 2. doc. 2. Fen. 1. c. 123. to the 12, &c.	So does Plutarch: night and darkness make people sad; so do underground vaults and dark dwellings in caves and rocks. Deserted places cause melancholy in an instant, especially in those unused to them. Read further about air in Hippocrates; Aëtius, book 3, chapters 171–175; Oribasius, chapters 1–22; and Avicenna, Canon, book 1, fen 2, doctrine 2, fen 1, "chapter 123 to the 12," and so forth.[2655]

[2653] Burton. 84 s: Aër noctu densatur, & cogit mœstitiam. "Air thickens at night and induces sadness."

[2654] Burton. 84 t: Lib. de Iside & Osyride. "The book On Isis and Osiris."

[2655] Editor. The Avicenna citation is internally unclear as printed: "c. 123. to the 12." It has not been silently repaired. Fen is a major division of the Canon. No book number is supplied for Oribasius in this passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Subsect. 6. Immoderate exercise a cause, and how. Solitariness, Idleness.	Subsection 6 Excessive exercise as a cause, and how it acts. Solitude and idleness.
Nothing so good, but it may be abused: Nothing better then Exercise (if opportunely used) for the preservation of the Body: Nothing so bad, if it be unseasonable, violent, or overmuch. Fernelius out of Galen, Path. lib. 1. c. 16. saith, [2656]That much exercise and weariness consumes the spirits and substance, refrigerates the body; and such humors which Nature would have otherwise concocted and expelled, it stirs up, and makes them rage: which being so inraged, diversly affect, and trouble the body and minde.	Nothing is so good that it cannot be misused. Nothing is better than exercise, taken at the right time, for preserving the body; nothing worse when it is ill-timed, violent or excessive. Fernel, citing Galen in his Pathology, book 1, chapter 16, says that excessive exercise and exhaustion consume the spirits and bodily substance and chill the body. They stir up and inflame humours that nature would otherwise have processed and expelled; once inflamed, these affect and disturb body and mind in various ways.[2657]

[2656] Burton. 84 u: Multa defatigatio, spiritus, viriumque substantiam exhaurit, & corpus refrigerat. Humores corruptos qui aliter à natura concoqui & domari possint, & demum blendè excludi, irritat, & quasi in furorem agit, qui postea mota camerina, tetro vapore corpus variè lacessunt, animumque. "Great exhaustion drains the spirits and the substance of our strength, and chills the body. It excites and, as it were, drives into frenzy corrupted humours that nature could otherwise process and subdue, and finally expel gently; these then, once Camarina has been stirred, assail body and mind in various ways with foul vapour." Printed blendè is retained here; translated as blandè, "gently."

[2657] Editor. "Concoction" is the body's processing of food and humours by natural heat. In the marginal quotation, "stirring Camarina" alludes proverbially to disturbing a marsh and thereby releasing harm. The explanation is physiological within Burton's humoral framework.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 84–85 So doth it, if it be unseasonably used, upon a full stomack, or when the body is full of crudities, which Fuchsius so much enveighs against, Lib. 2. instit. sect. 2. c. 4. giving that for a cause, why school-boys in Germany are so often scabbed, because they use exercise presently after meats. [2658]Bayerus puts in a caveat against such exercise, because it [2659]corrupts the meat in the stomack, and carries the same juyce raw, and as yet undigested, into the veins (saith Lemnius) which there putrifies, and confounds the animal spirits.	The same happens when exercise is taken at the wrong time, on a full stomach or when the body is full of undigested matter. Fuchs strongly attacks this in Institutes, book 2, section 2, chapter 4, explaining that German schoolboys so often have scabby skin because they exercise immediately after meals. Bayerus warns against such exercise because it spoils the food in the stomach and carries its juice, still raw and undigested, into the veins, says Lemnius, where it putrefies and disrupts the animal spirits.[2660]
Source page 85 Crato, consil. 21. l. 2. [2661]protests against all such exercise after meat, as being the greatest enemy to concoction that may be, and cause of corruption of humors, which produce this, and many other diseases. Not without good reason then, doth Salust. Salvianus, l. 2. c. 1. and Leonartus Jacchinus in 9. Rhasis. Mercurialis, Arculanus, and many other, set down [2662]immoderate exercise, as a most forcible cause of melancholy.	Crato, consultation 21, book 2, protests against all such exercise after meals as the greatest possible enemy of digestion and a cause of corrupted humours, which produce this and many other diseases. Not without good reason, then, do Sallustius Salvianus, book 2, chapter 1; Leonartus Jacchinus, on book 9 of Rhazes; Mercurialis; Arculanus; and many others list excessive exercise as a most powerful cause of melancholy.

[2658] Burton. 84 x: In Veni mecum, Libro sic inscripto. “In the book so entitled, Veni mecum [Come with Me].”

[2659] Burton. 85 y: Instit. ad vit. Christ. cap. 44. cibos crudos in venas rapit, qui putrescentes illic spiritus animales inficiunt. “Instruction for the Christian Life, chapter 44: it sweeps undigested food into the veins, where its putrefaction infects the animal spirits.”

[2660] Editor. “Animal spirits” are the subtle bodily agents thought to carry sensation and movement, not the spirits of nonhuman animals. “Crudities” are incompletely digested or processed substances. Bayerus’s identity and the exact work cited as Veni mecum remain to be checked.

[2661] Burton. 85 z: Crudi hæc humoris copia per venas aggreditur, unde morbi multiplices. “This abundance of undigested humour advances through the veins, producing many kinds of disease.”

[2662] Burton. 85 a: Immodicum exercitium. “Excessive exercise.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
Opposite to Exercise, is Idleness (the badg of gentry) or want of Exercise, the bane of body and minde, the nurse of naughtiness, stepmother of discipline, the chief author of all mischief, one of the seven deadly sins, and a sole cause of this and many other maladies, the devils cushion, as [2663]Gualter calls it, his pillow and chief reposal. For the minde can never rest, but still meditates on one thing or other, except it be occupied about some honest business, of his own accord it rusheth into melancholy.	The opposite of exercise is idleness—the badge of gentility—or lack of exercise: the ruin of body and mind, the nurse of wickedness, the stepmother of discipline, the chief author of all mischief, one of the seven deadly sins, and a cause sufficient by itself to produce this and many other illnesses. It is the devil's cushion, as Gualter calls it, his pillow and favourite resting place. For the mind can never rest: it is always thinking about something, and unless occupied with some worthwhile business, it rushes of its own accord into melancholy.[2664]
[2665]As too much and violent exercise offends on the one side, so doth an idle life on the other, (saith Crato) it fills the body full of flegm, gross humors, and all maner of obstructions, rheumes, catars, &c. Rhasis, cont. lib. 1. tract. 9. accounts of it as the greatest cause of melancholy. [2666]I have often seen (saith he) that idleness begets this humor more then any thing else. Montaltus, c. 1. seconds him out of his experience, [2667]They that are idle are far more subject to melancholy, then such as are conversant or imployed about any office or business.	Just as excessive and violent exercise does harm at one extreme, says Crato, an idle life does so at the other: it fills the body with phlegm, thick humours, all kinds of blockages, rheums, catarrhs and so on. Rhazes, Continens, book 1, treatise 9, counts it the greatest cause of melancholy. "I have often seen," he says, "that idleness breeds this humour more than anything else." Montaltus, chapter 1, supports him from his own experience: idle people are far more prone to melancholy than those engaged in some duty or business.

[2663] Burton. 85 b: Hom. 31. in 1 Cor. 6. Nam quia mens hominis quiescere non possit, sed continuo circa varias cogitationes discurrat, nisi honesto aliquo negotio occupetur, ad melancholiam sponte delabitur. "Homily 31 on 1 Corinthians 6. Because the human mind cannot rest, but continually runs among various thoughts, unless occupied by some honourable business it slips of its own accord into melancholy."

[2664] Editor. "Gentry" identifies the social rank for which freedom from ordinary work could be a mark of status. "Stepmother" personifies hostile or inadequate care; "naughtiness" here means wickedness, not mild misbehaviour. Idleness is associated with the deadly sin of sloth.

[2665] Burton. 85 c: Crato concil. 21. Ut immodica corporis exercitatio nocet corporibus, ita vita deses, & otiosa: otium, animal pituitosum reddit, viscerum obstructiones & crebras fluxiones, & morbos concitat. "Crato, consultation 21. Just as excessive physical exercise harms bodies, so does an inactive and idle life: idleness makes the living body phlegmatic and produces obstructions of the internal organs, frequent fluxes and diseases."

[2666] Burton. 85 d: Et vidi quod una de rebus quæ magis generat melancholiam, est otiositas. "And I have seen that one of the things that most produces melancholy is idleness."

[2667] Burton. 85 e: Reponitur otium ab aliis causa, & hoc à nobis observatum eos huic malo magis obnoxios qui plane otiosi sunt, quam eos qui aliquo munere versantur exequendo. "Others list idleness as a cause, and we have observed that those who are wholly idle are more subject to this malady than those engaged in carrying out some duty."

Original text 1651	Modern English
[2668]Plutarch reckons up idleness for a sole cause of the sickness of the soul: There are they (saith he) troubled in minde, that have no other cause but this. Homer, Iliad. 1. brings in Achilles eating of his own heart in his Idleness, because he might not fight. Mercurialis, consil. 86. for a melancholy young man urgeth [2669]it is a chief cause; why was he melancholy? because idle. Nothing begets it sooner, encreaseth and continueth it oftner then idleness.	Plutarch counts idleness a cause sufficient by itself to produce sickness of the soul: some people, he says, are troubled in mind for no other reason. Homer, Iliad, book 1, presents Achilles eating his heart out in idleness because he could not fight. Mercurialis, consultation 86, on a melancholy young man, insists that it is a chief cause. Why was he melancholy? Because he was idle. Nothing breeds it sooner or more often increases and prolongs it than idleness.
A disease familiar to all idle persons, an inseparable companion to such as live at ease, Pingui otio desidiosè agentes, a life out of action, and have no calling or ordinary imployment to busie themselves about, that have small occasions; and though they have, such is their laziness, dulness; they will not compose themselves to do ought, they cannot abide work, though it be necessary, easie, as to dress themselves, write a Letter, or the like;	It is a disease familiar to all idle people, an inseparable companion to those who live at ease, "passing their days lazily in comfortable leisure," inactive, with no calling or regular occupation to keep them busy, and little demanding their attention. Even when something does, their laziness and sluggishness are such that they will not settle down to do anything. They cannot bear work, however necessary or easy—dressing themselves, writing a letter or the like.[2670] yet as he that is benummed with cold, sits still shaking, that might relieve himself with a little exercise or stirring, do they complain, but will not use the facile and ready means to do themselves good; and so are still tormented with melancholy. Especially if they have been formerly brought up to business, or to keep much company, and upon a sudden come to lead a sedentary life, it crucifies their souls, and seazeth on them in an instant;	Yet, like someone numb with cold who sits shivering although a little movement or exercise would bring relief, they complain but will not use the easy and available means of helping themselves; and so melancholy continues to torment them. Especially when they have been accustomed to business or to much company and suddenly begin a sedentary life, it tortures their souls and seizes them in an instant.

[2668] Burton. 85 f: De Tranquil. animæ. Sunt qua ipsum otium in animi conjicit ægritudinem. "On Tranquillity of Mind. There are [those] whom idleness itself casts into sickness of mind." The printed qua is retained; the sense requires a relative referring to people.

[2669] Burton. 85 g: Nihil est quod æque melancholiam alat ac augeat, ac otium & abstinentia à corporis & animi exercitationibus. "Nothing nourishes and increases melancholy as much as idleness and abstention from exercises of body and mind."

[2670] Editor. Burton's moral term "idleness" ranges across chosen inactivity, lack of an occupation and an inability to undertake ordinary tasks. His account thus describes impaired activity while also reproaching it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 85–86 for whilst they are any ways imployed, in action, discourse, about any business, sport or recreation, or in company to their liking, they are very well; but if alone or idle, tormented instantly again; one days solitariness, one hours sometimes, doth them more harm, then a weeks physick, labor and company can do good. Melancholy seazeth on them forthwith being alone, and is such a torture, that as wise Seneca well saith, Malo mihi malè quam molliter esse, I had rather be sick then idle.[2671]	For while they are occupied in any way—with activity, conversation, business, sport or recreation, or with company they enjoy—they are very well; but once alone or idle, they are immediately tormented again. A day's solitude, sometimes a single hour's, harms them more than a week of medicine, work and company can help them. Melancholy seizes them as soon as they are alone and tortures them so much that, as wise Seneca well says, "I would rather live in hardship than in softness"—I would rather be sick than idle.[2672]
Source page 86 This idleness is either of body or minde. That of body is nothing but a kinde of benumming laziness, intermitting exercise, which if we may beleeve [2673]Fernelius, causeth crudities, obstructions, excremental humors, quencheth the natural heat, dulls the spirits, and makes them unapt to do any thing whatsoever. [2674]Neglectis urenda filix innascitur agris.	This idleness belongs either to the body or to the mind. Bodily idleness is simply a kind of numbing laziness, a cessation of exercise which, if we may believe Fernel, causes undigested matter, blockages and waste humours; extinguishes the natural heat; dulls the spirits; and makes them unfit to do anything whatsoever. "In neglected fields grows fern that must be burned."[2675]

[2671] Burton. 85 h, printed at the foot of the page without a clear body anchor: Nihil magis excæcat intellectum, quam otium. Gordonius de observat. vit. hum. lib. 1. "Nothing blinds the understanding more than idleness. Gordon, de observat. vit. hum., book 1 (title abbreviated as printed)." Retained at the end of the passage that crosses pages 85–86.

[2672] Editor. Seneca, Letters 82.2. Seneca explains male as living harshly and laboriously, rather than comfortably; Burton recasts this as being sick rather than idle. The modern text preserves both the fresh translation of the Latin and Burton's own gloss. The Gordon marginal note is displaced in the printing and has no clear anchor.

[2673] Burton. 86 i: Path. lib. 1. cap. 17. exercitationis intermissio, inertem calorem, languidos spiritus, & ignavos, & ad omnes actiones segniores reddit, cruditates, obstructiones, & excrementorum proventus facit. "Pathology, book 1, chapter 17: cessation of exercise makes the heat inactive and the spirits feeble, sluggish and slower in every action; it produces undigested matter, blockages and accumulations of waste."

[2674] Burton. 86 k: Hor. Ser. 1. Sat. 3. "Horace, Satires, book 1, satire 3."

[2675] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.3.37. Burton's next sentence applies the image of neglected land to the inactive body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As Fern grows in untild grounds, and all maner of weeds, so do gross humors in an idle body, Ignavum corrumpunt otia corpus. A horse in a stable that never travels, a hawk in a Mew that seldom flies, are both subject to diseases; which left unto themselves are most free from any such incumbrances. An idle dog will be mangy, and how shall an idle person think to escape?	As fern and every kind of weed grow on untilled ground, so thick humours grow in an idle body: "Idleness corrupts the inactive body." A horse kept in a stable that never travels, a hawk kept in a mew that seldom flies, are both subject to diseases from which they are largely free when left to themselves. An idle dog will become mangy; how can an idle person expect to escape?[2676]
Idleness of the minde, is much worse then this of the body; wit without employment, is a disease, [2677]Ærugo animi, rubigo ingenii: the rust of the soul, [2678]a plague, a hell it self, Maximum animi nocumentum, Galen calls it. [2679]As in a standing pool, worms and filthy creepers increase, (& vitium capiunt ni moveantur aquæ, the water it self putrifies, and air likewise, if it be not continually stirred by the wind) so do evil and corrupt thoughts in an idle person, the soul is contaminated.	Idleness of mind is much worse than bodily idleness. Intelligence without employment is a disease, "corrosion of the mind, rust of the intellect"—the rust of the soul, a plague, a hell in itself. Galen calls it "the greatest injury to the mind." Just as worms and filthy crawling things multiply in a stagnant pool—and "waters become foul unless they are stirred"; the water itself putrefies, and air likewise unless the wind continually stirs it—so evil and corrupt thoughts multiply in an idle person, and the soul is contaminated.
In a Common-wealth, where is no publike enemy, there is likely civil wars, and they rage upon themselves: this body of ours, when it is idle and knows not how to bestow it self, macerates and vexeth it self with cares, griefs, false-fears, discontents, and suspicions; it tortures and preys upon his own bowels, and is never at rest.	In a commonwealth with no external enemy, civil wars are likely, and people turn their fury on themselves. So this body of ours, when idle and at a loss how to occupy itself, wastes and torments itself with cares, sorrows, groundless fears, discontents and suspicions. It tortures and preys upon its own entrails and is never at rest.

[2676] Editor. A mew is an enclosure where a hawk is kept. The lines about the inactive body and stagnant water adapt Ovid, Letters from the Black Sea 1.5.5–6: corrumpant and capiant become corrumpunt and capiunt. Jerome, Letter 1.1, offers a parallel for an intellect rusting through inactivity, but does not verify Burton's Seneca attribution. The separate pool maxim and the precise Plutarch and Galen wording remain unlocated.

[2677] Burton. 86 l: Seneca.

[2678] Burton. 86 m: Mœrorem animi, & maciem, Plutarch calls it. "Plutarch calls it grief and wasting of the mind."

[2679] Burton. 86 n: Sicut in stagno generantur vermes, sic & otioso malæ cogitationes. Sen. "As worms breed in a stagnant pool, so do evil thoughts in an idle person. Seneca."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thus much I dare boldly say, He or she that is idle, be they of what condition they will, never so rich, so well allied, fortunate, happy, let them have all things in abundance, and felicity, that heart can wish and desire, all contentment, so long as he or she, or they are idle, they shall never be pleased, never well in body and minde, but weary still, sickly still, vexed still, loathing still, weeping, sighing, grieving, suspecting, offended with the world, with every object, wishing themselves gone or dead, or else carried away with some foolish phantasie or other.	This much I dare say boldly: whoever is idle, whatever their station, however rich, well connected, fortunate or happy, though they possess everything in abundance, every happiness the heart could wish and every satisfaction, as long as they remain idle they will never be content, never sound in body and mind. They will always be weary, always sickly, always troubled, always disgusted—weeping, sighing, grieving, suspecting, offended by the world and everything in it, wishing themselves gone or dead, or carried away by some foolish fancy or other.
And this is the true cause that so many great men, Ladies, and Gentlewomen, labor of this disease in Countrey and City; for idleness is an appendix to nobility, they count it a disgrace to work, and spend all their days in sports, recreations, and pastimes, and will therefore take no pains; be of no vocation: they feed liberally, fare well, want exercise, action, employment, (for to work, I say, they may not abide) and company to their desires, and thence their bodies become full of gross humors, wind, crudities, their mindes disquieted, dull, heavy, &c. care, jealousie, fear of some diseases, sullen fits, weeping fits seize too [2680]familiarly on them.	And this is the true reason why so many great men, ladies and gentlewomen suffer from this disease in town and country. Idleness attends nobility: they think work a disgrace, spend their days in sports, recreations and pastimes, and therefore undertake no labour and follow no vocation. They eat plentifully and well, but lack exercise, activity, employment—for, as I say, they cannot bear to work—and company to their taste. Hence their bodies fill with thick humours, wind and undigested matter, and their minds become troubled, dull and heavy. Care, jealousy, fear of illnesses, sulking fits and weeping fits take hold of them all too readily.[2681]

[2680] Burton. 86 o: Now this leg, now that arm now their head, heart, &c.

[2681] Editor. "Appendix" means something attached to or accompanying another thing. The attack is directed at inherited rank without useful occupation. In this paragraph "want" means lack, not desire.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For what will not fear and phantasie work in an idle body? what distempers will they not cause? when the children of [2682]Israel murmured against Pharaoh in Egypt, he commanded his officers to double their task, and let them get straw themselves, and yet make their full number of Brick; for the sole cause why they mutiny, and are evil at ease, is, they are idle.	For what will fear and imagination not do to an idle body? What disorders will they not cause? When the children of Israel murmured against Pharaoh in Egypt, he ordered his officers to double their task: they were to gather their own straw and still make their full quota of bricks. For the sole reason for their mutiny and discontent was, “They are idle.”[2683]
Source page 86–87 When you shall hear and see so many discontented persons, in all places where you come, so many several grievances, unnecessary complaints, fear, suspicions[2684], the best means to redress it, is to set them awork, so to busie their mindes; for the truth is, they are idle. Well they may build castles in the air for a time, and sooth up themselves with phantastical and pleasant humors, but in the end they will prove as bitter as gall, they shall be still I say discontent, suspicious, [2685]fearful, jealous, sad, fretting and vexing of themselves;	When everywhere you go you hear and see so many discontented people, so many grievances, needless complaints, fears and suspicions, the best remedy is to set them to work and occupy their minds; for the truth is, they are idle. They may build castles in the air for a while and soothe themselves with fanciful and pleasant imaginings, but these will prove as bitter as gall in the end. They will remain, I say, discontented, suspicious, fearful, jealous and sad, fretting and tormenting themselves.[2686]

[2682] Burton. 86, first asterisk: Exod. 5. “Exodus 5.”

[2683] Editor. Exodus 5:6–19: Pharaoh withholds straw while demanding the same brick quota, accusing the Israelites of idleness. Burton calls the extra burden a doubling of the task and uses Pharaoh’s accusation as his illustration; it is Pharaoh’s explanation in the biblical narrative.

[2684] Burton. 86, second asterisk: (For they cannot well tell what aileth them, or what they would have themselves) my heart, my head, my husband, my son, &c.

[2685] Burton. 87 p: Prov. 18. Pigrum dejiciet timor. Heautontimorumenon. “Proverbs 18. Fear will cast down the idle man. The Self-Tormentor.”

[2686] Editor. The marginal saying occurs in the Vulgate text of Proverbs 18:8; Burton’s future dejiciet differs from the consulted present deiicit. The Greek title means The Self-Tormentor, also the title of Terence’s comedy. Its opening (61–91, 135–140) presents Menedemus’s relentless labour as penance for his treatment of his son. This clarifies the title’s association with self-punishment; Burton supplies no line, and a specific passage behind his allusion is not established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 87 so long as they be idle, it is impossible to please them, Otio qui nescit uti, plus habet negotii quam qui negotium in negotio, as that [2687]Agellius could observe: He that knows not how to spend his time, hath more business, care, grief, anguish of minde, then he that is most busie in the midst of all his business. Otiosus animus nescit quid volet: An idle person (as he follows it) knows not when he is well, what he would have, or whither he would go, Quum illuc ventum est, illinc lubet, he is tired out with every thing, displeased with all, weary of his life: Nec benè domi, nec militiæ, neither at home, nor abroad, errat, & præter vitam vivitur, he wanders, and lives besides himself.	As long as they are idle, it is impossible to please them. “He who does not know how to use leisure has more trouble than someone occupied with business”—as Aulus Gellius observed. Someone who does not know how to spend his time has more business, care, grief and anguish of mind than the busiest person in the thick of his affairs. “The idle mind does not know what it wants”: an idle person, as he goes on, does not know when he is well off, what he wants or where he would go. “Once there, he wants to leave”: he is tired of everything, pleased with nothing, weary of life. “At ease neither at home nor on campaign”—neither at home nor abroad—“he wanders, and life is lived beside itself”: he wanders and lives beside himself.[2688]
In a word, What the mischievous effects of laziness and idleness are, I do not finde any where more accurately expressed, then in these verses of Philolaches in the [2689]Comical Poet, which for their elegancy, I will in part insert.	In a word, nowhere do I find the harmful effects of laziness and idleness more exactly expressed than in these verses spoken by Philolaches in the comic poet. For their elegance, I shall quote part of them.[2690]

[2687] Burton. 87 q: Lib. 19. c. 10. “Book 19, chapter 10.”

[2688] Editor. Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights 19.10, quoting a chorus from Ennius’s Iphigenia. Burton compresses and alters the wording while expanding it in English. His printed præter vitam differs from the source’s praeterpropter vitam; the modern text retains his image of living beside oneself. The comparison is with the Latin text in the PHI Classical Latin Texts database.

[2689] Burton. 87, asterisk: Plautus. Prol. Mostel. “Plautus, prologue to Mostellaria.”

[2690] Editor. Plautus, Mostellaria, act 1, scene 2, Philolaches’s house comparison, beginning at line 91 in the consulted text. Burton’s marginal “Prol.” does not match that location. He selects and reshapes lines from the extended comparison, marking omissions with &c. His prose interpretation follows the Latin excerpt; both are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Novarum ædium esse arbitror similem ego hominem, Quando hic natus est: Ei rei argumenta dicam. Ædes quando sunt ad amussim expolitæ, Quisque laudat fabrum, atque exemplum expetit, &c. At ubi illò migrat nequam homo indiligensque, &c. Tempestas venit, confringit tegulas, imbricesque, Putrifacit aer operam fabri, &c.	I think a human being, when first born, Is like a newly built house. I shall explain why. When a house is finished to exact measure, Everyone praises the builder and wants to copy it, and so on. But when a worthless, careless man moves in, and so on, A storm comes and breaks the roof tiles and gutters; The weather rots the builder's work, and so on.
Dicam ut homines similes esse ædium arbitremini, Fabri parentes fundamentum substruunt liberorum, Expoliunt, docent literas, nec parcunt sumptui, Ego autem sub fabrorum potestate frugi fui, Postquam autem migravi in ingenium meum, Perdidi operam fabrorum illicò, oppidò, Venit ignavia, ea mihi tempestas fuit, Adventuque suo grandinem & imbrem attulit, Illa mihi virtutem deturbavit, &c.	I shall show you why people resemble houses. Parents are the builders who lay their children's foundations, Polish them, teach them letters, and spare no expense. While I was under my builders' authority, I was upright; But once I moved into a mind of my own, I ruined their work at once, utterly. Idleness came: that was my storm, And with it came hail and rain. It swept my virtue away, and so on.
A young man is like a fair new house, the Carpenter leaves it well built, in good repair, of solid stuff; but a bad tenant lets it rain in, and for want of reparation fall to decay, &c. Our Parents, Tutors, Friends, spare no cost to bring us up in our youth, in all maner of vertuous education; but when we are left to our selves, Idleness as a tempest drives all vertuous motions out of our mindes, & nihili sumus, on a sudden, by sloath and such bad ways, we come to naught.	A young man is like a fine new house: the carpenter leaves it well built, sound and made of solid materials; but a bad tenant lets the rain in and, through lack of repair, lets it fall into decay, and so forth. Our parents, tutors and friends spare no expense in bringing us up with every kind of virtuous education. But when we are left to ourselves, idleness, like a storm, drives every virtuous impulse from our minds, "and we become worthless": suddenly, through sloth and such bad ways, we come to nothing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cozen German to Idleness, and a concomitant cause, which goes hand in hand with it, is [2691]nimia solitudo, too much solitariness, by the testimony of all Physicians, Cause and Symptom both; but as it is here put for a cause, it is either coact, enforced, or else voluntary.	First cousin to idleness, and an accompanying cause that goes hand in hand with it, is "excessive solitude"—too much being alone—which all physicians testify is both cause and symptom. Considered here as a cause, it is either compelled, imposed on us, or voluntary.
Source page 87–88 Enforced solitariness is commonly seen in Students, Monks, Friers, Anchorites, that by their order and course of life, must abandon all company, society of other men, and betake themselves to a private cell: Otio superstitioso seclusi, as Bale and Hospinian well term it, such as are the Carthusians of our time, that eat no flesh (by their order) keep perpetual silence, never go abroad.	Enforced solitude is commonly found among students, monks, friars and anchorites, whose rules and way of life require them to abandon all company and human society and withdraw to a private cell: "secluded in superstitious idleness," as Bale and Hospinian aptly call it. Such are the Carthusians of our time, who eat no meat, as their rule requires, keep perpetual silence and never go out.[2692]
Source page 88 Such as live in prison, or some desert place, and cannot have company, as many of our Countrey Gentlemen do in solitary houses, they must either be alone without companions, or live beyond their means, and entertain all comers as so many hostes, or else converse with their servants and hindes, such as are unequal, inferior to them, and of a contrary disposition; or else as some do, to avoid solitariness, spend their time with leud fellows in Taverns, and in Ale-houses, and thence addict themselves to some unlawful disports, or dissolute courses.	Those who live in prison or some deserted place and cannot get company—as many of our country gentlemen do in isolated houses—must either remain alone without companions, or live beyond their means and entertain everyone who comes as though they were innkeepers, or associate with their servants and farm labourers, people unequal and inferior to them in rank and of a different disposition. Or, as some do to avoid solitude, they spend their time with disreputable fellows in taverns and alehouses and so give themselves over to unlawful amusements or dissolute ways.[2693]

[2691] Burton. Page 87, r: "Piso, Montaltus, Mercurialis, &c." The physicians are cited without individual locators.

[2692] Editor. Anchorites are religious recluses. Burton adopts Bale and Hospinian's hostile phrase for monastic withdrawal; his absolute statements about Carthusian silence and enclosure belong to that polemical account. He later qualifies his criticism by defending religious houses devoted to study.

[2693] Editor. Hindes means farm servants or agricultural labourers. "Unequal" expresses Burton's assumption of differences in social rank; desert means deserted or remote, not necessarily arid.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Divers again are cast upon this rock of solitariness for want of means, or out of a strong apprehension of some infirmity, disgrace, or through bashfulness, rudeness, simplicity, they cannot apply themselves to others company. Nullum solum infelici gratius solitudine, ubi nullus sit qui miseriam exprobret;	Others are driven onto this rock of solitude by poverty or a strong fear of some infirmity or disgrace; or through shyness, uncouthness or lack of worldly experience they cannot adapt themselves to other people's company. "No place is more welcome to the unhappy than solitude, where there is no one to reproach them with their misery."
this enforced solitariness takes place, and produceth his effect soonest in such as have spent their time jovially, peradventure in all honest recreations, in good company, in some great family or populous City, and are upon a sudden confined to a desert Country Cottage far off, restrained of their liberty, and barred from their ordinary associates: Solitariness is very irksom to such, most tedious, and a sudden cause of great inconvenience.	This enforced solitude takes hold and produces its effects soonest in those who have spent their time merrily, perhaps in entirely innocent recreation, in good company, in some large household or populous city, and are suddenly confined to a deserted country cottage far away, deprived of their freedom and cut off from their usual companions. Solitude is deeply irksome to such people, unbearably tedious, and a sudden cause of great harm.
Voluntary solitariness is that which is familiar with Melancholy, and gently brings on like a Siren, a shooing-horn, or some Sphinx to this irrevocable gulf, [2694]a primary cause Piso calls it; most pleasant it is at first, to such as are melancholy given, to lie in bed whole days, and keep their chambers, to walk alone in some solitary Grove, betwixt Wood and Water, by a Brook side, to meditate upon some delightsom and pleasant Subject, which shall affect them most; amabilis insania, and mentis gratissimus error:	Voluntary solitude is melancholy's familiar companion. Like a Siren, a lure or some Sphinx, it gently draws us into this gulf from which there is no return; Piso calls it a primary cause. At first it is most pleasant for those inclined to melancholy to lie in bed all day and remain in their rooms; to walk alone in a secluded grove, between wood and water, beside a brook; to meditate on some delightful, pleasant subject that most engages them: "a lovely madness," and "the mind's most welcome delusion."[2695]

[2694] Burton. Page 88, s: "A quibus malum, velut à primaria causa, occasionem nactum est." "From these the illness took its occasion, as from a primary cause."

[2695] Editor. Shooing-horn means a shoehorn, figuratively something that draws one on; it is rendered "lure." The Siren and Sphinx suggest enticing danger. The two Latin phrases are from Horace, Odes 3.4.5–6 and Epistles 2.2.140 respectively. In the latter, a man resents the cure that removes his happy delusion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A most incomparable delight it is so to melancholize, and build castles in the air, to go smiling to themselves, acting an infinite variety of parts, which they suppose, and strongly imagine they represent, or that they see acted or done: Blandæ quidem ab initio, saith Lemnius, to conceive and meditate of such pleasant things, sometimes, [2696]Present, past or to come, as Rhasis speaks.	It is an incomparable delight to indulge in melancholy like this, building castles in the air, smiling to oneself, acting an endless variety of parts which one supposes and vividly imagines oneself to be playing, or sees performed in the mind. “Enticing indeed at first,” says Lemnius: to picture and contemplate such pleasant things, sometimes “present, past or yet to come,” as Rhazes says.
So delightsom these toyes are at first, they could spend whole days and nights without sleep, even whole yeers alone in such contemplations, and phantastical meditations, which are like unto dreams, and they will hardly be drawn from them, or willingly interrupt, so pleasant their vain conceits are, that they hinder their ordinary tasks and necessary business, they cannot address themselves to them, or almost to any study or imployment,	These fancies are so delightful at first that they could spend whole days and nights without sleep, even whole years alone, in such contemplations and fanciful meditations, which are like dreams. They can scarcely be drawn away from them and will not willingly interrupt them. Their empty imaginings are so pleasant that they obstruct ordinary tasks and necessary business; they cannot set themselves to these, or to almost any study or occupation.
these phantastical and bewitching thoughts so covertly, so feelingly, so urgently, so continually set upon, creep in, insinuate, possess, overcome, distract, and detain them, they cannot I say go about their more necessary business, stave off or extricate themselves, but are ever musing, melancholizing, and carried along, as he (they say) that is lead round about an Heath with a Puck in the night,	These fanciful, bewitching thoughts attack them so secretly, so keenly, so insistently, so continually; creep in, insinuate themselves, possess, overcome, distract and hold them. They cannot, I say, attend to their more necessary business, ward the thoughts off or free themselves. They are always musing, indulging in melancholy, carried along like someone who, as the story goes, is led round and round a heath at night by a puck.[2697]

[2696] Burton. Page 88, t: “Jucunda rerum præsentium, præteritarum, & futurarum meditatio.” “Pleasant meditation on things present, past and future.”

[2697] Editor. A puck is a mischievous spirit credited with leading travellers astray. The image describes compulsive wandering through one’s own thoughts, rather than purposeful reflection.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 88–89 they run earnestly on in this labarinth of anxious and solicitous melancholy meditations, and cannot well or willingly refrain, or easily leave off, winding and unwinding themselves, as so many clocks, and still pleasing their humors, until at last the Scene is turned upon a sudden, by some bad object, and they being now habituated to such vain meditations and solitary places, can endure no company, can ruminate of nothing but harsh and distastfull subjects.	They hurry on through this labyrinth of anxious, troubled, melancholy meditations, unable or unwilling to hold back or easily stop, winding and unwinding themselves like so many clocks, still indulging their inclinations. At last some distressing object suddenly changes the scene. By now accustomed to these empty meditations and solitary places, they cannot bear company and can brood on nothing but harsh and unpleasant subjects.
Source page 89 Fear, sorrow, suspicion, subrusticus pudor, discontent, cares, and weariness of life surprize them in a moment, and they can think of nothing else, continually suspecting, no sooner are their eyes open, but this infernal plague of Melancholy seizeth on them, and terrifies their souls, representing some dismal object to their minds, which now by no means, no labour, no perswasions they can avoid, hæret lateri lethalis arundo, they may not be rid of it, [2698]they cannot resist.	Fear, sorrow, suspicion, awkward shyness, discontent, cares and weariness of life take them by surprise in a moment. They can think of nothing else and are continually suspicious. No sooner do they open their eyes than this infernal plague of melancholy seizes them and terrifies their souls, presenting some dismal object to their minds which no means, no effort, no persuasion can now avert. “The deadly arrow clings to their side”: they cannot get rid of it; they cannot resist.[2699]

[2698] Burton. Page 89, u: “Facilis descensus Averni: Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras, Hic labor, hoc opus est. Virg.” “Easy is the descent to Avernus; but to retrace one’s steps and escape to the air above—this is the labour, this the task.” Virgil, Aeneid 6.126–129, with an intervening line omitted and the final clauses reversed.

[2699] Editor. “The deadly arrow” recalls Virgil, Aeneid 4.73: Dido is compared to a wounded deer carrying the hunter’s shaft. Burton applies the image to persistent mental suffering. Subrusticus pudor is a somewhat rustic or socially awkward shyness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I may not deny but that there is some profitable Meditation, Contemplation, and kinde of solitariness to be embraced, which the Fathers so highly commended, [2700]Hierom, Chrysostom, Cyprian, Austin, in whole Tracts, which Petrarch, Erasmus, Stella, and others, so much magnifie in their books; a Paradise, an Heaven on Earth, if it be used aright, good for the body, and better for the soul:	I cannot deny that there is a profitable meditation, contemplation and kind of solitude to be embraced: that which the Fathers—Jerome, Chrysostom, Cyprian and Augustine—praised so highly in whole treatises, and which Petrarch, Erasmus, Stella and others extol in their books. Used rightly, it is a paradise, a heaven on earth, good for the body and better for the soul.[2701]
As many of those old Monks used it, to divine contemplations, as Simulus a Courtier in Adrians time, Dioclesian the Emperour retired themselves, &c. in that sense, Vatia solus scit vivere, Vatia lives alone, which the Romans were wont to say, when they commended a Country life. Or to the bettering of their knowledg, as Democritus, Cleanthes, and those excellent Philosophers have ever done, to sequester themselves from the tumultuous world, or as in Plinies villa Laurentana, Tullies Tusculan, Jovius study, that they might better vacare studiis et Deo, serve God, and follow their studies.	Many monks of old used it for divine contemplation; Simulus, a courtier in Hadrian's time, and the emperor Diocletian withdrew from the world, and so on. In this sense, "Vatia alone knows how to live"—Vatia lives alone—as the Romans used to say in praise of country life.[2702] Or people withdraw to improve their knowledge, as Democritus, Cleanthes and those excellent philosophers have always done, secluding themselves from the tumultuous world; or as at Pliny's Laurentine villa, Cicero's Tusculan retreat or Giovio's study, so that they might better "devote themselves to study and to God," serve God and pursue their studies.

[2700] Burton. Page 89, x: "Hieronimus ep. 72. dixit oppida & urbes videri sibi tetros carceres, solitudinem Paradisum: solum scorpionibus infectum, sacco amictus, humi cubans, aqua & herbis victitans, Romanis prætulit deliciis." "Jerome, letter 72, said towns and cities seemed to him foul prisons, solitude a paradise: dressed in sackcloth, lying on the ground, living on water and herbs, he preferred a land infested with scorpions to the delights of Rome." Burton's letter number is retained.

[2701] Editor. Jerome, Letter 22.7, supplies the desert, sackcloth, ground and scorpions. Its account includes continuing temptation and treats the desert as a prison, rather than offering an uncomplicated idyll. Letter 14.10 contrasts smoky cities with the desert's pure air and a mental walk in paradise. These passages illuminate parts of Burton's description; the complete marginal paraphrase and the edition behind his epistle 72 remain unidentified. The printed number is retained.

[2702] Editor. Seneca, Letters 55.3–4, reports the praise "Vatia, you alone know how to live," then challenges it: withdrawal by itself is not a wise life. Burton's Latin means "Vatia alone knows how to live"; his English "Vatia lives alone" is looser and is retained separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Me thinks therefore our too zealous innovators were not so well advised in that general subversion of Abbies and religious houses, promiscuously to fling down all, they might have taken away those gross abuses crept in amongst them, rectified such inconveniencies, and not so far to have raved and raged against those fair buildings, and everlasting monuments of our forefathers devotion, consecrated to pious uses;	It seems to me, therefore, that our overzealous reformers were ill advised in that wholesale destruction of abbeys and religious houses, indiscriminately pulling everything down. They might have removed the gross abuses that had crept in and corrected those evils, without raging so furiously against those beautiful buildings, those enduring monuments to our forefathers' devotion, consecrated to pious uses.[2703]
some Monasteries and Collegiate Cels might have been well spared, and their revenues otherwise imployed, here and there one, in good Towns or Cities at least, for men and women of all sorts & conditions to live in, to sequester themselves from the cares and tumults of the world, that were not desirous, or fit to marry, or otherwise willing to be troubled with common affairs, and know not well where to bestow themselves, to live apart in, for more conveniency, good education, better company sake, to follow their studies (I say) to the perfection of arts and sciences, common good, and as some truly devoted Monks of old had done, freely and truly to serve God.	Some monasteries and collegiate houses might well have been spared, their revenues put to other uses: one here and there, at least in substantial towns or cities, for men and women of every rank and condition to live in, secluded from the world's cares and turmoil. People who did not wish to marry, or were unsuited to it, or were unwilling to be troubled with ordinary affairs and did not know where to settle, could live apart there for greater convenience, good education and better company; to pursue their studies, I say, advance the arts and sciences, serve the common good and, as some truly devoted monks of old had done, freely and sincerely serve God.

[2703] Editor. Burton is criticising the indiscriminate destruction of religious houses during the Reformation. His proposal preserves their buildings and income for communal study, education and devotion, including provision for unmarried women as well as men.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For these men are neither solitary, nor idle, as the Poet made answer to the husbandman in Æsop, that objected idleness to him; he was never so idle as in his company; or that Scipio Africanus in [2704]Tully, Nunquam minus solus, quam cum solus; nunquam minus otiosus, quam quum esset otiosus; never less solitary, then when he was alone, never more busie, then when he seemed to be most idle.	For these people are neither solitary nor idle. As the poet answered the farmer in Aesop who accused him of idleness, he was never so idle as in the farmer's company. Or as Scipio Africanus said in Cicero: "Never less alone than when alone; never less idle than when at leisure"—never less solitary than when he was alone, never busier than when he seemed most idle.[2705]
Source page 89–90 It is reported by Plato in his dialogue de Amore, in that prodigious commendation of Socrates, how a deep meditation coming into Socrates minde by chance, he stood still musing, eodem vestigio cogitabundus, from morning to noon, and when as then he had not yet finished his meditation, perstabat cogitans, he so continued till the evening, the soldiers (for he then followed the Camp) observed him with admiration, and on set purpose watched all night, but he persevered immovable ad exortum solis, till the Sun rose in the morning, and then saluting the Sun, went his wayes.	Plato reports in his dialogue On Love, in that extraordinary tribute to Socrates, how a profound thought happened to enter Socrates' mind and he stood still pondering, "lost in thought on the very same spot," from morning until noon. When he had not yet finished his meditation, "he remained standing in thought," and continued until evening. The soldiers—for he was then on campaign—watched him in amazement and deliberately kept watch all night. He remained motionless "until sunrise," until the sun rose in the morning; then, saluting the sun, he went on his way.[2706]

[2704] Burton. Page 89, y: "Offic. 3." Cicero, On Duties, book 3; the saying opens 3.1.

[2705] Editor. Cicero, On Duties 3.1, attributes the saying about leisure and solitude to Scipio Africanus, on Cato's authority. Burton reverses the order of its two clauses. The Aesopic poet-and-farmer anecdote has not yet been located.

[2706] Editor. Plato, Symposium 220c–d, in Alcibiades' praise of Socrates. De Amore means On Love, an alternative description of the dialogue. Burton's inserted Latin phrases are translated independently of his surrounding paraphrase.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 90 In what humor constant Socrates did thus, I know not, or how he might be affected, but this would be pernicious to another man; what intricate business might so really possess him, I cannot easily guess; But this is otiosum otium, it is far otherwise with these men, according to * Seneca, Omnia nobis mala solitudo persuadet; this solitude undoeth us, pugnat cum vitâ sociali; 'tis a destructive solitariness.	I do not know in what frame of mind steadfast Socrates acted thus, or what he felt; but this would be harmful to another man. I cannot easily guess what intricate problem could so thoroughly absorb him. But this is "idle leisure"; it is quite otherwise with these people. As Seneca says, "Solitude persuades us to every evil." This solitude ruins us; "it fights against social life"; it is a destructive solitude.[2707]
These men are Devils alone, as the saying is, Homo solus aut Deus, aut Dæmon: a man alone, is either a Saint or a Devil, mens ejus aut languescit, aut tumescit; and [2708]Væ soli in this sense, woe be to him that is so alone. These wretches do frequently degenerate from men, and of sociable creatures become beasts, monsters, inhumane, ugly to behold, Misanthropi; they do even loath themselves, and hate the company of men, as so many Timons, Nebuchadnezzars; by too much indulging to these pleasing humors, and through their own default.	These people are devils when alone. As the saying goes, "A solitary man is either a god or a demon": a man alone is either a saint or a devil; "his mind either languishes or swells with pride." And "woe to the solitary," in this sense: woe to anyone so alone. These wretches often degenerate from human beings, turning from sociable creatures into beasts, monsters, inhuman and hideous to behold, haters of humankind. They even loathe themselves and hate human company, like so many Timons and Nebuchadnezzars, through indulging these pleasing inclinations too much and through their own fault.[2709]

[2707] Editor. Seneca, Letters 25.5. Otiosum otium is literally "idle leisure"; Burton's abrupt turn leaves its attachment awkward, and the modern version preserves that turn without assigning it more firmly to Socrates. No separate marginal source accompanies the asterisk before Seneca.

[2708] Burton. Page 90, *: "Eccl. 4." Ecclesiastes 4:10. The page also prints an asterisk before Seneca, without a separate marginal reference; that unmatched marker is retained in the original column.

[2709] Editor. Timon is the proverbial misanthrope; Nebuchadnezzar's withdrawal from human society and life among beasts is related in Daniel 4. Burton moves here from describing distress to condemning it as a failure of conduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So that which Mercurialis consil. 11. sometimes expostulated with his melancholy patient, may be justly applyed to every solitary and idle person in particular. [2710]Natura de te videtur conqueri posse, &c. Nature may justly complain of thee, that whereas she gave thee a good wholesome temperature, a sound body, and God hath given thee so divine and excellent a Soul, so many good parts, and profitable gifts, thou hast not only contemned and rejected, but hast corrupted them, polluted them, overthrown their temperature, and perverted those gifts with riot, idleness, solitariness, and many other wayes, thou art a traitour to God and Nature, an enemy to thy self and to the world.	Thus the reproach Mercurialis once addressed to his melancholy patient in consultation 11 may justly be applied to every solitary and idle person individually. “Nature seems entitled to complain of you,” and so on. Nature may justly complain of you: she gave you a good, healthy constitution, a sound body, and God gave you so divine and excellent a soul, so many good abilities and useful gifts; yet you have not only despised and rejected them, but corrupted and polluted them, destroyed their balance and perverted those gifts through dissipation, idleness, solitude and many other ways. You are a traitor to God and nature, an enemy to yourself and the world.
Perditio tua ex te; thou hast lost thy self wilfully, cast away thy self, thou thy self art the efficient cause of thine own misery, by not resisting such vain cogitations, but giving way unto them.	“Your destruction comes from yourself”: you have wilfully lost and cast yourself away. You yourself are the active cause of your own misery, by yielding to such empty thoughts instead of resisting them.[2711]

[2710] Burton. Page 90, z: “Natura de te videtur conqueri posse, quod cum ab ea temperatissimum corpus adeptus sis, tam præclarum à Deo ac utile donum, non contempsisti modo, verum corrupisti, fœdasti, prodidisti, optimam temperaturam otio, crapula, & aliis vitæ erroribus, &c.” “Nature seems entitled to complain of you: although you received from her a most well-balanced body, so splendid and useful a gift from God, you have not merely despised it but corrupted, defiled and betrayed its excellent constitution through idleness, drunken excess and other errors of life, and so on.” Mercurialis, consultation 11, as identified in the body.

[2711] Editor. Perditio tua ex te adapts the rebuke in Hosea 13:9; ex te, “from yourself,” is not in the consulted Vulgate text. Efficient cause means the agent that brings something about. The accusation of wilful self-destruction is Burton’s moral judgement, preserved as part of the historical text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 7. Sleeping and waking, causes.	Subsection 7 Sleeping and waking as causes
What I have formerly said of Exercise, I may now repeat of Sleep. Nothing better than moderate sleep, nothing worse than it, if it be in extreames, or unseasonably used. It is a received opinion, that a melancholy man cannot sleep overmuch; Somnus supra modum prodest, as an only Antidote, and nothing offends them more, or causeth this malady sooner, then waking, yet in some cases sleep may do more harm then good in that flegmatick, swinish, cold, and sluggish melancholy, which Melancton speaks of, that thinkes of waters, sighing most part, &c.	What I said earlier of exercise I may now repeat of sleep. Nothing is better than moderate sleep, nothing worse when taken to extremes or at the wrong time. It is an accepted opinion that a melancholy person cannot sleep too much: "Sleep beyond measure is beneficial," as though it were the sole antidote, and nothing harms them more or causes this illness sooner than wakefulness. Yet in some cases sleep may do more harm than good: in that phlegmatic, swinish, cold and sluggish melancholy of which Melanchthon speaks, which thinks of waters and spends most of its time sighing, and so on.[2712]
[2713]It duls the Spirits, if overmuch, and senses, fils the head full of gross humors, causeth distillations, rheumes, great store of excrements in the brain, and all the other parts, as [2714]Fuchsius speaks of them, that sleep like so many Dormice.	Too much sleep dulls the spirits and senses, fills the head with thick humours, causes downward flows of fluid and rheums, and a great accumulation of waste matter in the brain and all other parts, as Fuchs says of those who sleep like so many dormice.[2715]

[2712] Editor. Phlegmatic describes a constitution associated with phlegm, coldness and sluggishness. Melanchthon's Book on the Soul, in Corpus Reformatorum 13, column 84, connects phlegm with unusual sluggishness and describes a man who slept almost constantly, spoke softly and responded to music. This is a partial parallel: the passage does not supply watery thoughts or sighing. Burton's "thinking of waters" remains unchanged; its exact source and meaning are still uncertain.

[2713] Burton. Page 90, a: "Path lib. cap. 17. Fernel. corpus infrigidat, omnes sensus, mentisque vires torpore debilitat." "It chills the body and weakens all the senses and powers of the mind through torpor." Fernel, Pathology, chapter 17; no book number is printed here.

[2714] Burton. Page 90, b: "Lib. 2. sect. 2. cap. 4. Magnam excrementorum vim cerebro & aliis partibus conservat." "It retains a great mass of waste matter in the brain and other parts." Fuchs, book 2, section 2, chapter 4.

[2715] Editor. Spirits and humours are components of the historical physiology. Distillations and rheums are flows or accumulations of bodily fluid; excrements here means waste or residual matter generally, not only faeces.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or if it be used in the day time, upon a full stomack, the body ill composed to rest, or after hard meats, it increaseth fearful dreams, Incubus, night walking, crying out, & much unquietness; such sleep prepares the body, as [2716]one observes, to many perilous diseases.	Or if sleep is taken by day, on a full stomach, when the body is poorly prepared for rest, or after foods that are hard to digest, it increases frightening dreams, nightmare oppression, sleepwalking, cries in the night and great restlessness. Such sleep, as one writer observes, predisposes the body to many dangerous diseases.[2717]
Source page 90–91 But as I have said, waking overmuch, is both a symptome, and an ordinary cause. It causeth driness of the brain, frensie, dotage, & makes the body dry, lean, hard, and ugly to behold, as [2718]Lemnius hath it. The temperature of the Brain is corrupted by it, the humors adust, the eyes made to sink into the head, choler increased, and the whole body inflamed:	But, as I have said, excessive wakefulness is both a symptom and a common cause. It dries the brain, causes frenzy and mental derangement, and makes the body dry, thin, hard and ugly to behold, as Lemnius puts it. It corrupts the brain's balance, burns the humours, makes the eyes sink into the head, increases choler and inflames the whole body.

[2716] Burton. Page 90, c: "Io. Ratzius lib. de rebus 6. non naturalibus. Præparat corpus talis somnus ad multas periculosas ægritudines." "Such sleep predisposes the body to many dangerous illnesses." Io. Ratzius, book On the Six Non-natural Things; the printed name is retained pending identification.

[2717] Editor. Incubus here names oppressive nightmare experiences; night walking means sleepwalking. Hard meats are foods considered difficult to digest. Burton is classifying these within the older account of sleep and bodily humours.

[2718] Burton. Page 90, d: "Instit. ad vitam optimam cap. 26. cerebro siccitatem adfert, phrenesin et delirium, corpus aridum facit, squalidum, strigosum, humores adurit, temperamentum cerebri corrumpit, maciem inducit: exsiccat corpus, bilem accendit, profundos reddit oculos, calorem auget." "It brings dryness to the brain, frenzy and delirium; makes the body dry, wasted and lean; burns the humours, corrupts the brain's balance, induces emaciation; dries the body, inflames bile, makes the eyes sunken and increases heat." Lemnius, Institutes for the Best Life, chapter 26.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 91 and as may be added out of Galen 3. de sanitate tuenda, Avicenna 3. 1. [2719]it overthrows the natural heat, it causeth crudities, hurts concoction, and what not? Not without good cause therefore Crato consil. 21. lib. 2. Hildesheim spicel. 2. de delir. & Mania, Iacchinus, Arculanus on Rhasis, Guianerius and Mercurialis, reckon up this over-much waking, as a principal cause.	And, as may be added from Galen's On the Preservation of Health, book 3, and Avicenna, 3.1, it destroys the natural heat, produces undigested matter, impairs digestion—and what does it not do? With good reason, then, Crato, consultation 21, book 2; Hildesheim, collection 2, On Delirium and Mania; Iacchinus; Arculanus on Rhazes; Guianerius; and Mercurialis list excessive wakefulness among the principal causes.

[2719] Burton. Page 91, e: "Naturalem calorem dissipat, læsa concoctione cruditates facit. Attenuant juvenum vigilatæ corpora noctes." "It disperses the natural heat and, by impairing digestion, produces undigested matter. Nights spent awake wear down young men's bodies." The second sentence is Ovid, Art of Love 1.735.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 3. SUBSECT. 1. Passions and perturbations of the minde, how they cause Melancholy.	Member 3 Subsection 1 Passions and disturbances of the mind and how they cause melancholy
As that Gymnosophist in [2720]Plutarch, made answer to Alexander, (demanding which spake best) Every one of his fellows did speak better then the other: so may I say of these causes; to him that shall require which is the greatest, every one is more grievous then other, and this of Passion the greatest of all.	Just as the gymnosophist in Plutarch answered Alexander, when asked which had spoken best, that each of his companions had spoken better than the next, so I may say of these causes, to anyone who asks which is greatest: each is more grievous than the next, and this one, passion, is the greatest of all.[2721]
A most frequent and ordinary cause of Melancholy, [2722]fulmen perturbationum (Piccolomineus calls it) this thunder and lightning of perturbation, which causeth such violent and speedy alterations in this our Microcosme, and many times subverts the good estate and temperature of it. For as the Body works upon the minde, by his bad humors, troubling the Spirits, sending gross fumes into the Brain; and so per consequens disturbing the Soul, and all the faculties of it,	A most frequent and common cause of melancholy is this “thunderbolt of the passions,” as Piccolomini calls it: this thunder and lightning of emotional disturbance, which causes such violent and rapid changes in our little world, the human being, and often overthrows its healthy condition and balance. For just as the body acts upon the mind through its bad humours, troubling the spirits and sending thick vapours into the brain, and so, as a consequence, disturbing the soul and all its faculties—
[2723]——Corpus onustum, Hesternis vitiis animum quoque prægravat una,	A body burdened with yesterday’s excesses Weighs down the mind along with it—

[2720] Burton. Page 91, f: “Vita Alexan.” Plutarch, Life of Alexander; the episode is in chapter 64.

[2721] Editor. Gymnosophist, literally “naked sage,” is the Greek designation used here for an Indian ascetic philosopher. Plutarch, Alexander 64.5, gives the paradoxical judgement that each answered worse than the other. Burton’s “better” is retained rather than silently aligned with Plutarch.

[2722] Burton. Page 91, g: “Grad. 1. c. 14.” Piccolomini, grade 1, chapter 14.

[2723] Burton. Page 91, *: “Hor.” Horace, Satires 2.2.77–78. The original expands the raised abbreviation in quoque.

Original text 1651	Modern English
with fear, sorrow, &c. which are ordinary symptomes of this Disease: so on the other side, the minde most effectually works upon the Body, producing by his passions and perturbations, miraculous alterations; as Melancholy, despair, cruel diseases, and sometimes death it self.	with fear, sorrow and so on, the usual symptoms of this disease, so, on the other hand, the mind acts most powerfully upon the body. Through its passions and disturbances it produces extraordinary changes: melancholy, despair, cruel diseases and sometimes death itself.
Insomuch, that it is most true which Plato saith in his Charmides: omnia corporis mala ab animâ procedere; all the [2724]mischiefes of the body, proceed from the soul: and Democritus in [2725]Plutarch urgeth, Damnatam iri animam à corpore, if the Body should in this behalf, bring an action against the Soul, surly the Soul would be cast and convicted, that by her supine negligence, had caused such inconveniences,	So much so that what Plato says in his Charmides is entirely true: “All the body’s evils proceed from the soul”; all bodily misfortunes come from the soul.[2726] And Democritus argues in Plutarch that “the soul would be condemned at the body’s suit”: if the body brought a legal action against the soul on this account, the soul would surely lose its case and be convicted of causing such harm through its gross negligence.

[2724] Burton. Page 91, h: “Perturbationes clavi sunt, quibus corpori animus seu patibulo affigitur. Iamb. de mist.” “The passions are nails by which the soul is fastened to the body as to a scaffold of execution.” Iamblichus, On the Mysteries, as cited; precise passage uncollated.

[2725] Burton. Page 91, i: “Lib. de sanitat. tuend.” Plutarch, Precepts for Keeping Well.

[2726] Editor. Charmides 156e–157a presents this claim within Socrates’ account of a Thracian healer, and includes both good and evil effects arising from the soul. Burton selects its claim about harm. Mind and soul overlap in this passage but have not been made interchangeable throughout.

Original text 1651	Modern English
having authority over the Body, and using it for an instrument, as a Smith doth his hammer (saith [2727]Cyprian) imputing all those vices and maladies to the Minde. Even so doth [2728]Philostratus, non coinquinatur corpus, nisi consensu animæ; the Body is not corrupted, but by the Soul. [2729]Lodovicus Vives will have such turbulent commotions proceed from Ignorance, and Indiscretion. All Philosophers, impute the miseries of the Body to the Soul, that should have governed it better, by command of reason, and hath not done it.	For the soul has authority over the body and uses it as an instrument, as a smith uses his hammer, says Cyprian, laying all those faults and illnesses at the mind's door. So does Philostratus: "The body is not defiled without the soul's consent"; the body is corrupted only by the soul. Luis Vives holds that such turbulent upheavals proceed from ignorance and lack of judgement. All philosophers blame the body's miseries on the soul, which should have governed it better under reason's command and has failed to do so.
The Stoicks are altogether of opinion (as [2730]Lipsius, and [2731]Piccolomineus record) that a wise man should be ἀπαθὴς, without all maner of passions and perturbations whatsoever, as [2732]Seneca reports of Cato, the [2733]Greeks of Socrates, and [2734]Io. Aubanus of a nation in Africk, so free from passion, or rather so stupid, that if they be wounded with a sword, they will only look back.	The Stoics are entirely of the opinion, as Lipsius and Piccolomini record, that a wise person should be "unaffected," free of every kind of passion and emotional disturbance. So Seneca reports of Cato, the Greeks of Socrates, and Johannes Boemus of a people in Africa, so free from passion—or rather, so insensible—that if wounded by a sword they merely look round.[2735]

[2727] Burton. Page 91, k: "Prolog. de virtute Christi; Quæ utitur corpore, ut faber malleo." "Which uses the body as a smith uses a hammer." Prologue, On the Power of Christ, attributed here to Cyprian; attribution and title require collation.

[2728] Burton. Page 91, l: "Vita Apollonij lib. 1." Philostratus, Life of Apollonius, book 1.

[2729] Burton. Page 91, m: "Lib. de anim. ab inconsiderantia, et ignorantia omnes animi motus." "All movements of the mind arise from heedlessness and ignorance." Vives, On the Soul.

[2730] Burton. Page 91, n: "De Physiol. Stoic." Lipsius, Physiologia of the Stoics.

[2731] Burton. Page 91, o: "Grad. 1. c. 32." Piccolomini, grade 1, chapter 32.

[2732] Burton. Page 91, p: "Epist. 104." Seneca, letter 104.

[2733] Burton. Page 91, q: "Ælianus." Aelian; no work or passage specified.

[2734] Burton. Page 91, r: "Lib. 1. cap. 6. si quis ense percusserit eos, tantum respiciunt." "If anyone strikes them with a sword, they only look back." Book 1, chapter 6.

[2735] Editor. The Greek ἀπαθὴς denotes freedom from passions, rather than the modern sense of apathy. "Io. Aubanus" is Johannes Boemus, also called Boemus Aubanus. Burton's report about an African people is a received ethnographic claim, not an observation he supplies evidence for here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 91–92 [2736]Lactantius 2. instit. will exclude fear from a wise man: others except all, some the greatest passions. But let them dispute how they will, set down in Thesi, give precepts to the contrary; we finde that of [2737]Lemnius true by common experience; No mortal man is free from these perturbations: Or if he be so, sure he is either a god, or a block.	Lactantius, in book 2 of the Institutes, would exclude fear from a wise person; others exclude all passions, some only the greatest. But let them dispute as they please, lay down their theses and give instructions to the contrary: common experience proves Lemnius right—no mortal is free from these disturbances. If anyone is, surely he is either a god or a block of wood.
Source page 92 They are born and bred with us, we have them from our parents by inheritance, A parentibus habemus malum hunc assem, saith [2738]Pelezius, Nascitur unâ nobiscum, aliturque, 'tis propagated from Adam, Cain was melancholy, [2739]as Austin hath it, and who is not?	They are born and bred with us; we inherit them from our parents. "We receive this bad penny from our parents," says Pelezius; "it is born and reared along with us." It descends from Adam. Cain was melancholy, as Augustine says—and who is not?[2740]

[2736] Burton. Page 91, s: "Terror in sapiente esse non debet." "Terror should have no place in a wise person."

[2737] Burton. Page 91, t: "De occult. nat. mir. l. 1. c. 16. Nemo mortalium qui affectibus non ducatur: qui non movetur, aut saxum, aut Deus est." "There is no mortal who is not led by emotions: one who is not moved is either a stone or a god." Lemnius, On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 1, chapter 16.

[2738] Burton. Page 92, u: "Instit. l. 2. de humanorum affect. morborumque curat." Institutes, book 2, On the Treatment of Human Emotions and Diseases; the abbreviated locator is retained without supplying missing detail.

[2739] Burton. Page 92, *: "Epist. 105." Augustine, letter 105, in Burton's numbering; exact correspondence remains unverified.

[2740] Editor. The bad penny is a metaphor for the unwelcome inheritance of disturbing emotions. Burton combines hereditary disposition with the theological descent of fallen humanity from Adam. His Augustine reference for Cain remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Good discipline, Education, Philosophy, Divinity (I cannot deny) may mitigate and restrain these passions in some few men at some times, but most part they domineer, and are so violent, [2741]that as a torrent, (torrens velut aggere rupto) bears down all before, and overflows his banks, sternit agros, sternit sata, they overwhelm Reason, Judgment, and pervert the temperature of the Body: Fertur [2742]equis auriga, nec audit currus habenas.	Good discipline, education, philosophy and theology may, I cannot deny, soften and restrain these passions in a few people at certain times. But for the most part they rule, and with such violence that, like a torrent—"like a flood when its embankment breaks"—which sweeps away everything before it and overflows its banks, "lays fields flat, lays crops flat," they overwhelm reason and judgement and corrupt the body's balance. "The driver is swept along by his horses, and the chariot does not heed the reins."[2743]
Now such a man (saith [2744]Austin) that is so led, in a wise mans eye, is no better then he that stands upon his head. It is doubted by some, Gravioresne morbi à perturbationibus, an ab humoribus, whether humors or perturbations cause the more grievous maladies. But we finde that of our Saviour, Mat. 26. 41. most true, The spirit is willing, the flesh is weak, we cannot resist:	Now someone led in this way, says Augustine, appears to a wise person no better than a man standing on his head.[2745] Some debate "whether more serious diseases arise from the passions or from the humours"—whether humours or emotional disturbances cause the graver illnesses. But we find our Saviour's words in Matthew 26:41 entirely true: "The spirit is willing, the flesh is weak"; we cannot resist.

[2741] Burton. Page 92, x: "Granatensis." No work or passage specified.

[2742] Burton. Page 92, y: "Virg." Virgil, Georgics 1.514.

[2743] Editor. The flattened fields and crops quote Virgil, Aeneid 2.306; the broken embankment in 2.496–499 is a parallel. Burton's first flood phrase, torrens velut aggere rupto, has not been located in its immediate source; the adjoining margin cites Granatensis. The runaway chariot is Georgics 1.514, with nec replacing neque. The Virgil parallels do not establish that the first phrase is a direct quotation from him. Burton's wording is retained, with fresh translations.

[2744] Burton. Page 92, z: "De civit. Dei. l. 14. c. 9. qualis in oculis hominum qui inversis pedibus ambulat, talis in oculis sapientum, qui passiones dominantur." "As someone walking with feet upside down appears to ordinary eyes, so to the eyes of the wise appears one whom the passions rule." City of God 14.9 is the printed reference; the quotation's exact source remains unlocated.

[2745] Editor. City of God 14.9 discusses emotions and challenges the ideal of complete freedom from feeling, but the precise upside-down comparison has not been located there. The printed Latin also has an awkward relative construction; the translation follows its clear intended contrast.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And this of [2746]Philo Judæus, Perturbations often offend the body, and are most frequent causes of Melancholy, turning it out of the hinges of his health. Vives compares them to [2747]Winds upon the Sea, some onely move as those great gales, but others turbulent quite overturn the ship.	And so with these words of Philo the Jew: emotional disturbances often harm the body and are very frequent causes of melancholy, wrenching it from the hinges of its health. Vives compares them to winds upon the sea: some, like great gusts, merely rock the ship, while other, tempestuous winds overturn it altogether.
Those which are light, easie, and more seldom, to our thinking, do us little harm, and are therefore contemned of us: Yet if they be reiterated, [2748]as the rain (saith Austin) doth a stone, so do these perturbations penetrate the minde: [2749]And (as one observes) produce an habit of Melancholy at the last, which having gotten the mastery in our souls, may well be called diseases.	Those that are slight, mild and infrequent seem to us to do little harm, and we therefore disregard them. Yet if they recur, these disturbances penetrate the mind as rain penetrates a stone, says Augustine. And, as one writer observes, they eventually produce an established disposition to melancholy; once they have gained mastery over our souls, they may rightly be called diseases.

[2746] Burton. Page 92, a: “Lib. de Decal. passiones maxime corpus offendunt & animam, & frequentissimæ causæ melancholiæ, dimoventes ab ingenio & sanitate pristina, l. 3. de anima.” “Passions greatly injure body and soul and are very frequent causes of melancholy, dislodging them from their former disposition and health.” The margin begins On the Decalogue and ends On the Soul, book 3; the latter appears to anticipate the following Vives reference.

[2747] Burton. Page 92, b: “Fræna & stimuli animi, velut in mari quædam auræ leves, quædam placidæ, quædam turbulentæ: sic in corpore quædam affectiones excitant tantum, quædam ita movent, ut de statu judicii depellant.” “The mind’s reins and goads: as at sea some breezes are light, some gentle, some stormy, so in the body some emotions merely arouse us, while others so disturb us that they dislodge judgement from its settled state.”

[2748] Burton. Page 92, c: “Ut gutta lapidem, sic paulatim hæ penetrant animum.” “As a drop penetrates stone, so these gradually penetrate the mind.”

[2749] Burton. Page 92, d: “Ubi valentes rectè morbi animi vocantur.” “When they grow strong, they are rightly called diseases of the mind.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
How these passions produce this effect, [2750]Agrippa hath handled at large, Occult. Philos. l. 1. c. 63. Cardan, l. 14. subtil. Lemnius, l. 1. c. 12. de occult. nat. mir. & lib. 1. cap. 16. Suarez, Met. disput. 18. sect. 1. art. 25. T. Bright, cap 12. Of his Melancholy Treatise. Wright the Jesuite, in his Book of the Passions of the Minde, &c.	How these passions produce this effect has been treated at length by Agrippa in Occult Philosophy, book 1, chapter 63; Cardan, On Subtlety, book 14; Lemnius, On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 1, chapter 12, and book 1, chapter 16; Suárez, Metaphysical Disputations, disputation 18, section 1, article 25; Timothy Bright, chapter 12 of his Treatise of Melancholy; Wright the Jesuit, in his book The Passions of the Mind; and others.[2751]
