For natural affection soon doth cease, And quenched is with Cupids greater flame; But faithful friendship doth them both suppress, And them with mastering discipline doth tame, Through thoughts aspiring to eternal fame. For as the soul doth rule the earthly mass, And all the service of the body frame, So love of Soul doth love of body pass, No less then perfect gold surmounts the meanest brass.	For natural affection soon dies down, Quenched by Cupid's greater flame; But faithful friendship overcomes them both And tames them with its ruling discipline, Through thoughts aspiring to eternal fame. For as the soul rules the earthly body And orders all its service, So love of soul surpasses love of body As pure gold surpasses the poorest brass.

[8463] Burton. Printed page 427, f: "Spencer Fairy Queen. lib 5. cant. 9. staff. 1. 2." Spenser, The Faerie Queene, book 5, canto 9, stanzas 1–2, as printed; compare book 4, canto 9, stanzas 1–2.

[8464] Editor. Spenser, The Faerie Queene 4.9.1–2, rather than the margin's book 5. The three loves in these stanzas are family affection, erotic love and friendship, not exactly Burton's useful, pleasant and honourable categories. Deem means judge; dispart means divide; gentle means noble. Burton's variants, including "by vertues" and "Me thinks," are retained. The modernization preserves the two nine-line stanzas without imposing a new rhyme scheme.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 428 [8465]A faithful friend is better then [8466]gold, a medicine of misery, [8467]an only possession; yet this love of friends, nuptial, heroical, profitable, pleasant, honest, all three loves put together, are little worth, if they proceed not from a true Christian illuminated soul, if it be not done in ordine ad Deum, for Gods sake.	A faithful friend is better than gold, a remedy for misery, a possession beyond compare. Yet this love of friends, married love, passionate love, useful, pleasant and honourable love—all three kinds together—are worth little unless they come from a true Christian soul enlightened by God, unless they are practised "with reference to God," for God's sake.[8468]
Though I had the gift of Prophesie, spake with tongues of men and Angels, though I feed the poor with all my goods, give my body to be burned, and have not this love, it profiteth me nothing, 1 Cor. 13. 1, 3. 'tis splendidum peccatum, without charity; This is an all apprehending love, a deifying love, a refined, pure, divine love, the quintessence of all love, the true Philosophers stone,	"Though I had the gift of prophecy and spoke with the tongues of men and angels, though I fed the poor with all my goods and gave my body to be burned, without this love it profits me nothing," 1 Corinthians 13:1, 3. Without charity it is "splendid sin." This is an all-embracing love, a love that makes us godlike, a refined, pure, divine love, the essence of all love, the true philosopher's stone.[8469]
Non potest enim, as [8470]Austin infers, veraciter amicus esse hominis, nisi fuerit ipsius primitus veritatis, He is no true friend that loves not Gods truth.	"For no one," as Augustine concludes, "can truly be a friend to another human being unless he is first a friend of truth itself": he is no true friend who does not love God's truth.[8471]

[8465] Burton. Printed page 428, g: "Syracides." Sirach, also called Ecclesiasticus.

[8466] Burton. Printed page 428, h: "Plutarch, preciosum numisma." Plutarch: "a precious coin."

[8467] Burton. Printed page 428, i: "Xenophon, verus amicus præstantissima possessio." Xenophon: "a true friend is the finest possession."

[8468] Editor. Nuptial love is married love; heroical is passionate or erotic love in Burton's terminology. An only possession means an exceptionally valuable or incomparable possession. The three marginal authorities are Sirach, Plutarch and Xenophon; their exact passages remain for collation. In ordine ad Deum specifies God as the end or governing purpose of the love.

[8469] Editor. Burton combines 1 Corinthians 13:1–3, including the prophecy of verse 2 although his printed locator names 1 and 3. Splendidum peccatum means a splendid or impressive sin: outwardly admirable action lacking charity. Quintessence is the purest essence; the philosopher's stone is the imagined alchemical agent of transformation. Here both are metaphors for charity's perfecting power.

[8470] Burton. Printed page 428, dagger: "Epist. 52." Letter 52, as printed.

[8471] Editor. Compare Augustine, Letter 155.1.1 to Macedonius, which begins this sentence Nemo enim potest. The margin's Letter 52 is retained; it differs from the numbering of the consulted text. Burton's English gloss makes "truth itself" explicitly "Gods truth," and both formulations remain in the modern column.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And therefore this is true love indeed, the cause of all good to mortal men, that reconciles all creatures, and glews them together in perpetual amity, and firm league, and can no more abide bitterness, hate, malice, then fair and foul weather, light and darkness, sterility and plenty may be together; as the Sun in the Firmament, (I say) so is love in the world; and for this cause 'tis love without an addition, love κατ' ἐξοχὴν love of God, and love of men.	This, therefore, is true love indeed, the cause of every good for mortal people. It reconciles all creatures and binds them together in lasting friendship and firm alliance. It can no more tolerate bitterness, hatred and malice than fair and foul weather, light and darkness, barrenness and abundance can coexist. As the sun is in the heavens, I say, so love is in the world. For this reason it is love without qualification, love above all: love of God and love of humankind.[8472]
[8473]The love of God begets the love of man; and by this love of our neighbour, the love of God is nourished and increased. By this happy union of love, [8474]all well governed families and cities are combined, the heavens annexed, and divine souls complicated, the world it self composed, and all that is in it conjoyned in God, and reduced to one.	"Love of God gives birth to love of humankind; and through this love of our neighbour, love of God is nourished and increased." Through love's happy union, "all well-governed families and cities are bound together, the heavens joined, divine souls intertwined, the world itself ordered, and everything in it united in God and brought together as one."[8475]

[8472] Editor. The Greek κατ' ἐξοχὴν means pre-eminently or above all. Love without an addition means love without a limiting qualification. Glews and league extend Burton's recurrent imagery of love as a bond joining otherwise separate beings.

[8473] Burton. Printed page 428, k: "Greg. Per amorem Dei, proximi gignitur; & per hunc amorem proximi, Dei nutritur." Gregory: "Through love of God, love of one's neighbour is born; and through this love of one's neighbour, love of God is nourished."

[8474] Burton. Printed page 428, l: "Piccolomineus grad. 7. cap. 27. hoc felici amoris nodo ligantur familiæ civitates, &c." Piccolomini, grade 7, chapter 27: "By this happy knot of love families and cities are bound," and so on.

[8475] Editor. Complicated here means intertwined, from the idea of folding together; reduced to one means brought into unity. The margins identify Gregory and Piccolomini, the latter by grade 7, chapter 27. These are Burton's attributions; their precise source passages remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8476]This love causeth true and absolute vertues, the life, spirit, and root of every vertuous action, it finisheth prosperity, easeth adversity, corrects all natural incumbrances, inconveniences, sustained by Faith and Hope, which with this our love, make an indissoluble twist; a Gordian knot, an *Æ*quilateral Triangle, And yet the greatest of them is love, 1 Cor. 13, 13.	"This love produces true and perfect virtues; it is the life, spirit and root of every virtuous action. It completes prosperity, eases adversity and remedies all natural hindrances and difficulties." It is sustained by faith and hope, which, with this love of ours, form an unbreakable cord, a Gordian knot, an equilateral triangle; "and yet the greatest of them is love," 1 Corinthians 13:13.[8477]
[8478]which inflames our souls with a divine heat, and being so inflamed, purged, and so purgeth, elevates to God, makes an attonement, and reconciles us unto him. [8479]That other love infests the soul of man, this cleanseth; that depresses, this erears; that causeth cares and troubles, this quietness of mind; this informs, that deforms our life; that leads to repentance, this to heaven.	It "sets our souls aflame with divine heat and, once they are so inflamed, purifies them; thus purifying, it lifts them to God, brings reconciliation and reconciles us to him." "That other love troubles the human soul; this cleanses it. That casts it down; this raises it. That causes cares and troubles; this brings peace of mind. This gives our life its proper form; that disfigures it. That leads to repentance; this to heaven."[8480]
For if once we be truly link't and touched with this charity, we shall love God above all, our neighbour as ourself, as we are enjoyned, Mark. 12. 31. Mat. 19. 19. perform those duties and exercises, even all the operations of a good Christian.	For once we are truly bound together and touched by this charity, we shall love God above all and our neighbour as ourselves, as we are commanded in Mark 12:31 and Matthew 19:19. We shall perform those duties and practices, all the actions of a good Christian.

[8476] Burton. Printed page 428, m: "Veras absolutas hæc parit virtutes, radix omnium virtutum, mens & spiritus." "This produces true and perfect virtues, the root of all virtues, their mind and spirit."

[8477] Editor. Absolute means complete or perfect; finisheth means brings to fulfilment. The intertwined cord, Gordian knot and equilateral triangle illustrate the union of faith, hope and charity. Burton nevertheless follows 1 Corinthians 13:13 in ranking love highest. His knot image stresses strength of union.

[8478] Burton. Printed page 428, n: "Divino calore animos incendit, incensos purgat, purgatos elevat ad Deum, Deum placat, hominem Deo conciliat. Bernard." "It kindles souls with divine heat; once kindled, it purifies them; once purified, it lifts them to God, appeases God and reconciles humankind to God." Bernard.

[8479] Burton. Printed page 428, o: "Ille inficit, hic perficit, ille deprimit, hic elevat; hic tranquillitatem, ille curas parit; hic vitam rectè informat, ille deformat, &c." "That love infects; this perfects. That casts down; this raises up. This produces tranquillity; that, cares. This rightly forms life; that disfigures it," and so on.

[8480] Editor. Attonement means reconciliation or making at one. The modern wording of the first sentence follows the sequence clarified by its Latin margin: kindling, purification, elevation and reconciliation; the printed English syntax is compressed. Erears means raises up; informs means gives form to. The following margin contrasts infecting with perfecting, where Burton's English contrasts troubling with cleansing; each version is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This love suffereth long, it is bountiful, envieth not, boasteth not it self, is not puffed up, it deceiveth not, it seeketh not his own things, is not provoked to anger, it thinketh not evil, it rejoyceth not in iniquity, but in truth. It suffereth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, 1 Cor. 13. 4, 5, 6, 7. it covereth all trespasses, Prov. 10. 12. a multitude of sinnes, 1 Pet. 4.	"This love is patient and generous; it does not envy or boast, is not conceited, does not deceive or seek its own advantage, is not provoked to anger, thinks no evil and rejoices in truth rather than wrongdoing. It bears all things, believes all things and hopes all things," 1 Corinthians 13:4–7. "It covers all offences," Proverbs 10:12, "a multitude of sins," 1 Peter 4.[8481]
as our Saviour told the woman in the Gospel, that washed his feet, many sins were forgiven her, for she loved much, Luke 7. 47. it will defend the fatherless and the widdow, Isa. 1. 17. will seek no revenge, or be mindful of wrong, Levit. 19. 18. will bring home his brothers oxe if he go astray, as it is commanded, Deut. 22. 1. will resist evil, give to him that asketh, and not turn from him that borroweth, bless them that curse him, love his enemie, Matthew 5. bear his brothers burthen, Galathians 6. 7.	As our Saviour told the woman in the Gospel who washed his feet, "her many sins were forgiven because she loved much," Luke 7:47. Love "will defend the orphan and the widow," Isaiah 1:17; "will take no revenge or harbour a grudge," Leviticus 19:18; "will bring home a brother's ox if it strays, as commanded," Deuteronomy 22:1; "will resist evil, give to anyone who asks, never turn away a borrower, bless those who curse him and love his enemy," Matthew 5; "bear his brother's burden," Galatians 6:7.[8482]

[8481] Editor. Burton strings together scriptural phrases in his own wording. His "it deceiveth not" is retained rather than replaced by the wording about unseemly behaviour in 1 Corinthians 13:5. The final references extend Paul's account with Proverbs 10:12 and 1 Peter 4:8. This edition modernizes Burton's text rather than substituting a single modern Bible translation.

[8482] Editor. The printed "will resist evil" is retained, although Matthew 5:39 gives the opposite injunction, "resist not evil." Bearing burdens is Galatians 6:2, rather than the printed 6:7. In Luke 7:47 Jesus speaks about the woman to Simon; he addresses her directly in verse 48. Burton compresses these moments. His other biblical applications are likewise paraphrastic.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 428–429 He that so loves, will be hospitable, and distribute to the necessities of the Saints; he will, if it be possible, have peace with all men, feed his enemy if he be hungry, if he be athirst, give him drink, he will perform those seven works of mercy, he will make himself equal to them of the lower sort, rejoyce with them that rejoyce, weep with them that weep, Rom. 12.	One who loves in this way will be hospitable and contribute to the needs of the saints. If possible, he will live at peace with everyone, "feed his enemy if he is hungry and give him drink if he is thirsty." He will perform the seven works of mercy, "place himself on equal terms with the lowly, rejoice with those who rejoice and weep with those who weep," Romans 12.[8483]
Source page 429 he will speak truth to his neighbour, be courteous and tender-hearted, forgiving others for Christs sake, as God forgave him, Eph. 4. 32. he will be like minded, Phil. 2. 2. Of one judgement; be humble, meek, long-suffering, Colos. 3. Forbear, forget and forgive, 12. 13. 23. and what he doth, shall be heartily done to God, and not to men: Be pittiful and courteous, 1 Pet. 3. Seek peace and follow it.	He will speak truth to his neighbour and be courteous and tender-hearted, "forgiving others for Christ's sake, as God forgave him," Ephesians 4:32. "He will be like-minded," Philippians 2:2, "of one judgement; humble, meek and patient," Colossians 3. "Bear with one another, forget and forgive," verses 12, 13 and 23; whatever he does will be done wholeheartedly for God, not for people. "Be compassionate and courteous," 1 Peter 3. "Seek peace and pursue it."[8484]
He will love his brother, not in word and tongue, but in deed and truth, Joh. 3. 18. and he that loves God, Christ will love him that is begotten of him Joh. 5. 1. &c. Thus should we willingly do, if we had a true touch of this charity, of this divine love, if we would perform this which we are enjoyned, forget and forgive, and compose our selves to those Christian Laws of Love.	He will love his brother in deed and truth, not merely in words, John 3:18; "and he who loves God, Christ, will love the one begotten of him," John 5:1, and so on. We should willingly do all this if we truly felt this charity, this divine love; if we would carry out what we are commanded, forget and forgive, and bring our conduct into accord with these Christian laws of love.[8485]

[8483] Editor. The saints are the community of believers. Burton's seven works of mercy invokes the traditional bodily works of care, including feeding the hungry, sheltering strangers and caring for the sick. His surrounding phrases draw on Romans 12, especially verses 13–20; the sevenfold list is not itself given there.

[8484] Editor. Burton assembles several exhortations: truth-speaking as well as kindness and forgiveness in Ephesians 4; unity in Philippians 2; patience and forgiveness in Colossians 3:12–13, followed by wholehearted work in verse 23; compassion and the pursuit of peace in 1 Peter 3. The wording "forget" is part of his expansion, not an instruction to erase memory.

[8485] Editor. The printed John 3:18 and 5:1 refer in substance to 1 John 3:18 and 5:1, not to those verses in the Gospel of John. The second phrase is syntactically compressed and includes "Christ," which has no corresponding position in 1 John 5:1. That word and Burton's locators are retained; the verse connects love of the begetter with love of the begotten.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8486]O felix hominum genus, Si vestros animos amor Quo cœlum regitur regat!	O happy human race, If your hearts were ruled by the love That rules the heavens![8487]
Angelical souls, how blessed, how happy should we be, so loving, how might we triumph over the divel, and have another heaven upon earth!	Angelic souls! How blessed and happy we should be if we loved like this; how we might triumph over the devil and have another heaven on earth!
But this we cannot do; and which is the cause of all our woes, miseries, discontent, melancholy, [8488]want of this charity,	But we cannot do this; and the cause of all our woes, miseries, discontent and melancholy is the lack of this charity.[8489]
We do invicem angariare, contemn, consult, vex, torture, molest and hold one anothers noses to the grindstone hard, provoke, rail, scoffe, calumniate, challenge, hate, abuse (hard-hearted, implacable, malicious, peevish, inexorable as we are) to satisfie our lust or private spleen, for [8490]toyes, trifles, and impertinent occasions, spend our selves, goods, friends, fortunes, to be revenged on our adversary, to ruin him and his.	We "oppress one another," despise, plot, vex, torture, harass and press one another's noses hard to the grindstone; provoke, rail, mock, slander, challenge, hate and abuse. Hard-hearted, implacable, malicious, spiteful and unrelenting as we are, we expend ourselves, our goods, friends and fortunes to satisfy our desires or private resentment, over toys, trifles and irrelevant occasions, to revenge ourselves on an enemy and ruin him and his family.[8491]

[8486] Burton. Printed page 429, p: "Boethius lib. 2. met. 8." Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy, book 2, metre 8.

[8487] Editor. Boethius, The Consolation of Philosophy 2, metre 8, final three lines. The poem describes love holding the cosmos together and wishes that the same power might govern human hearts. Burton adds his own Christian exclamation about an earthly heaven, bringing this ideal account of charity to a close.

[8488] Burton. Printed page 429, q: "Deliquium patitur charitas, odium ejus loco succedit. Basil. 1. ser. de instit. mon." "Charity suffers an eclipse; hatred takes its place." Basil, first sermon on monastic instruction, as cited.

[8489] Editor. This begins Burton's account of the failure to practise the charity described in Block 111. Want means lack. The marginal deliquium can suggest fainting or an eclipse: love gives way to hatred.

[8490] Burton. Printed page 429, r: "Nodum in scirpo quærentes." "Looking for a knot in a bulrush": manufacturing a difficulty or pretext for complaint.

[8491] Editor. Angariare means to impose burdens or forced service. Consult here is read in the older sense of taking counsel or plotting. Spleen means resentment; peevish means malicious or perverse. The marginal bulrush proverb describes finding grievances where none need exist.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis all our study, practice and business, how to plot mischief, mine, countermine, defend and offend, ward our selves, injure others, hurt all; as if we were born to do mischief, and that with such eagerness and bitterness, with such rancor, malice, rage and fury, we prosecute our intended designs, that neither affinity or consanguinity, love or fear of God or men can contain us: no satisfaction, no composition will be accepted, no offices will serve, no submission;	All our thought, effort and business goes into plotting mischief: mining and countermining, defending and attacking, protecting ourselves, injuring others, harming everyone, as though we were born to do harm. We pursue our designs with such eagerness and bitterness, such rancour, malice, rage and fury, that neither marriage nor blood ties, neither love nor fear of God or humankind can restrain us. No reparation or settlement is accepted, no service will suffice, no submission.[8492]
though he fall upon his knees, as Sarpedon did to Glaucus in Homer, acknowledging his error, yield himself with tears in his eyes, beg his pardon, we will not relent, forgive, or forget, till we have confounded him and his, made dice of his bones, as they say, see him rot in prison, banish his friends, followers, & omne invisum genus, rooted him out and all his posterity.	Though he fall on his knees, as Sarpedon did to Glaucus in Homer, admit his error, surrender with tears in his eyes and beg pardon, we will not relent, forgive or forget until we have destroyed him and his family, "made dice of his bones," as the saying goes, seen him rot in prison, banished his friends, followers "and all the hated race," and rooted out him and all his descendants.[8493]

[8492] Editor. Mine and countermine borrow the language of siege warfare. Offend means attack; composition means a negotiated settlement; offices means acts of service or kindness. Burton describes revenge that refuses every means of reconciliation.

[8493] Editor. The example of Sarpedon asking Glaucus's pardon has not been verified in Homer. It is retained without substituting a different supplicant. Made dice of his bones is an image of total destruction. The Latin adds the whole hated family or race to the victim's friends and descendants.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 429–430 Monsters of men as we are, Dogs, Wolves, [8494]Tygers, Fiends, incarnate Divels, we do not only contend, oppress, and tyrannize our selves, but as so many fire-brands, we set on, and animate others: our whole life is a perpetual combate, a conflict, a set battle, a snarling fit: Eris dea is setled in our tents, [8495]omnia de lite, opposing wit to wit, wealth to wealth, strength to strength, fortunes to fortunes, friends to friends, as at a sea-fight, we turn our broad sides, or two milstones with continual attrition, we fire our selves, or break anothers backs, and both are ruined and consumed in the end.	Monstrous people that we are—dogs, wolves, tigers, fiends, devils in human form—we not only quarrel, oppress and tyrannize ourselves, but, like so many firebrands, incite and encourage others. Our whole life is perpetual combat, conflict, pitched battle, snarling strife. "The goddess Discord" has settled in our tents; "everything comes from strife." We pit wit against wit, wealth against wealth, strength against strength, fortune against fortune, friends against friends. As in a sea battle, we turn our broadsides; or, like two millstones rubbing continually, we set ourselves on fire or break one another's backs, until both are ruined and consumed.[8496]
Source page 430 Miserable wretches, to fat and inrich our selves, we care not how we get it, Quocunque modo rem, how many thousands we undo, whom we oppress, by whose ruin and downfall we arise, whom we injure, fatherless children, widdows, common societies, to satisfie our own private lust.	Wretched creatures! To fatten and enrich ourselves, we care nothing how we get wealth —"money by whatever means"—how many thousands we ruin, whom we oppress, through whose downfall we rise, or whom we injure: orphaned children, widows, whole communities, all to satisfy our private desires.[8497]

[8494] Burton. Printed page 429, s: "Hircaneæq; admorunt ubera tygres." "And Hyrcanian tigers offered their breasts." Compare Virgil, Aeneid 4.367.

[8495] Burton. Printed page 429, t: "Heraclitus." Heraclitus; the attribution accompanies omnia de lite, "everything from strife."

[8496] Editor. Eris is the Greek goddess of strife. The tiger phrase is from Dido's accusation in Virgil, Aeneid 4.367. Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 8.1, attributes universal generation through strife to Heraclitus; this supplies an ancient parallel, not Burton's exact Latin intermediary. A set battle is a pitched battle; attrition means friction or grinding.

[8497] Editor. Quocunque modo rem means obtaining property or money by whatever means; compare Horace, Epistles 1.1.65–66. Undo means ruin. Common societies are communities. Burton's first-person plural makes the indictment collective, implicating speaker and reader.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Though we have myriads, abundance of wealth and treasure, (pittiless, merciless, remorsless, and uncharitable in the highest degree) and our poor brother in need, sickness, in great extremity, and now ready to be starved for want of food, we had rather, as the Fox told the Ape, his tail should sweep the ground still, then cover his buttocks;	Though we have countless riches, an abundance of wealth and treasure, we remain utterly pitiless, merciless, remorseless and uncharitable. While our poor brother is needy, sick, in desperate distress and about to starve for lack of food, we would rather, as the fox told the ape, let our tail drag along the ground than cover his bare backside.[8498]
rather spend it idly, consume it with dogs, hawks, hounds, unnecessary buildings, in riotous apparel, ingurgitate, or let it be lost, then he should have part of it; [8499]rather take from him that little which he hath, then relieve him.	We would rather squander our wealth, use it up on dogs, hawks, hounds, unnecessary buildings and extravagant clothes, gorge ourselves or let it go to waste than give him a share. We would rather take what little he has than relieve his need.[8500]
Like the dog in the manger, we neither use it our selves, let others make use of, or enjoy it; part with nothing while we live: for want of disposing our houshold, and setting things in order, set all the world together by the ears, after our death.	Like the dog in the manger, we neither use it ourselves nor allow others to use or enjoy it. We part with nothing while we live; by failing to arrange our household affairs and set things in order, we set everyone quarrelling after our death.[8501]
Poor Lazarus lies howling at his gates for a few crums, he only seeks chippings, offals; let him roar and howl, famish, and eat his own flesh, he respects him not.	Poor Lazarus lies howling at his gates for a few crumbs, asking only for scraps and leftovers. Let him cry and howl, starve and eat his own flesh: the rich man takes no notice of him.[8502]

[8498] Editor. Myriads signifies vast numbers or riches. The fox-and-ape fable makes the fox prefer wasting its long tail to sharing any of it with the bare-bottomed ape. The exact version used by Burton remains unlocated.

[8499] Burton. Printed page 430, u: “Si in gehennam abit, pauperem qui non alat: quid de eo fiet qui pauperem denudat? Austin.” “If someone who does not feed the poor goes to hell, what will become of someone who strips the poor bare?” Augustine, as attributed.

[8500] Editor. Ingurgitate means gorge; hawks and hounds represent costly sport. Augustine, Sermon 178.3.3–4.4, contrasts withholding aid with robbery and stripping the clothed. This closely parallels the margin’s argument, but does not establish its exact Latin wording or Burton’s intermediary.

[8501] Editor. The dog in the manger prevents other animals from eating fodder it cannot eat itself. Set together by the ears means provoke quarrelling. Disposing the household includes settling property and inheritance, so hoarding produces conflict even after death.

[8502] Editor. Compare the rich man and Lazarus in Luke 16:19–31. Burton amplifies the scene of the poor man at the gate with his own images of abandonment and hunger; these should not all be mistaken for details in the Gospel.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A poor decayed kinsman of his sets upon him by the way in all his jollity, and runs begging bareheaded by him, conjuring by those former bonds of friendship, alliance, consanguinity, &c. unkle, cosen, brother, father,	A poor relation fallen on hard times approaches him on the road amid all his splendour and runs bareheaded beside him, begging, appealing to those old bonds of friendship, marriage and blood: uncle, cousin, brother, father—[8503]
—— Per ego has lachrymas, dextramque tuam te, Si quidquam de te merui, fuit aut tibi quidquam Dulce meum, miserere mei.	By these tears, by your right hand, I beg you: If I have deserved anything from you, or anything of mine Has ever been dear to you, have pity on me.[8504]
Shew some pitty for Christs sake, pitty a sick man, an old man, &c. he cares not, ride on: pretend sickness, inevitable loss of limbs, goods, plead suretiship, or shipwrack, fires, common calamities, shew thy wants and imperfections,	"Show some pity for Christ's sake; pity a sick man, an old man," and so on. He does not care: ride on. Plead sickness, unavoidable loss of limbs or goods, debts incurred as a guarantor, shipwreck, fires or public disasters; show your needs and infirmities—[8505]
Et si per sanctum juratus dicat Osyrim, Credite, non ludo, crudeles tollite claudum.	Even if he swears by holy Osiris and says, "Believe me, I am not pretending; cruel people, lift up a lame man."[8506]
Swear, protest, take God and all his Angels to witness, quære peregrinum, thou art a counterfeit crank, a cheater, he is not touched with it, pauper ubique jacet, ride on, he takes no notice of it.	Swear, protest, call God and all his angels to witness: "find someone who does not know you"; you are a feigned invalid, a cheat. He is unmoved. "The poor man lies downtrodden everywhere." Ride on; he takes no notice.[8507]

[8503] Editor. Decayed means impoverished or fallen in circumstances, not physically decomposed. Jollity includes prosperous splendour. Going bareheaded shows deference; conjuring means solemnly imploring, not practising magic.

[8504] Editor. Adapted from Dido's appeal to Aeneas, Aeneid 4.314 and 317–318. Burton omits intervening words and makes the appeal end miserere mei, "have pity on me," rather than Virgil's miserere domus labentis, "pity a falling house." The borrowed plea is placed in the poor relation's mouth.

[8505] Editor. Pretend here means put forward or allege; it need not imply a false claim. Suretiship is liability for someone else's debt. Burton's repeated ride on imitates the wealthy traveller refusing to stop.

[8506] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.17.60–61, adapted at the opening. Osiris is an Egyptian god invoked in the beggar's oath. In Horace the appeal comes from a known deceiver whose real injury is no longer believed; Burton uses it amid his description of indiscriminate refusal to help.

[8507] Editor. Quære peregrinum continues Horace, Epistles 1.17.62: the neighbours tell the man to try a stranger who does not know his tricks. A counterfeit crank is a beggar pretending illness. The accusation belongs to the refusing voice. Pauper ubique jacet is Ovid, Fasti 1.218, on the social power of wealth.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Put up a supplication to him in the name of a thousand Orphans, an Hospital, a Spittle, a Prison as he goes by, they cry out to him for ayd, ride on, surdo narras, he cares not, let them eat stones, devour themselves with vermine, rot in their own dung, he cares not.	Present a petition as he passes in the name of a thousand orphans, a hospital, a shelter for the sick, a prison; they cry to him for help. Ride on: "you are speaking to a deaf man." He does not care. Let them eat stones, be eaten up by vermin, rot in their own filth: he does not care.[8508]
Shew him a decayed haven, a bridge, a school, a fortification, &c. or some publick work, ride on; good your worship, your honour, for Gods sake, your Countries sake, ride on.	Show him a harbour, a bridge, a school, a fortification or some other public work in disrepair: ride on. "Please, your worship, your honour, for God's sake, for your country's sake"—ride on.
But shew him a role wherein his name shall be registred in golden letters, and commended to all posterity, his arms set up, with his devises to be seen, then peradventure he will stay and contribute; or if thou canst thunder upon him, as Papists do, with satisfactory and meritorious works, or perswade him by this means he shall save his soul out of hell, and free it from Purgatory (if he be of any religion) then in all likelihood he will listen and stay;	But show him a roll on which his name will be recorded in golden letters and praised to all posterity, with his coat of arms displayed and his emblems visible, and perhaps he will stop and contribute. Or, if you can thunder at him, as Papists do, about works of satisfaction and merit, or persuade him that by these means he will save his soul from hell and free it from purgatory—if he has any religion—then in all likelihood he will listen and stop.[8509]
Source page 430–431 or that he have no children, no neer kinsman, heir, he cares for at least, or cannot well tell otherwise how or where to bestow his possessions (for carry them with him he cannot) it may be then he will build some School or Hospitall in his life, or be induced to give liberally to pious uses after his death.	Or if he has no children, no close relation or heir whom he cares for at least, or cannot otherwise decide how or where to dispose of his possessions —for he cannot take them with him—perhaps then he will build a school or hospital during his lifetime, or be persuaded to make a generous bequest for religious and charitable purposes.[8510]

[8508] Editor. A supplication is a petition. Spittle is a shortened form of hospital, often an institution for the sick or poor. Surdo narras, speaking to a deaf person, is proverbial for an appeal that receives no hearing. The surrounding suffering is Burton's vehement moral indictment.

[8509] Editor. Role means roll or register; arms and devises are heraldic arms and emblems. Papists is Burton's polemical term for Roman Catholics. Satisfactory works are understood to make satisfaction for sin, while meritorious works earn reward in the view he attacks. His claim about motives is part of this religious controversy.

[8510] Editor. Pious uses includes religious and charitable purposes. Burton extends his accusation from public recognition to the disposal of unwanted or untransmittable wealth, while the following paragraph expressly allows the existence of sincere benefactors.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 431 For I dare boldly say, vain glory, that opinion of merit, and this enforced necessity, when they know not otherwise how to leave, or what better to do with them, is the main cause of most of our good works.	For I dare say boldly that vainglory, this belief in merit, and the necessity forced on people when they do not know how else to leave their possessions or what better to do with them, are the chief causes of most of our good works.
I will not urge this to derogate from any mans charitable devotion, or bounty in this kinde, to censure any good work; no doubt there be many sanctified, heroical, and worthy minded men, that in true zeal, and for vertues sake (divine spirits) that out of commiseration and pitty, extend their liberality, and as much as in them lies, do good to all men, cloath the naked, feed the hungry, comfort the sick and needy, relieve all, forget and forgive injuries, as true charity requires; yet most part there is simulatum quid, a deal of hypocrisie in this kind, much default and defect.	I do not press this argument to detract from anyone's charitable devotion or generosity, or to condemn any good work. There are undoubtedly many sanctified, noble and worthy-minded people—divine spirits—who, out of true zeal and for virtue's sake, generously give from compassion and pity. As far as they can, they do good to everyone, clothe the naked, feed the hungry, comfort the sick and needy, relieve everyone, forget and forgive injuries, as true charity requires. Yet for the most part there is "something feigned," a great deal of hypocrisy, much fault and failing.[8511]

[8511] Editor. Heroical here means noble or magnanimous, rather than the erotic sense used elsewhere in the book. Simulatum quid means something simulated or pretended. The concession prevents the passage from amounting to an unqualified denial of all sincere charity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8512]Cosmus Medices that rich citizen of Florence ingenuously confessed to a neer friend of his, that would know of him why he built so many publike and magnificent palaces, and bestowed so liberally on Scholars, not that he loved learning more then others, but to [8513]eternize his own name, to be immortall by the benefit of Scholars; for when his friends were dead, walls decayed, and all Inscriptions gone, books would remain to the worlds end.	Cosimo de' Medici, that wealthy citizen of Florence, frankly confessed to a close friend who asked why he built so many splendid public palaces and gave so generously to scholars: it was not because he loved learning more than other people, "but to make his own name everlasting, to gain immortality through scholars; for when his friends were dead, walls decayed and all inscriptions gone, books would remain until the world's end."[8514]
The lanthorn in [8515]Athens was built by Xenocles, the Theater by Pericles, the famous port Pyræum by Musicles, Pallas Palladium by Phidias, the Pantheon by Callicratidas; but these brave monuments are decayed all, and ruined long since, their builders names alone flourish by mediation of writers.	The lantern in Athens was built by Xenocles, the theatre by Pericles, the famous port of Piraeus by Musicles, the statue of Pallas by Phidias, the Pantheon by Callicratidas. Yet all these splendid monuments have decayed and long since fallen into ruin; only their builders' names flourish, preserved through writers.[8516]

[8512] Burton. Printed page 431, x: "Jovius, vita ejus." Giovio, his life of Cosimo.

[8513] Burton. Printed page 431, y: "Immortalitatem beneficio literarum, immortali gloriosa quadam cupiditate concupivit. Quod cives quibus benefecisset perituri, mœnia ruitura, etsi regio sumptu ædificata, non libri." "He desired immortality through literature, with a certain undying and glorious ambition, because the citizens he had benefited would perish and the buildings would fall, even if constructed at royal expense, but books would not." The repetition of immortalitatem and immortali is retained.

[8514] Editor. Cosmus Medices is Cosimo de' Medici; Giovio is Paolo Giovio. Ingenuously means frankly or candidly. The Latin margin speaks of benefited citizens, while Burton's English says friends; both readings are retained. The exact biography passage and the identification of this Cosimo remain for collation.

[8515] Burton. Printed page 431, dagger: "Plutarch. Pericle." Plutarch, Pericles.

[8516] Editor. Compare Plutarch, Pericles 13. The list in Burton differs in names and assignments from Plutarch: Mnesicles built the Propylaea, Callicrates and Ictinus the Parthenon, and Xenocles completed the lantern over the sanctuary at Eleusis. Burton's Musicles, Callicratidas, Pantheon and other associations are retained. Pallas Palladium is rendered as the statue of Pallas, without silently identifying a specific Athenian statue.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as [8517]he said of that Marian Oke, now cut down and dead, nullius Agricolæ manu culta stirps tam diuturna, quam quæ poetæ versu seminari potest, no plant can grow so long as that which is ingenio sata, set and manured by those ever-living wits.	And as he said of that oak of Marius, now cut down and dead, "no tree tended by a farmer's hand lasts so long as one that can be sown in a poet's verse." No plant can grow so long as one "sown by genius," planted and tended by those ever-living minds.[8518]
[8519]Allon Backuth that weeping Oke, under which Deborah, Rebecchaes nurse died, and was buried, may not survive the memory of such everlasting monuments. Vainglory and emulation (as to most men) was the cause efficient, and to be a trumpeter of his own fame, Cosmus sole intent to do good, that all the world might take notice of it.	Allon-bacuth, that weeping oak under which Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, died and was buried, may not outlast the memory of such everlasting monuments. Vainglory and rivalry, as with most people, were the motivating cause. To trumpet his own fame was Cosimo's sole purpose in doing good, so that the whole world might notice it.[8520]
Such for the most part is the charity of our times, such our Benefactors, Mæcenates and Patrons. Shew me amongst so many myriads, a truly devout, a right, honest, upright, meek, humble, a patient, innocuous, innocent, a mercifull, a loving, a charitable man! [8521]Probus quis nobiscum vivit? Shew me a Caleb or a Joshua!	Such, for the most part, is the charity of our times; such are our benefactors, our Maecenases and patrons. Show me among so many thousands a truly devout person, just, honourable, upright, meek, humble, patient, harmless, innocent, merciful, loving and charitable! "What good man lives among us?" Show me a Caleb or a Joshua![8522]
Dic mihi Musa virum ——	Tell me, Muse, of the man—[8523]

[8517] Burton. Printed page 431, asterisk: "Tullius lib. 1. de legibus." Cicero, On Laws, book 1.

[8518] Editor. Cicero, On Laws 1.1–2, contrasts the physical oak associated with Marius and the tree's lasting life in poetry. Burton paraphrases the Latin. Marian means belonging to Marius, not to Mary. Manured here means cultivated or tended; wits means minds or writers.

[8519] Burton. Printed page 431, dagger: "Gen. 35. 8." Genesis 35:8.

[8520] Editor. Genesis 35:8 places Deborah's burial beneath an oak called Allon-bacuth, the oak of weeping. Burton additionally says she died under it. Cause efficient means the active or producing cause. The imputed motive for Cosimo's benefactions is Burton's judgement, not an independently established fact.

[8521] Burton. Printed page 431, z: "Hor." Horace; compare Satires 1.3.56–57.

[8522] Editor. Mæcenates uses the name of the Roman literary patron Maecenas as a plural for patrons. Horace, Satires 1.3.56–57, introduces a good and modest man with an indefinite quis, "someone." Burton turns the fragment into a question about whether any good person lives among us. Caleb and Joshua are biblical examples of fidelity.

[8523] Editor. Horace, Art of Poetry 141, gives Dic mihi, Musa, virum in a Latin rendering of the Odyssey's opening. Burton uses the appeal to summon an exemplary person. Only the quoted fragment is supplied.

Original text 1651	Modern English
shew a vertuous woman, a constant wife, a good neighbour, a trusty servant, an obedient child, a true friend, &c. Crows in Africk are not so scant.	Show me a virtuous woman, a faithful wife, a good neighbour, a trustworthy servant, an obedient child, a true friend, and so on. Crows in Africa are not so scarce.[8524]
He that shall examine this [8525]iron age wherein we live, where love is cold, & jam terras Astræa reliquit, Justice fled with her assistants, vertue expelled,	Anyone who examines this iron age in which we live, where love is cold "and now Astraea has left the earth," Justice has fled with her attendants and virtue has been expelled—[8526]

[8524] Editor. Constant means steadfast or faithful. The scarcity of crows in Africa is a proverbial comparison here; the sentence is retained as Burton's claim, not presented as a verified statement about African bird populations.

[8525] Burton. Printed page 431, a: "Durum genus sumus." "We are a hard race." Compare Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.414.

[8526] Editor. The iron age is the morally degraded final age in a classical scheme of human history. Astraea personifies justice; compare Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.149–150. The marginal "we are a hard race" echoes 1.414, where humans are descended from stones. Burton combines the passages in a moral application.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— Justitiæ soror, Incorrupta fides, nudaque veritas, ——	Justice's sister, Incorruptible Faith, and naked Truth—[8527]
Source page 431–432 all goodness gone, where vice abounds, the Divel is loose, & see one man vilify and insult over his brother, as if he were an innocent, or a block, oppress, tyrannise, prey upon, torture him, vex, gaule, torment and crucify him, starve him, where is charity?	All goodness gone, vice abounding, the devil loose—and sees one person vilify and exult over his brother as though he were a simpleton or a block of wood, oppress and tyrannize over him, prey on and torture him, vex, chafe, torment, crucify and starve him: where is charity?[8528]
Source page 432 He that shall see men [8529]swear and forswear, lye and bear false witness, to advantage themselves, prejudice others, hazard goods, lives, fortunes, credit, all, to be revenged on their enemies, men so unspeakable in their lusts, unnaturall in malice, such bloudy designements, Italian blaspheming, Spanish renouncing, &c. may well aske where is charity?	Anyone who sees people swear oaths and break them, lie and bear false witness to benefit themselves and harm others, risk goods, lives, fortunes, reputation—everything—to revenge themselves on their enemies; people unspeakable in their desires, unnatural in their malice, with such murderous schemes, Italian blaspheming, Spanish renouncing and the like, may well ask: where is charity?[8530]

[8527] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.24.6–7. Faith here is fidelity or good faith, personified as Justice's sister; naked Truth is truth without disguise. Burton lifts these figures from an elegy into his picture of virtue's departure.

[8528] Editor. An innocent can mean a person regarded as intellectually simple; a block is a block of wood, hence someone treated as unfeeling or stupid. Insult over means exult or act contemptuously over. Gaule means gall, chafe or wound. The catalogue exposes the reduction of another person to an object.

[8529] Burton. Printed page 432, b: "Tull. pro Rosc. Mentiri vis causa mea? ego vero cupide & libenter mentiar tua causa; & si quando me vis pejurare, ut paullulum tu compendii facias, paratum fore scito." Cicero, For Roscius: "Do you want to lie for my sake? I will indeed lie eagerly and gladly for yours; and if you ever want me to swear falsely so that you may make a little profit, know that I shall be ready." The printed pejurare is retained.

[8530] Editor. Forswear means swear falsely; prejudice means harm; credit means reputation. Italian blaspheming and Spanish renouncing are national stereotypes, the latter meaning impious disavowal. In Cicero, For Roscius the Actor 49–50, the offer to lie and swear falsely is an imagined exchange, immediately rejected as implausible. Burton's altered wording, including pejurare against the consulted peierare, remains.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He that shall observe so many law-suits, such endless contentions, such plotting, undermining, so much mony spent with such eagerness and fury, every man for himself, his own ends, the Divel for all: so many distressed souls, such lamentable complaints, so many factions, conspiracies, seditions, oppressions, abuses, injuries, such grudging, repining, discontents, so much emulation, envy, so many brawles, quarrels, monomachies, &c. may well require what is become of charity?	Anyone who observes so many lawsuits, such endless disputes, such plotting and undermining, so much money spent with such eagerness and fury—everyone for himself and his own ends, the devil for all—so many distressed souls, such pitiful complaints, so many factions, conspiracies, rebellions, oppressions, abuses and injuries, such grudging, resentment and discontent, so much rivalry and envy, so many brawls, quarrels and duels, may well ask what has become of charity.[8531]
when we see and read of such cruel wars, tumults, uproares, bloudy battels, so many men slain, so many cities ruinated, &c. (for what else is the subject of all our stories almost, but Bills, Bowes, and Gunns!) so many [8532]murders and massacres, &c. where is Charity?	When we see and read of such cruel wars, tumults, uproars and bloody battles, so many people killed and so many cities ruined—for what else fills almost all our histories but bills, bows and guns?—so many murders and massacres: where is charity?[8533]
Or see men wholly devote to God, Churchmen, professed Divines, holy men, [8534]to make the trumpet of the Gospel the trumpet of war, a company of Hell-born Jesuits, and fiery-spirited Friers, facem præferre to all seditions; as so many firebrands set all the world by the ears	Or see people wholly devoted to God—churchmen, professed theologians, holy men—"make the trumpet of the Gospel the trumpet of war": a company of hell-born Jesuits and fiery-spirited friars "carrying the torch" before every rebellion, like so many firebrands setting the whole world quarrelling.[8535]

[8531] Editor. Monomachies are single combats or duels. Require means inquire or ask. Emulation here is competitive rivalry rather than admirable imitation. Burton extends private hostility into litigation, conspiracy and civil disorder.

[8532] Burton. Printed page 432, c: "Gallienus in Treb. Pollio lacera, occide, mea mente irascere. Rabie jecur incendente feruntur Præcipites. Vopiscus of Aurelian. Tantum fudit sanguinis quantum quis vini potavit." Gallienus in Trebellius Pollio: "Tear, kill, be angry as I am." "With rage setting their liver aflame, they rush headlong." Vopiscus on Aurelian: "He shed as much blood as anyone drank wine." These adjacent examples form one marginal note.

[8533] Editor. Bills are polearms, not financial documents. Stories means histories. The marginal Gallienus and Aurelian examples are attributed to writers of the Historia Augusta; they are transmitted claims illustrating cruelty. Their exact textual settings and the intervening verse remain for full collation.

[8534] Burton. Printed page 432, d: "Evangelii tubam belli tubam faciunt; in pulpitis pacem, in colloquiis bellum suadent." "They make the Gospel's trumpet a trumpet of war; in the pulpits they urge peace, in their conversations war."

[8535] Editor. Divines are theologians; friars are members of mendicant religious orders. The insults against Jesuits and friars are Burton's anti-Catholic polemic. Facem præferre means carry a torch before someone, here inciting rebellion. The margin contrasts preaching peace publicly with advocating war in conversation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
(I say nothing of their contentious and rayling books, whole ages spent in writing one against another, and that with such virulency and bitterness, Bionæis sermonibus & sale nigro) and by their bloudy inquisitions that in thirty years, Bale saith, consumed 39 Princes, 148 Earls, 235 Barons, 14755 Commons; worse then those ten persecutions, may justly doubt where is Charity?	I say nothing of their contentious and abusive books, whole ages spent writing against one another with such venom and bitterness, "with Bion's discourses and black salt." And their bloody inquisitions, which in thirty years, Bale says, destroyed 39 princes, 148 earls, 235 barons and 14,755 common people—worse than those ten persecutions—may justly make us ask: where is charity?[8536]
Obsecro vos quales hi demum Christiani! Are these Christians? I beseech you tell me: He that shall observe and see these things, may say to them as Cato to Cæsar, credo quæ de inferis dicuntur falsa existimas, sure I think thou art of opinion there is neither Heaven, nor Hell.	"I ask you, what sort of Christians are these!" Are these Christians? Tell me, I beg you. Anyone who witnesses these things may say to them, as Cato said to Caesar, "I believe you think the things said about the underworld are false." Surely, I think, you believe there is neither heaven nor hell.[8537]
Let them pretend religion, zeal, make what shewes they will, give almes, peace-makers, frequent sermons, if we may guess at the tree by the fruit, they are no better then Hypocrites, Epicures, Atheists, with the [8538]fool in their hearts they say there is no God.	Let them profess religion and zeal, make whatever displays they please, give alms, act as peacemakers and attend sermons: if we may judge the tree by its fruit, they are no better than hypocrites, Epicureans and atheists; with "the fool, they say in their hearts that there is no God."[8539]

[8536] Editor. Bionæis sermonibus & sale nigro echoes Horace, Epistles 2.2.60, evoking the biting discourse of Bion and caustic wit. Burton's numerical claims are attributed to Bale and have not been independently verified. The ten persecutions refers to a traditional Christian enumeration of persecutions under Roman emperors, used as a rhetorical comparison.

[8537] Editor. Compare Cato's speech in Sallust, Catiline 52.13, which disputes Caesar's apparent disbelief in punishments after death. Burton recasts the Latin into direct address and expands its application to both heaven and hell. The question challenges the consistency of professed Christianity and violent conduct.

[8538] Burton. Printed page 432, e: "Psal. 13. 1." Psalm 13:1 as printed; compare Psalm 14:1 in Hebrew-based numbering.

[8539] Editor. Epicures is a hostile label for people given to pleasure, not a careful account of Epicurean philosophy. The fool's denial of God is Psalm 14:1 in Hebrew-based numbering, Psalm 13:1 in the Vulgate tradition. The printed locator is therefore retained without treating every numbering difference as an error.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis no marvel then if being so uncharitable, hard-hearted as we are, we have so frequent and so many discontents, such melancholy fits, so many bitter pangs, mutuall discords, all in a combustion, often complaints, so common grievances, generall mischiefes, si tantæ in terris tragœdiæ, quibus labefactatur & miserè laceratur humanum genus, so many pestilences, wars, uproares, losses, deluges, fires, inundations, Gods vengeance and the plagues of Egypt, come not upon us, since we are so currish one towards another, so respectless of God, and our neighbours, and by our crying sinnes pull these miseries upon our own heads.	It is no wonder, then, if, being so uncharitable and hard-hearted, we suffer so many and such frequent discontents, such fits of melancholy, so many bitter pangs and mutual quarrels, everything in turmoil, constant complaints, widespread grievances and general calamities; "if there are such tragedies on earth, shaking and miserably tearing the human race apart"; if so many plagues, wars, uproars, losses, deluges, fires and floods, God's vengeance and the plagues of Egypt, do not come upon us. We are so vicious towards one another, so heedless of God and our neighbours, and by our crying sins bring these miseries down on our own heads.[8540]
Nay more, tis justly to be feared, which [8541]Josephus once said of his Countrymen Jewes, If the Romans had not come when they did to sack their City, surely it had been swallowed up with some earthquake, deluge, or fired from Heaven as Sodom and Gomorrah: their desperate malice, wickedness and peevishness was such.	More than that, we have good reason to fear what Josephus once said of his Jewish countrymen: "If the Romans had not come when they did to sack their city, surely it would have been swallowed by an earthquake or flood, or burned by fire from heaven like Sodom and Gomorrah, such was their desperate malice, wickedness and perversity."[8542]

[8540] Editor. Combustion means turmoil or violent agitation; crying sins are offences imagined to call out for judgement. The printed sentence moves awkwardly from miseries already suffered to disasters that "come not upon us." That negative is retained. Burton interprets collective suffering within a theology of punishment for uncharitableness.

[8541] Burton. Printed page 432, dagger: "De bello Iudaico lib. 6. c. 16. Puto si Romani contra nos venire tardassent, aut hiatu terræ devorandam fuisse civitatem, aut diluvio perituram, aut fulmina ac Sodoma cum incendio passuram, ob desperatum populi, &c." The Jewish War, book 6, chapter 16, as printed: "I think that if the Romans had delayed coming against us, the city would have been swallowed by an opening in the earth, or perished in a flood, or suffered thunderbolts and fire like Sodom, because of the people's desperate …" The final phrase is abbreviated. Compare Jewish War 5.13.6.

[8542] Editor. Compare Josephus, Jewish War 5.13.6, in the consulted numbering. Josephus imagines destruction by earthquake, flood or fire like Sodom if Rome had delayed. Burton adds Gomorrah and adapts the judgement. The printed 6.16 remains in the marginal note. Burton immediately applies this threatened fate to his own society.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 432–433 'Tis to be suspected, if we continue these wretched waies, we may look for the like heavy visitations to come upon us: If we had any sense or feeling of these things, surely we should not go on as we do, in such irregular courses, practise all manner of impieties; our whole carriage would not be so averse from God.	We have reason to suspect that, if we persist in these wretched ways, we may expect equally severe visitations. If we had any awareness or feeling for these things, surely we would not go on as we do, following such wayward courses and practising every kind of impiety; our whole conduct would not be so opposed to God.[8543]
Source page 433 If a man would but consider, when he is in the midst and full career of such prodigious and uncharitable actions, how displeasing they are in Gods sight, how noxious to himself, as Salomon told Joab, 1 King. 2. The Lord shall bring this bloud upon their heads, Prov. 1. 27. sudden desolation and destruction shall come like a whirlwinde upon them: affliction, anguish, the reward of his hand shall be given him, Isa. 3. 11. &c. they shall fall into the pit they have digged for others, and when they are scraping, tyrannizing, getting, wallowing in their wealth, This night, O fool, I will take away thy soul, what a severe account they must make;	If only, in the midst and full rush of such monstrous and uncharitable actions, a person would consider how displeasing they are in God's sight and how harmful to himself—as Solomon told Joab, 1 Kings 2: "The Lord will bring this blood upon their heads"; Proverbs 1:27: "Sudden desolation and destruction will come upon them like a whirlwind"; "affliction, anguish, the reward of his hands will be given him," Isaiah 3:11, and so on; "they will fall into the pit they have dug for others"; and while they scrape together wealth, tyrannize, acquire and wallow in riches, "This night, you fool, I will take away your soul"—what a strict account they must give![8544]

[8543] Editor. Visitations are punitive afflictions in this context; carriage means conduct. The first-person plural continues Burton's application of the preceding historical example to his contemporaries.

[8544] Editor. The warnings combine and adapt several biblical passages: 1 Kings 2:32–33; Proverbs 1:27; Isaiah 3:11; the pit image found in Psalms and Proverbs; and the rich fool of Luke 12:20. In 1 Kings Solomon speaks to Benaiah about Joab, rather than directly to Joab as Burton says. His locators and composite wording are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and how [8545]gracious on the other side a charitable man is in Gods eys, haurit sibi gratiam. Matth. 5. 7. Blessed are the mercifull, for they shall obtain mercy: He that lendeth to the poor, gives to God; and how it shall be restored to them again, how by their patience and long suffering they shall heap coals on their enemies heads, Rom. 12. and he that followeth after righteousness and mercy, shall finde righteousness and glory;	And, on the other hand, how pleasing a charitable person is in God's eyes: "he draws grace to himself." Matthew 5:7: "Blessed are the merciful, for they will obtain mercy." "Whoever lends to the poor gives to God"; it will be repaid to them. "By their patience and forbearance they will heap coals upon their enemies' heads," Romans 12; "and whoever follows righteousness and mercy will find righteousness and glory."[8546]
surely they would check their desires, curb their unnaturall, inordinate affections, agree amongst themselves, abstain from doing evill, amend their lives and learn to do well. Behold how comely and good a thing it is for brethren to live together in union: it is like the pretious ointment, &c. How odious [8547]to contend one with the other!	Surely they would check their desires, curb their unnatural and disorderly passions, agree among themselves, refrain from evil, amend their lives and learn to do good. "See how beautiful and good it is for brothers to live together in unity: it is like the precious ointment," and so on. How hateful to quarrel with one another![8548]
[8549]Miseri quid luctatiunculis hisce volumus? ecce mors supra caput est, & supremum illud tribunal, ubi & dicta & facta nostra examinanda sunt: Sapiamus!	"Wretched creatures, what do we want with these petty struggles? See, death hangs over our heads, and that supreme tribunal where our words and deeds must be examined. Let us be wise!"[8550]

[8545] Burton. Printed page 433, f: "Benefacit animæ suæ vir misericors;" "A merciful person benefits his own soul." Compare Proverbs 11:17.

[8546] Editor. The margin corresponds to Proverbs 11:17. Gracious means pleasing or favoured. Lending to the Lord through aid to the poor is Proverbs 19:17; Burton changes its phrasing. Romans 12:20 gives the coals image in connection with feeding a hungry enemy. The final promise adapts Proverbs 21:21. Burton's wording is modernized without replacing it with a standardized Bible text.

[8547] Burton. Printed page 433, g: "Concordia magnæ res crescunt, discordia maximæ dilabuntur." "Through concord great things grow; through discord the greatest fall apart." The printed magnæ is retained; compare Sallust, Jugurthine War 10.6, with parvae, "small."

[8548] Editor. The image of brothers living in unity and precious ointment is Psalm 133:1–2 in Hebrew-based numbering. The marginal concord maxim parallels Sallust, Jugurthine War 10.6, but prints magnæ, "great," where Sallust has parvae, "small." Both the printed reading and its difference are recorded.

[8549] Burton. Printed page 433, h: "Lipsius." Justus Lipsius. The exact work and passage remain to be established.

[8550] Editor. Luctatiunculis is diminutive: petty struggles or little bouts of wrestling. The Latin and Burton's following English rendering are both retained. The margin attributes the appeal to Lipsius without a work or passage; the exact source remains unresolved. This closes Section 1, before the new discussion of erotic love in Section 2.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Why do we contend and vex one another? behold death is over our heads, and we must shortly give an account of all our uncharitable words and actions: think upon it: and be wise.	Why do we quarrel and torment one another? See, death hangs over our heads, and soon we must account for all our uncharitable words and actions. Think about it, and be wise.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SECT. 2. MEMB. 1. SUBSECT. 1. Heroicall love causing Melancholy. His Pedegree, Power, and Extent.	SECTION 2 MEMBER 1, SUBSECTION 1 Love melancholy: its ancestry, power and reach.[8551]
IN the precedent Section mention was made amongst other pleasant objects, of this comeliness and beauty which proceeds from women, that causeth Heroicall, or love-melancholy, is more eminent above the rest, and properly called Love. The part affected in men is the liver, and therefore called Heroicall, because commonly Gallants, Noblemen, and the most generous spirits are possessed with it.	In the preceding section, among other pleasing objects, we mentioned the grace and beauty of women that causes "heroical," or love, melancholy. It stands above the other kinds and is properly called Love. The part affected in men is the liver. It is called "heroical" because gallants, noblemen and the noblest spirits are commonly possessed by it.[8552]
Source page 433–434 His power and extent is very large, [8553]and in that twofold division of Love, φιλεῖν and ἐρᾶν [8554]those two Veneries which Plato and some other make mention of, it is most eminent, and κατ᾽ ἐξοχὴν called Venus, as I have said, or Love it self. Which although it be denominated from men, and most evident in them, yet it extends and shews it self in vegetall and sensible creatures, those incorporeall substances (as shall be specified) and hath a large dominion of soveraignty over them.	Its power and reach are very great. In that twofold division of love into "affection" and "erotic desire"—those two Venuses mentioned by Plato and others—it is the foremost, called Venus "in the pre-eminent sense," as I have said, or Love itself. Although named with reference to human beings, and most evident in them, it extends to plants, sentient creatures and those incorporeal beings to be described below, exercising a wide dominion over them.[8555]

[8551] Editor. Heroicall love is Burton's term here for erotic love that causes melancholy, not heroic conduct in the modern sense. The heading opens Section 2, Member 1, Subsection 1. Pedigree becomes ancestry; extent is the reach of Love's power.

[8552] Editor. The liver as the bodily seat of this passion belongs to Burton's inherited physiology. His explanation of heroical connects the term with high rank and noble spirits. Gallants are fashionable or spirited gentlemen; generous here means noble, not primarily charitable. The modern sentence division clarifies the shift from bodily location to the name.

[8553] Burton. Printed page 433, i: "Memb. 1. Subs. 2." The printed internal cross-reference is retained.

[8554] Burton. Printed page 433, k: "Amor & amicitia." "Love and friendship."

[8555] Editor. The Greek verbs distinguish affection or friendship, philein, from erotic desire, eran. Kat' exochēn means pre-eminently or in the special sense. Veneries here means two Venuses or forms of love; later in the block venery means sexual activity. Vegetall means belonging to plants; sensible means capable of sensation. The printed internal reference is preserved without silently redirecting it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 434 His pedegree is very ancient, derived from the beginning of the world, as [8556]Phædrus contends, and his [8557]parentage of such antiquity, that no Poet could ever finde it out. Hesiod makes [8558]Terra and Chaos to be Loves parents, before the Gods were born:	Love's ancestry is very ancient, reaching back to the beginning of the world, as Phaedrus argues. His parentage is so old that no poet could ever discover it. Hesiod makes Earth and Chaos Love's parents, before the gods were born:[8559]
Ante deos omnes primum generavit Amorem.	Before all the gods, she first brought forth Love.
Some think it is the self same fire Prometheus fetched from heaven. Plutarch amator. libello, will have Love to be the son of Iris and Favonius; but Socrates in that pleasant Dialogue of Plato, when it came to his turn to speak of Love, (of which subject Agatho the Rhetoritian, magniloquus Agatho, that Chanter Agatho, had newly given occasion) in a poeticall strain, telleth this tale:	Some think Love is the very fire Prometheus brought from heaven. Plutarch, in his little work on love, makes Love the son of Iris and the West Wind. But Socrates, in that delightful dialogue of Plato, when his turn came to speak about love—a subject just introduced by Agathon the rhetorician, "grandiloquent Agathon," that singer Agathon—tells this tale in a poetic vein:[8560]

[8556] Burton. Printed page 434, l: "Phædrus orat. in laudem amoris Platonis convivio." Phaedrus's speech in praise of love in Plato's Symposium.

[8557] Burton. Printed page 434, m: "Vide Boccac. de Genial deorum." "See Boccaccio on the genealogy of the gods." The printed Genial is retained.

[8558] Burton. Printed page 434, n: "See the morall in Plut. of that fiction."

[8559] Editor. Compare Phaedrus's speech in Plato, Symposium 178a–c. Burton compresses the sequence of Chaos, Earth and Love into a parentage. The following verse corresponds to the Parmenides quotation in that speech, although Burton places it immediately after his statement about Hesiod. Terra is Earth; the Latin verse's unstated subject is supplied as she from the creation context.

[8560] Editor. Prometheus brought fire to human beings in Greek myth. Iris is the rainbow goddess; Favonius is the Latin West Wind, corresponding to Zephyrus. Plutarch, On Love 20, reports the Iris-and-Zephyrus genealogy. Agatho is Agathon, a tragic poet and speaker in Plato's Symposium; Chanter and magniloquus are Burton's characterizations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
When Venus was born, all the Gods were invited to a banquet, and amongst the rest, [8561]Porus the God of bounty and wealth; Penia or poverty came a begging to the door; Porus well whitled with Nectar (for there was no wine in those daies) walking in Jupiters garden, in a Bowre met with Penia, and in his drink got her with child, of whom was born Love; and because he was begotten on Venus birth day, Venus still attends upon him. The morall of this is in [8562]Ficinus.	When Venus was born, all the gods were invited to a banquet, among them Porus, the god of abundance and wealth. Penia, or Poverty, came begging at the door. Porus, thoroughly drunk on nectar—for there was no wine in those days—was walking in Jupiter's garden when he met Penia in a bower. In his drunkenness he made her pregnant, and she gave birth to Love. Because he was conceived on Venus's birthday, Venus always attends upon him. Ficino gives the moral interpretation of this story.[8563]
Another tale is there borrowed out of Aristophanes: [8564]In the beginning of the world, men had four arms and four feet, but for their pride because they compared themselves with the Gods, were parted into halfes, and now peradventure by love they hope to be united again and made one.	Another tale there is borrowed from Aristophanes. At the beginning of the world, human beings had four arms and four feet. But because they proudly compared themselves with the gods, they were divided into halves; now, perhaps, they hope through love to be reunited and made one.[8565]

[8561] Burton. Printed page 434, o: "Affluentiæ Deus." "God of abundance."

[8562] Burton. Printed page 434, p: "Cap. 7. Comment. in Plat. convivium." Chapter 7, commentary on Plato's Symposium, as cited.

[8563] Editor. Compare Symposium 203b–c, where Socrates recounts Diotima's teaching. Plato has Porus asleep and Penia taking the initiative; Love becomes Aphrodite's attendant. Burton alters the action and reverses the attendance, making Venus attend Love. Both changes are retained. Whitled means intoxicated. Morall means an allegorical interpretation, not simply a lesson in good behaviour.

[8564] Burton. Printed page 434, q: "See more in Valesius lib. 3. cont. med. & cont 13." The abbreviated locator is retained for collation.

[8565] Editor. Compare Aristophanes's speech in Symposium 189d–191d. Plato describes the original double-bodied humans and their division as punishment. Burton abbreviates a more elaborate account of bodily form, sex and the desire for reunion; missing details have not been supplied in the translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Otherwise thus, [8566]Vulcan met two lovers, and bid them aske what they would and they should have it; but they made answer, O Vulcane faber Deorum, &c. O Vulcan the Gods great Smith, we beseech thee to work us anew in thy fornace, and of two make us one; which he presently did, and ever since true lovers are either all one, or else desire to be united. Many such tales you shall finde in Leon Hebræus, dial. 3. and their morall to them.	Or the story runs this way: Vulcan met two lovers and told them to ask for whatever they wished, and they would have it. They answered, "O Vulcan, smith of the gods," and so on: "O Vulcan, the gods' great smith, we beg you to forge us anew in your furnace and make us one instead of two." He immediately did so; ever since, true lovers are either wholly one or desire to be united. You will find many such tales, with their moral interpretations, in the third dialogue of Leone Ebreo.[8567]
The reason why Love was still painted yong, (as Phornutus [8568]and others will) [8569]is because yong men are most apt to love, soft, fair, and fat, because such folks are soonest taken: naked, because all true affection is simple and open: he smiles, because merry and given to delights: hath a quiver, to shew his power, none can escape: is blinde, because he sees not where he strikes, whom he hits, &c.	The reason Love was always portrayed as young, according to Phornutus and others, "is that young people are most disposed to love; soft, beautiful and plump, because such people are most readily captivated; naked, because all true affection is simple and open. He smiles because he is merry and given to pleasure; he carries a quiver to show his power, which no one can escape; and he is blind because he does not see where he strikes or whom he hits," and so on.[8570]

[8566] Burton. Printed page 434, r: "Vives 3. de anima; oramus te ut tuis artibus & caminis nos refingas, & ex duobus unum facias; quod & fecit, & exinde amatores unum sunt & unum esse petunt." Vives, On the Soul, book 3: "We beg you to refashion us by your art and furnaces, and make one out of two; this he did, and ever since lovers are one and seek to be one."

[8567] Editor. Compare Symposium 192d–e: Hephaestus hypothetically offers to weld the lovers together. Burton, following the Vives passage he quotes, turns this into an encounter and accomplished act. Vulcan is the Roman equivalent of Hephaestus. Leon Hebræus is Leone Ebreo, author of the Dialogues of Love.

[8568] Burton. Printed page 434, s: "See more in Natalis Comes Imagin. Deorum. Philostratus de Imaginibus. Lilius Giraldus Syntag. de diis. Phornutus, &c." The printed titles and attributions are retained.

[8569] Burton. Printed page 434, t: "Juvenis pingitur quod amore plerumque juvenes capiuntur; sic & mollis, formosus, nudus, quod simplex & apertus hic affectus; ridet quod oblectamentum præ se ferat, cum pharetra &c." "He is painted young because young people are generally caught by love; likewise soft, beautiful and naked, because this affection is simple and open; he laughs because he brings pleasure; with a quiver, and so on."

[8570] Editor. Phornutus is the name under which the mythographer Cornutus was known in early modern books. Still means always or habitually. Taken means captivated; fat describes a plump or full form. The physical attributes are interpreted allegorically, including the blindness that makes Love strike without discrimination. Burton's exact intermediary remains to be established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
His power and soveraignty is expressed by the [8571]Poets, in that he is held to be a God, and a great commanding God, above Jupiter himself; Magnus Dæmon, as Plato calls him, the strongest and merriest of all the Gods according to Alcinous and [8572]Athenæus. Amor virorum rex, amor rex & deûm, as Euripides, the God of Gods and governor of men; for we must all do homage to him, keep an holy day for his Deity, adore in his Temples, worship his image, (numen enim hoc non est nudum nomen) and sacrifice to his altar, that conquers all, and rules all:	The poets express his power and sovereignty by holding him to be a god, a mighty commanding god above Jupiter himself: "a great spirit," as Plato calls him; the strongest and merriest of all the gods, according to Alcinous and Athenaeus. "Love is king of men; Love is king of gods too," says Euripides: god of gods and governor of humanity. We must all pay him homage, keep a holy day for his divinity, adore him in his temples, worship his image—"for this divinity is no mere name"—and sacrifice at his altar: he conquers and rules everyone.[8573]
[8574]Mallem cum leone, cervo & apro Æolico, Cum Antæo & Stymphalicis avibus luctari Quam cum amore ——	I would rather wrestle with a lion, a stag and the Aeolian boar, With Antaeus and the Stymphalian birds, Than with Love—[8575]

[8571] Burton. Printed page 434, u: "A petty Pope, claves habet superorum & inferorum, as Orpheus, &c." "He holds the keys of those above and those below," as Orpheus, and so on.

[8572] Burton. Printed page 434, x: "Lib. 13. cap. 5. Dyphnoso." Athenaeus, Deipnosophists, book 13, chapter 5, as printed.

[8573] Editor. Compare Symposium 202d–e for Love as a great daimon, a spirit mediating between mortal and divine; this is not the later Christian sense of devil. The numen/nomen phrase plays on divinity and name, asserting real power rather than a title. The marginal petty Pope likewise makes Love a ruler holding keys. The Alcinous and Euripides references remain for exact collation.

[8574] Burton. Printed page 434, asterisk: "Plautus." Compare Persa 3–5; Burton adapts the wording and line order.

[8575] Editor. Plautus, Persa 3–5, adapted. Burton omits the hydra, changes the ordering, and prints Æolico, Aeolian, where the consulted Latin has Aetolico, Aetolian. Antaeus is a giant and the Stymphalian birds belong to Hercules's labours. Burton's subsequent English is a free rendering and is therefore preserved separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 434–435 I had rather contend with Bulls, Lions, Bears, and Giants, then with Love; he is so powerfull, enforceth [8576]all to pay tribute to him, domineers over all, and can make mad and sober whom he list; insomuch that Cæcilius in Tullies Tusculanes, holds him to be no better then a fool or an idiot, that doth not acknowledge Love to be a great God.	I would rather fight bulls, lions, bears and giants than Love. So powerful is he that he compels everyone to pay him tribute, lords it over all, and makes whomever he pleases mad or sane. Indeed, Caecilius, in Cicero's Tusculan Disputations, considers anyone who does not acknowledge Love as a great god no better than a fool or an idiot.[8577]
Source page 435 [8578]Cui in manu sit quem esse dementem velit, Quem sapere, quem in morbum injici, &c.	In whose hands it lies to choose whom he would drive mad, Whom make wise, whom cast into sickness, and so on.
That can make sick and cure whom he list. Homer and Stesichorus were both made blinde, if you will believe [8579]Leon Hebræus for speaking against his godhead:	He can make sick or cure whomever he pleases. Homer and Stesichorus were both struck blind, if you believe Leone Ebreo, for speaking against his divinity.[8580]

[8576] Burton. Printed page 434, y: "Regnat & in superos jus habet ille deos. Ovid." "He reigns and has authority even over the gods above." Ovid, as attributed.

[8577] Editor. Cæcilius is the comic poet Caecilius Statius, quoted by Cicero in Tusculan Disputations 4.68. Burton's verse omits quem sanari, whom to heal, which appears in the consulted Latin; he restores that idea in the following prose. List means pleases. The attribution through Selden is retained in the margin.

[8578] Burton. Printed page 435, z: "Selden proleg. 3. cap. de diis Syris." Selden, On the Syrian Gods, prolegomena, chapter 3, as cited.

[8579] Burton. Printed page 435, a: "Dial. 3." Leone Ebreo, dialogue 3.

[8580] Editor. Burton attributes this blindness story to Leone Ebreo. Its exact location and its transfer to speaking against Love's divinity remain for collation; the account is not silently replaced with another version of the poets' blindness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And though Aristophanes degrade him, and say that he was [8581]scornfully rejected from the councell of the Gods, had his wings clipped besides, that he might come no more amongst them, and to his farther disgrace banished heaven for ever, and confined to dwell on earth, yet he is of that [8582]power, majesty, omnipotency, and dominion, that no creature can withstand him.	And although Aristophanes degrades him, saying that he was contemptuously expelled from the council of the gods, his wings clipped so that he could no longer come among them, and, to disgrace him further, banished from heaven for ever and confined to earth, still his power, majesty, omnipotence and dominion are such that no creature can resist him.[8583]
[8584]Imperat Cupido etiam diis pro arbitrio, Et ipsum arcere ne armipotens potest Jupiter.	Cupid commands even the gods as he pleases, And mighty Jupiter himself cannot restrain him.
He is more then quarter Master with the Gods,	He is more than an equal partner of the gods—[8585]
—— Tenet Thetide æquor, umbras Æaco, cælum Jove:	He holds The sea through Thetis, the shades through Aeacus, heaven through Jove.
and hath not so much possession, as dominion. Jupiter himself was turned into a Satyre, Shepheard, a Bull, a Swan, a golden showre, and what not, for love; that as [8586]Lucian's Juno right well objected to him, ludus amoris tu es, thou art Cupids wherlegigg: how did he insult over all the other Gods, Mars, Neptune, Pan, Mercury, Bacchus, and the rest?	He has not merely possession but dominion. Jupiter himself was transformed for love into a satyr, a shepherd, a bull, a swan, a shower of gold and every imaginable thing. As Lucian's Juno quite rightly reproached him, "you are Love's plaything"—you are Cupid's whirligig. How he lorded it over all the other gods: Mars, Neptune, Pan, Mercury, Bacchus and the rest![8587]

[8581] Burton. Printed page 435, dagger: "A concilio Deorum rejectus & ad majorem ejus ignominiam, &c." "Rejected from the council of the gods, and to his greater disgrace," and so on.

[8582] Burton. Printed page 435, b: "Fulmine concitatior." "Swifter than a thunderbolt."

[8583] Editor. The claimed Aristophanes passage and the precise Sophocles source for the following Latin couplet remain unresolved. Burton juxtaposes an account of Love's expulsion with an assertion that no one can withstand him; this rhetorical contrast is preserved.

[8584] Burton. Printed page 435, asterisk: "Sophocles." The attribution accompanies the two Latin lines.

[8585] Editor. Quarter Master means a partner in power. Burton distinguishes possession from dominion. The verse is adapted from Seneca, Trojan Women 345–346, where Achilles's ancestry extends through sea, underworld and heaven: Thetis, Aeacus and Jove. Burton transfers the image to Love's rule through the deities.

[8586] Burton. Printed page 435, asterisk: "Tom. 4." Lucian, volume 4, as printed.

[8587] Editor. A whirligig is a spinning toy, making Jupiter something Cupid turns about at will. Insult over means triumph or lord it over. Burton gathers Jupiter's mythic transformations into a catalogue of Love's power; the volume number for Lucian is edition-dependent.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8588]Lucian brings in Jupiter complaining of Cupid that he could not be quiet for him; and the Moon lamenting that she was so impotently besotted on Endymion, even Venus her self confessing as much, how rudely and in what sort her own son Cupid had used her being his [8589]mother, Now drawing her to mount Ida, for the love of that Trojan Anchises, now to Libanus for that Assyrian youths sake. And although she threatned to break his bow and arrowes, to clip his wings, [8590]and whipped him besides on the bare buttocks with her pantophle, yet all would not serve, he was too headstrong and unruly.	Lucian presents Jupiter complaining that Cupid would give him no peace, and the Moon lamenting how helplessly infatuated she was with Endymion. Even Venus herself confesses how badly her own son Cupid treated her, his mother: "Now dragging her to Mount Ida for love of the Trojan Anchises, now to Lebanon for the sake of that Assyrian youth. Although she threatened to break his bow and arrows and clip his wings, and even whipped his bare buttocks with her slipper, none of it worked: he was too headstrong and unruly."[8591]
That monster conquering Hercules was tamed by him:	That conqueror of monsters, Hercules, was tamed by him:[8592]
Quem non mille feræ, quem non Sthenelejus hostis, Nec potuit Juno vincere, vicit amor.	The man whom a thousand beasts, the son of Sthenelus, And Juno could not conquer, Love conquered.
Whom neither beasts nor enemies could tame, Nor Juno's might subdue, Love quell'd the same.	The man whom neither beasts nor enemies could tame, Nor Juno's might subdue, was overcome by Love.

[8588] Burton. Printed page 435, c: "Dial deorum Tom 3." Dialogues of the Gods, volume 3, as cited.

[8589] Burton. Printed page 435, asterisk: "Quippe matrem ipsius quibus modis me afficit, nunc in Idam adigens Anchisæ causâ &c." "Indeed, in what ways he torments me, his own mother, now driving me to Ida for Anchises's sake," and so on.

[8590] Burton. Printed page 435, dagger: "Jampridem & plagas ipsi in nates incussi sandalio." "Already long ago I struck his buttocks with my sandal too."

[8591] Editor. Compare Lucian's Dialogues of the Gods, especially Aphrodite and Selene, numbered 19 (11) in the consulted text. The Moon is Selene; Endymion is her beloved. The Assyrian youth is Adonis. Pantophle means slipper. Burton's Latin marginal quotations and English paraphrase are recorded separately.

[8592] Editor. Ovid, Heroides 9.25–26. The Stheneleian enemy is Eurystheus, son of Sthenelus, who imposed Hercules's labours. Burton prints Nec and vicit where the consulted text has non and vincit. His separate English couplet generalizes the named enemy, and is retained after the new translation of the Latin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Your bravest souldiers and most generous spirits are enervated with it, [8593]ubi mulieribus blanditiis permittunt se, & inquinantur amplexibus. Apollo that took upon him to cure all diseases, [8594]could not help himself of this; and therefore [8595]Socrates calls Love a tyrant, and brings him triumphing in a Chariot, whom Petrarch imitates in his triumph of Love, and Fracastorius in an elegant Poem expresseth at large, Cupid riding, Mars and Apollo following his Chariot, Psyche weeping, &c.	Your bravest soldiers and noblest spirits are weakened by it, “when they surrender to women’s blandishments and are defiled by their embraces.” Apollo, who undertook to cure every disease, could not cure himself of this one. Socrates therefore calls Love a tyrant and depicts him riding in triumph in a chariot. Petrarch imitates him in his Triumph of Love, and Fracastoro develops the picture in an elegant poem: Cupid rides, Mars and Apollo follow his chariot, Psyche weeps, and so forth.[8596]
In vegetall creatures what soveraignty Love hath, by many pregnant proofs and familiar examples may be proved, especially of palme trees, which are both he and she, and express not a sympathy but a love-passion, and by many observations have been confirmed.	Love’s sovereignty over plants can be demonstrated by many compelling proofs and familiar examples, especially palm trees. These are male and female, and display not merely a sympathetic affinity but a passion of love, confirmed by many observations.[8597]
[8598]Vivunt in venerem frondes, omnisque vicissim Felix arbor amat, nutant & mutua palmæ Fœdera, populeo suspirat populus ictu, Et Platano Platanus, alnoque assibilat alnus.	The leaves live for love; every fruitful tree Loves in return. Palms nod their mutual pledges; Poplar sighs at poplar’s touch, Plane whispers to plane, and alder to alder.[8599]

[8593] Burton. Printed page 435, dagger: “Altopilius, fol. 79.” The name and locator are retained as printed.

[8594] Burton. Printed page 435, d: “Nullis amor est medicabilis herbis.” “Love can be cured by no herbs.” Compare Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.523.

[8595] Burton. Printed page 435, e: “Plutarch. in Amatorio. Dictator quo creato cessant reliqui magistratus.” Plutarch, On Love: “A dictator upon whose appointment the other magistrates cease to hold office.”

[8596] Editor. Enervated means weakened or deprived of vigour. The Latin’s disparaging account of women’s embraces belongs to Burton’s quotation. The herbal maxim is Apollo’s admission in Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.523. Petrarch’s Triumph of Love and Fracastoro’s poem are invoked as triumphal processions in which the god conquers other gods. Their exact passages and the Altopilius reference remain for collation.

[8597] Editor. Pregnant proofs means compelling or abundant evidence. Sympathy here is an affinity between natural things, while love-passion gives the relation a human emotional character. The passage presents early modern natural philosophy through reported observations and inherited stories.

[8598] Burton. Printed page 435, dagger: “Claudian. descript. vener. aulæ.” Claudian, description of Venus’s court; compare the wedding poem for Honorius and Maria, 65–68.

[8599] Editor. Claudian, Epithalamium on the marriage of Honorius and Maria 65–68, in the description of Venus’s dwelling. Burton’s text differs from the consulted Latin, including nutant & mutua and Et Platano Platanus. The modern version follows his printed wording and keeps the four-line form.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 436 Constantine de Agric. lib. 10. cap. 4. gives an instance out of Florentius his Georgicks, of a Palm tree that loved most fervently, [8600]and would not be comforted untill such time her Love applied her self unto her; you might see the two trees bend, and of their own accords stretch out their boughs to embrace and kiss each other: They will give manifest signs of mutuall love.	Constantine, in On Agriculture, book 10, chapter 4, gives an example from Florentius's Georgics of a palm tree that loved most ardently, "and would not be comforted until her beloved drew close to her. You could see the two trees bend and voluntarily stretch out their branches to embrace and kiss one another. They give unmistakable signs of mutual love."[8601]
Ammianus Marcellinus lib. 24. reports that they marry one another, and fall in love if they grow in sight, and when the winde brings the smell to them, they are marvellously affected. Philostratus in Imaginibus, observes as much, and Galen lib. 6. de locis affectis cap. 5. they will be sick for love, ready to dye and pine away, which the husbandmen perceiving, saith [8602]Constantine, stroke many Palms that grow together, and so stroking again the Palm that is enamoured, they carry kisses from the one to the other:	Ammianus Marcellinus, book 24, reports that they marry one another and fall in love if they grow within sight; when the wind carries their scent to one another, they are wonderfully moved. Philostratus, in his Images, observes the same, as does Galen in On the Affected Parts, book 6, chapter 5. They fall sick for love, ready to die and waste away. Farmers, noticing this, says Constantine, "stroke several palms growing together, and then stroke the lovesick palm in turn, carrying kisses from one to the other."[8603]

[8600] Burton. Printed page 436, f: "Neque prius in iis desiderium cessat dum dejectus consoletur; videre enim est ipsam arborem incurvatam, ultro ramis ab utrisque, vicissim ad osculum exporrectis. Manifesta dant mutui desiderii signa." "Their longing does not cease until the dejected lover finds comfort; one can see the tree itself bending, the branches on both sides freely reaching out in turn for a kiss. They give clear signs of mutual desire."

[8601] Editor. Geoponica 10.4, associated with Constantine VII, cites Florentinus for a female palm's longing for a male. Owen's English translation describes relief through contact and transfer of the male's flower. Burton gives both palms feminine pronouns; his Latin margin prints dejectus, dejected. These forms remain. The Greek and Latin intermediary have not been collated.

[8602] Burton. Printed page 436, g: "Multas palmas contingens quæ simul crescunt, rursusque ad amantem regrediens, eamque manus attingens, quasi osculum mutuo ministrare videtur, & expediti concubitus gratiam facit." "Touching many palms that grow together, then returning to the one in love and touching it with his hands, he seems to convey a kiss between them, and does them the favour of facilitating union."

[8603] Editor. Compare Ammianus Marcellinus 24.3.12–13, which reports male and female palms, fertilization and apparent mutual desire. Husbandmen means cultivators or farmers. Burton combines this with other authorities and a description of transferring contact between palms. The Galen and Philostratus locators remain to be checked against their full texts.

Original text 1651	Modern English
or tying the leaves and branches of the one to the stem of the other, will make them both flourish and prosper a great deal better: [8604]which are enamoured, they can perceive by the bending of boughs, and inclination of their bodies.	Or they tie the leaves and branches of one to the trunk of the other, making both flourish and prosper much better. “They can tell which are in love by the bending of their branches and the leaning of their trunks.”
If any man think this which I say to be a tale, let him read that story of two palm trees in Italy, the male growing at Brundusium, the female at Otranto (related by Jovianus Pontanus in an excellent Poem, sometimes Tutor to Alphonsus junior, King of Naples, his Secretary of State, and a great Philosopher) which were barren, and so continued a long time, till they came to see one another growing up higher, though many Stadiums asunder.	If anyone thinks what I say is a fable, let him read the story of two palm trees in Italy, the male growing at Brindisi and the female at Otranto. Giovanni Pontano relates it in an excellent poem; he was once tutor to the younger Alfonso, king of Naples, his secretary of state, and a great philosopher. The trees “were barren, and remained so for a long time,” until, growing taller, they came within sight of one another, although many stadia apart.[8605]
Pierius in his Hieroglyphicks, and Melchior Guilandinus Memb. 3. tract. de papyro, cites this story of Pontanus for a truth. See more in Salmuth Comment. in Pancirol. de Nova repert. Tit. 1. de novo orbe, Mizaldus Arcanorum lib. 2. and Sands voyages lib. 2. fol. 103. &c.	Pierio Valeriano, in his Hieroglyphics, and Melchior Guilandinus, in the third section of his treatise On Papyrus, cite Pontano’s story as true. See further Salmuth’s commentary on Panciroli’s New Discoveries, title 1, “On the New World”; Mizaldus’s Secrets, book 2; and Sandys’s Travels, book 2, page 103, and so forth.[8606]

[8604] Burton. Printed page 436, h: “Quam vero ipsa desideret affectu ramorum significat, & ad illam respicit; amantur, &c.” “Which one she desires she indicates by the disposition of her branches, and looks towards her; they are loved,” and so on. The compressed wording is retained.

[8605] Editor. Brundusium is Brindisi; the male and female trees are said to stand far apart at Brindisi and Otranto. Stadia is the plural of an ancient unit of distance. Burton’s attribution of the story to Pontano is retained without endorsing its botanical claim. A printed superscript i before which were barren has no separate recoverable marginal text on this scan; the literal marker is retained in the original column.

[8606] Editor. This is a chain of literary authorities rather than an independent verification of the story. Pierius is Pierio Valeriano; Sands is George Sandys. The abbreviated titles and locators are reproduced, with recognizable titles expanded in the modern text; edition-specific page references remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If such fury be in vegetals, what shall we think of sensible creatures, how much more violent and apparent shall it be in them.	If there is such frenzy in plants, what are we to think of sentient creatures? How much more violent and evident must it be in them!
[8607]Omne adeo genus in terris hominumque, ferarum, Et genus æquoreum, pecudes, pictæque volucres In furias ignemque ruunt; amor omnibus idem.	Every race on earth, of humans and wild beasts, The creatures of the sea, the herds and brightly coloured birds, Rush into frenzy and fire: love is the same for all.[8608]
All kinde of creatures in the earth, And fishes of the Sea, And painted birds do rage alike; This love bears equal sway.	All kinds of creatures on the earth, And fishes in the sea, And brightly coloured birds rage alike: This love rules all equally.
[8609]Hic Deus & terras & maria alta domat.	This god subdues both the lands and the deep seas.[8610]
Common experience and our sense will inform us, how violently brute beasts are carried away with this passion, horses above the rest,	Common experience and our senses show us how violently animals are carried away by this passion, horses above all—
—— furor est insignis equarum.	The frenzy of mares is extraordinary.[8611]

[8607] Burton. Printed page 436, k: “Virg. 3. Georg.” Virgil, Georgics 3.242–244.

[8608] Editor. Virgil, Georgics 3.242–244. Burton prints ferarum without the second -que of the consulted text. The three Latin lines are followed by Burton’s separate four-line English rendering; both remain in the edition. Painted means brightly coloured.

[8609] Burton. Printed page 436, l: “Propertius.” The attribution accompanies Hic Deus & terras & maria alta domat.

[8610] Editor. Propertius, Elegies 2.26.52. In its original context the line immediately follows Boreas and his abduction of Orithyia. Burton applies its assertion of dominion over land and sea to Love.

[8611] Editor. Virgil, Georgics 3.266, on the sexual frenzy of mares. The fragment’s equarum is specifically female horses, though Burton’s prose says horses generally. Only the quoted fragment is supplied.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8612]Cupid in Lucian bids Venus his mother be of good cheer, for he was now familiar with Lions, and oftentimes did get on their backs, hold them by the mane, and ride them about like horses, and they would fawn upon him with their tails.	In Lucian, Cupid tells his mother Venus to be cheerful: he has now become familiar with lions, often climbs on their backs, holds them by the mane and rides them about like horses, while they fawn on him with their tails.[8613]
Source page 436–437 Bulls, Bears and Boars are so furious in this kinde they kill one another: but especially Cocks, [8614]Lions, and Harts, which are so fierce that you may hear them fight half a mile off, saith [8615]Turbervile, and many times kill each other, or compell them to abandon the rut, that they may remain masters in their places; and when one hath driven his corrivall away, he raiseth his nose up into the ayr, and looks aloft, as though he gave thanks to nature, which affords him such great delight.	Bulls, bears and boars are so furious in this passion that they kill one another; especially cocks, lions and stags. The stags are so fierce that you can hear them fight half a mile away, says Turbervile. Often they kill each other or force their rivals to abandon the rut, so that they may remain masters in their place. “When one has driven his rival away, he raises his nose into the air and looks upwards as though thanking nature,” which affords him such great delight.[8616]
Source page 437 How birds are affected in this kind, appears out of Aristotle, he will have them sing ob futuram venerem, for joy or in hope of their venery which is to come.	How birds are affected in this way appears in Aristotle: he maintains that they sing “in anticipation of mating,” from joy or hope of the sexual pleasure to come.[8617]

[8612] Burton. Printed page 436, m: “Dial. deorum. Confide mater, leonibus ipsis familiaris jam factus sum, & sæpe conscendi eorum terga & apprehendi jubas: equorum more insidens eos agito, & illi mihi caudis adblandiuntur.” Dialogues of the Gods: “Take heart, mother: I have become familiar even with lions; I have often climbed on their backs and seized their manes. Sitting on them as on horses, I drive them, and they fawn on me with their tails.”

[8613] Editor. Compare Lucian, Dialogues of the Gods, Aphrodite and Eros, numbered 20 (12) in the consulted text. Cupid boasts that he can ride lions. The consulted translation also describes putting a hand into their mouths; Burton’s wording about their tails is retained in both body and margin.

[8614] Burton. Printed page 436, n: “Leones præ amore furunt, Plin l. 8. c. 16. Arist. l. 6. hist. animal.” “Lions rage with love.” Pliny, book 8, chapter 16; Aristotle, History of Animals, book 6, as cited.

[8615] Burton. Printed page 436, asterisk: “Cap. 17. of his book of hunting.” Turbervile, chapter 17, as cited.

[8616] Editor. Harts are adult male deer; rut is their mating season; corrivall means rival. The hunting-book reference is transmitted under Turbervile’s name. The final gesture is interpreted as gratitude to nature by the quoted writer, not established as the animal’s conscious intention.

[8617] Editor. Venery here means sexual activity or mating. Burton attributes the explanation of birdsong to Aristotle without a precise passage; the attribution is retained pending collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8618]Aeriæ primum volucres te Diva, tuumque Significant initum, perculsæ corda tua vi.	First the birds of the air proclaim you, goddess, And your arrival, their hearts struck by your power.[8619]
Fishes pine away for love and wax lean, if [8620]Gomesius authority may be taken, and are rampant too, some of them: Peter Gellius lib. 10. de hist. animal. tells wonders of a Triton in Epirus: There was a well not far from the shore, where the country wenches fetched water, they, [8621]Tritons, stupri causâ would set upon them and carry them to the Sea, and there drown them, if they would not yeeld; so love tyrannizeth in dumb creatures.	"Fish waste away for love and grow thin," if we may accept Gomesius's authority; some of them are sexually ravenous too. Pierre Gilles, in his History of Animals, book 10, tells wonders of a Triton in Epirus. There was a well near the shore where country girls fetched water. These Tritons would attack them "for the purpose of sexual violation," carry them into the sea and drown them if they would not submit. So love tyrannizes over creatures without speech.[8622]
Yet this is naturall for one beast to dote upon another of the same kinde; but what strange fury is that, when a Beast shall dote upon a man? Saxo Grammaticus lib. 10. Dan. hist. hath a story of a Bear that loved a woman, kept her in his den a long time and begot a son of her, out of whose loynes proceeded many Northern Kings: this is the originall belike of that common tale of Valentine and Orson:	Yet it is natural for one animal to dote on another of its own kind. What strange madness is it when an animal dotes on a human being? Saxo Grammaticus, in his Danish History, book 10, tells of a bear that loved a woman, kept her in his den for a long time and fathered a son by her, from whom many northern kings descended. This, perhaps, is the origin of the familiar tale of Valentine and Orson.[8623]

[8618] Burton. Printed page 437, dagger: "Lucretius." On the Nature of Things 1.12–13.

[8619] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 1.12–13, from the opening invocation to Venus. Initum means arrival or advent here; the lines describe the coming of the goddess and spring. Burton's accompanying account applies the poem to animal desire.

[8620] Burton. Printed page 437, o: "De sale lib. 1. c. 21. Pisces ob amorem marcescunt, pallescunt. &c." On Salt, book 1, chapter 21: "Fish waste away and grow pale because of love," and so on.

[8621] Burton. Printed page 437, dagger: "Hauriendæ aquæ causa venientes ex insidiis a Tritone comprehensæ &c." "Coming to draw water, they were seized from ambush by a Triton," and so on.

[8622] Editor. Gomesius is the author cited under the Latin title On Salt; Peter Gellius is Pierre Gilles. A Triton is a sea-being of classical mythology. Stupri causâ and the drowning threat describe sexual coercion, not courtship. Burton reports the story as an example of desire's tyranny; its specific textual transmission remains unresolved.

[8623] Editor. Saxo Grammaticus is the author of the Danish History. Burton himself qualifies the supposed origin of Valentine and Orson with belike, perhaps. The bear's offspring and royal genealogy are reported narrative, not an established biological claim. The exact Saxo passage and Burton's derivation require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ælian, Pliny, Peter Gellius are full of such relations. A Peacock in Lucadia loved a maid, and when she died, the Peacock pined. [8624]A Dolphin loved a boy called Hernias, and when he died, the fish came on land, and so perished.	Aelian, Pliny and Pierre Gilles are full of such accounts. A peacock in Leucadia loved a girl, and when she died, the peacock wasted away. "A dolphin loved a boy called Hernias; when he died, the fish came ashore and perished."[8625]
The like adds Gellius lib. 10. cap. 22. out of Apion, Ægypt. lib. 15. a Dolphin at Puteoli loved a child, would come often to him, let him get on his back, and carry him about, [8626]and when by sickness the child was taken away, the Dolphin died.	Aulus Gellius adds a similar story, book 10, chapter 22, from Apion's Egyptian History, book 15. A dolphin at Puteoli loved a child, often came to him, let him climb onto its back and carried him about; "when illness took the child away, the dolphin died."[8627]

[8624] Burton. Printed page 437, p: "Plin. l. 10 c. 5 quumque aborta tempestate periisset Hernias in sicco piscis expiravit." Pliny, book 10, chapter 5, as printed: "When Hernias had died in a storm that arose, the fish expired on dry land." The printed aborta and name are retained.

[8625] Editor. The name Hernias and the marginal Pliny locator are retained as printed. The stories illustrate attachment and bereavement by analogy with human love. Fish is Burton's broad historical term for the dolphin; the modern text preserves it inside his quotation.

[8626] Burton. Printed page 437, q: "Postquam puer morbo abiit, & ipse delphinus periit." "After the boy died of illness, the dolphin too perished."

[8627] Editor. The dolphin story occurs in Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights 6.8, which quotes book 5 of Apion's Egyptian History. Burton instead prints 10.22 and book 15; these locators are retained in the modern text. Gellius names Puteoli and Hyacinthus, but the child's name is not imported into Burton's account. Aulus Gellius is distinct from Pierre Gilles, named earlier.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8628]Every book is full (saith Busbequius, the Emperors Orator with the grand Senior, not long since ep. 3. legat. Turc.) and yeelds such instances, to believe which I was alwaies afraid least I should be thought to give credit to fables, untill I saw a Lynx which I had from Assyria, so affected towards one of my men, that it cannot be denied but that he was in love with him.	"Every book is full of such examples," says Busbecq, who was recently the emperor's ambassador to the Grand Seignior, in the third of his Turkish Letters. "I was always afraid to believe them, lest I be thought to put faith in fables, until I saw a lynx I had from Assyria so attached to one of my men that there could be no denying it was in love with him."[8629]
When my man was present, the beast would use many notable enticements, and pleasant motions, and when he was going, hold him back, and look after him when he was gone, very sad in his absence, but most jocond when he returned: and when my man went from me, the beast expressed his love with continuall sickness, and after he had pined away some few daies, died.	"When my man was present, the animal would make many striking attempts to entice him, with playful movements. When he was leaving, it would hold him back, and after he had gone, gaze after him. It was very sad in his absence, but delighted when he returned. When my man left my service, the animal expressed its love through continual sickness, and after wasting away for a few days, died."
Such another story he hath of a Crane of Majorca, that loved a Spaniard, that would walk any way with him, and in his absence seek about for him, make a noise that he might hear her, and knock at his door, [8630]and when he took his last farewell, famished her self. Such pretty pranks can love play with Birds, Fishes, Beasts:	He has another such story of a crane from Majorca that loved a Spaniard. She would walk anywhere with him, look for him in his absence, call out so that he might hear her and knock at his door. "When he said his last farewell, she starved herself." Such curious tricks can love play on birds, fish and beasts.[8631]

[8628] Burton. Printed page 437, r: "Pleni sunt libri quibus feræ in homines inflammatæ fuerunt, in quibus ego quidem semper assensum sustinui, veritus ne fabulosa crederem; Donec vidi lyncem quem habui ab Assyria, sic affectum ega unum de meis hominibus &c." "Books are full of cases in which wild beasts burned with love for humans; I always withheld assent, fearing to believe fables, until I saw a lynx I had from Assyria so attached to one of my men," and so on. Ega is printed for the sense towards, erga.

[8629] Editor. Busbequius is Ogier Ghiselin de Busbecq; Orator means ambassador; the Grand Seignior is the Ottoman sultan. Turkish Letter 3, in Forster and Daniel's translation, pp. 206–207, supplies the lynx and crane accounts. There the lynx's keeper travels with Busbecq, and no death of the crane is narrated. Burton's differing account remains; his Latin intermediary requires collation.

[8630] Burton. Printed page 437, s: "Desiderium suum testatus post inediam aliquot dierum interiit." "Showing its longing, it died after several days without food."

[8631] Editor. Jocond means joyful; went from me means left the speaker's service or company. Pretty pranks means striking or curious tricks here, rather than harmless amusement. The crane's death is attributed to grief in the story.

Original text 1651	Modern English
(8632*Cælestis ætheris, ponti, terræ claves habet Venus,* Solaque istorum omnium imperium obtinet.)	Venus holds the keys of heaven's air, the sea and earth; She alone has dominion over them all.[8633]
Source page 437–438 and if all be certain that is credibly reported, with the spirits of the air, and divels of hell themselves, who are as much inamored and dote (if I may use that word) as any other creatures whatsoever. For if those stories be true that are written of Incubus and Succubus, of Nymphes, lascivious Faunes, Satyrs, and those Heathen gods which were divels, those lascivious Telchines, of whom the Platonists tell so many fables; or those familiar meetings in our daies, and company of witches and divels, there is some probability for it.	And, if all that is credibly reported is true, love plays these tricks on the spirits of the air and the devils of hell themselves. They are as enamoured, and dote as much—if I may use that word—as any other creatures. For if the written accounts of incubi and succubi, nymphs, lustful fauns and satyrs, and those pagan gods who were devils, are true; or those of the lustful Telchines, about whom the Platonists tell so many tales; or those familiar meetings and intercourse between witches and devils in our own day: then there is some probability in it.[8634]
I know that Biarmannus, Wierus lib. 3. cap. 19. & 24. and some others stoutly deny it, that the divel hath any carnall copulation with women, that the Divel takes no pleasure in such facts, they be meer phantasies, all such relations of Incubi, Succubi, lyes and tales:	I know that Biarmannus, Weyer in book 3, chapters 19 and 24, and others firmly deny that the devil has any sexual intercourse with women. They maintain that the devil takes no pleasure in such acts, that they are mere fantasies, and that all such accounts of incubi and succubi are lies and fables.[8635]

[8632] Burton. Printed page 437, dagger: "Orpheus hymno ven." Orpheus, hymn to Venus, as cited.

[8633] Editor. The margin cites the Orphic hymn to Venus, the Roman name used for Aphrodite. The keys signify dominion over the three realms. This intervening verse links the animals just discussed with the spirits that follow.

[8634] Editor. Incubi and succubi are supposed sexual spirits in demonological accounts; fauns, satyrs and Telchines belong to classical mythic traditions. Burton interprets pagan deities through a Christian demonology. His repeated if preserves a conditional framing before the catalogue of competing authorities.

[8635] Editor. Wierus is Johann Weyer. Facts means acts or deeds. Burton reports a dispute about whether such intercourse is physically possible or the product of fantasy; the identification of Biarmannus and the precise cited passages remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 438 But Austin. lib. 15. de civit. Dei doth acknowledge it; Erastus de Lamiis, Jacobus Sprenger and his colleagues &c. [8636]Zanchius cap. 16. lib. 4. de oper. Dei. Dandinus in Arist. de Animâ lib. 2. Text. 29. com. 30. Bodin lib. 2. cap. 7. and Paracelsus, a great champion of this Tenent amongst the rest, which give sundry peculiar instances, by many testimonies, proofs and confessions evince it.	But Augustine, in The City of God, book 15, acknowledges it; so do Erastus in On Witches, Jacob Sprenger and his colleagues, Zanchi in On the Works of God, book 4, chapter 16, Dandini's commentary on Aristotle's On the Soul, book 2, text 29, comment 30, Bodin, book 2, chapter 7, and Paracelsus, a leading defender of this opinion. They offer particular instances and demonstrate it through many testimonies, proofs and confessions.[8637]
Hector Boethius in his Scottish history, hath three or four such examples, which Cardan confirms out of him lib. 16. cap. 43. of such as have had familiar company many years with them, and that in the habit of men and women.	Hector Boece, in his Scottish History, gives three or four such examples, repeated in confirmation by Cardano, book 16, chapter 43: people who had intimate company for many years with these beings, appearing in the form of men and women.[8638]
Philostratus in his fourth book de vita Apollonii, hath a memorable instance in this kinde, which I may not omit, of one Menippus Lycius a yong man 25. years of age, that going betwixt Cenchreas and Corinth, met such a phantasm in the habit of a fair gentlewoman, which taking him by the hand, carried him home to her house, in the suburbs of Corinth, and told him she was a Phœnician by birth,	Philostratus, in the fourth book of his Life of Apollonius, gives a memorable example of this kind that I must not omit. A young man of twenty-five, Menippus of Lycia, was travelling between Cenchreae and Corinth when he met such a phantom in the form of a beautiful gentlewoman. She took his hand and led him home to her house in the suburbs of Corinth, saying that she was Phoenician by birth.[8639]

[8636] Burton. Printed page 438, t: "Qui hæc in atræ bilis aut Imaginationis vim referre conati sunt, nihil faciunt." "Those who have tried to attribute these things to black bile or the power of imagination achieve nothing."

[8637] Editor. Augustine, City of God 15.23, discusses reported assaults by incubi, but also hesitates over the nature of spirits and rejects the fall of God's holy angels into such unions. Burton compresses this nuanced discussion into an acknowledgement. The other authors are cited as participants in the historical controversy. Evince means demonstrate or establish.

[8638] Editor. Hector Boethius is the Scottish historian Hector Boece; Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. Habit means outward form or appearance here. The transmitted accounts and their locators have not been independently established as events.

[8639] Editor. Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 4.25, tells the story of Menippus of Lycia and the apparition near Corinth. Cenchreae was a port associated with Corinth. Burton calls the woman a phantasm from the outset, anticipating the revelation. Gentlewoman denotes social presentation, not a verified identity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and if he would tarry with her, [8640]he should hear her sing and play, and drink such wine as never any drank, and no man should molest him; but she being fair and lovely would live and die with him, that was fair and lovely to behold.	If he would stay with her, "he would hear her sing and play, drink wine such as no one had ever drunk, and no man would trouble him. Beautiful and lovely as she was, she would live and die with him, who was himself so beautiful and lovely to behold."
The yong man a Philosopher, otherwise staid and discreet, able to moderate his passions, though not this of love, tarried with her a while to his great content, and at last married her, to whose wedding, amongst other guests, came Apollonius, who by some probable conjectures, found her out to be a Serpent, a Lamia, and that all her furniture was like Tantalus gold described by Homer, no substance, but meer illusions.	The young man was a philosopher, otherwise steady and judicious, able to control his passions —though not this passion of love. He stayed with her for a while in great contentment and eventually married her. Among the wedding guests came Apollonius, who, from certain plausible indications, discovered that she was a serpent, a lamia, and that all her furnishings were like Tantalus's gold as described by Homer: without substance, mere illusions.[8641]
When she saw her self descried, she wept, and desired Apollonius to be silent, but he would not be moved, and thereupon She, Plate, House, and all that was in it vanished in an instant: [8642]many thousands took notice of this fact, for it was done in the midst of Greece.	When she saw that she had been discovered, she wept and asked Apollonius to be silent. But he would not yield; whereupon she, her silverware, her house and everything in it vanished in an instant. "Many thousands knew of this event, for it happened in the midst of Greece."[8643]

[8640] Burton. Printed page 438, u: "Cantantem audies & vinum bibes, quale antea nunquam bibisti; te rivalis turbabit nullus; pulchra autem pulchro contentè vivam, & moriar." "You will hear me singing and drink wine such as you have never drunk before; no rival will disturb you; beautiful myself, I shall live and die content with you, beautiful as you are."

[8641] Editor. A lamia is a predatory supernatural female figure in the story. The consulted Philostratus compares the furnishings with Tantalus's gardens; Burton prints gold. His version is retained. Staid means steady; descried in the next sentence means discovered or exposed; plate is precious-metal tableware.

[8642] Burton. Printed page 438, x: "Multi factum hoc cognovêre, quod in media Græcia gestum sit." "Many knew of this event, because it happened in the midst of Greece." Burton's English adds thousands.

[8643] Editor. Philostratus's account exposes the woman as a devouring apparition and describes the disappearance of the displayed wealth and servants. Burton condenses and reshapes it. His body text says many thousands, while the Latin margin only says many; the difference is retained rather than treated as independent testimony to the event.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sabine in his Comment on the 10th of Ovids Metamorphosis, at the tale of Orpheus, telleth us of a Gentleman of Bavaria, that for many months together bewailed the loss of his dear wife; at length the Divel in her habit came and comforted him, and told him, because he was so importunate for her, that she would come and live with him again, on that condition he would be new married, never swear and blaspheme as he used formerly to do; for if he did, she should be gone:	Sabinus, in his commentary on book 10 of Ovid's Metamorphoses, at the story of Orpheus, tells of a gentleman of Bavaria who mourned the loss of his dear wife for many months. At last the devil came in her form and comforted him, saying that, because he was so insistent in longing for her, she would return and live with him again, provided he married her anew and never swore or blasphemed as he had formerly done. If he did, she would leave.[8644]
[8645]He vowed it, married, and lived with her, she brought him children, and governed his house, but was still pale and sad, and so continued, till one day falling out with him, he fell a swearing; she vanished thereupon, and was never after seen. [8646]This I have heard, saith Sabine, from persons of good credit, which told me that the Duke of Bavaria did tell it for a certainty to the Duke of Saxony.	"He made the vow, married her and lived with her. She bore him children and managed his household, but remained pale and sad. This continued until one day, during a quarrel, he began to swear. She immediately vanished and was never seen again." "I have heard this," says Sabinus, "from people of good repute, who told me that the Duke of Bavaria related it to the Duke of Saxony as a certain fact."[8647]

[8644] Editor. Sabine is Georgius Sabinus. The comparison with Orpheus concerns the recovery of a dead wife in Ovid, Metamorphoses 10. Habit means appearance or guise; importunate means persistently insistent. Burton's supernatural account is translated as a reported story; Sabinus's commentary has not yet been independently collated.

[8645] Burton. Printed page 438, y: "Rem curans domesticam, ut ante, peperit aliquot liberos, semper tamen tristis & pallida." "Managing the household as before, she bore several children, yet remained always sad and pale."

[8646] Burton. Printed page 438, z: "Hæc audivi à multis fide dignis qui asseverabant ducem Bavariæ eadem retulisse Duci Saxoniæ pro veris." "I heard these things from many trustworthy people, who asserted that the Duke of Bavaria had related them to the Duke of Saxony as true."

[8647] Editor. The chain of testimony is part of Burton's argument for belief, not verification of the event. The marginal Latin includes as before, absent from Burton's English paraphrase; both versions are preserved in their respective places.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 438–439 One more I will relate out of Florilegus, ad annum 1058. an honest Historian of our nation, because he telleth it so confidently, as a thing in those daies talked of all over Europe: A yong Gentleman of Rome, the same day that he was married, after dinner with the Bride and his friends went a walking into the fields, and towards evening to the Tennis-Court to recreate himself; whilst he played, he put his ring upon the finger of Venus statua, which was thereby made in brass, after he had sufficiently played, and now made an end of his sport, he came to fetch his ring, but Venus had bowed her finger in, and he could not get it off.	I will tell one more story from Florilegus, under the year 1058. He is a trustworthy historian of our own nation, and tells it so confidently, as something discussed throughout Europe in those days. A young gentleman of Rome, on his wedding day, went walking in the fields after dinner with his bride and friends, and towards evening went to the tennis court for recreation. While playing, he put his ring on the finger of a nearby bronze statue of Venus. When he had played enough and finished his game, he went to retrieve the ring, but Venus had bent her finger inwards, and he could not remove it.[8648]
Source page 439 Whereupon loath to make his company tarry at present, there left it, intending to fetch it the next day, or at some more convenient time, went thence to supper, and so to bed. In the night when he should come to perform those nuptiall rites, Venus steps between him and his wife, (unseen or felt of her) and told him that she was his wife, that he had betrothed himself unto her by that ring, which he put upon her finger: she troubled him for some following nights.	Unwilling to keep his companions waiting, he left it there, intending to retrieve it the next day or at a more convenient time. He went to supper and then to bed. That night, when he was about to consummate the marriage, Venus stepped between him and his wife—who neither saw nor felt her—and told him that she was his wife: by placing that ring on her finger, he had pledged himself to her. She troubled him for several nights afterwards.
He not knowing how to help himself, made his moan to one Palumbus, a learned Magitian in those daies, who gave him a letter, and bid him at such a time of the night, in such a cross way, at the Towns end, where old Saturn would pass by with his associates in procession, as commonly he did, deliver that script with his own hands to Saturn himself;	Not knowing how to escape his predicament, he appealed to a certain Palumbus, a learned magician of that time. Palumbus gave him a letter and instructed him to go at a specified hour of the night to a particular crossroads on the edge of town, where old Saturn would pass in procession with his companions, as he commonly did, and hand the letter to Saturn himself.

[8648] Editor. The Venus-and-ring story occurs under 1058 in Flowers of History, Yonge's translation, vol. 1, pp. 544–546. Its ball game follows a feast lasting several days; Burton specifies the wedding day and a tennis court. Brass here means copper alloy. The annal is located, but Burton's Latin edition and the claim of circulation throughout Europe remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
the young man of a bold spirit, accordingly did it; and when the old fiend had read it, he called Venus to him, who rode before him, and commanded her to deliver his ring, which forthwith she did, and so the gentleman was freed.	The young man was bold and did as instructed. When the old fiend had read the letter, he called Venus, who was riding ahead of him, and ordered her to return the ring. She immediately obeyed, and the gentleman was freed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many such stories I finde in severall [8649]Authors to confirm this which I have said; as that more notable amongst the rest, of Philinium and Machates in [8650]Phlegons Tract de rebus mirabilibus, and though many be against it, yet I for my part will subscribe to Lactantius lib. 14. cap. 15.	I find many such stories in various authors to confirm what I have said, among them the especially notable story of Philinium and Machates in Phlegon's treatise On Marvellous Things. Although many disagree, I for my part will assent to Lactantius, book 14, chapter 15:[8651]
[8652]God sent Angels to the tuition of men; but whilest they lived amongst us, that mischievous all-commander of the Earth, and hot in lust, enticed them by little and little to this vice, and defiled them with the company of women: And Anaxagoras de resurrect. [8653]Many of those spirituall bodies overcome by the love of Maids, and lust, failed, of whom those were born here we call Giants.	"God sent angels to protect human beings; but while they lived among us, that wicked ruler of the whole earth, burning with lust, gradually enticed them into this vice and defiled them through intercourse with women." And Anaxagoras, On the Resurrection: "Many of those spiritual beings, overcome by love of maidens and by lust, fell; from them were born those whom we here call giants."[8654]

[8649] Burton. Printed page 439, a: "Fabula Damarati & Aristonis in Herodoto lib. 6. Erato." The story of Demaratus and Ariston in Herodotus, book 6, Erato; compare Histories 6.69.

[8650] Burton. Printed page 439, †: "Interpret. Mersio." "With Mersius as interpreter." The name is faint in the scan; this appears to refer to the edition associated with Johannes Meursius. Exact reading and edition remain to be collated.

[8651] Editor. Philinium is Burton's form of Philinnion. In Phlegon's 1620 Opuscula, the title credits Meursius with revision and notes; the opening of On Marvellous Things credits Xylander as translator. This distinction qualifies the provisional Mersio in the margin; Burton's exact edition remains uncertain. The fallen-angels passage is Lactantius, Divine Institutes 2.15, not book 14; the printed locator is retained.

[8652] Burton. Printed page 439, b: "Deus Angelos misit ad tutelam cultumq; generis humani; sed illos cum hominibus commorantes, dominator ille terræ salacissimus paulatim ad vitia pellexit, & mulierum congressibus inquinavit." "God sent angels to guard and care for the human race; but while they lived among human beings, that most lustful ruler of the earth gradually enticed them into vice and defiled them through intercourse with women."

[8653] Burton. Printed page 439, c: "Quidam ex illo capti sunt amore virginum, & libidine victi defecerunt, ex quibus gigantes qui vocantur, nati sunt." "Some of that company were captivated by love of virgins and, overcome by lust, fell; from them were born those who are called giants." The printed ex illo is retained.

[8654] Editor. The second passage closely corresponds to Athenagoras, A Plea for the Christians 24, rather than Anaxagoras or a treatise on resurrection. The modern text preserves Burton's attribution, while this note identifies the primary parallel. Tuition means protection. Burton's own English paraphrases are modernized as they stand rather than replaced with another translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Justin Martyr, Clemens Alexandrinus, Sulpitius Severus, Eusebius, &c. to this sense make a twofold fall of Angels, one from the beginning of the world, another a little before the deluge, as Moses teacheth us, [8655]openly professing that these Genii can beget, and have carnall copulation with Women.	Justin Martyr, Clement of Alexandria, Sulpicius Severus, Eusebius and others accordingly describe two falls of angels: one at the beginning of the world, the other shortly before the Flood, as Moses teaches us. They openly declare that these spirits can beget children and have sexual intercourse with women.[8656]
At Japan in the East Indies, at this present (if we may believe the relation of travellers) there is an Idol called Teuchedy, to whom one of the fairest virgins of the country is monthly brought, and left in a private room, in the Fotoqui, or Church, where she sits alone to be defloured. At certain times [8657]Teuchedy (which is thought to be the divell) appears to her, and knows her carnally. Every month a fair Virgin is taken in. By what means she comes out the old man can tell.	In Japan in the East Indies, at the present time—if we may believe travellers' accounts—there is an idol called Teuchedy. Each month one of the most beautiful virgins of the country is brought to him and left in a private room in the Fotoqui, or temple, where she sits alone to be deflowered. At certain times Teuchedy, thought to be the devil, appears to her and has sexual intercourse with her. Every month a beautiful virgin is taken in. The old man can tell by what means she comes out.[8658]

[8655] Burton. Printed page 439, d: "Pererius in Gen. lib. 8. c. 6. ver. 1. Zanc. &c." Pererius on Genesis, book 8, chapter 6, verse 1; Zanchi and others.

[8656] Editor. Genesis 6.1–4 supplies the sons of God, daughters of men and giants behind this interpretation. Burton treats the sons of God as angels and combines this with an earlier fall of angels; these are interpretative claims, not an explicit two-fall account in Genesis. The full list of patristic authorities remains to be collated.

[8657] Burton. Printed page 439, e: "Purchas Hack posth. par. 1. lib. 4. cap. 1. S. 7." Purchas, Hakluytus Posthumus, part 1, book 4, chapter 1, section 7. The printed section sign resembles S.

[8658] Editor. The names Teuchedy and Fotoqui are retained from the traveller's report cited through Purchas; their identification remains unresolved. Calling the idol the devil expresses the report's Christian polemic. The old man is a suggestive but unexplained allusion; the translation preserves its ambiguity without supplying an invented participant or explanation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In that goodly temple of Jupiter Belus in Babylon, there was a fair Chappell, saith [8659]Herodotus, an eye witness of it, in which was splendide stratus lectus & apposita mensa aurea, a brave bed, a table of gold, &c. into which no creature came but one only woman, which their God made choice of, as the Chaldæan priests told him, and that their [8660]God lay with her himself, as at Thebes in Egypt was the like done of old.	In that magnificent temple of Jupiter Belus in Babylon there was a beautiful chapel, says Herodotus, who saw it himself. In it stood "a splendidly furnished bed and a golden table beside it"—a fine bed, a table of gold, and so forth. No one entered it except one woman, chosen by their god, as the Chaldaean priests told him; and their god himself lay with her, as was also done in ancient times at Thebes in Egypt.[8661]
Source page 439–440 So that you see this is no news, the Divels themselves, or their jugling Priests have plaid such pranks in all ages. Many Divines stifly contradict this; but I will conclude with [8662]Lipsius, that since examples, testimonies and confessions of those unhappy women are so manifest on the other side, and many, even in this our Town of Lovan, that it is likely to be so.	So you see, this is nothing new: the devils themselves, or their trickster priests, have played such pranks in every age. Many theologians firmly dispute it; but I will conclude with Lipsius that, since "the examples, testimony and confessions of those unfortunate women are so evident on the other side, and so numerous, even in our own town of Louvain," it is likely to be true.[8663]

[8659] Burton. Printed page 439, f: "In Clio." In Clio, the traditional title of Herodotus, Histories, book 1.

[8660] Burton. Printed page 439, g: "Deus ipse hoc cubili requiescens" "The god himself resting in this bed."

[8661] Editor. Herodotus, Histories 1.181–182, describes the Babylonian tower and bed. He explicitly says that he does not believe the Chaldaeans' claim that the god visits the woman. Burton's presentation omits that qualification and calls him an eyewitness; it must not be read as Herodotus verifying intercourse with a deity.

[8662] Burton. Printed page 439, h: "Physiologiæ Stoicorum l. 1. cap. 20. Si spiritus unde semen iis &c. at exempla turbant nos; mulierum quotidianæ confessiones de mistione omnes asserunt, & sunt in hac urbe Lovanio exempla." Lipsius, Physics of the Stoics, book 1, chapter 20: "If they are spirits, where do they obtain seed, and so forth? Yet examples trouble us: the daily confessions of women all attest intercourse, and there are examples in this city of Louvain."

[8663] Editor. Juggling here means deceptive, and Divines means theologians. Lovan or Louvain is Leuven. Burton appeals to stories, confessions and judicial proceedings as evidence; those records do not themselves establish supernatural events. His Lipsius quotations await collation against the cited edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 440 [8664]One thing I will add, that I suppose that in no age past, I know not by what destiny of this unhappy time, there have never appeared or shewed themselves so many lecherous divels, Satyrs, and Genii, as in this of ours, as appears by the daily narrations, and judiciall sentences upon record.	"I will add one thing: I believe that in no past age —I know not what fate governs this unhappy time—have so many lecherous devils, satyrs and spirits appeared or shown themselves as in our own, as the daily accounts and recorded judicial sentences reveal."[8665]
Read more of this question in Plutarch vit. Numæ, Austin de civ. Dei. lib. 15. Wierus lib. 3. de præstig. Dæm. Giraldus Cambrensis itinerar. Camb. lib. 1. Malleus malefic. quæst. 5. part. 1. Jacobus Reussus lib. 5. cap. 6. fol. 54. Godelman. lib. 2. cap. 4. Erastus, Valesius de sacra philo. cap. 40. John Nider Fornicar. lib. 5. cap. 9. Stroz. Cicogna. lib. 3. cap. 3. Delrio, Lipsius Bodine dæmonol. lib. 2. cap. 7. Pererius in Gen. lib. 8. in 6. cap. ver. 2. King James, &c.	Read more on this question in Plutarch's Life of Numa; Augustine's City of God, book 15; Weyer's On the Deceptions of Demons, book 3; Gerald of Wales's Journey through Wales, book 1; the Hammer of Witches, part 1, question 5; Jacobus Reussus, book 5, chapter 6, page 54; Godelmann, book 2, chapter 4; Erastus; Valesius's Sacred Philosophy, chapter 40; John Nider's Fornicar, book 5, chapter 9; Strozzi Cicogna, book 3, chapter 3; Delrio; Lipsius; Bodin's Demonology, book 2, chapter 7; Pererius on Genesis, book 8, chapter 6, verse 2; King James; and others.[8666]

[8664] Burton. Printed page 440, i: "Unum dixero, non opinari me illo retro ævo tantam copiam Satyrorum, & salacium istorum Geniorum se ostendisse, quantam nunc quotidianæ narrationes, & judiciales sententiæ proferunt." "I will say one thing: I do not think that in past ages so many satyrs and those lustful spirits showed themselves as daily accounts and judicial sentences now bring forward."

[8665] Editor. The claim that such appearances were more numerous in the writer's own age is part of the quoted argument. Daily reports and convictions are not an independently established measure of the frequency of the alleged events.

[8666] Editor. The bibliography closes Subsection 1. Wierus is Johann Weyer; Austin is Augustine. Nider's printed title Fornicar. apparently points to his Formicarius, but the source reading is retained. The listed authors, editions and locators have not all been verified; they should not be taken as unanimous support for Burton's conclusion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 2. How love tyrannizeth over men. Love, or Heroical melancholy his definition, part affected.	SUBSECTION 2 How love tyrannizes over human beings. Love, or heroical melancholy: its definition and the part affected.[8667]
YOu have heard how this tyrant Love rageth with brute beasts and spirits; now let us consider what passions it causeth amongst men.	You have heard how this tyrant Love rages among animals and spirits. Now let us consider the passions it causes among human beings.
[8668]Improbe amor quid non mortalia pectora cogis?	Cruel Love, to what will you not drive mortal hearts?[8669]
How it tickles the hearts of mortall men,	How it stirs the hearts of mortal men—
Horresco referens, ——	I shudder to tell it—[8670]
I am almost afraid to relate, amazed, [8671]and ashamed, it hath wrought such stupend and prodigious effects, such foul offences. Love indeed (I may not deny) first united Provinces, built Cities, and by a perpetuall generation makes and preserves mankind, propagates the Church; but if it rage it is no more love, but burning lust, a disease, Phrensie, Madness, Hell.	I am almost afraid to relate it, astonished and ashamed: it has produced such stupendous and monstrous effects, such foul offences. Love did indeed—I cannot deny it—first unite provinces, build cities, and, through continual reproduction, create and preserve humanity and increase the Church. But when it rages, it is no longer love: it is burning lust, disease, frenzy, madness, hell.[8672]

[8667] Editor. Heroical melancholy is the historical category of erotic or lovesick melancholy. Part affected asks which bodily or mental faculty is its seat. The heading announces topics developed later; this opening portion is chiefly a catalogue of love's alleged excesses.

[8668] Burton. Printed page 440, k: "Virg." Virgil; Aeneid 4.412.

[8669] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.412, in the account of Dido watching the Trojans prepare to leave. Burton carries the line's accusation against Love into his own discussion.

[8670] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 2.204: Aeneas shudders as he tells of the serpents approaching Laocoon. Burton leaves the quotation as a brief interruption before resuming his sentence.

[8671] Burton. Printed page 440, l: "For it is a shame to speak of those things which are done of them in secret, Eph. 5. 12."

[8672] Editor. Burton begins by crediting love with social order and reproduction, then distinguishes these benefits from desire that rages beyond restraint. His shift from love to burning lust structures the denunciation that follows.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8673]Est orcus ille, vis est immedicabilis, est rabies insana; 'tis no vertuous habit this, but a vehement perturbation of the mind, a monster of nature, wit, and art, as Alexis in [8674]Athenæus sets it out, viriliter audax, muliebriter timidum, furore præceps, labore infractum, mel felleum, blanda percussio, &c.	"It is hell, an incurable force, a mad frenzy." This is no virtuous disposition, but a violent disturbance of the mind, a monster of nature, intelligence and art, as Alexis describes it in Athenaeus: "bold as a man, timid as a woman, headlong in fury, unbroken by toil, honey mixed with gall, a caressing blow," and so forth.[8675]
It subverts kingdoms, overthrows cities, towns, families, mars, corrupts, and makes a massacre of men; thunder and lightning, wars, fires, plagues, have not done that mischief to mankind, as this burning lust, this brutish passion. Let Sodome and Gomorrah, Troy, (which Dares Phrygius, and Dictis Cretensis will make good) and I know not how many cities bear record, —— & fuit ante Helenam, &c. all succeeding ages will subscribe: Ione of Naples in Italy, Fredegunde and Brunhalt in France, all histories are full of these Basilisks.	It subverts kingdoms, overthrows cities, towns and families, ruins and corrupts people, and massacres them. Thunder and lightning, wars, fires and plagues have not harmed humanity as much as this burning lust, this brutish passion. Let Sodom and Gomorrah, Troy—as Dares the Phrygian and Dictys the Cretan will confirm—and I know not how many other cities bear witness: "and there was before Helen," and so forth. Every succeeding age will agree. Joanna of Naples in Italy, Fredegund and Brunhild in France: all histories are full of these basilisks.[8676]

[8673] Burton. Printed page 440, m: "Plutarch. amator. lib." Plutarch, the book On Love. The precise location and wording of Burton's Latin quotation remain uncollated.

[8674] Burton. Printed page 440, n: "Lib. 13." Athenaeus, book 13; the cited comedy of Alexis is Phaedrus.

[8675] Editor. Plutarch, Dialogue on Love 13, quotes the denunciation of Aphrodite as an example of abuse directed at gods, within a defence of their divinity. Burton applies it to raging lust. His Latin intermediary remains uncollated. Athenaeus, Deipnosophists 13, quotes Alexis's Phaedrus on Love's contraries. Unbroken by toil takes infractum in its negative sense, supported by the comparison with adamantine endurance; it can also mean broken. Burton's Latin compresses the passage.

[8676] Editor. The fragment echoes Horace, Satires 1.3.107, on wars fought for sex before Helen; Burton leaves the sentence incomplete. Dares and Dictys are the literary authorities he invokes for Troy. Ione is Joanna of Naples; Fredegund and Brunhild are the Frankish queens. Basilisks compares these women to legendary deadly creatures and belongs to Burton's hostile rhetoric.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Besides those daily monomachies, murders, effusion of blood, rapes, riot and immoderate expence, to satisfie their lusts, beggery, shame, loss, torture, punishment, disgrace, loathsome diseases that proceed from thence, worse then calentures and pestilent feavers, those often Gouts, Pox, Arthritis, palsies, cramps, Sciatica, convulsions, aches, combustions, &c. which torment the body, that ferall melancholy which crucifies the Soul in this life, and everlasting torments in the world to come.	Besides all this come daily duels, murders, bloodshed, rapes, debauchery and extravagant spending to satisfy lust; poverty, shame, loss, torture, punishment and disgrace; the loathsome diseases that follow, worse than raging or pestilential fevers; repeated attacks of gout, the pox, arthritis, palsy, cramps, sciatica, convulsions, pain and burning, which torment the body; that deadly melancholy which crucifies the soul in this life; and everlasting torments in the world to come.[8677]
Source page 441 Notwithstanding they know these and many such miseries, threats, tortures will surely come upon them, rewards, exhortations, è contra; yet either out of their own weakness, a depraved nature, or loves tyranny, which so furiously rageth, they suffer themselves to be led like an oxe to the slaughter; (Facilis descensus Averni) they go down headlong to their own perdition, they will commit folly with beasts, men leaving the naturall use of women, as [8678]Paul saith, burned in lust one towards another, and man with man wrought filthiness.	Although they know that these and many other miseries, threats and torments will surely fall upon them—and despite the rewards and exhortations offered on the other side—through their own weakness, a depraved nature or love's furious tyranny, they allow themselves to be led like an ox to the slaughter. "Easy is the descent to Avernus": they plunge headlong into their own destruction. They commit sexual offences with animals; men, "leaving the natural use of women," as Paul says, "burned with lust for one another, and man with man committed filthiness."[8679]

[8677] Editor. Monomachies are single combats or duels; calentures are violent fevers; pox here points to venereal disease. Ferall means deadly or destructive. This catalogue combines historical disease names, moral judgment and supposed consequences of lust; it is not a set of established medical causal relationships.

[8678] Burton. Printed page 441, †: "Rom. 1. 17." The words quoted are from Romans 1.27; Burton's printed 17 is retained.

[8679] Editor. The ox led to slaughter recalls Proverbs 7.22. The descent to Avernus adapts Virgil, Aeneid 6.126; the consulted Latin has Averno where Burton prints Averni. The biblical quotation is Romans 1.27, not the marginal 1.17. Its condemnatory wording is preserved as Burton's quotation, without treating it as the editor's judgment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Semiramis equo, Pasiphae tauro, Aristo Ephesius asinæ se commiscuit, Fulvius equæ, alii canibus, capris, &c. unde monstra nascuntur aliquando, Centauri, Sylvani, & ad terrorem hominum prodigiosa spectra: Nec cum brutis, sed ipsis hominibus rem habent, quod peccatum Sodomiæ vulgo dicitur; & frequens olim vitium apud Orientales illos fuit, Græcos nimirum, Italos, Afros, Asianos:	Semiramis coupled with a horse, Pasiphae with a bull, Aristo of Ephesus with a she-ass, Fulvius with a mare; others with dogs, goats and so on. From these unions monsters are sometimes born —centaurs, woodland spirits and prodigious apparitions to terrify human beings. Nor do they have intercourse only with animals, but with other human beings, in what is commonly called the sin of sodomy. This vice was once frequent among those peoples of the East—namely Greeks, Italians, Africans and Asians.[8680]
[8681]Hercules Hylam habuit, Polycletum, Dionem, Perithoonta, Abderum & Phryga; alii & Euristium ab Hercule amatum tradunt. Socrates [8682]pulchrorum Adolescentum causa frequens Gymnasium adibat, flagitiosoque spectaculo pascebat oculos, quod & Philebus & Phædon Rivales, Charmides & reliqui Platonis Dialogi, satis superque testatum faciunt: quod vero Alcibiades de eodem Socrate loquatur, lubens conticesco, sed & abhorreo; tantum incitamentum præbet libidini.	Hercules had Hylas, Polycletus, Dion, Perithoon, Abderus and the Phrygian; others also report that Hercules loved Eurystius. Socrates often visited the gymnasium for the sake of handsome young men and feasted his eyes on the disgraceful spectacle, as Philebus, Phaedo, Rival Lovers, Charmides and Plato's other dialogues amply testify. As for what Alcibiades says about that same Socrates, I gladly keep silent; indeed, I recoil from it, so greatly does it incite lust.[8683]

[8680] Editor. Here Burton shifts into an extended Latin catalogue. It mixes myth, alleged conduct and sweeping accusations against peoples and regions. The claims that such unions produce centaurs or woodland spirits are fabulous, not biological. Sodomy is Burton's historical moral category and does not map neatly onto a modern sexual orientation.

[8681] Burton. Printed page 441, k: "Lilius Giraldus. vita ejus." Lilio Gregorio Giraldi, his life of Hercules; Burton gives no fuller locator.

[8682] Burton. Printed page 441, l: "Pueros amare solis Philosophis relinquendum vult Lucianus dial. Amorum." "Lucian, in the dialogue Loves, would have the love of boys reserved for philosophers alone." This reports a position in the dialogue, not an independently established rule of ancient life.

[8683] Editor. The list of Hercules's loves is transmitted through Giraldi; the reading Euristium is retained and rendered Eurystius without identifying it with a different name. Burton's insinuation about Socrates is selective: in Plato, Symposium 219b–d, Alcibiades describes an unsuccessful attempt to seduce him, praising his self-command. The dialogues are literary representations, not proof of Burton's accusation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
At hunc perstrinxit Theodoretus lib. de curat. græc. affect. cap. ultimo. Quin & ipse Plato suum demiratur Agathonem, Xenophon Cliniam, Virgilius Alexin, Anacreon Bathyllum; Quod autem de Nerone, Claudio, cæterorumque portentosa libidine memoriæ proditum, mallem à Petronio, Suetonio, cæterisque petatis, quando omnem fidem excedat, quam à me expectetis; sed vetera querimur.	But Theodoret censures him in the final chapter of his Cure of Greek Maladies. Indeed, Plato himself admires his Agathon, Xenophon his Clinias, Virgil his Alexis, and Anacreon his Bathyllus. As for what is recorded about the monstrous lust of Nero, Claudius and the others, I would rather you sought it from Petronius, Suetonius and the rest than expected it from me, since it exceeds all belief. But we are complaining about ancient times.[8684]
[8685]Apud Asianos, Turcas, Italos, nunquam frequentius hoc nequam hodierno die vitium; Diana Romanorum Sodomia; officinæ horum alicubi apud Turcas,	Among Asians, Turks and Italians this wicked vice has never been more frequent than today. Sodomy is the Romans' Diana; in some places among the Turks there are establishments for these practices—[8686]
—— qui saxis semina mandant —— arenas arantes;	Those who entrust seed to rocks—ploughing the sands;[8687]

[8684] Editor. Theodoret's work is the Cure of Greek Maladies; the exact passage cited here remains to be collated. These alleged attachments bring together philosophical dialogues, poetry and hostile biographical traditions. They should not be treated as equally documented personal histories.

[8685] Burton. Printed page 441, m: "Busbequius." Ogier Ghiselin de Busbecq.

[8686] Editor. Diana is a figure for a cherished object of worship: Burton accuses the Romans of treating sodomy as their idol. His assertions about Asians, Turks and Italians are hostile generalizations, not verified descriptions of those populations.

[8687] Editor. Sowing on rocks and ploughing sand make non-reproductive intercourse figuratively barren labour. The exact source of these paired fragments remains unidentified; neither has been silently expanded into a complete verse.

Original text 1651	Modern English
& frequentes querelæ, etiam inter ipsos conjuges hac de re, quæ virorum concubitum illicitum calceo in oppositam partem verso magistratui indicant; nullum apud Italos familiare magis peccatum, qui & post [8688]Lucianum & [8689]Tatium, scriptis voluminibus defendunt; Johannes de la Casa Beventinus Episcopus, divinum opus vocat, suave scelus, adeoque jactat se non alia usum Venere. Nihil usitatius apud monachos, Cardinales, sacrificulos, etiam [8690]furor hic ad mortem, ad insaniam.	There are frequent complaints about it, even between married couples: wives report their husbands' illicit intercourse to the magistrate by turning a shoe the opposite way. Among Italians no sin is more familiar or more prevalent; following Lucian and Achilles Tatius, they defend it in written books. Giovanni della Casa, bishop of Benevento, calls it a divine work, a delightful crime, and even boasts that he has enjoyed no other sexual pleasure. Nothing is more usual among monks, cardinals and petty priests. This frenzy leads even to death and madness.[8691]
[8692]Angelus Politianus, ob pueri amorem, violentas sibi manus injecit. Et horrendum sanè dictu, quantum apud nostros patrum memoria, scelus detestandum hoc sævierit!	Angelo Poliziano laid violent hands upon himself for love of a boy. And it is truly dreadful to say how fiercely this detestable crime raged among our own people within our fathers' memory![8693]

[8688] Burton. Printed page 441, n: "Achilles Tatius lib. 2." Achilles Tatius, book 2. In the printing, this marker stands before Lucianum.

[8689] Burton. Printed page 441, o: "Lucianus Charidemo." Lucian, Charidemus. In the printing, this marker stands before Tatium.

[8690] Burton. Printed page 441, p: "Non est hæc mentula demens. Mart." "Is not this penis mad?" Martial. Compare the rhetorical question in Epigrams 3.76.3; Burton changes its word order and prints a full stop.

[8691] Editor. The printed n and o marginal references appear crossed: n names Achilles Tatius but is attached to Lucian, and o names Lucian but is attached to Tatius. Their source positions are retained. Beventinus is the printed form rendered of Benevento. The accusation against Giovanni della Casa and the general charges against Catholic clergy require independent source collation; Burton's polemical assertion is not evidence that they are true.

[8692] Burton. Printed page 441, q: "Jovius Musc." Paolo Giovio. The abbreviation is transcribed as printed; the precise work and passage have not been established here.

[8693] Editor. Burton attributes the allegation about Poliziano to Giovio. Laid violent hands upon himself is a claim of self-inflicted death, not an established cause of death here. Puer is rendered boy; the source gives no age. The adjoining appeal to our fathers' memory means the preceding generation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Quum enim Anno 1538. prudentissimus Rex Henricus Octavus cucullatorum cœnobia, & sacrificorum collegia, votariorum, per venerabiles legum Doctores Thomam Leum, Richardum Laytonum visitari fecerat, &c. tanto numero reperti sunt apud eos scortatores, cinædi, ganeones, pædicones, puerarii, pæderastæ, Sodomitæ, ([8694]Balei verbis utor) Ganimedes, &c. ut in unoquoque eorum novam crederis Gomorrham.	For when, in 1538, the most prudent King Henry VIII had the monasteries of the hooded orders and the colleges of priests and vowed religious inspected by the venerable doctors of law Thomas Lee and Richard Layton, so many whoremongers, catamites, debauchees, men who practise anal intercourse, pursuers of boys, pederasts, sodomites and Ganymedes were found among them—I use Bale's words—that you would have thought each establishment a new Gomorrah.[8695]
Sed vide si lubet eorundem Catalogum apud eundem Baleum; Puellæ (inquit) in lectis dormire non poterant ob fratres necromanticos. Hæc si apud votarios, monachos, sanctos (scilicet homousiones, quid in foro, quid in aula factum suspiceris; quid apud nobiles, quid inter fornices, quam non fœditatem, quam non spurcitiem?	If you wish, see their catalogue in that same Bale. "Girls," he says, "could not sleep in their beds because of the necromantic friars." If such things occurred among vowed religious, monks and saints—those consubstantial beings, forsooth—what would you suspect went on in the marketplace or at court, among nobles or in brothels? What foulness, what filth would be absent?[8696]

[8694] Burton. Printed page 441, r: "Præfat. lectori lib. de vitis pontif." "Preface to the reader, in the book on the lives of the pontiffs." Burton is citing John Bale.

[8695] Editor. Thomas Lee is the commissioner also known as Thomas Legh; Richard Layton was his fellow visitor. Burton's date 1538 is retained, although their visitation activity began earlier. Bale's catalogue piles up overlapping sexual insults and accusations rather than precise modern classifications; Ganymedes evokes the mythological youth taken by Jupiter. The passage is Protestant polemic and does not independently substantiate misconduct by each named group.

[8696] Editor. Necromantic means associated with summoning the dead or other forbidden magic; the accusation against friars is Bale's. Homousiones evokes the theological term consubstantial and is mocking language for the supposedly holy men. The source opens a parenthesis here without closing it; the modern sentence supplies paired dashes for readability.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 441–442 Sileo interim turpes illas, & ne memorandas quidem monachorum [8697]mastrupationes, masturbatores. [8698]Rodericus a Castro vocat, tum & eos qui se invicem ad Venerem excitandam flagris cædunt, Spintrias, Succubas, Ambubeias, & lasciviente lumbo Tribades illas mulierculas, quæ se invicem fricent, & præter Eunuchos etiam ad Venerem explendam, artificiosa illa veretra habent.	Meanwhile I pass over those shameful practices of the monks, unfit even to be mentioned: their masturbations—Rodrigo de Castro calls them "masturbators"—and those who whip one another to arouse sexual desire; male prostitutes, women who take the receptive role, flute girls, and those lustful little women, the tribades, who rub themselves against one another and, besides eunuchs, use artificial penises to satisfy their desire.[8699]
Source page 442 Immo quod magis mirere, fœmina fœminam Constantinopoli non ita pridem deperiit, ausa rem plane incredibilem, mutato cultu mentita virum de nuptiis sermonem iniit, & brevi nupta est: sed authorem ipsum consule, Busbequium.	Indeed, more astonishing still, not long ago in Constantinople a woman fell desperately in love with another woman. She dared something scarcely credible: changing her clothes and passing herself off as a man, she opened negotiations for marriage and was soon married. But consult the author himself, Busbecq.[8700]

[8697] Burton. Printed page 442, s: "Mercurialis cap. de Priapismo. Cælius l. 11. antiq. lect. cap. 14. Galenus 6. de locis aff." Mercurialis, chapter on priapism; Caelius Rhodiginus, Ancient Readings, book 11, chapter 14; Galen, On the Affected Parts, book 6.

[8698] Burton. Printed page 442, †: "De morb. mulier. lib. 1. c. 15." Rodrigo de Castro, On the Diseases of Women, book 1, chapter 15.

[8699] Editor. Mastrupationes is retained as printed. Spintrias denotes sexual performers or prostitutes; Succubas here is read as women taking a receptive sexual role, not automatically as demons. Ambubeias evokes the flute girls of classical sexual satire. Tribades is an old term for women who have sexual contact with women; Burton's disparaging vocabulary does not establish a modern clinical or identity category.

[8700] Editor. Burton reports this story through Busbecq without giving a precise locator. The modern text preserves the reported change of clothing and marriage, without assigning the subject a modern identity or treating the anecdote as independently established fact.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Omitto [8701]Salinarios illos Ægyptiacos, qui cum formosarum cadaveribus concumbunt, & eorum vesanam libidinem, qui etiam idola & imagines depereunt. Nota est fabula Pigmalionis apud [8702]Ovidium: Mundi & Paulinæ apud Ægesippum belli Jud. lib. 2. cap. 4.	I pass over those Egyptian embalmers who have intercourse with the bodies of beautiful women, and the insane lust of people who even fall in love with statues and images. The story of Pygmalion in Ovid is well known, as is that of Mundus and Paulina in Hegesippus's Jewish War, book 2, chapter 4.[8703]
Pontius C. Cæsaris legatus, referente Plinio, lib. 35. cap. 3. quem suspicor eum esse qui Christum crucifixit, picturis Atalantæ & Helenæ adeo libidine incensus, ut tollere eas vellet si natura tectorii permisisset, alius statuam bonæ Fortunæ deperiit, (Ælianus lib. 9. cap. 37.) alius Bonæ deæ, & ne qua pars probro vacet.	Pontius, a legate of Gaius Caesar—whom I suspect to be the man who crucified Christ—was so inflamed with lust for pictures of Atalanta and Helen, Pliny reports in book 35, chapter 3, that he wished to take them away, had the nature of the plaster permitted it. Another man fell in love with a statue of Good Fortune—Aelian, book 9, chapter 37—and another with the Good Goddess. No part is left free of disgrace.[8704]

[8701] Burton. Printed page 442, t: "Herodotus l. 2. Euterpe: uxores insignium virorum non statim vita functas tradunt condendas, ac ne eas quidem fœminas quæ formosæ sunt, sed quatriduo ante defunctas, nec cum iis salinarii concumbant, &c." Herodotus, book 2, Euterpe: "They do not hand over the wives of eminent men immediately after death for embalming, nor beautiful women either, but only when they have been dead four days, lest the embalmers have intercourse with them," and so forth. The translation reads printed nec in the intended sense of ne, "lest"; compare Histories 2.89.

[8702] Burton. Printed page 442, u: "Metam. 33." Ovid, Metamorphoses. The printed 33 is retained; the Pygmalion episode is in book 10.

[8703] Editor. Herodotus, Histories 2.89, gives a three- or four-day delay before embalming certain women; Burton's margin specifies four. Pygmalion is in Ovid, Metamorphoses 10.243–297, not the printed 33. Hegesippus, Jewish War 2.4, in the consulted English translation, tells how Mundus impersonates Anubis with the help of bribed priests to deceive Paulina. This is a reported human deception, not intercourse with a statue. The Latin edition remains uncollated.

[8704] Editor. The consulted text of Pliny, Natural History 35.17–18, attributes the attempted removal of the paintings at Lanuvium to Caligula, not to a legate called Pontius. Burton's suggestion of Pontius Pilate is therefore especially doubtful. It is retained as his explicit conjecture. The Aelian and Good Goddess anecdotes remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8705]Raptus ad stupra (quod ait ille) & ne [8706]os quidem a libidine exceptum. Heliogabalus, per omnia cava corporis libidinem recepit, Lamprid. vita ejus.	"Abductions for sexual violation," as that author says, "and not even the mouth is exempt from lust." Elagabalus received lust through every opening of his body, according to Lampridius's Life of him.[8707]
[8708]Hostius quidam specula fecit, & ita disposuit, ut quum virum ipse pateretur, aversus omnes admissarii motus in speculo videret, ac deinde falsa magnitudine ipsius membri tanquam vera gauderet, simul virum & fœminam passus, quod dictu fœdum & abominandum.	A certain Hostius had mirrors made and arranged so that, while being penetrated by a man, he could face away and see every movement of his stallion in the mirror, delighting in the falsely magnified size of the man's penis as though it were real. At the same time he submitted to a man and a woman—foul and abominable even to describe.[8709]

[8705] Burton. Printed page 442, x: "Seneca de ira, l. 11. c. 18." Seneca, On Anger; locator transcribed as printed. The verbal parallel is at 2.9.3.

[8706] Burton. Printed page 442, y: "Nullus est meatus ad quem non pateat aditus impudicitiæ. Clem. Alex. pædag. lib. 3. c. 3." "There is no passage to which access does not lie open to indecency." Clement of Alexandria, The Instructor, book 3, chapter 3.

[8707] Editor. The verbal parallel is Seneca, On Anger 2.9.3, which reads raptus ac stupra and libidini, rather than Burton's ad and a libidine. The translation follows Burton's printed wording; his marginal locator differs as well. Lampridius is the traditional attribution of the Life of Elagabalus in the Historia Augusta, a source whose allegations are not independently verified by their repetition here.

[8708] Burton. Printed page 442, †: "Seneca 1. nat. quæst." Seneca, Natural Questions, book 1; the story of Hostius Quadra is in chapter 16.

[8709] Editor. Seneca, Natural Questions 1.16, tells the story of Hostius Quadra's magnifying mirrors. Burton's Latin condenses it. Admissarius literally denotes a breeding stallion and is used contemptuously of the male sexual partner; the metaphor is preserved. The final condemnation is Burton's own narrative voice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ut verum planè sit, quod apud [8710]Plutarchum Gryllus Ulyssi objecit, Ad hunc usque diem apud nos neque mas marem, neque fœmina fœminam amavit, qualia multa apud vos memorabiles & præclari viri fecerunt: ut viles missos faciam, Hercules imberbem sectans socium, amicos deseruit, &c.	So what Gryllus charged against Ulysses in Plutarch may well be true: "Down to this day, among us no male has loved a male, nor female a female, as many memorable and celebrated men have done among you. To leave the common people aside, Hercules deserted his friends while pursuing a beardless companion," and so forth.[8711]
Vestræ libidines intra suos naturæ fines coerceri non possunt, quin instar fluvii exundantis atrocem fœditatem, tumultum, confusionemque naturæ gignant in re Venerea: nam & capras, porcos, equos inierunt viri & fœminæ, insano bestiarum amore exarserunt, unde Minotauri, Centauri, Sylvani, Sphinges, &c.	"Your lusts cannot be confined within nature's own bounds: like an overflowing river, they breed hideous foulness, disorder and confusion of nature in sexual matters. For men and women have coupled with goats, pigs and horses, burning with mad love of beasts; hence Minotaurs, Centaurs, woodland spirits, Sphinxes and the rest."[8712]
Sed ne confutando doceam, aut ea foras efferam, quæ non omnes scire convenit (hæc enim doctis solummodo quod causa non absimili [8713]Rodericus, scripta velim) ne levissimis ingeniis & depravatis mentibus fœdissimi sceleris notitiam, &c. nolo quem diutius hisce sordibus inquinare.	But lest by refuting these things I teach them, or publish matters that it is not fitting for everyone to know—for I intend these words only for the learned, as Rodrigo does for a similar reason—and lest I give frivolous minds and depraved spirits knowledge of the foulest crime, and so forth, I do not wish to soil anyone further with this filth.[8714]

[8710] Burton. Printed page 442, z: "Tom. P. Gryllo." Plutarch, Gryllus. The abbreviated opening is retained; compare chapter 7, 990D–991A.

[8711] Editor. Plutarch, Gryllus 7, 990D–F. Gryllus, a companion of Odysseus transformed into a pig, argues that animals are superior to human beings. The assertion about animals is part of this literary debate, not a biological observation established by the quotation.

[8712] Editor. The continuation corresponds to Gryllus 7, 990F–991A. Burton compresses the argument and lists mythical hybrids. Their alleged origins illustrate the polemic of the dialogue; the translation does not convert them into natural history.

[8713] Burton. Printed page 442, †: "De morbis mulierum l. 1. c. 15." Rodrigo de Castro, On the Diseases of Women, book 1, chapter 15.

[8714] Editor. Burton says that he limits this material to learned readers, using Latin as a barrier. The modern column translates the whole passage. The elliptical clause about knowledge of the foulest crime is completed grammatically in English without adding a new example. This closes the catalogue immediately before his return to love between men and women.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I come at last to that Heroicall Love, which is proper to men and women, is a frequent cause of melancholy, and deserves much rather to be called burning lust, then by such an honourable title.	I come at last to that heroic love which belongs specifically to men and women, is a frequent cause of melancholy, and deserves to be called burning lust far more than to bear so honourable a title.[8715]
There is an honest love I confess, which is naturall, laqueus occultus captivans corda hominum, ut à mulieribus non possint separari, a secret snare to captivate the hearts of men, as [8716]Christopher Fonseca proves, a strong allurement, of a most attractive, occult, adamantine property, and powerfull vertue, and no man living can avoid it.	There is, I admit, an honourable love which is natural: “a hidden snare that captures men’s hearts, so that they cannot be separated from women”—a secret snare to capture men’s hearts, as Cristóbal de Fonseca demonstrates; a strong attraction with a most compelling, hidden, magnetic quality and powerful force, which no living man can escape.[8717]
[8718]Et qui vim non sentit amoris, aut lapis est, aut bellua. He is not a man but a block, a very stone, aut [8719]Numen, aut Nebuchadnezzar, he hath a gourd for his head, a pepon for his heart, that hath not felt the power of it, and a rare creature to be found, one in an age,	“And he who does not feel the force of love is either a stone or a beast.” He who has not felt its power is no man but a block, a very stone, “either a god or a Nebuchadnezzar”; he has a gourd for a head and a melon for a heart. A rare creature indeed, one in an age,[8720]

[8715] Editor. Heroic or heroical love names a historical category of erotic melancholy, not an assertion that the passion is courageous or admirable. Burton contrasts it here with honourable married affection; his technical definitions follow near the end of the block.

[8716] Burton. Printed page 442, *: “Amphitheat. amor. cap. 4. interpret. Curtio.” The Amphitheatre of Love, chapter 4, in Curtius’s translation.

[8717] Editor. Honest means morally honourable. Occult means hidden in its workings; vertue means effective power. Adamantine is used in the language of attraction, suggesting the lodestone or magnet. The Latin includes the inability to separate from women; Burton’s following English paraphrase shortens it. Both are retained.

[8718] Burton. Printed page 442, a: “Æneas Sylvius Juvenal.” Aeneas Sylvius; Juvenal. The short marginal reference serves the adjoining discussion; its scope is not explicit.

[8719] Burton. Printed page 442, †: “Tertul. prover. lib. 4. adversus Marc. cap. 40.” Tertullian, Against Marcion, book 4, chapter 40; the abbreviation prover. is retained without expansion.

[8720] Editor. Block means an unfeeling block of wood; pepon is a melon. The alternatives god and Nebuchadnezzar place the unresponsive man outside ordinary humanity. Tertullian, Against Marcion 4.40, taunts Marcion with having a melon in place of a heart; Burton borrows the insult in a different context. The dagger’s printed position is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Qui nunquam visæ flagraverit amore puellæ:	Who has never burned with love for a girl he has seen.[8721]
Source page 442–443 for semel insanivimus omnes, dote we either yong or old, as [8722]he said, and none are excepted but Minerva and the Muses: so Cupid in [8723]Lucian complains to his mother Venus, that amongst all the rest, his arrows could not pierce them.	For "we have all been mad once": we become infatuated either young or old, as the poet said; none are exempt except Minerva and the Muses. So Cupid complains to his mother Venus in Lucian that, alone among all the rest, they could not be pierced by his arrows.[8724]
Source page 443 But this nuptiall love, is a common passion, an honest, for men to love in the way of marriage; ut materia appetit formam, sic mulier virum. You know marriage is honorable, a blessed calling, appointed by God himself in Paradise; it breeds true peace, tranquillity, content and happiness, qua nulla est aut fuit unquam sanctior conjunctio, as Daphnæus in [8725]Plutarch could well prove, & quæ generi humano immortalitatem parat, when they live without jarring, scolding, lovingly as they should do.	But this married love is a common and honourable passion: people loving with marriage in view. "As matter desires form, so woman desires man." You know that marriage is honourable, a blessed calling instituted by God himself in Paradise. It produces true peace, tranquillity, contentment and happiness: "No union is, or ever was, more sacred," as Daphnaeus in Plutarch could readily prove, "and it provides immortality for the human race"—when the couple live without quarrelling or scolding, lovingly, as they should.[8726]

[8721] Editor. The modern line follows the sense Burton's surrounding argument requires: the exceptionally rare man who has never fallen in love. Juvenal, Satire 4.114, describes the blind Catullus burning for a girl he had never seen: nunquam qualifies visæ. Burton changes flagrabat to flagraverit and uses the line in a setting that shifts the negative towards never falling in love. His adapted sense is preserved, with the original ambiguity recorded here.

[8722] Burton. Printed page 442, b: "Chaucer."

[8723] Burton. Printed page 442, c: "Tom. 1. dial. deorum Lucianus. Amore non ardent Musæ." Lucian, Dialogues of the Gods, volume 1. "The Muses do not burn with love."

[8724] Editor. Dote here means become infatuated. The Latin saying means that everyone has been mad at least once; Burton's Chaucer reference is not supplied with a location. In Lucian, Dialogues of the Gods 23 (19 in another numbering), Eros explains his fear of Athena and his reverence for the Muses. Artemis is also discussed; Burton's only exceptions compress the dialogue.

[8725] Burton. Printed page 443, *: "In amator. dialog." In the Dialogue on Love.

[8726] Editor. The matter-and-form comparison uses Aristotelian language of potentiality seeking fulfilment. In Plutarch, Dialogue on Love 4–5, Daphnaeus defends the sanctity of marriage and its renewal of the human race through births. Burton joins remarks from that debate to his praise of peaceful married life. Immortality here means generational continuity, not personal bodily survival. The Latin intermediary remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8727]Felices ter & amplius Quos irrupta tenet copula, nec ullis Divulsus querimoniis Suprema citius solvit amor die.	Three times happy, and more, Those held by an unbroken bond, whose love, Untorn by any quarrels, Releases them no sooner than their final day.[8728]
Thrice happy they, and more then that, Whom bonds of love so firmly ties, That without brawls till death them part, 'Tis undissolv'd and never dies.	Three times happy, and more than that, Are those whom love's bonds hold so firmly That, free from quarrels until death parts them, Their love remains unbroken and never dies.
As Seneca lived with his Paulina, Abraham and Sara, Orpheus and Euridice, Arria and Pætus, Artemisia and Mausolus, Rubenius Celer, that would needs have it ingraven on his tomb, he had led his life with Ennea his dear wife forty three years eight moneths, and never fell out. There is no pleasure in this world comparable to it, 'tis summum mortalitatis bonum	So Seneca lived with his Paulina, Abraham with Sarah, Orpheus with Eurydice, Arria with Paetus, Artemisia with Mausolus; and Rubenius Celer, who insisted on having it engraved on his tomb that he had lived with Ennea, his dear wife, for forty-three years and eight months, and they had never quarrelled. No pleasure in this world compares with it: it is "the highest good of mortal life"—[8729]
—— [8730]hominum divûmq; voluptas, Alma Venus —— latet enim in muliere aliquid majus potentiusq; omnibus aliis humanis voluptatibus, as [8731]one holds, there's something in a woman beyond all humane delight; a magnetique vertue, a charming quality, an occult and powerfull motive.	"Venus, giver of life, delight of men and gods"—"for in a woman there lies something greater and more powerful than all other human pleasures," as one writer holds. There is something in a woman beyond all human delight: a magnetic force, an enchanting quality, a hidden and powerful impulse.[8732]

[8727] Burton. Printed page 443, d: "Hor." Horace, Odes 1.13.17–20; see the editorial note on variants.

[8728] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.13.17–20. Burton prints nec ullis and solvit where the consulted Latin has nec malis and solvet, as well as spelling differences. His Latin and his separate English version are translated separately; the second version is not substituted for the first.

[8729] Editor. The list joins biblical, mythical and historical couples as examples of constancy. The epitaph attributed to Rubenius Celer and Ennea has not been independently identified; their printed names and the precise forty-three years and eight months are retained.

[8730] Burton. Printed page 443, *: "Lucretius." Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 1.1–2.

[8731] Burton. Printed page 443, †: "Fonseca." Cristóbal de Fonseca.

[8732] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 1.1–2, invokes life-giving Venus as the delight of humans and gods. The second quotation is attributed in the margin to Fonseca. Magnetique and motive continue Burton's account of attraction as an effective but hidden force.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The husband rules her as head, but she again commands his heart, he is her servant, she his onely joy and content: no happiness is like unto it, no love so great as this of man and wife, no such comfort, as [8733]placens uxor, a sweet wife:	The husband rules her as head, but she in turn commands his heart. He is her servant; she is his only joy and contentment. No happiness equals it, no love is so great as this between husband and wife, no comfort like "a delightful wife"—a sweet wife:[8734]
[8735]Omnis amor magnus, sed aperto in conjuge major.	All love is great, but greater for an openly acknowledged spouse.[8736]
when they love at last as fresh as they did at first,	When their love at the end is as fresh as it was at the beginning,
[8737]Charaq; charo consenescit conjugi,	And she, beloved, grows old with her beloved husband,[8738]
as Homer brings Paris kissing Helena, after they had been married ten years, protesting withall that he loved her as dear as he did the first hour that she was betrothed.	As Homer presents Paris kissing Helen after they had been married ten years, declaring that he loved her as dearly as in the first hour of their betrothal.[8739]
And in their old age when they make much of one another, saying as he did to his wife in the Poet,	And when they cherish one another in old age, speaking as the poet did to his wife,

[8733] Burton. Printed page 443, †: "Hor." Horace; compare Odes 2.14.21.

[8734] Editor. Burton combines the husband's formal headship with the wife's emotional influence. Horace's placens uxor occurs in Odes 2.14.21, where the speaker says that even a beloved wife must be left at death. Burton applies the phrase to the comforts of marriage.

[8735] Burton. Printed page 443, e: "Propert." Propertius, Elegies 4.3.49.

[8736] Editor. Propertius, Elegies 4.3.49, in a wife's letter to her absent husband. The printed aperto in conjuge is also found in the consulted Latin text; it is understood here as a spouse acknowledged openly in marriage. It has not been silently changed to another editorial reading.

[8737] Burton. Printed page 443, †: "Simonides. græc." "Simonides, in Greek." The attribution is retained; exact source and intermediary remain uncollated.

[8738] Editor. The feminine chara and masculine charo preserve the reciprocal sense: a beloved wife growing old with a beloved husband. Burton attributes the line to Simonides in Greek; the exact Greek passage and the Latin version require further collation.

[8739] Editor. Compare Iliad 3.441–446. Paris says his present desire exceeds even what he felt when he first carried Helen away and lay with her on Cranae. Burton recasts the scene as affection continuing after ten years of marriage; kissing and the language of betrothal belong to his retelling.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8740]Uxor vivamus quod viximus, & moriamur; Servantes nomen sumpsimus in thalamo; Nec ferat ulla dies ut commutemur in ævo, Quin tibi sim juvenis, tuq; puella mihi.	Wife, let us live as we have lived, and die, Keeping the name we took in the bridal chamber. Let no day bring such change as we grow older That I am no longer young to you, nor you a girl to me.[8741]
Dear wife, let's live in love, and dye together, As hitherto we have in all good will: Let no day change or alter our affections, But let's be young to one another still.	Dear wife, let us live in love and die together, In all the goodwill we have shared till now. Let no day change or alter our affections, But let us still be young to one another.
Such should conjugall love be, still the same, and as they are one flesh, so should they be of one mind, as in an Aristocraticall government, one consent, [8742]Geryon-like, coalescere in unum, have one heart in two bodies, will and nill the same.	Such should married love be: always the same. As they are one flesh, so they should be of one mind, as in an aristocratic government, sharing one accord; like Geryon, "growing together into one," having one heart in two bodies, wishing and refusing the same things.[8743]
Source page 443–444 A good wife according to Plutarch, should be as a looking-glass to represent her husbands face and passion: If he be pleasant, she should be merry: if he laugh, she should smile; if he look sad, she should participate of his sorrow, and bear a part with him, and so they should continue in mutuall love one towards another.	A good wife, according to Plutarch, should be like a mirror reflecting her husband's face and feelings. If he is cheerful, she should be merry; if he laughs, she should smile; if he looks sad, she should share his sorrow and bear part of it with him. In this way they should continue in mutual love for one another.[8744]

[8740] Burton. Printed page 443, f: "Ausonius." Ausonius, To His Wife; the epigram's numbering varies by edition.

[8741] Editor. Ausonius, To His Wife. Burton's opening includes and let us die and his second line omits the relative pronoun; the consulted text instead has and let us keep the names we first took in the bridal chamber. The translation follows Burton's printed version, supplying the understood relative link, and preserves his separate English quatrain.

[8742] Burton. Printed page 443, †: "Geryon amicitiæ symbolum." "Geryon, a symbol of friendship."

[8743] Editor. Will and nill means desire and refuse. Aristocraticall government suggests rule shared among a few, here used as an analogy for agreement. Geryon, the multiple-bodied mythological figure, is expressly made an emblem of friendship in the margin; Burton's one heart in two bodies applies the emblem to the married pair.

[8744] Editor. Plutarch, Advice to Bride and Groom 14, develops the mirror comparison and requires the wife to adapt her feelings to her husband's. Burton adds his framing of mutual love. The unequal distribution of emotional duties is retained as part of the historical text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 444 [8745]Et me ab amore tuo deducet nulla senectus, Sive ego Tythonus, sive ego Nestor ero.	And no old age will draw me away from love of you, Though I become a Tithonus or a Nestor.[8746]
No age shall part my love from thee sweet wife, Though I live Nestor or Tithons life.	No age will part my love from you, sweet wife, Though I live as long as Nestor or Tithonus.
And she again to him, as the [8747]Bride saluted the Bridegrome of old in Rome, Ubi tu Caius, ego semper Caia, be thou still Caius, Ile be Caia.	And she in turn should say to him, as the bride greeted the bridegroom in ancient Rome: “Where you are Gaius, I am always Gaia.” Remain Gaius, and I will be Gaia.[8748]
’Tis an happy state this indeed, when the fountain is blessed (saith Solomon, Prov. 5. 17.) and he rejoyceth with the wife of his youth, and she is to him as the loving Hinde, and pleasant Roe, and he delights in her continually.	This is indeed a happy condition, “when the fountain is blessed,” as Solomon says in Proverbs 5.17, “and he rejoices with the wife of his youth, and she is to him like the loving hind and graceful doe, and he delights in her continually.”[8749]

[8745] Burton. Printed page 444, *: “Propert. l. 2.” Propertius, book 2; Elegies 2.25.9–10.

[8746] Editor. Propertius, Elegies 2.25.9–10. Burton prints Et where the consulted text has at. Nestor and Tithonus exemplify extreme longevity. Sweet wife is present only in Burton’s English paraphrase, not in the Latin couplet; the two versions remain separate.

[8747] Burton. Printed page 444, *: “Plutarch. c. 30 Rom. hist.” Plutarch, chapter 30, Roman history, as abbreviated here. Compare Roman Questions 30.

[8748] Editor. Plutarch, Roman Questions 30, discusses the formula Where you are Gaius, I am Gaia as participation in the household and its management. Burton adds semper, always, and gives a freer English version. Caius/Caia are modernized as Gaius/Gaia.

[8749] Editor. The quoted material paraphrases Proverbs 5.18–19 rather than beginning at the printed verse 17. Burton’s locator remains in the modern text. Hind and roe are female deer in this imagery; the fountain belongs to the chapter’s praise of fidelity within marriage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But this love of ours is immoderate, inordinate, and not to be comprehended in any bounds. It will not contain it self within the union of marriage, or apply to one object, but is a wandring, extravagant, a domineering, a boundless, an irrefragable, a destructive passion: sometimes this burning lust rageth after marriage, and then it is properly called Jealousie; sometimes before, and then it is called Heroicall melancholy; it extends sometimes to corrivals, &c. begets rapes, incests, murders:	But the love we are concerned with is excessive, disordered and impossible to contain within any bounds. It will not confine itself to marriage or attach itself to one person, but is a wandering, straying, domineering, boundless, irresistible and destructive passion. Sometimes this burning lust rages after marriage, when it is properly called jealousy; sometimes before, when it is called heroic melancholy. Sometimes it extends to rivals in love, and so forth, producing rapes, incests and murders:[8750]
Marcus Antonius compressit Faustinam sororem, Caracalla Juliam Novercam, Nero Matrem, Caligula sorores, Cyneras Mirrham filiam, &c. But it is confined within no terms of bloud, years, sex, or whatsoever else.	"Marcus Antonius had intercourse with his sister Faustina; Caracalla with his stepmother Julia; Nero with his mother; Caligula with his sisters; Cinyras with his daughter Myrrha," and so forth. It respects no limits of kinship, age, sex or anything else.[8751]
Some furiously rage before they come to discretion or age. [8752]Quartilla in Petronius, never remembred she was a maid: and the wife of Bath in Chaucer, cracks,	Some are seized by this fury before they reach years of discretion or maturity. Quartilla in Petronius could never remember having been a virgin; and Chaucer's Wife of Bath boasts,[8753]

[8750] Editor. This love of ours means the disordered love under examination. Extravagant means straying beyond bounds; irrefragable here means impossible to resist or restrain; corrivals are competing lovers. Burton's division between premarital love melancholy and marital jealousy organizes his subsequent discussion.

[8751] Editor. The catalogue mixes allegations about Roman rulers with the myth of Cinyras and Myrrha. Its names, relationships and accusations are reproduced as Burton prints them, including Marcus Antonius and Faustina as his sister and Julia as Caracalla's stepmother. These details require independent historical collation and are not certified by translation.

[8752] Burton. Printed page 444, †: "Junonem habeam iratam, si unquam meminerim me virginem fuisse. Infans enim paribus inquinata sum, & subinde majoribus me applicui, donec ad ætatem perveni; ut Milo vitulum, &c." "May Juno be angry with me if I ever remember having been a virgin. For as a child I was defiled with those of my own age, and later attached myself to older ones until I reached adulthood; as Milo the calf," and so forth. Burton abbreviates Petronius, Satyricon 25, adding Milo's name to its proverb about lifting a calf and then a bull.

[8753] Editor. Maid here means virgin; cracks means boasts. Quartilla is a fictional speaker in Petronius, Satyricon 25. Burton uses a literary account of childhood sexual experience as evidence of precocious lust; the narrative is not evidence of a child's informed consent. The translation preserves the report without adding detail.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Since I was twelve years old, believe, Husbands at kirk door had I five.	Since I was twelve years old, believe me, I have had five husbands at the church door.[8754]
[8755]Aratine Lucretia sold her maiden-head a thousand times before she was twenty four years old, plus millies vendideram virginitatem, &c. neq; te celabo, non deerant qui ut integram ambirent.	Aretino's Lucretia sold her virginity a thousand times before she was twenty-four: "I had sold my virginity more than a thousand times," and so forth, "and I will not conceal from you that there was no shortage of men who courted me as though I were untouched."[8756]
Rahab that harlot began to be a professed quean at ten years of age, and was but fifteen when she hid the spies, as [8757]Hugh Broughton proves, to whom Serrarius the Jesuite, quæst. 6. in cap. 2. Josue, subscribes.	Rahab the harlot began working openly as a prostitute at ten years old and was only fifteen when she hid the spies, as Hugh Broughton demonstrates; Serarius the Jesuit agrees with him in question 6 on Joshua, chapter 2.[8758]

[8754] Editor. The Wife of Bath's Prologue, lines 4–6. Burton compresses Chaucer into a rhyming couplet. She describes five successive marriages over the years since the age of twelve, not five marriages all contracted at twelve. Kirk means church; the church-door phrase refers to the marriage ceremony.

[8755] Burton. Printed page 444, †: "Pornodidasc. dial. lat. interp. Casp. Barthio ex Ital." Pornodidascalus, a dialogue translated from Italian into Latin by Caspar Barth.

[8756] Editor. Aratine means Pietro Aretino; the margin cites Caspar Barth's Latin Pornodidascalus. Lucretia's repeated sale of virginity is a claim within that literary dialogue. The Latin wording and its precise relation to the Italian remain uncollated.

[8757] Burton. Printed page 444, *: "Angelico scriptur. concentu." In the Angelic Concord of Scripture, as Burton abbreviates the title.

[8758] Editor. Quean means prostitute. Joshua 2 tells of Rahab hiding the spies but supplies neither of these ages. Burton attributes the chronology to Hugh Broughton and Nicolas Serarius; their exact passages remain uncollated. His proves is retained as his assessment of their authority.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Generally women begin pubescere as they call it, or catullire, as Julius Pollux cites, lib. 2. cap. 3. onomast. out of Aristophanes, [8759]at fourteen years old, then they doe offer themselves, and some plainly rage. [8760]Leo Afer saith, that in Africk a man shall scarce finde a maid at fourteen years of age, they are so forward, and many amongst us after they come into the teens do not live without husbands, but linger.	Generally women begin "to reach puberty," as they call it, or "to be in heat," as Julius Pollux quotes from Aristophanes in his Onomasticon, book 2, chapter 3, at fourteen years old. Then they offer themselves, and some are openly frantic. Leo Africanus says that in Africa one will scarcely find a virgin at fourteen, so precocious are they; and many among us, once in their teens, do not live without husbands but merely languish.[8761]
What pranks in this kinde the middle age have played, is not to be recorded.	The exploits of this kind committed by those in middle life are beyond recording.
Si mihi sint centum linguæ, sint oraq; centum,	If I had a hundred tongues and a hundred mouths,[8762]

[8759] Burton. Printed page 444, g: "Epictetus c. 42. mulieres statim ab anno 14. movere incipiunt, &c. attrectari se sinunt & exponunt. Levinus Lemnius." Epictetus, chapter 42. "Women begin to be stirred as soon as their fourteenth year," and so forth; "they allow themselves to be touched and expose themselves." Levinus Lemnius. The division of these words between the two cited authorities is not fully specified; the exact texts remain to be collated.

[8760] Burton. Printed page 444, †: "L. 3. fol. 126." Book 3, folio 126; the Leo Africanus reference.

[8761] Editor. Epictetus, Enchiridion 40 in the consulted translation, describes men flattering girls from fourteen and their consequent concern with adornment; he urges valuing modest conduct instead. Burton's compressed margin cites 42 and joins this with Lemnius. Its Latin intermediary remains uncollated. His African claim is attributed to Leo Africanus, not established as a general fact. Linger means languish; the Pollux, Lemnius and Leo passages remain unchecked.

[8762] Editor. A conventional poetic image of the impossibility of telling everything. Burton's wording is preserved; a precise direct or intermediary source for this form has not been assigned.

Original text 1651	Modern English
no tongue can sufficiently declare, every story is full of men and womens unsatiable lust, Nero's, Heliogabali, Bonosi, &c. [8763]Cœlius Amphilenum, sed Quintius Amphilenam depererunt, &c. They neigh after other mens wives (as Jeremy cap. 5. 8. complaineth) like fed horses, or range like town Bulls, raptores virginum & viduarum, as many of our great ones do.	No tongue can adequately tell it. Every history is full of the insatiable lust of men and women—Nero, Elagabalus, Bonosus and the rest. "Caelius was desperately in love with Amphilenus, but Quintius with Amphilena," and so forth. They neigh after other men's wives like well-fed horses, as Jeremiah 5.8 complains, or roam like communal breeding bulls, "ravishers of virgins and widows," as many of our great men do.[8764]
Source page 444–445 Solomons wisdom was extinguished in this fire of lust, Sampsons strength enervated, piety in Lots daughters quite forgot, gravity of Priesthood in Helies sons, reverend old age in the Elders that would violate Susanna, filiall duty in Absolon to his stepmother, brotherly love in Ammon towards his sister.	Solomon's wisdom was extinguished in this fire of lust; Samson's strength was weakened; piety was entirely forgotten by Lot's daughters, priestly dignity by Eli's sons, the reverence due to old age by the elders who wanted to violate Susanna, filial duty by Absalom towards his stepmother, and brotherly love by Amnon towards his sister.[8765]
Source page 445 Humane, divine laws, precepts, exhortations, fear of God and men, fair, foul means, fame, fortunes, shame, disgrace, honor cannot oppose, stave off, or withstand the fury of it, omnia vincit amor, &c.	Human and divine laws, commandments, exhortations, fear of God and men, fair means or foul, reputation, wealth, shame, disgrace and honour cannot oppose, ward off or withstand its fury: "Love conquers all," and so forth.[8766]

[8763] Burton. Printed page 444, †: "Catullus." Catullus, poem 100.1–2; names and wording differ from the consulted text.

[8764] Editor. Catullus 100.1–2 pairs Caelius with Aufillenus and Quintius with Aufillena in the consulted text. Burton prints Amphilenum and Amphilenam and changes the phrasing. These male and female names are preserved in translation. Bonosus and the larger catalogue of alleged excesses remain uncollated; story here means historical account.

[8765] Editor. The sequence draws on familiar biblical narratives of desire overriding other obligations. Eli is Helie, Absalom is Absolon, and Amnon is Ammon in Burton's spelling. The singular stepmother is retained rather than harmonized with the account of David's concubines. Burton's moral grouping of these different stories is his own.

[8766] Editor. The Latin means Love conquers all. Fame here is reputation and fortunes are worldly resources or wealth. The accumulation of restraints is deliberately exhaustive; the modern sentence retains its sequence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
No cord, nor cable can so forcibly draw, or hold so fast, as love can do with a twin'd thread; The scorching beams under the Æquinoctiall, or extremity of cold within the circle Artique, where the very Seas are frozen, cold or torrid zone cannot avoid, or expell this heat, fury and rage of mortall men.	No cord or cable can pull so powerfully or hold so firmly as love can with a twisted thread. The scorching rays beneath the equator, or the extreme cold within the Arctic Circle, where the very seas freeze—neither the cold nor the torrid zone can avert or expel this heat, fury and rage of mortal men.
[8767]Quo fugis ah demens, nulla est fuga, tu licet usq; Ad Tanaim fugias, usq; sequetur amor.	Where are you fleeing, madman? There is no escape. Though you flee As far as the Tanais, Love will follow you all the way.[8768]
Of womens unnaturall, [8769]unsatiable lust, what Country, what Village doth not complain? Mother and daughter sometimes dote on the same man, father and son, master and servant on one woman.	What country, what village does not complain of women's unnatural, insatiable lust? Mother and daughter sometimes dote on the same man; father and son, master and servant, on one woman.[8770]
—— Sed amor, sed inæffrenata libido, Quid castum in terris intentatumq; reliquit?	But love, but unbridled lust— What chaste thing on earth has it left unassailed?
What breach of vows and oaths, fury, dotage, madness, might I reckon up? Yet this is more tolerable in youth, and such as are still in their hot and lusty bloud: but for an old fool to dote, to see an old leacher, what more odious, what can be more absurd? and yet what so common? Who so furious?	What broken vows and oaths, what fury, infatuation and madness might I list? Yet this is more tolerable in the young and those whose blood is still hot and vigorous. But for an old fool to dote—to see an old lecher—what is more hateful, what can be more absurd? And yet what is more common? Who is so frenzied?

[8767] Burton. Printed page 445, †: "Euripides." This attribution is retained as printed. The couplet corresponds to Propertius, Elegies 2.30.1–2.

[8768] Editor. Propertius, Elegies 2.30.1–2, despite the marginal attribution to Euripides. The Tanais is the River Don, invoked as a remote destination. Burton prints Tanaim; the consulted Propertius has Tanain. The original spelling remains in the left column.

[8769] Burton. Printed page 445, h: "De mulierum inexhausta libidine luxuq; insatiabili omnes æque regiones conqueri posse existimo. Steph." "I think all regions can equally complain of women's inexhaustible lust and insatiable debauchery." Stephanus, as abbreviated; the precise work remains unidentified.

[8770] Editor. The generalization about women is Burton's polemical claim, reinforced by the marginal quotation. The succeeding examples also include male rivals. The precise source of the unattributed Sed amor couplet remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8771]Amare ea ætate si occiperint, multo insaniunt acrius,	If they begin to fall in love at that age, their madness is far more violent,
Some dote then more then ever they did in their youth. How many decrepit, hoary, harsh, writhen, bursten-bellied, crooked, toothless, bald, blear-eyed, impotent, rotten, old men shall you see fickering still in every place?	Some become more infatuated then than they ever did in youth. How many decrepit, grey-haired, rough, wrinkled, ruptured, crooked, toothless, bald, bleary-eyed, impotent, decayed old men will you see still flirting everywhere?[8772]
One gets him a yong wife, another a Curtisan, and when he can scarce lift his leg over a sill, and hath one foot already in Charons boat, when he hath the trembling in his joynts, the gout in his feet; a perpetuall rhume in his head, a continuate cough, [8773]his sight fails him, thick of hearing, his breath stinks, all his moisture is dried up and gone, may not spit from him, a very child again, that cannot dress himself, or cut his own meat, yet he will be dreaming of, and honing after wenches, what can be more unseemly?	One gets himself a young wife, another a courtesan. He can scarcely lift his leg over a threshold and already has one foot in Charon's boat; his joints tremble, his feet are gouty; he has a perpetual catarrh in his head and a persistent cough. His sight fails; he is hard of hearing; his breath stinks; all his moisture has dried up and vanished, and he cannot even spit. A child again, unable to dress himself or cut his own food, he will still dream of and pine for girls. What could be more unseemly?[8774]

[8771] Burton. Printed page 445, †: "Plautus." Plautus; exact passage remains to be collated.

[8772] Editor. Writhen means wrinkled or twisted; bursten-bellied suggests a rupture or hernia; fickering means flirting or courting. Burton's catalogue is satirical abuse of older lovers. Its insults are retained without turning them into medical descriptions endorsed by this edition.

[8773] Burton. Printed page 445, *: "Oculi caligant, aures graviter audiunt, capilli fluunt, cutis arescit, flatus olet, tussis, &c. Cyprian." "The eyes grow dim, the ears hear poorly, the hair falls out, the skin dries up, the breath smells, there is a cough," and so forth. Cyprian; exact passage not yet collated.

[8774] Editor. Charon ferries the dead in classical mythology: one foot in his boat means close to death. Rhume is a catarrhal discharge; continuate means persistent; meat means food; honing means yearning. The loss of moisture belongs to the passage's historical account of ageing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Worse it is in women then in men, when she is †ætate declivis, diu vidua, mater olim, parum decorè matrimonium sequi videtur, an old widdow, a mother so long since ([8775]in Plinies opinion) she doth very unseemly seek to marry,	It is worse in women than in men, when she is "advanced in years, long widowed, a mother long ago: she seems to pursue marriage with little propriety." An old widow, a mother so long since —in Pliny's opinion—seeks marriage very unbecomingly,[8776]
yet whilst she is so old a crone, a beldam, she can neither see, nor hear, go nor stand, [8777]a meer [8778]karkass, a witch, and scarce feel; she catterwauls, and must have a stallion, a Champion, she must and will marry again, and betroth her self to some yong man, [8779]that hates to look on, but for her goods; abhors the sight of her, to the prejudice of her good name, her own undoing, grief of friends, and ruin of her children.	Yet though she is such an old crone, a hag, unable to see or hear, walk or stand, a mere corpse, a witch, scarcely able to feel, she caterwauls and must have a stallion, a champion. She must and will marry again, pledging herself to some young man who hates to look at her except for her wealth, who abhors the sight of her—all to the damage of her reputation, her own undoing, her friends' grief and her children's ruin.[8780]

[8775] Burton. Printed page 445, †: "Lib. 8. Epist. Ruffinus." Book 8, letter to Rufinus: Pliny, Letters 8.18. One marginal text corresponds to two daggers in the body; the first dagger is retained literally and the single footnote is anchored at the second.

[8776] Editor. Pliny, Letters 8.18.8–10, to Rufinus. Pliny recounts public criticism of a distinguished widow who married the disabled, elderly Domitius Tullus, then praises her patient devotion. Burton makes the disapproval sound like Pliny's own general verdict on remarriage and omits the favourable conclusion. The duplicate dagger is recorded in the Burton footnote.

[8777] Burton. Printed page 445, i: "Hiatq; turpis inter aridas nates podex." "And the ugly anus gapes between withered buttocks." Compare Horace, Epodes 8.5–6; Burton joins and alters the lines.

[8778] Burton. Printed page 445, k: "Cadaverosa adeo ut ab inferis reversa videri possit, vult adhuc catullire." "So corpse-like that she might seem to have returned from the dead, she still wants to be in heat."

[8779] Burton. Printed page 445, l: "Nam & matrimoniis est despectum senium. Æneas Silvius." "For old age is despised even in marriages." Aeneas Sylvius; the exact source passage remains uncollated.

[8780] Editor. Beldam is an insulting term for an old woman; champion and stallion imply a vigorous sexual partner. Caterwauling compares desire to cats in heat. The demeaning imagery, including the obscene Horatian marginal line, is retained as part of Burton's satire of older women.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But to enlarge or illustrate this power and effects of love, is to set a candle in the Sun. [8781]It rageth with all sorts and conditions of men, yet is most evident among such as are yong and lusty, in the flower of their years, nobly descended, high fed, such as live idly, and at ease;	But to expand on or illustrate this power of love and its effects is to set a candle in the sunlight. It rages among people of every rank and condition, yet is most apparent in the young and vigorous, in the flower of their years, nobly born, richly fed, living idly and at ease.[8782]
Source page 445–446 and for that cause (which our Divines call burning lust) this [8783]ferinus insanus amor, this mad and beastly passion, as I have said, is named by our Physitians, Heroicall love, and a more honorable title put upon it, Amor nobilis, as [8784]Savanarola stiles it, because noble men and women make a common practise of it, and are so ordinarily affected with it.	For that reason this “wild, mad love,” this mad and beastly passion which our theologians call burning lust, is, as I have said, called heroic love by our physicians. They give it a more honourable title, “noble love,” as Savonarola styles it, because noble men and women commonly practise it and are so frequently affected by it.[8785]

[8781] Burton. Printed page 445, m: “Quid toto terrarum orbe communius? quæ civitas, quod oppidum quæ familia vacat amatorum exemplis? Æneas Silvius. Quis trigesimum annum natus nullum amoris causa peregit insigne facinus? ego de me facio conjecturam, quem amor in mille pericula misit.” “What is more common throughout the whole world? What city, what town, what household lacks examples of lovers?” Aeneas Sylvius. “Who has reached thirty without doing some remarkable deed for love? I judge by myself, whom love has sent into a thousand dangers.”

[8782] Editor. High fed means richly fed, and lusty means vigorous. To set a candle in the Sun means to explain something already obvious. Burton now moves from satire back to the classification of the passion; the noble and idle are singled out to explain its title.

[8783] Burton. Printed page 445, n: “Forestus. Plato.” Pieter van Foreest; Plato.

[8784] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], o: “Pract. major. Tract. 6. cap. 1. Rub. 11. de ægrit. cap. quod his multum contingat.” Major Practice, treatise 6, chapter 1, rubric 11, on diseases of the head: “because it happens often to these people.” Savonarola.

[8785] Editor. Savonarola here is the medical writer cited through his Major Practice. Burton connects heroic and noble love with social rank. The source page for the continuation is misnumbered 246; in sequence it is page 446. Modern pagination records the sequence and notes the misprint.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 446 Avicenna lib. 3. Fen. 1. tract. 4. cap. 23. calleth this passion Ilishi, and defines it [8786]to be a disease or melancholy vexation, or anguish of minde, in which a man continually meditates of the beauty, gesture, manners of his Mistris, and troubles himself about it: desiring (as Savanarola adds) with all intentions and eagerness of minde to compass or enjoy her, [8787]as commonly Hunters trouble themselves about their sports, the covetous, about their gold & goods, so is he tormented still about his Mistris.	Avicenna, book 3, fen 1, treatise 4, chapter 23, calls this passion Ilishi and defines it as "a disease, or melancholic distress, or anguish of mind, in which a man continually dwells on the beauty, bearing and manners of his mistress and torments himself about them," longing, as Savonarola adds, with all his concentration and eagerness "to win or enjoy her." "As hunters commonly concern themselves with their sport, and the covetous with their gold and possessions, so he is continually tormented about his mistress."[8788]
Arnoldus Villanovanus in his book of Heroicall love defines it, [8789]a continuall cogitation of that which he desires, with a confidence or hope of compassing it: which definition his Commentator cavils at.	Arnald of Villanova, in his book on heroic love, defines it as "continual thought of what one desires, with confidence or hope of obtaining it"—a definition his commentator disputes.[8790]

[8786] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], p: "Hæc ægritudo est solicitudo melancholica in qua homo applicat sibi continuam cogitationem super pulchritudine ipsius quam amat, gestuum, morum." "This disease is a melancholic anxiety in which a person continually occupies his thought with the beauty of the woman he loves, her gestures and manners."

[8787] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], q: "Animi forte accidens quo quis rem habere nimia aviditate concupiscit, ut ludos venatores, aurum & opes avari." "A powerful condition of the mind in which someone desires to possess a thing with excessive eagerness, as hunters do their sport, and misers gold and riches."

[8788] Editor. Ilishi is retained as Burton's printed form of the term used in the Latin Avicennian tradition for lovesickness. Fen is a subdivision of Avicenna's Canon. Mistress means the woman loved, without necessarily implying an adulterous relationship. The exact cited Latin editions and the form of the term remain to be collated.

[8789] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], r: "Assidua cogitatio super rem desideratam, cum confidentia obtinendi, ut spe apprehensum delectabile, &c." "Continual thought about a desired thing, with confidence of obtaining it, so that the pleasing object is grasped in hope," and so forth.

[8790] Editor. Arnoldus Villanovanus is Arnald of Villanova. Burton quotes a definition and then reports its commentator's objections. Compassing means obtaining. The commentary and the textual transmission of the work attributed to Arnald remain for full collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For continuall cogitation is not the genus, but a symptome of love; we continually think of that which we hate and abhor, as well as that which we love; and many things we covet and desire, without all hope of attaining.	For continual thought is not love's general class but a symptom of it. We continually think of what we hate and abhor as well as what we love; and we covet and desire many things without any hope of attaining them.[8791]
Carolus à Lorme in his Questions makes a doubt, An amor sit morbus, whether this heroicall love be a disease: Julius Pollux Onomast. lib. 6. cap. 44. determines it; They that are in love are likewise [8792]sick; lascivus, salax, lasciviens, & qui in venerem furit, verè est ægrotus. Arnoldus will have it improperly so called, and a malady rather of the body, then minde.	Charles de Lorme, in his Questions, raises the issue "whether love is a disease"—whether this heroic love is an illness. Julius Pollux, Onomasticon, book 6, chapter 44, settles it: those who are in love are also sick; "the lustful, the lecherous, those behaving wantonly and those mad for sex are truly ill." Arnald considers disease an improper name for it, and regards it as a disorder of the body rather than the mind.[8793]
Tully in his Tusculans defines it a furious disease of the minde, Plato madness it self, Ficinus his Commentator, cap. 12. a species of madness, for many have run mad for women, Esdr. 4. 26. but Rhases [8794]a melancholy passion, and most Physitians make it a species, or kinde of melancholy (as will appear by the Symptomes) and treat of it apart:	Cicero, in his Tusculan Disputations, defines it as a raging disease of the mind; Plato as madness itself; and his commentator Ficino, chapter 12, as a species of madness: "For many have gone mad for women," Esdras 4.26. But Rhazes calls it "a melancholic passion," and most physicians make it a species or kind of melancholy, as will appear from the symptoms, and treat it separately.[8795]

[8791] Editor. Genus is the broader class to which a thing belongs in a logical definition. The objection is that persistent thought is only a sign shared by several states, including hatred, and that hope of success is not necessary to desire.

[8792] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], s: "Morbus corporis potius quam animi." "A disease of the body rather than the mind." The printed marker stands at sick; the note relates to the subsequent statement about Arnald.

[8793] Editor. Morbus means disease. Burton distinguishes whether lovesickness is literally a disease and whether it belongs primarily to body or mind. The margin marked s is printed at sick although its wording supports the later statement about Arnald; that placement is preserved.

[8794] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], t: "Amor est passio melancholica." "Love is a melancholic disorder."

[8795] Editor. Tully is Cicero; Rhases is al-Razi. Tusculan Disputations 4.72–76 discusses desire approaching insanity and its treatment; Burton's phrase is a summary, not an exact definition located there. Cicero also distinguishes the Stoic account of love as an attempt at friendship. The scriptural phrase is 1 Esdras 4.26. The Plato, Ficino and medical source chain remains uncollated; these authorities do not necessarily share one concept of disease, madness or melancholy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
whom I mean to imitate, and to discuss it in all his kinds, to examine his severall causes, to shew his symptomes, indications, prognosticks, effect, that so it may be with more facility cured.	I intend to follow them: to discuss it in all its forms, examine its various causes, and explain its symptoms, indications, prognoses and effect, so that it may more readily be cured.
The part affected in the mean, time as [8796]Arnoldus supposeth, is the former part of the head for want of moisture, which his Commentator rejects.	Meanwhile, the part affected, Arnald supposes, "is the front of the head, through lack of moisture"—a view his commentator rejects.[8797]
Langius med. epist. lib. 1. cap. 24. will have this passion sited in the liver, and to keep residence in the heart, [8798]to proceed first from the eyes so carried by our spirits, and kindled with imagination in the liver and heart; cogit amare jecur, as the saying is. Medium ferit per epar, as Cupid in Anacreon.	Lange, Medical Letters, book 1, chapter 24, places this passion in the liver and has it reside in the heart: "It proceeds first from the eyes, is carried by our spirits, and is kindled by the imagination in the liver and heart." "The liver compels one to love," as the saying goes. "He strikes through the middle of the liver," as Cupid does in Anacreon.[8799]

[8796] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], u: "Ob calefactionem spirituum pars anterior capitis laborat ob consumptionem humiditatis." "Through the heating of the spirits, the front of the head suffers because its moisture is consumed."

[8797] Editor. Former part means the front or anterior part. The moisture and spirits in this debate are elements of historical physiology. The commentator's rejection is essential to the passage: Burton is recording competing explanations, not one settled anatomical account.

[8798] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], x: "Affectus animi concupiscibilis è desiderio rei amatæ per oculos in mente concepto, spiritus in corde & jecore incendens." "A passion of the appetitive faculty, arising from desire for the loved object, conceived in the mind through the eyes, inflaming the spirits in the heart and liver."

[8799] Editor. Langius is Johann Lange. Sited, as printed, means located. Spirits here are the subtle agents thought to carry bodily and mental activity. Epar is Greek-derived Latin for liver. The Anacreontic and proverbial lines are translated but their exact intermediary forms remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For some such cause belike [8800]Homer fains Titius liver (who was enamored on Latona) to be still gnawed by two Vultures day and night in hell, [8801]for that young mens bowels thus enamored, are so continually tormented by love.	For some such reason, perhaps, Homer imagines the liver of Tityus, who was enamoured of Latona, being continually gnawed by two vultures, day and night in hell: "because the inward parts of young men so enamoured are continually tortured by love."[8802]
Gordonius cap. 2. part. 2. [8803]will have the testicles an immediate subject or cause, the liver an Antecedent.	Bernard of Gordon, chapter 2, part 2, "makes the testicles the immediate seat or cause, and the liver an antecedent cause."
Fracastorius agrees in this with Gordonius, inde primitus imaginatio venerea, erectio, &c. titillatissimam partem vocat, ita ut nisi extruso semine gestiens voluptas non cessat, nec assidua veneris recordatio, addit Gnastivinus Comment. 4. Sect. prob. 27. Arist.	Fracastoro agrees with Gordon in this: "From there arise the first sexual fantasies, erection," and so forth. He calls it "the most sensitive part, so that unless semen is discharged the exultant pleasure does not cease, nor the continual recollection of sex," adds Guastavini in his commentary on Aristotle, section 4, problem 27.[8804]

[8800] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], y: "Odyss. & Metamor. 4. Ovid." Homer, Odyssey; and Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.

[8801] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], z: "Quod talem carnificinam in adolescentum visceribus amor faciat inexplebilis." "Because insatiable love inflicts such butchery on the inward parts of young people."

[8802] Editor. Homer, Odyssey 11.576–581, describes Tityus punished by two vultures for his assault on Leto, called Latona in Latin. Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.457–458, also describes his torn inward parts. Burton's account and its interpretation as the inward torment of lovers are retained; his fains means imagines or represents poetically.

[8803] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], a: "Testiculi quoad causam conjunctam, epar antecedentem, possunt esse subjectum." "The testicles may be the seat in respect of the immediate cause, the liver in respect of the antecedent cause."

[8804] Editor. Fracastorius is Girolamo Fracastoro. The print reads Gnastivinus, apparently for the commentator Guastavini; the identification is provisional pending edition-level collation. Extruso semine means semen discharged; titillatissimam denotes extreme susceptibility to stimulation. The translation retains the historical bodily explanation and its sequence of claims.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But properly it is [8805]a passion of the brain, as all other melancholy, by reason of corrupt imagination, and so doth Jason Pratensis c. 19. de morb. cerebri, (who writes copiously of this Eroticall love) place and reckon it amongst the affections of the brain.	But properly it is a disorder of the brain, like all other melancholy, arising from an impaired imagination. So Jason Pratensis, in chapter 19 of On Diseases of the Brain, where he writes at length about this erotic love, places and counts it among the disorders of the brain.[8806]
Source page 446–447 [8807]Melancton de animâ confutes those that make the liver a part affected, and Guianerius Tract. 15. cap. 13. & 17. though many put all the affections in the heart, refers it to the brain. Ficinus cap. 7. in Convivium Platonis, will have the blood to be the part affected. Io. Frietagius cap. 14. noct. med. supposeth all four affected, heart, liver, brain, blood; but the major part concur upon the brain,	Melanchthon, On the Soul, refutes those who make the liver a part affected; and Guaineri, treatise 15, chapters 13 and 17, assigns it to the brain, although many place all the passions in the heart. Ficino, chapter 7 of his commentary on Plato's Symposium, "makes the blood the part affected." Johann Freitag, chapter 14 of Medical Nights, supposes all four to be affected—heart, liver, brain and blood—but the majority agree on the brain.[8808]
Source page 447 'tis imaginatio læsa; and both imagination and reason [8809]are misaffected; because of his corrupt judgement, and continuall meditation of that which he desires, he may truly be said to be melancholy.	It is "an impaired imagination," and both imagination and reason are disordered. Because of his faulty judgement and continual dwelling on what he desires, the sufferer may truly be called melancholic.

[8805] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], b: "Propriè passio cerebri est ob corruptam imaginationem." "Properly it is a disorder of the brain arising from an impaired imagination."

[8806] Editor. Affections here means disorders. Corrupt imagination means an impaired image-forming faculty, not simply immoral thoughts. Jason Pratensis is the Latinized name of the medical writer cited; Burton endorses the brain as the principal seat after rehearsing competing accounts.

[8807] Burton. Printed page 446 [misprinted 246], c: "Cap. de affectibus." Chapter on the passions, in Melanchthon's On the Soul.

[8808] Editor. The names are modernized as Melanchthon, Guaineri and Freitag; their printed Latin forms remain opposite. Ficino's Convivium Platonis concerns Plato's Symposium. The exact editions, chapter divisions and fuller contexts of these medical and philosophical references remain for collation.

[8809] Burton. Printed page 447, e: "Est corruptio imaginativæ & æstimativæ facultatis, ob formam fortiter affixam, corruptumq; judicium, ut semper de eo cogitet." "It is an impairment of the imaginative and estimative faculties, owing to an image firmly fixed in the mind and a faulty judgement, so that he thinks of it continually."

Original text 1651	Modern English
If it be violent, or his disease inveterate, as I have determined in the precedent partitions, both imagination and reason are misaffected, first one, and then the other.	If the passion is violent or his disease long established, both imagination and reason are disordered, first one and then the other, as I have concluded in the preceding partitions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
ideoq; recte melancholicus appellatur. Concupiscentia vehemens ex corrupto judicio æstimativæ virtutis.	And therefore he is rightly called melancholic: intense desire arising from a faulty judgement of the estimative faculty.[8810]

[8810] Editor. The estimative faculty is the power of appraising the perceived or imagined object—here, its desirability. The closing Latin restates the role of faulty judgement in excessive desire. The print begins ideoq;, an abbreviation of ideoque, and therefore. This ends Member 1, Subsection 2.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 2. SUBSECT. 1. Causes of Heroicall love, Temperature, full Diet, Idleness, Place, Climate, &c.	Member 2. Subsection 1. Causes of heroic love: bodily temperament, plentiful diet, idleness, place, climate, and so forth.[8811]
OF all causes the remotest are stars. [8812]Ficinus cap. 19. saith, they are most prone to this burning lust, that have Venus in Leo in their Horoscope, when the Moon and Venus be mutually aspected, or such as be of Venus complexion.	Of all the causes, the most remote are the stars. Ficino, chapter 19, says that those most prone to this burning lust are people who have Venus in Leo in their horoscope, when the Moon and Venus are in mutual aspect, or who have a temperament governed by Venus.[8813]
[8814]Plutarch interprets Astrologically that tale of Mars and Venus, in whose genitures ♂ and ♀ are in conjunction, they are commonly lascivious, and if women, queanes; as the good wife of Bath confessed in Chaucer;	Plutarch interprets the story of Mars and Venus astrologically: "Those in whose birth charts Mars and Venus are in conjunction are commonly lustful; and if they are women, whores"—as Chaucer's good Wife of Bath confessed:[8815]
I followed aye mine inclination, By vertue of my constellation.	I always followed my inclination, Under the influence of my birth constellation.[8816]

[8811] Editor. Heroic love is Burton's historical category of erotic melancholy. Temperature means the body's balance of qualities, not a thermometer reading. This block gives the whole subsection, printed 447–451.

[8812] Burton. Printed page 447, f: "Comment. in convivium Platonis. Irretiuntur cito quibus nascentibus Venus fuerit in Leone, vel Luna venerem vehementer aspexerit, & qui eadem complexione sunt præditi." Commentary on Plato's Symposium. Those at whose birth Venus was in Leo, or the Moon strongly aspected Venus, and those endowed with the same temperament, are quickly ensnared.

[8813] Editor. Remote causes stand farther back in the causal chain than immediate bodily causes. Aspect means an angular relationship between heavenly bodies in an astrological chart; complexion means temperament. These are historical astrological explanations.

[8814] Burton. Printed page 447, g: "Plerumq; amatores sunt, & si fœminæ meretrices, l. de audiend." They are generally lovers; if women, prostitutes. Book on listening.

[8815] Editor. Geniture is a natal horoscope. The symbols ♂ and ♀ name Mars and Venus. Quean is a derogatory term for a sexually disreputable woman or prostitute; the gendered judgement belongs to Burton and his cited authority. The exact Plutarch passage remains to be collated.

[8816] Editor. Chaucer, Wife of Bath's Prologue 615–616. Burton gives an early modern spelling of the couplet, in which the Wife invokes the configuration of the heavens at her birth.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But of all those Astrologicall Aphorisms which I have ever read, that of Cardan is most memorable, for which howsoever he be bitterly censured by [8817]Marinus Marcennus, a malapert Frier, and some others also, (which [8818]he himself suspected) yet me thinks it is free, down right, plain and ingenuous.	But of all the astrological aphorisms I have ever read, Cardan's is the most memorable. However bitterly Marinus Mersenne, an impudent friar, and some others condemn him for it—as he himself anticipated—it seems to me frank, straightforward, plain and candid.[8819]
In his [8820]eighth Geniture or example, he hath these words of himself. ♂ ♀ & ☿ in ☿ dignitatibus assiduam mihi Venereorum cogitationem præstabunt, ita ut nunquam quiescam. Et paulo post, Cogitatio Venereorum me torquet perpetuo, & quam facto implere non licuit, aut fecisse potentem puduit, cogitatione assiduâ mentitus sum voluptatem.	In his eighth birth chart, or example, he says this about himself: "Mars, Venus and Mercury in Mercury's dignities will give me constant thoughts of sexual matters, so that I shall never have any rest." And a little later: "Thoughts of sexual matters torment me continually; and the pleasure I was unable to fulfil in action, or was ashamed to act on when I could, I have counterfeited through constant thought."[8821]
Et alibi, ob ☾ & ☿ dominium & radiorum mixtionem, profundum fuit ingenium, sed lascivum, egoq; turpi libidini deditus & obscœnus. So far Cardan of himself, quod de se fatetur ideo [8822]ut utilitatem adferat studiosis hujusce disciplinæ,	And elsewhere: "Because of the dominion of the Moon and Mercury, and the mingling of their rays, my intellect was profound but lustful, and I was given to shameful desire and obscenity." So much for Cardan's account of himself, "which he confesses about himself in order to benefit students of this discipline."

[8817] Burton. Printed page 447, †: "Comment in Genes. cap 3." Commentary on Genesis, chapter 3.

[8818] Burton. Printed page 447, *: "Et si in hoc parum à præclara infamia stultitiaq; abero, vincit tamen amor veritatis." Even if in this I come close to conspicuous infamy and folly, love of truth nevertheless prevails.

[8819] Editor. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano; Marcennus is Marin Mersenne. Malapert means impertinently bold; ingenuous means candid. Burton defends Cardano's frankness while insulting his critic; the Latin quotation awaits collation against the 1553 edition.

[8820] Burton. Printed page 447, †: "Edit. Basil. 1553. Cum Commentar. in Ptolomæi quadripartitum." Basel edition, 1553, with the commentary on Ptolemy's Tetrabiblos.

[8821] Editor. The enlarged scan reads ♂ ♀ & ☿ in ☿ dignitatibus: Mars, Venus and Mercury, in Mercury's dignities. Dignities are astrological positions supposed to give a planet strength. The later pair is ☾ & ☿, Moon and Mercury. The symbols are expanded into names in the modern column.

[8822] Burton. Printed page 447, h: "Fol.445. Basil. Edit." Folio 445, Basel edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and for this he is traduced by Marcennus, when as in effect he saith no more then what Gregory Nazianzen of old, to Chilo his scholar, offerebant se mihi visendæ mulieres, quarum præcellenti elegantiâ & decore conspectabili tentabatur meæ integritas pudicitiæ. Et quidem flagitium vitavi fornicationis, at munditiæ virginalis florem arcanâ cordis cogitatione fœdavi.	For this Mersenne maligns him, although in effect he says no more than Gregory of Nazianzus long ago said to his pupil Chilo: "Women presented themselves to my sight, whose outstanding elegance and visible beauty put the integrity of my chastity to the test. I did indeed avoid the disgrace of fornication, but I stained the flower of virginal purity with the secret thoughts of my heart."[8823]
Source page 447–448 Sed ad rem. Aptiores ad masculinam venerem sunt quorum genesi Venus est in signo masculino, & in Saturni finibus aut oppositione, &c. Ptolomæus in quadripart. plura de his & specialia habet Aphorismata, longo proculdubio usu confirmata, & ab experientia multa perfecta, inquit commentator ejus Cardanus.	But to the point. Those at whose birth Venus is in a masculine sign and in Saturn's terms or in opposition to him are more inclined to sexual relations with males, and so forth. Ptolemy's Tetrabiblos contains many detailed aphorisms on these matters, undoubtedly confirmed by long practice and perfected through much experience, says his commentator Cardan.[8824]
Source page 448 Tho. Campanella Astrologiæ lib. 4. cap. 8. articulis 4. & 5. insaniam amatoriam remonstrantia, multa præ cæteris accumulat aphorismata, quæ qui volet, consulat. Chiromantici ex cingulo Veneris plerumq; conjecturam faciunt, & monte Veneris, de quorum decretis, Taisnerum, Johan. de Indagine, Goclenium, ceterosq; si lubet, inspicias.	Tommaso Campanella, in his Astrology, book 4, chapter 8, articles 4 and 5, amasses more aphorisms than most on the signs of lovesickness: anyone who wishes may consult them. Palm readers generally draw their conclusions from the girdle of Venus and the mount of Venus; for their judgements, consult Taisnier, Johann von Indagine, Goclenius and the others, if you like.[8825]

[8823] Editor. The attribution to Gregory of Nazianzus and the addressee Chilo are reproduced from Burton; neither the exact work nor the quotation has yet been independently located. The contrast is between outward chastity and inward fantasy.

[8824] Editor. Masculinam venerem means sexual relations with males; the wording does not map neatly onto a modern identity category. In astrology, masculine signs form one class of zodiacal signs, and terms are subdivisions of signs assigned to planets. Burton's claim of empirical confirmation is part of the quoted argument.

[8825] Editor. The girdle and mount of Venus are palmistry features. The list refers to early modern writers on astrology and divination; their particular passages remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Physitians divine wholly from the temperature and complexion; Phlegmatick persons are seldom taken according to Ficinus Comment. cap. 9. naturally melancholy less then they, but once taken they are never freed; though many are of opinion flatuous or hypocondriacal melancholy are most subject of all others to this infirmity.	Physicians make their predictions entirely from bodily temperament and constitution. According to Ficino's Commentary, chapter 9, phlegmatic people are seldom affected, and those naturally melancholic still less; but once caught, they are never freed. Many, however, believe that people with flatulent or hypochondriacal melancholy are more subject than anyone else to this affliction.[8826]
Valescus assigns their strong imagination for a cause, Bodine abundance of wind, Gordonius of seed, and spirits, or atomi in the seed, which cause their violent and furious passions. Sanguine then are soon caught, young folks most apt to love, and by their good wills, saith [8827]Lucian, would have about with every one they see: the colts evil is common to all complexions.	Valescus gives their powerful imagination as the cause; Bodin, an abundance of wind; Gordon, an abundance of semen and spirits, or atoms in the semen, which produce their violent and furious passions. People of a sanguine temperament, then, are soon caught; the young are most inclined to love and, if they had their way, says Lucian, "would have a bout with everyone they see." The colt's complaint is common to every constitution.[8828]

[8826] Editor. Phlegmatic, melancholic and sanguine belong to humoral physiology. Hypochondriacal melancholy was associated with the upper abdominal organs and with wind; it does not here mean modern health anxiety. Naturally melancholy refers to a constitutional type.

[8827] Burton. Printed page 448, h: "Dial. amorum." Dialogue on loves.

[8828] Editor. Seed means semen; spirits are subtle bodily agents in historical physiology. Atomi means minute particles. To have a bout is a sexual euphemism; the colt's evil jokingly compares human desire with a young horse's sexual restlessness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Theomestus a young and lusty gallant acknowledgeth (in the said Author) all this to be verified in him, I am so amorously given, [8829]you may sooner number the Sea sands, and snow falling from the skies, then my severall loves. Cupid had shot all his arrows at me, I am deluded with various desires, one love succeeds another, and that so soon, that before one is ended, I begin with a second; she that is last is still fairest, and she that is present pleaseth me most:	Theomestus, a vigorous young gallant in the same author, admits that all this is true of him: "I am so amorously disposed that you could sooner count the sands of the sea and the snow falling from the sky than my different loves. Cupid has shot all his arrows at me. I am beguiled by different desires: one love follows another so quickly that, before one is over, I begin a second. The latest is always the fairest, and the woman before me pleases me most.[8830]
as an Hydra's head my loves increase, no Iolaus can help me. Mine eyes are so moist a refuge and sanctuary of love, that they draw all beauties to them, and are never satisfied. I am in a doubt what fury of Venus this should be: Alas, how have I offended her so to vex me, what Hippolitus am I! What Telchin is my Genius? or is it a naturall imperfection, an hereditary passion?	"My loves multiply like the heads of the Hydra; no Iolaus can help me. My eyes are so moist a refuge and sanctuary of love that they draw every beauty to them and are never satisfied. I wonder what wrath of Venus this can be. Alas, how have I offended her, that she torments me so? What Hippolytus am I? What Telchin is my guardian spirit? Or is this a natural defect, an inherited passion?"[8831]

[8829] Burton. Printed page 448, †: "Citius maris fluctus & nives cœlo delabentes numeraris, quam amores meos; Alii amores aliis succedunt, ac priusquam desinant priores, incipiunt sequentes. Adeo humidis oculis meus inhabitat Asylus omnem formam ad se rapiens, ut nulla satietate expleatur. Quænam hæc ira Veneris, &c." You could sooner count the sea's waves and the snow falling from heaven than my loves. Loves follow other loves, and before the earlier ones end the next begin. So deeply does my sanctuary dwell in moist eyes, drawing every beauty to itself, that no gratification fills it. What wrath of Venus is this? And so forth. Burton's English says sands where this Latin says waves; the awkward meus … Asylus is retained.

[8830] Editor. The speaker belongs to the dialogue Amores transmitted under Lucian's name. Burton prints Theomestus. This literary speech is an example, not a medical case record; its wording and attribution await full collation.

[8831] Editor. Iolaus helped Heracles destroy the many-headed Hydra, whose severed heads regrew. Hippolytus rejected Aphrodite's worship and suffered her vengeance. A Telchin is a malignant mythic being; genius here means an attendant or guardian spirit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Another in [8832]Anacreon confesseth that he had twenty sweet-hearts in Athens at once, fifteen at Corinth, as many at Thebes, at Lesbos, and at Rhodes, twice as many in Ionia, thrice in Caria, twenty thousand in all: or in a word, εἰ φύλλα πάντα, &c.	Another speaker in Anacreon confesses that he had twenty sweethearts in Athens at once, fifteen at Corinth, as many at Thebes, Lesbos and Rhodes, twice as many in Ionia, three times as many in Caria—twenty thousand in all. Or, in a word, "If all the leaves," and so forth:[8833]
Folia arborum omnium si Nosti referre cuncta, Aut computare arenas In æquore universas, Solum meorum amorum Te fecero logistam:	If you know how to number All the leaves of all the trees, Or count all the sands Within the sea, You alone will I appoint Accountant of my loves.
Canst count the leaves in May, Or sands ith' Ocean Sea, Then count my loves I pray.	Can you count the leaves in May, Or the sands in the ocean? Then count my loves, I pray.
His eys are like a ballance, apt to propend each way, and to be weighed down with every wenches looks, his heart a weathercock, his affection tinder, or Napthe it self, which every fair object, sweet smile, or mistris favor sets on fire.	His eyes are like a balance, ready to tip either way and to be weighed down by every girl's looks; his heart is a weathercock; his affection is tinder, or naphtha itself, which every beautiful sight, sweet smile or favour from a mistress sets alight.[8834]

[8832] Burton. Printed page 448, *: "Num.32." Number 32.

[8833] Editor. Burton's Anacreon refers to the Anacreontic poetic tradition. Number 32 is his edition's numbering. The Greek incipit means "If all the leaves"; the following Latin and Burton's separate English version are both preserved. His geographical totals remain uncollated.

[8834] Editor. Propend means incline or tip; naphtha is a highly inflammable substance. Wench here means a girl or young woman; mistress means the woman courted.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 448–449 Guianerius tract. 15. cap. 14. refers all this [8835]to the hot temperature of the testicles, Fernandus a Frenchman in his Erotique Mel. (which [8836]book came first to my hands after the third Edition) to certain atomi in the seed, such as are very spermatick and full of seed. I finde the same in Aristot. sect. 4. prob. 17. si non secernatur semen, cessare tentigines non possunt, as Guastavinius his Commentator translates it, for which cause these yong men, that be strong set, of able bodies, are so subject to it.	Guaineri, treatise 15, chapter 14, attributes all this "to the hot temperament of the testicles"; Ferrand, a Frenchman, in his Erotic Melancholy —a book that first came into my hands after the third edition—to certain atoms in the semen, in people "who produce much semen and are full of it." I find the same in Aristotle, section 4, problem 17: "If semen is not discharged, erections cannot cease," as his commentator Guastavini translates it. This is why these sturdy, vigorous young men are so subject to it.[8837]
Source page 449 Hercules de Saxonia, hath the same words in effect. But most part I say, such are aptest to love that are young and lusty, live at ease, staul-fed, free from cares, like cattle in a rank pasture, idle and solitary persons, they must needs hirquitullire, as Guastavinius recites out of Censorinus.	Ercole Sassonia says substantially the same. But generally, I say, those most inclined to love are the young and vigorous, living at ease, stall-fed and free from care, like cattle in a lush pasture; idle and solitary people must inevitably "go into heat like goats," as Guastavini quotes from Censorinus.[8838]
[8839]Mens erit apta capi tum quum lætissima rerum. Ut seges in pingui luxuriabit humo.	The mind will be ready for capture when, happiest in its circumstances, It flourishes like a crop in fertile soil.[8840]

[8835] Burton. Printed page 448, i: "Qui calidum testiculorum crisin habent, &c." Those who have a hot temperament of the testicles, and so forth. The print reads crisin; the sense is bodily constitution.

[8836] Burton. Printed page 448, †: "Printed at Paris 1624. Seven years after my first Edition." Burton's two dates conflict: his first edition appeared in 1621, three years before 1624; "seven years" is retained.

[8837] Editor. Guianerius is Antonio Guaineri; Fernandus refers to Jacques Ferrand. The source's bibliographical dating conflict is retained in Burton's footnote. The Aristotelian Problems circulated with commentary; the physiological account and exact wording require collation.

[8838] Editor. Stall-fed compares the comfortably maintained young with fattened livestock. Censorinus, On the Birthday 14.7, uses the related verb of a deepening, uneven voice and associates the name for youths with a goat-like bodily smell. Burton's hirquitullire is retained. "Go into heat like goats" follows his sexual context, not Censorinus's immediate meaning. Guastavini's intervening explanation and spelling remain to be collated.

[8839] Burton. Printed page 449, k: "Ovid de art." Ovid, The Art of Love.

[8840] Editor. Ovid, Art of Love 1.359–360. The print places a full stop after rerum although the comparison continues. Ovid describes the mind when happiest and flourishing; the modern rendering restores the syntax without changing the original column.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The minde is apt to lust, and hot or cold, As corn luxuriates in a better mold.	The mind is prone to lust, now hot, now cold, As grain grows lush in richer soil.[8841]
The place itself makes much wherein we live, the clime, air, and discipline if they concur. In our Misnia, saith Galen, neer to Pergamus, thou shalt scarce finde an adulterer, but many at Rome, by reason of the delights of the seat.	The place where we live makes a great difference, together with the climate, air and way of life, if they combine. In our Misnia, says Galen, near Pergamum, you will scarcely find an adulterer, but there are many at Rome because of the pleasures of the place.[8842]
It was that plenty of all things, which made [8843]Corinth so infamous of old, and the opportunity of the place to entertain those forrain commers; every day strangers came in, at each gate, from all quarters. In that one Temple of Venus a thousand whores did prostitute themselves, as Strabo writes, besides Lais and the rest of better note: All nations resorted thither, as to a school of Venus.	It was that abundance of everything which made Corinth so infamous in antiquity, along with the city's convenient position for receiving foreign visitors. Every day strangers entered through every gate from all directions. In that one temple of Venus, a thousand whores prostituted themselves, as Strabo writes, besides Lais and the others of greater fame. People of every nation flocked there as to a school of Venus.[8844]
Our hot and Southern countries are prone to lust, and far more incontinent then those that live in the North, as Bodine discourseth at large, Method. hist. cap. 5. Molles Asiatici, so are Turks, Greeks, Spaniards, Italians, even all that latitude:	The people of our hot southern countries are prone to lust, and far less sexually restrained than those who live in the north, as Bodin discusses at length in his Method of History, chapter 5. "Soft Asiatics"—so too Turks, Greeks, Spaniards, Italians, everyone at that latitude.[8845]

[8841] Editor. Burton's English couplet is freer than the Latin: "hot or cold" has no counterpart in the quoted Ovid. Corn means cereal grain; mold means soil.

[8842] Editor. The print reads Misnia, but the geographical context near Pergamum points to Mysia, in Asia Minor. Misnia is retained rather than silently emended. Galen's exact passage has not yet been located. Discipline here is habitual conduct or social training.

[8843] Burton. Printed page 449, †: "Gerbelius descript. Græciæ. Rerum omnium affluentia & loci mira opportunitas, nullo non die hospites in portas advertebant. Templo Veneris mille meretrices se prostituebant." Gerbel's Description of Greece. Abundance of everything and the place's remarkable convenience brought visitors to its gates every day. In Venus's temple a thousand prostitutes offered themselves.

[8844] Editor. Strabo, Geography 8.6.20, describes more than a thousand enslaved courtesans dedicated to Aphrodite's temple and connects them with Corinth's prosperity. Burton's wording compresses this account. Gerbel's intermediary passage remains uncollated.

[8845] Editor. Burton adopts climatic explanations and sweeping sexual stereotypes about peoples and regions. Molles means soft or effeminate in this polemical usage. His claim is preserved as his historical judgement, not endorsed as a fact about these populations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and in those Tracts, such as are more fruitful, plentiful, and delicious, as Valence in Spain, Capua in Italy, domicilium luxus Tully terms it, and (which Hannibals souldiers can witness) Canopus in Ægypt, Sybaris, Phæacia, Baiæ, [8846]Cyprus, Lampsacus.	And within those regions, especially the places more fertile, abundant and delightful: Valencia in Spain; Capua in Italy, which Cicero calls "the home of luxury," as Hannibal's soldiers can testify; Canopus in Egypt; Sybaris, Phaeacia, Baiae, Cyprus and Lampsacus.[8847]
In [8848]Naples the fruits of the soyl and pleasant air enervate their bodies, and alter constitutions: insomuch, that Florus calls it Certamen Bacchi & Veneris, but [8849]Foliot admires it.	At Naples, the fruits of the soil and the pleasant air weaken their bodies and change their constitutions, so much so that Florus calls it "a contest between Bacchus and Venus"; but Foliot admires it.[8850]
In Italy and Spain, they have their stews in every great City, as in Rome, Venice, Florence, where some say, dwell ninety thousand Inhabitants, of which ten thousand are Curtizans; and yet for all this, every Gentleman almost hath a peculiar Mistris; fornications, adulteries, are nowhere so common: urbs est jam tota lupanar; how should a man live honest among so many provocations?	In Italy and Spain they have brothels in every large city, as in Rome, Venice and Florence, where, some say, ninety thousand people live, ten thousand of them courtesans. Yet despite all this, almost every gentleman has a mistress of his own. Nowhere are fornication and adultery so common: "The whole city has now become a brothel." How could a man live chastely amid so many temptations?[8851]

[8846] Burton. Printed page 449, l: "Tota Cypri insula delitiis incumbit, & ob id tantum luxuriæ dedita visa est olim Veneri sacrata. Ortelius, Lampsacus olim Priapo sacer ob vinum generosum, & loci delitias. Idem." The whole island of Cyprus devotes itself to pleasures, and seemed so given to luxury that it was formerly consecrated to Venus. Ortelius. Lampsacus was formerly sacred to Priapus because of its strong wine and the delights of the place. The same author.

[8847] Editor. These places form a conventional catalogue of luxurious environments. Phaeacia belongs to Homeric story; Capua evokes the tradition that Hannibal's soldiers were softened by its comforts. The particular Cicero and Bodin passages remain uncollated.

[8848] Burton. Printed page 449, m: "Agri Neapolitani delectatio, elegantia, amænitas, vix intra modum humanum consistere videtur; unde &c. Leand. Alber. in Campania." The delight, elegance and beauty of the Neapolitan countryside scarcely seem to remain within human bounds; hence, and so forth. Leandro Alberti, on Campania.

[8849] Burton. Printed page 449, *: "Lib. de laud. urb. Neap." Book in praise of the city of Naples.

[8850] Editor. Florus, Epitome 1.11, on the Samnite war, calls fertile Campania a contest between Liber and Ceres: wine and grain. Burton names Bacchus and Venus, making it wine and sexual pleasure in his account of Naples. This alteration is preserved; its intermediary remains unidentified. Enervate means weaken. Foliot's praise of Naples remains uncollated.

[8851] Editor. Stews are brothels; peculiar means one's own. The city figures are reported with "some say" and have not been verified. Honest here means sexually chaste. The allocation of each reported statistic to a particular city has not been independently verified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
now if vigor of youth, greatness, liberty I mean, and that impunity of sin which grandies take to themselves in this kinde shall meet, what a gap must it needs open to all manner of vice, with what fury will it rage? For, as [8852]Maximus Tyrius the Platonist observes, libido consecuta quum fuerit materiam improbam, & preruptam licentiam, & effrænatam audaciam, &c. what will not lust effect in such persons?	Now if youthful vigour, high rank—by which I mean freedom—and the immunity from punishment that great people claim for such sins all come together, what an opening this must make for every kind of vice! With what fury it will rage! For, as Maximus of Tyre, the Platonist, observes, "when lust has acquired corrupt material to work upon, headlong licence and unbridled boldness," and so forth, what will it not accomplish in such people?
For commonly Princes and great men make no scruple at all of such matters, but with that whore in Spartian, quicquid libet licet, they think they may do what they list, profess it publikely, and rather brag with [8853]Proculus (that writ to a friend of his in Rome, what famous exploits he had done in that kind) then any way be abashed at it.	Princes and great men commonly have no scruples at all about such things. Like that whore in Spartian—"Whatever I please is permitted"—they think they may do as they like, admit it publicly, and boast, like Proculus, who wrote to a friend in Rome about his famous exploits of this kind, instead of feeling any shame.[8854]
[8855]Nicholas Sanders relates of Henry the 8th. (I know not how truly) Quod paucas vidit pulchriores quas non concupierit, & paucissimas non concupierit quas non violarit, He saw very few maids that he did not desire, and desired fewer whom he did not enjoy: nothing so familiar amongst them, 'tis most of their business:	Nicholas Sander says of Henry VIII—I do not know how truthfully—"that he saw few beautiful women whom he did not desire, and desired very few whom he did not violate." He saw very few girls whom he did not desire, and desired fewer whom he did not possess. Nothing is more usual among them; it occupies most of their time.[8856]

[8852] Burton. Printed page 449, †: "Disputat. de morbis animi, Reinoldo Interpret." Disputation on the diseases of the soul, in Rainolds's translation.

[8853] Burton. Printed page 449, n: "Lampridius, Quod decem noctibus centum virgines fecisset mulieres." Lampridius: that in ten nights he had made a hundred virgins women.

[8854] Editor. The names Spartian and Lampridius refer to traditional attributions within the Historia Augusta. Proculus's boast and the quoted maxim remain uncollated; Burton presents them as examples of high-ranking impunity.

[8855] Burton. Printed page 449, o: "Vita ejus." His life.

[8856] Editor. The print has paucissimas non concupierit quas non violarit, an extra negative that conflicts with Burton's own English gloss. The modern Latin rendering follows the sense he immediately supplies. His "I know not how truly" explicitly qualifies Sander's allegation; the underlying account is not verified here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 449–450 Sardanapalus, Messalina, and Ione of Naples, are not comparable to [8857]meaner men and women; Solomon of old had a thousand Concubines, Assuerus his Eunuches, and keepers, Nero his Tigillinus, Panders and Bawds, the Turks, [8858]Muscovits, Mogors, Xeriffs of Barbary, and Persian Sophies, are no whit inferior to them in our times.	Sardanapalus, Messalina and Joan of Naples cannot compare with men and women of lower rank. Solomon in ancient times had a thousand concubines; Ahasuerus had his eunuchs and keepers; Nero his Tigellinus, procurers and bawds. The Turks, Muscovites, Mughals, sharifs of Barbary and Persian shahs are in no way inferior to them in our own times.[8859]
Source page 450 Delectus fit omnium puellarum toto regno formâ præstantiorum (saith Jovius) pro imperatore; & quas ille linquit, nobiles habent; They press and muster up wenches as we do souldiers, and have their choice of the rarest beauties their countries can afford, and yet all this cannot keep them from adultery, incest, sodomy, buggery, and such prodigious lusts.	"A selection is made of all the most beautiful girls throughout the kingdom," says Giovio, "for the emperor; and those he leaves are taken by the nobles." They conscript and muster girls as we do soldiers, and choose the rarest beauties their countries can offer. Yet all this cannot keep them from adultery, incest, sodomy, buggery and such monstrous lusts.[8860]
We may conclude, that if they be yong, fortunate, rich, high-fed, and idle withall, it is almost impossible they should live honest, not rage, and precipitate themselves into those inconveniences of burning lust.	We may conclude that, if they are young, fortunate, rich, lavishly fed and idle as well, it is almost impossible for them to live chastely without raging and throwing themselves into those troubles of burning lust.

[8857] Burton. Printed page 449, p: "If they contain themselves, many times it is not virtutis amore; non deest voluntas sed facultas." If they restrain themselves, it is often not "from love of virtue"; "the will is not lacking, only the means."

[8858] Burton. Printed page 450, q: "in Muscov." On Muscovy.

[8859] Editor. Joan of Naples is cited without a distinguishing numeral. Burton's "a thousand concubines" compresses 1 Kings 11.3, which gives 700 wives and 300 concubines. Mogors means Mughals; Xeriffs means sharifs; Sophies is an early modern designation for the Persian rulers. The examples are Burton's polemical catalogue.

[8860] Editor. Press means forcibly recruit. Sodomy and buggery are overlapping historical terms for condemned sexual acts, without a stable one-to-one correspondence to present-day categories. Giovio's selection narrative remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8861]Otium & reges prius & beatas Perdidit urbes.	Idleness has destroyed kings before now, And prosperous cities.[8862]
Idleness overthrowes all, Vacuæ pectore regnat amor, love tyrannizeth in an idle person. Amore abundas Antipho. If thou hast nothing to do.	Idleness overthrows everything: “Love reigns in an unoccupied heart”; love tyrannizes over an idle person. “You have love to spare, Antipho.” If you have nothing to do,[8863]
[8864]Invidia vel amore miser torquebere ——	You will be miserably tormented by envy or love —[8865]
Thou shalt be haled in pieces with envy, lust, some passion or other. Homines nihil agendo malè agere discunt; ’Tis Aristotles Simile, [8866]as match or touchwood takes fire, so doth an idle person love.	You will be torn to pieces by envy, lust or some passion or other. “By doing nothing, people learn to do wrong.” It is Aristotle’s simile: “As a fuse or touchwood catches fire, so an idle person catches love.”[8867]
Quæritur Ægystus quare sit factus adulter, &c.	Why, it is asked, did Aegisthus become an adulterer? And so forth.[8868]

[8861] Burton. Printed page 450, r: “Catullus ad Lesbium.” Catullus, to Lesbius. The poem is conventionally addressed to Lesbia.

[8862] Editor. Catullus 51.15–16. Burton’s marginal ad Lesbium has a masculine ending; the poem is addressed to Lesbia. Beatas means prosperous or fortunate.

[8863] Editor. Vacuæ pectore is the form printed here; the construction is irregular, and its source remains uncertain. “Amore abundas, Antipho” occurs in Terence’s Phormio 163: the dialogue contrasts lacking a beloved with having her and still feeling distressed.

[8864] Burton. Printed page 450, s: “Hor.” Horace.

[8865] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.2.37, reads vigil, “wakeful,” where Burton prints miser, “wretched.” The translation follows Burton. The surrounding exhortation urges study and useful occupation.

[8866] Burton. Printed page 450, t: “Polit.8.num.28.ut naptha ad ignem, sic amor ad illos qui torpescunt ocio.” Politics 8, number 28. As naphtha responds to fire, so love responds to those who languish in idleness. The precise Aristotelian locus remains unconfirmed.

[8867] Editor. Match means a slow-burning fuse; touchwood is tinder. Burton’s Latin marginal simile uses naphtha rather than wood. The exact Aristotle reference and the preceding maxim remain unresolved.

[8868] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 161–162. The omitted answer is that Aegisthus was idle. Burton follows the question with his own explanation rather than quoting the answering line.

Original text 1651	Modern English
why was Ægistus a whoremaster? You need not ask a reason of it. Ismenedora stole Baccho, a woman forced a man, as [8869]Aurora did Cephalus: No marvel, saith [8870]Plutarch, Luxurians opibus more hominum mulier agit: She was rich, fortunate and jolly, and doth as men do in that case, as Jupiter did by Europa, Neptune by Amymone.	Why was Aegisthus a whoremonger? You need not ask the reason. Ismenodora carried off Bacchon: a woman seized a man, as Aurora did Cephalus. No wonder, says Plutarch: "Revelling in her wealth, the woman acts in the manner of men." She was rich, fortunate and full of high spirits, and acts as men do in such circumstances —as Jupiter did with Europa, and Neptune with Amymone.[8871]
The Poets therefore did well to feign all Shepheards Lovers, to give themselves to songs and dalliances, because they lived such idle lives. For love as [8872]Theophrastus defines it, is otiosi animi affectus, an affection of an idle minde, or as [8873]Seneca describes it, Juventâ gignitur, juxu nutritur, feriis alitur, otioq; inter læta fortunæ bona; Youth begets it, riot maintains it, idleness nourisheth it, &c.	The poets therefore did well to make all their shepherds lovers, devoted to songs and flirtations, because they led such idle lives. For love, as Theophrastus defines it, "is a passion of an idle mind"; or, as Seneca describes it, "It is born in youth, nourished by luxury, sustained by holidays and leisure amid fortune's happy gifts." Youth begets it, dissipation maintains it, idleness feeds it, and so forth.[8874]

[8869] Burton. Printed page 450, †: "Pausanias Attic. lib.1. Cephalus egregiæ formæ juvenis ab aurora raptus quod ejus amore capta esset." Pausanias, Attica, book 1. Cephalus, a young man of outstanding beauty, was carried off by Dawn because she had fallen in love with him.

[8870] Burton. Printed page 450, u: "In amatorio." In the Dialogue on Love.

[8871] Editor. Plutarch's Dialogue on Love recounts Ismenodora's abduction of Bacchon. In the dialogue the remark about wealth and acting like a man is voiced by Zeuxippus, quoting tragedy; Burton presents it simply under Plutarch's name. Aurora is Dawn; the other examples are mythological abductions or sexual encounters.

[8872] Burton. Printed page 450, †: "E Stobæo ser.62." From Stobaeus, discourse 62.

[8873] Burton. Printed page 450, †: "Amor otiosæ cura est sollicitudinis." Love is the care of idle anxiety.

[8874] Editor. Riot means dissolute living; printed juxu is understood as luxu, luxury. The body adapts Octavia 561–563, where the character Seneca tells Nero that love grows through youth, luxury and leisure. Burton adds feriis alitur, absent there. The margin resembles a maxim in Publilius Syrus, Sentences, beginning Amor otiosae causa; Burton has cura est instead of causa. Both forms remain. The Theophrastus–Stobaeus reference and immediate intermediaries remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
which makes [8875]Gordonius the Physitian cap. 20. part. 2. call this disease the proper passion of Nobility. Now if a weak judgement and a strong apprehension do concurr, how, saith Hercules de Saxoniâ, shall they resist? Savanarola appropriates it almost to [8876]Monks, Friers, and religious persons, because they live solitary, fare daintily, and do nothing: and well he may, for how should they otherwise choose?	This leads Gordon the physician, chapter 20, part 2, to call this disease the characteristic passion of the nobility. Now, if weak judgement and a powerful imagination come together, how, asks Ercole Sassonia, can they resist? Savonarola treats it as almost peculiar to "monks, friars and members of religious orders, because they live in solitude, eat delicately and do nothing." And well he may: how could they help it?[8877]
Diet alone is able to cause it: A rare thing to see a young man or a woman that lives idly, and fares well, of what condition soever, not to be in love. [8878]Alcibiades was still dallying with wanton young women, immoderate in his expences, effeminate in his apparel, ever in love, but why? he was over delicate in his diet, too frequent and excessive in banquets.	Diet alone can cause it. It is rare to see a young man or woman, of whatever station, who lives idly and eats well without being in love. Alcibiades was always dallying with wanton young women, extravagant in his spending, effeminate in his clothing, forever in love. But why? He was excessively fastidious about his food, and too frequent and excessive in his banqueting.[8879]
Ubicunq; securitas, ibi libido dominatur; lust and security domineer together, as S. Hierome averreth. All which the wife of Bath in Chaucer freely justifies.	"Wherever there is freedom from care, lust holds sway." Lust and untroubled ease rule together, as Saint Jerome declares. Chaucer's Wife of Bath freely confirms all this:
For all to sicker, as cold engendreth hail, A liquorish tongue must have a liquorish tail.	For just as surely as cold engenders hail, A greedy tongue must have a lustful tail.[8880]

[8875] Burton. Printed page 450, x: "Principes plerumq; ob licentiam & affluentiam divitiarum istam passionem solent incurrere." Princes commonly fall into this passion because of their licence and abundance of riches.

[8876] Burton. Printed page 450, y: "Ardenter appetit qui otiosam vitam agit, & communiter incurrit hæc passio solitarios delitiose viventes, incontinentes, religiosos, &c." One who lives an idle life desires ardently; this passion commonly befalls solitary people who live luxuriously, the unrestrained, members of religious orders, and so forth.

[8877] Editor. Apprehension means imaginative conception. Savonarola is the medical writer in this context; religious persons means members of religious orders. The charge against their way of life is Burton's, not a neutral description.

[8878] Burton. Printed page 450, *: "Plutarch. vit. ejus." Plutarch, his Life.

[8879] Editor. Still means continually; condition means social position. Burton moralizes Alcibiades' consumption and dress; the detailed correspondence with Plutarch's Life remains to be checked.

[8880] Editor. Compare Wife of Bath's Prologue 465–466. Chaucer has "mouth" where Burton prints "tongue"; Burton's opening "For all to sicker" is also a variant. Liquorish means greedy for sensual pleasure; tail is a bawdy reference to the sexual parts.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 450–451 Especially if they shall further it by choice Diet, as many times those Sybarites and Phæaces do, feed liberally, and by their good will, eat nothing else but lascivious meats.	Especially if they encourage it with choice food, as those Sybarites and Phaeacians often do, eating lavishly and, if they had their way, eating nothing but foods that stimulate lust.[8881]
Source page 451 [8882]Vinum imprimis generosum, legumen, fabas, radices omnium generum bene conditas, & largo pipere aspersas, carduos hortulanos, lactucas, [8883]erucas, rapas, porros, cæpas, nucem piceam, amygdalas dulces, electuaria, syrupos, succos, cochleas, conchas, pisces optimè præparatos, aviculas, testiculos animalium, ova, condimenta diversorum generum, molles lectos, pulvinaria, &c.	Above all, strong wine; pulses, beans, roots of every kind, well seasoned and generously sprinkled with pepper; garden cardoons, lettuces, rocket, turnips, leeks, onions, pine nuts, sweet almonds, medicinal pastes, syrups, juices, snails, shellfish, exquisitely prepared fish, small birds, animals' testicles, eggs, seasonings of various kinds, soft beds, cushions, and so forth.[8884]
Et quicquid ferè medici impotentiâ rei venereæ laboranti præscribunt, hoc quasi diasatyrion habent in delitiis, & his dapes multò delicatiores; mulsum, exquisitas & exoticas fruges, aromata, placentas, expressos succos multis ferculis variatos, ipsumque vinum suavitate vincentes, & quicquid culina, pharmacopœa, aut quæque ferè officina subministrare possit.	And almost everything physicians prescribe for someone suffering from sexual impotence they prize as though it were a compound aphrodisiac, together with dishes much more luxurious than these: honeyed wine, choice and exotic fruits, spices, cakes, extracted juices varied through many courses and surpassing wine itself in sweetness, and whatever the kitchen, pharmacy or almost any workshop can supply.[8885]

[8881] Editor. Meats means foods generally. Sybarites and Phaeacians stand for people devoted to luxurious living. The concluding Latin catalogue is rendered in full; it records Burton's discussion of supposed aphrodisiacs.

[8882] Burton. Printed page 451, †: "Vina parant animos veneri." Wine prepares minds for love.

[8883] Burton. Printed page 451, z: "Sed nihil erucæ faciunt bulbive salaces; Improba nec prosit jam satureia tibi. Ovid." But rocket and lust-provoking bulbs achieve nothing; and let shameless savory now be of no help to you. Burton attributes this to Ovid; it is a variant of Martial 3.75.3–4, where prosunt means "are of no help."

[8884] Editor. Electuaries are medicinal preparations mixed into a paste, commonly with a sweet binder. Carduos hortulanos is rendered garden cardoons; exact plant identification remains open. The marginal couplet is Martial 3.75.3–4, despite Burton's attribution to Ovid. Martial describes failed aphrodisiacs; Burton's prosit differs from prosunt in the consulted text.

[8885] Editor. Diasatyrion names a compounded stimulant associated with satyrion, traditionally an orchid root. This is a historical pharmaceutical term; its composition and efficacy are not established by the passage. Officina can mean a shop or workshop, including an apothecary's.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Et hoc plerumque victu quum se ganeones infarciant, [8886]ut ille ob Chreseida suam, se bulbis & cochleis curavit; etiam ad Venerem se parent, & ad hanc palestram se exerceant, quâ fieri possit, ut non miserè depereant, [8887]ut non penitus insaniant?	And when these debauchees commonly stuff themselves with such fare—as that man, for the sake of his Chryseis, dosed himself with bulbs and snails—and also prepare themselves for sex and train for this wrestling ground, how can they fail to fall desperately in love, how can they fail to go utterly mad?[8888]
Æstuans venter cito despuit in libidinem, Hieronymus ait. [8889]Post prandia, Callyroenda. Quis enim continere se potest? [8890]Luxuriosa res vinum, fomentum libidinis vocat Augustinus, blandum dæmonem, Bernardus; lac veneris, Aristophanes.	"A heated belly soon discharges into lust," says Jerome. "After dinner, Callirhoe." For who can restrain himself? Wine is a luxurious thing: Augustine calls it fuel for lust; Bernard, a coaxing demon; Aristophanes, Venus's milk.[8891]
Non Ætna, non Vesuvius tantis ardoribus æstuant, ac juveniles medullæ vino plenæ, addit [8892]Hieronymus: unde ob optimum vinum Lampsacus olim Priapo sacer: & venerandi Bacchi socia, apud [8893]Orpheum Venus audit.	Neither Etna nor Vesuvius blazes with such heat as the marrow of young people filled with wine, Jerome adds. Hence Lampsacus was formerly sacred to Priapus because of its excellent wine; and in Orpheus Venus is called the companion of revered Bacchus.[8894]

[8886] Burton. Printed page 451, a: "Petronius. Curavi me mox cibis validioribus, &c." Petronius. I soon treated myself with more strengthening foods, and so forth.

[8887] Burton. Printed page 451, b: "Ut ille apud Skenkium, qui post potionem, uxorem & quatuor ancillas proximo cubiculo cubantes, compressit." Like the man in Schenck who, after taking a potion, had intercourse with his wife and four maidservants lying in the next room.

[8888] Editor. Ganeones are gluttons or debauchees; the palaestra is a wrestling ground used here as a sexual metaphor. Burton's Petronius reference and the name Chreseida need collation. The following marginal note supplies another sexual anecdote from Schenck.

[8889] Burton. Printed page 451, c: "Pers.Sat.3." Persius, Satire 3. The identifiable passage is actually Satire 1.134.

[8890] Burton. Printed page 451, d: "Siracides. Nox, & amor vinumq; nihil moderabile suadent." Sirach. Night, love and wine counsel no moderation. The latter sentence corresponds to Ovid, Amores 1.6.59; the juxtaposed authorities are retained.

[8891] Editor. The scan reads Callyroenda; the identifiable allusion is Persius 1.134, post prandia Callirhoen, concerning after-dinner literary entertainment. Burton cites Satire 3 in the margin. "Callirhoe" is used in the modern column for the printed form. The attributions to Augustine, Bernard and Aristophanes remain uncollated.

[8892] Burton. Printed page 451, e: "Lib.ad Olympiam." Book to Olympias. The attribution requires further collation.

[8893] Burton. Printed page 451, †: "Hymno." In a hymn.

[8894] Editor. Juveniles medullæ means youthful marrow, a bodily metaphor for deep heat and desire. Priapus is a fertility deity; Bacchus is the wine god. Burton's reference to a work addressed to Olympias and the exact Orphic hymn require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hæc si vinum simplex, & per se sumptum præstare possit, nam —— [8895]quo me Bacche rapis tui plenum — quam non insaniam, quem non furorem à cæteris expectemus?	If plain wine, taken by itself, can do these things —for "Where are you carrying me, Bacchus, full of you?"—what madness, what frenzy should we not expect from the rest?[8896]
[8897]Gomesius salem enumerat inter ea quæ intempestivam libidinem provocare solent, Et salaciores fieri fœminas ob esum salis contendit. Venerem ideo dicunt ab Oceano ortam.	Gómez counts salt among the things that commonly provoke untimely lust, and maintains that eating salt makes women more lustful. That, they say, is why Venus was born from the ocean.[8898]
[8899]Unde tot in Veneta scortorum millia cur sunt? In promptu causa est, est Venus orta mari.	Why are there so many thousands of whores in Venice? The reason is plain: Venus was born from the sea.[8900]
Et hinc fœta mater Salacea Oceani conjux, verbumque fortasse salax à sale effluxit. Mala Bacchica tantum olim in amoribus prævaluerunt, ut coronæ ex illis statuæ Bacchi ponerentur.	Hence too the fertile mother Salacia, Ocean's wife; and perhaps the word salax, "lustful," flowed from sal, "salt." Bacchic apples once had such power in matters of love that wreaths made of them were placed on the statue of Bacchus.[8901]

[8895] Burton. Printed page 451, †: "Hor.l.3.Od.25." Horace, Odes 3.25.

[8896] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.25.1–2. In the ode, Bacchic possession is tied to poetic inspiration; Burton redirects the line to the effects of drinking.

[8897] Burton. Printed page 451, f: "De sale lib. cap.21." Book on salt, chapter 21.

[8898] Editor. Gomesius is the author cited here for a work on salt. The argument links salt, sexual desire and the sea birth of Venus by association; it is not a demonstrated physiological explanation.

[8899] Burton. Printed page 451, *: "Kornmannus lib. de virginitate." Kornmann, book on virginity.

[8900] Editor. The couplet is an anti-Venetian sexual joke cited through Kornmann. It adapts the "reason is plain" formula also found in Ovid's Aegisthus couplet; its full textual history remains unresolved.

[8901] Editor. Burton gives Salacea as Ocean's wife and speculates that salax derives from sal. The modern column uses the standard name Salacia while retaining his asserted relationship and signalling the etymology with "perhaps." The precise plant meant by mala Bacchica remains uncertain; "Bacchic apples" preserves that uncertainty.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8902]Cubebis in vino maceratis utuntur Indi orientales ad Venerem excitandum, & [8903]Surax radice Africani. Chinæ radix eundem effectus habet, talisq; herbæ meminit mag. nat. lib. 2. cap. 16. [8904]Baptista Porta ex India allatæ, cujus mentionem facit & Theophrastus.	The East Indians use cubebs steeped in wine to excite sexual desire, and the Africans use surax root. China root has the same effect; and Giambattista della Porta, in Natural Magic, book 2, chapter 16, mentions such a plant brought from India, which Theophrastus also mentions.[8905]
Sed infinita his similia apud Rhasin, Matthiolum, Mizaldum, cæterosque medicos occurrunt, quorum ideo mentionem feci, ne quis imperitior in hos scopulos impingat, sed pro virili tanquam syrtes & cautes consulto effugiat.	But countless things of this kind occur in Rhazes, Mattioli, Mizald and the other physicians. I have mentioned them so that an inexperienced person may not strike these rocks, but may deliberately steer clear of them, as far as he can, as he would shoals and reefs.[8906]

[8902] Burton. Printed page 451, g: “Garcias ab horto aromatum, lib.1.cap.28.” Garcia da Orta, on aromatic plants, book 1, chapter 28.

[8903] Burton. Printed page 451, h: “Surax radix ad coitum summe facit si quis comedat, aut infusionem bibat, membrum subito erigitur. Leo Afer. lib.9.cap.ult.” Surax root greatly promotes intercourse: if someone eats it or drinks an infusion, the penis immediately becomes erect. Leo Africanus, book 9, last chapter. The marginal sentence continues across the foot of the page.

[8904] Burton. Printed page 451, †: “Quæ non solum edentibus sed & genitale tangentibus tantum valet, ut coire summe desiderent; quoties fere velint, possint; alios duodecies profecisse, alios ad 60 vices pervenisse refert.” It has such power, not only for those who eat it but also for those who touch the genitals with it, that they greatly desire intercourse and can perform it almost as often as they wish. He reports that some succeeded twelve times, others reached sixty. This is Burton’s report of a historical claim, not a verified effect.

[8905] Editor. Cubebs are an aromatic spice. The identity of surax and the historical scope of China root require botanical collation; no precise species is supplied. The claims quoted from Leo Africanus and della Porta are reproduced as historical reports.

[8906] Editor. Rhasin, Matthiolum and Mizaldum refer to Rhazes, Pietro Andrea Mattioli and Antoine Mizauld. Burton ends by presenting his catalogue as a warning to avoid temptation, returning to the metaphor of navigating dangerous shoals.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 452 MEMB. 2. SUBSECT. 2. Other causes of Love-Melancholy, Sight, Beauty from the face, eyes, other parts, and how it pierceth.	Member 2. Subsection 2. Other causes of love melancholy: sight; beauty of the face, eyes and other parts; and how it pierces us.[8907]
MAny such causes may be reckoned up, but they cannot avail, except opportunity be offered of time, place, and those other beautiful objects, or artificiall enticements, as kissing, conference, discourse, gestures concur, with such like lascivious provocations.	Many such causes may be listed, but they cannot take effect unless time and place offer an opportunity, and other beautiful objects or contrived enticements—kissing, meeting, conversation, gestures and similar lustful provocations—combine with them.
Kornamannus in his book de linea amoris makes five degrees of lust, out of [8908]Lucian belike, which he handles in five Chapters, Visus, Colloquium, Convictus, Oscula, Tactus.	Kornmann, in his book On the Line of Love, sets out five stages of lust, apparently taken from Lucian, which he treats in five chapters: seeing, conversation, keeping company, kisses and touching.[8909]
Sight of all other, is the first step of this unruly love, though sometime it be prevented by relation or hearing, or rather incensed. For there be those so apt, credulous and facile to love, that if they hear of a proper man, or woman, they are in love before they see them, and that meerly by relation, as Achilles Tatius observes. [8910]Such is their intemperance and lust, that they are as much maimed by report, as if they saw them.	Above all else, sight is the first step in this unruly love, though sometimes a report or something heard anticipates it—or, rather, inflames it. Some people are so prone, so credulous and so ready to love that, if they hear of a handsome man or woman, they fall in love before seeing them, merely from the description, as Achilles Tatius observes. “Such is their lack of restraint and their lust that they are as deeply wounded by a report as if they had seen the person.”[8911]

[8907] Editor. The subsection continues beyond this block. “Love melancholy” remains Burton’s historical category; here he moves from bodily predispositions to encounters with beauty.

[8908] Burton. Printed page 452, i: “Lucian. Tom. 4. Dial. amorum.” Lucian, volume 4, Dialogue of Love; Burton’s edition numbering.

[8909] Editor. Heinrich Kornmann’s title is De linea amoris. “Belike” marks Burton’s own conjecture about his dependence on Lucian. Convictus here means shared company or association.

[8910] Burton. Printed page 452, k: “Ea enim hominum intemperantium libido est ut etiam fama ad amandum impellantur, & audientes æque afficiuntur ac videntes.” “Such is the lust of unrestrained people that even a report drives them to love, and hearing affects them as much as seeing.”

[8911] Editor. “Prevented” means anticipated or preceded, not stopped; “proper” means handsome. “Maimed” sustains Burton’s recurring image of love as a wound.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8912]Calisthenes a rich young Gentleman of Byzance in Thrace, hearing of Leucippe Sostratus fair daughter, was far in love with her, and out of fame and common rumor, so much incensed, that he would needs have her to be his wife.	Callisthenes, a rich young gentleman of Byzantium in Thrace, heard of Leucippe, the beautiful daughter of Sostratus, and fell deeply in love with her. Her reputation and common report so inflamed him that he was determined to have her as his wife.[8913]
And sometimes by reading they are so affected, as he in [8914]Lucian confesseth of himself, I never read that place of Panthea in Xenophon, but I am as much affected as if I were present with her. Such persons commonly; [8915]fain a kind of beauty to themselves; and so did those three Gentlewomen in [8916]Balthasar Castilio, fall in love with a yong man, whom they never knew, but only heard him commended:	Sometimes reading affects them in this way, as the speaker in Lucian confesses of himself: "I never read that passage about Panthea in Xenophon without being as deeply moved as if I were in her presence." Such people commonly imagine a kind of beauty for themselves. So those three gentlewomen in Baldassare Castiglione fell in love with a young man whom they had never known, merely from hearing him praised.[8917]

[8912] Burton. Printed page 452, l: "Formosam Sostrato filiam audiens, uxorem cupit, & sola illius auditione ardet." "Hearing that Sostratus has a beautiful daughter, he desires her as his wife and burns merely from hearing of her."

[8913] Editor. This is an example from Achilles Tatius's romance Leucippe and Clitophon. Burton presents a literary character as evidence about the force of reputation.

[8914] Burton. Printed page 452, m: "Quoties de Panthea Xenophontis locum perlego, ita animo afficior ac si coram intuerer." "Whenever I read Xenophon's passage about Panthea, I am moved as if I were looking at her in person."

[8915] Burton. Printed page 452, n: "Pulchritudinem sibi ipsis confingunt. Imagines." "They invent beauty for themselves." Images. The marginal text is attached here to its corresponding clause; its body marker is indistinct in the scan.

[8916] Burton. Printed page 452, o: "De aulico lib. 2. fol. 116. 'tis a pleasant story, and related at large by him." Castiglione, The Courtier, book 2, folio 116 in Burton's edition.

[8917] Editor. Panthea belongs to Xenophon's Cyropaedia; Lucian's Images discusses the power of verbal portraits. Castilio is Baldassare Castiglione. The precise early editions behind both quotations remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
or by reading of a letter; for there is a grace commeth from hearing, [8918]as a moral Philosopher informeth us, as well as from sight, and the species of love are received into the phantasie by relation alone; [8919]Ut cupere ab aspectu, sic velle ab auditu, both senses affect. Interdum & absentes amamus, sometimes we love those that are absent, saith Philostratus, and gives instance in his friend Athenodorus, that lov'd a maid at Corinth whom he never saw; non oculi sed mens videt, We see with the eyes of our understanding.	Or it may happen through reading a letter: for, as a moral philosopher tells us, charm comes through hearing as well as sight, and images of love enter the imagination through a description alone. "As desire comes from seeing, so longing comes from hearing": both senses move us. "Sometimes we love those who are absent," says Philostratus. He gives the example of his friend Athenodorus, who loved a girl at Corinth whom he had never seen: "It is the mind that sees, not the eyes." We see with the eyes of our understanding.[8920]
But the most familiar and usual cause of Love, is that which comes by sight, which conveys those admirable rayes of beauty and pleasing graces to the heart. Plotinus derives love from sight, ἔρως quasi ὅρασις,	But the most familiar and usual cause of love is what comes through sight, which carries those wonderful rays of beauty and pleasing graces to the heart. Plotinus derives the word for love from the word for sight: eros, as if from horasis.[8921]
[8922]Si nescis, oculi sunt in amore duces,	In case you do not know, the eyes are our guides in love.[8923]

[8918] Burton. Printed page 452, p: "Gratia venit ab auditu æque ac visu, & species amoris in phantasiam recipiunt sola relatione. Picolomineus grad. 8. c. 38." "Charm comes through hearing as well as sight, and they receive images of love into the imagination through a description alone." Piccolomini, degree 8, chapter 38. The citation continues across the foot of the page.

[8919] Burton. Printed page 452, dagger: "Lips. cent. 2. epist. 22. Beauties Encomions." Lipsius, second century of letters, letter 22; "praises of beauty."

[8920] Editor. "Species" means the images or representations received by the imagination, not biological species. The passage extends the argument from eyesight to imagined beauty conveyed by language. Philostratus's exact letter remains to be identified.

[8921] Editor. Plotinus, Enneads 3.5.3, associates eros, love, with horasis, sight. His immediate subject is divine Love arising from the Soul's contemplation; Burton applies the association to bodily sight. This is a philosophical etymology, not an established linguistic derivation. The Greek text and Burton's Latin intermediary remain for collation.

[8922] Burton. Printed page 452, r: "Propert." Propertius, Elegies 2.15.12.

[8923] Editor. Propertius, Elegies 2.15.12. The Latin line is translated separately from Burton's following English elaboration.

Original text 1651	Modern English
the eys are the harbingers of love, and the first step of love is sight, as [8924]Lilius Giraldus proves at large, hist. deor. syntag. 13. they as two sluices let in the influences of that divine, powerful, soul-ravishing, and captivating beauty, which, as [8925]one saith, is sharper then any dart or needle, wounds deeper into the heart; and opens a gap through our eyes to that lovely wound, which pierceth the soul it self (Eccles. 18.) Through it love is kindled like a fire.	The eyes are love's forerunners, and the first step in love is sight, as Lilio Giraldi demonstrates at length in his History of the Gods, treatise 13. Like two sluices, they admit the influences of that divine, powerful, soul-enrapturing and captivating beauty which, as one writer says, "is sharper than any dart or needle, wounds the heart more deeply, and opens a passage through our eyes for that lovely wound which pierces the soul itself." "Through it love is kindled like a fire" (Eccles. 18).[8926]
Source page 453 This amazing, confounding, admirable, amiable Beauty, [8927]then which in all Natures treasure (saith Isocrates) there is nothing so majestical and sacred, nothing so divine, lovely, pretious, 'tis natures Crown, gold and glory; bonum si non summum, de summis tamen non infrequenter triumphans, whose power hence may be discerned; we contemn and abhor generally such things as are foul and ugly to behold, accompt them filthy, but love and covet that which is fair.	This astonishing, bewildering, wonderful, lovely beauty—"than which," says Isocrates, "there is nothing in all nature's treasury more majestic and sacred, more divine, lovely or precious"—is nature's crown, gold and glory: "a good which, if not the highest, nevertheless often triumphs over the highest." We can recognize its power from this: in general we despise and abhor things that are foul and ugly to look at, consider them filthy, but love and covet what is beautiful.[8928]

[8924] Burton. Printed page 452, dagger: "Amoris primum gradum visus habet, ut aspiciat rem amatam." "Sight has the first place in love, so that one may look upon the beloved object."

[8925] Burton. Printed page 452, t: "Achilles Tatius lib. 1. Forma telo quovis acutior ad inferendum vulnus, perq; oculos amatorio vulneri aditum patefaciens in animum penetrat." "Beauty, sharper than any weapon for inflicting a wound, opens a passage through the eyes for love's wound and penetrates the soul." Achilles Tatius, book 1.

[8926] Editor. "Sluices" are channels or gates admitting a flow; the eyes admit beauty's influence. The scriptural wording corresponds to Ecclesiasticus (Sirach) 9:8, not the printed "Eccles. 18." That reference is retained for transparency.

[8927] Burton. Printed page 453, u: "In totâ rerum natura nihil forma divinius, nihil augustius, nihil pretiosius, cujus vires hinc facile intelliguntur, &c." "In all nature nothing is more divine, more majestic or more precious than beauty; its power is readily understood from this," and so forth.

[8928] Editor. Compare Isocrates, Helen 54–57, which praises beauty's exceptional status and its power to elicit willing service. Burton's Latin interjection qualifies beauty's rank even as it celebrates its force.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis [8929]beauty in all things, which pleaseth and allureth us, a fair hawk, a fine garment, a goodly building, a fair house, &c. That Persian Xerxes when he destroyed all those Temples of the Gods in Greece, caused that of Diana, in integrum servari, to be spared alone for that excellent beauty and magnificence of it. Inanimate beauty can so command.	It is beauty in everything that pleases and attracts us: a handsome hawk, a fine garment, a magnificent building, a beautiful house, and so on. When Xerxes the Persian destroyed all those temples of the gods in Greece, he ordered Diana's alone "to be preserved intact," because of its outstanding beauty and magnificence. Even inanimate beauty can exercise such authority.[8930]
'Tis that which Painters, Artificers, Orators, all aym at, as Eriximachus the Physitian in Plato contends, [8931]It was beauty first that ministred occasion to art, to find out the knowledge of carving, painting, building, to find out models, perspectives, rich furnitures, and so many rare inventions.	It is what painters, craftsmen and orators all aim at. As Eryximachus the physician argues in Plato, "Beauty first gave art the occasion to discover the techniques of carving, painting and building; to devise models, perspective, rich furnishings and so many remarkable inventions."[8932]
Whiteness in the Lilly, red in the Rose, purple in the Violet, a lustre in all things without life, the cleer light of the Moon, the bright beams of the Sun, splendor of Gold, purple, sparkling Diamond, the excellent feature of the Horse, the majesty of the Lion, the colour of Birds, Peacocks tails, the silver scales of Fish, we behold with singular delight and admiration.	The whiteness of the lily, the red of the rose, the purple of the violet, the lustre of lifeless things, the moon's clear light, the sun's bright beams, the splendour of gold, purple and sparkling diamond, the horse's fine form, the lion's majesty, the colours of birds, peacocks' tails and the silver scales of fish: we look on these with exceptional delight and admiration.

[8929] Burton. Printed page 453, dagger: "Christ. Fonseca." Cristóbal de Fonseca; the precise work and passage remain to be collated.

[8930] Editor. This is Burton's historical report, cited generally to Fonseca. The identity of the temple and the accuracy of the Xerxes anecdote remain unverified.

[8931] Burton. Printed page 453, x: "S. L." Printed abbreviation retained; its expansion is uncertain.

[8932] Editor. Eryximachus speaks in Plato's Symposium. Burton's wide-ranging account of the arts is retained as his formulation; the exact Platonic or intermediary passage has not yet been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8933]And which is rich in plants, delightful in flowers, wonderful in wild beasts, but most glorious in men, doth make us affect and earnestly desire it, as when we hear any sweet harmony, an eloquent tongue, see any excellent quality, curious work of man, elaborate art, or ought that is exquisite, there ariseth instantly in us a longing for the same. We love such men, but most part for comeliness of person; we call them Gods and Goddesses, divine, serene, happy, &c.	And beauty, "which is abundant in plants, delightful in flowers, wonderful in wild beasts, but most glorious in human beings," makes us love and earnestly desire it. Just as, when we hear sweet harmony or an eloquent voice, or see some excellent quality, an ingenious human work, skilful art or anything exquisite, a longing for it immediately arises in us. We love such people, but chiefly for their good looks; we call them gods and goddesses, divine, serene, blessed, and so on.[8934]
And of all mortal men they alone ([8935]Calcagninus holds) are free from calumny; qui divitiis, magistratu & gloriâ florent, injuriâ lacessimus, we back-bite, wrong, hate renowned, rich and happy men, we repine at their felicity, they are undeserving we think, fortune is a step-mother to us, a parent to them.	And of all mortal people, they alone, Calcagnini maintains, are free from slander. "We attack with injustice those who flourish in wealth, office and glory": we backbite, wrong and hate famous, rich and fortunate people; we resent their happiness and think they do not deserve it. Fortune is a stepmother to us, a parent to them.[8936]

[8933] Burton. Printed page 453, y: "Bruys prob. 11. de forma è Luciano." Bruys, problem 11, on beauty, from Lucian; exact edition and passage remain to be identified.

[8934] Editor. "Curious" means skilfully or ingeniously made. "Feature" in the preceding passage means bodily form, not a single facial characteristic. The marginal Bruys reference is unresolved.

[8935] Burton. Printed page 453, asterisk: "Lib. de calumnia. Formosi Calumniæ vacant; dolemus alios meliore loco positos, fortunam nobis novercam illis &c." "Book on Slander. The beautiful are free from slander; we resent others being placed in a better position, fortune being a stepmother to us, to them," and so forth.

[8936] Editor. Celio Calcagnini is cited for a work on slander. Fortune as "stepmother" draws on the conventional image of a harsh or partial parent; it is Burton's metaphor.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We envy (saith [8937]Isocrates) wise, just, honest men, except with mutual offices and kindnesses, some good turn or other, they extort this love from us; only fair persons we love at first sight, desire their acquaintance, and adore them as so many Gods: we had rather serve them then command others, and account our selves the more beholding to them, the more service they enjoyn us: though they be otherwise vitious, unhonest, we love them, favour them, and are ready to do them any good office for their [8938]beauties sake, though they have no other good quality beside.	"We envy wise, just and honourable people," says Isocrates, "unless, by reciprocal services and kindnesses—some good turn or other—they force this love from us. Only beautiful people do we love at first sight, seek to know and adore like gods. We would rather serve them than command others, and consider ourselves the more indebted to them, the more service they demand of us." Even if they are otherwise vicious and dishonourable, we love them, favour them and stand ready to do them any kindness for their beauty's sake, although they have no other good quality.[8939]
Dic igitur ô formose adolescens (as that eloquent Phavorinus breaks out in [8940]Stobeus) dic Autiloque, suavius nectare loqueris; dic ô Telemache, vehementius Ulysse dicis; dic Alcibiades utcunq; ebrius, libentius tibi licet ebrio auscultabimus.	"Speak, then, handsome youth," as the eloquent Favorinus exclaims in Stobaeus: "Speak, Autilochus: your words are sweeter than nectar. Speak, Telemachus: you speak more forcefully than Ulysses. Speak, Alcibiades, however drunk you are: even drunk, we shall listen to you more gladly."[8941]

[8937] Burton. Printed page 453, z: "Invidemus sapientibus, justis, nisi beneficiis assidue amorem extorquent; solos formosos amamus & primo velut aspectu benevolentia conjungimur, & eos tanquam Deos colimus, libentius iis servimus quam aliis imperamus, majoremq; &c." "We envy the wise and just unless they continually force our affection by benefits. We love only the beautiful, feel goodwill towards them at first sight, honour them like gods, and serve them more willingly than we command others; and greater," and so forth.

[8938] Burton. Printed page 453, a: "Formæ majestatem Barbari verentur, nec alii majores quam quos eximia forma natura donata est, Herod. lib. 5. Curtius 6. Arist. Polit." "Barbarians revere the majesty of beauty; none are greater than those whom nature has endowed with exceptional beauty." Herodotus, book 5; Curtius, book 6; Aristotle, Politics. The printed Latin is grammatically irregular.

[8939] Editor. Isocrates, Helen 56–57, provides the contrast between envy of other forms of excellence and willing service to beauty. Burton goes on to sharpen the claim with his own account of morally objectionable people.

[8940] Burton. Printed page 453, dagger: "Serm. 63." Stobaeus, discourse 63 in Burton's numbering.

[8941] Editor. Favorinus is quoted through Stobaeus. The 1651 Latin prints Autiloque, while Burton's English gives Antiloquus; the two forms are retained rather than silently harmonized. Exact identification and collation remain pending.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Speak fair youth, speak Antiloquus, thy words are sweeter then Nectar, speak O Telemachus, thou art more powerful then Ulysses, speak Alcibiades though drunk, we will willingly hear thee as thou art.	Speak, handsome youth; speak, Antiloquus: your words are sweeter than nectar. Speak, Telemachus: you are more powerful than Ulysses. Speak, Alcibiades, though drunk: we will gladly hear you as you are.[8942]
Source page 453–454 Faults in such are no faults: For when the said [8943]Alcibiades had stoln Anytus his gold and silver plate, he was so far from prosecuting so foul a fact (though every man else condemned his impudence, and insolency) that he wished it had been more, and much better (he loved him dearly) for his sweet sake.	In such people, faults are no faults. For when this same Alcibiades stole Anytus's gold and silver plate, Anytus was so far from prosecuting such a shameful deed—though everyone else condemned the impudence and insolence—that he wished it had been more, and much better, for his darling's sake: he loved him dearly.[8944]
Source page 454 No worth is eminent in such lovely persons, all imperfections hid; non enim facile de his quos plurimum diligimus, turpitudinem suspicamur, for hearing, sight, touch, &c. our mind and all our senses are captivated, omnes sensus formosus delectat.	No worth stands out in such lovely people; every imperfection is hidden. "For we do not readily suspect ugliness in those whom we love most." Hearing, sight, touch and the rest—our mind and all our senses are captivated: "A beautiful person delights every sense."[8945]

[8942] Editor. Burton supplies his own English version after the Latin. Both are retained in the modern text, as elsewhere in this edition; the repetition belongs to Burton's composition.

[8943] Burton. Printed page 453, unmarked marginal lines: "Plutarch. vit. ejus. Brisonius Strabo." Plutarch, his Life [of Alcibiades]; Brissonius; Strabo. These lines are reproduced together as printed; their individual attachment is not specified.

[8944] Editor. Plutarch, Alcibiades 4.4–5, says that Anytus praised him for taking only half the vessels when he could have taken all. Burton turns that indulgence into a wish that the taking had been greater.

[8945] Editor. The source reads "No worth is eminent," a puzzling phrase retained here. It may mean that other merit is overshadowed by beauty; the following clauses plainly say that faults escape notice. No unverified emendation has been introduced.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many men have been preferred for their person alone, chosen Kings, as amongst the Indians, Persians, Æthiopians of old; the properest man of person the country could afford, was elected their Soveraign Lord; Gratior est pulchro veniens è corpore virtus, and so have many other nations thought and done, as [8946]Curtius observes; Ingens enim in corporis majestate veneratio est, for there is a majestical presence in such men;	Many men have been advanced for their looks alone, and chosen as kings, as among the Indians, Persians and Ethiopians of old. The handsomest man the country could offer was elected its sovereign lord: "Virtue is more pleasing when it comes from a beautiful body." Many other nations have thought and acted in the same way, as Curtius observes: "For great reverence attaches to bodily majesty." Such men have a majestic presence.[8947]
and so far was beauty adored amongst them, that no man was thought fit to reign, that was not in all parts compleat and supereminent. Agis King of Lacedemon had like to have been deposed, because he married a little wife; they would not have their royal issue degenerate.	So deeply did they adore beauty that no man was thought fit to reign unless he was perfect and outstanding in every part. Agis, king of Sparta, nearly lost his throne because he married a short woman: they would not have their royal offspring deteriorate.[8948]

[8946] Burton. Printed page 454, dagger: "Lib. 5. magnorumq; operum non alios capaces putant quam quos eximiâ specie natura donavit." "Book 5. They consider no one capable of great deeds except those whom nature has endowed with exceptional beauty."

[8947] Editor. The Latin adapts Virgil, Aeneid 5.344, changing the opening and in corpore to è corpore. Strabo, Geography 17.2.3, gives beauty among several qualifications for Ethiopian kings, alongside cattle-breeding, courage and wealth. This may explain the nearby unmarked Strabo citation, but its attachment remains uncertain. It does not establish Burton's broader claim about Indians and Persians.

[8948] Editor. Compare Plutarch, Agesilaus 2.3: Archidamus, not Agis, is fined for marrying a short woman. Burton's different name and threatened deposition are preserved and should not be read as a verified historical account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Who would ever have thought that Adrian the fourth, an English Monk's bastard (as [8949]Papirius Massovius writes in his life) inops a suis relictus, squalidus & miser, a poor forsaken child should ever come to be Pope of Rome? But why was it? Erat acri ingenio, facundiâ expeditâ, eleganti corpore, facieque lætâ ac hilari, (as he follows it out of [8950]Nubrigensis, for he plows with his heifer,)	Who would ever have thought that Adrian IV, an English monk's bastard—as Papirius Masson writes in his life—"destitute, abandoned by his own family, dirty and wretched," a poor forsaken child, would ever become pope of Rome? But why did it happen? "He had a keen intellect, ready eloquence, a fine body and a cheerful, pleasant face"—as Masson goes on to say, taking it from William of Newburgh, for he ploughs with another man's heifer.[8951]
he was wise, learned, eloquent, of a pleasant, a promising countenance, a goodly proper man; he had, in a word, a winning look of his own, and that carryed it, for that he was especially advanced. So Saul was a goodly person and a fair. Maximinus elected Emperour, &c.	He was wise, learned and eloquent, with a pleasant, promising expression: a fine, handsome man. In a word, he had a winning look of his own, and that won the day: it was chiefly for that that he was advanced. So "Saul was a fine and handsome person"; Maximinus was elected emperor; and so on.[8952]
Branchus the son of Apollo, whom he begot of Jance, Sucrons daughter (saith Lactantius) when he kept King Admetus heards in Thessaly, now grown a man, was an earnest suiter to his mother to know his father; the Nymph denyed him, because Apollo had conjured her to the contrary; yet overcome by his importunity at last she sent him to his father;	Branchus was Apollo's son by Jance, Sucron's daughter, says Lactantius, conceived when Apollo kept King Admetus's herds in Thessaly. Now grown to manhood, he begged his mother to tell him who his father was. The nymph refused, because Apollo had bound her by oath not to reveal it; but his persistence overcame her, and at last she sent him to his father.[8953]

[8949] Burton. Printed page 454, asterisk: "Lib. de vitis Pontificum. Rom." Book on the Lives of the Roman Pontiffs.

[8950] Burton. Printed page 454, asterisk: "Lib. 2. cap. 6." William of Newburgh, book 2, chapter 6.

[8951] Editor. Papirius Massovius is Jean Papire Masson; Nubrigensis is William of Newburgh. "Ploughing with his heifer" means borrowing another's material, a biblical proverbial allusion. Burton's allegation about Adrian's birth remains a reported claim requiring collation.

[8952] Editor. Saul's appearance and height are described in 1 Samuel 9:2 and 10:23–24. The latter passage also explicitly attributes his selection to the Lord; Burton stresses appearance as the cause of advancement. "Advanced" means promoted. His preceding account of Adrian also includes learning and eloquence. The Maximinus reference remains uncollated.

[8953] Editor. The mythological narrative and the names Jance and Sucron are retained as printed. Burton names Lactantius without supplying a precise work or passage; identification remains open.

Original text 1651	Modern English
when he came into Apollo's presence, malas Dei reverenter osculatus, he carried himself so well, and was so fair a yong man, that Apollo was infinitely taken with the beauty of his person, he could scarce look off him, and said he was worthy of such parents, gave him a crown of gold, the spirit of Divination, and in conclusion, made him a Demi-god.	When he entered Apollo's presence, "reverently kissing the god's cheeks," he behaved so well and was so handsome a young man that Apollo was utterly captivated by his beauty. He could scarcely take his eyes off him, said that he was worthy of such parents, gave him a golden crown and the gift of prophecy, and finally made him a demigod.
O vis superba formæ, a Goddess beauty is, whom the very Gods adore, nam pulchros dii amant; she is Amoris domina, loves harbinger, loves loadstone, a witch, a charm, &c. Beauty is a dowre of it self, a sufficient patrimony, an ample commendation, an accurate epistle, as [8954]Lucian, [8955]Apuleius, Tiraquellus, and some others conclude.	O proud power of beauty! Beauty is a goddess whom the very gods adore, "for the gods love the beautiful." She is "the mistress of love," love's forerunner, love's lodestone, a witch, a charm, and so on. Beauty is a dowry in itself, a sufficient inheritance, a generous recommendation, a carefully written letter—as Lucian, Apuleius, Tiraqueau and others conclude.[8956]
Imperio digna forma, Beauty deserves a Kingdome, saith Abulensis, paradox. 2. cap. 110. immortality; and [8957]more have got this honour and eternity for their beauty, then for all other vertues besides: and such as are fair, are worthy to be honoured of God and men. That Idalian Ganymedes was therefore fetched by Jupiter into Heaven, Hephestion dear to Alexander, Antinous to Adrian.	"Beauty worthy of command": beauty deserves a kingdom, says Abulensis, Paradox 2, chapter 110 —and immortality. "More people have gained this honour and eternal life for their beauty than for all other virtues together"; and those who are beautiful "deserve to be honoured by God and men." For this reason Jupiter carried that Idalian Ganymede into heaven; Hephaestion was dear to Alexander, and Antinous to Hadrian.[8958]

[8954] Burton. Printed page 454, b: "Dial. amorum c. 2. de magia. Lib. 2 connub. cap. 27. Virgo formosa etsi oppidò pauper, abundè est dotata." "Dialogue of Love; chapter 2, On Magic; book 2, On Marriage, chapter 27. A beautiful maiden, even if extremely poor, is richly endowed." The citation sequence is reproduced without silently redistributing its references.

[8955] Burton. Printed page 454, c: "Isocrates plures ob formam immortalitatem adepti sunt quam ob reliquas omnes virtutes." "Isocrates: more people have gained immortality for beauty than for all the other virtues."

[8956] Editor. A lodestone is a natural magnet. A "dowry" and "patrimony" are material assets; beauty is imagined as their substitute. The "epistle" is a letter of recommendation. Tiraquellus is André Tiraqueau.

[8957] Burton. Printed page 454, d: "Lucian Tom. 4. Charidemo: Qui pulchri, merito apud Deos & apud homines honore affecti. Muta commentatio, quavis epistolâ ad commendandum efficacior." "Lucian, volume 4, Charidemus: the beautiful are deservedly honoured among gods and men. A silent commentary, more effective in recommending someone than any letter."

[8958] Editor. Abulensis is Alfonso de Madrigal, known as El Tostado. "Idalian" is retained as printed rather than silently changed to "Idaean." The examples mix divine abduction, political companionship and imperial favour.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 454–455 Plato calls beauty for that cause a priviledge of Nature, Naturæ gaudentis opus, natures master-piece, a dumb comment; Theophrastus, a silent fraud; still rhetorick Carneades, that perswades without speech, a kingdome without a guard, because beautiful persons command as so many Captains; Socrates, a tyranny, which tyrannizeth over tyrants themselves; which made Diogenes belike call proper women Queens, quod facerent homines quæ præciperent, because men were so obedient to their commands.	For that reason Plato calls beauty a privilege of nature, “the work of nature rejoicing,” nature’s masterpiece, a wordless commentary; Theophrastus, a silent fraud; Carneades, silent rhetoric that persuades without speech, a kingdom without a guard, because beautiful people command like so many captains; Socrates, a tyranny “that tyrannizes over tyrants themselves.” This presumably made Diogenes call handsome women queens, “because men did whatever they ordered”: men were so obedient to their commands.[8959]
Source page 455 They will adore, cringe, complement and bow to a common wench (if she be fair) as if she were a noble woman, a Countess, a Queen or a goddess. Those intemperate yong men of Greece, erected at Delphos a golden image with infinite cost, to the eternal memory of Phryne the curtizan, as Ælian relates, for she was a most beautiful woman, in so much saith [8960]Atheneus, that Apelles and Praxitiles drew Venus picture from her.	They will worship, cringe, pay compliments and bow to a common girl, if she is beautiful, as though she were a noblewoman, a countess, a queen or a goddess. Those unrestrained young men of Greece erected a golden statue at Delphi, at immense expense, to preserve the memory of Phryne the courtesan for ever, as Aelian relates. She was so beautiful, Athenaeus says, that Apelles and Praxiteles made their likenesses of Venus from her.[8961]

[8959] Editor. “Still rhetoric” means silent eloquence. Burton strings together definitions attributed to different philosophers; exact attribution and punctuation require comparison with the intermediary collections he used.

[8960] Burton. Printed page 455, dagger: “Lib 9. Var. hist. tanta formæ elegantia ut ab ea nuda &c.” “Book 9, Various History: such elegance of form that from her naked,” and so forth. This title points to Aelian, despite the body’s adjacent name Athenaeus; see the Editor note.

[8961] Editor. The margin names book 9 of Various History, Aelian’s work, although the body names Athenaeus. Phryne’s association with Apelles and Praxiteles also appears in Athenaeus’s account of her. The precise relation of Burton’s citations remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thus young men will adore and honour beauty; Nay Kings themselves I say will do it, and voluntarily submit their soveraignty to a lovely woman. Wine is strong, Kings are strong, but a woman strongest, 1 Esd. 4. 10. as Zerobabel proved at large to King Darius, his Princes and Noblemen.	Thus young men worship and honour beauty. Indeed, kings themselves will do it, I say, and willingly submit their sovereignty to a lovely woman. "Wine is strong, kings are strong, but a woman is strongest," 1 Esdras 4:10, as Zerubbabel proved at length to King Darius, his princes and nobles.[8962]
Kings sit still and command Sea and Land, &c. all pay tribute to the King; but women make Kings pay tribute, and have dominion over them. When they have got gold and silver, they submit all to a beautiful woman, give themselves wholly to her, gape and gaze on her, and all men desire her more then gold or silver, or any pretious thing: they will leave father and mother, and venture their lives for her, labour and travel to get, and bring all their gains to women, steal, fight and spoil for their Mistress sakes. And no King so strong, but a fair woman is stronger then he is.	Kings sit at ease and command sea and land, and so forth; everyone pays tribute to the king. But women make kings pay tribute and rule over them. When men have acquired gold and silver, they surrender it all to a beautiful woman, give themselves wholly to her, and gape and gaze at her. All men desire her more than gold, silver or any precious thing. They will leave father and mother and risk their lives for her; labour and travel to earn money and bring all their gains to women; steal, fight and plunder for their mistresses' sake. No king is so strong that a beautiful woman is not stronger than he.[8963]
All things (as he proceeds) fear to [8964]touch the King; yet I saw him and Apame his concubine, the daughter of the famous Bartacus sitting on the right hand of the King, and she took the crown off his head, and put it on her own, and stroke him with her left hand; yet the King gaped and gazed on her, and when she laughed he laughed, and when she was angry he flattered to be reconciled to her.	"Everyone," he continues, "is afraid to touch the king; yet I saw him with Apame his concubine, the daughter of the famous Bartacus, sitting at the king's right hand. She took the crown from his head, put it on her own and struck him with her left hand. Yet the king gaped and gazed at her; when she laughed, he laughed; and when she was angry, he flattered her to regain her favour."[8965]

[8962] Editor. The contest about wine, kings, women and truth is in 1 Esdras 3–4. Zerubbabel's speech begins at 4:13, rather than the printed 4:10; Burton condenses its argument.

[8963] Editor. The passage paraphrases 1 Esdras 4:14–27, combining selected details. "Travel" can also carry the older sense of toil; both labour and journeying are present in the biblical account.

[8964] Burton. Printed page 455, dagger: "Esdras. 4.29." 1 Esdras 4:29; the account continues through verse 31.

[8965] Editor. 1 Esdras 4:28–31. "Stroke" is the past tense of strike; it does not mean that Apame stroked or caressed the king. Burton ends before Zerubbabel's declaration that truth surpasses all these powers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So beauty commands even Kings themselves; nay whole armies and kingdomes are captivated together with their Kings: [8966]Forma vincit armatos, ferrum pulchritudo captivat; vincentur specie, qui non vincentur prælio.	So beauty commands even kings themselves; indeed, whole armies and kingdoms are taken captive along with their kings. “Beauty conquers armed men; beauty takes the sword captive. Those who cannot be conquered in battle will be conquered by looks.”
And ’tis a great matter saith [8967]Xenophon, and of which all fair persons may worthily brag, that a strong man must labour for his living if he will have ought, a valiant man must fight and endanger himself for it, a wise man speak, shew himself and toil; but a fair and beautiful person doth all with ease, he compasseth his desire without any pains taking:	And it is no small thing, says Xenophon, “and something of which all beautiful people may rightly boast, that a strong man must labour for his living if he is to have anything, a brave man must fight and risk his life for it, and a wise man must speak, display his abilities and toil; but a handsome and beautiful person does it all with ease and obtains what he desires without taking any trouble.”[8968]

[8966] Burton. Printed page 455, y: “Origen hom. 23. in Numb. In ipsos tyrannos tyrannidem exercet.” “Origen, homily 23 on Numbers. It exercises tyranny over tyrants themselves.” Printed marker y retained.

[8967] Burton. Printed page 455, k: “Illud certe magnum ob quod gloriari possunt formosi, quod robustis necessarium sit laborare, fortem periculis se objicere, sapientem &c.” “That is certainly a great thing of which beautiful people can boast: the strong must labour, the brave expose themselves to dangers, the wise,” and so forth.

[8968] Editor. The speaker is Critobulus in Xenophon’s Symposium 4.13, boasting of beauty’s advantages. Burton names the author rather than the dramatic speaker. The precise Latin version he used remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
God and men, Heaven and Earth conspire to honour him; every one pities him above other, if he be in need, [8969]and all the world is willing to do him good. [8970]Chariclea fell into the hands of Pyrats, but when all the rest were put to the edge of the sword, she alone was preserved for her person. [8971]When Constantinople was sacked by the Turk, Irene escaped, and was so far from being made a captive, that she even captivated the grand Senior himself.	God and men, heaven and earth combine to honour him. Everyone pities him more than others if he is in need, and the whole world is willing to help him. Chariclea fell into the hands of pirates, but when all the others were put to the sword, she alone was spared for her beauty. When Constantinople was sacked by the Turk, Irene escaped, and so far from being made a captive, she captivated the Grand Signor himself.[8972]
So did Rosamond insult over King Henry the second.	So Rosamond triumphed over King Henry II.[8973]

[8969] Burton. Printed page 455, l: “Majorem vim habet ad commendandum forma, quam accurate scripta epistola. Arist.” “Beauty has greater power to recommend someone than a carefully written letter.” Aristotle.

[8970] Burton. Printed page 455, m: “Heliodor. lib. 1.” Heliodorus, Aethiopica, book 1.

[8971] Burton. Printed page 455, n: “Knowles. hist. Turcica.” Richard Knolles, The General History of the Turks; Burton’s spelling retained.

[8972] Editor. Chariclea is the heroine of Heliodorus’s Aethiopica. The Irene story is cited to Knolles; “Grand Signor” denotes the Ottoman sultan. Burton’s account here is an illustrative narrative, not independent confirmation of the event.

[8973] Editor. “Insult over” means triumph or exult over. Burton compresses and alters Samuel Daniel’s Complaint of Rosamond: the consulted text has a seven-line stanza beginning with her power over a king, not Burton’s four-line excerpt.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [8974]I was so fair an object, Whom fortune made my King, my love made subject, He found by proof the priviledge of beauty, That it had power to countermand all duty.	—— I was so fair a sight: The man whom fortune made my king, my love made subject. He learned through experience the privilege of beauty: It had the power to override all duty.
It captivates the very Gods themselves, Morosiora numina,	It takes even the gods themselves captive, those more exacting divinities:
[8975]—— Deus ipse deorum Factus ob hanc formam bos, equus imber, olor.	—— The very god of gods, For beauty's sake, became bull, horse, shower and swan.[8976]
Source page 456 And those mali genii are taken with it, as [8977]I have already proved. Formosam Barbari verentur, & ad aspectum pulchrum immanis animus mansuescit. (Heliodor. lib. 5.) The Barbarians stand in awe of a fair woman, and at a beautiful aspect a fierce spirit is pacified.	And those evil spirits are captivated by it, as I have already shown. "Barbarians revere a beautiful woman, and at a beautiful sight a savage spirit grows gentle" (Heliodorus, book 5). Barbarians stand in awe of a beautiful woman, and a fierce spirit is calmed by a lovely face.[8978]

[8974] Burton. Printed page 455, dagger: "Daniel in complaint of Rosamond." Samuel Daniel, The Complaint of Rosamond; Burton's excerpt compresses and changes the verse.

[8975] Burton. Printed page 455, asterisk: "Stroza filius Epig." Strozzi the younger, Epigrams; the precise poem remains to be located.

[8976] Editor. The verse concerns the supreme god's transformations in pursuit of beauty. Burton cites Strozzi the younger without a poem number; the list and attribution remain to be collated. "Morosiora" means more exacting or difficult to please.

[8977] Burton. Printed page 456, dagger: "Sect. 2. Mem. 1. Sub. 1." A backward reference to Section 2, Member 1, Subsection 1 of this partition.

[8978] Editor. "Genii" here means spirits. Burton returns to his earlier discussion of spiritual beings in love. "Barbarians" is the inherited Greek and Roman category in these quotations, not an editorial classification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For when as Troy was taken, and the wars ended, (as Clemens [8979]Alexandrinus quotes out of Euripides) angry Menelaus with rage and fury armed, came with his sword drawn, to have killed Helena with his own hands, as being the sole cause of all those wars and miseries: but when he saw her fair face, as one amazed at her divine beauty, he let his weapon fall, and embraced her besides, he had no power to strike so sweet a creature.	For when Troy had fallen and the wars were over, as Clement of Alexandria quotes from Euripides, angry Menelaus, armed with rage and fury, came with his sword drawn to kill Helen with his own hands, since she had been the sole cause of all those wars and miseries. But when he saw her beautiful face, astonished by her divine beauty, he let his weapon fall and even embraced her: he could not bring himself to strike so lovely a creature.[8980]
Ergo hebetantur enses pulchritudine, the edge of a sharp sword (as the saying is) is dulled with a beautiful aspect, and severity it self is overcome. Hiperides the orator, when Phryne his client was accused at Athens for her lewdness, used no other defence in her cause, but tearing her upper garment, disclosed her naked breast to the Judges, with which comeliness of body and amiable gesture they were so moved and astonished, that they did acquit her forthwith, and let her go.	"Thus swords are blunted by beauty": the edge of a sharp sword, as the saying goes, is dulled by a beautiful face, and severity itself is overcome. When the orator Hyperides' client Phryne was accused at Athens of lewd behaviour, he used no other defence of her case: he tore her upper garment and exposed her bare breast to the judges. Her bodily beauty and lovely bearing so moved and astonished them that they immediately acquitted her and let her go.[8981]

[8979] Burton. Printed page 456, o: "Stromatum l. post captam Trojam cum impetu ferretur, ad occidendam Helenam, stupore adeo pulchritudinis correptus ut ferrum excideret, &c." "Stromata, book [number not supplied]: after Troy's capture, as he rushed to kill Helen, he was so seized with astonishment at her beauty that his sword fell," and so forth.

[8980] Editor. Burton reports Euripides through Clement of Alexandria, not from a specified direct reading of the play. The margin leaves the book number after Stromatum incomplete; the precise passage remains to be located.

[8981] Editor. Athenaeus, Deipnosophists 13.59 (590d–e), says Hypereides first spoke unsuccessfully, then exposed Phryne's breast and appealed to pity and fear of condemning a priestess of Aphrodite. Burton's "no other defence" compresses this sequence. His description of the charge as lewdness and his intermediary remain unverified; the narrative is preserved as he tells it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
O noble piece of Justice, mine author exclaims, and who is he that would not rather lose his seat and robes, forfeit his office, then give sentence against the majesty of beauty? Such prerogatives have fair persons, and they alone are free from danger. Parthenopæus was so lovely and fair, that when he fought in the Theban wars, if his face had been by chance bare, no enemy would offer to strike or hurt him, such immunities hath beauty.	O noble piece of justice, my author exclaims! Who would not rather lose his seat and robes, forfeit his office, than pass sentence against the majesty of beauty? Beautiful people enjoy such privileges, and they alone are free from danger. Parthenopaeus was so lovely and handsome that, when he fought in the Theban wars, if his face happened to be uncovered, no enemy would attempt to strike or hurt him. Such immunity beauty enjoys.[8982]
Beasts themselves are moved with it. Sinalda was a woman of such excellent feature, [8983]and a Queen, that when she was to be trodden on by wild horses for a punishment, the wild beasts stood in admiration of her person, (Saxo Grammaticus lib. 8. Dan. Hist.) and would not hurt her.	Even beasts are moved by it. Sinalda was a woman of such outstanding beauty, and a queen, that when she was condemned to be trampled by wild horses, “the wild beasts stood admiring her beauty and would not hurt her” (Saxo Grammaticus, History of the Danes, book 8).[8984]
Wherefore did that royal virgin in [8985]Apuleius when she fled from the theeves den, in a desart, make such an Apostrophe to her Asse on whom she rode: (for what knew she to the contrary but that he was an Asse?) Si me parentibus & proco formoso reddideris, quas tibi gratias, quos honores habebo, quos cibos exhibebo?	Why did that royal maiden in Apuleius, when she fled from the thieves’ den in a wilderness, address the ass on which she rode in this way—for how could she know he was anything but an ass? “If you restore me to my parents and my handsome bridegroom, what thanks shall I give you, what honours shall I pay you, what food shall I offer you?”[8986]

[8982] Editor. Parthenopaeus is a youthful warrior in the Theban cycle. The claim of immunity is rhetorical: Burton is accumulating exemplary stories about beauty, not offering a consistent historical demonstration.

[8983] Burton. Printed page 456, p: “Tantæ formæ fuit ut cum vincta loris, feris exposita foret; equorum calcibus obterenda, ipsis jumentis admirationi fuit; lædere noluerunt.” “She was so beautiful that, when bound with straps and exposed to wild beasts to be crushed by horses’ hooves, even the beasts admired her and refused to hurt her.”

[8984] Editor. Sinalda is Burton’s printed form of the name. The story is attributed to Saxo Grammaticus, book 8; the name, circumstances and passage remain to be collated.

[8985] Burton. Printed page 456, dagger: “Lib. 8. miles.” Book 8 of the Milesian tale; the quoted scene is actually in Apuleius, Metamorphoses 6.28–29.

[8986] Editor. The scene is Apuleius, Metamorphoses 6.28–29, not book 8 as in the margin. The ass is the transformed human narrator Lucius. The woman’s speech includes precisely the thanks, honours and food mentioned here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
She would comb him, dress him, feed him, and trick him every day her self, and he should work no more, toil no more, but rest and play, &c. And besides she would have a dainty picture drawn, in perpetual remembrance, a virgin riding upon an Asses back with this motto, Asino vectore regia virgo fugiens captivitatem; why said she all this? why did she make such promises to a dumb beast?	She would comb him, groom him, feed him and adorn him herself every day; he should work no more, toil no more, but rest and play, and so forth. Besides, she would have a fine picture painted as a lasting memorial: a maiden riding on an ass's back, with this inscription, "A royal maiden escaping captivity with an ass as her bearer." Why did she say all this? Why did she make such promises to a speechless beast?[8987]
But that she perceived the poor Asse to be taken with her beauty; for he did often obliquo collo pedes puellæ decoros basiare, kiss her feet as she rid, & ad delicatulas voculas tentabat adhinnire, offer to give consent as much as in him was to her delicate speeches, and besides he had some feeling as he conceived of her misery.	Because she perceived that the poor ass was captivated by her beauty. For he often "turned his neck to kiss the girl's lovely feet," kissing her feet as she rode, "and tried to bray in response to her sweet little words," attempting, as far as he could, to show his agreement with her tender speech. Besides, he thought he had some fellow feeling for her distress.[8988]
And why did Theagines horse in Heliodorus [8989]curvet, prance, and go so proudly, exultans alacriter & superbiens, &c. but that sure as mine author supposeth, he was in love with his master? dixisses ipsum equum pulchrum intelligere pulchram domini formam?	And why did Theagenes' horse in Heliodorus curvet, prance and move so proudly, "leaping eagerly and showing off," and so forth, unless surely, as my author supposes, it was in love with its master? "Would you not have said that the handsome horse itself understood the beauty of its master's form?"[8990]

[8987] Editor. "Trick" means dress or adorn. Apuleius 6.29 places virgo regia in the opposite order to Burton's regia virgo; both mean "royal maiden." The picture and inscription are part of her proposed reward.

[8988] Editor. Apuleius 6.28 gives both the kisses and the attempted answering bray. Burton repeats and interprets the episode through the ass's human consciousness; the modern version preserves that narrative complication.

[8989] Burton. Printed page 456, asterisk: "Æthiop. l. 3." Aethiopica, book 3.

[8990] Editor. "Curvet" means perform a prancing leap. The horse passage is assigned to book 3 of Heliodorus's Aethiopica; its exact text remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A fly lighted on [8991]Malthus cheek as he lay asleep; but why? Not to hurt him, as a parasite of his standing by well perceived, non ut pungeret sed ut oscularetur, but certainly to kiss him, as ravished with his divine looks.	A fly landed on Malthus's cheek as he lay asleep. But why? Not to hurt him, as a hanger-on standing beside him clearly understood: "not to sting him but to kiss him"—certainly to kiss him, enraptured by his divine looks.[8992]
Source page 456–457 Inanimate creatures I suppose, have a touch of this, when a drop of [8993]Psyches Candle fell on Cupids shoulder, I think sure it was to kiss it. When Venus ran to meet her rose-cheeked Adonis, as an elegant [8994]Poet of ours sets her out,	Even inanimate things, I suppose, have a touch of this. When a drop from Psyche's candle fell on Cupid's shoulder, surely, I think, it was to kiss it. When Venus ran to meet her rosy-cheeked Adonis, as an elegant poet of ours describes her,[8995]
Source page 457 —— the bushes in the way Some catch her neck, some kiss her face, Some twine about her legs to make her stay, And all did covet her for to embrace.	——the bushes in her path: Some catch her neck, some kiss her face, Some coil around her legs to make her stay, And all longed to embrace her.[8996]
Aer ipse amore inficitur, as Heliodorus holds, the ayr it self is in love: For when Hero plaid upon her Lute,	"The very air is infected with love," as Heliodorus maintains: the air itself is in love. For when Hero played her lute, [8991] Burton. Printed page 456, dagger: "Atheneus. lib. 8." Athenaeus, book 8. This citation has not yet been reconciled with the anecdote.

[8992] Editor. "Parasite" means a dependent flatterer or hanger-on. The anecdote satirizes flattery as well as celebrating beauty. Burton's printed Malthus and reference to Athenaeus, book 8, have not yet been securely identified.

[8993] Burton. Printed page 457, p: "Apuleius Aur. asino." Apuleius, The Golden Ass.

[8994] Burton. Printed page 457, dagger: "Shakespeare."

[8995] Editor. Apuleius, Metamorphoses 5.23, imagines that Psyche's lamp wished to touch and kiss Cupid, so that a drop of hot oil fell on his shoulder. Burton calls the lamp a candle. The modern version retains his object and his playful interpretation.

[8996] Editor. Shakespeare, Venus and Adonis 871–874. Burton compresses and alters the passage: Shakespeare has thigh where Burton gives legs, and describes Venus breaking away from the embrace. Burton's changed final line is retained and modernized, rather than replaced with Shakespeare's wording.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[8997]The wanton Air in twenty sweet forms danc't After her fingers ——	The playful air danced in twenty lovely shapes To the movement of her fingers——[8998]
and those lascivious winds staid Daphne when she fled from Apollo;	and those lustful winds held Daphne back as she fled from Apollo:
—— [8999]nudabant corpora venti, Obviaque adversas vibrabant flamina vestes.	——the winds laid bare her body, And the opposing gusts fluttered her clothes against her.[9000]
Boreas ventus loved Hyacinthus, and Orithya Ericthons daughter of Athens: vi rapuit, &c. he took her away by force, as she was playing with other wenches at Ilissus, and begat Zetes and Calais his two sons of her. That seas and waters are enamoured with this our beauty, is all out as likely as that of the air and winds; for when Leander swimmed in the Hellespont, Neptune with his Trident did beat down the waves, but	Boreas, the north wind, loved Hyacinthus, and Orithyia, Ericthon's daughter of Athens: "he carried her off by force," and so on. He abducted her as she was playing with other girls beside the Ilissus, and fathered his two sons, Zetes and Calais, by her. That seas and waters fall in love with our beauty is every bit as likely as the same claim about the air and winds. For when Leander swam in the Hellespont, Neptune beat down the waves with his trident, but[9001]
They still mounted up intending to have kiss'd him, And fell in drops like tears because they mist him.	They kept rising, intending to kiss him, And fell in drops like tears because they missed him.
The [9002]River Alpheus was in love with Arethusa, as she tells the tale herself,	The river Alpheus was in love with Arethusa, as she tells the story herself:

[8997] Burton. Printed page 457, dagger: "Marlow."

[8998] Editor. The lines occur in George Chapman's continuation of Hero and Leander, Fifth Sestiad 43–44. There, "her fingers" refers to personified Music accompanying a wedding procession. Burton changes And to The, cuts the second line short, and applies the image to Hero playing the lute. His Marlow attribution is preserved; the edition he used remains unidentified.

[8999] Burton. Printed page 457, asterisk: "Ov. Met. 1." Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.

[9000] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.527–528, during Daphne's flight from Apollo. Burton's framing gives the winds their own desire; the Latin describes them exposing her body and tossing her clothes.

[9001] Editor. Boreas is the north wind; the Hellespont is the strait Leander swims to reach Hero. Ericthon is retained from Burton; the parentage and the Hyacinthus association require collation. Burton's vi rapuit expressly says that Orithyia is abducted by force.

[9002] Burton. Printed page 457, dagger: "Ovid. Met. lib. 5." Ovid, Metamorphoses 5.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— viridesque manu siccata capillos, Fluminis Alphei veteres recitavit amores; Pars ego Nympharum, &c. ——	——and, drying her green hair with her hand, She recounted the river Alpheus's old love: "I was one of the nymphs," and so on——[9003]
When our Tame and Isis meet	When our Thame and Isis meet,
[9004]Oscula mille sonant, connexu brachia pallent, Mutuaque explicitis connectunt colla lacertis.	A thousand kisses sound; their arms grow pale in the embrace, And, stretching out their arms, they clasp each other's necks.[9005]
Inachus and Pincus, and how many loving rivers can I reckon up, whom beauty hath enthrall'd! I say nothing all this while of Idols themselves that have committed Idolatry in this kind, of looking glasses, that have been rapt in love (if you will believe [9006]Poets) when their Ladies and mistresses looked on to dress them.	Inachus and Pincus—and how many rivers in love could I list, which beauty has enslaved! All this while I say nothing of idols themselves that have committed idolatry of this kind, or of mirrors that have been carried away by love, if you will believe the poets, when their ladies and mistresses looked into them to dress.[9007]
Et si non habeo sensum, tua gratia sensum Exhibet, & calidi sentio amoris onus. Dirigis huc quoties spectantia lumina, flammæ Succendunt inopi saucia membra mihi.	Though I have no feeling, your charm gives me Feeling, and I feel the burden of burning love. Whenever you turn your watching eyes this way, flames Set my wounded limbs ablaze, helpless as I am.

[9003] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 5.575–577. Burton substitutes Alphei and recitavit for the consulted text's Elei and narravit. The first two lines introduce Arethusa's story, while the third begins her own speech. The change from narrator to speaker is retained.

[9004] Burton. Printed page 457, asterisk: "Leland."

[9005] Editor. Thame and Isis are personified English rivers, meeting to form the Thames in the literary convention invoked here. Leland is John Leland. The printed pallent means grow pale; its precise sense and the quotation's wording remain to be collated.

[9006] Burton. Printed page 457, dagger: "Angerianus." Girolamo Angeriano.

[9007] Editor. Looking glasses are mirrors. Burton's joke makes both worshipped images and reflecting objects into worshippers of beauty. Pincus is retained as printed; the river's identification remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Though I no sense at all of feeling have, Yet your sweet looks do animate and save; And when your speaking eys do this was turn, Me thinks my wounded members live and burn.	Though I have no power of feeling, Your sweet looks give me life and save me; And when your speaking eyes turn this way, My wounded limbs seem to live and burn.[9008]
I could tell you such another story of a spindle that was fired by a fair Ladies [9009]looks, or fingers, some say, I know not well whether, but fired it was by report, and of a cold bath that suddenly smoaked, and was very hot when naked Cælia came into it,	I could tell you another such story of a spindle set on fire by a beautiful lady's looks—or her fingers, some say; I am not quite sure which. But it caught fire, according to the report. And there is the story of a cold bath that suddenly steamed and grew very hot when naked Caelia entered it:
Miramur quis sit tantus & unde vapor, &c.	We wonder what this great cloud of steam is, and where it comes from, and so on.[9010]

[9008] Editor. Burton gives an English verse rendering after the Latin; both remain separate. The 1651 line reads this was turn, evidently requiring way for the sense. Only the modern column supplies way. The Latin expresses the mirror's helpless burning; Burton's English adds animate and save.

[9009] Burton. Printed page 457, asterisk: "Si longe aspicias hæc urit lumine divos Atque homines prope, cur urere lina nequit? Angerianus." If you look from far away, she burns the gods with her gaze, and men close at hand: why can she not burn flax? Angeriano. The printed aspicias is retained.

[9010] Editor. Vapor here is steam from the bath. Angeriano's conceits literalize the conventional fire of love: a gaze can ignite a spindle, and a beautiful body heat cold water. The exact poems remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 457–458 But of all the tales in this kind, that is the most memorable of [9011]Death himself, when he should have stroken a sweet young Virgin with his dart, he fell in love with the object. Many more such could I relate which are to be believed with a poetical faith.	But of all stories of this kind, the most memorable concerns Death himself: when he ought to have struck a sweet young maiden with his dart, he fell in love with the person before him. I could relate many more such stories, which must be believed with a poet's faith.[9012]
Source page 458 So dumb and dead creatures dote, but men are mad, stupifyed many times at the first sight of beauty, amazed, [9013]as that fisherman in Aristænetus, that spied a maid bathing her self by the Sea side,	Thus speechless and lifeless things fall foolishly in love; but human beings go mad, often stupefied at the first sight of beauty, struck dumb like the fisherman in Aristaenetus who caught sight of a girl bathing by the sea:
[9014]Soluta mihi sunt omnia membra —— A capite ad calcem, sensusque omnis periit De pectore, tam immensus stupor animum invasit mihi.	All my limbs went slack—— From head to heel, and all awareness left My heart: such immense astonishment seized my mind.[9015]

[9011] Burton. Printed page 457, dagger: "Idem Anger." The same author, Angeriano.

[9012] Editor. Poetical faith asks the reader to accept a story in the spirit of poetry. Burton signals the imaginative status of this extravagant catalogue before turning to human responses.

[9013] Burton. Printed page 458, dagger: "Obstupuit mirabundus membrorum elegantiam &c. ep. 7." He stood amazed, marvelling at the beauty of her limbs, and so on. Letter 7.

[9014] Burton. Printed page 458, dagger: "Stobæus è græco." Stobaeus, from the Greek.

[9015] Editor. The marginal reference names Stobaeus without locating the Greek source. This Latin verse describes loss of bodily strength and awareness; its author and original wording remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as [9016]Lucian in his images, confesseth of himself, that he was at his mistriss presence void of all sense, immovable, as if he had seen a Gorgons head: which was no such cruel monster, (as [9017]Cœlius interprets it, lib. 3. cap. 9.) but the very quintessence of beauty, some fair creature, as without doubt the Poet understood in the first fiction of it, at which the spectators were amazed.	And Lucian, in his Portraits, confesses of himself that in his mistress's presence he was bereft of all feeling and unable to move, as if he had seen a Gorgon's head. This was no such savage monster, as Coelius interprets it in book 3, chapter 9, but the very essence of beauty, some lovely creature —as the poet doubtless meant when he first invented it—at which spectators stood astonished.[9018]
[9019]Miseri quibus intentata nites, poor wretches are compelled at the very sight of her ravishing looks to run mad, or make away themselves.	"Wretched are those for whom you shine, as yet untried": the poor creatures are driven by the very sight of her captivating looks to go mad or kill themselves.[9020]
[9021]They wait the sentence of her scornful eyes; And whom she favours lives, the other dyes.	They await the verdict of her scornful eyes; The one she favours lives, the other dies.
[9022]Heliodorus lib. 1. brings in Thyamis almost besides himself, when he saw Chariclia first, and not daring to look upon her a second time, for he thought it impossible for any man living to see her and contain himself.	Heliodorus, in book 1, presents Thyamis almost beside himself when he first saw Chariclea, not daring to look at her a second time, for he thought it impossible for any living man to see her and control himself.

[9016] Burton. Printed page 458, r: "Parum abfuit quo minus saxum ex homine factus sum, ipsis statuis immobiliorem me fecit." I very nearly changed from a man into stone; she made me more motionless than statues themselves.

[9017] Burton. Printed page 458, s: "Veteres Gorgons fabulam confinxerunt, eximium formæ decus stupidos reddens." The ancients invented the tale of the Gorgon: exceptional beauty renders people stupefied. Gorgons is the printed form.

[9018] Editor. In Lucian, Portraits 1, Lycinus tells Polystratus that a passing beauty nearly turned him to stone; section 11 says he saw her only once. Burton recasts this as Lucian's confession about his mistress. The dialogue identifies her as the emperor's beloved in section 10. Coelius's allegorical explanation of the Gorgon remains uncollated.

[9019] Burton. Printed page 458, t: "Hor. Ode. 5." Horace, Ode 5.

[9020] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.5.12–13, addresses the beautiful but inconstant Pyrrha. Burton prints intentata; the consulted Latin has intemptata. The phrase means that she seems attractive to those who have not yet experienced her. Burton intensifies it into madness and self-destruction.

[9021] Burton. Printed page 458, asterisk: "Marlos Hero." Marlowe's Hero.

[9022] Burton. Printed page 458, u: "Aspectum virginis sponte fugit insanus fere, & impossibile existimans ut simul eam aspicere quis possit, & intra temperantiæ metas se continere." Almost beside himself, he willingly fled the girl's sight, thinking it impossible to look at her and at the same time remain within the bounds of self-control.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The very fame of beauty will fetch them to it many miles off, (such an attractive power this loadstone hath) and they will seem but short, they will undertake any toil or trouble, [9023]long journeys. Penia or Atalanta shall not overgo them, through Seas, Desarts, Mountains, and dangerous places, as they did to gaze on Psyche: many mortal men came far and neer to see that glorious object of her age, Paris for Helena, Corebus to Troja,	The mere fame of beauty will draw them to it from many miles away—such is this magnet's power of attraction—and the miles will seem short. They will undertake any labour or hardship, any long journey. Neither Penia nor Atalanta will outstrip them through seas, deserts, mountains and dangerous places, as people travelled to gaze at Psyche: many mortal men came from far and near to see that glorious spectacle of her age. Paris came for Helen, and Coroebus to Troy:[9024]
—— Illis Trojam qui forte diebus Venerat insano Cassandræ incensus amore.	——who happened in those days to have come to Troy, Inflamed with a mad love for Cassandra.[9025]
King John of France once prisoner in England, came to visit his old friends again, crossing the seas; but the truth is, his comming was to see the Countess of Salisbury the Non-percil of those times, and his dear mistriss.	King John of France, once a prisoner in England, crossed the sea to visit his old friends again; but the truth is that he came to see the Countess of Salisbury, the peerless beauty of those times and his dear mistress.[9026]

[9023] Burton. Printed page 458, x: "Apuleius l. 4. Multi mortales longis itineribus, &c." Apuleius, book 4: many mortals, by long journeys, and so on.

[9024] Editor. Loadstone means magnet. Atalanta is the swift runner of myth. Penia is left as Burton prints it; the intended figure is not securely identified. The Psyche reference is to the crowds drawn by her beauty in Apuleius, book 4.

[9025] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 2.340–341. Coroebus has come to Troy in love with Cassandra; Burton quotes the narrator's description.

[9026] Editor. Non-percil is Burton's printed form of nonpareil, without equal. The romantic explanation for King John's return to England is an assertion in Burton's catalogue; the Countess's identity and the historical basis remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That infernal God Plutus came from hell it self, to steal Proserpina; Achilles left all his friends for Polixena's sake, his enemies daughter; and all the [9027]Græcian Gods forsook their heavenly mansions for that fair Lady, Philo Dioneus daughters sake, the Paragon of Greece in those days; eâ enim venustate fuit, ut eam certatim omnes dii conjugem expeterent.	That god of the underworld, Plutus, came from hell itself to abduct Proserpina. Achilles abandoned all his friends for the sake of Polyxena, his enemy's daughter; and all the Greek gods left their heavenly dwellings for that beautiful lady Philo, Dioneus's daughter, the paragon of Greece in those days: "For she was so lovely that all the gods competed to have her as their wife."[9028]
[9029]Formosa divis imperat puella.	A beautiful girl commands the gods.[9030]
They will not only come to see, but as a Faulkoner makes an hungry hawke hover about, follow, give attendance and service, spend goods, lives, and all their fortunes to attain;	They will come not merely to look, but—as a falconer makes a hungry hawk hover nearby—to follow, attend and serve, spending their possessions, their lives and their whole fortunes to gain their desire:
Were beauty under twenty locks kept fast, Yet love breaks through, and picks them all at last.	Even if beauty were secured behind twenty locks, Love breaks through, and picks them all at last.
When fair Hero came abroad, the eys, hearts, and affections of her spectators were still attendant on her.[9031]	When beautiful Hero appeared in public, the eyes, hearts and affections of those who saw her always followed her.[9032]

[9027] Burton. Printed page 458, dagger: "Nic. Gerbel. l. 5. Achaia." Nicolaus Gerbel, book 5, Achaea.

[9028] Editor. Plutus is printed, although the abductor of Proserpina in the familiar myth is Pluto. The modern column retains the name so the substitution is visible. Philo, Dioneus's daughter, is likewise retained pending collation with Gerbel; no conjectural identification is substituted.

[9029] Burton. Printed page 458, asterisk: "I Secundus basiorum lib." Janus Secundus, Book of Kisses.

[9030] Editor. Janus Secundus, Basia 18, ends with this line. The book celebrates kisses and their power; the maxim here crowns Burton's examples of beauty commanding gods.

[9031] Burton. Printed page 458, y: "Musæus. Illa autem bene morata, per ædem quocunque vagabatur, sequentem mentem habebat, & oculos, & corda virorum." Musaeus: the well-behaved girl, wherever she wandered through the temple, had men's minds, eyes and hearts following her. The marginal y has no clearly visible counterpart in the body; it is attached to the Hero sentence it glosses.

[9032] Editor. Musaeus's Hero and Leander is a separate Greek treatment of the lovers. Burton's marginal Latin accompanies his account of the spectators. Came abroad means appeared in public, not travelled overseas.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9033]Et medios inter vultus supereminet omnes, Perque urbem aspiciunt venientem numinis instar.	Among all those faces she towers above the rest, And as she comes through the city they gaze at her as at a goddess.[9034]
[9035]So far above the rest fair Hero shin'd, And stole away th'inchanted gazers mind.	So far above the rest fair Hero shone, And stole the spellbound onlooker's mind.
Source page 459 [9036]When Peter Aretine's Lucretia came first to Rome, and that the fame of her beauty, ad urbanarum deliciarum sectatores venerat, nemo non ad videndam eam, &c. was spread abroad, they came in (as they say) thick and threefold to see her, and hovered about her gates, as they did of old to Lais of Corinth, and Phryne of Thebes.	When Pietro Aretino's Lucretia first came to Rome, and the fame of her beauty spread abroad —"it had reached the devotees of the city's pleasures; everyone came to see her," and so on— they came, as the saying goes, thick and fast to see her, and hovered around her gates, as people once did around those of Lais of Corinth and Phryne of Thebes.[9037]
[9038]Ad cujus jacuit Græcia tota fores,	At whose doors all Greece lay prostrate.[9039]

[9033] Burton. Printed page 458, dagger: "Homer."

[9034] Editor. The margin attributes these Latin lines to Homer. Their precise Homeric passage and Latin translator have not been identified; the attribution remains marked as Burton's.

[9035] Burton. Printed page 458, asterisk: "Marlo."

[9036] Burton. Printed page 459, dagger: "Perno didascalo dial. Ital. Latin. donat. à Gasp. Barthio Germano." Pornodidascalus: an Italian dialogue rendered into Latin by the German Caspar Barth. The printed Perno is retained; the title is Pornodidascalus.

[9037] Editor. Pietro Aretino's Lucretia belongs to the literary work cited through Caspar Barth's Latin Pornodidascalus. Thick and threefold means in great numbers. Burton's Phryne of Thebes is retained; the passage is a catalogue of literary and historical beauties, not a single continuous historical account.

[9038] Burton. Printed page 459, asterisk: "Propertius."

[9039] Editor. Propertius, Elegies 2.6.2, refers to Lais. The line turns the crowd at her door into all Greece lying in submission.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9040]Every man sought to get her love, some with gallant and costly apparel, some with an affected pace, some with musique, others with rich gifts, pleasant discourse, multitude of followers; others with letters, vows, and promises, to commend themselves, and to be gracious in her eys. Happy was he that could see her, thrice happy that enjoyed her company.	Every man sought to win her love: some with splendid and costly clothes, some with an affected walk, some with music, others with rich gifts, pleasant conversation or crowds of followers; others with letters, vows and promises, to recommend themselves and find favour in her eyes. Happy was the man who could see her; three times happy the one who enjoyed her company.
Charmides [9041]in Plato was a proper young man, in comeliness of person, and all good qualities far exceeding others; whensoever fair Charmides came abroad, they seem'd all to be in love with him (as Critias describes their carriage) and were troubled at the very sight of him; many came neer him, many followed him wheresoever he went,	Charmides in Plato was a handsome young man, far surpassing others in bodily beauty and every good quality. Whenever handsome Charmides appeared in public, everyone seemed to be in love with him—as Critias describes their behaviour—and they were overcome at the very sight of him. Many drew near him; many followed him wherever he went.[9042]
As those [9043]formarum spectatores did Acontius, if at any time he walked abroad: The Athenian Lasses stared on Alcibiades, Sapho and the Mitilean women on Phaon the fair. Such lovely sights do not onely please, entice, but ravish and amaze.	So those "spectators of beauty" followed Acontius whenever he walked abroad. The Athenian girls stared at Alcibiades; Sappho and the women of Mytilene at handsome Phaon. Such lovely sights do not merely please and entice: they carry people away and leave them astonished.

[9040] Burton. Printed page 459, dagger: "Vestium splendore & elegantia, ambitione incessus, donis, cantilenis, &c. gratiam adipisci." To gain favour by the splendour and elegance of clothes, a showy gait, gifts, songs, and so on.

[9041] Burton. Printed page 459, z: "Præ cæteris corporis proceritate & egregia indole mirandus apparebat, cæteri autem capti ejus amore videbantur, &c." He appeared remarkable above the rest for his stature and outstanding nature; the others seemed captivated by love of him, and so on.

[9042] Editor. In the opening of Plato's Charmides, Socrates narrates the admiration of the men and boys when Charmides enters. Critias identifies the youth as his cousin; the description of the crowd is Socrates's. Burton's attribution to Critias is retained. The early Latin intermediary remains uncollated. Proper means handsome; carriage means behaviour.

[9043] Burton. Printed page 459, asterisk: "Aristænetus ep. 10." Aristaenetus, Letter 10.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cleonimus a delicate and tender youth, present at a feast which Androcles his uncle made in Piræo at Athens, when he sacrificed to Mercury, so stupified the guests, Dineas, Aristippus, Agasthenes, and the rest, (as Charidemus in [9044]Lucian relates it) that they could not eat their meat, they sate all supper time gazing, glancing at him, stealing looks, and admiring of his beauty.	Cleonymus, a delicate, tender youth, attended a feast given by his uncle Androcles in the Piraeus at Athens, when he sacrificed to Mercury. The youth so stupefied the guests—Dineas, Aristippus, Agasthenes and the rest, as Charidemus relates in Lucian—that they could not eat their food. Throughout supper they sat gazing and glancing at him, stealing looks and admiring his beauty.[9045]
Many will condemn these men that are so enamoured, for fools; but some again commend them for it; many reject Paris judgement, and yet Lucian approves of it, admiring Paris for his choice; he would have done as much himself, and by good desert in his mind; Beauty is to be preferred [9046]before wealth or wisdom.	Many will condemn men so infatuated as fools; others, however, praise them for it. Many reject the judgment of Paris, yet Lucian approves of it, admiring Paris for his choice: he would have done the same himself, and rightly, in his opinion. Beauty should be preferred to wealth or wisdom.[9047]
[9048]Athenæus Deipnosophist. lib. 13. cap. 7. holds it no such indignity for the Trojans and Greeks to contend ten years, to spend so much labour, loose so many mens lives for Helens sake, [9049]for so fair a Ladies sake,	Athenaeus, in The Learned Banqueters, book 13, chapter 7, considers it no such disgrace for the Trojans and Greeks to fight for ten years, to expend so much effort and lose so many men's lives for Helen's sake—for the sake of so beautiful a lady:

[9044] Burton. Printed page 459, dagger: "Tom. 4. dial. meretr. respicientes & ad formam ejus obstupescentes." Volume 4, Dialogues of the Courtesans: looking at him and being stunned by his beauty. This marginal title differs from Charidemus in the body.

[9045] Editor. The body identifies Charidemus, while the margin points to Dialogues of the Courtesans. Both labels are preserved without conflating them. Meat here means food generally; delicate and tender describe the youth's physical refinement.

[9046] Burton. Printed page 459, a: "In Charidemo sapientiæ merito pulchritudo præfertur & opibus." In Charidemus, beauty is deservedly preferred to wisdom and wealth.

[9047] Editor. Paris's judgment chooses beauty over the competing gifts of the goddesses. Burton reports competing views of that choice; his praise here belongs to the deliberately expansive argument for beauty's power.

[9048] Burton. Printed page 459, b: "Indignum nihil est Troas fortes & Achivos tempore tam longo perpessos esse labore." There is nothing shameful in the brave Trojans and Achaeans enduring hardship for so long. The printed labore is retained.

[9049] Burton. Printed page 459, c: "Digna quidem facies pro qua vel obiret Achilles, vel Priamus, belli causa probanda fuit. Proper. lib. 2." A face indeed worthy that even Achilles or Priam should die for it; it was an acceptable cause of war. Propertius, book 2. Burton's Priamus differs from Propertius's Priamo: see the Editor note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ob talem uxorem cui præstantissima forma, Nil mortale refert.	For such a wife, whose surpassing beauty Has nothing mortal about it.[9050]
That one woman was worth a kingdom, a hundred thousand other women, a world it self. Well might [9051]Sterpsichores be blind for carping at so fair a creature, and a just punishment it was.	That one woman was worth a kingdom, a hundred thousand other women, a whole world. Well might Sterpsichores go blind for finding fault with so beautiful a creature: it was a just punishment.[9052]
The same testimony gives Homer of the old men of Troy, that were spectators of that single combate betwixt Paris and Menelaus at the Seiangate: when Helena stood in their presence, they said all, the war was worthily prolonged and undertaken [9053]for her sake. The very gods themselves (as Homer and [9054]Isocrates record) fought more for Helena, then they did against the Gyants.	Homer gives the same testimony about the old men of Troy, who watched the single combat between Paris and Menelaus at the Scaean Gate. When Helen stood before them, they all said the war was worth undertaking and prolonging for her sake. The very gods themselves, as Homer and Isocrates record, fought more for Helen than they did against the Giants.[9055]

[9050] Editor. The body's couplet renders a Homeric praise of Helen in Latin; its translator is not identified. The attached Propertius quotation parallels it. Propertius 2.3.35–36 has Priamo, "to Priam," so that even Priam could approve the cause of the war. Burton's Priamus instead makes Priam another possible man to die for her. The marginal version is retained and translated as printed.

[9051] Burton. Printed page 459, dagger: "Cæcus qui Helenæ formam carpserat." Blind, he who had criticized Helen's beauty.

[9052] Editor. Sterpsichores is Burton's printed name for the poet ordinarily called Stesichorus in the story of blindness and recantation after attacking Helen. The modern text retains Burton's form; the precise source remains for collation.

[9053] Burton. Printed page 459, d: "Those mutinous Turks that murmured at Mahomet, when they saw Irene, excused his absence. Knowls." A parallel from Knolles's history of the Turks; Burton has already used the Irene story.

[9054] Burton. Printed page 459, dagger: "In laudem Helenæ orat." Oration in Praise of Helen.

[9055] Editor. Burton invokes the Trojan elders' praise of Helen in Iliad 3 and Isocrates's Helen. The extra marginal example of Mahomet and Irene is from Knolles and refers back to a story used in Block 117. These reported judgments belong to the speakers in Burton's argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 459–460 When [9056]Venus lost her son Cupid, she made proclamation by Mercury, that he that could bring tidings of him should have seven kisses; a noble reward some say, and much better then so many golden talents; seven such kisses to many men, were more pretious then seven Cities, or so many Provinces. One such kiss alone, would recover a man if he were a dying,	When Venus lost her son Cupid, she had Mercury proclaim that whoever brought news of him would receive seven kisses: a noble reward, some say, and much better than as many talents of gold. To many men, seven such kisses would be worth more than seven cities or as many provinces. One such kiss alone would restore a man even if he were dying:[9057]
Source page 460 [9058]Suaviolum Stygia sic te de valle reducet, &c.	Thus a little kiss will bring you back from the valley of Styx, and so on.[9059]

[9056] Burton. Printed page 459, asterisk: “Apul. miles. lib. 4.” Apuleius, Milesian Tales, book 4; the cited episode is in book 6.

[9057] Editor. Apuleius, Metamorphoses 6.8, has Venus advertise a reward of seven kisses for information about Psyche, not Cupid. Burton also cites book 4. His name and citation are preserved, with the discrepancy recorded here. A talent is an ancient unit of weight and money.

[9058] Burton. Printed page 460, asterisk: “Secun. bas. 13.” Secundus, Kiss 13.

[9059] Editor. Secundus, Basia 13. The consulted text says that a kiss brought the speaker back from the valley of Styx; Burton adapts it to a future promise addressed to another person. Styx evokes the world of the dead.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Great Alexander married Roxane, a poor mans child, only for her person. [9060]'Twas well done of Alexander, & heroically done, I admire him for it. Orlando was mad for Angelica, and who doth not condole his mishap? Thisbe died for Piramus, Dido for Æneas; who doth not weep, as (before his conversion) [9061]Austin did in commiseration of her estate! she died for him, me thinks (as he said) I could die for her!	Alexander the Great married Roxane, a poor man's daughter, solely for her beauty. Well done, Alexander—and heroically done! I admire him for it. Orlando went mad for Angelica: who does not pity his misfortune? Thisbe died for Pyramus, Dido for Aeneas. Who does not weep in pity at her plight, as Augustine did before his conversion? She died for him; "I think," as he said, "I could die for her!"[9062]
But this is not the matter in hand, what prerogative this Beauty hath, of what power and soveraignty it is, and how far such persons that so much admire, and dote upon it, are to be justified; no man doubts of these matters; the question is how and by what meanes Beauty produceth this effect?	But this is not the matter before us: what privileges beauty has, what power and sovereignty it exercises, and how far people who so admire and dote upon it may be justified. No one doubts these things. The question is how, and by what means, beauty produces this effect.
By sight: the Eye betrayes the soul, and is both Active and Passive in this business; it wounds and is wounded, is an especiall cause and instrument, both in the subject and in the object. [9063]Asteares, it begins in the eyes, descends to the breast, it conveyes these beauteous rayes, as I have said unto the heart. Ut vidi ut perii. [9064]Mars videt hanc, visamque cupit.	Through sight. The eye betrays the soul and is both active and passive in this business: it wounds and is wounded; it is a principal cause and instrument, both in the person looking and in the person seen. Like tears, it begins in the eyes and descends to the breast; as I have said, it carries these beautiful rays to the heart. "As soon as I saw, I was lost." "Mars sees her, and, having seen her, desires her."[9065]

[9060] Burton. Printed page 460, e: "Curtius l. 1." Curtius, book 1; reference retained as printed.

[9061] Burton. Printed page 460, f: "Confess." Confessions.

[9062] Editor. Burton's Curtius citation and description of Roxane's parentage require collation. Orlando and Angelica belong to chivalric romance. Augustine, Confessions 1.13, recalls weeping over Dido and criticizes his absorption in her fictional death; Burton's further I could die for her has not been verified there. The modern version preserves the attribution without certifying the words.

[9063] Burton. Printed page 460, dagger: "Seneca. Amor in oculis oritur." Seneca: love originates in the eyes.

[9064] Burton. Printed page 460, g: "Ovid. Fast." Ovid, Fasti.

[9065] Editor. Asteares is read as As tears, with the word division made explicit in modern English. Active and passive means that an eye both acts upon another and receives an impression. The short Latin utterances repeat and dramatize sight's immediate effect; exact sources for the first and for the Seneca marginal wording remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Shechem saw Dinah the daughter of Lea, and defiled her, Gen. 34. 3. Jacob Rachel. 29. 17. for she was beautiful & fair: David spied Bershaba afar off, 2 Reg. 11. 2. the Elders Susanna, [9066]as that Orthomenian Strato saw fair Aristoclea the daughter of Theophanes, bathing her self at that Hercyne well in Lebadea; and were captivated in an instant. Viderunt oculi, rapuerunt pectora flammæ; Ammon fell sick for Thamars sake, 2 Sam. 13. 2.	Shechem saw Dinah, Leah's daughter, and violated her, Genesis 34:3; Jacob saw Rachel, 29:17, "for she was beautiful and fair"; David caught sight of Bathsheba from a distance, 2 Samuel 11:2; the elders saw Susanna; and Strato of Orthomenus saw beautiful Aristoclea, the daughter of Theophanes, bathing at the fountain of Hercyne in Lebadea. They were captivated in an instant. "The eyes saw; flames seized the heart." Amnon fell ill for Tamar's sake, 2 Samuel 13:2.[9067]
The beauty of Esther was such, that she found favor not onely in the sight of Assuerus, but of all those that looked upon her. Gerson, Origen, and some others contended that Christ himself was the fairest of the sons of men, and Joseph next unto him, speciosus præ filiis hominum, and they will have it literally taken; his very person was such, that he found grace and favor of all those that looked upon him.	Esther's beauty was such that she found favour not only in the eyes of Ahasuerus but in those of everyone who looked at her. Gerson, Origen and some others maintained that Christ himself was the fairest of the sons of men, with Joseph next to him: "more beautiful than the sons of men." They insist that this should be understood literally: his bodily appearance was such that he won the affection and favour of everyone who looked at him.[9068]

[9066] Burton. Printed page 460, dagger: "Plutarch."

[9067] Editor. The cited events include coercion and sexual violence, not only attraction: Shechem violates Dinah, the elders threaten Susanna, and Amnon's desire leads to Tamar's rape. Genesis 34:2 narrates Shechem's act; 34:3 follows it. Burton's 2 Reg. 11:2 uses the Latin numbering for what English Bibles call 2 Samuel 11:2. Orthomenian is retained in modern form as Orthomenus; the usual place-name is Orchomenus.

[9068] Editor. Speciosus præ filiis hominum echoes Psalm 45:2 in English numbering, 44:3 in the Vulgate. Burton reports a literal reading of Christ's physical beauty; the individual positions attributed to Gerson and Origen remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Joseph was so fair, that as the ordinary Gloss hath it, filiæ decurrerent per murum, & ad fenestras, they ran to the top of the walls, and to the windows to gaze on him, as we do commonly to see some great personage go by: and so Matthew Paris describes Matilda the Empress going through Cullen. [9069]P. Morales the Jesuite saith as much of the Virgin Mary.	Joseph was so handsome that, as the Ordinary Gloss puts it, "the girls ran along the wall and to the windows": they ran to the tops of the walls and to the windows to gaze at him, as we commonly do to see some great personage pass by. Matthew Paris similarly describes the Empress Matilda passing through Cologne. The Jesuit Father Morales says as much of the Virgin Mary.[9070]
Antony no sooner saw Cleopatra, but, saith Appian lib. 1. he was enamored on her. [9071]Theseus at the first sight of Helen was so besotted, that he esteemed himself the happiest man in the world if he might enjoy her, and to that purpose kneeled down, and made his patheticall prayers unto the gods.	Antony had no sooner seen Cleopatra, says Appian, book 1, than he fell in love with her. Theseus, at his first sight of Helen, was so infatuated that he considered he would be the happiest man in the world if he could possess her. To that end he knelt and made impassioned prayers to the gods.
[9072]Charicles by chance espying that curious picture of smiling Venus naked in her Temple, stood a great while gazing, as one amazed, at length he brake into that mad passionate speech, O fortunate God Mars, that wast bound in chains, and made ridiculous for her sake! He could not contain himself, but kissed her picture, I know not how oft, and heartily desired to be disgraced as Mars was. And what did he that his Betters had not done before him?	Charicles happened to catch sight of that exquisite image of smiling Venus, naked in her temple. He stood gazing for a long time in astonishment, then burst into that wildly passionate speech: "O fortunate god Mars, who was bound in chains and made a laughingstock for her sake!" Unable to restrain himself, he kissed her image I do not know how many times, and earnestly wished to be disgraced as Mars had been. And what did he do that his betters had not already done?[9073]

[9069] Burton. Printed page 460, h: "Lib. de pulchrit. Jesu & Mariæ." Book on the Beauty of Jesus and Mary.

[9070] Editor. The Ordinary Gloss, or Glossa ordinaria, is the standard medieval biblical commentary tradition. Cullen is Cologne. Burton's Joseph, Matilda and Morales references remain to be checked against their cited texts.

[9071] Burton. Printed page 460, k: "Lucian Charidemon supra omnes mortales felicissimum si hac frui possit." Lucian, Charidemon: happiest above all mortals, if he could possess her. The title is retained as printed.

[9072] Burton. Printed page 460, dagger: "Lucian amor. Insanum quiddam ac furibundum exclamans, O fortunatissime deorum Mars qui propter hanc vinctus fuisti." Lucian, Loves: crying out something wild and frenzied, "O Mars, most fortunate of the gods, who was bound for her sake!"

[9073] Editor. Picture can mean an image or representation, including a statue. Burton's account concerns Venus in a temple, so image preserves this broader sense. The chains refer to the exposure of Mars and Venus together; Charicles envies the god's humiliation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [9074]atque aliquis de diis non tristibus optat Sic fieri turpis ——	——and one of the more lighthearted gods wishes To be disgraced in just this way——[9075]
Source page 460–461 When Venus came first to heaven, her comeliness was such, that (as mine author saith) [9076]all the gods came flocking about, and saluted her, each of them went to Jupiter, and desired he might have her to be his wife. When fair [9077]Antiochus came in presence, as a candle in the dark his beauty shined, all mens eyes (as Xenophon describes the manner of it) were instantly fixed on him, and moved at the sight, insomuch that they could not conceal themselves, but in gesture or looks it was discerned and expressed.	When Venus first came to heaven, her beauty was such that, as my author says, all the gods flocked around to greet her, and each went to Jupiter to ask for her as his wife. When handsome Antiochus appeared, his beauty shone like a candle in the dark. Everyone's eyes, as Xenophon describes it, were immediately fixed on him, and they were so moved by the sight that they could not hide their feelings: their gestures and looks revealed and expressed them.[9078]

[9074] Burton. Printed page 460, asterisk: "Ov. Met. l. 3." Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 3; the quotation is actually in book 4.

[9075] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.187–188, not book 3 as printed in the margin. The gods are looking at Mars and Venus caught together. Burton omits the first word of the preceding line and quotes the wish to share Mars's disgrace.

[9076] Burton. Printed page 460, l: "Omnes dii complexi sunt, & in uxorem sibi petierunt, Nat. Comes de Venere." All the gods embraced her and asked for her as their wife. Natalis Comes, on Venus.

[9077] Burton. Printed page 460, m: "Ut cum lux noctis affulget, omnium oculos incurrit: sic Antiloquus, &c." As when a light shines in the night it catches everyone's eyes, so Antiloquus, and so on. The marginal Antiloquus differs from Antiochus in the body.

[9078] Editor. Xenophon, Symposium 1.8–10, describes Autolycus. Burton's body gives Antiochus and his margin Antiloquus; both source forms remain visible. The modern column retains Antiochus rather than silently replacing it with Xenophon's name.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 461 Those other senses, hearing, touching may much penetrate and affect, but none so much, none so forcible as sight. Forma Briseis mediis in armis movit Achillem, Achilles was moved in the midst of a battle by fair Briseis. Ajax by Tecmessa; Judith captivated that great Captain Holofernes; Dalilah, Sampson; Rosamund, [9079]Henry the second; Roxolana, Solyman the Magnificent, &c.	Those other senses, hearing and touch, may penetrate and affect us deeply, but none so deeply or so powerfully as sight. “Briseis’s beauty moved Achilles in the midst of warfare”: Achilles was moved in the middle of battle by beautiful Briseis; Ajax by Tecmessa. Judith captivated that great commander Holofernes; Delilah, Samson; Rosamund, Henry II; and Roxelana, Suleiman the Magnificent, and so on.[9080]
[9081]Νικᾷ δὲ καὶ σίδηρον, Καὶ πῦρ καλή τις οὖσα.	Being beautiful, a woman conquers Both iron and fire.[9082]
A fair woman overcomes fire and sword.	A beautiful woman overcomes fire and sword.
[9083]Naught under heaven so strongly doth allure The sense of man and all his minde possess, As beauties loveliest bait, that doth procure Great warriers erst their rigor to suppress, And mighty hands forget their manliness, Driven with the power of an heart-burning eye, And lapt in flowres of a golden tress, That can with melting pleasure mollifie Their heardned hearts inur’d to cruelty.	Nothing beneath heaven so strongly allures Man’s senses and possesses his whole mind As beauty’s loveliest bait, which induces Great warriors to put aside their former harshness, And mighty hands to forget their manly strength, Driven by the power of an eye that sets hearts burning, And wrapped in flowers of a golden lock of hair, Which can, with melting pleasure, soften Their hardened hearts, accustomed to cruelty.[9084]

[9079] Burton. Printed page 461, n: “Delevit omnes ex animo mulieres.” He erased all other women from his mind.

[9080] Editor. Burton piles up examples from epic, scripture and royal stories. The Latin Briseis sentence is followed by his own English paraphrase; both are retained. The Rosamund and Roxelana traditions are reported as his examples, pending detailed source collation.

[9081] Burton. Printed page 461, dagger: “Nam vincit & vel ignem, ferrumque, si qua pulchra est. Anacreon, 2.” For a woman, if she is beautiful, conquers even fire and iron. Anacreon, 2.

[9082] Editor. The Greek couplet is followed by Burton’s own English version. The margin attributes it to Anacreon, poem 2; the exact text and numbering of his edition remain to be collated. Iron is rendered figuratively as sword in Burton’s English line.

[9083] Burton. Printed page 461, o: “Spencer in his fairy Qu.” Spenser, The Faerie Queene.

[9084] Editor. Spenser, The Faerie Queene 5.8.1. Burton’s version differs substantially in its later lines, including heart-burning and flowers where the familiar text has heart-robbing and fetters. His wording is retained. Erst refers to the warriors’ former condition; inured means accustomed or hardened.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9085]Clitiphon ingenuously confesseth, that he no sooner came in Leucippes presence, but that he did corde tremere, & oculis lasciviùs intueri; [9086]he was wounded at the first sight, his heart panted and he could not possibly turn his eyes from her.	Clitophon frankly confesses that no sooner did he come into Leucippe's presence than "his heart trembled, and his eyes looked at her lustfully." He was wounded at first sight; his heart pounded, and he could not possibly turn his eyes away from her.[9087]
So doth Calysiris in Heliodorus lib. 2. Isis Priest, a reverend old man complain, who by chance at Memphis seeing that Thracian Rodophe, might not hold his eyes off her, [9088]I will not conceal it, she overcame me with her presence, and quite assaulted my continency which I had kept unto mine old age; I resisted a long time my bodily eyes with the eyes of my understanding, at last I was conquered, and as in a tempest carried headlong.	So too Calasiris in Heliodorus, book 2, a venerable old priest of Isis, complains that when he happened to see the Thracian Rhodopis at Memphis, he could not keep his eyes off her. "I will not hide it: her presence overcame me and fiercely attacked the chastity I had maintained into old age. For a long time I resisted my bodily eyes with the eyes of my understanding; at last I was conquered and swept headlong as in a storm."[9089]
Xenophiles a Philosopher, railed at women down right for many years together, scorned, hated, scoffed at them; coming at last into Daphnis a fair maids company, (as he condoles his mishap to his friend [9090]Demaritus) though free before,	Xenophiles, a philosopher, had bitterly railed against women for many years, scorning, hating and mocking them. At last he found himself in the company of Daphnis, a beautiful girl; and, as he laments his misfortune to his friend Demaritus, although he had been free before,
Intactus nullis ante cupidinibus,	Untouched before by any desires,

[9085] Burton. Printed page 461, p: "Achilles Tatius lib. 1." Achilles Tatius, book 1.

[9086] Burton. Printed page 461, q: "Statim ac eam contemplatus sum, occidi; oculos à virgine avertere conatus sum, sed illi repugnabant." As soon as I gazed at her, I was undone; I tried to turn my eyes away from the girl, but they resisted.

[9087] Editor. Ingenuously means frankly or candidly. Clitophon and Leucippe are the lovers in Achilles Tatius's romance; the first-person marginal Latin makes the injury and the eyes' refusal into figures of desire.

[9088] Burton. Printed page 461, r: "Pudet dicere, non celabo tamen. Memphim veniens me vicit, & continentiam expugnavit, quam ad senectutem usque servaram, oculis corporis, &c." I am ashamed to say it, but I will not hide it. Coming to Memphis, she conquered me and stormed the chastity I had maintained into old age, with the eyes of the body, and so on.

[9089] Editor. Calysiris and Rodophe are Burton's printed forms of Calasiris and Rhodopis. Continency means sexual self-restraint or chastity. The contest between bodily eyes and the eyes of understanding returns to the subsection's account of sight overcoming judgment.

[9090] Burton. Printed page 461, dagger: "Nunc primum circa hanc anxius animi hæreo. Aristænetus, ep. 17." Now for the first time I am anxiously absorbed in her. Aristaenetus, Letter 17.

Original text 1651	Modern English
was far in love, and quite overcome upon a sudden. Victus sum fateor à Daphnide, &c. I confess I am taken,	he suddenly fell deeply in love and was completely overcome. "I confess I am conquered by Daphnis," and so on: I admit I am captured.
[9091]Sola hæc inflexit sensus, animumque labentem Impulit ——	She alone has swayed my feelings and pushed My wavering spirit onward——[9092]
I could hold out no longer.	I could hold out no longer.
Such another mishap, but worse, had Stratocles the Physitian, that blear-eyed old man, muco plenus (so [9093]Prodromus describes him) he was a severe woman-hater all his life, fæda & contumeliosa semper in fæminas profatus, a bitter persecutor of the whole sexe, humanas aspides & viperas appellabat, he forswore them all still, and mocked them wheresoever he came, in such vile terms, ut matrem & sorores odisses, that if thou hadst heard him, thou would'st have loathed thine own mother and sisters for his words sake.	A similar misfortune, but worse, befell Stratocles the physician, that bleary-eyed old man, "full of mucus," as Prodromus describes him. All his life he had been a fierce woman-hater, "always uttering foul and insulting things against women," a bitter persecutor of the whole sex: "he called them human asps and vipers." He constantly renounced them all and mocked them wherever he went in such vile terms "that you would have hated your mother and sisters": if you had heard him, you would have loathed your own mother and sisters because of what he said.[9094]
Source page 461–462 Yet this old doting fool was taken at last with that celestiall and divine look of Myrilla the daughter of Anticles the Gardner, that smirking wench, that he shaved off his bushie beard, painted his face, [9095]curl'd his hair, wore a lawrel crown to cover his bald pate, and for her love besides was ready to run mad.	Yet this old doting fool was finally captivated by the heavenly, divine look of Myrilla, the gardener Anticles's daughter, that smiling girl. He shaved off his bushy beard, painted his face, curled his hair, wore a laurel crown to cover his bald head, and was almost driven mad by love for her.

[9091] Burton. Printed page 461, asterisk: "Virg. Æn. 4." Virgil, Aeneid 4.

[9092] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.22–23, has Dido say that he alone has moved her feelings. Burton changes the masculine to feminine, adapting her words to a man captivated by a woman. The precise Aristaenetus reference and the preceding short Latin verse remain for collation.

[9093] Burton. Printed page 461, dagger: "Amaranto. dial." The dialogue Amarantus, attributed here to Prodromus.

[9094] Editor. The enlarged scan reads muco plenus, full of mucus. The episode is Burton's account of the dialogue Amarantus; its detailed wording and personal names remain to be collated with Prodromus. The contemptuous character description belongs to Burton's narrative.

[9095] Burton. Printed page 462, dagger: "Comasque ad speculum disposuit." And he arranged his hair before a mirror.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 462 For the very day that he married, he was so furious, ut solis occasum minus expectare posset, (a terrible, a monstrous long day) he could not stay till it was night, sed omnibus insalutatis in thalamum festinus irrupit, the meat scarce out of his mouth, without any leave taking, he would needs go presently to bed. What young man therefore, if old men be so intemperate, can secure himself? Who can say I will not be taken with a beautiful object? I can, I will contain:	For on the very day he married, he was so frenzied "that he could scarcely wait for sunset"—a terrible, monstrously long day. He could not wait until night, "but hurried into the bridal chamber without saying goodbye to anyone." With the food scarcely out of his mouth and without taking leave, he insisted on going straight to bed. What young man, then, can consider himself safe, if old men are so uncontrolled? Who can say, "I shall not be captivated by a beautiful sight. I can, I will restrain myself"?
No, saith [9096]Lucian, of his mistris, she is so fair, that if thou dost but see her, she will stupifie thee, kill thee straight, and Medusa like turn thee to a stone, thou canst not pull thine eys from her, but as an adamant doth iron, she will carry thee bound headlong whether she will her self, infect thee like a Basilisk. It holds both in men and women. Dido was amazed at Æneas presence; Obstupuit primo aspectu Sidonia Dido; and as he feelingly verified out of his experience;	"No," says Lucian of his mistress: "she is so beautiful that if you merely see her, she will stupefy you, kill you on the spot, and turn you to stone like Medusa. You cannot pull your eyes away from her; like a magnet drawing iron," she will drag you captive wherever she chooses, poisoning you like a basilisk. This holds for men and women alike. Dido was amazed by Aeneas's presence: "Sidonian Dido was astonished at the first sight." And, as another man feelingly confirmed from experience:[9097]
[9098]Quam ego postquam vidi, non ita amavi ut sani solent Homines, sed eodem pacto ut insani solent.	After I saw her, I did not love as sane Men usually do, but just as madmen do.[9099]

[9096] Burton. Printed page 462, s: "Imag. Polistrato, Si illam saltem intuearis, statuis immobiliorem te facit: si conspexeris eam, non relinquetur facultas oculos ab ea amovendi; abducet te alligatum quocunque voluerit, ut ferrum ad se trahere ferunt adamantem." Portraits, to Polystratus: if you merely look at her, she makes you more motionless than statues. Once you have seen her, you cannot turn your eyes away; she will lead you bound wherever she wishes, as they say a magnet draws iron to itself.

[9097] Editor. Adamant here means a magnet or lodestone. Medusa turns spectators to stone; a basilisk was believed to kill by its gaze. The Dido line is Virgil, Aeneid 1.613. Burton's next he shifts to the male speaker in Plautus rather than continuing Dido's speech.

[9098] Burton. Printed page 462, t: "Plaut. Merc." Plautus, Mercator.

[9099] Editor. Plautus, Mercator 262–263, spoken by Demipho. The consulted text has aspexi and amo where Burton prints vidi and amavi. His Latin and his following English couplet are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I lov'd her not as others soberly, But as a mad man rageth, so did I.	I did not love her calmly, as others do; I raged as a madman does.
So Museus of Leander, nusquam lumen detorquet ab illa; and [9100]Chaucer of Palamon	So Musaeus says of Leander, "He never turns his gaze away from her"; and Chaucer says of Palamon,
He cast his eye upon Emilia, And therewith he blent and cryed ha ha, As though he had been stroke unto the hearta.	He cast his eye upon Emilia, And at once he flinched and cried, "Ah, ah!" As though he had been struck through the heart.[9101]
If you desire to know more particularly what this Beauty is, how it doth Influere, how it doth fascinate (for all hold, love is a fascination) thus in brief. [9102]This comeliness or Beauty ariseth from the due proportion of the whole, or from each several part.	If you wish to know more precisely what this beauty is, how it exerts its influence, how it bewitches—for everyone holds that love is a kind of bewitchment—here it is in brief. This loveliness or beauty arises from the proper proportions of the whole, or from each individual part.[9103]

[9100] Burton. Printed page 462, u: "In the Knights tale."

[9101] Editor. Chaucer, The Knight's Tale, Canterbury Tales I.1077–1079. Burton alters the wording and gives Emilia and hearta; blent corresponds to Chaucer's bleynte, flinched or started. The translation follows the sense without imitating the added final syllable.

[9102] Burton. Printed page 462, x: "Ex debita totius proportione aptaque partium compositione. Piccolomineus." From the proper proportion of the whole and the fitting arrangement of its parts. Piccolomini.

[9103] Editor. Influere means to flow into or exert an influence upon. Fascination here includes the older sense of bewitchment by a look. Burton is explaining a literary and historical account of love's power, not establishing an optical mechanism.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For an exact delineation of which, I refer you to Poets, Historiographers, and those amorous Writers, to Lucians Images, and Charidemus, Xenophons description of Panthea, Petronius Catalectes, Heliodorus Chariclia, Tatius Leucippe, Longus Sophistas Daphnis and Cloe, Theodorus Prodromus his Rhodanthes, Aristænetus and Philostratus Epistles, Balthasar Castilio, lib. 4. de aulico, Laurentius cap. 10. de melan. Æneas Sylvius his Lucretia, and every Poet almost, which have most accurately described a perfect beauty, an absolute feature, and that through every member, both in men and women.	For an exact description, I refer you to poets, historians and those writers on love: to Lucian's Portraits and Charidemus; Xenophon's description of Panthea; the collected poems of Petronius; Heliodorus's Chariclea; Achilles Tatius's Leucippe; Longus the Sophist's Daphnis and Chloe; Theodorus Prodromus's Rhodanthe; the letters of Aristaenetus and Philostratus; Baldassare Castiglione's Courtier, book 4; Laurentius, chapter 10 on melancholy; Aeneas Sylvius's Lucretia; and almost every poet. They have described perfect beauty and faultless form most precisely, in every part of both men and women.[9104]
Each part must concur to the perfection of it; for as Seneca saith, Ep. 33. lib. 4. Non est formosa mulier cujus crus laudatur & brachium, sed illa cujus simul universa facies admirationem singulis partibus dedit; she is no fair woman, whose arm, thigh, &c. are commended, except the face and all the other parts be correspondent.	Every part must contribute to that perfection. For, as Seneca says in Letter 33, book 4, "A woman is not beautiful whose leg and arm are praised, but one whose whole appearance together has lent distinction to each individual part." A woman whose arm, thigh and so on are praised is not beautiful unless her face and all the other parts are in harmony.[9105]
And the face especially gives a lustre to the rest: The face is it that commonly denominates fair or fowl; arx formæ facies, The Face is Beauties Towre; and though the other parts be deformed, yet a good face carries it (facies non uxor amatur) that alone is most part respected, principally valued, delitiis suis ferox, and of it self able to captivate.	The face, especially, gives lustre to the rest. It is the face that usually determines whether someone is called beautiful or ugly: "the face is beauty's citadel." The face is beauty's tower; and although the other parts may be misshapen, a beautiful face wins the day—"it is the face, not the wife, that is loved." That alone is usually admired and chiefly valued, "proud of its charms," and able to captivate by itself.

[9104] Editor. Burton's catalogue mixes titles, characters and abbreviated references. Lucian's Portraits 5–8 constructs an ideal image from features of statues and paintings; section 11 turns to beauty of character, and section 23 joins body and soul. This is a literary comparison, not a neutral anatomical inventory. Burton's editions and the Charidemus attribution remain unresolved.

[9105] Editor. Seneca, Letter 33.5, uses beauty as an analogy for reading whole works. His text says that the whole appearance takes admiration away from the separate parts, admirationem partibus singulis abstulit. Burton instead prints dedit, gave, and adds other words. The source column and the translation retain his altered claim; his English explanation stresses harmony.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 463 [9106]Urit te Glyceræ nitor, Urit grata protervitas, Et vultus nimium lubricus aspici;	Glycera's radiance sets you on fire; Her pleasing boldness sets you on fire, And her face, too dangerous to gaze upon.[9107]
Glycera's too fair a face was it that set him on fire, too fine to be beheld. When [9108]Chærea saw the singing wenches sweet looks, he was so taken, that he cried out, O faciem pulchram, deleo omnes dehinc ex animo mulieres, tædet quotidianarum harum formarum! O fair face, Ile never love any but her, look on any other hereafter but her, I am weary of these ordinary beauties, away with them.	It was Glycera's excessively beautiful face that set him on fire, too lovely to look at. When Chaerea saw the singing girl's sweet looks, he was so captivated that he cried out, "Oh, what a beautiful face! From now on I banish all other women from my mind; I am tired of these everyday beauties!" Oh, beautiful face! I shall never love anyone but her, or look at anyone else again. I am tired of these ordinary beauties; away with them.[9109]
The more he sees her, the worse he is, —uritque videndo, as in a burning-glass, the Sun beams are recollected to a center, the rayes of love are projected from her eyes. It was Æneas countenance ravished Queen Dido, Os humerosque Deo similis, he had an angelical face.	The more he sees her, the worse he becomes: "and burns at the sight." Just as a burning glass gathers the sun's rays into a single point, rays of love are cast from her eyes. It was Aeneas's face that enraptured Queen Dido: "like a god in face and shoulders." He had an angelic face.[9110]
[9111]O sacros vultus Baccho vel Apolline dignos, Quos vir, quos tuto fæmina nulla videt!	Oh, sacred features worthy of Bacchus or Apollo, Which no man, no woman, can look upon safely![9112]

[9106] Burton. Printed page 463, y: "Hor. Od. 19. lib. 1." Horace, Odes 1.19.

[9107] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.19.5–8. Burton changes me to te, me to you, and omits the comparison with Parian marble. Lubricus literally suggests slipperiness and figuratively danger or treachery; the face is perilous to look upon.

[9108] Burton. Printed page 463, dagger: "Ter. Eunuch. Act 2. scen. 3." Terence, Eunuchus, act 2, scene 3.

[9109] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 296–297, in the scene cited by Burton. The Latin cries out against ordinary beauties. Burton follows it with his own expanded English paraphrase, retained separately here.

[9110] Editor. A burning glass is a lens that focuses sunlight. The Aeneas phrase is from Virgil, Aeneid 1.589, with Burton's shortened wording. Angelical is Burton's Christianizing description after the classical comparison with a god.

[9111] Burton. Printed page 463, z: "Petronius Catell." Petronius, collected poems; Catell. is the printed abbreviation.

[9112] Editor. Burton assigns this couplet to Petronius's collected poems. Its precise place and attribution in the early printed collection remain unresolved; no secure poem number is supplied.

Original text 1651	Modern English
——O sacred looks befitting Majesty, Which never mortal wight could safely see!	——Oh, sacred looks befitting majesty, Which no mortal could ever behold safely!
Although for the greater part this beauty be most eminent in the face, yet many times those other members yeeld a most pleasing grace, and are alone sufficient to enamor. An high brow like unto the bright heavens, cæli pulcherrima plaga, Frons ubi vivit honor, frons ubi ludit amor, white and smooth like the polished alabaster, a pair of cheeks of Vermilian colour, in which love lodgeth; [9113]Amor qui mollibus genis puellæ pernoctas: A corall lip, suaviorum delubrum, in which	Although this beauty is generally most conspicuous in the face, other parts often have a most pleasing grace and are enough by themselves to inspire love. A high forehead like the bright heavens, "the loveliest region of the sky; a brow where honour lives, a brow where love plays," white and smooth as polished alabaster; a pair of vermilion cheeks where love lodges: "Love, who spends the night on a girl's soft cheeks." A coral lip, "the shrine of kisses," in which[9114]
Basia mille patent, basia mille latent,	A thousand kisses lie revealed, a thousand lie hidden,
gratiarum sedes gratissima; a sweet smelling flowre, from which Bees may gather hony, [9115]Mellilegæ volucres quid adhuc cava thyma, rosasque, &c.	"the Graces' most delightful dwelling": a sweet-smelling flower from which bees may gather honey. "Honey-gathering winged creatures, why still seek hollow thyme-blossoms and roses?" and so on,[9116]
Omnes ad dominæ labra venite meæ, Illa rosas spirat, &c.	Come, all of you, to my mistress's lips: She breathes roses, and so on.

[9113] Burton. Printed page 463, asterisk: "Sophocles Antigone."

[9114] Editor. The forehead, cheeks and lips begin a catalogue of bodily beauties. The invocation comes from Sophocles, Antigone 783–784, in the choral ode to Love after Haemon's quarrel with Creon. The chorus describes Love overpowering gods and humans and causing conflict; Burton extracts the image of Love on a girl's cheek. His Latin intermediary remains uncollated.

[9115] Burton. Printed page 463, dagger: "Io. Secundus bas. 19." Janus Secundus, Basia 19.

[9116] Editor. Janus Secundus, Basia 19. The consulted Latin has thyma cana, pale thyme, where Burton prints cava thyma, hollow thyme; it also has illa rosas spirant, those lips breathe roses, where Burton has illa rosas spirat, she breathes roses. Both of Burton's readings are preserved and translated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A white and round neck, that via lactea, dimple in the chin, black eye-brows, Cupidinis arcus, sweet breath, white and even teeth, which some call the sale-piece, a fine soft round pap, gives an excellent grace,	A white, rounded neck, that "Milky Way"; a dimple in the chin; black eyebrows, "Cupid's bow"; sweet breath; white, even teeth, which some call the feature that sells the whole; a lovely, soft, rounded breast: these lend exquisite grace.[9117]
[9118]Quale decus tumidis Pario de marmore mammis!	What beauty in swelling breasts of Parian marble![9119]
[9120]and make a pleasant valley lacteum sinum, between two chaulkie hills, Sororiantes papillulas, & ad pruritum frigidos amatores solo aspectu excitantes. Unde is,	And they form a pleasant valley, "a milky hollow," between two chalk-white hills: "little sister breasts, rousing cold lovers to lust by the mere sight of them." Hence this line:
[9121]Forma papillarum quam fuit apta premi!	How well the shape of those breasts invited a caress![9122]
Again Urebant oculos duræ stantesque mamillæ.	Again: Firm, upright breasts set the eyes on fire.[9123]

[9117] Editor. The Milky Way and Cupid's bow are visual metaphors for the neck and eyebrows. Pap means breast. Sale-piece suggests a feature that recommends the whole body to an admirer, as a choice sample recommends merchandise.

[9118] Burton. Printed page 463, dagger: "Læcheus." Burton's printed author-name; the precise quotation remains to be collated.

[9119] Editor. Parian marble, from the island of Paros, supplies the comparison of white, smooth flesh with stone. Læcheus is retained as printed; the exact source of the line is not yet verified.

[9120] Burton. Printed page 463, asterisk: "Arandus. vallis amænissima è duobus montibus composita niveis." Arandus: a most delightful valley formed by two snowy mountains.

[9121] Burton. Printed page 463, a: "Ovid."

[9122] Editor. Ovid, Amores 1.5.20. Premi means to be pressed or squeezed; caress conveys the erotic touch here. The earlier Latin description calls the breasts sisters and says their sight arouses even cold lovers.

[9123] Editor. Burton's source for the second breast line is not identified in the margin. The original erotic detail and the separate quotation are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A flexen hair; golden hair was even in great account, for which Virgil commends Dido, Nondum sustulerat flavum Proserpina crinem, Et crines nodantur in aurum. Apollonius (Argonaut. lib. 4. Iasonis flava coma incendit cor Medeæ) will have Iasons golden haire, to be the main cause of Medea's dotage on him.	Flaxen hair: golden hair was held in high esteem, and Virgil praises Dido for it—"Proserpina had not yet taken away the golden lock," and "her hair is tied up in gold." Apollonius, in Argonautica, book 4—"Jason's golden hair set Medea's heart on fire"—makes Jason's golden hair the chief cause of Medea's infatuation with him.[9124]
Source page 463–464 Castor and Pollux were both yellow hair'd. Paris, Menelaus, and most amorous young men have been such in all ages, molles ac suaves, as Baptista Porta infers [9125]Physiog. lib. 2. lovely to behold. Homer so commends Helena, makes Patroclus and Achilles both yellow hair'd: Pulchricoma Venus, and Cupid himself was yellow hair'd, in aurum coruscante & crispante capillo, like the neat picture of Narcissus in Callistratus; for so [9126]Psyche spied him asleep,	Castor and Pollux were both blond. Paris, Menelaus and most amorous young men in every age have been so: "soft and charming," as Giambattista della Porta concludes in Physiognomy, book 2, lovely to behold. Homer praises Helen in this way, and makes Patroclus and Achilles both blond. There is "beautiful-haired Venus," and Cupid himself was blond, "his hair gleaming and curling into gold," like the exquisite image of Narcissus in Callistratus; for so Psyche saw him sleeping.[9127]
Source page 464 Briseis, Polixena, &c. flavicomæ omnes,	Briseis, Polyxena, and so on, all golden-haired,
——and Hero the fair, Whom young Apollo courted for her hair.	——and beautiful Hero, Whom young Apollo courted for her hair.[9128]

[9124] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.698 and 4.138. The first passage concerns the lock taken before Dido's death; the second describes hair bound with gold, not necessarily golden hair. Burton repurposes both as praise of blondness. His Apollonius reference remains to be checked.

[9125] Burton. Printed page 463, dagger: "Fol. 77. Dapsiles hilares amatores, &c." Folio 77: generous, cheerful lovers, and so on.

[9126] Burton. Printed page 464, b: "When Cupid slept. Cæsariem auream habentem, ubi Psyche vidit, mollemque ex ambrosia cervicem inspexit, crines crispos, purpureas genas candidasque, &c. Apuleius." When Psyche saw him with golden hair, and looked upon his soft, ambrosial neck, his curling locks and his rosy-white cheeks, and so on. Apuleius.

[9127] Editor. Porta's description belongs to the historical practice of inferring character from appearance. Burton's generalizations about hair colour are reproduced as his claims. The exact Homer, Callistratus and Cupid parallels remain for collation.

[9128] Editor. The second line is Marlowe, Hero and Leander, First Sestyad, near the opening description of Hero. Burton introduces it with his own shortened phrase.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Leland commends Guithera King Arthurs wife for a fair flaxen hair: Paulus Æmilius sets out Clodoveus that lovely King of France. [9129]Synesius holds every effeminate fellow or adulterer is fair hair'd: and Apuleius adds that Venus her self, Goddess of Love, cannot delight, [9130]Though she come accompanied with the Graces, and all Cupids train to attend upon her, girt with her own girdle, and smell of Cynamon and Bawm, yet if she be bald or bad hair'd, she cannot please her Vulcan.	Leland praises Guithera, King Arthur's wife, for her beautiful flaxen hair; Paulus Aemilius describes Clovis, that handsome king of France. Synesius holds that every effeminate man or adulterer is fair-haired; and Apuleius adds that Venus herself, goddess of love, cannot give delight, even if she comes accompanied by the Graces and all Cupid's attendants, wearing her own girdle and smelling of cinnamon and balm: if she is bald or has ugly hair, she cannot please her Vulcan.[9131]
Which belike makes our Venetian Ladies at this day, to counterfeit yellow hair so much, great women to calimistrate and curle it up, vibrantes ad gratiam crines, & tot orbibus in captivitatem flexos, to adorn their heads with spangles, pearls, and made flowers; and all Courtiers to affect a pleasing grace in this kind. In a word, [9132]The hairs are Cupids nets, to catch all comers, a brushie wood, in which Cupid builds his nest, and under whose shadow all Lovers a thousand several ways sport themselves.	This, probably, is why our Venetian ladies nowadays so often imitate blond hair, why great ladies crimp and curl it—"waving locks for beauty, twisted into so many coils to take captives"—and adorn their heads with spangles, pearls and artificial flowers, and why all courtiers cultivate an attractive appearance in this respect. In a word, hair is Cupid's net, to catch everyone who comes near: a thicket where Cupid builds his nest, and in whose shade all lovers amuse themselves in a thousand different ways.[9133]

[9129] Burton. Printed page 464, c: "In laudem calvi; splendida coma quisque adulter est; allicit aurea coma." In Praise of Baldness: every adulterer has splendid hair; golden hair attracts.

[9130] Burton. Printed page 464, asterisk: "Venus ipsa non placeret comis nudata, capite spoliata, si qualis ipsa Venus cum fuit virgo omni gratiarum choro stipata, & toto cupidinum populo concinnata, baltheo suo cincta, cinnama fragrans, & balsama, si calva processerit, placere non potest Vulcano suo." Venus herself would not please if stripped of her hair, her head bare. Even if she appeared as in her maidenhood, surrounded by the whole company of Graces and adorned with the entire crowd of Loves, wearing her girdle and fragrant with cinnamon and balm, if she came forward bald she could not please her Vulcan.

[9131] Editor. Guithera is Burton's name for Arthur's wife; the Leland and Paulus Aemilius references remain unverified. Apuleius, Metamorphoses 2.8, contains the bald Venus comparison. Burton's English adds bad hair to baldness, and his marginal Latin also varies from Apuleius.

[9132] Burton. Printed page 464, dagger: "Arandus. Capilli retia Cupidinis, sylva cædua, in qua nidificat Cupido, sub cujus umbra amores mille modis se exercent." Arandus: hair is Cupid's net, a coppice in which Cupid nests, in whose shade loves disport themselves in a thousand ways.

[9133] Editor. Calimistrate means to curl hair with a heated iron. Made flowers are artificial flowers. The claims about Venetian fashion and the Arandus quotations are retained pending detailed source collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A little soft hand, pretty little mouth, small, fine, long fingers,	A small, soft hand, a pretty little mouth, slender, delicate, long fingers,
Gratia quæ digitis—— tis that which Apollo did admire in Daphne, ——laudat digitosque manusque;	"What grace in those fingers!"——this is what Apollo admired in Daphne: "——he praises her fingers and hands."[9134]
a straight and slender body, a small foot, and well proportioned leg, hath an excellent lustre, [9135]Cui totum incumbit corpus uti fundamento ædes. Clearchus vowed to his friend Amyander in [9136]Aristænetus, that the most attractive part in his Mistris, to make him in love and like her first, was her pretty leg and foot: a soft and white skin, &c. have their peculiar graces, [9137]Nebula haud est mollior ac hujus cutis est, ædipol papillam bellulam.	An upright, slender body, a small foot and a well-proportioned leg have an exquisite beauty: "on which the whole body rests, as a house upon its foundation." Clearchus assured his friend Amyander in Aristaenetus that the most attractive part of his mistress, which first made him like her and fall in love, was her pretty leg and foot. Soft, white skin and so on have their particular charms: "A cloud is no softer than her skin. By Pollux, what a lovely little breast!"[9138]
Though in men these parts are not so much respected; a grim Sarazan sometimes,	In men, however, these parts are less admired. Sometimes a fierce Saracen,
——nudus membra Pyracmon,	——Pyracmon, bare-limbed,[9139]

[9134] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.500, for Apollo praising Daphne's fingers and hands. The separate Gratia quæ digitis phrase is not securely attributed here; Burton has incorporated the two snippets into his prose catalogue.

[9135] Burton. Printed page 464, asterisk: "Theod. Prodromus Amor. lib. 1." Theodorus Prodromus, Love, book 1.

[9136] Burton. Printed page 464, dagger: "Epist. 72. Ubi pulchram tibiam, bene compactum tenuemque pedem vidi." Letter 72: when I saw her beautiful lower leg and her well-shaped, slender foot.

[9137] Burton. Printed page 464, d: "Plaut Cas." Plautus, Casina.

[9138] Editor. Tibia here means the lower leg, not a musical pipe. The apparent reference Epist. 72 is retained as printed. Aedipol is an oath by Pollux. The exact Aristaenetus and Plautus Casina passages remain for collation.

[9139] Editor. Pyracmon is a Cyclopean smith. Burton interrupts his sentence with the classical image of a bare-limbed worker; the precise line remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
a Martiall hirsute face pleaseth best; a black man is a pearle in a fair womans eye, and is as acceptable as [9140]lame Vulcan was to Venus; for he being a sweaty fuliginous black-smith, was dearly beloved of her, when fair Apollo, nimble Mercury were rejected, and the rest of the sweet-fac'd gods forsaken.	a martial, hairy face pleases best. A dark man is a pearl in a fair woman's eye, and as welcome as lame Vulcan was to Venus. Though he was a sweaty, sooty blacksmith, she loved him dearly, while handsome Apollo and nimble Mercury were rejected, and the rest of the sweet-faced gods abandoned.[9141]
Many women (as Petronius [9142]observes) sordibus calent (as many men are more moved with kitchin wenches, and a poor market maid, then all these illustrious Court and City dames) will sooner dote upon a slave, a servant, a Dirt-dawber, a Brontes, a Cooke, a Player, if they see his naked legs or arms, [9143]thorosaque brachia, &c. like that Huntsman Meleager in Philostratus, though he be all in raggs, obscene and dirty, besmeared like a ruddleman, a gypsie, or a chimny-sweeper, then upon a Noble Gallant, Nireus, Ephestion, Alcibiades, or those embroidered Courtiers full of silk and gold.	Many women, as Petronius observes, "are inflamed by dirt"—just as many men are more stirred by kitchen girls and a poor market girl than by all these splendid ladies of court and city. They will fall in love sooner with a slave, a servant, a mud-plasterer, a Brontes, a cook or an actor, if they see his bare legs or arms, "his muscular arms," and so on, like the hunter Meleager in Philostratus—even if he is dressed in rags, filthy and dirty, smeared like a red-ochre worker, a gypsy or a chimney-sweep—than with a noble gentleman, a Nireus, a Hephaestion, an Alcibiades, or those embroidered courtiers covered in silk and gold.[9144]

[9140] Burton. Printed page 464, asterisk: "Claudus optime rem agit." The lame man manages the business very well.

[9141] Editor. Saracen is Burton's historical label for a Muslim or eastern man. Black, beside the contrast with a fair woman and the sooty Vulcan, can concern complexion or darkened appearance; dark preserves that ambiguity. These comparisons express the period's racial and bodily stereotypes.

[9142] Burton. Printed page 464, e: "Fol. 5. Si servum viderint, aut flatorem altius cinctum, aut pulvere perfusum, aut histrionem in scenam traductum, &c." Folio 5: if they see a slave, or a bellows-worker with his clothing hitched up, or someone covered in dust, or an actor brought onto the stage, and so on. The scan appears to read flatorem; the possible reading statorem remains for collation. See the editorial note on Petronius.

[9143] Burton. Printed page 464, dagger: "Me pulcra fateor carere forma, verum luculenta —— nostra est. Petronius Catal. de Priapo," I confess I lack beautiful form, but my —— is splendid. Petronius, collected poems, on Priapus. Burton's blank conceals the sexual boast; his omission is preserved.

[9144] Editor. Petronius, Satyrica 126, supplies the contrast between high status and socially humble objects of desire. His text has statores, attendants. Burton's margin appears to read flatorem, a bellows-worker, although the old type may represent statorem. Ruddle is red ochre. The term gypsy and the contemptuous grouping of workers belong to Burton's language. The Priapus marginal quotation is a separate, not yet collated text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9145]Justines wife, a Citizen of Rome, fell in love with Pylades a Player, and was ready to run mad for him, had not Galen himself helped her by chance. Faustina the Empress doted on a Fencer.	Justine's wife, the wife of a citizen of Rome, fell in love with Pylades, an actor, and would have gone mad for him if Galen himself had not happened to help her. The empress Faustina was infatuated with a gladiator.[9146]
Source page 464–465 Not one of a thousand falls in love, but there is some peculiar part or other which pleaseth most, and inflames him above the rest. [9147]A company of young Philosophers on a time, fell at variance, which part of a woman was most desireable and pleased best? some said the forehead, some the teeth, some the eyes, cheeks, lips, neck, chin, &c. the controversie was referred to Lais of Corinth to decide, but she smiling said, they were a company of fools; for suppose they had her where they wished, what would they [9148]first seek?	Not one person in a thousand falls in love without finding some particular part more pleasing and more inflaming than all the rest. Once a group of young philosophers quarrelled over which part of a woman was most desirable and pleasing. Some said the forehead, some the teeth, some the eyes, cheeks, lips, neck, chin, and so on. They referred the dispute to Lais of Corinth for a decision; but she smiled and said they were a pack of fools. For suppose they had her where they wanted her: what would they reach for first?[9149]
Source page 465 Yet this notwithstanding I do easily grant, neque quis vestrum negaverit opinor, All parts are attractive, but especially [9150]the eys [9151]	Nevertheless, I readily grant—and "none of you, I think, will deny"—that every part is attractive, but especially the eyes:

[9145] Burton. Printed page 464, f: "Galen."

[9146] Editor. Burton gives only Galen as the source for the first story. Justines, Pylades, the supposed cure, and the Faustina anecdote remain to be checked in their respective primary accounts. Fencer here means a gladiator.

[9147] Burton. Printed page 465, dagger: "Calcagninus Apologis, Quæ pars maxime desiderabilis? alius frontem, alius genas, &c." Calcagnini, Apologues: which part is most desirable? One said the forehead, another the cheeks, and so on.

[9148] Burton. Printed page 465, asterisk: "Inter fæmineum." The female crotch or genitals; a euphemistic Latin answer to Lais's question.

[9149] Editor. Burton attributes the anecdote to Calcagnini's Apologues. The margin states the sexual answer that the main text leaves implicit. Its exact location in Calcagnini remains to be verified.

[9150] Burton. Printed page 465, g: "Hensius." The author-name is printed Hensius; detailed identification remains for collation.

[9151] Burton. Printed page 465, h: "Sunt enim oculi, præcipuæ pulchritudinis sedes. lib. 6." For the eyes are the chief seats of beauty. Book 6. No author is named in this marginal unit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
——(videt igne micantes, Syderibus similes oculos)——	——"he sees eyes flashing with fire, Like stars"——[9152]
which are Loves Fowlers; [9153]aucupium amoris, the shooing hornes, the hooks of Love (as Arandus will) the guides, touchstone, Judges, that in a moment cure mad men, and make sound folks mad, the watchmen of the body; what do they not? How vex they not? All this is true, and (which Athenæus lib. 13. dip. cap. 5. and Tatius hold) they are the chief seats of Love, and as James [9154]Lernutius hath faceteely expressed in an elegant Ode of his,	They are Love's bird-catchers, "love's bird-snare," its shoehorns, its hooks, as Arandus has it: the guides, touchstone and judges that in a moment cure madmen and drive sane people mad, the body's watchmen. What do they not do? In what way do they not torment us? All this is true; and, as Athenaeus holds in his Deipnosophists, book 13, chapter 5, and Tatius too, they are the chief seats of love. James Lernutius wittily expresses it in an elegant ode:[9155]
Amorem ocellis flammeolis heræ Vidi insidentem, credite posteri, Fratresque circum ludibundos Cum pharetra volitare & arcu, &c.	I saw Love in my mistress's fiery eyes, Seated there—believe me, generations to come — And his brothers sporting all around, Fluttering with quiver and bow, and so on.[9156]
I saw Love sitting in my Mistris eyes Sparkling, believe it all posterity, And his attendants playing round about With bow and arrows ready for to fly.	I saw Love sitting in my mistress's sparkling eyes — Believe it, all posterity— And his attendants playing all around, With bow and arrows ready to fly.

[9152] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.498–499, within Apollo's first sight of Daphne. Burton encloses the quotation in parentheses; the Hensius and book 6 marginal references beside this passage are separate references and are not silently reassigned to Ovid.

[9153] Burton. Printed page 465, dagger: "Amoris hami, duces, judices & indices qui momento insanos sanant, sanos insanire cogunt, oculatissimi corporis excubitores, quid non agunt? quid non cogunt?" Love's hooks, guides, judges and indicators, which instantly heal the insane and drive the sane mad, the body's most sharp-eyed sentries: what do they not do? What do they not compel?

[9154] Burton. Printed page 465, i: "Ocelli carm. 17. cujus & Lipsius epist. quæst. lib. 3. cap. 11. meminit ob elegantiam." Ocelli, poem 17; Lipsius too mentions its elegance in Epistolicae quaestiones, book 3, chapter 11. The latter reference remains to be checked.

[9155] Editor. Fowlers catch birds; shoehorns draw or ease something into place; a touchstone tests value. These are accumulating metaphors for attraction. The source prints faceteely, rendered wittily. Detailed checks of Arandus, Athenaeus and Tatius remain.

[9156] Editor. Janus Lernutius, Ocelli 17, begins with these four lines. Burton calls him James. Heræ means of the mistress; the eyes belong to the woman loved. The English stanza that follows is Burton's separate rendering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Scaliger calls the eyes, [9157]Cupids arrows; the tongue, the lightning of Love; the paps, the tents: Balthasar Castilio, the causes, the chariots, the lamps of Love,	Scaliger calls the eyes Cupid's arrows, the tongue Love's lightning, and the breasts Love's tents; Baldassare Castiglione calls the eyes love's causes, chariots and lamps.[9158]
——æmula lumina stellis, Lumina quæ possent sollicitare Deos.	——eyes that rival the stars, Eyes that could stir even the gods.[9159]
Eys emulating stars in light, Entizing gods at the first sight;	Eyes that rival stars in light, Enticing gods at the first sight;
Loves Orators, [9160]Petronius.	Love's orators, says Petronius:
O blandos oculos, & o facetos, Et quâdam propriâ notâ loquaces Illic est Venus, & leves amores, Atque ipsa in medio sedet voluptas.	Oh, those alluring eyes, oh, those charming eyes, Speaking in a language of their own! There are Venus and playful Loves, And in their midst sits Pleasure herself.[9161]
O sweet and pretty speaking eys, Where Venus love and pleasure lies!	Oh, sweet and pretty speaking eyes, Where Venus, love and pleasure dwell!
Loves Torches, Touch-box, Napthe and Matches, [9162]Tibullus.	Love's torches, powder-box, naphtha and matches, says Tibullus:[9163]

[9157] Burton. Printed page 465, k: "Cynthia prima suis miserum me cepit ocellis, Contactum nullis ante cupidinibus. Propert. l. 1." Cynthia was the first to capture wretched me with her eyes, untouched before by any desires. Propertius, book 1. This margin sits beside the Scaliger sentence although it quotes Propertius.

[9158] Editor. The margin beside Cupid's arrows quotes Propertius 1.1.1–2 rather than Scaliger. A further small l-like marker appears before Balthasar Castilio, but there is no additional marginal text on the page to reproduce. The exact Scaliger and Castiglione passages remain for collation.

[9159] Editor. The star-like eyes couplet has no separate source citation here. It remains unidentified rather than being assigned to the preceding named author without evidence.

[9160] Burton. Printed page 465, n: "In catalect." In the collected poems.

[9161] Editor. Burton attributes these lines to Petronius's collected poems. Their particular early printed form, including o facetos, remains to be collated. The plural Loves are personified companions of Venus.

[9162] Burton. Printed page 465, p: "De Sulpitio lib. 4." On Sulpitio, book 4. The masculine-looking printed Sulpitio is retained; the poem concerns Sulpicia.

[9163] Editor. A touch-box holds priming powder for a firearm. Naphtha is flammable liquid; matches here are material used to convey fire. Burton extends the eyes-as-fire metaphor through a series of combustible objects.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Illius ex oculis quum vult exurere divos, Accendit geminas lampades acer amor.	When fierce Love wishes to set the gods ablaze, He lights twin torches from her eyes.[9164]
Tart love when he will set the gods on fire, Lightens the eys as Torches to desire.	Fierce Love, when he wishes to set the gods on fire, Lights eyes like torches to kindle desire.
Leander at the first sight of Hero's eys, was incensed, saith Musæus.	Leander was set on fire at his first sight of Hero's eyes, says Musaeus:
Source page 465–466 Simul in [9165]oculorum radiis crescebat fax amorum, Et cor fervebat invecti ignis impetu; Pulchritudo enim celebris immaculatæ fæminæ, Acutior hominibus est veloci sagittâ. Oculus verò via est, ab oculi ictibus Vulnus dilabitur, & in præcordia viri manat.	At once in the rays of her eyes love's torch grew brighter, And his heart seethed under the force of the invading fire; For the renowned beauty of a pure maiden Is sharper for men than a swift arrow. The eye is its path: from the eye's blows The wound spreads and flows into a man's heart.[9166]
Source page 466 Loves torches gan to burn first in her eyes, And set his heart on fire, which never dies: For the fair beauty of a Virgin pure, Is sharper then a dart, and doth inure A deeper wound, which pierceth to the heart By the eyes, and causeth such a cruel smart.	Love's torches first began to burn in her eyes And set his heart on fire, a fire that never dies; For the lovely beauty of a pure maiden Is sharper than a dart, and inflicts A deeper wound, piercing through the eyes To the heart, and causing such cruel pain.

[9164] Editor. Corpus Tibullianum 3.8.5–6, also numbered 4.2.5–6, in a poem about Sulpicia. Burton's fourth-book reference follows the alternative division; the printed Sulpitio is retained in his note. The poem's attribution to Tibullus is not certain.

[9165] Burton. Printed page 465, q: "Pulchritudo ipsa per occultos radios in pectus amantis dimanans amatæ rei formam insculpsit, Tatius l. 5." Beauty itself, streaming by hidden rays into the lover's breast, engraved the beloved's image there. Tatius, book 5; Burton's location remains to be collated.

[9166] Editor. Burton presents the Latin as Musaeus, followed by his own six-line English version. The precise Latin intermediary remains to be collated; both versions are translated independently. The Tatius marginal quotation is a related comment, not part of the poem.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9167]A modern Poet brings in Amnon complaining of Thamar,	A modern poet presents Amnon lamenting over Tamar:[9168]
——& me fascino Occidit ille risus & formæ lepos, Ille nitor, illa gratia, & verus decor, Illæ æmulantes purpuram, & [9169]rosas genæ, Oculique vinctæque aureo nodo comæ.——	——and with their spell they kill me: That smile and charm of form, That radiance, that grace and true beauty, Those cheeks that rival purple and roses, Those eyes, and hair tied in a golden knot.——
It was thy beauty, 'twas thy pleasing smile, Thy grace and comeliness did me beguil, Thy rose-like cheeks, and unto purple fair Thy lovely eyes and golden knotted hair.	It was your beauty, your pleasing smile, Your grace and loveliness that bewitched me; Your rose-like cheeks, beautiful as purple, Your lovely eyes and golden, knotted hair.
[9170]Philostratus Lemnius cries out on his Mistris Basilisk eyes, ardentes faces, those two burning glasses, they had so inflamed his soul, that no water could quench it. What a tyranny, (saith he) what a penetration of bodies is this! thou drawest with violence, and swallowest me up, as Charybdis doth Saylers with thy rocky eyes; he that falls into this gulf of Love, can never get out. Let this be the Corallary then, the strongest beames of beauty, are still darted from the eyes.	Philostratus of Lemnos cries out against his mistress's basilisk eyes, "blazing torches," those two burning glasses. They had so inflamed his soul that no water could quench it. "What tyranny," he says, "what penetration of bodies is this! With your rocky eyes you violently draw me in and swallow me, as Charybdis does sailors. Anyone who falls into this gulf of love can never escape." Let this, then, be the conclusion: beauty's strongest beams are always shot from the eyes.[9171]

[9167] Burton. Printed page 466, r: "Jacob Cornelius Amnon Traged. Act. 1. sc. 1." Jacob Cornelius, Amnon, tragedy, act 1, scene 1.

[9168] Editor. Modern means post-classical, relative to Burton's classical examples. His margin names Jacob Cornelius and the play Amnon; the exact edition is not yet verified. The speech treats desire for Tamar through the familiar imagery of enchantment and beauty.

[9169] Burton. Printed page 466, s: "Rosæ formosarum oculis nascuntur, & hilaritas vultus elegantiæ corona. Philostratus delitiis." Roses grow in beautiful women's eyes, and a cheerful expression is beauty's crown. Philostratus, Delights; the exact collection remains to be identified.

[9170] Burton. Printed page 466, t: "Epist. & in delitiis, Abi & oppugnationem relinque, quam flamma non extinguit; nam ab amore ipsa flamma sentit incendium: quæ corporum penetratio, quæ tyrannis hæc? &c." Letters, and in Delights: depart and abandon the assault which flame does not extinguish; for flame itself feels love's fire. What penetration of bodies, what tyranny is this? And so on. Flamma, flame, is the printed reading.

[9171] Editor. A basilisk's gaze was thought deadly; Charybdis is the whirlpool that swallows sailors in classical myth. Burton's printed marginal flamma, flame, differs from the body's water. The source text is preserved in each place; the Philostratus attribution and intermediary collection remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9172]Nam quis lumina tanta, tanta, Posset luminibus suis tueri, Non statim trepidansque palpitansque, Præ desiderii æstuantis aurâ? &c.	For who could gaze with his own eyes Upon eyes so splendid, so splendid, Without at once trembling and throbbing In the breath of burning desire? And so on.[9173]
For who such eyes with his can see And not forthwith enamour'd be!	For who could look upon such eyes Without at once falling in love!
And as men catch dotrels, by putting out a leg or an arm, with those mutual glances of the eyes they first inveagle one another.	And just as people catch dotterels by stretching out a leg or an arm, so lovers first lure one another with those exchanged glances.[9174]
[9175]Cynthia prima suis miserum me cepit ocellis.	Cynthia was the first to capture wretched me with her eyes.[9176]
Of all eyes (by the way) black are most amiable, enticing and, fairer, which the Poet observes in commending of his Mistriss.	Of all eyes, incidentally, black eyes are the loveliest, the most alluring and beautiful, as the poet observes in praising his mistress:
[9177]Spectandum nigris oculis, nigroque capillo.	A sight worth seeing, with black eyes and black hair.[9178]
which Hesiod admires in his Alcmena,	This is what Hesiod admires in his Alcmene:

[9172] Burton. Printed page 466, dagger: "Læcheus Panthea." Læcheus, Panthea; the precise edition remains to be collated.

[9173] Editor. The repeated tanta intensifies the splendour of the eyes. The printed name Læcheus and title Panthea are preserved; the exact text remains for source collation.

[9174] Editor. Burton alludes to the old account that dotterels could be trapped by inducing them to imitate a fowler's movements. Here the shared look is itself the trap. Inveagle means entice or lure.

[9175] Burton. Printed page 466, dagger: "Propertius."

[9176] Editor. Propertius, Elegies 1.1.1. The same line appeared with the next line in Burton's earlier margin on printed 465. Its repetition here closes the argument about reciprocal glances; it is not removed as a duplicate.

[9177] Burton. Printed page 466, u: "Ovid. amorum, lib. 2. eleg. 4." Ovid, Amores 2.4.

[9178] Editor. The line is Horace, Ars poetica 37, although Burton's margin cites Ovid, Amores 2.4. In Horace it forms part of a comparison about an artist's failure to achieve a harmonious whole. The attribution is corrected here without altering Burton's source text.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9179]Cujus à vertice ac nigricantibus oculis, Tale quiddam spirat ac ab aureâ Venere.	From her head and dark eyes Breathes something like the charm of golden Venus.[9180]
From her black eyes, and from her golden face, As if from Venus came a lovely grace.	From her black eyes and her golden face Came a lovely grace, as if from Venus.
and [9181]Triton in his Milæne —— nigra oculos formosa mihi. [9182]Homer useth that Epithete of Oxe-eyed, in describing Juno, because a round black eye is the best, the Son of beauty, and farthest from black the worse:	And Triton, speaking of his Milaene: "black-eyed, beautiful to me." Homer uses the epithet "ox-eyed" to describe Juno, because a round black eye is the best, the sun of beauty, and the farther from black, the worse.[9183]
Source page 466–467 Which [9184]Polydore Virgil taxeth in our Nation; Angli ut plurimum cæsiis oculis, we have gray eyes for the most part. Baptista Porta Physiognom. lib. 3. puts gray colour upon children, they be childish eyes, dull and heavy.	Polydore Vergil criticizes this in our nation: "The English mostly have grey eyes." For the most part, our eyes are grey. Giambattista della Porta, in Physiognomy, book 3, assigns grey eyes to children: they are childish eyes, dull and heavy.[9185]

[9179] Burton. Printed page 466, dagger: "Scut. Hercul." The Shield of Heracles.

[9180] Editor. The passage is Shield of Heracles 7–8, in the opening praise of Alcmene, whose charm is compared to golden Aphrodite's. Burton's Latin gives head; his following English makes it golden face, relocating the golden epithet. The Latin intermediary remains unidentified. Both versions are translated separately.

[9181] Burton. Printed page 466, asterisk: "Calcagninus dial." Calcagnini, dialogue.

[9182] Burton. Printed page 466, x: "Iliad l." Iliad, book; no clearly legible book numeral follows in this scan.

[9183] Editor. The Triton quotation is assigned to Calcagnini's dialogue in the margin; its exact location and the name Milæne remain unresolved. Son is printed in the phrase Son of beauty; the modern text interprets this as sun. Burton supplies the inference about dark eyes; it is not part of Homer's epithet itself.

[9184] Burton. Printed page 466, y: "Hist. lib. 1." History, book 1.

[9185] Editor. Burton connects aesthetic preference with national stereotypes and physiognomy. These are historical claims, not reliable inferences about temperament from eye colour. The Polydore Vergil and Porta passages remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 467 Many commend on the other side Spanish Ladies, and those [9186]Greek Dames at this day, for the blackness of their eys, as Porta doth his Neopolitan young wives. Sueton describes Julius Cæsar to have been nigris vegetisque oculis micantibus, of a black quick sparkling eye: and although Averroes in his Colliget will have such persons timerous, yet without question they are most amorous.	Many, on the other hand, praise Spanish ladies and the Greek women of today for their black eyes, as Porta praises his young Neapolitan wives. Suetonius describes Julius Caesar as having "black, lively, sparkling eyes"—black, quick, sparkling eyes. And although Averroes, in his Colliget, calls such people timid, they are unquestionably the most amorous.[9187]

[9186] Burton. Printed page 467, z: "Sands relation fol. 67." Sandys's Relation, folio 67; the specific passage remains to be collated.

[9187] Editor. Suetonius, Julius Caesar 45, describes black, lively eyes; Burton adds micantibus, sparkling. His final claim about amorousness is retained as his own confident assertion. The Sandys, Porta and Averroes references remain to be verified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Now last of all, I will shew you by what means beauty doth fascinate, bewitch, as some hold, and work upon the soul of a man by the eye. For certainly I am of the Poets mind, Love doth bewitch and strangely change us.	Now, last of all, I shall show you how beauty fascinates—bewitches, as some maintain—and works upon a person's soul through the eye. For I certainly agree with the poet: love bewitches and strangely changes us.[9188]
[9189]Ludit amor sensus, oculos perstringit, & aufert Libertatem animi, mirâ nos fascinat arte. Credo aliquis dæmon subiens præcordia flammam Concitat, & raptam tollit de cardine mentem.	Love tricks the senses, dazzles the eyes, and steals Freedom of mind, bewitching us by wondrous art. Some demon, I think, enters the heart and kindles A flame, wrenching the captive mind off its hinges.[9190]
Love mocks our senses, curbs our liberties, And doth bewitch us with his Art and rings, I think some Divel gets into our entrals, And kindles coals, and heaves our souls frm th'hinges.	Love tricks our senses, curbs our freedom, And bewitches us with his magic and rings. I think some devil enters our entrails, Kindles coals, and heaves our souls off their hinges.

[9188] Editor. Fascinate here means bewitch or exert an occult influence, especially through the gaze. Burton is presenting historical theories of attraction, not a modern account of vision.

[9189] Burton. Printed page 467, a: "Mantuan." Baptista Mantuanus.

[9190] Editor. Baptista Mantuanus, Eclogue 1.48–51. The consulted text has praestringit, an additional et before mira, and concitet and tollat where Burton prints perstringit, omits et, and has concitat and tollit. Burton's following English version adds the rings of a magician.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Heliodorus lib. 3. proves at large, [9191]that love is witch-craft, it gets in at our eys, pores, nostrils, ingenders the same qualities, and affections in us, as were in the party whence it came. The manner of the fascination, as Ficinus 10. cap. com. in Plat. declares it, is thus: Mortal men are then especially bewitched, when as by often gazing one on the other, they direct sight to sight, joyn eye to eye, and so drink and suck in Love between them; for the beginning of this disease is the Eye. And therefore he that hath a cleer Eye, though he be otherwise deformed, by often looking upon him, will make one mad, and tie him fast to him by the eye.	Heliodorus, in book 3, argues at length that love is witchcraft: it enters through our eyes, pores and nostrils, and produces in us the same qualities and feelings as those of the person from whom it came. Ficino, in chapter 10 of his commentary on Plato, explains how this bewitchment works: "People are especially bewitched when, by repeatedly gazing at one another, they meet gaze with gaze and eye with eye, and so drink and draw love into themselves; for this disease begins in the eye. Consequently, someone with bright eyes, though otherwise misshapen, can drive another person mad by repeatedly looking at him, and bind him fast through the eye."[9192]
Leonard. Varius lib. 1. cap. 2. de fascinat. telleth us, that by this interview, [9193]the purer spirits are infected, the one Eye pierceth through the other with his rays, which he sends forth, and many men have those excellent piercing eys, that which Suetonius relates of Augustus, their brightness is such, they compel their spectators to look off, and can no more endure them then the Sun beams.	Leonardus Varius, in On Fascination, book 1, chapter 2, tells us that through this exchange of looks "the purer spirits are infected." One eye pierces the other with the rays it sends out. Many people have such remarkably penetrating eyes: as Suetonius relates of Augustus, their brightness makes those who look at them turn away, unable to bear them any more than the sun's rays.[9194]

[9191] Burton. Printed page 467, b: "Amor per oculos, nares, poros influens, &c. Mortales tum summopere fascinantur quando frequentissimo intuitu aciem dirigentes, &c. Ideo si quis nitore polleat oculorum, &c." Love entering through eyes, nostrils and pores, and so on. Mortals are most strongly bewitched when they direct their gaze with the greatest frequency, and so on. Therefore if anyone excels in brightness of eyes, and so on.

[9192] Editor. Ficino's Italian On Love 7.10 matches this account of sustained mutual gazing and attractive eyes overcoming bodily defects; Burton's chapter 10 therefore has a corresponding locus. Chapters 7.4–5 develop the spirits and contagion arguments used below. Chapter 7.10 ends by distinguishing this visual bewitchment from moderate, divine love, to which all the parts contribute. The precise Latin edition and the Heliodorus wording remain to be collated.

[9193] Burton. Printed page 467, c: "Spiritus puriores fascinantur, oculus à se radios emittit, &c." The purer spirits are bewitched; the eye emits rays from itself, and so on.

[9194] Editor. Spirits are the subtle bodily medium imagined to carry life and sensation. Interview means an exchange of looks. Suetonius, Augustus 79, says Augustus liked people to lower their gaze as before the sun; Burton makes this part of a theory of visual power.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9195]Barradius lib. 6. cap. 10. de Harmonia Evangel. reports as much of our Saviour Christ, and [9196]Peter Morales of the Virgin Mary, whom Nicephorus describes likewise to have been yellow-hair'd, of a wheat colour, but of a most amiable and piercing eye.	Barradius, in his Harmony of the Gospels, book 6, chapter 10, reports the same of our Saviour Christ, and Peter Morales of the Virgin Mary. Nicephorus likewise describes her as having yellow hair, a wheat-coloured complexion, and most lovely, penetrating eyes.[9197]
The rays, as some think, sent from the eys, carry certain spiritual vapours with them, and so infect the other party, and that in a moment. I know, they that hold visio fit intramittendo, will make a doubt of this; but Ficinus proves it from blear-eys, [9198]That by sight alone, make others blear eyed: and it is more then manifest, that the vapour of the corrupt blood doth get in together with the rays, and so by the contagion, the spectators eys are infected.	The rays sent out by the eyes, some think, carry certain vapours of the spirits with them, and thus infect the other person in an instant. I know that those who hold that "vision occurs by receiving something from outside" will question this; but Ficino proves it by inflamed eyes, "which make other people's eyes inflamed through sight alone. It is more than evident that the vapour of corrupted blood enters together with the rays, and so the observer's eyes are infected by contagion."[9199]

[9195] Burton. Printed page 467, d: "Lib. de pulch. Jes. & Mar." Book on the beauty of Jesus and Mary. The marker precedes Barradius, although this title belongs with the following reference to Morales.

[9196] Burton. Printed page 467, e: "Lib. 2. c. 23. colore triticum referente, crine, flava, acribus oculis." Book 2, chapter 23: with a complexion resembling wheat, yellow hair, piercing eyes. The compressed wording and punctuation are retained.

[9197] Editor. These descriptions belong to religious traditions about the appearance of Christ and Mary. Burton names authorities rather than eyewitness evidence. Morales's title and the Nicephorus citation are reproduced from the margins; their exact editions await collation.

[9198] Burton. Printed page 467, f: "Lippi solo intuitu alios lippos faciunt, & patet una cum radio vaporem corrupti sanguinis emanare, cujus contagione oculus spectantis inficitur." Those with inflamed eyes make others' eyes inflamed by sight alone; evidently a vapour of corrupted blood issues with the ray, infecting the onlooker's eye by contagion.

[9199] Editor. The Latin states the intromission view of sight: something enters the eye, rather than a ray being emitted from it. Burton acknowledges this objection to the emitted-ray theory. The supposed transmission of inflamed eyes by looking is part of his historical argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Other arguments there are of a Basilisk, that kills afar off by sight, as that Ephesian did of whom [9200]Philostratus speaks, of so pernicious an eye, he poysoned all he looked steddily on: and that other argument, menstruæ fæminæ, out of Aristotles Problems, morbosæ Capivaccius adds, and [9201]Septalius the Commentator, that contaminate a looking-glass with beholding it.	Further arguments concern the basilisk, which kills from a distance by sight, as did that Ephesian of whom Philostratus speaks, whose eye was so deadly that he poisoned everyone he looked at steadily. Then there is that other argument from Aristotle's Problems, concerning "menstruating women"—"diseased women," Capivaccius adds, and Septalius the commentator—who taint a mirror by looking into it.[9202]
Source page 467–468 [9203]So the beams that come from the agents heart, by the eys infect the spirits about the patients, inwardly wound, and thence the spirits infect the blood. To this effect she complained in [9204]Apuleius, Thou art the cause of my grief, thy eys piercing through mine eys to mine inner parts, have set my bowels on fire, and therefore pitty me that am now ready to dye for thy sake.	Thus the beams coming from the active person's heart through the eyes infect the spirits surrounding the person affected, wound that person inwardly, and so the spirits infect the blood. To this effect the woman in Apuleius complained: "You are the cause of my suffering. Your eyes, piercing through mine into my innermost parts, have set my entrails on fire. Pity me, then, for I am now ready to die for your sake."[9205]

[9200] Burton. Printed page 467, g: "Vita Apollon." Life of Apollonius.

[9201] Burton. Printed page 467, dagger: "Comment. in Aristot. Probl." Commentary on Aristotle's Problems.

[9202] Editor. A basilisk was a fabulous creature credited with a lethal gaze. Aristotle, On Dreams 2, describes a menstruating woman's gaze supposedly staining a polished mirror, through a change transmitted by the surrounding air. This locates a close Aristotelian parallel, without establishing Burton's route through the Problems, Capivaccius or Septalius. The mirror effect is a historical belief, not an established observation; Burton's references remain as printed.

[9203] Burton. Printed page 467, h: "Sic radius à corde percutientis missus, regimen proprium repetit, cor vulnerat, per oculos & sanguinem inficit & spiritus, subtili quadam vi. Castil. lib. 3. de aulico." Thus a ray sent from the striker's heart seeks its own seat of government, wounds the heart, and through the eyes infects both blood and spirits with a certain subtle force. Castiglione, The Courtier, book 3.

[9204] Burton. Printed page 468, i: "Lib. 10. Causa omnis & origo omnis præsentis doloris tute es; Isti enim tui oculi, per meos oculos ad intima delapsi præcordia, acerrimum meis medullis commovent incendium; ergo miserere tua causa pereuntis." Book 10. You are the whole cause and origin of all my present suffering; those eyes of yours, passing through mine into my inmost heart, kindle a fierce fire in my marrow. Therefore pity one who is dying because of you.

[9205] Editor. Agent and patient mean the person acting and the person acted upon. Apuleius, Metamorphoses 10.3: a stepmother declares her passion to her stepson. Burton shortens the speech and marginal Latin; these are translated as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 468 Ficinus illustrates this with a familiar example of that Marrhusian Phædrus and Theban Lycias, [9206]Lycias he stares on Phædrus face, and Phædrus fastens the balls of his eys upon Lycias, and with those sparkling rays sends out his spirits. The beams of Phædrus eys are easily mingled with the beams of Lycias, and spirits are joyned to spirits. This vapour begot in Phædrus heart, enters into Lycias bowels: and that which is a greater wonder, Phædrus blood is in Lycias heart, and thence come those ordinary love-speeches, my sweet heart Phædrus, and mine own self, my dear bowels. And Phædrus again to Lycias, O my light, my joy, my soul, my life.	Ficino illustrates this with the familiar example of Myrrhinusian Phaedrus and Lysias of Thebes. "Lysias stares at Phaedrus's face, and Phaedrus fixes his eyes on Lysias, sending out his spirits with those sparkling rays. The beams from Phaedrus's eyes readily mingle with those from Lysias's, and spirits join with spirits. This vapour, generated in Phaedrus's heart, enters Lysias's entrails; and, more wonderfully still, Phaedrus's blood is in Lysias's heart. Hence those ordinary expressions of love: 'Phaedrus, my sweetheart, my very self, my dear heart'; and Phaedrus in turn says to Lysias, 'Oh, my light, my joy, my soul, my life.'"[9207]
Phædrus follows Lycias, because his heart would have his spirits, and Lycias follows Phædrus, because he loves the seat of his spirits; both follow, but Lycias the earnester of the two: The river hath more need of the fountain, then the fountain of the river; as iron is drawn to that which is touched with a loadstone, but draws not it again: so Lycias draws Phædrus.	"Phaedrus follows Lysias because his heart wants its spirits back, and Lysias follows Phaedrus because he loves the home of his spirits. Both pursue the other, but Lysias more eagerly: the river needs the spring more than the spring needs the river. Just as iron is drawn towards something touched by a magnet, without drawing it back in return, so Lysias draws Phaedrus."[9208]

[9206] Burton. Printed page 468, k: "Lycias in Phædri vultum inhiat, Phædrus in oculos Lyciæ scintillas suorum defigit oculorum; cumque scintillis, &c. Sequitur Phædrus Lyciam, quia cor suum petit spiritum; Phædrum Lycias, quia spiritus propriam sedem postulat. Verum Lycias, &c." Lysias gazes open-mouthed at Phaedrus's face; Phaedrus fixes the sparks of his eyes upon Lysias's, and with those sparks, and so on. Phaedrus follows Lysias because his heart seeks its spirit; Lysias follows Phaedrus because the spirit claims its own home. But Lysias, and so on.

[9207] Editor. Ficino, On Love 7.4, calls Phaedrus Mirrinusio and Lysias a Theban orator; Burton prints Marrhusian and Lycias. The modern text uses Myrrhinusian and Lysias. This is Ficino's illustrative account of exchanged spirits. Bowels can mean the seat of tender feeling; in the endearment it becomes dear heart.

[9208] Editor. Burton ends by saying that Lysias draws Phaedrus. Ficino's consulted Italian text instead concludes that Lysias follows Phaedrus more readily than Phaedrus follows Lysias. Burton's direction of attraction is retained and the discrepancy recorded.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But how comes it to pass then, that the blind man loves, that never saw? We read in the Lives of the Fathers, a story of a child that was brought up in the wilderness, from his infancy, by an old Hermite: now come to mans estate, he saw by chance, two comely women wandring in the woods: he asked the old man what creatures they were, he told him Fayries; After a while talking obiter, the Hermite demanded of him, which was the pleasantest sight that ever he saw in his life? he readily replyed, the two [9209]Fayries he spied in the wilderness.	But how, then, does a blind man fall in love, if he has never seen? In the Lives of the Fathers we read of a child brought up from infancy in the wilderness by an old hermit. When he had grown to manhood, he happened to see two beautiful women wandering in the woods. He asked the old man what creatures they were; he told him, "Fairies." Later, in passing conversation, the hermit asked him what was the most pleasing sight he had ever seen in his life. He promptly replied, "The two fairies I saw in the wilderness."[9210]
So that without doubt, there is some secret loadstone in a beautiful woman, a magnetique power, a natural inbred affection, which moves our concupiscence, and as he sings,	So there is undoubtedly some hidden lodestone in a beautiful woman, a magnetic power, a natural, inborn affinity that stirs our desire; and, as the poet sings,
Me thinks I have a mistress yet to come, And still I seek, I love, I know not whom.	I think I have a mistress still to come; And still I seek, I love, I know not whom.[9211]

[9209] Burton. Printed page 468, dagger: "Dæmonia inquit quæ in hoc Eremo nuper occurrebant." The demons, he said, which lately appeared in this wilderness. The Latin has demons where Burton's English has fairies.

[9210] Editor. The Lives of the Fathers is a collection of stories about early Christian hermits. Burton's fairies translates the marginal dæmonia, demons or spirits. The anecdote illustrates untrained desire; it does not directly explain the preceding example of congenital blindness. Its exact source remains unresolved.

[9211] Editor. Burton gives no attribution for this couplet. Mistress means the woman loved or sought; it does not necessarily imply an adulterous relationship. The source of the lines remains to be identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis true indeed of natural and chaste love, but not of this Heroical passion, or rather brutish burning lust of which we treat; we speak of wandring, wanton, adulterous eys, which as [9212]he saith, lie still in wait as so many souldiers, and when they spy an innocent spectator fixed on them, shoot him through, and presently bewitch him: Especially when they shall gaze and glote, as wanton lovers do one upon another, and with a pleasant eye-conflict participate each others souls.	That is indeed true of natural and chaste love, but not of this heroic passion—or, rather, the brutish, burning lust we are discussing. We mean roving, wanton, adulterous eyes, which, as he says, "lie constantly in ambush like soldiers. When they see an innocent onlooker gazing at them, they shoot him through and bewitch him at once; especially when they gaze and stare amorously, as wanton lovers do at one another, sharing each other's souls in a delightful encounter of eyes."[9213]
Hence you may perceive how easily, and how quickly we may be taken in love; since at the twinkling of an Eye, Phædras spirits may so perniciously infect Lycias blood. [9214]Neither is it any wonder, if we but consider how many other diseases closely, and as suddainly are caught by infection, Plague, Itch, Scabs, Flux, &c. The spirits taken in, will not let him rest that hath received them, but egg him on.	From this you can see how easily and quickly we may be caught by love, since in the blink of an eye Phaedrus's spirits may so dangerously infect Lysias's blood. "Nor is this surprising, if we consider how many other diseases are caught imperceptibly and just as suddenly through infection: plague, itching, scabs, flux, and so on." Once absorbed, the spirits will give the person who has received them no rest, but urge him on.[9215]
[9216]Idque petit corpus mens unde est saucia amore;	It seeks the body that wounded the mind with love;[9217]

[9212] Burton. Printed page 468, l: "Castilio de aulico, l. 3. fol. 228. Oculi ut milites in insidiis semper recubant, & subito ad visum sagittas emittunt, &c." Castiglione, The Courtier, book 3, folio 228. Eyes lie continually in ambush like soldiers, and suddenly shoot arrows at a look, and so on.

[9213] Editor. Heroical passion is the learned category of excessive erotic love discussed in this partition. Glote means gaze fondly or amorously; eye-conflict turns reciprocal looking into a playful battle. The quotation is assigned to Castiglione in the margin.

[9214] Burton. Printed page 468, m: "Nec mirum si reliquos morbos qui ex contagione nascuntur consideremus, pestem, pruritum, scabiem, &c." Nor is it surprising if we consider the other diseases arising from contagion: plague, itching, scabies, and so on.

[9215] Editor. Closely means secretly or imperceptibly. Flux denotes a bowel discharge or diarrhoeal illness. Compare Ficino, On Love 7.5, for the analogy between love and diseases spread by contagion; his list differs from Burton's.

[9216] Burton. Printed page 468, n: "Lucretius."

[9217] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things, book 4, in the account of sexual desire and the body that wounds the lover. The Latin says that it seeks the body from which the mind has been wounded; Burton applies the line to the preceding account of spirits.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and we may manifestly perceive a strange eduction of spirits, by such as bleed at nose after they be dead, at the presence of the murderer; but read more of this in Lemnius lib. 2. de occult. nat. mir. cap. 7. Valleriola lib. 2. observ. cap. 7. Valesius controv. Ficinus, Cardan, Libavius de cruentis cadaveribus, &c.	And we can plainly perceive a strange drawing-out of spirits in those who bleed from the nose after death in the presence of their murderer. But read further in Lemnius, On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 2, chapter 7; Valleriola, Observations, book 2, chapter 7; Valesius's Controversies; Ficino; Cardan; Libavius, On Bleeding Corpses; and so on.[9218]

[9218] Editor. Eduction means drawing out. Burton appeals to the belief that a murdered body would bleed in its killer's presence, sometimes called cruentation. This is a historical evidentiary belief; the listed medical and natural-philosophical references await detailed collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 469 MEMB. 3. SUBSECT. 3.	MEMBER 3 SUBSECTION 3[9219]
Artificial allurements of love, causes and provocations to lust; Gestures, Cloaths, Dowre, &c.	Artificial attractions of love and incitements to lust Gestures Clothes Dowry and so on
Natural beauty is a stronger loadstone of it self, as you have heard, a great temptation, and pierceth to the very heart; [9220]forma verecundæ nocuit mihi visa puellæ; but much more when those artificial inticements and provocations of Gestures, Cloaths, Jewels, Pigments, Exornations, shall be annexed unto it; those other circumstances, opportunity of time and place shall concurr, which of themselves alone were all sufficient, each one in particular to produce this effect.	Natural beauty is itself a stronger lodestone, as you have heard: a great temptation, piercing to the very heart. "The sight of a modest maiden's beauty has wounded me." But it is much stronger still when joined by those artificial enticements and provocations—gestures, clothes, jewels, cosmetics and ornaments—and by favourable circumstances of time and place, any one of which could produce this effect by itself.[9221]

[9219] Editor. The displayed 1651 heading reads Member 3, Subsection 3, after Member 2, Subsection 2. Its running head also gives Member 3, but the preceding page's catchword says "Memb. 2." The synopsis groups all five causes under Member 2. This edition follows the displayed body sequence here and in the modern synopsis: artificial attractions are 3.2.3.3, favourable occasions are 3.2.3.4, and procurers and love potions are 3.2.3.5. Symptoms, prognosis and treatments then follow as Members 4, 5 and 6. This preserves the unusual sequence without inventing earlier subsections in Member 3.

[9220] Burton. Printed page 469, o: "In beauty, that of favor is preferred before that of Colours, and decent motion is more then that of favor. Bacons Essaies." Favour means features or appearance; decent motion means becoming movement.

[9221] Editor. Pigments are cosmetics; exornations are adornments. The Latin line is unassigned here. Bacon's Of Beauty, quoted in the margin, ranks features above colour and graceful movement above features; Burton abbreviates the formulation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is a question much controverted by some wise men, forma debeat plus arti an naturæ? Whether natural or artificial objects be more powerful? but not decided: for my part I am of opinion, that though beauty it self be a great motive, and give an excellent lustre in sordibus, in beggery, as a Jewel on a dunghil will shine and cast his rays, it cannot be suppressed, which Heliodorus fains of Chariclia, though she were in beggers weeds: yet as it is used, artificial is of more force, and much to be preferred.	Some wise men have much debated the question, "Does beauty owe more to art or to nature?" Are natural or artificial attractions more powerful? It remains undecided. For my part, I think that although beauty itself is a strong inducement, shining splendidly "amid filth," in beggary—like a jewel on a dungheap, which still shines and casts its rays, and cannot be concealed, as Heliodorus relates of Chariclea even in beggar's clothes—yet, as things are managed, artifice has greater power and deserves much preference.[9222]
[9223]Sic dentata sibi videtur Ægle, Emptis ossibus Indicoque cornu; Sic quæ nigrior est cadente moro, Cerussata sibi placet Lychoris.	So Aegle thinks herself well toothed With purchased bone and Indian ivory; So Lycoris, darker than a falling mulberry, Admires herself coated in white lead.[9224]
So toothless Ægle seems a pretty one; Set out with new bought teeth of Indy bone: So foul Lychoris blacker then berry, Her self admires, now finer then cherry.	So toothless Aegle thinks herself pretty, Decked with newly bought teeth of Indian ivory; So ugly Lycoris, blacker than a berry, Admires herself, now fairer than a cherry.

[9222] Editor. Art means skill, artifice or deliberate enhancement, not only the fine arts. Weeds means clothes. The example of Chariclea is attributed to Heliodorus; the exact passage has not yet been collated.

[9223] Burton. Printed page 469, dagger: "Martialis." Martial.

[9224] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 1.72.3–6. Cerussata means coated with white lead, a whitening cosmetic; Indian horn here is ivory used for false teeth. The contrast in complexion belongs to the poem's satirical beauty standards. Burton's English verse expands the Latin and is kept separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
John Lerius the Burgundian cap. 8. hist. navigat. in Brasil. is altogether on my side. For whereas (saith he) at our coming to Brasil, we found both men and women naked as they were born, without any covering, so much as of their privities, and could not be perswaded, by our Frenchmen that lived a year with them, to wear any, [9225]Many will think that our so long commerce with naked women, must needs be a great provocation to lust; but he concludes otherwise, that their nakedness did much less entice them to lasciviousness, then our womens cloaths.	John Léry of Burgundy, in chapter 8 of his History of a Voyage to Brazil, is entirely on my side. "When we arrived in Brazil," he says, "we found both men and women as naked as at birth, without any covering, even over their private parts; and our Frenchmen, who lived with them for a year, could not persuade them to wear any. Many will think that our prolonged association with naked women must have been a great incitement to lust." But he concludes otherwise: their nakedness stirred lust far less than our women's clothes.[9226]
And I dare boldly affirm (saith he) that those glittering attires, counterfeit colors, headgears, curled hairs, plaited coats, cloaks, gowns, costly stomachers, guarded and loose garments, and all those other coutrements, wherewith our countrywomen counterfeit a beauty, and so curiously set out themselves, cause more inconvenience in this kind, then that Barbarian homeliness, although they be no whit inferior unto them in beauty. I could evince the truth of this by many other arguments, but I appeal (saith he) to my companions at that present, which were all of the same mind.	"And I boldly affirm," he says, "that those glittering outfits, artificial colours, headdresses, curled hair, pleated coats, cloaks, gowns, costly bodice panels, trimmed and loose garments, and all those other accessories by which our countrywomen fabricate beauty and so elaborately display themselves cause more mischief of this kind than that barbarian simplicity, although those women are in no way inferior to ours in beauty. I could prove this by many other arguments, but I appeal to my companions at the time, who were all of the same opinion."[9227]

[9225] Burton. Printed page 469, p: "Multi tacitè opinantur commercium illud adeo frequens cum Barbaris nudis, ac præsertim cum fæminis, ad libidinem provocare, at minus multò noxia illorum nuditas quàm nostrarum fæminarum cultus. Ausim asseverare splendidum illum cultum, fucos, &c." Many privately suppose that such frequent intercourse with naked barbarians, especially women, incites lust; yet their nakedness is far less harmful than our women's dress. I would venture to assert that splendid dress, cosmetics, and so on.

[9226] Editor. Jean de Léry, History of a Voyage to Brazil, chapter 8; the corresponding passage was checked in the French text. Commerce means association or dealings, not necessarily trade. Léry's argument compares the effect of habitual nakedness with elaborate European dress.

[9227] Editor. Stomachers are ornamental panels over the front of the bodice; guarded garments have decorative borders or trimmings. Homeliness here means plainness. Barbarian reproduces the European author's designation; the passage nonetheless explicitly grants the women equal natural beauty.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 469–470 His country-man Montague in his Essayes, is of the same opinion, and are so many others; out of whose assertions thus much in brief we may conclude: that Beauty is more beholding to Art then Nature, and stronger provocations proceed from outward ornaments, then such as nature hath provided.	His countryman Montaigne, in his Essays, agrees, as do many others. From their assertions we may briefly conclude that beauty owes more to art than to nature, and that outward ornaments provoke more strongly than the attractions nature supplies.[9228]
Source page 470 It is true that those fair sparkling eys, white neck, coral lips, turgent Paps, Rose-colored cheeks, &c. of themselves are potent enticers; but when a comely, artificial, well-composed look, pleasing gesture, an affected carriage shall be added, it must needs be far more forcible then it was, when those curious needle-works, variety of colours, purest dyes, Jewels, spangles, pendants, lawn, lace, tiffanies, fair and fine linnen, embroideries, calamistrations, oyntments, &c. shall be added, they will make the veriest dowdy otherwise, a Goddess, when nature shall be furthered by Art.	It is true that those lovely, sparkling eyes, white neck, coral lips, swelling breasts, rose-coloured cheeks and so on are powerful enticements in themselves. But when an attractive, artful, carefully composed expression, a pleasing gesture and a studied bearing are added, the effect must be far stronger. Add elaborate needlework, varied colours, the finest dyes, jewels, spangles, pendants, lawn, lace, gauzes, fine white linen, embroidery, curled hair, ointments and so on, and they will turn even the dowdiest woman into a goddess, when art assists nature.[9229]

[9228] Editor. Montague is Montaigne. Essays 2.15, on desire increased by difficulty, discusses masks, veils and farthingales as devices that heighten desire by obstructing access. This is a close parallel for Burton's claim, although it does not prove which passage or edition he used, or his broader ranking of art above nature. Beholding means beholden or indebted.

[9229] Editor. Lawn is fine linen; tiffany is a light, transparent fabric. Calamistrations means curling the hair. The catalogue moves between textiles, ornaments, hairstyles and cosmetics.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For it is not the eye of it self that enticeth to lust, but an adulterous eye, as Peter terms it, 2. 2. 14. a wanton, a rolling, lascivious eye: A wandring eye, which Isaiah taxeth, 3. 16. Christ himself, and the Virgin Mary had most beautiful eys, as amiable eys as any persons, saith [9230]Barradius, that ever lived, but withall so modest, so chaste, that whosoever looked on them, was freed from that passion of burning lust, if we may believe [9231]Gerson and [9232]Bonaventure: there was no such Antidote against it, as the Virgin Maries face; 'Tis not the eye, but carriage of it, as they use it, that causeth such effects.	For it is not the eye itself that incites lust, but an "adulterous eye," as Peter calls it in his second epistle, 2:14: a wanton, roving, lustful eye, the wandering eye Isaiah condemns in 3:16. Christ himself and the Virgin Mary had most beautiful eyes—as lovely, Barradius says, as those of anyone who ever lived—but also so modest and chaste that whoever looked at them was freed from burning lust, if we may believe Gerson and Bonaventure. There was no antidote like the Virgin Mary's face. It is not the eye, but how it is used, that causes such effects.[9233]
When Pallas, Juno, Venus, were to win Paris favour for the golden apple, as it is elegantly described in that pleasant enterlude of [9234]Apuleius, Juno came with majesty upon the stage, Minerva gravely, but Venus, dulce subridens, constitit amœnè; & gratissimæ Gratiæ deam propitiantes, &c. came in smiling with her gratious graces and exquisite Musick, as if she had danced, & nonnunquam saltare solis oculis, and which was the main matter of all, she danced with her rolling eys: they were the Brokers and Habingers of her sute. So she makes her brags in a modern Poet,	When Pallas, Juno and Venus sought Paris's favour and the golden apple, as elegantly described in Apuleius's delightful interlude, Juno came majestically onto the stage and Minerva gravely. But Venus "stood charmingly, smiling sweetly, while the most gracious Graces attended upon the goddess," and so on. She entered smiling, with her gracious Graces and exquisite music, as though dancing, "and sometimes dancing with her eyes alone." That was the chief thing: she danced with her roving eyes, the brokers and heralds of her suit. So she boasts in a modern poet:[9235]

[9230] Burton. Printed page 470, q: "Harmo. evangel. lib. 6. cap. 6." Harmony of the Gospels, book 6, chapter 6. Printed 467 cited chapter 10.

[9231] Burton. Printed page 470, r: "Serm. de concep. virg. Physiognomia virginis omnes movet ad castitatem." Sermon on the Virgin's conception. The Virgin's appearance moves everyone to chastity.

[9232] Burton. Printed page 470, s: "3. sent. d. 3. q. 3. mirum, virgo formosissima, sed à nemine concupita." Sentences, book 3, distinction 3, question 3. Wonderful: a most beautiful virgin, yet desired by no one.

[9233] Editor. Burton cites 2 Peter 2:14 and Isaiah 3:16 for wanton eyes, then contrasts them with the chaste gaze attributed to Christ and Mary. His notes assign the theological statements to Barradius, Gerson and Bonaventure; their edition-specific references are retained.

[9234] Burton. Printed page 470, dagger: "Met. 10." Apuleius, Metamorphoses, book 10.

[9235] Editor. Apuleius, Metamorphoses 10.30–32, describes a staged Judgment of Paris. Burton's account compresses the performance and its attending Graces. Pallas and Minerva name the same goddess; suit means the request for Paris's favourable judgment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9236]Soon could I make my brow to tyrannize, And force the world do homage to mine eys.	Soon I could make my brow rule tyrannically, And force the world to pay homage to my eyes.[9237]
The eye is a secret Orator, the first bawde, Amoris porta, and with private looks, winking, glances and smiles, as so many dialogues they make up the match many times, and understand one anothers meanings, before they come to speak a word. [9238]Eurialus and Lucretia were so mutually enamored by the eye, and prepared to give each other entertainment, before ever they had conference: he asked her good will with his eye; she did suffragari, and gave consent with a pleasant look.	The eye is a secret orator, the first go-between, "love's gateway." Secret looks, winks, glances and smiles serve as dialogues: often lovers arrange the match and understand each other before speaking a word. Euryalus and Lucretia were thus mutually captivated through the eyes and ready to welcome one another before they had ever spoken together. He asked for her favour with his eyes; she "assented," giving consent with a pleasing look.[9239]

[9236] Burton. Printed page 470, dagger: "Rosamonds complaint, by Sam. Daniel."

[9237] Editor. Samuel Daniel, The Complaint of Rosamond. The consulted 1592 text reads teach my browe and make the world where Burton has make my brow and force the world. Rosamond is the speaker in Daniel; Burton introduces her words while discussing Venus.

[9238] Burton. Printed page 470, t: "Æneas Silv." Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini.

[9239] Editor. Bawd can mean a procurer or sexual intermediary. The story of Euryalus and Lucretia is assigned to Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini; Burton's exact wording remains to be collated. Suffragari means give support or assent.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That [9240]Thracian Rodope was so excellent at this dumb Rhetorick, that if she had but looked upon any one almost (saith Calisiris) she would have bewitched him, and he could not possibly escape it. For as [9241]Salvianus observes, the eys are the windows of our souls, by which as so many channels, all dishonest concupiscence gets into our hearts. They reveal our thoughts, and as they say, frons animi index, but the eye of the countenance,	That Thracian Rhodope was so skilful in this silent rhetoric that, Calasiris says, if she so much as looked at almost anyone, she would bewitch him and he could not possibly escape. For, as Salvian observes, "the eyes are the windows of our souls, through which, as through so many channels, all unchaste desire enters our hearts." They reveal our thoughts and, as the saying goes, "the face is the index of the mind": but the eye is the index of the face.[9242]
[9243]Quid procacibus intuere ocellis? &c.	Why do you look with such shameless eyes? And so on.[9244]

[9240] Burton. Printed page 470, u: "Heliodor. l. 2. Rodope Thracia tam inevitabili fascino instructa, tam exacte oculis intuens attraxit, ut si in illam quis incidisset, fieri non posset quin caperetur." Heliodorus, book 2. Rhodope of Thrace possessed such inescapable fascination, and drew people by so intent a gaze, that anyone who encountered her could not avoid capture.

[9241] Burton. Printed page 470, x: "Lib. 3. de providentia: Animi fenestræ oculi, & omnis improba cupiditas per ocellos tanquam canales introit." On Providence, book 3. The eyes are the soul's windows; every wicked desire enters through the eyes as through channels.

[9242] Editor. Salvian, On the Government of God 3.8, explains the windows-and-channels image while expounding Matthew 5:28: Christians should restrain desire at the point of looking. Burton's On Providence is the title used in his margin; the passage is independently located in book 3. The modern text supplies the ellipsis: the face indicates the mind, the eye the face. Calisiris becomes Calasiris; the Heliodorus passage and the Latin intermediary remain uncollated.

[9243] Burton. Printed page 470, dagger: "Buchanan."

[9244] Editor. Attributed in the margin to George Buchanan. The line asks why someone looks with forward or shameless eyes; its precise poem and textual form remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 470–471 I may say the same of smiling, gate, nakedness of parts, plausible gestures, &c. To laugh is the proper passion of a man, an ordinary thing to smile; but those counterfeit, composed, affected, artificial and reciprocal, those counter-smiles are the dumb shews and prognosticks of greater matters, which they most part use, to inveagle and deceive; though many fond lovers again are so frequently mistaken, and led into a fools paradise.	I may say the same of smiling, gait, exposed parts of the body, appealing gestures and so on. Laughter is an attribute peculiar to human beings, and smiling is ordinary; but those feigned, composed, affected, artful, exchanged smiles—those answering smiles—are silent displays and foretastes of greater things, mostly used to entice and deceive. Yet many foolish lovers are repeatedly mistaken and led into a fool's paradise.[9245]
Source page 471 For if they see but a fair maid laugh, or shew a pleasant countenance, use some gratious words or gestures, they apply it all to themselves, as done in their favour, sure she loves them, she is willing, coming, &c.	For if they merely see a pretty young woman laugh, look pleasant, or use gracious words or gestures, they take it all personally, as done in their favour: surely she loves them; she is willing, yielding, and so on.
Stultus quando videt quod pulchra puella ridet, Tum fatuus credit se quod amare velit:	When a fool sees a pretty young woman smile, The simpleton thinks that she wants to love him.[9246]
When a fool sees a fair maid for to smile, He thinks she loves him, 'tis but to beguile.	When a fool sees a pretty young woman smile, He thinks she loves him; it is only a lure.
They make an art of it, as the Poet telleth us,	They make an art of it, as the poet tells us,
[9247]Quis credat? discunt etiam ridere puellæ, Quæritur atque illis hac quoque parte decor:	Who would believe it? Girls even learn to laugh, And seek attractiveness in this too.[9248]

[9245] Editor. Proper passion is a logical expression for a characteristic property: the traditional example is the human capacity for laughter. Dumb shows are wordless performances; prognostics are signs of what is to come. Fond here means foolish.

[9246] Editor. An unattributed rhyming Latin couplet. Burton's English version adds the claim that the woman means to deceive; that addition is preserved in its own modernized couplet.

[9247] Burton. Printed page 471, y: "Ovid de arte amandi." Ovid, The Art of Love.

[9248] Editor. Ovid, The Art of Love 3.281–282. The consulted Latin has aque illis, from a/ab, where Burton prints atque illis. The modern rendering conveys the sense that women seek attractiveness in laughter as well.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Who can believe? to laugh maids make an Art, And seek a pleasant grace to that same part.	Who would believe it? Girls make laughter an art, Seeking a pleasing grace in that as well.
And 'tis as great an enticement as any of the rest,	And it is as powerful an enticement as any of the rest:
——[9249]subrisit molle puella, Cor tibi ritè salit.——	——a girl smiled sweetly: Does your heart beat as it should?——[9250]
She makes thine heart leap with [9251]a pleasing gentle smile of hers.	She makes your heart leap with her pleasing, gentle smile.[9252]
[9253]Dulce ridentem Lalagen amabo, Dulce loquentem,	I shall love Lalage, sweetly laughing, Sweetly speaking,[9254]

[9249] Burton. Printed page 471, z: "Pers. 3. Sat." Persius, Satire 3.

[9250] Editor. Persius, Satire 3.110–111. The question is whether the heart still beats normally at an attractive sight; Burton prints the excerpt as a statement, then glosses it as the heart leaping. The Latin translation preserves the interrogative sense, while the following prose preserves Burton's gloss.

[9251] Burton. Printed page 471, a: "Vel centum Charites ridere putaret, Musæus of Hero." One would think a hundred Graces were smiling. Musaeus, of Hero.

[9252] Editor. Charites are the Graces, divine embodiments of charm. Burton's marginal Latin imagines a hundred of them smiling in Hero; the precise Latin version of Musaeus remains to be identified.

[9253] Burton. Printed page 471, b: "Hor. Od. 22. lib. 1." Horace, Odes 1.22.

[9254] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.22.23–24. The lines are kept apart from Burton's ensuing prose paraphrase, so both the quotation and his repetition remain visible.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I love Lalage as much for smiling, as for discoursing, delectata illa risit tam blandum, as he said in Petronius of his Mistris, being well pleased, she gave so sweet a smile. It won [9255]Ismenius, as he confesseth, Ismene subrisit amatorium, Ismene smiled so lovingly the second time I saw her, that I could not chuse but admire her: And Galla's sweet smile quite overcame [9256]Faustus the Shepheard,	I love Lalage as much for smiling as for talking. "Delighted, she smiled so sweetly," as the man in Petronius said of his mistress: pleased, she gave such a sweet smile. It won over Ismenias, as he confesses: "Ismene smiled amorously." The second time I saw her, Ismene smiled so lovingly that I could not help admiring her. And Galla's sweet smile quite overcame Faustus the shepherd:[9257]
Me aspiciens motis blandè subrisit ocellis.	Looking at me, she smiled sweetly, her eyes playing.[9258]
All other gestures of the body will enforce as much. Daphnis [9259]in Lucian was a poor tattered wench, when I knew her first, said Corbile, pannosa & lacera, but now she is a stately peece indeed, hath her maids to attend her, brave attires, mony in her purse, &c. and will you know how this came to pass? by setting out her self after the best fashion, by her pleasant carriage, affability, sweet smiling upon all, &c.	All other bodily gestures can have as much effect. "Daphnis in Lucian was a poor ragged girl when I first knew her," said Corbile, "in tatters and rags; but now she is a splendid creature indeed, with maids to attend her, fine clothes, money in her purse, and so on. Would you know how this happened? By presenting herself in the best fashion, by her pleasing manner, friendliness, and sweet smiles for everyone."[9260]

[9255] Burton. Printed page 471, c: "Eustathius l. 5." Eustathius, book 5.

[9256] Burton. Printed page 471, dagger: "Mantuan." Baptista Mantuanus.

[9257] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 127, supplies the quoted description of Circe's smile. Ismenius and Ismene are the lovers of the romance attributed here to Eustathius; their names are modernized to Ismenias and Ismene. The Eustathius passage remains to be collated.

[9258] Editor. Baptista Mantuanus, Eclogue 1.104: Galla looks back at Faustus and smiles. Motis ocellis gives the movement or play of her eyes, rather than only the smile.

[9259] Burton. Printed page 471, dagger: "Tom. 4. merit. dial. Exornando seipsam eleganter, facilem & hilarem se gerendo erga cunctos, ridendo suave ac blandum quid, &c." Volume 4, Dialogues of Courtesans. By adorning herself elegantly, behaving amiably and cheerfully towards everyone, smiling sweetly and charmingly, and so on.

[9260] Editor. Burton assigns the story to Lucian's Dialogues of Courtesans. The names Daphnis and Corbile and the printed volume reference are retained; exact identification and wording remain for collation. Brave here means splendid, not courageous.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many women dote upon a man for his complements only, and good behaviour, they are won in an instant; too credulous to believe that every light, wanton sutor, who sees or makes love to them, is instantly inamored, he certainly dotes on, admires them, will surely marry, when as he means nothing less, 'tis his ordinary carriage in all such companies.	Many women fall for a man simply because of his courtesies and good manners; they are won in an instant. They are too ready to believe that every frivolous, wanton suitor who sees or courts them is instantly in love: surely he adores and admires them; surely he will marry them. Yet nothing is further from his intention: this is his usual behaviour in all such company.
So both delude each other, by such outward shews, and amongst the rest, an upright, a comely grace, curtesies, gentle salutations, cringes, a mincing gate, a decent and an affected pace, are most powerful enticers, and which the Prophet Esay a Courtier himself, and a great observer, objected to the daughters of Sion 3. 16. they minced as they went, and made a tinkling with their feet. To say the truth, what can they not effect by such means?	So both deceive each other by such outward displays. Among these, an upright and graceful bearing, curtsies, gentle greetings, bows, a mincing gait, and a becoming, studied walk are powerful enticements. The prophet Isaiah, himself a courtier and a keen observer, reproached the daughters of Zion for these in 3:16: "They minced as they walked, and made a tinkling with their feet." To tell the truth, what can they not accomplish by such means?[9261]

[9261] Editor. Complements means polite attentions or courtesies. Cringes are bows; decent means becoming or suitable. Isaiah 3:16 supplies the mincing walk and tinkling feet. Burton's description of Isaiah as a courtier is his characterization.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whilst nature decks them in their best attires Of youth and beauty which the world admires,	While nature dresses them in the finest clothes Of youth and beauty, which the world admires,[9262]
[9263]Urit ——voce, manu, gressu, pectore, fronte, oculis.	She sets us on fire—with voice, hand, step, Breast, brow and eyes.[9264]
Source page 471–472 When Art shall be annexed to beauty, when wiles and guiles shall concur: for to speak as it is, Love is a kind of legerdemain; meer jugling, a fascination) When they shew their fair hand, fine foot and leg withal, magnum sui desiderium nobis relinquunt, saith [9265]Balthazar Castilio lib. 1. they set us a longing, and so when they pull up their petty-coats, and outward garments, as usually they do to shew their fine stockings, and those of purest silken dye, gold fringes, laces, embroydrings, (it shall go hard but when they go to Church, or to any other place, all shall be seen) 'tis but a springe to catch woodcocks; and as [9266]Chrysostome telleth them down-right, though they say nothing with their mouths, they speak in their gate, they speak with their eys, they speak in the carriage of their bodies.	When art is added to beauty, when tricks and deceits work together—for, to speak plainly, love is a kind of sleight of hand, mere trickery, a bewitchment—when they show their lovely hand, fine foot and leg, "they leave us with a great longing for them," says Baldassare Castiglione in book 1: they set us longing. So too when they lift their petticoats and outer clothes, as they commonly do to show their fine stockings of the richest dyed silk, gold fringes, lace and embroidery—they will take care, when going to church or anywhere else, that everything is seen —it is merely a snare to catch fools. As Chrysostom tells them bluntly, "Though they say nothing with their mouths, they speak in their walk, they speak with their eyes, they speak through the bearing of their bodies."[9267]

[9262] Editor. No source is supplied for this English couplet. Nature's finest attire is youth and beauty; the next lines shift from these natural attractions to deliberate enhancement.

[9263] Burton. Printed page 471, dagger: "Angerianus." Angerianus.

[9264] Editor. The margin attributes the line to Angerianus. Gressu is by her step or gait. The single printed Latin line is divided into two in modern English for readability; its exact source remains to be collated.

[9265] Burton. Printed page 472, d: "Vel si forte vestimentum de industria elevetur, ut pedum ac tibiarum pars aliqua conspiciatur, dum templum aut locum aliquem adierit." Or if a garment happens to be deliberately raised so that some part of the feet and legs is visible, while she goes to church or elsewhere.

[9266] Burton. Printed page 472, e: "Sermone, quod non fæminæ viris cohabitent. Non loquuta es lingua, sed loquuta es gressu: non loquuta es voce, sed oculis loquuta es clarius quàm voce." In the sermon That Women Should Not Live with Men. You have not spoken with your tongue, but with your walk; not with your voice, but more clearly with your eyes than with your voice.

[9267] Editor. Legerdemain means sleight of hand. A springe is a snare and woodcock can mean an easily deceived person. The opening source sentence has an unmatched closing parenthesis; modern punctuation makes its aside explicit. The moral judgment about women's presentation belongs to Burton's argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 472 And what shall we say otherwise of that baring of their necks, shoulders, naked breasts, arms and wrists, to what end are they but only to tempt men to lust!	And what else can we say of their baring their necks, shoulders, breasts, arms and wrists? What purpose does it serve except to tempt men to lust?
[9268]Nam quid lacteolus sinus, & ipsas Præ te fers sine linteo papillas? Hoc est dicere, posce, posce, trado; Hoc est ad Venerem vocare amantes:	Why display your milk-white bosom, Your very breasts, without a cloth to cover them? This is to say, "Ask, ask: I yield"; This is to summon lovers to love.[9269]
There needs no more as [9270]Fredericus Matenesius well observes, but a cryer to go before them so dressed, to bid us look out, a trumpet to sound, or for defect a Sowgelder to blow,	As Fredericus Matenesius aptly observes, all that is lacking is a crier to go before them dressed like that and tell us to look, a trumpet to sound—or, failing that, a sow-gelder to blow his horn:[9271]
[9272]Look out look out and see What object this may be That doth perstringe mine eye: A gallant Lady goes, In rich and gaudy clothes, But whether away God knows, ——look out. &c. & quæ sequuntur,	Look out, look out and see What sight this may be That dazzles my eye: A splendid lady goes In rich and showy clothes, But where, God only knows. ——Look out, and so on, and what follows.

[9268] Burton. Printed page 472, dagger: "Jovianus Pontanus Baiar lib. 1. ad Hermionem." Giovanni Pontano, Baiae, book 1, To Hermione.

[9269] Editor. Burton attributes the verses to Pontano, Baiae, book 1, To Hermione. The source prints lacteolus sinus, an awkward grammatical form; the sense is the milk-white bosom. The complete quotation and title have not yet been collated against Pontano's text. Venus stands for sexual love.

[9270] Burton. Printed page 472, asterisk: "De luxu vestium discurs. 6. Nihil aliud deest nisi ut præco vos præcedat, &c." On Luxury in Dress, discourse 6. Nothing is lacking except a herald to walk before you, and so on.

[9271] Editor. A sow-gelder castrated pigs and advertised by a horn. Burton comically substitutes this tradesman for a herald or trumpeter, then offers the following song. Perstringe means dazzle or strike the eye. The tune and the Matenesius reference remain to be traced.

[9272] Burton. Printed page 472, y: "If you can tell how, you may sing this to the tune, a Sow-gelder blows."

Original text 1651	Modern English
or to what end and purpose? But to leave all these phantastical raptures, Ile prosecute mine intended Theam. Nakedness, as I have said, is an odious thing of it self, remedium amoris; yet it may be so used, in part, and at set times, that there can be no such enticement as it is;	Or to what end and purpose? But leaving these fanciful flights aside, I shall pursue my intended subject. Nakedness, as I have said, is repulsive in itself, "a remedy for love"; yet when used partially and at chosen times it can be the most powerful enticement of all:
[9273]Nec mihi cincta Diana placet, nec nuda Cythere, Illa voluptatis nil habet, hæc nimium.	Neither clothed Diana nor naked Venus pleases me: The one has no sensual delight, the other too much.[9274]
David so espied Bersheba, the Elders Susanna: [9275]Apelles was inamored with Campaspe, when he was to paint her naked. Tiberius in Suet. cap. 42. supped with Sestius Gallus an old leacher, libidinoso sene, eâ lege ut nudæ puellæ administrarent; some say as much of Nero, and Pontus Huter of Carolus Pugnax.	That was how David saw Bathsheba, and the elders Susanna. Apelles fell in love with Campaspe when he was to paint her naked. Tiberius, in Suetonius, chapter 42, dined with Sestius Gallus, an old lecher—"a lustful old man"—"on condition that naked girls should serve." Some say the same of Nero, and Pontus Heuter of Charles the Bold.[9276]

[9273] Burton. Printed page 472, e: "Auson. epig. 28." Ausonius, Epigram 28, in Burton's numbering. The letter e is repeated on this page.

[9274] Editor. Ausonius, the epigram beginning Hanc volo quae non volt. The consulted Latin text has nec bis cincta, neither twice-girded or closely clothed, where Burton prints nec mihi cincta, neither clothed … pleases me. Burton's wording is translated. Cythere is Venus; numbering varies between editions.

[9275] Burton. Printed page 472, f: "Plin. lib. 33. cap. 10. Campaspen Nudam picturus Apelles, amore ejus illaqueatus est." Pliny, book 33, chapter 10. When Apelles was to paint Campaspe naked, he was ensnared by love for her. The printed reference is retained.

[9276] Editor. Bathsheba and Susanna are the biblical bathing episodes. Suetonius, Tiberius 42, calls the host Cestius Gallus, rather than Burton's Sestius; both Latin formulations of the dinner condition convey service by naked women. The Pliny reference is printed 33.10; that reference and the Nero and Heuter claims await full collation. Carolus Pugnax is Charles the Bold.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Amongst the Babylonians, it was the custome of some lascivious queans to dance friskin in that fashion, saith Curtius lib. 5. and Sardus de mor. gent. lib. 1. writes of others to that effect. The [9277]Tuscans at some set banquets, had naked women to attend upon them, which Leonicus de Varia hist. lib. 3. cap. 96. confirms of such other bawdy nations.	Among the Babylonians, some lustful women used to dance and frisk in that fashion, says Curtius in book 5; and Sardus, in Customs of Peoples, book 1, writes similarly of others. At certain formal banquets the Etruscans had naked women to wait on them, a practice Leonicus, in his Miscellaneous History, book 3, chapter 96, also records of other lewd nations.[9278]
Nero would have filthy pictures still hanging in his chamber, which is too commonly used in our times; and Heliogabalus, etiam coram agentes, ut ad venerem incitarent: So things may be abused. A servant maid in Aristænetus, spyed her Master and Mistress through the keyhole [9279]merily disposed; upon the sight she fell in love with her Master.	Nero always wanted obscene pictures hanging in his room, a practice all too common in our time; and Heliogabalus "even had people performing before him, to arouse his lust." So things can be misused. A servant in Aristaenetus watched her master and mistress through the keyhole as they were enjoying themselves; the sight made her fall in love with her master.[9280]

[9277] Burton. Printed page 472, g: "In Tyrrhenis conviviis nudæ mulieres ministrabant." At Etruscan banquets naked women served.

[9278] Editor. Tuscans here means the ancient Etruscans. These are Burton's reports and moral descriptions of other peoples, drawn from the named writers; the particular Curtius, Sardus and Leonicus passages remain to be collated.

[9279] Burton. Printed page 472, asterisk: "Amatoria miscentes vidit, & in ipsis complexibus audit, &c. emersit inde cupido in pectus Virginis." She saw them making love, and hears them in their embraces, and so on; from this desire arose in the maiden's heart.

[9280] Editor. Merily disposed is a euphemism for sexual activity, made explicit by the marginal Latin. Heliogabalus is the emperor also called Elagabalus. These anecdotes are preserved as Burton's cited examples, with their individual sources still requiring collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 472–473 [9281]Antoninus Caracalla observed his mother in law with her breasts amorously laid open, he was so much moved, that he said, Ah si liceret, O that I might; which she by chance over-hearing, replyed as impudently, [9282]Quicquid libet licet, thou maist do what thou wilt: And upon that temptation he married her: this object was not in cause, not the thing it self, but that unseemly, undecent carriage of it.	Antoninus Caracalla saw his stepmother with her breasts enticingly exposed. He was so stirred that he said, “Ah, if only it were allowed!”—“Oh, if only I might!” She happened to overhear and replied just as shamelessly, “Whatever you please is permitted”: you may do what you wish. Tempted by this, he married her. The object itself was not the cause, but its unseemly, indecent presentation.[9283]
Source page 473 When you have all done, veniunt à veste sagittæ, the greatest provocations of lust are from our apparel; God makes, they say, man shapes, and there is no motive like unto it;	When all is said and done, “the arrows come from clothing”: the greatest provocations to lust come from our apparel. God makes, they say, and man shapes; and there is no inducement like it.[9284]
[9285]Which doth even Beauty beautifie, And most bewitch a wretched eye.	It makes even beauty more beautiful, And utterly bewitches a wretched eye.[9286]

[9281] Burton. Printed page 472, dagger: “Epist. 7. lib. 2.” Letter 7, book 2. The dagger stands before Antoninus; this bibliographical form appears to refer back to Aristaenetus. Its placement is retained.

[9282] Burton. Printed page 473, h: “Spartian.” Spartianus, the name attached to the Life of Caracalla in the Historia Augusta.

[9283] Editor. The story is in the Historia Augusta, Life of Caracalla 10.1–4, attributed to Spartianus. The consulted edition identifies the alleged marriage and stepmother relationship as fabrications: Julia Domna was Caracalla’s mother. Mother in law here therefore means the stepmother of the story, not a wife’s mother. Burton’s account is preserved without treating it as established history.

[9284] Editor. The arrows are those of erotic attraction: Burton now turns from exposed beauty to clothing itself. The maxim contrasts God’s making of the person with the human shaping of appearance. No separate author is named for the Latin phrase here.

[9285] Burton. Printed page 473, asterisk: “Sidneys Arcadia.” Philip Sidney, Arcadia.

[9286] Editor. Sidney’s Arcadia, in Zelmane’s song beginning “What tongue can her perfection tell,” praises Philoclea. The preceding lines attribute a special grace to the Graces, becoming her limbs at every time and place; Burton transfers the couplet to apparel. The consulted text reads “the wretched eye,” against Burton’s “a wretched eye.” His wording and the deliberate beauty/beautify repetition are preserved; his particular edition remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
a filthy knave, a deformed quean, a crooked carkass, a maukin, a witch, a rotten post, an hedgstake may be so set out and tricked up, that it shall make as fair a shew, as much enamour as the rest: many a silly fellow is so taken. Primum luxuriæ aucupium, one calls it, the first snare of lust; [9287]Bossus aucupium animarum, lethalem arundinem, a fatal reed, the greatest bawd, forte lenocinium, sanguineis lachrymis deplorandum, saith [9288]Matenesius, and with tears of blood to be deplored.	A filthy rogue, an ugly hussy, a crooked carcass, a slattern, a witch, a rotten post, a hedge-stake can be dressed and decked out to look as fair and inspire as much love as the rest. Many a foolish fellow is caught in this way. One calls it "lust's first snare"; Bossus calls it "a snare for souls, a deadly reed"—a fatal reed, the greatest go-between; "a powerful enticement, to be lamented with tears of blood," says Matenesius, and with tears of blood to be deplored.[9289]
Not that comeliness of clothes is therefore to be condemned, and those usual ornaments: there is a decency and decorum in this as well as in other things, fit to be used, becoming several persons, and befitting their estates; he is only phantastical, that is not in fashion, and like an old image in Arras hangings, when a manner of attire is generally received: but when they are so new fangled, so unstaid, so prodigious in their attires, beyond their means and fortunes, unbefitting their age, place, quality, condition, what should we otherwise think of them?	This does not mean that becoming clothes and customary ornaments should be condemned. Here, as in other things, there is a propriety and fitness worth observing, suited to different people and their stations. When a style of dress is generally accepted, the person who refuses the fashion is merely eccentric, like an old figure in a tapestry. But when people are so eager for novelty, so changeable, so extravagant in their dress—beyond their means and fortunes, unsuited to their age, position, rank and condition—what else should we think of them?[9290]

[9287] Burton. Printed page 473, i: "De immod. mulier. cultu." On immoderate female adornment.

[9288] Burton. Printed page 473, dagger: "Discurs. 6. de luxu vestium." Discourse 6, On Luxury in Dress.

[9289] Editor. Maukin can mean a slattern or a rag-like figure; Burton's catalogue slides from insulting descriptions of people to inanimate objects. Aucupium means bird-catching or a snare, and the deadly reed continues that trapping imagery. Bossus is Matthaeus Bossus; the exact Matenesius reference remains unverified. These are the polemic's judgements, not neutral descriptions.

[9290] Editor. Arras is figured tapestry. Estates means social stations as well as means; phantastical here means eccentric or affected. Burton qualifies his attack: customary, becoming dress is acceptable, while conspicuous novelty and expenditure beyond one's position are condemned.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Why do they adorn themselves with so many colours of hearbs, fictitious flowers, curious needleworks, quaint devices, sweet smelling odours, with those inestimable riches of precious stones, pearls, rubies, diamonds, emeralds, &c. Why do they crown themselves with gold and silver, use coronets and tires of several fashions, deck themselves with pendants, bracelets, ear-rings, chains, girdles, rings, pins, spangles, embroydries, shadows, rebatoes, versicolor ribbands? why do they make such glorious shews with their scarfs, feathers, fans, masks, furs, laces, tiffanies, ruffs, falls, calls, cuffs, damasks, velvets, tinsels, cloth of gold, silver, tissue? with colours of heavens, stars, planets: the strength of mettals, stones, odours, flowers, birds, beasts, fishes, and whatsoever Africk, Asia, America, sea, land, art, and industry of man can afford?	Why do they adorn themselves with so many plant colours, artificial flowers, elaborate needlework, ingenious designs, sweet perfumes, and the priceless wealth of precious stones—pearls, rubies, diamonds, emeralds, and so on? Why do they crown themselves with gold and silver, wear coronets and headdresses of various fashions, and deck themselves with pendants, bracelets, earrings, chains, belts, rings, pins, spangles, embroidery, shading headwear, stiff collars and many-coloured ribbons? Why do they make such splendid displays with scarves, feathers, fans, masks, furs, lace, gauze, ruffs, falling collars, hairnets, cuffs, damask, velvet, glittering fabrics, cloth of gold and silver, and tissue? With the colours of the heavens, stars and planets, and all the resources of metals, stones, scents, flowers, birds, beasts, fish, and whatever Africa, Asia, America, sea, land, art and human industry can supply?[9291]

[9291] Editor. Tires are headdresses; rebatoes stiffened collars or collar supports; tiffanies gauzy fabrics; falls falling collars; calls hairnets. Shadows is interpreted as headwear shading the face. Tinsel and tissue can denote rich fabrics containing metallic thread, rather than the modern decorative strips and paper. The catalogue accumulates forms of dress without offering a precise inventory of one costume.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Why do they use and covet such novelty of inventions, such new fangled tires, and spend such inestimable sums on them? To what end are those crisped, false hairs, painted faces, as [9292]the Satyrist observes, such a composed gate, not a step awry? Why are they like so many Sybarites, or Neroes Poppæa, Assuerus concubines, so costly, so long a dressing, as Cæsar was marshalling his army, or an hawk in pruning? [9293]Dum moliuntur, dum comuntur, annus est: A [9294]Gardner takes not so much delight and pains in his garden, an horse-man to dress his horse, scour his armour, a Mariner about his ship, a Merchant his shop and shop-book, as they do about their faces, and all those other parts: such setting up with corks, streightning with whale-bones; why is it but as a day-net catcheth Larks, to make yong men stoop unto them?	Why do they use and crave such novel inventions and newfangled headdresses, spending incalculable sums on them? "What are those curled, false locks and painted faces for," as the satirist asks, "and that carefully studied walk, without a step out of place?" Why, like so many Sybarites, or Nero's Poppaea, or Ahasuerus's concubines, do they spend so much money and time dressing—as long as Caesar took to marshal his army, or a hawk takes to preen? "While they prepare, while they adorn themselves, a year goes by." A gardener takes less pleasure and trouble over his garden, a horseman over grooming his horse and polishing his armour, a sailor over his ship, a merchant over his shop and accounts, than they take over their faces and all their other parts. Such raising themselves on cork soles, such squeezing themselves with whalebone! What is it for but to make young men swoop towards them, as a day-net catches larks?[9295]

[9292] Burton. Printed page 473, k: "Petronius fol. 95. quo spectant flexæ comæ? quo facies medicamine attrita & oculorum mollis petulantia? quo incessus tam compositus, &c." Petronius, folio 95. What are curled locks for? What purpose is served by a face rubbed with cosmetics and the eyes' soft wantonness? Why so studied a walk? And so on.

[9293] Burton. Printed page 473, l: "Ter." Terence.

[9294] Burton. Printed page 473, asterisk: "P. Aretine. Hortulanus non ita exercetur visendis hortis, eques equis, armis, nauta navibus, &c." Pietro Aretino. A gardener is not so occupied in inspecting gardens, a horseman with horses and arms, a sailor with ships, and so on.

[9295] Editor. Petronius, Satyrica 126, has Chrysis address the male Polyaenus; Burton applies the description to women. Terence, Heauton Timorumenos II.ii (around line 240), reads conantur, "try," where Burton prints comuntur, "adorn themselves." Corks are raised cork soles; whalebone stiffens the clothing. The day-net comparison makes the young man a bird lured into a trap. The Aretino passage remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 473–474 Philocharus a gallant in Aristenetus, advised his friend Polienus, to take heed of such enticements, [9296]for it was the sweet sound and motion of his Mistris spangles and bracelets, the smell of her oyntments, that captivated him first.	Philocharus, a gallant in Aristaenetus, warned his friend Polyaenus to beware of such enticements: it was the pleasing sound and movement of his mistress's spangles and bracelets, and the scent of her ointments, that first captivated him.[9297]
Source page 474 Illa fuit mentis prima ruina meæ.	That was the first downfall of my mind.
Quid sibi vult pixidum turba, saith [9298]Lucian, To what use are pins, pots, glasses, ointments, irons, combs, bodkins, setting-sticks? why bestow they all their patrimonies and husbands yearly revenues on such fooleries? [9299]bina patrimonia singulis auribus; why use they dragons, wasps, snakes, for chains, inamelled jewels on their necks, ears? dignam potius foret ferro manus istas religari, atque utinam monilia verè dracones essent; they had more need some of them be tied in Bedlam with iron chains, have a whip for a fan, and hair-cloaths next to their skins, and instead of wrought smocks, have their cheeks stigmatised with a hot iron; I say, some of our Jesabels, instead of painting, if they were well served.	"What is the purpose of this crowd of boxes?" asks Lucian. "What use are pins, pots, mirrors, ointments, curling irons, combs, bodkins and setting-sticks? Why do they spend their entire inheritances and their husbands' yearly incomes on such follies?" "Two estates on each ear!" "Why do they wear dragons, wasps and snakes as chains and enamelled jewels on their necks and ears? Those hands would deserve better to be bound in iron; would that their necklaces really were snakes!" Some of them would have more need of iron chains in Bedlam, a whip instead of a fan, and haircloth next to their skin; instead of embroidered shifts, their cheeks branded with a hot iron. I mean some of our Jezebels: that would be their due, instead of face-paint.[9300]

[9296] Burton. Printed page 474, dagger: "Epist. 4. Sonus armillarum bene sonantium, odor unguentorum, &c." Letter 4. The sound of pleasantly jingling bracelets, the scent of ointments, and so on.

[9297] Editor. Aristaenetus's fictional love letters supply the example; Burton gives only Letter 4 in the margin. His spellings Aristenetus and Polienus are normalized in the modern text. The independent Latin line that follows makes the narrator's mental ruin the point of the anecdote. Its attribution is not separately specified here.

[9298] Burton. Printed page 474, m: "Tom. 4. dial. Amor. vascula plena multæ infelicitatis omnem maritorum opulentiam in hæc impendunt, dracones pro monilibus habent, qui utinam vere dracones essent. Lucian." Volume 4, Dialogue on Love. Little vessels full of great unhappiness; they spend all their husbands' wealth on these things, wear snakes as necklaces—would that they really were snakes! Lucian.

[9299] Burton. Printed page 474, dagger: "Seneca."

[9300] Editor. Bedlam is Bethlem hospital, invoked here as an image of confinement and punishment. Haircloth is coarse penitential clothing; wrought smocks are embroidered shifts. Bodkins and setting-sticks are implements for arranging hair or dress. The Jezebel comparison evokes the painted biblical queen. Burton intensifies the cited satire into a punitive outburst; the exact Lucian and Seneca loci remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But why is all this labour, all this cost, preparation, riding, running, far fetched, and dear bought stuffe? [9301]Because forsooth they would be fair and fine, and where nature is defective, supply it by art.	But why all this labour, expense, preparation, riding and running about, all these goods brought from afar and bought so dearly? Why, because they want to be beautiful and fine, and to supply by art whatever nature lacks.[9302]
[9303]Sanguine quæ vero non rubet, arte rubet, (Ovid.)	She who has no natural blush is rosy through art. (Ovid.)[9304]

[9301] Burton. Printed page 474, n: “Castilio de aulic. lib. 1. Mulieribus omnibus hoc imprimis in votis est, ut formosæ sint, aut si reipsa non sint, videantur tamen esse; & si qua parte natura defuit, artis suppetias adjungunt: unde illæ faciei unctiones, dolor & cruciatus in arctandis corporibus, &c.” Castiglione, The Courtier, book 1. Above all, every woman wishes to be beautiful, or, if she is not really beautiful, at least to appear so. Wherever nature has failed, they add the aid of art: hence those facial ointments, the pain and torment of constricting their bodies, and so on. The marker precedes Because forsooth in the body.

[9302] Editor. Castilio is Baldassare Castiglione, author of The Courtier. The marginal Latin expands the claim that art supplies nature’s defects and includes the bodily pain of fashionable constriction. Its precise Latin edition and relation to the Italian text remain for collation.

[9303] Burton. Printed page 474, dagger: “Ovid. epist. Med. Jasoni.” Ovid, the letter of Medea to Jason.

[9304] Editor. The verse is Ovid, Ars amatoria 3.200. The marginal reference to Medea’s letter to Jason (Heroides 12) is therefore misplaced. The printed attribution is retained in the Burton note; the modern line translates the contrast between real blood and artificial colour.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and to that purpose they annoint and paint their faces, to make Helen of Hecuba —— parvamque exortamque puellam —— Europen; To this intent they crush in their feet and bodies, hurt and crucifie themselves, sometimes in laxe clothes, an hundred yards I think in a gown, a sleeve: and sometimes again so close, ut nudos exprimant artus. [9305]Now long tails and trains, and then short, up, down, high, low, thick, thin, &c. now little or no bands, then as big as cart wheels; now loose bodies, then great fardingals and close girt, &c. Why is all this, but with the whore in the Proverbs, to intoxicate some or other? oculorum decipulam, [9306]one therefore calls it & Indicem libidinis, the trap of lust, and sure token, as an Ivy-bush is to a Tavern.	To that end they anoint and paint their faces, making a Helen out of a Hecuba, and a Europa out of "a little, newly grown girl." To that end they squeeze their feet and bodies, hurting and tormenting themselves: sometimes in loose clothes, with a hundred yards, I think, in a gown or a sleeve; then again so tight that "they reveal the naked limbs." Now long tails and trains, then short; up, down, high, low, thick, thin, and so on. Now little collars or none, then collars as big as cartwheels; now loose bodices, then huge farthingales and tight girdling, and so on. What is it all for but to intoxicate someone, like the prostitute in Proverbs? One therefore calls it "a trap for the eyes and a sign of lust"—lust's trap and a sure sign of it, as an ivy-bush marks a tavern.[9307]
Quòd pulchros Glycere sumas de pixide vultus, Quòd tibi compositæ nec sine lege comæ: Quòd niteat digitis adamas, Beryllus in aure, Non sum divinus, sed scio quid cupias.	Glycere, since you take your beauty from a box, And carefully arrange your hair; Since diamonds shine on your fingers, beryl in your ear— I am no prophet, but I know what you desire.[9308]
O Glycere in that you paint so much, Your hair is so bedeckt in order such, With rings on fingers, bracelets in your ear, Although no Prophet, tell I can, I fear.	O Glycere, since you paint yourself so much, And deck your hair in such an ordered way, With rings on fingers, bracelets in your ear, Though no prophet, I can tell, I fear.

[9305] Burton. Printed page 474, o: "Modo caudatas tunicas, &c. Bossus." Now gowns with trains, and so on. Bossus.

[9306] Burton. Printed page 474, dagger: "Scribanius philos. Christ. cap. 6." Scribanius, Christian Philosophy, chapter 6.

[9307] Editor. Helen and Europa stand for beauty, Hecuba for the older woman whom cosmetics supposedly transform. The printed parvamque exortamque is anomalous; its tentative literal rendering is "little, newly grown." Juvenal 8.33–34 instead has pravam extortamque, "crooked and twisted," in a passage about calling such a girl Europa. Farthingales support wide skirts; bands are collars. The ivy-bush advertises a tavern; the seductive woman recalls Proverbs 7.

[9308] Editor. These are lines 1–3 and 16 of In Glyceren, Epigrammatum liber tertius 67, in the online John Leech collection. The intervening twelve lines are omitted by Burton. The checked text ends quod cupias; Burton has quid cupias. His following English version freely changes details, including the jewel in the ear; it remains a separate verse unit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To be admired, to be gazed on, to circumvent some novice; as many times they do, that instead of a Lady he loves a cap and a feather, instead of a maid that should have verum colorem, corpus solidum & succi plenum (as Chærea describes his mistriss in the [9309]Poet) a painted face, a ruffe-band, fair and fine linnen, a coronet, a flowre,	To be admired, to be gazed at, to ensnare some novice—as they often do, so that instead of a lady he loves a cap and feather; instead of a young woman with "a natural complexion, a firm body full of vitality," as Chaerea describes his mistress in the poet, he loves a painted face, a ruff, fine white linen, a coronet, a flower—[9310]
[9311](Naturæque putat quod fuit artificis,)	(And thinks the craftsman's work is nature's.)[9312]
a wrought wastcoate he dotes on, or a pied petticote, a pure die instead of a proper woman. For generally as with rich furred Conies, their cases are far better then their bodies, and like the bark of a Cinnamon tree which is dearer then the whole bulk, their outward accoutrements are far more pretious then their inward indowments. 'Tis too commonly so.	He dotes on an embroidered waistcoat or a many-coloured petticoat: a fine dye instead of a fine woman. For generally, as with richly furred rabbits, their coverings are far better than their bodies; and, like the bark of a cinnamon tree, worth more than its whole trunk, their outward equipment is far more precious than their inward qualities. It is all too commonly so.[9313]

[9309] Burton. Printed page 474, dagger: "Ter. Eunuc. Act. 2. Scen. 3." Terence, The Eunuch, act 2, scene 3.

[9310] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus II.iii, around line 318. Chaerea praises a natural complexion and a firm, vigorous body, in contrast to fashionable practices that diminish young women's health and appearance. Burton adapts the grammar of the quotation. Succus literally means juice or sap and here conveys bodily vitality.

[9311] Burton. Printed page 474, asterisk: "Stroza fil." Strozzi the son.

[9312] Editor. The margin attributes the line to Strozzi the son, conventionally Ercole Strozzi. Its precise poem remains unverified. Artificis means the maker's or craftsman's: the admirer mistakes something manufactured for something natural.

[9313] Editor. Conies are rabbits and cases their skins. Bulk here means the tree's trunk or main mass. Proper means handsome or well formed, while pure die is a fine dye or colour. The material comparisons continue the distinction between costly coverings and the qualities of the person beneath them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 475 [9314]Auferimur cultu, & gemmis, auroque teguntur Omnia; pars minima est ipsa puella sui.	Adornment carries us away; jewels and gold cover Everything; the girl herself is the least part of herself.[9315]
With gold and jewels all is covered, And with a strange tire we are won, (While she's the least part of her self) And with such baubles quite undone.	With gold and jewels all is covered, And an exotic headdress wins us over; (While she is the least part of herself) Such baubles utterly undo us.
Why do they keep in so long together, a whole winter sometimes, and will not be seen but by torch or candle-light, and come abroad with all the preparation may be, when they have no business, but only to shew themselves?	Why do they stay indoors for so long at a time, sometimes a whole winter, allowing themselves to be seen only by torchlight or candlelight, then venture out after every possible preparation, when they have no business except to show themselves?
Spectatum veniunt, veniunt spectentur ut ipsæ.	They come to see, they come to be seen.[9316]
[9317]For what is beauty if it be not seen, Or what is't to be seen if not admir'd, And though admir'd, unless in love desir'd?	For what is beauty if it is not seen? What use is being seen, if not admired? And even admired, unless desired in love?[9318]

[9314] Burton. Printed page 475, p: "Ovid."

[9315] Editor. Ovid, Remedia amoris 343–344. The lover is carried away by adornment, so that the actual woman seems the smallest component of the elaborate appearance. Burton adds a conjunction before gemmis. His English rendering that follows introduces further details and is preserved independently.

[9316] Editor. Ovid, Ars amatoria 1.99. In its original setting the line concerns women at the theatre. Burton broadens it to public display generally. The doubled veniunt is retained as the repeated "they come."

[9317] Burton. Printed page 475, dagger: "S. Daniel." Samuel Daniel.

[9318] Editor. Samuel Daniel, The Complaint of Rosamond (1592), in Rosamond's complaint about beauty hidden from view. The checked early text has unless admired where Burton prints if not admir'd. The modern version follows Burton's wording and preserves the three separate lines.

Original text 1651	Modern English
why do they go with such counterfeit gate, which [9319]Philo Judæus, reprehends them for, and use (I say it again) such gestures, apish, ridiculous, undecent attires, Sybaritical tricks, fucos genis, purpurissam venis, cerussam fronti, leges oculis, &c. use those sweet perfumes, powders and ointments in publike; flock to hear sermons so frequent, is it for devotion? or rather as [9320]Basil tells them, to meet their sweet-hearts, and see fashions; for as he saith, commonly they come so provided to that place, with such curious complements, with such gestures and tires, as if they should go to a dancing school, a stage-play, or bawdy-house, fitter then a Church,	Why do they walk with that affected gait for which Philo the Jew reproaches them, and practise—I say it again—such gestures, such apish, ridiculous, indecent dress and Sybaritic tricks, "paint for the cheeks, rouge for the veins, white lead for the brow, rules for the eyes," and so on? Why wear those sweet perfumes, powders and ointments in public, and flock so frequently to sermons? Is it for devotion? Or rather, as Basil tells them, to meet their sweethearts and see the fashions? For, as he says, they commonly come with such elaborate airs, gestures and attire as though bound for a dancing school, a play or a brothel—places more suited to them than a church.[9321]
When such a she-Priest comes her Mass to say, Twenty to one they all forget to pray.	When such a she-priest comes to say her Mass, Twenty to one, they all forget their prayers.[9322]

[9319] Burton. Printed page 475, q: "Lib. de victimis. Fracto incessu, obtutu lascivo, calamistrata, cincinnata, fucata, recens lota, purpurissata, pretiosoque amicta palliolo, spirans unguenta, ut juvenum animos circumveniat." On Sacrifices. With a mincing walk and a wanton gaze, her hair curled and dressed, painted, freshly washed, rouged and clad in a costly mantle, breathing perfumes, so as to ensnare young men's minds.

[9320] Burton. Printed page 475, r: "Orat. in ebrios. Impudenter se masculorum aspectibus exponunt, insolenter comas jactantes, trahunt tunicas pedibus collidentes, oculoque petulanti, risu effuso, ad tripudium insanientes, omnem adolescentum intemperantiam in se provocantes, idque in templis memoriæ martyrum consecratis; pornœium civitatis officinam fecerunt impudentiæ." Discourse against the Drunkards. They shamelessly expose themselves to men's gaze, toss their hair insolently, trail their gowns, stamp their feet, and, with wanton eyes and unrestrained laughter, rave in the dance, provoking every young man's intemperance towards themselves—even in temples consecrated to the memory of martyrs. They have made those places the city's brothel, a workshop of shamelessness. The doubtful printed word pornœium is retained; the general sense is brothel.

[9321] Editor. Philo is Philo of Alexandria; the margin names On Sacrifices. The citation to Basil is to the discourse against drunkenness. Their exact passages and Burton's Latin versions remain to be collated. Sybaritic means luxuriously self-indulgent. Leges oculis, literally "rules for the eyes," suggests a studied management of the gaze. The passage treats churchgoing as display through satirical accusation.

[9322] Editor. An unattributed couplet. She-priest is a mocking description of the conspicuously dressed woman, whose appearance supposedly distracts the congregation. It does not establish that she holds a clerical office. The modern rendering retains the twenty-to-one wager.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They make those holy Temples consecrated to godly Martyrs, and religious uses, shops of impudence, dens of whores and theeves, and little better then brothel houses. When we shall see these things dayly done, their husbands bankrupts, if not cornuto's, their wives light huswives, daughters dishonest; and hear of such dissolute acts, as dayly we do, how should we think otherwise? what is their end, but to deceive and inveagle young men? As tow takes fire, such inticing objects produce their effect, how can it be altered?	"They turn those holy temples, consecrated to godly martyrs and religious uses, into shops of shamelessness, dens of whores and thieves, little better than brothels." When we see such things done daily—their husbands bankrupt, if not cuckolded, their wives loose, their daughters unchaste—and hear of the dissolute acts we hear of every day, how should we think otherwise? What is their purpose but to deceive and entice young men? As tow catches fire, such alluring sights produce their effect; how can it be otherwise?[9323]
When Venus stood before Anchises (as [9324]Homer fains in one of his Hymns) in her costly robes, he was instantly taken,	When Venus stood before Anchises in her costly robes, as Homer relates in one of his Hymns, he was captivated at once:[9325]
Cùm ante ipsum staret Iovis filia, videns eam Anchises, admirabatur formam, & stupendas vestes; Erat enim induta peplo, igneis radiis splendidiore; Habebat quoque torques fulgidos, flexiles helices, Tenerum collum ambiebant monilia pulchra, Aurea, variegata. ——	When Jove's daughter stood before him, Anchises, Seeing her, marvelled at her beauty and wondrous clothes; For she wore a robe more brilliant than rays of fire. She also wore gleaming chains and winding coils; Beautiful necklaces encircled her tender neck, Golden and richly varied.——

[9323] Editor. Cornuto means cuckold; light huswife means a sexually disreputable woman. Tow is loose flax or hemp fibre, readily kindled. Burton presents attraction as an almost automatic ignition and casts blame on women's appearance. The quoted description of profaned temples continues the Basil citation in the preceding paragraph.

[9324] Burton. Printed page 475, s: "Hymno Veneri dicato." In the hymn dedicated to Venus.

[9325] Editor. Homeric Hymn 5, To Aphrodite, especially lines 81–91. Aphrodite, called Venus by Burton, appears before the mortal Anchises with dazzling clothing and jewellery. Homeric is the conventional name of this collection, not a secure attribution to Homer. The translator of Burton's quoted Latin version remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
When Venus stood before Anchises first, He was amaz'd to see her in her tires; For she had on a hood as red as fire, And glittering chains, and Ivy twisted spires, About her tender neck were costly bruches, And neck-laces of gold, inamell'd ouches.	When Venus first stood before Anchises, He marvelled to see her in her finery; For she wore a hood as red as fire, Glittering chains and coils like twisted ivy; About her tender neck were costly brooches, And golden necklaces, enamelled settings.[9326]
So when Medea came in presence of Jason first, attended by her Nymphs and Ladies, as she is described by [9327]Apollonius,	So too when Medea first appeared before Jason, attended by her nymphs and ladies, as Apollonius describes her:[9328]
Source page 476 Cunctas verò ignis instar sequebatur splendor, Tantum ab aureis fimbriis resplendebat jubar, Accenditque in oculis dulce desiderium.	A radiance like fire followed them all; Such brilliance shone from their golden borders, And kindled sweet desire in his eyes.
A lustre followed them like flaming fire, And from their golden borders came such beams, Which in his eys provok'd a sweet desire.	A lustre followed them like flaming fire; Such beams came from their golden borders That they stirred sweet desire in his eyes.

[9326] Editor. Tires means finery or dress; bruches are brooches, and ouches ornamental settings or mounts. Burton's English version changes the Latin fire-bright robe into a red hood and expands the winding ornaments into ivy-like coils. Both renderings remain in the edition so that those differences are visible.

[9327] Burton. Printed page 475, t: "Argonaut. l. 4." Argonautica, book 4.

[9328] Editor. Apollonius Rhodius, Argonautica 4, in the wedding preparations following line 1128, describes nymphs bringing flowers and gazing with desire at the Golden Fleece laid on the bridal couch. The fire-like light comes from that fleece. Burton applies the lines to Medea's first appearance before Jason, then changes desire in the nymphs' eyes to desire in his eyes in his English verse. Book 4 is a correct location; the narrative application differs. The Latin intermediary remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such a relation we have in [9329]Plutarch, when the Queens came and offered themselves to Anthony, [9330]with divers presents, and entising ornaments, Asiatick allurements, with such wonderful joy and festivity, they did so inveagle the Romans, that no man could contain himself, all was turned to delight and pleasure. The women transformed themselves to Bacchus shapes, the men-children to Satyrs and Pans; but Anthony himself was quite besotted with Cleopatra's sweet speeches, philters, beauty, pleasing tires: for when she sailed along the river Cydnus, with such incredible pomp in a gilded ship, her self dressed like Venus, her maids like the Graces, her pages like so many Cupids, Anthony was amazed, and rapt beyond himself.	We have a similar account in Plutarch: queens came and offered themselves to Antony with various gifts and enticing ornaments. Such Asiatic attractions, such extraordinary joy and festivity, so beguiled the Romans that no one could restrain himself; everything became delight and pleasure. The women took on the shapes of Bacchus, the boys those of satyrs and Pans. Antony himself was utterly besotted with Cleopatra's sweet words, love-charms, beauty and pleasing dress. When she sailed along the river Cydnus with incredible pomp in a gilded ship, dressed as Venus, her maids as the Graces and her pages as so many Cupids, Antony was amazed and carried beyond himself.[9331]

[9329] Burton. Printed page 476, asterisk: "Vit. Anton." Life of Antony.

[9330] Burton. Printed page 476, u: "Regia domo ornatuque certantes, sese ac formam suam Antonio offerentes, &c. Cum ornatu & incredibili pompa per Cydnum fluvium navigarent aurata puppi, ipsa ad similitudinem Veneris ornata, puellæ Gratiis similes, pueri cupidinibus, Antonius ad visum stupefactus." Competing in royal household and splendour, offering themselves and their beauty to Antony, and so on. When they sailed along the river Cydnus in a gilded vessel, with adornment and incredible pomp, she dressed like Venus, her girls like Graces and boys like Cupids, Antony was astonished at the sight.

[9331] Editor. Burton combines episodes from Plutarch's Life of Antony. In chapter 26 Cleopatra sails up the Cydnus with a gilded stern, dressed as Aphrodite, while attendants enact divine figures. Burton says only along the river and describes a gilded ship. His preceding Bacchic spectacle and the surrounding summary are retained as his composite account; philters are love-charms or potions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Heliodorus lib. 1. brings in Damænetæ stepmother to Cnemon, whom she [9332]saw in his scarfs, rings, robes and coronet, quite mad for the love of him. It was Judiths Pantofles that ravished the eyes of Olofernes. [9333]Cardan is not ashamed to confess, that seeing his wife the first time all in white, he did admire and instantly love her. If these outward ornaments were not of such force, why doth [9334]Naomi give Ruth counsel how to please Boaz? and [9335]Judith seeking to captivate Olofernes, washed and anointed her self with sweet ointments, dressed her hair, and put on costly attires.	Heliodorus, in book 1, introduces Demaenete, Cnemon's stepmother, driven quite mad with love for him when she saw him in his scarves, rings, robes and garland. It was Judith's slippers that ravished Holofernes's eyes. Cardan is not ashamed to confess that the first time he saw his wife, dressed all in white, he admired her and immediately fell in love. If these outward ornaments had no such power, why does Naomi advise Ruth how to please Boaz? And Judith, seeking to captivate Holofernes, washed and anointed herself with sweet ointments, dressed her hair and put on costly clothes.[9336]
The riot in this kind hath been excessive in times past; no man almost came abroad, but curled and anointed,	Extravagance of this kind has been excessive in former times: almost no man went out without curled hair and perfume,
[9337]Et matutino sudans Crispinus amomo, Quantum vix redolent duo funera,	And Crispinus sweating with morning perfume— As much as two funerals together scarcely give off.[9338]

[9332] Burton. Printed page 476, y: "Amictum Chlamyde & coronis, quum primum aspexit Cnemonem, ex potestate mentis excidit." When she first saw Cnemon dressed in a cloak and garlands, she lost command of her mind. The source has y before x.

[9333] Burton. Printed page 476, x: "Lib. de lib. prop." Book on His Own Books.

[9334] Burton. Printed page 476, z: "Ruth. 3. 3."

[9335] Burton. Printed page 476, a: "Cap. 9. 5." Chapter 9, verse 5, as printed.

[9336] Editor. Pantofles are slippers. Ruth 3.3 supplies Naomi's instructions to wash, anoint and dress. Judith's preparation is in Judith 10.3–4; Burton's margin instead prints 9.5. The accounts in Heliodorus and Cardan still require detailed collation. Demaenete is the normalized name of Cnemon's stepmother in Heliodorus's Ethiopian Story.

[9337] Burton. Printed page 476, b: "Juv. Sat. 6." Juvenal, Satire 6, as printed.

[9338] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 4.108–109, not Satire 6 as the margin states. Crispinus is imagined giving off as much perfume as two funerals, where aromatics were lavishly used. Burton's prose gloss repeats the comparison; it is retained rather than absorbed into the verse.

Original text 1651	Modern English
one spent as much as two funerals at once, and with perfumed hairs, [9339]& rosa canos odorati capillos Assyriaque nardo. What strange thing doth [9340]Sueton relate in this matter of Caligula's riot? And Pliny lib. 12. & 13. Read more in Dioscorides, Ulmus, Arnoldus, Randelitius de fuco & decoratione; for it is now an art, as it was of old, (so [9341]Seneca records) officinæ sunt odores coquentium.	One spent as much as two funerals at once, and wore perfumed hair: "their grey locks scented with roses and Assyrian nard." What extraordinary things Suetonius relates about Caligula's extravagance in this matter! And Pliny, in books 12 and 13. Read further in Dioscorides, Ulmus, Arnoldus and Rondelet, On Cosmetics and Adornment; for it is now a craft, as it was in antiquity: "there are workshops where perfumes are concocted," as Seneca records.[9342]
Women are bad and men worse, no difference at all betwixt their and our times: [9343]Good manners, (as Seneca complains) are extinct with wantonness, in tricking up themselves, men go beyond women, they wear harlots colours, and do not walk, but jet and dance, hic mulier, hæc vir, more like Players, Butterflies, Baboons, Apes, Anticks, then men.	Women are bad and men worse; there is no difference at all between their times and ours. "Good conduct," as Seneca complains, "is extinguished by wantonness. In decking themselves out, men surpass women; they wear prostitutes' colours, and do not walk, but strut and dance." Masculine woman, feminine man: more like actors, butterflies, baboons, apes and grotesques than men.[9344]

[9339] Burton. Printed page 476, c: "Hor. lib. 2. Od. 11." Horace, Odes 2.11.

[9340] Burton. Printed page 476, d: "Cap. 27." Chapter 27, as printed.

[9341] Burton. Printed page 476, e: "Epist. 90." Letter 90.

[9342] Editor. The Horace fragment condenses Odes 2.11.13–17, on grey hair, roses and Assyrian nard. Caligula's extravagant perfumed bathing appears in Suetonius, Caligula 37; Burton's margin prints 27. The perfume workshops occur in Seneca, Letter 90.19. De fuco & decoratione means "on cosmetics and adornment"; the precise works intended by the intervening medical bibliography remain to be identified.

[9343] Burton. Printed page 476, f: "Quicquid est boni moris levitate extinguitur, & politura corporis muliebres munditias antecessimus, colores meretricios viri sumimus, tenero & molli gradu suspendimus gradum, non ambulamus, nat. quæst. lib. 7. cap. 31." Whatever good conduct remains is extinguished by frivolity; in polishing the body we have surpassed women's elegance. We men adopt prostitutes' colours, suspend our steps with a tender, soft gait, and do not walk. Natural Questions, book 7, chapter 31.

[9344] Editor. The margin paraphrases Seneca, Natural Questions 7.31.2, which condemns bodily refinement and the loss of good conduct. Hic mulier, hæc vir deliberately reverse the expected Latin grammatical genders, making a masculine "woman" and feminine "man." Burton uses the formula as a satirical reproach. Jet means strut; anticks are grotesque figures or performers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So ridiculous moreover are we in our attires, and for cost so excessive, that as Hierome said of old, Uno filo villarum insunt pretia, uno lino decies sestertium inseritur; 'tis an ordinary thing to put a thousand Okes, and an hundred Oxen into a suit of apparel, to wear a whole Mannor on his back. What with shooe-ties, hangers, points, caps and feathers, scarfs, bands, cuffs, &c. in a short space their whole patrimonies are consumed.	Moreover, our clothes are so ridiculous and so excessively costly that, as Jerome said long ago, "A single thread contains the price of country estates; a million sesterces are woven into one strand." It is an ordinary thing to put a thousand oaks and a hundred oxen into a suit of clothes, to wear a whole manor on one's back. With shoe-ribbons, sword-belts, fastening laces, caps and feathers, scarves, collars, cuffs, and so on, entire inheritances are soon consumed.[9345]
Source page 476–477 Heliogabalus is taxed by Lampridius, and admired in his age for wearing jewels in his shoos, a common thing in our times, not for Emperours and Princes, but almost for serving-men and taylors: all the flowers, stars, constellations, gold and precious stones do condescend to set out their shooes. To repress the luxury of those Roman matrons, there was [9346]Lex Valeria and Oppia, and a Cato to contradict; but no Laws will serve to repress the pride and insolency of our days, the prodigious riot in this kind.	Lampridius censures Heliogabalus, who astonished his age by wearing jewels in his shoes. In our time this is common, almost even among serving men and tailors, as well as emperors and princes: all the flowers, stars, constellations, gold and precious stones stoop to adorn their shoes. To restrain the luxury of Roman matrons there were the Valerian and Oppian laws, and a Cato to speak against such luxury; but no laws can restrain the pride and insolence of our day, its prodigious extravagance in this respect.[9347]

[9345] Editor. The Latin reckons the cost of an estate or a million sesterces within a single thread of luxurious clothing. The exact Jerome passage remains unlocated. Hangers are the straps supporting a sword; points are fastening laces. Burton's oaks, oxen and manor translate expenditure into the land and resources consumed to pay for it.

[9346] Burton. Printed page 477, g: "Liv. lib. 4. dec. 4." Livy, book 4 of the fourth decade: book 34.

[9347] Editor. Historia Augusta, Elagabalus 23.4, attributed to Lampridius, describes engraved gems on the emperor's shoes and ridicule of art that could scarcely be seen at his feet. Burton's admired means regarded with wonder, not necessarily approval; he turns the anecdote into a comparison with contemporary dress. Livy 34.1–8 concerns repeal of the Oppian law: Valerius supports repeal, Cato opposes it. Burton's pairing obscures that opposition. Riot means extravagant expenditure; the anecdote's presence in the biography does not independently prove its historicity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 477 Lucullus wardrobe is put down by our ordinary Citizens; and a Coblers wife in Venus, a Courtesan in Florence, is no whit inferiour to a Queen, if our Geographers say true: and why is all this? [9348]Why do they glory in their Jewels (as he saith) or exult and triumph in the beauty of clothes? why is all this cost? to incite men the sooner to burning lust. They pretend decency and ornament; but let them take heed, lest while they set out their bodies, they do damn their souls; 'tis [9349]Bernards counsel: shine in Jewels, stink in conditions; have purple robes, and a torn conscience.	Our ordinary citizens outdo Lucullus's wardrobe; and a cobbler's wife in Venice, or a courtesan in Florence, is no whit inferior to a queen, if our geographers tell the truth. Why all this? "Why do they glory in their jewels," as he says, "or exult and triumph in the beauty of their clothes? Why all this expense? To kindle burning lust in men all the sooner." They claim it is propriety and ornament; but let them beware lest, while adorning their bodies, they damn their souls. This is Bernard's warning: they shine with jewels and stink in character, wearing purple robes over a ragged conscience.[9350]

[9348] Burton. Printed page 477, h: "Quid exultas in pulchritudine panni? quid gloriaris in gemmis ut facilius invites ad libidinosum incendium? Mat. Bossus de immoder. mulie. cultu." Why exult in the beauty of cloth? Why glory in jewels, to invite lust's fire more readily? Matthaeus Bossus, On Immoderate Female Adornment.

[9349] Burton. Printed page 477, i: "Epist. 113. fulgent monilibus, moribus sordent, purpurata vestis, conscientia pannosa, cap. 3. 17." Letter 113. They shine with necklaces, are foul in conduct; a purple garment, a ragged conscience. Chapter 3, verse 17 points forward to Isaiah.

[9350] Editor. The printed Venus is understood as Venice from the geographical comparison; the original reading is retained on the left. Put down means surpassed. Lucullus represents immense luxury. The warning contrasts outward brilliance with inward moral poverty. Burton's reference to Bernard, Letter 113, and the precise Bossus passage remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Let them take heed of Esayes Prophesie, that their slippers and tires be not taken from them, sweet balls, bracelets, earings, vailes, wimples, crisping-pins, glasses, fine linnen, hoods, lawns, and sweet favours, they become not bald, burnt, and stink upon a sudden. And let maids beware, as [9351]Cyprian adviseth, lest while they wander too loosly abroad, they loose not their virginities: and like Ægyptian temples, seem fair without, but prove rotten carcasses within.	Let them heed Isaiah's prophecy, lest their slippers and headdresses be taken from them—their perfume-balls, bracelets, earrings, veils, wimples, curling-pins, mirrors, fine linen, hoods, lawn and sweet scents—and they suddenly become bald, branded and foul-smelling. And let young women beware, as Cyprian advises, lest, while wandering too freely abroad, they lose their virginity, and, like Egyptian temples, look beautiful outside but prove rotten carcasses within.[9352]

[9351] Burton. Printed page 477, k: "De virginali habitu: dum ornari cultius, dum evagari virgines volunt, desinunt esse virgines. Clemens Alexandrinus lib. de pulchr. animæ, ibid." On the Dress of Virgins. While virgins wish to be more elaborately adorned and to roam abroad, they cease to be virgins. Clement of Alexandria, Book on the Beauty of the Soul, in the same place.

[9352] Editor. Isaiah 3.16–24 supplies the catalogue of ornaments and the reversal from perfume and fine dress to foulness, baldness and burning. Sweet balls are containers or balls of scent; lawn is fine linen. Burton's sweet favours is understood contextually as sweet scents. The Cyprian warning and Clement's Egyptian-temple comparison are separately named in the margin; exact passages remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
How much better were it for them to follow that good counsel of [9353]Tertullian? To have their eyes painted with chastity, the Word of God inserted into their ears, Christ's yoke tied to the hair, to subject themselves to their husbands. If they would do so, they should be comely enough, cloathe themselves with the silk of sanctity, damask of devotion, purple of piety and chastity, and so painted, they shall have God himself to be a suiter: Let whores and queanes [9354]prank up themselves, and let them paint their faces with minion and cerusse, they are but fuels of lust, and signs of a corrupt soul: if ye be good, honest, vertuous, and religious Matrons, let sobriety, modesty and chastity be your honour, and God himself your love and desire.	How much better to follow Tertullian's good advice: paint their eyes with chastity, place the word of God in their ears, bind Christ's yoke to their hair, and submit themselves to their husbands. Then they would be beautiful enough. Clothe themselves in the silk of sanctity, the damask of devotion, the purple of piety and chastity: painted in that fashion, they will have God himself as a suitor. Let whores and hussies deck themselves out and paint their faces with red lead and white lead: these are only fuel for lust and signs of a corrupt soul. If you are good, honest, virtuous and religious matrons, let sobriety, modesty and chastity be your honour, and God himself your love and desire.[9355]

[9353] Burton. Printed page 477, l: "Lib. 2 de cultu mulierum, oculos depictos verecundia, inserentes in aures sermonem dei, annectentes crinibus jugum Christi, caput maritis subjicientes, sic facile & satis eritis ornatæ: vestite vos serico probitatis, byssino sanctitatis, purpura pudicitiæ; taliter pigmentatæ deum habebitis amatorem." On the Apparel of Women, book 2. Eyes painted with modesty, inserting God's word into your ears, binding Christ's yoke to your hair, submitting your head to your husbands: thus you will easily be sufficiently adorned. Clothe yourselves in the silk of uprightness, the fine linen of holiness, the purple of chastity; painted thus, you will have God as your lover.

[9354] Burton. Printed page 477, m: "Suas habeant Romanæ lascivias; purpurisso, ac cerussa ora perungant, fomenta libidinum, & corruptæ mentis indicia; vestrum ornamentum deus sit, pudicitia, virtutis studium. Bossus Plautus." Let Roman women have their wanton ways; let them smear their faces with rouge and white lead, incentives to lust and signs of a corrupted mind. Let God, chastity and the pursuit of virtue be your adornment. Bossus; Plautus. This note continues across the bottom of the page; Plautus anticipates the maxim on perfume.

[9355] Editor. Tertullian, On the Apparel of Women 2.13, substitutes moral adornment for cosmetics and jewels. Burton recasts the textile sequence in his English: the Latin margin has silk of uprightness, fine linen of holiness and purple of chastity. Minion represents minium, red lead; cerusse is white lead. The religious and marital exhortations belong to the cited early Christian argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Mulier rectè olet, ubi nihil olet, then a woman smells best, when she hath no perfume at all; no crown, chain, or jewel (Guevarra adds) is such an ornament to a Virgin, or vertuous woman, quàm virgini pudor, as chastity is: more credit in a wise mans eye and judgement they get by their plainness, and seem fairer then they that are set out with bables, as a Butchers meat is with pricks, puffed up and adorned like so many Jays with variety of colours.	"A woman smells right when she smells of nothing": a woman smells best when she wears no perfume at all. No crown, chain or jewel, Guevara adds, adorns a maiden or a virtuous woman as much "as modesty adorns a maiden"—as chastity does. By their plainness they gain more credit in a wise man's eyes and judgement, and seem fairer than those decked out with baubles, like a butcher's meat skewered into shape, puffed up and adorned like so many jays in a variety of colours.[9356]

[9356] Editor. Plautus, Mostellaria I.iii: Scapha tells the young woman that she smells best when she smells of nothing. The marginal Plautus at the end of the preceding note points forward to this maxim. Guevarra is Antonio de Guevara; his exact passage remains unlocated. Pricks are skewers; the butcher's display supplies another image of artificial presentation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is reported of Cornelia that vertuous Roman Lady, great Scipio's daughter, Titus Sempronius wife, and the mother of the Gracchi, that being by chance in company with a Campanian, a strange gentlewoman (some light huswife belike, that was dressed like a May Lady, and as most of our gentlewomen are, was [9357]more sollicitous of her head tire, then of her health, that spent her time betwixt a comb and a glass, and had rather be fair then honest (as Cato said) and have the Common-wealth turned topsie turvie, then her tires marred; and she did naught but brag of her fine robes and jewels, and provoked the Roman Matron to shew hers: Cornelia kept her in talk till her children came from school, and these, said she, are my jewels, and so deluded and put off a proud, vain, phantastical huswife.	It is told of Cornelia, that virtuous Roman lady—the great Scipio's daughter, Titus Sempronius's wife and mother of the Gracchi—that she happened to be in the company of a Campanian woman, a lady from elsewhere. Presumably she was some loose woman dressed like a May Queen, and, like most of our gentlewomen, more concerned about her headdress than her health, spending her time between comb and mirror, preferring beauty to virtue, as Cato said, and sooner seeing the commonwealth turned upside down than her headdress spoiled. She did nothing but boast of her fine robes and jewels, and challenged the Roman matron to show hers. Cornelia kept her talking until her children came home from school. "These," she said, "are my jewels"; and so she outwitted and dismissed a proud, vain, fanciful woman.[9358]

[9357] Burton. Printed page 477, n: "Sollicitiores de capitis sui decore quam de salute, inter pectinem & speculum diem perdunt, concinniores esse malunt quam honestiores, & rempub. minus turbari curant quam comam. Seneca." More concerned for the adornment of their heads than their safety, they waste the day between comb and mirror, prefer elegance to virtue, and care less about the commonwealth being disturbed than their hair. Seneca.

[9358] Editor. The jewels anecdote occurs in Valerius Maximus 4.4, preface. Cornelia's husband was Tiberius, not the printed Titus (compare Plutarch, Tiberius Gracchus 1). The comb-and-mirror comparison matches Seneca, On the Shortness of Life 12.3, where it concerns men; Burton inserts it into the woman's portrait and names Cato in the body, Seneca in the margin. A May Lady is the ornamented female figure of May festivities.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 477–478 How much better were it for our Matrons to do as she did, to go civilly and decently, [9359]Honestæ mulieris instar quæ utitur auro pro eo quod est, ad ea tantum quibus opus est, to use gold as it is gold, and for that use it serves, and when they need it, then to consume it in riot, begger their husbands, prostitute themselves, inveagle others, and peradventure damn their own souls? How much more would it be for their honour and credit?	How much better for our matrons to do as she did, dressing respectably and becomingly, "like an honourable woman who uses gold for what it is, only for necessary purposes": to use gold as gold, for the purpose it serves and when they need it, rather than waste it in extravagance, beggar their husbands, prostitute themselves, entice others, and perhaps damn their own souls! How much more would that advance their honour and reputation?[9360]
Source page 478 Thus doing, as Hierom said of Blesilla, [9361]Furius did not so triumph over the Gaules, Papyrius of the Samnites, Scipio of Numantia, as she did by her temperance; pulla semper veste, &c. they should insult and domineer over lust, folly, vain-glory, all such inordinate, furious and unruly passions.	By doing so—as Jerome said of Blesilla, "Furius did not triumph so greatly over the Gauls, Papirius over the Samnites, or Scipio over Numantia, as she did through her self-restraint, always in a dark dress," and so on—they would triumph and rule over lust, folly, vainglory, and all such excessive, furious and unruly passions.[9362]

[9359] Burton. Printed page 478, o: "Lucian."

[9360] Editor. Civilly means respectably, in accord with accepted social conduct. Burton's Latin and English deliberately repeat the contrast between necessary use and extravagant display. The Lucian citation has no work or section specified and remains unlocated. This appeal develops Cornelia as the model for the closing paragraph.

[9361] Burton. Printed page 478, p: "Non sic Furius de Gallis, non Papyrius de Samnitibus, Scipio de Numantia triumphavit, ac illa se vincendo in hac parte." Not so did Furius triumph over the Gauls, Papirius over the Samnites, or Scipio over Numantia, as she did by conquering herself in this respect.

[9362] Editor. The triumph comparison belongs to Jerome, Letter 77.11, on Fabiola's funeral, not Blesilla's. Jerome also includes Pompey's victory over Pontus, omitted here. Burton conflates the ascetic examples and turns the comparison into triumph over passions. The separate dark-dress phrase is retained as printed. Insult here has the older sense of exulting or triumphing, rather than verbally abusing someone.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But I am over tedious, I confess, and whilst I stand gaping after fine clothes, there is another great allurement, (in the worlds eye at least) which had like to have stoln out of sight, and that is mony, veniunt à dote sagittæ, mony makes the match; [9363]Μόνον ἄργυρον βλέπουσιν: 'Tis like sauce to their meat, cum carne condimentum, a good dowry with a wife. Many men if they do hear but of a great portion, a rich heir, are more mad then if they had all the beauteous ornaments, and those good parts Art and Nature can afford, they [9364]care not for honesty, bringing up, birth, beauty, person, but for mony.	But I am too tedious, I confess. While I stand gaping after fine clothes, another great attraction —in the world's eyes, at least—has almost slipped out of sight: money. "The arrows come from the dowry": money makes the match; "they look only at money." It is like sauce with their meat, "seasoning with the flesh": a good dowry with a wife. Many men, merely hearing of a large marriage portion or a rich heiress, grow more frantic than if they had all the beautiful ornaments and fine qualities that art and nature can provide. They care nothing for virtue, upbringing, birth, beauty or person, but only for money.[9365]

[9363] Burton. Printed page 478, dagger: "Anacreon. 4. Solum intuemur aurum." Anacreon, 4. "We look only at gold."

[9364] Burton. Printed page 478, dagger: "Affer tecum si vis vivere mecum." "Bring something with you if you wish to live with me."

[9365] Editor. A portion is property brought to marriage; honesty includes virtue and sexual respectability. The Greek says "they look only at silver," hence money; Burton's Latin changes person and metal to "we look only at gold." The corresponding Anacreontic poem, XLVI in Stanley's English version, sets wealth above birth and learning, then blames it for family strife, war and lovers' distress. Burton applies its complaint to marriage. His printed 4, the Latin intermediary and the opening dowry tag remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9366]Canes & equos (ô Cyrne) quærimus Nobiles, & à bonâ progenie: Malam vero uxorem, malique patris filiam Ducere non curat vir bonus, Modo ei magnam dotem afferat.	For dogs and horses, Cyrnus, we seek Noble stock and good descent; Yet a good man does not mind marrying A bad woman, a bad father's daughter, If only she brings him a large dowry.[9367]
Our dogs and horses still from the best breed We carefully seek, and well may they speed: But for our wives, so they prove wealthy, Fair or foul, we care not what they be.	For dogs and horses we seek the best breed With care, and may they prosper well; But as for wives, so long as they are wealthy, Fair or foul, we care not what they are.
If she be rich, then she is fair, fine, absolute and perfect, then they burn like fire, they love her dearly, like pig and pye, and are ready to hang themselves if they may not have her. Nothing so familiar in these dayes, as for a young man to marry an old wife, as they say, for a piece of good; asinum auro onustum; and though she be an old crone, and have never a tooth in her head, neither good conditions, nor good face, a natural fool, but onely rich, she shall have twenty young Gallants to be suiters in an instant. As she said in Suetonius, non me, sed mea ambiunt, 'tis not for her sake, but for her lands or mony; and an excellent match it were (as he added) if she were away.	If she is rich, then she is beautiful, fine, complete and perfect. Then they burn like fire and love her dearly, like pork and pie, and are ready to hang themselves if they cannot have her. Nothing is more common these days than for a young man to marry an old woman, as they say, for a bit of property: "an ass laden with gold." Though she is an old crone without a tooth in her head, with neither good character nor a good face, a born fool—provided she is rich—she will have twenty young gallants courting her in an instant. As the woman in Suetonius said, "They court my possessions, not me." It is for her land or money, not for her sake; and, as he added, it would be an excellent match if she were out of the way.[9368]
So on the other side, many a young lovely maid will cast away her self upon an old, doting, decrepit dizard,	On the other hand, many a lovely young woman will throw herself away on an old, doting, decrepit fool—

[9366] Burton. Printed page 478, asterisk: "Theognis."

[9367] Editor. Theognis, elegiac lines 183–192, supplies the breeding-and-marriage comparison. Burton gives a Latin adaptation, then a separate English version. Good and bad in this aristocratic argument carry implications of social birth as well as moral worth; the comparison is not a neutral account of human value. The Latin intermediary remains unidentified.

[9368] Editor. Absolute means complete; conditions means character or disposition. Natural fool is a historical term for someone thought intellectually impaired from birth. Burton's disparaging language and caricature of age remain visible. The statement assigned to a woman in Suetonius has not yet been securely located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9369]Bis puer effœto quamvis balbutiat ore, Prima legit raræ tam culta roseta puellæ,	Though twice a child, he stammers with worn-out mouth, He plucks the first, well-tended roses of a rare girl—[9370]
that is rheumatick and gouty, hath some twenty diseases, perhaps but one eye, one leg, never a nose, no hair on his head, wit in his brains, nor honesty, if he have land or [9371]mony, she will have him before all other suiters,	Rheumatic and gouty, suffering from twenty diseases, perhaps with only one eye, one leg, no nose, no hair on his head, no sense in his brains and no virtue: if he has land or money, she will take him before every other suitor.[9372]
[9373]Dummodo sit dives barbarus ille placet.	Provided he is rich, that barbarian pleases her.[9374]

[9369] Burton. Printed page 478, dagger: “Chaloner. l. 9. de repub. Ang.” Chaloner, On the English Commonwealth, book 9.

[9370] Editor. Burton cites Thomas Chaloner’s Latin work on the English commonwealth. Twice a child means returned to childish dependence through old age. Plucking the girl’s first roses is a sexual metaphor. The awkward printed raræ tam is retained; the precise passage and reading require collation.

[9371] Burton. Printed page 478, r: “Uxorem ducat Danaen, &c.” “Let him take Danae as his wife,” and so on.

[9372] Editor. The description treats illness, disability and appearance as reasons to reject a husband. It is Burton’s satirical catalogue. Danae in the margin evokes the myth in which Jupiter reaches her as a shower of gold, fitting the argument about wealth; the quoted fragment’s source remains unidentified.

[9373] Burton. Printed page 478, s: “Ovid.”

[9374] Editor. Ovid, Ars amatoria 2.276. The consulted Latin has ipse (“even the barbarian himself”) where Burton prints ille (“that barbarian”). His version is translated here. Barbarian carries the speaker’s contempt for an uncultivated or foreign suitor.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 478–479 If he be rich, he is the man, a fine man, and a proper man, she'l go to Iacaktres or Tidore with him; Gelasimus de monte aureo. Sir Giles Goose-cap, Sr. Amorous La-Fool, shall have her. And as Philemasium in [9375]Aristænetus told Emmusus, absq; argento omnia vana, hang him that hath no mony, 'tis to no purpose to talk of marriage without means, [9376]trouble me not with such motions; let others do as they will, Ile be sure to have one shall maintain me fine and brave. Most are of her minde, [9377]De moribus ultima fiet Quæstio, for his conditions, she shall enquire after them another time, or when all is done, the match made, and every body gone home.	If he is rich, he is the man—a fine man, a handsome man. She will go to Jacatra or Tidore with him: "Gelasimus of the Golden Mountain." Sir Giles Goosecap or Sir Amorous La Foole shall have her. As Philemasium told Emmusus in Aristaenetus, "Without money everything is useless." Hang the man who has none! "It is pointless to discuss marriage without means. Do not trouble me with such proposals. Let others do as they please: I will make sure of a man who keeps me finely and splendidly dressed." Most women share her view: "Character will be the last question asked." She will inquire about his character some other time—when everything is over, the match made and everyone gone home.[9378]
Source page 479 [9379]Lucians Lysia was a proper young maid, and had many fine Gentlemen to her suiters; Ethecles a Senators son, Melissus a Merchant, &c. but she forsook them all for one Pasius a base, hirsute, bald-pated knave; but why was it? His father lately died and left him sole heir of his goods and lands.	Lucian's Lysia was a handsome young woman with many fine gentlemen courting her—Ethecles, a senator's son; Melissus, a merchant; and others. But she abandoned them all for a certain Pasius, a low, shaggy, bald-headed rogue. Why? His father had recently died, leaving him sole heir to his property and lands.[9380]

[9375] Burton. Printed page 479, dagger: "Epist. 14. formam spectant alii per gratias, ego pecuniam, &c. ne mihi negotium facesse." Letter 14. "Others look to beauty and charms, I to money," and so on; "do not trouble me."

[9376] Burton. Printed page 479, asterisk: "Qui caret argento, frustra utitur argumento." "Whoever lacks money argues in vain."

[9377] Burton. Printed page 479, t: "Juvenalis." Juvenal.

[9378] Editor. Iacaktres is provisionally understood as Jacatra, on Java; Tidore is another distant trading destination. Sir Giles Goosecap is the foolish knight of Sir Gyles Goosecappe, printed in 1606; Sir Amorous La Foole appears in Jonson's Epicoene. The comic names thus evoke stage fools as acceptable suitors if wealthy. Gelasimus of the Golden Mountain and the Aristaenetus letter remain uncollated. Juvenal 3.140–141 originally concerns judging a witness by wealth before character; Burton applies it to marriage.

[9379] Burton. Printed page 479, dagger: "Tom. 4. merit. dial. multos amatores rejecit, quia pater ejus nuper mortuus, ac dominus ipse factus bonorum omnium." Volume 4, Dialogues of Courtesans. "She rejected many lovers because his father had recently died, and he himself had become master of all the property."

[9380] Editor. Burton substantially rearranges Lucian, Dialogues of the Courtesans 12. In the consulted text the woman is Joessa, Lysias is her male lover, and Melissus is the recent heir. She says she rejected wealthy men for Lysias without charging him. Burton's money-seeking Lysia and Pasius are retained as his account, with the discrepancy made explicit here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This is not amongst your dust-worms alone, poor snakes that will prostitute their souls for mony, but with this bait you may catch our most potent, puissant, and illustrious Princes. That proud upstart domineering Bishop of Ely, in the time of Richard the first, Viceroy in his absence, as [9381]Nuburgensis relates it, to fortifie himself, and maintain his greatness, propinquarum suarum connubiis, plurimos sibi potentes & nobiles devincire curavit, married his poor kinswomen (which came forth of Normandy by droves) to the chiefest nobles of the land, and they were glad to accept of such matches, fair or foul, for themselves, their sons, nephews, &c. Et quis tam præclaram affinitatem sub spe magnæ promotionis non optaret? Who would not have done as much for mony and preferment? as mine author [9382]adds.	This occurs not only among grubbers in the dust, poor wretches who will sell their souls for money: the same bait can catch our most powerful, mighty and illustrious princes. That proud, domineering upstart, the bishop of Ely in Richard I's reign, who governed during the king's absence, sought to strengthen himself and maintain his power. As William of Newburgh relates, "he took care to bind many powerful nobles to himself through marriages with his female relatives." He married his poor kinswomen, who came over from Normandy in droves, to the greatest nobles in the land. They gladly accepted these matches, fair or foul, for themselves, their sons, nephews and so on. "Who would not desire so splendid a connection, in the hope of great advancement?" Who would not do as much for money and preferment, as my author adds?[9383]

[9381] Burton. Printed page 479, dagger: "Lib. 3. cap. 14. quis nobilium eo tempore, sibi aut filio aut nepoti uxorem accipere cupiens, oblatam sibi aliquam propinquarum ejus non acciperet obviis manibus? quarum turbam acciverat è Normannia in Angliam ejus rei gratia." Book 3, chapter 14. "What nobleman at that time, seeking a wife for himself, his son or his nephew, would not welcome with open arms one of his kinswomen offered to him? He had summoned a crowd of them from Normandy to England for that purpose."

[9382] Burton. Printed page 479, u: "Alexander Gaguinus Sarmat. Europ. descript." Alexander Gaguinus, Description of European Sarmatia.

[9383] Editor. Dust-worms and poor snakes are contemptuous terms for lowly, grasping people. William of Newburgh, History 4.14.6 in Stevenson's translation, describes the bishop of Ely securing nobles through marriages to female relatives brought from Normandy, and their hope of advancement. This matches Burton's example, though his margin prints 3.14. The account is hostile to the chancellor. The adjacent Gaguinus reference may anticipate the following dynastic examples; its attachment and Burton's Latin edition remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Vortiger King of Britain, married Rowena the daughter of Hengist the Saxon Prince, his mortal enemy; but wherefore? she had Kent for her dowry. Iagello the great Duke of Lituania, 1386. was mightily enamored on Hedergæ, insomuch that he turned Christian from a Pagan, and was baptized himself by the name of Vladislaus, and all his subjects for her sake: but why was it? she was daughter and heir of Poland, and his desire was to have both Kingdoms incorporated into one. Charls the great was an earnest suiter to Irene the Empress, but, saith [9384]Zonarus, ob regnum, to annex the Empire of the East to that of the West.	Vortigern, king of Britain, married Rowena, daughter of Hengist, the Saxon prince and his mortal enemy. Why? She had Kent as her dowry. In 1386 Jagiełło, grand duke of Lithuania, was so deeply enamoured of Hedwig that he converted from paganism to Christianity and was baptized as Władysław, along with all his subjects for her sake. But why? She was Poland's daughter and heir, and he wanted the two kingdoms united. Charlemagne eagerly courted the empress Irene, but, says Zonaras, "for the kingdom": to join the Eastern Empire to the Western.[9385]
Yet what is the event of all such matches, that are so made for mony, goods, by deceit, or for burning lust, quos fœda libido conjunxit, what follows? they are almost mad at first, but 'tis a meer flash; as chaff and straw soon fired, burn vehemently for a while, yet out in a moment; so are all such matches made by those allurements of burning lust; where there is no respect of honesty, parentage, vertue, religion, education, and the like, they are extinguished in an instant, and instead of love, comes hate; for joy, repentance and desperation it self.	Yet what becomes of all these matches made for money or property, through deceit or burning lust—those "whom foul desire has joined"? What follows? At first they are almost mad, but it is a mere flash. Chaff and straw catch fire quickly and burn fiercely for a while, yet go out in a moment. So it is with matches made through the attractions of burning lust. Where there is no regard for honesty, family, virtue, religion, education and the like, they are extinguished in an instant: hatred replaces love, and regret and even despair replace joy.[9386]

[9384] Burton. Printed page 479, x: "Tom. 3. annal." Volume 3 of the Annals.

[9385] Editor. Geoffrey of Monmouth, History of the Kings of Britain 6.12, reverses Burton's Kent transaction: Vortigern grants Kent to Hengist in return for the marriage. This is legendary history. Hedergæ is understood as Hedwig (Jadwiga), and Iagello as Jagiełło. Burton's compressed account of conversion, motives and political union, and his Zonaras reference, remain for historical collation.

[9386] Editor. Honesty means upright conduct, not simply truthfulness. Burton contrasts fleeting appetite with the social and religious qualifications he thinks should govern marriage. His claims that such matches inevitably end in hatred and despair belong to this moral argument, rather than establishing a universal outcome.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Franciscus Barbarus in his first book de re uxoria c. 5. hath a story of one Philip of Padua that fell in love with a common whore, and was now ready to run mad for her; his father having no more sons, let him enjoy her; [9387]but after a few days, the young man began to loath, could not so much as endure the sight of her, and from one madness fell into another. Such event commonly have all these lovers; and he that so marries, or for such respects, let them look for no better success, then Menelaus had with Helen, Vulcan with Venus, Theseus with Phædra, Minos with Pasiphae, and Claudius with Messalina; shame, sorrow, misery, melancholy, discontent.	Francesco Barbaro, in On Marriage, book 1, chapter 5, tells of a certain Philip of Padua who fell in love with a common prostitute and was on the point of going mad for her. His father, having no other sons, let him have her. But after a few days the young man began to loathe her and could not even bear the sight of her: he fell from one madness into another. Such is the usual outcome for these lovers. Anyone who marries in this way or for such reasons should expect no better fortune than Menelaus with Helen, Vulcan with Venus, Theseus with Phaedra, Minos with Pasiphae, or Claudius with Messalina: shame, sorrow, misery, melancholy and discontent.[9388]

[9387] Burton. Printed page 479, y: “Libido statim deferbuit, fastidium cœpit, & quod in ea tantopere adamavit aspernatur, & ab ægritudine liberatus in angorem incidit.” “Desire immediately cooled, disgust began, and he despises what he had loved so greatly in her; released from one sickness, he fell into anguish.”

[9388] Editor. Francesco Barbaro’s De re uxoria means On Marriage, or On Wifely Matters. The anecdote’s exact text remains to be collated. The closing list joins classical myth with Roman imperial history as examples of disastrous unions; Burton treats their very different stories as a single warning.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 480 SUBSECT. 4.	SUBSECTION 4
Importunity and opportunity of time, place, conference, discourse, singing, dancing, musick, amorous tales, objects, kissing, familiarity, tokens, presents, bribes, promises, protestations, tears, &c.	Persistence and opportunity of time and place; meetings, conversation, singing, dancing, music, amorous tales and sights, kissing, familiarity, tokens, gifts, bribes, promises, declarations, tears, and so on.[9389]
All these allurements hitherto are afar off, and at a distance; I will come nearer to those other degrees of Love, which are conference, kissing, dalliance, discourse, singing, dancing, amorous tales, objects, presents, &c. which as so many Syrens steal away the hearts of men and women. For as Tacius observes, l. 2. [9390]It is no sufficient trial of a maids affection by her eys alone, but you must say something that shall be more available, and use such other forcible engins; therefore take her by the hand, wring her fingers hard, and sigh withall; if she accept this in good part, and seem not to be much averse, then call her Mistris, take her about the neck and kiss her, &c.	All the attractions considered so far operate from afar, at a distance. I will come closer to those further stages of love: meetings, kissing, dalliance, conversation, singing, dancing, amorous tales and sights, gifts, and so on. Like so many Sirens, they steal away the hearts of men and women. As Achilles Tatius observes in book 2, "A young woman's eyes alone do not sufficiently test her affection. You must say something more effective and employ other powerful devices. Take her hand, squeeze her fingers firmly, and sigh as you do so. If she takes this well and seems not greatly averse, then call her your mistress, put your arms about her neck and kiss her," and so on.[9391]

[9389] Editor. Importunity means persistent urging or solicitation; conference means personal meetings or conversation; protestations are emphatic declarations, often of love. The heading outlines the entire new subsection. This block covers its opening discussion of proximity and familiarity; singing, music and later topics continue beyond it.

[9390] Burton. Printed page 480, z: "De puellæ voluntate periculum facere solis oculis non est satis, sed efficacius aliquid agere oportet, ibiq; etiam machinam alteram adhibere: itaq; manus tange, digitos constringe, atq; inter stringendum suspira; si hæc agentem æquo se animo feret, neq; facta hujusmodi aspernabitur, tum vero dominam appella, ejusq; collum suaviare." "Testing a girl's inclination by her eyes alone is not enough: one must do something more effective and employ another device. Touch her hands, squeeze her fingers and sigh while squeezing them. If she bears this calmly and does not reject such acts, then call her your mistress and kiss her neck."

[9391] Editor. Tacius is Achilles Tatius, author of Leucippe and Clitophon. Engines means devices or stratagems. Burton's English says to say something where the marginal Latin says to do something; it also expands kissing the neck into embracing and kissing. His description turns the testing of a woman's reactions into a technique of courtship.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But this cannot be done except they first get opportunity of living, or coming together, ingress, egress, and regress; letters and commendations may do much, outward gestures and actions: but when they come to live near one another, in the same street, village, or together in an house, love is kindled on a sudden. Many a Serving-man by reason of this opportunity and importunity, inveagles his Masters daughter, many a Gallant loves a Dowdy, many a gentleman runs upon his wives maids, many Ladies dote upon their men, as the Queen in Ariosto did upon the Dwarf, many matches are so made in haste, and they compelled as it were by [9392]necessity so to love, which had they been free, come in company of others, seen that variety which many places afford, or compared them to a third, would never have looked one upon another.	But none of this can happen unless they first have opportunities to live or meet together, to come in, go out and return. Letters, recommendations, outward gestures and actions can do much; but when people live near one another—in the same street or village, or together in a house—love suddenly catches fire. Through such opportunity and persistence, many a serving man entices his master's daughter; many a gallant loves a slattern; many a gentleman pursues his wife's maids; many ladies dote on their servants, as Ariosto's queen doted on the dwarf. Many matches are made hastily in this way, as though necessity compelled the pair to love. Had they been free, mixed with other people, seen the variety available elsewhere or compared each other with someone else, they would never have looked at one another.[9393]

[9392] Burton. Printed page 480, dagger: "Hungry dogs will eat dirty puddings."

[9393] Editor. Dowdy is an insulting term for an unattractive or slovenly woman. Men in "their men" means male servants. The queen-and-dwarf example is attributed to Ariosto but has not been collated here. The marginal proverb compares restricted choice in love to hunger overcoming distaste; puddings are food, not necessarily sweet desserts.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or had not that opportunity of discourse and familiarity been offered, they would have loathed and contemned those, whom for want of better choice and other objects, they are fatally driven on, and by reason of their hot bloud, idle life, full diet, &c. are forced to dote upon them that come next. And many times those which at the first sight cannot fancy or affect each other, but are harsh and ready to disagree, offended with each others carriage, like Benedict and Betteris in the [9394]Comedy, and in whom they finde many faults, by this living together in a house, conference, kissing, colling, and such like allurements, begin at last to dote insensibly one upon another.	Without that opportunity for conversation and familiarity, they would have loathed and despised the people towards whom fate now drives them for want of better choice or other objects of desire. Their hot blood, idle life, rich diet and so on force them to dote on whoever is nearest. Often, too, people who initially feel no liking or affection for one another—who are prickly and quick to quarrel, offended by each other's behaviour, like Benedick and Beatrice in the comedy, and finding many faults in one another—through sharing a house, talking, kissing, embracing and similar attractions gradually begin to fall in love without noticing it.[9395]
It was the greatest motive that Potiphars wife had to dote upon Joseph, and [9396]Clitiphon upon Leucippe his Unkles daughter, because the plague being at Bizance, it was his fortune for a time to sojourn with her, to sit next her at the table, as he telleth the tale himself in Tatius lib. 2. (which though it be but a fiction, is grounded upon good observation, and doth well express the passions of lovers) he had opportunity to take her by the hand, and after a while to kiss, and handle her paps, &c. [9397]which made him almost mad.	This was the strongest inducement for Potiphar's wife to dote on Joseph, and for Clitophon to love Leucippe, his uncle's daughter. Because of the plague at Byzantium, he happened to live with her for a time and sit beside her at table, as he tells the story himself in Tatius, book 2. Although it is fiction, it rests on good observation and expresses lovers' passions well. He had opportunities to take her hand, and after a while to kiss her and touch her breasts, and so on, which almost drove him mad.[9398]

[9394] Burton. Printed page 480, asterisk: "Shakespeare."

[9395] Editor. Burton's Benedict and Betteris are Shakespeare's Benedick and Beatrice in Much Ado About Nothing. Their antagonistic exchanges develop into acknowledged love, assisted by their friends' contrivances. Burton uses them as an analogy for intimacy overcoming initial dislike. Colling means embracing; insensibly means imperceptibly.

[9396] Burton. Printed page 480, a: "Tatius lib. 1." Tatius, book 1.

[9397] Burton. Printed page 480, b: "In mammarum attractu, non aspernanda inest jucunditas, & attrectatus, &c." "In touching breasts there is no contemptible pleasure, and in handling," and so on.

[9398] Editor. Potiphar's wife pursues Joseph in Genesis 39. Burton's Tatius references disagree: book 1 in the margin, book 2 in the body. His remark explicitly defends fiction as evidence about human passions. The plague, chronology and details of his retelling remain to be collated against the Greek novel; they are preserved as his narrative here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 480–481 Ismenius the Orator makes the like confession in Eustathius lib. 1. when he came first to Sosthenes house, and sate at table with Cratistes his friend, Ismene Sosthenes daughter, waiting on them with her breasts open, arms half bare,	Ismenius the orator makes a similar confession in Eustathius, book 1. When he first came to Sosthenes's house and sat at table with his friend Cratistes, Sosthenes's daughter Ismene waited on them, with her breasts exposed and her arms half bare—[9399]
Source page 481 [9400]Nuda pedem, discincta sinum, spoliata lacertos,	Barefoot, her dress loosened at the breast, her arms bare—[9401]
after the Greek fashion in those times, ——[9402]nudos media plus parte lacertos, as Daphne was when she fled from Phœbus (which moved him much) was ever ready to give attendance on him, to fill him drink, her eyes were never off him, rogabundi oculi, those speaking eyes, courting eyes, inchanting eyes; but she was still smiling on him, and when they were risen, that she had gotten a little opportunity, [9403]she came and drank to him, and withall trod upon his toes, and would come and go, and when he could not speak for the company, she would wring his hand, and blush when she met him:	After the Greek fashion of those times—"her arms bare for more than half their length," as Daphne's were when she fled from Phoebus, a sight that deeply moved him. Ismene was always ready to attend to him and pour his drink. Her eyes never left him: "imploring eyes," those speaking, courting, enchanting eyes. She kept smiling at him. When they had risen and she found a little opportunity, she came and drank to him, treading on his toes as she did so. She would come and go, and when the company prevented him from speaking, she would squeeze his hand and blush when she met him.[9404]

[9399] Editor. Burton turns to the romance usually called Hysmine and Hysminias, attributed to Eustathius. His forms Ismene and Ismenius are retained in the modern version. The quoted scenes are literary courtship, not direct testimony about Greek social customs. The precise Latin intermediary remains unidentified.

[9400] Burton. Printed page 481, asterisk: "Mantuan."

[9401] Editor. Mantuan is the Latin poet Battista Mantovano. The line describes an uncovered foot, loosened clothing at the breast and bare arms. Burton inserts it into his prose account of Ismene. The exact poem and line remain unlocated.

[9402] Burton. Printed page 481, asterisk: "Ovid. 1. Met." Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 1.

[9403] Burton. Printed page 481, c: "Manus ad cubitum nuda, coram astans, fortius intuita, tenuem de pectore spiritum ducens, digitum meum pressit, & bibens pedem pressit; mutuæ compressiones corporum, labiorum commixtiones, pedum connexiones, &c. Et bibit eodem loco, &c." "With her arm bare to the elbow, standing before me, looking intently and drawing a faint breath from her chest, she squeezed my finger; while drinking she pressed my foot. Mutual embraces, minglings of lips, intertwinings of feet, and so on. And she drank from the same place," and so on.

[9404] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.501, describes Daphne's arms as Apollo gazes at her. Phoebus is Apollo. Burton inserts this fragment into the romance scene and then resumes Ismene's attentions. The Latin marginal account and the English body overlap but are not word-for-word equivalents; both are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and by this means first she overcame him (bibens amorem hauriebam simul) she would kiss the cup and drink to him, and smile, and drink where he drank on that side of the cup, by which mutual compressions, kissings, wringing of hands, treading of feet, &c. Ipsam mihi videbar sorbillare virginem, I sipt and sipt, and sipt so long, till at length I was drunk in love upon a sudden.	By these means she first overcame him: "As I drank, I drank in love as well." She would kiss the cup, drink to him, smile and drink from the same side of the cup where he had drunk. Through these mutual embraces, kisses, hand-squeezings, foot-pressings and so on, "I seemed to be sipping the girl herself." I sipped and sipped and sipped, until suddenly I found myself drunk with love.[9405]
Philocharinus in [9406]Aristænetus, met a fair maid by chance, a meer stranger to him, he looked back at her, she looked back at him again, and smiled withall.	In Aristaenetus, Philocharinus happened to meet a beautiful young woman, a complete stranger. He looked back at her; she looked back at him and smiled.[9407]
[9408]Ille dies lethi primus, primusque malorum Causa fuit —— &c.	That day was the beginning of death, the first Cause of evils——and so on.[9409]
It was the sole cause of his farther acquaintance, & love that undid him.	That alone led to their further acquaintance and the love that ruined him.
[9410]O nullis tutum credere blanditiis.	Oh, it is unsafe to trust any blandishments.[9411]

[9405] Editor. The repeated sipping turns drinking into an image of erotic absorption. Burton gives Latin phrases and then expands the final one into his own repeated English verb. Their separate effects are kept in the modern column, rather than reducing the sequence to a single statement.

[9406] Burton. Printed page 481, dagger: "Epist. 4. Respexi, respexit & illa subridens, &c." Letter 4. "I looked back, and she too looked back, smiling," and so on.

[9407] Editor. Aristaenetus, Letter 4 as cited by Burton. The brief mutual backward glance illustrates how a small gesture can initiate acquaintance. The precise edition and full episode have not yet been collated.

[9408] Burton. Printed page 481, asterisk: "Vir. Æn. 4." Virgil, Aeneid, book 4.

[9409] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.169–170, on Dido and Aeneas entering the cave. The consulted text has primus leti, where Burton reverses the order to lethi primus. Burton transfers the tragic foreshadowing to a different love story; the lineation follows his printed quotation.

[9410] Burton. Printed page 481, asterisk: "Propertius."

[9411] Editor. Propertius 1.15.42. Blandishments are flattering or caressing attentions. The Latin's emphatic negative is rendered idiomatically as "unsafe to trust any." The speaker's warning concludes an accusation of Cynthia's faithlessness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This opportunity of time and place, with their circumstances are so forcible motives, that it is unpossible almost for two young folks equall in years to live together, and not be in love, especially in great houses, Princes Courts, where they are idle in summo gradu, fare well, live at ease, and cannot tell otherwise how to spend their time.	These opportunities of time and place, with their attendant circumstances, are such powerful inducements that it is almost impossible for two young people of the same age to live together without falling in love—especially in great households and princely courts, where they are idle "to the highest degree," eat well, live at ease and do not know how else to spend their time.[9412]
[9413]Illic Hippolitum pone, Priapus erit.	Put Hippolytus there: he will become Priapus.[9414]
Achilles was sent by his mother Thetis, to the Iland of Scyros in the Ægæan Sea (where Lycomedes then raigned) in his nonage to be brought up, to avoid that hard destiny of the Oracle (he should be slain at the siege of Troy:) and for that cause was nurtured in Geneseo, amongst the Kings children in a womans habit; but see the event? He comprest Deidamia the Kings fair daughter, and had a fine son, called Pyrrhus by her.	Achilles's mother Thetis sent him while still a minor to be brought up on Scyros, the island in the Aegean Sea then ruled by Lycomedes. This was to escape the cruel destiny foretold by the oracle: that he would be killed at the siege of Troy. For that reason he was raised in the women's quarters among the king's children, dressed as a woman. But see the outcome! He slept with the king's beautiful daughter Deidamia and had a fine son by her, called Pyrrhus.[9415]

[9412] Editor. Great houses are aristocratic households. Burton's claim about the near inevitability of love combines proximity with wealth, leisure and abundant food. It carries forward his account of idleness and rich living as conditions that nourish erotic melancholy.

[9413] Burton. Printed page 481, d: "Ovid amor. lib. 2. eleg. 2." Ovid, Amores, book 2, elegy 2.

[9414] Editor. Ovid, Amores 2.4.32, not 2.2 as printed in the margin. Hippolytus represents chastity; Priapus is a sexually potent fertility god. The abrupt transformation is comic exaggeration, applied by Burton to the temptations of a leisured household.

[9415] Editor. Geneseo is provisionally understood as gynaeceo, "in the women's quarters"; the printed form remains on the left. Nonage means minority. Comprest is a sexual euphemism. Pyrrhus is also called Neoptolemus. The Achilles narrative and its precise intermediary remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Peter Albelhardus the Philosopher, as he tells the tale himself, being set by Fulbertus her unkle, to teach Helonissa his lovely neice, and to that purpose sojourned in his house, and had committed agnam tenellam famelico lupo, I use his own words, he soon got her good will, plura erant oscula quam sententiæ, and he read more of love then any other Lecture; such prety feats can opportunity plea; primum domo conjuncti, inde animis, &c.	The philosopher Peter Abelard tells his own story. Fulbert, the uncle of the lovely Heloise, appointed him to teach his niece and lodged him in his house for that purpose. Thus "a tender lamb was entrusted to a hungry wolf"—I use his own words. Abelard soon won her affection: "there were more kisses than learned statements," and he lectured more on love than on any other subject. Opportunity can play such pretty tricks: "first joined in one house, then in their minds," and so on.[9416]
Source page 481–482 But when as I say, nox, vinum, & adolescentia, youth, wine, and night, shall concur, nox amoris & quietis conscia, 'tis a wonder they be not all plunged over head and ears in love; for youth is benigna in amorem, & prona materies, a very combustible matter, Napthe it self, the fuell of loves fire, and most apt to kindle it. If there be seven servants in an ordinary house, you shall have three couple in some good liking at least, and amongst idle persons how should it be otherwise?	But when, as I say, "night, wine and youth"—youth, wine and night—come together—"night, the confidante of love and rest"—it is a wonder they are not all plunged head over heels in love. Youth is "material favourable and inclined to love," highly combustible matter: naphtha itself, the fuel of love's fire, ready to kindle it. If an ordinary household has seven servants, you will find at least three couples with some liking for one another. Among idle people, how could it be otherwise?[9417]

[9416] Editor. Abelard's Historia calamitatum supplies the lamb-and-wolf comparison, kisses and lessons, and shared house followed by shared affection. Burton condenses the wording; the consulted Latin has teneram, not tenellam. Names are normalized to Abelard and Heloise. The printed plea is read contextually as play. This is Abelard's retrospective account of his conduct.

[9417] Editor. Naphtha is a readily combustible substance, used here as an image for youth's susceptibility. The seven-servant example is Burton's rhetorical illustration, not a statistical finding. The short Latin tags are translated in place; their exact sources remain to be identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 482 Living at [9418]Rome, saith Aratines Lucretia, in the flowre of my fortunes, rich, fair, young, and so well brought up, my conversation, age, beauty, fortune, made all the world admire and love me. Night alone, that one occasion is enough to set all on fire, and they are so cunning in great houses, that they make their best advantage of it: Many a Gentlewoman, that is guilty to her self of her imperfections, paintings, impostures, will not willingly be seen by day, but as [9419]Castilio noteth, in the night. Diem ut glis odit, tædarum lucem super omnia mavult, She hates the day like a dor-mouse, and above all things loves torches and candle-light, and if she must come abroad in the day, she covets, as [9420]in a Mercers shop, a very obfuscate and obscure light. And good reason she hath for it: Nocte latent mendæ, and many an amorous gull is fetched over by that means.	"Living in Rome," says Aretino's Lucretia, "at the height of my fortunes—rich, beautiful, young and so well brought up—my social graces, age, beauty and fortune made the whole world admire and love me." Night alone is enough to set everything on fire. People in great households are so cunning that they make the most of it. Many a gentlewoman, conscious of her imperfections, cosmetics and deceptions, is unwilling to be seen by day; as Castiglione observes, she prefers the night. "She hates daylight like a dormouse and prefers torchlight above everything." She hates the day like a dormouse and loves torches and candlelight best; if she must go out by day, she wants a very dim, obscure light, like that in a cloth merchant's shop. She has good reason: "faults lie hidden at night," and many a lovesick fool is taken in that way.[9421]

[9418] Burton. Printed page 482, dagger: "Romæ vivens flore fortunæ, & opulentiæ meæ, ætas, forma, gratia conversationis, maxime me fecerunt expetibilem, &c." "Living in Rome at the height of my fortune and wealth, my age, beauty and charm in company made me exceedingly desirable," and so on.

[9419] Burton. Printed page 482, e: "De Aulic. l. 1. fol. 63." The Courtier, book 1, folio 63.

[9420] Burton. Printed page 482, dagger: "Ut adulterini mercatorum panni." "Like the merchants' adulterated cloth."

[9421] Editor. Aratine is Aretino; Castilio is Castiglione, whose Courtier is cited in the margin. Their exact passages remain for collation. Ovid, Ars amatoria 1.249, supplies "faults lie hidden at night." A mercer sells textiles; fetched over means deceived. Burton's Latin and English dormouse comparison are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Gomesius lib. 3. de sale gen. c. 22. gives instance in a Florentine Gentleman, that was so deceived with a wife, she was so radiently set out with rings and jewels, lawns, scarfs, laces, gold, spangles, and gaudy devices, that the young man took her to be a goddess (for he never saw her but by torchlight) but after the wedding solemnities, when as he viewed her the next morning without her tires, and in a clear day, she was so deformed, a lean, yellow, riveld, &c. such a beastly creature in his eyes, that he could not endure to look upon her.	Gomesius, in On Salt, book 3, chapter 22, gives the example of a Florentine gentleman deceived in his choice of wife. She was so brilliantly decked out in rings and jewels, fine linen, scarves, lace, gold, spangles and showy ornaments that the young man took her for a goddess: he had only ever seen her by torchlight. But the morning after the wedding, when he saw her without her finery in clear daylight, she was so ugly—lean, yellow, wrinkled and so on—such a beastly creature in his eyes, that he could not bear to look at her.[9422]
Such matches are frequently made in Italy, where they have no other opportunity to wooe but when they go to Church, or, as [9423]in Turkie, see them at a distance, they must enterchange few or no words, till such time they come to be married, and then as Sardus lib. 1. cap. 3. de morb. gent. and [9424]Bohemus relate of those old Lacedemonians, the Bride is brought into the chamber, with her hair girt about her, the Bridegroom comes in, and unties the knot, and must not see her at all by day-light, till such time as he is made a father by her.	Such matches are often made in Italy, where people have no opportunity to court except on going to church; or, as in Turkey, they see one another from a distance and must exchange few words, if any, until they marry. Then, as Sardus in On the Customs of Nations, book 1, chapter 3, and Boemus relate of the ancient Spartans, the bride is brought into the chamber with her hair bound about her; the bridegroom enters and unties the knot, and must not see her at all by daylight until he has fathered a child by her.[9425]

[9422] Editor. Lawns are fine linens; tires are ornaments or finery; riveld means wrinkled. De sale is translated as On Salt, while Burton's abbreviated gen. remains unexpanded. The exact Gomesius work, edition and anecdote require collation. The harsh description reports the deceived husband's judgement.

[9423] Burton. Printed page 482, f: "Busbeq. epist." Busbecq, Letters.

[9424] Burton. Printed page 482, g: "Paranympha in cubiculum adducta capillos ad cutim resecebat; sponsus inde ad eam ingressus cingulum solvebat, nec prius sponsam aspexit interdiu quam ex illa factus esset pater." "The bridal attendant, [the bride] having been brought into the chamber, cut her hair down to the skin; the bridegroom then entered and loosened her girdle, and did not see his bride by daylight until he had become a father by her."

[9425] Editor. Lacedemonians are Spartans; Bohemus is Boemus, and Busbeq. refers to Busbecq. De morb. gent. is understood as an abbreviation for a work on national customs. Burton's English says the bride's hair is bound and a knot untied; the Latin margin instead has hair cut to the skin and a girdle loosened. Neither version is silently substituted for the other.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In those hotter countries these are ordinary practises at this day; but in our Northern parts amongst Germans, Danes, French, and Britaines, the continent of Scandia and the rest, we assume more liberty in such causes; we allow them, as Bohemus saith, to kiss coming and going, & modo absit lascivia, in cauponam ducere, to talk merrily, sport, play, sing, and dance, so that it be modestly done, go to the Ale-house and Tavern together. And 'tis not amiss, though [9426]Chrysostome, Cyprian, Hierome, and some other of the Fathers speak bitterly against it: but that is the abuse which is commonly seen at some drunken matches, dissolute meetings, or great unruly feasts.	These practices are common in those hotter countries today. But in our northern regions—among Germans, Danes, French and Britons, in mainland Scandinavia and elsewhere—we take greater liberties in such matters. As Boemus says, we allow them to kiss on meeting and parting, "provided there is no lewdness, to take one another to a tavern," to talk merrily, amuse themselves, play, sing and dance, so long as it is done modestly, and to visit alehouses and taverns together. There is nothing wrong with this, although Chrysostom, Cyprian, Jerome and some other Fathers speak bitterly against it. They condemn the abuse commonly seen at drunken gatherings, dissolute meetings and great unruly feasts.[9427]

[9426] Burton. Printed page 482, h: "Serm. cont. concub." Sermon against cohabitation.

[9427] Editor. Burton permits sociable courtship when conducted modestly, interpreting the Fathers' strictures as directed at abuse. His broad contrasts between northern and southern countries are those of his sources and argument. Scandia is Scandinavia; matches here means gatherings or parties. The precise Boemus and patristic passages remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9428]A young pittivanted, trim-bearded fellow, saith Hierom, will come with a company of complements, and hold you up by the arm as you go, and wringing your fingers, will so be enticed, or entice: one drinks to you, another embraceth, a third kisseth, and all this while the Fidler plays or sings a lascivious song; a fourth singles you out to dance, [9429]one speaks by becks and signs, and that which he dares not say, signifies by passions; amongst so many and so great provocations of pleasure, lust conquers the most hard and crabbed minds, and scarce can a man live honest amongst feastings, and sports, or at such great-meetings.	"A young fellow with a neatly trimmed, pointed beard," says Jerome, "will come with a string of compliments, support you by the arm as you walk, and squeeze your fingers, enticing you or being enticed himself. One drinks to you, another embraces you, a third kisses you, while the fiddler plays or sings a lewd song. A fourth chooses you as his dancing partner. One speaks through nods and signs, expressing by emotional gestures what he dares not say. Amid so many powerful incitements to pleasure, lust conquers even the hardest and most unyielding minds; scarcely can anyone remain chaste amid feasting and entertainments or at such great gatherings."[9430]

[9428] Burton. Printed page 482, i: "Lib. 2. epist. ad filium, & virginem & matrem viduam epist. 10. dabit tibi barbatulus quispiam manum, sustentabit lassam, & pressis digitis aut tentabitur aut tentabit, &c." Book 2, letter to the son, virgin and widowed mother, letter 10. "Some young bearded man will give you his hand, support you when tired, and by squeezing your fingers will either be tempted or tempt you," and so on.

[9429] Burton. Printed page 482, k: "Loquetur alius nutibus, & quicquid metuit dicere, significabit affectibus. Inter has tantas voluptatum illecebras etiam ferreas mentes libido domat. Difficile inter epulas servatur pudicitia." "Another will speak through nods, and signify by emotions whatever he fears to say. Amid such great attractions of pleasure, desire subdues even iron minds. Chastity is preserved with difficulty amid feasts."

[9430] Editor. Jerome, Letter 117.6, contains the offered hand, finger pressure, suggestive performance and difficulty of chastity at banquets. Burton expands and rearranges the scene. His edition's book-and-letter numbering is retained in the margin. Pittivanted refers to a pointed beard; becks are nods or beckoning signs; honest here means chaste.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 482–483 For as he goes on, [9431]she walks along and with the ruffling of her clothes, makes men look at her, her shoos creek, her paps tied up, her waste pulled in to make her look small, she is straight girded, her hairs hang loose about her ears, her upper garment sometimes falls, and sometimes tarries to shew her naked shoulders, and as if she would not be seen, she covers that in all haste, which voluntarily she shewed.	For, as he continues, “She walks along and draws men’s eyes with the rustling of her clothes. Her shoes creak; her breasts are bound up; her waist is drawn in to make her look small. She is tightly girdled, her hair hangs loose about her ears, and her outer garment sometimes falls and sometimes lingers, exposing her bare shoulders. Then, as though she did not wish to be seen, she hastily covers what she deliberately showed.”[9432]
Source page 483 And not at Feasts, Playes, Pageants, and such assemblies, [9433]but as Chrysostome objects, these tricks are put in practise at Service time in Churches, and at the Communion it self. If such dumb shews, signs, and more obscure significations of Love can so move, what shall they do that have full liberty to sing, dance, kiss, coll, to use all manner of discourse and dalliance? What shall he do that is beleagred of all sides?	Nor only at feasts, plays, pageants and similar gatherings: as Chrysostom complains, these tricks are practised during church services and even at Communion itself. If such silent displays, signs and more veiled expressions of love have so much power, what will those do who have complete freedom to sing, dance, kiss, embrace, and indulge in every kind of conversation and dalliance? What can a man do when besieged on every side?[9434]

[9431] Burton. Printed page 483, l: “Clamore vestium ad se juvenes vocat; capilli fasciolis comprimuntur crispati, cingulo pectus arctatur, capilli vel in frontem, vel in aures defluunt: palliolum interdum cadit, ut nudet humeros, & quasi videri noluerit, festinans celat, quod volens detexerit.” “With the noise of her clothes she calls young men to herself; curled hair is bound with ribbons, her chest is confined by a girdle, her hair falls over her forehead or ears. Her little cloak sometimes drops to bare her shoulders, and, as if unwilling to be seen, she hastily hides what she willingly exposed.”

[9432] Editor. Jerome, Letter 117.7, supplies the creaking shoes, constrained breasts and chest, hair and deliberately dropped shawl. Burton’s body and Latin marginal summary differ in detail. Straight means tightly, waste means waist, and ruffling is rendered as rustling. The passage attributes calculated seduction to dress and gestures.

[9433] Burton. Printed page 483, m: “Serm. cont. concub. In sancto & reverendo sacramentorum tempore multas occasiones, ut illis placeant qui eas vident, præbent.” Sermon against cohabitation. “At the holy and reverent time of the sacraments, they offer many opportunities to please those who see them.”

[9434] Editor. Serm. cont. concub. abbreviates a sermon against cohabitation, here attributed to Chrysostom. The exact work and passage remain to be established. The argument extends suspicion of seductive display from public entertainments to worship; dumb shows are silent gestures or performances.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9435]Quem tot, tam roseæ petunt puellæ, Quem cultæ cupiunt nurus, amorque Omnis undique & undecunque & usque, Omnis ambit Amor, Venusque Hymenque:	Whom so many rosy girls pursue, Whom elegant women desire, and love On every side, from everywhere, unceasingly— All Love surrounds him, Venus too, and Hymen.[9436]
After whom so many Rosie maids enquire, Whom dainty Dames and loving wights desire, In every place, still, and at all times sue, Whom Gods and gentle Goddesses do wooe;	Whom so many rosy maidens seek, Whom dainty dames and loving people desire, Courted everywhere, continually, at all times, Whom gods and gentle goddesses woo;
How shall he contain?	How can he restrain himself?[9437]
The very tone of some of their voices, a pretty pleasing speech, an affected tone they use, is able of it self to captivate a yong man; but when a good Wit shall concur, Art and eloquence, fascinating speech, pleasant discourse, sweet gestures, the Syrens themselves cannot so inchant. [9438]P. Jovius commends his Italian Country-women, to have an excellent faculty in this kind, above all other nations, and amongst them the Florentine Ladies: some prefer Roman and Venetian Curtesans, they have such pleasing tongues, and such elegancy of speech, that they are able to overcome a Saint,	The very sound of some women's voices—a pretty, pleasing way of speaking, an affected tone they adopt—can by itself captivate a young man. But when wit joins in, with art and eloquence, enchanting speech, pleasant conversation and graceful gestures, the Sirens themselves cannot cast such a spell. Paolo Giovio praises his Italian countrywomen for excelling in this art above all other nations, especially the ladies of Florence. Some prefer Roman and Venetian courtesans: their tongues are so pleasing and their speech so elegant that they could overcome a saint.[9439]

[9435] Burton. Printed page 483, dagger: "Pont. Baia. l. 1." Pontanus, Baiae, book 1.

[9436] Editor. Burton attributes these lines to Pontanus, Baiae, book 1. The precise poem remains unlocated. Nurus can mean young married women or daughters-in-law; "women" suits this catalogue of admirers. Venus represents erotic love, and Hymen marriage. Burton's own English version follows separately and broadens the named deities into gods and goddesses.

[9437] Editor. Contain means restrain oneself. The question closes the accumulating examples of opportunity and familiarity and supplies this block's stopping point. The following sentence turns specifically to voices and speech, leading onward to singing and music.

[9438] Burton. Printed page 483, n: "Descr. Brit." Paolo Giovio, Description of Britain.

[9439] Editor. Paolo Giovio is the Latin P. Jovius. Burton treats cultivated speech, wit and gesture as arts of attraction. Fascinating here retains the older sense of enchanting; the Sirens lure listeners through song. The precise Giovio passage remains to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9440]Pro facie multis vox sua lena fuit.	For many women, their voice has served as a procuress in place of beauty.[9441]
Tantâ gratiâ vocis famam conciliabat, saith Petronius in his fragment of pure impurities, I mean his Satyricon, tam dulcis sonus permulcebat aëra, ut putares inter auras cantare Syrenum concordiam; She sang so sweetly that she charmed the Ayr, and thou wouldst have thought thou hadst heard a consort of Syrens. [9442]O good God, when Lais speaks, how sweet it is! Philocolus exclaims in Aristænetus. To hear a fair young Gentlewoman play upon the Virginals, Lute, Vial, and sing to it, which as Gellius observes, lib. 1. cap. 11. are lascivientium delitiæ, the chief delights of Lovers, must needs be a great enticement. Parthenis was so taken.	"Such charm of voice won her renown," says Petronius in his fragment of pure impurities—I mean his Satyricon; "so sweet a sound caressed the air that you would have thought a choir of Sirens was singing on the breeze." She sang so sweetly that she enchanted the air, and you would have thought you were hearing a choir of Sirens. "Good God, how sweet it is when Lais speaks!" exclaims Philocolus in Aristaenetus. To hear a beautiful young gentlewoman play the virginals, lute or viol and sing to her own accompaniment—which, as Gellius observes in book 1, chapter 11, are "the delights of the wanton," lovers' chief pleasures—must be a great enticement. Parthenis was captivated in this way.[9443]
[9444]Mi vox ista avida haurit ab aure animam:	That voice draws my soul out through my eager ear.[9445]

[9440] Burton. Printed page 483, o: "Res est blanda canor, discant cantare puellæ pro facie &c. Ovid. 3. de art. amandi." "Song is alluring: let girls learn to sing; in place of beauty," etc. Ovid, Art of Love, book 3.

[9441] Editor. Ovid, Art of Love 3.315–316, checked in the Latin text. Lena means a female procurer or go-between: the voice wins lovers where facial beauty might not. Burton preserves the sexually pointed metaphor.

[9442] Burton. Printed page 483, dagger: "Epist. l. 1. Cum loquitur Lais, quantâ, O dii boni, vocis ejus dulcedo!" Letters, book 1: "When Lais speaks, good gods, how sweet her voice is!" The printed dagger stands earlier, after Petronius; this marginal text concerns the following Aristaenetus quotation.

[9443] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 127, describes Circe speaking, not singing; the received Latin differs from Burton's first clause. His "pure impurities" is a deliberate paradox. Virginals are a small keyboard instrument; a viol is a bowed string instrument. The Gellius and Aristaenetus references await detailed collation.

[9444] Burton. Printed page 483, dagger: "Aristænetus lib. 2. epist. 5. Quam suavè canit! verbum audax dixi, omnium quos vidi formosissimus, utinam amare me dignetur!" Aristaenetus 2.5: "How sweetly he sings! I have said something bold: the handsomest of all I have seen. If only he would deign to love me!"

[9445] Editor. The Latin makes the eager ear the channel through which the singer draws out the listener's soul. Burton's marginal Aristaenetus 2.5 citation also includes the Latin of the following exclamation; it is one continuous marginal note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
O sister Harpedona (she laments) I am undone, how sweetly he sings, Ile speak a bold word, he is the properest man that ever I saw in my life: O how sweetly he sings, I dye for his sake, O that he would love me again! If thou didst but hear her sing, saith [9446]Lucian, thou wouldst forget Father and mother, forsake all thy friends, and follow her. Helena is highly commended by [9447]Theocritus the Poet for her sweet voice and musick; none could play so well as she, and Daphnis in the same Edyllion,	"Oh, sister Harpedona," she laments, "I am undone! How sweetly he sings! I will say something bold: he is the handsomest man I have ever seen in my life. Oh, how sweetly he sings! I am dying for him. If only he would love me in return!" If you merely heard her sing, says Lucian, you would forget your father and mother, abandon all your friends and follow her. The poet Theocritus highly praises Helen's sweet voice and music: no one could play as well as she. And Daphnis, in the same idyll—[9448]
Quam tibi os dulce est, & vox amabilis ô Daphni, Jucundius est audire te canentem, quàm mel lingere!	How sweet your mouth is, Daphnis, how lovely your voice! To hear you singing is more delightful than licking honey.[9449]
Source page 484 How sweet a face hath Daphne, how lovely a voice? Hony it self is not so pleasant in my choice.	How sweet a face has Daphne, how lovely a voice! Even honey is less pleasant to my taste.

[9446] Burton. Printed page 483, p: "Imagines, si cantantem audieris, ita demulcebere, ut parentum & patriæ statim obliviscaris." Lucian, Portraits: "If you hear her singing, you will be so enchanted that you will at once forget your parents and homeland."

[9447] Burton. Printed page 483, q: "Edyl. 18. neque sane ulla sic Cytharam pulsare novit." Idyll 18: "Indeed no other woman knows how to play the lyre so well."

[9448] Editor. The singer's sex changes because Burton moves between different examples. Properest means most handsome. Lucian's marginal quotation says "parents and homeland," while Burton's English says "father and mother" and "all thy friends"; both readings are retained.

[9449] Editor. The praise of Helen is in Theocritus, Idyll 18; the praise addressed to Daphnis is in Idyll 8, not "the same" idyll. Both passages were checked in the collected Idylls. Burton's following English couplet prints Daphne and renders os, mouth, as face; the two versions remain separate.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A sweet voice and musick are powerful enticers. Those Samian singing wenches, Aristonica, Onanthe and Agathocleia, regiis diadematibus insultarunt, insulted over Kings themselves, as [9450]Plutarch contends.	A sweet voice and music are powerful enticements. Those Samian singing girls, Aristonica, Oenanthe and Agathoclea, "trampled on royal diadems"—lorded it over kings themselves, as Plutarch maintains.[9451]
Centum luminibus cinctum caput Argus habebat,	Argus had a head encircled by a hundred eyes.[9452]
Argus had an hundred eys, all so charmed by one silly pipe, that he lost his head. Clitiphon complains in [9453]Tatius of Leucippes sweet tunes, he heard her play by chance upon the Lute, and sing a pretty song to it in commendations of a Rose, out of old Anacreon belike;	Argus had a hundred eyes, all so enchanted by one simple pipe that he lost his head. In Tatius, Clitophon complains of Leucippe's sweet music. He happened to hear her playing the lute and singing a pretty song in praise of a rose—out of old Anacreon, perhaps.[9454]
Rosa honor decusque florum, Rosa flos odorque divum, Hominum rosa est voluptas, Decus illa Gratiarum, Florente amoris horâ, Rosa suavium Diones, &c.	The rose is the glory and ornament of flowers, The rose is the gods' flower and fragrance, The rose is the delight of humankind, The ornament of the Graces, In love's flowering season, The rose is Dione's kiss, and so on.[9455]

[9450] Burton. Printed page 484, dagger: "Amatorio Dialogo." Plutarch, Dialogue on Love.

[9451] Editor. Insulted over means lorded it over. Plutarch, Dialogue on Love 753d, names these three women among Samian flute-girls and dancers who dominated kings. The passage contrasts the risks of marrying a socially inferior woman with the proposed marriage to Ismenodora. The list and Samian designation are thus independently located; Burton's particular Latin version remains uncollated.

[9452] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.625. Argus is the many-eyed watchman lulled to sleep by Mercury's pipe and killed. Silly in the following sentence means simple or insignificant.

[9453] Burton. Printed page 484, r: "Puellam Cythara canentem vidimus." "We saw the girl singing to the lyre."

[9454] Editor. The speaker is Clitophon in Achilles Tatius's Leucippe and Clitophon. Burton's "belike" marks conjecture: perhaps the song is from Anacreon. The precise relationship of the Latin rose verses to the song in Tatius remains unresolved; they are not silently reassigned to another poet.

[9455] Editor. Dione is used here as a name of the love-goddess. Suavium literally means a kiss. The Latin and Burton's English adaptation differ in their order and details; both are translated independently.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Rose the fairest of all flowers, Rose delight of higher powers, Rose the joy of mortal men, Rose the pleasure of fine women, Rose the Graces ornament, Rose Diones sweet content.	Rose, the fairest of all flowers, Rose, delight of heavenly powers, Rose, the joy of mortal men, Rose, the pleasure of fine women, Rose, the Graces' ornament, Rose, Dione's sweet delight.
To this effect the lovely Virgin with a melodious air upon her golden wired Harp or Lute, I know not well whether, plaid and sang, and that transported him beyond himself, and that ravished his heart. It was Jasons discourse as much as his beauty, or any other of his good parts, which delighted Medea so much.	To this effect the lovely young woman played and sang a melodious air on her harp or lute with its golden strings—I am not quite sure which. It transported him beyond himself and ravished his heart. It was Jason's conversation as much as his beauty, or any other of his fine qualities, that so delighted Medea.
—— [9456]Delectabatur enim Animus simul formâ dulcibusque verbis.	For her heart delighted equally In his beauty and his sweet words.[9457]
It was Cleopatra's sweet voice, and pleasant speech which inveagled Anthony, above the rest of her enticements.	Above all her other attractions, it was Cleopatra's sweet voice and pleasant conversation that captivated Antony.[9458]
Verba ligant hominem, ut Taurorum cornua funes,	Words bind a man as ropes bind bulls' horns.
as Bulls horns are bound with ropes, so are mens hearts with pleasant words. Her words burn as fire, Eccles. 9. 10. Roxolana bewitched Solyman the magnificent; and Shores wife by this engine overcame Edward the fourth,	As bulls' horns are bound with ropes, so men's hearts are bound with pleasant words. "Her words burn like fire," Eccles. 9:10. Roxolana bewitched Suleiman the Magnificent, and Shore's wife overcame Edward IV by this means.[9459]

[9456] Burton. Printed page 484, s: "Apollonius. Argonaut. l. 3." Apollonius, Argonautica, book 3.

[9457] Editor. Burton gives a Latin rendering of Apollonius's Greek and identifies only Argonautica, book 3. The precise lines and intermediary translation have not been established.

[9458] Editor. Compare Plutarch, Antony 27.2–3, which stresses the charm of Cleopatra's conversation and the sweetness of her voice. Burton's next Latin maxim develops the familiar comparison between binding an animal physically and binding a person by speech; its precise source remains unlocated.

[9459] Editor. Eccles. here points to Ecclesiasticus, or Sirach. The parallel is 9:11 in the Douay–Rheims/Vulgate numbering, about a woman's conversation burning like fire; Burton's 9:10 is retained. Roxolana is Hürrem, Suleiman's consort; Shore's wife is Jane, or Elizabeth, Shore, Edward IV's mistress.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9460]Omnibus una omnes surripuit Veneres.	She alone stole all the charms from all the others.[9461]
The wife of Bath in Chaucer confesseth all this out of her experience.	Chaucer's Wife of Bath admits all this from her own experience.[9462]
Some folk desire us for riches, Some for shape, some for fairness, Some for that she can sing or dance, Some for gentleness, or for dalliance.	Some people desire us for wealth, Some for our figure, some for beauty, Some because a woman can sing or dance, Some for good breeding, or for flirtation.
[9463]Peter Aretines Lucretia telleth as much and more of her self, I counterfeited honesty, as if I had been virgo virginissima, more then a Vestal virgin, I looked like a wife, I was so demure and chaste, I did adde such gestures, tunes, speeches, signs and motions upon all occasions, that my spectators and auditors were stupified, enchanted, fastned all to their places, like so many stocks and stones.	Pietro Aretino's Lucretia says as much, and more, about herself: "I feigned virtue as though I were the most virginal of virgins, more than a Vestal virgin. I looked like a married woman, so demure and chaste. On every occasion I added such gestures, tones, speeches, signs and movements that those who saw and heard me were stupefied, enchanted, rooted to the spot like so many blocks of wood and stones."[9464]

[9460] Burton. Printed page 484, t: "Catullus."

[9461] Editor. Catullus 86.6: the poet praises Lesbia, who has appropriated all other women's charms. Burton applies the line to his examples of successful seduction.

[9462] Editor. Wife of Bath's Prologue, lines 257–260. Burton omits the opening "Thou seyst": Chaucer's Wife is reporting what a husband says, rather than simply confessing her own view. Gentillesse includes noble birth or good breeding; dalliance includes flirtatious talk.

[9463] Burton. Printed page 484, dagger: "Pornodidascalo dial. Ital. Lat. interp. Jasper. Barthio. Germ. Fingebam honestatem plusquam virginis Vestalis, intuebar oculis uxoris, addebam gestus &c." Pornodidascalus, an Italian dialogue translated into Latin by the German Jasper Barth: "I feigned virtue greater than a Vestal virgin's, looked with a wife's eyes, added gestures," etc.

[9464] Editor. Pornodidascalus is the Latin title named in Burton's marginal citation, which attributes the Italian work to Aretino and gives its translator as Jasper Barth. The attribution and precise passage need bibliographical collation. The Vestals were Roman priestesses bound to chastity; the speaker adopts their appearance of virtue.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 484–485 Many silly Gentlewomen are fetched over in like sort, by a company of guls and swaggering companions, that frequently bely noblemens favours, riming Coribantiasmi, Thrasonëan Rhadamantes or Bombomachides, that have nothing in them but a few players ends and complements, vain braggadocians, impudent intruders, that can discourse at table of Knights and Lords combats, like [9465]Lucians Leontiscus, of other mens travels, brave adventures, and such common trivial news, ride, dance, sing old ballet tunes, and wear their clothes in fashion, with a good grace; a fine sweet gentleman, a proper man, who could not love him! She will have him though all her friends say no, though she beg with him.	Many foolish gentlewomen are similarly taken in by a set of gulls and swaggering fellows who constantly boast falsely of noblemen's favour: rhyming Corybantic madmen, Thraso-like Rhadamants or Bombomachideses, with nothing in them but a few scraps from plays and polite phrases; empty braggarts and impudent intruders who can talk at table about the combats of knights and lords, like Lucian's Leontiscus, about other people's travels, daring adventures and such commonplace, trivial news; who can ride, dance, sing old ballad tunes and wear fashionable clothes with a good air. What a fine, delightful gentleman, what a handsome man—who could fail to love him! She will have him even if all her friends object, even if she must beg with him.[9466]

[9465] Burton. Printed page 485, dagger: "Tom. 4. dial. merit." Volume 4, Dialogues of Courtesans.

[9466] Editor. Fetched over means deceived; players' ends are scraps of theatrical dialogue. Coribantiasmi evokes Corybantic frenzy, Thrasonëan the boastful soldier Thraso. Rhadamantes and Bombomachides are retained as Burton's mock-heroic names. Compare Lucian, Dialogues of Courtesans 13, where Leontichus boasts of military exploits; Burton prints Leontiscus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 485 Some again are incensed by reading amorous toys, Amadis de Gaul, Palmerin de Oliva, the Knight of the sun, &c. or hearing such tales of [9467]lovers, descriptions of their persons, lascivious discourses, such as Astyanassa, Helena's waiting woman, by the report of Suidas, writ of old, de variis concubitus modis, and after her Philenis and Elephantine; or those light tracts of [9468]Aristides Milesius (mentioned by Plutarch) and found by the Persians, in Crassus army amongst the spoiles, Aretines Dialogues, with ditties, Love songs, &c. must needs set them on fire, with such like pictures, as those of Aretine, or wanton objects in what kind soever; no stronger engine then to hear or read of love toyes, fables and discourses ([9469]one saith) and many by this means are quite mad.	Others are inflamed by reading amorous trifles—Amadis of Gaul, Palmerin of Oliva, The Knight of the Sun, and so on—or by hearing such tales of lovers, descriptions of their persons and lascivious accounts, such as Astyanassa, Helen's waiting woman, wrote long ago, according to the Suda, "on the various ways of sexual intercourse," followed by Philenis and Elephantine. Or those frivolous tales of Aristides of Miletus, mentioned by Plutarch and found by the Persians among the spoils of Crassus's army, Aretino's Dialogues, ditties, love songs and the like must set them on fire, together with such pictures as Aretino's, or provocative sights of any kind. "There is no stronger device than hearing or reading amorous trifles, fables and stories," says one writer, "and many are driven quite mad in this way."[9470]

[9467] Burton. Printed page 485, u: "Amatorius sermo vehemens vehementis cupiditatis incitatio est, Tatius l. 1." "An impassioned discourse of love is a stimulus to intense desire." Tatius, book 1.

[9468] Burton. Printed page 485, dagger: "De luxuria & delitiis compositi." "Written about debauchery and pleasures."

[9469] Burton. Printed page 485, x: "Æneas Sylvius. Nulla machina validior quam lectio lascivæ historiæ; sæpe etiam hujusmodi fabulis ad furorem incenduntur." Aeneas Silvius: "No device is stronger than reading a lascivious story; often such tales inflame people to madness."

[9470] Editor. Incensed means inflamed. The first three titles are chivalric romances; Burton then turns to explicitly sexual writings and pictures. Suidas is the traditional name attached to the Byzantine lexicon now called the Suda. The reports about ancient erotic authors, Aretino's pictures and the Aeneas Silvius quotation remain for detailed source collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
At Abdera in Thrace (Andromeda one of Euripides Tragedies being played) the spectators were so much moved with the object, and those pathetical love speeches of Perseus, amongst the rest, O Cupid, Prince of Gods and men, &c. that every man almost a good while after spake pure Iambicks, and raved still on Perseus speech O Cupid, Prince of Gods and men. As Car-men, Boyes and Prentises, when a new song is published with us, go singing that new tune still in the streets; they continually acted that Tragical part of Perseus, and in every mans mouth was O Cupid, in every street, O Cupid, in every house almost, O Cupid, Prince of Gods and men, pronouncing still like stage-players, O Cupid; they were so possessed all with that rapture, and thought of that pathetical love speech, they could not a long time after forget, or drive it out of their minds, but O Cupid, Prince of Gods and men, was ever in their mouths. This belike made Aristotle Polit. lib. 7. cap. 18. forbid yong men to see Comedies, or to hear amorous tales.	At Abdera in Thrace, when Euripides' tragedy Andromeda was performed, the spectators were so moved by the spectacle and Perseus's impassioned speeches of love—especially "O Cupid, prince of gods and men"—that for a good while afterwards almost everyone spoke in pure iambics, continually raving over Perseus's speech, "O Cupid, prince of gods and men." Just as carters, boys and apprentices here keep singing a new tune in the streets when a song is published, they continually acted Perseus's tragic part. In every mouth it was "O Cupid"; in every street, "O Cupid"; in almost every house, "O Cupid, prince of gods and men," always declaiming like actors, "O Cupid." They were all so possessed by this rapture and the thought of that impassioned love speech that for a long time they could neither forget it nor drive it from their minds: "O Cupid, prince of gods and men" was always on their lips. Perhaps this made Aristotle, in Politics, book 7, chapter 18, forbid young men to see comedies or hear amorous tales.[9471]
[9472]Hæc igitur Juvenes nequam facilesque puellæ Inspiciant ——	Let dissolute young men and yielding girls Look upon these things, then—[9473]

[9471] Editor. Compare Lucian, How to Write History 1: the Abderites suffer fever after a performance in summer heat, then obsessively declaim Andromeda. Burton foregrounds the love speeches and omits the fever's course. Pathetical means moving or impassioned; car-men are carters. Aristotle's chapter number is retained pending collation.

[9472] Burton. Printed page 485, asterisk: "Martial. l. 4." Martial, book 4; compare the editorial note on the quotation.

[9473] Editor. Compare Martial 3.69.5–6, not the printed book 4. Burton rearranges the first line and substitutes Inspiciant, "let them look," for the source's continuation. Nequam means dissolute, not "not": the Latin invites sexually experienced readers, whereas Burton's following English forbids young people. The disagreement is preserved rather than corrected in translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
let not yong folks meddle at all with such matters. And this made the Romanes as [9474]Vitruvius relates, put Venus temple in the Suburbs, extra murum, ne adolescentes venereis insuescant, to avoid all occasions and objects. For what will not such an object do? Ismenius as he walked in Sosthenes garden, being now in love, when he saw so many [9475]lascivious pictures, Thetis marriage, and I know not what, was almost beside himself. And to say truth with a lascivious object who is not moved, to see others dally, kiss, dance? And much more when he shall come to be an Actor himself.	Let young people have nothing whatever to do with such matters. And this made the Romans, as Vitruvius relates, put Venus's temple in the suburbs, "outside the wall, so that young people should not grow accustomed to sexual pleasures," avoiding every occasion and provoking sight. For what will such a sight not do? Ismenius, walking in Sosthenes's garden when he was already in love, was almost beside himself at the sight of so many lascivious pictures —the marriage of Thetis, and I know not what else. In truth, who is unmoved by a lascivious sight, by seeing others dally, kiss or dance? And much more so when he becomes an actor himself.[9476]
Source page 485–486 To kiss and to be kissed, which amongst other lascivious provocations, is as a burden in a song, and a most forcible battery, as infectious, [9477]Xenophon thinks, as the poyson of a spider, a great allurement, a fire it self, proœmium aut anticœnium, the prologue of burning lust (as Apuleius adds) lust it self,	To kiss and be kissed is, among other lascivious provocations, like the refrain of a song, a most powerful assault, as infectious, Xenophon thinks, as a spider's venom: a great enticement, a fire in itself, "a prelude or appetizer," the prologue to burning lust—or, as Apuleius adds, lust itself.[9478]

[9474] Burton. Printed page 485, dagger: "Lib. 1. c. 7." Vitruvius, book 1, chapter 7.

[9475] Burton. Printed page 485, y: "Eustathius l. 1. Picturæ parant animum ad Venerem, &c. Horatius ad res venereas intemperantior traditur; nam cubiculo suo sic specula dicitur habuisse disposita, ut quocunque respexisset imaginem coitus referrent. Suetonius vit. ejus." Eustathius, book 1: "Pictures prepare the mind for love," etc. "Horace is said to have been immoderate in sexual matters: he is said to have arranged mirrors in his bedroom so that wherever he looked they reflected an image of intercourse." Suetonius, his Life.

[9476] Editor. Vitruvius 1.7.1 gives the placement of Venus's temple near the gate and cites Etruscan religious rules for keeping it from exciting the passions of matrons and youths. Burton generalizes this into Roman practice. Objects here are sights that provoke desire. Eustathius is the name under which the romance of Ismenius and Ismene was known to Burton.

[9477] Burton. Printed page 485, dagger: "Osculum ut Phalangium inficit." "A kiss infects like a venomous spider."

[9478] Editor. Burden means refrain; battery means a sustained assault. Proœmium is a prelude; anticœnium an appetizer before dinner. These metaphors make kissing a recurring stimulus and preparation for further desire. Xenophon's spider comparison and the Apuleius wording remain for exact collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 486 [9479]Venus quintâ parte sui nectaris imbuit.	Venus has steeped it in a fifth part of her nectar.[9480]
A strong assault, that conquers Captains, and those all commanding forces, ([9481]Domasque ferro sed domaris osculo.) [9482]Aretines Lucretia, when she would in kindnesse overcome a suiter of hers, and have her desire of him, took him about the neck, and kissed him again and again, and to that, which she could not otherwise effect, she made him so speedily and willingly condescend. And 'tis a continual assault, —— [9483]hoc non deficit incipitque semper, always fresh, and ready to [9484]begin as at first, basium nullo fine terminatur, sed semper recens est, and hath a fiery touch with it.	A powerful assault, conquering captains and the forces that command all others: "You subdue with the sword, but are subdued by a kiss." When Aretino's Lucretia wished to overcome a suitor by affection and obtain what she wanted from him, she put her arms around his neck and kissed him again and again. What she could not otherwise achieve, she thus made him grant promptly and willingly. And it is a continual assault: "it does not fail, but is always beginning," always fresh and ready to begin as at first; "a kiss reaches no final ending, but is always new," and it has a fiery touch.[9485]
—— [9486]Tenta modo tangere corpus, Jam tua mellifluo membra calore fluent.	Only try to touch the body: At once your limbs will melt with honeyed heat.[9487]

[9479] Burton. Printed page 486, z: "Hor." Horace.

[9480] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.13.15–16, checked in Latin. The original refers to sweet kisses which Venus has imbued with her nectar. The "fifth part" is retained without imposing a speculative explanation.

[9481] Burton. Printed page 486, a: "Heinsius."

[9482] Burton. Printed page 486, dagger: "Applico me illi proximùs & spissè deosculata sagum peto." "I press close to him and, after kissing him repeatedly, ask for a cloak." Proximùs is retained as printed.

[9483] Burton. Printed page 486, b: "Petronius catalect." Petronius, collected pieces or fragments.

[9484] Burton. Printed page 486, c: "Catullus ad Lesbiam: da mihi basia mille, deinde centum, &c." Catullus, To Lesbia: "Give me a thousand kisses, then a hundred," etc.

[9485] Editor. Heinsius is Daniel Heinsius; his poem remains unlocated. Catalecta denotes collected pieces or fragments. The Petronian poem beginning Foeda est in coitu ends with Burton's hoc non deficit incipitque semper: continued kissing is contrasted with the brief pleasure of intercourse. Its exact edition and attribution history remain uncollated. The Catullus margin quotes 5.7–8; the adjoining prose about a kiss never ending is not a verified Catullan line.

[9486] Burton. Printed page 486, d: "Petronius."

[9487] Editor. Attributed to Petronius by Burton; the precise poem has not been established. Fluent literally suggests flowing or melting: the body seems to dissolve under pleasurable heat.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Especially when they shall be lasciviously given, as he feelingly said, [9488]& me pressulum deosculata Fotis, Catenatis lacertis, [9489]Obtorto valgiter labello. [9490]Valgiis suaviis,	Especially when the kisses are given lasciviously, as he said from experience: “and Fotis kissed me close, with her arms intertwined”; “with her lip twisted awry”; “with open-mouthed kisses”—[9491]

[9488] Burton. Printed page 486, e: “Apuleius l. 10 & Catalect.” Apuleius, book 10, and collected pieces.

[9489] Burton. Printed page 486, dagger: “Petronius.”

[9490] Burton. Printed page 486, asterisk: “Apuleius.”

[9491] Editor. Burton assembles short phrases under Apuleius and Petronius rather than quoting a single continuous scene. Pressulum suggests closeness; valgus and related forms suggest a mouth turned or opened askew. The exact readings, locations and relationship to the following poem require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Dum semiulco suavio Meam puellam suavior, Anima tunc ægra & saucia Concurrit ad labia mihi.	While I kiss my girl With half-parted lips, My soul, sick and wounded, Rushes up to my lips.[9492]
The soul and all is moved; [9493]Jam pluribus osculis labra crepitabant, animarum quoque mixturam facientes, inter mutuos complexus animas anhelantes:	The soul itself is moved: "Now their lips were sounding with many kisses, mingling their souls too, breathing them out in their mutual embraces."[9494]
[9495]Hæsimus calentes, Et transfudimus hinc & hinc labellis Errantes animas, valete curæ.	We clung together, burning, And poured through our lips, to and fro, Our wandering souls. Farewell, cares.[9496]

[9492] Editor. Compare Macrobius, Saturnalia 2.2.17, where a longer Latin version of a Greek epigram attributed to Plato begins with a kiss given to "my boy," meum puellum. Burton has "my girl," meam puellam, and compresses the poem. His wording is preserved; the nearby Apuleius citation does not settle the poem's authorship.

[9493] Burton. Printed page 486, f: "Petronius Proselios ad Circen." "Petronius, Proselios to Circe." The name and attribution are retained without silently repairing them.

[9494] Editor. Compare the fragment printed at Satyricon 132 in the consulted Latin text, where kisses, intertwined hands and bodies mingle souls. Burton's wording and the marginal "Proselios to Circe" are not identical to that text; the attribution is left visible for later collation.

[9495] Burton. Printed page 486, g: "Petronius."

[9496] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 79: part of a poem recalling a night together. Burton excerpts the middle and ends with farewell to cares. The image of souls passing through kisses connects it with the preceding poem.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They breath out their souls and spirits together with their kisses, saith [9497]Balthazar Castilio, change hearts and spirits, and mingle affections as they do kisses, and it is rather a connexion of the mind then of the body. And although these kisses be delightsome and pleasant, Ambrosian kisses, [9498]Suaviolum dulci dulcius Ambrosiâ, such as [9499]Ganymedes gave Jupiter, Nectare suavius, sweeter then [9500]Nectar, Balsome, hony, [9501]Oscula merum amorem stillantia, Love dropping kisses; for	They breathe out their souls and spirits along with their kisses, says Baldassare Castiglione, exchange hearts and spirits and mingle affections as they do kisses: it is a union of mind more than of body. Although these kisses are delightful and pleasant—ambrosial kisses, “a little kiss sweeter than sweet ambrosia,” such as Ganymede gave Jupiter, “sweeter than nectar,” sweeter than nectar, balsam or honey, “kisses dripping pure love,” love-dropping kisses; for[9502]
The Gilliflower, the Rose is not so sweet, As sugred kisses be when Lovers meet:	Neither gillyflower nor rose is as sweet As sugared kisses when lovers meet.[9503]
Yet they leave an irksome impression, like that of aloes or gall,	Yet they leave a bitter aftertaste, like aloes or gall —

[9497] Burton. Printed page 486, h: “Animus conjungitur, & spiritus etiam noster per osculum effluit; alternatim se in utriusq; corpus infundentes commiscent; Animæ potius quam corporis connectio.” “The mind is joined, and our spirit too flows out through a kiss; pouring themselves by turns into each other’s body, they mingle: a union of soul rather than body.”

[9498] Burton. Printed page 486, dagger: “Catullus.”

[9499] Burton. Printed page 486, i: “Lucian. Tom. 4.” Lucian, volume 4.

[9500] Burton. Printed page 486, asterisk: “Non dat basia, dat Næa nectar, dat rores animæ suaveolentes, dat nardum, Thymumq; Cinnamumq; & mel, &c. Secundus bas. 4.” “Nea gives not kisses but nectar, gives sweet-scented dews of the soul, gives nard, thyme, cinnamon and honey,” etc. Johannes Secundus, Kisses 4.

[9501] Burton. Printed page 486, k: “Eustathius lib. 4.” Eustathius, book 4.

[9502] Editor. Castilio is Castiglione. Spirits are the subtle vital breaths imagined to pass between lovers; ambrosia and nectar are the gods’ food and drink. Catullus 99.2 supplies the little kiss. Secundus, Basia 4.1–4, supplies nectar, fragrant soul-dew, spices and honey; the poem ends by refusing divine life without the beloved. This locates Burton’s quotation, not his edition. The Castiglione, Lucian and Eustathius passages remain for exact collation.

[9503] Editor. Gilliflower is an older name used for fragrant garden flowers, especially pinks or carnations. The unattributed English couplet is retained as a separate verse unit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9504]Ut mi ex Ambrosiâ mutatum jam foret illud Suaviolum, tristi tristius Helleboro.	So that for me that little kiss had changed from ambrosia To something bitterer than bitter hellebore.[9505]
At first Ambrose it self was not sweeter, At last black Hellebor was not so bitter.	At first ambrosia itself was no sweeter; At last black hellebore was not so bitter.
They are deceitful kisses,	They are deceitful kisses—
[9506]Quid me mollibus implicas lacertis? Quid fallacibus osculis inescas? &c.	Why do you entwine me in your soft arms? Why lure me with deceitful kisses? And so on.[9507]
Why dost within thine arms me lap, And with false kisses me intrap?	Why enfold me in your arms And trap me with false kisses?
They are destructive, and the more the worse:	They are destructive, and the more of them, the worse—
[9508]Et quæ me perdunt, oscula mille dabat,	And she gave a thousand kisses that undo me.[9509]

[9504] Burton. Printed page 486, dagger: “Catullus.”

[9505] Editor. Catullus 99.13–14, contrasting an initially ambrosial stolen kiss with the bitter response it provokes. Aloes, gall and hellebore supply images of bitterness. Burton’s English follows separately; this is a literary comparison, not a medical prescription.

[9506] Burton. Printed page 486, asterisk: “Buchanan.”

[9507] Editor. Burton attributes these lines to George Buchanan without specifying a poem. Inescare means to bait or entice into a trap; his following English couplet emphasizes the same image. Exact location unresolved.

[9508] Burton. Printed page 486, l: “Ovid. art. am. Eleg. 18.” Ovid, “Art of Love, Elegy 18”; the line is from Amores 2.18.10.

[9509] Editor. Ovid, Amores 2.18.10, not the Art of Love as the margin implies. The consulted text has dedit, “gave”; Burton prints dabat, “was giving.” The next Ovid line quoted below, Implicuitque, immediately precedes it in the source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 486–487 They are the bane of these miserable Lovers. There be honest kisses, I deny not, osculum charitatis, friendly kisses, modest kisses, Vestall-virgin kisses, officious and ceremonial kisses, &c. Osculi sensus, brachiorum amplexus, kissing and embracing are proper gifts of nature to a man: but these are too lascivious kisses,	They are the ruin of these miserable lovers. There are virtuous kisses, I do not deny it: “the kiss of charity,” friendly kisses, modest kisses, Vestal-virgin kisses, courteous and ceremonial kisses, and so on. “The touch of a kiss, the embrace of arms”: kissing and embracing are nature’s particular gifts to humankind. But these kisses are too lascivious—[9510]
Source page 487 [9511]Implicuitque suos circum mea colla lacertos, &c.	And she wound her arms around my neck, and so on.[9512]

[9510] Editor. The kiss of charity is a Christian greeting of fellowship; officious here means dutiful or courteous, not meddlesome. Burton distinguishes socially or religiously proper kisses from the erotic acts under discussion.

[9511] Burton. Printed page 487, m: “Ovid.” Ovid.

[9512] Editor. Ovid, Amores 2.18.9. Burton has separated the two consecutive lines and quoted them in reverse order. They describe the poet’s mistress distracting him from martial poetry.

Original text 1651	Modern English
too continuate, and too violent, [9513]Brachia non hederæ, non vincunt oscula conchæ; they cling like Ivy, close as an Oyster, bill as Doves, meretricious kisses, biting of lips, cum additamentis: Tam impresso ore (saith [9514]Lucian) ut vix labia detrahant, inter deosculandum mordicantes, tum & os aperientes quoque & mammas attrectantes, &c. such kisses as she gave to Gyton, innumera oscula dedit non repugnanti puero, cervicem invadens, innumerable kisses, &c. More then kisses, or too homely kisses: as those that [9515]he spake of, Accepturus ab ipsa Venere 7. suavia, &c. with such other obscenities that vain lovers use, which are abominable and pernicious.	Too prolonged and too violent: "Ivy cannot outdo their arms, nor shellfish their kisses." They cling like ivy, shut close as an oyster, bill like doves: prostitutes' kisses, with lip-biting and "additions." "With mouths pressed so close," says Lucian, "that they can hardly draw their lips apart, nibbling as they kiss, opening their mouths too and touching breasts," and so on; such kisses as she gave Giton: "seizing him by the neck, she gave innumerable kisses to the unresisting boy"—innumerable kisses, and so on. More than kisses, or kisses too familiar, like those he mentioned: "to receive seven kisses from Venus herself," and so on, with the other obscenities foolish lovers practise, which are abominable and pernicious.[9516]

[9513] Burton. Printed page 487, n: "Cum capita liment solitis morsiunculis, & cum mamillarum pressiunculis. Lip. od. ant. lec. lib. 3." "When they caress heads with the customary little bites and with little squeezes of breasts." Lipsius, Ancient Readings, book 3. Printed "od." is retained; the abbreviation and the reading liment require collation.

[9514] Burton. Printed page 487, dagger: "Tom. 4. dial. meretr." Volume 4, Dialogues of Courtesans.

[9515] Burton. Printed page 487, o: "Apuleius Miles. 6. Et unum blandientis linguæ admulsum longè mellitum: & post lib. 11. Arctius eam complexus cœpi suaviari jamque pariter patentis oris inhalitu cinnameo & occursantis linguæ illisu nectareo, &c." Apuleius, Milesian Tales 6: "And one far sweeter, caressing stroke of the tongue"; and later, book 11: "Embracing her more closely, I began to kiss her, and now with both the cinnamon-scented breath of her open mouth and the nectarean meeting of her tongue," etc. The body's letter beside "he spake" resembles p; this is the corresponding marginal text.

[9516] Editor. Continuate means prolonged or repeated without interruption; homely here means excessively familiar. The margin combines citations under Apuleius, including the reward of kisses for finding Psyche in Metamorphoses 6.8. The printed later reference to book 11, the Lipsius reading and the Lucian and Giton wording remain for detailed collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If as Peter de Ledesmo cas. conf. holds, every kiss a man gives his wife after marriage, be mortale peccatum, a mortal sin, or that of [9517]Hierome, Adulter est quisquis in uxorem suam ardentior est amator, or that of Thomas Secund. Secund. quæst. 154. artic. 4. contactus & osculum sit mortale peccatum, or that of Durand. Rational. lib. 1. cap. 10. abstinere debent Conjuges a complexu, toto tempore quo solemnitas nuptiarum interdicitur, what shall become of all such [9518]immodest kisses and obscene actions, the fore-runners of brutish lust, if not lust it self! What shall become of them, that often abuse their own Wives? But what have I to do with this?	If, as Pedro de Ledesma maintains in his Cases of Conscience, every kiss a man gives his wife after marriage is "a mortal sin"; or if Jerome's saying holds, "Whoever is too ardent a lover of his own wife is an adulterer"; or Thomas's, in the Second Part of the Second Part, question 154, article 4, that "touching and kissing are a mortal sin"; or Durandus's, in Rationale, book 1, chapter 10, that "spouses ought to abstain from embracing throughout the period when solemn weddings are forbidden"—what will become of all such immodest kisses and obscene acts, the forerunners of brutish lust, if not lust itself? What will become of those who frequently misuse their own wives? But what have I to do with this?[9519]
That which I aim at, is to shew you the progress of this burning lust: to epitomize therefore all this which I have hitherto said, with a familiar example out of that elegant Musæus; observe but with me those amorous proceedings of Leander and Hero: They began first to look one on the other with a lascivious look,	My aim is to show you the progress of this burning lust. To sum up everything I have said so far with a familiar example from the elegant Musaeus, observe with me the amorous advances of Leander and Hero. They began by looking at one another with lustful eyes—[9520]

[9517] Burton. Printed page 487, asterisk: "Lib. 1. advers. Jovin. cap. 30." Against Jovinian, book 1, chapter 30; compare the editorial note.

[9518] Burton. Printed page 487, q: "Oscula qui sumpsit, si non & cætera sumpsit, &c." "He who has taken kisses, if he has not taken the rest," etc.

[9519] Editor. Burton's compressed theological claims need qualification. Aquinas, Summa theologiae II–II, 154.4, explicitly says kisses and touches are not mortal sins in themselves; their intention matters. Jerome, Against Jovinian 1.49 in the consulted edition, quotes the saying about the over-ardent husband from Xystus. Burton prints chapter 30. His sweeping Ledesma claim and Durandus citation remain unverified; they should not be taken as established statements of those authors' positions.

[9520] Editor. Musaeus's Hero and Leander supplies an illustrative courtship. Burton excerpts a Latin rendering of the Greek and then gives his own English verse summary. The two prose Inde markers mean "then" and articulate successive stages; they are retained within the lineated quotation. The particular Latin edition has not been identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Obliquè intuens inde nutibus, —— Nutibus mutuis inducens in errorem mentem puellæ. Et illa è contra nutibus mutuis juvenis Leandri quod amorem non renuit, &c. Inde Adibat in tenebris tacitè quidem stringens Roseos puellæ digitos, ex imo suspirabat Vehementer —— Inde Virginis autem benè olens collum osculatus. Tale verbum ait amoris ictus stimulo, Preces audi & amoris miserere mei, &c. Sic fatus recusantis persuasit mentem puellæ.	Looking sideways, then with nods— With answering nods leading the girl's mind astray. And she in return showed with answering nods That she did not reject young Leander's love, and so on. Then— He approached in the darkness, silently pressing The girl's rosy fingers, and from his depths Sighed mightily—then— Kissing the young woman's sweet-scented neck, Struck by love's spur, he spoke these words: "Hear my prayers and pity my love," and so on. Speaking thus, he persuaded the reluctant girl's mind.
Source page 487–488 With becks and nods he first began, To try the wenches mind, With becks and nods and smiles again An answer he did find. And in the dark he took her by the hand, And wrung it hard, and sighed grievously, And kiss'd her too, & woo'd her as he might, With Pitty me sweet heart or else I die, And with such words and gestures as there past, He won his Mistres favour at the last.	With gestures and nods he first began To test the young woman's feelings; With gestures and nods and smiles in return He found himself an answer. And in the dark he took her hand, Squeezed it hard, and sighed deeply, Kissed her too, and courted her as best he could, With "Pity me, sweetheart, or else I die." And with the words and gestures that passed between them, He won his mistress's favour at last.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 488 The same proceedings is elegantly described by Apollonius in his Argonauticks, betwixt Jason and Medea, by Eustathius in the ten books of the loves of Ismenius and Ismene, Achilles Tatius betwixt his Clitophon and Leucippe, Chaucers neat poeme, of Troilus and Cresseide; and in that notable tale in Petronius of a Souldier and a Gentlewoman of Ephesus, that was so famous all over Asia for her chastity, and that mourned for her husband: the Souldier wooed her with such Rhetorick as Lovers use to do, —— placitone etiam pugnabis amori? &c. at last, frangi pertinaciam passa est, he got her good will, not only to satisfie his lust, [9521]but to hang her dead husbands body on the cross (which he watched in stead of the theeves) that was newly stoln away, whilest he woo'd her in her Cabin. These are tales you will say, but they have most significant Morals, and do well express those ordinary proceedings of doting Lovers.	The same advances are elegantly described by Apollonius in his Argonautica, between Jason and Medea; by Eustathius in the ten books of the loves of Ismenius and Ismene; by Achilles Tatius between his Clitophon and Leucippe; in Chaucer's fine poem Troilus and Criseyde; and in Petronius's notable tale of a soldier and a gentlewoman of Ephesus, famous throughout Asia for her chastity, who was mourning her husband. The soldier courted her with lovers' customary rhetoric: "Will you resist even a love that pleases you?" and so on. At last "she allowed her obstinacy to be broken": he gained her consent not only to satisfy his lust but to hang her dead husband's body on the cross in place of the thief's body he had been guarding, which had just been stolen while he courted her in her chamber. These are stories, you will say; but they have deeply significant morals, and well express the ordinary conduct of infatuated lovers.[9522]
Many such allurements there are, Nods, Jests, Winks, Smiles, Wrastlings, Tokens, Favours, Symbols, Letters, Valentines, &c. For which cause belike, Godfridus lib. 2. de amor. would not have women learn to write. Many such provocations are used when they come in presence, [9523]they will and will not.	There are many such enticements: nods, jokes, winks, smiles, wrestling, tokens, favours, signs, letters, valentines, and so on. Perhaps for this reason Godfridus, in book 2 of On Love, would not have women taught to write. Many such provocations are used when they meet face to face: they are willing and unwilling.[9524]

[9521] Burton. Printed page 488, r: "Corpus placuit mariti sui tolli ex arca, atq; illi quæ vacabat cruci adfigi." "She agreed that her husband's body should be taken from its coffin and fastened to the cross that stood empty."

[9522] Editor. Compare Petronius, Satyricon 111–112: the widow's maid quotes Aeneid 4.38, and breaking her obstinacy first concerns eating after fasting. Burton folds the verse into the soldier's wooing. The "Cabin" is her husband's tomb; his corpse replaces the stolen crucified body. Eustathius's romance appears as eleven books in Marcovich's 2001 edition, De Hysmines et Hysminiae amoribus libri XI. Burton's ten is retained; the edition behind his count remains unidentified.

[9523] Burton. Printed page 488, dagger: "Novi ingenium mulierum, nolunt ubi velis, ubi nolis cupiunt ultrò. Ter. Eunuc. act. 4. sc. 7." "I know women's nature: they are unwilling when you wish it, and when you do not, they desire it of their own accord." Terence, Eunuch, act 4, scene 7.

[9524] Editor. Favours and tokens are objects given as signs of affection; valentines may be chosen partners as well as messages. Burton's Godfridus and the work abbreviated de amor. remain to be identified. The margin quotes Terence, Eunuch 812–813: a character's generalization about women, which Burton adopts as a courtship commonplace.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Malo me Galatea petit lasciva puella, Et fugit ad salices, & se cupit ante videri.	Playful Galatea pelts me with an apple, Then runs to the willows, hoping to be seen before she hides.[9525]
My Mistress with an apple wooes me, And hastily to covert goes To hide her self, but would be seen With all her heart before God knows.	My mistress woos me with an apple, Then hurries into cover To hide herself; but first, God knows, She longs with all her heart to be seen.
Hero so tripped away from Leander as one displeased,	So Hero tripped away from Leander as though displeased:
[9526]Yet as she went full often lookt behind, And many poor excuses did she find To linger by the way, ——	Yet as she went she often looked behind, And found many flimsy excuses To linger on the way.[9527]
but if he chance to overtake her, she is most averse, nice and coy,	But if he happens to catch up with her, she is all resistance, reserve and coyness:
Denegat & pugnat, sed vult super omnia vinci.	She refuses and fights, but above all desires to be conquered.[9528]
She seems not won, but won she is at length, In such wars women use but half their strength.	She seems unconquered, but is won at last; In wars like these, women use only half their strength.[9529]

[9525] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 3.64–65. The girl throws an apple and retreats to the willows, wanting her suitor to notice her. Burton's following English quatrain is a separate adaptation, not a literal rendering, and is preserved independently.

[9526] Burton. Printed page 488, a: "Marlo." Christopher Marlowe.

[9527] Editor. Christopher Marlowe, Hero and Leander, Second Sestiad, opening passage. Burton extracts part of Hero's retreat and ends the quotation before Marlowe's account of her stopping and almost turning back.

[9528] Editor. The Latin presents the literary convention that a woman's resistance conceals a wish to yield; its exact source remains untraced. It is a claim made within this account of courtship, not evidence that refusal signifies consent. Nice here means fastidious or reserved.

[9529] Editor. Marlowe, Hero and Leander, Second Sestiad 285–286. Burton changes the first line from Seeming not won, yet won she was at length to his present-tense wording. The verse extends the preceding metaphor of courtship as warfare.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sometimes they lye open and are most tractable and coming, apt, yielding and willing to embrace, to take a green gown, with that Shepardess in Theocritus, Edyl. 27. to let their Coats, &c. to play and dally, at such seasons, and to some, as they spy their advantage; and then coy, close again, so nice, so surly, so demure, you had much better tame a colt, catch or ride a wild horse, then get her favour, or win her love, not a look, not a smile, not a kiss for a kingdome.	Sometimes they are open and most accommodating and forward, ready, yielding and willing to embrace, to get a green gown with that shepherdess in Theocritus, Idyll 27, to let their skirts, and so on; to play and dally at such times, and with such men, as they see an advantage. Then they become coy and reserved again, so particular, so unapproachable, so demure that you would have an easier time taming a colt, catching or riding a wild horse, than gaining her favour or winning her love: not a look, not a smile, not a kiss for a kingdom.[9530]

[9530] Editor. To take a green gown is an erotic expression for tumbling on the grass. Coats are skirts or petticoats; Burton leaves the phrase to let their Coats unfinished with &c., and its implied action is not expanded here. Idyll 27, The Wooing of Daphnis, dramatizes a shepherd's persuasion of a maiden. Coming means forward or receptive, close means reserved, and nice means difficult to please.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9531]Aretines Lucretia was an excellent Artisan in this kind, as she tels her own tale, Though I was by nature and art most beautiful and fair, yet by these tricks I seem'd to be far more amiable then I was. For that which men earnestly seek and cannot attain, draws on their affection with a most furious desire.	Aretino's Lucretia was a consummate practitioner of this art, as she tells her own story: "Though nature and art had made me very beautiful, these tricks made me seem far more attractive than I was. For what men eagerly seek and cannot attain draws their affection onward with the most furious desire."[9532]
Source page 488–489 I had a sutor lov'd me dearly (saith she) and the [9533]more he gave me, the more eagerly he woed me, the more I seem'd to neglect, to scorn him, and which I commonly gave others, I would not let him see me, converse with me, no not have a kiss.	"I had a suitor who loved me dearly," she says, "and the more he gave me and the more eagerly he courted me, the more I seemed to neglect and scorn him. I would not grant him what I commonly allowed others: to see me, talk to me, or even have a kiss."[9534]

[9531] Burton. Printed page 488, b: "Pornodidasculo dial. Ital. Latin. donat. à Gasp. Barthio Germano, Quanquàm natura, & arte eram formosissima, isto tamen astu tanto speciosior videbar; quod enim oculis cupitum ægrè præbetur, multo magis affectus humanos incendit." Pornodidascalus, an Italian dialogue rendered into Latin by the German Caspar Barth. "Though nature and art made me very beautiful, this trick made me seem so much lovelier; for what is desired by the eyes and granted with difficulty inflames human feelings much more."

[9532] Editor. The account continues the Lucretia material from the Pornodidascalus cited in Block 123. Burton attributes it to Aretino and names Caspar Barth as Latin translator. The precise edition and authorial attribution remain for collation. Amiable here means attractive or lovable; art includes cultivated appearance and calculated behaviour.

[9533] Burton. Printed page 488, c: "Quo majoribus me donis propitiabat, eo pejoribus illum modis tractabam, ne basium impetravit, &c." "The greater the gifts with which he sought to win me, the worse I treated him; he did not obtain even a kiss," etc.

[9534] Editor. The phrase which I commonly gave others refers to the access and kisses she denies this suitor. Burton translates and enlarges the marginal Latin rather than reproducing it word for word.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 489 To gull him the more, and fetch him over (for him onely I aimed at) I personated mine own servant to bring in a present from a Spanish Count, whilst he was in my company, as if he had been the Counts servant, which he did excellently well perform: [9535]Comes de monte Turco, my Lord and Master hath sent your Ladiship a small present, and part of his hunting, a piece of Venison, a Pheasant, a few Partridges, &c. (all which she bought with her own mony) commends his love and service to you, desiring you to accept of it in good part, and he means very shortly to come and see you.	"To dupe him further and get the better of him—for he alone was my target—I had my own servant play the part of a Spanish count's servant, bringing me a present while my suitor was with me. He performed his part exceedingly well: 'My lord and master, the Count of Monte Turco, has sent your ladyship a small present, a share of his hunting: some venison, a pheasant, a few partridges, and so on'—all of which she had bought with her own money—'and sends his love and service, asking you to accept it kindly. He intends to visit you very soon.'"[9536]
Withall she shewed him rings, gloves, scarfs, coronets which others had sent her, when there was no such matter, but onely to circumvent him. [9537]By these means (as she concludes) I made the poor Gentleman so mad, that he was ready to spend himself, and venture his dearest bloud for my sake.	At the same time she showed him rings, gloves, scarves and coronets supposedly sent by others. There was no truth in it: it was all a scheme to deceive him. "By these means," she concludes, "I drove the poor gentleman so mad that he was ready to exhaust his means and risk his own lifeblood for my sake."

[9535] Burton. Printed page 489, d: "Comes de monte Turco Hispanus has de Venatione suâ partes misit, jussitque peramanter orare, ut hoc qualecunque donum suo nomine accipias." "The Spanish Count of Monte Turco has sent these portions of his hunting, and commanded me most affectionately to ask you to accept this gift, such as it is, in his name."

[9536] Editor. To gull and fetch over mean to deceive or outwit. Personated mine own servant means that she assigned her servant a fictitious role. The count is part of the speaker's staged deception; coronets in the next sentence are ornamental headpieces.

[9537] Burton. Printed page 489, e: "His artibus hominem ita excantabam, ut pro me ille ad omnia paratus, &c." "By these arts I so bewitched the man that he was ready for anything on my behalf," etc.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Philinna in [9538]Lucian practised all this long before, as it shall appear unto you by her discourse; for when Diphilus her sweet-heart came to see her (as his daily custome was) she frowned upon him, would not vouchsafe him her company, but kissed Lamprias his corrivall, at the same time [9539]before his face: but why was it? To make him (as she telleth her mother that chid her for it) more jealous; to whetten his love, to come with a greater appetite, and so know that her favour was not so easie to be had;	Philinna in Lucian had practised all this long before, as her conversation will show you. When her sweetheart Diphilus came to see her, as he did every day, she frowned at him and would not grant him her company, but kissed his rival Lamprias before his very face. Why? To make him more jealous, as she tells her mother, who reproached her for it; to sharpen his love, make him return with a keener appetite, and teach him that her favour was not so easily obtained.[9540]
Many other tricks she used besides this (as she there confesseth) for she would fall out with, and anger him of set purpose, pick quarrels upon no occasion, because she would be reconciled to him again. Amantium iræ amoris redintegratio, as the old saying is, the falling out of lovers is the renewing of love; and according to that of Aristenætus, jucundiores amorum post injurias deliciæ, love is increased by injuries, as the Sun beams are more gracious after a cloud.	She used many other tricks besides this, as she confesses there: she would deliberately quarrel with him and make him angry, picking fights without any cause because she wished to be reconciled again. “Lovers’ quarrels renew love,” as the old saying has it: falling out renews their love. And, as Aristaenetus says, “Love’s delights are sweeter after wrongs”: injuries increase love, just as sunshine is more welcome after a cloud.[9541]

[9538] Burton. Printed page 489, f: “Tom. 4. dial. merit.” Lucian, volume 4, Dialogues of Courtesans.

[9539] Burton. Printed page 489, g: “Relicto illo, ægre ipsi interim faciens, & omnino difficilis.” “Leaving him, meanwhile distressing him, and altogether hard to please.”

[9540] Editor. Compare Lucian, Dialogues of Courtesans 3. Philinna says she kissed Lamprias to retaliate after Diphilus had kissed and praised Thais. Burton recasts that exchange as a calculated way to heighten a suitor’s desire. Corrival means rival, not an accomplice.

[9541] Editor. The maxim about quarrels renewing love occurs in Terence’s Andria; its exact location and Burton’s Aristaenetus wording remain for collation. Injuries means wrongs or offences. The second Latin phrase says that love’s pleasures are sweeter after a quarrel, which Burton then paraphrases as increased love.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And surely this Aphorism is most true; for as Ampelis informs Crisis in the said Lucian, [9542]If a lover be not jealous, angry, waspish, apt to fall out, sigh and swear, he is no true lover.	And surely this maxim is very true; for, as Ampelis tells Chrysis in the same Lucian, "If a lover is not jealous, angry, irritable, prone to quarrel, sigh and swear, he is no true lover."[9543]
To kiss and coil, hang about her neck, protest, swear and wish, are but ordinary symptomes, incipientis adhuc & crescentis amoris signa; but if he be jealous, angry, apt to mistake, &c. bene speres licet, sweet sister he is thine own; yet if you let him alone, humour him, please him, &c. and that he perceive once he hath you sure, without any corrivall, his love will languish, and he will not care so much for you.	Kissing and fondling, hanging about her neck, protesting, swearing and invoking wishes are only ordinary symptoms, "signs of love still beginning and growing." But if he is jealous, angry, ready to take offence, and so on, "you may hope for the best": sweet sister, he is yours. Yet if you leave him untroubled, indulge him and please him, and he once sees that he has you securely, without any rival, his love will fade and he will care less for you.[9544]

[9542] Burton. Printed page 489, h: "Si quis enim nec Zelotypus irascitur, nec pugnat aliquando amator, nec perjurat, non est habendus amator, &c. Totus hic ignis Zelotypia constat, &c. maximi amores inde nascuntur. Sed si persuasum illi fuerit te solum habere, elanguescit illico amor suus." "For if a lover neither becomes jealous and angry, nor sometimes fights, nor swears falsely, he is not to be counted a lover," etc. "All this fire consists in jealousy," etc. "The greatest loves arise from it. But if he becomes convinced that he alone possesses you, his love immediately grows faint."

[9543] Editor. Lucian, Dialogues of Courtesans 8, Ampelis and Chrysis. Burton endorses Ampelis's jealous-love maxim, but the dialogue gives Chrysis a questioning and resistant voice. The source also includes physical violence which Burton's paraphrase largely suppresses. The scene is not a reliable test of affection.

[9544] Editor. Coil here means fondle or embrace; apt to mistake means ready to take something amiss. The Latin phrases are translated as well as Burton's accompanying explanations. The ensuing advice remains Ampelis's position in Lucian's dialogue.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hitherto (saith he) can I speak out of experience; Demophantus a rich fellow was a suiter of mine, I seem'd to neglect him, and gave better entertainment to Calliades the Painter before his face, principio abiit, verbis me insectatus, at first he went his way all in a chafe, cursing and swearing, but at last he came submitting himself, vowing and protesting that he loved me most dearly, I should have all he had, and that he would kill himself for my sake. Therefore I advise thee (dear sister Crisis) and all maids, not to use your suiters over kindly; insolentes enim sunt hoc cum sentiunt, 'twill make them proud and insolent;	"So far," he says, "I can speak from experience. A rich fellow, Demophantus, was a suitor of mine. I appeared to neglect him and treated Calliades the painter more favourably before his eyes. 'At first he went away, assailing me with words': he left in a rage, cursing and swearing. But eventually he came back in submission, vowing and protesting that he loved me most dearly, that I should have everything he owned, and that he would kill himself for my sake. Therefore I advise you, dear sister Chrysis, and all young women, not to treat your suitors too kindly: 'they grow insolent when they realize this'; it will make them proud and insolent."[9545]
but now and then reject them, estrange thy self, & si me audies semel atque iterum exclude, shut him out of doors once or twice, let him dance attendance; follow my counsell, and by this means [9546]you shall make him mad, come off roundly, stand to any conditions, and do whatsoever you will have him.	"Instead, reject them now and then; keep your distance. 'If you will listen to me, shut him out once and again': close your door to him once or twice; let him wait on you. Follow my advice, and you will make him frantic, bring him to pay handsomely, accept any terms, and do whatever you want."

[9545] Editor. Lucian, Dialogues of Courtesans 8, has Demophantus threaten to kill Ampelis, whereas Burton makes him threaten to kill himself. That change is preserved on the right. Burton's parenthetic he is retained; the story is voiced by Ampelis. Come off roundly, below, means pay generously.

[9546] Burton. Printed page 489, i: "Venientem videbis ipsum denuo inflammatum & prorsus insanientem." "You will see him come again, inflamed and utterly mad."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 489–490 These are the ordinary practises; yet in the said Lucian, Melissa me thinks, had a trick beyond all this; for when her suiter came coldly on, to stir him up, she writ one of his corrivals names and her own in a paper, —— Melissa amat Hermotimum, Hermotimus Melissam, causing it to be stuck upon a post, for all gazers to behold, and lost it in the way where he used to walk; which when the silly novice perceived, statim ut legit credidit, instantly apprehended it was so, came raving to me, &c. [9547]and so when I was in despair of his love, four months after I recovered him again.	These are the usual practices; yet Melissa, in the same Lucian, seems to me to have devised a trick beyond them all. When her suitor grew lukewarm, she wrote her own name and that of one of his rivals on a piece of paper—"Melissa loves Hermotimus; Hermotimus loves Melissa"—and had it fastened to a post for everyone to see, and left it on the path where he used to walk. When the simple novice noticed it, "he believed it as soon as he read it": he immediately took it for the truth and came raging to me, and so on. "And so, when I had despaired of his love, four months later I won him back."[9548]
Source page 490 Eugenia drew Timocles for her Valentine, and wore his name a long time after in her bosome; Camena singled out Pamphilus to dance, at Mysons wedding (some say) for there she saw him first; Felicianus overtook Cælia by the high way side, offered his service, thence came farther acquaintance, and thence came love. But who can repeat half their devices? What Aratine experienced, what conceited Lucian, or wanton Aristenætus?	Eugenia drew Timocles as her valentine and wore his name at her breast for a long time afterwards. Camena picked Pamphilus as her dancing partner at Myson's wedding, some say, for that was where she first saw him. Felicianus caught up with Caelia beside the road and offered his services; from this came further acquaintance, and from acquaintance, love. But who could recount half their devices? What experienced Aretino, what ingenious Lucian, or amorous Aristaenetus could do it?[9549]

[9547] Burton. Printed page 490, k: "Et sic cum fere de illo desperassem, post menses quatuor ad me rediit." "And so, when I had almost despaired of him, after four months he returned to me."

[9548] Editor. Burton combines different parts of Lucian, Dialogues of Courtesans 4. Melitta, called Melissa here, denies knowing Hermotimus; Bacchis suggests that someone else wrote the names to provoke jealousy. The recovery after four months belongs to Bacchis's separate account of a witch restoring her lover Phanias. Burton makes the writing a deliberate trick by Melissa and merges its outcome with Bacchis's story.

[9549] Editor. The three brief courtship examples are presented without precise references and remain to be traced. Drawing a valentine means selecting a partner by lot. Conceited means inventive or witty, rather than self-important.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They will deny and take, stiffly refuse, and yet earnestly seek the same, repel to make them come with more eagerness, fly from if you follow, but if averse, as a shadow they will follow you again, fugientem sequitur, sequentem fugit; with a regaining retrait, a gentle reluctancy, a smiling threat, a pretty pleasant peevishness, they will put you off, and have a thousand such several enticements. For as he saith,	They will deny and accept, firmly refuse what they nevertheless eagerly seek, and repel a suitor to make him return more eagerly. Pursue them and they flee; turn away and they follow you again like a shadow: "it follows the one who flees and flees the one who follows." With a retreat that wins you back, a gentle reluctance, a smiling threat or a charming little fit of petulance, they will put you off. They have a thousand such different enticements. For, as the poet says,[9550]
[9551]Non est forma satis, nec quæ vult bella videri, Debet vulgari more placere suis. Dicta, sales, lusus, sermones, gratia, risus, Vincunt naturæ candidioris opus.	Beauty is not enough; she who wishes to seem lovely Must not please her admirers in the common way. Sayings, wit, playfulness, conversation, charm and laughter Surpass the work of nature at its fairest.[9552]
'Tis not enough though she be fair of shew, For her to use this vulgar complement: But pretty toys and jests, and sawes and smiles, As far beyond what beauty can attempt.	It is not enough, though she looks fair, For her to offer ordinary courtesies; But pretty trifles, jokes, sayings and smiles Go far beyond what beauty can achieve.

[9550] Editor. The shadow comparison gives the same chase-and-retreat idea twice, first in English and then in Latin. Regaining describes a retreat calculated to recover the pursuer; peevishness is playful ill humour.

[9551] Burton. Printed page 490, t: "Petronius Catal." Petronius, Catalecta, or collected shorter pieces.

[9552] Editor. The poem beginning Non est forma satis is printed as fragment 20 in the consulted Petronian collection. Its readings sibi, sermonis gratia and Vindicunt differ from Burton's suis, sermones, gratia and Vincunt. The translation follows Burton, including Vincunt, "surpass," and his English adaptation follows separately. Saws in that adaptation are sayings; complement means courtesy or polite accomplishment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9553]For this cause belike Philostratus in his Images, makes divers Loves, some yong, some of one age, some of another, some winged, some of one sex, some of another, some with torches, some with golden apples, some with darts, gins, snares, and other engines in their hands, as Propertius hath prettily painted them out, lib. 2. & 29. and which some interpret, divers enticements, or divers affections of Lovers, which if not alone, yet joyntly may batter and overcome the strongest constitutions.	Perhaps for this reason Philostratus, in his Images, represents various Loves: some young, some of one age and some of another; some winged; some of one sex and some of the other; some with torches, golden apples, darts, traps, snares and other devices in their hands, as Propertius has neatly depicted them in book 2, poem 29. Some interpret these figures as the different enticements or affections of lovers, which, if they cannot do so singly, may together batter down and overcome the strongest constitutions.[9554]

[9553] Burton. Printed page 490, u: “Imagines deorum, fol. 327. varios amores facit, quos aliqui interpretantur multiplices affectus & illecebras, alios puellos, puellas, alatos, alias poma aurea, alios sagittas, alios laqueos, &c.” Images of the Gods, folio 327: “He represents various Loves, which some interpret as manifold feelings and enticements: some as boys, girls, winged figures; others with golden apples, others arrows, others snares,” etc. The uneven Latin construction is retained.

[9554] Editor. Loves are personified Cupids. Propertius 2.29a.3–10 depicts naked boys carrying torches, arrows and bonds, then binding the speaker at an angry woman’s command. This locates part of Burton’s catalogue, not its golden apples or every other attribute. The body names Philostratus, while the margin cites Images of the Gods, folio 327; that bibliographical reference remains unresolved. Gins are traps; engines are devices.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is reported of Decius, and Valerianus, those two notorious persecutors of the Church, that when they could enforce a yong Christian by no means (as [9555]Hierome records) to sacrifice to their Idols, by no torments or promises, they took another course to tempt him: they put him into a fair Garden, and set a yong Curtesan to dally with him, [9556]she took him about the neck and kissed him, and that which is not to be named, manibusque attrectare, &c. and all those enticements which might be used, that whom torments could not, Love might batter and beleaguer. But such was his constancy, she could not overcome, and when this last engine would take no place, they left him to his own ways.	It is told of Decius and Valerian, those two notorious persecutors of the Church, that, when neither tortures nor promises could force a young Christian to sacrifice to their idols, as Jerome records, they tried another means of tempting him. They placed him in a beautiful garden and sent a young courtesan to caress him. She put her arms about his neck and kissed him, and did what must not be named, "handling him with her hands," and so on, employing every possible enticement so that love might batter and besiege the man whom torture could not subdue. But his constancy was such that she could not overcome him; and when this last device failed, they left him to his own ways.[9557]

[9555] Burton. Printed page 490, x: "Epist. lib. 3. vita Pauli Eremitæ." Letters, book 3, Life of Paul the Hermit.

[9556] Burton. Printed page 490, y: "Meretrix speciosa cepit delicatius stringere colla complexibus, & corpore in libidinem concitato, &c." "A beautiful prostitute began tenderly to clasp his neck in her embraces, and, when his body had been roused to lust," etc.

[9557] Editor. Jerome, Life of Paul the First Hermit 3. Burton omits the youth's drastic resistance: in Jerome he bites off the end of his tongue and spits it at the woman. Jerome does not conclude the episode by saying that the persecutors left him alone. Both differences are retained in the body. Beleaguer means besiege.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 490–491 At [9558]Barclye in Glocester-shire, there was in times past a Nunnery (saith Gualterus Mapes, an old Historiographer, that lived 400 years since) of which there was a noble and a fair Lady Abbess: Godwin, that subtile Earl of Kent travelling that way, (seeking not her but hers) leaves a Nephew of his, a proper young Gallant (as if he had been sick) with her, till he came back again, and gives the young man charge so long to counterfeit, till he had deflowred the Abbess, and as many besides of the Nuns as he could, and leaves him withall rings, jewels, girdles, and such toyes to give them still, when they came to visit him.	At Berkeley in Gloucestershire there was once a nunnery, says Walter Map, an old historian who lived four hundred years ago, "whose abbess was a beautiful lady of noble birth. Godwin, that crafty Earl of Kent, was travelling that way. Seeking not her but her possessions, he left a nephew of his, a handsome young gallant pretending to be ill, in her care until his return. He instructed the young man to keep up the pretence until he had deflowered the abbess and as many other nuns as he could. He also left him rings, jewels, girdles and similar trifles to give them whenever they visited him."
Source page 491 The young man willing to undergo such a business, plaid his part so well, that in short space he got up most of their bellies, and when he had done, told his Lord how he had sped; [9559]His Lord makes instantly to the Court, tells the King how such a Nunnery was become a bawdy house, procures a visitation, gets them to be turned out, and begs the lands to his own use.	"The young man willingly undertook the business and played his part so well that he soon made most of them pregnant. When he had finished, he told his lord how he had fared. His lord immediately went to court, told the king that this nunnery had become a brothel, secured an investigation, had the women expelled, and asked for the lands for himself."[9560]

[9558] Burton. Printed page 490, z: "Camden in Glocestershire, huic præfuit nobilis & formosa Abbatissa, Godwinus comes indolo subtilis, non ipsam, sed sua cupiens, reliquit nepotem suum forma elegantissimum, tanquam infirmum donec reverteretur, instruit, &c." Camden, under Gloucestershire: "A noble and beautiful abbess presided here. Earl Godwin, crafty by nature, desiring not her but her possessions, left his very handsome nephew as though he were ill until his return, and instructed him," etc. The printed indolo is retained.

[9559] Burton. Printed page 491, a: "Ille impiger regem adit, Abbatissam & suas prægnantes edocet, exploratoribus missis probat, & iis ejectis, à domino suo manerium accepit." "He promptly approaches the king, declares the abbess and her women to be pregnant, proves it by sending investigators, and, after their expulsion, receives the manor from his lord."

[9560] Editor. The body names Walter Map, while the margin cites Camden under Gloucestershire. Berkeley is the modern spelling of Barclye. This is an allegation retold to illustrate temptation, not an independently established account of the nunnery. A visitation is an official inspection. The complete Map–Camden transmission remains for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This story I do therefore repeat, that you may see of what force these enticements are, if they be opportunely used, and how hard it is even for the most averse and sanctified souls to resist such allurements. John Maior in the life of John the Monk, that lived in the dayes of Theodosius, commends the Hermite to have been a man of singular continency, and of a most austere life; but one night by chance the Devil came to his Cell in the habit of a young market wench that had lost her way, and desired for Gods sake some lodging with him.	I repeat this story so that you may see how powerful these enticements are when used at the right moment, and how hard even the most reluctant and sanctified souls find it to resist them. John Maior, in the life of John the Monk, who lived in the days of Theodosius, praises the hermit as a man of extraordinary chastity and most austere life. But one night the Devil happened to come to his cell disguised as a young market girl who had lost her way, and begged him, for God's sake, for lodging.
[9561]The old man let her in, and after some common conference of her mishap, she began to inveagle him with lascivious talk and jests, to play with his beard, to kiss him, and do worse, till at last she overcame him. As he went to address himself to that business, she vanished on a sudden, all the Devils in the ayr laughed him to scorn. Whether this be a true story, or a tale, I will not much contend, it serves to illustrate this which I have said.	"The old man let her in. After some ordinary conversation about her misadventure, she began to entice him with lewd talk and jokes, play with his beard, kiss him, and do worse, until at last she overcame him. As he prepared himself for the act, she suddenly vanished, and all the devils in the air laughed him to scorn." I will not argue much about whether this is a true story or a fiction; it serves to illustrate what I have said.[9562]

[9561] Burton. Printed page 491, b: "Post sermones de casu suo suavitate sermonis conciliat animum hominis, manumque inter colloquia & risus ad barbam protendit & palpare cœpit cervicem suam & osculari; quid multa? captivum ducit militem Christi. Complexura evanescit, dæmones in aere monachum riserunt." "After talking about her misfortune, she wins the man's heart by her sweet speech; amid conversation and laughter she reaches her hand towards his beard and begins to stroke the neck and kiss. Why say more? She leads Christ's soldier captive. As she is about to embrace him she vanishes; demons in the air laugh at the monk." The printed cervicem suam literally says "her own neck"; its reference in this compressed account is uncertain.

[9562] Editor. Continency means sexual self-restraint; habit means clothing or disguise; address himself means prepare himself. Burton expressly leaves the tale's truth uncertain. The identity and edition behind John Maior and the Life of John require further verification; the marginal Latin also has a doubtful pronoun in the neck-stroking clause.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yet were it so, that these of which I have hitherto spoken, and such like inticing baits be not sufficient, there be many others, which will of themselves intend this passion of burning lust, amongst which, Dancing is none of the least; and it is an engine of such force, I may not omit it. Incitamentum libidinis, Petrach calls it, the spur of lust, [9563]A circle of which the Devil himself is the Center. [9564]Many women that use it, have come dishonest home, most indifferent, none better.	Yet even if those enticements I have described, and similar baits, are insufficient, many others can themselves intensify this passion of burning lust. Dancing is by no means the least of these. It is so powerful a device that I must not omit it. Petrarch calls it "an incitement to lust," lust's spur, "a circle whose centre is the Devil himself." "Many women who practise it have returned home unchaste, most no better or worse, and none improved."[9565]
[9566]Another terms it the companion of all filthy delights and enticements, and 'tis not easily told what inconveniences come by it, what scurrile talk, obscene actions, and many times such monstrous gestures, such lascivious motions, such wanton tunes, meretricious kisses, homely embracings,	Another calls it "the companion of every filthy pleasure and enticement. It is hard to tell what mischief comes of it, what coarse talk and obscene actions," and often such monstrous gestures, lewd movements, wanton tunes, prostitutes' kisses and familiar embraces,[9567]

[9563] Burton. Printed page 491, dagger: "Choræa circulus, cujus centrum diab." "A dance is a circle whose centre is the Devil."

[9564] Burton. Printed page 491, c: "Multæ inde impudicæ domum rediere, plures ambiguæ, melior nulla." "Many returned home from there unchaste, more of doubtful virtue, none better."

[9565] Editor. Intend means intensify, and engine means an effective instrument. Burton attributes incitement to lust to Petrarch, then adds the circle and returning-women maxims without fully distinguishing their sources. These exact attributions remain unresolved. His English indifferent is milder than the margin's ambiguæ, "of doubtful virtue"; both are retained.

[9566] Burton. Printed page 491, d: "Turpium delitiarum comes est externa saltatio; neque certè facile dictu quæ mala hinc visus hauriat, & quæ pariat colloquia, monstrosos, inconditos gestus &c." "Outward dancing accompanies shameful pleasures; it is certainly not easy to say what evils the sight draws from it, what conversations it engenders, what monstrous, disorderly gestures," etc.

[9567] Editor. The writer is unnamed. Scurrile means coarse or indecent; homely here means familiar or intimate. The marginal externa saltatio literally describes outward or external dancing; the exact source and intended distinction remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [9568](ut Gaditana canoro Incipiat prurire choro, plausuque probatæ Ad terram tremulâ descendant clune puellæ, Irritamentum Veneris languentis) ——	As the girl of Cadiz begins her lustful dance to song, And the girls, applauded and approved, Sink to the ground with trembling buttocks, A stimulus to flagging desire.[9569]
That it will make the spectators mad. When that Epitomizer of [9570]Trogus had to the full described and set out King Ptolomies riot, as a chief engine and instrument of his overthrow, he adds tympanum & tripudium, fidling and dancing; the King was not a spectator onely, but a principall Actor himself.	That it will drive the spectators mad. When the epitomizer of Trogus had fully described King Ptolemy's debauchery, he added "drumming and dancing"—fiddling and dancing—as a chief device and instrument of his downfall: "The king was not merely a spectator but a principal performer himself."[9571]
Source page 491–492 A thing nevertheless frequently used, and part of a Gentlewomans bringing up, to sing, dance, and play on the Lute, or some such instrument, before she can say her Pater Noster, or ten Commandements. 'Tis the next way their Parents think, to get them husbands, they are compelled to learn, and by that means, [9572]Incestos amores de tenero meditantur ungue;	Nevertheless, it is common practice, and part of a gentlewoman's upbringing, to sing, dance and play the lute or a similar instrument before she can say the Lord's Prayer or the Ten Commandments. Their parents think it the surest way to get them husbands. They are compelled to learn, and so "they practise unchaste loves from their tenderest years."[9573]

[9568] Burton. Printed page 491, e: "Juv. Sat. 11." Juvenal, Satire 11.

[9569] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 11.162–167, on provocative dancers from Cadiz. Burton abridges and alters the syntax: the consulted text has plural incipiant and tremulo, against his Incipiat and tremulâ. The translation follows the printed singular opening, then the plural girls, and preserves the omitted material as an omission rather than silently restoring it.

[9570] Burton. Printed page 491, dagger: "Justin. l. 10. Adduntur instrumenta luxuriæ, tympana & tripudia; nec tam spectator rex, sed nequitiæ magister, &c." Justin, book 10: "The instruments of luxury are added, drums and dances; the king is not so much a spectator as a master of wickedness," etc.

[9571] Editor. Justin, Epitome 30.1.9, not the margin's printed book 10. Justin epitomizes Pompeius Trogus. The consulted Latin has tympana et crepundia, "drums and rattles," and nec iam spectator; Burton gives dancing and nec tam spectator. His two versions are translated as they stand. Riot means extravagant debauchery.

[9572] Burton. Printed page 491, f: "Hor. l. 5. od. 6." Horace, book 5, ode 6, as printed.

[9573] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.6.23–24, not book 5 as printed in the margin. Burton adapts the singular meditatur to plural meditantur. Incestus can mean unchaste or polluted without specifically implying incest; de tenero ungui is an idiom for early childhood. Pater Noster is the Lord's Prayer.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 492 'Tis a great allurement as it is often used, and many are undone by it. Thais in Lucian, inveagled Lamprias in a dance. Herodias so far pleased Herod, that she made him swear to give her what she would ask, John Baptists head in a platter.	As it is often practised, dancing is a powerful enticement, and many are ruined by it. Thais in Lucian enticed Lamprias through a dance. Herodias pleased Herod so much that she made him swear to give her whatever she asked: John the Baptist's head on a platter.[9574]
[9575]Robert Duke of Normandy, riding by Falais, spied Arlette a fair maid, as she danced on a green, and was so much enamoured with the object, that [9576]he must needs lye with her that night. Owen Tudor won Queen Catharines affection in a dance, falling by chance with his head in her lap. Who cannot parallel these stories out of his experience?	Robert, Duke of Normandy, riding past Falaise, saw a beautiful maiden, Arlette, dancing on a green, and was so captivated by the sight that he simply had to sleep with her that night. Owen Tudor won Queen Catherine's affection at a dance when he happened to fall with his head in her lap. Who cannot find parallels to these stories in their own experience?[9577]

[9574] Editor. In Lucian, Dialogues of Courtesans 3, Thais's dancing wins Diphilus's praise; Lamprias is her own companion. In Matthew 14:6–11 and Mark 6:22–28, the dancer is Herodias's daughter, who consults her mother before requesting John's head. Burton's names are preserved in the body.

[9575] Burton. Printed page 492, g: "Havarde vita ejus." Hayward, his life; the printed form is retained.

[9576] Burton. Printed page 492, h: "Of whom he begat William the Conquerour, by the same token she tore her smock down, saying, &c." Burton gives no words after saying; the anecdote is left incomplete in the margin.

[9577] Editor. Arlette is the woman also known as Herleva, mother of William the Conqueror; the margin explicitly makes that identification. The Hayward reference and the particular dance stories about Robert and Owen Tudor remain to be checked in their cited historical sources. The broken-off smock anecdote in Burton's margin is not completed conjecturally.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Speusippus a noble gallant in that greek [9578]Aristenætus, seeing Panareta a fair yong Gentlewoman dancing by accident, was so far in love with her, that for a long time after he could think of nothing but Panareta: he came raving home full of Panareta: Who would not admire her, who would not love her, that should but see her dance as I did? O admirable, O divine Panareta! I have seen old and new Rome, many fair Cities, many proper women, but never any like to Panareta, they are dross, dowdies all to Panareta! O how she danced, how she tript, how she turn'd, with what a grace! happy is that man that shall injoy her. O most incomparable, only, Panareta!	Speusippus, a noble gallant in the Greek writer Aristaenetus, happened to see a beautiful young gentlewoman, Panareta, dancing. He fell so deeply in love that for a long time afterwards he could think of nothing but Panareta. He came home raving, full of Panareta: "Who would not admire her, who would not love her, if he merely saw her dance as I did? Oh, wonderful, divine Panareta! I have seen old Rome and new Rome, many beautiful cities and many handsome women, but never anyone like Panareta. Beside Panareta they are all dross, all frumps! Oh, how she danced, how she tripped, how she turned, with what grace! Happy the man who shall possess her. Oh, incomparable, matchless Panareta!"[9579]
When Xenophon in Symposio or Banquet, had discoursed of love, and used all the engines that might be devised, to move Socrates, amongst the rest, to stir him the more, he shuts up all with a pleasant Enterlude or dance of Dionysius and Ariadne.	When Xenophon, in his Symposium or Banquet, has discussed love and employed every imaginable device to move Socrates among the rest, he concludes with a delightful interlude or dance of Dionysus and Ariadne, to stir him further.

[9578] Burton. Printed page 492, dagger: "Epist. 26. Quis non miratus est saltantem? Quis non vidit & amavit? veterem & novam vidi Romam, sed tibi similem non vidi Panareta; felix qui Panareta fruitur, &c." Letter 26: "Who has not admired her dancing? Who has seen her without loving her? I have seen old and new Rome, but never anyone like you, Panareta; happy the man who enjoys Panareta," etc.

[9579] Editor. Burton's Aristaenetus margin gives letter 26 without a book number; that reference remains for exact collation. Old and new Rome mean Rome and Constantinople. Proper means handsome; dowdies are unattractive or dowdily dressed women. His language of raving conveys infatuation rather than a clinical diagnosis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9580]First Ariadne dressed like a Bride came in and took her place; by and by Dionysius entred, dancing to the Musick. The spectators did all admire the yong mans carriage; and Ariadne her self was so much affected with the sight, that she could scarce sit. After a while Dionysius beholding Ariadne, and incensed with love, bowing to her knees, embraced her first, and kissed her with a grace; she embraced him again, and kissed him with like affection, &c. as the dance required: but they that stood by and saw this, did much applaud and commend them both for it.	"First Ariadne entered dressed as a bride and took her place; soon Dionysus came in, dancing to the music. All the spectators admired the young man's bearing, and Ariadne herself was so moved by the sight that she could scarcely sit still. After a while Dionysus, gazing at Ariadne and fired with love, bent to her knees, embraced her and kissed her gracefully. She embraced him in return and kissed him with equal affection, and so on, as the dance required. The onlookers warmly applauded and praised them both."
And when Dionysius rose up, he raised her up with him, and many pretty gestures, embraces, kisses, and love complements passed between them; which when they saw fair Bacchus and beautiful Ariadne so sweetly and so unfeignedly kissing each other, so really embracing, they swore they loved indeed, and were so enflamed with the object, that they began to rouse up themselves, as if they would have flown.	"When Dionysus rose, he lifted her up with him, and many charming gestures, embraces, kisses and loving courtesies passed between them. Seeing handsome Bacchus and beautiful Ariadne kissing each other so sweetly and sincerely, and embracing so truly, the spectators swore that they were really in love. So inflamed were they by the sight that they began to stir themselves as though they would take flight."

[9580] Burton. Printed page 492, i: "Principio Ariadne velut sponsa prodit, ac sola recedit; prodiens illico Dionysius ad numeros cantante tibia saltabat; admirati sunt omnes saltantem juvenem, ipsaque Ariadne, ut vix potuerit conquiescere; postea vero cum Dionysius eam aspexit, &c. Ut autem surrexit Dionysius, erexit simul Ariadnem; licebatque spectare gestus osculantium, & inter se complectentium; qui autem spectabant, &c. Ad extremum videntes eos mutuis amplexibus implicatos & jamjam ad thalamum ituros; qui non duxerant uxores jurabant uxores se ducturos; qui autem duxerant conscensis equis & incitatis, ut iisdem fruerentur, domum festinârunt." "First Ariadne comes forward like a bride and withdraws alone; Dionysus immediately enters and dances to the rhythm of the flute. All admire the dancing youth, and Ariadne herself can scarcely remain still. Afterwards, when Dionysus sees her," etc. "When Dionysus rises, he raises Ariadne with him; one may watch their gestures as they kiss and embrace each other; those watching," etc. "At last, seeing them entwined in mutual embraces and about to enter the bedchamber, the unmarried swear to take wives; those already married mount their horses and spur them home to enjoy their wives." Includes the continuation across the bottom of the page; Burton's abridged Latin differs in places from the body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
At the last when they saw them still, so willingly embracing, and now ready to go to the Bride-chamber, they were so ravished with it, that they that were unmarried, swore they would forthwith marry, and those that were married, called instantly for their horses, and gallopped home to their wives.	"At last, seeing them still embracing so willingly and now ready to go to the bridal chamber, they were so transported that the unmarried men swore they would marry at once, while the married men immediately called for their horses and galloped home to their wives."[9581]

[9581] Editor. Xenophon, Symposium 9.2–7. Dionysius in Burton is Dionysus, also called Bacchus. Burton presents the performance as an attempt to move Socrates; the source concludes by distinguishing Socrates and the few remaining guests, who go for a walk, from those hastening home to their wives. The extended marginal paraphrase includes its continuation across the foot of printed page 492.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What greater motive can there be then this burning lust? What so violent an oppugner? Not without good cause therefore so many general Councels condemn it, so many Fathers abhor it, so many grave men speak against it: Use not the company of a woman, saith Syracides, 8. 4. that is a singer, or a dancer; neither hear, least thou be taken in her craftiness. In circo non tam cernitur quam discitur libido. [9582]Hædus holds, lust in Theaters is not seen, but learned.	What greater incitement can there be than this burning lust? What more violent assailant? It is with good reason, then, that so many general councils condemn dancing, so many Church Fathers abhor it, and so many grave men speak against it. “Do not keep company with a woman,” says Sirach 8:4, “who is a singer or dancer; neither listen, lest you be caught by her cunning.” “In the circus lust is not so much watched as learned.” Haedus maintains that lust in theatres is not seen but learned.[9583]
Source page 492–493 Gregory Nazianzen that eloquent Divine ([9584]as he relates the story himself) when a noble friend of his solemnly invited him with other Bishops, to his daughter Olympia’s wedding, refused to come: [9585]For it is absurd to see an old gouty Bishop sit amongst dancers, he held it unfit to be a spectator, much less an actor.	Gregory Nazianzen, that eloquent theologian, tells how a noble friend formally invited him and other bishops to his daughter Olympia’s wedding. He declined: “For it is absurd to see an old, gouty bishop sitting among dancers.” He thought it unsuitable to be a spectator, still less a participant.[9586]

[9582] Burton. Printed page 492, dagger: “Lib. 4. de contemnend. amoribus.” Book 4, On Despising Loves.

[9583] Editor. Oppugner means assailant. Burton prints Syracides 8.4; the warning about a dancing woman occurs at Sirach 9:4 in the consulted Douay–Rheims text. Petrus Haedus is cited through On Despising Loves, book 4; the exact form of the circus/theatre maxim remains to be collated.

[9584] Burton. Printed page 492, asterisk: “Ad Anysium epist. 57.” To Anysius, letter 57.

[9585] Burton. Printed page 493, dagger: “Intempestivum enim est, & à nuptiis abhorrens, inter saltantes podagricum videre senem, & Episcopum.” “For it is untimely, and ill-suited to a wedding, to see a gouty old man, and a bishop, among the dancers.”

[9586] Editor. Gregory of Nazianzus, letter 193 to Vitalianus in Storin’s translation, matches the wedding of Olympias, attending bishops and the absent writer’s gout. He jokes about his own unfitness among dancers and sends his blessing to the couple. Burton’s margin instead gives To Anysius, letter 57. That citation and his Latin wording remain uncollated; the letter is not a general prohibition of weddings or dancing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 493 Nemo saltat sobrius, Tully writes, he is not a sober man that danceth; for some such reason (belike) Domitian forbad the Romane Senators to dance, and for that fact removed many of them from the Senate.	"No sober man dances," Cicero writes: the man who dances is not sober. Perhaps for some such reason Domitian forbade Roman senators to dance, and expelled many from the Senate for doing so.[9587]
But these, you will say, are lascivious and Pagan dances, 'tis the abuse that causeth such inconvenience, and I do not well therefore to condemn, speak against, or innocently to accuse the best and pleasantest thing (so [9588]Lucian calls it) that belongs to mortall men.	But these, you will say, are lewd and pagan dances. The abuse causes the harm, and therefore I am wrong to condemn, speak against or "unjustly accuse the best and pleasantest thing in human life," as Lucian calls it.
You misinterpret, I condemn it not; I hold it notwithstanding an honest disport, a lawful recreation, if it be opportune, moderately and soberly used: I am of Plutarchs mind, [9589]that which respects pleasure alone, honest recreation, or bodily exercise, ought not to be rejected and contemned:	You misunderstand me: I do not condemn it. I still regard it as an innocent amusement and a lawful recreation when practised at a suitable time, moderately and soberly. I agree with Plutarch: "What serves pleasure alone, innocent recreation or bodily exercise should not be rejected and despised."

[9587] Editor. Cicero, For Murena 13, says that scarcely anyone dances sober unless mad, in a qualified discussion of dissolute entertainment; Burton compresses this to an absolute maxim. Suetonius, Domitian 8, records the expulsion of one former quaestor for enthusiasm for acting and dancing, not the general ban and many expulsions asserted here.

[9588] Burton. Printed page 493, asterisk: "Rem omnium in mortalium vita optimam innocenter accusare." "To accuse without cause the best of all things in mortal life."

[9589] Burton. Printed page 493, k: "Quæ honestam voluptatem respicit, aut corporis exercitium, contemni non debet." "What serves innocent pleasure or exercise of the body should not be despised."

Original text 1651	Modern English
I subscribe to [9590]Lucian, 'tis an elegant thing, which cheareth up the mind, exerciseth the body, delights the spectators, which teacheth many comely gestures, equally affecting the ears, eyes, and soul it self.	I agree with Lucian: "It is a graceful art that cheers the mind, exercises the body, delights its spectators and teaches many becoming gestures, appealing equally to the ears, the eyes and the soul itself."[9591]
Salust discommends singing and dancing in Sempronia, not that she did sing or dance, but that she did it in excess, 'tis the abuse of it: and Gregories refusal doth not simply condemn it, but in some folks. Many will not allow men and women to dance together, because it is a provocation to lust: they may as well with Lycurgus and Mahomet, cut down all Vines, forbid the drinking of Wine, for that it makes some men drunk.	Sallust censures Sempronia's singing and dancing, not because she sang or danced, but because she did so excessively: it is the abuse he condemns. Gregory's refusal likewise condemns it only for certain people, not absolutely. Many will not allow men and women to dance together because it provokes lust. They might as well, with Lycurgus and Muhammad, cut down all vines and forbid wine because it makes some people drunk.[9592]
[9593]Nihil prodest quod non lædere possit idem: Igne quid utilius? ——	Nothing benefits us that cannot also harm us: What is more useful than fire?[9594]

[9590] Burton. Printed page 493, asterisk: "Elegantissima res est, quæ & mentem acuit, corpus exercet, & spectantes oblectet, multos gestus decoros docens, oculos, aures, animum ex æquo demulcens." "It is a most graceful art, which sharpens the mind, exercises the body and delights spectators, teaching many becoming gestures and equally charming the eyes, ears and mind."

[9591] Editor. Compare Lucian, On the Dance, also translated as Of Pantomime. It defends an art combining bodily movement, narrative and instruction; Burton applies that defence more broadly to dancing. The earlier innocently to accuse is taken as accusing without just cause. The intervening Plutarch quotation remains to be located exactly.

[9592] Editor. Sallust, Catiline 25.2, calls Sempronia more accomplished at music and dancing than becomes a respectable woman. Burton reads this as a criticism of excess. His comparison with Lycurgus and Muhammad is a polemical analogy; its historical particulars are not independently established here.

[9593] Burton. Printed page 493, dagger: "Ovid." Ovid.

[9594] Editor. Ovid, Tristia 2.266–267. Burton quotes the general maxim and only the opening question of the next line. Ovid goes on to contrast fire's usefulness with its use in arson; the comparison supports Burton's distinction between recreation and abuse.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I say of this as of all other honest recreations, they are like fire, good and bad, and I see no such inconvenience, but that they may so dance, if it be done at due times, and by fit persons: and conclude with Wolfgangus [9595]Hider, and most of our modern divines: Si decoræ, graves, verecundæ, plena luce bonorum virorum & matronarum honestarum, tempestive fiant, probari possunt, & debent.	I say of this what I say of all other innocent recreations: they are like fire, both good and bad. I see no harm sufficient to forbid such dancing, provided it is done at proper times and by suitable people. I conclude with Wolfgang Hider and most of our modern theologians: "If dances are becoming, dignified and modest, performed in full daylight in the presence of good men and respectable married women, and at a fitting time, they can and should be approved."[9596]
There is a time to mourn, a time to dance, Eccles. 3. 4. Let them take their pleasures then, and as [9597]he said of old, young men and maids flourishing in their age, fair and lovely to behold, well attired and of comely carriage, dancing a Greek Galiard, and as their dance required, kept their time, now turning now tracing, now apart now altogether, now a courtesie then a caper, &c. and it was a pleasant sight, to see those pretty knots, and swimming figures.	"There is a time to mourn and a time to dance," Ecclesiastes 3:4. Let them take their pleasures, then. As an ancient writer says: "Young men and maidens in the flower of their age, fair and lovely to see, well dressed and graceful in bearing, danced a Greek galliard. Keeping time as the dance required, they now turned, now stepped through its patterns, now moved apart, now together, now curtsied, then leaped," and so on. Those intricate formations and flowing figures were a delightful sight.[9598]

[9595] Burton. Printed page 493, dagger: "System. moralis Philosophiæ." System of Moral Philosophy.

[9596] Editor. Hider is cited under a System of Moral Philosophy; the exact authorial form and edition remain for collation. Plena luce is rendered literally as full daylight, with the attendance of good men and respectable women supplied from the surrounding construction. Tempestive means timely or at a proper occasion.

[9597] Burton. Printed page 493, l: "Apuleius. 10. Puelli, puellæque virenti florentes ætatula, forma conspicui, veste nitidi, incessu gratiosi, Græcanicam saltantes Pyrrhicam, dispositis ordinationibus, decoros ambitus inerrabant, nunc in orbem flexi, nunc in obliquam seriem connexi, nunc in quadrum cuneati, nunc inde separati, &c." Apuleius, book 10: "Boys and girls blooming in youthful age, handsome in appearance, splendidly dressed and graceful in movement, dancing a Greek Pyrrhic dance in arranged formations, traced becoming circuits: now curved into a circle, now linked in a slanting line, now massed in a square, now separated again," etc.

[9598] Editor. Apuleius, Metamorphoses 10.29. The source and margin name a Pyrrhic dance, associated with martial movements; Burton calls it a Greek galliard, an analogy using a dance familiar to his readers. Tracing means executing the dance's steps or figures. The English details and the marginal Latin are not identical.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Sun and Moon (some say) dance about the earth, the three upper Planets about the Sun as their center, now stationary, now direct, now retrograde, now in Apogæo then in perigæo, now swift then slow, occidentall, orientall, they turn round, jumpe and trace, ♀ and ☿ about the Sun with those thirty three Maculæ or Burbonian planet, circa Solem saltantes Cytharedum, saith Fromundus.	The sun and moon, some say, dance around the earth, and the three outer planets around the sun as their centre: now stationary, now moving forwards, now backwards; now at apogee, then at perigee; now swift, then slow; westward, eastward. They turn, leap and tread their figures. Venus and Mercury dance around the sun with those thirty-three spots or Bourbonian planets, "dancing around the sun, the lyre-player," as Fromundus says.[9599]
Four Medicean stars dance about Jupiter, two Austrian about Saturn, &c. and all (belike) to the musick of the Sphears.	Four Medicean stars dance around Jupiter, two Austrian ones around Saturn, and so on; and all, presumably, to the music of the spheres.[9600]
Our greatest Counsellors, and staid Senators, at sometimes dance, as David before the Ark, 2 Sam. 6. 14. Miriam Exod. 15. 20. Judith 15. 13. (though the devil hence perhaps hath brought in those bawdy Bacchanals) and well may they do it.	Our greatest counsellors and most dignified senators sometimes dance, as David did before the Ark, in 2 Samuel 6:14; Miriam, in Exodus 15:20; and Judith, in Judith 15:13. Perhaps the Devil took his cue from this to introduce those bawdy bacchanals, but they may rightly dance.[9601]

[9599] Editor. The three upper planets are Mars, Jupiter and Saturn. Direct and retrograde describe apparent forward and backward motion; apogee and perigee are positions farthest from and nearest the earth. The symbols on the left are Venus and Mercury. Maculæ means spots. Burton turns competing astronomical descriptions into a dance; his thirty-three Bourbonian planets and precise Fromundus passage remain for collation.

[9600] Editor. The four Medicean stars are Jupiter's large moons, now called Io, Europa, Ganymede and Callisto, observed by Galileo in 1610. Burton's two Austrian bodies at Saturn belong to early telescopic interpretation; the specific name and claim remain unresolved here. The music of the spheres is the traditional idea of harmony produced by celestial motions.

[9601] Editor. These are biblical examples used to defend dancing: David before the Ark, Miriam after the crossing of the sea, and Judith leading the women's celebration. The numbering follows Burton's cited Bible traditions. Bacchanals are revels associated with Bacchus, used here as a term of censure.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 493–494 The greatest Souldiers, as [9602]Quintilianus, [9603]Æmilius Probus, [9604]Cælius Rhodiginus have proved at large, still use it in Greece, Rome, and the most worthy Senators, cantare, saltare. Lucian, Macrobius, Libanus, Plutarch, Julius, Pollux, Athenæus, have written just tracts in commendation of it. In this our age it is in much request in those countries, as in all civill Common-wealths, as Alexander ab Alexandro, lib. 4. cap. 10. & lib. 2. cap. 25. hath proved at large, [9605]amongst the Barbarians themselves nothing so pretious; all the World allows it.	The greatest soldiers, as Quintilian, Aemilius Probus and Caelius Rhodiginus have shown at length, continually practise it in Greece and Rome, as do the worthiest senators: "singing and dancing." Lucian, Macrobius, Libanius, Plutarch, Julius, Pollux and Athenaeus have written full discussions in its praise. In our own age it is much sought after in those countries, as in all civilized commonwealths, as Alexander ab Alexandro has demonstrated at length in book 4, chapter 10, and book 2, chapter 25. Even among the barbarians nothing is more prized; the whole world approves it.[9606]
Source page 494 [9607]Divitias contemno tuas, rex Crœse, tuamque Vendo Asiam, unguentis, flore, mero, Choreis.	I scorn your wealth, King Croesus, and would sell Your Asia for perfumes, flowers, wine and dances.[9608]

[9602] Burton. Printed page 493, asterisk: "Lib. 1. cap. 11." Book 1, chapter 11.

[9603] Burton. Printed page 494, dagger: "Vit. Epaminondæ." Life of Epaminondas.

[9604] Burton. Printed page 494, asterisk: "Lib. 5." Book 5.

[9605] Burton. Printed page 494, dagger: "Read P. Martyr Ocean Decad. Benzo, Lerius, Hacluit, &c." Read Peter Martyr's Decades of the New World, Benzoni, Léry, Hakluyt, etc.

[9606] Editor. Aemilius Probus is the name under which lives now attributed to Cornelius Nepos circulated; Burton cites the Life of Epaminondas. Its opening contrasts Roman disapproval of dancing with Greek esteem for it, a distinction lost in Burton's general praise. Julius, Pollux are separately punctuated in his list, though Julius Pollux is one author; the source punctuation is preserved. The other wide-ranging references and the claims of universal approval remain for detailed collation. Barbarians is Burton's historical category.

[9607] Burton. Printed page 494, dagger: "Angerianus Erotopædium." Angerianus, Erotopædium, as printed; the precise title form remains for collation.

[9608] Editor. Croesus, the wealthy king of Lydia, stands for immense riches. Burton attributes the couplet to Angerianus and prints the title Erotopædium; exact location and title form remain for verification. The speaker values ordinary pleasures above the king's dominions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9609]Plato in his Common-wealth, will have dancing-schools to be maintained, that young folks might meet, be acquainted, see one another, and be seen; nay more, he would have them dance naked; and scoffs at them that laugh at it.	Plato, in his Republic, would have dancing schools maintained so that young people could meet, become acquainted, see one another and be seen. More than that, he would have them dance naked, and mocks those who laugh at it.[9610]
But Eusebius præpar. Evangel. lib. 13. cap. 11. and Theodoret lib. 9 curat. græc. affect. worthily lash him for it; and well they might: for as one saith, [9611]The very sight of naked parts, causeth enormous, exceeding concupiscences, and stirs up both men and women to burning lust.	But Eusebius, in Preparation for the Gospel, book 13, chapter 11, and Theodoret, in book 9 of his Cure of the Greek Maladies, rightly lash him for it; and well they may. As one writer says, "The very sight of naked parts causes immoderate and excessive desires, and stirs both men and women to burning lust."[9612]
There is a mean in all things: this is my censure in brief; Dancing is a pleasant recreation of body and mind, if sober and modest, (such as our Christian dances are) if tempestively used; a furious motive to burning lust, if as by Pagans heretofore, unchastely abused. But I proceed.	There is a proper measure in everything. This is my judgment in brief: dancing is a pleasant recreation for body and mind when it is sober and modest, as our Christian dances are, and practised at the proper time; but it is a fierce incitement to burning lust when unchastely abused, as it once was by the pagans. But I proceed.

[9609] Burton. Printed page 494, m: "10. Leg. τῆς γὰρ τοιαὐτης σπουδῆς ἕνεκα, &c. hujus causa oportuit disciplinam constitui, ut tam pueri quam puellæ choreas celebrent, spectenturque, ac spectent, &c." Laws, book 10: "For the sake of such a serious purpose," etc. "For this reason a system of education should be established, so that boys and girls alike take part in dances, be seen and see," etc. The abbreviated opening Greek and the book number are retained as printed; compare the editorial note.

[9610] Editor. The meeting and dancing passage is in Plato, Laws 6.771e–772a, rather than the body's Republic or the margin's book 10. Laws qualifies the permitted exposure by age, occasion and modesty. The ridicule of those who laugh at naked exercise belongs to a related argument in Republic 5, also quoted by Eusebius. Burton combines these arguments.

[9611] Burton. Printed page 494, n: "Aspectus enim nudorum corporum tam mares quam fœminas irritare solet ad enormes lasciviæ appetitus." "For the sight of naked bodies commonly arouses both men and women to excessive lustful desires."

[9612] Editor. Eusebius, Preparation for the Gospel 13.19 in Gifford's translation, quotes Plato on mixed exercise and dancing, including Laws 6; 13.11 instead discusses honouring the righteous dead. Burton's chapter 11 is retained, with this numbering discrepancy recorded. His edition and the Theodoret parallel remain uncollated. Enormous means beyond due measure; concupiscence is strong, especially sexual, desire. The closing censure is Burton's judgment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If these allurements do not take place, for [9613]Simierus, that great master of dalliance shall not behave himself better, the more effectually to move others, and satisfie their lust, they will swear and lye, promise, protest, forge, counterfeit, brag, bribe, flatter and dissemble of all sides.	If these enticements fail—for even Simierus, that great master of dalliance, could do no better—they will swear and lie, promise, protest, fabricate, counterfeit, boast, bribe, flatter and dissemble on every side, to move others more effectively and satisfy their own lust.[9614]
Twas Lucrecia's counsel in Aretine, Si vis amicâ frui, promitte, finge, jura, perjura, jacta, simula, mentire, and they put it well in practice, as Apollo to Daphne,	It was Lucretia's advice in Aretino: "If you wish to enjoy your mistress, promise, invent, swear, forswear yourself, boast, pretend and lie." And they put it thoroughly into practice, as Apollo did with Daphne:[9615]
—— [9616]mihi Delphica tellus Et Claros & Tenedos, Patareaq; regia servit, Jupiter est genitor ——	The land of Delphi serves me, And Claros, Tenedos and the palace of Patara; Jupiter is my father.[9617]
Delphos, Claros and Tenedos serve me, And Jupiter is known my Sire to be.	Delphi, Claros and Tenedos serve me, And Jupiter is known to be my father.
The poorest swaines will do as much;[9618]	The poorest country lads will do as much:

[9613] Burton. Printed page 494, asterisk: "Camden Annal. Anno 1578 fol. 276 Amatorius facetus & illecebris exquisitissimus." Camden, Annals, under 1578, folio 276. "Witty in love and exquisitely skilled in enticements."

[9614] Editor. Take place means succeed. The awkward for-clause is read as a parenthesis: even the celebrated courtier Simierus could not surpass these arts. Burton's Camden citation associates the name with courtly love; its exact page and wording remain uncollated. The modern punctuation makes the sentence legible without changing its sequence of claims.

[9615] Editor. Lucretia belongs to the sexually satirical dialogue tradition Burton cites under Aretino, mediated elsewhere in his notes by Latin versions. This is advice spoken by a literary character. The exact Italian and Latin locations of the several Lucretia passages in this block remain to be collated.

[9616] Burton. Printed page 494, dagger: "Met. 1. Ovid." Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 1.

[9617] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.515–517. Apollo boasts of his places of worship and divine parentage while pursuing Daphne. Burton's English couplet omits Patara; both the Latin quotation and his shorter English version are retained and modernized separately.

[9618] Burton. Printed page 494, asterisk: "Erasmus egl. mille mei Siculis errant in montibus agni." Erasmus, eclogue. "A thousand lambs of mine roam on the Sicilian mountains."

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9619]Mille pecus nivei sunt & mihi vallibus agni.	I too have a flock of a thousand snow-white lambs in the valleys.[9620]
I have a thousand sheep, good store of cattle, and they are all at her command,	I have a thousand sheep, a good stock of cattle, and they are all at her command:
[9621]Tibi nos, tibi nostra supellex, Ruraq; servierint ——	I, my household goods, And my lands will be at your service.[9622]
house, land, goods, are at her service, as he is himself. Dinomachus, a Senators Son in [9623]Lucian, in love with a wench inferior to him in birth and fortunes, the sooner to accomplish his desire, wept unto her, and swore he loved her with all his heart, and her alone; and that as soon as ever his father died (a very rich man and almost decrepit) he would make her his wife.	House, land and goods are at her service, as he is himself. Dinomachus, a senator's son in Lucian, was in love with a girl beneath him in birth and fortune. To achieve his desire more quickly, he wept before her and swore that he loved her with all his heart, and her alone; and that as soon as his father died—a very rich man, almost decrepit —he would make her his wife.[9624]

[9619] Burton. Printed page 494, asterisk: "Virg." Virgil.

[9620] Editor. The body prints pecus, which is awkward beside the plural lambs; the translation supplies the sense of a flock. The Erasmus marginal line closely resembles Virgil, Eclogue 2.21, where the lambs are feminine agnae and the possessive is meae. The following body line also recalls the pastoral boast, but has not been established here as a verbatim Virgil quotation. Both separate marginal attributions are preserved.

[9621] Burton. Printed page 494, dagger: "Lecheus." The abbreviated attribution is retained; the precise poem remains uncollated.

[9622] Editor. Lecheus is Burton's sole attribution. The precise authorial form and location await collation. Supellex means household goods or furnishings; rura, country lands.

[9623] Burton. Printed page 494, a: "Tom. 4. merit. dial. amare se jurat & lachrimatur dicitq; uxorem me ducere velle, quum pater oculos clausisset." Volume 4, Dialogues of Courtesans. "He swears that he loves me and weeps, and says that he wishes to marry me when his father has closed his eyes."

[9624] Editor. Lucian, Dialogues of Courtesans 7, supplies the promise of marriage after a father's death and the mother's warning about a wealthy bride. In the Fowler translation the lover is Chaereas, son of Laches the Areopagite and Dinomache; Burton calls him Dinomachus. Musarium still defends him at the end: the dialogue does not say that she abandons the affair. Burton's names and ending are retained; his Latin intermediary remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 494–495 The maid by chance made her Mother acquainted with the business, who being an old fox, well experienced in such matters, told her daughter, now ready to yield to his desire, that he meant nothing less, for dost thou think he will ever care for thee, being a poor wench, [9625]that may have his choice of all the beauties in the City, one noble by birth, with so many talents, as yong, better qualified, and fairer then thy self? Daughter beleeve him not: the maid was abasht, & so the matter broke off.	The girl happened to tell her mother about it. An old fox, well versed in such matters, her mother told her daughter, who was now ready to yield to his desire, that he had no such intention. “Do you think he will ever care for you, a poor girl, when he can choose from all the beauties in the city: someone nobly born, with so many talents for her dowry, as young as you, better accomplished and more beautiful? Daughter, do not believe him.” The girl was disconcerted, and so the affair came to an end.[9626]
Source page 495 When Jupiter woed Juno first (Lilius Giraldus relates it out of an old Comment on Theocritus) the better to effect his sute, he turned himself into a Cuckow, and spying her one day walking alone, separated from the other Goddesses, caused a tempest suddenly to arise, for fear of which she fled to shelter: Jupiter to avoid the storm likewise flew into her lap, in virginis Junonis gremium devolavit, whom Juno for pitty covered in her [9627]Apron.	When Jupiter first courted Juno—as Lilius Giraldus relates from an old commentary on Theocritus—he turned himself into a cuckoo to advance his suit. Seeing her one day walking alone, apart from the other goddesses, he suddenly raised a storm, which frightened her into seeking shelter. Jupiter too flew into her lap to escape the storm: “he flew down into the maiden Juno’s lap.” Out of pity, Juno covered him with her apron.[9628]

[9625] Burton. Printed page 494, b: “Quum dotem alibi multo majorem aspiciet, &c.” “When he sees a much larger dowry elsewhere,” and so on.

[9626] Editor. Talents are ancient units of money, here a dowry, not personal abilities. Better qualified refers to accomplishments or other advantages. Meant nothing less means that he had no intention of doing what he promised; abasht, disconcerted or put out.

[9627] Burton. Printed page 495, dagger: “Or upper garment. Quem Juno miserata veste contexit.” “Juno, pitying him, covered him with her garment.”

[9628] Editor. Lilius Giraldus is Lilio Gregorio Giraldi. Burton expressly gives the story at second hand from a commentary on Theocritus. The apron is clarified by his own note as an outer garment. The precise commentary passage and the form Telia remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But he turned himself forthwith into his own shape, began to embrace and offer violence unto her, sed illa matris metu abnuebat, but she by no means would yield, donec pollicitus Connubium obtinuit, till he vowed and swore to marry her, and then she gave consent. This fact was done at Thorax hill, which ever after was called Cuckow hill, and in perpetuall remembrance, there was a Temple erected to Telia Juno in the same place. So powerfull are fair promises, vows, oaths and protestations.	But he immediately resumed his own shape, began to embrace her and attempted to force himself on her. “But she refused, for fear of her mother”: she would not yield at all, “until he gained his end by promising marriage.” He vowed and swore to marry her, and then she consented. This happened on Mount Thorax, afterwards always called Cuckoo Hill; and a temple to Juno Telia was erected there to commemorate it for ever. Such is the power of fair promises, vows, oaths and protestations.[9629]

[9629] Editor. Offer violence means attempt sexual force. The Latin explicitly gives fear of her mother as Juno’s reason for refusing, a detail absent from Burton’s ensuing English paraphrase. Both statements are retained. Fact here means deed or occurrence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It is an ordinary thing too in this case to belie their age, which widdows usually do, that mean to marry again, and batchelours too sometimes,	In these circumstances it is also common to lie about one's age, as widows usually do when they mean to marry again, and sometimes bachelors too:
[9630]Cujus octavum trepidavit ætas, cernere lustrum;	Whose age has trembled to behold Its eighth five-year span.[9631]
to say they are younger then they are. Carmides in the said Lucian loved Philematium, an old maid of 45. years, [9632]she swore to him she was but 32. next December. But to dissemble in this kind, is familiar of all sides, and often it takes.	They say they are younger than they are. Charmides, in the same Lucian, loved Philematium, an unmarried woman of forty-five; she swore to him that she would be only thirty-two next December. But such deception is common on all sides, and often succeeds.[9633]
[9634]Fallere credentem res est operosa puellam,	To deceive a trusting girl is a laborious business.[9635]
'tis soon done, no such great mastery,	It is soon done, no great feat:
Egregiam verò laudem, & spolia ampla, ——	Splendid praise indeed, and rich spoils![9636]

[9630] Burton. Printed page 495, asterisk: "Hor." Horace.

[9631] Editor. Horace, Odes 2.4.23–24, has claudere lustrum, to complete a five-year period, where Burton prints cernere, to see it. The eighth lustrum points to forty years. Horace speaks of his own age; Burton transfers the lines to people misrepresenting theirs.

[9632] Burton. Printed page 495, c: "Dejeravit illa secundum supra trigesimum ad proximum Decembrem completuram se esse." "She swore that she would complete her thirty-second year next December."

[9633] Editor. Lucian, Dialogues of Courtesans 11: Charmides and Tryphaena discuss Philematium. The consulted text gives her claim as twenty-two on her next birthday, against an alleged actual age of forty-five. Burton's thirty-two and next December, supported by his Latin margin, are retained.

[9634] Burton. Printed page 495, dagger: "Ovid." Ovid.

[9635] Editor. The 1651 text prints res est operosa, "is a laborious business," but Burton's immediate English says the opposite. Ovid, Heroides 2.63–64, reads non est operosa … gloria: deceiving a trusting girl is no difficult glory. The original column preserves Burton's printed words; their literal translation is followed by his contradictory English gloss.

[9636] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.93: Juno sarcastically congratulates Venus on overcoming one woman, Dido. The fragment is similarly ironic here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And nothing so frequent as to bely their estates, to prefer their suites, and to advance themselves. Many men to fetch over a young woman, widdows, or whom they love, will not stick to crack, forge and fain any thing comes next, bid his boy fetch his cloak, rapier, gloves, jewels, &c. in such a chest, scarlet-golden-tissue breeches, &c. when there is no such matter;	Nothing is more common than lying about their wealth to further their courtship and improve their standing. To take in a young woman, a widow, or whoever they love, many men will not hesitate to boast, fabricate and invent whatever comes to mind: telling the servant boy to fetch his cloak, rapier, gloves, jewels and so on from such-and-such a chest, his scarlet breeches of cloth of gold, and so forth, when none of these things exists.[9637]
or make any scruple to give out, as he did in Petronius, that he was master of a ship, kept so many servants, and to personate their part the better, take upon them to be gentlemen of good houses, well descended and allied, hire apparell at brokers, some Scavinger or pricklouse Tailors to attend upon them for the time, swear they have great possessions, [9638]bribe, lye, cog, and foist how dearly they love, how bravely they will maintain her, like any Lady, Countess, Dutchess, or Queen; they shall have gowns, tiers, jewels, coaches, and caroches, choice diet,	Nor will they scruple to announce, like the fellow in Petronius, that they own a ship and keep so many servants. To play their part better, they pretend to be gentlemen of good families, well born and well connected; hire clothes from secondhand dealers and some street cleaner or louse-stabbing tailors to attend them for the occasion; swear they have great estates; bribe, lie, cheat and pass off their stories of how dearly they love her and how magnificently they will keep her, like any lady, countess, duchess or queen. She shall have gowns, headdresses, jewels, coaches and carriages, and the finest food:[9639]

[9637] Editor. Fetch over means trick or take in; crack, boast; estate, wealth or property. Tissue is a rich fabric woven with gold or silver thread. Burton shifts loosely between singular and plural in the feigned instructions to a servant.

[9638] Burton. Printed page 495, d: “Nam donis vincitur omnis amor. Catullus 1. el. 5.” “For every love is conquered by gifts.” Catullus, book 1, elegy 5, as printed; the line is Tibullus 1.5.60.

[9639] Editor. Pricklouse derides a tailor’s needle as piercing lice. Cog and foist mean cheat and pass off falsehoods; tiers are headdresses, caroches large carriages. Compare Petronius, Satyricon 117: Eumolpus and his companions stage a wealthy master and servants to exploit legacy-hunters at Croton, inventing African estates and losses in a shipwreck. This is a close parallel for pretended wealth, not a verified match for Burton’s shipowner detail. The gifts line is Tibullus 1.5.60, despite Catullus in the margin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The heads of Parrats, tongues of Nightingals. The brains of Peacocks, and of Estriches, Their bath shall be the juyce of Gilliflowres, Spirit of Roses, and of Violets, The milk of Unicorns, &c.	The heads of parrots, tongues of nightingales, The brains of peacocks and of ostriches; Their bath shall be the juice of gillyflowers, Essence of roses and of violets, The milk of unicorns, and so on.[9640]
as old Vulpone courted Cælia in the [9641]Comœdy, when as they are no such men, not worth a groat, but meer sharkers, to make a fortune, to get their desire, or else pretend love to spend their idle hours, to be more welcome, and for better entertainment. The conclusion is, they mean nothing less,	So old Volpone courted Celia in the comedy. In reality these men are nothing of the sort, not worth a groat, merely swindlers seeking a fortune or the fulfilment of their desires. Or they pretend to be in love to fill their idle hours, make themselves more welcome and secure better hospitality. The upshot is that they have no intention of keeping their promises:
Source page 496 [9642]Nil metuunt jurare, nihil promittere curant: Sed simulac cupidæ mentis satiata libido est, Dicta nihil metuere, nihil perjuria curant.	They fear no oath, take no care over what they promise; But once the lust of their eager mind is satisfied, They fear nothing for their words and care nothing for perjury.[9643]
Oathes, vows, promises, are much protested; But when their minde and lust is satisfied, Oathes, vows, promises, are quite neglected.	Oaths, vows and promises are loudly declared; But once their mind and lust are satisfied, Oaths, vows and promises are quite forgotten.

[9640] Editor. Ben Jonson, Volpone, act 3, in the scene with Celia. Burton combines portions of the speech, changes the pronouns and omits intervening lines; scene divisions differ from his citation. Gillyflowers are fragrant cultivated flowers, especially carnations or pinks. The extravagant unicorn milk is part of the fictional seducer's promised luxury.

[9641] Burton. Printed page 495, e: "Fox. act. 3. sc. 3." Ben Jonson, The Fox, act 3, scene 3, as cited by Burton.

[9642] Burton. Printed page 496, p: "Catullus." Catullus.

[9643] Editor. Catullus 64.146–148, from Ariadne's lament. The checked Latin reads parcunt, "they refrain," rather than Burton's curant, "they care," in the first line, and has other minor verbal differences. The translation follows Burton's wording and context: they take no care over the promises they make. His separate English triplet follows.

Original text 1651	Modern English
though he solemnly swear by the Genius of Cæsar, by Venus shrine, Hymens deity, by Jupiter, and all the other gods, give no credit to his words. For when Lovers swear, Venus laughs, Venus hæc perjuria ridet, [9644]Jupiter himself smiles, and pardons it withall, as grave [9645]Plato gives out, of all perjury, that alone for love matters is forgiven by the gods.	Though he solemnly swears by Caesar's guardian spirit, by Venus's shrine, by Hymen's divinity, by Jupiter and all the other gods, put no trust in his words. For when lovers swear, Venus laughs: "Venus laughs at these false oaths." Jupiter himself smiles and pardons them too, as the solemn Plato declares: of all perjury, only that committed in matters of love is forgiven by the gods.[9646]
If promises, lies, oathes, and protestations will not avail, they fall to bribes, tokens, gifts, and such like feates. [9647]Plurimus auro conciliatur amor: as Jupiter corrupted Danae with a golden shower, and Liber Ariadne with a lovely Crown, (which was afterwards translated into the heavens, and there for ever shines;) they will rain Chickins, Florens, Crowns, Angels, all maner of coines and stamps in her lap.	If promises, lies, oaths and protestations do not work, they turn to bribes, tokens, gifts and similar devices. "Much love is won by gold." As Jupiter seduced Danae with a shower of gold, and Liber won Ariadne with a beautiful crown—which was afterwards raised into the heavens, where it shines for ever—so they will shower sequins, florins, crowns, angels, coins of every kind and stamp, into her lap.[9648]

[9644] Burton. Printed page 496, q: "Perjuria ridet amantum Jupiter, & ventos irrita ferre jubet, Tibul. lib. 3. & 6." "Jupiter laughs at lovers' perjury and bids the winds carry their idle oaths away." Tibullus, book 3 and 6, as printed; compare 3.6.49–50.

[9645] Burton. Printed page 496, e: "In Philebo. pejerantibus his dii soli ignoscunt." In the Philebus. "The gods pardon these perjurers alone." The attribution to this dialogue is retained; compare the Symposium.

[9646] Editor. Genius is a guardian spirit; Hymen is the marriage god. The lovers' exemption from ordinary oaths appears in Plato's Symposium 183b, in Pausanias's account, rather than the Philebus named in Burton's margin. The Jupiter couplet is in the Tibullan collection, 3.6.49–50; Burton's "lib. 3. & 6." is retained as printed.

[9647] Burton. Printed page 496, r: "Catul." Catullus, as printed; compare Ovid, Art of Love 2.277–278.

[9648] Editor. The gold maxim condenses Ovid, Art of Love 2.277–278, despite Catul. in the margin. Liber is Bacchus; the crown of Ariadne becomes a constellation. Chickins are sequins, Italian gold coins; florins, crowns and angels are also coins. The modern text keeps the punning passage from mythical gold to actual money.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And so must he certainly do that will speed, make many feasts, banquets, invitations, send her some present or other every foot. Summo studio parentur epulæ (saith [9649]Hædus) & crebræ fiant largitiones, he must be very bountiful and liberal, seek and sue, not to her onely, but to all her followers, friends, familiars, fidlers, panders, parasites, and houshold servants; he must insinuate himself, and surely will, to all, of all sorts, messengers, porters, carriers; no man must be unrewarded, or unrespected.	And this, certainly, is what a man must do if he means to succeed: give many feasts and banquets, issue invitations, send her some present or other at every turn. "Let feasts be prepared with the greatest care," says Haedus, "and gifts be frequent." He must be most generous and liberal, paying court not only to her but to all her attendants, friends, intimates, fiddlers, panders, hangers-on and household servants. He must ingratiate himself—and certainly will—with everyone of every sort: messengers, porters and carriers. Nobody must go unrewarded or unacknowledged.[9650]
I had a suiter (saith [9651]Aretine's Lucretia) that when he came to my house, flung gold and silver about, as if it had bin chaff. Another suiter I had was a very cholerick fellow; but I so handled him, that for all his fuming, I brought him upon his knees: If there had been an excellent bit in the market, any novelty, fish, fruit, or fowl, muskadel, or malmesey, or a cup of neat wine in all the city, it was presented presently to me, though never so dear, hard to come by, yet I had it: the poor fellow was so fond at last, that I think if I would I might have had one of his eyes out of his head.	"I had a suitor," says Aretino's Lucretia, "who used to fling gold and silver about my house as if it were chaff. Another suitor of mine was a very hot-tempered fellow; but I managed him so well that, for all his blustering, I brought him to his knees. If there was a fine morsel in the market, any novelty, fish, fruit or fowl, muscatel or malmsey, or a cup of unmixed wine anywhere in the city, it was brought to me at once. However expensive or difficult to obtain, I had it. In the end the poor fellow was so infatuated that I believe I could have had one of his eyes out of his head if I had wanted it."[9652]

[9649] Burton. Printed page 496, f: "Lib. 1. de contemnendis amoribus." Book 1 of On Despising Love.

[9650] Editor. Hædus is Petrus Haedus; his title means On Despising Love. Every foot means continually or at every turn. Parasites are dependent flatterers and hangers-on. The precise passage in Haedus has not been collated.

[9651] Burton. Printed page 496, g: "Dial. Ital. argentum ut paleas projiciebat. Biliosum habui amatorem qui supplex flexis genibus, &c. Nullus recens allatus terræ fructus, nullum cupediarum genus tam carum erat, nullum vinum Creticum pretiosum, quin ad me ferret illico; credo alterum oculum pignori daturus, &c." Italian dialogue. "He threw silver about like chaff. I had a bilious lover who, kneeling as a suppliant," and so on. "No newly brought fruit of the earth, no sort of delicacy was so dear, no Cretan wine so costly, that he would not bring it to me immediately; I believe he would have pledged one of his eyes," and so on.

[9652] Editor. Cholerick means hot-tempered, with the humoral association of yellow bile. Muskadel and malmesey are muscatel and malmsey wines; neat means unmixed. Fond means foolishly infatuated. The next suitor's kingdom for her virginity is present in the Latin and is retained alongside Burton's looser English promise of his whole estate.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A third suiter was a Merchant of Rome, and his manner of woing was with [9653]exquisite musick, costly banquets, poems, &c. I held him off till at length he protested, promised, and swore pro virginitate regno me donaturum, I should have all he had, house, goods and lands, pro concubitu solo: [9654]Neither was there ever any Conjurer I think, to charm his spirits that used such attention, or mighty words, as he did exquisite phrases; or General of any army, so many stratagems to win a city, as he did tricks and devices to get the love of me.	"A third suitor was a Roman merchant, who courted me with exquisite music, costly banquets, poems and so on. I held him off until at last he protested, promised and swore 'that he would give me a kingdom for my virginity': I should have everything he owned, house, goods and lands, 'merely for sleeping with him.' No conjurer, I think, ever used such concentration or powerful words to charm his spirits as this man used exquisite phrases; nor did any general employ as many stratagems to capture a city as he used tricks and devices to win my love."
Thus men are active and passive, and women not far behind them in this kinde: Audax ad omnia fæmina, quæ vel amat, vel odit.	Thus men both act upon others and are acted upon; and women are not far behind them in this respect: "A woman who loves or hates will dare anything."
[9655]For half so boldly there can non, Swear and lye as women can.	For no man can swear and lie Half as boldly as women can.[9656]
[9657]They will crack, counterfeit and collogue as well as the best, with handkerchiefs, and wrought nightcaps, purses, poses, and such toyes: as he justly complained,	They will boast, counterfeit and flatter as well as anyone, with handkerchiefs, embroidered nightcaps, purses, posies and such trinkets, as the poet justly complained:[9658]

[9653] Burton. Printed page 496, dagger: "Post musicam opiperas epulas, & tantis juramentis, donis, &c." "After music, sumptuous feasts, and with such oaths and gifts," and so on. The compressed wording is retained.

[9654] Burton. Printed page 496, h: "Nunquam aliquis umbrarum conjurator tanta attentione, tamq; potentibus verbis usus est, quam ille exquisitis mihi dictis, &c." "No conjurer of spirits ever used such concentration and such powerful words as he used exquisite speeches to me," and so on.

[9655] Burton. Printed page 496, asterisk: "Chaucer." Geoffrey Chaucer.

[9656] Editor. Chaucer, The Wife of Bath's Prologue, lines 227–228. The speaker is the Wife describing marital tactics; Burton shortens the wording into a general maxim. His non means none, supplied as no man in the modern version.

[9657] Burton. Printed page 496, f: "Ah crudele genus nec tutum fæmina nomen! Tibul. l. 3. eleg. 4." "Ah, cruel race! Woman is no trustworthy name." Tibullus, book 3, elegy 4.

[9658] Editor. Collogue means flatter or speak coaxingly; wrought means embroidered. Poses is retained in the original; the modern reading posies can mean small bouquets or short mottoes and verses used as tokens. The marginal warning about women is in the Tibullan collection, 3.4.61; Burton has tutum, safe, where the consulted text reads fidum, trustworthy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9659]Cur mittis violas? nempe ut violentius urer; Quid violas violis me violenta tuis? &c.	Why send me violets? Surely to make me burn more violently; Why, violent woman, do you violate me with your violets? And so on.[9660]
Source page 497 Why dost thou send me Violets my dear? To make me burn more violent I fear; With Violets too violent thou art, To violate and wound my gentle heart.	Why send me violets, my dear? To make me burn more fiercely, I fear; With violets you are too violent, Violating and wounding my tender heart.
When nothing else will serve, the last refuge is their tears. Hæc scripsi (testor amorem) mixta lachrymis & suspiriis, 'twixt tears and sighs, I write this (I take love to witness) saith [9661]Chelidonia to Philonius. Lumina quæ modò fulmina, jam flumina lachrymarum, those burning torches are now turn'd to floods of tears.	When nothing else will do, their last resort is tears. "I wrote these words mingled with tears and sighs—I call Love to witness": "Amid tears and sighs I write this, taking Love as my witness," says Chelidonia to Philonius. "Eyes that just now were lightning bolts are now rivers of tears": those blazing torches have now turned into floods of tears.[9662]

[9659] Burton. Printed page 496, dagger: "Jovianus Pon." Giovanni Gioviano Pontano.

[9660] Editor. Pontano's Latin plays on violas, violets, violentius, more violently, and violas, you violate. The printed urer is retained; the sense calls for urar, "I may be burned." The exact poem and reading await collation. Burton's English quatrain separately pursues the same repeated sounds.

[9661] Burton. Printed page 497, asterisk: "Aristænetus lib. 2. epist. 13." Aristaenetus, book 2, letter 13.

[9662] Editor. Burton cites Aristaenetus 2.13. His Latin contrasts fulmina, lightning bolts, with flumina, rivers: a sound-play that the literal translation brings out, alongside his own image of burning torches. The exact letter wording and names remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Aretines Lucretia, when her sweet heart came to town [9663]wept in his bosome, that he might be perswaded those tears were shed for joy of his return. Quartilla in Petronius when nought would move, fell a weeping, and as Balthazar Castilio paints them out, [9664]To these Crocodiles tears, they will add sobs, fiery sighs, and sorrowfull countenance, pale colour, leanness, and if you do but stir abroad, these fiends are ready to meet you at every turn, with such a sluttish neglected habit, dejected look, as if they were now ready to dye for your sake; and how saith he, shall a yong novice thus beset, escape? But beleeve them not.	When her sweetheart came to town, Aretino's Lucretia "wept on his breast, so that he would believe her tears were shed for joy at his return." Quartilla in Petronius, when nothing else would move him, began to weep. As Baldassare Castiglione describes them: "To these crocodile tears they add sobs, burning sighs, a sorrowful expression, pallor and wasting. If you so much as venture outside, these fiends are ready to meet you at every turn, so slovenly and neglected in their dress, so downcast in their looks, as though they were about to die for your sake. How," he asks, "is a young novice, beset like this, to escape?" But do not believe them.[9665]
—— [9666]animam ne crede puellis, Namque est fæmineâ tutior unda fide.	Do not entrust your life to girls, For the waves are safer than a woman's faith.[9667]

[9663] Burton. Printed page 497, dagger: "Suaviter flebam, ut persuasum habeat lachrymas præ gaudio illius reditus mihi emanare." "I wept sweetly, so that he would believe my tears were flowing for joy at his return."

[9664] Burton. Printed page 497, u: "Lib. 3. his accedunt, vultus subtristis, color pallidus, gemebunda vox, ignita suspiria, lachrymæ prope innumerabiles. Istæ se statim umbræ offerunt tanto squalore & in omni fere diverticulo tanta macie, ut illas jamjam moribundas putes." Book 3. "Added to these are a rather sorrowful expression, a pale complexion, a moaning voice, burning sighs, almost innumerable tears. These ghosts immediately present themselves in such squalor, and in almost every byway so emaciated, that you would think them at the point of death."

[9665] Editor. Quartilla's tears occur in Petronius, Satyricon 17. Castilio is Baldassare Castiglione, author of The Book of the Courtier. Burton's long English passage and Latin margin overlap but are not identical. Sluttish here means slovenly in dress, rather than the modern sexual insult; habit means clothing.

[9666] Burton. Printed page 497, asterisk: "Petronius." Petronius; the precise verse attribution remains uncollated.

[9667] Editor. The lines correspond to the opening couplet of Anthologia Latina 268 in Riese's numbering, printed among Pentadius's epigrams in the Latin text quoted by Luca Mondin. That text reads animum, heart or mind, where Burton has animam, life or soul, and includes an opening comparison with entrusting a ship to winds. Burton's Petronius attribution is retained; his immediate source and the attribution history remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Thou thinkest peradventure because of her vows, tears, smiles, and protestations, she is solely thine, thou hast her heart, hand, and affection, when as indeed there is no such matter, as the [9668]Spanish Bawd said, gaudet illa habere unum in lecto, alterum in portâ, tertium qui domi suspiret, she will have one sweet heart in bed, another in the gate, a third sighing at home, a fourth &c. Every yong man she sees and likes hath as much interest, and shall as soon injoy her as thy self.	Perhaps her vows, tears, smiles and protestations make you think she is yours alone, that you possess her heart, hand and affection, when in fact nothing of the sort is true. As the Spanish Bawd said, "She delights in having one man in bed, another at the door, a third sighing at home": one sweetheart in bed, another at the gate, a third sighing at home, a fourth, and so on. Every young man she sees and likes has as much of a claim, and will enjoy her as readily as you.[9669]
On the other side, which I have said, men are as false, let them swear, protest, and lye;	On the other hand, as I have said, men are just as false, for all their swearing, protesting and lying:
[9670]Quod vobis dicunt, dixerunt mille puellis.	What they tell you, they have told a thousand girls.[9671]
They love some of them those eleven thousand Virgins at once, and make them believe each particular, he is besotted on her, or love one till they see another, and then her alone: like Milo's wife in Apuleius, lib. 2. Si quem conspexerit speciosæ formæ juvenem, venustate ejus sumitur, & in eum animum intorquet.	Some of them love all those eleven thousand virgins at once, making each one believe he is besotted with her; or they love one until they see another, and then her alone, like Milo's wife in Apuleius, book 2: "If she catches sight of a handsome young man, his beauty captivates her, and she turns her passion upon him."[9672]

[9668] Burton. Printed page 497, dagger: "Cælestina act. 7. Barthio interpret. omnibus arridet, & à singulis amari se solam dicit." Celestina, act 7, in Barth's translation. "She smiles on everyone, and says to each that she alone is loved." The compressed Latin and Burton's separate paraphrase are both retained.

[9669] Editor. The Spanish Bawd is Celestina, the procurer of the Spanish work associated with Fernando de Rojas, cited through Caspar Barth's Latin version. Burton's note specifies act 7. Interest here means a share or claim. His recurrent generalizations belong to the passage's satirical argument about both sexes.

[9670] Burton. Printed page 497, x: "Ovid." Ovid.

[9671] Editor. Ovid, Art of Love 3.435. The consulted Latin begins Quae, whereas Burton prints Quod; the sense is unchanged. Ovid addresses women with a warning about habitual seducers.

[9672] Editor. The eleven thousand virgins evoke the traditional companions of Saint Ursula, used as an extravagant number. Milo's wife is Pamphile in Apuleius, Metamorphoses 2.5; the quoted Latin compresses the description of her susceptibility to handsome young men.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis their common complement in that case, they care not what they swear, say, or do. One while they slight them, care not for them, rail down right and scoffe at them, and then again they will run mad, hang themselves, stab and kill, if they may not injoy them. Henceforth therefore,	This is their usual form of courtship in such cases; they do not care what they swear, say or do. At one moment they slight the women, take no interest in them, abuse them outright and mock them; at the next, they will go mad, hang themselves, stab and kill if they cannot have them. Henceforth, therefore,

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— nulla viro juranti fæmina credat,	Let no woman trust a man who swears.[9673]
let not maids believe them. These tricks and counterfeit passions are more familiar with women, [9674]finem hic dolori faciet aut vitæ dies, miserere amantis, quoth Phædra to Hippolitus.	Let young women not believe them. These tricks and feigned passions are more common among women: "This day will end either my sorrow or my life; have pity on one who loves you," said Phaedra to Hippolytus.[9675]
Joessa in [9676]Lucian, told Pythius a yong man, to move him the more, that if he would not have her, she was resolv'd to make away her self. There is a Nemesis, and it cannot chuse but grieve and trouble thee, to hear that I have either strangled or drowned my self for thy sake.	Joessa in Lucian told a young man, Pythius, to move him more deeply, that if he would not have her she was determined to kill herself. "There is a Nemesis, and you cannot help feeling grief and distress when you hear that I have hanged or drowned myself for your sake."[9677]

[9673] Editor. Catullus 64.143, again from Ariadne's speech after Theseus has abandoned her. Burton moves from men's threats and promises to women's feigned distress, transferring particular literary speeches into general claims.

[9674] Burton. Printed page 497, asterisk: "Seneca Hippol." Seneca, Hippolytus, the tragedy now usually called Phaedra.

[9675] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 670–671. Phaedra addresses her stepson Hippolytus. Burton's note calls the play Hippolytus, an alternative title. The threat is part of the dramatic character's attempt to obtain his pity.

[9676] Burton. Printed page 497, y: "Tom. 4. dial. merit. tu vero aliquando mœrore afficieris ubi audieris me à meipsa laqueo tui causa suffocatam aut in puteum præcipitatam." Volume 4, Dialogues of Courtesans. "You, indeed, will one day grieve when you hear that for your sake I have hanged myself or thrown myself into a well."

[9677] Editor. Lucian, Dialogues of Courtesans 12. Joessa addresses Lysias; Pythias is the other female speaker. Burton's Pythius, described as a young man, appears to confuse these names. The retelling is retained. Nemesis is the divine power of retribution invoked against the unresponsive lover.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 497–498 Nothing so common to this sexe, as oaths, vows, and protestations, and as I have already said, tears, which they have at command; for they can so weep, that one would think their very hearts were dissolved within them, and would come out in tears, their eys are like rocks, which still drop water, diariæ lachrymæ & sudoris in modum turgeri promptæ, saith [9678]Aristænetus, they wipe away their tears like sweat, weep with one eye, laugh with the other; or as children [9679]weep and cry, they can both together.	Nothing is more common among this sex than oaths, vows and protestations, and, as I have already said, tears, which they can produce at will. They can weep so much that you would think their very hearts had dissolved within them and were pouring out in tears. Their eyes are like rocks that continually drip water: “daily tears, ready to be wiped away like sweat,” says Aristaenetus. They wipe their tears away like sweat, weep with one eye and laugh with the other; or, like children weeping and crying, they can do both together.[9680]
Source page 498 [9681]Neve puellarum lachrymis moveare memento, Ut flerent oculos erudîêre suos.	Remember not to be moved by girls’ tears; They have trained their eyes to weep.[9682]
Care not for womens tears, I counsel thee, They teach their eys as much to weep as see.	Pay no heed to women’s tears, I advise you; They teach their eyes as much to weep as to see.
And as much pitty is to be taken of a woman weeping, as of a Goose going bare-foot. When Venus lost her son Cupid, she sent a Cryer about, to bid every one that met him take heed.	You should pity a weeping woman as much as a goose going barefoot. When Venus lost her son Cupid, she sent a crier around to warn everyone who met him to beware:

[9678] Burton. Printed page 498, c: “Epist. 20. l. 2.” Letter 20, book 2.

[9679] Burton. Printed page 498, d: “Matronæ flent duobus oculis, moniales quatuor, virgines uno, meretrices nullo.” “Married women weep with two eyes, nuns with four, maidens with one, prostitutes with none.” The marginal d has no clear matching body marker; it is attached here to the passage on calculated tears.

[9680] Editor. The source prints turgeri, an uncertain form. The modern translation takes it in the sense of tergeri, “to be wiped away,” supported by Burton’s following English gloss; this is an explicit interpretive emendation, not a confirmed reading of Aristaenetus. The unanchored marginal d is preserved here. The final “weep and cry” and “both” remain awkward in the source; no opposite verb has been silently inserted.

[9681] Burton. Printed page 498, y: “Ovid.” Ovid.

[9682] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 689–690. Burton prints memento, “remember,” where the consulted text has caveto, “beware.” His English couplet expands the thought by comparing weeping with seeing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9683]Si flentem aspicias, ne mox fallare, caveto; Sin arridebit, magis effuge; & oscula si fors Ferre volet, fugito; sunt oscula noxia, in ipsis Suntque venena labris, &c.	If you see him weeping, beware of being quickly deceived; If he smiles, flee all the more; and if he happens To offer kisses, run: his kisses are harmful, And poison lies upon his very lips, and so on.[9684]
Take heed of Cupids tears, if cautelous, And of his smiles and kisses I thee tell, If that he offer't, for they be noxious, And very poyson in his lips doth dwell.	If you are prudent, beware Cupid's tears, And his smiles and kisses, I tell you, If he offers them, for they are harmful, And poison itself dwells on his lips.
[9685]A thousand years, as Castilio conceives, will scarce serve to reckon up those allurements and guiles, that men and women use to deceive one another with.	A thousand years, Castiglione thinks, "would scarcely suffice to count all the enticements and tricks that men and women use to deceive one another."

[9683] Burton. Printed page 498, z: "Imagines deorum fol. 332. è Moschi amore fugitivo, quem Politianus Latinum fecit." Images of the Gods, folio 332, from Moschus's Runaway Love, translated into Latin by Poliziano.

[9684] Editor. Moschus, Runaway Love, in the Latin adaptation by Angelo Poliziano cited through Images of the Gods. The Greek poem's closing warning includes feigned tears, laughter, kisses and poison. Burton prints a Latin version and then his own English verse; both remain distinct. Cautelous means cautious or wary.

[9685] Burton. Printed page 498, a: "Lib. 3. mille vix anni sufficerent ad omnes illas machinationes, dolosq; commemorandos, quos viri & mulieres ut se invicem circumveniant, excogitare solent." Book 3. "A thousand years would scarcely suffice to recount all the schemes and tricks that men and women commonly devise to deceive one another."

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 5. Bawds, Philters, causes.	Subsection 5 Procurers and love potions as causes
When all other engines fail, that they can proceed no farther of themselves, their last refuge is to flye to Bawds, Panders, Magical Philters, and receits, rather then fail, to the Divel himself.	When all other devices fail and they can get no further by themselves, their last resort is to turn to bawds, panders, magical love potions and recipes; rather than fail, they turn to the Devil himself.[9686]
Flectere si nequeunt superos, Acheronta movebunt.	If they cannot sway the gods above, they will rouse the world below.[9687]
And by those indirect means many a man is overcome, and precipitated into this malady, if he take not good heed. For these Bawds first, they are every where so common, and so many, that as he said of old Croton, [9688]homines hic aut captantur, aut captant, either inveagle or be inveagled, we may say of most of our Cities, there be so many professed, cunning bawds in them.	By such devious means many a man is overcome and plunged into this malady unless he takes great care. First, these bawds are so common everywhere, and so numerous, that we may say of most of our cities what was said of ancient Croton: “Here people are either hunted or hunting”—either deceiving or being deceived—so many skilful professional bawds do they contain.[9689]
Besides, bawdry is become an art, or a liberal science, as Lucian calls it; and there be such tricks and subtleties, so many nurses, old women, Panders, letter-carriers, beggers, Physitians, Friers, Confessors employed about it, that nullus tradere stilus sufficiat, one saith,	Besides, procuring has become an art, or a liberal science, as Lucian calls it. There are such tricks and subtleties, so many nurses, old women, panders, letter carriers, beggars, physicians, friars and confessors engaged in it, that “no pen could suffice to recount them,” as one writer says:

[9686] Editor. Bawds and panders arrange sexual encounters, commonly for payment; the terms can include intermediaries in seduction as well as prostitution. Philters are love potions; receits are recipes or prescribed preparations. Engines continues the metaphor of stratagems and siege machinery.

[9687] Editor. Adapted from Juno’s words in Virgil, Aeneid 7.312. Burton changes the first-person singular verbs, “if I cannot … I will,” to the plural, “if they cannot … they will.” Acheron is an underworld river and, by extension, the underworld itself.

[9688] Burton. Printed page 498, b: “Petronius.” Petronius.

[9689] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 116, describes Croton as a city of legacy-hunters and the rich people they cultivate. Burton reapplies the image of hunters and prey to sexual procuring. His Lucian attribution in the following passage remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [9690]trecentis versibus Suas impuritias traloqui nemo potest.	In three hundred lines No one could recount their filthy practices.[9691]
Such occult notes, [9692]Stenography, Polygraphy, Nuntius Animatus, or magnetical telling of their minds, which [9693]Cabeus the Jesuit, by the way, counts fabulous and false; cunning conveyances in this kind, that neither Juno's jealousie, nor Danae's custody, nor Argo's vigilancy can keep them safe.	There are such secret signs, stenography, polygraphy, the Animated Messenger, or magnetic communication of their thoughts—which Cabeus the Jesuit, incidentally, considers fictitious and false—and such cunning means of passing messages that neither Juno's jealousy, nor Danae's confinement, nor Argus's vigilance can keep their charges safe.[9694]

[9690] Burton. Printed page 498, dagger: "Plautus." Plautus.

[9691] Editor. Plautus, Persa 410–411, an insult addressed to a pimp. Burton changes tuas, "your," to suas, "their." Three hundred lines is rhetorical abundance, not a literal account promised by Burton.

[9692] Burton. Printed page 498, unmarked marginal entry: "Tritemius." Johannes Trithemius. The unmarked name is placed beside the discussion of secret writing rather than combined with the separate Plautus attribution above it.

[9693] Burton. Printed page 498, dagger: "De Magnet. Philos. lib. 4. cap. 10." On Magnetic Philosophy, book 4, chapter 10.

[9694] Editor. The list concerns secret communication: concealed writing, ciphers, and purported communication by magnetism. Trithemius's unmarked marginal name accompanies stenography and polygraphy. Nuntius Animatus is printed as a title, literally Animated Messenger. Burton attributes the rejection of magnetic communication to Niccolò Cabeo. Precise editions and the title's intended work remain uncollated. Juno, Danae and the many-eyed Argus are examples of jealousy, confinement and watchfulness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 498–499 'Tis the last and common refuge to use an assistant, such as that Catanean Philippa was to Jone Queen of Naples, a [9695]Bawds help, an old woman in the business, as [9696]Myrrha did when she doted on Cyniras, and could not compass her desire, the old Jade her Nurse was ready at a pinch, dic inquit, opemque me sine ferre tibi —— & in hâc mea (pone timorem) Sedulitas erit apta tibi, fear it not, if it be possible to be done, I will effect it:	The last and usual resort is to employ an assistant, as Philippa of Catania was to Joan, Queen of Naples: the help of a bawd, an old woman in the business. So Myrrha did when she doted on Cinyras and could not achieve her desire: that old jade, her nurse, was ready in a pinch. "Tell me," she said, "and let me bring you help; in this my diligence will serve you—put aside your fear." Do not be afraid: if it can be done, I will do it.[9697]
Source page 499 non est mulieri mulier insuperabilis, as [9698]Cælestina said, let him or her be never so honest, watched, and reserved; tis hard but one of these old women will get access: and scarce shall you find, as [9699]Austin observes, in a Nunnery a maid alone, if she cannot have egress, before her window you shall have an old woman, or some prating Gossip tell her some tales of this Clerk, and that Monk, describing or commending some yong Gentleman or other unto her.	"No woman is unconquerable by another woman," as Celestina said. However virtuous, closely watched and reserved a man or woman may be, one of these old women will almost certainly find a way in. As Augustine observes, you will scarcely find a young woman alone in a nunnery: "If she cannot go out, you will find an old woman or some chattering gossip at her window, telling her stories of this cleric or that monk, describing or praising some young gentleman or other to her."[9700]

[9695] Burton. Printed page 499, d: "Catul. eleg. 5. lib. 1. Venit in exitium callida lena meum." Catullus, elegy 5, book 1, as printed. "A cunning bawd has come to my ruin." The line is Tibullus 1.5.48.

[9696] Burton. Printed page 499, e: "Ovid. 10. met." Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 10.

[9697] Editor. The Philippa and Queen Joan reference is left as Burton's historical allegation, not independently confirmed here. Myrrha desires her own father Cinyras in Ovid, Metamorphoses 10; Burton combines the nurse's offers of help, including lines 408–409. His marginal verse is Tibullus 1.5.48, despite the Catullus attribution. Jade is an insult for the old nurse.

[9698] Burton. Printed page 499, dagger: "Parobosc. Barthii." Barth's Pornoboscodidascalus, his Latin version of Celestina; the printed abbreviation is retained.

[9699] Burton. Printed page 499, f: "De vit. Erem. c. 3. ad sororem vix aliquam reclusarum hujus temporis solam invenies, ante cujus fenestram non anus garrula, vel nugigerula mulier sedet, quæ eam fabulis occupet, rumoribus pascat, hujus vel illius monachi, &c." On the Eremitical Life, chapter 3, to a sister. "You will scarcely find any recluse of our time alone without a chattering old woman or a teller of trifles sitting at her window, occupying her with stories and feeding her rumours of this or that monk," and so on.

[9700] Editor. The passage attributed to Austin, or Augustine, is from Aelred of Rievaulx, A Rule of Life for a Recluse, chapter 3, transmitted under the title On the Eremitical Life, to a Sister among works attributed to Augustine. The Latin concerns an enclosed recluse; Burton generalizes it into a young woman in a nunnery. Both the source attribution and this difference are made visible here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As I was walking in the street (saith a good fellow in Petronius) to see the town served one evening, [9701]I spied an old woman in a corner selling of Cabbages and Roots, (as our Hucksters do plums, Apples, and such like fruits;) mother (quoth he) can you tell where I dwell? she being well pleased with my foolish urbanity, replied, and why sir should I not tell? with that she rose up and went before me; I took her for a wise woman, and by and by she led me into a by-lane, and told me there I should dwell; I replyed again I knew not the house; but I perceived on a sudden by the naked queans, that I was now come into a Bawdy house, and then too late I began to curse the treachery of this old Jade.	"As I was walking in the street one evening to see the town's goings-on," says a fellow in Petronius, "I noticed an old woman in a corner selling cabbages and roots"—as our small traders sell plums, apples and similar fruit. "'Mother,' I asked, 'can you tell me where I live?' Pleased with my foolish politeness, she answered, 'And why, sir, should I not?' With that she got up and led the way. I took her for a wise woman; presently she led me into a side street and told me that was where I should live. I replied that I did not recognize the house; but the naked prostitutes suddenly made me realize that I had come into a brothel. Then, too late, I began cursing the treachery of the old jade."[9702]
Such tricks you shall have in many places, and amongst the rest it is ordinary in Venice, and in the Island of Zante, for a man to be Bawd to his own wife. No sooner shall you land or come on shore, but as the Comical Poet hath it,	You will meet such tricks in many places. Among others, it is usual in Venice and on the island of Zante for a man to act as bawd to his own wife. No sooner do you land or come ashore than, as the comic poet puts it,

[9701] Burton. Printed page 499, g: "Agreste olus anus vendebat, & rogo inquam, mater, nunquid scis ubi ego habitem? delectata illa urbanitate tam stulta, & quid nesciam inquit? consurrexitq; & cœpit me præcedere; divinam ego putabam, &c. nudas video meretrices & in lupanar me adductum, sero execratus aniculæ insidias." "An old woman was selling country vegetables. 'Pray, mother,' I said, 'do you know where I live?' Pleased with such foolish politeness, she said, 'Why should I not know?' She rose and began to lead the way; I thought she was a diviner," and so on. "I see naked prostitutes and realize that I have been led into a brothel, cursing the old woman's tricks too late." Burton's compressed and altered Latin is retained.

[9702] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 6–7: Encolpius is lost and asks a vegetable seller for directions. Burton recasts this as an evening walk. His "wise woman" corresponds to divinam, a diviner or woman with uncanny knowledge. Urbanity is politeness or wit; queans here means prostitutes. The unusual "see the town served" is rendered contextually as seeing its goings-on, without claiming a more exact sense.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9703]Morem hunc meretrices habent, Ad portum mittunt servulos, ancillulas, Si qua peregrina navis in portum aderit, Rogant cujatis sit, quod ei nomen siet, Post illæ extemplo sese adplicent.	Prostitutes have this custom: They send servant boys and girls to the harbour; If a foreign ship arrives there, They ask where the newcomer comes from and what his name is; Then the women immediately attach themselves to him.[9704]
These white Divels have their Panders, Bawds and Factors in every place to seek about, and bring in customers, to tempt and way-lay novices, and silly travellers. And when they have them once within their clutches, as Ægidius Maserius in his comment upon Valerius Flaccus describes them, [9705]with promises and pleasant discourse, with gifts, tokens, and taking their opportunities, they lay nets which Lucretia cannot avoid, and baits that Hippolitus himself would swallow; they make such strong assaults and batteries, that the Goddess of Virginity cannot withstand them:	These fair-faced devils have their panders, bawds and agents everywhere, searching for customers and bringing them in, tempting and lying in wait for novices and unsuspecting travellers. Once they have them in their clutches, as Aegidius Maserius describes them in his commentary on Valerius Flaccus, "with promises and pleasant conversation, with gifts and tokens, seizing their opportunities, they lay nets that Lucretia could not escape, and bait that Hippolytus himself would swallow. Their assaults and battering are so powerful that the goddess of virginity herself could not withstand them."[9706]

[9703] Burton. Printed page 499, h: "Plautus Menech." Plautus, Menaechmi.

[9704] Editor. Plautus, Menaechmi 338–342, with alterations in Burton's wording. The questions concern a newly arrived traveller, whose name can then be used to feign acquaintance. The Latin's masculine cujatis points to the person, not the ship. Factors are agents; silly means unsuspecting or inexperienced.

[9705] Burton. Printed page 499, i: "Promissis everberant, molliunt dulciloquiis, & opportunum tempus aucupantes laqueos ingerunt quos vix Lucretia vitare; escam parant quam vel satur Hippolitus sumeret, &c. Hæ sanè sunt virgæ soporiferæ quibus contactæ animæ ad Orcum descendunt; hoc gluten quo compactæ mentium alæ evolare nequeunt, dæmonis ancillæ, quæ sollicitant, &c." "They batter with promises, soften with sweet talk, and, watching for their opportunity, cast snares that even Lucretia could scarcely avoid; they prepare bait that even a sated Hippolytus would take," and so on. "These indeed are the sleep-bringing wands whose touch sends souls down to Orcus; this is the glue that binds the mind's wings so they cannot fly away: servants of the Devil, who entice," and so on. The Latin is elliptical; the full continuation across the foot of the page is included.

[9706] Editor. Maserius is cited as a commentator on Valerius Flaccus; the exact passage remains uncollated. White devils suggests attractive or apparently innocent exteriors. Lucretia and Hippolytus are conventional examples of chastity; the goddess of virginity is Diana. These are exaggerated claims about the procurers' powers, not accounts of those figures' actions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
give gifts, and bribes to move Penelope, and with threats able to terrifie Susanna. How many Proserpina's with those catchpoles doth Pluto take? These are the sleepy rods with which their souls touched descend to hell; this the glew or lime with which the wings of the mind once taken cannot fly away; the Divels ministers to allure, entice, &c. Many yong men and maids without all question are inveagled by these Eumenides and their associates. But these are trivial and well known.	"They give presents and bribes that could sway Penelope, and make threats that could terrify Susanna. How many Proserpinas does Pluto capture with these bailiffs? These are the sleep-inducing wands whose touch sends souls down to hell; this is the glue or birdlime that catches the mind's wings and prevents their escape; these are the Devil's servants, alluring and enticing," and so on. Without question, many young men and women are ensnared by these Furies and their associates. But these things are commonplace and well known.[9707]
Source page 499–500 The most slye, dangerous, and cunning bawds, are your knavish Physitians, Empyricks, Mass-Priests, Monks, [9708]Jesuits, and Friers. Though it be against Hippocrates oath, some of them will give a dram, promise to restore maidenheads, and do it without danger, make an abort if need be, keep down their paps, hinder conception, procure lust, make them able with Satyrions, and now and then step in themselves.	The slyest, most dangerous and most cunning bawds are those rogue physicians, empirics, mass-priests, monks, Jesuits and friars of yours. Though it violates the Hippocratic oath, some of them will administer a drug, promise to restore virginity safely, cause an abortion if necessary, keep the breasts from swelling, prevent conception, arouse lust, improve sexual potency with satyrions, and now and then take a turn themselves.[9709]
Source page 500 No Monastery so close, house so private, or prison so well kept, but these honest men are admitted to censure and ask questions, to feel their pulse, be at their bed side, and all under pretence of giving Physick. Now as for Monks, Confessors, and Friers, as he said,	No monastery is so enclosed, no house so private, no prison so well guarded, that these honest men are not admitted to examine and question people, feel their pulse and attend their bedside, all under the pretence of giving medical treatment. As for monks, confessors and friars, as the poet said,

[9707] Editor. Penelope exemplifies marital fidelity; Susanna resists sexual coercion in the biblical story. Proserpina is the woman carried off by Pluto, ruler of the underworld. Catchpoles are officers who seize people; lime is sticky birdlime. Eumenides, literally the Kindly Ones, is a euphemistic name for the Furies. Burton makes the go-betweens servants of hell.

[9708] Burton. Printed page 500, asterisk: "See the practices of the Jesuits Anglice edit. 1630." See The Practices of the Jesuits, published in English in 1630. The exact edition remains to be identified.

[9709] Editor. Empirics are medical practitioners relying on practical experience, often disparaged as unqualified. Paps means breasts; satyrions are plants or preparations reputed to stimulate sexual desire or potency. Burton's catalogue records accusations and supposed effects, not established medical abilities. His use of mass-priests and the ensuing Jesuit charges places the passage within anti-Catholic polemic.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9710]Non audet Stygius Pluto tentare quod audet Effrenis Monachus, plenaque fraudis anus.	Pluto of the underworld dares not attempt what An unbridled monk and a deceitful old woman dare.[9711]
That Stygian Pluto dares not tempt or do, What an old hag or Monk will undergo:	Pluto of the underworld dares not attempt or do What an old hag or monk will undertake.
Either for himself to satisfie his own lust; for another, if he be hired thereto, or both at once, having such excellent means. For under colour of visitation, auricular confession, comfort and penance, they have free egress and regress, and corrupt God knows how many. They can such trades some of them, practice Physick, use exorcisms, &c.	Whether for himself, to satisfy his own lust, for someone else who hires him, or for both at once, he has such excellent opportunities. Under cover of visitation, private confession, consolation and penance, they may come and go freely, corrupting God knows how many. Some of them know these trades: they practise medicine, perform exorcisms and so on.[9712]
[9713]That whereas was wont to walk an Elf, There now walks the limiter himself, In every bush and under every tree, There needs no other Incubus but he.	Where an elf once used to walk, Now walks the begging friar himself; In every bush and under every tree, No other incubus is needed but he.[9714]

[9710] Burton. Printed page 500, k: "Æn. Sylv." Aeneas Sylvius; the exact location of the couplet remains uncollated.

[9711] Editor. Æn. Sylv. denotes Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini. The exact work containing the couplet has not been established here. Stygian refers to the Styx and hence the underworld; effrenis means unbridled or unchecked.

[9712] Editor. Auricular confession is private confession spoken to a priest; visitation is pastoral or official attendance. "They can such trades" means they know or are skilled in them. Burton treats religious and medical access as opportunities for abuse; the generalized allegations are his.

[9713] Burton. Printed page 500, l: "Chaucer in the wife of Baths tale." Chaucer, The Wife of Bath's Tale.

[9714] Editor. Chaucer, The Wife of Bath's Tale, lines 873–874 and 879–880, compressed and slightly changed. A limiter is a friar licensed to beg within a particular district. An incubus is a male demon believed to assault sleepers sexually. The passage turns the supposed expulsion of supernatural beings into a joke about the friar's own sexual threat.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9715]In the Mountains betwixt Dauphine and Savoy, the Friers perswaded the good wives to counterfeit themselves possessed, that their husbands might give them free access, and were so familiar in those days with some of them, that, as one [9716]observes, wenches could not sleep in their beds for Necromantick Friers: and the good Abbess in Bocace may in some sort witness, that rising betimes, mistook and put on the Friers breeches instead of her vail or hat.	In the mountains between Dauphiné and Savoy, the friars persuaded married women to pretend they were possessed, so that their husbands would allow them free access. In those days they were so intimate with some of them that, as one writer observes, “girls could not sleep in their beds for necromantic friars.” The good abbess in Boccaccio may serve as a witness of sorts: rising early, she mistakenly put on the friar’s breeches instead of her veil or hat.[9717]
You have heard the story, I presume of [9718]Paulina, a chast matron in Ægesippus, whom one of Isis Priests did prostitute to Mundus a yong knight, and made her believe it was their God Anubis.	You have presumably heard the story in Hegesippus of Paulina, a chaste married woman, whom one of Isis’s priests delivered up to a young knight named Mundus, making her believe he was their god Anubis.[9719]

[9715] Burton. Printed page 500, m: “H. Stephanus Apol. Herod. lib. 1. cap. 21.” Henri Estienne, Apology for Herodotus, book 1, chapter 21.

[9716] Burton. Printed page 500, n: “Bale. Puellæ in lectis dormire non poterant.” Bale. “Girls could not sleep in their beds.”

[9717] Editor. The Estienne and Bale anecdotes are retained as Burton’s cited allegations; they have not been independently established as events. Necromantick means practising supposed magic or dealings with spirits. Boccaccio, Decameron 9.2, tells the comic story of an abbess who, rushing out in the dark, puts her priest-lover’s breeches on her head. Burton calls him a friar and changes the occasion to rising early.

[9718] Burton. Printed page 500, dagger: “Idem Josephus lib. 18. cap. 4.” “The same in Josephus, book 18, chapter 4.” Compare Antiquities 18.3.4 in the chapter division consulted.

[9719] Editor. The story is found in Josephus, Antiquities 18.3.4, also transmitted through the work called Hegesippus. Mundus obtains access to Paulina by bribery and religious impersonation: she believes she is meeting Anubis. Burton’s wording is retained, while the note identifies the deception behind the sexual encounter. Knight means a man of Roman equestrian rank.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many such pranks are played by our Jesuits, sometimes in their own habits, sometimes in others, like souldiers, courtiers, citizens, Schollars, Gallants, and women themselves. Proteus like in all forms, and disguises, that go abroad in the night, to inescate and beguile yong women, or to have their pleasure of other mens wives: And if we may believe [9720]some relations, they have wardrops of several suits in their Colledges for that purpose.	Our Jesuits play many such tricks, sometimes in their own dress, sometimes in that of others: soldiers, courtiers, townsmen, scholars, fashionable gentlemen and even women. Like Proteus, they assume every shape and disguise, going out at night to bait and deceive young women or take their pleasure with other men's wives. If certain reports are to be believed, they keep wardrobes of different costumes in their colleges for this purpose.[9721]
Howsoever in publike they pretend much zeal, seem to be very holy men, and bitterly preach against adultery, fornication, there are no verier Bawds or whoremasters in a country, [9722]Whose soul they should gain to God, they sacrifice to the Divel. But I spare these men for the present.	However much zeal they profess in public, however holy they seem, and however fiercely they preach against adultery and fornication, there are no more thoroughgoing bawds or whoremongers in the country. "The souls they ought to win for God, they sacrifice to the Devil." But I spare these men for the present.
The last battering engins, are Philters, Amulets, Spells, Charms, Images, and such unlawful means; if they cannot prevail of themselves by the help of Bawds, Panders, and their adherents, they will flye for succour to the Divel himself.	Their last siege engines are love potions, amulets, spells, charms, images and other unlawful means. If they cannot succeed by themselves, with the help of bawds, procurers and their associates, they will seek assistance from the Devil himself.[9723]

[9720] Burton. Printed page 500, o: "Liber edit. Augustæ Vindelicorum An. 1608." "A book published at Augsburg in the year 1608." No author or title is supplied.

[9721] Editor. Proteus is the mythological shape-shifter. Inescate means catch with bait. Burton qualifies the wardrobe story with "if we may believe"; the margin supplies only Augsburg and 1608, without an author or title. This bibliographical lead and the 1630 Practices of the Jesuits reference remain unresolved. The passage reports polemical accusations and is not independent evidence of their truth.

[9722] Burton. Printed page 500, p: "Quarum animas lucrari debent deo, sacrificant diabolo." "Those whose souls they ought to win for God, they sacrifice to the Devil."

[9723] Editor. Philters are supposed love potions; images are figures or effigies used in magic. Burton continues the siege metaphor of courtship. These are reported beliefs and allegations in his sources.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 500–501 I know there be those that deny the Divel can do any such thing, (Crato, epist. 2. lib. med.) and many Divines, there is no other fascination then that which comes by the eys, of which I have formerly spoken; and if you desire to be better informed, read Camerarius oper. subcis. cent. 2. c. 5. It was given out of old that a Thessalian wench had bewitched King Philip to dote upon her, and by Philters enforced his love; but when Olympia the Queen saw the maid of an excellent beauty, well-brought up, and qualified: these, quoth she, were the Philters which inveagled King Philip; those the true charms, as Henry to Rosamund,	I know that some deny the Devil can do any such thing—Crato, in the second letter of his medical collection, and many theologians—and hold that there is no enchantment except what comes through the eyes, of which I have already spoken. For fuller information, read Camerarius's Leisure Hours, second century, chapter 5. In ancient times it was said that a Thessalian girl had bewitched King Philip into doting on her and had forced his love with potions. But when Queen Olympia saw that the girl was exceptionally beautiful, well brought up and accomplished, she said these were the potions that had captivated Philip: these were the real charms. As Henry says to Rosamond:[9724]
Source page 501 [9725]One accent from thy lips the blood more warms, Then all their Philters, exorcisms and charms.	One syllable from your lips warms the blood more Than all their love potions, incantations and charms.[9726]

[9724] Editor. Fascination means bewitchment, here contrasted with the captivating effect of the eyes. A "century" is a collection of a hundred pieces. Compare Plutarch, Advice to Bride and Groom 23 (Moralia 141B–C): Olympias recognizes the woman's beauty and character as sufficient explanation. Burton prints Olympia.

[9725] Burton. Printed page 501, dagger: "M. Drayton Her. epist."

[9726] Editor. Michael Drayton, England's Heroical Epistles, Henry II to Rosamond. Accent means a sound or syllable of speech; exorcisms here includes spoken magical formulas. The exact wording of Drayton's independent text remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
With this alone Lucretia brags in [9727]Aretine, she could do more then all Philosophers, Astrologers, Alchymists, Necromancers, Witches, and the rest of the crew. As for hearbs and Philters, I could never skill of them, The sole philter that ever I used, was kissing and embracing, by which alone I made men rave like beasts stupified, and compelled them to worship me like an Idol.	With this alone, Lucretia boasts in Aretino, she could accomplish more than all the philosophers, astrologers, alchemists, necromancers, witches and the rest of that crew. "As for herbs and love potions, I never understood them. The only love potion I ever used was kissing and embracing; with that alone I made men rave like stupefied beasts and compelled them to worship me like an idol."[9728]
In our times 'tis a common thing saith Erastus in his book de Lamiis, for Witches to take upon them the making of these Philters, [9729]to force men and women to love and hate whom they will, to cause tempests, diseases, &c. by Charms, Spels, Characters, Knots.	In our own times, says Erastus in his book On Witches, witches commonly claim to make such love potions: to force men and women to love or hate whomever they choose, to cause storms, diseases and so forth, by charms, spells, magical signs and knots.[9730]
[9731]—— hic Thessala vendit Philtra.	Here a Thessalian woman sells love potions.[9732]

[9727] Burton. Printed page 501, dagger: "Barnodidascalo dial. Ital. latin. fact. à Gasp. Barthio. Plus possum quam omnes philosophi, Astrologi, Necromantici, &c. Sola saliva inungens. I. amplexus & basiis tam furiose furere, tam bestialiter obstupescere coegi, ut instar Idoli me adorarint." Aretino's dialogue in Caspar Barth's Latin version: "I can do more than all philosophers, astrologers, necromancers, etc. Anointing with saliva alone. I. With embraces and kisses I made them rave so furiously and become so brutishly stupefied that they worshipped me like an idol." The isolated printed I. is retained; its function is uncertain.

[9728] Editor. The marginal title refers to Barth's Latin rendering of Aretino's erotic dialogues. "Could never skill of" means "never understood." Lucretia's boast is a literary speech, not Burton's personal testimony.

[9729] Burton. Printed page 501, q: "Sagæ omnes sibi arrogant notitiam, & facultatem in amorem alliciendi quas velint; odia inter conjuges serendi, tempestates excitandi, morbos infligendi, &c." "All witches claim the knowledge and power to entice into love whomever they wish, to sow hatred between spouses, raise storms and inflict diseases."

[9730] Editor. Thomas Erastus's De lamiis concerns witches. Characters are written magical signs; knots could serve as ritual instruments. "Take upon them" means claim or profess the power.

[9731] Burton. Printed page 501, dagger: "Juvenalis Sat."

[9732] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.610–611. Thessaly was conventionally associated with magic in classical literature. Burton compresses the lineation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
St. Hierom proves that they can do it, (as in Hilarius life, epist. lib. 3.) he hath a story of a yong man, that with a Philter made a maid mad for the love of him, which maid was after cured by Hilarion. Such instances I find in John Nider, Formicar. lib. 5. cap. 5. Plutarch records of Lucullus that he died of a Philter; and that Cleopatra used Philters to inveagle Anthony, amongst other allurements. Eusebius reports as much of Lucretius the Poet. Panormitan. lib. 4. de gest. Alphonsi, hath a story of one Stephan a Neapolitan Knight, that by a Philter was forced to run mad for love.	St Jerome proves that they can do it: in the life of Hilarius, in the third book of his letters, he tells of a young man who used a love potion to make a girl mad with love for him; she was afterwards cured by Hilarion. I find similar examples in Johann Nider's Ant Hill, book 5, chapter 5. Plutarch records that Lucullus died from a love potion, and that Cleopatra used love potions among her other enticements to captivate Antony. Eusebius reports the same of the poet Lucretius. Panormita, in book 4 of The Deeds of Alfonso, tells of a Neapolitan knight named Stephan who was driven mad with love by a potion.[9733]
But of all others, that which [9734]Petrarch epist. famil. lib. 1. ep. 5. relates of Charls the Great, is most memorable: He foolishly doted upon a woman of mean favour and condition, many years together, wholly delighting in her company, to the great grief and indignation of his friends and followers. When she was dead, he did embrace her corps, as Apollo did the bay-tree, for his Daphne, and caused her Coffin (richly embalmed and decked with Jewels) to be carried about with him, over which he still lamented.	Most memorable of all, however, is what Petrarch relates of Charlemagne in book 1, letter 5 of his Familiar Letters. For many years he foolishly doted on a woman of ordinary looks and humble standing, taking his entire delight in her company, to the great grief and indignation of his friends and followers. When she died, he embraced her corpse as Apollo embraced the laurel tree for the sake of his Daphne, and had her coffin, richly embalmed and adorned with jewels, carried about with him, continually lamenting over it.[9735]

[9733] Editor. Jerome, Life of Hilarion 21, concerns magical inscriptions buried under a girl's threshold, rather than a drink; Burton prints Hilarius for Hilarion. Plutarch, Lucullus 43.1–2, reports loss of reason attributed to drugs, not simply immediate death. The Lucretius tradition belongs to Jerome's continuation of Eusebius's Chronicle. These are distinct literary reports, compressed here into a catalogue; the Nider and Panormita passages await full collation.

[9734] Burton. Printed page 501, dagger: "Idem refert Hen. Kormannus de mir. mort. lib. 1. cap. 14. Perdite amavit mulierculam quandam, illius amplexibus acquiescens, summa cum indignatione suorum & dolore." "Heinrich Kornmann reports the same in On the Wonders of the Dead, book 1, chapter 14. He loved a certain woman desperately, finding contentment in her embraces, to his followers' great indignation and grief."

[9735] Editor. Favour means appearance, and condition social rank. Charls the Great is Charlemagne. The enchanted-ring story is a legend of Aachen, transmitted by Petrarch; modern scholarship locates it in Familiares 1.4, whereas Burton cites 1.5. Apollo embraced Daphne after she became a laurel. Burton's parenthesis awkwardly attaches embalming to the coffin; that wording is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
At last a venerable Bishop that followed his Court, pray'd earnestly to God (commiserating his Lord and Masters case) to know the true cause of this mad passion, and whence it proceeded; it was revealed to him in fine, that the cause of the Emperors mad love lay under the dead womans tongue. The Bishop went hastily to the carkass, and took a small ring thence; upon the removal the Emperour abhorr'd the Coarse, and instead [9736]of it, fell as furiously in love with the Bishop, he would not suffer him to be out of his presence: which when the Bishop perceived, he flung the ring into the midst of a great Lake, where the King then was.	At last a venerable bishop attached to his court, pitying his lord and master's condition, prayed earnestly to God to discover the true cause and origin of this mad passion. Eventually it was revealed to him that the cause of the emperor's mad love lay beneath the dead woman's tongue. The bishop hurried to the corpse and removed a small ring. Once it was removed, the emperor recoiled from the body and instead fell just as passionately in love with the bishop, refusing to let him out of his sight. When the bishop realized this, he threw the ring into the middle of a great lake near where the king was staying.
From that houre the Emperour neglecting all his other houses, dwelt at [9737]Ache, built a fair house in the midst of the Marsh, to his infinite expence, and a [9738]Temple by it, where after he was buried, and in which city all his posterity ever since use to be crowned.	From that hour the emperor neglected all his other residences and lived at Aachen. At enormous expense he built a fine house in the middle of the marsh, with a church beside it, where he was afterwards buried; and in that city all his successors have since customarily been crowned.[9739]

[9736] Burton. Printed page 501, asterisk: "Et inde totus in Episcopum furere, illum colere." "And thereafter to be wholly mad for the bishop, to adore him."

[9737] Burton. Printed page 501, dagger: "Aquisgranum, vulgo Aixe." "Aquisgranum, commonly Aix": Aachen.

[9738] Burton. Printed page 501, unmarked continuation beside the asterisk at Temple: "Immenso sumptu templum & ædes, &c." "At immense expense, a church and residence," etc. Set separately from the place-name gloss because the body has a separate anchor.

[9739] Editor. Ache, Aix and Aquisgranum here denote Aachen. Posterity has been rendered "successors" in the coronation context. The assertion that all were crowned there is part of Burton's historical generalization within the legend.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 501–502 Marcus the Heretick is accused by Irenæus to have inveagled a yong maid by this means; and some writers speak hardly of the Lady Katharine Cobham, that by the same Art she circumvented Humphrey Duke of Glocester to be her husband. Sycinius Æmilianus summoned [9740]Apuleius to come before Cneius Maximus, Proconsul of Africk, that he being a poor fellow, had bewitched by Philters Pudentilla an ancient rich Matron to love him, and being worth so many thousand sesterces, to be his wife.	Irenaeus accuses Marcus the heretic of seducing a young woman by this means. Some writers also speak harshly of Lady Katharine Cobham, alleging that she used the same art to trick Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, into marrying her. Sicinius Aemilianus summoned Apuleius before Cneius Maximus, proconsul of Africa, accusing him, a poor man, of using love potions to bewitch Pudentilla, a wealthy older woman worth many thousands of sesterces, into loving and marrying him.[9741]
Source page 502 Agrippa lib. 1. cap. 48. occult. philos. attributes much in this kind to Philters, Amulets, Images: and Salmutz com. in Pancirol. Tit. 10. de Horol. Leo Afer lib. 3. saith, 'tis an ordinary practice at Fez in Africk, Præstigiatores ibi plures, qui cogunt amores & concubitus: as skilful all out as that Hyperborean Magitian, of whom Cleodemus in [9742]Lucian, tells so many fine feats, perform'd in this kind.	Agrippa, in book 1, chapter 48 of Occult Philosophy, attributes considerable power of this kind to love potions, amulets and images; so does Salmuth in his commentary on Panciroli, title 10, On Clocks. Leo Africanus, in book 3, says this is common practice at Fez in Africa: "There are many magicians there who compel love and sexual intercourse." They are every bit as skilful as the Hyperborean magician about whose wonderful feats in this line Cleodemus tells so many stories in Lucian.[9743]

[9740] Burton. Printed page 502, r: "Apolog. quod Pudentillam viduam ditem & provectioris ætatis fœminam cantaminibus in amorem sui pellexisset." Apology: "That he had enticed Pudentilla, a rich widow and a woman of advanced years, into loving him by incantations."

[9741] Editor. Irenaeus, Against Heresies 1.13.5, accuses Marcus of love magic involving an Asian deacon's wife. Burton's "Katharine Cobham" appears to confuse Eleanor Cobham, Humphrey of Gloucester's wife; the allegation remains an allegation. Apuleius's Apology concerns charges surrounding his marriage to Pudentilla. At 25.3 it names Claudius Maximus, against Burton's Cneius Maximus; 28.5–8 describes Aemilianus's use of Sicinius Pudens in the prosecution. Burton's names are retained; his intermediaries remain uncollated.

[9742] Burton. Printed page 502, dagger: "Philopseudes Tom. 3."

[9743] Editor. Agrippa is Heinrich Cornelius Agrippa; Salmuth comments on Guido Panciroli. Hyperborean means from the far north. In Lucian's Philopseudes, or Lover of Lies, Cleodemus claims that a northern magician brought Chrysis to Glaucias. Tychiades answers that money could have persuaded her and mocks the magician's fee. The story belongs to a sceptical dialogue, not an unchallenged report. Burton's Latin version and volume numbering remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But Erastus, Wierus, and others are against it; they grant indeed such things may be done, but (as Wierus discourseth, lib. 3. de Lamiis cap. 37.) not by Charms, Incantations, Philters, but the Divel himself; lib. 5. cap. 2. he contends as much; So doth Freitagius noc. med. cap. 74. Andreas Cisalpinus cap. 5. and so much Sigismundus Schereczius cap. 9. de hirco nocturno, proves at large.	But Erastus, Weyer and others oppose this explanation. They concede that such things may indeed happen, but, as Weyer argues in book 3, chapter 37 of On Witches, they are done by the Devil himself, not by charms, incantations or love potions. He argues the same in book 5, chapter 2; so do Freitag, in chapter 74 of Medical Nights, and Andrea Cesalpino, in chapter 5. Sigismund Scherertz also sets out a lengthy demonstration in chapter 9 of The Night Goat.[9744]
[9745]Unchast women by the help of these witches, the Divels kitchin maids, have their loves brought to them in the night, and carried back again by a phantasm flying in the air in the likeness of a Goat. I have heard (saith he) dyvers confess, that they have been so carried on a Goats back to their sweet hearts, many miles in a night.	"Unchaste women, with the help of these witches, the Devil's kitchen maids, have their lovers brought to them at night and carried back again by a phantom flying through the air in the shape of a goat. I have heard several people confess," he says, "that they have been carried in this way on a goat's back to their sweethearts, many miles in a single night."
Others are of opinion that these feats, which most suppose to be done by Charms and Philters, are meerly effected by natural causes, as by mans blood Chimically prepared, which much avails saith Ernestus Burgravius, in Lucernâ vitæ & mortis indice, ad amorem conciliandum & odium, (so huntsmen make their dogs love them, and farmers their pullen) 'tis an excellent Philter as he holds, sed vulgo prodere grande nefas, but not fit to be made common:	Others think these feats, which most people suppose are achieved by charms and love potions, result entirely from natural causes. Chemically prepared human blood, for example, is very effective, says Ernst Burggraf in The Lamp Indicating Life and Death, "for producing love and hatred." This is how huntsmen make their dogs love them, and farmers their poultry. He holds it to be an excellent love potion, "but to reveal it to the public is a great crime": it is not fit for common knowledge.[9746]

[9744] Editor. Wierus is Johann Weyer. The disagreement here concerns the supposed agency of magic: the material charm versus a devil acting directly. Burton does not equate rejection of a potion's independent power with rejection of supernatural events.

[9745] Burton. Printed page 502, dagger: "Impudicæ mulieres opera veneficarum, diaboli coquarum, amatores suos ad se noctu ducunt & reducunt, ministerio hirci in aëre volantis: multos novi qui hoc fassi sunt, &c." "Immodest women use witches, the Devil's cooks, to bring their lovers to them at night and take them back, through the agency of a goat flying in the air; I have known many who confessed this."

[9746] Editor. Pullen means poultry. "Natural causes" here includes early chemical and occult sympathies. The passage attributes a claim to Burggraf; it supplies neither evidence for efficacy nor a modern medical explanation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and so be Mala insana, Mandrake roots, [9747]Mandrake apples, pretious stones, dead mens cloaths, candles, mala Bacchica, panis porcinus, Hippomanes, a certain hair in a [9748]Wolfs tail, &c. of which Rhasis, Dioscorides, Porta, Wecker, Rubeus, Mizaldus, Albertus treate: a swallows heart, dust of a Doves heart, multum valent linguæ viperarum, cerebella asinorum, tela equina, palliola quibus infantes obvoluti nascuntur, funis strangulati hominis, lapis de nido Aquilæ, &c.	So are "mad apples," mandrake roots and fruits, precious stones, dead people's clothes, candles, "Bacchic apples," "swine's bread," hippomanes, a particular hair from a wolf's tail and so on. These are discussed by Rhazes, Dioscorides, Porta, Wecker, Rubeus, Mizaldus and Albertus. A swallow's heart, powdered dove's heart; "vipers' tongues are very powerful, as are asses' brains, the membrane from a foal's birth, the cauls in which babies are born, the rope of a hanged man, and a stone from an eagle's nest," and so forth.[9749]
See more in Skenkius observat. medicinal. lib. 4. &c. which are as forcible and of as much vertue, as that fountain Salmacis in [9750]Vitruvius, Ovid, Strabo, that made all such mad for love that drank of it, or that hot Bath at [9751]Aix in Germany, wherein Cupid once dipt his arrows, which ever since hath a peculiar vertue to make them lovers all that wash in it. But hear the Poets own description of it,	For more examples, see book 4 of Schenck's Medical Observations. Their power and efficacy are as great as those of the fountain Salmacis in Vitruvius, Ovid and Strabo, which drove everyone who drank from it mad with love; or of the hot bath at Aachen in Germany, where Cupid once dipped his arrows, and which has ever since had the special power of making lovers of everyone who bathes in it. But hear the poet's own description:[9752]

[9747] Burton. Printed page 502, parenthesis-like mark: "Mandrake apples, Lemnius lib. herb. bib. c. 2."

[9748] Burton. Printed page 502, asterisk: "Of which read Plin. lib. 8. cap. 22. & lib. 13. c. 25. & Quintilianum lib. 7."

[9749] Editor. "Mad apples" commonly denotes aubergines; "Bacchic apples" is an old plant name, and "swine's bread" denotes cyclamen. Their exact species in Burton's cited authorities are not established here. Hippomanes names more than one supposed equine love charm, including a substance associated with a foal's birth. Tela equina is interpreted here as an equine birth membrane. A caul is a fetal membrane covering a newborn; the eagle-stone is the traditional aëtites. These are historical materia magica, not a practical recipe.

[9750] Burton. Printed page 502, dagger: "Lib. 11. c. 8. Venere implicat eos, qui ex eo bibunt. Idem Ov. Met. 4. Strabo. Geog. l. 14." "It entangles in love those who drink from it." The opening reference is printed 11.8; Compare Vitruvius's discussion of Salmacis at 2.8.12.

[9751] Burton. Printed page 502, dagger: "Lod. Guicciardines descript. Ger. in Aquisgrano."

[9752] Editor. Salmacis is a spring at Halicarnassus. Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.285–388, tells the story of Salmacis and Hermaphroditus; Vitruvius, Architecture 2.8.12, explicitly rejects the water's alleged power to make men effeminate. Burton's "mad for love" compresses and changes these traditions. Virtue means efficacy or power.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Unde hic fervor aquis terrâ erumpentibus udâ? Tela olim hic ludens ignea tinxit Amor; Et gaudens stridore novo, Fervete perennes Inquit, & hæc pharetræ sint monumenta meæ. Ex illo fervet, rarusque hic mergitur hospes, Cui non titillet pectora blandus amor.	Why this heat in waters springing from the damp earth? Love once playfully dipped his fiery arrows here; Delighted by the strange hissing, "Boil on for ever," He said, "and let these waters commemorate my quiver." Ever since, the spring has boiled; few visitors bathe here Without gentle love stirring in their breasts.[9753]
Source page 502–503 These above-named remedies have happily as much power as that bath of Aix, or [9754]Venus inchanted girdle, in which saith Natalis Comes, Love toies and dalliance, pleasantness, sweetness, perswasions, subtilties, gentle speeches and all witchcraft to enforce love, was contained. Read more of these in Agrippa de occult. Philos. lib. 1. cap. 50. & 45. Malleus malefic. part. 1. quæst. 7. Delrio tom. 2. quest. 3. lib. 3. Wierus, Pomponatius cap. 8. de incantat. Ficinus lib. 13. Theol. Plat. Calcagninus, &c.	Perhaps these remedies have as much power as the bath at Aachen, or Venus's enchanted girdle, which, according to Natale Conti, contained "love's playfulness and dalliance, pleasure, sweetness, persuasions, cunning, gentle words, and every enchantment for compelling love." Read more about them in Agrippa's Occult Philosophy, book 1, chapters 50 and 45; The Hammer of Witches, part 1, question 7; Del Rio, volume 2, book 3, question 3; Weyer; Pomponazzi's On Incantations, chapter 8; Ficino's Platonic Theology, book 13; Calcagnini; and others.[9755]

[9753] Editor. The marginal reference points to Lodovico Guicciardini's description of Aachen. The six-line poem explains the hot spring through Cupid's heated arrows; its author and exact printed intermediary remain unconfirmed.

[9754] Burton. Printed page 502, u: "Baltheus Veneris, in quo suavitas, & dulcia colloquia, benevolentiæ, & blanditiæ, suasiones, fraudes & veneficia includebantur." "Venus's girdle, in which were enclosed sweetness and pleasant conversations, goodwill and caresses, persuasions, tricks and enchantments."

[9755] Editor. Happily means "perhaps," not "fortunately." Venus's girdle is the mythical store of erotic persuasion. The list concludes the subsection on procurers and love charms; Member 4 begins the account of symptoms.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 503 MEMB. 4. SUBSECT. 1. Symptomes or signs of Love Melancholy, in Body, Mind, good, bad, &c.	MEMBER 4 SUBSECTION 1 Symptoms or signs of love melancholy in body and mind Good and bad signs and so forth
Symptomes are either of Body or Mind; of body, paleness, leanness, driness, &c. [9756]Pallidus omnis amans, color hic est aptus amanti, as the Poet describes lovers: fecit amor maciem, love causeth leanness. [9757]Avicenna de Ilishi c. 33. makes hollow eys, driness, Symptomes of this disease, to go smiling to themselves, or acting as if they saw or heard some delectable object.	The symptoms are either bodily or mental. Bodily symptoms include paleness, thinness, dryness and so on. "Every lover is pale; this colour suits a lover," as the poet describes them; "love has caused wasting": love makes people thin. Avicenna, in chapter 33, On Love, lists hollow eyes and dryness as symptoms of this disease, together with going about smiling to oneself or behaving as though one saw or heard something delightful.[9758]
Valleriola lib. 3. observat. cap. 7. Laurentius cap. 10. Ælianus Montaltus de Her. amore. Langius epist. 24. lib. 1. epist. med. deliver as much, corpus exangue pallet, corpus gracile, oculi cavi, lean, pale,	Valleriola, in book 3, chapter 7 of his Observations; Laurentius, chapter 10; Eliano Montalto, On Love Melancholy; and Lange, in book 1, letter 24 of his Medical Letters, say much the same: "The bloodless body is pale; the body thin, the eyes hollow." Thin and pale:[9759]
—— ut nudis qui pressit calcibus anguem,	Like someone who has trodden on a snake with bare heels.[9760]
hollow-eyd, their eys are hidden in their heads,	Hollow-eyed, their eyes sunken in their heads:

[9756] Burton. Printed page 503, x: "Ovid. Facit hunc amor ipse colorem. Met. 4." "Love itself produces this colour." Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.203 has iste, "that," rather than Burton's ipse, "itself."

[9757] Burton. Printed page 503, y: "Signa ejus profunditas oculorum, privatio lachrymarum, suspiria, sæpe rident sibi, ac si quod delectabile viderent, aut audirent." "Its signs are sunken eyes, lack of tears, and sighing; they often smile to themselves as though they saw or heard something delightful."

[9758] Editor. Burton changes Ovid's Palleat omnis amans, "Let every lover be pale" (Art of Love 1.729), into the statement "Every lover is pale." Fecit amor maciem comes from Metamorphoses 11.793. The margin cites a different passage, Metamorphoses 4.203. Ilishi is an early Latin form used for Avicenna's discussion of passionate love. The marginal wording specifies absence of tears where the body says dryness.

[9759] Editor. The physicians are presented as agreeing on a conventional picture of the wasted lover. Her. amore refers to amor hereos, the medical category of pathological love discussed throughout this section.

[9760] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 1.43. Burton rearranges the words of a comparison about frightened pallor and applies it to a lover.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9761]Tenerque nitidi corporis cecidit decor ——	And the tender beauty of the radiant body has faded.[9762]
They pine away, and look ill with waking, cares, sighs,	They waste away and look ill from sleeplessness, cares and sighs:
Et qui tenebant signa Phœbeæ facis oculi, nil gentile nec patrium micant.	And the eyes that bore the marks of Phoebus's torch No longer shine with their ancestral radiance.
With groans, griefs, sadness, dulness,	With groans, grief, sadness and listlessness:
[9763]—— Nulla jam Cereris subit Cura aut salutis ——	No thought now arises Of food or health.
want of appetite, &c. A reason of all this, [9764]Jason Pratensis gives, because of the distraction of the spirits, the Liver doth not perform his part, nor turns the aliment into blood as it ought, and for that cause the members are weak for want of sustenance, they are lean and pine, as the hearbs of my garden do this month of May, for want of rain. The green sickness therefore often happeneth to yong women, a Cacexia or an evil habit to men, besides their ordinary sighs, complaints, and lamentations, which are too frequent. As drops from a still,	Loss of appetite, and so on. Jason Pratensis explains all this: "Because the spirits are distracted, the liver fails to do its work and does not turn food into blood as it should. The limbs are consequently weak for lack of nourishment; they grow thin and wither, as the herbs in my garden do this May for lack of rain." Thus young women often develop the green sickness, and men cachexia, or a poor bodily condition, besides their usual sighs, complaints and lamentations, which are all too frequent. Like drops from a still:[9765]

[9761] Burton. Printed page 503, dagger: "Seneca Hip."

[9762] Editor. This and the next two Latin extracts come from Seneca's Phaedra, also called Hippolytus, approximately lines 373–380. Phoebus is the sun god, Phaedra's ancestor; the eyes no longer display their inherited brightness. Burton's tenebant differs from ferebant in the consulted text. Ceres, goddess of grain, stands for food.

[9763] Burton. Printed page 503, asterisk: "Seneca Hip."

[9764] Burton. Printed page 503, z: "De morbis cerebri de erot. amore. Ob spirituum distractionem hepar officio suo non fungitur, nec vertit alimentum in sanguinem, ut debeat. Ergo membra debilia, & penuria alibilis succi marcescunt, squalentque ut herbæ in horto meo hoc mense Maio zeriscæ, ob imbrium defectum." On Diseases of the Brain, on erotic love: "Because the spirits are distracted, the liver does not perform its function or turn food into blood as it should. Hence the limbs are weak and wither from lack of nourishing fluid, and shrivel like the dry herbs in my garden this May for lack of rain." The unusual printed zeriscæ is interpreted from this context and Burton's English paraphrase.

[9765] Editor. Pratensis explains wasting through an older physiology in which bodily spirits sustain functions and the liver converts nourishment into blood. Green sickness is the historical diagnosis chlorosis; cachexia here means a generally poor bodily condition. "Habit" means constitution or state of the body, not a repeated action.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— ut occluso stillat ab igne liquor,	As liquid drips from a fire enclosed.[9766]
doth Cupids fire provoke tears from a true Lovers eys.	So Cupid's fire draws tears from a true lover's eyes.
[9767]The mighty Mars did oft for Venus shreek, Privily moistning his horrid cheek With womanish tears, ——	Mighty Mars often cried out for Venus, Secretly wetting his fearsome cheek With womanish tears.[9768]
[9769]—— ignis distillat in undas, Testis erit largus qui rigat ora liquor,	Fire is distilled into water; The abundant stream that bathes the face will bear witness.[9770]

[9766] Editor. A still is a distilling apparatus. The enclosed heat and dripping liquid furnish Burton's comparison between inward passion and visible tears. This unattributed Latin fragment remains untraced.

[9767] Burton. Printed page 503, asterisk: "Fairy Queen l. 3. cant. 11."

[9768] Editor. Compare Spenser, The Faerie Queene 3.11.44.3–7: Burton condenses and rearranges the stanza, omitting Mars's other nymphs and his "unwarlike" suffering. Spenser places the tears before the secretly moistened cheek. Horrid means fearsome or bristling. Womanish carries the poem's gendered judgment about tears; Burton's wording and order are retained.

[9769] Burton. Printed page 503, dagger: "Amator Emblem. 3."

[9770] Editor. Burton abbreviates the reference to an amatory emblem, number 3. Both lines continue the metaphor of passion distilled into tears; the precise emblem-book edition has not yet been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 503–504 with many such like passions. When Chariclia was enamored on Theagines, as [9771]Heliodorus sets her out, she was half distracted, and spake she knew not what, sighed to her self, lay much awake and was lean upon a sudden: and when she was besotted on her son in law, [9772]pallor deformis, marcentes oculi, &c. she had ugly paleness, hollow eys, restless thoughts, short wind, &c.	Along with many other such sufferings. When Chariclea fell in love with Theagenes, as Heliodorus describes her, "she was half distracted, spoke without knowing what she said, sighed to herself, lay awake much of the time and suddenly grew thin." And when the other woman became infatuated with her stepson, "an ugly pallor, languishing eyes," and so forth: she had an ugly pallor, hollow eyes, restless thoughts and shortness of breath.[9773]
Source page 504 Eurialus in an Epistle sent to Lucretia his Mistress, complains amongst other grievances, tu mihi & somni & cibi usum abstulisti, thou hast taken my stomack and my sleep from me. So he describes it aright;	In a letter to his mistress Lucretia, Euryalus complains, among other grievances, "You have deprived me of both sleep and food": you have taken away my appetite and my sleep. So the poet describes it accurately:[9774]
[9775]His sleep, his meat, his drink, is him bereft, That lean he waxeth, and dry as a shaft, His eys hollow and grisly to behold, His hew pale and ashen to unfold, And solitary he was ever alone, And waking all the night making mone?	His sleep, his food, his drink are taken from him, So that he grows thin, as dry as an arrow shaft; His eyes are hollow and dreadful to behold, His complexion pale and ashen to describe; He is solitary, always alone, And lies awake all night, lamenting.[9776]

[9771] Burton. Printed page 503, a: "Lib. 4. Animo errat, & quidvis obvium loquitur, vigilias absque causa sustinet, & succum corporis subito amisit." Book 4: "Her mind wanders; she says whatever comes into it, endures sleeplessness without cause, and has suddenly lost the body's substance."

[9772] Burton. Printed page 503, dagger: "Apuleius."

[9773] Editor. In Heliodorus, Aethiopica 4, the physician Acestinus identifies Chariclea's love through her wandering thoughts, disordered speech, sleeplessness and wasting; this matches Burton's symptom list. His Latin version remains uncollated. The next woman is the unnamed stepmother in Apuleius, Metamorphoses 10.2; "son in law" means stepson here. Burton's repeated "she" joins two novels: it does not make Chariclea that stepmother.

[9774] Editor. Euryalus and Lucretia are the lovers in Aeneas Silvius Piccolomini's Historia de duobus amantibus, The Tale of Two Lovers. Stomack means appetite. The following "he" introduces Chaucer, identified in the margin.

[9775] Burton. Printed page 504, unmarked: "Chaucer in the Knights tale."

[9776] Editor. Chaucer, The Knight's Tale, lines 1361–1366, on Arcite's wasting. Burton adapts wording and tense; shaft is an arrow or slender rod, and unfold means describe. The modern verse follows Burton's six lines, not the modern editor's reconstruction of Chaucer.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Theocritus Edyl. 2. makes a fair maid of Delphis in love with a yong man of Minda, confess as much,	In Idyll 2, Theocritus makes a beautiful girl of Delphis, in love with a young man of Myndus, confess as much:[9777]
Ut vidi ut insanii, ut animus mihi male affectus est, Miseræ mihi forma tabescebat, neque amplius pompam Ullam curabam, aut quando domum redituram Novi, sed me ardens quidam morbus consumebat, Decubui in lecto dies decem, & noctes decem, Defluebant capite capilli, ipsaque sola reliqua Ossa & cutis. ——	As soon as I saw him, I went mad; my mind was stricken. My beauty wasted away, poor wretch; I no longer cared For any procession, nor did I know when I would return home; a burning sickness consumed me. I lay in bed ten days and ten nights; The hair fell from my head, and all that remained Was skin and bone.
No sooner seen I had, but mad I was, My beauty fail'd, and I no more did care For any pomp, I knew not where I was, But sick I was, and evil I did fare; I lay upon my bed ten days and nights, A Sceleton I was in all mens sights.	No sooner had I seen him than I went mad; My beauty faded, and I no longer cared For any pomp; I did not know where I was, But I was sick, and fared badly; I lay in bed for ten days and nights, A skeleton in everyone's eyes.
All these passions are well expressed by [9778]that Heroical Poet in the person of Dido;	That epic poet expresses all these sufferings well in the person of Dido:
At non infelix animi Phœnissa, nec unquam Solvitur in somnos, oculisque ac pectore amorem Accipit; ingeminant curæ, rursusque resurgens Sævit amor, &c. ——	But not the Phoenician woman, unhappy in her soul; never Is she released into sleep, nor with eyes and heart does she receive Love; cares redouble, and, rising once again, Love rages, and so forth.[9779]

[9777] Editor. Theocritus, Idyll 2.82–90, gives this lament to Simaetha; Delphis is the young man from Myndus, not her town. Burton's faulty introduction is retained. His Latin is an intermediary version, followed by his own six-line English paraphrase; the two are separately translated. Pompam refers to the procession she had gone to see; Burton's English generalizes it to pomp.

[9778] Burton. Printed page 504, c: "Virg. 4. Æn."

[9779] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.529–532. The 1651 text prints oculisque ac pectore amorem, "with eyes and heart … love," where the consulted Virgil reads oculisve aut pectore noctem, "night in her eyes or breast." This creates a strained contradiction with the love that rages below. The modern column renders the printed reading, and Burton's separate English paraphrase follows it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Unhappy Dido could not sleep at all, But lies awake, and takes no rest: And up she gets again, whilst care and grief, And raging love torments her brest.	Unhappy Dido could not sleep at all, But lies awake and takes no rest; She gets up again, while care and grief And raging love torment her breast.
Accius Sannazarius Egloga 2. de Galatea, in the same manner fains his Lychoris [9780]tormenting her self for want of sleep, sighing, sobbing, and lamenting. And Eustathius in his Ismenias much troubled, and [9781]panting at heart, at the sight of his mistress, he could not sleep, his bed was thorns. [9782]All make leanness, want of appetite, want of sleep ordinary Symptomes, and by that means they are brought often so low, so much altered and changed, that as [9783]he jested in the Comœdy, one can scarce know them to be the same men.	Actius Sannazarius, in Eclogue 2, On Galatea, similarly depicts his Lycoris tormenting herself through sleeplessness, sighing, sobbing and lamentation. In Eustathius, Ismenias is greatly troubled, his heart pounding at the sight of his mistress; he cannot sleep, and his bed is a bed of thorns. All these writers make thinness, loss of appetite and sleeplessness common symptoms. By these means lovers are often brought so low, so altered and changed, that, as the character jokes in the comedy, one can scarcely recognize them as the same people.[9784]
Attenuant juvenum vigilatæ corpora noctes, Curaque & immenso qui fit amore dolor.	Sleepless nights waste young men's bodies, As do care and the grief that comes with boundless love.[9785]

[9780] Burton. Printed page 504, d: "Dum vaga passim sydera fulgent, numerat longas tetrica horas, & sollicito nixus cubito suspirando viscera rumpit." "While wandering stars shine everywhere, gloomy, she counts the long hours and, leaning on her restless elbow, rends her heart with sighs." Printed nixus is masculine, although Burton's Lycoris is female.

[9781] Burton. Printed page 504, e: "Saliebat crebro trepidum cor ad aspectum Ismenes." "His anxious heart beat rapidly at the sight of Ismene."

[9782] Burton. Printed page 504, f: "Gordonius c. 20. amittunt sæpe cibum, potum, & maceratur inde totum corpus." Bernard of Gordon, chapter 20: "They often forgo food and drink, and the whole body is wasted as a result."

[9783] Burton. Printed page 504, g: "Ter. Eunuch. Dii boni, quid hoc est, adeone homines mutari ex amore, ut non cognoscas eundem esse!" Terence, The Eunuch: "Good gods, what is this? Can people be so changed by love that you do not recognize the same person!"

[9784] Editor. Sannazarius is Jacopo Sannazaro, also known by the literary name Actius Sincerus. Eustathius is Eustathios Makrembolites, author of the romance Hysmine and Hysminias; Burton uses Ismene and Ismenias. The comic remark is adapted from Terence, Eunuchus 225–226. The Sannazaro and Eustathius intermediaries remain to be collated.

[9785] Editor. Ovid, Art of Love 1.735–736. Burton's immenso, "boundless," replaces in magno, "in great," in the consulted Latin text. The English translates Burton's reading.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 504–505 Many such Symptomes there are of the Body to discern lovers by, —— quis enim bene celat amorem? Can a man saith Solomon, Prov. 6.27. carry fire in his bosome and not burn? it will hardly be hid, though they do all they can to hide it, it must out, plus quam mille notis —— it may be described,	There are many such bodily symptoms by which to recognize lovers: "For who conceals love well?" Can a man, asks Solomon in Proverbs 6:27, carry fire in his breast and not be burned? It can scarcely be hidden. Whatever they do to conceal it, it must come out; it can be detected "by more than a thousand signs."[9786]
Source page 505 [9787]Quoque magis tegitur, tectus magis æstuat ignis.	The more the fire is covered, the more fiercely it burns beneath its cover.[9788]
'Twas Antiphanes the Comœdians observation of old, Love and drunkenness cannot be concealed, Celare alia possis, hæc præter duo, vini potum, &c. words, looks, gestures, all will betray them: but two of the most notable signs are observed by the pulse and Countenance.	Long ago the comic poet Antiphanes observed that love and drunkenness cannot be concealed: "You may hide other things, except these two: drinking wine," and so forth. Words, looks and gestures will all betray lovers; but two of the clearest signs can be observed in their pulse and their expression.[9789]

[9786] Editor. The question about concealing love is Ovid, Heroides 12.37, Medea to Jason. Proverbs 6:27 asks whether a man can carry fire in his bosom without burning his clothes, in a warning about adultery. The "thousand signs" fragment is left unattributed.

[9787] Burton. Printed page 505, asterisk: "Idem Met. 4."

[9788] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.64, describing the concealed passion of Pyramus and Thisbe.

[9789] Editor. Antiphanes is the Greek comic poet. Burton gives a Latin version of a fragment; the exact ancient witness and Latin intermediary remain unverified. Countenance here means the face and its expression.

Original text 1651	Modern English
When Antiochus the son of Seleucus was sick for Stratonice his Mother-in-law, and would not confess his grief, or the cause of his disease, Erasistratus the Physitian found him by his Pulse and Countenance, to be in love with her, [9790]because that when she came in presence, or was named, his pulse varied, and he blushed besides. In this very sort was the love of Callicles, the son of Polycles, discovered by Panacæus the Physitian, as you may read the story at large in [9791]Aristenætus.	When Antiochus, son of Seleucus, was sick with love for his stepmother Stratonice and would not confess his suffering or the cause of his illness, the physician Erasistratus discovered from his pulse and expression that he was in love with her: whenever she appeared or was named, his pulse changed and he blushed. In exactly this way the physician Panacaeus discovered the love of Callicles, son of Polycles, as you may read at length in Aristaenetus.[9792]

[9790] Burton. Printed page 505, h: “Ad ejus nomen rubebat, & ad aspectum pulsus variebatur. Plutar.” “At her name he blushed, and at the sight of her his pulse changed.” Plutarch. The spelling variebatur is retained.

[9791] Burton. Printed page 505, dagger: “Epist. 13.”

[9792] Editor. Plutarch, Demetrius 38, tells the Antiochus story. Stratonice is his stepmother, the meaning of Mother-in-law here. Aristaenetus’s separate story is cited as letter 13; its names and physician are retained pending full collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
By the same signs Galen brags, that he found out Justa, Boethius the Consuls wife, to dote on Pylades the Player, because at his name still she both altered Pulse and Countenance, as [9793]Polyarchus did at the name of Argenis. Franciscus Valesius, l. 3. med. contr. 13. denies there is any such pulsus amatorius, or that love may be so discerned; but Avicenna confirms this of Galen out of his experience, lib. 3. Fen. 1. and Gordonius, cap. 20. [9794]Their pulse he saith is inordinate and swift, if she go by whom he loves,	Galen boasts that he discovered by the same signs that Justa, wife of the consul Boethius, was infatuated with the actor Pylades: whenever his name was mentioned, both her pulse and her expression changed, as Polyarchus's did at the name of Argenis. Francisco Vallés, in book 3, controversy 13 of his Medical Controversies, denies that there is any such thing as a "lover's pulse," or that love can be detected in this way. But Avicenna, in book 3, fen 1, confirms Galen's account from his own experience, as does Bernard of Gordon in chapter 20: "Their pulse is irregular and rapid," he says, "if the woman they love passes by."[9795]
Langius, epist. 24. lib. 1. med. Epist. Nevisanus lib. 4. numer. 66. syl. nuptialis, Valescus de Taranta, Guianerius, Tract. 15. Valeriola sets down this for a Symptome, [9796]Difference of Pulse, neglect of business, want of sleep, often sighs, blushings, when there is any speech of their Mistress, are manifest signs.	Lange, in book 1, letter 24 of his Medical Letters; Nevizzano, in book 4, number 66 of The Marriage Forest; Valescus de Taranta; Guaineri, treatise 15; and Valleriola record this symptom: "A change in the pulse, neglect of business, sleeplessness, frequent sighing and blushing whenever their mistress is mentioned are clear signs."

[9793] Burton. Printed page 505, dagger: "Barck. lib. 1. Oculi medico tremore errabant." Barclay, book 1: "His eyes wandered with a slight trembling." The scan prints medico, "medical"; "slight" translates the conjectural correction modico, which makes sense with tremore.

[9794] Burton. Printed page 505, i: "Pulsus eorum velox & inordinatus, si mulier quam amat fortè transeat." "Their pulse is rapid and irregular if the woman he loves happens to pass by."

[9795] Editor. Burton conflates identities: the Pylades patient in Galen's On Prognosis is the wife of Justus; Boethus's wife is a different patient (compare Susan Mattern, "Galen and the words of patients," 2025). The printed names remain in the text. Polyarchus and Argenis are characters in John Barclay's Argenis. A fen is a division of Avicenna's Canon. Burton also records disagreement over whether love has a distinctive pulse.

[9796] Burton. Printed page 505, k: "Signa sunt cessatio ab omni opere insueto, privatio somni, suspiria crebra, rubor cum sit sermo de re amata, & commotio pulsus." "The signs are withdrawal from all unaccustomed work, loss of sleep, frequent sighs, blushing when the beloved object is mentioned, and disturbance of the pulse." Insueto literally means "unaccustomed"; Burton's body paraphrase generalizes it to business.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But amongst the rest, Josephus Struthius that Polonian, in the fift Book cap. 17. of his Doctrine of Pulses, holds that this and all other passions of the minde, may be discovered by the Pulse. [9797]And if you will know, saith he, whether the men suspected be such or such, touch their arteries, &c. And in his fourth Book, 14. Chapter, he speaks of this particular Pulse, [9798]Love makes an unequall pulse, &c. he gives instance of a Gentlewoman [9799]a Patient of his, whom by this means he found to be much enamoured, and with whom: he named many persons, but at the last when his name came whom he suspected, [9800]her pulse began to vary, and to beat swifter, and so by often feeling her pulse, he perceived what the matter was.	Among the others, the Polish physician Józef Struś, in book 5, chapter 17 of his Doctrine of Pulses, holds that this and all other passions of the mind can be detected from the pulse. “If you wish to know,” he says, “whether the people you suspect are in such a state, feel their arteries.” In book 4, chapter 14, he discusses this particular pulse: “Love makes the pulse uneven.” He gives the example of a gentlewoman he treated, whose passionate attachment, and its object, he discovered by this means. He named many people; at last, when he named the man he suspected, “her pulse began to change and beat faster.” By repeatedly feeling her pulse he understood what was happening.[9801]
Apollonius. Argonaut. lib. 4. Poetically setting down the meeting of Jason and Medea, makes them both to blush at one anothers sight, and at the first they were not able to speak.	Apollonius, in book 4 of the Argonautica, poetically describes the meeting of Jason and Medea: both blush at the sight of each other, and at first they cannot speak.[9802]

[9797] Burton. Printed page 505, l: “Si noscere vis an homines suspecti tales sint, tangito eorum arterias.” “If you wish to know whether the people suspected are in such a state, touch their arteries.”

[9798] Burton. Printed page 505, m: “Amor facit inæquales, inordinatos.” “Love makes them uneven and irregular”: the understood object is pulses.

[9799] Burton. Printed page 505, n: “In nobilis cujusdam uxore quam subolfacerem adulteri amore fuisse correptam & quam maritus, &c.” “In the wife of a certain nobleman, whom I suspected had been seized with love for an adulterer, and whom her husband,” etc. The printed quotation is syntactically incomplete; its suggestion of adultery is more explicit than Burton’s body text.

[9800] Burton. Printed page 505, o: “Cœpit illico pulsus variari & ferri celerius et sic inveni.” “Immediately the pulse began to change and move faster, and so I discovered it.”

[9801] Editor. Josephus Struthius is the Latinized name of Józef Struś. His marginal case description explicitly suggests an adulterous attachment; the main text is less specific. The claimed inference is presented as his case report.

[9802] Editor. The matching meeting of Jason and Medea is in Apollonius Rhodius, Argonautica 3.962–972, rather than Burton’s book 4. The narrative describes Medea blushing and both lovers initially silent; Burton extends the blush to both.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9803]—— totus Parmeno Tremo, horreoque postquam aspexi hanc,	Parmeno, I tremble all over And shudder now that I have seen her.[9804]
Phædria trembled at the sight of Thais, others sweat, blow short, Crura tremunt ac poplites, —— are troubled with palpitation of heart upon the like occasion, cor proximum ori, saith [9805]Aristenætus, their heart is at their mouth, leaps, these burn and freeze, (for love is fire, ice, hot, cold, itch, feaver, frenzy, plurisy, what not) they look pale, red, and commonly blush at their first congress; and sometimes through violent agitation of spirits, bleed at nose, or when she is talked of:	Phaedria trembled at the sight of Thais. Others sweat and gasp for breath; "their legs and knees tremble." On such occasions they suffer palpitations: "the heart is close to the mouth," says Aristaenetus. Their heart leaps into their mouth; they burn and freeze—for love is fire, ice, heat, cold, an itch, a fever, frenzy, pleurisy: what is it not? They turn pale or red and commonly blush at their first meeting. Sometimes, through the violent agitation of their spirits, their noses bleed, even when she is merely spoken of.[9806]
Source page 505–506 which very sign [9807]Eustathius makes an argument of Ismenes affection, that when she met her Sweet-heart by chance, she changed her countenance, to a Maiden-blush. 'Tis a common thing amongst Lovers, as [9808]Arnulphus that merry-conceited Bishop, hath well expressed in a facete Epigram of his,	Eustathius takes this very sign as evidence of Ismene's affection: when she unexpectedly met her sweetheart, her face changed to a maiden's blush. This is common among lovers, as Arnulf, that witty bishop, has well expressed in a humorous epigram:[9809]

[9803] Burton. Printed page 505, dagger: "Eunuch. act. 2. scen. 2."

[9804] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 83–84, act 1, scene 2. Burton's marginal act 2 is erroneous. Phaedria addresses Parmeno; Parmeno is not the trembling lover.

[9805] Burton. Printed page 505, asterisk: "Epist. 7. lib. 2. Tener sudor & creber anhelitus, palpitatio cordis, &c." Book 2, letter 7: "A light sweat, rapid breathing, palpitation of the heart," etc.

[9806] Editor. Blow short means pant or breathe in short gasps; congress means meeting. The series mixes sensations, conditions and metaphors. "Spirits" retains its historical physiological sense. The assertion about nosebleeds is Burton's; the short Latin fragment about trembling legs remains untraced.

[9807] Burton. Printed page 505, p: "Lib. 1."

[9808] Burton. Printed page 506, q: "Lexoviensis Episcopus." "Bishop of Lisieux."

[9809] Editor. The "very sign" illustrated in Eustathius is blushing, not the immediately preceding nosebleed. Facete and merry-conceited mean witty or humorous. Burton identifies Arnulf as bishop of Lisieux in the margin; the epigram's exact attribution remains to be verified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 506 Alterno facies sibi dat responsa rubore, Et tener affectum prodit utrique pudor, &c.	Their faces answer one another with alternating blushes, And tender modesty reveals the feeling in them both.[9810]
Their faces answer, and by blushing say, How both affected are, they do bewray.	Their faces answer, and their blushes tell What each feels for the other.
But the best conjectures are taken from such symptomes as appear when they are both present; all their speeches, amorous glances, actions, lascivious gestures will bewray them, they cannot contain themselves, but that they will be still kissing.	But the best inferences come from the signs that appear when both lovers are together. Everything they say, their amorous glances, their actions and their lustful gestures reveal them. They cannot restrain themselves from continually kissing.[9811]
[9812]Stratocles the Physitian upon his Wedding day, when he was at dinner, Nihil prius sorbillavit, quam tria basia puellæ pangeret; could not eat his meat for kissing the Bride, &c. First a word, and then a kiss, then some other Complement, and then a kiss, then an idle question, then a kiss, and when he hath pumped his wits dry, can say no more, kissing and coiling are never out of season,	On his wedding day, while at dinner, the physician Stratocles "took no sip before planting three kisses on the girl": he could not eat for kissing the bride. First a word, then a kiss; then some further compliment, then a kiss; then an idle question, then a kiss. And when he has drained his wit dry and can say no more, kissing and embracing are never out of season:[9813]
[9814]Hoc non deficit incipitque semper,	This never fails; it is always beginning again.[9815]

[9810] Editor. Pudor may mean modesty, bashfulness or a sense of shame. Burton follows the Latin couplet with his own English couplet, so both are retained separately.

[9811] Editor. Conjectures means inferences from visible signs, not idle guesses. Still means continually. Burton treats gestures as indications of desire; their interpretation belongs to his literary and medical account.

[9812] Burton. Printed page 506, dagger: "Theodorus prodromus Amaranto dial. Gaulimo interpret." Theodore Prodromos, dialogue Amarantus, in Gaulminus's translation. The printed translator's name is retained.

[9813] Editor. Theodore Prodromos is the Byzantine author; Gaulminus is Gilbert Gaulmin. The exact Latin Amarantus passage remains to be collated. Meat means food; complement is a courteous expression; coiling means embracing.

[9814] Burton. Printed page 506, asterisk: "Petron Catal." A poem transmitted under Petronius, in a collection or Catalecta.

[9815] Editor. Burton cites the line as Petronian. Its exact place in the early collection abbreviated Catal. remains to be verified; the modern line translates the wording printed here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'tis never at an end, [9816]another kiss, and then another, another, and another, &c.	It never ends: another kiss, and then another, another and another.
—— huc ades O Thelayra —— Come kiss me Corinna?	Come here, O Thelayra. Come, kiss me, Corinna![9817]
[9818]Centum basia centies, Centum basia millies, Mille basia millies, Et tot millia millies, Quot guttæ Siculo mari, Quot sunt sydera cœlo, Istis purpureis genis, Istis turgidulis labris, Ocellisque loquaculis, Figam continuo impetu; O formosa Neæra.	A hundred kisses a hundred times, A hundred kisses a thousand times, A thousand kisses a thousand times, And as many thousands, a thousand times, As there are drops in the Sicilian sea, As there are stars in the sky, On those rosy cheeks, On those softly swelling lips, And on those eloquent little eyes, I shall plant in one unbroken rush, O beautiful Neaera.[9819]
As Catullus to Lesbia.	As Catullus says to Lesbia:
Da mihi basia mille, deinde centum, Dein mille altera, da secunda centum, Dein usque altera millia, deinde centum.	Give me a thousand kisses, then a hundred, Then another thousand; give a second hundred, Then still more thousands, then a hundred.[9820]

[9816] Burton. Printed page 506, dagger: "Sed unum ego usque, & unum Petam à tuis labellis, postque unum & unum & unum, dari rogabo. Læcheus Anacreon." "But one, and ever one more, I shall ask from your lips; and after one, and one, and one, I shall ask for another." Leech, Anacreontic verse.

[9817] Editor. Thelayra and Corinna are names addressed in separate poetic fragments. The Latin says only "Come here"; Burton's neighbouring English is not a literal translation of it. Their exact intermediaries remain untraced.

[9818] Burton. Printed page 506, r: "Io. Secundus bas. 7." Johannes Secundus, Kisses 7.

[9819] Editor. Johannes Secundus, Basium 7.1–11. Burton prints Figam, "I shall plant," where the consulted text has ferrem, "I would bring." The modern follows Burton. The multiplication is deliberate poetic excess, not a numerical total to be corrected.

[9820] Editor. Catullus 5.7–9. Burton alters individual words, including the final millia, "thousands," for mille, "a thousand." Both the printed text and its number are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9821]—— first give an hundred, Then a thousand, then another Hundred, then unto the other Add a thousand, and so more, &c.	First give a hundred, Then a thousand, then another Hundred; then to the other Add a thousand, and still more.[9822]
Till you equall with the store, all the grass, &c. So Venus did by her Adonis, the Moon with Endymion, they are still dallying and culling, as so many Doves, Columbatimque labra conserentes labris: and that with alacrity and courage,	Until you match the abundance of all the grass, and so forth. So Venus did with her Adonis, and the Moon with Endymion. They are always fondling and embracing, like so many doves, "joining lips to lips as doves do," and with eagerness and spirit:
[9823]Affligunt avidè corpus, junguntque salivas Oris, & inspirant prensantes dentibus ora.	They press eagerly against the body, mingling Their mouths' saliva, and breathe into one another while gripping lips with their teeth.[9824]

[9821] Burton. Printed page 506, asterisk: "Translated or imitated by Mr. B. Iohnson, our arch Poet in his 119. Ep." Arch Poet means foremost poet; the quoted passage is located differently in the consulted Jonson text.

[9822] Editor. The lines are in Ben Jonson's The Forest 6, To the Same, beginning "Kiss me, Sweet," in the consulted 1692 text. Burton's "119. Ep." does not locate them there. His four displayed lines and the following prose continuation are preserved.

[9823] Burton. Printed page 506, a: "Lucret. l. 4." Lucretius, book 4.

[9824] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 4.1108–1109. The consulted Latin reads adfigunt and pressantes where Burton prints Affligunt and prensantes. The passage describes lovers' frustrated wish for bodily union; "press" renders the forceful contact in Burton's version.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9825]Tam impresso ore ut vix inde labra detrahant, cervice reclinata, as Lamprias in Lucian kissed Thais, Philippus her [9826]in Aristænetus, amore lymphato tam furiosè adhæsit, ut vix labra solvere esset, totumque os mihi contrivit; [9827]Aretines Lucretia, by a suiter of hers was so saluted, and 'tis their ordinary fashion.	"With mouth pressed so firmly that they can scarcely draw their lips away, the neck bent back": so Lamprias kissed Thais in Lucian, and Philippus kissed his beloved in Aristaenetus. "Maddened by love, he clung so fiercely that it was scarcely possible to part our lips, and he bruised my whole mouth." One of her suitors greeted Aretino's Lucretia in this way; and it is their usual practice.[9828]
Source page 506–507 —— dentes illudunt sæpe labellis, Atque premunt arctè adfigentes oscula ——	Their teeth often play upon the lips, And they press close, fastening kisses upon them.[9829]

[9825] Burton. Printed page 506, b: "Lucian. dial. Tom. 4. Merit. sed & aperientes, &c." Lucian, Dialogues of the Courtesans, volume 4; "but also opening," etc. The marginal fragment is incomplete.

[9826] Burton. Printed page 506, c: "Epist. 16." Letter 16.

[9827] Burton. Printed page 506, d: "Deducto ore longo me basio demulcet." "With mouth opened, he caresses me with a long kiss."

[9828] Editor. These are three distinct literary examples: Lucian's Lamprias and Thais, Philippus in Aristaenetus, and Lucretia in the dialogue tradition Burton cites as Aretino. The Latin intermediaries and exact letter numbering remain to be collated.

[9829] Editor. The second line echoes Lucretius 4.1079. Burton joins it to a different fragment about teeth and lips. The two printed lines are retained rather than reconstructed as a continuous Lucretian quotation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 507 They cannot I say, contain themselves, they will be still not only joyning hands, kissing, but embracing, treading on their toes, &c. diving into their bosomes, and that libenter, & cum delectatione, as [9830]Philostratus confesseth to his Mistress; and Lamprias in Lucian, Mammillas premens, per sinum clam dextrâ, &c. feeling their paps, and that scarce honestly sometimes: as the old man in the [9831]Comœdy well observed of his son, Non ego te videbam manum huic puellæ in sinum inserere? Did not I see thee put thy hand into her bosome? go to, with many such love tricks.	They cannot, I say, control themselves. They are always joining hands and kissing, but also embracing, treading on each other's toes and reaching into each other's bosoms, "willingly and with pleasure," as Philostratus confesses to his mistress; and as Lamprias in Lucian, "pressing her breasts, with his right hand secretly inside her dress." They feel their breasts, sometimes with little regard for decency, as the old man in the comedy rightly observed of his son: "Did I not see you put your hand into this girl's bosom?" Come now! And there are many other such lovers' tricks.[9832]
[9833]Juno in Lucian deorum, Tom. 3. dial. 3. complains to Jupiter of Ixion, [9834]he looked so attentively on her, and sometimes would sigh and weep in her company, and when I drank by chance, and gave Ganymede the cup, he would desire to drink still in the very cup that I drank of, and in the same place where I drank, and would kiss the cup, and then look steddily on me, and sometimes sigh, and then again smile.	In Lucian's Dialogues of the Gods, volume 3, dialogue 3, Juno complains to Jupiter about Ixion: he gazed at her intently and sometimes sighed and wept in her company. "When I happened to drink and handed the cup to Ganymede, he would always ask to drink from the very cup I had used, at the same place where I had drunk. He would kiss the cup, then gaze steadily at me, sometimes sighing, then smiling again."[9835]

[9830] Burton. Printed page 507, e: "In delitiis mammas tuas tango, &c." "Amid our pleasures I touch your breasts," etc.

[9831] Burton. Printed page 507, f: "Terent." Terence.

[9832] Editor. Paps means breasts; honestly means decently. Terence's Heauton Timorumenos 562–563 has Chremes rebuke his son Clitipho for putting a hand into a courtesan's bosom. Burton paraphrases the Latin. The Philostratus and Lucian intermediaries remain uncollated.

[9833] Burton. Printed page 507, g: "Tom. 4. merit. dial." Volume 4, Dialogues of the Courtesans. This marginal citation conflicts with the body's Dialogues of the Gods.

[9834] Burton. Printed page 507, h: "Attentè admodum in me aspexit, & interdum ingemiscebat, & lachrymabatur. Et si quando bibens, &c." "He looked at me very intently, and sometimes groaned and wept. And if at any time, drinking," etc.

[9835] Editor. The scene is Lucian, Dialogues of the Gods, Hera and Zeus on Ixion. It appears as dialogue 6 in the consulted Fowler translation; numbering varies. Burton's marginal Dialogues of the Courtesans is a conflicting locator. Juno and Jupiter are the Roman names for Hera and Zeus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If it be so they cannot come neer to dally, have not that opportunity, familiarity, or acquaintance to confer and talk together; yet if they be in presence, their eye will bewray them: Ubi amor ibi oculus, as the common saying is, where I look I like, and where I like I love; but they will lose themselves in her looks.	If they cannot get close enough to caress one another, lacking the opportunity, intimacy or acquaintance to converse, their eyes will still reveal them when they are together. "Where love is, there the eye is," as the common saying goes: where I look, I like; where I like, I love. They will lose themselves in her gaze.
Alter in alterius jactantes lumina vultus, Quærebant taciti noster ubi esset amor.	Casting their eyes upon one another's faces, They silently asked where our love might be.[9836]
They cannot look off whom they love, they will impregnare eam ipsis oculis, deflowre her with their eyes, be still gazing, staring, stealing faces, smiling, glancing at her, as [9837]Apollo on Leucothoe, the Moon on her [9838]Endymion, when she stood still in Caria, and at Latmos caused her Chariot to be stayed. They must all stand and admire, or if she go by, look after her as long as they can see her, she is animæ auriga, as Anacreon calls her, they cannot go by her door or window, but as an Adamant, she draws their eyes to it, though she be not there present, they must needs glance that way, and look back to it.	They cannot take their eyes off the person they love: they would "make her pregnant with their very eyes," deflower her with their gaze. They are always gazing, staring, stealing looks, smiling and glancing at her, as Apollo at Leucothoe, or the Moon at her Endymion, when she stood still in Caria and had her chariot halted at Latmos. They must stand and admire; if she passes, they watch her for as long as she remains in sight. She is "the charioteer of the soul," as Anacreon calls her. They cannot pass her door or window without her drawing their eyes to it like a magnet. Even when she is absent, they must glance that way and look back.[9839]

[9836] Editor. The source of this couplet has not been securely identified. Its shift from "they" to noster, "our," is present in Burton and retained in the translation.

[9837] Burton. Printed page 507, dagger: "Quique omnia cernere debes Leucothoen spectas, & virgine figis in una quos mundo debes oculos, Ovid. Met. 4." "You who ought to see everything gaze at Leucothoe, fixing on one girl the eyes you owe to the world." Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 4.

[9838] Burton. Printed page 507, dagger: "Lucian Tom. 3. quoties ad Cariam venis currum sistis, & desuper aspectas." Lucian, volume 3: "Whenever you come to Caria, you stop your chariot and gaze down from above."

[9839] Editor. Adamant here means a lodestone or magnet. Animae auriga is literally "charioteer of the soul." The Ovid parallel is Metamorphoses 4.195–197, on the Sun's gaze at Leucothoe. The exact Anacreontic phrase and Lucian intermediary remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Aristænetus of [9840]Exithemus, Lucian in his Imagin. of himself, and Tatius of Clitophon say as much, Ille oculos de Leucippe [9841]nunquam dejiciebat, and many Lovers confess when they came in their Mistress presence, they could not hold off their eyes, but looked wistly and steddily on her, inconnivo aspectu, with much eagerness and greediness, as if they would look thorow, or should never have enough sight of her.	Aristaenetus says as much of Exithemus, Lucian of himself in his Portraits, and Achilles Tatius of Clitophon: "He never took his eyes off Leucippe." Many lovers confess that in their mistress's presence they could not turn their eyes away, but looked at her intently and steadily, "with an unblinking gaze," so eagerly and greedily that they seemed to want to see right through her, or as though they could never have enough of seeing her.[9842]
—— Fixis ardens obtutibus hæret;	Burning with passion, she remains fixed in her gaze.[9843]
So she will do by him, drink to him with her eyes, nay drink him up, devoure him, swallow him, as Martials Mamurra is remembred to have done:	She will do the same to him: drink to him with her eyes—indeed, drink him up, devour him, swallow him, as Martial's Mamurra is said to have done:

[9840] Burton. Printed page 507, asterisk: "Ex quo te primum vidi Pythia aliò oculos vertere non fuit." "Since I first saw you, Pythia, it has not been possible to turn my eyes elsewhere."

[9841] Burton. Printed page 507, dagger: "Lib. 4." Book 4.

[9842] Editor. Tatius is Achilles Tatius, author of Leucippe and Clitophon. Wistly means intently. The marginal Pythia belongs to Burton's Aristaenetus example; Exithemus and the early translation's wording are retained pending collation.

[9843] Editor. The line conveys a fixed, ardent gaze. Its exact source remains unconfirmed; the modern feminine subject follows Burton's "So she will do" in the next sentence.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Inspexit molles pueros, oculisque comedit, &c.	He inspected the delicate boys and ate them with his eyes.[9844]
There is a pleasant story to this purpose in Navigat. Vertom. lib. 3. cap. 5. The Sultan of Sanas wife in Arabia, because Vertomannus was fair and white could not look off him, from Sun-rising to Sun-setting, she could not desist, she made him one day come into her chamber, & geminæ horæ spatio intuebatur, non à me nunquam aciem oculorum avertebat, me observans veluti Cupidinem quendam, for two hours space she still gazed on him.	There is an amusing story of this in Varthema's Travels, book 3, chapter 5. Because Varthema was handsome and fair-skinned, the wife of the sultan of Sana in Arabia could not take her eyes off him, from sunrise to sunset. She could not stop. One day she had him come into her room: "For two hours she gazed at me, never turning her eyes away, regarding me as a kind of Cupid." For two hours she kept gazing at him.[9845]
Source page 507–508 A young man in [9846]Lucian fell in love with Venus picture, he came every morning to her Temple, and there continued all day long [9847]from Sun-rising to Sun-set, unwilling to go home at night, sitting over against the Goddess Picture, he did continually look upon her, and mutter to himself I know not what.	A young man in Lucian fell in love with an image of Venus. Every morning he came to her temple and stayed there all day, from sunrise to sunset, reluctant to go home at night. Sitting opposite the goddess's image, he continually gazed at her, muttering I know not what to himself.[9848]

[9844] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 9.59.3. Mamurra is looking at enslaved boys offered for sale. Burton transfers the image of visual consumption to a woman gazing at her beloved.

[9845] Editor. Vertomannus is Ludovico di Varthema, the traveller; Sana is Sana'a. Fair and white combines attractiveness with complexion. Burton is retelling a traveller's claim; the precise Latin edition and chapter remain to be collated.

[9846] Burton. Printed page 507, dagger: "Dial. amorum." Dialogues of Love.

[9847] Burton. Printed page 507, asterisk: "Ad occasum Solis ægrè domum rediens, atque; totum die ex adverso deæ sedens recto, in ipsam perpetuo oculorum ictus direxit, &c." "Returning home reluctantly at sunset, and sitting directly opposite the goddess all day, he continually directed his gaze at her," etc. The printed totum die is grammatically irregular; the sense is "all day."

[9848] Editor. Picture here means a statue: Aphrodite at Cnidus. Amores 15–16, transmitted under Lucian's name, describes the young man's daily visits, lingering gaze and muttering; section 15 supplies Burton's scene. This locates the narrative without settling authorship or Burton's Latin version. The marginal citation and following excerpt retain their separate anchors.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 508 If so be they cannot see them whom they love, they will still be walking and waiting about their Mistress doors, taking all opportunity to see them, as in [9849]Longus Sophista, Daphnis and Cloe, two Lovers, were still hovering at one anothers gates, he sought all occasions to be in her company, to hunt in Summer, and catch Birds in the Frost about her Fathers house in the winter, that she might see him, and he her.	If they cannot see the people they love, they will keep walking and waiting about their mistresses' doors, taking every opportunity to see them. In Longus the sophist, the two lovers Daphnis and Chloe were always hovering at each other's gates. He sought every chance to be with her: hunting in summer and catching birds in the frost around her father's house in winter, so that she could see him and he her.[9850]
[9851]A Kings Palace was not so diligently attended, saith Aretines Lucretia, as my house was when I lay in Rome, the Porch and street was ever full of some, walking or riding, on set purpose to see me, their eye was still upon my window, as they passed by, they could not choose but look back to my house when they were past, and sometimes hem or cough, or take some impertinent occasion to speak aloud, that I might look out and observe them.	"A king's palace was not so closely attended," says Aretino's Lucretia, "as my house when I lived in Rome. The porch and street were always full of people walking or riding there expressly to see me. As they passed, their eyes remained on my window. They could not help looking back at my house after they had gone by, and would sometimes clear their throats or cough, or seize some irrelevant occasion to speak loudly, so that I might look out and notice them."[9852]

[9849] Burton. Printed page 508, x: "Lib. 3." Book 3.

[9850] Editor. Longus, Daphnis and Chloe, book 3. The winter hunting provides a pretext for approaching Chloe's house. Burton's wider seasonal summary is retained; the exact early translation remains to be collated.

[9851] Burton. Printed page 508, dagger: "Regum palatium non tam diligenti custodia septum fuit, ac ædes meas stipabant, &c." "A royal palace was not surrounded by such diligent attendance as the crowd that thronged my house," etc.

[9852] Editor. Lay means lived or stayed. Hem is a throat-clearing sound; impertinent means irrelevant. Lucretia's first-person boast is a speech in the erotic dialogue tradition, not an eyewitness report by Burton.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis so in other places, 'tis common to every Lover, 'tis all his felicity to be with her, to talk with her, he is never well but in her company, and will walk [9853]seven or eight times a day through the street where she dwells, and make sleeveless errands to see her; plotting still where, when, and how to visit her,	It is the same elsewhere; it is common to every lover. All his happiness lies in being with her and talking to her. He is never at ease except in her company, and will walk seven or eight times a day through the street where she lives, inventing pointless errands to see her, always planning where, when and how to visit her:[9854]
[9855]Levesque sub nocte susurri, Composita repetuntur hora.	And soft whispers at nightfall Are sought again at the appointed hour.[9856]
And when he is gone, he thinks every minute an hour, every hour as long as a day, ten days a whole year, till he see her again.	Once he has left, every minute seems an hour, every hour as long as a day, ten days a whole year, until he sees her again.
[9857]Tempora si numeres, benè quæ numeramus amantes.	If you count the time—and we lovers count it well.[9858]

[9853] Burton. Printed page 508, y: "Uno, & eodem die sexties vel septies ambulant per eandem plateam ut vel unico amicæ suæ fruantur aspectu, lib. 3. Theat. mundi." "Six or seven times on one and the same day they walk through the same street, so that they may enjoy even a single glimpse of their beloved." Theatre of the World, book 3. The body gives seven or eight.

[9854] Editor. Sleeveless errands are fruitless errands or invented pretexts. The cited Theatre of the World gives six or seven journeys, whereas Burton's body gives seven or eight; neither count has been silently reconciled.

[9855] Burton. Printed page 508, dagger: "Hor." Horace.

[9856] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.9.19–20. The consulted text has repetantur, "let them be sought again"; Burton's repetuntur makes it a statement. Composita hora means a time arranged beforehand.

[9857] Burton. Printed page 508, dagger: "Ovid." Ovid.

[9858] Editor. Ovid, Heroides 2.7, Phyllis to Demophoon. Burton quotes only the first half of the sentence; the conditional form remains open in the modern line.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And if thou be in love, thou wilt say so too, Et longum formosa vale, farewell Sweet-heart, vale charissima Argenis, &c. Farewell my dear Argenis, once more farewell, farewell. And though he is to meet her by compact, and that very shortly, perchance to morrow, yet loath to depart, he'l take his leave again, and again, and then come back again, look after, and shake his hand, wave his hat afar off. Now gone, he thinks it long till he see her again, and she him, the clocks are surely set back, the hour's past,	If you are in love, you will say so too. "And a long farewell, beautiful one"; farewell, sweetheart; "farewell, dearest Argenis." Farewell, my dear Argenis; once more farewell, farewell. Although they have arranged to meet again very soon, perhaps tomorrow, he is reluctant to leave. He says goodbye again and again, then comes back, looks after her, waves his hand, waves his hat from far away. Once gone, he finds the wait until he sees her again too long, and she feels the same about him. Surely the clocks have been put back; the appointed hour is past:[9859]
[9860]Hospita Demophoon tua te Rodopeia Phillis, Ultra promissum tempus abesse queror.	Demophoon, I, your hostess Phyllis of Rhodope, Complain that you are absent beyond the promised time.[9861]

[9859] Editor. Compact means agreement. Argenis is the heroine of John Barclay's romance. The farewell fragments and their exact intermediaries remain to be collated; the repeated farewells are deliberate.

[9860] Burton. Printed page 508, dagger: "Ovid." Ovid.

[9861] Editor. Ovid, Heroides 2.1–2. Phyllis addresses the absent Demophoon; Rhodope identifies her Thracian home. Burton's Rodopeia spelling is retained in the original.

Original text 1651	Modern English
She looks out at window still to see whether he come, [9862]and by report Phillis went nine times to the Sea side that day, to see if her Demophoon were approaching, and [9863]Troilus to the City gates, to look for his Creiseid. She is ill at ease, and sick till she see him again, peevish in the mean time, discontent, heavy, sad, and why comes he not? where is he? why breaks he promise? why tarries he so long? sure he is not well; sure he hath some mischance, sure he forgets himself and me, with infinite such.	She keeps looking out of the window to see whether he is coming. Phyllis is said to have gone to the shore nine times that day to see whether her Demophoon was approaching; and Troilus went to the city gates to look for his Cressida. She is uneasy and sick until she sees him again: meanwhile irritable, dissatisfied, dejected and sad. Why does he not come? Where is he? Why does he break his promise? Why does he take so long? Surely he is unwell; surely some accident has befallen him; surely he has forgotten himself and me—and countless other such thoughts.[9864]

[9862] Burton. Printed page 508, asterisk: “Hyginus, fab. 59. Eo die dicitur novies ad littus cucurrisse.” Hyginus, Fable 59: “On that day she is said to have run to the shore nine times.”

[9863] Burton. Printed page 508, asterisk: “Chaucer.” Chaucer.

[9864] Editor. Hyginus, Fable 59.2, says that Phyllis ran to the shore nine times on the day appointed for Demophoon’s return. It explains the place-name Ennea Hodoi, “Nine Roads,” through these visits. Burton’s nine visits in one day are thus confirmed. His edition and Chaucer’s city-gate episode in Troilus and Criseyde remain uncollated; the names are modernized in the right column.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 508–509 And then confident again, up she gets, out she looks, listens and enquires, harkens, kens, every man afar off is sure he, every stirring in the street, now he is there, that's he, malè auroræ, malè soli dicit, deieratque, &c. the longest day that ever was, so she raves, restless and impatient; for Amor non patitur moras, Love brooks no delayes: the time's quickly gone that's spent in her company, the miles short, the way pleasant, all weather is good whilst he goes to her house, heat or cold, though his teeth chatter in his head, he moves not, wet or dry, 'tis all one, wet to the skin, he feels it not, cares not at least for it, but will easily endure it and much more, because it is done with alacrity, and for his Mistress sweet sake: let the burden be never so heavy, Love makes it light.	Then she grows confident again: up she gets, out she looks, listening and asking, straining her ears and searching the distance. Surely every far-off man is he; every movement in the street means he is there. That is he! "She curses the dawn, curses the sun, and swears." It is the longest day there ever was. So she raves, restless and impatient, for "love allows no delays": love will not wait. Time spent with her passes quickly; the miles are short, the road pleasant. All weather is good while he travels to her house. Heat or cold—even if his teeth chatter—does not trouble him. Wet or dry, it is all the same; soaked to the skin, he does not feel it, or at least does not care. He readily endures it and much more, because he does it gladly for his sweet mistress's sake. However heavy the burden, love makes it light.[9865]
Source page 509 [9866]Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and it was quickly gone because he loved her. None so merry, if he may happily enjoy her company, he is in heaven for a time, and if he may not, dejected in an instant, solitary, silent, he departs weeping, lamenting, sighing, complaining.	Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and they passed quickly because he loved her. No one is so happy: if he is fortunate enough to enjoy her company, he is in heaven for a while. If he cannot, he is instantly cast down, solitary and silent; he leaves weeping, lamenting, sighing and complaining.[9867]

[9865] Editor. Kens means sees or makes out at a distance; brooks means tolerates. "He moves not" is read as remaining untroubled, not ceasing to travel. The unassigned Latin fragments are translated without supplying an unverified author.

[9866] Burton. Printed page 509, asterisk: "Gen. 29. 20." Genesis 29:20.

[9867] Editor. Genesis 29:20 describes Jacob's seven years of service as seeming only a few days because of his love for Rachel. Burton's account passes directly from cheerful endurance to distress at separation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But the Symptomes of the mind in Lovers, are almost infinite, and so diverse, that no Art can comprehend them; though they be merry sometimes, and rapt beyond themselves for joy: yet most part, Love is a plague, a torture, an hell, a bitter sweet passion at last; [9868]Amor melle & felle est fæcundissimus, gustum dat dulcem & amarum. 'Tis suavis amaricies, dolentia delectabilis, hilare tormentum;	But lovers' mental symptoms are almost endless, and so varied that no discipline can encompass them. Though they are sometimes cheerful and carried beyond themselves with joy, love is for the most part a plague, a torture, a hell, a bittersweet passion in the end. "Love abounds in honey and gall; it gives a taste both sweet and bitter." It is "sweet bitterness, delightful pain, cheerful torment":[9869]
[9870]Et me melle beant suaviora, Et me felle necant amariora;	Sweeter than honey, these things delight me; More bitter than gall, they kill me.[9871]
Like a summer fly or Sphines wings, or a rainbow of all colours,	Like a summer fly, or a sphinx's wings, or a rainbow of every colour:
Quæ ad solis radios conversæ aureæ erant, Adversus nubes cæruleæ, quale jubar Iridis,	Turned towards the sun's rays they were golden, Against the clouds blue, like the radiance of a rainbow.[9872]

[9868] Burton. Printed page 509, dagger: "Plautus Cistel." Plautus, Cistellaria, The Casket Comedy.

[9869] Editor. Plautus, Cistellaria 69–70. Burton compresses the fuller contrast between a sweet taste and bitterness to satiety. Art means an organized discipline or body of knowledge; gall is bitter bile.

[9870] Burton. Printed page 509, asterisk: "Stobæus è græco." Stobaeus, from the Greek.

[9871] Editor. The margin credits Stobaeus as transmitter of the Greek. The original author, Greek passage and Latin intermediary remain unverified. The plural things in English supplies the objects described by the Latin comparatives.

[9872] Editor. Burton prints Sphines; "sphinx's" is an interpretation of that uncertain form. The Latin description of shifting golden and blue colours remains unattributed. Its plurals refer back to the wings.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Fair, fowl, and full of variation, though most part irksome and bad. For in a word, the Spanish inquisition is not comparable to it; [9873]a torment and execution it is, as he calls it in the poet, an unquenchable fire, and what not? [9874]From it, saith Austin, arise biting cares, perturbations, passions, sorrows, fears, suspitions, discontents, contentions, discords, wars, treacheries, enmities, flattery, cosening, riot, lust, impudence, cruelty, knavery, &c.	Beautiful, ugly and endlessly changing, though mostly distressing and bad. In a word, the Spanish Inquisition cannot compare with it. It is "torment and execution," as the character in the poet calls it, an unquenchable fire—and what is it not? From it, says Augustine, arise gnawing cares, disturbances, passions, sorrows, fears, suspicions, discontents, disputes, discord, wars, treachery, enmity, flattery, fraud, excess, lust, shamelessness, cruelty and villainy.[9875]
[9876]—— dolor, querelæ, Lamentatio, lachrymæ perennes, Languor, anxietas, amaritudo; Aut si triste magis potest quid esse, Hos tu das Comites Neæra vitæ.	Pain, complaints, Lamentation, ceaseless tears, Languor, anxiety, bitterness, Or anything sadder still, if such can be: These, Neaera, are the companions you give my life.[9877]
These be the companions of lovers, and the ordinary symptomes, as the Poet repeats them.	These are lovers' companions, their usual symptoms, as the poet lists them.
[9878]In amore hæc insunt vitia, Suspitiones, inimicitiæ, audaciæ, Bellum, pax rursum, &c.	Love contains these faults: Suspicions, enmities, acts of boldness, War, then peace again.[9879]

[9873] Burton. Printed page 509, z: "Plautus; credo ego ad hominis carnificinam amorem inventum esse." "I believe love was invented for the torture of man." The marginal wording differs from the consulted Plautus.

[9874] Burton. Printed page 509, a: "De civitat. lib. 22. cap. 20. Ex eo oriuntur mordaces curæ, perturbationes, mærores, formidines, insana gaudia, discordiæ, lites, bella, insidiæ, iracundiæ, inimicitiæ, fallaciæ, adulatio, fraus, furtum, nequitia, impudentia." City of God, book 22, chapter 20: "From it arise gnawing cares, disturbances, griefs, fears, mad joys, discords, disputes, wars, plots, fits of anger, enmities, deceptions, flattery, fraud, theft, wickedness and shamelessness."

[9875] Editor. The comparison with the Inquisition is Burton's hyperbole. Plautus, Cistellaria 203, makes Love the inventor of torture. Augustine's matching list is City of God 22.22, not the printed 22.20, and concerns misplaced love of many harmful things more generally. Burton selects and adapts it to erotic love.

[9876] Burton. Printed page 509, dagger: "Marullus l. 1." Marullus, book 1.

[9877] Editor. Michele Marullo, Epigrammata 1.28, Ad Neaeram. Burton extracts the catalogue from a longer poem about the miserable life Neaera gives the speaker.

[9878] Burton. Printed page 509, b: "Ter. Eunuch." Terence, The Eunuch.

[9879] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 59–61. Burton omits items and prints audaciae, "acts of boldness," where the consulted text has indutiae, "truces." The modern translates Burton's reading.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9880]Insomnia, ærumna, error, terror, & fuga, Excogitantia, excors immodestia, Petulantia, cupiditas, & malevolentia; Inhæret etiam aviditas, desidia, injuria, Inopia, contumelia, & dispendium, &c.	Sleeplessness, hardship, wandering, terror and flight, Scheming, witless lack of restraint, Wantonness, desire and ill will; Also clinging to it are greed, idleness, injury, Poverty, insult and loss.[9881]
In love these vices are; suspitions, Peace, war, and impudence, detractions, Dreams, cares, and errors, terrors and affrights, Immodest pranks, devices, sleights and flights, Heart-burnings, wants, neglects, desire of wrong; Loss continual, expence and hurt among.	These faults are found in love: suspicions, Peace, war, shamelessness and slander, Dreams, cares and errors, terrors and alarms, Indecent pranks, plots, tricks and flights, Resentments, needs, neglect, the wish to injure, Continual loss, expense and harm among them.[9882]
Every Poet is full of such catalogues of Love symptomes; but fear and sorrow may justly challenge the chief place. Though Hercules de Saxonia cap. 3. Tract. de melanch. will exclude fear from Love Melancholy, yet I am otherwise perswaded. [9883]Res est solliciti plena timoris amor.	Every poet is full of such catalogues of love's symptoms; but fear and sorrow may rightly claim the foremost place. Although Hercules de Saxonia, in chapter 3 of his Treatise on Melancholy, would exclude fear from love melancholy, I am persuaded otherwise: "Love is a thing full of anxious fear."[9884]
Source page 510 'Tis full of fear, anxiety, doubt, care, peevishness, suspicion, it turns a man into a woman, which made Hesiod belike, put fear and paleness Venus daughters;	It is full of fear, anxiety, doubt, care, irritability and suspicion. It turns a man into a woman—which presumably made Hesiod call Fear and Paleness daughters of Venus:[9885]

[9880] Burton. Printed page 509, c: "Plautus Mercat." Plautus, The Merchant.

[9881] Editor. Plautus, Mercator 25–30. Burton shortens and alters the catalogue. Excogitantia, here rendered "scheming," differs from the consulted incogitantia, "thoughtlessness." Insomnia is sleeplessness; the subsequent English verse instead says "Dreams."

[9882] Editor. Burton's English catalogue combines and reshapes the preceding quotations. Heart-burnings means resentments; sleights are tricks. His English version is separately modernized, preserving its differences from the Latin.

[9883] Burton. Printed page 509, d: "Ovid." Ovid.

[9884] Editor. Hercules de Saxonia is Ercole Sassonia, a physician. Ovid's line is Heroides 1.12, spoken by Penelope. Burton explicitly disagrees with excluding fear from love melancholy; the exact Sassonia passage remains uncollated.

[9885] Editor. The remark about becoming a woman expresses Burton's gendered judgement. Hesiod, Theogony 933–936, makes Deimos and Phobos male children of Aphrodite and Ares, not daughters. Burton's Latin represents their names as Paleness and Fear; its early translator remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— Marti clypeos atque arma secanti Alma Venus peperit Pallorem, unaque Timorem:	To Mars, who cleaves shields and armour, Gracious Venus bore Paleness, and Fear with him.
Because fear and love are still linked together. Moreover they are apt to mistake, amplifie, too credulous sometimes, too full of hope and confidence, and then again very jealous, unapt to believe or entertain any good news.	For fear and love are always joined. Moreover, lovers are prone to misunderstand and exaggerate: sometimes too credulous, too hopeful and confident, then again intensely suspicious and unwilling to believe or welcome any good news.
The Comical Poet hath prettily painted out this passage amongst the rest in a [9886]Dialogue betwixt Mitio and Æschines, a gentle father and a love-sick son. M. Be of good chear my son, thou shalt have her to wife. Æ. Ah father, do you mock me now? M. I mock thee, why? Æ. That which I so earnestly desire, I more suspect and fear. M. Get you home, and send for her to be your wife. Æ. What now a wife, now father, &c.	The comic poet neatly depicts this state, among others, in a dialogue between Micio and Aeschinus, a kindly father and a lovesick son. Micio: "Take heart, my son; you shall marry her." Aeschinus: "Ah, father, are you mocking me now?" Micio: "Mocking you? Why?" Aeschinus: "The more earnestly I desire it, the more I doubt and fear it." Micio: "Go home and send for her to be your wife." Aeschinus: "What, a wife now, father? Now?"[9887]

[9886] Burton. Printed page 510, dagger: "Adelph. Act. 4. scen. 5. M. Bono animo es, duces uxorem hanc Æschines. Æ. Hem, pater, num tu ludis me nunc? M. Egone te, quamobrem? Æ. Quod tam misere cupio, &c." The Brothers, act 4, scene 5. Micio: "Take heart, Aeschinus; you shall marry her." Aeschinus: "What, father, are you mocking me now?" Micio: "I, you? Why?" Aeschinus: "Because I desire it so desperately," etc.

[9887] Editor. Terence, Adelphoe, The Brothers: Micio is Aeschinus's adoptive father. Burton abbreviates the exchange following Micio's assurance that Aeschinus may marry. The consulted Latin includes a direction to pray to the gods, omitted here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
These doubts, anxieties, suspitions, are the least part of their torments; they break many times from passions to actions, speak fair, and flatter, now most obsequious and willing, by and by they are averse, wrangle, fight, swear, quarrel, laugh, weep: and he that doth not so by fits, [9888]Lucian holds, is not throughly touched with this Load-stone of Love. So their actions and passions are intermixt, but of all other passions, Sorrow hath the greatest share; [9889]Love to many is bitterness it self; rem amaram Plato calls it, a bitter potion, an agony, a plague.	These doubts, anxieties and suspicions are the least of their torments. They often pass from feelings to actions: speaking pleasantly and flattering, now completely compliant and willing, then resistant, arguing, fighting, swearing, quarrelling, laughing and weeping. Lucian holds that anyone who does not act like this by turns has not been thoroughly touched by love's lodestone. Their actions and emotions are thus mixed together, but sorrow takes the greatest share. To many, love is bitterness itself. Plato calls it "a bitter thing": a bitter potion, an agony, a plague.[9890]

[9888] Burton. Printed page 510, asterisk: "Tom. 4. dial. amorum." Volume 4, Dialogues of Love.

[9889] Burton. Printed page 510, e: "Aristotle 2. Rhet. puts love therefore in the irascible part." The irascible part is a historical division of the soul associated with passions such as anger. Burton's precise Aristotelian warrant remains to be established.

[9890] Editor. Load-stone continues the magnetic metaphor for attraction. Passions means emotions. Burton's Lucian and Plato references, and the marginal Aristotelian division of the soul, remain to be established from their precise sources.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9891]Eripite hanc pestem perniciemque mihi; Quæ mihi subrepens imos ut torpor in artus, Expulit ex omni pectore lætitias.	Tear this plague, this ruin, away from me; Creeping like numbness into the depths of my limbs, It has driven every joy from my heart.[9892]
O take away this plague, this mischief from me, Which as a numness over all my body, Expels my joys, and makes my soul so heavy.	Oh, take this plague, this affliction from me, Which, like numbness throughout my body, Drives out my joys and weighs down my soul.
Phædria had a true touch of this, when he cryed out,	Phaedria felt this keenly when he cried:
[9893]O Thais, Utinam esset mihi Pars æqua amoris tecum, ac pariter fieret ut Aut hoc tibi doleret itidem, ut mihi dolet.	O Thais, if only I had An equal share of love with you, and it could come about That this hurt you just as it hurts me.[9894]
O Thais would thou hadst of these my pains a part, Or as it doth me now, so it would make thee smart.	O Thais, I wish you shared some of these pains of mine, Or that it made you suffer as it makes me suffer now.
So had that yong man, when he roared again for discontent.	So did that young man when he roared with distress:

[9891] Burton. Printed page 510, unmarked: “Ovid.” The quotation beside this attribution is Catullus 76.20–22.

[9892] Editor. Catullus 76.20–22, not Ovid as the margin says. The speaker asks the gods for release from consuming love. Burton follows it with his own English three-line rendering, retained separately.

[9893] Burton. Printed page 510, dagger: “Ter. Eunuch. Act. 1. sc. 2.” Terence, The Eunuch, act 1, scene 2.

[9894] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus, act 1, scene 2, Phaedria to Thais. Burton abbreviates and reshapes the wish for equal love or equal pain; the awkward ac … aut sequence is preserved in the original and conveyed by the joined wish in English.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9895]Jactor, crucior, agitor, stimulor, Versor in amoris rota miser, Exanimor, feror, distrahor, deripior, Ubi sum, ibi non sum; ubi non sum, ibi est animus.	I am tossed, tortured, driven, goaded, Wretchedly turned upon love's wheel, Drained of life, swept away, pulled apart and torn down; Where I am, I am not; where I am not, there is my mind.[9896]
I am vext and toss'd, and rack't on Loves wheel; Where not, I am; but where am, do not feel.	I am troubled, tossed and tortured on love's wheel; Where I am not, I am; where I am, I have no feeling.
Source page 510–511 The Moon in [9897]Lucian, made her mone to Venus, that she was almost dead for love, pereo equidem amore; and after a long tale, she broke off abruptly and wept, [9898]O Venus thou knowest my poor heart. Charmides in [9899]Lucian, was so impatient, that he sob'd and sighed, tore his hair, and said he would hang himself, I am undone, O sister Tryphæna, I cannot endure these love pangs; what shall I do? Vos O dii Averrunci, solvite me his curis, O yee Gods, free me from these cares and miseries, out of the anguish of his Soul, [9900]Theocles prays.	In Lucian, the Moon lamented to Venus that she was almost dying of love: "I am indeed perishing from love." After a long tale she broke off abruptly and wept: "O Venus, you know my poor heart." In Lucian, Charmides was so distraught that he sobbed and sighed, tore his hair and said he would hang himself. "I am undone, O sister Tryphaena; I cannot endure these pangs of love. What shall I do?" "O gods who avert evil, release me from these cares": out of the anguish of his soul Theocles prays, "O gods, free me from these cares and miseries."[9901]

[9895] Burton. Printed page 510, asterisk: "Plautus." Plautus.

[9896] Editor. Plautus, Cistellaria 206–211: Alcesimarchus compares himself to someone tortured on a wheel. Burton shortens the passage and follows it with a compressed English couplet. The divided sense of bodily and mental presence remains in both versions.

[9897] Burton. Printed page 510, a: "Tom. 3." Volume 3.

[9898] Burton. Printed page 510, b: "Scis quod posthac dicturus fuerim." "You know what I would have said next." The masculine dicturus is retained, although the body's speaker is the Moon.

[9899] Burton. Printed page 510, c: "Tom. 4. dial. merit. Tryphæna, Amor me perdit, neque malum hoc amplius sustinere possum." Volume 4, Dialogues of the Courtesans: "Tryphaena, love is destroying me, and I cannot bear this suffering any longer."

[9900] Burton. Printed page 511, d: "Aristænetus, lib. 2. epist. 8." Aristaenetus, book 2, letter 8.

[9901] Editor. These are separate literary speakers: the Moon, Charmides and Theocles. Averrunci means gods who avert evil. The first two passages are attributed to Lucian, the third to Aristaenetus 2.8; their early translations require full collation. "Sister" is retained as the speaker's form of address.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 511 Shall I say, most part of a Lovers life is full of agony, anxiety, fear and grief, complaints, sighs, suspitions, and cares, (high ho, my heart is wo) full of silence and irksome solitariness?	Shall I say that most of a lover's life is full of agony, anxiety, fear and grief, complaints, sighs, suspicions and cares—"Heigh-ho, my heart is woe"—full of silence and painful solitude?
Frequenting shady bowers in discontent, To the ayre his fruitless clamors he will vent.	Discontented, he frequents the shady bowers And pours his fruitless cries into the air.[9902]
Except at such times that he hath lucida intervalla, pleasant gales, or sudden alterations, as if his Mistress smile upon him, give him a good look, a kiss, or that some comfortable message be brought him, his service is accepted, &c.	Except when he has "lucid intervals," pleasant breezes or sudden changes: when his mistress smiles on him, gives him a kindly look or a kiss, or some encouraging message arrives saying that his courtship is accepted, and so forth.[9903]
He is then too confident and rapt beyond himself, as if he had heard the Nightingale in the Spring before the Cuckow, or as [9904]Calisto was at Melebæas presence, Quis unquam hac mortali vita tam gloriosum corpus vidit? humanitatem transcendere videor, &c. who ever saw so glorious a sight, what man ever enjoyed such delight? More content cannot be given of the Gods, wished, had or hoped of any mortal man. There is no happiness in the world comparable to his, no content, no joy to this, no life to Love, he is in Paradise.	Then he is overconfident and carried beyond himself, as though in spring he had heard the nightingale before the cuckoo, or as Calisto was in Melibea's presence: "Who has ever seen so glorious a body in this mortal life? I seem to transcend humanity." Who ever saw so glorious a sight? What man ever enjoyed such delight? No greater satisfaction can be granted by the gods, desired, possessed or hoped for by any mortal. No happiness in the world compares with his, no contentment or joy with this; no life compares with love. He is in paradise.[9905]

[9902] Editor. Bowers are sheltered, shaded places. The source of this English couplet has not yet been securely identified.

[9903] Editor. Lucida intervalla means lucid intervals. Burton extends the expression to temporary relief and elation; gales are favourable breezes, used figuratively.

[9904] Burton. Printed page 511, dagger: "Celestinæ, act. 1. Sancti majore lætitia non fruuntur. Si mihi Deus omnium votorum mortalium summam concedat, non magis, &c." Celestina, act 1: "The saints enjoy no greater happiness. If God were to grant me the sum of all mortal wishes, not more," etc.

[9905] Editor. Calisto and Melibea are the central lovers of Celestina. The Latin excerpt and its intermediary remain to be collated. The nightingale-before-cuckoo comparison alludes to an auspicious sign; Burton does not identify its source here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9906]Quis me uno vivit fælicior? aut magis hac est Optandum vita dicere quis poterit?	Who lives happier than I alone? Or who can say That anything is more desirable than this life?[9907]
Who lives so happy as my self? what bliss In this our life may be compar'd to this?	Who lives as happily as I? What bliss In this life of ours can compare with this?
He will not change fortune in that case with a Prince.	In that state he would not exchange his fortune with a prince.
[9908]Donec gratus eram tibi, Persarum vigui rege beatior.	While I was dear to you, I flourished happier than the king of Persia.[9909]
The Persian Kings are not so joviall as he is, [9910]O e festus dies hominis, O happy day; so Chærea exclaims when he came from Pamphila his Sweet-heart, well pleased,	The Persian kings are not as merry as he is. "Oh, a man's holiday!" Oh, happy day! So Chaerea exclaims when he comes away, well pleased, from his sweetheart Pamphila:[9911]
Nunc est profecto interfici cum perpeti me possem, Ne hoc gaudium contaminet vita aliqua ægritudine.	Now, surely, I could bear to be killed, Lest life taint this joy with some distress.
He could find in his heart to be killed instantly, lest if he live longer, some sorrow or sickness should contaminate his joyes. A little after, he was so merrily set upon the same occasion, that he could not contain himself.	He could bring himself to be killed at once, lest longer life should taint his joy with sorrow or sickness. A little later, on the same occasion, he was in such high spirits that he could not contain himself:

[9906] Burton. Printed page 511, f: "Catullus de Lesbia." Catullus, on Lesbia.

[9907] Editor. Catullus 107.7–8. Burton prints optandum, whereas the consulted text has optandus, qualifying the person whose life is enviable. The modern follows the impersonal sense of Burton's wording.

[9908] Burton. Printed page 511, g: "Hor. ode 9. lib. 3." Horace, Odes 3.9.

[9909] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.9.1 and 4. Burton leaves out the two intervening lines. The poem is a dialogue between former lovers contemplating reconciliation.

[9910] Burton. Printed page 511, e: "Act. 3. scen. 5. Eunuch. Ter." Terence, The Eunuch, act 3, scene 5.

[9911] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 550–560. Chaerea's delight follows his rape of Pamphila, which Burton's "sweetheart" wording obscures. The passage is a character's exultation, not evidence of a mutually welcomed encounter. Aegritudo can mean distress as well as sickness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9912]O populares, ecquis me vivit hodie fortunatior? Nemo hercule quisquam; nam in me dii plane potestatem Suam omnem ostendere;	O fellow citizens, does anyone alive today have better fortune than I? No one, by Hercules, no one; for in me the gods have plainly displayed All their power.[9913]
Is't possible (O my Countrymen) for any living to be so happy as my self? No sure it cannot be, for the Gods have shewed all their power, all their goodness in me. Yet by and by when this young Gallant was crossed in his wench, he laments, and cryes, and roars down-right.	Is it possible, my countrymen, for anyone alive to be as happy as I? Surely not: the gods have displayed all their power, all their goodness, in me. Yet presently, when this young gallant was thwarted in his pursuit of the girl, he lamented, cried and positively roared.
Occidi —— I am undone;	I am ruined! I am undone!
Neque virgo est usquam, neque ego, qui è conspectu illam amisi meo. Ubi quæram, ubi investigem, quem percuncter, quam insistam viam?	The girl is nowhere, and neither am I, who have lost sight of her. Where shall I search, where trace her, whom ask, which road take?[9914]
The Virgin's gone, and I am gone, she's gone, she's gone, and what shall I do? where shall I seek her, where shall I find her, whom shall I ask? what way, what course shall I take? what will become of me?	The girl is gone, and I am lost. She is gone, she is gone—and what shall I do? Where shall I seek her? Where shall I find her? Whom shall I ask? Which road, which course shall I take? What will become of me?

[9912] Burton. Printed page 511, f: "Act. 5. scen. 9." Act 5, scene 9. The corresponding speech is numbered act 5, scene 8 in the consulted Terence.

[9913] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 1031–1033, numbered 5.8 in the consulted text. This later joy concerns recognition of Pamphila's citizen status and the prospect of marriage; Burton joins it to the earlier episode.

[9914] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 292–294. This speech actually precedes the two joyful scenes just quoted. Burton rearranges the play to illustrate emotional reversals; the order here follows Burton.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 511–512 [9915]—— vitales auras invitus agebat, he was weary of his life, sick, mad and desperate [9916]utinam mihi esset aliquid hic, quo nunc me præcipitem darem. 'Tis not Chæreas case this alone, but his, and his, and every Lover's in the like state.	"Unwillingly he drew the breath of life": he was weary of living, sick, mad and desperate. "If only there were something here from which I could throw myself headlong now." This is not Chaerea's case alone, but this lover's, and that lover's, and every lover's in the same condition.[9917]
Source page 512 If he hear ill news, have bad success in his suit, she frown upon him, or that his Mistress in his presence respect another more (as [9918]Hædus observs) Prefer another suiter, speak more familiarly to him, or use more kindly then himself, if by nod, smile, message she disclose her self to another, he is instantly tormented, none so dejected as he is, utterly undone, a castaway [9919]In quem fortuna omnia odiorum suorum crudelissima tela exonerat, a dead man, the scorn of fortune, a monster of fortune, worse then naught, the losse of a Kingdom had been less.	If he hears bad news, meets with failure in his courtship, sees her frown at him or show another man greater regard in his presence—as Haedus observes, "prefer another suitor, speak more familiarly to him or treat him more kindly; if by a nod, smile or message she reveals her feelings to another"—he is instantly tormented. No one is so dejected: he is utterly ruined, an outcast "upon whom Fortune discharges all the cruellest arrows of her hatred," a dead man, Fortune's laughingstock, a monstrous example of her power, worse than nothing. Losing a kingdom would have been less.[9920]

[9915] Burton. Printed page 511, dagger: "Mantuan." Mantuan, the poet Baptista Mantuanus.

[9916] Burton. Printed page 511, asterisk: "Ter. Adelph. 3. 4." Terence, The Brothers, 3.4. The matching line is in Andria 606, spoken by Davus.

[9917] Editor. Mantuan, Eclogue 1.38, has Faustus recalling Galla: invitus agebam, "unwillingly I lived," against Burton's agebat, "he lived." The headlong-fall wish is Terence, Andria 606, spoken by Davus after his scheme goes wrong, not a lover in Adelphoe 3.4 as the margin suggests. Both sources are located; Burton's altered person and printed attribution are preserved.

[9918] Burton. Printed page 512, g: "Lib. 1. de contem. amoribus. Si quem alium respexerit amica suavius, & familiarius, si quem alloquuta fuerit, si nutu, nuncio, &c. statim cruciatur." Book 1, On Contempt of Love: if his beloved looks more sweetly and familiarly upon another, speaks to someone else, or communicates by nod, message, etc., he is immediately tormented.

[9919] Burton. Printed page 512, dagger: "Calisto in Celestina." Calisto in Celestina.

[9920] Editor. Haedus is Pietro Edo. The sequence of imagined slights makes jealousy a torment; Fortune's arrows continue Burton's deliberate exaggeration. His Calisto quotation and Haedus's precise wording await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9921]Aretine's Lucretia made very good proof of this, as she relates it her self. For when I made some of my suiters beleeve I would betake my self to a Nunnery, they took on, as if they had lost Father and Mother, because they were for ever after to want my company. omnes labores leves fuere, all other labour was light; [9922]but this might not be endured,	Aretino's Lucretia proved this very well, as she herself relates: "When I made some of my suitors believe that I would enter a convent, they grieved as though they had lost father and mother, because they would be deprived of my company for ever." "All hardships were light": every other burden was easy, but this could not be endured:[9923]
Tui carendum quod erat ——	That I had to be without you.[9924]
for I cannot be without thy company, mournfull Amyntas, painfull Amyntas, carefull Amyntas; better a Metropolitan City were sackt, a Royall Army overcome, an invincible Armado sunk, and twenty thousand Kings should perish, then her little finger ake, so zealous are they, and so tender of her good. They would all turn Friers for my sake, as she follows it, in hope by that means to meet, or see me again, as my Confessors, at stool-ball, or at barly-break:	For I cannot do without your company: mournful Amyntas, suffering Amyntas, anxious Amyntas. Better that a capital city be sacked, a royal army defeated, an invincible armada sunk and twenty thousand kings perish than that her little finger ache: so devoted are they, so solicitous for her welfare. "They would all become friars for my sake," she continues, hoping in that way to meet or see me again as my confessors, at stoolball or at barley-break.[9925]

[9921] Burton. Printed page 512, h: "Pornodidasc. dial. Ital. Patre & matre se singulatim orbos censebant, quod meo contubernio carendum esset." The Italian dialogue Pornodidascalus: each considered himself bereft of father and mother because he would have to forgo my company.

[9922] Burton. Printed page 512, dagger: "Ter. tui carendum quod erat." Terence: that I had to be without you.

[9923] Editor. Lucretia speaks within the erotic dialogue tradition associated with Aretino and its Latin adaptation, Pornodidascalus. Burton presents a literary character's boast. The margin's defective in armor is rendered as "into marble," the sense supplied by his English; the printed form remains.

[9924] Editor. Terence, Heauton Timorumenos 399–400: the quoted phrase completes the contrast with other hardships. Burton divides the Latin across prose and a separate verse fragment.

[9925] Editor. Amyntas is a conventional pastoral lover's name. Painful and careful mean suffering and anxious. Stoolball is a ball game; barley-break a chasing game often associated with courtship. The enormous losses are comic hyperbole.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And so afterwards when an importunate suiter came, [9926]If I had bid my Maid say that I was not at leisure, not within, busy, could not speak with him, he was instantly astonished, and stood like a pillar of marble; another went swearing, chafing, cursing, foaming.	So afterwards, when a persistent suitor came, "If I told my maid to say that I had no time, was out, was busy or could not speak with him, he was instantly stunned and stood like a marble pillar. Another went away swearing, raging, cursing and foaming":
[9927]Illa sibi vox ipsa Iovis violentior irâ, cum tonat, &c.	That very utterance was fiercer to him than Jupiter's anger when he thunders.[9928]
the voyce of a mandrake had been sweeter musick; but he to whom I gave entertainment, was in the Elysian fields, ravished for joy, quite beyond himself. 'Tis the generall humor of all Lovers, she is their stern, Pole-star, and guide.	A mandrake's cry would have been sweeter music. "But the man I welcomed was in the Elysian fields, transported with joy, quite beside himself." This is the general disposition of all lovers: she is their rudder, Pole Star and guide.[9929]
[9930]Deliciumque animi, deliquiumque sui.	The delight of his soul, and the loss of himself.[9931]

[9926] Burton. Printed page 512, i: "Si responsum esset dominam occupatam esse aliisque vacaret, ille statim vix hoc audito velut in armor obriguit, alii se damnare, &c. at cui favebam, in campis Elysiis esse videbatur, &c." If the answer was that the lady was occupied and had time for others, he, scarcely hearing this, immediately stiffened as if into marble; others cursed themselves, etc. But the man I favoured seemed to be in the Elysian fields, etc.

[9927] Burton. Printed page 512, dagger: "Mantuan." Mantuan.

[9928] Editor. Mantuan is Baptista Mantuanus. The precise source of this thunder comparison has not yet been established; the fragment is translated as printed.

[9929] Editor. The mandrake was reputed to scream when uprooted; Elysium was the blessed afterlife of classical myth. Stern here means the steering device or rudder: she directs the lover's course.

[9930] Burton. Printed page 512, k: "Lecheus." Leech.

[9931] Editor. Burton credits John Leech. Delicium and deliquium play on delight and a failing or loss of self; the English conveys both senses but cannot reproduce their near-identical sound. The exact poem remains untraced.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As a Tulipant to the Sun (which our Herbalists call Narcissus) when it shines, is Admirandus flos ad radios solis se pandens, a glorious Flower exposing it self; [9932]but when the Sun sets, or a tempest comes, it hides it self, pines away, and hath no pleasure left, (which Carolus Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, in a cause not unlike, sometimes used for an Impress) so do all inamorates to their Mistress, she is their Sun, their Primum mobile, or anima informans; this [9933]one hath elegantly expressed by a windmill, still moved by the wind, which otherwise hath no motion of it self.	A tulip turns to the sun—our herbalists call it Narcissus—and when the sun shines it is "a wondrous flower opening to the sun's rays," a splendid flower unfolding itself. But when the sun sets or a storm comes, it closes, droops and loses all delight. Charles Gonzaga, Duke of Mantua, once used this as an emblem in a similar cause. So all lovers respond to their mistress: she is their sun, their "first mover" or "animating soul." One writer has elegantly expressed this through a windmill, always moved by the wind and otherwise incapable of motion itself:[9934]
Sic tua ni spiret gratia, truncus ero.	So, unless your favour breathes upon me, I shall be a lifeless log.[9935]
He is wholly animated from her breath, his soul lives in her body, [9936]sola claves habet interitus & salutis, she keeps the keys of his life; his fortune ebbs and flows with her favour, a gracious or bad aspect turns him up or down,	He draws all his life from her breath; his soul lives in her body. "She alone holds the keys of destruction and deliverance": she keeps the keys of his life. His fortunes ebb and flow with her favour; a kindly or unfriendly look raises or casts him down:
Mens mea lucescit Lucia luce tuâ.	My mind grows bright, Lucia, in your light.[9937]

[9932] Burton. Printed page 512, l: "Sole se occultante, aut tempestate veniente, statim clauditur ac languescit." When the sun hides itself or a storm approaches, it immediately closes and droops.

[9933] Burton. Printed page 512, m: "Emblem. amat. 13." Love Emblems 13.

[9934] Editor. Tulipant means tulip, but the added Narcissus name does not securely identify a modern species. An impress is a personal emblem. Primum mobile and anima informans adapt cosmological and philosophical terms: the first mover and the soul giving a body its living form.

[9935] Editor. The windmill and this Latin line occur in the Heinsius emblem collection of 1601, Ni spirat immota, numbered 9 in the consulted edition. Burton prints 13. Different numbering or an intermediary remains to be checked.

[9936] Burton. Printed page 512, asterisk: "Calisto de Melebæa." Calisto on Melibea.

[9937] Editor. Lucia is made to echo lucescit and luce, words for shining and light. Burton supplies no author for this line, and its source remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 512–513 Howsoever his present state be pleasing or displeasing, 'tis continuate so long as he loves, he can do nothing, think of nothing but her; desire hath no rest, she is his Cynosure, Hesperus & Vesper, his morning and evening Star, his Goddess, his Mistress, his life, [9938]his soul, his every thing, dreaming, waking, she is always in his mouth; his heart, eys, ears, and all his thoughts are full of her. His Laura, his Victorina, his Columbina, Flavia, Flaminia, Cælia, Delia or Isabella, (call her how you will) she is the sole object of his senses, the substance of his soul, nidulus animæ suæ, he magnifies her above measure, totus in illa, full of her, can breath nothing but her.	Whether his present condition pleases or distresses him, it continues as long as he loves. He can do nothing, think of nothing but her. Desire has no rest. She is his Cynosure, Hesperus and Vesper, his morning and evening star, his goddess, his mistress, his life, his soul, his everything. Dreaming or waking, he always speaks of her; his heart, eyes, ears and every thought are full of her. His Laura, his Victorina, his Columbina, Flavia, Flaminia, Celia, Delia or Isabella—call her what you will—is the sole object of his senses, the substance of his soul, "his soul's little nest." He exalts her beyond measure, "wholly absorbed in her," so full of her that he can breathe nothing else.[9939]
Source page 513 I adore Melebæa, saith Love-sick [9940]Calisto, I believe in Melebæa, I honour, admire and love my Melebæa; His soul was soused, imparadised, imprisoned in his Lady. When [9941]Thais took her leave of Phædria,	"I adore Melibea," says lovesick Calisto. "I believe in Melibea; I honour, admire and love my Melibea." His soul was steeped in his lady, placed in paradise in her, imprisoned in her. When Thais took her leave of Phaedria:[9942]
—— mi Phædria, & nunquid aliud vis?	My Phaedria, is there anything else you wish?
Sweet heart (she said) will you command me any further service? he readily replied, and gave this in charge;	"Sweetheart," she said, "is there any further service you require of me?" He readily replied with these instructions:

[9938] Burton. Printed page 512, i: "Anima non est ubi animat, sed ubi amat." The soul is not where it gives life, but where it loves.

[9939] Editor. Cynosure originally names the Little Bear and, by extension, a guiding star or focus of attention. Hesperus and Vesper both usually name the evening star: Burton's morning-and-evening gloss is retained. The soul's "little nest" extends his image of living in the beloved.

[9940] Burton. Printed page 513, dagger: "Celestinæ act. 1. credo in Melebæam, &c." Celestina, act 1: I believe in Melibea, etc.

[9941] Burton. Printed page 513, a: "Ter. Eunuch. Act. 1. sc. 2." Terence, Eunuchus, act 1, scene 2.

[9942] Editor. Calisto and Melibea are the lovers of Celestina. The mock profession of faith appears in act 1; Burton's Latin intermediary remains to be collated. Soused means steeped or soaked; imparadised means placed in paradise.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— egone quid velim? Dies noctesque ames me, me desideres, Me somnies, me expectes, me cogites, Me speres, me te oblectes, mecum tota sis, Meus fac postremo animus, quando ego sum tuus.	What do I wish? Love me day and night; long for me, Dream of me, wait for me, think of me, Hope for me, delight in me, be wholly with me; In short, be my very soul, since I am yours.[9943]
Dost ask (my dear) what service I will have? To love me day and night is all I crave, To dream on me, to expect, to think on me, Depend and hope, still covet me to see; Delight thy self in me, be wholly mine, For know my love, that I am wholly thine.	Do you ask, my dear, what service I desire? To love me day and night is all I ask; To dream of me, await me, think of me, Depend on me and hope, still long to see me; Delight in me, be wholly mine, For know, my love, that I am wholly yours.
But all this needed not, you will say, if she affect once, she will be his, settle her love on him, on him alone,	But none of this was needed, you will say: once she falls in love, she will be his and fix her love on him alone:
[9944]—— illum absens absentem Auditque videtque ——	Though apart, she hears And sees him in his absence.[9945]
she can, she must think and dream of nought else but him, continually of him, as did Orpheus on his Euridice,	She can—she must—think and dream of nothing else but him, constantly of him, as Orpheus did of his Eurydice:
Te dulcis conjux, te solo in littore mecum, Te veniente die, te discedente canebam.	Of you, sweet wife, of you upon the lonely shore, I sang to myself; Of you at the coming of day, of you at its departure.[9946]
On thee sweet wife was all my song, Morn, Evening, and all along.	Of you, sweet wife, was all my song, Morning, evening and throughout the day.

[9943] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 190–196, Phaedria's parting instructions to Thais. Burton's last Latin line lacks sis after fac; the translation supplies the intended "be." His following English verse is a separate rendering, preserved independently.

[9944] Burton. Printed page 513, dagger: "Virg. 4. Æn." Virgil, Aeneid 4.

[9945] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.83. Dido continues to hear and see the absent Aeneas. The two forms of absent emphasize that the lovers are apart.

[9946] Editor. Virgil, Georgics 4.465–466. Burton changes the third-person secum and canebat into first-person mecum and canebam, and prints discedente for decedente. The modern follows his first-person version; solo qualifies the deserted shore.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And Dido upon her Æneas;	And Dido of her Aeneas:
—— & quæ me insomnia terrent, Multa viri virtus, & plurima currit Imago.	And what dreams terrify me! The man's great excellence, and his image again and again, run through my mind.[9947]
And ever and anon she thinks upon the man That was so fine, so fair, so blith, so debonair.	Again and again she thinks of the man Who was so fine, so handsome, so cheerful, so gracious.
Clitophon in the first book of Achilles Tatius, complaineth how that his Mistress Leucippe tormented him much more in the night, then in the day. [9948]For all day long he had some object or other to distract his senses, but in the night all ran upon her: All night long he lay [9949]awake and could think of nothing else but her, he could not get her out of his mind, towards morning sleep took a little pity on him, he slumbred a while, but all his dreams were of her.	In the first book of Achilles Tatius, Clitophon complains that his mistress Leucippe tormented him much more by night than by day. During the day he had one object or another to distract his senses, but at night everything centred on her. He lay awake all night, unable to think of anything else or put her out of his mind. Towards morning, sleep took a little pity on him: he slumbered for a while, but all his dreams were of her.[9950]
[9951]—— te nocte sub atrâ Alloquor, amplector, falsaque in imagine somni, Gaudia solicitam palpant evanida mentem.	In the dark night I speak to you, Embrace you, and in the false image of a dream Fleeting joys caress my anxious mind.[9952]

[9947] Editor. Burton joins and reshapes Aeneid 4.9 and 4.3–4. Dido's terrifying dreams are combined with the narrator's account of the man's excellence and ancestry returning to her mind. The English couplet below is Burton's freer rendering.

[9948] Burton. Printed page 513, k: "Interdiu oculi, & aures occupatæ distrahunt animum, at noctu solus jactor, ad auroram somnus paulum misertus, nec tamen ex animo puella abiit, sed omnia mihi de Leucippe somnia erant." By day my occupied eyes and ears distract my mind, but at night I toss alone. Towards dawn sleep took a little pity on me; yet the girl did not leave my mind, and all my dreams were of Leucippe.

[9949] Burton. Printed page 513, dagger: "Totâ hac nocte somnum hisce oculis non vidi. Ter." All this night I have seen no sleep with these eyes. Terence.

[9950] Editor. Achilles Tatius, Leucippe and Clitophon 1, contrasts daytime distractions with the mind's suffering during bodily rest. Clitophon finally sleeps near dawn and dreams of Leucippe: the sequence matches Burton's account. The English comparison establishes the passage, not his Latin edition. The separate Terence fragment about seeing no sleep retains its own note; its dramatic location remains unverified.

[9951] Burton. Printed page 513, dagger: "Buchanan. Sylv." Buchanan, Silvae.

[9952] Editor. George Buchanan, Silvae 3, Desiderium Lutetiae, lines 10–12. The pastoral beloved Amaryllis represents Paris. Burton draws a general example of lovers' dreams from a poem of longing for that city.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 514 In the dark night I speak, embrace and finde, That fading joys deceive my careful mind.	In the dark night I speak, embrace, and find That fleeting joys deceive my anxious mind.
The same complaint [9953]Eurialus makes to his Lucretia, day and night I think of thee, I wish for thee, I talk of thee, call on thee, look for thee, hope for thee, delight my self in thee, day and night I love thee.	Euryalus makes the same complaint to his Lucretia: “Day and night I think of you, wish for you, speak of you, call upon you, look for you, hope for you and delight in you; day and night I love you.”[9954]
[9955]Nec mihi vespere Surgente decedunt amores, Nec rapidum fugiente solem;	My love does not depart When evening rises, Nor when it flees the swift sun.[9956]
Morning, Evening, all is alike with me, I have restless thoughts,	Morning and evening are alike to me; my thoughts find no rest:
[9957]Te vigilans oculis, animo te nocte requiro.	Waking, I seek you with my eyes; at night, with my mind.[9958]
Still I think on thee. Anima non est ubi animat, sed ubi amat; I live and breath in thee, I wish for thee.	I think of you constantly. “The soul is not where it gives life, but where it loves.” I live and breathe in you; I long for you.

[9953] Burton. Printed page 514, l: “Æn. Sylv. Te dies, noctesque amo, te cogito, te desidero, te voco, te expecto, te spero, tecum oblecto me, totus in te sum.” Aeneas Sylvius: day and night I love you, think of you, long for you, call upon you, await you, hope for you, delight myself with you; I am wholly absorbed in you.

[9954] Editor. Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini’s Historia de duobus amantibus, the story of Euryalus and Lucretia. This Lucretia is a different character from Aretino’s speaker above; the exact Latin edition awaits collation.

[9955] Burton. Printed page 514, m: “Hor. lib. 2. ode. 9.” Horace, Odes 2.9.

[9956] Editor. Horace, Odes 2.9.10–12. The consulted text addresses Valgius, mourning Mystes, with tibi and Vespero; Burton substitutes mihi and vespere, turning it into a first-person declaration. The evening star’s rising and withdrawal mark night and morning.

[9957] Burton. Printed page 514, n: “Petronius.” Petronius.

[9958] Editor. The margin attributes this line to Petronius. It circulates among verses assigned to him, but the precise collection, numbering and attribution require further collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9959]O niveam quæ te poterit mihi reddere lucem, O mihi felicem terque quaterque diem.	Oh, the radiant light that can restore you to me! Oh, the day that will be three and four times happy for me![9960]
O happy day that shall restore thee to my sight. In the mean time he raves on her; her sweet face, eys, actions, gestures, hands, feet, speech, length, bredth, height, depth, and the rest of her dimensions, are so survaied, measured, and taken, by that Astrolabe of phantasie, and that so violently sometimes, with such earnestness and eagerness, such continuance, so strong an imagination, that at length he thinks he sees her indeed; he talks with her, he imbraceth her, Ixion-like pro Junone nubem, a cloud for Juno, as he said. Nihil præter Leucippen cerno, Leucippe mihi perpetuò in oculis, & animo versatur, I see and meditate of naught but Leucippe. Be she present or absent, all is one;	Oh, happy day that will restore you to my sight! Meanwhile he raves about her. Her sweet face, eyes, actions, gestures, hands, feet and speech, her length, breadth, height, depth and every other dimension are so surveyed, measured and recorded by that astrolabe of imagination—sometimes with such intensity, earnestness, eagerness and persistence, with so powerful an imagination—that at last he thinks he truly sees her. He speaks with her and embraces her: like Ixion, he takes "a cloud for Juno," as the saying goes. "I see nothing but Leucippe; Leucippe is always before my eyes and in my mind." I see and contemplate nothing but Leucippe. Present or absent, it is all the same:[9961]
[9962]Et quamvis aberat placidæ præsentia formæ, Quem dederat præsens forma, manebat amor.	And although the presence of her gentle beauty was absent, The love that her beauty had inspired while present remained.[9963]
That impression of her beauty is still fixed in his mind	The impression of her beauty remains fixed in his mind:

[9959] Burton. Printed page 514, asterisk: "Tibullus l. 3. Eleg. 3." Tibullus, book 3, elegy 3.

[9960] Editor. Corpus Tibullianum 3.3.25–26, in the poems attributed to Lygdamus. Niveam, literally snow-white, describes a bright or auspicious day. "Three and four times" intensifies the happiness.

[9961] Editor. An astrolabe measures celestial positions; here imagination measures every feature of the beloved. Ixion embraced a cloud fashioned to resemble Juno. The Leucippe quotation continues the Achilles Tatius example; its Latin intermediary remains unverified.

[9962] Burton. Printed page 514, dagger: "Ovid. Fast. 2. ver. 775." Ovid, Fasti 2, line 775.

[9963] Editor. Ovid, Fasti 2.777–778, rather than the margin's 775. The passage describes Sextus Tarquinius dwelling on Lucretia before he rapes her. Burton prints Et and placidae where the consulted text has Sic and placitae; the modern follows his "gentle" reading.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9964]—— hærent infixi pectore vultus.	Her features remain firmly imprinted in his heart.[9965]
as he that is bitten with a mad dog, thinks all he sees dogs, dogs in his meat, dogs in his dish, dogs in his drink: his mistress is in his eys, ears, heart, in all his senses. Valleriola had a merchant his patient in the same predicament: and [9966]Ulricus Molitor out of Austin, hath a story of one, that through vehemency of his love passion, still thought he saw his Mistress present with him, she talked with him, Et commisceri cum eâ vigilans videbatur, still embracing him.	Just as a person bitten by a mad dog thinks everything he sees is dogs—dogs in his food, dogs in his dish, dogs in his drink—so his mistress is in his eyes, ears and heart, in every sense. Valleriola had a merchant as a patient in the same condition. Ulrich Molitor, drawing on Augustine, tells of a man who, through the force of his passion, constantly thought he saw his mistress beside him, talking to him: "While awake, he seemed to have intercourse with her," as she continually embraced him.[9967]
Now if this passion of love can produce such effects, if it be pleasantly intended, what bitter torments shall it breed, when it is with fear and continual sorrow, suspicion, care, agony, as commonly it is, still accompanied, what an intolerable [9968]pain must it be?	Now if love can produce such effects when its course is pleasant, what bitter torments must it breed when, as is usual, it is constantly accompanied by fear and unending sorrow, suspicion, anxiety and agony? What intolerable pain it must be![9969]

[9964] Burton. Printed page 514, asterisk: "Virg. Æn. 4." Virgil, Aeneid 4.

[9965] Editor. Aeneid 4.4: Aeneas's features are fixed in Dido's mind. Burton applies the fragment to a man imagining his mistress, so the modern pronouns follow his immediate setting.

[9966] Burton. Printed page 514, o: "De Pythonissa" On the Witch.

[9967] Editor. Valleriola is François Vallériole; Molitor is Ulrich Molitor. The alleged visual effects and the Augustine-derived story belong to Burton's historical accounts, not an established explanation of rabies. Commisceri explicitly means sexual intercourse, stronger than Burton's accompanying "embracing." Exact sources await collation.

[9968] Burton. Printed page 514, p: "Juno, nec ira deum tantum, nec tela, nec hostis, quantum tute potis animis illapsus. Silius Ital. 15. bel. Punic. de amore." Neither Juno nor the gods' anger, weapons or an enemy has such power as you yourself, having slipped into people's minds. Silius Italicus, Punic War 15, on love.

[9969] Editor. Intended concerns the direction or application of the passion, here taken as pleasant rather than troubled. The marginal Silius quotation is fragmentary; its book-15 locator has not yet been confirmed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— Non tam grandes Gargara culmos, quot demerso Pectore curas longâ nexas Usque catenâ, vel quæ penitùs Crudelis amor vulnera miscet.	Gargara bears no such multitude Of tall stalks as the cares in a sunken Heart, linked in a long, unbroken Chain, or the wounds that deep within Cruel love intermingles.[9970]
Mount Gargarus hath not so many stems, As Lovers breast hath grievous wounds, And linked cares, which love compounds.	Mount Gargarus has fewer stalks Than a lover's breast has grievous wounds And linked cares that love combines.
Source page 514–515 When the King of Babylon would have punished a Courtier of his, for loving of a yong Lady of the royal blood, and far above his fortunes, [9971]Apollonius in presence, by all means perswaded to let him alone; For to love and not enjoy was a most unspeakable torment, no tyrant could invent the like punishment; as a gnat at a candle, in a short space he would consume himself.	When the king of Babylon wished to punish one of his courtiers for loving a young woman of royal blood, far above his station, Apollonius, who was present, urged him by every means to leave the man alone. To love without fulfilment was an unspeakable torment; no tyrant could invent such a punishment. Like a gnat at a candle, he would soon consume himself.[9972]

[9970] Editor. Gargara, on Mount Ida, was proverbial for abundant crops. The fragment has no expressed verb in its first comparison; "bears" supplies it. The printed demerso is retained as "sunken." Burton's English version is separately preserved; the Latin source remains unidentified.

[9971] Burton. Printed page 515, q: "Philostratus vita ejus. Maximum tormentum quod excogitare, vel docere te possum, est ipse amor." Philostratus, his Life: the greatest torment I can devise or teach you is love itself.

[9972] Editor. Philostratus, Life of Apollonius 1.36. The source concerns a palace eunuch's desire for a royal concubine, not simply a courtier and a high-born young woman. Burton generalizes and alters the situation while retaining frustration as punishment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 515 For Love is a perpetual [9973]flux, Angor animi, a warfare, militat omni amans; a grievous wound is love still, and a Lovers heart is Cupids quiver, a consuming [9974]fire, [9975]accede ad hanc ignem, &c. an inextinguible fire.	For love is a perpetual flow, "anguish of mind," a warfare: "every lover serves as a soldier." Love is always a grievous wound, and a lover's heart is Cupid's quiver; it is a consuming fire—"approach this fire"—an unquenchable fire.[9976]
[9977]—— alitur & crescit malum, Et ardet intus, qualis Ætnæo vapor Exundat antro ——	The evil is fed and grows, And burns within, like the heat That pours from Etna's cavern.[9978]
As Ætna rageth, so doth Love, and more then Ætna or any material fire.	As Etna rages, so does love—and more fiercely than Etna or any physical fire:
[9979]—— Nam amor sæpe Lyparæo Vulcano ardentiorem flammam incendere solet.	For love often kindles a flame Hotter than Vulcan's fire at Lipara.[9980]

[9973] Burton. Printed page 515, r: "Ausonius c. 35." Ausonius, chapter 35.

[9974] Burton. Printed page 515, s: "Et cæco carpitur igne: & mihi sese offert ultro meus ignis Amyntas." And she is consumed by a hidden fire; and my flame Amyntas offers himself to me unbidden.

[9975] Burton. Printed page 515, dagger: "Ter. Eunuc." Terence, Eunuchus.

[9976] Editor. The Ausonius locator remains unconfirmed. Militat omni amans adapts Ovid, Amores 1.9.1, which has omnis. The margin combines Aeneid 4.2 and Eclogues 3.66. Terence, Eunuchus 85, has hunc ignem, not Burton's hanc; the original forms remain.

[9977] Burton. Printed page 515, dagger: "Sen. Hippol." Seneca, Hippolytus.

[9978] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 101–103, also transmitted under the title Hippolytus. Phaedra describes the inward heat of her passion. Etna supplies the volcanic comparison.

[9979] Burton. Printed page 515, u: "Theocritus edyl. 2. Leonibus cor est violabile telis." Theocritus, Idyll 2. Even lions' hearts can be wounded by arrows.

[9980] Editor. Theocritus, Idyll 2: Love's fire exceeds that of the smith-god Hephaestus, called Vulcan in Latin, at Lipara in the Aeolian Islands. Burton's Latin version and the appended lion-heart fragment need collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Vulcans flames are but smoak to this; For fire, saith [9981]Xenophon, burns them alone that stand neer it, or touch it; but this fire of Love burneth and scorcheth afar off, and is more hot and vehement then any material fire; [9982]Ignis in igne furit, 'tis a fire in a fire, the quintessence of fire. For when Nero burnt Rome, as Calisto urgeth, he fired houses, consumed mens bodies and goods; but this fire devours the soul it self, and [9983]one soul is worth 100000 bodies. No water can quench this wild fire.	Vulcan's flames are mere smoke beside this. Fire, says Xenophon, burns only those who stand near it or touch it; but love's fire burns and scorches from far away, hotter and fiercer than any physical fire. "Fire rages within fire": it is fire within fire, the very essence of fire. When Nero burned Rome, as Calisto argues, he set houses alight and consumed people's bodies and possessions. But this fire devours the soul itself, and one soul is worth a hundred thousand bodies. No water can quench this raging fire.[9984]
[9985]—— In pectus cæcos absorbuit ignes, Ignes qui nec aqua perimi potuere, nec imbre Diminui, neque graminibus, magicisque susurris.	Into his breast he drew hidden fires, Fires that water could not destroy nor rain Diminish, nor herbs nor magic whispers.[9986]
A fire he took into his brest, Which water could not quench, Nor herb, nor art, nor Magick spells Could quell, nor any drench.	He took a fire into his breast That water could not quench, Nor herb, nor skill, nor magic spells Could still, nor any draught.
Except it be tears and sighs, for so they may chance find a little ease.	Unless it is tears and sighs: through these they may perhaps find a little relief.

[9981] Burton. Printed page 515, dagger: "Ignis tangentes solum urit, at forma procul astantes inflammat." Fire burns only those who touch it, but beauty inflames those standing far away.

[9982] Burton. Printed page 515, dagger: "Nonius" Nonius.

[9983] Burton. Printed page 515, asterisk: "Major illa flamma quæ consumit unam animam, quam quæ centum millia corporum." Greater is the flame that consumes one soul than the flame that consumes a hundred thousand bodies.

[9984] Editor. Xenophon, Cyropaedia 5.1.16: Cyrus warns Araspas that beauty inflames from a distance. Nonius's exact fragment remains unlocated. Calisto's comparison in Celestina treats Nero's burning of Rome as a rhetorical example; Burton's statement is retained as part of that comparison.

[9985] Burton. Printed page 515, x: "Mant. egl. 2." Mantuan, Eclogue 2.

[9986] Editor. Mantuan, Eclogue 2.104–106, describes Amyntas's love. Mustard's 1911 text has aquis, "waters," and umbris, "shade," against Burton's aqua and imbre, "rain"; it also has magicisve, "or magical," against magicisque, "and magical." Graminibus means herbs; susurris, whispers. Burton's readings are retained in both columns. His early edition remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9987]Sic candentia colla, sic patens frons, Sic me blanda tui Neæra ocelli, Sic pares minio genæ perurunt, Ut ni me lachrymæ rigent perennes, Totus in tenues eam favillas.	So your shining neck, your open brow, So your eyes, charming Neaera, So your vermilion cheeks burn me, That, unless unending tears kept me wet, I would turn entirely to fine ashes.[9988]
So thy white neck Neæra me poor soul Doth scorch, thy cheeks, thy wanton eys that roul: Were it not for my dropping tears that hinder, I should be quite burnt up forthwith to cinder.	So your white neck, Neaera, scorches my poor soul, Your cheeks and your roving, playful eyes; Were it not for the falling tears that prevent it, I would at once be wholly burned to cinders.
This fire strikes like lightning, which made those old Græcians paint Cupid in many of their [9989]Temples with Jupiters thunder-bolts in his hands; for it wounds, and cannot be perceived how, whence it came, where it pierced,	This fire strikes like lightning. That is why the ancient Greeks painted Cupid in many of their temples with Jupiter's thunderbolts in his hands: it wounds, and no one can perceive how it struck, where it came from or where it entered.[9990]
[9991]Urimur, & cæcum pectora vulnus habent,	We burn, and our breasts bear a hidden wound.[9992]
And can hardly be discerned at first.	And at first it can scarcely be discerned:
[9993]Est mollis flamma medullas, Et tacitum insano vivit sub pectore vulnus.	The flame consumes the soft marrow, And a silent wound lives beneath the frenzied breast.[9994]

[9987] Burton. Printed page 515, asterisk: "Marullus Epig. lib. 1." Marullo, Epigrams, book 1.

[9988] Editor. Michele Marullo, Epigrammata 1.13, Ad Neaeram. Burton reorders the neck-and-brow line and omits other lines before the concluding tears and ashes. Minio is vermilion. His English version adds details, including the rolling eyes, retained separately.

[9989] Burton. Printed page 515, y: "Imagines deorum." Images of the Gods.

[9990] Editor. The marginal title means Images of the Gods. Burton gives no author or location; the particular mythography and evidence for the temple images have not been established.

[9991] Burton. Printed page 515, z: "Ovid." Ovid.

[9992] Editor. Ovid, Heroides 4.20, Phaedra's letter to Hippolytus. Caecum describes a hidden wound; the image continues the contrast between invisible injury and consuming heat.

[9993] Burton. Printed page 515, a: "Æneid. 4." Aeneid 4.

[9994] Editor. Aeneid 4.66–67. Est here is the verb "eats," not "is"; mollis qualifies medullas, the soft marrow. Burton adds insano. His English "gentle wound" and "easy fire" give a different sense, which remains in the separate English rendering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A gentle wound, an easie fire it was And slie at first, and secretly did pass.	A gentle wound, an easy fire it was, Stealthy at first, passing in secret.
But by and by it began to rage and burn a main;	But presently it began to rage and burn fiercely:
Source page 515–516 [9995]—— Pectus insanum vapor, Amorque torret, intus sævus vorat Penitus medullas, atque per venas meat Visceribus ignis mersus, & venis latens, Ut agilis altas flamma percurrit trabes.	Heat and love scorch the frenzied breast; Within, the fierce fire devours The inmost marrow and travels through the veins, Buried in the entrails and hidden in the veins, As a swift flame races through high beams.[9996]
Source page 516 This fiery vapour rageth in the veins, And scorcheth entrals, as when fire burns An house, it nimbly runs along the beams, And at the last the whole it overturns.	This fiery heat rages in the veins And scorches the entrails, as a house fire Runs swiftly along the beams And finally brings the whole building down.
Abraham Hoffemannus lib. 1. amor. conjugal. cap. 2. pag. 22. relates out of Plato, how that Empedocles the Philosopher was present at the cutting up of one that died for love, [9997]his heart was combust, his liver smoakie, his lungs dried up, and so much that he verily believed his soul was either sod or rosted, through the vehemency of loves fire. Which belike made a modern writer of amorous Emblems, express Loves fury by a pot hanging over the fire, and Cupid blowing the coals. As the heat consumes the water,	Abraham Hoffmann, in Conjugal Love, book 1, chapter 2, page 22, relates from Plato that the philosopher Empedocles was present at the dissection of someone who had died of love. His heart was burned, his liver smoke-blackened and his lungs dried up, so much so that Empedocles truly believed the soul had been either boiled or roasted by the violence of love's fire. Perhaps this led a modern writer of love emblems to represent love's fury as a pot hanging over a fire, with Cupid blowing the coals. As heat consumes the water:[9998]

[9995] Burton. Printed page 515, b: "Senecæ." Seneca.

[9996] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 640–644. Burton alters and expands the text: the consulted version has intimis saevit ferus, and lacks his Penitus medullas line. His five-line arrangement, including the repeated veins, is retained and translated.

[9997] Burton. Printed page 516, dagger: "Cor totum combustum, jecur suffumigatum, pulmo arefactus, ut credam miseram illam animam bis elixam aut combustam, ob maximum ardorem quem patitur ob ignem amoris." The whole heart burned, the liver smoke-blackened, the lung dried up, so that I believe that wretched soul twice boiled or burned, because of the immense heat it suffers from love's fire.

[9998] Editor. The alleged dissection is reported through Hoffmann, not verified here as a passage of Plato or a historical event. Sod means boiled. The margin's bis, "twice," differs from the body's wording; it is preserved in its own translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[9999]Sic sua consumit viscera cæcus amor,	So blind love consumes its own entrails.[10000]

[9999] Burton. Printed page 516, asterisk: “Embl. Amat. 4. & 5.” Love Emblems 4 and 5.

[10000] Editor. The pot motif and related verse occur in Heinsius’s 1601 collection, emblem 2, and Vaenius’s Amorum emblemata, emblem 49. The latter reads Sic mea, “so my,” where Burton has Sic sua, “so its own.” His 4 and 5 numbering remains unreconciled.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So doth Love dry up his radical moisture. Another compares Love to a melting torch, which stood too neer the fire.	So love dries up his vital moisture. Another writer compares love to a melting torch standing too close to the fire:[10001]
[10002]Sic quo quis propior suæ puellæ est, Hoc stultus propior suæ ruinæ est.	So the nearer a man is to his girl, The nearer the fool is to his ruin.[10003]
The neerer he unto his mistriss is, The neerer he unto his ruine is.	The nearer he is to his mistress, The nearer he is to his ruin.
So that to say truth, as [10004]Castilio describes it, The beginning, middle, end of Love is naught else but sorrow, vexation, agony, torment, irksomness, wearisomness, so that to be squalid, ugly, miserable, solitary, discontent, dejected, to wish for death, to complain, rave, and to be peevish, are the certain signs, and ordinary actions of a love-sick person. This continual pain and torture makes them forget themselves, if they be far gone with it, in doubt, despair of obtaining, or eagerly bent, to neglect all ordinary business.	To tell the truth, then, as Castiglione describes it, love's beginning, middle and end are nothing but sorrow, vexation, agony, torment, distress and weariness. To be unkempt, ugly, miserable, solitary, dissatisfied and dejected; to wish for death, complain, rave and be irritable—these are the unmistakable signs and usual actions of a lovesick person. This unending pain and torture makes them forget themselves. If they are deeply affected, doubtful or despairing of success, or intensely intent upon it, they neglect all ordinary business.[10005]

[10001] Editor. Radical moisture is the innate moisture believed in early physiology to sustain life together with vital heat. Burton makes emotional burning consume this supposed bodily resource.

[10002] Burton. Printed page 516, dagger: "Grotius." Grotius.

[10003] Editor. The margin names Hugo Grotius, but this couplet's exact source remains untraced. Heinsius's 1601 emblem 4 offers a related torch-and-fire image with different Latin verses; it is a parallel, not a verified source for these words.

[10004] Burton. Printed page 516, c: "Lib. 4. nam illius amoris nec principia, nec media aliud habent quid, quam molestias, dolores, cruciatus, defatigationes, adeo ut miserum esse mærore, gemitu, solitudine torqueri, mortem optare, semperque debacchari, sint certa amantium signa & certæ actiones." Book 4: for that love has in its beginnings and middle nothing but troubles, pains, torments and exhaustion; so that to be miserable, tormented by grief, groaning and loneliness, to desire death and rage continually are sure signs and characteristic actions of lovers.

[10005] Editor. Castilio is Baldassare Castiglione, author of The Book of the Courtier; Burton cites book 4. His English catalogue is longer than the marginal Latin extract. The particular Latin edition and full context remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10006]—— pendent opera interrupta, minæque Murorum ingentes, æquataque machina cœlo.	The interrupted works stand suspended, the great Threatening walls and the structure rising level with the sky.[10007]
Love-sick Dido left her works undone, so did [10008]Phædra,	Lovesick Dido left her work unfinished; so did Phaedra:
—— Palladis telæ vacant, Et inter ipsas pensa labuntur manus.	Pallas's loom stands idle, And the wool slips between my very hands.[10009]
Faustus in [10010]Mantuan, took no pleasure in any thing he did,	Faustus, in Mantuan, took no pleasure in anything he did:
Nulla quies mihi dulcis erat, nullus labor ægro Pectore, sensus iners, & mens torpore sepulta, Carminis exciderat studium. ——	No rest was sweet to me, no work to my sick Heart; my senses were numb and my mind buried in torpor; I had lost all interest in song.[10011]
And tis the humour of them all, to be careless of their persons, and their estates, as the shepherd in [10012]Theocritus, Et hæc barba inculta est, squalidique capilli, their beards flag, and they have no more care of pranking themselves or of any business; they care not as they say, which end goes forward.	And all of them tend to neglect their appearance and their affairs, like the shepherd in Theocritus: "This beard is untrimmed, and the hair unkempt." Their beards hang loose; they no longer care about dressing themselves up or attending to any business. As the saying goes, they do not care which end goes forward.[10013]

[10006] Burton. Printed page 516, asterisk: "Virg. Æn. 4." Virgil, Aeneid 4.

[10007] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.88–89: building work at Carthage is abandoned as Dido becomes absorbed in love. Minae conveys the walls' threatening height; machina is the huge constructed work.

[10008] Burton. Printed page 516, dagger: "Seneca Hip. act." Seneca, Hippolytus, act [number not supplied].

[10009] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 103–104. Pallas Athena presides over weaving. Pensa is the wool being worked; it slips from Phaedra's hands as attention fails.

[10010] Burton. Printed page 516, asterisk: "Eclog. 1." Eclogue 1.

[10011] Editor. Mantuan, Eclogue 1, Faustus's account of love. The contrast is between ordinary work or rest and the numb inactivity of a suffering heart. The precise edition still requires collation.

[10012] Burton. Printed page 516, d: "Edyl. 14." Idyll 14.

[10013] Editor. Theocritus, Idyll 14, opens with Thyonichus remarking on Aeschinas's neglected appearance. Burton calls the man a shepherd. Pranking means dressing or adorning oneself, without its modern sense of playing tricks.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10014]Oblitusque greges, & rura domestica totus [10015]Uritur, & noctes in luctum expendit amaras.	Forgetting his flocks and his farm at home, he burns All through, and spends bitter nights in grief.[10016]
Forgetting flocks of sheep and country farms, The silly shepherd always mourns and burns.	Forgetting flocks of sheep and country farms, The poor shepherd constantly mourns and burns.
Source page 516–517 Love-sick [10017]Chærea when he came from Pamphila's house, and had not so good welcome as he did expect, was all amort, Parmeno meets him, quid tristis es? Why art thou so sad man? unde es? whence com'st, how do'st? [10018]but he sadly replies, Ego hercle nescio neque unde eam, neque quorsum eam, ita prorsus oblitus sum mei, I have so forgotten my self, I neither know where I am, nor whence I come, nor whether I will, what I do. P. [10019]How so? Ch. I am in love. Prudens sciens.	When lovesick Chaerea came from Pamphila's house and had not received the welcome he expected, he was utterly dispirited. Parmeno meets him: "Why are you sad?" Why are you so sad, man? "Where are you from?" Where have you come from? How are you? But he answers sorrowfully: "By Hercules, I do not know where I am coming from or where I am going; I have so completely forgotten myself." I have so forgotten myself that I know neither where I am, where I have come from, where I am going nor what I am doing. Parmeno: "How so?" Chaerea: "I am in love." "Aware and knowing": [10020]

[10014] Burton. Printed page 516, e: "Mant. Eclog. 2." Mantuan, Eclogue 2.

[10015] Burton. Printed page 516, f: "Ov. Met. 13. de Polyphemo: uritur oblitus pecorum, antrorumque suorum; jamque tibi formæ, &c." Ovid, Metamorphoses 13, on Polyphemus: he burns, forgetting his flocks and his caves; and now you care about your appearance, etc.

[10016] Editor. Burton cites Mantuan's Eclogue 2 and adds Ovid, Metamorphoses 13.762–766, on Polyphemus. Ovid supports neglect of flocks, but goes on to describe care for his appearance, not its neglect. Silly here means pitiable or poor.

[10017] Burton. Printed page 516, dagger: "Ter. Eunuch." Terence, Eunuchus.

[10018] Burton. Printed page 516, asterisk: "Qui quæso amo." How, please? I am in love.

[10019] Burton. Printed page 517, asterisk: "Qui quæso? Amo." How, please? I am in love.

[10020] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 304–307: Chaerea has lost sight of the young woman he followed, rather than just received a poor welcome at her house. All amort means utterly dejected. The Qui quaeso amo gloss is printed on both pages 516 and 517; both marginal entries are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 517 [10021]—— vivus vidensque pereo, nec quid agam scio.	Alive and seeing, I perish, and do not know what to do.[10022]
[10023]He that erst had his thoughts free (as Philostratus Lemnius in an Epistle of his, describes this fiery passion) and spent his time like an hard student, in those delightsome philosophicall precepts, he that with the Sun and Moon wandred all over the world, with Stars themselves ranged about, and left no secret or small mystery in Nature unsearched, since he was enamoured, can doe nothing now but think and meditate of love matters, day and night composeth himself how to please his Mistress; all his study, endeavour, is to approve himself to his Mistress, to win his Mistress favour, to compass his desire, to be counted her servant.	As Philostratus of Lemnos describes this fiery passion in one of his letters: "A man whose thoughts were once free, who spent his time studying those delightful philosophical teachings, who wandered throughout the world with the sun and moon, ranged with the stars themselves and left no secret or small mystery in nature unexplored—since falling in love, he can do nothing but think and meditate on love. Day and night he arranges himself to please his mistress. All his study and effort go towards winning her approval and favour, attaining his desire and being counted her servant."[10024]
When Peter Abelhardus that great Scholler of his age,	When Peter Abelard, that great scholar of his age —
[10025]Cui soli patuit scibile quicquid erat,	To whom alone lay open everything that could be known—[10026]

[10021] Burton. Printed page 517, dagger: "Ter. Eunuch." Terence, Eunuchus.

[10022] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 72–73. Prudens sciens and the following line are spoken by Phaedria earlier in the play, not Chaerea. Burton joins two different speakers and scenes into one example of love's bewilderment.

[10023] Burton. Printed page 517, g: "Qui olim cogitabat quæ vellet, & pulcherrimis Philosophiæ præceptis operam insumpsit, qui universi circuitiones cœli, naturam, &c. Hanc unam intendit operam, de sola cogitat, noctes & dies se componit ad hanc, & ad acerbam servitutem redactus animus, &c." He who once thought whatever he wished and devoted his effort to philosophy's finest teachings, who studied the revolutions of the whole heaven, nature, etc., directs all his effort towards this woman alone, thinks only of her, and night and day prepares himself for her; his mind has been reduced to bitter servitude, etc.

[10024] Editor. Burton attributes this to an epistle of Philostratus of Lemnos without a number. The exact letter and Latin translator remain unidentified. Approve means prove acceptable; compass means attain.

[10025] Burton. Printed page 517, asterisk: "Pars Epitaphii ejus." Part of his epitaph.

[10026] Editor. This is the closing line of the epitaph beginning Petrus in hac petra latitat, "Peter lies hidden in this stone." It praises Abelard's knowledge. The poem is attributed to Peter the Venerable, but Rémusat, Abélard 1, note 343, distinguishes that uncertain attribution from the better-supported attribution of a different epitaph. Burton supplies no author; his immediate source remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
was now in love with Helonissa; he had no mind to visit or frequent Schools and Schollers any more. Tædiosum mihi valde fuit (as [10027]he confesseth) ad scholas procedere, vel in iis morari, all his mind was on his new Mistress.	fell in love with Heloise, he no longer wished to visit the schools or spend time with scholars. "It became very tedious for me," as he confesses, "to go to the schools or remain there." His whole mind was on his new mistress.[10028]
Now to this end and purpose, if there be any hope of obtaining his suit, to prosecute his cause, he will spend himself, goods, fortunes for her, and though he lose and alienate all his friends, be threatned, be cast off, and disinherited; for as the Poet saith, [10029]Amori quis legem det? though he be utterly undone by it, disgraced, go a begging, yet for her sweet sake, to enjoy her, he will willingly beg, hazzard all he hath, goods, lands, shame, scandall, fame, and life it self.	Now, to this end, if there is any hope of succeeding in his suit, he will exhaust himself, his possessions and his fortune in pursuing her—even though he loses and alienates all his friends, is threatened, cast off and disinherited. For, as the poet says, "Who can lay down a law for love?" Though it utterly ruins and disgraces him and reduces him to begging, for her sweet sake, to possess her, he will willingly beg and risk everything he has: goods, lands, shame, scandal, reputation and life itself.[10030]
Non recedam neque quiescam, noctu & interdiu, Prius profecto quam aut ipsam, aut mortem investigavero.	I shall not withdraw or rest, by night or day, Until I have surely found either her or death.[10031]
Ile never rest or cease my suit, Till she or death do make me mute.	I'll never rest or cease my suit Till she or death has silenced me.

[10027] Burton. Printed page 517, asterisk: "Epist. prima." First letter.

[10028] Editor. Abelard's Historia calamitatum, conventionally the first letter, describes neglect of teaching after his affair with his student Heloise began. The consulted Latin reads Tediosum mihi vehementer erat where Burton gives Taediosum mihi valde fuit. His shortened wording is translated as printed.

[10029] Burton. Printed page 517, double bar: "Boethius, l.3. Met. ult." Boethius, book 3, final metre.

[10030] Editor. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 3, metre 12, the story of Orpheus and Eurydice: Burton recasts "Quis legem det amantibus?" ("Who can lay down a law for lovers?") as a question about love itself. "Suit" here means courtship; "enjoy" means possess or obtain the beloved, including sexually.

[10031] Editor. Plautus, Mercator 862–863 (5.2): Charinus vows to search for his beloved. Burton freely alters non concedam and aut amicam, and abbreviates usquam noctu neque dius. His separate English couplet makes the silence of death explicit; the Latin says he will find either the woman or death.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Parthenis in [10032]Aristænetus was fully resolved to do as much. I may have better matches I confess, but farewell shame, farewell honour, farewell honesty, farewell friends and fortunes, &c. O Harpedona keep my counsel, I will leave all for his sweet sake, I will have him, say no more, contra gentes, I am resolved, I will have him.	Parthenis in Aristaenetus was firmly resolved to do as much. "I admit I could make better marriages, but farewell shame, farewell honour, farewell chastity, farewell friends and fortunes, and all the rest. O Harpedona, keep my secret. I will leave everything for his sweet sake. I will have him; say no more. Against the whole world, I am resolved: I will have him."[10033]
[10034]Gobrias the Captain, when he had espied Rhodanthe, the fair captive Maid, fell upon his knees before Mystilus the Generall, with tears, vows, and all the Rhetorick he could, by the scars he had formerly received, the good service he had done, or whatsoever else was dear unto him, besought his Governour he might have the captive Virgin to be his wife, virtutis suæ spolium, as a reward of his worth and service; and moreover, he would forgive him the mony which was owing, and all reckonings besides due unto him. I ask no more, no part of booty, no portion, but Rhodanthe to be my wife. And when as he could not compass her by fair means, he fell to treachery, force and villany, and set his life at stake at last, to accomplish his desire.	When the captain Gobrias saw Rhodanthe, the beautiful captive maiden, he fell on his knees before the general Mystilus. With tears, vows and all the eloquence he could muster, he appealed to the scars he had received, the good service he had done and everything else dear to the general, begging his commander to give him the captive maiden as his wife, "the prize of his valour," as a reward for his worth and service. Moreover, he would release him from the money owed and all other outstanding payments. "I ask nothing more, no share of booty, no portion, only Rhodanthe as my wife." When he could not obtain her by peaceful means, he resorted to treachery, force and villainy, finally staking his life to fulfil his desire.[10035]

[10032] Burton. Printed page 517, dagger: "Epist. lib. 6. Valeat pudor, valeat honestas, valeat honor." Farewell modesty, farewell chastity, farewell honour. The locator is reproduced as printed.

[10033] Editor. Aristaenetus's fictional love letters. "Honesty" here carries the sense of sexual honour or chastity; "keep my counsel" means keep my secret. The printed "Epist. lib. 6" is not a usable book citation for the usual two-book collection and awaits collation.

[10034] Burton. Printed page 517, asterisk: "Theodor. prodromus, lib.3. Amor Mestyli genibus obvolutus, ubertimque lachrymans, &c. Nihil ex tota præda præter Rhodanthem virginem accipiam." Theodore Prodromus, book 3 of the love romance: clasping Mystilus's knees and weeping copiously, etc. I shall take nothing from all the booty except the maiden Rhodanthe. Amor is best understood as an abbreviated work citation, not the subject of the kneeling.

[10035] Editor. Theodore Prodromus's Byzantine romance Rhodanthe and Dosikles, cited by Burton as book 3. The narrator treats a captive woman as a reward of military service; "portion" is a share of the spoils. The precise Latin intermediary remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 517–518 'Tis a common humour this, a generall passion of all Lovers to be so affected, and which Æmilia told Aratine a Courtier in Castilio's discourse, [10036]surely Aratine, if thou werst not so indeed, thou didst not love; ingenuously confess, for if thou hadst been throughly enamoured, thou wouldst have desired nothing more then to please thy Mistress. For that is the law of love, to will and nill the same,	This is a common disposition, a passion shared by all lovers. As Emilia told the courtier Aretino in Castiglione's dialogue: "Surely, Aretino, if you were not truly like this, you were not in love. Admit it honestly: if you had been thoroughly in love, you would have desired nothing more than to please your mistress. For love's law is to desire and reject the same things."[10037]
Source page 518 [10038]Tantum velle & nolle, velit nolit quod amica.	To desire and reject only what the beloved desires and rejects.[10039]

[10036] Burton. Printed page 517, h: "Lib.2. Certe vix credam, & bona fide fateare Aratine, te non amasse adeo vehementer; si enim vere amasses, nihil prius aut potius optasses, quam amatæ mulieri placere. Ea enim amoris lex est idem velle & nolle." Book 2. Surely I can scarcely believe it; admit honestly, Aretino, that you did not love so intensely. For if you had truly loved, you would have wished for nothing sooner or more than to please the woman you loved. For this is love's law: to desire and reject the same things.

[10037] Editor. Baldassare Castiglione's Book of the Courtier; Emilia Pia addresses Pietro Aretino. "Aratine" is Burton's spelling. "Nill" means refuse or not wish: the lover adopts the beloved's likes and dislikes.

[10038] Burton. Printed page 518, asterisk: "Stroza fil. Epig." Strozzi the son, Epigrams.

[10039] Editor. The citation "Stroza fil." denotes the younger Strozzi, Ercole, rather than his father Tito Vespasiano. The precise epigram remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Undoubtedly this may be pronounced of them all, they are very slaves, drudges for the time, mad men, fools, dizards, [10040]atrabilarii, beside themselvs, and as blind as Beetles. Their [10041]dotage is most eminent, Amare simul & sapere ipsi Iovi non datur, as Seneca holds, Jupiter himself cannot love and be wise both together; the very best of them, if once they be overtaken with this passion, the most staid, discreet, grave, generous and wise, otherwise able to govern themselvs, in this commit many absurdities, many indecorums, unbefitting their gravity and persons.	This can undoubtedly be said of them all: for the time being they are absolute slaves and drudges, madmen, fools, simpletons, "sufferers from black bile," beside themselves and as blind as beetles. Their infatuation is unmistakable. "Even Jupiter is not granted the power to love and be wise at the same time," as Seneca maintains: Jupiter himself cannot be in love and be wise together. Even the best of them, once overtaken by this passion—the steadiest, most prudent, dignified, noble-minded and wise, otherwise capable of governing themselves—commit many absurdities and improprieties, unworthy of their dignity and standing.[10042]
[10043]Quisquis amat servit, sequitur captivus amantem, Fert domitâ cervice jugum ——	Whoever loves is a slave, follows the lover as a captive, And bears the yoke upon a subdued neck.[10044]
Sampson, David, Solomon, Hercules, Socrates, &c. are justly taxed of indiscretion in this point; the middle sort are betwixt hawk and buzzard; and although they do perceive and acknowledge their own dotage, weaknesse, fury, yet they cannot withstand it; as well may witnesse those expostulations, and confessions of Dido in Virgil.	Samson, David, Solomon, Hercules, Socrates and others are rightly charged with imprudence in this respect. Those of middling ability are caught between one thing and another; although they perceive and acknowledge their own infatuation, weakness and frenzy, they cannot resist it. Dido's protests and confessions in Virgil bear witness:[10045]

[10040] Burton. Printed page 518, dagger: "Quippe hæc omnia ex atrabile & amore proveniunt. Iason Pratensis." For all these things arise from black bile and love. Jason Pratensis.

[10041] Burton. Printed page 518, i: "Immensus amor ipso stultitia est. Cardan. lib. 1. de sapientia." Excessive love is folly itself. Cardano, On Wisdom, book 1. The printed ipso is retained where ipsa would be expected.

[10042] Editor. "Dizards" are fools or simpletons; atrabilarii means people affected by black bile within humoral medicine. The maxim resembles Publilius Syrus, Sententiae A22, "Amare et sapere vix deo conceditur" ("Even a god can scarcely love and be wise"). Burton's wording and attribution to Seneca are retained, without treating them as an exact Senecan quotation.

[10043] Burton. Printed page 518, asterisk: "Mantuan." Mantuan.

[10044] Editor. Mantuan is Baptista Mantuanus, the Carmelite poet. The yoke image makes erotic attachment a form of servitude. Burton prints amantem ("lover"), not amatam ("beloved woman"); the translation preserves that distinction.

[10045] Editor. "Taxed" means censured. "Betwixt hawk and buzzard" describes an intermediate or uncertain condition; here those of middling judgement recognize their folly without mastering it. The list draws on the conventional erotic vulnerabilities of biblical and classical heroes and sages.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10046]Incipit effari mediaque in voce resistit.	She begins to speak, and stops in the middle of her utterance.[10047]
[10048]Phædra in Seneca,	Phaedra, in Seneca:

[10046] Burton. Printed page 518, a: “Virg. Æn.4.” Virgil, Aeneid 4.

[10047] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.76. Dido begins to address Aeneas and breaks off. The fragment illustrates emotional hesitation rather than an explicit confession.

[10048] Burton. Printed page 518, b: “Seneca Hippol.” Seneca, Hippolytus (Phaedra).

Original text 1651	Modern English
Quod ratio possit, vincit ac regnat furor, Potensque totâ mente dominatur deus.	Whatever reason can achieve, passion conquers and reigns, And the mighty god rules over the whole mind.[10049]
Myrrha in [10050]Ovid.	Myrrha, in Ovid:[10051]
Illa quidem sentit, fœdoque repugnat amori, Et secum quo mente feror, quid molior, inquit, Dii precor, & pietas, &c.	She indeed understands, and struggles against her shameful love, Saying to herself, "Where is my mind carrying me? What am I attempting? Gods, I pray, and reverence for family ties…"
She sees and knows her fault, and doth resist, Against her filthy lust she doth contend, And whether go I, what am I about? And God forbid, yet doth it in the end.	She sees and knows her fault, and resists, Struggling against her filthy lust. "Where am I going? What am I doing? God forbid!" Yet in the end she does it.
Again,	Again:
—— Pervigili igne Carpitur indomito, furiosaque vota retractat, Et modo desperat, modo vult tentare, pudetque Et cupit, & quid agat, non invenit, &c.	An unceasing, untamed fire Consumes her; she returns to her frenzied desires, Now despairs, now wishes to attempt them; she is ashamed And longs for them, and cannot discover what to do.[10052]

[10049] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 184–185, also called Hippolytus. The consulted text begins "quid ratio possit?" ("What can reason do?") and reads vicit ("has conquered"); Burton has Quod and vincit. The translation follows Burton's printed syntax; the god who dominates the mind is Love.

[10050] Burton. Printed page 518, asterisk: "Met.10." Metamorphoses 10.

[10051] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 10.319–321. Myrrha is struggling against desire for her father, Cinyras. Pietas means the reverence and obligations owed especially to gods and family; Burton's English paraphrase replaces the appeal to gods and family duty with "God forbid."

[10052] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 10.369–372. Ovid's pervigil describes the sleepless Myrrha and igni her consuming fire. Burton prints pervigili igne, making the fire itself unceasing. Retractat here means turns over or revisits her desires; Burton's separate "recals her vow" is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
With raging lust she burns, and now recals Her vow, and then despairs, and when 'tis past, Her former thoughts she'l prosecute in hast, And what to do she knows not at the last.	She burns with raging lust, now recalls Her vow, then despairs; when that has passed, She will hasten to pursue her former thoughts, And finally does not know what to do.
She will and will not, abhors; and yet as Medæa did, doth it,	She wills it and refuses it, abhors it, yet does it, as Medea did:
—— Trahit invitam nova vis, aliudque cupido, Mens aliud suadet; video meliora, proboque, Deteriora sequor.	A strange new force drags me against my will; desire urges one thing, Reason another. I see the better course and approve it; I follow the worse.[10053]
Reason pulls one way, burning lust another, She sees and knows what's good, but she doth neither.	Reason pulls one way, burning lust another; She sees and knows what is good, but does not do it.
[10054]O fraus, amorque, & mentis emotæ furor, Quo me abstulistis?	O deceit, and love, and frenzy of a disordered mind, Where have you carried me?[10055]

[10053] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 7.19–21, Medea's debate over helping Jason. His English couplet compresses the conflict; "doth neither" loosely says that she does not do the good she recognizes, not that she follows neither impulse.

[10054] Burton. Printed page 518, dagger: "Buchanan." George Buchanan.

[10055] Editor. George Buchanan. The lines occur within the satirical material reproduced in Domingos Maurício Gomes dos Santos's study of Buchanan at Coimbra (Humanitas 15–16, p.315), with an intervening line omitted by Burton. The exact poem locator in Buchanan's collected verse remains to be established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 518–519 The major part of Lovers are carried headlong like so many brute beasts, reason counsells one way, thy friends, fortunes, shame, disgrace, danger, and an ocean of cares that will certainly follow; yet this furious lust, præcipitates, counterpoiseth, weighs down on the other; though it be their utter undoing, perpetuall infamy, loss, yet they will do it, and become at last insensati void of sense; degenerate into dogs, hogs, asses, brutes; as Jupiter into a Bull, Apuleius an Asse, Lycaon a wolf, Tereus a Lap-wing, [10056]Calisto a Bear, Elpenor and Grillus into Swine by Circe.	Most lovers are carried headlong like so many brute beasts. Reason counsels one course: consider your friends, your fortunes, shame, disgrace, danger and the ocean of cares that will certainly follow. Yet this furious lust hurls them forward, counterbalances all this and outweighs it on the other side. Though it means their utter ruin, lasting disgrace and loss, they will do it. At last they become "senseless," devoid of judgement, and degenerate into dogs, pigs, asses and beasts: as Jupiter became a bull, Apuleius an ass, Lycaon a wolf, Tereus a lapwing, Callisto a bear, and Elpenor and Gryllus were turned into pigs by Circe.[10057]
Source page 519 For what else may we think those ingenious Poets to have shadowed in their witty fictions and poems, but that a man once given over to his lust (as [10058]Fulgentius interprets that of Apuleius, Alciat of Tereus) is no better then a beast.	For what else can we think those ingenious poets intended to represent in their clever fictions and poems, except that someone once surrendered to lust is no better than a beast? So Fulgentius interprets the story in Apuleius, and Alciato that of Tereus.[10059]
[10060]Rex fueram, sic crista docet, sed sordida vita Immundam e tanto culmine fecit avem.	I was a king, as this crest shows; but a filthy life Cast me down from that height and made me an unclean bird.[10061]

[10056] Burton. Printed page 519, k: "An immodest woman is like a Bear."

[10057] Editor. These transformations are not equivalent instances of voluntary lust. Apuleius is the author of the Golden Ass; Lucius is its transformed protagonist. Lycaon becomes a wolf after impiety, and in Ovid Callisto is assaulted by Jupiter before Juno turns her into a bear (Metamorphoses 1–2). Burton's moralizing catalogue and marginal judgement about Callisto are his own framing. Gryllus is the pig-speaker in Plutarch's dialogue on animal reason.

[10058] Burton. Printed page 519, l: "Feram induit dum rosas comedat, idem ad se redeat." He assumes a beast's form until he eats roses—that is, returns to himself. The unusual idem is retained; the context requires an explanatory "that is."

[10059] Editor. Fulgentius supplies an allegorical reading of the ass's transformation and recovery through roses. Burton interprets a return to human shape as a return to reason. The precise passage and his use of the wording in the margin await collation.

[10060] Burton. Printed page 519, m: "Alciatus de upupa Embl. Animal immundum upupa stercora amans; ave hac nihil fædius, nihil libidinosius. Sabin in Ovid. Met." Alciato, emblem on the hoopoe. The hoopoe is an unclean creature, loving dung; no bird is fouler or more lustful. Sabinus on Ovid's Metamorphoses.

[10061] Editor. Alciato's cited upupa is the hoopoe: its crest recalls Tereus's crown. Burton calls the transformed bird a "Lap-wing" in the preceding prose. The translation retains that difference instead of silently substituting the species named in the note. Sabinus is the commentator Georg Sabinus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I was a King, my Crown a witnesse is, But by my filthinesse am come to this.	I was a king—my crown bears witness— But my filthiness has brought me to this.
Their blindnesse is all out as great, as manifest as their weaknesse and dotage, or rather an inseparable companion, an ordinary sign of it. [10062]Love is blind, as the saying is, Cupid's blind, and so are all his followers.	Their blindness is every bit as great and apparent as their weakness and infatuation—or rather, it is an inseparable companion and a usual sign of it. Love is blind, as the saying goes. Cupid is blind, and so are all his followers.
Quisquis amat ranam, ranam putat esse Dianam.	Whoever loves a frog thinks that frog is Diana.[10063]
Every Lover admires his Mistress, though she be very deformed of her self, ill-favored, wrinkled, pimpled, pale, red, yellow, tand, tallow-faced, have a swoln Juglers platter face; or a thin, lean, chitty face; have clouds in her face, be crooked, dry, bald, goggle-eyed, blear-ey'd or with staring eys, she looks like a squis'd cat, hold her head still awry, heavy, dull, hollow-eyed, black or yellow about the eyes; or squint-eyed, sparrow-mouthed, Persean hook-nosed, have a sharp Fox nose, a red nose, China flat, great nose, nare simo patuloque, a nose like a promontory, gubber-tushed, rotten teeth, black, uneven, brown teeth, beetle-browed, a Witches beard, her breath stink all over the room, her nose drop winter and summer,	Every lover admires his mistress, though in herself she may be utterly misshapen, ugly, wrinkled, pimply, pale, red, yellow, tanned or tallow-faced; have a swollen face like a juggler's platter, or a thin, lean, pinched face; have blemishes on her face; be crooked, dried up, bald, goggle-eyed, bleary-eyed or staring like a squeezed cat; always hold her head crookedly; look heavy, dull and hollow-eyed, with black or yellow around her eyes; or be cross-eyed, sparrow-mouthed, Persian hook-nosed, with a sharp fox's nose, a red nose, a great flat Chinese nose, "a snub and spreading nose," a nose like a promontory; have jutting teeth, rotten teeth, black, uneven or brown teeth; beetling brows, a witch's beard, breath that stinks throughout the room and a nose that drips winter and summer;[10064]

[10062] Burton. Printed page 519, n: "Love is like a false glasse, which represents every thing fairer then it is."

[10063] Editor. A rhyming Latin proverb: rana ("frog") is paired with Diana, the goddess used as a standard of beauty. No specific author is supplied.

[10064] Editor. The catalogue is an extended grotesque portrait, expressing the hostile observer's standards of appearance, including national stereotypes. "Chitty" means pinched or small; "clouds" are blemishes; "squis'd" means squeezed; "gubber-tushed" describes projecting teeth. Latin nare simo patuloque specifies a flattened, spreading nose.

Original text 1651	Modern English
with a Bavarian poke under her chin, a sharp chin, lave eared, with a long cranes neck, which stands awry too, pendulis mammis, her dugs like two double jugs, or else no dugs, in that other extream, bloody-faln-fingers, she have filthy long unpared nailes, scabbed hands or wrists, a tand skin, a rotten carkass, crooked back, she stoops, is lame, splea-footed, as slender in the middle as a cow in the wast, gowty legs, her ankles hang over her shooes, her feet stink, she breed lice, a meer changeling, a very monster, an aufe imperfect, her whole complexion savours,	with a Bavarian goitre beneath her chin, a sharp chin, hanging ears and a long crane's neck that also stands crookedly; "with hanging breasts," her teats like two double-sized jugs—or, at the opposite extreme, no breasts at all; have fingers swollen with blood, filthy long untrimmed nails, scabby hands or wrists, tanned skin, a rotten body and a crooked back; stoop, limp, turn her feet out; be as slim in the middle as a cow at the waist; have gouty legs, ankles bulging over her shoes, stinking feet and lice; be an outright changeling, a monster, a malformed changeling, her whole body reeking;[10065]
an harsh voyce, incondite gesture, vile gate, a vast virago, or an ugly tit, a slug, a fat fustilugs, a trusse, a long lean rawbone, a skeleton, a sneaker (si qua latent meliora puta) and to thy judgement looks like a mard in a lanthorn, whom thou couldst not fancy for a world, but hatest, loathest, and wouldst have spit in her face, or blow thy nose in her bosome, remedium amoris to another man, a dowdy, a slut, a scold, a nasty, rank, rammy, filthy, beastly quean, dishonest peradventure, obscene, base, beggerly, rude, foolish, untaught, peevish, Irus' daughter, Thirsite sister, Grobians scholler; if he love her once, he admires her for all this, he takes no notice of any such errours, or imperfections of body or mind.	have a harsh voice, uncouth gestures and an ugly walk; be a huge virago or an ugly little creature, a sluggish lump, a fat lumbering woman, a squat bundle, a long lean bag of bones, a skeleton or a sneaking thing ("if anything is hidden, imagine it better"); and in your judgement look like a turd in a lantern, someone you could not fancy for the world, but hate and loathe, in whose face you would spit or whose bosom you would blow your nose in—"a cure for love" to another man—a dowdy, a slattern, a scold, a nasty, rank hussy, stinking like a ram, filthy and beastly, perhaps unchaste, obscene, low, beggarly, rude, foolish, ignorant, perverse, a daughter of Irus, sister of Thersites, pupil of Grobian: once he loves her, he admires her despite all this, noticing none of these faults or imperfections of body or mind.[10066]

[10065] Editor. "Bavarian poke" denotes a swelling at the throat, understood as a goitre; "lave eared," drooping-eared; "splea-footed," splay-footed. A "changeling" or "aufe" invokes the supposed fairy substitute for a human child, then used abusively for a malformed or foolish person. "Complexion" can mean bodily constitution; "savours" here means smells unpleasantly.

[10066] Editor. "Fustilugs" is an insulting name for a heavy, clumsy woman; "trusse," a compact bundle; "mard," excrement; "rammy," smelling like a ram. The Latin parenthesis adapts Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.502: Apollo imagines Daphne's concealed parts still lovelier. Burton changes putat ("he thinks") to puta ("imagine"). Irus is the beggar in Odyssey 18; Thersites the abusive, ugly speaker in Iliad 2; Grobian a literary embodiment of boorish manners. The insults belong to Burton's caricature.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10067]Ipsa hæc —— delectant, veluti Balbinum Polypus Agnæ,	These very things delight him, as Agna's nasal polyp delighted Balbinus.[10068]
Source page 519–520 he had rather have her then any woman in the world. If he were a King, she alone should be his Queen, his Empresse. O that he had but the wealth and treasure of both the Indies to endow her with, a carrack of Diamonds, a chain of Pearl, a carcanet of Jewels (a pair of calf-skin gloves of four pence a pair were fitter) or some such toy, to send her for a token, she should have it with all his heart; he would spend myriads of crowns for her sake. Venus her self, Panthea, Cleopatra, Tarquins Tanaquil, Herods Mariamne, or [10069]Mary of Burgundy if she were alive, would not match her.	He would rather have her than any woman in the world. If he were a king, she alone would be his queen, his empress. If only he had the wealth and treasure of both the Indies to bestow upon her, a shipload of diamonds, a chain of pearls, a jewelled necklace—a pair of calfskin gloves costing fourpence would be more fitting—or some such trinket to send as a love-token! She would have it with all his heart. He would spend tens of thousands of crowns for her sake. Venus herself, Panthea, Cleopatra, Tarquin's Tanaquil, Herod's Mariamne or Mary of Burgundy, if she were alive, could not match her.[10070]
Source page 520 [10071]Vincet vultus hæc Tyndarios, Qui moverunt horrida bella.	She will surpass the face of Tyndareus's daughter, Which set dreadful wars in motion.[10072]

[10067] Burton. Printed page 519, asterisk: "Hor. ser. lib.1. sat.3." Horace, Satires, book 1, satire 3.

[10068] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.3.39–40: a lover can delight even in blemishes. The consulted text names Hagna; Burton prints Agna. Polypus is a nasal growth or polyp, not a beauty spot. Horace turns the example towards indulgence of friends' faults.

[10069] Burton. Printed page 520, asterisk: "The daughter and heir of Carolus Pugnax." Charles the Bold.

[10070] Editor. A "carrack" is a large merchant ship; a "carcanet" a jewelled necklace. The East and West Indies stand for immense riches; crowns are coins. Panthea is the celebrated wife of Abradatas in Xenophon; Tanaquil, the wife of Tarquinius Priscus; Mariamne, Herod's wife. Mary of Burgundy was the daughter of Charles the Bold, as Burton's margin explains.

[10071] Burton. Printed page 520, dagger: "Seneca in Octavia." Seneca, Octavia.

[10072] Editor. Octavia 775–776, a tragedy transmitted among Seneca's works, here praising Poppaea. Tyndareus's daughter is Helen, whose departure with Paris led to the Trojan War. Burton's Tyndarios replaces Tyndaridos in the consulted text. The attribution to Seneca is retained as Burton's citation, not a claim about authorship.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Let Paris himself be judge; renowned Helena comes short; that Rodopeian Phillis, Larissæan Coronis, Babylonian Thysbe, Polixena, Laura, Lesbia, &c. your counterfeit Ladies were never so fair as she is.	Let Paris himself judge: renowned Helen falls short. That Rhodopean Phyllis, Larissaean Coronis, Babylonian Thisbe, Polyxena, Laura, Lesbia and the rest—your imagined ladies were never as beautiful as she is.[10073]
[10074]Quicquid erit placidi, lepidi, grati, atque faceti, Vivida cunctorum retines Pandora deorum,	Whatever there is of gentleness, charm, grace and wit, You embody, a living Pandora of all the gods.[10075]
What e're is pretty, pleasant, facete, well, What e're Pandora had, she doth excell.	Whatever is pretty, pleasant, witty, good, Whatever Pandora possessed, she surpasses.
[10076]Dicebam Triviæ formam nihil esse Dianæ.	I used to say that the beauty of Diana of the crossroads was nothing.[10077]
Diana was not to be compar'd to her, nor Juno, nor Minerva, nor any Goddess. Thetis feet were as bright as silver, the ancles of Hebe clearer then Chrystall, the arms of Aurora as ruddy as the Rose, Juno's brests as white as snow, Minerva wise, Venus fair; but what of this? dainty come thou to me. She is all in all,	Diana could not compare with her, nor Juno, Minerva or any goddess. Thetis's feet were bright as silver, Hebe's ankles clearer than crystal, Aurora's arms rosy as the rose, Juno's breasts white as snow; Minerva was wise, Venus beautiful. But what of that? Come to me, my sweet one. She is everything in one:[10078]

[10073] Editor. A catalogue of women celebrated in poetry: Phyllis is associated with Thrace's Rhodope mountains, Coronis with Thessalian Larissa, Thisbe with Babylon, and Polyxena with Troy. Laura and Lesbia are the beloved figures of Petrarch and Catullus. "Counterfeit" emphasizes their poetic representation, not proof that all were wholly invented.

[10074] Burton. Printed page 520, dagger: "Lecheus." John Leech.

[10075] Editor. Pandora's name evokes the gifts bestowed by all the gods. "Facete" means witty or elegantly pleasing. Burton credits John Leech; the exact poem has not yet been located.

[10076] Burton. Printed page 520, asterisk: "Mantuan. Egl.1." Mantuan, Eclogue 1.

[10077] Editor. Mantuan, Eclogue 1.47: Faustus recalls praising Galla above Diana, although she could scarcely see with one eye. Fortunatus replies that Love deceives the senses and takes away freedom of mind (48–49). Trivia, "of the crossroads," is Diana's title. The verse thus belongs to an account of infatuation, not an independent description of the goddess.

[10078] Editor. Thetis is a sea-goddess, Hebe the goddess of youth, Aurora the dawn, Juno the queen of the gods, Minerva wisdom and Venus love and beauty. The catalogue assembles their attributes in one woman. "Dainty come thou to me" is an affectionate invitation, not a description of another goddess.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10079]—— Cælia ridens Est Venus, incedens Iuno, Minerva loquens.	Celia laughing Is Venus; walking, Juno; speaking, Minerva.[10080]
[10081]Fairest of fair, that fairnesse doth excell.	Fairest of the fair, surpassing beauty itself.[10082]

[10079] Burton. Printed page 520, dagger: “Angerianus.” Girolamo Angeriano.

[10080] Editor. Girolamo Angeriano, cited in the margin. Celia combines Venus’s charm, Juno’s regal bearing and Minerva’s eloquence. The precise poem locator remains to be checked.

[10081] Burton. Printed page 520, dagger: “Fayry Queen Cant. lir.4.” The Faerie Queene. The indistinct printed locator after Cant. is retained as lir.; its intended expansion remains uncertain.

[10082] Editor. Spenser, The Faerie Queene 4.2.23.4: the Squire of Dames addresses the false Florimell, whom he mistakes for the real woman. Spenser has doest, addressing her directly; Burton prints doth. Burton’s wording is retained. The indistinct marginal locator does not securely give this canto and remains unaltered.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Ephemerus in Aristænetus, so far admires his Mistress good parts, that he makes proclamation of them, and challengeth all comers in her behalf. [10083]Who ever saw the beauties of the East, or of the West, let them come from all quarters, all, and tell truth, if ever they saw such an excellent feature as this is. A good fellow in Petronius cryes out, no tongue can tell his Ladies fine feature, or expresse it. [10084]quicquid dixeris minus erit, &c.	Ephemerus in Aristaenetus so admires his mistress's fine qualities that he proclaims them and challenges all comers on her behalf. "Whoever has seen the beauties of the East or West, let them come from every quarter, all of them, and say truthfully whether they ever saw beauty as excellent as this." A fellow in Petronius cries out that no tongue can describe or express his lady's lovely appearance: "Whatever you say will fall short."[10085]
No tongue can her perfections tell, In whose each part, all tongues may dwell.	No tongue can describe her perfections; On each part of her all tongues could dwell.
Most of your Lovers are of his humour and opinion. She is nulli secunda, a rare creature, a Phœnix, the sole commandress of his thoughts, Queen of his desires, his only delight: as [10086]Triton now feelingly sings, that Love-sick Sea-God.	Most of your lovers share his disposition and opinion. She is "second to none," a rare creature, a phoenix, the sole ruler of his thoughts, queen of his desires, his only delight—as the lovesick sea-god Triton now sings with feeling:
Candida Leucothe placet, & placet atra Melæne, Sed Galatea placet longe magis omnibus una.	Fair Leucothe pleases me, and dark Melaene pleases me, But Galatea alone pleases me far more than all the rest.[10087]
Fair Leucothe, black Melæne please me well, But Galatea doth by ods the rest excell.	Fair Leucothe and dark Melaene please me well, But Galatea far surpasses all the rest.

[10083] Burton. Printed page 520, asterisk: "Epist.12. Quis unquam formas vidit orientis, quis occidentis, veniant undique omnes, & dicant veraces, an tam insignem viderint formam." Letter 12. Whoever has seen the beauties of the East, whoever those of the West, let all come from everywhere and say truthfully whether they have seen beauty so remarkable.

[10084] Burton. Printed page 520, dagger: "Nulla vox formam ejus possit comprehendere." No words could encompass her beauty.

[10085] Editor. Aristaenetus, letter 12, as cited in the margin. "Feature" means overall appearance or beauty. Petronius's description of Circe in Satyricon 126 provides the relevant setting, but Burton's exact wording is not yet collated against it.

[10086] Burton. Printed page 520, asterisk: "Calcagnini dial. Galat." Calcagnini, dialogue Galatea.

[10087] Editor. Celio Calcagnini's dialogue Galatea, according to Burton. "Candida" and "atra" contrast fair and dark colouring; Burton renders the latter as "black." The modern versions retain the contrast as fair and dark. Exact dialogue location awaits collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All the gracious Elogies, Metaphors, Hyperbolicall comparisons of the best things in the world, the most glorious names; whatsoever, I say, is pleasant, amiable, sweet, gratefull, and delicious, are too little for her.	All the flattering praises, metaphors and extravagant comparisons with the best things in the world, all the most glorious names—everything, I say, that is pleasant, lovable, sweet, delightful and delicious—are too little for her:
Phœbo pulchrior & sorore Phœbi.	More beautiful than Phoebus and Phoebus's sister.[10088]
His Phœbe is so fair, she is so bright, She dims the Suns lustre, and the Moons light.	His Phoebe is so beautiful, so bright, She dims the sun's brilliance and the moon's light.
Source page 520–521 Stars, Suns, Moons, Metals, sweet smelling Flowers, Odours, perfumes, Colours, Gold, Silver, Ivory, Pearls, precious Stones, Snow, painted Birds, Doves, Hony, Suger, Spice, cannot expresse her; so soft so tender, so radiant, sweet, so fair is she.	Stars, suns, moons, metals, fragrant flowers, scents, perfumes, colours, gold, silver, ivory, pearls, precious stones, snow, brightly coloured birds, doves, honey, sugar and spice cannot describe her: so soft, so tender, so radiant, sweet and beautiful is she.
Source page 521 [10089]—— Mollior cuniculi capillo, &c.	Softer than a rabbit's fur.[10090]
[10091]Lydia bella, puella candida, Quæ benè superas lac, & lilium, Albamque simul rosam & rubicundam, Et expolitum ebur Indicum.	Beautiful Lydia, fair girl, You far surpass milk and the lily, The white rose and the red alike, And polished Indian ivory.[10092]

[10088] Editor. Phoebus is Apollo, associated with the sun; his sister is Diana, associated with the moon. Burton's English version names the beloved Phoebe and develops the comparison into an image of outshining both. The Latin line is unassigned here.

[10089] Burton. Printed page 521, o: "Catullus." Catullus.

[10090] Editor. Catullus 25.1 addresses Thallus abusively as effeminate and later accuses him of theft. Burton detaches the softness of rabbit's fur from that hostile context and uses it among a lover's flattering comparisons.

[10091] Burton. Printed page 521, p: "Petronii. Catalect." Petronius, collected short poems.

[10092] Editor. The poem beginning "Lydia bella" was transmitted among short poems attributed to Petronius; Burton's Catalecta means a collection of miscellaneous short pieces. Attribution and exact textual lineage remain to be checked. His four English lines are an additional rendering, not a replacement for the Latin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Fine Lydia my Mistress white and fair, The milk, the Lilly do not thee come near; The Rose so white, the Rose so red to see, And Indian Ivory comes short of thee:	Lovely Lydia, my mistress, white and fair, Neither milk nor lily comes near you; The rose so white, the rose so red to see, And Indian ivory fall short of you.
Such a description our English Homer makes of a fair Lady.	Our English Homer gives just such a description of a beautiful lady:
[10093]That Emilia that was fairer to seen, Then is Lilly upon the stalk green: And fresher then May with flowers new, For with the Rose colour strove her hew, I not which was the fairer of the two.	That Emily who was fairer to see Than a lily on its green stalk, And fresher than May with its new flowers— Her complexion rivalled the rose in colour; I do not know which of the two was fairer.[10094]
In this very phrase [10095]Polyphemus courts Galatea.	In just this language Polyphemus courts Galatea:
Candidior folio nivei Galatea ligustri, Floridior prato, longâ procerior alno, Splendidior vitro, tenero lascivior hædo, &c. Mollior & cygni plumis, & lacte coacto.	Galatea, whiter than the petal of snow-white privet, More blooming than a meadow, taller than a long alder, Brighter than glass, friskier than a tender young kid, Softer than swan's down and curdled milk.[10096]
Whiter Galet then the white withie-wind, Fresher then a field, higher then a tree, Brighter then glass, more wanton then a Kid, Softer then Swans down, or ought that may be.	Galatea, whiter than white bindweed, Fresher than a field, taller than a tree, Brighter than glass, friskier than a kid, Softer than swan's down or anything else.

[10093] Burton. Printed page 521, dagger: "Chaucer in the knights tale."

[10094] Editor. Chaucer, The Knight's Tale, Canterbury Tales I.1035–1039. Burton calls Chaucer the English Homer and prints the quotation in blackletter. "I not" means "I know not," not a defective modern negative. Burton's wording and spelling remain in the original column; the typeface is normalized.

[10095] Burton. Printed page 521, q: "Ov. Met.13." Ovid, Metamorphoses 13.

[10096] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 13.789–791 and 796, with intervening comparisons omitted. Burton's English gives "withie-wind," bindweed, for Latin ligustrum, privet, and omits the curdled milk. The two versions preserve these differences. The Latin folium is literally a leaf, used here for the flower's pale petal.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So she admires him again, in that conceited Dialogue of Lucian, which John Secundus, an Elegant Dutch modern Poet hath translated into verse. When Doris and those other Sea Nymphs, upbraided her with her ugly mishapen Lover Polyphemus; she replyes, they speak out of envy and malice,	And she admires him in return, in that witty dialogue of Lucian which Johannes Secundus, an elegant modern Dutch poet, translated into verse. When Doris and the other sea-nymphs reproached her for her ugly, misshapen lover Polyphemus, she replied that they spoke out of envy and malice:[10097]
Et planè invidia huc mera vos stimulare videtur, Quòd non vos itidem ut me Polyphemus amet;	And plainly it seems to be sheer envy that drives you to this: That Polyphemus does not love you as he loves me.
Say what they could, he was a proper man. And as Holoissa writ to her Sweet-heart Peter Abelhardus, Si me Augustus orbis imperator uxorem expeteret, mallem tuæ esse meretrix quam orbis imperatrix; she had rather be his vassal, his Quean, then the worlds Empresse or Queen.	Whatever they might say, he was a handsome man. And as Heloise wrote to her sweetheart Peter Abelard, “If Augustus, emperor of the world, sought me as his wife, I would rather be your whore than empress of the world”: she would rather be his slave, his mistress, than the world’s empress or queen.[10098]
—— non si me Iupiter ipse forte velit; ——	Not even if Jupiter himself should happen to desire me.[10099]
she would not change her love for Jupiter himself.	She would not exchange her lover for Jupiter himself.

[10097] Editor. Lucian’s dialogue of Doris and Galatea among the Dialogues of the Sea Gods; Johannes Secundus is Jan Everaerts, the Netherlandish Latin poet. “Conceited” means witty or ingenious. This comic defence of Polyphemus comes from a different narrative treatment than Ovid’s rejected Cyclops; the two accounts need not be reconciled. The Latin verse translation has not yet been fully collated.

[10098] Editor. Heloise’s first letter to Abelard, conventionally letter 2 in their collected correspondence, prefers the personal bond to imperial marriage. Burton condenses the passage and prints the grammatically irregular tuæ where tua is expected with meretrix. His “Quean” is an abusive word for a sexually disreputable woman; the pun with “Queen” sharpens the contrast in rank.

[10099] Editor. Compare Catullus 70.1–2, where the poet’s beloved claims she would prefer him even to Jupiter. Burton’s sentence is a free parallel, not the same Latin text; no source is named in this margin.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To thy thinking she is a most loathsome creature; and as when a countrey fellow discommended once that exquisite Picture of Helena, made by Zeuxis, [10100]for he saw no such beauty in it; Nichomachus a love-sick spectator replyed, Sume tibi meos oculos & deam existimabis, take mine eyes, and thou wilt think she is a Goddess, dote on her forthwith, count all her vices, vertues; her imperfections, infirmities, absolute and perfect:	To your mind she is a most loathsome creature. But once, when a country fellow disparaged Zeuxis's exquisite painting of Helen because he saw no such beauty in it, Nicomachus, a lovesick spectator, replied, "Take my eyes and you will think her a goddess." Take my eyes: you will immediately dote on her, count all her vices virtues, and think her imperfections and infirmities absolute perfection.[10101]
Source page 521–522 If she be flat-nosed, she is lovely; if hook-nosed, kingly; if dwarfish and little, pretty; if tall, proper and man-like; our brave British Bunduica; if crooked, wise; if monstrous, comely, her defects are no defects at all, she hath no deformities. Immo nec ipsum amicæ stercus fœtet, Though she be nasty fulsome, as Sostratu's bitch, or Parmeno's sow: thou hadst as live have a snake in thy bosome, a toad in thy dish, and callest her witch, divill, hag, with all the filthy names thou canst invent; he admires her on the other side, she is his Idoll, Lady, Mistris, [10102]Venerilla, Queen, the quintessence of beauty, an Angel, a Star, a Goddess.	If her nose is flat, she is lovely; if hooked, regal; if she is dwarfish and little, pretty; if tall, handsome and manly—our valiant British Boudicca; if crooked, wise; if monstrous, comely. Her defects are no defects at all: she has no deformities. "Indeed, even the beloved's own shit does not stink." Though she is as filthy and disgusting as Sostratus's bitch or Parmeno's sow, though you would as willingly have a snake in your bosom or a toad in your dish, and call her witch, devil and hag, with every filthy name you can invent, he, on the other hand, admires her. She is his idol, lady, mistress, little Venus, queen, the essence of beauty, an angel, a star, a goddess.[10103]

[10100] Burton. Printed page 521, asterisk: "Plutarch. sibi dixit tam pulchram non videri, &c." Plutarch: he said she did not seem so beautiful to him, etc.

[10101] Editor. Aelian, Various History 14.47, gives a related anecdote about Nicostratus, a painter admiring Zeuxis's Helen. His reply means that a viewer with his eyes would not ask why he admires it; Aelian compares an educated listener's ears with an artist's eyes. Burton's Nicomachus, lovesickness and goddess wording are not established by that parallel. His Plutarch attribution and its transmission remain unresolved.

[10102] Burton. Printed page 522, r: "Quanto quàm Lucifer, aurea Phœbe, tanto virginibus conspectior omnibus Herce. Ovid." As far as golden Phoebe surpasses the Morning Star, so far Herse is more conspicuous than all the maidens. Ovid. The abbreviated comparison and Herce are retained.

[10103] Editor. Bunduica is Boudicca. "As live" means as lief, as willingly; "fulsome," disgusting. Parmeno's sow was proverbial for a mimic's convincing imitation of a pig (Plutarch, Table Talk 5.1); Sostratus's bitch remains untraced here. Venerilla is a diminutive of Venus. The Ovidian margin recalls Herse's brilliance among other maidens, Metamorphoses 2.722–725.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 522 [10104]Thou art my Vesta, thou my Goddess art, Thy hallowed Temple onely is my heart.	You are my Vesta, you are my goddess; Your only hallowed temple is my heart.[10105]
The fragrancy of a thousand Curtesans is in her face: Nec pulchræ effigies hæc Cypridis aut Stratonices, 'Tis not Venus picture that, nor the Spanish Infanta's, as you suppose, (good Sir) no Princess, or Kings daughter; no, no, but his divine Mistress forsooth, his dainty Dulcinia, his dear Antiphila, to whose service he is wholly consecrate, whom he alone adores.	The fragrance of a thousand courtesans is in her face. "This is no portrait of lovely Venus or Stratonice." That is not a picture of Venus or the Spanish Infanta, as you suppose, good sir—no princess or king's daughter. No, no: it is his divine mistress, indeed, his dainty Dulcinea, his dear Antiphila, to whose service he is wholly consecrated, the only one he adores.[10106]
[10107]Cui comparatus indecens erit pavo, Inamabilis sciurus, & frequens Phœnix.	Compared with her, a peacock would be ugly, A squirrel unlovable, and a phoenix commonplace.[10108]
To whom confer'd a Peacocks undecent, A Squirrels harsh, a Phœnix too frequent.	Compared with her a peacock is unsightly, A squirrel unappealing, a phoenix too common.
All the graces, veneries, elegances, pleasures, attend her. He prefers her before a Myriade of Court Ladies.	All graces, charms of love, refinements and pleasures attend her. He prefers her to ten thousand ladies of the court.

[10104] Burton. Printed page 522, dagger: "M.D. Son.30." Michael Drayton, sonnet 30.

[10105] Editor. Michael Drayton, Idea, sonnet 30, "To the Vestals," closing couplet. Vesta is the Roman goddess of the hearth and sacred fire; the beloved's eyes kindle the lover's inward flame in the full sonnet.

[10106] Editor. Cypris is Venus; Stratonice is a royal woman of classical tradition, here an exemplar of beauty. The unattached Latin line remains unlocated. An Infanta is a Spanish royal daughter. Dulcinea is Don Quixote's idealized beloved; Antiphila is the beloved in Terence's Heautontimorumenos. Burton moves between courtly, classical and comic models.

[10107] Burton. Printed page 522, asterisk: "Martial. l.5. Epig.38." Martial, book 5, epigram 38 (37 in the consulted text).

[10108] Editor. Martial 5.37.12–13 in the consulted numbering (Burton gives 5.38), from a lament for Erotion, an enslaved girl who died before her sixth birthday. This is affectionate mourning, not an original courtship poem. Burton prints erit ("will be") for Martial's erat ("was"). The phoenix, supposedly unique, becomes commonplace beside the person praised.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10109]He that commends Phillis or Neræa, Or Amarillis, or Galatea, Tityrus or Melibea, by your leave, Let him be mute, his Love the praises have.	Whoever praises Phyllis or Nerea, Or Amaryllis or Galatea, Tityrus or Meliboea—by your leave, Let him be silent: let this lover's beloved have the praise.[10110]

[10109] Burton. Printed page 522, s: "Ariosto." Ariosto.

[10110] Editor. Burton credits Ariosto but supplies no canto for these lines. The names evoke pastoral poetry; Tityrus is conventionally male, while the printed Melibea is retained. The exact passage and English intermediary remain unlocated, so the irregular list is not silently repaired.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nay, before all the Gods and Goddesses themselves. So [10111]Quintus Catulus admired his squint-eyed friend Roscius.	Indeed, he prefers her to all the gods and goddesses themselves. So Quintus Catulus admired his cross-eyed friend Roscius:
Pace mihi liceat (Cœlestes) dicere vestrâ, Mortalis visus pulchrior esse Deo.	With your leave, heavenly ones, let me say it: A mortal seemed more beautiful than a god.[10112]
By your leave gentle Gods, this I'le say true, There's none of you that have so fair an hue.	By your leave, gentle gods, I shall speak truly: Not one of you has so beautiful a face.
All the bumbast Epithetes, patheticall adjuncts, incomparably fair, curiously neat, divine, sweet, dainty, delicious, &c. pretty diminutives, corculum, suaviolum, &c. pleasant names may be invented, bird, mouse, lamb, puss, pigeon, pigsney, Kid, hony, love, dove, chicken, &c. he puts on her.	He bestows upon her every inflated epithet and passionate description—incomparably beautiful, exquisitely neat, divine, sweet, dainty, delicious—and pretty diminutive, "little heart," "little kiss," and every fond name that can be invented: bird, mouse, lamb, puss, pigeon, pig's eye, kid, honey, love, dove, chick and so on.[10113]
[10114]Meum mel, mea suavitas, meum cor, Meum suaviolum, mei lepores.	My honey, my sweetness, my heart, My little kiss, my delight.[10115]

[10111] Burton. Printed page 522, asterisk: "Tully lib.1. de nat. deor. pulchrior deo, & tamen erat oculis perversissimis." Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods, book 1: more beautiful than a god, and yet he was extremely cross-eyed.

[10112] Editor. Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods 1.79, quotes Quintus Lutatius Catulus on the actor Roscius. Cicero's surrounding discussion concerns attraction even to perceived blemishes. Burton retains the erotic admiration of a male beloved but paraphrases the couplet more expansively in his English version.

[10113] Editor. "Bumbast" means inflated or padded; "pathetical," full of feeling. Corculum is "little heart"; suaviolum "little kiss." "Pigsney," literally "pig's eye," was an affectionate term, however unflattering it may sound now.

[10114] Burton. Printed page 522, dagger: "Marullus ad Neæram epig. 1. lib." Marullus, to Neaera, Epigrams, book 1. The compact locator is retained.

[10115] Editor. Michele Marullo, addressed to Neaera in book 1 of his Epigrams according to Burton. Lepores literally denotes charms or delights. The precise poem locator remains to be established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
my life, my light, my jewell, my glory, [10116]Margareta speciosa, cujus respectu omnia mundi pretiosa sordent, my sweet Margaret, my sole delight and darling. And as [10117]Rhodomant courted Isabella;	My life, my light, my jewel, my glory, "beautiful Margaret, beside whom all the precious things of the world are worthless"; my sweet Margaret, my only delight and darling. And as Rodomont courted Isabella:[10118]
By all kind words, and gestures that he might, He calls her his dear heart, his sole beloved, His joyfull comfort, and his sweet delight. His Mistress, and his Goddess, and such names, As loving Knights apply to lovely Dames.	With every kind word and gesture in his power, He calls her his dear heart, his only beloved, His joyful comfort and his sweet delight, His mistress and his goddess, and the names That loving knights bestow upon lovely ladies.[10119]
Every cloth she wears, every fashion pleaseth him above measure; her hand,	Every garment she wears, every fashion pleases him beyond measure; her hand—
O quales digitos, quas habet illa manus!	Oh, what fingers, what hands she has![10120]

[10116] Burton. Printed page 522, asterisk: "Barthius." Caspar Barth.

[10117] Burton. Printed page 522, t: "Ariosto, lib.29. hist.8." Ariosto, book 29, stanza 8.

[10118] Editor. Caspar Barth's praise of Margaret, as assigned in the margin. The language also plays on margarita, "pearl," beside other precious things. No exact poem locator is supplied or yet confirmed.

[10119] Editor. Ariosto, Orlando furioso 29.8, according to Burton's citation; Rodomont is Rodomonte. Burton's English verse is retained as a five-line extract. The wider episode turns his pursuit of Isabella into coercion and ends in her death; the tender language should not be taken as the whole character of their encounter. The English intermediary awaits collation.

[10120] Editor. The admiration of fingers and hands resembles Ovid's catalogue of Daphne's beauty, Metamorphoses 1.500–502, but this exact line has not been securely assigned. It is translated as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 522–523 pretty foot, pretty coronets, her sweet carriage, sweet voyce, tone, O that pretty tone, her divine and lovely looks, her every thing, lovely, sweet, amiable and pretty, pretty, pretty. Her very name (let it be what it will) is a most pretty pleasing name; I believe now there is some secret power and vertue in names, every action, sight, habit, gesture; he admires, whether she play, sing, or dance, in what tyres soever she goeth, how excellent it was, how well it became her, never the like seen or heard.	Her pretty foot, pretty garlands, her sweet bearing, sweet voice, tone—oh, that pretty tone!—her divine and lovely looks, everything about her: lovely, sweet, lovable and pretty, pretty, pretty. Her very name, whatever it may be, is the prettiest, most pleasing name. Now I believe there is some secret power and virtue in names! He admires every action, sight of her, dress and gesture. Whether she plays, sings or dances, whatever finery she wears, how excellent it was, how well it suited her! Nothing like it was ever seen or heard.[10121]
Source page 523 [10122]Mille habet ornatus, mille decenter habet.	She has a thousand adornments, and wears a thousand becomingly.[10123]
Let her wear what she will, do what she will, say what she will,	Let her wear what she will, do what she will, say what she will:
[10124]Quicquid enim dicit, seu facit, omne decet.	For whatever she says or does, everything becomes her.[10125]
He applauds and admires every thing she wears, saith or doth,	He applauds and admires everything she wears, says or does:

[10121] Editor. “Coronets” are ornamental wreaths or headpieces; “carriage” is bearing or deportment; “habit” means clothing; “tyres,” attire and adornments. Burton’s repeated “pretty” mimics the lover’s indiscriminate praise.

[10122] Burton. Printed page 523, u: “Tibullus.” Tibullus.

[10123] Editor. Corpus Tibullianum 3.8.14, also numbered 4.2.14. The original line refers to the shape-changing god Vertumnus as a comparison for Sulpicia’s beauty in different clothing. Burton lifts it out of that comparison and applies it directly to the woman.

[10124] Burton. Printed page 523, dagger: “Marul. lib.2.” Marullus, book 2.

[10125] Editor. Marullo, book 2, in Burton’s citation; the precise epigram remains unlocated. Decet means is becoming, fitting or graceful, not necessarily morally good.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10126]Illam quicquid agit, quoquo vestigia vertit, Composuit furtim subsequiturque decor; Seu solvit crines, fusis decet esse capillis, Seu compsit, comptis est reverenda comis.	Whatever she does, wherever she turns her steps, Grace has secretly arrayed her and follows behind; If she unbinds her hair, loose locks become her; If she arranges it, her dressed hair commands reverence.[10127]
What ere she doth, or whether ere she go, A sweet and pleasing grace attends forsooth; Or lose, or bind her hair, or comb it up, She's to be honoured in what she doth.	Whatever she does, wherever she goes, A sweet and pleasing grace attends her, indeed; Whether she loosens, binds or combs up her hair, She deserves honour in whatever she does.
[10128]Vestem induitur, formosa est; exuitur, tota forma est, let her be dressed or undressed, all is one, she is excellent still, beautiful, fair, and lovely to behold. Women do as much by men; nay more, far fonder, weaker, and that by many parasanges.	"She puts on a garment: she is beautiful; she takes it off: she is beauty itself." Dressed or undressed, it is all the same: she is always excellent, beautiful, fair and lovely to behold. Women do as much for men—indeed, more, being much more foolish and weak, by many leagues.[10129]

[10126] Burton. Printed page 523, x: "Tibullus, l.4. de Sulpitia." Tibullus, book 4, on Sulpicia.

[10127] Editor. Corpus Tibullianum 3.8.7–10, also 4.2.7–10. The consulted text has movit, componit and veneranda where Burton prints vertit, composuit and reverenda. The translation follows Burton's wording. These verses belong to the poems about Sulpicia in the Tibullan collection, without settling authorship.

[10128] Burton. Printed page 523, a: "Aristænetus, Epist.1." Aristaenetus, letter 1.

[10129] Editor. Aristaenetus's first letter, according to Burton. The antithesis distinguishes being beautiful from embodying beauty itself. A parasang is an ancient Persian measure of distance, used here figuratively for a great margin. Burton's assertion about women's greater weakness is part of his argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Come to me my dear Lycias, (saith Musarium in [10130]Aristænetus) come quickly Sweet-heart, all other men are Satyrs, meer clowns, block-heads to thee, no body to thee: Thy looks, words, gestures, actions, &c. are incomparably beyond all others. Venus was never so much besotted on her Adonis, Phædra so delighted in Hippolitus, Ariadne in Theseus, Thysbe in her Pyramus, as she is inamoured on her Mopsus.	"Come to me, my dear Lycias," says Musarium in Aristaenetus. "Come quickly, sweetheart. All other men are satyrs, mere boors and blockheads beside you, nobodies beside you. Your looks, words, gestures and actions are incomparably beyond everyone else's." Venus was never so infatuated with her Adonis, Phaedra so delighted with Hippolytus, Ariadne with Theseus or Thisbe with her Pyramus, as this woman is in love with her Mopsus.[10131]
Be thou the Marygold, and I will be the Sun, Be thou the Frier, and I will be the Nun.	You be the marigold, and I will be the sun; You be the friar, and I will be the nun.[10132]
I could repeat centuries of such. Now tell me what greater dotage, or blindnesse can there be then this in both sexes? and yet their slavery is more eminent, a greater sign of their folly then the rest.	I could repeat hundreds of such examples. Now tell me: what greater infatuation or blindness can there be than this, in both sexes? Yet their servitude is more striking still, a greater sign of their folly than all the rest.

[10130] Burton. Printed page 523, b: "Epist.24. Veni cito charissime Lycia, cito veni; præ te Satyri omnes videntur non homines, nullo loco solus es, &c." Letter 24. Come quickly, dearest Lycias, come quickly; beside you all appear satyrs, not men. The final printed nullo loco solus es literally means "you are alone in no place"; it does not convey the body's "no body to thee" and is left as a doubtful reading.

[10131] Editor. Aristaenetus, letter 24 in Burton's locator. Satyrs and clowns mean brutish or uncultivated men. Mopsus is a conventional pastoral name for the woman's beloved; the following mythical couples are examples of intense attachment. The final clause of the Latin margin is textually doubtful and is recorded separately.

[10132] Editor. The marigold's association with the sun makes the first line an image of mutual dependence. The friar and nun add a playfully incongruous religious pairing. "Centuries" in the following prose means hundreds of examples, not hundreds of years.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They are commonly slaves, captives, voluntary servants, Amator amicæ mancipium, as [10133]Castilio terms him, his Mistress servant, her drudge, prisoner, bond-man, what not? He composeth himself wholly to her affections, to please her; and as Æmilia said, makes himself her lackey. All his cares, actions, all his thoughts, are subordinate to her will and commandement; her most devote, obsequious, affectionate servant and vassall. For love (as [10134]Cyrus in Xenophon well observed) is a meer tyranny, worse then any disease, and they that are troubled with it, desire to be free and cannot, but are harder bound then if they were in iron chains.	They are commonly slaves, captives and willing servants: "the lover is his beloved's property," as Castiglione calls him—his mistress's servant, her drudge, prisoner, bondsman, and what else? "He adapts himself entirely to her inclinations, to please her; and, as Emilia said, makes himself her lackey. All his concerns, actions and thoughts are subject to her will and command": her most devoted, obedient, affectionate servant and vassal. "For love," as Cyrus rightly observed in Xenophon, "is absolute tyranny, worse than any disease. Those afflicted by it desire freedom but cannot obtain it; they are bound more tightly than if they were in iron chains."[10135]

[10133] Burton. Printed page 523, y: "Lib.3. de aulico, alterius affectui se totum componit, totus placere studet, & ipsius animam amatæ pedissequam facit." The Courtier, book 3: he adapts himself entirely to another's inclinations, strives wholly to please, and makes his own soul his beloved's handmaid.

[10134] Burton. Printed page 523, z: "Cyropæd. l.5. amor servitus, & qui amant optant eo liberari non secus ac alio quovis morbo, neque liberari tamen possunt, sed validiori necessitate ligati sunt quam si in ferrea vincula conjecti forent." Cyropaedia, book 5: love is slavery; lovers wish to be freed from it as from any other disease, but cannot, being bound by a stronger compulsion than if they had been thrown into iron chains.

[10135] Editor. "Castilio" is Baldassare Castiglione, author of The Book of the Courtier; Emilia is a participant in its dialogue. Burton's vocabulary makes the lover a possession, servant and feudal dependant. In Xenophon's Cyropaedia 5.1.12, Cyrus describes lovers who wish to escape but are bound more strongly than by iron chains.

Original text 1651	Modern English
What greater captivity or slavery can there be (as [10136]Tully expostulates) then to bee in love? Is he a free man over whom a woman domineers, to whom she prescribes Lawes, commands, forbids what she will her self? That dares deny nothing she demands; she asks, he gives; she calls, he comes; she threatens, he fears; Nequissimum hunc servum puto, I account this man a very drudge.	What greater captivity or slavery can there be, as Cicero demands, than being in love? "Is a man free when a woman rules him, lays down laws for him, commands and forbids whatever she pleases? When he dares refuse nothing she demands? She asks: he gives. She calls: he comes. She threatens: he fears." "I consider this man a most worthless slave"—in other words, an absolute drudge.[10137]
Source page 523–524 And as he follows it, [10138]Is this no small servitude for an enamorite to be every hour combing his head, stiffning his beard, perfuming his hair, washing his face with sweet waters, painting, curling, and not to come abroad but sprucely crowned, decked and apparelled?	And, as he continues: "Is this no small slavery for a lover: every hour combing his hair, stiffening his beard, perfuming his hair, washing his face with scented waters, applying cosmetics and curls, and never going out unless smartly crowned, adorned and dressed?"[10139]

[10136] Burton. Printed page 523, c: "In paradoxis, An ille mihi liber videtur cui mulier imperat? cui leges imponit, præscribit, jubet, vetat quod videtur. Qui nihil imperanti negat, nihil audet, &c. poscit? dandum; vocat? veniendum; minatur? extimiscendum." In the Paradoxes: does that man seem free to me whom a woman commands, for whom she makes laws, prescribes, orders and forbids as she pleases? He refuses her no command, dares nothing, etc. Does she demand something? It must be given. Call? He must come. Threaten? He must tremble.

[10137] Editor. Cicero, Paradoxa Stoicorum 5.36, argues that freedom requires command of one's passions. Burton compresses and modifies its exchange of commands and obedience. "Tully" is Cicero; "mistress" here means the woman a man loves or courts, without necessarily implying an extramarital relationship.

[10138] Burton. Printed page 523, d, continued at the foot of the page: "Illane parva est servitus amatorum singulis fere horis pectine capillum, calamistroque barbam componere, faciem aquis redolentibus diluere, &c." Is it a small slavery for lovers, almost every hour, to arrange their hair with a comb and their beard with a curling iron, to wash their face with scented waters, etc.?

[10139] Editor. "Enamorite": a person in love; "sweet waters": scented washing waters; "painting": cosmetics. Paradoxa 5.36 supplies the preceding commands and obedience, but its continuation turns to collectors of art and luxurious objects (36–38), not this grooming list. Burton's implied continuation of Cicero is therefore unverified. His Latin margin specifies a curling iron for the beard; the English has stiffening. Both are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 524 Yet these are but toyes in respect to go to the Barber, Baths, Theatres, &c. he must attend upon her where ever she goes, run along the streets by her doors and windows to see her, take all opportunities, sleeveless errands, disguise, counterfeit shapes, and as many forms as Jupiter himself ever took; and come every day to her house (as he will surely do if he be truly enamoured) and offer her service, and follow her up and down from room to room, as Lucretia's suiters did, he cannot contain himself but he will do it, he must and will be where she is, sit next her, still talking with her.	Yet these are trifles by comparison: going to the barber, baths, theatres and so forth. He must attend her wherever she goes, run through the streets past her doors and windows to see her, seize every opportunity, invent pointless errands, wear disguises and assumed identities—as many forms as Jupiter himself ever took. He must come to her house every day, as he certainly will if truly in love, offer his services and follow her from room to room, as Lucretia's suitors did. He cannot restrain himself: he must do it. He must and will be wherever she is, sit beside her and talk to her continually.[10140]
[10141]If I did but let my glove fall by chance, (as the said Aretines Lucretia brags) I had one of my suiters, nay two or three at once ready to stoop and take it up, and kiss it, and with a low congy deliver it unto me: If I would walk, another was ready to sustain me by the arm. A third to provide fruits, Pears, Plums, Cherries, or whatsoever I would eat or drink.	"If I merely happened to drop my glove," as that Lucretia of Aretino's boasts, "one of my suitors—indeed, two or three at once—was ready to stoop, pick it up, kiss it and return it to me with a deep bow. If I wished to walk, another was ready to support my arm. A third would provide fruit: pears, plums, cherries, or anything I wanted to eat or drink."[10142]

[10140] Editor. "Sleeveless errands": useless or ineffective errands, here pretexts for visits. Jupiter's many assumed forms belong to stories of his sexual pursuits. "Entertainment" in the following paragraph means reception or treatment, rather than amusement.

[10141] Burton. Printed page 524, e: "Si quando in pavimentum incautius quid mihi excidisset, elevare idem quam promptissime, nec nisi osculo compacto mihi commendare, &c." If ever I carelessly dropped something on the floor, [they would] pick it up at once and return it to me only after kissing it, etc.

[10142] Editor. Burton attributes this Lucretia to Aretino; the exact work and passage remain unverified. She should not be identified with the Lucretia in Aeneas Sylvius's tale merely because they share a name. "Congy" is a reverential bow, from French congé.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All this and much more he doth in her presence, and when he comes home, as Troilus on his Cresseid, 'tis all his meditation to recount with himself his actions, words, gestures, what entertainment he had, how kindly she used him in such a place, how she smiled, how she graced him, and that infinitely pleased him; then he breaks out, O sweet Areusa, O my dearest Antiphila, O most divine looks, O lovely graces, and thereupon instantly he makes an Epigram, or a Sonet to five or seven tunes, in her commendation, or else he ruminates how she rejected his service, denied him a kiss, disgraced him, &c. and that as effectually torments him. And these are his exercises betwixt comb and glass, Madrigals, Elegies, &c. these his cogitations till he see her again.	He does all this and much more in her presence. When he comes home, like Troilus thinking of his Cressida, his sole occupation is to rehearse his actions, words and gestures: the reception he received, how kindly she treated him in a certain place, how she smiled and favoured him, and how infinitely it pleased him. Then he bursts out: "O sweet Areusa! O my dearest Antiphila! O most divine looks! O lovely graces!" At once he makes an epigram or a sonnet to five or seven tunes in her praise. Or else he broods over how she rejected his service, refused him a kiss, humiliated him and so forth; and this torments him just as powerfully. These are his occupations between comb and mirror: madrigals, elegies and the like. Such are his thoughts until he sees her again.[10143]
But all this is easie and gentle, and the least part of his labour and bondage, no hunter will take such pains for his Game, Fowler for his sport, or Souldier to sack a City, as he will for his Mistress favour.	But all this is easy and mild, the smallest part of his toil and bondage. No hunter will take such pains for his game, no bird-catcher for his sport, no soldier to sack a city, as he will for his mistress's favour.
Ipsa comes veniam, neque me salebrosa movebunt Saxa, nec obliquo dente timendus aper.	I myself will come as your companion; neither rugged Rocks nor the boar with its fearsome slanting tusk will deter me.[10144]

[10143] Editor. Troilus and Cressida are the lovers of the Trojan romance tradition, including Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde. "Glass" means mirror. An epigram is a short poem; sonnets, madrigals and elegies supply forms for the lover's praises or complaints. Burton accumulates literary names without identifying every immediate source.

[10144] Editor. Ovid, Heroides 4.103–104: Phaedra promises to accompany Hippolytus on the hunt. Burton prints neque me salebrosa ("nor … rugged") where the consulted Latin has nec me latebrosa ("nor … cavernous/hidden"). The original column retains Burton's reading; the modern column translates it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As Phædra to Hippolitus. No danger shall affright; for if that be true the Poets fain, Love is the son of Mars and Venus; as he hath delights, pleasures, elegancies from his mother, so hath he hardness, valour and boldness from his father. And 'tis true that Bernard hath; Amore nihil mollius, nihil violentius, nothing so boisterous, nothing so tender as love.	So says Phaedra to Hippolytus. No danger will frighten him. For if the poets' fiction is true, Love is the son of Mars and Venus: as he inherits delights, pleasures and graces from his mother, so he inherits hardiness, courage and boldness from his father. And Bernard's saying is true: "Nothing is gentler than love, nothing more violent"—nothing so tempestuous, nothing so tender as love.[10145]
If once therefore enamoured, he will go, run, ride many a mile to meet her, day and night, in a very dark night, endure scorching heat, cold, wait in frost and snow, rain, tempests, till his teeth chatter in his head, those Northern winds and showrs cannot cool or quench his flames of love. Intempestâ nocte non deterretur, he will, take my word, he will sustain hunger, thirst, Penetrabit omnia, perrumpet omnia, love will find out a way, through thick and thin he will to her; Expeditissimi montes videntur amnes tranabiles, he will swim through an Ocean, ride post over the Alpes, Apenine, or Pirenean hills,	Once in love, therefore, he will walk, run or ride many miles to meet her, by day or night, even in pitch darkness; endure scorching heat and cold; wait in frost, snow, rain and storms until his teeth chatter. Those northern winds and showers cannot cool or quench the flames of his love. "He is not deterred by the dead of night." Take my word for it: he will endure hunger and thirst. "He will penetrate everything, break through everything": love will find a way. Through thick and thin he will reach her. "Mountains seem easily traversed, rivers swimmable." He will swim an ocean, ride post-haste over the Alps, Apennines or Pyrenees,[10146]

[10145] Editor. Mars and Venus personify martial courage and erotic attraction; their parentage of Love explains his mixed character in Burton's argument. The precise source of the saying attributed to Bernard has not been established.

[10146] Editor. "Ride post": travel rapidly, using the posting system and relays of horses. Burton's catalogue of obstacles alternates English and Latin variations on love's supposed invincibility. The unattributed Latin phrases are translated without supplying conjectural authors.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10147]Ignem marisque fluctus, atque turbines Venti paratus est transire, ——	He is ready to pass through fire, the waves of the sea, And whirlwinds—[10148]
Source page 524–525 though it rain daggers with their points downward, light or dark, all is one: (Roscida per tenebras Faunus ad antra venit) for her sweet sake he will undertake Hercules twelve labours, endure, hazard, &c. he feels it not.	Even if it rains daggers point-downwards, light or dark makes no difference: "Faunus came through the darkness to the dewy cave." For her sweet sake he will undertake Hercules's twelve labours, endure anything and risk everything: he feels none of it.[10149]
Source page 525 [10150]What shall I say (saith Hædus) of their great dangers they undergo, single combats they undertake, how they will venture their lives, creep in at windows, gutters, climb over walls to come to their sweet-hearts, (anointing the doors and hinges with oyl, because they should not creak, tread soft, swim, wade, watch, &c.) and if they be surprised, leap out at windows, cast themselves headlong down, bruising or breaking their legs or arms, and sometimes losing life it self; as Calisto did for his lovely Melibea.	"What shall I say," asks Haedus, "of the great dangers they face, the single combats they undertake, how they risk their lives, creep through windows and gutters, climb over walls to reach their sweethearts"—oiling doors and hinges to prevent creaking, treading softly, swimming, wading, keeping watch and so on—"and, if surprised, leap out of windows and throw themselves headlong down, bruising or breaking their legs or arms, sometimes losing life itself?" So Calisto did for his lovely Melibea.[10151]

[10147] Burton. Printed page 524, dagger: "Plutarchus amat. dial." Plutarch, Dialogue on Love.

[10148] Editor. Plutarch, Dialogue on Love 17, describes the lover's readiness to go through fire, water and whirlwinds for his beloved. Burton's fire, sea and winds match this passage in the consulted English translation. His particular Latin verse version remains unidentified.

[10149] Editor. Ovid, Fasti 2.332, in the story of Faunus, Omphale and Hercules. The surrounding episode concerns Faunus's attempted sexual assault, frustrated when exchanged clothing leads him to Hercules. Burton detaches the line as an image of nocturnal pursuit. Hercules's twelve labours are the hero's traditional cycle of extraordinary tasks.

[10150] Burton. Printed page 525, asterisk: "Lib.1. de contem. amor. quid referam eorum pericula & clades, qui in amicarum ædes per fenestras ingressi stillicidiaque, egressi indeque deturbati, sed aut præcipites, membra frangunt, collidunt, aut animam amittunt." Book 1, On Despising Love: why recount the dangers and disasters of those who enter their mistresses' houses through windows and gutters and, on leaving or being driven out, fall headlong, breaking or bruising their limbs or losing their lives? The printed sed aut præcipites is syntactically awkward; the translation follows the evident general sense.

[10151] Editor. Pietro Haedus's work on love is cited under the abbreviated title De contemnendo amore. Calisto and Melibea belong to Celestina, the Spanish tragicomedy associated with Fernando de Rojas; Burton uses Calisto's fatal fall as an example of the risks of clandestine courtship. The quoted Haedus passage still requires edition-level collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hear some of their own confessions, protestations, complaints, proffers, expostulations, wishes, brutish attempts, labours in this kind. Hercules served Omphale, put on an aprone, took a distaff and spun; Thraso the souldier was so submisse to Thais, that he was resolved to do whatsoever she enjoyned. [10152]Ego me Thaidi dedam, & faciam quod jubet, I am at her service.	Hear some of their own confessions, declarations, complaints, offers, protests, wishes, brutish attempts and efforts of this kind. Hercules served Omphale, put on an apron, took up a distaff and spun. The soldier Thraso was so submissive to Thais that he resolved to do whatever she commanded: "I shall surrender myself to Thais and do what she orders." I am at her service.[10153]
[10154]Philostratus in an Epistle to his Mistress, I am ready to dye Sweet-heart if it be thy will; allay his thirst whom thy star hath scorched and undone, the fountains and rivers deny no man drink that comes; the fountain doth not say thou shalt not drink, nor the apple thou shalt not eat, nor the fair meadow walk not in me, but thou alone wilt not let me come near thee, or see thee, contemned and despised I dye for grief.	Philostratus, in a letter to his mistress: "I am ready to die, sweetheart, if that is your wish. Quench the thirst of the man your star has scorched and ruined. Springs and rivers refuse drink to no one who comes. The spring does not say, 'You shall not drink'; the apple, 'You shall not eat'; the beautiful meadow, 'Do not walk in me.' Yet you alone will not let me approach or see you. Scorned and despised, I die of grief."[10155]

[10152] Burton. Printed page 525, dagger: "Ter. Eunuch. Act.5. Scen.8." Terence, Eunuchus, act 5, scene 8.

[10153] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 1026–1027, where Thraso declares his submission to Thais and immediately compares himself with Hercules serving Omphale. The consulted text labels the scene 5.7; Burton gives 5.8 and recasts the wording. A distaff holds the fibre being spun.

[10154] Burton. Printed page 525, a: "Paratus sum ad obeundum mortem, si tu jubeas; hanc sitim æstuantis seda, quam tuum sydus perdidit, aquæ & fontes non negant, &c." I am ready to face death if you command it. Quench the thirst of the fevered one whom your star has ruined; waters and springs do not refuse, etc. The printed quam has an awkward antecedent; the rendering follows Burton's accompanying English.

[10155] Editor. The attributed Philostratus letter turns springs, fruit and meadow into contrasts with the woman's refusal. "Star" evokes the beloved as a celestial influence that burns or ruins the lover. Its exact place within the letter collection remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10156]Polienus when his Mistress Circe did but frown upon him in Petronius, drew his sword, and bad her kill, stab, or whip him to death, he would strip himself naked, and not resist. Another wil tak a journey to Iapan, Longæ navigationis molestias non curans: A third (if she say it) will not speak a word for a twelvemonths space, her command shall be most inviolably kept: A fourth, will take Hercules club from him, and with that Centurion in the Spanish Cœlestina, will kill ten men for his Mistress Areusa, for a word of her mouth, he will cut bucklers in two like pippins, and snap down men like flies, Elige quo mortis genere illum occidi cupis? [10157]	In Petronius, when his mistress Circe merely frowned at him, Polyaenus drew his sword and told her to kill him, stab him or whip him to death: he would strip naked and offer no resistance. Another will journey to Japan, "disregarding the hardships of a long voyage." A third, if she says so, will not speak a word for twelve months: her command will be kept absolutely. A fourth will take Hercules's club from him and, like that Centurio in the Spanish Celestina, kill ten men for his mistress Areusa at a word from her. He will slice shields in two like apples and strike men down like flies: "Choose what kind of death you want me to kill him by."[10158]
[10159]Galeatus of Mantua did a little more: for when he was almost mad for love of a fair Maid in the City, she to try him belike what he would do for her sake, bad him in jest leap into the River Po if he loved her; he forthwith did leap headlong off the bridge and was drowned. Another at Ficinum in like passion, when his Mistress by chance (thinking no harm I dare swear) bad him go hang, the next night at her doors hanged himself.	Galeatus of Mantua went a little further. When he was almost mad with love for a beautiful girl in the city, she told him in jest to leap into the River Po if he loved her—presumably to test what he would do for her sake. He immediately jumped headlong from the bridge and drowned. Another, at Ficinum, was similarly in love. When his mistress happened to tell him to go and hang himself—intending no harm, I dare swear—he hanged himself at her door the following night.[10160]

[10156] Burton. Printed page 525, b: "Si occidere placet, ferrum meum vides, si verberibus contenta es, curro nudus ad pœnam." If you wish to kill me, you see my sword; if you are content with a whipping, I run naked to punishment.

[10157] Burton. Printed page 525, dagger: "Act.15.18. Impera mihi; occidam decem viros, &c." Acts 15, 18: command me; I will kill ten men, etc.

[10158] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 130: Polyaenus writes to Circe after sexual failure. The source offers future submission in a letter; Burton turns it into an enacted gesture, drawing a sword, and understates the cause as a frown. Centurio is the boastful character's name in Celestina; it is not a military rank here. "Pippins" are apples.

[10159] Burton. Printed page 525, asterisk: "Gasper Ens. puellam miserè deperiens, per jocum ab ea in Padum desilire jussus statim è ponte se præcipitavit. Alius Ficino insano amore ardens ab amica jussus se suspendere, illico fecit." Gaspar Ens: desperately in love with a girl, and told by her in jest to jump into the Po, he immediately threw himself from the bridge. Another, at Ficino, burning with mad love, immediately obeyed when his mistress told him to hang himself.

[10160] Editor. These are anecdotes attributed to Gaspar Ens, presented as extreme consequences of lovers' obedience. Burton's "thinking no harm I dare swear" is his conjecture about the woman's intention. The Ens work and the place printed Ficinum (Ficino in the margin) remain unidentified; the uncertain name is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10161]Money (saith Xenophon) is a very acceptable and welcome guest, yet I had rather give it my dear Clinia, then take it of others, I had rather serve him, then command others, I had rather be his drudge, then take my ease, undergo any danger for his sake, then live in security. For I had rather see Clinia then all the world besides, and had rather want the sight of all other things, then him alone; I am angry with the night and sleep that I may not see him, and thank the light and Sun because they shew me my Clinia, I will run into the fire for his sake, and if you did but see him, I know that you likewise would run with me.	"Money," says Xenophon, "is a very welcome and pleasing guest; yet I would rather give it to my dear Clinias than receive it from others. I would rather serve him than command others, be his drudge than take my ease, face any danger for his sake than live in safety. For I would rather see Clinias than all the rest of the world, and lose the sight of everything else rather than of him alone. I resent night and sleep because I cannot see him, and thank the daylight and sun because they show me my Clinias. I will run into the fire for his sake; and if you merely saw him, I know you too would run with me."[10162]
Source page 525–526 So [10163]Philostratus to his Mistress, Command me what you will, I will do it; bid me go to Sea, I am gone in an instant, take so many stripes, I am ready, run through the fire, and lay down my life and soul at thy feet, 'tis done. So did Æolus to Iuno.	So Philostratus writes to his mistress: "Command whatever you wish: I will do it. Tell me to go to sea: I am gone at once. To take so many lashes: I am ready. To run through fire and lay down my life and soul at your feet: it is done." So Aeolus answered Juno:

[10161] Burton. Printed page 525, c, continued at the foot of the page: "Intelligo pecuniam rem esse jucundissimam, meam tamen libentius darem Cliniæ quam ab aliis acciperem, libentius huic servirem, quam aliis imperarem, &c. Noctem & somnum accuso, quod illum non videam, luci autem & soli gratiam habeo quod mihi Cliniam ostendant. Ego etiam cum Clinia in ignem currerem; & scio vos quoque mecum ingressuros si videretis." I know money is most pleasant; yet I would more gladly give mine to Clinias than receive it from others, and serve him rather than command others, etc. I blame night and sleep because I cannot see him, but thank daylight and the sun for showing him to me. I would even run into fire with Clinias; and I know you too would enter with me if you saw him.

[10162] Editor. Xenophon, Symposium 4.12–16: the speaker is Critobulus, praising his male beloved Clinias. Burton freely rearranges the speech. In the source, Critobulus's final boast is that his own beauty would persuade others to follow him through fire; Burton instead makes seeing Clinias the inducement. The male pronouns are retained.

[10163] Burton. Printed page 525, d: "Impera quidvis; navigare jube, navem conscendo; plagas accipe, plector; animum profundere, in ignem currere, non recuso, lubens facio." Command anything: tell me to sail, I board a ship; "take lashes," I am beaten; to pour out my life, to run into fire—I do not refuse; I do it gladly.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 526 —— Tuus ô regina quod optas Explorare labor, mihi jussa capescere fas est.	Your task, O queen, is to determine what you wish; My duty is to carry out your commands.[10164]
O Queen it is thy pains to enjoyn me still, And I am bound to execute thy will.	O queen, your task is always to command me, And I am bound to carry out your will.
And Phædra to Hippolitus,	And Phaedra to Hippolytus:
Me vel sororem Hippolite aut famulam voca, Famulamque potius, omne servitium feram.	Call me your sister, Hippolytus, or your servant— Your servant, rather: I will bear every kind of servitude.[10165]
O call me sister, call me servant, chuse, Or rather servant, I am thine to use.	Call me sister or servant, as you choose; Rather, your servant: I am yours to use.
[10166]Non me per altas ire si jubeas nives, Pigeat gelatis ingredi Pindi jugis, Non si per ignes ire aut infesta agmina Cuncter, paratus [10167]ensibus pectus dare, Te tunc jubere, me decet jussa exequi.	If you command me to go through deep snow, I would not shrink from climbing the frozen ridges of Pindus, Nor hesitate to pass through fire or hostile ranks, Ready to offer my breast to their swords. It is for you then to command, and for me to obey.[10168]

[10164] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 1.76–77: Aeolus accepts Juno's command to unleash the winds against the Trojans. This is obedience between divine powers, repurposed here as a parallel for lovers' service. Burton prints quod optas and capescere; the consulted text reads quid optes and capessere. His separate English couplet follows.

[10165] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 611–612, also known as Hippolytus: Phaedra offers herself as servant to her stepson. Burton has aut where the consulted text has vel in the first line. The Latin and Burton's own English version are retained as distinct verse units.

[10166] Burton. Printed page 526, f: "Seneca in Hipp. act.2." Seneca, Hippolytus [Phaedra], act 2.

[10167] Burton. Printed page 526, g: "Hujus ero vivus, mortuus hujus ero. Propert. lib.2. vivam si vivat; si cadat illa, cadam, Id." Living I shall be hers; dead I shall be hers. Propertius, book 2. I shall live if she lives; if she falls, I shall fall. The same author.

[10168] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 613–618, abridged and altered. Burton prints masculine paratus where the consulted text has paratis agreeing with "swords"; his final line also rewrites Seneca. Pindus is a Greek mountain range. The accompanying Propertius quotations are from 2.15.36 and 2.28.42; Burton changes vivet/cadet to vivat/cadat in the latter. His separate English paraphrase follows.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It shall not grieve me to the snowy hills, Or frozen Pindus tops forthwith to climbe, Or run through fire, or through an Army, Say but the word, for I am alwaies thine.	I shall not mind climbing straightaway To snowy hills or frozen Pindus's peaks, Or running through fire or through an army. Only say the word, for I am always yours.
Callicratides in [10169]Lucian breaks out into this passionate speech, O God of heaven, grant me this life for ever to sit over against my Mistris, and to hear her sweet voyce, to go in and out with her, to have every other business common with her; I would labour when she labours, saile when she sailes; he that hates her should hate me; and if a tyrant kill her, he should kill me; if she should dye, I would not live, and one grave should hold us both.	Callicratidas in Lucian bursts into this passionate speech: "O God of heaven, grant me this life for ever: to sit opposite my mistress and hear her sweet voice, to go in and out with her, to share every other occupation with her. I would work when she works and sail when she sails. Whoever hates her should hate me. If a tyrant kills her, he should kill me. If she dies, I would not live; one grave should hold us both."[10170]
[10171]Finiet illa meos moriens morientis amores.	Dying, she will end my love, as I too die.[10172]
Abrocomus in [10173]Aristænetus makes the like petition for his Delphia,	Abrocomus in Aristaenetus makes the same petition for his Delphia:
[10174]—— Tecum vivere amem, tecum obeam lubens.	I would love to live with you, and gladly die with you.[10175]

[10169] Burton. Printed page 526, i: "Dial. Amorum. Mihi ô dii cælestes ultra sit vita hæc perpetua ex adverso amicæ sedere, & suave loquentem audire, &c. si moriatur, vivere non sustinebo, & idem erit sepulchrum utriusque." Dialogue of Loves: O heavenly gods, may this life continue for ever for me—to sit opposite my beloved and hear her speak sweetly, etc. If she dies, I shall not bear to live, and one tomb will hold us both.

[10170] Editor. The speech occurs in Amores 46, transmitted under Lucian's name but of uncertain authorship. Callicratidas there addresses love for a male youth; Burton's English and Latin marginal rendering make the beloved female. He also changes shared illness to shared labour and a tyrant's imprisonment to killing. The modern column follows Burton while this note records the changed context.

[10171] Burton. Printed page 526, dagger: "Buchanan." George Buchanan.

[10172] Editor. Burton attributes the line to George Buchanan, without a work or poem number. Its precise location remains unverified. The future Finiet and the repeated dying of beloved and speaker are retained in the rendering.

[10173] Burton. Printed page 526, o: "Epist.21. Sit hoc votum à diis amare Delphidem, ab ea amari, adloqui pulchram & loquentem audire." Letter 21: let this be my wish from the gods—to love Delphis, be loved by her, speak to the beautiful woman and hear her speak.

[10174] Burton. Printed page 526, p: "Hor." Horace.

[10175] Editor. Aristaenetus's fictional love letters supply Abrocomus and Delphia (Delphis in the Latin margin); the exact letter passage requires collation. The following verse is Horace, Odes 3.9.24, spoken by Lydia at the close of a lovers' dialogue.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis the same strain which Theagines used to his Clariclea, so that I may but enjoy thy love, let me dye presently: Leander to his Hero, when he besought the Sea waves to let him go quietly to his Love, and kill him coming back.	It is the same refrain Theagenes used to his Chariclea: "If only I may enjoy your love, let me die at once." So too Leander, for his Hero, when he begged the sea's waves to let him reach his beloved undisturbed and kill him on the return journey:
[10176]Parcite dum propero, mergite dum redeo.	Spare me while I hurry there; drown me as I return.[10177]
'Tis the common humor of them all, to contemn death, to wish for death, to confront death in this case, Quippe queîs nec fera, nec ignis, neque præcipitium, nec fretum, nec ensis, neque laqueus gravia videntur; 'Tis their desire (saith Tyrius) to dye.	It is their common disposition in this situation to scorn death, wish for death and face death: "For neither wild beast, fire, precipice, sea, sword nor noose seems dreadful to them." "They desire to die," says Tyrius.[10178]
Haud timet mortem, cupit ire in ipsos —— obvius enses.	He does not fear death; he longs to go Straight against the swords themselves.[10179]

[10176] Burton. Printed page 526, q: "Mart." Martial.

[10177] Editor. Martial, Liber de Spectaculis 25b.4 in the consulted numbering. Burton repeats dum ("while") where the second clause of that text has cum ("when"). Leander swims the Hellespont to visit Hero. The preceding Theagenes and Chariclea are the lovers of Heliodorus's Aethiopica; Burton's spellings are retained in the original column.

[10178] Editor. "Tyrius" names Maximus of Tyre. Burton's Latin lists the dangers lovers supposedly disregard; the exact discourse and version behind this quotation remain unverified. "Humor" here means disposition or cast of mind.

[10179] Editor. Seneca, Medea 593–594, adapted: the source has aut timet mortem, under the preceding negative, whereas Burton begins Haud timet. In context the chorus describes the rage of a rejected wife, not a lover's devoted courage. A matching Haud version also appears in Otto Vaenius's Amorum emblemata, emblem 100; that parallel does not prove Burton used it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Though a thousand dragons or divels kept the gates, Cerberus himself, Scyron and Procrustes lay in wait, and the way as dangerous, as inaccessible as hell, through fiery flames and over burning coulters, he will adventure for all this. And as [10180]Peter Abelhardus lost his testicles for his Heloissa, he will I say not venture an incision, but life it self. For how many gallants offered to lose their lives for a nights lodging with Cleopatra in those daies! And in the hour and moment of death, 'tis their sole comfort to remember their dear Mistress, as [10181]Zerbino slain in France, and Brandimart in Barbary; as Arcite did his Emely.	Though a thousand dragons or devils guard the gates, though Cerberus himself, Sciron and Procrustes lie in wait, and the way is as dangerous and inaccessible as hell, through flames and over burning ploughshares, he will venture on despite it all. As Peter Abelard lost his testicles for his Heloise, so, I say, he will risk not merely an incision but life itself. How many gallants in those days offered to lose their lives for a night with Cleopatra! And at the very moment of death their only comfort is to remember their dear mistress: Zerbino, killed in France, and Brandimart in Barbary, as Arcite remembered his Emily.[10182]
Source page 527 [10183]—— when he felt death, Dusked been his eys, and faded is his breath, But on his Lady yet casteth he his eye, His last word was, mercy Emely, His spirit chang'd, and out went there, Whether I cannot tell, ne where.	When he felt death, His eyes grew dim, his breath faded; Yet still he cast his eye upon his lady. His last word was, "Mercy, Emily!" His spirit changed and passed away— Whither I cannot tell, nor where.[10184]

[10180] Burton. Printed page 526, dagger: "Lege Calamitates Pet. Abelhardi Epist. prima." Read Peter Abelard's Calamities, the first letter.

[10181] Burton. Printed page 526, asterisk: "Ariosto." Ariosto, Orlando furioso.

[10182] Editor. Cerberus guards the underworld; Sciron and Procrustes are violent figures overcome by Theseus. "Coulters" are plough blades. Abelard's Historia calamitatum describes his forcible castration after his relationship with Heloise; Burton frames it as a lover's risk. Zerbino and Brandimart are figures in Ariosto, Arcite in Chaucer. The Cleopatra claim is reported as Burton's anecdote, not treated as established history.

[10183] Burton. Printed page 527, asterisk: "Chaucer in the Knights tale." Chaucer, The Knight's Tale.

[10184] Editor. Chaucer, The Knight's Tale, Canterbury Tales I.2805–2810, freely abridged. Burton alters the opening and replaces Chaucer's image of the spirit changing its "house" with chang'd, and out went there. The original column preserves Burton's version, including Whether; the modern rendering gives its evident directional sense, "whither."

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10185]When captain Gobrius by an unlucky accident had received his deaths wound, heu me miserum exclamat, miserable man that I am, (instead of other devotions) he cries out, shall I die before I see Rodanthe my sweet heart. Sic amor mortem, (saith mine author) aut quicquid humanitus accidit, aspernatur, so love triumphs, contemns, insults over death it self.	When Captain Gobrius received his fatal wound in an unfortunate accident, "Alas, wretched me!" he exclaimed. Instead of other devotions, he cried: "Shall I die before I see Rodanthe, my sweetheart?" "Thus love despises death," says my author, "or anything that happens to human beings." So love triumphs over death itself, scorns it and exults over it.[10186]
Thirteen proper yong men lost their lives for that fair Hippodamias sake, the daughter of Onomaus King of Elis: when that hard condition was proposed of death or victory, they made no account of it, but couragiously for love died, till Pelops at last won her by a slight. [10187]As many gallants desperatly adventured their dearest blood for Atalanta the daughter of Schænius, in hope of marriage, all vanquished and overcame, till Hippomenes by a few golden apples happily obtained his suit.	Thirteen handsome young men lost their lives for the beautiful Hippodamia, daughter of Oenomaus, king of Elis. When faced with the harsh condition of death or victory, they disregarded it and courageously died for love, until Pelops finally won her by a trick. As many gallants recklessly risked their precious lives for Atalanta, daughter of Schoeneus, in the hope of marriage. All were defeated and overcome, until Hippomenes succeeded in his suit with a few golden apples.[10188]

[10185] Burton. Printed page 527, dagger: "Theodorus prodromus, Amorum lib.6. Interpret. Gaulmino." Theodore Prodromus, Loves, book 6, translated by Gaulmin.

[10186] Editor. Theodore Prodromus's Byzantine romance of Rhodanthe and Dosikles, cited through Gilbert Gaulmin's translation. "Insults over" means exults or triumphs over. The precise wording and the name Gobrius await collation with that version.

[10187] Burton. Printed page 527, r: "Ovid.10. Met. Higinius c.185." Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 10; Hyginus, chapter 185.

[10188] Editor. The two marriage contests pit suitors against death: a chariot race for Hippodamia, a footrace for Atalanta. In Ovid, Metamorphoses 10.560–707, Hippomenes wins by distracting Atalanta with golden apples. Burton's "slight" means a stratagem; the modern spelling is sleight.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Perseus of old, fought with a sea monster for Andromeda's sake; and our S. George freed the Kings daughter of Sabea (the golden legend is mine author) that was exposed to a Dragon, by a terrible combat. Our Knights errant, and the Sir Lancelots of these days, I hope will adventure as much for Ladies favours, as the Squire of Dames, Knight of the Sun, Sir Bevis of Southampton, or that renowned peere,	Perseus of old fought a sea-monster for Andromeda's sake; and our Saint George, in a terrible combat, rescued the king of Sabea's daughter, who had been exposed to a dragon—the Golden Legend is my source. I hope our knights-errant and the Sir Lancelots of today will risk as much for ladies' favour as the Squire of Dames, the Knight of the Sun, Sir Bevis of Southampton, or that renowned nobleman,[10189]
[10190]Orlando, who long time had loved dear Angelica the fair, and for her sake About the world in nations far and near, Did high attempts perform and undertake;	Orlando, who for a long time dearly loved Fair Angelica, and for her sake Throughout the world, in nations far and near, Performed and undertook great enterprises.[10191]

[10189] Editor. Burton mixes classical myth, the saint's legend and chivalric romance. The Squire of Dames appears in Spenser; the Knight of the Sun and Bevis of Southampton belong to popular romance. The Golden Legend's dragon story is conventionally set at Silene in Libya; Burton's Sabea is retained and requires collation with the version he used.

[10190] Burton. Printed page 527, k: "Ariost. lib.1. cant.1. staff.5." Ariosto, book 1, canto 1, stanza 5.

[10191] Editor. Ariosto, Orlando furioso 1.5, in Sir John Harington's English verse translation. "Staff." abbreviates stanza. The modern column updates this English quotation separately, preserving its four-line form.

Original text 1651	Modern English
he is a very dastard, a Coward, a block and a beast, that will not do as much, but they will sure, they will; for it is an ordinary thing for these enamorato's of our times to say and do more, to stab their arms, carouse in blood, [10192]or as that Thessalian Thero, that bit off his own thumb, provocans rivalem ad hoc æmulandum, to make his corrival do as much. 'Tis frequent with them to challenge the field for their Lady and Mistress sake, to run a tilt,	He is an utter craven, a coward, a blockhead and a beast who will not do as much. But surely they will—they will! These lovers of our own time commonly say and do still more: stab their arms, drink toasts in blood, or act like that Thessalian Thero, who bit off his own thumb, "challenging his rival to match the deed," to make his competitor do the same. They frequently issue challenges to combat for their lady and mistress, and charge in a joust,[10193]
[10194]That either bears (so furiously they meet) The other down under the horses feet,	So that each knocks the other down Beneath the horses' feet—so furiously they meet.
and then up and to it again,	Then up and at it again:
And with their axes both so sorely pour, That neither plate nor mail sustain'd the stour, But riveld wreak like rotten wood asunder, And fire did flash like lightning after thunder;	And both rain down such heavy blows with their axes That neither plate nor chainmail withstands the onslaught, But crumples and breaks apart like rotten wood, And fire flashes like lightning after thunder.[10195]

[10192] Burton. Printed page 527, dagger: "Plut. dial. amor." Plutarch, Dialogue on Love.

[10193] Editor. "Carouse": drink deeply; "corrival": rival suitor; "challenge the field": challenge to combat; "run a tilt": joust. Plutarch, Dialogue on Love 17, says Thero put his left hand on a wall and cut off his thumb with a sword, challenging his rival to do the same. Burton says he bit it off. His version is retained; the Latin intermediary remains uncollated.

[10194] Burton. Printed page 527, dagger: "Fairy Queen cant.3. lib.4. & cant.3. lib.4." The Faerie Queene, book 4, canto 3, and book 4, canto 3. The locator is repeated as printed.

[10195] Editor. The excerpts adapt Spenser, The Faerie Queene 4.1.41 and 4.3.15; Burton's margin repeats 4.3. In the second, Spenser's combatants are Cambell and Diamond. Burton condenses the stanza, changes bet, "beat," to pour, and omits the blood showering through the armour. Spenser has riued were, "were split"; Burton's difficult riveld wreak is retained, with its contextual sense "crumples and breaks apart." "Stour" means onslaught.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and in her quarrel, to fight so long [10196]till their head piece, bucklers be all broken, and swords hackt like so many saws, for they must not see her abused in any sort, 'tis blasphemy to speak against her, a dishonour without all good respect to name her. 'Tis common with these creatures, to drink [10197]healths upon their bare knees, though it were a mile to the bottome (no matter of what mixture) off it comes.	And to fight in her cause until "their helmets and shields are all broken, and their swords notched like so many saws." They cannot bear to see her insulted in any way: to speak against her is blasphemy; to name her without every mark of respect is dishonour. These creatures commonly kneel on their bare knees to drink toasts; though the cup were a mile deep, whatever the mixture, down it goes.[10198]

[10196] Burton. Printed page 527, dagger: "Dum cassis pertusa, ensis instar Serræ excisus, scutum &c. Barthius Cœlestina." Until the helmet is pierced, the sword notched like a saw, the shield, etc. Barth's Celestina.

[10197] Burton. Printed page 527, dagger: "Lesbia sex cyathis, septem Justina bibatur." Let Lesbia be toasted in six cups, Justina in seven.

[10198] Editor. Barthius is Caspar Barth, whose Latin Celestina Burton cites. The toast in the next margin adapts Martial 1.71.1, which has Laevia rather than Lesbia in the consulted text. The number of cups corresponds to the letters in each woman's name; Burton's version keeps the six/seven pattern.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 527–528 If she bid them they will go barefoot to Jerusalem, to the great Chams court, [10199]to the East Indies, to fetch her a bird to wear in her hat: and with Drake and Candish sail round about the world for her sweet sake, adversis ventis, serve twice seaven years as Iacob did for Rachel; do as much as [10200]Gesmunda the daughter of Tancredus prince of Salerna, did for Guisardus her true love, eat his heart when he died; or as Artemesia drank her husbands bones beaten to powder, and so bury him in her self, and endure more torments then Theseus or Paris. Et his colitur Venus magis quam thure, & victimis, with such sacrifice as these (as [10201]Aristænetus holds) Venus is well pleased.	If she orders it, they will go barefoot to Jerusalem, to the Great Khan's court, to the East Indies to fetch her a bird to wear in her hat. They will sail around the world with Drake and Cavendish for her sweet sake, "against contrary winds"; serve twice seven years, as Jacob did for Rachel; do as much as Ghismonda, daughter of Tancred, prince of Salerno, who ate the heart of her true love Guiscardo when he died; or as Artemisia, who drank her husband's powdered bones and so buried him within herself; and endure more torments than Theseus or Paris. "Venus is worshipped more by these things than by incense and sacrificial victims": such sacrifices, as Aristaenetus maintains, please Venus well.[10202]
Source page 528 Generally they undertake any pain, any labour, any toyl, for their Mistress sake, love and admire a servant, not to her alone, but to all her friends and followers, they hug and embrace them for her sake; her dog, picture, and every thing she wears, they adore it as a relique. If any man come from her, they feast him, reward him, will not be out of his company, do him all offices, still remembring, still talking of her:	In general, they undertake any hardship, labour or toil for their mistress's sake. They love and admire, acting as servants not only to her but to all her friends and attendants, whom they hug and embrace for her sake. Her dog, her portrait, everything she wears—they worship it as a relic. If anyone comes from her, they feast him, reward him, will not leave his company and do him every service, always remembering her, always talking of her:[10203]

[10199] Burton. Printed page 527, l: "As Xanthus for the love of Eurippe, Omnem Europam peragravit. Parthenius Erot. cap.8." As Xanthus, for love of Eurippe, travelled through all Europe. Parthenius, Love Stories, chapter 8.

[10200] Burton. Printed page 528, s: "Beroaldus è Bocatio." Beroaldus, from Boccaccio.

[10201] Burton. Printed page 528, t: "Epist.17. l.2." Letters, book 2, letter 17.

[10202] Editor. "Cham" is Khan; "Candish," Cavendish. Jacob serves fourteen years in Genesis 29. Beroaldo's Fabula Tancredi 275–284 has Ghismonda kiss Guiscardo's heart, drink poison and press his heart to her own; it does not support Burton's eat his heart. Boccaccio, Decameron 4.1, likewise has a poisoned drink. Burton's account is retained. Artemisia's powdered remains occur in Gellius 10.18. Parthenius 8 calls Xanthus's wife Heripe; Burton's margin has Eurippe.

[10203] Editor. The printed phrase love and admire a servant has elliptical, uncertain syntax. The modern rendering understands the lover as serving the beloved and her whole household, in keeping with the surrounding argument; it does not silently supply a lost word in the original. "Relique" means a relic, an object venerated for its connection with a sacred person.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10204]Nam si abest quod ames, præsto simulachra tamen sunt Illius, & nomen dulce obversatur ad aures.	For if the one you love is absent, images are still at hand, And that sweet name keeps hovering about your ears.[10205]
The very carrier that comes from him to her is a most welcome guest, and if he bring a letter, she will read it twenty times over, and as [10206]Lucretia did by Eurialus, kiss the letter a thousand times together, and then read it: And [10207]Chelidonia by Philonius, after many sweet kisses put the letter in her bosome,	Even the messenger who comes from him to her is a most welcome guest. If he brings a letter, she will read it twenty times over and, as Lucretia did with Euryalus's, "kiss the letter a thousand times in succession, and then read it." And Chelidonia, receiving Philonius's letter, put it in her bosom after many sweet kisses,[10208]
And kiss again, and often look thereon, And stay the messenger that would be gone:	And kiss it again, and often look at it, And detain the messenger who wishes to leave.
And ask many pretty questions, over and over again, as how he looked, what he did, and what he said? In a word,	And ask many little questions over and over again: how did he look, what did he do, what did he say? In a word:
[10209]Vult placere sese amicæ, vult mihi, vult pedissequæ, Vult famulis, vult etiam ancillis, & catulo meo.	He wants to please his mistress, me and her attendant, The servants, the maids too, and my little dog.[10210]

[10204] Burton. Printed page 528, dagger: "Lucretius." Lucretius.

[10205] Editor. Lucretius, De rerum natura, book 4, in the discussion of the absent beloved's images and name. Simulacra can mean images or likenesses and also carries the poem's technical sense of image-films that act on perception. Burton makes the lines part of his catalogue of obsessive remembrance.

[10206] Burton. Printed page 528, m: "Æneas Sylvius, Lucretia quum accepit Euryali literas hilaris statim milliesque papirum basiavit." Aeneas Sylvius: when Lucretia received Euryalus's letter, she was immediately joyful and kissed the paper a thousand times.

[10207] Burton. Printed page 528, n: "Mediis inseruit papillis litteram ejus, mille prius pangens suavia. Arist.2. epist.13." She slipped his letter between her breasts, first planting a thousand kisses on it. Aristaenetus, book 2, letter 13.

[10208] Editor. Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini's Historia de duobus amantibus tells the story of Euryalus and Lucretia; he later became Pope Pius II. The second example is attributed to Aristaenetus 2.13. Burton varies the names and spellings in the body and margins; they are regularized only in the modern column where secure. The English couplet's exact source remains unlocated.

[10209] Burton. Printed page 528, o: "Plautus Asinar." Plautus, Asinaria.

[10210] Editor. Plautus, Asinaria 183–185 in the consulted numbering: the bawd Cleareta describes a suitor's efforts to please her daughter and the whole household. Thus "me" in the Latin is the mother, not the poet. Burton compresses the lines, and his accompanying English couplet omits that distinction. "Well apaid" means well satisfied.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He strives to please his Mistress, and her maid, Her servants, and her dog, and's well apaid.	He strives to please his mistress and her maid, Her servants and her dog, and is well content.
If he get any remnant of hers, a busk-point, a feather of her fan, a shoo-tye, a lace, a ring, a bracelet of hair,	If he obtains any little thing of hers—a bodice lace, a feather from her fan, a shoelace, a ribbon, a ring or a bracelet of hair—[10211]
[10212]Pignusque direptum lacertis; Aut digito malè pertinaci,	A token snatched from her arms, Or from a finger that hardly resists,[10213]
he wears it for a favour on his arm, in his hat, finger, or next his heart. Her picture he adores twice a day, and for two houres together, will not look off it; As Laodomia did by Protiselaus, when he went to war, [10214]Sit at home with his picture before her: a garter or a bracelet of hers is more precious then any Saints Relique, he lays it up in his casket, (O blessed Relique) and every day will kiss it: if in her presence, his eye is never off her, and drink he will where she drank, if it be possible, in that very place, &c.	He wears it as a love-token on his arm, in his hat, on his finger or beside his heart. He worships her portrait twice a day and will gaze at it for two hours together without looking away, as Laodamia did when Protesilaus went to war: "Sit at home with his image before her." A garter or bracelet of hers is more precious than any saint's relic. He stores it in his casket—O blessed relic!—and kisses it every day. In her presence his eyes never leave her; he will drink where she drank, if possible at the very same spot, and so on.[10215]
If absent, he will walk in the walk, sit under that tree where she did use to sit, in that bowr, in that very seat,	If she is absent, he will walk along the path she walked, sit beneath the tree where she used to sit, in that bower, on that very seat,

[10211] Editor. A "busk-point" is a fastening lace associated with the stiffened front of a bodice. A "favour" is a token worn to declare attachment to a lady. The catalogue moves from fashionable accessories to objects treated as sacred relics.

[10212] Burton. Printed page 528, p: "Hor." Horace.

[10213] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.9.23–24: a token playfully taken from an arm or resisting finger. Burton prints direptum where the consulted text has dereptum. The weak resistance belongs to the poem's representation of courtship; "hardly resists" preserves the force of malè pertinaci.

[10214] Burton. Printed page 528, q: "Illa domi sedens imaginem ejus fixis oculis assidue conspicata." Sitting at home, she gazed continually at his image with eyes fixed upon it.

[10215] Editor. Laodamia and Protesilaus are the legendary couple separated by the Trojan War. "Picture" can mean an image or likeness, rather than specifically an oil painting. The precise source of the Latin marginal sentence remains unlocated. "Casket" means a small box; drinking in the same place suggests touching the same spot on the vessel with the lips.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— & foribus miser oscula figit,	And, wretched man, he presses kisses on the doors.[10216]
many years after sometimes, though she be far distant and dwell many miles off, he loves yet to walk that way still, to have his chamber window look that way: To walk by that rivers side (which though far away) runs by the house where she dwels, he loves the wind blows to that coast.	Sometimes many years afterwards, although she is far away and lives many miles off, he still loves to walk that way and have his chamber window face that direction. He loves to walk beside the river that, though far away, runs past the house where she lives; he loves the wind that blows towards that region.
[10217]O quotes dixi Zephyris properantibus illuc, Felices pulchram visuri Amaryllida venti.	Oh, how often I have said to the west winds hurrying there: "Happy winds, you will see beautiful Amaryllis!"[10218]
Source page 529 O happy western winds that blow that way, For you shall see my loves fair face to day,	O happy western winds that blow that way, For you will see my love's fair face today.
he will send a message to her by the wind,	He will send her a message by the wind:
[10219]Vos auræ Alpinæ, placidis de montibus auræ, Hæc illi portate. ——	You Alpine breezes, breezes from the peaceful mountains, Carry these words to her.[10220]

[10216] Editor. Lucretius, De rerum natura 4.1179: the excluded lover kisses the beloved's doors. The opening continues the preceding account of places and objects treasured for their association with her. A bower is a shaded garden retreat.

[10217] Burton. Printed page 528, r: "Buchanan. Sylva."

[10218] Editor. Buchanan, Sylvae, Desiderium Lutetiae 28–29, printed page 93 in the consulted scan. Daphnis addresses the west winds that will see Amaryllis; the next lines ask them to tell her of his passion. Buchanan has quoties, "how often," where Burton prints quotes. That printed form remains on the left; the modern column gives its evident sense. Burton's separate English couplet follows.

[10219] Burton. Printed page 529, †: "Fracastorius Naugerio."

[10220] Editor. Burton cites Girolamo Fracastoro addressing Andrea Navagero (Latin Naugerius). The precise poem locator remains unverified. The carried message is supplied by hæc, "these things/words."

Original text 1651	Modern English
he desires to confer with some of her acquaintance, for his heart is still with her, [10221]to talk of her, admiring and commending her, lamenting, moaning, wishing himself any thing for her sake, to have opportunity to see her, [10222]O that he might but enjoy her presence! So did Philostratus to his mistress, [10223]O happy ground on which she treads, and happy were I if she would tread upon me. I think her countenance would make the rivers stand, and when she comes abroad, birds will sing and come about her.	He longs to speak with one of her acquaintances, for his heart is always with her; to talk about her, admiring and praising her, lamenting and moaning, wishing himself anything for her sake, if only it would give him a chance to see her. Oh, if he could only enjoy her presence! So Philostratus addressed his mistress: "O happy ground on which she treads! And happy would I be if she would tread on me. I think her face could make rivers stand still; and when she comes out, birds will sing and gather round her."[10224]
Ridebunt valles, ridebunt obvia Tempe, In florem viridis protinus ibit humus.	The valleys will laugh; Tempe will laugh to meet her; The green earth will burst at once into flower.[10225]
The fields will laugh, the pleasant vallies burn, And all the grass will into flowers turn.	The fields will laugh, the pleasant valleys burn, And all the grass will turn into flowers.
Omnis Ambrosiam spirabit aura.	Every breeze will breathe ambrosia.

[10221] Burton. Printed page 529, p: "Non ipsos solum sed ipsorum memoriam amant. Lucian." "They love not only the people themselves but their memory."

[10222] Burton. Printed page 529, o: "Happy servants that serve her, happy men that are in her company."

[10223] Burton. Printed page 529, r: "Epist. O ter felix solum! beatus ego, si me calcaveris; vultus tuus amnes sistere potest, &c." "Letter. O thrice-happy ground! Happy am I if you tread on me; your face can stop rivers," etc.

[10224] Editor. The p and o marginal entries are printed out of alphabetical order; their body anchors are preserved. Philostratus is the author cited for these extravagant love letters; their exact numbering and Burton's Latin intermediary require collation. "Still" means always.

[10225] Editor. Tempe is the Thessalian vale, conventionally a lovely landscape. The English couplet's "burn" is retained as Burton prints it; it does not reproduce the Latin's second "laugh." Ambrosia evokes divine sweetness or fragrance. Exact sources of these unassigned verses remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10226]When she is in the meadow, she is fairer then any flower, for that lasts but for a day, the river is pleasing, but it vanisheth on a sudden but thy flowre doth not fade, thy stream is greater then the Sea. If I look upon the Heaven, methinks I see the sun faln down to shine below, and thee to shine in his place, whom I desire. If I look upon the night, methinks I see two more glorious stars, Hesperus and thy self.	"When she is in the meadow, she is fairer than any flower, for that lasts only a day. The river is pleasing, but it suddenly vanishes; yet your flower does not fade, your stream is greater than the sea. If I look at heaven, I seem to see the sun fallen down to shine below, and you, whom I desire, shining in its place. If I look at the night, I seem to see two more glorious stars: Hesperus and yourself."[10227]
[10228]A little after he thus courts his Mistress, If thou goest forth of the city, the protecting Gods that keep the town, will run after to gaze upon thee: If thou sail upon the seas, as so many small boats, they will follow thee: what river would not run into the Sea.	A little later he courts his mistress in these words: "If you leave the city, the protecting gods who guard the town will run after you to gaze at you. If you sail on the seas, they will follow you like so many small boats. What river would not run into the sea?"
Another, he sighs and sobs, swears he hath Cor scissum, an heart bruised to powder, dissolved and melted within him, or quite gone from him, to his mistress bosome belike, he is in an oven, a Salamander in the fire, so scorched with loves heat; He wisheth himself a saddle for her to sit on, a posie for her to smell to, and it would not grieve him to be hanged, if he might be strangled in her garters: he would willingly die to morrow, so that she might kill him with her own hands.	Another sighs and sobs, swears he has "a heart torn apart," a heart crushed to powder, dissolved and melted within him—or gone from him altogether, into his mistress's bosom, presumably. He is in an oven, a salamander in the fire, so scorched is he by love's heat. He wishes himself a saddle for her to sit on, a posy for her to smell; he would not mind being hanged if he could be strangled in her garters. He would willingly die tomorrow if she might kill him with her own hands.[10229]

[10226] Burton. Printed page 529, *: "Idem epist. in Prato cum sit flores superat; illi pulchri sed unius tantum diei; fluvius gratus sed evanescis; at tuus fluvius mari major. Si cælum aspicio, solem existimo cecidisse, & in terrâ ambulare, &c." "The same, letter. In the meadow she surpasses the flowers; they are beautiful, but only for one day; the river is pleasing, but you vanish; yet your river is greater than the sea. If I look at heaven, I think the sun has fallen and walks on earth," etc. The printed evanescis shifts to second person; the body instead says the river vanishes.

[10227] Editor. Hesperus is the evening star. These are extravagant comparisons within the Philostratus passage, not geographical or astronomical claims. Burton moves between third-person "she" and direct address; the modern column preserves those shifts.

[10228] Burton. Printed page 529, †: "Si civitate egrederis, sequentur te dii custodes, spectaculo commoti; si naviges sequentur; quis fluvius salum tuum non rigaret?" "If you leave the city, its guardian gods will follow you, moved by the sight; if you sail, they will follow; what river would not water your sea?"

[10229] Editor. The salamander was traditionally imagined as able to live in fire. A posy is a small bunch of flowers. The fanciful transformations and wishes for death belong to Burton's catalogue of erotic exaggeration.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10230]Ovid would be a Flea, a Gnat, a Ring, Catullus a Sparrow,	Ovid would be a flea, a gnat, a ring; Catullus, a sparrow:
O si tecum ludere sicut ipsa possem, Et tristes animi levare curas.	Oh, if I could play with you as she does, And ease the sorrowful cares of my heart![10231]
[10232]Anacreon, a glass, a gown, a chain, any thing,	Anacreon would be a mirror, a gown, a necklace —anything:
Source page 529–530 Sed speculum ego ipse fiam, Ut me tuum usque cernas, Et vestis ipse fiam, Ut me tuum usque gestes. Mutari & opto in undam, Lavem tuos ut artus, Nardus puella fiam, Ut ego teipsum inungam, Sim fascia in papillis, Tuo & monile collo, Fiamque calceus, me Saltem ut pede usque calces.	But let me become a mirror, So you may always look at me, your own; And let me become a garment, So you may always wear me, your own. I wish, too, to be changed into water, So that I may wash your limbs. Let me become spikenard, girl, So that I may anoint you yourself; Let me be the band about your breasts, And a necklace on your neck; And let me become a shoe, so that At least you may always tread on me.[10233]

[10230] Burton. Printed page 529, t: “El. 15. 2.”

[10231] Editor. Ovid, Amores 2.15, wishes to become the ring sent to his beloved; the flea and gnat attributions require separate verification. Catullus 2.9–10 addresses the beloved’s sparrow: he wishes to play with it as she does, rather than explicitly wishing to become it. Burton supplies that interpretation and adds O to the quoted opening.

[10232] Burton. Printed page 529, *: “Carm. 30.”

[10233] Editor. A Latin rendering of an Anacreontic poem, cited as poem 30 in Burton’s edition. The exact edition and modern numbering remain unverified. Nard is a fragrant ointment; fascia a breast-band. The print reads masculine teipsum, “you yourself,” after puella, “girl.” The translation keeps the emphasis on the person addressed, while following the female addressee indicated by the context.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 530 [10234]But I a looking-glass would be, Still to be lookt upon by thee, Or I, my Love, would be thy gown, By thee to be worn up and down; Or a pure Well full to the brims, That I might wash thy purer limbs: Or I'de be precious balm to 'noint, With choicest care each choicest joint; Or, if I might, I would be fain About thy neck thy happy chain: Or would it were my blessed hap To be the Lawn o're thy fair pap. Or would I were thy shoo, to be Daily trod upon by thee.	But I would be a looking-glass, For you to gaze upon always; Or, my love, I would be your gown, For you to wear wherever you go; Or a pure well filled to the brim, That I might wash your purer limbs; Or precious balm, to anoint Each lovely joint with choicest care; Or, if I could, I would gladly be The happy necklace round your neck; Or would it were my blessed luck To be the fine linen on your fair breast; Or would I were your shoe, to be Trodden on by you each day.[10235]
O thrice happy man that shall enjoy her: as they that saw Hero in Musæus, and [10236]Salmacis to Hermaphroditus,	O thrice-happy man who will possess her! So said those who saw Hero in Musaeus, and Salmacis to Hermaphroditus:
——[10237]Felices mater, &c. felix nutrix.—— Sed longè cunctis, longèque beatior ille, Quem fructu sponsi & socii dignabere lecti.	Happy the mother, and so forth; happy the nurse — But far, far happier than them all is he Whom you will deem worthy of the joys of marriage and a shared bed.[10238]
The same passion made her break out in the Comedy,	The same passion made the woman in the comedy exclaim:

[10234] Burton. Printed page 530, unmarked: "Englished by M. B. Holliday in his Technog. Act. 1. scen. 7."

[10235] Editor. Barten Holyday's Technogamia, act 1, scene 7, supplies the English rendering, printed here separately from the Latin. "Lawn" is fine linen; "pap" means breast; "hap" means fortune or chance. Burton's Holliday spelling remains in his marginal note.

[10236] Burton. Printed page 530, *: "Ovid. Met. lib. 4."

[10237] Burton. Printed page 530, t: "Xenophon Cyropæd. lib. 5."

[10238] Editor. The passage blends the admiration of Hero in Musaeus with Salmacis's address to Hermaphroditus in Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.320–328. Ovid blesses the young man's family, nurse and especially his bride; Burton's masculine ille/quem instead praises the man who will share the beloved's bed. The scan reads fructu sponsi. The Xenophon reference is anchored within these verses although it does not identify their Ovidian wording; its placement is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10239]Næ illæ fortunatæ sunt quæ cum illo cubant,	How fortunate the women who sleep with him![10240]
happy are his bed-fellows; and as she said of Cyrus, [10241]Beata quæ illi uxor futura esset, blessed is that woman that shall be his wife, nay thrice happy she that shall enjoy him but a night,	Happy are his bedfellows. And, as she said of Cyrus, "Blessed is the woman who will become his wife": happy is the woman who will marry him; indeed, thrice happy she who will enjoy him for even one night.[10242]
[10243]Una nox Jovis sceptro æquiparanda,	One night is worth Jupiter's sceptre.[10244]
Such a nights lodging is worth Jupiters Scepter,	Such a night's lodging is worth Jupiter's sceptre:
[10245]Qualis nox erit illa, dii, deæque, Quam mollis thorus?	What a night that will be, gods and goddesses! How soft the bed![10246]
O What a blissful night would it be, how soft, how sweet a bed? She will adventure all her estate for such a night, for a Nectarean, a balsome kiss alone.	"Oh, what a blissful night it would be! How soft, how sweet a bed!" She will risk her whole fortune for such a night, for a single nectar-sweet, balmy kiss.

[10239] Burton. Printed page 530, †: "Plautus de milite."

[10240] Editor. Plautus, Miles gloriosus 65. Artotrogus, the soldier's flattering dependant, reports women praising Pyrgopolynices; a woman does not speak the line directly on stage. The preceding exchange exposes Artotrogus's interest in being fed. Burton moves sunt, "are," after fortunatae and changes isto to illo, both rendered here as "him." His quotation and separate English gloss remain distinct.

[10241] Burton. Printed page 530, †: "Lucian."

[10242] Editor. The scan clearly reads Cyrus. The adjacent Lucian citation and the earlier Xenophon, Cyropaedia 5, citation do not provide a secure locator for this sentence; the attribution and anchor placement remain to be collated. The paraphrase follows Burton without silently assigning the quotation to another speaker.

[10243] Burton. Printed page 530, †: "E Græco Ruf." "From the Greek of Rufinus."

[10244] Editor. Burton attributes this Latin version to the Greek poet Rufinus but supplies no epigram number. Jupiter's sceptre represents supreme sovereignty: one night with the beloved is preferred to it. The exact epigram remains unlocated.

[10245] Burton. Printed page 530, *: "Petronius."

[10246] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 79: a male speaker recalls a night with Giton. Burton changes fuit, "was," to erit, "will be," and applies the couplet to anticipated heterosexual pleasure. Thorus is a spelling of torus, bed. The modern column follows Burton's future tense.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Qui te videt beatus est, Beatior qui te audiet, Qui te potitur est Deus.	Happy is he who sees you; Happier he who will hear you; He who possesses you is a god.[10247]
The Sultan of Sana's wife in Arabia, when she had seen Vertomannus that comely traveller, lamented to herself in this manner, [10248]O God, thou hast made this man whiter then the Sun, but me, mine husband, and all my children black: I would to God he were my husband, or that I had such a son, she fell a weeping, and so impatient for love at last, that (as Potiphars wife did by Joseph) she would have had him gone in with her, she sent away Gazella, Tegeia, Galzerana her waiting maids, loaded him with fair promises and gifts, and wooed him with all the Rhetorick she could,	The wife of the Sultan of Sana in Arabia, after seeing that handsome traveller Varthema, lamented to herself in this way: "O God, you have made this man whiter than the sun, but me, my husband and all my children black. Would to God he were my husband, or that I had such a son!" She began to weep and at last grew so impatient with love that, like Potiphar's wife with Joseph, she wanted him to go in with her. She sent away her waiting-maids Gazella, Tegeia and Galzerana, loaded him with fine promises and gifts, and wooed him with all the eloquence she could muster:[10249]
—— extremum hoc miseræ da munus amanti.	Grant this last favour to your wretched lover.[10250]

[10247] Editor. The sequence rises from seeing, to hearing, to sexual possession. The precise source of these three unassigned lines remains unverified. Audiet is future, "will hear," as rendered here.

[10248] Burton. Printed page 530, u: "Lod. Vertomannus navig. lib. 2. c. 5. O deus, hunc creasti sole candidiorem, è diverso me & conjugem meum & natos meos omnes nigricantes. Utinam hic, &c. Ibi Gazella, Tegeia, Galzerana, & promissis oneravit, & donis, &c." "Ludovico Varthema, Travels, book 2, chapter 5. O God, you created this man whiter than the sun, but, by contrast, me, my husband and all my children dark. Would that this man," etc. "There Gazella, Tegeia, Galzerana; and she loaded him with promises and gifts," etc.

[10249] Editor. Varthema's Itinerary, in the 1910 English edition, page 31, has the queen call him white like the sun and speak of one son. She offers Gazella, Tegia or Galzerana as alternatives to herself; Burton says she sends them away. His altered account is retained. This is a traveller's reported speech, not independent testimony about her conduct. Sana is Sana'a; the Joseph comparison recalls Genesis 39. Burton's Latin version and chapter numbering remain uncollated.

[10250] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.429. Dido asks Anna to plead with Aeneas for a delay. Burton changes det, "let him give," to da, "give," making the appeal direct. The modern rendering follows his imperative.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 530–531 But when he gave not consent, she would have gone with him, and left all, to be his page, his servant, or his Lackey, Certa sequi charum corpus ut umbra solet, so that she might enjoy him, threatning moreover, to kill her self, &c. Men will do as much and more for women, spend goods, lands, lives, fortunes; Kings will leave their Crowns, as King John for Matilda the Nun at Dunmow.	But when he would not consent, she was ready to go with him and leave everything to become his page, servant or lackey, "resolved to follow his dear body as a shadow does," if only she could possess him. She also threatened to kill herself, and so forth. Men will do as much and more for women: spend their goods, lands, lives and fortunes. Kings will leave their crowns, as King John would for Matilda, the nun at Dunmow.[10251]
Source page 531 [10252]But Kings in this get privileg'd may be, Ile be a Monk so I may live with thee.	But kings may be granted a privilege in this: I'll be a monk, if I can live with you.[10253]
The very Gods will endure any shame (atque aliquis de diis non tristibus inquit, &c.) be a spectacle as Mars and Venus were to all the rest; so did Lucians Mercury wish, and peradventure so dost thou. They will adventure their lives with alacrity.	The very gods will endure any shame—"and one of the less solemn gods says," and so forth—and become a spectacle to all the rest, as Mars and Venus did. So Lucian's Mercury wished; and perhaps you do too. They will gladly risk their lives:
——[10254]pro quâ non metuam mori——	For her I would not fear to die.[10255]

[10251] Editor. The Latin means that she is resolved to follow the beloved as a shadow follows a body; its precise source remains unlocated. The following John and Matilda example is a literary representation of royal desire, continued by Drayton's imagined epistle, rather than evidence that the king actually abdicated.

[10252] Burton. Printed page 531, *: "M. D."

[10253] Editor. M. D. identifies Michael Drayton, England's Heroical Epistles, King John to Matilda. The consulted collected text reads yet privilegd'd, whereas this scan reads get privileg'd. The modern column gives the evident sense of a royal exemption from monastic separation; the original preserves get.

[10254] Burton. Printed page 531, †: "Hor. Ode 9. lib. 3."

[10255] Editor. The gods' spectacle recalls Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.171–189, where Mars and Venus are trapped together; Burton's inquit adapts optat. Horace, Odes 3.9.11 supplies "for her I would not fear to die." The "twice" formulation that follows adapts 3.9.15, where Lydia speaks of dying twice for a male beloved. Burton turns the exchange into escalating declarations about one woman. The precise Lucian dialogue locator remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
nay more, pro quâ non metuam bis mori, I will dye twice, nay twenty times for her. If she die, theres no remedy, they must die with her, they cannot help it. A Lover in Calcagninus, wrote this on his darlings Tomb,	Indeed, more: "For her I would not fear to die twice." I will die twice—twenty times—for her. If she dies, there is no remedy: they must die with her; they cannot help it. A lover in Calcagnini wrote this on his darling's tomb:
Quincia obiit, sed non Quincia sola obiit, Quincia obiit, sed cum Quincia & ipse obii; Risus obit, obit gratia, lusus obit, Nec mea nunc anima in pectore, at in tumulo est.	Quincia has died, but Quincia did not die alone; Quincia has died, and with Quincia I too have died. Laughter dies, grace dies, playfulness dies; My soul is now not in my breast, but in the tomb.[10256]
Quincia my dear is dead, but not alone, For I am dead, and with her I am gone: Sweet smiles, mirth, graces, all with her do rest, And my soul too, for 'tis not in my brest.	Quincia, my dear, is dead, but not alone, For I am dead, and with her I have gone; Sweet smiles, mirth, graces—all lie with her, And my soul too, for it is not in my breast.
How many doting Lovers upon the like occasion might say the same? But these are toys in respect; they will hazard their very souls for their mistress sake.	How many lovesick lovers in such circumstances might say the same? Yet these are trifles by comparison: they will risk their very souls for their mistress's sake.
Atque aliquis inter juvenes miratus est, & verbum dixit, Non ego in cælo cuperem Deus esse, Nostram uxorem habens domi Hero.	And one among the young men marvelled and said: "I would not wish to be a god in heaven If I had Hero at home as my wife."[10257]
One said, to Heaven would I not desire at all to go, If that at mine own house I had such a fine wife as Hero.	One said, "I would have no desire To go to heaven at all, If in my own house I had Such a lovely wife as Hero."

[10256] Editor. Burton names Celio Calcagnini (Latin Calcagninus); the exact poem remains unlocated. The source scan reads obii, "I died," in the second line. Lusus means play, sport or amorous diversion. Burton's separate English version follows.

[10257] Editor. These Latin lines present a young admirer of Hero preferring marriage with her to divine life in heaven, corresponding to the admiration scene in Musaeus's Hero and Leander. The exact Latin translation used by Burton remains to be identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Venus forsook Heaven for Adonis sake ———[10258] cælo præfertur Adonis.	Venus forsook heaven for Adonis's sake: "Adonis is preferred to heaven."[10259]
Old Januarye in Chaucer thought when he had his fair May, he should never go to heaven, he should live so merrily here on earth; had I such a mistress, he protests,	Old January in Chaucer thought that once he had his lovely May he would never go to heaven, so merrily would he live here on earth. "If I had such a mistress," another protests,[10260]
[10261]Cælum diis ego non suum inviderem, Sed sortem mihi dii meam inviderent.	I would not envy the gods their heaven; The gods would envy me my lot.[10262]

[10258] Burton. Printed page 531, †: "Ov. Met. 10."

[10259] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 10.532: Venus prefers Adonis to heaven. Burton retains the Latin statement as well as its introductory English paraphrase.

[10260] Editor. January and May are the old husband and young bride in Chaucer's Merchant's Tale. Burton compresses January's concern that earthly marital bliss might cost him future heavenly bliss. The following heaven-envy couplet has a separate Buchanan attribution, so "another" in the modern transition distinguishes its speaker from January.

[10261] Burton. Printed page 531, †: "Buchanan Hendecass."

[10262] Editor. Burton cites Buchanan's hendecasyllabic poems. The exact poem remains unverified. Both the Latin and Burton's distinct English couplet are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I would not envy their prosperity, The Gods should envy my felicity.	I would not envy their prosperity; The gods would envy my happiness.
Another as earnestly desires to behold his sweetheart, he will adventure and leave all this, and more then this to see her alone.	Another longs just as earnestly to behold his sweetheart: he will risk and abandon all this, and more than this, merely to see her.
[10263]Omnia quæ patior mala si pensare velit fors, Unâ aliqua nobis prosperitate, dii Hoc precor, ut faciant, faciant me cernere coram, Cor mihi captivum quæ tenet hocce, deam.	If fortune would compensate for all the ills I suffer With some single piece of good fortune, I pray The gods to grant this: let me see face to face The goddess who holds this heart of mine captive.[10264]
If all my mischiefs were recompenced, And God would give me what I requested, I would my mistress presence only seek, Which doth mine heart in prison captive keep.	If all my troubles were compensated, And God would give me what I asked, I would seek only my mistress's presence, Who keeps my heart a prisoner.
But who can reckon up the dotage, madness, servitude and blindness, the foolish phantasms and vanities of Lovers, their torments, wishes, idle attempts?	But who can count the infatuation, madness, servitude and blindness, the foolish imaginings and vanities of lovers—their torments, wishes and futile attempts?

[10263] Burton. Printed page 531, *: "Petrarch."

[10264] Editor. Burton attributes this Latin quatrain to Petrarch without a work or poem number; that attribution remains unverified. Fors is fortune or chance, while dii is plural "gods." Burton's separate English paraphrase substitutes singular God; each version is rendered independently.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 532 Yet for all this, amongst so many irksome, absurd, troublesome symptoms, inconveniences, phantastical fits and passions which are usually incident to such persons, there be some good and graceful qualities in Lovers, which this affection causeth. As it makes wise men fools, so many times it makes fools become wise; [10265]it makes base fellows become generous, cowards couragious, as Cardan notes out of Plutarch; covetous, liberal and magnificent; clowns, civil; cruel, gentle; wicked prophane persons, to become religious; slovens, neat; churls, merciful; and dumb dogs, eloquent: your lazie drones, quick and nimble; Feras mentes domat cupido, that fierce, cruel and rude Cyclops Polyphemus sighed, and shed many a salt tear for Galatea's sake.	Yet, for all this, among the many irksome, absurd and troublesome symptoms, disadvantages, fantastic fits and passions that commonly afflict such people, love also produces some good and attractive qualities. As it makes wise men fools, so it often makes fools wise. As Cardano notes from Plutarch, it makes low-minded fellows noble, cowards courageous, the covetous generous and lavish, boors courteous, the cruel gentle, wicked and irreligious people devout, slovenly people neat, hard-hearted people merciful, and dumb dogs eloquent; your lazy drones become quick and nimble. "Cupid tames savage minds." That fierce, cruel and uncouth Cyclops Polyphemus sighed and shed many a salt tear for Galatea's sake.[10266]
No passion causeth greater alterations, or more vehement of joy or discontent. Plutarch. Sympos. lib.5. quæst.1. [10267]saith, that the soul of a man in love is full of perfumes and sweet odours, & all manner of pleasing tones and tunes, insomuch that it is hard to say (as he adds) whether love do mortal men more harm then good. It adds spirits, and makes them otherwise soft and silly, generous and couragious,	No passion produces greater changes, or more violent changes in joy or distress. Plutarch, in Table Talk, book 5, question 1, says that "the soul of a man in love is full of perfumes and sweet scents, and every kind of pleasing tone and tune." So much so that, as he adds, it is hard to say whether love does mortals more harm than good. It gives them spirit, making those otherwise weak and timid noble and courageous:[10268]

[10265] Burton. Printed page 532, y: "Cardan lib. 2. de sap. ex vilibus generosos efficere solet, ex timidis audaces, ex avaris splendidos, ex agrestibus civiles, ex crudelibus mansuetos, ex impiis religiosos, ex sordidis nitidos atque cultos, ex duris misericordes, ex mutis eloquentes." "Cardano, On Wisdom, book 2. It commonly makes the base noble, the timid bold, the miserly lavish, rustics courteous, the cruel gentle, the impious religious, the dirty clean and well groomed, the hard-hearted merciful, the mute eloquent."

[10266] Editor. "Generous" here means noble in spirit, as distinct from the following financial liberality. "Clowns" means rustics or boors; "dumb dogs" is a contemptuous image for those unable or unwilling to speak. The quotation and the Polyphemus example introduce the claim that love can civilize the uncouth. The exact source of Feras mentes remains unverified.

[10267] Burton. Printed page 532, z: "Anima hominis amore capti tota referta suffitibus & odoribus: Pæanes resonat, &c." "The soul of a man captured by love is entirely filled with incense and scents; it resounds with paeans," etc.

[10268] Editor. Burton explicitly cites Plutarch's Table Talk 5.1; the wording and location of the perfumes comparison still require verification. A paean is a song of praise. "Spirits" here means energy and courage, and "silly" means weak or lacking force.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10269]Audacem faciebat amor.	Love made her bold.[10270]
Ariadne's love made Theseus so adventurous, and Medea's beauty Jason so victorious; expectorat amor timorem. [10271]Plato is of opinion, that the love of Venus made Mars so valorous. A yong man will be much abashed to commit any foul offence that shall come to the hearing or sight of his Mistress.	Ariadne's love made Theseus so daring, and Medea's beauty made Jason so victorious: "love drives fear from the breast." Plato holds that love for Venus made Mars so valiant. "A young man will be deeply ashamed to commit any disgraceful act that comes to his mistress's ears or eyes."[10272]
As [10273]he that desired of his enemy now dying, to lay him with his face upward, ne amasius videret eum à tergo vulneratum, least his sweet-heart should say he was a coward.	Like the man who, as he was dying, asked his enemy to lay him face upwards, "lest his beloved see him wounded in the back"—lest his sweetheart should call him a coward.[10274]

[10269] Burton. Printed page 532, a: "Ovid."

[10270] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.96, describes Thisbe venturing out to meet Pyramus. Latin audacem does not identify gender by its ending; the modern "her" reflects that source context. Burton then turns to Theseus and Jason.

[10271] Burton. Printed page 532, b: "In convivio. Amor Veneris Martem detinet, & fortem facit; adolescentem maxime erubescere cernimus quum amatrix eum turpe quid committentem offendit." "In the Symposium. Love of Venus holds Mars captive and makes him brave; we see a young man blush deeply when his female lover catches him doing something shameful."

[10272] Editor. Plato, Symposium 196d, has Agathon argue that Love is stronger than Ares because Ares is captured by love for Aphrodite; it does not say straightforwardly that Venus makes Mars brave. The shame-before-the-beloved argument belongs to Phaedrus's earlier speech, 178d–179a, centred on male lovers. Burton's mistress and the margin's amatrix make the beloved female.

[10273] Burton. Printed page 532, *: "Plutarch. Amator. dial."

[10274] Editor. Plutarch, Dialogue on Love 17, relates a fallen fighter asking time to turn before the finishing blow, so that his male beloved will not see a wound in his back; compare Pelopidas 18.3. Burton compresses the action. Amasius is masculine; his English "sweet-heart" and the modern column leave the beloved's gender unspecified here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And if it were [10275]possible to have an Army consist of Lovers, such as love, or are beloved, they would be extraordinary valiant and wise in their government, modesty would detain them from doing amiss, emulation incite them to do that which is good and honest, and a few of them would overcome a great company of others.	And if it were "possible to have an army composed of lovers—those who love or are loved—they would be exceptionally brave and wise in governing themselves. A sense of shame would keep them from doing wrong; rivalry would urge them to do what is good and honourable; and a few of them would overcome a great host of others."[10276]
There is no man so pusillanimous, so very a dastard, whom love would not incense, make of a divine temper, and an heroical spirit. As he said in like case, [10277]Tota ruat cæli moles, non terreor, &c. Nothing can terrifie, nothing can dismay them, But as Sir Blandimor and Paridel those two brave Fayrie Knights, fought for the love of fair Florimel in presence——	There is no man so faint-hearted, so utter a coward, whom love would not kindle, endow with a godlike nature and a heroic spirit. As the poet said in a similar case, "Let the whole mass of heaven collapse: I am not afraid," and so forth. Nothing can terrify or dismay them. They fight as Sir Blandimor and Paridel, those two brave Faerie knights, fought for love of fair Florimel in her presence—[10278]

[10275] Burton. Printed page 532, c: "Si quo pacto fieri civitas aut exercitus posset partim ex his qui amant, partim ex his, &c." "If by any means a city or army could be made up partly of those who love, partly of those," etc. The marginal excerpt breaks off here.

[10276] Editor. Plato, Symposium 178e–179a, in Phaedrus's speech. Lovers and beloveds would be disciplined by shame and rivalry in honour. Burton abridges the argument; his Latin margin stops mid-sentence. "Honest" means honourable.

[10277] Burton. Printed page 532, †: "Angerianus."

[10278] Editor. The verse fragment is attributed to Girolamo Angeriano; its exact poem remains unlocated. "Incense" means kindle or inspire. Burton's Blandimor and Paridel correspond to Spenser's Blandamour and Paridell; the original spellings are retained in the modern narrative here because the textual difference is recorded in this note.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10279]And drawing both their swords with rage anew, Like two mad Mastives each other slew, And shields did share, and males did rash, and helms did hew; So furiously each other did assail, As if their souls at once they would have rent, Out of their breasts, that streams of blood did rail Adown as if their springs of life were spent, That all the ground with purple blood was sprent, And all their armour stain'd with bloody gore, Yet scarcely once to breath would they relent: So mortal was their malice and so sore, That both resolved (then yield) to dye before.	And both drew their swords in renewed fury; Like two mad mastiffs, each struck to kill the other; They sliced shields, tore mail and hacked helmets. So furiously they attacked each other, As if at once to tear the souls Out of their breasts, that streams of blood poured Down, as though the fountains of their life were drained; All the ground was spattered with purple blood, And all their armour stained with bloody gore. Yet scarcely once would they pause to breathe: So deadly was their hatred, and so fierce, That both resolved to die before they yielded.[10280]
Source page 532–533 Every base swain in love will dare to do as much for his dear mistress sake. He will fight and fetch [10281]Argivum Clypeum, that famous buckler of Argos, to do her service, adventure at all, undertake any enterprise. And as Serranus the Spaniard then Governor of Sluce, made answer to Marquess Spinola, if the enemy brought 50000 divels against him he would keep it.	Every humble rustic in love will dare as much for his dear mistress's sake. He will fight to fetch "the Argive shield," that famous buckler of Argos, to serve her; risk everything and undertake any enterprise. Like Serrano, the Spaniard then governor of Sluys, who answered the Marquis Spinola that even if the enemy brought fifty thousand devils against him, he would hold it.[10282]

[10279] Burton. Printed page 532, *: "Fairy Qu. lib. 4. Cant. 2."

[10280] Editor. Spenser, The Faerie Queene 4.2.17–18, abridged and altered. Burton prints each other slew where Spenser has each on other flew; the modern rendering gives an ongoing attempt to kill, consistent with the continued battle. He also replaces Spenser's final line about false friendship. The figure present is the false Florimell. "Share" means cut, "rash" tear, "rail" flow, and "sprent" sprinkled.

[10281] Burton. Printed page 532, †: "Zened. proverb. Cent. 6."

[10282] Editor. "Swain" means a country youth. Burton cites a proverb collection, abbreviated Zened., for the Argive shield; its precise entry remains unverified. Sluce is Sluys, now Sluis. The governor's boast is retained as Burton's anecdote; its historical source and the reported exchange with Spinola still require verification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 533 The nine worthies, Oliver and Rowland, and forty dozen of peers are all in him, he is all mettle, armor of proof, more then a man, and in this case improved beyond himself. For as [10283]Agatho contends, a true Lover is wise, just, temperate and valiant.	The Nine Worthies, Oliver and Roland, and forty dozen peers are all combined in him. He is all courage, armour tested and proven, more than a man; in this condition he surpasses himself. For, as Agathon argues, a true lover is wise, just, temperate and brave.[10284]
[10285]I doubt not therefore, but if a man had such an Army of Lovers (as Castilio supposeth) he might soon conquer all the world, except by chance he met with such another Army of Inamorato's to oppose it. [10286]For so perhaps they might fight as that fatal Dog, and fatal Hare in the heavens, course one another round, and never make an end.	"I do not doubt, therefore, that if a man had such an army of lovers," as Castiglione supposes, "he could soon conquer the whole world, unless by chance he encountered another such army of enamoured people to oppose it." For then, perhaps, they might fight like that fated Dog and fated Hare in the heavens, chasing round after one another without ever reaching an end.[10287]

[10283] Burton. Printed page 533, *: "Plat. Convivio."

[10284] Editor. The Nine Worthies are exemplary heroes of chivalric tradition; Oliver, Roland and the peers belong to Charlemagne's legendary company. "Armour of proof" is armour tested for strength. In Plato, Symposium 196b–197b, Agathon ascribes justice, temperance, courage and wisdom to Love itself; Burton applies the praise to a true lover.

[10285] Burton. Printed page 533, d: "Lib. 3. de Aulico. Non dubito quin is qui talem exercitum haberet, totius orbis statim victor esset, nisi forte cum aliquo exercitu confligendum esset in quo omnes amatores essent." "The Courtier, book 3. I do not doubt that whoever had such an army would immediately conquer the whole world, unless perhaps he had to fight an army in which all were lovers."

[10286] Burton. Printed page 533, e: "Higinus de Cane & Lepore cælesti, & Decimator." "Hyginus, on the celestial Dog and Hare; and Decimator."

[10287] Editor. Burton cites Castiglione's Courtier, book 3, for the invincible lovers and the Granada example. "Fatal" means governed by fate. Hyginus, Astronomica 2.33 and 35, discusses the Dog and Hare, but the paradox of a quarry that cannot be caught and a dog that cannot fail concerns a fox, not a hare. Burton's celestial chase conflates these accounts. Decimator is Heinrich Decimator; his precise passage remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Castilio thinks Ferdinand King of Spain would never have conquered Granado, had not Queen Isabell and her Ladies been present at the siege; [10288]It cannot be expressed what courage the Spanish Knights took, when the Ladies were present, a few Spaniards overcame a multitude of Moors.	Castiglione thinks Ferdinand, King of Spain, would never have conquered Granada if Queen Isabella and her ladies had not been present at the siege. "It is impossible to express what courage the Spanish knights gained from the ladies' presence: a few Spaniards overcame a multitude of Moors."
They will undergo any danger whatsoever, as Sir Walter Manny in Edward the thirds time, stuck full of Ladies favours, fought like a Dragon. For soli amantes as [10289]Plato holds, pro amicis mori appetunt, only Lovers will dye for their friends, and in their Mistress quarrel. And for that cause he would have women follow the Camp, to be spectators and encouragers of noble actions: upon such an occasion, the [10290]Squire of Dames himself, Sir Lancelot or Sir Tristram, Cæsar, or Alexander shall not be more resolute or go beyond them.	They will face any danger whatsoever. So Sir Walter Manny, in Edward III's time, covered with ladies' tokens, fought like a dragon. For, as Plato holds, "only lovers desire to die for their friends": only lovers will die for their friends and in their mistress's cause. For that reason, he would have women follow the army, to witness and encourage noble deeds. On such an occasion, the Squire of Dames himself, Sir Lancelot or Sir Tristram, Caesar or Alexander, would be no more resolute and could not surpass them.[10291]
Not courage only doth Love add, but as I said, subtilty, wit and many pretty devises,	Love supplies not only courage but, as I said, ingenuity, wit and many clever devices:
[10292]Namque dolos inspirat amor, fraudesque ministrat,	For love inspires stratagems and supplies deceits.[10293]

[10288] Burton. Printed page 533, f: "Vix dici potest quantam inde audaciam assumerent Hispani, inde pauci infinitas Maurorum copias superarent." "It can scarcely be said how much courage the Spaniards gained from this; hence a few overcame countless forces of Moors."

[10289] Burton. Printed page 533, †: "Lib. 5. de legibus."

[10290] Burton. Printed page 533, *: "Spencers Fayry Queen 3. book. cant. 8."

[10291] Editor. Ladies' "favours" are wearable tokens. The claim that lovers alone dare die for their beloved is in Plato, Symposium 179b, rather than the Laws 5 cited here. The precise source of the proposal about women accompanying armies remains to be verified. The Squire of Dames is Spenser's figure; Lancelot and Tristram are Arthurian knights.

[10292] Burton. Printed page 533, *: "Hyginus. l. 2."

[10293] Editor. The first of two adjacent asterisk margins names Hyginus; the next names Aratus. Their printed order is preserved, although the prose swan story matches Hyginus, Astronomica 2.8. The verse's own source and the role of the Aratus reference remain unresolved; the margins have not silently been reassigned.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10294]Jupiter in love with Leda, and not knowing how to compass his desire, turn'd himself into a Swan, and got Venus to pursue him in the likeness of an Eagle, which she doing, for shelter he fled to Leda's lap, & in ejus gremio se collocavit, Leda embraced him, and so fell fast asleep, sed dormientem Jupiter compressit, by which means Jupiter had his will. Infinite such tricks can love devise, such fine feats in abundance, with wisdome and wariness, ——[10295] quis fallere possit amantem.	Jupiter, in love with Leda and not knowing how to achieve his desire, turned himself into a swan and persuaded Venus to pursue him in the form of an eagle. When she did so, he fled for shelter to Leda's lap, "and settled himself in her bosom." Leda embraced him and fell fast asleep, "but Jupiter had intercourse with her while she slept"; in this way Jupiter had his will. Love can invent endless tricks of this kind, an abundance of such ingenious feats, with wisdom and watchfulness: "Who could deceive a lover?"[10296]
All manner of civility, decency, complement and good behaviour, plus salis & leporis, polite graces, and merry conceits. Bocace hath a pleasant tale to this purpose, which he borrowed from the Greeks, and which Beroaldus hath turned into Latine, Bebelius in verse, of Cymon and Iphigenia. This Cymon was a fool, a proper man of person, and the Governour of Cyprus son, but a very ass, insomuch that his father being ashamed of him, sent him to a Farm-house he had in the country to be brought up. Where by chance, as his manner was, walking alone, he espied a gallant yong Gentlewoman named Iphigenia, a Burgomasters daughter of Cyprus with her maid, by a brook side in a little thicket, fast asleep in her smock, where she had newly bathed her self:	And every kind of courtesy, propriety, politeness and good behaviour, "more wit and charm," refined graces and merry fancies. Boccaccio has a pleasant story to this purpose, borrowed from the Greeks, which Beroaldus turned into Latin and Bebel into verse: the story of Cymon and Iphigenia. This Cymon was a fool, a handsome man in person and the son of the governor of Cyprus, but a complete ass. His father was so ashamed of him that he sent him to be brought up at a farmhouse he owned in the country. There, as he was walking alone, as was his custom, he happened to see a fine young gentlewoman named Iphigenia, the daughter of a magistrate of Cyprus, with her maid, beside a brook in a little thicket. She lay fast asleep in her shift, having just bathed there.[10297]

[10294] Burton. Printed page 533, *: "Aratus in phænom."

[10295] Burton. Printed page 533, *: "Virg."

[10296] Editor. Hyginus, Astronomica 2.8, tells this trick of Jupiter and Nemesis, then mentions a separate Leda version. Burton combines them under Leda's name. The intercourse takes place while the woman is asleep, without consent; Burton treats it as a successful device. Virgil, Aeneid 4.296, supplies "Who could deceive a lover?" about Dido's suspicion of Aeneas's departure.

[10297] Editor. Boccaccio, Decameron 5.1. His Cymon, originally named Galesus, is the son of the rich Cypriot Aristippus, not described there as governor. Burton cites Latin adaptations by Filippo Beroaldo and Heinrich Bebel; these and his asserted Greek source remain to be collated. "Proper" means handsome; "smock" is a woman's shift. "Complement" means social polish or ceremony.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 533–534 When [10298]Cymon saw her, he stood leaning on his staffe, gaping on her immoveable, and in a maze: at last he fell so far in love with the glorious object, that he began to rouze himself up, to bethink what he was, would needs follow her to the city, and for her sake began to be civil, to learn to sing and dance, to play on Instruments, and got all those Gentlemen-like qualities and complements in a short space, which his friends were most glad of. In brief, he became from an Idiot and a clown, to be one of the most compleat Gentlemen in Cyprus, did many valorous exploits, and all for the love of Mistress Iphigenia.	"When Cymon saw her, he stood leaning on his staff, staring at her motionless and amazed." At last he fell so deeply in love with that glorious sight that he began to rouse himself, to reflect on what he was, and insisted on following her to the city. For her sake he began to acquire good manners, learn to sing and dance and play instruments. In a short time he acquired all those gentlemanly accomplishments and social graces, to the great delight of his friends. In brief, from a simpleton and a boor he became one of the most accomplished gentlemen in Cyprus, performed many courageous exploits—and all for love of Mistress Iphigenia.[10299]
Source page 534 In a word, I may say thus much of them all, let them be never so clownish, rude and horrid, Grobians and sluts, if once they be in love, they will be most neat and spruce; for, [10300]Omnibus rebus, & nitidis nitoribus antevenit amor, they will follow the fashion, begin to trick up, and to have a good opinion of themselves, venustatum enim mater Venus; a ship is not so long a rigging, as a yong Gentlewoman a trimming up her self, against her sweet-heart comes.	In a word, I can say this of them all: however boorish, uncouth and rough they may be, however ill-mannered or slovenly, once they fall in love they become wonderfully neat and smart. For "love surpasses everything, even the brightest splendours." They follow the fashion, begin to dress themselves up and think well of their own appearance, "for Venus is the mother of charms." A ship takes less time to rig than a young gentlewoman takes to dress herself before her sweetheart arrives.[10301]

[10298] Burton. Printed page 533, g: "Hanc ubi conspicatus est Cymon, baculo innixus, immobilis hæsit, & mirabundus, &c." "When Cymon caught sight of her, he stood leaning on his staff, motionless and astonished," etc.

[10299] Editor. Burton ends his summary with Cymon's acquisition of manners and accomplishments. Boccaccio's full tale continues with violent abduction, imprisonment and killings before marriage. The phrase "valorous exploits" compresses that troubling narrative into an example of love's civilizing power. "Idiot" here means an ignorant or foolish person, not a modern clinical diagnosis.

[10300] Burton. Printed page 534, †: "Plautus Casina act 2. sc. 4."

[10301] Editor. "Clownish" means boorish; Grobians exemplify bad manners; "sluts" means slovenly people. "Trick up" means adorn. Plautus, Casina 217–218, has Lysidamus declare that he thinks love surpasses everything, even brilliant splendours. Burton shortens this personal declaration into a maxim; his margin has 2.4, while the consulted text places it in 2.3. The following Venus phrase remains untraced. The ship comparison concerns the time spent dressing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A Painters shop, a flowry meadow, no so gracious aspect in Natures store-house as a yong maid, nubilis puella, a Novitsa or Venetian Bride, that looks for an husband, or a yong man that is her suitor; composed looks, composed gate, cloaths, gestures, actions, all composed; all the graces, elegancies in the world are in her face.	A painter's shop, a flowery meadow—nothing in nature's storehouse offers so lovely a sight as a young maid, "a girl of marriageable age," a novitsa or Venetian bride looking for a husband, or the young man who courts her. Their looks are studied, their walk studied; clothes, gestures, actions—all studied. Every grace and elegance in the world is in her face.[10302]
Their best robes, ribbins, chains, Jewels, Lawns, Linnens, Laces, Spangles, must come on, [10303]præter quam res patitur student elegantiæ, they are beyond all measure coy, nice, and too curious on a sudden: 'Tis all their study, all their business, how to wear their cloaths neat, to be polite and terse, and to set out themselves. No sooner doth a yong man see his sweet-heart coming, but he smugs up himself, puls up his cloak now faln about his shoulders, ties his garters, points, sets his band, cuffs, slicks his hair, twires his beard, &c. When Mercury was to come before his Mistress,	On must go their best robes, ribbons, chains, jewels, fine linens, laces and spangles: "they pursue elegance beyond what their means allow." Suddenly they become excessively fastidious, particular and painstaking. Their whole concern, their whole business, is to wear their clothes neatly, look polished and trim, and display themselves to advantage. No sooner does a young man see his sweetheart coming than he tidies himself up: pulls up the cloak that has slipped about his shoulders, ties his garters and fastening cords, adjusts his collar and cuffs, smooths his hair, twists his beard, and so on. When Mercury was about to appear before his mistress,[10304]
[10305]Chlamydemque ut pendeat aptè Collocat, ut limbus totumque appareat aurum.	He arranges his cloak so that it hangs becomingly, And its border and all its gold are displayed.[10306]

[10302] Editor. Novitsa is Burton's term for a Venetian bride; its particular ceremony or costume is not specified here. Nubilis means marriageable, not newly married. "Composed" means deliberately arranged or studied; "gate" is gait. The scan reads no so; the modern column supplies the evident comparative sense without altering the original.

[10303] Burton. Printed page 534, h: "Plautus."

[10304] Editor. Lawn is fine linen. "Coy," "nice" and "curious" here express excessive care and fastidiousness; "terse" means polished or neat. Points are cords fastening clothing, a band is a collar, and "twires" means twists. The h Plautus margin stands below the Latin about elegance, without a clear h in the body; it is attached to that quotation here. Exact Plautus locator unresolved.

[10305] Burton. Printed page 534, †: "Ovid Met. 2."

[10306] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.733–734: Mercury prepares to court Herse. Burton excerpts the cloak passage. The Latin rendering and his independent English couplet are retained separately, as throughout this block.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He puts his cloak in order, that the lace, And hem, and gold-work all might have his grace.	He sets his cloak in order, so the lace, The hem and gold-work all may show their grace.
Salmacis would not be seen of Hermaphroditus, till she had spruced up her self first.	Salmacis would not let Hermaphroditus see her until she had first made herself smart.
[10307]Nec tamen ante adiit, etsi properabat adire, Quam se composuit, quam circumspexit amictus, Et finxit vultum, & meruit formosa videri.	Yet, eager though she was to approach him, she did not go Until she had arranged herself, inspected her clothes, And composed her face, deserving to be thought beautiful.[10308]

[10307] Burton. Printed page 534, †: "Ovid Met. 4."

[10308] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.317–319. Salmacis composes her appearance before approaching Hermaphroditus. "Tire" means attire; the English verse makes the hoped-for admiration explicit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nor did she come, although 'twas her desire, Till she compos'd her self, and trim'd her tire, And set her looks to make him to admire.	Nor did she come, although she longed to go, Till she arranged herself and dressed with care, And set her looks to win his admiration.
Venus had so ordered the matter, that when her son [10309]Æneas was to appear before Queen Dido, he was	Venus had so arranged matters that, when her son Aeneas was to appear before Queen Dido, he was
Os humerosque deo similis (namque ipsa decoram Cæsariem nato genetrix, lumenque juventæ Purpureum & lætos oculis afflarat honores.)	Like a god in face and shoulders—for his mother herself Had breathed upon her son lovely hair, the radiant Glow of youth, and joyful splendour in his eyes.[10310]
Like a God, for she was the tire-woman her self, to set him out with all natural and artificial impostures. As Mother Mammæa did her son Heliogabalus new chosen Emperor, when he was to be seen of the people first.	Like a god: she herself acted as his dresser, adorning him with every natural and artificial device of deception. So Mother Mamaea did for her son Heliogabalus, newly chosen emperor, when he was first to appear before the people.[10311]
When the hirsute Cyclopical Polyphemus courted Galatea;	When the shaggy Cyclops Polyphemus courted Galatea,

[10309] Burton. Printed page 534, *: "Virg. 1. Æn."

[10310] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 1.589–591. Venus enhances Aeneas's appearance before Dido. Purpureum denotes the radiant bloom of youth here; a narrowly literal "purple" would obscure the description.

[10311] Editor. A tire-woman dresses and adorns another person. Burton's imperial example confuses family members: Herodian 5.3.3 names Soaemias as the mother of Bassianus, the future Heliogabalus, and Mamaea as the mother of Alexianus, the future Severus Alexander. The modernization retains Burton's claim; the precise source of the dressing anecdote remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10312]Jamque tibi formæ, jamque est tibi cura placendi, Jam rigidos pectis rastris Polypheme capillos, Jam libet hirsutam tibi falce recidere barbam, Et spectare feros in aqua & componere vultus,	Now you care for your looks, now you care to please; Now, Polyphemus, you comb your stiff hair with a rake; Now you like to cut back your shaggy beard with a sickle, And study and compose your savage features in the water.[10313]
Source page 534–535 And then he did begin to prank himself, To please and combe his head, and beard to shave, And look his face ith' the water as a glass, And to compose himself for to be brave.	And then he began to dress himself up, To please, to comb his hair and shave his beard, To view his face in water as a mirror, And arrange himself to look splendid.
Source page 535 He was upon a sudden now spruce and keen, as a new ground hatchet. He now began to have a good opinion of his own feature, and good parts, now to be a gallant.	Suddenly he was smart and sharp as a freshly ground hatchet. Now he began to think well of his own looks and fine qualities, and to act the gallant.
Jam Galatea veni, nec munera despice nostra, Certè ego me novi, liquidâque in Imagine vidi Nuper aquæ, placuitq; mihi mea forma videnti.	Come now, Galatea, and do not despise my gifts. I certainly know myself: lately I saw my reflection In clear water, and was pleased with my looks as I gazed.[10314]
Come now my Galatea, scorn me not, Nor my poor presents; for but yesterday I saw my self ith' water, and me thought Full fair I was, then scorn me not I say.	Come now, my Galatea, do not scorn me Or my poor gifts; for only yesterday I saw myself in water, and I thought Myself quite handsome. Do not scorn me, then.

[10312] Burton. Printed page 534, i: "Ovid. Met. 13."

[10313] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 13.764–767. The tools—rake and sickle—preserve the giant's rustic scale. "Prank" in Burton's following English version means adorn; "brave" means splendidly dressed. His version omits the specific tools.

[10314] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 13.839–841. Polyphemus admires his own reflection. The scan has liquidâque in Imagine where the consulted Ovid text has liquidaeque in imagine. The modern column renders the intended image of clear water; the original retains Burton's reading.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10315]Non sum adeò informis, nuper me in littore vidi, Cum placidum ventis staret mare————	I am not so ugly: lately I saw myself on the shore, When the sea lay calm, undisturbed by winds.[10316]
'Tis the common humor of all Sutors to trick up themselves, to be prodigal in apparel, purè lotus, neat, comb'd and curl'd, with powdered hairs, comptus & calamistratus, with a long love-lock, a flower in his ear, perfumed gloves, rings, scarfs, feathers, points, &c. as if he were a Princes Ganymede, with every day new suits, as the fashion varies; going as if he trod upon egs,	It is the common habit of all suitors to dress themselves up and spend extravagantly on clothes: "washed clean," neat, combed and curled, their hair powdered, "groomed and curled with an iron," with a long lovelock, a flower in the ear, scented gloves, rings, scarves, feathers, fastening cords and so forth—as if each were a prince's Ganymede, wearing new suits every day as fashion changes, and walking as though he were treading on eggs.[10317]
and as Heinsius writ to Primierus, [10318]If once he be besotted on a wench, he must lye awake a nights, renounce his book, sigh and lament, now and then weep for his hard hap, and mark above all things what Hats, Bands, Doublets, Breeches, are in fashion, how to cut his Beard, and wear his lock, to turn up his Mustachio's, and curle his head, prune his pickitiwant, or if he wear it abroad, that the East side be correspondent to the West:	And, as Heinsius wrote to Primierus, "Once he is infatuated with a girl, he must lie awake at night, give up his books, sigh and lament, sometimes weep over his hard luck, and above all observe what hats, collars, doublets and breeches are in fashion; how to trim his beard and wear his lovelock, turn up his moustaches and curl his hair, shape his pointed beard—or, if he wears it spread out, ensure that the east side matches the west."[10319]

[10315] Burton. Printed page 535, †: "Virg. E. l. 2."

[10316] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 2.25–26. The speaker is Corydon addressing Alexis, a male beloved; these lines are a new parallel, not a continuation of Polyphemus's speech. Burton prints Non where the consulted Virgil has nec.

[10317] Editor. A lovelock is a conspicuous long lock of hair worn as a token or fashion. Ganymede is the beautiful boy who serves as the gods' cupbearer and is desired by Jupiter; "a prince's Ganymede" suggests a handsome male favourite. The Latin grooming phrases are translated as well as Burton's adjacent English descriptions.

[10318] Burton. Printed page 535, k: "Epist. An uxor literato sit ducenda. Noctes insomnes traducendæ; literis renunciandum, sæpe gemendum, nonnunquam & illacrymandum sorti & conditioni tuæ. Videndum quæ vestes, quis cultus te deceat, quis in usu sit, utrum latus barbæ, &c. Cum cura loquendum, incedendum, bibendum & cum cura insaniendum." "Letter: Whether a scholar should marry. Sleepless nights must be passed; literature given up; frequent sighs and sometimes tears shed over your lot and condition. You must consider what clothes and appearance suit you, what is fashionable, which side of the beard," etc. "You must speak, walk and drink with care, and go mad with care."

[10319] Editor. Daniel Heinsius's cited letter asks whether a scholar should marry. "Pickitiwant" is a pointed beard; wearing it "abroad" means spread out. The east/west joke demands symmetry. The addressee printed Primierus and the letter's exact edition remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
he may be scoffed at otherwise, as Julian that Apostate Emperor was for wearing a long hirsute goatish beard, fit to make ropes with, as in his Mysopogone, or that Apologetical Oration he made at Antioch to excuse himself, he doth Ironically confess, it hindred his kissing, nam non licuit inde pura puris, eoque suavioribus labra labris adjungere, but he did not much esteem it, as it seems by the sequel, de accipiendis dandisve osculis non laboro, yet (to follow mine author) it may much concern a yong lover, he must be more respectful in this behalf, he must be in league with an excellent Taylor, Barber,	Otherwise he may be mocked, as Julian, the apostate emperor, was for wearing a long, shaggy, goat-like beard, fit for making ropes. In his Misopogon, the speech he made at Antioch in his own defence, he ironically admits that it hindered his kissing, "for it prevented me from pressing smooth lips to smooth lips, all the sweeter for their smoothness." But he did not greatly care, as the following words show: "I do not trouble myself about receiving or giving kisses." Yet, to follow my author, this may matter a great deal to a young lover. He must be more attentive in this respect, and on good terms with an excellent tailor and barber:[10320]
[10321]Tonsorem puerum sed arte talem, Qualis nec Thalamis fuit Neronis;	A young barber, but so skilled That Nero's chambers never had his equal.[10322]
have neat shooe-ties, points, garters, speak in Print, walk in Print, eat and drink in Print, and that which is all in all, he must be mad in Print.	He must have neat shoe-ties, fastening cords and garters; speak with studied precision, walk with studied precision, eat and drink with studied precision—and, most essential of all, be mad with studied precision.[10323]

[10320] Editor. Julian's Misopogon, or Beard-Hater, opens by ironically defending his beard against Antioch's ridicule. The passage on kissing is in the opening discussion of his beard (338–339). "Apologetical" means defensive, not regretful. "Apostate" is Burton's conventional Christian designation for Julian, who rejected Christianity. The Latin version Burton used still requires collation.

[10321] Burton. Printed page 535, †: "Mart. Epig. 5."

[10322] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 8.52.1–2; Burton's margin reads Epig. 5. The scan reads Thalamis, which allows the sense "in Nero's chambers," followed here. The consulted Martial instead reads Thalamus, the name of Nero's barber: "a boy barber so skilled that not even Nero's Thalamus equalled him." The original preserves Thalamis rather than silently correcting the name.

[10323] Editor. "In print" means exact, neat or meticulously correct, like a carefully produced printed text. The repetition culminates in the absurd demand that even madness follow the rules of fashionable conduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Amongst other good qualities an amorous fellow is endowed with, he must learn to sing and dance, play upon some instrument or other, as without all doubt he will, if he be truly touched with this Loadstone of Love. For as [10324]Erasmus hath it, Musicam docet amor & Poesin, Love will make them Musicians, and to compose ditties, Madrigals, Elegies, Love Sonnets, and sing them to several pretty tunes, to get all good qualities may be had.	Among the other accomplishments with which an amorous fellow is endowed, he must learn to sing and dance and play some instrument—as he certainly will if he has truly felt the attraction of this magnet of love. For, as Erasmus puts it, "Love teaches music and poetry." Love will make them musicians, make them compose ditties, madrigals, elegies and love sonnets, and sing them to various pretty tunes, acquiring every accomplishment they can.[10325]
Source page 535–536 [10326]Jupiter perceived Mercury to be in love with Philologia, because he learned languages, polite speech, (for Suadela her self was Venus daughter, as some write) Arts and Sciences, quo virgini placeret, all to ingratiate himself, and please his Mistress. 'Tis their chiefest study to sing, dance; and without question, so many Gentlemen and Gentlewomen would not be so well qualified in this kind, if love did not incite them.	Jupiter could tell that Mercury was in love with Philologia because he learned languages, polished speech—for Persuasion herself was Venus's daughter, according to some writers—the arts and sciences, "to please the maiden": all to win his mistress's favour and delight her. Their chief concern is to sing and dance; and certainly so many gentlemen and gentlewomen would not be so accomplished in these things if love did not spur them on.[10327]

[10324] Burton. Printed page 535, l: "Chil. 4. cent. 5. pro. 16."

[10325] Editor. A lodestone is a natural magnet. "Good qualities" here chiefly means cultivated accomplishments. The Erasmus reference identifies Adages, fourth chiliad, fifth century, proverb 16; the exact edition and wording remain to be collated. Elegies here are lyric or love poems, not necessarily laments for the dead.

[10326] Burton. Printed page 535, †: "Martianus Capella lib. 1. de nupt. philol. Jam. Illum sentio amore teneri, ejusq; studio plures habere comparatas in famulitio disciplinas, &c." "Martianus Capella, book 1, On the Marriage of Philology. Now I perceive that he is held by love, and that through devotion to her he has acquired several disciplines to attend him," etc.

[10327] Editor. Martianus Capella, Marriage of Philology and Mercury 1.36: Jupiter says Mercury has acquired disciplines as attendants and eloquence to please Philologia; music, painting and sculpture follow. Burton condenses the passage. The consulted Latin has amore torreri, "burn with love," against his amore teneri, "be held by love." Suadela is Persuasion; her parentage and Burton's particular edition remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 536 [10328]Who saith Castilio, would learn to play, or give his mind to Musick, learn to dance, or make so many rimes, Love-songs, as most do, but for womens sake, because they hope by that means to purchase their good wills, and win their favour? We see this daily verified in our yong women and wives, they that being maids took so much pains to sing, play, and dance, with such cost and charge to their parents, to get those graceful qualities, now being married will scarce touch an instrument, they care not for it.	"Who," says Castiglione, "would learn to play, devote himself to music, learn to dance, or write so many verses and love songs, as most do, except for women's sake, hoping by these means to gain their goodwill and win their favour?" We see this confirmed every day in our young women and wives. Those who, as unmarried girls, worked so hard at singing, playing and dancing, at such expense to their parents, to acquire those graceful accomplishments, will scarcely touch an instrument now they are married: they no longer care for it.[10329]
Constantine agricult. lib. 11. cap. 18. makes Cupid himself to be a great dancer, by the same token as he was capering amongst the Gods, [10330]he flung down a bowl of Nectar, which distilling upon the white Rose, ever since made it red: and Calistratus by the help of Dædalus about Cupids Statue, [10331]made a many of yong wenches still a dancing, to signe belike that Cupid was much affected with it, as without all doubt he was.	Constantine, in his Agriculture, book 11, chapter 18, makes Cupid himself a great dancer: as evidence, while capering among the gods, "he knocked down a bowl of nectar, which dripped onto the white rose and made it red ever afterwards." And Callistratus, with Daedalus's help, "made a group of young girls continually dancing" around Cupid's statue, presumably to show that Cupid was very fond of dancing—as undoubtedly he was.[10332]

[10328] Burton. Printed page 536, m: "Lib. 3. de aulico. Quis Choreis insudaret, nisi fœminarum causa? quis musicæ tantum navaret operam nisi quod illius dulcedine permulcere speret? quis tot carmina componeret; nisi ut inde affectus suos in mulieres explicaret?" "Book 3, The Courtier. Who would labour at dancing, except for women's sake? Who would devote so much effort to music, unless he hoped to charm them with its sweetness? Who would compose so many poems, except to express through them his feelings for women?"

[10329] Editor. Castilio is Baldassare Castiglione, The Courtier, book 3. Burton moves from men's motive for acquiring accomplishments to a generalization about women abandoning them after marriage; this is his argument, not an independently established social rule. Exact Italian/Latin passage awaiting collation.

[10330] Burton. Printed page 536, n: "Craterem nectaris evertit saltans apud Deos, qui in terram cadens, rosam prius albam rubore infecit." "Dancing among the gods, he overturned a bowl of nectar, which, falling to earth, stained the formerly white rose red."

[10331] Burton. Printed page 536, o: "Puellas choreantes circa juvenilem Cupidinis statuam fecit. Philostrat. Imag. lib. 3. de statuis. Exercitium amori aptissimum." "He made girls dancing around a youthful statue of Cupid. Philostratus, Images, book 3, On Statues. An exercise most suited to love."

[10332] Editor. The agricultural compilation cited under Constantine is the Geoponica; Burton specifies 11.18, still to be collated. Callistratus, Descriptions 3, describes a bronze Eros by Praxiteles and compares its lifelike quality with a dancing group by Daedalus. Burton instead makes Callistratus and Daedalus seem jointly to create girls around Cupid. His Philostratus margin reflects the collected-text context, not proof that Callistratus was the sculptor.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For at his and Psyches wedding, the Gods being present to grace the feast; Ganymede fill'd Nectar in abundance (as [10333]Apuleius describes it) Vulcan was the Cook, the Howres made all fine with Roses and flowers, Apollo plaid on the harp, the Muses sang to it, sed suavi Musicæ superingressa Venus saltavit, but his mother Venus danced to his and their sweet content.	For at his wedding to Psyche, with the gods present to honour the feast, Ganymede poured nectar in abundance, as Apuleius describes it. Vulcan was the cook; the Hours decorated everything with roses and flowers; Apollo played the harp and the Muses sang to it; "but Venus stepped forward and danced to the sweet music"—his mother Venus danced to his delight and theirs.[10334]
Witty [10335]Lucian in that Pathetical Love passage, or pleasant description of Jupiters stealing of Europa, and swimming from Phœnicia to Crete, makes the Sea calm, the winds hush, Neptune and Amphitrite riding in their chariot to break the waves before them, the Tritons dancing round about, with every one a Torch, the Sea-nymphs half naked, keeping time on Dolphins backs, and singing Hymenæus, Cupid nimbly tripping on the top of the waters, and Venus her self coming after in a shell, strawing Roses and flowers on their heads.	Witty Lucian, in that moving love passage, his pleasing description of Jupiter's abduction of Europa and swim from Phoenicia to Crete, makes the sea calm and the winds still. Neptune and Amphitrite ride in their chariot to break the waves before them; Tritons dance all around, each carrying a torch; half-naked sea nymphs keep time on dolphins' backs and sing the wedding song; Cupid trips nimbly over the water; and Venus herself follows in a shell, strewing roses and flowers over their heads.[10336]

[10333] Burton. Printed page 536, †: "Lib. 6. Met."

[10334] Editor. Apuleius, Metamorphoses 6.24. The Hours are divine figures, not spans of time. In Apuleius, Ganymede serves Jupiter while Liber serves the other gods; Apollo sings to the lyre. Burton compresses and rearranges the feast and supplies an English gloss after his Latin quotation.

[10335] Burton. Printed page 536, †: "Tom. 4."

[10336] Editor. Lucian, Dialogues of the Sea Gods, Zephyrus and Notus. Europa rides on Jupiter in the form of a bull. "Pathetical" means emotionally affecting; Hymenaeus is a wedding song. Burton's account presents an abduction through the festive imagery of a marriage procession. Lucian gives the torches and wedding song to plural Loves; Burton redistributes these details among Tritons, nymphs and a single Cupid.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Praxitiles in all his pictures of love, fains Cupid ever smiling, and looking upon dancers; and in Saint Markes Garden in Rome (whose work I know not) one of the most delicious pieces, is a many of [10337]Satyrs dancing about a wench asleep. So that dancing still is as it were a necessary appendix to love matters. Yong lasses are never better pleased, then when as upon an Holiday after Evensong, they may meet their sweet-hearts, and dance about a May-pole, or in a Town-green under a shady Elm.	In all his representations of Love, Praxiteles depicts Cupid smiling and watching dancers; and in St Mark's Garden in Rome, one of the most delightful pieces—I do not know whose work it is—shows a group of satyrs dancing around a sleeping girl. So dancing is always, as it were, a necessary accompaniment to love affairs. Young girls are never happier than when, on a holiday after evensong, they can meet their sweethearts and dance around a maypole, or on a town green beneath a shady elm.[10338]
Nothing so familiar in [10339]France, as for Citizens wives and maids to dance a round in the streets, and often too for want of better Instruments, to make good Musick of their own voices, and dance after it. Yea many times this love will make old men and women that have more toes then teeth dance, —— John come kiss me now, mask and mum; for Comus and Hymen love masks, and all such merriments above measure, will allow men to put on womens apparel in some cases, and promiscuously to dance, yong and old, rich and poor, generous and base, of all sorts.	Nothing is more common in France than for townsmen's wives and unmarried women to dance in a circle in the streets, often, for lack of better instruments, making good music with their own voices and dancing to it. Indeed, love often makes old men and women with more toes than teeth dance to "John, come kiss me now," take part in masques and go mumming. For Comus and Hymen delight immensely in masques and all such merriment: in some circumstances they will allow men to wear women's clothes, and people of every kind to dance together—young and old, rich and poor, noble and low-born.[10340]

[10337] Burton. Printed page 536, †: "Kornman. de cur. mort. part. 5. cap. 28. Sat. puellæ dormienti insultantium, &c." "Kornmann, On the Curiosities of the Dead, part 5, chapter 28. Satyrs leaping about a sleeping girl," etc. Insultantium can also suggest assailing or mocking her.

[10338] Editor. "Pictures" can mean representations more generally, including sculpture. Praxiteles was a sculptor; compare Callistratus's Eros just discussed. The assertion about all his depictions, and the precise Roman work cited through Heinrich Kornmann, remain unverified. "Evensong" is the evening church service.

[10339] Burton. Printed page 536, †: "View of Fr."

[10340] Editor. Comus personifies revelry; Hymen is the marriage god. Masques and mummings are costumed entertainments. "Promiscuously" here means mingled together without separation by age or rank. "Generous" means noble-born. The title John, come kiss me now is retained; the precise View of France cited in the margin remains to be identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Paulus Jovius taxeth Augustine Niphus the Philosopher, [10341]For that being an old man, and a publike Professor, a father of many children, he was so mad for the love of a yong maid (that which many of his friends were ashamed to see) an old gowty fellow, yet would dance after Fidlers. Many laughed him to scorn for it, but this omnipotent love would have it so.	Paolo Giovio censures the philosopher Agostino Nifo because, "though an old man, a public professor and the father of many children, he was so madly in love with a young girl"—a sight that shamed many of his friends—"that, old and gouty as he was, he would still dance to fiddlers." Many laughed him to scorn, but all-powerful love insisted on it.[10342]
Source page 537 [10343]Hyacinthino bacillo Properans amor, me adegit Violenter ad sequendum.	With a hyacinth wand, Hurrying Love drove me Forcibly to follow.[10344]
Love hasty with his purple staffe did make Me follow, and the dance to undertake.	Hasty Love, with his purple staff, compelled Me to follow and take up the dance.
And 'tis no news this, no indecorum; for why? a good reason may be given of it. Cupid and Death met both in an Inne, and being merrily disposed, they did exchange some arrows from either quiver; ever since yong men dye, and oftentimes old men dote.	There is nothing new in this, nothing improper; a good reason can be given for it. Cupid and Death met at an inn and, being in a merry mood, exchanged some arrows from their quivers. Ever since, young men die and old men often fall foolishly in love.

[10341] Burton. Printed page 536, p: "Vita ejus. Puellæ, amore septuagenarius senex usq; ad insaniam correptus, multis liberis susceptis: multi non sine pudore conspexerunt senem & Philosophum podagricum, non sine risu saltantem ad tibicenodes." "His Life. A seventy-year-old man, having fathered many children, seized to the point of madness by love for a girl: many watched with embarrassment the old, gouty philosopher dancing to flute-players, not without laughter."

[10342] Editor. Paulus Jovius is Paolo Giovio; Augustine Niphus is Agostino Nifo. "Taxeth" means censures. Burton's Latin margin specifies seventy years and flute-players, while his prose says merely old and uses "fiddlers." Each column follows its own source wording. Giovio's exact biographical passage remains to be collated.

[10343] Burton. Printed page 537, †: "Anacreon Carm. 3."

[10344] Editor. Burton attributes the Latin to Anacreon, poem 3; the precise Anacreontic text, Latin translator and numbering remain unverified. Hyacinthino may refer to the flower or its colour. The Latin says Love forces the speaker to follow; Burton's independent English couplet adds the dance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
———[10345]Sic moritur Juvenis, sic moribundus amat.	Thus the young man dies; thus the dying man loves.[10346]
And who can then withstand it? If once we be in love, yong or old, though our teeth shake in our heads, like virginal Jacks, or stand parallel asunder like the arches of a bridge, there is no remedy, we must dance Trenchmore for a need, over tables, chairs, and stools, &c. And princum prancum is a fine dance.	Who, then, can resist it? Once we are in love, young or old, though our teeth rattle in our heads like the jacks of a virginal, or stand far apart like the arches of a bridge, there is no help for it: if need be, we must dance Trenchmore over tables, chairs, stools and so on. And princum prancum is a fine dance.[10347]

[10345] Burton. Printed page 537, †: "Ioach. Bellius Epig."

[10346] Editor. Ioach. Bellius identifies Joachim du Bellay in Latinized form; the exact epigram remains to be located. The exchange of Love's and Death's arrows explains the paradox of youthful death and desire in old age. Moribundus means dying or near death, stronger than merely old.

[10347] Editor. A virginal is a keyboard instrument whose jacks rise to pluck the strings: Burton imagines loose teeth rattling like them. Trenchmore is a vigorous dance. Princum prancum is retained as his comic dance-name or refrain; its precise allusion remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Plutarch, Sympos. 1. quæst. 5. doth in some sort excuse it, and telleth us moreover in what sense, Musicam docet amor, licet prius fuerit rudis, how love makes them that had no skill before, learn to sing and dance; he concludes, 'tis only that power and prerogative love hath over us. [10348]Love (as he holds) will make a silent man speak, a modest man most officious; dull, quick; slow, nimble; and that which is most to be admired, an hard, base, untractable churl, as fire doth iron in a Smiths forge, free, facile, gentle, and easie to be entreated.	Plutarch, in Table Talk, book 1, question 5, offers some excuse for it, and explains the sense in which "love teaches music, even to someone previously unskilled": how love makes people with no previous ability learn to sing and dance. He concludes that it is simply the power and authority love has over us. "Love," he maintains, "will make a silent man speak, a shy man most obliging, the dull quick, the slow nimble; and, most remarkable of all, it will make a hard, mean, unmanageable churl—as fire softens iron in a smith's forge—open-handed, accommodating, gentle and easy to persuade."[10349]
Nay 'twill make him prodigal in the other extream, and give an hundred [10350]sesterces for a nights lodging, as they did of old to Lais of Corinth, or [10351]ducenta drachmarum millia pro unicâ nocte, as Mundus to Paulina, spend all his fortunes (as too many do in like case) to obtain his suit. For which cause many compare Love to wine, which makes men jovial and merry, frolick and sad, whine, sing, dance, and what not.	Indeed, it will drive him to the opposite extreme of extravagance, paying a hundred sesterces for a night's lodging, as men once did to Lais of Corinth, or "two hundred thousand drachmas for a single night," as Mundus offered Paulina; spending his entire fortune, as too many do in such cases, to gain his desire. This is why many compare love to wine, which makes men jovial and merry, playful and sad, whine, sing, dance—and what does it not make them do?[10352]

[10348] Burton. Printed page 537, q: "De taciturno loquacem facit, & de verecundo officiosum reddit, de negligente industrium, de socorde impigrum." "It makes the silent talkative, the shy obliging, the negligent industrious, the sluggish energetic."

[10349] Editor. Plutarch, Table Talk 1.5, supplies both the saying about love teaching poetry and the transformations of character, including the miser softened like iron in fire. These are explanations proposed by diners at Sossius's entertainment. The English translation confirms the sequence; Burton's Latin intermediary remains unidentified. "Modest" means shy, "officious" obliging, and "free" open-handed.

[10350] Burton. Printed page 537, †: "Gellius l. 1. cap. 8. Pretium noctis centum sestertia." "Gellius, book 1, chapter 8. The price of a night: one hundred thousand sesterces." The margin's sestertia counts thousands; the body says a hundred sesterces.

[10351] Burton. Printed page 537, †: "Josephus antiq. Jud. lib. 18. cap. 4."

[10352] Editor. The sums disagree: Burton's body says one hundred sesterces; his Gellius margin says one hundred thousand. Gellius, Attic Nights 1.8, actually reports Lais demanding ten thousand drachmas from Demosthenes, who refuses. Josephus, Antiquities 18.3.4, reports Mundus offering Paulina two hundred thousand drachmas, also refused; Burton's 18.4 locator differs. The two margins are vertically reversed on the page; here they accompany their respective stories.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But above all the other Symptoms of Lovers, this is not lightly to be over-passed, that likely of what condition soever, if once they be in love, they turn to their ability, Rimers, Ballet-makers, and Poets. For as Plutarch saith, [10353]They will be witnesses and trumpeters of their Paramours good parts, bedecking them with verses and commendatory songs, as we do statues with gold, that they may be remembred and admired of all.	But above all the other symptoms of lovers, this must not lightly be passed over: whatever their condition, once they fall in love they usually become, as their ability permits, rhymesters, ballad-makers and poets. For, as Plutarch says, "They will bear witness to their beloveds' good qualities and proclaim them abroad, adorning them with verses and songs of praise, as we adorn statues with gold, so that everyone may remember and admire them."[10354]
Ancient men will dote in this kind sometimes as well as the rest; the heat of love will thaw their frozen affections, dissolve the ice of age, and so far inable them, though they be 60 years of age above the girdle, to be scarce 30 beneath. Jovianus Pontanus makes an old fool rime, and turn Poetaster to please his Mistress,	Old men will sometimes dote in this way as much as anyone else. Love's heat will thaw their frozen feelings, melt the ice of age, and so invigorate them that, though they are sixty above the waist, they are scarcely thirty below it. Giovanni Pontano makes an old fool rhyme and turn into a would-be poet to please his mistress:
[10355]Ne ringas Mariana, meos ne despice canos, De sene nam Juvenem Dia referre potes, &c.	Do not scowl, Mariana; do not despise my grey hairs, For, goddess, you can turn an old man back into a youth.[10356]
Sweet Marian do not mine age disdain, For thou canst make an old man yong again.	Sweet Marian, do not disdain my age, For you can make an old man young again.

[10353] Burton. Printed page 537, r: "Ipsi enim volunt suarum amasiarum pulchritudinis præcones ac testes esse, eas laudibus, & cantilenis & versibus exornare, ut auro statuas, ut memorentur, & ab omnibus admirentur." "For they wish themselves to be heralds and witnesses of their sweethearts' beauty, adorning them with praises, songs and verses, as statues with gold, so that they may be remembered and admired by everyone."

[10354] Editor. "Likely" means ordinarily or probably; "condition" means social position. Ballet-makers means ballad-makers, not choreographers. Burton ascribes the lovers' praise to Plutarch; the precise passage and Latin version remain to be collated. The margin emphasizes beauty, while the body broadens this to "good parts."

[10355] Burton. Printed page 537, s: "Tom. 2. Ant. Dialogo."

[10356] Editor. Jovianus Pontanus is Giovanni Pontano. The margin abbreviates his Antonius dialogue, volume 2; the exact edition and couplet remain unverified. Canos means grey hairs, and Dia addresses the woman as divine. "Poetaster" is a contemptuous term for an inferior poet. The waist comparison is a joke about renewed sexual vigour.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 537–538 They will be still singing amorous songs and ditties (if yong especially) and cannot abstain though it be when they go to, or should be at Church. We have a pretty story to this purpose in Westmonasteriensis, an old writer of ours (if you will believe it) [10357]An. Dom. 1012. at Colewiz in Saxony, on Christmas Eve a company of yong men and maids, whilst the Priest was at Mass in the Church, were singing catches and love songs in the Church-yard, he sent to them to make less noise, but they sung on still; and if you will, you shall have the very song it self.	They are always singing love songs and ditties, especially when young, and cannot stop even while going to church, or when they ought to be there. We have an entertaining story of this in Westmonasteriensis, an old writer of ours—if you care to believe it. In AD 1012, at Colewiz in Saxony, on Christmas Eve, while the priest was saying Mass in church, a group of young men and girls were singing catches and love songs in the churchyard. He sent word asking them to make less noise, but they went on singing; and, if you please, here is the very song itself.[10358]
Source page 538 Equitabat homo per sylvam frondosam, Ducebatque secum Meswinden formosam, Quid stamus, cur non imus?	A man rode through the leafy wood, Taking beautiful Meswinde with him. Why are we standing here? Why do we not go?
A fellow rid by the green wood side, And fair Meswinde was his bride, Why stand we so, and do not go?	A fellow rode beside the greenwood, And fair Meswinde was his bride. Why do we stand here and not go?[10359]

[10357] Burton. Printed page 537, †: “Flores hist. fol. 298.”

[10358] Editor. Westmonasteriensis means “of Westminster,” here the chronicle known as Flores historiarum, formerly associated with Matthew of Westminster. Colewiz is Burton’s spelling for the site of the legendary cursed dancers in Saxony. A catch is a part-song. Burton himself signals doubt with “if you will believe it”; the cited folio and place-name require collation.

[10359] Editor. The Latin song says that the man brought beautiful Meswinde with him; Burton’s separate English version identifies her as his bride. Both versions are preserved. No new claim about their relationship has been added to the Latin translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This they sung, he chaft, till at length impatient as he was, he prayed to S. Magnus, patron of the Church, they might all three sing and dance 'till that time twelve month, and so [10360]they did, without meat and drink, wearisomness or giving over, till at years end they ceased singing, and were absolved by Herebertus Archbishop of Colen.	They sang this while he fumed, until at last, losing patience, he prayed to St Magnus, patron of the church, that all three of them might sing and dance until that day twelve months later. And so they did, without food or drink, without growing tired or stopping, until at the year's end they ceased singing and were absolved by Heribert, Archbishop of Cologne.[10361]
They will in all places be doing thus, yong folks especially, reading love stories, talking of this or that yong man, such a fair maid, singing, telling or hearing lascivious tales, scurril tunes, such objects are their sole delight, their continual meditation, and as Guastavinius adds, Com. in 4. Sect. 27. Prob. Arist. ob seminis abundantiam crebræ cogitationes, veneris frequens recordatio & pruriens voluptas, &c. an earnest longing comes hence, pruriens corpus, pruriens anima, amorous conceits, tickling thoughts, sweet and pleasant hopes; hence it is, they can think, discourse willingly, or speak almost of no other subject.	They will do this everywhere, especially the young: read love stories, talk of this young man or that beautiful girl, sing, tell or listen to lascivious tales and bawdy songs. Such things are their only delight and their constant preoccupation. As Guastavini adds, in his commentary on Aristotle's Problems, section 4, problem 27, "because of an abundance of semen, thoughts recur, Venus is often remembered, and pleasure itches for satisfaction," and so on. From this comes an eager longing, "an itching body, an itching soul," amorous fancies, titillating thoughts, sweet and pleasant hopes. Hence they can think or speak of almost nothing else, and willingly discuss no other subject.[10362]

[10360] Burton. Printed page 538, *: "Per totum annum cantarunt, pluvia super illos non cecidit; non frigus, non calor, non sitis, nec lassitudo illos affecit, &c." "They sang throughout the whole year; rain did not fall upon them; neither cold, heat, thirst nor weariness affected them," etc.

[10361] Editor. The scan reads "all three," despite having introduced a company; that number is retained. Absolution ends the curse in Burton's account. This is a reported miracle-legend, not a medical explanation of prolonged dancing. The chronicler's wording, number of dancers and chronology remain to be checked.

[10362] Editor. Guastavinius is Girolamo Guastavini, a commentator on the Aristotelian Problems. The semen explanation belongs to the historical physiology quoted by Burton. Pruriens literally means itching, here sexual excitement; "scurril" means bawdy or coarse. The exact commentary passage still requires collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis their only desire, if it may be done by art, to see their husbands picture in a glass, they'l give any thing to know when they shall be married, how many husbands they shall have, by Cromnyomantia, a kind of Divination with [10363]onions laid on the Altar on Christmas Eve, or by fasting on S. Annes Eve or night, to know who shall be their first husband, or by Amphitomantia, by beans in a Cake, &c. to burn the same.	Their one desire is to see their future husband's image in a mirror, if magic can accomplish it. They will give anything to know when they will marry and how many husbands they will have: by cromnyomancy, a kind of divination using onions laid on the altar on Christmas Eve; by fasting on St Anne's eve or night to discover who their first husband will be; or by amphitomancy, using beans in a cake and burning it, and so forth.[10364]
This love is the cause of all good conceits, [10365]neatness, exornations, plays, elegancies, delights, pleasant expressions, sweet motions, and gestures, joys, comforts, exultancies, and all the sweetness of our life, [10366]qualis jam vita foret, aut quid jucundi sine aureâ Venere? Emoriar cum istâ non amplius mihi cura fuerit, let me live no longer then I may love, saith a mad merry fellow in Mimnermus.	This love is the cause of all fine fancies, neatness, adornment, games, elegance, delights, pleasant expressions, graceful movements and gestures, joys, comforts, exultation, and all the sweetness of our life. "What sort of life would it be, or what pleasure could there be, without golden Venus? Let me die when I no longer care for her." Let me live no longer than I can love, says a mad, merry fellow in Mimnermus.[10367]

[10363] Burton. Printed page 538, †: "His eorum nomina inscribuntur de quibus quærunt." "On these are written the names of those about whom they inquire."

[10364] Editor. "Art" here means magical practice, and "glass" a mirror. Cromnyomancy uses onions; Burton describes writing prospective husbands' names on them in his margin. The word Amphitomantia is preserved as printed, but resembles alphitomancy, divination using meal or barley; Burton's stated method involves beans and a cake. What is burnt and the precise ritual remain unclear, so the rendering follows the immediate wording.

[10365] Burton. Printed page 538, t: "Huic munditias, ornatum, leporem, delicias, ludos, elegantiam, omnem deniq; vitæ suavitatem debemus." "To this we owe neatness, adornment, charm, delights, games, elegance—in short, all the sweetness of life."

[10366] Burton. Printed page 538, †: "E Græco." "From the Greek."

[10367] Editor. This is a Latin rendering of the opening of Mimnermus's first elegiac fragment, asking what value life has without Aphrodite, called Venus here. Burton's Latin and subsequent English paraphrase are both retained. The E Græco margin is attached to this quotation; the vertically adjacent Hyginus citation belongs to the later Danaus story. Exact Latin translator unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This love is that salt that seasoneth our harsh and dull labours, and gives a pleasant rellish to our other unsavory proceedings, [10368]Absit amor, surgunt tenebræ, torpedo, veternum, pestis, &c. All our feasts almost, masques, mummings, banquets, merry meetings, weddings, pleasing songs, fine tunes, Poems, Love-stories, Plays, Comedies, Attelans, Jigs, Fescenines, Elegies, Odes, &c. proceed hence.	This love is the salt that seasons our harsh and tedious labours and gives a pleasant flavour to our otherwise tasteless activities. "Let love depart, and darkness rises, numbness, torpor, pestilence," and so on. From it arise almost all our feasts, masques, mummings, banquets, merry gatherings, weddings, pleasing songs, fine tunes, poems, love stories, plays, comedies, Atellan farces, jigs, Fescennine verses, elegies, odes, and so forth.[10369]
[10370]Danaus the son of Belus, at his daughters wedding at Argos, instituted the first plays (some say) that ever were heard of. Symbols, Emblems, Impreses, devises, if we shall believe Jovius, Contiles, Paradine, Camillus de Camillis, may be ascribed to it.	Danaus, son of Belus, instituted the first games ever heard of, some say, at his daughters' wedding at Argos. Symbols, emblems, imprese and devices may also be attributed to love, if we believe Giovio, Contile, Paradin and Camillo de Camilli.[10371]

[10368] Burton. Printed page 538, *: "Angerianus."

[10369] Editor. Angerianus is Girolamo Angeriano; the precise poem remains unlocated. Atellans are comic farces associated with the ancient town of Atella; Fescennine verses are rustic, often bawdy festive verses. A jig can be a dance or a short comic musical entertainment. The list mixes ancient and contemporary forms.

[10370] Burton. Printed page 538, †: "Hyginius cap. 272."

[10371] Editor. Hyginus, Fabulae 273 in the consulted numbering, places Danaus's wedding games fifth in a list, not first; Burton's margin cites 272. "Plays" here is rendered games to fit this athletic/festive context. Imprese are symbolic devices, often with mottoes. The other names identify writers on emblems; their particular works and Burton's claim that these originate in love remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 538–539 Most of our arts and sciences, painting amongst the rest, was first invented, saith [10372]Patritius ex amoris beneficio, for loves sake. For when the daughter of [10373] [10374]Deburiades the Sycionian, was to take leave of her sweetheart now going to wars, ut desiderio ejus minus tabesceret, to comfort her self in his absence, she took his picture with cole upon a wall, as the candle gave the shadow, which her father admiring perfected afterwards, and it was the first picture by report that ever was made. And long after, Sycion for painting, carving, statuary, musick, and Philosophy was preferred before all the Cities in Greece.	Most of our arts and sciences, painting among them, were first invented, says Patrizi, "thanks to love"—for love's sake. For when the daughter of Deburiades of Sicyon was about to part from her sweetheart, who was going to war, "so that she might waste away less from longing for him," and to comfort herself in his absence, she drew his picture in charcoal on a wall, following the shadow cast by a candle. Her father admired it and afterwards perfected it; and this is said to have been the first picture ever made. Long afterwards, Sicyon ranked above every city in Greece for painting, carving, sculpture, music and philosophy.[10375]
Source page 539 Apollo was the first inventer of Physick, Divination, Oracles; Minerva found out weaving, Vulcan curious iron-work, Mercury letters, but who prompted all this into their heads? Love, Nunquam talia invenissent, nisi talia adamassent, they loved such things, or some party, for whose sake they were undertaken at first.	Apollo first invented medicine, divination and oracles; Minerva discovered weaving, Vulcan intricate ironwork, Mercury letters. But who put all this into their heads? Love: "They would never have invented such things unless they had loved them." They loved these things, or some person for whose sake they first undertook them.[10376]

[10372] Burton. Printed page 538, †: "Lib. 4. tit. 11. de prin. institut."

[10373] Burton. Printed page 538, *: "Plin. lib. 35. cap. 12."

[10374] Burton. Printed page 538, *: "Gerbelius l. 6. descript. Gr."

[10375] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 35.151, describes Butades, a potter of Sicyon at Corinth: his daughter outlines her lover's lamp-cast shadow, and he makes a clay relief. Bostock and Riley's chapter heading 43 (12) supplies a correspondence for Burton's 35.12. His Deburiades, war, charcoal, candle and origin-of-painting account are retained. The displaced Patrizi citation stays with Patritius; the Pliny and Gerbelius asterisks stay with the story. Patrizi, Gerbelius and the wider claim for Sicyon remain uncollated.

[10376] Editor. "Physick" means medicine; "curious" means skilfully intricate. These are mythological attributions of invention. The Latin gives Burton's argument that attachment to a craft or a beloved motivates invention; its precise source remains unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis true, Vulcan made a most admirable Bruch or neck-lace, which long after, Axion and Temenus, Phegius sons, for the singular worth of it, consecrated to Apollo at Delphos, but Pharyllus the Tyrant stole it away, and presented it to Aristons wife, on whom he miserably doted (Parthenius tels the story out of Phylarchus) but why did Vulcan make this excellent Ouche? to give Hermione Cadmus wife, whom he dearly loved.	True, Vulcan made a most admirable brooch or necklace, which long afterwards Axion and Temenus, the sons of Phegius, dedicated to Apollo at Delphi because of its exceptional worth. But the tyrant Pharyllus stole it and gave it to Ariston's wife, with whom he was wretchedly infatuated. Parthenius tells the story from Phylarchus. But why did Vulcan make this splendid jewel? To give it to Hermione, Cadmus's wife, whom he dearly loved.[10377]
All our Tilts and Turnaments, Orders of the Garter, Golden Fleece, &c.	All our jousts and tournaments, the Orders of the Garter and the Golden Fleece, and so forth—
Nobilitas sub amore jacet ———	Nobility lies subject to love—
owe their beginnings to love, and many of our histories. By this means, saith Iovius, they would express their loving minds to their Mistress, and to the beholders.[10378]	owe their beginnings to love, as do many of our histories. By these means, says Giovio, they wished to express their loving thoughts to their mistress and to those who watched.[10379]

[10377] Editor. Bruch means brooch; an "ouche" is a jewel or ornament. Parthenius 25, citing Phylarchus, tells of Phayllus stealing the necklace for Ariston's wife, but does not give Burton's whole earlier history. Cadmus's wife is ordinarily Harmonia, not Hermione. Burton's name and Vulcan's motive are retained pending fuller collation.

[10378] Burton. Printed page 539, u: "Fransus l. 3. de Symbolis qui primus symbolum excogitavit voluit nimirum hac ratione implicitum animum evolvere, eumq; vel dominæ vel aliis intuentibus ostendere." "Fransus, book 3, On Symbols. Whoever first devised a symbol plainly wished in this way to unfold his hidden feelings and show them either to his mistress or to other onlookers."

[10379] Editor. Tilts are jousts. The quotation subordinates noble rank to love. The u margin, printed higher on the page, concerns symbolic devices and is attached here by subject; its author reads Fransus, whose identity remains uncertain. It should not silently be equated with the Giovio named in the prose.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis the sole subject almost of Poetry, all our invention tends to it, all our songs, whatever those old Anacreons: (And therefore Hesiod makes the Muses and Graces still follow Cupid, and as Plutarch holds, Menander, and the rest of the Poets were Loves Priests,) all our Greek and Latine Epigrammatists, Love writers, Antony Diogenes the most ancient, whose Epitome we find in Photius Bibliotheca, Longus Sophista, Eustathius, Achilles Tatius, Aristænetus, Heliodorus, Plato, Plutarch, Lucian, Parthenius, Theodorus, Prodromus, Ovid, Catullus, Tibullus, &c.	Love is almost the sole subject of poetry. All our invention tends towards it, all our songs, whatever those old Anacreons wrote. Hence Hesiod makes the Muses and Graces continually follow Cupid, and, as Plutarch maintains, Menander and the other poets were Love's priests. All our Greek and Latin epigrammatists and writers on love—Antonius Diogenes, the earliest, whose epitome we find in Photius's Bibliotheca; Longus the Sophist, Eustathius, Achilles Tatius, Aristaenetus, Heliodorus, Plato, Plutarch, Lucian, Parthenius, Theodorus, Prodromus, Ovid, Catullus, Tibullus and the rest —[10380]
Our new Ariostoes, Boyards, Authors of Arcadia, Urania, Fairy Queen, &c. Marullus, Leotichius, Angerianus, Stroza, Secundus, Capellanus, &c. with the rest of those facete modern Poets, have written in this kind, are but as so many Symptoms of Love. Their whole books are a Synopsis or breviary of Love, the portuous of Love, Legends of Lovers lives and deaths, and of their memorable adventures;	our modern Ariostos and Boiardos, the authors of Arcadia, Urania and The Faerie Queene; Marullus, Leotichius, Angerianus, Stroza, Secundus, Capellanus, and the other witty modern poets who have written in this vein: all are so many symptoms of love. Their entire books are a synopsis or compendium of love, love's breviary, legends of lovers' lives and deaths and of their memorable adventures.[10381]

[10380] Editor. Photius's Bibliotheca summarizes older books; "epitome" means an abridged account. Burton groups poets, novelists and philosophers together as witnesses to love. Theodorus and Prodromus appear separately in his list; Theodore Prodromus is a single author, but the source punctuation is preserved. The claim of priority for Antonius Diogenes requires qualification and fuller collation.

[10381] Editor. Arcadia, Urania and The Faerie Queene are works associated respectively with Philip Sidney, Mary Wroth and Edmund Spenser. "Facete" means witty; a portuous is a portable breviary or prayer book, extending Burton's mock-devotional description of love literature. The Neo-Latin authors' precise works, and the spelling Leotichius, remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Nay more, quod leguntur, quod laudantur amori debent, as [10382]Nevisanus the Lawyer holds, there never was any excellent Poet, that invented good fables, or made laudable verses, which was not in love himself; had he not taken a quill from Cupids wings, he could never have written so amorously as he did.	More than that, "they owe it to love that they are read and praised." As the lawyer Nevisanus maintains, "There was never an excellent poet who invented good tales or composed admirable verse without being in love himself." Had he not taken a quill from Cupid's wings, he could never have written as amorously as he did.[10383]
[10384]Cynthia te vatem fecit lascive Properti, Ingenium Galli pulchra Lycoris habet. Fama est arguti Nemesis formosa Tibulli, Lesbia dictavit docte Catulle tibi. Non me Pelignus, nec spernet Mantua vatem, Si qua Corinna mihi, si quis Alexis erit.	Cynthia made you a poet, wanton Propertius; Beautiful Lycoris holds Gallus's inspiration. Lovely Nemesis is the fame of subtle Tibullus; Lesbia dictated to you, learned Catullus. Neither the Paelignian nor Mantua will scorn me as a poet, If I have a Corinna or an Alexis.[10385]
Wanton Propertius, and witty Gallus, Subtile Tibullus, and learned Catullus, It was Cynthia, Lesbia, Lychoris, That made you Poets all; and if Alexis, Or Corinna chance my Paramour to be, Virgil and Ovid shall not despise me.	Wanton Propertius, and witty Gallus, Subtle Tibullus, and learned Catullus: Cynthia, Lesbia and Lycoris Made poets of you all; and if Alexis Or Corinna happens to become my lover, Virgil and Ovid shall not despise me.

[10382] Burton. Printed page 539, x: "Lib. 4. num. 102. sylvæ nuptialis poetæ non inveniunt fabulas, aut versus laudatos faciunt, nisi qui ab amore fuerint excitati." "Book 4, number 102, of the Nuptial Wood: poets do not invent tales or compose admired verses unless they have been stirred by love."

[10383] Editor. Nevisanus is Giovanni Nevizzano, author of Sylva nuptialis, the work cited in the margin. "Fables" here means invented stories. Cupid's feather becomes the poet's pen: the assertion is Burton's playful generalization, not a biographical test of every poet.

[10384] Burton. Printed page 539, y: "Martial. Ep. 73. lib. 9."

[10385] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 8.73.5–10 in the consulted text; Burton's margin says book 9. His habet and Pelignus differ from erat and Paeligni. The Paelignian signifies Ovid; Mantua evokes Virgil. Alexis is a male beloved. Burton's separate English version omits Nemesis; that omission is preserved without removing her from the Latin rendering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 540 [10386]Non me carminibus vincet nec Thraceus Orpheus, Nec Linus.	Neither Thracian Orpheus nor Linus Will surpass me in song.[10387]
Petrarchs Laura made him so famous, Astrophels Stella, and Jovianus Pontanus Mistress was the cause of his Roses, Violets, Lillies, Nequitiæ, blanditiæ, joci, decor, Nardus, Ver, Corolla, Thus, Mars, Pallas, Venus, Charis, Crocum, Laurus, Unguentum, Costum, Lachrymæ, Myrrha, Musæ, &c. and the rest of his Poems; why are Italians at this day generally so good Poets and Painters? because every man of any fashion amongst them hath his Mistress.	Petrarch's Laura made him so famous; Stella did the same for Astrophel. Jovianus Pontanus's mistress inspired his Roses, Violets, Lilies, Wantonness, Caresses, Jests, Beauty, Spikenard, Spring, Garland, Frankincense, Mars, Pallas, Venus, Grace, Saffron, Laurel, Perfume, Costus, Tears, Myrrh, Muses and his other poems. Why are Italians nowadays generally such good poets and painters? Because every man of any standing among them has his mistress.[10388]
The very rusticks and hog-rubbers, Menalcas and Coridon, qui fætant de stercore equino, those fulsome knaves, if once they taste of this Love liquor, are inspired in an instant. Instead of those accurate Emblems, curious Impreses, gaudy masques, Tilts, Turnaments, &c. They have their Wakes, Whitson-ales, Shepheards feasts, meetings on holy days, country dances, roundelays, writing their names on [10389]trees, true lovers knots, pretty gifts.	Even the country folk and pig-tenders, Menalcas and Corydon, "who stink of horse dung"—those foul fellows—are instantly inspired once they taste this liquor of love. Instead of carefully wrought emblems, intricate symbolic devices, splendid masques, jousts and tournaments, they have their wakes, Whitsun ales, shepherds' feasts, holiday gatherings, country dances, roundelays, names carved on trees, true lovers' knots and pretty gifts.[10390]

[10386] Burton. Printed page 540, *: "Virg. Eglo. 4."

[10387] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 4.55–56. Burton prints vincet, "will surpass," where the consulted text has vincat, "may surpass." In Virgil the speaker imagines singing the future deeds of the child celebrated in the poem; Burton reapplies the boast to poetic inspiration by love.

[10388] Editor. Astrophel is the lover-persona of Sidney's Astrophil and Stella. Pontanus is Giovanni Pontano. Burton's catalogue of poem subjects or titles is translated, while the divine names remain names. Nard, costus, myrrh and frankincense are aromatic substances. The exact sequence and editions of Pontano's poems remain uncollated.

[10389] Burton. Printed page 540, †: "Teneris arboribus amicarũ nomina inscribentes ut simul crescant. Hæd." "Inscribing their sweethearts' names on young trees, so that they may grow together. Haedus."

[10390] Editor. Menalcas and Corydon are conventional pastoral names. Wakes are local feasts; Whitsun ales are festive gatherings with ale at Whitsuntide. Impreses are symbolic devices, often with mottoes. "Fulsome" means offensive or disgusting here. The tree inscription makes the lovers' names grow as the bark grows; Burton attributes it to Haedus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
With tokens, hearts divided, and half rings, Shepheards in their Loves are as coy as Kings.	With keepsakes, divided hearts and half-rings, Shepherds in love are as fastidious as kings.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Choosing Lords, Ladies, Kings, Queens, and Valentines, &c. they go by couples,	Choosing lords, ladies, kings, queens and valentines, they go in pairs,
Coridons Phillis, Nysa and Mopsus, With daynty Dousibel and Sir Tophus.	Corydon's Phyllis, Nysa and Mopsus, With dainty Dousibel and Sir Tophus.[10391]
Instead of Odes, Epigrams and Elegies, &c. they have their Ballads, country tunes, O the Broom, the bonny bonny Broom, Ditties and Songs, Bess a Bell she doth excel, —— they must write likewise and indicte all in rime.	Instead of odes, epigrams and elegies, they have their ballads, country tunes—"O the broom, the bonny, bonny broom"—ditties and songs—"Bess a Bell, she does excel." They too must write, composing everything in rhyme.[10392]
[10393]Thou Hony-suckle of the Hathorne hedge, Vouchsafe in Cupids cup my heart to pledge; My hearts dear blood, sweet Cis is thy Carouse, Worth all the Ale in Gammer Gubbins house. I say no more, affairs call me away, My Fathers horse for provender doth stay. Be thou the Lady Cressetlight to me, Sir Trolly Lolly will I prove to thee. Written in hast, farewel my Cowslip sweet, Pray let's a Sunday at the Ale-house meet.	You honeysuckle of the hawthorn hedge, Accept my heart's toast in Cupid's cup; My heart's dear blood, sweet Cis, is your draught, Worth all the ale in old Mistress Gubbins's house. I say no more: my duties call me away; My father's horse is waiting for its fodder. Be Lady Cressetlight to me, And I will be Sir Trolly Lolly to you. Written in haste: farewell, my sweet cowslip; Let us meet at the alehouse on Sunday.[10394]

[10391] Editor. Lords, ladies, kings and queens here belong to festive games or mock courts. The pastoral and comic names are retained as names, without inventing modern equivalents. "Coy" in the preceding couplet means particular or fastidious. The precise source of these verses remains unlocated.

[10392] Editor. "Indicte" means compose. The quoted song fragments preserve their repeated refrains; their precise versions remain unlocated.

[10393] Burton. Printed page 540, unmarked: "S. R. 1600."

[10394] Editor. A pledge is an answering drink or toast; a carouse is a deep draught. Gammer is a familiar title for an older woman. Provender is animal fodder. The inflated lover's language ends in feeding a horse and arranging an alehouse meeting. The marginal initials S. R. and date 1600 remain unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Your most grim Stoiks, and severe Philosophers will melt away with this passion, and if [10395]Atheneus bely them not, Aristippus, Apollidorus, Antiphanes, &c. have made love songs and Commentaries of their Mistress praises, [10396]Orators write Epistles, Princes give titles, Honours, what not? [10397]Xerxes gave to Themistocles Lampsacus to find him wine, Magnesia for bread, and Myunte for the rest of his diet.	Your sternest Stoics and most austere philosophers melt under this passion. If Athenaeus does not misrepresent them, Aristippus, Apollidorus, Antiphanes and others wrote love songs and accounts praising their mistresses. Orators write letters; princes give titles, honours—what will they not give? Xerxes gave Themistocles Lampsacus to supply his wine, Magnesia his bread, and Myus the rest of his food.[10398]
The [10399]Persian Kings allotted whole Cities to like use, hæc civitas mulieri redimiculum præbeat, hæc in collum, hæc in crines, one whole city served to dress her hair, another her neck, a third her hood. [10400]Assuerus would have given Esther half his Empire, and [10401]Herod bid Herodias ask what she would, she should have it.	The Persian kings allotted entire cities to similar purposes: “Let this city supply the woman’s headband, this one her neck ornaments, this one her hair ornaments.” One whole city served to adorn her hair, another her neck, a third her headdress. Ahasuerus would have given Esther half his empire, and Herod told Herodias to ask whatever she wished: she should have it.[10402]

[10395] Burton. Printed page 540, y: “Lib. 13 cap. Dipnosophist.”

[10396] Burton. Printed page 540, a: “See Putean. epist. 33. de sua Margarita Beroaldus &c.”

[10397] Burton. Printed page 540, b: “Hen. Steph. apol. pro Herod.”

[10398] Editor. Burton cites Athenaeus’s Deipnosophists, book 13, and gives abbreviated references to Puteanus and Henri Estienne. The list does not establish that all the men named were Stoics. The three-city gift is an analogy for lavish provision, not itself an affair of love. The king’s identity and the precise source passages remain for collation.

[10399] Burton. Printed page 540, †: “Tully orat. 5. Ver.”

[10400] Burton. Printed page 540, c: “Esth. 5.”

[10401] Burton. Printed page 540, d: “Mat. 1.47.”

[10402] Editor. Tully is Cicero. Against Verres 2.3.76 compares Verres’s exactions with Persian and Syrian kings assigning cities to maintain their wives’ ornaments. Burton’s margin has orat. 5. Ver.; his quotation omits in before redimiculum. Esther 5:3 gives the half-kingdom offer. Matthew 14:6–8 addresses Herodias’s daughter, not Herodias; Burton’s attribution remains. His Mat. 1.47. appears to reorder 14:7.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Caligula gave an 100000 sesterces to his Curtisan at first word to buy her pins, and yet when he was solicited by the Senate, to bestow something to repair the decayed wals of Rome for the Common-wealths good, he would give but 6000 sesterces at most.	Caligula gave his courtesan 100,000 sesterces at the first word, to buy her pins; yet when the Senate asked him to contribute to repairing Rome's crumbling walls for the public good, he would give no more than 6,000 sesterces.[10403]
Source page 540–541 [10404]Dionysius that Sicilian tyrant rejected all his privy Councellors, and was so besotted on Mirrha his favourite and Mistress, that he would bestow no office, or in the most weightiest business of the kingdome do ought without her especial advice, prefer, depose, send, entertain no man, though worthy and well deserving, but by her consent; and he again whom she commended, howsoever unfit, unworthy, was as highly approved.	Dionysius, the Sicilian tyrant, rejected all his privy councillors and was so besotted with his favourite and mistress Mirrha that he would appoint no one to office or act in the kingdom's most important affairs without her special advice. He would promote, remove, dispatch or receive no man, however worthy and deserving, without her consent; while anyone she recommended, however unfit and unworthy, received the highest approval.[10405]
Source page 541 Kings and Emperours instead of Poems, build Cities; Adrian built Antinoa in Ægypt, besides Constellations, Temples, Altars, Statues, Images, &c. in the honour of his Antinous. Alexander bestowed infinite sums, to set out his Hephestion to all eternity.	Instead of poems, kings and emperors build cities. Hadrian built Antinoa in Egypt, besides constellations, temples, altars, statues and images in honour of his Antinous. Alexander spent immense sums to perpetuate the glory of his Hephaestion.[10406]

[10403] Editor. "Pins" suggests small personal expenses, contrasting private indulgence with public neglect. Sesterces are Roman money; the sums are retained without converting them into modern currency. Burton supplies no separate source beside this anecdote, and its attribution and figures remain unverified.

[10404] Burton. Printed page 540, *: "Gravissimis regni negotiis nihil sine amasiæ suæ consensu fecit. omnesq; actiones suas scortillo communicavit. &c. Nich. Bellus discours. 26. de amat." "In the kingdom's most weighty affairs he did nothing without his mistress's consent, and discussed all his actions with that little whore," etc. Nicholas Bellus, discourse 26, on lovers.

[10405] Editor. "Prefer" means promote, "depose" remove from office, "entertain" receive or employ. The citation is to Nicholas Bellus, printed in an abbreviated form. The identity of Mirrha and the underlying historical account remain unverified; the marginal Latin adds an insult not present in the prose.

[10406] Editor. Adrian is Hadrian; Antinoa is his city commemorating Antinous in Egypt. Hephaestion was Alexander's intimate companion. Burton's examples include male beloveds and are retained accordingly. "Set out" means celebrate or magnify. The phrase about building constellations compresses different forms of commemoration; precise sources remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10407]Socrates professeth himself loves servant, ignorant in all arts, and sciences, a Doctor alone in love matters, & quum alienarum rerum omnium scientiam diffiteretur, saith [10408]Maximus Tyrius his sectator, hujus negotii professor, &c. and this he spake openly, at home, abroad, at publick feasts, in the Academy, in Pyræo, Lycæo, sub Platano, &c. the very blood-hound of beauty, as he is stiled by others.	Socrates professes himself "Love's servant," ignorant of every art and science, a master only in matters of love. "Although he disclaimed knowledge of all other things," says his follower Maximus of Tyre, "he professed expertise in this business." He said this openly, at home and abroad, at public feasts, in the Academy, "in the Piraeus, in the Lyceum, beneath the plane tree," and elsewhere—the very bloodhound of beauty, as others call him.[10409]
But I conclude there is no end of Loves Symptomes, 'tis a bottomless pit. Love is subject to no dimensions; not to be survayed by any art or engine: and besides I am of [10410]Hædus mind, no man can discourse of love matters, or judge of them aright, that hath not made tryal in his own person, or as Æneas Sylvius [10411]adds, hath not a little doted, been mad or love-sick himself. I confess I am but a novice, a Contemplator only,	But I conclude that love's symptoms have no end: they are a bottomless pit. Love admits of no dimensions and cannot be surveyed by any art or instrument. Besides, I agree with Haedus: "No one can discuss matters of love, or judge them rightly, without having tried them in person"; or, as Aeneas Sylvius adds, without having been a little infatuated, mad or lovesick himself. I confess that I am only a beginner, only an observer:[10412]
Nescio quid sit amor nec amo——	I do not know what love is, nor am I in love—

[10407] Burton. Printed page 541, e: "Amoris famulus omnem scientiam diffitetur, amandi tamen se scientissimum doctorem agnoscit." "Love's servant disclaims all knowledge, yet acknowledges himself a most knowledgeable teacher of loving."

[10408] Burton. Printed page 541, †: "Serm. 8."

[10409] Editor. Maximus of Tyre is a later admirer of Socrates, not a contemporary disciple. The Academy, Piraeus, Lyceum and plane tree evoke settings of Socratic discussion. The bloodhound comparison means relentless pursuit of beauty. Burton cites discourse 8; the edition and exact Latin wording remain unverified.

[10410] Burton. Printed page 541, z: "Quis horum scribere molestias potest, nisi qui & is aliquantum insanivit?" "Who can write of these troubles unless he too has been somewhat mad?"

[10411] Burton. Printed page 541, f: "Lib. 1. de non temnendis amoribus; opinor hac de re neminem aut disceptare rectè posse aut judicare qui non in ea versatur, aut magnum fecerit periculum." "Book 1, On Not Despising Loves: I think no one can properly discuss or judge this subject unless he is engaged in it or has made a considerable trial of it."

[10412] Editor. The adjoining marginal quotations appear crossed in relation to the prose. The z note speaks of having been mad; the f note cites De non temnendis amoribus and speaks of personal experience, corresponding to the preceding Haedus claim. Both remain at their printed body anchors. Exact attribution awaits collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I have a tincture; for why should I lye, dissemble or excuse it, yet homo sum, &c. not altogether inexpert in this subject, non sum præceptor amandi, and what I say, is meerly reading, ex aliorum forsan ineptiis, by mine own observation, and others relation.	I have a touch of it—for why should I lie, conceal it or make excuses? Yet "I am human," and not altogether inexperienced in this subject. "I am no teacher of the art of love." What I say comes merely from reading, "perhaps from other people's follies," from my own observation and from others' reports.[10413]

[10413] Editor. A "tincture" is a slight touch or infusion. Burton's denial of love is immediately qualified by an admission of some experience; the wavering is deliberate in the passage and is not harmonized. The sources of the short Latin tags remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 5. SUBSECT. 1.	MEMBER 5 SUBSECTION 1
Prognosticks of Love Melancholy.	The prognosis of love melancholy
What Fires, Torments, Cares, Jealousies, Suspicions, Fears, Griefs, Anxieties, accompany such as are in love, I have sufficiently said: the next question is what will be the event of such miseries, what they foretell. Some are of opinion that this love cannot be cured, Nullis amor est medicabilis herbis, it accompanies them to the last,[10414]	I have said enough about the fires, torments, cares, jealousies, suspicions, fears, griefs and anxieties that accompany people in love. The next question is what these miseries will lead to, what they foretell. Some believe that this love cannot be cured: "No herbs can remedy love." It accompanies them to the end.[10415]
Idem amor exitio est pecori pecorisque magistro,	The same love destroys the flock and its master.
and is so continue, that by no perswasion almost it may be relieved. Bid me not love, said [10416]Eurialus, bid the Mountains come down into the plains, bid the Rivers run back to their fountains; I can as soon leave to love, as the Sun leave his course;	It is so persistent that almost no persuasion can relieve it. "Tell me not to love," said Euryalus, "and you might as well tell the mountains to come down into the plains, or the rivers to run back to their springs. I can cease loving as soon as the sun can abandon its course."[10417]

[10414] Burton. Printed page 541, a: "Semper moritur, nunquam mortuus est qui amat. Æn. Sylv." "The lover is always dying, never dead. Aeneas Sylvius."

[10415] Editor. "Prognosticks" concerns the expected course or outcome of a condition. The herbal-cure line corresponds to Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.523, where the consulted text reads sanabilis rather than medicabilis. The following flock-and-master line is Virgil, Eclogue 3.101, quoted without a separate marginal reference; Burton's exitio est differs from exitium in the consulted text. These are literary claims about incurability.

[10416] Burton. Printed page 541, b: "Eurial. ep. ad Lucretiam, apud Æneam Silvium; Rogas ut amare deficiam? roga montes ut in planum deveniant, ut fontes flumina repetant; tam possum te non amare ac suum Phœbus relinquere cursum." "Euryalus's letter to Lucretia, in Aeneas Sylvius: You ask me to cease loving? Ask the mountains to descend to the plain, the rivers to return to their springs; I can no more stop loving you than Phoebus can abandon his course."

[10417] Editor. "Continue" is retained from the scan and rendered persistent. Euryalus and Lucretia belong to Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini's tale of two lovers. The impossibilities express the speaker's refusal or inability to cease loving. The Latin edition quoted by Burton remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10418]Et prius æquoribus pisces, & montibus umbræ, Et volucres deerunt sylvis, & murmura ventis, Quam mihi discedent formosæ Amaryllidis ignes.	Sooner will the seas lack fish, the mountains shade, The woods their birds, and the winds their murmuring, Than my passion for beautiful Amaryllis leave me.[10419]
First Seas shall want their Fish, the mountains shade, Woods singing birds, the winds murmur shall fade, Then my fair Amaryllis love allaid.	First seas shall lose their fish, the mountains shade, Woods their songbirds, the winds their murmuring, Before my love for fair Amaryllis is allayed.
Source page 541–542 Bid me not love, bid a deaf man hear, a blind man see, a dumb speak, a lame run, counsel can do no good, a sick man cannot relish, No Physick can ease me.	Tell me not to love: tell a deaf man to hear, a blind man to see, a mute man to speak, a lame man to run. Advice does no good; a sick man has no taste for anything. No medicine can relieve me.
Source page 542 Non prosunt domino quæ prosunt omnibus artes.	The arts that benefit everyone else do not benefit their master.[10420]
As Apollo confessed, and Iupiter himself could not be cured.	So Apollo confessed; and Jupiter himself could not be cured.

[10418] Burton. Printed page 541, †: “Buchanan. Syl.”

[10419] Editor. Buchanan, Sylvae, Desiderium Lutetiae, printed page 95 in the consulted scan. Daphnis declares his unchanging love for Amaryllis despite the attentions of Melaenis and Lycisca; two concluding lines follow Burton’s extract. The scan has Amaryllidos against Burton’s Amaryllidis. “Fires” means passion. The separate English verse expands birds into singing birds. Burton’s immediate edition remains unknown.

[10420] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.524: Apollo, who claims the invention of medicine, cannot cure his own desire for Daphne. Burton prints Non where the consulted text begins nec. “Relish” in the preceding prose concerns the sick person’s impaired taste or appetite.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10421]Omnes humanos curat medicina dolores, Solus amor morbi non habet artificem.	Medicine cures all human pains; Love alone has no practitioner to treat its sickness.[10422]
Physick can soon cure every disease, [10423]Excepting love that can it not appease.	Medicine can soon cure every disease, Except for love, which it cannot appease.
But whether Love may be cured or no, and by what means, shall be explained in his place; in the mean time, if it take his course, and be not otherwise eased or amended, it breaks out into outragious often and prodigious events. Amor & Liber violenti dii sunt, as [10424]Tatius observes, & eousque animum incendunt, ut pudoris oblivisci cogant, Love and Bacchus are so violent Gods, so furiously rage in our minds, that they make us forget all honesty, shame and common civility.	But whether love can be cured, and by what means, will be explained in its proper place. Meanwhile, if it runs its course without relief or remedy, it often erupts in outrageous and monstrous consequences. “Love and Bacchus are violent gods,” as Tatius observes, “and so inflame the mind that they compel it to forget shame.” Love and Bacchus are such violent gods, and rage so furiously in our minds, that they make us forget all decency, shame and ordinary civility.[10425]
For such men ordinarily as are throughly possessed with this humor, become insensati & insani, for it is [10426]amor insanus, as the Poet calls it, beside themselves, and as I have proved, no better then beasts, irrational, stupid, head-strong, void of fear of God or men, they frequently forswear themselves, spend, steal, commit incests, rapes, adulteries, murders, depopulate Towns, Cities, Countries, to satisfie their lust.	For people thoroughly possessed by this passion usually become “senseless and mad”—it is “mad love,” as the poet calls it—beside themselves and, as I have shown, no better than beasts: irrational, unthinking, headstrong, with no fear of God or men. They often swear falsely, squander money, steal, commit incest, rape, adultery and murder, and depopulate towns, cities and countries to satisfy their lust.

[10421] Burton. Printed page 542, c: “Propert. lib. 2. Eleg. 1.”

[10422] Editor. Propertius, Elegies 2.1.57–58. Burton’s curat and non habet differ from sanat and non amat in the consulted text. The latter means that love does not welcome the healer, not that no healer exists. The modern column follows Burton’s printed reading. The adjacent d margin expands the claim with images of hell and frenzy.

[10423] Burton. Printed page 542, d: “Est orcus illa vis, est immedicabilis, est rabies insana.” “That power is hell; it is incurable; it is a mad frenzy.”

[10424] Burton. Printed page 542, e: “Lib. 2.”

[10425] Editor. Liber is another name for Bacchus, god of wine. Tatius is Achilles Tatius, cited at book 2. “Honesty” here means decency or honourable conduct, not only truthfulness. “Prodigious” means monstrous or extraordinary. The precise Latin version of the quotation remains uncollated.

[10426] Burton. Printed page 542, †: “Virg. Egl. 3.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10427]A Divel 'tis, and mischief such doth work, As never yet did Pagan, Jew, or Turk.	It is a devil, working such mischief As pagan, Jew or Turk has never done.[10428]
The wars of Troy may be a sufficient witness; and as Appian lib. 5. hist. saith of Anthony and Cleopatra, [10429]Their Love brought themselves, and all Egypt into extream and miserable calamities, the end of her is as bitter as worm-wood, and as sharp as a two-edged sword. Prov. 5. 4, 5. Her feet go down to death, her steps lead on to hell. She is more bitter then death (Eccles. 7.28.) and the sinner shall be taken by her.	The Trojan War is witness enough. And, as Appian says of Antony and Cleopatra in book 5 of his History, "Their love brought them and all Egypt into extreme and wretched calamities." Her end is as bitter as wormwood and as sharp as a two-edged sword: Proverbs 5:4–5. "Her feet go down to death; her steps lead on to hell." "She is more bitter than death" (Ecclesiastes 7:28), "and the sinner shall be taken by her."[10430]
[10431]Qui in amore præcipitavit, pejus perit, quàm qui saxo salit. [10432]He that runs headlong from the top of a rock, is not in so bad a case, as he that falls into this gulf of love. For hence, saith [10433]Platina, comes Repentance, Dotage, they loose themselves, their wits, and make shipwrack of their fortunes altogether: Madness, to make away themselves and others, violent death.	"Someone who plunges headlong into love perishes more miserably than someone who leaps from a rock." A person who rushes headlong from the top of a cliff is not in so bad a plight as one who falls into this gulf of love. For from it, says Platina, "come regret and folly: they lose themselves and their wits, and altogether wreck their fortunes"; madness, killing themselves and others, violent death.[10434]

[10427] Burton. Printed page 542, †: "R. T."

[10428] Editor. The couplet's comparison with pagans, Jews and Turks reflects inherited Christian polemical language. "Turk" here serves as a conventional religious as well as political label. The margin reads R. T.; the body marker looks like f. Their discrepancy and the verse's attribution remain unresolved.

[10429] Burton. Printed page 542, g: "Qui quidem amor utroq; & totam Ægyptum extremis calamitatibus involvit." "That love indeed involved both of them and all Egypt in extreme calamities."

[10430] Editor. Burton invokes Troy and the Antony–Cleopatra story as public disasters caused by desire. Proverbs 5:4–5 describes the dangerous woman; the Ecclesiastes wording corresponds to 7:26 in the consulted King James text, rather than Burton's 7:28. The Appian passage and his precise scriptural editions remain to be collated.

[10431] Burton. Printed page 542, h: "Plautus."

[10432] Burton. Printed page 542, i: "Ut corpus pondere, sic animus amore præcipitatur. Austin. l. 2. de civ. dei, c. 28." "As the body is carried headlong by weight, so the mind by love. Augustine, City of God, book 2, chapter 28."

[10433] Burton. Printed page 542, k: "Dial. hinc oritur pœnitentia, desperatio, & non vident ingenium se cum re simul amisisse." "Dialogue: hence arise regret and despair, and they do not see that they have lost their understanding along with their property."

[10434] Editor. "Repentance" means regret; "dotage" means folly or infatuation. "Make away" means kill. The marginal citations to Plautus, Augustine and Platina have not been fully located. Burton's repeated cliff and shipwreck images present falling in love as loss of judgement, property and life.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Prognosticatio est talis, saith Gordonius, [10435]si non succurratur iis, aut in maniam cadunt, aut moriuntur, the prognostication is, they will either run mad, or dye. For if this passion continue, saith [10436]Ælian Montaltus, it makes the blood hot, thick, and black; and if the inflammation get into the brain, with continual meditation and waking, it so dries it up, that madness followes, or else they make away themselves,	"The prognosis is this," says Gordonius: "Unless they receive help, they either fall into madness or die." The prediction is that they will either go mad or die. For if this passion continues, says Aelianus Montaltus, "it makes the blood hot, thick and black; and if the inflammation reaches the brain, constant brooding and sleeplessness dry it out so much that madness follows, or else they kill themselves."[10437]
[10438]Coridon, Coridon, quæ te dementia cepit?	Corydon, Corydon, what madness has seized you?[10439]
Now as Arnoldus adds, it will speedily work these effects, if it be not presently helped; [10440]They will pine away, run mad, and dye upon a sudden; Facilè incidunt in maniam, saith Valescus, quickly mad; nisi succurratur, if good order be not taken,	Now, as Arnoldus adds, it will soon produce these effects unless it is promptly treated: "They will waste away, go mad and suddenly die." "They readily fall into madness," says Valescus—quickly go mad—"unless help is given," unless proper measures are taken.[10441]

[10435] Burton. Printed page 542, l: "Idem Savanarola, & plures alii, &c. Rabidam facturus Orexin. Juven." "Savonarola and many others say the same," etc. "About to make the appetite ravenous." Juvenal.

[10436] Burton. Printed page 542, m: "Cap. de Heroico Amore. Hæc passio durans sanguinem torridum & atrabilarium reddit; hic vero ad cerebrum delatus, insaniam parat, vigilia & crebro desiderio exiccans." "Chapter on Love Melancholy. This passion, if it persists, makes the blood overheated and full of black bile; when carried to the brain, it brings on madness, drying it out through sleeplessness and constant longing."

[10437] Editor. Gordonius is Bernard of Gordon; Aelianus Montaltus is the physician also known as Elia Montalto. Their prediction and the drying of overheated, black-bile-laden blood belong to historical humoral medicine. "Meditation" means brooding here, "waking" sleeplessness. These statements are retained as their reported explanations, not modern medical findings.

[10438] Burton. Printed page 542, †: "Virg. Egl. 2."

[10439] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 2.69. Corydon rebukes himself for his passion for Alexis, a young man. Burton's repeated name and question are preserved. The literary quotation provides a transition from medical explanation back to the lover's lament.

[10440] Burton. Printed page 542, n: "Insani fiunt aut sibi ipsis desperantes mortem afferunt. Languentes cito mortem aut maniam patiuntur." "They go mad or, despairing, bring death upon themselves. Wasting away, they soon suffer death or madness."

[10441] Editor. "Presently" means immediately; "good order" means appropriate measures or treatment. Arnoldus and Valescus are cited medical authorities; the exact works and passages remain unverified. The margin and body give related but not identical predictions.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10442]Eheu triste jugum quisquis amoris habet, Is prius ac norit se periisse perit.	Alas, whoever bears love's sorrowful yoke Perishes before he knows that he is lost.[10443]
Source page 543 Oh heavy yoke of love, which who so bears, Is quite undone, and that at unawares.	Oh, heavy yoke of love: whoever bears it Is utterly undone, and unawares.
So she confessed of her self in the Poet.	So the woman in the poet confessed of herself:
—— [10444]Insaniam priusquam quis sentiat, Vix pili intervallo à furore absum.	I shall go mad before anyone notices; I am scarcely a hair's breadth from madness.[10445]
I shall be mad before it be perceived, An hair breadth off scarce am I, now distracted.	I shall be mad before anyone sees it; Scarcely a hair's breadth away, already distraught.
As mad as Orlando for his Angelica, or Hercules for his Hylas,	As mad as Orlando over his Angelica, or Hercules over his Hylas:[10446]
At ille ruebat quò pedes ducebant, furibundus, Nam illi sævus Deus intus jecur laniabat,	But he rushed in frenzy wherever his feet led him, For within him a cruel god was tearing his liver.
He went he car'd not whether, mad he was, The cruel God so tortur'd him, alas.	He went he cared not where, so mad he was; The cruel god tormented him so, alas.
At the sight of Hero I cannot tell how many ran mad,	At the sight of Hero, I cannot tell how many went mad,

[10442] Burton. Printed page 542, †: "Calcagninus."

[10443] Editor. Calcagninus is Celio Calcagnini in Latinized form. The exact poem remains unlocated. The Latin contrasts perishing with recognizing that one has perished; Burton's English version turns this into being undone unawares. Both are kept separately.

[10444] Burton. Printed page 543, p: "Lucian Imag. So for Lucians Mistriss all that saw her, and could not enjoy her, ran mad, or hanged themselves."

[10445] Editor. The speaker and source of the first-person verse remain unidentified. The p margin cites Lucian's Images and adds a separate report about admirers of his mistress; it does not securely identify the verse. "Distracted" means mentally disordered or distraught, not merely inattentive.

[10446] Editor. Orlando and Angelica belong to Ariosto's Orlando furioso. Hylas is Hercules's male beloved or companion. The following Latin describes Hercules's frantic search and locates his pain in the liver; the exact Latin translation is unverified. Burton's English verse omits that anatomical detail.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10447]Alius vulnus celans insanit pulchritudine puellæ.	Another, hiding his wound, goes mad over the girl's beauty.[10448]

[10447] Burton. Printed page 543, q: "Musæus."

[10448] Editor. The margin names Musaeus, author of Hero and Leander. The Latin explicitly connects the lover's madness with the girl's beauty; Burton's independent English couplet instead develops the image of concealed grief and a thief-like onset. Both versions remain distinct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And whilst he doth conceal his grief, Madness comes on him like a thief.	And while he conceals his grief, Madness steals upon him like a thief.
Go to Bedlam for examples. It is so well known in every village, how many have either dyed for love, or voluntarily made away themselves, that I need not much labour to prove it; [10449]Nec modus aut requies nisi mors reperitur amoris: Death is the common Catastrophe of such persons.	Go to Bedlam for examples. Every village knows so well how many have either died of love or deliberately killed themselves that I need not labour to prove it: "Love finds neither limit nor rest except in death." Death is the usual catastrophe for such people.[10450]
[10451]Mori mihi contingat, non enim alia Liberatio ab ærumnis fuerit ullo pacto istis.	May death be granted me: there can be No other release at all from these sorrows.[10452]
Would I were dead, for nought God knows, But death can rid me of these woes.	Would that I were dead, for God knows nothing But death can free me from these woes.
As soon as Eurialus departed from Senes, Lucretia his Paramour [10453]never looked up, no jests could exhilarate her sad mind, no joys comfort her wounded and distressed soul, but a little after she fell sick and died. But this is a gentle end, a natural death, such persons commonly make away themselves.	As soon as Euryalus left Siena, his lover Lucretia "never lifted her spirits; no jokes could cheer her sorrowful mind, no pleasures comfort her wounded and distressed soul. Soon afterwards she fell ill and died." But this is a gentle end, a natural death: such people commonly kill themselves.[10454]

[10449] Burton. Printed page 543, r: "Ovid met. 10."

[10450] Editor. Bedlam is the familiar name of London's Bethlem hospital. Ovid, Metamorphoses 10.377, describes Myrrha's desire for her father; Burton turns that particular tragic statement into a general maxim. His aut differs from et in the consulted text. "Catastrophe" means the concluding disaster of a story as well as calamity.

[10451] Burton. Printed page 543, †: "Anacreon."

[10452] Editor. Burton attributes the Latin lament to Anacreon. The particular poem, numbering and Latin translator remain unverified. The wish for death belongs to the quoted lover's dramatic voice; Burton supplies a separate English couplet.

[10453] Burton. Printed page 543, unmarked: "Æneas Silvius. Ad ejus decessum nunquam visa Lucretia ridere, nullis facetiis, jocis, nullo gaudio potuit ad lætitiam renovari, mox in ægritudinem incidit, & sic brevi contabuit." "Aeneas Sylvius. After his departure Lucretia was never seen to laugh; no wit, jokes or joy could restore her cheerfulness. Soon she fell ill and thus wasted away in a short time."

[10454] Editor. Senes is Siena. This is the conclusion Burton gives to Aeneas Sylvius's fictional love story, not an independent clinical case. "Never looked up" means that Lucretia never recovered her spirits. The unmarked Aeneas Sylvius margin is displaced upward on the printed page and is attached to this passage by content.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— proprioque in sanguine lætus, Indignantem animam vacuas effudit in auras;	And, glad amid his own blood, Poured his indignant soul into the empty air.[10455]
so did Dido; Sed moriamur ait, sic sic juvat ire per umbras; Piramus and Thysbe, Medea, [10456]Coresus and Callyrhoe, [10457]Theagines the Philosopher and many Myriads besides, and so will ever do,	So did Dido: "But let us die, she says; thus, thus it pleases me to go among the shades"; Pyramus and Thisbe, Medea, Coresus and Callirhoe, Theagines the philosopher, and countless thousands besides—and so they always will.[10458]
—— [10459]& mihi fortis Est manus, est & amor, dabit hic in vulnera vires,	I too have a strong hand, And love as well; love will give strength to strike the wounds.[10460]
Who ever heard a story of more woe, Then that of Juliet and her Romeo?	Who ever heard a story of more woe Than that of Juliet and her Romeo?[10461]

[10455] Editor. The two Latin lines speak grammatically of a male figure; that gender is retained before Burton moves to Dido. Their precise source or combination of sources remains unresolved. They should not silently be rewritten as Dido's direct speech.

[10456] Burton. Printed page 543, †: "Pausanias Achaicis l. 7."

[10457] Burton. Printed page 543, *: "Megarensis amore flagrans Lucian. Tom. 4." "Burning with love for a Megarian. Lucian, volume 4."

[10458] Editor. Dido's words are from Aeneid 4.660, with Burton's per for sub. Pausanias 7.21.1–5 tells how Coresus, priest of Dionysus, dies in Callirhoe's place; she then kills herself from pity and shame. This supplies Burton's paired example, as distinct from his other compressed literary deaths. Medea's inclusion and the Lucian reference for Theagines remain unresolved.

[10459] Burton. Printed page 543, †: "Ovid. 3. met."

[10460] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.149–150: Thisbe resolves to follow Pyramus in death. Burton's margin says book 3, and his Latin compresses the original wording. Thisbe, rather than Dido, is the speaker.

[10461] Editor. The couplet echoes the closing lines of Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, with Burton's own wording. It is a new example, not a translation of the preceding Ovid. The precise early Shakespeare text behind Burton's form remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Read Parthenium in Eroticis, and Plutarchs amatorias narrationes or loves stories, all ending almost to this purpose: Valleriola lib. 2. observ. 7. hath a lamentable narration of a Merchant his patient, [10462]that raving through impatience of love, had he not been watched, would every while have offered violence to himself.	Read Parthenius's Love Stories and Plutarch's Amatory Narratives, or tales of love: almost all end in this way. Valleriola, in book 2, observation 7, gives a lamentable account of a merchant who was his patient: "Raving because he could not endure his love, he would repeatedly have harmed himself had he not been watched."[10463]
Amatus Lucitanus cent. 3. car. 56. hath such [10464]another story, and Fælix Plater. med. observ. lib. 1. a third of a yong [10465]Gentleman that studied Physick, and for the love of a Doctors daughter, having no hope to compass his desire, poisoned himself, [10466]Anno 1615. A barber in Francfort, because his wench was betrothed to another, cut his own throat.	Amatus Lusitanus, century 3, cure 56, has another such story, and Felix Plater, Medical Observations, book 1, a third: a young gentleman studying medicine, in love with a doctor's daughter and without hope of attaining his desire, poisoned himself. In 1615 a barber in Frankfurt, because his sweetheart was betrothed to someone else, cut his own throat.[10467]

[10462] Burton. Printed page 543, t: "Furibundus putavit se videre Imaginem puellæ, & coram loqui blandientis illi, &c." "In his frenzy he thought he saw the girl's image, and that she was speaking and flattering him in person," etc.

[10463] Editor. "Impatience" means inability to endure, not merely irritation at delay. Valleriola is François Valleriola. The margin adds the patient's imagined sight and speech of the beloved. Burton gives an observation number; the case itself remains to be checked in the cited edition.

[10464] Burton. Printed page 543, u: "Juven. Hebræus." "A young Hebrew man."

[10465] Burton. Printed page 543, x: "Juvenis Medicinæ operam dans Doctoris filiam deperibat, &c." "A young man studying medicine was desperately in love with a doctor's daughter," etc.

[10466] Burton. Printed page 543, y: "Gotardus Arthus Gallobelgicus, nund. vernal. 1615. collum novacula aperuit: & inde expiravit." "Gotardus Arthus, Gallobelgicus, spring fair issue, 1615: he opened his throat with a razor and died from it."

[10467] Editor. A century is a hundred medical cases. The scan reads car. 56., apparently for cur., rendered "cure." Amatus Lusitanus and Felix Plater are the physicians; the u margin describes a young Jewish man. "Compass" means attain. The date 1615 begins the Frankfurt report, not Plater's case. All three reports require source collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 543–544 [10468]At Neoburge the same year a yong man, because he could not get her Parents consent, killed his sweet-heart, and afterward himself, desiring this of the magistrate, as he gave up the Ghost, that they might be buried in one grave,	At Neuburg that same year, a young man, unable to obtain his sweetheart's parents' consent, killed her and then himself. As he was dying he asked the magistrate that they might be buried in one grave,[10469]
Source page 544 Quodque rogis superest una requiescat in urnâ,	And let what remains from the funeral pyres rest in one urn,[10470]
which [10471]Gismunda besought of Tancredus her father, that she might be in like sort buried with Guiscardus her lover, that so their bodies might lye together in the grave, as their souls wander about [10472]Campos lugentes in the Elysian fields, —— quos durus amor crudeli tabe peredit, in a mirtle grove	as Gismunda begged her father Tancred that she too might be buried with her lover Guiscardo. Then their bodies might lie together in the grave, as their souls wander through "the Fields of Mourning" in the Elysian fields—"those whom cruel love consumed with wasting misery"—in a myrtle grove:[10473]
—— & myrtea circum Sylva tegit: curæ non ipsâ in morte relinquunt.	And a myrtle wood shelters them all around: Their cares do not leave them even in death.

[10468] Burton. Printed page 543, z: "Cum renuente parente utroq; & ipsa virgine frui non posset, ipsum & ipsam interfecit, hoc à magistratu petens, ut in eodem sepulchro sepeliri posset." "Since, with both parents refusing, he could not possess the girl herself, he killed himself and her, asking the magistrate that they might be buried in the same tomb."

[10469] Editor. Neoburge is rendered Neuburg, without identifying which town beyond what the source establishes. The margin specifies both parents' refusal; the prose refers to her parents. The account reports a murder followed by suicide, even though Burton places it among tales of love. The chronicle report remains unverified.

[10470] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.166, concludes Pyramus and Thisbe's story. The consulted text has requiescit, "rests"; Burton prints requiescat, "let it rest," fitting his preceding request for burial together. The cremation urn comes from the classical quotation, not necessarily the Neuburg account.

[10471] Burton. Printed page 544, †: "Bocace."

[10472] Burton. Printed page 544, *: "Sedes eorum qui pro amoris impatientia pereunt, Virg. 6. Æneid." "The abode of those who perish because they cannot endure love. Virgil, Aeneid 6."

[10473] Editor. Gismunda/Ghismonda and Guiscardo belong to Boccaccio's Decameron 4.1. The Virgil excerpts are Aeneid 6.441–444, the Fields of Mourning; Burton loosely calls them Elysian. The myrtle, associated with Venus, shelters those who died of love. The exact Boccaccio version Burton used remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
You have not yet heard the worst, they do not offer violence to themselves in this rage of lust but unto others, their nearest and dearest friends. [10474]Cataline killed his only son, misitque ad orci pallida, lethi obnubila, obsita tenebris loca, for the love of Aurelia Orestilla, quod ejus nuptias vivo filio recusaret.	You have not yet heard the worst. In this frenzy of lust they harm not only themselves but others, their nearest and dearest friends. Catiline killed his only son, "and sent him to Orcus's pale regions, clouded by death and overgrown with darkness," for love of Aurelia Orestilla, "because she refused to marry him while his son was alive."[10475]
[10476]Laodice the sister of Mithridates, poisoned her husband, to give content to a base fellow whom she loved. [10477]Alexander to please Thais a concubine of his, set Persipolis on fire. [10478]Nereus wife, a widow and Lady of Athens, for the love of a Venetian Gentleman, betrayed the City, and he for her sake, murthered his wife, the daughter of a Noble man in Venice.	Laodice, Mithridates's sister, poisoned her husband to please a low-born fellow whom she loved. Alexander set Persepolis on fire to please Thais, a concubine of his. Nereus's wife, a widow and ruler of Athens, betrayed the city for love of a Venetian gentleman; and for her sake he murdered his wife, the daughter of a Venetian nobleman.[10479]
[10480]Constantine Despota, made away Catharine his wife, turned his son Michael and his other children out of doors, for the love of a base Scriveners daughter in Thessalonica, with whose beauty he was enamored.	Constantine the despot killed his wife Catharine and turned his son Michael and his other children out of doors, for love of the daughter of a lowly scrivener in Thessalonica, whose beauty had captivated him.[10481]

[10474] Burton. Printed page 544, †: "Sal. Val."

[10475] Editor. The margin abbreviates Sallust and Valerius Maximus. Sallust, Catiline 15, reports the killing as something generally believed; Burton states it directly. Orcus is the underworld. The source of the intervening Latin phrase about its dark regions remains unresolved.

[10476] Burton. Printed page 544, *: "Sabel. lib. 3. En. 6."

[10477] Burton. Printed page 544, †: "Curtius lib. 5."

[10478] Burton. Printed page 544, a: "Chalcocondilas de reb. Turcicis lib. 9. Nerei uxor Athenarum domina, &c." "Chalcocondylas, On Turkish Affairs, book 9. Nereus's wife, ruler of Athens," etc.

[10479] Editor. "Base" can indicate low social rank, as here. Burton cites Sabellicus, Curtius and Chalcocondylas for these compressed anecdotes. The Laodice claim, Thais's relationship to Alexander, and Nereus's identity require checking against those sources; the modernization does not silently replace them with a different account.

[10480] Burton. Printed page 544, b: "Nicephorus Greg hist. lib. 8. Uxorem occidit liberos & Michaelem filium videre abhorruit. Thessalonicæ amore captus pronotarii filiæ, &c." "Nicephorus Gregoras, History, book 8. He killed his wife and loathed the sight of his children and his son Michael. At Thessalonica, captivated by love for a protonotary's daughter," etc.

[10481] Editor. Despot is a title, not simply a judgement of tyranny. A scrivener is a professional writer or clerk; the margin instead names a protonotary, a senior notarial office. That difference and the claimed killings must be checked in Nicephorus Gregoras, History 8; Burton's body and margin are both preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10482]Leucophria betrayed the City where she dwelt, for her sweet-hearts sake, that was in the enemies Camp. [10483]Pithidice the Governours daughter of Methinia for the love of Achilles, betrayed the whole Iland to him, her fathers enemy. [10484]Diognetus did as much in the City where he dwelt, for the love of Policrita, Medea for the love of Jason, she taught him how to tame the fire-breathing brass-feeted Bulls, and kill the mighty dragon that kept the golden fleece, and toar her little brother Absyrtus in pieces, that her father Æthes might have something to detain him, while she ran away with her beloved Jason, &c. Such Acts and Scenes hath this Tragecomœdy of love.	Leucophrye betrayed the city where she lived for the sake of her sweetheart in the enemy camp. Pithidice, the governor of Methinia's daughter, betrayed the whole island to Achilles, her father's enemy, for love of him. Diognetus did as much in the city where he lived for love of Polycrite. For love of Jason, Medea taught him to tame the fire-breathing bulls with brazen feet and kill the mighty dragon guarding the Golden Fleece; she tore her little brother Absyrtus to pieces so that her father Aeetes would have something to delay him while she fled with her beloved Jason. Such are the acts and scenes of this tragicomedy of love.[10485]

[10482] Burton. Printed page 544, c: "Parthenius Erot. lib. cap. 5."

[10483] Burton. Printed page 544, d: "Idem, ca. 21. Gubernatoris filia Achillis amore capta civitatem prodidit." "The same author, chapter 21. The governor's daughter, captivated by love for Achilles, betrayed the city."

[10484] Burton. Printed page 544, e: "Idem. cap. 9."

[10485] Editor. Parthenius 5 gives Leucophrye's betrayal; 21 calls the girl Pisidice and the city Methymna, where Burton prints Pithidice and Methinia and enlarges the betrayal to an island. In Parthenius 9, Diognetus betrays the besieging forces to save Polycrite's city, rather than betraying his own city. Burton's compressed versions remain in the text. His Medea narrative combines familiar episodes; its precise source is unlocated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 6. SUBSECT. 1.	MEMBER 6 SUBSECTION 1
Cure of Love-Melancholy, by Labour, Dyet, Physick, Fasting, &c.	The cure of love melancholy by work, diet, medicine, fasting and other means
Although it be controverted by some, whether Love Melancholy may be cured, because it is so irresistible and violent a passion, for as you know,	Although some dispute whether love melancholy can be cured, because it is such an irresistible and violent passion—for, as you know,
—— [10486]facilis descensus Averni; Sed revocare gradum, superasque evadere ad auras; Hic labor, hoc opus est. ——	Easy is the descent to Avernus; But to turn back and escape to the air above— That is the labour, that is the task.[10487]
It is an easie passage down to hell, But to come back once there you cannot well.	The passage down to hell is easy; But once you are there, returning is no easy matter.
Source page 544–545 Yet without question, if it be taken in time, it may be helped, and by many good remedies amended. Avicenna lib. 3. Fen. cap. 23. & 24. sets down seven compendious ways how this malady may be eased, altered and expelled. Savanarola 9. principal observations, Iason Pratensis prescribes eight rules besides Physick, how this passion may be tamed, Laurentius 2. main precepts, Arnoldus, Valleriola, Montaltus, Hildesheim, Langius, and others enform us otherwaies, and yet all tending to the same purpose.	yet unquestionably, if treated in time, it can be relieved and improved by many good remedies. Avicenna, book 3, fen, chapters 23 and 24, sets out seven concise methods by which this malady may be eased, altered and expelled. Savonarola gives nine principal observations; Jason Pratensis prescribes eight rules, besides medicines, for taming this passion; Laurentius gives two main precepts. Arnoldus, Valleriola, Montaltus, Hildesheim, Langius and others offer different instructions, yet all tend towards the same purpose.[10488]

[10486] Burton. Printed page 544, *: "Virg. Æn. 6."

[10487] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 6.126, 128–129. Avernus evokes the entrance to the underworld. Burton omits a line, prints Averni rather than Averno, and reverses Virgil's hoc opus, hic labor est. His English couplet is a separate adaptation, retained alongside the new translation of his Latin.

[10488] Editor. "Physick" can mean medicine generally or medicinal treatment. Fen is a subdivision of Avicenna's Canon; Burton gives no fen number here. The figures enumerate the authorities' rules, not different modern treatments. Exact editions and medical passages remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 545 The sum of which I will briefly Epitomize, (for I light my Candle from their Torches,) and enlarge again upon occasion, as shall seem best to me, and that after mine own method. The first rule to be observed in this stubborn and unbridled passion, is exercise and diet. It is an old and well known sentence, Sine Cerere & Baccho friget Venus; As an [10489]idle sedentary life, liberall feeding, are great causes of it, so the opposite, labour, slender and sparing diet, with continual business, are the best and most ordinary means to prevent it.	I shall briefly summarize their substance—for I light my candle from their torches—and expand upon it as occasion offers and seems best to me, following my own method. The first rule for this stubborn, unbridled passion concerns exercise and diet. There is an old and familiar saying: "Without Ceres and Bacchus, Venus grows cold." Just as an idle, sedentary life and abundant food are major causes, so their opposites—work, a light and sparing diet, and constant occupation—are the best and most usual means of prevention.[10490]
Otia si tollas, periêre Cupidinis artes, Contemptæque jacent, & sine luce faces.	Take away idleness, and Cupid's arts are ruined; His torches lie despised and without light.[10491]
Take idleness away, and put to flight Are Cupids Arts, his Torches give no light.	Take idleness away, and Cupid's arts Are put to flight; his torches give no light.
Minerva, Diana, Vesta, and the nine Muses were not enamoured at all, because they never were idle.	Minerva, Diana, Vesta and the nine Muses never fell in love, because they were never idle.[10492]

[10489] Burton. Printed page 545, f: "Otium naufragium castitatis. Austin." "Idleness is the shipwreck of chastity. Augustine."

[10490] Editor. Ceres, Bacchus and Venus stand for food, wine and sexual love. The proverb occurs in Terence, Eunuchus 732, with Libero instead of Baccho. The claims here belong to Burton's historical account of love melancholy; they are not present-day treatment advice. The Augustine attribution in the margin remains unlocated.

[10491] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 139–140. Burton prints artes, "arts," where the consulted text reads arcus, "bows." The modern column translates Burton's reading. His own English verse follows separately.

[10492] Editor. Burton treats the goddesses and Muses as exemplary figures of chastity and occupation. "Not enamoured at all" is his sweeping claim, not a reconciliation of every myth about them.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10493]Frustra blanditiæ appulistis ad has, Frustra nequitiæ venistis ad has, Frustra delitiæ obsidebitis has, Frustra has illecebræ, & procacitates, Et suspiria, & oscula, & susurri, Et quisquis male sana corda amantum Blandis ebria fascinat venenis.	In vain, flatteries, have you approached them; In vain, wanton tricks, have you come to them; In vain, pleasures, will you besiege them; In vain, temptations and shameless advances, Sighs and kisses and whispers, And whoever bewitches lovers' disordered hearts, Drunk with seductive poisons.[10494]
In vain are all your flatteries, In vain are all your knaveries, Delights, deceipts, procacities, Sighs, kisses, and conspiracies, And what e're is done by Art, To bewitch a Lovers heart.	In vain are all your flatteries, In vain are all your knaveries, Delights, deceits and shameless tricks, Sighs, kisses and conspiracies, And every art employed To bewitch a lover's heart.
'Tis in vain to set upon those that are busie. 'Tis Savanarola's third rule, Occupari in multis & magnis negotiis, and Avicenna's precept, cap. 24.	It is useless to assail those who are busy. Savonarola's third rule is "to be occupied in many important affairs," and this is also Avicenna's precept in chapter 24:
[10495]Cedit amor rebus: res age tutus eris.	Love yields to business: keep busy, and you will be safe.[10496]

[10493] Burton. Printed page 545, *: "Buchanan. Hendeca syl."

[10494] Editor. Buchanan, Hendecasyllabi, Ad eandem, beginning Risus, blanditiae, procacitates, printed pages 112–114 in the consulted scan; the excerpt is on 113. It reads me and quicquid where Burton has has and quisquis. Burton applies the speaker's rejection of love to the goddesses and Muses; Buchanan's speaker later relents at Neaera's tears. "Procacities" means impudent advances; susurri means whispers, unlike the English verse's "conspiracies."

[10495] Burton. Printed page 545, g: "Ovid. lib. 3. remed."

[10496] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 144. Res can mean affairs, work or business; the point is active occupation. Burton's "book 3" locator is preserved even though the consulted poem is presented as one continuous work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To be busie still, and as [10497]Guianerius injoyns, about matters of great moment, if it may be. [10498]Magninus adds, Never to be idle, but at the hours of sleep.	Be continually occupied and, as Guianerius directs, with matters of great importance if possible. Magninus adds: "Never be idle except during the hours of sleep."[10499]
—— [10500]& ni Poscas ante diem librum cum lumine, si non Intendas animum studiis, & rebus honestis, Invidia vel amore miser torquebere. ——	And unless you call for a book and a light before dawn, Unless you direct your mind to study And honourable pursuits, you will be wretchedly Tormented by envy or love.[10501]
For if thou dost not ply thy book, By candle-light to study bent, Imploy'd about some honest thing, Envy or Love shall thee torment.	For if you do not apply yourself to books, Intent on study by candlelight, Occupied with some honourable pursuit, Envy or love will torment you.
No better Physick then to be alwaies occupied, seriously intent.	There is no better medicine than to be always occupied and earnestly absorbed.
[10502]Cur in penates rariùs tenues subit, Hæc delicatas eligens pestis domus, Mediumque sanos vulgus affectus tenet? &c.	Why does this plague, choosing luxurious homes, Enter humble households less often, While ordinary people keep their feelings sound?[10503]

[10497] Burton. Printed page 545, h: "Cap. 16. circa res arduas exerceri." "Chapter 16: to occupy oneself with difficult affairs."

[10498] Burton. Printed page 545, i: "Part. 2. c. 23. reg. San. His, præter horam somni, nulla per otium transeat." "Part 2, chapter 23, Regimen of Health. Apart from the hour of sleep, let none pass in idleness for them."

[10499] Editor. "Still" means continually; "moment" means importance. Guianerius and Magninus are medical authorities. The margin's part 2 locator differs from the part 3 reference to Magninus on the next page; the editions and locators remain to be collated.

[10500] Burton. Printed page 545, k: "Hor. lib. 1. epist. 2."

[10501] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.2.34–37. Burton has poscas and intendas where the consulted text has posces and intendes, and miser, "wretched," instead of vigil, "sleepless." "Honest" means honourable or morally worthwhile, not merely truthful. Both Latin and Burton's separate English version are translated as printed.

[10502] Burton. Printed page 545, l: "Seneca."

[10503] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 209–212, spoken by the Nurse. Burton omits the intervening line asking why chaste Venus lives in small homes. His English couplet further compresses the argument. Penates means household gods and, by extension, the home.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Why dost thou ask, poor folks are often free, And dainty places still molested be?	Why, you ask, are poor people often free, While luxurious homes are always troubled?
Source page 545–546 Because poor people fare coursly, work hard, go wollward and bare. Non habet unde suum paupertas pascat amorem, [10504]Guianerius therefore prescribes his patient to go with haircloth next his skin, to go bare-footed, and barelegged in cold weather, to whip himself now and then, as Monks do, but above all, to fast. Not with sweet wine, mutton and pottage, as many of those Tenterbellies do, howsoever they put on Lenten faces, and whatsoever they pretend, but from all manner of meat.	Because poor people eat coarse food, work hard, and go with wool next to their skin and with little clothing. "Poverty has nothing with which to feed its love." Guianerius therefore prescribes that his patient wear haircloth next to his skin, go barefoot and barelegged in cold weather, and whip himself now and then, as monks do—but above all, fast. Not on sweet wine, mutton and broth, as many of those gluttons do, however much they put on Lenten faces and whatever they pretend, but abstaining from every kind of food.[10505]

[10504] Burton. Printed page 546, m: "Tract. 16. cap. 18. sæpe nuda carne cilicium portent tempore frigido sine caligis, & nudis pedibus incedant, in pane & aqua jejunent, sæpius se verberibus cædant &c." "Treatise 16, chapter 18. Let them often wear haircloth on bare flesh, go without leggings and barefoot in cold weather, fast on bread and water, and frequently beat themselves," etc.

[10505] Editor. "Wollward" means wearing wool directly against the skin, without linen; "tenterbellies" are gluttons, their bellies stretched like cloth on a tenter. A "Lenten face" is a show of fasting or austerity. The Latin is Ovid, Remedies for Love 749; his next line says poverty is nevertheless not worth choosing for this purpose. Burton omits that qualification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 546 Fasting is an all-sufficient remedy of it self; for as Iason Pratensis holds, the bodies of such persons that feed liberally, and live at ease, [10506]are full of bad spirits and Divels, divelish thoughts; no better Physick for such parties, then to fast. Hildesheim spicel. 2. to this of hunger, adds [10507]often baths, much exercise and sweat, but hunger and fasting he prescribes before the rest. And 'tis indeed our Saviours Oracle, This kind of divell is not cast out but by fasting and prayer; which makes the Fathers so immoderate in commendation of fasting.	Fasting is a sufficient remedy by itself. For, as Jason Pratensis maintains, the bodies of people who eat plentifully and live at ease "are full of evil spirits and devils, of devilish thoughts; there is no better medicine for them than fasting." Hildesheim, in his second collection, adds to hunger "frequent baths, much exercise and sweating," but prescribes hunger and fasting before all the rest. Indeed, our Saviour's pronouncement is that "this kind of devil is cast out only by fasting and prayer"; hence the Church Fathers' extravagant praise of fasting.[10508]

[10506] Burton. Printed page 546, n: "Dæmonibus referta sunt corpora nostra, illorum præcipue qui delicatis vescuntur eduliis, advolitant, & corporibus inhærent; hanc ob rem jejunium impendio probatur ad pudicitiam." "Our bodies are full of demons, especially the bodies of those who eat delicacies; they fly about and cling to the body. For this reason fasting is greatly commended as a means to chastity."

[10507] Burton. Printed page 546, o: "Victus sit attenuatus, balnei frequens usus & sudationes, cold baths, not hot, saith Magninus part. 3. ca. 23. to dive over head and ears in a cold river, &c." The Latin means: "Let the diet be reduced; frequent use of baths and sweating."

[10508] Editor. The biblical wording recalls Matthew 17:21 and Mark 9:29 in the King James tradition. Burton applies an account of casting out a spirit to love melancholy. His authorities combine bodily regimen with religious ideas about demons and chastity. Spicel. abbreviates a collection or gleanings; the full Hildesheim passage remains to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As Hunger, saith [10509]Ambrose, is a friend of Virginity, so is it an enemy to lasciviousness, but fulness overthrowes chastity, and fostereth all manner of provocations. If thine horse be too lusty, Hierome adviseth thee to take away some of his provender; by this means those Pauls, Hilaries, Antonies, and famous Anchorites subdued the lusts of the flesh; by this means Hilarion made his Asse, as he called his own body, leave kicking, (so [10510]Hierome relates of him in his life) when the Divel tempted him to any such foule offence.	"As hunger," says Ambrose, "is a friend to virginity, so it is an enemy to lust; but a full stomach overthrows chastity and fosters every kind of temptation." If your horse is too spirited, Jerome advises taking away some of his fodder. By this means those Pauls, Hilaries, Anthonies and famous hermits subdued the lusts of the flesh. By this means Hilarion made his ass—as he called his own body—stop kicking, as Jerome relates in his life, when the devil tempted him to such a foul offence.[10511]
By this means those [10512]Indian Brachmani kept themselves continent, they lay upon the ground covered with skins, as the Redshanks do on Hadder, and dieted themselves sparingly on one dish, which Guianerius would have all young men put in practise; and if that will not serve, [10513]Gordonius would have them soundly whipped, or to cool their courage, kept in prison, and there fed with bread and water, till they acknowledge their errour, and become of another mind.	By this means the Indian Brahmans kept themselves chaste: they lay on the ground covered with skins, as the Redshanks do on heather, and ate sparingly of a single dish. Guianerius would have all young men follow this practice. If that fails, Gordonius would have them thoroughly whipped or, to cool their ardour, kept in prison and fed on bread and water until they acknowledge their error and change their minds.[10514]

[10509] Burton. Printed page 546, p: "Ser. de gula; fames amica virginitati est, inimica lasciviæ: saturitas vero castitatem perdit, & nutrit illecebras." "Sermon on Gluttony: hunger is a friend to virginity and an enemy to lust; fullness destroys chastity and nourishes temptations."

[10510] Burton. Printed page 546, q: "Vita Hilarionis lib. 3. epist. cum tentasset eum dæmon titillatione inter cætera, Ego inquit, aselle, ad corpus suum, faciam, &c." "Life of Hilarion, book 3 of the letters. When the demon had tempted him with sensual excitement, among other things he said to his own body, 'I will, little ass,'" etc.

[10511] Editor. Hierome is Jerome. Life of Hilarion 5 recounts Hilarion addressing his body as an ass and threatening to subdue it with hunger and labour. Anchorites are religious recluses. The separate Ambrose attribution and the identities encompassed by Burton's plural "Pauls, Hilaries, Antonies" remain for fuller collation.

[10512] Burton. Printed page 546, r: "Strabo l. 15. Geog. sub pellibus cubant, &c." "Strabo, Geography, book 15. They lie under skins," etc.

[10513] Burton. Printed page 546, s: "Cap. 2. part. 2. Si sit juvenis, & non vult obedire, flagelletur frequenter & fortiter, dum incipiat fœtere." "Chapter 2, part 2. If he is young and unwilling to obey, let him be whipped frequently and severely, until he begins to stink."

[10514] Editor. Brachmani means Brahmans. "Redshanks" is a historical, often disparaging name for Highland Scots; "Hadder" means heather. "Courage" here means sexual ardour. The brutal whipping and imprisonment are the measures Burton reports from his authorities; the marginal fœtere literally means "to stink," a disturbing reading retained pending collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If imprisonment and hunger will not take them down, according to the direction of that [10515]Theban Crates, time must wear it out; if time will not, the last refuge is an halter. But this you will say is comically spoken. However Fasting by all means must be still used; and as they must refrain from such meats formerly mentioned, which cause venery, or provoke lust, so they must use an opposite diet.	If imprisonment and hunger do not subdue them, then, according to Crates of Thebes, "time must wear it out; if time fails, the last refuge is a noose." But, you will say, this is spoken in jest. Fasting, however, must certainly be continued; and just as they must abstain from the foods mentioned earlier that stimulate sexual desire or provoke lust, so they must follow the opposite diet.[10516]
[10517]Wine must be altogether avoided of the younger sort. So [10518]Plato prescribes, and would have the Magistrates themselves abstain from it, for examples sake, highly commending the Carthaginians for their temperance in this kind. And 'twas a good edict, a commendable thing, so that it were not done for some sinister respect, as those old Ægyptians abstained from Wine, because some fabulous Poets had given out, Wine sprang first from the blood of the Gyants, or out of superstition as our modern Turks, but for temperance, it being animæ virus & vitiorum fomes, a plague it self if immoderately taken.	The young must avoid wine altogether. Plato prescribes this, and would have magistrates themselves abstain as an example, highly praising the Carthaginians for their restraint in this respect. It was a good decree, a commendable practice, provided that it was followed for temperance rather than some mistaken reason: as the ancient Egyptians abstained because poets telling fables had declared that wine first sprang from the Giants' blood, or from superstition, as our modern Turks do. For wine is "a poison to the soul and fuel for vice," a plague in itself when taken immoderately.[10519]

[10515] Burton. Printed page 546, t: "Laertius, lib. 6. cap. 5. amori medetur fames; sin aliter, tempus; sin non hoc, laqueus." "Laertius, book 6, chapter 5. Hunger cures love; failing that, time; failing that, a noose."

[10516] Editor. Diogenes Laertius 6.86 attributes the progression from hunger to time to a noose to Crates of Thebes. "Halter" here means a hanging rope; Burton immediately marks the saying as comic. "Venery" means sexual activity or desire, and "meats" means foods generally.

[10517] Burton. Printed page 546, u: "Vina parant animos Veneri, &c." "Wine prepares the mind for Venus," etc.

[10518] Burton. Printed page 546, *: "3. de Legibus."

[10519] Editor. The consulted Plato passage is Laws 2.674, not Burton's marginal book 3. It restricts wine for soldiers, magistrates and other groups in particular circumstances; 2.666 also distinguishes ages. Plutarch, Isis and Osiris 6, records the myth of vines growing from the fallen enemies of the gods. Burton's dismissal of Turkish abstinence as superstition is his religious judgement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 546–547 Women of old for that cause, [10520]in hot Countries were forbid the use of it; as severely punished for drinking of wine, as for adultery; and young folks, as Leonicus hath recorded, Var. hist. l. 3. cap. 87, 88. out of Atheneus and others; and is still practised in Italy and some other Countries of Europe, and Asia, as Claudius Minoes hath well illustrated in his Comment on the 23. Embleme of Alciat. So choyce is to be made of other diet.	For this reason women in hot countries were formerly forbidden to drink it and were punished as severely for drinking wine as for adultery. The young were forbidden it too, as Leonicus records in his Various Histories, book 3, chapters 87 and 88, drawing on Athenaeus and others. This is still practised in Italy and some other countries of Europe and Asia, as Claudius Minoes has fully illustrated in his commentary on Alciato's twenty-third emblem. The rest of the diet must likewise be chosen with care.[10521]
Source page 547 Nec minus erucas aptum est vitare salaces, Et quicquid Veneri corpora nostra parat.	It is no less fitting to avoid lust-provoking rocket And whatever prepares our bodies for Venus.[10522]
Eringo's are not good for to be taken, And all lascivious meats must be forsaken.	Eryngo is not good to take, And all foods that excite lust must be forsaken.

[10520] Burton. Printed page 546, †: "Non minus si vinum bibissent ac si adulterium admisissent. Gellius, lib. 10. c. 23." "No less if they had drunk wine than if they had committed adultery. Gellius, book 10, chapter 23."

[10521] Editor. Gellius, Attic Nights 10.23, discusses women in Rome and Latium, including severe punishment for wine-drinking; it does not establish Burton's wider claim about hot countries. Leonicus and Claudius Minoes are cited through abbreviated titles. The exact Alciato emblem numbering and Burton's statements about his own time remain unverified.

[10522] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 799–800. The consulted Latin has aptum vitare without Burton's est. Eruca is rocket, whereas Burton's English substitutes eryngo, a different plant associated with sexual stimulation. The two readings are kept distinct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Those opposite meats which ought to be used, are, Cowcumbers, Mellons, Purslan, water Lillies, Rue, Woodbine, Ammi, Lettice, which Lemnius so much commends, lib. 2. cap. 42. and Mizaldus hort. med. to this purpose; Vitex, or Agnus castus before the rest, which saith [10523]Magninus, hath a wonderful vertue in it.	The foods with the opposite effect, which should be used, are cucumbers, melons, purslane, water lilies, rue, woodbine, ammi and lettuce, which Lemnius greatly praises for this purpose in book 2, chapter 42, as does Mizaldus in his Medical Garden. Above all the others stands vitex, or agnus castus, which Magninus says has a wonderful power.[10524]
Those Athenian women, in their solemn feasts called Thesmopheries, were to abstain nine dayes from the company of men, during which time, saith Ælian, they laid a certain hearb named Hanea, in their beds, which asswaged those ardent flames of love, and freed them from the torments of that violent passion. See more in Porta, Matthiolus, Crescentius lib. 5. &c. and what every Herbalist almost and Physitian hath written, cap. de Satyriasi & Priapismo; Rhasis amongst the rest.	At their solemn festival called the Thesmophoria, Athenian women had to abstain from men's company for nine days. During this time, says Aelian, they placed in their beds a certain herb called Hanea, which calmed love's burning flames and freed them from that violent passion's torments. See more in Porta, Mattioli, Crescentius, book 5, and the chapters "On Satyriasis and Priapism" written by almost every herbalist and physician, Rhazes among them.[10525]

[10523] Burton. Printed page 547, x: "Rer. Sam. part. 3. cap. 23. Mirabilem vim habet." The Latin sentence means: "It has a wonderful power."

[10524] Editor. The list names substances Burton's authorities believed reduced desire. Woodbine is honeysuckle; ammi is retained as a historical plant name without forcing a modern species identification. Vitex or agnus castus is chaste tree. "Vertue" means an attributed power or medicinal property, not moral goodness. The margin reads Rer. Sam., apparently a misprint for Reg. San., Regimen of Health. The precise herbal passages remain uncollated.

[10525] Editor. The Thesmophoria was a festival of Demeter celebrated by women. Burton's Hanea is retained; its exact textual history and his Aelian passage require checking. Satyriasis denotes excessive male sexual desire; priapism a persistent erection. Burton groups conditions together that should not be treated as equivalent modern diagnoses.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In some cases again, if they be much dejected and brought low in body, and now ready to despair through anguish, grief, and too sensible a feeling of their misery, a cup of wine and full diet is not amiss, and as Valescus adviseth, cum aliâ honestâ venerem sæpè exercendo, which Langius Epist. med. lib. 1. epist. 24. approves out of Rhasis (ad assiduationem coitus invitat) and Guianerius seconds it, cap. 16, tract. 16. as a [10526]very profitable remedie,	In some cases, however, if they are deeply dejected and physically weakened, and ready to despair through anguish, grief and an excessively keen sense of their misery, a cup of wine and a substantial diet are appropriate. So too, as Valescus advises, is "frequently having intercourse with another respectable woman." Langius approves this from Rhazes in his Medical Letters, book 1, letter 24—"he recommends frequent intercourse"—and Guianerius supports it in treatise 16, chapter 16, as a very beneficial remedy.[10527]

[10526] Burton. Printed page 547, y: "Cum muliere aliqua gratiosa sæpe coire erit utilissimum. Idem Laurentius. cap. 11." "It will be most beneficial to have intercourse frequently with some pleasing woman. Laurentius says the same, chapter 11."

[10527] Editor. Burton makes an exception to his preceding regimen for patients weakened by distress. Honestâ can mean respectable or decent; the margin instead says gratiosa, pleasing or attractive. Both are preserved. The medical authorities' advocacy of intercourse with another woman belongs to their historical theory; the exact passages remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [10528]tument tibi quum inguina, cum si Ancilla, aut verna præsto est, tentigine rumpi Malis? non ego namque, &c. ——	When your groin swells, if a maidservant Or a homeborn slave is at hand, would you rather Burst with desire? I certainly would not, and so forth.[10529]
[10530]Iason Pratensis subscribes to this counsel of the Poet, Excretio enim aut tollit prorsus aut lenit ægritudinem. As it did the raging lust of Assuerus, [10531]qui ad impatientiam amoris leniendam, per singulas fere noctes novas puellas devirginavit. And to be drunk too by fits; but this is mad Physick, if it be at all to be permitted.	Jason Pratensis endorses this advice from the poet, "for discharge either removes the affliction altogether or eases it," as it did Ahasuerus's raging lust, "who, to relieve love's impatience, deflowered new girls almost every night." Getting drunk from time to time is also advised; but this is mad medicine, if it is to be allowed at all.[10532]

[10528] Burton. Printed page 547, *: "Hor."

[10529] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.2.116–119. Burton shortens and alters the passage. Verna denotes a person born enslaved in the household; Horace's fuller text specifies puer, a boy or young male, which Burton omits. The translation does not turn this enslaved person into a willing partner. The passage reflects the sexual exploitation embedded in its ancient social setting.

[10530] Burton. Printed page 547, †: "Cap. 29. de morb. cereb."

[10531] Burton. Printed page 547, *: "Beroaldus orat. de amore."

[10532] Editor. Excretio here means sexual discharge or emission. Assuerus is Ahasuerus; Burton's claim is attributed to Beroaldus and remains unverified. "By fits" means intermittently. Burton expressly calls the proposed medicine mad; that qualification is essential to the passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If not, yet some pleasure is to be allowed, as that which Vives speaks of, lib. 3. de anima. [10533]A Lover that hath as it were lost himself through impotency, impatience, must be called home as a traveller by musick, feasting, good wine, if need be, to drunkenness it self, which many so much commend for the easing of the mind, all kind of sports and merriment, to see fair pictures, hangings, buildings, pleasant fields, Orchards, Gardens, Groves, ponds, pooles, Rivers, fishing, fowling, hawking, hunting, to hear merry tales, and pleasant discourse, reading, to use exercise till he sweat, that new spirits may succeed,	If not, some pleasure must still be allowed, such as Vives describes in book 3 of On the Soul: "A lover who has, as it were, lost himself through lack of self-control and impatience must be brought home like a traveller: by music, feasting, good wine—even, if need be, drunkenness itself, which many so highly commend for relieving the mind; every kind of sport and merriment; looking at fine pictures, tapestries and buildings, pleasant fields, orchards, gardens, groves, ponds, pools and rivers; fishing, bird-catching, falconry and hunting; hearing merry tales and pleasant conversation; reading; exercising until he sweats, so that fresh spirits may take their place;[10534]
or by some vehement affection or contrary passion, to be diverted till he be fully weaned from anger, suspition, cares, fears, &c. and habituated into another course. Semper tecum sit, (as [10535]Sempronius adviseth Calisto his love-sick master) qui sermones joculares moveat, conciones ridiculas, dicteria falsa, suaves historias, fabulas venustas recenseat, coram ludat, &c. still have a pleasant companion to sing and tell merry tales, songs and facete histories, sweet discourse, &c.	or diverting him through some powerful emotion or contrary passion, until he is entirely weaned from anger, suspicion, cares, fears and the rest, and accustomed to a different course." "Always have someone with you," as Sempronius advises his lovesick master Calisto, "to start amusing conversations, recite ridiculous speeches, invented jests, pleasing histories and charming tales, and play before you." Always have an agreeable companion to sing, tell merry tales and witty stories, and offer pleasant conversation.[10536]

[10533] Burton. Printed page 547, z: "Amatori, cujus est pro impotentia mens amota, opus est ut paulatim animus velut à peregrinatione domum revocetur per musicam, convivia, &c. Per aucupium, fabulas, & festivas narrationes, laborem usque ad sudorem, &c." "A lover whose mind has been displaced by lack of self-control needs his mind gradually recalled home, as from a journey, through music, feasts," etc. "Through bird-catching, tales and entertaining narratives, work to the point of sweating," etc.

[10534] Editor. Vives is Juan Luis Vives, cited from On the Soul, book 3. "Impotency" here is loss of self-command, not specifically erectile incapacity. Hangings are tapestries; fowling is bird-catching, hawking hunting with trained hawks. "Spirits" belongs to historical physiology. The complete Vives wording remains to be collated.

[10535] Burton. Printed page 547, †: "Cælestinæ Act. 2. Barthio interpret."

[10536] Editor. Sempronius and Calisto are characters in La Celestina. Burton cites act 2 in Caspar Barth's Latin version. Facete means witty or humorous. The Latin list and Burton's English gloss are both retained; the exact wording and act reference await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 547–548 And as the melody of Musick, merriment, singing, dancing, doth augment the passion of some Lovers, as [10537]Avicenna notes, so it expelleth it in others, and doth very much good. These things must be warily applyed, as the parties Symptomes vary, and as they shall stand variously affected.	And just as melodious music, merriment, singing and dancing increase some lovers' passion, as Avicenna observes, so they drive it out in others and do much good. These things must be applied cautiously, according to the patients' differing symptoms and states of mind.[10538]
Source page 548 If there be any need of Physick, that the humours be altered, or any new matter aggregated, they must be cured as melancholy men. Carolus à Lorme amongst other questions, discussed for his degree at Montpelier in France, hath this, An amantes & amentes iisdem remediis curentur? Whether Lovers and mad men be cured by the same remedies? he affirms it, for love extended is meer madness. Such Physick then as is prescribed, is either inward or outward, as hath been formerly handled in the precedent partition in the cure of Melancholy.	If medicine is needed because the humours have changed or fresh matter has accumulated, they must be treated as sufferers from melancholy. Among the questions Charles de Lorme discussed for his degree at Montpellier in France was this: "Are lovers and mad people cured by the same remedies?" He affirms that they are, for love carried to excess is sheer madness. The treatment prescribed is therefore either internal or external, as discussed earlier in the preceding partition on the cure of melancholy.[10539]

[10537] Burton. Printed page 548, a: "Cap. de Ilishi. Multos hoc affectu sanat cantilena, lætitia, musica; & quidam sunt quos hæc augent." "Chapter on Ilishi. Song, cheerfulness and music cure many of this condition; but there are some in whom these things increase it."

[10538] Editor. Burton explicitly says the same entertainment can worsen one person's symptoms and relieve another's. The margin's Ilishi is retained as the printed form of Avicenna's chapter designation; its spelling and exact location remain to be collated.

[10539] Editor. Humours and accumulated matter belong to the older bodily theory underlying Burton's account. Love "extended" means carried to excess. Amantes and amentes make a Latin pun on lovers and madmen. The de Lorme thesis and its date remain unverified; the reference to the preceding partition points to Burton's general treatment of melancholy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Consult with thy Valleriola observat. lib. 2. observ. 7. Lod. Mercatus lib. 2. cap. 4. de mulier. affect. Daniel Sennertus lib. 1. part. 2. cap. 10. [10540]Jacobus Ferrandus the Frenchman in his Tract de amore Erotique, Forestus lib. 10. observ. 29. & 30. Jason Pratensis and others for peculiar receipts. [10541]Amatus Lucitanus cured a yong Jew that was almost mad for love, with the syrop of Hellebor, and such other evacuations and purges, which are usually prescribed to black choler:	For particular prescriptions, consult Valleriola, Observations, book 2, observation 7; Luis Mercado, On the Diseases of Women, book 2, chapter 4; Daniel Sennert, book 1, part 2, chapter 10; the Frenchman Jacques Ferrand in his treatise On Erotic Love; Forestus, book 10, observations 29 and 30; Jason Pratensis and others. Amatus Lusitanus cured a young Jewish man, almost mad with love, with hellebore syrup and the other evacuations and purges usually prescribed for black bile.[10542]
[10543]Avicenna confirms as much if need require, and [10544]blood-letting above the rest, which makes amantes ne sint amentes, Lovers to come to themselves, and keep in their right minds. 'Tis the same which Schola Salernitana, Jason Pratensis, Hildesheim, &c. prescribe blood-letting to be used as a principal remedy.	Avicenna likewise approves this if necessary, and especially bloodletting, which ensures that "lovers are not madmen," bringing them to themselves and keeping them in their right minds. The School of Salerno, Jason Pratensis, Hildesheim and others similarly prescribe bloodletting as a principal remedy.[10545]

[10540] Burton. Printed page 548, *: "This Author came to my hands since the third Edition of this Book."

[10541] Burton. Printed page 548, b: "Cent. 3. curat. 56. Syrupo Helleborato & aliis quæ ad atram bilem pertinent." "Century 3, cure 56. With hellebore syrup and other things appropriate to black bile."

[10542] Editor. "Receipts" means prescriptions. Burton's note about Ferrand records when that work became available to him, an important trace of the book's revision. The Amatus case repeats the century 3, case 56 citation encountered in Block 133, where the scan printed car. rather than curat. The report itself remains to be collated.

[10543] Burton. Printed page 548, c: "Purgetur si ejus dispositio venerit ad adust. humoris, & phlebotomizetur." "Let him be purged if his condition has reached the burning of the humour, and let him be bled."

[10544] Burton. Printed page 548, d: "Amantium morbus ut pruritus solvitur; venæ sectione & cucurbitulis." "Lovers' disease, like itching, is relieved by opening a vein and by cupping."

[10545] Editor. The Latin pun means "so that lovers are not madmen." Adust refers to a humour supposedly altered by excessive heat. Cucurbitulæ are cupping vessels. These are historical explanations of purging and bloodletting, not statements of their effectiveness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Those old Scythians had a trick to cure all appetite of burning lust, by letting themselves blood under the ears, and to make both men and women barren, as Sabellicus in his Æneades relates of them. Which Salmuth. Tit. 10. de Herol. comment. in Pancirol. de nov. repert. Mercurialis var. lec. lib. 3. cap. 7. out of Hippocrates and Benzo say still is in use amongst the Indians, a reason of which [10546]Langius gives lib. 1. epist. 10.	The ancient Scythians had a practice for curing every appetite of burning lust and making both men and women infertile: bleeding themselves below the ears, as Sabellicus reports in his Enneads. Salmuth, title 10, On Watches, in his commentary on Panciroli's New Inventions, and Mercurialis, Various Readings, book 3, chapter 7, drawing on Hippocrates and Benzoni, say that it is still practised among the Indians. Langius gives an explanation in book 1, letter 10.[10547]
Huc faciunt medicamenta Venerem sopientia, ut Camphora pudendis alligata, & in brachâ gestata (quidam ait) membrum flaccidum reddit. Laboravit hoc morbo virgo nobilis, cui inter cætera præscripsit Medicus, ut laminam plumbeam multis foraminibus pertusam ad dies viginti portaret in dorso; ad exiccandum vero sperma jussit eam quam parcissimè cibari, & manducare frequenter coriandrum præparatum, et semen lactucæ et acetosæ, et sic eam à morbo liberavit.	Medicines that lull sexual desire also serve this purpose. "Camphor tied to the genitals and worn in the breeches," someone says, "makes the penis flaccid. A young noblewoman suffered from this disorder. Among other things, her physician prescribed that she wear on her back for twenty days a sheet of lead pierced with many holes. To dry up her seed, he ordered her to eat as sparingly as possible and frequently chew prepared coriander, lettuce seed and sorrel seed; in this way he freed her from the disease."[10548]

[10546] Burton. Printed page 548, e: "Cura à Venæ sectione per aures, unde semper steriles." "A cure by bloodletting around the ears, as a result of which they are always infertile."

[10547] Editor. Hippocrates, Airs, Waters, Places 22, connects Scythian impotence with an operation involving veins behind the ears, within ancient reproductive theory. Burton's further claim about both sexes and practices among Indians comes through other authorities. De Herol. is retained in the original; it apparently abbreviates a title concerning clocks or watches, rendered provisionally here. Those intermediate sources remain uncollated.

[10548] Editor. The source switches to an extended Latin catalogue of remedies. "Seed" in the woman's case preserves sperma and the historical belief in female generative seed. The lead sheet is worn on the back, not taken internally. Neither the unnamed physician nor the case has yet been identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Porro impediunt & remittunt coitum folia salicis trita & epota, & si frequentius usurpentur ipsa in totum auferunt. Idem præstat Topatius annulo gestatus, dextrum lupi testiculum attritum, & oleo vel aqua rosatâ exhibitum Veneris tædium inducere scribit Alexander Benedictus: lac butyri comestum & semen Canabis, & Camphora exhibita idem præstant.	Furthermore, willow leaves, crushed and drunk, obstruct and diminish intercourse, and if used more frequently abolish it altogether. Topaz worn in a ring does the same. Alexander Benedictus writes that a wolf's right testicle, ground up and administered in oil or rosewater, produces an aversion to sex. Buttermilk taken as food, hemp seed and administered camphor have the same effect.[10549]
Verbena herba gestata libidinem extinguit, pulvisque ranæ decollatæ & exiccatæ. Ad extinguendum coitum, ungantur membra genitalia, & renes & pecten aqua in qua opium Thebaicum sit dissolutum; libidini maxime contraria Camphora est, & coriandrum siccum frangit coitum, & erectionem virgæ impedit; idem efficit synapium ebibitum.	Vervain carried on the body extinguishes desire, as does the powder of a beheaded and dried frog. To suppress intercourse, let the genitals, loins and pubic region be anointed with water in which Theban opium has been dissolved. Camphor is especially opposed to lust; dry coriander weakens intercourse and prevents an erection of the penis. Mustard drunk has the same effect.[10550]
Da verbenam in potu et non erigetur virga sex diebus; utere menthâ siccâ cum aceto, genitalia illinita succo Hyoscyami aut cicutæ, coitus appetitum sedant, &c.	"Give vervain in a drink, and the penis will not become erect for six days. Use dried mint with vinegar; anointing the genitals with henbane or hemlock juice calms the desire for intercourse," and so forth.[10551]

[10549] Editor. The catalogue mixes plant preparations with stones and animal parts credited with occult or medicinal powers. Topatius is rendered topaz, without asserting equivalence to a precisely defined modern mineral. Lac butyri is rendered buttermilk. Alexander Benedictus is the Latin name used here for Alessandro Benedetti; the passage remains uncollated.

[10550] Editor. Renes can mean kidneys or loins; pecten here is the pubic region. These terms describe the sites of the external application. Theban opium is an old medicinal name, not a modern standardized formulation. The catalogue is a historical prescription record; its efficacy is not established by Burton's assertions.

[10551] Editor. Hyoscyamus is henbane and cicuta hemlock. "Virga," literally rod, means the penis. The six-day claim is translated without alteration. Burton gives no separate source beside this sentence; the passage requires collation with the medical authorities he names.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 548–549 ℞. seminis lactuc. portulac. coriandri an. ʒ j. menthæ siccæ ʒ ß. sacchari albiss. ℥ iij. pulverisentur omnia subtiliter, & post ea simul misce aqua Nenupharis, f. confec. solida in morsulis. Ex his sumat mane unum quum surgat.	Take lettuce seed, purslane seed and coriander seed, one drachm of each; dried mint, half a drachm; the whitest sugar, three ounces. Powder everything finely, then mix it together with water-lily water; make a solid confection in small pieces. Let the patient take one of these in the morning on rising.[10552]
Source page 549 Innumera fere his similia petas ab Hildeshemo loco prædicto, Mizaldo, Porta, cæterisque.	You may find almost countless similar prescriptions in Hildesheim at the place already cited, in Mizaldus, Porta and the others.[10553]

[10552] Editor. The prescription uses apothecaries' notation: an. means "of each," j one, ß one half, and iij three; ʒ denotes a drachm and ℥ an ounce. These historical measures are retained without conversion into modern doses. Nenupharis means water lily; morsuli are small pieces or lozenges of a medicinal confection. The recipe continues across the printed page break.

[10553] Editor. This sentence closes Member 6, Subsection 1. Hildeshemo is the Latin inflected form of Hildesheim. The promised abundance of similar prescriptions is Burton's bibliographical claim, not a verification of every recipe.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 2.	SUBSECTION 2
Withstand the beginnings, avoid occasions, change his place: fair and foul means, contrary passions, with witty inventions: to bring in another, and discommend the former.	Resist the beginnings, avoid occasions, change one's location; fair and foul means, contrary passions and ingenious devices; introduce another love and disparage the former
Other good rules and precepts are enjoyned by our Physitians, which if not alone, yet certainly conjoyned may do much; The first of which is obstare principiis, to withstand the beginning, [10554]Quisquis in primo obstitit, Pepulitque amorem tutus ac victor fuit, he that will but resist at first, may easily be a conquerer at the last.	Our physicians prescribe other useful rules and precepts which, even if ineffective separately, may certainly do much when combined. The first is "to resist the beginnings": "Whoever resisted at the outset and drove love away was safe and victorious." Anyone who resists at first may easily conquer in the end.[10555]
Baltazar Castilio l. 4. urgeth this precept above the rest, [10556]when he shall chance (saith he) to light upon a woman that hath good behaviour joyned with her excellent person, and shall perceive his eyes with a kind of greediness to pull unto them this Image of beauty, and carry it into the heart; shall observe himself to be somewhat incensed with this influence, which moveth within: when he shall discern those subtle spirits sparkling in her eyes, to administer more fuel to the fire, he must wisely withstand the beginnings, rowze up reason stupified almost, fortify his heart by all means, and shut up all those passages, by which it may have entrance.	Baldassare Castiglione, in book 4, presses this precept above the others: "When he happens," he says, "to encounter a woman whose good manners accompany her excellent looks, and notices his eyes greedily drawing in this image of beauty and carrying it into his heart; when he finds himself somewhat inflamed by this influence stirring within, and discerns the subtle spirits sparkling in her eyes adding fuel to the fire: he must wisely resist the beginnings, rouse his almost stupefied reason, fortify his heart by every means, and close all the passages by which it may enter."[10557]

[10554] Burton. Printed page 549, g: "Seneca."

[10555] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 132–133, spoken by the Nurse. Obstare principiis means to resist at the outset; it recalls Ovid's related maxim principiis obsta. The heading previews several methods discussed later, beyond this block.

[10556] Burton. Printed page 549, †: "Cum in mulierem inciderit, quæ cum formâ morum suavitatem conjunctam habet, & jam oculos persenserit formæ ad se imaginem cum aviditate quadam rapere cum eadem, &c." "When he encounters a woman who combines beauty with sweetness of manners, and has already noticed his eyes eagerly drawing her image of beauty towards themselves with it," etc.

[10557] Editor. Castiglione, The Book of the Courtier, book 4, in Bembo's account of love governed by reason. The image entering the heart and the spirits shining from the eyes belong to historical theories of sight and passion. Burton's English and the abbreviated Latin margin are retained separately; his exact Latin intermediary remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis a precept which all concur upon,	It is a precept on which all agree:
[10558]Opprime dum nova sunt subiti mala semina morbi, Dum licet, in primo limine siste pedem.	Crush the evil seeds of sudden sickness while they are new; While you can, halt your foot at the very threshold.[10559]
Thy quick disease whilst it is fresh to day, By all means crush, thy feet at first step stay.	Crush your sudden sickness by every means While it is fresh today; stop at the first step.
Which cannot sooner be done, then if he confess his grief and passion to some judicious friend [10560](qui tacitus ardet magis uritur, the more he conceals, the greater is his pain) that by his good advice may haply ease him on a sudden; and withal to avoid occasions, or any circumstance that may aggravate his disease, to remove the object by all means; for who can stand by a fire and not burn?	Nothing can accomplish this sooner than confessing his grief and passion to a discerning friend—"he who burns in silence burns the more"; the more he conceals, the greater his pain—whose good advice may perhaps bring immediate relief. At the same time he must avoid occasions, or any circumstance that may aggravate his disease, and remove the object of his passion by every means. For who can stand beside a fire and not burn?[10561]
[10562]Sussilite obsecro & mittite istanc foràs, Quæ misero mihi amanti ebibit sanguinem.	Spring up, I beg you, and let her out— She drains the blood of me, her wretched lover.[10563]

[10558] Burton. Printed page 549, h: "Ovid. de rem. lib. 1."

[10559] Editor. Burton combines Ovid, Remedies for Love 81 and 80, reversing their order and replacing the latter's Si piget, "if you regret it," with Dum licet, "while you can." "Quick disease" here means the sudden or rapidly developing affliction. His separate English rendering remains distinct.

[10560] Burton. Printed page 549, i: "Æneas Silvius."

[10561] Editor. "Haply" means perhaps; "occasions" are circumstances that provoke passion; its "object" is the beloved. The saying occurs in Aeneas Sylvius's Historia de duobus amantibus, in the paragraph beginning Intuens igitur Euryalum. Lucretia considers whom to confide in, then approaches her husband's servant Sosias. Burton quotes the narrator's maxim, omitting Nam, "for." His immediate edition remains unknown.

[10562] Burton. Printed page 549, *: "Plautus curcu."

[10563] Editor. Plautus, Curculio 151–152. The lover addresses the door-bolts, asking them to spring up and let his beloved come out. Burton puts the lines after advice to remove the beloved, reversing the purpose of their original setting. His Latin reverses the consulted text's mihi misero to misero mihi. The modern rendering preserves the appeal to let her out.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis good therefore to keep quite out of her company, which Hierome so much labours to Paula, to Nepotian; Chrysost. so much inculcates in ser. in contubern. Cyprian, and many other Fathers of the Church, Siracides in his ninth chapter, Jason Pratensis, Savanarola, Arnoldus, Valleriola, &c. and every Physitian that treats of this subject.	It is therefore good to keep entirely out of her company, as Jerome so strongly urges upon Paula and Nepotian, and Chrysostom repeatedly insists in his sermon on living together. Cyprian and many other Church Fathers say the same, as do the son of Sirach in his ninth chapter, Jason Pratensis, Savonarola, Arnoldus, Valleriola and every physician who treats this subject.[10564]
Not only to avoid as [10565]Gregory Tholosanus exhorts, kissing, dalliance, all speeches, tokens, love-letters and the like, or as Castilio lib. 4. to converse with them, hear them speak, or sing, (tolerabilius est audire basiliscum sibilantem, thou hadst better hear, saith [10566]Cyprian, a serpent hiss) [10567]those amiable smiles, admirable graces, and sweet gestures, which their presence affords.	Not only, as Gregory Tholosanus urges, to avoid kissing, dalliance, all conversation, gifts, love letters and the like; or, as Castiglione says in book 4, their company, their speaking or singing —"it is more bearable to hear a basilisk hiss," says Cyprian: you would be better off hearing a serpent hiss—and those lovely smiles, wonderful graces and sweet gestures which their presence offers.[10568]

[10564] Editor. Siracides is the son of Sirach, here Ecclesiasticus 9. The scan reads Paula; the earlier transcription Paulus has been corrected in both columns. Jerome's Letter 52.5 to Nepotianus warns a clergyman against visiting or sitting with a woman alone and against conduct inviting suspicion. This confirms the Nepotian reference; the Paula passage and Burton's abbreviated Chrysostom reference on cohabitation remain unidentified.

[10565] Burton. Printed page 549, k: "Tom. 2. lib. 4. cap. 10. Syntag. med arc. Mirâ. vitentur oscula, tactus, sermo, & scripta impudica, literæ, &c." "Volume 2, book 4, chapter 10. Syntag. med arc. Mirâ. Let kisses, touching, conversation, indecent writings, letters, etc., be avoided."

[10566] Burton. Printed page 549, *: "Lib. de singul. cler."

[10567] Burton. Printed page 549, l: "Tam admirabilem splendorem declinet, gratiam, scintillas, amabiles risus, gestus suavissimos, &c." "Let him avoid such wonderful radiance, charm, sparks, lovely smiles, sweetest gestures, etc."

[10568] Editor. Tholosanus is Gregory of Toulouse; Castilio is Castiglione. A basilisk is a fabled deadly serpent. De singularitate clericorum, in the paragraph beginning Quando libera non est, warns against a woman's singing in a shared household: Cujus cantu tolerabilius est audire basiliscum sibilantem. Burton omits Cujus cantu, "than her singing." The consulted Migne transcription labels the author uncertain. Burton's Cyprian attribution and compressed Syntag. med arc. Mirâ. reference remain.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10569]Neû capita liment solitis morsiunculis, Et his papillarum oppressiunculis Abstineant: ——	Let them not rasp heads with their usual nibbles, And from these little squeezes of the breasts Let them abstain—[10570]
Source page 550 but all talk, name, mention, or cogitation of them, and of any other women, persons, circumstance, amorous book or tale that may administer any occasion of remembrance. [10571]Prosper adviseth yong men not to read the Canticles, and some parts of Genesis at other times; but for such as are enamored they forbid, as before, the name mentioned, &c. especially all sight, they must not so much as come neer, or look upon them.	but also all talk of them, their names, any mention or thought of them, and any other women, people, circumstances, love books or stories that may provide a reminder. Prosper advises young men not to read the Song of Songs or some parts of Genesis even at other times; but for those in love, these authorities forbid, as already said, even the mention of the name, and so forth. Above all, they forbid seeing the beloved: lovers must not even come near or look at them.[10572]
[10573]Et fugitare decet simulachra & pabula amoris, Abstinere sibi atque alio convertere mentem.	And flee the images and nourishment of love, Abstain from them; turn the mind elsewhere.[10574]

[10569] Burton. Printed page 549, †: “Lipsius hort. leg. lib. 3. antiq. lec.”

[10570] Editor. The scan reads capita liment: literally, “let them rasp heads,” followed by diminutives for bites and squeezes of the breasts. The literal bodily language is retained. Burton cites Lipsius’s Antiquae lectiones, book 3; the precise passage and its earlier source remain uncollated.

[10571] Burton. Printed page 550, †: “Lib. 3. de vit. cœlitus compar. cap. 6.”

[10572] Editor. Canticles is the Song of Songs. These are Burton’s reports of restrictions on reading and association. The title De vita coelitus comparanda in the margin does not by itself settle the attribution to Prosper; the work, chapter and author need collation.

[10573] Burton. Printed page 550, *: “Lucretius.”

[10574] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things, book 4. The consulted Latin reads sed, “but,” and absterrere, “keep away,” where Burton has Et and Abstinere. Simulachra are images or likenesses; pabula is nourishment or fuel. The printed variants are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Gaze not on a maid saith Syracides, turn away thine eys from a beautiful woman, c. 9. v. 5. 7, 8. averte oculos, saith David, or if thou dost see them, as Ficinus adviseth, let not thine eye be intentus ad libidinem, do not intend her more then the rest: for as [10575]Propertius holds, Ipse alimenta sibi maxima præbet amor, love as a snow-ball inlargeth it self by sight: but as Hierome to Nepotian, aut æqualiter ama, aut æqualiter ignora, either see all alike, or let all alone; make a league with thine eys, as [10576]Job did, and that is the safest course, let all alone, see none of them.	"Do not gaze at a maiden," says the son of Sirach; "turn your eyes away from a beautiful woman," chapter 9, verses 5, 7 and 8. "Turn away your eyes," says David. Or if you do see them, as Ficino advises, do not let your eye be "intent on lust"; pay her no more attention than the rest. For, as Propertius maintains, "love itself provides its own greatest nourishment": like a snowball, love grows through looking. But, as Jerome writes to Nepotian, "either love all equally or disregard all equally": either look at all alike or leave all alone. Make a covenant with your eyes, as Job did; and that is the safest course: leave all alone, look at none of them.[10577]
Nothing sooner revives, [10578]or waxeth sore again, as Petrarch holds, then love doth by sight. As Pompe renews ambition; the sight of gold, covetousness; a beauteous object sets on fire this burning lust.	Nothing revives sooner, "or becomes painful again," as Petrarch maintains, than love does through sight. "As pomp renews ambition, and the sight of gold greed, so a beautiful object sets this burning lust on fire."[10579]
Et multum saliens incitat unda sitim.	And leaping water greatly stirs up thirst.[10580]

[10575] Burton. Printed page 550, *: "Lib. 3. Eleg. 10."

[10576] Burton. Printed page 550, †: "Job. 31. Pepigi fœdus cum oculis meis ne cogitarem de virgine." "Job 31. I made a covenant with my eyes, not to think about a maiden."

[10577] Editor. Sirach 9:5, 7–8 and Job 31:1 are explicit references. The Propertius line is 3.21.4 in the consulted numbering, rather than the margin's 3.10. Jerome, Letter 52.5, advises equal regard or disregard for consecrated virgins; Burton broadens this into advice about looking. The exact David and Ficino passages remain to be located. "Intend" means attend to or fix attention on.

[10578] Burton. Printed page 550, m: "Dial. 3. de contemptu mundi; nihil facilius recrudescit quam amor; ut pompa visa renovat ambitionem, auri species avaritiam, spectata corporis forma incendit luxuriam." "Dialogue 3, On Contempt of the World. Nothing more readily becomes sore again than love; as the sight of pomp renews ambition and the appearance of gold greed, so the sight of bodily beauty kindles lust."

[10579] Editor. Pompe means magnificent display; "waxeth sore" means becomes painful again. In Secretum 3, Augustine quotes Seneca's warning against reminders of the beloved and the maxim that love easily breaks out afresh. Later in the same exchange, purple clothing revives ambition, coins avarice and bodily beauty lust. Burton condenses these examples. His immediate Petrarch edition remains unidentified.

[10580] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 632. The consulted text has multam, modifying "thirst"; Burton prints multum, here rendered adverbially as "greatly." The unmarked quotation is retained as a separate verse line.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The sight of drink makes one dry, and the sight of meat increaseth appetite. 'Tis dangerous therefore to see. A [10581]yong Gentleman in merriment would needs put on his Mistress cloaths, and walk abroad alone, which some of her suiters espying, stole him away for her that he represented. So much can sight enforce. Especially if he have been formerly enamored, the sight of his Mistress strikes him into a new fit, and makes him rave many days after.	The sight of drink makes one thirsty, and the sight of food increases appetite. Looking is therefore dangerous. A young gentleman, for a joke, insisted on putting on his mistress's clothes and walking out alone. Some of her suitors saw him and carried him off, taking him for the woman he represented. Such is the force of sight. Especially if a man has been in love before, seeing his mistress throws him into a fresh fit and makes him rave for many days afterwards.[10582]
—— [10583]Infirmis causa pusilla nocet, Ut pene extinctum cinerem si sulphure tangas, Vivet, & ex minimo maximus ignis erit: Sic nisi vitabis quicquid renovabit amorem, Flamma recrudescet, quæ modo nulla fuit.	A slight cause harms the weak. As nearly dead embers touched with sulphur Will live, and the smallest fire become the greatest, So, unless you avoid whatever will renew love, The flame that was just now gone will flare again.[10584]
A sickly man a little thing offends, As brimstone doth a fire decayed renew, And make it burn afresh, doth loves dead flames, If that the former object it review.	A little thing can hurt a sickly man; As sulphur brings a dying fire to life And makes it burn again, so love's dead flames revive If love looks once more at its former object.

[10581] Burton. Printed page 550, *: "Seneca cont. lib. 2. cont. 9."

[10582] Editor. "Dry" means thirsty and "meat" food. The anecdote is cited to Seneca the Elder's Controversiae, book 2, controversy 9; this declamatory source and its numbering remain for collation. Burton presents a rhetorical example, not an independently documented abduction.

[10583] Burton. Printed page 550, n: "Ovid."

[10584] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 730–734. Burton prints causa for culpa, "fault," vitabis for vitaris, and recrudescet for redardescet. His separate English stanza is preserved as a second rendering, including its compressed grammar. Brimstone is sulphur.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or as the Poet compares it to embers in ashes, which the wind blows, [10585]ut solet à ventis, &c. a scald head (as the saying is) is soon broken, dry wood quickly kindles, and when they have been formerly wounded with sight, how can they by seeing but be inflamed? Ismenias acknowledgeth as much of himself, when he had been long absent, and almost forgotten his Mistress, [10586]at the first sight of her, as straw in a fire I burned afresh, and more then ever I did before.	Or, as the poet compares it to embers in ashes stirred by the wind, "as happens through the winds," and so forth: a diseased scalp, as the saying goes, is easily broken, dry wood quickly catches fire, and when lovers have already been wounded by sight, how can looking fail to inflame them? Ismenias admits as much of himself. After a long absence, when he had almost forgotten his mistress, "at the first sight of her, like straw in a fire, I burned afresh, more fiercely than ever before."[10587]
[10588]Chariclia was as much moved at the sight of her dear Theagines, after he had been a great stranger.	Chariclea was just as moved at the sight of her dear Theagenes after a long separation.[10589]
[10590]Mertila in Aristænetus swore she would never love Pamphilus again, and did moderate her passion, so long as he was absent; but the next time he came in presence, she could not contain, effuse amplexa attrectari se sinit, &c. she broke her vow, and did profusely embrace him.	Mertila in Aristaenetus swore she would never love Pamphilus again, and kept her passion under control while he was away. But the next time he appeared, she could not restrain herself: "embracing him lavishly, she lets herself be caressed," and so forth. She broke her vow and embraced him without restraint.[10591]

[10585] Burton. Printed page 550, o: "Met. 7. ut solet à ventis alimenta resumere, quæque Parva sub inductâ latuit scintilla favilla crescere & in veteres agitata resurgere flammas." "Metamorphoses 7. As it is wont to recover nourishment from the winds, and the little spark that lay hidden beneath a covering of ash to grow and, stirred up, rise again into its former flames."

[10586] Burton. Printed page 550, p: "Eustathii l. 3. aspectus amorem incendit, ut marcescentem in palea ignem ventus; ardebam interea majore concepto incendio." "Eustathius, book 3. Sight kindles love as the wind kindles a failing fire in straw; meanwhile I burned, a greater fire having caught."

[10587] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 7.79–83, describes Medea's rekindled desire on seeing Jason. Burton's margin condenses the passage. A "scald head" is a scalp affected by disease, hence easily injured. Ismenias belongs to the romance attributed here to Eustathius; the passage and Latin version remain uncollated.

[10588] Burton. Printed page 550, q: "Heliodorus l. 4. inflammat mentem novus aspectus, perinde ac ignis materiæ admotus, Chariclia, &c." "Heliodorus, book 4. A fresh sight inflames the mind, like fire applied to fuel; Chariclea, etc."

[10589] Editor. Chariclia and Theagines are Chariclea and Theagenes in Heliodorus's Aethiopica. "A great stranger" here means long absent. Burton cites book 4; the exact passage and his Latin wording require collation.

[10590] Burton. Printed page 550, †: "Epist. 15. l. 2."

[10591] Editor. Burton cites Aristaenetus, book 2, letter 15. "Could not contain" means could not restrain herself. Both the Latin statement that she permits caresses and Burton's following English account are retained; the cited letter remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 550–551 Hermotinus a yong man (in the said [10592]Author) is all out as unstaid, he had forgot his Mistress quite, and by his friends was well weaned from her love: but seeing her by chance, agnovit veteris vestigia flammæ, he raved amain, Illa tamen emergens veluti lucida stella cœpit elucere, &c. she did appear as a blazing star, or an Angel to his sight. And it is the common passion of all lovers to be overcome in this sort.	Hermotinus, a young man in the same author, is every bit as unsteady. He had quite forgotten his mistress, and his friends had thoroughly weaned him from loving her; but, seeing her by chance, "he recognized the traces of the old flame" and raved violently. "Yet, coming into view, she began to shine like a bright star," and so forth: she appeared to his eyes like a blazing star or an angel. And it is the common experience of all lovers to be overcome in this way.[10593]
Source page 551 For that cause belike Alexander discerning this inconvenience and danger that comes by seeing, [10594]when he heard Darius wife so much commended for her beauty, would scarce admit her to come in his sight, foreknowing belike that of Plutarch, formosam videre periculosissimum, how full of danger it is to see a proper woman; and though he was intemperate in other things, yet in this superbè se gessit, he carryed himself bravely.	For that reason, presumably, Alexander recognized the trouble and danger that come from looking. When he heard Darius's wife so highly praised for her beauty, he would scarcely allow her into his sight, perhaps anticipating Plutarch's saying, "to look at a beautiful woman is most dangerous." Though intemperate in other things, in this "he bore himself nobly": he behaved admirably.[10595]

[10592] Burton. Printed page 550, *: "Epist. 4. lib. 2."

[10593] Editor. "All out as unstaid" means every bit as unsteady. The old-flame phrase adapts Virgil, Aeneid 4.23, where Dido says agnosco, "I recognize"; Burton changes it to agnovit, "he recognized." Aristaenetus 2.4 and the bright-star comparison remain to be collated.

[10594] Burton. Printed page 551, r: "Curtius lib. 3. cum uxorem Darii laudatam andivisset, tantum cupiditati suæ frænum injecit, ut illam vix vellet intueri." "Curtius, book 3. When he heard Darius's wife praised, he put such a restraint on his desire that he scarcely wished to look at her."

[10595] Editor. "Proper" means handsome; "bravely" means admirably. Plutarch, Alexander 22.5, reports Alexander's claim in a letter that he had neither seen nor wished to see Darius's wife, nor allowed praise of her beauty. This supports Burton's story, but does not establish his precise Curtius quotation or the separate Plutarch maxim. The margin's andivisset, apparently for audivisset, "had heard," is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And so when as Araspus in Xenophon, had so much magnified that divine face of Panthea to Cyrus, [10596]by how much she was fairer then ordinary, by so much he was the more unwilling to see her.	Likewise, when Araspas in Xenophon had so greatly praised Panthea's divine face to Cyrus, the more her beauty surpassed the ordinary, the less willing Cyrus was to see her.[10597]
Scipio a yong man of 23 years of age, and the most beautifull of the Romans, equal in person to that Græcian Charinus, or Homers Nireus, at the siege of a City in Spain, when as a noble and a most fair yong Gentlewoman was brought unto him, [10598]and he had heard she was betrothed to a Lord, rewarded her, and sent her back to her sweet-heart.	Scipio, a young man of twenty-three and the most handsome of the Romans, equal in looks to the Greek Charinus or Homer's Nireus, was besieging a city in Spain when a noble and very beautiful young gentlewoman was brought to him. Hearing that she was betrothed to a lord, he gave her gifts and sent her back to her sweetheart.[10599]
S. Austin, as [10600]Gregory reports of him, ne cum sorore quidem suâ putavit habitandum, would not live in the house with his own sister. Xenocrates lay with Lais of Corinth all night, and would not touch her.	Saint Augustine, as Gregory reports, "thought he ought not to live even with his own sister": he would not share a house with her. Xenocrates lay beside Lais of Corinth all night and would not touch her.[10601]

[10596] Burton. Printed page 551, s: "Cyropædia. cum Pantheæ formam evexisset Araspus, tanto magis inquit Cyrus, abstinere oportet, quanto pulchrior est." "Cyropaedia. When Araspas had exalted Panthea's beauty, Cyrus said: the more beautiful she is, the more one ought to keep away."

[10597] Editor. Xenophon, Cyropaedia 5.1.7–8: Cyrus refuses to see Panthea because her beauty might distract him from his duties. Araspus is the Latinized form of Araspas. Burton's Latin margin and English paraphrase express the same comparison differently.

[10598] Burton. Printed page 551, t: "Livius, cum eam regulo cuidam desponsatam audivisset muneribus cumulatam remisit." "Livy. When he heard she was betrothed to a prince, he sent her back laden with gifts."

[10599] Editor. Livy 26.50 recounts Scipio's return of a captive woman to her fiancé Allucius, with a wedding gift. Burton's age of twenty-three and comparison with Charinus and Nireus are retained as his claims; they are not established by this cited episode alone.

[10600] Burton. Printed page 551, †: "Ep. 39. lib. 7."

[10601] Editor. S. Austin means Saint Augustine. The Gregory reference gives book 7, letter 39, without an edition; both that numbering and the report about Augustine remain to be checked. "Lay with" here means shared a bed or lay beside, since the sentence expressly denies sexual contact. The Xenocrates anecdote also requires collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Socrates, though all the city of Athens supposed him to dote upon fair Alcibiades, yet when he had an opportunity [10602]solus cum solo, to lye in the chamber with, and was woed by him besides, as the said Alcibiades publiquely [10603]confessed, formam sprevit & superbè contempsit, he scornfully rejected him.	Although all Athens supposed Socrates to be infatuated with handsome Alcibiades, when he had an opportunity to sleep in the same room, "one man alone with another," and was also courted by him, as Alcibiades publicly confessed, "he spurned his beauty and proudly disdained it": he rejected him with scorn.[10604]
Petrarch that had so magnified his Laura in several poems, when by the Popes means she was offered unto him, would not accept of her.	Petrarch, who had so exalted his Laura in various poems, would not accept her when she was offered to him through the Pope's intervention.[10605]

[10602] Burton. Printed page 551, †: "Et ea loqui posset quæ soli amatores loqui solent." "And could say the things that lovers alone are accustomed to say."

[10603] Burton. Printed page 551, †: "Platonis Convivio."

[10604] Editor. Plato, Symposium, in Alcibiades's account of his unsuccessful attempt to seduce Socrates. Solus cum solo explicitly describes one man alone with another. Burton's Latin comment on contempt and the marginal sentence are retained separately from the fuller narrative.

[10605] Editor. Burton reports the familiar story of Petrarch's refusal of Laura when a marriage was proposed through papal intervention. No source is supplied here; the anecdote is retained without treating it as verified biography.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10606]It is a good happiness to be free from this passion of Love, and great discretion it argues in such a man that can so contain himself; but when thou art once in love, to moderate thy self (as he saith) is a singular point of wisdome.	"It is a great happiness to be free from this passion of love, and a man who can restrain himself so shows great judgment; but once you are in love, to govern yourself," as he says, "is a rare achievement of wisdom."[10607]
[10608]Nam vitare plagas in amoris ne jaciamur Non ita difficile est, quàm captum retibus ipsis Exire, & validos Veneris perrumpere nodos.	For avoiding being thrown into love's snares Is not so difficult as escaping once caught in the nets And breaking through the strong knots of Venus.[10609]
To avoid such nets is no such mastery, But tane to escape is all the victory.	Avoiding such nets is no great feat; Escaping once caught is the whole victory.
But for as much as few men are free, so discreet lovers, or that can contain themselves, and moderate their passions, to curb their senses, as not to see them, not to look lasciviously, not to confer with them, such is the fury of this head-strong passion of raging lust, and their weakness, ferox ille ardor à natura insitus, [10610]as he terms it, such a furious desire nature hath inscribed, such unspeakable delight,	But few men are free of love, few lovers so prudent or able to restrain themselves and govern their passions, to curb their senses enough not to see the beloved, not to look lustfully or converse with them. Such is the fury of this headstrong passion of raging lust, and such their weakness: "that fierce ardour implanted by nature," as he calls it, such furious desire has nature inscribed in us, such indescribable delight—[10611]

[10606] Burton. Printed page 551, u: "Heliodorus lib. 4. expertem esse amoris beatitudo est; at quum captus sis, ad moderationem revocare animum prudentia singularis." "Heliodorus, book 4. To be free of love is happiness; but once you are caught, to recall the mind to moderation is exceptional wisdom."

[10607] Editor. The margin identifies Heliodorus, book 4. "Singular" means exceptional, and "discretion" sound judgment. The Latin distinguishes being untouched by love from recovering self-command after being caught by it; the exact textual intermediary remains uncollated.

[10608] Burton. Printed page 551, *: "Lucretius l. 4."

[10609] Editor. Lucretius, On the Nature of Things, book 4: the comparison makes escaping love harder than avoiding its snares. Burton's separate English couplet follows; "mastery" means a difficult feat, and "tane" means taken or caught.

[10610] Burton. Printed page 551, †: "Hædus lib. 1. de amor. contem."

[10611] Editor. The quotation is attributed to Petrus Haedus, De amoris contemptu, book 1. "Confer" means converse. Burton's long sentence runs through the following verse and resumes with "which"; the modern version keeps that connection.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sic Divæ Veneris furor, Insanis adeò mentibus incubat,	So does divine Venus's frenzy Brood over minds so mad.[10612]
Source page 551–552 which neither reason, counsel, poverty, pain, misery, drudgery, partus dolor, &c. can deter them from; we must use some speedy means to correct and prevent that, and all other inconveniences, which come by conference and the like. The best, readiest, surest way, and which all approve, is Loci mutatio, to send them several ways, that they may neither hear of, see, nor have opportunity to send to one another again, or live together soli cum sola as so many Gilbertines.	—from which neither reason, advice, poverty, pain, misery, drudgery, "the pain of childbirth," nor anything else can deter them. We must use some swift means to correct and prevent this and all the other troubles that arise from conversation and the like. The best, readiest and surest way, approved by all, is "a change of place": send them in different directions, so that they can neither hear of nor see each other, have another opportunity to send messages, or live together, "men alone with a woman," like so many Gilbertines.[10613]
Source page 552 Elongatio à patria, 'tis Savanarola's fourth rule, and Gordonius precept, distrahatur ad longinquas regiones, send him to travel. 'Tis that which most run upon, as so many hounds with full cry, Poets, Divines, Philosophers, Physitians, all, mutet patriam:	"Removal from one's country" is Savonarola's fourth rule, and Gordonius's precept: "let him be sent away to distant regions"—send him travelling. This is what most pursue, like so many hounds in full cry: poets, theologians, philosophers, physicians, all say, "let him change his country."[10614]

[10612] Editor. Venus personifies sexual love. The two lines have no separate attribution in the scan, and their source remains unidentified. Insanis modifies mentibus, "mad minds"; adeo intensifies the assertion.

[10613] Editor. Loci mutatio is a change of place. "Several ways" means separate directions; "send" means send a message. Soli cum sola is literally plural males alone with a single female. Gilbertines names a religious community; the precise historical or satirical allusion remains to be established.

[10614] Editor. Elongatio means removal to a distance. Gordonius's distrahatur is an instruction that the lover be taken away. Burton groups medical, religious and literary authorities through the image of hounds pursuing the same quarry.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Valesius: [10615]as a sick man he must be cured with change of Aire, Tully 4. Tuscul. The best remedy is to get thee gone, Jason Pratensis: change air and soyl, Laurentius.	Valesius: "like a sick man, he must be cured by a change of air." Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, book 4: the best remedy is to go away. Jason Pratensis and Laurentius: change your air and country.[10616]
Fuge littus amatum.	Flee the beloved shore.[10617]
Virg. Utile finitimis abstinuisse locis.	Virgil: It helps to avoid neighbouring places.[10618]
[10619]Ovid. I procul, & longas carpere perge vias. —— sed fuge, tutus eris.	Ovid: Go far away, and keep travelling long roads. But flee, and you will be safe.[10620]
Travelling is an Antidote of Love,	Travelling is an antidote to love:
[10621]Magnum iter ad doctas proficisci cogor Athenas, Ut me longa gravi solvat amore via.	I must journey far to learned Athens, So a long road may free me from oppressive love.[10622]

[10615] Burton. Printed page 552, x: "Loci mutatione tanquam non convalescens curandus est. cap. 11." "He must be cured by a change of place, as one who is not recovering. Chapter 11."

[10616] Editor. "Soil" means country or region. Tully is Cicero; Tuscul. abbreviates Tusculan Disputations. The scan's punctuation compresses several names and recommendations. Valesius, Jason Pratensis, Laurentius and the exact Cicero passage still require collation; no modern therapeutic efficacy is asserted by the editorial account.

[10617] Editor. This apparently adapts Virgil, Aeneid 3.44, fuge litus avarum, "flee the greedy shore," changing avarum to amatum, "beloved." In Virgil, Polydorus warns Aeneas away from the land where he was murdered; Burton redirects the phrase to separation from love.

[10618] Editor. The printed "Virg." stands before this line, but the line is Ovid, Remedies for Love 626. The attribution is preserved and the mismatch recorded rather than silently repaired.

[10619] Burton. Printed page 552, y: "Amorum l. 2. Quisquis amat, loca nota nocent; dies ægritudinem adimit, absentia delet. Ire licet procul hinc patriæque relinquere fines. Ovid." "Loves, book 2. Familiar places harm whoever loves; time removes the distress, absence effaces it. One may go far from here and leave the borders of one's country. Ovid."

[10620] Editor. The first line is Ovid, Remedies for Love 214. "But flee, and you will be safe" compresses the advice, recalling 224 and the tutus eris of 650. The margin labels its additional collection of phrases Amorum book 2; their exact sources and arrangement remain for collation.

[10621] Burton. Printed page 552, †: "Lib. 3. eleg. 20."

[10622] Editor. Propertius 3.21.1–2 in the consulted numbering; Burton's margin gives 3.20. The poem describes a journey to Athens as an escape from love. The statement about being sent by his parents is Burton's addition to these lines.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For this purpose saith Propertius, my parents sent me to Athens; time and absence wear away pain and grief, as fire goes out for want of fuel.	For this purpose, says Propertius, my parents sent me to Athens. Time and absence wear away pain and grief, as fire goes out for lack of fuel.
† Quantum oculis, animo tam procul ibit amor.	As far as love goes from the eyes, so far it will go from the mind.[10623]
But so as they tarry out long enough: a whole year [10624]Xenophon prescribes Critobulus, vix enim intra hoc tempus ab amore sanari poteris: some will hardly be weaned under.	But they must stay away long enough. Xenophon prescribes a whole year for Critobulus: “for you can scarcely be cured of love within that time.” Some can hardly be weaned from it any sooner.[10625]
All this [10626]Heinsius merrily inculcates in an Epistle to his friend Primerius: First fast, then tarry, thirdly change thy place, fourthly think of an halter. If change of place, continuance of time, absence, will not wear it out with those precedent remedies, it will hardly be removed: but these commonly are of force.	Heinsius playfully presses all this in a letter to his friend Primerius: first fast; then wait; third, change your place; fourth, think of a noose. If a change of place, the passage of time and absence, together with the preceding remedies, will not wear it out, it will scarcely be removed. But these usually work.[10627]
Felix Plater observ. lib. 1. had a baker to his patient, almost mad for the love of his maid, and desperate; by removing her from him, he was in a short space cured.	Felix Plater, Observations, book 1, had a baker as his patient, nearly mad with love for his maid and desperate. By having her removed from him, he was cured in a short time.[10628]

[10623] Editor. Propertius 3.21.10. The dagger is printed before this line without a distinct corresponding marginal entry; it is retained as a source marker, with the identification supplied here.

[10624] Burton. Printed page 552, †: “Lib. 1. Socrat. memor. Tibi O Critobule consulo ut integrum annum absis, &c.” “Memorabilia of Socrates, book 1. I advise you, Critobulus, to be away for a whole year, etc.”

[10625] Editor. Xenophon, Memorabilia 1.3.13, where Socrates advises Critobulus to spend a year abroad after the discussion of a kiss. Burton attributes the precept to the author. The consulted primary-text search excerpt confirms the year; full page retrieval was unavailable.

[10626] Burton. Printed page 552, z: “Proximum est ut esurias. 2. ut moram temporis opponas. 3. & locum mutes. 4. ut de laqueo cogites.” “The next thing is to go hungry; second, to oppose it with a delay of time; third, to change your place; fourth, to think of a noose.”

[10627] Editor. “Halter” means a noose. Burton calls this advice merry: its final item is a grim literary joke following fasting, time and distance, not an editorial recommendation. The exact letter to Primerius and its relation to the earlier Crates tradition remain uncollated.

[10628] Editor. Plater’s Observations supplies Burton’s claimed cure. “Maid” means a female domestic servant in this context. The specific case and outcome remain uncollated; the translation preserves the historical claim without adding clinical confirmation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Iseus a Philosopher of Assyria, was a most dissolute liver in his youth, palam lasciviens, in love with all he met; but after he betook himself by his friends advice to his study, and left womens companie, he was so changed, that he cared no more for plays, nor feasts, nor masks, nor songs, nor verses, fine cloaths, nor no such love toys: he became a new man upon a sudden, tanquam si priores oculos amisisset, saith mine [10629]Author, as if he had lost his former eys.	Isaeus, a philosopher of Assyria, lived most dissolutely in his youth, "openly indulging in lust," falling in love with everyone he met. But after taking his friends' advice, turning to study and leaving women's company, he changed so completely that he no longer cared for plays, feasts, masques, songs, verses, fine clothes or any such amorous trifles. He suddenly became a new man, "as if he had lost his former eyes," as my author says.[10630]
Peter Godefridus in the last chapter of his third book, hath a story out of S. Ambrose, of a yong man that meeting his old love after long absence, on whom he had extreamly doted, would scarce take notice of her; she wondred at it, that he should so lightly esteem her, called him again, lenibat dictis animum, and told him who she was, Ego sum inquit: At ego non sum ego; But he replied, he was not the same man: proripuit sese tandem, as Dido fled from [10631]Æneas, not vouchsafing her any farther parly, loathing his folly, and ashamed of that which formerly he had done.	In the last chapter of his third book, Peter Godefridus tells a story from Saint Ambrose of a young man who met his former love after a long absence. Though once deeply infatuated with her, he scarcely acknowledged her. Astonished that he valued her so lightly, she called to him again, "soothing his heart with words," and told him who she was. "It is I," she said. "But I am no longer I," he answered: he was not the same man. "At last he rushed away," as Dido fled from Aeneas, refusing her any further conversation, disgusted by his folly and ashamed of what he had formerly done.[10632]
[10633]Non sum stultus ut ante jam Neæra,	I am no longer a fool as before, Neaera.[10634]

[10629] Burton. Printed page 552, *: "Philostratus de vitis Sophistarum."

[10630] Editor. "Masks" means masques, staged entertainments, and "love toys" amorous trifles. Burton identifies his source as Philostratus, Lives of the Sophists. The precise Isaeus passage, his designation as a philosopher and Burton's geographical description remain for collation.

[10631] Burton. Printed page 552, *: "Virg. 6. Æn."

[10632] Editor. Burton threads Virgil's language into an anecdote attributed through Peter Godefridus to Ambrose. Aeneid 6.468 supplies lenibat dictis animum, and 6.472 has tandem corripuit sese, where Burton prints proripuit sese tandem. The change from Dido to the young man reverses the gender of the person who departs. The Ambrose/Godefridus chain remains uncollated.

[10633] Burton. Printed page 552, †: "Buchanan."

[10634] Editor. Buchanan's Ad eandem, beginning Risus, blanditiae, procacitates, is confirmed in scanned printed pages 112–114. Page 113 reads Non sum stultus ut ante. Iam Neæra / Vale: "farewell" continues in the next line. Burton stops before Vale and supplies his own dismissal in prose. Buchanan's speaker later relents at Neaera's tears. Burton's immediate edition remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
O Neæra, put your tricks, and practise hereafter upon some body else, you shall befool me no longer.	O Neaera, from now on try your tricks and schemes on somebody else; you shall fool me no longer.
Source page 552–553 Petrarch hath such another tale of a yong gallant, that loved a wench with one eye, and for that cause by his parents was sent to travel into far Countries, after some years he returned, and meeting the maid for whose sake he was sent abroad, asked her how, and by what chance she lost her eye? no said she, I have lost none, but you have found yours:	Petrarch has another such tale of a young gallant who loved a girl with one eye, and for that reason was sent by his parents to travel in distant countries. After some years he returned. Meeting the girl for whose sake he had been sent abroad, he asked how she had come to lose her eye. "No," she said, "I have lost none; you have found yours."[10635]
Source page 553 Signifying thereby that all Lovers were blind, as Fabius saith, Amantes de forma judicare non possunt, Lovers cannot judge of beauty, nor scarce of any thing else, as they will easily confess, after they return unto themselves, by some discontinuance or better advice, wonder at their own folly, madness, stupidity, blindness, be much abashed, and laugh at Love, and call't an idle thing, condemn themselves that ever they should be so besotted or misled; and be heartily glad they have so happily escaped.	She meant that all lovers were blind, as Fabius says: "lovers cannot judge beauty," nor scarcely anything else. They will readily confess this once some interruption or better advice has brought them back to themselves. They wonder at their own folly, madness, stupidity and blindness, feel deeply ashamed, "and laugh at love, and call it an idle thing," condemn themselves for ever having been so infatuated or misled, and rejoice heartily that they have escaped so happily.[10636]

[10635] Editor. "Wench" here means a young woman. The reply turns blindness into a figure for the lover's loss of judgment: her eye has not changed, his perception has. Burton supplies no precise Petrarch reference at this point.

[10636] Editor. "Discontinuance" is an interruption or separation; "return unto themselves" means recover their judgment. Fabius is the name Burton gives the authority for the maxim; the precise work and the italicized English phrase remain to be located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If so be (which is seldome) that change of place will not effect this alteration, then other remedies are to be annexed, fair and foul means, as to perswade, promise, threaten, terrifie, or to divert by some contrary passion, rumour, tales, news, or some witty invention, to alter his affection, [10637]by some greater sorrow, to drive out the less, saith Gordonius, as that his house is on fire, his best friends dead, his mony stoln. [10638]That he is made some great Governour, or hath some honour, office, some inheritance is befaln him, He shall be a Knight, a Baron: or by some false accusation, as they do to such as have the hickhop, to make them forget it.	If a change of place fails to bring about this alteration, which seldom happens, other remedies must be added, fair means and foul: persuasion, promises, threats, fright, or diversion through some contrary passion, rumour, story, news or clever invention, to alter his affection. "Drive out the smaller sorrow by a greater," says Gordonius: tell him his house is on fire, his best friend dead or his money stolen; or that he has been made a great governor, received an honour or office, or come into an inheritance, and will be a knight or baron. Or use some false accusation, as people do to those with hiccups, to make them forget them.[10639]

[10637] Burton. Printed page 553, b: "Annuncientur valde tristia, ut major tristitia possit minorem obfuscare." "Let very sorrowful things be announced, so that the greater sorrow may obscure the smaller."

[10638] Burton. Printed page 553, c: "Aut quod sit factus senescalus, aut habeat honorem magnum." "Or that he has been made a seneschal, or has received a great honour."

[10639] Editor. "Hickhop" means hiccups. A seneschal is a high household or administrative officer. Burton describes fabricating distressing or gratifying news, and false accusations, to displace the passion; those deceptive practices belong to the historical argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Saint Hierome lib. 2. epist. 16. to Rusticus the Monk, hath an instance of a yong man of Greece, that lived in a Monastery in Ægypt, [10640]that by no labour, no continence, no perswasion could be diverted, but at last by this trick he was delivered. The Abbot sets one of his covent to quarrel with him, and with some scandalous reproach or other to defame him before company, and then to come and complain first, the witnesses were likewise suborned for the plaintiffe. The yong man wept, and when all were against him, the Abbot cunningly took his part, least he should be overcome with immoderate grief: but what need many words? By this invention he was cured, and alienated from his pristine love-thoughts.	Saint Jerome, book 2, letter 16, to the monk Rusticus, gives the example of a young Greek living in a monastery in Egypt, whom no labour, abstinence or persuasion could divert, but who was finally delivered by this trick. The abbot set one of his community to quarrel with him, defame him before others with some scandalous accusation, and then be the first to lodge a complaint. Witnesses were also bribed or induced to give false evidence for the complainant. The young man wept; when everyone was against him, the abbot cunningly took his side, lest he be overwhelmed by excessive grief. But why prolong the story? By this device he was cured and drawn away from his former thoughts of love.[10641]
—— Injuries, slanders, contempts, disgraces,	Injuries, slanders, contempt, disgrace,
—— spretæque injuria formæ,	and the insult of beauty scorned,[10642]

[10640] Burton. Printed page 553, d: “Adolescens Græcus erat in Ægypti cœnobio qui nulla operis magnitudine, nulla persuasione flammam poterat sedare: monasterii pater hac arte servavit. Imperat cuidam è sociis, &c. Flebat ille, omnes adversabantur; solus pater callidè opponere, ne abundantia tristitiæ absorberetur, quid multa? hoc invento curatus est, & à cogitationibus pristinis avocatus.” “There was a young Greek in a monastery in Egypt who could calm the flame by no amount of work or persuasion. The father of the monastery saved him by this device. He ordered one of the brethren, etc. The young man wept; all opposed him. Only the father cunningly took the other side, lest he be swallowed up by excessive sorrow. Why say more? By this device he was cured and drawn away from his former thoughts.”

[10641] Editor. Jerome, Letter 125.13 to Rusticus in the consulted numbering, rather than Burton’s book 2, letter 16. Jerome makes the process last a year; Burton compresses that interval away. “Covent” means the monastic community, “suborned” induced to give false evidence, and “pristine” former. The narrative explicitly depends on deliberate mistreatment and false accusation.

[10642] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 1.27, on Juno’s resentment at the judgment of Paris. Burton reuses the insult to rejected beauty as an example of what can turn affection into hatred.

Original text 1651	Modern English
are very forcible means to withdraw mens affections, contumelia affecti amatores amare desinunt, as [10643]Lucian saith, Lovers reviled or neglected, contemned or misused, turn Love to hate; [10644]redeam? Non si me obsecret, I'le never love thee more. Egone illam, quæ illum, quæ me, quæ non?	are very powerful ways to turn people's affections aside. As Lucian says, "lovers subjected to insult cease to love." Lovers abused or neglected, despised or mistreated, turn love to hatred. "Shall I return? Not if she begs me!" "I'll never love you more." "What, I love her—who loves him, who treats me—who does not—?"[10645]
So Zephyrus hated Hyacinthus because he scorned him, and preferred his corrival Apollo (Palephætus fab. Nar.) he will not come again though he be invited.	So Zephyrus hated Hyacinthus because he scorned him and preferred his rival Apollo: Palaephatus, Fabulous Narratives. Such a lover will not come again even when invited.[10646]

[10643] Burton. Printed page 553, e: "Tom. 4."

[10644] Burton. Printed page 553, f: "Ter."

[10645] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 49 and 65. The first line voices Phaedria's defiance; the second reproduces his broken, angry syntax. The supplied verbs in the modern rendering make that elliptical sense readable while retaining its interruptions. Lucian's volume reference is too broad to identify the exact passage without further collation.

[10646] Editor. "Corrival" means rival. Burton cites Palaephatus for the myth of Zephyrus's jealousy of Apollo over Hyacinthus; the abbreviated title and the specific version remain uncollated. The closing refusal resumes the general description of the rejected lover.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Tell him but how he was scoffed at behind his back, (’tis the councel of Avicenna) that his Love is false, and entertains another, rejects him, cares not for him, or that she is a fool, a nasty quean, a slut, a fixen, a scold, a divel, or which Italians commonly do, that he or she hath some loathsome filthy disease, gout, stone, strangury, falling-sickness, and they are hereditary, not to be avoided, he is subject to a consumption, hath the Pox, that he hath three or four incurable tetters, issues: that she is bald, her breath stinks, she is mad by inheritance, and so are all the kinred, an hair-brain, with many other secret infirmities, which I will not so much as name, belonging to women.	Just tell him how he was mocked behind his back —this is Avicenna’s advice—that his love is unfaithful, entertains another, rejects him or cares nothing for him; or that she is a fool, a filthy whore, a sloven, a vixen, a scold or a devil. Or, as Italians commonly do, say that he or she has some disgusting, filthy disease: gout, stone, painful dribbling urination or epilepsy, and that these are hereditary and unavoidable; that he is prone to wasting disease, has the pox or three or four incurable skin eruptions or draining sores; that she is bald, her breath stinks, she is mad by inheritance, as are all her relatives, and is scatterbrained, with many other hidden ailments belonging to women which I will not even name.[10647]
Source page 553–554 That he is an Hermaphrodite, an Eunuch, imperfect, impotent, a spend-thrift, a gamester, a fool, a gull, a begger, a whoremaster, far in debt, and not able to maintain her, a common drunkard, his mother was a Witch, his father hang’d, that he hath a wolfe in his bosome, a sore leg, he is a leper, hath some incurable disease, that he will surely beat her, he cannot hold his water, that he cries out or walks in the night, will stab his bed-fellow, tell all his secrets in his sleep, and that no body dare lie with him, his house is haunted with spirits, with such fearfull and tragicall things, able to avert and terrifie any man or woman living.	Say that he is a hermaphrodite, a eunuch, physically defective or impotent; a spendthrift, gambler, fool, dupe, beggar or whoremonger, deeply in debt and unable to support her; a habitual drunkard whose mother was a witch and whose father was hanged; that he has an ulcer in his breast, a sore leg, leprosy or some incurable disease; that he will certainly beat her, cannot hold his urine, cries out or walks at night, will stab his bedfellow or reveal all his secrets in his sleep, so that nobody dares sleep beside him; that his house is haunted by spirits. Use such frightening and tragic things as could repel and terrify any man or woman alive.[10648]

[10647] Editor. This catalogue consists of allegations to be made about the beloved. “Quean” is a sexual insult; “slut” can mean a slovenly woman; “fixen” is vixen. Stone denotes urinary calculi, strangury painful or difficult urination, falling-sickness epilepsy, and consumption a wasting disease. Pox here has a venereal implication. “Tetters” are skin eruptions and “issues” draining sores or openings. These historical terms do not establish diagnoses or inheritance patterns.

[10648] Editor. The historical label “hermaphrodite” is retained because it functions here as a stigmatizing allegation; it does not map neatly onto modern descriptions of sex characteristics. A “gull” is a dupe, and “maintain” means support financially. A “wolf” can mean an eating ulcer or similar destructive sore; that sense is used here. The whole list, including disability, disease and family disgrace, belongs to Burton’s proposed campaign of disparagement.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 554 Gordonius cap. 20. part. 2. hunc in modum consulit;	Gordonius, part 2, chapter 20, advises in this manner:
Paretur aliqua vetula turpissima aspectu, cum turpi & vili habitu: & portet subtus gremium pannum menstrualem, & dicat quod amica sua sit ebriosa, & quod mingat in lecto, & quod est epileptica & impudica; & quod in corpore suo sunt excrescentiæ enormes, cum fœtore anhelitus, & aliæ enormitates, quibus vetulæ sunt edoctæ: si nolit his persuaderi, subito extrahat [10649]pannum menstrualem, coram facie portando, exclamando, talis est amica tua; & si ex his non demiserit, non est homo, sed diabolus incarnatus.	"Find an old woman of very ugly appearance, in ugly, shabby clothes. Let her carry a menstrual cloth concealed in her lap, and say that his beloved is a drunkard, wets the bed, is epileptic and unchaste; that her body has monstrous growths, with foul breath and other deformities which old women know about. If he will not be persuaded by this, let her suddenly draw out the menstrual cloth, hold it before his face and cry, 'Such is your beloved!' And if he does not desist after this, he is no man, but a devil incarnate."[10650]
Idem fere Avicenna cap. 24. de cura Elishi, Lib. 3. Fen. 1. Tract. 4. Narrent res immundas vetulæ, ex quibus abominationem incurrat, & res [10651]sordidas, & hoc assiduent.	Avicenna says much the same in book 3, fen 1, treatise 4, chapter 24, on the treatment of Elishi: "Let old women tell filthy things that will fill him with disgust, and sordid things; let them keep at it."[10652]
Idem Arculanus cap. 16. in 9. Rhasis, &c.	Arculanus says the same in chapter 16 of his commentary on book 9 of Rhazes, and so forth.[10653]

[10649] Burton. Printed page 554, g: "Hypatia Alexandrina quendam se adamantem prolatis muliebribus pannis, & in eum conjectis ab amoris insania laboravit. Suidas & Eunapius." "Hypatia of Alexandria, a man who loved her, women's cloths brought out and thrown at him: the sentence ends "suffered from love's madness." Suidas and Eunapius."

[10650] Editor. Gordonius is Bernard of Gordon. The Latin directs an old woman to produce disgust by allegations and a menstrual cloth. Burton's Hypatia margin prints laboravit, "suffered" or "laboured," where the construction appears to require liberavit, "freed [him]." The defective wording is retained, and the intended cure is not silently substituted in its translation. The Hypatia story and attribution to Suidas and Eunapius require primary collation.

[10651] Burton. Printed page 554, h: "Savanarola reg. 5."

[10652] Editor. Elishi is retained as printed, a Latinized term for lovesickness in Burton's Avicenna citation; its spelling differs from Ilishi earlier in the discussion. Fen is a division of the Canon. The Savonarola margin supports the instruction to repeat the sordid stories. These are historical aversion tactics, not editorial medical advice.

[10653] Editor. Arculanus is Giovanni Arcolano; Rhasis is the Latinized name of Rhazes. Burton closes this sequence with another medical authority, before turning to the substitution of a different beloved. The commentary passage remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Withall as they do discommend the old, for the better affecting a more speedy alteration, they must commend another Paramour, alteram inducere, set him or her to be woed, or woe some other that shall be fairer, of better note, better fortune, birth, parentage, much to be preferred,	At the same time, as they disparage the former beloved, to bring about a quicker change they must praise another lover: "introduce another woman." Arrange for him or her to be courted, or to court someone more beautiful, of better standing, fortune, birth or family, and much to be preferred.[10654]
[10655]Invenies alium si te hic fastidit Alexis,	You will find another, if this Alexis scorns you.[10656]
by this means, which Jason Pratensis wisheth, to turn the stream of affection another way,	By this means, which Jason Pratensis recommends, turn the stream of affection in another direction:
Successore novo truditur omnis amor;	Every love is driven out by a new successor.[10657]
or as Valesius adviseth, by [10658]subdividing to diminish it, as a great River cut into many channels, runs low at last.	Or, as Valesius advises, diminish it by dividing it, as a great river, split into many channels, finally runs low.[10659]
[10660]Hortor & ut pariter binas habeatis amicas, &c.	And I urge you to have two mistresses at once, and so forth.[10661]

[10654] Editor. "Discommend" means disparage; "affecting" here has the force of bringing about. Paramour means lover. Alteram is feminine, while Burton's English extends the proposed substitution to either sex. Jason Pratensis and Valesius are cited later in this sequence; their exact passages remain uncollated.

[10655] Burton. Printed page 554, †: "Virg. Egl. 2."

[10656] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 2.73. The consulted text ends Alexin, the accusative "another Alexis"; Burton prints Alexis, producing the sense rendered here. The original poem concerns Corydon's love for Alexis, a young man; Burton applies the line to the replacement of a beloved generally.

[10657] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 462. The consulted text has vincitur, "is conquered," where Burton prints truditur, "is driven out." The modern column translates Burton's wording.

[10658] Burton. Printed page 554, i: "Distributio amoris fiat in plures, ad plures amicas animum applicet." "Let love be distributed among several; let him apply his mind to several mistresses."

[10659] Editor. The river divided into smaller streams also appears in Ovid, Remedies for Love 445. Burton gives Valesius's Latin instruction in the margin. These are reported literary and medical counsels, whose presence does not establish their efficacy.

[10660] Burton. Printed page 554, k: "Ovid."

[10661] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 441. Burton's quotation and the following English explanation are kept separately. "Amicas" here means lovers or mistresses.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If you suspect to be taken, be sure, saith the Poet, to have two mistresses at once, or go from one to another: as he that goes from a good fire in cold weather is loth to depart from it, though in the next room there be a better, which will refresh him as much; there's as much difference of hæc as hic ignis; or bring him to some publique shews, plays, meetings, where he may see variety, and he shall likely loath his first choice:	If you suspect you may be caught, make sure, says the poet, to have two mistresses at once, or go from one to another. A man beside a good fire in cold weather is reluctant to leave it, although a better one in the next room would comfort him just as much; there is as much difference in "this woman" as in "this fire." Or take him to public shows, plays or gatherings, where he can see a variety of people, and he will probably loathe his first choice.[10662]
carry him but to the next town, yea peradventure to the next house, and as Paris lost Oenones love by seeing Helena, and Cresseida forsook Troilus by conversing with Diomede, he will dislike his former mistress, and leave her quite behind him, as [10663]Theseus left Ariadne fast asleep in the Iland of Dia, to seek her fortune, that was er'st his loving Mistress.	Take him just to the next town, perhaps even the next house, and, as Paris lost his love for Oenone on seeing Helen, and Cressida forsook Troilus through her association with Diomedes, he will dislike his former mistress and leave her entirely behind him—as Theseus left Ariadne, once his loving mistress, fast asleep on the island of Dia to seek her own fortune.[10664]

[10662] Editor. The Latin plays on grammatical gender: hæc is feminine, "this woman"; hic ignis is masculine, "this fire." Burton makes the difficulty of leaving a familiar fire an analogy for attachment to a familiar beloved. "Refresh" means comfort or revive.

[10663] Burton. Printed page 554, †: "Higinus fab. 43."

[10664] Editor. "Lost Oenones love" is read as Paris losing his love for Oenone. Hyginus, Fable 43.1, confirms Theseus leaving Ariadne asleep on Dia: he fears disgrace if he brings her home; Liber, or Bacchus, then marries her. Burton places the abandonment among examples of displaced attachment. The consulted fable ends with Theseus marrying Phaedra, Ariadne's sister. "Er'st" means formerly.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10665]Nunc primum Dorida vetus amator contempsi, as he said, Doris is but a dowdy to this. As he that looks himself in a glass forgets his Physiognomie forthwith, this flattering glass of love will be diminished by remove; after a little absence it will be remitted, the next fair object will likely alter it.	"Now for the first time I, her long-standing lover, despised Doris," as he said: Doris is only a dowdy beside this woman. Just as someone who looks at himself in a mirror immediately forgets his features, so the power of this flattering mirror of love will diminish with a change of place. After a short absence it will weaken; the next beautiful person will probably change it.[10666]
A yong man in [10667]Lucian was pittifully in love, he came to the Theater by chance, and by seeing other fair objects there, mentis sanitatem recepit, was fully recovered, [10668]and went merrily home, as if he had taken a dram of oblivion.	A young man in Lucian was pitifully in love. He happened to come to the theatre and, on seeing other beautiful people there, "recovered his sanity": he was fully cured and went home cheerfully, as though he had taken a dose of forgetfulness.[10669]
Source page 554–555 [10670]A mouse (saith an Apologer) was brought up in a chest, there fed with fragments of bread and cheese, thought there could be no better meat, till coming forth at last, and feeding liberally of other variety of viands, loathed his former life: moralize this fable by thy self.	A mouse, says a writer of fables, was brought up in a chest and fed there on scraps of bread and cheese. It thought no better food could exist, until it finally came out and fed freely on a variety of other foods; then it loathed its former life. Apply the moral of this fable to yourself.[10671]

[10665] Burton. Printed page 554, *: "Petronius."

[10666] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon, in the description of Circe. The consulted text has Itaque tunc primum, "and so then for the first time," where Burton has Nunc primum, "now for the first time." A "dowdy" is an unattractive or shabbily dressed woman. "Remove" means change of place; "remitted" weakened. The mirror comparison recalls James 1:23–24, though Burton gives no citation here.

[10667] Burton. Printed page 554, a: "Lib. de salt."

[10668] Burton. Printed page 554, b: "E theatro egressus hilaris, ac si pharmacum oblivionis bibisset." "He left the theatre cheerful, as though he had drunk a drug of forgetfulness."

[10669] Editor. Lucian, On the Dance, describes an amorous spectator cured by seeing the harmful effects of passion, and a sorrowful spectator leaving cheerful as after a draught of forgetfulness. Burton recasts this as a particular young man cured by seeing other beautiful people; the distinction is retained. "Dram" is a small dose.

[10670] Burton. Printed page 554, c: "Mus in cista natus, &c." "A mouse born in a chest, etc."

[10671] Editor. An "Apologer" is a writer of apologues or fables, not an apologist in the modern sense. "Meat" and "viands" both mean food. Burton supplies no author for the mouse fable, which remains untraced.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 555 Plato in his seventh book De Legibus, hath a pretty fiction of a City under ground, [10672]to which by little holes, some small store of light came; the inhabitants thought there could not be a better place, and at their first coming abroad they might not endure the light, ægerrime solem intueri; but after they were accustomed a little to it, [10673]they deplored their fellows misery that lived under ground.	Plato, in the seventh book of his Laws, has an ingenious fiction about an underground city into which a little light entered through small holes. The inhabitants thought there could be no better place, and when they first came outside they could not bear the light: "they could scarcely look at the sun." But after growing a little accustomed to it, they pitied the misery of their companions who lived underground.[10674]
A silly Lover is in like state, none so fair as his Mistress at first, he cares for none but her; yet after a while when he hath compared her with others, he abhors her name, sight and memory. 'Tis generally true; for as he observes, [10675]Priorem flammam novus ignis extrudit; & ea multorum natura, ut præsentes maxime ament, One fire drives out another; and such is womens weakness, that they love commonly him that is present.	A foolish lover is in the same condition. At first no one is as beautiful as his mistress; he cares for no one else. Yet after a while, once he has compared her with others, he detests her name, her sight and her memory. It is generally true, for, as the writer observes, "a new fire drives out the former flame; and many people have it in their nature to love those present most." One fire drives out another, and such is women's weakness that they commonly love the man who is present.[10676]

[10672] Burton. Printed page 555, d: "In quem è specu subterraneo modicum lucis illabitur." "Into which a little light slips from an underground cave."

[10673] Burton. Printed page 555, e: "Deplorabant eorum miseriam qui subterraneis illis locis vitam degunt." "They pitied the misery of those who spend their lives in those underground places."

[10674] Editor. The cave allegory is in Plato's Republic, book 7, not Laws, book 7. Burton's description adapts the prisoners' emergence, difficulty with sunlight and pity for those remaining below. De Legibus is preserved in the original and translated literally as Laws; the correction belongs here.

[10675] Burton. Printed page 555, l: "Tatius lib. 6."

[10676] Editor. Tatius is Achilles Tatius. The Latin generalizes about "many people"; Burton's following English singles out women, then extends the observation to men. Both stages of the argument are preserved. The book 6 passage and Latin intermediary remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And so do many men (as he confessed) he loved Amye, till he saw Floriat, and when he saw Cynthia, forgat them both: but fair Phillis was incomparably beyond them all, Cloris surpassed her, and yet when he espied Amarillis, she was his sole Mistress; O divine Amarillis: quam procera, cupressi ad instar, quam elegans, quam decens! &c. how lovely, how tall, how comely she was, (saith Polemius) till he saw another, and then she was the sole subject of his thoughts. In conclusion, her he loves best he saw last.	And so do many men. As one confessed, he loved Amye until he saw Floriat; and when he saw Cynthia, he forgot them both. But beautiful Phillis was incomparably beyond them all; Cloris surpassed her; yet when he caught sight of Amaryllis, she became his only mistress. O divine Amaryllis! “How tall, like a cypress; how elegant, how graceful!” How lovely, how tall, how comely she was, says Polemius—until he saw another, who then became the sole subject of his thoughts. In the end, he loves best the woman he saw last.[10677]
[10678]Triton the Sea-God first loved Leucothoe, till he came in presence of Milæne, she was the commandress of his heart, till he saw Galatea[10679]; but (as she complains) he loved another eftsoons, another, and another.	Triton the sea god first loved Leucothoe, until he came into Milaene’s presence. She ruled his heart until he saw Galatea; but, as Galatea complains, before long he loved another, and another, and another.[10680]

[10677] Editor. The succession of names is preserved as Burton prints it, with Amaryllis normalized in the modern column. “Cupressi ad instar” compares her height to a cypress. Polemius and the precise source of this catalogue remain to be identified.

[10678] Burton. Printed page 555, †: “Aristænetus epist. 4.”

[10679] Burton. Printed page 555, *: “Calcagnin. Dial. Galat. Mox aliam prætulit, aliam prælaturus quam primum occasio arriserit.” “Calcagnini, Dialogue of Galatea. Soon he preferred another, ready to prefer yet another as soon as opportunity smiled on him.”

[10680] Editor. “Eftsoons” means soon afterwards or again. The margins offer both Aristaenetus, letter 4, and Calcagnini’s Dialogue of Galatea, without separate body markers for their relation. Both marginal entries are retained at this passage; their exact allocation and textual relationship require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis a thing which by Hieroms report, hath been usually practised. [10681]Heathen Philosophers drive out one love with another, as they do a peg, or pin with a pin. Which those seven Persian Princes did to Assuerus, that they might requite the desire of Queen Vashti with the love of others.	According to Jerome, this has commonly been practised. "Pagan philosophers drive out one love with another, as one peg or pin drives out another." The seven Persian princes did this for Ahasuerus, replacing his longing for Queen Vashti with love for other women.[10682]
Pausanias in Eliacis, saith, that therefore one Cupid was painted to contend with another, and to take the Garland from him, because one love drives out another.	Pausanias, in his account of Elis, says that this is why one Cupid was depicted contending with another and taking the garland from him: because one love drives out another.[10683]
[10684]Alterius vires subtrahit alter amor.	One love takes away another's strength.[10685]
and Tully 3. nat. deor. disputing with C. Cotta, makes mention of three several Cupids, all differing in office.	And Cicero, in book 3 of On the Nature of the Gods, debating with Gaius Cotta, mentions three separate Cupids, each with a different function.[10686]

[10681] Burton. Printed page 555, m: "Epist. lib. 2. 16. Philosophi sæculi veterem amorem novo, quasi clavum clavo repellere, quod & Assuero Regi septem Principes Persarum fecere, ut Vastæ Reginæ desiderium amore compensarent." "Letters, book 2, 16. The philosophers of the world drive out an old love with a new one, like one nail with another. The seven princes of Persia also did this for King Ahasuerus, to compensate by love for his longing for Queen Vashti."

[10682] Editor. Jerome, Letter 125.14 in the consulted numbering, rather than the margin's book 2, 16. Jerome continues by distinguishing replacing one fault with another from overcoming faults through opposing virtues. Burton selects the analogy and Persian example without that continuation. Assuerus is Ahasuerus; Vashta in the marginal Latin is Vashti.

[10683] Editor. Pausanias, Description of Greece 6.23.5, describes a relief of Love and Love Returned, with the latter trying to take a palm-branch from the former. Burton says "painted" and "Garland" and gives his own explanation in terms of one love displacing another. Eliacis means the account of Elis.

[10684] Burton. Printed page 555, n: "Ovid."

[10685] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 444. This line belongs to the same passage as the advice to keep two mistresses and the image of a river divided into channels.

[10686] Editor. Cicero, On the Nature of the Gods 3.60, lists three Cupids with different parentages, the third identified as Anteros. The list occurs in Cotta's speech. Burton's description "disputing with C. Cotta" and his emphasis on different functions are retained as his framing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Felix Plater in the first book of his observations, boasts how he cured a widower in Basil, a Patient of his, by this stratagem alone, that doted upon a poor servant his maid, when friends, children, no perswasion could serve to alienate his mind: they motioned him to another honest mans daughter in the Town, whom he loved, and lived with, long after, abhorring the very name and sight of the first.	Felix Plater, in the first book of his Observations, boasts that by this stratagem alone he cured a patient, a widower in Basel, who was infatuated with a poor woman employed as his maid. Friends, children and all persuasion had failed to turn his mind away. They proposed to him the daughter of another respectable man in the town; he loved her and lived with her long afterwards, detesting the very name and sight of the first woman.[10687]
After the death of Lucretia, [10688]Eurialus would admit of no comfort, till the Emperour Sigismond married him to a noble Lady of his Court, and so in short space he was freed.	After Lucretia's death, Euryalus would accept no comfort until the Emperor Sigismund married him to a noble lady of his court; then, in a short time, he was freed from his sorrow.[10689]

[10687] Editor. Basil is Basel. "Motioned him to" means proposed or directed his attention to a match; "honest" here means respectable. Plater's report of the widower's cure is preserved as a historical claim; the case itself remains uncollated.

[10688] Burton. Printed page 555, o: "Lugubri veste indutus, consolationes non admisit, donec Cæsar ex ducali sanguine, formosam virginem matrimonio conjunxit. Æneas Sylvius hist. de Eurialo & Lucretia." "Dressed in mourning, he admitted no consolation until the emperor joined him in marriage to a beautiful maiden of ducal blood. Aeneas Sylvius, History of Euryalus and Lucretia."

[10689] Editor. The ending of Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini's History of Two Lovers confirms Euryalus mourning Lucretia until the emperor marries him to a beautiful, chaste and prudent virgin of ducal descent. Burton's margin condenses this sentence; his "of his Court" and "in short space" are not specified there. The narrative then warns against love's bitter outcome. Burton uses the marriage as an example of recovery.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 556 SUBSECT. 6.	SUBSECTION 3[10690]
By counsel and perswasion, foulness of the fact, mens, womens faults, miseries of marriage, events of lust, &c.	By counsel and persuasion, the foulness of the deed, the faults of men and women, the miseries of marriage, the consequences of lust, and so forth
As there be divers causes of this burning lust, or heroical love; so there be many good remedies to ease and help; amongst which, good counsel and perswasion, which I should have handled in the first place, are of great moment, and not to be omitted. Many are of opinion, that in this blind head-strong passion, counsel can do no good.	As there are various causes of this burning lust, or heroic love, so there are many good remedies to relieve and help it. Among them, good counsel and persuasion, which I should have discussed first, are of great importance and must not be omitted. Many believe that counsel can do no good in this blind, headstrong passion.[10691]
[10692]Quæ enim res in se neque consilium neque modum Habet, ullo eam consilio regere non potes.	For a thing that has neither reason nor measure in itself You cannot govern by any counsel.[10693]
Which thing hath neither judgement, or an end, How should advice or counsel it amend?	A thing with neither judgment nor a limit— How should advice or counsel put it right?
—— [10694]Quis enim modus adsit amori?	For what limit can there be to love?[10695]

[10690] Editor. The scan prints “SUBSECT. 6.”, although the running head and the sequence identify this as Member 6, Subsection 3. The original column retains 6; the modern heading uses 3. “Fact” in the following heading means deed, and “events” consequences.

[10691] Editor. “Heroical love” is the historical category of lovesickness discussed throughout this member. “Moment” means importance or weight. Burton now turns from changing the object of desire to counsel and persuasion.

[10692] Burton. Printed page 556, p: “Ter.”

[10693] Editor. Terence, Eunuchus 57–58. The consulted text places ullum after habet; Burton instead prints ullo with consilio, “by any counsel.” The meaning follows Burton’s construction. His separate English couplet follows as a distinct version.

[10694] Burton. Printed page 556, †: “Virg. Egl. 2.”

[10695] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 2.68. Modus is a measure, limit or restraint. The poem supplies both this question and the earlier advice about finding another Alexis.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But without question, good counsel and advice must needs be of great force, especially if it shall proceed from a wise, fatherly, reverent, discreet person, a man of authority whom the parties do respect, stand in awe of, or from a judicious friend; of it self alone, it is able to divert and suffice.	Yet good counsel and advice must undoubtedly have great power, especially when they come from a wise, fatherly, venerable and prudent person, someone of authority whom the people concerned respect and stand in awe of, or from a friend of sound judgment. By itself, it can turn them aside and be sufficient.
Gordonius the Physitian attributes so much to it, that he would have it by all means used in the first place. Amoveatur ab illa, consilio viri quem timet, ostendendo pericula sæculi, judicium inferni, gaudia Paradisi.	The physician Gordonius gives it such weight that he insists it should be used first. “Let him be turned away from her by the counsel of a man he fears, who shows him the dangers of this world, the judgment of hell and the joys of Paradise.”[10696]
He would have some discreet men to disswade them, after the fury of passion is a little spent, or by absence allayed; for it is as intempestive at first, to give counsel, as to comfort parents when their children are in that instant departed; to no purpose to prescribe Narcoticks, Cordials, Nectarines, potions, Homers Nepenthes, or Helenas Boul, &c. Non cessabit pectus tundere, she will lament and howl for a season:	He would have prudent men dissuade them after the passion’s fury is somewhat spent or softened by absence. At first, giving counsel is as ill-timed as comforting parents at the very moment their children have died. It is useless to prescribe narcotics, cordials, nectar-like draughts, potions, Homer’s nepenthe or Helen’s bowl: “she will not stop beating her breast.” She will lament and howl for a time.[10697]

[10696] Editor. Gordonius is Bernard of Gordon. Sæculi refers to the present world; the Latin joins worldly danger to judgment and Paradise. The prescription belongs to Burton’s historical account; its precise medical source remains uncollated.

[10697] Editor. “Intempestive” means ill-timed. Cordials were preparations believed to strengthen or comfort the heart; “Nectarines” here denotes nectar-like draughts. Homer’s nepenthe and Helen’s bowl refer to the grief-banishing drink in Odyssey 4. The Latin breast-beating phrase is left unattributed by Burton.

Original text 1651	Modern English
let passion have his course a while, and then he may proceed, by fore-shewing the miserable events and dangers which will surely happen, the pains of hell, joys of Paradise, and the like, which by their preposterous courses they shall forfeit or incurre; and 'tis a fit method, a very good means: for what [10698]Seneca said of vice, I say of love, Sine magistro discitur, vix sine magistro deseritur, 'tis learned of it self, but hardly left without a Tutor.[10699]	Let passion run its course for a while; then he may proceed by setting out the miserable consequences and dangers that will surely follow, the pains of hell, the joys of Paradise and the like, which their perverse conduct will make them forfeit or incur. This is a fitting method, a very good means. For what Seneca said of vice I say of love: "It is learned without a teacher, but scarcely abandoned without one." It is learned by itself, but hardly left behind without a tutor.[10700]
'Tis not amiss therefore to have some such overseer, to expostulate and shew them such absurdities, inconveniences, imperfections, discontents, as usually follow; which their blindness, fury, madness, cannot apply unto themselves, or will not apprehend through weakness: and good for them to disclose themselves, to give ear to friendly admonitions.	It is therefore useful to have such a supervisor to reason with them and show them the absurdities, troubles, imperfections and discontents that usually follow. In their blindness, fury and madness they cannot apply these to themselves, or through weakness will not acknowledge them. It is good for them to disclose their feelings and listen to friendly warnings.
Tell me sweet-heart, (saith Tryphena to a love-sick Charmides in [10701]Lucian) what is that troubles thee; peradventure I can ease thy mind, and further thee in thy suit; and so without question she might, and so maist thou, if the Patient be capable of good counsel, and will hear at least what may be said.	"Tell me, sweetheart," says Tryphaena to the lovesick Charmides in Lucian, "what is troubling you. Perhaps I can ease your mind and help you in your courtship." Undoubtedly she could, and so can you, if the patient is receptive to good advice and will at least hear what can be said.[10702]

[10698] Burton. Printed page 556, †: "Lib. de beat. vit. cap. 14."

[10699] Burton. Printed page 556, *: "Longo usu discimus, longa desuetudine dediscendum est. Petrarch. epist. lib. 5. 8." "We learn by long practice; by long disuse we must unlearn. Petrarch, Letters, book 5, 8."

[10700] Editor. The maxim was not located in the consulted De vita beata, chapter 14, despite Burton's marginal reference; the attribution or chapter numbering requires further collation. The separate Petrarch margin describes learning by use and unlearning by disuse, rather than repeating the teacher maxim. "Preposterous" means perverse or disordered.

[10701] Burton. Printed page 556, †: "Tom. 4. dial. meret. Fortasse etiam ipsa ad amorem istum nonnihil contulero." "Volume 4, Dialogues of the Courtesans. Perhaps I myself may also contribute something to this love affair."

[10702] Editor. Tryphaena and Charmides belong to Lucian's Dialogues of the Courtesans. Burton turns the offer of help in a love affair into an example of receptive listening. The exact dialogue, translation and volume numbering remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 556–557 If he love at all, she is either an honest woman or a whore. If dishonest, let him read or inculcate to him that 5. of Solomons Prov. Ecclus. 26. Ambros. lib. 1. cap. 4. in his book of Abel and Cain, Philo Judæus de mercede mer. Platinas dial. in Amores, Espencæus and those three books of Pet. Hædus de contem. amoribus, Æneas Sylvius tart Epistle, which he wrote to his friend Nicholas of Warthurge, which he calls medelam illiciti amoris, &c.	If he loves at all, she is either a chaste woman or a whore. If she is unchaste, let him read, or have impressed upon him, the fifth chapter of Solomon's Proverbs; Ecclesiasticus 26; Ambrose, book 1, chapter 4 of Abel and Cain; Philo the Jew, On the Hire of a Prostitute; Platina's dialogue On Loves; Espencaeus; the three books of Petrus Haedus On Despising Loves; and Aeneas Sylvius's sharp letter to his friend Nicholas of Warthurge, which he calls "a remedy for illicit love," and so forth.[10703]
Source page 557 [10704]For what's an whore, as he saith, but a peler of youth, [10705]a ruine of men, a destruction, a devourer of patrimonies, a downfal of honour, fodder for the divel, the gate of death, and supplement of hell? [10706]Talis amor est laqueus animæ, &c. a bitter hony, sweet poyson, delicate destruction, a voluntary mischief, commixtum cœnum, sterquilinium.	"For what is a whore," as he says, "but a plunderer of youth, the ruin of men, a destroyer, a devourer of inheritances, the downfall of honour, fodder for the devil, the gate of death and a recruit for hell?" "Such love is a snare for the soul," and so forth: bitter honey, sweet poison, delicious destruction, a willingly chosen evil, "a mixture of filth, a dunghill."[10707]

[10703] Editor. "Honest" in this sexual classification means chaste; the harsh alternative is Burton's. Ecclesiasticus is Sirach. The abbreviations name a sequence of moral and literary authorities; expansions of mercede mer., in Amores and de contem. amoribus are provisional. "Tart" means sharp or severe. Warthurge is retained as the printed place-name; these references require exact collation.

[10704] Burton. Printed page 557, r: "Quid enim meretrix nisi juventutis expilatrix, virorum rapina seu mors; patrimonii devoratrix, honoris pernicies, pabulum diaboli, janua mortis, inferni supplementum?" "For what is a whore but a plunderer of youth, the ruin or death of men, a devourer of inheritance, the destruction of honour, fodder for the devil, the gate of death, a recruit for hell?"

[10705] Burton. Printed page 557, *: "Sanguinem hominum sorbent." "They suck men's blood."

[10706] Burton. Printed page 557, a: "Contemplatione Idiotæ c. 34. discrimen vitæ, mors blanda, mel felleum, dulce venenum, pernities delicata, malum spontaneum, &c." "In the Contemplation of the Idiot, chapter 34: a danger to life, a flattering death, honey mixed with gall, sweet poison, delicious destruction, a willingly chosen evil, etc."

[10707] Editor. A "peler" is a plunderer or one who strips another of property. The catalogue is moral invective, not a description to generalize about sex workers. The marginal "they suck men's blood" intensifies the metaphor. The work called Contemplation of the Idiot and the precise passage remain to be identified; "idiot" in such a title can denote an unlearned person.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And as [10708]Pet. Aratines Lucretia, a notable quean, confesseth; Gluttony, anger, envy, pride, sacriledge, theft, slaughter, were all born that day a whore began her profession: for as she follows it, her pride is greater then a rich churls, she is more envious then the pox, as malitious as melancholy, as covetous as hell. If from the beginning of the world any were mala, pejor, pessima, bad in the superlative degree, 'tis a whore; how many have I undone, caused to be wounded, slain! O Antonia thou seest [10709]what I am without, but within God knows, a puddle of iniquity, a sink of sin, a pocky quean.	And, as Lucretia, a notorious whore in Pietro Aretino, confesses: "Gluttony, anger, envy, pride, sacrilege, theft and slaughter were all born on the day a whore began her profession." As she goes on, "Her pride is greater than a rich miser's; she is more envious than the pox, as malicious as melancholy and as covetous as hell. If, from the beginning of the world, anyone has been bad, worse, worst—bad in the superlative degree—it is a whore. How many have I ruined, caused to be wounded or killed! O Antonia, you see what I am outwardly, but God knows what I am within: a puddle of iniquity, a sink of sin, a pox-ridden whore."[10710]
Let him now that so dotes, meditate on this; Let him see the event and success of others, Sampson, Hercules, Holofernes, &c. those infinite mischiefs attend it. If she be another mans wife he loves, 'tis abominable in the sight of God and men: adultery is expresly forbidden in Gods commandment, a mortal sin, able to endanger his soul: if he be such a one that fears God, or have any religion, he will eschew it, and abhor the loathsomness of his own fact.	Let the man who is so infatuated now reflect on this. Let him look at what happened to others—Samson, Hercules, Holofernes and the rest—and the countless evils that attend it. If the woman he loves is another man's wife, it is abominable in the sight of God and men. Adultery is expressly forbidden by God's commandment, a mortal sin that can endanger his soul. If he fears God or has any religion, he will avoid it and abhor the foulness of his own deed.[10711]

[10708] Burton. Printed page 557, b: "Pornodidasc. dial. Ital. gula, ira, invidia, superbia, sacrilegia, latrocinia, cædes, eo die nata sunt, quo primum meretrix professionem fecit. Superbia major quam opulenti rustici, invidia quam luis venereæ, inimicitia nocentior melancholia, avaritia in immensum profunda." "Pornodidascalus, Italian dialogue. Gluttony, anger, envy, pride, sacrilege, theft and slaughter were born on the day when a whore first entered her profession. Pride greater than a rich peasant's, envy greater than the venereal disease's, hostility more harmful than melancholy, greed infinitely deep."

[10709] Burton. Printed page 557, c: "Qualis extra sum vides, qualis intra novit Deus." "You see what I am outwardly; God knows what I am within."

[10710] Editor. Pietro Aretino's dialogue is cited through the Latin title Pornodidascalus. Burton calls the speaker Lucretia; the identity, wording and relation to Aretino's Italian require collation. "Churl" means a miserly or coarse person; "pocky" means afflicted with the pox. The comparisons personify disease and melancholy as part of the invective.

[10711] Editor. "Event and success" means outcome, without the modern implication of achievement. "Fact" means deed. Burton invokes Samson, Hercules and Holofernes as examples of destructive desire and frames adultery within his Christian moral argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If he love an honest maid, 'tis to abuse, or marry her: if to abuse, 'tis fornication, a foul fact, (though some make light of it) and almost equal to adultery it self. If to marry, let him seriously consider what he takes in hand, look before he leap, as the proverb is, or settle his affections, and examine first the party and condition of his estate and hers, whether it be a fit match, for fortunes, years, parentage, and such other circumstances, an sit suæ Veneris. Whether it be likely to proceed: if not, let him wisely stave himself off at the first, curb in his inordinate passion, and moderate his desire, by thinking of some other subject, divert his cogitations.	If he loves a chaste maiden, it is either to dishonour her or to marry her. If to dishonour her, it is fornication, a foul deed, though some make light of it, and almost equal to adultery itself. If to marry her, let him seriously consider what he undertakes: look before he leaps, as the proverb says, or fixes his affections. First examine the woman and the condition of his circumstances and hers: whether they are a suitable match in wealth, age, family and other such matters, "whether she is suited to his love," and whether it is likely to go ahead. If not, let him wisely hold himself back at the outset, curb his excessive passion and moderate his desire by turning his thoughts to another subject.[10712]
Or if it be not for his good, as Æneas forewarned by Mercury in a dream, left Dido's love, and in all hast got him to Sea,	Or, if it is not for his good, let him act as Aeneas did: warned by Mercury in a dream, he left Dido's love and hurried out to sea.[10713]
[10714]Mnesthea, Surgestumque vocat fortemque Cloanthem, Classem aptent taciti jubet ——	He calls Mnestheus, Surgestus and brave Cloanthus, And orders them to make the fleet ready in silence—[10715]
and although she did oppose with vows, tears, prayers, and imprecation,	And although she opposed him with vows, tears, prayers and curses,

[10712] Editor. "Abuse" here means sexually dishonour or seduce, not the full range of the modern term. "Estate" means circumstances or condition, including property and rank. The Latin an sit suæ Veneris is compressed and is rendered as suitability to his love; its exact source remains unidentified.

[10713] Editor. Burton combines episodes in Aeneid 4: Mercury's first warning, the preparations for departure and the later warning in a dream. The lines immediately quoted are from 4.288–289, before the dream; the sequence is Burton's compression.

[10714] Burton. Printed page 557, †: "Virg."

[10715] Editor. The consulted Virgil reads Sergestum and fortemque Serestum; the scan prints Surgestum and fortemque Cloanthem. Burton thus alters both names, and the original column retains them. The modern rendering gives their corresponding name forms, Surgestus and Cloanthus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— nullis ille movetur Fletibus, aut illas voces tractabilis audit;	No tears move him, Nor does he listen to those words with a yielding heart.[10716]
Source page 557–558 Let thy Mercury-reason rule thee against all allurements, seeming delights, pleasing inward or outward provocations. Thou maist do this if thou wilt, pater non deperit filiam, nec frater sororem, a father dotes not on his own daughter, a brother on a sister; and why? because it is unnatural, unlawful, unfit. If he be sickly, soft, deformed, let him think of his deformities, vices, infirmities: if in debt, let him ruminate how to pay his debts: if he be in any danger, let him seek to avoid it: if he have any law-suit, or other business, he may do well to let his love matters alone and follow it, labour in his vocation, what ever it is.	Let your Mercury—reason—govern you against all enticements, apparent delights and pleasing temptations from within or without. You can do this if you will. “A father does not dote on his daughter, nor a brother on his sister”: a father does not lust after his own daughter, nor a brother after his sister. Why? Because it is unnatural, unlawful and unfitting. If he is sickly, weak or deformed, let him think about his deformities, faults and infirmities. If in debt, let him ponder how to pay it; if in danger, let him seek to avoid it. If he has a lawsuit or other business, he would do well to leave his love affairs alone and attend to it, working at his calling, whatever it may be.[10717]

[10716] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.438–439. Burton replaces voces ullas with illas voces and changes their order. Tractabilis means yielding or susceptible to persuasion; the translation retains Burton’s “those words.”

[10717] Editor. Mercury becomes an image for the lover’s own reason. “Soft” means weak or lacking firmness, and “vocation” a calling or occupation. Burton’s absolute statement about incest is part of his moral argument, not an empirical claim established by this edition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 558 But if he cannot so ease himself, yet let him wisely premeditate of both their estates; if they be unequal in years, she yong and he old, what an unfit match must it needs be, an uneven yoak, how absurd and undecent a thing is it! as Lycinus in [10718]Lucian told Timolaus, for an old bald crook-nosed knave, to marry a yong wench; how odious a thing it is to see an old Leacher! what should a bald fellow do with a combe, a dumb doter with a pipe, a blind man with a looking-glass, and thou with such a wife? How absurd is it for a yong man to marry an old wife for a piece of good.	But if he cannot relieve himself in this way, let him still reflect prudently on both their circumstances. If their ages are unequal, she young and he old, what an unsuitable match it must be, an uneven yoke! How absurd and indecent for an old, bald, crooked-nosed scoundrel to marry a young woman, as Lycinus in Lucian told Timolaus. How odious to see an old lecher! What should a bald fellow do with a comb, a mute dotard with a pipe, a blind man with a mirror—or you with such a wife? How absurd for a young man to marry an old woman for a share of property.[10719]
But put case she be equal in years, birth, fortunes, and other qualities correspondent, he doth desire to be coupled in marriage, which is an honourable estate, but for what respects? Her beauty belike, and comeliness of person, that is commonly the main object, she is a most absolute form in his eye at least, Cui formam Paphia, & Charites tribuere decorem; but do other men affirm as much? Or is it an errour in his judgement?	But suppose her age, birth and wealth are equal to his, and her other qualities correspond. He wishes to be joined in marriage, which is an honourable condition—but for what reasons? Her beauty, presumably, and her bodily grace: that is usually the chief attraction. She is a perfect beauty, in his eyes at least, “to whom the Paphian goddess gave beauty, and the Graces grace.” But do other men say as much? Or is his judgment mistaken?[10720]

[10718] Burton. Printed page 558, f: “Tom. 2. in votis. Calvus cum sis, nasum habeas simum &c.” “Volume 2, On Wishes. Since you are bald and have a snub nose, etc.”

[10719] Editor. Lucian’s On Wishes is also called The Ship or The Wishes. The Latin margin calls Timolaus’s nose simum, “snub,” whereas Burton’s English says “crook-nosed”; both readings are retained. “A piece of good” means some property or wealth. In the consulted dialogue Lycinus mocks Timolaus’s wish for magical powers and universal attractiveness, rather than recounting a proposed marriage. The surrounding analogies require separate collation.

[10720] Editor. “Absolute” means complete or perfect. Paphia, the goddess of Paphos, is Venus; the Charites are the Graces. The unmarked Latin line is translated without supplying an unverified author. Burton asks whether desire has distorted the lover’s judgment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10721]Fallunt nos oculi vagique sensus, Oppressa ratione mentiuntur,	Our eyes and wandering senses deceive us; With reason overpowered, they lie.[10722]
our eys and other senses will commonly deceive us; It may be, to thee thy self upon a more serious examination, or after a little absence, she is not so fair as she seems. Quædam videntur & non sunt; Compare her to another standing by, 'tis a touchstone to try, confer hand to hand, body to body, face to face, eye to eye, nose to nose, neck to neck, &c. examine every part by it self, then altogether, in all postures, several sites, and tell me how thou likest her.	Our eyes and other senses commonly deceive us. Perhaps, even to you, on closer examination or after a short absence, she is not as beautiful as she seems. "Some things appear to be what they are not." Compare her with another woman standing beside her; that is a touchstone for the test. Compare hand with hand, body with body, face with face, eye with eye, nose with nose, neck with neck, and so on. Examine each part separately, then all together, in every posture and different position, and tell me how you like her.[10723]
It may be not she, that is so fair, but her coats, or put another in her cloaths, and she will seem all out as fair; as the [10724]Poet then prescribes, separate her from her cloaths: suppose thou saw her in a base beggers weed, or else dressed in some old hirsute attires out of fashion, fowl linnen, course raiment, besmeared with soot, colly, perfumed with Opoponax, Sagapenum, Assa fœtida, or some such filthy gums, dirty, about some undecent Action or other;	Perhaps it is her clothes, not she, that are so beautiful; put another woman in them and she will seem just as beautiful. As the poet therefore prescribes, separate her from her clothes. Imagine seeing her in a poor beggar's dress, or in some old, shaggy, unfashionable outfit, dirty linen and coarse clothing, smeared with soot and grime, scented with opopanax, sagapenum, asafoetida or other such foul-smelling gums, filthy and engaged in some unseemly activity.[10725]

[10721] Burton. Printed page 558, †: "Petronius."

[10722] Editor. The lines occur among the Fragmenta Petroniana, in the poem beginning Fallunt nos oculi. It goes on to compare a tower's changing appearance at a distance, illustrating the unreliability of the senses. Burton quotes only the opening two lines.

[10723] Editor. A touchstone tests precious metal and here means a test of quality. "Confer" means compare and "sites" positions. The Latin qualification, "some things appear and are not," concerns deceptive appearances; the modern version makes the implication explicit.

[10724] Burton. Printed page 558, r: "Ovid."

[10725] Editor. "Weed" means clothing, "hirsute" shaggy or rough, and "colly" soot or grime. The gums are named historically without prescribing their use. Ovid's Remedies for Love includes advice about clothing and inspecting the beloved's faults; Burton greatly expands the degrading catalogue.

Original text 1651	Modern English
or in such a case as [10726]Brassivola the Physitian found Malatasta his patient, after a potion of Hellebor, which he had prescribed: Manibus in terram depositis, & ano versus cœlum elevato (ac si videretur Socraticus ille Aristophanes, qui Geometricas figuras in terram scribens, tubera colligere videbatur) atram bilem in album parietem injiciebat, adeoque totam cameram, & se deturpabat, ut, &c. all to bewrayed, or worse; if thou saw'st her (I say) wouldst thou affect her as thou dost?	Or imagine her in the condition in which the physician Brasavola found his patient Malatasta after a dose of hellebore he had prescribed: "With his hands on the ground and his anus raised towards the sky—as though one were seeing that Socratic Aristophanes who, drawing geometrical figures on the ground, seemed to be gathering truffles—he squirted black bile onto a white wall, and so befouled the whole room and himself that," and so forth. Utterly fouled, or worse: if you saw her like this, I say, would you love her as you do?[10727]
Suppose thou beheldest her in a [10728]frosty morning, in cold weather, in some passion or perturbation of mind, weeping, chafing, &c. rivel'd and ill favoured to behold. She many times that in a composed look seems so amiable and delicious, tam scitula forma, if she do but laugh or smile, makes an ugly sparrow-mouthed face, and shews a pair of uneven, loathsom, rotten, foul teeth;	Suppose you saw her on a frosty morning, in cold weather, in some fit of passion or disturbance of mind, weeping or raging, wrinkled and ugly to look at. A woman who, with a composed expression, often seems so lovely and delightful, "so pretty in form," may, merely by laughing or smiling, make an ugly sparrow-mouthed face and reveal uneven, loathsome, rotten, dirty teeth.[10729]

[10726] Burton. Printed page 558, †: "In Catarticis lib. 2."

[10727] Editor. Brasavola's patient and the cited Cathartics remain uncollated. The Latin describes purging after hellebore in humoral terms: black bile. It prints the anomalous "Socraticus ille Aristophanes," literally "that Socratic Aristophanes," apparently invoking the comic school scene in Aristophanes's Clouds. The wording is retained rather than silently substituting Socrates. "All to bewrayed" means thoroughly befouled.

[10728] Burton. Printed page 558, u: "Si ferveat deformis, ecce formosa est; si frigeat formosa, jam sis informis. Th. Morus Epigram." "If an ugly woman is warm, behold, she is beautiful; if a beautiful woman is cold, you may now be ugly. Thomas More, Epigrams."

[10729] Editor. "Chafing" means raging or fretting, "rivel'd" wrinkled, and "scitula" pretty or neat. "A pair of … teeth" describes the set or rows collectively. The More margin switches from a woman in the third person to sis, "you may be"; this awkward printed reading is retained. Its warm/cold contrast and relation to Burton's frosty morning require collation with More.

Original text 1651	Modern English
She hath a black skin, gouty legs, a deformed crooked carkass under a fine coat. It may be for all her costly tires she is bald, and though she seem so fair by dark, by candle light, or afar off at such a distance, as Callicratides observed in [10730]Lucian, If thou shouldst see her neer, or in a morning, she would appear more ugly then a beast. [10731]Si, diligenter consideres, quid per os & nares & cæteres corporis meatus egreditur, vilius sterquilinium nunquam vidisti.	She has dark skin, gouty legs and a deformed, crooked body beneath a fine dress. Perhaps, for all her costly headdresses, she is bald; and although she seems so beautiful in darkness, by candlelight or at a distance, as Callicratidas observed in Lucian, "if you saw her close up or in the morning, she would seem uglier than a beast." "If you carefully consider what comes out through the mouth, nostrils and other passages of the body, you have never seen a viler dunghill."[10732]

[10730] Burton. Printed page 558, x: "Amorum dial. Tom. 4. si quis ad auroram contempletur multas mulieres à nocte lecto surgentes, turpiores putabit esse bestiis." "Dialogue of Loves, volume 4. If anyone observes many women at dawn rising from bed after the night, he will think them uglier than beasts."

[10731] Burton. Printed page 558, *: "Hugo de claustro Animæ, lib. 1. c. 1."

[10732] Editor. "Tires" means headdresses. Loves 39–40, transmitted under Lucian's name, places the morning comparison in Callicratidas's polemic against women during a debate about male and female love; criticism of cosmetics follows. Burton omits the detail that the beasts are unlucky to name at dawn. His dark-skin disparagement belongs to his historical rhetoric. The Latin intermediary and Hugo, De claustro animae, remain uncollated; these judgments are not editorial claims.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 559 Follow my counsell, see her undrest, see her, if it be possible, out of her attires, furtivis nudatam coloribus, it may be she is like Æsops Jay, or [10733]Plinies Cantharides, she will be loathsome, ridiculous, thou wilt not endure her sight: or suppose thou saw'st her sick, pale, in a consumption, on her death-bed, skin and bones, or now dead, Cujus erat gratissimus amplexus, as Barnard saith, erit horribilis aspectus;	Follow my advice: see her undressed; see her, if possible, without her finery, "stripped of her borrowed colours." Perhaps she is like Aesop's jay or Pliny's blister beetles: she will be repulsive and ridiculous; you will not bear to look at her. Or imagine seeing her ill, pale, wasting away, on her deathbed, skin and bones, or already dead: "She whose embrace was most delightful," as Bernard says, "will be horrible to look at."[10734]
Non redolet, sed olet, quæ redolere solet.	She who usually smells sweet now stinks, with no sweet scent.[10735]
As a posie, she smels sweet, is most fresh and fair one day, but dried up, withered, and stinks another. Beautifull Nireus, by that Homer so much admired, once dead, is more deformed then Thersites, and Solomon deceased as ugly as Marcolphus: thy lovely mistris, that was erst [10736]Charis charior ocellis, dearer to thee then thine eyes, once sick or departed, is	Like a posy, she smells sweet and is fresh and beautiful one day, but dried up, withered and stinking another. Beautiful Nireus, so greatly admired by Homer, once dead is uglier than Thersites; and Solomon, dead, is as ugly as Marcolphus. Your lovely mistress, who was once "Charis, dearer than one's eyes," dearer to you than your own eyes, once ill or dead is[10737]
Vili vilior æstimata cœno,	Judged fouler than foul mire,

[10733] Burton. Printed page 559, *: "Hist. nat. 11. cap. 35. A fly that hath golden wings but a poisoned body."

[10734] Editor. "Attires" means dress and ornaments; furtivis coloribus means borrowed or stolen colours. The jay recalls the fable of a bird adorned with others' feathers. Cantharides are blister beetles. The margin's chapter reference and the sentence attributed to Bernard require exact collation. "Consumption" here describes wasting. The passage continues Burton's historical rhetoric of bodily aversion.

[10735] Editor. The line plays on redolere, to smell sweet, and olere, to smell, here stink. Its source is not specified. The feminine relative pronoun can refer to the woman or to the fading flower of the next sentence.

[10736] Burton. Printed page 559, †: "Buchanan, Hendecasyll."

[10737] Editor. Nireus is handsome, Thersites ugly; Marcolphus belongs to Solomon folklore. "Erst" means formerly. Buchanan's Ad eandem (scan, p. 113) supplies both fragments, with aestimata before ocellis. Burton omits it and applies a contrast about Neaera's chastity to illness and death. Charis is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
worse then any durt or dunghill. Her embraces were not so acceptable, as now her looks be terrible: thou hadst better behold a Gorgons head, then Helenas carkase.	worse than any dirt or dunghill. Her embraces were never so welcome as her appearance is now terrible. You would do better to look at a Gorgon's head than at Helen's corpse.[10738]
Some are of opinion, that to see a woman naked is able of it self to alter his affection; and it is worthy of consideration, saith [10739]Montaigne the Frenchman in his Essaies, that the skilfullest masters of amorous dalliance, appoint for a remedy of venerous passions, a full survey of the body; which the Poet insinuates,	Some think that seeing a woman naked can itself change a man's affection. It is worth considering, says the Frenchman Montaigne in his Essays, that the most skilful masters of amorous play prescribe a full view of the body as a remedy for sexual passions. The poet suggests as much:[10740]
[10741]Ille quod obscœnas in aperto corpore partes Viderat, in cursu qui fuit, hæsit amor.	Because he had seen the private parts of the naked body, The love that had been racing came to a halt.[10742]
The love stood still, that ran in full cariere, When once it saw those parts should not appear.	The love that ran at full speed stood still Once it saw those parts that should stay hidden.
It is reported of Seleucus King of Syria, that seeing his wife Stratonices bald pate, as she was undressing her by chance, he could never affect her after. Remundus Lullius the Physitian, spying an ulcer or canker in his mistris breast, whom he so dearly loved, from that day following abhorr'd the looks of her.	It is reported that Seleucus, king of Syria, happened to see his wife Stratonice's bald head as she undressed and could never love her afterwards. The physician Raymond Lull, discovering an ulcer or cancer in the breast of the mistress he loved so dearly, abhorred the sight of her from that day on.[10743]

[10738] Editor. A Gorgon's gaze was petrifying in myth. Burton contrasts the beloved's living embrace with the corpse; the comparison is part of his argument about impermanence, not a judgment supplied by the modern editor.

[10739] Burton. Printed page 559, y: "Apol. pro Rem. Seb." "Apology for Raymond Sebond."

[10740] Editor. Montaigne, Essays 2.12, "Apology for Raymond Sebond," includes this counsel and quotes the same Ovid couplet. "Venerous" means sexual or pertaining to Venus. The consulted translation confirms the sequence; Burton's precise relation to the earlier English translations remains for collation.

[10741] Burton. Printed page 559, z: "Ovid. 2. rem."

[10742] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 429–430. The quoted two-line sentence is retained, followed by Burton's own separate English version. "Cariere" in that version is a rapid course or gallop.

[10743] Editor. "Affect" means love or desire. "Canker" may denote a cancerous sore. These are reported anecdotes about Seleucus and Raymond Lull, not verified medical or biographical accounts; their sources and historical identities require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Philip the French King as Neubrigensis, lib. 4. cap. 24. relates it, married the King of Denmarks daughter, [10744]and after he had used her as a wife one night, because her breath stunk, they say, or for some other secret fault, sent her back again to her father.	Philip, king of France, as William of Newburgh relates in book 4, chapter 24, married the king of Denmark's daughter; after sleeping with her as his wife for one night, he sent her back to her father, they say, because her breath stank or because of some other hidden defect.[10745]
Peter Mattheus in the life of Lewis the eleaventh, findes fault with our English [10746]Chronicles, for writing how Margaret the King of Scots daughter and wife to Lewis the 11. French King, was ob graveolentiam oris rejected by her husband.	Pierre Matthieu, in his life of Louis XI, criticizes our English chronicles for saying that Margaret, daughter of the king of Scots and wife of Louis XI of France, was rejected by her husband "because of the foul smell of her breath."[10747]
Many such matches are made for by-respects, or some seemly comeliness, which after hony moons past, turn to bitterness: for burning lust is but a flash, a gunpowder passion; and hatred oft follows in the highest degree, dislike and contempt.	Many such marriages are made for ulterior considerations or some outward beauty; after the honeymoon is past they turn to bitterness. Burning lust is only a flash, a gunpowder passion; intense hatred often follows, along with dislike and contempt.[10748]
—— [10749]Cum se cutis arida laxat, Fiunt obscuri dentes:	When the dry skin sags And the teeth grow dark:

[10744] Burton. Printed page 559, a: "Post unam noctem incertum unde offensam cepit, propter fœtentem ejus spiritum alii dicunt, vel latentem fœditatem repudiavit, rem faciens plane illicitam, & regiæ personæ multum indecoram." "After one night he took offence, for an uncertain reason; some say because of her foul breath, or he rejected her because of a hidden foulness, doing something plainly unlawful and highly unbecoming a royal person."

[10745] Editor. The consulted William of Newburgh places this episode at 4.26, not 4.24, and calls the woman the Danish king's sister, not daughter. He reports several alleged causes, says the actual reason was unknown, and condemns the repudiation. Burton's different kinship, numbering and return-to-father detail are preserved as his account.

[10746] Burton. Printed page 559, †: "Hall and Grafton belike."

[10747] Editor. Peter Mattheus is Pierre Matthieu. "Belike" in Burton's margin means probably: he tentatively names Edward Hall and Richard Grafton. The sentence reports Matthieu's objection to a story, not the editor's acceptance of that story. Its precise historical sources remain uncollated.

[10748] Editor. "By-respects" are subsidiary or ulterior motives. "Gunpowder passion" makes desire an intense but short-lived flash. Burton moves from particular stories to a general warning about marriages founded on appearance.

[10749] Burton. Printed page 559, *: "Juvenal."

Original text 1651	Modern English
when they wax old, and ilfavoured, they may commonly no longer abide them.	when women grow old and unattractive, their lovers commonly cannot bear them any longer.[10750]
—— Jam gravis es nobis, be gone, they grow stale, fulsome, loathsome, odious, thou art a beastly filthy queane,	"Now you are a burden to us"—be gone! They grow stale, disgusting, repulsive, hateful: you are a beastly, filthy slut,
—— [10751]faciem Phœbi cacantis habes,	You have the face of Phoebus taking a shit,[10752]
thou art Saturni podex, withered and dry, insipida & vetula,	you are "Saturn's arse," withered and dried up, "insipid and old,"
—— [10753]Te quia rugæ turpant, & capitis nives,	Because wrinkles and the snow upon your head disfigure you,[10754]
(I say) be gone, [10755]portæ patent, proficiscere.	be gone, I say: "The gates are open; depart."[10756]

[10750] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.144–148, supplies the sagging skin, dark teeth and subsequent iam gravis es nobis. Burton changes the conditional laxet and fiant of the consulted text to laxat and fiunt and excerpts the surrounding dismissal. The implied agents of "abide them" are the women's lovers or husbands.

[10751] Burton. Printed page 559, †: "Mart."

[10752] Editor. Martial 3.89.2 addresses a man: nam faciem durum, Phoebe, cacantis habes, "Phoebus, you have the face of someone passing hard stool." Burton omits durum and prints Phœbi, a genitive, producing "the face of Phoebus defecating." The modern column follows that printed construction and retains the vulgarity. The following "Saturn's arse" is another insult, not a verified continuation of Martial.

[10753] Burton. Printed page 559, *: "Hor. ode. 13. lib. 4." "Horace, Odes, book 4, ode 13."

[10754] Editor. Horace, Odes 4.13.11–12. The "snow" is white hair. Burton excerpts and joins the clauses within his catalogue of insults; the modern wording follows that arrangement.

[10755] Burton. Printed page 559, *: "Tully in Cat." "Cicero, Against Catiline."

[10756] Editor. Cicero, Against Catiline 1.10, has patent portae; proficiscere. Burton reverses the first two words and transfers the political command to his imagined rejection of an ageing lover. The margin appears above the Horace entry but belongs to this final phrase.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 560 Yea but you will infer, your mistris is compleat, of a most absolute form in all mens opinions, no exceptions can be taken at her, nothing may be added to her person, nothing detracted, she is the mirror of women for her beauty, comeliness and pleasant grace, unimitable, meræ delitiæ, meri lepores, she is Myrothetium Veneris, Gratiarum pixis, a meer magazine of naturall perfections, she hath all the Veneres, and Graces,	Yes, but you will argue that your mistress is perfect, with a faultless figure in everyone's opinion. No objection can be made to her: nothing can be added to her appearance or taken away. In beauty, comeliness and pleasing grace she is the model of womanhood, beyond imitation, "sheer delight, sheer charm"; she is "Venus's perfume box, the casket of the Graces," a complete storehouse of natural perfections. She has all the charms of Venus and all the Graces,[10757]
—— mille faces & mille figuras,	A thousand torches and a thousand forms,[10758]
in each part absolute and compleat,	perfect and complete in every part,
[10759]Læta genas, læta os roseum, vaga lumina læta:	Radiant in her cheeks, radiant in her rosy mouth, radiant in her roving eyes:[10760]
to be admired for her person, a most incomparable, unmatchable peece, aurea proles, ad simulachrum alicuius numinis composita, a Phœnix, vernantis ætatulæ Venerilla, a Nymph, a Fairy, [10761]like Venus her self when she was a maid, nulli secunda, a meer quintessence, flores spirans & amaracum, fœminæ prodigium: Put case she be, how long will she continue?	admirable in her appearance, an utterly incomparable, matchless creature, "a golden offspring, fashioned in the likeness of some divinity, a phoenix, a little Venus in the bloom of youth," a nymph, a fairy, like Venus herself when she was a maiden, "second to none," perfection distilled, "breathing flowers and marjoram, a wonder of a woman." Suppose she is: how long will she remain so?[10762]

[10757] Editor. "Mirror" means model or exemplar; "magazine" means storehouse. Myrothetium is a perfume container and pixis a small box. The extravagant praise prepares Burton's answer that even supposedly perfect beauty cannot endure.

[10758] Editor. Faces is the Latin plural of fax, a torch or flame, not the English "faces." The fragment combines the imagery of kindled desire and manifold forms. It is left without a verified attribution.

[10759] Burton. Printed page 560, †: "Lochæus."

[10760] Editor. The Latin uses accusatives of respect: radiant as to cheeks, mouth and eyes. "Lochæus" is preserved as the marginal attribution; the name and exact poem remain unresolved.

[10761] Burton. Printed page 560, †: "Qualis fuit Venus cum fuit virgo, balsamum spirans, &c." "Such as Venus was when she was a maiden, breathing balsam, etc."

[10762] Editor. "Quintessence" means the purest concentrated essence; Venerilla is a diminutive of Venus, and ætatula a tender or youthful age. Nulli secunda means second to none. The short marginal comparison with the maiden Venus has no named source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10763]Florem decoris singuli carpunt dies:	Each passing day plucks away the flower of beauty.[10764]
Every day detracts from her person, and this beauty is bonum fragile, a meer flash, a Venice glass, quickly broken,	Every day takes something from her appearance; this beauty is "a fragile good," a mere flash, a Venetian glass, quickly broken,
[10765]Anceps forma bonum mortalibus, —— exigui donum breve temporis,	Beauty is a doubtful blessing for mortals, A brief gift of a little time.[10766]
it will not last. As that fair flower [10767]Adonis, which we call an Anemony, flourisheth but one month, this gracious all commanding beauty fades in an instant. It is a jewell soon lost, the painters Goddesse, falsa veritas, a mere picture. Favour is deceitfull, and beauty is vanity, Prov. 31. 30.	It will not last. As that beautiful flower of Adonis, which we call an anemone, blooms for only a month, so this graceful, all-commanding beauty fades in an instant. It is a jewel soon lost, the painter's goddess, "a false truth," a mere picture. "Charm is deceptive, and beauty is fleeting," Proverbs 31:30.[10768]
[10769]Vitrea gemmula, fluxaq; bullula, candida forma est, Nix, Rosa, ros, fumus, ventus & aura, nihil.	Fair beauty is a little glass jewel, a passing bubble, Snow, a rose, dew, smoke, wind and a breeze—nothing.[10770]

[10763] Burton. Printed page 560, *: "Seneca."

[10764] Editor. The line occurs at Octavia 550, in the character Seneca's reply to Nero. Burton's margin simply says "Seneca"; the work is transmitted in the Senecan dramatic corpus. Attribution and textual history should be distinguished from the speaker's name.

[10765] Burton. Printed page 560, a: "Seneca Hyp." "Seneca, Hippolytus."

[10766] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 761–762, also called Hippolytus. Anceps means uncertain, two-sided or perilous: beauty is a doubtful blessing. Venetian glass supplies a separate image of fragility in Burton's surrounding prose.

[10767] Burton. Printed page 560, b: "Camerarius emb. 68 cent. 1. flos omnium pulcherrimus statim languescit, formæ typus." "Camerarius, Emblems, first century, 68. The most beautiful of all flowers immediately withers: an emblem of beauty."

[10768] Editor. "Favour" means pleasing appearance or charm; "vanity" transience or emptiness. The flower and one-month claim belong to Burton's emblematic comparison. Camerarius's marginal reference is retained for collation; it is not a modern botanical finding.

[10769] Burton. Printed page 560, †: "Bernart. Bauhusius Ep. l. 4."

[10770] Editor. Candida forma is fair or radiant beauty, while Burton's English version says "beauty pale." Gemmula and bullula are diminutives, rendered "little jewel" and "bubble." The abbreviated Bauhusius attribution and numbering are reproduced without claiming the poem has been independently located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A brittle Jem, bubble, is beauty pale, A Rose, dew, snow, smoke, winde, air, naught at all.	Pale beauty is a brittle gem, a bubble, A rose, dew, snow, smoke, wind, air—nothing at all.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If she be fair, as the saying is, she is commonly a fool: if proud, scornfull, sequiturq; superbia formam, or dishonest, rara est concordia formæ atq; pudicitiæ, can she be fair and honest too? [10771]Aristo the son of Agesicles married a Spartan lass, the fairest Lady in all Greece next to Helen, but for her conditions the most abominable, and beastly creature of the world.	If she is beautiful, as the saying goes, she is commonly a fool; if proud, she is scornful, "and pride follows beauty"; or she is unchaste, for "beauty and chastity seldom agree." Can she be beautiful and chaste too? Ariston, son of Agesicles, married a Spartan girl, the most beautiful woman in all Greece after Helen, but in character the most abominable, beastly creature in the world.[10772]
So that I would wish thee to respect, with [10773]Seneca, not her person but qualities. Will you say that's a good blade which hath a guilded scabbard, imbroidered with gold, and Jewels? No, but that which hath a good edge and point, well tempered mettle, able to resist.	So I would have you follow Seneca in valuing her qualities rather than her appearance. Will you call a blade good because it has a gilded scabbard, decorated with gold and jewels? No: call it good if it has a good edge and point, well-tempered metal and the strength to withstand resistance.[10774]

[10771] Burton. Printed page 560, a: "Pausanias Lacon. lib. 3. uxorem duxit Spartæ mulierum omnium post Helenam formosissimam, at ob mores omnium turpissimam." "Pausanias, Laconia, book 3. He married the most beautiful of all the women of Sparta after Helen, but in character the foulest of them all."

[10772] Editor. Pausanias 3.7.7 says that Ariston's wife had been the ugliest girl in Sparta and became the most beautiful through Helen's intervention. It does not make Burton's allegation about her character. His body text and Latin margin are both retained, but this discrepancy is material. "Honest" here means chaste; "conditions" character or disposition.

[10773] Burton. Printed page 560, b: "Epist. 76. gladium bonum dices, non cui deauratus est baltheus, nec cui vagina gemmis distinguitur, sed cui ad secandum subtilis acies & mucro munimentum omne rupturus." "Letter 76. You will call a sword good, not because its belt is gilded or its scabbard decorated with jewels, but because it has a keen cutting edge and a point that will break through every defence."

[10774] Editor. Seneca, Letter 76.14, compares a good sword's practical edge and point with its decorated belt and scabbard. Burton's English compresses the equipment into a scabbard; his Latin margin retains baltheus, belt. The consulted Latin has auratus and an explicit est after acies. His adaptation remains visible in both columns.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This beauty is of the body alone, and what is that, but as [10775]Gregory Nazianzen telleth us, A mock of time and sickness? or as Boëthius, [10776]as mutable as a flowre, and 'tis not nature so makes us, but most part the infirmity of the beholder.	This beauty belongs to the body alone; and what is it but, as Gregory Nazianzen tells us, "the plaything of time and sickness"? Or, as Boethius says, "as changeable as a flower"; it is not nature that makes us seem so, but chiefly the weakness of the beholder.[10777]
For ask another, he sees no such matter: Dic mihi per gratias qualis tibi videtur, I pray thee tell me how thou likest my sweet-heart, as she asked her sister in Aristænætus, [10778]whom I so much admire, me thinks he is the sweetest gentleman, the properest man that ever I saw: but I am in love, I confess, (nec pudet fateri) and cannot therefore well judge.	Ask someone else: he sees nothing of the sort. "Please tell me what you think of him"—tell me, I beg you, how you like my sweetheart, as the woman in Aristaenetus asked her sister: "I admire him so much; I think he is the sweetest gentleman, the handsomest man I ever saw. But I am in love, I confess"—"and I am not ashamed to admit it"—"so I cannot judge properly."[10779]
But be she fair indeed, golden-haired, as Anacreon his Bathillus, (to examine particulars) she have	But suppose she is truly beautiful, golden-haired like Anacreon's Bathyllus; to examine the details, suppose she has[10780]
[10781]Flammeolos oculos, collaq; lacteola,	Little fiery eyes and a milk-white neck,

[10775] Burton. Printed page 560, h: "Pulchritudo corporis, temporis & morbi ludibrium. orat. 3." "Bodily beauty, the plaything of time and sickness. Oration 3."

[10776] Burton. Printed page 560, c: "Florum mutabilitate fugacior, nec sua natura formosas facit, sed spectantium infirmitas." "More fleeting than the changefulness of flowers; it is not their own nature that makes women beautiful, but the weakness of those who look at them."

[10777] Editor. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 3, prose 8, compares beauty's transience with spring flowers and attributes its appearance to the weakness of the observer's eyes. Burton's margin compresses and recasts that passage. Gregory's attribution and oration number remain to be collated.

[10778] Burton. Printed page 560, †: "Epist. 11. Quem ego depereo Juvenis mihi pulcherrimus videtur; sed forsan amore percita de amore non recte judico." "Letter 11. The young man I love desperately seems most beautiful to me; but perhaps, stirred by love, I do not judge love rightly."

[10779] Editor. "Properest" means most handsome or well-formed. Burton juxtaposes a Latin request, its English gloss, a longer speech and an additional Latin aside. All are retained in sequence. The Aristaenetus letter and the relation between its text and Burton's version remain for collation.

[10780] Editor. Bathyllus is the beloved named in the Anacreontic tradition. The named comparison is retained without treating the catalogue of features as a continuous quotation from one poem. The following Luc. Brugensis abbreviation remains unexpanded pending exact identification.

[10781] Burton. Printed page 560, †: "Luc. Brugensis."

Original text 1651	Modern English
a pure sanguine complexion, little mouth, corall lips, white teeth, soft and plump neck, body, hands, feet, all fair and lovely to behold, composed of all graces, elegances, an absolute piece,	a clear, rosy complexion, a little mouth, coral lips, white teeth, a soft, plump neck, body, hands and feet, all beautiful and lovely to look at, made up of every grace and elegance, a perfect creation,
Source page 561 [10782]Lumina sint Melitæ Junonia, dextra Minervæ, Mamillæ Veneris, sura maris dominæ, &c.	Let Melita's eyes be Juno's, her right hand Minerva's, Her breasts Venus's, her calf the sea goddess's, and so on.[10783]
Let [10784]her head be from Prage, paps out of Austria, belly from France, back from Brabant, hands out of England, feet from Rhine, buttocks from Switzerland, let her have the Spanish gate, the Venetian tyre, Italian complement and endowments;	Let her head come from Prague, her breasts from Austria, her belly from France, her back from Brabant, her hands from England, her feet from the Rhineland and her buttocks from Switzerland. Let her have the Spanish walk, Venetian dress, Italian courtesy and accomplishments:[10785]
[10786]Candida sydereis ardescant lumina flammis, Sudent colla rosas, & cedat crinibus aurum, Mellea purpuream depromant ora ruborem; Fulgeat, ac Venerem cœlesti corpore vincat, Forma dearum omnis, &c.	Let bright eyes blaze with starry fires, Let her neck breathe roses, and gold yield to her hair; Let honeyed lips reveal a crimson blush; Let her shine and surpass Venus with her heavenly body, The beauty of all the goddesses, and so forth.[10787]

[10782] Burton. Printed page 561, †: "Idem." "The same author."

[10783] Editor. "Idem" refers back to Luc. Brugensis on the previous page. The line assembles divine features; sura is the calf of the leg. "The sea goddess" renders maris dominæ without imposing an unverified proper name. The precise poem remains uncollated.

[10784] Burton. Printed page 561, d: "Bebelius adagiis Ger." "Bebel, German Proverbs."

[10785] Editor. "Paps" means breasts, "gate" gait, "tyre" dress or adornment, and "complement" courteous manners or accomplishments. The national and regional catalogue is a literary commonplace cited to Bebel; its precise proverb remains uncollated, and it is not demographic evidence.

[10786] Burton. Printed page 561, †: "Petron. Cat."

[10787] Editor. The margin attributes this poem to Petronius, but it was not located in the consulted Satiricon or Fragmenta Petroniana. Sudent literally means "let them sweat," here rendered as exuding a rose scent. The printed purpuream does not agree with masculine ruborem; the final line is also syntactically loose. The translation preserves the imagery without claiming a settled text or attribution.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Let her be such a one throughout, as Lucian deciphers in his Imagines, as Euphanor of old painted Venus, Aristænætus describes Lais, another Helena, Chariclia, Leucippe, Lucretia, Pandora; let her have a box of beauty to repair her self still, such a one as Venus gave Phaon, when he carried her over the Ford; let her use all helps art and nature can yeeld; be like her, and her, and whom thou wilt, or all these in one;	Let her be altogether such a woman as Lucian portrays in his Portraits, as Euphanor painted Venus long ago, or as Aristaenetus describes Lais: another Helen, Chariclea, Leucippe, Lucretia or Pandora. Let her have a box of beauty with which to renew herself continually, like the one Venus gave Phaon when he ferried her across the water. Let her use every aid that art and nature can supply; let her be like this woman, and that woman, and whomever you please, or all of them in one.[10788]
A little sickness, a Feaver, small pox, wound, scarre, loss of an eye, or limb, a violent passion, a distemperature of heat or cold, marres all in an instant, disfigures all; child-bearing, old age, that tyrant time will turn Venus to Erynnis; raging time, care, rivels her upon a sudden; after she hath been married a small while, and the black oxe hath trodden on her toe, she will be so much altered, and wax out of favour, thou wilt not know her.	A little illness, a fever, smallpox, a wound, a scar, the loss of an eye or a limb, a violent passion, an imbalance of heat or cold, spoils and disfigures everything in an instant. Childbearing, old age and that tyrant time will turn Venus into a Fury. Ravaging time and care wrinkle her suddenly. After she has been married a little while and the black ox has trodden on her toe, she will be so changed and lose so much of her beauty that you will not know her.[10789]

[10788] Editor. “Deciphers” means portrays. Lucian’s Imagines, or Portraits, 4–8 combines features of several sculptures, paintings and poetic descriptions into a woman’s likeness. In section 7, Euphranor supplies hair coloured like his Hera’s. This confirms the composite portrait, but does not identify Burton’s separate claim about Euphanor painting Venus. His name remains as printed; the precise Aristaenetus and Phaon references remain uncollated.

[10789] Editor. Erynnis is a Fury. The black ox treading on someone’s toe is a proverbial image of trouble or adversity; it is retained with this explanation. “Out of favour” here means losing beauty. The supposed transformation is Burton’s historical rhetoric about ageing and misfortune.

Original text 1651	Modern English
One growes too fat, another too lean, &c. modest Matilda, pretty pleasing Peg, sweet singing Susan, mincing merry Moll, dainty dancing Doll, neat Nancy, Jolly Jone, nimble Nel, kissing Kate, bouncing Besse with black eyes, fair Phillis with fine white hands, fidling Franck, tall Tib, slender Sib, &c. will quickly loose their grace, grow fulsome, stale, sad, heavy, dull, sour, and all at last out of fashion. Ubi jam vultus argutia, suavis suaviatio, blandus risus, &c.	One grows too fat, another too thin, and so on. Modest Matilda, pretty pleasing Peg, sweet-singing Susan, mincing merry Moll, dainty dancing Doll, neat Nancy, jolly Joan, nimble Nell, kissing Kate, buxom Bess with her black eyes, fair Phillis with her fine white hands, fiddling Frank, tall Tib, slender Sib, and the rest will soon lose their grace, become repellent, stale, gloomy, heavy, dull and sour, and at last all go out of fashion. "Where now are the lively expression, the sweet kisses, the winning smile?" and so on.[10790]
Those fair sparkling eyes will look dull, her soft corall lips will be pale, dry, cold, rough, and blew, her skin rugged, that soft and tender superficies will be hard and harsh, her whole complexion change in a moment, and as [10791]Matilda writ to King John.	Those beautiful sparkling eyes will look dull; her soft coral lips will become pale, dry, cold, rough and blue; her skin will grow coarse, that soft and tender surface hard and harsh. Her entire complexion will change in a moment, as Matilda wrote to King John:[10792]
I am not now as when thou saw'st me last, That favour soon is vanished and past; That Rosie blush lapt in a Lilly vale, Now is with morphew overgrown and pale.	I am not now as when you saw me last; That beauty soon has vanished and is past. That rosy blush enfolded in a lily vale Is now blotched over, discoloured and pale.
'Tis so in the rest, their beautie fades as a tree in winter, which Deianira hath elegantly expressed in the Poet,	So it is with the rest: their beauty fades like a tree in winter, as Deianira elegantly expresses it in the poet:

[10790] Editor. The sequence preserves the familiar names and their alliteration where possible. "Mincing" suggests affectedly dainty movement; "bouncing" a buxom, vigorous figure; "fulsome" offensive or cloying. The unattributed Latin asks where the former animation, kissing and smile have gone.

[10791] Burton. Printed page 561, *: "M. Draiton."

[10792] Editor. The quotation is from Drayton's "Matilda to King John," lines 157–160 as counted in the TCP transcription of the 1603 volume. Its last line begins Now with the Morphew, against Burton's Now is with morphew. Matilda continues by describing tear-worn cheeks and vanished beauty. This is a literary epistle. "Lapt" means enfolded; "morphew" a blotchy skin discoloration. Burton's version is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10793]Deforme solis aspicis truncis nemus? Sic nostra longum forma percurrens iter, Deperdit aliquid semper, & fulget minus, Malisq; minus est quicquid in nobis fuit, Olim petitum cecidit, & partu labat, Materq; multum rapuit ex illa mihi, Ætas citato senior eripuit gradu.	Do you see the wood, ugly with nothing but trunks? So our beauty, travelling its long road, Always loses something and shines less; Whatever we had is diminished by afflictions. What was once desired has fallen, and droops through childbirth; Motherhood has taken much of that beauty from me, And advancing age has snatched it away with hurried step.[10794]
Source page 561–562 And as a tree that in the green wood growes, With fruit and leaves, and in the Summer blowes, In winter like a stock deformed showes: Our beauty takes his race and journey goes, And doth decrease, and loose, and come to nought; Admir'd of old, to this by child-birth brought: And mother hath bereft me of my grace, And crooked old age coming on apace.	As a tree that grows in the green wood, With fruit and leaves, and blossoms in the summer, Looks ugly as a bare trunk in the winter, So our beauty runs its course and travels on, Dwindles, loses and comes to nothing. Once admired, childbirth has brought me to this; Motherhood has robbed me of my grace, And bent old age comes quickly on.

[10793] Burton. Printed page 561, e: "Senec. act. 2. Herc. Oetæo." "Seneca, Hercules on Oeta, act 2."

[10794] Editor. Hercules Oetaeus 384–390 supplies this speech. The scan clearly prints Malisq; minus est, rendered "diminished by afflictions," whereas the consulted text has nec illa venus est. Burton also prints partu labat for periit labans and ex illa for ex illo, with a different order of the last lines. His separate English version expands the tree image and makes motherhood explicit. Both versions remain distinct; the variants need later textual collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 562 To conclude with Chrysostome, [10795]When thou seest a fair and beautifull person, a brave Bonaroba, a bella Donna, quæ salivam moveat, lepidam puellam & quam tu facile ames, a comely woman, having bright eyes, a merry countenance, a shining lustre in her look, a pleasant grace, wringing thy soul, and increasing thy concupiscence; bethink with thy self that it is but earth thou lovest, a meer excrement, which so vexeth thee, which thou so admirest, and thy raging soul will be at rest. Take her skin from her face, and thou shalt see all loathsomness under it, that beauty is a superficiall skin and bones, nerves, sinewes: suppose her sick, now rivel'd, hoarie-headed, hollow cheeked, old; within she is full of filthy fleame, stinking, putride, excrementall stuffe: snot and snevill in her nostrills, spettle in her mouth, water in her eyes, what filth in her brains, &c.	To conclude with Chrysostom: when you see a fair and beautiful person, a splendid courtesan, a beautiful lady "who makes your mouth water," "a charming girl whom you could easily love," a comely woman with bright eyes, a cheerful face, a shining look and a pleasing grace, wrenching your soul and increasing your lust, consider that what you love is only earth. It is mere excrement that so torments you and that you so admire; then your raging soul will find rest. Remove the skin from her face and you will see every kind of foulness beneath it: that beauty is a surface of skin, bones, nerves and sinews. Imagine her ill, now wrinkled, grey-haired, hollow-cheeked and old. Within, she is full of filthy phlegm, stinking, putrid, excremental matter: mucus and snot in her nostrils, spittle in her mouth, water in her eyes—what filth in her brain!—and so forth.[10796]
Or take her at best, and look narrowly upon her in the light, stand nearer her, nearer yet, thou shalt perceive almost as much, and love less, as [10797]Cardan well writes, minus amant qui acutè vident, though Scaliger deride him for it:	Or take her at her best and examine her closely in the light. Stand nearer, nearer still: you will notice almost as much and love less, as Cardan aptly writes, "Those who see sharply love less," though Scaliger mocks him for it.[10798]

[10795] Burton. Printed page 562, f: "Vides venustam mulierem, fulgidum habentem oculum, vultu hilari coruscantem, eximium quendam aspectum & decorem præ se ferentem, urentem mentem tuam & concupiscentiam agentem; cogita terram esse id quod amas, & quod admiraris stercus, & quod te urit &c. cogita illam jam senescere, jam rugosam cavos genas, ægrotam; tantis sordibus intus plena est, pituita, stercore: reputa quid intra nares, oculos, cerebrum gestat, quas sordes, &c." "You see a beautiful woman with a bright eye, shining with a cheerful face, displaying an extraordinary appearance and grace, inflaming your mind and stirring desire. Think that what you love is earth, that what you admire is dung, and what burns you, etc. Imagine her already ageing, already wrinkled, hollow-cheeked, ill; within she is full of so much filth, phlegm and dung. Consider what she carries within her nostrils, eyes and brain, what filth, etc."

[10796] Editor. Bonaroba was a term for a courtesan or sexually available woman; bella donna means beautiful woman. The two following Latin phrases intensify the attraction. Burton's long English passage and Latin margin differ in detail; both are translated as printed. No precise Chrysostom work is given here. The demeaning bodily imagery belongs to the historical argument and is not an editorial account of women's bodies.

[10797] Burton. Printed page 562, g: "Subtil. 13." "On Subtlety, book 13."

[10798] Editor. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano and Scaliger Julius Caesar Scaliger. The reference is to De subtilitate, book 13; the exact saying and Scaliger's response require collation. Burton uses sharp sight as an image of disenchantment.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If he see her near, or look exactly at such a posture, whosoever he is, according to the true rules of symmetry and proportion, those I mean of Albertus Durer, Lomatius and Tasnier, examine him of her. If he be elegans formarum spectator, he shall finde many faults in Physiognomy, and ill colour; if form, one side of the face likely bigger then the other, or crooked nose, bad eies, prominent veines, concavities about the eyes, wrinkles, pimples, redde streeks, frechons, hairs, warts, neves, inequalities, roughness, scabredity, paleness, yellowness, and as many colours as are in a Turkicocks neck, many indecorums in their other parts; est quod desideres, est quod amputes, one leires, another frownes, a third gapes, squints, &c.	If someone sees her at close range or studies her in such a posture, whoever he is, by the true rules of symmetry and proportion—I mean those of Albrecht Dürer, Lomazzo and Taisnier—question him about her. If he is "a discriminating observer of forms," he will find many faults in her features and defects of colour; in her shape, perhaps one side of the face larger than the other, or a crooked nose, bad eyes, prominent veins, hollows around the eyes, wrinkles, pimples, red streaks, freckles, hairs, warts, moles, unevenness, roughness, scabbiness, pallor, yellowness and as many colours as on a turkey's neck, with many unseemly features in the other parts. "There is something you would wish added, something you would cut away." One leers, another frowns, a third gapes or squints, and so on.[10799]
And 'tis true that he saith, [10800]Diligenter consideranti raro facies absoluta, & quæ vitio caret, seldom shall you finde an absolute face without fault, as I have often observed; not in the face alone is this defect or disproportion to be found; but in all the other parts of body and minde; she is fair indeed, but foolish; pretty, comely and decent, of a majesticall presence, but peradventure imperious, unhonest, acerba, iniqua, selfwil'd: she is rich, but deformed; hath a sweet face, but bad carriage, no bringing up, a rude and wanton flirt; a neat body she hath, but it is a nasty queane otherwise, a very slut, of a bad kinde.	And what he says is true: "To the careful observer, a perfect face, free from fault, is rare." Seldom will you find a faultless face, as I have often observed. This defect or disproportion appears throughout body and mind, not in the face alone. She is beautiful, certainly, but foolish; pretty, comely and seemly, with a majestic presence, but perhaps domineering, unchaste, "harsh and unjust," self-willed. She is rich but deformed; has a sweet face but bad manners, no upbringing, a rude, wanton hussy. She has a trim body, but otherwise she is a filthy wench, a complete slattern of a bad sort.[10801]

[10799] Editor. Lomatius and Tasnier are normalized as Lomazzo and Taisnier. "Examine him of her" means question the observer about her. "Frechons" are freckles, "neves" moles or blemishes, and "scabredity" roughness or scabbiness. The Latin about adding and cutting is a figure for aesthetic criticism, not a physical procedure.

[10800] Burton. Printed page 562, h: "Cardan. subtil. lib. 13." "Cardan, On Subtlety, book 13."

[10801] Editor. "Absolute" means perfect; "unhonest" unchaste; "carriage" conduct or manners. "Flirt" here is a disparaging term for a flighty woman, and "slut" can denote a slattern. The catalogue contrasts outward form with alleged qualities of character; its generalizations are Burton's.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As flowres in a garden have colour some, but no smell, others have a fragrant smell, but are unseemly to the eye; one is unsavory to the taste as rue, as bitter as wormwood, and yet a most medicinall cordiall flowre, most acceptable to the stomack; so are men and women; one is well qualified, but of ill proportion, poor and base: a good eye she hath, but a bad hand and foot, fœda pedes & fœda manus; a fine leg, bad teeth, a vast body, &c.	Some flowers in a garden have colour but no scent; others smell sweet but are ugly to look at. One tastes unpleasant like rue, bitter as wormwood, yet is a highly medicinal, strengthening flower, most welcome to the stomach. So it is with men and women: one has good qualities but is ill-proportioned, poor and low-born. She has a fine eye but an ugly hand and foot, "ugly in feet and ugly in hands"; a fine leg, bad teeth, a huge body, and so on.[10802]
Examine all parts of body and minde, I advise thee to enquire of all. See her angry, merry, laugh, weep, hot, cold, sick, sullen, dressed, undressed, in all attires, sites, gestures, passions, at her meales, &c. and in some of these you will surely dislike.	Examine every part of body and mind; I advise you to inquire into everything. See her angry or cheerful, laughing or weeping, hot or cold, ill or sulky, dressed or undressed, in every kind of clothing, position, gesture and passion, at her meals, and so on; in some of these states you will surely dislike her.
Source page 562–563 Yea not her onely let him observe, but her parents how they carry themselves: for what deformities, defects, incumbrances of body or minde be in them at such an age, they will likely be subject to, be molested in like manner, they will patrizare or matrizare. And with all let him take notice of her companions, in convictu, (as Quiverra prescribes) & quibuscum conversetur, whom she converseth with.	Indeed, let him observe not only her but also how her parents conduct themselves. Whatever deformities, defects or burdens of body or mind they have at a given age, their children will probably suffer from likewise: they will "take after their father" or "take after their mother." At the same time let him notice her companions "in daily company," as Quiverra prescribes, and "those with whom she associates"—the people she spends time with.[10803]
Source page 563 Noscitur ex Comite, qui non cognoscitur ex se.	A person not known by himself is known by his companion.

[10802] Editor. "Cordial" describes a preparation thought to strengthen the heart or spirits. The flower comparison is historical medical imagery. "Base" means low-born or low in social standing; the phrase about hands and feet is compressed Latin, translated by its accusatives of respect.

[10803] Editor. Patrizare and matrizare mean resemble one's father and mother. The claim extends physical resemblance to conduct and affliction; it is preserved as Burton's assumption. "Converse" here means associate, not merely talk. Quiverra's identity and work remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
According to Thucidides, she is commonly the best, de quo minimus foras habetur sermo, that is least talked of abroad. For if she be a noted reveller, a gadder, a singer, a pranker or dancer, then take heed of her. For what saith Theocritus?	According to Thucydides, the best woman is generally the one "of whom least is said in public," the one least talked about abroad. For if she is a well-known reveller, a gadabout, a singer, one who dresses to show off, or a dancer, then beware of her. For what does Theocritus say?[10804]
At vos festivæ ne ne saltate puellæ, En malus hircus adest in vos saltare paratus.	But you merry girls, do not, do not dance! Look, a wicked goat is here, ready to mount you.[10805]
Young men will do it when they come to it,	Young men will do it when the chance comes,
Fawnes and Satyres will certainly play wreeks, when they come in such wanton Baccho's Elenora's presence. Now when they shall perceive any such obliquity, indecency, disproportion, deformity, bad conditions &c. let them still ruminate on that, and as [10806]Hædus adviseth out of Ovid, earum mendas notent, note their faults, vices, errours, and think of their imperfections; 'tis the next way to divert and mitigate Loves furious head-strong passions; as a Peacocks feet, and filthy comb, they say, make him forget his fine feathers, and pride of his tail;	Fauns and satyrs will certainly play their wild tricks when they enter the presence of such a wanton woman as Baccho's Elenora. When men perceive any such deviation, indecency, disproportion, deformity or bad character, let them keep dwelling on it; as Haedus advises, drawing on Ovid, "let them note the women's faults": mark their faults, vices and errors, and think about their imperfections. This is the most direct way to turn aside and soften love's furious, headstrong passions, just as a peacock's feet and dirty comb are said to make him forget his fine feathers and the pride of his tail.[10807]

[10804] Editor. Thucydides 2.45.2 places the sentiment in Pericles' funeral speech to women entering widowhood, referring to their reputation among men for praise or blame. Burton generalizes it. His Latin prints masculine de quo in a sentence about a woman. "Pranker" means someone who dresses or adorns herself showily.

[10805] Editor. Saltare repeats the idea of dancing or leaping, with the goat's sexual mounting as the joke. Theocritus is Burton's attribution; the exact Greek poem and Latin version remain uncollated. His following English line is a separate, much freer rendering.

[10806] Burton. Printed page 563, †: "Lib. de contem. amoribus, earum mendas volvant animo, sæpe ante oculos constituant, sæpe damnent." "In the book On Despising Loves: let them turn the women's faults over in their minds, often set them before their eyes, often condemn them."

[10807] Editor. "Play wreeks" means play wild or mischievous tricks; "the next way" means the nearest or most direct means. The name Baccho's Elenora is retained without a firm identification. Ovid, Remedies for Love 299–340, does recommend dwelling on the beloved's faults, sometimes inventing them; Burton cites the advice through Haedus. The peacock comparison remains a reported emblematic claim.

Original text 1651	Modern English
she is lovely, fair, well-favoured, well qualified, courteous and kinde, But if she be not so to me, what care I how kinde she be. I say with [10808]Philostratus, formosa aliis, mihi superba, she is a tyrant to me, and so let her go.	She is lovely, beautiful, good-looking, accomplished, courteous and kind; but if she is not so to me, what do I care how kind she is? I say with Philostratus, "Beautiful to others, haughty towards me": she is a tyrant to me, so let her go.[10809]
Besides these outward næves or open faults, errors, there be many inward infirmities, secret, some private, (which I will omit) and some more common to the sexe, sullen fits, evil qualities, filthy diseases, in this case fit to be considered;	Besides these outward blemishes, obvious faults and errors, there are many hidden infirmities: some private, which I will omit, and some more common to the sex—sulky fits, bad qualities and filthy diseases—appropriate to consider in this case:
Consideratio fæditatis mulierum, menstruæ imprimis, quam immundæ sunt, quam Savanarola proponit regula septima penitus observandam; & Platina dial. amoris fusè perstringit. Lodovicus Bonacialus mulieb. lib. 2. cap. 2. Pet. Hædus. Albertus, & infiniti fere medici.	"Consideration of women's foulness, especially menstrual foulness, how unclean they are": Savonarola proposes, in his seventh rule, that this be thoroughly considered; Platina discusses it at length in his Dialogue on Love, as do Ludovicus Bonacialus in book 2, chapter 2 of his work on women, Petrus Haedus, Albertus and almost countless physicians.[10810]

[10808] Burton. Printed page 563, †: "In delitiis."

[10809] Editor. The English refrain and the Philostratus fragment are distinct. "In delitiis" is too abbreviated to establish an exact work here; the wording and both literary sources remain for collation. Superba means proud or disdainful.

[10810] Editor. The Latin treats menstruation as foulness and invokes a series of medical authorities. This is a historical prejudice, not a statement adopted by the edition. The translation supplies the implied object of consideration after menstruæ and treats the abbreviated titles descriptively; the Savonarola rule, Platina passage, Bonacialus reference and unspecified Albertus require collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10811]A Lover in Calcagninus Apologies, wished with all his heart he were his mistris Ring, to see, hear, embrace, see, and do I know not what: O thou fool, quoth the Ring, if thou wer'st in my room, thou shouldst hear, observe, and see pudenda & pœnitenda, that which would make thee loath and hate her, yea peradventure all women for her sake.	A lover in Calcagnini's Fables wished with all his heart that he were his mistress's ring, so that he could see, hear, embrace, see again, and do I know not what. "You fool," said the ring, "if you were in my place, you would hear, observe and see things shameful and regrettable, things that would make you loathe and hate her—perhaps even all women on her account."[10812]
I will say nothing of the vices of their mindes, their pride, envy, inconstancy, weakness, malice, selfwill, lightness, insatiable lust, jealousie; Ecclus 5. 14. No malice to a womans, no bitterness like to hers, Eccles. 7. 21. and as the same Author urgeth Prov. 31. 10. Who shall finde a vertuous woman? He makes a question of it.	I will say nothing of the faults of their minds: their pride, envy, inconstancy, weakness, malice, wilfulness, frivolity, insatiable lust and jealousy. Ecclesiasticus 5:14: "No malice equals a woman's, no bitterness is like hers," Ecclesiastes 7:21. And, as the same author asks in Proverbs 31:10, "Who shall find a virtuous woman?" He makes a question of it.[10813]
Neq; jus neq; bonum, neq; æquum sciunt, melius peius, prosit, obsit, nihil vident, nisi quod libido suggerit. They know neither good nor bad, be it better or worse (as the Comicall Poet hath it) beneficiall or hurtfull, they will do what they list.	"They know neither right nor goodness nor fairness; better or worse, helpful or harmful, they see nothing except what desire suggests." They know neither good nor bad: whether it is better or worse, beneficial or harmful—as the comic poet puts it—they will do whatever they please.[10814]

[10811] Burton. Printed page 563, *: "Quum amator annulum se amicæ optaret, ut ejus amplexu frui posset, &c. O te miserum ait annulus, si meas vices obires, videres, audires, &c. nihil non odio dignum observares." "When a lover wished he were his mistress's ring, so that he might enjoy her embrace, etc.: "You poor fool," said the ring, "if you took my place, you would see and hear, etc.; you would observe nothing that did not deserve hatred.""

[10812] Editor. "Apologies" here means apologues or fables. The printed "see, hear, embrace, see" repeats see; the modern version keeps the repetition. "In my room" means in my place. The speaking ring supplies a fictional example, and its exact location in Calcagnini remains unresolved.

[10813] Editor. Burton's "I will say nothing" introduces a list: a rhetorical pretence of passing over a subject. His biblical references are retained as printed, not silently corrected. Ecclesiasticus is Sirach, distinct from Ecclesiastes; the familiar parallel for woman's bitterness is Ecclesiastes 7:26, not 7:21. "The same Author" follows the traditional association of Ecclesiastes and Proverbs with Solomon.

[10814] Editor. Terence, Heauton Timorumenos 642–643, adapted. In the play Chremes rebukes Sostrata over their daughter's exposure; Burton turns the speech into a general charge against women. His final clause substitutes desire for Terence's wording. The English gloss is Burton's own separate rendering.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10815]Insidiæ humani generis, querimonia vitæ, Exuviæ noctis, durissima cura diei, Pœna virum, nex & juvenum, &c. ——	Snares of the human race, the lament of life, The spoils of night, the harshest care of day, The punishment of men, the death of young men too, etc.[10816]
Source page 564 And to that purpose were they first made, as Jupiter insinuates in the [10817]Poet;	And for that purpose they were first created, as Jupiter suggests in the poet:[10818]
The fire that bold Prometheus stole from me, With plagues cal'd women shall revenged be, On whose alluring and entising face, Poor mortalls doting shall their death embrace.	The fire that bold Prometheus stole from me Shall be avenged with plagues called women: Poor mortals, doting on their alluring, enticing faces, Shall embrace their own death.
In fine, as Diogenes concludes in Nevisanus, Nulla est fœmina quæ non habeat Quid: they have all their faults.	In short, as Diogenes concludes in Nevisanus, "There is no woman who does not have a certain something": they all have their faults.[10819]
[10820]Every each of them hath some vice, If one be full of villany, Another hath a liquorish eye. If one be full of wantonness, Another is a Chideress.	Every one of them has some fault: If one is full of wickedness, Another has a lustful eye. If one is full of wantonness, Another is a scold.[10821]

[10815] Burton. Printed page 563, *: "Lætheus."

[10816] Editor. The margin reads Lætheus; the author and exact poem remain unidentified. "Exuviæ" means spoils or things stripped off: "the spoils of night" preserves the compressed, uncertain image instead of supplying an explanation. The verse is a catalogue of accusations against women.

[10817] Burton. Printed page 564, *: "See our English Tatius li. 1."

[10818] Editor. The fire theft and punishment evoke the myth of Prometheus. Burton cites an English Tatius in the margin; the precise English rendering has not been identified. Jupiter is the Roman name used for Zeus.

[10819] Editor. "Quid," literally "something," implies a defect or reservation. Burton attributes the saying to Diogenes through Nevisanus; the precise passage in that intermediary remains unlocated.

[10820] Burton. Printed page 564, *: "Chaucer in Romant of the Rose."

[10821] Editor. "Liquorish" means lustful; "Chideress," a scolding woman. Romaunt of the Rose 4261–4266, in Skeat's text, supplies the passage; Burton omits line 4262, "Oon is dishonest, another is nyce." The next four lines condemn these charges as Wikked-Tunge's baseless slander. Burton's Chaucer attribution and particular edition remain to be examined.

Original text 1651	Modern English
When Leander was drowned, the inhabitants of Sestos consecrated Heros Lanterne to Anteros, Anteroti sacrum, [10822]and he that had good successe in his love, should light the candle: but never any man was found to light it; which I can refer to nought, but the inconstancy and lightness of women.	When Leander drowned, the inhabitants of Sestos consecrated Hero's lantern to Anteros, "Sacred to Anteros." Whoever had been successful in love was to light its candle; but no man was ever found to light it. I can attribute this to nothing but women's inconstancy and frivolity.[10823]
[10824]For in a thousand, good there is not one; All be so proud, unthankfull and unkinde, With flinty hearts, careless of others moane, In their own lusts carried most headlong blinde, But more herein to speak I am forbidden, Sometime for speaking truth one may be chidden.	For among a thousand there is not one good woman; All are so proud, ungrateful and unkind, With hearts of flint, heedless of others' suffering, Swept blindly headlong by their own desires. But I am forbidden to say more about this: Sometimes one may be scolded for speaking the truth.[10825]
I am not willing, you see, to prosecute the cause against them, and therefore take heed you mistake me not, [10826]matronam nullam ego tango, I honour the sex, with all good men, and as I ought to do, rather then displease them, I will voluntarily take the oath which Mercurius Britannicus took, Viragin. descript. lib. 2. fol. 95; Me nihil unquam mali nobilissimo sexui, vel verbo, vel facto machinaturum, &c.	You see that I am unwilling to pursue the case against them, so take care not to misunderstand me: "I touch no married woman." With all good men, and as I ought, I honour the sex. Rather than displease them, I will willingly swear the oath taken by Mercurius Britannicus, Description of Viragos, book 2, folio 95: "That I will never devise any harm against the most noble sex, either in word or in deed," etc.[10827]

[10822] Burton. Printed page 564, †: "Qui se facilem in amore probarit, hanc succendito. At qui succendat, ad hunc diem repertus nemo. Calcagninus." "Let the man who has found himself fortunate in love light this. But to this day no one has been found to light it. Calcagnini."

[10823] Editor. Hero's light guides Leander's nocturnal visits across the water in their traditional story. Anteros represents requited love. This lantern episode is cited to Calcagnini; its exact location and the unusual Latin "se facilem in amore probarit" remain to be collated. The translation follows Burton's own account of successful love.

[10824] Burton. Printed page 564, l: "Ariosto."

[10825] Editor. Burton attributes the six English lines to Ariosto without identifying the translator or location. Their rhyme is not forced into the modernization at the expense of sense.

[10826] Burton. Printed page 564, †: "Hor:"

[10827] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.2.54: in its original setting, "touch" concerns sexual relations with married women; Burton redirects it to verbal criticism. "Viragin." is expanded as Description of Viragos; the precise title and passage associated with Mercurius Britannicus remain to be identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
let Simonides, Mantuan, Platina, Pet. Aratine, and such women-haters bare the blame, if ought be said amiss; I have not writ a tenth of that which might be urged out of them and others; [10828]non possunt invectivæ omnes, & satyræ in fœminas scriptæ, uno volumine comprehendi.	Let Simonides, Mantuan, Platina, Pietro Aretino and such woman-haters bear the blame if anything has been said amiss. I have not written a tenth of what might be brought forward from them and others: "All the invectives and satires written against women cannot be contained in one volume."[10829]
And that which I have said (to speak truth) no more concerns them then men, though women be more frequently named in this Tract; (to Apologize once for all) I am neither parciall against them, or therefore bitter: what is said of the one, mutato nomine, may most-part be understood of the other.	And, to tell the truth, what I have said concerns women no more than men, though women are named more often in this treatise. To make my defence once and for all, I am neither prejudiced against them nor bitter on that account. What is said of one sex, "with the name changed," may for the most part be understood of the other.[10830]
My words are like Passus picture in [10831]Lucian, of whom, when a good fellow had bespoke an horse to be painted with his heeles upward, tumbling on his back, he made him passant: now when the fellow came for his piece, he was very angry, and said, it was quite opposite to his minde; but Passus instantly turned the Picture upside down, shewed him the horse at that site which he requested, and so gave him satisfaction. If any man take exception at my words, let him alter the name, read him for her, and 'tis all one in effect.	My words are like the picture by Passus in Lucian. A fellow commissioned him to paint a horse with its heels in the air, rolling on its back; he painted it walking. When the man came for his picture, he was very angry and said that it was the exact opposite of what he wanted. But Passus immediately turned the picture upside down, showing him the horse in the position he had requested, and so satisfied him. If anyone objects to my words, let him change the name, read "him" for "her," and the meaning is just the same.[10832]

[10828] Burton. Printed page 564, †: "Christoph. Fonseca."

[10829] Editor. The named writers function as authorities for the invective Burton claims merely to report. Mantuan is the poet Baptista Mantuanus; Pet. Aratine is Pietro Aretino. The Fonseca passage and the individual charges borrowed from these writers remain uncollated.

[10830] Editor. "Apologize" means defend one's position, not express regret. Burton explicitly extends the criticism to men, an instruction repeated in the reversible-picture anecdote.

[10831] Burton. Printed page 564, †: "Encom. Demosthen." "Encomium of Demosthenes."

[10832] Editor. The Demosthenes encomium transmitted with Lucian, sections 23–24, names the painter Pauson and describes a galloping horse. Burton prints Passus and calls the horse "passant," walking. Both substantive readings are preserved here; "site" means position.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 564–565 But to my purpose: If women in generall be so bad (and men worse then they) what a hazard is it to marry? where shall a man finde a good wife, or a woman a good husband? A woman a man may eschue, but not a wife: wedding is undoing (some say) marrying marring, wooing woing: [10833]a wife is a fever hectick, as Scaliger calls her, and not to be cured but by death, as out of Menander, Atheneus addes,	But to my point: if women in general are so bad, and men worse than they are, what a risk it is to marry! Where will a man find a good wife, or a woman a good husband? A man may avoid a woman, but not a wife. A wedding is an undoing, some say; marrying is marring, wooing is woeing. "A wife is a wasting fever," as Scaliger calls her, "cured only by death." As Athenaeus adds, quoting Menander:[10834]
Source page 565 In pelagus te jacis negotiorum, —— Non Lybium, non Ægeum, ubi ex triginta non pereunt Tria navigia: ducens uxorem servatur prorsus nemo:	You throw yourself into a sea of troubles— Not the Libyan or Aegean, where out of thirty ships Not three are lost: no man who takes a wife is saved at all.[10835]
Thou wadest into a sea it self of woes; In Libycke and Ægæan each man knowes Of thirty not three ships are cast away, But on this rock not one escapes, I say.	You wade into a very sea of woes; In the Libyan and Aegean seas everyone knows That fewer than three ships out of thirty are wrecked, But on this rock, I say, not one escapes.

[10833] Burton. Printed page 565, m: "Febris hectica uxor, & non nisi morte avellenda." "A wife is a wasting fever, and one to be removed only by death."

[10834] Editor. "Marrying marring" and "wooing woing" are puns on marriage as ruin and wooing as woe. "Woeing" recreates the latter in modern spelling. A hectic fever was a persistent wasting fever; this is an analogy, not a medical diagnosis. Scaliger's exact passage remains unlocated.

[10835] Editor. Athenaeus, Deipnosophists 13.8 in the consulted division, quotes Menander on a sea of troubles. The Libyan and Aegean seas provide ordinary dangers against which marriage is exaggerated. Burton's Latin and his separate four-line English version are both retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The worldly cares, miseries, discontents, that accompany marriage, I pray you learn of them that have experience, for I have none; [10836]παῖδας ἐγὼ λόγους ἐγεννησάμην, libri mentis liberi. For my part I'le dissemble with him,	For the worldly cares, miseries and discontents that accompany marriage, please learn from those who have experience; I have none. "I have begotten writings as my children"; "books are the mind's children." For my part, I will pretend along with the poet:[10837]
Este procul nymphæ, fallax genus este puellæ, Vita jugata meo non facit ingenio: Me juvat, &c.	Keep far away, nymphs; keep away, girls, deceitful race: A life under the yoke does not suit my nature. I delight in—etc.[10838]
many married men exclaime at the miseries of it, and rail at wives downright; I never tried, but as I hear some of them say,	Many married men cry out against its miseries and rail openly at wives. I have never tried it, but I hear some of them say:
[10839]Mare haud mare, vos mare acerrimum,	The sea is no sea; you are the fiercest sea.[10840]
An Irish Sea is not so turbulent and raging as a litigious wife.	An Irish Sea is less turbulent and raging than a quarrelsome wife.
[10841]Scylla & Charybdis Sicula contorquens freta, Minus est timenda, nulla non melior fera est.	Scylla and Charybdis, churning the Sicilian straits, Are less to be feared; every wild beast is better.[10842]

[10836] Burton. Printed page 565, *: "Synesius, libros ego liberos genui. Lipsius antiq. Lect. lib." "Synesius: I have begotten books as children. Lipsius, Ancient Readings, book [number not supplied]."

[10837] Editor. The Greek says that writings have been begotten as children; the Latin plays on libri, books, and liberi, children. Compare Synesius, Letter 1 to Nicander. Burton's Lipsius reference supplies no book number. Greek ligatures and accent forms are normalized; fine typographical collation remains open.

[10838] Editor. "Jugata" means yoked, with marriage implied. Burton breaks off after "Me juvat," "I delight in"; the missing continuation is not supplied. The poem is unattributed here. "Dissemble" preserves Burton's suggestion of a pose rather than a simple declaration of settled preference.

[10839] Burton. Printed page 565, o: "Plautus Asin act. 1."

[10840] Editor. Plautus, Asinaria 134: the speaker is Argyrippus, reproaching the women who have excluded him, not a husband complaining of his wife. Burton omits "est" and varies the spelling. The following Irish Sea comparison is his own application.

[10841] Burton. Printed page 565, *: "Senec. in. Hercul."

[10842] Editor. Hercules Oetaeus 235–236, transmitted under Seneca's name. Scylla and Charybdis are the paired maritime dangers of the Sicilian straits; in the drama the Nurse speaks of a wife's jealous rage. Burton's looser English couplet remains distinct from the Latin translation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Scylla and Charybis are lesse dangerous, There is no beast that is so noxious.	Scylla and Charybdis are less dangerous; No beast is so harmful.
Which made the Divell belike, as most interpreters hold, when he had taken away Job's goods, corporis & fortunæ bona, health, children, friends, to persecute him the more, leave his wicked wife, as Pineda proves out of Tertullian, Cyprian, Austin, Chrysostome, Prosper, Gaudentius, &c. ut novum calamitatis inde genus viro existeret, to vex and gaule him worse quam totus infernus, then all the fiends in hell, as knowing the conditions of a bad woman.	This presumably made the Devil—as most interpreters maintain—leave Job his wicked wife after taking away his possessions, "the goods of body and fortune," his health, children and friends, so as to persecute him still more. Pineda proves this from Tertullian, Cyprian, Augustine, Chrysostom, Prosper, Gaudentius and others: "so that a new kind of calamity might arise for the man from this," to vex and torment him worse "than all hell," worse than all its devils, knowing as he did the character of a bad woman.[10843]
Jupiter non tribuit homini pestilentius malum, saith Simonides: better dwell with a Dragon or a Lion, then keep house with a wicked wife. Ecclus 25. 18. better dwell in a wilderness. Prov. 21. 19. no wickedness like to her, Ecclus 25. 22. She makes a sorry heart, an heavy countenance, a wounded minde, weak hands, and feeble knees, vers. 25. A woman and death are two the bitterest things in the world:	"Jupiter has given man no more destructive evil," says Simonides. "Better to dwell with a dragon or a lion than to keep house with a wicked wife," Ecclesiasticus 25:18; "better to live in a wilderness," Proverbs 21:19. "No wickedness is like hers," Ecclesiasticus 25:22. "She causes a grieving heart, a sorrowful face, a wounded mind, weak hands and feeble knees," verse 25. "A woman and death are the two bitterest things in the world."[10844]
uxor mihi ducenda est hodie, id mihi visus est dicere, abi domum & suspende te. Ter. And. 1. 5. And yet for all this we Batchelors desire to be married, with that Vestall virgin, we long for it,	"I must take a wife today: he seemed to me to be saying, 'Go home and hang yourself,'" Terence, Andria 1.5. Yet for all this, we bachelors wish to marry; like that Vestal virgin, we long for it:[10845]

[10843] Editor. This judgment of Job's wife is presented as a line of interpretation, mediated by Juan de Pineda and his patristic authorities. It is not a quotation from the biblical narrator. Exact locations in Pineda and the named authors remain to be checked.

[10844] Editor. Burton's scriptural numbering is retained; the warnings cluster in Sirach 25, whose verse divisions vary. The saying attributed to "Simonides" has a parallel near the end of Semonides of Amorgos, poem 7, in its attack on women. The comparison is through an English translation; Burton's Latin intermediary remains unidentified.

[10845] Editor. Terence, Andria 254–255, has Pamphilus interpreting his father's order that he marry. Burton changes the order's second person into the first person, "I must take a wife." It is a character's comic expression of distress.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10846]Felices nuptæ! moriar, nisi nubere dulce est.	Happy married women! May I die if marrying is not sweet.[10847]
Tis the sweetest thing in the world, I would I had a wife, saith he,	"It is the sweetest thing in the world; I wish I had a wife," he says:
For fain would I leave a single life, If I could get me a good wife.	For gladly would I leave the single life, If I could find myself a good wife.
hai-ho for an husband cries she, a bad husband, nay the worst that ever was is better then none: O blissfull marriage, O most welcome marriage, and happy are they that are so coupled: we do earnestly seek it, and are never well till we have effected it.	"Heigh-ho for a husband!" she cries. A bad husband—indeed, the worst that ever was—is better than none. O blissful marriage, O most welcome marriage! Happy are those who are joined in this way. We eagerly seek it and are never at ease until we have achieved it.
But with what fate? like those birds in the [10848]Embleme, that fed about a cage, so long as they could fly away at their pleasure, liked well of it; but when they were taken and might not get loose, though they had the same meat, pined away for sullenness, and would not eat. So we commend marriage;	But with what outcome? We are like the birds in the emblem that fed around a cage: as long as they could fly away whenever they wished, they liked it well enough. But once they were caught and could not get free, although they had the same food, they pined away in dejection and would not eat. So we praise marriage:[10849]
Source page 566 —— donec miselli liberi Aspicimus dominam; sed postquam heu janua clausa est, Fel intus est quod mel fuit:	While we poor wretches are still free And gaze upon our mistress; but once, alas, the door is shut, What was honey becomes gall within.[10850]

[10846] Burton. Printed page 565, †: "Seneca."

[10847] Editor. Seneca the Elder, Controversiae 6.8, gives this verse in an imaginary legal case about a Vestal virgin accused after writing it. It is not evidence of an actual prosecution. "Nuptæ" means married women; the speaker envies them. Burton then changes to a male bachelor's voice.

[10848] Burton. Printed page 565, †: "Amator. Emblem." "Love emblems."

[10849] Editor. An emblem combines an image with explanatory words. Burton's abbreviated reference gives no author or emblem number. "Meat" here is food, not specifically animal flesh.

[10850] Editor. This unattributed verse continues the sentence from the preceding page. "Fel" is bitter gall and "mel" is honey; the Latin compresses the reversal into a rhyme. The couple's enclosure follows the birdcage image.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So long as we are wooers, may kiss and koll at our pleasure, nothing is so sweet, we are in heaven as we think: but when we are once tied, and have lost our liberty, marriage is an hell, give me my yellow hose again: a mouse in a trap lives as merrily, we are in a purgatory some of us, if not hell it self.	As long as we are wooers, free to kiss and embrace whenever we please, nothing is so sweet: we think ourselves in heaven. But once we are bound and have lost our liberty, marriage is a hell: "Give me my yellow stockings again!" A mouse in a trap lives just as merrily; some of us are in purgatory, if not hell itself.[10851]
Dulce bellum inexpertis, as the proverb is, 'tis fine talking of war, and marriage sweet in contemplation, 'till it be tried: and then as wars are most dangerous, irksome, every minute at deaths door, so is, &c.	"War is sweet to those who have not experienced it," as the proverb goes. It is fine to talk of war, and marriage is sweet to contemplate until it is tried. Then, just as war is terribly dangerous and distressing, with death at the door every minute, so is—etc.[10852]
When those wild Irish Peers, saith [10853]Stanihurst, were feasted by King Henry the second (at what time he kept his Christmas at Dublin) and had tasted of his Prince-like cheer, generous wines, dainty fare, had seen his [10854]massie plate of silver, gold, inamel'd, beset with jewels, golden candle-sticks, goodly rich hangings, brave furniture, heard his trumpets sound, Fifes, Drums, and his exquisite musick in all kindes:	When those wild Irish noblemen, says Stanihurst, were entertained by King Henry II when he kept Christmas in Dublin, they tasted his princely hospitality, fine wines and delicate food; they saw his heavy silver and gold plate, enamelled and set with jewels, golden candlesticks, splendid rich hangings and magnificent furnishings; they heard his trumpets, fifes and drums and his exquisite music of every kind.[10855]

[10851] Editor. "Koll" means embrace. The yellow-hose saying asks for the former condition back in this context; its precise proverbial background remains unidentified. The literal clothing image is retained.

[10852] Editor. The proverb contrasts imagined pleasures with experience. Burton deliberately leaves the parallel with marriage unfinished at "so is, &c."; the modernization does the same.

[10853] Burton. Printed page 566, o: "De rebus Hibernicis, l. 3." "On Irish Affairs, book 3."

[10854] Burton. Printed page 566, p: "Gemmea pocula, argentea vasa, cælata candelabra, aurea, &c. Conchileata aulea, buccinarum clangorem, tibiarum cantum, & symphoniæ suavitatem, majestatemq; principis coronati cum vidissent sella de aurata, &c." "Jewelled cups, silver vessels, chased golden candlesticks, etc.; purple hangings, the blare of trumpets, the sound of pipes and the sweetness of harmonious music; when they had seen the majesty of the crowned prince on a gilded throne, etc."

[10855] Editor. Richard Stanihurst's On Irish Affairs, book 3, is Burton's authority. The description of the Irish as wild and their life as squalid belongs to this partisan historical presentation. The Latin marginal list repeats and supplements the luxurious objects in the body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
when they had observed his majesticall presence as he sate in purple robes, crowned with his scepter, &c. in his royall seat, the poor men were so amazed, enamored, and taken with the object, that they were pertæsi domestici & pristini tyrotarchi, as weary and ashamed of their own sordidity and manner of life. They would all be English forthwith; who but English! but when they had now submitted themselves, and lost their former liberty, they began to rebell some of them, others repent of what they had done, when it was too late.	When they observed his majestic presence, sitting in purple robes on his royal throne, crowned and holding his sceptre, the poor men were so amazed, enchanted and captivated by the sight that they were "weary of their former homely fare," weary and ashamed of their own squalor and way of life. They would all become English immediately: who mattered but the English? But once they had submitted and lost their former liberty, some began to rebel and others to regret what they had done, when it was too late.[10856]
'Tis so with us Batchelors, when we see and behold those sweet faces, those gaudy shewes that women make, observe their pleasant gestures and graces, give ear to their Siren tunes, see them dance, &c. we think their conditions are as fine as their faces, we are taken with dumb signes, in amplexum ruimus, we rave, we burn, and would fain be married.	It is the same with us bachelors. When we see those lovely faces and women's dazzling displays, observe their pleasing gestures and graces, listen to their siren songs, see them dance and so on, we imagine that their characters are as fine as their faces. We are captivated by silent signs; "we rush into their embrace"; we rave, we burn and would gladly be married.
But when we feel the miseries, cares, woes, that accompany it, we make our moan many of us, cry out at length and cannot be released. If this be true now, as some out of experience will enform us, farewell wiving for my part, and as the Comicall Poet merrily saith,	But when we feel the miseries, cares and woes that come with it, many of us lament, cry out at last and cannot be released. If this is true, as some will tell us from experience, then for my part, farewell to taking a wife! As the comic poet says in jest:

[10856] Editor. The scan reads "tyrotarchi," an obscure form left unchanged on the original side. "Former homely fare" is provisional, guided by the immediate contrast of food and Burton's English explanation; collation with Stanihurst is required. The political anecdote becomes an analogy for attraction followed by loss of liberty.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10857]Perdatur ille pessimè qui fœminam Duxit secundus, nam nihil primo imprecor! Ignarus ut puto mali primus fuit.	May the second man to take a wife perish miserably; I call down no curse upon the first! The first, I think, did not know the evil.[10858]
[10859]Foul fall him that brought the second match to passe, The first I wish no harm, poor man alas, He knew not what he did, nor what it was.	Ill befall the man who made the second match; I wish the first no harm—alas, poor man, He knew neither what he did nor what it was.
What shall I say to him that marries again and again,	What shall I say to the man who marries again and again,
[10860]Stulta maritali qui porrigit ora capistro,	Who puts his foolish head into the marriage halter?[10861]
I pitty him not, for the first time he must do as he may, bear it out sometimes by the head and shoulders, and let his next neighbour ride, or else run away, or as that Syracusian in a tempest, when all ponderous things were to be exonerated out of the ship, quia maximum pondus erat, fling his wife into the Sea. But this I confesse is Comically spoken, [10862]and so I pray you take it.	I do not pity him. As for the first time, he must manage as he can, sometimes bear the burden on his head and shoulders and let his next-door neighbour ride, or else run away; or, like that Syracusan in a storm when all heavy things had to be unloaded from the ship, throw his wife into the sea, "because she was the greatest weight." But I confess that this is said in jest, and I ask you to take it that way.[10863]

[10857] Burton. Printed page 566, p: "Eubulus in Crisill. Athenæus dypnosophist. l. 13. c. 3."

[10858] Editor. Athenaeus 13.8 in the consulted division quotes Eubulus's Chrysilla about marrying twice. Burton's Latin "duxit secundus," and especially Ralph Burton's following version, can instead suggest the second man ever to marry. That ambiguity is retained, rather than silently substituting the consulted translation's interpretation.

[10859] Burton. Printed page 566, †: "Translated by my brother Ralfe Burton."

[10860] Burton. Printed page 566, *: "Juvenal."

[10861] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.43, reads "iam" where Burton has "qui." The marriage "capistrum" is an animal's halter or muzzle; "head" renders the literal "face" naturally while keeping the image of restraint.

[10862] Burton. Printed page 566, r: "Hæc in speciem dicta cave ut credas." "These things are said for effect: take care how you believe them."

[10863] Editor. "Bear it out" means endure; the neighbour's "riding" carries a sexual suggestion of cuckoldry. The Syracusan anecdote treats a wife as ship's ballast. Burton expressly labels the passage comic, reinforced by his marginal caution.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 566–567 In sober sadness, [10864]marriage is a bondage, a thralldom, an yoke, an hinderance to all good enterprises, (he hath married a wife and cannot come) a stop to all preferments, a rock on which many are saved, many impinge and are cast away: not that the thing is evill in it self or troublesome, but full of all contentment and happiness, one of the three things which please God, [10865]when a man and his wife agree together, an honorable and happy estate, who knows it not? If they be sober, wise, honest, as the Poet infers,	In sober earnest, marriage is a bondage, a slavery, a yoke, an obstacle to every good undertaking—"he has married a wife and cannot come"—a bar to every advancement, a rock on which many are saved and against which many strike and are wrecked. Not that marriage itself is evil or troublesome: it is full of every satisfaction and happiness, one of the three things that please God, "when a man and his wife agree together." It is an honourable and happy state—who does not know it?—if they are temperate, wise and virtuous, as the poet concludes:[10866]
Source page 567 [10867]Si commodos nanciscantur amores, Nullum iis abest voluptatis genus.	If they find loves that suit them, No kind of pleasure is missing.[10868]
If fitly matcht be man and wife, No pleasure's wanting to their life.	If man and wife are well matched, No pleasure is lacking in their life.
But to undiscreet sensuall persons, that as brutes are wholy led by sense, it is a ferall plague, many times an hell it self, and can give little or no content, being that they are often so irregular and prodigious in their lusts, so diverse in their affections.	But to imprudent, sensual people, governed wholly by their senses like beasts, it is a deadly plague, often a hell in itself, and can give little or no satisfaction, since their lusts are often so unruly and monstrous and their affections so changeable.

[10864] Burton. Printed page 566, s: "Batchelors alwayes are the bravest men. Bacon. seek eternity in memory, not in posterity, like Epaminondas, that instead of children, left two great victories behinde him, which he called his two daughters."

[10865] Burton. Printed page 567, *: "Ecclus 28. [3?]"

[10866] Editor. "In sober sadness" means seriously; the parenthesis echoes Luke 14:20. The harmonious couple belongs to Sirach 25:1, against the margin's uncertain "Ecclus 28.3." Bacon's essays Of Marriage and Single Life and Of Parents and Children discuss childless benefactors and lasting achievement, but neither supplies this whole marginal statement. Its wording and Epaminondas example remain untraced. Burton distinguishes marriage from its abuse.

[10867] Burton. Printed page 567, †: "Euripides Andromach."

[10868] Editor. Burton cites Euripides' Andromache for this Latin couplet; its exact Greek parallel and intermediary remain unlocated. His separate English couplet is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Uxor nomen dignitatis, non voluptatis, as [10869]he said, a wife is a name of honor, not of pleasure: she is fit to bear the office, govern a family, to bring up children, sit at bords end and carve, as some carnal men think and say; they had rather go to the stews, or have now and then a snatch as they can come by it, borrow of their neighbours, then have wives of their own; except they may, as some Princes and great men do, keep as many Curtisans as they will themselves, fly out impunè,	"Wife is a title of dignity, not of pleasure," as he said: a wife is a name of honour, not of pleasure. She is fit to hold the office, govern a household, bring up children, sit at the head of the table and carve—as some lustful men think and say. They would rather visit brothels or snatch an encounter now and then when they can, borrowing from their neighbours, than have wives of their own; unless, like some princes and great men, they may keep as many courtesans as they please and stray "with impunity,"[10870]
[10871]Permolere uxores alienas.	Grind away at other men's wives.[10872]
that polygamy of Turkes, Lex Iulia, with Cæsar once inforced in Rome (though Levinus Torrentius, and others suspect it) uti uxores quot & quas vellent liceret, that every great man might marry, and keep as many wives as he would, or Irish divorcement were in use:	Unless the Turks' polygamy, the Julian law that Caesar once enforced in Rome—though Levinus Torrentius and others doubt it—"allowing them as many wives, and whichever wives, they wished," so that every great man might marry and keep as many wives as he wanted, or Irish divorce, were customary:[10873]

[10869] Burton. Printed page 567, s: "Ælius Verus imperator Spar. vit. ejus." "The emperor Aelius Verus: Spartianus, his Life."

[10870] Editor. Historia Augusta, Aelius 5.11, attributes the maxim to Aelius Verus replying to his wife's complaint about his affairs. The margin calls him emperor, although he died as Caesar before becoming emperor. Burton presents the household role here as the view of "some carnal men." "Stews" means brothels.

[10871] Burton. Printed page 567, †: "Hor:"

[10872] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.2.35, uses "permolere," literally to grind thoroughly, as a coarse sexual metaphor. "Other men's wives" continues the preceding line in Horace. The grinding image is preserved rather than turned into a neutral phrase for adultery.

[10873] Editor. Suetonius, Julius 52.3, reports a proposed measure permitting Caesar multiple wives for producing children, not an enacted general permission for great men. Burton registers Torrentius's doubt but broadens the claim. Printed "with Cæsar" is read as "which Caesar" in the modernization. His Irish-divorce assertion remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but as it is, 'tis hard and gives not that satisfaction to these carnal men, beastly men as too many are: [10874]What still the same, to be tied [10875]to one, be she never so fair, never so vertuous, is a thing they may not endure, to love one long. Say thy pleasure, and counterfeit as thou wilt, as [10876]Parmeno told Thais, Neq; tu uno eris contenta, one man will never please thee; nor one woman many men:	As things stand, marriage is hard and does not give these sensual men—beastly men, as too many are—the satisfaction they want. "What, always the same one?" To be bound to one woman, however beautiful or virtuous, to love one for long, is more than they can endure. Say what you please and pretend as you like: as Parmeno told Thais, "Nor will you be content with one." One man will never satisfy you; nor will one woman satisfy many men.[10877]
But as [10878]Pan replied to his father Mercury, when he asked whether he was married, Nequaquam pater, amator enim sum, &c. No father, no, I am a lover still, and cannot be contented with one woman. Pythias, Echo, Menades, and I know not how many besides were his Mistresses, he might not abide marriage.	But, as Pan replied to his father Mercury when asked whether he was married, "Not at all, father, for I am a lover," etc. "No, father, no, I am still a lover and cannot be content with one woman." Pythias, Echo, the Maenads and I do not know how many others were his mistresses: he could not bear marriage.[10879]
Varietas delectat, 'tis loathsome and tedious, what one still? which the Satyrist said of Iberina, is verified in most,	"Variety delights." Marriage is disgusting and tedious: what, always the same one? What the satirist said of Iberina proves true of most:[10880]

[10874] Burton. Printed page 567, †: "Quod licet, ingratum est." "What is permitted gives no pleasure."

[10875] Burton. Printed page 567, t: "For better for worse, for richer for poorer, in sickness and in health, &c. tis durus sermo to a sensuall man." ""Durus sermo" means "a hard saying.""

[10876] Burton. Printed page 567, p: "Ter. act. 1. Sc. 2. Eunuch."

[10877] Editor. The marginal marriage-vow formula explains the lasting tie the sensual person rejects. Terence, Eunuchus 122, has Parmeno say "eras," "you were," to Thais; Burton prints "eris," "you will be." The translation preserves Burton's tense.

[10878] Burton. Printed page 567, q: "Lucian. Tom. 4. necq; cum unâ aliquâ rem habere contentus forem." "Lucian, volume 4: nor would I be content to have an affair with any one woman."

[10879] Editor. Lucian's dialogue of Pan and Hermes, section 2 in the consulted text, names Echo, Pitys and the Maenads; Burton prints Pythias. That name is retained rather than silently corrected. Mercury is Hermes; the Maenads are the female followers of Dionysus. The marginal Latin supplies the sentence's further refusal of one woman.

[10880] Editor. The questions mimic dissatisfaction with one partner; the maxim about variety supplies its rationale. The shift back towards accusations against women is Burton's, followed shortly by a corresponding accusation against men.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10881]Unus Iberinæ vir sufficit? ocyus illud Extorquebis ut hæc oculo contenta sit uno,	Does one man satisfy Iberina? You will sooner Force her to be content with a single eye.[10882]
'Tis not one man will serve her by her will, As soon shee'l have one eye as one man still:	One man will not suffice her, if she has her will; She would as soon have one eye as always one man.
As capable of any impression as materia prima it self, that still desires new forms, like the sea their affections ebb and flow. Husband is a cloak for some to hide their villany; once married she may fly out at her pleasure, the name of Husband is a sanctuary to make all good. Eò ventum (saith Seneca) ut nulla virum habeat, nisi ut irritet adulterum.	As receptive to any impression as "prime matter" itself, which always desires new forms, their affections ebb and flow like the sea. For some women a husband is a cloak to hide their wickedness: once married, a woman may stray as she pleases; the title of husband is a sanctuary that makes everything acceptable. "Things have come to such a pass," says Seneca, "that no woman has a husband except to excite a lover."[10883]

[10881] Burton. Printed page 567, †: "Juvenal."

[10882] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.53–54; the consulted text spells the name Hiberina. The comparison imagines that she would sooner accept one eye than one partner. Burton's separate English rendering follows.

[10883] Editor. "Materia prima," prime matter, is the philosophical substrate that receives form. Burton applies its capacity for forms to changing desire. Seneca, On Benefits 3.16.3, supplies the statement about taking a husband to entice an adulterous lover. "Sanctuary" means a protective refuge or cover.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 567–568 They are right and straight, as true Trojans as mine hostes daughter, that Spanish wench in [10884]Ariosto, as good wives as Messalina. Many men are as constant in their choice, and as good husbands as Nero himself, they must have their pleasure of all they see, and are in a word far more fickle then any woman.	They are upright and true, as faithful a band as my hostess's daughter—that Spanish girl in Ariosto—and as good wives as Messalina. Many men are just as constant in their choice and as good husbands as Nero himself: they must have their pleasure with everyone they see and are, in a word, far more fickle than any woman.[10885]
Source page 568 For either they be full of jealousie, Or masterfull, or loven novelte, &c.	For either they are full of jealousy, Or domineering, or in love with novelty, etc.
Good men have often ill wives, as bad as Xantippe was to Socrates, Elevora to St. Lues, Isabella to our Edward the second: and good wives are as often matched to ill husbands, as Mariamne to Herod, Serena to Dioclesian, Theodora to Theophilus, and Thyra to Gurmunde.	Good men often have bad wives, as bad as Xanthippe was to Socrates, Elevora to St Lues and Isabella to our Edward II. And good wives are just as often matched with bad husbands, as Mariamne with Herod, Serena with Diocletian, Theodora with Theophilus and Thyra with Gurmunde.[10886]
But I will say nothing of dissolute and bad husbands, of Batchelours and their vices; their good qualities are a fitter subject for a just volume, too well known already in every village, town and city, they need no blazon; and lest I should marre any matches, or dis-hearten loving maids, for this present I will let them passe.	But I will say nothing of dissolute and bad husbands, or of bachelors and their vices. Their good qualities are a fitter subject for a full volume; already too well known in every village, town and city, they need no proclamation. And, lest I spoil any matches or dishearten loving young women, for the present I will let them pass.[10887]

[10884] Burton. Printed page 567, u: "Lib. 28."

[10885] Editor. "True Trojans" is an ironic expression for loyal companions; the surrounding comparisons reverse the praise. Burton cites book 28 of Ariosto for the Spanish girl, without a stanza. Messalina and Nero serve as conventional examples of sexual misconduct; the details of Burton's allusions remain uncollated.

[10886] Editor. The names belong to Burton's catalogue of ill-matched couples, whose moral judgments are preserved as his. The scan clearly prints "Elevora" and "St. Lues"; their intended identification remains uncertain. The Serena story and the other historical or legendary assessments require later source collation.

[10887] Editor. A "just volume" is a full or substantial volume; "blazon" is public proclamation. "Good qualities" is sarcastic in its setting. Burton ends with the same pretence of silence with which this block began.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Being that men and women are so irreligious, depraved by nature, so wandring in their affections, so brutish, so subject to disagreement, so unobservant of marriage rites, what shall I say? If thou beest such a one, or thou light on such a wife, what concord can there be, what hope of agreement? 'tis not conjugium but conjurgium, as the Reed and Ferne in the [10888]Embleme, averse and opposite in nature: 'tis twenty to one thou wilt not marry to thy contentment: but as in a lottery forty blanks were drawn commonly for one prize, out of a multitude you shall hardly choose a good one: a small ease hence then, little comfort,	Since men and women are so irreligious, depraved by nature, so wandering in their affections, so brutish, so prone to disagreement, so heedless of marriage vows, what shall I say? If you are such a person, or happen upon such a wife, what harmony can there be, what hope of agreement? It is not wedlock but deadlock—as with the reed and fern in the emblem, averse and opposed by nature. The odds are twenty to one against your marrying to your satisfaction. Just as in a lottery forty blanks were commonly drawn for one prize, you will hardly choose a good partner from a multitude. Little relief, then, little comfort comes from it:[10889]
[10890]Nec integrum unquam transiges lætus diem.	Nor will you ever pass a whole day happily.[10891]
If he or she be such a one, Thou hadst much better be alone.	If he or she is such a person, You would be much better off alone.

[10888] Burton. Printed page 568, r: "Camerar. 82. cent. 3." "Camerarius, emblem 82, third hundred."

[10889] Editor. "Conjugium" means marriage; Burton's punning "conjurgium" evokes quarrelling. "Wedlock/deadlock" reproduces a comparable verbal contrast, though the Latin emphasizes strife. Camerarius's emblem supplies the plant analogy; its text remains uncollated. The numerical odds are rhetorical illustrations, not measured probabilities.

[10890] Burton. Printed page 568, s: "Simonides."

[10891] Editor. Semonides of Amorgos, poem 7, near its end, similarly denies a man living with a woman an untroubled day. This English comparison supports the sense; Burton's Latin version remains untraced. His following couplet applies the warning to either sex.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If she be barren, she is not —— &c. If she have [10892]children, and thy state be not good, though thou be wary and circumspect, thy charge will undo thee, —— fœcunda domum tibi prole gravabit, thou wilt not be able to bring them up, [10893]and what greater misery can there be, then to beget children, to whom thou canst leave no other inheritance but hunger and thirst?	If she is barren, she is not—etc. If she has children and your circumstances are poor, however cautious and careful you may be, the expense will ruin you: "She will burden your household with plentiful offspring." You will not be able to bring them up; and what greater misery can there be than to beget children to whom you can leave no inheritance but hunger and thirst?[10894]
[10895]cum fames dominatur, strident voces rogantium panem, penetrantes patris cor: what so grievous as to turn them up to the wide world, to shift for themselves? No plague like to want: and when thou hast good means, and art very carefull of their education, they will not be ruled.	"When hunger rules, the cries of those asking for bread ring out, piercing their father's heart." What is so grievous as turning them out into the wide world to fend for themselves? No plague equals poverty. And when you have ample means and take great care over their upbringing, they will not obey.
Think but of that old proverb, ἡρώων τέκνα πήματα, Heroum filii noxæ, great mens sons seldome do well; O utinam aut cœlebs mansissem, aut prole carerem! [10896]Augustus exclaims in Suetonius.	Just think of the old proverb, "Heroes' children are troubles," "Heroes' sons are afflictions": great men's sons seldom do well. "Oh, if only I had remained unmarried, or had no offspring!" Augustus exclaims in Suetonius.[10897]

[10892] Burton. Printed page 568, x: "Children make misfortunes more bitter. Bacon."

[10893] Burton. Printed page 568, y: "Heinsius Epist. Primiero. Nihil miserius quàm procreare liberos ad quos nihil ex hæreditate tua pervenire videas præter famem & sitim." "Heinsius, letter to Primiero. Nothing is more miserable than to beget children to whom you see that nothing of your inheritance will pass except hunger and thirst."

[10894] Editor. Burton breaks off the opening complaint with a dash and "&c."; no missing accusation is supplied. "State" means financial circumstances and "charge" the cost of supporting dependants. The following Latin promises abundant offspring as a burden, not a blessing.

[10895] Burton. Printed page 568, †: "Chrys. Fonseca."

[10896] Burton. Printed page 568, x: "Liberi sibi carcinomata." "His children were cancers to him."

[10897] Editor. The Greek proverb and its Latin version are both retained in translation. Suetonius, Augustus 65, gives the emperor's lament in Greek and calls his disgraced daughter Julia and grandchildren Julia and Agrippa his three ulcers and cancers. Burton's Latin compresses that lament and his margin generalizes its targets as children.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Jacob had his Ruben, Simeon and Levi: David an Amnon, an Absolon, Adoniah; wise mens sons are commonly fools, insomuch that Spartian concludes, Neminem prope magnorum virorum optimum & utilem reliquisse filium; [10898]They had been much better to have been childless.	Jacob had his Reuben, Simeon and Levi; David an Amnon, an Absalom, an Adonijah. Wise men's sons are commonly fools, so much so that Spartianus concludes that "scarcely any great man has left behind a thoroughly good and useful son." They would have been much better off childless.[10899]
'Tis too common in the middle sort; Thy sonne's a drunkard, a gamester, a spendthrift; thy daughter a fool, a whore, thy servants lazie drones and theeves, thy neighbours divels, they will make thee weary of thy life.	It is all too common among people of middling rank: your son is a drunkard, a gambler, a spendthrift; your daughter a fool, a whore; your servants lazy drones and thieves; your neighbours devils. They will make you weary of your life.
[10900]If thy wife be froward, when she may not have her will, thou hadst better be buried alive; she will be so impatient, raving still, and roaring like Juno in the Tragedy, there's nothing but tempests, all is in an uproar. If she be soft and foolish, thou wert better have a block, she will shame thee and reveal thy secrets:	If your wife is quarrelsome, you would be better off buried alive whenever she cannot have her way. She will be so impatient, constantly raving and roaring like Juno in the tragedy: nothing but storms, everything in uproar. If she is weak-minded and foolish, you would be better off with a block of wood; she will disgrace you and reveal your secrets.[10901]
Source page 569 if wise and learned, well qualified, there is as much danger on the other side, mulierem doctam ducere periculosissimum, saith Nevisanus, she will be too insolent and peevish,	If she is wise, learned and accomplished, the opposite danger is just as great: "It is most dangerous to marry a learned woman," says Nevisanus. She will be too arrogant and ill-tempered.

[10898] Burton. Printed page 568, y: "Melius fuerat eos sine liberis decessisse." "It would have been better for them to have died without children."

[10899] Editor. Reuben, Simeon and Levi are Jacob's sons; Amnon, Absalom and Adonijah are David's. Burton collects their troubled biblical histories as examples. The exact wording and location of his conclusion attributed to Spartianus remain to be collated.

[10900] Burton. Printed page 568, z: "Lemnius cap. 6. lib. 1. Si morosa, si non in omnibus obsequaris, omnia impacata in ædibus, omnia sursum misceri videas, multæ tempestates, &c. Lib. 2. numer. 101. sil. nup." "Lemnius, chapter 6, book 1. If she is ill-tempered, if you do not comply with her in everything, you will see everything unsettled in the house, everything turned upside down, many storms, etc. Marriage Miscellany, book 2, number 101."

[10901] Editor. "Froward" means contrary or hard to please; "soft" here means weak in judgement. "Juno in the Tragedy" is not identified more precisely. The final reference to Sylva nuptialis in the margin is retained with the Lemnius entry as printed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10902]Malo Venusinam quam te Cornelia mater.	I prefer Venusina to you, mother Cornelia.[10903]
Take heed; if she be a slut, thou wilt loath her; if proud shee'l beggar thee, [10904]shee'l spend thy patrimony in bables, all Arabia will not serve to perfume her haire, saith Lucian: if fair and wanton, shee'l make thee a Cornuto; if deformed, she will paint.	Take care: if she is slovenly, you will loathe her; if proud, she will beggar you. "She will spend your inheritance on trinkets; all Arabia will not suffice to perfume her hair," says Lucian. If beautiful and wanton, she will make a cuckold of you; if ugly, she will paint her face.[10905]
[10906]If her face be filthy by nature, she will mend it by art, alienis & adscititiis imposturis, which who can indure? If she do not paint she will look so filthy, thou canst not love her, and that peradventure will make thee unhonest. Cromerus lib. 12. hist. relates of Casimirus, [10907]that he was unchast, because his wife Aleida the daughter of Henry Landgrave of Hessia, was so deformed.	If her face is ugly by nature, she will improve it artificially, "with borrowed, external deceptions"—and who can bear that? If she does not paint, she will look so ugly that you cannot love her, and perhaps that will make you unfaithful. Kromer, in book 12 of his History, relates that Casimir was unchaste because his wife Aleida, daughter of Henry, Landgrave of Hesse, was so ugly.[10908]
If she be poor, she brings beggery with her (saith Nevisanus) misery and discontent. If you marry a maid, it is uncertain how she proves,	If she is poor, she brings poverty with her, says Nevisanus, misery and discontent. If you marry a maiden, you cannot be sure how she will turn out:
Hæc forsan veniet non satis apta tibi:	Perhaps she will prove ill suited to you.

[10902] Burton. Printed page 569, b: "Juvenal."

[10903] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.167–169, prefers Venustina to Cornelia, mother of the Gracchi, if Cornelia brings pride in her ancestry along with her virtues. Burton prints Venusinam, retained here rather than silently changed to the consulted text's Venustinam.

[10904] Burton. Printed page 569, *: "Tom. 4. Amores. omnem mariti opulentiam profundet, totam Arabiam capillis redolens." "Volume 4, Loves: she will squander all her husband's wealth, her hair fragrant with all Arabia."

[10905] Editor. "Slut" here means dirty or untidy; "Cornuto," cuckold; "paint," use cosmetics. Loves 40, transmitted under Lucian's name, has Callicratidas accuse dark-haired women of spending their husbands' wealth on Arabian perfumes. Burton broadens the charge. This is polemic within a debate about love; his Latin intermediary remains unidentified.

[10906] Burton. Printed page 569, †: "Idem. & quis sanæ mentis sustinere queat &c." "The same: and who in his right mind could endure it, etc.?"

[10907] Burton. Printed page 569, c: "Subegit ancillas quod uxor eius deformior esset." "He had intercourse with maidservants because his wife was rather ugly."

[10908] Editor. Burton cites Marcin Kromer's history of Poland for this allegation about Casimir and Aleida. Its wording and historical basis have not been independently established here. "Unhonest" refers to sexual misconduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If yong, she is likely wanton and untaught; if lusty, too lascivious; and if she be not satisfied, you know where and when, nil nisi jurgia, all is in an uprore, and there is little quietness to be had: if an old maid, 'tis an hazard she dies in childbed: if a rich [10909]widdow, induces te in laqueum, thou dost halter thy self, she will make all away before hand, to her other children, &c.	If young, she is likely to be wanton and untaught; if vigorous, too lustful. And if she is not satisfied —you know where and when—there is "nothing but quarrelling": everything is in uproar, and little peace is to be had. If she is an older maiden, there is a risk she will die in childbirth; if a rich widow, "you lead yourself into a snare," you put a halter round your own neck: she will hand everything over beforehand to her other children, etc.[10910]
—— [10911]dominam quis possit ferre tonantem?	Who could endure a thundering mistress?
she will hit thee still in the teeth with her first husband: if a yong widdow, she is often unsatiable and immodest. If she be rich, well descended, bring a great dowry, or be nobly allied, thy wives friends will eat thee out of house and home, dives ruinam ædibus inducit, she will be so proud, so high-minded, so imperious. For	She will constantly reproach you with her first husband. If a young widow, she is often insatiable and immodest. If she is rich, well born, brings a large dowry or has noble connections, your wife's relations will eat you out of house and home: "A rich woman brings ruin upon a household." She will be so proud, so haughty, so domineering. For[10912]
—— nihil est magis intolerabile dite,	Nothing is more unbearable than a rich woman.[10913]

[10909] Burton. Printed page 569, d: "Sil. nup. l. 2. num. 25. Dives inducit tempestatem, pauper curam: Ducens viduam se inducit in laqueum." "Marriage Miscellany, book 2, number 25. A rich woman brings a storm, a poor woman worry; a man marrying a widow leads himself into a snare."

[10910] Editor. "Lusty" means physically vigorous; the next word, "lascivious," makes the sexual charge explicit. "You know where and when" is Burton's euphemism for sexual satisfaction. The halter image conveys entrapment, and "her other children" are those from the widow's previous marriage.

[10911] Burton. Printed page 569, †: "Sic quisq; dicit, alteram ducit tamen." "Everyone says so, yet marries another woman."

[10912] Editor. "Friends" can include family or relations. "Hit thee in the teeth with" means continually reproach or taunt someone with a comparison. These are the accumulated anti-marriage arguments in Burton's counsel to the lovesick, continuing the passage begun in Block 138.

[10913] Editor. Compare Juvenal, Satire 6.460, where the consulted Latin text has "intolerabilius nihil est quam femina dives." Burton abbreviates and reshapes the line.

Original text 1651	Modern English
there's nothing so intolerable, thou shalt be as the Tassell of a gosse-hauke, [10914]she will ride upon thee, domineer as she list, wear the breeches in her oligarchicall government; and beggar thee besides.	There is nothing so unbearable. You will be like the male of a goshawk: she will ride roughshod over you, domineer as she pleases, wear the breeches in her oligarchic government, and beggar you besides.[10915]
Uxores divites servitutem exigunt; (as Seneca hits them declam. lib. 2. declam. 6.) Dotem accepi, imperium perdidi. They will have soveraigncy, pro conjuge dominam arcessis, they will have attendance, they will do what they list. [10916]In taking a dowry thou loosest thy liberty, dos intrat, libertas exit, hazardest thine estate.	"Rich wives demand servitude"—as Seneca strikes at them in book 2, declamation 6—"I accepted a dowry and lost my authority." They will have sovereignty: "You summon a mistress instead of a wife." They will have servants waiting on them; they will do as they please. In taking a dowry you lose your liberty: "The dowry comes in, freedom goes out"; you put your estate at risk.[10917]
Hæ sunt atq; aliæ multæ in magnis dotibus Incommoditates, sumptusq; intolerabiles, &c.	These and many other troubles accompany great dowries, And unbearable expenses, etc.[10918]
with many such inconveniences: say the best she is a commanding servant; thou hadst better have taken a good huswife maid in her smock. Since then there is such hazard, if thou be wise, keep thy self as thou art, 'tis good to match, much better to be free.	With many such inconveniences. At best, she is a servant who gives orders; you would have done better to take a maiden who was a good housekeeper, with nothing but her shift. Since there is such risk, if you are wise, stay as you are: it is good to marry, much better to be free.[10919]

[10914] Burton. Printed page 569, e: "Si dotata erit, imperiosa, continuoq; viro inequitare conabitur. Petrarch." "If she has a dowry, she will be domineering, and will immediately try to ride over her husband. Petrarch."

[10915] Editor. "Tassell" is a form of tiercel, the male hawk, smaller than the female. The comparison carries into the image of the wife riding over her husband. "Oligarchicall" imports the language of restricted political rule into the household.

[10916] Burton. Printed page 569, f: "If a woman nourish her husband, she is angry and impudent, and ful of reproach. Ecclus 25.24. Scilicet uxori nubere nolo meæ." "The Latin adds: Naturally, I do not wish to be the bride of my own wife."

[10917] Editor. The declamations are associated with Seneca the Elder. Burton's book and declamation numbers are preserved pending exact collation. The margin's Ecclesiasticus is Sirach; its verse numbering is retained. The final Latin uses nubere, conventionally said of the bride, to picture the husband as subordinate to his wife.

[10918] Editor. Plautus, Aulularia 532–533. Burton quotes the complaint about large dowries and their attendant expenses.

[10919] Editor. A "huswife" is a woman skilled in household management. To take her "in her smock" means to marry her without a dowry or possessions beyond her clothing. "Commanding servant" is Burton's pointed contradiction.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [10920]procreare liberos lepidissimum, Hercle verò liberum esse, id multo est lepidius.	To beget children is most delightful; But, by Hercules, to be free is much more delightful.[10921]
[10922]art thou yong? then match not yet; if old, match not at all.	Are you young? Then do not marry yet; if old, do not marry at all.
Vis juvenis nubere? nondum venit tempus. Ingravescente ætate jam tempus præteriit.	Do you wish to marry while young? The time has not yet come. As age advances, the time has already passed.

[10920] Burton. Printed page 569, †: “Plautus mil. glor. act. 3. sc. 1.”

[10921] Editor. Plautus, Miles Gloriosus 682–683, adapted: liberos, “children,” plays against liberum, “free.” The Latin in the play is an exchange between Palaestrio and Periplectomenus.

[10922] Burton. Printed page 569, *: “Stobeus ser. 66. Alex. ab Alexand. lib. 4. cap. 8.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
And therefore with that Philosopher, still make answer to thy friends that importune thee to marry, adhuc intempestivum, 'tis yet unseasonable, and ever will be.	And so, like that philosopher, always answer your friends who press you to marry, "It is still untimely": it is not yet the right time, and never will be.[10923]
Source page 570 Consider withall how free, how happy, how secure, how heavenly, in respect, a single man is, [10924]as he said in the Comœdie, Et isti quod fortunatum esse autumant, uxorem nunquam habui, and that which all my neighbours admire and applaud me for, account so great an happiness, I never had a wife;	Consider, too, how free, how happy, how secure, how heavenly by comparison is a single man's condition. As he said in the comedy, "And what those people think a piece of good fortune: I have never had a wife." And what all my neighbours admire and applaud me for, what they account so great a blessing: I have never had a wife.[10925]
consider how contentedly, quietly, neatly, plentifully, sweetly and how merrily he lives! he hath no man to care for but himself, none to please, no charge, none to controle him, is tied to no residence, no cure to serve, may go and come, when, whither, live where he will, his own master, and do what he list himself.	Consider how contentedly, peacefully, neatly, abundantly, pleasantly and merrily he lives! He has no one to care for but himself, no one to please, no dependants, no one to control him. He is bound to no residence, has no charge to attend to, may come and go when and where he wishes, live wherever he chooses, be his own master and do whatever he pleases.[10926]

[10923] Editor. The paradox that it is first too early and then too late to marry is cited through Stobaeus and Alexander ab Alexandro. Burton leaves "that Philosopher" unnamed here; no identification is supplied without collation.

[10924] Burton. Printed page 570, †: "They shall attend the lamb in heaven, because they were not defiled with women. Apoc. 14."

[10925] Editor. Plautus, Miles Gloriosus, in Periplectomenus's praise of his independence; Burton supplies his own expanded English gloss, preserved separately. The nearby marginal appeal to Revelation 14 concerns the undefiled followers of the Lamb, not the comic speaker.

[10926] Editor. "Cure" is a charge or responsibility, with a possible echo of pastoral care and clerical residence. The passage describes the supposed freedom of the bachelor, not an assertion that all unmarried people have no obligations.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Consider the excellency of Virgins, [10927]Virgo cœlum meruit, marriage replenish the earth, but virginity Paradise; Elias, Eliseus, John Baptist were Batchelors: Virginity is a pretious jewell, a fair garland, a never fading flower; [10928]for why was Daphne turned to a green bay tree, but to shew that virginity is immortall?	Consider the excellence of virgins: "The virgin has merited heaven." Marriage fills the earth, but virginity Paradise. Elijah, Elisha and John the Baptist were bachelors. Virginity is a precious jewel, a beautiful garland, a flower that never fades. For why was Daphne changed into a green laurel tree, except to show that virginity is immortal?[10929]
[10930]Ut flos in septis secretus nascitur hortis, Ignotus pecori, nullo contusus aratro, Quam mulcent auræ, firmat Sol, educat imber, &c. Sic virgo dum intacta manet, dum chara suis, sed Cum Castum amisit, &c. ——	As a flower grows secluded in enclosed gardens, Unknown to cattle, bruised by no plough, Caressed by breezes, strengthened by the sun, nourished by rain, etc., So a maiden, while she remains untouched, while dear to her own; but When she has lost her chaste flower, etc.[10931]
Virginity is a fine picture, as [10932]Bonaventure calls it, a blessed thing in it self, and if you will believe a Papist, meritorious.	Virginity is a beautiful picture, as Bonaventure calls it, a blessed thing in itself, and, if you will believe a Papist, meritorious.[10933]

[10927] Burton. Printed page 570, *: "Nuptiæ replent terram, virginitas Paradisum. Hier." "Marriage fills the earth, virginity Paradise. Jerome."

[10928] Burton. Printed page 570, h: "Daphne in laurum semper virentem, immortalem docet gloriam paratam virginibus pudicitiam servantibus." "Daphne's transformation into an evergreen laurel teaches that immortal glory is prepared for virgins who preserve their chastity."

[10929] Editor. Burton moves between unmarried life and consecrated virginity. Elias and Eliseus are Elijah and Elisha. Daphne's laurel is interpreted allegorically here: the explanation is Burton's moral reading of the transformation.

[10930] Burton. Printed page 570, †: "Catull. Car. nuptiali."

[10931] Editor. Catullus 62.39–47, shortened and altered. Burton omits intervening lines, prints Quam where the consulted text has quem, and leaves the last line incomplete. "Flower" in the translation supplies the understood noun from the comparison and from Catullus's full line; the omissions remain visible.

[10932] Burton. Printed page 570, i: "Diet. salut. c. 22. pulcherrimum sertum infiniti precii, gemma & pictura speciosa." "Diet of Salvation, chapter 22: a most beautiful garland of infinite price, a jewel and a splendid picture."

[10933] Editor. "Papist" is Burton's polemical term for a Roman Catholic. "Meritorious" concerns religious merit, not simply something praiseworthy. The Dieta salutis citation is reproduced as Burton attributes it; authorship and edition remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And although there be some inconveniences, irksomness, solitariness, &c. incident to such persons, want of those comforts, quæ ægro assideat, & curet ægrotum, fomentum paret, roget medicum, &c. embracing, dalliance, kissing, colling, &c. those furious motives and wanton pleasures a new married wife most part enjoyes; yet they are but toyes in respect, easily to be endured, if conferred to those frequent incumbrances of marriage;	And although such people suffer some inconveniences—boredom, loneliness, etc.—and lack those comforts, "a woman to sit beside the sick man, tend him in his illness, prepare a soothing application, send for the doctor, etc.," embraces, dalliance, kisses, caresses, etc., those passionate stirrings and sensual pleasures a newly married wife generally enjoys, yet these are trifles by comparison, easily endured when set against the frequent burdens of marriage.[10934]
Solitariness may be otherwise avoided with mirth, musick, good company, business, imployment; in a word, [10935]Gaudebit minus, & minus dolebit; for their good nights, he shall have good daies.	Loneliness may be avoided in other ways: with merriment, music, good company, business and occupation. In a word, "He will rejoice less and grieve less." In exchange for their good nights, he will have good days.[10936]
And me thinks sometime or other amongst so many rich Bachelors, a benefactor should be found to build a monasticall College for old, decayed, deformed, or discontented maides to live together in, that have lost their first loves, or otherwise miscarried, or else are willing howsoever to lead a single life.	And it seems to me that, sooner or later, among so many rich bachelors a benefactor ought to be found to build a monastic college where unmarried women who are old, impoverished, disfigured or unhappy could live together—women who have lost their first loves or met with other misfortunes, or who, for whatever reason, wish to lead a single life.[10937]

[10934] Editor. "Colling" means embracing, especially about the neck; "furious motives" are intense impulses or stirrings of passion. The source explicitly says "wife," retained here. The Latin describes a woman's attendance during illness; its precise source is not identified in the margin.

[10935] Burton. Printed page 570, *: "Mart."

[10936] Editor. Martial 12.34.11 reads Gaudebis, "you will rejoice," where Burton has Gaudebit, "he will rejoice." The poem concerns friendship; Burton applies its concluding caution to unmarried life. "Their good nights" contrasts married sexual pleasures with the bachelor's tranquil days.

[10937] Editor. "Decayed" can mean reduced in means or circumstances; "miscarried" here means met with misfortune or failed in one's hopes, not specifically suffered pregnancy loss. Burton proposes a communal residence for women who are unwilling or unable to marry.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The rest I say are toyes in respect, and sufficiently recompenced by those innumerable contents and incomparable priviledges of Virginity. Think of these things, confer both lives, and consider last of al these commodious prerogatives a Bachelor hath, how well he is esteemed, how heartily welcome to all his friends, quam mentitis obsequiis, as Tertullian observes, with what counterfeit curtesies they will adore him, follow him, present him with gifts, hamatis donis:	The rest, I say, are trifles by comparison, amply compensated by the countless satisfactions and incomparable privileges of virginity. Think about these things; compare the two ways of life; and consider, last of all, these advantageous privileges a bachelor enjoys: how highly he is esteemed, how warmly all his friends welcome him, "with what feigned attentions," as Tertullian observes—what counterfeit courtesies they will use to adore him, follow him and present him with gifts, "gifts with hooks in them."[10938]
it cannot be believed, (saith [10939]Ammianus) with what humble service he shall be worshipped, how loved and respected: If he want children (and have means) he shall be often invited, attended on by Princes, and have advocates to plead his cause for nothing, as [10940]Plutarch addes. Wilt thou then be reverenced, and had in estimation?	It is incredible, says Ammianus, with what humble service he will be worshipped, how loved and respected. If he has no children—and has money—he will be frequently invited out, waited on by princes, and have advocates to plead his case for nothing, as Plutarch adds. Do you wish, then, to be revered and highly esteemed?[10941]
—— * dominus tamen & domini rex Si tu vis fieri, nullus tibi parvulus aula Luserit Æneas, nec filia dulcior illa? Iucundum & charum sterilis facit uxor Amicum.	But if you wish to become a master and your master's king, Let no little Aeneas have played in your hall, Nor a daughter sweeter than she; A barren wife makes a pleasant and cherished friend of you.[10942]

[10938] Editor. The praise turns satirical: counterfeit attentions and gifts with hooks imply that the rich bachelor is courted for his estate. Burton cites Tertullian without a location; the exact passage remains unverified.

[10939] Burton. Printed page 570, o: "Lib. 24. qua obsequiorum diversitate colantur homines sine liberis." "Book 24: with what variety of attentions childless men are courted."

[10940] Burton. Printed page 570, p: "Hunc alii ad cœnam invitant, princeps huic famulatur, oratores gratis patrocinantur. lib. de amore Prolis." "Some invite him to dinner, a prince waits on him, advocates plead for him for nothing. Book On Love of Offspring."

[10941] Editor. The references to Ammianus, book 24, and Plutarch's On Love of Offspring are retained as printed; the precise passages and numbering remain to be collated. The claim depends on the man being both childless and wealthy.

[10942] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 5.137–140, adapted. The consulted text has illo, "him," referring to little Aeneas; Burton prints illa, "her," retained in the translation despite its uncertain reference. Aeneas here stands for a son. Childlessness makes the rich patron vulnerable to fortune-hunters. The printed asterisk has no corresponding marginal entry on this page.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 570–571 Live a single man, marry not, and thou shalt soon percieve how those Hæredipetæ (for so they were called of old) will seek after thee, bribe and flatter thee for thy favour, to be thine heire or executor: Aruntius and Aterius, those famous parasites in this kinde, as [10943]Tacitus and [10944]Seneca have recorded, shall not go beyond them.	Live as a single man, do not marry, and you will soon see how those legacy hunters—for that was their name in antiquity—will seek you out, bribe and flatter you for your favour, to become your heir or executor. Aruntius and Aterius, those famous parasites of this kind recorded by Tacitus and Seneca, will not surpass them.[10945]
Source page 571 Periplectomines that good personat old man, delitium senis, well understood this in Plautus; for when Pleusides exhorted him to marry that he might have children of his own, he readily replied in this sort,	Periplectomines, that fine old man in the play, "a delight of an old fellow," understood this well in Plautus. When Pleusides urged him to marry so that he might have children of his own, he readily answered as follows:[10946]
Quando habeo multos cognatos, quid opus mihi sit liberis? Nunc benè vivo & fortunatè, atq; animo ut lubet. Mea bona mea morte cognatis dicam interpartiant. Illi apud me edunt, me curant, visunt quid agam, ecquid velim, Qui mihi mittunt munera, ad prandium, ad cœnam vocant,	When I have many relatives, what need have I of children? Now I live well and happily, just as I please. At my death I will direct that they share my property among my relatives. They eat at my house, care for me, visit to see how I am and what I want, Send me gifts, and invite me to lunch and dinner.[10947]

[10943] Burton. Printed page 570,]: "Annal. 11."

[10944] Burton. Printed page 571, q: "6º de benefic. 38."

[10945] Editor. Hæredipetæ means people hunting inheritances. The Tacitus margin is printed at the foot of the preceding page and is anchored here to his name. Burton gives Aruntius and Aterius, Annals 11 and On Benefits 6.38; the names and exact reference relationship remain to be checked.

[10946] Editor. Plautus's characters are normally named Periplectomenus and Pleusicles; Burton's printed forms remain in both columns. "Personat" means represented as a character. The unusual delitium senis is rendered idiomatically; it is not silently rewritten in the original.

[10947] Editor. Miles Gloriosus 705–715 supplies the context. Burton compresses 705–712 into five lines, omitting the dawn visits and sacrificial portions. His irregular dicam interpartiant corresponds to didam, inter eos partiam, division among relatives. The ensuing play makes their motive explicit: they covet his property. Burton's wording and separate English verse remain; his immediate edition is unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Whilest I have kin, what need I brats to have? Now I live well, and as I will, most brave. And when I dye, my goods Ile give away, To them that do invite me every day, That visite me, and send me pretty toyes, And strive who shall do me most curtesies.	While I have kin, what need have I of brats? Now I live well, as I please, in splendid style. And when I die, I will give my goods away To those who invite me every day, Who visit me and send me pretty gifts, And vie to show me the most kindness.
This respect thou shalt have in like manner, living as he did, a single man. But if thou marry once, [10948]cogitato in omni vita te servum fore, bethink thy self what a slavery it is, what an heavy burthen thou shalt undertake, how hard a task thou art tied to; for as Hierome hath it, qui uxorem habet, debitor est, & uxoris servus alligatus,	You will receive the same respect if you live as he did, a single man. But once you marry, "consider that you will be a slave throughout your life." Think what slavery it is, what a heavy burden you undertake, what a hard task you are bound to; for, as Jerome puts it, "He who has a wife is a debtor, bound as his wife's slave."[10949] and how continuate, what squalor attends it, what irksomeness, what charges; for wife and children are a perpetual bill of charges; besides a Myriade of cares, miseries, and troubles, for as that Comical Plautus merrily and truly said, He that wants trouble, must get to be master of a ship, or marry a wife; and as another seconds him, wife and children have undone me; so many and such infinite incumbrances accompany this kinde of life.	And how unceasing it is, what squalor attends it, what drudgery, what expense! For a wife and children are a perpetual bill of expenses, besides a myriad cares, miseries and troubles. As the comic poet Plautus said, merrily and truly, anyone who lacks trouble must become master of a ship or marry a wife. And as another supports him, wife and children have ruined me. So many, such endless burdens accompany this way of life.
Furthermore, uxor intumuit, &c. or as he said in the Comœdy,	Furthermore, "the wife has swollen up," etc.; or, as he said in the comedy:[10950]
[10951]Duxi uxorem, quam ibi miseriam vidi, nati filii, alia cura.	I married a wife: what misery I experienced there! Children were born: another worry.[10952]

[10948] Burton. Printed page 571, †: "E Græco." "From the Greek."

[10949] Editor. The margin labels the slavery maxim "From the Greek," without identifying a writer. "Debtor" in Jerome's saying invokes the obligations of marriage. The exact Jerome passage remains to be collated.

[10950] Editor. Uxor intumuit means literally "the wife has swollen." In this sequence of childbirth and expense, pregnancy is the likely implication, though swelling with anger is also possible; the translation keeps the image open.

[10951] Burton. Printed page 571, †: "Ter. Adelph."

[10952] Editor. Terence, Adelphoe 867–868: Demea recalls marriage and children in a speech comparing his own harsh, laborious life with his brother's more agreeable one. Burton presents the words as a compact complaint.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All gifts and invitations cease, no friend will esteem thee, and thou shalt be compelled to lament thy misery, and make thy mone with [10953]Bartholomæus Scheræus, that famous Poet Laureat, and professor of Hebrew in Witenberge: I had finished this work long since, but that inter alia dura & tristia quæ misero mihi pene tergum fregerunt (I use his own words) amongst many miseries which almost broke my back, συζυγία ob Xantipismum, a shrew to my wife, tormented my minde above measure, and beyond the rest.	All gifts and invitations cease; no friend will value you, and you will be forced to lament your misery and make your complaint with Bartholomaeus Scheraeus, that famous poet laureate and professor of Hebrew at Wittenberg: "I would have finished this work long ago, except that, among other hard and grievous things that almost broke my miserable back"—I use his own words—among many miseries that almost broke my back, "marriage, through Xanthippe-like behaviour," a shrew for my wife, tormented my mind beyond measure and more than all the rest.[10954]
So shalt thou be compelled to complain, and to cry out at last, with [10955]Phoroneus the lawyer, How happy had I been, if I had wanted a wife!	So you too will be forced to complain and cry out at last, with Phoroneus the lawyer, "How happy I would have been if I had had no wife!"
If this which I have said will not suffice, see more in Lemnius lib. 4. cap. 13. de occult. nat. mir. Espensæus de continentia. lib. 6. cap. 8. Kornman de virginitate, Platina in Amor. dial. Practica artis amandi, Barbarus de re uxoria. Arnisæus in polit. cap. 3. and him that is instar omnium, Nevisanus the Lawyer, Sylva nuptial. almost in every page.	If what I have said does not suffice, see more in Lemnius, On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 4, chapter 13; Espensaeus, On Continence, book 6, chapter 8; Kornmann, On Virginity; Platina's Dialogue on Love; The Practice of the Art of Loving; Barbaro, On Marriage; Arnisaeus, Politics, chapter 3; and the one who is "a match for them all," Nevisanus the lawyer, in almost every page of his Marriage Miscellany.[10956]

[10953] Burton. Printed page 571, †: "Itineraria in Psalmos institutione ad lectorem."

[10954] Editor. The Greek συζυγία means marriage or union under a yoke; Xantipismus evokes Xanthippe, traditionally represented as Socrates' quarrelsome wife. Burton translates his mixed-language quotation in stages, and those repetitions are retained. The margin's Itineraria in Psalmos and institutione ad lectorem need bibliographical collation.

[10955] Burton. Printed page 571, *: "Bruson lib. 7. 22. cap. Si uxor deesset, nihil mihi ad summam felicitatem defuisset." "Brusonius, book 7, chapter 22. If I had had no wife, nothing would have been lacking to my complete happiness."

[10956] Editor. This is Burton's further-reading list; English renderings of abbreviated Latin titles identify their subjects without claiming particular modern editions. Instar omnium means the equivalent of all the others. The precise editions and the full set of cited locations have not been verified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 572 SUBSECT. 4. Philters, Magicall, and Poeticall cures.	Subsection 4 Love potions and magical and poetic cures
Where perswasions and other remedies will not take place, many fly to unlawfull means, Philters, Amulets, Magick spels, Ligatures, Characters, Charmes, which as a wound with the spear of Achilles, if so made and caused, must so be cured.	Where persuasion and other remedies have no effect, many turn to unlawful means: love potions, amulets, magical spells, bindings, signs and charms. As with a wound from Achilles' spear, if the wound has been made and caused in that way, it must be cured in the same way.[10957]
If forced by Spels and Philters, saith Paracelsus, it must be eased by Characters, Mag. lib. 2. cap. 28. and by Incantations. Fernelius Path. lib. 6. cap. 13. [10958]Skenkius lib. 4. observ. Med. hath some examples of such as have been so magically caused, and magically cured, and by witch-craft: so saith Baptista Codronchus, lib. 3. cap. 9. de mor. ven. Malleus malef. cap. 6.	If imposed by spells and love potions, says Paracelsus, it must be relieved by magical signs—Magic, book 2, chapter 28—and by incantations: Fernel, Pathology, book 6, chapter 13. Schenck, Medical Observations, book 4, has examples of cases brought about by magic and cured by magic and witchcraft. So too says Giovanni Battista Codronchi, On Venereal Diseases, book 3, chapter 9; The Hammer of Witches, chapter 6.[10959]

[10957] Editor. "Philters" are love potions; "ligatures" magical bindings; "characters" inscribed signs. The Achilles comparison invokes the traditional idea that the weapon causing a wound could also cure it. Burton calls these practices unlawful before cataloguing them.

[10958] Burton. Printed page 572, k: "Extinguitur virilitas ex incantamentorum maleficiis; neq; enim fabula est, nonnulli reperti sunt, qui ex veneficiis amore privati sunt, ut ex multis historiis patet." "Virility is extinguished by the evil workings of incantations; this is no fable, for some have been found deprived of love by sorcery, as many accounts show."

[10959] Editor. Burton groups medical and demonological works as witnesses to magical causation and cure. His references are retained, including the terse Malleus maleficarum citation. The margin shifts from love to loss of sexual potency; those are related but distinct claims.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis not permitted to be done, I confess: yet often attempted: see more in Wierus lib. 3. cap. 18. de præstig. de remediis per Philtra. Delrio Tom. 2. lib. 2. quest. 3. sect. 3. disquisit. magic. Cardan lib. 16. cap. 90. reckons up many magneticall medicines, as, to piss through a ring, &c. Mizaldus cent. 3. 30. Baptista Porta, Jason Pratensis, Lobelius pag. 87. Matthiolus, &c. prescribe many absurd remedies.	It is not permissible, I admit, yet it is often attempted. See further Weyer, On the Deceptions of Demons, book 3, chapter 18, on remedies through love potions; Delrio, Magical Investigations, volume 2, book 2, question 3, section 3. Cardano, book 16, chapter 90, lists many sympathetic remedies, such as pissing through a ring, etc. Mizaldus, third century, item 30; Giambattista della Porta; Jason Pratensis; Lobel, page 87; Mattioli, etc., prescribe many absurd remedies.[10960]
Radix mandragoræ ebibitæ, Annuli ex ungulis Asini, Stercus amatæ sub cervical positum, illa nesciente, &c. quum odorem fœditatis sentit, amor solvitur.	Mandrake root taken in a drink; rings made from an ass's hooves; the beloved woman's dung placed under the pillow without her knowledge, etc.: when he smells its foulness, his love dissolves.[10961]
Noctuæ ovum abstemios facit comestum, ex consilio Iarchæ Indorum gymnosophistæ apud Philostratum lib. 3. Sanguis amasiæ ebibitus omnem amoris sensum tollit: Faustinam Marci Aurelii uxorem, gladiatoris amore captam, ita penitus consilio Chaldæorum liberatam, refert Julius Capitolinus.	An owl's egg, eaten on the advice of Iarchas, the Indian naked philosopher in Philostratus, book 3, makes people abstain from wine. Drinking a mistress's blood removes all feeling of love: Julius Capitolinus reports that Faustina, Marcus Aurelius's wife, who was captivated by love for a gladiator, was completely freed from it in this way on the Chaldeans' advice.[10962]

[10960] Editor. "Magneticall" here concerns supposed attraction or sympathy, not modern magnetic treatment. A "century" is a collection of one hundred items. Burton himself calls these remedies absurd; the catalogue is translated as his historical report. Cardano's work is not named here.

[10961] Editor. The Latin is a compressed list, with mandragoræ ebibitæ grammatically awkward as printed. The pillow's possessor is not expressly stated; no possessor is added in the translation. The text explicitly gives the woman's ignorance and the lover's response to the smell.

[10962] Editor. "Abstemios" means abstinent from wine, which makes the owl's-egg item distinct from the love remedies around it. In Historia Augusta, Marcus Aurelius 19.1–4, the Faustina tale involves bathing in the gladiator's blood and then lying with her husband, not drinking a mistress's blood. The source presents it as a reported story; Burton's compression is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some of our Astrologers will effect as much by Characteristicall Images, ex Sigillis Hermetis, Salomonis, Chaelis, &c. mulieris imago habentis crines sparsos, &c.	Some of our astrologers will accomplish as much through images bearing magical signs: “from the seals of Hermes, Solomon, Chael, etc.; an image of a woman with her hair loose,” etc.[10963]
Our old Poets and Phantasticall writers have many fabulous remedies for such as are love-sick, as that of Protesilaus tombe in Philostratus, in his dialogue betwixt Phœnix and Vinitor: Vinitor upon occasion discoursing of the rare vertues of that shrine, telleth him that Protesilaus Altar and Tombe [10964]cures almost all manner of diseases, consumptions, dropsies, quartan agues, sore eyes: and amongst the rest, such as are love-sick, shall there be helped.	Our old poets and imaginative writers have many fabulous remedies for the lovesick, such as the tomb of Protesilaus in Philostratus, in his dialogue between a Phoenician and a vinegrower. Taking the opportunity to discuss the shrine’s remarkable powers, the vinegrower tells him that the altar and tomb of Protesilaus cure almost every kind of disease: wasting illnesses, dropsy, quartan fevers and sore eyes; among the rest, the lovesick will find relief there.[10965]
But the most famous is [10966]Leucata Petra, that renowned Rock in Greece, of which Strabo writes, Geog. lib. 10. not far from Saint Maures, saith Sands lib. 1. From which rock if any Lover flung himself down headlong, he was instantly cured. Venus after the death of Adonis when she could take no rest for love,	But the most famous is Leucata Petra, that renowned rock in Greece of which Strabo writes in Geography, book 10, not far from Saint Maura, according to Sandys, book 1. If any lover threw himself headlong from that rock, he was instantly cured. After Adonis’s death, when Venus could find no rest for love,[10967]

[10963] Editor. These are talismanic figures associated with the named magical authorities. “Seals” means signs or designs, not wax closures. Chael’s precise identity and the cited collection remain unverified.

[10964] Burton. Printed page 572, l: “Curat omnes morbos, Phthises, hydropes & oculorum morbos, & febre quartana laborantes & amore captos, miris artibus eos demulcet.” “He cures all diseases, wasting illnesses, dropsies and diseases of the eyes; he soothes sufferers from quartan fever and those captured by love through marvellous arts.”

[10965] Editor. Phœnix and Vinitor identify the Phoenician and the vinegrower in Philostratus’s Heroicus. In 16.1–2, Protesilaus heals diseases and advises unlucky lovers; Burton compresses the account into a general promise of relief. “Phthises” are wasting diseases; “dropsy” is fluid accumulation; a quartan fever recurs every fourth day by inclusive counting. Burton presents the shrine’s healing powers as a fabulous report.

[10966] Burton. Printed page 572, m: “The moral is, vehement Fear expells Love.”

[10967] Editor. Strabo, Geography 10.2.9, reports the belief attached to the Leucadian rock and quotes Menander on Sappho. Saint Maura is the historical name associated with Leucas/Lefkada. Burton’s marginal explanation makes violent fear, rather than the water alone, the supposed mechanism. This is the reported legend, not established efficacy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10968]Cum vesana suas torreret flamma medullas,	When a maddening flame scorched her very marrow,[10969]
came to the Temple of Apollo to know what she should do to bee eased of her pain: Apollo sent her to Leucata Petra, where she precipitated her self, and was forthwith freed, and when she would needs know of him a reason of it, he told her again, that he had often observed [10970]Jupiter when he was enamoured on Juno, thither go to ease and wash himself, and after him diverse others.	She came to Apollo's temple to learn what she should do to ease her pain. Apollo sent her to Leucata Petra, where she threw herself down and was immediately freed. When she insisted on knowing the reason, he answered that he had often seen Jupiter go there to find relief and bathe when he was enamoured of Juno, and various others after him.
Cephalus for the love of Protela, Degoneus daughter, leapt down here, that Lesbian Sappho for Phaon, on whom she miserably doted.	Cephalus leapt down here for love of Protela, daughter of Degoneus; and Sappho of Lesbos for Phaon, on whom she doted miserably.[10971]
Source page 573 [10972]Cupidinis œstro percita è summo præceps ruit,	Driven by Cupid's frenzy, she plunged headlong from the summit.
hoping thus to ease her self, and to be freed of her love pangs.	Hoping in this way to find relief and be freed from the pangs of love.
[10973]Hic se Deucalion Pyrrhæ succensus amore Mersit, & illæso corpore pressit aquas. Nec mora, fugit amor, &c. ——	Here Deucalion, burning with love for Pyrrha, Plunged into the water and struck it unharmed. Without delay, his love fled, etc.[10974]

[10968] Burton. Printed page 572, †: "Catullus."

[10969] Editor. Catullus 100.7, adapted: the consulted text reads meas, "my," where Burton has suas, "her." He transfers the poet's burning passion to Venus. This is not Catullus's narrative of Venus and Adonis.

[10970] Burton. Printed page 572, n: "Quum Junonem deperiret Jupiter omnipotens, ibi solitus lavare, &c." "When almighty Jupiter was desperately in love with Juno, he used to bathe there, etc."

[10971] Editor. Strabo 10.2.9 names Pterelas, son of Deioneus, as Cephalus's beloved. Burton instead prints Protela, daughter of Degoneus; his names and gender are retained and the discrepancy is made explicit here. The next Latin line is his rendering of the Sappho tradition cited to Menander.

[10972] Burton. Printed page 573, †: "Menander."

[10973] Burton. Printed page 573, o: "Ovid. ep. 21."

[10974] Editor. The Deucalion passage is Heroides 15.165–168 in standard verse numbering, in Sappho's letter to Phaon. Burton's margin reads epistle 21. His wording abbreviates the Latin; his own separate four-line English rendering is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hither Deucalion came, when Pyrrha's love Tormented him, and leapt down to the sea, And had no harm at all, but by and by His love was gone and chased quite away.	Here Deucalion came when love for Pyrrha Tormented him, and leapt down into the sea. He suffered no harm at all, and straight away His love was gone, completely driven off.
This medicine Jos. Scaliger speaks of, Ausoniarum Lectionum lib. 18. Salmutz in Pancirol. de. 7. mundi mirac. and other writers. Pliny reports that amongst the Cyzeni, there is a Well consecrated to Cupid, of which if any lover tast, his passion is mitigated:	Joseph Scaliger speaks of this remedy in his Readings in Ausonius, book 18; so do Salmuth in his commentary on Panciroli, On the Seven Wonders of the World, and other writers. Pliny reports that among the Cyzeni there is a spring consecrated to Cupid, and that any lover who tastes its water has his passion eased.[10975]
And Anthony Verdurius Imag. deorum, de Cupid. saith, that amongst the Ancients there was [10976]Amor Lethes, he took burning torches, and extinguished them in the river; his statua was to be seen in the Temple of Venus Elusina, of which Ovid makes mention, and saith, that all lovers of old went thither on pilgrimage, that would be rid of their love pangs.	And Anthony Verdurius, Images of the Gods, on Cupid, says that the ancients had a Love of Forgetfulness: he took burning torches and extinguished them in the river. His statue could be seen in the temple of Venus Elusina, which Ovid mentions, saying that in antiquity all lovers who wished to be rid of their pangs went there on pilgrimage.[10977]

[10975] Editor. The scan reads lib. 18 in the Scaliger reference; the precise bibliographical location remains unresolved. Salmutz is retained in the original, modernized to Salmuth. Cyzeni is the printed place-name; the Pliny passage has not yet been securely identified.

[10976] Burton. Printed page 573, p: "Apud antiquos amor Lethes olim fuit, is ardentes faces in profluentem inclinabat; huius statua Veneris Elusinæ templo visebatur, quo amantes confluebant, qui amicæ memoriam deponere volebant." "Among the ancients there was once a Love of Forgetfulness, who lowered burning torches into a river; his statue was seen in the temple of Venus Elusina, where lovers gathered who wished to put away the memory of their mistress."

[10977] Editor. Ovid, Remedies for Love 549–554, describes Lethaean Love at the temple named for Eryx near the Colline Gate: Love adds cold water to his torches and lovers ask to forget. Burton's "Venus Elusina" differs from that setting; it is preserved rather than silently corrected. Lethe is forgetfulness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Pausanias in [10978]Phocicis, writes of a Temple dedicated, Veneri in spelunca, to Venus in the vault, at Naupactus in Achaia (now Lepanto) in which your widowes that would have second husbands, made their supplications to the Goddesse; all manner of suits concerning Lovers were commenced, and their grievances helped.	Pausanias, in his account of Phocis, writes of a temple dedicated "to Venus in a cave"—to Venus in the vault—at Naupactus in Achaea, now Lepanto. There, widows who wanted second husbands made their petitions to the goddess; all manner of lovers' suits were brought and their grievances relieved.[10979]
The same Author in Achaicis, tells as much of the river [10980]Seneleus in Greece; if any Lover washed himself in it, by a secret vertue of that water, (by reason of the extream coldness belike) he was healed of Loves torments,	The same author, in his account of Achaea, tells a similar story of the river Seneleus in Greece: if any lover bathed in it, a hidden power in the water—because of its extreme coldness, perhaps—healed him of love's torments.[10981]
[10982]Amoris vulnus idem qui sanat facit.	The one who heals love's wound is the very one who makes it.[10983]

[10978] Burton. Printed page 573, †: "Lib. 10. Vota ei nuncupant amatores, multis de causis, sed imprimis viduæ mulieres, ut sibi alteras à dea nuptias exposcant." "Book 10. Lovers address vows to her for many reasons, but especially widows, to ask the goddess to grant them another marriage."

[10979] Editor. Pausanias 10.38.12 confirms a cave sanctuary of Aphrodite at Naupactus, where widows especially prayed to marry again. Burton uses Venus, her Roman counterpart. "Suits" means petitions, with a suggestion of legal proceedings; his description extends beyond the brief Pausanias passage.

[10980] Burton. Printed page 573, †: "Rodiginus ant. lect. lib. 16. cap. 25. cals it Selenus. Omni amore liberat." "Rhodiginus, Ancient Readings, book 16, chapter 25, calls it Selenus. It frees people from all love."

[10981] Editor. Pausanias 7.23.1–3 calls the river Selemnus and reports the belief that bathing there removes love. Burton prints Seneleus and his margin Selenus. Pausanias qualifies the story with "if"; Burton retains that doubt in the next paragraph. The conjecture about extreme cold is Burton's addition.

[10982] Burton. Printed page 573, †: "Seneca."

[10983] Editor. The printed marginal attribution is Seneca. The same wording occurs in the consulted Sententiae of Publilius Syrus. Burton's route to the Senecan attribution remains to be collated. "Idem qui" identifies the maker and healer as the same agent.

Original text 1651	Modern English
which if it be so, that water as he holds, is omni auro pretiosior, better then any gold. Where none of all these remedies will take place, I know no other, but that all Lovers must make an head, and rebell, as they did in [10984]Ausonius, and crucifie Cupid till he grant their request, or satisfie their desires.	If that is so, the water, as he maintains, is "more precious than all gold," worth more than any gold. Where none of these remedies has any effect, I know no other course: all lovers must join forces and rebel, as they did in Ausonius, and crucify Cupid until he grants their request or satisfies their desires.[10985]

[10984] Burton. Printed page 573, q: "Cupido crucifixus: Lepidum poema." "Cupid Crucified: a charming poem."

[10985] Editor. "Make an head" means unite in resistance. Ausonius's Cupido cruciatus 57–65 has the dead heroines bind Cupid to a myrtle; at 94–104 they relent, and he escapes the nightmare. Burton adapts this as lovers forcing him to grant their desires. The Seneca attribution of the preceding maxim still needs tracing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 5. The last and best cure of Love Melancholy, is, to let them have their desire.	SUBSECTION 5 The last and best cure for love melancholy is to let lovers have their desire.
The last refuge and surest remedy, to be put in practice in the utmost place, when no other means will take effect, is, to let them go together, and enjoy one another; potissima cura est ut heros amasia sua potiatur, saith Guianerius, cap. 15. tract. 15.	The last refuge and surest remedy, to be tried as a final resort when no other means will work, is to let them come together and enjoy one another: "The most effective cure is for the lovesick man to possess his beloved," says Guianerius, chapter 15, treatise 15.[10986]
Æsculapius himself to this malady, cannot invent a better remedy, quam ut amanti cedat amatum, [10987](Jason Pratensis) then that a Lover have his desire.	Aesculapius himself can invent no better remedy for this malady "than that the beloved yield to the lover"—Jason Pratensis—than that a lover have his desire.[10988]
Et pariter torulo bini jungantur in uno, Et pulchro detur Æneæ Lavinia conjux.	And let the two be joined together in one little bed, And let Lavinia be given as wife to handsome Aeneas.[10989]
And let them both be joyned in a bed, And let Æneas fair Lavinia wed.	And let them both be joined in a bed, And let Aeneas wed fair Lavinia.
Source page 574 'Tis the special cure, to let them bleed in vena Hymenæa, for love is a pluresie, and if it be possible, so let it be,	The specific cure is to let them bleed in "Hymen's vein," for love is a pleurisy; and if possible, let it be so:[10990]
—— optataq; gaudia carpant.	And let them enjoy the pleasures they desire.

[10986] Editor. Heros is the lovesick patient in the medical vocabulary cited here. Burton presents union as the final remedy after other means fail. Guianerius's exact edition and the chapter and treatise numbering remain for collation.

[10987] Burton. Source page 573, †: "cap. 19. de morb. cerebri." "Chapter 19, On Diseases of the Brain."

[10988] Editor. Aesculapius is the classical god of medicine. The Latin says that the beloved yields to the lover; Burton immediately restates this as the lover's obtaining his desire. Jason Pratensis is cited to his work on diseases of the brain.

[10989] Editor. The two Latin lines invoke the union of Aeneas and Lavinia. Pulchro qualifies Aeneas as handsome; Burton's separate English version instead places "fair" beside Lavinia. Both versions retain their distinct wording.

[10990] Editor. Vena Hymenæa, "Hymen's vein," is a sexual conceit named for the god of marriage: bloodletting is made an image of marital intercourse. The claim about pleurisy belongs to Burton's analogy and historical medical framework.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[10991]Arculanus holds it the speediest and the best cure, 'tis Savanarolas [10992]last precept, a principal infallible remedy, the last, sole, and safest refuge.	Arculanus holds it the quickest and best cure. It is Savonarola's last instruction, a principal and infallible remedy, the last, only and safest refuge.
[10993]Julia sola potes nostras extinguere flammas, Non nive, non glacie, sed potes igne pari.	Julia, you alone can extinguish my flames, Not with snow or ice, but with an equal fire.[10994]
Julian alone can quench my desire, With neither ice nor snow, but with like fire.	Julian alone can quench my desire, With neither ice nor snow, but with a matching fire.
When you have all done, saith [10995]Avicenna, there is no speedier or safer course, then to joyne the parties together according to their desires & wishes, the custome and forme of law; and so we have seen him quickly restored to his former health, that was languished away to skin and bones; after his desire was satisfied, his discontent ceased, and we thought it strange; our opinion is therefore that in such cases Nature is to be obeyed.	When all else has been tried, says Avicenna, there is no quicker or safer course than to unite the parties according to their desires and wishes, and the custom and form of law. We have thus seen a man who had wasted away to skin and bones quickly restored to his former health. Once his desire was satisfied, his distress ceased, and we thought it remarkable. Our opinion, therefore, is that in such cases nature should be obeyed.[10996]

[10991] Burton. Source page 574, r: "Patiens potiatur re amata, si fieri possit, optima cura. cap. 16. in 9. Rhasis." "Let the patient possess the beloved object, if possible: the best cure. Chapter 16, on book 9 of Rhazes."

[10992] Burton. Source page 574, s: "Si nihil aliud, nuptiæ & copulatio cum ea." "If nothing else, marriage and union with her."

[10993] Burton. Source page 574, †: "Petronius Catal."

[10994] Editor. The Latin names Julia, but the English line on the scan reads Julian, retained here. The margin attributes the couplet to "Petronius Catal."; its precise identification remains unresolved.

[10995] Burton. Source page 574, t: "Cap. de Ilishi. Non invenitur cura, nisi regimen connexionis inter eos, secundum modum promissionis, & legis, & sic vidimus ad carnem restitutum, qui jam venerat ad arefactionem; evanuit cura postquam sensit, &c." "Chapter on Ilishi. No cure is found except arranging a union between them according to the manner of promise and law; thus we have seen restored to flesh one who had already reached a state of wasting; his anxiety vanished after he experienced it, etc."

[10996] Editor. Burton gives an expanded English account of the Avicenna passage reproduced in the margin. Ilishi is the printed term in that chapter heading. "Restored to flesh" describes recovery from wasting. These are the authorities' reported cures.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Areteus an old Author lib. 3. cap. 3. hath an instance of a yong man, [10997]when no other means could prevail, was so speedily relieved. What remaines then but to joyn them in marriage?	Aretaeus, an ancient author, in book 3, chapter 3, gives an example of a young man who, when no other means could help, was quickly relieved in this way. What remains, then, but to join them in marriage?[10998]
[10999]Tunc & Basia morsiunculasq; Surreptim dare, mutuos fovere Amplexus licet, & licet jocari.	Then they may secretly exchange Kisses and little bites, cherish one another's Embraces, and take their pleasure.[11000]
they may then kiss and coll, lye and look babies in one anothers eyes, as their Syres before them did, they may then satiate themselves with loves pleasures, which they have so long wished and expected;	They may then kiss and embrace, lie gazing at their tiny reflections in one another's eyes, as their fathers did before them; they may then satisfy themselves with love's pleasures, which they have so long desired and awaited.[11001]
Atq; uno simul in toro quiescant, Conjuncto simul ore suavientur, Et somnos agitent quiete in una.	And let them rest together in one bed, Kiss with their mouths joined together, And sleep together in one peaceful rest.

[10997] Burton. Source page 574, u: "Fama est melancholicum quendam ex amore insanabiliter se habentem, ubi puellæ se conjunxisset, restitutum, &c." "It is reported that a certain melancholic, incurably afflicted by love, recovered after he united with the girl, etc."

[10998] Editor. The Aretaeus example is attributed to book 3, chapter 3; the exact edition and its relation to modern numbering remain to be collated. Burton explicitly makes marriage the proposed form of union.

[10999] Burton. Source page 574, †: "Jovian. Pontanus, Basi. lib. 1." "Jovianus Pontanus, Basi., book 1."

[11000] Editor. Morsiunculæ are little bites or love-bites; jocari here suggests erotic play. The margin prints "Basi. lib. 1." after Pontanus's name. The exact textual location of these two verse passages remains unverified.

[11001] Editor. "Coll" means embrace. To "look babies" in another's eyes is to gaze at the tiny reflected images of oneself; it does not mean to look at literal children. "Syres" means fathers or forefathers.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Yea but hic labor, hoc opus, this cannot conveniently be done, by reason of many and severall impediments. Sometimes both parties themselves are not agreed: Parents, Tutors, Masters, Gardians, will not give consent; Laws, Customes, Statutes hinder: poverty, superstition, fear and suspition: many men dote on one woman, semel & simul: she dotes as much on him, or them, and in modesty must not, cannot woo, as unwilling to confess, as willing to love: she dare not make it known, shew her affection, or speak her minde.	Yes, but "here is the labour, here the task": this cannot readily be done, because of many different obstacles. Sometimes the parties themselves are not agreed. Parents, tutors, masters and guardians will not consent; laws, customs and statutes stand in the way; poverty, superstition, fear and suspicion. Many men dote on one woman "all at the same time." She dotes just as much on him, or them, yet in modesty she must not, cannot woo, as reluctant to confess as she is willing to love. She dares not make it known, show her affection or speak her mind.[11002]
And hard is the choice (as it is in Euphues) when one is compelled either by silence to dye with grief, or by speaking to live with shame. In this case almost was the fair Lady Elizabeth Edward the fourth his daughter, when she was enamoured on Henry the seventh, that noble yong Prince, and new saluted King, when she brake forth into that passionate speech,	And "hard is the choice," as it says in Euphues, "when one is forced either to die of grief through silence, or to live in shame through speaking." The beautiful Lady Elizabeth, Edward IV's daughter, was almost in this position when she fell in love with Henry VII, that noble young prince, newly hailed as king, and burst into this passionate speech:[11003]
[11004]O that I were worthy of that comely Prince! but my father being dead, I want friends to motion such a matter! What shall I say? I am all alone, and dare not open my mind to any. What if I acquaint my mother with it? bashfulness forbids. What if some of the Lords? audacity wants. O that I might but confer with him, perhaps in discourse I might let slip such a word that might discover mine intention!	"Oh, if only I were worthy of that handsome prince! But my father is dead, and I lack friends to propose such a matter. What shall I say? I am all alone, and dare not reveal my thoughts to anyone. What if I tell my mother? Shyness forbids it. What if I tell one of the lords? I lack the boldness. Oh, if only I might speak with him! Perhaps in conversation I might let slip a word that would reveal my intention."[11005]

[11002] Editor. The opening adapts Aeneid 6.129, whose order is hoc opus, hic labor. Burton lists impediments both to reciprocal love and to marriage; the later clauses describe the restraint imposed on women's courtship by modesty.

[11003] Editor. Euphues is John Lyly's prose romance. Elizabeth is identified as Edward IV's daughter and Henry VII's prospective partner. The quoted thoughts are a literary historical representation, not a verified verbatim record of her speech.

[11004] Burton. Source page 574, †: "Speedes hist. e M.S. Ber. Andreæ." "Speed's History, from a manuscript of Bernard André."

[11005] Editor. "Motion" means propose or put forward. Burton's source chain is John Speed's History and a manuscript attributed to Bernard André; the exact passage and manuscript remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 574–575 How many modest maides may this concern, I am a poor servant, what shall I do? I am a fatherless child, and want means, I am blith and buxome, yong and lusty, but I have never a sutor. Exspectant stolidi ut ego illos rogatum veniam, as [11006]she said, a company of silly fellows, look belike that I should woo them and speak first: fain they would and cannot woo,	How many modest maidens may this concern! "I am a poor servant: what shall I do? I am a fatherless child and lack means. I am cheerful and lively, young and vigorous, but I have no suitor. The fools expect me to come and ask them," as she said. A pack of silly fellows apparently expect me to woo them and speak first. Gladly would these women woo, but they cannot:[11007]
Source page 575 —— [11008]quæ primum exordia summam?	What opening words shall I choose?[11009]
being meerly passive they may not make sute, with many such lets and inconveniences, which I know not; what shall we do in such a case? sing Fortune my Foe? ——	Confined to a passive role, they may not make advances, with many other such obstacles and difficulties that I know nothing of. What shall we do in such a case? Sing "Fortune my Foe"?[11010]

[11006] Burton. Source page 574, †: "Lucretia in Cælestina. act. 19. Barthio interpret." "Lucretia in Celestina, act 19, translated by Barth."

[11007] Editor. "Buxome" and "lusty" suggest liveliness and vigour. In Celestina 19, Lucrecia envies Melibea's intimacy with Calisto and complains that his servants expect her to seek them out. The Spanish text confirms the situation; Barth's Latin remains uncollated. Burton moves from this speaker to women unable to initiate courtship.

[11008] Burton. Source page 575, †: "Virg. 4. Æn." "Virgil, Aeneid 4."

[11009] Editor. The scan reads summam, retained in the original column; the translation follows the evident sense of sumam. Aeneid 4.284 has quae prima exordia sumat, asking how Aeneas is to begin speaking to Dido. Burton turns it into a first-person question.

[11010] Editor. "Lets" are impediments. Fortune my Foe is a song title, invoked as a ready-made lament; no further lyrics are supplied here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some are so curious in this behalf, as those old Romans, our modern Venetians, Dutch and French, that if two parties dearly love, the one noble, the other ignoble, they may not by their Laws match, though equal otherwise in years, fortunes, education, and all good affection. In Germany except they can prove their gentility by three descents, they scorn to match with them.	Some are so particular in this matter—the ancient Romans, our modern Venetians, Dutch and French—that if two people dearly love each other, one noble and the other of common birth, their laws forbid them to marry, though otherwise equal in age, fortune, education and all sincere affection. In Germany they scorn to marry anyone who cannot prove gentle birth through three generations.[11011]
A noble man must marry a noble woman: a Baron, a Barons daughter; a Knight, a Knights: a Gentleman, a Gentlemans: as slaters sort their slattes, do they degrees and families. If she be never so rich, fair, well-qualified otherwise, they will make him forsake her. The Spaniards abhor all widows; the Turks repute them old women, if past five and twenty. But these are too severe Laws, and strict Customs, dandum aliquid amori, we are all the sons of Adam, 'tis opposite to Nature, it ought not to be so.	A nobleman must marry a noblewoman; a baron, a baron's daughter; a knight, a knight's; a gentleman, a gentleman's. They sort ranks and families as roofers sort their slates. However rich, beautiful or otherwise accomplished she may be, they will make him abandon her. Spaniards abhor all widows; Turks consider women old if they are over twenty-five. But these laws are too severe, these customs too strict: "Something must be allowed to love." We are all Adam's sons. It is contrary to nature; it ought not to be so.[11012]
Again he loves her most impotently, she loves not him, and so è contra. [11013]Pan loved Echo, Echo Satyrus, Satyrus Lyda.	Again, he loves her uncontrollably, but she does not love him, and vice versa. Pan loved Echo, Echo a satyr, and the satyr Lyda.[11014]

[11011] Editor. "Dutch" could cover German as well as Netherlandish peoples in Burton's usage; he next turns specifically to Germany. "Gentility" means gentle or noble birth. The sweeping claims about marriage laws are Burton's account, not a verified survey of each jurisdiction.

[11012] Editor. A "portion" or rank in this discussion concerns social and marital standing. Burton opposes excessive restrictions on marriage through the common descent of humanity from Adam. His national generalizations about widows and age are retained as his assertions.

[11013] Burton. Source page 575, *: "E Græco Moschi." "From the Greek of Moschus."

[11014] Editor. "Impotently" means without self-control, not sexually impotent. Satyrus is rendered as a satyr; Burton presents the linked loves of Pan, Echo, the satyr and Lyda through a Latin rendering attributed to Moschus.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Quantum ipsorum aliquis amantem oderat, Tantum ipsius amans odiosus erat.	As much as any one of them hated a lover, So much, as a lover, he himself was hated.[11015]
They love and loath of all sorts, he loves her, she hates him; and is loathed of him, on whom she dotes. Cupid hath two darts, one to force love, all of gold, and that sharp, —— [11016]Quod facit auratum est; another blunt, of Lead, and that to hinder; —— fugat hoc, facit illud amorem.	They love and loathe in every combination: he loves her, she hates him, and the man she dotes on loathes her. Cupid has two darts: one to compel love, entirely of gold and sharp—"The one that creates it is gilded"—and another blunt one of lead to prevent it: "This drives love away; that creates it."[11017]
This we see too often verified in our common experience. [11018]Choresus dearly loved that Virgin Callyrrhoe, but the more he loved her, the more she hated him. Oenone loved Paris, but he rejected her; they are stiffe of all sides, as if beauty were therefore created to undo, or be undone.	We see this confirmed all too often in everyday experience. Choresus dearly loved the maiden Callyrrhoe, but the more he loved her, the more she hated him. Oenone loved Paris, but he rejected her. They are unyielding on every side, as if beauty had been created to ruin others or be ruined itself.[11019]

[11015] Editor. Moschus, poem V in Edmonds's translation, A Lesson to Lovers, gives this chain of rejected love, then advises loving those who love you. The awkward ipsius amans is retained. The modern version follows the reciprocal frustration evident in Burton's prose and this English comparison; the Latin intermediary remains unidentified.

[11016] Burton. Source page 575, a: "Ovid. Met. 1." "Ovid, Metamorphoses 1."

[11017] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.468–471: Cupid's gold-pointed arrow creates love, and the blunt leaden one repels it. Burton separates and rearranges portions of the lines, surrounding them with his own explanation.

[11018] Burton. Source page 575, b: "Pausanias Achaicis lib. 7. Perditè amabat Challyrhoen virginem, & quanto erat Choresi amor vehementior, tanto erat puellæ animus ab ejus amore alienior." "Pausanias, Achaean affairs, book 7. He desperately loved the maiden Challyrhoe; and the more intense Choresus's love was, the more averse the girl's heart was to his love."

[11019] Editor. Pausanias 7.21.1 tells of the priest Coresus and Callirhoe; Burton prints Choresus and Callyrrhoe, while the margin has Challyrhoe. The original spellings are retained. Oenone is the nymph abandoned by Paris; Burton couples these examples of rejected love.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I give her all attendance, all observance, I pray and intreat, [11020]Alma precor miserere mei, fair mistris pitty me, I spend my self, my time, friends and fortunes to win her favour, (as he complains in the [11021]Eglogue,) I lament, sigh, weep, and make my moan to her, but she is hard as flint,	I wait on her, pay her every attention, beg and plead: "Gracious one, I pray you, pity me"; fair mistress, pity me. I spend myself, my time, my friends and my fortune to win her favour—as he complains in the eclogue. I lament, sigh, weep and pour out my grief to her, but she is hard as flint:[11022]
—— cautibus Ismariis immotior ——	More unmoving than the rocks of Ismarus.
as fair and hard as a diamond, she will not respect, —— Despectus tibi sum, or hear me,	As beautiful and hard as a diamond, she will neither regard me—"You despise me"—nor hear me:[11023]

[11020] Burton. Source page 575, †: "Virg. 6. Æn." "Virgil, Aeneid 6."

[11021] Burton. Source page 575, c: "Erasmus Egl. Galatea." "Erasmus, the eclogue Galatea."

[11022] Editor. Aeneid 6.117: Aeneas addresses the Sibyl as alma, "gracious one," asking her to pity him and his father. Burton adapts the appeal with mei, "me," and reapplies it to a mistress. The Erasmus eclogue citation is reproduced but has not been independently located.

[11023] Editor. "Despectus tibi sum" is also found in Virgil's Eclogue 2.19, where Corydon complains to Alexis. Burton interweaves short poetic phrases with his own speaker's lament; the Ismarian rocks and the following fleeing-beloved couplet require further source collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— fugit illa vocantem Nil lachrymas miserata meas, nil flexa querelis.	She flees from me as I call, Pitying none of my tears, unmoved by my complaints.
What shall I do?	What shall I do?
I wooed her as a young man should do, But Sir she said I love not you.	I wooed her as a young man should, But "Sir," she said, "I do not love you."
[11024]Durior at scopulis mea Cælia, marmore, ferro, Robore, rupe, antro, cornu, adamante, gelu.	But my Caelia is harder than crags, marble, iron, Oak, rock, cave, horn, adamant or ice.[11025]
Rock, Marble, heart of Oak with iron bar'd, Frost, flint or adamants are not so hard.	Rock, marble, heart of oak barred with iron, Frost, flint or adamant are not so hard.
I give, I bribe, I send presents, but they are refused.	I give, I bribe, I send presents, but they are refused.
[11026]Rusticus est Coridon, nec munera curat Alexis.	Corydon is a country bumpkin, and Alexis cares nothing for gifts.[11027]
Source page 575–unnumbered verso I protest, I swear, I weep, —— [11028]odioq; rependit amores, Irrisit lachrymas —— she neglects me for all this, she derides me, contemns me, she hates me: Phillida flouts me: Caute, feris, quercu durior Euridice, stiffe, churlish, rocky still.	I declare my love, I swear, I weep: "She repays love with hatred"; "She laughed at my tears." Despite all this, she ignores me, mocks me, despises me, hates me. Phillida scoffs at me: "Eurydice, harder than rock, wild beasts or oak"—unyielding, harsh, stony still.[11029]

[11024] Burton. Source page 575, *: "Angerianus Erotopægnion."

[11025] Editor. Angerianus is Girolamo Angeriano. "Adamant" is the proverbial substance of extreme hardness, often associated with diamond. Burton's English couplet compresses the longer Latin catalogue, and both are preserved separately.

[11026] Burton. Source page 575, d: "Virg." "Virgil."

[11027] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 2.56, adapted. The consulted text reads Rusticus es, Corydon, "You are a rustic, Corydon"; Burton instead has est Coridon, "Corydon is a rustic." Alexis is the male beloved in Virgil's poem.

[11028] Burton. Source page 575, e: "Lechæus."

[11029] Editor. The margin's Lechæus is retained without an unverified identification. "Phillida flouts me" and the Latin fragments make a collage of rejected lovers' complaints. Caute, feris, quercu lists a rock, wild beasts and oak as standards of hardness.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page unnumbered verso after 575 And tis most true, many Gentlewomen are so nice, they scorn all suiters, crucifie their poor Paramours, and think no body good enough for them, as dainty to please as Daphne her self,	And it is quite true: many gentlewomen are so fastidious that they scorn all suitors, torment their poor lovers and think nobody good enough for them, as hard to please as Daphne herself:[11030]
[11031]Multi illam petiere, illa aspernata petentes, Nec quid Hymen, quid amor, quid sint connubia curat.	Many sought her; she scorned those who sought her, And cared nothing for Hymen, love or marriage.[11032]
Many did woo her, but she scorn'd them still, And said she would not marry by her will.	Many wooed her, but she always scorned them, And said she would not marry of her own will.
One while they will not marry, as they say at least, (when as they intend nothing less) another while not yet, when 'tis their only desire, they rave upon it. She will marry at last, but not him: he is a proper man indeed, and well qualified, but he wants means: another of her suiters hath good means, but he wants wit; one is too old, another too yong, too deformed, she likes not his carriage: a third too loosely given, he is rich, but base born:	At one time they will not marry—so they say, at least, though that is the last thing they intend; at another, not yet, when it is their sole desire and they are mad for it. She will marry eventually, but not him: he is certainly a handsome, accomplished man, but he lacks means. Another suitor has ample means, but lacks sense. One is too old; another too young, too ugly; she dislikes his manner. A third is too dissolute; he is rich, but low-born.[11033]

[11030] Editor. "Nice" means excessively fastidious or hard to please; "paramours" here means lovers. "Crucifie" figuratively means torment. The unnumbered verso is PDF 684, sequence 584; the following recto actually prints 576.

[11031] Burton. Source page unnumbered verso after 575, †: "Ovid Met. 1." "Ovid, Metamorphoses 1."

[11032] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.478–480, shortened and altered: the consulted text has aversata rather than Burton's aspernata, and includes an intervening line. Hymen is the god of marriage, and here also evokes marriage itself.

[11033] Editor. "Proper" means handsome or well-formed; "wit" means sense or understanding; "carriage" is manner or behaviour. "They intend nothing less" means that refusing marriage is furthest from their intention, despite what they say.

Original text 1651	Modern English
she will be a Gentlewoman, a Lady, as her sister is, as her mother is: she is all out as fair, as well brought up, hath as good a portion, and she looks for as good a match, as Matilda or Dorinda: if not, she is resolved as yet to tarry, so apt are yong maids to bogle at every object, so soon woon or lost with every toy, so quickly diverted, so hard to be pleased.	She will be a gentlewoman, a lady, as her sister is, as her mother is. She is every bit as beautiful, as well brought up, has as good a marriage portion, and expects as good a match as Matilda or Dorinda. Otherwise, she is resolved to wait for the present. Young maidens are so ready to shy at every object, so easily won or lost by every trifle, so quickly turned aside, so hard to please.[11034]
In the mean time, quot torsit amantes? one suiter pines away, languisheth in love, mori quot denique cogit! another sighs and grieves, she cares not: and which [11035]Stroza objected to Ariadne,	Meanwhile, "How many lovers has she tormented?" One suitor pines away, languishing in love: "How many, in the end, does she drive to death!" Another sighs and grieves; she does not care. And there is what Strozzi reproached Ariadne with:[11036]
Nec magis Euriali gemitu, lacrymisque moveris, Quam prece turbati flectitur ora sali. Tu juvenem, quo non formosior alter in urbe, Spernis, & insano cogis amore mori,	You are no more moved by Euryalus's groans and tears Than the face of the troubled sea is softened by prayer. You scorn a youth, the handsomest in the city, And drive him to die of maddening love.
Is no more mov'd with those sad sighs and tears, Of her sweet-heart, then raging Sea with prayers: Thou scorn'st the fairest youth in all our City, And mak'st him almost mad for love to dye:	She is no more moved by her sweetheart's Sad sighs and tears than the raging sea by prayers. You scorn the handsomest youth in all our city, And drive him almost mad, to die for love.

[11034] Editor. "All out" means fully or every bit; a "portion" is the property a woman brings to marriage. To "bogle" is to shy or start, as a horse does; "toy" means a trifle. Matilda and Dorinda serve as names in the comparison, without a specific identification supplied here.

[11035] Burton. Source page unnumbered verso after 575, *: "Erot. lib. 2." "Erotica, book 2."

[11036] Editor. Stroza is rendered Strozzi; Burton's margin gives Erotica, book 2. The exact poem and early edition remain to be collated. Burton's separate English rendering changes the Latin's direct second-person reproach into third person before returning to "thou."

Original text 1651	Modern English
They take a pride to prank up themselves, to make yong men enamored, —— [11037]captare viros & spernere captos, to dote on them, and to run mad for their sakes,	They take pride in dressing themselves up to make young men fall in love—"to capture men and scorn them once captured"—to make them dote on them and go mad for their sakes.[11038]
—— [11039]sed nullis illa movetur Fletibus, aut voces ullas tractabilis audit,	But she is moved by no tears, Nor will she listen to any plea with a yielding heart.[11040]
Whilest niggardly their favours they discover, They love to be belov'd, yet scorn the Lover.	While they grant their favours grudgingly, They love to be loved, yet scorn the lover.
All suit and service is too little for them, presents too base:	All courtship and service are too little for them, presents too paltry:
Tormentis gaudet amantis —— & spoliis,	She delights in her lover's torments—and in the spoils.[11041]
As Atalanta they must be over-run, or not wonn. Many yong men are as obstinate, and as curious in their choice, as tyrannically proud, insulting, deceitful, false-hearted, as irrefragable and peevish on the other side, Narcissus like,	Like Atalanta, they must be outrun or cannot be won. On the other side, many young men are just as obstinate and particular in their choice, just as tyrannically proud, overbearing, deceitful and false-hearted, just as unyielding and perverse, like Narcissus:[11042]

[11037] Burton. Source page unnumbered verso after 575, †: "T. H."

[11038] Editor. "Prank up" means adorn or dress elaborately. The marginal initials T. H. are preserved without expansion because the cited writer has not been securely identified.

[11039] Burton. Source page unnumbered verso after 575, †: "Virg. 4. Æn." "Virgil, Aeneid 4."

[11040] Editor. Aeneid 4.438–439, adapted. Virgil's ille and tractabilis describe Aeneas resisting Dido's pleas; Burton changes ille to illa, transferring the resistance to a woman. His separate English couplet makes a broader accusation about lovers.

[11041] Editor. The verse means that she enjoys the lover's suffering and the gains or spoils obtained from him. No marginal attribution accompanies this line on the scan; the source remains to be located.

[11042] Editor. Atalanta could be won in marriage by the suitor who defeated her in a footrace. Burton then makes the criticism reciprocal: men too may be proud, deceitful and difficult to please. "Irrefragable" means stubbornly resistant here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11043]Multi illum Juvenes, multæ petiere puellæ, Sed fuit in tenerâ tam dira superbia formâ, Nulli illum Juvenes, nullæ petiere puellæ.	Many young men and many maidens sought him; But such fierce pride dwelt in his youthful beauty That no young men, no maidens sought him.[11044]
Source page 576 Yong men and maids did to him sue, But in his youth so proud, so coy was he, Yong men and maids bad him adiew.	Young men and maidens courted him, But in his youth he was so proud, so aloof, That young men and maidens bade him farewell.
Echo wept and wooed him by all means above the rest, love me for pitty, or pitty me for love, but he was obstinate,	More than all the rest, Echo wept and tried every means of wooing him: love me out of pity, or pity me for love. But he was obstinate:
Ante ait emoriar quam sit tibi copia nostri,	"I would sooner die," he says, "than let you possess me."[11045]
he would rather dye then give consent. Psyche ran whining after Cupid,	He would rather die than consent. Psyche ran after Cupid, pleading:
[11046]Formosum tua te Psyche formosa requirit, Et poscit te dia deum, puerumque puella,	Your beautiful Psyche seeks you, beautiful one; A goddess asks for you, a god; a girl for you, a boy.[11047]
Fair Cupid, thy fair Psyche to thee sues, A lovely lass a fine yong gallant wooes;	Fair Cupid, your fair Psyche pleads with you; A lovely lass woos a handsome young gallant.

[11043] Burton. Source page unnumbered verso after 575, x: "Metamor. 3." "Metamorphoses 3."

[11044] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.353–355, altered. The consulted Ovid has cupiere, "desired," dura, "hard," and tetigere, "touched"; Burton prints petiere, "sought," dira, "fierce," and petiere again. His English version likewise makes the suitors withdraw. The discrepancy is preserved, not silently corrected.

[11045] Editor. Metamorphoses 3.391. Narcissus refuses Echo; Burton's prose immediately repeats the meaning of the Latin. Copia nostri means access to or possession of me in this context.

[11046] Burton. Source page 576, †: "Fracastorius Dial. de anim." "Fracastoro, Dialogue on the Soul."

[11047] Editor. Burton cites Fracastoro's Dialogue on the Soul. Dia means divine or goddess; the line balances god with goddess, and boy with girl. The exact location and form of Fracastoro's verse remain for collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but he rejected her nevertheless. Thus many Lovers do hold out so long, doting on themselves, stand in their own light, till in the end they come to be scorned and rejected, as Stroza's Gargiliana was,	But he rejected her nevertheless. In this way many lovers hold out so long, doting on themselves and standing in their own way, that in the end they come to be scorned and rejected, as Strozzi's Gargiliana was:[11048]

[11048] Editor. "Stand in their own light" means obstruct their own prospects. The Strozzi couplet reproaches Gargiliana after the loss of her former admirers; the poem's precise bibliographical location remains unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Te juvenes, te odere senes, desertaque langues, Quæ fueras procerum publica cura prius.	Young men hate you, old men hate you; abandoned, you languish, You who were once the common concern of noblemen.
Both yong and old do hate thee scorned now, That once was all their joy and comfort too.	Both young and old now hate and scorn you, Who once were all their joy and comfort too.
as Narcissus was himself,	As Narcissus himself was:
—— Who despising many Died ere he could enjoy the love of any.	Who, despising many, Died before he could enjoy the love of any.
They begin to be contemned themselves of others, as he was of his shadow, and take up with a poor curat, or an old serving-man at last, that might have had their choice of right good matches in their youth, like that generous Mare in [11049]Plutarch, which would admit of none but great Horses, but when her tail was cut off and mane shorn close, and she now saw her self so deformed in the water, when she came to drink, ab asino conscendi se passa, she was contented at last to be covered by an Ass. Yet this is a common humor, will not be left, and cannot be helped.	They in turn begin to be despised by others, as he was by his reflection, and finally settle for a poor curate or an old servant, though in their youth they might have had their choice of excellent matches. They resemble that well-bred mare in Plutarch who would admit only fine stallions; but when her tail was cut off and her mane shorn close, and she saw herself so disfigured in the water as she came to drink, "she allowed an ass to mount her": at last she was content to be mated with an ass. Yet this is a common disposition; people will not abandon it, and it cannot be helped.[11050]
[11051]Hanc volo quæ non vult, illam quæ vult ego nolo: Vincere vult animos, non satiare Venus.	I want this woman who does not want me; that one who does, I do not want. Venus wishes to conquer hearts, not satisfy them.[11052]

[11049] Burton. Source page 576, †: "Dial. am." "Dialogue on Love."

[11050] Editor. "Shadow" means reflection; "generous" means well-bred or of noble stock. Burton's "curat" is a curate, a clergyman. The mare story is attributed to Plutarch's Dialogue on Love in the margin; its exact location and wording remain for collation.

[11051] Burton. Source page 576, †: "Ausonius."

[11052] Editor. Ausonius's epigram beginning Hanc volo quæ non vult contrasts desire for the unwilling with rejection of the willing. Burton's four-line English version expands the two Latin lines, replacing Venus's conquest of hearts with Love's torture of souls.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I love a maid, she loves me not: full fain She would have me, but I not her again; So Love to crucifie mens souls is bent, But seldom doth it please or give content.	I love a maiden who does not love me; another Would gladly have me, but I do not want her. So Love is bent on torturing people's souls, And seldom pleases them or gives content.
Their love danceth in a ring, and Cupid hunts them round about, he dotes, is doted on again,	Their love dances in a ring, and Cupid chases them round and round: he dotes, and someone in turn dotes on him.
Dumque petit petitur, pariterque accendit & ardet,	While he seeks, he is sought; he kindles and burns at once.[11053]
their affection cannot be reconciled. Oftentimes they may and will not, 'tis their own foolish proceedings that mars all, they are too distrustful of themselves, too soon dejected: say she be rich, thou poor: she yong, thou old; she lovely and fair, thou most illfavoured and deformed; she noble, thou base: she spruce and fine, but thou an ugly Clown: nil desperandum, there's hope enough yet: Mopso Nisa datur, quid non speremus amantes?	Their affections cannot be brought into agreement. Often they could, but will not: their own foolish conduct spoils everything. They have too little confidence in themselves and are too easily discouraged. Suppose she is rich and you poor; she young and you old; she lovely and beautiful, you extremely ugly and misshapen; she noble, you low-born; she elegant and finely dressed, you an ugly rustic. "Never despair": there is still hope enough. "Nisa is given to Mopsus: what may we lovers not hope for?"[11054]
Put thy self forward once more, as unlikely matches have been and are daily made, see what will be the event. Many leave roses and gather thistles, loath hony and love verjuice: our likings are as various as our palates. But commonly they omit opportunities, oscula qui sumpsit, &c. they neglect the usual means and times.	Put yourself forward once more. Matches just as unlikely have been made and are made every day: see what the outcome will be. Many leave roses and gather thistles, loathe honey and love sour grape juice. Our likings vary as much as our palates. But commonly they let opportunities pass—"He who has taken kisses, etc."—and neglect the customary means and occasions.[11055]

[11053] Editor. Metamorphoses 3.425, from Narcissus's love for his own reflection. Burton applies its paradox—simultaneously pursuing and pursued, kindling and burning—to the circle of frustrated lovers.

[11054] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 8.26. Nisa's being given to Mopsus is spoken bitterly by a rejected lover in Virgil; Burton uses the unexpected match to encourage hope. "Base" means low-born; "clown" is a rustic.

[11055] Editor. Verjuice is sour juice from unripe grapes or other fruit. The unfinished oscula qui sumpsit echoes Ovid, Art of Love 1.669, a passage urging a man to proceed beyond kisses. Burton leaves the rest at "etc."; that truncation is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page unnumbered verso after 576 He that will not when he may, When he will he shall have nay.	He who will not when he may, When he wishes will be told no.
They look to be wooed, sought after, and sued to. Most part they will and cannot, either for the above-named reasons, or for that there is a multitude of suiters equally enamored, doting all alike; and where one alone must speed, what shall become of the rest? Hero was beloved of many, but one did enjoy her; Penelope had a company of suiters, yet all missed of their aym.	They expect to be wooed, sought after and courted. Most often they wish to marry but cannot, either for the reasons already named or because a crowd of suitors are equally enamoured, all doting alike. Where only one can succeed, what is to become of the rest? Hero was loved by many, but one enjoyed her; Penelope had a crowd of suitors, yet all failed in their aim.[11056]
In such cases he or they must wisely and warily unwind themselves, unsettle his affections by those rules above prescribed, —— [11057]quin stultos excutit ignes, divert his cogitations, or else bravely bear it out, as Turnus did, Tua sit Lavinia conjux, when he could not get her, with a kind of heroical scorn he bid Æneas take her, or with a milder farewell, let her go,	In such cases he, or they, must wisely and carefully disentangle themselves and loosen the attachment by the rules already prescribed —"Why does he not shake off these foolish fires?"—turn his thoughts elsewhere, or bear it bravely as Turnus did: "Let Lavinia be your wife." When he could not win her, he told Aeneas to take her, with a kind of heroic scorn. Or let her go with a gentler farewell:[11058]
—— Et Phillida solus habeto, take her to you, God give you joy Sir. The Fox in the Emblem would eat no grapes, but why? because he could not get them; care not thou for that which may not be had.	"And have Phyllis to yourself": take her; God grant you joy, sir. The fox in the emblem would eat no grapes. But why? Because he could not get them. Do not trouble yourself over what cannot be had.[11059]

[11056] Editor. Hero's lover is Leander; Penelope's suitors fail because she remains the wife of Odysseus. "Speed" means succeed. The proverb at the top of the unnumbered verso completes the preceding discussion of missed opportunities.

[11057] Burton. Source page unnumbered verso after 576, †: "Ovid. Met. 9." "Ovid, Metamorphoses 9."

[11058] Editor. The margin cites Metamorphoses 9; its quin stultos excutit ignes adapts Iphis's self-address in 9.746. In Aeneid 12.937, the defeated Turnus concedes Lavinia to Aeneas. "Heroical scorn" is Burton's characterization of that concession.

[11059] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 7.59, has et Phyllida solus habeto: a shepherd's challenge about Phyllis, reapplied here as a farewell. The fox and grapes supply the closing fable or emblem of dismissing the unattainable.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many such inconveniences, lets and hinderances there are, which cross their projects, and crucifie poor Lovers, which sometimes may, sometimes again cannot be so easily removed. But put case they be reconciled all, agreed hitherto, suppose this love or good liking be betwixt two alone, both parties well pleased, there is mutuus amor, mutual love and great affection: yet their Parents, Guardians, Tutors, cannot agree, thence all is dashed, the match is unequal: one rich, another poor:	There are many such difficulties, obstacles and hindrances that thwart their plans and torment poor lovers. Sometimes they can be removed easily; sometimes they cannot. But suppose everything so far is settled and agreed; suppose this love or liking is between two people alone, both well pleased, with "mutual love" and great affection. Yet their parents, guardians or tutors cannot agree, and so everything is ruined: the match is unequal, one rich and the other poor.
durus pater, an hard-hearted, unnatural, a covetous father will not marry his son, except he have so much mony, ita in aurum omnes insaniunt, as [11060]Chrysostome notes, nor joyn his daughter in marriage, to save her dowry, or for that he cannot spare her for the service she doth him, and is resolved to part with nothing whilest he lives, not a penny, though he may peradventure well give it, he will not till he dies, and then as a pot of mony broke, it is divided amongst them that gaped after it so earnestly.	"A harsh father": a hard-hearted, unnatural, covetous father will not arrange his son's marriage unless he receives a certain sum—"So mad is everyone for gold," as Chrysostom observes. Nor will he marry off his daughter, to save her dowry, or because he cannot spare the service she does him. He is resolved to part with nothing while he lives, not a penny, even if he could readily afford it. He will not give it until he dies; then, like the contents of a broken money-pot, it is divided among those who gaped so eagerly for it.[11061]
Or else he wants means to set her out, he hath no mony, and though it be to the manifest prejudice of her body and souls health, he cares not, he wil take no notice of it, she must and shall tarry.	Or else he lacks the means to provide for her marriage: he has no money, and though the delay plainly harms the health of her body and soul, he does not care and will take no notice. She must and shall wait.

[11060] Burton. Source page unnumbered verso after 576, †: "Hom. 5. in 1. epist. Thess. cap. 4. ver. 8." "Homily 5 on the First Epistle to the Thessalonians, chapter 4, verse 8."

[11061] Editor. "Unnatural" means lacking parental affection; "marry his son," arrange his marriage. Chrysostom's Homily 5 on First Thessalonians urges early marriage and rebukes fathers who wait for a large income, caring more for money than chastity. The English translation confirms the passage; Burton's Latin edition remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many slack and careless Parents, iniqui patres, measure their childrens affections by their own, they are now cold and decrepit themselves, past all such youthful conceits, and they will therefore starve their childrens Genius, have them à pueris [11062]illico nasci senes, they must not marry, nec earum affines esse rerum quas secum fert adolescentia: ex sua libidine moderatur quæ est nunc, non quæ olim fuit: as he said in the Comœdy: they will stifle nature, their yong bloods must not participate of youthful pleasures, but be as they are themselves old on a sudden.	Many negligent and careless parents, "unjust fathers," measure their children's affections by their own. They are now cold and decrepit, past all such youthful thoughts, and therefore mean to starve their children's natural spirit, to have them "born old men straight from childhood." They must not marry, "nor have anything to do with the things that youth brings with it. He sets the measure by his own desire as it is now, not as it once was," as the character says in the comedy. They will stifle nature: their young people must have no share in youth's pleasures, but suddenly become old like themselves.[11063]
And 'tis a general fault amongst most parents in bestowing of their children, the father wholly respects wealth, when through his own folly, riot, indiscretion, he hath embeazled his estate, to recover himself, he confines and prostitutes his eldest sons love and affection to some fool, or ancient, or deformed piece for mony,	And it is a common fault among most parents arranging their children's marriages: the father considers wealth alone. When his own folly, extravagance and indiscretion have wasted his estate, he tries to recover his position by confining and selling his eldest son's love and affection to some foolish, old or ugly creature for money.[11064]
[11065]Phanaretæ ducet filiam, rufam illam virginem, Cæsiam, sparso ore, adunco naso ——	He will marry Phanareta's daughter, that red-haired maiden, Grey-eyed, broad-faced, with a hooked nose.[11066]

[11062] Burton. Source page unnumbered verso after 576, y: "Ter." "Terence."

[11063] Editor. Terence, Heautontimorumenos 213–216: Clitipho complains that fathers expect the young to be old already. Burton adapts and interweaves the speech with his own prose, including a shift from plural moderantur to singular moderatur. Genius here is the child's natural disposition or appetite.

[11064] Editor. "Bestowing" means arranging a child's marriage; "riot" is extravagant living, and "embeazled" here means wasted or dissipated. "Piece" contemptuously refers to the prospective bride, whose wealth is being used to repair the father's estate.

[11065] Burton. Source page unnumbered verso after 576, †: "Ter. Heaut. Scen. ult." "Terence, Heautontimorumenos, final scene."

[11066] Editor. The final scene of Terence's Heautontimorumenos describes the proposed bride. Cæsia denotes grey or blue-grey eyes; sparso ore a broad face. Burton's quotation changes the dramatic wording into a statement that the son will marry her.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page unnumbered verso after 576–577 and though his son utterly dislike, with Clitipho in the Comœdy, Non possum pater: If she be rich, Eia (he replies) at elegans est, credas animum ibi esse? he must and shall have her, she is fair enough, young enough; if he look or hope to inherit his lands, he shall marry, not when or whom he loves, Arconidis huius filiam, but whom his father commands, when and where he likes, his affection must dance attendance upon him.	And though his son objects utterly, like Clitipho in the comedy—"I cannot, father"—if she is rich, "Come now," he replies, "but he is choosy! You would think he had some sense!" He must and shall have her; she is beautiful enough, young enough. If he expects or hopes to inherit his father's lands, he must marry, not when he wishes or the woman he loves—"this Arconides's daughter"—but whomever his father orders, when and where his father pleases. His affection must wait upon his father's wishes.[11067]
Source page 577 His daughter is in the same predicament forsooth; as an empty boat she must carry what, where, when, and whom her Father will. So that in these businesses the father is still for the best advantage; Now the mother respects good kinred, most part the son a proper woman.	His daughter, indeed, is in the same predicament: like an empty boat, she must carry what and whom her father wishes, wherever and whenever he pleases. In these affairs the father always seeks the greatest advantage; the mother values good family connections, and the son usually wants a handsome woman.
All which [11068]Livy exemplifies, dec. 1. lib. 4. a Gentleman and a Yeoman woo'd a wench in Rome (contrary to that statute that the gentry and commonalty must not match together) the matter was controverted: The Gentleman was preferred by the mothers voice, quæ quam splendidissimis nuptiis jungi puellam volebat: the overseers stood for him that was most worth, &c.	Livy illustrates all this in the first decade, book 4: a gentleman and a yeoman courted a young woman in Rome, contrary to the statute forbidding marriage between the gentry and common people. The matter was disputed. The mother favoured the gentleman, "wishing the girl to enter the most splendid marriage possible"; the guardians supported the man with the greater wealth, etc.[11069]

[11067] Editor. Burton assembles and adapts lines from the final scene of Heautontimorumenos. His Arconidis differs from the consulted text's Archonidi; the original form is retained as Arconides in English. Burton also prints Phanaretæ for Phanocratae and at elegans for ut elegans. The father's mocking comment is directed at the son's fastidiousness.

[11068] Burton. Source page 577, z: "Plebeius & nobilis ambiebant puellam; puellæ certamen in partes venit, &c." "A plebeian and a nobleman courted a girl; the contest for the girl became a partisan dispute, etc."

[11069] Editor. Livy 4.9 concerns the dispute over marriage with a girl at Ardea, followed by a political conflict. Burton relocates it to Rome and uses English social ranks for the Roman categories. "Overseers" means the girl's guardians. In Livy the guardians support their own social class, rather than explicitly the richer suitor. The Latin says the mother wanted a particularly splendid marriage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But parents ought not to be so strict in this behalfe, Beauty is a dowry of it self all-sufficient, [11070]Virgo formosa, etsi oppidò pauper, abunde dotata est, [11071]Rachel was so married by Jacob, and Bonaventure [11072]in 4. sent. denies that he so much as venially sins, that marries a maid for comeliness of person. The Jews, Deut. 21.11. if they saw amongst the captives a beautifull woman, some small circumstances observed, might take her to wife.	But parents ought not to be so strict in this matter. Beauty is in itself an entirely sufficient dowry: "A beautiful maiden, though extremely poor, has a dowry in abundance." Jacob married Rachel on this basis; and Bonaventure, in his commentary on the fourth book of the Sentences, denies that a man commits even a venial sin by marrying a maiden for her physical beauty. Among the Jews, Deuteronomy 21:11, a man who saw a beautiful woman among the captives might take her as his wife after observing certain minor formalities.[11073]
They should not be too severe in that kinde, especially if there be no such urgent occasion, or grievous impediment. 'Tis good for a commonwealth. [11074]Plato holds, that in their contracts young men should never avoid the affinity of poor folks, or seek after rich. Poverty and base parentage may be sufficiently recompenced by many other good qualities, modesty, vertue, religion and choice bringing up,	They should not be too severe in such matters, especially where no pressing reason or serious impediment exists. It is good for a commonwealth. Plato holds that in making marriage agreements young men should never avoid kinship with poor families or seek it with rich ones. Poverty and low birth may be amply compensated by many other good qualities: modesty, virtue, religion and excellent upbringing.[11075]

[11070] Burton. Source page 577, *: "Apuleius Apol." "Apuleius, Apology."

[11071] Burton. Source page 577, a: "Gen. 26." "Genesis 26."

[11072] Burton. Source page 577, b: "Non peccat venialiter qui mulierem ducit ob pulchritudinem." "He does not commit a venial sin who marries a woman for her beauty."

[11073] Editor. The margin cites Genesis 26, but Jacob's love for Rachel and their marriage are in Genesis 29. "Venial" means a lesser sin, as distinct from mortal sin in the theology Burton cites. Deuteronomy 21:10–13 concerns a woman captured in war; "minor formalities" reproduces Burton's minimizing description of the prescribed conditions. The Apuleius and Bonaventure passages require further collation.

[11074] Burton. Source page 577, †: "Lib. 6. de leg. Ex usu reipub. est ut in nuptiis juvenes neq; pauperum affinitatem fugiant, neq; divitum sectentur." "Laws, book 6. It benefits the commonwealth if, in marriage, young men neither avoid kinship with the poor nor pursue it with the rich."

[11075] Editor. Plato, Laws 6, in the discussion of marriage at 772–773, discourages pursuing rich marriages and recommends the city's interest in matching families. "Affinity" is kinship by marriage. Burton's Latin margin supplies the compressed formulation translated in the body.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11076]I am poor, I confess; but am I therefore contemptible, and an abject? Love it self is naked, the Graces, the Stars, and Hercules clad in a Lions skin. Give something to vertue, love, wisdom, favour, beauty, person; be not all for mony.	"I am poor, I confess; but does that make me contemptible, an outcast? Love himself is naked, as are the Graces and the stars, while Hercules is clad in a lion's skin." Allow something to virtue, love, wisdom, a pleasing face, beauty and bodily form. Do not think only of money.[11077]
Besides you must consider that Amor cogi non potest, Love cannot be compelled, they must affect as they may: [11078]Fatum est in partibus illis quas sinus abscondit; as the saying is, marriage and hanging goes by destiny, matches are made in heaven,	Besides, you must consider that "Love cannot be forced": love cannot be compelled; people must love as they can. "Fate lies in those parts which the fold of the garment conceals." As the saying goes, marriage and hanging follow destiny; matches are made in heaven.[11079]
It lies not in our power to love or hate, For will in us is over-rul'd by fate.	It is not in our power to love or hate, For our will is overruled by fate.[11080]

[11076] Burton. Source page 577, *: "Philost. ep. Quoniam pauper sum, idcirco contemptior & abjectior tibi videar? Amor ipse nudus est, gratiæ & astra; Hercules pelle leonina indutus." "Philostratus, Letters. Because I am poor, should I therefore seem more contemptible and abject to you? Love himself is naked, as are the Graces and stars; Hercules is clothed in a lion's skin."

[11077] Editor. Philostratus's letter is cited without a number. Burton invokes the naked or lightly clothed appearance of divine and heroic figures as an argument against contempt for poverty. "Favour" means facial appearance, distinct from monetary advantage.

[11078] Burton. Source page 577, c: "Juvenal."

[11079] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 9.32–33: fate is located in the sexual parts hidden by clothing. Burton adapts the wording and uses it as a transition to proverbial statements about the destiny of marriage. The first Latin statement and Burton's own English repetition are both retained.

[11080] Editor. Christopher Marlowe, Hero and Leander. Burton ends this part of the argument with two lines asserting that fate governs attraction. The following passage begins the story of a servant maid in Aristaenetus; its marginal references belong to that continuation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
A servant maid in [11081]Aristænetus loved her mistris Minion, which when her Dame perceived, furiosa æmulatione, in a jealous humour she dragg'd her about the house by the hair of the head, and vext her sore. The wench cryed out, [11082]O mistris, fortune hath made my body your servant, but not my soul! Affections are free, not to be commanded.	A servant maid in Aristaenetus loved her mistress's favourite. When her mistress discovered this, "in furious jealousy," she dragged her about the house by the hair and tormented her cruelly. The girl cried out, "Oh, mistress, fortune has made my body your servant, but not my soul!" Affections are free and cannot be commanded.[11083]

[11081] Burton. Source page 577, †: "Lib. 2. ep. 7." "Book 2, letter 7."

[11082] Burton. Source page 577, *: "Ejulans inquit, non mentem unà addixit mihi fortuna servitute." "Crying out, she says: Fortune did not bind my mind along with me in servitude."

[11083] Editor. Aristaenetus, Love Letters 2.7. "Minion" means a favourite or lover; the Greek identifies him as the mistress's adulterous lover. The maid is enslaved, which gives her claim to an unenslaved mind its force. Burton abridges the story.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Moreover it may be to restrain their ambition, pride, and covetousness, to correct those hereditary diseases of a family, God in his just judgement assignes and permits such matches to be made. For I am of Plato and [11084]Bodines mind, that Families have their bounds and periods as well as kingdoms, beyond which for extent or continuance they shall not exceed, six or seven hundred yeers, as they there illustrate by a multitude of examples, and which Peucer and [11085]Melancthon approve,	Moreover, God in his just judgement may appoint and permit such marriages to restrain their ambition, pride and greed, and to correct those hereditary diseases of a family. For I agree with Plato and Bodin that families, like kingdoms, have their limits and allotted terms, beyond which they will not extend in power or duration—six or seven hundred years—as those writers illustrate with many examples, and as Peucer and Melanchthon also affirm;[11086]
Source page 577–unnumbered PDF688 but in a perpetuall tenor (as we see by many pedigrees of Knights, Gentlemen, Yeomen) continue as they began, for many descents with little alteration. Howsoever let them I say, give something to youth, to love; they must not think they can fancy whom they appoint;	yet they continue on an unbroken course, as we see from many pedigrees of knights, gentlemen and yeomen, remaining as they began for many generations with little change. However that may be, let parents, I say, make some allowance for youth and love. They must not suppose their children can love whomever they appoint.[11087]

[11084] Burton. Source page 577, d: “De repub. c. de period. rerum pub.” “On the Commonwealth, the chapter on the cycles of commonwealths.”

[11085] Burton. Source page 577, †: “Com. in Car. Chron.” “Commentary on Carion’s Chronicle.”

[11086] Editor. Burton treats such marriages as providential checks on inherited pride. Bodin, Six Bookes 4.2 in Knolles’s translation, discusses political cycles, including 496 years, while reserving God’s freedom from natural laws. This supplies context, but Burton’s six- or seven-hundred-year family limit, his Bodin version and the Peucer–Melanchthon references remain untraced. These are historical speculations, not established laws.

[11087] Editor. The contrast between fixed limits and apparent continuity is compressed in the source. “Tenor” is an uninterrupted course; “descents” means generations, and “fancy” means love or desire. The translation retains the qualification without supplying a new argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page unnumbered PDF688 [11088]Amor enim non imperatur, affectus liber si quis alius & vices exigens, this is a free passion, as Pliny said in a Panegyrick of his, and may not be forced: Love craves liking, as the saying is, it requires mutuall affections, a correspondency: invito non datur nec aufertur, it may not be learned, Ovid himself cannot teach us how to love, Solomon describe, Apelles paint, or Helena expresse it.	"Love cannot be commanded: it is an affection as free as any, and demands a return." This is a free passion, as Pliny said in one of his panegyrics, and cannot be forced. "Love craves liking," as the saying goes: it requires mutual affection, a response. "It cannot be given or taken away against one's will." It cannot be learned. Ovid himself cannot teach us how to love, Solomon cannot describe it, Apelles paint it, or Helen embody it.[11089]
They must not therefore compell or intrude; [11090]quis enim (as Fabius urgeth) amare alieno animo potest? but consider withall the miseries of enforced marriages; take pitty upon youth: and such above the rest as have daughters to bestow, should be very carefull and provident to marry them in due time.	Parents must therefore neither compel nor impose: "For who," as Fabius argues, "can love with another person's heart?" They should also consider the misery of forced marriages and have pity on the young. Above all, those with daughters to marry should take great care and thought to marry them at the proper time.[11091]

[11088] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, e: "Plin. in pan." "Pliny, in the Panegyric."

[11089] Editor. Pliny, Panegyric 85.3, argues that a ruler cannot command affection and must reciprocate it. Burton compresses and applies this to lovers. Ovid represents instruction in love, Solomon wisdom and love poetry, Apelles painting, and Helen surpassing beauty.

[11090] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, †: "Declam. 306." "Declamation 306."

[11091] Editor. "Fabius" is Quintilian; Burton cites Declamation 306 in the collection transmitted under his name. The exact wording and attribution await collation. "Bestow" means arrange a marriage; "intrude" here means impose a choice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Syracides cap. 7. vers. 25. calls it a weighty matter to perform, so to marry a daughter to a man of understanding in due time: Virgines enim tempestivè locandæ, as [11092]Lemnius admonisheth, lib. 1. cap. 6. Virgins must be provided for in season, to prevent many diseases, of which [11093]Rodericus a Castro de morbis mulierum lib. 2. cap. 3. and Lod. Mercatus lib. 2. de mulier. affect. cap. 4. de melanch. virginum & viduarum, have both largely discoursed.	Sirach, chapter 7, verse 25, calls it "a weighty matter to perform": to marry a daughter to a man of understanding at the proper time. "For maidens must be married in good season," as Lemnius advises in book 1, chapter 6. Husbands must be found for them in time to prevent many diseases, which Rodrigo de Castro, On the Diseases of Women, book 2, chapter 3, and Luis Mercado, On Women's Disorders, book 2, chapter 4, "On the Melancholy of Maidens and Widows," have both discussed at length.[11094]
And therefore as well to avoid these ferall maladies, 'tis good to get them husbands betimes, as to prevent some other grosse inconveniences, and for a thing that I know besides; ubi nuptiarum tempus & ætas advenerit, as Chrysostome adviseth, let them not defer it; they perchance will marry themselves else, or do worse.	It is therefore good to find them husbands early, both to avoid these deadly maladies and to prevent other serious troubles—and for another reason that I know. "When the time and age for marriage have arrived," as Chrysostom advises, let parents not postpone it: otherwise the young people may marry on their own, or do worse.[11095]

[11092] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, f: "Puellis imprimis nulla danda occasio lapsus. Lemn. lib. 1. 54. de vit. instit." "Above all, girls must be given no occasion to go astray. Lemnius, On the Ordering of Life, book 1, 54."

[11093] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, †: "See more part. 1. s. mem. 2. subs. 4." The matching discussion is First Partition, Section 3, Member 2, Subsection 4, "Symptoms of melancholy in unmarried women, nuns and widows" (1.3.2.4, printed p. 202 onward). Section 3 is supplied editorially; the printed reference leaves it unspecified. Related passage: 1.3.2.4 (section supplied editorially from subject).

[11094] Editor. Sirach, also called Ecclesiasticus, 7:25. The medical argument reflects early modern theories about unmarried women's illness. The body gives Lemnius 1.6, but the margin gives 1.54; both are retained. "De melancholia virginum et viduarum" is the cited chapter's subject. The marginal cross-reference is preserved and expanded editorially to 1.3.2.4, the matching discussion of these women's symptoms.

[11095] Editor. Compare Chrysostom, Homily 5 on 1 Thessalonians, on arranging sons' marriages promptly; Burton extends the advice in his discussion of daughters. "Ferall" means deadly or destructive. He leaves his additional reason unnamed, though the context suggests sexual conduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If Nevizanus the Lawyer do not impose, they may do it by right: for as he proves out of Curtius and some other Civilians, Sylva, nup. lib. 2. numer. 30. [11096]A maid past 25 yeers of age, against her parents consent may marry such a one as is unworthy of, and inferiour to her, and her father by law must be compelled to give her a competent dowry.	If the lawyer Nevizanus is not misleading us, they may do so as a matter of right. For, as he proves from Curtius and other civil lawyers in The Marriage Grove, book 2, number 30, a maiden over twenty-five may, against her parents' wishes, marry a man unworthy of her and beneath her in rank; and her father must by law be compelled to give her a suitable dowry.[11097]
Mistake me not in the mean time, or think that I do Apologize here for any headstrong unruly wanton flurts. I do approve that of S. Ambrose (comment. in Genesis 24. 51.) which he hath written touching Rebecca's spousals, A woman should give unto her parents the choice of her husband, [11098]lest she be reputed to be malapert and wanton, if she take upon her to make her own choice; [11099]for she should rather seem to be desired by a man, then to desire a man her self.	Meanwhile, do not misunderstand me or suppose that I am defending headstrong, unruly, shameless hussies. I approve what St Ambrose writes about Rebecca's betrothal, in his commentary on Genesis 24:51: a woman should leave the choice of her husband to her parents, lest she be thought forward and wanton if she undertakes to choose for herself; for she should appear to be desired by a man rather than to desire a man herself.[11100]

[11096] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, g: "Filia excedens annum 25. potest inscio patre nubere, licet indignus sit maritus, & eum cogere ad congrue dotandum." "A daughter over twenty-five may marry without her father's knowledge, though the husband is unworthy, and compel him to provide a suitable dowry."

[11097] Editor. Giovanni Nevizzano's Sylva nuptialis, literally "Marriage Grove," is a collection of legal arguments and learning about marriage. "Civilians" are specialists in civil law. Burton's reported legal proposition belongs to that historical discussion; its exact source in Curtius remains to be collated.

[11098] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, †: "Ne appetentiæ procacioris reputetur author." "Lest she be regarded as the source of an overbold desire."

[11099] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, *: "Expetita enim magis debet videri à viro quam ipsa virum expetisse." "For she should seem to have been sought by a man rather than to have sought a man herself."

[11100] Editor. "Apologize" means defend; "flurts" and "malapert" are disparaging words for forward women. Burton limits his defence of free affection by endorsing parental choice and female reserve. The Ambrose attribution is retained; the exact passage has not been independently located.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To those hard parents alone I retort that of Curtius, (in the behalf of modester maids) that are too remiss and careless of their due time and riper yeers. For if they tarry longer, to say truth, they are past date, and no body will respect them.	I turn Curtius's argument solely against those harsh parents who, neglectful and careless of the proper time and their daughters' marriageable years, fail the more modest maidens on whose behalf I speak. For if the women wait longer, to tell the truth, they are past their time, and no one will consider them.[11101]
A woman with us in Italy (saith [11102]Aretines Lucretia) 24. yeers of age, is old already, past the best, of no account. An old fellow, as Lycistrata confesseth in [11103]Aristophanes, etsi sit canus, cito puellam virginem ducat uxorem, and 'tis no newes for an old fellow to marry a yong wench: but as he follows it, mulieris brevis occasio est, etsi hoc non apprehenderit, nemo vult ducere uxorem, expectans vero sedet; who cares for an old maid? she may set, &c.	"A woman of twenty-four here in Italy," says Aretine's Lucretia, "is already old, past her best and of no account." An old man, as Lysistrata admits in Aristophanes, "though grey-haired, may soon take a young maiden as his wife"; and it is nothing new for an old man to marry a young girl. But, as the passage continues, "A woman's opportunity is brief; if she fails to seize it, no one wants to marry her, and she sits waiting." Who cares for an old maid? She may sit there, and so on.[11104]
A virgin, as the Poet holds, lasciva & petulans puella virgo, is like a flowre, a Rose withered on a sudden.	A maiden, as the poet holds—"a lively and playful young virgin"—is like a flower, a rose that suddenly withers.[11105]

[11101] Editor. "Past date" is Burton's judgement about marriage prospects within the social conventions he describes. It is not a statement of biological incapacity.

[11102] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, †: "Mulier apud nos 24. annorum vetula est & projectitia." "A woman of twenty-four among us is an old woman, cast aside."

[11103] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, *: "Comœd. Lycistrat. And. Divo Interpr." "The comedy Lysistrata, translated by Andreas Divus."

[11104] Editor. Aristophanes, Lysistrata, approximately lines 595–607, contrasts older men's opportunity to remarry with the brief marriageable period allowed to women. Burton quotes Andreas Divus's Latin version. "Aretine's Lucretia" is retained without a secure work identification; the age claim is attributed speech.

[11105] Editor. The Latin describes a playful, forward young woman; its precise poetic source remains unlocated. The following rose verses supply the comparison with rapid ageing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11106]Quam modo nascentem rutilus conspexit Eous, Hanc rediens sero vespere vidit anum.	The rose the bright morning star just saw being born, It saw grown old when it returned late in the evening.[11107]
Source page unnumbered PDF689 She that was erst a maid as fresh as May, Is now an old Crone, time so steals away.	She who was lately a maiden as fresh as May Is now an old crone: so time steals away.
Let them take time then while they may, make advantage of youth, and as he prescribes,	Then let them seize their opportunity while they can, make the most of youth, and, as he instructs,
[11108]Collige virgo rosas dum flos novus & nova pubes, Et memor esto ævum sic properare tuum;	Gather roses, maiden, while the blossom and your youth are fresh, And remember that your own lifetime hastens in the same way.
Fair maids go gather Roses in the prime, And think that as a flowre so goes on time.	Fair maidens, go and gather roses in their prime, And remember that time passes like a flower.
Let's all love, dum vires anniq; sinunt, whiles we are in the flower of yeers, fit for love matters, and while time serves: for	Let us all love, "while our strength and years allow," while we are in the flower of youth, fit for love's affairs, and while the opportunity lasts; for
[11109]Soles occidere & redire possunt, Nobis cum semel occidit brevis lux, Nox est perpetuò una dormienda.	Suns can set and rise again; But once our brief light has set, We must sleep one everlasting night.[11110]

[11106] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 688, h: "Ausonius edy. 14." "Ausonius, Idyll 14."

[11107] Editor. De rosis nascentibus, lines 45–46 and 49–50, traditionally printed among Ausonius's works and also in the Appendix Vergiliana. The rose ages within a day; Burton's English version transfers the image directly to a woman. His source numbering "Idyll 14" is retained.

[11108] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 689, unnumbered: "Idem." "The same author."

[11109] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 689, p: "Catullus."

[11110] Editor. Catullus 5.4–6. Burton prints "perpetuò" where the usual text has "perpetua"; the translation preserves the sense of an unending sleep. The Latin and the following English adaptation are separate units in the source.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11111]Suns that set may rise again, But if once we lose this light, 'Tis with us perpetual night.	Suns that set may rise again; But once we lose this light, For us it is perpetual night.[11112]
Volat irrevocabile tempus, time past cannot be recal'd. But we need no such exhortation, we are all commonly too forward: yet if there be any escape, and all be not as it should, as Diogenes struck the father when the son swore, because he taught him no better, if a maid or yong man miscarry, I think their Parents oftentimes, Guardians, Overseers, Governours, neque vos (saith [11113]Chrysostome) à supplicio immunes evadetis, si non statim ad nuptias, &c. are in as much fault, and as severely to be punished as their children, in providing for them no sooner.	"Time flies beyond recall": time past cannot be brought back. But we need no such exhortation; generally we are all too eager. Yet if anyone goes astray and things are not as they should be—just as Diogenes struck the father when the son swore, because he had taught him no better—then, if a maiden or young man misconducts themselves, I think their parents, guardians, overseers and governors are often equally at fault and deserve punishment as severe as their children's for not arranging their marriages sooner. "Nor will you escape punishment," says Chrysostom, "if you do not bring them promptly to marriage," and so on.[11114]
Now for such as have free liberty to bestow themselves, I could wish that good counsell of the Comicall old man were put in practice,	Now, for those who are free to choose their own spouses, I wish the good advice of the old man in the comedy were put into practice:
[11115]Opulentiores pauperiorum ut filias Indotatas ducant uxores domum: Et multò fiet civitas concordior, Et invidia nos minore utemur, quam utimur.	Let the richer men take poorer men's daughters Home as wives, without dowries; Then the city will be far more harmonious, And we will meet with less envy than we do.[11116]

[11111] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 689, q: "Translated by M. B. Johnson." "Translated by Master Ben Jonson."

[11112] Editor. Ben Jonson's "Come, my Celia, let us prove," in Volpone, draws on Catullus. Burton's "M. B. Johnson" means Master Ben Jonson. His quoted English version is kept separately from the new rendering of the Latin.

[11113] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 689, *: "Hom. 5. in 1. Thes. cap. 4. 1." "Homily 5 on 1 Thessalonians, chapter 4, verse 1."

[11114] Editor. "Escape" is a lapse and "miscarry" means misconduct, not pregnancy loss. Compare Chrysostom, Homily 5 on 1 Thessalonians, for parental responsibility and early marriage. The Diogenes anecdote and the exact wording of the time maxim remain to be located; no source line is invented.

[11115] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 689, *: "Plautus."

[11116] Editor. Plautus, Aulularia 479–482, spoken by Megadorus. Burton adapts the grammar and order. His English version adds "much more piety," absent from these Latin lines; that addition is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
That rich men would marry poor maidens some, And that without dowry, and so bring them home; So would much concord be in our City, Less envy should we have, much more piety.	If rich men would marry some poor maidens And bring them home without a dowry, There would be much harmony in our city, Less envy and far more piety.
If they would care less for wealth, we should have much more content and quietness in a Commonwealth. Beauty, good bringing up, me thinks, is a sufficient portion of it self, —— [11117]Dos est sua forma puellis, and he doth well that will accept of such a wife.	If they cared less about wealth, we should have far more contentment and peace in the commonwealth. Beauty and a good upbringing seem to me a sufficient dowry in themselves: "A maiden's beauty is her dowry." A man does well to accept such a wife.[11118]
Eubulides in [11119]Aristænetus married a poor mans child, facie non illætabili, of a merry countenance, and heavenly visage, in pitty of her estate, and that quickly.	Eubulides, in Aristaenetus, married a poor man's daughter, "with a face not uncheerful," a merry countenance and heavenly features, out of pity for her circumstances—and quickly, too.[11120]
Acontius comming to Delos, to sacrifice to Diana, fell in love with Cydippe a noble lass, and wanting means to get her love, flung a golden apple into her lap, with this inscription upon it,	Acontius, coming to Delos to sacrifice to Diana, fell in love with Cydippe, a girl of noble birth. Lacking any means of winning her love, he threw a golden apple into her lap with this inscription on it:[11121]

[11117] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 689, †: "Ovid."

[11118] Editor. The margin attributes the maxim to Ovid. Garzoni's Piazza universale, Discorso primo, likewise quotes these words under Ovid's name after praising beauty as a sufficient dowry. This establishes an early modern parallel, not an Ovidian location or Burton's direct dependence on Garzoni; both remain unconfirmed.

[11119] Burton. Source page unnumbered PDF 689, p: "Epist. 12. l. 2. Eligit conjugem pauperem, indotatam & subito deamavit, ex commiseratione ejus inopiæ." "Letter 12, book 2. He chooses a poor wife without a dowry and suddenly falls in love, out of pity for her poverty."

[11120] Editor. Aristaenetus 2.12 presents a husband who married a poor woman from pity, then complains that she became domineering and extravagant. Burton extracts the initial act as a favourable example. "Non illætabili" is a restrained negative, expanded much more warmly in his English.

[11121] Editor. Compare Ovid, Heroides 20–21. There Cydippe unwittingly binds herself by reading an inscribed oath aloud in Diana's temple. Burton instead gives a promise in the man's voice and abbreviates the obstacles to their marriage. The couplet's exact source remains unlocated; the difference is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Juro tibi sane per mystica sacra Dianæ, Me tibi venturum comitem, sponsumq; futurum.	I solemnly swear to you by Diana's sacred mysteries That I will come to be your companion and become your husband.
I swear by all the rites of Diana, Ile come and be thy husband if I may.	I swear by all the rites of Diana, I will come and be your husband if I may.
She considered of it, and upon some small enquiry of his person and estate, was married unto him.	She considered it and, after a brief inquiry into his person and circumstances, married him.
Source page 578 Blessed is the wooing, That is not long a doing,	Blessed is the wooing That is quickly done,

Original text 1651	Modern English
As the saying is, when the parties are sufficiently known to each other, what needs such scrupulosity, so many circumstances? dost thou know her conditions, her bringing up, like her person? let her means be what they will, take her without any more ado.	As the saying goes. When the parties know each other well enough, why so many scruples, so many formalities? Do you know her character and upbringing, and like her looks? Whatever her means, take her without further fuss.[11122]
[11123]Dido and Æneas were accidentally driven by a storm both into one cave, they made a match upon it; Masinissa was married to that fair captive Sophonisba King Scyphax wife, the same day that he saw her first, to prevent Scipio and Lælius, least they should determine otherwise of her.	Dido and Aeneas were driven by chance in a storm into the same cave, and made a marriage of it. Masinissa married the beautiful captive Sophonisba, King Scyphax's wife, on the very day he first saw her, to forestall Scipio and Laelius, lest they decide her fate otherwise.[11124]
If thou lovest the party, do as much: good education and beauty is a competent dowry, stand not upon mony. Erant olim aurei homines (saith Theocritus) & adamantes redamabant, in the golden world men did so, (in the raign of [11125]Ogyges belike, before staggering Ninus began to domineere) if all be true that is reported: and some few now a dayes will do as much, here and there one; 'tis well done me thinks, and all happiness befall them for so doing.	If you love the person, do the same: a good education and beauty are an adequate dowry; do not insist on money. "There were golden men in former times," says Theocritus, "and those they loved loved them in return." People acted so in the golden age—presumably in the reign of Ogyges, before drunken Ninus began to lord it over others—if everything reported is true. And a few nowadays will do as much, one here and another there. I think they do well, and may every happiness come to them for it.[11126]

[11122] Editor. "Conditions" means character or disposition; "circumstances" here includes the formalities and preliminaries of courtship. The proverb advocates a short courtship once the parties know one another.

[11123] Burton. Source page 578, q: "Virg. Æn." "Virgil, Aeneid."

[11124] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.160–172, describes the cave union, which Dido calls marriage; Aeneas later disputes a marriage compact (4.338–339). Compare Livy 30.12–15 for Masinissa and Sophonisba, wife of Syphax, Burton's "Scyphax." The sequel ends in her death, an outcome omitted from this brief recommendation.

[11125] Burton. Source page 578, †: "Fabius pictor. amor ipse conjunxit populos, &c." "Fabius Pictor: love itself united peoples, etc."

[11126] Editor. Theocritus, Idyll 12, imagines lovers whose mutual affection will be praised as belonging to a golden age; the poem addresses a male beloved. Burton applies it to marriage without dowries. Ogyges and Ninus evoke remote legendary antiquity. "Staggering" suggests drunkenness; the particular Fabius Pictor attribution has not been collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11127]Leontius a Philosopher of Athens, had a fair daughter called Athenais, multo corporis lepore ac venere, (saith mine authour) of a comely carriage, he gave her no portion but her bringing up, occulto formæ præsagio, out of some secret fore-knowledge of her fortune, bestowing that little which he had, amongst his other children.	Leontius, a philosopher of Athens, had a beautiful daughter called Athenais, "with great physical grace and charm," as my author says, and a lovely bearing. He gave her no dowry except her upbringing, "through a secret presentiment inspired by her beauty," through some hidden foreknowledge of her fortune, distributing what little he had among his other children.[11128]
But she thus qualified, was preferred by some friends to Constantinople to serve Pulcheria the Emperours sister, of whom she was baptized and called Eudocia. Theodosius the Emperour in short space took notice of her excellent beauty and good parts, and a little after, upon his sisters sole commendation made her his wife: 'Twas nobly done of Theodosius.	But with these accomplishments she was recommended by friends for service to Pulcheria, the emperor's sister, at Constantinople; through her she was baptized and named Eudocia. Before long the emperor Theodosius noticed her exceptional beauty and abilities, and soon afterwards, on his sister's recommendation alone, made her his wife. It was nobly done by Theodosius.[11129]

[11127] Burton. Source page 578, r: "Lipsius polit. Sebast. Mayer. Select. Sect. 1. cap. 13." "Lipsius, Politics; Sebastian Mayer, Select Sections, section 1, chapter 13."

[11128] Editor. The Latin links the father's foreknowledge to her beauty; "Venere" means charm. Cats, quoting Lipsius's Monita et exempla politica, chapter 5, gives Athenais a hundred crowns and her brothers the rest, unlike Burton's no dowry beyond upbringing. This Dutch parallel does not establish Burton's immediate source; Lipsius's Latin and Mayer remain uncollated.

[11129] Editor. Theodosius II's wife Eudocia was originally Athenais. Socrates, Church History 7.21, names her father Leontius and says the bishop Atticus baptized her before her marriage. Burton's wording may mean baptism through Pulcheria's agency; it should not be taken as evidence that she administered it. The detailed inheritance story belongs to the later narrative tradition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11130]Rodope was the fairest lady in her dayes in all Ægypt; she went to wash her, and by chance (her maides mean while looking but carelesly to her cloathes) an Eagle stole away one of her shooes, and laid it in Psammeticus the King of Ægypts lap at Memphis: he wondred at the excellency of the shooe and pretty foot, but more Aquilæ factum, at the manner of the bringing of it: and caused forthwith proclamation to be made, that she that owned that shooe should come presently to his Court; the virgin came and was forthwith married to the King.	Rodope was the most beautiful lady of her day in all Egypt. She went to bathe, and by chance, while her maids were carelessly watching her clothes, an eagle carried off one of her shoes and dropped it into the lap of Psammetichus, king of Egypt, at Memphis. He marvelled at the exquisite shoe and pretty foot, but still more at "the eagle's deed," the way it had been brought to him. He immediately had a proclamation issued that the shoe's owner should come at once to court. The maiden came and was immediately married to the king.[11131]
I say this was heroically done and like a Prince: I commend him for it, and all such as have means, that will either do (as he did) themselves, or so for love, &c. marry their children. If he be rich, let him take such a one as wants, if she be vertuously given; for as Syracides cap. 7. ver. 19. adviseth, Forgoe not a wife and good woman; for her grace is above gold. If she have fortunes of her own, let her make a man.	I say this was nobly done, as became a prince. I commend him for it, and all those with means who will either do as he did themselves, or marry their children for love in the same way, and so on. If a man is rich, let him take a woman who lacks money, provided she is virtuous; for, as Sirach 7:19 advises, "Do not forgo a wife who is a good woman, for her grace is worth more than gold." If a woman has a fortune of her own, let her establish a man in life.[11132]

[11130] Burton. Source page 578, s: "Mayerus select. Sect. 1. c. 14 & Ælian. l. 13. c. 33. cum famulæ lavantis vestes incuriosius custodirent, &c. mandavit per universam Ægyptum ut fœmina quæreretur, cujus is calceus esset; eamq; sic inventam in matrimonium accepit." "Mayer, Select Sections, section 1, chapter 14, and Aelian, book 13, chapter 33. While her maids watched her clothes rather carelessly as she bathed, etc., he gave orders throughout Egypt to search for the woman whose shoe it was, and, when she was found in this way, took her in marriage."

[11131] Editor. Aelian, Various History 13.33, tells the shoe story of Rhodopis, whom he calls a courtesan. Burton's "Rodope" and "virgin" are preserved. Aelian likewise records the king's admiration for the shoe and the eagle's act; the tale is not independently authenticated here.

[11132] Editor. Sirach 7:19 commends a wise and good wife above gold; Burton prints "a wife and good woman," omitting "wise." "Make a man" means establish his fortune or social position. His recommendation allows a wealthy woman to support a poorer husband.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Danaus of Lacedæmon had a many daughters to bestow, and means enough for them all, he never stood enquiring after great matches, as others use to do, but [11133]sent for a company of brave young gallants home to his house, and bid his daughters choose every one one, whom she liked best, and take him for her husband, without any more ado. This act of his was much approved in those times.	Danaus of Lacedaemon had many daughters to marry and enough means for them all. He never bothered to seek grand matches as others usually do, but sent for a company of handsome young men to come to his house, and told each daughter to choose the one she liked best and take him for her husband, without further fuss. This action of his was much approved in those days.[11134]
But in this iron age of ours we respect riches alone, (for a maid must buy her husband now, with a great dowrie if she will have him) covetousness and filthy lucre marres all good matches, or some such by-respects.	But in our iron age we value wealth alone—for a maiden must now buy her husband with a large dowry if she wants him. Greed and filthy gain, or some such ulterior consideration, spoil all good marriages.[11135]
Source page 579 Crales a Servian Prince (as Nicephorus Gregoras Rom. Hist. lib. 6. relates it,) was an earnest sutor to Eudocia the Emperours sister, though her brother much desired it, yet she could not [11136]abide him, for he had three former wives, all basely abused;	Crales, a Serbian prince, as Nicephorus Gregoras relates in book 6 of his Roman History, was an eager suitor to Eudocia, the emperor's sister. Although her brother very much wanted the marriage, she could not bear the man, for he had had three previous wives, all shamefully ill-treated.[11137]

[11133] Burton. Source page 578, *: "Pausanias lib. 3. de Laconicis. Dimisit qui nunciaverint, &c. optionem puellis dedit, ut earum quælibet eum sibi virum deligeret, cujus maxime esset forma complacita." "Pausanias, book 3, on Laconia. He sent men to announce it, etc.; he gave the girls the choice, so that each might choose as husband the man whose appearance pleased her most."

[11134] Editor. Pausanias 3.12.2 differs materially: the suitors choose Danaus's daughters in the order of a foot-race, after his daughters' crimes made them difficult to marry. Burton makes the daughters choose. His location "of Lacedaemon" also appears to blend Danaus with the Spartan setting of Icarius's similar race. Both the body and margin retain Burton's account.

[11135] Editor. The iron age is the conventional opposite of the golden age: an age of greed and moral decline. "By-respects" means ulterior or secondary motives, here financial and social advantages.

[11136] Burton. Source page 579, †: "Illius conjugium abominabatur." "She abhorred marriage to him."

[11137] Editor. The account is assigned to Nicephorus Gregoras's Roman History, book 6. "Crales" is Burton's designation of the Serbian ruler; its exact form and identification await collation against Gregoras. The Eudocia in this story is distinct from the earlier wife of Theodosius II. The passage's detailed chronology awaits collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but the Emperour still Cralis amicitiam magni faciens, because he was a great Prince, and a troublesom neighbour, much desired his affinity, and to that end betrothed his own daughter Simonida to him, a little girle five yeers of age (he being fourty five,) and five [11138]years elder then the Emperor himself: Such disproportionable and unlikely matches can wealth and a fair fortune make.	But the emperor, still "valuing Crales's friendship highly," because he was a powerful prince and a troublesome neighbour, greatly desired an alliance by marriage. To that end he betrothed his own daughter Simonida to him, a little girl of five; the man was forty-five, five years older than the emperor himself. Such unequal and ill-suited matches can wealth and a splendid fortune bring about.[11139]
And yet not that alone, it is not only money, but sometime vainglory, pride, ambition do as much harm as wretched covetousness it self in another extream. If a Yeoman have one sole daughter, he must over-match her, above her birth and calling, to a gentleman forsooth, because of her great portion, too good for one of her own rank, as he supposeth:	Yet that is not all: it is not only money. Sometimes, at the other extreme, vainglory, pride and ambition do as much harm as miserable greed itself. If a yeoman has an only daughter, he must marry her above her birth and station—to a gentleman, indeed! Her large dowry makes her too good for someone of her own rank, he supposes.[11140]
A Gentlemans daughter and heir must be married to a Knight Barronets eldest son at least; and a Knights only daughter to a Baron himself, or an Earl, and so upwards, her great dowre deserves it. And thus striving for more honour to their wealth, they undo their children, many discontents follow, and oftentimes they ruinate their Families.	A gentleman's daughter and heiress must marry at least the eldest son of a knight baronet; and a knight's only daughter must marry a baron himself, or an earl, and so on upwards: her great dowry deserves it. Thus, striving to add higher rank to their wealth, they ruin their children. Many troubles follow, and they often destroy their families.[11141]

[11138] Burton. Source page 579, *: "Socero quinque circiter annos natu major." "About five years older than his father-in-law."

[11139] Editor. Burton explicitly criticizes the age disparity and the political motive. The ages five and forty-five and the five-year difference from the father-in-law are the source's figures and have not been silently adjusted.

[11140] Editor. A yeoman occupied a social rank below the gentry, though he might be wealthy. "Over-match" here means marry above one's rank, and "portion" means dowry; the passage mocks social ambition bought with money.

[11141] Editor. A baronet holds a hereditary title below the peerage; a baron and an earl are peers. Burton's sequence climbs the social hierarchy. "Knight Barronet" is retained in the original column.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11142]Paulus Jovius gives instance in Galeatius the second, that Heroical Duke of Millan, externas affinitates, decoras quidem regio fastu, sed sibi & posteris damnosas & fere exitiales quæsivit; he married his eldest son John Galeatius to Isabella the King of France his sister; but she was socero tam gravis, ut ducentis millibus aureorum constiterit, her entertainment at Millan was so costly that it almost undid him.	Paolo Giovio gives the example of Galeazzo II, that noble duke of Milan: "He sought foreign marriage alliances, splendid indeed in their royal pomp, but harmful and almost fatal to himself and his descendants." He married his eldest son, Gian Galeazzo, to Isabella, the king of France's sister; but she was "so costly to her father-in-law that she cost him two hundred thousand gold pieces." Her reception at Milan was so expensive that it almost ruined him.[11143]
His daughter Violanta was married to Lionel Duke of Clarence the yongest son to Edward the third King of England, but, ad ejus adventum tantæ opes tam admirabili liberalitate profusæ sunt, ut opulentissimorum regum splendorem superasse videretur, he was welcomed with such incredible magnificence, that a Kings purse was scarce able to bear it;	His daughter Violanta married Lionel, duke of Clarence, the youngest son of Edward III, king of England. But "at his arrival such wealth was poured out with such astonishing generosity that it seemed to surpass the splendour of the wealthiest kings." He was welcomed with such incredible magnificence that a king's purse could scarcely have borne it.[11144]
for besides many rich presents of horses, arms, plate, money, jewels, &c. he made one dinner for him and his company, in which were thirty two messes and as much provision left, ut relatæ à mensa dapes decem millibus hominum sufficerent, as would serve ten thousand men: But a little after Lionel died, novæ nuptæ & intempestivis Conviviis operam dans, &c. and to the Dukes great loss, the solemnity was ended.	For besides many rich gifts of horses, weapons, silverware, money, jewels and so on, he gave a single dinner for Lionel and his company, at which there were thirty-two courses and so much food left that "the dishes taken from the table would suffice for ten thousand people." But soon afterwards Lionel died, "devoting himself to his new bride and untimely banquets," and so on; and, at great loss to the duke, the celebration was over.[11145]

[11142] Burton. Source page 579, *: "Vit. Galeat. secundi." "Life of Galeazzo II."

[11143] Editor. Galeatius and John Galeatius are Galeazzo II and Gian Galeazzo Visconti. Giovio's Life of Galeazzo II is Burton's named source. The quoted financial figures and title "duke" remain as Burton prints them, pending detailed historical collation; Isabella is the French royal bride.

[11144] Editor. Lionel of Antwerp, duke of Clarence, was not Edward III's youngest son. Burton's error remains in the text. Violanta is Violante Visconti. "Ad ejus adventum" means "at his arrival"; the lavish reception is the point of the example.

[11145] Editor. "Plate" is precious-metal tableware; "messes" are servings or courses. "Intempestivis" can mean ill-timed or late, here qualifying feasts; the phrasing is not an independently established medical explanation of Lionel's death. Burton presents expenditure on the marriage as wasted.

Original text 1651	Modern English
So can titles, honours, ambition, make many brave, but infortunate matches, of all sides for by-respects, though both crased in body and minde, most unwilling, averse, and often unfit, so love is banished, and we feel the smart of it in the end. But I am too lavish peradventure in this subject.	Thus titles, honours and ambition can make many splendid but unfortunate marriages, with ulterior motives on every side, even though both parties are unsound in body and mind, utterly unwilling, averse and often ill-suited. So love is banished, and in the end we suffer for it. But perhaps I have been too expansive on this subject.[11146]
Another let or hinderance is strict and severe Discipline, Laws and rigorous Customs that forbid men to marry at set times, and in some places: as Prentises, Servants, Collegiats, States of lives in Coppy holds, or in some base inferiour Offices, [11147]Velle licet in such cases, potiri non licet as he said.	Another obstacle or hindrance is strict and severe discipline, laws and rigorous customs that forbid people to marry at certain times and in certain places: apprentices, servants, members of colleges, holders of copyhold estates for lives, or those in some low and subordinate offices. In such cases, as the poet said, “You may desire, but you may not possess.”[11148]
They see but as prisoners through a grate, they covet and catch but Tantalus à labris, &c. Their love is lost, and vain it is in such an estate to attempt. [11149]Gravissimum est adamare nec potiri, ’tis a grievous thing to love and not enjoy.	They can only gaze, like prisoners through a grating; they long and reach, but “Tantalus, from his lips,” and so on. Their love is wasted, and in such a position it is useless to try. “It is most painful to love without possession”: it is a grievous thing to love and not enjoy.[11150]

[11146] Editor. “Brave” means splendid or impressive; “crased” means impaired or unsound; “smart” means pain. A stray closing parenthesis after “unfit” in the scan has been omitted in the reading transcription.

[11147] Burton. Source page 579, i: “Apuleius in Catel. nobis cupido velle dat, posse abnegat.” “Apuleius, in the Catalepton: desire gives us the wish, but denies us the power.”

[11148] Editor. “Collegiats” includes college members under celibacy rules; copyhold is customary tenure recorded in a manorial court, here held for lives. The margin’s Nobis Cupido line is line 5 of Anechomenos, transmitted under Apuleius’s name, Anthologia Latina 712 Riese. Its opening is Amare liceat, si potiri non licet; Burton’s Velle licet adapts it. His “Catel.” edition remains unidentified.

[11149] Burton. Source page 579, †: “Anacreon 56.” “Anacreon, 56.”

[11150] Editor. Tantalus is the mythical sufferer whose desired food and water recede from his grasp. Burton gives only a Latin fragment, not a complete verse. The Anacreon reference number 56 is retained pending collation against the numbering of the Anacreontea.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 579–580 They may indeed, I deny not, marry if they will, and have free choice some of them; but in the mean time their case is desperate, Lupum auribus tenent, they hold a Wolfe by the ears, they must either burn or starve. 'Tis Cornutum sophisma, hard to resolve, if they marry they forfeit their estates, they are undone and starve themselves through beggery and want: if they do not marry, in this heroical passion they furiously rage, are tormented, and torn in pieces by their predominate affections.	Some of them may indeed marry if they wish and have a free choice—I do not deny it. But all the while their case is desperate: "They hold a wolf by the ears"; they must either burn or starve. It is "a horned dilemma," hard to resolve. If they marry, they forfeit their livelihoods, ruin themselves, and starve through poverty and want. If they do not marry, this passion of love makes them rage furiously; they are tormented and torn apart by their ruling affections.[11151]
Source page 580 Every man hath not the gift of continence, let him [11152]pray for it then, as Beza adviseth in his Tract de Divortiis, because God hath so called him to a single life, in taking away the means of marriage:	Not every man has the gift of sexual self-restraint. Then let him pray for it, as Beza advises in his treatise On Divorce, because God, by taking away the means of marriage, has thus called him to a single life.[11153]

[11151] Editor. A wolf held by its ears is dangerous both to retain and to release. "Cornutum sophisma" evokes the horns of a dilemma. "Burn" means burn with desire, echoing 1 Corinthians 7:9. "Heroical" here refers to erotic melancholy; "estates" can mean livelihoods or endowed positions, not only landed property.

[11152] Burton. Source page 580, †: "Continentiæ donum ex fide postulet quia certum sit eum vocari ad cælibatum cui demis &c." "Let him ask in faith for the gift of continence, since it is certain that he is called to celibacy … The closing words cui demis are unclear as printed; Burton leaves the quotation incomplete."

[11153] Editor. Theodore Beza, the Reformed theologian, is cited on celibacy where marriage is materially unavailable. "Continence" means sexual restraint. The incomplete Latin margin has a problematic ending, retained with an explicit uncertainty; the source passage needs collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11154]Paul would have gone from Myssia to Bythinia, but the spirit suffered him not, and thou wouldest peradventure be a married man with all thy will, but that protecting Angel holds it not fit. The devil too sometimes may divert by his ill suggestions, and marr many good matches, as the same [11155]Paul was willing to see the Romanes, but hindred of Satan he could not.	Paul wished to go from Mysia to Bithynia, but the Spirit would not allow him; and perhaps you would wholeheartedly wish to be a married man, but that protecting angel does not judge it fitting. The devil too may sometimes turn people aside with his evil suggestions and spoil many good marriages, just as the same Paul wished to visit the Romans but could not, because Satan hindered him.[11156]
There be those that think they are necessitated by Fate, their Stars have so decreed, and therefore they grumble at their hard fortune, they are well inclined to marry, but one rub or other is ever in the way:	There are those who think they are constrained by fate, that their stars have so decreed; and therefore they grumble at their hard fortune. They are quite willing to marry, but one obstacle or another is always in the way.
I know what Astrologers say in this behalf, what Ptolomy quadripartit. Tract. 4. cap. 4. Skoner lib. 1. cap. 12. what Leovitius genitur. exempl. 1. which Sextus ab Heminga takes to be the Horoscope of Hieronymus Wolfius, what Pezelius, Origanus and Leovitius his illustrator Garceus cap. 12. what Junctine, Protanus, Campanella, what the rest,	I know what astrologers say on this subject: Ptolemy in the Four-Part Treatise, book 4, chapter 4; Schöner, book 1, chapter 12; Leovitius in his first example of a nativity, which Sextus ab Heminga takes to be the horoscope of Hieronymus Wolf; Pezelius, Origanus, and Leovitius's commentator Garceus, chapter 12; Junctinus, Protanus, Campanella and the rest.[11157]

[11154] Burton. Source page 580, *: "Act. 16. 7." "Acts 16:7."

[11155] Burton. Source page 580, †: "Rom. 1. 13." "Romans 1:13."

[11156] Editor. Acts 16:7 gives the proposed journey to Bithynia and the Spirit's refusal. Romans 1:13 says Paul was prevented from visiting Rome, without naming Satan; "Satan hindered us" occurs in 1 Thessalonians 2:18 about returning to Thessalonica. Burton appears to combine the passages. His claim remains in the translation, with the distinction recorded here.

[11157] Editor. Nativity and geniture mean a horoscope cast for birth. Burton cites Ptolemy's marriage discussion as IV.4; it is IV.5 in the Robbins edition consulted. The early modern authorities and Heminga's identification are retained; their individual passages await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
(to omit those Arabian conjectures a parte Conjugii, a parte lasciviæ, triplicitates veneris, &c. and those resolutions upon a question, an amica potiatur, &c.) determine in this behalf, viz. an sit natus conjugem habiturus, facilè an difficulter sit sponsam impetraturus, quot conjuges, quo tempore, quales decernantur nato uxores, de mutuo amore conjugum both in mens and womens genitures,	Leaving aside those Arabian conjectures drawn "from the Part of Marriage, from the Part of Lust, the triplicities of Venus," and so on, and those answers to questions such as "whether he will possess his beloved," they determine "whether the native will have a spouse; whether he will obtain a bride easily or with difficulty; how many wives are allotted to him, at what time, and of what kind; and the mutual love of spouses," in the birth charts of both men and women.[11158]
by the examination of the seventh house the Almutens, Lords and Planets there, a ☾ d & ☉ a &c. by particular Aphorismes, Si dominus 7mæ in 7m vel secunda nobilem decernit uxorem, servam aut ignobilem si duodecima. Si Venus in 12ma &c. With many such, too tedious to relate.	They do so by examining the seventh house, its almutens, rulers and planets, and by calculations from the Moon and the Sun, and so on; and by particular rules: "If the ruler of the seventh is in the seventh or second house, it indicates a wife of noble birth; a servant or a woman of low birth if in the twelfth. If Venus is in the twelfth," and so on—with many similar rules too tedious to relate.[11159]
Yet let no man be troubled, or finde himself grieved with such Prædictions, as Hier. Wolfius well saith in his Astrologicall [11160]Dialogue, non sunt prætoriana decreta, they be but conjectures, the Stars incline, but not enforce,	Yet let no one be troubled or distressed by such predictions. As Hieronymus Wolf well says in his Astrological Dialogue, "They are not a magistrate's decrees"; they are only conjectures. The stars incline us, but do not compel us.[11161]

[11158] Editor. The native is the person whose horoscope is being read. Parts are calculated astrological points; triplicities are groups of three zodiacal signs. Burton distinguishes judgements from birth charts from answers to questions posed at a particular time.

[11159] Editor. Almutens are planets judged strongest by astrological dignities. The scan prints the compressed sequence a ☾ d & ☉ a &c.; the Moon and Sun are clear, but the adjoining letters are not securely resolved. The modern text gives the clear sense and does not invent a missing configuration. Ptolemy's marriage chapter uses the Moon in men's charts and the Sun in women's.

[11160] Burton. Source page 580, †: "Præfix. gen. Leovitii." "Prefixed to Leovitius's Nativities."

[11161] Editor. The praetor was a Roman magistrate: a legal decree supplies the contrast with an uncertain prediction. The following verse distinguishes bodily influence from the rational soul's freedom under God. Wolf's exact Latin source remains to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Sydera corporibus præsunt cælestia nostris, Sunt ea de vili Condita namque luto: Cogere sed nequeunt animum ratione fruentem, Quippe sub imperio solius ipse dei est.	Heavenly stars rule over our bodies, For these are fashioned from humble clay; But they cannot compel the mind endowed with reason, For it is subject to God alone.
wisdom, diligence, discretion, may mitigate if not quite alter such decrees, Fortuna sua à cujusque fingitur moribus, [11162]Qui cauti, prudentes, voti compotes, &c. let no man then be terrified or molested with such Astrological Aphorisms, or be much moved, either to vain hope or fear, from such predictions, but let every man follow his own free will in this case, and do as he sees cause.	Wisdom, diligence and judgement may soften, if not entirely change, such decrees. "Each person's fortune is shaped by his own conduct"; "those who are cautious and prudent attain their wishes," and so on. Let no one, then, be terrified or troubled by such astrological rules, or greatly moved by such predictions either to vain hope or fear. Let everyone follow his own free will in this matter, and act as he sees fit.
Source page 580–581 Better it is indeed to marry then burn, for their souls health, but for their present fortunes, by some other means to pacifie themselves, and divert the stream of this fiery torrent, to continue as they are, [11163]rest satisfied, lugentes virginitatis florem sic aruisse, deploring their misery with that Eunuch in Libanius, since there is no helpe or remedy, and with Jephthe's daughter to bewaile their virginities.	For the health of their souls, it is indeed better to marry than to burn; but for their present worldly circumstances, it is better to calm themselves by some other means and divert the course of this fiery torrent, to remain as they are and be content, "lamenting that the flower of virginity has thus withered." Since there is no help or remedy, they must deplore their misery with that eunuch in Libanius, and with Jephthah's daughter mourn their virginity.[11164]

[11162] Burton. Source page 580, *: "Idem Wolfius dial." "The same Wolf, Dialogue."

[11163] Burton. Source page 580, k: "That is, make the best of it, and take his lot as it falls."

[11164] Editor. Better to marry than to burn echoes 1 Corinthians 7:9. Jephthah's daughter mourns her virginity in Judges 11:37–38 before her father fulfils his vow. The Libanius passage has not been securely located. Burton distinguishes spiritual need from worldly circumstances rather than offering an unqualified rule.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 581 Of like nature is superstition, those rash vowes of Monks and Friers, and such as live in religious Orders, but far more tyrannical and much worse. Nature, youth, and his furious passion forcibly inclines, and rageth on the one side: but their Order and Vow checks them on the other.	Superstition is of a similar nature—those rash vows of monks, friars and members of religious orders—but is far more tyrannical and much worse. Nature, youth and this furious passion exert a powerful pull and rage on one side, while their order and their vow restrain them on the other.[11165]
[11166]Votoque suo sua forma repugnat,	And her own beauty conflicts with her vow.[11167]
What Merits and Indulgences they heap unto themselves by it, what commodities, I know not, but I am sure, from such rash vowes, and inhumane manner of life proceed many inconveniences, many diseases, many vices, [11168]mastupration, satyriasis, priapismus, melancholy, madness, fornication, adultery, buggery, sodomy, theft, murther, and all manner of mischiefes:	What merits and indulgences they accumulate for themselves by it, what benefits, I do not know; but I am sure that from such rash vows and such an inhuman way of life arise many troubles, many diseases, many vices: masturbation, satyriasis, priapism, melancholy, madness, fornication, adultery, buggery, sodomy, theft, murder and every sort of wrongdoing.[11169]

[11165] Editor. This is Burton's Protestant argument against obligatory religious celibacy. Superstition, rash vows and the accusations that follow express his polemical judgement; they are not neutral descriptions of religious communities.

[11166] Burton. Source page 581, *: "Ovid. 1. met." "Ovid, Metamorphoses 1."

[11167] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 1.489, describes Daphne's wish for perpetual virginity: her beauty conflicts with that wish. Burton changes Ovid's second-person tuo/tua to suo/sua. The feminine subject is kept in translation even though Burton applies the line to male religious vows.

[11168] Burton. Source page 581, †: "Mercurialis de Priapismo." "Mercurialis, On Priapism."

[11169] Editor. The source spelling mastupration denotes masturbation. Satyriasis was a historical term for excessive male sexual desire; priapismus denotes persistent erection. Burton combines medical categories and moral accusations, including overlapping terms buggery and sodomy. His assertion that celibacy causes this catalogue of illnesses and crimes belongs to the historical argument, not to present medical explanation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
read but Bales Catalogue of Sodomites, at the visitation of Abbies here in England, Henry Stephan his Apol. for Herodotus, that which Ulricus writes in one of his Epistles, [11170]in that Pope Gregory when he saw 600. skuls and bones of infants taken out of a fishpond near a Nunnery, thereupon retracted that decree of Priests marriages, which was the cause of such a slaughter; was much grieved at it, and purged himself by repentance.	Only read Bale's Catalogue of Sodomites, concerning the visitation of abbeys here in England; Henri Estienne's Defence of Herodotus; or what Ulricus writes in one of his letters: when Pope Gregory saw six hundred skulls and bones of infants taken out of a fishpond near a nunnery, he thereupon revoked that decree concerning priests' marriages which had caused such slaughter, grieved deeply over it, and cleansed himself by repentance.[11171]
Read many such, and then ask what is to be done, is this vow to be broke or not? No, saith Bellarmine, cap. 38. lib. de Monach. melius est scortari & uri quam de voto cælibatus ad nuptias transire, better burne or fly out, then to break thy vow.	Read many such accounts, and then ask what should be done: should this vow be broken or not? No, says Bellarmine, chapter 38 of his book On Monks: "It is better to fornicate and burn than to pass from a vow of celibacy into marriage"—better to burn or stray than to break your vow.[11172]

[11170] Burton. Source page 581, m: "Memorabile quod Ulricus epistola refert Gregorium quum ex piscina quadam allata plus quam sex mille infantum capita vidisset, ingemuisse & decretum de cælibatu tantam cædis causam confessus condigno illud pœnitentiæ fructu purgasse. Kemnitius ex concil. Trident. part. 3. de cælibatu sacerdotum." "Memorable is what Ulricus reports in a letter: when Gregory saw more than six thousand infants' heads brought from a certain fishpond, he groaned; admitting that the decree on celibacy had caused so great a slaughter, he expiated it with a fitting fruit of repentance. Chemnitz, Examination of the Council of Trent, part 3, on the celibacy of priests."

[11171] Editor. The body gives 600 skulls and bones; the Latin margin gives more than 6,000 heads. Both are retained. Burton transmits an anti-celibacy allegation through Ulricus and Chemnitz; this edition has not established the event as historical. Bale and Estienne are likewise invoked as polemical authorities.

[11172] Editor. Scortari means to fornicate; fly out euphemistically means to transgress sexually. The sentence is Burton's representation of Bellarmine's position. Its precise wording and surrounding argument in De monachis 38 remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And Coster in his Enchirid. de cælibat. sacerdotum, saith it is absolutely gravius peccatum, [11173]a greater sin for a Priest to marry, then to keep a concubine at home. Gregory de Valence, cap. 6. de cælibat. maintaines the same, as those Essei and Montanists of old.	And Coster, in his Handbook, "On the Celibacy of Priests," says it is absolutely "a graver sin" for a priest to marry than to keep a concubine at home. Gregory of Valencia maintains the same in chapter 6, "On Celibacy," as did those Essenes and Montanists of old.[11174]
Insomuch that many Votaries, out of a false perswasion of merit and holinesse in this kinde, will sooner dye then marry, though it be to the saving of their lives. [11175]Anno. 1419. Pius 2. Pope, James Rossa Nephew to the King of Portugal, and then elect Archbishop of Lisbone, being very sick at Florence, [11176]when his Physitians told him, that his disease was such, he must either lye with a wench, marry, or dye, cheerfully chose to dye; Now they commended him for it:	Indeed, many people bound by vows, falsely convinced of the merit and holiness of this condition, will die sooner than marry, even if marriage would save their lives. In the year 1419, with Pius II as pope, James Rossa, nephew of the king of Portugal and then archbishop-elect of Lisbon, was very ill at Florence. When his physicians told him that his disease required him either to sleep with a woman, marry or die, he cheerfully chose to die. Now they praised him for it.[11177]

[11173] Burton. Source page 581, n: "Si nubat, quam si domi concubinam alat." "If he marries, than if he keeps a concubine at home."

[11174] Editor. Votaries are people bound by religious vows. Burton aligns Coster and Gregory of Valencia with ancient ascetic groups. That alignment, and his comparative claim about marriage and concubinage, are retained as his argument; the cited originals require collation.

[11175] Burton. Source page 581, o: "Alphonsus Ciaconius lib. de gest. Pontificum." "Alfonso Chacón, book on the deeds of the popes."

[11176] Burton. Source page 581, p: "Cum medici suaderent ut aut nuberet aut coitu uteretur, sic mortem vitari posse, mortem potius intrepidus expectavit &c." "When physicians advised him either to marry or to have intercourse, saying death could thus be avoided, he instead fearlessly awaited death, etc."

[11177] Editor. The scan unmistakably prints 1419. The date, the name James Rossa and the medical anecdote are retained for source collation; they are not silently regularized. The alleged need for intercourse to avert death reflects the medical reasoning of the story.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But S. Paul teacheth otherwise, Better marry then burne, and as S. [11178]Hierome gravely delivers it, Aliæ sunt leges Cæsarum, aliæ Christi, aliud Papinianus, aliud Paulus noster præcipit, there's a difference betwixt Gods ordinances, and mens lawes:	But Saint Paul teaches otherwise: "Better to marry than to burn." And as Saint Jerome solemnly puts it, "The laws of the Caesars are one thing, Christ's another; Papinian commands one thing, our Paul another." There is a difference between God's ordinances and human laws.[11179]
and therefore Cyprian Epist. 8. boldly denounceth, impium est, adulterum est, sacrilegum est, quodcunque humano furore statuitur, ut dispositio divina violetur, it is abominable, impious, adulterous, and sacrilegious, what men make and ordaine after their own furies to cross Gods lawes.	And therefore Cyprian, Letter 8, boldly declares: "Whatever is established by human madness to violate the divine order is impious, adulterous and sacrilegious." What people devise and ordain in their own frenzy to thwart God's laws is abominable, impious, adulterous and sacrilegious.[11180]
[11181]Georgius Wicelius one of their own arch Divines (Inspect. eccles. pag. 18.) exclaimes against it, and all such rash monasticall vowes, and would have such persons seriously to consider what they do, whom they admit, ne in posterum querantur de inanibus stupris, lest they repent it at last.	Georg Witzel, one of their own leading theologians, in his Survey of the Church, page 18, protests against it and against all such rash monastic vows. He would have those concerned seriously consider what they do and whom they admit, "lest they afterwards complain of fruitless sexual transgressions"—lest they repent it in the end.[11182]

[11178] Burton. Source page 581, †: "Epist. 30." "Letter 30."

[11179] Editor. Jerome, Letter 77.3 to Oceanus, supplies the checked parallel; Burton's margin reads Letter 30. Jerome contrasts Roman law's unequal sexual standards with Christian obligations for both sexes in his discussion of Fabiola. Papinian is the Roman jurist; Paul is the apostle.

[11180] Editor. Cyprian's words occur in the letter to the people about the schism of Felicissimus, numbered 39.5 in the translation consulted. Its immediate concern is rival altars and priesthoods, rather than celibacy. Burton reorders the adjectives and applies the principle to marriage; his Letter 8 is retained.

[11181] Burton. Source page 581, †: "Vide vitam ejus edit. 1613. by. D. T. James." "See his life, published in 1613 by Dr Thomas James."

[11182] Editor. The Latin inanibus stupris is harsher and less precise than Burton's English lest they repent it: literally fruitless or empty sexual transgressions. Both the translated Latin and his paraphrase are retained. Witzel's passage and the marginal reference to a life edited by Thomas James remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For either as he follows it, you must allow them Concubines or suffer them to marry, for scarce shall you finde three Priests of three thousand, qui per ætatem non ament, that are but troubled with burning lust. Wherefore I conclude, It is an unnatural and impious thing to bar men of this Christian liberty, too severe and inhumane an edict.	For, as he continues, you must either allow them concubines or permit them to marry: among three thousand priests you will scarcely find three "who do not fall in love in the course of their lives," who are free from burning lust. Therefore I conclude that to deprive people of this Christian liberty is unnatural and impious, an excessively severe and inhuman decree.[11183]
Source page 582 [11184]The silly Wren, the Titmouse also, The little Redbrest have their election, They fly I saw and together gone, Whereas hem list, aboat environ As they of kinde have inclination, And as nature Impres and guide, Of every thing list to provide.	The little wren, and the titmouse too, The little robin, have their choice; I saw them fly and go together Wherever they wished, all round about, As their natural inclination moved them, And as Nature, their empress and guide, Pleases to provide for every creature.[11185]
But man alone, alas the hard stond, Full cruelly by kinds ordinance Constrained is, and by statutes bound, And debarred from all such pleasance: What meaneth this, what is this pretence Of laws, I wis, against all right of kinde Without a cause, so narrow men to binde?	But man alone—alas, his hard plight!— Is cruelly constrained by nature's ordinance, Bound by statutes, And barred from all such pleasure. What does this mean? What is this claim Of laws, against every right of nature, To bind people so tightly without cause?[11186]

[11183] Editor. Per ætatem can mean throughout one's life or with reference to age; the translation uses the former without erasing the ambiguity. Burton's that are but troubled is compressed; his claim is that almost none remain free of desire.

[11184] Burton. Source page 582, o: "Lidgate in Chaucers flower of curtesie."

[11185] Editor. These stanzas correspond to John Lydgate's Floure of Curtesye in the Middle English Texts Series. Silly here means little or harmless; hem means them; list means wish; kinde means nature. Impres represents empress, a title for personified Nature. Burton's They fly I saw differs from the edited poem's To flyen yfere, meaning to fly together.

[11186] Editor. Stond means plight or predicament; I wis means certainly. The consulted Lydgate text has a question about God's providence where Burton prints pretence / Of laws. Burton's wording is translated as printed, including kinds ordinance, despite the tension between natural inclination and legal restraint.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Many Lay-men repine still at Priests marriages above the rest, and not at Cleargy men only, but all of the meaner sort and condition, they would have none marry but such as are rich and able to maintain wives, because their parish belike shall be pestered with Orphanes, & the world full of beggers:	Many laymen still object above all to priests' marriages—and not only to those of clergymen, but to those of everyone of lower rank and station. They would have no one marry except the rich, who can support wives, because, apparently, their parish would be burdened with orphans and the world filled with beggars.
but [11187]these are hard-hearted, unnatural, monsters of men, shallow politicians, they do not [11188]consider that a great part of the world is not yet inhabited as it ought, how many Colonies into America, Terra Australis incognita, Africa, may be sent? Let them consult with S[r]. William Alexanders book of Colonies, Orpheus Juniors Golden fleece, Captaine Whitburne, M[r]. Hagthorp, &c. and they shall surely be otherwise informed.	But these are hard-hearted, unnatural monsters of men, shallow politicians. They do not consider that much of the world is not yet inhabited as it ought to be, or how many colonies could be sent to America, the unknown southern land, and Africa. Let them consult Sir William Alexander's book on colonies, Orpheus Junior's Golden Fleece, Captain Whitbourne, Mr Hagthorpe and others, and they will certainly learn otherwise.[11189]
Those politique Romans were of another minde, they thought their City and Country could never be too populous. [11190]Adrian the Emperour said he had rather have men then money, malle se hominum adjectione ampliare imperium, quam pecuniâ; Augustus Cæsar made an oration in Rome ad cælibes, to perswade them to marry,	Those politically astute Romans thought differently: they believed their city and country could never be too populous. The emperor Hadrian said he would rather have people than money, "that he preferred to enlarge the empire by adding people rather than wealth." Augustus Caesar delivered a speech at Rome "to the unmarried" to persuade them to marry.[11191]

[11187] Burton. Source page 582, p: "Tis not multitude but idlenesse which causeth beggery."

[11188] Burton. Source page 582, q: "Or to set them awork, and bring them up in some honest trades."

[11189] Editor. Burton answers fear of poverty through employment and overseas colonization. Terra Australis incognita is the conjectured unknown southern land. His claim about insufficient habitation assumes lands available for European settlement, without considering existing inhabitants' claims. The colonial works are retained as his proposed authorities; their individual passages are uncollated.

[11190] Burton. Source page 582, r: "Dion. Cassius lib. 56." "Cassius Dio, book 56."

[11191] Editor. The margin cites Cassius Dio 56, which concerns Augustus and includes speeches urging marriage; it is not the Hadrian narrative. Burton's attribution of the people-rather-than-money remark to Hadrian is retained pending identification. No correction of the emperor's name is made.

Original text 1651	Modern English
some countries compelled them to marry of old, as [11192]Jews, Turks, Indians, Chinese, amongst the rest in these daies, who much wonder at our discipline to suffer so many idle persons to live in Monasteries and often marvel how they can live honest.	Some countries compelled people to marry in former times, as do the Jews, Turks, Indians and Chinese, among others, in our own day. They are greatly surprised by our practice of allowing so many idle people to live in monasteries, and often wonder how they can live chastely.[11193]
[11194]In the Isle of Maragnan, the Governour and petty King there did wonder at the Frenchmen, and admire how so many Friers, and the rest of their company could live without wives, they thought it a thing impossible, and would not believe it.	On the island of Maranhão, the governor and local king were astonished by the Frenchmen and wondered how so many friars and the rest of their company could live without wives. They thought it impossible and would not believe it.[11195]
If these men should but survey our multitudes of religious houses, observe our numbers of Monasteries all over Europe, 18. Nunneries in Padua, in Venice 31 Cloisters of Monkes, 28. of Nunnes, &c. ex ungue leonem, 'tis to this proportion, in all other Provinces and Cities, what would they think, do they live honest? Let them dissemble as they will, I am of Tertullians minde, that few can containe but by compulsion.	If these men surveyed our multitude of religious houses and counted our monasteries throughout Europe—eighteen nunneries in Padua, thirty-one monasteries of monks and twenty-eight of nuns in Venice, and so on—"you may know the lion by its claw"; the proportion is the same in all other provinces and cities. What would they think? Do these people live chastely? Let them dissemble as they please: I agree with Tertullian that few can remain continent except under compulsion.[11196]

[11192] Burton. Source page 582, s: "Sardus. Buxtorphius."

[11193] Editor. Honest here means sexually chaste. Burton's broad assertions about Jews, Turks, Indians and Chinese are the categories and generalizations of his sources; they are not established here as uniform practices.

[11194] Burton. Source page 582, t: "Claude Abbaville in his hist. of the Frenchmen to the Isle of Maragnan, An. 1614."

[11195] Editor. Maranhão is Burton's Maragnan. The margin names Claude d'Abbeville's 1614 account of the French mission. The reported dialogue is retained as Burton presents it; it has not been independently collated with that account.

[11196] Editor. Ex ungue leonem is the proverb know the lion from its claw: infer the whole from a small part. Burton uses local counts of religious houses to generalize about Europe; those figures are retained without independent verification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11197]O chastity (saith he) thou art a rare Goddess in the world, not so easily got, seldom continuate: Thou maist now and then be compeld either for defect of nature, or if discipline perswade, decrees enforce:	"O chastity," he says, "you are a rare goddess in the world, not easily attained and seldom lasting. Now and then you may be compelled, either through a deficiency of nature, or if discipline persuades and decrees enforce."[11198]
Source page 582–583 or for some such by-respects, sullennesse, discontent, they have lost their first loves, may not have whom they will themselves, want of meanes, rash vowes, &c. But can he willingly containe? I think not.	Or people may abstain for some such secondary motive: sullenness, discontent, having lost their first loves, being unable to have the partner they themselves want, lack of means, rash vows, and so on. But can a man willingly remain continent? I think not.
Source page 583 Therefore either out of commiseration of humane imbecillity, in policy, or to prevent a far worse inconvenience, for they hold it some of them as necessary as meat and drink, and because vigour of youth, the state and temper of most mens bodies do so furiously desire it, they have heretofore in some nations liberally admitted polygamy and stewes,	Therefore, either out of pity for human weakness, as a matter of policy, or to prevent a far worse evil—for some regard sex as necessary as food and drink, and because the vigour of youth and the condition and temperament of most people's bodies desire it so fiercely—some nations have in the past freely permitted polygamy and brothels.[11199]

[11197] Burton. Source page 582, *: "Rara quidem dea tu es O castitas in his terris, nec facile perfecta, rarius perpetua, cogi nonnunquam potest, ob naturæ defectum, vel si disciplina perswaserit, censura compresserit." "You are indeed a rare goddess in these lands, O chastity: not easily perfected, more rarely perpetual. It can sometimes be compelled through a defect of nature, or if discipline has persuaded and censure has restrained."

[11198] Editor. Tertullian, On Modesty 1.1, describes chastity as rare and attainable through nature, training or restraint. Burton's version adds the address to a goddess and turns nature's preparation into a defect of nature. His ensuing conclusion about unwilling continence is his own use of the passage, not a close quotation of Tertullian.

[11199] Editor. Imbecillity means weakness; policy means practical governance; stews means brothels. Temper refers to bodily constitution. Burton is reporting arguments used to justify these practices; the passage does not establish their medical necessity.

Original text 1651	Modern English
an hundred thousand Curtisans in grand Cario in Ægypt, as [11200]Radzivilius observes, are tolerated, besides boyes: how many at Fesa, Rome, Naples, Florence, Venice, &c. and still in many other Provinces and Cities of Europe they do as much, because they think young men, Churchmen & servants amongst the rest, can hardly live honest.	In great Cairo in Egypt, as Radziwiłł observes, a hundred thousand courtesans are tolerated, besides boys. How many there are in Fez, Rome, Naples, Florence, Venice and elsewhere! And many other provinces and cities of Europe still do the same, because they think young men—including churchmen and servants—can scarcely live chastely.[11201]
The consideration of this belike made Vibius the Spaniard, when his friend [11202]Crassus that rich Roman gallant lay hid in the Cave, ut voluptatis quam ætas illa desiderat copiam faceret, to gratify him the more, send two [11203]lusty lasses to accompany him all that while he was there imprisoned.	Perhaps this consideration led Vibius the Spaniard, when his friend Crassus, that wealthy Roman gentleman, was hiding in the cave, "to provide an abundance of the pleasure that his age desired": to oblige him still further, he sent two vigorous young women to keep him company throughout his confinement there.[11204]
And Surenus the Parthian general, when he warred against the Romans, to carry about with him 200 Concubines, as the Swisse Souldiers do now commonly their wives.	And it led Surena, the Parthian general, when he fought the Romans, to take two hundred concubines about with him, as Swiss soldiers now commonly take their wives.[11205]

[11200] Burton. Source page 583, *: "Peregrin. Hierosol." "Pilgrimage to Jerusalem."

[11201] Editor. The number 100,000 is Burton's report from Radziwiłł's pilgrimage narrative and remains unverified. Courtesans means prostitutes in this context; the addition of boys refers to their sexual exploitation. The source's Cario is rendered Cairo, and Fesa as Fez.

[11202] Burton. Source page 583, †: "Plutarch. vita ejus, adolescentiæ medio constitutus." "Plutarch, his Life: in the midst of youth."

[11203] Burton. Source page 583, *: "Ancillas duas egregia forma & ætatis flore." "Two female slaves of outstanding beauty and in the flower of their age."

[11204] Editor. Plutarch, Crassus 4–5, describes hiding on Vibius Paciacus's estate and the sending of two enslaved young women. Burton's lusty lasses softens the slavery explicit in his Latin margin. Imprisoned here describes concealment and confinement, not a formal sentence.

[11205] Editor. Plutarch, Crassus 21.6, gives two hundred wagons for Surena's concubines. Burton gives two hundred concubines. The differing unit is retained in the body and recorded here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But because this course is not generally approved, but rather contradicted as unlawful and abhorred, [11206]in most countries they do much encourage them to marriage, give great rewards to such as have many children, and mulct those that will not marry, Jus trium liberorum, and in Agellius lib. 2. cap. 15. Ælian. lib. 6. cap. 5. Valerius lib. 1. cap. 9. [11207]We read that three children freed the father from painful offices, and five from all contribution.	But since this course is not generally approved, and is rather opposed and abhorred as unlawful, most countries strongly encourage marriage, greatly reward those with many children, and fine those who refuse to marry: "the privilege of three children." And in Aulus Gellius, book 2, chapter 15, Aelian, book 6, chapter 5, and Valerius, book 1, chapter 9, we read that three children freed their father from burdensome offices, and five from all public contributions.[11208]
A woman shall be saved by bearing children. Epictetus would have all marry, and as [11209]Plato will 6, de legibus, he that marrieth not before 35 yeares of his age, must be compelled and punished, and the mony consecrated to [11210]Juno's Temple, or applied to publique uses.	"A woman shall be saved by bearing children." Epictetus would have everyone marry; and Plato, in book 6 of the Laws, requires that a man who has not married before the age of thirty-five be compelled and punished, and the money dedicated to Juno's temple or applied to public purposes.[11211]

[11206] Burton. Source page 583, u: "Alex. ab. Alex l. 4. c. 8." "Alessandro degli Alessandri, book 4, chapter 8."

[11207] Burton. Source page 583, x: "Tres filii patrem ab excubiis, quinque ab omnibus officiis liberabant." "Three children freed their father from watch duty, five from all public duties."

[11208] Editor. Jus trium liberorum means the right or privilege of three children. Gellius 2.15 discusses precedence accorded to marriage and parenthood. The exact three-child and five-child exemptions need further collation with Burton's other authorities; his Latin margin specifies watch duty where his body says burdensome offices.

[11209] Burton. Source page 583, y: "Præcepto primo, cogatur nubere aut mulctetur & pecunia templo Junonis dedicetur & publica fiat." "By the first precept, let him be compelled to marry or be fined, and let the money be dedicated to Juno's temple and become public property."

[11210] Burton. Source page 583, †: "Nic. Hill. Epic. philos." "Nicholas Hill, Epicurean Philosophy."

[11211] Editor. The first sentence echoes 1 Timothy 2:15. Plato, Laws 6, 774a–b, prescribes penalties for remaining unmarried after thirty-five; the money is sacred to Hera, whom Burton calls Juno. Burton also cites Nicholas Hill in the margin. Epictetus's alleged universal requirement is retained without an identified passage.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They account him in some countries unfortunate that dies without a wife, a most unhappy man as [11212]Boetius inferres, and if at all happy, yet infortunio felix, unhappy in his supposed happiness. They commonly deplore his estate, and much lament him for it: O my sweet son, &c. See Lucian de luctu, Sands fol. 83 &c.	In some countries they consider a man who dies without a wife unfortunate—a most unhappy man, as Boethius infers; and, if happy at all, still "fortunate in misfortune," unhappy in his supposed happiness. They commonly deplore his condition and lament him deeply for it: "Oh, my sweet son," and so on. See Lucian, On Mourning, and Sandys, folio 83, and so forth.[11213]
Yet notwithstanding many with us are of the opposite part, they are married themselves, and for others let them burne, fire and flame, they care not, so they be not troubled with them.	Yet many among us take the opposite side. They are married themselves; as for others, let them burn, blaze and flame—they do not care, so long as they are not troubled by them.
Some are too curious, and some too covetous, they may marry when they will both for ability and meanes, but so nice, that except as Theophilus the Emperour was presented by his mother Euprosine, with all the rarest beauties of the Empire in the great Chamber of his Palace at once, and bid to give a golden apple to her he liked best. If they might so take and choose whom they list out of all the fair maids their nation affords, they could happily condescend to marry: otherwise, &c.	Some are too fastidious, and some too covetous. They have the capacity and means to marry whenever they wish, but are so particular that they demand the choice offered to the emperor Theophilus, whose mother Euphrosyne presented all the rarest beauties of the empire together in the great chamber of his palace and told him to give a golden apple to the woman he liked best. If they could thus pick whomever they pleased from all the beautiful maidens their nation affords, they might perhaps consent to marry; otherwise—and so on.[11214]

[11212] Burton. Source page 583, *: "Consol. 3. pros. 7." "Consolation, book 3, prose 7."

[11213] Editor. Boethius, Consolation 3, prose 7, citing Euripides, calls the childless man fortunate in misfortune because children can cause suffering. Burton applies this to dying without a wife and reverses the emphasis in his English gloss. Both formulations remain. The comparison is through an English translation; Burton's Latin edition, Lucian and Sandys remain uncollated.

[11214] Editor. Curious and nice both mean excessively particular; happily here means perhaps. Burton's interrupted syntax is completed in modern English without adding to the bride-selection story. Theophilus, Euphrosyne and the golden apple are retained as his account; the family relation and source remain to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
why should a man marry saith another Epicurean rout, whats matrimony but a matter of money? why should free nature be entrenched on, confined or obliged, to this or that man or woman, with these manicles of body and goods? &c.	"Why should a man marry?" asks another Epicurean crowd. "What is matrimony but a matter of money? Why should free nature be encroached upon, confined or bound to this man or that woman with these shackles upon body and property?" And so on.[11215]
There are those too, that dearly love, admire & follow women, all their lives long, sponsi Penelopes, never well but in their companies, wistly gazing on their beauties, observing close, hanging after them, dallying still with them, & yet dare not, will not marry.	There are also those who dearly love, admire and pursue women all their lives: "Penelope's suitors," never content except in their company, gazing intently at their beauty, attending them closely, trailing after them, constantly flirting with them—and yet they dare not, will not marry.[11216]

[11215] Editor. Rout means crowd or company; manicles are manacles. Epicurean is Burton's polemical label for this pleasure-seeking objection, not a precise account of Epicurus's teaching.

[11216] Editor. Penelope's suitors pursue the wife of the absent Odysseus in the Odyssey. Wistly means intently; dallying means amorous play. Burton describes men devoted to courtship yet unwilling to marry.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 583–584 Many poor people, & of the meaner sort are too distrustful of Gods providence, they will not, dare not for such worldly respects, fear of want, woes, miseries, or that they shall light as [11217]Lemnius saith, on a scold, a slut, or a bad wife. And therefore [11218][11219]Tristem Juventam venere deserta colunt, they are resolved to live single, as [11220][11221]Epaminondas did,	Many poor people and those of lower rank are too distrustful of God's providence. They will not, dare not marry for such worldly reasons: fear of want, suffering and misery, or fear, as Lemnius says, of ending up with a scold, a slattern or a bad wife. And so "they pass a sorrowful youth, forsaking love"; they are resolved to live single, as Epaminondas did.[11222]
Source page 584 [11223]Nil ait esse prius, melius nil cælibe vita,	He says nothing comes before it, nothing is better than single life.[11224]
and ready with Hippolitus to abjure all women; [11225]Detestor omnes, horreo, fugio, execror, &c. But, Hippolite nescis quod fugis vitæ bonum,	And they are ready, with Hippolytus, to renounce all women: "I detest them all; I shudder at them, flee them and curse them," and so on. But "Hippolytus, you do not know what blessing of life you are fleeing."[11226]

[11217] Burton. Source page 583, z: "Qui se capistro matrimonii alligari non patiuntur Lemn. lib. 4. 13. de occult. nat. Abhorrent multi à matrimonio, ne morosam, querulam, acerbam, amaram uxorem perferre cogantur." "Those who do not allow themselves to be bound by the halter of marriage. Lemnius, On the Hidden Things of Nature, book 4, 13. Many shrink from marriage lest they be forced to endure a peevish, complaining, harsh and bitter wife."

[11218] Burton. Source page 583, †: "Senec. Hippol." "Seneca, Hippolytus. Repeated on page 584."

[11219] Burton. Source page 584, †: "Senec. Hippol." "Seneca, Hippolytus."

[11220] Burton. Source page 583, †: "Cælebs enim vixerat nec ad uxorem ducendam unquam induci potuit." "For he had lived unmarried and could never be induced to take a wife. Repeated on page 584."

[11221] Burton. Source page 584, †: "Cælebs enim vixerat nec ad uxorem ducendam unquam induci potuit." "For he had lived unmarried and could never be induced to take a wife."

[11222] Editor. Slut here means a slattern or slovenly woman. Seneca, Phaedra 462, has coles, addressed to Hippolytus: will you spend a sorrowful youth forsaking Venus? Burton changes it to the plural colunt. The Seneca and Epaminondas marginal entries appear both at the foot of page 583 and the top of 584; all four printed entries are retained.

[11223] Burton. Source page 584, *: "Hor." "Horace."

[11224] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.1.88. In context a married man praises celibacy, while an unmarried man praises marriage: Horace illustrates inconsistency. Burton extracts one half of that comparison.

[11225] Burton. Source page 584, *: "Senec. Hip." "Seneca, Hippolytus."

[11226] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 565–578, places Hippolytus's rejection after the Nurse asks why a few women's crimes condemn all. She then says love can master obstinacy, citing his Amazon mother. Burton calls the play Hippolytus. His following Hippolyte nescis line is not in this exchange; its exact source remains unestablished.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hippolite nescis —— alas poor Hippolitus thou knowest not what thou saiest, 'tis otherwise Hippolytus.	"Hippolytus, you do not know"—alas, poor Hippolytus, you do not know what you are saying. It is otherwise, Hippolytus.
[11227]Some make a doubt, an uxor literato sit ducenda, whether a Scholar should marry, if she be fair she will bring him back from his grammer to his horne-book, or else with kissing and dalliance she will hinder his study; if foule with scolding, he cannot well intend to both, as Philippus Beroaldus that great Bononian Doctor once writ, impediri enim studia literarum, &c.	Some question "whether a learned man should take a wife"—whether a scholar should marry. If she is beautiful, she will take him back from his grammar to his hornbook, or else hinder his studies with kisses and caresses; if ugly, with scolding. He cannot properly attend to both, as Filippo Beroaldo, that great Bolognese scholar, once wrote: "For literary studies are hindered," and so on.[11228]
but he recanted at last, and in a solmn sort with true conceived words he did ask the world and all women forgiveness. But you shall have the story as he relates himself, in his Commentaries on the sixt of Apuleius: For a long time I lived a single life, & ab uxore ducenda semper abhorrui, nec quicquam libero lecto censui jucundius, I could not abide marriage,	But at last he recanted, and solemnly, in sincerely meant words, asked the world and all women to forgive him. Yet you shall have the story as he tells it himself, in his commentary on the sixth book of Apuleius: "For a long time I lived a single life, and I always shrank from taking a wife, judging nothing more pleasant than a bed free of marriage." I could not endure marriage;[11229]
but as a rambler, erraticus ac volaticus amator (to use his own words) per multiplices Amores discurrebam, I took a snatch where I could get it, nay more, I railed at marriage down right, and in a publike auditory when I did interpret that sixt Satyre of Juvenal, out of Plutarch, and Seneca, I did heap up all the dicteries I could against women,	but as a wanderer—"a roving and inconstant lover," to use his own words—"I ran through many love affairs." I snatched what pleasure I could get. More than that, I openly railed against marriage, and when I expounded Juvenal's sixth satire before a public audience, I heaped up every jibe against women that I could find in Plutarch and Seneca.

[11227] Burton. Source page 584, †: "Æneas Sylvius de dictis Sigismundi. Hensius. Primero." "Aeneas Sylvius, On the Sayings of Sigismund; Hensius; Primero."

[11228] Editor. A hornbook was an elementary learning aid: the phrase imagines the scholar reduced to his first lessons and may also invite a joke about a cuckold's horns. Foule means physically unattractive. Beroaldo is the Bolognese humanist; the abbreviated authorities in the margin remain partly unresolved.

[11229] Editor. Beroaldo's alleged autobiographical recantation is cited to his commentary on Apuleius, book 6. Burton switches between Latin quotation and English paraphrase, and both are translated. Exact collation with the commentary remains outstanding.

Original text 1651	Modern English
but now recant with Stesichorus, Palinodiam cano, nec pœnitet censeri in ordine maritorum, I approve of marriage, I am glad I am a married man, I am heartily glad I have a wife, so sweet a wife, so noble a wife, so young, so chast a wife, so loving a wife,	But now, with Stesichorus, I recant: "I sing a recantation, and do not regret being numbered among husbands." I approve of marriage; I am glad to be a married man. I am heartily glad to have a wife: so sweet a wife, so nobly born a wife, so young, so chaste a wife, so loving a wife.[11230]
and I do wish and desire all other men to marry; and especially Scholars, that as of old Martia did by Hortensius, Terentia by Tullius, Calphurnia to Plinius, Pudentilla to Apuleius, [11231]hold the candle whilst their husbands did meditate and write, so theirs may do to them, and as my dear [11232]Camilla doth to me.	And I wish and urge all other men to marry, especially scholars, so that, just as Marcia in old times held the candle for Hortensius, Terentia for Cicero, Calpurnia for Pliny, and Pudentilla for Apuleius while their husbands reflected and wrote, their wives may do the same for them, as my dear Camilla does for me.[11233]
Let other men be averse; raile then and scoffe at women, and say what they can to the contrary, vir sine uxore malorum expers est, &c. a single man is an happy man, &c. but this is a toy.	Let other men be opposed; let them rail and jeer at women, and say whatever they can against them: "A man without a wife is free from troubles," and so on; a single man is a happy man, and so forth. But this is nonsense.
[11234]Nec dulces amores sperne puer, neque tu choreas;	Do not scorn sweet love, young man, nor dancing.[11235]
these men are too distrustful and much to blame, to use such speeches,	These men are too distrustful, and greatly to blame for speaking in this way:

[11230] Editor. A palinode is a poem of recantation. Burton invokes the traditional example of Stesichorus's retraction of his attack on Helen. Here it supplies an image for Beroaldo's change of mind about marriage.

[11231] Burton. Source page 584, *: "Legentibus & meditantibus Candelas & Candelabrum tenuerunt." "They held candles and a candlestick for their husbands as they read and reflected."

[11232] Burton. Source page 584, †: "Habeo uxorem ex animi sententia Camillam Paleotti Iurisconsulti filiam." "I have a wife after my own heart, Camilla, daughter of the jurist Paleotti."

[11233] Editor. Tullius is Cicero. Burton groups four ancient wives as scholarly helpers, then names Beroaldo's Camilla; the margin identifies her as Paleotti's daughter. The candle-holding details and the historical relationships have not been individually verified against Beroaldo's source.

[11234] Burton. Source page 584, *: "Hor." "Horace."

[11235] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.9.14–15, urging a young man to enjoy love and dancing. The quotation is translated independently of Burton's surrounding argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11236]Parcite paucorum diffundere crimen in omnes,	Do not spread the blame of a few upon all.[11237]
They must not condemne all for some.	They must not condemn everyone because of a few.
As there be many bad, there be some good wives; as some be vitious, some be vertuous: read what Salomon hath said in their praises, Prov. 13. and Syracides cap. 26. & 30. blessed is the man that hath a vertuous wife, for the number of his days shall be double. A vertuous woman rejoyceth her husband, and she shall fulfil the yeares of his life in peace. A good wife is a good portion, (& 36. 24.) An help, a pillar of rest, columina quietis,	As there are many bad wives, there are also some good ones; as some are vicious, some are virtuous. Read what Solomon has said in their praise in Proverbs 13, and Sirach, chapters 26 and 30: "Blessed is the man who has a virtuous wife, for the number of his days shall be doubled. A virtuous woman gladdens her husband, and she shall fill the years of his life with peace. A good wife is a good portion"; and, in 36:24, "a helper, a pillar of rest"—"supports of tranquillity."[11238]
[11239]Qui capit uxorem, fratrem capit atque sororem.	He who takes a wife gains both a brother and a sister.[11240]
Et 30, he that hath no wife wandereth to and fro mourning. Minuuntur atræ conjuge curæ, women are the sole, only joy, and comfort of a mans life, borne ad usum & lusum hominum, [11241]Firmamenta familiæ,	And at verse 30: "He who has no wife wanders to and fro mourning." "Dark cares are lessened by a wife." Women are the one and only joy and comfort of a man's life, born "for men's use and delight," "the mainstays of the household."[11242]

[11236] Burton. Source page 584, a: "Ovid." "Ovid."

[11237] Editor. Ovid, Art of Love 3.9–10, reads paucarum, of a few women, then asks that each woman be judged on her merits. The passage defends teaching women the art of love. Burton retains the warning but prints paucorum, of a few people; his English restatement is separate. His immediate edition remains unidentified.

[11238] Editor. The virtuous wife is praised in Proverbs 31, not Burton's printed 13. Sirach 26:1–3 supplies the opening sentences; Sirach 36:24 calls a wife a help and pillar of rest. The source prints she shall fulfil, while the biblical parallel refers to the husband; Burton's feminine pronoun is retained. Columina is plural, supports.

[11239] Burton. Source page 584, *: "Aphranius." "Afranius."

[11240] Editor. Burton attributes this line to Afranius. The exact surviving fragment or intermediary source has not been located; the saying presents a wife as supplying the intimacy of both brother and sister.

[11241] Burton. Source page 584, y: "Lœbeus."

[11242] Editor. Burton prints Et 30, but the saying about wandering without a wife is Sirach 36:25 in the King James text consulted. His numeral and further Latin phrases are retained. The margin beside Firmamenta reads Lœbeus; the cited work has not been identified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Delitiæ humani generis, solatia vitæ, Blanditiæ noctis, placidissima cura diei, Vota virum, juvenum spes, &c.	The delights of humankind, the comforts of life, The caresses of night, the gentlest care of day, Men's desire, young men's hope, and so on.[11243]
Source page 585 [11244]A wife is a young mans Mistress, a middle ages companion, an old mans nurse: Particeps lætorum & tristium, A prop, an help, &c.	A wife is a young man's mistress, a middle-aged man's companion, an old man's nurse; "a partner in joys and sorrows," a support, a help, and so on.[11245]
[11246]Optima viri possessio est uxor benevola, Mitigans iram & avertens animam ejus à tristitia,	A man's best possession is a loving wife, Soothing his anger and turning his spirit from sadness.[11247]
Mans best possession is a loving wife, She tempers anger and diverts all strife.	A man's best possession is a loving wife; She softens anger and turns aside all strife.
There is no joy, no comfort, no sweetnes, no pleasure in the world like to that of a good wife,	There is no joy, no comfort, no sweetness, no pleasure in the world like that of a good wife:
Quam cum chara domi conjux, fidusque maritus Unanimes degunt —— saith our Latin Homer,	Than when a dear wife and faithful husband Live together at home in harmony—says our Latin Homer.[11248]

[11243] Editor. The three Latin lines praise women as a source of comfort and desire. Their exact source is not identified on this page and remains unlocated. Cura can mean care, concern or cherished object; gentlest care retains that range.

[11244] Burton. Source page 584, q: "Bacons Essayes."

[11245] Editor. Bacon, Essays, Of Marriage and Single Life, gives the three ages in the plural. Burton recasts the saying in the singular and adds the Latin phrase about joys and sorrows. The marginal citation is printed at the bottom of the preceding page.

[11246] Burton. Source page 585, †: "Euripides."

[11247] Editor. The margin attributes the two Latin lines to Euripides, without a play title. Exact identification remains open. Burton's separate English couplet substitutes strife for the Latin sadness; each version is translated independently.

[11248] Editor. Compare Odyssey 6.182–185, where Odysseus praises a husband and wife keeping house in harmony. Burton's Latin Homer means a Latin rendering of Homer; the particular translator is not named and remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
she is stil the same in sickness and in health, his eye, his hand, his bosome friend, his partner at all times, his other self, not to be separated by any calamity, but ready to share all sorrow, discontent, and as the Indian women do, live and die with him; nay more, to die presently for him.	She is always the same in sickness and in health: his eye, his hand, his intimate friend, his partner at every moment, his other self. No calamity can separate them; she is ready to share every sorrow and distress, and, as Indian women do, to live and die with him—indeed, even to die immediately for him.[11249]
Admetus King of Thessaly when he lay upon his death bed, was told by Apollos Oracle, that if he could get any body to die for him, he should live longer yet, but when all refused, his parents, etsi decrepiti, friends and followers forsook him, Alcestus his wife, though young, most willingly undertook it, what more can be desired or expected?	When Admetus, king of Thessaly, lay on his deathbed, Apollo's oracle told him that if he could find anyone to die for him, he would live longer. But everyone refused: his parents, "though aged and infirm," his friends and his followers abandoned him. His wife Alcestis, though young, most willingly undertook it. What more can be desired or expected?[11250]
And although on the other side there be an infinite number of bad husbands (I should rail downright against some of them) able to discourage any women; yet there be some good ones again, and those most observant of marriage Rites.	And although, on the other side, there are countless bad husbands—I could rail outright against some of them—enough to discourage any woman, there are also some good ones, most faithful to the obligations of marriage.

[11249] Editor. Burton alludes to Indian widow-burning as an example of conjugal devotion. The comparison is his historical representation and does not distinguish choice from coercion. Presently means immediately.

[11250] Editor. In Euripides' Alcestis, Apollo arranges that Admetus may escape death if another dies in his place; Alcestis agrees after his parents refuse. Burton's oracle and deathbed framing compresses the story. His question closes this block before he turns from good wives to good and bad husbands.

Original text 1651	Modern English
An honest Country fellow (as Fulgosius relates it) in the Kingdom of Naples, [11251]at plough by the Sea side, saw his wife carried away by Mauritanian Pirats, he ran after in all haste, up to the chin first, and when he could wade no longer, swam, calling to the Governor of the ship to deliver his wife, or if he must not have her restored, to let him follow as a prisoner, for he was resolved to be a Gally-slave, his drudg, willing to endure any misery, so that he might but enjoy his dear wife.	An honest countryman in the kingdom of Naples, as Fulgosius relates, was ploughing by the sea when he saw his wife carried away by Mauritanian pirates. He ran after them in all haste, first up to his chin in the water; when he could wade no farther, he swam, calling to the ship's commander to release his wife. If she could not be restored to him, he asked to accompany her as a prisoner. He was resolved to become a galley slave, the commander's drudge, willing to endure any misery if only he could be with his dear wife.[11252]
The Moores seeing the mans constancy, and relating the whole matter to their Governor at Tunnis, set them both free, and gave them an honest pension to maintain themselves during their lives.	The Moors, seeing the man's steadfastness and reporting the whole affair to their governor at Tunis, set them both free and gave them a substantial allowance to support them for the rest of their lives.

[11251] Burton. Source page 585, *: "Cum juxta mare agrum coleret: Omnis enim miseriæ immemorem, conjugalis amor eum fecerat. Non sine ingenti admiratione, tanta hominis charitate motus rex liberos esse jussit, &c." "While he was cultivating a field by the sea: for conjugal love had made him forgetful of every hardship. With great admiration, moved by the man's great affection, the king ordered them to be set free, and so on."

[11252] Editor. Fulgosius is Battista Fregoso. Burton presents the captive couple as an example of conjugal devotion; the precise passage in Fregoso remains to be collated. Mauritanian and Moors are his historical terms for North Africans here, not references to the boundaries of the modern state of Mauritania. Honest pension means a respectable or sufficient allowance.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I could tell many stories to this effect; but put case it often prove otherwise, because marriage is troublesome, wholly therefore to avoid it, is no argument; [11253]He that will avoid trouble must avoid the world (Eusebius præpar. Evangel. 5. cap. 50.)	I could tell many stories to this effect. But suppose things often turn out otherwise: to avoid marriage altogether because it is troublesome is no sound argument. "Whoever would avoid trouble must avoid the world"—Eusebius, Preparation for the Gospel, book 5, chapter 50.[11254]
Some trouble there is in marriage I deny not, Et si grave sit matrimonium, saith Erasmus, edulcatur tamen multis, &c. yet there be many things to [11255]sweeten it, a pleasant wife, placens uxor, pretty children, dulces nati, deliciæ filiorum hominum, the chief delight of the sons of men; Eccles. 2.8. &c.	I do not deny that there is some trouble in marriage. "Even if marriage is burdensome," says Erasmus, "it is nevertheless sweetened by many things," and so on. There are many things to sweeten it: a pleasant wife—"a pleasing wife"; pretty children—"dear children, the delights of the sons of men," their chief delight; Ecclesiastes 2:8, and so forth.[11256]
And howsoever though it were all troubles, [11257]utilitatis publicæ causa devorandum, grave quid libenter subeundum, it must willingly be undergone for publik goods sake,	And in any case, even if it were nothing but trouble, "it must be swallowed for the sake of the public good, a burden willingly undertaken": it must willingly be endured for the public good.
[11258]Audite (populus) hæc, inquit Susarion, Malæ sunt mulieres, veruntamen O populares, Hoc sine malo domum inhabitare non licet.	Hear this, people, says Susarion: Women are an evil; nevertheless, my countrymen, Without this evil one cannot keep a household.[11259]

[11253] Burton. Source page 585, c: "Qui vult vitare molestias vitet mundum." "Whoever wishes to avoid troubles must avoid the world."

[11254] Editor. Burton's reference to Preparation for the Gospel 5.50 is retained. Book 5 of the Gifford text consulted ends at chapter 36, and the quoted saying has not been located there. The attribution and numbering require further collation.

[11255] Burton. Source page 585, d: "Τίς δὲ βίος τί δὲ τερπνὸν ἄτερ χρυσῆς ἀφροδίτης. Quid vita est quæso, quidve est sine Cypride dulce? Mimner." "What is life, what is pleasure without golden Aphrodite? What is life, I ask, or what is sweet without Cypris? Mimnermus."

[11256] Editor. The Greek margin is the opening of Mimnermus, fragment 1; Cypris is Aphrodite or Venus. Ecclesiastes 2:8 contains the phrase delights of the sons of men, but its application to children is Burton's. His Latin repetitions are translated separately rather than silently absorbed into the English.

[11257] Burton. Source page 585, e: "Erasmus." "Erasmus."

[11258] Burton. Source page 585, *: "E Stobeo." "From Stobaeus."

[11259] Editor. The English fragment attributed to Susarion in the Ancient History Sourcebook includes his parentage and home, and ends by calling both marriage and non-marriage bad. These details are absent from Burton's three Latin lines; his English couplet condenses them further. The Greek attribution and his cited Stobaeus intermediary remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hear me O my country men, saith Susarion, Women are naught, yet no life without one.	Hear me, my countrymen, says Susarion: Women are bad, yet there is no living without one.
Source page 585–586 [11260]Malum est mulier, sed necessarium malum, they are necessary evils and for our own ends we must make use of them to have issue, [11261]Supplet Venus ac restituit humanum genus, and to propagate the Church.	"Woman is an evil, but a necessary evil." They are necessary evils, and for our own ends we must make use of them to have children—"Venus replenishes and restores the human race"—and to propagate the Church.[11262]
Source page 586 For to what end is a man born? why lives he, but to increase the world? and how shall he do that well, if he do not marry? [11263]Matrimonium humano generi immortalitatem tribuit, saith Nevisanus, Matrimony makes us immortal, and according to [11264]Tacitus, 'tis firmissimum imperii munimentum, the sole and chief prop of an empire.	For what purpose is a man born? Why does he live, except to increase the world's population? And how can he do that properly if he does not marry? "Marriage bestows immortality on the human race," says Nevisanus: matrimony makes us immortal. And according to Tacitus, it is "the strongest bulwark of an empire," its sole and chief support.[11265]
[11266]Indigne vivit per quem non vivit & alter,	He lives unworthily through whom no other lives.[11267]

[11260] Burton. Source page 585, †: "Menander." "Menander."

[11261] Burton. Source page 586, *: "Seneca Hyp." "Seneca, Hippolytus."

[11262] Editor. The necessary-evil maxim is attributed in Burton's margin to Menander, without a work or fragment number. The following phrase adapts Seneca, Phaedra 469–470, where Venus replenishes a depleted race. These are arguments in Burton's debate about marriage, including its instrumental and hostile descriptions of women.

[11263] Burton. Source page 586, unmarked: "Lib. 3. num. 1." "Book 3, number 1."

[11264] Burton. Source page 586, †: "Hist. lib. 4." "Histories, book 4."

[11265] Editor. Nevisanus is Giovanni Nevizzano. The unmarked Lib. 3. num. 1. appears immediately below the Seneca reference in the margin; it is provisionally attached to Nevizzano, whose work is numbered by books and sections, rather than to Seneca's play. The printed Tacitus reference says Histories 4; the precise passage remains unlocated.

[11266] Burton. Source page 586, g: "Palingenius." "Palingenius."

[11267] Editor. Burton attributes the line to Palingenius, without giving a book or line. It means that the man who does not give life to another lives unworthily; its exact location remains to be checked.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11268]which Pelopidas objected to Epaminondas, he was an unworthy member of a Common-wealth, that left not a childe after him to defend it, and as [11269]Trismegistus to his son Tatius, have no commerce with a single man:	This was the objection Pelopidas made to Epaminondas: a man was an unworthy member of a commonwealth if he left no child behind to defend it. And as Trismegistus said to his son Tatius, “Have no dealings with an unmarried man.”[11270]
Holding belike that a Batchelor could not live honestly as he should, and with Georgius Wicelius, a great Divine and holy man, who of late by twenty six arguments commends marriage as a thing most necessary for all kinde of persons, must laudable and fit to be embraced: and is perswaded withall, that no man can live and die religiously, and as he ought, without a wife, persuasus neminem posse neque piè vivere, neque bene mori citra uxorem,	He apparently held that a bachelor could not live honourably as he ought, agreeing with Georgius Wicelius, a great theologian and holy man, who has lately advanced twenty-six arguments commending marriage as most necessary for every kind of person, highly praiseworthy and fit to be embraced. He is also persuaded that no man can live and die religiously, as he ought, without a wife—“persuaded that no one can either live piously or die well without a wife.”[11271]
he is false, an enemy to the Common-wealth, injurious to himself, destructive to the world, an apostate to nature, a rebell against heaven and earth. Let our wilful, obstinate, and stale Bachelors ruminate of this,	Such a man is false, an enemy of the commonwealth, harmful to himself, destructive to the world, an apostate from nature, a rebel against heaven and earth. Let our wilful, obstinate and ageing bachelors ponder this.

[11268] Burton. Source page 586, †: “Bruson. lib. 7. cap. 23.” “Brusonius, book 7, chapter 23.”

[11269] Burton. Source page 586, h: “Noli societatem habere, &c.” “Have no association, and so on.”

[11270] Editor. Compare Nepos, Epaminondas 10: Pelopidas reproaches his childlessness; he calls Leuctra an enduring daughter. For Hermes Trismegistus, Everard’s Divine Pymander 9.77–79 condemns childlessness and tells Asclepius not to congratulate a childless man. This differs from Burton’s instruction to Tat to avoid an unmarried man. It is a contextual parallel; the precise Hermetic wording and Brusonius route remain untraced.

[11271] Editor. Georgius Wicelius is Georg Witzel. The count of twenty-six arguments and the judgement on unmarried men are Burton’s report, not independently verified here. The source prints must laudable, understood as most laudable in the modern version. Stale bachelors means men grown old in bachelorhood.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If we could live without wives, as Marcellus Numidicus said in [11272]Agellius, we would all want them, but because we cannot, let all marry, and consult rather to the publike good, then their own private pleasure or estate.	"If we could live without wives," as Marcellus Numidicus said in Aulus Gellius, "we would all do without them; but since we cannot, let everyone marry, and consider the public good rather than personal pleasure or circumstances."[11273]
It were an happy thing, as wise [11274]Euripides hath it, if we could buy children with gold and silver, and be so provided, sine mulierum congressu, without womens company, but that may not be,	It would be a happy thing, as wise Euripides puts it, if we could buy children with gold and silver and so provide ourselves, "without intercourse with women," without women's company. But that cannot be.[11275]
[11276]Orbis jacebit squalido turpis situ, Vanum sine ullis classibus stabit mare, Alesque cœlo deerit & sylvis fera	The world will lie foul in squalid neglect; The empty sea will stand without any fleets, And birds will be missing from the sky, wild beasts from the woods.[11277]
Earth, Ayr, Sea, Land eftsoon would come to nought, The world it self should be to ruine brought.	Earth, air, sea and land would soon come to nothing; The world itself would be brought to ruin.
necessity therefore compels us to marry.	Necessity therefore compels us to marry.

[11272] Burton. Source page 586, i: "Lib. 1. cap. 6. Si, inquit, Quirites, sine uxore esse possemus, omnes careremus; Sed quoniam sic est, saluti potius publicæ quam voluptati consulendum." "Book 1, chapter 6. If, he said, Romans, we could do without a wife, we would all be without one; but since things are as they are, we must consider the public welfare rather than pleasure."

[11273] Editor. Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights 1.6, calls the speaker Metellus Numidicus, not Burton's Marcellus. Burton abbreviates the argument; Gellius says nature prevents living entirely without wives, although life with them is not wholly comfortable. Want them here means do without them. The printed name is retained in both columns; Burton's precise intermediary has not been established.

[11274] Burton. Source page 586, †: "Beatum foret si liberos auro & argento mercaris, &c." "It would be a happy thing if you could purchase children with gold and silver, and so on."

[11275] Editor. Compare Euripides, Hippolytus 616–624: Hippolytus wishes men could buy children at temples without women. Burton turns a character's hostile speech into a general saying of wise Euripides. His precise Latin intermediary remains unidentified.

[11276] Burton. Source page 586, *: "Seneca. Hyp." "Seneca, Hippolytus."

[11277] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 471–473. Burton prints Vanum and classibus, empty and fleets; the Latin text consulted has vacuum and piscibus, empty and fish. Classibus belongs to the manuscript tradition; piscibus is an emendation. The translation follows Burton's ships, while his following English couplet gives a looser summary. Eftsoon here means soon.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But what do I trouble my self, to finde arguments to perswade to, or commend marriage? behold a brief abstract of all that which I have said, and much more, succinctly, pithily, pathetically, perspicuously, and elegantly delivered in twelve motions to mitigate the miseries of marriage, by [11278]Jacobus de Voragine,	But why do I trouble myself to find arguments to recommend marriage or persuade people to it? Here is a brief summary of everything I have said, and much more, expressed concisely, forcefully, movingly, clearly and elegantly in twelve considerations to soften the miseries of marriage, by Jacobus de Voragine.[11279]
1 Res est? habes quæ tueatur & augeat. 2 Non est? habes quæ quærat. 3 Secundæ res sunt? felicitas duplicatur.	1 Have you property? You have someone to preserve and increase it. 2 Have you none? You have someone to acquire it. 3 Are you prospering? Your happiness is doubled.
4 Adversæ sunt? Consolatur, adsidet, onus participat ut tolerabile fiat. 5 Domi es? solitudinis tædium pellit. 6 Foras? Discedentem visu prosequitur, absentem desiderat, redeuntem læta excipit.	4 Are you in adversity? She comforts you, stays beside you and shares the burden to make it bearable. 5 Are you at home? She drives away the weariness of solitude. 6 Abroad? Her eyes follow you as you leave; she misses you when absent and welcomes you back with joy.
7 Nihil jucundum absque societate? Nulla societas matrimonio suavior. 8 Vinculum Conjugalis charitatis adamantinum. 9 Accrescit dulcis affinium turba, duplicatur numerus parentum, fratrum, sororum, nepotum.	7 Is nothing pleasant without companionship? No companionship is sweeter than marriage. 8 The bond of conjugal love is unbreakable. 9 The dear company of relatives by marriage grows; the number of parents, brothers, sisters and descendants is doubled.[11280]

[11278] Burton. Source page 586, *: “Gen. 2. Adjutorium simile. &c.” “Genesis 2. A helper like himself, and so on.”

[11279] Editor. Burton attributes this numbered collection to Jacobus de Voragine; its exact source remains unidentified. Motions are propositions or considerations; pathetically means movingly, appealing to feeling. The margin invokes Genesis 2:18, the creation of a fitting helper.

[11280] Editor. Adamantine means as hard or unbreakable as adamant. Affines are relations acquired through marriage; nepotes can mean grandchildren or descendants, as well as nephews. Descendants is used here and for Burton’s corresponding English nephewes.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 587 10 Pulchra sis prole parens. 11 Lex Mosis sterilitatem matrimonii execratur, quanto amplius Cælibatum? 12 Si natura pœnam non effugit, ne voluntas quidem effugiet.	10 May you become a parent of fine children. 11 The law of Moses curses barrenness in marriage; how much more, then, celibacy? 12 If nature does not escape punishment, neither will the will escape it.[11281]
1 Hast thou meanes? thou hast none to keep and increase it. 2 Hast none? thou hast one to helpe to get it. 3 Art in prosperity? thine happinesse is doubled.	1 Have you means? You have someone to preserve and increase them. 2 Have you none? You have someone to help obtain them. 3 Are you prosperous? Your happiness is doubled.[11282]
4 Art in adversity? shee'l comfort, assist, bear a part of thy burden to make it more tolerable. 5 Art at home? shee'le drive away melancholy. 6 Art abroad? shee lookes after thee going from home, wishes for thee in thine absence, and joyfully welcomes thy returne.	4 Are you in adversity? She will comfort and assist you, bearing part of your burden to make it more bearable. 5 Are you at home? She will drive away melancholy. 6 Are you abroad? She watches you leave home, longs for you in your absence, and joyfully welcomes your return.
7 There's nothing delightsome without society, no society so sweet as Matrimony. 8 The band of Conjugal love is adamantine. 9 The sweet company of kinsmen increaseth, the number of parents is doubled, of brothers, sisters, nephewes.	7 Nothing is delightful without companionship; no companionship is so sweet as marriage. 8 The bond of conjugal love is unbreakable. 9 The dear company of relatives increases: the number of parents is doubled, and of brothers, sisters and descendants.

[11281] Editor. The last two arguments treat involuntary childlessness as nature's punishment and voluntary celibacy as still less excusable. This is the historical argument being reproduced. The alleged Mosaic curse is not supplied with a specific biblical reference by Burton, and should not be read as an established theological conclusion.

[11282] Editor. The source's first English item prints none to keep and increase it, reversing both its own Latin habes quæ tueatur and the argument. The modern version reads someone as a transparent correction; the original column preserves none. Burton's English twelve-point version remains separate from the translated Latin list.

Original text 1651	Modern English
10 Thou art made a father by a faire and happy issue. 11 Moses Curseth the barrennesse of Matrimony, how much more a single life? 12 If Nature escape not punishment, surely thy Will shall not avoid it.	10 You become the father of beautiful, fortunate children. 11 Moses curses barrenness in marriage; how much more a single life? 12 If nature does not escape punishment, surely your will shall not avoid it.
All this is true, say you, and who knowes it not? but how easy a matter is it to answer these motives, and to make an Anti-parodia quite opposite unto it? To exercise my self I will Essay.	All this is true, you say, and who does not know it? But how easy it is to answer these arguments and construct a counter-parody directly opposed to them! As an exercise, I shall try.[11283]
1 Hast thou meanes? thou hast one to spend it. 2 Hast none? thy beggery is increased. 3 Art in prosperity? thy happinesse is ended.	1 Have you means? You have someone to spend them. 2 Have you none? Your poverty is increased. 3 Are you prosperous? Your happiness is ended.
4 Art in adversity? like Job's wife shee'le aggravate thy misery, vexe thy soule, make thy burden intollerable. 5 Art at home? shee'le scold thee out of doores. 6 Art abroad? If thou be wise keep thee so, shee'le perhaps graft hornes in thine absence, scowle on thee coming home.	4 Are you in adversity? Like Job's wife, she will aggravate your misery, torment your soul and make your burden unbearable. 5 Are you at home? She will scold you out of doors. 6 Are you abroad? If you are wise, stay there: perhaps she will give you cuckold's horns while you are away, and scowl at you when you come home.[11284]
7 Nothing gives more content then solitarinesse, no solitarinesse like this of a single life. 8 The band of marriage is adamantine; no hope of loosing it, thou art undone. 9 Thy number increaseth, thou shalt be devoured by thy wives friends.	7 Nothing gives more contentment than solitude, and no solitude compares with single life. 8 The bond of marriage is unbreakable: there is no hope of loosening it; you are ruined. 9 Your numbers increase: you will be eaten out of house and home by your wife's relations.

[11283] Editor. Anti-parodia is a counter-parody: Burton answers each of the twelve favourable propositions in the same order. His announced exercise explains the abrupt reversal in tone; it does not cancel his eventual recommendation of marriage.

[11284] Editor. Job 2:9 is the reference to Job's wife. Grafting horns means making the husband a cuckold through adultery. The horticultural metaphor and its jealousy are preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
10 Thou art made a Cornuto by an unchast wife, and shalt bring up other folkes Children instead of thine owne. 11 Paul commends marriage, yet he preferres a single life. 12 Is marriage honorable? What an immortall crown belongs to virginity?	10 An unchaste wife makes you a cuckold, and you will bring up other people's children instead of your own. 11 Paul commends marriage, yet prefers a single life. 12 Is marriage honourable? What an immortal crown, then, belongs to virginity![11285]

[11285] Editor. Cornuto is Italian for a horned man, hence a cuckold. Compare 1 Corinthians 7, especially verses 7–9 and 32–35, for Paul's treatment of married and unmarried life. The question about honourable marriage also echoes Hebrews 13:4; the crown of virginity is the polemical counter-argument here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 587–588 So Siracides himself, speaks as much as may be, for and against women, so doth almost every philosopher plead pro and con, every poet thus argues the case (though what cares vulgus hominum what they say?) so can I conceive peradventure, and so canst thou: when all is said, yet since some be good, some bad, let's put it to the venture. I conclude therefore with Seneca,	So Sirach himself says all that can be said for and against women; almost every philosopher likewise argues on both sides, and every poet debates the case—though what do "the mass of people" care what they say? Perhaps I can devise such arguments too, and so can you. When all is said, since some are good and some bad, let us take the chance. I therefore conclude with Seneca:[11286]
Source page 588 —— cur Toro viduo jaces? Tristem juventam solve: nunc luxus rape, Effunde habenas, optimos vitæ dies Effluere prohibe.	Why do you lie in a lonely bed? Release your sorrowful youth; seize pleasure now, Give the reins free play; keep the best days of life From slipping away.[11287]
Why dost thou lye alone, let thy youth and best daies to passe away? Marry whilst thou maist, donec viventi canities abest morosa, whilest thou art yet able, yet lusty,	Why do you lie alone and let your youth and best days pass away? Marry while you can, "while fretful grey age is still absent from your life," while you are still able and vigorous.[11288]
[11289]Elige cui dicas, tu mihi sola places,	Choose someone to whom you can say, "You alone please me."[11290]
make thy choice, and that freely forthwith, make no delay, but take thy fortune as it falls. 'Tis true,	Make your choice freely and at once; do not delay, but take your fortune as it comes. It is true:

[11286] Editor. Siracides means the author of Sirach or Ecclesiasticus. Burton has already quoted its praise of a good wife; here he observes that authorities can supply opposing arguments. Put it to the venture means take the risk or make the attempt.

[11287] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 448–451, spoken by the Nurse to Hippolytus. Burton's nunc luxus rape differs from nunc cursus rape in the Latin text consulted; the modern version follows his invitation to seize pleasures. Reins continue the image of allowing youth free movement.

[11288] Editor. The Latin recalls Horace, Odes 1.9.16–17, but Burton prints viventi, living, where Horace has virenti, flourishing or youthful. The modern version preserves the printed sense. Lusty means vigorous, not exclusively sexually eager.

[11289] Burton. Source page 588, †: "Ovid." "Ovid."

[11290] Editor. Ovid, Art of Love 1.42. The line is addressed to a man seeking a woman to love; Burton uses it in support of choosing a wife.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [11291]calamitosus est qui inciderit In malam uxorem, felix qui in bonam,	Wretched is the man who falls in with A bad wife; happy the one who finds a good one.[11292]
'Tis an hazard both waies I confesse, to live single or to marry,	There is risk on either side, I confess, whether one lives single or marries.
[11293]Nam & uxorem ducere, & non ducere malum est,	For both taking a wife and not taking one are an evil.[11294]
it may be bad, it may be good, as it is a crosse and calamity on the one side, so 'tis a sweet delight, an incomparable happinesse, a blessed estate, a most unspeakable benefit, a sole content on the other; 'tis all in the proof.	It may be bad; it may be good. Just as it is an affliction and a calamity on one side, on the other it is a sweet delight, an incomparable happiness, a blessed condition, a benefit beyond expression, a unique contentment. Experience must settle it.
Be not then so wayward, so covetous, so distrustful, so curious and nice, but let's all marry, mutuos foventes amplexus: Take me to thee, and thee to me, to morrow is St Valentines day, let's keep it Holiday for Cupids sake, for that great God Loves sake, for Hymens sake, and celebrate [11295]Venus Vigil with our Ancestors for company together, singing as they did,	Do not, then, be so contrary, so grasping, so mistrustful, so particular and hard to please. Let us all marry, "cherishing one another's embraces": "Take me to yourself, and yourself to me." Tomorrow is Saint Valentine's Day; let us keep it as a holiday for Cupid's sake, for the sake of that great god Love, for Hymen's sake. Let us celebrate the Vigil of Venus together in our ancestors' company, singing as they did:[11296]

[11291] Burton. Source page 588, †: "Euripides." "Euripides."

[11292] Editor. The two Latin lines are attributed to Euripides without a play title. Their precise source has not been established. Inciderit suggests encountering or falling in with someone.

[11293] Burton. Source page 588, †: "E græco Valerius lib. 7. cap. 7." "From the Greek. Valerius, book 7, chapter 7."

[11294] Editor. Burton cites Valerius, book 7, chapter 7, from the Greek, without naming a work. The saying also occurs as the final thought of the Susarion fragment quoted above. The precise intermediary is left open.

[11295] Burton. Source page 588, *: "Pervigilium Veneris è vetere poeta." "The Vigil of Venus, from an ancient poet."

[11296] Editor. Hymen is the deity of marriage. Clipping below means embracing. Burton imagines a collective celebration with the ancient celebrants of Venus; his tomorrow is a rhetorical invitation, not evidence for the date of composition.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Cras amet qui nunquam amavit, quique amavit, cras amet. Ver novum, ver iam canorum, ver natus orbis est, Vere concordant amores, vere nubunt alites, Et nemus coma resolvit &c. Cras amet, &c.	Tomorrow let him love who never loved; and he who has loved, let him love tomorrow. Spring is new, spring now sings; in spring the world was born. In spring loves come into harmony, in spring birds mate, And the woodland loosens its leafy hair, and so on. Tomorrow let him love, and so on.[11297]
Let him that is averse from marriage read more in Barbarus de re uxor. lib. 1. cap. 1. Lemnius de institut. cap. 4. P. Godefridus de Amor. lib. 3. cap. 1. [11298]Nevisanus lib. 3. Alex. ab Alexandro, lib. 4. cap. 8. Tunstall, Erasmus tracts in laudem matrimonii, &c.	Anyone averse to marriage should read further in Barbaro, On Marriage, book 1, chapter 1; Lemnius, On Education, chapter 4; P. Godefridus, On Love, book 3, chapter 1; Nevisanus, book 3; Alessandro degli Alessandri, book 4, chapter 8; and the tracts of Tunstall and Erasmus in praise of marriage, and so forth.[11299] and I doubt not but in the end he will rest satisfied, recant with Beroaldus, do penance for his former folly, singing some penitentiall ditties, desire to be reconciled to the Deity of this great God Love, go a pilgrimage to his Shrine, offer to his Image, sacrifice upon his Altar, and be as willing at last to embrace marriage as the rest:	I do not doubt that in the end he will be satisfied, recant with Beroaldo, and do penance for his former folly, singing penitential songs. He will seek reconciliation with the divinity of this great god Love, make a pilgrimage to his shrine, offer gifts to his image, sacrifice upon his altar, and at last be as willing to embrace marriage as the rest.

[11297] Editor. The opening and refrain of the anonymous Vigil of Venus. The source prints ver natus and coma resolvit where the comparative text has vere natus and comam resolvit. The modern version gives the evident spring and woodland imagery, preserving the source readings in the original. The final Cras amet is an abbreviated repetition, not a missing verse.

[11298] Burton. Source page 588, k: “Domus non potest consistere sine uxore. Nevisanus lib. 2. num. 18.” “A household cannot stand without a wife. Nevisanus, book 2, number 18.”

[11299] Editor. The works are offered by Burton as further reading, not quoted here at length. De re uxoria concerns marriage; de institut. is rendered On Education provisionally. P. Godefridus and the exact Lemnius and Tunstall works require bibliographic collation. The margin cites Nevizzano 2.18 although the body directs the reader to book 3.

Original text 1651	Modern English
There will not be found, I hope, [11300]No not in that severe family of Stoicks, who shall refuse to submit his grave beard, and supercilious lookes to the clipping of a wife, or disagree from his fellowes in this point. For what more willingly (as [11301]Varro holds) can a proper man see then a fair wife, a sweet wife, a loving wife? can the world afford a better sight, sweeter content, a fairer object, a more gracious aspect?	I hope that no one will be found, "not even in that austere family of Stoics, who refuses to submit his solemn beard and haughty looks to a wife's embrace, or disagrees with his fellows on this point." For "what would a man in his prime more gladly see," as Varro holds, "than a beautiful wife, a sweet wife, a loving wife?" Can the world offer a better sight, sweeter contentment, a fairer object, a more pleasing appearance?[11302]
Source page 588–589 Since then this of marriage, is the last and best refuge, and cure of Heroicall love, all doubts are cleared, and impediments removed; I say again, what remaines, that but according to both their desires, they be happily joyned, since it cannot otherwise be helped. God send us all good wives, every man his wish in this kinde, and me mine!	Since marriage is the last and best refuge and cure for love melancholy, all doubts are cleared and obstacles removed. I ask again: what remains except that, according to both their desires, they should be happily joined, since there is no other remedy? God send us all good wives, each man his wish in this matter—and me mine![11303]
Source page 589 [11304]And God that all this world hath ywrought, Send him his Love that hath it so deere bought.	And may God, who made this whole world, Send him his love, who has paid so dearly for it.[11305]

[11300] Burton. Source page 588, l: "Nemo in severissima Stoicorum familia qui non barbam quoque & supercilium amplexibus uxoris submiserit, aut in ista parte à reliquis dissenserit. Hensius Primero." "No one in the most austere family of Stoics has failed to submit even his beard and eyebrow to his wife's embraces, or has differed from the others in this matter. Hensius, Primero."

[11301] Burton. Source page 588, †: "Quid libentius homo masculus videre debet quam bellam uxorem?" "What should a man more gladly see than a beautiful wife?"

[11302] Editor. Proper man means a well-formed or vigorous man; supercilious combines raised eyebrows with haughtiness. The beard and eyebrow are conventional signs of the severe philosopher. The margin's Hensius Primero and the exact Varro passage remain unresolved.

[11303] Editor. Heroicall love is the passionate love melancholy treated throughout this section, not a claim that the conduct is admirable. Burton's cure is marriage by the desire of both parties. The first-person wish closes his argument in a deliberately personal tone.

[11304] Burton. Source page 589, †: "Chaucer." "Chaucer."

[11305] Editor. Chaucer, The Knight's Tale 3099–3100, at the end of the tale, after the marriage of Palamon and Emelye. Bought means obtained at a cost, with the lover's suffering understood as the price; it does not necessarily mean a literal purchase.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If all parties be pleased, aske their Banes, 'tis a match. [11306]Fruitur Rhodanthe sponsa, sponso Dosicle, Rhodanthe and Dosicles shall goe together, Clitiphon and Leucippe, Theagines and Chariclia, Poliarchus hath his Argenis, Lysander Calista, (to make up the maske) [11307]Potiturque sua puer Iphis Ianthi.	If everyone is content, publish their marriage banns: it is a match. "He enjoys Rhodanthe as his bride, and she Dosicles as her bridegroom." Rhodanthe and Dosicles shall be joined, Clitiphon and Leucippe, Theagenes and Charicleia; Poliarchus has his Argenis, Lysander his Calista; and, to complete the masque, "the youth Iphis possesses his own Ianthe."[11308]
[11309]And Troilus in lust and in quiet, Is with Creseid, his own heart sweet.	And Troilus, in pleasure and at peace, Is with Criseyde, his own sweetheart.[11310]
And although they have hardly past the pikes, through many difficulties and delayes brought the match about, yet let them take this of [11311]Aristenetus (that so marry) for their comfort: [11312]After many troubles and cares, the marriages of Lovers are more sweet and pleasant.	And although they have barely passed through the dangers, bringing the match about through many difficulties and delays, let those who marry in this way take comfort from Aristaenetus: "After many troubles and cares, lovers' marriages are sweeter and more pleasant."[11313]

[11306] Burton. Source page 589, *: "Concluso Theod. Podromi. 9 l. Amor." "At the close of Theodore Prodromus's nine books on love."

[11307] Burton. Source page 589, m: "Ovid." "Ovid."

[11308] Editor. Banns are the public announcements of an intended marriage. Burton assembles couples from romance into an imagined masque, a staged entertainment. The margin directs the Rhodanthe and Dosicles reference to Theodore Prodromus, book 9; its opening word is read as Concluso. Ovid, Metamorphoses 9.797, supplies Iphis and Ianthe, after Iphis's transformation from female to male. Burton's variant Ianthi is retained in the original.

[11309] Burton. Source page 589, *: "The conclusion of Chaucers Poem of Troilus and Creseid."

[11310] Editor. Chaucer, Troilus and Criseyde 3.1819–1820. Burton's margin calls this the conclusion of the poem, but it concludes the third book. Lust means pleasure or delight here; quiet is peace. These lovers are not married in Chaucer's narrative.

[11311] Burton. Source page 589, *: "Epist. 4. l. 2. Jucundiores multo & suaviores longè post molestas turbas amantium nuptiæ." "Letter 4, book 2. Much more delightful and far sweeter are lovers' weddings after troublesome disturbances."

[11312] Burton. Source page 589, †: "Olim meminisse juvabit." "One day it will be a pleasure to remember."

[11313] Editor. Past the pikes means through serious dangers. Burton cites Aristaenetus, Love Letters 2.4; the precise Latin version remains to be collated. The additional margin Olim meminisse juvabit echoes the consolation of Aeneid 1.203, adapted without its opening words.

Original text 1651	Modern English
As we commonly conclude a Comœdy with an [11314]wedding, and shaking of hands, lets shut up our discourse, and end all with an [11315]Epithalamium.	As we commonly conclude a comedy with a wedding and a joining of hands, let us close our discourse and end it all with a wedding song.[11316]
Feliciter nuptis, God give them joy together. [11317]Hymen O Hymenæe, Hymen ades o Hymenæe! Bonum factum, 'Tis well done, Haud equidem sine mente reor, sine numine Divum, 'tis an happy conjunction, a fortunate match, an even couple,	"Happiness to the newlyweds!" God give them joy together. "Hymen, O Hymenaeus! Come, Hymen, O Hymenaeus!" "Well done!" It is well done. "I do not think it is without the purpose and power of the gods." It is a happy union, a fortunate match, an evenly matched couple.[11318]
Ambo animis, ambo præstantes viribus, ambo Florentes annis,——	Both outstanding in spirit, both in strength, both In the flower of their years.[11319]
they both excell in gifts of body and mind, are both equal in yeares, youth, vigor, alacrity, she is fair and lovely as Lais or Helena, he as another Charinus or Alcibiades,	They both excel in gifts of body and mind, and are equal in age, youthfulness, vigour and liveliness. She is as beautiful and lovely as Lais or Helen; he is another Charinus or Alcibiades.[11320]

[11314] Burton. Source page 589, o: "Quid expectatis, intus fiunt nuptiæ. the musick, guests, and all the good cheere is within." "What are you waiting for? The wedding is taking place inside. The music, guests and all the good cheer are inside."

[11315] Burton. Source page 589, †: "I Secundus sylvar. lib. Iam virgo thalamum subibit unde ne virgo redeat, marite cura." "Johannes Secundus, book of Silvae. Now the maiden will enter the bridal chamber; husband, take care that she does not return from it a maiden."

[11316] Editor. An epithalamium is a wedding song. The margin quotes Johannes Secundus, Silvae 8, Epithalamium 54–55, in Guépin's Latin transcription: the groom is urged to ensure that the bride does not return a virgin from the bridal chamber. The quotation is located, but Burton's edition and the dramatic source of the wedding-inside remark remain unidentified.

[11317] Burton. Source page 589, q: "Catullus." "Catullus."

[11318] Editor. The invocation of Hymen recalls Catullus 62. Haud equidem sine mente reor, sine numine Divum is Virgil, Aeneid 5.56, originally about Aeneas's arrival for Anchises's memorial rites. Burton repurposes the line as an auspicious wedding blessing.

[11319] Editor. The wording appears to combine and alter Virgil's ambo animis in Aeneid 11.291, about Hector and Aeneas, with ambo florentes aetatibus in Eclogue 7.4. Neither parallel has Burton's exact wording. His following prose supplies its application to an evenly matched couple.

[11320] Editor. Lais and Helen are conventional examples of female beauty; Alcibiades supplies a male example. The intended Charinus has not been securely identified. Burton is comparing the couple's attractiveness, not relating a marriage between those classical figures.

Original text 1651	Modern English
—— [11321]ludite ut lubet & brevi Liberos date. ——	Play as you please, and soon Give us children.[11322]
Then modestly go sport and play, And lets have every year a boy.	Then go, with modesty, to sport and play, And let us have a boy each year.
[11323]Goe give a sweet smel as Incense, and bring forth flowers as the Lilly: that we may say hereafter,	"Go, give a sweet scent like incense, and put forth flowers like the lily," so that we may say hereafter:[11324]
Scitus Mecastor natus est Pamphilo puer.	By Castor, a lovely boy has been born to Pamphilus.[11325]
In the mean time I say,	Meanwhile, I say:
[11326]Ite, agite O juvenes, [11327]non murmura vestra columbæ, Brachia non hederæ, neque vincant oscula conchæ.	Go, come, young lovers: let no doves surpass your murmurs, No ivy your embracing arms, no shellfish your kisses.[11328]
Gentle youths go sport your selves betimes, Let not the Doves outpass your murmurings, Or Ivy clasping armes, or oyster kissings.	Gentle young lovers, go enjoy yourselves in good time; Let no doves surpass your murmuring, No ivy your clasping arms, no oysters your kissing.

[11321] Burton. Source page 589, p: "Catullus." "Catullus."

[11322] Editor. Catullus 61.204–205 in the usual numbering. The Latin requests children soon; Burton's English couplet specifies a boy every year. This additional detail belongs to his paraphrase and is preserved there only.

[11323] Burton. Source page 589, s: "Ecclus. 39.14." "Ecclesiasticus 39:14."

[11324] Editor. Ecclesiasticus or Sirach 39:14. Burton adapts a passage about fragrance and flowering into a blessing on the couple's fertility.

[11325] Editor. Terence, Andria 486, spoken by the midwife Lesbia. Burton rearranges the words and prints Mecastor; the oath is by Castor. Scitus here praises the baby's appearance.

[11326] Burton. Source page 589, t: "Galeni Epithal." "Galen's wedding song."

[11327] Burton. Source page 589, *: "O noctem quater & quater beatam." "O night four times and four times blessed."

[11328] Editor. The verse has a close parallel in Historia Augusta, The Two Gallieni 11.8, as a wedding poem attributed to the emperor Gallienus. Burton's margin prints Galeni, which could misleadingly suggest the physician Galen; it is preserved and translated literally in the Burton note. The source expands or alters the opening. Shellfish renders conchæ; Burton specifies oysters in his English version.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And in the morne betime, as those [11329]Lacedæmonian Lasses saluted Helena and Menelaus, singing at their windowes, and wishing good successe, do we at yours:	And early in the morning, as those Spartan girls greeted Helen and Menelaus, singing at their windows and wishing them happiness, so do we at yours:
Salve O sponsa, salve felix, det vobis Latona Felicem Sobolem, Venus dea det æqualem amorem Inter vos mutuò; Saturnus durabiles divitias, Dormite in pectora mutuò amorem inspirantes, Et desiderium! ——	Hail, bride; hail, fortunate one! May Latona give you Fortunate children; may the goddess Venus give you equal love For one another, and Saturn lasting wealth. Sleep, breathing love into each other's breasts, And desire![11330]
Source page 589–590 Good morrow Master Bridegroom, and Mistris Bride, Many fair lovely Bernes to you betide! Let Venus to you mutual love procure, Let Saturne give you riches to endure. Long may you sleep in one anothers armes. Inspiring sweet desire, and free from harmes.	Good morning, master bridegroom and mistress bride! May many beautiful, lovely children come to you! May Venus bring you love for one another; May Saturn give you enduring wealth. Long may you sleep in each other's arms, Breathing sweet desire, and free from harm.[11331]
Source page 590 Even all your lives long,	Indeed, throughout your lives:

[11329] Burton. Source page 589, τ: "Theocritus eidyl. 18." "Theocritus, Idyll 18."

[11330] Editor. Theocritus, Idyll 18.49–58, the wedding song for Helen. Latona is Leto and Venus is Aphrodite. The Greek poem invokes Zeus for lasting prosperity; Burton's Latin and English both give Saturn, which is retained. His unidentified Latin version compresses the original.

[11331] Editor. Bernes means children, related to bairns. This English stanza continues across the page boundary from 589 to 590; it remains one verse unit. It is distinct from the preceding Latin blessing.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11332]Contingat vobis turturum concordia, Corniculæ vivacitas ——	May the harmony of turtledoves be yours, And the long life of the crow.[11333]
The love of Turtles hap to you, And Ravens yeares still to renew.	May the love of turtledoves be yours, And ravens' years renewed again and again.
Let the Muses sing (as he said;) the Graces dance, not at their weddings only but all their daies long; so couple their hearts, that no irksomnesse or anger ever befall them: Let him never call her other name then my joy, my light, or she call him otherwise then sweet-heart. To this happinesse of theirs, let not old age any whit detract, but as their yeares, so let their mutual love and comfort increase. And when they depart this life,	Let the Muses sing, as he said, and the Graces dance, not only at their wedding but throughout their lives. "Join their hearts so that no weariness or anger ever comes between them. Let him never call her anything but 'my joy, my light,' nor she call him anything but 'sweetheart.' Let old age take nothing from this happiness; as their years increase, so may their mutual love and comfort." And when they leave this life,
—— †concordes quoniam vixere tot annos, Auferat hora duos eadem, nec conjugis usquam Busta suæ videat, nec sit tumulandus ab illa.	Since they have lived in harmony for so many years, May the same hour carry both away; may he never see His wife's grave, nor have to be buried by her.[11334]

[11332] Burton. Source page 590, g: "Erasm. Epithal. P. Ægidij. Nec saltent modo sed duo charissima pectora indissolubili mutuæ benevolentiæ nodo copulent, ut nihil unquam eos incedere possit iræ vel tædii. Illa perpetuò nihil audiat nisi, mea lux: Ille vicissim nihil nisi, anime mi: Atque huic jucunditati ne senectus detrahat, imo potius aliquid adaugeat." "Erasmus, Wedding Song for Peter Giles. Let them not merely dance, but join two most dear hearts in an indissoluble bond of mutual affection, so that no anger or weariness can ever enter them. May she always hear only "my light," and he in turn only "my soul." May old age take nothing from this happiness, but rather add something to it."

[11333] Editor. The marginal heading names Erasmus's wedding song for Peter Giles and continues with the Latin behind the following prose blessing. Turtles means turtledoves. Cornicula is a crow; Burton's English has ravens. The different bird names remain in their respective versions. Exact collation with Erasmus is still required.

[11334] Editor. Adapted from Ovid, Metamorphoses 8.708–710, Philemon's prayer that he and Baucis may die together. Burton changes the prayer into the third person. The printed dagger before concordes has no accompanying marginal wording on this page; it is retained as a source mark in the original.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Because they have so sweetly liv'd together, Let not one dye a day before the other, He bury her, she him, with even fate, One houre their soules let jointly separate.	Because they have lived so sweetly together, Let neither die a day before the other, Nor he bury her, nor she him; with equal fate, May one hour release their souls together.[11335]
Fortunati ambo si quid mea carmina possunt, Nulla dies unquam memori vos eximet ævo.	Fortunate both! If my verses have any power, No day will ever erase you from the memory of time.[11336]
Atq; hæc de amore dixisse sufficiat, sub correctione, [11337]quod ait ille, cujusque melius sentientis. Plura qui volet de remediis amoris, legat Iasonem Pratensem, Arnoldum, Montaltum, Savanarolum, Langium, Valescum, Crimisonum, Alexandrum Benedictum, Laurentium, Valleriolam, è Poëtis Nasonem, è nostratibus Chaucerum, &c. with whom I conclude,	And let this be enough said about love, "subject to correction," as that writer says, "by anyone who judges better." Whoever wants more on the remedies for love should read Jason Pratensis, Arnaldus, Montalto, Savonarola, Lange, Valescus, Crimisonus, Alessandro Benedetti, Du Laurens and Valleriola; among the poets, Ovid; and among our own writers, Chaucer, and others —with whom I conclude:[11338]

[11335] Editor. The negative wish in the first two lines governs the otherwise compressed He bury her, she him. The modern version makes that scope explicit: neither should have to bury the other. Separate means release the souls from their bodies.

[11336] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 9.446–447, addressed to the dead Nisus and Euryalus. Burton uses the promise of poetic remembrance to complete his conjugal blessing. The couplet is translated separately from both the Latin prayer and its English paraphrase.

[11337] Burton. Source page 590, h: "Kornmannus de linea amoris." "Kornmann, On the Line of Love."

[11338] Editor. Burton returns to Latin to close the discussion and list further authorities. Naso is Ovid; nostratibus means writers of our own country. The abbreviated medical names follow his list; precise editions and the identities behind Arnaldus and Crimisonus remain for the final bibliography. Kornmann's title and qualifying phrase also require exact collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11339]For my words here and every part, I speak them all under correction, Of you that feeling have in loves art, And put it all in your discretion, To intreat & make diminution Of my language, that I you beseech: But now to purpose of my rather speech.	As for my words here, and in every part, I submit them all to correction By you who have experience in love's art, And leave it entirely to your judgement To handle and diminish My language: this I ask of you. But now, back to the subject of my earlier speech.[11340]

[11339] Burton. Source page 590, †: "Finis 3 book of Troilus & Creseid."

[11340] Editor. Chaucer, Troilus and Criseyde 3.1331–1337, not the end of book 3 as the margin claims. The comparative text has To encresse or maken dymynucioun; Burton prints To intreat & make diminution. The original retains intreat and the modern version renders it handle, rather than silently restoring increase. Rather speech means earlier discourse. This stanza closes Burton's Section 2; Section 3 opens the treatment of jealousy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 591 SECT. 3.	SECTION 3
MEMB. 1. SUBSECT. 1.	MEMBER 1. SUBSECTION 1.
JEALOUSY.	JEALOUSY
Jealousie, its Æquivocations, Name, Definition, Extent, severall kindes; of Princes, Parents, Friends. In Beasts, Men: before marriage, as Corrivals; or after, as in this place.	Jealousy: its different meanings, name, definition, extent and various kinds; among rulers, parents and friends; in animals and human beings; before marriage, as rivals, or afterwards, as discussed here.[11341]
Valescus de Taranta cap. de Melanchol. Ælian Montaltus, Felix Platerus, Guianerius, put Jealousie for a cause of Melancholy, others for a Symptome; because melancholy persons amongst these passions and perturbations of the minde, are most obnoxious to it.	Valescus de Taranta, in his chapter on melancholy, Elia Montalto, Felix Platter and Guaineri classify jealousy as a cause of melancholy; others call it a symptom, because melancholy people are especially susceptible to it among the mind's passions and disturbances.[11342]
But me thinks for the latitude it hath, and that prerogative above other ordinary symptomes, it ought to be treated of as a Species apart, being of so great and eminent note, so furious a passion, and almost of as great extent as Love it self, as [11343]Benedetto Varchi holds, No love without a mixture of Jealousie, qui non Zelat, non amat.	But I think that, because of its range and its prominence above other ordinary symptoms, it deserves to be treated as a separate species: it is so great and conspicuous a matter, so furious a passion, and almost as widespread as love itself. As Benedetto Varchi holds, "There is no love without some jealousy"; "he who is not jealous does not love."[11344]

[11341] Editor. Æquivocations means different senses of the same word. Burton first surveys jealous concern, envy and political suspicion before narrowing his subject to husbands' sexual jealousy. Member and subsection retain his divisions of the argument.

[11342] Editor. These are medical authorities already used throughout the book. Burton distinguishes a cause from a symptom, then proposes a separate species: a category within his historical classification of melancholy.

[11343] Burton. Source page 591, i: "In his Oration of Jealousie, put out by Fr. Sansavin."

[11344] Editor. Varchi's jealousy lecture appeared in 1545. Hosington's bibliographical study identifies Sansovino's prefatory letter to Gaspara Stampa, also translated in Tofte's Blazon of Jealousie (1615). This clarifies Sansovino's participation; the original editions still require direct collation. Burton's later R. T. refers to Robert Tofte. The claim that all love contains jealousy belongs to the quoted argument.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For these causes I will dilate, and treat of it by it self, as a bastard-branch or kinde of Love Melancholy, which, as Heroical Love goeth commonly before marriage, doth usually follow, torture, and crucifie in like sort, deserves therefore to be rectified alike, requires as much care and industry, in setting out the severall causes of it, prognosticks and cures.	For these reasons I shall expand upon it and treat it separately, as an illegitimate offshoot or kind of love melancholy. Whereas passionate love commonly precedes marriage, jealousy usually follows it, torturing and tormenting in the same way. It therefore deserves similar treatment and requires equal care and effort in setting out its various causes, prognoses and cures.[11345]
Which I have more willingly done, that he that is or hath been jealous, may see his error as in a glass; he that is not, may learn to detest, avoid it himself, and dispossess others that are any wise affected with it.	I have undertaken this all the more willingly so that anyone who is or has been jealous may see his error as in a mirror; anyone who has not may learn to detest it, avoid it himself, and free others who are affected by it in any way.
Jealousie is described and defined to be [11346]a certain suspition which the lover hath of the party he chiefly loveth, lest he or she should be enamoured of another: or any eager desire to enjoy some beauty alone, to have it proper to himself only: a fear or doubt, lest any forrainer should participate or share with him in his love.	Jealousy is described and defined as “a suspicion the lover has about the person he chiefly loves, lest he or she should fall in love with someone else”; or an eager desire to enjoy a beautiful person alone, to have that person exclusively to himself: a fear or doubt that an outsider might participate or share in his love.

[11345] Editor. Heroical love is the intense, often pathological erotic passion treated in the preceding section. Bastard-branch presents jealousy as its irregular offspring; rectified means treated or corrected, and prognosticks are predictions of its course.

[11346] Burton. Source page 591, k: “Benedetto Varchi.”

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or (as [11347]Scaliger adds) a fear of losing her favour, whom he so earnestly affects. Cardan cals it a [11348]Zeal for love, and a kinde of envy lest any man should beguile us. [11349]Ludovicus Vives defines it in the very same words, or little differing in sense.	Or, as Scaliger adds, "a fear of losing the favour of the woman he so earnestly loves." Cardano calls it "a zeal for love, and a kind of envy lest someone should deceive us." Juan Luis Vives defines it in the same words, or with little difference in meaning.[11350]
There be many other Jealousies, but improperly so called all; as that of Parents, Tutors, Guardians over their children, friends whom they love, or such as are left to their wardship or protection.	There are many other kinds of jealousy, though all are improperly called so: that of parents, tutors and guardians concerning their children, friends they love, or people entrusted to their care or protection.
Storax non rediit hac nocte à cœna Æschinus, Neque servulorum quispiam qui adversum ierant?	Storax! Has Aeschinus not returned from dinner tonight, Nor any of the servants who went out to meet him?[11351]
As the old man in the Comœdy cried out in passion, and from a sollicitous fear and care he had of his adopted son; [11352]not of beauty, but lest they should miscarry, do amiss, or any way discredit, disgrace (as Vives notes) or endanger themselves and us.	So the old man in the comedy cried out in agitation, from anxious fear and concern for his adopted son: "not about beauty, but lest they should come to harm, do wrong, or in any way discredit, disgrace"—as Vives observes—"or endanger themselves and us."

[11347] Burton. Source page 591, l: "Exercitat. 317. Cum metuimus ne amatæ rei exturbemur possessione." "Exercise 317. When we fear that we may be driven out of possession of the thing we love."

[11348] Burton. Source page 591, m: "Zelus de forma est invidentiæ species ne quis forma quam amamus fruatur." "Jealousy concerning beauty is a kind of envy, lest someone enjoy the beauty we love."

[11349] Burton. Source page 591, n: "3. de Anima." "On the Soul, book 3."

[11350] Editor. Scaliger is Julius Caesar Scaliger; Cardan is Girolamo Cardano; Ludovicus Vives is Juan Luis Vives. The marginal definitions differ slightly from Burton's English summaries. The apparent initial R. before de Anima in the next margin is retained as printed; its intended expansion remains uncertain.

[11351] Editor. Terence, The Brothers (Adelphi), opening scene, lines 26–27. Micio calls for the slave Storax and anxiously notes that his adopted son Aeschinus has not returned. Burton's interrogative punctuation is retained; the text consulted punctuates the observation as a statement.

[11352] Burton. Source page 591, o: "R. de Anima. Tangimur zelotypia de pupillis, liberis charisq; curæ nostræ concreditis, non de forma, sed ne male sit iis, aut ne nobis sibique parent ignominiam." "On the Soul. We feel jealousy concerning wards, children and dear ones entrusted to our care, not about beauty, but lest harm befall them or they bring disgrace upon us and themselves."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 591–592 [11353]Ægeus was so sollicitous for his son Theseus, (when he went to fight with the Minotaure) of his success, lest he should be foiled, [11354]Prona est timori semper in pejus fides.	Aegeus was similarly anxious about his son Theseus's success when he went to fight the Minotaur, fearing he might be defeated: "Fear is always inclined to believe the worse."[11355]
Source page 592 We are still apt to suspect the worst in such doubtful cases, as many wives in their husbands absence, fond mothers in their childrens, lest if absent they should be misled or sick, and are continually expecting news from them, how they do fare, and what is become of them, they cannot endure to have them long out of their sight: Oh my sweet son, O my dear childe, &c.	We are always inclined to suspect the worst in such uncertain cases, as many wives do in their husbands' absence, or doting mothers in their children's, fearing that while away they may be led astray or fall ill. They continually await news of how they are faring and what has become of them; they cannot bear to have them long out of sight: "Oh, my sweet son! Oh, my dear child!" and so on.
Paul was jealous over the Church of Corinth, as he confesseth, 2 Cor. 11.12. With a godly jealousie, to present them a pure Virgin to Christ; and he was affraid still, lest as the Serpent beguiled Eva through his subtilty, so their mindes should be corrupt from the simplicity that is in Christ.	Paul was jealous over the church at Corinth, as he acknowledges in 2 Corinthians 11:12, "with a godly jealousy, to present them as a pure virgin to Christ"; and he remained afraid that, as the serpent deceived Eve through his cunning, their minds might be corrupted away from simplicity in Christ.[11356]

[11353] Burton. Source page 591, p: "Plutarch."

[11354] Burton. Source page 592, q: "Senec. in Herc. fur." "Seneca, Hercules Furens."

[11355] Editor. Plutarch, Theseus 17 and 22: the promised change of sail was forgotten after Theseus's success, and Aegeus interpreted the returning black sail as news of his death. The maxim is Seneca, Hercules Furens 316; editions vary between timori and timoris, without changing the general sense.

[11356] Editor. The passage is 2 Corinthians 11:2–3, not 11:12. Burton's printed reference is retained in the text. Paul likens his community to a bride promised to Christ.

Original text 1651	Modern English
God himself in some sense is said to be jealous, [11357]I am a jealous God, and will visit: so Psal. 79.5. Shall thy jealousie burn like fire for ever? But these are improperly called Jealousies, and by a Metaphor, to shew the care and solicitude they have of them.	God himself is said to be jealous in a certain sense: "I am a jealous God, and will visit"; likewise Psalm 79:5, "Shall your jealousy burn like fire for ever?" But these are called jealousies only figuratively, by a metaphor expressing care and concern for those in question.[11358]
Although some Jealousies express all the Symptomes of this which we treat of, fear, sorrow, anguish, anxiety, suspicion, hatred, &c. the object only varied. That of some fathers is very eminent, to their sons and heirs; for though they love them dearly being children, yet now comming toward mans estate they may not well abide them, the son and heire is commonly sick of the father, and the father again may not well brook his eldest son, inde simultates, plerumque contentiones & inimicitiæ;	Yet some jealousies display all the symptoms of the kind we are discussing—fear, sorrow, anguish, anxiety, suspicion, hatred and so forth—with only the object changed. That of some fathers towards their sons and heirs is especially marked. Although they love them dearly as children, they can scarcely tolerate them as they approach adulthood. The son and heir is commonly tired of his father, and the father in turn can scarcely endure his eldest son: "hence grudges, and very often quarrels and enmities."
But that of Princes is most notorious, as when they fear corrivals (if I may so call them) successors, emulators, subjects, or such as they have offended. [11359]Omnisq; potestas impatiens consortis erit: They are still suspitious, lest their authority should be diminished, [11360]as one observes;	But the jealousy of rulers is most notorious, as when they fear rivals, if I may call them so: successors, competitors, subjects, or people they have offended. "All power will be intolerant of a partner." "They are always suspicious, lest their authority be diminished," as one observer remarks.[11361]

[11357] Burton. Source page 592, r: "Exod.20."

[11358] Editor. Exodus 20:5. Visit here means visit punishment upon, rather than make a social call. The Psalm reference is 79:5 in the English numbering.

[11359] Burton. Source page 592, s: "Lucan."

[11360] Burton. Source page 592, t: "Daneus Aphoris. polit. semper metuunt ne eorum authoritas minuatur." "Daneau, Political Aphorisms. They always fear that their authority may be diminished."

[11361] Editor. Lucan, Civil War 1.92–93. Consors is someone who shares power. Daneus is Lambert Daneau, cited for a related political maxim.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and as Comineus hath it, [11362] [11363]It cannot be expressed what slender causes they have of their grief and suspition, a secret disease, that commonly lurks and breeds in Princes families.	And as Commynes puts it, "It cannot be expressed how slight are the causes of their distress and suspicion: a secret disease that commonly lurks and breeds in rulers' households."[11364]
Sometimes it is for their honour onely, as that of Adrian the Emperor, [11365]that killed all his emulators. Saul envied David; Domitian Agricola, because he did excell him, obscure his honour as he thought, eclipse his fame.	Sometimes it concerns their honour alone, as with the emperor Hadrian, "who killed all his rivals." Saul envied David; Domitian envied Agricola because he surpassed him, overshadowing his honour, as he thought, and eclipsing his fame.[11366]

[11362] Burton. Source page 592, u: "Belli Neapol. lib.5." "Neapolitan War, book 5."

[11363] Burton. Source page 592, x: "Dici non potest quam tenues & infirmas causas habent mœroris & suspicionis, & hic est morbus occultus, qui in familiis principum regnat." "It cannot be said how slight and weak are their grounds for grief and suspicion; and this is a hidden disease that reigns in rulers' households."

[11364] Editor. Comineus is Philippe de Commynes. Burton uses the Latin title concerning the Neapolitan war for his historical memoirs; his precise edition and book numbering remain to be collated. The two adjoining marginal entries are kept separate, including the first of two x marks on this page.

[11365] Burton. Source page 592, x: "Omnes æmulos interfecit. Lamprid." "He killed all his rivals. Lampridius."

[11366] Editor. The Historia Augusta, Hadrian 15, describes his persecution of former friends and his humiliating treatment of scholars; it does not simply say he killed every rival. The Life is transmitted under Aelius Spartianus, whereas Burton's margin names Lampridius. Saul and David exemplify jealousy of another man's rising reputation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Juno turned Prætus daughters into Kine, for that they contended with her for beauty; Cyparissæ King Eteocles children, were envied of the Goddesses for their excellent good parts, and dancing amongst the rest, saith [11367]Constantine, and for that cause flung down headlong from heaven, and buried in a pit, but the earth took pity of them, and brought out Cypress trees to preserve their Memories. [11368]Niobe, Arachne, and Marsias can testifie as much.	Juno turned Proetus's daughters into cows because they competed with her in beauty. The Cyparissae, King Eteocles's children, were envied by the goddesses for their excellent accomplishments, including dancing, says Constantine, "and for that reason were thrown headlong from heaven and buried in a pit; but the earth took pity on them and brought forth cypress trees to preserve their memory." Niobe, Arachne and Marsyas can testify to as much.[11369]
But it is most grievous when it is for a kingdome it self, or matters of commodity, it produceth lamentable effects, especially amongst Tyrants, in despotico Imperio, and such as are more feared than beloved of their subjects, that get and keep their soveraignty by force, and fear. [11370]Quod civibus tenere te invitis scias, &c. as Phalaris, Dionysius, Periander held theirs.	But jealousy is most grievous when it concerns a kingdom itself or material interests. It produces lamentable effects, especially among tyrants, "under despotic rule," and those whom their subjects fear more than love, who gain and retain sovereignty through force and fear: "which you know you hold against your citizens' will," and so forth, as Phalaris, Dionysius and Periander held theirs.[11371]
For though fear, cowardise and jealousie, in Plutarchs opinion, be the common causes of tyranny, as in Nero, Caligula, Tiberius, yet most take them to be symptomes.	For although fear, cowardice and jealousy are, in Plutarch's opinion, the common causes of tyranny, as in Nero, Caligula and Tiberius, most people take them to be symptoms.[11372]

[11367] Burton. Source page 592, y: "Constant. agricult. lib.10.c.5. Cyparissæ Eteoclis filiæ, saltantes ad æmulationem dearum in puteum demolitæ sunt, sed terra miserata, cupressos inde produxit." "Constantine, Agriculture, book 10, chapter 5. The Cyparissae, daughters of Eteocles, dancing in rivalry with the goddesses, were thrown down into a pit; but the earth, pitying them, brought forth cypresses from it."

[11368] Burton. Source page 592, z: "Ovid. Met." "Ovid, Metamorphoses."

[11369] Editor. The examples move from political envy to divine envy. Proetus's daughters, the Cyparissae, Niobe, Arachne and Marsyas belong to myth, not historical evidence. Ovid treats Arachne, Niobe and Marsyas in Metamorphoses 6. Constantine denotes the agricultural compilation associated with Constantine VII, commonly called the Geoponica. Its exact parallel and Burton's wording about the Cyparissae remain for collation.

[11370] Burton. Source page 592, a: "Seneca."

[11371] Editor. Seneca, Hercules Furens 343–344: the usurper Lycus says that a drawn sword must protect power held against the citizens' will. Burton gives only the first part of the sentence. Phalaris, Dionysius and Periander are traditional examples of Greek tyrants.

[11372] Editor. The contrast between causes and symptoms repeats the opening problem: does fear produce tyranny, or does tyranny produce fear? Burton supplies no precise Plutarch reference here; the attribution remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 592–593 For [11373]what slave, what hangman (as Bodine well expresseth this passion, l. 2. c. 5. de rep.) can so cruelly torture a condemned person, as this fear and suspition? Fear of death, infamy, torments, are those furies and vultures that vex and disquiet tyrants, and torture them day and night, with perpetual terrors and affrights, envy, suspition, fear, desire of revenge, and a thousand such disagreeing perturbations, turn and affright the soul out of the hinges of health, and more grievously wound and pierce, than those cruel masters can exasperate and vex their Prentises or servants, with clubbes, whippes, chaines and tortures.	For "what slave, what executioner"—as Bodin aptly describes this passion in On the Commonwealth, book 2, chapter 5—"can torture a condemned person as cruelly as this fear and suspicion? Fear of death, disgrace and torment are the furies and vultures that vex and disturb tyrants, torturing them day and night with perpetual terror and alarm. Envy, suspicion, fear, desire for revenge, and a thousand such conflicting disturbances wrench and frighten the soul out of the hinges of health. They wound and pierce it more grievously than cruel masters can torment their apprentices or servants with clubs, whips, chains and torture."[11374]
Source page 593 Many terrible examples we have in this kinde, amongst the Turks especially, many jealous outrages; [11375]Selimus killed Cornutus his youngest brother, five of his Nephews, Mustapha Bassa, and divers others. [11376]Bajazet the second Turk, jealous of the valour and greatness of Acmet Bassa, caused him to be slain. [11377]Solyman the magnificent, murdered his own Son Mustapha;	We have many terrible examples of this kind, especially among the Turks: many jealous outrages. Selim killed Cornutus, his youngest brother, five of his nephews, Mustafa Pasha and various others. Bayezid, the second of that name among the Turkish rulers, jealous of Ahmed Pasha's courage and greatness, had him killed. Suleiman the Magnificent murdered his own son Mustafa.[11378]

[11373] Burton. Source page 592, b: "Quis autem carnifex addictum supplicio crudelius afficiat, quam metus? Metus inquam mortis, infamiæ cruciatus, sunt illæ ultrices furiæ quæ tyrannos exagitant, &c. Multo acerbius sauciant & pungunt, quam crudeles domini servos vinctos fustibus ac tormentis excruciare possunt." "What executioner could treat a condemned man more cruelly than fear? Fear, I say, of death, disgrace and torture: these are the avenging Furies that harry tyrants, and so on. They wound and pierce much more sharply than cruel masters can torment bound slaves with clubs and instruments of torture."

[11374] Editor. Bodin, Six Bookes 2.5, in Knolles's 1606 translation, compares a tyrant's fear with an executioner's torments, then lists conflicting passions that tyrannize over him. This confirms Burton's location and context. His expanded imagery and Latin margin still require comparison with Bodin's Latin and French editions. The Furies personify avenging torment.

[11375] Burton. Source page 593, c: "Lonicerus To.1. Turc. hist. c.24." "Lonicer, Turkish History, volume 1, chapter 24."

[11376] Burton. Source page 593, d: "Jovius vita ejus." "Giovio, his Life."

[11377] Burton. Source page 593, e: "Knowles. Busbequius. Sand. fol.52."

[11378] Editor. Selimus, Bajazet and Solyman are Selim, Bayezid and Suleiman; Bassa is the older European form of pasha. The identity behind Cornutus and the precise sequence of executions require collation with Lonicer and Giovio. Burton's historical examples are reproduced without silently regularizing disputed names.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and 'tis an ordinary thing amongst them, to make away their brothers, or any competitors, at the first comming to the Crown: 'tis all the solemnity they use at their fathers funerals.	And it is common among them to kill their brothers, or any rivals, upon first coming to the throne: this is all the ceremony they observe at their fathers' funerals.[11379]
What mad pranks in his jealous fury did Herod of old commit in Jury, when he massacred all the children of a year old? [11380]Valens the Emperour in Constantinople, when as he left no man alive of quality in his kingdome that had his name begun with Theo. Theodoti, Theognosti, Theodosii, Theoduli, &c. They went all to their long home, because a wizard told him that name should succeed in his Empire.	What mad acts did Herod commit long ago in Judaea in his jealous fury, when he massacred all the one-year-old children? Or the emperor Valens in Constantinople, when he left no man of standing alive in his kingdom whose name began with Theo—Theodotus, Theognostus, Theodosius, Theodulus and so on? They all went to their eternal home because a diviner told him that a man of that name would succeed him in the empire.[11381]
And what furious designs hath [11382]Io. Basilius, that Muscovian tyrant, practised of late? It is a wonder to read that strange suspicion, which Suetonius reports of Claudius Cæsar, and of Domitian, they were afraid of every man they saw:	And what furious schemes has Ivan Vasilievich, that Muscovite tyrant, carried out lately? It is astonishing to read of the extraordinary suspicion Suetonius reports in Claudius Caesar and Domitian: they feared every man they saw.[11383]

[11379] Editor. Burton generalizes polemically from Ottoman dynastic killings; the claim about all funeral ceremony is his rhetorical exaggeration. Knowles names Richard Knolles; Busbequius is Ogier Ghiselin de Busbecq; Sand. is George Sandys.

[11380] Burton. Source page 593, †: "Nicephorus lib.11.c.45. Socrates lib.7.cap.35. Neque Valens alicui pepercit qui Theo. cognomine vocaretur." "Nicephorus, book 11, chapter 45; Socrates, book 7, chapter 35. Valens spared no one whose name began Theo."

[11381] Editor. Jury means Judaea. Matthew 2:16 specifies boys aged two and under, rather than Burton's one-year-old children. The parallel account of Valens is Socrates, Ecclesiastical History 4.19, not the margin's 7.35; it gives the divined opening letters as Theod-. Burton's names and references remain in the text.

[11382] Burton. Source page 593, f: "Alexand. Gaguin Muscov. hist. descrip. c.5." "Alexander Guagnini, Historical Description of Muscovy, chapter 5."

[11383] Editor. Io. Basilius is Ivan IV of Muscovy; "lately" reflects Burton's time. Gaguin is Alexander Guagnini; D. Fletcher is Giles Fletcher, writer on Russia. Compare Suetonius, Claudius 35, on guards and searches of visitors, and Domitian 14, on reflective walls used to watch behind him. These locate examples of suspicion; Burton's immediate edition remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And which Herodian of Antoninus and Geta, those two jealous brothers, the one could not endure so much as the others servants, but made away him, his chiefest followers, and all that belonged to him, or were his well-wishers.	And Herodian reports the same of Antoninus and Geta, those two jealous brothers: one could not endure even the other's servants, but killed him, his chief followers, and everyone attached to him or wishing him well.[11384]

[11384] Editor. Antoninus here is Caracalla, Geta's brother. The story concerns rivalry within the imperial household, carried beyond the rival himself to servants and supporters. Burton's compressed account is retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11385]Maximinus perceiving himself to be odious to most men, because he was come to that height of honour out of base beginnings, and suspecting his mean parentage would be objected to him, caused all the Senators that were nobly descended, to be slain in a jealous humour, turned all the servants of Alexander his predecessor out of doores, and slew many of them, because they lamented their masters death, suspecting them to be traitors, for the love they bare to him.	Maximinus, perceiving that most men hated him because he had risen to such high honour from lowly beginnings, and suspecting that his humble parentage would be used against him, had all the nobly born senators killed in a fit of jealousy. He dismissed all the servants of Alexander, his predecessor, and killed many because they mourned their master's death, suspecting them of treason because of their love for him.[11386]
When Alexander in his fury had made Clitus his dear friend to be put to death, and saw now (saith [11387]Curtius) an alienation in his subjects hearts, none durst talk with him, he began to be Jealous of himself, lest they should attempt as much on him, and said they lived like so many wild beasts in a wilderness, one afraid of another.	When Alexander in his rage had caused his dear friend Cleitus to be killed, and now saw his subjects' hearts estranged, says Curtius—no one dared speak to him—he began to fear for himself, lest they should attempt the same against him, "and said that they lived like so many wild beasts in a wilderness, afraid of one another."[11388]

[11385] Burton. Source page 593, g: "D. Fletcher, timet omnes ne insidiæ essent, Herodot. l.7. Maximinus invisum se sentiens, quod ex infimo loco in tantam fortunam venisset moribus ac genere barbarus, metuens ne natalium obscuritas objiceretur; omnes Alexandri prædecessoris ministros ex aula ejecit, pluribus interfectis quod mœsti essent ad mortem Alexandri, insidias inde metuens." "Dr Fletcher: he fears everyone, lest there be treachery. Herodotus, book 7. Maximinus, feeling himself hated because he had risen from the lowest station to such high fortune, barbarous in character and origin, and fearing that his obscure birth would be held against him, expelled from court all the attendants of Alexander, his predecessor. He killed several because they mourned Alexander's death, fearing treachery on that account."

[11386] Editor. The relevant primary parallel is Herodian 7.1.1–4, not Herodotus as the margin prints. Herodian distinguishes dismissal of noble advisers from the killing of palace attendants; Burton broadens the account into the death of all nobly born senators. The physically continuous margin also begins with a Fletcher reference, apparently relating back to Muscovy; it is reproduced as one entry without claiming a secure division.

[11387] Burton. Source page 593, h: "Lib.8. tanquam feræ solitudine vivebant, terrentes alios, timentes." "Book 8. They lived like wild beasts in solitude, frightening others and themselves afraid."

[11388] Editor. Curtius, History of Alexander 8.1–2, describes Alexander himself killing Cleitus, followed by remorse and isolation. Burton's made … to be put to death is retained in sense. The marginal comparison emphasizes reciprocal terror: frightening others while afraid oneself.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Our modern stories afford us many notable examples. [11389]Henry the third of France, jealous of Henry of Lorain Duke of Guise, Anno 1588. caused him to be murdered in his own chamber. [11390]Lewes the eleventh was so suspicious, he durst not trust his children, every man about him he suspected for a traitor: Many strange tricks Comineus telleth of him.	Our modern histories provide many notable examples. Henry III of France, jealous of Henry of Lorraine, Duke of Guise, had him murdered in his own chamber in 1588. Louis XI was so suspicious that he dared not trust his children; he suspected everyone around him of being a traitor. Commynes tells many strange stories of his behaviour.[11391]
How jealous was our Henry the [11392]fourth of King Richard the second, so long as he lived, after he was deposed? and of his own son Henry, in his later daies? which the Prince well perceiving, came to visit his father in his sickness, in a watchet velvet gown, full of oilet holes, and with needles sticking in them, (as an embleme of Jealousie) and so pacified his suspicious father, after some speeches and protestations, which he had used to that purpose.	How jealous was our Henry IV of King Richard II, for as long as Richard lived after his deposition? And of his own son Henry in his later days? The prince, clearly perceiving this, visited his sick father in a pale-blue velvet gown covered in eyelet holes with needles stuck in them, as an emblem of jealousy. By this means, and after speeches and assurances made for that purpose, he calmed his suspicious father.[11393]
Source page 593–594 Perpetual imprisonment, as that of Robert [11394]Duke of Normandy, in the daies of Henry the first, forbidding of marriage to some persons, with such like edicts and prohibitions, are ordinary in all states.	Lifelong imprisonment, such as that of Robert, Duke of Normandy, in Henry I's time; forbidding certain people to marry; and similar decrees and prohibitions are common in all states.[11395]

[11389] Burton. Source page 593, i: "Serres fol.56."

[11390] Burton. Source page 593, k: "Neap. belli lib.5. nulli prorsus homini fidebat, omnes insidiari sibi putabat." "Neapolitan War, book 5. He trusted absolutely no one; he thought everyone was plotting against him."

[11391] Editor. Serres is Jean de Serres, the French historian. Comineus again names Commynes. Burton's examples juxtapose a killing ordered by Henry III with the suspicions of Louis XI; their source editions and the page reference have not been independently verified.

[11392] Burton. Source page 593, l: "Camdens Remaines."

[11393] Editor. Watchet is pale blue; oilet holes are eyelets. The visiting prince is the future Henry V. Burton cites William Camden's Remaines for the striking costume and its interpretation; the precise passage remains to be collated.

[11394] Burton. Source page 593, m: "Mat. Paris."

[11395] Editor. Mat. Paris is Matthew Paris. Robert is Robert Curthose, Duke of Normandy, imprisoned by his brother Henry I. Burton groups confinement and restrictions on marriage as political means of forestalling rivals.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 594 In a word ([11396]as he said;) three things cause Jealousie, a mighty state, a rich treasure, a fair wife; or where there is a crackt title, much tyranny, and many exactions. In our state, as being freed from all these fears and miseries, we may be most secure and happy under the raign of our fortunate Prince.	In a word, as he said, three things cause jealousy: a powerful position, a rich treasury, and a beautiful wife; or a doubtful title, much tyranny and many oppressive levies. In our country, being free from all these fears and miseries, we may be entirely secure and happy under the reign of our fortunate prince.[11397]
[11398]His fortune hath indebted him to none, But to all his people universally; And not to them but for their love alone, Which they account as placed worthily. He is so set, he hath no cause to be Jealous, or dreadfull of disloyalty; The pedestall whereon his greatness stands, Is held of all our hearts, and all our hands.	His good fortune has made him indebted to no one Except his people as a whole, And to them only for their love, Which they consider worthily bestowed. He is so firmly placed that he has no cause For jealousy or fear of disloyalty; The pedestal on which his greatness stands Is supported by all our hearts and all our hands.[11399]
But I rove, I confess. These æquivocations, Jealousies, and many such, which crucifie the souls of men, are not here properly meant, or in this distinction of ours included, but that alone which is for beauty, tending to love, and wherein they can brook no corrival, or endure any participation: and this Jealousie belongs as well to brute beasts, as men.	But I wander, I admit. These different meanings of jealousy, and many similar things that torment human souls, are not what is properly meant here or included in our classification. We mean only the jealousy concerned with beauty and directed towards love, in which people can tolerate no rival or endure any sharing. This jealousy belongs to animals as well as human beings.

[11396] Burton. Source page 594, n: "R.T. notis in blason jealousie." "R. T., in his notes to the Blazon of Jealousy."

[11397] Editor. A crackt title is a doubtful claim to sovereignty; exactions are oppressive levies. The ensuing Daniel quotation praises James I. The reassuring claim about our state preserves Burton's earlier royal context; it should not be read as a description newly written for the 1651 publication.

[11398] Burton. Source page 594, o: "Daniel in his Panegyrick to the King."

[11399] Editor. Samuel Daniel, A Panegyrike Congratulatorie to James I (1603), stanza 69, lines 1–4, joined to stanza 73, lines 5–8. Burton changes the address from second to third person and alters some wording, including built to held. His composite eight-line quotation is preserved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some creatures, saith [11400]Vives, Swans, Doves, Cocks, Bulls, &c. are jealous as well as men, and as much moved, for fear of communion.	Some creatures, says Vives—swans, doves, cocks, bulls and so forth—are jealous just as human beings are, and equally disturbed by the fear of sharing their mates.[11401]
[11402]Grege pro toto bella juvenci, Si conjugio timuere suo, Poscunt timidi prælia cervi, Et mugitus dant concepti signa furoris.	Young bulls fight for the whole herd; If they fear for their mates, Timid stags demand battle, And their bellowing reveals the fury they have conceived.[11403]
In Venus cause what mighty battels make Your raving Bulls, and stirs for their herds sake? And Harts and Bucks that are so timorous, Will fight and roare, if once they be but jealous.	In Venus's cause, what mighty battles Your raging bulls wage, what commotion for their herds! And stags and bucks, though so timid, Will fight and roar once they become jealous.
In Bulls, Horses, Goats, this is most apparently discerned, Buls especially, alium in pascuis non admittit, he will not admit another Bull to feed in the same pasture, saith [11404]Oppian: which Stephanus Bathorius, late king of Poland used as an Impress, with that Motto, Regnum non capit duos.	This is most clearly seen in bulls, horses and goats, especially bulls: "he admits no other to the pasture"; he will not allow another bull to feed in the same pasture, says Oppian. Stephen Báthory, the late king of Poland, used this as an emblem with the motto "A kingdom has no room for two."[11405]

[11400] Burton. Source page 594, p: "3. de anima cap. de zel. Animalia quædam zelotypia tanguntur, ut olores, columbæ, galli, tauri, &c. ob metum communionis." "On the Soul, book 3, chapter on jealousy. Certain animals are affected by jealousy, such as swans, doves, cocks, bulls and so forth, through fear of sharing."

[11401] Editor. Communion here means sharing sexual access, not a religious sacrament. Burton transfers human descriptions of jealousy to animal behaviour through inherited natural history and moral illustration.

[11402] Burton. Source page 594, q: "Seneca."

[11403] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 339–344. Burton begins after the verb and alters iuvencus, a singular young bull, to plural juvenci; he also has mugitus where the consulted text has mugitu. The modern rendering supplies the implied fight. Burton's separate English verse version follows as a separate unit.

[11404] Burton. Source page 594, †: "Lib.11. Cynoget." "On Hunting, book 11."

[11405] Editor. Impress means an emblem or device with a motto. Burton joins animal exclusiveness to the political impossibility of two sovereigns. The margin clearly prints Lib.11.; the intended book and passage in the hunting poem require collation, so the number is not silently changed.

Original text 1651	Modern English
R. T. in his blason of Jealousie, telleth a story of a Swan about Windsore, that finding a strange Cock with his mate, did swim I know not how many miles after to kill him, and when he had so done, came back and killed his hen; a certain truth, he saith, done upon Thames, as many Water-men, and neighbour Gentlemen can tell. Fidem suam liberet; for my part, I do beleeve it may be true; for Swans have ever been branded with that Epithite of Jealousie.	R. T., in his Blazon of Jealousy, tells a story of a swan near Windsor which, finding a strange male with his mate, swam I know not how many miles after him to kill him. Having done so, he returned and killed his own female. This is a certain truth, he says, something that happened on the Thames, as many boatmen and local gentlemen can testify. "Let him make good his word." For my part, I believe it may be true, for swans have always been branded with the epithet "jealous."[11406]
[11407]The jealous Swanne against his death that singeth, And eke the Owle that of death bode bringeth.	The jealous swan that sings as his death approaches, And also the owl that brings the omen of death.[11408]

[11406] Editor. R. T. is Robert Tofte. Cock and hen here mean male and female swans. Fidem suam liberet leaves the reporter responsible for substantiating his story; Burton then cautiously accepts its possibility. This is an anecdote offered as evidence, not an independently verified observation.

[11407] Burton. Source page 594, t: "Chaucer in his assembly of fowls."

[11408] Editor. Chaucer, The Parliament of Fowls, lines 342–343. Against means in anticipation of, and bode means a warning or omen. The lines invoke the traditional swan song and the owl as a bird of ill omen.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 594–595 [11409]Some say as much of Elephants, that they are more jealous than any other creatures whatsoever; and those old Ægyptians, as [11410]Pierius informeth us, expresse in their Hieroglyphicks, the passion of Jealousie by a Camel; [11411]because that fearing the worst still about matters of Venery, he loves solitudes, that he may enjoy his pleasure alone, & in quoscunque obvios insurgit, zelotypiæ stimulis agitatus, he will quarrel and fight with whosoever come next, man or beast, in his jealous fits.	Some say the same of elephants: that they are more jealous than any other creatures whatever. And the ancient Egyptians, as Pierius informs us, represent the passion of jealousy in their hieroglyphs by a camel, "because, always fearing the worst in sexual matters, he loves solitude so that he may enjoy his pleasure alone"; "and, goaded by jealousy, he attacks anyone he encounters." In his jealous fits he will quarrel and fight with whoever comes near, human or animal.[11412]
Source page 595 I have read as much of [11413]Crocodiles; and if Peter Martyrs authority be authentique, legat. Babylonicæ lib. 3. you shall have a strange tale to that purpose confidently related. Another story of the jealousie of dogs, see in Hieron. Fabricius Tract. 3. cap. 5. de loquela animalium.	I have read the same of crocodiles; and if Peter Martyr's testimony is trustworthy, you will find a strange tale confidently told to this effect in book 3 of his Babylonian Embassy. For another story, about jealousy in dogs, see Girolamo Fabrici's On the Speech of Animals, treatise 3, chapter 5.[11414]

[11409] Burton. Source page 594, s: "Alderovand."

[11410] Burton. Source page 594, t: "Lib.12." "Book 12."

[11411] Burton. Source page 594, u: "Sibi timens circa res venereas, solitudines amat quo solus sola fœmina fruatur." "Fearing for himself in sexual matters, he loves solitude so that he alone may enjoy the female alone."

[11412] Editor. Alderovand. names Ulisse Aldrovandi. Pierius is Pierio Valeriano, whose Hieroglyphica interprets animals as emblems. Burton's appeal to Egyptian hieroglyphs comes through this early modern symbolic tradition. Venery means sexual activity here, not hunting.

[11413] Burton. Source page 595, †: "Crocodili zelotypi & uxorum amantissimi, &c." "Crocodiles are jealous and extremely fond of their wives, and so on."

[11414] Editor. Peter Martyr here is the diplomat and humanist Peter Martyr of Anghiera. Babylonian refers to the title of his embassy account, not necessarily ancient Mesopotamia. Hieron. Fabricius is Girolamo Fabrici. Neither animal anecdote has been independently collated in this draft.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But this furious passion is most eminent in men, and is as well amongst Batchelors, as married men. If it appear amongst Batchelors, we commonly call them rivals or corrivals, a metaphor derived from a River, rivales à rivo; for as a river, saith Acron in Hor. art. Poet. and [11415]Donat. in Ter. Eunuch. divides a common ground betwixt two men, and both participate of it, so is a woman indifferent betwixt two suiters, both likely to enjoy her; and thence comes this emulation, which breaks out many times into tempestuous stormes, and produceth lamentable effects, murder it self, with much cruelty, many single combats.	But this furious passion is most conspicuous in human beings, among bachelors as well as married men. When it appears among bachelors, we commonly call them rivals or fellow rivals, a metaphor derived from a stream: "rivals from rivus, a stream." Just as a stream, say Acron in his commentary on Horace's Art of Poetry and Donatus on Terence's Eunuch, divides land held in common between two men, and both share in it, so a woman stands impartially between two suitors, each with a prospect of possessing her. From this comes the rivalry that often breaks into tempestuous storms and produces lamentable effects: murder itself, much cruelty, and many duels.[11416]
They cannot endure the least injury done unto them before their mistress, and in her defence, will bite off one anothers noses; they are most impatient of any flout, disgrace, lest emulation or participation in that kind.	They cannot endure the slightest injury done to them in front of their mistress, and in her defence will bite off one another's noses. They are utterly intolerant of any mockery, disgrace, or the least rivalry or sharing of this kind.
[11417]Lacerat lacertum Largi mordax Memmius. Memmius the Romane (as Tully tels the story de oratore lib. 2.) being corrival with Largus at Terracina, bit him by the arme, which fact of his was so famous, that it afterwards grew to a proverb in those parts.	"Biting Memmius mangles Largus's arm." The Roman Memmius, as Cicero tells the story in On the Orator, book 2, was Largus's rival at Terracina and bit him on the arm. This deed became so famous that it afterwards passed into a proverb in those parts.[11418]

[11415] Burton. Source page 595, †: "Qui dividit agrum communem; inde deducitur ad amantes." "Which divides land held in common; from this it is extended to lovers."

[11416] Editor. Rivales and rivus are the Latin words on which Burton bases his derivation. Indifferent means standing equally between the claimants, not emotionally uninterested. Acron and Donatus are cited as commentators; the exact scholia and the claim about divided land remain to be checked.

[11417] Burton. Source page 595, †: "Erasmus chil.1. Cent.9. adag.99." "Erasmus, Adages, first thousand, ninth hundred, adage 99."

[11418] Editor. Cicero, On the Orator 2.240, calls the story Crassus's invention; Burton treats it as a famous deed. The Leiden index confirms Erasmus, Adages 1.9.99 (899), with Largi in its heading, matching Burton's proverbial line. Cicero's prose names Largius. Erasmus's full commentary and Burton's route to the anecdote remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11419]Phædria could not abide his corrival Thraso; for when Parmeno demanded, numquid aliud imperas? whether he would command him any more service? No more (saith he) but to speak in his behalf, and to drive away his corrival if he could.	Phaedria could not endure his rival Thraso. When Parmeno asked, "Do you have any further orders?"—whether he wanted any other service from him—he said, "Nothing more, except to speak on his behalf and drive away his rival if he could."[11420]
Constantine in the eleventh book of his husbandry, cap. 11. hath a pleasant tale of the Pine tree; [11421]she was once a fair maid, whom Pineus and Boreas two corrivals, dearly sought; but jealous Boreas broke her neck, &c. And in his 18 chapter he telleth another tale of [11422]Mars, that in his jealousie slew Adonis.	Constantine, in book 11, chapter 11 of his work on farming, tells a delightful story about the pine tree: "She was once a beautiful maiden, whom two rivals, Pineus and Boreas, eagerly courted; but jealous Boreas broke her neck," and so on. In chapter 18 he tells another story, of Mars, who killed Adonis in his jealousy.[11423]
Petronius calleth this passion amantium furiosam æmulationem, a furious emulation; and their symptomes are well expressed by Sir Jeffery Chaucer in his first Canterbury tale.	Petronius calls this passion "the furious rivalry of lovers": a furious rivalry. Their symptoms are well expressed by Sir Geoffrey Chaucer in his first Canterbury tale.[11424]

[11419] Burton. Source page 595, †: "Ter. Eun. act.1.sc.1. Munus nostrum ornato verbis, & istum æmulum, quoad poteris, ab ea pellito." "Terence, The Eunuch, act 1, scene 1. Praise our gift with your words, and keep that rival away from her as far as you can."

[11420] Editor. Terence, The Eunuch 213–215, in act 2, scene 1 of the consulted text, rather than the margin's act 1, scene 1. Phaedria tells Parmeno to praise his gift and keep his rival away from Thais. Burton compresses the instruction into speaking on his behalf, and shifts between direct and indirect speech; that shift is retained.

[11421] Burton. Source page 595, x: "Pinus puella quondam fuit, &c." "The pine was once a maiden, and so on."

[11422] Burton. Source page 595, y: "Mars zelotypus Adonidem interfecit." "Jealous Mars killed Adonis."

[11423] Editor. Husbandry means agriculture. The pine-tree story and the Adonis story are attributed to Constantine's agricultural collection. Pineus is retained as printed; the identification of the rival and the chapter numbering remain for collation. Boreas is the north wind; Mars is the god of war.

[11424] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 99.2: the speaker pleads that furious jealousy is beyond lovers' control. Chaucer's first Canterbury tale is The Knight's Tale, whose rival kinsmen Palamon and Arcite love Emelye. Sir is Burton's form of address here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
It will make the nearest and dearest friends fall out; they will endure all other things to bee common, goods, lands, monyes, participate of each pleasures, and take in good part any disgraces, injuries in another kinde; but as Propertius well describes it in an Elegy of his, in this they will suffer nothing, have no corrivals.	It will make the closest and dearest friends quarrel. They will tolerate the sharing of everything else—goods, lands, money—share one another's pleasures, and take any other kind of insult or injury in good part. But, as Propertius aptly describes it in one of his elegies, in this matter they will yield nothing and admit no rivals.
Tu mihi vel ferro pectus, vel perde veneno, A domina tantùm te modo tolle mea: Te socium vitæ, te corporis esse licebit, Te dominum admitto rebus amice meis. Lecto te solum, lecto te deprecor uno, Rivalem possum non ego ferre Jovem.	Destroy my heart with steel or poison, Only keep away from my mistress. You may share my life and my body; I grant you mastery of my possessions, my friend. Only my bed, that one bed, I beg you to leave alone: I cannot endure even Jupiter as a rival.[11425]
Source page 595–596 [11426]Stab me with sword, or poison strong Give me to work my bane; So thou court not my lass, so thou From mistress mine refrain. Command my self, my body, purse, As thine own goods take all, And as my ever dearest friend, I ever use thee shall. O spare my Love, to have alone Her to my self I crave, Nay, Jove himself Ile not endure My Rival for to have.	Stab me with a sword, or give me strong poison To bring about my death, Provided you do not court my girl, provided you Keep away from my mistress. Command me, my body and my purse; Take everything as your own property, And as my dearest friend I shall always treat you. Oh, leave my love alone; I long To have her to myself. No, I will not endure even Jove himself As my rival.[11427]

[11425] Editor. Propertius, Elegies 2.34.13–18. The lover offers his friend everything except access to his mistress's bed. Jupiter, also called Jove, supplies the extreme example of a rival he will not tolerate. The following English expansion remains separate from this translation of the Latin.

[11426] Burton. Source page 595, unmarked: "R.T."

[11427] Editor. The unmarked R.T. stands beside the poem on printed page 595. It is provisionally attached to the English rendering and understood as Robert Tofte's initials; exact attribution awaits collation with his Blazon. Work my bane means cause my death, and use thee means treat you.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 596 This Jealousie which I am to treat of, is that which belongs to maried men, in respect of their own wives; to whose estate, as no sweetness, pleasure, happiness can be compared in the world, if they live quietly and lovingly together; so if they disagree or be jealous, those bitter pils of sorrow and grief, disasterous mischiefes, mischances, tortures, gripings, discontents, are not to be separated from them.	The jealousy I am to discuss is that of married men concerning their own wives. Just as no sweetness, pleasure or happiness in the world can compare with their condition if they live peacefully and lovingly together, so, if they quarrel or become jealous, those bitter pills of sorrow and grief—disastrous harms, misfortunes, torments, agonies and discontents—cannot be separated from them.
A most violent passion it is where it taketh place, an unspeakable torment, a hellish torture, an infernal plague, as Ariosto cals it, A fury, a continual fever, full of suspition, fear, and sorrow, a martyrdome, a mirth-marring monster.	Where it takes hold, it is an extremely violent passion, an unspeakable torment, a hellish torture, an infernal plague, as Ariosto calls it: "a fury, a continual fever, full of suspicion, fear and sorrow, a martyrdom, a monster that destroys joy."[11428]
The sorrow and grief of heart of one woman jealous of another, is heavier than death, Ecclus. 28.6. as [11429]Peninnah did Hannah, vex her and upbraid her sore.	"The sorrow and grief of heart of one woman jealous of another is heavier than death," Ecclesiasticus 28:6; as Peninnah did to Hannah, "tormenting her and bitterly reproaching her."[11430]
'Tis a main vexation, a most intolerable burden, a corrosive to all content, a frenzy, a madness it self, as [11431]Benedetto Varchi proves out of that select Sonnet of Giovanni de la Casa, that reverend Lord, as he stiles him.	It is a great affliction, an utterly intolerable burden, something that eats away all contentment, a frenzy, madness itself, as Benedetto Varchi demonstrates from that choice sonnet by Giovanni della Casa, that reverend lord, as he styles him.[11432]

[11428] Editor. Ariosto is Ludovico Ariosto. Burton gives no canto or line reference for this chain of descriptions; the extent of the quotation remains unverified. A fury evokes a tormenting spirit, while martyrdome here means prolonged suffering.

[11429] Burton. Source page 596, z: "1 Sam.1.6."

[11430] Editor. The parallel for the jealous woman is Ecclesiasticus, or Sirach, 26:6, not Burton's 28:6; heavier than death is an additional part of his formulation, not that verse's wording in the King James Apocrypha. In 1 Samuel 1:6, Peninnah repeatedly provokes Hannah about her childlessness.

[11431] Burton. Source page 596, a: "Blason of Jealousie."

[11432] Editor. Varchi's lecture expounds Giovanni della Casa's sonnet beginning Cura, che di timor ti nutri e cresci, "Care, which feeds and grows on fear." Burton returns to the authority used at the beginning of this subsection. Reverent social and ecclesiastical address is retained in reverend lord.

Original text 1651	Modern English
SUBSECT. 2.	SUBSECTION 2
Causes of Jealousie. Who are most apt. Idleness, Melancholy, Impotency, long absence, beauty, wantonness, naught themselves. Allurements from time, place, persons, bad usage, Causes.	Causes of jealousy. Who are most susceptible. Idleness, melancholy, impotence, prolonged absence, beauty, sexual licence, being unfaithful themselves. Temptations arising from time, place and people; mistreatment as a cause.[11433]
Astrologers make the stars a cause or sign of this bitter passion, and out of every mans Horoscope will give a probable conjecture whether he will be jealous or no, and at what time, by direction of the significators to their several promissors: their Aphorisms are to be read in Albubator, Pontanus, Schoner, Junctine, &c.	Astrologers make the stars a cause or sign of this bitter passion. From each man's horoscope they will offer a probable prediction of whether he will be jealous, and when, by directing the significators towards their respective promissors. Their rules can be read in Albubator, Pontanus, Schöner, Junctinus and others.[11434]
Bodine cap.5. meth. hist. ascribes a great cause to the country or clime, and discourseth largely there of this subject, saying, that southern men are more hot, lascivious, and jealous, then such as live in the North; they can hardly contain themselves in those hotter climes, but are most subject to prodigious lusts.	Bodin, in chapter 5 of his Method of History, assigns great importance to country or climate, and discusses this subject at length. He says that southern men are more hot-blooded, lustful and jealous than those who live in the north; in those hotter climates they can scarcely restrain themselves and are especially subject to monstrous lusts.[11435]

[11433] Editor. This is the opening instalment of Subsection 2, not the whole subsection. "Naught themselves" anticipates the unfaithful husband's tendency to suspect his wife. "Honest" commonly means sexually faithful here. Burton's national and gender generalizations are retained as historical assertions of the text, not adopted as facts by this edition.

[11434] Editor. In astrological directions, a significator represents a person or concern in the chart, and a promissor is a point approached to predict an event. Albubator is the Latinized name of an Arabic astrological authority; the exact treatise is not specified. Pontanus, Schöner and Junctinus are cited by surname only.

[11435] Editor. Jean Bodin, Methodus ad facilem historiarum cognitionem, chapter 5. The explanation relies on a historical theory of climate and temperament. "Hot" links the geographical south to bodily heat and sexual appetite.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Leo Afer telleth incredible things almost, of the lust and jealousie of his country men of Africk, and especially such as live about Carthage, and so doth every Geographer of them in [11436]Asia, Turky, Spaniards, Italians. Germany hath not so many drunkards, England Tobacconists, France dancers, Holland mariners, as Italy alone hath jealous husbands. And in [11437]Italy some account them of Piacenza more jealous than the rest.	Leo Africanus tells almost incredible things about the lust and jealousy of his African countrymen, especially those living around Carthage; and every geographer says the same about people in Asia and Turkey, Spaniards and Italians. Germany has fewer drunkards, England fewer tobacco smokers, France fewer dancers and Holland fewer sailors than Italy alone has jealous husbands. And within Italy, some consider the people of Piacenza more jealous than the rest.[11438]
Source page 596–597 In [11439]Germany, France, Brittain, Scandia, Poland, Muscovy, they are not so troubled with this ferall malady, although Damianus à Goes, which I do much wonder at, in his Topography of Lapland, and Herbastein of Russia, against the stream of all other Geographers, would fasten it upon those Northern inhabitants.	In Germany, France, Britain, Scandinavia, Poland and Muscovy, people are less troubled by this deadly malady, although Damião de Góis, much to my surprise, in his description of Lapland, and Herberstein in his account of Russia, contradict the general current of other geographers and would pin it on those northern inhabitants.[11440]

[11436] Burton. Source page 596, b: “Mulierum conditio misera: nullam honestam credunt nisi domo conclusa vivat.” “The condition of women is miserable: they believe none chaste unless she lives shut up at home.”

[11437] Burton. Source page 596, †: “Fines Morison.”

[11438] Editor. Leo Africanus is al-Hasan al-Wazzan, author of the Description of Africa. “Tobacconists” here means tobacco users, not shopkeepers. Fynes Moryson is cited in the margin. The lists are rhetorical national stereotypes rather than quantified comparisons.

[11439] Burton. Source page 596, c: “Nomen zelotypiæ apud ipsos locum non habuit. lib.3.c.8.” “The name of jealousy had no place among them. Book 3, chapter 8.”

[11440] Editor. Scandia means Scandinavia; Muscovy designates Russia centred on Moscow. The writers are Damião de Góis and Sigismund von Herberstein. The abbreviated book-and-chapter reference in margin c is retained without assigning it to a particular work.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 597 Antomarius Poggius, and Munster in his description of Baden, reports that men and women of all sorts go commonly into the Bathes together, without all suspition, the name of jealousie (saith Munster) is not so much as once heard of among them.	Antomarius Poggius, and Münster in his description of Baden, report that men and women of every rank commonly enter the baths together without any suspicion: "The very name of jealousy," says Münster, "is never so much as heard among them."[11441]
In Frisland the women kiss him they drink to, and are kissed again of those they pledge. The virgins in Holland go hand in hand with young men from home, glide on the Ice, such is their harmless liberty, and lodge together abroad without suspition, which rash Sansovinus an Italian makes a great sign of unchastity.	In Friesland, women kiss the man they drink to and are kissed in return by those whose toast they answer. In Holland, unmarried young women go away from home hand in hand with young men, skate on the ice—such is their innocent freedom—and lodge together away from home without suspicion. Rash Sansovino, an Italian, regards this as a strong sign of unchastity.
In France, upon small acquaintance it is usual to court other mens wives, to come to their houses, and accompany them arm in arm in the streets, without imputation. In the most Northern Countries young men and maids familiarly dance together, men and their wives, [11442]which, Siena only excepted, Italians may not abide.	In France, on only slight acquaintance, it is customary to pay court to other men's wives, visit their houses and accompany them arm in arm through the streets, without reproach. In the northernmost countries young men and women dance freely together, as do men and their wives; Italians, except in Siena, cannot tolerate this.

[11441] Editor. The scan reads Antomarius Poggius. The name and precise identity require collation; it is not silently replaced with the better-known Poggio Bracciolini. Sebastian Münster's geographical description is the other named authority.

[11442] Burton. Source page 597, †: "Fines Moris. part.3.cap.2."

Original text 1651	Modern English
The [11443]Greeks on the other side have their private bathes for men and women, where they must not come neer, not so much as see one another: and as [11444]Bodine observes lib.5. de repub. the Italians could never endure this, or a Spaniard, the very conceit of it would make him mad: and for that cause they lock up their women, and will not suffer them to be neer men, so much as in the [11445]Church, but with a partition between.	The Greeks, on the other hand, have separate baths for men and women, where they must not come near or even see one another. As Bodin observes in book 5 of On the Commonwealth, Italians could never tolerate this mixing; nor could a Spaniard—the mere thought would drive him mad. That is why they lock up their women and will not allow them near men, even in church, without a partition between them.
He telleth moreover, how that when he was Embassadour in England, he heard Mendoza the Spanish Legate finding fault with it, as a filthy custome for men and women to sit promiscuously in Churches together: but Dr. Dale the Master of the requests told him again, that it was indeed a filthy custome in Spain, where they could not contain themselves from lascivious thoughts in their holy places, but not with us.	He also tells how, when he was an ambassador in England, he heard Mendoza, the Spanish envoy, condemn as a filthy custom the practice of men and women sitting together indiscriminately in church. But Dr Dale, Master of Requests, replied that it was indeed a filthy custom in Spain, where people could not keep themselves from lustful thoughts in holy places, but not among us.[11446]

[11443] Burton. Source page 597, d: "Busbequius. Sands."

[11444] Burton. Source page 597, e: "Præ amore & zelotypia sæpius insaniunt." "They often go mad through love and jealousy."

[11445] Burton. Source page 597, f: "Australes ne sacra quidem publica fieri patiuntur, nisi uterque sexus pariete medio dividatur: & quum in Angliam inquit, legationis causa profectus essem, audivi Mendozam legatum Hispaniarum dicentem turpe esse viros & fœminas in, &c." "Southerners do not even permit public worship unless the sexes are separated by a wall between them. And when, he says, I had travelled to England on an embassy, I heard Mendoza, the Spanish envoy, saying that it was shameful for men and women in, etc."

[11446] Editor. "Promiscuously" means without separation by sex. Bodin, Six Bookes 5.1, in Knolles's translation, gives the Mendoza–Dale exchange and says he travelled to England "with an Ambassage," rather than naming himself ambassador. Mendoza is Bernardino de Mendoza; the passage calls Dale Master of Requests. Dale's fuller identification and Burton's precise Bodin edition remain for verification.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Baronius in his Annals out of Eusebius taxeth Licinius the Emperour for a decree of his made to this effect, Iubens ne viri simul cum mulieribus in Ecclesiâ interessent: for being prodigiously naught himself, aliorum naturam ex suâ vitiosâ mente spectavit, he so esteemed others.	Baronius, drawing on Eusebius in his Annals, censures the emperor Licinius for a decree to this effect, "ordering that men should not attend church together with women." Being monstrously immoral himself, "he judged other people's nature by his own corrupt mind": that was how he assessed them.[11447]
But we are far from any such strange conceits, and will permit our wives and daughters to go to the Tavern with a friend, as Aubanus saith, modo absit lascivia, and suspect nothing, to kiss coming and going, which as Erasmus writes in one of his Epistles, they cannot endure. England is a paradise for women, and hell for horses: Italy a paradise of horses, hell for women, as the diverbe goes.	But we are far from such strange notions. We allow our wives and daughters to go to the tavern with a friend, as Aubanus says, "provided there is no indecency," and suspect nothing; we allow kisses on arrival and departure, which, as Erasmus writes in one of his letters, they cannot tolerate. England is a paradise for women and a hell for horses; Italy a paradise for horses and a hell for women, as the proverb goes.[11448]

[11447] Editor. The parallel is Eusebius, Life of Constantine 1.52–53, where Licinius forbids men and women to assemble together for worship and is accused of judging others by his own depravity. Burton reaches it through Cesare Baronio's ecclesiastical Annals. This is a hostile historical portrayal, not independent evidence of Licinius's motives.

[11448] Editor. Aubanus denotes Johann Boemus (Boemus Aubanus). The exact Erasmus letter and source of the proverb are not identified here; the statement about kissing contrasts English custom with the southern customs under discussion.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Some make a question whether this headstrong passion rage more in women then men, as Montagne l.3. But sure it is more outragious in women, as all other melancholy is, by reason of the weakness of their sex. Scaliger Poet. lib. cap.13. concludes against women. [11449]Besides their inconstancy, treachery, suspition, dissimulation, superstition, pride, (for all women are by nature proud) desire of soveraignty, if they be great women, (he gives instance in Juno) bitterness and jealousie are the most remarkable affections.	Some, such as Montaigne in book 3, ask whether this headstrong passion rages more fiercely in women than in men. But surely it is more outrageous in women, as all other melancholy is, because of the weakness of their sex. Scaliger, in his Poetics, book unspecified, chapter 13, decides against women. "Besides their inconstancy, treachery, suspicion, deceit, superstition and pride"—for all women are proud by nature—"and their desire to rule, if they are powerful women"—he gives Juno as an example —"bitterness and jealousy are their most conspicuous emotions."[11450]
[11451]Sed neque fulvus aper media tam fulvus in ira est, Fulmineo rapidos dum rotat ore canes. Nec Leo, &c.	But neither is the tawny boar so fierce in the midst of rage, When with his lightning mouth he tosses the rushing hounds, Nor the lion, and so on.[11452]
Tyger, Bore, Bear, Viper, Lioness, A womans fury cannot express.	Tiger, boar, bear, viper, lioness Cannot express a woman's fury.

[11449] Burton. Source page 597, g: "Idea: mulieres præterquam quod sunt infidæ, suspicaces, inconstantes, insidiosæ, simulatrices, superstitiosæ, & si potentes, intolerabiles, amore zelotypæ supra modum." "Idea: women, besides being faithless, suspicious, inconstant, treacherous, deceitful, superstitious and, if powerful, intolerable, are excessively jealous in love."

[11450] Editor. The 1651 text prints lib. without a book number; "book unspecified" makes that gap explicit. "Idea" in the margin is retained. Burton's attribution to Scaliger and Montaigne's book 3 have not been verified at the level of exact passages; the categorical claims about women belong to this historical polemic.

[11451] Burton. Source page 597, unmarked, beside the verse: "Ovid.2.de art." "Ovid, Art of Love, book 2."

[11452] Editor. Ovid, Art of Love 2.373–378. The scan repeats fulvus ("tawny") where the standard text has saevus ("fierce"); the translation uses the evident intended sense and records the repair here. Burton also prints rapidos dum where the parallel has rabidos cum, and Leo for lea. His separate English couplet expands the list of animals and is therefore retained separately.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 597–598 [11453]Some say red-headed women, pale-coloured, black-eyed, and of a shril voice, are most subject to jealousie.	Some say that red-haired women, pale women, those with black eyes and those with shrill voices are most subject to jealousy.[11454]
Source page 598 [11455]High colour in a woman choler shews, Naught are they, peevish, proud, malicious; But worst of all red, shril, and jealous.	A woman's high colour shows an angry temperament; They are wicked, ill-tempered, proud and malicious; But worst of all are the red-haired, shrill and jealous.
Comparisons are odious, I neither parallel them with others, nor debase them any more: men and women are both bad, and too subject to this pernicious infirmity. It is most part a symptome and cause of Melancholy, as Plater and Valescus teach us: melancholy men are apt to be jealous, and jealous apt to be melancholy.	Comparisons are odious. I shall neither compare them with others nor disparage them further: men and women are both bad, and all too subject to this pernicious infirmity. For the most part it is both a symptom and a cause of melancholy, as Platter and Valescus teach us: melancholy people are prone to jealousy, and jealous people to melancholy.
[11456]Pale jealousie, childe of insatiate love, Of heart-sick thoughts which melancholy bred, A hell-tormenting fear, no faith can move, By discontent with deadly poison fed; With headless youth and errour vainly led. A mortall plague, a vertue-drowning flood, A hellish fire not quenched but with blood.	Pale jealousy, child of insatiable love, Of heartsick thoughts that melancholy bred, A hellishly tormenting fear no assurance can change, Fed by discontent with deadly poison, Vainly led by reckless youth and error: A deadly plague, a flood that drowns virtue, A hellish fire extinguished only by blood.[11457]

[11453] Burton. Source page 597, h: "Bartello."

[11454] Editor. Bartello is the attribution actually printed in margin h; the precise work is unresolved. Hair, complexion and voice are being treated as signs of temperament in a historical physiognomic argument.

[11455] Burton. Source page 597, accompanying the verse continued on 598, unmarked: "R.T."

[11456] Burton. Source page 598, unmarked, beside Pale jealousie: "R.T."

[11457] Editor. The unmarked R.T. occurs both below margin h on 597 and beside this stanza on 598. The first is provisionally attached to "High colour"; the second to "Pale jealousie." These likely relate to the R.T. cited for the Blazon of Jealousy in the preceding discussion, but that relationship has not been established by direct collation. The scan's "headless" is understood as heedless or reckless.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If idleness concurr with melancholy, such persons are most apt to be jealous; 'tis [11458]Nevisanus note, An idle woman is presumed to be lascivious, and often jealous. Mulier cum sola cogitat, male cogitat: And 'tis not unlikely, for they have no other business to trouble their heads with.	If idleness joins melancholy, such people are especially prone to jealousy. Nevisanus observes: "An idle woman is presumed to be lustful, and often jealous." "When a woman thinks alone, she thinks evil." And this is not unlikely, for they have no other business to occupy their minds.[11459]
More particular causes be these which follow. Impotency first, when a man is not able of himself to perform those dues which he ought unto his wife: for though he be an honest liver, hurt no man, yet Trebius the Lawyer may make a question, an suum cuiq; tribuat, whether he give every one their own; and therefore when he takes notice of his wants, and perceives her to be more craving, clamorous, unsatiable and prone to lust than is fit; he begins presently to suspect, that wherein he is defective, she will satisfie her self, she will be pleased by some other means.	The more particular causes are these. First, impotence: when a man cannot perform the duties he owes his wife. Though he may live honestly and harm no one, Trebius the lawyer may still ask "whether he gives each person their due"—whether he gives everyone what belongs to them. When he recognizes his shortcomings and finds her more demanding, clamorous, insatiable and lustful than is proper, he immediately begins to suspect that she will satisfy herself where he falls short, and obtain her pleasure by other means.[11460]
Cornelius Gallus hath elegantly expressed this humor in an Epigram to his Lychoris.	Cornelius Gallus has elegantly expressed this state of mind in an epigram to his Lycoris.[11461]
Iamque alios juvenes aliosque requirit amores, Me vocat imbellem decrepitumque senem, &c.	And now she seeks other young men and other loves; She calls me a feeble, decrepit old man, and so on.

[11458] Burton. Source page 598, i: "Lib.2.num.8. mulier otiosa facile præsumitur luxuriosa, & sæpe zelotypa." "Book 2, number 8. An idle woman is readily presumed lustful, and often jealous."

[11459] Editor. Giovanni Nevizzano, Latinized Nevisanus, is the legal writer repeatedly cited here. The detached maxim about a woman thinking alone is translated as printed; its ultimate source is not established.

[11460] Editor. The joke invokes the three legal precepts: live honestly, harm no one, give each person their due (Justinian, Institutes 1.1.3). The third becomes a joke about the marital sexual obligation. Trebius is retained from the scan; the later marginal version names Trebatius. The precise intermediary source remains unresolved.

[11461] Editor. The couplet is Maximianus, Elegy 2.5–6, addressed to Lycoris. Burton's attribution to Cornelius Gallus belongs to an older attribution of these elegies; the original column keeps it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For this cause is most evident in old men, that are cold and dry by nature, and married succi plenis, to young wanton wives, with old doting Ianivere in Chaucer, they begin to mistrust all is not well,	For this cause is most evident in old men, who are naturally cold and dry and married to women "full of sap"—young, lustful wives. Like old, doting January in Chaucer, they begin to suspect that all is not well.[11462]
——she was young and he was old, And therefore he feared to be a Cuckold.	She was young and he was old, And so he feared being made a cuckold.
And how should it otherwise be? Old age is a disease of it self, loathsome, full of suspition and fear; when it is at best, unable, unfit for such matters. [11463]Tam apta nuptiis quam bruma messibus, as welcome to a young woman as snow in harvest, saith Nevisanus: Et si capis juvenculam, faciet tibi cornua: Marry a lusty maide and she will surely graft horns on thy head.	And how could it be otherwise? Old age is a disease in itself, loathsome, full of suspicion and fear; even at its best it is incapable and unfit for such matters. "As suited to marriage as winter to harvest": as welcome to a young woman as snow at harvest, says Nevisanus. "And if you take a young girl, she will give you horns": marry a vigorous young woman and she will certainly graft horns onto your head.[11464]
[11465]All women are slippery, often unfaithfull to their husbands, (as Æneas Sylvius epist.38. seconds him.) but to old men most treacherous: they had rather mortem amplexarier, lye with a coarse than such a one: [11466]Oderunt illum pueri, contemnunt mulieres.	"All women are unreliable, often unfaithful to their husbands"—as Aeneas Sylvius supports him in letter 38—"but most treacherous to old men." They would rather "embrace death," lie with a corpse, than with such a man: "Boys hate him; women despise him."[11467]

[11462] Editor. Cold and dry are the humoral qualities conventionally assigned to old age; "full of sap" means sexually vigorous. January is the elderly husband of May in Chaucer's Merchant's Tale. Burton's couplet is retained without treating it as a verified verbatim quotation from Chaucer.

[11463] Burton. Source page 598, k: "Lib.2.num.4." "Book 2, number 4."

[11464] Editor. "Horns" signify a husband whose wife has been unfaithful. Burton gives both the Latin winter-and-harvest comparison and his own version about snow; both remain. These claims about age and sexual fidelity are part of his rhetoric.

[11465] Burton. Source page 598, l: "Quum omnibus infideles fœminæ, senibus infidelissimæ." "While women are unfaithful to all, they are most unfaithful to old men."

[11466] Burton. Source page 598, †: "Mimnermus."

[11467] Editor. Aeneas Sylvius is Enea Silvio Piccolomini, later Pius II; his letter numbering remains uncollated. Mimnermus fragment 1.9 describes an old man as hated by boys and dishonoured by women, in a lament on ageing. Burton's Latin intermediary remains unidentified. "Coarse" means corpse; mortem amplexarier literally means "embrace death," expanded in Burton's English gloss.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 598–599 On the other side many men, saith Hieronymus, are suspicious of their wives, [11468]if they be lightly given, but old folks above the rest. In so much that she did not complain without a cause in [11469]Apuleius of an old bald, bedridden knave she had to her goodman.	On the other hand, many men, says Jerome, are suspicious of their wives if they are sexually unrestrained, but old men most of all. So the woman in Apuleius did not complain without reason about the old, bald, bedridden scoundrel she had for a husband.[11470]
Source page 599 Poor woman as I am, what shall I do? I have an old grim sire to my husband, as bald as a cout, as little and as unable as a child, a bedfull of bones, he keepes all the doors barred and locked upon me, wo is me, what shall I do? He was jealous, and she made him a cuckold for keeping her up: Suspicion without a cause, hard usage is able of it self to make a woman flie out, that was otherwise honest.	"Poor woman that I am, what shall I do? I have a grim old fellow for a husband, as bald as a coot, as small and as incapable as a child"—a bedful of bones—"he keeps every door barred and locked against me. Woe is me! What shall I do?" He was jealous, and she made him a cuckold for keeping her confined. Groundless suspicion and harsh treatment can themselves make a woman stray who would otherwise have remained faithful.

[11468] Burton. Source page 598, m: "Vix aliqua non impudica, & quam non suspectam marito quis habeat." "Scarcely any woman is not unchaste, or such that one could consider her above her husband's suspicion."

[11469] Burton. Source page 599, n: "Lib.5.de aur. asino. At ego misera patre meo seniorem maritum nacta sum, dein cucurbita calviorem & quovis puero pumiliorem, cunctam domum seris & catenis obditam custodientem." "The Golden Ass, book 5. But I, unfortunate woman, have acquired a husband older than my father, balder than a gourd and smaller than any boy, who guards the entire house, shut up with bars and chains."

[11470] Editor. Apuleius, Metamorphoses (The Golden Ass) 5.9: one of Psyche's envious sisters complains about her own husband. Burton expands her words and adds the claim that confinement made her commit adultery; that claim is not part of this passage in Apuleius. Jerome's exact source is unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
——[11471]plerasque bonas tractatio pravas Esse facit,——	Treatment makes many good women Become bad.
bad usage aggravates the matter. Nam quando mulieres cognoscunt maritum hoc advertere, licentius peccant, as [11472]Nevisanus holds, when a woman thinks her husband watcheth her, she will sooner offend; [11473]Liberius peccant, & pudor omnis abest, rough handling makes them worse: as the good wife of Bathe in Chaucer brags,	Mistreatment makes matters worse. “For when women realize their husband is paying attention to this, they sin more freely,” as Nevisanus maintains: when a woman thinks her husband is watching her, she is more likely to offend. “They sin more freely, and all shame is gone.” Rough handling makes them worse, as Chaucer’s good Wife of Bath boasts.[11474]
In his own grease I made him frie, For anger and for very Jealousie.	I made him fry in his own grease, With anger and sheer jealousy.[11475]

[11471] Burton. Source page 599, †: “Chaloner.”

[11472] Burton. Source page 599, o: “Lib.4.n.80.” “Book 4, number 80.”

[11473] Burton. Source page 599, p: “Ovid.2.de art amandi.” “Ovid, Art of Love, book 2.”

[11474] Editor. The Ovid parallel is Art of Love 2.589–590: after Vulcan exposes Mars and Venus, they do openly what they formerly concealed. Burton alters the wording to “They sin more freely.” Both Chaloner excerpts in this block remain to be located precisely.

[11475] Editor. Chaucer, Wife of Bath’s Prologue 487–488. The metaphor is close to “stew in his own juice”: she makes her husband suffer from his own anger and jealousy. The adjacent Chaucer passage says she flirted rather than physically betrayed this husband, a distinction Burton does not reproduce here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Of two extreames, this of hard usage is the worst. 'Tis a great fault (for some men are uxorii) to be too fond of their wives, to dote on them as [11476]Senior Deliro on his Fallace, to be too effeminate, or as some do, to be sick for their wives, breed children for them, and like the [11477]Tiberini lie in for them, as some birds hatch egges by turns, they do all womens offices:	Of the two extremes, harsh treatment is the worse. It is a great fault—for some men are "enslaved to their wives"—to be excessively fond of them, to dote on them as Signor Deliro does on his Fallace, to be too effeminate, or, as some do, to suffer sickness for their wives, carry children for them, and, like the Tiberini, take to childbed for them. As some birds take turns incubating eggs, these men perform all women's duties.[11478]
Cælius Rhodiginus ant. lect. lib.6. cap.24. makes mention of a fellow out of Seneca, [11479]that was so besotted on his wife, he could not endure a moment out of her company, he wore her scarfe when he went abroad next his heart, and would never drink but in that cup she began first.	Caelius Rhodiginus, in Ancient Readings, book 6, chapter 24, mentions a man from Seneca who was so besotted with his wife that he could not bear a moment away from her. When he went out he wore her scarf next to his heart, and he would never drink except from a cup she had drunk from first.[11480]

[11476] Burton. Source page 599, p repeated: "Every man out of his humour."

[11477] Burton. Source page 599, q: "Calcagninus Apol. Tiberini ab uxorem partu earum vices subeunt, ut aves per vices incubant, &c." "Calcagnini, Apologues. The Tiberini at their wives' childbirth take their places, as birds take turns brooding, etc."

[11478] Editor. Deliro and Fallace are characters in Ben Jonson's Every Man Out of His Humour. "Lie in" means take to bed for childbirth. The Tiberini recalls the Tibareni of Apollonius, Argonautica 2.1011–1014, whose men lie groaning while their wives give birth; Burton cites Celio Calcagnini as his immediate authority. This reported practice is conventionally called couvade. The margin's printed ab uxorem is grammatically defective; its translation gives the evident sense.

[11479] Burton. Source page 599, r: "Exiturus fascia uxoris pectus alligabat, nec momento præsentia ejus carere poterat, potumque non hauriebat nisi prægustatum labris ejus." "When going out he bound his breast with his wife's scarf, and he could not bear to lack her presence for a moment; nor would he drink anything unless her lips had tasted it first."

[11480] Editor. Caelius Rhodiginus is Lodovico Ricchieri. His Ancient Readings 6.24 is the cited intermediary. The precise Senecan passage has not been established; the note translates the complete Latin marginal account.

Original text 1651	Modern English
We have many such fondlings that are their wives packhorses and slaves, (nam grave malum uxor superans virum suum, as the Comical Poet hath it, there's no greater misery to a man than to let his wife domineer) to carry her muffe, dog, and fan, let her wear the breeches, lay out, spend and do what she will, go and come, whither, when she will, they give consent.	We have many such doting fools who are their wives' packhorses and slaves—"for a wife who masters her husband is a grievous evil," as the comic poet puts it; no misery is greater for a man than allowing his wife to rule him. They carry her muff, dog and fan, let her wear the breeches, buy, spend and do whatever she pleases, go and come wherever and whenever she likes: they consent to it all.[11481]
Here take my muffe, and do you hear good man; Now give me pearl, and carry you my fan, &c.	Here, take my muff—and listen, husband: Now give me pearls, and carry my fan, and so on.
——[11482]poscit pallam, redimicula, inaures; Curre, quid hic cessas? vulgo vult illa videri, Tu pete lecticas——	She demands a mantle, ribbons, earrings; Run! Why are you lingering here? She wants to be seen in public; Go and fetch a litter.
many brave and worthy men have trespassed in this kinde, multos foràs claros, domestica hæc destruxit infamia, and many noble Senators and souldiers (as [11483]Pliny notes) have lost their honour, in being uxorii, so sottishly overruled by their wives; and therefore Cato in Plutarch made a bitter jest on his fellow Citizens, the Romanes, we govern all the world abroad, and our wives at home rule us.	Many brave and worthy men have erred in this way: "this domestic disgrace has ruined many who were distinguished abroad." Many noble senators and soldiers, as Pliny observes, have lost their honour by being "enslaved to their wives," so foolishly allowing themselves to be ruled by them. Hence Cato's bitter joke in Plutarch about his fellow citizens, the Romans: "We govern the whole world abroad, and our wives rule us at home."[11484]

[11481] Editor. A muff is a hand-warmer. "Wear the breeches" means govern the household. The unnamed comic poet's Latin maxim and the two English lines remain unattributed. The quotation that follows asks for a litter, a conveyance carried by attendants.

[11482] Burton. Source page 599, †: "Chaloner."

[11483] Burton. Source page 599, *: "Panegyr. Trajano." "Panegyric to Trajan."

[11484] Editor. Pliny, Panegyric 83.4, contrasts public distinction with domestic disgrace; Burton adapts the wording. The scan reads foràs claros, "distinguished abroad," not fortes claros. Plutarch, Cato the Elder 8.2–3, reports the quip about Roman women and relates it to a saying of Themistocles.

Original text 1651	Modern English
These offend in one extream; But too hard and too severe, are far more offensive on the other. As just a cause may be long absence of either party, when they must of necessity be much from home, as Lawyers, Physitians, Marriners, by their professions; or otherwise make frivolous, impertinent journeyes, tarry long abroad to no purpose, lie out, and are gadding still, upon small occasions,	These offend at one extreme; those who are too harsh and severe offend far more at the other. An equally valid cause may be either partner's prolonged absence, when they must spend much time away from home—as lawyers, physicians and sailors must because of their professions—or when they make frivolous, unnecessary journeys, stay away a long time for no purpose, sleep elsewhere and are forever gadding about on slight excuses.
it must needs yeeld matter of suspition, when they use their wives unkindly in the mean time, and never tarry at home, it cannot use but ingender some such conceit.	This must provide grounds for suspicion. When they meanwhile treat their wives unkindly and never stay at home, it cannot help generating some such thought.[11485]
Source page 600 [11486]Uxor si cesses amare te cogitat Aut tete amari, aut potare, aut animo obsequi, Et tibi benè esse soli, quum sibi sit malè.	If you are late, your wife thinks you are in love, Or loved by someone, or drinking, or indulging yourself, And that you alone are enjoying yourself while she fares badly.[11487]
If thou be absent long, thy wife then thinks, Th'art drunk, at ease, or with some pretty minks, 'Tis well with thee, or else beloved of some, Whil'st she poor soul doth fare full ill at home.	If you are absent long, your wife then thinks You are drunk, at ease, or with some pretty minx; You are doing well, or someone loves you, While she, poor soul, fares very badly at home.

[11485] Editor. The scan reads "it cannot use but"; the idiom and context require "cannot help" or "cannot but." The original reading is retained rather than silently replaced with "choose."

[11486] Burton. Source page 600, q: "Ter. Adelph. Act.1.sce.1." "Terence, The Brothers, act 1, scene 1."

[11487] Editor. Terence, The Brothers 35–37 (act 1, scene 1). Burton's version differs from the Latin parallel: it includes "or loved by someone" where that text has "or feasting," and puts soli with the husband rather than the word's sense with the wife. Both the printed Latin and Burton's separate English expansion are retained and translated in their own terms.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Hippocrates the Physitian had a smack of this disease; for when he was to go from home as far as Abdera, and some other remote cities of Greece, he writ to his friend Dionysius (if at least those [11488]Epistles be his) to oversee his wife in his absence, (as Apollo set a Raven to watch his Coronis) although she lived in his house with her father and mother, whom he knew would have a care of her;	The physician Hippocrates had a touch of this disease. When he was to travel from home as far as Abdera and other distant Greek cities, he wrote to his friend Dionysius—if those letters really are his—to watch over his wife in his absence, as Apollo set a raven to watch his Coronis, although she lived in his house with her parents, whom he knew would look after her.[11489]
yet that would not satisfie his jealousie, he would have his speciall friend Dionysius to dwell in his house with her all the time of his peregrination, [11490]and to observe her behaviour, how she carried her self in her husbands absence, and that she did not lust after other men.	Yet this would not satisfy his jealousy. He wanted his close friend Dionysius to live in his house with her throughout his travels and "observe her behaviour, how she conducted herself in her husband's absence, and see that she did not desire other men."
[11491]For a woman had need to have an overseer to keep her honest; they are bad by nature, and lightly given all, and if they be not curbed in time, as an unproined tree, they will be full of wild branches, and degenerate of a sudden.	"For a woman needs a supervisor to keep her chaste. They are all bad and sexually unrestrained by nature; unless curbed in time, like an unpruned tree they will become full of wild branches and suddenly degenerate."

[11488] Burton. Source page 600, r: "Fab. Calvo. Ravennate interprete." "With Fabio Calvo of Ravenna as translator."

[11489] Editor. Burton himself questions the authenticity of these letters attributed to Hippocrates. The letter to Dionysius and Fabio Calvo's exact Latin text await direct collation; they are not treated as verified biographical evidence. Apollo and Coronis provide a mythological parallel involving a watchful raven.

[11490] Burton. Source page 600, s: "Dum rediero domum meam habitabis, & licet cum parentibus habitet hac mea peregrinatione; eam tamen & ejus mores observabis ut absentia viri sui probe degat, nec alios viros cogitet aut quærat." "Until I return, you will live in my house; although she lives with her parents during my travels, you will nevertheless watch her and her conduct, so that she lives virtuously in her husband's absence and neither thinks of nor seeks other men."

[11491] Burton. Source page 600, t: "Fœmina semper custode eget qui se pudicam contineat; suapte enim natura nequitias insitas habet, quas nisi indies comprimat, ut arbores stolones emittunt, &c." "A woman always needs a guardian to keep her chaste; for by her very nature she has innate wicked tendencies, which, unless he restrains them daily, put out shoots like trees, etc."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Especially in their husbands absence: though one Lucretia were trusty, and one Penelope, yet Clytemnestra made Agamemnon cuckold; and no question there be too many of her conditions. If their husbands tarry too long abroad upon unnecessary business, well they may suspect: or if they run one way, their wives at home will flie out another, Quid pro quo.	Especially in their husbands' absence: though one Lucretia and one Penelope were faithful, Clytemnestra made Agamemnon a cuckold, and undoubtedly too many women are like her. If their husbands stay away too long on unnecessary business, they have good reason to suspect them; or if the men run off one way, their wives at home will stray another: "one thing in return for another."[11492]
Or if present, and give them not that content which they ought, [11493]Primum ingratæ, mox invisæ noctes quæ per somnum transiguntur, they cannot endure to lie alone, or to fast long.	Or if they are present but do not give them the satisfaction they should: "Nights spent asleep are first unwelcome, then detested." They cannot endure sleeping alone or abstaining for long.
[11494]Peter Godefridus in his second book of love, and sixt chapter, hath a story out of S. Anthonies life, of a Gentleman, who by that good mans advise, would not meddle with his wife in the passion week; but for his pains she set a pair of horns on his head.	Peter Godefridus, in book 2, chapter 6 of his work on love, has a story from the life of St Anthony about a gentleman who, on that good man's advice, would not have intercourse with his wife during Passion Week; but for his pains she put a pair of horns on his head.[11495]

[11492] Editor. Lucretia and Penelope are conventional examples of marital fidelity; Clytemnestra takes Aegisthus as her lover while Agamemnon is away at Troy. Quid pro quo here has the retaliatory sense "one thing for another."

[11493] Burton. Source page 600, u: "Heinsius."

[11494] Burton. Source page 600, x: "Uxor cujusdam nobilis quum debitum maritale sacro passionis hebdomada non obtineret, alterum adiit." "A certain nobleman's wife, when she did not receive the marital due in the holy week of the Passion, went to another man."

[11495] Editor. The "marital due" is sexual intercourse. The printed Passion Week and the marginal "holy week of the Passion" are retained without silently replacing the date with a modern calendar designation. The precise Godefridus work and which St Anthony is intended remain unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Such another he hath out of Abstemius, one perswaded a new married man, [11496]to forbear the three first nights, and he should all his life time after be fortunate in cattle, but his impatient wife would not tarry so long: well he might speed in cattle, but not in children.	He has another such story from Abstemius. Someone persuaded a newly married man to abstain for the first three nights, promising that he would then prosper in livestock for the rest of his life. But his impatient wife would not wait so long: he might do well with his cattle, but not with his children.[11497]
Such a tale hath Heinsius of an impotent and slack scholler, a meer student, and a friend of his, that seeing by chance a fine damsel sing and dance, would needs marry her, the match was soon made, for he was young and rich, genis gratus, corpore glabellus, arte multiscius, & fortuna opulentus, like that Apollo in [11498] [11499]Apuleius.	Heinsius tells a similar story about an impotent, listless scholar, wholly absorbed in his studies, who was a friend of his. Happening to see a beautiful girl singing and dancing, he insisted on marrying her. The match was soon made, for he was young and rich, "handsome in the face, smooth in body, skilled in many arts and wealthy in fortune," like Apollo in Apuleius.[11500]

[11496] Burton. Source page 600, y: "Ne tribus prioribus noctibus rem haberet cum ea, ut esset in pecoribus fortunatus, ab uxore moræ impatiente, &c." "That he should not have intercourse with her for the first three nights, so that he might prosper in livestock; by his wife, impatient of delay, etc."

[11497] Editor. Abstemius is Laurentius Abstemius (Lorenzo Bevilacqua), a writer of Latin fables. The joke contrasts prosperity in livestock with uncertainty about the paternity of children. The exact fable and Godefridus's intermediary text remain to be checked.

[11498] Burton. Source page 600, *: "Totam noctem bene & pudice nemini molestus dormiendo transegit; mane autem quum nullius conscius facinoris sibi esset, & inertiæ puderet, audisse se dicebat cum dolore calculi solere eam conflictari. Duo præcepta juris unâ nocte expressit, neminem læserat & honeste vixerat, sed an suum cuique reddidisset, quæri poterat. Mutius opinor & Trebatius hoc negassent." "He passed the whole night sleeping well and chastely, troubling nobody. In the morning, conscious of no wrongdoing but ashamed of his inactivity, he said he had heard that she often suffered from the pain of the stone. He had fulfilled two precepts of law in one night: he had harmed no one and lived honestly. But whether he had given each their due was open to question. Mucius and Trebatius, I think, would have denied it."

[11499] Burton. Source page 600, unmarked at the foot of the page: "lib.1." "Book 1."

[11500] Editor. The Apollo description is Apuleius, Florida 3: genis gratus means pleasing in the cheeks or face, not "generous in spirit." The long starred note printed beside Apuleius instead expands the scholar anecdote and repeats the three-precept legal joke; the separate lib.1. at the bottom of the page is also retained. Its attachment is uncertain, and Florida 3 does not justify silently treating it as a correct Apuleius citation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The first night, having liberally taken his liquor (as in that countrey they do) my fine scholler was so fuddled, that he no sooner was laid in bed, but he fell fast asleep, never waked till morning, and then much abashed, purpureis formosa rosis cum Aurora ruberet, when the fair morn with purple hew gan shine, he made an excuse, I know not what, out of Hippocrates Cous, &c. and for that time it went currant;	On the first night, having drunk freely, as people in that country do, my fine scholar was so befuddled that he fell fast asleep as soon as he was put to bed and never woke until morning. Then, greatly embarrassed, "when lovely Dawn blushed with purple roses"—when the fair morning began to shine with a purple hue—he made some excuse, I know not what, from Hippocrates of Cos and so forth, and for that occasion it passed muster.[11501]
Source page 600–601 but when as afterward he did not play the man as he should do, she fell in league with a good fellow, and whilst he sate up late at his study about those Criticisms, mending some hard places in Festus or Pollux, came cold to bed, and would tell her still what he had done, she did not much regard what he said, &c.	But when he afterwards failed to perform as a man should, she took up with a lively fellow. While he sat up late at his textual criticism, correcting difficult passages in Festus or Pollux, then came cold to bed and kept telling her what he had accomplished, she paid little attention to what he said, and so on.[11502]
Source page 601 [11503]She would have another matter mended much rather, which he did not perceive was corrupt: thus he continued at his study late, she at her sport, alibi enim festivus noctes agitabat, hating all schollers for his sake, till at length he began to suspect, and turned a little yellow, as well he might; for it was his own fault;	"She would much rather have had another passage put right, which he did not recognize as corrupt." So he stayed late at his studies, and she at her pleasures—"for elsewhere the merry fellow was spending his nights"—hating all scholars because of him. At last he began to suspect something and turned a little yellow, as well he might: it was his own fault.[11504]

[11501] Editor. Hippocrates Cous means Hippocrates of Cos. "Went current" means was accepted, like valid coin. The Latin dawn phrase is translated separately from Burton's English gloss; its exact source and the Heinsius anecdote remain unresolved. The marginal excuse alleges that the wife suffered from urinary-stone pain.

[11502] Editor. Festus and Pollux compiled lexical works in Latin and Greek respectively. "Criticisms" means textual scholarship: identifying and repairing difficult or corrupt readings. This prepares the sexual pun on a neglected "passage" in the next unit.

[11503] Burton. Source page 601, a: "Alterius loci emendationem serio optabat, quem corruptum esse ille non invenit." "She earnestly wanted another passage corrected, which he did not discover to be corrupt."

[11504] Editor. The Latin has masculine festivus, literally "the merry fellow"; the rendering understands the lover, although Burton's surrounding English follows the wife. The wording needs collation with the Heinsius source. Yellow is a conventional colour of jealousy. "The mends" in the next unit means the remedy or means of putting matters right.

Original text 1651	Modern English
and if men be jealous in such cases ([11505]as oft it falls out) the mends is in their own hands, they must thank themselves. Who will pitie them, saith Neander, or be much offended with such wives, si deceptæ prius viros decipiant, & cornutos reddant, if they deceive those that cozened them first?	If men become jealous in such cases, as often happens, the remedy is in their own hands: they have only themselves to thank. Who will pity them, says Neander, or be very angry with such wives, "if, having first been deceived, they deceive their husbands and make them cuckolds"—if they deceive those who cheated them first?
A Lawyers wife in [11506]Aristænetus, because her husband was negligent in his business, quando lecto danda opera, threatned to cornute him: and did not stick to tell Philinna one of her gossips as much, and that aloud for him to hear: if he follow other mens matters and leave his own, I'le have an Orator shall plead my cause, I care not if he know it.	A lawyer's wife in Aristaenetus threatened to make him a cuckold because he neglected his business "when attention should be given to bed." She did not hesitate to tell Philinna, one of her women friends, as much—and loudly enough for him to hear: "If he pursues other men's affairs and leaves his own unattended, I shall have an advocate to plead my case. I do not care whether he knows it."[11507]
A fourth eminent cause of jealousie, may be this, when he that is deformed, and as Pindarus of Vulcan, sine gratiis natus, hirsute, ragged, yet vertuously given, will marry some fair nice peece, or light huswife, begins to misdoubt (as well he may) she doth not affect him.	A fourth major cause of jealousy may be this: when a man who is misshapen and, as Pindar says of Vulcan, "born without the Graces," shaggy and rough, though virtuous in character, marries some beautiful, fastidious creature or flighty woman, he begins to suspect, as well he may, that she does not love him.[11508]

[11505] Burton. Source page 601, b: "Such another tale is in Neander de Joco-seriis his first tale."

[11506] Burton. Source page 601, *: "Lib.2.Ep.3. Si pergit alienis negotiis operam dare sui negligens, erit alius mihi orator qui rem meam agat." "Book 2, letter 3. If he goes on attending to other people's business while neglecting his own, I shall have another advocate to handle my affairs."

[11507] Editor. Aristaenetus, Erotic Letters 2.3, is the citation given in the margin. The legal vocabulary—business, advocate, pleading—carries sexual double meanings. "Gossip" here means a familiar woman friend, not necessarily a person spreading rumours. The Greek text has not been directly collated for this block.

[11508] Editor. The Graces personify charm and beauty; Vulcan is the divine smith, conventionally represented as lame. The exact Pindar attribution is unresolved. "Nice" here means fastidious or dainty; "light" implies sexual inconstancy.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11509]Lis est cum forma magna pudicitiæ, Beautie and honesty have ever been at oddes. Abraham was jealous of his wife because she was fair: so was Vulcan of his Venus, when he made her creeking shooes, saith [11510]Philostratus, ne mœcharetur, sandalio scilicet deferente, That he might hear by them when she stirred, which Mars indignè ferre, [11511]was not well pleased with.	"Chastity has a great quarrel with beauty": beauty and chastity have always been at odds. Abraham was jealous over his wife because she was beautiful; so was Vulcan over his Venus when, as Philostratus says, he made her creaking shoes "to prevent her committing adultery, the sandal informing against her"—so that he could hear whenever she moved. Mars "took offence at this": he was not at all pleased.[11512]
Good cause had Vulcan to do as he did, for she was no honester then she should be. Your fine faces have commonly this fault, and it is hard to finde, saith Francis Philelphus in an epistle to Saxola his friend, a rich man honest, a proper woman not proud or unchast. Can she be fair and honest too?	Vulcan had good reason to act as he did, for she was none too chaste. Your pretty faces commonly have this fault, and it is hard to find, says Francesco Filelfo in a letter to his friend Saxola, an honest rich man or a handsome woman who is neither proud nor unchaste. "Can she be beautiful and chaste as well?"[11513]
[11514]Sæpe etenim occuluit pictâ sese Hydra sub herbâ, Sub specie formæ, incauto se sæpe marito Nequam animus vendit,——	For often a serpent has hidden itself beneath bright grass; Under the appearance of beauty, to an unwary husband A wicked soul often sells itself.[11515]

[11509] Burton. Source page 601, c: "Ovid. rara est concordia formæ atque pudicitiæ." "Ovid. Rare is the agreement of beauty and chastity."

[11510] Burton. Source page 601, †: "Epist." "Letters."

[11511] Burton. Source page 601, *: "Quod strideret ejus calceamentum." "Because her footwear creaked."

[11512] Editor. The body quotes Ovid, Heroides 16.288; the Ovid-labelled margin actually quotes Juvenal 10.297–298. Abraham recalls Genesis 12:11–13. Philostratus, Letter 37, says Venus's noisy sandal betrayed her adultery to Vulcan, in praise of bare feet. It does not say Vulcan made the shoes for surveillance or mention Mars's complaint. Burton's Latin intermediary remains untraced; Mars is Venus's lover.

[11513] Editor. Francesco Filelfo is the Italian humanist Latinized as Philelphus. The letter to Saxola and the unattributed English question await direct collation. "Proper" means handsome; "honest" here means chaste.

[11514] Burton. Source page 601, †: "Hor. epist.15." "Horace, letter 15."

[11515] Editor. The margin cites Horace, letter 15, but these lines do not occur in Epistles 1.15 in the checked Latin text. The attribution is left unresolved. Hydra can mean a water snake as well as the mythological monster; "serpent" preserves the hidden-danger image without forcing the many-headed Hydra into it.

Original text 1651	Modern English
He that marries a wife that is snowt fair alone, let him look saith [11516]Barbarus for no better successe than Vulcan had with Venus, or Claudius with Messalina.	A man who marries a wife for her facial beauty alone should expect, says Barbaro, no better success than Vulcan had with Venus or Claudius with Messalina.[11517]
And 'tis impossible almost in such cases the wife should contain, or the good man not be jealous: for when he is so defective, weak, ill proportioned, unpleasing in those parts which women most affect, and she most absolutely fair and able on the other side, if she be not very vertuously given, how can she love him?	In such cases it is almost impossible for the wife to restrain herself or for her husband not to be jealous. When he is so deficient, weak, ill-proportioned and unattractive in the qualities women most desire, while she, on the other hand, is perfectly beautiful and vigorous, how can she love him unless she is exceptionally virtuous?
and although she be not fair, yet if he admire her and think her so, in his conceit she is absolute, he holds it impossible for any man living not to dote as he doth, to look on her and not lust, not to covet, and if he be in company with her, not to lay seige to her honestie:	Even if she is not beautiful, if he admires her and thinks she is, she is perfect in his imagination. He believes it impossible for any man alive not to dote on her as he does—to look at her without lusting or coveting, or to be in her company without laying siege to her chastity.
or else out of a deep apprehension of his infirmities, deformities, and other mens good parts, out of his own little worth and desert, he distrusts himself, (for what is jealousie but distrust?) he suspects she cannot affect him, or be not so kinde and loving as she should, she certainly loves some other man better then himself.	Or else, intensely aware of his own weaknesses and deformities and other men's good qualities, conscious of his own small worth and merit, he distrusts himself—for what is jealousy but distrust? He suspects that she cannot love him, or is not as kind and loving as she should be: she must certainly love some other man better than him.

[11516] Burton. Source page 601, d: "De re uxoria lib.1.cap.5." "On Marriage, book 1, chapter 5."

[11517] Editor. The scan reads "snowt fair": snout-fair, handsome in the face. It does not mean snow-white. Francesco Barbaro's On Marriage 1.5 is the marginal reference. Claudius and his wife Messalina provide the Roman counterpart to the myth of Vulcan and Venus; Burton uses their marriages as exempla.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 602 [11518]Nevisanus lib.4.num.72. Will have barrenness to be a main cause of Jealousie. If her husband cannot play the man, some other shall, they will leave no remedies unassayed, and thereupon the good man growes jealous, I could give an instance, but be it as it is.	Nevizzano, in book 4, paragraph 72, makes barrenness a principal cause of jealousy. If her husband cannot perform as a man, someone else shall; they will leave no remedy untried, and thereupon the husband grows jealous. I could give an example, but let it stand as it is.[11519]
I finde this reason given by some men, because they have been formerly naught themselves, they think they may be so served by others, they turned up trumpe, before the Cards were shuffled; they shall have therefore legem talionis, like for like.	Some men give this reason: because they have previously been unfaithful themselves, they think others may treat them in the same way. They turned up trumps before the cards were shuffled; therefore they shall receive "the law of retaliation," like for like.[11520]
[11521]Ipse miser docui, quo posset ludere pacto Custodes, eheu nunc premor arte meâ!	Wretched that I am, I myself taught her how to deceive Her guards; alas, now my own skill is turned against me![11522]
Wretch as I was, I taught her bad to be, And now mine own sly tricks are put upon me.	Wretch that I was, I taught her to be false, And now my own sly tricks are played on me.
Mala mens, malus animus, as the saying is, ill dispositions cause ill suspitions.	"A bad mind, a bad disposition," as the saying goes: bad dispositions breed bad suspicions.

[11518] Burton. Source page 602, e: "Cum steriles sunt, ex mutatione viri se putant concipere." "When they are barren, they think they will conceive by changing the man."

[11519] Editor. "Play the man" means perform sexually; "barrenness" is inability to conceive. The passage reports Burton's historical assumptions about marriage and fertility. It is not a modern account of infertility.

[11520] Editor. Nevizzano is Giovanni Nevizzano, whose Sylva nuptialis supplies marriage lore throughout this discussion. The card image suggests taking the advantage prematurely; the retaliatory maxim frames suspicion as projection of one's own behaviour.

[11521] Burton. Source page 602, f: "Tibullus eleg.6." "Tibullus, elegy 6."

[11522] Editor. Tibullus 1.6.9–10: the speaker taught Delia to deceive her guards and is now deceived himself. Burton prints eheu for the checked text's heu heu. His following English couplet is a separate, freer rendering; both are retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11523]There is none jealous I durst pawne my life, But he that hath defil'd anothers wife, And for that he himself hath gone astray, He straightway thinks his wife will tread that way.	I would stake my life that no man is jealous Except one who has defiled another's wife; And because he himself has gone astray, He immediately thinks his wife will take that path.[11524]
To these two above named causes, or incendiaries of this rage, I may very well annex those circumstances of time, place, persons, by which it ebbes and flowes, the fewell of this furie, as [11525]Vives truely observes; and such like accidents or occasions, proceeding from the parties themselves, or others, which much aggravate and intend this suspitious humour.	To these two causes just named, or kindlers of this rage, I may well add the circumstances of time, place and people through which it ebbs and flows—the fuel of this fury, as Vives rightly observes—and similar accidents or occasions, arising from the partners themselves or from others, which greatly aggravate and intensify this suspicious disposition.
For many men are so lasciviously given, either out of a depraved nature, or too much liberty, which they do assume unto themselves, by reason of their greatness, in that they are noble men, (for licentia peccandi, & multitudo peccantium are great motives) though their own wives be never so fair, noble, vertuous, honest, wise, able and well given, they must have change.	For many men are so lustfully inclined, either through a depraved nature or through the excessive freedom they claim because of their greatness as noblemen—for "licence to sin, and the multitude of sinners" are powerful inducements—that however beautiful, noble, virtuous, chaste, wise, vigorous and well-disposed their own wives may be, they must have a change.
[11526]Qui cum legitimi junguntur fœdere lecti, Virtute egregiis, facieq; domoq; puellis, Scorta tamen, fœdasq; lupas in fornice quærunt, Et per adulterium nova carpere gaudia tentant.	Though bound by the covenant of lawful marriage To women distinguished in virtue, beauty and family, They still seek prostitutes and filthy whores in brothels, And try to pluck new pleasures through adultery.[11527]

[11523] Burton. Source page 602, g: "Wither's Sat." "Wither's satires."

[11524] Editor. The margin attributes the quatrain to George Wither's satires; its precise location remains to be collated. The verse makes a sweeping satirical claim, not a distinction Burton consistently maintains in the examples that follow.

[11525] Burton. Source page 602, h: "3. de Anima. Crescit ac decrescit zelotypia cum personis, locis, temporibus, negotiis." "On the Soul, book 3. Jealousy increases and decreases with people, places, times and affairs."

[11526] Burton. Source page 602, i: "Marullus."

[11527] Editor. Marullus is the name supplied by the margin; the precise poem has not been established. The Latin's four lines and Burton's compressed two-line English version are separately translated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Who being match'd to wives most vertuous, Noble, and fair, fly out lascivious.	Though married to wives most virtuous, Noble and beautiful, they stray in lust.
Quod licet ingratum est, that which is ordinary, is unpleasant. Nero (saith Tacitus) abhorred Octavia his own wife, a noble vertuous Lady, and loved Acte a base queane in respect. [11528]Cerinthus rejected Sulpitia, a noble mans daughter, and courted a poor servant maid.	"What is permitted is unwelcome": what is commonplace is displeasing. Nero, says Tacitus, detested his own wife Octavia, a noble and virtuous lady, and loved Acte, by comparison a lowly woman. Cerinthus rejected Sulpicia, a nobleman's daughter, and courted a poor servant girl.[11529]
——tanta est alienâ in messe voluptas,	So great is the pleasure in another person's harvest,[11530]
for that [11531]stolne waters be more pleasant: or as Vitellius the Emperour was wont to say, Jucundiores amores, qui cum periculo habentur, like stolne Venison, still the sweetest is that love, which is most difficultly attained: they like better to hunt by stealth in another mans walk, then to have the fairest course that may be at game of their own.	for "stolen waters are more pleasant"; or, as the emperor Vitellius used to say, "The more delightful loves are those pursued with danger." Like stolen venison, the sweetest love is always that which is hardest to obtain. They prefer to hunt secretly in another man's grounds rather than enjoy the finest possible chase after game of their own.[11532]
[11533]Aspice ut in cœlo modò sol, modò luna ministret, Sic etiam nobis una puella parum est.	See how in heaven now the sun, now the moon performs its office; So too, for us one woman is not enough.[11534]

[11528] Burton. Source page 602, dagger: "Tibullus Epig." "Tibullus, epigram."

[11529] Editor. The Sulpicia poem is preserved in the Tibullan collection, 3.16.3–4, also numbered 4.10. It contrasts Servius's daughter Sulpicia with a lower-status rival. "Tibullus" in the margin identifies the collection, not necessarily the author. The Nero and Acte passage still requires collation with Tacitus.

[11530] Editor. An agricultural metaphor for pleasure sought with another man's partner. The line is retained as a separate quotation; its precise source remains to be verified.

[11531] Burton. Source page 602, k: "Prov.9.17." "Proverbs 9:17."

[11532] Editor. A "walk" is a hunting ground and a "course" a pursuit of game. Burton extends the stolen-water proverb into a poaching metaphor. The saying assigned to Vitellius is not independently verified here.

[11533] Burton. Source page 602, l: "Propert. eleg.2." "Propertius, elegy 2."

[11534] Editor. Propertius 2.22a.35–36, with Burton's wording Aspice ut in cœlo rather than the checked aspice uti caelo. The margin's abbreviated eleg.2. is preserved. Burton's English adds the judgment "often to the worse."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 603 As Sun and Moon in Heaven change their course, So they change loves, though often to the worse.	As sun and moon in heaven change their course, So they change lovers, though often for the worse.
Or that some fair object so forcibly moves them, they cannot contain themselves, be it heard or seen they will be at it. [11535]Nessus the Centaure, was by agreement to carry Hercules and his wife over the river Evenus; no sooner had he set Dianira on the other side, but he would have offered violence unto her, leaving Hercules to swim over as he could: and though her husband was a spectator, yet would he not desist till Hercules with a poysoned arrow shot him to death.	Or some beautiful object moves them so powerfully that they cannot restrain themselves: whether they hear of it or see it, they will pursue it. Nessus the centaur had agreed to carry Hercules and his wife across the river Evenus. No sooner had he set Deianira on the other side than he tried to rape her, leaving Hercules to swim across as best he could. Although her husband was watching, he would not stop until Hercules shot him dead with a poisoned arrow.[11536]
[11537]Neptune saw by chance that Thessalian Tyro, Eunippius wife, he forthwith in the fury of his lust, counterfeited her husbands habit, and made him cuckold. Tarquin heard Collatine commend his wife, and was so far enraged, that in midst of the night to her he went. [11538]Theseus stole Ariadne, vi rapuit that Trœzeniam Anaxa, Antiope, and now being old, Helena a girle not yet ready for an husband.	Neptune happened to see Tyro of Thessaly, Eunippius's wife, and immediately, in the frenzy of his lust, assumed her husband's appearance and made him a cuckold. Tarquin heard Collatinus praise his wife, and was so inflamed that he went to her in the middle of the night. Theseus abducted Ariadne, "carried off by force" that Anaxa of Troezen, Antiope, and, when he was already old, Helen, a girl not yet ready for marriage.[11539]

[11535] Burton. Source page 603, star: "Ovid lib.9. Met. Pausanias Strabo, quum crevit imbribus hyemalibus. Dianeiram suscipit, Herculem nando sequi jubet." "Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 9; Pausanias; Strabo. When it swelled with winter rains, he took Deianira up and told Hercules to follow by swimming."

[11536] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 9.101–133, describes Nessus carrying Deianira while Hercules swims. Burton's opening agreement to carry both is broader than that account. The references to Pausanias and Strabo remain uncollated.

[11537] Burton. Source page 603, dagger: "Lucian tom.4." "Lucian, volume 4."

[11538] Burton. Source page 603, dagger: "Plutarch."

[11539] Editor. The forms Eunippius and Trœzeniam Anaxa are retained from the print; the Tyro narrative and the list attributed to Plutarch require direct collation. "Vi rapuit" means seizure by force, not consensual elopement. Burton similarly abbreviates the Tarquin narrative.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Great men are most part thus affected all, as an horse they neigh, saith [11540]Jeremiah, after their neighbours wives,	Great men are, for the most part, all disposed this way: like horses they neigh, says Jeremiah, after their neighbours' wives,
——ut visâ pullus adhinnit equâ:	As a colt neighs at the sight of a mare.
And if they be in company with other women, though in their own wives presence, they must be courting and dallying with them. Juno in Lucian complains of Jupiter that he was still kissing Ganymede before her face, which did not a little offend her: And besides he was a counterfeit Amphitryo, a bull, a swan, a golden shower, and plaid many such bad pranks, too long, too shamefull to relate.	And if they are in company with other women, even in their own wives' presence, they must court and flirt with them. In Lucian, Juno complains that Jupiter kept kissing Ganymede before her very face, which offended her greatly. Besides, he impersonated Amphitryon, became a bull, a swan and a golden shower, and played many such wicked tricks, too lengthy and too shameful to relate.[11541]
Or that they care little for their own Ladies, and fear no Lawes, they dare freely keep whores at their wives noses. 'Tis too frequent with noble men to be dishonest; Pietas, probitas, fides, privata bona sunt, as [11542]he said long since, piety, chastity, and such like vertues are for private men: not to be much looked after in great Courts:	Or they care little for their own ladies and fear no laws, daring openly to keep prostitutes under their wives' noses. Unchastity is all too common among noblemen. "Piety, integrity and fidelity are private virtues," as someone said long ago: piety, chastity and similar virtues are for private men, and are scarcely to be sought in great courts.[11543]
And which Suetonius of the good Princes of his time, they might be all engraven in one ring, we may truely hold of chast potentates of our age. For great personages will familiarly run out in this kinde, and yield occasion of offence.	And what Suetonius said of the good princes of his time—that they could all be engraved on a single ring—we may truly say of the chaste rulers of our age. For great personages commonly go astray in this way and give cause for offence.[11544]

[11540] Burton. Source page 603, m: "Cap.5.8." "Chapter 5, verse 8."

[11541] Editor. These are mythological transformations and impersonations used in Jupiter's sexual encounters. Ganymede is the youth brought to Olympus. Burton's precise Lucian passage remains to be collated.

[11542] Burton. Source page 603, n: "Seneca."

[11543] Editor. Seneca, Thyestes 217–218, puts a related assertion into the mouth of the tyrant Atreus: sanctitas pietas fides. Burton substitutes pietas, probitas, fides. It is dramatic characterization, not an uncomplicated statement of Seneca's own ethics; Burton's subsequent English paraphrase is also retained.

[11544] Editor. The ring image means that good rulers are few enough to be represented on one small object. The attribution to Suetonius has not been located and is left unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11545]Montaigne in his essayes, gives instance in Cæsar, Mahomet the Turk, that sacked Constantinople, and Ladislaus King of Naples, that besieged Florence: great men, and great souldiers, are commonly great &c. probatum est, they are good doers. Mars and Venus are equally ballanced in their actions,	Montaigne, in his Essays, gives examples in Caesar, Mehmed the Turk, who sacked Constantinople, and Ladislaus, king of Naples, who besieged Florence. Great men and great soldiers are commonly great—and so forth. "It is proved": they are good performers. Mars and Venus are evenly matched in their activities,[11546]
[11547]Militis in galea nidum fecêre columbæ, Apparet Marti quam sit amica Venus.	Doves have made their nest in a soldier's helmet; It is clear how friendly Venus is with Mars.
A dove within a head-piece made her nest, 'Twixt Mars and Venus see an interest.	A dove made her nest inside a helmet: See the bond between Mars and Venus.
Especially if they be bald, for bald men have ever been suspicious (read more in Aristotle Sect.4. prob.19.) as Galba, Otho, Domitian, and remarkable Cæsar amongst the rest. [11548]Urbani servate uxores, mœchum calvum adducimus;	Especially if they are bald, for bald men have always been suspect—read more in Aristotle, section 4, problem 19—such as Galba, Otho, Domitian and, conspicuous among them, Caesar. "Citizens, guard your wives: we are bringing home the bald adulterer."[11549]

[11545] Burton. Source page 603, o: "Lib.2.cap.23." "Book 2, chapter 23."

[11546] Editor. The margin cites Montaigne, Essays 2.23. "Great &c." and "good doers" are sexual innuendo. Mars and Venus stand for warfare and love; the following epigram associates Venus's doves with a soldier's helmet. Burton attributes it to the poems collected under Petronius.

[11547] Burton. Source page 603, dagger: "Petronius Catal." "Petronius, Catalecta."

[11548] Burton. Source page 603, star: "Sueton." "Suetonius."

[11549] Editor. "Suspicious" here means open to suspicion, as the examples and soldiers' taunt indicate. Suetonius, Julius 51, supplies the bald-adulterer verse. The Aristotelian reference and the larger physiognomic generalization remain unverified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 603–604 besides, this bald Cæsar, saith Curio in Sueton, was omnium mulierum vir; he made love to Eunoe Queen of Mauritania, to Cleopatra, to Posthumia wife to Sergius Sulpitius, to Lollia wife to Gabinius, to Tertulla of Crassus, and to Mutia Pompey's wife, and I know not how many besides: And well he might, for if all be true that I have read, he had a licence to lye with whom he list.	Besides, this bald Caesar, says Curio in Suetonius, was "every woman's husband." He made love to Eunoë, queen of Mauretania; Cleopatra; Postumia, wife of Sergius Sulpitius; Lollia, wife of Gabinius; Tertulla, wife of Crassus; Mucia, Pompey's wife; and I do not know how many others. And well he might, for if everything I have read is true, he had a licence to sleep with whomever he pleased.[11550]
Source page 604 Inter alios honores Cæsari decretos (as Sueton.cap.52. de Julio, and Dion lib.44. relate) jus illi datum, cum quibuscunque fœminis se jungendi. Every private History will yield such variety of Instances: Otherwise good, wise, discreet men, vertuous and valiant, but too faulty in this.	"Among the other honours decreed to Caesar," as Suetonius, chapter 52 of Julius, and Dio, book 44, relate, "he was granted the right to unite himself with any women whatsoever." Every particular history will supply a variety of such examples: men otherwise good, wise, prudent, virtuous and brave, but all too culpable in this.[11551]

[11550] Editor. Suetonius, Julius 50–52, supplies the affairs and Curio's taunt. His text names Servius Sulpicius, where Burton prints Sergius Sulpitius. Curio's longer phrase also accuses Caesar of relations with men; Burton quotes only its first half, which is preserved as such.

[11551] Editor. Suetonius, Julius 52, reports Cinna's claim to have prepared a law allowing Caesar multiple marriages for procreation. Dio 44.7.3, compared in English, instead records a suggestion of unrestricted sexual access among extravagant honours proposed for Caesar. Neither passage by itself establishes Burton's assertion that such a licence was already granted. His source versions remain unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Priamus had fifty sons, but seventeen alone lawfully begotten. [11552]Philippus bonus left fourteen bastards. Laurence Medices a good Prince and a wise, but, saith [11553]Machiavel, prodigiously lascivious. None so valiant as Castruccius Castrucanus, but as the said author hath it, [11554]none so incontinent as he was.	Priam had fifty sons, but only seventeen were lawfully begotten. Philip the Good left fourteen illegitimate children. Lorenzo de' Medici was a good and wise prince, but, says Machiavelli, monstrously lustful. No one was as brave as Castruccio Castracani; yet, according to the same author, no one was as sexually unrestrained.[11555]
And 'tis not only predominant in Grandies this fault: but if you will take a great mans testimony, 'tis familiar with every base souldier in France, (and elsewhere I think) This vice ([11556]saith mine Author) is so common with us in France, that he is of no accompt, a meer coward, not worthy the name of a souldier, that is not a notorious whoremaster. In Italy he is not a gentleman, that besides his wife hath not a Courtesan and a mistress.	Nor does this fault prevail only among the great: if you accept a great man's testimony, it is familiar to every common soldier in France, and elsewhere too, I think. "This vice," says my author, "is so common among us in France that a man who is not a notorious whoremonger is held of no account, a mere coward, unworthy of the name of soldier." In Italy, a man is no gentleman unless, besides his wife, he has a courtesan and a mistress.[11557]

[11552] Burton. Source page 604, p: "Pontus Heuter vita ejus." "Pontus Heuterus, his life."

[11553] Burton. Source page 604, q: "Lib.8. Flor. hist. Dux omnium optimus & sapientissimus, sed in in re venereâ prodigiosus." "Florentine History, book 8. The best and wisest leader of all, but monstrous in sexual matters."

[11554] Burton. Source page 604, r: "Vita Castruccii. Idem uxores maritis abalienavit." "Life of Castruccio. The same man alienated wives from their husbands."

[11555] Editor. The named rulers are Philip the Good of Burgundy, Lorenzo de' Medici and Castruccio Castracani. These numerical and sexual claims are reproduced as Burton's reported examples, not independently verified biographies. The Machiavelli marginal quotation repeats in in; the repetition is preserved and translated once.

[11556] Burton. Source page 604, star: "Sesellius lib.2 de repub. Gallorum. Ita nunc apud infimos obtinuit hoc vitium, ut ut nullius ferè pretii sit, & ignavus miles qui non in scortatione maximè excellat, & adulterio." "Seyssel, On the Commonwealth of the French, book 2. This vice now so prevails among the lowest ranks that a soldier who does not excel in whoring and adultery is held almost worthless and cowardly."

[11557] Editor. "Base" means low-ranking, not necessarily morally corrupt. The margin cites Claude de Seyssel and repeats ut. Burton's national and gender generalizations belong to his historical polemic; later he allows that either partner may be wholly innocent.

Original text 1651	Modern English
'Tis no marvail then, if poor women in such cases be jealous, when they shall see themselves manifestly neglected, contemned, loathed, unkindly used: their disloyal husbands to entertain others in their rooms, and many times to court Ladies to their faces: other mens wives to wear their jewels: how shall a poor woman in such a case moderate her passion?	It is no wonder, then, that poor women are jealous in such circumstances, when they see themselves openly neglected, despised, loathed and mistreated; their unfaithful husbands entertaining others in their place, often courting ladies before their faces; other men's wives wearing their jewels. How can a poor woman in such a situation moderate her passion?
[11558]Quis tibi nunc Dido cernenti talia sensus?	What do you feel now, Dido, as you witness such things?[11559]
How on the other side shall a poor man contain himself from this feral malady, when he shall see so manifest signes of his wives inconstancy? when as like Milo's wife, she dotes upon every young man she sees, or as [11560]Martials Sota, —— deserto sequitur Clitum marito.	On the other hand, how can a poor man keep himself from this deadly malady when he sees such obvious signs of his wife's inconstancy? When, like Milo's wife, she dotes on every young man she sees, or, like Martial's Sota, "abandons her husband and follows Clitus."[11561]
Though her husband be proper and tall, fair and lovely to behold, able to give contentment to any one woman, yet she will taste of the forbidden fruit: Juvenal's Iberina to an hair, she is as well pleased with one eye, as one man.	Although her husband is handsome and tall, fair and lovely to behold, able to satisfy any one woman, she will still taste the forbidden fruit. She is Juvenal's Iberina to the very hair: she is as content with one eye as with one man.[11562]

[11558] Burton. Source page 604, dagger: "Virg. Æn.4." "Virgil, Aeneid 4."

[11559] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.408. The checked text has tum, "then," while Burton has nunc, "now"; the modern rendering follows Burton. Dido watches preparations for Aeneas's departure.

[11560] Burton. Source page 604, star: "Epig.9.lib.4." "Epigram 9, book 4."

[11561] Editor. Martial 4.9 addresses Labulla, daughter of Sota, who follows Clytus after abandoning her husband. Burton calls the woman Sota and changes the quotation into the third person. His wording is retained and translated; the Milo reference is unresolved.

[11562] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.53–54, names Hiberina in the checked text. "To an hair" means exactly. The comparison says that one husband satisfies her no more than having only one eye would.

Original text 1651	Modern English
If a young gallant come by chance into her presence, a Fastidious Brisk, that can wear his cloaths well in fashion, with a lock, gingling spur, a feather, that can cringe, and withal complement, court a Gentlewoman, she raves upon him, O what a lovely proper man he was, another Hector, an Alexander, a goodly man, a demi-god, how sweetly he carried himself, with how comely a grace, sic oculos, sic ille manus, sic ora ferebat, how neatly he did wear his cloaths!	If a young gallant happens to enter her presence —a Fastidious Brisk who can dress fashionably, with a lovelock, jingling spur and feather, who can bow and pay compliments and court a gentlewoman—she raves about him: "Oh, what a lovely, handsome man he was!" Another Hector, an Alexander, a splendid man, a demigod! How charmingly he bore himself, with what graceful dignity: "That was how he moved his eyes, his hands, his face." How elegantly he wore his clothes![11563]
[11564]Quam sese ore ferens, quam forti pectore & armis,	How noble his bearing, how brave his heart and arms![11565]
how bravely did he discourse, ride, sing and dance, &c. and then she begins to loath her husband, repugnans osculatur, to hate him and his filthy beard, his goatish complexion, as Doris said of Polyphemus, [11566]Totus qui saniem, totus ut hircus olet, he is a rammy fulsome fellow, a goblin faced fellow, he smels, he stinks,	How splendidly he talked, rode, sang and danced, and so on! Then she begins to loathe her husband, "kisses him reluctantly," hates him and his filthy beard and goatish appearance. As Doris said of Polyphemus, "He reeks all over of pus, all over like a he-goat": a rank, disgusting fellow, a goblin-faced fellow; he smells, he stinks,[11567]
Et cæpas simul alliumque ructat——	And belches onions and garlic together—

[11563] Editor. Fastidious Brisk is the affected gallant in Ben Jonson's Every Man Out of His Humour. A "lock" is a fashionable lovelock; "cringe" means make an elaborate bow. The Latin is Virgil, Aeneid 3.490, originally Andromache's recollection of Astyanax, adapted here to erotic admiration.

[11564] Burton. Source page 604, dagger: "Virg.4.Æn." "Virgil, Aeneid 4."

[11565] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.11: Dido admires Aeneas. Burton prints Quam where the checked text has quem. The sense is preserved without forcing an unidiomatic literal rendering of that difference.

[11566] Burton. Source page 604, dagger: "Secundus syl." "Secundus, Sylvae."

[11567] Editor. "Rammy" means rank-smelling; "fulsome" means repulsively offensive. The margin cites Johannes Secundus's Sylvae; the exact lines about Polyphemus and the following onion-and-garlic line await collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
si quando ad thalamum, &c. how like a dizard, a fool, an asse he looks, how like a clown he behaves himself! [11568]she will not come neer him by her good will, but wholly rejects him, as Venus did her fuliginous Vulcan, at last,	"If ever he comes to the bedchamber," and so forth—how like a simpleton, a fool, an ass he looks; how like a boor he behaves! She will not come near him willingly, but rejects him altogether, as Venus did her soot-blackened Vulcan, until at last,
Nec Deus hunc mensâ, Dea nec dignata cubili est.	No god has deemed him worthy of the table, nor a goddess of her bed.[11569]
Source page 604–605 So did Lucretia a Lady of Sene, after she had but seen Eurialus, in Eurialum tota ferebatur, domum reversa, &c. she would not hold her eys off him in his presence,	So did Lucretia, a lady of Siena, after she had merely seen Euryalus: "She was wholly swept towards Euryalus; when she returned home," and so forth. In his presence she could not keep her eyes off him,[11570]
Source page 605 ——[11571]tantum egregio decus enitet ore.	So much beauty shines from that noble face.
and in his absence could think of none but him, odit virum, she loathed her husband forthwith, might not abide him.	And in his absence she could think of no one else. "She hates her husband": she immediately loathed her husband and could not bear him.
[11572]Et conjugalis negligens tori, viro Præsente, acerbo nauseat fastidio.	And neglecting the marriage bed, She feels bitter, sickening disgust in her husband's presence.[11573]

[11568] Burton. Source page 604, s: "Æneas Sylvius."

[11569] Editor. Virgil, Eclogue 4.63, quoted independently of its original context. Fuliginous means sooty or smoke-blackened, apt for Vulcan as smith. The original column retains the verse rather than supplying words Burton omits from the preceding line.

[11570] Editor. Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini's Tale of Two Lovers concerns Lucretia of Siena and Euryalus. The marginal attribution begins on the preceding page and is placed at its printed anchor. The next Latin verse is Virgil, Aeneid 4.150.

[11571] Burton. Source page 605, star: "Virg.4.Æn." "Virgil, Aeneid 4."

[11572] Burton. Source page 605, dagger: "S. Græco Simonides." "Simonides, from the Greek; the printed initial S. is unresolved."

[11573] Editor. The marginal attribution names Simonides and a Greek source, but the exact poem and the initial S. remain unresolved. The Latin describes aversion to the marriage bed; Burton's English narrows this to the husband's appearance. Both are separately retained.

Original text 1651	Modern English
All against the Laws of Matrimony, She did abhor her husbands Phisnomy,	Against all the laws of matrimony, She abhorred her husband's face, and sought all opportunity to see her sweet heart again. Now when the good man shall observe his wife so lightly given, to be so free, and familiar with every gallant, her immodesty and wantonness (as [11574]Camerarius notes) it must needs yield matter of suspition to him,	and sought every opportunity to see her sweetheart again. Now when a husband notices that his wife is so flighty, "so free and familiar with every gallant," her immodesty and wantonness, as Camerarius observes, must necessarily give him grounds for suspicion.
when she still pranks up her self beyond her means and fortunes, makes impertinent journeys, unnecessary visitations, staies out so long, with such and such companions, so frequently goes to plays, masks, feasts, and all publique meetings, shall use such immodest [11575]gestures, free speeches, and withal shew some distast of her own husband; how can he chuse, though he were another Socrates, but be suspicious, and instantly jealous? [11576]Socraticas tandem faciet transcendere metas;	When she continually dresses herself up beyond her means and station, makes pointless journeys and unnecessary visits, stays out so long with this or that companion, goes so frequently to plays, masques, feasts and public gatherings, uses such immodest gestures and unrestrained language, and also shows some distaste for her husband—how can he avoid being suspicious and immediately jealous, even if he were another Socrates? "At last she will make him overstep even Socratic bounds."[11577]
More especially when he shall take notice of their more secret and sly tricks, which to cornute their husbands they commonly use, (dum ludis, ludos hæc te facit) they pretend love, honour, chastity, and seem to respect them before all men living, Saints in shew, so cunningly can they dissemble, they will not so much as look upon another man, in his presence,	All the more when he notices the secret, sly tricks they commonly use to make their husbands cuckolds: "While you play, she makes a plaything of you." They profess love, honour and chastity, and seem to value their husbands above all living men. Saints in appearance, so skilfully can they dissemble that they will not so much as look at another man in their husband's presence,

[11574] Burton. Source page 605, t: "Cent.2.ca.38. Oper. subcis. mulieris liberius & familiarius communicantis cum omnibus licentia & immodestia, sinistri sermonis & suspitionis materiam viro præbet." "Miscellaneous Hours, century 2, chapter 38. The licence and immodesty of a woman who converses too freely and familiarly with everyone gives her husband grounds for adverse comment and suspicion."

[11575] Burton. Source page 605, u: "Voces liberæ, oculorum colloquia, contrectationes parum verecundæ, motus immodici, &c. Heinsius." "Unrestrained speech, conversations of the eyes, immodest touching, excessive movements, etc. Heinsius."

[11576] Burton. Source page 605, star: "Chaloner."

[11577] Editor. "Pranks up" means dresses showily; "impertinent" means irrelevant or needless. Socrates represents proverbial patience. The line assigned to Chaloner says that even those limits of endurance can be exceeded.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11578]so chaste, so religious, and so devout, they cannot endure the name or sight of a quean, a harlot, out upon her: and in their outward carriage are most loving and officious, will kiss their husband, and hang about his neck, (dear husband, sweet husband) and with a composed countenance, salute him, especially when he comes home, or if he go from home, weep, sigh, lament, and take upon them to be sick and swoune, (like Iocundo's wife in [11579]Ariosto, when her husband was to depart) and yet arrant, &c. they care not for him,	so chaste, so religious and devout that they cannot endure the name or sight of a whore, a harlot—shame on her! In outward behaviour they are most affectionate and attentive, kissing their husband and hanging about his neck—"dear husband, sweet husband"—and greeting him with a composed expression, especially when he comes home. If he leaves, they weep, sigh and lament, pretend to be ill and faint, like Jocundo's wife in Ariosto when her husband was about to depart; yet they are utter—and so forth. They care nothing for him,[11580]
Aye me, the thought (quoth she) makes me so fraid, That scarce the breath abideth in my brest; Peace my sweet love and wife, Jocundo said, And weeps as fast, and comforts her his best, &c. All this might not asswage the womans pain, Needs must I die before you come again, Nor how to keep my life I can devise, The doleful days and nights I shall sustain, From meat my mouth, from sleep will keep mine eys, &c. That very night that went before the morrow, That he had pointed surely to depart, Jocundo's wife was sick, and swoun'd for sorrow Amid his arms, so heavy was her heart.	"Alas," she said, "the thought so frightens me That scarcely any breath remains within my breast." "Peace, my sweet love and wife," Jocundo said, And wept as freely, comforting her as best he could, and so on. All this could not relieve the woman's pain: "I must surely die before you return. I cannot think how I shall stay alive; The sorrowful days and nights I must endure Will keep food from my mouth and sleep from my eyes," and so on. That very night before the morning On which he had firmly planned to leave, Jocundo's wife was ill and fainted with grief Within his arms, so heavy was her heart.
And yet for all these counterfeit tears and protestations, Iocundo coming back in all haste for a Jewel he had forgot,	Yet for all these sham tears and declarations, when Jocundo hurried back for a jewel he had forgotten,

[11578] Burton. Source page 605, dagger: "What is here said, is not prejudicial to honest women."

[11579] Burton. Source page 605, x: "Lib.28.st.13." "Book 28, stanza 13."

[11580] Editor. Burton's marginal qualification excludes "honest," or chaste, women; "arrant, &c." suppresses an insult. The following composite verse corresponds to Ariosto, Orlando furioso 28.13–14 and 17; the discovery on the next page corresponds to 28.21. Thus the margin's stanza 13 marks the opening, not the whole extract. Burton's English translator and edition remain uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 606 His chaste and yoke fellow he found, Yok't with a knave, all honesty neglected, Th'adulterer sleeping very sound, Yet by his face was easily detected: A beggars brat bred by him from his cradle, And now was riding on his masters saddle.	He found his chaste companion in marriage Coupled with a knave, all chastity abandoned. The adulterer was sleeping soundly, Yet was easily recognized by his face: A beggar's child whom he had raised from the cradle, Now riding in his master's saddle.
Thus can they cunningly counterfeit, as [11581]Platina describes their customes, kiss their husbands whom they had rather see hanging on a Gallowes, and swear they love him dearer then their own lives; whose soul they would not ransome for their little dogs;	Thus skilfully can they deceive, as Platina describes their habits: "Kiss their husbands, whom they would rather see hanging on a gallows, and swear they love him more dearly than their own lives; yet they would not ransom his life at the cost of their little dog's."[11582]
——similis si permutatio detur, Morte viri cupiunt animam servare catellæ.	If such an exchange were offered, They would wish to save their little dog's life by their husband's death.
Many of them seem to be precise and holy forsooth, and will go to such a [11583]Church, to hear such a good man by all means, an excellent man, when 'tis for no other intent (as he follows it) then to see and to be seen, to observe what fashions are in use, to meet some Pander, Bawd, Monk, Frier, or to entise some good fellow.	Many of them appear scrupulously religious and holy, indeed, and insist on going to a particular church to hear such a good man, such an excellent man, when their sole purpose, as he continues, is "to see and be seen, to observe the latest fashions, to meet some procurer, bawd, monk or friar, or to entice some lively fellow."

[11581] Burton. Source page 606, y: "Dial amor. Pendet fallax & blanda circa oscula mariti, quem in cruce, si fieri posset, deosculari velit; Illius vitam chariorem esse sua jurejurando affirmat: quem certe non redimeret animâ catelli si posset." "Dialogue on Love. Deceitful and flattering, she hangs upon her husband's kisses, though she would prefer to kiss him on the gallows if she could. She swears that his life is dearer than her own, yet she would certainly not ransom him with her little dog's life if she could."

[11582] Editor. Platina is Bartolomeo Sacchi. "Soul" here carries the sense of life, clarified by anima in the Latin. The satire claims the wife would sacrifice her husband to save her pet. The Platina quotation and unattributed couplet require full collation.

[11583] Burton. Source page 606, z: "Adeunt templum ut rem divinam audiant, ut ipsæ simulant, sed vel ut Monachum fratrem, vel adulterum lingua, oculis, ad libidinem provocent." "They enter church to hear divine service, as they pretend, but really to provoke a monk, friar or adulterer to lust with tongue and eyes."

Original text 1651	Modern English
For they perswade themselves, as [11584]Nevisanus shews, That it is neither sin nor shame to lye with a Lord or a parish Priest, if he be a proper man: [11585]and though she kneele often, and pray devoutly, 'tis (saith Platina) not for her husbands welfare, or childrens good, or any friend, but for her sweet-hearts return, her Panders health.	For they persuade themselves, as Nevizzano shows, "that it is neither sin nor shame to sleep with a lord or a parish priest, if he is a handsome man." And though she kneels often and prays devoutly, says Platina, "it is not for her husband's welfare, her children's good or any friend, but for her sweetheart's return and her procurer's health."

[11584] Burton. Source page 606, a: "Lib.4.num.81. Ipsæ sibi persuadent, quod adulterium cum Principe vel cum Præsule, non est pudor, nec peccatum." "Book 4, paragraph 81. They persuade themselves that adultery with a prince or prelate is neither shame nor sin."

[11585] Burton. Source page 606, b: "Deum rogat, non pro salute mariti, filii, cognati vota suscipit, sed pro reditu mœchi si abest, pro valetudine lenonis si ægrotet." "She prays to God and makes vows not for the welfare of husband, son or kinsman, but for her adulterous lover's return if he is away, and her procurer's health if he is ill."

Original text 1651	Modern English
If her husband would have her go, she fains her self sick, [11586]Et simulat subitò condoluisse caput: her head akes, and she cannot stir: but if her Paramour ask as much, she is for him in all seasons, at all houres of the night.	If her husband wants her to go out, she pretends to be ill: "And pretends that her head has suddenly begun to ache." Her head hurts, and she cannot move. But if her lover asks the same, she is ready for him at any time, at every hour of the night.[11587]
[11588]In the Kingdome of Malabar, and about Goa in the East-Indies, the women are so subtile, that with a certain drink they give them to drive away cares as they say, [11589]they will make them sleep for twenty foure houres, or so intoxicate them, that they can remember naught of that they saw done, or heard, and by washing of their feet, restore them again, and so make their husbands cuckolds to their faces.	In the kingdom of Malabar and around Goa in the East Indies, the women are so cunning that, with a certain drink they give their husbands supposedly to drive away cares, "they make them sleep for twenty-four hours, or so intoxicate them that they remember nothing of what they saw done or heard; then, by washing their feet, restore them again, and so make their husbands cuckolds before their faces."[11590]
Some are ill disposed at all times, to all persons they like, others more wary to some few, at such and such seasons, as Augusta, Livia, non nisi plena navi vectorem tollebat. But as he said,	Some are unfaithfully disposed at all times towards anyone they like; others are more cautious, restricting themselves to a few people at particular times, as the empress Livia "would take a passenger aboard only when the ship was full." But as the poet said,[11591]

[11586] Burton. Source page 606, c: "Tibullus."

[11587] Editor. Tibullus 1.6.36 supplies the pretended headache. Burton uses it to continue the contrast between a husband's request and a lover's. The Latin and the following English explanation remain distinct.

[11588] Burton. Source page 606, d: "Gartardus Arthus descript. Indiæ Orient. Linchosten." "Gartardus Arthus, Description of the East Indies; Linschoten."

[11589] Burton. Source page 606, e: "Garcias ab Horto hist. lib.2.cap.24. Daturam herbam vocat & describit. Tam proclives sunt ad venerem mulieres ut viros inebrient per 24 horas, liquore quodam, ut nihil videant, recordentur, at dormiant, & post lotionem pedum, ad se restituunt, &c." "Garcia da Orta, History, book 2, chapter 24. He names and describes the plant datura. Women are so inclined to lust that they intoxicate their husbands for twenty-four hours with a certain liquid, so that they see nothing, remember nothing, but sleep; then after washing their feet they restore them to themselves, etc."

[11590] Editor. These are travellers' allegations about Malabar and Goa, cited through Arthus, Linschoten and Garcia da Orta. The marginal note names datura, but the account, especially restoration by washing the feet, is reproduced as a historical claim, not validated pharmacology.

[11591] Editor. The printed name is Livia, with a dagger that has no corresponding marginal entry on this page. Macrobius, Saturnalia 2.5.9, assigns the "full ship" joke to Julia: she claims to admit a lover only when already pregnant by her husband. Burton's name is retained, with the discrepancy recorded here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11592]No pen could write, no tongue attain to tell, By force of eloquence, or help of Art, Of womens treacheries the hundreth part.	No pen could write, no tongue succeed in telling, By eloquence's power or art's assistance, A hundredth part of women's treacheries.
Both, to say truth, are often faulty; Men and women give just occasions in this humor of discontent, aggravate and yield matter of suspition: but most part of the chief causes proceed from other adventitious accidents and circumstances, though the parties be free, and both well given themselves.	Both sexes, to tell the truth, are often at fault. Men and women give genuine grounds for this discontent, aggravating it and furnishing matter for suspicion. Yet most of the principal causes arise from other external accidents and circumstances, even when the partners themselves are innocent and both well disposed.
Source page 606–607 The undiscreet carriage of some lascivious gallant (& è contra of some light woman) by his often frequenting of an house, bold unseemly gestures, may make a breach, and by his over familiarity, if he be inclined to yellowness, colour him quite out. If he be poor, basely born, saith Benedetto Varchi, and otherwise unhandsome, he suspects him the less; but if a proper man, such as was Alcibiades in Greece, and Castruccius Castrucanus in Italy, well descended, commendable for his good parts, he taketh on the more, and watcheth his doings.	The indiscreet behaviour of some lustful gallant—and, conversely, of some flighty woman—through frequent visits to a house and bold, improper gestures, may cause a breach. By his excessive familiarity he may colour the husband thoroughly yellow, if the husband already inclines that way. If the visitor is poor, of low birth and otherwise unattractive, says Benedetto Varchi, the husband suspects him less. But if he is handsome, like Alcibiades in Greece or Castruccio Castracani in Italy, well born and admired for his accomplishments, the husband grows more agitated and watches his actions.[11593]

[11592] Burton. Source page 606, f with adjacent attribution at foot of page: "Ariosto. Lib.28.st.75." "Ariosto, book 28, stanza 75."

[11593] Editor. Yellow is the conventional colour of jealousy; Burton sustains the image in "colour him quite out." The two instances of "he" shift between the visitor and the husband; the modern version makes those roles explicit.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 607 [11594]Theodosius the Emperour gave his wife Eudoxia a golden apple when he was a suiter to her, which she long after bestowed upon a young Gallant in the Court, of her especiall acquaintance. The Emperor espying this apple in his hand, suspected forthwith, more than was, his wives dishonesty, banished him the Court, and from that day following, forbare to accompany her any more.	The emperor Theodosius gave his wife Eudoxia a golden apple when he was courting her. Long afterwards she gave it to a young gallant at court with whom she was particularly acquainted. Seeing the apple in his hand, the emperor immediately suspected his wife of more unchastity than there was, banished the man from court, and from that day onwards ceased to have relations with her.[11595]
[11596]A rich merchant had a fair wife; according to his custome he went to travell; in his absence a good fellow tempted his wife; she denied him; yet he dying a little after, gave her a legacy for the love he bore her. At his return her jealous husband because she had got more by land than he had done at Sea, turned her away upon suspition.	A rich merchant had a beautiful wife. As usual, he went travelling; in his absence a fellow tried to seduce her. She refused him; nevertheless, when he died shortly afterwards, he left her a legacy because of his love for her. On returning, her jealous husband, because she had gained more on land than he had at sea, cast her out on suspicion.[11597]
Now when those other circumstances of time and place, opportunity and importunity shall concurre, what will they not effect?	Now when those other circumstances of time and place, opportunity and persistent solicitation, combine, what will they not accomplish?

[11594] Burton. Source page 607, dagger: “Lipsius Polit.” “Lipsius, Politics.”

[11595] Editor. The margin cites Lipsius’s Politics. The apple story is commonly associated with Theodosius II and Eudocia; Burton prints Eudoxia and gives a particular version involving a courtship gift. Those details are preserved pending collation with Lipsius, rather than silently replaced by another account.

[11596] Burton. Source page 607, star: “Seneca lib.2. controv.8.” “Seneca, Controversies, book 2, controversia 8.”

[11597] Editor. The story is Seneca the Elder, Controversies 2.7 in the checked numbering, where the foreign merchant is the would-be seducer, and his will praises the wife’s chastity. Burton gives 2.8 and calls the husband a merchant. The comparison between her gains on land and his at sea also occurs in the rhetorical exercise.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Fair opportunitie can win the coyest she that is, So wisely he takes time, as hee'll be sure he will not miss: Then he that loves her gamesome vean, and tempers toyes with art, Brings love that swimmeth in her eye: to dive into her heart.	A favourable opportunity can win the most reluctant woman, If he chooses his moment so wisely that he is sure not to fail; Then he who loves her playful humour, and skilfully blends his dalliance, Makes the love that swims in her eye dive into her heart.[11598]
As at Playes, Masks, great feasts and banquets, one singles out his wife to dance, another courts her in his presence, a third tempts her, a fourth insinuates with a pleasing complement, a sweet smile, ingratiates himself with an amphibological speech, as that merry companion in the [11599]Satyrist did to his Glycerium, adsidens & interiorem palmam amabiliter concutiens,	At plays, masques, great feasts and banquets, for example, one man singles out his wife to dance, another courts her in his presence, a third tempts her, and a fourth slips into her favour with a pleasing compliment and a sweet smile, ingratiating himself with a double-entendre. So did that merry fellow in the satirist with his Glycerium, "sitting beside her and affectionately pressing the inside of her palm,"[11600]
Quod meus hortus habet sumas impunè licebit, Si dederis nobis quod tuus hortus habet,	You may freely take what my garden contains, If you give me what your garden contains,
with many such. &c. and then as he saith,	and many such things, and so forth. And then, as the poet says,
[11601]She may no while in chastity abide, That is assaid on every side.	She cannot long remain chaste Who is assailed on every side.[11602]

[11598] Editor. "Opportunity" supplies the occasion; "importunity" means persistent solicitation. The four-line verse is unattributed in this passage. "Toys" means playful or amorous trifles; "vean" is vein or disposition.

[11599] Burton. Source page 607, star: "Bodicher. Sat." "Bodicher, satires."

[11600] Editor. "Amphibological" means deliberately ambiguous, here a sexual double-entendre. The margin's Bodicher remains to be fully identified. The garden exchange is suggestive, and pressing the palm adds a physical signal to the verbal one.

[11601] Burton. Source page 607, unmarked: "Chaucer."

[11602] Editor. "Assaid" means assailed or tried. The unmarked margin attributes the couplet to Chaucer; the precise text and edition remain to be checked. Its spelling has been retained apart from mechanical long-s normalization.

Original text 1651	Modern English
For after a great feast, [11603]Vino sæpè suum nescit amica virum. Noah (saith [11604]Hierome) shewed his nakedness in his drunkenness, which for six hundred yeers he had covered in soberness. Lot lay with his daughters in his drink, as Cyneras with Myrrha,	For after a great feast, "In wine a woman often fails to recognize her own man." Noah, says Jerome, "exposed in drunkenness the nakedness he had covered for six hundred years in sobriety." Lot slept with his daughters when drunk, as Cinyras did with Myrrha,[11605]
——[11606]quid enim Venus ebria curat?	For what does drunken Venus care?[11607]
The most continent may be overcom, or if otherwise they keep bad company, they that are modest of themselves, and dare not offend, confirmed [11608]by others, grow impudent, and confident, and get an ill habit.	The most sexually restrained may be overcome. Or if, in another way, they keep bad company, those who are modest in themselves and dare not transgress, "encouraged by others, grow shameless and bold, and acquire a bad habit."
[11609]Alia quæstus gratiâ matrimonium corrumpit, Alia peccans multas vult morbi habere socias.	One woman corrupts marriage for the sake of gain; Another, herself transgressing, wants many companions in her disease.[11610]

[11603] Burton. Source page 607, g: "Tibullus."

[11604] Burton. Source page 607, dagger: "Epist.85.ad Oceanum. Ad unius horæ ebrietatem nudat femora, quæ per sexcentos annos sobrietate contexerat." "Letter 85 to Oceanus. In one hour's drunkenness he bares the thighs he had covered for six hundred years in sobriety."

[11605] Editor. The wine line is Propertius 2.33b.34, despite the Tibullus attribution. Jerome, Letter 69.9 to Oceanus, has sexcentos, "six hundred," in the checked Latin transcription, supporting Burton against the checked English version's sixty. His marginal number 85 remains unexplained. Jerome discusses clerical temperance through Noah and Lot; Cinyras and Myrrha supply Burton's mythological incest parallel.

[11606] Burton. Source page 607, star: "Juv.Sat.13." "Juvenal, satire 13."

[11607] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 6.300, not Satire 13 as printed in the margin. Venus personifies sexual desire; the question asks what restraint drunken lust will observe.

[11608] Burton. Source page 607, h: "Nihil audent primo, post ab aliis confirmatæ, audaces & confidentes sunt. Ubi semel verecundiæ limites transierint." "At first they dare nothing; afterwards, encouraged by others, they are daring and confident, once they have crossed the bounds of modesty."

[11609] Burton. Source page 607, star: "Euripides."

[11610] Editor. The margin assigns this Latin couplet to Euripides. The exact Greek passage and Latin intermediary remain unresolved. The disease metaphor describes the sharing and encouragement of sexual misconduct.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Or if they dwell in suspected places, as in an infamous Inne, neer some Stewes, neer Monkes, Friers, Nevisanus addes, where be many tempters and solliciters, idle persons that frequent their companies, it may give just cause of suspition. Martial of old enveighed against them that counterfeited a disease to go to the Bath; for so, many times,	Or if they live in suspect places—an ill-reputed inn, near brothels, near monks or friars, Nevizzano adds—where there are many tempters and solicitors, idle people who frequent their company, it may give reasonable grounds for suspicion. Martial long ago inveighed against women who feigned illness to go to the baths; for in this way, often,
[11611]——relicto Conjuge Penelope venit, abit Helene.	Leaving her husband behind, She arrives a Penelope and leaves a Helen.[11612]
Source page 607–608 Æneas Sylvius puts in a caveat against Princes Courts, because there be tot formosi juvenes qui promittunt, so many brave suiters to tempt, &c. [11613]If you leave her in such a place, you shall likely finde her in company you like not, either they come to her, or she is gone to them.	Aeneas Sylvius issues a warning against princes' courts, because there are "so many handsome young men making promises," so many splendid suitors to tempt her, and so on. "If you leave her in such a place, you will probably find her in company you dislike: either they have come to her, or she has gone to them."

[11611] Burton. Source page 607, unmarked following Euripides entry: "1.63." "Book 1, epigram 63; provisionally attached to Martial in the body."

[11612] Editor. Martial 1.62.5–6 in the checked numbering; the detached marginal 1.63. is provisionally attached here and retained. Burton omits intervening words of Martial's line. Penelope signifies fidelity, Helen departure with another man. The poem describes the baths at Baiae; "the Bath" is rendered as baths, not silently identified with the English city.

[11613] Burton. Source page 608, dagger: "De miser. curialium. Aut alium cum eâ invenies, aut ipse alium reperies." "On the Miseries of Courtiers. Either you will find another man with her, or you yourself will find another."

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 608 [11614]Kornmannus makes a doubting jest in his lascivious Countrey, Virginis illibata censetur ne castitas ad quam frequenter accedant scholares? And Baldus the Lawyer scoffes on, quum scholaris, inquit, loquitur cum puellâ, non præsumitur ei dicere, pater noster, When a Scholler talkes with a maid, or another mans wife in private, it is presumed he saith not a Pater noster.	Kornmann makes a sceptical joke in his lustful Country: “Is a maiden’s chastity considered untouched when scholars frequently visit her?” And Baldus the lawyer continues the mockery: “When a scholar,” he says, “speaks with a girl, he is not presumed to be saying the Our Father to her.” When a scholar talks privately with a maiden or another man’s wife, it is presumed that he is not saying an Our Father.[11615]
Or if I shall see a Monke or a Frier climb up by a ladder at midnight into a Virgins or Widowes chamber window, I shall hardly think he then goes to administer the Sacraments, or to take her confession. These are the ordinary causes of jealousie, which are intended or remitted as their circumstances vary.	Or if I see a monk or friar climbing a ladder at midnight into a maiden’s or widow’s bedroom window, I shall hardly think he is going there to administer the sacraments or hear her confession. These are the ordinary causes of jealousy, which intensify or diminish as their circumstances vary.

[11614] Burton. Source page 608, i: “Cap.18.de Virg.” “On Virgins, chapter 18.”

[11615] Editor. Kornmann’s book is cited as On Virgins in the margin; Burton’s capitalized “Countrey” is retained without treating it as a verified title. Pater noster is the opening of the Lord’s Prayer, “Our Father.” The Baldus attribution and Kornmann’s chapter remain to be collated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
MEMB. 2. SUBSECT. 1.	MEMBER 2. SUBSECTION 1.
Symptomes of Jealousie, fear, sorrow, suspition, strange actions, gestures, outrages, locking up, oathes, trials, lawes, &c.	Symptoms of jealousy: fear, sorrow, suspicion, strange actions, gestures, outrages, confinement, oaths, trials, laws, and so on.
Of all passions, as I have already proved, Love is most violent, and of those bitter potions which this Love-Melancholy affords, this bastard Jealousie is the greatest, as appears by those prodigious Symptomes which it hath, and that it produceth. For besides Fear and Sorrow, which is common to all Melancholy, anxiety of minde, suspition, aggravation, restless thoughts, paleness, meagerness, neglect of business, and the like, these men are farther yet misaffected, and in an higher strain.	Of all passions, as I have already shown, love is the most violent; and of the bitter potions that this love-melancholy supplies, its bastard offspring jealousy is the strongest, as appears from the extraordinary symptoms it has and produces. Besides fear and sorrow, which are common to all melancholy, anxiety of mind, suspicion, exaggeration, restless thoughts, paleness, wasting, neglect of business and the like, these people are afflicted still further, and to a greater degree.[11616]
'Tis a more vehement passion, a more furious perturbation, a bitter pain, a fire, a pernicious curiosity, a gall corrupting the honey of our life, madness, vertigo, plague, hell, they are more than ordinarily disquieted, they lose bonum pacis, as [11617]Chrysostome observes; and though they be rich, keep sumptuous tables, be nobly allied, yet miserrimi omnium sunt, they are most miserable, they are more than ordinarily discontent, more sad, nihil tristius, more than ordinarily suspitious.	It is a more vehement passion, a more furious disturbance, a bitter pain, a fire, a destructive inquisitiveness, gall spoiling the honey of our life, madness, dizziness, plague, hell. They are troubled beyond the ordinary measure; they lose "the blessing of peace," as Chrysostom observes. Although they are rich, dine sumptuously and have noble family connections, "they are the most miserable of all": they are utterly miserable, more than ordinarily discontented, sadder —"nothing is sadder"—and more than ordinarily suspicious.[11618]

[11616] Editor. The heading begins Member 2, Subsection 1 of the Third Partition, Section 3. "Symptoms" includes emotions, bodily signs and conduct, and eventually social practices and laws. Burton's melancholy remains an early modern category, not a single present-day diagnosis.

[11617] Burton. Source page 608, star: "Hom.38.in c.17.Gen. Etsi magnis affluunt divitiis, &c." "Homily 38 on Genesis 17. Although they abound in great riches, and so on."

[11618] Editor. "Gall" means bitterness, with the bodily sense of bile; "pernicious curiosity" means harmful prying. Chrysostom, Homilies on Genesis 38.5, contrasts domestic peace with the misery of jealous spouses despite wealth, fine food and noble birth. The French translation confirms this context. The homily begins from Genesis 16:1, not chapter 17 as Burton's margin says; his Latin version remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Jealousie, saith [11619]Vives, begets unquietness in the minde, night and day: he hunts after every word he hears, every whisper, and amplifies it to himself (as all melancholy men do in other matters) with a most unjust calumny of others, he misinterprets every thing is said or done, most apt to mistake or misconstrue, he pryes into every corner, follows close, observes to an hair. 'Tis proper to Jealousie so to do,	Jealousy, says Vives, "breeds unrest in the mind, night and day: he hunts after every word he hears, every whisper, and magnifies it to himself"—as all melancholy people do in other matters—"with the most unjust accusations against others. He misinterprets everything said or done, all too ready to misunderstand or misconstrue." He pries into every corner, follows closely, observes to a hair's breadth. It is characteristic of jealousy to act so,
Pale hag, infernall fury, pleasures smart, Envies observer, prying in every part.	Pale hag, infernal fury, pleasure's torment, Envy's watcher, prying everywhere.[11620]
Besides those strange gestures of staring, frowning, grinning, rolling of eyes, menacing, gastly looks, broken pace, interrupt, precipitate, half-turns. He will sometimes sigh, weep, sob for anger,	Besides those strange gestures: staring, frowning, grimacing, rolling the eyes, threatening, ghastly looks, an uneven gait, interrupted, hasty half-turns. Sometimes he will sigh, weep and sob with anger,
Nempe suos imbres etiam ista tonitrua fundunt,	Indeed, even these thunderclaps pour down their showers,[11621]

[11619] Burton. Source page 608, k: "3.de Anima. Omnes voces, auras, omnes susurros captat zelotypus, & amplificat apud se cum iniquissima de singulis calumnia. Maxime suspitiosi, & ad pejora credendum proclives." "On the Soul, book 3. The jealous man catches every word, every breath, every whisper, and magnifies them to himself with the most unjust accusation against each person. Extremely suspicious, and inclined to believe the worst."

[11620] Editor. Samuel Daniel, The Complaint of Rosamond, in the address to Jealousy beginning "Thou hast a thousand gates." The consulted text reads "Envious observer"; Burton prints "Envies observer," retained as "Envy's watcher." "Smart" means pain or torment.

[11621] Editor. The thunderstorm metaphor joins angry outbursts to the tears that follow them. The exact source of this unattributed Latin line has not been established.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 608–609 swear and bely, slander any man, curse, threaten, braule, scold, fight; and sometimes again flatter, and speak fair, ask forgiveness, kisse and coll, condemn his rashness and folly, vow, protest and swear he will never do so again; and then eftsoons, impatient as he is, rave, roar, and lay about him like a mad man, thump her sides, drag her about perchance, drive her out of doors, send her home, he will be divorced forthwith, she is a whore, &c.	swear and tell lies about people, slander anyone, curse, threaten, brawl, scold and fight. At other times he will flatter her and speak kindly, ask forgiveness, kiss and embrace her, condemn his rashness and folly, vow, protest and swear that he will never do so again. Then, soon afterwards, unable to restrain himself, he will rave, roar and strike out like a madman, punch her in the sides, perhaps drag her about, drive her out of doors and send her home. He will have a divorce at once; she is a whore, and so on.[11622]
Source page 609 by and by with all submiss complement intreat her fair, and bring her in again, he loves her dearly, she is his sweet, most kinde and loving wife, he will not change, not leave her for a kingdom; so he continues off and on, as the toy takes him, the object moves him, but most part brauling, fretting, unquiet he is, accusing and suspecting not strangers only, but Brothers and Sisters, Father and Mother, nearest and dearest friends. He thinks with those Italians,	Before long he treats her kindly with every submissive compliment and brings her in again. He loves her dearly; she is his sweet, kindest, most loving wife; he would not exchange her or leave her for a kingdom. So he goes on, back and forth, as the whim takes him or something stirs him; but for the most part he is quarrelsome, fretful and restless, accusing and suspecting not only strangers but brothers and sisters, father and mother, his nearest and dearest friends. He thinks with those Italians,
Chi non tocca parentado, Tocca mai e rado.	Who does not touch his kin Touches never, or rarely.[11623]

[11622] Editor. “Coll” means embrace; “eftsoons,” soon afterwards; “toy,” in the next passage, a whim or fancy. The sequence of assault, apology, reassurance and renewed assault is explicit in Burton, and is retained without softening.

[11623] Editor. The Italian uses “touch” with a sexual implication: the jealous person suspects even close relations. The awkward “mai e rado,” literally “never and rarely,” is rendered as “never, or rarely.” The proverb’s printed source remains unidentified.

Original text 1651	Modern English
And through fear, conceives unto himself things almost incredible and impossible to be effected. As an Hearn when she fishes, still prying on all sides; or as a Cat doth a Mouse, his eye is never off hers; he glotes on him, on her, accurately observing on whom she looks, who looks at her, what she saith, doth, at dinner, at supper, sitting, walking, at home, abroad, he is the same, still enquiring, mandring, gazing, listning, affrighted with every small object; why did she smile, why did she pity him, commend him? why did she drink twice to such a man? why did she offer to kiss, to dance? &c. a whore, a whore, an arrant whore. All this he confesseth in the Poet,	Through fear he imagines things almost incredible and impossible to accomplish. Like a heron fishing, always peering in every direction, or a cat watching a mouse, he never takes his eyes off her. He stares at him, at her, observing precisely whom she looks at, who looks at her, what she says and does. At dinner, at supper, sitting, walking, at home or abroad, he is the same: always questioning, wandering about, gazing, listening, frightened by every little thing. Why did she smile? Why did she pity him, praise him? Why did she drink twice to that man? Why did she offer to kiss, to dance, and so on? A whore, a whore, an utter whore. He confesses all this in the poet's words,[11624]
[11625]Omnia me terrent, timidus sum, ignosce timori, Et miser in tunica suspicor esse virum. Me lædit si multa tibi dabit oscula mater, Me soror, & cum qua dormit amica simul.	Everything frightens me; I am afraid: forgive my fear. Wretched that I am, I suspect a man beneath a woman's tunic. It hurts me if your mother gives you many kisses, Your sister too, and the female friend who sleeps beside you.[11626]
Each thing affrights me, I do fear, Ah pardon me my fear, I doubt a man is hid within The cloathes that thou dost wear,	Everything frightens me; I am afraid. Ah, pardon my fear: I suspect a man is hidden in The clothes that you wear.

[11624] Editor. "Hearn" is a heron. "Mandring" is taken as wandering or roaming about, in a series of watchful, restless actions. "Drink twice to" means offer two drinking salutes; "arrant" means utter or thoroughgoing.

[11625] Burton. Source page 609, l: "Propertius."

[11626] Editor. Propertius 2.6. Burton gives lines 13–14 before 11–12, with verbal differences including "terrent" where the consulted Latin has "laedent." His English quatrain translates only the first pair of his Latin lines, and makes the person wearing the tunic the beloved. Both versions are retained separately; neither is made to replace the other.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Is ’t not a man in womans apparel? is not some body in that great chest, or behinde the door, or hangings, or in some of those barrels? May not a man steal in at the window with a ladder of ropes, or come down the chimney, have a false key, or get in when he is asleep? If a Mouse do but stir, or the winde blow, a casement clatter, that’s the villaine, there he is; by his good will no man shall see her, salute her, speak with her, she shall not go forth of his sight, so much as to do her needs.	Is that not a man in women’s clothing? Is someone not hiding in that great chest, behind the door or the hangings, or in one of those barrels? Might a man not creep in through the window by a rope ladder, come down the chimney, have a false key, or get in while he is asleep? If a mouse so much as stirs, the wind blows or a window rattles, that is the villain: there he is! If he had his way, no man would see her, greet her or speak to her; she would never leave his sight, even to relieve herself.
[11627]Non ita bovem Argus, &c. Argus did not so keep his Cow, that watchfull dragon the golden fleece, or Cerberus the coming in of Hell, as he keepes his wife. If a dear friend or neer kinsman come as guest to his house, to visit him, he will never let him be out of his own sight and company, lest peradventure, &c.	“Argus did not guard his cow so,” and so on. Argus did not guard his cow, nor that watchful dragon the Golden Fleece, nor Cerberus the entrance to hell, as he guards his wife. If a dear friend or close relative comes as a guest to visit him, he never lets the man out of his sight or company, lest perhaps—and so on.[11628]
Source page 609–610 If the necessity of his business be such that he must go from home, he doth either lock her up, or commit her with a deal of injunctions and protestations to some trusty friends, him and her he sets and bribes to oversee: one servant is set in his absence to watch another, and all to observe his wife, and yet all this will not serve, though his business be very urgent, he will when he is half way, come back again in all post hast, rise from supper, or at midnight, and be gone, and sometimes leave his business undone, and as a stranger court his own wife in some disguised habit.	If his business requires him to leave home, he either locks her up or entrusts her to reliable friends with a mass of instructions and solemn declarations. He appoints and bribes this man and that woman to keep watch; during his absence one servant is set to watch another, and all of them to watch his wife. Yet none of this is enough. However urgent his business, halfway there he will return at full speed, rise from supper or leave at midnight, sometimes abandon his business altogether, and court his own wife as a stranger, wearing a disguise.[11629]

[11627] Burton. Source page 609, m: “Æneas Silv.” “Aeneas Sylvius.”

[11628] Editor. Argus guarded Io in the form of a cow; a dragon guarded the Golden Fleece, and Cerberus guarded the underworld. Burton’s margin names Aeneas Sylvius (Pius II), but the precise passage is uncollated. The unfinished “lest” deliberately leaves the feared sexual encounter unspoken.

[11629] Editor. “Habit” here means clothing or disguise. The passage escalates from confinement and delegated surveillance to sudden returns and a husband’s attempt to test his wife while disguised.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 610 Though there be no danger at all, no cause of suspition, she live in such a place, where Messalina her self could not be dishonest if she would, yet he suspects her as much as if she were in a bawdy house, some Princes Court, or in a common Inne, where all comers might have free accesse. He cals her on a sudden all to naught, she is a strumpet, a light huswife, a bitch, an arrant whore. No perswasion, no protestation can divert this passion, nothing can ease him, secure or give him satisfaction.	Although there is no danger at all, no cause for suspicion, and she lives somewhere even Messalina herself could not be unfaithful if she wished, he suspects her as much as if she were in a brothel, some prince's court or a public inn, where anyone might have free access. Suddenly he calls her every foul name: a strumpet, a wanton housewife, a bitch, an utter whore. No persuasion or solemn assurance can turn aside this passion; nothing can ease him, reassure him or satisfy him.[11630]
It is most strange to report what outragious acts by men and women have been committed in this kind, by women especially, that will run after their husbands into all places and companies, as [11631]Jovianus Pontanus wife did by him, follow him whithersoever he went, it matters not, or upon what business, raving like Juno in the Tragœdy, miscalling, cursing, swearing, and mistrusting every one she sees.	It is astonishing to relate what outrages men and women have committed in this way, especially women, who will run after their husbands into every place and company. So Jovianus Pontanus's wife followed him wherever he went, regardless of the place or his business, raging like Juno in the tragedy, calling names, cursing, swearing and mistrusting everyone she saw.[11632]

[11630] Editor. Messalina, wife of the emperor Claudius, serves as a conventional Roman example of sexual licence. "Calls her all to naught" means heaps abuse on her; "light huswife" is a sexually disparaging term, not a comment on housekeeping.

[11631] Burton. Source page 610, n: "Ant.Dial." "Ant. dialogue."

[11632] Editor. Jovianus Pontanus is the humanist Giovanni Pontano. The margin's "Ant. Dial." probably points to his dialogue Antonius; the anecdote and the tragedy invoked through the jealous Juno require exact collation.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Gomesius in his third book of the life and deeds of Francis Ximenius, sometime Archbishop of Toledo, hath a strange story of that incredible jealousie of Ioane Queen of Spain, wife to King Philip, mother of Ferdinand and Charles the 5. Emperours; when her husband Philip, either for that he was tyred with his wives jealousie, or had some great business, went into the Low-countries; she was so impatient and melancholy upon his departure, that she would scarce eat her meat, or converse with any man;	In the third book of his Life and Deeds of Francis Ximenius, formerly archbishop of Toledo, Gomesius has an extraordinary story about the incredible jealousy of Joan, queen of Spain, wife of King Philip and mother of the emperors Ferdinand and Charles V. When her husband Philip went to the Low Countries, either because he was tired of his wife's jealousy or because he had important business, she became so distressed and melancholy at his departure that she would scarcely eat or speak to anyone.[11633]
and though she were with child, the season of the yeer very bad, the winde against her, in all haste she would to sea after him. Neither Isabella her Queen mother, the Archbishop, or any other friend could perswade her to the contrary, but she would after him. When she was now come into the Low-countries, and kindly entertained by her husband, she could not contain her self, [11634]but in a rage ran upon a yellow hair'd wench, with whom she suspected her husband to be nought, cut off her hair, did beat her black and blew, and so dragged her about.	Although she was pregnant, the season very unfavourable and the wind against her, she insisted on putting to sea after him at once. Neither her mother Queen Isabella, the archbishop nor any other friend could persuade her otherwise: she would follow him. Once she had reached the Low Countries and been kindly received by her husband, she could not restrain herself, "but in a rage rushed at a blonde girl whom she suspected of an affair with him, cut off her hair, beat her black and blue, and dragged her about."
It is an ordinary thing for women in such cases to scrat the faces, slit the noses of such as they suspect; as Henry the seconds importune Juno did by Rosamond at Woodstock: for she complains in a [11635]moderne Poet, she scarce spake,	It is common for women in such cases to scratch the faces and slit the noses of those they suspect, as Henry II's relentless Juno did to Rosamond at Woodstock. For Rosamond complains in a modern poet that the queen had scarcely spoken,[11636]

[11633] Editor. The persons named are Joan (Juana) of Castile, Philip of Habsburg, her mother Isabella, and her sons Charles V and Ferdinand I. Gomesius is the name under which Álvar Gómez's life of Francisco Jiménez de Cisneros is cited. Burton's anecdote and its account of motives are transmitted here as his source-based narrative, not as a retrospective clinical diagnosis; the cited passage remains uncollated.

[11634] Burton. Source page 610, o: "Rabie conceptâ, cæsariem abrasit, puellæq; mirabiliter insultans faciem vibicibus fædavit." "Seized with rage, she cut off her hair and, violently assaulting the girl, disfigured her face with welts."

[11635] Burton. Source page 610, dagger: "Daniel."

[11636] Editor. The marginal "Daniel" identifies Samuel Daniel's Complaint of Rosamond. Burton excerpts its fictional first-person account of the queen attacking Rosamond, omitting most of the tigress simile. His "Juno" casts the queen in the mythological role of a jealous wife. The poem is a literary source, not independent confirmation of this assault.

Original text 1651	Modern English
But flies with eager fury to my face, Offering me most unwomanly disgrace. Look how a Tigresse, &c. So fell she on me in outragious wise, As could Disdain and Jealousie devise.	But flies at my face with fierce fury, Offering me the most unwomanly outrage. See how a tigress—and so on. So she fell upon me in as outrageous a manner As disdain and jealousy could devise.
Or if it be so they dare not or cannot execute any such tyrannical injustice, they will miscall, rail and revile, bear them deadly hate and malice, as [11637]Tacitus observes, The hatred of a jealous woman is inseparable against such as she suspects.	Or if they dare not or cannot carry out such tyrannical injustice, they will call names, rail and revile, and bear those women deadly hatred and malice. As Tacitus observes, "A jealous woman's hatred never leaves those she suspects."[11638]
[11639]Nulla vis flammæ, tumidique venti Tanta, nec teli metuenda torti, Quanta cum conjux viduata tædis Ardet & odit.	No force of flame or swelling wind, Nor the dreaded force of a hurled weapon, is so great As when a wife deprived of marriage's joys Burns and hates.[11640]
Windes, weapons, flames make not such hurly burly, As raving women turn all topsie turvy.	Winds, weapons, flames make no such uproar As raging women turning everything upside down.
Source page 611 So did Agrippina by Lollia, and Calphurnia in the dayes of Claudius. But women are sufficiently curbed in such cases, the rage of men is more eminent, and frequently put in practice. See but with what rigour those jealous husbands tyrannize over their poor wives.	So Agrippina treated Lollia and Calpurnia in the days of Claudius. But women are sufficiently restrained in such cases; men's rage is more conspicuous and more often put into practice. Just see how harshly those jealous husbands tyrannize over their poor wives.[11641]

[11637] Burton. Source page 610, p: "Annal.lib.12. Principis mulieris zelotypæ est in alias mulieres quas suspectas habet, odium inseparabile." "Annals, book 12. A jealous princess has an enduring hatred of other women whom she suspects."

[11638] Editor. The Latin margin formulates a general rule about a jealous woman of princely rank. It is not a verbatim sentence in the consulted text of Tacitus, Annals 12.22, which relates Agrippina's actions against Lollia and Calpurnia.

[11639] Burton. Source page 610, star: "Seneca in Medea." "Seneca in Medea."

[11640] Editor. Seneca, Medea 579–582. "Tædis," literally marriage torches, stands for marriage. Burton's "tumidique" differs from "tumidive" in the consulted Latin. His following English couplet is a freer, more general rendering and is therefore retained as a separate verse unit.

[11641] Editor. Tacitus, Annals 12.22, describes Agrippina's hostility toward Lollia Paulina, a rival for marriage to Claudius, and toward Calpurnia, whose beauty Claudius had praised. Burton's "Calphurnia" is retained in the original column. His claim that women are restrained introduces the contrast with husbands' power over their wives.

Original text 1651	Modern English
In Greece, Spain, Italy, Turkie, Africk, Asia, and generally over all those hot countries, [11642]Mulieres vestræ terra vestra, arate sicut vultis; Mahomet in his Alcoran gives this power to men, your wives are as your land, till them, use them, intreat them fair or foul, as you will your selves.	In Greece, Spain, Italy, Turkey, Africa, Asia and generally throughout all those hot countries, "Your women are your land: plough as you please." Muhammad in his Quran gives men this power: your wives are like your land; till them, use them, treat them well or badly, just as you please.[11643]
([11644]Necastor lege durâ vivunt mulieres,) they lock them still in their houses, which are as so many prisons to them, will suffer no body to come at them, or their wives to be seen abroad,	"By Castor, women live under a harsh law." They keep them locked in their houses, which are so many prisons to them, allow no one to approach them and will not let their wives be seen outside,[11645]
——nec campos liceat lustrare patentes.	Nor may they roam the open fields.[11646]

[11642] Burton. Source page 611, star: "Alcoran cap. Bovis, interprete Ricardo præd. c.8. confutationis." "Quran, chapter of the Cow, as interpreted by Ricardus the preacher, chapter 8 of his Refutation."

[11643] Editor. The underlying allusion is Quran 2:223, with its agricultural metaphor. Burton's margin cites a Christian refutation associated with Ricoldus (here "Ricardus") as intermediary. "Treat them well or badly" is Burton's hostile expansion, not wording in the Quranic verse. His geographical generalization and interpretation are preserved as his claims; the exact intermediary passage is still to be collated.

[11644] Burton. Source page 611, dagger: "Plautus."

[11645] Editor. Plautus, Mercator 817–829: Syra protests that a husband may bring home a prostitute without penalty, while a wife may be divorced for going out without his knowledge. This is a character's complaint in comedy, not a legal enactment. The consulted Latin begins Ecastor, "by Castor"; Burton's Necastor is retained. His edition remains unidentified.

[11646] Editor. Literally, "nor may they traverse the open fields." Burton supplies no attribution, and the exact source of this fragment remains unresolved.

Original text 1651	Modern English
They must not so much as look out. And if they be great persons, they have Eunuchs to keep them, as the Grand Seignior amongst the Turks, the Sophies of Persia, those Tartarian Mogors, and Kings of China. Infantes masculos castrant innumeros ut regi serviant, saith [11647]Riccius, they geld innumerable infants to this purpose; the King of [11648]China maintains 10000 Eunuchs in his family to keep his wives.	They may not so much as look out. If the husbands are great men, they have eunuchs to guard them, as do the Grand Seigneur among the Turks, the Sophis of Persia, those Tatar Moguls and the kings of China. "They castrate countless male infants to serve the king," says Ricci: they castrate innumerable infants for this purpose. The king of China maintains ten thousand eunuchs in his household to guard his wives.[11649]
The Xeriffes of Barbary keep their Curtezans in such strict manner, that if any man come but in sight of them he dies for it; and if they chance to see a man, and do not instantly cry out, though from their windows, they must be put to death.	The sharifs of Barbary keep their courtesans so strictly that if any man so much as comes into their sight he dies for it; and if the women happen to see a man and do not cry out immediately, even from their windows, they must be put to death.[11650]

[11647] Burton. Source page 611, q: "Expedit.in Sinas l.3.c.9." "Expedition to China, book 3, chapter 9."

[11648] Burton. Source page 611, r: "Decem Eunuchorum millia numerantur in regia familia, qui servant uxores ejus." "Ten thousand eunuchs are counted in the royal household, guarding his wives."

[11649] Editor. The Grand Seigneur is the Ottoman sultan; the Sophis are the Persian shahs; "Mogors" names the Mughal rulers. "Family" means the whole royal household. Burton cites the Ricci account of China for the numerical claim; the exact text and figure have not been independently verified here.

[11650] Editor. "Xeriffes" means sharifs; "Barbary" is the early modern European term for the North African coast. These sweeping claims about rulers' households and punishments are Burton's report, not verified descriptions of every such community.

Original text 1651	Modern English
The Turks have I know not how many black deformed Eunuchs (for the white serve for other ministeries) to this purpose sent commonly from Ægypt, deprived in their childhood of all their privities, and brought up in the Seraglio at Constantinople to keep their wives; which are so penned up they may not confer with any living man, or converse with younger women, have a Cucumber or Carret sent in to them for their diet, but sliced, for fear, &c. and so live and are left alone to their unchaste thoughts all the dayes of their lives.	The Turks have I do not know how many black, mutilated eunuchs for this purpose—the white ones perform other services—usually sent from Egypt, deprived in childhood of all their genital organs and brought up in the seraglio at Constantinople to guard their wives. The women are so confined that they may not speak with any living man or associate with younger women, nor receive a cucumber or carrot as food unless it has been sliced, for fear—and so on. Thus they live, left alone with their unchaste thoughts for all their lives.[11651]
The vulgar sort of women, if at any time they come abroad, which is very seldome, to visit one another, or to go to their Bathes, are so covered, that no man can see them, as the matrons were in old Rome, lecticâ aut sellâ tectâ vectæ, so [11652]Dion and Seneca record, Velatæ totæ incedunt, which [11653]Alexander ab Alexandro relates of the Parthians, lib.5.cap.24. which with Andreas Tiraquellus his Commentator, I rather think should be understood of Persians.	Women of the common sort, if they ever go out—which is very seldom—to visit one another or go to their baths, are so covered that no man can see them. So were the matrons of ancient Rome, "carried in a litter or a covered chair," as Dio and Seneca record. "They walk completely veiled," Alexander ab Alexandro relates of the Parthians in book 5, chapter 24; but, with his commentator André Tiraqueau, I think this should rather be understood to mean the Persians.[11654]

[11651] Editor. "Deformed" is rendered "mutilated" in the immediate context of castration. Burton distinguishes black and white eunuchs by service, using the racial categories of his account. "Seraglio" denotes the palace household or its secluded quarters. His "for fear, &c." leaves the sexual use of vegetables implied; no missing words are supplied.

[11652] Burton. Source page 611, dagger: "Lib.57.ep.81." "Book 57; letter 81."

[11653] Burton. Source page 611, s: "Semotas à viris servant in interioribus, ab eorum conspectu immunes." "They keep them secluded from men in the inner rooms, out of the men's sight."

[11654] Editor. Dio 57.15.4 describes the sick Libo brought to the senate in a covered litter of the kind used by senators' wives. This supports the transport detail, not Burton's wider account of seclusion. Seneca's Letter 81 concerns gratitude; the corresponding passage was not located there. Burton's correction of Alexander's Parthians to Persians, following Tiraqueau, remains uncollated.

Original text 1651	Modern English
I have not yet said all, they do not onely lock them up, sed & pudendis seras adhibent: hear what Bembus relates lib.6. of his Venetian History, of those inhabitants that dwell about Quiloa in Africk. Lusitani, inquit, quorumdam civitates adierunt, qui natis statim fœminis naturam consuunt, quoad urinæ exitus ne impediatur, easque quum adoleverint sic consutas in matrimonium collocant, ut sponsi prima cura sit conglutinatas puellæ oras ferro interscindere.	I have not yet told everything: they not only lock them up, "but also put locks upon their genitals." Hear what Bembo relates in book 6 of his Venetian History about the inhabitants around Kilwa in Africa. "The Portuguese," he says, "visited the towns of certain people who sew up girls' genital parts immediately after birth, leaving the passage of urine unobstructed, and give them in marriage when they have grown up, still sewn together, so that the bridegroom's first task is to cut apart with a blade the girl's joined edges."[11655]
Source page 611–612 In some parts of Greece at this day, like those old Jews, they will not beleeve their wives are honest, nisi pannum menstruatum prima nocte videant: our Countryman [11656]Sands in his peregrination, saith it is severely observed in Zazynthus, or Zante; and Leo Afer in his time at Fez in Africke, non credant virginem esse nisi videant sanguineam mappam; si non, ad parentes pudore rejicitur. Those sheets are publikely shewed by their parents, and kept as a signe of incorrupt virginity.	In some parts of Greece today, as among those Jews of old, they will not believe their wives are chaste "unless they see a bloodstained cloth on the first night." Our countryman Sandys says in his travels that this is strictly observed in Zazynthus, or Zante; and Leo Africanus says that in his time at Fez in Africa "they do not believe her to be a virgin unless they see a bloody cloth; otherwise she is sent back in disgrace to her parents." Those sheets are publicly shown by their parents and kept as a sign of untouched virginity.[11657]

[11655] Editor. Bembo is Pietro Bembo; "Quiloa" is Kilwa on the East African coast. The Latin describes sewing together the external genital parts and later cutting them apart. This is a reported practice in Burton's cited Venetian History, not a medical recommendation; the precise passage and attribution await collation.

[11656] Burton. Source page 611, t: "Lib.1.fol.7." "Book 1, folio 7."

[11657] Editor. "Sands" is George Sandys; "Zazynthus" is Burton's form beside Zante (Zakynthos). The passage concerns alleged wedding-night proofs of virginity. Its claims are historical: hymenal appearance or bleeding cannot establish a history of sexual intercourse. See the WHO interagency statement listed below for that modern medical distinction.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 612 The Jews of old examined their maids ex tenui membrana, called Hymen, which Laurentius in his Anatomy, Columbus lib.12.cap.16. Capivaccius lib.4.cap.11. de uteri affectibus, Vincent. Alsarus Genuensis quæst. med. cent.4. Hieronymus Mercurialis consult. Ambros. Pareus, Julius Cæsar Claudinus Respons.4. as that also [11658]de ruptura venarum ut sanguis fluat, copiously confute 'tis no sufficient triall, they contend.	The Jews of old tested their maidens "by a thin membrane" called the hymen. Laurentius in his Anatomy, Columbus in book 12, chapter 16, Capivaccius in book 4, chapter 11, On Disorders of the Womb, Vincentius Alsarius of Genoa in the fourth hundred of his Medical Questions, Hieronymus Mercurialis in his Consultations, Ambroise Paré, and Julius Caesar Claudinus in Response 4 extensively refute this, as well as the test "by rupturing veins so that blood flows": they maintain that it is no adequate proof.[11659]
And yet others again defend it, Gaspar Bartholinus Institut. Anat. lib.1.cap.31. Pineus of Paris, Albertus Magnus de secret. mulier. cap.9. & 10. &c. and think they speak too much in favour of women.	Yet others defend it: Caspar Bartholin in his Institutes of Anatomy, book 1, chapter 31; Pineau of Paris; Albertus Magnus in On the Secrets of Women, chapters 9 and 10; and so on. They think the others speak too much in women's favour.[11660]

[11658] Burton. Source page 612, u: "Diruptiones hymenis sæpe fiunt à propriis digitis vel ab aliis instrumentis." "Tears in the hymen are often caused by their own fingers or by other instruments."

[11659] Editor. Burton presents a dispute among medical writers, not an established anatomical test. "De uteri affectibus" means On Disorders of the Womb; "cent.4" means the fourth collection of one hundred questions. The named medical references and chapter numbers are retained pending edition-level collation.

[11660] Editor. Burton's opposing authorities defend the supposed test and accuse its critics of favouring women. The title On the Secrets of Women is given with Burton's attribution to Albertus Magnus; that attribution is not independently authenticated here.

Original text 1651	Modern English
[11661]Ludovicus Boncialus, lib.2.cap.2. muliebr. naturalem illam uteri labiorum constrictionem, in qua virginitatem consistere volunt, astringentibus medicinis fieri posse vendicat, & si defloratæ sint, astutæ [11662]mulieres (inquit) nos fallunt in his. Idem Alsarius Crucius Genuensis iisdem ferè verbis. Idem Avicenna lib.3.Fen.20.tract.1.cap.47. [11663]Rhasis Continent. lib.24. Rodericus à Castro de nat. mul. lib.1.cap.3.	Ludovicus Boncialus, in his work on women, book 2, chapter 2, "maintains that the natural constriction of the lips of the womb, in which they claim virginity consists, can be produced by astringent medicines; and even if they have been deflowered, cunning women," he says, "deceive us in these matters. Alsarius Crucius of Genoa says the same in almost the same words. So does Avicenna, book 3, fen 20, treatise 1, chapter 47; Rhazes, Continens, book 24; and Rodrigo de Castro, On the Nature of Women, book 1, chapter 3."[11664]
An old bawdy nurse in [11665]Aristænetus, (like that Spanish Cælestina, [11666]quæ quinque mille virgines fecit mulieres, totidemque mulieres arte sua virgines) when a fair maid of her acquaintance wept and made her moan to her, how she had been deflowred, and now ready to be married, was afraid it would be perceived, comfortably replyed, Noli vereri filia, &c. Fear not daughter, I'le teach thee a trick to help it. Sed hæc extra callem.	An old bawd of a nurse in Aristaenetus—like that Spanish Celestina, "who made five thousand virgins into women, and by her art as many women into virgins"—comforted a beautiful girl she knew who wept and lamented that she had been deflowered and, now about to be married, feared it would be discovered. She replied reassuringly, "Do not be afraid, daughter," and so on: Fear not, daughter; I will teach you a trick to remedy it. But these matters take us off the path.[11667]

[11661] Burton. Source page 612, x: "Idem Rhasis Arab.cont." "The same in Rhazes the Arab, Continens."

[11662] Burton. Source page 612, star: "Ita clausæ pharmacis ut non possunt coitum exercere." "So closed up by medicines that they cannot have intercourse."

[11663] Burton. Source page 612, dagger: "Qui & Pharmacum præscribit docetque." "Who also prescribes and explains a medicine."

[11664] Editor. "Uteri labia," literally "lips of the womb," reflects imprecise historical anatomy and refers here to the genital opening, not the modern anatomical uterus. "Fen" is a division of Avicenna's Canon. "Boncialus," the chapter numbers, and the overlapping Alsarius names are retained pending bibliographical collation; "Continens" is the cited title of Rhazes's medical compendium.

[11665] Burton. Source page 612, dagger: "Epist.6.Mercero Inter." "Letter 6, in Mercer's translation."

[11666] Burton. Source page 612, dagger: "Barthius. Ludus illi temeratum pudicitiæ florem mentitis machinis pro integro vendere. Ego docebo te quâ mulier ante nuptias sponso te probes virginem." "Barthius. It was a game to her to sell the violated flower of chastity as intact through deceptive tricks. I will teach you how, though a woman, you may prove yourself a virgin to your bridegroom before marriage."

[11667] Editor. Celestina is the Spanish literary procuress; the margin attributes the Latin observation to Barthius. Burton combines it with a nurse's reassurance from Aristaenetus. "Woman" as opposed to "virgin" means a sexually experienced woman. The Latin and Burton's own English reassurance both remain; his closing phrase marks the digression.

Original text 1651	Modern English
To what end are all those Astrologicall questions, an sit virgo, an sit casta, an sit mulier? and such strange absurd trials in Albertus Magnus, Bap. Porta, Mag. lib.2.cap.21. in Wecker. lib.5. de secret. by Stones, perfumes, to make them pisse, and confess I know not what in their sleep; some jealous brain was the first founder of them.	What is the purpose of all those astrological questions—"whether she is a virgin, whether she is chaste, whether she is a sexually experienced woman"—and those strange, absurd tests in Albertus Magnus; in Baptista Porta's Magic, book 2, chapter 21; and in Wecker's On Secrets, book 5, using stones and fumigations to make women urinate and confess I know not what in their sleep? Some jealous brain first devised them.[11668]
And to what passion may we ascribe those severe laws against jealousie, Num.5.14. Adulterers Deut. cap.22.v.22. as amongst the Hebrewes, amongst the Ægyptians (reade [11669]Boemus l.1.c.5. de mor. gen. of the Carthaginians, cap.6. of Turks, lib.2.cap.11.) amongst the Athenians of old, Italians at this day, wherein they are to be severely punished, cut in peeces, burned, vivi-comburio, buried alive, with severall expurgations, &c. are they not as so many symptomes of incredible jealousie?	And to what passion should we attribute those severe laws concerning jealousy, Numbers 5:14, and adulterers, Deuteronomy 22:22, among the Hebrews, among the Egyptians—read Boemus, On the Customs of Peoples, book 1, chapter 5; for the Carthaginians, chapter 6; for the Turks, book 2, chapter 11—among the ancient Athenians and the Italians of today? Under these laws people are to be severely punished, cut to pieces, burned—burned alive—buried alive, with various ordeals of purgation and so on. Are these not so many symptoms of incredible jealousy?[11670]

[11668] Editor. The questions are astrological inquiries about a woman's sexual history. "Perfumes" means fumigations or aromatic vapours. Burton explicitly calls these proposed tests absurd; the translation retains that judgment. The precise passages in Albertus, Porta and Wecker remain uncollated.

