Thus in brief. To our imagination cometh by the outward sense or memory, some object to be known (residing in the foremost part of the brain) which he misconceiving or amplifying, presently communicates to the heart, the seat of all affections. The pure spirits forthwith flock from the Brain to the Heart, by certain secret channels, and signifie what good or bad object was presented; [2752]which immediately bends it self to prosecute, or avoid it; and withal, draweth with it other humors to help it: So in pleasure, concur great store of purer spirits; in sadness, much melancholy blood; in ire, choler.	Briefly, it happens like this. Through the external senses or memory, some object to be understood reaches our imagination, which resides in the front part of the brain. Misconceiving or magnifying it, the imagination immediately communicates it to the heart, the seat of all emotions. The pure spirits at once flock from the brain to the heart through certain hidden channels and report what good or bad object has been presented. The heart immediately sets itself to pursue or avoid that object, drawing other humours along to assist it. Thus in pleasure, a great quantity of purer spirits gathers; in sadness, much melancholy blood; in anger, choler.[2753]

[2750] Burton. Page 92, e: “Imaginatio movet corpus, ad cujus motum excitantur humores, & Spiritus vitales, quibus alteratur.” “Imagination moves the body; at its motion the humours and vital spirits are stirred, and by these it is altered.”

[2751] Editor. The references in Burton’s body text remain part of the modern reading text. Their Latin titles are translated for readability; compressed book and chapter locators are retained without implying that every citation has been independently collated.

[2752] Burton. Page 92, f: “Eccles. 13. 26. The heart alters the countenance to good or evil, and distraction of the minde causeth distemperature of the body.” Modernized: “The heart changes the face for good or ill, and disturbance of mind causes disorder of the body.” Compare Ecclesiasticus, also called Sirach, 13:25–26 in the consulted KJV numbering; Burton’s wording is not a verbatim quotation of that version.

If the Imagination be very apprehensive, intent, and violent, it sends great store of spirits to, or from the heart, and makes a deeper impression, and greater tumult, as the humors in the body be likewise prepared, and the temperature it self ill or well disposed, the passions are longer and stronger: So that the first step and fountain of all our grievances in this kinde, is [2754]læsa Imaginatio, which mis-informing the Heart, causeth all these distemperatures, alteration and confusion of spirits and humors.	If the imagination is highly receptive, intent and violent, it sends a great quantity of spirits to or from the heart, making a deeper impression and a greater disturbance. As the bodily humours are correspondingly prepared, and the constitution itself is ill or well disposed, the passions last longer and grow stronger. The first beginning and source of all our troubles of this kind is therefore "impaired imagination," which misinforms the heart and causes all these disorders, this alteration and confusion of spirits and humours.
Source page 92–93 By means of which, so disturbed, concoction is hindred, and the principal parts are much debilitated; as [2755]Dr Navarra well declared, being consulted by Montanus about a melancholy Jew. The spirits so confounded, the nourishment must needs be abated, bad humors increased, crudities and thick spirits ingendred with melancholy blood. The other parts cannot perform their functions, having the spirits drawn from them by vehement passion, but fail in sense and motion; so we look upon a thing, and see it not; hear, and observe not; which otherwise would much affect us, had we been free.	With these so disturbed, digestion is hindered and the principal organs greatly weakened, as Dr Navarra explained well when Montanus consulted him about a Jewish man suffering from melancholy. With the spirits so disordered, nourishment must necessarily diminish, bad humours increase, and undigested matter and thick spirits be generated together with melancholy blood. The other parts, deprived of their spirits by violent passion, cannot perform their functions: sensation and movement fail. Thus we look at something without seeing it, or hear without noticing, although it would otherwise affect us deeply if we were free from that passion.[2756]

[2756] Editor. Concoction means digestion; crudities are incompletely digested material. The account explains failures of attention through bodily spirits diverted by emotion.

Source page 93 I may therefore conclude with [2757]Arnoldus, Maxima vis est phantasiæ, & huic uni ferè, non autem corporis intemperiei, omnis melancholiæ causa est ascribenda: Great is the force of Imagination, and much more ought the cause of melancholy to be ascribed to this alone, then to the distemperature of the body.	I may therefore conclude with Arnoldus: "The power of imagination is very great, and almost the whole cause of melancholy should be ascribed to this alone, rather than to an imbalance of the body." Great is the force of imagination, and the cause of melancholy should be attributed far more to this alone than to bodily disorder.
Of which Imagination, because it hath so great a stroke in producing this malady, and is so powerful of it self, it will not be improper to my discourse, to make a brief Digression, and speak of the force of it, and how it causeth this alteration. Which maner of Digression, howsoever some dislike, as frivolous and impertinent, yet I am of [2758]Beroaldus his opinion, Such Digressions do mightily delight and refresh a weary Reader, they are like sauce to a bad stomack, and I do therefore most willingly use them.	Since imagination has so great a part in producing this illness and is so powerful in itself, it will suit my discourse to make a brief digression on its force and the way it causes this alteration. Although some dislike this kind of digression as frivolous and irrelevant, I share Beroaldus's opinion: such digressions greatly delight and refresh a weary reader; they are like sauce to a poor appetite, and I therefore use them most willingly.[2759]

"Digressions of this kind commonly give agreeable pleasure, pleasantly revive a weary reader and restore a queasy stomach as though with a seasoning; and I gladly digress."

Subsect. 2. Of the force of Imagination.	Subsection 2. The power of imagination.
What Imagination is, I have sufficiently declared in my Digression of the Anatomy of the soul. I will onely now point at the wonderful effects and power of it; which, as it is eminent in all, so most especially it rageth in melancholy persons, in keeping the species of objects so long, mistaking, amplifying them by continual and [2760]strong meditation, until at length it produceth in some parties real effects, causeth this, and many other maladies.	I have sufficiently explained what imagination is in my Digression on the Anatomy of the Soul. Now I will only point to its extraordinary effects and power. Prominent in everyone, it rages most fiercely in melancholy people, retaining the mental images of objects for so long, misconceiving and magnifying them through continual, intense meditation, until at last it produces real effects in some people, causing this and many other illnesses.[2761]
And although this Phantasie of ours, be a subordinate faculty to reason, and should be ruled by it, yet in many men, through inward or outward distemperatures, defect of Organs, which are unapt or hindered, or otherwise contaminated, it is likewise unapt, hindred, and hurt.	Although this imagination of ours is a faculty subordinate to reason and should be governed by it, in many people it too becomes unfit, obstructed and damaged through internal or external disorders, or defects in its organs, which are unfit, obstructed or otherwise impaired.

[2760] Burton. Page 93, k: “Ab imaginatione oriuntur affectiones, quibus anima componitur, aut turbata deturbatur, Jo. Sarisbur. Matolog. lib. 4. c. 10.” “From imagination arise the emotions by which the soul is composed or, when disturbed, thrown into disorder.” John of Salisbury, Metalogicon 4.10. Burton adapts the chapter heading, replacing its introductory wording with Ab imaginatione and retaining the ensuing clause. The printed abbreviation Matolog. is preserved.

[2761] Editor. Species are the forms or mental images through which objects are represented to the mind. Meditation here includes prolonged, absorbed thinking, without implying a particular religious practice.

Original text 1651	Modern English
This we see verified in sleepers, which by reason of humors, and concourse of vapors troubling the Phantasie, imagine many times absurd and prodigious things, and in such as are troubled with Incubus, or Witch-ridden (as we call it) if they lie on their backs, they suppose an old woman rides, and sits so hard upon them, that they are almost stifled for want of breath; when there is nothing offends, but a concourse of bad humors, which trouble the Phantasie.	We see this confirmed in sleepers, who often imagine absurd and monstrous things because humours and a gathering of vapours trouble their imagination. So too those troubled by incubus, or "witch-ridden," as we call it: if they lie on their backs, they suppose that an old woman rides them, sitting so heavily on them that they are almost suffocated for lack of breath, when nothing is harming them except a gathering of bad humours disturbing their imagination.[2762]
This is likewise evident in such as walk in the night in their sleep, and do strange feats: [2763]These vapors move the Phantasie, the Phantasie the Appetite, which moving the animal spirits, causeth the body to walk up and down, as if they were awake. Fracast. l. 3. de intellect. refers all Extasies to this force of Imagination, such as lie whole days together in a trance: as that Priest whom [2764]Celsus speaks of, that could separate himself from his senses when he list, and lie like a dead man, void of life and sense. Cardan brags of himself, that he could do as much, and that when he list.	This is also evident in those who walk at night in their sleep and perform strange feats. These vapours stir the imagination, the imagination stirs the appetite, and the appetite, moving the animal spirits, causes the body to walk about as though awake. Fracastoro, in On the Intellect, book 3, attributes all trances to this power of imagination: people who lie entranced for whole days together, for example, or that priest mentioned by Celsus who could withdraw from his senses whenever he wished and lie like a dead man, without life or sensation. Cardan boasts that he could do as much himself, whenever he pleased.[2765]

[2762] Editor. Incubus here denotes an oppressive nightmare experience, described as being ridden or crushed in sleep. Burton substitutes an explanation through humours and imagination for the supposed old woman. The physiological explanation is his historical account.

Source page 93–94 Many times such men when they come to themselves, tell strange things of Heaven and Hell, what visions they have seen; as that Sir Owen in Matthew Paris, that went into St Patricks Purgatory, and the Monk of Evesham in the same Author. Those common apparitions in Bede and Gregory, Saint Brigets revelations, Wier. l. 3. de lamiis c. 11. Cæsar Vanninus in his Dialogues, &c. reduceth, (as I have formerly said;) with all those tales of Witches progresses, dancing, riding, transformations, operations, &c. to the force of [2766]Imagination, and the [2767]Devils illusions.	Often, when such people come to themselves, they tell strange things about heaven and hell and the visions they have seen: like Sir Owen in Matthew Paris, who entered St Patrick's Purgatory, and the monk of Evesham in the same author. Those familiar apparitions in Bede and Gregory, St Bridget's revelations, and all those tales of witches' journeys, dancing, riding, transformations and operations, and so on, are attributed, as I have already said, to the power of imagination and the devil's illusions by Weyer in On Witches, book 3, chapter 11, and Cesare Vanini in his Dialogues, among others.[2768]
Source page 94 The like effects almost are to be seen in such as are awake: How many Chimæras, Anticks, Golden Mountains and Castles in the Air do they build unto themselves? I appeal to Painters, Mechanicians, Mathematicians. Some ascribe all vices to a false and corrupt Imagination, Anger, Revenge, Lust, Ambition, Covetousness, which prefers falshood, before that which is right and good, deluding the Soul with false shews and suppositions.	Almost the same effects can be seen in those who are awake. How many chimeras, grotesques, golden mountains and castles in the air they build for themselves! I appeal to painters, makers of machines and mathematicians. Some attribute all vices—anger, revenge, lust, ambition and greed—to a false and corrupted imagination, which prefers falsehood to what is right and good, deceiving the soul with false appearances and suppositions.[2769]

Wier." "Wicked women consecrate themselves to the demon with words and anointings. He uses them for his work, governs their imagination and leads them to the places they desire, while their bodies remain without sensation. The devil covers these with a shadow so no one can see them; afterwards, removing the shadow, he restores the women to their own bodies." Weyer, book 3, chapter 11.

[2770]Bernardus Penotus will have heresie and superstition to proceed from this fountain; as he falsly imagineth, so he believeth; and as he conceiveth of it, so it must be, and it shall be, contra gentes, he will have it so. But most especially in passions and affections, it shews strange and evident effects: what will not a fearful man conceive in the dark? what strange formes of Bugbears, Devils, Witches, Goblins? Lavater imputes the greatest cause of spectrums, and the like apparitions, to fear, which above all other passions, begets the strongest Imagination, (saith [2771]Wierus) and so likewise love, sorrow, joy, &c.	Bernardus Penotus maintains that heresy and superstition spring from this source: as a person falsely imagines, so he believes; as he conceives a thing, so it must be and shall be—"against the whole world," he insists on it. But imagination shows its strange and unmistakable effects most especially in passions and emotions. What will a frightened person not imagine in the dark? What strange shapes of bogeys, devils, witches and goblins! Lavater makes fear the chief cause of spectres and similar apparitions. Above all other passions, fear produces the strongest imagination, says Weyer; so too do love, sorrow, joy and the rest.
Some dye suddenly, as she that saw her son come from the battel at Cannæ, &c. Jacob the Patriark, by force of Imagination, made peckled Lambs, laying peckled rods before his sheep. Persina that Æthiopian Queen in Heliodorus, by seeing the picture of Perseus and Andromeda, in stead of a Blackmoor, was brought to bed of a fair white childe.	Some die suddenly, like the woman who saw her son return from the battle of Cannae. The patriarch Jacob, through the force of imagination, produced speckled lambs by laying speckled rods before his sheep.[2772] Persinna, the Ethiopian queen in Heliodorus, looked at a picture of Perseus and Andromeda and gave birth to a beautiful white child instead of a black one.[2773]

[2772] Editor. Livy 22.7.13 tells of two mothers dying when their sons returned after Lake Trasimene, rather than Cannae. Burton's battle name is retained. Jacob's rods occur in Genesis 30:37–43; attributing their effect specifically to imagination is Burton's explanatory reading.

In imitation of whom belike, * an hard favoured fellow in Greece, because he and his wife were both deformed, to get a good brood of children, Elegantissimas imagines in thalamo collocavit, &c. hung the fairest pictures he could buy for money in his chamber, That his wife by frequent sight of them, might conceive and bear such children. And if we may beleeve Bale, one of Pope Nicholas the thirds Concubines, by seeing of [2774]a Bear, was brought to bed of a monster.	Perhaps in imitation of her, an ugly fellow in Greece, since both he and his wife were ill formed, sought to beget a handsome family: "he placed the most beautiful pictures in his bedchamber," and so on. He hung the finest pictures money could buy in his room so that his wife, frequently seeing them, might conceive and bear children like them. And if we may believe Bale, one of Pope Nicholas III's concubines gave birth to a monster after seeing a bear.[2775]
If a woman (saith [2776]Lemnius) at the time of her conception, think of another man present, or absent, the childe will be like him. Great bellied women, when they long, yeeld us prodigious examples in this kinde, as Moles, Warts, Scars, Harelips, Monsters, especially caused in their children by force of a depraved phantasie in them: Ipsam speciem quam animo effigiat, foetui inducit: She imprints that stamp upon her childe, which she [2777]conceives unto her self.	If a woman, says Lemnius, thinks of another man, present or absent, at the time of conception, her child will resemble him. Pregnant women with cravings give us extraordinary examples of this kind: moles, warts, scars, cleft lips and monstrous births, caused in their children especially by the force of their own disordered imagination. "She impresses upon the foetus the very form she pictures in her mind": she stamps upon her child the image she conceives within herself.[2778]

[2778] Editor. This is the historical theory of maternal impression: an image or craving was supposed to mark or shape the developing child. The claim that a mother's thoughts stamp birthmarks or malformations onto her child is not an established causal explanation. Burton's language of disordered imagination records the period belief, not a finding about maternal responsibility.

And therefore Lodovicus Vives, lib. 2. de Christ. fæm. gives a special caution to great bellied women, [2779]That they do not admit such absurd conceits and cogitations, but by all means avoid those horrible objects, heard or seen, or filthy spectacles. Some will laugh, weep, sigh, groan, blush, tremble, sweat, at such things as are suggested unto them by their Imagination.	And therefore Luis Vives, in On the Christian Woman, book 2, particularly warns pregnant women not to admit such absurd fancies and thoughts, but by every means to avoid those horrible things heard or seen, or filthy spectacles. Some people laugh, weep, sigh, groan, blush, tremble or sweat at things suggested to them by their imagination.
Source page 94–95 Avicenna speaks of one that could cast himself into a Palsie when he list; and some can imitate the tunes of Birds and Beasts, that they can hardly be discerned: Dagebertus and Saint Francis Scars and Wounds, like to those of Christs (if at the least any such were) [2780]Agrippa supposeth to have hapned by force of Imagination: that some are turned to Wolves, from Men to Women, and Women again to Men (which is constantly believed) to the same Imagination; or from Men to Asses, Dogs, or any other shapes.	Avicenna speaks of someone who could bring on paralysis whenever he wished; and some can imitate the sounds of birds and beasts so closely that the difference can scarcely be detected. Agrippa supposes that Dagebertus's and St Francis's scars and wounds, resembling Christ's —if indeed there ever were any such—arose through the force of imagination. To the same imagination he attributes people's transformation into wolves, from men into women and women back into men, which is firmly believed, or from men into asses, dogs or any other shapes.[2781]

Source page 95 [2782]Wierus ascribes all those famous transformations, to Imagination: that in Hydrophobia they seem to see the picture of a Dog, still in their water, [2783]that melancholy men, and sick men, conceive so many phantastical visions, apparitions to themselves, and have such absurd apparitions, as that they are Kings, Lords, Cocks, Bears, Apes, Owls; that they are heavy, light, transparent, great and little, sensless and dead (as shall be shewed more at large, in our [2784]Sections of Symptomes) can be imputed to naught else, but to a corrupt, false, and violent Imagination.	Weyer attributes all those famous transformations to imagination. That sufferers from hydrophobia seem constantly to see the image of a dog in their urine; that melancholy and sick people conceive so many fantastic visions and apparitions, entertaining such absurd images as that they are kings, lords, cocks, bears, apes or owls; that they are heavy, light, transparent, large or small, without sensation or dead, as will be shown more fully in our sections on symptoms: all this can be attributed only to a corrupted, false and violent imagination.[2785]
It works not in sick and melancholy men onely, but even most forcibly sometimes in such as are sound: it makes them suddenly sick, and [2786]alters their temperature in an instant. And sometimes a strong conceit or apprehension, as [2787]Valesius proves, will take away Diseases: in both kindes it will produce real effects. Men if they see but another man tremble, giddy or sick of some fearful disease, their apprehension and fear is so strong in this kinde, that they will have the same Disease.	It works not only in sick and melancholy people, but sometimes with the greatest force in those who are healthy, suddenly making them ill and altering their constitution in an instant. Sometimes, too, a strong idea or impression will remove diseases, as Valesius demonstrates: in either direction it produces real effects. If people merely see someone else trembling, dizzy or sick with some fearful disease, their apprehension and fear are so strong that they develop that same disease.

Or if by some South-sayer, Wiseman, Fortune-teller, or Physitian, they be told they shall have such a Disease, they will so seriously apprehend it, that they will instantly labor of it. A thing familiar in China, (saith Riccius the Jesuite) [2788]If it be told them they shall be sick on such a day, when that day comes, they will surely be sick, and will be so terribly afflicted, that sometimes they die upon it.	Or if some soothsayer, wise man, fortune-teller or physician tells them they will have a particular disease, they take the prediction so much to heart that they immediately suffer from it. This is familiar in China, says Ricci the Jesuit: if people are told they will be ill on a certain day, when that day comes they will certainly be ill, and so terribly afflicted that they sometimes die of it.[2789]
Dr Cotta in his Discovery of ignorant Practitioners of Physick, cap. 8. hath two strange stories to this purpose, what phansie is able to do. The one of a Parsons wife in Northamptonshire, An. 1607. that coming to a Physitian, and told by him that she was troubled with the Sciatica, as he conjectured, (a disease she was free from) the same night after her return, upon his words, fell into a grievous fit of a Sciatica. And such another example he hath of another good wife, that was so troubled with the cramp, after the same maner she came by it, because her Physitian did but name it.	Dr Cotta, in chapter 8 of his Discovery of Ignorant Practitioners of Medicine, has two strange stories showing what imagination can do. One concerns a parson's wife in Northamptonshire in 1607. She went to a physician, who told her that he thought she was suffering from sciatica, a disease she did not have. That very night, after returning home, she suffered a severe attack of sciatica because of his words. He gives a similar example of another housewife troubled by cramp, which she acquired in the same way merely because her physician named it.[2790]

"Many give such credit to these foretellers that fear itself makes the prediction true: if they are told that illness will seize them on a certain day, when it arrives they fall ill and, stricken by the force of fear, struggle with sickness and sometimes even death." The Christian Expedition to China, book 1, chapter 9.

[2790] Editor. John Cotta's A Short Discovery of the Unobserved Dangers of Several Sorts of Ignorant and Inconsiderate Practisers of Physic in England appeared in 1612. Burton shortens its title. The two anecdotes and his chapter number are retained; comparison with the full chapter remains pending.

Sometimes death it self is caused by force of Phantasie. I have heard of one that coming by chance in company of him that was thought to be sick of the Plague (which was not so) fell down suddenly dead. Another was sick of the Plague with conceit. One seeing his fellow let blood, falls down in a sown. Another (saith [2791]Cardan out of Aristotle) fell down dead which is familiar to women at any gastly sight) seeing but a man hanged.	Sometimes the force of imagination causes death itself. I have heard of someone who happened to come into the company of a man thought to have the plague, although he did not, and suddenly fell down dead. Another fell ill with the plague through the mere thought of it. One person faints at the sight of his companion being bled. Another, Cardan says on Aristotle's authority, fell down dead merely from seeing a man hanged—as commonly happens to women at any ghastly sight.[2792]
A Jew in France (saith [2793]Lodovicus Vives) came by chance over a dangerous passage, or plank, that lay over a Brook in the dark, without harm, the next day perceiving what danger he was in, fell down dead. Many will not beleeve such stories to be true, but laugh commonly, and deride when they hear of them; but let these men consider with themselves, as [2794]Peter Byarus illustrates it, If they were set to walk upon a plank on high, they would be giddy, upon which they dare securely walk upon the ground.	A Jewish man in France, says Luis Vives, happened to cross a dangerous passage, a plank laid over a brook, in the dark without coming to harm. The next day, realizing the danger he had been in, he fell down dead. Many will not believe such stories, but usually laugh and scoff when they hear them. Yet let them consider, as Peter Byarus illustrates the point, that if they were made to walk on a plank high above the ground, they would grow dizzy, though they would confidently walk on the same plank at ground level.

[2792] Editor. Burton passes from reported anecdotes to sweeping claims about illness and women. These are preserved as his claims. The original has an unmatched closing parenthesis after "sight"; the modern version expresses the intended aside with a dash.

Many (saith Agrippa) [2795]strong hearted men otherwise, tremble at such sights, dazel, and are sick, if they look but down from an high place, and what moves them but conceit? As some are so molested by Phantasie; so some again by Fancy alone, and a good conceit, are as easily recovered.	Many men otherwise stout-hearted, says Agrippa, tremble at such sights, become dizzy and feel sick merely from looking down from a high place. And what affects them except an idea in the mind? Just as some are troubled in this way by imagination, others are as easily restored by imagination alone and a favourable expectation.
Source page 95–96 We see commonly the Tooth-ache, Gout, Falling-sickness, biting of a mad Dog, and many such maladies cured by Spels, Words, Characters, and Charms, and many green wounds by that now so much used Unguentum Armarium, magnetically cured, which Crollius and Goclenius in a book of late hath defended, Libavius in a just Tract as stifly contradicts, and most men controvert.	We commonly see toothache, gout, epilepsy, the bite of a mad dog and many such ailments cured by spells, words, written symbols and charms; and many fresh wounds healed magnetically by that “weapon salve” now so widely used, which Crollius and Goclenius have recently defended in print, Libavius just as firmly opposes in a full treatise, and most people dispute.[2796]

[2796] Editor. Green wounds are fresh wounds; characters are inscribed signs. Unguentum Armarium is weapon salve. Magnetically describes an alleged action at a distance, by sympathy. Burton reports the controversy among Crollius, Goclenius and Libavius; their particular treatises await collation.

Source page 96 All the world knows there is no vertue in such Charms, or Cures, but a strong conceit and opinion alone, as [2797]Pomponatius holds, which forceth a motion of the humors, spirits, and blood, which takes away the cause of the malady from the parts affected. The like we may say of our Magicall effects, superstitious cures, and such as are done by Mountebanks and Wizards. As by wicked incredulity many men are hurt (so saith [2798]Wierus of Charms, Spels, &c.) we finde in our experience, by the same means many are relieved.	Everyone knows that such charms or cures have no power beyond strong imagination and belief alone, which, as Pomponazzi maintains, set the humours, spirits and blood in motion and remove the cause of illness from the affected parts. We may say the same of magical effects, superstitious cures and those performed by quacks and wizards. Just as many people are harmed by wicked disbelief, says Weyer of charms, spells and the like, so we find from experience that many are relieved by the same means.[2799]
An Empirick oftentimes, and a silly Chyrurgian, doth more strange cures, then a rationall Physitian. Nymannus gives a reason, because the Patient puts his confidence in him, [2800]which Avicenna prefers before Art, Precepts, and all Remedies whatsoever. 'Tis opinion alone (saith [2801]Cardan) that makes, or marrs Physitians, and he doth the best cures, according to Hippocrates, in whom most trust.	An empiric or a simple surgeon often performs more extraordinary cures than a learned physician. Nymannus gives the reason: the patient places his confidence in him, and Avicenna ranks that confidence above medical skill, rules and every remedy whatsoever. Belief alone, says Cardan, makes or ruins physicians; and according to Hippocrates, the one most trusted performs the best cures.[2802]

"Imagination causes a sudden movement of humours and spirits; the blood is swept along by the varying emotion, at the same time removing the causes of illness from the affected parts." Pomponazzi, On Incantation.

[2798] Burton. Page 96, asterisk: "Lib. 3. c. 18. de præstig. Ut impia credulitate quis læditur, sic & levari eundem credibile est, usuque observatum." "As someone is harmed by impious credulity, so it is credible, and observed in practice, that the same person may also be relieved." Weyer, On the Deceptions of Demons, book 3, chapter 18.

[2799] Editor. The 1651 body prints incredulity, "disbelief," while the marginal Latin has credulitate, "credulity" or ready belief. The same disagreement appears in the BSB 1651 copy, at its first printed page 96 (Archive n187). Both readings are retained and translated separately. Agreement between two copies of this edition confirms the reading, but does not resolve its origin; other editions and Weyer's text still require collation.

[2801] Burton. Page 96, k: "Plures sanat in quem plures confidunt. lib. de sapientia." "He cures more people in whom more people trust." Cardan, On Wisdom.

So diversly doth this phantasie of ours affect, turn and winde, so imperiously command our bodies, which as another [2803]Proteus, or a Cameleon, can take all shapes; and is of such force (as Ficinus adds) that it can work upon others, as well as our selves. How can otherwise blear-eyes in one man, cause the like affection in another? Why doth one mans yawning[2804], make another yawn? One mans pissing provoke a second many times to do the like? Why doth scraping of trenchers offend a third, or hacking of files?	So variously does this imagination of ours affect, twist and turn, so imperiously command our bodies: like another Proteus or a chameleon, it can take every shape. Its power is so great, Ficino adds, that it can work upon others as well as ourselves. How else can sore eyes in one person cause the same complaint in another? Why does one person's yawning make another yawn? Why does one man's pissing often prompt a second to do the same? Why is a third disturbed by the scraping of wooden plates or the rasping of files?[2805]
Why doth a Carkass bleed, when the murtherer is brought before it, some weeks after the murther hath been done? Why do Witches and old women, fascinate and bewitch children: but as Wierus, Paracelsus, Cardan, Mizaldus, Valleriola, Cæsar Vanninus, Campanella, and many Philosophers think, the forcible imagination of the one party, moves and alters the spirits of the other.	Why does a corpse bleed when the murderer is brought before it, some weeks after the murder? Why do witches and old women cast the evil eye on children and bewitch them? It is because, as Weyer, Paracelsus, Cardan, Mizaldus, Valleriola, Cesare Vanini, Campanella and many philosophers think, one person's forceful imagination moves and alters another's spirits.[2806]

"Imagination is like Proteus or a chameleon, sometimes affecting one's own body and another's." Marsilio Ficino, Platonic Theology, book 13, chapter 18.

[2805] Editor. Proteus is the shape-changing figure of classical myth; the chameleon is proverbial for changing colour. Blear-eyes means inflamed or watery eyes, and trenchers are wooden plates. The examples join perceived contagion, imitation and unpleasant sensory responses under imagination.

[2806] Editor. The bleeding-corpse story reflects the belief that a murdered body would bleed in its killer's presence. Fascinate means to bewitch, especially through the eyes. Burton presents these alongside ordinary bodily responses as examples needing the same explanation.

Nay more, they can cause and cure not only diseases, maladies, and severall infirmities, by this means, as Avicenna de anim. l. 4. sect. 4. supposeth, in parties remote, but move bodies from their places, cause thunder, lightnings, tempests, which opinion Alkindus, Paracelsus, and some others approve of. So that I may certainly conclude, this strong conceit or imagination, is astrum hominis, and the rudder of this our ship, which reason should steer, but overborn by phantasie, cannot manage, and so suffers it self, and this whole vessel of ours to be over-ruled, and often overturned.	More than this: by such means they can not only cause and cure diseases, illnesses and various infirmities in people far away, as Avicenna supposes in On the Soul, book 4, section 4, but also move bodies from their places and cause thunder, lightning and storms, an opinion approved by al-Kindi, Paracelsus and some others. Thus I may confidently conclude that this strong conception or imagination is "the human being's star," and the rudder of this ship of ours. Reason should steer it, but, overpowered by imagination, cannot control it, and so allows itself and our whole vessel to be overruled and often overturned.[2807]

[2807] Editor. Astrum hominis, "the human being's star," compares imagination's command over the body with a star's supposed governing influence. The ship and rudder analogy brings the discussion back to the relation between reason and the passions.

I have thus far digressed, because this imagination is the medium deferens of passions, by whose means they work and produce many times prodigious effects; and as the phantasie is more or less intended or remitted, and their humours disposed, so do perturbations move more or less, and take deeper impression.	I have digressed this far because imagination is the “conveying medium” of the passions: through it they work and often produce extraordinary effects. As imagination is more or less heightened or relaxed, and according to the disposition of the humours, so the passions act with greater or lesser force and make a deeper impression.

Perturbations and passions, which trouble the phantasie; though they dwell between the confines of Sense and Reason, yet they rather follow Sense than Reason, because they are drowned in corporeal organs of Sense. They are commonly [2810]reduced into two inclinations, Irascible, and Concupiscible. The Thomists subdivide them into eleven, six in the Coveting, and five in the Invading. Aristotle reduceth all to Pleasure and Pain; Plato to Love and Hatred; [2811]Vives to Good and Bad.	The disturbances and passions that trouble the imagination, though they inhabit the borderland between sense and reason, follow sense rather than reason, because they are immersed in the bodily organs of sense. They are commonly divided between two inclinations, the irascible and the concupiscible. The followers of Thomas Aquinas subdivide them into eleven: six belonging to the desiring faculty and five to the faculty of struggle. Aristotle reduces them all to pleasure and pain; Plato to love and hatred; Vives to good and evil.[2812]

If good, it is present, and then we absolutely joy and love: or to come, and then we desire and hope for it: If evil, we absolutely hate it: if present, it is Sorrow; if to come Fear: These four passions [2813]Bernard compares to the wheeles of a Chariot, by which we are carryed in this world. All other passions are subordinate unto these four, or six, as some will: Love, Joy, Desire, Hatred, Sorrow, Fear: The rest, as Anger, Envy, Emulation, Pride, Jealousie, Anxiety, Mercy, Shame, Discontent, Despair, Ambition, Avarice, &c. are reducible unto the first: and if they be immoderate, they [2814]consume the spirits, and melancholy is especially caused by them.	If the object is good, it is either present, and then we simply rejoice in it and love it; or still to come, and then we desire and hope for it. If it is evil, we simply hate it: if present, it brings sorrow; if still to come, fear. Bernard compares these four passions to the wheels of a chariot that carries us through this world. All other passions fall under these four—or six, as some would have it: love, joy, desire, hatred, sorrow and fear. The rest, such as anger, envy, rivalry, pride, jealousy, anxiety, pity, shame, discontent, despair, ambition, greed and so on, can be reduced to these primary passions. When excessive, they consume the spirits and are especially productive of melancholy.[2815]

[2813] Burton. Page 97, p: “Scr. 35. Hæ quatuor passiones sunt tanquam rotæ in curru, quibus vehimur hoc mundo.” “These four passions are like the wheels of a chariot, by which we are carried through this world.” Bernard, sermon 35 as cited; precise collection unverified.

[2815] Editor. “Emulation” here is rivalry; “mercy,” pity or compassion. The “spirits” are the subtle bodily agents of early modern physiology. Burton moves between different classifications rather than offering one fixed list: the four traditionally principal passions are joy, desire, sorrow and fear.

Some few discreet men there are, that can govern themselves, and curb in these inordinate Affections, by Religion, Philosophy, and such divine Precepts, of meekness, patience, and the like; but most part for want of government, out of indiscretion, ignorance, they suffer themselves wholly to be led by sense; and are so far from repressing rebellious inclinations, that they give all incouragement unto them, leaving the raynes, and using all provocations to further them: bad by Nature, worse by Art, Discipline, [2816]Custome, Education, and a perverse will of their own, they follow on, wheresoever their unbridled Affections will transport them, and do more out of custome, self-will, than out of Reason.	A few judicious people can govern themselves and curb these unruly emotions through religion, philosophy and divine precepts of meekness, patience and the like. But most, lacking self-control through poor judgement and ignorance, let themselves be led entirely by sense. Far from repressing their rebellious inclinations, they give them every encouragement, dropping the reins and using every stimulus to spur them on. Bad by nature and made worse by artifice, training, habit, education and their own perverse will, they follow wherever their unbridled emotions carry them, acting more from habit and wilfulness than from reason.

Contumax voluntas, as Melancthon cals it, malum facit: this stubborn will of ours perverts judgment, which sees and knows what should and ought to be done, and yet will not do it. Mancipia gulæ, slaves to their several lusts, and appetite, they precipitate and plunge [2817]themselves into a Labyrinth of cares, blinded with lust, blinded with ambition; [2818]They seek that at Gods hands, which they may give unto themselves, if they could but refrain from those cares, and perturbations, wherewith they continually macerate their mindes. But giving way to these violent passions of fear, grief, shame, revenge, hatred, malice, &c. they are torn in pieces, as Actæon was with his dogs, and [2819]crucifie their own souls.	"A stubborn will," as Melanchthon calls it, "does evil": this obstinate will of ours perverts judgement, which sees and knows what should and ought to be done, yet refuses to do it. "Slaves to the belly," slaves to their various lusts and appetites, they fling and plunge themselves into a labyrinth of cares, blinded by lust, blinded by ambition. They ask God for what they could give themselves, if only they could restrain the cares and disturbances with which they continually wear away their minds. But by yielding to these violent passions of fear, grief, shame, revenge, hatred, malice and so on, they are torn to pieces, as Actaeon was by his dogs, and crucify their own souls.[2820]

"Many, blinded by ambition and desires, plunge into unrest. They do not understand that they ask the gods for what they could provide for themselves, if they wished to command the cares and disturbances with which they constantly wear themselves away."

[2821]In this Catalogue of Passions, which so much torment the Soul of man, and cause this malady (for I will briefly speak of them all, and in their order) the first place in this Irascible appetite, may justly be challenged by Sorrow. An inseparable companion, [2822]The mother and daughter of melancholy, her Epitome, Symptome, and chief cause: as Hippocrates hath it: They beget one another, and tread in a ring, for Sorrow is both Cause and Symptome of this disease. How it is a Symptome shall be shewed in his place.	In this catalogue of passions that so greatly torment the human soul and cause this illness—for I shall speak briefly of them all, in order—sorrow may justly claim first place within the irascible appetite. An inseparable companion, it is melancholy's mother and daughter, its epitome, symptom and principal cause, as Hippocrates puts it. They beget one another and move in a circle, for sorrow is both a cause and a symptom of this disease. How it is a symptom will be shown in its proper place.[2823]

[2822] Burton. Repeated page 96, x: "Timor & mœstitia, si diu perseverent, causæ & soboles atri humoris sunt, & in circulum se procreant. Hip. Aphorism. 23. l. 6. Idem Montaltus cap. 19. Victorius Faventinus pract. imag." "Fear and sadness, if they persist long, are causes and offspring of black humour, and generate each other in a circle." Hippocrates, Aphorisms 6.23; the same in Montalto, chapter 19, and Vittori of Faenza, Practica, here abbreviated pract. imag.

That it is a cause all the world acknowledgeth, Dolor nonnullis insaniæ causa fuit, & aliorum morborum insanabilium, saith Plutarch to Apollonius; a cause of madness, a cause of many other diseases, a sole cause of this mischief, [2824]Lemnius cals it. So doth Rhasis cont. l. 1. tract. 9. Guianerius Tract. 15. c. 5. And if it take root once, it ends in despair, as [2825]Felix Plater observes, and as in a [2826]Cebes table, may well be coupled with it.	That it is a cause, everyone acknowledges. "Grief has caused madness in some people, and other incurable diseases," says Plutarch to Apollonius. A cause of madness, a cause of many other diseases, and a cause sufficient by itself to produce this affliction: so Lemnius calls it. So do Rhazes in the Continens, book 1, treatise 9, and Guianerius in treatise 15, chapter 5. Once it takes root, it ends in despair, as Felix Platter observes, and may well be coupled with despair, as in the Tablet of Cebes.[2827]

"Much care and sadness bring on melancholy; if it takes root for long, it degenerates into true, fixed melancholy and ends in despair." On Mental Alienation, chapter 3, cited under Platter.

[2829] Editor. Olympias was the recipient of Chrysostom’s letters from exile. The letter number and Burton’s Latin wording remain to be collated. “Ague” means fever here; the strappado was a form of suspension torture. The escalating images preserve Burton’s account of grief as both bodily and spiritual torment.

'Tis the Eagle without question which the Poets fained to gnaw [2830]Prometheus heart, and no heaviness is like unto the heaviness of the heart, Ecclus 25.15,16. [2831]Every perturbation is a misery, but grief a cruel torment, a domineering passion: as in old Rome, when the Dictator was created, all inferior magistracies ceased: when grief appears, all other passions vanish. It dries up the bones, saith Solomon, c. 17. Pro. makes them hollow-ey'd, pale, and lean, furrow faced, to have dead looks, wrinkled browes, riveled cheeks, dry bodies, and quite perverts their temperature that are misaffected with it.	It is unquestionably the eagle that the poets imagined gnawing Prometheus's heart; and no heaviness compares with heaviness of heart, Ecclesiasticus 25:15–16. Every disturbance is a misery, but grief is a cruel torment, a domineering passion. Just as in ancient Rome all lesser magistracies ceased when a dictator was appointed, so when grief appears all other passions vanish. It dries up the bones, says Solomon in Proverbs 17. It makes its sufferers hollow-eyed, pale and thin, furrows their faces, gives them lifeless looks, wrinkled brows, shrivelled cheeks and dried-out bodies, and utterly disorders their constitution.[2832]
As Elenora that exil'd mournful Dutches (in our [2833]English Ovid) laments to her noble husband Humphry Duke of Glocester,	As Eleanor, that sorrowful exiled duchess, laments to her noble husband Humphrey, Duke of Gloucester, in the work of our English Ovid:[2834]
Sawest thou those eyes in whose sweet cheerful look, Duke Humphry once, such joy and pleasure took, Sorrow hath so despoil'd me of all grace, Thou couldst not say this was my Elnors face. Like a foule Gorgon, &c.	If you saw those eyes whose sweet and cheerful look Once gave you, Duke Humphrey, such joy and pleasure, Grief has stripped me of all beauty so completely You could not say, "This was my Eleanor's face." Like a hideous Gorgon, and so on.

[2832] Editor. "Temperature" means the balance or constitution of the humours, not a thermometer reading; "riveled" means shrivelled. Ecclesiasticus is also called Sirach. Burton's biblical numbering is preserved pending version-by-version collation; the proverb about dried bones is Proverbs 17:22. His Prometheus allusion makes the heart the seat of grief.

[2833] Burton. Repeated page 96, e: "M. Drayton in his Her. ep". Michael Drayton, England's Heroical Epistles.

Source page 96–97 repeated [PDF198–199] David confessed as much, Psal. 38.8. I have roared for the very disquietness of my heart. And Psal. 119.4. part.4.v. My soul melteth away for very heaviness, vers. 38. I am like a bottle in the smoak. Antiochus complained that he could not sleep, and that his heart fainted for grief, [2839]Christ himself, Vir dolorum, out of an apprehension of grief, did sweat blood, Mark 14. His soul was heavy to the death, and no sorrow was like unto his.	David confessed as much in Psalm 38:8: "I have roared because of the very unrest of my heart." And in Psalm 119, part 4, verse 4: "My soul melts away from sheer heaviness"; verse 38: "I am like a wineskin in the smoke." Antiochus complained that he could not sleep and that his heart fainted with grief. Christ himself, "a man of sorrows," sweated blood through the apprehension of grief, Mark 14. His soul was sorrowful to the point of death, and no sorrow equalled his.[2840]

[2839] Burton. Repeated page 97, f: "Marc. 6. 16. 11." Printed beside the Antiochus/Christ passage, with the body marker before Christ. The wording about Antiochus corresponds to 1 Maccabees 6:10–11; the printed abbreviation and numbers are retained.

[2840] Editor. Psalm 119, part 4, verse 4 corresponds to verse 28: the psalm's fourth group of eight verses begins at verse 25. The following printed "38" is an apparent reversal of 83, the wineskin passage. Burton's reference is preserved in the body. The sweating of blood belongs to Luke 22:44; Mark 14:34 supplies the sorrow unto death. "Man of sorrows" recalls Isaiah 53:3. The marginal "Marc. 6. 16. 11." is defective; Antiochus's sleepless grief is in 1 Maccabees 6:10–11.

Crato, in consultation 21, book 2, gives an example of someone made melancholy by grief; and Montanus, in consultation 30, of a noblewoman whose illness had no other cause. I. S. D., in Hildesheim, completely cured a patient who had been severely troubled with melancholy for many years. But afterwards a slight occasion for sorrow brought back his former attacks, and he suffered as before.[2844]

Examples are common, how it causeth melancholy, [2845]desperation, and sometimes death it self; for (Ecclus. 38.15.) Of heaviness comes death. Worldly sorrow causeth death, 2 Cor. 7.10. Psal. 31.10. My life is wasted with heaviness, and my years with mourning. Why was Hecuba said to be turned to a dog? Niobe into a stone? but that for grief she was sensless and stupid. Severus the Emperor [2846]dyed for grief: and how [2847]many myriads besides?	Examples abound of sorrow causing melancholy, despair and sometimes death itself; for "Death comes from heaviness," Ecclesiasticus 38:15. "Worldly sorrow causes death," 2 Corinthians 7:10. "My life is wasted with heaviness, and my years with mourning," Psalm 31:10. Why was Hecuba said to have been turned into a dog, or Niobe into a stone, except that grief left her numb and senseless? The emperor Severus died of grief—and how many tens of thousands besides?[2848]
Tanta illi est feritas, tanta est insania luctus.	So fierce is his grief, so great its madness.[2849]

[2846] Burton. Repeated page 97, l: "Herodian. l. 3. mœrore magis quam morbo consumptus est." "He was consumed more by grief than by disease." Herodian, book 3.

[2847] Burton. Repeated page 97, m: "Bothwellius atribilarius obiit Brizarrus Genuensis hist. &c." "Bothwell died melancholy." Bizzarri's Genoese history, cited in the printed form Brizarrus; the exact passage remains unlocated.

[2848] Editor. The death-from-sorrow wording appears at Sirach 38:18 in the consulted numbering, rather than Burton's 38:15. Hecuba and Niobe illustrate emotional numbness; "stupid" means stupefied. Herodian 3.15.1–2 describes Severus's illness, Caracalla's attempt to hasten his death, and his end chiefly through grief. This supports the substance of Burton's reference, without identifying his Latin version. Bizzarri's Bothwell passage remains unlocated.

[2849] Editor. Adapted from Statius, Silvae 5.5.23. The consulted Latin reads "tanta mihi feritas" ("such fierceness in me"); Burton substitutes "illi est," shifting the reference to another person. The modern version follows Burton's altered text.

Melancthon gives a reason of it, [2850]the gathering of much melancholy blood about the heart, which collection extinguisheth the good spirits, or at least dulleth them, sorrow strikes the heart, makes it tremble and pine away, with great pain: And the black blood drawn from the spleen, and diffused under the ribs, on the left side, makes those perilous hypochondriacall convulsions, which happen to them that are troubled with Sorrow.	Melanchthon gives the reason: a great quantity of melancholy blood gathers around the heart, and this accumulation extinguishes the good spirits, or at least dulls them. Sorrow strikes the heart, makes it tremble and waste away in great pain. The black blood drawn from the spleen and spread beneath the ribs on the left side causes those dangerous hypochondriacal convulsions that occur in people troubled by sorrow.[2851]

[2851] Editor. "Hypochondriacal" refers to the region beneath the ribs. Melanchthon's Book on the Soul, Corpus Reformatorum 13, columns 126 and 129, supplies the stricken heart and humour drawn from the spleen. Column 129 describes obstructions and dangerous hypochondriacal diseases, rather than Burton's flatus or convulsions. The consulted witness therefore confirms the account's substance, but does not settle Burton's wording or source edition. The English and marginal Latin remain separately translated as printed.

Subsect. 5. Fear, a Cause.	Subsection 5. Fear as a cause.
Cosen german to Sorrow, is Fear, or rather a sister, fidus Achates, and continual companion, an assistant and a principal agent in procuring of this mischief; a cause and symptome as the other. In a word, as [2852]Virgil of the Harpies, I may justly say of them both,	Fear is sorrow's first cousin—or rather its sister, its "faithful Achates" and constant companion, a helper and a principal agent in bringing about this affliction; like sorrow, it is both a cause and a symptom. In a word, I may justly say of them both what Virgil says of the Harpies:[2853]
Tristius haud illis monstrum, nec sævior ulla Pestis & ira Deum stygiis sese extulit undis. A sadder monster, or more cruel plague so fell, Or vengance of the Gods, ne'r came from Styx or Hell.	No more dreadful monster, no fiercer plague Or wrath of the gods ever rose from the waters of Styx. A sadder monster, a more cruel, deadly plague, Or vengeance of the gods never came from Styx or Hell.

[2852] Burton. Repeated page 97, o: "Lib. 3. Æn. 4." Virgil's Aeneid, book 3, as cited; the Harpies passage is at 3.214–15.

[2853] Editor. "Cosen german" means first cousin. Achates is Aeneas's faithful companion; the Harpies are the monstrous creatures described in Aeneid 3.214–15. Styx is a river of the underworld. The first two modern verse lines translate the Latin afresh; the next two modernize Burton's own English couplet.

Source page 97 repeated–98 [PDF199; supplied] This foule fiend of fear was worshipped heretofore as a God by the Lacedæmonians, and most of those other torturing [2854]affections, and so was sorrow amongst the rest, under the name of Angerona Dea, they stood in such awe of them, as Austin de Civitat. Dei, lib. 4. cap. 8. noteth out of Varro, Fear was commonly [2855]adored and painted in their Temples with a Lions head; and as Macrobius records 1. 10. Saturnalium; [2856]In the Calends of Ianuary Angerona had her holy day, to whom in the Temple of Volupia, or Goddess of pleasure, their Augures and Bishops did yearly sacrifice; that being propitious to them, she might expell all cares, anguish, and vexation of the minde for that yeer following.	This foul fiend, fear, was formerly worshipped as a god by the Spartans, as were most of those other tormenting emotions. Sorrow was among them, under the name of the goddess Angerona: such was their dread of these passions, as Augustine notes from Varro in The City of God, book 4, chapter 8. Fear was commonly worshipped and depicted in their temples with a lion's head. And as Macrobius records in Saturnalia 1.10, Angerona had her festival on the Kalends of January. In the temple of Volupia, the goddess of pleasure, their augurs and pontiffs offered her an annual sacrifice, so that, favourably disposed towards them, she might banish all cares, anguish and vexation of mind for the coming year.[2857]

"On the Kalends of January is the festival of the goddess Angerona, to whom the pontiffs offer sacrifices in Volupia's shrine, because, when propitiated, she drives away anguish and mental anxieties." The date differs from Macrobius 1.10.7; see the Editor note.

[2857] Editor. The recovered pages begin within this sentence. "Bishops" here renders pagan pontiffs; the modern side uses that term. The Kalends are the first day of a Roman month, but Macrobius, Saturnalia 1.10.7, places Angerona's festival on the twelfth day before the Kalends of January—21 December, by inclusive counting. Burton omits the qualifying date both in the body and in his Latin note; his date is preserved and explained rather than silently replaced.

Source page 98 [supplied] Many lamentable effects this Fear causeth in men, as to be red, pale, tremble, sweat, [2858]it makes sudden cold and heat to come over all the body, palpitation of the heart, Syncope, &c. It amazeth many men that are to speak, or shew themselves in publike assemblies, or before some great personages, as Tully confessed of himself, that he trembled still at the beginning of his speech; and Demosthenes that great Orator of Greece before Philippus. It confounds voice and memory, as Lucian wittily brings in Iupiter Tragœdus, so much afraid of his auditory, when he was to make a speech to the rest of the Gods, that he could not utter a ready word, but was compelled to use Mercuries help in prompting.	Fear causes many distressing effects: people flush, turn pale, tremble and sweat; sudden cold and heat run through the whole body; the heart palpitates, they faint, and so on. It overwhelms many who must speak or appear in public assemblies or before some great personage. Cicero confessed that he always trembled at the beginning of a speech, and Demosthenes, that great Greek orator, did so before Philip. It confounds voice and memory, as Lucian wittily shows in Jupiter the Tragedian: when Jupiter must address the other gods, he is so afraid of his audience that he cannot get a word out readily and has to enlist Mercury as his prompter.[2859]

Mont.” “Fear produces cold, palpitation of the heart, failure of the voice and pallor.” Agrippa, book 1, chapter 63. “The fearful always have cold spirits.” Mont., left abbreviated.

[2859] Editor. “Syncope” is fainting; “amaze” and “astonish” have the stronger sense of overwhelming or stunning. “Still” means always. Tully is Cicero; Philip is the Macedonian king. Jupiter the Tragedian is the title of Lucian’s comic dialogue; Mercury acts as a prompter. The precise Cicero and Demosthenes passages remain for collation.

Many men are so amazed and astonished with fear, [2860]they know not where they are, what they say, what they do, and that which is worst, it tortures them many dayes before with continuall affrights and suspition. It hinders most honourable attempts, & makes their hearts ake, sad and heavy. They that live in fear are never free, [2861]resolute, secure, never merry, but in continual pain: that, as Vives truely said, Nulla est miseria major quam metus, no greater misery, no rack, nor torture like unto it, ever suspicious, anxious, sollicitous, they are childishly drooping without reason, without judgment, [2862]especially if some terrible object be offered, as Plutarch hath it.	Many are so overwhelmed and stunned by fear that they do not know where they are, what they are saying or what they are doing. Worst of all, it tortures them for many days beforehand with continual terrors and suspicions. It obstructs the most honourable undertakings and leaves their hearts aching, sad and heavy. Those who live in fear are never free, resolute or secure, never cheerful, but constantly in pain. As Vives truly said, “No misery is greater than fear”: no greater misery, no rack or torture equals it. Always suspicious, anxious and worried, they droop like children, without reason or judgement, especially when confronted with something terrifying, as Plutarch puts it.

It causeth oftentimes sudden madness, and almost all maner of diseases, as I have sufficiently illustrated in my [2863]Digression of the force of Imagination, and shall do more at large in my section of [2864]Terrors. Fear makes our Imagination conceive what it list, invites the devil to come to us, as [2865]Agrippa and Cardan avouch, and tyrannizeth over our Phantasie more than all other affections, especially in the dark. We see this verified in most men, as [2866]Lavater saith, Quæ metuunt, fingunt; what they fear they conceive, and faign unto themselves; they think they see Goblins, Hagges, Devils, and many times become melancholy thereby.	It often causes sudden madness and almost every kind of disease, as I have sufficiently illustrated in my Digression on the Power of Imagination, and shall discuss more fully in my section on Terrors. Fear makes our imagination conceive whatever it pleases, invites the devil to come to us, as Agrippa and Cardan maintain, and tyrannizes over our imagination more than any other emotion, especially in the dark. We see this borne out in most people, as Lavater says: "They imagine what they fear." What they fear, they conceive and invent for themselves. They think they see goblins, hags and devils, and often become melancholy as a result.[2867]
Cardan subtil. lib. 18. hath an example of such an one, so caused to be melancholy (by sight of a bugbear) all his life after. Augustus Cæsar durst not sit in the dark, nisi aliquo assidente, saith [2868]Suetonius, Nunquam tenebris evigilavit. And 'tis strange what women and children will conceive unto themselves, if they go over a Church-yard in the night, lye, or be alone in a dark room, how they sweat and tremble on a sudden.	Cardan, in On Subtlety, book 18, gives an example of someone made melancholy in this way for the rest of his life by the sight of a frightening apparition. Augustus Caesar did not dare sit in the dark "unless someone sat beside him," says Suetonius; "he never lay awake in darkness." And it is strange what women and children will imagine if they cross a churchyard at night, lie down or remain alone in a dark room: how suddenly they sweat and tremble![2869]

Many men are troubled with future events, fore-knowledge of their fortunes, destinies, as Severus the Emperor, Adrian and Domitian, Quod sciret ultimum vitæ diem, saith Suetonius, valde solicitus, much tortured in minde because he foreknow his end; with many such, of which I shall speak more opportunely in another [2870]place. Anxiety, mercy, pity, indignation, &c. and such fearful branches derived from these two stemmes of fear and sorrow, I voluntarily omit; read more of them in [2871]Carolus Paschalius, [2872]Dandinus, &c.	Many people are troubled by future events, by foreknowledge of their fortunes and destinies, as were the emperor Severus, Hadrian and Domitian: "Because he knew the last day of his life," says Suetonius, he was "deeply anxious"—greatly tormented in mind because he foresaw his end. There are many such cases, which I shall discuss more appropriately elsewhere. Anxiety, compassion, pity, indignation and similar fearful branches growing from these two stems of fear and sorrow I deliberately pass over. Shame and Disgrace cause most violent passions, and bitter pangs. Ob pudorem & dedecus publicum, ob errorem commissum sæpe moventur generosi animi (Felix Plater lib. 3. de alienat. mentis) Generous minds are often moved with shame, to despair for some publike disgrace. And he, saith Philo lib. 2. de provid. dei, [2874]That subjects himself to fear, grief, ambition, shame, is not happy, but altogether miserable, tortured with continual labour, care, and misery.	Shame and disgrace cause the most violent emotions and bitter pangs. “Noble minds are often disturbed by shame and public dishonour, by some fault they have committed”—Felix Platter, On Mental Alienation, book 3. Noble minds are often driven by shame to despair over some public disgrace. And whoever submits himself to fear, grief, ambition and shame, says Philo in On the Providence of God, book 2, is not happy but utterly miserable, tormented by continual toil, care and suffering.[2875]

[2875] Editor. “Generous” means noble in disposition or birth, rather than willing to give. The Latin from Platter is translated before Burton’s separate English expansion, which adds despair. Philo’s reference is retained in its printed form; the precise source needs collation.

It is as forcible a batterer as any of the rest: [2876]Many men neglect the tumults of the world, and care not for glory, and yet they are afraid of infamy, repulse, disgrace, (Tul. offic. l. 1.) they can severely contemn pleasure, bear grief indifferently, but they are quite [2877]battered and broken with reproach and obloquy: (siquidem vita & fama pari passu ambulant) and are so dejected many times for some publique injury, disgrace, as a box on the ear, by their inferior, to be overcome of their adversary, foiled in the field, to be out in a speech, some foul fact committed or disclosed, &c. that they dare not come abroad all their lives after, but melancholize in corners, and keep in holes.	It strikes as hard as any of the other passions. Many people disregard the world's commotions and care nothing for glory, yet fear infamy, rejection and disgrace—Cicero, On Duties, book 1. They can sternly despise pleasure and bear grief with indifference, yet reproach and slander batter and break them completely, "since life and reputation walk hand in hand." Often they are so cast down by some public injury or disgrace—a slap on the ear from someone beneath them, defeat by an adversary, a reverse in battle, losing their way in a speech, some foul deed committed or exposed, and so on—that for the rest of their lives they dare not go out, but brood in corners and hide in holes.[2878]

[2877] Burton. Supplied page 99, k: "Gravius contumeliam ferimus quam detrimentum, ni abjecto nimis animo simus. Plut. in Timol." "We bear insult more painfully than loss, unless we are excessively abject in spirit." Plutarch, Life of Timoleon, as cited.

[2878] Editor. "Repulse" is rejection or rebuff; "to be out" in a speech is to lose one's words; a "fact" is a deed. Burton connects social humiliation with withdrawal from public life. His English says people can bear grief indifferently, whereas the marginal Latin says they are less firm under pain; the difference is retained.

The most generous spirits are most subject to it: Spiritus altos frangit & generosos: Hieronymus. Aristotle because he could not understand the motion of Euripus, for grief and shame drowned himself: Cælius Rodiginus antiquar. lec. lib. 29. cap. 8. Homerus pudore consumptus, was swallowed up with this passion of shame, [2879]because he could not unfold the fishermans riddle. Sophocles killed himself, [2880]for that a Tragedie of his was hissed off the stage: Valer. max. lib. 9. cap. 12.	The noblest spirits are most subject to it: "It breaks lofty and noble spirits," says Jerome. Aristotle drowned himself from grief and shame because he could not understand the currents of the Euripus: Caelius Rhodiginus, Ancient Readings, book 29, chapter 8. "Homer was consumed by shame": this passion swallowed him up because he could not solve the fisherman's riddle. Sophocles killed himself because one of his tragedies was hissed off the stage: Valerius Maximus, book 9, chapter 12.[2881]

[2880] Burton. Supplied page 99, m: "Ob Tragœdiam explosam, mortem sibi gladio conscivit." "Because his tragedy was hissed off, he brought death upon himself with a sword."

[2881] Editor. These are received exemplary stories, not established biographies. Euripus is the strait beside Euboea, famous for its changing currents. Valerius Maximus 9.12, external examples 3 and 5, reports Homer's fatal grief over the riddle, but says Sophocles died from joy after a theatrical victory. It does not support Burton's account of Sophocles's suicide after failure; that account and its marginal note are retained as a textual discrepancy.

Lucretia stabbed her self, and so did [2882]Cleopatra, when she saw, that she was reserved for a triumph, to avoid the infamy. Antonius the Roman, [2883]after he was overcome of his enemy, for three dayes space sat solitary in the fore-part of the Ship, abstaining from all company, even of Cleopatra her self, and afterwards for very shame, butchered himself, Plutarch vita ejus. Apollonius Rodius [2884]wilfully banished himself, forsaking his country, and all his dear friends, because he was out in reciting his Poems, Plinius lib. 7. cap. 23. Ajax ran mad, because his armes were adjudged to Ulysses.	Lucretia stabbed herself, and Cleopatra did the same when she saw that she was being kept for a triumph, to escape the dishonour. After his defeat by the enemy, Mark Antony sat alone for three days in the bow of his ship, avoiding all company, even Cleopatra's; afterwards he butchered himself from sheer shame, Plutarch, Life of Antony. Apollonius of Rhodes voluntarily went into exile, abandoning his country and all his dear friends because he faltered while reciting his poems, Pliny, book 7, chapter 23. Ajax went mad because his arms were awarded to Ulysses.[2885]

[2882] Burton. Supplied page 99, n: "cum vidit in triumphum se servari, causa ejus ignominiæ vitandæ mortem sibi conscivit. Plut." "When she saw that she was being kept for a triumph, she took her own life to avoid that dishonour." Plutarch.

[2883] Burton. Supplied page 99, o: "Bello victus, per tres dies sedit in prora navis, abstinens ab omni consortio, etiam Cleopatræ, postea se interfecit." "Defeated in war, he sat for three days in the ship's bow, avoiding all company, even Cleopatra's; later he killed himself."

[2885] Editor. A triumph could display defeated rulers as captives. Plutarch, Antony 67.4, records the three days at the prow; 76–77 places Antony's suicide later at Alexandria, following a false report of Cleopatra's death. In 86.1–3 Plutarch gives alternative accounts of her death and admits uncertainty; he does not support Burton's grouping of her with Lucretia's stabbing. "His armes" for Ajax is retained although the contest concerned Achilles's armour. The Apollonius story is not supplied by Pliny 7.23 (§87) in the consulted numbering; Burton's edition or intermediary remains unidentified.

In China 'tis an ordinary thing for such as are excluded in those famous tryals of theirs, or should take degrees, for shame and grief to lose their wits, [2886]Mat. Riccius expedit. ad Sinas l. 3. c. 9. Hostratus the Fryer took that book which Reuchlin had writ against him, under the name of Epist. obscurorum virorum, so to heart, that for shame and grief he made away himself, [2887]Iovius in elogiis.	In China it is common for those rejected in their celebrated examinations, or candidates for degrees, to lose their minds from shame and grief: Matteo Ricci, Expedition to China, book 3, chapter 9. The friar Hoogstraten took so deeply to heart the book Reuchlin had written against him, entitled Letters of Obscure Men, that shame and grief drove him to kill himself: Giovio, Eulogies.[2888]

[2887] Burton. Supplied page 99, r: "Hostratus cucullatus adeo graviter ob Reuclini librum, qui inscribitur, Epistolæ obscurorum virorum, dolore simul & pudore sauciatus, ut seipsum interfecerit." "The hooded Hoogstraten was so grievously wounded by grief and shame over Reuchlin's book entitled Letters of Obscure Men that he killed himself." This is Burton's reported claim; see the Editor note on its attribution and its stronger wording than the consulted Giovio translation.

[2888] Editor. Burton cites the account of China associated with Matteo Ricci for distress following examination failure. Hostratus is Jakob van Hoogstraten. Giovio's eulogy of Reuchlin does ascribe the Letters of Obscure Men to Reuchlin's circle and reports Hoogstraten's death from chagrin and anger, but the consulted translation does not explicitly say suicide. Modern attribution gives the principal authorship to Crotus Rubianus and Ulrich von Hutten (C. G. Nauert, New Catholic Encyclopedia). Burton's stronger claim is retained as a claim, with Latin-source collation pending.

Source page 99–100 [supplied; PDF200] A grave and learned Minister, and an ordinary Preacher at Alcmar in Holland, was one (day as he walked in the fields for his recreation) suddenly taken with a lask or looseness, and thereupon compelled to retire to the next ditch; but being surprized at unawares, by some Gentlewomen of his Parish, wandering that way; was [2889]so abashed, that he did never after shew his head in publike; or come into the Pulpit, but pined away with Melancholy: (Pet. Forestus med. observat. lib. 10. observat. 12.) So shame amongst other passions can play his prize.	A grave and learned minister, a regular preacher at Alkmaar in Holland, was one day walking in the fields for recreation when he was suddenly seized with diarrhoea and forced to withdraw to the nearest ditch. Caught unawares by some gentlewomen of his parish who were walking that way, he was so ashamed that he never again appeared in public or entered the pulpit, but wasted away with melancholy: Pieter van Foreest, Medical Observations, book 10, observation 12. Thus shame, too, can show its strength among the passions.[2890]

Printed babe retained; the exclamation is commonly babae.

[2893] Editor. Burton lists punishments and public humiliations meant to produce shame. "Carted" means paraded publicly in a cart. Ballio is the shameless pimp in Plautus's Pseudolus. His approving interjections turn abuse into applause; the long author's note preserves Burton's comic exchange. The printed babe is retained on the original side. The full exchange has not been directly collated with the play, and the Horace phrase remains unidentified.

[2894] Editor. Persius, Satire 5.103–4. Melicertes is invoked as a sea deity in a passage about an unqualified person claiming command of a ship. Burton adapts Persius's exclamet ("would cry out") to exclamat ("cries out"); frons, literally the forehead, signifies modesty or a capacity for shame.

Yet a modest man, one that hath grace, a generous spirit, tender of his reputation, will be deeply wounded, and so grievously affected with it, that he had rather give myriads of crowns, lose his life, then suffer the least defamation of honor, or blot in his good name. And if so be that he cannot avoid it, as a Nightingale, Quæ cantando victa moritur, (saith [2895]Mizaldus,) dies for shame, if another bird sing better, he languisheth and pineth away in the anguish of his spirit.	Yet a modest man, one with a sense of decency, a noble spirit sensitive about his reputation, will be deeply wounded and so grievously affected that he would rather give away tens of thousands of crowns, or lose his life, than suffer the slightest stain on his honour or blemish on his good name. If he cannot avoid it, then, like a nightingale "that dies when defeated in song," as Mizaldus says—dies of shame if another bird sings better—he languishes and wastes away in anguish of spirit.[2896]

Valescus of Taranta and Felix Platter observe that envy so gnaws at many people's hearts that they become thoroughly melancholy. That is presumably why Solomon, Proverbs 14:13, calls it "the rotting of the bones," and Cyprian "a hidden wound."[2899]

[2898] Burton. Page 100, z: "Invidia affligit homines adeo & corrodit, ut hi melancholici penitus fiant." "Envy so afflicts and eats away at people that they become thoroughly melancholy."

The Sicilian tyrants never invented the like torment. It crucifies their souls, withers their bodies, makes them hollow-ey'd, [2902]pale, lean, and gastly to behold, Cyprian ser. 2. de Zelo & livore. [2903]As a Moth gnawes a garment, so, saith Chrysostome, doth envy consume a man: to be a living Anatomy: a Skeleton, to be a lean and [2904]pale carcass, quickned with a [2905]fiend, Hall in Charact. for so often as an envious wretch sees another man prosper, to be enriched, to thrive, and be fortunate in the world, to get honors, offices, or the like, he repines and grieves.	The Sicilian tyrants never invented a torment like it. It crucifies people's souls, withers their bodies, makes them hollow-eyed, pale, thin and ghastly to behold: Cyprian, sermon 2, On Jealousy and Envy. As a moth eats a garment, says Chrysostom, so envy consumes a person, making him a living anatomical specimen, a skeleton, "a lean and pale carcass, brought to life by a fiend"—Hall, Characters. Whenever an envious wretch sees another person prosper, grow rich, thrive and succeed in the world, gain honours, offices or the like, he resents it and grieves.[2906]

It burns, scorches, torments, and destroys through wasting and squalor." Attributed to Augustine, first Sunday in Advent; exact sermon unverified.

[2906] Editor. A "living Anatomy" is an emaciated person resembling an anatomical specimen or skeleton. "Quickned" means brought to life. Hall is Joseph Hall, whose Characters is cited without a precise locator. The marginal classical and Christian images are preserved rather than absorbed into the body.

[2907] Burton. Page 101, f: "Ovid." Metamorphoses 2.780–782; Burton joins selected phrases.

[2908] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 2.780–782, describes personified Envy. Burton joins the wasting at others' success to the statement that Envy is its own punishment, omitting intervening words. The translation follows his excerpt.

He tortures himself if his equal, friend, neighbor be preferred, commended, do well, if he understand of it, it gaules him afresh, and no greater pain can come to him, then to hear of another mans wel-doing, 'tis a dagger at his heart every such object. He lookes at him, as they that fell down in Lucians rock of honor, with an envious eye, and will damage himself, to do another a mischief: Atque cadet subito, dum super hoste cadat. As he did in Æsop, lose one eye willingly, that his fellow might lose both, or that rich man in [2909]Quintilian that poysoned the flowers in his garden, because his neighbors Bees should get no more honey from them.	He tortures himself if his equal, friend or neighbour is promoted, praised or successful. Once he hears of it, it wounds him afresh; no greater pain can come to him than news of another person's good fortune. Every such sight is a dagger at his heart. He looks on with an envious eye, like those who fell from Lucian's rock of honour, and will harm himself to injure someone else: "He will fall headlong, provided he falls upon his enemy." Like the man in Aesop, he would willingly lose one eye so that his companion might lose both; or like the rich man in Quintilian who poisoned the flowers in his garden so that his neighbour's bees could gather no more honey from them.[2910]

[2909] Burton. Page 101, *: "Declam. 13. linivit flores maleficis succis in venenum mella convertens." "Declamation 13. He smeared the flowers with harmful juices, turning the honey into poison." Burton cites the declamations under Quintilian's name.

[2910] Editor. The stories turn envy into deliberate self-injury. The Latin maxim, the precise Lucian allusion and the route by which the Aesopic tale reached Burton remain unlocated. The poisoned flowers belong to the declamatory example Burton cites as Quintilian, Declamation 13; a full comparison remains pending.

His whole life is sorrow, and every word he speaks a Satyre, nothing fats him but other mens ruines. For to speak in a word, Envy is nought else but Tristitia de bonis alienis, sorrow for other mens good, be it present, past, or to come: & gaudium de adversis, and [2911]joy at their harms, opposite to mercy, [2912]which grieves at other mens mischances, and misaffects the body in another kinde; so Damascen defines it, lib. 2. de orthodox. fid. Thomas 2.2. quæst. 36. art. 1. Aristotle l. 2. Rhet. c. 4. & 10. Plato Philebo. Tully 3. Tusc. Greg. Nic. l. de virt. animæ. c. 12. Basil. de Invidia. Pindarus od. 1. ser. 5. and we finde it true.	His whole life is sorrow, and every word he speaks a satire; nothing fattens him but other people's ruin. In a word, envy is simply "sorrow at another's good fortune"—sorrow for other people's blessings, past, present or future—and "joy at adversity," joy in their suffering. It is the opposite of compassion, which grieves at other people's misfortunes and affects the body adversely in a different way. So John of Damascus defines it in On the Orthodox Faith, book 2; Thomas Aquinas, II–II, question 36, article 1; Aristotle, Rhetoric, book 2, chapters 4 and 10; Plato, Philebus; Cicero, Tusculan Disputations, book 3; Gregory of Nyssa, On the Virtue of the Soul, chapter 12; Basil, On Envy; Pindar, ode 1, series 5. And we find it true.[2913]

[2912] Burton. Page 101, h: "Misericordia etiam quæ tristitia quædam est, sæpe miserantis corpus male afficit Agrippa. l. 1. cap. 63." "Compassion too, which is a kind of sorrow, often adversely affects the body of the person who feels it." Agrippa, book 1, chapter 63.

[2913] Editor. "Mercy" here means compassion or pity, rather than remission of punishment. Burton collects related accounts rather than identical definitions: Aquinas, II–II, question 36, article 1, defines envy through sorrow at another's good. "Greg. Nic." is rendered Gregory of Nyssa; the attributed title and chapter, and the compressed Pindar reference, still require bibliographical verification.

'Tis a common disease, and almost natural to us, as [2914]Tacitus holds, to envy another mans prosperity. And 'tis in most men an incurable disease. [2915]I have read, saith Marcus Aurelius, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldee Authors, I have consulted with many wise men, for a remedy for envy, I could finde none, but to renounce all happiness, and to be a wretch, and miserable for ever. 'Tis the beginning of hell in this life, and a passion not to be excused. [2916]Every other sin hath some pleasure annexed to it, or will admit of an excuse; envy alone wants both. Other sinnes last but for a while, the gut may be satisfied, anger remits, hatred hath an end, envy never ceaseth. Cardan lib. 2. de sap.	It is a common disease, almost natural to us, as Tacitus maintains, to envy another person's prosperity. And in most people it is incurable. "I have read Greek, Hebrew and Chaldean authors," says Marcus Aurelius, "and consulted many wise men for a remedy for envy. I could find none except to renounce all happiness and remain wretched and miserable for ever." It is the beginning of hell in this life, and a passion without excuse. Every other sin has some pleasure attached to it, or admits of an excuse; envy alone lacks both. Other sins last only a while: the belly can be satisfied, anger subsides, hatred comes to an end; envy never ceases. Cardan, On Wisdom, book 2.[2917]

[2917] Editor. The saying attributed to Marcus Aurelius has not been securely located in his writings; it should not be treated as an authenticated quotation from the Meditations. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. The claims of incurability and unending envy are Burton's moral and medical rhetoric.

Divine and humane examples are very familiar, you may runne and read them, as that of Saul and David, Cain and Abel, angebat illum non proprium peccatum, sed fratris prosperitas, saith Theodoret, it was his brothers good fortune gauled him. Rachel envied her sister, being barren, Gen. 30. Iosephs bretheren him, Gen. 37. David had a touch of this vice, as he confesseth [2918]Ps. 37. [2919]Jeremy and [2920]Habbakuk, they repined at others good, but in the end they corrected themselves. Ps. 75. fret not thy self, &c. Domitian spited Agricola for his worth, [2921]that a private man should be so much glorified. [2922]Cecinna was envyed of his fellow Citizens, because he was more richly adorned.	Examples from sacred and secular history are familiar enough to read at a glance: Saul and David, Cain and Abel. “It was not his own sin that distressed him, but his brother’s prosperity,” says Theodoret; his brother’s good fortune was what galled him. Rachel, being barren, envied her sister, Genesis 30; Joseph’s brothers envied him, Genesis 37. David had a touch of this vice, as he confesses in Psalm 37. Jeremiah and Habakkuk resented the prosperity of others, but eventually corrected themselves. Psalm 75: “Do not fret,” and so on. Domitian resented Agricola’s merit—that a private man should receive such glory. Caecina was envied by his fellow citizens because he was more richly dressed.[2923]

[2923] Editor. The biblical locators are retained as printed. Compare Psalm 73:3 for envy of the foolish and Psalm 37:1 for “Fret not”; Burton’s Psalm 75 is therefore also problematic. Tacitus, Histories 2.20, supplies Caecina’s display of dress, the resentment at Salonina’s finery and the reflection on others’ recent good fortune; Burton’s marginal locator differs.

Source page 101–102 But of all others, [2924]women are most weak, ob pulchritudinem invidæ sunt fœminæ (Musæus) aut amat, aut odit, nihil est tertium (Granatensis.) They love, or hate, no medium amongst them. Implacabiles plerumque læsæ mulieres, Agrippina like, [2925]A woman if she see her neighbor more neat or elegant, richer in tires, Jewels, or apparel, is enraged, and like a Lioness sets upon her husband, railes at her, scoffes at her, and cannot abide her: so the Roman Ladies in Tacitus did at Solonina Cecinna's wife, [2926]because she had a better horse, and better furniture, as if she had hurt them with it; they were much offended: In like sort our gentlewomen do at their usual meetings, one repines or scoffes at anothers bravery and happiness.	But women, above all others, are weakest: "Women are envious over beauty"—Musaeus; "She either loves or hates; there is no third possibility"—Granatensis. They love or hate, with no middle ground. "Women, when injured, are generally implacable," like Agrippina. If a woman sees her neighbour neater or more elegant, with finer headdresses, jewels or clothes, she becomes enraged and attacks her husband like a lioness; she abuses and mocks the other woman and cannot bear her. So the Roman ladies in Tacitus reacted to Salonina, Caecina's wife: because she had a better horse and finer trappings, they were deeply offended, as if she had injured them by possessing them. Our gentlewomen behave in the same way at their usual gatherings: one resents or mocks another's finery and good fortune.[2927]

[2926] Burton. Page 101, t: "Quod insigni equo & ostro veheretur, quamquam nullius cum injuria, ornatum illum tanquam læsæ gravabantur." "Because she rode on a splendid horse and in purple, although harming no one, they resented that finery as if they had been injured." Compare Tacitus, Histories 2.20.

[2929] Editor. Myrsine is presented through an ancient agricultural compilation cited under Constantine, book 11, chapter 7. This is a received story, not a documented case history; its wording and attribution require collation. “Wench” here simply means a girl or young woman.

Subsect. 8. Æmulation, Hatred, Faction, Desire of revenge, Causes.	Subsection 8. Rivalry, hatred, faction and the desire for revenge as causes.
Out of this root of Envy, [2930]spring those ferall branches of faction, hatred, livor, emulation, which cause the like grievances, and are, serræ animæ, the sawes of the soul, [2931]consternationis pleni affectus, affections full of desperate amazement; or as Cyprian describes emulation, it is [2932]a moth of the soule, a consumption, to make another mans happiness his misery, to torture, crucifie and execute himself, to eate his owne heart. Meat and drink can do such men no good, they do alwayes grieve, sigh and groan, day and night without intermission, their brest is torne asunder:	From this root of envy spring those deadly branches—faction, hatred, spite and rivalry—which cause similar distress and are "saws of the soul," the soul's saws; "passions full of consternation," emotions filled with desperate bewilderment. Or, as Cyprian describes rivalry, it is a moth in the soul, a wasting disease: to make another person's happiness one's own misery, to torture, crucify and execute oneself, to eat one's own heart. Food and drink do such people no good. They grieve, sigh and groan continually, day and night without respite; their breast is torn apart.[2933]

[2931] Burton. Page 102, *: "Valerius l. 3. cap. 9." Valerius, book 3, chapter 9; the work is not specified.

and a little after, [2934]Whomsoever he is, whom thou dost emulate and envy, he may avoyd thee, but thou canst neither avoid him, nor thy self; wheresoever thou art, he is with thee, thine enemy is ever in thy brest, thy destruction is within thee, thou art a captive, bound hand and foot, as long as thou art malicious, and envious, and canst not be comforted. It was the devils overthrow; and whensoever thou art throughly affected with this passion, it will be thine. Yet no perturbation so frequent, no passion so common.	And a little later: Whoever it is you rival and envy, he may escape you, but you can escape neither him nor yourself. Wherever you are, he is with you; your enemy is always in your breast, your destruction within you. You are a captive, bound hand and foot as long as you remain malicious and envious, and you cannot be comforted. This was the devil's downfall; whenever this passion fully possesses you, it will be yours. Yet no disturbance is more frequent, no passion more common.[2935]

[2935] Editor. Compare Cyprian, On Jealousy and Envy, §9. The marginal Latin says the envious person cannot escape himself; Burton's English expands this to escaping neither his rival nor himself. Both forms are retained. The reference to the devil recalls §4 of the same treatise.

[2937] Editor. Hesiod, Works and Days 25–26. The Greek is translated in the first two lines; Burton's four-line English version follows separately in modernised form. Greek tekton means a carpenter or craftsman, whereas Burton's verse says "Smith." The passage belongs to Hesiod's account of productive rivalry, a distinction Burton develops below.

Every society, corporation and private family is full of it, it takes hold almost of all sorts of men, from the Prince to the Ploughman, even amongst Gossips it is to be seen, scarce three in a company but there is siding, faction, emulation between two of them, some simultas, jarre, private grudge, heartburning in the midst of them.	Every society, corporate body and private family is full of it. It takes hold of almost every kind of person, from prince to ploughman; even among familiar companions it can be seen. Scarcely three people meet without two of them taking sides, forming factions or competing, with some "enmity," quarrel, private grudge or resentment among them.[2938]
Source page 102–103 Scarce two gentlemen dwell together in the Country, (if they be not near kin or linked in marriage) but there is emulation betwixt them and their servants, some quarrel or some grudge, betwixt their wives or children, friends and followers, some contention about wealth, gentry, precedency, &c. by meanes of which, like the Frog in [2939]Æsop, that would swell till she was as big as an Oxe, burst her self at last; they will stretch beyond their fortunes, callings, and strive so long that they consume their substance in Law-suits, or otherwise in hospitality, feasting, fine clothes, to get a few bumbast titles, for ambitiosâ paupertate laboramus omnes, to outbrave one another, they will tire their bodies, macerate their soules, and through contentions or mutual invitations begger themselves.	Scarcely two gentlemen live near one another in the country, unless they are close relatives or connected by marriage, without rivalry between them and their servants; some quarrel or grudge between their wives or children, friends and followers; some dispute over wealth, ancestry, precedence and so on. As a result, like Aesop's frog, which tried to swell to the size of an ox and finally burst, they exceed their means and station, competing until they consume their property in lawsuits—or in hospitality, feasting and fine clothes to acquire a few inflated titles. For "we all suffer from ambitious poverty." To outshine one another, they exhaust their bodies, wear away their souls, and beggar themselves through disputes or competitive entertaining.[2940]

[2938] Editor. "Corporation" means an organised corporate body or community. "Gossips" can mean familiar companions and associates, especially women gathered socially; it need not mean people spreading rumours. Simultas is personal enmity or a feud.

[2939] Burton. Page 102, b: "Rana cupida æquandi bovem, se distendebat. &c." "The frog, eager to equal the ox, kept swelling herself, and so on."

[2940] Editor. "Gentry" concerns family standing or ancestry; "precedency" concerns rank and precedence. "Bumbast" means inflated or padded out. The frog-and-ox fable makes ruinous social competition literal. "Mutual invitations" are reciprocal entertainments, with each host trying to surpass the other.

Scarcely two great scholars live in the same age without bitterly attacking one another and one another's followers: Scotists and Thomists, Realists and Nominalists, Plato and Aristotle, Galenists and Paracelsians, and so on. It holds true in every profession.[2941]
Honest [2942]emulation in studies, in all callings is not to be disliked, 'tis ingeniorum cos, as one cals it, the whetstone of wit, the nurse of wit and valor, and those noble Romans out of this spirit did brave exploits; There is a modest ambition; as Themistocles was roused up with the glory of Miltiades; Achilles trophies moved Alexander,	Honourable rivalry in study and in every calling is not to be condemned. It is "the whetstone of intelligence," as someone calls it—the whetstone of wit, the nurse of intelligence and courage; that spirit inspired those noble Romans to heroic deeds. There is a restrained ambition: Themistocles was stirred by the glory of Miltiades, and Achilles's trophies moved Alexander.[2943]
[2944]Ambire semper stulta confidentia est, Ambire nunquam deses arrogantia est,	To seek advancement always is foolish presumption; To seek it never is idle arrogance.[2945]

[2941] Editor. Scotists and Thomists follow Duns Scotus and Thomas Aquinas. Realists and Nominalists dispute the status of universals; Galenists and Paracelsians represent rival medical traditions. Burton groups unlike intellectual disputes together as instances of professional antagonism, rather than describing their doctrines in detail.

[2942] Burton. Page 103, c: "Æmulatio alit ingenia: Paterculus poster. Vol." "Rivalry nourishes intellects." Velleius Paterculus, latter volume, as cited. The maxim is in Roman History 1.17.6 in the consulted division, with the word order Alit aemulatio ingenia. Burton's "latter volume" is retained; his edition remains unidentified.

'Tis a sluggish humor not to emulate or to sue at all, to withdraw himself, neglect, refrain from such places, honors, offices, through sloth, niggardliness, fear, bashfulness, or otherwise, to which by his birth, place, fortunes, education he is called, apt, fit, and well able to undergo; but when it is immoderate, it is a plague and a miserable pain.	It is a sluggish disposition never to compete or apply at all: to withdraw, neglect or refrain from positions, honours and offices through laziness, stinginess, fear, shyness or some other reason, when one's birth, standing, means and education call one to them, and one is suited, qualified and well able to undertake them. But when ambition becomes excessive, it is a plague and a miserable torment.
What a deale of money did Henry the 8. & Francis the first King of France, spend at that [2946]famous interview? and how many vain Courtiers, seeking each to outbrave other, spent themselves, their lively-hood and fortunes, and dyed beggars? [2947]Adrian the Emperor, was so galled with it, that he killed all his equals; so did Nero. This passion made [2948]Dionysius the Tyrant banish Plato and Philoxenus the Poet, because they did excell, and eclips his glory, as he thought; The Romans exile Coriolanus, confine Camillus, murder Scipio; The Greeks by ostracisme to expel Aristides, Nicias, Alcibiades, imprison Theseus, make away Phocion, &c.	How much money Henry VIII and Francis I, King of France, spent at that famous meeting! And how many vain courtiers, each trying to outshine the others, spent their livelihoods and fortunes and died as beggars! The emperor Hadrian was so galled by this passion that he killed all his equals; so did Nero. It made the tyrant Dionysius banish Plato and the poet Philoxenus because they excelled and, he thought, eclipsed his glory. It made the Romans exile Coriolanus, banish Camillus and murder Scipio; and the Greeks expel Aristides, Nicias and Alcibiades by ostracism, imprison Theseus, kill Phocion, and so on.[2949]

[2949] Editor. The royal meeting is the Field of Cloth of Gold, held between Ardres and Guînes in June 1520; the margin prints 1519. Burton's subsequent list compresses very different ancient stories into examples of envy. "All his equals" and the catalogue of exiles, ostracisms and killings are retained as his claims; their individual sources and historical accuracy need further collation.

When Richard the first, and Philip of France, were fellow souldiers together, at the siege of Acon in the Holy land, and Richard had approved himself to be the more valiant man, in so much that all mens eys were upon him, it so gaulled Philip, Francum urebat Regis victoria, saith mine [2950]Author, tam ægre ferebat Richardi gloriam, ut carpere dicta, calumniari facta; that he cavilled at all his proceedings, and fell at length to open defiance; he could contain no longer, but hasting home, invaded his territories, and professed open war.	When Richard I and Philip of France fought alongside one another at the siege of Acre in the Holy Land, Richard proved himself the more valiant, so that everyone's eyes were upon him. This so galled Philip—"the king's victory burned the Frenchman," says my authority; "he bore Richard's glory so badly that he picked at his words and slandered his deeds"—that he found fault with all Richard's proceedings and at last broke into open defiance. Unable to restrain himself any longer, he hurried home, invaded Richard's territories and declared open war.[2951]
Hatred stirs up contention, Prov. 10.12. and they break out at last into immortal enmity, into virulency, and more than Vatinian hate and rage; [2952]they persecute each other, their friends, followers, and all their posterity with bitter taunts, hostile wars, scurril invectives, libels, calumnies, fire, sword, and the like, and will not be reconciled. Witness that Guelf and Gibelline faction in Italy; that of the Adurni and Fregosi in Genoa; that of Cneius Papirius, and Quintus Fabius in Rome: Cæsar and Pompey, Orleans and Burgundy in France; York and Lancaster in England:	"Hatred stirs up contention," Proverbs 10:12. At last they erupt into undying enmity and venom, into hatred and fury surpassing even Vatinius's. They persecute each other, their friends, followers and all their descendants with bitter taunts, hostile wars, foul abuse, defamatory writings, slander, fire, sword and the like, and refuse reconciliation. Witness the Guelf and Ghibelline factions in Italy; the Adorni and Fregosi in Genoa; Gnaeus Papirius and Quintus Fabius in Rome; Caesar and Pompey; Orléans and Burgundy in France; York and Lancaster in England.[2953]

[2952] Burton. Page 103, h: "Nulla dies tantum poterit lenire furorem. Æterna bella pace sublata gerunt. Jurat odium, nec ante invisum esse desinit, quam esse desiit. Paterculus, vol. 1." "No day will be able to soothe such fury. With peace abolished, they wage everlasting wars. Hatred swears an oath; he does not cease to be hated before he ceases to exist." Paterculus, volume 1, as cited. The final clause adapts Roman History 1.12.7 on Rome's hatred of Carthage. That passage has durat within a longer sentence; it does not supply Jurat odium as printed here. Jurat is retained and translated literally. The opening phrases and Burton's source edition remain unlocated; the whole note should not be treated as one verified quotation from Paterculus.

This hatred, malice, faction, and desire of revenge, invented first all those racks, and wheels, strappadoes, brazen bulls, feral engines, prisons, inquisitions, severe laws to macerate and torment one another.	Indeed, this passion often rages so fiercely that it overthrows not only individuals and families but populous cities—Carthage and Corinth bear witness—and even turns flourishing kingdoms into wilderness. This hatred, malice, faction and desire for revenge first invented all those racks, wheels, strappadoes, bronze bulls, deadly instruments, prisons, inquisitions and harsh laws for wearing down and tormenting one another.[2956]

[2956] Editor. A strappado suspends a person by bound arms; the bronze bull is a legendary instrument of execution. “Engines” means devices or instruments, and “macerate” means wear down or torment. Burton moves from damage to individuals to the destruction of whole political communities.

Source page 104 How happy might we be, and end our time with blessed days, and sweet content, if we could contain our selves, and as we ought to do, put up injuries, learn humility, meekness, patience, forget and forgive, as in [2957]Gods word we are injoyned, compose such final controversies amongst our selves, moderate our passions in this kinde, and think better of others, as [2958]Paul would have us, then of our selves: Be of like affection one towards another, and not avenge our selves, but have peace with all men. But being that we are so peevish and perverse, insolent and proud, so factious and seditious, so malicious and envious; we do invicem angariare, maul and vex one another, torture, disquiet, and precipitate our selves into that gulf of woes and cares, aggravate our misery, and melancholy, heap upon us hell and eternal damnation.	How happy we might be, ending our lives in blessed days and sweet contentment, if we could restrain ourselves; bear injuries as we ought; learn humility, meekness and patience; forget and forgive as God's word commands; settle such final disputes among ourselves; moderate these passions; and think better of others than of ourselves, as Paul would have us. Be of one mind towards one another; do not avenge yourselves, but live in peace with everyone. Yet because we are so ill-tempered and perverse, insolent and proud, so factious and rebellious, so malicious and envious, we "oppress one another": we batter and vex each other, torment and disturb one another, and plunge ourselves into that gulf of woes and cares. We aggravate our misery and melancholy, and heap hell and eternal damnation upon ourselves.[2959]

[2959] Editor. The scan clearly reads "final controversies," an awkward expression retained provisionally as "final disputes"; an intended alternative has not been established. Colossians 3:12–13 and Romans 12:16–19 underlie the appeal to patience, forgiveness and peace. The preference of others to oneself also recalls Philippians 2:3. Angariare means to press into service or oppress.

Subsect. 9. Anger a Cause.	Subsection 9. Anger as a cause.
Anger, a perturbation, which carries the spirits outwards, preparing the body to melancholy, and madness it self: Ira furor brevis est, and as [2960]Piccolomineus accounts it, one of the three most violent passions. [2961]Areteus sets it down for an especial cause (so doth Seneca, ep. 18. l. 1.) of this malady. [2962]Magninus gives the reason, Ex frequenti ira supra modum calefiunt; it over-heats their bodies, and if it be too frequent, it breaks out into manifest madness, saith S. Ambrose.	Anger is a disturbance that carries the spirits outwards, predisposing the body to melancholy and even to madness: "Anger is a brief madness." Piccolomini counts it among the three most violent passions. Aretaeus names it as a particular cause of this illness, as does Seneca, letter 18, book 1. Magninus gives the reason: "Frequent anger heats them beyond measure"; it overheats their bodies, and, if too frequent, breaks out into manifest madness, says Saint Ambrose.[2963]
'Tis a known saying, Furor fit læsa sæpius patientia, the most patient spirit that is, if he be often provoked, will be incensed to madness; it will make a devil of a Saint: And therefore Basil (belike) in his Homily de Irâ, cals it tenebras rationis, morbum animæ, & dæmonem pessimum; the darkning of our understanding, and a bad Angel.	It is a familiar saying: "Patience too often injured turns to fury." Even the most patient spirit, repeatedly provoked, will be driven mad with anger; it will make a devil of a saint. Presumably that is why Basil, in his homily On Anger, calls it "the darkness of reason, a disease of the soul, and a most evil demon"—the darkening of our understanding, and an evil angel.

"Anger, sorrow and great consternation of mind make people melancholy. Aretaeus. Excessive anger produces madness." The scan prints an intrusive in before mœror, across the line break; it is retained here but omitted in the sense translation.

[2963] Editor. "Spirits" are the subtle bodily agents of early modern physiology. "Anger is a brief madness" occurs in Horace, Epistles 1.2.62. Seneca, Letter 18.14, quotes Epicurus's maxim that excessive anger produces madness; it appears in book 2 in the consulted division, rather than Burton's book 1. Burton's edition remains unidentified. The Piccolomini, Aretaeus, Magninus and Ambrose passages still require collation. Burton's movement between temporary frenzy and lasting illness does not follow modern diagnostic distinctions.

[2964]Lucian in Abdicato, Tom. 1. will have this passion to work this effect, especially in old men and women, Anger and calumny (saith he) trouble them at first, and after a while break out into open madness: many things cause fury in women, especially if they love or hate overmuch, or envy, be much grieved or angry; these things by little and little lead them on to this malady. From a disposition they proceed to an habit, for there is no difference betwixt a mad man, and an angry man, in the time of his fit:	Lucian, in The Disowned Son, volume 1, holds that this passion has that effect especially in old men and women. Anger and slander, he says, disturb them at first and after a while break out into open madness. Many things cause frenzy in women, especially excessive love or hatred, envy, deep grief or anger; these things gradually lead them into this illness. From a disposition they advance to a settled condition, for during his fit there is no difference between a madman and an angry man.[2965]
Anger, as Lactantius describes it, L. de Ira Dei, ad Donatum c. 5. is [2966]sæva animi tempestas, &c. a cruel tempest of the minde, making his eyes sparkle fire, and stare, teeth gnash in his head, his tongue stutter, his face pale, or red, and what more filthy imitation can be of a mad man?	Anger, as Lactantius describes it in On the Anger of God, addressed to Donatus, chapter 5, is "a savage storm of the mind," and so on—a cruel tempest of the mind, making a man's eyes flash fire and stare, his teeth grind, his tongue stammer, his face turn pale or red. What uglier likeness of a madman could there be?[2967]

[2965] Editor. Lucian's Abdicatus, The Disowned Son, is a rhetorical speech involving a physician and his father. Burton's note names Gilbert Cousin as the Latin translator. "Habit" here means an established condition rather than a routine action. Burton's assertions about age and sex are retained as historical claims; the complete speech and Cousin's wording still require collation.

[2966] Burton. Page 104, q: "Sæva animi tempestas tantos excitans fluctus ut statim ardescant oculi, os tremit, lingua titubet, dentes concrepant, &c." "A savage storm of the mind, raising such waves that immediately the eyes blaze, the mouth trembles, the tongue stammers, the teeth chatter, and so on."

[2967] Editor. Lactantius, On the Anger of God, chapter 5, sets out the Stoic argument that anger is incompatible with divine blessedness before contesting its conclusion. Burton extracts its vivid account of human anger. It should not be mistaken for Lactantius's final denial that God can be angry.

[2968]Ora tument ira, fervescunt sanguine venæ, Lumina Gorgonio sævius angue micant.	Faces swell with anger, veins boil with blood; Eyes flash more fiercely than a Gorgon's snake.[2969]
They are void of reason, inexorable, blinde, like beasts & monsters for the time, say and do they know not what, curse, swear, rail, fight, and what not? How can a mad man do more? as he said in the Comedy, [2970]Iracundia non sum apud me, I am not mine own man. If these fits be immoderate, continue long, or be frequent, without doubt they provoke madness.	For the time being they are without reason, unyielding and blind, like beasts and monsters. They say and do they know not what: curse, swear, abuse, fight—what do they not do? How could a madman do more? As the character says in the comedy, "Anger puts me beside myself"—I am not my own man. If these fits are excessive, prolonged or frequent, they undoubtedly bring on madness.[2971]

[2969] Editor. Compare Ovid, The Art of Love 3.503–504. The consulted Latin has nigrescunt, "grow dark," and Gorgoneo … igne, "Gorgonian fire"; Burton prints fervescunt, "boil," and Gorgonio … angue, "a Gorgon's snake." The translation follows Burton's printed wording. Gorgons are mythical figures associated with terrifying faces and snakes.

[2971] Editor. "I am not mine own man" means that the speaker has lost self-command. Terence is cited without a play or line; the exact locus remains unverified. "Madness" translates Burton's broad term and does not supply a modern diagnosis.

Source page 104–105 Montanus consil. 21. had a melancholy Jew to his patient, he ascribes this for a principal cause: Irascebatur levibus de causis, He was easily moved to anger. Ajax had no other beginning of his madness; and Charls the sixt, that Lunatick French King, fell into this misery, out of the extremity of his passion, desire of revenge and malice, [2972]incensed against the Duke of Britain, he could neither eat, drink, nor sleep for some days together, and in the end, about the Calends of Iuly, 1392. he became mad upon his horse-back, drawing his sword, striking such as came neer him promiscuously, and so continued all the days of his life, Æmil. lib. 10. Gal. hist.	Montanus, in consultation 21, had a Jewish patient suffering from melancholy, and ascribes his illness principally to this cause: “He became angry over trifles”—he was easily moved to anger. Ajax’s madness had no other beginning. And Charles VI, that mentally deranged French king, fell into this condition through the extremity of his passion, his desire for revenge and his malice. Enraged against the Duke of Brittany, he could neither eat, drink nor sleep for several days together. Finally, about the first of July 1392, he went mad on horseback, drawing his sword and striking indiscriminately at anyone who came near him; and he continued so for the rest of his life. Aemilius, French History, book 10.[2973]
Source page 105 Ægesippus de excid. urbis Hieros. l. 1. c. 37. hath such a story of Herod, That out of an angry fit, became made, [2974]leaping out of his bed, he killed Iosephus, and played many such Bedlam pranks, the whole Court could not rule him for a long time after: Sometimes he was sorry and repented, much grieved for that he had done, Postquam deferbuit ira, by and by outragious again.	Hegesippus, On the Destruction of Jerusalem, book 1, chapter 37, tells a similar story of Herod: in a fit of anger he went mad, leaped from his bed and killed Josephus, and performed many such mad acts. For a long time afterwards the entire court could not control him. Sometimes, “after his anger had cooled,” he was sorry and repentant, deeply grieved by what he had done; a moment later he was raging again.[2975]

[2972] Burton. Page 105, t: “Infensus Britanniæ Duci, & in ultionem versus, nec cibum cepit, nec quietem, ad Calendas Julias 1392. comites occidit.” “Hostile to the Duke of Brittany and bent on revenge, he took neither food nor rest; about the first of July 1392 he killed his companions.”

[2975] Editor. In the work now commonly called Pseudo-Hegesippus, On the Destruction of Jerusalem, 1.37, Joseph is Herod’s brother-in-law, married to Salome—not the historian Josephus. The narrative says Herod ordered Joseph and Mariamne killed; Burton compresses this to “he killed Josephus.” The scan’s “became made” is rendered “went mad.” “Bedlam” supplies a conventional image of frenzied behaviour.

In hot cholerick bodies, nothing so soon causeth madness, as this passion of Anger, besides many other diseases, as Pelesius observes, Cap. 21. l. 1. de hum. affect. causis; Sanguinem imminuit, fel auget: And as [2976]Valesius controverts, Med. controv. lib. 5. contro. 8. many times kills them quite out. If this were the worst of this passion, it were more tolerable, [2977]But it ruines and subverts whole Towns, [2978]Cities, Families, and Kingdoms; Nulla pestis humano generi pluris stetit, saith Seneca, de Ira, lib. 1. No plague hath done mankinde so much harm.	In hot, choleric bodies nothing causes madness more quickly than anger, besides many other diseases, as Pelesius observes in On the Causes of Human Emotions, book 1, chapter 21: "It diminishes the blood and increases the bile." And, as Valesius discusses in Medical Controversies, book 5, controversy 8, it often kills people outright. If this were its worst effect, it would be more tolerable. But it ruins and overthrows whole towns, cities, families and kingdoms. "No plague has cost humankind more," says Seneca in On Anger, book 1. No plague has done humanity so much harm.[2979]
Look into our Histories, and you shall almost meet with no other subject, but what a [2980]company of hare-brains have done in their rage. We may do well therefore, to put this in our procession amongst the rest: From all blindness of heart, from pride, vain-glory, and hypocrisie, from envy, hatred and malice, anger, and all such pestiferous perturbations, Good Lord deliver us.	Look into our histories and you will find scarcely any other subject than what a crowd of hotheads have done in their rage. We might therefore do well to include this among the petitions in our litany: From all blindness of heart, from pride, vainglory and hypocrisy, from envy, hatred and malice, anger and all such destructive passions, good Lord, deliver us.[2981]

[2979] Editor. "Choleric" refers to a hot constitution associated with bile. The medical claims belong to Burton's humoral explanation; Pelesius's and Valesius's passages remain uncollated. Seneca's statement about anger's cost to humanity is at On Anger 1.2.1, followed by examples of cities and peoples destroyed.

[2980] Burton. Page 105, a: "Stultorum regum & populorum continet æstus." "It contains the frenzies of foolish kings and peoples." The phrase recalls Horace, Epistles 1.2.8.

[2981] Editor. "Procession" refers here to the litany, a form of public prayer. Burton adapts the Book of Common Prayer's petition against blindness of heart, pride, vainglory, hypocrisy, envy, hatred and malice, adding anger and destructive passions. The movement from histories of violence to communal prayer closes the subsection.

Subsect. 10. Discontents, Cares, Miseries, &c. causes.	Subsection 10. Discontents, cares, miseries and the like as causes.
Discontents, cares, crosses, miseries, or whatsoever it is, that shall cause any molestation of spirits, grief, anguish, and perplexity, may well be reduced to this head, (preposterously placed here in some mens judgments they may seem) yet in that Aristotle in his [2982]Rhetorick defines these cares, as he doth Envy, Emulation, &c. still by grief, I think I may well rank them in this Irascible row; being that they are as the rest, both causes and Symptoms of this disease, producing the like inconveniences, and are most part accompanied with anguish and pain.	Discontents, cares, setbacks, miseries—whatever disturbs the spirits and causes grief, anguish and perplexity—may properly come under this heading. Some may judge them out of place here; yet since Aristotle in his Rhetoric defines these cares, like envy, rivalry and the rest, in terms of grief, I think I may properly place them in this irascible group. Like the others, they are both causes and symptoms of this disease, producing similar troubles and usually accompanied by anguish and pain.[2983]

[2982] Burton. Page 105, b: “Lib. 2. Invidia est dolor & ambitio est dolor, &c.” “Book 2. Envy is grief, and ambition is grief, and so on.” Aristotle’s Rhetoric.

[2983] Editor. Crosses are setbacks or afflictions; spirits are the bodily spirits of early modern physiology. Irascible refers to the passions concerned with difficulty, resistance and injury. Burton anticipates an objection to his classification: these conditions are both causes and symptoms, and grief links them to the passions already discussed.

Source page 105–106 The common Etymology will evince it, Cura quasi cor uro, Dementes curæ, insomnes curæ, damnosæ curæ, tristes, mordaces, carnifices, &c. biting, eating, gnawing, cruel, bitter, sick, sad, unquiet, pale, tetrick, miserable, intolerable cares, as the Poets [2984]call them, worldly cares, and are as many in number as the Sea sands. [2985]Galen, Fernelius, Felix Plater, Valescus de Taranta, &c. reckon afflictions, miseries, even all these contentions, and vexations of the minde, as principal causes, in that they take away sleep, hinder concoction, dry up the body, and consume the substance of it.	The familiar derivation will show it: cura, “care,” as though from cor uro, “I burn the heart.” “Maddening cares, sleepless cares, harmful cares, sad, biting, torturing cares,” and so on: biting, eating, gnawing, cruel, bitter, sick, sad, restless, pale, grim, miserable, intolerable cares, as the poets call them—worldly cares, as countless as the sands of the sea. Galen, Fernel, Felix Platter, Valescus of Taranta and others count afflictions and miseries—all these conflicts and vexations of the mind—among the principal causes, because they take away sleep, impede digestion, dry out the body and consume its substance.[2986]
Source page 106 They are not so many in number, but their causes be as divers, and not one of a thousand free from them, or that can vindicate himself, whom that Ate dea,	Numerous as they are, their causes are just as varied. [2986] Editor. Cura from cor uro is a wordplay offered as an etymology. Tetrick means grim or gloomy; concoction means digestion or the bodily processing of nourishment. The drying and consuming effects belong to the humoral account of melancholy. The list of poetic epithets deliberately accumulates near-synonyms; the modern version retains that accumulation.

[2987] Burton. Page 106, *: “Lucian. Podag.” Lucian, the work on gout. The abbreviated reference accompanies the Latin verses about Ate.

Homers Goddess Ate, hath not involved into this discontented [2989]rank, or plagued with some misery or other. Hyginus, fab. 220. to this purpose hath a pleasant tale. Dame Cura by chance went over a brook, and taking up some of the durty slime, made an Image of it; Jupiter eftsoons coming by, put life to it, but Cura and Jupiter could not agree what name to give him, or who should own him; the matter was referred to Saturn as Judg, he gave this arbitrement, His name shall be Homo ab humo, Cura eum possideat quamdiu vivat, Care shall have him whilst he lives, Iupiter his soul, and Tellus his body when he dies.	Homer's goddess Ate, has not drawn into this discontented company or afflicted with some misery or other. Hyginus, fable 220, tells an entertaining story to this purpose. Lady Cura happened to cross a brook and, picking up some muddy clay, made a figure from it. Jupiter came by soon afterwards and gave it life; but Cura and Jupiter could not agree what to call him or who should possess him. They referred the matter to Saturn as judge, and he gave this ruling: His name shall be homo, "human being," from humus, "earth"; "Let Care possess him as long as he lives." Care shall have him while he lives, Jupiter his soul and Tellus his body when he dies.[2990]
But to leave tales. A general cause, a continuate cause, an inseparable accident to all men, is discontent, care, misery; were there no other particular affliction (which who is free from?) to molest a man in this life, the very cogitation of that common misery, were enough to macerate, and make him weary of his life; to think that he can never be secure, but still in danger, sorrow, grief, and persecution.	But to leave stories aside. Discontent, care and misery are a universal and continuing cause, an inseparable condition of human life. Even if no particular affliction troubled a person in this life —and who is free of such affliction?—the mere thought of this common misery would be enough to wear him down and make him weary of living: the thought that he can never be safe, but remains exposed to danger, sorrow, grief and persecution.[2991]

[2990] Editor. Hyginus, Fabulae 220: Care shapes a person from clay, Jupiter supplies spirit, Earth claims the body, and Saturn arbitrates their competing claims. Burton compresses the narrative, omitting Earth's entrance into the dispute. Cura means care or anxiety; Tellus is Earth. The Latin ruling and Burton's English gloss are both preserved.

[2991] Editor. Accident here is an accompanying condition, not a mishap; macerate means wear down or waste away. Burton now broadens the medical account into a meditation on the insecurity of human life.

For to begin at the hour of his birth, as [2992]Pliny doth elegantly describe it, He is born naked, and falls [2993]a whining at the very first, he is swadled and bound up like a prisoner, cannot help himself, and so he continues to his lives end. Cujusque feræ pabulum, saith [2994]Seneca, impatient of heat and cold, impatient of labor, impatient of idleness, exposed to Fortunes contumelies. To a naked Marriner, Lucretius compares him, cast on shore by shipwrack, cold and comfortless in an unknown Land:	To begin at the hour of his birth, as Pliny describes it so well: he is born naked and starts crying at once; he is swaddled and bound like a prisoner, unable to help himself, and so he continues to the end of his life. “Food for any wild beast,” says Seneca, unable to bear heat or cold, labour or idleness, exposed to Fortune’s insults. Lucretius compares him to a naked sailor cast ashore by shipwreck, cold and comfortless in an unknown land.[2995]
No estate, age, sex, can secure himself from this common misery. A man that is born of a woman, is of short continuance, and full of trouble, Job 14.1, 22. and while his flesh is upon him, he shall be sorrowful, and while his soul is in him, it shall mourn. All his days are sorrow, and his travels griefs, his heart also taketh not rest in the night, Ecclus. 2.23. And 2. 11. All that is in it, is sorrow and vexation of spirit.	No rank, age or sex can protect anyone from this common misery. “A person born of woman lives only a short time and is full of trouble,” Job 14:1, 22; “while his flesh is upon him, he will suffer, and while his soul is within him, it will mourn.” “All his days are sorrow, and his labours grief; even at night his heart finds no rest,” Ecclesiasticus 2:23. And 2:11: “All that is in it is sorrow and vexation of spirit.”[2996]

[2992] Burton. Page 106, f: “Lib. 7. nat. hist. cap. 1. hominem nudum, & ad vagitum edit natura. Flens ab initio, devinctus jacet, &c.” “Natural History, book 7, chapter 1. Nature brings forth the human being naked and ready to cry. Weeping from the outset, he lies bound, and so on.” Pliny.

O tearful human race, weak and pitiable!” The printing has τῶ where the identified Greek source has ὦ, “O”; the translation follows that intelligible reading. Burton then adds Latin: “Lachrymans natus sum, & lachrymans morior, &c.” “Weeping I was born, and weeping I die, and so on.”

[2994] Burton. Page 106, *: “Ad Marinum.” “To Marinus.” This is the printed reference beside Seneca; the passage is identifiable in To Marcia 11.3.

[2995] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 7, opening; Seneca, To Marcia 11.3; Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 5.222–227. Burton’s Ad Marinum is a faulty locator for the identifiable Seneca passage. The Greek margin excerpts lines 1 and 3 of Palladas, Greek Anthology 10.84; it omits lines 2 and 4. The Latin restatement in the margin is also translated. Cardano, De consolatione 1 (1663 collected edition, p. 590), also quotes the poem and the Latin opening Lachrymans natus sum. This later witness is a possible transmission lead, not proof of Burton’s immediate source. The small initial glyph before γένος remains uncertain after the BSB comparison; τῶ is retained provisionally.

[2996] Editor. The Job quotations are 14:1 and 14:22. The abbreviation Ecclus. ordinarily denotes Ecclesiasticus, and is expanded that way in the modern column, but the quoted passages belong to Ecclesiastes 2:23 and 2:11. Travels here means labours. The erroneous book label is documented rather than silently corrected.

[2997]Ingress, progress, regress, egress, much alike: Blindness seizeth on us in the beginning, labor in the middle, grief in the end, error in all. What day ariseth to us, without some grief, care, or anguish? Or what so secure and pleasing a morning have we seen, that hath not been overcast before the evening? One is miserable, another ridiculous, a third odious. One complains of this grievance, another of that. Aliquando nervi, aliquando pedes vexant, (Seneca) nunc distillatio, nunc epatis morbus; nunc deest, nunc superest sanguis: Now the Head akes, then the Feet, now the Lungs, then the Liver, &c.	Entering, advancing, retreating, departing—it is much the same. Blindness seizes us at the beginning, labour in the middle, grief at the end, error throughout. What day dawns for us without some grief, care or anguish? What morning have we seen so secure and pleasant that clouds have not gathered before evening? One person is miserable, another ridiculous, a third odious. One complains of this grievance, another of that. "Sometimes the sinews trouble us, sometimes the feet"—Seneca—"now a discharge, now a disease of the liver; now there is too little blood, now too much." Now the head aches, then the feet; now the lungs, then the liver, and so on.[2998]
Huic sensus exuberat, sed est pudori degener sanguis, &c. He is rich, but low-born; another is noble, but poor; a third has means, but perhaps lacks health or the intelligence to manage his estate. Children trouble one, a wife another, and so on. "No one easily comes to terms with his condition": no one is pleased with his fortune.[3000]

[2998] Editor. The four rhyming terms describe arrival, progress, retreat and departure. Seneca's catalogue of bodily complaints is adapted from Letter 120.16: Burton changes its wording and follows it with his own freer English summary. Distillatio means a flowing or dripping discharge; it need not denote a single modern diagnosis.

[3000] Editor. Boethius, Consolation 2, prose 4.13–15, has census, "wealth," where Burton prints sensus, "understanding" or "sense." The modern version translates the printed Latin, then preserves Burton's "He is rich," which agrees with census. The repeated saying about one's condition also belongs to this passage. This discrepancy remains visible in both columns.

Go where you will and you will find discontents, cares, woes, complaints, sickness, diseases, burdens and outcries. Look into the marketplace, says Chrysostom, and there is brawling and conflict; into the court, and there is roguery and flattery; into a private home, and there are worry, care and sadness, and so on. As the ancient poet said,[3003]

If you go into the marketplace, there are quarrels and fights; into the court, fraud and flattery; into a private home, and so on." Chrysostom; the homily collection is not specified.

[3003] Editor. A dram is a very small weight compared with a pound: the image makes sorrow overwhelmingly predominant. Cark means anxious worry. Court may include a seat of government or a judicial court. Burton's Chrysostom citation supplies only Homily 10, so the collection and exact passage remain to be identified.

[3005] Editor. Compare Iliad 17.446–447, where Zeus reflects on mortal suffering while looking at Achilles's immortal horses. Burton gives a Latin rendering, translated here afresh; he then repeats the thought in English.

No creature so miserable as man, so generally molested, [3006]in miseries of body, in miseries of minde, miseries of heart, in miseries asleep, in miseries awake, in miseries wheresoever he turns, as Bernard found, Nunquid tentatio est vita humana super terram? A meer temptation is our life, (Austin. confess. lib. 10. cap. 28.) catena perpetuorum malorum, & quis potest molestias & difficultates pati? Who can endure the miseries of it?	No creature is so miserable as humanity, so universally afflicted: in misery of body, misery of mind, misery of heart; in misery asleep, in misery awake, in misery wherever one turns, as Bernard found. “Is not human life on earth a trial?” Our life is nothing but a trial—Augustine, Confessions, book 10, chapter 28—“a chain of perpetual evils; and who can endure troubles and hardships?” Who can bear its miseries?[3007]

[3008]In prosperity we are insolent and intolerable, dejected in adversity, in all fortunes foolish and miserable. [3009]In adversity I wish for prosperity, and in prosperity I am afraid of adversity; What mediocrity may be found? where is no temptation? what condition of life is free? [3010]Wisdom hath labor annexed to it, glory envy; riches and cares, children and incumbrances, pleasure and diseases, rest and beggery go together: As if a man were therefore born, (as the Platonists hold) to be punished in this life, for some precedent sins.	In prosperity we are arrogant and unbearable, in adversity dejected, in every condition foolish and miserable. In adversity I long for prosperity; in prosperity I fear adversity. What middle state can be found? Where is there no trial? What condition of life is free of it? Wisdom has labour attached to it, glory envy; riches and cares, children and burdens, pleasure and disease, idleness and poverty go together—as though, in the Platonists' view, a person were born in order to be punished in this life for earlier sins.[3011]

[3009] Burton. Page 107, m: "Prospera in adversis desidero, & adversa prosperis timeo, quis inter hæc medius locus, ubi non sit humanæ vitæ tentatio?" "In adversity I long for prosperity, and in prosperity I fear adversity. What middle place is there between them, where human life is not tried?" Compare Augustine, Confessions 10.28.39.

Or that, as [3012]Pliny complains, Nature may be rather accounted a step-mother, then a mother unto us, all things considered: No creatures life so brittle, so full of fear, so mad, so furious; onely man is plagued with envy, discontent, griefs, covetousness, ambition, superstition.	Or, as Pliny complains, all things considered, Nature might better be called our stepmother than our mother. No creature's life is so fragile, so fearful, so mad, so furious; only humanity is afflicted by envy, discontent, grief, greed, ambition and superstition.[3013]

No halcyon days, when a person can feel safe or be content with his present condition. As Boethius concludes, there is something in each of us that we seek before trying it and abhor once we have tried it. We wish for it earnestly and covet it eagerly, then soon grow tired of it.[3018]

[3012] Burton. Page 107, o: "Lib. 7. cap. 1. "Book 7, chapter 1. One cannot adequately judge whether Nature has been a kinder parent to man or a harsher stepmother. No creature has a more fragile life, greater fear, confusion or frenzy; of living creatures, man alone has been given ambition, grief, greed and superstition." Pliny.

[3013] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 7, opening, compares Nature as parent and stepmother and singles out human anxieties. Burton extends and paraphrases the catalogue. The exclusiveness of these claims is part of the ancient and early modern argument, rather than a statement of present-day zoology.

[3014] Burton. Page 107, p: "Euripides." No play or passage is supplied for the Latin verses.

[3015] Editor. The Irish Sea supplies an image of repeated storms; Burton then reinforces it with Latin verses attributed only to Euripides. Their play and the Latin translator have not yet been securely identified.

[3018] Editor. Halcyon days are calm, secure times, from the tradition of calm weather during the kingfisher's nesting. Boethius, Consolation 2, prose 4.15, says that each condition contains something the inexperienced do not know and the experienced dread. Burton's marginal petant, "seek," and his English recast ignorance as desire. Both are retained.

If we escape Scylla, we run into Charybdis; and so, in perpetual fear, labour and anguish, we pass from one plague, one misfortune, one burden to another, "serving a harsh servitude." You could as easily separate weight from lead, heat from fire, moisture from water or brightness from the sun as misery, discontent, care, calamity and danger from a human being.[3021]

[3020] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.4.12, reads Inter spem curamque, "between hope and care," where Burton prints Inter spemque metumque, "between hope and fear." The modern column follows Burton's Latin. Bangle away and befool out mean waste or fritter away; falling in and falling out suggests alternating agreement and quarrels.

[3021] Editor. Scylla and Charybdis are the opposing dangers of ancient sea-voyage legend: escaping one exposes the traveller to the other. Precipitiums means precipices. The succession of incompatible images—maze, wilderness, sea, yoke—is deliberate; it makes hardship seem unavoidable from every direction.

In which grief and sorrow ([3022]as he right well observes out of Solon) innumerable troubles, labors of mortal men, and all maner of vices, are included, as in so many pens. Our villages are like mole-hills, and men as so many Emots, busie, busie still, going to and fro, in and out, and crossing one anothers projects, as the lines of several Sea-cards cut each other in a Globe or Map.	Our towns and cities are so many dwellings of human misery, enclosing grief and sorrow, innumerable troubles, mortal labours and every kind of vice as though in pens—as the writer aptly observes from Solon. Our villages are like molehills, and people like so many ants, busy, forever busy, going to and fro, in and out, thwarting one another's plans as the lines of different sea charts cross on a globe or map.[3023]

[3023] Editor. Emots are ants; sea-cards are nautical charts, whose intersecting lines supply the comparison. The margin cites Borrheus on Job 6, while the body names Solon as the earlier authority. This chain of attribution is retained; its intermediary text still needs collation.

Yet ask the man himself and perhaps he will say that he is the most miserable and unhappy of all. [3027] Editor. "Jupiter's chick" and "the white hen's son" are proverbial favourites of fortune; the latter suggests a rare, specially favoured person. The shoe conceals its discomfort from an onlooker. Burton gives the attribution Cn. Græcinus, but its precise source is unsettled. His English explanation of where the shoe pinches follows the freshly translated Latin.

It is not another mans opinion can make me happy; but as [3028]Seneca well hath it, He is a miserable wretch, that doth not account himself happy, though he be Soveraign Lord of a world; he is not happy, if he think himself not to be so: for what availeth it what thine estate is, or seem to others, if thou thy self dislike it?	Another person's opinion cannot make me happy. As Seneca aptly puts it, the man who does not consider himself happy is a miserable wretch, even if he rules a world. He is not happy if he thinks himself otherwise: what does it matter what your condition is, or seems to others, if you yourself dislike it?[3029]
A common humor it is of all men to think well of other mens fortunes, and dislike their own: [3030]Cui placet alterius, sua nimirum est odio sors: but [3031]qui fit Mecænas, &c. how comes it to pass, what's the cause of it? Many men are of such a perverse nature, they are well pleased with nothing (saith [3032]Theodoret) neither with riches, nor poverty, they complain when they are well, and when they are sick, grumble at all fortunes, prosperity and adversity; they are troubled in a cheap yeer, in a barren, plenty or not plenty, nothing pleaseth them, war nor peace, with children, nor without.	It is a common human tendency to think well of other people's fortunes and dislike our own: "Whoever admires another's lot plainly hates his own." But "how does it happen, Maecenas," and so on—how does it come about, what causes it? Many people are so perverse that nothing pleases them, says Theodoret: neither riches nor poverty. They complain when well, and when ill; they grumble at every turn of fortune, in prosperity and adversity. They are troubled in a year of low prices and in a barren year, in plenty or scarcity. Nothing pleases them: war or peace, having children or having none.[3033]

[3028] Burton. Page 108, z: "Epist. 9. l. 7. Miserable is the man who does not judge himself supremely happy, even if he commands the world. He is not happy who does not think himself so: what does it matter what your condition is, if it seems bad to you?" The material occurs in Seneca's Letter 9.20–21; the printed book number is retained.

[3029] Editor. Seneca, Letter 9.20–21, combines a saying of Epicurus, Seneca's own restatement and a comic verse about believing oneself happy. Burton compresses the material into one assertion and cites "book 7," though Letter 9 belongs to book 1 in the consulted text. Estate means condition or circumstances.

"Cure of Greek Maladies, chapter 6, on providence. Nothing pleases many people: they condemn both riches and poverty, complain about diseases, resent being healthy, and, to put it once for all, nothing delights them, and so on." Theodoret.

[3033] Editor. The first Horatian line is Epistles 1.14.11; the second begins Satires 1.1, addressed to Maecenas, on dissatisfaction with one's own lot. Burton prints 1.4 for the former. A cheap year is a year of plentiful supplies and low prices; a barren year is one of scarcity. The Theodoret wording remains to be collated in its cited chapter.

This for the most part is the humor of us all, to be discontent, miserable, and most unhappy, as we think at least; and shew me him that is not so, or that ever was otherwise? Quintus Metellus his felicity is infinitely admired amongst the Romans, insomuch, that as [3034]Paterculus mentioneth of him, you can scarce finde of any Nation, order, age, sex, one for happiness to be compared unto him: he had in a word, Bona animi, corporis & fortunæ, goods of minde, body, and fortune, so had P. Mutianus [3035]Crassus.	For the most part this is the disposition of us all: discontented, miserable and profoundly unhappy —at least in our own opinion. Show me someone who is otherwise, or ever was! The Romans endlessly admire Quintus Metellus's good fortune. As Paterculus says, scarcely anyone of any nation, rank, age or sex can be found whose happiness compares with his. In a word, he had "the goods of mind, body and fortune"—goods of mind, body and fortune; so did Publius Mucianus Crassus.[3036]

[3034] Burton. Page 108, d: "Vix ullius gentis, ætatis, ordinis hominem invenies cujus felicitatem fortunæ Metelli compares, Vol. 1." "You will scarcely find a person of any nation, age or rank whose happiness you could compare with Metellus's good fortune. Volume 1." Velleius Paterculus.

"Publius Crassus Mucianus is said to have possessed five of the greatest good things: he was extremely rich, extremely noble, supremely eloquent, deeply learned in law and chief pontiff."

[3036] Editor. Felicity here includes favourable outward circumstances, not simply a feeling. The three kinds of goods—mind, body and fortune—are a conventional philosophical division. Burton names the second Roman P. Mutianus Crassus, while the margin orders the name Crassus Mutianus; the modern form regularizes Mutianus to Mucianus without concealing that variation. The Metellus comparison is Velleius Paterculus, Roman History 1.11.5; the following sections describe his distinguished children and family funeral.

Lampsaca that Lacedemonian Lady, was such another in [3037]Plinies conceit, A Kings wife, a Kings mother, a Kings daughter: And all the world esteemed as much of Polycrates of Samos. The Greeks brag of their Socrates, Phocyon, Aristides; the Psophidians in particular of their Aglaus, Omni vitâ felix, ab omni periculo immunis (which by the way Pausanias held impossible) the Romans of their [3038]Cato, Curius, Fabricius, for their composed fortunes, and retired estates, government of passions, and contempt of the world: yet none of all these was happy, or free from discontent, neither Metellus, Crassus, nor Polycrates, for he died a violent death, and so did Cato: And how much evil doth Lactantius and Theodoret speak of Socrates, a weak man, and so of the rest.	Lampsaca, the Spartan lady, was another such person in Pliny's opinion: a king's wife, a king's mother, a king's daughter. And everyone thought as highly of Polycrates of Samos. The Greeks boast of Socrates, Phocion and Aristides; the people of Psophis especially of their Aglaus, "happy throughout his life, immune to every danger"—which Pausanias, incidentally, held impossible. The Romans boast of Cato, Curius and Fabricius for their settled fortunes, withdrawn ways of life, command of their passions and contempt for worldly things. Yet none of them was happy or free from discontent: neither Metellus, Crassus nor Polycrates, who died violently, as did Cato. And how much evil Lactantius and Theodoret say of Socrates, a weak man—and likewise of the rest.[3039]

[3039] Editor. Pliny's woman is Lampido, Natural History 7.133; Burton prints Lampsaca. The modern column retains his name. The following catalogue assembles reputedly fortunate or virtuous Greeks and Romans, then disputes their happiness. Burton's dismissal of Socrates invokes Christian polemic. The precise passages in Pausanias, Lactantius and Theodoret, and the particular Cato intended throughout, require further collation.

The great Gonzalo, that famous Spaniard, was at first honoured and approved by prince and people, then confined and banished. "Great envy and bitter slanders commonly follow admirable deeds": it is Polybius's observation; grievous enmities and bitter accusations commonly follow renowned actions.[3046]
One is born rich, dies a beggar: sound to day, sick to morrow: now in most flourishing estate, fortunate and happy, by-and-by deprived of his goods by forragin enemies, robbed by theeves, spoiled, captivated, impoverished, as they of [3047]Rabbah put under iron sawes, and under iron harrowes, and under axes of iron, and cast into the tile kiln,	One is born rich and dies a beggar; healthy today, ill tomorrow; now flourishing, fortunate and happy, then stripped of his property by plundering enemies, robbed by thieves, despoiled, taken captive and impoverished—like the people of Rabbah, put under iron saws, iron harrows and iron axes, and thrown into the brick kiln.[3048]
[3049]Quid me felicem toties jactâstis amici, Qui cecidit, stabili non erat ille gradu.	Why did you so often proclaim me happy, my friends? The man who fell had never stood secure.

[3044] Editor. The preceding Brutus and Cassius sentence abbreviates Velleius Paterculus, Roman History 2.69.6, where Fortune first favours them and then, as if tired, abandons them. Burton retains the latter half of that contrast. The following proverbial line says that even the strong meet someone stronger; its precise source remains unidentified.

[3046] Editor. Statutes here means statues. Gonzalo is Gonzalo Fernández de Córdoba, the Spanish commander commonly called the Great Captain; Burton cites Paolo Giovio's Life. Burton's series gives a general pattern of honour followed by disgrace, rather than a precise biography of every named man. The particular Polybius passage remains unlocated.

[3049] Burton. Page 109, m: "Boethius lib. 1. Met. Met. 1." Boethius, book 1, metre 1; the duplicated Met. is retained.

He that erst marched like Xerxes with innumerable armies, as rich as Cræsus, now shifts for himself in a poor cock-boat, is bound in iron chains, with Bajazet the Turk, and a foot-stool with Aurelian, for a tyrannizing Conqueror to trample on.	The man who once marched like Xerxes with countless armies, as rich as Croesus, now fends for himself in a wretched little boat, is bound in iron chains like Bayezid the Turk, or becomes a footstool like Aurelian for a tyrannical conqueror to trample upon.[3050]
So many casualties there are, that as Seneca said of a City consumed with fire, Una dies interest inter maximam civitatem & nullam, one day betwixt a great city, and none: so many grievances from outward accidents, and from our selves, our own indiscretion, inordinate appetite, one day betwixt a man and no man.	So many disasters occur that, as Seneca said of a city destroyed by fire, “One day lies between a very great city and no city at all”—one day between a great city and none. So many troubles arise from outward events and from ourselves, our own folly and ungoverned desires: one day between a living man and no man.[3051]
And which is worse, as if discontents and miseries would not come fast enough upon us; homo homini dæmon, we maul, persecute, and study how to sting, gaul, and vex one another with mutual hatred, abuses, injuries; preying upon, and devouring as so many [3052]ravenous birds; and as juglers, panders, bawds, cousening one another; or raging as [3053]wolves, tigers, and devils, we take a delight to torment one another;	Worse still, as though discontents and miseries did not come upon us quickly enough, “one person is another’s demon.” We batter and persecute one another, plotting how to sting, wound and trouble each other with mutual hatred, abuse and injuries; we prey upon and devour each other like ravenous birds, cheat one another like tricksters, procurers and pimps, or rage like wolves, tigers and devils, delighting in one another’s torment.[3054]

[3050] Editor. The preceding couplet is Boethius, Consolation 1, metre 1.21–22. Xerxes and Bayezid exemplify royal defeat; cock-boat means a small boat. Burton’s Aurelian appears to confuse emperors: Lactantius, Deaths of the Persecutors 5.3, tells of Valerian being used as a mounting-step by the Persian king Shapur. The story is reported as a literary tradition, and Burton’s name is retained.

[3052] Burton. Page 109, n: “Omnes hic aut captantur, aut captant: aut cadavera quæ lacerantur, aut corvi qui lacerant. Petron.” “Everyone here is either hunted or hunting: either corpses being torn apart or ravens tearing them apart.” Petronius. Compare Satyricon 116, on legacy-hunters at Croton.

[3053] Burton. Page 109, o: “Homo omne monstrum est, ille nam superat feras, luposque & ursos pectore obscuro tegit. Hens.” “Man is every monster: he surpasses wild beasts and hides wolves and bears within his dark breast.” The abbreviated attribution Hens. is retained; the precise source remains unlocated.

men are evil, wicked, malicious, trecherous, and [3055]naught, not loving one another, or loving themselves, not hospitable, charitable, nor sociable as they ought to be, but counterfeit, dissemblers, ambodexters, all for their own ends, hard-hearted, merciless, pitiless, and to benefit themselves, they care not what mischief they procure to others.	People are evil, wicked, malicious, treacherous and vicious. They do not love one another, or love only themselves; they are neither hospitable, charitable nor sociable as they ought to be, but false, deceitful and double-dealing, intent on their own ends, hard-hearted, merciless and pitiless. To benefit themselves, they care nothing for the harm they cause others.[3056]
Source page 109–110 [3057]Praxinoe and Gorgo in the Poet, when they had got in to see those costly sights, they then cryed benè est, and would thrust out all the rest: when they are rich themselves, in honor, preferred, full, and have even that they would, they debar others of those pleasures which youth requires, and they formerly have enjoyed.	Praxinoe and Gorgo, in the poet, once they had got in to see those splendid spectacles, cried “All is well” and wanted to push everyone else out. Once people are rich, honoured, promoted and satisfied, possessing everything they want, they deny others the pleasures that youth calls for and that they themselves once enjoyed.[3058]

[3056] Editor. Naught means wicked or worthless; ambodexters are double-dealers who serve either side for their own advantage. The awkward phrase “not loving one another, or loving themselves” is interpreted here as a contrast between mutual love and selfish love, supported by the ensuing “all for their own ends.” Its exact punctuation and force remain a collation question.

[3057] Burton. Page 109, q: “Theocritus Edyl. 15.” Theocritus, Idyll 15.

[3058] Editor. Theocritus, Idyll 15, follows Praxinoe and Gorgo through a crowded festival at the royal palace in Alexandria. After they enter, Praxinoe expresses relief that everyone in her party is inside. Burton gives the moment a harsher moral application, making it an emblem of people excluding others once they themselves are satisfied. Preferred means advanced in rank or office.

Source page 110 He sits at table in a soft chair at ease, but he doth not remember in the mean time, that a tired waiter stands behind him, an hungry fellow ministers to him full, he is athirst that gives him drink (saith [3059]Epictetus) and is silent whiles he speaks his pleasure: pensive, sad, when he laughs.	A man sits comfortably at table in a cushioned chair, forgetting meanwhile that a tired servant stands behind him. A hungry man attends him when he is full; the man who gives him drink is thirsty, says Epictetus, and keeps silent while he speaks at will, anxious and sad while he laughs.[3060]
Pleno se proluit auro; He feasts, revels, and profusely spends, hath variety of robes, sweet musick, ease, and all the pleasure the world can afford, whilst many an hunger-starved poor creature pines in the street, wants clothes to cover him, labours hard all day long, runs, rides for a trifle, fights peradventure from Sun to Sun, sick and ill, weary, full of pain and grief, is in great distress and sorrow of heart.	"He drenches himself from a full golden cup." He feasts, revels and spends lavishly, has many robes, sweet music, ease and every pleasure the world can offer, while many a starving poor creature wastes away in the street, lacks clothes to cover himself, labours hard all day, runs and rides for a pittance, perhaps fights from dawn until dusk, sick, weary and full of pain and grief, in great distress and sorrow of heart.[3061]
He loathes and scornes his inferior, hates or emulates his equal, envies his superior, insults over all such as are under him, as if he were of another Species, a demi-god, not subject to any fall, or humane infirmities.	He loathes and despises his inferior, hates or rivals his equal, envies his superior, and lords it over everyone beneath him, as though he belonged to another species, a demigod immune to any fall or human weakness.

[3059] Burton. Page 110, r: "Qui sedet in mensa, non meminit sibi otioso ministrare negotiosos, edenti esurientes, bibenti sitientes, &c." "The man sitting at table forgets that busy people serve him in his idleness, hungry people as he eats, thirsty people as he drinks, and so on." Burton attributes the thought to Epictetus in the body.

[3060] Editor. Ministers means serves or attends. Burton turns the relation between a comfortable diner and an exhausted servant into a series of bodily opposites: leisure and labour, fullness and hunger, drinking and thirst, speech and silence. The exact Epictetus passage behind his Latin citation remains unlocated.

[3061] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 1.739, describes Bitias drinking from a full golden cup: pleno se proluit auro. Both the McGill and BSB 1651 copies, printed page 110, read Pleno. The earlier Plena transcription and the note calling it Burton's error were mistaken; the original column is corrected explicitly in audit pass 13. The modern rendering is unchanged. From Sun to Sun means throughout the daylight hours; the contrast is between luxury and the deprivation that sustains it.

Generally they love not, are not beloved again: they tire out others bodies with continual labour, they themselves living at ease, caring for none else, sibi nati; and are so far many times from putting to their helping hand, that they seek all meanes to depress, even most worthy and well deserving, better than themselves, those whom they are by the lawes of nature, bound to relieve and help, as much as in them lies, they will let them cater-waul, starve, beg, and hang, before they will any wayes (though it be in their power) assist, or ease: [3062]so unnatural are they for the most part, so unregardful: so hard-hearted, so churlish, proud, insolent, so dogged, of so bad a disposition. And being so brutish, so devillishly bent one towards another, how is it possible, but that we should be discontent of all sides, full of cares, woes, and miseries?	Generally they neither love nor are loved in return. They exhaust other people's bodies with ceaseless labour while living at ease themselves, caring for no one else, "born for themselves alone." Often, far from lending a helping hand, they seek every way to keep others down—even the most worthy and deserving, better people than themselves, whom the laws of nature bind them to relieve and help to the utmost of their power. They will let them wail, starve, beg and hang before offering any assistance or relief, though able to do so. For the most part they are so unnatural and heedless, so hard-hearted, surly, proud, arrogant, stubborn and ill-disposed. Since we behave so brutally and devilishly towards one another, how can we fail to be discontented on every side, full of cares, woes and miseries?[3063]

[3062] Burton. Page 110, s: "Quando in adolescentia sua ipsi vixerint, lautius & liberius voluptates suas expleverint, illi gnatis imponunt duriores continentiæ leges." "When they themselves have enjoyed life in their youth and indulged their pleasures more luxuriously and freely, they impose stricter rules of restraint on their children." This note elaborates the earlier charge of denying the young pleasures one has enjoyed oneself, although its marker is later in the paragraph.

[3063] Editor. Insults over means lords it over or behaves arrogantly towards; dogged means stubborn or unfeeling; cater-waul means wail. The laws of nature invoke obligations to aid others. Burton closes this stretch by linking discontent to failures of mutual care; the next paragraph examines particular conditions and occupations.

If this be not a sufficient proof of their discontent and misery, examine every condition and calling apart. Kings, Princes, Monarchs, and Magistrates seem to be most happy, but look into their estate, you shall [3064]find them to be most encumbred with cares, in perpetual fear, agony, suspition, jealousie; that as [3065]he said of a Crown, if they knew but the discontents that accompany it, they would not stoop to take it up.	If this is not sufficient proof of their discontent and misery, examine each condition and calling separately. Kings, princes, monarchs and magistrates seem the happiest of all; but look into their situation and you will find them the most burdened with cares, in perpetual fear, anguish, suspicion and jealousy. As was said of a crown, if they only knew the troubles that accompany it, they would not stoop to pick it up.[3066]
Quem mihi regem dabis (saith Chrysostome) non curis plenum? What King canst thou shew me, not full of cares? [3067]Look not on his crown, but consider his afflictions: attend not his number of servants, but multitude of crosses. Nihil aliud potestas culminis, quam tempestas mentis, as Gregory seconds him; Soveraignty is a tempest of the Soul: Sylla like they have brave titles, but terrible fits: splendorem titulo, cruciatum animo:	"What king can you show me," says Chrysostom, "who is not full of cares?" What king can you show me who is not full of cares? Look beyond his crown and consider his afflictions; take account of the multitude of his troubles, not the number of his servants. "Power at the summit is nothing but a tempest of the mind," as Gregory echoes him: sovereignty is a tempest of the soul. Like Sulla, they have splendid titles but terrible fits: "splendour in the title, torment in the mind."[3068]

[3064] Burton. Margin t: "Lugubris Ate luctuque fero Regum tumidas obsidet arces. Res est inquieta fælicitas." "Mournful Ate besieges the proud citadels of kings with savage grief. Happiness is a restless thing." Ate personifies ruin and delusion; the exact poetic source remains to be collated.

[3065] Burton. Margin u: "Plus aloes quam mellis habet. Non humi jacentem tolleres. Valer. l.7. c.3." "It contains more aloes than honey. You would not pick it up lying on the ground." Valerius Maximus, book 7, chapter 3. Aloes supplies the bitter half of the comparison.

[3066] Editor. "Condition and calling" means social rank and occupation. The crown anecdote is retained without supplying a speaker not named in Burton's body text; the exact Valerius Maximus passage remains to be collated.

[3067] Burton. Margin x: "Non diadema aspicias, sed vitam afflictione refertam, non catervas satellitum, sed curarum multitudinem." "Look not at the diadem but at a life filled with affliction; not at the companies of attendants but at the multitude of cares."

which made [3069]Demosthenes vow, si vel ad tribunal, vel ad interitum duceretur: if to be a Judge, or to be condemned, were put to his choice, he would be condemned. Rich men are in the same predicament: what their pains are, stulti nesciunt, ipsi sentiunt: they feel, fooles perceive not, as I shall prove elsewhere, and their wealth is brittle, like childrens rattles: they come and go, there is no certainty in them; those whom they elevate, they do as suddenly depress, and leave in a vale of misery.	This made Demosthenes declare that "if he were led either to the tribunal or to his destruction"—if given the choice between being a judge and being condemned—he would choose condemnation. Rich men are in the same position. As for their sufferings, "fools do not know them; they themselves feel them": they feel what fools do not perceive, as I shall show elsewhere. Their wealth is fragile, like children's rattles. Riches come and go; there is no certainty in them. Those whom they raise up they just as suddenly bring down, leaving them in a valley of misery.[3070]

For particular professions, I hold as of the rest, there's no content or security in any; On what course will you pitch, how resolve?	People of the middle rank are so many asses carrying burdens. Or, if they are free and live at ease, they exhaust themselves and consume their bodies and fortunes in indulgence and excess, conflict, rivalry and the like. I reserve the poor and their discontents for another place. As for particular professions, I hold the same opinion as of the rest: none offers contentment or security. What course will you settle on? What will you decide?

[3069] Burton. Margin *: "As Plutarch relateth."

[3070] Editor. Plutarch, Demosthenes 26, makes the choice between the political speaker's platform and death, rather than specifically becoming a judge or being condemned. Burton's interpretation remains in the text; the two are not silently substituted. "Predicament" here means category or condition.

[3071] Burton. Margin y: "Sect.2. memb.4 subsect.6." Section 2, Member 4, Subsection 6, on poverty and want.

Source page 111 To be a Divine 'tis contemptible in the worlds esteem: To be a Lawyer 'tis to be a wrangler: To be a Physician, [3072]pudet lotii, 'tis loathed: A Philosopher, a mad man: an Alchymist, a begger: a Poet, esurit, an hungry Jack: A Musitian, a player: A School-master, a drudge: An Husband-man, an Emmet: A Merchant, his gains are uncertaine: A Mechanitian, base: A Chyrurgian, fulsome.	To be a clergyman is contemptible in the world's estimation; to be a lawyer is to be a wrangler. To be a physician—"one is ashamed of the urine"—is loathsome. A philosopher is a madman; an alchemist, a beggar; a poet—"he goes hungry"—a hungry fellow. A musician is a mere performer; a schoolmaster, a drudge; a farmer, an ant. A merchant's profits are uncertain; a craftsman is lowly; a surgeon, disgusting.[3073]

A smith or metalworker never takes the drinking pot from his nose; a courtier is a parasite. As the man could find no tree in the wood to hang himself from, I can point to no condition of life that brings contentment. The same may be said of every age. Children live in perpetual slavery, always under their masters' tyrannical rule. Young men and those of mature years are subject to labour and a thousand worldly cares, to treachery, falsehood and cheating:[3075]
[3076]Incedit per ignes, Suppositos cineri doloso,	He walks over fires Hidden beneath deceptive ash.[3077]

[3072] Burton. Margin z: "Stercus & urina, medicorum fercula prima." "Excrement and urine, the physicians' first courses." The joke makes the materials they inspect into dishes served at a meal.

[3073] Editor. The catalogue gives derisive stereotypes, not neutral definitions. Physicians examined urine diagnostically; "pudet lotii" literally expresses shame or embarrassment about urine. "Divine" means clergyman or theologian; "emmet," ant; "mechanitian," a manual artisan; "fulsome," repulsive. "Esurit" means "he is hungry"; Burton adds his own English gloss.

[3074] Burton. Margin a: "Nihil lucrantur, nisi admodum mentiendo. Tull. Offic." "They make no profit except by telling plenty of lies." Tully—that is, Cicero—On Duties; a precise locator remains to be collated.

[3075] Editor. "The pot's never from's nose" pictures habitual drinking. The unnamed man unable to choose a tree is a comic comparison for indecision; its source remains unidentified. "Masters" includes those responsible for children's education and discipline.

[3076] Burton. Margin b: "Hor. l.2. od.1." Horace, Odes 2.1, lines 7–8.

[3077] Editor. Horace addresses Pollio in Odes 2.1.7–8: "incedis," you walk. Burton's "incedit," he walks, adapts the quotation to his account of adult life. The deceitful ash conceals a still-burning fire.

[3078]old are full of aches in their bones, cramps and convulsions, silicernia, dull of hearing, weak sighted, hoary, wrinkled, harsh, so much altered as that they cannot know their own face in a glass, a burden to themselves and others, after 70. years, all is sorrow (as David hath it) they do not live but linger. If they be sound, they fear diseases; if sick, weary of their lives: Non est vivere, sed valere vita.	The old are full of aching bones, cramps and convulsions—worn-out old wrecks, hard of hearing, weak-sighted, grey-haired, wrinkled and harsh; so changed that they cannot recognize their own faces in a mirror, burdens to themselves and others. After seventy years, "all is sorrow," as David has it: they do not live but linger. If healthy, they fear disease; if sick, they are weary of life. "Life is being well, not merely being alive."[3079]
One complains of want, a second of servitude, [3080]another of a secret or incurable disease: of some deformity of body, of some loss, danger, death of friends, shipwrack, persecution, imprisonment, disgrace, repulse, [3081]contumely, calumny, abuse, injury, contempt, ingratitude, unkindness, scoffes, flouts, unfortunate mariage, single life, too many children, no children, false servants, unhappy children, barrenness, banishment, oppression, frustrate hopes and ill success, &c.	One complains of poverty, another of servitude, another of a hidden or incurable disease; of bodily deformity, loss, danger, the death of friends, shipwreck, persecution, imprisonment, disgrace, rejection, insult, slander, abuse, injury, contempt, ingratitude, unkindness, scoffs and taunts; an unhappy marriage, single life, too many children, no children, dishonest servants, unfortunate children, infertility, banishment, oppression, frustrated hopes and failure, and so on.

[3078] Burton. Margin c: "Rarus felix idemque senex. Seneca in Herc. œteo." "Rare is the man both happy and old." Hercules on Oeta, transmitted under Seneca's name.

[3079] Editor. "Silicernia" is a contemptuous Latin expression for decrepit old people, translated here as "worn-out old wrecks." The seventy-year allusion is Psalm 90:10, although Burton says David; that psalm's heading names Moses. The concluding Latin is Martial, Epigrams 6.70.15, with the final "est" omitted.

[3080] Burton. Margin d: "Omitto ægros, exules, mendicos, quos nemo audet felices dicere. Card. lib.8. c.46. de rer. var." "I leave aside the sick, exiles and beggars, whom no one dares call happy." Cardano, On the Variety of Things, book 8, chapter 46.

[3081] Burton. Margin e: "Spretæque injuria formæ." "And the insult to her rejected beauty." The phrase alludes to Juno's resentment in Virgil, Aeneid 1.27; exact collation remains pending.

[3082] Burton. Margin f: "Hor." Horace; the passage adapts Satires 1.1.13–14.

Talking Fabius will be tyred before he can tell half of them; they are the subject of whole Volumes, and shall (some of them) be more opportunely dilated elsewhere. In the meane time thus much I may say of them, that generally they crucifie the soul of man, [3084]attenuate our bodies, dry them, wither them, rivel them up like old apples, make them as so many Anatomies, ([3085]ossa atque pellis est totus, ita curis macet) they cause tempus fædum & squalidum, cumbersome dayes, ingrataque tempora, slow, dull, and heavy times;	Talkative Fabius will be tired before he can tell half of them. They fill whole volumes, and some will be discussed more fully elsewhere, at a more suitable point. Meanwhile, I may say this much: they generally crucify the human soul, waste our bodies, dry and wither them, shrivel them like old apples, turn them into so many skeletons —"he is all skin and bones, so wasted is he with cares." They produce "a foul and dismal time," burdensome days, "and ungrateful seasons": slow, dull and weary times.[3086]
make us howle, roar, and tear our haire, as Sorrow did in [3087]Cebes table, and groan for the very anguish of our souls. Our hearts faile us, as Davids did, Psal. 40.12. for innumerable troubles that compassed him; and we are ready to confess with Hezekiah, Isay 58.17. behold for felicity I had bitter grief: to weep with Heraclitus, to curse the day of our birth with Jeremy, 20.14. and our stars with Job:	They make us howl, roar and tear our hair, like Sorrow in Cebes' Picture, and groan in the sheer anguish of our souls. Our hearts fail us, as David's did, Psalm 40:12, because of the innumerable troubles surrounding him. We are ready to confess with Hezekiah, Isaiah 58:17, "See, instead of happiness I had bitter grief"; to weep with Heraclitus, to curse the day of our birth with Jeremiah, 20:14, and our stars with Job.[3088]

[3084] Burton. Margin g: "Attenuant vigiles corpus miserabile curæ." "Sleepless cares waste the wretched body." Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.396, describing Echo after Narcissus rejects her. The comparison text reads "extenuant" for Burton's "Attenuant"; both mean wasting or thinning.

[3085] Burton. Margin h: "Plautus." The exact source of the skin-and-bones quotation has not yet been established.

[3086] Editor. "Anatomies" means bodies reduced to skeleton-like thinness; "rivel," shrivel. The Latin skin-and-bones saying is translated as printed, while its attribution to Plautus remains to be verified. "Tempus fædum & squalidum" and "ingrataque tempora" are followed by Burton's expanding English glosses.

[3087] Burton. Margin i: "Hæc quæ crines evellit, ærumna." "This woman tearing out her hair is Sorrow."

to hold that axiome of Silenus, [3089]better never to have been born, and the best next of all, to dye quickly: or if we must live, to abandon the world, as Timon did, creep into caves and holes, as our Anchorites; cast all into the Sea, as Crates Thebanus: or as Theombrotus Ambrociato's 400 auditors, precipitate our selves to be rid of these miseries.	We are ready to accept Silenus's maxim: best never to have been born, and next best to die quickly. Or, if we must live, to abandon the world like Timon, creep into caves and holes like our anchorites, throw everything into the sea like Crates of Thebes, or, like the four hundred listeners of Theombrotus of Ambracia, throw ourselves down from a height to escape these miseries.[3090]

[3089] Burton. Margin k: "Optimum non nasci, aut cito mori." "Best not to be born, or to die soon."

[3090] Editor. Timon represents withdrawal from society; anchorites are religious recluses, and Crates of Thebes represents renunciation of wealth. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 1.83–84, first relates Ptolemy's restriction of Hegesias's lectures after listeners killed themselves, then tells of Cleombrotus of Ambracia, who died after reading Plato. He does not make Cleombrotus their teacher or give four hundred listeners. Burton apparently combines these traditions. His printed name and number remain; their immediate source is unresolved.

These Concupiscible and Irascible Appetites are as the two twists of a rope, mutually mixt one with the other, and both twining about the Heart: both good, as Austin holds l.14. c.9. de civ. Dei: [3092]if they be moderate: both pernitious if they be exorbitant. This Concupiscible appetite, howsoever it may seem to carry with it a shew of pleasure and delight, and our concupiscences most part affect us with content and a pleasing object, yet if they be in extreames, they rack and wring us on the other side.	These concupiscible and irascible appetites are like the two strands of a rope, intertwined with one another and both winding around the heart. Both are good, as Augustine holds in The City of God, book 14, chapter 9, if moderate; both are harmful if excessive. However much the concupiscible appetite may seem to offer pleasure and delight, and however often our desires please us by presenting an attractive object, when carried to extremes they torture and torment us in their turn.[3093]

[3091] Editor. "Concupiscible" describes the appetite directed towards perceived pleasures or goods; "irascible" describes the passions involved in facing difficulties or threats. These are historical divisions of the passions. This leaf is numbered 122 in the source, although it falls between 111 and 113; it is cited here as 112 [122].

[3092] Burton. Margin l: "Bonæ si rectâ ratione sequuntur, malæ si exorbitant." "Good if they follow right reason; bad if they stray beyond its bounds." The printed Latin is grammatically compressed; the sense is clear from Burton's English.

[3093] Editor. Compare Augustine, City of God 14.9: the moral character and direction of the affections matter, and a rightly directed love can produce rightly directed fear, desire and grief. Burton condenses this into his language of moderation and excess.

A true saying it is, Desire hath no rest: is infinite in it self, endless: and as [3094]one cals it, a perpetual rack, [3095]or horse-mill, according to Austin, still going round as in a ring. They are not so continual, as divers, facilius atomos denumerare possem, saith [3096]Bernard, quam motus cordis; nunc hæc, nunc illa cogito, you may as well reckon up the motes in the Sun, as them.	It is truly said that desire has no rest: it is infinite in itself, endless; as one writer calls it, a perpetual rack, or, according to Augustine, a horse-mill, always going round in a circle. These desires are as varied as they are continual. "I could more easily count the atoms," says Bernard, "than the movements of the heart: now I think of this, now of that." You might as well count the motes in a sunbeam as count them.[3097]
[3098]It extends it self to every thing, as Guianerius will have it, that is superfluously sought after: or to any [3099]fervent desire, as Fernelius interprets it; be it in what kinde soever, it tortures if immoderate, and is (according to [3100]Plater and others) an especial cause of Melancholy. Multuosis concupiscentiis dilaniantur cogitationes meæ, [3101]Austin confessed, that he was torne a pieces with his manifold desires:	It extends to anything sought excessively, according to Guaineri, or to any ardent desire, as Fernel interprets it. Whatever its kind, it tortures us if immoderate and, according to Platter and others, is a particular cause of melancholy. "My thoughts are torn apart by my many desires": Augustine confessed that his manifold desires tore him to pieces.[3102]

[3094] Burton. Margin m: "Tho. Buovie. Prob.18." Probably Tommaso Buoni, problem 18; the spelling and exact edition remain to be established.

[3095] Burton. Margin n: "Molam asinariam." "A mill turned by an ass." Burton's body text instead says "horse-mill."

[3096] Burton. Margin o: "Tract. de Inter. c.92." Treatise on the Interior [House], chapter 92; the abbreviated title and attribution to Bernard have not been independently verified.

[3097] Editor. A horse-mill was driven by an animal walking continually in a circle. The marginal Latin specifies an ass rather than a horse. The rack is an instrument of torture. Burton's abbreviated citation to a work attributed to Bernard remains to be fully identified; "atoms" becomes dust motes in his own explanatory gloss.

[3098] Burton. Margin p: "Circa quamlibet rem mundi hæc passio fieri potest, quæ superflue diligatur. Tract.15. c.17." "This passion can arise concerning any worldly thing that is loved excessively." Guaineri, treatise 15, chapter 17.

[3099] Burton. Margin q: "Ferventius desiderium." "An excessively ardent desire."

[3100] Burton. Margin r: "Imprimis verò Appetitus &c. 3. de alien. ment." "Above all, however, appetite," and so on. Platter, On Mental Alienation, book 3.

[3101] Burton. Margin s: "Conf. l. c.29." Confessions, book [number omitted], chapter 29. Compare Augustine 11.29.39; see the editorial note on the altered wording.

and so doth [3103]Bernard complain, that he could not rest for them a minute of an houre: this I would have, and that, and then I desire to be such and such. 'Tis a hard matter therefore to confine them, being they are so various and many, unpossible to apprehend all. I will only insist upon some few of the chief, and most noxious in their kind, as that exorbitant Appetite and Desire of Honor, which we commonly call Ambition:	Bernard likewise complains that they would not let him rest for a minute: I would have this, and that; then I wish to be this sort of person, then that. It is therefore hard to set limits to desires: they are so various and numerous that it is impossible to grasp them all. I shall dwell only on a few of the chief and most harmful kinds, such as that excessive appetite and desire for honour which we commonly call ambition;
Love of money, which is Covetousness, and that greedy desire of gain: self-love, pride, and inordinate desire of Vain-glory or applause, Love of study in excess: Love of women, (which will require a just volume of it self) of the other I will briefly speak, and in their order.	love of money, which is covetousness, and that greedy desire for gain; self-love, pride and the excessive desire for vain glory or applause; excessive love of study; and love of women, which will require a whole volume to itself. I shall speak briefly of the others in their order.[3104]
Ambition, a proud covetousness, or a dry thirst of Honor, a great torture of the minde, composed of envy, pride, and covetousness, a gallant madness, one defines it, a pleasant poison, [3105]Ambrose, a canker of the soul, an hidden plague: [3106]Bernard, a secret poyson, the father of livor, and mother of hypocrisie, the moth of holiness, and cause of madness, crucifying and disquieting all that it takes hold of.	Ambition: a proud covetousness, or a parching thirst for honour; a great torture of the mind, composed of envy, pride and greed. One defines it as a splendid madness, a pleasant poison; Ambrose, as a canker of the soul, a hidden plague; Bernard, as a secret poison, the father of spite and mother of hypocrisy, the moth that eats holiness, and a cause of madness, crucifying and disturbing everyone it seizes.[3107]

[3103] Burton. Margin t: "Per diversa loca vagor, nullo temporis momento quiesco, talis & talis esse cupio, illud atque illud habere desidero." "I wander through different places; I rest at no moment of time. I wish to be this sort of person and that; I desire to have this thing and that."

[3104] Editor. The promised extended treatment of love belongs to the Third Partition. "A just volume" means a full-sized or substantial volume, rather than a morally just one.

[3105] Burton. Margin u: "Ambros. l.3. super Lucam. ærugo animæ." Ambrose, On Luke, book 3: "rust of the soul."

[3107] Editor. "Gallant" here means splendid or showy; "livor," Latin for envy or spite. "Moth of holiness" means something eating holiness away. The exact Ambrose and Bernard quotations, including the attribution of individual phrases, remain unverified.

[3108]Seneca cals it, rem solicitam, timidam, vanam, ventosam, a windy thing, a vain, solicitous, and fearful thing. For commonly they that like Sysiphus, role this restless stone of Ambition, are in a perpetuall agony, still [3109]perplexed, semper taciti, tristesque recedunt, (Lucretius) doubtful, timorous, suspicious, loath to offend in word or deed,	Seneca calls it “an anxious, fearful, empty, windy thing”: a windy thing, a vain, anxious and fearful thing. For those who, like Sisyphus, roll this restless stone of ambition are commonly in perpetual anguish, always perplexed—“always they withdraw silent and sad,” as Lucretius says —uncertain, timid, suspicious, afraid to give offence in word or deed.[3110]
Source page 112 [122]–113 still cogging and collogueing, embracing, capping, cringing, applauding, flattering, fleering, visiting, waiting at mens doors, with all affability, counterfeit honesty and humility. If that will not serve, if once this humor (as [3111]Cyprian describes it) possess his thirsty soul, ambitionis salsugo ubi bibulam animam possidet, by hooke and by crook he will obtain it, and from his hole he will clime to all honors and offices, if it be possible for him to get up, flattering one, bribing another, he will leave no meanes unassay’d to win all.	They are always lying and wheedling, embracing, doffing their caps, bowing and scraping, applauding, flattering, smiling ingratiatingly, visiting and waiting at people’s doors, all affability, feigned integrity and humility. If that will not do—if once this disposition possesses his thirsty soul, as Cyprian describes it, “when the brine of ambition possesses a soul eager to drink”—he will gain his object by hook or by crook. He will climb from his hole to every honour and office, if he can get up at all: flattering one person, bribing another, leaving no means untried to win everything.[3112]

[3108] Burton. Margin y: “Ep.88.” Seneca, Letter 88; the exact wording has not yet been verified against that letter.

[3110] Editor. Sisyphus was condemned to push a stone uphill repeatedly, only to have it roll back down. Lucretius applies the story to political ambition in On the Nature of Things 3.995–1002. At 3.997 he has “semper victus tristisque recedit,” always retiring defeated and sad; Burton substitutes silent for defeated and makes the subject plural. The modernization follows Burton’s Latin.

[3111] Burton. Bottom note a: “Semper attonitus, semper pavidus quid dicat, faciatve: ne displiceat humilitatem simulat, honestatem mentitur.” “Always bewildered, always afraid of what he may say or do: to avoid displeasing, he puts on humility and feigns integrity.”

[3112] Editor. “Cogging and collogueing” means lying and wheedling; “capping,” doffing one’s cap deferentially; “fleering,” smiling ingratiatingly. The salt-water image suggests a drink that increases thirst. The passage is attributed by Burton to Cyprian; the sermon collection and its authorship require verification.

Source page 113 It is a wonder to see how slavishly these kinde of men subject themselves, when they are about a sute, to every inferior person: what pains they will take, run, ride, cast, plot, countermine, protest and swear, vow, promise, what labors undergo, earely up, down late; how obsequious and affable they are, how popular and courteous, how they grin and fliere upon every man they meet; with what feasting and inviting, how they spend themselves and their fortunes, in seeking that many times, which they had much better be without, as [3113]Cyneas the Orator told Pyrrhus:	It is astonishing how slavishly such men submit to every subordinate when pursuing a petition: the pains they take, running, riding, calculating, plotting, counterplotting, protesting and swearing, vowing and promising; the labours they undergo, up early and down late. How obliging and affable, how friendly and courteous they are; how they grin and smile ingratiatingly at everyone they meet! With all their feasts and invitations, they exhaust themselves and their fortunes in seeking what they would often be much better without, as the orator Cineas told Pyrrhus.[3114]
with what waking nights, painful houres, anxious thoughts, and bitterness of minde, inter spemque metumque, distracted and tired, they consume the interim of their time. There can be no greater plague for the present. If they do obtain their sute, which with such cost and solicitude they have sought, they are not so freed, their anxiety is anew to begin, for they are never satisfied, nihil aliud nisi imperium spirant, their thoughts, actions, endeavors are all for Soveraignty and Honor,	What sleepless nights, painful hours, anxious thoughts and bitterness of mind consume the time they spend waiting, distracted and exhausted “between hope and fear”! There can be no greater present torment. If they do obtain the object of their petition, sought at such expense and with such anxiety, they are still not free. Their anxiety must begin again, for they are never satisfied: “they breathe nothing but power.” Their thoughts, actions and efforts are all directed towards sovereignty and honour.

[3114] Editor. A “sute” is a petition or pursuit of favour or office. “Popular” here means affable towards ordinary people. In Plutarch, Pyrrhus 14, Cineas asks why the king cannot enjoy his hoped-for leisure already, without first conquering other countries. The printed marginal b actually refers back to Cyprian; it is retained and explained.

like [3115]Lues Sforzia that huffing Duke of Milan, a man of singular wisdom, but profound ambition, borne to his own, and to the destruction of Italy, though it be to their own ruin, and friends undoing, they will contend, they may not cease, but as a dog in a wheele, a bird in a cage, or a squirrel in a chain, so [3116]Budæus compares them; they climbe and climbe still, with much labor, but never make an end, never at the top.	Like Ludovico Sforza, that swaggering Duke of Milan, a man of exceptional wisdom but deep ambition, born to his own destruction and Italy's, they will struggle on even at the cost of their own ruin and their friends' undoing. They cannot stop. Like a dog in a wheel, a bird in a cage or a squirrel on a chain—Budé's comparisons—they climb and climb with great effort, but never finish, never reach the top.[3117]
A Knight would be a Baronet, and then a Lord, and then a Vicount, and then an Earl, &c. a Doctor, a Dean, and then a Bishop: from Tribune to Prætor: from Bailiffe, to Maior: first this office, and then that; as Pyrrhus in [3118]Plutarch, they will first have Greece, then Africk, and then Asia, and swell with Æsops frog so long, till in the end they burst, or come down with Sejanus, ad Gemonias scalas, and break their own necks:	A knight would become a baronet, then a lord, then a viscount, then an earl, and so on; a doctor, a dean, then a bishop; from tribune to praetor, from bailiff to mayor: first this office, then that. Like Pyrrhus in Plutarch, they must first have Greece, then Africa, then Asia. They swell like Aesop's frog until at last they burst, or come down with Sejanus "to the Gemonian Steps" and break their own necks.[3119]

[3116] Burton. Margin d: "Plutarchus. Quia convivemur, & in otio nos oblectemus, quoniam in promptu id nobis sit &c." Plutarch: "Because we may feast together and enjoy ourselves at leisure, since this is ready to hand for us," and so on. Also margin g: "Lib.3. de contemptu rerum fortuitarum. Magno conatu & impetu moventur, super eodem centro rotati, non proficiunt, nec ad finem perveniunt." On Contempt for the Things of Fortune, book 3: "They move with great effort and force, revolving about the same centre; they make no progress and never reach the end." Editorial placement: printed d anchors the Plutarch note here, although its subject is Pyrrhus and Cineas; the nearby g belongs to Budé's revolving creatures and is included here.

or as Evangelus the piper in Lucian, that blew his his pipe so long, till he fell down dead. If he chance to miss, and have a canvas, he is in a hell on the other side; so dejected, that he is ready to hang himself, turn Heretick, Turk, or Traitor in an instant. Enraged against his enemies, he [3120]railes, swears, fights, slanders, detracts, envies, murders:	Or they are like Evangelus the piper in Lucian, who blew his pipe until he fell down dead. If the ambitious man happens to fail and suffer a rebuff, he finds a hell on the other side: so dejected that he is ready to hang himself, become a heretic, a Muslim or a traitor in an instant. Enraged against his enemies, he rails, swears, fights, slanders, disparages, envies and murders.[3121]
and for his own part, si appetitum explere non potest, furore corripitur; if he cannot satisfie his desire (as [3122]Bodine writes) he runs mad. So that both wayes, hit or miss, he is distracted so long as his Ambition lasts, he can look for no other but anxiety and care, discontent and grief in the mean time, [3123]madness it self, or violent death in the end.	For his own part, "if he cannot satisfy his appetite, he is seized by madness": if he cannot satisfy his desire, as Bodin writes, he goes mad. So, either way, success or failure, he is distraught for as long as his ambition lasts. He can expect nothing but anxiety and care, discontent and grief in the meantime, and madness itself or a violent death at the end.[3124]

[3120] Burton. Margin f: "Ut hedera arbori adhæret, sic ambitio, &c." "As ivy clings to a tree, so ambition," and so on. Bottom note f: "Ambitio in insaniam facile delabitur, si excedat. Patritius l.4. tit.20. de regis instit." "Ambition easily slips into madness if it becomes excessive." Patrizi, On the Education of a King, book 4, title 20. Both notes share the printed f.

[3122] Burton. Bottom note g: "Lib.5. de rep. cap.1." Bodin, On the Commonwealth, book 5, chapter 1. The other g on this page, referring to Budé, is preserved with his comparison above.

[3123] Burton. Bottom note h: "Imprimis verò appetitus, seu concupiscentia nimia rei alicujus, honestæ vel inhonestæ, phantasiam lædunt: unde multi ambitiosi, philauti, irati, avari, insani, &c. Felix Plater l.3. de mentis alien." "Above all, appetite, or excessive desire for anything honourable or dishonourable, injures the imagination; hence many ambitious, self-loving, angry and covetous people become mad," and so on. Felix Platter, On Mental Alienation, book 3.

[3124] Editor. "Distracted" can mean both mentally tormented and deranged. Burton makes disappointed ambition a medical as well as a moral cause. Bodin's and Platter's exact source contexts remain to be checked; these historical claims are preserved as his argument.

The event of this is common to be seen in populous Cities, or in Princes Courts, for a Courtiers life (as Budæus describes it) is a [3125]Gallimaufry of ambition, lust, fraud, imposture, dissimulation, detraction, envy, pride; the Court, a common conventicle of flatterers, time-servers, politicians, &c. or as [3126]Anthony Perez will, the suburbs of hell it self. If you will see such discontented persons, there you shall likely finde them.	The results are commonly seen in populous cities and princes' courts. For a courtier's life, as Budé describes it, is a hotchpotch of ambition, lust, fraud, imposture, deceit, detraction, envy and pride; the court, a common gathering place for flatterers, time-servers, schemers and the like—or, as Antonio Pérez has it, the suburbs of hell itself. If you want to see such discontented people, you are likely to find them there.[3127]
Source page 113–114 [3128]And which he observed of the markets of old Rome, Qui perjurum convenire vult hominem, mitto in Comitium; Qui mendacem & gloriosum, apud Cluasinæ sacrum; Dites, damnosos maritos, sub basilica quærito, &c.	And as the poet observed of the marketplaces of ancient Rome: Whoever wants to meet a perjurer, I send to the Comitium; For a liar and braggart, go to Cloacina's shrine; For rich, spendthrift husbands, look beneath the basilica, and so on.[3129]
Source page 114 Perjur'd knaves, Knights of the Post, liers, crackers, bad husbands, &c. keep their severall stations; they do still, and alwayes did in every commonwealth.	Perjured rogues, hired false witnesses, liars, boasters, spendthrifts and the like each keep to their particular stations. They still do, and always have, in every commonwealth.[3130]

[3126] Burton. Bottom note k: "In his Aphor." In his Aphorisms.

[3127] Editor. "Gallimaufry" is a hotchpotch or medley; "conventicle," a gathering place or assembly, here contemptuously used. "Politicians" means calculating schemers. Antonio Pérez's exact aphorism is not yet located.

[3128] Burton. Bottom note l: "Plautus Curcul. Act.4. Sce.1." Plautus, Curculio, act 4, scene 1; compare lines 470–472.

[3129] Editor. Plautus, Curculio 470–472. The Comitium was a public assembly area; Cloacina's shrine and the basilica are locations in the Roman Forum. The printed "Cluasinæ" is regularized to Cloacina's on the right. Burton's "mitto," I send, differs from the comparison text's "ito," go. His prose restatement follows separately.

[3130] Editor. "Knights of the Post" are professional false witnesses, not members of an order of chivalry. "Crackers" means boasters; "bad husbands," bad managers of their resources, hence spendthrifts. The phrase also echoes the literal husbands in Plautus's line.

Subsect. 12. φιλαργυρία Covetousnesse, a Cause.	Subsection 12. Love of money. Covetousness as a cause.[3131]
[3132]Plutarch, in his book whether the diseases of the body be more grievous then those of the soul; is of opinion, if you will examine all the causes of our miseries in this life, you shall finde them most part, to have had their beginning from stubborne anger, that furious desire of contention, or some injust or immoderate affection, as Covetousness, &c.	Plutarch, in his book on whether diseases of the body are more grievous than those of the soul, holds that if you examine all the causes of our miseries in this life, you will find that most began in stubborn anger, that furious desire for conflict, or some unjust or immoderate passion, such as covetousness.
From whence are warres and contentions amongst you? [3133]S. Iames askes: I will adde usury, fraud, rapine, Simony, oppression, lying, swearing, bearing false witness, &c. are they not from this fountain of covetousness, that greediness in getting, tenacity in keeping, sordidity in spending; that they are so wicked, [3134]injust against God, their neighbor, themselves, all comes hence.	"Where do the wars and conflicts among you come from?" Saint James asks. I will add usury, fraud, robbery, simony, oppression, lying, swearing, bearing false witness and the rest. Do they not flow from this fountain of covetousness: greed in acquiring, obstinacy in keeping, meanness in spending? Their wickedness and injustice towards God, their neighbours and themselves all come from here.[3135]

[3131] Editor. The Greek φιλαργυρία means love of money or avarice. The Greek heading and Burton's English gloss both appear in translation. Greek letterforms and accent placement are regularized in the original column.

[3132] Burton. Margin z: "Tom.2. Si examines, omnes miseriæ causas vel a furioso contendendi studio, vel ab injusta cupiditate, originem traxisse scies. Idem fere Chrysostomus com. in c.6. ad Roman. ser.11." Volume 2: "If you examine them, you will know that all causes of misery originate either in a furious desire for conflict or in unjust craving." Much the same in Chrysostom, commentary on Romans 6, sermon 11. Burton's z is retained in this identification.

[3133] Burton. Margin *: "Cap.4.1." James 4:1.

[3135] Editor. "Simony" means buying or selling spiritual offices or privileges. "Usury" here retains its historical religious and moral sense of lending at interest or oppressive interest-taking; it is not restricted to a modern legal definition. "Sordidity" describes miserly spending.

The desire of money is the root of all evil, and they that lust after it, pierce themselves through with many sorrowes, 1 Tim. 6.10. Hippocrates therefore in his Epistle to Crateva an Herbalist, gives him this good counsel, that if it were possible, [3136]amongst other hearbs, he should cut up that weed of Covetousness by the roots, that there be no remainder left, and then know this for a certainty, that together with their bodies, thou mayst quickly cure all the diseases of their minds.	"The desire for money is the root of all evil, and those who crave it pierce themselves with many sorrows," 1 Timothy 6:10. Hippocrates therefore gives this good advice in his letter to the herbalist Crateuas: if possible, among his other herbs he should cut up the weed of covetousness by the roots, leaving none of it behind. Then, know this for certain: along with their bodies, you may quickly cure all the diseases of their minds.[3137]
For it is indeed the patterne, Image, Epitome of all Melancholy, the fountain of many miseries, much discontented care and woe; this inordinate, or immoderate desire of gain, to get or keep money, as [3138]Bonaventure defines it: or, as Austin describes it, a madness of the soul, Gregory a torture; Chrysostome, an insatiable drunkenness; Cyprian, blindness, speciosum supplicium, a plague subverting Kingdomes, families, and incurable disease:	For covetousness is indeed the pattern, image and epitome of all melancholy, the fountain of many miseries, of much discontented care and woe: this inordinate or immoderate desire for gain, to acquire or keep money, as Bonaventure defines it. Or, as Augustine describes it, a madness of the soul; Gregory, a torture; Chrysostom, an insatiable drunkenness; Cyprian, blindness, "a splendid punishment," a plague overthrowing kingdoms and families, an incurable disease.[3139]

[3136] Burton. Margin b: "Si vero, Crateva, inter cæteras herbarum radices, avaritiæ radicem secare posses amaram, ut nullæ reliquiæ essent, probe scito, &c." "But if, Crateuas, among the other roots of herbs you could cut away the bitter root of avarice, so that no remnants remained, know assuredly," and so on.

[3137] Editor. The correspondence between Hippocrates, the Abderites and Crateuas belongs to the letter tradition surrounding the supposed madness of Democritus, already used earlier in the book. It is not treated here as an authenticated personal letter by the historical Hippocrates. Burton's precise Latin edition remains to be identified.

[3138] Burton. Margin e, linked by c in the body: "Cap.6. Dietæ salutis: avaritia est amor immoderatus pecuniæ vel acquirendæ, vel retinendæ." The Diet of Salvation, chapter 6: "Avarice is an immoderate love of money, either to acquire it or to retain it." Burton attributes the work to Bonaventure; authorship and edition remain to be checked.

[3139] Editor. "Epitome" means a condensed embodiment. Burton's string of authorities moves between moral fault, bodily disease and mental suffering. "Speciosum supplicium" is a punishment splendid in appearance: wealth disguises its torment. The work cited under Bonaventure's name and the individual patristic phrases remain to be collated.

Budæus, an ill habit, [3140]yielding to no remedies: neither Æsculapius nor Plutus can cure them: a continual plague, saith Solomon, and vexation of spirit, another Hell.[3141] I know there be some of opinion, that covetous men are happy, and worldly wise, that there is more pleasure in getting of wealth then in spending, and no delight in the world like unto it.	Budé calls it a bad disposition, yielding to no remedies: neither Asclepius nor Plutus can cure such people. A continual plague, says Solomon, and vexation of spirit; another hell. I know that some think covetous men happy and worldly-wise, that there is more pleasure in acquiring wealth than in spending it, and no delight in the world to equal it.[3142]
'Twas [3143]Bias problem of old, With what art thou not weary? with getting mony. What is most delectable? to gain. What is it, trow you, that makes a poor man labour all his life time, carry such great burdens, fare so hardly, macerate himself, and endure so much misery, undergo such base offices with so great patience, to rise up early, and lye down late, if there were not an extraordinary delight in getting and keeping of mony?	It was Bias's question of old: "What do you never tire of?" "Getting money." "What is most delightful?" "Making a profit." What do you suppose makes a poor man labour all his life, carry such heavy burdens, eat so poorly, wear himself away, endure so much misery, perform such menial tasks with such patience, rise early and lie down late, unless there is an extraordinary delight in getting and keeping money?[3144]

[3140] Burton. Margin *: "Ferum profecto dirumque ulcus animi, remediis non cedens: medendo exasperatur." "Truly a savage and dreadful ulcer of the mind, yielding to no remedies: treatment makes it worse." Raised nasal contractions and the -que abbreviation are expanded from the image.

[3141] Burton. Margin d, with no corresponding visible d in the body: "Malus est morbus maleque afficit avaritia siquidem censeo, &c. avaritia difficilius curatur quam insania: quoniam hac omnes ferè medici laborant. Hip. ep. Abderit." "Avarice is a bad disease and causes grievous suffering, as I judge," and so on. "Avarice is harder to cure than madness, because almost all physicians suffer from it." Hippocrates, letter to the Abderites. Placed here after the catalogue of descriptions of greed.

[3142] Editor. Asclepius is the god of healing; Plutus the god of wealth. Their pairing says that neither medicine nor more riches cures greed. The unanchored marginal d, including the joke that physicians themselves are avaricious, is preserved at this point. The precise saying attributed to Solomon remains unresolved.

[3143] Burton. Lower margin *: "Extremos currit mercator ad Indos Hor." "The merchant runs to the remotest Indians." Horace. The printed star is attached to Bias, but this line anticipates the merchant's journey below; the printed linkage is retained here.

[3144] Editor. Bias is one of the traditional Seven Sages of Greece. "Problem" here means a question posed for an answer. The printed star and dagger linking the Bias exchange and Horace's merchant line appear reversed; both notes retain the printed anchors and explain the mismatch. Burton is now presenting an apparent defence of acquiring wealth, answered in the ensuing discussion.

What makes a Merchant that hath no need, satis superque domi, to range all over the world, through all those intemperate [3145]Zones of heat & cold, voluntarily to venture his life, and be content with such miserable famine, nasty usage, in a stinking ship; if there were not a pleasure and hope to get mony, which doth season the rest, and mitigate his indefatigable pains?	What makes a merchant who lacks nothing, with "enough and more than enough at home," range all over the world through those intemperate zones of heat and cold, willingly risk his life, and accept such wretched hunger and filthy conditions in a stinking ship, unless the pleasure and hope of getting money give a relish to the rest and soften his unremitting toil?
Source page 114–115 What makes them go into the bowels of the earth, an hundred fathome deep, endangering their dearest lives, enduring damps and filthy smels, when they have enough already, if they could be content, and no such cause to labour, but an extraordinary delight they take in riches?	What makes them go into the bowels of the earth, a hundred fathoms deep, risking their precious lives, enduring poisonous vapours and foul smells, when they already have enough if only they could be content, and have no such need to labour—what but the extraordinary delight they take in riches?[3146]
Source page 115 This may seem plausible at first shew, a popular and strong argument; but let him that so thinks, consider better of it, and he shall soon perceive, that it is far otherwise then he supposeth; it may be haply pleasing at the first, as most part all melancholy is. For such men likely have some lucida intervalla, pleasant symptomes intermixt, but you must note that of [3147]Chrysostome, 'Tis one thing to be rich, another to be covetous;	This may seem plausible at first sight, a persuasive and powerful argument. But let anyone who thinks so consider it more closely, and he will soon see that things are very different from what he supposes. It may perhaps be pleasant at first, as almost all melancholy is. Such men generally have some "lucid intervals," with pleasant symptoms mixed in. But you must remember Chrysostom's distinction: it is one thing to be rich, another to be covetous.[3148]

[3147] Burton. Margin *: "Hom.2. aliud avarus, aliud dives." "Homily 2: a greedy man is one thing, a rich man another." The collection of Chrysostom's homilies is not specified.

[3148] Editor. "Lucid intervals" are periods of clarity or relief between disturbances. Burton's claim about initial pleasure belongs to his historical account of melancholy, which encompasses moral passions as well as illness.

generally they are all fooles, dizards, mad-men, [3149]miserable wretches, living besides themselves, sine arte fruendi, in perpetual slavery, fear, suspicion, sorrow, and discontent, plus aloes quam mellis habent; and are indeed, rather possessed by their money, then possessors;	Generally they are all fools, simpletons, madmen, miserable wretches, living out of their senses, "without the art of enjoyment," in perpetual slavery, fear, suspicion, sorrow and discontent: "they have more aloes than honey." Indeed, they are possessed by their money rather than its possessors.[3150]
as [3151]Cyprian hath it, mancipati pecuniis, bound prentise to their goods, as [3152]Pliny; or as Chrysostome, servi divitiarum, slaves and drudges to their substance; and we may conclude of them all, as [3153]Valerius doth of Ptolomæus King of Cyprus, He was in title a King of that Iland, but in his minde, a miserable drudge of money:	As Cyprian puts it, they are "enslaved to money," bound apprentice to their goods, as Pliny says; or, as Chrysostom calls them, "slaves of riches," slaves and drudges to their possessions. We may conclude of them all what Valerius says of Ptolemy, king of Cyprus: in title he was king of that island, but in his mind a miserable drudge to money.

[3150] Editor. "Dizards" are fools or simpletons; "besides themselves" means out of their senses. Aloes is bitter, honey sweet. Burton turns ownership into bondage: the miser serves what he supposedly possesses.

[3151] Burton. Margin f: "Epist. ad Donat. cap.2." Cyprian, To Donatus, chapter 2 in Burton's citation; the edition and numbering remain to be collated.

[3152] Burton. Margin *: "Lib.9. ep.30." Pliny, Letters 9.30.4, says that desire to possess has so seized people that they seem possessed rather than possessing. Burton's being bound as an apprentice to one's goods is a paraphrase of this reversal.

[3154] Burton. Margin *: "Hor.10. lib.1." Horace. The compressed reference supplies no work title; the words adapt Epistles 1.10.39–40, with "carens," lacking, for "caret," lacks.

[3155] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.10.39–40. "Metals" stands for precious metal or wealth. Burton's own English gloss follows the fresh translation and is retained separately.

wanting his liberty, which is better then gold. [3156]Damasippus the Stoick in Horace, proves that all mortall men dote by fits, some one way, some another, but that covetous men are madder then the rest: and he that shall truly look into their estates, and examine their symptomes, shall finde no better of them, but that they are all fooles, as Nabal was, Re & nomine (1. Reg.15.)	Lacking his liberty, which is better than gold. Damasippus the Stoic in Horace proves that all mortals have their fits of folly, some in one way, some in another, but that covetous men are madder than the rest. Whoever looks closely into their condition and examines their symptoms will find nothing better to say of them than that they are all fools, as Nabal was, "in fact and in name" (1 Kings 15).[3157]
For what greater folly can there be, or [3158]madness, then to macerate himself when he need not? and when, as Cyprian notes, [3159]he may be freed from his burden, and eased of his pains, will go on still, his wealth increasing, when he hath enough, to get more, to live besides himself, to starve his Genius, keep back from his wife and children, neither letting them, nor other friends use or enjoy that which is theirs by right, and which they much need perhaps;	For what greater folly or madness can there be than to wear himself away when he need not? And when, as Cyprian observes, he could free himself from his burden and relieve his pains, he still goes on as his wealth increases: getting more when he has enough, living out of his senses, starving his own appetite for enjoyment, withholding from his wife and children, allowing neither them nor other friends to use or enjoy what is rightfully theirs and perhaps badly needed.[3160]

[3156] Burton. Margin h: "Danda est hellebori multo pars maxima avaris." "By far the largest share of hellebore must be given to the greedy." Horace, Satires 2.3.82. Margin i adds: "Luke.12.20. Stulte, hac nocte repetiam animam tuam." "Fool, this night I shall demand your soul back." These two marginal items have no clear matching superscript in the body; both support the following account of the covetous fool. Hellebore was used as a purgative against madness.

[3157] Editor. The Damasippus discussion is in Horace, Satires 2.3. Nabal's name and character are linked in 1 Samuel 25:25: his name means "fool." Burton prints "1. Reg.15." The older title First Book of Kings can designate 1 Samuel, but chapter 15 is still wrong; the modern column retains his citation rather than silently repairing it.

[3158] Burton. Margin *: "Opes quidem mortalibus sunt dementia. Theog." "Wealth is indeed madness for mortals." Attributed to Theognis; precise source pending.

[3159] Burton. Margin k: "Ed.2. lib.2. Exonerare cum se possit & relevare ponderibus pergit magis fortunis augentibus pertinaciter incubare." "Although he could unburden himself and be relieved of the weight, as his fortune grows he persists all the more obstinately in brooding over it." The printed citation reads "Ed.2. lib.2."; its exact expansion remains uncertain.

[3160] Editor. To "starve his Genius" is to deny himself the ordinary pleasures of life. Genius here draws on the Roman idea of a person's attendant spirit or nature, not exceptional intellectual ability.

[3161]like a hog, or dog in the manger, he doth only keep it, because it shall do no body else good, hurting himself and others; and for a little momentary pelf, damne his own soul? They are commonly sad and tetrick by nature, as Achabs spirit was because he could not get Naboths Vineyard, (1. Reg.22.) and if he lay out his money at any time, though it be to necessary uses, to his own Childrens good, he brawles and scolds, his heart is heavy, much disquieted he is, and loath to part from it:	Like a hog, or a dog in the manger, he merely keeps it so that it can do nobody else any good, harming himself and others; and for a little fleeting gain he damns his own soul. Such men are generally sad and sour by nature, as Ahab was in spirit because he could not obtain Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings 22). If he ever spends his money, even on necessities or for his own children's benefit, he brawls and scolds. His heart is heavy; he is deeply troubled and reluctant to part with it.[3162]
Miser abstinet & timet uti, Hor. He is of a wearish, dry, pale constitution, and cannot sleep for cares and worldly business, his riches, saith Salomon, will not let him sleep, and unnecessary business which he heapeth on himself; or if he do sleep, 'tis a very unquiet, interrupt, unpleasing sleep: with his bags in his armes,	"The wretch denies himself and fears to use it," Horace says. He has a sickly, dry, pale constitution and cannot sleep for cares and worldly business—his riches, says Solomon, will not let him sleep—and the unnecessary business he heaps upon himself. Or, if he does sleep, it is a very restless, broken, unpleasant sleep, with his moneybags in his arms:[3163]
congestis undique saccis Indormit inhians,	With sacks heaped all around, He falls asleep gaping over them.[3164]

[3161] Burton. Margin m, continuing along the foot of page 115: "Non amicus, non liberis, non ipsi sibi quidquam impertit: possidet ad hoc tantum, ne possidere alteri liceat, &c. Hieron. ad Paulin. Tam deest quod habet quam quod non habet." "He gives nothing to friends, children or even himself; he possesses only so that another may not possess, and so on. Jerome, to Paulinus. He lacks what he has as much as what he does not have." "Amicus" is printed where the construction calls for "amicis," to friends; the translation gives the intended sense. No clear m is visible in the body; the note is attached to the matching description of withholding.

[3162] Editor. "Pelf" is contemptuous for money or gain; "tetrick" means sour or morose. Ahab's sullen response to Naboth occurs in 1 Kings 21:4, not chapter 22 as printed. The dog in the manger neither eats the fodder nor allows another animal to do so.

[3163] Editor. "Wearish" means sickly or wasted. The Horatian phrase abbreviates Ars Poetica 170, on the old man who acquires possessions but fears to use them. The sleepless rich man is Ecclesiastes 5:12 in the King James numbering.

[3164] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.1.70–71. Burton changes "indormis," you sleep, to "Indormit," he sleeps. "Inhians" evokes an open mouth and eager fixation; the miser sleeps over his piled moneybags.

Source page 115–116 And though he be at a banquet, or at some merry feast, he sighes for grief of heart (as [3165]Cyprian hath it) and cannot sleep though it be upon a down bed: his wearish body takes no rest, [3166]troubled in his abundance, and sorrowful in plenty, unhappy for the present, and more unhappy in the life to come. Basil.	And though he is at a banquet or some merry feast, he sighs with grief of heart, as Cyprian says, and cannot sleep even on a bed of down. His sickly body finds no rest: troubled amid abundance and sorrowful amid plenty, unhappy in the present and more unhappy in the life to come, as Basil says.
Source page 116 He is a perpetual drudge, [3167]restless in his thoughts, and never satisfied, a slave, a wretch, a dust-worm, semper quod idolo suo immolet, sedulus observat, Cypr. prolog. ad sermon. still seeking what sacrifice he may offer to his golden god. Per fas & nefas, he cares not how, his trouble is endless, [3168]crescunt divitiæ, tamen curtæ nescio quid semper abest rei: his wealth increaseth, and the more he hath, the more [3169]he wants; like Pharaohs lean Kine, which devoured the fat, and were not satisfied.	He is an unending drudge, restless in his thoughts and never satisfied: a slave, a wretch, a worm of the dust. “He is always diligently watching for something to sacrifice to his idol,” Cyprian, preface to the sermons: always seeking a sacrifice to offer his golden god. “By fair means or foul,” he cares not how; his trouble is endless. “Riches grow, yet something is always missing from the diminished estate”: his wealth increases, and the more he has, the more he lacks, like Pharaoh’s lean cattle, which devoured the fat ones and were not satisfied.[3170]

[3165] Burton. Margin n: “Epist.2. lib.2. Suspirat in convivio, bibat licet gemmis & toro molliore marcidum corpus condiderit, vigilat in pluma.” “Letter 2, book 2. He sighs at the banquet; though he drinks from gems and lays his wasted body upon a softer couch, he lies awake on feathers.” Burton’s Cyprian reference; exact edition pending.

[3166] Burton. Margin o: “Angustatur ex abundantia, contristatur ex opulentia, infelix præsentibus bonis, infælicitior in futuris.” “He is distressed by abundance, saddened by wealth, unhappy amid present goods, more unhappy in what is to come.” The body attributes this to Basil.

[3167] Burton. Margin p: “Illorum cogitatio nunquam cessat qui pecunias supplere diligunt. Guainer. tract.15. c.17.” “The thoughts of those who love to add to their money never cease.” Guaineri, treatise 15, chapter 17; medical source not yet collated.

[3170] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.24.63–64, pictures growing wealth that still seems insufficient. Pharaoh’s dream of the lean cattle devouring the fat ones is in Genesis 41. The attribution “Cypr. prolog. ad sermon.” is retained but its exact work and authorship remain unverified.

[3171]Austin therefore defines covetousness, quarumlibet rerum inhonestam & insatiabilem cupiditatem, an unhonest and unsatiable desire of gain; and in one of his Epistles compares it to Hell; [3172]which devoures all, and yet never hath enough, a bottomeless pit, an endless misery; in quem scopulum avaritiæ cadaverosi senes ut plurimum impingunt, and that which is their greatest corrosive, they are in continual suspition, fear, and distrust. He thinkes his own wife and children are so many theeves, and go about to cozen him, his servants are all false:	Augustine therefore defines covetousness as "a dishonourable and insatiable desire for things of any kind," a dishonourable and insatiable desire for gain. In one of his letters he compares it to hell, which devours everything and yet never has enough: a bottomless pit, an endless misery, "that reef of avarice upon which cadaverous old men so often run aground." And what eats away at them most is their continual suspicion, fear and distrust. The covetous man thinks his own wife and children are so many thieves, intent on cheating him, and that his servants are all dishonest.
Rem suam periisse, seque eradicarier, Et divum atque hominum clamat continuo fidem, De suo tigillo si qua exit foras.	He cries at once to gods and men to witness That his property is lost and he is ruined, If anything escapes from beneath his roof.[3173]
If his doores creek, then out he cryes anon, His goods are gone, and he is quite undone.	If his doors creak, he cries out straight away: His goods are gone, and he is ruined.

[3171] Burton. Margin s: "Lib.3. de lib. arbit. Immoritur studiis, & amore senescit habendi." "Book 3, On Free Choice. He dies over his pursuits, and grows old in the love of possessing." The first locator refers to Augustine and still needs collation. The appended verse is Horace, Epistles 1.7.85, on Volteius Mena exhausting himself as a landowner; it must not be attributed to Augustine merely because it shares the margin.

[3172] Burton. Margin t: "Avarus vir inferno est similis, &c. modum non habet, hoc egentior quo plura habet." "A greedy man is like hell, and so on: he has no limit, and is the needier the more he has."

[3173] Editor. Adapted from Plautus, Aulularia 299–301. Plautus names smoke escaping from the roof-beam; Burton's verse here omits fumus, leaving its last line incomplete. "Anything" supplies the sense in the modern column; the original is preserved. Burton's English couplet instead mentions creaking doors. On printed page 117 he returns to the smoke in both his prose and margin, so the omission here should not be treated as his consistent version of the scene.

Timidus Plutus, an old proverb, As fearful as Plutus: so doth Aristophanes, and Lucian bring him in fearful still, pale, anxious, suspicious, and trusting no man, [3174]They are afraid of tempests for their corne; they are afraid of their friends lest they should ask something of them, beg or borrow; they are afraid of their enemies lest they hurt them, theeves lest they rob them; they are afraid of war and afraid of peace, afraid of rich and afraid of poor; afraid of all.	"Timid Plutus," an old proverb: as fearful as Plutus. So Aristophanes and Lucian portray him, always fearful, pale, anxious, suspicious and trusting nobody. They fear storms for the sake of their grain; they fear their friends, lest they ask something of them, beg or borrow. They fear their enemies, lest they harm them; thieves, lest they rob them. They fear war and fear peace, fear the rich and fear the poor: they fear everyone.[3175]

Last of all, they are afraid of want, that they shall die beggers, which makes them lay up still, and dare not use that they have: what if a dear year come; or dearth, or some loss? and were it not that they are loth to [3176]lay out money on a rope, they would be hanged forthwith, and sometimes die to save charges, and make away themselves, if their corne and cattle miscarry; though they have abundance left, as [3177]Agellius notes. [3178]Valerius makes mention of one that in a famine, sould a Mouse for 200 pence, and famished himself: Such are their cares, [3179]griefes and perpetual fears.	Last of all, they fear want: that they will die beggars. This makes them keep saving, afraid to use what they have. What if a year of high prices comes, or a shortage, or some loss? Were they not reluctant to spend money on a rope, they would hang themselves at once. Sometimes they die to save expenses, killing themselves if their grain or cattle come to harm, though they have plenty left, as Aulus Gellius observes. Valerius mentions a man who, during a famine, sold a mouse for two hundred pence and himself starved. Such are their cares, griefs and perpetual fears.[3180]

[3176] Burton. Margin x: “Hall Char.” Joseph Hall, Characters; the individual sketch and wording remain to be collated.

[3177] Burton. Margin y: “Agellius lib.3. cap.1. interdum eo sceleris perveniunt ob lucrum, ut vitam propriam commutent.” “Aulus Gellius, book 3, chapter 1. Sometimes for gain they go so far in wrongdoing as to barter their own life.” In the consulted text, 3.1 discusses avarice’s weakening of body and mind; neither this sentence nor Burton’s failed-harvest suicide example occurs there. The locator or intermediary remains unresolved.

[3178] Burton. Margin z: “Lib.7. cap.6.” Valerius Maximus 7.6.3 tells of a man among the Praenestines under siege who sells a mouse for two hundred denarii and then dies of hunger, while the buyer survives. Burton’s “pence” preserves the number but is not a verified conversion of the currency.

[3179] Burton. Margin a, continuing at the foot of page 116: “Omnes perpetuo morbo agitantur, suspicatur omnes timidus, sibique ob aurum insidiari putat, nunquam quiescens. Plin. Procem. lib.14.” “All are tormented by a continual disease; fearful, he suspects everyone and thinks they plot against him for his gold, never resting.” The consulted opening of Pliny, Natural History 14.1–7, criticizes greed and the decline of learning but does not contain this wording. Burton’s printed locator remains; the quotation’s source and any intermediary are unresolved.

[3180] Editor. A “dear year” is one of high food prices; “dearth” means shortage or famine. The mouse story is Valerius Maximus 7.6.3: two hundred denarii, rendered by Burton as “pence.” The failed-harvest suicide is not found in the cited Gellius 3.1 as consulted. These two anecdotes therefore have different levels of source confirmation.

These symptomes are elegantly expressed by Theophrastus in his Character of a covetous man: [3181]lying in bed, he asked his wife whether she shut the trunkes, and chests fast, the capcase be sealed, and whether the Hall door be bolted; and though she say all is well, he riseth out of his bed in his shirt, bare foot and barelegged, to see whether it be so, with a dark Lanthorne searching every corner, scarce sleeping a wink all night.	Theophrastus elegantly describes these symptoms in his character of a covetous man. Lying in bed, he asks his wife whether she has shut the trunks and chests securely, sealed the small case, and bolted the hall door. Though she says all is well, he gets out of bed in his shirt, barefoot and barelegged, to see whether it is so. With a shuttered lantern he searches every corner, scarcely sleeping a wink all night.[3182]

Source page 116–117 Lucian in that pleasant and witty dialogue called Gallus, brings in Mycillus the Cobler disputing with his Cocke, sometimes Pythagoras; where after much speech Pro and Con, to prove the happiness of a meane estate, and discontents of a rich man, Pythagoras his Cock in the end, to illustrate by examples that which he had said, brings him to Gnyphon the Usurers house at mid-night, and after that to Eucrates; whom they found both awake, casting up their accounts, and telling of their money, [3183]lean dry, pale and anxious, still suspecting least some body should make a hole through the wall, and so get in: or if a Rat or Mouse did but stir, starting upon a sudden, and running to the door to see whether all were fast.	In that delightful and witty dialogue called The Cock, Lucian introduces Micyllus the cobbler disputing with his cock, who was once Pythagoras. After much argument on both sides, to demonstrate the happiness of a modest condition and the discontents of a rich man, the Pythagorean cock finally illustrates his claims with examples. At midnight he takes Micyllus to the moneylender Gniphon's house and then to Eucrates. They find both awake, adding up their accounts and counting their money, lean, dry, pale and anxious, always suspecting that someone will make a hole in the wall and break in; or, if a rat or mouse so much as stirs, starting suddenly and running to the door to see whether everything is secure.[3184]

[3183] Burton. Margin c on page 117: "Curis extenuatus, vigilans & secum supputans." "Wasted by cares, keeping awake and reckoning to himself." The superscript c falls immediately before "lean"; it belongs to this description, not to Mycillus on the preceding page.

Source page 117 Plautus in his Aululari a, makes old Euclio, [3185]commanding Staphyla his wife to shut the doors fast, and the fire to be put out, least any body should make that an errant to come to his house; when he washed his hands, [3186]he was loath to fling away the foul water: complaining that he was undone, because the smoak got out of his roofe. And as he went from home, seeing a Crow scrat upon the muck-hill, returned in all hast, taking it for malum omen, an ill signe, his mony was digged up:	In his Pot of Gold, Plautus has old Euclio order his wife Staphyla to shut the doors securely and put out the fire, lest anyone use it as an excuse to visit his house. When he washed his hands, he was reluctant to throw away the dirty water, and complained that he was ruined because smoke escaped from his roof. On leaving home, he saw a crow scratching on the dung heap and hurried back, taking it as "a bad omen," an ill sign that his money had been dug up.[3187]

He that will but observe their actions, shall finde these and many such passages not fained for sport, but really performed, verified indeed by such covetous and miserable wretches, and that it is,	There are many such examples. Anyone who observes their actions will find that these and many similar incidents are not invented for amusement but actually happen, borne out in practice by such covetous, miserable wretches, and that it is
[3188]manifesta phrenesis Ut locuples moriaris egenti vivere fato,	Plain madness To live a pauper's life so that you may die rich.[3189]

[3185] Burton. Margin d: "Cave quemquam alienum in ædes intromiseris. Ignem extingui volo, ne causæ quidquam sit quod te quisquam quæritet. Si bona fortuna veniat ne intromiseris; Occlude sis fores ambobus pessulis. Discrucior animi quia domo abeundum est mihi: Nimis hercule invitus abeo, nec quid agam scio." "Take care not to admit any stranger into the house. I want the fire put out, so nobody has any reason to seek you out. If Good Fortune comes, do not admit her; please fasten the doors with both bolts. I am tortured in mind because I must leave home. By Hercules, I go most unwillingly, and do not know what to do." A selection from Plautus, Aulularia, especially 90–104, rearranged and slightly altered.

[3186] Burton. Margin e: "Plorat aquam profundere, &c. periit dum fumus de tigillo exit foras." "He weeps to pour away water, and so on; he is ruined while smoke escapes from the roof beam." Compare Plautus, Aulularia 299–301 and 308.

[3187] Editor. Staphyla is Euclio's elderly slave, not his wife: Plautus, Aulularia 51, has her describe serving him, and at 67 she calls him her master. Burton's mistaken relationship remains in both columns. "Errant" means errand or pretext; "scrat," scratch; "muck-hill," dung heap. Burton combines separate scenes; the complaint about wasting washing-water is at line 308.

[3189] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 14.136–137. The Latin means living the lot of a poor person in order to die wealthy. Burton's English sentence follows his quotation and is retained as an additional gloss.

Subsect. 13. Love of Gaming, &c. and pleasures immoderate; Causes.	Subsection 13. Love of gambling and the like, and excessive pleasures, as causes.
It is a wonder to see, how many poor, distressed, miserable wretches, one shall meet almost in every path and street, begging for an almes, that have been well descended, and sometimes in flourishing estate, now ragged, tattered, and ready to be starved, lingring out a painful life, in discontent and grief of body and minde, and all through immoderate lust, gaming, pleasure and riot. 'Tis the common end of all sensual Epicures and brutish prodigals, that are stupified and carried away headlong with their severall pleasures and lusts.	It is astonishing how many poor, distressed, miserable wretches one meets on almost every path and street, begging for alms: people of good family, once prosperous, now ragged, tattered and near starvation, dragging out a painful life in discontent and suffering of body and mind, all through excessive lust, gambling, pleasure and riotous living. This is the usual end of sensual pleasure-seekers and brutish spendthrifts, stupefied and swept headlong away by their various pleasures and desires.[3190]
Cebes in his table, S. Ambrose in his second book of Abel and Cain, and amongst the rest Lucian in his tract de Mercede conductis, hath excellent well deciphered such mens proceedings in his picture of Opulentia, whom he fains to dwell on the top of a high mount, much sought after by many suiters; at their first coming they are generally entertained by Pleasure and Dalliance, and have all the content that possibly may be given, so long as their mony lasts; but when their means fail, they are contemptibly thrust out at a back door, headlong, and there left to Shame, Reproach, Despair.	Cebes in his Tablet, Saint Ambrose in the second book of Abel and Cain, and, among others, Lucian in his treatise On Salaried Posts have portrayed such people's course excellently. Lucian does so in his picture of Wealth, whom he imagines dwelling on a high mountain, eagerly sought by many suitors. On first arriving, they are generally welcomed by Pleasure and Dalliance and given every possible satisfaction as long as their money lasts. But when their means fail, they are contemptuously thrust headlong out of a back door and left there to Shame, Reproach and Despair.[3191]

[3190] Editor. "Epicures" here is the conventional polemical term for sensual pleasure-seekers. It does not accurately summarise Epicurus's philosophical account of pleasure. "Riot" means extravagant, dissolute living.

[3191] Editor. The Tablet attributed to Cebes is an allegorical picture of human life. Lucian's On Salaried Posts in Great Houses ends with a comparable picture of Wealth and the disappointed dependent. Burton redirects an account of salaried dependence towards prodigality; the exact Latin translation he used remains to be identified.

Source page 117–118 And he at first that had so many attendants, parasites, and followers, young and lusty, richly arrayd, and all the dainty fare that might be had, with all kinde of welcome and good respect, is now upon a sudden stript of all, [3192]pale, naked, old, diseased and forsaken, cursing his stars, and ready to strangle himself; having no other company but Repentance, Sorrow, Grief, Derision, Beggery, and Contempt, which are his daily attendants to his lives end. As the [3193]prodigall son had exquisite musick, merry company, dainty fare at first; but a sorrowful reckoning in the end: so have all such vain delights and their followers.	The man who at first had so many attendants, parasites and followers, who was young and vigorous, richly dressed, with every delicacy he could obtain, every welcome and mark of respect, is now suddenly stripped of everything: pale, naked, old, diseased and abandoned, cursing his stars and ready to strangle himself. His only companions are Repentance, Sorrow, Grief, Derision, Beggary and Contempt, his daily attendants for the rest of his life. Just as the prodigal son had exquisite music, merry company and fine food at first, but a sorrowful reckoning at the end, so it is with all such empty delights and those who pursue them.[3194]

[3193] Burton. Margin g: “Luke 15.” The parable of the prodigal son, Luke 15:11–32.

[3194] Editor. Burton’s account of Luke 15 rearranges the parable. There the music and feast celebrate the son’s return after his destitution, not the early period of wasteful living. The translation preserves Burton’s sequence and the note records the discrepancy.

Source page 118 [3195]Tristes voluptatum exitus, & quisquis voluptatum suarum reminisci volet, intelliget, as bitter as gall and wormwood is their last; grief of mind, madness it self. The ordinary rocks upon which such men do impinge and precipitate themselves, are Cards, Dice, Hawkes, and Hounds, Insanum venandi studium, one cals it, insanæ substructiones: their mad structures, disports, plays, &c. when they are unseasonably used, imprudently handled, and beyond their fortunes.	"The ends of pleasures are sorrowful, as anyone who cares to recall his own pleasures will understand." Their end is as bitter as gall and wormwood: grief of mind, madness itself. The usual rocks against which such men dash and hurl themselves are cards, dice, hawks and hounds—"a mad passion for hunting," as one calls it—and "mad building projects": their extravagant structures, sports, games and the like, when pursued at the wrong time, managed imprudently, and beyond their means.[3196]
Some men are consumed by mad phantastical buildings, by making Galleries, Cloisters, Tarraces, Walkes, Orchards, Gardens, Pools, Rillets, Bowers, and such like places of pleasure; Inutiles domos, [3197]Xenophon calls them, which howsoever they be delightsome things in themselves, and acceptable to all beholders, an ornament, and befitting some great men; yet unprofitable to others, and the sole overthrow of their estates. Forestus in his observations hath an example of such a one that became melancholy upon the like occasion, having consumed his substance in an unprofitable building, which would afterward yield him no advantage.	Some men are ruined by extravagant, fanciful buildings: galleries, cloisters, terraces, walks, orchards, gardens, pools, little streams, bowers and similar places of pleasure. Xenophon calls them "useless houses." However delightful in themselves and pleasing to everyone who sees them, however ornamental and suitable for some great men, they are unprofitable to others and the sole cause of their financial ruin. In his Observations, Forestus gives an example of a man who became melancholy for this reason, having consumed his wealth on an unprofitable building that afterwards brought him no return.[3198]

[3195] Burton. Margin h: "Boethius." The Consolation of Philosophy 3, prose 7; Burton adapts the sentence about recalling the sorrowful consequences of sensual desires.

[3196] Editor. Boethius, Consolation of Philosophy 3, prose 7. The comparison text speaks of recalling one's "libidinum," sensual desires; Burton substitutes "voluptatum," pleasures, and changes the sentence's construction. "Substructions" literally suggests supporting structures or building work; here the context is ruinously expensive construction.

[3197] Burton. Margin i: "In Oeconom. Quid si nunc ostendam eos qui magna vi argenti domus inutiles ædificant, inquit Socrates." "In the Oeconomicus. What if I now show you those who build useless houses at enormous monetary expense, says Socrates." Xenophon, Oeconomicus; exact Latin version and locator await collation.

[3198] Editor. Pieter van Foreest, Latinised as Petrus Forestus, is the physician cited. Burton gives no precise observation number. "Rillets" are small streams, often ornamental in this context; "bowers" are sheltered garden retreats.

Others, I say, are [3199]overthrown by those mad sports of Hawking and hunting; honest recreations, and fit for some great men, but not for every base inferior person; whilst they will maintain their Faulkoners, dogs, and hunting Nags, their wealth, saith [3200]Salmutze, runs away with hounds, and their fortunes flie away with Hawkes: They persecute beasts so long, till in the end they themselves degenerate into beasts, as [3201]Agrippa taxeth them, [3202]Actæon like, for as he was eaten to death by his own dogs, so do they devoure themselves and their patrimonies, in such idle and unnecessary disports, neglecting in the mean time their more necessary business, and to follow their vocations.	Others, I say, are ruined by those mad sports of hawking and hunting: honourable recreations, suitable for some great men, but not for every person of low or inferior rank. While they insist on keeping their falconers, dogs and hunting horses, their wealth, says Salmuth, runs away with the hounds, and their fortunes fly away with the hawks. They pursue beasts so long that at last they themselves degenerate into beasts, as Agrippa reproaches them: like Actaeon. For as he was eaten to death by his own dogs, so they devour themselves and their inherited estates in such idle and unnecessary sports, meanwhile neglecting their more necessary business and the duties of their callings.[3203]

[3200] Burton. Margin l: “Pancirol. Tit.23. avolant opes cum accipitre.” “Panciroli, title 23. Wealth flies off with the hawk.” Burton cites Heinrich Salmuth’s commentary on Panciroli; precise edition pending.

[3201] Burton. Margin m, without a clear matching body marker: “Insignis venatorum stultitia, & supervacania cura eorum, qui dum nimium venationi insistunt, ipsi abjecta omni humanitate in feras degenerant, ut Actæon, &c.” “The remarkable folly of hunters and the needless preoccupation of those who, while devoting themselves excessively to hunting, cast aside all humanity and themselves degenerate into beasts, like Actaeon, and so on.” The printed form “supervacania” is retained; the intended adjective means unnecessary or superfluous.

[3202] Burton. Margin n: “Sabin. in Ovid. Metamor.” Georg Sabinus, commentary on Ovid’s Metamorphoses; precise passage remains to be collated.

[3203] Editor. The contrast between permissible recreation for the great and folly in lower ranks preserves Burton’s social assumptions. In the Actaeon myth, the hunter becomes a stag and is killed by his own hounds. Burton makes this a figure for hunting expenses consuming a family’s estate.

Over-mad too sometimes are our great men in delighting and doting too much on it: [3204]When they drive poor husbandmen from their tillage, as [3205]Sarisburiensis objects, polycrat. l.1. c.4. fling down countrey Farms, and whole Townes, to make Parkes, and Forests, [3206]starving men to feed beasts, and punishing in the mean time such a man that shall molest their game more severely then him that is otherwise a common hacker, or a notorious thief. But great men are some wayes to be excused, the meaner sort have no evasion why they should not be counted mad.	Our great men, too, are sometimes excessively mad in their delight and obsession with it: when they drive poor farmers from their fields, as John of Salisbury objects in Policraticus, book 1, chapter 4; pull down country farms and whole towns to make parks and forests; starve people to feed beasts; and meanwhile punish anyone who interferes with their game more severely than a common cut-throat or notorious thief. But great men can be excused in some respects; people of lower rank have no defence against being counted mad.[3207]

[3204] Burton. Margin o: “Agrippa de vanit. scient. Insanum venandi studium dum à novalibus arcentur agricolæ subtrahunt prædia rusticis, agricolonis præcluduntur sylvæ & prata pastoribus ut augeantur pascua feris. — Majestatis reus agricola si gustarit.” “Agrippa, On the Vanity of the Sciences. A mad passion for hunting: while farmers are driven from arable land, estates are taken from country people, woods are closed to cultivators and meadows to shepherds so that pasture for beasts may increase. A farmer is guilty of treason if he tastes [the game].” The Latin is compressed; punctuation has been supplied in the translation.

[3206] Burton. Margin q: “Feris quam hominibus æquiores. Cambd. de Guil. Conq. qui 36 Ecclesias matrices depopulatus est ad forestam novam. Mat. Paris.” “Fairer to beasts than to people. Camden, on William the Conqueror, who depopulated thirty-six parish churches for the New Forest. Matthew Paris.” This records Burton’s historical authorities and their allegation; the figure has not been independently established here.

[3207] Editor. “Sarisburiensis” is John of Salisbury. A “common hacker” is a violent ruffian or cut-throat. The New Forest allegation is transmitted through Burton’s historical authorities; its scale is not independently confirmed by this edition.

Poggius the Florentine, tels a merry story to this purpose, condemning the folly and impertinent business of such kinde of persons. A physician of Millan, saith he, that cured mad men, had a pit of water in his house, in which he kept his patients, some up to the knees, some to the girdle, some to the chin, pro modo insaniæ, as they were more or less affected. One of them by chance that was well recovered, stood in the door, and seeing a gallant ride by with a Hawk on his fist, well mounted, with his Spaniels after him, would needs know to what use all this preparation served;	Poggio the Florentine tells an amusing story to this effect, condemning the folly and pointless occupation of such people. A physician in Milan, he says, who treated madmen, had a pit of water in his house. He kept his patients in it, some up to their knees, some to their waists, some to their chins, “according to the degree of madness,” as they were more or less affected. One who had recovered well happened to stand in the doorway. Seeing a gentleman ride past on a fine horse, with a hawk on his fist and his spaniels following, he insisted on knowing what all this equipment was for.[3208]
Source page 118–119 he made answer, to kill certain fowle: the patient demanded again, what his fowle might be worth which he killed in a year; he replyed, 5 or 10 crownes: and when he urged him farther what his Dogs, Horse, and Hawke stood him in, he told him 400 Crowns: with that the patient bad be gone, as he loved his life and welfare, for if our master come and finde thee here, he will put thee in the pit amongst mad men up to the chin: Taxing the madness and folly of such vain men that spend themselves in those idle sports, neglecting their business and necessary affaires.	The gentleman answered that it was to kill certain birds. The patient then asked what the birds he killed in a year might be worth. He replied, five or ten crowns. Pressed further about what his dogs, horse and hawk cost him, he said four hundred crowns. At that, the patient told him to be gone, as he valued his life and well-being: “If our master comes and finds you here, he will put you in the pit among the madmen, up to your chin.” The story rebukes the madness and folly of such vain men, who exhaust their means on idle sports while neglecting their business and necessary affairs.

[3208] Editor. Poggio Bracciolini is the Florentine humanist and collector of humorous tales. Burton presents this as an anecdote satirising extravagant hunting. It is not a clinical recommendation or evidence that the described treatment was effective; exact tale and Latin wording remain to be collated.

Source page 119 Leo decimus, that hunting Pope, is much discommended by [3209]Iovius in his life, for his immoderate desire of hauking and hunting, in so much that (as he saith) he would sometimes live about Ostia weeks and months together, leave suiters [3210]unrespected, Buls and pardons unsigned, to his own prejudice, and many private mens losse.	Leo the Tenth, that hunting pope, is severely censured by Giovio in his Life for his excessive passion for hawking and hunting, so much so that, Giovio says, he would sometimes stay near Ostia for weeks and months at a time, leaving petitioners unattended and bulls and pardons unsigned, to his own detriment and the loss of many private individuals.[3211]
[3212]And if he had been by chance crossed in his sport, or his game not so good, he was so impatient, that he would revile and miscall many times, men of great worth with most bitter taunts, look so sowre, be so angry and waspish, so grieved & molested, that it is incredible to relate it. But if he had good sport, and been well pleased on the other side, incredibili munificentia, with unspeakable bounty and munificence he would reward all his fellow hunters, and deny nothing to any suiter when he was in that mood.	If anything happened to thwart him in his sport, or the hunting was poor, he became so impatient that he often reviled and abused men of great worth with the bitterest taunts. He looked so sour, was so angry and irritable, so grieved and vexed, that the account seems incredible. On the other hand, if he had good sport and was pleased, he would reward all his fellow hunters “with incredible generosity,” with unspeakable bounty and munificence, refusing nothing to any petitioner while he was in that mood.

[3209] Burton. Margin r: “Tom.2. de vitis illustrium, l.4. de vit. Leon.10.” Paolo Giovio, Lives of Illustrious Men, volume 2, book 4 of the Life of Leo X; edition pending.

[3210] Burton. Margin s: “Venationibus adeo perdite studebat & aucupiis.” “He was so recklessly devoted to hunting and fowling.”

[3211] Editor. “Leo decimus” is Pope Leo X; “Iovius” is Paolo Giovio. The source reads “hauking and hunting”: hawking means hunting birds with trained hawks. Papal bulls are formal documents; “pardons” refers to ecclesiastical pardons or indulgences.

[3212] Burton. Margin t: “Aut infeliciter venatus tam impatiens inde, ut summos sæpe viros acerbissimis contumeliis oneraret, & incredibile est quali vultus animique habitu dolorem iracundiamque præferret, &c.” “Or, after unsuccessful hunting, he became so impatient that he often heaped the bitterest insults on the greatest men; it is incredible with what expression and temper he displayed grief and anger, and so on.”

To say truth, 'tis the common humor of all gamesters, as Galateus observes, if they win, no man living are so jovial and merry, but [3213]if they lose, though it be but a trifle, two or three games at Tables, or a dealing at Cards for two pence a game, they are so cholerick and testy that no man may speak with them, and break many times into violent passions, oaths, imprecations, and unbeseeming speeches, little differing from mad men for the time.	To tell the truth, this is the common disposition of all gamblers, as Galateo observes. If they win, nobody alive is so jovial and merry. But if they lose, even a trifle—two or three games of backgammon, or a deal at cards for twopence a game—they become so angry and touchy that nobody can speak to them. They often break out in violent fits of passion, oaths, curses and improper language, differing little from madmen for the time being.[3214]
Generally of all Gamesters and gaming, if it be excessive, thus much we may conclude, that whether they win or lose for the present, their winnings are not Munera fortunæ, sed insidiæ, as that wise Seneca determines, not fortunes gifts, but baits, the common Catastrophe is [3215]beggery, [3216]Ut pestis vitam, sic adimit alea pecuniam, as the plague takes away life, doth gaming goods, for [3217]omnes nudi, inopes & egeni;	Of all gamblers and gambling, when excessive, we may generally conclude this much: whether they win or lose for the moment, their winnings are "not gifts of fortune but snares," as the wise Seneca judges—not fortune's gifts but bait. The usual outcome is beggary. "As plague takes life, so gambling takes money": as the plague takes away life, gambling takes away possessions, for "all are stripped, destitute and needy."[3218]

[3213] Burton. Margin u: "Unicuique autem hoc a natura insitum est, ut doleat sicubi erraverit aut deceptus sit." "It is implanted by nature in everyone to feel distress whenever he has made a mistake or been deceived."

[3214] Editor. "Galateus" points to the courtesy-book tradition of Giovanni della Casa's Galateo; the precise version remains uncollated. "Tables" denotes a backgammon-type board game. "Cholerick" retains the older association of anger with choler or yellow bile, while also meaning irascible.

[3215] Burton. Margin x: "Iuven. Sat.8. Nec enim loculis comitantibus itur, Ad casum tabulæ, posita sed luditur arca. Lemnius instit. ca.44. mendaciorum quidem, & perjuriorum, & paupertatis mater est alea, nullam habens patrimonii reverentiam, quum illud effuderit, sensim in furta delabitur & rapinas. Saris. polycrat. l.1. c.5." "Juvenal, Satire 8. One does not approach the hazard of the gaming board with mere purses attending: the strongbox is set down and put at stake. Lemnius, Institutes, chapter 44. Gambling is the mother of lies, perjuries and poverty; having no respect for inherited wealth, once it has poured that out it gradually slips into theft and robbery. Salisbury, Policraticus, book 1, chapter 5." The verse actually belongs to Juvenal, Satire 1.89–90; the margin's assignment of the following prose between Lemnius and Salisbury needs collation.

[3216] Burton. Margin y: "Damhouderus." Joost de Damhouder; work and exact location unspecified.

[3217] Burton. Margin z: "Dan. Souter." Daniel Souter; the cited work and precise location remain to be checked.

For a little pleasure they take, and some small gaines and gettings now and then, their wives and children are wringed in the mean time, & they themselves with losse of body and soul, rue it in the end. I will say nothing of those prodigious prodigals, perdendæ pecuniæ genitos, as he [3221]taxed Anthony, Qui patrimonium sine ulla fori calumnia amittunt, saith [3222]Cyprian, and mad Sybaritical spendthrifts, Quique una comedunt patrimonia cœna;	For the little pleasure they take and the small gains and winnings they make now and then, their wives and children suffer in the meantime, and they themselves rue it in the end, losing body and soul. I will say nothing of those monstrous spendthrifts, “born to squander money,” as the writer reproached Antony; people “who lose their inherited estates without any legal accusation,” as Cyprian says; and mad, Sybaritic squanderers “who eat up estates at a single dinner.”[3223]

[3219] Burton. Margin a: “Petrar. dial.27.” Petrarch, dialogue 27; exact work, edition and verse attribution require collation.

[3220] Editor. Scylla is the devouring sea-monster of classical myth. The verse moves from financial loss to damage to the soul. Burton’s marginal “Petrar. dial.27.” does not by itself establish the verse’s exact provenance; that remains open.

[3221] Burton. Margin b: “Salust.” Sallust, as printed. The attribution of this remark about Antony remains unresolved.

[3222] Burton. Margin c: “Tom.3. Ser. de Alea.” “Volume 3, Sermon on Gambling.” Burton attributes it to Cyprian; authorship and the collection he used require collation.

[3223] Editor. “Sybaritical” means extravagantly luxurious, from the proverbial wealth and luxury of Sybaris. The Antony quotation is attributed to “Salust.” in the margin, but has not been securely located. “Without any legal accusation” means losing one’s estate without even needing hostile legal proceedings to bring about the loss.

that [3224]eat up all at a breakfast, at a supper, or amongst Baudes, Parasites, and Players, consume themselves in an instant, as if they had flung it into Tybur, with great wages, vain and idle expences &c. not themselves only, but even all their friends, as a man desperately swimming drowns him that comes to help him, by suretiship and borrowing they will willingly undo all their associates & allies. [3225]Irati pecuniis, as he saith, angry with their mony:	They eat everything up at a breakfast or a supper, or consume their means in an instant among bawds, parasites and players, as though they had thrown it into the Tiber, through high wages and vain, idle expenses. They ruin not only themselves but all their friends. As a desperate swimmer drowns the person who comes to help him, so, through guarantees and borrowing, they willingly ruin all their associates and relations. "Angry with money," as he says: angry with their money.[3226]

[3225] Burton. Margin f: "Seneca." The phrase "Irati pecuniis," angry with money, is attributed to Seneca; precise location pending.

Source page 119–120 [3227]What with a wanton eye, a liquorish tongue, and a gamesome hand, when they have undiscreetly impoverished themselves, morgaged their wits together with their lands, and entombed their ancestors faire possessions in their bowels, they may lead the rest of their dayes in a prison, as many times they do, they repent at leasure; and when all is gone begin to be thrifty: but Sera est in fundo parsimonia, 'tis then too late to look about; their [3228]end is misery, sorrow, shame, and discontent.	What with a lustful eye, a greedy tongue and a gambling hand, once they have foolishly impoverished themselves, mortgaged their wits along with their lands, and buried their ancestors' fine possessions in their bowels, they may spend the rest of their days in prison, as they often do. They repent at leisure, and when everything is gone begin to be thrifty. But "economy comes too late at the bottom": it is then too late to take stock. Their end is misery, sorrow, shame and discontent.[3229]
Source page 120 And well they deserve to be infamous and discontent, [3230]Catamidiari in Amphitheatro, as by Adrian the Emperors edict they were of old, decoctores bonorum suorum, so he cals them, prodigal fools, to be publikely shamed, and hissed out of all Societies, rather then to be pitied or relieved. [3231]The Tuscans and Boëtians brought their bankrups into the market place in a bear with an empty purse carryed before them, all the boyes following, where they sat all day circumstante plebe, to be infamous and ridiculous.	And well they deserve disgrace and discontent: "to be flogged in the amphitheatre," as they were in ancient times by an edict of Emperor Hadrian, "squanderers of their own property," as he calls them, prodigal fools, to be publicly shamed and hissed out of every gathering rather than pitied or relieved. The Tuscans and Boeotians brought their bankrupts into the marketplace on a bier, with an empty purse carried before them and all the boys following. There they sat all day, "with the people standing around," exposed to disgrace and ridicule.[3232]

[3227] Burton. Margin g: "Hall." Joseph Hall; the exact source and extent of the borrowing remain to be collated.

[3228] Burton. Margin h: "In Sat.11. Sed deficiente crumena: & crescente gula, quis te manet exitus—rebus in ventrem mersis." "In Satire 11. But as your purse dwindles and your appetite grows, what end awaits you—your possessions sunk into your belly?" Juvenal; the quotation is compressed and its full wording remains to be collated.

[3229] Editor. "Liquorish" means greedy or fond of rich tastes, not necessarily addicted to liquor. Seneca, Letter 1.5, uses the proverb about thrift coming too late at the bottom of the vessel. Burton's altered word order preserves its sense: begin economising before the store is exhausted.

[3230] Burton. Margin i: "Spartian. Adriano." The Life of Hadrian attributed to Aelius Spartianus, in the Historia Augusta, 18.9. The comparison text reads "catomidiari," to be flogged, against Burton's "Catamidiari."

[3231] Burton. Margin k: "Alex. ab. Alex. lib.6. c.10. Idem Gerbelius, lib.5. Græ. disc." Alexander ab Alexandro, book 6, chapter 10; likewise Nicolaus Gerbelius, book 5 of his Description of Greece. Full titles and exact passages remain for collation.

At [3233]Padua in Italy they have a stone called the stone of Turpitude, near the Senate house, where spendthrifts, and such as disclaime non-payment of debts, do sit with their hinder parts bare, that by that note of disgrace others may be terrified from all such vain expence, or borrowing more then they can tell how to pay. The [3234]Civilians of old set guardians over such brain-sick prodigals, as they did over madmen, to moderate their expences, that they should not so loosely consume their fortunes, to the utter undoing of their Families.	At Padua in Italy they have a stone called the Stone of Shame, near the Senate House, where spendthrifts and those who declare themselves unable to pay their debts sit with their backsides bare. This mark of disgrace is meant to frighten others away from such wasteful spending, or from borrowing more than they know how to repay. The civil lawyers of antiquity appointed guardians over such deranged spendthrifts, as they did over madmen, to control their expenses and prevent them from wasting their fortunes so recklessly as to ruin their families utterly.[3235]
I may not here omit those two main plagues, and common dotages of humane kinde, Wine and Women, which have infatuated and besotted Myriades of people: They go commonly together.	I must not omit here those two great plagues and common obsessions of humankind, wine and women, which have made fools of countless people and robbed them of their senses. They commonly go together.[3236]
[3237]Qui Vino indulget, quemque alea decoquit, ille In venerem putris——	The man who indulges in wine, whom gambling ruins, Is rotten with lust—[3238]

[3233] Burton. Margin l: “Fines Moris.” Fynes Moryson; work and precise location not supplied. The body has no clear l before “Padua”; the contextual attachment is supplied here.

[3234] Burton. Margin m: “Iustinian. in Digestis.” Justinian’s Digest. Compare 27.10.1, opening paragraph (Ulpian), on appointing a curator for a spendthrift as for an insane person. Burton invokes ancient civil-law practice; see the following editorial note.

[3235] Editor. “Disclaime non-payment of debts” is confirmed in the McGill scan, but its force remains awkward. The modern column retains the contextual sense of declaring inability to pay. “Civilians” are civil-law jurists. Digest 27.10.1, opening paragraph (Ulpian), describes appointing a curator to restrain a spendthrift, on the model of care for an insane person. This supports the guardianship passage; it does not establish the Stone of Shame ritual. The Moryson and Alexander/Gerbelius references remain uncollated.

[3237] Burton. Margin n, page 120: “Persius Sat.5.” Adapted from Persius, Satire 5.57–58; see the editorial note.

[3238] Editor. Persius, Satire 5.57–58, distinguishes different men: one pursues sport, another gambling, another sexual indulgence. Burton substitutes wine for sport and joins the figures into one man. The modern verse translates Burton’s adaptation, not a restored text of Persius.

To whom is sorrow, saith Salomon, Pro.23.39. to whom is wo, but to such a one as loves drink? it causeth torture, (vino tortus & irâ) and bitterness of minde, Sirac.31.21. Vinum furoris, Jeremy cals it 15. cap. wine of madness, as well he may, for insanire facit sanos, it makes sound men sick and sad, and wise men [3239]mad. To say and do they know not what.	Who has sorrow, says Solomon, Proverbs 23:39? Who has woe, but the man who loves drink? It causes torment—"racked by wine and anger"—and bitterness of mind, Sirach 31:21. Jeremiah calls it "wine of fury," chapter 15: wine of madness, as well he may, for "it makes the sane go mad." It makes healthy men sick and sad, and wise men mad, saying and doing they know not what.[3240]
Accidit hodie terribilis casus (saith S. Austin) hear a miserable accident; Cyrillus son this day in his drink, Matrem prægnantem nequiter oppressit, sororem violare voluit, patrem occidit ferè, & duas alias sorores ad mortem vulneravit, would have violated his sister, killed his father, &c.	"A terrible event happened today," says Saint Augustine. Hear this dreadful occurrence: Cyrillus's son, drunk today, "wickedly assaulted his pregnant mother, tried to rape his sister, almost killed his father, and mortally wounded two other sisters"; he would have raped his sister, killed his father, and so on.[3241]

[3241] Editor. The story is found in the sermon collection To the Brothers in the Wilderness transmitted under Augustine's name; attribution to Augustine is not independently affirmed here. Burton's Latin says "almost killed his father," while his following English says "killed." Both are retained. "Oppressit" describes an assault; its precise sexual implication in the tale is left unexpanded.

A true saying it was of him, Vino dari lætitiam & dolorem, drink causeth mirth, and drink causeth sorrow, drink causeth poverty and want (Prov.21.) shame and disgrace. Multi ignobiles evasere ob vini potum, & 3242 amissis honoribus profugi aberrarunt: Many men have made shipwrack of their fortunes, and go like rogues and beggars, having turned all their substance into aurum potabile, that otherwise might have lived in good worship and happy estate,	His saying was true: "wine brings joy and grief." Drink causes mirth, and drink causes sorrow; drink causes poverty and want (Proverbs 21), shame and disgrace. "Many have fallen into dishonour through drinking wine and, stripped of their honours, have wandered as fugitives," says Augustine. Many men have shipwrecked their fortunes and wander like rogues and beggars, having turned all their property into "drinkable gold," though they might otherwise have lived in good standing and prosperity.[3243]
and for a few hours pleasure, for their Hilary term's but short, or [3244]free madness, as Seneca cals it, purchase unto themselves eternal tediousness and trouble.	For a few hours' pleasure—for their term of merriment is short—or "voluntary madness," as Seneca calls it, they purchase endless weariness and trouble.[3245]

[3242] Burton. Margin p: "Ser.33. ad frat. in Eremo." Sermon 33, To the Brothers in the Wilderness, attributed here to Augustine. The reference also supplies the preceding Cyrillus story. The transmitted sermon has "patrem occidit," killed his father; Burton adds "ferè," almost, in his Latin account, though not in his English gloss.

[3243] Editor. "Aurum potabile," drinkable gold, also names an alchemical or medicinal preparation. Here it is a joke about drinking away one's wealth. "Good worship" means respectable social standing; the poverty warning corresponds to Proverbs 21:17.

[3244] Burton. Margin q: "Liberæ unius horæ insaniam æterno temporis tædio pensant." "They pay for one hour of voluntary madness with an eternity of weariness." Burton connects this with Seneca; the exact passage remains unlocated.

[3245] Editor. "Hilary term" names a law or university term and puns on hilarity: their season of merriment is brief. "Free madness" means voluntarily chosen madness. The precise Senecan source remains unlocated.

That other madness is on women, Apostatare facit cor: saith the wise man [3246]Atque homini cerebrum minuit. Pleasant at first she is, like Dioscorides Rhododaphne, that fair plant to the eye, but poyson to the taste, the rest as bitter as wormwood in the end (Prov.5.4.) and sharpe as a two-edged sword 7.21. Her house is the way to hel, & goes down to the Chambers of death:	That other madness centres on women. “It makes the heart turn away,” says the wise man, “and diminishes a man’s brain.” At first she is pleasant, like Dioscorides’ rhododaphne, that plant so beautiful to the eye but poisonous to taste. What follows is as bitter as wormwood in the end (Proverbs 5:4), and sharp as a two-edged sword. At 7:21: “Her house is the way to hell, and goes down to the chambers of death.”[3247]

They lose grace and glory,	What more sorrowful thing could be said? They are miserable in this life: mad, beasts, led like oxen to the slaughter. Worse still, whoremongers and drunkards will be judged: “they forfeit grace,” says Augustine, “lose glory, and incur eternal damnation.” They lose grace and glory,[3249]

They gain Hell and eternal damnation.	They gain hell and eternal damnation.

[3246] Burton. Margin r: “Menander.” Attached to “Atque homini cerebrum minuit,” “and diminishes a man’s brain.” The fragment and Latin intermediary remain unlocated.

[3247] Editor. Rhododaphne is oleander. Burton combines moral and botanical images of attraction followed by poison. The house leading to death is Proverbs 7:27, not 7:21; the bitterness and two-edged sword are at 5:4. “Apostatare facit cor” recalls Sirach 19:2. Burton’s sentence fragments and citations are retained in sense, without substituting corrected references in the body.

[3248] Burton. Margin s: “Pro.5.” Proverbs 5, as printed; the ox led to slaughter occurs in Proverbs 7:22.

[3249] Editor. The ox led to slaughter is Proverbs 7:22; Burton’s margin says chapter 5. “Whoremasters” means men who pursue illicit sex or prostitutes. The threatened judgment is part of Burton’s religious argument; his Latin formulation has not been securely located.

[3250] Burton. Margin t, page 121: “Merlin. Cocc.” Merlin Cocai, the literary name associated with Teofilo Folengo. Exact poem and lines remain unlocated.

SUBSECT. 14. Philautia, or Self-love, Vain-glory, Praise, Honor, Immoderate applause, Pride, over-much Joy, &c. causes.	Subsection 14 Self-love, vainglory, praise, honour, excessive applause, pride, too much joy, and so on, as causes
Self-love, Pride, and Vain-glory, [3251]cæcus amor sui, which Chrysostome cals one of the devils three great nets; [3252]Bernard, an arrow which pierceth the soul through, and slayes it; a slie insensible enemy, not perceived, are maine causes.	Self-love, pride and vainglory—"blind love of oneself," which Chrysostom calls one of the devil's three great nets, and Bernard an arrow that pierces the soul and kills it, a stealthy enemy that slips past our awareness—are major causes.[3253]
Where neither anger, lust, covetousness, fear, sorrow, &c. nor any other perturbation can lay hold; this will slily and insensibly pervert us, Quem non gula vicit, Philautia superavit, (saith Cyprian) whom surfetting could not overtake Self-love hath overcome. [3254]He hath scorned all money, bribes, gifts, upright otherwise and sincere, hath inserted himself to no fond Imagination, and sustained all those tyrannical concupiscences of the body, hath lost all his honor, captivated by vain-glory. Chrysostom sup. Io. Tu sola animum mentemque peruris, gloria.	Where neither anger, lust, covetousness, fear, sorrow nor any other disturbance can take hold, this will quietly corrupt us without our noticing. "Self-love has conquered the man whom gluttony did not defeat," says Cyprian: self-love has overcome the man whom overindulgence could not overtake. He has scorned all money, bribes and gifts; otherwise upright and sincere, he has given himself to no foolish fancy and has withstood all the body's tyrannical desires, yet he has lost all his honour, taken captive by vainglory. Chrysostom, on John. "Glory, you alone burn up the soul and mind."[3255]

[3251] Burton. Margin u: "Hor." Horace; "cæcus amor sui" occurs in Odes 1.18.14.

[3252] Burton. Margin x: "Sagitta quæ animam penetrat, leviter penetrat, sed non leve infligit vulnus, sup. cant." "An arrow that penetrates the soul: it enters lightly, but inflicts no light wound." Bernard, on the Song of Songs; exact sermon pending.

[3253] Editor. "Philautia" is Greek for self-love. Here it means conceited self-admiration, not modern ideas of healthy self-respect. "Vain-glory" is the excessive desire for praise or reputation. The net and arrow imagery makes this apparently pleasant passion an attack on the soul.

[3254] Burton. Margin y: "Qui omnem pecuniarium contemptum habent, et nulli imaginationis totius mundi se immiscuerint, et tyrannicas corporis concupiscentias sustinuerint, hi multoties capti à vana gloria omnia perdiderunt." "Those who have contempt for all monetary things, have involved themselves in no fantasy of the whole world, and have withstood the body's tyrannical desires, have often lost everything when captured by vainglory." The opening construction is awkward as printed; the translation gives its contextual sense. Chrysostom, on John, is named in the body.

[3255] Editor. "Inserted himself to" means involved himself in; "sustained" here means withstood. Burton's English changes the marginal Latin from plural to singular and narrows "lost everything" to "lost all his honor." The edition preserves both versions. The final address to Glory remains unlocated.

A great assault and cause of our present malady, although we do most part neglect, take no notice of it, yet this is a violent batterer of our souls, causeth melancholy and dotage. This pleasing humor, this soft and whispering popular aire, Amabilis insania, this delectable Frensie, most irrefragable passion, Mentis gratissimus error, this acceptable disease, which so sweetly sets upon us, ravisheth our senses, lulls our souls asleep, puffes up our hearts as so many bladders, and that without all feeling, [3256]in so much as those that are misaffected with it, never so much as once perceive it, or think of any cure.	A powerful assault and cause of our present illness: although we generally neglect it and take no notice of it, this violently batters our souls and causes melancholy and folly. This pleasing disposition, this soft, whispering breeze of popular favour—"lovable madness," this delightful frenzy, most irresistible passion, "the mind's most welcome error"—this agreeable disease steals upon us so sweetly, ravishes our senses, lulls our souls to sleep and puffs up our hearts like so many bladders, all without our feeling it, so that those afflicted never once perceive it or think of a cure.[3257]
We commonly love him best in this [3258]malady, that doth us most harm, and are very willing to be hurt; adulationibus nostris libenter favemus (saith [3259]Jerom) we love him, we love him for it: [3260]O Bonciari suave, suave fuit à te tali hæc tribui! 'Twas sweet to hear it.	In this disease we usually love best the man who does us most harm, and are quite willing to be hurt. "We gladly welcome flattery of ourselves," says Jerome: we love him, we love him for it. "O Bonciarius, how sweet, how sweet it was to receive such praise from a man like you!" It was sweet to hear.[3261]

[3256] Burton. Margin z: "Hac correpti non cogitant de medela." "Those seized by this do not think of a remedy."

[3257] Editor. "Mentis gratissimus error" comes from Horace, Epistles 2.2.140: a man cured of imagining theatrical performances complains that his pleasant delusion has been taken away. "Irrefragable" means irresistible in this context. Inflated bladders supply a physical image of empty self-importance.

[3258] Burton. Margin a: "Dii talem à terris avertite pestem." "Gods, avert such a plague from the earth."

[3259] Burton. Margin b: "Ep. ad Eustochium, de custod. virgin." Jerome, letter to Eustochium on preserving virginity; full comparison remains pending.

[3260] Burton. Margin c: "Lyps. Ep. ad Bonciarium." Justus Lipsius, letter to Bonciarius; exact letter and edition pending.

[3261] Editor. Lipsius addresses Marco Antonio Bonciari, Latinised as Bonciarius. "Adulationibus nostris" is rendered in context as flattery directed at us. Burton repeats the pleasure of hearing praise in his own English gloss.

And as [3262]Pliny doth ingenuously confess to his dear friend Augurinus, all thy writings are most acceptable, but those especially that speak of us. Again, a little after to Maximus, [3263]I cannot express how pleasing it is to me to hear my self commended.	And as Pliny candidly confesses to his dear friend Augurinus, all your writings are most welcome, but especially those that speak of me. Again, a little later, to Maximus: I cannot express how pleasing it is to hear myself praised.[3264]
Though we smile to our selves, at least Ironically, when Parasites bedawb us with false Encomions, as many Princes cannot chuse but do, Quum tale quid nihil intra se repererint, when they know they come as far short, as a Mouse to an Elephant, of any such vertues; yet it doth us good. Though we seem many times to be angry, [3265]and blush at our own praises, yet our soules inwardly rejoyce, it puffes us up; 'tis fallax suavitas, blandus dæmon, makes us swell beyond our bounds, and forget our selves.	Though we smile to ourselves, at least ironically, when parasites smear us with false encomiums—as many princes cannot help doing, "since they find nothing of the kind within themselves," knowing that they fall as far short of such virtues as a mouse falls short of an elephant—still it gives us pleasure. Though we often seem angry and blush at our own praises, inwardly our souls rejoice. It puffs us up: "a deceptive sweetness," "a coaxing demon," making us swell beyond our proper limits and forget ourselves.[3266]
Her two daughters are lightness of minde, immoderate joy and pride, not excluding those other concomitant vices, which [3267]Iodocus Lorichius reckons up; Bragging, Hypocrisie, Peevishness, and curiosity.	Her two daughters are lightness of mind, excessive joy and pride, not to mention the other attendant vices listed by Jodocus Lorichius: boasting, hypocrisy, perversity and idle curiosity.[3268]

[3262] Burton. Margin d: "Ep.lib.9 Omnia tua scripta pulcherrima existimo, maxime tamen illa quæ de nobis." "I consider all your writings most beautiful, but especially those about me." Pliny, Letters 9.8.1; Burton varies the order of "scripta tua."

[3263] Burton. Margin e: "Exprimere non possum quam sit jucundum &c." "I cannot express how pleasant it is," and so on. Pliny, Letters 9.23.3; he is delighted that his and Tacitus's names are recognised through their literary work.

[3264] Editor. Pliny, Letters 9.8 and 9.23. Burton's version of the second letter compresses a specific pleasure—being recognised through one's writings—into the general pleasure of praise. "Ingenuously" means candidly, without concealment.

[3265] Burton. Margin f: "Hierom. & licet nos indignos dicimus & calidus rubor ora perfundat, attamen ad laudem suam intrinsecus animæ lætantur." "Jerome. And although we call ourselves unworthy and a hot blush spreads over our faces, yet inwardly souls rejoice at their own praise." Exact wording and location remain for collation.

[3266] Editor. "Parasites" are flattering dependants who live at another's expense. "Encomions" are speeches or expressions of praise. "Popular aire" earlier likewise means the breeze of public favour, rather than a tune.

[3267] Burton. Margin g: "Thesaur. Theol." Jodocus Lorichius, theological thesaurus; precise passage pending.

[3268] Editor. Burton announces "two daughters" but names lightness of mind, excessive joy and pride. The wording is preserved; it may group lightness and excessive joy together. "Peevishness" here includes perversity or foolish ill temper; "curiosity" can mean vain or meddlesome inquisitiveness.

Source page 121–122 Now the common cause of this mischief, ariseth from our selves or others, [3269]we are active and passive. It proceeds inwardly from our selves, as we are active causes, from an over-weening conceit we have of our good parts, own worth, (which indeed is no worth) our bounty, favor, grace, valor, strength, wealth, patience, meekness, hospitality, beauty, temperance, gentry, knowledg, wit, science, art, learning, our [3270]excellent gifts and fortunes, for which Narcissus like, we admire, flatter, and applaud our selves, and think all the world esteems so of us; and as deformed women, easily beleeve those that tell them they be fair, we are too credulous of our own good parts and praises, too well perswaded of our selves.	Now the usual cause of this mischief comes from ourselves or from others: we both act and are acted upon. It proceeds inwardly from ourselves when we are the active causes, from an inflated opinion of our good qualities and our own worth —which is really no worth—our generosity, attractiveness, grace, courage, strength, wealth, patience, meekness, hospitality, beauty, temperance, gentle birth, knowledge, intelligence, science, art, learning, our excellent gifts and good fortune. For these, like Narcissus, we admire, flatter and applaud ourselves, and think the whole world values us as highly. Just as unattractive women readily believe those who tell them they are beautiful, we too readily believe in our own good qualities and praises, and are too well satisfied with ourselves.[3271]

[3269] Burton. Margin h: “Nec enim mihi cornea fibra est. Per.” “For my heart is not made of horn.” Persius, Satire 1.47: he is not insensible to praise.

[3270] Burton. First starred margin, page 122: “E manibus illis, Nascentur violæ. Pers.1. Sat.” “From those shades violets will spring.” Adapted from Persius, Satire 1.38–40: “e manibus illis” refers to the poet’s dead remains or spirit, not his hands.

Source page 122 We brag and venditate our [3272]own works, and scorn all others in respect of us: Inflati scientia (saith Paul) our wisdom, [3273]our learning; all our geese are swans, and we as basely esteem and vilifie other mens, as we do over-highly prize and value our own. We will not suffer them to be in secundis, no not in tertiis: what, Mecum confertur Ulisses? they are Mures, Muscæ, culices præ se, nitts and flies compared to his inexorable and supercilious, eminent and arrogant worship: Though indeed they be far before him.	We boast of and advertise our own works, and scorn everyone else's in comparison. "Puffed up with knowledge," as Paul says: our wisdom, our learning! All our geese are swans, and we value other men's works as low and disparage them as much as we overvalue and prize our own. We will not allow them second place, no, not even third. What, "is Ulysses compared with me?" They are "mice, flies and gnats beside him," nits and flies compared with his implacable and haughty, eminent and arrogant worship, though in truth they are far ahead of him.[3274]
Onely wise, onely rich, onely fortunate, valorous, and fair, puffed up with this Timpany of self-conceit; as that proud [3275]Pharisee, they are not (as they suppose) like other men, of a purer and more precious mettal: Soli rei gerendi sunt efficaces, which that wise Periander held of such: [3276]meditantur omne qui prius negotium, &c.	They alone are wise, alone rich, alone fortunate, brave and beautiful, puffed up with this dropsy of self-conceit. Like that proud Pharisee, they suppose they are unlike other men, made of a purer and more precious metal. "They alone are effective in conducting affairs"—what the wise Periander said of those "who first consider every undertaking," and so on.[3277]

[3273] Burton. Margin k: "Fab.l.10.c.3. Ridentur mala qui componunt carmina, verum gaudent scribentes, & se venerantur, & ultra. Si taceas laudant, quicquid scripsere beati. Hor.ep.2.l.2." "Fabius, book 10, chapter 3. Those who compose bad poems are laughed at, but they enjoy writing, worship themselves, and, if you keep silent, go further and happily praise whatever they have written." The opening reference is to Quintilian; the verse is Horace, Epistles 2.2.106–108. Burton prints "ultra" where the comparison text has "ultro," and changes its word order.

[3274] Editor. "Venditate" means advertise or boast of. "Knowledge puffs up" recalls 1 Corinthians 8:1; Burton prints "Inflati scientia." The challenge about Ulysses echoes Ajax in Ovid, Metamorphoses 13. "His worship" is mock honorific language for the self-important man.

[3275] Burton. Margin l: "Luke 18.10." The Pharisee's comparison with other men is at Luke 18:11; verse 10 introduces the two men.

[3276] Burton. Margin m: "Auson. sap." Ausonius, on the Seven Sages; Burton's Periander quotation is incomplete and its precise text remains to be collated.

[3277] Editor. "Timpany" names an abdominal swelling, here a figure for inflated self-regard. The Pharisee says he is unlike other men in Luke 18:11. Burton's juxtaposition with Periander is syntactically abrupt: a claim to exclusive competence is followed by a fragment about thinking before acting. The translation keeps that fragmentary structure.

[3278]Novi quendam (saith [3279]Erasmus) I knew one so arrogant that he thought himself inferiour to no man living, like [3280]Callisthenes the Philosopher, that neither held Alexanders acts, or any other subject worthy of his Pen, such was his insolency; or Seleucus King of Syria, who thought none fit to contend with him but the Romans, [3281]Eos solos dignos ratus quibuscum de imperio certaret.	"I knew a certain man," says Erasmus: I knew someone so arrogant that he thought himself inferior to no man alive, like Callisthenes the philosopher, whose insolence was such that he thought neither Alexander's deeds nor any other subject worthy of his pen; or Seleucus, king of Syria, who thought nobody fit to contend with him except the Romans, "judging them alone worthy to contest dominion with him."[3282]

[3279] Burton. Second starred margin: "chil.3. cent.10. pro.97. Qui se crederet neminem ulla in re præstantiorem." "Who believed that no one surpassed him in any respect." Erasmus, Adages, chiliad 3, century 10, proverb 97; exact collation pending.

[3280] Burton. Margin n: "Tanto fastu scripsit, ut Alexandri gesta inferiora scriptis suis existimaret, Io. Vossius lib.1. cap.9. de hist." "He wrote with such arrogance that he considered Alexander's deeds inferior to his own writings." Vossius, On History, book 1, chapter 9, as cited; exact work and edition remain to be established.

[3281] Burton. Margin o: "Plutarch. vit. Catonis." Plutarch, Life of Cato the Elder 12.1, describes Antiochus the Great, who recovered Seleucus Nicator's former dominions and regarded the Romans as his only worthy opponents. Burton names Seleucus instead. That name remains in both columns; the Latin intermediary and the origin of the substitution remain unresolved.

[3282] Editor. Callisthenes wrote about Alexander; Burton's marginal account says he regarded his writings as greater than Alexander's deeds, a narrower claim than the body's dismissal of every subject as unworthy. Plutarch, Cato the Elder 12.1, names Antiochus rather than Seleucus. Burton's name is retained; the Latin intermediary and the origin of the substitution remain unresolved.

That which Tully writ to Atticus long since, is still in force, [3283]There was never yet true Poet nor Orator, that thought any other better then himself. And such for the most part are your Princes, Potentates, great Philosophers, Historiographers, Authors of Sects or Heresies, and all our great Scholars, as [3284]Hierom defines; A natural Philosopher is a glorious creature, and a very slave of rumor, fame, and popular opinion, and though they write de contemptu gloriæ, yet as he observes, they will put their names to their books.	What Cicero wrote to Atticus long ago still holds: there has never yet been a true poet or orator who thought anyone else better than himself. Such, for the most part, are your princes, potentates, great philosophers, historians, founders of sects or heresies, and all our great scholars. As Jerome defines him, a natural philosopher is a vainglorious creature, an utter slave to rumour, fame and popular opinion. Though they write "on contempt for glory," as he observes, they still put their names on their books.[3285]

Vobis & famæ me semper dedi, saith Trebellius Pollio, I have wholly consecrated my self to you and fame: 'Tis all my desire, night and day, 'tis all my study to raise my name. Proud [3286]Pliny seconds him; Quanquam O! &c. and that vain-glorious [3287]Orator, is not ashamed to confess in an Epistle of his to Marcus Lucceius, [3288]Ardeo incredibili cupiditate, &c. I burn with an incredible desire, to have my name registred in thy book. Out of this fountain proceed all those cracks and brags,	"I have always devoted myself to you and to fame," says Trebellius Pollio: I have wholly consecrated myself to you and fame. It is all my desire, night and day; all my study is to raise my name. Proud Pliny supports him: "Although—O!" and so on. And that vainglorious orator is not ashamed to confess, in a letter to Marcus Lucceius, "I burn with an incredible desire," and so on: I burn with an incredible desire to have my name recorded in your book. From this fountain flow all those boasts and brags,[3289]
——[3290]speramus carmina fingi Posse linenda cedro, & leni servanda cupresso ——	We hope that poems can be fashioned To be anointed with cedar oil and kept in smooth cypress. —[3291]

[3286] Burton. Margin r, continued at the foot of page 122: "Epist.5. Capitoni suo. Diebus ac noctibus, hoc solum cogito si qua me possim levare humo. Id voto meo sufficit, &c." "Letter 5, to his Capito. Day and night I think only of how I may raise myself from the ground. That satisfies my wish," and so on. Pliny, Letters 5.8.3. Burton compresses and alters a passage in which Pliny quotes Virgil, replacing "tollere" with "levare." The body's "Quanquam O!" also occurs there.

[3287] Burton. Margin s: "Tullius." Marcus Tullius Cicero.

[3288] Burton. Margin t at the foot of page 122: "Ut nomen meum scriptis tuis illustretur. Inquies animus studio æternitatis, noctes & dies angebatur. Hensius orat. funeb. de Scal." "That my name may be made illustrious by your writings. His restless mind was tormented night and day by the desire for immortality. Heinsius, funeral oration on Scaliger." The margin combines the Cicero phrase and a further example; both are retained.

[3289] Editor. Burton prints "Marcus Lucceius"; the letter requesting literary commemoration is Cicero, Letters to Friends 5.12, to Lucius Lucceius. Pliny's "Quanquam O!" in Letters 5.8.3 is itself a broken-off quotation. It is translated as a fragment, with the continuation left unsupplied.

[3291] Editor. Horace, Ars Poetica 331–332. Cedar oil and cypress storage protect a book physically; Burton uses them to suggest literary survival. Horace asks whether such poetry can be expected from minds absorbed in money. Burton removes that question's framing and presents the words as a boast. The print reads "leni," gentle, where the comparison text has "levi," smooth; the modern version follows the contextual sense of the cypress surface. The BSB 1651 copy, p. 122, also reads leni; the contextual translation is retained as an explicit editorial choice.

And that of Ennius,	And that passage of Ennius,

[3292] Burton. Margin y at the foot of page 122: “Od. ult. l.3.” Last ode of book 3. Burton’s sequence also includes Horace, Odes 2.20.1–3, before the excerpts from 3.25 and 3.30.

[3293] Editor. A sequence of Horatian claims to poetic distinction: Odes 2.20.1–3, 3.25.17–18 and 3.30.10, 1. The Aufidus is a river in southern Italy. Burton gathers separate poems into a single catalogue of self-praise and prints “loquor,” I speak, for Horace’s “loquar,” I shall speak.

[3294] Burton. Unlettered material at the foot of p. 122: “Iamque opus exegi. Vale liber fœlix Palingen. lib.18.” “And now I have finished my work. Farewell, fortunate book. Palingenius, book 18.” Both McGill and BSB 1651 copies read 18, correcting this draft’s 10 in audit pass 14. Iamque opus exegi repeats the Ovid opening in the body. The precise attachment and intended Palingenius reference remain unresolved; 18 records the print, not a verified book locator.

With many such proud strains, and foolish flashes too common with Writers. Not so much as Democharis on the [3297]Topicks, but he will be immortal: Typotius de fama, shall be famous, and well he deserves, because he writ of fame; and every trivial Poet must be renowned,	With many such proud strains and foolish flourishes, all too common among writers. Even Democharis, writing on the Topics, must be immortal. Typotius, writing On Fame, must be famous, and well he deserves it, since he wrote about fame! And every trivial poet must be renowned,[3298]
——Plausuque petit clarescere vulgi.	And seeks to shine through the applause of the crowd.
This puffing humor it is, that hath produced so many great tomes, built such famous monuments, strong Castles, and Mausolean Tombs, to have their acts eternized, ——Digito monstrari, & dicier hic est; to see their names inscribed, as Phryne on the walls of Thebes, Phryne fecit:	It is this self-inflating disposition that has produced so many great volumes, built such famous monuments, strong castles and tombs like that of Mausolus, to make their deeds eternal: “To be pointed out, and have people say, ‘That is the man!’” To see their names inscribed, as Phryne’s on the walls of Thebes: “Phryne made this.”[3299]

[3296] Editor. The epitaph ascribed to Ennius is quoted by Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 1.15.34. Cicero also inserts the question “cur?”, why, but has “vivos,” alive, where Burton prints “docta,” learned. The modern verse translates Burton’s version.

[3297] Burton. Dagger margin on the page numbered 113, in sequence 123: “In lib.8.” “In book 8.” Attached to Democharis on the Topics; author identification remains uncertain.

[3298] Editor. “Democharis” is the name as printed; the identification of the commentator on the Topics remains uncertain. Typotius is Jacobus Typotius, cited for a work on fame. Burton’s praise of him is pointedly circular and ironic.

[3299] Editor. Mausolus’s tomb supplied the word “mausoleum.” The pointing finger echoes Persius, Satire 1.28. The Phryne story concerns an offer to rebuild Thebes’ walls in return for an inscription; Burton compresses it into an accomplished inscription. The full historical source chain remains to be collated.

This causeth so many bloody battles, ——Et noctes cogit vigilare serenas; Long journies, Magnum iter intendo, sed dat mihi gloria vires, gaining honor, a little applause. Pride, self-love, Vain-glory.	This causes so many bloody battles, “And compels us to stay awake through clear nights”; Long journeys, “I set out on a long journey, but glory gives me strength”; Winning honour, a little applause. Pride, self-love, vainglory.[3300]
This is it which makes them take such pains, and break out into those ridiculous strains, this high conceit of themselves, to [3301]scorn all others; ridiculoso fastu & intolerando contemptu, as [3302]Palæmon the Grammarian contemned Varro, secum & natas & morituras literas jactans, and brings them to that height of insolency, that they cannot indure to be contradicted, [3303]or hear of any thing but their own commendation, which Hierom notes of such kinde of men. And as [3304]Austin well seconds him, ’tis their sole study day and night to be commended and applauded.	This is what makes them take such pains and burst into those ridiculous strains: this high opinion of themselves, making them scorn everyone else “with ridiculous arrogance and intolerable contempt,” as Palaemon the grammarian despised Varro, “boasting that learning had been born with him and would die with him.” It brings them to such a pitch of insolence that they cannot bear contradiction or listen to anything but their own praises, as Jerome observes of such men. Augustine aptly supports him: their only study, day and night, is to be praised and applauded.[3305]

[3300] Editor. Burton’s short quotations interrupt the syntax, with “gaining honour” resuming the catalogue of motives. “Et noctes…” echoes Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 1.142; the journey sustained by glory adapts Propertius 4.10.3, changing “ascendo,” I climb, to “intendo,” I set out or direct my course. Exact intermediary texts remain to be checked.

[3301] Burton. Margin z: “De ponte dejicere.” “To throw off the bridge.” A proverbial expression of rejection; its exact source here remains unlocated.

[3302] Burton. Margin a: “Sueton lib. de gram.” Suetonius, On Grammarians, chapter 23, on Palaemon’s arrogance and contempt for Varro.

[3303] Burton. Margin b: “Nihil libenter audiunt, nisi laudes suas.” “They gladly hear nothing but their own praises.” Jerome is named in the body; locator pending.

[3304] Burton. Margin c: “Epist.56. Nihil aliud dies noctesque cogitant nisi ut in studiis suis laudentur ab hominibus.” “Letter 56. Day and night they think of nothing else but being praised by men for their pursuits.” Augustine, as cited; edition-specific numbering and wording remain uncollated.

[3305] Editor. Suetonius, On Grammarians 23, says Palaemon called Varro a pig and claimed that learning was born and would die with him. Burton compresses the passage. “Scorn” is amplified by the marginal proverb about throwing someone off a bridge.

When as indeed, in all wise mens judgments, quibus cor sapit, they are [3306]mad, empty vessels, funges, beside themselves, derided, & ut Camelus in proverbio quærens cornua, etiam quas habebat aures amisit, their works are toyes, as an Almanack out of date, [3307]authoris pereunt garrulitate sui, they seek fame and immortality, but reap dishonor and infamy, they are a common obloquie, insensati, and come far short of that which they suppose or expect. [3308]O puer ut sis vitalis metuo.	Yet in the judgment of all wise men, "whose hearts have understanding," they are mad, empty vessels, mushrooms, out of their senses, objects of derision. "Like the camel in the proverb, which sought horns and lost even the ears it already had," their works are trifles, like an out-of-date almanac: "they perish through their author's chatter." They seek fame and immortality, but reap dishonour and infamy. They are common objects of abuse, "senseless," and fall far short of what they suppose or expect. "O boy, I fear you will not live long."[3309]
Of so many myriades of Poets, Rhetoricians, Philosophers, sophisters, as [3310]Eusebius well observes, which have written in former ages, scarce one of a thousands works remaines, nomina & libri simul cum corporibus interierunt, their books and bodies are perished together. It is not as they vainly think, they shall surely be admired and immortal, as one told Philip of Macedon insulting after a victory, that his shadow was no longer than before, we may say to them,	Of the many thousands of poets, rhetoricians, philosophers and sophists who wrote in former ages, scarcely one in a thousand has works that survive, as Eusebius aptly observes: "their names and books have perished together with their bodies"; their books and bodies have perished together. It is not as they vainly think, that they will certainly be admired and immortal. As someone told Philip of Macedon, exulting after a victory, that his shadow was no longer than before, so we may say to them, [3306] Burton. Margin d: "Quæ major dementia aut dici, aut excogitari potest, quam sic ob gloriam cruciari? Insaniam illam domine longe fac à me. Austin. conf.lib.10.cap.37." "What greater madness can be expressed or imagined than to be so tormented for glory? Lord, keep that madness far from me." Augustine, Confessions 10.37.62 contains the concluding prayer, with "istam" for Burton's "illam"; the preceding question remains unlocated.

[3307] Burton. Margin e: "Mart.l.5.51." Martial, book 5, epigram 51, as printed. The exact quotation and locator remain unresolved.

[3308] Burton. Margin f: "Hor.Sat.1.l.2." Horace, Satires 2.1.60.

[3309] Editor. "Funges," mushrooms, disparages these men as insubstantial or worthless growths. The camel's request for horns loses it the ears it already possessed: ambition causes a loss instead of a gain. The final phrase is Horace, Satires 2.1.60, a warning about the dangers of satirical writing; Burton turns it against hopes of literary survival.

[3310] Burton. Final starred margin on the page numbered 113: "Lib. cont. Philos.cap.1." "Book against the philosophers, chapter 1." The body names Eusebius; the exact work and passage remain to be identified. The body marker appears as g, whereas the margin uses a star.

Source page 124 Nos demiramur, sed non cum deside vulgo, Sed velut Harpyas, Gorgonas, & Furias.	We marvel, but not with the idle crowd: Rather as at Harpies, Gorgons and Furies.[3311]
We marvail too, not as the vulgar we, But as we Gorgons, Harpy, or Furies see.	We marvel too, though not as common people do, But as at Gorgons, Harpies or Furies.
Or if we do applaud, honor and admire; quota pars, how small a part in respect of the whole world, never so much as hears our names, how few take notice of us, how slender a Tract, as scant as Alcibiades his land in a Map! And yet every man must and will be immortal, as he hopes, and extend his fame to our Antipodes, when as half, no not a quarter of his own Province or City, neither knows nor hears of him:	Or if we do applaud, honour and admire: "what a small part"—how small a part, compared with the whole world, ever so much as hears our names! How few take notice of us; how narrow a region, as tiny as Alcibiades' land on a map! Yet every man must and will be immortal, so he hopes, and spread his fame to the other side of the earth, when half—no, not even a quarter—of his own province or city knows him or hears of him.[3312]
but say they did, whats a City to a Kingdom, a Kingdom to Europe, Europe to the world, the world it self that must have an end, if compared to the least visible Star in the Firmament, eighteen times bigger then it? and then if those Stars be infinite, and every Star there be a Sun, as some will, and as this Sun of ours hath his Planets about him, all inhabited; what proportion bear we to them, and wher's our glory?	But suppose they did. What is a city beside a kingdom, a kingdom beside Europe, Europe beside the world, or the world itself, which must come to an end, compared with the smallest visible star in the firmament, eighteen times larger than it? Then, if those stars are infinite, and every star is a sun, as some maintain, and each, like our own sun, has its planets around it, all inhabited, what proportion do we bear to them, and where is our glory?[3313]

[3311] Editor. Harpies, Gorgons and Furies are terrifying figures of classical myth. The point is astonishment at a monster rather than admiration for achievement. The Latin couplet's author remains unlocated; Burton's English couplet is retained separately.

[3313] Editor. The stellar sizes and inhabited planetary systems belong to Burton's historical cosmological argument. His "if" and "as some maintain" matter: he invokes a speculative vastness to diminish human fame, rather than establishing these propositions as fact.

Orbem terrarum victor Romanus habebat, as he crackt in Petronius, all the world was under Augustus: and so in Constantines time, Eusebius brags he governed all the world, universum mundum præclarè admodum administravit,——& omnes orbis gentes Imperatori subjecti: so of Alexander it is given out, the 4. Monarchies. &c. when as neither Greeks nor Romans, ever had the fifteenth part of the now known world, nor half of that which was then described.	"The victorious Roman held the whole world," as he boasted in Petronius: the whole world was under Augustus. So, too, in Constantine's time, Eusebius boasts that he governed the whole world: "he ruled the entire world most splendidly —and all the nations of the earth were subject to the emperor." The same is said of Alexander, the four monarchies, and so on, though neither Greeks nor Romans ever possessed a fifteenth of the world now known, or half of what was then described.[3314]
What Braggadocians are they and we then? quam brevis hic de nobis sermo, as [3315]he said, [3316]pudebit aucti nominis, how short a time; how little a while doth this fame of ours continue? Every private Province, every small territory and City, when we have all done, will yeeld as generous spirits, as brave examples in all respects, as famous as our selves, Cadwallader in Wales, Rollo in Normandy, Robbin-hood and Little Iohn, are as much renown'd in Sherwood, as Cæsar in Rome, Alexander in Greece, or his Hephæstion, [3317]Omnis ætas omnisque populus in exemplum & admirationem veniet,	What braggarts they and we are, then! "How brief is this talk of us," as he said; "you will be ashamed of your enlarged renown." How short a time, how little while does this fame of ours last? When all is said and done, every outlying province, every small territory and city will produce spirits as noble, examples as fine in every respect, people as famous as ourselves. Cadwallader in Wales, Rollo in Normandy, Robin Hood and Little John are as renowned in Sherwood as Caesar in Rome, Alexander in Greece, or his Hephaestion. "Every age and every people will furnish examples and objects of admiration."[3318]

[3314] Editor. The Roman-world line occurs in Petronius's civil-war poem in the Satyricon. Burton juxtaposes it with Augustus, Constantine, Alexander and the traditional four world monarchies. His fractional estimates of imperial territory are rhetorical and are not independently established here.

[3315] Burton. Margin g, page 124: "Tul.som.Scip." Cicero, The Dream of Scipio.

[3316] Burton. Margin h: "Boethius." The phrase "pudebit aucti nominis" belongs to Consolation of Philosophy 2, metre 7.

[3317] Burton. Margin i: "Putean.cisalp. hist.lib.1." Puteanus, Cisalpine History, book 1; full bibliographic identification and precise passage pending.

[3318] Editor. Cadwallader is a Welsh royal name; Rollo is associated with the foundation of Normandy; Hephaestion was Alexander's companion. The point is the local scale of renown, with legendary and historical figures placed side by side. "Braggadocians" means boastful braggarts.

Every town, city, book, is full of brave Souldiers, Senators, Scholars, and though [3319]Bracydas was a worthy Captain, a good man, and as they thought, not to be matched in Lacedæmon, yet as his mother truly said, plures habet Sparta Bracyda meliores, Sparta had many better men than ever he was; and howsoever thou admirest thy self, thy friend, many an obscure fellow the world never took notice of, had he been in place or action, would have done much better than he or he, or thou thy self.	Every town, city and book is full of fine soldiers, senators and scholars. Though Brasidas was a worthy commander, a good man, and—as they thought—unequalled in Lacedaemon, his mother truly said, "Sparta has many men better than Brasidas": Sparta had many better men than he ever was. However much you admire yourself or your friend, many an obscure fellow the world never noticed, had he held the position or taken part in the action, would have done much better than this man or that, or you yourself.[3320]

[3319] Burton. Margin k: "Plutarch. Lycurgo." Plutarch, Life of Lycurgus 25, relating the reply of Brasidas's mother.

[3320] Editor. "Bracydas" is Brasidas, the Spartan commander; the modern spelling is regularised. Lacedaemon refers to Sparta. Plutarch's Life of Lycurgus 25 gives his mother's reply: Sparta had many better men than her son.

Another kinde of mad men there is opposite to these, that are insensibly mad, and know not of it, such as contemn all praise and glory, think themselves most free, when as indeed they are most mad: calcant sed alio fastu: a company of Cynicks, such as are Monkes, Hermites, Anachorites, that contemn the world, contemn themselves, contemn all titles, honors, offices: and yet in that contempt, are more proud than any man living whatsoever.	There is another kind of madman, the opposite of these, mad without knowing it: those who despise all praise and glory, who think themselves most free when they are in fact most mad. “They trample it down, but with a different pride”: a company of Cynics, such as monks, hermits and anchorites, who despise the world, despise themselves, despise all titles, honours and offices, yet in that contempt are prouder than anyone else alive.[3321]
They are proud in humility; proud in that they are not proud, sæpe homo de vanæ gloriæ contemptu, vanius gloriatur, as Austin hath it, confess. lib.10. cap.38. like Diogenes, intus gloriantur, they brag inwardly, and feed themselves fat with a self-conceit of sanctity, which is no better than hypocrisie.	They are proud in their humility, proud that they are not proud. “Often a man boasts more vainly of his contempt for vainglory,” as Augustine puts it in Confessions, book 10, chapter 38. Like Diogenes, “they glory inwardly”: they boast within themselves and feed themselves fat on a conceit of holiness, which is no better than hypocrisy.[3322]

[3321] Editor. “Cynics” recalls the ancient philosophical tradition of conspicuous simplicity; Burton applies it polemically to Christian ascetics. Anchorites are religious recluses. The phrase about trampling pride recalls the story of Diogenes treading on Plato’s furnishings and being accused of doing so with another kind of pride.

[3322] Editor. Augustine, Confessions 10.38.63: contempt for vainglory can itself become a source of vainglory. Burton makes the wording more explicitly general by inserting “homo,” a man. Diogenes exemplifies the risk of inward self-congratulation.

Source page 124–125 They go in sheeps russet, many great men that might maintaine themselves in cloth of gold, and seem to be dejected, humble by their outward carriage, when as inwardly they are swoln full of pride, arrogancy, and self-conceit. And therefore Seneca adviseth his friend Lucilius, [3323]in his attire and gesture, outward actions, especially to avoid all such things as are more notable in themselves: as a rugged attire, hirsute head, horrid beard, contempt of money, course lodging, and whatsoever leads to fame that opposite way.	Many great men who could afford cloth of gold go about in coarse wool and appear lowly and humble in their outward bearing, while inwardly they are swollen with pride, arrogance and self-conceit. Seneca therefore advises his friend Lucilius, in his dress, bearing and outward actions, especially to avoid anything conspicuous in itself: rough clothing, an unkempt head, a shaggy beard, contempt for money, a coarse bed, and whatever pursues fame by that contrary route.[3324]

[3324] Editor. “Sheeps russet” is coarse, plain wool; cloth of gold is luxurious fabric woven with gold thread. “Dejected” means lowly or cast down in appearance. Seneca, Letter 5.1–2, warns against conspicuous austerity; Burton’s margin incorrectly says Letter 13. The advice closes the account of pride arising within ourselves, before the next paragraph turns to flattery from others. McGill p. 125 confirms the printed 13. The correction belongs to the annotation; the original marginal number is preserved.

Source page 125 All this madness yet proceeds from our selves, the main engin which batters us, is from others, we are meerly passive in this business: from a company of Parasites and flatterers, that with immoderate praise, & bumbast Epithetes, glosing titles, false elogiums, so bedawbe & applaud, guild over many a silly and undeserving man, that they clap him quite out of his wits. Res imprimis violenta est, as Hierom notes, this common applause is a most violent thing, laudum placenta, a drum, fife, and trumpet cannot so animate; that fattens men, erects and dejects them in an instant.	All this madness, however, proceeds from ourselves. The chief engine that batters us comes from others; in this business we are entirely acted upon: by a company of parasites and flatterers who, with excessive praise, inflated epithets, flattering titles and false eulogies, so smear with praise, applaud and gild many a foolish and undeserving man that they clap him clean out of his senses. “It is an exceedingly violent thing,” as Jerome observes: this public applause is most powerful, “a cake of praises.” No drum, fife or trumpet can stir men so; it fattens them, raises them up and casts them down in an instant.[3325]
[3326]Palma negata macrum, donata reducit opimum.	Denied the palm, he returns lean; awarded it, fat.[3327]
It makes them fat and lean, as frost doth Conies.	It makes them fat and lean, as frost does rabbits.

[3325] Editor. The “engin” is a siege engine: other people’s praise batters the self. “Bumbast” means inflated or padded language; “glosing,” flattering or deceptive; “guild,” gild. The image of a cake of praise makes applause a kind of rich food. The exact Jerome phrase remains unlocated.

[3326] Burton. Margin l, page 125: “Per.” Persius, as printed. The line is Horace, Epistles 2.1.181, where the contest for theatrical success makes the writer lean or fat according to the verdict.

[3328]And who is that mortal man that can so containe himself, that if he be immoderately commended, and applauded, will not be moved? Let him be what he will, those Parasites will overturne him: if he be a King, he is one of the nine Worthies, more than a man, a God forthwith, — [3329]edictum Domini Deique nostri: and they will sacrifice unto him, —	And what mortal man can so restrain himself that extravagant praise and applause will not move him? Whatever he may be, those parasites will overthrow him. If he is a king, he is one of the Nine Worthies, more than a man, instantly a god—"the decree of our Lord and God"—and they will sacrifice to him:—[3330]
[3331]divinos si tu patiaris honores, Ultrò ipsi dabimus meritasque sacrabimus aras.	If you will allow divine honours, We shall gladly grant them ourselves and consecrate the altars you deserve.
If he be a souldier, then Themistocles, Epaminondas, Hector, Achilles, duo fulmina belli, triumviri terrarum, &c, and the valour of both Scipio's is too little for him, he is invictissimus, serenissimus, multis trophæis ornatissimus, naturæ dominus, although he be lepus galeatus, indeed a very coward, a milksop, [3332]and as he said of Xerxes, postremus in pugnâ, primus in fugâ, and such a one as never durst look his enemy in the face.	If he is a soldier, then he is Themistocles, Epaminondas, Hector, Achilles, "the two thunderbolts of war," "the world's triumvirs," and so on. The courage of both Scipios is too little for him. He is "most invincible, most serene, most richly adorned with trophies, master of nature," though he is "a hare in a helmet": a complete coward, a milksop. As was said of Xerxes, he is "last in battle, first in flight," a man who never dared look his enemy in the face.[3333]

[3328] Burton. Margin m, page 125: "Quis vero tam bene modulo suo metiri se norit, ut eum assiduæ et immodicæ laudationes non moveant? Hen. Steph." "Who knows so well how to measure himself by his own measure that persistent, excessive praise will not move him?" Henri Estienne; precise source unlocated.

[3331] Burton. Star margin, page 125: "Stroza." Tito Vespasiano Strozzi, Eroticon 4.14.7–8, an inscription praising Borso d'Este. The modern verse translates the excerpt afresh.

[3332] Burton. Second star margin, page 125: "Justin." Justin, Epitome of Pompeius Trogus 2.10, describes Xerxes as first in flight and last in battle. Burton reverses the clauses and substitutes pugnâ for proelio without changing that opposition. This locates the literary characterization, not independent proof of Xerxes's conduct.

[3333] Editor. The two Scipios are the Roman military heroes evoked by "two thunderbolts of war"; compare Virgil, Aeneid 6.842–843. "Triumvirs" evokes shared Roman rule. "A hare in a helmet" makes martial display a disguise for cowardice.

If he be a big man, then is he a Sampson, another Hercules: if he pronounce a speech, another Tully or Demosthenes: as of Herod in the Acts, the voice of God and not of man: If he can make a verse, Homer, Virgil, &c. And then my silly weak Patient, takes all these elogiums to himself; if he be a Scholar so commended for his much reading, excellent style, method, &c. he will eviscerate himself like a spider, study to death. Laudatas ostendit avis Iunonia pennas, Peacock-like he will display all his feathers.	If he is a big man, he is a Samson, another Hercules; if he delivers a speech, another Cicero or Demosthenes—as they said of Herod in Acts, "the voice of God and not of man." If he can write a verse, he is Homer, Virgil, and so on. Then my foolish, weak patient takes all these praises to himself. If he is a scholar praised for his extensive reading, excellent style, method, and so on, he will spin out his own entrails like a spider and study himself to death. "Juno's bird displays its praised feathers": like a peacock, he will spread all his feathers.[3334]
If he be a souldier, and so applauded, his valour extoll'd, though it be impar congressus, as that of Troilus, and Achilles, Infelix puer, he will combat with a Giant, run first upon a breach. As another [3335]Philippus, he will ride into the thickest of his enemies. Commend his house keeping, and he will beggar himself: commend his temperance, he will starve himself.	If he is a soldier, so applauded and his courage so exalted, though the encounter is unequal, like that between Troilus and Achilles—"unhappy boy"—he will fight a giant and be first to charge a breach. Like another Philip, he will ride into the thick of his enemies. Praise his hospitality and he will beggar himself; praise his temperance and he will starve himself.[3336]
——laudataque virtus Crescit, & immensum gloria calcar habet.	And virtue grows when praised; Glory has an immense spur.[3337]

[3334] Editor. Acts 12:22 supplies the acclaim of Herod. Ovid, Art of Love 1.627, supplies Juno's bird, the peacock. The spider metaphor imagines the scholar spinning his work out of his own body, exhausting himself to sustain praise.

[3335] Burton. Margin n, page 125: "Livius. Gloria tantum elatus, non ira, in medios hostes irruere, quod completis muris, conspici se pugnantem a muro spectantibus, egregium ducebat." "Livy. Carried away by glory alone, not anger, he rushed among the enemy, because, with the walls crowded, he thought it splendid to be seen fighting by the onlookers upon the wall." Compare Livy 31.24: Philip V attacks at Athens, driven not only by anger but also by glory, non ira tantum sed etiam gloria elatus. Burton's compressed margin instead excludes anger. The translation follows Burton, and the difference is retained explicitly.

[3336] Editor. "Impar congressus" and "infelix puer" recall Troilus facing Achilles in Virgil, Aeneid 1.475. Housekeeping means maintaining a generous household and entertaining guests; the passage is about ruinous hospitality, not housework.

[3337] Editor. Ovid, Letters from Pontus 4.2.35–36. In Ovid, an audience stimulates poetic effort; Burton extends the stimulus of praise to destructive excess.

He is mad, mad, mad; there is no stopping him. "He will endure no rival": he will cross the Alps to be talked about or to maintain his reputation. Praise an ambitious man, some proud prince or ruler: "If he is praised beyond measure," says Erasmus, "he raises his crest, casts off the man, and thinks himself a god." He raises his crest and will no longer be a man but a god.[3340]
Source page 126 ——[3341]nihil est quod credere de se Non audet quum laudatur diis æqua potestas.	There is nothing that power equal to the gods Does not dare believe of itself when praised.[3342]

[3338] Burton. Margin o, page 125: "I demens, & sævas curre per Alpes. Aude aliquid, &c. ut pueris placeas, & declamatio fias. Juv. Sat. 10." "Go, madman, and run through the savage Alps. Dare something, and so on, to please schoolboys and become a declamation." Juvenal 10.166–167; Burton abbreviates and rearranges the second line.

[3339] Burton. Margin p, page 125: "In moriæ Encom." Erasmus, In Praise of Folly, section 3, describes a vain patron raising his peacock crest while a hired flatterer equates him with the gods. This supplies cristas erigit and the comparison with divinity. Burton's full sentence is not verbatim in the consulted text; its exact intermediary remains unresolved.

[3340] Editor. "No whoe" means no cry of "whoa" will stop him. "Impatiens consortis erit" is Lucan, Civil War 1.92, on power's intolerance of a partner. The Alpine allusion evokes Hannibal's campaign and Juvenal's mockery of its schoolroom afterlife.

[3341] Burton. Dagger margin, page 126: "Juvenal. Sat. 4." Juvenal 4.70–71. The comparison text reads "non possit," cannot, where Burton prints "Non audet," does not dare.

[3342] Editor. Juvenal's lines concern Domitian's susceptibility to absurd flattery. "Power equal to the gods" describes the ruler's elevated position in the satire; Burton's "does not dare" is preserved in translation.

How did this work with Alexander, that would needs be Jupiters son, and go like Hercules in a Lions skin? Domitian a God, ([3343]Dominus Deus noster sic fieri jubet) like the [3344]Persian Kings, whose Image was adored by all that came into the City of Babylon. Commodus the Emperor was so gulled by his flattering parasites, that he must be called Hercules. [3345]Antonius the Roman would be crowned with Ivy, carried in a Chariot, and adored for Bacchus. Cotys King of Thrace, was married to [3346]Minerva, and sent three severall messengers one after another, to see if she were come to his bed-chamber.	How did this work upon Alexander, who insisted on being Jupiter's son and going about like Hercules in a lion's skin? Domitian became a god —"Our Lord God commands that it be done so"— like the Persian kings, whose image was worshipped by everyone entering Babylon. The emperor Commodus was so deceived by his flattering parasites that he had to be called Hercules. The Roman Antony would be crowned with ivy, carried in a chariot and worshipped as Bacchus. Cotys, king of Thrace, was married to Minerva and sent three separate messengers, one after another, to see whether she had come to his bedchamber.[3347]

[3343] Burton. First star margin, page 126: "Sueton. c. 12. in Domitiano." Suetonius, Domitian, chapter 12 as printed; the wording is in chapter 13.2. Suetonius has "Dominus et deus noster hoc fieri iubet," "Our Lord and God commands this to be done." Burton omits "et" and gives "sic" for "hoc."

[3347] Editor. The list turns extravagant praise into claims to divine identity. Antony is Mark Antony; Bacchus is the wine god, and Minerva the goddess identified with Athena. The individual anecdotes are Burton's historical exempla, not independently established events here.

Such was Xerxes, who would whip the sea, put Neptune in chains "with foolish boasting," and send a challenge to Mount Athos. Such are many foolish princes, led into a fool's paradise by their parasites.[3349]

[3348] Burton. Margin s, page 126: "Ælian. li. 12." Aelian, Various History 12.51: the physician Menecrates calls himself Jupiter, and Philip exposes his pretension by serving him incense while other guests eat. This establishes the cited anecdote's location; Burton's Latin intermediary is not identified.

'tis a common humor, incident to all men, when they are in great places, or come to the solstice of honor, have done, or deserv'd well, to applaud and flatter themselves. Stultitiam suam produnt, &c. (saith [3350]Platerus) your very tradesmen if they be excellent, will crak and brag, and shew their folly in excess. They have good parts, and they know it, you need not tell them of it; out of a conceit of their worth, they go smiling to themselves, a perpetual meditation of their Trophies and plaudites, they run at the last quite mad, and lose their wits. [3351]Petrarch, lib. 1. de contemptu mundi, confessed as much of himself,	It is a common disposition in everyone, when they hold high office, reach the height of honour, perform well or deserve well, to applaud and flatter themselves. "They betray their own folly," and so on, says Plater. Even your tradesmen, if they excel, will boast and brag and display their folly to excess. They have ability and know it; you need not tell them. From a conceit of their own worth they go about smiling to themselves. Continually brooding on their trophies and applause, they at last go quite mad and lose their senses. Petrarch, in book 1 of On Contempt for the World, confessed as much of himself.[3352]
and Cardan in his 5 book of wisdom, gives an instance in a Smith of Millan, a fellow Citizen of his, [3353]one Galeus de Rubeis, that being commended for refinding of an instrument of Archimedes, for joy ran mad. Plutarch in the life of Artaxerxes, hath such a like story of one Chamus a souldier, that wounded King Cyrus in battle, and grew thereupon so [3354]arrogant, that in a short space after he lost his wits.	Cardano, in his fifth book of wisdom, gives the example of a smith of Milan, a fellow citizen of his, one Galeus de Rubeis, who went mad with joy when praised for rediscovering an instrument of Archimedes. Plutarch, in the Life of Artaxerxes, tells a similar story of a soldier named Chamus, who wounded King Cyrus in battle and became so arrogant as a result that he soon afterwards lost his senses.[3355]

[3350] Burton. Third star margin, page 126: "De mentis alienat. cap. 3." Plater, On Mental Derangement, chapter 3, as cited.

[3351] Burton. Margin t, page 126: "Sequiturque superbia formam. Livius li. 11. Oraculum est, vivida sæpe ingenia luxuriari hac & evanescere multosque sensum penitus amisisse. Homines intuentur, ac si ipsi non essent homines." "Pride follows beauty. Livy, book 11. It is an oracular saying that lively minds often grow luxuriant and dissipate through this, and that many have entirely lost their reason. They look at human beings as though they themselves were not human." The note has no clear matching t in the body; attached to the preceding account of self-admiration. The first phrase is Ovid, Fasti 1.419; the Livy locator and remaining wording require collation.

[3352] Editor. The "solstice" of honour is its highest point; "parts" means abilities, and "plaudites" applause. The movement from kings to tradesmen makes self-congratulation a general human tendency. Petrarch's cited title is commonly associated with his Secretum.

So many men, if any new honor, office, preferment, booty, treasure, possession, or patrimony, ex insperato fall unto them, for immoderate joy, and continual meditation of it, cannot sleep [3356]or tell what they say or do, they are so ravished on a sudden; and with vain conceits transported, there is no rule with them. Epaminondas therefore, the next day after his Leuctrian victory, [3357]came abroad all squalid and submisse, and give no other reason to his friends of so doing, than that he perceived himself the day before, by reason of his good fortune, to be too insolent, overmuch joyed.	So it is with many men: if some new honour, office, advancement, spoils, treasure, property or inheritance falls to them unexpectedly, excessive joy and continual thinking about it keep them from sleeping or knowing what they say or do. They are suddenly so enraptured and carried away by vain notions that there is no controlling them. Epaminondas therefore went out shabby and subdued on the day after his victory at Leuctra. He gave his friends no other reason than that he had noticed himself becoming too arrogant and excessively joyful the day before because of his good fortune.[3358]
That wise and vertuous Lady, [3359]Queen Katherin, Dowager of England, in private talke, upon like occasion, said, that [3360]she would not willingly endure the extremity of either fortune; but if it were so, that of necessity she must undergo the one, she would be in adversity, because comfort was never wanting in it, but still counsel and government were defective in the other: They could not moderate themselves.	That wise and virtuous lady, Queen Katherine, dowager of England, said in private conversation on a similar occasion that she would not willingly experience the extreme of either fortune. But if necessity forced her to undergo one of them, she would choose adversity, because comfort was never lacking there, whereas good counsel and self-government were always deficient in the other. People could not moderate themselves.[3361]

[3357] Burton. Margin z, page 126: “Processit squalidus & submissus, ut hesterni Diei gaudium intemperans hodie castigaret.” “He went out shabby and subdued, to chastise today the unrestrained joy of yesterday.” No separate source is named.

[3358] Editor. Burton treats excessive joy as a disturbance that can deprive a person of sleep and self-command. The Epaminondas anecdote supplies an example of deliberate self-correction after success; its precise source remains unlocated.

[3359] Burton. Margin a, page 126: “Uxor Hen. 8.” “Wife of Henry VIII.” This identifies Katherine as Catherine of Aragon.

[3360] Burton. Margin b, page 126: “Neutrius se fortunæ extremum libenter experturam dixit: sed si necessitas alterius subinde imponeretur, optare se difficilem & adversam: quod in hac nulli unquam defuit solatium, in altera multis consilium, &c. Lod. Vives.” “She said she would not willingly experience the extreme of either fortune; but if necessity imposed one or the other, she would choose the difficult and adverse, because in this no one ever lacked consolation, whereas in the other many lacked counsel, and so on.” Juan Luis Vives; exact passage unlocated.

[3361] Editor. The marginal identification makes this Catherine of Aragon. Burton’s maxim contrasts consolation in adversity with the lack of restraint in prosperity. “Government” here is chiefly command of oneself.

Leonartus Fuchsius Instit. lib. 3 sect. 1. cap. 1. Fælix Plater. lib. 3. de mentis alienat. Herc. de Saxonia Tract. post. de melanch. cap. 3. speak of a [3362]peculiar Fury, which comes by overmuch study. Fernelius lib. 1. cap. 18. [3363]puts Study, contemplation, and continual meditation, as an especial cause of madness: and in his 86. consul. cites the same words. Io. Arculanus in lib. 9. Rhasis ad Almansorem cap. 16. amongst other causes reckons up studium vehemens:	Leonhart Fuchs, Institutes, book 3, section 1, chapter 1; Felix Plater, book 3, On Mental Derangement; and Hercules of Saxony, the later treatise On Melancholy, chapter 3, speak of a particular frenzy caused by excessive study. Fernel, book 1, chapter 18, names study, contemplation and continual meditation as a special cause of madness, and repeats the same words in his eighty-sixth consultation. Giovanni Arcolano, commenting on book 9, chapter 16, of Rhazes' To Almansor, lists "intense study" among the causes.[3364]

[3364] Editor. These citations introduce a historical medical category of scholarly frenzy. The terms "fury," "madness" and "melancholy" overlap in Burton's discussion and are not interchangeable with a single present-day diagnosis. Exact editions of the medical authorities remain to be collated.

so doth Levinus Lemnius, lib. de occult. nat. mirac. lib. 1. cap. 16. [3365]Many men (saith he) come to this malady by continual [3366]Study, and night-waking, and of all other men, Scholars are most subject to it: and such Rhasis adds, [3367]that have commonly the finest wits. Cont. lib. 1. tract. 9. Marsilius Ficinus de sanit. tuenda. lib. 1. cap. 7. puts Melancholy amongst one of those five principal plagues of Students, 'tis a common Maul unto them all, and almost in some measure an inseparable companion.	So does Levinus Lemnius, On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 1, chapter 16. "Many men," he says, "come to this illness through continual study and staying awake at night; of all men, scholars are most subject to it"—especially, Rhazes adds, those who generally have the keenest minds, in Continens, book 1, treatise 9. Marsilio Ficino, On Preserving Health, book 1, chapter 7, places melancholy among the five principal afflictions of students. It is a common scourge to them all and, to some degree, almost an inseparable companion.[3368]

[3366] Burton. Star margin, page 127: "Study is a continuall and earnest meditation, applied to some thing with great desire. Tully." Cicero is cited without a work or section; the definition is retained.

[3367] Burton. Margin f, page 127: "Et illi qui sunt subtilis ingenii, & multæ præmeditationis, de facili incidunt in melancholiam." "Those of subtle intelligence and much prolonged thought readily fall into melancholy." Rhazes, as cited in the body.

[3368] Editor. "Night-waking" is staying awake to study; "maul" is a crushing affliction. "Spirits" in this medical framework are subtle bodily agencies involved in life and thought, not ghosts. Ficino's work circulates under varying titles associated with his books on life.

Varro belike for that cause calls Tristes Philosophos & severos, severe, sad, dry, tetrick are common Epithites to Scholars: And [3369]Patritius therefore in the institution of Princes, would not have them to be great Students. For (as Machiavel holds) Study weakens their bodies, dulls the spirits, abates their strength and courage; and good Scholars are never good Souldiers, which a certain Goth well perceived, for when his Country-men came into Greece, and would have burned all their books, he cried out against it, by all means they should do it, [3370]leave them that plague, which in time will consume all their vigor, and martiall spirits.	Perhaps for that reason Varro calls them "sad and stern philosophers." Stern, sad, dry and sour are common descriptions of scholars. Patritius therefore, in his instruction of princes, would not have them become great students. For, as Machiavelli holds, study weakens their bodies, dulls their spirits and reduces their strength and courage; good scholars are never good soldiers. A certain Goth understood this well. When his countrymen entered Greece and wanted to burn all the books, he protested that they should by no means do it: leave the Greeks that plague, which in time would consume all their vigour and martial spirit.[3371]
The [3372]Turks abdicated Cornutus the next heir, from the Empire, because he was so much given to his book: and 'tis the common Tenent of the world, that Learning duls and diminisheth the spirits, and so per consequens produceth melancholy.	The Turks excluded Cornutus, the next heir, from the empire because he was so devoted to his books. The common opinion of the world is that learning dulls and diminishes the spirits and consequently produces melancholy.[3373]

[3369] Burton. Margin g, page 127: "Ob studiorum solicitudinem lib. 5. Tit. 5." "Because of the anxiety of studies, book 5, title 5." Patritius, as cited; precise edition and passage pending.

[3370] Burton. Margin h, page 127: "Gaspar Ens Thesaur. Polit. Apoteles. 31. Græcis hanc pestem relinquite, quæ dubium non est, quin brevi omnem iis vigorem ereptura sit; Ut ad arma tractanda plane inhabiles futuri sint." "Caspar Ens, Political Treasury, conclusion 31. Leave the Greeks this plague, which will undoubtedly soon take all their vigour away, so that they will become wholly unfit to bear arms." This Latin supports the negative sense supplied in the modern column.

[3372] Burton. Margin i, page 127: "Knoles Turk. Hist." Richard Knolles, The General History of the Turks. The name and succession anecdote require collation with Knolles.

Two main reasons may be given of it, why Students should be more subject to this malady than others. The one is, they live a sedentary, solitary life, sibi & musis, free from bodily exercise, and those ordinary disports which other men use: and many times if discontent and idleness concur with it, which is too frequent, they are precipitated into this gulf on a sudden: but the common cause is overmuch study: too much learning (as [3374]Festus told Paul) hath made thee mad; 'tis that other extreme which effects it.	Two main reasons can be given for students' greater susceptibility to this illness. One is that they lead a sedentary, solitary life, "for themselves and the Muses," without bodily exercise or the ordinary recreations other men enjoy. Often, if discontent and idleness join in—which happens all too frequently—they are suddenly plunged into this gulf. But the common cause is excessive study: "Too much learning has made you mad," as Festus told Paul. It is that other extreme which brings it about.[3375]
So did Trincavelius, lib. 1. consil. 12. & 13. finde by his experience, in two of his Patients, a young Baron, and another that contracted this malady by too vehement study. So Forestus observat. l. 10. observ. 13. in a young Divine in Lovain, that was mad, and said [3376]he had a Bible in his head: Marsilius Ficinus de sanit. tuend. lib. 1. cap. 1. 3. 4. & lib. 2. cap. 16. gives many reasons, [3377]why Students dote more often then others:	Trincavelli found this in his own experience, in book 1, consultations 12 and 13: two of his patients, a young baron and another man, contracted the illness through excessively intense study. So did Forestus, Observations, book 10, observation 13, in the case of a young theologian at Louvain who was mad and said he had a Bible in his head. Marsilio Ficino, On Preserving Health, book 1, chapters 1, 3 and 4, and book 2, chapter 16, gives several reasons why students lose their senses more often than other people.[3378]

[3375] Editor. Burton sets excessive study beside the opposite danger of idleness and isolation. Acts 26:24 records Festus's accusation; Paul rejects it in the following verse. Burton uses the accusation as a familiar saying about overlearning.

[3376] Burton. Margin l, page 127: "Nimiis studiis melancholicus evasit, dicens se Biblium in capite habere." "Through excessive studies he became melancholic, saying that he had a Bible in his head." Forestus, as cited; "Biblium" is the printed form.

[3377] Burton. Margin m, page 127: "Cur melancholia assidua, crebrisque deliramentis vexentur eorum animi ut desipere cogantur." "Why their minds are troubled by persistent melancholy and frequent derangements, so that they are driven out of their senses." Ficino, as cited.

[3378] Editor. A "divine" is a theologian or clergyman. The case reports are transmitted through Burton's medical sources; the statement about a Bible in the head is the reported patient's belief. "Dote" means lose judgement or reason here.

Source page 128 The first is their negligence: [3379]other men look to their Tools, a Painter will wash his Pensils, a Smith will look to his Hammer, Anvil, Forge: an Husbandman will mend his Plough-Irons, and grinde his Hatchet if it be dull; a Faulkner or Huntsman will have an especial care of his Hawks, Hounds, Horses, Dogs, &c.: A Musitian will string, and unstring his Lute, &c. onely Scholars neglect that Instrument, their brain and spirits (I mean) which they daily use, and by which they range over all the world, which by much study is consumed.	The first is their neglect. Other men care for their tools: a painter washes his brushes; a smith looks after his hammer, anvil and forge; a farmer repairs his plough-irons and sharpens his hatchet when it is blunt. A falconer or huntsman takes particular care of his hawks, hounds, horses, dogs, and so on. A musician strings and unstrings his lute. Only scholars neglect the instrument they use every day—I mean their brain and spirits—with which they range across the whole world, and which much study wears away.[3380]

[3380] Editor. “Pensils” are paintbrushes, and a husbandman is a farmer. The comparison makes care for the scholar’s bodily instrument as necessary as a craftsman’s maintenance of tools. Burton’s English expands and redistributes the examples in his Latin margin.

Vide (saith Lucian) ne funiculum nimis intendendo, aliquando abrumpas: See thou twist not the rope so hard, till at length it [3381]break. Ficinus in his fourth Chap. gives some other reasons; Saturn and Mercury, the Patrons of Learning, are both dry Planets: and [3382]Origanus assigns the same cause, why Mercurialists are so poor, and most part beggers; for that their President Mercury had no better fortune himself. The Destinies of old, put poverty upon him as a punishment; since when, Poetry and Beggery, are Gemelli, twin-born Brats, inseparable companions:	"Take care," says Lucian, "that by stretching the cord too tightly you do not eventually snap it": see that you do not twist the rope so hard that it finally breaks. Ficino, in his fourth chapter, gives other reasons. Saturn and Mercury, the patrons of learning, are both dry planets. Origanus gives the same reason why Mercury's followers are so poor and mostly beggars: their patron Mercury had no better fortune himself. Long ago the Fates imposed poverty on him as a punishment. Since then, poetry and beggary have been "twins," children born together, inseparable companions.[3383]
* And to this day is every Scholar poor, Gross gold from them runs headlong to the Boor:	And to this day every scholar is poor; Gross gold runs headlong from them to the boor.[3384]

[3382] Burton. Margin p, page 128: "Ephemer." Origanus's ephemerides, astronomical tables; no precise edition or location specified.

[3383] Editor. The cord image warns against overstrain. Saturn's and Mercury's dryness belongs to historical astrology; "Mercurialists" here means learned people under Mercury's patronage. The following myth and verse make scholarly poverty an inherited condition. The Lucian locator remains unresolved.

[3384] Editor. Christopher Marlowe, Hero and Leander, first sestiad, lines 471–472: the two quoted lines follow the Fates' punishment that Mercury and Poverty should always be together. "Gross gold" contrasts material wealth with learning; "boor" means an uncultivated person. McGill p. 128 confirms the star beside the couplet but supplies no separate marginal source text for it. The Marlowe match does not establish the preceding Origanus reference.

Mercury, can help them to knowledg but not to money. The second is contemplation, [3385]which dries the brain and extinguisheth natural heat; for whilst the spirits are intent to meditation above in the head, the stomack and liver are left destitute, and thence come black blood and crudities by defect of concoction, and for want of exercise, the superfluous vapours cannot exhale, &c.	Mercury can help them to knowledge, but not to money. The second reason is contemplation, which dries the brain and extinguishes natural heat. While the spirits are occupied with meditation above in the head, the stomach and liver are left without their support. Black blood and undigested matter then arise from defective digestion, and lack of exercise prevents the surplus vapours from escaping, and so on.[3386]
The same reasons are repeated by Gomesius, lib. 4. cap. 1. de sale [3387]Nymannus orat. de Imag. Io. Voschius lib. 2. cap. 5. de peste: and something more they add, that hard Students are commonly troubled with Gouts, Catarrhes, Rhumes, Cacexia, Bradiopepsia, bad Eyes, Stone, and Collick, [3388]Crudities, Oppilations, Vertigo, Windes, Consumptions, and all such diseases as come by overmuch sitting; they are most part lean, dry, ill coloured, spend their fortunes, lose their wits, and many times their lives, and all through immoderate pains, and extraordinary studies.	The same reasons are repeated by Gomesius, On Salt, book 4, chapter 1; Nymannus, Oration on the Imagination; and Johannes Vossius, On Plague, book 2, chapter 5. They add more: diligent students are commonly afflicted with gout, catarrhs, rheums, wasting ill health, sluggish digestion, bad eyes, stones and colic, undigested matter, obstructions, dizziness, wind, wasting diseases and all the illnesses that arise from too much sitting. They are mostly lean, dry and pallid; they spend their fortunes and lose their senses, and often their lives—all through excessive labour and extraordinary study.[3389]

[3386] Editor. This is a humoral explanation: thought draws bodily resources toward the head, weakens digestion and produces black blood. “Concoction” means the body’s processing of food. The account is preserved as historical physiology, not a present-day medical explanation.

[3389] Editor. “Catarrhs” and “rheums” concern flows or accumulations of bodily fluid; cachexia is a poor bodily condition, bradypepsia slow digestion, and oppilations obstructions. “Consumption” here covers wasting illness rather than necessarily one specific disease. Vossius’s precise bibliography remains unresolved.

If you will not believe the truth of this, look upon great Tostatus and Thomas Aquinas Works, and tell me whether those men took pains? peruse Austin, Hierom, &c. and many thousands besides.	If you will not believe this, look at the works of the great Tostatus and Thomas Aquinas and tell me whether those men worked hard. Read Augustine, Jerome and many thousands more.[3390]
Qui cupit optatam cursu contingere metam, Multa tulit, fecitque puer, sudavit & alsit.	He who longs to reach the hoped-for finish in the race Has endured and done much as a boy, has sweated and shivered.[3391]
He that desires this wished goal to gain, Must sweat and freeze before he can attain,	He who desires to reach this wished-for goal Must sweat and freeze before he can attain it, and labor hard for it. So did Seneca, by his own confession, ep. 8. [3392]Not a day that I spend idle, part of the night I keep mine eyes open, tired with waking, and now slumbring to their continual task. Hear Tully pro Archia Poeta: whilst others loytered, and took their pleasures, he was continually at his book, so they do that will be Scholars, and that to the hazard (I say) of their healths, fortunes, wits, and lives.	and labour hard for it. So did Seneca, by his own admission in Letter 8: “Not a day do I spend idle. For part of the night I keep my eyes, tired with waking and now drooping into sleep, at their continual task.” Hear Cicero in For the Poet Archias: while others idled and took their pleasure, he was continually at his books. So do those who would be scholars, and at the risk, I say, of their health, fortunes, senses and lives.[3393]

[3390] Editor. Tostatus is Alfonso de Madrigal, known for the bulk of his theological writing. Burton appeals to the scale of these authors’ works as evidence of labour, not as proof of a particular illness.

[3391] Editor. Horace, Art of Poetry 412–413. Burton follows the Latin with his own compact English version; both are retained, with a fresh translation of the Latin first. The runner’s preparation stands for intellectual training.

[3392] Burton. Margin t, page 128: “Nullus mihi per otium dies exit, partem noctis studiis dedico, non vero somno, sed oculos vigilia fatigatos cadentesque, in operam detineo.” “No day passes for me in idleness; I dedicate part of the night to study, not to sleep, but keep my eyes, wearied by waking and drooping, at their work.” Seneca, Letter 8.1. The comparison text has “partem noctium studiis vindico” and “non vaco somno sed succumbo,” “I claim part of the nights for study” and “I do not give myself to sleep but succumb to it”; Burton shortens and alters the wording.

[3393] Editor. Seneca, Letter 8.1, supplies the sleepless labour; Cicero, For Archias 12–13, defends time devoted to literature against other people’s leisure. Burton stresses the bodily and financial cost of scholarly effort.

How many poor scholars have lost their senses or become fools, neglecting every worldly affair and their own health, wealth, "being and well-being," to gain knowledge? After all their labour, the world's reward is to call them ridiculous, foolish simpletons, idiots and asses; and, as often happens, to reject, despise and mock them as foolish and mad. Look for examples in Hildesheim, Gleanings, part 2, On Mania and Delirium; read Trincavelli, book 3, consultation 36 and chapter 17; Montanus, consultation 233; Garceus, On Judgements of Nativities, chapter 33; Mercurialis, consultation 86, chapter 25; and Prosper Calenius in his book On Black Bile. Go to Bedlam and ask.[3397]

[3394] Editor. "Thebet Benchorat" is the Latinized name of Thabit ibn Qurra. The eighth sphere is the sphere of fixed stars in the inherited cosmological model. The expenditure and forty-year figures are Burton's reports, not independently verified here.

[3395] Burton. Margin u, page 129: "Johannes Hanuschius Bohemus nat. 1516. eruditus vir, nimiis studiis in Phrenesin incidit. Montanus instances in a Frenchman of Tolosa." "Johannes Hanuschius, a Bohemian born in 1516, a learned man, fell into frenzy through excessive studies." Tolosa is Toulouse. The printed note precedes the reference to Garceus; its name and source chain await collation.

[3396] Burton. Margin x, page 129: "Cardinalis Cæcius; ob laborem, vigiliam, & diuturna studia factus Melancholicus." "Cardinal Caecius became melancholic through labour, wakefulness and prolonged studies." The identity and precise Calenius passage remain unresolved.

[3397] Editor. "Esse and bene esse" means existence and well-being. Bedlam is the familiar name for Bethlem Hospital in London. Burton's language moves between illness, social ridicule and contempt; its historical insults are retained rather than converted into diagnoses.

Or if they keep their wits, yet they are esteemed scrubs and fools by reason of their carriage: after seven years study——[3398]statuâ taciturnius exit, Plerumque & risum populi quatit.——	Or if they keep their senses, they are still thought worthless fellows and fools because of their behaviour. After seven years of study—"he comes out more silent than a statue and usually shakes the people with laughter."[3399]
Because they cannot ride an horse, which every Clown can do; salute and court a Gentlewoman, carve at Table, chringe, and make congies, which every common Swasher can do, [3400]hos populus ridet, &c. they are laughed to scorn, and accompted silly fools by our Gallants. Yea many times, such is their misery, they deserve it: [3401]a meer Scholar, a meer Ass.	Because they cannot ride a horse, which any country fellow can do, greet and court a gentlewoman, carve at table, bow and make polite salutations, which any common swaggerer can do—"the people laugh at them," and so on—our fashionable gentlemen laugh them to scorn and reckon them simple fools. Indeed, such is their misery, they often deserve it: a mere scholar, a mere ass.[3402]

[3399] Editor. Horace, Epistles 2.2.81–84. The main text gives the irregular "risum populi," where Burton's fuller margin and the comparison text give "risu populum": the man makes the people shake with laughter. The modern column follows that clarified sense; the original remains unchanged.

[3400] Burton. Body y and first margin a, page 129: "Pers. Sat. 3." Persius 3.86. Burton gives "hos populus ridet," "the people laugh at these men," where the comparison text reads "his populus ridet," "the people laugh at these things."

[3402] Editor. A clown is a country fellow, a swasher a swaggering braggart, and congies bows or salutations. "Mere" means exclusively: the insult targets learning without other accomplishments. The unlettered Themistocles note offers a counterargument about practical capacity.

[3405] Burton. Margin c, page 129: "Translated by M.B. Holi-day." Barten Holyday's English version of Persius. The modern column first translates the Latin afresh, then separately modernizes this English verse.

Thus they go commonly meditating unto themselves, thus they sit, such is their action and gesture. Fulgosius l. 8. c. 7. makes mention how Th. Aquinas supping with King Lewis of France, upon a sudden knocked his fist upon the table, & cryed, conclusum est contra Manichæos, his wits were a woolgathering, as they say, & his head busied about other matters, when he perceived his error, he was much [3406]abashed.	Thus they commonly go about meditating to themselves; thus they sit; such are their movements and gestures. Fulgosius, book 8, chapter 7, tells how Thomas Aquinas, dining with King Louis of France, suddenly struck the table with his fist and cried, "The argument against the Manichaeans is settled!" His mind was woolgathering, as they say, and his head was occupied with other matters. When he realized his mistake, he was deeply embarrassed.[3407]
Such a story there is of Archimedes in Vitruvius, that having found out the means to know how much gold was mingled with the silver in King Hierons crown, ran naked forth of the bath and cryed εὕρηκα I have found: [3408]and was commonly so intent to his studies, that he never perceived what was done about him: when the City was taken, and the souldiers now ready to rifle his house, he took no notice of it. S. Bernard rode all day long by the Lemnian lake, and asked at last where he was, Marullus lib. 2. cap. 4.	Vitruvius tells such a story of Archimedes: having discovered how to determine how much gold was mixed with the silver in King Hiero's crown, he ran naked from the bath crying "I have found it!"—I have found it. He was habitually so absorbed in his studies that he never noticed what went on around him. When the city was captured and soldiers were about to plunder his house, he took no notice. Saint Bernard rode all day beside the Lemnian lake and at last asked where he was: Marullus, book 2, chapter 4.[3409]

[3406] Burton. Margin d, page 129: "Thomas rubore confusus dixit se de argumento cogitasse." "Thomas, overcome with embarrassment, said he had been thinking about an argument." Fulgosius, as cited in the body.

[3407] Editor. The Manichaeans are the followers of Mani, against whom Aquinas believes he has completed an argument. The story represents scholarly absorption that forgets its social setting. "Woolgathering" is wandering or distracted thought; Fulgosius's exact text remains uncollated.

[3408] Burton. Margin e, page 129: "Plutarch. vitâ Marcelli, Nec sensit urbem captam, nec milites in domum irruentes, adeo intentus studiis, &c." "Plutarch, Life of Marcellus. He noticed neither the capture of the city nor the soldiers bursting into his house, so absorbed was he in his studies, and so on." Compare Marcellus 19.4.

Source page 129–130 It was Democritus carriage alone that made the Abderites [3410]suppose him to have been mad, and send for Hippocrates to cure him: if he had been in any solemn company, he would upon all occasions fall a laughing. Theophrastus saith as much of Heraclitus, for that he continually wept, and Laertius of Menedemus Lampsacus, because he ran like a mad man, [3411]saying, he came from hell as a Spie, to tell the devils what mortal men did.	It was Democritus's behaviour alone that made the people of Abdera suppose him mad and send for Hippocrates to cure him. In any solemn company, he would burst out laughing at every opportunity. Theophrastus says much the same of Heraclitus, because he wept continually, and Laertius of Menedemus Lampsacus, because he ran about like a madman, saying that he had come from hell as a spy to report to the devils what mortals did.[3412]
Source page 130 Your greatest Students are commonly no better, silly, soft fellows in their outward behaviour, absurd, ridiculous to others, and no whit experienced in worldly business; they can measure the heavens, range over the world, teach others wisdom, and yet in bargains and contracts they are circumvented by every base Tradesman. Are not these men fools? and how should they be otherwise, but as so many Sots in Schools, when (as [3413]he well observed) they neither hear nor see such things as are commonly practised abroad? how should they get experience, by what means?	Your greatest students are commonly no better: foolish, ineffectual fellows in their outward behaviour, absurd and ridiculous to others, with no experience of worldly business. They can measure the heavens, range across the world and teach wisdom to others, yet every lowly tradesman outwits them in bargains and contracts. Are these men not fools? How could they be anything but so many school-bred dolts when, as he rightly observed, they neither hear nor see the things commonly done in the world outside? How are they to gain experience? By what means?[3414]

[3410] Burton. Margin f, page 129: "Lib. 2. cap. 18." "Book 2, chapter 18." Attached to the Democritus anecdote, where f occurs; the work is not specified afresh and the locator remains unresolved.

[3412] Editor. Democritus's laughter returns to the book's opening persona. Diogenes Laertius 6.102 gives the Fury disguise to Menedemus; the account calls Menedemus a pupil of Colotes of Lampsacus; Burton applies "Lampsacus" directly to Menedemus. These anecdotes make unusual behaviour the basis for other people's judgement of madness.

[3414] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 1, attacks rhetorical schooling detached from ordinary experience. "Circumvented" means outwitted or deceived, and "sots" means fools here, not necessarily drunkards. Burton's criticism concerns practical inexperience despite intellectual range.

[3415]I knew in my time many Scholars, saith Æneas Sylvius (in an Epistle of his to Gasper Scitick Chancellor to the Emperor) excellent well learned, but so rude, so silly, that they had no common civility, nor knew how to manage their domestick or publike affairs. Paglarensis was amazed, and said his Farmer had surely cosened him, when he heard him tell that his Sow had eleven Pigs, and his Ass had but one Foal.	"I knew many scholars in my time," says Aeneas Sylvius, in a letter to Gaspar Schlick, the emperor's chancellor, "who were exceedingly learned, yet so uncouth and foolish that they lacked ordinary civility and did not know how to manage domestic or public affairs." Paglarensis was astonished, and said that his farmer must have cheated him, when he heard that his sow had eleven piglets but his donkey only one foal.[3416]
To say the best of this Profession, I can give no other testimony of them in general, than that of Pliny of Isæus; [3417]He is yet a Scholer, than which kinde of men there is nothing so simple, so sincere, none better, they are most part harmless, honest, upright, innocent, plain dealing men.	To say the best of this profession, I can give no other testimony about them in general than Pliny gives of Isaeus: "He is still a scholar; no kind of men is so simple, so sincere, or better." They are mostly harmless, honest, upright, innocent and plain-dealing men.[3418]

[3416] Editor. Aeneas Sylvius Piccolomini later became Pope Pius II; Gaspar Schlick was an imperial chancellor. The tale of the piglets and foal illustrates ignorance of ordinary husbandry. Paglarensis's identity and the exact letter remain unresolved.

[3418] Editor. Pliny, Letters 2.3.5–6, praises Isaeus, an elderly rhetorical teacher, and contrasts school life with the cunning learned in real lawsuits. Burton ends this catalogue of scholarly folly with a defence of scholars' innocence and sincerity.

Now because they are commonly subject to such hazards, and inconveniences, as dotage, madness, simplicity, &c. Io. Voschius would have good Schollers to be highly rewarded, and had in some extraordinary respect above other men, to have greater [3419]priviledges than the rest, that adventure themselves and abbreviate their lives for the publike good.	Now, because they are commonly subject to such dangers and disadvantages as loss of judgement, madness, simplicity, and so on, Johannes Vossius would have good scholars richly rewarded and held in exceptional esteem above other men. Those who risk themselves and shorten their lives for the public good should enjoy greater privileges than the rest.[3420]
But our Patrons of Learning are so far now adays, from respecting the Muses, and giving that honor to Scholars, or reward which they deserve, and are allowed by those indulgent priviledges of many noble Princes, that after all their pains taken in the Universities, cost and charge, expences, irksom hours, laborious tasks, wearisome days, dangers, hazards, (barred interim from all pleasures which other men have, mewed up like Hawks all their lives) in they chance to wade through them, they shall in the end be rejected, contemned, and which is their greatest misery, driven to their shifts, exposed to want, poverty, and beggery. Their familiar attendants are,	But nowadays our patrons of learning are so far from respecting the Muses and giving scholars the honour or reward they deserve—and which the generous privileges granted by many noble princes entitle them to—that, after all their labour at the universities, cost and expense, tedious hours, demanding tasks, weary days, dangers and risks, they end by being rejected and despised. Meanwhile they are denied all the pleasures other men enjoy, shut up like hawks all their lives. If they manage to struggle through these hardships, their greatest misery still awaits them: they are left to fend for themselves, exposed to want, poverty and beggary. Their constant companions are:[3421]

[3419] Burton. Margin k, page 130: “Jure privilegiandi qui ob commune bonum abbreviant sibi vitam.” “Those who shorten their lives for the common good rightly deserve privileges.” Vossius is the authority named in the body; exact location remains uncollated.

[3420] Editor. The argument moves from scholars’ personal hazards to a claim on public support: their shortened lives are presented as a sacrifice for the common good. Vossius is the medical authority named earlier; the precise bibliography remains unresolved.

[3421] Editor. “Mewed” means confined, as hawks are kept in a mews; “interim” means meanwhile, and “shifts” expedients for surviving. The source prints “in they chance”; the modern column supplies “if” as a contextual correction. The long conditional sentence has been divided without dropping its catalogue of burdens.

Source page 130–131 If there were nothing else to trouble them, the conceit of this alone were enough to make them all melancholy. Most other Trades and Professions after some seven years Prentiship, are enabled by their Craft to live of themselves. A Merchant adventures his goods at sea, and though his hazard be great, yet if one Ship return of four, he likely makes a saving Voyage.	If nothing else troubled them, the thought of this alone would be enough to make them all melancholic. In most other trades and professions, some seven years of apprenticeship give people the skill to support themselves. A merchant risks his goods at sea, and though the risk is great, if one ship out of four returns he will probably recover his costs.[3424]

[3424] Editor. A “saving voyage” covers its costs. The one-ship-in-four example is Burton’s rhetorical estimate, not an independently established rate of return. His contrast is between trades that promise a livelihood and scholarship that does not.

Source page 131 An Husbandmans gains are almost certain; quibus ipse Iupiter nocere non potest ('tis [3425]Cato's Hyperbole, a great husband himself;) onely Schollers methinks are most uncertain, unrespected, subject to all casualties, and hazards. For first, not one of a many proves to be a Scholler, all are not capable and docile, [3426]ex omni ligno non fit Mercurius:	A farmer's profits are almost certain: "Jupiter himself cannot harm them"—Cato's exaggeration, and he was a great husbandman himself. Only scholars, it seems to me, face the greatest uncertainty, receive no respect, and are exposed to every accident and risk. First, not one in many becomes a scholar; not everyone has the ability or is teachable: "Not every piece of wood can be made into a Mercury."[3427]
we can make Majors and Officers every year, but not Scholars: Kings can invest Knights and Barons, as Sigismond the Emperor confessed; Universities can give degrees; and Tu quod es, è populo quilibet esse potest: but he nor they, nor all the world can give Learning, make Philosophers, Artists, Orators, Poets;	We can appoint mayors and officials every year, but cannot make scholars. Kings can invest knights and barons, as the Emperor Sigismund admitted; universities can confer degrees; and "anyone from the crowd can become what you are." But neither he nor they, nor all the world together, can bestow learning or create philosophers, masters of the arts, orators and poets.[3428]

[3425] Burton. First star margin, page 131: "Plutarch. vita ejus. Certum agricolationis lucrum, &c." "Plutarch, his Life. The certain profit of farming, and so on." Compare Cato the Elder 21.5: there the investments beyond Jupiter's power to harm are ponds, hot springs and fullers' premises, after Cato turns from farming. Burton applies the claim to husbandry.

[3428] Editor. "Majors" means mayors here, not military majors. Martial, Epigrams 5.13.10, supplies "Tu quod es": his poet contrasts literary distinction with a rich man's attainable status. "Artists" means people trained in the learned arts, and "invest" confer rank. The Sigismund anecdote remains uncollated.

we can soon say, as Seneca well notes, O virum bonum, ô divitem, point at a rich man, a good, an happy man, a proper man, sumptuosè vestitum, Calamistratum, bene olentem, magno temporis impendio constat hæc laudatio, ô virum literarum, but tis not so easily performed to finde to out a learned man. Learning is not so quickly got, though they may be willing to take pains, to that end sufficiently informed, and liberally maintained by their Patrons and Parents, yet few can compass it.	We can readily say, as Seneca well observes, "What a good man! What a rich man!" We can point to a rich man, a good man, a fortunate man, a handsome man, "expensively dressed, with curled hair, sweetly scented." But "this praise costs a great expenditure of time: 'What a man of learning!'" Finding a learned man is not so easy. Learning is not quickly acquired. People may be willing to work, adequately instructed for the purpose, and generously supported by their patrons and parents, yet few can attain it.[3429]
Or if they be docile, yet all mens wills are not answerable to their wits, they can apprehend, but will not take pains; they are either seduced by bad companions, vel in puellam impingunt, vel in poculum, and so spend their time to their friends grief and their own undoings.	Or, if they are teachable, their will does not always match their intelligence. They can understand but will not work. They are led astray by bad companions, "or stumble into a girl's arms, or into the wine cup," and so spend their time to the grief of their friends and their own ruin.[343o]
Or put case they be studious, industrious, of ripe wits, and perhaps good capacities, then how many diseases of body and minde must they encounter? No labor in the world like unto study. It may be, their temperature will not endure it, but striving to be excellent to know all, they lose health, wealth, wit, life and all.	Or suppose they are studious, industrious, mature in judgement and perhaps well endowed with ability: how many diseases of body and mind must they then encounter? No labour in the world compares with study. Their constitution may be unable to bear it; striving to excel and know everything, they lose health, wealth, reason, life and all.[3431]

[343o] Editor. The paired Latin phrases turn sexual pursuit and drinking into things over which a student stumbles. "Friends" can include the relatives and supporters who have invested in his education.

[3431] Editor. "Temperature" means bodily constitution, in the historical humoral sense. Burton's sweeping claim that study is the greatest labour belongs to his defence of scholars, not to a modern medical assessment.

Let him yet happily escape all these hazards, æreis intestinis, with a body of brass, and is now consummate and ripe, he hath profited in his studies, and proceeded with all applause: after many expences, he is fit for preferment, where shall he have it? he is as far to seek it as he was (after twenty years standing) at the first day of his coming to the University.	Yet let him escape all these hazards by good fortune, "with bowels of bronze," with a body of brass. Suppose he is now fully accomplished and mature, has benefited from his studies and taken his degrees to general applause. After so much expense, he is ready for advancement—but where will he find it? After twenty years at the university, he is as far from finding it as on the day he first arrived.[3432]
For what course shall he take, being now capable and ready? The most parable and easie, and about which many are imployed, is to teach a School, turn Lecturer or Curat, and for that he shall have Faulkners wages, ten pound per annum, and his diet, or some small stipend, so long as he can please his Patron or the Parish; if they approve him not (for usually they do but a year or two) as inconstant, as [3433]they that cryed Hosanna one day, and Crucifie him the other; Servingman like, he must go look a new Master: if they do, what is his reward?	What course can he take, now that he is qualified and ready? The most readily available and easiest, which employs many, is teaching a school or becoming a lecturer or curate. For that he will receive a falconer's wages: ten pounds a year and his food, or some small stipend, for as long as he can please his patron or the parish. If they cease to approve of him—as they usually do after a year or two, as fickle as those who cried "Hosanna" one day and "Crucify him" the next—he must find a new master, like a serving man. If they remain satisfied, what is his reward?[3434]

[3433] Burton. Star margin, page 131: "Mat. 21." Matthew 21:9 contains "Hosanna"; the cry for crucifixion is at Matthew 27:22–23. Burton compresses the two scenes.

[3435]Hoc quoque te manet ut pueros elementa docentem Occupet extremis in vicis alba senectus.	This too awaits you: while you teach boys their first lessons, White-haired old age will overtake you in the farthest streets.[3436]
Like an Ass, he wears out his time for provender, and can shew a stum rod, togam tritam & laceram, saith [3437]Hædus, an old torn gown, an ensign of his infelicity, he hath his labor for his pain, a modicum to keep him till he be decrepit, and that is all. Grammaticus non est felix, &c.	Like a donkey, he wears out his life for fodder, and all he can show is a worn-down rod and, as Haedus says, "a threadbare and tattered gown"—an old torn gown, the badge of his misfortune. His labour earns him nothing but more trouble, a pittance to keep him until he is decrepit, and that is all. "A schoolmaster is not fortunate," and so on.[3438]
If he be a trencher Chaplain in a Gentlemans house, as it befel [3439]Euphormio, after some seven years service, he may perchance have a Living to the halves, or some small Rectory with the mother of the maids at length, a poor kindswoman, or a crackt Chamber-maid, to have and to hold during the time of his life. But if he offend his good Patron, or displease his Lady Mistress in the mean time,	If he is a chaplain serving at a gentleman's table, as happened to Euphormio, after some seven years' service he may perhaps obtain a living with only half its income, or eventually a small rectory accompanied by marriage to the woman in charge of the maids, a poor female relative, or a chambermaid whose sexual reputation has been damaged—to have and to hold for the rest of his life. But if in the meantime he offends his good patron or displeases the lady of the house:[3440]

[3436] Editor. Horace addresses his book in Epistles 1.20: it may end its days teaching children their letters in outlying streets or villages. Burton applies that future to the schoolmaster himself. His "alba" is translated as white-haired rather than silently replaced by Horace's "balba," stammering.

[3437] Burton. Star margin, page 131: "Lib. 1. de contem. amor." "Book 1, On Contempt for Love." Haedus, as named in the body; the exact passage and edition remain uncollated.

[3439] Burton. Margin m, page 131: "Satyricon." John Barclay's Euphormionis Lusinini Satyricon, the satire whose narrator is Euphormio; the precise episode remains to be collated.

as Hercules did by Cacus, he shall be dragged forth of doors by the heels, away with him. If he bend his forces to some other studies, with an intent to be à secretis to some Noble man, or in such a place with an Embassador, he shall finde that these persons rise like Prentises one under another, and in so many Tradesmens shops, when the master is dead, the Foreman of the shop commonly steps in his place.	As Hercules treated Cacus, he will be dragged out of doors by the heels: away with him! If he directs his efforts to other studies, intending to become a private secretary to a nobleman or to hold such a post with an ambassador, he will find that these men rise through the ranks like apprentices, one beneath another. In many tradesmen's shops, when the master dies the foreman usually steps into his place.[3443]

[3442] Editor. Juvenal's satire concerns the humiliation of a dependent dinner guest; Burton transfers it to the household chaplain. Cacus, slain by Hercules, supplies the image of a body dragged by the foot. The following English explanation is retained separately.

[3443] Editor. "À secretis" means a confidential or private secretary. Burton describes advancement through subordinate service and succession within a household or establishment; he does not promise a direct route from university learning to such a post.

Now for Poets, Rhetoricians, Historians, Philosophers, [3444]Mathematicians, Sophisters, &c. they are like Grashoppers, sing they must in Summer, and pine in the Winter, for there is no preferment for them. Even so they were at first, if you will believe that pleasant Tale of Socrates, which he told fair Phædrus under a Plane-tree, at the banks of the river Ilissus; about noon when it was hot, and the Grashoppers made a noise, he took that sweet occasion to tell him a Tale, how Grashoppers were once Scholars, Musitians, Poets, &c. before the Muses were born, and lived without meat and drink, and for that cause were turned by Iupiter into Grashoppers.	As for poets, rhetoricians, historians, philosophers, mathematicians, logicians, and so on, they are like grasshoppers: they must sing in summer and waste away in winter, for there is no advancement for them. They were just the same from the beginning, if you believe that delightful tale Socrates told the handsome Phaedrus beneath a plane tree on the banks of the Ilissus. It was about noon, the day was hot, and the grasshoppers were making a noise. He took that pleasant opportunity to tell how grasshoppers had once been scholars, musicians, poets and the like, before the Muses were born. They lived without food or drink, and for that reason Jupiter turned them into grasshoppers.[3445]
And may be turned again, In Tythoni Cicadas, aut Lyciorum ranas, for any reward I see they are like to have: or else in the mean time, I would they could live, as they did, without any viaticum, like so many [3446]Manucodiatæ those Indian Birds of Paradise, as we commonly call them; those I mean that live with the Air, and dew of Heaven, and need other food:	And they may be turned again "into Tithonus's cicadas or the Lycians' frogs," for all the reward I can see them likely to receive. Or else, meanwhile, I wish they could live as those creatures did, without any provisions, like so many manucodiatae—those Indian birds we commonly call birds of paradise. I mean the ones that live on air and the dew of heaven and need no other food.[3447]

[3444] Burton. Margin o, page 132: "Ars colit astra." "Art cultivates the stars." Attached to the mathematicians; the short motto also evokes the elevated reach of learned pursuits.

[3445] Editor. Plato, Phaedrus 259b–d, tells how people were so delighted when the Muses and song appeared that they forgot food and drink and died; cicadas arose from them and received their foodless life from the Muses. Burton calls them grasshoppers, compresses the sequence and names Jupiter as transformer. His version is retained. "Sophisters" here means students or practitioners of logic.

[3446] Burton. Margin p, page 132: "Aldrovandus de Avibus l. 12. Gesner, &c." Ulisse Aldrovandi, On Birds, book 12; Conrad Gessner and others. Burton gives these as authorities for the birds of paradise; exact passages remain uncollated.

[3447] Editor. Tithonus evokes transformation into a cicada; the Lycians recall the peasants changed into frogs after denying Latona water, Ovid, Metamorphoses 6.313–381. "Viaticum" means provisions or support. Air and dew as the birds' sustenance belongs to inherited natural history. The source prints "need other food"; the modern column supplies "no" because the argument requires freedom from the need for provisions. This is an explicit contextual emendation, not a zoological claim. Servius on Aeneid 4.585 explicitly describes Tithonus's conversion into a cicada through length of life. The Latin excerpt supplies a primary parallel, not proof of Burton's immediate source. Aldrovandi and Gessner still require direct collation.

for being as they are, their [3448]Rhetorick onely serves them, to curse their bad fortunes, and many of them for want of means are driven to hard shifts; from Grashoppers they turn Humble-Bees and Wasps, plain Parasites, and make the Muses, Mules, to satisfie their hunger starved panches, and get a meals meat.	As things stand, their rhetoric serves only to curse their bad luck. Many, for lack of money, are driven to desperate expedients. From grasshoppers they turn into bumblebees and wasps, outright parasites; they make the Muses into mules to fill their starving bellies and obtain a meal.[3449]
To say truth, 'tis the common fortune of most Scholars, to be servile and poor, to complain pittifully, and lay open their wants to their respectless Patrons, as [3450]Cardan doth, as [3451]Xilander, and many others: And which is too common in those Dedicatory Epistles, for hope of gain, to lye, flatter, and with hyperbolical elogiums and commendations, to magnifie and extol an illiterate unworthy Idiot, for his excellent vertues, whom they should rather, as [3452]Machiavel observes, vilifie, and rail at down right for his most notorious villanies and vices.	To tell the truth, the usual lot of most scholars is servility and poverty: they complain pitifully and display their needs to unheeding patrons, as Cardano does, and Xylander, and many others. As happens all too often in dedicatory letters, the hope of gain makes them lie and flatter, magnifying and extolling an unlearned, unworthy fool for his excellent virtues with extravagant praises and compliments. As Machiavelli observes, they should instead denounce and abuse him outright for his notorious crimes and vices.[3453]

[3449] Editor. "Humble-bees" are bumblebees. The sequence turns harmless singers into stinging, dependent feeders. "Muses" becoming "mules" is Burton's pun: learning is made to carry burdens for a meal.

[3450] Burton. Dagger margin, page 132: "Lib. de libris Propriis fol. 24." "Book On His Own Books, folio 24." Girolamo Cardano, as named in the body; edition and passage pending.

[3451] Burton. Star margin, page 132: "Præfat. translat. Plutarch." "Preface to the translation of Plutarch." Wilhelm Xylander, as named in the body; exact edition pending.

[3452] Burton. Margin q, page 132: "Polit. disput. laudibus extollunt eos ac si virtutibus pollerent, quos ob infinita scelera potius vituperare oporteret." "Political discourse: they exalt with praises, as though rich in virtues, those whom they ought rather to condemn for countless crimes." Machiavelli, as cited; the abbreviated locator does not securely establish a particular work or chapter.

[3453] Editor. Dedicatory letters addressed potential patrons and could solicit support. "Respectless" describes the patrons' lack of regard. Cardano, Xylander and Machiavelli are preserved as Burton's examples; their exact editions and passages remain in the collation record.

So they prostitute themselves as Fidlers, or mercenary Tradesmen, to serve great mens turns for a small reward. They are like [3454]Indians, they have store of gold, but know not the worth of it: for I am of Synesius opinion, [3455]King Hieron got more by Simonides acquaintance, then Simonides did by his: they have their best education, good institution, sole qualification from us, and when they have done well, their honor and immortality from us; we are the living tombs, registers, and as so many trumpetors of their fames: what was Achilles without Homer? Alexander without Arrian and Curtius? who had known the Cæsars, but for Suetonius and Dion?	So they sell themselves like fiddlers or tradesmen working for pay, to serve the purposes of great men for a small reward. They are like Indians: they possess abundant gold but do not know its value. For I share Synesius's opinion that King Hiero gained more from knowing Simonides than Simonides gained from knowing him. Great men receive their best education, sound instruction and all their accomplishments from us; when they do well, their honour and immortality also come from us. We are their living tombs and records, the trumpeters of their fame. What was Achilles without Homer? Alexander without Arrian and Curtius? Who would have known the Caesars but for Suetonius and Dio?[3456]
[3457]Vixerunt fortes ante Agamemnona Multi: sed omnes illachrymabiles Urgentur, ignotique longâ Nocte, carent quia vate sacro.	Many brave men lived before Agamemnon, But all lie unwept and unknown, Pressed beneath the long night, Because they lack a sacred poet.[3458]

[3454] Burton. Star margin, page 132: "Or as horses know not their strength they consider not their own worth." An alternative comparison to the "Indians" in the body; the marginal English is retained in full.

[3456] Editor. Synesius's letter to Theotimus compares the poet's preservation of a ruler's fame with the ruler's material support. Burton speaks here as one of the scholars: "from us." His broad comparison with "Indians" reflects a European colonial stereotype, not an account of Indigenous knowledge. "Dion" is Cassius Dio; Curtius is Quintus Curtius Rufus.

[3457] Burton. Star margin, page 132: "Hor. lib. 4. od. 9." Horace, Odes 4.9.25–28. Burton prints "Vixerunt" where the comparison text has "Vixere"; the sense is unchanged.

Source page 133 they are more beholden to Scholars, then Scholars to them; but they under-value themselves, and so by those great men are kept down. Let them have that Encyclopædian, all the learning in the world; they must keep it to themselves, [3459]live in base esteem, and starve, except they will submit, as Budæus well hath it, so many good parts, so many ensigns of Arts, vertues, be slavishly obnoxius to some illiterate Potentate, and live under his insolent Worship, or Honor, like Parasites, Qui tanquam mures alienum panem comedunt. For to say truth, artes hæ non sunt Lucrativæ, as Guido Bonat that great Astrologer could fore-see, they be not gainful Arts these, sed esurientes & famelicæ, but poor and hungry.	Great men owe more to scholars than scholars owe to them. But scholars undervalue themselves and so are kept down by those great men. Let them possess the whole circle of knowledge, all the learning in the world: they must keep it to themselves, live despised and starve, unless they submit all their abilities, all their distinctions in arts and virtues, as Budé well puts it, to servile dependence on some unlearned ruler. They must live beneath his insolent Worship or Honour like parasites "who eat another's bread like mice." For, in truth, as that great astrologer Guido Bonatti could foresee, "these arts are not profitable": these are no money-making arts, "but starving and famished"—poor and hungry.[3460]
[3461]Dat Galenus opes, dat Iustinianus honores, Sed genus & species cogitur ire pedes:	Galen gives wealth, Justinian gives honours, But genus and species are forced to go on foot.[3462]
The rich Physitian, honor'd Lawyers ride, Whil'st the poor Scholar foots it by their side.	The rich physician and honoured lawyers ride, While the poor scholar walks beside them.

[3459] Burton. First star margin, page 133: "Inter inertes & Plebeios fere jacet, ultimum locum habens, nisi tot artis virtutisque insignia, turpiter, obnoxiè, supparisitando fascibus subjecerit protervæ insolentisque potentiæ. Lib. 1. de contempt. rerum fortuitarum." "He generally lies among the idle and common people, in the lowest place, unless he shamefully and servilely submits so many distinctions of art and virtue, through parasitic flattery, to the insignia of arrogant and insolent power. Book 1, On Contempt for the Things of Fortune." Budé, as named in the body. The printed form "supparisitando" is retained; the sense corresponds to supparasitando. Exact wording awaits collation.

[3460] Editor. "Encyclopædian" means the whole circle of learning, not necessarily a particular reference book. "Obnoxius" means subject or dependent. "Worship" and "Honour" are forms of address for socially elevated men. Bonatti's supposed foresight becomes a joke about astrology's inability to make scholarship pay.

[3462] Editor. Galen stands for medicine, Justinian for law; "genus and species," terms of logical classification, stand for academic philosophy. The proverb opposes riding to going on foot. The nearby Buchanan attribution belongs securely to the following Calliope couplet, not demonstrably to these lines; its printed attachment is preserved in the author's note.

Poverty is the Muses Patrimony, and as that Poetical divinity teacheth us, when Iupiters daughters were each of them married to the Gods, the Muses alone were left solitary, Helicon forsaken of all Suters, and I believe it was, because they had no portion.	Poverty is the Muses' inheritance. As poetic theology teaches us, when Jupiter's daughters were each married to the gods, the Muses alone were left unmarried, Helicon abandoned by every suitor. I believe the reason was that they had no dowries.[3463]
Calliope longum cælebs cur vixit in ævum? Nempe nihil dotis, quod numeraret, erat.	Why did Calliope live unmarried for so long? Because she had no dowry to count out.[3464]
Why did Calliope live so long a maid? Because she had no dowry to be paid.	Why did Calliope remain so long a maid? Because she had no dowry to be paid.
Ever since all their followers are poor, forsaken and left unto themselves. In so much, that as [3465]Petronius argues, you shall likely know them by their clothes. There came, saith he, by chance into my company, a fellow not very spruce to look on, that I could perceive by that note alone he was a Scholar, whom commonly rich men hate: I asked him what he was, he answered; a Poet; I demanded again why he was so ragged, he told me this kinde of learning never made any man rich.	Ever since, all their followers have been poor, abandoned and left to fend for themselves. So much so that, as Petronius argues, you will probably recognize them by their clothes. "A fellow happened to join me," he says, "whose appearance was far from smart. That sign alone told me he was a scholar, one of those whom rich men commonly hate. I asked what he was; he answered, 'A poet.' I then asked why he was so ragged. He told me that this kind of learning had never made anyone rich."[3466]

[3463] Editor. Helicon is the mountain associated with the Muses. A "portion" is a marriage portion or dowry. Burton's mythic explanation makes poverty the inherited condition of those devoted to learning.

[3465] Burton. Margin s, page 133: "In Satyricon intrat senex, sed cultu non ita speciosus, ut facile appareret eum hac nota literatum esse, quos divites odisse solent. Ego inquit Poeta sum: Quare ergo tam male vestitus es? Propter hoc ipsum; amor ingenii neminem unquam divitem fecit." "In the Satyricon an old man enters, but not so splendidly dressed; from that sign it was easy to see that he was one of the learned, whom the rich habitually hate. 'I am a poet,' he says. 'Why, then, are you so badly dressed?' 'For that very reason: love of genius has never made anyone rich.'" Adapted and compressed from Petronius 83; Burton's Latin changes several phrases.

[3466] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 83, introduces the poet Eumolpus in an art gallery. Burton compresses the encounter into a dialogue and makes ragged clothing the sign of scholarship. This is a scene in a satirical narrative, not Petronius's own autobiographical encounter.

[3467]Qui Pelago credit, magno se fænore tollit, Qui pugnas & rostra petit, præcingitur auro: Vilis adulator picto jacet ebrius ostro, Sola pruinosis horret facundia pannis.	He who trusts the sea raises himself on great returns; He who seeks battles and the public platform is girded with gold. The worthless flatterer lies drunk in embroidered purple; Eloquence alone shivers in frost-covered rags.[3468]
A Marchants gain is great that goes to Sea, A Souldier embossed all in gold: A Flatterer lyes fox'd in brave array, A Scholar onely ragged to behold.	A merchant earns great profits at sea; A soldier is covered in gold. A flatterer lies drunk in splendid clothes; Only a scholar is ragged to behold.[3469]

[3467] Burton. Margin t, page 133: "Petronius Arbiter." Satyricon 83, the verse in Eumolpus's speech. Burton prints "rostra," the public speaking platform, where the comparison text has "castra," military camps, and omits two lines. The modern column follows Burton's printed Latin.

[3468] Editor. The Latin "rostra" includes the public platform, whereas Burton's English verse speaks only of a soldier. Petronius's comparison text has "castra," camps. Both of Burton's versions are preserved separately; the modern Latin rendering retains the difference. He also omits a line on profitable adultery and the final line on the neglected arts.

[3469] Editor. "Fox'd" means drunk; "brave array" splendid clothing. "Embossed" suggests being richly covered or ornamented. This is Burton's compact English version of the preceding Petronius passage, not a replacement for its fresh translation.

Source page 133–134 All which our ordinary Students, right well perceiving in the Universities, how unprofitable these Poeticall, Mathematical, and Philosophicall Studies are, how little respected, how few Patrons; apply themselves in all haste to those three commodious Professions of Law, Physick, and Divinity, sharing themselves between them, [3470]rejecting these Arts in the mean time, History, Philosophy, Philology, or lightly passing them over, as pleasant toyes fitting onely table talk, and to furnish them with discourse.	Our ordinary university students see all this very clearly: how unprofitable poetic, mathematical and philosophical studies are, how little respect they receive, how few patrons they have. They hasten into the three lucrative professions of law, medicine and divinity, dividing themselves among them. Meanwhile they reject these other arts—history, philosophy, philology—or pass lightly over them as amusing trifles fit only for table talk and material for conversation.[3471]
Source page 134 They are not so behoveful: he that can tell his money hath Arithmetick enough: He is a true Geometrician, can measure out a good fortune to himself; A perfect Astrologer, that can cast the rise and fall of others, and marke their Errant motions to his own use. The best Opticks are, to reflect the beams of some great mens favor and grace to shine upon him. He is a good Engineer that alone can make an instrument to get preferment.	They are not so useful: a man who can count his money knows enough arithmetic. A true geometrician can measure out a good fortune for himself; a perfect astrologer can calculate the rise and fall of others and turn their wandering movements to his own advantage. The best optics reflect the rays of great men's favour and grace so that they shine on him. A good engineer needs only to devise a means of gaining advancement.[3472]

[3471] Editor. "Physick" is medicine and "divinity" theology or preparation for clerical work. "Commodious" here means materially advantageous. Philology broadly concerns language and literary learning. Burton treats the turn to these professions as a consequence of inadequate support for other studies.

[3472] Editor. "Tell" means count; "behoveful" useful. The list satirically reduces mathematics, astrology, optics and engineering to devices for personal advancement. "Errant motions" recalls wandering planets while also describing the movements of powerful people.

This was the common Tenent and practice of Poland, as Cromerus observed not long since, in the first Book of his History; their Universities were generally base, not a Philosopher, a Mathematician, an Antiquary, &c. to be found of any note amongst them, because they had no set reward or stipend, but every man betook himself to Divinity, hoc solum in votis habens, opimum sacerdotium, a good Personage was their aim.	This was the usual opinion and practice in Poland, as Kromer observed not long ago in the first book of his History. Their universities were generally of low standing; no philosopher, mathematician, antiquary or the like of any distinction could be found among them, because no fixed reward or stipend was provided. Instead, everyone took up divinity, "having only this wish: a fat benefice." A good parsonage was their aim.[3473]
This was the practice of some of our neer neighbors, as [3474]Lipsius inveighs, they thrust their children to the study of Law and Divinity, before they be informed aright, or capable of such studies. Scilicet omnibus artibus antistat spes lucri, & formosior est cumulus auri, quam quicquid Græci Latinique delirantes scripserunt. Ex hoc numero deinde veniunt ad gubernacula reipub. intersunt & præsunt consiliis regum, o pater, o patria? so he complained, and so may others. For even so we finde, to serve a great man, to get an Office in some Bishops Court (to practise in some good Town) or compass a Benefice, is the mark we shoot at, as being so advantagious, the high way to preferment.	Some of our near neighbours followed the same practice, as Lipsius complains: they push their children into the study of law and divinity before they are properly instructed or ready for such studies. "Of course, the hope of profit takes precedence over all the arts, and a heap of gold is more beautiful than anything those raving Greeks and Romans wrote. From this number men then come to steer the state; they sit in and preside over the councils of kings. O father, O fatherland!" So he complained, and others may do the same. For we find just this: serving a great man, obtaining an office in a bishop's court, practising in a prosperous town or securing a benefice is the target we aim at, because it offers such advantages—the highway to advancement.[3475]

[3473] Editor. "Cromerus" is Marcin Kromer; the passage presents Burton's report of his judgement, not a verified account of every Polish university. "Personage" here means parsonage or the income-bearing clerical position, not a distinguished person. The exact historical passage remains uncollated.

[3474] Burton. Star margin, page 134: "Epistol. quæst. lib. 4. Ep. 21." Lipsius, Epistolary Questions, book 4, letter 21, as cited. Exact edition and wording remain to be collated.

Although many times, for ought I can see, these men fail as often as the rest in their projects, and are as usually frustrate of their hopes. For let him be a Doctor of the Law, an excellent Civilian of good worth, where shall he practise and expatiate? Their fields are so scant, the Civil Law with us so contracted with Prohibitions, so few Causes, by reason of those all-devouring municipal Laws, quibus nihil illiteratius, saith [3476]Erasmus, an illiterate and a barbarous study, (for though they be never so well learned in it, I can hardly vouchsafe them the name of Scholars, except they be otherwise qualified) and so few Courts are left to that profession, such slender offices, and those commonly to be compassed at such dear rates, that I know not how an ingenious man should thrive amongst them.	Yet, as far as I can see, these men often fail in their plans just as frequently as the rest and are just as often disappointed in their hopes. Suppose a man is a doctor of law, an excellent and accomplished civil lawyer: where can he practise and find room to work? His field is so narrow. Here, prohibitions so restrict the civil law, and so few cases remain because of those all-devouring laws of our own country—"than which nothing is more unlearned," says Erasmus, an unlearned and barbarous study—that scarcely any courts are left to the profession. However well versed men may be in that national law, I can hardly grant them the name of scholars unless they have other accomplishments. The offices are so poorly paid, and usually cost so much to obtain, that I do not know how a talented man can prosper among them.[3477]
Now for Physitians, there are in every Village so many Mountebanks, Empericks, Quacksalvers, Paracelsians, as they call themselves, Causifici & sanicidæ, so [3478]Clenard tearmes them, Wisards, Alcumists, poor Vicars, cast Apothecaries, Physitians men, Barbers, and Good wives, professing great skill, that I make great doubt how they shall be maintained, or who shall be their Patients.	As for physicians, every village has so many mountebanks, empirics, quacks and self-styled Paracelsians—"lawsuit-makers and health-killers," as Clenard calls them—wizards, alchemists, poor vicars, discarded apothecaries, physicians' servants, barbers and housewives, all claiming great skill, that I seriously doubt how they can earn a living or who their patients will be.[3479]

[3478] Burton. Star margin, page 134: "Epist. lib. 2." Nicolaus Clenardus, Letters, book 2. The exact letter and the paired satirical terms require collation.

[3479] Editor. Mountebanks sold remedies through public performance; empirics claimed practical experience, and Paracelsians followed the medical tradition associated with Paracelsus. Burton's hostile list also includes household and customary practitioners. "Cast" means discarded, and "physicians' men" their servants or assistants. The printed pair "Causifici & sanicidæ" literally combines lawsuit-makers with killers of health; its exact Clenard context remains unresolved.

Besides, there are so many of both sorts, and some of them such Harpyes, so covetous, so clamorous, so impudent; and as [3480]he said, litigious Idiots,	Besides, there are so many of both kinds, and some are such harpies—so grasping, so noisy, so shameless—and, as the poet said, litigious fools:[3481]

[3480] Burton. Margin y, page 134: "Ia. Dousa Epodon. lib. 2. car. 2." Janus Dousa, Epodes, book 2, poem 2, as printed; the full poem has not been collated here.

[3481] Editor. "Both sorts" resumes lawyers and physicians. Harpies are mythic creatures associated with snatching and fouling food, hence an image for rapacity. The following attack is attributed to Janus Dousa, the Dutch Latin poet.

that they cannot well tell how to live one by another, but as he jested in the Comedy of clocks, they were so many, [3483]major pars populi aridâ reptant fame, they are almost starved a great part of them, and ready to devoure their fellowes, [3484]Et noxia calliditate se corripere, such a multitude of pettifoggers and Empericks; such imposters, that an honest man knows not in what sort to compose and behave himself in their society, to carry himself with credit in so vile a rout, scientiæ nomen, tot sumptibus partum & vigiliis, profiteri dispudeat, postquam &c.	There are so many that they scarcely know how to make a living alongside one another. As the comic poet joked about clocks, “the greater part of the people crawl about in parching hunger.” A great many are almost starving, ready to devour their fellows “and attack one another with malicious cunning.” Such a multitude of pettifoggers and empirics, such impostors, that an honest man does not know how to conduct himself in their company or maintain his good name in so vile a crowd: “he would be ashamed to profess the title of learning, acquired at such expense and through so many sleepless nights, since”—and so on.[3485]
Last of all to come to our Divines, the most noble profession and worthy of double honor, but of all others the most distressed and miserable. If you will not believe me, hear a brief of it, as it was not many years since publikely preached at Pauls cross, [3486]by a grave Minister then, and now a reverend Bishop of this land,	Last of all, to come to our clergy: theirs is the noblest profession, worthy of double honour, yet of all people they are the most distressed and miserable. If you will not believe me, hear a brief account publicly preached not many years ago at Paul’s Cross by a minister who was then a respected preacher and is now a reverend bishop of this country:[3487]

[3484] Burton. Star margin, page 135: “Barc. Argenis lib. 3.” John Barclay, Argenis, book 3; exact passage uncollated. The note accompanies “Et noxia calliditate se corripere,” and may also govern the final fragment about shame in professing learning.

[3486] Burton. Page 135 a: Ioh. Howson 4 Novembris 1597. the Sermon was printed by Arnold Hartfield. [John Howson, 4 November 1597; sermon printed by Arnold Hartfield. See the date and printer correction in the Editor note.]

We that are bred up in learning, and destinated by our Parents to this end, we suffer our childhood in the Grammer school, which Austin calls magnam tyrannidem, & grave malum, and compares it to the torments of martyrdome; when we come to the University, if we live of the Colleage allowance, as Phalaris objected to the Leontines πάντων ἐνδεεῖς πλὴν λιμοῦ καὶ φόβου, needy of all things but hunger and fear, or if we be maintained but partly by our Parents cost, do expend in unnecessary maintenance, books and degrees, before we come to any perfection, five hundreth pounds, or a thousand marks.	"We who are brought up in learning, and destined for this by our parents, endure our childhood in the grammar school, which Augustine calls 'a great tyranny and a grievous evil', comparing it to the torments of martyrdom. When we come to the university, if we live on the college allowance, we are, as Phalaris reproached the Leontines, 'lacking everything except hunger and fear'—needy of all things but hunger and fear. Or, if our parents bear even part of our costs, we spend five hundred pounds or a thousand marks on unnecessary upkeep, books and degrees before we reach any accomplishment.[3488]
If by this price of the expence of time, our bodies and spirits, our substance and patrimonies, we cannot purchase those small rewards, which are ours by law, and the right of inheritance, a poor Personage, or a Vicarige of 50 l. per annum, but we must pay to the Patron for the lease of a life (a spent and out-worne life) either in annual pension, or above the rate of a coppy-hold, and that with the hazard and loss of our souls, by Simony and perjury, and the forfeiture of all our spiritual preferments, in esse and posse, both present and to come.	If, at this cost in time, in our bodies and spirits, our property and inheritances, we cannot obtain those small rewards that belong to us by law and hereditary right—a poor parsonage, or a vicarage worth fifty pounds a year—but must pay the patron for a lease lasting our lifetime, a spent and worn-out lifetime, either by an annual payment or at more than the rate for a copyhold, and must do so at the risk and loss of our souls through simony and perjury, forfeiting all our church appointments, 'actual and possible', both present and future—[3489]

What father after a while will be so improvident, to bring up his son to his great charge, to this necessary beggery? What Christian will be so irreligious, to bring up his son in that course of life, which by all probability and necessity, cogit ad turpia, enforcing to sin, will entangle him in simony and perjury, when as the Poet saith, Invitatus ad hæc aliquis de ponte negabit: a beggers brat taken from the bridge where he sits a begging, if he knew the inconvenience, had cause to refuse it.	What father, before long, will be so improvident as to educate his son at great expense for this inevitable beggary? What Christian will be so irreligious as to bring up his son for a life that, in all probability and indeed inevitably, 'compels him to shameful acts'—forces him into sin—and will entangle him in simony and perjury? As the poet says, 'Even someone invited from a bridge would refuse such fare': a beggar's brat taken from the bridge where he sits begging would have reason to refuse it if he knew the hardship involved."[3490]
This being thus, have not we fished fair all this while, that are initiate Divines, to finde no better fruits of our labors, [3491]hoc est cur palles, cur quis non prandeat hoc est? do we macerate our selves for this? Is it for this we rise so early all the year long? [3492]Leaping (as he saith) out of our beds, when we hear the bell ring, as if we had heard a thunderclap.	If this is so, have we who have entered the ministry not had a fine catch all this while, to find no better fruit from our labours? "Is this why you grow pale? Is this a reason for anyone to go without dinner?" Do we wear ourselves away for this? Is this why we rise so early all year long, leaping, as he says, out of bed when we hear the bell ring, as though we had heard a thunderclap?[3493]

[3490] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 14.134, originally describes food so wretched that even a beggar from a bridge would refuse it. Burton retains the sermon's enlarged application to the clergy's prospects. "Necessary" means unavoidable; "improvident" means heedless of future consequences.

[3493] Editor. "Fished fair" is bitterly ironic: what a fine catch their studies have brought. Compare Persius 3.85, which reads hoc est quod palles, where Burton prints cur. "Macerate" means waste away or wear down the body. The source of the bell-and-thunderbolt comparison remains unlocated.

Source page 135–136 If this be all the respect, reward and honor we shall have, [3494]frange leves calamos, & scinde Thalia libellos: let us give over our bookes, and betake our selves to some other course of life? to what end should we study? [3495]Quid me litterulas stulti docuere parentes, what did our parents meane to make us schollers, to be as far to seek of preferment after twenty years study, as we were as first: why do we take such pains? Quid tantum insanis juvat impallescere chartis? If there be no more hope of reward, no better encouragement.	If this is all the respect, reward and honour we are to receive, "break your slender pens, Thalia, and tear up your books." Let us abandon our books and take up some other way of life. Why should we study? "Why did my foolish parents teach me letters?" What did our parents mean by making us scholars, if after twenty years' study we are as far from advancement as at the beginning? Why do we take such pains? "What pleasure is there in growing so pale over these mad pages?" If there is no further hope of reward, no better encouragement—[3496]
Source page 136 I say again; Frange leves calamos, & scinde Thalia libellos, lets turne souldiers, sell our books, and buy Swords, Guns, and Pikes, or stop bottles with them, turne our Philosophers gownes, as Cleanthes once did, unto millers coats, leave all and rather betake our selves to any other course of life, than to continue longer in this misery. [3497]Præstat dentiscalpia radere, quam literariis monumentis magnatum favorem emendicare.	I say again, "break your slender pens, Thalia, and tear up your books." Let us turn soldiers, sell our books and buy swords, guns and pikes, or use the books to stopper bottles. Let us turn our philosophers' gowns into millers' coats, as Cleanthes once did, leave everything and take up any other way of life rather than continue in this misery. "It is better to whittle toothpicks than to beg the favour of the great with literary works."[3498]

[3496] Editor. The two Martial phrases come from Epigrams 9.73.7–10, on the wealth of a cobbler: Burton changes at me ("but me") to Quid me ("why me"). Thalia is a Muse. The final question recalls Persius 5.62, at te nocturnis iuvat inpallescere chartis, but replaces the praise of night study with a frustrated question about mad pages.

Yea, but me thinkes I hear some man except at these words, that though this be true which I have said of the estate of Schollers, and especially of Divines, that it is miserable and distressed at this time, that the Church suffers shipwrack of her goods, and that they have just cause to complain; there is a fault, but whence proceeds it? If the cause were justly examined, it would be retorted upon our selves, if we were cited at that Tribunal of truth, we should be found guilty, and not able to excuse it.	Yes, but I seem to hear someone objecting to these words. What I have said about the condition of scholars, and especially the clergy, may be true: they are miserable and distressed at present, the Church's goods are being shipwrecked, and they have just cause to complain. There is a fault—but where does it come from? If the cause were fairly examined, the charge would be turned back upon ourselves. If summoned before that tribunal of truth, we should be found guilty and unable to excuse ourselves.
That there is a fault among us, I confess, and were there not a buyer, there would not be seller: but to him that will consider better of it, it will more than manifestly appear, that the fountain of these miseries proceeds from these griping Patrons. In accusing them, I do not altogether excuse us; both are faulty, they and we: yet in my judgment, theirs is the greater fault, more apparant causes & much to be condemned.	I admit that there is fault among us: without a buyer, there would be no seller. But anyone who considers the matter more carefully will see plainly enough that these miseries flow from grasping patrons. In accusing them, I do not wholly excuse us. Both sides are at fault, they and we; yet in my judgement theirs is the greater fault, the more evident cause, and much to be condemned.

For my part, if it be not with me as I would, or as it should, I do ascribe the cause, as [3499]Cardan did in the like case: meo infortunio potius quam illorum sceleri, to [3500]mine own infelicity, rather than their naughtiness: Although I have been baffled in my time by some of them, & have as just cause to complain as another: or rather indeed to mine own negligence;	For my part, if my circumstances are not what I would wish or what they ought to be, I attribute the cause, as Cardano did in a similar case, "to my own misfortune rather than their wrongdoing"—to my own unhappiness rather than their wickedness. Some of them have indeed treated me with contempt in my time, and I have as good a cause to complain as anyone. Or rather, I attribute it to my own negligence.[3501]
for I was ever like that Alexander in [3502]Plutarch, Crassus his tutor in Philosophy, who though he lived many years familiarly with rich Crassus, was even as poor when from, (which many wondred at) as when he came first to him; he never asked, the other never gave him any thing; when he travelled with Crassus he borrowed an hat of him, at his returne restored it again.	For I have always been like that Alexander in Plutarch, Crassus's philosophy tutor. Though he lived on familiar terms with wealthy Crassus for many years, he was just as poor when he left him —which astonished many people—as when he first arrived. He never asked; the other never gave him anything. When he travelled with Crassus, he borrowed a hat from him and returned it when they came back.[3503]

[3501] Editor. "Naughtiness" here is wickedness; "baffled" can mean treated contemptuously or frustrated. Burton's unusually personal marginal confession expands his refusal to court patrons. Its vegetable-dinner fragment recalls the debate between Diogenes and Aristippus in Horace, Epistles 1.17.13–15, about independence and courtly favour; Burton's words are not an exact quotation of those lines.

[3502] Burton. Page 136 star: Vit. Crassi. nec facile judicare potest utrum pauperior cum primo ad Crassum, &c. [Life of Crassus: nor can one easily judge whether he was poorer when he first came to Crassus, and so on.]

[3503] Editor. Plutarch, Crassus 3.3–4, describes the tutor's continuing poverty, but gives him a cloak for journeys, reclaimed on his return. Burton says "hat", retained here. His incomplete "when from" is rendered "when he left him". This Alexander should not be confused with the Renaissance author in the following passage.

I have had some such noble friends acquaintance and Schollers, but most part, (common courtesies and ordinary respects excepted) they & I parted as we met, they gave me as much as I requested, & that was —	I have had some such noble friends, acquaintances and pupils; but for the most part, apart from common courtesies and ordinary marks of respect, we parted as we had met. They gave me as much as I asked for, and that was—
And as Alexander ab Alexandro Genial. dier. l. 6. c. 16. made answer to Hieronymus Massainus, that wondred, quum plures ignavos & ignobiles ad dignitates & sacerdotia promotos quotidie videret, when other men rose, still he was in the same state, eodem tenore & fortuna cui mercedem laborum studiorumque deberi putaret, whom he thought to deserve as well as the rest.	And as Alessandro d'Alessandro answered Girolamo Massaini in his Genial Days, book 6, chapter 16: Massaini wondered, "since he saw many idle and obscure men promoted daily to honours and church offices", why Alessandro remained in the same position while others rose —"in the same condition and circumstances, although he thought a reward was owed to him for his labours and studies"—for he thought Alessandro deserved as much as the rest.[3504]
He made answer, that he was content with his present estate, was not ambitious, and although objurgabundus suam segnitiem accusaret, cum obscuræ sortis homines ad sacerdotia & pontificatus evectos &c. he chid him for his backwardness, yet he was still the same: and for my part (though I be not worthy perhaps to carry Alexanders books) yet by some overweening and wellwishing friends, the like speeches have been used to me; but I replied still with Alexander, that I had enough, and more peradventure than I deserved;	He answered that he was content with his present circumstances and had no ambition. Although Massaini "reproached him, accusing him of laziness, when men of obscure condition had been raised to church offices and bishoprics, and so on"—scolding him for hanging back—he remained unchanged. For my part, though I may not be worthy to carry Alessandro's books, some friends who think too highly of me and wish me well have spoken to me in the same way. But I always answered with Alessandro that I had enough, and perhaps more than I deserved.

[3504] Editor. Alexander ab Alexandro is the Italian humanist Alessandro d'Alessandro; Genialium dierum is a collection of learned miscellanies. Burton combines excerpts with overlapping English explanations. The translations retain both. Book 6, chapter 16 and the exchange with Massaini still require full collation.

Source page 136–137 and with Libanius Sophista, that rather chose (when honours and offices by the Emperor were offered unto him) to be talis Sophista, quam talis Magistratus. I had as live be still Democritus junior, and privus privatus, si mihi jam daretur optio, quam talis fortasse Doctor, talis Dominus. — Sed quorsum hæc? For the rest 'tis on both sides facinus detestandum, to buy and sell livings, to detain from the Church, that which Gods and mens Laws have bestowed on it; but in them most, and that from the covetousness and ignorance of such as are interested in this business;	And I agreed with Libanius the sophist, who, when the emperor offered him honours and offices, preferred to be "a sophist of this standing rather than a magistrate of that standing". I would just as soon remain Democritus Junior, "a wholly private man, if I were now given the choice, rather than perhaps such a Doctor, such a Lord". But where is all this leading? For the rest, it is "a detestable crime" on both sides to buy and sell church livings, or to withhold from the Church what divine and human laws have bestowed on it. But the patrons are chiefly to blame, through the greed and ignorance of those involved in this business.[3505]
Source page 137 I name covetousnes in the first place, as the root of all these mischiefes, which Achan like, compels them to commit sacriledge, and to make Simoniacal compacts, (and what not) to their own ends, [3506]that kindles Gods wrath, brings a plague, vengeance, and an heavy visitation upon themselves and others.	I name greed first, as the root of all these evils. Like Achan, it drives them to commit sacrilege and make simoniacal bargains—and what else will they not do?—to serve their own ends. This kindles God's wrath, bringing plague, vengeance and grievous punishment upon themselves and others.[3507]

[3506] Burton. Page 137 f: Deum habent iratum, sibique mortem æternam acquirunt, aliis miserabilem ruinam. Serrarius in Josuam, 7. Euripides. [They have God angry with them, and procure eternal death for themselves and wretched ruin for others. Serrarius on Joshua 7. Euripides. The last name is retained here as printed; it also accompanies the verse below.]

[3507] Editor. Joshua 7 tells how Achan secretly took forbidden spoils, bringing disaster upon Israel before his exposure. Burton turns him into a repeated emblem of sacrilegious appropriation. Serrarius is the biblical commentator Nicolas Serarius; his exact passage remains to be collated.

Some out of that insatiable desire of filthy lucre, to be enriched, care not how they come by it per fas & nefas, hooke or crook, so they have it. And others when they have with riot and prodigality, imbezelled their estates, to recover themselves, make a prey of the Church, robbing it, as [3508]Iulian the Apostate did, spoile Parsons of their revenews (in keeping halfe back) as [3509]a great man amongst us observes: and that maintenance on which they should live: by meanes whereof, Barbarism is increased, and a great decay of Christian Professors:	Some, in their insatiable desire for filthy gain and riches, do not care how they obtain it, “by right or wrong”, by hook or by crook, so long as they have it. Others, having squandered their estates in riotous extravagance, try to recover themselves by making the Church their prey. They rob it, as Julian the Apostate did, stripping parsons of their revenues by keeping back half, as a great man among us observes, and taking the support on which they should live. As a result, ignorance increases and there is a great decline among those who profess Christianity.[3510]
for who will apply himselfe to these divine studies, his son, or friend, when after great pains taken, they shall have nothing whereupon to live? But with what event do they these things?	For who will devote himself, his son or his friend to these theological studies if, after immense labour, they will have nothing to live on? But what comes of these actions?

They toyle and moyle, but what reap they? They are commonly unfortunate families that use it, accursed in their progenie, & as common experience evinceth, accursed themselves in all their proceedings. With what face (as [3513]he quotes out of Aust.) can they expect a blessing or inheritance from Christ in Heaven, that defraud Christ of his inheritance here on earth?	They toil and drudge, but what do they reap? The families that practise this are commonly unfortunate, cursed in their offspring and, as ordinary experience shows, themselves cursed in all their undertakings. “How can they have the face to expect a blessing or inheritance from Christ in heaven when they defraud Christ of his inheritance here on earth?”—as he quotes from Augustine.[3514]
I would all our Symoniacal Patrons, and such as detain Tithes, would read those judicious Tracts of Sr Henry Spelman, and Sr Iames Sempill Knights; those late elaborate and learned Treatises of Dr Tillslye, and Mr Montague, which they have written of that subject. But though they should read, it would be to small purpose, clames licet & mare cælo Confundas: thunder, lighten, preach hell and damnation, tell them ’tis a sin, they will not believe it:	I wish all our simoniacal patrons, and those who withhold tithes, would read the judicious tracts written on this subject by Sir Henry Spelman and Sir James Sempill, and the recent, painstaking and learned treatises by Dr Tillesley and Mr Montagu. But even if they read them, it would do little good: “You may shout and confound sea with sky.” Thunder, flash lightning, preach hell and damnation, tell them it is a sin: they will not believe it.[3515]

[3514] Editor. Spelman supplies the quotation attributed to Augustine. Its exact patristic source remains unverified. The passage presents family misfortune as divine punishment, an argument within Burton’s polemic rather than an independently established causal explanation.

[3515] Editor. Tithes were payments for church support, traditionally a tenth of produce or income. The writers are Henry Spelman, James Sempill, Richard Tillesley and Richard Montagu; their individual passages await collation. The Latin comes from Juvenal 6.283–284, where a defiant speaker dismisses protest. “Late” means recent, not deceased.

denounce and terrifie, they have [3516]cauterized consciences, they do not attend, as the inchanted Adder, they stop their ears. Denounce and terrify them: their consciences are seared, and they pay no attention. Like the adder faced with a charm, they stop their ears. Call them base, irreligious, profane, barbarous, pagans, atheists, Epicureans—as some of them surely are—and, like the pimp in Plautus, they cry, “Bravo! Excellent!” They applaud themselves with that miser, “as soon as I gaze at the money in my chest”. They are worse than heathens.[3519]

[3518] Editor. The seared conscience is from 1 Timothy 4:2; the deaf adder recalls Psalm 58:4–5. Horace’s miser applauds himself at home while others hiss (Satires 1.1.65–67); “money, by whatever means” comes from Epistles 1.1.65–66. Burton’s Plautine pimp is not yet securely located. “Epicurean” is used polemically for a self-indulgent unbeliever.

[3519] Editor. “Rout” means rabble; “bum[b]ast” evokes stuffing or padding. Burton combines an attack on outward religious display with a pointed admission that his own Christian charity is failing. The fierce religious labels belong to his historical argument.

Source page 137–138 For as Dionysius Halicarnasseus observes antiq. Rom. lib. 7. [3520]Primum locum &c. Greeks and Barbarians observe all religious rites, and dare not break them for fear of offending their Gods; but our Simoniacal contractors, our senseless Achans, our stupified Patrons, fear neither God nor divel, they have evasions for it, it is no sin, or not due jure divino, or if a sin, no great sin, &c.	For, as Dionysius of Halicarnassus observes in Roman Antiquities, book 7, “First place”, and so on: Greeks and non-Greeks observe all their religious rites and dare not break them for fear of offending their gods. But our simoniacal dealers, our senseless Achans, our stupefied patrons fear neither God nor devil. They find evasions: it is no sin; or the payment is not due “by divine law”; or, if it is a sin, it is no great sin, and so on.[3521]
Source page 138 And though they be daily punished for it, and they do manifestly perceive, that as he said, Frost and Fraud come to foul ends; yet as [3522]Chrysostome followes it Nulla ex pœnâ sit correctio, & quasi adversis malitia hominum provocetur, crescit quotidie quod puniatur: they are rather worse than better, —— iram atque animos à crimine sumunt, and the more they are corrected, the more they offend:	And though they are punished for it daily and plainly see that, as the saying goes, frost and fraud come to foul ends, yet, as Chrysostom pursues the point, “No correction comes from punishment; as though adversity provoked human wickedness, the thing to be punished grows daily.” They become worse rather than better: “They draw anger and defiance from their crime.” The more they are chastised, the more they offend.[3523]

[3521] Editor. Burton’s Latin marginal quotation stresses ancestral worship; his English generalizes it to observance of religious rites. Compare Dionysius, Roman Antiquities 7.70.3, where the endurance of traditional rites supports his argument about a people’s origins; Burton applies it to the honour owed to religion. Jure divino concerns the claim that church dues or tithes are owed by divine authority, not merely human arrangement.

but let them take their course, [3524]Rode caper vites, go on still as they begin, 'tis no sin, let them rejoyce secure, Gods vengeance will overtake them in the end, and these ill gotten goods as an Eagles feathers, [3525]will consume the rest of their substance: It is [3526]aurum Tholosanum, and will produce no better effects.	But let them take their course: "Gnaw the vines, goat." Let them go on as they began—it is no sin! Let them rejoice in their security. God's vengeance will overtake them in the end, and these ill-gotten goods, like an eagle's feathers, will consume the rest of their property. It is "the gold of Tolosa", and will produce no better consequences.[3527]
[3528]Let them lay it up safe, and make their conveyances never so close, lock and shut door, saith Chrysostome, yet fraud and Covetousness, two most violent theeves, are still included, and a little gain evill gotten, will subvert the rest of their goods.	"Let them store it safely," says Chrysostom, "make their arrangements as secret as they please, lock and shut the door: fraud and greed, two most violent thieves, are still shut inside, and a little gain dishonestly acquired will overthrow the rest of their goods."
The Eagle in Æsop, seeing a piece of flesh, now ready to be sacrificed, swept it away with her clawes, and carried it to her nest; but there was a burning coal stuck to it by chance, which unawares consumed her, young ones, nest and altogether. Let our Symoniacal Church-chopping Patrons, and sacrilegious Harpyes, look for no better success.	The eagle in Aesop, seeing a piece of meat ready for sacrifice, snatched it up in her claws and carried it to her nest. But a burning coal happened to be stuck to it, and before she knew it, it consumed her, her young, her nest and everything together. Let our simoniacal patrons who trade in church livings, those sacrilegious Harpies, expect no better outcome.[3529]

[3527] Editor. Ovid, Fasti 1.357–358: the goat may gnaw the vine, but it will still provide wine for his sacrifice; Burton prints plural vites for singular vitem. Eagle feathers were reputed to destroy other feathers stored with them. The gold of Tolosa, now Toulouse, was proverbial for ruinous plunder; Strabo 4.1.13 recounts Caepio's misfortune and also questions the treasure's supposed Delphic origin.

[3529] Editor. Burton's eagle exemplum makes theft recoil on the thief; the precise Aesopic version behind his account remains unidentified. Harpies are the mythological creatures notorious for snatching away or fouling food. "Church-chopping" means dealing or trafficking in church appointments.

A second cause is Ignorance, and from thence contempt, successit odium in literas ab ignorantiâ vulgi; which [3530]Iunius well perceived: this hatred and contempt of learning, proceeds out of Ignorance, as they are themselves barbarous, idiots, dull, illiterate, and proud, so they esteem of others.[3531]	A second cause is ignorance, and from it contempt: "Hatred of letters has arisen from the ignorance of the multitude," as Junius clearly perceived. This hatred and contempt of learning proceeds from ignorance. Since they themselves are uncultivated, unlearned, dull, illiterate and proud, they judge others accordingly.[3532]
Sint Mæcenates, non deerunt Flacce Marones:	Let there be patrons like Maecenas, Flaccus, and Virgils will not be lacking.[3533]
Let there be bountiful Patrons, and there will be painful Schollers in all Sciences. But when they contemn Learning, and think themselves sufficiently qualified, if they can write and read, scamble at a piece of Evidence, or have so much Latine as that Emperor had, [3534]qui nescit dissimulare, nescit vivere, they are unfit to do their country service, to performe or undertake any action or imployment, which may tend to the good of a Common-wealth, except it be to fight, or to do country Justice, with common sense, which every Yeoman can likewise do.	Let there be generous patrons, and there will be hardworking scholars in every branch of knowledge. But when they despise learning and think themselves sufficiently qualified if they can read and write, stumble through a legal document, or know as much Latin as that emperor—"He who does not know how to dissemble does not know how to live"—they are unfit to serve their country or undertake any activity or employment that might benefit the commonwealth, except to fight or administer local justice with common sense, which any yeoman can equally do.[3535]

[3532] Editor. "Idiots" here means unlearned people. Junius is cited through Academiae, chapter 7; the passage awaits collation. The margin's t proverb has no clear matching body marker and is attached here by subject, preserving its position alongside the paragraph on ignorance.

[3533] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 8.55 (also numbered 8.56), line 5. Maecenas, patron of Virgil and Horace, becomes the name for a generous patron; Maro is Virgil. Flaccus is the person addressed. Burton broadens the saying in his following English gloss to scholars in every field.

[3534] Burton. Page 138 u: He that cannot dissemble cannot live.

[3535] Editor. "Painful" means painstaking or hardworking. A piece of "evidence" here is a legal document or title deed; "scamble" means cope with it awkwardly. A yeoman was a man of the substantial farming class. "Country justice" means local magisterial duties. Burton does not name the emperor, whose identity remains unresolved.

And so they bring up their children, rude as they are themselves, unqualified, untaught, uncivil most part. [3536]Quis e nostrâ juventute legitimè instituitur literis? Quis oratores aut Philosophos tangit? quis historiam legit, illam rerum agendarum quasi animam? præcipitant parentes vota sua, &c. 'twas Lipsius complaint to his illiterate country-men, it may be ours.	And so they bring up their children as uncultivated as themselves: unqualified, untaught and, for the most part, ill-mannered. "Who among our young people is properly educated in letters? Who touches the orators or philosophers? Who reads history, which is, as it were, the soul of practical affairs? Parents rush to fulfil their wishes, and so on." This was Lipsius's complaint to his illiterate countrymen; it may also be ours.[3537]
Now shall these men judge of a Schollers worth, that have no worth, that know not what belongs to a students labors, that cannot distinguish between a true scholler and a drone? or him that by reason of a voluble tongue, a strong voice, a pleasing tone, and some trivantly Polyanthean helps, steales and gleanes a few notes from other mens Harvests, and so makes a fairer shew, than he that is truly learned indeed: that thinks it no more to preach, that to speak, [3538]or to run away with an empty Cart; as a grave man said; and thereupon vilifies us, and our paines; scorne us, and all learning.	Are these men to judge a scholar's worth, when they have no worth themselves, know nothing of a student's labour, and cannot distinguish a true scholar from a drone? Or from someone who, with a fluent tongue, a strong voice, a pleasing tone and a few truant's aids from a Polyanthea, steals and gleans a few notes from other people's harvests, and so makes a finer show than someone genuinely learned? They think preaching is no more than talking, or running off with an empty cart, as a respected man said. And so they disparage us and our labour, and scorn us and all learning.[3539]

[3537] Editor. Justus Lipsius, Epistolary Questions 4.21, as cited. Præcipitant parentes vota sua suggests parents impatiently hastening the fulfilment of their hopes; the surrounding letter has not yet been collated, so the translation avoids specifying a career they intend.

[3539] Editor. Polyanthea names a collection of extracts and commonplaces arranged for convenient borrowing. "Trivantly" is retained from the print and understood as "truantly": borrowed learning substitutes for study. Printed "that to speak" is understood as "than to speak". The empty cart is the image Burton attributes to John King's last lecture on Jonah; its exact context remains to be checked.

Source page 138–139 [3540]Because they are rich, and have other meanes to live, they think it concernes them not to know, or to trouble themselves with it; a fitter taske for younger brothers, or poor mens sons, to be pen and Inkhorne men, pedantical slaves, and no whit beseeming the calling of a Gentleman, as Frenchmen and Germans commonly do, neglect therefore all humane learning, what have they to do with it?	Because they are rich and have other means of support, they think learning is no concern of theirs and not worth their trouble. They think being a pen-and-ink man, a slave to book learning, is a fitter occupation for younger brothers or poor men's sons, entirely unbecoming to a gentleman's station. As Frenchmen and Germans commonly do, they therefore neglect all human learning. What have they to do with it?[3541]
Source page 139 Let Marriners learn Astronomy; Merchants Factors study Arithmetick; Surveiers get them Geometry; Spectacle-makers Opticks; Landleapers Geography; Town-Clarks Rhetorick, what should he do with a spade, that hath no ground to dig? or they with Learning, that have no use of it? thus they reason, and are not ashamed to let Marriners, Prentises, and the basest servants be better qualified than themselves. In former times, Kings, Princes, and Emperors were the only Schollers, excellent in all faculties.	Let sailors learn astronomy, merchants' agents study arithmetic, surveyors acquire geometry, spectacle-makers optics, wanderers geography, and town clerks rhetoric. What should a man do with a spade when he has no ground to dig, or they with learning when they have no use for it? That is how they reason, unashamed to let sailors, apprentices and the lowliest servants be better qualified than themselves. In former times, kings, princes and emperors were the foremost scholars, accomplished in every field.[3542]
Iulius Cæsar mended the year, and writ his own Commentaries,	Julius Caesar reformed the calendar and wrote his own Commentaries:

[3541] Editor. Younger sons, less likely to inherit an estate, often needed a profession. An inkhorn is a small ink container; the phrase dismisses professional writers or clerks. Burton's national comparison is his own broad generalization, retained as part of the text.

[3542] Editor. A factor is a commercial agent; a landleaper a wanderer or vagrant. "Only scholars" here praises rulers as pre-eminent scholars rather than claiming that nobody else studied. The contrast turns occupational knowledge into a rebuke to the idle gentleman.

Orion, Perseus, Alfonso and Ptolemy were famous astronomers; Sabor, Mithridates and Lysimachus admired physicians: Plato's kings, all of them. Evax, that Arabian prince, was an expert in precious stones and an accomplished philosopher. The kings of Egypt in ancient times were priests, chosen from among them: "At once king of men and priest of Phoebus."[3547]

[3543] Burton. Page 139 star: Lucan. lib. 8. [Lucan, book 8, as printed; the passage is in book 10.]

[3544] Editor. Lucan, Civil War 10.185–186, not book 8 as Burton's margin says. Caesar speaks in the first person, vacavi ("I found time"); Burton changes this to vacavit ("he found time"). The modern verse follows Burton's third person. The calendar reform and the Commentaries support his picture of a ruler engaged in scholarship.

[3545] Burton. Page 139 z: Spartian. Solliciti de rebus nimis. [Spartianus. Excessively concerned with matters. The abbreviated citation is retained; no precise passage has been established.]

but those heroical times are past; the Muses are now banished in this bastard age, ad sordida tuguriola, to meaner persons, and confined alone almost to Universities. In those daies, Schollers were highly beloved, [3548]honoured, esteemed; as old Ennius by Scipio Africanus, Virgil by Augustus, Horace by Mæcenas: Princes companions; dear to them, as Anacreon to Polycrates; Philoxenus to Dionysius, and highly rewarded.	But those heroic times are past. In this degenerate age the Muses are banished “to squalid little huts”, to people of lower station, and confined almost entirely to universities. In those days scholars were greatly loved, honoured and esteemed: old Ennius by Scipio Africanus, Virgil by Augustus, Horace by Maecenas. They were companions of princes, dear to them, as Anacreon was to Polycrates and Philoxenus to Dionysius, and richly rewarded.[3549]
Alexander sent Xenocrates the Philosopher 50. talents, because he was poor, visu rerum, aut eruditione præstantes viri, mensis olim regum adhibiti, as Philostratus relates of Adrian and Lampridius of Alexander Severus: famous Clarkes came to these Princes Courts, velut in Lycæum, as to an University, and were admitted to their tables, quasi divum epulis accumbentes;	Alexander sent the philosopher Xenocrates fifty talents because he was poor. “Men distinguished by their knowledge of affairs or their learning were once admitted to kings’ tables,” as Philostratus relates of Hadrian and Lampridius of Alexander Severus. Famous scholars came to these princes’ courts “as to a Lyceum”—as to a university—and were admitted to their tables, “as though reclining at the banquets of the gods”.[3550]

[3550] Editor. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 5.32.91, records Alexander’s offer of fifty talents to Xenocrates. Xenocrates says he needs no money and accepts only thirty minas to avoid slighting the king. Burton gives the offer without this qualification. A talent is a weight or sum of money; “clarks” means learned men. McGill p. 139 confirms visu rerum, retained and interpreted as knowledge of affairs. The possible correction usu rerum, “experience of affairs”, and the Philostratus and Lampridius references still need collation. The Lyceum was Aristotle’s school.

Archilaus that Macedonian King would not willingly sup without Euripides, (amongst the rest he drank to him at supper one night and gave him a cup of gold for his pains) delectatus poetæ suavi sermone; and it was fit it should be so: Because as [3551]Plato in his Protagoras well saith, a good Philosopher as much excels other men, as a great King doth the Commons of his country;	Archelaus, the Macedonian king, was reluctant to dine without Euripides. Among his other kindnesses, one evening at supper he drank to him and gave him a golden cup for his pains, "delighted by the poet's charming conversation". And it was fitting that this should be so, because, as Plato says well in his Protagoras, a good philosopher excels other men as much as a great king excels the common people of his country.[3552]
and again, [3553]quoniam illis nihil deest, & minime egere solent, & disciplinas quas profitentur, soli à contemptu vindicare possunt, they needed not to beg so basely, as they compel [3554]Schollers in our times to complain of poverty, or crouch to a rich chuffe for a meales meat, but could vindicate themselves, & those Arts which they professed. Now they would & cannot:	And again, "because they lack nothing and are least accustomed to want, they alone can rescue the disciplines they profess from contempt". They had no need to beg so abjectly, as scholars in our times are compelled to complain of poverty or cringe before a rich boor for a meal. They could defend themselves and the arts they professed. Now they would do so, but cannot.[3555]

[3552] Editor. Burton attributes the philosopher-and-king comparison to Plato's Protagoras, but no exact passage has yet been established; the attribution is retained without a conjectural section number. His Latin margin says "more", whereas the English says "as much"; both are preserved. The cup anecdote likewise awaits collation.

[3554] Burton. Page 139 d: Servile nomen est Scholaris jam. [The name "scholar" is now a servile one. The printed abbreviations nom. and ē are expanded.]

for it is held by some of them, as an axiome, that to keep them poor, will make them study; they must be dieted, as horses to a race, not pampered, [3556]Alendos volunt, non saginandos, ne melioris mentis flammula extinguatur: a fat bird will not sing, a fat dog cannot hunt, and so by this depression of theirs, [3557]some want meanes, others will, all want incouragement, as being forsaken almost, & generally contemned.[3558] 'Tis an old saying, Sint Mæcenates non deerunt Flacce Marones, and 'tis a true saying still.	For some of these patrons take it as an axiom that keeping scholars poor will make them study. They must be put on a strict diet like horses before a race, not pampered: "They want them fed, not fattened, lest the little flame of the nobler mind be extinguished." A fat bird will not sing; a fat dog cannot hunt. And so, because scholars are kept down in this way, some lack the means, others the will, and all lack encouragement, being almost abandoned and generally despised. "Let there be patrons like Maecenas, Flaccus, and Virgils will not be lacking" is an old saying, and it remains true.[3559]
Source page 139–140 Yet oftentimes I may not deny it the main fault is in our selves. Our Academicks too frequently offend in neglecting patrons, as [3560]Erasmus well taxeth, or making ill choice of them; negligimus oblatos aut amplectimur parum aptos, or if we get a good one, non studemus mutuis officiis favorem ejus alere, we do not plye and follow him as we should.	Yet often—I cannot deny it—the chief fault lies in ourselves. Our university scholars too frequently go wrong by neglecting patrons, as Erasmus justly reproaches them, or by choosing them badly: "We neglect those who offer themselves, or embrace those who are unsuitable." Or, if we obtain a good one, "we do not take pains to nourish his favour through services in return": we do not attend and follow him as we should.[3561]

[3557] Burton. Page 139 f: Haud facile emergunt, &c. [They do not easily rise, and so on. Juvenal, Satire 3.164–165: those whose abilities are obstructed by poverty at home.]

[3558] Burton. Page 139 g: Media quod noctis ab hora sedisti qua nemo faber, qua nemo sedebat, qui docet obliquo lanam deducere ferro: rara tamen merces. Juv. Sat. 7. [That you have sat from midnight, when no craftsman sat at work, nor one who teaches the drawing out of wool with a slanting iron: yet payment is rare. Juvenal, Satire 7.222–224, 228, excerpted.]

[3559] Editor. The remark assigned to Seneca remains unlocated. Juvenal 3.164–165 supplies the marginal fragment about poverty obstructing ability. The further, unanchored margin g excerpts Satire 7.222–224 and 228 on a teacher's early hours and difficulty getting paid; its placement here follows subject and page position. Burton prints Media and sedebat where the compared text has mediae and sederet. Martial's patronage line is repeated to close the appeal.

[3561] Editor. Burton's printed reference resolves to Adages IV.1.1, no. 3001, Dulce bellum inexpertis, on war's attraction to the inexperienced. The Huygens Latin text consulted does not establish the patronage borrowing at that locus. The earlier note treated the citation too confidently; the reference is retained as Burton's, with its applicability unresolved. To "plye" a patron is to attend him assiduously; patronage involves reciprocal services.

Source page 140 Idem mihi accidit Adolescenti (saith Erasmus) acknowledging his fault, & gravissime peccavi, and so may [3562]I say my self, I have offended in this, and so peradventure have many others. We did not spondere magnatum favoribus, qui cœperunt nos amplecti, apply our selves with that readiness we should: idleness, love of liberty, immodicus amor libertatis effecit ut diu cum perfidis amicis, as he confesseth, & pertinaci paupertate colluctarer, bashfulness, melancholy, timourousness cause many of us to be too backward and remiss.	"The same thing happened to me as a young man," says Erasmus, acknowledging his fault, "and I was very much to blame." I too may say that I have offended in this, as perhaps many others have. We did not "respond to the favours of great men who had begun to embrace us", or apply ourselves as readily as we should. Idleness, love of liberty—"an excessive love of liberty made me struggle long with treacherous friends", as he confesses, "and stubborn poverty"—bashfulness, melancholy and timidity make many of us too hesitant and negligent.[3563]
So some offend in one extream, but too many on the other, we are most part too forward, too solicitous, too ambitious, too impudent; We commonly complain deesse Mæcenates, want of encouragement, want of meanes, when as the true defect is in our own want of worth, our insufficiency: did Mæcenas take notice of Horace or Virgil till they had shewed themselves first? or had Bavius and Mevius any patrons?	Some therefore err at one extreme, but too many at the other. For the most part we are too forward, too importunate, too ambitious, too shameless. We commonly complain that "Maecenases are lacking", that we lack encouragement and means, when the real defect is our own lack of merit, our inadequacy. Did Maecenas notice Horace or Virgil before they had proved themselves? And did Bavius and Mevius have any patrons?[3564]

[3562] Burton. Page 140, dagger: "Had I done as others did, put my self forward, I might have happily been as great a man as many of my equals." Here happily means perhaps or by good fortune.

[3563] Editor. McGill p. 140 confirms spondere. Burton's following English calls for "respond to" or "repay", as if respondere were intended. The original remains; the modern sense follows his gloss, not a verified Erasmus reading. The interrupted confession about liberty is joined in meaning without deleting Burton's interruption. Its precise source and the intended Adages reference remain unresolved.

[3564] Editor. Maecenas supported Horace and Virgil and became the proverbial generous patron. Bavius and Maevius are the proverbial bad poets paired in Virgil, Eclogues 3.90. Burton invokes them as a challenge to unproven applicants, not as evidence that every gifted scholar found support.

Egregium specimen dent, saith Erasmus, let them approve themselves worthy first, sufficiently qualified for learning and manners, before they presume or impudently intrude and put themselves on great men as too many do, with such base flattery, parasitical colloging, such hyperbolical elogies they do usually insinuat, that it is a shame to hear and see. Immodicæ laudes conciliant invidiam, potius quam laudem, and vain commendations derogate from truth, and we think in conclusion, non melius de laudato, pejus de laudante, ill of both, the commender and commended.	"Let them give an excellent proof of themselves," says Erasmus. Let them first show themselves worthy, sufficiently qualified in learning and conduct, before they presume to intrude shamelessly and thrust themselves upon great men, as too many do. They usually ingratiate themselves through such abject flattery, such parasitical coaxing, such extravagant praise that it is shameful to hear and see. "Excessive praises win resentment rather than praise." Empty commendations detract from the truth, and in the end we think "no better of the person praised, and worse of the person praising"—ill of both, the praiser and the praised.[3565]
So we offend, but the main fault is in their harshness, defect of patrons. How beloved of old, and how much respected was Plato to Dionysius? How dear to Alexander was Aristotle, Demeratus to Philip, Solon to Crœsus, Anexarcus and Trebatius to Augustus, Cassius to Vespasian, Plutarch to Trajan, Seneca to Nero, Simonides to Hieron? how honored?	So we are at fault; but the chief fault lies in their harshness, in the failure of patrons. How beloved and respected Plato once was by Dionysius! How dear Aristotle was to Alexander, Demaratus to Philip, Solon to Croesus, Anaxarchus and Trebatius to Augustus, Cassius to Vespasian, Plutarch to Trajan, Seneca to Nero, Simonides to Hieron! How honoured![3566]
[3567]Sed hæc prius fuere, nunc recondita Senent quiete,	But these things were long ago; now, laid away, They grow old in quiet.[3568]
those daies are gone:	Those days are gone:

[3565] Editor. "Colloging" is coaxing or flattering conversation; "elogies" means praises, not elegies. The final Latin says we think no better of the praised person and worse of the praiser; Burton's own English condemns both. Both statements are retained.

[3566] Editor. This catalogue idealizes ancient patronage. Anaxarchus, associated with Alexander the Great, cannot straightforwardly belong to Augustus's circle; Cassius and other compressed names also need checking against Burton's intermediaries. The original claims are retained without treating every pairing as established history.

[3567] Burton. Page 140, h: "Catullus, Iuven." Catullus; Juvenal. The two names refer to the successive verse quotations.

[3568] Editor. Catullus 4.25–26 describes a retired boat: "these things" are its former exploits, and it now grows old in quiet retirement. Burton prints plural Senent in place of singular senet and transfers the lines to vanished patronage. His following English phrase is retained separately.

A renowned scholar himself, and the sole patron, pillar and sustainer of learning—[3571]
but his worth in this kind is so well known, that as Paterculus of Cato, Jam ipsum laudare nefas sit: and which [3572]Pliny to Trajan. Seria te carmina, honorque æternus annalium, non hæc brevis & pudenda prædicatio colet. But he is now gone, the Sun of ours set, and yet no night followes,	but his merit in this respect is so well known that, as Paterculus said of Cato, "it would now be wrong even to praise him"; and as Pliny said to Trajan, "Serious poetry and the everlasting honour of the annals will celebrate you, not this brief and shameful proclamation." But he is now gone. Our sun has set, and yet no night follows:[3573]
—— Sol occubuit, nox nulla sequuta est.	The sun has set; no night has followed.
We have such another in his room	We have another such king in his place:

[3569] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 7.1. Caesar means the emperor as patron. Burton turns the line towards the English monarchy in the paragraph that follows.

[3570] Burton. Page 140, i: "Nemo est quem non Phœbus hic noster, solo intuitu liberaliorem reddat." There is no one whom this Phoebus of ours does not make more generous by his mere glance.

[3571] Editor. The king is James VI and I. Phoebus is Apollo, god of the sun and poetry; Ptolemy and Maecenas stand for royal and private patronage. A "Platonic king" evokes the learned ruler of Plato's political ideal. Grande decus, columenque adapts Horace, Odes 2.17.4, originally addressed to Maecenas.

[3572] Burton. Page 140, star: "Penegyr." Pliny's Panegyric.

[3573] Editor. Paterculus, Roman History 2.45.5, calls Cato's integrity beyond praise, then criticizes his haughtiness on returning from Cyprus. Burton freely generalizes the praise to Cato himself. Pliny, Panegyric 54, contrasts lasting literary commemoration with theatrical praise; Burton has colet for colit. James died in 1625; the successor is Charles I, executed in 1649. The 1651 text retains the earlier wish for his long reign. The sun-and-night verse and the Phoebus margin remain unlocated.

I cannot deny that a sprinkling of our gentry, one here and another there, are exceptionally learned, like the Fuggers in Germany; Du Bartas, Du Plessis and Sadeel in France; Pico della Mirandola, Schottus and Barotius in Italy.[3576]

[3576] Editor. The list includes the German Fugger family, the French writers Guillaume de Saluste Du Bartas, Philippe Duplessis-Mornay and Antoine de la Roche Chandieu (Sadeel), and Giovanni Pico della Mirandola. Schottus and Barotius are retained without forcing uncertain identifications; the exact forms and Burton’s geographical grouping need collation.

But they are but few in respect of the multitude, the major part (and some again excepted, that are indifferent) are wholly bent for Hawkes and hounds, and carried away many times with intemperate lust, gaming and drinking. If they read a book at any time, (si quod est interim otii à venatu, poculis, alea, scortis) 'tis an English Chronicle, Sr Huon of Bordeaux, Amadis de Gaule, &c. a play-book, or some pamphlet of Newes, and that at such seasons only, when they cannot stir abroad, to drive away time, [3578]their sole discourse is dogs, hawks, horses, and what Newes?	But they are few beside the multitude. Most—again excepting some of middling attainment—are wholly devoted to hawks and hounds, and often carried away by uncontrolled lust, gambling and drinking. If they ever read a book, "if meanwhile there is any leisure from hunting, drinking, dice and prostitutes", it is an English chronicle, Sir Huon of Bordeaux, Amadis of Gaul, a playbook or some news pamphlet, and only when they cannot go out, to pass the time. Their only conversation is about dogs, hawks, horses—and what is the news?[3579]

[3578] Burton. Sequence page 141, k: "Rarus enim ferme sensus communis in illa Fortuna. Iuv. Sat. 8." For a sense of common humanity is seldom found in that station. Juvenal, Satire 8.

[3579] Editor. "Indifferent" means moderate or middling, not unconcerned. Huon of Bordeaux and Amadis of Gaul are chivalric romances. The marginal quotation is Juvenal 8.73–74; sensus communis here suggests fellow-feeling or common humanity, not merely practical common sense.

If some one have been a traveller in Italy, or as far as the Emperors Court, wintered in Orleance, and can court his Mistris in broken French, wear his clothes neatly in the newest fashion, sing some choice Out-landish tunes, discourse of Lords, Ladies, Townes, Palaces, and Cities, he is compleat and to be admired: [3580]Otherwise he and they are much at one; no difference betwixt the Master and the Man, but worshipful titles: wink and choose betwixt him that sits down (clothes excepted) and him that holds the Trencher behind him: yet these men must be our Patrons, our governors too sometimes, statesman, magistrates, noble, great, and wise by inheritance.	If someone has travelled in Italy, or as far as the emperor's court, spent a winter in Orléans, and can court his mistress in broken French, dress neatly in the latest fashion, sing a few choice foreign tunes and talk about lords, ladies, towns, palaces and cities, he is an accomplished gentleman, to be admired. Otherwise he and the rest are much alike: there is no difference between master and servant except their honourable titles. Shut your eyes and choose between the man who sits down to eat and the man who holds the platter behind him—apart from their clothes, there is nothing to choose. Yet these men must be our patrons, and sometimes our governors too: statesmen, magistrates, noble, great and wise by inheritance.[3581]
Mistake me not (I say again) Vos ô Patritius sanguis, you that are worthy Senators, Gentlemen, I honor your names and persons, and with all submissness, prostrate my self to your censure and service. There are amonst you, I do ingeniously confess, many well deserving Patrons, and true patriots, of my knowledge, besides many hundreds which I never saw, no doubt, or heard of, pillars of our common-wealth, [3582]whose worth, bounty, learning, forwardness, true zeal in Religion, and good esteem of all Schollers, ought to be consecrated to all posterity;	Do not misunderstand me, I say again: "You of patrician blood", you worthy senators and gentlemen, I honour your names and persons, and submit myself most humbly to your judgement and service. Among you, I frankly acknowledge, are many deserving patrons and true patriots whom I know, besides, no doubt, many hundreds I have never seen or heard of: pillars of our commonwealth whose merit, generosity, learning, readiness to help, true religious zeal and esteem for all scholars ought to be honoured by every generation to come.[3583]

[3581] Editor. The margin quotes Juvenal 8.30–32 on nobility without merit. A trencher is a plate or platter. "Worshipful" is an honorific indicating social rank; Burton's "wink and choose" insists that rank alone supplies no intellectual distinction.

[3582] Burton. Sequence page 141, m: "I have often met with my self, and conferred with divers worthy Gentlemen in the Country, no whit inferior, if not to be preferred for divers kind of learning to many of our Academicks."

[3583] Editor. The address to "patrician blood" comes from Persius 1.61. "Censure" means judgement, not necessarily condemnation. Printed amonst and ingeniously are retained; the latter is understood in the sense "frankly", as ingenuously. "Forwardness" here is a willingness to help.

but of your rank, there are a deboshed, corrupt, covetous, illiterate crew again, no better than stocks, merum pecus (testor Deum, non mihi videri dignos ingenui hominis appellatione) barbarous Thracians, & quis ille thrax qui hoc neget? a sordid, prophane, pernicious company, irreligious, impudent and stupid, I know not what Epithets to give them, enemies to learning, confounders of the Church, and the ruin of a common-wealth:	But within your ranks there is also a debauched, corrupt, greedy, unlearned crew, no better than blocks of wood, "mere cattle—I call God to witness that I do not consider them worthy of the name of freeborn men"—barbarous Thracians, "and what Thracian would deny this?" A sordid, profane, pernicious company, irreligious, shameless and stupid: I do not know what names to give them. They are enemies of learning, destroyers of the Church and the ruin of a commonwealth.[3584]
Patrons they are by right of inheritance, and put in trust freely to dispose of such Livings to the Churches good; but (hard taske masters they prove) they take away their straw, and compel them to make their number of brick: they commonly respect their own ends, commodity is the steer of all their actions, and him they present in conclusion, as a man of greatest gifts, that will give most; no penny, [3585]no Pater Noster, as the saying is.	They are patrons by hereditary right, entrusted to grant such church livings freely for the Church's good. But they prove harsh taskmasters: they take away the straw and compel the men to make their full tally of bricks. They commonly pursue their own ends; profit steers everything they do, and the man they finally nominate as having the greatest gifts is the one who will give most. "No penny, no Our Father," as the saying goes.[3586]

[3584] Editor. "Stocks" are blocks of wood. "Thracian" functions as a classical stereotype of uncultivated barbarism, not a factual assessment of a people. The precise intermediaries for the Latin outbursts remain unlocated.

[3585] Burton. Sequence page 141, o: "Ipse licet Musis venias comitatus Homere, Nil tamen attuleris, ibis Homere foras." Even if you come accompanied by the Muses, Homer, if you bring nothing, Homer, you will go back outside.

[3586] Editor. The straw and bricks recall Exodus 5.7–18. A patron's presentation was the nomination of a candidate to a church living. "Greatest gifts" turns intellectual and spiritual gifts into cash. Pater Noster is the opening of the Lord's Prayer. The margin adapts Ovid, Art of Love 2.279–280, where Homer without presents is turned away.

"Unless you back your prayers with gold, you only provoke them further." "As Cerberus with a morsel": their attendants and officers must be bribed, paid and won over, as Cerberus is with a mouthful of food by the traveller going down to hell. The old saying was, "Everything at Rome is for sale." It is a remnant of popery that will never be rooted out: there is no hope, no good to be achieved without money.[3587]

Source page 142 [printed 128] multi mortales confluebant ad videndum sæculi decus, speculum gloriosum, laudatur ab omnibus, spectatur ab omnibus, nec quisquam non rex, non regius, cupidus ejus nuptiarum petitor accedit; mirantur quidem divinam formam omnes, sed ut simulacrum fabre politum mirantur;	"Many mortals flocked together to see the glory of the age, a glorious mirror. She is praised by everyone, gazed at by everyone; yet no one—not a king, not a prince—comes as a suitor eager to marry her. All indeed admire her divine beauty, but they admire it as they would a skilfully fashioned statue."[3591]

[3588] Burton. Sequence page 141, p: "Et legat historicos authores, noverit omnes Tanquam ungues digitosque suos. Iuv. Sat. 7." And let him read the historical authors and know them all as well as his own fingers and nails. Juvenal, Satire 7.

[3590] Editor. The first margin adapts Juvenal 7.231–232, turning the original demand to read history and know all authors into reading historical authors. The cold, unrewarded honesty is Juvenal 1.74. "Parts" means abilities; "afar off" concerns the distance travelled by the listeners.

[3591] Editor. Apuleius, Metamorphoses 4.28 and 4.32. Burton combines and adapts the account. His printed speculum means "mirror"; it is retained rather than silently replaced by spectaculum, "spectacle". The compared Apuleius text describes admiration for a finely made statue. Burton's following English instead gives a picture.

Your rich men have now lately learned To admire, commend and come together To hear and see a worthy scholar speak, As children admire a peacock's feather.

[3592] Burton. Sequence page 142, printed 128, q: "Tu vero licet Orpheus sis, saxa sono testudinis emolliens, nisi plumbea eorum corda, auri vel argenti malleo emollias &c. Salisburiensis Policrat. lib. 5. c. 10." Though you are Orpheus, softening rocks with the sound of the lyre, unless you soften their leaden hearts with a hammer of gold or silver, and so on. John of Salisbury, Policraticus 5.10.

[3593] Editor. Apuleius does not attribute Psyche's lack of suitors to poverty or a missing dowry; Burton adds that explanation. John of Salisbury, Policraticus 5.10, located in Dickinson's translation, says that even Orpheus or Arion cannot move court officials without a golden or silver hammer to soften their leaden hearts. The surrounding passage also uses Ovid's rejected Homer and Cerberus. This confirms the source context; Burton's abbreviated Latin still needs direct collation against a Latin edition.

He shall have all the good words that may be given, [3596]a proper man, and 'tis pitty he hath no preferment, all good wishes, but inexorable, indurat as he is, he will not prefer him, though it be in his power, because he is indotatus, he hath no mony. Or if he do give him entertainment, let him be never so well qualified, plead affinity, consanguinity, sufficiency, he shall serve seven years, as Iacob did for Rachel, before he shall have it.	He will receive every kind word that can be offered: "A fine man! What a pity he has no appointment!" All good wishes—but the patron, unyielding and hard-hearted as he is, will not advance him, though he has the power, because the scholar is "without a dowry": he has no money. Or, if the patron does take him into his household, however well qualified he may be, however he pleads kinship by marriage or blood, or his own competence, he must serve seven years, as Jacob did for Rachel, before he receives the appointment.[3597]
[3598]If he will enter at first, he must yet in at that Simoniacal gate, come off soundly, and put in good security to performe all covenants, else he will not deale with, or admit him. But if some poor scholler, some parson chaff, will offer himself; some Trencher Chaplain, that will take it to the halfes, thirds, or accept of what he will give, he is welcome; be comformable, preach as he will have him, he likes him before a million of others; for the best is alwayes best cheap:	If he wants to enter at once, he must still come in through that simoniacal gate, pay handsomely and provide sound security that he will fulfil every condition; otherwise the patron will neither deal with him nor admit him. But if some poor scholar, some worthless parson offers himself—some table-fed chaplain who will take the living on halves or thirds, or accept whatever the patron will give—he is welcome. Let him conform and preach as the patron wishes, and he is preferred to a million others: for the best is always the cheapest.[3599]

[3598] Burton. Sequence page 142, printed 128, t: "Quatuor ad portas Ecclesias itur ad omnes; sanguinis aut Simonis, præsulis atque Dei. Holcot." Four doors lead to all churches: that of kinship, of Simon, of the bishop and of God. Holcot.

[3599] Editor. "Come off soundly" means pay heavily. Simony is the buying or selling of church office, named for Simon Magus (Acts 8.18–24); this explains the door of "Simon" in the Holcot margin. The reference to halves and thirds concerns accepting a share of the living's income. "Parson chaff" dismisses a worthless cleric. Printed comformable is retained.

and then as Hierom said to Cromatius, patellâ dignum operculum, such a Patron, such a Clark; the cure is well supplied, and all parties pleased.	And then, as Jerome said to Chromatius, “a lid worthy of the dish”: such a patron, such a clergyman. The parish is well provided for, and everyone is pleased.[3600]
So that is still verified in our age, which [3601]Chrysostome complained of in his time, Qui opulentiores sunt, in ordinem parasitorum cogunt eos, & ipsos tanquam canes ad mensas suas enutriunt, eorumque impudentes Ventres iniquarum cœnarum reliquiis differtiunt, iisdem pro arbitro abutentes:	So what Chrysostom complained of in his own time remains true in ours: “The wealthier men force them into the ranks of parasites and keep them at their tables like dogs, stuffing their shameless bellies with the remnants of unjust feasts and using them at will.”[3602]
Rich men keep these Lecturers, and fawning Parasites, like so many dogs at their tables, and filling their hungry guts with the offals of their meat, they abuse them at their pleasure, and make them say what they propose.	Rich men keep these lecturers and fawning parasites like so many dogs at their tables, fill their hungry guts with scraps from their meals, misuse them at pleasure and make them say whatever they prescribe.

[3600] Editor. The lid-and-dish proverb makes patron and dependent fit one another. Burton attributes it to Jerome writing to Chromatius; the exact letter or intermediary has not yet been established. “Cure” means the pastoral charge. The claim that it is well supplied is sarcastic.

[3602] Editor. Burton cites Chrysostom’s work on Babylas against the pagans. Its exact passage and Latin intermediary require collation. Printed pro arbitro is retained, with the sense “at will”. The English following the Latin is Burton’s own expanded gloss; “lecturers” here are religious teachers or preachers.

[3603]As children do by a bird or a butterflye in a string, pull in and let him out as they list, do they by their trencher Chaplaines, prescribe, command their wits, let in and out as to them it seems best. If the Patron be precise, so must his Chaplain be, if he be papistical, his Clark must be so too, or else be turned out.	As children treat a bird or butterfly on a string, pulling it in and letting it out as they please, so these men treat their table-fed chaplains: they lay down rules, command their minds, pull them in and let them out as they think best. If the patron is a strict Puritan, his chaplain must be one too; if he is a papist, his clergyman must also be one, or be turned out.[3604]
Source page 142–143 These are those Clarks which serve the turne, whom they commonly entertain, and present to Church livings, whilst in the mean time we that are University men, like so many hide-bound Calves in a Pasture, tarry out our time, wither away as a flower ungathered in a garden, & are never used: or as so many candles, illuminate our selves alone, obscuring one anothers light, & are not discerned here at all, the least of which, translated to a dark room, or to some Country benefice, where it might shine apart, would give a fair light, and be seen over all.	These are the clergymen who serve their purpose, whom they commonly employ and nominate to church livings. Meanwhile we university men, like so many stunted calves in a pasture, wait out our time and wither away like an unpicked flower in a garden, never put to use. Or, like so many candles, we light only ourselves, obscuring one another's light, and are not noticed here at all. Yet the least of us, moved to a dark room or some country living where he could shine on his own, would give a good light, visible everywhere.[3605]

[3604] Editor. "Precise" here denotes a Puritan or religious rigorist; "papistical" is Burton's polemical word for Catholic. Heinsius's Latin margin has a butterfly or caterpillar, while Burton's body text has a bird or butterfly. Both are preserved; the precise Heinsius passage remains unlocated.

[3605] Editor. "Hide-bound" describes an animal whose tight skin and poor condition prevent thriving; the modern rendering is "stunted". "Translated" means moved to another place. A benefice or church living is an endowed ecclesiastical post and its income.

[3606] Burton. Sequence page 143, star: "Joh. 5." John 5.

[3607] Editor. John 5.2–9 supplies the pool of Bethesda, the stirring of its water and the invalid who has no one to help him reach it before another person. Burton casts unsuccessful university applicants in that role. "Travel" here is travail or labour; "suit" is an appeal or petition.

[3608] Editor. Dilapidations were disrepair for which a holder of church property could be liable. First fruits were a payment based on the first year's income from a living; tenths an annual tenth. Subsidies and benevolences were further levies or contributions; procurations were payments associated with ecclesiastical visitations. A "crackt title" is a defective legal claim to the appointment.

This happened to Clenardus of Brabant with his rectorship and charge of the Beguines. No sooner was he inducted than he was sued: "And we began," he says, "to litigate fiercely and fight an implacable war." At last, after ten years of litigation—as long as the siege of Troy—when he had exhausted himself and spent his money, he was forced to abandon everything for the sake of peace and surrender it to his opponent.[3610]
Or else we are insulted over, and trampled on by domineering officers, fleeced by those greedy Harpyes to get more fees; we stand in fear of some precedent Lapse; we fall amongst refractory, seditious Sectaries, peevish Puritans, perverse Papists, a lascivious rout of Atheistical Epicures, that will not be reformed, or some litigious people, (those wild beasts of Ephesus, must be fought with) that will not pay their dues without much repining, or compelled by long suit;	Or else domineering officials insult us and trample on us; those greedy Harpies fleece us to obtain more fees. [3609] Burton. Sequence page 143, star: "Epist. lib. 2. Jam suffectus in locum demortui, protinus exortus est adversarius, &c. post multos labores, sumptus, &c." Letters, book 2. Having just been appointed in place of the deceased, an opponent immediately arose, and so on; after much labour and expense, and so on. The Latin compresses the construction; Clenardus is the person appointed.

[3610] Editor. Clenardus is the scholar Nicolas Cleynaerts. Beguines were women living a communal religious life; Burton refers to his charge connected with such a community. The Letters, book 2, passage has not yet been collated. The ten-year comparison invokes the traditional length of the Trojan War, and does not independently verify the lawsuit's duration.

[3611] Editor. A lapse could transfer the right to nominate to a living after failure to fill it within the required time, threatening a later appointment. "Peevish" means obstinate or perverse. Burton groups several hostile religious labels together; his "Epicureans" are supposed unbelieving pleasure-seekers. The beasts at Ephesus recall Paul's words in 1 Corinthians 15.32.

for Laici clericis oppido infesti, an old axiome, all they think well gotten that is had from the Church, and by such uncivil, harsh dealings, they make their poor Minister weary of his place, if not his life: and put case they be quiet honest men, make the best of it, as often it fals out, from a polite and terse Academick, he must turne rustick, rude, melancholick alone, learne to forget, or else, as many do, become Maulsters, Grasiers, Chapmen, &c. (now banished from the Academy, all commerce of the Muses, and confined to a country village, as Ovid was from Rome to Pontus,) and daily converse with a company of Idiots and Clownes.	For, as the old maxim has it, "laypeople are exceedingly hostile to the clergy." They think anything taken from the Church is a fair gain, and by such uncivil, harsh dealings they make their poor minister weary of his post, if not his life. And suppose they are peaceable, honest people—take the best case, as often happens: from a polished, refined university scholar he must become rustic and uncultivated, melancholy and alone, learning to forget; or else, as many do, turn maltster, grazier, merchant and so on. Banished from the university and all fellowship with the Muses, confined to a country village as Ovid was sent from Rome to Pontus, he must spend his days in the company of unlearned people and country boors.[3612]
Source page 143 [sequence] Nos interim quod attinet (nec enim immunes ab hac noxâ sumus) idem reatus manet, idem nobis, & si non multò gravius, crimen objici potest: nostrâ enim culpâ fit, nostrâ incuriâ, nostrâ avaritiâ, quod tam frequentes, fœdæque fiant in Ecclesiâ nundinationes, (templum est vænale, deusque) tot sordes invehantur, tanta grassetur impietas, tanta nequitia, tam insanus miseriarum Euripus, & turbarum æstuarium, nostro inquam, omnium (Academicorum imprimis) vitio fit.	As for us, meanwhile—for we are not free of this offence—the same guilt remains; the same charge, if not a much heavier one, can be brought against us. It is through our fault, our negligence, our greed that such frequent and shameful trafficking goes on in the Church—"the temple is for sale, and God too"—that so much filth is brought in, so much impiety and wickedness run rampant, such a mad Euripus of miseries, such a seething tide of troubles. It happens, I say, through the fault of us all, and especially of university men.[3613]

[3612] Editor. The maxim about lay hostility to clergy is retained as Burton's claim; its precise intermediary remains unlocated. "Polite" and "terse" mean polished and refined. Maltsters prepare malt, graziers raise livestock, and chapmen trade goods. "Idiots" means unlearned people; "clowns" rustic or uncultivated people. Ovid's exile to Tomis on the Black Sea supplies the final comparison.

[3613] Editor. Burton turns from the hardships of scholars to the universities' own responsibility, addressing fellow learned readers in Latin. Euripus, the strait beside Euboea, supplies an image of confused, shifting currents. Nundinationes means trading, here in spiritual offices and appointments. The parenthetical temple-for-sale saying remains unlocated.

We invite this evil ourselves and deserve every insult and every misery that meanwhile befalls us, since we do not do our utmost to resist it. For what can we expect when so many poor students, men of no known parentage and petty fellows of every rank are admitted to degrees each day, indiscriminately and in a rush? If they have learned one or two definitions and distinctions by heart and spent the customary number of years on dialectic, it does not matter what progress they have made or what sort of men they are: ignoramuses, triflers, idlers, gamblers, drinking companions, worthless men, servants of lust and pleasure—[3614]

Sometimes, I would add, they are presented with splendid praises of their conduct and learning. And when they are about to leave, they are honoured with testimonials, written most lavishly in their favour by men who undoubtedly sacrifice their own trustworthiness and reputation in doing so.

[3614] Editor. Resp. abbreviates respublica, the commonwealth. Dialectic is formal logic and disputation. Terræ filii, literally sons of the earth, disparages people of unknown or low birth; the contempt for social origin belongs to Burton's polemic. Admission to a degree is distinct from admission as a student.

[3615] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.2.28, comparing idle consumers with Penelope's suitors and the luxurious court of Alcinous in the Odyssey. Burton prints Penelopes where the consulted Latin text has Penelopae.

Doctores enim & Professores (quod ait [3616]ille) id unum curant, ut ex professionibus frequentibus, & tumultuariis potius quam legitimis, commoda sua promoveant, & ex dispendio publico suum faciant incrementum. Id solum in votis habent annui plerumque magistratus, ut ab incipientium numero [3617]pecunias emungant; nec multum interest qui sint, literatores an literati, modo pingues, nitidi, ad aspectum speciosi, & quod verbo dicam, pecuniosi sint.	For doctors and professors, as that author says, care only to advance their own interests through frequent academic ceremonies, hasty rather than properly conducted, and to increase their own wealth at the public's expense. For the most part, the officers appointed for the year want only to squeeze money from the number of candidates taking degrees. It matters little whether these are mere dabblers in letters or learned men, provided they are plump, sleek, handsome to look at and, to put it in one word, wealthy.[3618]
[3619]Philosophastri licentiantur in artibus, artem qui non habent; [3620]Eosque sapientes esse jubent, qui nullâ prædíti sunt sapientiâ, Et nihil ad gradum præterquam velle adferunt. Theologastri (solvant modo) satis superque docti, per omnes honorum gradus evehuntur & ascendunt.	Pretended philosophers are licensed in the arts though they possess no art; men with no wisdom are declared wise, and bring nothing to their degree except the wish to obtain it. Sham theologians—provided they pay—are more than learned enough; they are carried up and climb through every rank of honour.[3621]

[3616] Burton. Sequence page 144, y: "Jun. Acad. cap. 6." Junius, Academies, chapter 6; exact work and passage remain to be collated.

[3617] Burton. Sequence page 144, z: "Accipiamus pecuniam, demittamus asinum ut apud Patavinos, Italos." Let us take the money and send away the ass, as among the Italians of Padua.

[3618] Editor. The passage concerns paid degree conferrals and officers serving annual terms. Professionibus is rendered contextually as academic ceremonies, pending collation of the Junius passage. Incipientes are candidates commencing a degree. Literatores/literati contrasts shallow pretensions with actual learning; emungant, literally wipe their noses, means fleece or squeeze money from.

[3619] Burton. Sequence page 144, a: "Hos non ita pridem perstrinxi, in Philosophastro Comœdia latina, in Æde Christi Oxon. publice habita, Anno 1617. Feb. 16." Not long ago I satirized these men in Philosophaster, a Latin comedy publicly performed at Christ Church, Oxford, on 16 February 1617.

Atque hinc fit quod tam viles scurræ, tot passim Idiotæ, literarum crepusculo positi, larvæ pastorum, circumforanei, vagi, barbi, fungi, crassi, asini, merum pecus in sacrosanctos theologiæ aditus, illotis pedibus irrumpant, præter inverecundam frontem adferentes nihil, vulgares quasdam quisquilias, & scholarium quædam nugamenta, indigna quæ vel recipiantur in triviis.	Hence such vile buffoons, such crowds of ignoramuses, living in the twilight of learning—masks of pastors, market-place charlatans, vagrants, simpletons, blockheads, dullards, asses, nothing but cattle—burst with unwashed feet into theology's holy precincts. They bring nothing but a shameless face, some commonplace rubbish and a few scraps of schoolroom nonsense unworthy even of a place at the crossroads.[3622]
Hoc illud indignum genus hominum & famelicum, indigum, vagum, ventris mancipium, ad stivam potius relegandum, ad haras aptius quam ad aras, quod divinas hasce literas turpiter prostituit, hi sunt qui pulpita complent, in ædes nobilium irrepunt, & quum reliquis vitæ destituantur subsidiis, ob corporis & animi egestatem, aliarum in Repub. partium minimè capaces sint; ad sacram hanc anchoram confugiunt, sacerdotium quovis modo captantes, non ex sinceritate, quod [3623]Paulus ait, sed cauponantes verbum Dei.	This is that unworthy breed of men, hungry, needy, wandering, enslaved to their bellies, who ought rather to be sent back to the plough, fitter for pigsties than altars, and who shamefully prostitute these divine writings. These are the men who fill the pulpits and creep into noble houses. Lacking other means of livelihood and, through poverty of body and mind, unfit for any other role in the commonwealth, they flee to this sacred anchor, grasping at the priesthood by any means, "not in sincerity", as Paul says, but "peddling the word of God".[3624]

[3624] Editor. The Latin plays on haras/aras, pigsties/altars. The sacred anchor is a last refuge. The biblical passage is 2 Corinthians 2.17, not the printed 7.17: Paul contrasts trading in God's word with sincere speech. Burton's anchor is to the cleric's livelihood as well as the religious calling.

Ne quis interim viris bonis detractum quid putet, quos habet Ecclesia Anglicana quamplurimos, egregiè doctos, illustres, intactæ famæ homines, & plures forsan quam quævis Europæ provincia; ne quis à florentissimis Academiis, quæ viros undiquaque doctissimos, omni virtutum genere suspiciendos, abundè producunt. Et multò plures utraque habitura, multò splendidior futura, si non hæ sordes splendidum lumen ejus obfuscarent, obstaret corruptio, & cauponantes quidam Harpyæ, proletariique bonum hoc nobis non inviderent.	Let no one meanwhile suppose that I mean to detract from good men. The Church of England has very many of them: exceptionally learned, distinguished men of unblemished reputation, perhaps more than any other country in Europe. Nor do I mean to detract from our flourishing universities, which produce in abundance men of the widest learning, admirable for every kind of virtue. Both Church and universities would have many more such men and shine far more brightly if this filth did not darken their splendid light, if corruption did not obstruct them, and if certain trafficking Harpies and low fellows did not begrudge us this good.[3625]

[3625] Editor. Burton distinguishes his criticism of corrupt appointments from a condemnation of the Church of England or the universities generally. Harpies are mythological predators; proletarii is a disparaging term for people of the lowest rank, not the modern political category proletariat.

Nemo enim tam cæcâ mente, qui non hoc ipsum videat: nemo tam stolido ingenio, qui non intelligat; tam pertinaci judicio, qui non agnoscat, ab his idiotis circumforaneis, sacram pollui Theologiam, ac cœlestes Musas quasi prophanum quiddam prostitui. Viles animæ & effrontes (sic enim Lutherus [3626]alicubi vocat) lucelli causâ, ut muscæ ad mulctra, ad nobilium & heroum mensas advolant, in spem sacerdotii, cujuslibet honoris, officii, in quamvis aulam, urbem se ingerunt, ad quodvis se ministerium componunt.	For no one is so blind in mind as not to see this, so dull as not to understand it, or so obstinate in judgement as not to acknowledge that these ignorant charlatans pollute sacred theology and prostitute the heavenly Muses as though they were something profane. "Vile and shameless souls"—as Luther calls them somewhere—fly to the tables of nobles and great men for a little gain, like flies to milk-pails. In hope of a church appointment, any honour or office, they thrust themselves into any court or city and adapt themselves to any service:
—— Ut nervis alienis mobile lignum —— Ducitur ——	Like a wooden puppet, moved by another's strings, he is led about.[3627]
[3628]offam sequentes, psittacorum more, in prædæ spem quidvis effutiunt: obsecundantes Parasiti ([3629]Erasmus ait) quidvis docent, dicunt, scribunt, suadent, & contra conscientiam probant, non ut salutarem reddant gregem, sed ut magnificam sibi parent fortunam.	Chasing a morsel, like parrots, they blurt out anything in hope of a prize. "Obliging parasites," Erasmus says, "teach, say, write and recommend anything, and approve it against their conscience, not to bring their flock to salvation, but to secure a splendid fortune for themselves."

As Paul says, they seek "their own interests, not those of Jesus Christ": not the Lord's treasure, but treasure for themselves and their families. Nor is this confined to those of poorer fortune and low station. The evil has invaded the middle ranks, the highest, the exalted—not to say the bishops.[3632]
[3633]Dicite pontifices, in sacris quid facit aurum?	Tell me, priests, what business has gold in holy things?[3634]

[3631] Editor. McGill's sequence p. 144, without a printed page number, confirms ne non offendant, literally "lest they not offend". This reverses the surrounding argument. The modern version follows the contextual sense, as though ne offendant were intended; this is an editorial interpretation, not a verified correction from Luther. Rem divinam/rem suam contrasts God's business with private advantage; bonum can suggest welfare or wealth.

[3632] Editor. Philippians 2.21, adapted: self-interest displaces the interests of Christ. The progression from the poor to bishops makes the accusation apply across the ecclesiastical hierarchy.

[3634] Editor. Persius, Satire 2.69 (line numbering varies in displayed texts), where the consulted Latin reads in sancto, "in the sanctuary", rather than Burton's in sacris. Pontifices addresses priests; Burton applies the ancient satire to Christian clergy.

"Greed often drives the greatest men off course." Men who would outshine others in upright conduct carry the torch before them towards simony. Striking this rock of corruption, they do not shear the flock but skin it; wherever they go, they plunder, drain and scrape everything bare, making a terrible shipwreck of their reputation, if not of their soul. The evil seems to have flowed from the highest to the lowest, rather than from the lowest to the highest, making true that old jest: "He bought it first; he has a right to sell it."[3636]
Simoniacus enim (quod cum Leone dicam) gratiam non accepit, si non accipit, non habet, & si non habet, nec gratus potest esse; Tantum enim absunt istorum nonnulli, qui ad clavum sedent à promovendo reliquos, ut penitus impediant, probè sibi conscii, quibus artibus illic pervenerint.	For the simoniac—to speak with Leo—has not received grace; if he does not receive it, he does not have it, and if he does not have it, he cannot enjoy God's favour. Indeed, some of those who sit at the helm are so far from advancing others that they obstruct them altogether, knowing very well the arts by which they themselves arrived there.[3637]

[3636] Editor. Simony is the purchase or sale of spiritual office. The flock-to-skinning image makes pastoral care predatory. The exact Sallust wording and the epigram "He bought it first" have not yet been located; Burton's attributions are preserved without supplying a guessed source.

[3637] Editor. The argument turns on gratia/gratus, grace and being acceptable or in favour. "Enjoy God's favour" interprets gratus in this theological context; it does not silently substitute "give grace". The precise text attributed to Leo remains unlocated. Those at the helm are the holders of power and patronage.

Hinc tam frequens simonia, hinc ortæ querelæ, fraudes, imposturæ, ab hoc fonte derivarunt omnes nequitiæ. Ne quid obiter dicam de ambitione, Adulatione plusquam aulicâ, ne tristi domicœnio laborent, de luxu, de fœdo nonnunquam vitæ exemplo, quo nonnullos offendunt, de compotatione Sybaritica &c.	Hence the frequency of simony; hence complaints, frauds and impostures; from this spring flow all the wicked practices. I say nothing in passing of ambition, of flattery beyond even a courtier's—so that they need not endure the dreariness of dining at home—of luxury, of the sometimes foul example of their lives that causes others to stumble, or of their Sybaritic drinking parties, and so on.[3639]
Hinc ille squalor Academicus, tristes hac tempestate Camenæ, quum quivis homunculus artium ignarus, his artibus assurgat, hunc in modum promoveatur & ditescat, ambitiosis appellationibus insignis, & multis dignitatibus augustus vulgi oculos perstringat, benè se habeat, & grandia gradiens majestatem quandam ac amplitudinem præ se ferens, miramque sollicitudinem, barbâ reverendus, togâ nitidus, purpurâ coruscus, supellectilis splendore, & famulorum numero maximè conspicuus.	Hence the university's squalor, hence the sorrow of the Muses in our age: any petty fellow ignorant of the arts may rise by these arts, gain promotion and wealth in this way, dazzle the crowd with high-sounding titles and a multitude of imposing dignities, and live comfortably. He strides along, displaying a certain majesty and grandeur, and a wonderful air of care: venerable in his beard, splendid in his gown, glittering in purple, conspicuous above all for his magnificent furnishings and numerous servants.[3640]
[3641]Quales statuæ (quod ait ille) quæ sacris in ædibus columnis imponuntur, velut oneri cedentes videntur, ac si insudarent, quum revera sensu sint carentes, & nihil saxeam adjuvent firmitatem: Atlantes videri volunt, quum sint statuæ lapideæ, umbratiles revera homunciones, fungi forsan & bardi, nihil à saxo differentes.	They resemble those statues, as that author says, set upon columns in sacred buildings: they appear to bend beneath a load, as though sweating, when in fact they have no feeling and add nothing to the strength of the stone. They want to look like Atlases, though they are stone statues, mere shadows of men in reality, perhaps blockheads and dullards, no different from a rock.[3642]

[3639] Editor. Domicœnium is dining at home: flattery secures invitations to better tables. Sybaritic recalls the proverbial luxury of ancient Sybaris. "Cause others to stumble" conveys the religious force of offendunt as well as ordinary offence.

[3640] Editor. Camenæ are the Muses. The repeated artibus contrasts scholarly arts with the tricks by which the unlearned gain advancement. Sollicitudinem is rendered as an outward air of care or concern, part of the display of office.

[3641] Burton. Sequence page 145, printed 141, i: "Budeus de Asse lib. 5." Guillaume Budé, De asse, book 5.

[3642] Editor. Atlantes, plural of Atlas, likens pretended pillars of the institution to figures apparently bearing a weight. Budé's exact passage in De asse 5 remains for collation. Fungi and bardi repeat the charge of dullness beneath imposing appearances.

Quum interim docti viri, & vitæ sanctioris ornamentis prædiți, qui æstum diei sustinent, his iniquâ sorte serviant, minimo forsan salario contenti, puris nominibus nuncupati, humiles, obscuri, multoque digniores licet, egentes, inhonorati vitam privatam agant, tenuique sepulti sacerdotio, vel in collegiis suis in æternum incarcerati, inglorie delitescant.	Meanwhile learned men, endowed with the graces of a holier life, who bear the heat of the day, are unfairly condemned to serve them, perhaps content with the smallest salary, known by their plain names, humble and obscure. Though far more deserving, they live privately in poverty and without honour, buried in a meagre church living, or imprisoned for ever in their colleges, hidden away without renown.[3643]
Sed nolo diutius hanc movere sentinam, hinc illæ lachrymæ, lugubris musarum habitus, [3644]hinc ipsa religio (quod cum Secellio dicam) in ludibrium & contemptum adducitur, abjectum sacerdotium (atque hæc ubi fiunt, ausim dicere, & putidum [3645]putidi dicterium de clero usurpare) Putidum vulgus, inops, rude, sordidum, melancholicum, miserum, despicabile, contemnendum.	But I will stir this cesspool no longer. Hence those tears, the Muses' mourning dress; hence religion itself—to speak with Seyssel—is brought into ridicule and contempt, and the priesthood debased. Where these things happen, I would venture to apply that foul man's foul taunt to the clergy: "A foul rabble, penniless, uncultivated, filthy, melancholy, miserable, despicable, contemptible."[3646]

[3643] Editor. Bearing the heat of the day recalls the labourers in Matthew 20.12. Puris nominibus means plain names, without the grand titles enjoyed by the unworthy. A tenuis sacerdotium is a poorly endowed church appointment.

[3646] Editor. Secellius is Claude de Seyssel. Campian is Edmund Campion; Burton's scornful putidum putidi repeats "foul" against the author and his taunt. The exact Seyssel and Campion passages have not been independently located. Burton ends the digression by returning to the word melancholy.

Of those remote, outward, ambient, Necessary causes, I have sufficiently discoursed in the precedent member, the Non-necessary follow: of which, saith [3647]Fuchsius, no art can be made, by reason of their uncertainty, casualty, and multitude; so called not necessary because according to [3648]Fernelius they may be avoided, and used without necessitie. Many of these accidental causes, which I shall entreat of here, might have well been reduced to the former, because they cannot be avoided, but casually happen to us, though accidentally, and unawares, at some time or other: the rest are contingent and inevitable, and more properly inserted in this rank of causes. To reckon up all is a thing unpossible; of some therefore more remarkable of these contingent causes which produce Melancholy, I will briefly speak and in their order.	I have discussed those remote, external, surrounding, necessary causes sufficiently in the preceding member. The non-necessary causes follow. Of these, Fuchs says, no systematic art can be formed because they are uncertain, accidental and so numerous. They are called non-necessary because, according to Fernel, they may be avoided or made use of without necessity. Many of the accidental causes I shall discuss here might well have been placed in the former class, because they cannot be avoided but happen to us by chance, accidentally and unexpectedly, at one time or another. The rest are contingent and unavoidable, and more properly placed in this class of causes. It is impossible to list them all; I shall therefore speak briefly, in order, of some of the more remarkable contingent causes that produce melancholy.[3649]

[3649] Editor. Non-necessary is a category in Burton’s account of causes, not a claim that these causes are unreal. “Contingent and inevitable” is the source’s wording, despite the preceding distinction between avoidable and unavoidable causes; the translation retains its inconsistency. An intended evitable, “avoidable”, is possible but is not silently substituted.

[3650]From a childs Nativity, the first ill accident that can likely befall him, in this kinde is a bad Nurse, by whose means alone he may be tainted with this malady from his cradle. Aulus Gellius l. 12. c. 1. brings in Phavorinus that eloquent Philosopher, proving this at large, [3651]that there is the same vertue and property in the milk as in the seed, and not in men alone, but in all other creatures:	From a child's birth, the first misfortune of this kind likely to befall him is a bad nurse, through whom alone he may be infected with this malady from his cradle. Aulus Gellius, book 12, chapter 1, introduces that eloquent philosopher Favorinus, proving at length that milk has the same power and properties as seed, not only in human beings but in all other creatures.[3652]

[3651] Burton. Sequence page 146, printed 142, o: "Sicut valet ad fingendas corporis atque animi similitudines vis & natura seminis, sic quoque, lactis proprietas. Neque id in hominibus solum, sed in pecudibus animadversum. Nam si ovium lacte hædi, aut caprarum agni alerentur, constat fieri in his lanam duriorem, in illis capillum gigni teneriorem." As the power and nature of seed shape the likenesses of body and mind, so too does the property of milk. This has been observed not only in human beings but in cattle: if kids are fed on sheep's milk, or lambs on goats' milk, the lambs' wool becomes harder and the kids' hair softer.

[3652] Editor. Nurse here means wet nurse. Seed means reproductive seed, and temperature elsewhere in the passage means humoral constitution. Gellius, Attic Nights 12.1.14–20, reports Favorinus's argument that milk shapes body and character. This is historical physiology and moral speculation, not established evidence that a nurse's character passes through her milk.

he gives instance in a Kid and Lamb, if either of them suck of the others milk; the Lamb of the Goats, or the Kid of the Ewes, the wool of the one will be hard, and the hair of the other soft. Giraldus Cambrensis Itinerar. Cambriæ l. 1. c. 2. confirmes this by a notable example which happened in his time. A sow-pig by chance sucked a Brach, and when he was grown, [3653]would miraculously hunt all manner of Dear, and that as well, or rather better than any ordinary hound. His conclusion is, [3654]that men and beasts participate of her nature and conditions, by whose milk they are fed.	He gives the example of a kid and a lamb: if either drinks the other's milk, the lamb drinking the goat's, or the kid the ewe's, the wool of the one will be hard and the hair of the other soft. Gerald of Wales confirms this in his Journey through Wales, book 1, chapter 2, with a remarkable example from his own time. A female piglet happened to suckle a female hound, and when it grew up it would hunt every kind of deer wonderfully well—as well as, or rather better than, any ordinary hound. His conclusion is that human beings and animals share the nature and disposition of the female whose milk feeds them.[3655]
Phavorinus urgeth it farther, and demonstrates it more evidently, that if a Nurse be [3656]mis-shapen, unchast, unhonest, impudent, drunk, cruel, or the like, the child that sucks upon her brest will be so too; all other affections of the minde and diseases, are almost ingrafed, as it were, and imprinted into the temperature of the Infant by the Nurses milk; as Pox, Leprosie, Melancholy, &c.	Favorinus presses the point further and demonstrates it more clearly: if a nurse is misshapen, unchaste, dishonest, shameless, drunken, cruel or the like, the child who sucks at her breast will be so too. All other affections of the mind and diseases—pox, leprosy, melancholy and so on—are almost grafted, as it were, and imprinted into the infant's constitution by the nurse's milk.

[3653] Burton. Sequence page 146, printed 142, p: "Adulta in ferarum persecutione ad miraculum usque sagax." When grown, extraordinarily keen in the pursuit of wild animals.

[3654] Burton. Sequence page 146, printed 142, b: "Tam animal quodlibet quam homo, ab illâ cujus lacte nutritur, naturam contrahit." Every animal, as well as a human being, acquires its nature from the female whose milk nourishes it. The marginal marker is printed b in the place where q would be expected.

[3655] Editor. Brach means a female hound; Dear means deer. The sow story is present in Gerald of Wales, Journey through Wales 1.2. Its presence in that source confirms Burton's literary example, not its biological claim. Burton calls the pig he after identifying it as a sow; the translation uses it.

[3656] Burton. Sequence page 146, printed 142, r: "Improba, informis, impudica, temulenta nutrix &c. quoniam in moribus efformandis magnam sæpe partem ingenii altricis & natura lactis tenet." A wicked, misshapen, unchaste, drunken nurse, and so on: because in forming character the nurse's disposition and the nature of her milk often play a large part. Printed ingenii is retained; the intended sense is the disposition of the nurse.

Cato for some such reason would make his servants children suck upon his wives brest, because by that means they would love him and his the better, and in all likelihood agree with them. A more evident example that the minds are altered by milk, cannot be given, than that of Dion, which he relates of Caligula's cruelty; it could neither be imputed to father nor mother, but to his cruel nurse alone, that anointed her paps with bloud stil when he sucked which made him such a murderer, and express for cruelty to an hair:	For some such reason Cato used to have his servants' children suck at his wife's breast, because this would make them love him and his family better and, in all likelihood, get along with them. No clearer example that minds are altered by milk could be given than Dion's account of Caligula's cruelty. It could be blamed on neither father nor mother, but solely on his cruel nurse, who always smeared her nipples with blood when he suckled. This made him such a murderer, reproducing her cruelty to a hair.[3657]

[3659]Et si delira fuerit, (one observes) infantulum delirum faciet, if she be a fool or dolt, the child she nurseth will take after her, or otherwise be misaffected; which Franciscus Barbarus l. 2. c. ult. de re uxoriâ proves at ful, and [3660]Ant. Guivarra lib. 2. de Marco Aurelio: the childe will surely participate.	And there is Tiberius, who was a habitual drunkard because his nurse was one. "And if she is witless," one observer says, "she will make the infant witless." If she is a fool or dullard, the child she nurses will take after her or be harmed in some other way, as Francesco Barbaro proves fully in the last chapter of book 2 of On Marriage, and Antonio de Guevara in book 2 of his Marcus Aurelius: the child will surely share her qualities.[3661]

[3657] Editor. Compare Plutarch, Cato the Elder 20.3: Cato's wife nurses enslaved children to encourage affection for her son. "Servants" in Burton's Roman example means enslaved members of the household. The Caligula anecdote is left as Burton's attributed report, not an independently established account; express means an exact likeness.

[3659] Burton. Sequence page 146, printed 142, t: "Lib. 2. de Cæsaribus." Book 2, On the Caesars. Corrected from the draft's 1: both the McGill and BSB copies of 1651 print 2. No author is named; the work and intended passage remain unidentified.

[3660] Burton. Sequence page 146, printed 142, u: "Beda c. 27. l. 1. Eccles. hist." Bede, Ecclesiastical History 1.27. In Gregory's answer to Augustine's eighth question, mothers are criticized for giving their infants to other women to nurse. This concerns maternal nursing and continence, not the preceding imperial anecdotes or transmission of mental traits. The citation's precise local attachment remains uncertain.

[3661] Editor. Burton's examples treat drunkenness and mental traits as transmissible through nursing. Marcus Aurelius here is mediated by Antonio de Guevara, not a verified quotation from the emperor's Meditations. Delira/delirum is rendered witless; it need not mean clinical delirium. The adjoining Bede reference concerns mothers nursing their own children, not evidence for inherited drunkenness or foolishness. The Dion anecdote and the anonymous De Cæsaribus passage remain unverified.

Source page 147 [sequence; printed 143] For bodily sickness there is no doubt to be made. Titus, Vespasians son was therefore sickly, because the Nurse was so, Lampridius. And if we may believe Physicians, many times children catch the pox from a bad Nurse, Botaldus cap. 61. de lue vener. Besides evil attendance, negligence, and many gross inconveniences, which are incident to Nurses, much danger may so come to the childe.	As for bodily sickness, there can be no doubt. Titus, Vespasian's son, was sickly because his nurse was so—Lampridius. And, if we may believe physicians, children often catch the pox from a bad nurse: Botallo, chapter 61 of On Venereal Disease. Besides, poor care, negligence and many serious failings to which nurses are prone may expose the child to great danger.[3662]
[3663]For these causes Aristotle Polit. lib. 7. c. 17. Phavorinus and Marcus Aurelius would not have a childe put to Nurse at all, but every mother to bring up her own, of what condition soever she be; for a sound and able mother to put out her childe to nurse, is naturæ intemperies, so [3664]Guatso cals it, 'tis fit therefore she should be nurse her self: the mother will be more careful, loving and attendant, then any servile woman, or such hired creatures; this all the world acknowledgeth, convenientissimum est (as Rod. à Castro de nat. mulierum lib. 4. c. 12. in many words confesseth) matrem ipsam lactare infantem, who denies that it should be so?	For these reasons Aristotle, in Politics, book 7, chapter 17, Favorinus and Marcus Aurelius would have no child put out to nurse at all, but every mother bring up her own, whatever her station. For a healthy mother capable of nursing to send her child out to nurse is "a disorder of nature", as Guazzo calls it. She should therefore nurse the child herself. The mother will be more careful, loving and attentive than any serving-woman or such hired creatures: everyone acknowledges this. "It is most fitting"—as Rodrigo de Castro acknowledges at length in On the Nature of Women, book 4, chapter 12—"for the mother herself to suckle the infant." Who denies that it should be so?[3665]

and which some women most curiously observe: amongst the rest, [3666]that Queen of France, a Spaniard by birth, that was so precise and zealous in this behalf, that when in her absence a strange nurse had suckled her childe, she was never quiet till she had made the infant vomit it up again. But she was too jealous.	Some women observe this most scrupulously. Among them was that queen of France, a Spaniard by birth, who was so strict and zealous in this matter that, when another nurse had suckled her child in her absence, she would not rest until she had made the infant vomit the milk up again. But she was too possessive.[3667]
If it be so, as many times it is, they must be put forth, the mother be not fit or well able to be a nurse, I would then advise such mothers, as [3668]Plutarch doth in his book de liberis educandis, and [3669]S. Hierome li. 2. epist. 27. Lætæ de institut. fil. Magninus part. 2. Reg. sanit. cap. 7. and the said Rodericus that they make choice of a sound woman, of a good complexion, honest, free from bodily diseases; if it be possible, all passions and perturbations of the minde, as sorrow, fear, grief, [3670]folly, melancholy. For such passions corrupt the milk, and alter the temperature of the childe, which now being [3671]Udum & molle lutum, is easily seasoned and perverted.	If, as often happens, children must be sent out because the mother is unfit or unable to nurse, I would advise such mothers—as Plutarch does in On the Education of Children, and St Jerome in book 2, letter 27, to Laeta on bringing up her daughter; Magninus in part 2, chapter 7 of his Regimen of Health; and the same Rodrigo—to choose a healthy, honest woman of a good constitution, free from bodily diseases and, if possible, from all passions and disturbances of the mind, such as sorrow, fear, grief, folly and melancholy. For such passions corrupt the milk and alter the child's constitution, which, being as yet "wet and soft clay", readily takes an impression and is distorted.[3672]

[3667] Editor. Curiously means scrupulously, not inquisitively; strange means outside the household. Burton supplies neither the queen's name nor a title for Stephanus's work. The identification and historical basis of the anecdote remain open. His own qualification, "too jealous", checks the example's extremity.

[3672] Editor. The work transmitted under Plutarch's name is On the Education of Children, especially chapter 5 on mothers and nurses. Jerome's letter to Laeta is 107 in modern numbering; section 4 discusses the nurse's behaviour. Persius, Satire 3.23, supplies wet and soft clay. Burton combines moral character, illness and humoral temperament within the same model of early formation.

And if such a nurse may be found out, that will be diligent and careful withall, let Phavorinus and M. Aurelius plead how they can against it, I had rather accept of her in some cases then the mother herself, and which Bonacialus the Physician, Nic. Biesius the politician, lib. 4. de repub. cap. 8. approves, [3673]Some nurses are much to be preferred to some mothers.	And if such a nurse can be found, diligent and careful as well, then let Favorinus and Marcus Aurelius argue against it as they will: in some cases I would rather choose her than the mother herself. The physician Bonaccioli and the political writer Nicolas Biesius, in book 4, chapter 8 of On the Commonwealth, approve the same view: some nurses are greatly to be preferred to some mothers.[3674]
For why may not the mother be naught, a peevish drunken flurt, a waspish cholerick slut, a crazed peece, a fool, (as many mothers are) unsound as soon as the nurse? There is more choice of nurses then mothers; and therefore except the mother be most vertuous, staid, a woman of excellent good parts, and of a sound complexion, I would have all children in such cases committed to discreet strangers.	For why may not the mother be wicked, a bad-tempered drunken hussy, a waspish, angry slattern, a deranged creature, a fool—as many mothers are—and as unsound as the nurse? There is more choice of nurses than of mothers. Therefore, unless the mother is thoroughly virtuous, steady, a woman of excellent abilities and a healthy constitution, I would have all children in such cases entrusted to sensible women outside the family.
And 'tis the only way; as by marriage they are engrafted to other families to alter the breed, or if any thing be amisse in the mother, as Ludovicus Mercatus contends, Tom. 2. lib. de morb. hæred. to prevent diseases and future maladies, to correct and qualifie the childes ill-disposed temperature, which he had from his parents. This is an excellent remedy, if good choice be made of such a Nurse.	And this is the only way—just as through marriage they are grafted into other families to change the stock—if anything is wrong with the mother, to prevent diseases and future maladies, and to correct and moderate the child's disordered constitution inherited from his parents, as Luis Mercado argues in volume 2, in his book On Hereditary Diseases. This is an excellent remedy if a good choice is made of such a nurse.[3675]

[3674] Editor. Politician means a writer on government. Bonacialus is generally identified with the physician Ludovico Bonaccioli. Burton now qualifies his earlier preference for maternal nursing: a suitable wet nurse may be better. The reversal is part of his argument and is retained.

[3675] Editor. The grafting comparison links marriage, inherited constitution and the supposed formative effect of a nurse's milk. Qualifie means temper or moderate, not make eligible. Burton's assertions about changing hereditary traits through nursing belong to the historical theory under discussion.

Source page 148 [sequence; printed 144] SUBSECT. 2. Education a cause of Melancholy.	Subsection 2 Education as a cause of melancholy.
Education, of these accidental causes of Melancholy, may justly challenge the next place, for if a man escape a bad nurse he may be undone by evil bringing up. [3676]Iason Pratensis puts this of Education for a principal cause; bad parents, step-mothers, Tutors, Masters, Teachers, too rigorous, too severe, too remisse or indulgent on the other side, are often fountains and furtherers of this disease.	Among these accidental causes of melancholy, education may justly claim the next place, for someone who escapes a bad nurse may be ruined by a bad upbringing. Jason Pratensis places education among the principal causes. Bad parents, stepmothers, tutors, masters and teachers, too rigorous or severe—or, at the other extreme, too lax or indulgent—often originate and promote this disease.
Parents and such as have the tuition and oversight of children, offend many times in that they are too stern, alway threatning, chiding, brawling, whipping or striking; by means of which, their poor children are so disheartned and cowed, that they never after have any courage, a merry hour in their lives, or take pleasure in any thing. There is a great moderation to be had in such things, as matters of so great moment, to the making or marring of a childe.	Parents and others entrusted with the care and supervision of children often go wrong by being too stern, always threatening, scolding, shouting, whipping or hitting. Their poor children become so disheartened and cowed that they never afterwards have any courage, a happy hour in their lives, or pleasure in anything. Great moderation is needed in such matters, which mean so much to the making or ruining of a child.

Some fright their children with beggars, bugbears, and hobgoblins, if they cry, or be otherways unruly: but they are much too blame in it, many times, saith Lavater de spectris, part. 1. cap. 5. ex metu in morbos graves incidunt & noctu dormientes clamant, for fear they fall into many diseases, and cry out in their sleep, and are much the worse for it all their lives: these things ought not at all, or to be sparingly done, & upon just occasion.	Some frighten their children with beggars, bogeymen and hobgoblins if they cry or are otherwise unruly; but they are much to blame for doing so. Often, says Lavater in On Ghosts, part 1, chapter 5, "through fear they fall into serious diseases and cry out at night in their sleep": fear brings on many diseases, makes them cry out in their sleep and leaves them much the worse for it throughout their lives. These things should not be done at all, or only sparingly and for a good reason.[3677]
Tyrannical, impatient, haire-brain Schoolmasters, aridi magistri, so [3678]Fabius termes them, Ajaces flagelliferi, are in this kinde as bad as hangmen and executioners, they make many children endure a martyrdom all the while they are at schoole, with bad diet, if they boord in their houses, too much severity and ill usage, they quite pervert their temperature of body and minde:	Tyrannical, impatient, hare-brained schoolmasters—"barren teachers", as Fabius calls them, "whip-bearing Ajaxes"—are as bad in this respect as hangmen and executioners. They make many children endure a martyrdom throughout their schooldays. With poor food, if the children board in their houses, excessive severity and ill-treatment, they utterly distort their constitution of body and mind.[3679]

[3679] Editor. Fabius is Marcus Fabius Quintilianus, Quintilian. Institutio oratoria 2.4.8 compares a dry or barren teacher with soil lacking moisture for young plants. "Whip-bearing Ajax" evokes the raging Ajax of classical tragedy; Burton pluralizes the figure into a class of violent teachers.

still chiding, rayling, frowning, lashing, tasking, keeping, that they are fracti animis, moped many times, weary of their lives, [3680]nimiâ severitate deficiunt & desperant, and think no slavery in the world (as once I did my self) like to that of a Grammar scholar. Præceptorum ineptiis discruciantur ingenia puerorum, saith Erasmus, they tremble at his voice, looks, coming in.	Always scolding, railing, frowning, lashing, setting tasks and keeping them in, they leave the children "broken in spirit", often stupefied and weary of life: "through excessive severity they lose heart and despair". They think no slavery in the world—as I once thought myself—equals that of a grammar-school pupil. "Children's minds are tortured by their teachers' foolishness," says Erasmus. They tremble at the teacher's voice, his looks, his entrance.[3681]
S. Austin in the first book of his confess. & 4. ca. cals this schooling meticulosam necessitatem, and elsewhere a martyrdome, and confesseth of himself, how cruelly he was tortured in minde for learning Greek, nulla verba noveram, & sævis terroribus & pœnis, ut nossem, instabatur mihi vehementer, I know nothing and with cruel terrors and punishment I was daily compell'd.	St Augustine, in the first book of his Confessions, chapter 4, calls this schooling "a fearful compulsion", and elsewhere a martyrdom. He confesses how cruelly his mind was tortured in learning Greek: "I knew none of the words, and they pressed me violently, with savage terrors and punishments, to learn them." I knew nothing, and was compelled daily with cruel terrors and punishment.[3682]

[3681] Editor. Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 2.4.10, warns that excessive correction makes children lose heart and attempt nothing. Burton's first-person memory of grammar school interrupts the borrowed authorities. Grammar school centred on the classical languages; keeping is detention, and moped here means stunned or mentally numbed.

[3682] Editor. The relevant passage is Augustine, Confessions 1.14.23, not the printed "4. ca." His account contrasts coerced Greek learning with the Latin he acquired through ordinary interaction. Burton's fresh Latin quotation and his shorter English gloss are kept separately. Meticulosam necessitatem is fearful compulsion.

Beza complains similarly of a harsh schoolmaster in Paris whose continual thunder and threats once made him think of drowning himself. He would have done so had he not met an uncle on the way, who rescued him from that misery for the time by taking him into his house. Trincavelli, in book 1, consultation 16, had a patient nineteen years old, extremely melancholy "because of excessive study, and the threats of Tarvitius and his teacher": because of too much study and his tutor's threats.[3685]

[3687] Editor. Micio and Demea are the indulgent and stern brothers of Terence's Adelphoe. The Latin about foolish leniency occurs in act 3, scene 4, spoken by Syrus. Noise means a band or company of musicians; Burton's punishment is deliberately ironic. The source prints Two for Too.

[3688] Burton. Sequence page 149, printed 145, star: "Idem. Ac. 1. sc. 2." The same author, act 1, scene 2. The verse is composite; see the editorial note.

[3689] Editor. This is a composite quotation. The perfume, broken doors and torn clothing recall Adelphoe 1.2, especially lines 116–120, but Burton changes the wording and adds material. The final "faciat…Sumat, consumat, perdat" comes from Heauton timorumenos (The Self-Tormentor), 464–465. The "Amat?" line appears in the Parry edition of Adelphi 1.2, though absent from the Latin Library text consulted. Burton's whole composite is translated as printed.

[3690] Editor. "Tu illum corrumpi sinis" is Demea's reproach in Adelphoe 1.2. The prediction of destitution and flight into military service occurs in act 3, scene 4; the consulted text has videre videor, not Burton's prævidere videor. Burton joins passages from different scenes and supplies his own short glosses.

So parents often erre, many fond mothers especially, dote so much upon their children, like [3691]Æsops Ape, till in the end they crush them to death, Corporum nutrices animarum novercæ, pampering up their bodies to the undoing of their souls: they will not let them be [3692]corrected or controled, but still soothed up in every thing they do, that in conclusion, they bring sorrow, shame, heaviness to their parents (Ecclus cap. 30. 8, 9. become wanton, stubborn, wilful, and disobedient; rude, naught, head-strong, incorrigible, and graceless;	So parents often err, especially many foolishly fond mothers, who dote on their children like Aesop's ape until in the end they crush them to death: "nurses of their bodies, stepmothers of their souls", pampering their bodies to their souls' undoing. They will not let them be corrected or restrained, but insist that they be indulged in everything they do, until in the end they "bring sorrow, shame and grief to their parents" (Ecclesiasticus, chapter 30, verses 8–9), and become wanton, stubborn, wilful and disobedient: rude, wicked, headstrong, incorrigible and graceless.[3693]
They love them so foolishly, saith [3694]Cardan, that they rather seem to hate them, bringing them not up to vertue but injury, not to learning but to riot, not to sober life and conversation, but to all pleasure and licentious behaviour.	They love them so foolishly, says Cardano, that they seem rather to hate them, bringing them up for wrongdoing instead of virtue, for riotous living instead of learning, for every pleasure and kind of licence instead of a sober life and conduct.

[3692] Burton. Sequence page 149, printed 145, f: "Prov. 13. 24. He that spareth the rod hates his son."

[3693] Editor. Fond means foolishly doting. The ape that kills its young by embracing it too tightly exemplifies destructive affection. Ecclesiasticus is Sirach, distinct from Ecclesiastes. The marginal Proverbs reference expresses Burton's defence of correction alongside his criticism of terror and cruelty; his argument is for a middle course, not an unqualified rejection of discipline.

[3694] Burton. Sequence page 149, printed 145, g: "Lib. 2 de consol. Book 2, On Consolation: we love children so foolishly that we seem rather to hate them, educating them not for virtue but wrongdoing, not for learning but luxury, not for virtue but pleasure.

Who is he of so litle experience that knows not this of Fabius to be true? [3695]Education is another nature altering the minde and will, and I would to God (saith he) we our selves did not spoile our childrens manners, by our overmuch cockering and nice education, and weaken the strength of their bodies and mindes, that causeth custom, custom nature, &c.	Who has so little experience that he does not know this saying of Fabius to be true? Education is a second nature, altering the mind and will. And would to God, he says, that we ourselves did not spoil our children's characters by excessive coddling and delicate upbringing, weakening the strength of their bodies and minds. This creates habit, and habit becomes nature, and so on.[3696]
For these causes Plutarch in his book de lib. educ. and Hierom. epist. lib. 1. epist. 17. to Læta de institut. filiæ, gives a most special charge to all parents, and many good cautions about bringing up of children, that they be not committed to undiscreet, passionate, bedlam Tutors, light, giddy headed, or covetous persons, and spare for no cost, that they may be well nurtured and taught, it being a matter of so great consequence.	For these reasons Plutarch, in On the Education of Children, and Jerome, in book 1, letter 17, to Laeta on bringing up her daughter, give parents a most particular charge and many good cautions about raising children. They must not entrust them to indiscreet, hot-tempered, mad tutors, or to frivolous, giddy or greedy people. They must spare no expense to have them well brought up and taught, since the matter is of such great consequence.[3697]

[3696] Editor. Cockering means coddling or pampering; nice education is an over-delicate upbringing. The quoted material beginning with the wish not to spoil children, and the movement from habit to nature, is in Quintilian, Institutio oratoria 1.2.6–8, rather than the printed 1.3. The opening second-nature maxim is not identified there.

[3697] Editor. The Jerome reference varies from the earlier book 2, letter 27 to book 1, letter 17; both point by addressee and subject to the letter to Laeta, modern Letter 107. Bedlam means mad or crazed. The passage from On the Education of Children 7 urges careful choice of tutors rather than appointments through favour or cheapness.

For such parents as do otherwise, Plutarch esteemes of them, [3698]that are more careful of their shooes then of their feet, that rate their wealth above their children. And he, saith Cardan, that leaves his son to a covetous Schoolemaster to be informed, or to a close Abby to fast and learn wisdome together, [3699]doth no other, then that he be a learned fool, or a sickly wise man.	Parents who do otherwise, Plutarch considers, care more for their shoes than for their feet and value their wealth above their children. And the man, says Cardano, who leaves his son with a greedy schoolmaster to be educated, or shuts him in an abbey to fast and learn wisdom together, does nothing but make him a learned fool or a sickly wise man.[3700]

[3700] Editor. The shoe-and-foot comparison is in On the Education of Children 7 (Moralia 3E). The Juvenal margin condenses Satire 7.187–188, where a father spends less on his son’s education than on household luxuries. Burton’s “nothing matters less” broadens Juvenal’s financial comparison. “Informed” means educated; a close abbey is an enclosed monastery. Cardano’s De sapientia 3 still needs direct collation.

Tully in the 4. of his Tusculans, distinguisheth these terrors which arise from the apprehension of some terrible object heard or seen, from other fears, and so doth Patritius lib. 5. Tit. 4. de regis institut.	Cicero, in book 4 of his Tusculan Disputations, distinguishes these terrors, arising from the perception of some dreadful thing heard or seen, from other fears. So does Patrizi in book 5, title 4 of On the Education of a King.[3701]
Of all fears they are most pernicious and violent, and so suddainly alter the whole temperature of the body, move the soul, and spirits, strik such a deep impression, that the parties can never be recovered, causing more grievous and fiercer Melancholy, as Felix Plater, c. 3. de mentis alienat.[3702] speakes out of his experience, then any inward cause whatsoever: and imprints it self so forcibly in the spirits, brain, humors, that if all the mass of bloud were let out of the body, it could hardly be extracted. This horrible kinde of Melancholy (for so he tearmes it) had been often brought before him, and troubles and affrights commonly men and women, young and old of all sorts.	Of all fears, these are the most harmful and violent. They change the body's entire constitution so suddenly, stir the soul and spirits, and leave so deep an impression that those affected can never recover. They cause graver and more violent melancholy than any internal cause whatever, as Felix Plater says from experience in chapter 3 of On Mental Alienation: it imprints itself so forcibly on the spirits, brain and humours that, even if all the blood were drained from the body, it could hardly be removed. This horrible kind of melancholy, as he calls it, had often been brought before him, and commonly troubles and terrifies men and women, young and old, of every sort.[3703]

[3704]Hercules de Saxonia, calls this kinde of Melancholy (ab agitatione spirituum) by a peculiar name; it comes from the agitation, motion, contraction, dilatation of spirits, not from any distemperature of humors, and produceth strong effects. This terror is most usually caused, as [3705]Plutarch will have, from some imminent danger, when a terrible object is at hand, heard, seen, or conceived, [3706]truely appearing, or in a [3707]dream: and many times the more sudden the accident, it is the more violent.	Hercules de Saxonia gives this kind of melancholy a special name: "from the agitation of the spirits." It comes from the agitation, movement, contraction and expansion of the spirits, rather than any disorder of the humours, and has powerful effects. According to Plutarch, this terror most often arises from some imminent danger, when something dreadful is close at hand, heard, seen or imagined, whether it truly appears or comes in a dream. Often, the more sudden the event, the more violent the terror.[3708]
[3709]Stat terror animis, & cor attonitum salit, Pavidumque trepidis palpitat venis jecur.	Terror holds the mind; the stunned heart leaps, And the frightened liver throbs with trembling veins.[3710]
Their soul's affright, their heart amazed quakes, The trembling Liver pants ith' veines, and akes.	Their soul is frightened; their astonished heart shakes; The trembling liver throbs within the veins and aches.

[3704] Burton. Printed page 146, star: "Tract. de melan. cap. 7. & 8. non ab intemperie, sed agitatione, dilatatione, contractione, motu spirituum." Treatise on Melancholy, chapters 7 and 8: not from a disordered constitution, but from the agitation, expansion, contraction and movement of the spirits.

[3706] Burton. Printed page 146, n: "Fit a visione horrenda, revera apparente, vel per insomnia, Platerus." It arises from a dreadful vision, appearing in reality or in dreams. Plater.

[3707] Burton. Printed page 146, o, continued at the foot: "A painters wife in Basil, 1600. Somniavit filium bello mortuum, inde Melancholica consolari noluit." The Latin says: she dreamed that her son had died in war; becoming melancholy as a result, she refused to be comforted.

[3708] Editor. Hercules de Saxonia is the physician Ercole Sassonia. His proposed distinction separates disturbed spirits from disordered humours. Burton then joins physical, imagined and dreamed threats in one account of fright. The marginal dream concerns a painter's wife in Basel and adds an example absent from the body.

[3710] Editor. Hercules Oetaeus 708–709, transmitted among Seneca's tragedies: Deianira describes fear still lodged in her body. The fresh translation of the Latin is followed by Burton's own English couplet, modernized separately. The liver belongs to the passage's bodily imagery and has not been replaced by a modern organ or diagnosis.

Arthemedorus the Grammarian lost his wits by the unexpected sight of a Crocodile, Laurentius 7. de melan. The Massacre at Lions 1572. in the reign of Charles the 9. was so terrible and fearful, that many ran mad, some died, great-bellied women were brought to bed before their time, generally all affrighted and agast.[3711]	Arthemedorus the grammarian lost his reason at the unexpected sight of a crocodile, according to Du Laurens, chapter 7 of On Melancholy. The massacre at Lyon in 1572, during the reign of Charles IX, was so terrible and frightening that many went mad, some died, and heavily pregnant women gave birth before their time; everyone was generally terrified and aghast.[3712]
Many lose their wits [3713]by the sudden sight of some spectrum or divil, a thing very common in all ages, saith Lavater part. 1. cap. 9. as Orestes did at the sight of the Furies, which appeared to him in black (as [3714]Pausanias records) The Greeks call them μορμολύχεια, which so terrifie their souls, or if they be but affrighted by some counterfeit divels in jest,	Many lose their reason at the sudden sight of some ghost or devil, something very common in every age, says Lavater in part 1, chapter 9. Orestes did so at the sight of the Furies, who appeared to him in black, as Pausanias records. The Greeks call such things "bogeys": they terrify people's souls. Even if people are merely frightened by imitation devils as a joke—[3715]
—[3716]ut pueri trepidant, atque omnia cæcis In tenebris metuunt—	As children tremble and fear everything In blind darkness—[3717]

[3712] Editor. Great-bellied means heavily pregnant; brought to bed means delivered of a child. Lions is Lyon. Burton's marginal source is a historical account of religion in France; the precise narrative and the grammarian's name remain for collation. These reported effects are preserved as his evidence, not independently confirmed clinical findings.

[3714] Burton. Printed page 146, star, at the foot: "Lib. 8. in Arcad." Book 8, on Arcadia.

[3715] Editor. Spectrum means an apparition or ghost. Pausanias, Description of Greece 8.34.3, says that the Furies appeared black when they were about to drive Orestes mad, then white when he recovered after biting off a finger. Burton gives only the terrifying appearance. The Greek is printed μορμολύχεια, rendered bogeys; the more usual form is μορμολύκεια. The printed form is retained.

as children in the dark conceive Hobgoblins, and are sore afraid, they are the worse for it all their lives. Some by sudden fires, earthquakes, inundations, or any such dismal objects: Themison the Physician fell into an Hydrophobia, by seeing one sick of that disease: (Dioscorides l. 6. c. 33.) or by the sight of a monster, a carcase, they are disquieted many months following, & cannot endure the room where a coarse hath been, for a world would not be alone with a dead man, or lye in that bed many years after in which a man hath died.	as children in the dark imagine hobgoblins and are terribly afraid—they remain the worse for it all their lives. Some are affected by sudden fires, earthquakes, floods or other dreadful sights. Themison the physician fell into hydrophobia through seeing someone ill with that disease (Dioscorides, book 6, chapter 33). Or the sight of a monster or a corpse disturbs them for many months afterwards: they cannot bear the room where a corpse has lain, would not be alone with a dead man for anything in the world, or sleep, even many years later, in a bed in which someone has died.[3718]
Source page 146–147 At [3719]Basil a many little children in the spring time, went to gather flowers in a meddow at the towns end, where a malefactor hung in gibbets; all gazing at it, one by chance flung a stone, and made it stir, by which accident, the children affrighted ran away; one slower then the rest, looking back, and seeing the stirred carcase wag towards her, cried out it came after, & was so terribly affrighted, that for many dayes she could not rest, eat or sleep, she could not be pacified, but melancholy, died.	At Basel, a number of little children went in spring to gather flowers in a meadow at the edge of town, where an executed criminal hung on a gibbet. As they all stared at it, one happened to throw a stone and made it move. Frightened by this, the children ran away. One girl, slower than the others, looked back, saw the disturbed corpse swing towards her, and cried out that it was coming after her. She was so terribly frightened that for many days she could neither rest, eat nor sleep; she could not be comforted, and died in melancholy.[3720]

[3719] Burton. Printed page 146, r, at the foot: "Puellæ extra urbem in prato concurrentes, &c. mæsta & melancholica domum rediit per dies aliquot vexata, dum mortua est. Plater." Girls gathering in a meadow outside the town, and so on; she returned home sorrowful and melancholy, and was afflicted for several days until she died. Plater.

[3720] Editor. Basil is Basel. The exposed body of an executed criminal supplies the terrifying object in Plater's reported case. Burton distinguishes the stone's actual movement of the corpse from the child's interpretation that it pursued her.

Source page 147 [3721]In the same town another childe beyond the Rhine, saw a grave opened, & upon the sight of a carcase, was so troubled in minde, that she could not be comforted, but a little after departed, and was buried by it. Platerus observat. l. 1.	In the same town, across the Rhine, another child saw a grave opened. The sight of the corpse so disturbed her mind that she could not be comforted; she died shortly afterwards and was buried beside it. Plater, Observations, book 1.
A Gentlewoman of the same city saw a fat hog cut up, when the intrals were opened, and a noysome savour offended her nose, she much misliked, and would not longer abide: a Physician in presence, told her, as that hog, so was she, ful of filthy excrements, and aggravated the matter by some other loathsome instances, in so much, this nice Gentlewoman apprehended it so deeply, that she fell forthwith a vomiting, was so mightily distempered in minde and boby, that with all his art and perswasions, for some months after, he could not restore her to her self again, she could not forget it, or remove the object out of her sight. Idem.	A gentlewoman of the same city saw a fat pig cut open. When its entrails were exposed and an offensive smell reached her nose, she was disgusted and would stay no longer. A physician who was present told her that, like the pig, she too was full of filthy excrement, and made matters worse with other loathsome examples. This delicate gentlewoman took it so deeply to heart that she immediately began to vomit. Her mind and body were so badly disturbed that, for months afterwards, all his skill and persuasion could not restore her to herself. She could not forget it or get the sight out of her mind. The same author.[3722]

[3722] Editor. Nice here means delicate or fastidious; savour means smell. The source prints boby for body. The physician’s words intensify the woman’s disgust, and his subsequent inability to calm her makes speech itself part of the causal sequence.

Many cannot endure to see a wound opened, but they are offended; a man executed, or labor of any fearful disease, as possession, Appolexies, one bewitched: [3723]or if they read by chance of some terrible thing, the symptomes alone of such a disease, or that which they dislike, they are instantly troubled in minde, agast, ready to apply it to themselves; they are as much disquieted, as if they had seen it: or were so affected themselves. Hecatas sibi videntur somniare, they dream & continually think of it.	Many cannot bear to see a wound opened without distress, or to see a man executed, suffering from some dreadful disease, possessed, struck by apoplexy or bewitched. If they happen to read of something terrible, even just the symptoms of such a disease, or anything they find repellent, their minds are instantly troubled. They are aghast, ready to apply it to themselves, and as disturbed as if they had seen it or were themselves afflicted. "They seem to themselves to dream of Hecates": they dream about it and think of it continually.[3724]
As lamentable effects are caused by such terrible objects heard, read, or seen, auditus maximos motus in corpore facit, as [3725]Plutarch holds, no sense makes greater alteration of body and minde: sudden speech sometimes, unexpected news, be they good or bad, prævisa minus oratio, will move as much, animum obruere, & de sede suâ dejicere, as a [3726]Philosopher observes, will take away our sleep, and appetite, disturbe and quite overturn us.	Equally lamentable effects come from dreadful things heard, read or seen. "Hearing produces the greatest movements in the body," as Plutarch holds: no sense causes greater changes in body and mind. Sudden words or unexpected news, whether good or bad—"speech less foreseen"—can move us just as much, "overwhelm the mind and cast it out of its place," as a philosopher observes. They deprive us of sleep and appetite, disturb us and quite overthrow us.[3727]

[3724] Editor. Apoplexy was a broad historical category involving sudden loss of bodily or mental function, not necessarily one modern diagnosis. Compare Lucian, Philopseudes 39: after hearing frightening stories, Tychiades seems to see monsters, spirits and Hecates. Hecate's plural name denotes apparitions. Burton's Latin changes seeing to dreaming and generalizes the experience. This is a close Greek parallel; his Latin intermediary remains unverified.

[3727] Editor. De auditione is Plutarch's On Listening. The marginal Theodore Prodromus reference points to a literary work of love, despite the body's general description "a philosopher." Prævisa minus oratio means speech insufficiently foreseen or unexpected. The two Latin phrases and Burton's English expansions are all retained.

Let them bear witnesse that have heard those Tragical alarums, outcryes, hideous noises, which are many times suddenly heard in the dead of the night by irruption of enemies and accidental fires, &c. those [3728]panick fears, which often drive men out of their wits, bereave them of sense, understanding and all, some for a time, some for their whole lives, they never recover it.	Let those bear witness who have heard the tragic alarms, outcries and hideous noises that so often break out suddenly in the dead of night, when enemies burst in, fires accidentally start, and so on. Such panics often drive people out of their minds, depriving them of their senses, understanding and everything: some for a time, others for the rest of their lives, never to recover.[3729]
The [3730]Midianites were so affrighted by Gideons souldiers, they breaking but every one a pitcher; and [3731]Hannibals army by such a panick fear was discomfited at the walls of Rome. Augusta Livia hearing a few Tragical verses recited out of Virgil, Tu Marcellus eris, &c. fell down dead in a swone.	The Midianites were terrified in this way by Gideon's soldiers, each doing no more than breaking a pitcher; and Hannibal's army was routed by a similar panic at the walls of Rome. The empress Livia, hearing a few tragic verses recited from Virgil—"You shall be Marcellus," and so on—fell down as though dead in a swoon.[3732]

[3728] Burton. Printed page 147, x: "Effuso cernens fugientes agmine turmas, Quis mea nunc inflat cornua Faunus ait. Alciato embl. 122." Seeing the troops fleeing in a scattered mass, Faunus said: who is blowing my horns now? Alciato, emblem 122.

[3729] Editor. Panic recalls Pan or Faunus and his association with sudden collective terror; the marginal Alciato verse makes that connection explicit. Its printed emblem number is 122. The exact edition and wording remain to be collated.

[3732] Editor. The breaking of pitchers is in Judges 7:19–22, not the printed 6:19; that passage also includes trumpets and torches. Virgil's words are Aeneid 6.883. The ancient Life of Virgil transmitted through Suetonius and Donatus, section 32, names Octavia, Marcellus's mother, as the woman who fainted, not Livia. Burton's name is retained in the translation. Dead in a swoon means unconscious, not a claim that she died. The Hannibal story and the ambiguous Plutarch reference remain unlocated.

Edinus, king of Denmark, was driven into a frenzy, together with all his men, by a sudden sound he heard: Krantz, Danish History, book 5, and Alessandro Alessandri, book 3, chapter 5. Amatus Lusitanus had a patient who became epileptic on receiving bad news, in his second hundred cases, cure 90. Cardano, On Subtlety, book 18, saw someone who lost his reason through misunderstanding an echo.[3734]
Source page 147–148 If one sense alone can cause such violent commotions of the minde, what may we think when hearing, sight, & those other senses are all troubled at once? as by some Earthquakes, thunder, lighting, tempests, &c. At Bologne in Italy Anno 1504. there was such a fearful earthquake about eleven a clock in the night (as [3735]Beroaldus in his book de terræ motu, hath commended to posterity) that all the citie trembled, the people thought the world was at an end, actum de mortalibus, such a fearful noise, it made such a detestable smel; the inhabitants were infinitely affrighted, and some ran mad.	If one sense alone can cause such violent upheavals of the mind, what must we think when hearing, sight and the other senses are all disturbed at once, as in earthquakes, thunder, lightning, storms and the like? At Bologna in Italy, in 1504, there was so frightening an earthquake at about eleven at night, as Beroaldo has recorded for posterity in his book On the Earthquake, that the whole city shook. People thought the world was ending, “that humankind was finished.” It made such a fearful noise and such a disgusting smell that the inhabitants were utterly terrified, and some went mad.[3736]

[3735] Burton. Printed page 148, star: “Subitarius terræ motus.” The Sudden Earthquake.

[3736] Editor. Bologne is Bologna. Lighting means lightning here. Commended to posterity means recorded for later generations. Beroaldo’s earthquake account is cited by title in the margin; its text has not yet been independently collated.

Source page 148 Audi rem atrocem, & annalibus memorandam (mine author addes) hear a strange story, & worthy to be chronicled, I had a servant at the same time called Fulco Argelanus, a bold & proper man, so grievously terrified with it, that he [3737]was first melancholy, after doted, at last mad, and made away himself.	"Hear a dreadful event, worthy to be recorded in the annals," my author adds: hear a strange story, worthy to be chronicled. At that time I had a servant called Fulco Argelanus, a bold and handsome man, who was so grievously frightened by it that he first became melancholy, then lost his judgement, and finally went mad and killed himself.[3738]
At [3739]Fuscinum in Japona there was such an earthquake and darknesse on a sudden, that many men were offended with headach, many overwhelmed with sorrow and melancholy. At Meacum whole streets and goodly palaces were overturned at the same time, and there was such an hideous noyse withall, like thunder, and a filthy smell, that their hair stared for fear, and their hearts quaked, men and beasts were incredibly terrified. In Sacai another city, the same earthquake was so terrible unto them, that many were bereft of their senses, and others by that horrible spectacle so much amazed, that they knew not what they did.	At Fuscinum in Japan there was such a sudden earthquake and darkness that many people suffered headaches, and many were overwhelmed by grief and melancholy. At Meacum, whole streets and splendid palaces were overturned at the same time. There was so hideous a noise, like thunder, and so foul a smell, that their hair stood on end with fear and their hearts shook; people and animals were terrified beyond belief. In Sacai, another city, the same earthquake was so dreadful that many lost their senses, while others were so stunned by the horrible spectacle that they did not know what they were doing.[3740]

[3737] Burton. Printed page 148, dagger: "Cœpit inde desipere cum dispendio sanitatis, inde adeo demens, ut sibi ipsi mortem inferret." He then began to lose his reason, at the cost of his health, and became so mad that he brought death upon himself.

[3738] Editor. The "I" who employed Fulco belongs to Burton's quoted author, not Burton himself. Proper means handsome or well formed; doted here means lost his judgement. Burton's short English introduction follows a fresh translation of the Latin, preserving the original doubling.

[3740] Editor. Japona is Japan. Burton cites a Jesuit account by Luís Fróis dated 1596. The place forms Fuscinum, Meacum and Sacai are retained pending collation with that account. Hair stared means stood on end. The marginal Latin abbreviates the report with &c.; those omissions are Burton's and are not silently filled in.

Blasius a Christian, the reporter of the news, was so affrighted for his part, that though it were two months after, he was scarce his own man, neither could he drive the remembrance of it out of his minde. Many times, some years following they will tremble afresh at the [3741]remembrance, or conceipt of such a terrible object, even all their lives long, if mention be made of it.	Blasius, a Christian who reported the news, was so frightened himself that, even two months later, he had scarcely recovered his composure and could not drive the memory from his mind. Often, years afterwards, people tremble afresh at the memory or idea of such a dreadful thing, even throughout their lives, whenever it is mentioned.[3742]
Cornelius Agrippa relates out of Guilelmus Parisiensis, a story of one, that after a distastful purge which a Physician had prescribed unto him, was so much moved, [3743]that at the very sight of physick he would be distempered, though he never so much as smelled to it, the box of Physick long after would give him a purge; nay the very remembrance of it did effect it;	Cornelius Agrippa repeats from William of Paris the story of a man so affected by an unpleasant purge prescribed by a physician that the mere sight of medicine upset him, even if he did not so much as smell it. Long afterwards, the medicine box itself would purge his bowels; indeed, the very memory of it had the same effect.[3744]
[3745]like travellers and Sea-men, saith Plutarch, that when they have been sanded, or dashed on a rock, for ever after fear not that mischance only, but all such dangers whatsoever.	It is like travellers and sailors, says Plutarch, who, once they have run aground or struck a rock, ever afterwards fear not only that particular misfortune but all dangers of that kind.

[3742] Editor. The marginal verse is Ovid, Tristia 1.3.1, recalling the night before his exile. Burton makes the remembered night part of his account of recurring fear; it is a literary quotation, distinct from the reported observations.

[3743] Burton. Printed page 148, d, at the foot: “Qui solo aspectu medicinæ movebatur ad purgandum.” Who was moved to evacuation by the sight of medicine alone.

[3744] Editor. The story is attributed to Cornelius Agrippa through William of Paris. Its emphasis is the bodily power of a remembered sensation. Sanded in the following comparison means run aground on sand. The Agrippa and Plutarch passages remain for exact collation.

SUBSECT. 4. Scoffs, Calumnies, bitter Jests, how they cause melancholy.	SUBSECTION 4 How mockery, slander and bitter jokes cause melancholy
It is an old saying, [3746][3747]A blow with a word strikes deeper then a blow with a sword: & many men are as much gauled with a calumny, a scurril and bitter jest, a libel, a pasquil, Satyre, Apologe, Epigram, Stage-playes, or the like, as with any mis-fortune, whatsoever.	It is an old saying: a blow from a word strikes deeper than a blow from a sword. Many people are as deeply wounded by a slander, a coarse and bitter joke, a defamatory writing, a lampoon, satire, fable, epigram, stage play or the like as by any misfortune whatever.[3748]
Princes & Potentates, that are otherwise happy, and have all at command, secure & free, quibus potentia sceleris impunitatem fecit, are grievously vexed with these pasquelling libels, and Satyrs: they fear a rayling [3749]Aretine, more then an enemy in the field, which made most Princes of his time (as some relate) allow him a liberal pension, that he should not taxe them in his Satyres.	Princes and rulers who are otherwise happy, with everything at their command, secure and free, "whose power has given them immunity for their crimes," are grievously troubled by such lampoons and satires. They fear a railing Aretino more than an enemy in the field. This led most princes of his time, according to some accounts, to give him a generous pension so that he would not attack them in his satires.[3750]

[3746] Burton. Printed page 148, f: "Leviter volant graviter vulnerant. Bernardus." They fly lightly and wound gravely. Bernard.

[3747] Burton. Printed page 148, star: "Ensis sauciat corpus, mentem sermo." A sword wounds the body; speech wounds the mind.

[3748] Editor. A pasquil is a lampoon or defamatory satire, from Pasquin, the Roman statue discussed below. Apologe means an instructive fable. Burton's catalogue includes both written and performed attacks; calumny is a false or malicious accusation.

[3750] Editor. Aretine is Pietro Aretino; taxe means censure or attack. Burton gives the pension story as a report, "as some relate," and that qualification is retained. The precise Barth preface and the preceding Latin maxim remain for collation.

The Gods had their Momus, Homer his Zoilus, Achilles his Thirsites, Philip his Demades: The Cæsars themselves in Rome were commonly taunted. There was never wanting a Petronius, a Lucian in those times, nor will be a Rablais, an Euphormio, a Boccalinus in ours.	The gods had their Momus, Homer his Zoilus, Achilles his Thersites, Philip his Demades. The Caesars themselves were regularly taunted in Rome. There was always a Petronius or a Lucian in those days, just as there will always be a Rabelais, an Euphormio or a Boccalini in ours.[3751]
Source page 148–149 Adrian the sixth Pope, [3752]was so highly offended, and grievously vexed with Pasquillers at Rome, he gave command that statue should be demolished and burned, the ashes flung into the river Tiber, and had done it forthwith, had not Lodovicus Suessanus, a facete companion, disswaded him to the contrary, by telling him, that Pasquils ashes would turn to frogs in the bottome of the river, and croak worse and lowder then before.	Pope Adrian VI was so deeply offended and troubled by the lampooners at Rome that he ordered the statue to be demolished and burned, and its ashes thrown into the Tiber. He would have done so immediately if Lodovicus Suessanus, a witty companion, had not dissuaded him by saying that Pasquin's ashes would turn into frogs at the bottom of the river and croak worse and louder than before.[3753]
Source page 149 —genus irritabile vatum, and therefore [3754]Socrates in Plato adviseth all his friends, that respect their credits, to stand in awe of Poets, for they are terrible fellows, can praise and dispraise as they see cause. Hinc quam sit calamus sævior ense patet.	"The touchy tribe of poets": hence Socrates in Plato advises all his friends who care about their reputations to stand in awe of poets. They are formidable fellows, able to praise or blame as they see fit. "This shows how much fiercer the pen is than the sword."[3755]

[3752] Burton. Printed page 149, g: "Iovius in vita ejus, gravissime tulit famosis libellis nomen suum ad Pasquilli statuam fuisse laceratum, decrevitque ideo statuam demoliri &c." Giovio, in his life: he took it very badly that his name had been torn apart in defamatory writings at Pasquin's statue, and therefore decided to demolish the statue, and so on.

[3754] Burton. Printed page 149, star: "Plato lib. 13. de legibus. Qui existimationem curant, poetas vereantur, quia magnam vim habent ad laudandum & vituperandum." Plato, Laws, book 13. Those who care about their reputation should fear poets, because they have great power to praise and blame.

[3755] Editor. Genus irritabile vatum adapts Horace, Epistles 2.2.102. The warning about the power of poets occurs in Minos 320e–321a, transmitted under Plato's name, rather than the printed Laws, book 13. The original citation is preserved. Calamus, literally a reed pen, is contrasted with the sword.

The Prophet David complains, Psal. 123. 4. that his soul was full of the mocking of the wealthy, and of the despitefulnesse of the proud, and Psal. 55. 4. for the voice of the wicked, &c. and their hate; his heart trembled within him, and the terrors of death came upon him: Fear and horrible fear, &c. and Psal. 69. 20. Rebuke hath broken my heart, and I am full of heavinesse.	The prophet David complains in Psalm 123:4 that his soul was filled with the mockery of the wealthy and the contempt of the proud. In Psalm 55:4, because of the voice of the wicked and their hatred, his heart trembled within him and the terrors of death came upon him: fear and horrible fear, and so on. And in Psalm 69:20: "Reproach has broken my heart, and I am full of sorrow."[3756]
Who hath not like cause to complain, and is not so troubled, that shall fall into the mouths of such men? for many are of so [3757]petulant a spleen, and have that figure Sarcasmus so often in their mouths, so bitter, so foolish, as [3758]Baltasar Castilio notes of them, that they cannot speak but they must bite; they had rather lose a friend then a jest; and what company soever they come in, they will be scoffing, insulting over their inferiours, especially over such as any way depend upon them, humoring, misusing, or putting gulleries on some or other, till they have made by their humoring or gulling [3759]ex stulto insanum: a mope or a noddy, and all to make themselves merry:	Who, falling into the mouths of such people, does not have the same cause to complain, and feel the same distress? Many are so insolently spiteful, with sarcasm so constantly on their tongues, so bitter and so foolish, that, as Baldassare Castiglione observes, they cannot speak without biting. They would rather lose a friend than a joke. Whatever company they enter, they mock and lord it over their inferiors, especially those who depend on them in any way. They play on someone's weakness, mistreat or trick them, until by their manipulation and deceit they have made "a madman out of a fool," a dazed simpleton or idiot, all to amuse themselves.[3760]

[3756] Editor. Burton combines and paraphrases biblical passages. The Psalm 55 material extends across verses 3–5, though he gives 4; the other references are Psalm 123:4 and 69:20. The modernization follows Burton's wording, rather than replacing it with the text of a different Bible translation.

[3759] Burton. Printed page 149, k: "Ter. Eunuch." Terence, The Eunuch.

[3760] Editor. Humoring and gulling here mean manipulating a person's weaknesses and making a fool of them; a noddy is an idiot or simpleton. The marginal petulanti splene cachinno echoes Persius, Satire 1.12. Burton's rhetoric connects ridicule with social dependence: inferiors may be unable to escape it. The precise Castiglione and Terence references remain for collation.

—[3761]dummodo risum Excutiat sibi, non hic cuiquam parcit amico,	As long as he can get a laugh for himself, He spares none of his friends.[3762]
Friends, neuters, enemies, all are as one, to make a fool a mad-man, is their sport, & they have no greater felicity then to scoff and deride others; they must sacrifice to the god of laughter, with them in [3763]Apuleius, once a day, or else they shall be melancholy themselves; they care not how they grinde & misuse others, so they may exhilarate their own persons.	Friends, people on neither side, enemies: all are alike to them. Turning a fool into a madman is their sport, and they have no greater happiness than mocking and ridiculing others. Like the people in Apuleius, they must sacrifice to the god of laughter once a day, or become melancholy themselves. They do not care how they torment and mistreat others, provided they can cheer themselves up.[3764]
Their wits indeed serve them to that sole purpose, to make sport, to break a scurrile jest, which is levissimus ingenii fructus, the froth of wit, as [3765]Tully holds, & for this they are often applauded, in all other discourse, dry, barren, straminious, dull and heavy, here lies their Genius, in this they alone excel, please themselves and others.	Indeed, their intelligence serves only this purpose: to provide amusement and crack a coarse joke, which is "the lightest fruit of talent," the froth of wit, as Cicero holds. For this they are often applauded. In all other conversation they are dry, barren, straw-like, dull and heavy. Here lies their talent; in this alone they excel and please themselves and others.[3766]

[3766] Editor. Straminious means straw-like, hence empty or worthless. Genius here is characteristic bent or talent. The exact wording levissimus ingenii fructus has not been located in the consulted text of Cicero's De oratore; Burton's attribution is retained as unverified.

Leo Decimus, that scoffing Pope, as Iovius hath registred in the 4. book of his life, took an extraordinary delight in humoring of silly fellows, and to put gulleries upon them, [3767]by commending some, perswading others to this or that; he made ex stolidis stultissimos, & maxime ridiculos, ex stultis insanos; soft fellows, stark noddies, and such as were foolish, quite mad before he left them.	Leo X, that mocking pope, took extraordinary pleasure in playing upon simple people and making fools of them, as Giovio records in book 4 of his life. By praising some and persuading others to do this or that, he made "the dull into utter fools and objects of the greatest ridicule, and fools into madmen": simple fellows became complete idiots, and foolish people quite mad before he had finished with them.[3768]
One memorable example he recites there, of Tarascomus of Parma a Musician that was so humored by Leo Decimus, and Bibiena his second in this business, that he thought himself to be a man of most excellent skill, (who was indeed a ninnie) they [3769]made him set foolish songs, and invent new ridiculous precepts, which they did highly commend, as to tye his arme that played on the Lute, to make him strike a sweeter stroke, [3770]and to pull down the Arras hangings, because the voice would be clearer, by reason of the reverberation of the wall.	He gives one memorable example: Tarascomus of Parma, a musician, was so manipulated by Leo X and his accomplice Bibbiena that he thought himself a man of exceptional skill, though he was really a ninny. They induced him to compose foolish songs and invent ridiculous new rules, which they praised highly: tying up the arm with which he played the lute to make his stroke sweeter, and taking down the tapestries because the voice would be clearer when it reverberated from the wall.[3771]

[3768] Editor. Leo Decimus is Pope Leo X. The account is attributed to book 4 of Giovio's life. The paired Latin clauses and Burton's following English gloss are both preserved. Soft here means easily manipulated, rather than physically soft.

[3769] Burton. Printed page 149, n: "Et vana inflatus opinione, incredibilia ac ridenda quædam Musices præcepta commentaretur, &c." And, puffed up with a baseless opinion of himself, he would invent some incredible and ridiculous rules of music, and so on.

[3770] Burton. Printed page 149, o: "Ut voces nudis parietibus illisæ, suavius ac acutius resilirent." So that voices striking the bare walls might resound more sweetly and clearly.

[3771] Editor. Arras hangings are tapestries, named after the town associated with their manufacture. Bibiena is Bibbiena. Burton presents the musical advice as part of a deception; the text does not establish that every acoustic observation is itself false. Tarascomus is retained as printed pending collation with Giovio.

Source page 149–150 In the like manner they perswaded one Baraballius of Caieta, that he was as good a Poet as Petrarch; would have him to be made a Laureat Poet, and invite all his friends to his instalment; and had so possessed the poor man with a conceipt of his excellent Poetry, that when some of his more discreet friends told him of his folly, he was very angry with them, and said [3772]they envied his honor and prosperity: It was strange (saith Iovius) to see an old man of 60. yeers, a venerable and grave old man, so gulled.	In the same way, they persuaded a certain Baraballius of Gaeta that he was as good a poet as Petrarch. They wanted him crowned poet laureate and to invite all his friends to the ceremony. They so filled the poor man with the idea of his poetic excellence that, when some of his wiser friends told him how foolish he was being, he became very angry and said they envied his honour and prosperity. It was strange, says Giovio, to see an old man of sixty, venerable and dignified, so thoroughly deceived.[3773]
Source page 150 But what cannot such scoffers do, especially if they finde a soft creature, on whom they may work? nay to say truth, who is so wise, or so discreet, that may not be humored in this kinde, especially if some excellent wits shall set upon him; he that mads others, if he were so humored, would be as mad himself, as much grieved and tormented; he might cry with him in the Comedy, Proh Iupiter, tu homo me adigas ad insaniam.	But what can such mockers not do, especially if they find a pliable person to work upon? Indeed, who is so wise or judicious that he cannot be manipulated like this, especially if some exceptionally clever people set upon him? The man who drives others mad, if treated in the same way, would be just as mad himself, just as distressed and tormented. He might cry out with the character in the comedy: “By Jupiter, are you, a mere man, to drive me mad?”[3774]

[3773] Editor. Caieta is Gaeta. A laureate’s instalment is a ceremonial crowning. Baraballius is retained as Burton’s name form, rather than silently substituting a modern identification. The marginal Latin promises immortality and glory, a stronger formulation than the body’s honour and prosperity.

[3774] Editor. Terence, Adelphoe, act 1, scene 2: Demea protests to Micio. The consulted text reads Pro Iuppiter! tu, homo, adigis me ad insaniam, a statement; Burton has adigas, rendered here as an indignant question. The change is recorded rather than silently correcting the Latin.

For all is in these things as they are taken; if he be a silly soul, and do not perceive it, 'tis well, he may happily make others sport, and be no whit troubled himself; but if he be apprehensive of his folly, and take it to heart, then it torments him worse then any lash: a bitter jest, a slander, a calumny, pierceth deeper then any losse, danger, bodily pain, or injury whatsoever; leviter enim volat, as Bernard of an arrow, sed graviter vulnerat, especially if it shall proceed from a virulent tongue, it cuts (saith David) like a two edged sword. They shoot bitter words as arrows, Psal. 64. 3. And they smote with their tongues, Jer. 18. 18. and that so hard, that they leave an incurable wound behinde them.	For in these matters everything depends on how they are taken. If he is a simple soul and does not notice it, all is well: he may happen to amuse others without being troubled himself. But if he recognizes his foolishness and takes it to heart, it torments him worse than any whipping. A bitter joke, slander or calumny pierces deeper than any loss, danger, bodily pain or injury whatever: "it flies lightly," as Bernard says of an arrow, "but wounds gravely." Especially when it comes from a venomous tongue, it cuts, as David says, like a two-edged sword. "They shoot bitter words as arrows," Psalm 64:3; and "they struck with their tongues," Jeremiah 18:18, so hard that they leave an incurable wound.[3775]
Many men are undone by this means, moped, & so dejected, that they are never to be recovered; and of all other men living, those which are actually melancholy, or inclined to it, are most sensible (as being suspitious, cholerick, apt to mistake, and impatient of an injury in that kinde: they aggravate, and so meditate continually of it, that it is a perpetual corrosive, not to be removed, till time wear it out.	Many people are ruined in this way, numbed and so cast down that they never recover. Of all living people, those who are already melancholy or inclined to it are most sensitive, being suspicious, irritable, prone to misunderstanding and unable to bear this kind of injury. They magnify it and dwell on it continually, until it becomes a perpetual corrosive that cannot be removed until time wears it away.[3776]

[3775] Editor. Bernard is cited for the arrow comparison, without a work or section. Psalm 64:3 likens the tongue to a sword and bitter words to arrows; Jeremiah 18:18 proposes striking the speaker with the tongue. Burton's past tense and expanded imagery are retained.

[3776] Editor. Sensible means sensitive; cholerick means irritable or prone to anger. Corrosive is a substance that eats away at something, transferred to persistent mental pain. The opening parenthesis in the source is not closed; the modernization regularizes the punctuation without changing the argument.

Although they peradventure that so scoffe, do it alone in mirth and merriment, and hold it optimum alienâ frui insaniâ, an excellent thing to enjoy another mans madnesse; yet they must know, that it is a mortal sin (as [3777]Thomas holds) and as the Prophet [3778]David denounceth, they that use it, shall never dwell in Gods tabernacle.	Even if those who mock do so only for fun and amusement, and consider it "an excellent thing to enjoy another's madness," an excellent thing to enjoy another man's madness, they must know that it is a mortal sin, as Thomas holds. As the prophet David declares, those who practise it shall never dwell in God's tabernacle.[3779]
Such scurrile jests, flouts, & sarcasmes therefore, ought not at all to be used; especially to our betters, to those that are in misery, or any way distressed: for to such, ærumnarum incrementa sunt, they multiply grief, and as [3780]he perceived, In multis pudor, in multis iracundia, &c. many are ashamed, many vexed, angred, and there is no greater cause or furtherer of melancholy.	Such coarse jokes, jeers and sarcasms should therefore never be used, especially against our superiors or those who are miserable or in any way distressed. For them, "they are additions to suffering": they multiply grief. As that author recognized, "in many, shame; in many, anger," and so on: many are ashamed, many vexed and angered, and there is no greater cause or aggravation of melancholy.[3781]

[3779] Editor. Thomas is Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae II–II, question 75, especially article 2. Aquinas distinguishes degrees and intentions of derision; contempt for the person can make it a mortal sin. Burton compresses that distinction. Psalm 15:1–3 joins dwelling in God's tabernacle with refraining from slander and injury. The repeated English phrase preserves Burton's translation after the Latin.

[3780] Burton. Printed page 150, s: "Balthasar Castilio lib. 2. de aulico." Baldassare Castiglione, The Courtier, book 2.

[3781] Editor. Castilio is Baldassare Castiglione, The Courtier, book 2. Betters means social superiors. Burton's warning also protects people already distressed; the Latin phrases and his English restatements are separately retained. Exact collation of the cited edition remains pending.

Martin Cromerus in the 6. book of his history, hath a pretty story to this purpose, of Vladislaus the second king of Poland, and Peter Dunninus, Earle of Shrine; they had been hunting late, & were enforced to lodge in a poor Cottage. When they went to bed, Vladislaus told the Earle in jest, that his wife lay softer with the Abbot of Shrine; he not able to contain, replied, Et tua cum Dabesso, and yours with Dabessus; a gallant young Gentleman in the Court, whom Christina the Queen loved. Tetigit id dictum Principis animum, these words of his so galled the Prince, that he was long after tristis & cogitabundus, very sad & melancholy for many months: but they were the Earles utter undoing: for when Christina heard of it, she persecuted him to death.	Marcin Kromer, in book 6 of his history, has a telling story about this, concerning Vladislaus II, king of Poland, and Peter Dunninus, earl of Shrine. They had been hunting late and were forced to stay in a poor cottage. As they went to bed, Vladislaus joked that the earl's wife was lying more comfortably with the abbot of Shrine. Unable to restrain himself, the earl replied, "And yours with Dabessus"—and yours with Dabessus, a handsome young gentleman at court whom Queen Christina loved. "The saying struck the prince's mind": these words so wounded him that he remained "sad and brooding," very sad and melancholy, for many months. But they utterly ruined the earl, for when Christina heard of them, she pursued him to his death.[3782]
Source page 150–151 Sophia the Empresse, Justinians wife, broke a bitter jest upon Narsetes the Eunuch, a famous Captain then disquieted for an overthrow which he lately had: that he was fitter for a distaffe and to keep women company, then to wield a sword, or to be General of an army: but it cost her dear, for he so far distasted it, that he went forthwith to the adverse part, much troubled in his thoughts, caused the Lumbards to rebell, and thence procured many miseries to the Common-wealth.	The empress Sophia, Justinian's wife, made a bitter joke at the expense of Narses the eunuch, a famous commander then distressed by a recent defeat: he was better suited to a distaff and women's company than to wielding a sword or commanding an army. But it cost her dearly. He resented it so deeply that, greatly troubled in mind, he immediately went over to the opposing side, caused the Lombards to rebel, and so brought many miseries upon the commonwealth.[3783]

[3782] Editor. Cromerus is Marcin Kromer. Burton's names, titles and the place Shrine are retained as printed. The story's identification, including the names Vladislaus, Peter Dunninus, Christina and Dabessus, requires comparison with book 6 of Kromer's history; the translation does not silently repair them from later retellings.

[3783] Editor. Paul the Deacon, History of the Lombards 2.5, gives the insult and Narses's alleged retaliation. The consulted Latin itself calls Sophia's husband Iustinianus, though 2.4 has just recorded Justinian's death and Justin the Younger's succession. Sophia was Justin II's wife. Burton's Justinian is retained, with the correction here; the confusion is already present in this historical tradition. A distaff holds fibres for spinning. The account establishes a tradition, not the truth of every alleged event.

Source page 151 Tiberius the Emperor with-held a Legacy from the people of Rome, which his Predecessor Augustus had lately given, and perceiving a fellow round a dead corse in the eare, would needs know wherefore he did so; the fellow replied, that he wished the departed Soul to signifie to Augustus, the commons of Rome were yet unpaid; for this bitter jest the Emperor caused him forthwith to be slaine, and carry the news himselfe.	The emperor Tiberius withheld from the people of Rome a bequest that his predecessor Augustus had recently left them. Seeing a man whisper into a corpse's ear, he insisted on knowing why. The man replied that he was asking the departed soul to tell Augustus that the people of Rome had still not been paid. For this bitter joke, the emperor had him killed immediately, to carry the news himself.[3784]
For this reason, all those that otherwise approve of jests in some cases, and facete Companions, (as who doth not?) let them laugh and be merrie, rumpantur & ilia Codro, 'tis laudable and fit, those yet will by no meanes admit them in their companies, that are any way inclined to this malady; non jocandum cum iis qui miseri sunt, & ærumnosi, no jesting with a discontented person, 'Tis Castilio's caveat, [3785]Io. Pontanus, and [3786]Galateus, and every good mans.	For this reason, even those who otherwise approve of jokes on some occasions and of witty companions—and who does not? Let them laugh and be merry, "and let Codrus's sides burst"; it is praiseworthy and fitting—even they will by no means allow such jesters among people at all inclined to this malady. "Do not joke with those who are miserable and afflicted": no joking with a discontented person. This is Castiglione's warning, and Pontano's, and Galateo's, and every good person's.[3787]
Play with me, but hurt me not: Jest with me, but shame me not.	Play with me, but do not hurt me; Joke with me, but do not shame me.

[3784] Editor. Round in the ear means whisper. Compare Suetonius, Tiberius 57.2: his version has the man call out to a passing corpse; Tiberius pays the man his share, then has him killed to deliver the message. Burton shortens and alters that account.

[3785] Burton. Printed page 151, t: "De sermone lib. 4. cap. 3." On Conversation, book 4, chapter 3.

[3787] Editor. Rumpantur & ilia Codro adapts Virgil, Eclogue 7.26, where Codrus is to burst with envy; Burton repurposes it amid laughter. Pontanus is Giovanni Pontano; Galateus refers to Giovanni della Casa's Galateo, a work on manners. The contrast permits sociable humour while refusing harmful jokes at distressed people's expense.

Comitas is a vertue betwixt Rusticity and Scurrility, two extremes, as Affability is betwixt Flattery and Contention, it must not exceed; but be still accompanied with that [3788]ἀβλάβεια or innocency, quæ nemini nocet, omnem injuriæ oblationem abhorrens, hurts no man, abhors all offer of injury. Though a man be liable to such a jest, or obloquie, have been overseene, or committed a foule fact, yet it is no good manners or humanity, to upbraid, to hit him in the teeth with his offence, or to scoffe at such a one; 'tis an old axiome, turpis in reum omnis exprobratio.	Pleasant sociability is a virtue between the two extremes of boorishness and coarse buffoonery, just as affability lies between flattery and quarrelsomeness. It must not go too far, but must always be accompanied by that "harmlessness," or innocence, "which harms no one and recoils from every offer of injury": it hurts no one and abhors all offered injury. Even if someone is open to such a joke or reproach, has behaved foolishly or committed a shameful act, it is neither good manners nor humanity to upbraid him, throw his offence in his face or mock him. As the old maxim says, "Every taunt directed at an accused man is shameful."[3789]
I speak not of such as generally taxe vice, Barclay, Gentilis, Erasmus, Agrippa, Fishcartus, &c. the Varronists and Lucians of our time, Satyrists, Epigrammatists, Comœdians, Apologists, &c. but such as personate, rayle, scoffe, calumniate, perstringe by name, or in presence offend;	I do not mean those who attack vice in general—Barclay, Gentilis, Erasmus, Agrippa, Fischart and others, the Varros and Lucians of our time, satirists, epigrammatists, comic dramatists, writers of fables and the like—but those who single people out, rail, mock, slander, attack them by name or insult them to their faces.[3790]

[3789] Editor. Comitas is pleasant sociability. Cicero, Tusculan Disputations 3.8.16, proposes ἀβλάβεια for innocentia, a disposition that harms no one. This locates the Greek term and the harmlessness definition; it does not establish Burton's whole following Latin clause. Overseene means having acted foolishly; a foule fact is a shameful deed. Hit him in the teeth means reproach him directly. Reus means an accused or guilty person; the reproach maxim remains unlocated.

[3790] Editor. Personate here means direct an attack at particular people; perstringe means assail or censure. Apologists here probably continues the earlier apologe, meaning writers of fables; the word can also mean writers of defences. Burton exempts general satire against vice while condemning personal abuse. Fishcartus is Johann Fischart; the intended Gentilis remains to be established.

'Tis horse-play this, and those jests (as he [3793]saith) are no better then injuries, biting jests, mordentes & aculeati, they are poysoned jests, leave a sting behinde them, and ought not to be used.	This is horseplay, and those jokes, as he says, are no better than injuries: biting jokes, "biting and barbed." They are poisoned jokes, leave a sting behind them, and should never be used.
[3794]Set not thy foot to make the blinde to fall, Nor wilfully offend thy weaker brother: Nor wound the dead with thy tongues bitter gall, Neither rejoice thou in the fall of other.	Do not put out your foot to trip the blind, Nor knowingly harm your weaker brother; Do not wound the dead with your tongue's bitter venom, Nor rejoice when another falls.[3795]
If these rules could be kept, we should have much more ease and quietnesse then we have, lesse melancholy: whereas on the contrary, we study to misuse each other, how to sting and gaul, like two fighting bores, bending all our force and wit, friends, fortunes, to crucifie [3796]one anothers souls; by means of which, there is little content and charity, much virulency, hatred, malice, and disquietnesse among us.	If these rules could be observed, we would have far more ease and peace than we do, and less melancholy. Instead, we study how to mistreat one another, how to sting and wound, like two fighting boars, turning all our strength and wit, friends and fortunes, to tormenting one another's souls. As a result, there is little contentment or charity among us, and much venom, hatred, malice and unrest.[3797]

[3795] Editor. Burton attributes these English verses to Pibrac's Quatrains, number 37. They are modernized as his English text, without reconstructing an unprinted French original. Exact comparison with the French and the identity of the English translator remain pending.

[3796] Burton. Printed page 151, star: "Ego hujus miseræ fatuitate & dementia conflictor. Tull. ad Attic. li. 11." I am tormented by this wretched person's foolishness and madness. Cicero, Letters to Atticus, book 11.

[3797] Editor. Bores means boars. Crucifie is metaphorical torment. The final marginal citation adapts Cicero, Letters to Atticus 11.25, whose transmitted text differs and is itself uncertain. Burton adds & dementia; his marginal wording is retained and freshly translated. This subsection closes by making interpersonal cruelty a collective cause of melancholy.

Source page 152 SUBSECT. 5. Loss of liberty, servitude, imprisonment, how they cause Melancholy.	SUBSECTION 5 How loss of liberty, servitude and imprisonment cause melancholy
To this Catalogue of causes, I may well annex loss of liberty, servitude, or imprisonment, which to some persons is as great a torture as any of the rest. Though they have all things convenient, sumptuous houses to their use, fair walks and gardens, delicious bowers, galleries, good fear and diet, & all things correspondent: yet they are not content, because they are confined, may not come and go at their pleasure, have, and do what they will, but live [3798]aliena quadra, at another mans table and command.	To this catalogue of causes I may well add loss of liberty, servitude or imprisonment, which for some people is as great a torture as any of the others. Although they have every comfort—splendid houses at their disposal, fine walks and gardens, delightful bowers, galleries, good food and everything to match—they are not content. They are confined: they cannot come and go as they please, have what they want or do as they wish, but live "at another's table," at another person's table and under their command.[3799]
As it is [3800]in meats so is it in all other things, places, societies, sports; let them be never so pleasant, commodious, wholesome, so good; yet omnium rerum est satietas, there is a loathing satiety of all things. The children of Israel were tired with Manna, it is irksome to them so to live, as to a bird in a cage, or a dog in his kennel, they are weary of it.	As with food, so with everything else: places, company and amusements. However pleasant, convenient, wholesome or good they may be, "one grows tired of everything": there is a surfeit of everything that ends in disgust. The children of Israel tired of manna. Such people find this way of living irksome; like a bird in a cage or a dog in its kennel, they grow weary of it.[3801]

[3799] Editor. Convenient means suitable or comfortable; fear is the printed spelling here for fare, food. Galleries are long rooms or passages used for walking. Juvenal, Satire 5.2, supplies aliena vivere quadra, living at another's table or expense; the marginal sentence adds a judgement rather than quoting that line verbatim.

[3800] Burton. Printed page 152, z: "Crambe bis cocta. Vitæ me redde priori." Cabbage cooked twice. Restore me to my former life.

They are happy, it is true, and have all things, to another mans judgment, that heart can wish, or that they themselves can desire, bona si sua norint: yet they loath it, and are tired with the present: Est natura hominum novitatis avida; mens nature is still desirous of news, variety, delights; and our wandring affections are so irregular in this kinde, that they must change, though it be to the worst.	They are happy, it is true, and in another person's judgement have everything the heart could wish for or they themselves could desire, "if only they knew their own blessings." Yet they loathe it and tire of their present condition. "Human nature is eager for novelty": people's nature always desires new things, variety and pleasures. Our wandering desires are so unruly in this respect that they must have change, even for the worse.[3802]
Batchelors must be married, and married men would be Batchelors; they do not love their own wives, though otherwise fair, wise, vertuous, and well qualified, because they are theirs; our present estate is still the worst, we cannot endure one course of life long, & quod modò voverat, odit, one calling long, esse in honore juvat, mox displicet; one place long, [3803]Romæ Tybur amo, ventosus Tybure Romam, that which we earnestly sought, we now contemn.	Bachelors must marry, and married men wish they were bachelors. They do not love their own wives, though otherwise beautiful, wise, virtuous and accomplished, because they are their own. Our present condition is always the worst. We cannot long endure one way of life, "and he hates what he lately prayed for"; one occupation, "it pleases him to hold honour, then displeases him"; or one place, "at Rome I love Tibur; fickle as the wind, at Tibur I love Rome." What we once eagerly sought, we now despise.[3804]

Hoc quosdam agit ad mortem (saith [3805]Seneca) quod proposita sæpe mutando in eadem revolvuntur, & non relinquunt novitati locum: Fastidio cæpit esse vita, & ipsus mundus, & subit illud rapidissimarum deliciarum, Quousque eadem?	"This drives some to death," says Seneca: "by often changing their plans they come round to the same things again and leave no room for novelty. Life and the world itself have begun to disgust them, and that cry of their headlong pleasures arises: 'How long must it be the same?'"[3806]
this alone kils many a man, that they are tied to the same still, as a horse in a mill, a dog in a wheele, they run round, without alteration or news, their life groweth odious, the world loathsome, and that which crosseth their furious delights. What? still the same? Marcus Aurelius and Solomon, that had experience of all worldly delights and pleasure, confessed as much of themselves; what they most desired, was tedious at last, and that their lust could never be satisfied, all was vanity and affliction of minde.	This alone kills many people: they are always tied to the same thing. Like a horse turning a mill or a dog in a wheel, they go round without change or novelty. Their life becomes hateful, the world loathsome, thwarting their frantic pursuit of pleasure. What? Still the same? Marcus Aurelius and Solomon, who had experienced every worldly delight and pleasure, confessed as much of themselves: what they most desired became tedious at last, their desires could never be satisfied, and all was vanity and distress of mind.[3807]

[3806] Editor. Seneca, On Tranquillity of Mind 2.15. Burton's wording differs from the consulted Latin in tense and phrasing, including the printed forms cæpit and ipsus, and rapidissimarum deliciarum where it has tabidarum deliciarum. The translation follows Burton's printed headlong or impetuous pleasures, rather than silently substituting Seneca's text. His following English is retained as a separate, expanded restatement.

[3807] Editor. The horse drives a mill by walking in a circle; the dog similarly turns a wheel. Lust here is appetite or desire more broadly than sexual desire. Ecclesiastes 2:10–11 supplies the judgement on pleasure and vanity; the specific Marcus Aurelius passage remains unidentified.

Now if it be death it self, another Hell, to be glutted with one kind of sport, dieted with one dish, tied to one place; though they have all things otherwise as they can desire, and are in Heaven to another mans opinion, what misery & discontent shall they have, that live in slavery, or in prison it self? Quod tristius morte, in servitute vivendum, as Hermolaus told Alexander in [3808]Curtius, worse then death is bondage: [3809]hoc animo scito omnes fortes, ut mortem servituti anteponant, All brave men at arms (Tully holdes) are so affected. [3810]Equidem ego is sum, qui servitutem extremum omnium malorum esse arbitror: I am he (saith Boterus) that accompt servitude, the extremity of misery.	Now, if it is death itself, another hell, to be surfeited with one amusement, fed on one dish and tied to one place, even when people otherwise have everything they could desire and are in heaven in another person's opinion, what misery and discontent must those endure who live in slavery or an actual prison? "To live in bondage is worse than death," as Hermolaus told Alexander in Curtius: bondage is worse than death. "Know that all brave men are of this mind: they prefer death to slavery." All brave soldiers, Cicero holds, feel this way. "For my part, I am one who considers slavery the greatest of all evils": I am one, says Botero, who regards servitude as the extremity of misery.[3811]
Source page 152–153 And what calamity do they endure, that live with those hard taskmasters, in gold mines, (like those 30000 [3812]Indian slaves at Potosa in Peru) tin-mines, lead-mines, stone-quarries, cole-pits, like so many mouldwarps under ground, condemned to the gallies, to perpetuall drudgery, hunger, thirst, and stripes, without all hope of delivery?	And what suffering do those endure who live under such harsh taskmasters, in gold mines—like those thirty thousand Indigenous slaves at Potosa in Peru—tin mines, lead mines, stone quarries and coal pits, like so many moles underground; or who are condemned to the galleys, to endless drudgery, hunger, thirst and beatings, without any hope of release?[3813]

[3809] Burton. Printed page 152, star: "Tull. in Lepido Fam. 10.27." Cicero, to Lepidus, Letters to Friends 10.27.

[3810] Burton. Printed page 152, d: "Boterus l. 1. polit. cap. 4." Botero, Politics, book 1, chapter 4.

[3811] Editor. Curtius is Quintus Curtius Rufus; Burton locates Hermolaus's speech in book 8. The letter to Lepidus is Cicero, Letters to Friends 10.27.1; a consulted historical Latin edition reads omnes sanos, all sensible people, rather than Burton's omnes fortes, all brave people. Botero is Giovanni Botero. The Latin quotations and Burton's own English glosses are both retained; exact Curtius and Botero collation remains pending.

[3813] Editor. Mouldwarps are moles; stripes are blows or lashes. Potosa is Burton's form for Potosí, within the historical Spanish viceroyalty of Peru. The number thirty thousand and the classification as slaves are his report, attributed to Johannes de Laet; they have not been independently established here. His reference to gold mines is retained, rather than silently revised from a modern account of Potosí.

Source page 153 How are those women in Turkie affected, that most part of the year come not abroad; those Italian and Spanish Dames, that are mewed up like Hawks, and lockt up by their jealous husbands? how tedious is it to them that live in Stoves and Caves half a year together? as in Island, Muscovy, or under the [3814]Pole it self, where they have six moneths perpetuall night.	How do those women in Turkey feel who do not go out for most of the year; or those Italian and Spanish ladies who are shut up like hawks and locked away by their jealous husbands? How wearying is life for those who spend six months at a time in heated rooms and caves, as in Iceland, Muscovy or beneath the Pole itself, where there are six months of continuous night?[3815]
Nay, what misery and discontent do they endure, that are in prison? They want all those six non-naturall things at once, good ayr, good dyet, exercise, company, sleep, rest, ease, &c. that are bound in chains all day long, suffer hunger, and (as [3816]Lucian describes it) must abide that filthy stink, and ratling of chains, howlings, pitifull out-cryes, that prisoners usually make: these things are not only troublesome, but intolerable.	Indeed, what misery and discontent do prisoners endure? They lack all those six non-natural things at once: good air, good food, exercise, company, sleep, rest, comfort and so on. Bound in chains all day and suffering hunger, they must endure, as Lucian describes it, the filthy stench, the rattling of chains, the howling and pitiful cries prisoners usually make. These things are not merely distressing but intolerable.[3817]

[3814] Burton. Printed page 153, e: “If there be any inhabitants.” Burton qualifies his reference to the Pole: if anyone inhabits it.

[3816] Burton. Printed page 153, f: “In Toxari. Interdiu quidem collum vinctum est, & manus constrictæ, noctu verò totum corpus vincitur; ad has miserias accidit corporis fætor, strepitus ejulantium, somni brevitas, hæc omnia planè molesta & intolerabilia.” In Toxaris. By day the neck is bound and the hands fettered; at night the whole body is restrained. Added to these miseries are the body’s stench, the din of lamentation and the shortness of sleep: all these things are plainly distressing and intolerable.

[3817] Editor. The six non-naturals are the historical medical categories discussed earlier: air; food and drink; movement and rest; sleep and waking; retention and evacuation; and the passions. Burton here gives an illustrative list rather than enumerating six exact headings. Lucian, Toxaris 29, describes Antiphilus’s confinement, stench and interrupted sleep. Burton’s Latin intermediary and its exact wording remain for collation.

They lie nastily amongst toads and frogs in a dark dungeon, in their own dung, in pain of body, in pain of soul, as Joseph did, Psal. 105.18. They hurt his feet in the stocks, the iron entred his soul. They live solitary, alone, sequestred from all company but heart-eating melancholy, and for want of meat, must eat that bread of affliction, prey upon themselves.	They lie in filth among toads and frogs in a dark dungeon, in their own excrement, suffering in body and soul, as Joseph did in Psalm 105:18: "They hurt his feet in the stocks; the iron entered his soul." They live in solitude, alone, cut off from every companion except heart-consuming melancholy. For lack of food, they must eat the bread of affliction and feed upon themselves.[3818]
Well might [3819]Arculanus put long imprisonment for a cause, especially to such as have lived jovially, in all sensuality and lust, upon a sudden are estranged and debarred from all manner of pleasures: as were Huniades, Edward, and Richard the second, Valerian the Emperour, Bajazet the Turk.	Arculanus had good reason to count long imprisonment among the causes, especially for those who have lived merrily, indulging every sensual pleasure and desire, and are suddenly cut off and excluded from every kind of pleasure: as were Huniades, Edward and Richard II, the emperor Valerian, and Bayezid the Turk.[3820]
If it be irksome to miss our ordinary companions & repast for once a day, or an hour, what shall it be to lose them for ever? If it be so great a delight to live at liberty, and to enjoy that variety of objects the world affords; what misery and discontent must it needs bring to him, that shall now be cast headlong into that Spanish Inquisition, to fall from Heaven to Hell, to be cubbed up upon a sudden, how shall he be perplexed, what shall become of him?	If it is painful to miss our usual companions and meal for a day, or an hour, what must it be to lose them for ever? If it is so great a delight to live freely and enjoy the variety the world offers, what misery and discontent must befall someone suddenly thrown headlong into the Spanish Inquisition, falling from heaven to hell, abruptly penned up? How distressed will he be? What will become of him?[3821]

[3818] Editor. Psalm 105:18 describes Joseph's fetters. Burton's iron entred his soul reflects a historical translation of the phrase, rather than the wording of every English Bible. Meat means food. Prey upon themselves continues the image of consuming grief.

[3819] Burton. Printed page 153, g: "In 9 Rhasis." On book 9 of Rhazes.

[3820] Editor. Arculanus is the physician Giovanni Arcolano, commenting on Rhazes. Huniades is retained without silently selecting a member of the Hunyadi family; Edward is likewise left as printed rather than assigned a number. These names and the captivity anecdotes require individual historical collation.

[3821] Editor. Repast is a meal. Cubbed up means confined or penned in. The Spanish Inquisition serves as Burton's example of a sudden reversal from freedom and pleasure to imprisonment; his language is forcefully polemical.

[3822]Robert Duke of Normandy, being imprisoned by his youngest brother Henry the first, ab illa die inconsolabili dolore in carcere contabuit, saith Matthew Paris: from that day forward, pined away with grief. [3823]Jugurth that generous Captain, brought to Rome in triumph, and after imprisoned, through anguish of his soul, and melancholy, dyed.	Robert, duke of Normandy, imprisoned by his youngest brother, Henry I, "from that day wasted away in prison with inconsolable grief," says Matthew Paris: from that day onwards he pined away with grief. Jugurtha, that noble commander, was brought to Rome in triumph and then imprisoned; through anguish of soul and melancholy, he died.[3824]
[3825]Roger, Bishop of Salisbury, the second man from King Stephen, (he that built that famous Castle of [3826]Devices in Wiltshire) was so tortured in prison with hunger, and all those calamities accompanying such men, [3827]ut vivere noluerit, mori nescierit, he would not live, and could not die, betwixt fear of death, and torments of life. Francis King of France was taken prisoner by Charls the fifth, ad mortem fere melancholicus, saith Guicciardine, melancholy almost to death, and that in an instant. But this is as clear as the Sun, and needs no further illustration.	Roger, bishop of Salisbury, second only to King Stephen—the man who built the famous castle at Devizes in Wiltshire—was so tormented in prison by hunger and all the sufferings of such people "that he did not wish to live and did not know how to die": he would not live and could not die, caught between fear of death and the torments of life. Francis, king of France, was taken prisoner by Charles V and became "melancholy almost to death," says Guicciardini: melancholy almost to death, and in an instant. But this is as clear as the sun and needs no further illustration.[3828]

[3823] Burton. Printed page 153, dagger: "Salust. Romam triumpho ductus tandemque in carcerem conjectus, animi dolore periit." Sallust. Led to Rome in triumph and finally thrown into prison, he died of anguish of mind.

[3824] Editor. Robert is Robert Curthose, William the Conqueror's eldest son, as Burton's marginal note states. The Matthew Paris passage remains for exact collation. Burton attributes Jugurtha's fate to Sallust, whose surviving Jugurthine War ends with his capture and Marius's consulship; compare Plutarch, Marius 12.3–4, which recounts mental collapse and death after six days of hunger.

[3825] Burton. Printed page 153, i: "Camden in Wiltsh. miserum senem ita fame & calamitatibus in carcere fregit, inter mortis metum, & vitæ tormenta, &c." Camden, in Wiltshire: he so broke the wretched old man by hunger and suffering in prison, between the fear of death and the torments of life, and so on.

SUBSECT. 6. Poverty and want, causes of Melancholy.	SUBSECTION 6 Poverty and want as causes of melancholy
Source page 153–154 Poverty and want, are so violent oppugners, so unwelcome guests, so much abhorred of all men, that I may not omit to speak of them apart. Poverty, although (if considered aright, to a wise, understanding, truly regenerate, & contented man) it be donum Dei, a blessed estate, the way to Heaven, as [3829]Chrysostome cals it, Gods gift, the mother of modesty, & much to be preferred before riches (as shall be shewed in his [3830]place) yet as it is esteemed in the worlds censure, it is a most odious calling, vile and base, a severe torture, summum scelus, a most intolerable burthen;	Poverty and want are such violent assailants, such unwelcome guests, so detested by everyone, that I must discuss them separately. Poverty, properly considered by a wise, discerning, truly regenerate and contented person, is “God’s gift”: a blessed condition, the way to heaven, as Chrysostom calls it, God’s gift, the mother of modesty, and much to be preferred to wealth, as will be shown in its proper place. Yet in the world’s judgement it is a most hateful condition, vile and base, a severe torture, “the greatest crime,” a most intolerable burden.[3831]
Source page 154 we [3832]shun it all, cane pejus & angue, we abhor the name of it, [3833]Paupertas fugitur, totoque arcessitur orbe, as being the fountain of all other miseries, cares, woes, labours, and grievances whatsoever.	We all shun it, “worse than a dog or a snake”; we detest its very name. “Poverty is shunned and arraigned throughout the world”: it is regarded as the source of every other misery, care, sorrow, toil and grievance.[3834]

[3831] Editor. Oppugners are assailants or adversaries; regenerate has its Christian sense of spiritually reborn. His place means its appropriate place in the book; the marginal reference points forward to Part 2, section 3, member 3. Burton distinguishes a religious valuation of poverty from the world’s contempt for it. Calling here is a condition or station, not a chosen profession. Chrysostom’s exact passage remains for collation.

[3832] Burton. Printed page 154, o: “Quem ut difficilem morbum pueris tradere formidamus. Plut.” Which, like a grievous disease, we fear to pass on to our children. Plutarch.

To avoid which, we will take any pains, — extremos currit mercator ad Indos, we will leave no haven, no coast, no creek of the world unsearched, though it be to the hazard of our lives, we will dive to the bottome of the sea, to the bowels of the earth, [3835]five, six, seven, eight, nine hundred fathome deep, through all five Zones, and both extremes of heat and cold: we will turn parasites and slaves, prostitute our selves, swear and lye, damn our bodies and souls, forsake God, abjure Religion, steal, rob, murder, rather then endure this unsufferable yoke of Poverty, which doth so tyrannize, crucifie, and generally depress us.	To escape it we will undertake any labour: "the merchant runs to the farthest Indians." We will leave no harbour, coast or creek in the world unexplored, even at the risk of our lives. We will dive to the sea's bottom and into the earth's bowels, five, six, seven, eight or nine hundred fathoms deep, travel through all five zones and both extremes of heat and cold. We will become parasites and slaves, sell ourselves, swear and lie, damn our bodies and souls, forsake God, renounce religion, steal, rob and murder rather than endure this unbearable yoke of poverty, which so tyrannises over us, torments us and weighs us all down.[3836]
For look into the world, and you shall see men most part esteemed according to their means, and happy as they are rich: [3837]Ubique tanti quisque, quantum habuit fuit. If he be likely to thrive, & in the way of preferment, who but he?	Look at the world, and you will see people valued mostly according to their means, and considered happy in proportion to their wealth: "Everywhere each person was worth as much as he possessed." If a man is likely to prosper and is on the way to advancement, who matters but him?[3838]

[3835] Burton. Printed page 154, star: "As in the silver mines at Friburgh in Germany. Fines Morison." As in the silver mines at Freiberg in Germany. Fynes Moryson.

[3838] Editor. Means are financial resources; preferment is advancement. The marginal attribution to Euripides has no work or line and remains unresolved. The translation keeps the Latin sentence as printed. Burton's following catalogue satirises the conversion of money into supposed virtue.

In the vulgar opinion, if a man be wealthy, no matter how he gets it, of what parentage, how qualified, how vertuously endowed, or villanously inclined; let him be a bawd, a gripe, an usurer, a villain, a Pagan, a Barbarian, a wretch, [3839]Lucians tyrant, on whom you may look with lesse security, then on the Sun: so that he be rich (and liberall withall) he shall be honoured, admired, adored, reverenced, and highly [3840]magnified.	In common opinion, if a man is wealthy, it does not matter how he acquired it, who his parents were, what abilities he has, what virtues he possesses or what villainies he inclines to. Let him be a procurer, a miser, a usurer, a villain, a pagan, a barbarian, a wretch, Lucian's tyrant, whom it is less safe to look at than the sun: provided he is rich—and generous too—he will be honoured, admired, adored, revered and highly praised.[3841]
The rich is had in reputation because of his goods, Eccl. 10.31. He shall be befriended: for, riches gather many friends, Prov. 19.4. — multos numerabit amicos; all happinesse ebbs and flows with his mony. He shall be accounted a gratious Lord, a Mecænas, a benefactor, a wise, discreet, a proper, a valiant, a fortunate man, of a generous spirit, Pullus Jovis, & gallinæ filius albæ: a hopeful, a good man, a vertuous, honest man.	"The rich man is respected because of his possessions," Ecclesiasticus 10:31. He will be befriended, for "riches gather many friends," Proverbs 19:4; "he will count many friends." All happiness ebbs and flows with his money. He will be considered a gracious lord, a Maecenas, a benefactor, a wise, judicious, handsome, brave and fortunate man of noble spirit; "Jupiter's chick, the son of a white hen": a promising man, a good man, a virtuous and honest man.[3842]

[3840] Burton. Printed page 154, p: "Omnis enim res, virtus, fama, decus, divina, humanaque pulchris Divitiis parent. Hor. Ser. l. 2. Sat 3. Clarus erit, fortis, justus, sapiens, etiam rex. Et quicquid volet. Hor." For everything—virtue, reputation, honour, things divine and human—obeys beautiful riches. Horace, Satires 2.3. He will be renowned, brave, just, wise, even a king, and whatever he wishes. Horace.

[3841] Editor. A bawd procures sexual partners; a gripe is a grasping miser. Lucian's comparison occurs in The Downward Journey or The Tyrant, section 26: Cyniscus condemns Megapenthes's insolence and cruelty after he grows rich through confiscation. The sun comparison is accusatory, not admiration. Burton's Latin intermediary remains unverified. The Horace quotations are Satires 2.3.94–96 and a compression of 2.3.97–98, satirical valuations recruited for Burton's argument.

[3842] Editor. Eccl. means Ecclesiasticus or Sirach, not Ecclesiastes. Burton's 10.31 corresponds to 10:30 in the versions consulted. Proverbs 19:4 follows; multos numerabit amicos adapts Ovid, Tristia 1.9.5. Maecenas's name denotes a patron of learning. The white hen's son is Juvenal 13.141: the satirist mocks a claim to exemption from common misfortunes, contrasting it with ill-fated chicks. Burton uses the image for a rich favourite. Jupiter's chick similarly suggests good fortune; its precise source remains open.

[3843]Quando ego te Junonium puerum, & matris partum verè aureum, as [3844]Tully said of Octavianus, while he was adopted Cæsar, & an [3845]heir apparent of so great a Monarchy, he was a golden child. All [3846]honor, offices, applause, grand titles, and turgent Epithets are put upon him, omnes omnia bona dicere; all mens eyes are upon him, God bless his good worship, his honour; [3847]every man speaks well of him, every man presents him, seeks and sues to him for his love, favour & protection, to serve him, belong unto him, every man riseth to him, as to Themistocles in the Olympicks, if he speak, as of Herod, Vox Dei, non hominis, the voyce of God, not of man.	"When I called you Juno's boy, your mother's truly golden child," as Cicero said of Octavian when he had been adopted by Caesar and was heir apparent to so great a monarchy: he was a golden child. Every honour, office, acclamation, grand title and inflated epithet is bestowed upon him; "everyone said every good thing." Everyone's eyes are on him: God bless his worship, his honour! Everyone speaks well of him, gives him gifts, seeks him out and petitions him for love, favour and protection, to serve him and belong to his household. Everyone rises to honour him, as they did for Themistocles at the Olympic Games. If he speaks, they say, as they did of Herod, "the voice of a god, not of a man": the voice of God, not of man.[3848]

[3844] Burton. Printed page 154, r: "Epist. ult. ad Atticum." The last letter to Atticus.

[3846] Burton. Printed page 154, t, at the foot: "O nummi, nummi: vobis hunc præstat honorem." O money, money: it is to you that he pays this honour.

[3847] Burton. Printed page 154, u, at the foot: "Exinde sapere eum omnes dicimus, ac quisque fortunam habet. Plaut. Pseud." We all call a man wise according to the fortune each possesses. Plautus, Pseudolus.

[3848] Editor. The adjoining quotations are Horace, Epistles 1.6.37, and Juvenal 5.136. The golden-child phrase belongs to the pseudonymous Letter to Octavian, located in Le Clerc's translation and note 5, which quotes Junonium puerum and partum aureum. His introduction records its rejection as genuine Cicero. Burton's last-letter-to-Atticus citation remains, but should not be taken as authentication; his full Latin and its edition history still need collation. Plautus, Pseudolus 679–682, says good fortune makes a man seem wise; Burton rearranges this and applies it to wealth. Turgent means inflated; worship and honour are titles. Themistocles's acclaim is Plutarch, Themistocles 17.4; Herod's, Acts 12:22.

All the graces, Veneres, pleasures, elegances attend him, [3849]golden Fortune accompanies and lodgeth with him; and as to those Roman Emperours, is placed in his chamber.	All the Graces, the charms of Venus, pleasures and refinements attend him. Golden Fortune accompanies him and lodges with him, placed in his chamber as she was in those Roman emperors' chambers.[3850]
— [3851]Securâ naviget aurâ, Fortunamque suo temperet arbitrio:	Let him sail on a favourable breeze, And shape his fortune as he pleases.[3852]
he may sayl as he will himself, and temper his estate at his pleasure, Joviall dayes, splendor and magnificence, sweet Musick, dainty fare, the good things, and fat of the land, fine clothes, rich attires, soft beds, down pillows are at his command, all the world labours for him, thousands of Artificers are his slaves to drudge for him, run, ride, and post for him:	He may sail wherever he wishes and manage his affairs as he pleases. Merry days, splendour and magnificence, sweet music, delicate food, the good things and abundance of the land, fine clothes, rich dress, soft beds and down pillows are all at his command. The whole world works for him; thousands of craftsmen are his slaves, to toil for him, run, ride and hurry on his errands.[3853]

[3852] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 137.9. This is the beginning of a poem about the power of money, whose later lines recur below. Burton starts after Quisquis habet nummos, whoever has money, and follows the verse with his own English restatement.

[3853] Editor. Temper his estate means manage or regulate his condition and resources. Artificers are skilled workers or craftsmen; post means travel or carry messages with speed. The expanded modern wording preserves Burton's catalogue of comforts and service.

Clergymen—for "the Pythia takes Philip's side"—lawyers, physicians, philosophers and scholars belong to him, wholly devoted to his service. Everyone wants to know him, be related to him or marry into his family, though he be a fool, a ninny, a monster or a simpleton. "Let him marry Danaë," whenever and whomever he wishes; "the king and queen desire him as a son-in-law." He is an excellent match for my son, daughter, niece and so on.[3857]

Every happiness attends him, everyone is ready to entertain him, and wherever he goes he dines in Apollo. What preparations are made for his reception! Fish and fowl, spices and perfumes, everything sea and land can supply. What cooking, masques and merriment to cheer him![3860]

[3855] Burton. Printed page 155, z: "Multi illum juvenes, multæ petiere puellæ." Many young men and many girls sought him.

[3856] Burton. Printed page 155, a: "Dummodo sit dives barbarus, ille placet." So long as the barbarian is rich, he pleases.

[3857] Editor. Divines are theologians or clergymen. Pythia Philippisat means that the Delphic priestess favours Philip; the phrase makes religious authority serve a patron. Aufe and goos-cap are terms for a fool. Danaë is the woman visited by Jupiter as a shower of gold; the phrase is from Petronius, Satyricon 137.9. The royal son-in-law line adapts Persius, Satire 2.38. The margin's Multi illum line adapts Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.353, on Narcissus: Burton prints petiere where the consulted text has cupiere. The second marginal marriage quotation remains for exact collation.

[3858] Burton. Printed page 155, b: "Plut. in Lucullo, a rich Chamber so called." Plutarch, Life of Lucullus: a sumptuous room so called.

[3863] Burton. Printed page 155, dagger: "Hor. Sat. 5. lib. 2." Horace, Satires, book 2, satire 5.

[3864] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.5.12–14. In this satire on legacy hunting, the rich man is fed before the household god, the Lar. Burton's following English couplet is his separate verse rendering and remains distinct from the fresh translation.

[3865] Editor. Buls, bears and cocks refer to animal spectacles or contests. Cabinets are small private rooms, not modern cupboards. Burton moves from a rich man's dinner to the entire apparatus of privileged leisure.

[3866]in aureis lac, vinum in argenteis, adolescentulæ ad nutum speciosæ, wine, wenches, &c. a Turkie Paradise, an heaven upon earth. Though he be a silly soft fellow, and scarce have common sense, yet if he be born to fortunes (as I have said) [3867]jure hæreditario sapere jubetur, he must have honor and office in his course: [3868]Nemo nisi dives honore dignus (Ambros. offic. 21.) none so worthy as himself: He shall have it, atque esto quicquid Servius aut Labeo.	"Milk in golden vessels, wine in silver ones, beautiful young women at a nod": wine, women and so forth, a Turkish paradise, a heaven on earth. Though he is a foolish, feeble fellow with scarcely any common sense, if he is born to wealth, as I have said, "he is commanded to be wise by hereditary right." He must have honour and office in his turn. "No one but a rich man deserves honour," Ambrose, On Duties, chapter 21: no one is as worthy as he is. He shall have it: "be whatever Servius or Labeo was."[3869]

[3868] Burton. Printed page 155, g: "Qui pecuniam habent, elati sunt animis, lofty spirits, brave men at arms, all rich men are generous, couragious, &c." Those who have money are proud in spirit: lofty spirits, brave soldiers; all rich men are noble-hearted, courageous and so on.

Command heaven and earth and tell the world it is your vassal: "Gold buys a crown; silver opens heaven; a denarius hires a philosopher; a coin compels the law; an obol feeds a scholar; metal secures health; bronze binds friends together."[3871]
And therefore not without good cause, John Medices that rich Florentine, when he lay upon his death bed, calling his sons, Cosmus & Laurence before him, amongst other sober sayings, repeated this, Animo quieto digredior, quod vos sanos & divites post me relinquam, It doth me good to think yet, though I be dying, that I shall leave you my children, Sound and Rich: For wealth sways all.	So it was not without good reason that Giovanni de' Medici, that rich Florentine, lying on his deathbed, summoned his sons Cosimo and Lorenzo and, among other sober sayings, repeated this: "I depart with a peaceful mind, because I shall leave you healthy and rich." Though I am dying, it does me good to think that I shall leave you, my children, healthy and rich. For wealth rules everything.[3872]

[3872] Editor. John Medices is Giovanni de' Medici, with his sons Cosimo and Lorenzo. The deathbed saying is printed without a source and remains for historical collation. Burton's Latin statement and English restatement are both retained.

It is not with us, as amongst those Lacedemonian Senators of Lycurgus in Plutarch, He preferred that deserved best, was most vertuous and worthy of the place; [3873]not swiftness, or strength, or wealth, or friends carryed it in those days; but inter optimos optimus, inter temperantes temperantissimus, the most temperate & best. We have no Aristocracies but in contemplation, all oligarchies, wherein a few rich men domineer, do what they list and are priviledged by their greatness.	With us it is not as it was with Lycurgus's Spartan senators in Plutarch. The man most deserving, most virtuous and worthy of the position was advanced. Speed, strength, wealth or friends did not win it in those days, but "the best among the best, the most self-controlled among the self-controlled": the most temperate and best. We have aristocracies only in theory; in practice, all are oligarchies, in which a few rich men lord it over others, do as they please and enjoy privileges because of their greatness.[3874]
Source page 155–156 [3875]They may freely trespasse, and do as they please, no man dare accuse them, no not so much as mutter against them, there is no notice taken of it, they may securely do it, live after their own lawes; and for their mony get pardons, indulgences, redeem their souls from Purgatory and Hell it self, — clausum possidet arca Jovem. Let them be Epicures, or Atheists, Libertines, Machiavilians, (as often they are)	They may offend freely and do as they please. No one dares accuse them, or even mutter against them. No notice is taken; they can act with impunity, live by their own laws and, for their money, obtain pardons and indulgences and redeem their souls from purgatory and hell itself: "the money chest holds Jupiter shut within it." Let them be Epicureans or atheists, libertines or Machiavellians, as they often are—[3876]

[3873] Burton. Printed page 155, h: "Non fuit apud mortales ullum excellentius certamen, non inter celeres celerrimo, non inter robustos robustissimo, &c." There was no more excellent contest among mortals: not for the swiftest among the swift, nor the strongest among the strong, and so on.

[3875] Burton. Printed page 155, i: "Quicquid libet licet." Whatever pleases them is permitted.

[3876] Editor. Petronius, Satyricon 137.9, ends with the money chest possessing Jupiter: money seems to command even the gods. The remarks on indulgences and purgatory are Burton's religious polemic. Epicures, libertines and Machiavellians are accusatory labels here; they should not be treated as precise descriptions of every doctrine associated with those names.

Source page 156 [3877]Et quamvis perjuris erit, sine gente, cruentus, they may go to heaven through the eye of a needle, if they will themselves, they may be canonized for Saints, they shall be [3878]honorably interred in Mausolean tombs, commended by Poets, registred in histories, have temples and statues erected to their names, — è manibus illis — nascentur violæ. —	"And though he be perjured, without ancestry, bloodstained"—they may pass to heaven through the eye of a needle if they wish. They may be canonised as saints, honourably buried in grand tombs, praised by poets, recorded in histories, and have temples and statues erected in their names: "from those departed shades violets will spring."[3879]
If he be bountifull in his life, & liberall at his death, he shall have one to sweare, as he did by Claudius the Emperour in Tacitus, he saw his soul go to Heaven, and be miserably lamented at his funeral. Ambubaiarum collegia, &c. Trimalcionis Topanta in Petronius rectâ in cœlum abiit, went right to Heaven: a base quean, [3880]thou wouldest have scorned once in thy misery to have a penny from her; and why? modio nummos metiit, she measured her mony by the bushell.	If he is bountiful in life and generous at death, he will find someone to swear, as a man did for the emperor Claudius in Tacitus, that he saw his soul go to heaven; and he will be mourned with pitiful lamentation at his funeral. "The companies of flute-girls," and so on. In Petronius, "Trimalchio's all-in-all went straight to heaven": she went straight to heaven—a low woman from whom, even in your misery, you would once have scorned to take a penny. And why? "She measured her money by the bushel": she measured her money by the bushel.[3881]

[3878] Burton. Printed page 156, k: "Cum moritur dives concurrunt undique cives: Pauperis ad funus vix est ex millibus unus." When a rich man dies, citizens gather from every side; at a poor man's funeral scarcely one in a thousand is present.

[3879] Editor. Horace, Satires 2.5.15, reads qui quamvis periurus erit, sine gente, cruentus. Burton's perjuris is retained in the original column but translated according to the apparent sense. The needle alludes to Matthew 19:24. Persius, Satire 1.39–40, supplies the violets springing from the dead; manibus here means departed spirits, not hands. Both allusions serve Burton's satire of wealth overcoming every obstacle.

[3880] Burton. Printed page 156, l: "Et modo quid fuit ignoscat mihi genius tuus, noluisses de manu ejus nummos accipere." And what was she just now? May your guardian spirit forgive me: you would not have wished to take money from her hand.

[3881] Editor. The Claudius and Tacitus attribution remains unverified. Ambubaiarum collegia begins Horace, Satires 1.2, where flute-girls and others mourn the generous Tigellius. Petronius, Satyricon 37, describes Fortunata, Trimalchio's wife, as his topanta, his all-in-all; her ascent to heaven is a metaphor for social elevation, not her death. The consulted text has panem, bread, where Burton's margin has nummos, money; his penny and repeated bushel gloss are preserved. Quean is a disparaging word for a woman.

These prerogatives do not usually belong to rich men, but to such as are most part seeming rich, let him have but a good [3882]outside, he carries it, and shall be adored for a God, as [3883]Cyrus was amongst the Persians, ob splendidum apparatum, for his gay tyres; now most men are esteemed according to their cloathes.	These privileges commonly belong to people who merely appear rich, as much as to the rich themselves. Let a man present a fine exterior and he wins the day; he will be worshipped as a god, as Cyrus was among the Persians, "because of his splendid appearance," for his magnificent dress. Nowadays most people are valued according to their clothes.[3884]
In our gullish times, whom you peradventure in modesty would give place to, as being deceived by his habit, and presuming him some great worshipful man, beleeve it, if you shall examin his estate, he will likely be proved a serving man of no great note, my Ladies Taylor, his Lordships Barber, or some such gull, a Fastidius Brisk, Sir Petronell Flash, a meer out-side. Only this respect is given him, that wheresoever he comes, he may call for what he will, and take place by reason of his outward habit.	In these gullible times, you may politely give way to someone whose dress deceives you into taking him for a man of great standing. Believe me, if you investigate his circumstances, he will probably turn out to be a servant of little importance, my lady's tailor, his lordship's barber or some such fool: a Fastidious Brisk, a Sir Petronel Flash, a mere show of a man. This much respect, however, is paid him: wherever he goes, he can call for what he wants and claim precedence because of the clothes he wears.[3885]

[3882] Burton. Printed page 156, m: "He that wears silk, sattin, velvet, and gold lace, must needs be a gentleman." Anyone who wears silk, satin, velvet and gold lace must surely be a gentleman.

[3884] Editor. Burton's do not usually belong … but to such … seeming rich extends the satire to the appearance of wealth; it does not retract the preceding catalogue. Tyres and habit mean dress or attire. The Xenophon reference is printed below the first paragraph of the next portion, but its dagger belongs to Cyrus here. The other nearby dagger note, Est sanguis atque spiritus pecunia mortalibus, belongs to Mony gives life & soul and is attached to that sentence.

[3885] Editor. Gullish means gullible or easily deceived; a gull can be a fool or dupe. Take place means claim precedence. Fastidius Brisk is Burton's spelling of Fastidious Brisk, the fashionable courtier in Ben Jonson's Every Man Out of His Humour; Sir Petronell Flash is the pretentious knight in Eastward Ho! The modern column regularises the names, while the original preserves their printed forms.

But on the contrary, if he be poor, Prov. 15.15. all his days are miserable, he is under hatches, dejected, rejected and forsaken, poor in purse, poor in spirit; [3886]prout res nobis fluit, ita & animus se habet; [3887]Mony gives life & soul.	But on the contrary, if he is poor, "all his days are miserable," Proverbs 15:15. He is down in the world, dejected, rejected and abandoned, poor in purse and poor in spirit: "as our affairs go, so goes our state of mind." Money gives life and soul.[3888]
Though he be honest, wise, learned, well deserving, noble by birth, and of excellent good parts: yet in that he is poor, unlikely to rise, come to honour, office or good means, he is contemned, neglected, Frustra sapit, inter literas esurit, amicus molestus. [3889]If he speak, what babler is this? Ecclus. his nobility without wealth, is [3890]projecta vilior algâ, and he not esteemed: Nos viles pulli nati infelicibus ovis,	Although he is honest, wise, learned, deserving, noble by birth and highly gifted, his poverty and poor prospects of advancement, honour, office or a good income make him despised and neglected. "He is wise to no purpose; he starves among his books, an unwelcome friend." If he speaks: "What babbler is this?" Ecclesiasticus. His nobility without wealth is "worth less than seaweed cast ashore," and he counts for nothing: "we are worthless chicks hatched from unlucky eggs."[3891]

[3887] Burton. Printed page 156, dagger, printed higher in the margin: "Est sanguis atque spiritus pecunia mortalibus." Money is blood and breath to mortals.

[3888] Editor. "Under hatches" means brought low or kept in a subordinate position. Proverbs 15:15 describes the afflicted person's days as evil; Burton applies it to material poverty. The money-as-blood marginal note is printed higher on page 156 but belongs here. The nearby Xenophon note belongs to the earlier mention of Cyrus and appears there once.

[3889] Burton. Printed page 156, n: "In tenui rara est facundia panno. Juv." Eloquence is rare in a threadbare cloak. Juvenal.

if once poor, we are metamorphosed in an instant, base slaves, villains and vile drudges; [3892]for to be poor, is to be a knave, a foole, a wretch, a wicked, an odious fellow, a common eye-sore, say poor and say all: they are borne to labour, to misery, to carry burdens like juments, pistum stercus comedere with Ulysses companions, and as Chremilus objected in Aristophanes, [3893]salem lingere, lick salt, to empty jakes, fay channels, [3894]carry out dirt and dunghils, sweep chimnies, rub horse heels, &c.	Once we become poor, we are transformed in an instant into base slaves, villains and wretched drudges. To be poor is to be a knave, a fool, a wretch, a wicked, hateful fellow, an eyesore to everyone: say “poor” and you have said it all. They are born to toil and misery, to carry burdens like beasts of burden, “to eat pounded dung” with Ulysses’ companions, and, as Chremylus objected in Aristophanes, “to lick salt”—lick salt; to empty privies, clean gutters, carry away dirt and dung, sweep chimneys, groom horses and so on.[3895]

[3892] Burton. Printed page 156, dagger: “Egere est offendere, & indigere scelestum esse, sat. Menip.” To be needy is to offend, and to be in want is to be wicked: Menippean satire. The faint est is confirmed in a second 1651 copy, BSB scan n253; the satire itself remains unidentified.

[3894] Burton. Printed page 156, p: “Nullum tam barbarum, tam vile munus est, quod non lubentissimè obire velit gens vilissima.” There is no task so uncivilised or so lowly that this most despised people would not willingly undertake it.

Source page 156–157 I say nothing of Turks Gally-slaves, which are bought [3896]and sold like juments, or those African Negroes, or poor [3897]Indian drudges, Qui indies hinc inde deferendis oneribus occumbunt, nam quod apud nos boves & asini vehunt, trahunt, &c. id omne misellis Indis, &c. they are ugly to behold; and though earst spruce, now rusty and squalid, because poor, [3898]immundas fortunas æquum est squalorem sequi, it is ordinarily so.	I say nothing of the Turks' galley slaves, bought and sold like beasts of burden, or those enslaved Black Africans, or the poor Indigenous labourers: "every day they succumb to carrying loads here and there; for everything that oxen and asses carry and draw among us is laid upon these wretched Indians," and so on. They are ugly to look at; though formerly neat, they are now shabby and filthy because they are poor: "squalor naturally follows wretched circumstances." It is generally so.[3899]
Source page 157 [3900]Others eat to live, but they live to drudge, [3901]servilis & misera gens nihil recusare audet, a servile generation, that dare refuse no task.	Others eat to live, but they live to drudge: "an enslaved and wretched people dares refuse nothing," a servile race that dares refuse no task.[3902]

[3899] Editor. The passage moves among Ottoman, African and American examples of coerced labour. "Indian" here refers to Indigenous Americans; the margin cites Johannes de Laet's account of America. These are Burton's compressed reports, not independently verified descriptions. The Lansius title in the margin is regularized from its divided printing, "H. spaniam."

[3902] Editor. The margin invokes Leo Africanus, Heinsius and Münster's account of German peasants. Burton's contrast is between eating to sustain life and being sustained only to work. "Generation" here means a class or race of people, not a group born at one time. Exact passages in these editions remain to be collated.

— [3903]Heus tu Dromo, cape hoc flabellum, ventulum hinc facito dum lavamus, Sirrah blow winde upon us while we wash, and bid your fellow get him up betimes in the morning, be it fair or foul, he shall run 50 miles a foot to morrow, to carry me a Letter to my mistres, Socia ad pistrinam, Socia shall tarry at home and grinde mault all day long, Tristan thresh.	"Hey, Dromo, take this fan and make a breeze here while we wash." Boy, fan us while we wash, and tell your fellow servant to rise early in the morning. Fair weather or foul, tomorrow he must run fifty miles on foot to carry a letter to my mistress. "Sosia, to the mill!" Sosia must stay home grinding malt all day; Tristan must thresh.[3904]
Thus are they commanded, being indeed some of them as so many footstools for rich men to tread on, blocks for them to get on horse back, or as [3905]wals for them to piss on. They are commonly such people, rude, silly, superstitious Ideots, nasty, unclean, lowsy, poor, dejected, slavishly humble:	Such are their orders. Some of them are treated like footstools for rich men to tread on, mounting blocks to help them onto their horses, or walls for them to piss against. Commonly they are people like this: uncultivated, simple, superstitious fools, filthy, unclean, lousy, poor, downcast and servilely humble.[3906]

and as [3907]Leo Afer observes of the commonalty of Africk, natura viliores sunt, nec apud suos duces majore in precio quam si canes essent: base by nature, and no more esteemed then dogs, [3908]miseram, laboriosam, calamitosam vitam agunt, & inopem, infælicem, rudiores asinis, ut è brutis planè natos dicas: no learning, no knowledg, no civility, scarce common sense, nought but barbarism amongst them;	As Leo Africanus observes of the common people of Africa, “they are base by nature, and their rulers value them no more than if they were dogs”: base by nature and no more valued than dogs. “They lead a miserable, laborious, calamitous, destitute and unhappy life, more ignorant than asses, so that you would say they were plainly born of beasts”: no learning, no knowledge, no refinement, scarcely common sense, nothing but barbarism among them.[3909]
belluino more vivunt, neq; calceos gestant, neq; vestes, like rogues and vagabonds, they go bare-footed and bare-legged, the soals of their feet being as hard as horse hoofs, as [3910]Radzivilus observed at Damiata in Egypt, leading a laborious, miserable, wretched, unhappy life, [3911]like beasts and juments, if not worse: (for a [3912]Spaniard in Iucatan, sold three Indian boyes for a Cheese, and an hundred Negro slaves for an horse) their discourse is scurrility, their summum bonum, a pot of Ale.	“They live like beasts and wear neither shoes nor clothes.” Like rogues and vagabonds, they go barefoot and barelegged, their soles as hard as horses’ hoofs, as Radziwiłł observed at Damietta in Egypt. They lead a laborious, miserable, wretched, unhappy life, like beasts and pack animals, if not worse—for a Spaniard in Yucatán sold three Indigenous boys for a cheese and a hundred enslaved Black people for a horse. Their talk is coarse abuse; their “highest good,” a pot of ale.[3913]

[3909] Editor. Leo Afer is Leo Africanus. The assertion that a people is “base by nature” and the comparisons with animals reproduce the prejudices of Burton and his cited authority. They should be read alongside his argument that hardship degrades people, rather than accepted as descriptions of innate character. The precise quoted edition remains uncollated.

[3910] Burton. Printed page 157, star: “Peregrin. Hieros.” Pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

[3911] Burton. Printed page 157, u: “Nihil omnino meliorem vitam degunt, quam feræ in silvis, jumenta in terris. Leo Afer.” They lead no better life at all than wild beasts in the woods or beasts of burden on the land. Leo Africanus.

There is not any slavery which these villains will not undergo. Inter illos pleriq; latrinas evacuant, alii culinariam curant, alii stabularios agunt, urinatores, & id genus similia exercent, &c. like those people that dwell in the [3914]Alps, Chimney-sweepers, Jakes-fermers, Dirt-daubers, Vagrant rogues, they labour hard some, and yet cannot get clothes to put on, or bread to eat.	There is no servile task these wretches will not undertake. “Among them many empty privies; others work in kitchens, tend stables, work as divers and pursue similar occupations,” and so on. Like those people who live in the Alps—chimney sweeps, privy cleaners, plasterers, wandering rogues—some labour hard and still cannot obtain clothes to wear or bread to eat.[3915]
For what can filthy poverty give else, but [3916]beggery, fulsom nastiness, squalor, contempt, drudgery, labour, ugliness, hunger and thirst: pediculorum, & pulicum numerum? as [3917]he well followed it in Aristophanes, fleas and lice, pro pallio vestem laceram, & pro pulvinari lapidem bene magnum ad caput, rags for his rayment, and a stone for his pillow, pro cathedra, rupta caput urnæ, he sits in a broken pitcher, or on a block for a chair, & malvæ ramos pro panibus comedit, he drinks water, and lives on wort leaves, pulse, like a hogg, or scraps like a dog,	For what else can filthy poverty offer but beggary, disgusting filth, squalor, contempt, drudgery, toil, ugliness, hunger and thirst, “a multitude of lice and fleas”? As the speaker in Aristophanes aptly continues: fleas and lice; “a torn garment instead of a cloak, and a good-sized stone under the head instead of a pillow”—rags for clothing and a stone for a pillow; “the broken top of a pot instead of a chair”—he sits in a broken pitcher or on a block for a chair; “and eats mallow stalks instead of bread”—he drinks water and lives on cabbage leaves and pulses like a pig, or scraps like a dog.[3918]

[3915] Editor. “Jakes-fermers” empty or clean privies; “dirt-daubers” work with mud or plaster. The Latin “urinatores” means divers, not workers concerned with urine. Ortelius’s Alpine place-names are retained in the note rather than assigned uncertain modern equivalents. Burton’s list moves between local trades and a general account of underpaid labour.

[3916] Burton. Printed page 157, star: “I write not this any ways to upbraid, or scoffe at, or misuse poor men, but rather to condole and pitty them, by expressing, &c.” I do not write this to reproach, mock or mistreat poor people in any way, but rather to grieve with and pity them by describing their condition, and so on.

[3918] Editor. Compare Aristophanes, Wealth (Plutus), 535 onward, where Chremylus describes the hardships of poverty. The marginal “Plaut.” is inconsistent with both the speaker and Burton’s attribution to Aristophanes. Burton alternates Latin tags with expanded English glosses; both are retained. “Wort leaves” are cabbage or other vegetable leaves; “pulse,” legumes.

As Chremylus concludes his speech: given the way we poor people live nowadays, who would not regard our life as unhappiness, misery and madness?

Whatever they have is instantly taken away. Their very struggle to live, to drudge and support their poor families—their trouble and anxiety—"takes away their sleep," Sirach 31:1, and makes them weary of life.[3923]
Source page 158 when they have taken all pains, done their utmost and honest endeavors, if they be cast behinde by sickness, or over-taken with years, no man pities them, hard-hearted and mercilesse, uncharitable as they are, they leave them so distressed, to beg, steal, murmur and [3924]rebell, or else starve.	When they have taken every trouble and done their honest best, if sickness sets them back or age overtakes them, no one pities them. Hardhearted, merciless and uncharitable, people leave them in such distress to beg, steal, complain and rebel, or else starve.[3925]

The feeling and feare of this miserie compelled those old Romanes, whom Menenius Agrippa pacified, to resist their governours: outlaws, and rebels in most places, to take up seditious armes, and in all ages hath caused uproares, murmurings, seditions, rebellions, thefts, murders, mutinies, jarres and contentions in every common-wealth: grudging, repining, complaining, discontent in each private family, because they want meanes to live according to their callings, bring up their children, it breakes their hearts, they cannot do as they would.	The experience and fear of this misery drove the ancient Romans whom Menenius Agrippa pacified to resist their rulers, and drives outlaws and rebels in most places to take up arms in revolt. In every age it has caused disturbances, complaints, seditions, rebellions, thefts, murders, mutinies, quarrels and conflicts in every commonwealth, and resentment, repining, complaints and discontent in every household. They lack the means to live according to their station and bring up their children; it breaks their hearts that they cannot do as they wish.[3926]
No greater misery then for a Lord to have a Knights living, a Gentleman a Yeomans, not to be able to live as his birth and place requires. Poverty and want are generally corrosives to all kind of men, especially to such as have been in good and flourishing estate, are suddenly distressed, [3927]nobly born, liberally brought up, and by some disaster and casualty, miserably dejected.	There is no greater misery than for a lord to have a knight's income, a gentleman a yeoman's, and be unable to live as his birth and rank require. Poverty and want generally eat away at people of every kind, especially those who once prospered and are suddenly in distress: people nobly born and generously brought up, brought miserably low by some disaster or mischance.[3928]

[3926] Editor. Livy 2.32–33 recounts the Roman plebeians' withdrawal and Menenius Agrippa's appeal through the fable of the belly and the limbs. Burton places fear of destitution behind collective revolt as well as private distress. "Calling" here means a person's station or occupation.

[3927] Burton. Printed page 158, e: "Augustas animas animoso in pectore versans." Harbouring noble souls within a courageous breast.

[3928] Editor. "Living" means income or means of support; a yeoman occupies a social rank below the gentleman in Burton's hierarchy. His measure of deprivation includes the inability to maintain an inherited standard of life. "Liberally brought up" means generously or genteelly raised, not politically liberal.

For the rest, as they have base fortunes, so have they base mindes correspondent, like Beetles è stercore orti, è stercore victus, in stercore delicium, as they were obscurely born and bred, so they delight and live in obscenity; they are not so throughly touched with it. Angustas animas angusto in pectore versant.	As for the rest, as their fortunes are lowly, so their minds are correspondingly low, like beetles: "born from dung, fed from dung, delighting in dung." As they were born and bred in obscurity, so they live and take pleasure in filth; it does not affect them so deeply. "They harbour narrow souls within narrow breasts."[3929]
Yea, that which is no small cause of their torments, if once they come to be in distress, they are forsaken of their fellows, most part neglected, and left unto themselves; as poor [3930]Terence in Rome was by Scipio, Lælius, and Furius, his great and noble friends.	Indeed, no small part of their torment is that once they fall into distress, their companions abandon them; for the most part they are neglected and left to themselves, as poor Terence in Rome was by his great and noble friends Scipio, Laelius and Furius.[3931]
Nil Publius Scipio profuit, nil ei Lælius, nil Furius, Tres per idem tempus qui agitabant nobiles facillime, Horum ille opera ne domum quidem habuit conductitiam.	Publius Scipio did him no good, nor Laelius, nor Furius, Three men who then lived most comfortably in noble station; Through their help he did not even have a rented house.

[3931] Editor. The Life of Terence transmitted with Donatus and attributed to Suetonius quotes these verses from Porcius Licinus. Their attack on Terence's noble patrons is not the biography's settled judgement: the same Life questions the claim of destitution and reports property and a well-married daughter. The verse's apparent "help" is bitterly ironic.

'Tis generally so, Tempora si fuerint nubila, solus eris, he is left cold and comfortless, nullus ad amissas ibit amicus opes, all flee from him as from a rotten wall, now ready to fall on their heads. Prov. 19.4. Poverty separates them from their [3932]neighbours,	It is generally so: "if the times turn cloudy, you will be alone." He is left cold and comfortless; "no friend will come when wealth has been lost." Everyone flees from him as from a rotten wall about to fall on their heads. Proverbs 19:4: "Poverty separates them from their neighbours."[3933]
[3934]Dum fortuna favet, vultum servatis amici, Cum cecidit, turpi vertitis ora fugâ.	While fortune favours me, friends, you keep a friendly face; When it falls, you turn your faces away in shameful flight.
Whil'st fortune favour'd, friends, you smil'd on me. But when she fled, a friend I could not see.	While fortune favoured me, friends, you smiled on me; But when she fled, no friend was there to see.
Which is worse yet, if he be poor [3935]every man contemns him, insults over him, oppresseth him, scoffs at, aggravates his misery.	Worse still, if he is poor, everyone despises him, lords it over him, oppresses and mocks him, and makes his misery worse.
[3936]Quum cæpit quassata domus subsidere, partes In proclinatas omne recumbit onus.	When a shaken house begins to sink, All the weight bears down upon the leaning parts.[3937]
When once the tottering house begins to shrink, Thither comes all the weight by an instinct.	Once the tottering house begins to sink, All the weight comes there as if by instinct.

[3932] Burton. Printed page 158, f: "Prov. 19.7. though he be instant, yet they will not." Proverbs 19:7. Though he presses them, they will not respond.

[3933] Editor. The cloudy-times line is Ovid, Tristia 1.9.6. Proverbs 19:4 and 19:7 associate poverty with abandonment. The following couplet appears in Petronius, Satyricon 80, with wording that differs from Burton's. His separate English couplet is also retained, rather than replaced by the fresh Latin translation.

[3934] Burton. Printed page 158, star: "Petronius." Petronius.

[3935] Burton. Printed page 158, g: "Non est qui doleat vicem, ut Petrus Christum, jurant se hominem non novisse." There is no one to grieve at his fate; like Peter denying Christ, they swear they have not known the man.

[3937] Editor. Ovid, Tristia 2.83–84. Burton's cæpit is retained; the consulted text reads coepit. The image presents new misfortunes as weight bearing on an already damaged house. Burton's English version adds "by an instinct"; that addition remains in its own paired verse.

[3939]omnes me noti ac ignoti deserunt, as he complained in the Comedy, friends & strangers, all forsake me. Which is most grievous, poverty makes men ridiculous. Nil habet infelix paupertas durius in se, Quam quod ridiculos homines facit,	Indeed, they are hateful to their own brothers and dearest friends. Proverbs 19:7: "His brothers hate him if he is poor." "All his neighbours hate him": his neighbours hate him, Proverbs 14:20. "Everyone, known and unknown to me, abandons me," as the man complained in the comedy: friends and strangers all forsake me. Most grievously, poverty makes people ridiculous. "Unhappy poverty has no harder burden than this: it makes people objects of ridicule."[3940]

Source page 159 they must endure [3941]jests, taunts, flouts, blowes of their betters, and take all in good part to get a meales meat: [3942]magnum pauperies opprobrium, jubet quidvis & facere & pati. He must turn Parasite, jester, fool, cum desipientibus desipere; saith [3943]Euripides, slave, villain, drudge to get a poor living, apply himself to each mans humors, to win & please, &c. and be buffeted, when he hath all done, as Ulysses was by Melanthius in [3944]Homer, be reviled, bafled, insulted over, for [3945]potentiorum stultitia perferenda est, and may not so much as mutter against it.	They must endure the jokes, taunts, jeers and blows of their superiors, and take it all pleasantly to obtain a meal: “poverty, a great disgrace, commands one to do and endure anything.” He must become a parasite, a jester, a fool, “play the fool with fools,” as Euripides says, a slave, a wretch, a drudge to earn a poor living. He must adapt himself to everyone’s moods, win them over and please them, and still be struck when he has done it all, as Ulysses was by Melanthius in Homer; be abused, humiliated and lorded over, for “the folly of the powerful must be endured,” without so much as muttering against it.[3946]
He must turn rogue, and villain, for as the saying is, Necessitas cogit ad turpia, poverty alone makes men theeves, rebels, murderers, traitors, assassinates, because of poverty we have sinned, Ecclus. 27.1. swear & forswear, bear false witness, lye, dissemble any thing, as I say, to advantage themselves, and to relieve their necessities: [3947]Culpæ scelerisque magistra est, when a man is driven to his shifts, what will he not do?	He must become a rogue and a villain, for, as the saying goes, “necessity drives people to shameful acts.” Poverty alone makes people thieves, rebels, murderers, traitors and assassins: “because of poverty we have sinned,” Ecclesiasticus 27:1. They swear and perjure themselves, bear false witness, lie and practise any deceit, as I say, to gain an advantage and relieve their needs. “It is the teacher of wrongdoing and crime.” When a man is driven to desperate expedients, what will he not do?[3948]

[3948] Editor. Ecclesiasticus is Sirach. The poverty wording at 27:1 reflects a historical textual tradition: the Douay version likewise associates poverty with sin, while other versions emphasise gain. “Driven to his shifts” means forced into desperate expedients. Burton’s sweeping connection between poverty and crime belongs to his argument about social pressure.

— si miserum fortuna Sionem Finxit, vanum etiam mendacemq; improba finget.	If fortune has made Sinon wretched, Wicked as she is, she will also make him false and a liar.[3949]
he will betray his father, Prince, and countrey, turn Turk, forsake Religion, abjure God and all, nulla tam horrenda proditio, quam illi lucri causa (saith [3950]Leo Afer) perpetrare nolint. [3951]Plato therefore cals poverty, theevish, sacrilegious, filthy, wicked and mischievous; and well he might.	He will betray his father, his prince and his country, turn Turk, forsake religion, renounce God and everything: “there is no treachery so dreadful that they would be unwilling to commit it for gain,” says Leo Africanus. Plato therefore calls poverty thievish, sacrilegious, filthy, wicked and destructive; and well he might.[3952]

[3951] Burton. Printed page 159, star: “4. de legibus. furacissima paupertas, sacrilega, turpis, flagitiosa, omnium malorum opifex.” Laws, book 4. Poverty is most thievish, sacrilegious, shameful, wicked, the maker of every evil.

[3952] Editor. “Turn Turk” is Burton’s Christian polemical expression for conversion to Islam, here treated as a betrayal. The Leo Africanus and Plato citations are preserved as printed; the precise passage supporting the Laws, book 4, attribution has not yet been identified. These denunciations should not be mistaken for neutral accounts of religion or poverty.

For it makes many an upright man otherwise, had he not been in want, to take bribes, to be corrupt, to do against his conscience, to sell his tongue, heart, hand, &c. to be churlish, hard, unmerciful, uncivil, to use indirect means to help his present estate. It makes Princes to exact upon their subjects, Great men tyrannize, Landlords oppress, Justice mercenary, Lawyers vultures, Physicians Harpyes, friends importunate, tradesmen lyars, honest men theeves, devout assassinates, great men to prostitute their wives, daughters & themselves, middle sort to repine, commons to mutiny, all to grudge, murmur and complain.	For it makes many a man who would otherwise have been upright, had he not been in want, accept bribes, become corrupt, act against his conscience and sell his tongue, heart and hand; become churlish, hard, merciless and uncivil, and use dishonest means to improve his circumstances. It makes princes extort from their subjects, great men tyrannise and landlords oppress; makes justice mercenary, lawyers vultures, physicians harpies, friends importunate, tradesmen liars, honest men thieves and the devout assassins. It makes great men prostitute their wives, daughters and themselves, the middle ranks repine, the common people mutiny, and everyone resent, grumble and complain.[3953]
A great temptation to all mischief, it compels some miserable wretches to counterfeit several diseases, to dismember, make themselves blinde, lame, to have a more plausible cause to beg, and lose their limbs to recover their present wants. Jodocus Damhouderius a Lawyer of Bruges, praxi rerum criminal. c. 112. hath some notable examples of such counterfeit Cranks, and every village almost will yeeld abundant testimonies amongst us; we have Dummerers, Abraham men, &c.	A great temptation to every kind of wrongdoing, it compels some miserable people to feign various diseases, mutilate themselves or make themselves blind or lame to have a more convincing reason to beg, losing their limbs to relieve their immediate needs. Joos de Damhouder, a lawyer of Bruges, gives some striking examples of such sham invalids in his Practice of Criminal Matters, chapter 112. Almost every village among us can offer abundant testimony: we have people who pretend to be mute, Abraham men and so on.[3954]

[3953] Editor. “Indirect means” means dishonest methods. Harpies are the rapacious creatures of classical mythology; “importunate” means persistently demanding. The catalogue ranges from rulers and professionals to ordinary workers, making want a threat to conscience and social order at every rank.

[3954] Editor. “Counterfeit cranks” are alleged sham invalids; “dummerers,” people accused of feigning muteness; “Abraham men,” beggars accused of feigning mental illness. These are hostile categories of early modern writing about vagrancy. Burton’s allegations of deception and deliberate injury, including the citation to Damhouder’s chapter 112, remain claims requiring source collation.

And that which is the extent of misery, it enforceth them through anguish and wearisomness of their lives, to make away themselves: They had rather be hanged, drowned, &c. then to live without means.	And, at the furthest extreme of misery, anguish and weariness with life drive them to kill themselves. They would rather be hanged or drowned, and so on, than live without means.[3955]
[3956]In mare cætiferum, ne te premat aspera egestas, Desili, & à celsis corrue Cerne jugis.	Into the whale-filled sea, lest harsh poverty crush you, Leap, Cyrnus, and fall from the lofty heights.
Much better 'tis to break thy neck, Or drowne thy self i'th' Sea, Then suffer irksome poverty, Goe make thy self away.	Far better to break your neck Or drown yourself in the sea Than endure distressing poverty: Go and put an end to yourself.
Source page 159–160 A Sybarite of old, as I finde it registred in [3957]Athenæus, supping in Phiditijs in Sparta, & observing their hard fare, said it was no marvel if the Lacedæmonians were valiant men; for his part he would rather run upon a sword point (and so would any man in his wits) then live with such base diet, or lead so wretched a life. In [3958]Japonia 'tis a common thing to stifle their children if they be poor, or to make an abort, which Aristotle commends.	An ancient Sybarite, as I find recorded in Athenaeus, was dining at the common messes in Sparta. Seeing their meagre fare, he said it was no wonder the Spartans were brave: for his part, he would rather run onto a sword point—as would anyone in his right mind—than live on such poor food or lead so wretched a life. In Japan, it is common to suffocate their children if they are poor, or procure an abortion, which Aristotle commends.[3959]

[3958] Burton. Printed page 159, r: "Gasper Vilela Jesuita epist. Japon. lib." Gaspar Vilela, Jesuit, in the book of letters from Japan.

[3959] Editor. Athenaeus, Deipnosophists 12, recounts the Sybarite's joke about Spartan food. Burton attributes the Japanese report to the Jesuit Gaspar Vilela; its exact passage remains unchecked. Aristotle, Politics 7.16, permits abortion within a particular population policy and before life and sensation: Burton's bare "commends" suppresses those qualifications.

Source page 160 In that civil commonwealth of China, [3960]the mother strangles her childe, if she be not able to bring it up, and had rather lose, then sell it, or have it endure such misery as poor men do. Arnobius lib. 7. adversus gentes, [3961]Lactantius lib. 5. cap. 9. objects as much to those ancient Greeks and Romans, they did expose their children to wilde beasts, strangle, or knock out their brains against a stone, in such cases.	In that civilised commonwealth of China, a mother strangles her child if she cannot afford to bring it up, preferring to lose it rather than sell it or let it endure the misery of the poor. Arnobius, Against the Nations, book 7, and Lactantius, book 5, chapter 9, level the same accusation against the ancient Greeks and Romans: in such circumstances they exposed their children to wild beasts, strangled them or dashed their brains out against a stone.[3962]
If we may give credit to [3963]Munster, amongst us Christians in Lituania, they voluntarily mancipate, and sell themselves, their wives and children to rich men, to avoid hunger and beggery; many make [3964]away themselves in this extremity. Apicius the Roman, when he cast up his accounts, and found but 100000 Crownes left, murdered himself for fear he should be famished to death.	If we may believe Münster, among us Christians in Lithuania people voluntarily enslave themselves, selling themselves, their wives and children to the rich to escape hunger and beggary. Many kill themselves in this extremity. When the Roman Apicius reckoned his accounts and found only a hundred thousand crowns remaining, he killed himself for fear of starving to death.[3965]

[3960] Burton. Printed page 160, s: “Mat. Riccius expedit. in Sinas lib. 1. c. 3.” Matteo Ricci, Expedition to China, book 1, chapter 3.

[3961] Burton. Printed page 160, star: “Vos Romani procreatos filios feris & canibus exponitis, nunc strangulatis vel in saxum eliditis, &c.” You Romans expose your children to wild beasts and dogs, sometimes strangle them or dash them against a rock, and so on.

[3964] Burton. Printed page 160, t: “Vel bonorum desperatione vel malorum perpessione fracti & fatigati, plures violentas manus sibi inferunt.” Broken and exhausted by despair of good things or by enduring evils, many lay violent hands upon themselves.

[3965] Editor. “Mancipate” means put into bondage. Münster’s Lithuanian report remains to be collated. Seneca, Consolation to Helvia 10.8–10, tells the Apicius story, reporting ten million sesterces remaining. Burton’s hundred thousand crowns is an early modern restatement of the sum, retained here without treating it as a verified conversion.

P. Forestus in his medicinal observations, hath a memorable example, of two brothers of Lovain, that being destitute of means, became both melancholy, & in a discontented humor massacred themselves. Another of a merchant, learned, wise otherwise and discreet, but out of a deep apprehension he had of a loss at Seas, would not be perswaded but as [3966]Ventidius in the Poet, he should die a begger.	Pieter van Foreest, in his medical observations, gives a memorable example of two brothers of Leuven who, having no means, both became melancholy and, in a state of despair, killed themselves. He gives another of a merchant, learned and otherwise wise and judicious, who was so deeply afraid of a loss at sea that, like Ventidius in the poet, he could not be persuaded that he would not die a beggar.[3967]
In a word thus much I may conclude of poor men, that though they have good [3968]parts, they cannot shew or make use of them: [3969]ab inopiâ ad virtutem obsepta est via, 'tis hard for a poor man to [3970]rise, haud facile emergunt, quorum virtutibus obstat res angusta domi: the wisdom of the poor is despised, and his words are not heard. Eccles. 6.19. his works are rejected, contemned, for the baseness and obscurity of the author, though laudable and good in themselves, they will not likely take.	In a word, I may conclude this much about the poor: although they have abilities, they cannot display or use them. "Poverty blocks the road to excellence." It is hard for a poor man to rise: "those whose abilities are hindered by straitened circumstances at home do not easily emerge." "The wisdom of the poor is despised, and his words are not heard," Ecclesiastes 6:19. His works are rejected and despised because of their author's lowly and obscure condition; however praiseworthy and good in themselves, they are unlikely to gain acceptance.[3971]
Nulla placere diu, neque vivere carmina possunt, Quæ scribuntur aquæ potoribus.	No poems can long give pleasure or live on That are written by drinkers of water.[3972]

[3967] Editor. P. Forestus is Pieter van Foreest; Lovain is Leuven. Burton cites medical case reports about distress and feared impoverishment, not a modern diagnostic category. The two Foreest cases and the Horatian attribution beside Ventidius remain unlocated. They should not be treated as independently established events.

[3968] Burton. Printed page 160, x: "Ingenio poteram superas volitare per arces: Ut me pluma levat, sic grave mergit onus." Through talent I could soar through the heights above; as the feather lifts me, so a heavy burden drags me down.

[3972] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.19.2–3. In its original setting the joke associates poetic inspiration with wine. Burton recruits it into a discussion of poverty, where drinking water implies being unable to afford wine. The Latin is freshly translated.

Poor men cannot please, their actions, counsels, consultations, projects, are vilified in the worlds esteem, amittunt consilium in re, which Gnatho long since observed. [3973]Sapiens crepidas sibi nunquam nec soleas fecit, a wise man never cobled shoes; as he said of old, but how doth he prove it? I am sure we finde it otherwise in our daies, [3974]pruinosis horret facundia pannis.	Poor people cannot please. Their actions, advice, deliberations and plans are held in contempt by the world: "they lose their judgement in their affairs," as Gnatho observed long ago. "The wise man never made himself slippers or sandals": a wise man never cobbled shoes, as the old saying goes. But how does he prove it? I am sure we find otherwise in our own day: "eloquence shivers in frost-covered rags."[3975]
Homer himself must beg if he want means, and as by report sometimes he did, [3976]go from door to door, and sing ballads, with a company of boyes about him. This common misery of theirs must needs distract, make them discontent and melancholy, as ordinarily they are, wayward, peevish, like a weary travailer, for	Homer himself must beg if he lacks means, going from door to door and singing ballads with a group of boys around him, as he reportedly once did. [3973] Burton. Printed page 160, star: "Paschalius." Paschalius.

[3975] Editor. The Eunuch 241 has Gnatho say that his acquaintance lost judgement along with property; Burton changes the wording. The wise shoemaker is Horace, Satires 1.3.127–128, a satire on the Stoic claim that the sage possesses every skill. This may explain the Horace reference printed earlier beside Juvenal. The final tag adapts Petronius, Satyricon 83.

[3976] Burton. Printed page 160, b: "Herodotus vita ejus. Scaliger in poet. Potentiorum ædes ostiatim adiens, aliquid accipiebat, canens carmina sua, concomitante eum puerorum choro." Herodotus, Life of Homer; Scaliger, Poetics. Going from door to door at the houses of the powerful, he received something for singing his verses, accompanied by a chorus of boys.

[3977] Editor. The ancient Life of Homer transmitted under Herodotus's name is a biographical tradition, not secure testimony by the historian. Burton also cites Scaliger's Poetics. The precise versions behind this summary remain to be checked. "Distract" means disturb or unsettle; "travailer" here means traveller.

The comic poet aptly seconds him:

All whose fortunes are less prosperous are somehow More suspicious, more inclined to take everything as an insult; They think themselves neglected because of their powerlessness.[3980]
If they be in adversity, they are more suspicious and apt to mistake; they think themselves scorned by reason of their misery; And therefore many generous spirits in such cases, withdraw themselves from all company, as that Comedian [3981]Terence is said to have done; when he perceived himself to be forsaken and poor, he voluntarily banished himself, to Stymphalus a base town in Arcadia, and there miserably died.	In adversity they are more suspicious and prone to misunderstanding; they think themselves scorned because of their misery. Many noble spirits in such circumstances therefore withdraw from all company, as the comic playwright Terence is said to have done. When he saw himself abandoned and poor, he went voluntarily into exile at Stymphalus, an insignificant town in Arcadia, and died there in misery.[3982]

[3979] Burton. Printed page 160, c: "Ter. Act. 4. Scen. 3. Adelph. Hegio." Terence, The Brothers, act 4, scene 3; Hegio.

[3980] Editor. Terence, The Brothers, act 4, scene 3: Hegio explains the suspiciousness of people in reduced circumstances. Burton abridges and changes the passage, ending with a belief that they are neglected rather than made fools of. The earlier hunger-and-bile proverb is also transmitted in Erasmus's Adages with an attribution to Plautus, Amphitryon; Burton's wording is retained.

[3982] Editor. The Life of Terence quotes the story of poverty and withdrawal in Porcius Licinus's hostile verse, but also preserves competing accounts of Terence's departure and death. Burton selects the version suited to his argument. "Comedian" means a writer of comedies; "base town," an insignificant place. The historical circumstances remain disputed in the source itself.

Source page 161 Neither is it without cause, for we see men commonly respected according to their means, ([3983]an dives sit omnes quærunt, nemo an bonus) and vilified if they be in bad clothes. [3984]Philophæmen the Orator was set to cut wood, because he was so homely attired. [3985]Terentius was placed at lower end of Cecilius table, because of his homely outside. [3986]Dantes that famous Italian Poet by reason his clothes were but mean, could not be admitted to sit down at a feast.	Nor is this without reason, for we see people commonly respected according to their means —"everyone asks whether he is rich; no one whether he is good"—and despised if they are badly dressed. Philopoemen the orator was put to chopping wood because he was so plainly dressed. Terence was placed at the lower end of Caecilius's table because of his shabby appearance. Dante, the famous Italian poet, was refused a seat at a feast because his clothes were so poor.[3987]
Gnatho scorned his old familiar friend because of his apparel, [3988]Hominem video pannis, annisq; obsitum, hic ego illum contempsi præ me. King Persius overcome sent a letter to [3989]Paulus Æmilius the Roman General; Persius P. Consuli S. but he scorned him any answer, tacitè exprobrans fortunam suam (saith mine author) upbraiding him with a present fortune.	Gnatho scorned an old close friend because of his clothes: "I see a man covered in rags and years; at this I despised him in comparison with myself." After his defeat, King Perseus sent a letter to the Roman general Paulus Aemilius: "Perseus to Paulus, consul, greetings." But Paulus disdained to answer him, "silently reproaching him with his fortune," as my author says: taunting him with his present condition.[3990]

[3990] Editor. The Eunuch, act 2, scene 2, supplies Gnatho's encounter with his ragged acquaintance. The royal letter is in Livy 45.4, not book 42 as the marginal decade reference implies. Livy says Paulus objected to Perseus still styling himself "king"; Burton omits that word from the salutation. His account is retained, with Persius regularized to Perseus in modern English.

Charles the Bold, that great duke of Burgundy, made Henry Holland, the exiled former duke of Exeter, run after his horse like a lackey, and would take no notice of him. Such is the world's usual way. [3994] Editor. The Commynes anecdote concerns Henry Holland, duke of Exeter, and Charles the Bold; its precise passage remains unchecked. "Convenient" means suitable or sufficient. The closing prayer is Proverbs 30:8. Burton names Solomon, but Proverbs 30:1 introduces these sayings as the words of Agur.

SUBSECT. 7. An heap of other Accidents causing Melancholy, Death of Friends, losses, &c.	Subsection 7. A collection of other events that cause melancholy: the death of friends, losses, and so on.
IN this Labyrinth of accidental causes, the farther I wander, the more intricate I finde the passage, multæ ambages, & new causes as so many by-paths offer themselves to be discussed: to search out all, where an Herculean work, and fitter for Theseus: I will follow mine intended thred; and point only at some few of the chiefest.	In this labyrinth of incidental causes, the farther I wander, the more intricate I find the passage: "many windings"; and new causes, like so many side paths, offer themselves for discussion. To explore them all would be a Herculean task, fitter for Theseus. I shall follow my intended thread and point out only a few of the chief ones.[3995]
Amongst which, [3996]loss and death of friends may challenge a first place, multi tristantur, as [3997]Vives well observes, post delicias, convivia, dies festos, many are melancholy after a feast, holy-day, merry meeting, or some pleasing sport, if they be solitary by chance, left alone to themselves, without employment, sport, or want their ordinary companions, some at the departure of friends only whom they shall shortly see again, weep and howle, and look after them as a Cow lowes after her calf, or a child takes on that goes to school after holidayes.	Among these, the loss and death of friends may claim first place. "Many grow sad," as Vives aptly observes, "after pleasures, banquets and holidays." Many become melancholy after a feast, holiday, merry gathering or enjoyable pastime if they happen to be alone, left to themselves without occupation or amusement, or without their usual companions. Some, merely at the departure of friends whom they will soon see again, weep and howl and gaze after them, as a cow lows after her calf or a child cries when returning to school after the holidays.[3998]
Ut me levarat tuus adventus, sic discessus afflixit, (which [3999]Tully writ to Atticus) thy coming was not so welcome to me, as thy departure was harsh.	"As your arrival had cheered me, so your departure distressed me," as Cicero wrote to Atticus: your coming was less welcome to me than your departure was painful.[4000]

[3995] Editor. Accidental means contingent or arising from circumstances. The printed where is understood as were. Multæ ambages means many windings or circuitous paths. Theseus escaped the Cretan labyrinth by following Ariadne's thread; Burton combines that image with the labours of Hercules.

[3996] Burton. Printed page 161, unlettered marginal heading: "Death of friends." The topic heading is retained as a marginal note.

[3997] Burton. Printed page 161, star: "De anima cap. de mœrore." On the Soul, chapter on sorrow; Juan Luis Vives.

[3998] Editor. Friends includes close relations as well as companions. Burton passes from the let-down after pleasure, through separation, to bereavement. Vives's exact wording in On the Soul remains to be collated.

[3999] Burton. Printed page 161, star: "Lib.12.epist." Letters, book 12; Cicero's letters to Atticus.

[4000] Editor. Cicero, Letters to Atticus 12.50. Burton's own English intensifies the comparison after the Latin; both are retained.

Montanus consil.132. makes mention of a country woman that parting with her friends and native place, became grievously melancholy for many years; and Trallianus of another, so caused for the absence of her husband.	Montanus, consultation 132, mentions a countrywoman who, on leaving her friends and birthplace, became grievously melancholy for many years; and Alexander of Tralles mentions another whose condition arose from her husband's absence.[4001]
Which is an ordinary passion amongst our good wives, if their husband tarry out a day longer then his appointed time, or break his houre, they take on presently with sighs and tears, he is either robed or dead, some mischance or other is surely befaln him, they cannot eat, drinke, sleep, or be quiet in minde, till they see him again.	This is a common feeling among our good wives. If a husband stays away a day longer than arranged, or misses his appointed hour, they immediately fall to sighing and weeping: he has either been robbed or is dead; some misfortune or other must surely have befallen him. They cannot eat, drink, sleep or have peace of mind until they see him again.[4002]
Source page 161–162 If parting of friends, absence alone can work such violent effects, what shall death do, when they must eternally be separated, never in this world to meet again? This is so grievous a torment for the time, that it takes away their appetite, desire of life, extinguisheth all delights, it causeth deep sighs and groans, tears, exclamations,	If friends' parting—mere absence—can have such violent effects, what will death do, when they must be separated for ever, never to meet again in this world? For the time being this is so grievous a torment that it takes away their appetite and desire to live, extinguishes every pleasure, and causes deep sighs and groans, tears and cries:

[4002] Editor. Robed means robbed here. Takes on means shows distress or makes a lament. The generalisation about wives belongs to Burton's account.

[4003] Editor. A fragmentary Latin lament, with omissions already in Burton. Tepentes, still warm, lacks its noun in the excerpt; no missing noun has been supplied. The exact source has not yet been established.

[4006] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 4.667–668, the mourning after Dido's death. Conciliator is a name for Pietro d'Abano derived from his medical work of that title. The base prints observantes imagines, literally watching images, where images continually before the eyes seems intended; the unusual Latin is retained.

[4008] Editor. The maxim is spoken by Megara in Seneca, Hercules Furens 313–314. Pliny, Letters 2.1.12, remembers Verginius Rufus in a letter to Romanus. Pliny's text has contemplatione, contemplation, where Burton has cogitatione, thought, and the marginal quotation rearranges the wording.

[4009] Burton. Printed page 162, star: "Calphurnius Græcus." "Calphurnius the Greek"; the printed attribution is retained. See the editorial note on the verse.

[4010] Editor. Nemesianus, Eclogue 2.44–46, where a lover laments Donace's absence. The consulted text has fusca, dark, instead of Burton's nigra, black. These eclogues formerly circulated with those of Calpurnius; the margin's Græcus is left as printed. The hyacinth is the poetic flower, not necessarily the modern botanical species.

They that are most staid and patient, are so furiously carried headlong by the passion of sorrow in this case, that brave discreet men otherwise, oftentimes forget themselves, and weep like children many months together, as [4011]if that they to water would, and will not be comforted. They are gone, they are gone.	Even the steadiest and most patient are swept headlong so violently by grief in such a case that men otherwise brave and sensible often forget themselves and weep like children for months together, as though they would dissolve into water, and refuse to be comforted. They are gone, they are gone.[4012]

[4012] Editor. Compare Chaucer, The Squire's Tale, line 496: the image is of weeping oneself into water. Burton adapts a Chaucerian expression rather than providing a full line. Staid means steady or composed.

[4013] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 6.429, originally concerning infants who died before their time. Burton applies the line to the dead more generally.

[4014] Editor. Ercole Strozzi's Epicedium, or funeral lament, for his father Tito Vespasiano: the linked CAMENA scan is the Paris 1530 collection, not 1545. Folio 39b has avidum where Burton prints avido; folio 40a has meus ille where he prints mens illa. Both excerpts have now been compared with those pages. Burton's readings and his separate English verse are retained; his immediate edition remains unidentified.

[4015] Burton. Printed page 162, l: "Præfat.lib.6." Preface to book 6; Quintilian's Education of the Orator.

[4016] Editor. Quintilian's preface to book 6 mourns family bereavements, including both sons. Cardano's only childe is preserved as Burton's claim; he had other children. This reference concerns his grief for his son Giovanni Battista. The cited autobiographical passages await exact collation.

[4017] Burton. Printed page 162, star: "Lib.de obitu Satyri fratris." Book on the death of his brother Satyrus; Ambrose.

[4018] Editor. Ambrose, On the Death of His Brother Satyrus 1.21 and 1.74: Burton abbreviates and joins phrases from two separate sections. The oration on Pulcheria belongs to Gregory of Nyssa, rather than Gregory of Nazianzus. Burton's attribution is retained; the precise Latin version of the Pulcheria oration remains uncollated.

[4019] Editor. Curtius, History of Alexander 8.2.10–11, places the three days of attempted self-starvation after Alexander killed Cleitus. Burton transfers the passage to Hephaestion's death. The translation follows Burton, with the discrepancy recorded here.

[4021] Burton. Printed page 163, m: "Ovid.Met." Ovid, Metamorphoses.

[4022] Editor. The list joins historical, biblical and mythological mourners: Hadrian for Antinous, Hercules for Hylas, Orpheus for Eurydice, David for Absalom, and Augustine for Monica. Niobe's transformation is told in Ovid, Metamorphoses 6.301–312. Stupified means numbed or rendered insensible.

Cured by Falloppio, he relapsed many years later after the sudden death of a daughter and could never afterwards be restored to health.
The fury of this passion is so violent sometimes, that it daunts whole kingdoms and cities. Vespasians death was pittifully lamented all over the Roman Empire, totus orbis lugebat, saith Aurelius Victor. The force of this passion is sometimes so violent that it overwhelms whole kingdoms and cities. Vespasian's death was piteously lamented throughout the Roman Empire: "the whole world mourned," says Aurelius Victor. [4027] Editor. Trincavelius is Vittore Trincavelli; Phalopius is Gabriele Falloppio. Counsel means a written medical consultation. These are Burton's reported cases, not diagnoses independently established for this edition.

[4028] Editor. The specific Aurelius Victor passage and Burton's Vespasian identification require collation; the name was also borne by Titus. His list of Alexander's acts of mourning likewise remains attributed to Burton, without treating all its details as independently verified.

Which is now practised amongst the Tartars, when [4029]a great Cham dieth, 10. or 12. thousand must be slain, men and horses, all they meet; and among those [4030]Pagan Indians, their wives and servants voluntarily dye with them.	This is now practised among the Tartars: when a great khan dies, ten or twelve thousand must be killed—men and horses, everyone they encounter. Among those pagan Indians, their wives and servants voluntarily die with them.[4031]
Leo Decimus was so much bewailed in Rome after his departure, that as Jovius gives out, [4032]communis salus, publica hilaritas, the common safety, all good fellowship, peace, mirth, and plenty died with him, tanquam eodem sepulchro cum Leone condita lugebantur; for it was a golden age whilst he lived, [4033]but after his decease an iron season succeeded, barbara vis & fæda vastitas, & dira malorum omnium incommoda, wars, plagues, vastity, discontent.	Leo X was so deeply mourned in Rome after his death that, as Giovio reports, “the common welfare and public happiness”—the common safety, all good fellowship, peace, mirth and plenty—died with him: “they were mourned as though buried in the same grave with Leo.” For his lifetime was a golden age, but after his death an iron age followed: “barbarous violence, foul devastation and the dreadful sufferings of every kind of evil”—wars, plagues, devastation and discontent.[4034]

[4029] Burton. Printed page 163, q: “Mathias à Michou. Boter. Amphitheat.” Maciej of Miechów; Botero; Amphitheatre. Burton’s compressed list of authorities is preserved.

[4030] Burton. Printed page 163, r: “Lo. Vertoman. M. Polus Venetus.lib.1.cap.54. perimunt eos quos in via obvios habent, dicentes, Ite, & domino nostro regi servite in alia vita. Nec tam in homines insaniunt, sed in equos, &c.” Ludovico di Varthema; Marco Polo the Venetian, book 1, chapter 54. “They kill those whom they encounter on the road, saying, ‘Go and serve our lord the king in the next life.’ Nor does their rage fall only upon people, but upon horses,” and so on. The two authorities occupy one marginal container.

[4031] Editor. Cham is khan. Tartars is Burton’s broad historical designation. His margin combines Varthema and Marco Polo under one marker and spans the adjacent accounts; the killing of those met on the road belongs to the latter account. These reports require source and context verification.

[4034] Editor. Paolo Giovio’s Life of Pope Leo X supplies Burton’s encomiastic contrast between a golden and an iron age. The following book 4 margin continues that reference; it does not belong to Pliny or Paterculus. Vastity means devastation.

When Augustus Cæsar died, saith Paterculus, orbis ruinam timueramus, we were all afraid, as if heaven had fallen upon our heads. [4035]Budæus records, how that at Lewes the 12th his death, tam subita mutatio, ut qui prius digito cœlum attingere videbantur, nunc humi derepente serpere, sideratos esse diceres, they that were erst in heaven, upon a sudden, as if they had been planet strucken, lay groveling on the ground;	When Augustus Caesar died, says Paterculus, "we had feared the ruin of the world": we were all afraid, as though heaven had fallen upon our heads. Budé records that at Louis XII's death there was "so sudden a change that those who previously seemed to touch heaven with a finger were now suddenly crawling on the ground; you would have said they had been struck by the stars." Those who were formerly in heaven suddenly lay grovelling on the ground, as if struck down by a planet.[4036]
[4037]Concussis cecidere animis, seu frondibus ingens Sylva dolet lapsis —— they look't like cropt trees.	Their spirits shaken, they sank down, as a vast Wood grieves when its leaves have fallen— They looked like lopped trees.[4038]

[4035] Burton. Printed page 163, t: "Lib.5.de asse." Book 5 of On the As; Guillaume Budé's study of ancient coinage and measures.

[4037] Burton. Printed page 163, dagger: "Maph." Maffeo; abbreviated attribution, probably Maffeo Vegio. Exact passage awaits collation.

[4038] Editor. The short marginal Maph. probably indicates Maffeo Vegio. The precise poem and wording are not yet securely located. Cropt trees are cut or lopped trees; this is Burton's English gloss, following the translated Latin image of fallen leaves.

[4039]At Nancy in Lorain, when Claudia Valesia, Henry the second French kings sister, and the Dukes wife deceased, the temples for fourty dayes were all shut up, no Prayers nor Masses, but in that room where she was. The Senators all seen in black, and for a twelve months space throughout the city, they were forbid to sing or dance.	At Nancy in Lorraine, when Claude of Valois, sister of Henry II, king of France, and wife of the duke, died, all the churches were closed for forty days: no prayers or masses except in the room where she lay. All the civic councillors appeared in black, and for twelve months singing and dancing were forbidden throughout the city.[4040]
[4041]Non ulli pastos illis egere diebus Frigida (Daphne) boves ad flumina, nulla nec amnem Libavit quadrupes, nec graminis attigit herbam.	In those days, Daphnis, no one drove the grazing cattle To the cool streams; no four-footed creature tasted The river's water or touched a blade of grass.[4042]
How were we affected here in England for our Titus, deliciæ humani generis, Prince Henries immature death, as if all our dearest friends lives had exhaled with his? [4043]Scanderbegs death was not so much lamented in Epirus.	How deeply were we affected here in England by the untimely death of Prince Henry, our Titus, "the delight of humankind," as though the lives of all our dearest friends had breathed their last with his! Scanderbeg's death was not mourned so deeply in Epirus.[4044]

[4039] Burton. Printed page 163, star: "Ortelius Itinerario: ob annum integrum à cantu, tripudiis, & saltationibus tota civitas abstinere jubetur." Ortelius, Itinerary: "For an entire year the whole city is ordered to abstain from singing, revelry and dancing."

[4040] Editor. Claude of France, also called Claude of Valois, was Henry II's daughter, not his sister; the Bibliothèque nationale de France identifies her accordingly. Burton's sister is preserved. The funeral customs reported from Ortelius still await independent collation.

[4043] Burton. Printed page 163, dagger: "See Barletius de vita & ob. Scanderbeg. lib.13.hist." See Marin Barleti, on the life and death of Scanderbeg, book 13 of the History.

[4044] Editor. Prince Henry Frederick, the elder son of James I, died in 1612 before succeeding to the throne. Burton likens him to the Roman emperor Titus. Scanderbeg is Gjergj Kastrioti, the Albanian ruler; Epirus is Burton's geographical designation.

In a word, as [4045]he saith of Edward the first at the news of Edward of Caernervan his sonnes birth, immortaliter gavisus, he was immortally glad, may we say on the contrary of friends deaths, immortaliter gementes, we are divers of us as so many turtles, eternally dejected with it.	In a word, as the historian says of Edward I at the news of his son Edward of Caernarfon's birth, "he rejoiced beyond measure"—he was eternally glad —so we may say the reverse of friends' deaths: "mourning for ever." Many of us, like so many turtledoves, are for ever cast down by it.[4046]
Source page 164 There is another sorrow, which ariseth from the loss of temporal goods and fortunes, which equally afflicteth, and may go hand in hand with the precedent; loss of time, loss of honor, office, of good name, of labor, frustrate hopes, will much torment; but in my judgment, there in no torture like unto it, or that sooner procureth this malady and mischief:	There is another sorrow, arising from the loss of worldly goods and wealth, which afflicts us equally and may go hand in hand with the preceding one. Loss of time, honour, office, reputation or labour, and disappointed hopes, will torment us greatly; but in my judgement no torture equals this loss, or more quickly brings about this illness and calamity.[4047]

[4045] Burton. Printed page 163, u: "Mat.Paris." Matthew Paris.

[4046] Editor. Turtles means turtledoves, proverbial mourning birds. Immortaliter can intensify rejoicing, beyond measure, but Burton develops its literal association with immortality into unending grief. Matthew Paris died before Edward of Caernarfon's birth; the precise chronicle or continuation intended by the margin requires identification.

[4047] Editor. Temporal means worldly rather than eternal. The base prints there in no torture, understood as there is no torture. Precedent means preceding.

[4049] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 13.134. The satire contrasts grief for lost money with other forms of mourning. Burton develops the one-line quotation in the prose following it.

it wrings true tears from our eyes, many sighes, much sorrow from our hearts, and often causeth habitual melancholy it self, Guianerius tract.15.5. repeats this for an especial cause: [4050]Loss of friends, and loss of goods, make many men melancholy, as I have often seen by continual meditation of such things.	It wrings real tears from our eyes, many sighs and much sorrow from our hearts, and often causes settled melancholy itself. Guaineri, treatise 15, chapter 5, repeats this as a particular cause: “Loss of friends and loss of goods make many people melancholy, as I have often seen, through continually dwelling on such things.”[4051]
The same causes Arnoldus Villanovanus inculcates, Breviar, l.1.c.18. ex rerum amissione, damno, amicorum morte, &c. Want alone will make a man mad, to be Sans argent, will cause a deep and grievous melancholy.	Arnald of Villanova stresses the same causes, Breviary, book 1, chapter 18: “from loss of possessions, damage, the death of friends,” and so on. Want alone will drive a man mad: being “without money” will cause deep and grievous melancholy.
Many persons are affected like [4052]Irishmen in this behalf, who if they have a good scimiter, had rather have a blow on their arme, then their weapon hurt: they will sooner lose their life, then their goods: and the grief that cometh hence, continueth long (saith [4053]Plater) and out of many dispositions, procureth an habit.	Many people feel about this as Irishmen do, who, if they have a good scimitar, would rather take a blow on the arm than have their weapon damaged. They would sooner lose their lives than their possessions. The grief that follows lasts a long time, says Platter, and repeated dispositions produce an established condition.[4054]

[4051] Editor. Guianerius is Antonio Guaineri. Habitual melancholy is an established or lasting condition, as opposed to a passing disposition. Burton’s English paraphrase mentions friends, while the marginal Latin gives children as its example; both are preserved.

[4052] Burton. Printed page 164, z: “Stanihurstus Hib.Hist.” Richard Stanihurst, History of Ireland.

[4053] Burton. Printed page 164, dagger: “Cap.3. Melancholia semper venit ab jacturam pecuniæ, victoriæ, repulsam, mortem liberorum, quibus longo post tempore animus torquetur, & à dispositione fit habitus.” Chapter 3. “Melancholy always comes from loss of money or victory, rejection or the death of children; these torment the mind for a long time afterwards, and a disposition becomes an established condition.” The printed grammar after ab is irregular; semper, “always,” is retained.

[4054] Editor. Burton repeats an ethnic generalisation drawn from Stanihurst. Plater is Felix Platter. Disposition and habit distinguish a passing state or tendency from an established condition; habit here does not mean a routine action. The margin prints semper, always, although the English makes no such universal claim.

[4055]Montanus and Frisemelica cured a young man of 22. years of age; that so became melancholy, ab amissam pecuniam, for a summe of money which he had unhappily lost. Schenkius hath such another story of one melancholy, because he overshot himself, and spent his stock in unnecessary building.	Montanus and Frigimelica cured a young man of twenty-two who became melancholy in this way, "because of lost money": a sum he had unfortunately lost. Schenck has another such story of a man made melancholy because he had overreached himself and spent his capital on unnecessary building.[4056]
[4057]Roger that rich Bishop of Salisbury, exutus opibus & castris à Rege Stephano, spoiled of his goods by King Stephan, vi doloris absorptus, atque in amentiam versus, indecentia fecit, through grief ran mad, spake and did he knew not what.	Roger, that rich bishop of Salisbury, "stripped of wealth and castles by King Stephen"—deprived of his goods by King Stephen—"overwhelmed by the force of grief and driven mad, behaved disgracefully." He went mad with grief, speaking and acting without knowing what he did.[4058]
Nothing so familiar, as for men in such cases, through anguish of minde to make away themselves. A poor fellow went to hang himself, (which Ausonius hath elegantly expressed in a neat [4059]Epigram) but finding by chance a pot of money, flung away the rope, and went merrily home, but he that hid the gold, when he missed it, hanged himself with that rope which the other man had left, in a discontented humor.	Nothing is more common than for people in such circumstances to kill themselves through anguish of mind. A poor fellow went to hang himself, as Ausonius elegantly tells in a neat epigram; but happening to find a pot of money, he threw away the rope and went home cheerfully. The man who had hidden the gold, however, on finding it missing, hanged himself in despair with the rope the other man had left.[4060]
At qui condiderat, postquam non reperit aurum, Aptavit collo, quem reperit laqueum.	But the man who had hidden it, when he failed to find his gold, Fitted to his neck the noose that he did find.

[4056] Editor. Frisemelica represents Francesco Frigimelica; Schenkius is Johannes Schenck von Grafenberg. The base has ungrammatical ab amissam pecuniam, rendered by its evident sense. Stock means capital; overshot himself means spent beyond his means.

[4058] Editor. Nubrigensis is William of Newburgh. Roger was bishop of Salisbury under Henry I and Stephen. Burton translates the Latin freely, omitting castles in his English gloss and expanding the account of his behaviour; both layers remain visible. Exact source collation is pending.

[4060] Editor. Ausonius's epigram tells an ironic reversal of fortune. Burton's number 22 is retained without assuming it matches every modern edition. The verse that follows repeats the conclusion of his prose account.

Such feral accidents can want and penury produce. Be it by suretiship, shipwrack, fire, spoile and pillage of souldiers, or what loss soever, it boots not, it will work the like effect, the same desolation in Provinces and Cities, as well as private persons. The Romans were miserably dejected after the battle of Cannas, the men amazed for fear, the stupid women tore their hair and cryed. The Hungarians when their King Ladislaus, & bravest souldiers were slain by the Turks, Luctus publicus, &c.	Such deadly events can want and poverty produce. Whether through standing surety, shipwreck, fire, soldiers' plunder and pillage, or any other loss, it makes no difference: it will produce the same effect, the same desolation in provinces and cities as in private individuals. The Romans were miserably cast down after the battle of Cannae, the men stunned with fear, the stupefied women tearing their hair and crying. So were the Hungarians when their King Ladislaus and their bravest soldiers were killed by the Turks: "public mourning," and so on.[4061]
The Venetians when their forces were overcome by the French King Lewis, the French & Spanish Kings, Pope, Emperor, all conspired against them, at Cambray, the French Herald denounced open war in the Senate: Lauredane Venetorum dux, &c. and they had lost Padua, Brixia, Verona, Forum Julij, their territories in the continent, and had now nothing left but the City of Venice it self, & urbi quoque ipsi (saith [4062]Bembus) timendum putarent, and the loss of that was likewise to be feared, tantus repente dolor omnes tenuit, ut nunquam alias, &c. they were pittifully plunged, never before in such lamentable distress.	So were the Venetians when their forces were defeated by Louis, king of France. The kings of France and Spain, the pope and the emperor had all conspired against them at Cambrai, and the French herald declared open war in the Senate: "Loredan, doge of the Venetians," and so on. They had lost Padua, Brescia, Verona, Friuli and their mainland territories, and now had nothing left but the city of Venice itself; "and they thought they must fear for the city itself," says Bembo. The loss of that too was to be feared: "so great a grief suddenly seized them all as never before," and so on. They were plunged into pitiful misery, never before in such lamentable distress.[4063]

[4061] Editor. Feral means deadly or disastrous, from Latin feralis. Suretiship is liability incurred by guaranteeing another person's debt. It boots not means it makes no difference; stupid here means stunned. Burton shifts from personal loss to collective military disaster.

[4062] Burton. Printed page 164, star: "Lib.8.Venet.hist." Book 8 of the History of Venice; Pietro Bembo.

[4063] Editor. The passage concerns the League of Cambrai and Venice's crisis under Doge Leonardo Loredan. Brixia is Brescia; Forum Julij designates Friuli here. Burton gives fragments rather than continuous quotation from Pietro Bembo, History of Venice, book 8; the precise text awaits collation.

Source page 164–165 Anno 1527, when Rome was sacked by Burbonius, the common souldiers made such spoile, that fair [4064]Churches were turned to stables, old monuments and books, made horse-litter, or burned like straw; reliques, costly pictures defaced, altars demolished, rich hangings, carpets, &c. trampled in the dirt.	In 1527, when Rome was sacked by Bourbon, the common soldiers made such havoc that beautiful churches were turned into stables, ancient records and books used as bedding for horses or burned like straw; relics and costly pictures were defaced, altars demolished, rich hangings, carpets and so on trampled into the dirt.[4065]
Source page 165 [4066]Their wives & loveliest daughters constuprated by every base culion, as Sejanus daughter was by the hangman in publike, before their fathers and husbands faces. Noblemens children, and of the wealthiest citizens, reserved for Princes beds, were prostitute to every common souldier, and kept for Concubines;	Their wives and loveliest daughters were raped by every base scoundrel, as Sejanus's daughter was by the executioner, publicly, before their fathers' and husbands' eyes. The daughters of noblemen and the wealthiest citizens, intended for princes' beds, were handed over to any common soldier and kept as concubines.[4067]

[4065] Editor. Burbonius is Charles, duke of Bourbon, associated with the imperial army's sack of Rome in 1527. Monuments here includes written records or memorial documents, given their use as litter. The Latin marginal word is provisionally transcribed Insulæ and interpreted as infulæ, mitres; the letterform and final peditæ remain uncertain.

[4067] Editor. Constuprated means raped; culion is an abusive term for a contemptible man. The ancient comparison concerns the reported assault on Sejanus's daughter before her execution, not an event of the 1527 sack. Burton's rhetoric presents the women through family status and intended marriage.

Senators and Cardinals themselves dragd along the streets, and put to exquisite torments, to confess where there money was hid; the rest murdered on heaps, lay stinking in the streets; Infants brains dashed out before their mothers eyes. A lamentable sight it was to see so goodly a City so suddenly defaced, rich citizens sent a begging to Venice, Naples, Ancona, &c. that erst lived in all maner of delights.	Senators and cardinals themselves were dragged through the streets and subjected to agonising torture to make them reveal where their money was hidden. The rest, murdered in heaps, lay stinking in the streets; infants' brains were dashed out before their mothers' eyes. It was a lamentable sight to see so splendid a city so suddenly ruined, and rich citizens who had formerly lived amid every pleasure sent begging to Venice, Naples, Ancona and elsewhere.[4068]
[4069]Those proud palaces that even now vaunted their tops up to Heaven, were dejected as low as hell in an instant. Whom will not such misery make discontent?	Those proud palaces that just now boasted their summits up to heaven were cast down as low as hell in an instant. Whom would such misery not make discontented?
Terence the Poet drowned himself (some say) for the loss of his Comedies, which suffered shipwrack. When a poor man hath made many hungry meales, got together a small summe, which he loseth in an instant; a Scholar spent many an houres study to no purpose, his labors lost, &c. how should it otherwise be?	Terence the poet drowned himself, some say, because of the loss of his comedies in a shipwreck. When a poor man has gone hungry through many meals and scraped together a small sum, only to lose it in an instant; when a scholar has spent many hours studying to no purpose, his labours lost, and so on—how could it be otherwise?[4070]

[4068] Editor. Exquisite torments means extreme or acutely painful torture, without the favourable sense of modern exquisite. The printed there money is understood as their money. The account remains Burton's historical report.

[4069] Burton. Printed page 165, star: "Ita fastu ante unum mensem turgida civitas, & cacuminibus cœlum pulsare visa, ad inferos usque paucis diebus dejecta." "Thus the city, swollen with pride one month before and seeming to strike heaven with its summits, was cast down to the underworld in a few days."

[4070] Editor. Burton marks this version of Terence's death as hearsay. The ancient Life attributed to Suetonius offers conflicting accounts, including shipwreck and death from grief at lost plays; deliberate drowning is not securely established. Compare the Terence note in Block 053.

I may conclude with Gregory, temporalium amor, quantum afficit, cùm hæret possessio, tantum quum subtrahitur, urit dolor: riches do not so much exhilarate us with their possession, as they torment us with their loss.	I may conclude with Gregory: "As deeply as love of worldly things moves us while possession lasts, so fiercely does grief burn when it is taken away." Riches do not give us as much joy in possessing them as they torment us when they are lost.[4071]
Next to Sorrow still I may annex such accidents as procure [4072]Fear; for besides those Terrors which I have [4073]before touched, and many other fears (which are infinite) there is a superstitious fear, one of the three great causes of fear in Aristotle, commonly caused by prodigies & dismal accidents, which much trouble many of us. (Nescio quid animus mihi præsagit mali.)	Next to sorrow I may also place those events that bring on fear. Besides the terrors I have already touched on, and many other fears, which are infinite, there is superstitious fear, one of the three great causes of fear in Aristotle, commonly aroused by portents and ominous events, which greatly trouble many of us. ("My mind forebodes some evil, I know not what.")[4074]
As if a Hare cross the way at our going forth, or a mouse gnaw our clothes: If they bleed three drops at nose, the salt fals towards them, a black spot apear in their nails, &c. with many such, which Delrio Tom.2.l.3.sect.4. Austin Niphus in his book de Augurijs. Polydore Virg. l.3. de Prodigijs. Sarisburiensis Polycrat. l.1.c.13. discuss at large.	For example, if a hare crosses our path as we set out, or a mouse gnaws our clothes; if three drops of blood fall from someone's nose, the salt falls towards them, or a black spot appears on their nails, and so on. These and many similar things are discussed at length by Delrio, volume 2, book 3, section 4; Agostino Nifo in his book On Auguries; Polydore Vergil, On Prodigies, book 3; and John of Salisbury, Policraticus, book 1, chapter 13.[4075]

[4071] Editor. Gregory is cited without a work or location. The exact source of the maxim remains to be established. Its Latin balances the strength of attachment and grief; Burton's English makes the stronger claim that loss torments more than possession delights. Both have been retained.

[4072] Burton. Printed page 165, unlettered heading: "fear from ominous accidents, destinies fore-told." Fear arising from ominous events and foretold destinies.

[4073] Burton. Printed page 165, c: "Sect.2.Memb.4.Subs.3." Section 2, Member 4, Subsection 3: the preceding discussion of fear.

[4074] Editor. The Latin adapts Terence, The Self-Tormentor 236: Clinia fears trouble in his love affair. Burton applies it to foreboding. His Aristotelian threefold classification has not been securely located. Prodigies means portents, not exceptionally gifted people.

[4075] Editor. Delrio is Martín del Río; Austin Niphus is Agostino Nifo; Sarisburiensis means John of Salisbury. Burton's editions and precise passages have not yet been collated. These are examples of beliefs Burton describes, not evidence that the omens predict events.

They are so much affected, that with the very strength of Imagination, Fear, and the Devils craft, [4076]they pull those misfortunes they suspect, upon their own heads, and that which they fear, shall come upon them, as Salomon fortelleth, Prov.10.24. and Isay denounceth, 66.4. which If [4077]they could neglect and contemn, would not come to pass, Eorum vires nostrâ resident opinione, ut morbi gravitas ægrotantium cogitatione, they are intended and remitted, as our opinion is fixed, more or less.	They are so deeply affected that, through the sheer force of imagination, fear and the Devil's cunning, they bring the misfortunes they suspect down upon their own heads. What they fear shall come upon them, as Solomon foretells in Proverbs 10:24 and Isaiah declares in 66:4. If they could disregard and despise these things, they would not happen: "Their power rests in our belief, as the severity of an illness does in the thoughts of the sick." They grow stronger or weaker according to the greater or lesser firmness of our belief.[4078]
N.N. dat pænas, saith [4079]Crato of such a one, utinam non attraheret: he is punished, and is the cause of it [4080]himself:	"So-and-so pays the penalty," says Crato of one such person; "if only he did not draw it upon himself!" He is punished, and is himself the cause of it.[4081]
[4082]Dum fata fugimus, fata stulti incurrimus, the thing that I feared, saith Job, is faln upon me.	"While we flee our fate, we fools run straight into it." The thing I feared, says Job, has fallen upon me.[4083]

[4076] Burton. Printed page 165, d: "Accersunt sibi malum." They summon evil upon themselves.

[4077] Burton. Printed page 165, e: "Si non observemus, nihil valent. Polidor." If we pay them no attention, they have no power. Polydore.

[4078] Editor. Intended means intensified; remitted means lessened. Burton combines belief in imagination's bodily effects with Christian claims about demons and providence. Proverbs 10:24 speaks of the fear of the wicked; Isaiah 66:4 of God bringing people's fears upon them. Burton broadens their application here.

[4079] Burton. Printed page 165, f: "Consil.26.l.2." Crato, consultation 26, book 2; exact edition and case remain to be collated.

[4080] Burton. Printed page 165, g: "Harme watch harme catch" A proverb: watch for harm and catch harm.

[4081] Editor. N.N. is a placeholder for an unnamed person. Dat pænas is the base spelling; the usual Latin expression is dat poenas, "pays the penalty." Crato is Johann Crato von Krafftheim. Burton's English gives the general sense rather than a literal rendering of utinam.

[4082] Burton. Printed page 165, dagger: "Geor. Buchan." George Buchanan; the final raised contraction is expanded as Buchan. The precise work has not been established.

[4083] Editor. Job 3:25. The Latin verse is attributed in the margin to George Buchanan; no precise dramatic source has yet been verified.

Severus, Adrian, Domitian, can testifie as much, of whose fear and suspicion, Sueton, Herodian, and the rest of those writers, tell strange stories in this behalf.	We may say the same of those troubled by their fortunes, or by evil destinies foreseen: "Foreknowledge of misfortunes torments many." Foreknowledge of what is to come tortures many people, when astrologers or sorcerers predict it "because of an angry heaven," whether it is a misfortune or death itself. This often happens by God's permission: "Because they fear the demon," says Chrysostom, "God therefore allows it to happen." Severus, Hadrian and Domitian can testify to this; Suetonius, Herodian and the other historians tell strange stories about their fear and suspicion in such matters.[4084]
Source page 166 [4085]Montanus consil.31. hath one example of a young man, exceeding melancholy upon this occasion. Such fears have still tormented mortal men in all ages, by reason of those lying oracles, and jugling Priests,	Montanus, consultation 31, gives an example of a young man made exceedingly melancholy in this way. Such fears have always tormented mortals, in every age, because of lying oracles and deceitful priests.[4086]

[4084] Editor. Iratum ob cœlum means "because of an angry heaven," here the hostile sky of astrology. Severus, Hadrian and Domitian are Roman emperors. Burton's general appeal to historians and his Chrysostom quotation remain to be collated in their exact sources.

[4085] Burton. Printed page 166, h: "Juvenis solicitus de futuris frustrà, factus melancholicus." A young man, needlessly anxious about the future, became melancholy.

[4086] Editor. Giovanni Battista da Monte, Latinized Montanus, was a physician whose consultations Burton frequently cites. Jugling means practising deception or trickery.

[4087]There was a fountain in Greece, neer Ceres Temple in Achaia, where the event of such diseases was to be known; A glass let down by a thred, &c. Amongst those Cyanean rocks at the springs of Lycia, was the Oracle of Thrixeus Apollo, where all fortunes were fore-told, sickness, health, or what they would besides: so common people have been alwayes deluded with future events.	There was a spring in Greece, near Ceres' temple in Achaea, where the outcome of such diseases could be learned: a mirror was lowered on a thread, and so on. Among the Cyanean rocks at the springs of Lycia was the oracle of Apollo Thyrxeus, where every fortune was foretold—sickness, health or anything else they wished. Thus ordinary people have always been deceived about future events.[4088]
At this day, Metus futurorum maximè torquet Sinas, this foolish fear, mightily crucifies them in China: as [4089]Matthew Riccius the Jesuite informeth us, in his Commentaries of those countries, of all Nations they are most superstitious, and much tormented in this kinde, attributing so much to their Divinators, ut ipse metus fidem faciat, that fear it self and conceipt, cause it to [4090]fall out:	Even today, "Fear of future events torments the Chinese exceedingly." This foolish fear grievously tortures them in China, as Matteo Ricci the Jesuit tells us in his account of those countries. Of all nations, they are the most superstitious and most tormented in this way, placing such trust in their diviners "that fear itself makes the prediction credible": fear itself, and imagination, cause it to come true.[4091]

[4088] Editor. Pausanias 7.21.12–13 describes the mirror oracle at Patrae, near a sanctuary of Demeter (Burton's Ceres), then the spring by Cyaneae in Lycia. Glass means mirror. The base prints Thrixeus; the modern column uses Thyrxeus, the form in the Greek text. The claim concerns divination, not a medical test.

[4089] Burton. Printed page 166, i: "Expedit. in Sinas, lib.1.c.3." Expedition into China, book 1, chapter 3. Burton's citation is retained; the exact passage and numbering require collation.

[4090] Burton. Printed page 166, k: "Timendo præoccupat, quod vitat, ultro provocatque quod fugit, gaudetque mœrens & lubens miser fuit. Heinsius Austriac." By fearing, he anticipates what he avoids, and of his own accord provokes what he flees; he rejoices in mourning and willingly became miserable. Heinsius, Austriacus. The printed change of tense is retained in translation.

[4091] Editor. This sweeping judgement about China belongs to Burton's use of a Jesuit account. Ricci's reports were published in Latin through Nicolas Trigault; Burton's exact passage is not yet collated. Conceipt here means imagination. Fidem faciat literally concerns making something credible; Burton's following English strengthens it into making it happen.

If he foretell sickness such a day, that very time they will be sick, vi metus afflicti in ægritudinem cadunt; and many times die as it is fore-told. A true saying, Timor mortis, morte pejor, the fear of death, is worse then death it self; and the memory of that sad hour, to some fortunate and rich men, is as bitter as gaule, Eccl.41.1.	If the diviner predicts sickness on a particular day, they will be sick at that very time: "Stricken by the force of fear, they fall ill"; and often they die as foretold. A true saying: "Fear of death is worse than death." The fear of death is worse than death itself; and to some prosperous and wealthy people the thought of that sad hour is as bitter as gall, Ecclesiasticus 41:1.[4092]
Inquietam nobis vitam facit mortis metus, a worse plague cannot happen to a man, then to be so troubled in his minde; 'tis triste divortium, an heavy separation, to leave their goods, with so much labor got, pleasures of the world, which they have so delitiously enjoyed, friends and companions whom they so dearly loved, all at once.	"Fear of death makes our life unquiet." No worse affliction can befall a person than such turmoil of mind. It is "a sorrowful parting," a grievous separation: to leave, all at once, possessions won with so much labour, the worldly pleasures they have enjoyed so deliciously, and friends and companions they have loved so dearly.
Axiochus the Philosopher was bold and couragious all his life, and gave good precepts de contemnenda morte, and against the vanity of the world to others; but being now ready to die himself, he was mightily dejected, hâc luce privabor? his orbabor bonis? he lamented like a childe, &c. And though Socrates himself was there to comfort him, ubi pristina virtutum jactatio O Axioche? yet he was very timorous and impatient of death, much troubled in his minde, Imbellis pavor & impatientia, &c.	Axiochus the philosopher was bold and courageous throughout his life, and gave others sound advice "on despising death" and against the vanity of the world. But when he himself was about to die, he became deeply dejected: "Shall I be deprived of this light? Bereft of these good things?" He lamented like a child, and so on. Though Socrates himself was there to comfort him—"Where is your former boasting of virtue, Axiochus?"—he was still very fearful, unable to bear death, and deeply troubled in mind: "unmanly fear and lack of fortitude," and so on.[4093]

[4093] Editor. Axiochus 365a–c, a dialogue transmitted under Plato's name but not accepted as his work. The Latin version attributed to Marsilio Ficino supplies close parallels for losing the light and good things of life, and for Socrates' rebuke. Burton condenses the exchange; it is a literary scene, not a documented deathbed report.

O Clotho, Megapetus the tyrant in Lucian exclaimes, now ready to depart, let me live a while longer. [4094]I will give thee a thousand talents of gold, and two boles besides, which I took from Cleocritus, worth an hundred talents apiece:	"O Clotho," cries the tyrant Megapenthes in Lucian, as he is about to depart, "let me live a little longer. I will give you a thousand talents of gold, and two bowls besides, which I took from Cleocritus, worth a hundred talents apiece."[4095]
Woe's me, [4096]saith another, what goodly manners shall I leave! what fertile Fields! what a fine House! what pretty Children! how many servants! Who shall gather my grapes, my corne? Must I now die so well setled? Leave all, so richly and well provided? Woe's me, what shall I do?	"Alas for me," says another, "what fine estates I shall leave! What fertile fields! What a beautiful house! What lovely children! How many servants! Who will gather my grapes, my grain? Must I die now, so well settled? Leave everything, when I am so richly and well provided for? Alas for me, what shall I do?"[4097]

[4094] Burton. Printed page 166, star at the offer: "Tom.4.dial.8.Cataplo. Auri puri mille talenta, me hodie tibi daturum promitto, &c." Volume 4, dialogue 8, Cataplus. I promise that I shall give you a thousand talents of pure gold today, and so on. The compressed printed me is read in its infinitive construction.

[4097] Editor. Manners here means manors or landed estates. Burton's margin assigns the lament to the same Lucian dialogue, but its exact wording has not been located in the version consulted. Corne means grain generally.

[4098]Animula vagula, blandula, quæ nunc abibis in loca?	Little soul, wandering, gentle, to what places will you now depart?[4099]
To these tortures of Fear and Sorrow, may well be annexed Curiosity, that irksome, that tyrannizing care, nimia solicitudo, [4100]superfluous industry about unprofitable things, and their qualities, as Thomas defines it: an itching humor or a kinde of longing to see that which is not to be seen, to do that which ought not to be done: to know that [4101]secret, which should not be known, to eat of the forbidden fruit.	To these torments of fear and sorrow we may well add curiosity: that wearisome, tyrannical preoccupation, "excessive anxiety," or unnecessary effort over useless things and their qualities, as Thomas defines it. It is an itching impulse, a kind of longing to see what is not to be seen, to do what ought not to be done, to know a secret that should not be known, to eat the forbidden fruit.[4102]
We commonly molest and tire our selves about things unfit and unnecessary, as Martha troubled her self to little purpose. Be it in Religion, Humanity, Magick, Philosophy, policie, any action or study, 'tis a needless trouble, a mear torment.	We commonly distress and exhaust ourselves over things inappropriate and unnecessary, as Martha troubled herself to little purpose. Whether in religion, classical learning, magic, philosophy, politics, or any undertaking or study, it is needless trouble, sheer torment.[4103]

[4099] Editor. History of the Emperors (Historia Augusta), Life of Hadrian 25.9, preserves the short poem ascribed to Hadrian. Burton joins its first and third lines, omitting "guest and companion of the body." The diminutives create an intimate, tender address to the departing soul.

[4101] Burton. Printed page 166, star: "Flavæ secreta Minervæ ut viderat Aglauros. Ov. Met.2." How Aglauros had seen the secrets of golden-haired Minerva. Ovid, Metamorphoses 2. Burton quotes the phrase out of its surrounding sentence.

[4102] Editor. Curiosity here is excessive, misdirected or forbidden inquiry, not simply a desire to learn. Thomas is Thomas Aquinas: compare Summa theologiae II–II, question 167, on disordered pursuit of knowledge. The Ovidian reference concerns Aglauros opening Minerva's forbidden basket, Metamorphoses 2.748–757; Burton's compressed definition has not been matched word for word to Aquinas.

[4103] Editor. Luke 10:40–42: Martha is distracted by much serving. Humanity means the study of classical literature; policie here means political affairs or statecraft.

What fruitless questions about the Trinity, resurrection, election, predestination, reprobation, hellfire and so on: how many will be saved, how many damned? What else is all superstition but an endless observance of idle ceremonies and traditions?[4104]
Source page 167 What is most of our Philosophy, but a Labyrinth of opinions, idle questions, propositions, Metaphysicall tearmes? Socrates therefore held all philosophers, cavillers & mad men, circa subtilia Cavillatores pro insanis habuit, palam eos arguens, saith [4105]Eusebius, because they commonly sought after such things quæ nec percipi à nobis neque comprehendi posset, or put case they did understand, yet they were altogether unprofitable.	What is most of our philosophy but a labyrinth of opinions, idle questions, propositions and metaphysical terms? Socrates therefore considered all philosophers quibblers and madmen: “He regarded those who quibbled over subtleties as insane, openly reproving them,” says Eusebius, because they commonly pursued things “which we could neither perceive nor comprehend”; or, supposing they did understand them, they were still altogether useless.[4106]
For what matter is it for us to know how high the Pleiades are, how far distant Persius and Cassiopea from us, how deep the sea, &c. we are neither wiser, as he follows it, nor modester, nor better, nor richer, nor stronger for the knowledge of it. Quod supra nos nihil ad nos,	For what does it matter to us to know how high the Pleiades are, how far Perseus and Cassiopeia lie from us, how deep the sea is, and so on? As he goes on to say, knowing these things makes us neither wiser, more temperate, better, richer nor stronger. “What is above us is no concern of ours.”[4107]

[4105] Burton. Printed page 167, dagger: “Contra Philos. cap.61.” Against the Philosophers, chapter 61. Compare Eusebius, Preparation for the Gospel 15.61–62; the latter quotes Xenophon on Socrates.

[4106] Editor. Eusebius, Preparation for the Gospel 15.61–62, criticizes speculative natural philosophy and quotes Xenophon’s Memorabilia on Socrates. Burton compresses this into a general charge against all philosophers; that breadth is his wording. Posset in the base is grammatically awkward after the plural quæ and is retained.

[4107] Editor. The Pleiades are a star cluster; Perseus and Cassiopeia are constellations. The base prints Persius, ordinarily the Roman poet’s name, and Cassiopea. The context establishes the celestial sense. Eusebius’s ensuing discussion connects useful knowledge with moral and practical improvement.

to what end are such great Tomes? why do we spend so many yeers in their studies? Much better to know nothing at all, as those barbarous Indians are wholly ignorant, then as some of us, to be so sore vexed about unprofitable toies: stultus labor est ineptiarum, to build an house without pins, make a rope of sand, to what end? cui bono?	What purpose do such enormous books serve? Why do we spend so many years studying them? Far better to know nothing at all, as those barbarous Indians are wholly ignorant, than to be, as some of us are, so grievously vexed over useless trifles: “Labour spent on trifles is foolish”—building a house without pegs, making a rope of sand. To what end? “What good does it do?”[4109]
He studies on, but as the boy told St. Austin, when I have laved the sea dry, thou shalt understand the mystery of the Trinity. He makes observations, keeps times and seasons; and as [4110]Conradus the Emperor would not touch his new Bride, till an Astrologer had told him a masculine hour, but with what success?	He studies on; but, as the boy told Saint Augustine, “When I have emptied the sea, you shall understand the mystery of the Trinity.” He makes observations, attends to times and seasons; and, like the emperor Conrad, who would not touch his new bride until an astrologer had told him an hour favourable to conceiving a boy—but with what success?[4111]

[4108] Editor. Genethliacal refers to astrological judgements based on births. Elections are the choice of supposedly favourable times. Physick means medicine; sophisms are deceptive or excessively subtle arguments. Burton includes disciplines central to his own heavily learned book in this satirical catalogue.

[4110] Burton. Printed page 167, star: “Mat. Paris.” Matthew Paris; the Conrad anecdote remains uncollated.

[4111] Editor. The boy and Augustine belong to a traditional exemplum about the limits of human understanding, not an episode in Augustine’s own account of his life. A masculine hour is an astrologically selected time intended to produce a male child. Burton’s identification of the emperor as Conrad and the reference to Matthew Paris remain unverified.

an Antiquary consumes his treasure and time to scrape up a company of old coynes, statues, roles, edicts, manuscripts, &c. he must know what was done of old in Athens, Rome, what lodging, diet, houses they had, and have all the present news at first, though never so remote, before all others, what projects, counsels, consultations, &c. quid Juno in aurem insusurret Jovi, whats now decreed in France, what in Italy: who was he, whence comes he, which way, whether goes he, &c.	An antiquary consumes his money and time scraping together a collection of old coins, statues, rolls, edicts, manuscripts and so on. He must know what happened long ago in Athens and Rome, what lodgings, food and houses they had; and he must have all the latest news, however distant, before anyone else—what schemes, counsels, deliberations, and so on; "what Juno whispers into Jupiter's ear"; what is now decreed in France, what in Italy; who that man was, where he comes from, which way he is going, where he is bound, and so on.[4114]

[4112] Editor. The maxim is attributed here to Socrates; its precise source remains unresolved. Creek means an inlet or small coastal recess.

[4113] Editor. The philosopher's stone was the hoped-for agent of alchemical transmutation. Burton's parenthesis is syntactically displaced; the modern column attaches his denial to the hoped-for making of gold while retaining the catalogue of extravagant promises.

[4114] Editor. An antiquary studies or collects remains of the past. Roles means rolls or written records; whether here means whither. Juno and Jupiter supply a comic image of prying even into the gods' private deliberations; the exact source of the phrase remains unlocated.

—— Lepidæ lexeis compostæ ut tesserulæ omnes,	Lovely phrases, all arranged like little mosaic tiles,[4118]

[4115] Editor. The Euripus is the strait by Chalcis, famous for its changing currents. The alleged fatal puzzle for Aristotle belongs to legend. Pliny the Elder's death during the eruption is described in his nephew's Letters 6.16, which also records a rescue mission: Burton selects curiosity for his argument. Compare Plutarch, Pyrrhus 14, for the projected conquests and Cineas's question about eventual rest. The sequence in Plutarch runs through Italy, Sicily, Libya and Carthage, then Macedonia and Greece; Burton's reference to Asia differs.

[4116] Burton. Printed page 167, dagger: "Seneca." Seneca; see the editorial note on the textual history of this line.

[4117] Editor. The quotation belongs to the first chorus of Seneca's Hercules Furens. Turbine magno spes sollicitae is an interpolated line, traditionally numbered 162, omitted by modern editions; Burton's wording also adds in before urbibus. Ardelion means a meddler or officious busybody. A fourth commands is preserved as a statement of what the fourth person does.

[4118] Editor. Lucilius, quoted by Cicero, Orator 149. The comparison is to carefully fitted mosaic cubes. Cicero's text has quam lepide lexis compostae; Burton changes the opening to Lepidæ lexeis, retained in the original column and translated as printed.

Source page 168 A third is over-solicitous about his diet, he must have such and such exquisite sauces, meat so dressed, so far fetched, peregrini aeris volucres, so cooked, &c. something to provoke thirst, something anon to quench his thirst. Thus he redeems his appetite with extraordinary charge to his purse, is seldome pleased with any meale, whilest a triviall stomack useth all with delight and is never offended.	A third is excessively anxious about his diet. He must have this or that exquisite sauce, food prepared just so, brought from far away—"birds from foreign skies"—cooked in just this way, and so on; something to excite his thirst, then something else to quench it. Thus he buys back his appetite at extraordinary expense, yet is seldom pleased with any meal, while an ordinary stomach enjoys everything and takes offence at nothing.[4120]

Another must have roses in winter, "flowers of another season," snow-water in summer, fruit before it can be, or usually is, ripe; artificial gardens and fishponds on the roofs of houses; everything unlike what ordinary people have, elaborate and rare, or else it is worthless.[4121]

[4119] Editor. Stramineous literally means made of straw, hence flimsy or worthless. Terse and polite here describe a neat, polished appearance. Curious pictures are finely wrought or choice works; plots are plans; degrees are ranks or dignities.

[4121] Editor. Compare Seneca, Moral Letters 122.8, for roses out of season and orchards on towers and roofs. Burton's full catalogue and its Latin phrase have not been collated to a single passage. Snow-water is water chilled or supplied by snow.

So busie, nice, curious wits, make that unsupportable in all vocations, trades, actions, employments, which to duller apprehensions is not offensive, earnestly seeking that which others as scornfully neglect. Thus restless, fastidious, over-inquisitive minds make things unbearable in every calling, trade, action and occupation which do not trouble duller understandings. They eagerly pursue what others just as scornfully disregard. Through our foolish curiosity we wear ourselves away, exhaust our souls, and rush headlong, through lack of judgement, perversity of will and lack of self-control, into countless needless cares and troubles, useless expenses, tedious journeys and laborious hours. [4123]Nescire velle quæ Magister maximus Docere non vult, erudita inscitia est.	To wish not to know what the greatest Teacher Does not wish to teach is learned ignorance.[4124] [4122] Editor. Nice means fastidious or over-particular; macerate means wear away or waste. Want of government means lack of self-control. The point is the burden created by compulsive refinement or inquiry.

[4123] Burton. Printed page 168, dagger: "Jos. Scaliger in Gnomit." Joseph Scaliger, in his maxims. Gnomit. is the apparent printed abbreviation; exact collection and text remain uncollated.

[4124] Editor. Burton attributes the maxim to Joseph Scaliger. The greatest Teacher is understood here as God; learned ignorance means knowingly accepting the limits of what can be learned. The exact source remains to be established.

Amongst these passions and irksome Accidents, [4125]unfortunate marriage may be ranked: a condition of life appointed by God himself in Paradise, an honourable and happy estate, and as great a felicity as can befall a man in this world, [4126]if the parties can agree as they ought, and live as [4127]Seneca lived with his Paulina: but if they be unequally matched, or at discord, a greater misery cannot be expected, to have a scold, a slut, an harlot, a fool, a fury or a fiend, there can be no such plague.	Among these passions and distressing circumstances we may rank an unhappy marriage. Marriage is a condition of life ordained by God himself in Paradise, an honourable and happy state, and as great a blessing as can befall a man in this world, if the partners can agree as they should and live as Seneca lived with his Paulina. But if they are ill matched or at odds, no greater misery can be imagined: to have a shrew, a slattern, a whore, a fool, a fury or a fiend—there can be no affliction like it.[4128]
Eccles.26.14. He that hath her is as if he held a Scorpion, &26.25. a wicked wife makes a sorry countenance, an heavy heart, and he had rather dwell with a Lyon, then keep house with such a wife. Her [4129]properties Jovianus Pontanus hath described at large, Ant.dial.Tom.2. under the name of Euphorbia.	Ecclesiasticus 26:14: “He who has her is as though he held a scorpion”; and 26:25: “A wicked wife makes a sorrowful face and a heavy heart”; and he would rather live with a lion than keep house with such a wife. Giovanni Pontano has described her characteristics at length, under the name Euphorbia, in his dialogue Antonius, volume 2.[4130]

[4126] Burton. Printed page 168, l: “A vertuous woman is the crown of her husband. Prov.12.4. but she &c.” A virtuous woman is her husband’s crown, Proverbs 12:4; the verse continues by contrasting a wife who brings shame.

[4127] Burton. Printed page 168, m: “Lib.17.epist.105.” Book 17, letter 105. The loving account of Paulina is in Seneca, Moral Letters 104.1–5 in the numbering consulted; the printed reference is retained.

[4128] Editor. Burton frames marriage through Genesis 2 and Proverbs 12:4, then gives a conventional hostile catalogue of wives before turning to women’s suffering. Slut here chiefly means a slovenly woman; harlot carries the sexual accusation separately. Compare Seneca, Moral Letters 104.1–5, for his loving concern for Paulina; the margin prints 105.

[4129] Burton. Printed page 168, n: “Tittonatur, candelabratur. &c.” Tittonatur remains a provisional reading of this scan. Pontano’s corresponding comic verbs are reported as titionatur and candelabratur; see the Editor’s note for their context. The marginal spelling has not been silently emended.

[4130] Editor. The Ecclesiasticus passages are 26:7, 25:23 and 25:16 in King James numbering, differing from Burton’s references. Pontano’s Antonius depicts Euphorbia attacking household utensils. Shephard’s study locates it at Opera (1501), signature i ii v, and explains the verbs as using pokers and throwing candlesticks. Sabbadini prints titionatur, candelabratur. These establish context through later witnesses; Burton’s exact edition and the provisional marginal spelling still need direct collation.

Or if they be not equal in years, the like mischief happens. Cecilius in Agellius lib.2.cap.23. complains much of an old wife, dum ejus morti inhio, egomet mortuus vivo inter vivos, whilest I gape after her death, I live a dead man amongst the living, or if they dislike upon any occasion,	Or, if they are unequal in age, the same trouble arises. Caecilius, in Aulus Gellius, book 2, chapter 23, complains bitterly of an old wife: "While I long for her death, I myself live dead among the living." While I eagerly await her death, I live a dead man among the living. Or if they take a dislike to each other for any reason:[4131]
[4132]Judge who that are unfortunately wed What 'tis to come into a loathed bed.	Judge, you who are unhappily married, What it is to come to a bed you loathe.[4133]
The same inconvenience befals women.	The same misfortune befalls women.
[4134]At vos ô duri miseram lugete parentes, Si ferro aut laqueo læva hac me exsolvere sorte Sustineo: ——	But you, hard-hearted parents, mourn your wretched daughter, If I bring myself, by the blade or the noose, to release myself From this unhappy fate.[4135]
Hard hearted parents both lament my fate, If self I kill or hang, to ease my state.	Hard-hearted parents, both lament my fate, If I kill or hang myself to ease my plight.

[4131] Editor. Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights 2.23, compares Caecilius Statius with Menander. Burton's Latin slightly recasts the husband's complaint in Caecilius's Plocium (2.23.10), changing mortem to morti and rearranging vivo mortuus. Agellius is an older form for Aulus Gellius; affect later in the passage means love.

[4132] Burton. Printed page 168, dagger: "Daniel in Rosamund." Samuel Daniel, The Complaint of Rosamond.

[4133] Editor. Samuel Daniel, The Complaint of Rosamond, lines 440–441 in the 1592 transcription consulted: "Iudge they who are vnfortunately wed" and "What tis to come vnto a loathed bed." Burton varies both lines slightly. Rosamond speaks of unwanted sexual intimacy; the comparison to unhappy marriage comes from her complaint.

[4134] Burton. Printed page 168, dagger: "Chalinorus lib.9.de repub. Angl." Thomas Chaloner, On the English Commonwealth, book 9; precise passage remains uncollated.

[4135] Editor. Thomas Chaloner's Latin verse, as attributed by Burton. The construction means "if I bring myself to release myself from this adverse fate," with by the blade or noose specifying the means. Burton's own English couplet follows separately; it is not replaced by the fresh translation.

Source page 168–169 [4136]A young Gentlewoman in Basil, was married, saith Felix Plater, observat. l.1. to an ancient man against her will, whom she could not affect, she was continually melancholy, and pined away for grief; and though her husband did all he could possibly to give her content, in a discontented humor at length she hanged her self. Many other stories he relates in this kinde.	A young gentlewoman in Basel, says Felix Platter in Observations, book 1, was married against her will to an elderly man whom she could not love. She was continually melancholy and wasted away with grief; and although her husband did everything he possibly could to please her, in her unhappiness she eventually hanged herself. He relates many other stories of this kind.[4137]
Source page 169 [4138]Thus men are plagued with women; they again with men, when they are of divers humors and conditions; he a spendthrift, she sparing; one honest, the other dishonest, &c. Parents many times disquiet their children, and they their parents. [4139]A foolish son is an heaviness to his mother. Injusta noverca:	Thus men are afflicted by women, and women in turn by men, when their temperaments and characters differ: he a spendthrift, she thrifty; one honest, the other dishonest, and so on. Parents often distress their children, and children their parents. “A foolish son is a grief to his mother.” “The unjust stepmother”:[4140]

[4136] Burton. Printed page 168, o: “Elegans virgo invita cuidam è nostratibus nupsit, &c.” A beautiful young woman unwillingly married one of our countrymen, and so on.

[4137] Editor. Felix Platter’s Observations, book 1, as cited by Burton; the case has not yet been checked in Platter’s original edition. Basil is Basel; ancient means elderly. The report illustrates coerced marriage and distress; Burton’s assertion of the husband’s efforts is part of the reported narrative.

[4140] Editor. Humors and conditions here means dispositions and characters. Proverbs 10:1 contrasts a wise son with a foolish one. Injusta noverca invokes the conventional hostile stepmother of ancient literature; it is not a neutral generalization about families. The orphaned p marker is retained in a Burton note.

A step-mother often vexeth a whole family, is matter of repentance, exercise of patience, fuel of dissention, which made Cato's son expostulate with his father, why he should offer to marry his client Solinius daughter, a young wench, Cujus causa novercam induceret; what offence had he done, that he should marry again?	A stepmother often troubles an entire family, provides grounds for regret, tests patience and fuels discord. This made Cato's son remonstrate with his father when he proposed to marry the young daughter of his client Salonius: "For what reason was he bringing in a stepmother?" What offence had the son committed, that his father should marry again?[4141]

Unkinde, unnatural friends, evil neighbors, bad servants, debts and debates, &c. 'twas Chilons sentence, comes æris alieni & litis est miseria, misery and usury do commonly together; suretiship is the bane of many families, Sponde, præstò noxa est: he shall be sore vexed that is surety for a stranger, Prov.11.15. and he that hateth suretiship is sure.	Unkind, unnatural friends, wicked neighbours, bad servants, debts and disputes, and so on. It was Chilon's saying: "Misery is the companion of debt and litigation." Misery and moneylending at interest commonly go together. Standing surety is the ruin of many families: "Give a guarantee, and harm is at hand." He who stands surety for a stranger will suffer sorely, Proverbs 11:15; and he who hates giving guarantees is safe.[4142]
Contention, brawling, law-sutes, falling out of neighbors and friends. —— discordia demens (Virg.Æn.6.) are equal to the first, grieve many a man and vex his soul. Nihil sanè miserabilius eorum mentibus (as [4143]Boter holds) nothing so miserable as such men, ful of cares, griefs, anxieties, as if they were stabbed with a sharp sword, fear, suspicion, desperation, sorrow, are their ordinary companions.	Contention, brawling, lawsuits, quarrels between neighbours and friends—"maddened Discord" (Virgil, Aeneid 6)—are equal to the former troubles: they grieve many a man and torment his soul. "Surely nothing is more wretched than their minds," as Botero maintains. Nothing is so miserable as such men, full of cares, griefs and anxieties, as though stabbed with a sharp sword; fear, suspicion, despair and sorrow are their constant companions.[4144]

[4143] Burton. Printed page 169, r: "De increm. urb.lib.3.c.3. tanquam diro mucrone confossi, his nulla requies, nulla delectatio, solicitudine, gemitu, furore, desperatione, timore, tanquam ad perpetuam ærumnam infeliciter rapti." On the Growth of Cities, book 3, chapter 3: "As though pierced by a dreadful blade, they have no rest, no pleasure; through anxiety, groaning, fury, despair and fear they are unhappily swept away, as it were, to endless misery."

Our Welchmen are noted by some of their [4145]own writers, to consume one another in this kinde; but whosoever they are that use it, these are their common symptomes, especially if they be convict or overcome, [4146]cast in a suit. Arius put out of a Bishoprick by Eustathius, turned Heretick, and lived after discontented all his life.	Some of their own writers remark that our Welshmen ruin one another in this way. But whoever engages in it, these are their usual symptoms, especially when found guilty or defeated—when they lose a lawsuit. Arius, deprived of a bishopric by Eustathius, became a heretic and afterwards lived discontentedly all his life.[4147]
[4148]Every repulse is of like nature; heu quanta de spe decidi! Disgrace, infamy, detraction, will almost effect as much, and that a long time after. Hipponax a Satyrical Poet, so vilified and lashed two painters in his Iambicks, ut ambo laqueo se suffocarent, [4149]Pliny saith, both hanged themselves.	Every rejection has the same effect: “Alas, from what great hopes have I fallen!” Disgrace, dishonour and slander will do almost as much, and their effects last long afterwards. Hipponax, a satirical poet, so vilified and scourged two painters in his iambic verses “that both strangled themselves with a noose,” Pliny says: both hanged themselves.[4150]

[4147] Editor. Cast in a suit means losing a lawsuit; disabled here means disparaged, as later in this passage. Burton’s national generalization is attributed to Humphrey Llwyd and William Vaughan, not endorsed by this edition. His Arius appears to confuse the better-known Arius with Aerius, whose rivalry with Eustathius of Sebaste is described by Epiphanius, Panarion 75; the summary of Epiphanius consulted says that Aerius failed to become bishop in Eustathius’s place. The name is retained pending fuller collation. The marginal Virgil phrase, from Aeneid 1.27, originally concerns Juno’s resentment at the rejection of her beauty.

[4150] Editor. Pliny, Natural History 36.11–12 (chapter 4, with older subsection 5 in the edition consulted), identifies the artists as the sculptors Bupalus and Athenis. He reports the suicide story but expressly rejects it, citing their later works. Burton calls them painters and omits Pliny’s rejection. Both differences are preserved rather than silently repaired. Repulse means rejection or rebuff; the two short Latin exclamations still require exact source identification.

All oppositions, dangers, perplexities, discontents, [4151]to live in any suspense, are of the same rank: potes hoc sub casu ducere somnos? Who can be secure in such cases. Ill bestowed benefits, ingratitude, unthankful friends much disquiet and molest some.	All opposition, dangers, perplexities, discontents, and living in any uncertainty belong to the same class: “Can you sleep in such a crisis?” Who can feel secure in such circumstances? Benefits bestowed on the undeserving, ingratitude and unthankful friends greatly disturb and distress some people.[4152]
Unkinde speeches trouble as many: uncivil carriage or dogged answers, weak women above the rest, if they proceed from their surly husbands, are as bitter as gaul, and not to be digested. A [4153]Glass-mans wife in Basil became melancholy because her husband said he would marry again if she died.	Unkind words trouble just as many. Rude behaviour or surly answers—especially for frail women, when these come from their ill-tempered husbands—are as bitter as gall and cannot be digested. A glassworker’s wife in Basel became melancholy because her husband said he would marry again if she died.[4154]
No cut to unkindness, as the saying is, a frown and hard speech, ill respect, a brow-beating, or bad look, especially to Courtiers, or such as attend upon great persons, is present death:	No wound cuts like unkindness, as the saying goes. A frown or harsh word, discourtesy, browbeating or an angry look is instant death, especially to courtiers or those who serve the great.
Ingenium vultu statque caditque suo,	Talent rises and falls with his expression.[4155]

[4151] Burton. Printed page 169, y: “Nihil æque amarum, quam diu pendere: quidam æquiore animo ferunt præcidi spem suam quam trahi. Seneca cap.3. lib.2. de Den.” “Nothing is so bitter as long suspense: some bear the cutting off of their hope more calmly than its being drawn out.” Seneca, chapter 3, book 2; the final abbreviation is provisionally transcribed as printed. See the editorial note.

[4152] Editor. The question about sleep is from Virgil, Aeneid 4.560: Mercury rebukes Aeneas for sleeping while danger threatens. Seneca’s maxim in the margin is from On Benefits 2.5.1, on the cruelty of delaying a promised gift. Burton gives chapter 3 and changes the word order. The scan’s final abbreviation looks like de Den.; the intended title is De beneficiis.

[4153] Burton. Printed page 169, unlettered references: “Virg. Plater observat.lib.1.” Virgil; Platter, Observations, book 1. The adjacent unlettered references are retained together here; Virgil relates to the preceding question about sleep, Platter to the glassworker’s wife.

[4154] Editor. Glass-man means a worker or dealer in glass; Basil is Basel. Burton cites Felix Platter’s Observations, book 1, but the exact case has not yet been collated. His claim about weak women belongs to his own gendered account of susceptibility.

[4155] Editor. Ovid, Fasti 1.18, addresses Germanicus: the poet’s talent rises or falls with the patron’s expression. Ovid has tuo, your; Burton prints suo, his own. The modern rendering follows Burton’s application to masters and dependants, while the original retains his altered pronoun.

they ebbe and flow with their masters favors. Some persons are at their wits ends, if by chance they overshoot themselves, in their ordinary speeches, or actions, which may after turn to their disadvantage or disgrace, or have any secret disclosed.	They ebb and flow with their masters' favour. Some people are at their wits' end if they happen to go too far in their ordinary words or actions, in a way that may later bring them disadvantage or disgrace, or if some secret of theirs is revealed.
Source page 169–170 Ronseus epist. miscel.3. reports of a Gentlewoman 25. years old; that falling foule with one of her Gossips, was upbraided with a secret infirmity, (no matter what) in publike and so much grieved with it, that shee did thereupon solitudines quærere, omnes ab se ablegare, ac tandem in gravissimam incidens melancholiam, contabescere, forsake all company, quite moped, and in a melancholy humor pine away.	Ronsse, Miscellaneous Letters 3, reports the case of a gentlewoman of twenty-five who quarrelled with one of her female friends and was publicly reproached with a secret infirmity—no matter what. She was so distressed by it that she began "to seek solitude, send everyone away from her, and at last, falling into the deepest melancholy, waste away": she forsook all company, became utterly withdrawn, and pined away in a melancholy state.[4156]
Source page 170 Others are as much tortured to see themselve rejected, contemned, scorned, disabled, dis-famed, detracted, undervalued, or [4157] [4158]left behind their fellow's. Lucian brings in Ætamacles a Philosopher in his Lapith.convivio, much discontented that he was not invited amongst the rest, expostulating the matter, in a long Epistle with Aristenetus their Host.	Others are just as tormented to find themselves rejected, despised, scorned, disparaged, defamed, slandered, undervalued, or left behind their fellows. In his Symposium, or The Lapiths, Lucian introduces the philosopher Aetamacles, deeply displeased at not being invited with the others, protesting about it in a long letter to their host Aristaenetus.[4159]

[4156] Editor. Gossip here means a familiar female companion, originally a fellow godparent, not necessarily a person spreading rumours. Moped describes withdrawal and dejection. Boudewijn Ronsse's Miscellaneous Letters 3 is Burton's cited source; the report's exact wording remains uncollated.

[4159] Editor. Both z notes quote Horace, Art of Poetry 417. Lucian, Symposium 21–24, names the excluded Stoic Hetoimocles (Ετοιμοκλῆς): his letter to Aristaenetus denies concern for food while bitterly protesting the slight. Ætamacles is Burton's form, retained here; its origin in his intermediary edition remains uncollated.

Prætextatus a robed Gentleman in Plutarch, would not sit down at a Feast, because he might not sit highest, but went his wayes all in a chafe. We see the common quarrellings that are ordinary with us, for taking of the wall, precedency, and the like, which though toyes in themselves, and things of no moment, yet they cause many distempers, much heart-burning amongst us.	Praetextatus, a gentleman in a robe in Plutarch, would not sit down at a feast because he could not take the highest place, but went away in a fury. We see the everyday quarrels among us over taking the wall, precedence and the like: although trifles in themselves and matters of no importance, they cause many disturbances and much resentment among us.[4160]
Nothing pierceth deeper then a contempt or disgrace, [4161]especially if they be generous spirits, scarce anything affects them more, then to be despised or vilified. Crato consil.16.l.2. exemplifies it, and common experience confirmes it.	Nothing cuts deeper than contempt or disgrace, especially in people of noble spirit; scarcely anything affects them more than being despised or vilified. Crato, consultation 16, book 2, gives an example, and common experience confirms it.[4162]
Of the same nature is oppression, Ecclus,77. surely oppression makes a man mad, loss of liberty, which made Brutus venture his life, Cato kill himself, & [4163]Tully complain, Omnem hilaritatem in perpetuum amisi, mine heart's broken, I shall never look up, or be merry again, [4164]hæc jactura intolerabilis, to some parties 'tis a most intolerable loss.	Of the same nature is oppression—Ecclesiastes 7:7, "Surely oppression makes a man mad"—and loss of liberty, which made Brutus risk his life, Cato kill himself, and Cicero lament, "I have lost all cheerfulness for ever": my heart is broken; I shall never lift my head or be merry again. "This loss is unbearable": to some people it is a most intolerable loss.[4165]

[4161] Burton. Printed page 170, b: "Scimus enim generosas naturas, nulla re citius moveri, aut gravius affici quam contemptu ac despicientia." "For we know that noble natures are moved by nothing more quickly, or affected by nothing more deeply, than contempt and disdain."

[4163] Burton. Printed page 170, †: "An Atticum epist.lib.12." Letters to Atticus, book 12. The printed An is retained; the intended title is Ad Atticum.

[4164] Burton. Printed page 170, *: "Epist.ad Brutum." Letters to Brutus.

[4165] Editor. Ecclus,77. points to Ecclesiastes 7:7. Cicero, To Atticus 12.40.3, says his former cheerfulness is lost, but immediately insists that his firmness remains. Burton abbreviates the Latin and expands it into despair in his English gloss; both are retained. The second phrase, attributed to a letter to Brutus, remains unlocated.

Banishment a great misery, as Tyrteus describes it in an Epigram of his,	Banishment is a great misery, as Tyrtaeus describes it in a poem of his:
Nam miserum est patriâ amissa, laribusque vagari Mendicum, & timidâ voce rogare cibos: Omnibus invisus, quocunque accesserit exul Semper erit, semper spretus egensque jacet, &c.	For it is wretched, country and home lost, to wander A beggar, and ask for food in a timid voice. Wherever the exile goes, he will always be hated By all; always despised, he lies in want, and so on.[4166]
A miserable thing 'tis so to wander, And like a begger for to whine at door, Contemn'd of all the world, an exile is, Hated, rejected, needy still and poor.	A miserable thing it is to wander so, And like a beggar whine from door to door; Despised by all the world, an exile is Hated, rejected, always needy, poor.
Polynices in his conference with Iocasta in [4167]Euripides, reckons up five miseries of a banished man, the least of which alone, were enough to deject some pusillanimous creatures. Oftentimes a too great feeling of our own infirmities or imperfections of body or minde, will rivel us up: as if we be long sick:	In his conversation with Jocasta in Euripides, Polynices lists five miseries of a banished man, the least of which alone would be enough to cast down some faint-hearted creatures. Often an excessive awareness of our own infirmities or imperfections of body or mind will shrivel us up, as when we are ill for a long time.[4168]
O beata sanitas, te præsente, amœnum Ver florit gratiis, absque te nemo beatus:	O blessed health, in your presence pleasant Spring blooms with charms; without you no one is happy.[4169]

[4166] Editor. Tyrtaeus is a Greek elegiac poet. The passage is given here in Burton's Latin version, translated afresh, followed separately by a modernization of his English verse. The precise Latin intermediary has not been identified; no claim is made that these are Tyrtaeus's original words.

[4167] Burton. Printed page 170, c: "In Phœniss." In The Phoenician Women.

[4168] Editor. Euripides, The Phoenician Women: the exchange between Polynices and Jocasta concerns exile and its humiliations. Burton's count of five miseries and his immediate edition remain to be collated. Pusillanimous means faint-hearted; rivel means shrivel or wrinkle.

[4169] Editor. Compare the close parallel in Ariphron's hymn to Health, preserved in Athenaeus, Deipnosophists 15.63 (702a–b): pleasures flourish with Health, and no one is happy without her. This identifies the Greek parallel, not Burton's precise Latin intermediary. His separate English appeal and biblical reference are retained.

O blessed health! thou art above all gold and treasure, Ecclus.30.15. the poor mans riches, the rich mans bliss, without thee there can be no happiness: Or visited with some loathsome disease, offensive to others, or troublesome to our selves: as a stinking breath, deformity of our limbs, crookedness, loss of an eye, leg, hand, paleness, leanness, redness, baldness, loss or want of hair, &c.	O blessed health! You are above all gold and treasure, Ecclesiasticus 30:15: the poor man's riches, the rich man's bliss; without you there can be no happiness. Or we may be afflicted with some loathsome disease, offensive to others or troublesome to ourselves: bad breath, misshapen limbs, bodily crookedness, the loss of an eye, leg or hand, pallor, thinness, redness, baldness, the loss or lack of hair, and so on.[4170]
hic ubi fluere cœpit, diros ictus cordi infert, saith [4171]Synesius, he himself troubled not a little ob comæ defectum, the loss of hair alone, strikes a cruel stroke to the heart. Acco an old woman, seeing by chance her face in a true glass (for she used false flattering glasses belike at other times, as most Gentlewomen do) animi dolore in insaniam delapsa est, (Cælius Rhodiginus l.17.c.2.) ran mad.	"When it begins to fall out, it deals dreadful blows to the heart," says Synesius, himself not a little troubled "by the loss of his hair." Hair loss alone strikes a cruel blow to the heart. Acco, an old woman, happened to see her face in a truthful mirror—for, apparently, she used false, flattering mirrors at other times, as most gentlewomen do—and "through anguish of mind fell into madness" (Caelius Rhodiginus, book 17, chapter 2): she went mad.[4172]

[4170] Editor. Ecclesiasticus, also called Sirach, 30:15 values health above gold and bodily well-being above wealth. Burton follows this with his own fuller appeal. His following catalogue records historical language about appearance, illness and disability, rather than adopting it as an editorial judgment.

[4172] Editor. Synesius's Eulogy of Baldness, chapter 1, describes the pain of finding his hair falling out. The humorous defence of baldness is the setting for Burton's example; Burton's Latin wording itself remains to be collated with his Latin edition. Acco is another learned anecdote attributed to Caelius Rhodiginus, not an independently verified case.

[4173]Brotheus the son of Vulcan, because he was ridiculous for his imperfections, flung himself into the fire. Lais of Corinth now grown old, gave up her glass to Venus, for she could not abide to look upon it. [4174]Qualis sum nolo, qualis eram nequeo. Generally to fair nice peeces, old age and foul linen are two most odious things, a torment of torments, they may not abide the thought of it.	Brotheus, the son of Vulcan, threw himself into the fire because his imperfections made him an object of ridicule. Lais of Corinth, now grown old, gave her mirror to Venus because she could not bear to look into it: “As I am, I will not see myself; as I was, I cannot.” Generally, to these beautiful, fastidious creatures, old age and dirty linen are the two most hateful things, a torment of torments; they cannot endure even the thought of them.[4175]

[4174] Burton. Printed page 170, †: “E Cret.” The abbreviation is transcribed provisionally; its intended expansion has not been established.

[4175] Editor. Ovid, Ibis 517–518 in the consulted text, mentions Broteas giving himself to a funeral pyre, but does not state his parentage or disfigurement; those details remain unverified here. The Lais mirror epigram is Greek Anthology 6.1, traditionally ascribed to Plato; Burton’s Latin intermediary and E Cret. remain unresolved. Fair nice peeces dismissively describes beautiful, fastidious women.

[4176] Burton. Printed page 171, *: “Hor.3.Car.Ode.3.” Horace, Odes, book 3, ode 3, as printed. The passage is from ode 27; see the editorial note.

To be foul, ugly, and deformed, much better be buried alive. Some are fair but barren, and that gaules them. Hannah wept sore, did not eat, and was troubled in spirit, and all for her barrenness, 1.Sam.1. and Gen.30. Rachel said in the anguish of her soul, give me a child, or I shall die: another hath too many: one was never married, and that's his hell, another is, and that's his plague.	To be foul, ugly and deformed—far better to be buried alive. Some are beautiful but barren, and that torments them. Hannah wept bitterly, did not eat, and was troubled in spirit, all because she was barren, 1 Samuel 1. And in Genesis 30, Rachel said in the anguish of her soul, "Give me a child, or I shall die." Another has too many. One has never married, and that is his hell; another is married, and that is his plague.[4178]
Some are troubled in that they are obscure; others by being traduced, slandered, abused, disgraced, vilified, or any way injured: minimè miror eos (as he said) qui insanire occipiunt ex injuriâ, I marvel not at all if offences make men mad. Seventeen particular causes of anger and offence Aristotle reckons them up, which for brevities sake I must omit.	Some are troubled because they are obscure; others because they are maligned, slandered, abused, disgraced, vilified or injured in any way: "I am not at all surprised at those," as he said, "who begin to go mad through being wronged." I do not wonder at all if injuries make men mad. Aristotle lists seventeen particular causes of anger and offence, which for brevity's sake I must omit.[4179]

[4178] Editor. Hannah's distress is described in 1 Samuel 1:7–10; Rachel's appeal is in Genesis 30:1. Burton gives child in the singular where the familiar biblical wording gives children. The extreme preference for burial belongs to the rhetoric of the preceding discussion, not to advice from this edition.

[4179] Editor. Traduced means maligned. Burton does not name the speaker of the Latin maxim. Aristotle's account of anger is relevant, but Burton's specific enumeration of seventeen and its source have not been established.

No tydings troubles one; ill reports, rumors, bad tydings or news, hard hap, ill success, cast in a sute, vain hopes, or hope deferred, another: expectation, adeo omnibus in rebus molesta semper est expectatio, as [4180]Polibius observes; one is too too eminent, another too base borne, and that alone tortures him as much as the rest: one is out of action, company, imployment; another overcome and tormented with worldly cares, and onerous business. But what [4181]tongue can suffice to speak of all?	No news troubles one person; ill reports, rumours, bad news, hard fortune, failure, losing a lawsuit, vain hopes or hope deferred trouble another. Then there is waiting: “So burdensome is waiting, always and in every matter,” as Polybius observes. One is far too prominent, another too low-born, and that alone tortures him as much as the rest. One has no activity, company or employment; another is overwhelmed and tormented by worldly cares and burdensome business. But what tongue could suffice to tell them all?[4182]
Many men catch this malady by eating certain meats, hearbs, roots, at unawares; as henbane, nightshade, cicuta, mandrakes, &c. [4183]A company of young men at Agrigentum in Sicily, came into a Taverne; where they had freely taken their liquor, whether it were the wine it self, or something mixt with it ’tis not yet known,	Many people acquire this malady by unknowingly eating certain foods, herbs or roots, such as henbane, nightshade, hemlock, mandrakes and so on. A group of young men in Agrigentum in Sicily entered a tavern, where they drank freely. Whether it was the wine itself or something mixed with it is still unknown.[4184]

[4181] Burton. Printed page 171, f: “Non mihi si centum linguæ sint, oraque centum, Omnia causarum percurrere nomina possem.” “Not if I had a hundred tongues and a hundred mouths could I run through the names of all the causes.”

[4185]but upon a sudden they began to be so troubled in their brains, that their phantasie so crased, that they thought they were in a ship at sea, and now ready to be cast away by reason of a tempest. Wherefore to avoid shipwrack and present drowning, they flung all the goods in the house out at the windowes into the street, or into the sea, as they supposed;	But suddenly their brains became so disturbed, their imagination so deranged, that they thought they were in a ship at sea, about to be wrecked in a storm. To avoid shipwreck and immediate drowning, they therefore threw all the goods in the house out of the windows into the street—or into the sea, as they supposed.
thus they continued mad a pretty season, and being brought before the Magistrate to give an account of this their fact, they told him (not yet recovered of their madness) that what was done they did for fear of death, and to avoid eminent danger:	They remained mad in this way for quite some time. When brought before the magistrate to account for their actions, they told him, still not recovered from their madness, that they had done it out of fear of death and to avoid imminent danger.
the spectators were all amazed at this their stupidity and gazed on them still, whilst one of the ancientest of the company, in a grave tone excused himself to the Magistrate upon his knees, O viri Tritones, ego in imo jacui, I beseech your deities, &c. for I was in the bottom of the ship all the while:	The onlookers were all astonished at their stupefaction and kept staring at them, while one of the oldest of the company knelt before the magistrate and solemnly excused himself: “O Tritons, I lay in the lowest part.” I beseech your divine majesties, and so on, for I was in the bottom of the ship all the time.[4186]
another besought them as so many sea Gods, to be good unto them, and if ever he and his fellows came to land again; [4187]he would build an Altar to their service. The Magistrate could not sufficiently laugh at this their madness, bid them sleep it out, and so went his wayes. Many such accidents frequently happen, upon these unknown occasions.	Another begged them, as so many sea gods, to be kind to them, and promised that if he and his companions ever reached land again, he would build an altar for their worship. The magistrate could not laugh enough at their madness; he told them to sleep it off and went on his way. Many such incidents often happen from these unknown causes.

[4186] Editor. Fact means deed; eminent here is rendered imminent. Stupidity denotes stupefaction or mental insensibility. Tritons are sea divinities. The Latin address and Burton’s fuller English speech remain separately visible. Athenaeus likewise has the eldest youth claiming to have lain low in the hold.

[4187] Burton. Printed page 171, †: “Aram vobis servatoribus diis erigemus.” “We shall raise an altar to you, our saving gods.”

Source page 171–172 Some are so caused by philters, wandring in the sun, biting of a mad dog, a blow on the head, stinging with that kind of Spider called Tarantula, an ordinary thing if we may believe Skenck.l.6.de Venenis, in Calabria and Apulia in Italy, Cardan.subtil.l.9. Scaliger exercitat.185. Their Symptomes are merrily described by Jovianus Pontanus Ant.dial. how they dance altogether, & are cured by Musick.	Some cases are caused by love potions, wandering in the sun, the bite of a mad dog, a blow on the head, or the sting of the spider called the tarantula—a common thing in Calabria and Apulia in Italy, if we may believe Schenck, book 6, On Poisons; Cardano, On Subtlety, book 9; and Scaliger, exercise 185. Giovanni Pontano amusingly describes their symptoms in his dialogue Antonius: how they all dance together and are cured by music.[4188]
Source page 172 [4189]Cardan speaks, of certain stones, if they be carried about one, which will cause melancholy and madness, he cals them unhappy, as an [4190]Adamant, Selenites, &c. which dry up the body, increase cares, diminish sleep: Ctesias in Persicis, makes mention of a Well in those parts, of which if any man drink, [4191]he is mad for 24. houres.	Cardano speaks of certain stones which, if carried on one's person, cause melancholy and madness. He calls them unlucky, such as adamant, selenites and so on, which dry out the body, increase cares and lessen sleep. In his Persian History, Ctesias mentions a well in those regions: anyone who drinks from it is mad for twenty-four hours.[4192]

[4191] Burton. Printed page 172, i: "Ad unum diem mente alienatus." "Out of his mind for one day."

[4192] Editor. Adamant commonly denotes diamond or an exceptionally hard stone; selenites is a traditional moon-associated stone name and is not securely equated here with a single modern mineral. Burton reports supposed powers of carried stones. The precise Cardano and Ctesias passages remain unresolved.

Some lose their wits by terrible objects (as elsewhere I have more [4193]copiously dilated) and life it self many times, as Hippolitus affrighted by Neptune's sea-horses, Athamas by Juno's Furies: but these relations are common in all Writers.	Some lose their wits at terrifying sights, as I have discussed more fully elsewhere, and often life itself: Hippolytus, frightened by Neptune's sea-horses; Athamas, by Juno's Furies. But these stories are common in all writers.[4194]

[4193] Burton. Printed page 172, †: "Part.1.Sect.2.Subsect.3." Part 1, Section 2, Subsection 3. No member number is supplied in the printed reference. The subject points to Member 4, Subsection 3, "Terrors and frights as causes of melancholy" (1.2.4.3, printed p. 146 onward). Member 4 is supplied editorially from that correspondence. Related passage: 1.2.4.3 (member supplied editorially from subject).

[4194] Editor. Objects here means things perceived, especially terrifying sights. The abbreviated cross-reference lacks a member number; 1.2.4.3 supplies the matching discussion of terrifying sights. The myths of Hippolytus and Athamas are cited loosely; Burton's sea-horses is retained without substituting another version of the Hippolytus story.

[4195]Hic alias poteram, & plures subnectere causas, Sed jumenta vocant, & Sol inclinat, Eundum est.	Here I could add other causes, and many more; But the beasts call, the sun declines: I must go.[4196]
Many such causes, much more could I say, But that for provender my cattle stay: The sun declines, and I must needs away.	Many such causes—much more could I say, But my cattle wait for their fodder; The sun declines, and I must be away.
These causes if they be considered, and come alone, I do easily yield, can do little of themselves, seldome, or apart (an old oke is not felled at a blow) though many times they are all sufficient every one:	Considered separately and occurring alone, these causes, I readily grant, can do little by themselves when rare or isolated—an old oak is not felled with a single blow—although often each one is fully sufficient.
yet if they concurre, as often they do, vis unita fortior; Et quæ non obsunt singula, multa nocent, they may batter a strong constitution; as [4197]Austin said, many grains and small sands sink a ship, many small drops make a floud, &c. often reiterated; many dispositions produce an habit.	Yet when they combine, as they often do, “United force is stronger,” and “Things harmless singly do harm in numbers.” They may batter a strong constitution. As Augustine said, many tiny grains of sand sink a ship; many small drops make a flood, and so on. Repeated often, many passing dispositions produce an established habit.[4198]

[4198] Editor. Habit here means an established condition formed by repeated dispositions, not simply a customary action. Burton’s accumulation of small causes is illustrated by the Augustine passage quoted in his margin. Its exact Augustinian location remains to be established; the unusual opening Intus is retained.

MEMB. 5. SUBSECT. 1. Continent, inward, antecedent, next causes, and how the body works on the Minde.	MEMBER 5 SUBSECTION 1 Immediate, internal, antecedent and proximate causes, and how the body acts upon the mind.[4199]
AS a Purly hunter, I have hitherto beaten about the circuit of the Forrest of this Microcosme, and followed only those outward adventious causes. I will now break into the inner rooms, and rip up the antecedent immediate causes which are there to be found.	Like a hunter in the purlieus, I have so far beaten about the outskirts of the forest of this microcosm, following only those external, adventitious causes. I shall now break into its inner chambers and lay open the antecedent, immediate causes to be found there.[4200]
For as the distraction of the minde, amongst other outward causes & perturbations, alters the temperature of the body, so the distraction & distemper of the body will cause a distemperature of the soul, and 'tis hard to decide which of these two do more harme to the other.	For just as disturbance of the mind, among other external causes and perturbations, alters the bodily temperament, so bodily disturbance and disorder will cause disorder in the soul; and it is hard to decide which of these two does more harm to the other.[4201]

[4200] Editor. Purly means purlieu: land at the edge of a forest, with a particular history in forest law. Microcosm, "little world," is the human being. Burton moves from a hunting metaphor to rooms and dissection. Adventious means arising from outside or added from without.

[4201] Editor. Temperature here means temperament: the balance of bodily qualities and humours, not a thermometer reading. Distemper and distemperature mean a disorder of that balance. Mind and soul overlap in Burton's vocabulary but have not been mechanically reduced to one modern term. His humoral explanations are historical, not current medical conclusions.

Plato, Cyprian, and some others, as I have formerly said, lay the greatest fault upon the soul, excusing the body; others again accusing the body, excuse the soul, as a principal agent. Their reasons are, because [4202]the manners do follow the temperature of the body, as Galen proves in his book of that subject, Prosper Calenus de Atra bile, Jason Pratensis c.de Mania, Lemnius l.4.c.16. and many others.	Plato, Cyprian and some others, as I have said before, place the greatest blame on the soul and excuse the body. Others, in turn, accuse the body and excuse the soul from being the chief agent. Their reason is that character follows the bodily temperament, as Galen proves in his book on that subject, and as do Prospero Calano in On Black Bile, Jason Pratensis in his chapter On Madness, Lemnius in book 4, chapter 16, and many others.[4203]
And that which Gualter hath commented hom.10.in epist.Johannis, is most true: concupiscence and original sin, inclinations, & bad humors, are [4204]radical in every one of us, causing these perturbations, affections, and several distempers, offering many times violence unto the soul.	And what Gwalther says in homily 10 on John's epistle is most true: concupiscence and original sin, inclinations and bad humours, are rooted in every one of us, causing these disturbances, passions and various disorders, and often doing violence to the soul.[4205]
Every man is tempted by his own concupiscence (James 1.14) the spirit is willing but the flesh is weak, and rebelleth against the spirit, as our [4206]Apostle teacheth us: that me thinks the soul hath the better plea against the body, which so forcibly inclines us, that we cannot resist,	Everyone is tempted by his own concupiscence, James 1:14. The spirit is willing, but the flesh is weak and rebels against the spirit, as our Apostle teaches us. So it seems to me that the soul has the better case against the body, which inclines us so powerfully that we cannot resist.[4207]

[4203] Editor. Galen's relevant work is commonly known as The Faculties of the Soul Follow the Mixtures of the Body. Manners means character or dispositions. The clause as a principal agent is compressed: the modern rendering understands the second group to excuse the soul from chief responsibility and assign it to the body. The cited early modern editions remain uncollated.

[4204] Burton. Printed page 172, n: "Scintillæ latent in corporibus." "Sparks lie hidden in bodies."

[4205] Editor. Gualter is Rudolf Gwalther. Concupiscence means disordered or sinful desire, not exclusively sexual desire. Radical means rooted or fundamental. Burton brings inherited sin and bodily humours into the same causal account; the marginal sparks image reinforces their latent presence.

[4206] Burton. Printed page 172, o: "Gal.5." Galatians 5.

[4207] Editor. James 1:14 supplies the account of temptation by one's own desire. The willing spirit and weak flesh are from Matthew 26:41 (also Mark 14:38); the conflict of flesh and spirit is in Galatians 5:17, the chapter cited in the margin. Burton combines the passages.

How the material body acts upon the immaterial soul, through the mediation of humours and spirits, which partake of both, and through disordered organs, is discussed by Cornelius Agrippa, On Occult Philosophy, book 1, chapters 63–65; Levinus Lemnius, On the Hidden Wonders of Nature, book 1, chapters 12 and 16, and chapter 21 of his Rules for the Best Life; Perkins, Cases of Conscience, book 1, chapter 12; and Timothy Bright, A Treatise of Melancholy, chapters 10–12.[4209]
Source page 173 For as [4210]anger, fear, sorrow, obtrectation, emulation, &c. si mentis intimos recessus occuparint, saith [4211]Lemnius, corpori quoque infesta sunt, & illi teterrimos morbos inferunt, cause grievous diseases in the body, so bodily diseases affect the soul by consent.	For just as anger, fear, sorrow, disparagement, rivalry and so on, “if they occupy the innermost recesses of the mind,” says Lemnius, “are also harmful to the body and inflict the most dreadful diseases upon it”—cause grievous bodily diseases—so bodily diseases affect the soul through their mutual sympathy.[4212]

[4208] Editor. Virgil, Aeneid 5.21–22: the helmsman Palinurus says that the Trojans cannot force their course against the weather. Burton applies the image of irresistible adverse conditions to bodily influences upon the soul.

[4209] Editor. Spirits here are subtle bodily agencies in historical physiology, not ghosts. Agrippa’s chapters 63–65 discuss passions and imagination acting upon bodies; the reference is broader than Burton’s immediate question about the body acting on the soul. Lemnius’s compressed list is provisionally divided between his two named works; its punctuation and numbering require collation. The Perkins and Bright chapter references are retained without claiming exact verification.

[4210] Burton. Printed page 173, p: “Sicut ex animi affectionibus corpus languescit: sic ex corporis vitiis, & morborum plerisque cruciatibus animum videmus hebetari, Galenus.” “As the body languishes from the passions of the mind, so we see the mind dulled by bodily disorders and by many of the torments of disease.” Galen.

[4211] Burton. Printed page 173, q: “Lib.1.c.16.” Book 1, chapter 16.

[4212] Editor. Obtrectation is disparagement or detraction; emulation here is jealous rivalry. Consent is physiological sympathy or shared responsiveness, not conscious agreement. Burton explicitly argues for influence in both directions between bodily and mental states.

Now the chiefest causes proceed from the [4213]Heart, humors, spirits: as they are purer, or impurer, so is the Minde, and equally suffers, as a Lute out of tune, if one string or one organ be distempered, all the rest miscarry,	Now the principal causes proceed from the heart, humours and spirits: as they are purer or more impure, so is the mind, and it suffers correspondingly. As with a lute out of tune, if one string or one organ is disordered, all the rest go wrong.
[4214]Corpus onustum Hesternis vitiis, animum quoque prægravat unà.	A body burdened with yesterday's excesses weighs down the mind as well.[4215]
The Body is domicilium animæ, her house, abode, and stay; and as a torch, gives a better light, a sweeter smell, according to the matter it is made of: so doth our soul performe all her actions, better or worse, as her organs are disposed; or as wine savours of the cask wherein it is kept; the soul receives a tincture from the body, through which it works.	The body is "the soul's dwelling," her house, abode and support. Just as a torch gives a better light and a sweeter smell according to the material from which it is made, so our soul performs all her actions better or worse according to the condition of her organs. Or, as wine takes on the flavour of the cask in which it is kept, the soul receives a tinge from the body through which she works.
We see this in old men, children, Europeans; Asians, hot and cold Climes; Sanguin are merry, Melancholy sad, Phlegmatick dull, by reason of abundance of those humors, and they cannot resist such passions which are inflicted by them.	We see this in old men, children, Europeans, Asians, and hot and cold climates. Sanguine people are merry, melancholic people sad, phlegmatic people dull, because of the abundance of those humours; and they cannot resist the passions these impose upon them.[4216]

[4216] Editor. The sanguine, melancholic and phlegmatic temperaments were associated with predominance of blood, black bile and phlegm respectively. Burton extends this explanatory scheme to ages, populations and climates; these are claims within his historical physiology.

For in this infirmity of humane nature, as Melancthon declares, the Understanding is so tied to, and captivated by his inferior senses, that without their help he cannot exercise his functions, and the Will being weakned, hath but a small power to restrain those outward parts, but suffers her self to be overruled by them;	For, in this weakness of human nature, as Melanchthon declares, the understanding is so bound to and held captive by its lower senses that it cannot perform its functions without their help. The weakened will has little power to restrain those outward parts, but allows herself to be overruled by them.[4217]
that I must needs conclude with Lemnius, spiritus & humores maximum nocumentum obtinent, spirits and humors do most harme in [4218]troubling the soul. How should a man choose but be cholerick and angry, that hath his body so clogged with abundance of gross humors? or melancholy, that is so inwardly disposed? That thence comes then this malady, Madness, Apoplexies, Lethargies, &c. it may not be denied.	So I must conclude with Lemnius that "spirits and humours hold the greatest power to harm": spirits and humours do the greatest harm in disturbing the soul. How can a man help being choleric and angry when his body is so clogged with an abundance of thick humours? Or melancholy when he is so disposed within? That this malady, madness, apoplexies, lethargies and so on arise from this cannot, then, be denied.[4219]
Now this body of ours is most part distempered by some precedent diseases, which molest his inward organs & instruments, and so per consequens cause melancholy, according to the consent of the most approved Physicians:	Now this body of ours is generally disordered by some preceding diseases, which trouble its internal organs and instruments, and so, as a consequence, cause melancholy, according to the agreement of the most highly regarded physicians.

[4217] Editor. Melancthon is Philipp Melanchthon. Understanding and will are treated as distinct faculties, with the lower senses supplying the understanding and potentially overpowering the will. Burton supplies no precise work or location for this attribution.

[4219] Editor. Gross means thick or coarse. Choleric links anger to choler, or yellow bile. Apoplexy and lethargy are historical disease categories, involving sudden loss of sense or movement and pathological sleep or stupor; they should not be assigned one modern diagnosis automatically.

[4220]This humor (as Avicenna l.3.Fen.1.Tract.4.c.18. Arnoldus breviar.l.1.c.18. Jacchinus comment.in 9.Rhasis.c.15. Montaltus c.10. Nicholas Piso c.de Melan.&c. suppose) is begotten by the distemperature of some inward part, innate, or left after some inflammation, or else included in the bloud after an [4221]ague, or some other malignant disease.	This humour—as Avicenna, book 3, fen 1, treatise 4, chapter 18; Arnoldus, Breviary, book 1, chapter 18; Jacchinus, commentary on book 9 of Rhazes, chapter 15; Montalto, chapter 10; Nicolas Le Pois, chapter On Melancholy; and others suppose—is generated by a disorder of some internal part, either inborn or remaining after an inflammation, or else is contained in the blood after a fever or some other malignant disease.[4222]
This opinion of theirs concurres with that of Galen.l.3.c.6.de locis affect. Guianerius gives an instance in one so caused by a quartan ague, and Montanus consil.32. in a young man of 28. years of age, so distempered after a quartan, which had molested him five years together.	This opinion agrees with Galen's, On the Affected Parts, book 3, chapter 6. Guaineri gives an example of someone whose condition was caused by a quartan fever; and Montanus, consultation 32, describes a young man of twenty-eight who became disordered in this way after a quartan fever that had troubled him for five years.[4223]

[4223] Editor. A quartan ague is an intermittent fever recurring on every fourth day by inclusive counting, roughly every seventy-two hours. Burton's five-year case is attributed to Montanus's consultation 32; neither it nor Guaineri's example has yet been independently collated.

Hildisheim spicel.2.de Mania, relates of a Dutch Baron, grievously tormented with melancholy after a long [4224]ague: Galen.l.de atra bile c.4. puts the plague a cause. Botaldus in his book de lue vener.c.2. the French pox for a cause, others, Phrensie, Epilepsie, Apoplexie, because those diseases do often degenerate into this.	Hildesheim, gleaning 2, On Madness, tells of a German baron grievously tormented with melancholy after a long fever. Galen, On Black Bile, chapter 4, gives plague as a cause; Botaldus, On Venereal Disease, chapter 2, gives the French pox; others give frenzy, epilepsy and apoplexy, because those diseases often develop into this one.[4225]
Source page 173–174 Of suppression of Hæmrods, Hæmorogia, or bleeding at nose, menstruous retentions, (although they deserve a larger explication, as being the sole cause of a proper kinde of melancholy, in more ancient Maids, Nunnes and Widowes, handled apart by Rodericus à Castro, and Mercatus, as I have elsewhere signified,) or any other evacuation stopped, I have already spoken.	I have already spoken of the suppression of haemorrhoidal bleeding, haemorrhage or nosebleeds, the retention of menstrual flow—though these deserve fuller explanation, as the sole cause of a distinct kind of melancholy in older unmarried women, nuns and widows, treated separately by Rodrigo de Castro and Mercado, as I have indicated elsewhere—or any other discharge being stopped.[4226]
Source page 174 Only this I will add, that this melancholy which shall be caused by such infirmities, deserves to be pitied of all men, and to be respected with a more tender compassion, according to Laurentius, as coming from a more inevitable cause.	I shall add only this: melancholy caused by such infirmities deserves everyone's pity and should be regarded with a more tender compassion, according to Du Laurens, because it arises from a cause harder to avoid.[4227]

[4224] Burton. Printed page 173, x: "Raro quis diuturno morbo laborat, qui non sit melancholicus, Mercurialis de affect. capitis lib.1.c.10.de Melanc." "Rarely does anyone suffer a prolonged disease without becoming melancholy." Mercuriale, On Affections of the Head, book 1, chapter 10, On Melancholy.

[4225] Editor. Dutch could mean German in seventeenth-century English; German is the contextual rendering here. The French pox means syphilis. Phrensie commonly denotes delirium with fever; degenerate into means develop into or change into. Botaldus is left in Burton's form pending secure identification of the cited edition.

[4226] Editor. Suppression refers to the stopping of discharges thought to remove harmful matter, including bleeding from haemorrhoids and the nose. Proper means distinct or particular; ancient means older. Burton's reproductive explanation is preserved as historical doctrine. His named authorities are Rodrigo de Castro and Luis de Mercado.

[4227] Editor. Laurentius is André Du Laurens. Burton closes the subsection by linking a cause harder to avoid with a greater claim on compassion. The exact passage in Du Laurens remains to be collated.

SUBSECT. 2. Distemperature of particular Parts, causes.	Subsection 2. Disorders of particular parts as causes.
There is almost no part of the Body, which being distempered, doth not cause this malady, as the Brain and his parts, Heart, Liver, Spleen, Stomack, Matrix or Wombe, Pylorus, Mirache, Mesentery, Hypocondries, Meseraick veines; and in a word, saith [4228]Arculanus, there is no part which causeth not melancholy, either because it is adust, or doth not expel the superfluity of the nutriment.	There is almost no part of the body which, when disordered, does not cause this malady: the brain and its parts, heart, liver, spleen, stomach, matrix or womb, pylorus, mirach, mesentery, hypochondria, mesenteric veins. In a word, says Arculanus, no part fails to cause melancholy, either because it is scorched or because it does not expel the surplus waste from nourishment.[4229]
Savonarola Pract. major. rubric. 11. Tract. 6. cap. 1. is of the same opinion, that melancholy is ingendred in each particular part, and [4230]Crato in consil. 17. lib. 2. Gordonius, who is instar omnium, lib. med. partic. 2. cap. 19. confirmes as much, putting the [4231]matter of Melancholy, sometimes in the Stomack, Liver, Heart, Brain, Spleen, Mirach, Hypocondries, when as the melancholy humor resides there, or the Liver is not well cleansed from Melancholy bloud.	Savonarola, in his Greater Practice, rubric 11, treatise 6, chapter 1, holds the same opinion: melancholy is generated in each particular part. So does Crato, in consultation 17, book 2. Gordonius, who is "a match for them all," confirms as much in part 2, chapter 19 of his medical work. He places the material of melancholy sometimes in the stomach, liver, heart, brain, spleen, mirach or hypochondria, when the melancholic humour lodges there or the liver is not properly cleared of melancholic blood.[4232]

[4229] Editor. "Distemperature" is a disordered balance of heat, cold, moisture and dryness in humoral medicine; "adust" means burnt or scorched. Pylorus is the stomach's outlet; mirach, the abdominal wall or region; mesentery, the tissue supporting the intestines; hypochondria, the upper abdominal regions beneath the ribs; meseraic veins, the veins of the mesentery. These names explain Burton's anatomical map, not a modern diagnosis.

[4230] Burton. Printed page 174, z: "A Liene, jecinore, utero, & aliis partibus oritur." It arises from the spleen, liver, womb and other parts.

[4231] Burton. Printed page 174, a: "Materia Melancholiæ aliquando in corde, in stomacho, hepate, ab hypocondriis, myrache, splene, cum ibi remanet humor melancholicus." The material of melancholy is sometimes in the heart, stomach or liver, or comes from the hypochondria, mirach or spleen, when melancholic humour remains there.

[4232] Editor. Melancholy can name the disease, its associated temperament, or the black bile thought to cause it. "Matter" here is the bodily material. Instar omnium praises Gordonius as having the authority of all the other writers together. Burton's compressed bibliographical references are retained; they have not all been checked against the cited editions.

The Brain is a familiar and frequent cause, too hot, or too cold, [4233]through adust bloud so caused, as Mercurialis will have it, within or without the head, the brain it self being distempered. Those are most apt to this disease, [4234]that have a hot heart and moist Brain, which Montaltus cap. 11. de Melanch. approves out of Halyabbas, Rhasis, and Avicenna.	The brain, being too hot or too cold, is a familiar and frequent cause: through blood scorched in this way, as Mercurialis maintains, within or outside the head, the brain itself being disordered. Those with a hot heart and a moist brain are most susceptible to this disease, a view Montaltus endorses in chapter 11 of his work on melancholy, citing Haly Abbas, Rhazes and Avicenna.[4235]
Mercurialis consil. 11. assignes the coldness of the brain a cause, and Salustius Salvianus med. lect. l. 2. c. 1 [4236]will have it arise from a cold and dry distemperature of the brain. Piso, Benedictus Victorius Faventinus, will have it proceed from a [4237]hot distemperature of the Brain; and [4238]Montaltus cap. 10. from the Brains heat, scorching the bloud.	Mercurialis, in consultation 11, names coldness of the brain as a cause; Sallustius Salvianus, in his medical lectures, book 2, chapter 1, holds that it arises from a cold and dry disorder of the brain. Piso and Benedictus Victorius Faventinus hold that it proceeds from a hot disorder of the brain; Montaltus, in chapter 10, from the brain's heat scorching the blood.[4239]

[4233] Burton. Printed page 174, b: "Ex sanguine adusto, intra vel extra caput." From scorched blood, within or outside the head.

[4234] Burton. Printed page 174, c: "Qui calidum cor habent, cerebrum humidum, facile melancholici." Those who have a hot heart and a moist brain readily become melancholic.

[4235] Editor. Haly Abbas, Rhazes and Avicenna are the Latinized names under which these Arabic-language medical authorities circulated. "Approves out of" means supports by citing. Heat and moisture here are the qualitative properties assigned to organs in the older physiological system.

[4236] Burton. Printed page 174, d: "Sequitur melancholia malam intemperiem frigidam & siccam ipsius cerebri." Melancholy follows an unhealthy cold and dry imbalance of the brain itself.

[4237] Burton. Printed page 174, e: "Sæpe fit ex calidiore cerebro, aut corpore colligente melancholiam. Piso." It often arises from an excessively hot brain, or from a body accumulating melancholic humour. Piso.

[4238] Burton. Printed page 174, f: "Vel per propriam affectionem, vel per consensum, cum vapores exhalant in cerebrum. Montalt. cap. 14." Either through its own disorder or through sympathy, when vapours rise into the brain. Montaltus, chapter 14.

[4239] Editor. Burton sets incompatible explanations beside one another: the brain may be blamed for excessive cold or excessive heat. The printed body cites Montaltus chapter 10, while marginal f cites chapter 14 and discusses direct disorder and sympathy. Both references remain as printed.

The brain is still distempered by himself, or by consent: by himself or his proper affection, as Faventinus cals it, [4240]or by vapors which arise from the other parts, and fume up into the head, altering the animal faculties.	The brain is always disordered either in itself or through its connection with other parts: in itself, through its own particular disorder, as Faventinus calls it; or through vapours rising from the other parts and steaming up into the head, altering the animal faculties.[4241]
Hildesheim spicel. 2. de Mania, thinks it may be caused from a [4242]distemperature of the heart; sometimes hot; sometimes cold. A hot Liver, and a cold Stomack, are put for usual causes of Melancholy: Mercurialis consil. 11. & consil. 6. consil. 86. assignes a hot Liver, and cold Stomack for ordinary causes.	Hildesheim, in his second collection, on mania, thinks it may be caused by a disorder of the heart, sometimes hot, sometimes cold. A hot liver and a cold stomach are listed as usual causes of melancholy: Mercurialis names them as ordinary causes in consultations 11, 6 and 86.
[4243]Monavius in an Epistle of his to Crato in Scoltzius, is of opinion, that Hypocondriacal Melancholy may proceed from a cold Liver the question is there discussed. Most agree that a hot Liver is in fault; [4244]The Liver is the shop of humors, and especially causeth melancholy by his hot and dry distemperature.	In a letter to Crato in Scholtz's collection, Monavius holds that hypochondriacal melancholy may proceed from a cold liver; the question is discussed there. Most agree that a hot liver is at fault. The liver is the workshop of the humours, and particularly causes melancholy through its hot and dry disorder.[4245]

[4241] Editor. "By consent" means through physiological sympathy with another part. The "animal faculties" are powers associated with the brain and nerves, including sensation, mental activity and voluntary movement; animal derives from anima, soul. Vapours and spirits belong to this historical explanation of bodily and mental activity.

[4243] Burton. Printed page 174, i: "Epist. 209. Scoltzii." Letter 209 in Scholtz's collection.

[4244] Burton. Printed page 174, k: "Officina humorum hepar concurrit, &c." The liver, the workshop of the humours, contributes, etc.

[4245] Editor. "Shop" means workshop: the liver was held to prepare blood and the humours from nourishment. Hypochondriacal melancholy was located in abdominal organs; the term does not mean simply fear of being ill. The marginal letter number is read as 209 in the scan, although OCR has also rendered it 109; collation with Scholtz remains pending.

[4246]The Stomack, and Meseraick veines do often concurre, by reason of their obstructions, and thence their heat cannot be avoided, and many times the matter is so adust, and inflamed in those parts, that it degenerates into Hypocondriacal melancholy. Guianerius c. 2. Tract. 15. holds the Meseraick veines to be a sufficient [4247]cause alone.	The stomach and mesenteric veins often contribute because of blockages, which make overheating inevitable; often the material in those parts is so scorched and inflamed that it degenerates into hypochondriacal melancholy. Guianerius, in chapter 2 of treatise 15, holds that the mesenteric veins alone are a sufficient cause.[4248]
Source page 174–175 The spleen concurres to this malady, by all their consents, and suppression of Hæmrods, dum non expurgat altera causa lien, saith Montaltus, if it be [4249]too cold and dry, and do not purge the other parts as it ought, Consil. 23. Montanus puts the [4250]spleen stopped for a great cause.	The spleen contributes to this malady, as they all agree, as does the suppression of haemorrhoidal bleeding. “The spleen is another cause when it fails to purge,” says Montaltus—if it is too cold and dry and does not cleanse the other parts as it should. In consultation 23, Montanus names a blocked spleen as a major cause.[4251]

[4247] Burton. Printed page 174, m: “Per se sanguinem adurentes.” Scorching the blood by themselves.

[4248] Editor. “Concur” means contribute together. Burton describes obstruction, overheating and scorching as a chain of causes, with darkened humoral material and vapours affecting the brain. Guianerius is then cited for the stronger claim that the mesenteric veins can suffice by themselves.

[4249] Burton. Printed page 175, n: “Lien frigidus & siccus c. 13.” A cold and dry spleen; chapter 13.

[4251] Editor. “By all their consents” here means agreement among the authorities, unlike the technical “by consent” above. Haemorrhoids were treated as a possible route of evacuating surplus blood; “suppression” means the stopping of that bleeding. Burton’s Latin sentence is compressed; the translation supplies the implied verb without changing the claim.

Source page 175 [4252]Christopherus à Vega reports of his knowledg, that he hath known Melancholy caused from putrefied bloud in those Seed-veins and womb: [4253]Arculanus from that menstruous bloud turned into melancholy, and seed too long detained (as I have already declared) by putrefaction or adustion.	Christophorus à Vega reports from his own knowledge that he has seen melancholy caused by putrefied blood in the seminal vessels and womb; Arculanus, by menstrual blood turned into melancholic humour, and by semen retained too long, through putrefaction or scorching, as I have already explained.[4254]
The Mesenterium, or Midriffe, Diaphragma, is a cause which the [4255]Greeks called φρένας: because by his inflammation, the minde is much troubled with convulsions and dotage. All these, most part, offend by inflammation, corrupting humours and spirits, in this non-naturall melancholy: for from these are ingendred fuliginous & black spirits.	The mesentery, or midriff, the diaphragm, is a cause—the part the Greeks called phrenas—because its inflammation greatly disturbs the mind with convulsions and derangement. In this unnatural melancholy, most of these parts do harm through inflammation, corrupting the humours and spirits, for from them soot-laden and black spirits are generated.[4256]

[4253] Burton. Printed page 175, q: “A sanguinis putredine in vasis seminariis & utero, & quandoque à spermate diu retento, vel sanguine menstruo in melancholiam verso per putrefactionem, vel adustionem.” From putrefaction of blood in the seminal vessels and womb; and sometimes from semen long retained, or menstrual blood turned into melancholic humour through putrefaction or scorching.

[4254] Editor. “Seed” means semen; “seed-veins” are the seminal vessels in the older anatomical terminology. The passage extends the theory of retained bodily matter to menstrual blood and semen. “Melancholy” in “turned into melancholy” denotes the supposed morbid humour.

And for that reason [4257]Montaltus cap. 10. de causis melan. will have the efficient cause of melancholy to be hot and dry, not a cold and dry distemperature, as some hold, from the heat of the brain, rosting the bloud, immoderate heat of the liver and bowels, and inflammation of the Pylorus.	For that reason Montaltus, in chapter 10 on the causes of melancholy, holds that its active cause is a hot and dry disorder, not a cold and dry one, as some maintain: the heat of the brain roasting the blood, excessive heat of the liver and bowels, and inflammation of the pylorus.[4258]
And so much the rather, because that, as Galen holds, all spices inflame the bloud, solitarinesse, waking, agues, study, meditation, all which heat: and therefore he concludes that this distemperature causing adventitious Melancholy, is not cold and dry, but hot and dry.	All the more so because, as Galen holds, all spices inflame the blood, as do solitude, sleeplessness, fevers, study and meditation, all of which produce heat. He therefore concludes that this disorder causing acquired melancholy is not cold and dry, but hot and dry.
But of this I have sufficiently treated in the matter of Melancholy, and hold that this may be true in non-naturall Melancholy, which produceth madnesse, but not in that naturall, which is more cold, and being immoderate, produceth a gentle dotage. [t] Which opinion Geraldus de Solo maintains in his comment upon Rhasis.	But I have discussed this sufficiently in treating the material of melancholy. I hold that it may be true of unnatural melancholy, which produces madness, but not of natural melancholy, which is colder and, when excessive, produces a milder derangement. Geraldus de Solo maintains this opinion in his commentary on Rhazes.[4259]

[4257] Burton. Printed page 175, s: “Ergo efficiens causa melancholiæ est calida & sicca intemperies, non frigida & sicca, quod multi opinati sunt, oritur enim à calore cerebri assante sanguinem, &c. tum quod aromata sanguinem incendunt, solitudo, vigiliæ, febris præcedens, meditatio, studium, & hæc omnia calefaciunt, ergo ratum sit, &c. lib. 1. cap. 13. de Melanch.” Therefore the active cause of melancholy is a hot and dry imbalance, not a cold and dry one, as many have thought. For it arises from the brain’s heat roasting the blood, etc.; also because spices inflame the blood, as do solitude, sleeplessness, a preceding fever, meditation and study. All these produce heat, so let the point be established, etc. Book 1, chapter 13, on melancholy.

[4258] Editor. An “efficient cause” actively brings about a condition, distinguished from the material out of which it arises. “Pylorus” is the outlet from the stomach. The long marginal note cites book 1, chapter 13, whereas the body gives Montaltus chapter 10; the discrepancy is retained.

[4259] Editor. Burton has discussed natural and burnt or acquired melancholy earlier, in the account of its material and varieties. “Dotage” means impaired or disordered thought, not specifically senility. A small t appears before “Which opinion” in the 1651 body; no corresponding t entry is visible on this page. It is preserved as [t] in the original column. The separate dagger reference below is attached to Hercules de Saxonia.

SUBSECT. 3. Causes of Head-Melancholy.	Subsection 3. Causes of head melancholy.
After a tedious discourse of the generall causes of Melancholy, I am now returned at last to treat in brief of the three particular species, and such causes as properly appertain unto them. Although these causes promiscuously concur to each and every particular kinde, and commonly produce their effects in that part which is most weak, ill disposed, and least able to resist, and so cause all three species, yet many of them are proper to some one kinde, and seldome found in the rest.	After a tedious discussion of the general causes of melancholy, I have now returned at last to deal briefly with its three particular kinds and the causes that properly belong to them. Although these causes combine indiscriminately in each particular kind, commonly producing their effects in the part that is weakest, most disordered and least able to resist, and so cause all three kinds, many are nevertheless peculiar to one kind and seldom found in the others.[4260]
As for example, Head-Melancholy is commonly caused by a cold or hot distemperature of the Brain, according to Laurentius cap. 5. de melan. but as [4261]Hercules de Saxoniâ contends, from that agitation or distemperature of the animall spirits alone.	For example, head melancholy is commonly caused by a cold or hot disorder of the brain, according to Laurentius, chapter 5 on melancholy; but Hercules de Saxonia contends that it comes from that disturbance or disorder of the animal spirits alone.[4262]

[4260] Editor. The three kinds distinguish melancholy originating in the brain, arising through abdominal organs, and arising from the whole body. Burton admits that the causes overlap and tend to act where resistance is weakest; his classification is not a set of exclusive mechanisms.

[4261] Burton. Printed page 175, dagger: “Lib. 3. Tract. posthum. de melan.” Book 3, Posthumous Treatise on Melancholy.

[4262] Editor. The animal spirits are the subtle bodily agents associated with the brain’s sensory and motor functions. Hercules locates the disturbance in them alone. The dagger note gives book 3 of the posthumous treatise; its exact passage remains to be collated.

Salust. Salvianus before mentioned lib. 2. cap. 3. de re med. will have it proceed from cold: but that I take of naturall melancholy, such as are fools and dote; for as Galen writes lib. 4. de puls. 8. and Avicenna, [4263]a cold and moist Brain is an unseparable companion of folly.	Sallustius Salvianus, mentioned before, holds in his medical work, book 2, chapter 3, that it proceeds from cold; but I take that to mean natural melancholy, in people who are foolish and mentally impaired. For, as Galen writes in book 4, chapter 8 on the pulse, and as Avicenna also says, a cold and moist brain is an inseparable companion of folly.[4264]
But this adventitious melancholy which is here meant, is caused of an hot and dry distemperature, as [4265]Damascen the Arabian lib. 3. cap. 22. thinks, and most writers; Altomarus and Piso call it [4266]an innate burning untemperatenesse, turning bloud and choler into melancholy.	But this acquired melancholy, which is meant here, is caused by a hot and dry disorder, as Damascenus the Arabian thinks in book 3, chapter 22, along with most writers. Altomarus and Piso call it an inborn, burning imbalance that turns blood and yellow bile into melancholic humour.[4267]
Source page 175–176 Both these opinions may stand good, as Bruel maintains, and Capivaccius, si cerebrum sit calidius, [4268]if the brain be hot, the animall spirits will be hot, and thence comes madnesse: if cold, folly.	Both opinions may hold good, as Bruel and Capivaccius maintain: “if the brain is hotter”—if the brain is hot, the animal spirits will be hot, and from this comes madness; if cold, folly.[4269]

[4264] Editor. “Fools,” “folly” and “dote” are Burton’s historical categories for impaired understanding, kept distinct from the more violent “madness” he contrasts with them. They do not map neatly onto present-day diagnostic categories. The marginal Latin mentions coldness alone, while the English body adds moisture.

[4265] Burton. Printed page 175, x: “Ab interno calore assatur.” It is roasted by internal heat.

[4267] Editor. “Adventitious” means acquired or arising from an added cause. The neighbouring “innate” describes a burning imbalance within the body; Burton does not fully reconcile these labels. Choler is yellow bile, distinguished here from the melancholic humour into which it is said to turn.

[4268] Burton. Printed page 176, z: “Si cerebrum sit calidius, fiet spiritus animalis calidior, & delirium maniacum; si frigidior, fiet fatuitas.” If the brain is hotter, the animal spirit will become hotter, and manic derangement will follow; if colder, intellectual incapacity will result.

[4269] Editor. The short Latin clause is translated before Burton’s fuller English gloss. His description of hotter spirits producing madness and colder ones producing folly repeats the distinction in his earlier discussion of the material of melancholy.

Source page 176 David Crusius Theat. morb. Hermet. lib. 2. cap. 6. de atra bile, grants melancholy to be a disease of an inflamed brain, but cold notwithstanding of it self: calida per accidens, frigida per se, hot by accident only; I am of Capivaccius minde for my part.	David Crusius, in his Hermetic Theatre of Diseases, book 2, chapter 6 on black bile, allows that melancholy is a disease of an inflamed brain, though cold in itself: "hot through an incidental condition, cold in its own nature"—hot only incidentally. For my part, I agree with Capivaccius.[4270]
Now this humour, according to Salvianus, is sometime in the substance of the Brain, sometimes contained in the Membranes, and Tunicles that cover the Brain, sometimes in the passages of the Ventricles of the brain, or veins of those ventricles.	Now this humour, according to Salvianus, is sometimes in the substance of the brain, sometimes contained in the membranes and coverings around it, sometimes in the passages of the brain's ventricles or the veins of those ventricles.[4271]
It followes many times [4272]a Phrensie, long diseases, agues, long abode in hot places, or under the Sun, a blow on the head, as Rhasis informeth us: Piso addes solitarines, waking, inflammations of the head, proceeding most part [4273]from much use of spices, hot wines, hot meats; all which Montanus reckons up consil. 22. for a Melancholy Jew; and Heurnius repeats cap. 12. de Mania:	It often follows delirium, long illnesses, fevers, a long stay in hot places or under the sun, or a blow to the head, as Rhazes tells us. Piso adds solitude, sleeplessness and inflammations of the head, proceeding mostly from heavy use of spices, heating wines and heating foods—all of which Montanus lists in consultation 22 for a melancholic Jew, and Heurnius repeats in chapter 12 on mania.[4274]

[4270] Editor. Per accidens and per se distinguish a secondary or incidental property from the thing's own nature, rather than chance from intention. Burton reports Crusius's qualification but then states his own preference for Capivaccius. The abbreviated title Theat. morb. Hermet. is expanded descriptively; its edition and exact passage remain uncollated.

[4271] Editor. "Tunicles" are thin coverings or membranes. The ventricles are the cavities within the brain, already discussed in Burton's anatomy. This list preserves the alternative locations proposed for the humour; it does not reconcile them.

[4272] Burton. Printed page 176, a: "Melancholia capitis accedit post phrenesim, aut longam moram sub sole, aut percussionem in capite, cap. 13. lib. 1." Head melancholy follows delirium, a long stay under the sun or a blow to the head. Chapter 13, book 1.

[4273] Burton. Printed page 176, b: "Qui bibunt vina potentia, & sæpè sunt sub sole." Those who drink strong wines and are often under the sun.

[4274] Editor. "Phrensie" is the historical delirium associated with fever. "Hot" wines and foods have heating qualities within the humoral system, not necessarily a high serving temperature. The cited patient's Jewish identity belongs to Burton's case description; the passage gives no reason to treat it as a cause.

Hot bathes, Garlick, Onions, saith Guianerius, bad ayr, corrupt, much [4275]waking, &c. retention of seed or abundance, stopping of hæmorrogiâ, the Midriffe misaffected; and according to Trallianus l. 1. 16. immoderate cares, troubles, griefs, discontent, study, meditation, and in a word, the abuse of all those 6 non-naturall things.	Hot baths, garlic and onions, says Guianerius; bad, corrupt air; much sleeplessness, and so on; retention or excess of semen, suppression of bleeding, a disordered midriff; and, according to Trallianus, book 1, chapter 16, excessive worries, troubles, griefs, discontent, study and meditation —in a word, the misuse of all those six non-natural things.[4276]
Hercules de Saxonia, cap. 16. lib. 1. will have it caused from a [4277]cautery, or boyl dried up, or any issue. Amatus Lusitanus cent. 2. cura. 67. gives instance in a fellow, that had a hole in his arm, [4278]after that was healed, ran mad, and when the wound was open, he was cured again.	Hercules de Saxonia, in chapter 16 of book 1, holds that it can be caused when a cautery wound, boil or any draining sore dries up. Amatus Lusitanus, in case 67 of his second hundred, gives the example of a man who had a hole in his arm: after it healed, he went mad; when the wound was open, he was cured again.[4279]

[4277] Burton. Printed page 176, d: “A cauterio & ulcere exsiccato.” From a cautery wound and a dried-up sore.

[4278] Burton. Printed page 176, e: “Ab ulcere curato incidit in insaniam, aperto vulnere curatur.” Once the sore was healed, he fell into madness; with the wound open, he is cured.

[4279] Editor. A cautery could create an artificial draining wound; an “issue” could be such an opening or its discharge. The case illustrates the older belief that closing an outlet might retain harmful matter. The narrative and claimed cure are Burton’s report; the original clinical account has not been collated.

Trincavelius consil. 13. lib. 1. hath an example of a melancholy man so caused by overmuch continuance in the Sun, frequent use of Venery, and immoderate exercise: And in his cons. 49. lib. 3. from an [4280]headpiece overheated, which caused head-melancholy. Prosper Calenus brings in Cardinall Cæsius for a pattern of such as are so melancholy by long study: but examples are infinite.	Trincavelius, in consultation 13 of book 1, has an example of a man whose melancholy was caused by staying too long in the sun, frequent sexual intercourse and excessive exercise; and in consultation 49 of book 3, an instance of head melancholy caused by an overheated helmet. Prosper Calenus offers Cardinal Caesius as an example of those made melancholic by prolonged study. But the examples are endless.[4281]

[4281] Editor. “Venery” means sexual intercourse. “Headpiece” here is a helmet, confirmed by the marginal galea, not the head itself. The printed Cæsius is retained, modernized typographically to Caesius; the individual case and identification remain unverified.

SUBSECT. 4. Causes of Hypocondriacall, or windie Melancholy.	Subsection 4. Causes of hypochondriacal, or windy, melancholy.
In repeating of these causes, I must crambe bis coctam apponere, say that again which I have formerly said, in applying them to their proper Species. Hypocondriacall or flatuous Melancholy, is that which the Arabians call Myrachiall, and is in my judgement the most grievous and frequent, though Bruel and Laurentius make it least dangerous, and not so hard to be known or cured.	In repeating these causes, I must "serve up twice-cooked cabbage"—say again what I have said before as I apply them to their proper kinds. Hypochondriacal, or flatulent, melancholy is what the Arabians call myrachial. In my judgment it is the most distressing and frequent kind, though Bruel and Laurentius consider it the least dangerous and less difficult to recognize or cure.[4282]
His causes are inward or outward. Inward from divers parts or organs, as Midriffe, Spleen, Stomack, Liver, Pylorus, Womb, Diaphragma, Meseraick veines, stopping of issues, &c.	Its causes are internal or external. Internal causes arise from various parts or organs: midriff, spleen, stomach, liver, pylorus, womb, diaphragm, mesenteric veins, the stopping of discharges, and so on.[4283]
Montaltus cap. 15. out of Galen recites [4284]heat and obstruction of those meseraicke veins, as an immediate cause, by which means the passage of the Chilus to the liver is detained, stopped or corrupted, and turned into rumbling & winde.	Montaltus, in chapter 15, cites Galen in naming heat and blockage of those mesenteric veins as an immediate cause: in this way the passage of chyle to the liver is delayed or stopped, or the chyle is corrupted and turned into rumbling and wind.[4285]

[4282] Editor. The cabbage proverb admits tiresome repetition. Compare Erasmus, Adages I.5.38 (438), and Juvenal, Satire 7.154. Burton's Latin is translated before his own English explanation. Myrachial is derived from mirach, the abdomen or its containing wall; "windy" and "flatuous" refer to wind or vapours in this historical kind of melancholy.

[4283] Editor. Midriff and diaphragm both appear in Burton's list and are retained. "Issues" is broad here, covering bodily discharges rather than naming one specific outlet. The distinction between internal and external causes organizes the discussion that follows.

[4285] Editor. Chyle is the milky product of digestion, thought in this model to pass through the mesenteric veins to the liver for further preparation. Burton's grammar blurs the passage of chyle with the chyle itself; the modern wording makes the implied subject of "corrupted" explicit.

Montanus consil. 233. hath an evident demonstration, Trincavelius another, lib. 1. cap. 12. and Plater a third, observat. lib. 1. for a Doctour of the Law visited with this infirmity, from the said obstruction and heat of these Meseraick veines, and bowels: quoniam inter ventriculum & jecur venæ effervescunt, the veins are inflamed about the Liver and Stomack.	Montanus gives a clear example in consultation 233, Trincavelius another in book 1, chapter 12, and Plater a third in book 1 of his observations: a doctor of law afflicted with this illness from the same blockage and heat of the mesenteric veins and bowels, "because the veins between the stomach and liver grow hot"—the veins are inflamed around the liver and stomach.[4286]
Source page 176–177 Sometimes those other parts are together misaffected; and concurre to the production of this malady: A hot liver and cold stomack or cold belly: look for instances in Hollerius, Victor Trincavelius, consil. 35. l. 3. Hildesheim Spicel. 2. fol. 132. Solenander consil. 9. pro cive Lugdunensi, Montanus consil. 229. for the Earl of Monfort in Germany, 1549. and Frisimelica in the 233 consultation of the said Montanus.	Sometimes those other parts are disordered together and combine to produce this malady: a hot liver and a cold stomach or cold abdomen. Look for examples in Hollerius; Victor Trincavelius, consultation 35, book 3; Hildesheim, collection 2, folio 132; Solenander, consultation 9, "for a citizen of Lyons"; Montanus, consultation 229, for the Earl of Montfort in Germany in 1549; and Frisimelica, in consultation 233 of the same Montanus.
Source page 177 I. Cæsar Claudinus gives instance of a cold stomack & over-hot liver, almost in every consultation, con. 89. for a certain Count: & con. 106. for a Polonian Baron, by reason of heat the bloud is inflamed, and grosse vapours sent to the heart and brain.	J. Caesar Claudinus gives examples of a cold stomach and an overheated liver in almost every consultation: in consultation 89, for a certain count, and 106, for a Polish baron. The heat inflames the blood and sends thick vapours to the heart and brain.[4287]

[4287] Editor. The initial I in I. Cæsar Claudinus is represented as J in the modern column. "Grosse" means thick or coarse, not disgusting. The compressed consultation references, names and 1549 date are retained as Burton prints them; the underlying cases remain to be collated.

Mercurialis subscribes to them cons. 89. [4288]the stomack being misaffected, which he cals the king of the belly, because if he be distempered, all the rest suffer with him, as being deprived of their nutriment or fed with bad nourishment, by means of which, come crudities, obstructions, winde, rumbling, griping, &c.	Mercurialis agrees with them in consultation 89: the stomach is disordered, which he calls the king of the abdomen, because if it is disordered all the rest suffer with it, being deprived of nourishment or fed with bad nourishment. This brings about undigested matter, blockages, wind, rumbling, cramps, and so on.[4289]
Hercules de Saxonia besides heat, will have the weaknesse of the liver and his obstruction a cause, facultatem debilem jecinoris, which he calls the minerall of melancholy. Laurentius assignes his reason, because the liver over-hot draws the meat undigested out of the stomack, and burneth the humours. Montanus cons. 244. proves that sometimes a cold liver may be a cause.	Besides heat, Hercules de Saxonia considers weakness and blockage of the liver a cause—"a weakened power of the liver," which he calls the mine of melancholy. Laurentius gives this reason: the overheated liver draws food out of the stomach undigested and burns the humours. Montanus, in consultation 244, proves that a cold liver may sometimes be a cause.[4290]
Laurentius c. 12. Trincavelius Lib. 12. consil. and Gualter Bruel seems to lay the greatest fault upon the Spleen; that doth not his duty in purging the Liver as he ought, being too great, or too little, in drawing too much bloud sometimes to it, and not expelling it, as P. Cnemiandrus in a [4291]consultation of his noted, tumorem lienis, he names it, and the fountain of melancholy.	Laurentius, chapter 12, Trincavelius, "book 12, consultation," and Gualter Bruel seem to place the greatest blame on the spleen. Too large or too small, it fails in its duty to cleanse the liver as it should, sometimes drawing too much blood to itself without expelling it, as P. Cnemiandrus noted in one of his consultations. He calls it "a swelling of the spleen" and the fountain of melancholy.[4292]

[4288] Burton. Printed page 177, h: "Stomacho læso robur corporis imminuitur, & reliqua membra alimento orbata, &c." When the stomach is impaired, the body's strength is diminished and the other parts are deprived of nourishment, etc.

[4289] Editor. "Crudities" are incompletely digested materials or humours; "griping" means abdominal cramps. The king image makes the other organs dependent on the stomach's provision of nourishment.

[4290] Editor. "Minerall" here is a mine or source from which melancholy is produced, rather than an inorganic substance in the modern sense. Facultatem debilem jecinoris means a weakened power or function of the liver. Burton again allows rival hot and cold explanations.

[4291] Burton. Printed page 177, i: "Hildesheim." Hildesheim.

[4292] Editor. The printed "Trincavelius Lib. 12. consil." is an incomplete or displaced reference. It is retained literally in the modern column rather than silently changed to a particular consultation. The margin names Hildesheim as the intermediary for Cnemiandrus; the exact account remains uncollated.

Diocles supposed the ground of this kinde of Melancholy, to proceed from the inflammation of the Pylorus, which is the neather mouth of the Ventricle. Others assign the Mesenterium or Midriffe distempered by heat, the womb misaffected, stopping of Hemrods, with many such.	Diocles supposed this kind of melancholy to have its origin in inflammation of the pylorus, which is the lower opening of the stomach. Others name the mesentery or midriff disordered by heat, a disordered womb, suppression of haemorrhoidal bleeding, and many similar causes.[4293]
All which Laurentius cap. 12. reduceth to three, Mesentery, Liver, and Spleen, from whence he denominates Hepatick, Splenitick, and Meseraick Melancholy. Outward causes, are bad diet, care, griefes, discontents, and in a word all those six non-naturall things, as Montanus found by his experience, consil. 244.	Laurentius, in chapter 12, reduces all these to three: mesentery, liver and spleen, from which he names hepatic, splenic and mesenteric melancholy. External causes are bad diet, worry, griefs, discontents—in a word, all those six non-natural things, as Montanus found from experience, consultation 244.[4294]
Solenander consil. 9. for a Citizen of Lyons in France, gives his reader to understand, that he knew this mischief procured by a medicine of Cantharides, which an unskilfull Physician ministred his patient to drink ad venerem excitandam.	Solenander, in consultation 9 for a citizen of Lyons in France, tells his reader that he knew this affliction to be caused by a medicine made from cantharides, which an unskilful physician gave his patient to drink “to arouse sexual desire.”[4295]

[4294] Editor. Hepatic, splenic and mesenteric mean associated with the liver, spleen and mesentery. Burton lists the organs in one order and the named forms in another; the translation preserves both sequences.

[4295] Editor. Cantharides are blister beetles used in historical medicines, including supposed aphrodisiacs. Here Burton cites a case in which their administration produced illness. The statement remains a reported case, not an endorsement of the remedy.

But most commonly fear, grief, and some sudden commotion, or perturbation of the minde begin it, in such bodies especially as are ill disposed. Melancthon. tract. 14. cap. 2. de animâ, will have it as common to men, as the mother to women, upon some grievous trouble, dislike, passion, or discontent.	But most commonly it begins with fear, grief or some sudden disturbance or agitation of the mind, especially in bodies already poorly disposed. Melanchthon, in treatise 14, chapter 2 on the soul, holds that it is as common in men as the disorder called “the mother” is in women, arising from some grievous trouble, aversion, passion or discontent.[4296]
For as Camerarius records in his life, Melancthon himself was much troubled with it, and therefore could speak out of experience. Montanus consil. 22. pro delirante Iudæo, confirms it, [4297]grievous symptomes of the minde brought him to it.	For, as Camerarius records in his life of him, Melanchthon himself suffered greatly from it and could therefore speak from experience. Montanus, in consultation 22, “for a delirious Jew,” confirms it: grievous symptoms of the mind brought the patient to it.[4298]
Randolotius relates of himself, that being one day very intent to write out a Physicians notes, molested by an occasion, he fell into an hypocondriacall fit, to avoid which he drank the decoction of wormwood, and was freed.	Randolotius relates that one day, while deeply intent on copying out a physician’s notes, he was troubled by some incident and fell into a hypochondriacal attack. To escape it he drank a decoction of wormwood and was relieved.[4299]

[4296] Editor. “The mother” is the historical disorder attributed to the womb, often called the suffocation of the mother. The analogy reflects the sex-based physiology of Burton’s sources. The printed “tract. 14. cap. 2. de animâ” remains unresolved; it is not silently converted into a different reference.

[4297] Burton. Printed page 177, k: “Habuit sæva animi symptomata quæ impediunt concoctionem, &c.” He had severe symptoms of the mind which impede digestion, etc.

[4298] Editor. The pronoun in “brought him to it” refers to the patient in Montanus’s case. The margin adds a detail absent from the body: mental symptoms impede digestion, reinforcing the reciprocal influence of mind and abdominal organs.

[4299] Editor. A decoction is a preparation made by boiling material in liquid. “An occasion” leaves the disturbing incident unspecified. The reported relief belongs to Randolotius’s account; the precise source and case remain to be checked.

[4300]Melancthon (being the disease is so troublesome and frequent) holds it a most necessary and profitable study, for every man to know the accidents of it, and a dangerous thing to be ignorant, and would therefore have all men, in some sort to understand the causes, symptomes, and cures of it.	Melanchthon, since the disease is so troublesome and frequent, considers it most necessary and useful for everyone to study its manifestations, and dangerous to be ignorant of them. He would therefore have everyone understand its causes, symptoms and cures to some degree.[4301]

[4300] Burton. Printed page 177, l: "Usitatissimus morbus cum sit, utile est hujus visceris accidentia considerare, nec leve periculum hujus causas morbi ignorantibus." Since this is a very common disease, it is useful to consider the disorders of this internal organ; nor is the danger slight for those ignorant of the causes of this disease.

[4301] Editor. "Accidents" here means the disease's manifestations or attendant disorders. The margin speaks specifically of "this internal organ" without naming it; the body broadens the point into a recommendation that everyone learn something of melancholy.

Source page 178 SUBSECT. 5. Causes of Melancholy from the whole Body.	Subsection 5. Causes of melancholy arising from the whole body.
As before, the cause of this kind of Melancholy is inward or outward. Inward, [4302]when the liver is apt to ingender such an humour, or the spleen weak by nature, and not able to discharge his office. A melancholy temperature, retention of Hæmrods, monthly issues, bleeding at nose, long diseases, agues, and all those six non-naturall things increase it.	As before, the cause of this kind of melancholy is internal or external. Internal: when the liver is prone to generate such a humour, or the spleen is naturally weak and unable to perform its function. A melancholic temperament, suppression of haemorrhoidal bleeding, menstrual flow and nosebleeds, long illnesses, fevers and all those six non-natural things increase it.[4303]
But especially [4304]bad dyet, as Piso thinks, pulse, salt meat, shell-fish, cheese, black wine, &c. Mercurialis out of Averroes and Avicenna condemns all herbs: Galen. lib. 3. de loc. affect. cap. 7. especially Cabbage. So likewise fear, sorrow, discontents, &c. but of these before. And thus in brief you have had the generall and particular causes of Melancholy.	But especially bad diet, as Piso thinks: pulses, salted meat, shellfish, cheese, dark wine, and so on. Mercurialis, citing Averroes and Avicenna, condemns all herbs; Galen, in book 3, chapter 7 on affected parts, especially cabbage. So likewise fear, sorrow, discontents and so on—but these have been discussed before. Thus, in brief, you have had the general and particular causes of melancholy.[4305]

[4303] Editor. “Retention” governs haemorrhoidal bleeding, monthly discharges and nosebleeds: their suppression is intended, rather than the bleeding itself. “Temperature” means bodily temperament. This third kind is attributed to the body’s overall humoral state.

[4304] Burton. Printed page 178, o: “Melancholiam, quæ fit à redundantia humoris in toto corpore, victus imprimis generat qui eum humorem parit.” Melancholy arising from an excess of the humour throughout the whole body is generated above all by a diet that produces that humour.

[4305] Editor. “Pulse” means peas, beans, lentils and similar edible seeds; “salt meat,” preserved meat; “black wine,” dark-coloured wine. “Herbs” is broader than modern culinary seasonings and can include green vegetables. Burton reports the dietary judgements of his authorities.

Now go and brag of thy present happinesse, whosoever thou art, brag of thy temperature, of thy good parts, insult, triumph, & boast; thou seest in what a brittle state thou art, how soon thou maist be dejected, how many severall waies, by bad diet, bad ayre, a small loss, a little sorrow or discontent, an ague, &c. how many sudden accidents may procure thy ruine, what a small tenure of happinesse thou hast in this life, how weak and silly a creature thou art.	Now go and brag of your present happiness, whoever you are! Brag of your constitution, of your good qualities; exult, triumph and boast! You see how fragile your condition is, how soon you may be brought low, in how many different ways: by bad diet, bad air, a small loss, a little sorrow or discontent, a fever, and so on. How many sudden events may bring about your ruin, how slight your hold on happiness in this life, how weak and helpless a creature you are![4306]
Humble thy self therefore under the mighty hand of God · 1 Pet. 5.6. know thy self, acknowledge thy present misery, and make right use of it. Qui stat videat ne cadat.	"Humble yourself therefore under the mighty hand of God," 1 Peter 5:6. Know yourself, acknowledge your present misery and put that knowledge to proper use. "Let whoever stands take care not to fall."[4307]
Thou dost now flourish, and hast bona animi, corporis, & fortunæ, goods of body, mind and fortune, nescis quid serus secum vesper ferat, thou knowest not what storms and tempests the late evening may bring with it.	You flourish now and possess "the goods of mind, body and fortune"—goods of body, mind and fortune. "You do not know what late evening may bring with it": you do not know what storms and tempests the late evening may bring.[4308]
Be not secure then, be sober and watch, [4309]fortunam reverenter habe, if fortunate and rich: if sick and poor, moderate thy self. I have said.	Do not be complacent, then; "be sober and watch." "Treat fortune with respect," if you are fortunate and rich; if sick and poor, govern yourself with moderation. I have said my say.[4310]

[4306] Editor. "Insult" here means exult or vaunt oneself; "good parts" means good qualities or abilities; "silly" means weak or helpless in this context. The medical catalogue turns into direct moral address, exposing the precariousness of the reader's apparent good fortune.

[4307] Editor. The first quotation is 1 Peter 5:6. Qui stat videat ne cadat abbreviates 1 Corinthians 10:12, which warns the person who thinks he stands to take care lest he fall. Burton applies the scriptural warning to confidence in health and worldly success.

[4308] Editor. The Latin lists mind, body and fortune; Burton's English reverses the first two, and both orders are preserved. The evening proverb resembles the title of Varro's Menippean satire quoted in Aulus Gellius, Attic Nights 13.11.1, Nescis quid vesper serus vehat. Burton adds storms and tempests in his English expansion.

[4309] Burton. Printed page 178, p: "Ausonius." Ausonius.

[4310] Editor. "Be sober and watch" recalls 1 Peter 5:8. Ausonius, Epigrams 2.7–8 in Evelyn-White's numbering, advises respect for fortune after recounting how King Agathocles remembered his humble origin. "Secure" means overconfident or complacent. "I have said" closes the section on causes, before Section 3 turns to symptoms.

SECT. 3. MEMB. 1. SUBSECT. 1. Symptomes, or signs of Melancholy in the Body.	Section 3. Member 1. Subsection 1. Symptoms or signs of melancholy in the body.
Parrhasius a painter of Athens, amongst those Olynthian captives Philip of Macedon brought home to sell, [4311]bought one very old man; and when he had him at Athens, put him to extreme torture and torment, the better by his example, to express the pains and passions of his Prometheus, whom he was then about to paint.	Parrhasius, a painter of Athens, bought a very old man from among the Olynthian captives whom Philip of Macedon brought home to sell. Once he had him in Athens, he subjected him to extreme torture and torment, so that his example would help him portray the pain and suffering of the Prometheus he was about to paint.[4312]
I need not be so barbarous, inhumane, curious or cruell for this purpose to torture any poor melancholy man, their symptomes are plain, obvious and familiar, there needs no such accurate observation or far fetcht object, they delineate themselves, they voluntarily betray themselves, they are too frequent in all places, I meet them still as I go, they cannot conceal it, their grievances are too well known, I need not seek far to describe them.	For my purpose I need not be so barbarous, inhuman, painstaking or cruel as to torture any poor melancholic person. Their symptoms are plain, obvious and familiar; no such minute observation or far-fetched subject is needed. They draw their own portraits; they reveal themselves of their own accord. They are all too common everywhere; I meet them constantly as I go. They cannot hide their condition; their sufferings are too well known. I need not look far to describe them.[4313]

[4313] Editor. “Curious” means painstaking or minutely inquisitive, and “accurate” exceptionally careful. “Object” is the person or subject observed. The painter’s act of delineation becomes Burton’s metaphor for describing the sufferers he encounters.

Source page 179 Symptomes therefore are either [4314]universall or particular, saith Gordonius, lib. med. cap. 19. part. 2. to persons, to species; some signes are secret, some manifest, some in the Body, some in the minde, and diversly vary, according to the inward or outward causes, Capivaccius; or from stars according to Jovianus Pontanus, de reb. cœlest. lib. 10. cap. 13. and cœlestiall influences, or from the humours diversly mixt, Ficinus li. 1. cap. 4. de sanit. tuendâ:	Symptoms, then, are either universal or peculiar to individuals or kinds of the disease, says Gordonius in part 2, chapter 19 of his medical work. Some signs are hidden, some apparent; some belong to the body, some to the mind. They vary in different ways according to the internal or external causes, says Capivaccius; or arise from the stars and celestial influences, according to Jovianus Pontanus, On Celestial Things, book 10, chapter 13; or from the various mixtures of the humours, says Ficino, book 1, chapter 4 of his work on preserving health.[4315]
as they are hot, cold, naturall, unnaturall, intended or remitted, so will Aëtius have melancholica deliria multiformia, diversity of melancholy signs. Laurentius ascribes them to their severall temperatures, delights, natures, inclinations, continuance of time, as they are simple or mixt with other diseases, as the causes are divers, so must the signs be, almost infinite, Altomarus cap. 7. art. med.	As they are hot or cold, natural or unnatural, intensified or lessened, so Aëtius holds that "melancholic derangements take many forms": a diversity of melancholic signs. Laurentius attributes them to people's different temperaments, pleasures, natures and inclinations, to the length of time the condition has lasted, and to whether it occurs alone or is mixed with other diseases. As the causes differ, so must the signs, almost without number: Altomarus, chapter 7 of his Art of Medicine.[4316]

[4314] Burton. Printed page 179, q: "Quædam universalia, particularia, quædam manifesta, quædam in corpore, quædam in cogitatione & animo, quædam à stellis, quædam ab humoribus, quæ ut vinum corpus variè disponit, &c. Diversa phantasmata pro varietate causæ externæ, internæ." Some are universal, others particular; some apparent, some in the body, some in thought and mind; some arise from the stars, some from the humours, which, like wine, affect the body in different ways, etc. Different imagined appearances correspond to the variety of external and internal causes. The printed Latin has a singular verb after quæ; the translation follows the evident sense.

[4315] Editor. The distinction is between signs common to melancholy generally and those peculiar to a person or a particular kind. Stars, humours and bodily or mental signs belong to the competing explanatory systems Burton is assembling.

[4316] Editor. "Temperature" means the mixture or balance of bodily qualities; "intended" means intensified. The translation keeps the literal sense of melancholica deliria multiformia before Burton's own looser English gloss, "diversity of melancholy signs."

And as wine produceth divers effects, or that herb Tortocolla in [4317]Laurentius, which makes some laugh, some weep, some sleep, some dance, some sing, some howle, some drinke, &c. so doth this our melancholy humour, work severall signes in severall parties.	And just as wine produces different effects, or that herb Tortocolla in Laurentius, which makes some laugh, some weep, some sleep, some dance, some sing, some howl, some drink, and so on, so this melancholic humour of ours produces different signs in different people.[4318]
But to confine them, these generall Symptomes may be reduced to those of the Body or the Minde. Those usuall signs appearing in the Bodies of such as are melancholy be these, cold and dry, or they are hot and dry, as the humor is more or lesse adust. From [4319]these first qualities arise many other second, as that of [4320]colour, black, swarty, pale, ruddy, &c. some are impensè rubri, as Montaltus cap. 16. observes out of Galen li. 3. de locis affectis, very red and high coloured.	But to bring them within bounds, these general symptoms may be grouped as those of the body or of the mind. The usual signs appearing in the bodies of melancholic people are these: they are cold and dry, or hot and dry, according to how far the humour has been scorched. From these primary qualities arise many secondary ones, such as colour: black, dark, pale, ruddy, and so on. Some are “intensely red,” as Montaltus observes in chapter 16, citing Galen’s On the Affected Parts, book 3—very red and highly coloured.[4321]

[4317] Burton. Printed page 179, r: “Lib. 1. de visu. fol. 17. Ad ejus usum alii sudant, alii vomunt, flent, bibunt, saltant, alii rident, tremunt, dormiunt, &c.” Book 1 on sight, folio 17. When it is used, some sweat; others vomit, weep, drink or dance; others laugh, tremble or sleep, etc.

[4321] Editor. “Adust” means burnt or scorched. Heat, coldness, dryness and moisture are primary humoral qualities; complexion and other visible features are secondary effects. “Black” and “swarty” here describe colour within that medical scheme.

Hippocrates in his book [4322]de insania & melan. reckons up these signes, that they are [4323]lean, withered, hollow-eyed, looke old, wrinkled, harsh, much troubled with winde, and a griping in their bellies, or belly-ake, belch often, dry bellies and hard, dejected lookes, shaggy beards, singing of the ears, vertigo, light headed, little or no sleep, and that interrupt, terrible and fearfull dreames, [4324]Anna soror, quæ me suspensam insomnia terrent?	Hippocrates, in his book On Madness and Melancholy, lists these signs: they are lean, withered, hollow-eyed, old-looking, wrinkled and rough; much troubled with wind and abdominal cramps or bellyache; frequently belching; with dry, hard bowels, dejected looks and shaggy beards; ringing in the ears, vertigo and light-headedness; little or no sleep, and that interrupted; terrible and frightening dreams. "Anna, my sister, what dreams terrify me in my anxious state?"[4325]

[4325] Editor. "Dry bellies" refers to dry or constipated bowels; "singing" is ringing in the ears. The quotation is Aeneid 4.9: Dido speaks to Anna while troubled by her attachment to Aeneas. The Hippocratic work is given under Burton's printed title and Calvus translation; the exact text has not yet been identified independently.

These same Symptomes are repeated by Melanelius in his booke of Melancholy collected out of Galen, Ruffus, Aëtius, by Rhasis, Gordonius, & all the Juniors, [4326]continuall, sharp, & stinking belchings, as if their meat in their stomack were putrefied, or that they had eaten fish, dry bellies, absurd & interrupt dreames, & many phantasticall visions about their eys, vertiginous, apt to tremble, & prone to Venery.	These same symptoms are repeated by Melanelius in his book on melancholy, compiled from Galen, Rufus and Aëtius; by Rhazes, Gordonius and all the later writers: continual sour and foul-smelling belching, as though the food in their stomachs had putrefied or they had eaten fish; dry bowels, absurd and interrupted dreams, and many imaginary visions before their eyes; dizziness, a tendency to tremble, and an inclination to sexual activity.[4327]
[4328]Some adde palpitation of the heart, cold sweat, as usuall Symptomes, and a leaping in many parts of the body, saltum in multis corporis partibus, a kinde of itching, saith Laurentius, on the superficies of the skin, like a flea-biting sometimes.	Some add palpitations of the heart and cold sweat as usual symptoms, and a jumping in many parts of the body—"a twitching in many parts of the body"—a kind of itching, says Laurentius, on the surface of the skin, sometimes like a flea-bite.

[4327] Editor. "Juniors" means later medical writers; "venery" means sexual activity. In the marginal Latin, culentumque is an unclear reading left untranslated within the otherwise translated note. The wording, its relation to virulentum and Burton's reference to fish remain unresolved; the English body has not been altered to agree with the note.

[4328] Burton. Printed page 179, z: "Altomarus, Bruel, Piso, Montaltus." The four medical authorities are listed without particular works or passages.

[4329] Burton. Printed page 179, a: "Frequentes habent oculorum nictationes, aliqui tamen fixis oculis plerumque sunt." They blink their eyes frequently; some, however, usually have a fixed stare.

[4330] Editor. "Twinkling" here is blinking; "stut" means stammer. Fen is a division of Avicenna's Canon. The Latin describes fluttering eyes, stammering and a deeply reddened complexion; Burton singles out stammering in his next sentence.

[4331]Rhasis makes head-ach and a binding heavinesse for a principall token, much leaping of winde about the skinne, as well as stutting, or tripping in speech, &c. hollow eys, grosse veines, & broad lips. To some too, if they be far gone mimicall gestures are too familiar, laughing, grinning, fleering, murmuring, talking to themselves, with strange mouthes & faces, inarticulate voices, exclamations, &c.	Rhazes makes headache and a constricting heaviness a principal sign, with much movement of wind under the skin, as well as stammering or stumbling in speech, and so on; hollow eyes, swollen veins and broad lips. Some, too, if their condition is far advanced, are all too prone to theatrical gestures: laughing, grinning, smirking, muttering, talking to themselves, making strange movements of the mouth and face, uttering inarticulate sounds and exclamations, and so on.[4332]
Source page 179–180 And although they be commonly leane, hirsute, unchearfull in countenance, withered, and not so pleasant to behold, by reason of those continuall fears, griefs, and vexations, dull, heavie, lazie, restlesse, unapt to go about any businesse; yet their memories are most part good, they have happy wits, and excellent apprehensions.	And although they are commonly lean, hairy, cheerless in expression, withered and not very pleasant to look at because of those continual fears, griefs and troubles—dull, heavy, sluggish, restless and unable to set about any business—yet their memories are mostly good; they have gifted minds and excellent powers of understanding.[4333]

[4332] Editor. “Mimicall” means like an actor’s gestures; “fleering” means grinning or smirking. The moving “wind” is part of the period’s bodily explanation of these sensations, not a metaphor added by the modern version.

[4333] Editor. “Happy wits” means gifted minds, and “apprehensions” powers of understanding. Burton sets this intellectual capacity beside the outward dullness and incapacity he has just described.

Source page 180 Their hot and dry brains make them they cannot sleep, Ingentes habent & crebras vigilias (Areteus) Mighty and often watchings, sometimes waking for a month, a year together. [4334]Hercules de Saxoniâ faithfully averreth, that he hath heard his mother swear, she slept not for seven moneths together: Trincavelius Tom. 2. cons. 16. speaks of one that waked 50. dayes, and Skenkius hath examples of two years, and all without offence.	Their hot and dry brains prevent them from sleeping: “They suffer great and frequent bouts of sleeplessness” (Aretaeus)—long and frequent periods of wakefulness, sometimes staying awake for a month or a year at a time. Hercules de Saxonia solemnly affirms that he heard his mother swear she had not slept for seven months together. Trincavelius, volume 2, consultation 16, speaks of someone who stayed awake for fifty days, and Schenck gives examples of two years, all without harm.[4335]
In naturall actions their appetite is greater then their concoction, multa appetunt, pauca digerunt, as Rhasis hath it, they covet to eat, but cannot digest. And although they [4336]do eat much, yet they are lean, ill liking, saith Areteus, withered and hard, much troubled with costivenesse, crudities, oppilations, spitting, belching, &c.	In their nutritive functions, their appetite exceeds their digestion: “They crave much but digest little,” as Rhazes puts it—they long to eat but cannot digest. And although they eat much, they are nevertheless lean and in poor bodily condition, says Aretaeus, withered and hard, much troubled with constipation, undigested matter, obstructions, spitting, belching, and so on.[4337]

[4335] Editor. “Watchings” are periods without sleep; “without offence” means without harm. These extraordinary durations are reported claims from Burton’s authorities. They have been preserved as claims, and the cited cases still require independent collation.

[4336] Burton. Printed page 180, d: “Alvus arida nihil dejiciens cibi capaces, nihilominus tamen extenuati sunt.” The bowels are dry and discharge nothing; they can take food, yet nevertheless they are wasted.

[4337] Editor. “Natural actions” are chiefly nutritive bodily functions in this medical vocabulary. “Concoction” means digestion, “ill liking” poor bodily condition, “costiveness” constipation and “oppilations” obstructions. “Crudities” are incompletely digested substances.

Their pulse is rare & slow, except it be of the [4338]Carotides which is very strong; but that varies according to their intended passions or perturbations, as Struthius hath proved at large, Spigmaticæ artis l. 4. c. 13.	Their pulse is infrequent and slow, except in the carotid arteries, where it is very strong; but this varies with the intensity of their passions or emotional disturbances, as Struthius has demonstrated at length in his Art of the Pulse, book 4, chapter 13.[4339]
To say truth, in such Chronick diseases the pulse is not much to be respected, there being so much superstition in it, as [4340]Crato notes, and so many differences in Galen, that he dares say they may not be observed, or understood of any man.	To tell the truth, in such chronic diseases the pulse deserves little attention, since there is so much superstition about it, as Crato notes, and Galen makes so many distinctions that he ventures to say no one can observe or understand them.[4341]
Their urine is most part pale, and low coloured, urina pauca, acris, biliosa, (Areteus) Not much in quantity: But this in my judgement, is all out as uncertain as the other, varying so often according to severall persons, habits, & other occasions not to be respected in Chronick diseases.	Their urine is mostly pale and faintly coloured: "urine scanty, acrid and bilious" (Aretaeus)—not much in quantity. But in my judgement this is quite as uncertain as the other sign, varying so often with different individuals, bodily constitutions and other circumstances that it deserves no attention in chronic diseases.[4342]

[4339] Editor. "Rare" describes widely separated beats; "intended passions" intensified emotions. The carotids are the neck arteries. Burton's title Spigmaticæ artis is retained in the original column; the modern title states its subject without silently repairing the Latin spelling.

[4340] Burton. Printed page 180, f: "Andreas Dudith Rahamo. ep. lib. 3. Crat. epist. multa in pulsibus superstitio, ausim etiam dicere, tot differentias quæ describuntur à Galeno, neque intelligi à quoquam nec observari posse." Andreas Dudith to Rahamus, a letter in book 3 of Crato's letters. There is much superstition in matters of the pulse; I would even venture to say that the many distinctions described by Galen can neither be understood nor observed by anyone.

[4341] Editor. The body attributes the observation to Crato, while the margin describes a letter from Andreas Dudith to Rahamus in Crato's letter collection. The difference is preserved. "Respected" means taken into account as a diagnostic sign.

[4342] Editor. Burton's own gloss translates only pauca, "scanty"; the modern version first gives all three Latin adjectives. "Habits" means bodily constitutions. His rejection of urine and pulse as reliable chronic signs is his judgement within the argument.

If the heart, brain, liver, spleen, be misaffected, as usually they are, many inconveniences proceed from them, many diseases accompany, as Incubus, [4345]Apoplexy, Epilepsie, Vertigo, those frequent wakings and terrible dreams, [4346]intempestive laughing, weeping, sighing, sobbing, bashfulnesse, blushing, trembling, sweating, swouning, &c. [4347]All their senses are troubled, they think they see, hear, smell, and touch that which they do not, as shall be proved in the following discourse.	If the heart, brain, liver and spleen are disordered, as they usually are, many troubles arise from them and many diseases accompany them: the nightmare, apoplexy, epilepsy, vertigo, those frequent spells of wakefulness and terrible dreams; untimely laughing, weeping, sighing, sobbing, shyness, blushing, trembling, sweating, fainting, and so on. All their senses are disturbed: they think they see, hear, smell and touch things they do not, as will be shown in the following discussion.[4348]

[4345] Burton. Printed page 180, h: “Post 40. ætat. annum, saith Jacchinus in 15. 9. Rhasis. Idem Mercurialis consil. 86. Trincavellius. Tom. 2. consil. 17.” After the fortieth year of life, says Jacchinus on chapter 15 of book 9 of Rhazes. The same in Mercurialis, consultation 86, and Trincavellius, volume 2, consultation 17.

[4347] Burton. Printed page 180, k: “Fernelius consil. 43. & 45. Montanus consil. 230. Galen. de locis affectis, lib. 3. cap. 6.” Fernel, consultations 43 and 45; Montanus, consultation 230; Galen, On the Affected Parts, book 3, chapter 6.

[4348] Editor. Incubus is the oppressive nightmare or night-time sense of a weight on the sleeper. “Apoplexy” is the historical category of a sudden loss of consciousness or bodily power. “Intempestive” means occurring at an inappropriate time. These names retain Burton’s categories rather than implying exact modern diagnoses.

SUBSECT. 2. Symptomes or Signes in the Minde.	Subsection 2. Symptoms or signs in the mind.
[4349]Arculanus in 9. Rhasis ad Almansor. cap. 16. will have these Symptomes to be infinite, as indeed they are, varying according to the parties, for scarce is there one of a thousand that dotes alike, [4350]Laurentius c. 16.	Arculanus, in his commentary on book 9 of Rhazes' work for Almansor, chapter 16, holds these symptoms to be infinite, as indeed they are, varying with the individual: scarcely one in a thousand is deranged in the same way, says Laurentius, chapter 16.[4351]
Source page 180–181 Some few of greater note I will point at; and amongst the rest, Fear and Sorrow, which as they are frequent causes, so if they persever long, according to Hippocrates [4352]and Galen's Aphorismes, they are most assured signes, inseparable companions, and characters of melancholy; Of present melancholy, and habituated, saith Montaltus cap. 11. and common to them all, as the said Hippocrates, Galen, Avicenna, and all Neotericks hold.	I will point out a few of the more notable ones, and among them fear and sorrow. Just as these are frequent causes, so, if they persist for a long time, according to Hippocrates and Galen's aphorisms, they are the surest signs, inseparable companions and distinguishing marks of melancholy: of melancholy as a present condition and as an established habit, says Montaltus, chapter 11, and common to all sufferers, as Hippocrates, Galen, Avicenna and all the more recent writers maintain.[4353]

[4349] Burton. Printed page 180, unlettered topical label: "Fear." The marginal topic heading accompanies the opening discussion of mental symptoms; it is preserved here rather than inserted as a new heading in the body.

[4350] Burton. Printed page 180, l: "Aphorism. & lib. de Melan." Aphorisms and the book on melancholy. The marker is printed before Laurentius; its apparent displacement is discussed in the Editor note.

[4351] Editor. "Dotes" means suffers derangement, not fond affection. The marginal l is visibly anchored before Laurentius, although its abbreviated wording ("Aphorisms and the book on melancholy") appears more suited to the ensuing Hippocratic reference. The printed attachment is preserved rather than silently moved.

[4352] Burton. Printed page 180, m: "Lib. 2. cap. 6. de locis affect. timor & mæstitia, si diutius perseverent, &c." On the Affected Parts, book 2, chapter 6: fear and sadness, if they persist for a long time, etc. The book and chapter are retained as printed.

[4353] Editor. The maxim about prolonged fear or despondency is Hippocrates, Aphorisms 6.23. Burton's adjoining Galenic citation prints book 2, chapter 6 of On the Affected Parts; it is not harmonized with the different Galenic references elsewhere in this block. "Neotericks" means more recent writers.

Source page 181 But as hounds many times run away with a false cry, never perceiving themselves to be at a fault, so do they. For Diocles of old, (whom Galen confutes) & amongst the Juniors, [4354]Hercules de Saxoniâ, with Lod. Mercatus cap. 17. l. 1. de melan. take just exceptions at this Aphorisme of Hippocrates, 'tis not alwayes true, or so generally to be understood, Fear and Sorrow are no common Symptomes to all melancholy;	But just as hounds often run off baying on a false scent, never realizing they have lost the trail, so do these writers. For Diocles in antiquity, whom Galen refutes, and among the later writers Hercules de Saxonia, with Ludovicus Mercatus, book 1, chapter 17 on melancholy, raise reasonable objections to this aphorism of Hippocrates. It is not always true, or to be understood so universally: fear and sorrow are not symptoms common to every melancholic person.[4355]
upon more serious consideration, I finde some (saith he) that are not so at all. Some indeed are sad, and not fearfull; some fearfull and not sad; some neither fearfull, nor sad; some both. Four kindes he excepts, fanaticall persons, such as were Cassandra, Manto, Nicostrata, Mopsus, Proteus, the Sybills, whom [4356]Aristotle confesseth to have been deeply melancholy.	"On more serious consideration," he says, "I find some who are not like this at all. Some are indeed sad but not fearful; some fearful but not sad; some neither fearful nor sad; some both." He excepts four kinds: people seized by prophetic frenzy, such as Cassandra, Manto, Nicostrata, Mopsus, Proteus and the Sibyls, whom Aristotle acknowledges to have been deeply melancholic.[4357]

[4354] Burton. Printed page 181, n: "Tract. posthumo de Melan. edit. Venetiis 1620. per Bolzettam Bibliop. Mihi diligentius hanc rem consideranti, patet quosdam esse, qui non laborant mærore & timore." In the posthumous treatise on melancholy, published at Venice in 1620 by the bookseller Bolzetta. On considering this matter more carefully, I see that some do not suffer from grief and fear.

[4355] Editor. Hounds are "at a fault" when they lose the scent. The hunting comparison turns a disagreement among medical authorities into an example of writers following one another without noticing an error.

[4356] Burton. Printed page 181, dagger: "Prob. lib. 3." Problems, book 3. Retained as printed; the relevant discussion is in Problems 30.1.

[4357] Editor. The names are examples of prophetic or inspired figures in Burton's catalogue. "Fanaticall" here denotes prophetic frenzy. The relevant discussion of inspired melancholy and Sibyls is in the Aristotelian Problems 30.1; the margin's "lib. 3" is retained. Burton's full list is not presented as a verbatim list from that passage.

Baptista Porta seconds him, Physiog. lib. 1. cap. 8. they were atrâ bile perciti: dæmoniacall persons, & such as speak strange languages, are of this ranke: some Poets, such as laugh alwayes, and think themselves Kings, Cardinalls, &c. sanguine they are, pleasantly disposed most part, and so continue.	Baptista Porta supports him, Physiognomy, book 1, chapter 8: they were "stirred by black bile." People possessed by demons, and those who speak unfamiliar languages, belong to this class; some poets; and those who laugh all the time and imagine themselves kings, cardinals, and so on. They are sanguine, usually cheerful in disposition, and remain so.[4358]
[4359]Baptista Porta confines Fear and Sorrow to them that are cold; but Lovers, Sybills, Enthusiasts, he wholly excludes. So that I think I may truly conclude, they are not alwayes sad and fearfull, but usually so: and that [4360]without a cause, timent de non timendis, (Gordonius:) quæque, momenti non sunt, although not all alike (saith Altomarus) [4361]yet all likely fear, [4362]some with an extraordinary and a mighty fear, Areteus.	Baptista Porta restricts fear and sorrow to those whose temperament is cold; he excludes lovers, Sibyls and people seized by inspiration altogether. So I think I may rightly conclude that they are not always sad and fearful, but usually are, and that without a cause: "they fear things that need not be feared" (Gordonius), "and things of no importance." Although not all in the same way, says Altomarus, yet all tend to fear, some with an extraordinary and overwhelming fear: Aretaeus.[4363]

[4358] Editor. The loosely punctuated list gives four exceptions: prophetic people, the possessed, poets, and those with continual mirth or grandiose beliefs. "Sanguine" refers to a blood-dominant temperament associated with cheerfulness. The modern punctuation makes the enumeration readable without changing its claims.

[4359] Burton. Printed page 181, star: "Physiog. lib. 1. c. 8. Quibus multa frigida bilis atra, stolidi & timidi, at qui calidi, ingeniosi, amasii, divinosi, spiritu instigati, &c." Physiognomy, book 1, chapter 8. Those with much cold black bile are dull and timid, but those who are hot are gifted, amorous, prophetic, impelled by a spirit, etc.

[4360] Burton. Printed page 181, o: "Omnes exercet metus & tristitia, & sine causa." Fear and sadness trouble them all, and without a cause.

[4361] Burton. Printed page 181, p: "Omnes timent licet non omnibus idem timendi modus Aëtius Tetrab. lib. 2. sect. c. 9." All are afraid, although their manner of fearing is not the same in every case. Aëtius, Tetrabiblos, book 2, section, chapter 9. The section number is not supplied in the printed citation.

[4362] Burton. Printed page 181, q: "Ingenti pavore trepidant." They tremble with immense fear.

[4363] Editor. "Enthusiasts" means people understood as divinely inspired or possessed, rather than merely eager people. The cold/hot distinction is physiological. The printed "yet all likely fear" is retained and rendered "all tend to fear"; the exact early medical wording remains to be checked.

[4364]Many fear death, and yet in a contrary humour, make away themselves, Galen. lib. 3. de loc. affect. cap. 7. Some are afraid the heaven will fall on their heads: some they are damned, or shall be. [4365]They are troubled with scruples of conscience, distrusting Gods mercies, think they shall goe certainly to Hell, the Devill will have them, & make great lamentation, Jason Pratensis.	Many fear death and yet, in a contrary mood, take their own lives: Galen, On the Affected Parts, book 3, chapter 7. Some fear the heavens will fall on their heads; some that they are damned or will be. They are troubled by scruples of conscience, distrust God's mercies, think they will certainly go to hell and the Devil will have them, and lament greatly: Jason Pratensis.[4366]
Fear of Devils, death, that they shalbe so sick, of some such or such disease, ready to tremble at every object, they shall die themselves forthwith, or that some of their dear friends or near allies are certainly dead: imminent danger, losse, disgrace still torment others, &c.	Fear of devils, death, becoming terribly ill with this or that disease; ready to tremble at everything they encounter; certain that they themselves will die immediately, or that some dear friend or close relative is already dead. Imminent danger, loss and disgrace continually torment others, and so on.
that they are all glasse, and therefore will suffer no man to come near them; that they are all cork, as light as feathers; others as heavy as lead, some are afraid their heads will fall off their shoulders, that they have frogs in their bellies, &c. [4367]Montanus consil. 23. speaks of one that durst not walk alone from home, for fear he should swoon, or die. A second [4368]fears every man he meets will rob him, quarrell with him, or kill him.	They believe they are made entirely of glass and therefore let no one come near them; or entirely of cork, as light as feathers; others, as heavy as lead. Some fear their heads will fall from their shoulders, or that they have frogs in their bellies, and so on. Montanus, consultation 23, speaks of someone who dared not walk away from home alone for fear of fainting or dying. A second fears that everyone he meets will rob him, quarrel with him or kill him.

[4364] Burton. Printed page 181, r: "Multi mortem timent, & tamen sibi ipsis mortem consciscunt, alii cœli ruinam timent." Many fear death, yet take their own lives; others fear the heavens falling.

[4366] Editor. "Scruples" are persistent religious or moral doubts. Burton describes fear of damnation through the sufferers' beliefs and through Jason Pratensis's account. The marginal Orcus, the classical underworld, is used here for hell.

[4367] Burton. Printed page 181, dagger: "Non ausus egredi domo ne deficeret." He did not dare leave home for fear he might faint.

[4369]A third dares not venture to walk alone, for fear he should meet the Devil, a thief, be sick; fears all old women as witches, and every black dog or cat he sees he suspecteth to be a Devil, every person comes near him is malificiated, every creature, all intend to hurt him, seek his ruine:	A third dares not venture out alone for fear of meeting the Devil or a thief, or becoming ill; he fears all old women as witches, and suspects every black dog or cat he sees of being a devil. Every person who comes near him is bewitched, every creature too: all intend to hurt him and seek his ruin.[4370]
another dares not go over a bridge, come near a poole, rock, steep hill, lye in a chamber where crosse beams are, for fear he be tempted to hang, drown or præcipitate himself. If he be in a silent auditory, as at a sermon, he is afraid he shall speak aloud at unawares, some thing undecent, unfit to be said.	Another dares not cross a bridge, come near a pool, a rock or a steep hill, or sleep in a room with crossbeams, for fear he may be tempted to hang or drown himself, or throw himself down. If he is among a silent audience, as at a sermon, he fears he may unintentionally speak aloud, saying something indecent or unfit to be said.
Source page 181–182 If he be locked in a close room, he is afraid of being stifled for want of air, and still carries Bisket, Aquavitæ, or some strong waters about him, for fear of deliquiums, or being sick; or if he be in a throng, middle of a Church, multitude, where he may not well get out, though he be at ease, he is so misaffected. He will freely promise, undertake any businesse beforehand, but when it comes to be performed, he dare not adventure, but fears an infinite number of dangers, disasters, &c.	If he is locked in a confined room, he fears suffocating for lack of air, and always carries biscuit, aqua vitae or some strong spirits for fear of fainting or becoming ill. Or if he is in a crowd, in the middle of a church or gathering where he cannot easily get out, even though physically comfortable, he suffers in this way. He will readily promise and undertake any business in advance, but when it comes to carrying it out, he dares not attempt it, fearing an infinite number of dangers, disasters, and so on.[4371]

[4369] Burton. Printed page 181, dagger before Avicenna, without a corresponding body marker visible: “Avicenna.” Avicenna. This marginal citation follows the note about demons, robbers and ambushes. Its editorial anchor is placed at the adjoining example of the third sufferer; the uncertain printed linkage is retained in the textual record.

[4370] Editor. “Malificiated” means affected by witchcraft or sorcery; Burton’s wording presents the surrounding people and creatures as bewitched. The separate Avicenna citation has no clearly corresponding body marker; its new footnote anchor at this sentence is editorial and recorded as such.

[4371] Editor. “Bisket” is dry biscuit; aqua vitae and “strong waters” are distilled spirits. Deliquiums are fainting fits. The list moves between fear of enclosed spaces, of crowds and of undertaking promised actions, without imposing later diagnostic categories.

Source page 182 Some are [4372]afraid to be burned, [4373]or that the ground will sink under them, or [4374]swallow them quick, or that the King will call them in question for some fact they never did (Rhasis cont.) and that they shall surely be executed. The terror of such a death troubles them, and they fear as much, and are equally tormented in minde, [4375]as they that have committed a murder, and are pensive without a cause, as if they were now presently to be put to death. Plater. cap. 3. de mentis alienat.	Some fear being burned, or that the ground will give way beneath them or swallow them alive, or that the king will call them to account for some deed they never committed (Rhazes, Continens), and that they will certainly be executed. The terror of such a death troubles them. They fear as much and are as tormented in mind as people who have committed murder, and are distressed without cause, as if they were about to be put to death that very moment: Plater, chapter 3 on mental derangement.[4376]
They are afraid of some losse, danger, that they shall surely lose their lives, goods, and all they have, but why they know not. Trincavelius consil. 13. lib. 1. had a patient that would needs make away himself, for fear of being hanged, and could not be perswaded for three years together, but that he had killed a man. Plater. observat. lib. 1. hath two other examples of such as feared to be executed without a cause.	They fear some loss or danger: they will certainly lose their lives, their possessions and everything they have, though they do not know why. Trincavelius, consultation 13, book 1, had a patient determined to take his own life for fear of being hanged, who for three whole years could not be persuaded that he had not killed a man. Plater's Observations, book 1, gives two other examples of people who feared execution without cause.

[4373] Burton. Printed page 182, u: "Ne terra absorbeantur. Forestus." Lest they be swallowed by the earth. Forestus.

[4374] Burton. Printed page 182, x: "Ne terra dehiscat. Gordon." Lest the earth split open. Gordonius.

[4376] Editor. "Quick" means alive; "fact" means deed, here an alleged offence. "Call in question" means call to account or interrogate. The marginal quotations about the earth swallowing or opening are both retained, even though their order does not exactly match the English images.

If they come in a place where a robbery, theft, or any such offence hath bin done, they presently fear they are suspected, and many times betray themselves without a cause. Lewis the 11th the French King, suspected every man a traitour that came about him, durst trust no officer.	If they enter a place where a robbery, theft or similar offence has been committed, they immediately fear they are under suspicion, and often give themselves away without cause. Louis XI, the French king, suspected everyone around him of being a traitor and dared trust no officer.[4377]
Alii formidolosi omnium, alii quorundam (Fracastorius lib. 2. de Intellect.) [4378]some fear all alike, some certain men, and cannot endure their companies, are sick in them, or if they be from home. Some suspect [4379]treason still, others are afraid of their [4380]dearest and nearest friends. (Melanelius è Galeno, Ruffo, Aëtio,)	"Some are afraid of everyone, others of particular people" (Fracastorius, On the Understanding, book 2): some fear everyone alike, some particular men, and cannot bear their company, becoming ill in it or when away from home. Some continually suspect treachery; others fear their nearest and dearest friends (Melanelius, from Galen, Rufus and Aëtius).[4381]
and dare not be alone in the dark, for fear of hobgoblins and devils: he suspects every thing he hears or sees to be a Devil, or enchanted; and imagineth a thousand Chimera's and visions, which to his thinking he certainly sees, bugbears, talks with black men, ghosts, goblins, &c.	And they dare not be alone in the dark for fear of hobgoblins and devils. He suspects everything he hears or sees of being a devil or enchanted; imagines a thousand chimeras and visions, which he is convinced he actually sees, terrifying apparitions; talks with dark figures, ghosts, goblins, and so on.[4382]

[4377] Editor. The statement about Louis XI is retained as Burton's historical example. This passage supplies no particular authority for it; its documentary basis remains uncollated.

[4378] Burton. Printed page 182, z: "Alius domesticos timet, alius omnes, Aëtius." One fears his household, another everyone. Aëtius.

[4380] Burton. Printed page 182, b: "Ille charissimos, hic omnes homines citra discrimen timet." That man fears his dearest friends; this one fears everyone without distinction.

[4381] Editor. The fresh translation of Fracastorius's Latin precedes Burton's English restatement. "Company" means people's presence or society. The marginal Aurelianus is a different authority from the Aretaeus cited elsewhere.

[4382] Editor. "Chimeras" are fantastic imagined creatures or forms, and "bugbears" frightening apparitions. "Black men" occurs among ghosts and goblins and is rendered "dark figures" in that supernatural context; the printed phrase remains visible in the original column. Burton shifts from plural sufferers to an illustrative singular, which the translation retains.

[4383]Omnes se terrent auræ, sonus excitat omnis.	Every breeze terrifies him; every sound makes him start.[4384]
Another through bashfulnesse, suspicion & timorousnesse will not be seen abroad, [4385]loves darknesse as life, and cannot endure the light, or to sit in lightsome places, his hat still in his eyes, he will neither see, nor be seen by his good will, Hippocrates lib. de Insania & Melancholia.	Another, through shyness, suspicion and timidity, will not be seen outside; he loves darkness as dearly as life and cannot endure the light or sit in well-lit places. With his hat always pulled down over his eyes, he would willingly neither see nor be seen: Hippocrates, On Madness and Melancholy.
He dare not come in company for fear he should be misused, disgraced, overshoot himself in gesture or speeches, or be sick; he thinks every man observes him, aims at him, derides him, owes him malice. Most part [4386]they are afraid they are bewitched, possessed, or poysoned by their enemies, and sometimes they suspect their neerest friends: he thinks something speaks or talks within him, or to him, and he belcheth of the poyson.	He dares not enter company for fear of being mistreated or disgraced, making some mistake in his gestures or speech, or becoming ill. He thinks everyone watches him, singles him out, mocks him and bears him malice. For the most part they fear being bewitched, possessed or poisoned by their enemies, and sometimes suspect their closest friends. He thinks something speaks or talks inside him, or to him, and that he belches up the poison.[4387]

[4386] Burton. Printed page 182, d: “Quidam larvas, & malos spiritus ab inimicis veneficiis & incantationibus sibi putant objectari, Hippocrates, potionem se veneficam sumpsisse putant, & de hac ructare sibi crebrò videtur. Idem Montaltus cap. 21. Aëtius lib. 2. & alii. Trallianus l. 1. cap. 16.” Some think ghosts and evil spirits are sent against them by their enemies through sorcery and incantations: Hippocrates. They think they have taken a poisonous potion, and seem to themselves to belch it up frequently. The same in Montaltus, chapter 21; Aëtius, book 2, and others; Trallianus, book 1, chapter 16.

[4387] Editor. “Overshoot himself” means make a blunder or go beyond proper bounds; “owes him malice” means bears him ill will. The Latin marginal note makes explicit that the poisoned belching is something the sufferer imagines.

Cristopherus à Vega lib. 2. cap. 1. had a patient so troubled, that by no perswasion or physick, he could be reclaimed. Some are afraid that they shall have every fearfull disease they see others have, hear of, or read, & dare not therefore hear or read of any such subject, no not of melancholy it self, lest by applying to themselves that which they hear or read, they should aggravate & increase it.	Christophorus à Vega, book 2, chapter 1, had a patient so troubled that no persuasion or medicine could bring him out of it. Some fear they will develop every dreadful disease they see in others, hear of or read about, and therefore dare not hear or read about any such subject, not even melancholy itself, lest by applying what they hear or read to themselves they should aggravate and increase it.
If they see one possessed, bewitched, an Epileptick Paroxysme, a man shaking with the palsie, or giddy headed, reeling or standing in a dangerous place, &c. for many dayes after it runs in their minds, they are afraid they shall be so too, they are in like danger, as Perk. c. 12. se. 2. wel observes in his Cases of Consc. and many times by violence of imagination they produce it.	If they see someone possessed or bewitched, an epileptic seizure, a man shaking with palsy or dizzy, staggering or standing in a dangerous place, and so on, it runs through their minds for many days afterwards. They fear the same will happen to them, that they are in similar danger, as Perkins rightly observes in his Cases of Conscience, chapter 12, section 2; and often, through the force of imagination, they bring it about.[4388]
Source page 182–183 They cannot endure to see any terrible object, as a Monster, a man executed, a carcase, hear the devil named, or any tragicall relation seen, but they quake for fear, Hecatas somniare sibi videntur (Lucian) they dream of Hobgoblins, and may not get it out of their minds a long time after:	They cannot bear the sight of anything terrifying —a monster, a man being executed, a corpse—or to hear the Devil named, or encounter any tragic account, without quaking with fear. “They seem to themselves to dream of Hecates” (Lucian)— they dream of hobgoblins—and may be unable to put it out of their minds for a long time afterwards.[4389]

[4388] Editor. A “paroxysm” is an acute attack or fit. Burton cites William Perkins’s Cases of Conscience in the abbreviated form c. 12. se. 2.; this locator remains to be collated. The claim that imagination produces the symptoms is preserved as Burton’s explanation.

[4389] Editor. Lucian, Lover of Lies (Philopseudes) 39: after hearing Eucrates’s stories, Tychiades says he seems to see apparitions, demons and Hecates. The Greek verb means seeing; Burton’s Latin has dreaming, and changes the first person to the third-person plural. The fresh translation follows Burton’s Latin, including plural Hecates, followed separately by his gloss “hobgoblins.” His Latin intermediary remains unidentified.

Source page 183 they apply (as I have said) all they hear, see, read, to themselves; as [4390]Felix Plater notes of some young Physicians, that study to cure diseases, catch them themselves, will be sick, and appropriate all symptomes they finde related of others, to their own persons.	They apply everything they hear, see or read to themselves, as I have said. Felix Plater notes this of some young physicians who study to cure diseases, catch them themselves, become ill, and apply to their own persons every symptom they find described in others.[4391]
And therefore (quod iterum moneo, licet nauseam paret lectori, malo decem potius verba, decies repetita licet, abundare, quam unum desiderari) I would advise him, that is actually melancholy, not to read this tract of Symptomes, lest he disquiet or make himself for a time worse, and more melancholy then he was before.	And therefore—"I give this warning again, though it may disgust the reader: I would rather have ten words too many, even repeated ten times, than one word missing"—I would advise anyone who is presently melancholic not to read this account of symptoms, lest he unsettle himself or become temporarily worse and more melancholic than before.[4392]
Generally, of them all take this, de inanibus semper conqueruntur, & timent, saith Aretius, they complain of toyes, & fear [4393]without a cause, and still think their melancholy to be most grievous, none so bad as they are, though it be nothing in respect, yet never any man sure was so troubled, or in this sort.	Take this as a general statement about them all: "They are always complaining and frightened over empty things," says Aretius. They complain of trifles and fear without a cause, always thinking their own melancholy the most grievous, and no one so badly afflicted as they are. Though it may be nothing by comparison, surely no one was ever so troubled, or troubled in this particular way.[4394]

[4390] Burton. Printed page 183, e: "Observat. l. 1. Quando iis nil nocet, nisi quod mulieribus melancholicis." Observations, book 1. When nothing harms them except what harms melancholic women. The clause's precise connection to the cited case remains to be checked in Plater.

[4391] Editor. The assertion that the young physicians "catch" the diseases is retained alongside their applying reported symptoms to themselves. Plater's marginal clause about melancholic women is obscure without its original setting and remains unresolved; it has not been used to supply a further explanation in the body.

[4392] Editor. This warning is Burton's own address to the reader and therefore belongs in the modern-English body, including the notes-free EPUB. His parenthesis defends deliberate repetition as a precaution against leaving something unsaid.

[4393] Burton. Printed page 183, f: "—timeo tamen metusque causæ nescius, causa est metus Heinsius Austriaco." —Yet I fear, and fear that knows no cause is itself a cause of fear. Heinsius, "Austriaco," as printed; the passage is in his Auriacus.

[4394] Editor. "Toyes" means trifles. Aretaeus, Chronic Diseases 1.5, describes unreasonable fears and, as illness worsens, groundless lamentation and complaints about life. This supports a contextual comparison, but does not establish Burton's exact Latin or prove that printed Aretius should be emended. Heinsius's verse is confirmed in Auriacus, Louise's speech before the closing chorus of Act 2; Burton's margin prints Austriaco. Fear becomes its own cause in the line.

As really tormented and perplexed in as great an agony for toyes and trifles (such things as they will after laugh at themselves) as if they were most materiall and essentiall matters indeed, worthy to be feared, and will not be satisfied. Pacifie them for one, they are instantly troubled with some other fear; alwayes afraid of something, which they foolishly imagine or conceive to themselves, which never peradventure was, never can be, never likely will be;	They are as truly tormented and distressed, in as great an agony over trifles and trivialities—things they will afterwards laugh at themselves for—as if these were matters of the greatest substance and importance, genuinely to be feared; and they cannot be reassured. Settle one fear, and they are instantly troubled by another, always afraid of something they foolishly imagine or conceive for themselves, which perhaps never existed, can never exist, is never likely to exist.
troubled in minde upon every small occasion, unquiet, still complaining, grieving, vexing, suspecting, grudging, discontent, & cannot be freed so long as melancholy continues. Or if their minds be more quiet for the present, and they free from forrain fears, outward accidents, yet their bodies are out of tune, they suspect some part or other to be amiss, now their head akes, heart, stomack, splen, &c. is misaffected, they shall surely have this or that disease;	The slightest occasion troubles their minds. They are restless, always complaining, grieving, fretting, suspecting, resenting, dissatisfied, and cannot be freed while melancholy continues. Or if their minds are quieter for the moment and free from fears of external things and events, their bodies are still out of tune. They suspect some part or other is wrong: now their head aches, or their heart, stomach, spleen or some other organ is disordered; they will certainly develop this or that disease.[4395]
still troubled in body, minde, or both; and through winde, corrupt phantasie, some accidentall distemper, continually molested. Yet for all this as [4396]Jacchinus notes, in all other things they are wise, staid, discreet, and do nothing unbeseeming their dignity, person, or place, this foolish, ridiculous, and childish fear excepted;	Always troubled in body, mind or both, and continually afflicted by wind, a disordered imagination or some incidental bodily disturbance. Yet for all this, as Jacchinus notes, in every other respect they are wise, steady and judicious, and do nothing unbecoming to their dignity, character or position, except for this foolish, ridiculous and childish fear.

[4395] Editor. “Forrain fears” are fears concerning things outside oneself; “outward accidents” external events or circumstances. “Phantasie” in the next sentence is the faculty of imagination, and “accidental distemper” an incidental bodily disorder. The closing account distinguishes this fear from the sufferer’s otherwise sound judgement and conduct.

[4396] Burton. Printed page 183, g: “Cap. 15. in 9. Rhasis, in multis vidi, præter rationem semper aliquid timent, in cæteris tamen optimè se gerunt, neque aliquid præter dignitatem committunt.” Chapter 15 on book 9 of Rhazes. I have seen this in many: they are always afraid of something without reason, yet in other matters behave excellently and do nothing beneath their dignity.

which so much, so continually tortures and crucifies their souls, like a barking dog that alwayes bawls, but seldome bites, this fear ever molesteth, and so long as melancholy lasteth, cannot be avoided.	It tortures and torments their souls so greatly and so continually. Like a barking dog that always yelps but seldom bites, this fear constantly troubles them and, as long as melancholy lasts, cannot be escaped.

Sorrow is the other Character, and inseparable companion, as individuall as Saint Cosmus and Damian, fidus Achates, as all writers witness, a common symptome, a continuall, and still without any evident cause, [4397]mærent omnes, & si roges eos reddere causam, non possunt: grieving still, but why they cannot tell: Agelasti, mæsti, cogitabundi, they look as if they had newly come forth of Trophonius den.	Sorrow is the other distinguishing mark and inseparable companion, as inseparable as Saints Cosmas and Damian, a "faithful Achates," as all writers testify: a common symptom, a continual one, and always without any evident cause. "They all grieve, and if you ask them to give a reason, they cannot": always grieving, but unable to say why. "Unsmiling, sad, deep in thought," they look as though they had just come out of Trophonius's cave.[4398]
And though they laugh many times, and seem to be extraordinary merry (as they will by fits) yet extream lumpish again in an instant, dull, and heavy, semel & simul, merry and sad, but most part sad: [4399]Si qua placent, abeunt; inimica tenacius hærent: sorrow sticks by them still continually, gnawing as the vulture did [4400]Titius bowels, & they cannot avoid it.	And although they often laugh and seem extraordinarily merry, as they will in spells, in an instant they are extremely downcast again, dull and heavy, "at one and the same time" merry and sad, but mostly sad. "Whatever pleases passes away; unwelcome things cling more firmly." Sorrow stays with them continually, gnawing as the vulture did at Tityos's entrails, and they cannot escape it.[4401]

[4397] Burton. Printed page 183, h: "Altomarus cap. 7. Areteus, triste, sunt." Altomarus, chapter 7; Aretaeus: "they are sad." The margin prints triste, sunt; the anomalous form is retained, with the intended sense translated.

[4398] Editor. "Character" is a distinguishing sign; "individuall" means inseparable. Cosmas and Damian are the paired physician saints; Achates is Aeneas's faithful companion. Agelasti is Greek-derived, "people who do not laugh." Pausanias, Description of Greece 9.39.13–14, describes the terrified return from Trophonius's oracle and the eventual recovery of laughter. The marginal triste is retained rather than corrected to tristes.

[4401] Editor. The line is from the close of Baptista Mantuanus's first Eclogue. Titius is Burton's form of Tityos; Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.457–58, places his tormented entrails among the punishments of the underworld. The changing moods and the continuing sorrow are both retained; the passage is not assigned a modern diagnosis.

Source page 183–184 No sooner are their eyes open, but after terrible & troublesome dreams their heavy hearts began to sigh: they are still fretting, chafing, sighing, grieving, complaining, finding faults, repining, grudging, weeping, Heautontimorumenoi, [4402]vexing themselves, disquieted in minde, with restless, unquiet thoughts, discontent, either for their own, other mens, or publike affaires, such as concerne them not, things past, present or to come, the remembrance of some disgrace, loss, injury, abuse, &c. troubles them now being idle afresh, as if it were new done;	No sooner are their eyes open after terrible and troubling dreams than their heavy hearts begin to sigh. They are always fretting, fuming, sighing, grieving, complaining, finding fault, repining, resenting, weeping—"self-tormentors," vexing themselves, disturbed in mind by restless, unsettled thoughts; discontented over their own affairs, other people's, or public affairs that do not concern them, things past, present or to come. The memory of some disgrace, loss, injury, insult or the like troubles them afresh now that they are idle, as though it had just happened.[4403]
Source page 184 they are afflicted otherwise for some danger, loss, want, shame, misery, that will certainly come, as they suspect and mistrust. Lugubris Ate frowns upon them, insomuch that Areteus well calls it, angorem animi, a vexation of the minde, a perpetual agony. They can hardly be pleased, or eased, though in other mens opinion most happy, go, tarry, run, ride,	Or they are distressed by some danger, loss, poverty, shame or misery that, as they fear and suspect, will certainly come. "Mournful Ate" frowns upon them, so that Aretaeus aptly calls it "anguish of mind," a torment of the mind, a perpetual agony. They can scarcely be pleased or relieved, although other people consider them most fortunate: whether they go, stay, run or ride,[4404]
——[4405]post equitem sedet atra cura:	——"behind the rider sits black care."[4406]

[4402] Burton. Printed page 183, l: "Inquies animus." An unquiet mind. The label is placed beside the self-tormenting description, without a clearly visible matching letter in the body; its footnote anchor is editorial.

[4403] Editor. Heautontimorumenoi means "self-tormentors," recalling the Greek title of Terence's comedy, from which Burton shortly quotes. "Chafing" means fuming with irritation. The printed began is rendered in the present tense to match the surrounding description; the original retains it.

[4404] Editor. Ate is the personification of ruin or destructive delusion. "Want" means poverty or deprivation; "happy" means fortunate. Burton distinguishes renewed distress over remembered events from fear of events still to come.

[4405] Burton. Printed page 184, m: "Hor. l. 3. Od. 1." Horace, Odes, book 3, ode 1.

[4406] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.1.40. Care rides behind the horseman: a change of place does not free the sufferer from it.

they cannot avoid this ferall plague, let them come in what company they will, [4407]hæret lateri læthalis arundo, as to a Deer that is struck, whether he run, go, rest, with the herd, or alone, this grief remains: irresolution, inconstancy, vanity of minde, their fear, torture, care, jealousie, suspicion, &c. continues, and they cannot be relieved. So [4408]he complained in the Poet,	They cannot escape this deadly affliction, whatever company they enter. "The fatal arrow clings to the side," as with a deer that has been struck: whether it runs, walks or rests, with the herd or alone, this grief remains. Indecision, inconstancy, emptiness of mind, their fear, torment, anxiety, jealousy, suspicion and the rest continue, and they find no relief. So the man complained in the poet:[4409]
Domum revortor mæstus, atque animo ferè Perturbato, atque incerto præ ægritudine, Assido: accurrunt servi: soccos detrahunt, Video alios festinare, lectos sternere, Cænam apparare, pro se quisque sedulo Faciebant, quo illam mihi lenirent miseriam.	"I return home sorrowful, my mind almost Distracted, bewildered by distress. I sit down: servants hurry up and take my slippers off; I see others hastening to spread the couches And prepare the meal; each did his utmost To soften that misery for me."[4410]
He came home sorrowfull, and troubled in his mind, his servants did all they possibly could to please him; one puld off his socks, another made ready his bed, a third his supper, all did their utmost endeavours to ease his grief; and exhilarate his person, he was profoundly melancholy, he had lost his son, illud angebat, that was his Cordolium, his pain, his agony which could not be removed.	He came home sorrowful and troubled in mind. His servants did everything they could to please him: one pulled off his socks, another prepared his bed, a third his supper. All did their utmost to ease his grief and cheer him. He was profoundly melancholy; he had lost his son: "that tormented him." That was his heartache, his pain, his agony, which could not be removed.[4411]

[4410] Editor. Terence, Heauton Timorumenos 122–27. The Latin is translated independently; Burton's following prose paraphrase is also retained. Socci are slippers, and lecti are couches or beds; the dining context supports "couches" here, while Burton writes "socks" and "bed."

[4411] Editor. Menedemus has driven his son abroad by opposing his love affair; the son is absent, not reported dead. Burton's "lost" is retained in that sense. Cordolium is literally heart-pain or heartache.

Hence it proceeds many times, that they are weary of their lives, and ferall thoughts to offer violence to their own persons, come into their minds, [4412]tædium vitæ is a common symptome, tarda fluunt, ingrataque tempora, they are soon tired with all things, they will now tarrie, now be gone; now in bed they will rise, now up, then go to bed, now pleased, then again displeased; now they like, by and by dislike all, weary of all, sequitur nunc vivendi, nunc moriendi cupido, saith Aurelianus lib. 1. cap. 6.	This often makes them weary of their lives, and deadly thoughts of doing violence to themselves enter their minds. “Weariness of life” is a common symptom. “Slowly and joylessly the hours pass.” They soon tire of everything: now they will stay, now leave; now, in bed, they will get up; now up, they will go to bed; now pleased, then displeased again; now they like everything, soon dislike it all, weary of all. “There follows now a desire to live, now a desire to die,” says Aurelianus, book 1, chapter 6.[4413]
but most part [4414]vitam damnant, discontent, disquieted, perplexed upon every light, or no occasion, object: often tempted, I say, to make away themselves: [4415]Vivere nolunt, mori nesciunt: they cannot die, they will not live: they complain, weep, lament, and think they lead a most miserable life, never was any man so bad, or so before, every poor man they see is most fortunate in respect of them, every begger that comes to the door is happier then they are,	But for the most part “they condemn life,” discontented, disturbed and distressed by every slight occasion or object, or by none at all: often tempted, I say, to do away with themselves. “They do not wish to live; they do not know how to die”: they cannot die, they will not live. They complain, weep and lament, and think they lead a most miserable life. No one was ever so badly off or in such a state before; every poor person they see is most fortunate compared with them; every beggar who comes to the door is happier than they are.[4416]

[4413] Editor. Tædium vitæ means weariness or disgust with life. The unattributed phrase about slow, joyless time recalls Horace, Epistles 1.1.23–24. Burton’s Aurelianus citation is preserved as given; its particular edition remains to be checked.

they could be contented to change lives with them, especially if they be alone, idle, & parted from their ordinary company, molested, displeased, or provoked: grief, fear, agony, discontent, wearisomeness, laziness, suspicion, or some such passion forcibly seizeth on them. Yet by and by when they come in company againe, which they like, or be pleased, suam sententiam rursus damnant, & vitæ solatio delectantur, as Octavius Horatianus observes, lib. 2. cap. 5. they condemn their former mislike, and are well pleased to live.	They would willingly exchange lives with them, especially if they are alone, idle and separated from their usual companions, troubled, displeased or provoked: grief, fear, agony, discontent, weariness, sluggishness, suspicion or some such passion takes forceful hold of them. Yet soon afterwards, when they return to company they like or are pleased, "they condemn their judgement in turn, and delight in the comfort of life," as Octavius Horatianus observes, book 2, chapter 5: they condemn their former dissatisfaction and are quite content to live.[4417]
Source page 184–185 And so they continue, till with some fresh discontent they be molested again, and then they are weary of their lives, weary of all, they will die, and shew rather a necessity to live, then a desire. Claudius the Emperour as [4418]Sueton describes him, had a spice of this disease, for when he was tormented with the pain of his stomack, he had a conceit to make away himselfe.	And so they continue until some fresh discontent troubles them again, and then they are weary of their lives, weary of everything; they wish to die and show a necessity to live rather than a desire. The emperor Claudius, as Suetonius describes him, had a touch of this disease: when tormented by stomach pain, he thought of taking his own life.[4419]

[4417] Editor. "Passion" means an emotional state or disturbance. Burton follows the same people through changes of feeling; his account does not claim that a return of pleasure permanently ends the difficulty. The attribution to Octavius Horatianus remains in Burton's printed form pending collation.

[4418] Burton. Printed page 184, star: "Cap. 31. Quo stomachi dolore correptum se, etiam de consciscenda morte cogitasse dixit." Chapter 31. He said that, seized by this stomach pain, he had even thought of taking his own life.

[4419] Editor. "A spice" means a touch or trace. Suetonius, Claudius 31, reports the emperor's statement about stomach pain and thoughts of death. Burton's classification of it as this disease is his own interpretation of the biographical report.

Cæsar Claudinus, consil. 84. had a Polonian to his Patient, so affected, that through [4420]fear and sorrow, with which he was still disquieted, hated his own life, wished for death every moment, and to be freed of his misery. Mercurialis another, and another that was often minded to dispatch himselfe, and so continued for many years.	Julius Caesar Claudinus, consultation 84, had a Polish patient so affected that, through the fear and sorrow that continually disturbed him, he hated his own life and wished every moment for death and release from his misery. Mercurialis had another, and another who often thought of killing himself; this continued for many years.[4421]

[4424] Burton. Printed page 185, s: “Facile in iram incidunt. Aret.” They easily fall into anger. Aretaeus.

[4425] Burton. Printed page 185, t: “Ira sine causa, velocitas iræ. Savanarola. pract. major. velocitas iræ signum. Avicenna. l. 3. Fen. 1. Tract. 4. cap. 18.” Anger without a cause, quickness to anger. Savonarola, the larger Practice. Quickness to anger is a sign. Avicenna, book 3, fen 1, treatise 4, chapter 18.

[4427] Editor. Jealousy here includes suspicious watchfulness, not only sexual jealousy. Datum vel non datum and scandalum acceptum distinguish an occasion actually given from offence nevertheless taken. The three topical labels in the margin remain in Burton footnotes rather than becoming added body headings.

If they speak in jest, he takes it in good earnest. If they be not saluted, invited, consulted with, called to counsel, &c. or that any respect, small complement, or ceremonie be omitted, they think themselves neglected, and contemned; for a time that tortures them. If two talk together, discourse, whisper, jest, or tell a tale in generall, he thinks presently they mean him, applies all to himself, de se putat omnia dici.	If people speak in jest, he takes it in earnest. If they are not greeted, invited, consulted, called to give advice, and so on, or if any mark of respect, small courtesy or ceremony is omitted, they think themselves neglected and despised; for a time this tortures them. If two people talk together, converse, whisper, joke or tell a story in general terms, he immediately thinks they mean him and applies everything to himself: "he thinks it is all said about him."[4428]
Or if they talk with him, he is ready to misconstrue every word they speak, and interpret it to the worst; he cannot endure any man to look steadily on him, speak to him almost, laugh, jest, or be familiar, or hem, or point, cough, or spit, or make a noise sometimes, &c. [4429]He thinkes they laugh or point at him, or do it in disgrace of him, circumvent him, contemn him, every man looks at him, he is pale, red, sweats for fear and anger, lest some body should observe him.	Or if they talk to him, he is ready to misconstrue every word and give it the worst meaning. He cannot bear anyone to look steadily at him, scarcely even to speak to him, to laugh, joke, act familiarly, clear the throat, point, cough, spit or sometimes make any noise at all. He thinks they are laughing or pointing at him, doing it to shame him, plotting against him or despising him. Everyone is looking at him; he turns pale, turns red, sweats with fear and anger lest someone notice him.
He works upon it, and long after, this false conceipt of an abuse, troubles him. Montanus consil. 22. gives instance in a melancholy Jew, that was Iracundior Adria, so waspish and suspitious, tam facilè iratus, that no man could tell how to carry himself in his companie.	He broods over it, and long afterwards this mistaken idea of an insult troubles him. Montanus, consultation 22, gives the example of a melancholic Jew who was "angrier than the Adriatic," so waspish and suspicious, "so easily angered," that no one knew how to behave in his company.[4430]

[4428] Editor. Burton moves between plural sufferers and a singular illustrative "he"; the translation preserves that movement. "Complement" is a courtesy or formal observance, not praise. His example concerns the interpretation of omitted social gestures.

[4429] Burton. Printed page 185, u: "Suspicio, diffidentia, symptomata, Crato Ep. Julio Alexandrino cons. 185. Scoltzii." Suspicion and distrust are symptoms. Crato, letter to Julius Alexandrinus, consultation 185 in Scoltzii, as printed. The collected source and locator require collation.

[4430] Editor. "Waspish" means irritable and quick to sting in speech. Iracundior Adria echoes Horace, Odes 3.9.23, where the Adriatic is stormy. The patient's identity is retained as Burton gives it; the reported behaviour is an individual example, not evidence about a people.

They are inconstant in all their actions, giddy, restless, unable to decide on any business. They will and will not, swayed back and forth by every slight occasion or spoken word. Yet once they have made up their minds, they are obstinate and hard to reconcile. Yet in most things they waver, cannot decide or think matters through, because of fear. “They act, and soon regret their action” (Aretaeus), “miserly, and shortly afterwards extravagant.” Now extravagant and then covetous, they act and soon repent of what they have done, so that they are troubled either way: whether they act or do not, lack or possess, succeed or fail. Disturbed on every side, soon tired and always seeking change —restless, I say, fickle, forever fleeing—they cannot bear to stay long in one place.[4433]

no companie long, or to persever in any action or businesse.	Nor can they bear any company for long, or persevere in any action or business.

[4432] Editor. “Vertiginous” here suggests giddiness or changeability. The wording about an aversion once settled is compressed: the translation makes explicit that advice cannot dislodge it, even when the proposed alternative is much better.

[4433] Editor. Burton’s English changes the order of the Latin: avari … prodigi is “miserly … extravagant,” while his gloss has “prodigall … covetous.” Both sequences are preserved. “Want or have” means lack or possess, and “hit or miss” succeed or fail.

[4438] Editor. "Eftsoons" and "anon" mean soon or presently; "erected" means raised in spirits and "animated" encouraged. The simile compares restless thought to a body unable to settle comfortably in bed.

[4440] Editor. "Passionate" means governed by strong emotions. "Solicitous" is anxiously concerned, "profuse" extravagant, and "vulgar complement" ordinary social courtesy. "Imaginations" encompasses thoughts and ideas as well as images.

Source page 186 and as [4441]Albertus Durer paints melancholy, like a sad woman leaning on her arm with fixed looks, neglected habit, &c. held therefore by some proud, soft, sottish, or half mad, as the Abderites esteemed of Democritus: and yet of a deep reach, excellent apprehension, judicious, wise and wittie: for I am of that [4442]Noblemans minde, Melancholy advanceth mens conceits, more then any humor whatsoever, improves their meditations more then any strong drink or sack.	And, as Albrecht Dürer depicts Melancholy, like a sad woman leaning on her arm, with a fixed stare and neglected dress, and so on. Some therefore consider them proud, feeble, foolish or half mad, as the people of Abdera thought Democritus; yet they have deep understanding, excellent powers of perception, sound judgement, wisdom and intelligence. For I agree with that nobleman: melancholy advances people's thoughts more than any other humour, and improves their meditations more than any strong drink or sack.[4443]
They are of profound judgement in some things, although in others non rectè judicant inquieti, saith Fracastorius, lib. 2. de Intell. And as Arculanus, c. 16 in 9. Rhasis, termes it, Judicium plerumque perversum, corrupti, cum judicant honesta inhonesta, & amicitiam habent pro inimicitia: They count honesty dishonesty, friends as enemies, they will abuse their best friends, and dare not offend their enemies.	They judge some things profoundly, although in others, "being troubled, they do not judge rightly," says Fracastorius, book 2, On Understanding. And as Arculanus, chapter 16 on book 9 of Rhazes, puts it: "Judgement is generally perverse; they are corrupted when they judge honourable things dishonourable, and take friendship for hostility." They count honesty dishonesty, friends enemies; they will abuse their best friends and dare not offend their enemies.[4444]

[4442] Burton. Printed page 186, star: "Howard cap. 7. differ." Howard, chapter 7, "differ." The abbreviated work or division has not been established from this citation.

[4444] Editor. Burton allows profound judgement in some matters alongside disordered judgement in others. The Latin Judicium … corrupti is syntactically abrupt as printed; the translation follows its available sense without repairing the original. Fracastorius's abbreviated title is expanded only at the level given by Burton.

Overjoyed by every favourable report, story or fortunate event, they are carried beyond themselves; then, at every small loss, bad news, imagined injury, loss or danger, they are afflicted beyond measure, in great agony, perplexed, dejected, stunned, unable to bear it, utterly undone; fearful, suspicious of everyone. Yet again, many are desperate, reckless people, rash and careless, fit to be assassins, being free of all fear and sorrow; according to Hercules de Saxonia, extremely bold, daring to walk alone at night through wildernesses and dangerous places, fearing no one.[4447]

[4445] Editor. Ex musca elephantem is literally "an elephant out of a fly," a proverb for magnifying a trifle. "Overshoot themselves" means exceed proper bounds or make a blunder; "conceit" here means take an idea into the mind.

[4446] Burton. Printed page 186, star: "Tract. de mel. cap. 2. Noctu ambulant per sylvas, & loca periculosa, neminem timent." Treatise on Melancholy, chapter 2. They walk at night through woods and dangerous places, fearing no one.

[4447] Editor. "Hairbraines" are reckless or scatterbrained people; "Assassinates" means assassins. Burton juxtaposes contradictory traits and cites Hercules de Saxonia for an exception to fear and sorrow. The contrast belongs to his deliberately varied catalogue.

[4451] Burton. Printed page 186, z: "Io. Maior vitis patrum fol. 202. Paulus Abbas Eremita tanta solitudine perseverat, ut nec vestem, nec vultum mulieris ferre possit, &c." Joannes Major, Lives of the Fathers, folio 202. Paul, abbot and hermit, persists in such solitude that he cannot bear either a woman's clothing or her face, etc.

[4452] Editor. Excandescentia denotes flaring up, especially in anger; it has not been silently reduced to sexual ardour to match the adjoining English. Anterotes here denotes people opposed to love. "Anchorite" is a religious recluse; "palsy" is retained as the historical term. The Duke of Muscovy and Paul's reported physical reaction need collation in the cited sources.

[4453]Humorous they are beyond all measure, sometimes profusely laughing, extraordinary merry, and then again weeping without a cause, (which is familiar with many Gentlewomen) groaning, sighing, pensive, sad, almost distracted, multa absurda fingunt, & à ratione aliena (saith [4454]Frambesarius) they feign many absurdities, vain, void of reason: one supposeth himself to be a Dog, Cock, Bear, Horse, Glasse, Butter, &c. He is a Giant, a Dwarf, as strong as an hundred men, a Lord, Duke, Prince, &c.	They are changeable beyond all measure: sometimes laughing immoderately, extraordinarily merry, then weeping without a cause—which is common among many gentlewomen—groaning, sighing, pensive, sad, almost beside themselves. "They imagine many absurd things, foreign to reason," says Frambesarius: they invent many absurdities, vain and unreasonable. One supposes himself a dog, cock, bear, horse, glass, butter, and so on. He is a giant, a dwarf, as strong as a hundred men, a lord, duke, prince, and so on.[4455]
Source page 186–187 And if he be told he hath a stinking breath, a great nose, that he is sick, or inclined to such or such a disease, he beleeves it eftsoons, and peradventure by force of imagination, will work it out. Many of them are immoveable, and fixed in their conceipts, others vary upon every object, heard or seen. If they see a stage-play, they run upon that a week after; if they hear Musick, or see dancing, they have naught but bag-pipes in their brain; if they see a combat, they are all for armes.	And if he is told that his breath stinks, that he has a large nose, that he is sick or prone to this or that disease, he believes it at once, and perhaps by the force of imagination will bring it about. Many are immovable and fixed in their ideas; others change with every object they hear or see. If they see a stage play, they dwell on it for a week afterwards; if they hear music or see dancing, they have nothing but bagpipes in their brains; if they see a fight, they are all for arms.[4456]

[4454] Burton. Printed page 186, star: "Consult. lib. 1. 17. Cons." Consultations, book 1, consultation 17.

[4455] Editor. "Humorous" means variable in mood or disposition, associated with humours; it does not mean funny. "Gentlewomen" marks social status. The examples include imagined transformation, bodily fragility and greatness; they are retained in Burton's own heterogeneous grouping.

[4456] Editor. "Eftsoons" here means immediately. The suggestion that imagination can bring bodily effects about belongs to Burton's account of that faculty. "Run upon" means dwell on; the bagpipes are his comic image of a tune occupying the mind.

Source page 187 [4457]If abused, an abuse troubles them long after; if crossed, that cross, &c. Restlesse in their thoughts and actions, continually meditating, Velut ægri somnia, vanæ finguntur species; More like dreames, then men awake, they fain a company of Antick, phantasticall conceipts, they have most frivolous thoughts, impossible to be effected; and sometimes think verily they hear and see present before their eyes such phantasms or goblins, they fear, suspect, or conceive, they still talk with, and follow them.	If insulted, the insult troubles them long afterwards; if thwarted, the disappointment, and so on. Restless in thought and action, continually brooding, "like a sick person's dreams, unreal forms are fashioned." More like dreamers than waking people, they invent a host of grotesque, fantastic ideas; their thoughts are utterly frivolous, impossible to put into effect. Sometimes they firmly believe that they hear and see before their eyes the very phantoms or goblins they fear, suspect or imagine; they continually talk with them and follow them.[4458]
In fine, cogitationes somniantibus similes, id vigilant, quod alii somniant cogitabundi; Still, saith Avicenna, they wake, as others dreame, and such for the most part are their imaginations and conceipts, [4459]absurd, vain, foolish toies, yet they are most [4460]curious and sollicitous, continual, & supra modum, Rhasis cont. lib. 1. cap. 9. præmeditantur de aliqua re. As serious in a toy, as if it were a most necessary businesse, of great moment, importance, and still, still, still thinking of it: sæviunt in se, macerating themselves.	In short, "their thoughts are like those of dreamers; absorbed in thought, they experience awake what others dream." Always, says Avicenna, they are awake as others dream, and such for the most part are their imaginings and ideas: absurd, empty, foolish trifles. Yet they are exceedingly absorbed and anxious, continually and "beyond measure," Rhazes, Continens, book 1, chapter 9: "they ponder some matter beforehand." As serious over a trifle as though it were essential business of great weight and importance, and still, still, still thinking about it: "they rage against themselves," wearing themselves away.[4461]

[4457] Burton. Printed page 187, a: "Generally as they are pleased or displeased, so are their continuall cogitations pleasing, or displeasing." Their continual thoughts are generally pleasant or unpleasant according to whether they themselves are pleased or displeased.

[4458] Editor. The Latin echoes Horace, Ars Poetica 7–8, where incoherent forms resemble a sick person's dreams. Burton has finguntur where the comparison text has fingentur. The body prints dreames, retained on the left; "dreamers" on the right follows the contrast with waking people. "Antick" means grotesque or fantastic; "fain" means invent or imagine. The phantoms are presented as the sufferer's perceived experiences.

[4459] Burton. Printed page 187, b: "Omnes exercent vanæ intensæque animi cogitationes, (N. Piso. Bruel.) & assiduæ." Empty, intense and unceasing thoughts of the mind trouble them all. Nicolaus Piso; Bruel. The raised contraction is expanded.

[4460] Burton. Printed page 187, c: "Curiosi de rebus minimis. Areteus." Preoccupied with the smallest things. Aretaeus.

[4461] Editor. "Curious" here means closely preoccupied, and "macerating" wearing down or wasting. The repeated "still, still, still" enacts the persistence of the thought. Continens is the conventional expansion of the abbreviated work attributed to Rhazes; these precise medical passages remain to be collated.

Though they do talk with you, and seem to be otherwise employed, and to your thinking very intent and busie, still that toy runs in their minde, that fear, that suspicion, that abuse, that jealousie, that agony, that vexation, that crosse, that castle in the ayr, that crochet, that whimsie, that fiction, that pleasant waking dream whatsoever it is. Nec interrogant (saith [4462]Fracastorius) nec interrogatis rectè respondent,	Although they talk with you and seem otherwise occupied, and to your mind deeply intent and busy, still that trifle runs in their minds: that fear, that suspicion, that insult, that jealousy, that agony, that vexation, that disappointment, that castle in the air, that crotchet, that whim, that fiction, that pleasant waking dream, whatever it may be. "They neither ask questions," says Fracastorius, "nor answer questions properly."[4463]
They do not much heed what you say, their minde is on another matter; ask what you will, they do not attend, or much intend that business they are about, but forget themselves what they are saying, doing, or should otherwise say or do, whither they are going, distracted with their own melancholy thoughts. One laughs upon a sudden, another smiles to himself, a third frownes, calls, his lips go still, he acts with his hand, as he walks, &c.	They pay little attention to what you say; their minds are on something else. Ask what you will, they do not listen or give much attention to the business before them, but forget what they are saying, doing, or should be saying or doing, and where they are going, distracted by their own melancholic thoughts. One suddenly laughs, another smiles to himself, a third frowns, calls out, keeps moving his lips, gestures with his hand as he walks, and so on.

[4463] Editor. A "crochet," now normally "crotchet," is an eccentric or fixed notion. The chain of "that" phrases preserves Burton's movement between distressing thoughts and pleasurable fantasy: the persistence of attention is common to both.

'Tis proper to all melancholy men, saith Mercurialis, con. 11. What conceit they have once entertained, to be most [4464]intent, violent, and continually about it. Invitis occurrit, do what they may, they cannot be rid of it, against their wills they must think of it a thousand times over, Perpetuò molestantur, nec oblivisci possunt, they are continually troubled with it, in company, out of company; at meat, at exercise, at all times and places,	It is characteristic of all melancholic people, says Mercurialis, consultation 11, to be deeply, violently and continually occupied with whatever idea they have once entertained. "It presents itself against their will": do what they may, they cannot get rid of it; against their will they must think of it a thousand times over. "They are perpetually troubled and cannot forget." It troubles them continually, in company or alone, at meals, at exercise, at all times and in all places.[4465]
[4466]non desinunt ea, quæ minime volunt, cogitare, if it be offensive especially, they cannot forget it, they may not rest or sleep for it, but still tormenting themselves, Sysiphi saxum volvunt sibi ipsis, as [4467]Brunner observes, Perpetua calamitas & miserabile flagellum.	"They never stop thinking about the things they least wish to." Especially if it is distressing, they cannot forget it; they cannot rest or sleep because of it, but keep tormenting themselves. "They roll Sisyphus's stone for themselves," as Brunner observes: "a perpetual calamity and a miserable scourge."[4468]

[4465] Editor. "Proper" means characteristic, and "conceit" an idea entertained by the mind. The separate Latin quotations and Burton's English explanations are retained rather than merged, preserving the accumulating emphasis on involuntary recurrence.

[4466] Burton. Printed page 187, dagger: "Tullius de Sen." Cicero, On Old Age. The attribution is retained as printed; the precise passage has not been matched.

[4468] Editor. Sisyphus's repeatedly returning stone provides the image of endless labour and self-torment; compare Ovid, Metamorphoses 4.460. The marginal Tullius de Sen. points to Cicero's On Old Age, but this wording was not matched in the consulted text. The attribution and Brunner's medical reference remain open for collation.

Source page 187–188 [4469]Crato, [4470]Laurentius, & Fernelius, put [4471]bashfulness for an ordinary Symptome, subrusticus pudor, or vitiosus pudor, is a thing which much haunts & torments them. If they have been misused, derided, disgraced, chidden, &c. or by any perturbation of minde misaffected, it so far troubles them, that they become quite moped many times, and so disheartned, dejected, they dare not come abroad, into strange companies especially, or manage their ordinary affairs, so childish, timorous and bashfull, they can look no man in the face; some are more disquieted in this kinde, some less, longer some, others shorter, by fits, &c. though some on the other side (according to [4472]Fracastorius) be inverecundi & pertinaces, impudent and peevish.	Crato, Laurentius and Fernel list bashfulness as a common symptom. “Somewhat rustic shyness,” or “faulty shyness,” is something that greatly haunts and torments them. If they have been ill-treated, mocked, disgraced, scolded or the like, or upset by any disturbance of mind, it troubles them so deeply that they often become quite stupefied, so disheartened and dejected that they dare not go out, especially among unfamiliar people, or manage their ordinary affairs. So childish, fearful and bashful are they that they cannot look anyone in the face. Some are more disturbed in this way, some less; some for longer, others for shorter spells, and so on; though others, on the contrary, according to Fracastorius, are “shameless and obstinate”—impudent and ill-tempered.[4473]
Source page 188 But most part they are very shamefac’d, and that makes them with Pet. Blesensis, Christopher Urswick, & many such, to refuse honours, offices and preferments, which sometimes fall into their mouths, they cannot speak, or put forth themselves as others can, timor hos, pudor impedit illos, timorousness & bashfulness hinder their proceedings, they are contented with their present estate, unwilling to undertake any office, and therefore never likely to rise.	But for the most part they are very shy, and that makes them, like Peter of Blois, Christopher Urswick and many others, refuse honours, offices and promotions that sometimes fall into their laps. They cannot speak or put themselves forward as others can: “fear holds these back, shyness those.” Fearfulness and bashfulness hinder their progress; they are content with their present condition, unwilling to undertake any office, and therefore unlikely ever to rise.[4474]

[4473] Editor. “Moped” here means stupefied or sunk in dejection. The Latin labels characterize shyness as awkward or faulty in Burton’s authorities’ vocabulary; they are not modern diagnoses. Burton again allows the contrary disposition within the same broad account.

[4474] Editor. “Shamefac’d” means bashful or shy; “preferments” are promotions or appointments. Peter of Blois and Christopher Urswick are Burton’s named examples, but the particular refusals alluded to here have not been independently traced. “Fall into their mouths” suggests opportunities offered without effort.

For that cause they seldom visit their friends, except some familiars: pauciloqui, of few words, and oftentimes wholly silent. [4475]Frambesarius a Frenchman had two such patients, omnino taciturnos, their friends could not get them to speak: Rodericus à Fonseca consult. Tom. 2. 85. consil. gives instance in a young man, of 27 years of age, that was frequently silent, bashfull, moped, solitary, that would not eat his meat, or sleep, and yet again by fits, apt to be angry, &c.	For that reason they seldom visit their friends, except a few intimates: “speaking little,” of few words, and often wholly silent. Frambesarius, a Frenchman, had two such patients, “altogether silent,” whom their friends could not get to speak. Rodrigo da Fonseca, Consultations, volume 2, consultation 85, gives the example of a young man aged twenty-seven who was frequently silent, bashful, stupefied and solitary, would neither eat his food nor sleep, and yet at other times was prone to anger, and so on.[4476]
Most part they are, as Plater notes, desides, taciturni, ægrè impulsi, nec nisi coacti procedunt, &c. they will scarce be compelled to do that which concerns them, though it be for their good, so diffident, so dull, of small or no complement, unsociable, hard to be acquainted with, especially of strangers; they had rather write their minds, then speak, and above all things love [4477]Solitariness. Ob voluptatem, an ob timorem soli sunt? Are they so solitary for pleasure (one asks) or pain? for both: yet I rather think for fear and sorrow, &c.	For the most part they are, as Plater notes, “inactive, silent, hard to stir, and will not go forward unless compelled,” and so on. They can scarcely be forced to do what concerns them, even for their own good: so distrustful, so sluggish, showing little or no courtesy, unsociable, hard to get to know, especially for strangers. They would rather write their thoughts than speak, and above all things love solitude. “Are they alone for pleasure or from fear?” Are they so solitary for pleasure, someone asks, or pain? For both; yet I think it is rather from fear and sorrow, and so on.[4478]

[4478] Editor. “Diffident” can mean distrustful as well as lacking confidence. The Latin question asks about pleasure or fear; Burton’s following English asks about pleasure or pain. Both are retained, followed by his preference for fear and sorrow as the explanation.

[4479] Burton. Printed page 188, i: “Virg. Æn. 6.” Virgil, Aeneid, book 6.

[4480] Editor. The passage adapts Aeneid 6.733–34. Burton prints fugiuntque (“and flee”) where the comparison text has gaudentque (“and rejoice”), and Respiciunt clausi rather than dispiciunt clausae, with nec for neque. The translation follows the 1651 reading; the following English couplet is Burton’s distinct paraphrase.

[4481] Burton. Printed page 188, k: “Iliad. 3.” Iliad, book 3. The locator is retained as printed; the corresponding passage is in book 6.

They delight in flouds & waters, desert places, to walk alone in orchards, gardens, private walks, back-lanes, averse from company, as Diogenes in his tub, or Timon Misanthropus, [4483]they abhor all companions at last, even their neerest acquaintance, & most familiar friends, for they have a conceit (I say) every man observes them, will deride, laugh to scorn, or misuse them, confining of themselves therefore wholly to their private houses or chambers, fugiunt homines sine causa (saith Rhasis) & odio habent, cont. l. 1. c. 9. they will dye themselves, feed and live alone.	They delight in rivers and waters, deserted places, walking alone in orchards, gardens, secluded walks and back lanes, averse to company like Diogenes in his tub or Timon the Misanthrope. At last they abhor all companions, even their closest acquaintances and most intimate friends, for they imagine, I say, that everyone watches them and will mock, scorn or ill-treat them. They therefore confine themselves entirely to their own houses or rooms. “They flee people without a cause,” says Rhazes, “and hate them,” Continens, book 1, chapter 9: they will die by themselves, eat and live alone.[4484]
It was one of the chiefest reasons, why the Citizens of Abdera suspected Democritus to be melancholy and mad; because that as Hippocrates related in his Epistle to Philopœmenes; [4485]he forsook the City, lived in groves & hollow trees, upon a green bank by a brook side, or confluence of waters all day long, and all night. Quæ quidem (saith he) plurimum atra bile vexatis & melancholicis eveniunt, deserta frequentant, hominumque congressum aversantur.	It was one of the chief reasons why the citizens of Abdera suspected Democritus of melancholy and madness: because, as Hippocrates related in his letter to Philopoemen, he left the city and lived in groves and hollow trees, on a green bank beside a brook or meeting of waters, all day and all night. “These things,” he says, “happen especially to those afflicted with black bile and melancholy: they frequent deserted places and shun human company.”[4486]

[4483] Burton. Printed page 188, l: “Si malum exasperantur, homines odio habent & solitaria petunt.” If the illness grows worse, they hate people and seek solitary places. The printed exasperantur is grammatically anomalous after malum; the intended sense is translated without altering the transcription.

[4484] Editor. “Flouds” here means rivers or flowing waters. Diogenes and Timon serve as familiar figures of withdrawal from society. “They will dye themselves” is read contextually as dying by themselves, in the sequence “feed and live alone”; it is not silently made another statement of self-killing. The grammatical difficulty exasperantur in the marginal Latin is retained.

[4485] Burton. Printed page 188, m: “Democritus solet noctes & dies apud se degere, plerumque autem in speluncis, sub amœnis arborum umbris vel in tenebris, & mollibus herbis, vel ad aquarum crebra & quieta fluenta, &c.” Democritus habitually spends nights and days by himself, generally in caves, beneath the pleasant shade of trees or in darkness, and on soft grass, or beside plentiful, quietly flowing waters, etc.

[4486] Editor. The Democritus–Hippocrates correspondence is part of the literary tradition attributed to Hippocrates, rather than secure eyewitness testimony by the historical physician. Burton’s body and marginal descriptions differ—hollow trees in the body, caves and shade in the margin—and both are preserved. The precise Latin edition and passage require collation.

Source page 188–190 [4487]Which is an ordinary thing with melancholy men. The Ægyptians therefore in their Hieroglyph. expressed a melancholy man by an Hare sitting in her form, as being a most timorous and solitary creature, Pierius Hieroglyph. l. 12. But this, and all precedent symptomes, are more or less apparent, as the humour is intended or remitted, hardly perceived in some, or not at all, most manifest in others.	This is common among melancholic people. The Egyptians therefore, in their hieroglyphics, represented a melancholic person by a hare sitting in its form, as an exceedingly fearful and solitary creature: Pierius, Hieroglyphics, book 12. But this and all the preceding symptoms are more or less apparent as the humour is intensified or lessened: scarcely perceptible in some, or not at all, and most evident in others.[4488]
Source page 190 Childish in some, terrible in others; to be derided in one, pitied or admired in another; to him by fits, to a second continuate: and howsoever these symptomes be common and incident to all persons, yet they are the more remarkable, frequent, furious and violent in melancholy men.	Childish in some, terrible in others; to be laughed at in one, pitied or wondered at in another; occurring in spells in one, continually in a second. And although these symptoms are common and may affect everyone, they are more conspicuous, frequent, furious and violent in melancholic people.[4489]

[4489] Editor. “Admired” means wondered at; “continuate” continuous. The qualification extends symptoms beyond melancholic people while claiming a difference in frequency and intensity. It prepares for the difficulty of classifying them.

To speak in a word, there is nothing so vain, absurd, ridiculous, extravagant, impossible, incredible, so monstrous a Chimæra, so prodigious and strange, [4490]such as Painters and Poets durst not attempt, which they will not really fear, fain, suspect & imagine unto themselves: And that which [4491]Lod. Viv. said in jest of a silly country fellow, that killd his Ass for drinking up the Moon, ut lunam mundo redderet, you may truly say of them in earnest.	To put it in a word, there is nothing so vain, absurd, ridiculous, extravagant, impossible or incredible, no chimera so monstrous, so prodigious and strange that painters and poets would not dare attempt it, which they will not truly fear, invent, suspect and imagine for themselves. And what Ludovicus Vives said in jest of a foolish countryman who killed his donkey for drinking up the moon, "so that he might restore the moon to the world," you may truly say of them in earnest.[4492]
They will act, conceive all extreams, contrarieties, and contradictions, and that in infinite varieties. Melancholici planè incredibilia sibi persuadent, ut vix omnibus sæculis duo reperti sint, qui idem imaginati sint (Erastus de Lamiis) scarce two of 2000. that concur in the same symptomes.	They will act out and conceive every extreme, opposition and contradiction, in endless varieties. "Melancholic people persuade themselves of utterly incredible things, so that in all the ages scarcely two have been found who imagined the same thing" (Erastus, On Witches): scarcely two in two thousand agree in the same symptoms.[4493]

[4491] Burton. Printed page 190, star: "In cap. 18. l. 10. de civ. dei, Lunam ab Asino epotam videns." On chapter 18, book 10 of The City of God: seeing that the moon had been drunk up by a donkey. Burton cites Vives's commentary; the exact intermediary passage remains to be collated.

[4492] Editor. "Fain" means imagine or invent; a chimera is a fantastic composite creature or impossible invention. Vives's commentary on City of God 10.16, note m, in John Healey's 1610 English translation, page 384, tells of people who try and kill an ass after a cloud hides the moon while it drinks. Burton gives one country fellow and cites 10.18; both differences are retained. His exact Latin edition and the marginal monster verse remain uncollated.

[4493] Editor. The Latin says scarcely two people in all the ages; Burton's English changes this to scarcely two in two thousand. Both are retained. The Erastus quotation is transmitted under Burton's abbreviated title and has not been independently collated.

The Tower of Babel never yielded such confusion of tongues, as this Chaos of melancholy doth variety of symptomes. There is in all melancholy similitudo dissimilis, like mens faces, a disagreeing likeness still; And as in a river we swim in the same place, though not in the same numericall water; as the same instrument affords severall lessons, so the same disease yields diversity of symptomes. Which howsoever they be diverse, intricate, and hard to be confined, I will adventure yet in such a vast confusion and generality, to bring them into some order; and so descend to particulars.	The Tower of Babel never produced such confusion of tongues as this chaos of melancholy produces variety of symptoms. In all melancholy there is "a dissimilar likeness," as in people's faces: always a likeness with differences. And as we swim in the same place in a river, though not in the very same water, and as the same instrument provides different tunes, so the same disease yields different symptoms. However various, intricate and hard to contain they may be, I will still venture, amid such vast confusion and breadth, to bring them into some order, and so descend to particulars.[4494]

[4494] Editor. "Numericall" means numerically identical: the water is not the very same water. "Lessons" are musical pieces or tunes. The likeness-with-differences, river and instrument comparisons support Burton's transition from general symptoms to particular forms; they do not resolve the contradictions he has catalogued.

Some men have peculiar Symptomes, according to their temperament and Crasis, which they had from the Starres and those celestiall influences, variety of wits and dispositions, as Anthony Zara contends, Anat. ingen. sect. 1. memb. 11, 12, 13, 14. plurimum irritant influentiæ cælestes, unde cientur animi ægritudines & morbi corporum. [4495]One saith, diverse diseases of the body and minde proceed from their influences, [4496]as I have already proved out of Ptolomy, Pontanus, Lemnius, Cardan, and others, as they are principall significators of manners, diseases, mutually irradiated, or Lords of the geniture, &c.	Some people have particular symptoms according to their temperament and bodily constitution, which they received from the stars and their celestial influences: varieties of intellect and disposition, as Anthony Zara maintains in Anatomy of Wits, section 1, members 11, 12, 13 and 14. “Celestial influences greatly excite disturbances, from which arise disorders of the mind and diseases of the body.” One writer says that various diseases of body and mind proceed from their influences, as I have already demonstrated from Ptolemy, Pontanus, Lemnius, Cardan and others, inasmuch as they are the chief astrological indicators of character and disease, acting through their mutual aspects or as rulers of the nativity, and so on.[4497]

[4496] Burton. Printed page 190 [first occurrence], r: “Sect. 2. Memb. 1. Subs. 4.” Section 2, Member 1, Subsection 4. Burton’s earlier discussion of the stars as causes.

[4497] Editor. Crasis and temperament concern the mixture of the humours. “Wits” means intellectual capacities; “manners” means character or conduct. “Mutually irradiated” describes planetary aspects, and “Lords of the geniture” the planets ruling a birth chart. The argument is Burton’s historical account of astrology. Both this source page (PDF 293) and the next (PDF 294) are numbered 190; the continuous text is distinguished by scan position.

Ptolomeus in his centiloquie, Hermes, or whosoever else the author of that tract, attributes all these symptomes, which are in melancholy men, to celestial influences: which opinion Mercurialis de affect. lib. 1. cap. 10. rejects; but as I say, [4498]Iovianus Pontanus, and others stiffly defend. That some are solitary, dull, heavy, churlish; some again blith, buxome, light, and merry, they ascribe wholly to the Stars.	Ptolemy in his Centiloquy—Hermes, or whoever else wrote that tract—attributes all these symptoms in melancholic people to celestial influences. Mercurialis rejects that opinion in On Disorders, book 1, chapter 10; but, as I say, Jovianus Pontanus and others staunchly defend it. That some are solitary, dull, heavy and surly, while others are cheerful, lively, light-hearted and merry, they attribute entirely to the stars.[4499]
As if Saturn be predominant in his nativity, and cause melancholy in his temperature, then [4500]he shall be very austere, sullen, churlish, black of colour, profound in his cogitations, ful of cares, miseries, and discontents, sad and fearfull, alwaies silent, solitary, still delighting in husbandry, in Woods, Orchards, Gardens, Rivers, Ponds, Pooles, darke Walks and close: Cogitationes sunt velle ædificare, velle arbores plantare, agros colere, &c. To catch Birds, Fishes, &c. still contriving and musing of such matters.	Thus, if Saturn predominates in a person's nativity and causes melancholy in his constitution, he will be very austere, sullen, surly, dark in complexion, deep in thought, full of cares, miseries and discontents, sad and fearful, always silent and solitary; continually delighting in farming, woods, orchards, gardens, rivers, ponds, pools, and dark, secluded walks. "Their thoughts are of wanting to build, wanting to plant trees, to cultivate fields, and so on." To catch birds, fish and the like: always devising and pondering such matters.[4501]

[4498] Burton. Printed page 190 [first occurrence], s: "De reb. cælest. lib. 10. c. 13." On Celestial Things, book 10, chapter 13.

[4499] Editor. Burton himself leaves the Centiloquy's authorship uncertain: "Hermes, or whosoever else." That uncertainty is preserved. "Buxome" here means lively or yielding in disposition, not a bodily shape. Mercurialis's dissent is part of the argument, not a modern editorial correction.

[4500] Burton. Printed page 190 [first occurrence], t: "1. de Indagine Goclenius." Goclenius, book 1 of On Investigation; exact title and passage to be collated.

[4501] Editor. "Nativity" means the astrological configuration at birth; "temperature" means constitution or balance of qualities. "Husbandry" means farming. "Close" describes a secluded or enclosed walk. The repeated activities retain the connection Burton draws between planetary influence and habitual thoughts.

If the Sun rules, they will be lords, emperors—at least in their imagination—and monarchs, bestowing offices, honours and so forth. If Venus rules, they are always courting their mistresses and are especially susceptible to love, amorously inclined; they seem to hear music and plays, to see fine pictures, dancers, entertainments and the like. Always in love, they dote on everyone they see.[4505]

[4502] Burton. Printed page 190 [second occurrence], star: "Hor. de art. poet." Horace, The Art of Poetry.

[4503] Editor. "Monomachies" are single combats or duels; "fain" means imagine. Burton assigns grandiose thoughts and bellicose behaviour to planetary dominance. "Satyrical" here suggests biting or mocking speech.

[4504] Editor. Horace, Ars Poetica 95–98, has proicit ampullas et sesquipedalia verba: Telephus and Peleus in poverty throw off inflated language to move an audience. Burton instead prints jactant, "bandy about," reversing the action to suit his boastful examples. The left column and translation retain Burton's wording. Sesquipedalia literally means a foot and a half long.

[4505] Editor. "Myriades" literally denotes tens of thousands; here it contributes to the language of extravagant power and numbers. A tetrarch is a ruler, literally of a fourth part of a territory. "Conceipt" means imagination. The sequence changes planetary rulers without repeating the governing verb in the original.

Mercurialists are solitary, much in contemplation, subtile, Poets, Philosophers, and musing most part about such matters. If the Moon have a hand, they are all for peregrinations, sea-voyages, much affected with travels, to discourse, read, meditate of such things; wandring in their thoughts, divers, much delighting in waters, to fish, fowl, &c.	Those governed by Mercury are solitary, much given to contemplation, subtle, poets and philosophers, and spend most of their time pondering such matters. If the Moon has a hand, they are all for journeys and sea voyages, greatly taken with travel and with discussing, reading and thinking about such things; wandering in their thoughts, changeable, greatly delighting in water, fishing, fowling and the like.[4506]
But the most immediate symptomes proceed from the Temperature it self, and the Organicall parts, as Head, Liver, Spleen, Meseraick veines, Heart, Womb, Stomack, &c. and most especially from distemperature of Spirits (which as [4507]Hercules de Saxonia contends, are wholy immaterial) or from the four humors in those seats, whether they be hot or cold, natural, unnatural, innate or adventitious, intended or remitted, simple or mixt,	But the most immediate symptoms arise from the constitution itself and the organs—the head, liver, spleen, mesenteric veins, heart, womb, stomach and so on—and especially from a disordered balance of the spirits, which Hercules de Saxonia maintains are wholly immaterial; or from the four humours in those locations, whether hot or cold, natural or unnatural, innate or acquired, intensified or diminished, unmixed or mixed.[4508]

[4506] Editor. “Mercurialists” here are people governed by Mercury. “Peregrinations” are journeys; “divers” means various or changeable in this sequence, rather than underwater divers. “Fowling” is catching or hunting birds.

[4507] Burton. Printed page 190 [second occurrence], t: “Tract 7. de Melan.” Treatise 7, On Melancholy. The printed form of the locator is retained.

[4508] Editor. “Organicall parts” are bodily organs; the meseraic veins are the mesenteric veins. “Spirits” are the physiological agents of the period’s accounts of sensation and bodily activity. Burton expressly reports Saxonia’s claim that they are immaterial. “Intended” and “remitted” mean intensified and diminished; “adventitious” means acquired.

their diverse mixtures, and severall additions, combinations, which may be as diversly varied, as those [4509]four first qualities in [4510]Clavius, and produce as many severall Symptomes and monstrous fictions as wine doth effects, which as Andreas Bachius observes, lib. 3. de vino, cap. 20. are infinite. Of greater note be these.	Their various mixtures, additions and combinations may vary as widely as those four primary qualities in Clavius, and produce as many different symptoms and monstrous imaginings as wine produces effects—which, as Andreas Bachius observes in On Wine, book 3, chapter 20, are infinite. The more notable are these.[4511]
If it be natural Melancholy, as Lod. Mercatus lib. 1. cap. 17. de melan. T. Bright c. 16. hath largely described, either of the Spleen, or of the veins, faulty by excess of quantity, or thickness of substance, it is a cold and dry humor, as Montanus affirmes consil. 26. the parties are sad, timorous & fearful. Prosper Calenus in his book de atra bile, will have them to be more stupid then ordinary, cold, heavie, dull, solitary, sluggish, Si multam atram bilem & frigidam habent: Hercules de Saxonia c. 19. l. 7. [4512]holds these that are naturally melancholy, to be of a leaden colour or black, and so doth Guianerius c. 3. tract. 15. and such as think themselves dead many times, or that they see, talk with black men, dead men, spirits and goblins frequently, if it be in excess.	If it is natural melancholy, as Lodovicus Mercatus in On Melancholy, book 1, chapter 17, and Timothy Bright, chapter 16, have described at length, whether in the spleen or the veins, defective through excessive quantity or thickness of substance, it is a cold and dry humour, as Montanus affirms in consultation 26. Those affected are sad, timid and fearful. Prosper Calenus, in his book On Black Bile, considers them more stupefied than usual, cold, heavy, dull, solitary and sluggish, “if they have much black and cold bile.” Hercules de Saxonia, chapter 19, book 7, holds that those who are naturally melancholic have a leaden or dark complexion; so does Guianerius, chapter 3, treatise 15. When it is excessive, they often think themselves dead, or frequently imagine that they see and speak with black men, dead people, spirits and goblins.[4513]

[4510] Burton. Printed page 190 [second occurrence], x: “Com. in 1. c. Johannis de Sacrobosco.” Commentary on chapter 1 of Johannes de Sacrobosco.

[4511] Editor. The four primary qualities are spelled out in the margin: moist, hot, cold and dry. Clavius’s commentary and Bachius’s account of wine are cited as analogies for combinations and effects; their exact passages have not yet been independently collated.

[4512] Burton. Printed page 190 [second occurrence], y: “Si residet melancholia naturalis, tales plumbei coloris aut nigri, stupidi, solitarij.” If natural melancholy is lodged in them, such people are leaden-coloured or dark, stupefied and solitary.

[4513] Editor. “Natural melancholy” here is black bile as a bodily humour, capable of becoming harmful through quantity or consistency. “Stupid” can mean stupefied or insensible, not merely unintelligent. “Black men” is retained from Burton’s description of perceived figures among spirits and the dead; the passage does not specify an ethnicity. The case claims remain Burton’s transmitted reports.

These Symptomes vary according to the mixture of those four humors adust, which is unnatural melancholy. For as Trallianus hath written cap. 16. l. 7. [4514]There is not one cause of this melancholy, nor one humor which begets it, but divers diversly intermixt, from whence proceeds this variety of Symptomes: And those varying again as they are hot or cold, [4515]Cold melancholy (saith Benedic. Vittorius Faventinus pract. mag.) is a cause of dotage, and more mild Symptomes, if hot or more adust, of more violent passions, and furies.	These symptoms vary according to the mixture of the four scorched humours, which constitutes unnatural melancholy. For, as Trallianus writes in chapter 16, book 7, there is no single cause of this melancholy, nor one humour that produces it, but several, variously intermixed, from which this variety of symptoms arises. And these vary again according to whether they are hot or cold. Cold melancholy, says Benedictus Victorius Faventinus in his Great Practice, causes mental derangement and milder symptoms; if hot or more thoroughly scorched, it causes more violent passions and frenzies.[4516]

[4514] Burton. Printed page 190 [second occurrence], z: “Non una melancholiæ causa est, nec unus humor vitii parens, sed plures, & alius aliter mutatus, unde non omnes eadem sentiunt symptomata.” There is no single cause of melancholy, nor one humour that fathers the disorder, but several, each differently altered; hence not everyone experiences the same symptoms.

[4515] Burton. Printed page 190 [second occurrence], a: “Humor frigidus delirii causa, humor calidus furoris.” Cold humour causes delirium; hot humour causes frenzy.

[4516] Editor. Adust means scorched or burnt. Adustion is the supposed alteration of a humour by excessive heat. “Dotage” here is mental derangement and does not necessarily mean old age. Cold, heat and dryness belong to this humoral explanation, not to modern clinical measurements.

Source page 190 [second occurrence]–191 Fracastorius l. 2. de intellect. will have us to consider well of it, [4517]with what kinde of Melancholy every one is troubled, for it much availes to know it; one is inraged by fervent heat, another is possessed by sad and cold; one is fearful, shamefast; the other impudent and bold; As Ajax, Arma rapit superosque furens in prælia poscit: quite mad or tending to madnesse: Nunc hos, nunc impetit illos. Bellerophon on the other side, solis errat malè sanus in agris, wanders alone in the woods; one despairs, weeps and is weary of his life, another laughs, &c.	Fracastorius, in On the Intellect, book 2, would have us consider carefully what kind of melancholy troubles each person, for it is very useful to know: one is enraged by burning heat, another possessed by sadness and cold; one is fearful and bashful, the other shameless and bold. Like Ajax: “He snatches up his weapons and, raging, challenges the gods to battle”—quite mad, or tending towards madness: “Now he attacks these, now those.” Bellerophon, on the other hand, “wanders deranged in lonely fields”: he wanders alone in the woods. One despairs, weeps and is weary of life; another laughs, and so on.[4518]
Source page 191 All which varietie is produced from the severall degrees of heat and cold, which [4519]Hercules de Saxonia will have wholy to proceed from the distemperature of spirits alone, animal especially, and those immateriall, the next and immediate causes of Melancholy as they are hot, cold, dry, moist, and from their agitation proceeds that diversity of Symptomes, which he reckons up, in the [4520]13. chap. of his Tract of Melancholy, and that largely through every part.	All this variety is produced by the different degrees of heat and cold. Hercules de Saxonia holds that it proceeds entirely from the disordered balance of the spirits alone—especially the animal spirits, which are immaterial—the nearest and immediate causes of melancholy, according to whether they are hot, cold, dry or moist. Their agitation produces the diversity of symptoms that he enumerates in chapter 13 of his Treatise on Melancholy, discussing it at length in every part.[4521]

[4517] Burton. Printed page 190 [second occurrence], b: “Multum refert quâ quisque melancholia teneatur, hunc fervens & accensa agitat, illum tristis & frigens occupat: hi timidi, illi inverecundi, intrepidi, &c.” It matters greatly what kind of melancholy grips each person: burning, inflamed melancholy agitates one, while gloomy, chilling melancholy seizes another; these are timid, those shameless and fearless, etc.

[4518] Editor. The Latin fragments are freshly translated before Burton’s English continues. The Bellerophon phrase says lonely fields, while Burton’s gloss says woods; both are retained. The precise intermediaries for these Ajax and Bellerophon quotations remain unidentified. “Shamefast” means bashful.

[4519] Burton. Printed page 191, dagger: “Cap. 7. & 8. Tract. de Mel.” Chapters 7 and 8, Treatise on Melancholy.

[4520] Burton. Printed page 191, star [upper margin]: “Signa melancholiæ ex intemperie & agitatione Spirituum sine materiâ.” Signs of melancholy arising from the disordered balance and agitation of the spirits without matter.

[4521] Editor. “Animal spirits” are associated with the functions of the soul, especially sensation and movement; animal does not mean nonhuman here. “Next” means nearest in the chain of causes. Burton juxtaposes a theory of immaterial spirits with the following explanation through altered humours.

Others will have them come from the divers adustion of the four humours, which in this unnatural melancholy, by corruption of bloud, adust choler, or melancholy natural, [4522]by excessive distemper of heat turned, in comparison of the naturall, into a sharp lye by force of adustion, cause according to the diversity of their matter, diverse and strange Symptomes, which T. Bright reckons up in his following chapter. So doth [4523]Arculanus, according to the four principall humors adust, and many others.	Others hold that they arise from the differing degrees to which the four humours are scorched. In this unnatural melancholy, corrupted blood, scorched choler or natural melancholy—transformed by excessive heat and scorching into something like a caustic lye compared with its natural state—produce, according to the diversity of their substance, various strange symptoms. Timothy Bright enumerates these in his following chapter; so does Arculanus, according to the four principal scorched humours, as do many others.[4524]

[4523] Burton. Printed page 191, d: “Cap. 16. in 9. Rhasis.” Chapter 16, on book 9 of Rhazes.

[4524] Editor. “Lye” is an alkaline liquid, here imagined as caustic after the humour has been scorched. The syntax follows a list of altered humours; the modern wording makes the comparison with their natural condition explicit. Bright’s citation and the exact account attributed to Arculanus await full collation.

For example, if it proceed from fleagme, (which is seldome and not so frequent as the rest) [4525]it stirres up dull Symptomes, and a kinde of stupiditie, or impassionate hurt: they are sleepy, saith [4526]Savonarola, dull, slow, cold, blockish, ass-like, Asininam melancholiam, [4527]Melancthon calls it, they are much given to weeping, and delight in waters, ponds, pooles, rivers, fishing, fowling, &c. (Arnoldus breviar. 1. cap. 18.) They are [4528]pale of colour, slothfull, apt to sleep, heavie; [4529]much troubled with head-ach, continual meditation, and muttering to themselves;	For example, if it proceeds from phlegm—which is rare and less frequent than the other kinds—it produces sluggish symptoms and a kind of stupor, or impairment without strong emotion. They are sleepy, says Savonarola, dull, slow, cold, dull-witted and ass-like. “Asinine melancholy,” Melanchthon calls it. They are much given to weeping and delight in waters, ponds, pools, rivers, fishing, fowling and the like (Arnoldus, Breviary, book 1, chapter 18). They are pale, slothful, inclined to sleep and heavy; much troubled by headache, continual brooding and muttering to themselves.[4530]

[4527] Burton. Printed page 191, g: “De anima cap. de humor: si à Phlegmate semper in aquis fere sunt, & circa fluvios, plorant multum, &c.” On the Soul, chapter on the humours: if it comes from phlegm, they are almost always in water and around rivers; they weep much, etc.

[4529] Burton. Printed page 191, i: “Savonarola.” Savonarola.

they dream of waters, [4531]that they are in danger of drowning, and fear such things, Rhasis. They are fatter then others that are melancholy, of a muddy complexion, apter to spit, [4532]sleep, more troubled with rheume then the rest, and have their eyes still fixed on the ground. Such a patient had Hercules de Saxonia, a widow in Venice, that was fat and very sleepy still; Christophorus à Vega another affected in the same sort.	They dream of water and of being in danger of drowning, and fear such things, says Rhazes. They are fatter than other melancholic people, have muddy complexions, are more inclined to spit and sleep, are more troubled by rheum than the rest, and always keep their eyes fixed on the ground. Hercules de Saxonia had such a patient, a widow in Venice, who was fat and continually very sleepy; Christophorus à Vega had another affected in the same way.[4533]
If it be inveterate or violent, the Symptomes are more evident, they plainly dote and are ridiculous to others, in all their gestures, actions, speeches: imagining impossibilities, as he in Christophorus à Vega, that thought he was a tun of Wine, [4534]and that Siennois, that resolved with himself not to pisse, for fear he should drown all the town.	If it is long-established or violent, the symptoms are more apparent. They are plainly deranged and seem ridiculous to others in all their gestures, actions and speech, imagining impossibilities, like the man in Christophorus à Vega who thought he was a cask of wine, and that man of Siena who resolved not to piss for fear of drowning the whole town.[4535]

Alexander, chapter 16 in book 7. The printed segnitiæ is retained.

[4532] Burton. Printed page 191, l: “Semper fere dormit somnolenta c. 16. l. 7.” Sleepy, she sleeps almost always; chapter 16, book 7. The feminine somnolenta is retained, although the body at this point speaks generally.

[4533] Editor. “Rheum” denotes a bodily discharge, especially mucus or catarrhal fluid. The widow is an individual reported case. The marginal somnolenta is feminine, though placed before that case; no identity beyond Burton’s text is inferred.

[4534] Burton. Printed page 191, m: “Laurentius.” Laurentius.

[4535] Editor. “Inveterate” means long-established. A tun is a large wine cask. “Siennois” means a person from Siena. “Pisse” is modernized to piss, retaining the original’s directness. These reported beliefs are not assigned retrospective diagnoses.

If it proceed from bloud adust, or that there be a mixture of bloud in it, [4536]such are commonly ruddy of complexion, and high-coloured, according to Salust Salvianus, and Hercules de Saxonia. And as Savonarola, Vittorius Faventinus Emper. farther adde, [4537]the veins of their eyes be red, as well as their faces. They are much inclined to laughter, wittie and merry, conceited in discourse, pleasant, if they be not far gone, much given to musick, dancing, and to be in womens company.	If it proceeds from scorched blood, or if blood is mixed into it, such people commonly have ruddy complexions and high colour, according to Salust Salvianus and Hercules de Saxonia. And, as Savonarola and Victorius Faventinus in his Empirics add, the veins of their eyes are red, as well as their faces. They are much inclined to laughter, witty and merry, imaginative in conversation, agreeable if the condition is not far advanced, and much given to music, dancing and women's company.[4538]
Source page 191–192 They meditate wholly on such things, and think [4539]they see or hear playes, dancing, and such like sports (free from all fear and sorrow, as Hercules de Saxonia [4540]supposeth.) If they be more strongly possessed with this kinde of melancholy, Arnoldus addes, Breviar. lib. 1. cap. 18. Like him of Argos in the Poet, that sate laughing [4541]all day long, as if he had been at a Theatre.	They think entirely about such things and imagine that they see or hear plays, dancing and similar entertainments, free from all fear and sorrow, as Hercules de Saxonia supposes. If they are more strongly affected by this kind of melancholy, Arnoldus adds in his Breviary, book 1, chapter 18, they are like the man of Argos in the poet, who sat laughing all day long as though he had been at a theatre.[4542]

[4536] Burton. Printed page 191, n: "Ca. 6. de mel. Si à sanguine, venit rubedo oculorum & faciei, plurimus risus." Chapter 6 of On Melancholy. If it comes from blood, there is redness of the eyes and face, and very much laughter.

[4538] Editor. "Conceited" here means ingenious or imaginative in speech, not vain. "Sanguine" refers to blood in the humoral classification. The irregular Trallianus locator in the margin is transcribed as printed rather than silently corrected.

[4542] Editor. Horace, Epistles 2.2.128–40, describes a man at Argos who believed he heard actors while sitting in an empty theatre and later regretted losing that pleasure when cured. The body's conditional sentence is completed in modern English by "they are like"; the separate Arnoldus and Horace references remain.

Source page 192 Such another is mentioned by [4543]Aristotle, living at Abydos a towne of Asia minor, that would sit after the same fashion, as if he had been upon a stage, and sometimes act himself, now clap his hands, and laugh, as if he had been well pleased with the sight. Wolfius relates of a country fellow called Brunsellius, subject to this humour, [4544]That being by chance at a sermon, saw a woman fall off from a form half asleep, at which object most of the company laughed, but he for his part, was so much moved, that for three whole dayes after he did nothing but laugh, by which meanes he was much weakened, and worse a long time following.	Another such man is mentioned by Aristotle, living at Abydos, a town in Asia Minor. He would sit in the same way, as though he were on a stage, and sometimes act himself, then clap his hands and laugh as though greatly pleased by the spectacle. Wolfius tells of a countryman called Brunsellius, subject to this humour, who happened to be at a sermon and saw a half-asleep woman fall off a bench. Most of the congregation laughed at the sight, but he was so moved that for three whole days afterwards he did nothing but laugh, which greatly weakened him and left him worse for a long time afterwards.[4545]

[4545] Editor. The scan reads Abydos; the earlier transcription Abdyos has been corrected. On Marvellous Things Heard 31 (832b), transmitted among Aristotle’s works, describes a man watching imagined actors and showing approval; after recovering, he calls it his happiest time. Burton adds or transmits the detail of acting himself. The complete chapter was compared in the 1936 Loeb translation. A “form” is a bench. Wolfius’s Brunsellius story remains uncollated.

Such a one was old Sophocles, and Democritus himself had hilare delirium, much in this vain. Laurentius cap. 3. de melan. thinks this kinde of melancholy, which is a little adust with some mixture of bloud, to be that which Aristotle meant, when he said Melancholy men of all other are most witty, which causeth many times a divine ravishment, & a kinde of Enthusiasmus, which stirreth them up to be excellent Philosophers, Poets, Prophets, &c. Mercurialis, consil. 110. gives instance in a young man his patient, sanguine melancholy, [4546]of a great wit, and excellently learned.	Old Sophocles was such a man, and Democritus himself had "cheerful delirium," very much in this vein. Laurentius, chapter 3 of On Melancholy, thinks that this kind of melancholy, slightly scorched and with some admixture of blood, is what Aristotle meant when he said that melancholic people are the most intellectually gifted of all. It often causes a divine rapture and a kind of inspired possession, stirring them to become outstanding philosophers, poets, prophets and so forth. Mercurialis, consultation 110, gives the example of a young patient of his with sanguine melancholy, a man of great intellectual ability and exceptional learning.[4547]
If it arise from choler adust, they are bold and impudent, and of a more hairebraine disposition, apt to quarrell and think of such things, battles, combats, and their manhood, furious, impatient in discourse, stiff, irrefragable and prodigious in their tenents, and if they be moved, most violent, outragious, [4548]ready to disgrace, provoke any, to kill themselves and others; Arnoldus addes, stark mad by fits, [4549]they sleep little, their urine is subtile and fiery. (Guianerius) In their fits you shall hear them speak all manner of languages, Hebrew, Greek and Latine, that never were taught or knew them before.	If it arises from scorched choler, they are bold and shameless, more reckless in disposition, inclined to quarrel and think about such things—battles, combats and their own prowess—furious, impatient in conversation, stubborn, unyielding and extravagant in their opinions. If stirred up, they become extremely violent and outrageous, ready to shame or provoke anyone, to kill themselves and others. Arnoldus adds that they are stark mad in fits; they sleep little, and their urine is thin and fiery (Guianerius). During their fits you will hear them speak every sort of language—Hebrew, Greek and Latin—though they were never taught them and never knew them before.[4550]

[4546] Burton. Printed page 192, u: "Juvenis & non vulgaris eruditionis." A young man of uncommon learning.

[4547] Editor. "Witty" here means intellectually gifted. The claim recalls Problems 30.1 in the Aristotelian corpus, on exceptional ability and melancholy; Burton presents Laurentius's interpretation of it. Enthusiasmus means inspired or divine possession, stronger than present-day enthusiasm. The Sophocles claim and Mercurialis's individual case await collation.

[4548] Burton. Printed page 192, x: "Si à cholera, furibundi, interficiunt se & alios, putant se videre pugnas." If from choler, they are frenzied, kill themselves and others, and think they see battles.

[4549] Burton. Printed page 192, y: "Urina subtilis & ignea, parum dormiunt." The urine is thin and fiery; they sleep little.

[4550] Editor. "Manhood" means prowess or courage; "irrefragable" describes an unyielding disposition in argument. Burton reports unlearned languages among the alleged effects of this kind of melancholy. The reports are preserved without treating them as independently verified abilities.

Apponensis in com. in Pro. sec. 30. speaks of a mad woman that spake excellent good Latine; and Rhasis knew another, that could prophesie in her fit, and foretell things truly to come. [4551]Guianerius had a patient could make Latine verses when the moon was combust, otherwise illiterate. Avicenna and some of his adherents will have these symptomes, when they happen, to proceed from the devill, and that they are rather dæmoniaci, possessed, then mad or melancholie, or both together, as Jason Pratensis thinkes, Immiscent se mali genii, &c.	Apponensis, in his commentary on section 30 of the Problems, speaks of a mad woman who spoke excellent Latin; and Rhazes knew another who could prophesy during her fit and truly foretell future events. Guianerius had a patient who could compose Latin verses when the Moon was combust, though otherwise unlettered. Avicenna and some of his followers hold that, when these symptoms occur, they come from the devil, and that such people are "demon-possessed"—possessed rather than mad or melancholic, or both together, as Jason Pratensis thinks: "Evil spirits intrude," and so on.[4552]
but most ascribe it to the humour, which opinion Montaltus cap. 21 stiffly maintains, confuting Avicenna and the rest, referring it wholly to the quality and disposition of the humour and subject. Cardan de rerum var. lib. 8. cap. 10. holds these men of all others to be assassinates, bold, hardy, fierce, and adventurous, to undertake any thing by reason of their choler adust.	But most attribute it to the humour, an opinion Montaltus firmly maintains in chapter 21, refuting Avicenna and the rest and referring it entirely to the quality and disposition of the humour and the person affected. Cardan, in On the Variety of Things, book 8, chapter 10, holds that these people above all others are assassins: bold, hardy, fierce and adventurous, ready to undertake anything because of their scorched choler.[4553]

[4552] Editor. Apponensis is Pietro d'Abano; the abbreviation points to a commentary on the Problems. In astrology a planet is "combust" when sufficiently close to the Sun to have its influence obscured. Burton records competing bodily and demonic explanations of the reported phenomena. He does not merge the two into a single agreed account.

[4553] Editor. "Subject" means the person in whom the humour acts. "Assassinates" means assassins. Burton's author attributes violent behaviour to this particular humour; the passage is preserved as a historical claim, not generalized to people with mental illness today.

[4554]This humor, saith he, prepares them to endure death it self, and all manner of torments with invincible courage, and 'tis a wonder to see with what alacrity they will undergoe such tortures, ut supra naturam res videatur: he ascribes this generosity, fury, or rather stupidity, to this adustion of choler and melancholy: but I take these rather to be mad or desperate, then properly melancholy: for commonly this humor so adust and hot, degenerates into madnesse.	This humour, he says, prepares them to endure death itself and every kind of torment with unconquerable courage; it is astonishing to see how readily they undergo such tortures, "so that the thing seems beyond nature." He attributes this nobility of spirit, frenzy—or rather insensibility—to this scorching of choler and melancholy. But I consider these people mad or desperate rather than properly melancholic, for this humour, so scorched and hot, commonly degenerates into madness.[4555]
Source page 192–193 If it come from melancholy it self adust, those men, saith Avicenna, [4556]are usually sad and solitary, and that continually, and in excess, more then ordinary suspicious, more fearfull, and have long, sore, and most corrupt imaginations; cold and black, bashfull, and so solitary, that as [4557]Arnoldus writes, they will endure no company, they dream of graves still, and dead men, and think themselves bewitched or dead:	If it comes from melancholy itself scorched, these people, says Avicenna, are usually sad and solitary, continually and excessively so, unusually suspicious, more fearful, and troubled by prolonged, distressing and deeply disordered imaginings; cold and dark in complexion, bashful, and so solitary that, as Arnoldus writes, they will tolerate no company. They constantly dream of graves and dead people and think themselves bewitched or dead.[4558]

[4554] Burton. Printed page 192, a: "Ad hæc perpetranda furore rapti ducuntur, cruciatus quosvis tolerant, & mortem, & furore exacerbato audent & ad supplicia plus irritantur; mirum est quantam habeant in tormentis patientiam." They are driven to perpetrate these things, swept away by frenzy; they endure every torment and death, and, with their frenzy intensified, dare to act and are further provoked by punishments. It is astonishing how much endurance they show under torture.

[4555] Editor. "Generosity" means nobility or greatness of spirit, rather than giving freely. "Stupidity" here is insensibility. Burton's "but I take" marks his own intervention: he distinguishes madness or desperation from melancholy properly so called.

[4556] Burton. Printed page 192, b: "Tales plus cæteris timent, & continuè tristantur, valde suspiciosi, solitudinem diligunt, corruptissimas habent imaginationes, &c." Such people fear more than others and grieve continually; they are very suspicious, love solitude and have deeply disordered imaginings, etc.

[4557] Burton. Printed page 192, c: "Si à melancholia adusta, tristes, de sepulchris somniant, timent ne fascinentur, putant se mortuos, aspici nolunt." If from scorched melancholy, they are sad, dream of tombs, fear being bewitched, think themselves dead and do not wish to be looked at.

[4558] Editor. The last of the four scorched humours is black bile itself. Burton's language joins bodily appearance, emotion and imagined experiences within one classification. The margin's aspici nolunt adds that they do not wish to be looked at, a detail absent from the body.

Source page 193 if it be extream, they think they hear hideous noyses, see and talk [4559]with black men, and converse familiarly with devils, and such strange Chimera's and visions, (Gordonius) or that they are possessed by them, that some body talks to them, or within them. Tales melancholici plerumque dæmoniaci, Montaltus consil. 26. ex Avicenna. Valescus de Taranta, had such a woman in cure, that thought she had to do with the devil: and Gentilis Fulgosius quæst. 55. writes that he had a melancholy friend, that[4560] [4561]had a black man in the likenesse of a Souldier, still following him wheresoever he was.	If it is extreme, they think they hear hideous noises, see and speak with black men, and converse intimately with devils and such strange phantoms and visions (Gordonius); or that they are possessed by them, that someone speaks to them or within them. "Such melancholic people are generally demon-possessed," says Montaltus, consultation 26, citing Avicenna. Valescus de Taranta treated such a woman, who thought she had sexual dealings with the devil; and Gentilis Fulgosius, question 55, writes that he had a melancholic friend who saw a black man in the likeness of a soldier continually following him wherever he went.[4562]
Laurentius cap. 7. hath many stories of such as have thought themselves bewitched by their enemies; and some that would eat no meat as being dead. [4563]Anno 1550. an Advocate of Paris fell into such a melancholy fit, that he believed verily he was dead, he could not be perswaded otherwise, or to eat or drink, till a kinsman of his, a Scholar of Bourges did eate before him, dressed like a corse. The storie saith Serres, was acted in a Comedy before Charles the ninth.	Laurentius, chapter 7, has many stories of people who thought themselves bewitched by their enemies, and some who would eat no food because they believed themselves dead. In 1550, a Paris lawyer fell into such a melancholic fit that he firmly believed he was dead. He could not be persuaded otherwise, or to eat or drink, until a relative of his, a student at Bourges, ate before him dressed as a corpse. The story, says Serres, was performed in a comedy before Charles IX.[4564]

[4559] Burton. Printed page 193, d: "Videntur sibi videre monachos nigros & dæmones, & suspensos & mortuos." They seem to themselves to see black monks and demons, and people hanged and dead.

[4560] Burton. Printed page 193, e: "Quavis nocte se cum dæmone coire putavit." She thought that every night she had intercourse with a demon. This note appears to concern the preceding woman, although its printed body marker is displaced into the account of the friend.

[4561] Burton. Printed page 193, f: "Semper fere vidisse militem nigrum præsentem." That he had almost always seen a black soldier present.

[4562] Editor. The margin makes "had to do with" explicitly sexual. Its e reference mark follows that in the account of the male friend; the sexual content appears to refer back to the preceding woman. The black soldier is presented as the friend's perceived apparition. The margin also specifies black monks and hanged people where the body is less particular.

[4563] Burton. Printed page 193, g: "Anthony de Verdeur." Anthony de Verdeur. This name is retained as printed; its identification requires collation.

[4564] Editor. "Meat" means food in general; an advocate is a lawyer and a scholar here a student. Burton separates the reported incident in 1550 from the later theatrical performance before Charles IX; he gives no date for the performance. The printed name Anthony de Verdeur and the Serres account require identification and collation.

Some think they are beasts, wolves, hogs, and cry like dogs, foxes, bray like asses, and low like kine, as King Prætus daughters. [4565]Hildesheim spicel. 2. de maniâ, hath an example of a Dutch Baron so affected, and Trincavelius lib. 1. consil. 11. another of a noble man in his country, [4566]that thought he was certainly a beast, and would imitate most of their voices, with many such symptomes, which may properly be reduced to this kinde.	Some think they are beasts, wolves or pigs, and cry like dogs or foxes, bray like asses and low like cattle, as King Proetus's daughters did. Hildesheim, in the second collection, On Mania, gives an example of a German baron affected in this way; and Trincavelius, book 1, consultation 11, gives another of a nobleman in his own country who firmly believed himself a beast and would imitate most of their cries, along with many similar symptoms that may properly be assigned to this kind.[4567]

[4565] Burton. Printed page 193, h: "Quidam mugitus boum æmulantur, & pecora se putant, ut Præti filiæ." Some imitate the lowing of oxen and think themselves cattle, like the daughters of Proetus.

[4566] Burton. Printed page 193, i: "Baro quidam mugitus boum, & rugitus asinorum, & aliorum animalium voces effingit." A certain baron imitates the lowing of oxen, the braying of asses and the cries of other animals. The margin describes a baron beside the second example in the body; the attribution is not silently reassigned.

[4567] Editor. "Kine" means cattle. "Dutch" here is rendered German in the account attributed to Hildesheim; the baron's identity remains unresolved. "Reduced to" means classified under. The marginal baron is not silently transferred from one reported case to another. Burton's reference to Proetus's daughters belongs to the classical story of women believing themselves cows.

If it proceede from the severall combinations of the four humours, or spirits, Herc. de Saxon. addes hot, cold, dry, moist, dark, confused, setled, constringed, as it participates of matter, or is without matter, the symptomes are likewise mixt. One thinks himself a giant, another a dwarfe; one is heavie as lead, another is as light as a feather.	If it proceeds from the various combinations of the four humours or spirits—Hercules de Saxonia adds hot, cold, dry, moist, dark, confused, settled, constricted, according to whether it shares in matter or is without matter—the symptoms are likewise mixed. Marcellus Donatus l. 2. cap. 41. makes mention out of Seneca, of one Seneccio a rich man, [4569]that thought himself and every thing else he had, great: great wife, great horses, could not abide little things, but would have great pots to drink in, great hose, and great shooes bigger then his feet. Like her in [4570]Trallianus, that supposed she could shake all the world with her finger, and was afraid to clinch her hand together, lest she should crush the world like an apple in pieces:	Marcellus Donatus, book 2, chapter 41, mentions from Seneca a rich man named Seneccio who thought himself and everything he possessed great: a great wife, great horses. He could not bear little things, but wanted great drinking vessels, great hose and great shoes larger than his feet. Like the woman in Trallianus who supposed she could shake the whole world with her finger and feared to clench her fist lest she crush the world to pieces like an apple.[4571]

[4568] Editor. “Constringed” means constricted or drawn together. Burton resumes the contrast between material humours and spirits described as immaterial, now explaining mixed symptoms by mixed causes.

[4570] Burton. Printed page 193, l: “Lib. 1. cap. 16. putavit se uno digito posse totum mundum conterere.” Book 1, chapter 16. She thought she could crush the whole world with one finger.

[4571] Editor. “Hose” denotes leg garments. Seneca the Elder, Suasoriae 2.17, describes a man wanting large servants, silver vessels, shoes, figs and a tall concubine. The consulted Latin calls him Seneca Grandio; Burton’s Seneccio, wife and horses are retained. This locates a precursor; his stated intermediary, Donatus 2.41, remains uncollated. The following body and margin differ: shaking the world with a finger and crushing it with a fist, versus crushing it with one finger.

Skenkius and Marcellus Donatus l. 2. cap. 1. have many such examples, and one amongst the rest of a Baker in Ferrara, that thought he was composed of butter, & durst not sit in the Sun, or come neer the fire for fear of being melted: of another that thought he was a case of leather, stuffed with winde. [4577] Editor. “Winde” here means air; “moped” means stupefied or sunk in dejection; “continuate” means continuous. The variety of reported experiences is integral to Burton’s account, including his contrast between intermittent and continuing symptoms.

Source page 193–194 Some have a corrupt ear, they think they hear musick, or some hideous noise as their phantasie conceivs, corrupt eyes, some smelling: some one sense, some another. [4578]Lewis the eleventh had a conceit every thing did stink about him, all the odoriferous perfumes they could get, would not ease him, but still he smelled a filthie stink.	Some have disordered hearing: they think they hear music or some hideous noise, as their imagination conceives it; others have disordered sight, others smell—one sense in some people, another in others. Louis XI imagined that everything around him stank. All the fragrant perfumes they could obtain failed to relieve him; he still smelled a foul stench.[4579]
Source page 194 A melancholy French Poet in [4580]Laurentius, being sick of a fever, and troubled with waking, by his Physicians was appointed to use unguentum populeum to anoint his temples: but he so distasted the smell of it, that for many years after, all that came near him he imagined to sent of it, and would let no man talk with him but aloof off, or wear any new cloathes, because he thought still they smelled of it; in all other things wise and discreet, he would talk sensibly, save only in this.	A melancholic French poet in Laurentius, ill with a fever and troubled by sleeplessness, was directed by his physicians to anoint his temples with poplar ointment. But he so disliked its smell that for many years afterwards he imagined everyone who came near him smelled of it. He would let no one speak with him except from a distance, or wear any new clothes, because he kept thinking they smelled of it. Wise and judicious in all other matters, he would speak sensibly except on this one subject.[4581]

[4579] Editor. “Corrupt” here means disordered or impaired, and “phantasie” imagination. The name is Louis XI of France; the anecdote is transmitted under the marginal Anthony de Verdeur citation and has not been independently verified.

[4580] Burton. Printed page 194, q: “Cap. 7. de mel.” Chapter 7, On Melancholy.

[4581] Editor. “Waking” means inability to sleep. Unguentum populeum is poplar ointment, a compound preparation named for poplar buds; its historical use is reported here, not recommended. “Sent” means smell. The clause about new clothes is compressed: the translation follows Burton’s wording without adding whose clothes they were.

A Gentleman in Limosin, saith Anthony Verdeur, was perswaded he had but one legge, affrighted by a wilde boar, that by chance stroke him on the legge: he could not be satisfied his legge was sound (in all other things well) untill two Franciscans by chance coming that way, fully removed him from the conceipt. Sed abunde fabularum audivimus.	A gentleman in Limousin, says Anthony Verdeur, was convinced that he had only one leg after being frightened by a wild boar that happened to strike him on the leg. Though well in all other respects, he could not be persuaded that his leg was sound until two Franciscans happened to pass that way and completely freed him from the idea. “But we have heard more than enough stories.”[4582]

[4582] Editor. Limosin is Limousin. Franciscans are members of the religious order. The two different spellings Verdeur and de Verdeur are retained in the source record. Burton supplies no account of how the friars dispelled the belief. The final Latin sentence closes Subsection 3 and signals his impatience with the accumulating stories.

SUBSECT. 4. Symptomes from Education, custome, continuance of time, our condition, mixt with other diseases, by fits, inclination, &c.	Subsection 4 Symptoms arising from education, custom, duration, our circumstances, mingled with other diseases, occurring in fits, from inclination, and so on
Another great occasion of the varietie of these symptomes, proceeds from custom, discipline, education, and severall inclinations, [4583]This humour will imprint in melancholy men the objects most answerable to their condition of life, and ordinary actions, and dispose men according to their severall studies and callings.	Another major cause of the variety of these symptoms lies in custom, training, education and differing inclinations. This humour will impress upon melancholic people the objects most closely corresponding to their condition in life and ordinary activities, and shape their dispositions according to their various studies and occupations.[4584]
If an ambitious man become melancholy, he forthwith thinkes he is a King, an Emperour, a Monarch, and walkes alone, pleasing himself with a vain hope of some future preferment, or present as he supposeth, and withall acts a Lords part, takes upon him to be some statesman or magnifico, makes congies, gives entertainment, looks big, &c. Francisco Sansovino records of a melancholy man in Cremona, that would not be induced to beleeve, but that he was Pope, gave pardons, made Cardinals, &c. [4585]Christophorus à Vega makes mention of another of his acquaintance, that thought he was a King, driven from his Kingdome, and was very anxious to recover his estate.	If an ambitious man becomes melancholic, he immediately thinks he is a king, an emperor, a monarch, and walks alone, pleasing himself with an empty hope of future advancement—or advancement already achieved, as he supposes. At the same time he plays the lord, assumes the role of some statesman or grandee, makes bows, receives visitors and looks important. Francisco Sansovino records a melancholic man in Cremona who could not be persuaded that he was anything but the pope: he granted pardons, made cardinals, and so on. Christophorus à Vega mentions another man he knew who thought he was a king driven from his kingdom and was very anxious to recover his position.[4586]

[4584] Editor. “Discipline” includes training and upbringing; “callings” means occupations or vocations. Burton now adds learned habits and circumstances to the bodily and planetary explanations of the preceding subsection. “Humour” retains its historical physiological sense.

[4585] Burton. Printed page 194, s: “Lib. 3 cap. 14. qui se regem putavit regno expulsum.” Book 3, chapter 14: who thought himself a king expelled from his kingdom.

[4586] Editor. “Preferment” is advancement in rank or office; a magnifico is a grandee; “congies” are formal bows or courtesies. “Gives entertainment” here means receiving people. The Cremona and royal-exile stories remain reports transmitted by Burton, not independently verified cases.

A covetous person is still conversant about purchasing of lands and tenements, plotting in his mind how to compasse such and such Manors, as if he were already Lord of, and able to go through with it; all he sees is his, re or spe, he hath devoured it in hope, or else in conceit esteems it his own; like him in [4587]Athenæus, that thought all the ships in the haven to be his own.	A covetous person is always occupied with buying lands and properties, scheming in his mind how to acquire this or that manor, as if he were already its lord and able to carry the purchase through. Everything he sees is his, "in reality or in hope": he has swallowed it up in anticipation, or in imagination counts it his own, like the man in Athenaeus who thought all the ships in the harbour belonged to him.[4588]
A lascivious innamorato plots all the day long to please his mistresse, acts and struts, and carries himself, as if she were in presence, still dreaming of her, as Pamphilus of his Glycerium, or as some do in their morning sleep. [4589]Marcellus Donatus knew such a Gentlewoman in Mantua, called Elionora Meliorina, that constantly beleeved she was married to a King, and [4590]would kneel down and talk with him, as if he had been there present with his associates; and if she had found by chance a piece of glass in a muck-hill or in the street, she would say that it was a jewell sent from her Lord and husband.	A lustful lover spends the whole day planning how to please his mistress, posing and strutting and conducting himself as though she were present, continually dreaming of her, as Pamphilus dreams of his Glycerium, or as some people do in their morning sleep. Marcellus Donatus knew such a gentlewoman in Mantua, called Elionora Meliorina, who firmly believed that she was married to a king. She would kneel and talk with him as though he were there with his companions; and if she happened to find a piece of glass on a dung heap or in the street, she would say that it was a jewel sent by her lord and husband.[4591]

[4587] Burton. Printed page 194, t: "Dipnosophist. lib. Thrasylaus putavit omnes naves in Piræum portum appellantes suas esse." Deipnosophists, book [not specified]. Thrasylaus thought all ships putting into the harbour of Piraeus were his.

[4588] Editor. "Conversant about" means occupied with; "tenements" means held property. Re or spe contrasts actual possession with expectation. Athenaeus, Deipnosophists 12, 554e–f, quoting Heracleides of Pontus On Pleasure, tells of Thrasylaus imagining the ships at Piraeus his own and regretting his cure. This supplies the missing book number, but does not identify Burton's edition. The printed name Thrasylaus is retained.

[4589] Burton. Printed page 194, u: "De hist. Med. mirab. lib. 2. cap. 1." On Marvellous Medical Histories, book 2, chapter 1.

[4591] Editor. Innamorato is Italian for a lover. Pamphilus and Glycerium are the lovers in Terence's Andria; this identifies the allusion without claiming a particular dream passage. "Constantly" here means firmly. The Latin marginal account and Burton's fuller English narrative are retained separately.

Source page 194–195 If devout and religious, he is all for fasting, prayer, ceremonies, almes, interpretations, visions, prophecies, revelations, [4592]he is inspired by the holy Ghost, full of the spirit: one while he is saved, another while damned, or still troubled in minde for his sinnes, the divell will surely have him, &c. more of these in the third Partition of love-Melancholy.	If devout and religious, he is wholly taken up with fasting, prayer, ceremonies, alms, interpretations, visions, prophecies and revelations. He is inspired by the Holy Ghost, full of the spirit: at one moment he is saved, at another damned, or continually troubled in mind over his sins—the devil will certainly have him, and so on. More about these matters in the Third Partition, on love melancholy.[4593]
Source page 195 [4594]A Scholars minde is busied about his studies, he applaudes himself for that he hath done, or hopes to do, one while fearing to be out in his next exercise, another while contemning all censures, envies one, emulates another; or else with indefatigable paines and meditation, consumes himself. So of the rest, all which vary according to the more remiss, and violent impression of the object, or as the humor it self is intended or remitted.	A scholar's mind is occupied with his studies. He applauds himself for what he has done or hopes to do, at one moment fearing that he will fail in his next academic exercise, at another scorning all criticism; he envies one person and rivals another, or else wears himself out with unremitting labour and study. So it is with the rest: all vary according to the weaker or stronger impression made by the object of thought, or as the humour itself is intensified or diminished.[4595]

[4592] Burton. Printed page 194, y: "Gordonius, quod sit propheta, & inflatus à spiritu sancto." Gordonius: that he is a prophet, and filled with the Holy Spirit.

[4593] Editor. The assertions of inspiration, salvation and damnation are presented within Burton's account of the person's changing thoughts. "Interpretations" is left broad, since the passage does not specify their objects. Burton points forward to the religious material in his Third Partition.

[4594] Burton. Printed page 195, z: "Qui forensibus causis insudat, nil nisi arresta cogitat, & supplices libellos, alius non nisi versus facit. P. Forestus." He who labours over legal cases thinks of nothing but judicial decisions and petitions; another does nothing but compose verses. P. Forestus.

[4595] Editor. An "exercise" is an academic performance or assignment; "to be out" means to falter or go wrong. "Censures" means judgments or criticisms. "Intended" and "remitted" mean intensified and diminished. Forestus's marginal examples add legal work and verse-writing to the scholar in the body.

For some are so gently melancholy, that in all their carriage, and to the outward apprehension of others, it can hardly be discerned, yet to them an intolerable burden, and not to be endured. [4596]Quædam occulta, quædam manifesta, some signes are manifest and obvious to all at all times, some to few, or seldome, or hardly perceived; let them keep their own counsell, none will take notice or suspect them.	For some are so mildly melancholic that it can scarcely be detected in their behaviour or by anyone observing them, yet to them it is an intolerable burden, impossible to endure. “Some things are hidden, some evident”: some signs are plain and obvious to everyone at all times, some to only a few, or seldom, or barely perceived. If they keep their own counsel, no one will notice or suspect them.[4597]
They doe not expresse in outward shew their depraved imaginations, as [4598]Hercules de Saxonia observes, but conceal them wholly to themselves, and are very wise men, as I have often seen: some fear, some doe not fear at all, as such as think themselves kings or dead, some have more signs, some fewer, some great, some less, some vex, fret, still fear, grieve, lament, suspect, laugh, sing, weep, chafe, &c. by fits (as I have said) or more during and permanent. Some dote in one thing, are most childish, and ridiculous, and to be wondred at in that, and yet for all other matters, most discreet and wise.	They do not outwardly display their disordered imaginings, as Hercules de Saxonia observes, but keep them entirely to themselves, and are very wise people, as I have often seen. Some are afraid; some feel no fear at all, such as those who think themselves kings or dead. Some have more signs, some fewer; some severe, some less so. Some are troubled, fret, constantly fear, grieve, lament, suspect, laugh, sing, weep or rage, in fits —as I have said—or for longer, continuing periods. Some are deluded about one thing, are utterly childish and ridiculous in that respect and provoke astonishment, yet in everything else are very judicious and wise.[4599]

[4598] Burton. Printed page 195, star: “Verbo non exprimunt, nec opere, sed alta mente recondunt, & sunt viri prudentissimi, quos ego sæpe novi; cum multi sint sine timore, ut qui se reges & mortuos putant, plura signa quidam habent, pauciora, majora, minora.” They express it neither in word nor deed, but hide it deep in their minds, and are very wise men, whom I have often known; many are without fear, such as those who think themselves kings or dead; some have more signs, fewer, greater, smaller.

[4599] Editor. “Depraved” here means disordered; “dote” means to be mentally deranged or deluded, not necessarily through old age. “During” means lasting. Burton stresses that a particular mistaken belief may coexist with judgment and wisdom in other matters.

To some it is in disposition, to another in habit; and as they write of heat and cold, we may say of this humour, one is melancholicus ad octo, a second two degrees less, a third half way. 'Tis super-particular, sesquialtera, sesquitertia, and superbipartiens tertias, quintas Melancholiæ, &c. all those Geometricall proportions are too little to expresse it.	In some it is a disposition, in another an established habit; and, as writers describe degrees of heat and cold, we may say of this humour that one person is "melancholic to the eighth degree," a second two degrees less, a third halfway. There are superparticular proportions of melancholy, one and a half and one and a third, and proportions exceeding unity by two thirds or two fifths, and so on. All those geometrical proportions are insufficient to express it.[4600]

[4600] Editor. The comparison borrows graduated degrees of qualities and the language of ratios. A superparticular ratio exceeds one by a single aliquot part: sesquialtera is 3:2, sesquitertia 4:3. Superbipartiens tertias and quintas give 5:3 and 7:5. Burton's point is that even such fine divisions cannot capture the variety; "ad octo" is a historical degree, not a modern clinical scale. "Habit" means an established condition, contrasted with a less settled disposition.

[4601]It comes to many by fits, and goes; to others it is continuate: many (saith [4602]Faventinus) in Spring and fall only are molested, some once a year, as that Roman [4603]Galen speaks of: one, at the conjunction of the Moon alone, or some unfortunate aspects, at such and such set hours and times, like the sea-tides, to some women when they be with child, as [4604]Plater notes, never otherwise: to others 'tis settled and fixed: to one led about and variable still by that [4605]ignis fatuus of phantasie, like an arthritis or running gout, 'tis here and there, and in everie joynt, alwaies molesting some part or other; or if the body be free, in a myriad of forms exercising the minde.	For many it comes and goes in fits; for others it is continuous. Many, says Faventinus, are troubled only in spring and autumn, some once a year, like the Roman Galen mentions; one only at the conjunction of the Moon, or at certain unfavourable planetary aspects, at particular fixed hours and times, like the tides of the sea. Some women experience it only when pregnant, as Plater notes, and never otherwise. In others it is settled and fixed; in one person it is continually led astray and shifted about by that will-o'-the-wisp, imagination. Like arthritis or wandering gout, it is here and there and in every joint, always troubling one part or another; or, if the body is free, tormenting the mind in a myriad forms.[4606]

[4601] Burton. Printed page 195, b: "Trallianus, lib. 1. 16. alii intervalla quædam habent, ut etiam consueta administrent, alii in continuo delirio sunt, &c." Trallianus, book 1, 16: some have intervals in which they can even attend to their customary affairs; others are in continual delirium, etc.

[4602] Burton. Printed page 195, c: "Prac. mag. Vere tantum & autumno." Great Practice: only in spring and autumn.

[4606] Editor. A lunar conjunction and planetary "aspects" belong to the astrological account. Ignis fatuus means will-o'-the-wisp, a misleading light; Burton uses it for imagination's shifting course. "Running gout" is pain thought to migrate through the body. Plater's starred reference is printed below Guianerius's e in the margin, although its body anchor comes earlier.

A second once peradventure in his life, hath a most grievous fit, once in seven years, once in five years, even to the extremitie of madness, death, or dotage, and that upon some ferall accident or perturbation, terrible object, and that for a time, never perhaps so before, never after. A third is moved upon all such troublesome objects, crosse fortune, disaster and violent passions, otherwise free, once troubled in three or four years.	A second person has a most grievous fit perhaps once in his life, once in seven years or once in five, reaching the extremity of madness, death or mental derangement, brought on by some dreadful event or disturbance or terrifying sight. It lasts for a time, perhaps never experienced before and never afterwards. A third is affected by all such distressing things, adverse fortune, disaster and violent passions, but is otherwise free, troubled once in three or four years.[4607]
A fourth, if things be to his minde, or he in action, well pleased, in good company, is most jocund, and of a good complexion: if idle, or alone, à la mort, or carried away wholly with pleasant dreams and phantasies, but if once crossed and displeased,	A fourth, if things are to his liking, or he is active, contented and in good company, is very cheerful and in good bodily condition. If idle or alone, he is utterly dejected or wholly carried away by pleasant dreams and fantasies; but once thwarted and displeased,
Pectore concipiet nil nisi triste suo.	"He will conceive nothing but sorrow in his heart."[4608]
Source page 195–196 his countenance is altered on a sudden, his hart heavie, irksome thoughts crucifie his soul, and in an instant he is moped or wearie of his life, he will kill himself. A fifth complains in his youth, a sixth in his middle age, the last in his old age.	His expression changes suddenly, his heart grows heavy, distressing thoughts torment his soul, and in an instant he is sunk in dejection or weary of life; he will kill himself. A fifth suffers in youth, a sixth in middle age, the last in old age.

[4607] Editor. "Ferall" here means dreadful or deadly, not wild in the modern animal sense. "Dotage" again means mental derangement. Burton describes different timing and triggers rather than one universal course.

[4608] Editor. À la mort conveys extreme dejection. The verse adapts Ovid, Ex Ponto 2.7.16: pectore concipio nil nisi triste meo, "I conceive nothing but sorrow in my heart." Burton changes concipio and meo to concipiet and suo: "he will conceive" and "his." The modern column follows Burton. "Complexion" here concerns bodily constitution or condition, rather than simply facial colour.

Source page 196 Generally thus much we may conclude of melancholy: That it is [4609]most pleasant at first, I say, mentis gratissimus error, a most delightsome humor, to be alone, dwell alone, walk alone, meditate, lye in bed whole daies, dreaming awake as it were, and frame a thousand phantastical imaginations unto themselves. They are never better pleased then when they are so doing, they are in Paradise for the time, and cannot well endure to be interrupt; with him in the Poet,	In general we may conclude this much about melancholy: that it is most pleasant at first, I say, "the mind's most welcome delusion," a most delightful disposition—to be alone, live alone, walk alone, meditate, lie in bed for whole days, dreaming awake, as it were, and fashion a thousand fantastic imaginings for themselves. They are never happier than when doing this; for the time they are in paradise and can scarcely bear to be interrupted, like the man in the poet,[4610]
—— [4611]pol me occidistis amici, Non servastis ait! ——	"By heaven, my friends, you have killed me, not saved me," he says.

you have undone him, he complains, if you trouble him: tell him what inconvenience will follow, what will be the event, all is one, canis ad vomitum, [4612]'tis so pleasant, he cannot refrain. Tell him what harm will follow, what the outcome will be: it makes no difference. "The dog returns to its vomit"; it is so pleasant that he cannot refrain. He may perhaps continue like this for many years because he has a strong constitution, or because some business intervenes to divert his thoughts. But at last, "the imagination is injured": his fancy is impaired and, now accustomed to such trifles, cannot stop working on, like fate. The scene changes suddenly: Fear and Sorrow displace those pleasing thoughts, and suspicion, discontent and perpetual anxiety take their places.[4613]
so by little and little, by that shooing horn of idleness, and voluntary solitariness, Melancholy this ferall fiend is drawn on, [4614]& quantum vertice ad auras Æthereas, tantum radice in Tartara tendit, it was not so delicious at first, as now it is bitter and harsh: a cankerd soul macerated with cares and discontents, tædium vitæ, impatience, agony, inconstancy, irresolution, precipitate them unto unspeakable miseries.	Thus, little by little, with idleness and voluntary solitude as the shoehorn, Melancholy, that deadly fiend, is drawn on: "As far as its crown reaches into the heavenly air, so far its root stretches into Tartarus." It was not so delicious at first as it is bitter and harsh now. A cankered soul wasted by cares and discontents, weariness of life, impatience, agony, inconstancy and indecision plunge them into unspeakable miseries.[4615]

[4613] Editor. Canis ad vomitum alludes to the dog returning to its vomit, as in Proverbs 26:11 and 2 Peter 2:22. The marginal Facilis descensus averni adapts Virgil, Aeneid 6.126, on the easy descent to the underworld; the comparison text has Averno. "Temperature" is constitution; "crased" means impaired, and "toyes" fanciful trifles. The printed "like a fate" is retained in translation rather than conjecturally replaced.

[4615] Editor. The shoehorn draws on the fiend as it would a shoe. The Latin comes from Virgil, Georgics 2.291–92: the tree extends down into Tartarus as far as its crown rises into the air. Burton transfers the image to the depth of suffering that succeeds pleasure. Tædium vitæ means weariness of life. "Macerated" means wasted or worn away.

They cannot endure company, light, or life it self, some of them; unfit for action, and the like. [4616]Their bodies are lean and dryed up, withered, ugly, their looks harsh, very dull, and their souls tormented, as they are more or less intangled, as the humour hath been intended, or according to the continuance of time they have been troubled.	Some of them cannot endure company, light or life itself; they are unfit for action, and so on. Their bodies are lean and dried up, withered and ugly, their looks harsh and very dull, and their souls tormented, according to how deeply they are entangled, how much the humour has intensified, or how long they have been troubled.[4617]
To discern all which symptomes the better, [4618]Rhasis the Arabian makes three degrees of them. The first is, falsa cogitatio, false conceits and idle thoughts: to misconstrue and amplifie, aggravating every thing they conceive or fear: the second is, falsò cogitata loqui, to talk to themselves, or to use inarticulate, incondite voices, speeches, obsolete gestures, and plainly to utter their minds and conceits of their hearts by their words and actions, as to laugh, weep, to be silent, not to sleep, eat their meat, &c. the third is to put in practice that which they think or speak.	To distinguish all these symptoms more clearly, Rhasis the Arabian divides them into three degrees. The first is “false thinking”: false notions and idle thoughts, misconstruing and magnifying, making everything they imagine or fear worse. The second is “speaking what has been falsely conceived”: talking to themselves, making inarticulate, disordered sounds and speeches and strange gestures, and openly expressing their minds and inward notions through words and actions—laughing, weeping, being silent, not sleeping or eating their food, and so on. The third is putting into practice what they think or say.[4619]

[4616] Burton. Printed page 196, i: “Corpus cadaverosum. Psa. 67. cariosa est facies mea præ ægritudine animæ.” A corpse-like body. Psalm 67: my face is wasted by the sickness of my soul. The printed psalm locator is retained; the exact source of the wording remains unverified.

[4617] Editor. Burton’s harsh description of bodily appearance is preserved as part of his historical account. The margin adds the corpse-like comparison and a supposed psalm quotation. Its printed “Psa. 67” has not been silently corrected or treated as a verified scriptural locator.

[4618] Burton. Printed page 196, k: “Lib. 9. ad Almansorem.” Book 9, To Almansor.

[4619] Editor. Rhasis is the Latinized name used here for the Arabic medical author al-Razi. “Incondite” means unarranged or disordered; “obsolete” gestures here suggests strange or unusual gestures. “Meat” means food. The translation takes “not” to govern both sleeping and eating in the compressed list. These are Burton’s transmitted historical categories.

[4620]Savonarola Rub. 11. tract. 8. cap. 1. de ægritudine, confirms as much [4621]when he begins to express that in words, which he conceives in his heart, or talks idly, or goes from one thing to another, which [4622]Gordonius cals nec caput habentia, nec caudam, he is in the middle way: [4623]but when he begins to act it likewise, and to put his fopperies in execution, he is then in the extent of melancholy or madness it self.	Savonarola, rubric 11, treatise 8, chapter 1, on illness, confirms as much: when he begins to express in words what he conceives in his heart, talks idly, or jumps from one thing to another—what Gordonius calls things "having neither head nor tail"—he is at the middle stage. But when he also begins to act upon it and put his follies into effect, he has reached the furthest extent of melancholy, or madness itself.[4624]

[4621] Burton. Printed page 196, m: "Quum ore loquitur quæ corde concepit, quum subito de una re ad aliud transit, neque rationem de aliquo reddit, tunc est in medio, at quum incipit operari quæ loquitur, in summo gradu est." When he speaks aloud what he has conceived in his heart, when he suddenly passes from one thing to another and gives no reason for anything, then he is at the middle stage; but when he begins to do what he speaks of, he is at the highest degree.

[4622] Burton. Printed page 196, n: "Cap. 19. Partic. 2. Loquitur secum & ad alios, ac si vere præsentes. Aug. cap. 11. li. de cura pro mortuis gerenda. Rhasis." Chapter 19, part 2. He talks to himself and to others as though they were really present. Augustine, chapter 11, book On the Care to Be Taken for the Dead. Rhasis. The adjacent references are retained together as printed.

[4623] Burton. Printed page 196, o: "Quum res ad hoc devenit, ut ea quæ cogitare cœperit, ore promat, atque acta permisceat, tum perfecta melancholia est." When it has reached the point that he utters what he has begun to think and mingles actions with it, then melancholy is fully developed.

[4624] Editor. The Savonarola reference is retained in Burton's printed order and abbreviations. The marginal l has an editorial anchor at Savonarola because no body marker is clearly legible. The adjacent Augustine and Rhasis references under n remain together; their precise relation to the Gordonius passage needs collation.

Source page 196–197 This progress of melancholy you shall easily observe in them that have been so affected, they go smiling to themselves at first, at length they laugh out; at first solitary, at last they can endure no company: or if they do, they are now dizards, past sense and shame, quite moped, they care not what they say or do, all their actions, words, gestures, are furious or ridiculous. At first his minde is troubled, he doth not attend what is said, if you tell him a tale, he cries at last, what said you? but in the end he mutters to himself, as old women doe many times, or old men when they sit alone, upon a sudden they laugh, whoop, hollow, or run away, and swear they see or hear players, [4625]Devils, Hobgoblins, Ghosts, strike, or strut, &c. grow humorous in the end:	You will easily observe this progression of melancholy in those who have been affected by it. At first they go about smiling to themselves; eventually they laugh aloud. At first solitary, in the end they can endure no company; or, if they do, they have now become fools, beyond sense and shame, utterly stupefied, caring nothing for what they say or do: all their actions, words and gestures are frenzied or ridiculous. At first his mind is troubled and he does not attend to what is said. If you tell him a story, he finally cries, "What did you say?" But in the end he mutters to himself, as old women often do, or old men when they sit alone. Suddenly they laugh, whoop, shout or run away, and swear that they see or hear actors, devils, hobgoblins and ghosts; they strike out or strut about, and so on, becoming capricious in the end.[4626]
Source page 197 Like him in the Poet, sæpe ducentos, sæpe decem servos, he will dress himself, and undress, careless at last, growes insensible, stupid or mad. [4627]He howles like a wolf, barks like a dog, and raves like Ajax and Orestes, hears Musick and outcries, which no man else hears.	Like the man in the poet, with "often two hundred slaves, often ten," he will dress and undress himself, grow careless at last, become insensible, stupefied or mad. He howls like a wolf, barks like a dog, and raves like Ajax and Orestes, hearing music and cries that no one else hears.[4628]

[4625] Burton. Printed page 197, p: "Melancholicus se videre & audire putat dæmones. Lavater de Spectris part. 3. cap. 2." The melancholic person thinks he sees and hears demons. Lavater, On Spectres, part 3, chapter 2.

[4626] Editor. "Dizards" means fools; "moped" here means stupefied or sunk in dejection; "humorous" means capricious or governed by changing humours. The passage's disparaging comparisons and claims about progression belong to Burton's historical description; they are not supplied as present-day diagnostic language.

[4627] Burton. Printed page 197, q: "Wierus lib. 3. cap. 31." Wierus, book 3, chapter 31.

[4628] Editor. Horace, Satires 1.3.11–12, describes the inconsistent Tigellius, who kept now two hundred slaves, now ten. Burton quotes only the numbers and slaves; the modern sentence supplies the linking "with." Ajax and Orestes are classical figures associated with madness. "Stupid" here means stupefied or insensible.

Who can sufficiently speak of these symptomes, or prescribe rules to comprehend them? as Echo to the painter in Ausonius, vane quid affectas &c. foolish fellow, what wilt? if you must needs paint me, paint a voice, & similem si vis pingere, pinge sonum; if you will describe melancholy, describe a phantasticall conceipt, a corrupt imagination, vain thoughts and different, which who can do?	Who can adequately describe these symptoms, or lay down rules that encompass them? As Echo says to the painter in Ausonius, “Fool, what are you attempting?” and so on. Foolish fellow, what do you want? If you must paint me, paint a voice: “And if you wish to paint a likeness, paint sound.” If you wish to describe melancholy, describe a fantastic notion, a disordered imagination, vain and differing thoughts—and who can do that?[4633]

[4629] Burton. Printed page 197, r: “Michael à musian.” Michael à musian. Editorially anchored at the Amatus Lusitanus example; no matching body letter is clearly visible. The name or reference remains to be identified.

[4632] Editor. A medical “century” is a collection of a hundred cases; cura is rendered case here. The unexplained marginal “Michael à musian” is retained and editorially anchored to the adjacent Amatus report. Boloigne in Italy is Bologna. The language and possession claims remain reported stories; their sources have not been fully collated.

[4633] Editor. Ausonius, Echo to the Painter, numbered XI in the comparison text. Burton abbreviates the opening and rearranges the final line. Both Latin fragments are freshly translated; his intervening English gloss remains distinct. Echo’s demand to paint sound becomes an image for the difficulty of depicting inner experience.

The four and twenty letters make no more variety of words in divers languages, then melancholy conceipts produce diversity of symptomes in several persons. They are irregular, obscure, various, so infinite, Proteus himself is not so divers, you may aswell make the Moon a new coat, as a true charecter of a melancholy man; as soon finde the motion of a bird in the aire, as the heart of man, a melancholy man. They are so confused, I say, divers, intermixt with other diseases.	The twenty-four letters make no greater variety of words in different languages than melancholic notions produce diversity of symptoms in different people. They are irregular, obscure, varied and so innumerable that Proteus himself is not so changeable. You might as well make the Moon a new coat as produce a true portrait of a melancholic person; you could as easily trace a bird's movement through the air as discover a person's heart—a melancholic person's heart. They are so confused, I say, so varied and intermingled with other diseases.[4634]
As the species be confounded (which [4635]I have shewed) so are the symptomes; Sometimes with headache, Cacexia, dropsie, stone; as you may perceive by those severall examples and illustrations, collected by [4636]Hildesheim spicel. 2. Mercurialis consil. 118. cap. 6 & 11. with head-ach, Epilepsie, Priapismus. Trincavelius consil. 12. lib. 1. consil. 49. with gout: caninus appetitus. Montanus consil. 26. &c. 23. 234. 249. with falling sickness, headach, Vertigo, Lycanthropia, &c. 1. Cæsar Claudinus consult. 4. consult. 89. & 116. with gout, agues, Hemrods, stone, &c. who can distinguish these melancholy symptomes so intermixt with others, or apply them to their severall kinds, confine them into method?	As the types are mingled, as I have shown, so are the symptoms: sometimes with headache, a wasted bodily condition, dropsy or stones, as you can see from the various examples and illustrations collected by Hildesheim, Spicilegium 2. Mercurialis, consultation 118, chapters 6 and 11: with headache, epilepsy and priapism. Trincavelius, consultation 12, book 1, consultation 49: with gout; ravenous appetite. Montanus, consultation 26, etc., 23, 234, 249: with epilepsy, headache, vertigo, lycanthropy, and so on. 1. Caesar Claudinus, consultation 4, consultations 89 and 116: with gout, fevers, haemorrhoids, stones, and so on. Who can distinguish these melancholic symptoms, so intermingled with others, assign them to their various kinds, or contain them within a system?[4637]

[4634] Editor. "Four and twenty letters" counts I/J and U/V as single letters. Proteus is the shape-changing mythical figure. Plutarch, Dinner of the Seven Wise Men 14 (Moralia 157A–B), tells of the Moon asking her mother for a garment that her changing shape prevents fitting. Proverbs 30:18–19, the eagle's path in the sky, offers a possible parallel to Burton's bird image. Neither comparison establishes his immediate intermediary.

[4635] Burton. Printed page 197, u: "Part. 1. Subs. 2. Memb. 2." Partition 1, subsection 2, member 2. The locator is retained in its printed order.

[4637] Editor. Cacexia denotes a poor or wasted bodily condition; dropsy denotes swelling; "stone" means bodily calculi; priapism a persistent erection; caninus appetitus, literally canine appetite, ravenous hunger. Falling sickness is epilepsy; lycanthropy here concerns imagined animal identity; agues are fevers, often intermittent; hemrods are haemorrhoids. The compressed consultation numbers and isolated "1." before Caesar Claudinus are retained, pending collation.

'Tis hard I confesse, yet I have disposed of them as I could, and will descend to particularize them according to their species. For hitherto I have expatiated in more generall lists or terms, speaking promiscuously of such ordinary signes, which occur amongst writers. Not that they are all to be found in one man, for that were to paint a monster or Chimæra, not a man; but some in one, some in another, and that successively or at severall times.	It is difficult, I admit; yet I have arranged them as best I could, and will now proceed to specify them according to their types. So far I have ranged within broader boundaries or terms, speaking without distinction of the ordinary signs that occur among writers. They are not all to be found in one person, for that would be to paint a monster or Chimera, not a person: some occur in one, some in another, and those successively or at different times.[4638]
Source page 197–198 Which I have been the more curious to expresse and report, not to upbraid any miserable man, or by way of derision (I rather pitty them) but the better to discern, to apply remedies unto them; and to shew that the best and soundest of us all, is in great danger, how much we ought to fear our own fickle estates, remember our miseries and vanities, examine and humiliate our selves, seek to God, and call to him for mercy, that needs not look for any rods to scourge our selves, since we carry them in our bowels, and that our souls are in a miserable captivity, if the light of grace and heavenly truth, doth not shine continually upon us: and by our discretion to moderate our selves, to be more circumspect and wary in the midst of these dangers.	I have taken all the more care to express and report these things, not to reproach anyone in misery or to ridicule them—I pity them instead—but to distinguish their troubles more clearly and apply remedies to them. And to show that even the best and soundest among us is in great danger; how much we ought to fear for our own unstable condition, remember our miseries and vanities, examine and humble ourselves, turn to God and call upon him for mercy. We need not look for rods with which to scourge ourselves, since we carry them in our own bowels; and our souls are in miserable captivity unless the light of grace and heavenly truth shines continually upon us. We should therefore use our judgment to govern ourselves and be more watchful and cautious amid these dangers.[4639]

[4638] Editor. "Lists" here means boundaries or limits; "promiscuously" means without distinction. A Chimera is a composite monster. Burton expressly rejects assembling every listed symptom into one supposed individual and acknowledges variation between people and over time.

[4639] Editor. "Curious" means careful or painstaking; "estates" means conditions; "humiliate" means humble. "Bowels" denotes the body's internal organs and preserves the force of Burton's image: people carry sources of suffering within themselves. The closing appeal combines compassion, medical purpose, shared vulnerability and religious self-examination.

IF [4640]no Symptomes appear about the stomack, nor the blood be misaffected, and fear and sorrow continue, it is to be thought the Brain it self is troubled, by reason of a melancholy juyce bred in it, or otherways conveyed into it; & that evill juyce is from the distemperature of the part, or left after some inflammation, Thus far Piso. But this is not always true, for blood and hypocondries both are often affected even in head-melancholy.	If no symptoms appear around the stomach, and the blood is not disordered, yet fear and sorrow continue, we must suppose that the brain itself is troubled by a melancholic fluid generated in it or otherwise conveyed into it; and that this harmful fluid comes from the disordered constitution of the part, or remains after an inflammation. So far Piso. But this is not always true, for both the blood and the hypochondria are often affected even in head melancholy.[4641]
[4642]Hercules de Saxonia differs here from the common current of Writers, putting peculiar signs of head-melancholy, from the sole distemperature of spirits in the Brain, as they are hot, cold, dry, moist, all without matter, from the motion alone, and tenebrosity of spirits; of melancholy which proceeds from humors by adustion, he treats apart, with their several symptomes and cures.	Hercules de Saxonia differs here from the general run of writers, assigning distinctive signs of head melancholy to the disordered condition of the spirits in the brain alone, according as they are hot, cold, dry or moist: all without humoral matter, arising solely from the motion and darkness of the spirits. He treats separately the melancholy that proceeds from humours through scorching, with its respective symptoms and cures.[4643]

[4641] Editor. The hypochondria are the upper abdominal regions beneath the ribs. “Hypochondriacal” in this classification concerns a supposed bodily origin there, rather than the modern meaning of anxiety about illness. “Juice” means a bodily fluid or humour. Burton immediately qualifies Piso’s diagnostic distinction.

[4642] Burton. Printed page 198, star: “Tract. de mel. cap. 13. &c. Ex intemperie spirituum, & cerebri motu, tenebrositate.” Treatise On Melancholy, chapter 13, etc. From the disordered condition of the spirits, and the movement and darkness of the brain. The margin and body phrase this explanation differently.

[4643] Editor. “Spirits” are the physiological agents of sensation and other bodily functions in this account. “Without matter” distinguishes this explanation from the humour-based account that follows. Adustion is scorching, the supposed transformation of humours by heat. The margin speaks of the brain’s movement and darkness, while the body assigns motion and darkness to the spirits; both wordings are preserved.

The common signs, if it be by essence in the head, are ruddiness of face, high sanguine complexion, most part rubore saturato, [4644]one cals it a blewish, and sometimes full of pimples, with red eyes. Avicenna l. 3. Fen. 2. Tract. 4. c. 18. Duretus and others out of Galen. de affect. l. 3. c. 6. [4645]Hercules de Saxonia to this of redness of face, adds heaviness of the head, fixed and hollow eyes.	The common signs, if it originates in the head itself, are a ruddy face and a strongly sanguine complexion, usually "with a deep flush." One writer calls it bluish, and sometimes covered with pimples, with red eyes: Avicenna, book 3, fen 2, treatise 4, chapter 18; Duretus and others, from Galen, On Affected Parts, book 3, chapter 6. To this redness of the face Hercules de Saxonia adds heaviness of the head and fixed, sunken eyes.[4646]
[4647]If it proceed from dryness of the brain, then their heads will be light, vertiginous, and they most apt to wake, & to continue whole moneths together without sleep. Few excrements in their eyes and nostrils, and often bald by reason of excess of drynes, Montaltus adds c. 17. If it proceed from moisture; dulness, drowziness, headache follows; and as Salust. Salvianus, c. 1. l. 2. out of his own experience found, Epileptical, with a multitude of humors in the head. They are very bashfull, ruddy, apt to blush, and to be red upon all occasions, præsertim si metus accesserit.	If it proceeds from dryness of the brain, their heads will feel light and dizzy, and they will be especially prone to wakefulness, remaining without sleep for whole months together. Montaltus adds, in chapter 17, that they have few discharges from the eyes and nostrils and are often bald through excessive dryness. If it proceeds from moisture, dullness, drowsiness and headache follow; and, as Salustius Salvianus found from his own experience, in book 2, chapter 1, epileptic symptoms, with an abundance of humours in the head. They are very bashful, ruddy, ready to blush and turn red on every occasion, "especially if fear comes upon them."[4648]

[4644] Burton. Printed page 198, z: "Facie sunt rubente & livescente, quibus etiam aliquando adsunt pustulæ." Their faces are red and livid; sometimes pimples are also present.

[4645] Burton. Printed page 198, a: "Jo Pantheon cap. de Mel. Si cerebrum primario afficiatur adsunt capitis gravitas, fixi oculi, &c." Jo Pantheon, chapter On Melancholy. If the brain is primarily affected, there are heaviness of the head, fixed eyes, etc. The printed opening locator is retained pending identification.

[4646] Editor. "By essence" means originating in the part itself, contrasted later with an effect transmitted from elsewhere. "Sanguine" concerns blood as a humour. Fen is a division in Avicenna's work. The name or locator "Jo Pantheon" in marginal a remains unexpanded pending collation. "Hollow eyes" means sunken eyes.

[4647] Burton. Printed page 198, b: "Laurent. cap. 5. si à cerebro ex siccitate, tum capitis erit levitas, sitis, vigilia, paucitas superfluitatum in oculis & naribus." Laurentius, chapter 5. If it comes from dryness in the brain, there will be lightness of the head, thirst, wakefulness and few discharges from the eyes and nostrils.

[4648] Editor. "To wake" means to remain awake, and "excrements" here means discharges or secretions, not faeces. The claim of whole months without sleep is retained as Burton's transmitted account. The compressed "Epileptical" is made explicit as epileptic symptoms in the modern column.

But the chiefest symptome to discern this species, as I have said, is this, that there be no notable signs in the stomack, Hypocondries, or elswhere, digna, as [4649]Montaltus terms them, or of greater note, because oftentimes the passions of the stomack concur with it. Wind is common to all three species, and is not excluded, only that of the Hypocondries is [4650]more windy then the rest, saith Hollerius. Ætius tetrab. l. 2. se. 2. c. 9. & 10. maintains the same, [4651]if there be more signs, and more evident in the head then elswhere, the Brain is primarily affected, & prescribes head-melancholy to be cured by meats amongst the rest, void of wind, & good juyce, not excluding wind, or corrupt blood, even in head-melancholy it self: but these species are often confounded, & so are their symptomes, as I have already proved.	But the chief sign by which to distinguish this type, as I have said, is the absence of notable signs in the stomach, hypochondria or elsewhere —"significant," as Montaltus calls them, or of greater importance—because disorders of the stomach often occur along with it. Wind is common to all three types and is not excluded; only the type arising from the hypochondria is windier than the rest, says Hollerius. Aetius, Tetrabiblos, book 2, section 2, chapters 9 and 10, maintains the same: if the signs are more numerous and evident in the head than elsewhere, the brain is primarily affected. Among other treatments, he prescribes foods that produce no wind and yield good bodily fluid. He does not exclude wind or corrupted blood even from head melancholy itself. But these types are often mingled, and so are their symptoms, as I have already shown.[4652]

[4651] Burton. Printed page 198, e, lower margin: "Si minus molestiæ circa ventriculum aut ventrem, in iis cerebrum primario afficitur, & curare oportet hunc affectum, per cibos flatus exortes, & bonæ concoctionis, &c. raro cerebrum afficitur sine ventriculo." If there is less trouble around the stomach or belly, in these people the brain is primarily affected, and this disorder should be treated with foods free from wind and easy to digest, etc. The brain is rarely affected without the stomach.

[4652] Editor. The three types here are melancholy located primarily in the head, the hypochondria, or the whole body. "Passions" of the stomach are disorders or sufferings. "Good juice" refers to the bodily nourishment or fluid that food was thought to produce. The Latin marginal advice instead stresses easy digestion; the two formulations remain distinct.

Source page 198–199 The symptomes of the minde are superfluous and continuall cogitations; [4653]for when the head is heated, it scorcheth the blood, and from thence proceed melancholy fumes, which trouble the minde, Avicenna. They are very cholerick, and soon hot, solitary, sad, often silent, watchfull, discontent, Montaltus cap. 24. If any thing trouble them, they cannot sleep, but fret themselves still, till another object mitigate, or time wear it out.	The symptoms of the mind are excessive and continual thoughts; for when the head is heated it scorches the blood, and melancholic fumes arise from it and trouble the mind: Avicenna. They are very irritable and quickly angered, solitary, sad, often silent, sleepless and discontented: Montaltus, chapter 24. If anything troubles them, they cannot sleep but keep fretting until something else eases the distress or time wears it away.[4654]
Source page 199 They have grievous passions, and immoderate perturbations of the mind, fear, sorrow, &c. yet not so continuate, but that they are sometimes merry, apt to profuse laughter, which is more to be wondred at, and that by the authority of [4655]Galen himself, by a reason of mixture of blood, prærubri jocosis delectantur & irrisores plerumque sunt, if they be ruddy, they are delighted in jests, and oftentimes scoffers themselves, conceipted; and as Rhodericus à Vega comments on that place of Galen, merry, witty, of a pleasant disposition, and yet grievously melancholy anon after: omnia discunt sine doctore, saith Areteus, they learn without a teacher:	They have grievous passions and excessive disturbances of mind—fear, sorrow and the like—yet these are not so continuous that they are never cheerful. Sometimes they are prone to unrestrained laughter, which is all the more surprising; and this is explained, on Galen's own authority, by an admixture of blood. "The very ruddy delight in jokes and are generally mockers": if ruddy, they enjoy jests and are often witty scoffers themselves; and, as Rhodericus à Vega comments on that passage of Galen, they are merry, witty and pleasant in disposition, yet deeply melancholic soon afterwards. "They learn everything without a teacher," says Aretaeus: they learn without a teacher.[4656]

[4653] Burton. Printed page 198, f, lower margin: "Sanguinem adurit caput calidius, & inde fumi melancholici adusti, animum exagitant." An over-hot head scorches the blood, and the scorched melancholic fumes arising from it disturb the mind.

[4654] Editor. "Watchfull" here means sleepless; "cholerick" describes an irritable, hot-tempered disposition within humoral language. "Superfluous" thoughts are excessive thoughts. Heating, scorching and fumes belong to Burton's historical physiological explanation.

[4655] Burton. Printed page 199, g: "Lib. de loc. affect. cap. 6." Book On Affected Parts, chapter 6.

[4656] Editor. "Conceipted" means witty or ingenious, not self-important. The Latin is translated before Burton's own gloss. Omnia adds "everything," which his shorter English gloss omits. The exact Galen, Vega and Aretaeus passages and Burton's intermediaries await collation.

and as [4657]Laurentius supposeth, those ferall passions and Symptomes of such as think themselves glass, pitchers, feathers, &c. speak strange languages, proceed a calore cerebri (if it be in excess) from the brains distempered heat.	And, as Laurentius supposes, those dreadful passions and symptoms in people who think themselves glass, pitchers, feathers, and so on, or speak unfamiliar languages, proceed "from the heat of the brain," if excessive—from its disordered heat.[4658]

[4658] Editor. "Ferall" means dreadful or deadly. "Strange languages" means unfamiliar or foreign languages. These transformed-body beliefs and reported language abilities continue examples from the preceding subsection; no retrospective diagnoses or independently verified abilities are asserted.

SUBSECT. 2. Symptomes of windy Hypocondriacall Melancholy.	Subsection 2 Symptoms of windy hypochondriacal melancholy
IN this Hypocondriacall or flatuous melancholy, the symptomes are so ambiguous saith [4659]Crato in a counsell of his for a Noblewoman, that the most exquisite Physicians cannot determine of the part affected. Matthew Flaccius consulted about a Noble matron, confessed as much, that in this malady he with Hollerius, Fracastorius, Falopius, and others, being to give their sentence of a party labouring of Hypocondriacall melancholy, could not find out by the symptomes, which part was most especially affected; some said the womb, some heart, some stomack, &c. and therefore Crato, consil. 24. lib. 1. boldly avers, that in this diversity of symptomes, which commonly accompany this disease, [4660]no physician can truely say what part is affected.	In this hypochondriacal or flatulent melancholy, the symptoms are so ambiguous, says Crato in a consultation concerning a noblewoman, that the most accomplished physicians cannot determine which part is affected. Matthew Flaccius, consulted about a noble matron, admitted as much. In this disorder, he, Hollerius, Fracastorius, Fallopius and others, called upon to give their judgment on someone suffering from hypochondriacal melancholy, could not discover from the symptoms which part was chiefly affected. Some said the womb, some the heart, some the stomach, and so on. Crato therefore boldly declares, in book 1, consultation 24, that amid the variety of symptoms commonly accompanying this disease, no physician can truly say which part is affected.[4661]

[4659] Burton. Printed page 199, i: “Hildesheim spicel. 1. de mel. In Hypocondriaca melancholia adeo ambigua sunt symptomata, ut etiam exercitatissimi medici de loco affecto statuere non possint.” Hildesheim, Spicilegium 1, On Melancholy. In hypochondriacal melancholy the symptoms are so ambiguous that even the most experienced physicians cannot determine the affected site.

[4661] Editor. “Counsell” here is a medical consultation; “exquisite” means exceptionally accomplished; “sentence” means judgment. Burton preserves the disagreement among practitioners over the affected organ. The printed name Matthew Flaccius is retained rather than identified by conjecture.

Galen lib. 3. de loc. affect. reckons up the ordinary symptomes, which all the Neotericks repeat of Diocles; only this fault he finds with him, that he puts not Fear and Sorrow amongst the other signs. Trincavellius excuseth Diocles, lib. 3. consil. 35. because that oftentimes in a strong head and constitution, a generous spirit, and a valiant, these symptomes appear not, by reason of his valour and courage. [4662]Hercules de Saxonia (to whom I subscribe) is of the same mind (which I have before touched) that Fear and Sorrow are not generall Symptomes; some fear and are not sad; some be sad and fear not; some neither fear nor grieve.	Galen, in book 3 of On Affected Parts, lists the ordinary symptoms which all the modern writers repeat from Diocles. His only objection is that Diocles does not include Fear and Sorrow among the other signs. Trincavellius defends Diocles in book 3, consultation 35, because in someone with a strong head and constitution, a noble and valiant spirit, these symptoms often do not appear, owing to his courage. Hercules de Saxonia, with whom I agree, holds the same opinion, which I have mentioned before: Fear and Sorrow are not universal symptoms. Some are afraid without being sad; some are sad without fear; some neither fear nor grieve.[4663]
The rest are these, beside Fear and Sorrow, [4664]sharp belchings, fullsome crudities, heat in the bowels, wind and rumbling in the guts, vehement gripings, pain in the belly and stomack sometimes, after meat that is hard of concoction, much watering of the stomack, and moist spittle, cold sweat, importunus sudor, unseasonable sweat all over the body, as Octavius Horatianus lib. 2. cap. 5. cals it. cold joynts, indigestion,	The remaining signs, besides Fear and Sorrow, are these: sour belching, foul undigested matter, heat in the bowels, wind and rumbling in the guts, violent cramps, and sometimes pain in the belly and stomach after food that is hard to digest; much watery fluid rising from the stomach, abundant saliva, cold sweat —"troublesome sweating," or, as Octavius Horatianus calls it in book 2, chapter 5, unseasonable sweat over the whole body—cold joints and indigestion.[4665]

Their ears sing now and then, Vertigo and giddiness come by fits, turbulent dreams, driness, leanness, apt they are to sweat upon all occasions, of all colours and complexions.	They cannot bear their own foul belching; there is continual wind about the hypochondria, heat and cramping in the bowels; “the parts beneath the heart are drawn upwards”—the midriff and bowels are pulled up; the veins around the eyes look red and swell from vapours and wind. Their ears ring from time to time; vertigo and dizziness come in fits, with troubled dreams, dryness and thinness. They are prone to sweat on every occasion and may be of any colour or complexion.[4667]

[4666] Burton. Printed page 199, m, lower margin: “Circa præcordia de assidua inflatione queruntur, & cum sudore totius corporis importuno, frigidos articulos sæpe patiuntur, indigestione laborant, ructus suos insuaves perhorrescunt, viscerum dolores habent.” They complain of persistent swelling in the parts beneath the heart and, along with troublesome sweating over the whole body, often suffer cold joints; they labour under indigestion, recoil from their own unpleasant belches, and have pain in the internal organs.

[4667] Editor. Præcordia is a historically variable term for the parts beneath or around the heart, including the upper abdomen; Burton himself glosses it as midriff and bowels here. The fresh Latin translation and his English gloss are kept distinct. “Ears sing” means ringing in the ears.

That Symptom alone vexeth many. [4668]Some again are black, pale, ruddy, sometime their shoulders, and shoulder blades ake, there is a leaping all over their bodies, sudden trembling, a palpitation of the heart, and that cardiaca passio, grief in the mouth of the stomack, which maketh the patient think his hart it self aketh, and sometimes suffocation, difficultas anhelitus, short breath, hard wind, strong pulse, swooning.	Many have a heightened colour, especially after meals. Cardinal Caecius was much troubled by this symptom and complained of it to his physician Prosper Calenus: he could not eat or drink a cup of wine without becoming as red in the face as if he had been at a mayor's feast. That symptom alone troubles many. Others are dark, pale or ruddy. Sometimes their shoulders and shoulder blades ache; there is twitching throughout the body, sudden trembling, palpitation of the heart, and that "cardiac affection," pain at the mouth of the stomach that makes the patient think the heart itself aches; sometimes suffocation, "difficulty in breathing," shortness of breath, laboured breathing, a strong pulse and fainting.[4669]

Montanus, consultation 55; Trincavelius, book 3, consultations 36 and 37; Fernelius, consultation 43; Frambesarius, book 1 of consultations, consultation 17; Hildesheim, Claudinus and others provide examples of every particular. The distinctive symptoms belonging to each part are these. If it proceeds from the stomach, says Savanarola, the stomach is full of pain and wind. Guianerius adds vertigo, nausea, much spitting, and so on. If from the abdominal wall, there is swelling and wind in the hypochondria, nausea, an urge to vomit and an upward pulling.[4671]

[4669] Editor. "High-coloured" means flushed. The mayor's feast evokes rich eating and drinking. "Black" here describes a dark complexion, one among the listed colours. Cardiaca passio names an affection associated with pain near the stomach's upper opening; Burton explicitly distinguishes perceived heart pain from that site. "Hard wind" is laboured breathing in this list. Cardinal Cæcius's identity remains unverified.

[4670] Burton. Printed page 200, o: "Pract. major: dolor in eo et ventositas, nausea." Greater Practice: pain in it, wind and nausea.

[4671] Editor. Myrache is rendered abdominal wall; the historical term mirach could refer broadly to the anterior belly wall and its coverings. A contemporary lexical comparison is Furetière's 1690 abdomen entry, which gives mirach as an Arabic name for that region. "Appetite to vomit" means an urge to vomit. The printed Savanarola and the consultation locators are retained on the left.

If from the heart, aking and trembling of it, much heaviness. If from the liver, there is usually a pain in the right Hypocondrie. If from the spleen, hardness and grief in the left Hypocondrie, a rumbling, much appetite and small digestion, Avicenna. If from the Meseraicke veins and liver on the other side, little or no appetite, Herc. de Saxoniâ. If from the Hypocondries, a rumbling inflation, concoction is hindred, often belching, &c.	If from the heart, there is aching and trembling of that organ, with much heaviness. If from the liver, there is usually pain in the right hypochondrium. If from the spleen, hardness and pain in the left hypochondrium, rumbling, a strong appetite and poor digestion: Avicenna. If, on the other hand, from the mesenteric veins and liver, there is little or no appetite: Hercules de Saxonia. If from the hypochondria, there is swelling with rumbling, impaired digestion, frequent belching, and so on.[4672]
And from these crudities, windy vapors ascend up to the brain which trouble the imagination, and cause fear, sorrow, dulness, heaviness, many terrible conceipts and Chimæra's, as Lemnius well observes, l. 1. c. 16. as [4673]a black and thick cloud covers the Sun, and intercepts his beams, and light, so doth this melancholy vapour obnubilate the minde, inforce it to many absurd thoughts and imaginations, and compell good, wise, honest, discreet men (arising to the Brain from the [4674]lower parts, as smoke out of a chimney) to dote, speak, and doe that which becomes them not, their persons, callings, wisdoms.	From this undigested matter, windy vapours rise to the brain, disturbing the imagination and causing fear, sorrow, dullness, heaviness and many terrifying notions and chimeras. As Lemnius aptly observes in book 1, chapter 16, just as a thick black cloud covers the Sun and intercepts its beams and light, so this melancholic vapour clouds the mind and forces it into many absurd thoughts and imaginings. Rising to the brain from the lower parts like smoke from a chimney, it compels good, wise, honest and judicious people to become deluded, and to say and do things unworthy of their persons, occupations and wisdom.[4675]

[4672] Editor. The meseraic veins are mesenteric veins. "On the other side" means on the other hand, contrasting appetite patterns; it does not identify the liver as anatomically left-sided. "Concoction" again means digestion.

[4673] Burton. Printed page 200, p: "Ut atra densaque nubes soli effusa, radios et lumen ejus intercipit et offuscat: sic etc." As a dark, thick cloud spread before the Sun intercepts and obscures its rays and light, so, etc.

[4675] Editor. "Obnubilate" means cloud or darken. Burton's smoke and cloud comparisons give visible form to the supposed passage of vapours from the abdomen to the brain. "Chimeras" are fantastic imaginings; "callings" means occupations or stations in life.

One by reason of those ascending vapours & gripings, rumbling beneath, will not be perswaded but that he hath a serpent in his guts, a viper, another frogs. Trallianus relates a storie of a woman, that imagined she had swallowed an Eele, or a Serpent; and Felix Platerus, observat. lib. 1. hath a most memorable example of a countreyman of his, that by chance falling into a pit where frogs & frogs-spawn was, and a little of that water swallowed, began to suspect that he had likewise swallowed frogs-spawn, and with that conceipt and fear, his phantasie wrought so far, that he verily thought he had young live frogs in his belly, qui vivebant ex alimento suo, that lived by his nourishment, and was so certainly perswaded of it, that for many years following, he could not be rectified in his conceipt:	Because of those rising vapours, cramps and rumblings below, one person cannot be persuaded that he does not have a serpent—a viper—in his guts; another believes he has frogs. Trallianus tells of a woman who imagined that she had swallowed an eel or a serpent. Felix Platerus, in book 1 of his Observations, gives a most memorable example of a fellow countryman who happened to fall into a pit containing frogs and frogspawn. Having swallowed a little of the water, he began to suspect that he had also swallowed frogspawn. With that notion and fear, his imagination worked so strongly that he truly thought he had young live frogs in his belly, "which lived on his own food"—which lived by his nourishment. He was so firmly convinced that for many years afterwards his belief could not be corrected.[4676]

[4676] Editor. The frog and eel stories are transmitted medical anecdotes. "Countryman" means a fellow countryman of Platerus, not necessarily a farmer. His Golden Practice, English translation (1664), page 28, describes imagined swallowed serpents and frogs; this later contextual parallel does not verify the patient in Observations 1, the chronology or the cure. Qui vivebant ex alimento suo is translated independently before Burton's English gloss.

Source page 200–201 He studied Physick seven years together to cure himself, travelled into Italy, France and Germany to confer with the best physicians about it, and A° 1609. asked his counsell amongst the rest, he told him it was wind, his conceipt, &c. but mordicus contradicere, & ore, & scriptis probare nitebatur: no saying would serve, it was no wind, but reall frogs: and doe you not heare them croake? Platerus would have deceived him, by putting live frogs into his excrements: but he being a physician himself, would not be deceived, vir prudens aliàs, & doctus, a wise and learned man otherwise, a Doctor of physick, and after seven years dotage in this kind, à phantasia liberatus est, he was cured. Laurentius and Goulart have many such examples, if you be desirous to read them.	He studied medicine for seven years to cure himself, travelled to Italy, France and Germany to consult the best physicians about it, and in 1609 sought Platerus's advice among the rest. Platerus told him it was wind, a notion of his, and so on; but "he stubbornly contradicted him and tried to prove it both orally and in writing." Nothing anyone said would do: it was no wind, but real frogs. "And do you not hear them croak?" Platerus would have tricked him by putting live frogs into his excrement; but, being a physician himself, he would not be deceived. He was "otherwise a prudent and learned man," a wise and learned man otherwise, a doctor of medicine; and after seven years of this delusion, "he was freed from the fantasy": he was cured. Laurentius and Goulart provide many such examples, if you wish to read them.[4677]

[4677] Editor. "Physick" means medicine, and "dotage" mental derangement or delusion, not necessarily old age. The text reports two seven-year periods without clearly relating them; they are not silently combined into a fourteen-year chronology. The proposed deception and eventual cure are reported without a mechanism for the cure. Latin phrases and Burton's glosses remain distinct.

Source page 201 One commoditie above the rest which are melancholy, these windy flatuous have, lucida intervalla, their symptomes and pains are not usually so continuate as the rest, but come by fits, fear and sorrow, and the rest: yet in another they exceed all others; and that is, [4678]they are luxurious, incontinent, and prone to Venerie, by reason of wind, & facile amant, & quamlibet ferè amant. (Jason Pratensis) Rhasis is of opinion, that Venus doth many of them much good; [4679]the other symptomes of the minde be common with the rest.	Those with this windy, flatulent melancholy have one advantage over other melancholic people: "lucid intervals." Their symptoms and pains—fear, sorrow and the rest—are usually less continuous, coming instead in fits. Yet in another respect they exceed all others: they are lustful, sexually unrestrained and inclined to intercourse because of wind, "and they readily fall in love, and love almost any woman"—Jason Pratensis. Rhasis holds that sexual intercourse does many of them much good. The other symptoms of the mind are shared with the remaining types.[4680]

[4680] Editor. "Commoditie" means advantage. "Luxurious" here means lustful; "incontinent" means sexually unrestrained; "Venus" and "Venerie" refer to sexual intercourse. Burton's wind-based explanation and attributed benefit are historical claims. Marginal t, apparently supplying Rhasis's locator, remains at its printed body position in the next clause.

SUBSECT. 3. Symptomes of Melancholy abounding in the whole bodie.	Subsection 3 Symptoms of melancholy abounding throughout the body
Their bodies that are affected with this universall melancholy, are most part black, [4681]the melancholy juice is redundant all over, hirsute they are, and lean, they have broad veins, their bloud is gross and thick. [4682]Their Spleen is weak, and a Liver apt to ingender the humour; they have kept bad diet, or have had some evacuation stopped, as hæmrods, or moneths in women, which [4683]Trallianus in the cure, would have carefully to be inquired, and withall to observe of what complexion the party is of, black or red.	The bodies of those affected by this universal melancholy are generally dark in complexion. The melancholic fluid is excessive throughout; they are hairy and lean, with broad veins and dense, thick blood. Their spleen is weak and their liver prone to generate the humour. They have followed a bad diet, or some bodily discharge has been stopped, such as haemorrhoidal bleeding or women's menstruation. Trallianus would have this carefully investigated in treatment, together with the person's complexion, whether dark or red.[4684]

[4682] Burton. Printed page 201, x: "Splen natura imbecillior. Montaltus cap. 22." The spleen is naturally weaker. Montaltus, chapter 22.

[4683] Burton. Printed page 201, y: "Lib. 1 cap. 16. Interrogare convenit, an aliqua evacuationis retentio obvenerit, viri in hæmorrhoid. mulierum menstruis, & vide faciem similiter an sit rubicunda." Book 1, chapter 16. It is proper to ask whether any suppression of a discharge has occurred—in a man, haemorrhoidal bleeding; in women, menstruation—and likewise see whether the face is ruddy.

[4684] Editor. "Universall" means throughout the body. "Redundant" means excessive; "hirsute" hairy; "gross" dense or coarse. "Moneths" means menstrual periods. In the humoral account, a stopped discharge could retain harmful matter. "Black" is a complexion term here.

For as Forrestus and Hollerius contend, if [4685]they be black, it proceeds from abundance of naturall melancholy; if it proceed from cares, agony, discontents, diet, exercise, &c. they may be as wel of any other colour: red, yellow, pale, as black, and yet their whole bloud corrupt: prærubri colore sæpe sunt tales, sæpe flavi, (saith [4686]Montaltus cap. 22.) The best way to discern this species, is to let them bleed, if the blood be corrupt, thick and black, and they withall free from those hypocondriacall symptomes, & not so grievously troubled with them, or those of the head, it argues they are melancholy à toto corpore.	For, as Forrestus and Hollerius maintain, if they are dark, it proceeds from an abundance of natural black bile. If it proceeds from cares, agony, discontents, diet, exercise and the like, they may just as well be any other colour—red, yellow or pale—as dark, and yet all their blood may be corrupted. "Such people are often very red in colour, often yellow," says Montaltus, chapter 22. The best way to distinguish this type is to let them bleed: if the blood is corrupted, thick and black, and they are also free of those hypochondriacal symptoms, or less severely troubled by them or those of the head, it indicates melancholy "arising from the whole body."[4687]

[4686] Burton. Printed page 201, a: "Montaltus cap. 22. Piso. Ex colore sanguinis si minuas venam, si fluat niger, &c." Montaltus, chapter 22. Piso. From the colour of the blood, if you open a vein, if it flows black, etc.

[4687] Editor. "Natural melancholy" here means black bile as a humour. The passage describes bloodletting as a means of distinguishing the type; it is Burton's historical prescription. The syntax moves from being free of the other symptoms to being less troubled by them, a qualification retained in the translation.

The fumes which rise from this corrupt blood, disturb the mind, and make them fearfull and sorrowfull, heavie hearted, as the rest, dejected, discontented, solitarie, silent, wearie of their lives, dull & heavie, or merrie, &c. and if far gone, that which Apuleius wished to his enemy, by way of imprecation, is true in them; [4688]Dead mens bones, hobgoblins, ghosts are ever in their minds, & meet them still in every turn: all the bugbears of the night, and terrors, fairy-babes of tombs, and graves are before their eyes, and in their thoughts, as to women and children, if they be in the dark alone.	The fumes rising from this corrupted blood disturb the mind and make them fearful and sorrowful, heavy-hearted like the rest, dejected, discontented, solitary, silent, weary of life, dull and heavy—or merry, and so on. If far gone, what Apuleius wished upon his enemy as a curse becomes true of them: dead men's bones, hobgoblins and ghosts are always in their minds and meet them at every turn; all the night's bogeys and terrors, the fairy creatures of tombs and graves, are before their eyes and in their thoughts, as with women and children alone in the dark.[4689]
If they hear, or read, or see any tragicall object, it sticks by them, they are afraid of death, and yet weary of their lives, in their discontented humours they quarrel with all the world, bitterly inveigh, taxe satyrically, and because they cannot otherwise vent their passions, or redress what is amiss, as they mean, they will by violent death at last be revenged on themselves.	If they hear, read or see anything tragic, it stays with them. They are afraid of death, yet weary of life. In their discontented moods they quarrel with the whole world, rail bitterly and criticize satirically; and because they cannot otherwise vent their passions or put right what they think is wrong, they will in the end take revenge upon themselves by a violent death.[4690]

[4689] Editor. The marginal passage adapts Apuleius, Apologia 64.1–2, a curse against Aemilianus. Apuleius asks for spectres to be heaped before "your" eyes; Burton makes sufferers heap them before their own eyes and adds their imagining them. His body paraphrase includes bones and fairy-babes, absent from that Latin passage. "Fairy-babes" is rendered fairy creatures; the comparison with women and children remains Burton's.

[4690] Editor. "Taxe" means criticize or censure; "as they mean" indicates what they themselves believe to be wrong. Burton's closing claim about self-inflicted death belongs to this historical account, not an assertion that people with melancholy necessarily follow such a course.

BEcause Lodovicus Mercatus in his second book de mulier. affect. cap. 4. and Rodericus à Castro de morb. mulier. cap. 3. lib. 2. two famous Physicians in Spain, Daniel Sennertus of Wittenberg lib. 1. part. 2. cap. 13. with others, have vouchsafed in their works not long since published, to write two just Treatises de Melancholia virginum, Monialium & Viduarum, as a peculiar species of melancholy (which I have already specified) distinct from the rest: [4691]for it much differs from that which commonly befals men and other women, as having one only cause proper to women alone) I may not omit in this generall Survey of melancholy Symptomes, to set down the particular signs of such parties so mis-affected.	Because Lodovicus Mercatus, in his second book On the Disorders of Women, chapter 4, and Rodericus à Castro, On the Diseases of Women, book 2, chapter 3—two famous physicians in Spain—and Daniel Sennertus of Wittenberg, book 1, part 2, chapter 13, with others, have thought fit in their recently published works to write two full treatises "on the melancholy of virgins, nuns and widows," treating it as a particular type of melancholy, already specified by me, distinct from the rest—for it differs greatly from that which commonly affects men and other women, having a single cause peculiar to women alone—I must not omit, in this general survey of melancholic symptoms, the particular signs in people so affected.[4692]

[4692] Editor. "Maids" here means unmarried women, not servants; "ancient" in the following paragraph means older. Just treatises are full or substantial treatises. Burton's syntax adds Sennertus and other writers to two named treatises; that count is retained. His unmatched closing parenthesis is retained on the left and the sentence repunctuated on the right. Claims about the physicians and publication history await bibliographical collation.

The causes are assigned out of Hippocrates, Cleopatra, Moschion, and those old Gynæciorum Scriptores, of this ferall malady, in more ancient Maids, Widows, and barren Women, ob septum transversum violatum saith Mercatus, by reason of the midriffe or Diaphragma, heart and brain offended with those vicious vapours which come from menstruous bloud, inflammationem arteriæ circa dorsum, Rodericus adds, an inflammation of the back, which with the rest is offended by [4693]that fuliginous exhalation of corrupt seed, troubling the brain, heart and mind;	The causes of this dreadful malady in older unmarried women, widows and barren women are drawn from Hippocrates, Cleopatra, Moschion and those ancient writers on women's diseases. "Because the diaphragm is impaired," says Mercatus: because the midriff or diaphragm, heart and brain are affected by harmful vapours arising from menstrual blood. "An inflammation of the artery near the back," Rodericus adds—an inflammation of the back, which, with the other parts, is affected by that sooty exhalation of corrupted seed, disturbing the brain, heart and mind.[4694]
the brain I say, not in essence, but by consent, Universa enim hujus affectus causa ab utero pendet, & à sanguinis menstrui malitia, for in a word, the whole malady proceeds from that inflammation, putredity, black smoky vapours, &c. from thence comes care, sorrow, and anxiety, obfuscation of spirits, agony, desperation, and the like, which are intended or remitted; si amatorius accesserit ardor, or any other violent object or perturbation of mind.	The brain, I say, is affected through sympathy with another part, rather than through a disorder originating in itself: "For the whole cause of this affection depends upon the womb and the harmful condition of the menstrual blood." In a word, the entire malady proceeds from that inflammation, putrefaction, black smoky vapours and the like. From these come care, sorrow, anxiety, a darkening of the spirits, agony, despair and similar troubles, which are intensified or diminished "if the ardour of love comes upon them," or through any other powerful object of thought or disturbance of mind.[4695]

[4694] Editor. Gynæciorum Scriptores means writers on women's diseases. Cleopatra is a name transmitted in that medical tradition; a New York Academy of Medicine catalogue record for the 1586 Gynaeciorum lists Cleopatra as a contributor, but it does not establish the historical identity intended by Burton. "Seed" refers to reproductive material in this physiology. The Latin specifies an artery near the back, whereas Burton's English gloss says simply the back; both are preserved.

This melancholy may happen to Widows, with much care and sorrow, as frequently it doth, by reason of a sudden alteration of their accustomed course of life, &c. To such as lye in childe-bed ob suppressam purgationem; but to Nunnes and more ancient Maids, and some barren Women for the causes abovesaid, 'tis more familiar, crebriùs his quam reliquis accidit, inquit Rodericus, the rest are not altogether excluded.	This melancholy may befall widows, with much care and sorrow, as it frequently does, because of a sudden change in their accustomed way of life, and so on. It may befall women lying in after childbirth "because the bodily discharge has been suppressed." But for the causes already given, it is more common among nuns, older unmarried women and some barren women: "It happens to these more often than to the rest," says Rodericus. The others are not altogether excluded.[4696]
Out of these causes Rodericus defines it with Areteus, to be angorem animi, a vexation of the mind, a sudden sorrow from a small, light, or no occasion, [4697]with a kind of still dotage and grief of some part or other, head, heart, breasts, sides, back, belly, &c. with much solitarinesse, weeping, distraction, &c. from which they are sometimes suddenly delivered, because it comes and goes by fits, and is not so permanent as other melancholy.	From these causes Rodericus, following Aretaeus, defines it as "anguish of mind," a vexation of the mind, a sudden sorrow arising from a small, slight or no occasion, with a kind of quiet mental derangement and pain in one part or another—the head, heart, breasts, sides, back or belly—and much solitude, weeping, distraction and the like. They are sometimes suddenly relieved of it, because it comes and goes in fits and is less continuous than other melancholy.[4698]

[4696] Editor. "Lie in child-bed" means the period of recovery after childbirth. Suppressed purgation here is an obstructed bodily discharge after childbirth, rather than a modern cleansing procedure. Burton also recognizes a widow's changed circumstances, care and sorrow. "Familiar" means common.

[4697] Burton. Printed page 202, c: "Cum tacito delirio ac dolore alicujus partis internæ, dorsi, hypocondrii, cordis regionem & universam mammam interdum occupantis, &c. Cutis aliquando squalida, aspera, rugosa, præcipue cubitis, genibus, & digitorum articulis, præcordia ingenti sæpe terrore æstuant & pulsant, cumque vapor excitatus sursum evolat, cor palpitat aut premitur, animus deficit, &c." With quiet delirium and pain in some internal part, the back or hypochondrium, sometimes occupying the region of the heart and the whole breast, etc. The skin is sometimes dry, rough and wrinkled, especially at the elbows, knees and finger joints; the parts beneath the heart often burn and throb with great terror, and when the stirred-up vapour rises, the heart palpitates or is oppressed, and consciousness fails, etc. The whole marginal container is retained here; some details recur in the body text that follows in Block 063.

[4698] Editor. "Still dotage" means quiet mental derangement; "grief" here includes bodily pain. Burton's definition emphasizes intermittent symptoms. The full marginal c belongs at this anchor, including details elaborated in the next body paragraph; it is not truncated at the block boundary.

Source page 202–203 But to leave this brief description, the most ordinary symptomes be these, pulsatio juxta dorsum, a beating about the back, which is almost perpetuall, the skin is many times rough, squalid, especially as Areteus observes, about the arms, knees, and knuckles. The midriffe and heart-strings do burn and beat very fearfully, and when this vapour or fume is stirred, flyeth upward, the heart it self beats, is sore grieved, and faints, fauces siccitate prægluduntur, ut difficulter possit ab uteri strangulatione decerni, like fits of the mother, Alvus plerisque nil reddit, aliis exiguum, acre, biliosum, lotium flavum.	But to leave this brief description, the most usual symptoms are these: “a throbbing near the back,” a beating about the back that is almost constant. The skin is often rough and dry, especially, as Aretaeus observes, around the arms, knees and knuckles. The midriff and heartstrings burn and throb alarmingly; and when this vapour or fume is stirred and flies upwards, the heart itself beats, suffers severe pain and faints. “The throat is closed by dryness, so that the condition can scarcely be distinguished from suffocation of the womb”: like fits of the womb. “In most, the bowels discharge nothing; in others, a little acrid, bilious matter; the urine is yellow.”[4699]

Source page 203 They complain many times, saith Mercatus, of a great pain in their heads, about their hearts, and hypocondries, and so likewise in their breasts, which are often sore, sometimes ready to swoon, their faces are inflamed, and red, they are dry, thirsty, suddenly hot, much troubled with winde, cannot sleep, &c. And from hence proceed ferina deliramenta, a brutish kind of dotage, troublesome sleep, terrible dreams in the night, subrusticus pudor & verecundia ignava, a foolish kinde of bashfulness to some, perverse conceipts and opinions, [4700]dejection of mind, much discontent, preposterous judgement.	They often complain, says Mercatus, of great pain in their heads, around their hearts and hypochondria, and likewise in their breasts, which are frequently sore. They sometimes feel ready to faint; their faces are inflamed and red; they are dry, thirsty, suddenly hot, much troubled by wind, unable to sleep, and so on. From this arise “wild delirious imaginings,” a brutish kind of mental derangement; troubled sleep; terrible dreams at night; “a somewhat rustic shame and timid diffidence,” a foolish kind of bashfulness in some; distorted notions and opinions; dejection of mind; much discontent; and perverse judgment.[4701]
They are apt to loath, dislike, disdain, to be weary of every object, &c. each thing almost is tedious to them, they pine away, void of counsell, apt to weep, and tremble, timorous, fearfull, sad, and out of all hope of better fortunes. They take delight in nothing for the time, but love to be alone and solitary, though that do them more harm; And thus they are affected so long as this vapour lasteth; but by and by as pleasant and merry as ever they were in their lives, they sing, discourse and laugh in any good company, upon all occasions, and so by fits it takes them now and then, except the malady be inveterate, and then ’tis more frequent, vehement and continuate.	They are prone to loathe, dislike and disdain, to grow weary of every object, and so on. Almost everything is tiresome to them; they waste away, unable to decide what to do, prone to weep and tremble, timid, fearful, sad and without any hope of better fortune. For the time they delight in nothing, but love to be alone and solitary, though this does them more harm. They remain in this state as long as the vapour lasts; but soon they are as pleasant and cheerful as ever in their lives, singing, talking and laughing in good company whenever occasion offers. Thus it takes them in fits from time to time, unless the disorder is long established, when it is more frequent, violent and continuous.[4702]

[4700] Burton. Printed page 203, dagger: “Animi dejectio, perversa rerum existimatio, præposterum judicium. Fastidiosæ, languentes, tædiosæ, consilii inopes, lachrymosæ, timentes, mœstæ, cum summa rerum meliorum desperatione, nulla re delectantur, solitudinem amant, &c.” Dejection of mind, distorted estimation of things, perverse judgment. Disgusted, languishing, weary, unable to decide, tearful, fearful and sad, utterly despairing of anything better, they delight in nothing and love solitude, etc.

[4701] Editor. “Dotage” means mental derangement; “conceipts” means notions; “preposterous” means disordered or perverse. The two Latin descriptions are freshly translated before Burton’s own, sometimes freer, glosses. The hypochondria are the regions beneath the ribs.

[4702] Editor. “Void of counsell” and the marginal consilii inopes describe being at a loss what to do. “Inveterate” means long established or deeply rooted. Burton contrasts recurring distress with intervals of cheerful social activity, while allowing a more continuous form.

Many of them cannot tell how to express themselves in words, or how it holds them, what ailes them, you cannot understand them, or well tell what to make of their sayings; so far gone sometimes, so stupified and distracted, they think themselves bewitched, they are in despair, aptæ ad fletum, desperationem, dolores mammis & hypocondriis. Mercatus therefore adds, now their breasts, now their hypocondries, belly and sides, then their heart and head akes, now heat, then wind, now this, now that offends, they are weary of all; [4703]and yet will not, cannot again tell how, where or what offends them, though they be in great pain, agony, and frequently complain, grieving, sighing, weeping and discontented still, sine causâ manifestâ, most part,	Many cannot find words to express themselves, or say how it affects them or what ails them; you cannot understand them or tell clearly what to make of their words. Sometimes they are so far gone, so stupefied and distraught, that they think themselves bewitched and fall into despair: "prone to weeping and despair, with pains in the breasts and hypochondria." Mercatus therefore adds that now their breasts ache, now their hypochondria, belly and sides, then their heart and head; now heat troubles them, then wind, now this, now that. They are weary of it all; yet they will not, or again cannot, say how, where or what troubles them, though they are in great pain and agony and complain frequently, always grieving, sighing, weeping and discontented, usually "without an evident cause."[4704]

[4703] Burton. Printed page 203, first star and its continuation: "Nolunt aperire molestiam quam patiuntur, sed conqueruntur tamen de capite, corde, mammis, &c. In puteos fere maniaci prosilire, ac strangulari cupiunt, nulla orationis suavitate ad spem salutis recuperandam erigi, &c. Familiares non curant, non loquuntur, non respondent. &c. & hæc graviora, si, &c." They will not disclose the trouble they suffer, but nevertheless complain of the head, heart, breasts, etc. Almost mad, they wish to leap into wells and to be strangled; no gentleness of speech [can] raise them to the hope of recovering their health, etc. They take no notice of those close to them, do not speak, do not answer, etc.; and these things are more severe if, etc. The abrupt final condition is printed without completion.

[4704] Editor. "How it holds them" means how the disorder affects them. The passage alternates inability and unwillingness to describe pain; both remain in the translation. Sine causa manifesta says that no cause is evident, not that the suffering is unreal. Marginal material following the first star continues without new body markers and is kept together.

yet I say they will complain, grudge, lament, and not be perswaded, but that they are troubled with an evill spirit, which is frequent in Germany, saith Rodericus, amongst the common sort: and to such as are most grievously affected, (for he makes three degrees of this disease in women) they are in despair, surely forespoken or bewitched, and in extremity of their dotage, (weary of their lives) some of them will attempt to make away themselves. Some think they see visions, confer with spirits and devils, they shall surely be damned, are afraid of some treachery, imminent danger, & the like, they will not speak, make answer to any question, but are almost distracted, mad, or stupid for the time, and by fits: and thus it holds them, as they are more or less affected, and as the inner humour is intended or remitted, or by outward objects and perturbations aggravated, solitariness, idleness, &c.	Yet, I say, they will complain, murmur and lament, and cannot be persuaded that they are not troubled by an evil spirit—a belief frequent among the common people in Germany, says Rodericus. Those most severely affected, for he distinguishes three degrees of this disease in women, are in despair, convinced that they have been cursed or bewitched; and in the extremity of their derangement, weary of life, some attempt to kill themselves. Some think they see visions and converse with spirits and devils, or that they will surely be damned. They fear treachery, imminent danger and the like; they will not speak or answer any question, but are almost distracted, mad or insensible for the time, in fits. This continues according to the severity of their condition, as the internal humour is intensified or diminished, or as it is aggravated by external objects and disturbances, solitude, idleness and the like.[4705]

[4705] Editor. “Forespoken” means cursed or bewitched; “stupid” here means stupefied or insensible. “Intended” and “remitted” mean intensified and diminished. The beliefs about spirits and damnation are reported as experiences within Burton’s category, not verified supernatural events. His three-degree scheme is attributed to Rodericus and remains uncollated.

Source page 203–204 Many other maladies there are incident to young women, out of that one and only cause above specified, may ferall diseases. I will not so much as mention their names, malancholy alone is the subject of my present discourse, from which I will not swerve. The severall cures of this infirmity, concerning Diet, which must be very sparing, Phlebotomy, Physick, internall, externall remedies, are at large in great variety in [4706]Rodericus à Castro, Sennertus, and Mercatus, which who so will, as occasion serves, may make use of.	Many other maladies befall young women from that single cause specified above: many dreadful diseases. I will not so much as mention their names. Melancholy alone is the subject of my present discussion, from which I will not depart. The various treatments for this infirmity—diet, which must be very sparing, bloodletting, medicines, internal and external remedies—are set out at length and in great variety by Rodericus à Castro, Sennertus and Mercatus, for anyone who wishes to make use of them as occasion requires.[4707]
Source page 204 But the best and surest remedy of all, is to see them well placed, and married to good husbands in due time, hinc illæ lachrymæ, that's the primary cause, and this the ready cure, to give them content to their desires. I write not this to patronize any wanton, idle flurt, lascivious or light huswives, which are too forward many times, unruly, and apt to cast away themselves on him that comes next, without all care, counsell, circumspection, and judgment.	But the best and surest remedy of all is to see them suitably settled and married to good husbands in due time: "hence those tears." That is the primary cause, and this the ready cure: to satisfy their desires. I do not write this to defend any wanton, idle flirt, any lustful or frivolous women, who are often too forward, unruly and ready to throw themselves away on the next man who comes along, without care, deliberation, caution or judgment.[4708]

[4708] Editor. Hinc illae lacrimae echoes Terence, Andria 126, where tears reveal an attachment to a woman. Burton applies it to the desires he identifies here. "Patronize" means defend; "huswives" is disparaging here, not a neutral description of married homemakers. His recommendation of marriage is retained as his own.

If religion, good discipline, honest education, wholesome exhortation, fair promises, fame and loss of good name cannot inhibit and deterre such, (which to chast and sober maids cannot chuse but avail much) labour and exercise, strict diet, rigor and threats may more opportunely be used, and are able of themselves to qualifie and divert ill disposed temperament.	If religion, sound discipline, decent upbringing, wholesome exhortation, fair promises, reputation and the loss of a good name cannot restrain and deter such women—things that must have great influence on chaste and sober unmarried women—labour and exercise, a strict diet, severity and threats may be more appropriately used, and can themselves moderate and redirect an ill-disposed temperament.[4709]
For seldom shall you see an hired servant, a poor handmaid, though ancient, that is kept hard to her work, and bodily labour, a course country wench troubled in this kind, but noble virgins, nice gentlewomen, such as are solitary and idle, live at ease, leade a life out of action and imployment, that fare well, in great houses and joviall companies, ill disposed peradventure of themselves, and not willing to make any resistance, discontented otherwise, of weak judgment, able bodies, and subject to passions (grandiores virgines, saith Mercatus, steriles & viduæ plerumque melancholicæ) such for the most part are misaffected, and prone to this disease.	For you will seldom see a hired servant or poor maid, even an older one, who is kept hard at work and bodily labour, or a rough country girl, troubled in this way. Rather, it is unmarried women of noble birth, delicate gentlewomen, those who are solitary and idle, live at ease without activity or employment, and eat well in great houses and convivial company; perhaps ill-disposed by nature and unwilling to resist, discontented in other ways, weak in judgment, strong in body and subject to passions. “Older unmarried women,” says Mercatus, “barren women and widows are generally melancholic.” These, for the most part, are the people affected and prone to this disease.[4710]

[4709] Editor. “Discipline” and “education” concern training and upbringing; “qualifie” means moderate. Burton recommends coercive measures for women he judges unwilling to restrain themselves. This belongs to his moral and physiological argument, rather than a present-day treatment proposal.

[4710] Editor. “Ancient” means older, “nice” delicate or fastidious, “fare well” eat well, and “able bodies” physically strong bodies. The contrast between labouring women and women of leisure is Burton’s class-based generalization. The Latin statement is translated in full within the sentence.

I do not so much pity them that may be otherwise eased, but those alone that out of a strong temperament, innate constitution, are violently carried away with this torrent of inward humours, and though very modest of themselves, sober, religious, vertuous, and well-given (as many so distressed maids are) yet cannot make resistance, these grievances will appear, this malady will take place, and now manifestly shews it self, and may not otherwise be helped.	I do not so much pity those who may be relieved in other ways, but those alone who, through a powerful temperament and inborn constitution, are violently swept away by this torrent of internal humours. Though personally very modest, sober, religious, virtuous and well disposed—as many unmarried women in such distress are—they cannot resist. These troubles will appear; this disorder will take hold and show itself plainly, and cannot otherwise be helped.[4711]
But where am I? Into what subject have I rushed? What have I to do with Nunnes, Maids, Virgins, Widows? I am a Batcheler my self, and lead a Monastick life in a Colledg, næ ego sane ineptus qui hæc dixerim, I confess 'tis an indecorum, and as Pallas a Virgin blushed, when Jupiter by chance spake of Love matters in her presence, and turn'd away her face; me reprimam, though my subject necessarily require it, I will say no more.	But where am I? Into what subject have I rushed? What have I to do with nuns, unmarried women, virgins and widows? I am a bachelor myself and lead a monastic life in a college: "I am certainly a fool to have said these things." I confess it is improper; and as the virgin Pallas blushed and turned her face away when Jupiter happened to speak of love in her presence, "I will restrain myself." Though my subject necessarily requires it, I will say no more.[4712]

[4711] Editor. Burton distinguishes those he blames for failing to resist from those whose inborn constitution, in his account, overcomes their intentions. "Well-given" means well disposed. This qualification complicates the blame expressed in the preceding paragraph without withdrawing it.

[4712] Editor. Burton presents himself as a bachelor living in a college. Pallas is Athena, the virgin goddess; Jupiter is Zeus. The specific narrative source for the blushing scene and the source of the Latin self-rebuke remain unidentified. Indecorum is a breach of propriety. The promised silence is immediately broken in the next paragraph.

And yet I must and will say something more, add a word or two in gratiam Virginum & Viduarum, in favour of all such distressed parties, in commiseration of their present estate. And as I cannot chuse but condole their mishap that labour of this infirmitie, and are destitute of help in this case, so must I needs inveigh against them that are in fault, more then manifest causes, and as bitterly tax those tyrannizing Pseudopolititians, superstitious orders, rash vows, hard-hearted parents, guardians, unnaturall friends, allies (call them how you will) those careless and stupid overseers, that out of worldly respects, covetousness, supine negligence, their own private ends (cum sibi sit interim benè) can so severely reject, stubbornly neglect, and impiously contemn, without all remorse and pitie, the tears, sighs, groans, and grievous miseries of such poor Souls committed to their charge.	And yet I must and will say something more, add a word or two "on behalf of virgins and widows," in favour of all such distressed people, out of compassion for their present condition. As I cannot help grieving for the misfortune of those who suffer from this infirmity and have no help, so I must denounce those at fault, its all-too-obvious causes. I must bitterly condemn those tyrannical sham statesmen, superstitious orders, rash vows, hard-hearted parents, guardians, unnatural friends and relatives—call them what you will—those careless and unfeeling overseers who, from worldly considerations, greed, utter negligence and their own private interests, "while all goes well with them meanwhile," can so harshly reject, stubbornly neglect and impiously despise, without remorse or pity, the tears, sighs, groans and grievous miseries of the poor souls committed to their care.[4713]

[4713] Editor. "Estate" means condition; "allies" includes relatives; "tax" means censure; "Pseudopolititians" are sham or false statesmen. The list mingles institutions, obligations and the people responsible for them. Burton's sympathy now turns into an attack on those who prevent relief or marriage.

Source page 204–205 How odious and abominable are these superstitious and rash vows of Popish Monasteries, so to bind and inforce men and women to vow virginitie, to lead a single life against the laws of nature, opposite to religion, policie, and humanity, so to starve, to offer violence, to suppress the vigor of youth, by rigorous statutes, severe laws, vaine perswasions, to debar them of that, to which by their innate temperature they are so furiously inclined, urgently carried, and sometimes precipitated, even irresistably led, to the prejudice of their souls health, and good estate of body and mind: And all for base and private respects, to maintain their gross superstition, to inrich themselves and their territories as they falsly suppose, by hindering some marriages, that the world be not full of beggers, and their parishes pestered with Orphanes; stupid politicians, hæccine fieri flagitia? ought these things so to be carried?	How odious and abominable are these superstitious and rash vows of papist monasteries: to bind and force men and women to vow virginity and lead a single life against the laws of nature, contrary to religion, good government and humanity; to starve them, do violence to them and suppress the vigour of youth through rigorous statutes, severe laws and empty arguments; to deny them that towards which their inborn constitution so fiercely inclines and urgently drives them, sometimes hurling them headlong and leading them irresistibly, to the harm of their souls' welfare and the sound condition of body and mind. All this for base and private interests: to maintain their gross superstition and enrich themselves and their territories, as they falsely suppose, by preventing certain marriages, so that the world may not fill with beggars or their parishes be burdened with orphans. Stupid politicians! "Can such outrages be committed?" Ought matters to be handled in this way?[4714]

[4714] Editor. "Popish" is Burton's hostile Protestant term for Roman Catholic; "papist" retains that force. "Policie" means public order; "temperature," bodily constitution. The starvation and violence concern enforced abstinence. His claims about institutional motives remain allegations. The Latin exclamation is translated before his gloss. Haeccine fieri flagitia also appears as an example of an independent infinitive in Lily's grammar, 1641, Latin part, page 92. This later witness establishes the schoolroom formula, not Burton's immediate source.

Source page 205 better marry then burn, saith the Apostle, but they are otherwise perswaded. They will by all means quench their neighbours house if it be on fire, but that fire of lust which breaks out into such lamentable flames, they will not take notice of, their own bowels oftentimes, flesh and bloud shall so rage and burn, and they will not see it: miserum est, saith Austin, seipsum non miserescere, & they are miserable in the meane time, that cannot pity themselves, the common good of all, and per consequens their own estates.	"Better to marry than to burn," says the Apostle, but they think otherwise. They will use every means to put out a fire in their neighbour's house, yet will take no notice of the fire of lust that breaks out in such lamentable flames. Often their own flesh and blood, their very children, will rage and burn in this way, and they refuse to see it. "It is wretched," says Augustine, "not to pity oneself"; and meanwhile they are wretched who cannot take pity on themselves, care for the common good of all, and "consequently" their own welfare.[4715]

[4715] Editor. The Apostle is Paul: compare 1 Corinthians 7:9. "Bowels" can mean one's own children or intimate kin, hence the rendering "their very children." The Augustinian maxim is not verbatim in the passage compared: Confessions 1.13.21 asks what is more miserable than a wretched person who does not pity himself, in a discussion of weeping for Dido. Burton applies a compressed form to the present argument.

For let them but consider what fearfull maladies, ferall diseases, gross inconveniences come to both sexes by this inforced temperance, it troubles me to think of, much more to relate those frequent aborts and murdring of infants in their Nunneries (read [4716]Kemnitius and others) their notorious fornications, those Spintrias, Tribadas, Ambubeias, &c. those rapes, incests, adulteries, masturbations, Sodomies, buggeries of Monkes and Friers. See Bales visitation of Abbies, [4717]Mercurialis, Rodericus à Castro, Peter Forestus, and divers physicians; I know their ordinarie Apologies and excuses for these things, sed viderint Politici, Medici, Theologi, I shall more opportunely meet with them [4718]elsewhere.	Let them consider what fearful maladies, dreadful diseases and grave harms come to both sexes through this enforced continence. It troubles me to think of, much more to recount, those frequent abortions and murders of infants in their nunneries—read Chemnitz and others—their notorious fornications, those sexual libertines, women who have sex with women, flute girls and the like; those rapes, incests, adulteries, masturbations, sodomies and buggeries of monks and friars. See Bale's visitation of abbeys, Mercurialis, Rodericus à Castro, Peter Forestus and various physicians. I know their usual defences and excuses for these things; "but let statesmen, physicians and theologians look to them." I shall deal with them more suitably elsewhere.[4719]
Illius viduæ, aut patronum Virginis hujus, Ne me forte putes, verbum non amplius addam.	Lest you should happen to think me the champion of that widow or this virgin, I shall add no further word.[4720]

[4717] Burton. Printed page 205, first star: "cap. de Satyr. et Priapis." Chapter on satyriasis and priapism.

[4718] Burton. Printed page 205, second star: "Part. 3. sect. 2. Memb. 5. Sub. 5." Part 3, section 2, member 5, subsection 5: Burton's internal cross-reference.

[4719] Editor. This is anti-monastic polemic, including allegations of sexual violence and infanticide, not independently verified reporting. Spintrias, Tribadas and Ambubeias are learned terms of sexual or social disparagement; the renderings preserve their force without assigning modern identities. Ambubeias evokes the classical flute girl, used contemptuously here. "Sodomy" and "buggery" are overlapping historical terms; neither supplies a precise modern classification. Kemnitius is Chemnitz; the printed medical locators and the Bale reference await bibliographical collation.

[4720] Editor. The couplet means that Burton will stop lest he be taken as a particular woman's advocate. Its closing words adapt Horace, Satires 1.1.120–21, where the speaker ends lest he seem to have plundered Crispinus's writings. The widow-and-virgin wording is not in those Horatian lines; its immediate source is unresolved. The modern version preserves two lines without forcing rhyme.

MEMB. 3. Immediate cause of these precedent Symptomes.	Member 3 Immediate cause of the preceding symptoms
TO give some satisfaction to melancholy men, that are troubled with these symptomes, a better means in my judgement cannot be taken, then to shew them the causes whence they proceed, not from divels, as they suppose, or that they are bewitched or forsaken of God, hear or see, &c. as many of them think, but from naturall and inward causes, that so knowing them, they may better avoid the effects, or at least endure them with more patience.	To give some reassurance to melancholic people troubled by these symptoms, no better course, in my judgment, can be taken than to show them the causes from which the symptoms proceed. They do not come from devils, as they suppose, nor mean that they are bewitched or forsaken by God, or that what they hear or see is as many of them believe, but arise from natural, internal causes. By knowing these, they may better avoid the effects, or at least endure them more patiently.[4721]
The most grievous and common symptomes and Fear are Sorrow, and that without a cause, to the wisest and discreetest men, in this malady not to be avoided. The reason why they are so Ætius discusseth at large, Tetrabib. 2.2. in his first probleme out of Galen, lib. 2. de causis sympt. 1. For Galen imputeth all to the cold that is black, and thinks that the spirits being darkned, and the substance of the brain cloudy and dark, all the objects thereof appear terrible, and the [4722]minde it self, by those dark, obscure, gross fumes, ascending from black humours, is in continuall darkness, fear and sorrow; divers terrible monstrous fictions in a thousand shapes & apparitions occurre, with violent passions, by which the brain and phantasie are troubled and eclipsed.	The most grievous and common symptoms are Fear and Sorrow, without a cause, which even the wisest and most judicious people cannot avoid in this disorder. Aetius discusses at length why this is so in Tetrabiblos 2.2, in his first problem, drawing on Galen, book 2, On the Causes of Symptoms, 1. Galen attributes everything to the cold that is black. He thinks that when the spirits are darkened and the substance of the brain is cloudy and dark, all its objects appear terrible. The mind itself, through those dark, obscure, dense fumes rising from black humours, remains in continual darkness, fear and sorrow. Terrible, monstrous fictions occur in a thousand shapes and apparitions, with violent passions that disturb and eclipse the brain and imagination.[4723]

[4721] Editor. "Satisfaction" means reassurance or an explanation that answers a doubt. Burton's compressed "hear or see, &c." is expanded syntactically on the right. His stated purpose is to replace fears of demonic or divine abandonment with an account of natural internal causes, so that knowledge may aid avoidance or endurance.

[4723] Editor. The scan prints "symptomes and Fear are Sorrow," an apparent transposition. It is retained on the left and reordered as "symptoms are Fear and Sorrow" on the right. "Without a cause" is soon qualified by Burton's distinction between an external object and an internal cause. "The cold that is black" remains literal rather than silently repaired. The compressed Aetius and Galen locators await collation.

Source page 205–206 [4724]Fracastorius lib. 2. de intellect. will have cold to be the cause of Fear and Sorrow; for such as are cold, are ill disposed to mirth, dull and heavy, by nature solitarie, silent; and not for any inward darkness (as Physicians think) for many melancholy men dare boldly be, continue, and walk in the dark, and delight in it: solum frigidi timidi: if they be hot, they are merry; and the more hot, the more furious, and void of fear, as we see in madmen: but this reason holds not, for then no melancholy, proceeding from choler adust, should fear.	Fracastorius, in book 2 On Understanding, would have cold be the cause of Fear and Sorrow. Those who are cold are indisposed to mirth, dull and heavy, naturally solitary and silent; this is not because of any internal darkness, as physicians think, for many melancholic people boldly remain and walk in the dark, and delight in it: "only the cold are timid." If they are hot, they are merry; and the hotter they are, the more furious and fearless, as we see in madmen. But this reasoning does not hold, for then no melancholic person whose condition proceeds from scorched choler should be afraid.[4725]

[4725] Editor. Cold and heat are bodily qualities in the humoral system. Adust choler is yellow bile supposedly altered by scorching. Burton presents Fracastorius's explanation and immediately objects that it fails to account for fear in a hot, scorched-humour condition. The Latin solum frigidi timidi is translated in place.

Source page 206 Averroes scoffs at Galen for his reasons, and brings five arguments to refell them: so doth Herc. de Saxoniâ, Tract. de melanch. cap. 3. assigning other causes, which are copiously censured and confuted by Ælianus Montaltus, cap. 5. & 6. Lod. Mercatus de Inter. morb. cur. lib. 1. cap. 17. Altomarus cap. 7. de mel. Guianerius tract. 15. c. 1. Bright cap. 17. Laurentius cap. 5. Valesius med. cont. lib. 5. con. 1.[4726] [4727]Distemperature they conclude, makes black juice, blackness obscures the spirits, the spirits obscured, cause fear and sorrow.	Averroes mocks Galen's reasons and offers five arguments to refute them. So does Hercules de Saxonia, in his Treatise on Melancholy, chapter 3, assigning other causes. These are extensively criticized and refuted by Aelianus Montaltus, chapters 5 and 6; Lodovicus Mercatus, On the Treatment of Internal Diseases, book 1, chapter 17; Altomarus, On Melancholy, chapter 7; Guianerius, treatise 15, chapter 1; Bright, chapter 17; Laurentius, chapter 5; and Valesius, Medical Controversies, book 5, controversy 1. They conclude that a disordered constitution produces black fluid; blackness obscures the spirits; and the obscured spirits cause fear and sorrow.[4728]

[4727] Burton. Printed page 206, e: "Intemperies facit succum nigrum, nigrities obscurat spiritum, obscuratio spiritus facit metum & tristitiam." A disordered constitution produces black fluid; blackness obscures the spirit; the obscuring of the spirit produces fear and sorrow.

Laurentius cap. 13. supposeth these black fumes offend especially the Diaphragma or Midriffe, and so per consequens the mind, which is obscured as [4729]the Sun by a cloud. To this opinion of Galen, almost all the Greeks and Arabians subscribe, the Latines new and old, internæ tenebræ offuscant animum, ut externæ nocent pueris, as children are affrighted in the dark, so are melancholy men at all times, [4730]as having the inward cause with them, & still carrying it about.	Laurentius, chapter 13, supposes these black fumes especially affect the diaphragm or midriff, and so "consequently" the mind, which is obscured as the Sun is by a cloud. Almost all the Greeks and Arabs, and Latin writers ancient and modern, subscribe to this opinion of Galen: "internal darkness obscures the mind, as external darkness harms children." Just as children are frightened in the dark, melancholic people are frightened at all times, having the internal cause within them and always carrying it about.[4731]
Which black vapors, whether they proceed from the black bloud about the heart, as T. W. Jes. thinks in his Treatise of the passions of the mind, or stomack, spleen, midriffe, or all the misaffected parts together, it boots not, they keep the mind in a perpetuall dungeon, and oppress it with continuall fears, anxieties, sorrows, &c.	Whether these black vapours proceed from the black blood around the heart, as T. W., the Jesuit, thinks in his Treatise of the Passions of the Mind, or from the stomach, spleen, midriff or all the disordered parts together, makes no difference. They keep the mind in a perpetual dungeon and oppress it with continual fears, anxieties, sorrows and the like.[4732]

[4729] Burton. Printed page 206, f: "Ut nubecula Solem offuscat. Constantinus lib. de melanch." As a little cloud obscures the Sun. Constantinus, book On Melancholy.

[4730] Burton. Printed page 206, g: "Altomarus c. 7. Causam timoris circumfert ater humor passionis materia, & atri spiritus perpetuam animæ domicilio offundunt noctem." Altomarus, chapter 7. Black humour, the material of the disorder, carries about the cause of fear, and dark spirits spread perpetual night over the dwelling of the soul.

[4731] Editor. The body names Laurentius, while the marginal cloud comparison cites Constantinus; both are retained. "Spirits" denotes physiological agents in this account. The Latin darkness comparison is translated before Burton's expanded analogy with frightened children.

[4732] Editor. "It boots not" means it makes no difference. T. W. Jes. denotes Thomas Wright, author of The Passions of the Minde in Generall. In the 1604 edition, book 2, chapter 3, pages 61–62, Wright explains sadness through melancholy blood collecting around the heart, weakening the spirits and drying the body. This verifies the cited physiological account, without establishing which edition Burton used. The perpetual dungeon is Burton's metaphor for inescapable suffering.

It is an ordinarie thing for such as are sound, to laugh at this dejected pusillanimity, and those other symptomes of melancholy, to make themselves merry with them, and to wonder at such, as toys and trifles, which may be resisted and withstood, if they will themselves: but let him that so wonders, consider with himself, that if a man should tell him on a sudden, some of his especial friends were dead, could he choose but grieve? or set him upon a steep rock, where he should be in danger to be precipitated, could he be secure? his heart would tremble for fear, and his head be giddy.	It is common for those who are well to laugh at this dejected faint-heartedness and the other symptoms of melancholy, to amuse themselves with them, and to marvel at such things as fancies and trifles that people could resist and withstand if only they chose. But let anyone who marvels in this way consider: if someone suddenly told him that some of his closest friends were dead, could he help grieving? Or if he were placed on a steep rock where he was in danger of falling, could he feel safe? His heart would tremble with fear and his head would be dizzy.[4733]
P. Byarus Tract. de pest. gives instance (as I have said) [4734]and put case (saith he) in one that walks upon a plank, if it lye on the ground, he can safely do it: but if the same plank be laid over some deep water, in stead of a bridge, he is vehemently moved, and 'tis nothing but his imagination, forma cadendi impressa, to which his other members and faculties obey.	P. Byarus, in his Treatise on Plague, gives an example, as I have mentioned: suppose, he says, someone walks along a plank. If it lies on the ground, he can do so safely; but if the same plank is laid over deep water as a bridge, he is powerfully disturbed. It is nothing but his imagination, "the impression of falling," which his other bodily parts and faculties obey.[4735]

[4733] Editor. "Sound" means well or healthy; "pusillanimity" faint-heartedness; "toys" fanciful trifles. Burton challenges ridicule and the assumption that sufferers can simply choose to resist. The grief and cliff examples ask the reader to imagine emotions that cannot be dismissed at will.

[4735] Editor. The name P. Byarus and the abbreviated treatise title remain as printed pending collation. Forma cadendi impressa means an impressed image or representation of falling. The margin says that the person will not cross the elevated beam; the body instead describes powerful disturbance. Both versions are retained.

Yea, but you infer, that such men have a just cause to fear, a true object of fear; so have melancholy men an inward cause, a perpetuall fume and darkness, causing fear, grief, suspicion, which they carry with them, an object which cannot be removed; but sticks as close, and is as inseparable as a shadow to a bodie, and who can expell, or over-run his shadow? remove heat of the liver, a cold stomack, weak spleen: remove those adust humours and vapours arising from them, black bloud from the heart, all outward perturbations, take away the cause, and then bid them not grieve nor fear, or be heavie, dull, lumpish, otherwise counsell can do little good; you may as well bid him that is sick of an ague, not to be adry; or him that is wounded, not to feel pain.	Yes, but you argue that such people have a just cause for fear, a real object of fear. So too do melancholic people have an internal cause: a perpetual fume and darkness producing fear, grief and suspicion, which they carry with them. It is an object that cannot be removed, but clings as closely and inseparably as a shadow to a body —and who can drive away or outrun his shadow? Remove the heat of the liver, the cold stomach, the weak spleen; remove those scorched humours and the vapours rising from them, the black blood from the heart and all external disturbances. Take away the cause, and then tell them not to grieve or fear, or be heavy, dull and sluggish. Otherwise advice can do little good. You might as well tell someone suffering from an ague not to be thirsty, or someone wounded not to feel pain.[4736]

[4736] Editor. “Counsell” means advice, not a modern therapeutic discipline; “adry” means thirsty; “lumpish” sluggish or dejected. An ague is a fever, often intermittent. Burton’s humoral causes are historical, while the structure of his argument is that suffering has causes and cannot be removed merely by commanding it to stop.

Source page 206–207 Suspicion follows Fear and Sorrow at heels, arising out of the same fountaine, so thinks [4737]Fracastorius, that Fear is the cause of Suspicion, and still they suspect some treachery, or some secret machination to be framed against them, still they distrust. Restlesnes proceeds from the same spring, variety of fumes makes them like & dislike. Solitarines, avoiding of light; that they are weary of their lives, hate the world, arise from the same causes, for their spirits and humours are opposite to light, fear makes them avoid company, and absent themselves, least they should be misused, hissed at, or overshoot themselves, which still they suspect.	Suspicion follows close on the heels of fear and sorrow, arising from the same source. So Fracastorius thinks: fear causes suspicion, and they constantly suspect that some treachery or secret plot is being contrived against them; they always distrust. Restlessness proceeds from the same source; a variety of fumes makes them like and dislike things. Solitude, avoidance of light, weariness of life and hatred of the world arise from the same causes, for their spirits and humours are opposed to light. Fear makes them avoid company and keep away, lest they be mistreated or hissed at, or go too far themselves, as they constantly fear.[4738]
Source page 207 They are prone to venery, by reason of wind. Angry, waspish, & fretting still, out of abundance of choler, which causeth fearfull dreams, and violent perturbations to them, both sleeping & waking: That they suppose they have no heads, flie, sink, they are pots, glasses, &c. is wind in their heads. [4739]Herc. de Saxonia doth ascribe this to the severall motions in the animall spirits, their dilation, contraction, confusion, alteration, tenebrosity, hot or cold distemperature, excluding all materiall humors.	They are prone to sexual desire because of wind. An abundance of choler makes them angry, irritable and continually fretting, causing frightening dreams and violent disturbances both asleep and awake. Their supposition that they have no heads, that they fly or sink, that they are pots or glasses, and so on, comes from wind in their heads. Hercules de Saxonia ascribes this to the various movements of the animal spirits: their expansion, contraction, confusion, alteration, darkness, and disordered heat or cold, excluding all material humours.[4740]

[4737] Burton. Printed page 206, i: “Lib. 2. de intellectione. Suspiciosi ob timorem & obliquum discursum, & semper inde putant sibi fieri insidias. Lauren. 5.” Book 2, On Understanding. Suspicious because of fear and distorted reasoning, they therefore always think plots are being laid against them. Laurentius, chapter 5.

[4738] Editor. “Overshoot themselves” means go too far or commit an indiscretion. “Spirits” here are physiological agents in the historical account. The opening sentence crosses printed pages 206–207; marginal i is attached to that sentence in full.

[4741]Fracastorius accounts it a thing worthy of inquisition, why they should entertain such false conceipts, as that they have horns, great noses, that they are birds, beasts, &c. why they should think themselves kings, lords, cardinals. For the first, [4742]Fracastorius gives two reasons: One is the disposition of the body: the other, the occasion of the phantasy, as if their eyes be purblind, their ears sing, by reason of some cold & rheume, &c. To the second, Laurentius answers, the imagination inwardly or outwardly moved, represents to the understanding, not incitements only; to favor the passion, or dislike, but a very intensive pleasure follows the passion, or displeasure, & the will & reason are captivated by delighting in it.	Fracastorius considers it worth investigating why they entertain such false notions as having horns or great noses, or being birds or beasts, and why they think themselves kings, lords or cardinals. For the first, Fracastorius gives two reasons: the disposition of the body and the occasion that prompts the imagination, as when their eyesight is dim or their ears ring because of some cold or rheum. To the second, Laurentius answers that imagination, stirred from within or without, presents the understanding with more than inducements to favour the passion or to dislike: intense pleasure follows the passion, or displeasure does, and will and reason are taken captive by delighting in it.[4743]
Why students and lovers are so often melancholy & mad, the Philosopher of [4744]Conimbra assigns this reason, because by a vehement and continuall meditation of that, wherewith they are affected, they fetch up the spirits into the brain, and with the heat brought with them, they incend it beyond measure: and the cells of the inner senses dissolve their temperature, which being dissolved, they cannot perform their offices as they ought.	The philosopher of Coimbra gives this reason why students and lovers are so often melancholy and mad: by intense and continual meditation on whatever affects them, they draw the spirits up into the brain; and with the heat these bring, they inflame it beyond measure. The chambers of the internal senses lose their balanced constitution, and once that is lost, they cannot perform their functions as they should.[4745]

[4741] Burton. Printed page 207, k: “Illud inquisitione dignum, cur tam falsa recipiant, habere se cornua, esse mortuos, nasutos, esse aves, &c.” It deserves investigation why they accept such false things: that they have horns, are dead, have great noses, are birds, and so on.

[4742] Burton. Printed page 207, l: “1. Dispositio corporis. 2. Occasio Imaginationis.” 1. The disposition of the body. 2. The occasion that prompts the imagination.

[4743] Editor. “Conceipts” are notions; “purblind” means dim-sighted; “rheum” is a bodily discharge associated here with a cold. The first explanation concerns altered bodily perceptions, the second imagined rank. Laurentius’s compressed account moves between pleasure and displeasure; the translation retains this difficulty rather than supplying a new theory.

[4744] Burton. Printed page 207, m: “In pro. li. de cœlo. Vehemens & assidua cogitatio rei erga quam afficitur, spiritus in cerebrum evocat.” In the proem to the book On the Heavens. Intense and continual thought about the object of one’s feeling draws the spirits into the brain.

[4745] Editor. The Coimbra reference belongs to the philosophical commentary tradition cited as Conimbricenses. The “cells” are imagined chambers of the internal senses, and “temperature” means the balance of bodily qualities. The exact proem and On Sleep locators await collation.

Why melancholy men are witty, which Aristotle hath long since maintained in his problems: and that [4746]all learned men, famous Philosophers, and Law-givers, ad unum ferè omnes Melancholici, have still been melancholy is a probleme much controverted. Jason Pratensis will have it understood of naturall melancholy, which opinion Melancthon inclines to, in his book de Anima, and Marcilius Ficinus de san. tuend. lib. 1. cap. 5. but not of the simple, for that makes men stupid, heavy, dull, being cold and dry, fearfull, fools, and solitary, but mixt with the other humors, flegme only excepted: and they not adust, [4747]but so mixt, as that blood be half, with little or no adustion, that they be neither too hot nor too cold.	Why melancholy people are intellectually gifted, as Aristotle long ago maintained in his Problems, and why learned men, famous philosophers and lawgivers have always been melancholy—"almost all, to a man, melancholic"—is a much-disputed question. Jason Pratensis takes this to mean natural melancholy, an opinion to which Melanchthon inclines in his book On the Soul, as does Marsilio Ficino in On Preserving Health, book 1, chapter 5. But not the unmixed humour: being cold and dry, that makes people stupefied, heavy, dull, fearful, foolish and solitary. It must be mixed with the other humours, except phlegm, and these must not be scorched; rather, blood should make up half the mixture, with little or no scorching, so that they are neither too hot nor too cold.[4748]

[4746] Burton. Printed page 207, n: "Melancholici ingeniosi omnes, summi viri in artibus & disciplinis, sive circum imperatoriam aut reip. disciplinam omnes ferè melancholici, Aristoteles." All melancholics are intellectually gifted; distinguished men in the arts and disciplines, or in military command or government, are almost all melancholic. Aristotle.

[4747] Burton. Printed page 207, o: "Adeo misceantur, ut sit duplum sanguinis ad reliqua duo." Let them be mixed so that there is twice as much blood as the other two.

[4748] Editor. "Witty" and "wit" mean intellectually gifted and intellectual capacity here. Compare Problems 30.1, opening at 953a, in the collection attributed to Aristotle: it asks why people distinguished in philosophy, politics, poetry and the arts are melancholic. Natural melancholy is constitutional black bile; "simple" means unmixed and "adust" scorched. The body's half-blood mixture and the margin's double proportion remain distinct. The Pratensis, Melanchthon, Ficino and Abano passages still require collation.

Aponensis cited by Melancthon, thinks it proceeds from melancholy adust, excluding all naturall melancholy as too cold. Laurentius condemnes his Tenent, because adustion of humours makes men mad, as lime burns when water is cast on it. It must be mixt with blood, & somewhat adust, and so that old Aphorisme of Aristotle may be verified, Nullum magnum ingenium sine mixturâ dementiæ, no excellent wit without a mixture of madnes.	Aponensis, cited by Melanchthon, thinks it proceeds from scorched melancholy, excluding all natural melancholy as too cold. Laurentius rejects this doctrine because scorching the humours makes people mad, just as lime burns when water is thrown on it. It must be mixed with blood and somewhat scorched; and so that old aphorism of Aristotle may be confirmed: "No great intellect without an admixture of madness"—no excellent mind without a mixture of madness.[4749]
Source page 207–208 Fracastorius shal decide the controversy, [4750]Phlegmatick are dull: Sanguine lively, pleasant, acceptable and merry, but not witty: Cholerick are too swift in motion, & furious, impatient of contemplation, deceitfull wits: Melancholy men have the most excellent wits, but not all, this humour may be hot or cold, thick or thin; if too hot, they are furious and mad: if too cold, dull, stupid, timorous and sad: if temperate, excellent, rather inclining to that extreme of heat, then cold.	Let Fracastorius decide the controversy. Phlegmatic people are dull; sanguine people lively, pleasant, agreeable and merry, but not intellectually gifted. Choleric people are too quick in their movements and furious, unable to endure contemplation, with deceptive minds. Melancholy people have the finest minds, but not all of them: this humour may be hot or cold, thick or thin. If too hot, they are furious and mad; if too cold, dull, stupefied, timid and sad; if temperate, excellent, tending towards the extreme of heat rather than cold.[4751]

[4751] Editor. These are the four humoral temperaments, and the claims about intelligence are those Burton reports. Fracastorius qualifies the praise of melancholy by the humour's temperature. "Deceitfull wits" is retained as "deceptive minds"; it is not silently replaced by a diagnosis or a modern personality category.

Source page 208 This sentence of his will agree with that of Heraclitus, a dry light makes a wise mind, temperate heat & drines, are the chief causes of a good wit; therefore saith Ælian, an Elephant is the wisest of all bruit beasts, because his brain is driest, & ob atræ bilis copiam: this reason Cardan approves subtil. l. 12. Io. Baptista Silvaticus, a physician of Milan, in his first controversy, hath copiously handled this question: Rulandus in his problems, Cælius Rhodiginus lib. 17. Valleriola 6to narrat. med. Herc. de Saxonia. Tract. posth. de mel. cap. 3. Lodovicus Mercatus de inter. morb. cur. lib. cap. 17. Baptista Porta Physiog. lib. 1. c. 13. and many others.	This judgment agrees with that of Heraclitus: a dry light makes a wise mind. Moderate heat and dryness are the chief causes of a good intellect. Therefore, says Aelian, the elephant is the wisest of all brute beasts, because its brain is driest, and "because of its abundance of black bile"; Cardan approves this explanation in On Subtlety, book 12. Giovanni Battista Silvatico, a physician of Milan, has discussed this question extensively in his first controversy; so have Rulandus in his Problems; Caelius Rhodiginus, book 17; Valleriola, sixth Medical Narrative; Hercules de Saxonia, posthumous Treatise on Melancholy, chapter 3; Lodovicus Mercatus, On the Treatment of Internal Diseases, book unspecified, chapter 17; Baptista Porta, Physiognomy, book 1, chapter 13; and many others.[4752]

[4752] Editor. "Sentence" means judgment; "bruit beasts," nonhuman animals. Compare Heraclitus, fragment B118, transmitted by Stobaeus 3.5.8, on the wise dry soul. The "dry light" wording belongs to its textual tradition, discussed in Burnet's note; Burton's intermediary remains unidentified. Aelian's precise elephant passage remains unlocated. The Mercatus reference prints lib. without a book number; none is supplied. Valleriola's 6to means sixth. The remaining medical citations await collation.

Weeping, sighing, laughing, itching, trembling, sweating, blushing, hearing & seeing strange noyses, visions, wind, crudity, are motions of the body, depending upon these precedent motions of the mind: Neither are tears, affections, but actions (as Scaliger holds) [4753]the voice of such as are afraid, trembles, because the heart is shaken (Conimb. prob. 6. sec. 3. de som.) why they stut or faulter in their speech, Mercurialis and Montaltus cap. 17. give like reasons out of Hippocrates, [4754]drines, which makes the nerves of the tongue torpid. Fast speaking, (which is a symptome of some few) Ætius will have caused [4755]from abundance of wind, and swiftness of imagination: [4756]baldness comes from excess of drines, hirsuteness from a dry temperature.	Weeping, sighing, laughing, itching, trembling, sweating, blushing, hearing strange noises and seeing visions, wind and indigestion are bodily movements depending on these preceding movements of the mind. Tears are not affections but actions, as Scaliger holds. The voice of those who are afraid trembles because the heart is shaken (the Coimbra commentary, problem 6, section 3, On Sleep). Mercurialis and Montaltus, chapter 17, give similar explanations from Hippocrates for stuttering or faltering in speech: dryness makes the nerves of the tongue torpid. Rapid speech, a symptom in a few, Aetius attributes to abundant wind and quickness of imagination. Baldness comes from excessive dryness, hairiness from a dry constitution.[4757]

[4756] Burton. Printed page 208, t: “Calvities ob siccitatis excessum.” Baldness from an excess of dryness.

[4757] Editor. The compressed “hearing & seeing strange noyses, visions” is clarified as hearing noises and seeing visions. “Affections” and “actions” distinguish states undergone from activities. “Stut” means stutter; “crudity” is imperfect digestion. The causes given for speech, baldness and hairiness are historical physiological claims.

The cause of much waking in a dry brain, continuall meditation, discontent, fears & cares, that suffer not the mind to be at rest, incontinency is from wind, and an hot liver, Montanus cons. 26. Rumbling in the guts, is caused from wind, and wind from ill concoction, weakness of naturall heat, or a distempered heat and cold; [4758]Palpitation of the heart from vapours, heaviness and aking from the same cause. That the belly is hard, wind is a cause, and of that leaping in many parts. Rednes of the face, & itching, as if they were flea-bitten, or stung with pis-mires, from a sharp subtile wind. [4759]Cold sweat from vapours arising from the Hypocondries, which pitch upon the skin; leanness for want of good nourishment.	The cause of prolonged wakefulness is a dry brain, continual thought, discontent, fears and cares that give the mind no rest. Sexual incontinence comes from wind and a hot liver: Montanus, consultation 26. Rumbling in the bowels is caused by wind, and wind by poor digestion, weakness of natural heat, or disordered heat and cold. Palpitation of the heart comes from vapours, and heaviness and aching from the same cause. Wind causes the hardness of the belly and the jumping sensations in various parts. Redness of the face and itching, as though bitten by fleas or stung by ants, come from a sharp, subtle wind. Cold sweat comes from vapours rising from the hypochondria and settling on the skin; leanness, from lack of good nourishment.[4760]
Why their appetite is so great, [4761]Ætius answers: Os ventris frigescit, cold in those inner parts, cold belly, & hot liver, causeth crudity, and intention proceeds from perturbations, [4762]our soul for want of spirits cannot attend exactly to so many intentive operations, being exhaust, & oversway'd by passion, she cannot consider the reasons which may disswade her from such affections.	Why their appetite is so great, Aetius answers: "The mouth of the stomach grows cold." Cold in those internal parts, a cold belly and hot liver, causes indigestion; and tension proceeds from disturbances. Our soul, lacking spirits, cannot attend precisely to so many operations requiring concentration. Exhausted and overmastered by passion, she cannot consider the reasons that might dissuade her from such affections.[4763]

[4761] Burton. Printed page 208, y: "Tetrab. 2. ser. 2. cap. 10." Tetrabiblos, book 2, division 2, chapter 10.

[4762] Burton. Printed page 208, z: "Ant. Lodovicus prob. lib. 1. sect. 5. de atrabiliariis." Antonius Lodovicus, Problems, book 1, section 5, on melancholics.

[4763] Editor. Os ventris is the mouth or opening of the stomach. "Intention" here means tension or strain; this passage illustrates that obsolete sense in Wiktionary's intention entry. It does not mean purpose. "Intentive" describes operations requiring concentrated attention. The original's feminine personification of the soul is retained.

[4764]Bashfulness and blushing, is a passion proper to men alone, and is not only caused for [4765]some shame and ignominy, or that they are guilty unto themselves of some fowle fact committed, but as [4766]Fracastorius will determines, ob defectum proprium, & timorem, from fear, and a conceit of our defects; The face labours and is troubled at his presence that sees our defects, and nature willing to help, sends thither heat, heat draws the subtilest bloud, and so we blush. They that are bold, arrogant, & careless, seldome or never blush, but such as are fearfull.	Bashfulness and blushing are a passion peculiar to human beings. They are not caused only by shame and disgrace, or by consciousness of some foul deed committed, but, as Fracastorius determines, “because of one’s own deficiency and fear”: from fear and an awareness of our defects. The face struggles and is troubled in the presence of someone who sees our defects; nature, seeking to help, sends heat there; heat draws the finest blood, and so we blush. The bold, arrogant and careless seldom or never blush; the fearful do.[4767]

[4765] Burton. Printed page 208, b: “Ob ignominiam aut turpitudinem facti, &c.” Because of disgrace or the shamefulness of a deed, and so on.

[4766] Burton. Printed page 208, c: “De Symp. & Antip. cap. 12. laborat facies ob præsentiam ejus qui defectum nostrum videt, & natura quasi opem latura calorem illuc mittit, calor sanguinem trahit, unde rubor; audaces non rubent, &c.” On Sympathy and Antipathy, chapter 12. The face struggles in the presence of someone who sees our deficiency; nature, as though bringing help, sends heat there; heat draws blood, hence redness. The bold do not blush, and so on.

[4767] Editor. “Proper to men alone” means peculiar to human beings. “Fact” means deed; “conceit” awareness or conception. The left retains the printed grammatical fault “will determines,” corrected to “determines” on the right. The passage distinguishes blushing from proof of moral guilt.

Source page 208–209 Anthonius Lodovicus, in his book de pudore, will have this subtil bloud to arise in the face, not so much for the reverence of our betters in presence, [4768]but for joy and pleasure, or if any thing at unawares shall pass from us, a sudden accident, occurse, or meeting: (which Disarius in [4769]Macrobius confirms) any object heard or seen, for blind men never blush, as Dandinus observes, the night & darkness make men impudent. Or that we be staid before our betters, or in company we like not, or if any thing molest and offend us, erubescentia turnes to rubor, blushing to a continuate redness.	Antonius Lodovicus, in his book On Shame, holds that this fine blood rises in the face not so much from reverence in the presence of our superiors, but from joy and pleasure, or if something escapes us unawares, or at a sudden accident, encounter or meeting—as Disarius in Macrobius confirms—or at anything heard or seen. For blind people never blush, as Dandinus observes; night and darkness make people shameless. Or if we are detained before our superiors, or in company we dislike, or something troubles and offends us, "the act of blushing turns to redness": blushing becomes a lasting flush.[4770]

[4768] Burton. Printed page 208, d: "Ob gaudium & voluptatem foras exit sanguis, aut ob melioris reverentiam, aut ob subitum occursum, aut si quid incautius exciderit." Blood comes outward because of joy and pleasure, or reverence for a superior, or a sudden encounter, or if something has slipped out unguardedly.

[4769] Burton. Printed page 208, dagger: "Com. in Arist. de anima. Cæci ut plurimum impudentes, nox facit impudentes." Commentary on Aristotle's On the Soul. Blind people are for the most part shameless; night makes people shameless.

[4770] Editor. "Betters" are social superiors; "occurse" is an encounter; "staid" means detained. The marginal commentary citation belongs to the discussion of blindness and darkness, although its printed body anchor is at Macrobius. Burton's absolute statement about blindness and blushing is retained as a historical claim. Erubescentia and rubor contrast the act of blushing with settled redness.

Source page 209 [4771]Sometimes the extremity of the ears tingle, and are red, sometimes the whole face, Etsi nihil vitiosum commiseris, as Lodovicus holds: though Aristotle is of opinion, omnis pudor ex vitio commisso, All shame for some offence. But we finde otherwise, it may as well proceed from fear, from force and inexperience, (so [4772]Dandinus holds) as vice; a hot liver, saith Duretus (notis in Hollerium): [4773]From a hot brain, from wind, the lungs heated, or after drinking of wine, strong drink, perturbations, &c.	Sometimes the tips of the ears tingle and redden, sometimes the whole face, "even if you have done nothing wrong," as Lodovicus holds; although Aristotle's opinion is that "all shame comes from a fault committed": all shame from some offence. But we find otherwise. It may come as readily from fear, force and inexperience, as Dandinus holds, as from wrongdoing; from a hot liver, says Duretus in his notes on Hollerius; from a hot brain, wind, heated lungs, or after drinking wine or strong drink, from emotional disturbances, and so on.[4774]

[4771] Burton. Printed page 209, e: "Alexander Aphrodisiensis, makes all bashfulness a vertue, eamque se refert in seipso experiri solitum, etsi esset admodum senex." Alexander of Aphrodisias makes all bashfulness a virtue, "and reports that he was accustomed to experience it in himself, although he was very old."

[4772] Burton. Printed page 209, star: "Com. in Arist. de anima, tam à vi & inexperientia quam à vitio." Commentary on Aristotle's On the Soul: as much from force and inexperience as from wrongdoing.

[4773] Burton. Printed page 209, f (dagger in the body): "Sæpe post cibum apti ad ruborem, ex potu vini, ex timore sæpe & ab hepate calido, cerebro calido, &c." Often prone to redness after food, from drinking wine, often from fear, and from a hot liver, a hot brain, and so on.

[4774] Editor. The marginal e includes both Burton's English and Latin; the English is preserved verbatim and the Latin translated. Dandinus's vis is rendered "force," matching Burton's English; its specific sense awaits collation. The margin marked f corresponds to a dagger in the body. The disagreement over whether shame presupposes an offence remains explicit.

Laughter what it is, saith [4775]Tully, how caused where, and so suddenly breaks out, that desirous to stay it, we cannot, how it comes to possess and stirre our face, veines, eyes, countenance, mouth, sides, let Democritus determine. The cause that it often affects melancholy men so much, is given by Gomesius lib. 3. de sale genial. cap. 18. abundance of pleasant vapours, which in sanguine melancholy especially, break from the heart, [4776]and tickle the midriffe, because it is transverse and full of nerves: by which titillation the sense being moved, and arteries distended, or pulled, the spirits from thence move and possess the sides, vaines, countenance, eyes. See more in Jossius de risu & fletu, Vives 3 de Animâ. Tears, as Scaliger defines, proceed from grief and pity, [4777]or from the heating of a moist brain, for a dry cannot weep.	What laughter is, says Cicero, how and where it is caused, and how it bursts out so suddenly that we cannot stop it though we wish to; how it comes to seize and stir our face, veins, eyes, countenance, mouth and sides—let Democritus determine. Gomesius, On Festive Wit, book 3, chapter 18, explains why it often affects melancholy people so strongly: an abundance of pleasant vapours, especially in sanguine melancholy, breaks out from the heart and tickles the diaphragm because it lies across the body and is full of nerves. This tickling moves the sense and stretches or pulls the arteries; the spirits then move into and take possession of the sides, veins, face and eyes. See further Jossius, On Laughter and Weeping, and Vives, On the Soul, book 3. Tears, as Scaliger defines them, proceed from grief and pity, or from the heating of a moist brain, for a dry one cannot weep.[4778]

[4775] Burton. Printed page 209, g: “2. De oratore, quid ipse risus, quo pacto concitatur, ubi sit, &c.” On the Orator, book 2: what laughter itself is, how it is aroused, where it is, and so on.

[4776] Burton. Printed page 209, h: “Diaphragma titillant, quia transversum & nervosum, quia titillatione moto sensu atque arteriis distentis, spiritus inde latera, venas, os, oculos occupant.” They tickle the diaphragm because it is transverse and full of nerves; because the sense is moved by tickling and the arteries stretched, the spirits then occupy the sides, veins, mouth and eyes.

[4777] Burton. Printed page 209, i: “Ex calefactione humidi cerebri: nam ex sicco lachrymæ non fluunt.” From the heating of a moist brain: tears do not flow from a dry one.

[4778] Editor. “Tully” is Cicero. Compare On the Orator 2.235, where the physical explanation of laughter is left to Democritus. “Midriffe” is the diaphragm; “titillation” tickling. De sale geniali is rendered descriptively as On Festive Wit, not as a verified published English title. The accounts of laughter and tears attributed to Gomesius, Jossius, Vives and Scaliger remain uncollated.

That they see and hear so many phantasmes, chimeræs, noyses, visions, &c. as Fienus hath discoursed at large in his book of imagination, & [4779]Lavater de spectris part. 1. cap. 2. 3. 4. their corrupt phantasie makes them see & hear that which indeed is neither heard nor seen, Qui multum jejunant, aut noctes ducunt insomnes, they that much fast, or want sleep, as melancholy or sick men commonly do, see visions, or such as are weak-sighted, very timorous by nature, mad, distracted, or earnestly seek. Sabini quod volunt somniant, as the saying is, they dream of that they desire.	As Fienus discusses at length in his book on imagination, and Lavater in On Spectres, part 1, chapters 2, 3 and 4, their disordered imagination makes them see and hear so many phantasms, chimeras, noises, visions and the like: things that in reality are neither heard nor seen. “Those who fast much or pass sleepless nights”—those who fast a great deal or lack sleep, as melancholy or sick people commonly do—see visions; so do people with weak eyesight, those very timid by nature, mad, distracted, or searching eagerly. “The Sabines dream what they wish”: as the saying goes, they dream of what they desire.[4780]
Like Sarmiento the Spaniard, who when he was sent to discover the Streights of Magellan, and Confine places, by the Prorex of Peru, standing on the top of an Hill, Amænissimam planitiem despicere sibi visus fuit, ædificia magnifica, quamplurimos Pagos, altas Turres, splendida Templa, and brave Cities, built like ours in Europe, not saith mine [4781]Author, that there was any such thing, but that he was vanissimus & nimis credulus, and would fain have had it so.	Like Sarmiento the Spaniard, who was sent by the viceroy of Peru to explore the Straits of Magellan and neighbouring places. Standing on a hilltop, “he thought he looked down upon a most delightful plain, magnificent buildings, very many villages, lofty towers and splendid temples,” and fine cities built like ours in Europe. Not, says my author, that any such things existed, but that he was “utterly fanciful and excessively credulous” and very much wanted it to be so.[4782]

[4779] Burton. Printed page 209, k: “Res mirandas imaginantur: & putant se videre quæ nec vident, nec audiunt.” They imagine extraordinary things and think they see what they neither see nor hear.

[4780] Editor. “Phantasms” and “chimeras” are imagined appearances. Sabini quod volunt somniant is translated literally before Burton’s general gloss. Compare Festus, De Verborum Significatione, under Sabini: the fragmentary entry partly restores the proverb and names Sinnius Capito. Piccart, Observationes historico-politicae 3.7, gives the full wording and attributes it to Festus. Neither comparison identifies Burton’s intermediary. The object of “earnestly seek” remains unstated.

[4781] Burton. Printed page 209, dagger: “Laet. lib. 13. cap. 2. descript. Indiæ Occident.” Laet, Description of the West Indies, book 13, chapter 2.

[4782] Editor. “Confine places” means neighbouring regions; “Prorex” viceroy; “brave” splendid. The Latin visual catalogue is translated in full, then Burton’s English continuation retained. The report and judgment about Sarmiento come through the cited Laet, not independent verification of the voyage.

Or as [4783]Lod. Mercatus proves, by reason of inward vapours, and humours from bloud, choler, &c. diversly mixt, they apprehend and see outwardly, as they suppose, divers images, which indeed are not. As they that drink wine think all runs round, when it is in their own brain; so is it with these men, the fault and cause is inward, as Galen affirmes, [4784]mad men and such as are near death, quas extra se videre putant Imagines, intra oculos habent, 'tis in their brain, which seemes to be before them; the brain as a concave glas reflects solid bodies. Senes etiam decrepiti cerebrum habent concavum & aridum, ut imaginentur se videre saith [4785]Boissardus, quæ non sunt, old men are too frequently mistaken and dote in like case:	Or, as Lodovicus Mercatus argues, internal vapours and humours arising from blood, choler and so on, mixed in different ways, cause them to perceive and seemingly see outside themselves various images that do not in fact exist. As wine drinkers think everything is spinning when the disturbance is in their own brain, so it is with these people: the fault and cause are internal. As Galen affirms, mad people and those near death "have within their eyes the images they think they see outside themselves." What seems to be before them is in their brain; the brain reflects solid bodies like a concave mirror. "Even decrepit old people have a hollow and dry brain, so that they imagine they see," says Boissardus, "things that do not exist." Old people too are often mistaken and mentally confused in this way.[4786]

[4783] Burton. Printed page 209, first star after the Laet reference: "Lib. 1. ca. 17. cap. de mel." Book 1, chapter 17, chapter on melancholy.

[4784] Burton. Printed page 209, l: "Insani, & qui morti vicini sunt, res quas extra se videre putant, intra oculos habent." Mad people and those near death have within their eyes the things they think they see outside themselves.

[4785] Burton. Printed page 209, last star: "Cap. 10. de Spirit. apparitione." Chapter 10, On the Apparition of Spirits.

Source page 209–210 or as he that looketh through a piece of red glass, judgeth every thing he sees to be red; corrupt vapours mounting from the body to the head, and distilling again from thence to the eyes, when they have mingled themselves with the watry crystal which receiveth the shadows of things to be seen, make all things appear of the same colour which remains in the humour that overspreds our sight, as to melancholy men all is black, to phlegmatick all white &c. Or else as before the Organs corrupt by a corrupt phantasy, as Lemnius lib. 1. cap. 16. well quotes, [4787]cause a great agitation of spirits, and humors, which wander to and fro in all the creeks of the brain, and cause such apparations before their eyes.	Or, just as someone looking through red glass judges everything red, corrupt vapours rise from the body to the head and distil from there back into the eyes. Once mixed with the watery crystal that receives the images of visible things, they make everything appear the colour of the humour that spreads over our sight: to melancholy people everything is black, to phlegmatic people white, and so on. Or else, as before, organs corrupted by a corrupted imagination—as Lemnius aptly observes in book 1, chapter 16—cause a great agitation of spirits and humours, which wander to and fro through every recess of the brain and produce such apparitions before their eyes.[4788]
Source page 210 One thinks he reads something written in the moon, as Pythagoras is said to have done of old, another smels brimstone, hears Cerberus bark: Orestes now mad supposed he saw the furies tormenting him, and his mother still ready to run upon him.	One thinks he reads something written in the moon, as Pythagoras is said to have done long ago; another smells sulphur or hears Cerberus bark. Orestes, now mad, imagined he saw the Furies tormenting him and his mother always ready to rush at him.[4789]

[4787] Burton. Printed page 210, m: “De occult. Nat. mirac.” On the Hidden Wonders of Nature.

[4788] Editor. “Watry crystal” evokes the transparent ocular medium that receives images in this explanation; “shadows” means images or appearances. “Creeks” are recesses. The printed “Organs corrupt” is read as organs corrupted, with no additional cause introduced.

[4789] Editor. Brimstone is sulphur; Cerberus is the hound of the classical underworld. Orestes is pursued by the Furies after killing his mother, Clytemnestra. The Pythagoras moon-reading story is retained as a report whose precise source is unresolved.

So Pentheus (in Bacchis Euripidis) saw two suns, two Thebes, his brain alone was troubled. Sickness is an ordinarie cause of such sights. Cardan subtil. 8. Mens ægra laboribus & jejuniis fracta, facit eos videre, audire, &c. And. Osiander beheld strange visions, and Alexander ab Alexandro both, in their sickness, which he relates de rerum varietat. lib. 8 cap. 44. Albategnius that noble Arabian on his death bed, saw a ship ascending and descending, which Fracastorius records of his friend Baptista Tirrianus.	So Pentheus, in Euripides' Bacchae, saw two suns and two cities of Thebes: his brain alone was disturbed. Sickness is a common cause of such sights. Cardan, On Subtlety, book 8: "A sick mind, broken by labour and fasting, makes them see and hear," and so on. Both Andreas Osiander and Alexander ab Alexandro saw strange visions during illness, which he relates in On the Variety of Things, book 8, chapter 44. Albategnius, that distinguished Arabian, saw a ship rising and falling on his deathbed; Fracastorius records the same of his friend Baptista Tirrianus.[4791]

[4791] Editor. Compare Euripides, Bacchae 918–924: Pentheus sees two suns and two cities of Thebes, and Dionysus addresses his altered sight. Burton's "his brain alone was troubled" is his own naturalizing account of the dramatic event. "He relates" refers in context to Cardan. The reports about Osiander, Alexander, Albategnius and Tirrianus await collation and are not independently authenticated.

Weak sight and vaine perswasion withall, may effect as much, and second causes concurring, as an oare in water makes a refraction, and seems bigger, bended double, &c. The thickness of the aire may cause such effects, or any object not well discerned in the dark, fear and phantasie will suspect to be a Ghost, a devil, &c. [4792]Quod nimis miseri timent, hoc facile credunt, we are apt to beleeve, and mistake in such cases. Marcellus Donatus, lib. 2. cap. 1. brings in a storie out of Aristotle, of one Antepheron which likely saw wheresoever he was, his own image in the aire, as in a glass.	Weak eyesight, together with a groundless conviction, may have the same effect when secondary causes combine, as an oar in water is refracted and seems larger, bent in two, and so on. Thick air may cause such effects; or fear and imagination will suspect any object imperfectly seen in the dark to be a ghost or devil. "What the wretched greatly fear, they readily believe": we are prone to belief and error in such cases. Marcellus Donatus, book 2, chapter 1, introduces a story from Aristotle about a certain Antepheron who apparently saw his own image in the air, as in a mirror, wherever he was.[4793]
Vitellio lib. 10. perspect. hath such another instance of a familiar acquaintance of his, that after the want of three or four nights sleep, as he was riding by a river side, saw another riding with him, and using all such gestures as he did, but when more light appeared, it vanished. Eremites and Anachorites have frequently such absurd visions, revelations, by reason of much fasting, & bad diet, many are deceived by legerdemain, as Scot hath well shewed in his book of the discovery of witchcrafts, and Cardan subtil. 18.	Witelo, in book 10 of his Optics, gives another such example of a close acquaintance who, after going without sleep for three or four nights, saw someone riding beside him along a riverbank and making all the same gestures. When more light appeared, the figure vanished. Hermits and anchorites frequently have such absurd visions and revelations because of much fasting and poor diet. Many are deceived by sleight of hand, as Scot has well shown in his Discovery of Witchcraft, and Cardan in On Subtlety, book 18.[4794]

[4792] Burton. Printed page 210, n in the margin (o in the body): "Seneca. Quod metuunt nimis, nunquam amoveri posse, nec tolli putant." Seneca. What they fear too much, they think can never be removed or taken away.

[4793] Editor. In Seneca, Hercules Furens 313–315, Megara says volunt, "wish"; Amphitryon replies about fear. Burton's body substitutes timent, "fear." His margin quotes the reply, with amoveri against the consulted moveri, and is labelled n against body o. These differences remain intact. The comparison verifies the distinct speakers and wording; it does not establish Burton's immediate edition. Antepheron and the Aristotle/Donatus reference still require collation.

[4794] Editor. "Perspectives" and perspectiva concern optics; Vitellio is Witelo. Anchorites are religious recluses; legerdemain is sleight of hand. Burton offers sleep loss, fasting and deception as explanations of reported visions. The particular Witelo anecdote and the Scot and Cardan passages remain uncollated.

Glow-worms, fiery apparitions, meteors and the will-o'-the-wisp, which Pliny, book 2, chapter 37, calls Castor and Pollux, and many such things appear on marshy ground, around churchyards, in damp valleys or where battles have been fought; read their causes in Goclenius, Velcurius, Finkius and others. Such scares are often contrived to frighten children with squibs, rotten wood and so on, or to make people look dead, "larger than usual," bigger, smaller, fairer or uglier: "to make those standing nearby appear headless, entirely on fire, or in the form of demons, take the hairs of a black dog," and so on, says Albertus.[4796]

Source page 211 And so 'tis ordinarie to see strange uncouth sights by Catoptricks; who knows not that if in a dark roome, the light be admitted at one only little hole, and a paper or glass put upon it, the sun shining, will represent on the opposite wal, all such objects as are illuminated by his rayes? with Concave and Cylinder glasses, we may reflect any shape of men, divels, anticks, (as magicians most part do, to gull a silly spectator in a dark roome) we will ourselves, & that hanging in the aire, when 'tis nothing but such an horrible image as [4797]Agrippa demonstrates, placed in another roome.	And so strange, unfamiliar sights are commonly seen through catoptrics. Who does not know that if light is admitted into a dark room through a single small hole, with paper or glass placed over it, the shining sun will project onto the opposite wall all the objects illuminated by its rays? With concave and cylindrical mirrors we can reflect whatever shapes of people, devils or grotesques we please, as magicians commonly do to trick a gullible spectator in a dark room, and make them seem suspended in the air; when there is nothing but a frightening image, such as Agrippa describes, placed in another room.[4798]
Roger Bacon of old is said to have represented his own image walking in the aire by this art, though no such thing appear in his perspectives. But most part it is in the brain that deceives them, although I may not deny, but that oftentimes the divel deludes them, takes his opportunity to suggest, and represent vain objects to melancholy men, and such as are ill affected.	Roger Bacon is said to have used this art long ago to make his own image appear to walk in the air, although nothing of the kind appears in his writings on optics. But for the most part, what deceives them is in the brain; although I cannot deny that the devil often deludes them, taking his opportunity to suggest and present unreal objects to melancholy people and those who are ill.[4799]

[4797] Burton. Printed page 211, dagger: "Lib. 1. occult. philos. Imperiti homines dæmonum & umbrarum imagines videre se putant, quum nihil sint aliud, quam simulacra animæ expertia." Occult Philosophy, book 1. Inexperienced people think they see images of demons and shades, when these are only images devoid of a soul.

[4798] Editor. Catoptrics concerns reflected images. "Anticks" are grotesque figures; "gull" means deceive, "silly" gullible. Burton describes a dark-room projection and then mirror effects; the arrangement of paper or glass is retained as he gives it. The Agrippa marginal passage stresses that these are lifeless images.

[4799] Editor. Burton qualifies a reported feat of Roger Bacon by observing that it does not appear in his optical writings. He then combines a predominantly internal explanation of deception with an explicit allowance for diabolical agency. The translation preserves both qualifications.

To these you may adde the knavish Impostures of Juglers, Exorcists, Mass-Priests and Mountebanks, of whom Roger Bacon speaks, &c. de miraculis naturæ & artis cap. 1. [4800]they can counterfeit the voices of all birds and bruit beasts almost, all tones and tunes of men, and speak within their throats, as if they spoke afar off, that they make their auditors beleeve they hear spirits, and are thence much astonished and affrighted with it. Besides, those artificiall devices to over-hear their confessions, like that whispering place of Glocester with us, or like the Dukes place at Mantua in Italy, where the sound is reverberated by a concave wall; a reason of which Blancanus in his Echometria gives, and mathematically demonstrates.	To these you may add the roguish impostures of conjurors, exorcists, mass priests and quacks, of whom Roger Bacon speaks in On the Wonders of Nature and Art, chapter 1. They can imitate the voices of almost all birds and brute beasts, and every human tone and tune, speaking within their throats as though from far away. They make their listeners believe they hear spirits, leaving them astonished and terrified. There are also artificial devices for overhearing their confessions, like the whispering place at Gloucester here in England, or the duke's place at Mantua in Italy, where a concave wall reflects sound. Blancanus explains and mathematically demonstrates the cause in his Echometria.[4801]

[4800] Burton. Printed page 211, first star: "Pythonissæ vocum varietatem in ventre & guttere fingentes, formant voces humanas à longe vel prope, prout volunt, ac si spiritus cum homine loqueretur, & sonos brutorum fingunt, &c." Soothsayers, making varied voices in their belly and throat, form human voices as if far away or near, as they wish, as though a spirit were speaking with a person, and imitate the sounds of animals, and so on.

[4801] Editor. "Juglers" are conjurors or performers of deceptive tricks; "mountebanks" quacks. "Mass-Priests" retains Burton's anti-Catholic terminology. Pythonissae evokes diviners or soothsayers; the marginal description concerns fabricated voices. The exact Bacon and Blancanus passages and the identification of the Gloucester and Mantua acoustic sites remain to be collated. This block closes before the general discussion of hearing.

So that the hearing is as frequently deluded as the sight, from the same causes almost, as he that hears bels, will make them sound what he list. As the fool thinketh, so the bell clinketh. Theophilus in Galen, thought he heard musick, from vapours which made his ears sound, &c. Some are deceived by Echo's, some by roaring of waters, or concaves & reverberation of aire in the ground, hollow places and wals. [4802]At Cadurcum in Aquitany, words & sentences are repeated by a strange Echo to the full, or whatsoever you shall play upon a musicall instrument, more distinctly & louder, then they are spoken at first.	Hearing, then, is deceived as often as sight, and by almost the same causes: someone listening to bells will make them sound whatever he pleases. "As the fool thinks, so the bell clinks." Theophilus, in Galen, thought he heard music because vapours made his ears ring. Some are deceived by echoes, some by the roar of water, or by cavities and the reverberation of air in the ground, hollow places and walls. At Cadurcum in Aquitaine, a remarkable echo repeats words and sentences in full, or whatever you play on a musical instrument, more distinctly and loudly than they were first uttered.[4803]

[4802] Burton. Printed page 211, star: "Tam clarè & articulatè audies repetitum, ut perfectior sit Eccho quam ipse dixeris." You will hear it repeated so clearly and distinctly that the echo is more perfect than your own utterance.

[4803] Editor. "List" means please or wish. The proverb connects what a listener expects with what he hears. "Concaves" are hollow spaces. Cadurcum is the place-name as Burton gives it; the precise echo site and Galen passage about Theophilus await collation. Vapours are part of the historical physiological explanation.

Some Echo's repeat a thing spoken seven times, as at Olympus in Macedonia, as Pliny relates, lib. 36. cap. 15. Some twelve times, as at Charenton a village nere Paris in France. At Delphos in Greece heretofore was a miraculous Echo, and so in many other places. Cardan subtil. l. 18. hath wonderfull stories of such as have been deluded by these Echo's. Blancanus the Jesuite in his Echometria hath variety of examples, & gives his reader full satisfaction of all such sounds by way of demonstration. [4804]At Barrey an Isle in the Severn mouth they seem to hear a smiths forge: so at Lypara, & those sulphurious Isles, & many such like which Olaus speaks of in the continent of Scandia, & those Northern countries. Cardan de rerum var. l. 15. c. 84. mentioneth a woman, that still supposed she heard the divel call her, & speaking to her, she was a painters wife in Millan: and many such illusions & voices, which proceed most part from a corrupt imagination.	Some echoes repeat something spoken seven times, as at Olympus in Macedonia, according to Pliny, book 36, chapter 15; some twelve times, as at Charenton, a village near Paris in France. At Delphi in Greece there was formerly a marvellous echo, and likewise in many other places. Cardan, On Subtlety, book 18, has remarkable stories of people deceived by these echoes. The Jesuit Blancanus, in his Echometry, has various examples and fully explains all such sounds to his reader by demonstration. At Barry, an island in the mouth of the Severn, people seem to hear a smith's forge; likewise at Lipari and those sulphurous islands, and at many similar places mentioned by Olaus in the mainland of Scandinavia and those northern countries. Cardan, On the Variety of Things, book 15, chapter 84, mentions a woman, a painter's wife in Milan, who constantly supposed she heard the devil calling and speaking to her; and many similar illusions and voices, which arise mostly from a disordered imagination.[4805]

[4805] Editor. Pliny's Natural History 36.100, in chapter 23 of the consulted edition, places the sevenfold echo at Olympia, not Olympus in Macedonia. Burton's place and chapter number are retained. Barrey, Lypara and Scandia are modernized as Barry, Lipari and Scandinavia. The remaining acoustic reports and the Milanese woman's story have not been independently verified.

I have briefly touched on how they come to prophesy, speak various languages, and discuss astronomy and other sciences unknown to them, of which they have always been ignorant. Here I will add only this: Arculanus, Bodin in his Demonomania, book 3, chapter 6, and some others regard it as a clear sign that such people are possessed by the devil. So do Hercules de Saxonia and Aponensis, and they consider them fit to be cured only by a priest.[4809]

[4807] Burton. Printed page 211, r: “Signa dæmonis nulla sunt nisi quod loquantur ea quæ ante nesciebant, ut Teutonicum aut aliud Idioma, &c.” There are no signs of a demon except that they speak things they did not know before, such as German or another language, and so on.

[4808] Burton. Printed page 212, star: “Cap. 12. tract. de mel.” Chapter 12 of the treatise on melancholy.

[4809] Editor. The marginal q combines Burton’s internal cross-reference with “cap. 16. in 9. Rhasis,” apparently anticipating the following Arculanus reference; its printed grouping remains intact. “Unknown sciences” means subjects the speaker had not learned. Burton reports a dispute over possession, not an established account of the phenomena.

Source page 212 But [4810]Guianerius, [4811]Montaltus, Pomponatius of Padua, and Lemnius lib. 2. cap. 2. refer it wholly to the ill disposition of the humour, & that out of the authority of Aristotle prob. 30. 1. because such symptomes are cured by purging; and as by the striking of a flint fire is inforced, so by the vehement [4812]motions of spirits, they do elicere voces inauditas, compell strange speeches to be spoken: another argument he hath from Plato's reminiscentia, which all out as likely as that which [4813]Marsilius Ficinus speaks of his friend Pierleonus; by a divine kind of infusion he understood the secrets of nature and tenents of Græcian and Barbarian philosophers, before ever he heard of, saw, or read their works: but in this I should rather hold with Avicenna and his associats, that such symptomes proceed from evil spirits, which take all opportunities of humors decayed, or otherwise to pervert the soul of man; and besides, the humour it self is Balneum Diaboli, the devils bath, and as Agrippa proves, doth intice him to seize upon them.	But Guianerius, Montaltus, Pomponazzi of Padua, and Lemnius, book 2, chapter 2, ascribe it wholly to the disordered condition of the humour, citing Aristotle's Problems 30.1, because such symptoms are cured by purging. Just as striking flint forces out fire, so violent movements of the spirits "draw forth unheard utterances": they compel strange speeches to be spoken. Another argument he takes from "Plato's recollection," which is every bit as plausible as what Marsilio Ficino says of his friend Pierleone: by a kind of divine infusion he understood the secrets of nature and the doctrines of Greek and non-Greek philosophers before he had ever heard of, seen or read their works. But in this I would rather agree with Avicenna and his associates that such symptoms proceed from evil spirits, which take every opportunity afforded by corrupted humours, or otherwise, to pervert the human soul. Besides, the humour itself is "the devil's bath"—the devil's bath—and, as Agrippa proves, entices him to seize upon them.[4814]

[4814] Editor. "Spirits" here are the subtle agents of humoral physiology. Plato's recollection is the doctrine that learning recalls knowledge already possessed by the soul. The printed "which all out as likely" lacks "is," supplied on the right. Burton's comparison leaves its degree of irony open. The marginal u is anchored editorially at "motions of spirits." The final preference for a demonic explanation is Burton's own. Both the Latin metaphor and his identical English gloss are retained.

SECT. 4. MEMB. 1. Prognosticks of Melancholy*.	SECTION 4 MEMBER 1 Prognosis of melancholy
Prognosticks, or signs of things to come, are either good or bad. If this malady be not hereditary, and taken at the beginning, there is good hope of cure, recens curationem non habet difficilem, saith Avicenna, l. 3. Fen. 1. Tract. 4. c. 18. That which is with laughter, of all others is most secure, gentle, and remiss, Hercules de Saxoniâ. [4815]If that evacuation of hæmrods, or varices which they call the water between the skin, shall happen to a melancholy man, his misery is ended, Hippocrates. Aphor. 6. 11. Galen. l. 6. de morbis vulgar. com. 8. confirmes the same; and to this Aphorisme of Hippocrates all the Arabians, new and old Latines subscribe; Montaltus. c. 25. Hercules de Saxonia, Mercurialis, Vittorius Faventinus, &c.	Prognostic signs, or signs of what is to come, are either good or bad. If this illness is not hereditary and is treated at the outset, there is good hope of a cure: “When recent, it is not difficult to cure,” says Avicenna, book 3, fen 1, treatise 4, chapter 18. The form accompanied by laughter is the safest, mildest and least severe of all: Hercules de Saxonia. “If that discharge from haemorrhoids, or varices, which they call water beneath the skin, occurs in a melancholy person, his misery is ended”: Hippocrates, Aphorisms 6.11. Galen, On Epidemics, book 6, commentary 8, confirms the same; and all the Arab authorities and the modern and ancient Latin authorities subscribe to this aphorism of Hippocrates: Montaltus, chapter 25; Hercules de Saxonia; Mercurialis; Vittorius Faventinus; and others.[4816]

[4815] Burton. Printed page 212, x: “Si melancholicis hæmorrhoides supervenerint varices, vel ut quibusdam placet, aqua inter cutem, solvitur malum.” If haemorrhoids or varices supervene in melancholy people, or, as some prefer, water beneath the skin, the illness is resolved.

[4816] Editor. “Prognosticks” concerns the expected course and outcome of illness; “secure” means comparatively safe, “remiss” mild. Fen is a division of Avicenna’s Canon. The physiological claims belong to the historical text. Aphorisms 6.11 mentions haemorrhoids as a favourable sign in melancholy and kidney disease; Burton’s quotation adds varices and an alternative interpretation as fluid under the skin. Varices are enlarged veins, not fluid. The difference between his body text and marginal wording is preserved.

Skenkius l. 1. observat. med. c. de Maniâ, illustrates this Aphorisme, with an example of one Daniel Federer a Coppersmith that was long melancholy, and in the end mad about the 27 yeare of his age, these varices or water began to arise in his thighs, and he was freed from his madness. Marius the Roman was so cured, some say, though with great pain. Skenkius hath some other instances of women that have been helped by flowing of their moneths, which before were stopped. That the opening of the hæmrods will do as much for men, all physicians joyntly signifie, so they be voluntary, some say, and not by compulsion.	Schenck, Medical Observations, book 1, chapter on mania, illustrates this aphorism with the example of Daniel Federer, a coppersmith who had long been melancholy and finally became mad. At about twenty-seven years of age, these varices, or water, began to appear in his thighs, and he was freed from his madness. Some say that Marius the Roman was cured in this way, though with great pain. Schenck has other examples of women helped by the return of menstrual flow that had previously stopped. All physicians agree that the opening of haemorrhoids will do as much for men, provided, some say, that it happens spontaneously and is not forced.[4817]

[4817] Editor. “Moneths” means menstrual periods; “voluntary” means spontaneous, not a conscious choice by the patient. The equation of varices with water beneath the skin is repeated from Burton. Federer’s case and the Marius comparison remain reports attributed to Schenck and others, not independently authenticated cases.

All melancholy are better after a quartane; [4818]Joubertus saith, scarce any man hath that ague twice: But whether it free him from this malady, 'tis a question; for many physicians ascribe all long agues for especiall causes, and a quartane ague amongst the rest. [4819]Rhasis cont. lib. 1. tract. 9. When melancholy gets out at the superficies of the skin, or settles breaking out in scabs, leprosie, morphew, or is purged by stooles, or by the urine, or that the spleen is inlarged, and those varices appeare, the disease is dissolved. Guianerius, cap. 5. tract. 15. addes dropsie, jaundise, dysentery, leprosie, as good signes, to these scabs, morphews, and breaking out, and proves it, out of the 6. of Hippocrates Aphorismes.	All melancholy people improve after a quartan fever; Joubert says that scarcely anyone has that ague twice. But whether it frees him from this illness is a question, for many physicians count prolonged agues among its particular causes, including quartan fever. Rhazes, Continens, book 1, treatise 9: "When melancholy comes out at the surface of the skin, or settles there, breaking out in scabs, leprosy or morphew, or is purged through the stools or urine, or when the spleen is enlarged and those varices appear, the disease is resolved." Guianerius, chapter 5, treatise 15, adds dropsy, jaundice, dysentery and leprosy as good signs alongside these scabs, morphews and eruptions, and proves it from book 6 of Hippocrates' Aphorisms.[4820]

[4820] Editor. A quartan ague is a fever recurring on every fourth day by inclusive counting, with two intervening days. "Morphew" is an old term for discoloured or blotched skin, without a single secure modern diagnosis; dropsy denotes fluid swelling. "Melancholy" in the evacuation account can mean the supposed morbid humour as well as the illness. The text explicitly disputes whether fever is a cure or a cause.

Source page 213 Evil prognosticks on the other part. Inveterata melancholia incurabilis, of it be inveterate, it is [4821]incurable, a common axiome, aut difficulter curabilis as they say that make the best, hardly cured. This Galen witnesseth, l. 3. de loc. affect. cap. 6. [4822]be it in whom it will, or from what cause soever, it is ever long, wayward, tedious, and hard to be cured, if once it be habituated. As Lucian said of the gout, she was [4823]the queen of diseases, and inexorable, may we say of melancholy. Yet Paracelsus will have all diseases whatsoever curable, & laughs at them which think otherwise, as T. Erastus part. 3. objects to him; although in another place hereditary diseases he accounts incurable, & by no art to be removed.	On the other hand, there are bad prognostic signs. “Chronic melancholy is incurable”: if it has become established, it is incurable—a common axiom—or, as those who put the best construction on it say, “difficult to cure,” hardly curable. Galen attests this in On the Affected Parts, book 3, chapter 6: “Whoever has it, and from whatever cause, it is always prolonged, obstinate, wearisome and difficult to cure once it has become established.” As Lucian said of gout, that she was “the queen of diseases, and inexorable,” so we may say of melancholy. Yet Paracelsus maintains that every disease whatsoever is curable and laughs at those who think otherwise, as Thomas Erastus objects against him in part 3; although elsewhere he regards hereditary diseases as incurable and beyond the power of any art to remove.[4824]

[4821] Burton. Printed page 213, a: “Quia jam conversa in naturam.” Because it has now become part of the person’s nature.

[4822] Burton. Printed page 213, b: “In quocunque sit à quacunque causa Hypocon. præsertim, semper est longa, morosa, nec facile curari potest.” Whoever has it and from whatever cause, especially the hypochondriacal form, it is always prolonged and obstinate and cannot easily be cured.

[4823] Burton. Printed page 213, c: “Regina morborum & inexorabilis.” The queen of diseases, and inexorable.

[4824] Editor. The left retains the printed “of it be inveterate”; the evident sense “if” is used on the right. “Inveterate” means long established; “wayward” obstinate; “habituated” established as a settled condition. The claims of incurability, and the opposing claims assigned to Paracelsus, are historical judgments. Erastus’s objection and the Lucian formulation await exact-source collation.

[4825]Hildesheim spicel. 2. de mel. holds it less dangerous if only [4826]imagination be hurt, and not reason, [4827]the gentlest is from bloud. Worse from choler adust, but the worst of all from melancholy putrefied. [4828]Bruel esteems hypochondriacall least dangerous, and the other two species opposite to Galen, hardest to be cured. [4829]The cure is hard in man, but much more difficult in women. And both men and women must take notice of that saying of Montanus consil. 230. pro Abbate Italo, [4830]This malady doth commonly accompany them to their grave; Physicians may ease, and it may lye hid for a time, but they cannot quite cure it, but it will return again more violent & sharp then at first, and that upon every small occasion or errour:	Hildesheim, Gleanings 2, On Melancholy, considers it less dangerous if only imagination is damaged, not reason. "The mildest comes from blood; worse is that from scorched choler, but worst of all is that from putrefied melancholy." Bruel considers the hypochondriacal form the least dangerous and the other two forms the hardest to cure, contrary to Galen. The cure is difficult in men, but much more difficult in women. Both men and women must take note of Montanus's saying in consultation 230, for an Italian abbot: "This illness commonly accompanies them to the grave. Physicians may ease it, and it may lie hidden for a time, but they cannot cure it completely. It will return more violent and severe than at first, at every small occasion or error."[4831]

[4829] Burton. Printed page 213, h: "Difficilis curatu in viris, multo difficilior in fæminis." Difficult to cure in men, much more difficult in women.

[4830] Burton. Printed page 213, i: "Ad interitum plerumque homines comitatur, licet medici levent plerumque, tamen non tollunt unquam, sed recidet acerbior quam antea minima occasione, aut errore." It generally accompanies people to death. Although physicians often relieve it, they never remove it; it will relapse more severely than before at the smallest occasion or error.

[4831] Editor. The three forms are melancholy of the head, of the hypochondria and of the whole body. The marginal Hildesheim quotation concerns deficiency of brain, although the body emphasizes the distinction between imagination and reason. The next margin calls the blood-derived form bad, while the body calls it gentlest; neither has been silently harmonized. The gender comparison and prediction of lifelong illness are the authorities' claims, not modern prognostic conclusions.

as in Mercuries weather-beaten statue, that was once all over gilt, the open parts were clean, yet there was in fimbriis aurum, in the chinks a remnant of gold; there will be some reliques of melancholy left in the purest bodies (if once tainted) not so easily to be rooted out. [4832]Oftentimes it degenerates into Epilepsy, Apoplexy, Convulsions, and blindness: by the authority of Hippocrates and Galen, [4833]all averre, if once it possesse the ventricles of the brain, Frambesarius, & Salust. Salvianus adds, if it get into the optick nerves, blindness. Mercurialis consil. 20. had a woman to his patient, that from melancholy became Epileptick and blinde.	As with Mercury's weather-beaten statue, once gilded all over, whose exposed parts were bare but which still had "gold in the fringes"—a remnant of gold in its crevices—some remains of melancholy will be left in the purest bodies, once affected, and will not be easily rooted out. It often degenerates into epilepsy, apoplexy, convulsions and blindness. On the authority of Hippocrates and Galen, all affirm this if it once occupies the brain's ventricles; Frambesarius and Sallustius Salvianus add blindness if it gets into the optic nerves. Mercurialis, consultation 20, had a woman patient who became epileptic and blind after melancholy.[4834]

[4832] Burton. Printed page 213, k: "Periculum est ne degeneret in Epilepsiam, Apoplexiam, Convulsionem, cæcitatem." There is a danger that it may degenerate into epilepsy, apoplexy, convulsion or blindness.

[4834] Editor. "Clean" means bare of gilding; "reliques" surviving remnants. In fimbriis means "in the fringes," whereas Burton's gloss says "in the chinks"; both are retained. Apoplexy is the historical category of sudden loss of consciousness and bodily function, not here a precise modern diagnosis. The listed progressions and patient history await source collation.

[4835]If it come from a cold cause or so continue cold, or increase, Epilepsie, Convulsions follow, and blindness, or else in the end they are moped, sottish, and in all their actions, speeches, gestures, ridiculous. For as [4839]Sennertus contends out of Crato, there is seminarius ignis in this humour, the very seeds of fire. If it come from melancholy naturall adust, and in excess, they are often dæmoniacall, Montanus.	If it comes from a cold cause, or continues cold, or increases, epilepsy, convulsions and blindness follow; otherwise they eventually become stupefied and foolish, ridiculous in all their actions, speech and gestures. If it comes from a hot cause, they are more frenzied and violent, and finally mad. "Mania quite often follows melancholy as it grows hot." If it heats and increases, that is the usual outcome: "He is mad periodically, or continually"—mad in fits or all the time. For, as Sennert maintains on Crato's authority, this humour contains "a seed-bearing fire," the very seeds of fire. If it comes from natural melancholy that has been scorched, and in excess, they are often possessed by demons: Montanus.[4840]

These categories should not be collapsed into a single present-day psychiatric diagnosis. The marginal n continues at the foot of the page; all six bottom references are included.

[4841]Seldome this malady procures death, except (which is the greatest, most grievous calamity, and the misery of all miseries) they make away themselves, which is a frequent thing, & familiar amongst them. This illness seldom causes death, except when—which is the greatest and most grievous calamity, the misery of all miseries—they kill themselves, a frequent and familiar occurrence among them. It is Hippocrates' observation and Galen's judgment: "Although they fear death, they nevertheless very often bring death upon themselves," On the Affected Parts, book 3, chapter 7. It is the verdict of all physicians: Rabbi Moses' aphorism, the prognosis of Avicenna, Rhazes, Aetius, Gordonius, Valescus, Altomarus, Sallustius Salvianus, Capivaccius, Mercatus, Hercules de Saxonia, Piso, Bruel, Fuchsius—all of them.[4843]

[4841] Burton. Printed page 213, q at foot: "Montalt. c. 15. Raro mors aut nunquam, nisi sibi ipsis inferant." Montaltus, chapter 15: death occurs rarely or never, unless they inflict it on themselves.

[4843] Editor. "Make away themselves" means kill themselves; "doom," judgment. Rabbi Moses is Maimonides. These severe prognostic claims supply no statistical measure of risk. For the printed Fabio Calico, compare the 1525 Hippocratic collection credited to M. Fabium Calvum, Marco Fabio Calvo, in the Wellcome catalogue. This is a bibliographical lead, not a verified correction. The exact On Madness passage, its attribution and Burton's translator reference still require comparison with the text.

[4845] Editor. Compare Lucretius, On the Nature of Things 3.79–81. Burton's quotation has the singular infelix and consciscat where the consulted text has humanos and consciscant. The translation follows Burton's singular wording. His separate four-line English rendering follows on the next source page and is retained as a distinct verse passage.

In such sort doth the torture and extremity of his misery torment him, that he can take no pleasure in his life, but is in a manner inforced to offer violence unto himself, to be freed from his present insufferable pains. So some (saith [4846]Fracastorius) in fury, but most in despair, sorrow, fear, and out of the anguish and vexation of their souls, offer violence to themselves: for their life is unhappy and miserable. They can take no rest in the night, nor sleep, or if they do slumber, fearfull dreams astonish them.	The torture and extremity of his misery torment him so greatly that he can take no pleasure in life, but is, in a manner, compelled to do himself violence to escape his present unbearable pains. Thus some, says Fracastorius, "in frenzy, but most in despair, sorrow and fear, and from the anguish and distress of their souls, do themselves violence, for their life is unhappy and miserable. They can find no rest at night and cannot sleep; or if they do slumber, frightening dreams terrify them."[4847]

[4846] Burton. Printed page 214, u: "Lib. 2. de Intell. sæpe mortem sibi consciscunt ob timorem & tristitiam, tædio vitæ affecti ob furorem & desperationem. Est enim infera &c. Ergo sic perpetuo afflictati vitam oderint, se præcipitant, his malis carituri aut interficiunt se, aut tale quid committunt." On Understanding, book 2: they often bring death upon themselves because of fear and sadness, wearied of life through frenzy and despair. For it is infernal, etc. Thus, continually afflicted in this way, they hate life and throw themselves down, intending to escape these evils, or kill themselves, or do something of that sort.

[4847] Editor. "Astonish" means terrify or overwhelm. Burton moves from prognostic authorities to an account of felt suffering. "In a manner" qualifies his language of compulsion and is retained. The Fracastorius marginal quotation and the body's expanded English account are both preserved.

In the day time they are afrighted still by some terrible object, and torn in pieces with suspicion, fear, sorrow, discontents, cares, shame, anguish, &c. as so many wild horses, that they cannot be quiet an hour, a minute of time, but even against their wills they are intent, and still thinking of it, they cannot forget it, it grindes their souls day and night, they are perpetually tormented, a burden to themselves, as Job was, they can neither eat, drink or sleep. Psal. 107. 18. Their soul abhorreth all meat, and they are brought to deaths door, [4848]being bound in misery and iron: they curse their stars with [4849]Job, and day of their birth, and wish for [4850]death: for as Pineda and most interpreters hold, Job was even melancholy to despair, and almost [4851]madnesse it self;	By day some terrible object constantly frightens them, and suspicion, fear, sorrow, discontent, cares, shame and anguish tear them apart like so many wild horses. Perpetually tormented, a burden to themselves as Job was, they can neither eat, drink nor sleep. Psalm 107:18: "Their soul loathes all food, and they are brought to death's door," "bound in misery and iron." With Job they curse their stars and the day of their birth and wish for death. For, as Pineda and most interpreters maintain, Job's melancholy reached despair and almost madness itself.[4852]

[4850] Burton. Printed page 214, z: "Job 6. 8." Job 6:8.

[4852] Editor. "Meat" means food; "allies" in the following passage means relations or kindred. The margin prints Job 33, but the curse on the day of birth occurs in Job 3:1–3; the erroneous number remains on the left. Burton's melancholy reading of Job is an interpretation attributed to Pineda and others. Psalm 107 and Job 6 are retained with their printed locators.

they murmur many times against the world, frinds, allies, all mankinde, even against God himself in the bitternesse of their passion, [4853]vivere nolunt, mori nesciunt, live they will not, die they cannot. And in the midst of these squalid, ugly, and such irksome days, they seek at last, finding no comfort, [4854]no remedy in this wretched life, to be eased of all by death. Omnia appetunt bonum, All creatures seek the best, and for their good as they hope, sub specie in shew at least, vel quia mori pulchrum putant (saith [4855]Hippocrates) vel quia putant inde se majoribus malis liberari, to be freed as they wish.	In the bitterness of their passion they often murmur against the world, friends, relations and all humankind, even against God himself: "They do not wish to live; they do not know how to die"—live they will not, die they cannot. Amid these squalid, ugly and wearisome days, finding no comfort or remedy in this wretched life, they finally seek relief from everything in death. "All things seek the good": all creatures seek the best, and what they hope will be for their good, "under the appearance"—in appearance at least—"either because they think it noble to die," says Hippocrates, "or because they think they will thereby be freed from greater evils": freed as they wish.[4856]

[4855] Burton. Printed page 214, c: "Lib. de insania. Sic sic juvat ire per umbras." On Madness. "Thus, thus it pleases me to pass among the shades."

[4856] Editor. Vivere nolunt, mori nesciunt is in Seneca, Moral Letters 4.5; the fresh translation precedes Burton's gloss. The fragment sub specie leaves its object implicit. The marginal verse recalls Virgil, Aeneid 4.660, but has per umbras where the consulted text has sub umbras. The argument explains the sufferer's hoped-for relief; it does not establish that hope as true.

Though many times as Æsops fishes, they leap from the frying-pan into the fire it self, yet they hope to be eased by his meanes; and therefore (saith Felix [4857]Platerus) after many tedious dayes at last, either by drowning, hanging, or some such fearfull end, they precipitate, or make away themselves: many lamentable examples are dayly seen amongst us: alius ante fores se laqueo suspendit, (as Seneca notes) alius se præcipitavit à tecto, ne dominum stomachantem audiret, alius ne reduceretur à fuga ferrum redegit in viscera, so many causes there are — His amor exitio est, furor his — love, grief, anger, madness, and shame, &c.	Though, like Aesop's fish, they often leap from the frying pan into the fire itself, they hope for relief by this means. Therefore, says Felix Plater, "after many wearisome days, at last, by drowning, hanging or some such fearful end," they throw themselves down or otherwise kill themselves. "Many lamentable examples are seen among us every day." "One hangs himself with a noose before the doors," as Seneca observes; "another threw himself from a roof rather than hear his angry master; another, rather than be brought back from flight, drove a blade into his entrails." So many causes there are: "Love brings death to these, frenzy to those"—love, grief, anger, madness, shame and so on.[4858]

[4857] Burton. Printed page 214, d: "Cap. 3. de mentis alienat. mæsti degunt, dum tandem mortem quam timent, suspendio aut submersione, aut aliqua alia vi, ut multa tristia exempla vidimus." Chapter 3, on mental derangement: they live in sorrow until at last the death they fear, by hanging or drowning or some other violence—as we have seen in many sad examples. The printed sentence is incomplete.

'Tis a common calamity, a fatall end to this disease, they are condemned to a violent death, by a jury of Physicians, furiously disposed, carried headlong by their tyrannizing wils, inforced by miseries, & there remains no more to such persons, if that heavenly Physician, by his assisting grace and mercy alone do not prevent, (for no humane perswasion, or art can help,) but to be their own butchers, and execute [4859]themselves. Socrates his cicuta, Lucretia's dagger, Timons halter are yet to be had; Cato's knife, and Nero's sword are left behinde them, as so many fatall engines, bequeathed to posterity, and will be used to the worlds end, by such distressed souls:	It is a common calamity, a fatal outcome of this disease: a jury of physicians condemns them to a violent death. Frenzied in disposition, swept headlong by their tyrannical wills and driven by misery, such people have nothing left but to be their own butchers and execute themselves, unless the heavenly Physician intervenes by his assisting grace and mercy alone, for no human persuasion or art can help. Socrates' hemlock, Lucretia's dagger and Timon's halter are still available; Cato's knife and Nero's sword remain behind them, so many fatal instruments bequeathed to posterity, to be used until the world's end by such distressed souls.[4860]
Source page 214–215 so intolerable, unsufferable, grievous and violent is their pain, [4861]so unspeakable, and continuate. One day of grief is an hundred years, as Cardan observes: 'Tis carnificina hominum, angor animi, as well saith Areteus, a plague of the soul, the cramp and convulsion of the soul, an Epitome of hell; and if there be an hell upon earth, it is to be found in a melancholy mans heart.	So intolerable, unbearable, grievous and violent is their pain, so unspeakable and unceasing. One day of grief is a hundred years, as Cardan observes. It is "a torture chamber for human beings, anguish of mind," as Aretaeus aptly says: a plague of the soul, the soul's cramp and convulsion, a hell in miniature. If there is a hell on earth, it is to be found in a melancholy person's heart.[4862]

[4861] Burton. Printed page 214, f: "O omnium opinionibus incogitabile malum. Lucian. Mortesque mille, mille dum vivit neces gerit, peritque, Heinsius Austriaco." O evil beyond everyone's imagining! Lucian. "While he lives he bears a thousand deaths, a thousand slayings, and perishes." Heinsius, in Austriacus.

[4862] Editor. "Continuate" means unceasing. Carnificina is a place of torture or execution; angor animi, anguish of mind. "Epitome" means a condensed representation. The Aretaeus, Cardan, Lucian and Heinsius references remain uncollated. The following English couplet is retained without assigning an unverified author.

Source page 215 For that deep torture may be call'd an hell, When more is felt, then one hath power to tell.	For that deep torment may be called a hell When one feels more than words have power to tell.
Yea, that which scoffing Lucian said of the Gout in jest, I may truly affirm of melancholy in earnest.	Indeed, what mocking Lucian said of gout in jest, I may truthfully say of melancholy in earnest.[4863]
O triste nomen! o diis odibile [4864]Melancholia lacrymosa, Cocyti filia, Tu Tartari specubus opacis edita Erinnys, utero quam Mægera suo tulit, Et ab uberibus aluit, cuique parvulæ Amarulentum in os lac Alecto dedit, Omnes abominabilem te dæmones Produxere in lucem, exitio mortalium.	O sorrowful name, O hateful to the gods, Weeping Melancholy, daughter of Cocytus, You Fury born in Tartarus' dark caverns, Whom Megaera bore within her womb And suckled at her breasts, and into whose infant mouth Alecto poured bitter milk: All the demons brought you, loathsome thing, Into the light, to the destruction of mortals.
Et paulo post.	And a little later.
Non Jupiter erit tale telum fulminis, Non ulla sic procella sævit æquoris, Non impetuosi tanta vis est turbinis. An asperos sustineo morsus Cerberi? Num virus Echidnæ membra mea depascitur? Aut tunica sanie tincta Nessi sanguinis? Illacrymabile & immedicabile malum hoc.	Jupiter strikes with no such thunderbolt; No storm at sea rages so fiercely; No rushing whirlwind has such force. Am I enduring Cerberus' savage bites? Is Echidna's venom consuming my limbs? Or a tunic steeped in Nessus' tainted blood? This evil is beyond tears and beyond cure.[4865]

[4864] Burton. Printed page 215, star: "Regina morborum cui famulantur omnes & obediunt. Cardan." The queen of diseases, whom all serve and obey. Cardan.

[4865] Editor. Cocytus and Tartarus belong to the classical underworld; Megaera and Alecto are Furies. Cerberus guards the underworld; Echidna is a serpentine monster, and Nessus' poisoned garment causes Hercules' torment. The source prints "Non Jupiter erit" rather than the grammatically expected ferit; the left retains erit, while "strikes" supplies the evident sense on the right. No conjectural replacement is made in the original column.

O sad and odious name! a name so fell, Is this of melancholy, brat of hell. There born in hellish darkness doth it dwel, The Furies brought it up, Megera's teat, Alecto gave it bitter milk to eat. And all conspir'd a bane to mortall men, To bring this devil out of that black den. Jupiters thunderbolt, no storm at sea, Nor whirl-winde doth our hearts so much dismay: What? am I bit by that fierce Cerberus? Or stung by [4866]serpent so pestiferous? Or put on shirt that's dipt in Nessus bloud? My pain's past cure; Physick can do no good.	O sad and hateful name, a name so fierce: Melancholy, hell's own brat. Born there, it dwells in hellish darkness; The Furies raised it at Megaera's breast; Alecto gave it bitter milk to drink. All conspired to be a bane to mortal men, Bringing this devil from that black den. Neither Jupiter's thunderbolt, nor storm at sea, Nor whirlwind so dismays our hearts. What—am I bitten by fierce Cerberus, Or stung by a serpent so poisonous? Have I put on a shirt dipped in Nessus' blood? My pain is past cure; medicine can do no good.[4867]
No torture of body like unto it, Siculi non invenere tyranni Majus tormentum, no strappado's, hot irons, Phalaris bulls,	No bodily torture equals it: "The Sicilian tyrants invented no greater torment." No strappados, hot irons or bulls of Phalaris.[4868]
[4869]Nec ira deum tantum, nec tela, nec hostis, Quantum sola noces animis illapsa,	Neither the gods' anger, nor weapons, nor the enemy Harms so much as you alone, stealing into minds.[4870]
Joves wrath, nor devils can Do so much harm to th' Soul of man.	Neither Jove's wrath nor devils can Do so much harm to the human soul.

[4866] Burton. Printed page 215, dagger: "Eheu quis intus scorpio, &c. Seneca Act. 4. Herc. OEt." Alas, what scorpion is within, etc. Seneca, Hercules on Oeta, act 4.

[4867] Editor. This is Burton's English paraphrase, not a second modern translation of the Latin. "Fell" means fierce or deadly; "physick" medicine. The dagger before "serpent" points to the marginal Hercules on Oeta quotation, preserved as a footnote. The 13 logical verse lines are retained; the scan's two long-line wraps are not counted as new verse lines.

[4868] Editor. The Latin adapts Horace, Epistles 1.2.58–59, where the greater torment is envy. Burton transfers the comparison to melancholy. Strappado, hot irons and Phalaris' bulls are examples of bodily torture; the plural "bulls" is Burton's.

All fears, griefs, suspicions, discontents, imbonities, insuavities are swallowed up, and drowned in this Euripus, this Irish sea, this Ocean of misery, as so many small brooks; 'tis coagulum omnium ærumnarum: which [4871]Ammianus applied to his distressed Palladius. I say of our Melancholy man, he is the cream of humane adversity, the quintessence, and upshot; all other diseases whatsoever, are but flea-bitings to melancholy in extent: 'Tis the pith of them all, [4872]	All fears, griefs, suspicions, discontents, evils and unpleasantnesses are swallowed up and drowned in this Euripus, this Irish Sea, this ocean of misery, like so many small streams. It is "the concentrated mass of every hardship," as Ammianus described his distressed Palladius. I say of our melancholy man that he is the cream of human adversity, its quintessence and final sum. All other diseases, whatever they may be, are mere flea bites beside melancholy in its extent. It is the essence of them all.[4873]
[4874]Hospitium est calamitatis; quid verbis opus est? Quamcunque malam rem quæris, illic reperies:	It is calamity's lodging; what need is there for words? Whatever evil you seek, there you will find it.[4875]
What need more words? 'tis calamities Inn. Where seek for any mischief, 'tis within;	What need for more words? It is calamity's inn; Whatever mischief you seek is within.

[4871] Burton. Printed page 215, star: "Lib. 29." Book 29.

[4872] Burton. Printed page 215, i: "Hic omnis imbonitas & insuavitas consistit, ut Tertulliani verbis utar, orat. ad martyr." Here every evil and unpleasantness is concentrated, to use Tertullian's words, Address to the Martyrs.

[4873] Editor. "Imbonities" and "insuavities" mean evils and unpleasantnesses; coagulum suggests concentration. The waters image gathers smaller troubles into one. In Ammianus 29.2.1 Palladius causes disasters; Burton applies the phrase to a sufferer. The editorially anchored margin adapts Tertullian, Ad Martyres 3.1, where hardship in soldiers' tents illustrates preparation for martyrdom. Burton substitutes Hic for ubi, omits duritia, and has consistit against the consulted constitit; the source also spells inbonitas. His wording is preserved.

[4875] Editor. Compare Plautus, Trinummus 553–554: the consulted text has quamvis malam rem quaeras, illic reperias. The scan reads Quamcunq; malam rem quæris, illic reperies; the contraction is expanded as Quamcunque. Burton's wording and his separate English couplet are preserved. The comparison originally concerns an unproductive piece of land.

and a melancholy man is that true Prometheus, which is bound to Caucasus; the true Titius, whose bowels are still by a vulture devoured (as Poets fain) for so doth [4876]Lilius Geraldus interpret it, of anxieties, and those griping cares, and so ought it to be understood.	And a melancholy man is the true Prometheus, bound to the Caucasus; the true Tityus, whose entrails a vulture continually devours, as the poets imagine. For Lilio Giraldi interprets it in this way, as anxieties and those gnawing cares, and so it should be understood.[4877]

[4877] Editor. Titius is normalized to Tityus. Burton treats the punishments of Prometheus and Tityus as allegories of anxiety: “still” means continually, “fain” invent or imagine, and “griping” gnawing or painfully clutching. Lilius Geraldus is Lilio Gregorio Giraldi; the exact passage in his Life of Hercules remains for verification.

In all other maladies, we seek for help, if a leg or an arm ake, through any distemperature or wound, or that we have an ordinary disease, above all things whatsoever, we desire help & health, a present recovery; if by any means possible it may be procured: we will freely part with all our other fortunes, substance, endure any misery, drink bitter potions, swallow those distastfull pils, suffer our joynts to be seared, to be cut off, any thing for future health; so sweet, so dear, so precious above all other things in this world is life: 'tis that we chiefly desire, long and happy days, [4878]multos da Jupiter annos, increase of years all men wish; but to a melancholy man, nothing so tedious, nothing so odious; that which they so carefully seek to preserve he abhors, he [4879]alone; so intolerable are his pains;	In all other illnesses we seek help. If a leg or an arm aches through some disorder or wound, or we have an ordinary disease, above everything else we desire help and health, an immediate recovery, if it can possibly be obtained. We will freely part with all our other possessions and wealth, endure any misery, drink bitter potions, swallow those unpleasant pills, allow our limbs to be cauterized or cut off—anything for future health. So sweet, so dear, so precious above everything else in this world is life: it is what we chiefly desire, long and happy days. "Grant me many years, Jupiter": everyone wishes for more years. But to a melancholy man nothing is so wearisome, nothing so hateful. What others seek so carefully to preserve, he alone abhors; his pains are so intolerable.[4880]

[4879] Burton. Printed page 215, l: "Quid est miserius in vita, quam velle mori? Seneca." "What is more wretched in life than to wish to die?" Seneca.

[4880] Editor. "Distemperature" means disorder; "present" immediate; "substance" wealth; "joynts" limbs or joints; "seared" cauterized. The Jupiter quotation is Juvenal, Satire 10.188, not Persius as the margin states. Its translation precedes Burton's English gloss. The marginal question adapts Seneca the Elder, Controversies 8.4, which has Quid est in vita miserius quam mori velle? The same declamation supplies the closing appeal for pity; it is distinct from Seneca the Younger's philosophical works.

Source page 215–216 some make a question, graviores morbi corporis an animi, whether the diseases of the body or mind be more grievous, but there is no comparison, no doubt to be made of it, multo enim sævior longeque est atrocior animi, quam corporis cruciatus (Lem. l. 1. c. 12.) the diseases of the mind are far more grievous. —Totum hic pro vulnere corpus, body and soul is misaffected here, but the soul especially. So Cardan testifies de rerum var. lib. 8. 40. [4881]Maximus Tyrius a Platonist, and Plutarch have made just volumes to prove it. [4882]Dies adimit ægritudinem hominibus, in other diseases there is some hope likely, but these unhappy men are born to misery, past all hope of recovery, incurably sick, the longer they live the worse they are, and death alone must ease them.	Some debate "whether illnesses of the body or of the mind are more severe," but there is no comparison, no room for doubt: "For the torment of the mind is much fiercer and far more terrible than that of the body" (Lemnius, book 1, chapter 12). Diseases of the mind are far more severe. "Here the whole body is one wound": body and soul are afflicted here, but especially the soul. So Cardan testifies in On the Variety of Things, book 8, chapter 40. Maximus of Tyre, a Platonist, and Plutarch have written entire volumes to prove it. "Time takes people's grief away": in other diseases there is generally some hope, but these unhappy men are born to misery, beyond all hope of recovery, incurably ill. The longer they live, the worse they become, and death alone must ease them.[4883]

[4881] Burton. Printed page 216, m: "Tom. 2. Libello, an graviores passiones, &c." "Volume 2, in the short treatise Whether the passions are more severe, etc." The abbreviated reference is retained.

[4883] Editor. Burton's absolute claim about incurability is rhetorical, not a clinical prognosis. "Just volumes" means entire volumes. Totum hic pro vulnere corpus adapts Lucan, Civil War 9.814, where est replaces hic: Tullus's whole body bleeds after a snakebite. The Terence tag comes from The Self-Tormentor 421–424: diem adimere aegritudinem hominibus is a reported saying that Menedemus doubts because his grief increases. Burton makes it a standalone assertion. Lemnius, Cardan and the Maximus/Plutarch allocation remain uncollated.

Source page 216 Another doubt is made by some Philosophers, whether it be lawfull for a man in such extremity of pain and grief, to make away himself: and how these men that so do, are to be censured. The Platonists approve of it, that it is lawfull in such cases, and upon a necessity. Plotinus l. de beatitud. c. 7. and Socrates himself defends it, in Plato's Phædon, if any man labor of an incurable disease, he may dispatch himself, if it be to his good.	Some philosophers raise another question: whether it is lawful for a man in such extreme pain and grief to kill himself, and how those who do so should be judged. The Platonists approve it, holding it lawful in such cases and under necessity: Plotinus, On Happiness, chapter 7. Socrates himself defends it in Plato's Phaedo: "If anyone suffers from an incurable disease, he may kill himself, if it is for his good."[4884]

[4884] Editor. "Censured" means judged; "dispatch himself" means kill himself. Plotinus, Ennead 1.4.7 (On Happiness), discusses the sage's freedom under misfortune and captivity; section 8 turns to severe pain. MacKenna's translation supplies a contextual comparison, not proof of Burton's immediate text. In Plato, Phaedo 61c–62c, Socrates says that one ordinarily may not kill oneself and must await necessity sent by a god. Burton's particular claim about incurable disease is not a direct quotation of that passage; his intermediary remains unidentified.

Epicurus and his followers, The Cynicks and Stoicks in generall affirm it, Epictetus and [4885]Seneca amongst the rest, quamcunque, veram esse viam ad libertatem, any way is allowable, that leads to liberty, [4886]let us give God thanks, that no man is compelled to live against his will: [4887]quid ad hominem claustra, carcer, custodia? liberum ostium habet, death is always ready and at hand. Vides illum præcipitem locum, illud flumen, Dost thou see that steep place, that river, that pit, that tree, there's liberty at hand, effugia servitutis & doloris sunt, as that Laconian lad cast himself headlong (non serviam aiebat puer) to be freed of his misery:	Epicurus and his followers, and the Cynics and Stoics generally, affirm it—Epictetus and Seneca among the rest: "Any path is a true path to freedom," any way is allowable that leads to liberty. "Let us thank God that no man is compelled to live against his will." "What do bars, prison or guards matter to a man? He has an open door": death is always ready and at hand. "Do you see that steep place, that river?" Do you see that steep place, that river, that pit, that tree? Freedom is at hand: "They are ways of escape from slavery and pain." So that Spartan boy threw himself headlong to be freed from his misery: "I will not be a slave," the boy said.[4888]
Every vein in thy body, if these be nimis operosi exitus, will let thee free, quid tua refert finem facias an accipias? there's no necessity for a man to live in misery. Malum est necessitati vivere, sed in necessitate vivere, necessitas nulla est. Ignavus qui sine causa moritur, & stultus qui cum dolore vivit. Idem epi. 58.	Every vein in your body will set you free, if these are "too laborious exits." "What does it matter to you whether you bring about your end or receive it?" There is no necessity for a man to live in misery. "It is an evil to live under necessity, but there is no necessity to live under necessity. He is a coward who dies without cause, and a fool who lives in pain." The same author, Letter 58.[4889]

[4885] Burton. Printed page 216, o: "Patet exitus; si pugnare non vultis licet fugere; quis vos tenet invitos? De provid. cap. 8." "The exit stands open; if you do not wish to fight, you may flee. Who holds you against your will?" On Providence, chapter 8, as printed.

[4886] Burton. Printed page 216, star: "Agamus Deo gratias quod nemo invitus in vita teneri potest." "Let us thank God that no one can be kept alive against his will."

[4887] Burton. Printed page 216, dagger: "Epist. 26. Seneca & de sacra. 2. cap. 15. & Epist. 70. & 12." Seneca, Letter 26, and "de sacra," book 2, chapter 15, and Letters 70 and 12. The anomalous printed title is retained.

[4888] Editor. Burton combines and adapts Senecan passages. Patet exitus comes from Seneca the Younger, On Providence 6.7, within a speech assigned to God; the printed chapter 8 remains unchanged. Compare On Anger 3.15.3–4 for the images of exits from bondage. The marginal de sacra. 2. cap. 15. is anomalous and remains unrepaired. Laconian means Spartan. The compilation's remaining letter references and intermediary need fuller collation. Burton's English amplifications and the fresh Latin translations are both retained.

[4889] Editor. Compare Seneca, Moral Letters 58.36: its formulation concerns dying because of pain and living for the sake of pain, with explicit qualifications about the condition of mind and body. Burton's sine causa, "without cause," and cum dolore, "in pain," alter that wording and remain on the left. The neighbouring maxims are a compilation, not a continuous quotation from Letter 58.

Wherefore hath our Mother the earth brought out poysons, saith [4890]Pliny, in so great a quantity, but that men in distress might make away themselves? which Kings of old had ever in a readiness, ad incerta fortunæ venenum sub custode promptum, Livy writes, and Executioners always at hand. Speusippus being sick was met by Diogenes, and carried on his slaves shoulders, he made his moan to the Philosopher; but I pitty thee not quoth Diogenes, qui cum talis vivere sustines, thou maist be freed when thou wilt, meaning by death.	Why has our mother earth produced poisons in such abundance, says Pliny, except that men in distress might kill themselves? Kings of old always kept these ready, Livy writes, "poison kept under guard, ready for the uncertainties of fortune," and executioners always at hand. When Speusippus was ill and being carried on his slaves' shoulders, Diogenes met him. He complained to the philosopher, but Diogenes said, "I do not pity you, since you endure living in such a condition": you may be freed whenever you choose, meaning by death.[4891]
[4892]Seneca therefore commends Cato, Dido, and Lucretia, for their generous courage in so doing, & others that voluntarily die, to avoid a greater mischief, to free themselves from misery, to save their honor, or vindicate their good name, as Cleopatra did, as Sophonisba, Syphax wife did, Hannibal did, as Junius Brutus, as Vibius Virius, and those Campanian Senators in Livy (Dec. 3. lib. 6.) to escape the Roman tyranny, that poysoned themselves. Themistocles drank Bulls bloud, rather then he would fight against his Country, and Demosthenes chose rather to drink poyson, Publius Crassi filius, Censorinus and Plancus, those heroicall Romans chose to make away themselves, then to fall into their enemies hands.	Seneca therefore commends Cato, Dido and Lucretia for their noble courage in doing so, and others who die voluntarily to avoid a greater evil, free themselves from misery, preserve their honour or defend their good name—as Cleopatra did; as Sophonisba, Syphax's wife, did; as Hannibal did; as Junius Brutus, Vibius Virius and those Campanian senators in Livy, third decade, book 6, did when they poisoned themselves to escape Roman tyranny. Themistocles drank bull's blood rather than fight against his country, and Demosthenes preferred to drink poison. Publius, the son of Crassus, Censorinus and Plancus, those heroic Romans, chose to kill themselves rather than fall into their enemies' hands.[4893]

[4890] Burton. Printed page 216, star: "Lib. 2. cap. 83. Terra mater nostri miserta." "Book 2, chapter 83. Mother earth, pitying us."

[4891] Editor. Speusippus and Diogenes are Greek philosophers. Burton presents the anecdote and the Pliny and Livy claims as authorities for one side of the debate; their exact passages remain for collation. No medical efficacy or historical accuracy is inferred from the examples.

Source page 216–217 How many myriads besides in all ages might I remember, qui sibi lethum Insontes peperere manu, &c. [4894]Rhasis in the Machabees is magnified for it, Sampsons death approved. So did Saul and Jonas sin, and many worthy men and women, quorum memoria celebratur in Ecclesia, saith [4895]Lemnichius, for killing themselves to save their Chastity and honor, when Rome was taken, as Austin instances, l. 1. de Civit. Dei, cap. 16. Jerom vindicateth the same in Jonam & Ambrose l. 3. de virginitate commendeth Pelagia for so doing. Eusebius, lib. 8. cap. 15. admires a Romane Matron for the same fact to save her self from the lust of Maxentius the Tyrant. Adelhelmus, Abbot of Malmesbury cals them Beatas virgines quæ sic, &c.	How many tens of thousands more from every age might I recall, “who, though innocent, brought death upon themselves by their own hand,” and so forth. Razis in Maccabees is praised for it, Samson’s death approved. So Saul and Jonah sinned, and many worthy men and women “whose memory is honoured in the Church,” says Lemnichius, by killing themselves to preserve their chastity and honour when Rome was taken, as Augustine gives examples in The City of God, book 1, chapter 16. Jerome defends the same in his commentary On Jonah, and Ambrose, On Virginity, book 3, commends Pelagia for doing so. Eusebius, book 8, chapter 15, admires a Roman matron for the same deed, to save herself from the lust of the tyrant Maxentius. Aldhelm, abbot of Malmesbury, calls them “blessed virgins who thus,” and so forth.[4896]

[4894] Burton. Printed page 216, p: “Mac. 14. 42.” Maccabees 14:42; the book number is not printed.

[4896] Editor. Rhasis is Razis, whose story is in 2 Maccabees 14:37–46, distinct from the physician Rhazes. The original assertion “So did Saul and Jonas sin” is retained, although Jonah does not kill himself in the biblical narrative. Augustine, City of God 1.16–17, argues that violation without consent does not destroy chastity and distinguishes compassion for sufferers from approval of suicide. Burton’s brief account compresses a more complex discussion. Tully is Cicero; Austin is Augustine; Jerom is Jerome; Adelhelmus is normalized to Aldhelm.

Source page 217 Titus Pomponius Atticus, that wise, discreet, renowned Romane Senator, Tully's dear friend when he had been long sick, as he supposed of an incurable disease, vitamque produceret ad augendos dolores, sine spe salutis, was resolved voluntarily by famine, to dispatch himself, to be rid of his pain; and when as Agrippa, and the rest of his weeping friends earnestly besought him, osculantes obsecrarent ne id quod natura cogeret, ipse acceleraret, not to offer violence to himself, with a settled resolution he desired again they would approve of his good intent, & not seek to dehort him from it: And so constantly died, precesque eorum taciturnâ sua obstinatione depressit.	Titus Pomponius Atticus, that wise, prudent and renowned Roman senator, Cicero's dear friend, had long been ill with what he supposed was an incurable disease, "and was prolonging his life only to increase his pains, without hope of recovery." He resolved voluntarily to starve himself to death to be rid of his pain. When Agrippa and his other weeping friends earnestly begged him, "kissing him and beseeching him not to hasten himself what nature would compel," not to do violence to himself, "he firmly asked them in return to approve his good intention and not try to dissuade him." And so he died steadfastly, "silencing their prayers by his unspoken obstinacy."[4897]

[4897] Editor. Compare Cornelius Nepos, Atticus 21–22. Burton condenses the speech and shifts its wording; Nepos describes Agrippa kissing and pleading, while Burton's plural osculantes accompanies several friends. Nepos 1.3 says Atticus retained equestrian standing, so Burton's "Senator" is inaccurate. "Constantly" means steadfastly; "dehort" dissuade. The printed political status is retained in both columns and corrected here.

Even so did Corellius Rufus another grave Senator, by the relation of Plinius Secundus, epist. lib. 1. epist. 12. famish himself to death; pedibus correptus cum incredibiles cruciatus & indignissima tormenta pateretur, à cibis omnino abstinuit; neither he nor Hispulla his wife could divert him, but destinatus mori obstinatè magis, &c. die he would, and die he did. So did Lycurgus, Aristotle, Zeno, Chrysippus, Empedocles, with myriads, &c. In wars for a man to run rashly upon imminent danger, and present death, is accounted valor and magnanimity, [4898]to be the cause of his own, and many a thousands ruin besides, to commit wilfull murther in a manner, of himself and others, is a glorious thing, and he shall be crowned for it.	So too Corellius Rufus, another venerable senator, according to Pliny the Younger, Letters, book 1, letter 12, starved himself to death: "Afflicted in his feet, suffering incredible agonies and most grievous torments, he abstained entirely from food." Neither Pliny nor Rufus's wife Hispulla could dissuade him, but "resolved to die, more obstinately," and so forth: die he would, and die he did. So did Lycurgus, Aristotle, Zeno, Chrysippus, Empedocles and tens of thousands more. In war, for a man to rush rashly into imminent danger and immediate death is counted courage and greatness of spirit. To cause his own destruction and that of many thousands besides, in a manner to commit the wilful murder of himself and others, is a glorious deed, for which he will be crowned.[4899]

[4899] Editor. Compare Pliny, Letters 1.12.4–10. Burton condenses different parts of the letter: the symptoms begin in the feet and later spread, and the refusal of food occurs later. His fragment destinatus mori obstinatè magis does not reproduce Pliny's wording continuously. The following catalogue, and the marginal examples later in the block, contain deaths requiring individual verification. Burton then challenges the different judgments applied to self-destruction in war.

The [4900]Massegatæ in former times, [4901]Barbicians, and I know not what nations besides, did stifle their old men, after 70. years, to free them from those grievances incident to that age. So did the inhabitants of the Island of Choa, because their air was pure and good, and the people generally long lived, antevertebant fatum suum, priusquam manci forent, aut imbecillitas accederet, papavere vel cicuta, with Poppy or Hemlock they prevented death.	In former times the Massagetae, the Barbicians and I do not know what other peoples suffocated their old men after seventy years of age to free them from the troubles belonging to that age. So did the inhabitants of the island of Choa: because their air was pure and good, and the people generally long-lived, "they anticipated their fate, before they lost the use of their limbs or weakness came upon them, with poppy or hemlock." With poppy or hemlock they forestalled death.[4902]

[4902] Editor. "Stifle" means suffocate; "prevented death" here means anticipated or forestalled the death that would otherwise occur. "Manci" means maimed or deprived of the use of limbs. The scan's body marker p and marginal q refer to Boemus and are retained in the note record. The forms "Barbicians" and "Choa," and the Aelian and Boemus accounts, await exact-source collation.

S. Thomas Moore in his Vtopia commends voluntary death, if he be sibi aut aliis molestus, troublesome to himself or others, [4903](especially if to live be a torment to him) let him free himself with his own hands from this tedious life, as from a prison, or suffer himself to be freed by others. And 'tis the same tenent which Laertius relates of Zeno, of old, Justè sapiens sibi mortem consciscit, si in acerbis doloribus versetur, membrorum mutilatione aut morbis ægre curandis, and which Plato 9. de legibus approves, if old age, poverty, ignominy, &c. oppress, and which Fabius expresseth in effect (Præfat. 7. Institut.) [4904]Nemo nisi suâ culpâ diu dolet.	Sir Thomas More, in his Utopia, commends voluntary death if a person is "troublesome to himself or others," troublesome to himself or others: "Especially if living is a torment to him, let him free himself by his own hands from this weary life, as from a prison, or allow others to free him." It is the same doctrine that Laertius reports of Zeno long ago: "The wise man rightly takes his own life if he is suffering severe pain, mutilation of his limbs or diseases difficult to cure." Plato approves it in Laws, book 9, if old age, poverty, disgrace and the like oppress him; and Fabius expresses it in effect in the preface to book 7 of the Institutes: "No one suffers long except through his own fault."[4905]

[4903] Burton. Printed page 217, r: "Lib. 2. Præsertim quum tormentum ei vita sit, bona spe fretus, acerba vita velut à carcere se eximat, vel ab aliis eximi sua voluntate patiatur." "Book 2. Especially when life is a torment to him, let him, relying on good hope, release himself from a bitter life as from a prison, or willingly allow others to release him."

[4904] Burton. Printed page 217, s: "Nam quis amphoram exsiccans fæcem exorberet (Seneca epist. 58.) quis in pœnas et risum viveret? stulti est manere in vita cum sit miser." "For who, draining a jar, would swallow the dregs? (Seneca, Letter 58.) Who would live for punishments and ridicule? It is a fool's part to remain alive when he is wretched."

[4905] Editor. The source's "S." before Thomas More is expanded as "Sir." Utopia, book 2, describes a fictional community's practice; it is not simply an unqualified personal recommendation by More. The surrounding account stresses care for the sick, consent and continued care for those who decline. Burton's Laertius/Zeno, Plato Laws 9 and Fabius references remain for detailed collation; Fabius is Quintilian. The marginal jar image adapts Seneca, Letter 58.32, while the following sentences are not thereby verified quotations.

It is an ordinary thing in China (saith Mat. Riccius the Jesuit) [4906]if they be in dispair of better fortunes, or tyred and tortured with misery, to bereave themselves of life, and many times to spite their enemies the more, to hang at their door. Tacitus the Historian, Plutarch the Philosopher, much approve a voluntary departure, and Aust. de civ. Dei. l. 1. c. 29. defends a violent death, so that it be undertaken in a good cause, nemo sic mortuus, qui non fuerat aliquando moriturus; quid autem interest, quo mortis genere vita ista finiatur, quando ille cui finitur, iterum mori non cogitur? &c.	It is common in China, says the Jesuit Matteo Ricci, "if they despair of better fortunes or are wearied and tortured by misery, to deprive themselves of life, and often, to spite their enemies further, to hang themselves at their door." Tacitus the historian and Plutarch the philosopher greatly approve a voluntary departure; and Augustine, The City of God, book 1, chapter 29, defends a violent death, provided it is undertaken in a good cause: "No one has died in this way who was not going to die at some time; and what does it matter by what kind of death this life is ended, when the person whose life ends is not compelled to die again?" And so forth.[4907]

[4906] Burton. Printed page 217, t: "Expedit. ad Sinas l. 1. c. 9. Vel bonorum desperatione, vel malorum perpessione fracti & fatigati, vel manus violentas sibi inferunt vel ut inimicis suis ægre faciant, &c." "Expedition to China, book 1, chapter 9. Broken and wearied either by despair of good things or by enduring evils, they either lay violent hands upon themselves, or, to cause distress to their enemies, etc."

[4907] Editor. Mat. Riccius is Matteo Ricci; the China report remains attributed and awaits source collation. The quoted Augustine sentences occur in City of God 1.11, not 1.29 as printed. They concern people killed by violence and the common necessity of death; they do not amount to a general approval of suicide. Burton's characterization is retained and the difference stated here.

no man so [4908]voluntarily dies, but volens nolens, he must die at last, and our life is subject to innumerable casualties, who knows when they may happen, utrum satius est unam perpeti moriendo, an omnes timere vivendo, rather suffer one, than fear all. Death is better than a bitter life, Eccl. 30. 17. [4909]And a harder choice to live in fear, than by once dying, to be freed from all.	No one dies voluntarily in this way who, "willing or unwilling," must not die in the end. Our life is subject to innumerable accidents—who knows when they may happen? "Is it better to undergo one by dying, or to fear them all by living?" Better to suffer one than fear them all. "Death is better than a bitter life," Ecclesiasticus 30:17. And it is a harder choice to live in fear than, by dying once, to be freed from all.[4910]
Source page 217–454 Theombrotus Ambraciotes perswaded I know not how many hundreds of his auditors, by a luculent oration he made of the miseries of this, and happiness of that other life, to precipitate themselves. And having read Platos divine tract de anima, for examples sake led the way first. That neat Epigram of Callimachus will tell you as much,	Theombrotus of Ambracia persuaded I do not know how many hundreds of his hearers, by an eloquent speech on the miseries of this life and the happiness of the next, to throw themselves to their deaths. Having read Plato's divine treatise On the Soul, he led the way himself to set an example. That elegant epigram of Callimachus will tell you as much:[4911]

[4908] Burton. Printed page 217, u: "So did Anthony, Galba, Vitellius, Otho, Aristotle himself, &c. Ajax in dispair; Cleopatra to save her honor." "So did Antony, Galba, Vitellius, Otho, Aristotle himself, etc.; Ajax in despair; Cleopatra to save her honour." These are Burton's examples; their historical accuracy is not assumed.

Source page 454 Jamque vale Soli cum diceret Ambrociotes, In Stygios fertur desiluisse lacus. Morte nihil dignum passus: sed forte Platonis Divini eximium de nece legit opus.	As the Ambracian said farewell to the sun, He is said to have leapt into the waters of Styx. He had suffered nothing to deserve death, but happened to read Divine Plato's remarkable work on dying.[4912]
[4913]Calenus and his Indians, hated of old to die a natural death: the Circumcellians and Donatists, loathing life, compelled others to make them away, with many such: [4914]but these are false and Pagan positions, prophane Stoicall Paradoxes, wicked examples, it boots not what Heathen Philosophers determine in this kind, they are impious, abominable, and upon a wrong ground. No evil is to be done that good may come of it; reclamant Christus, reclamant Scriptura, God, and all good men are [4915]against it.	Calanus and his Indians of old hated to die a natural death; the Circumcellions and Donatists, loathing life, compelled others to kill them, and there are many such examples. But these are false and pagan doctrines, profane Stoic paradoxes, wicked examples. It does not matter what pagan philosophers decide in this matter: these doctrines are impious, abominable and founded on error. "No evil is to be done that good may come of it"; "Christ protests, Scripture protests." God and all good men are against it.[4916]

[4915] Burton. Printed page 454, star: "See Lipsius Manuduc. ad Stoicam philosophiam lib. 3. dissert. 22. D. Kings 14. Lect. on Jonas. D. Abbots 6. Lect. on the same Prophet." See Lipsius, Introduction to Stoic Philosophy, book 3, dissertation 22; Doctor King's fourteenth lecture on Jonah; Doctor Abbot's sixth lecture on the same prophet.

[4916] Editor. Calenus is normalized to Calanus. Circumcellions and Donatists refer to groups in late-antique North African Christianity; Burton repeats hostile accounts of their conduct. "Positions" means doctrines or propositions; "it boots not" means it does not matter. The scan's reclamant with singular subjects is retained; the right gives the intended sense. The Seneca marginal story belongs to the rhetorical Controversies tradition, not automatically to the younger Seneca's philosophical writings.

He that stabs another can kill his body; but he that stabs himself, kils his own Soul. [4917]Malè meretur, qui dat mendico, quod edat; nam & illud quod dat, perit; & illi producit vitam ad miseriam: he that gives a begger an almes (as that Comical Poet said) doth ill, because he doth but prolong his miseries.	He who stabs another can kill his body; but he who stabs himself kills his own soul. "He does a disservice who gives a beggar something to eat: what he gives is lost, and he prolongs the beggar's life for misery." He who gives a beggar alms, as that comic poet said, does harm because he only prolongs his misery.[4918]
But Lactantius l. 6. c. 7. de vero cultu, cals it a detestable opinion, and fully confutes it, lib. 3. de sap. cap. 18. and S. Austin ep. 52. ad Macedonium, cap. 61. ad Dulcitium Tribunum: so doth Hierom to Marcella of Blesilla's death, Non recipio tales animas &c. he cals such men martyres stultæ Philosophiæ: so doth Cyprian de duplici martyrio; Si qui sic moriantur, aut infirmitas, aut ambitio, aut dementia cogit eos: 'tis meer madness so to do, [4919]furor est ne moriare mori. To this effect writes Arist. 3. Ethic. Lipsius Manuduc. ad Stoicam Philosophiam lib. 3. dissertat. 23. but it needs no confutation.	But Lactantius, On True Worship, book 6, chapter 7, calls it a detestable opinion, and fully refutes it in On Wisdom, book 3, chapter 18; so does Saint Augustine, Letter 52 to Macedonius and chapter 61 to the tribune Dulcitius; and Jerome to Marcella on Blesilla's death: "I do not receive such souls," and so forth. He calls such men "martyrs of foolish philosophy." So too Cyprian, On the Two Kinds of Martyrdom: "If any die in this way, weakness, ambition or madness compels them." It is sheer madness to do so: "It is madness to die so as not to die." Aristotle writes to this effect in Ethics, book 3, and Lipsius in his Introduction to Stoic Philosophy, book 3, dissertation 23. But it needs no refutation.[4920]

[4918] Editor. Compare Plautus, Trinummus 339–340. Burton abbreviates and alters the wording, including producit where the consulted text has prodit. This is a character's speech in a comedy, followed here by Burton's own English gloss. Its claim is introduced for rejection in the next passage. The preceding statement about the soul expresses Burton's theological argument.

[4920] Editor. Martial, Epigrams 2.80.2, is a question that Burton makes a statement. Lactantius's On Wisdom is Divine Institutes 3; chapter 18 opposes voluntary death. On True Worship is book 6, but Burton's 6.7 locator remains unexplained. Jerome's passage on Blesilla is Letter 39.3 to Paula, not Marcella: Jerome places the warning in Christ's mouth. Augustine's letter to Dulcitius is numbered 204 in the consulted Latin, especially sections 5–8. The printed cap. 61. is preserved; its numbering history, the Macedonius reference and the Cyprian attribution remain to be checked.

This only let me add, that in some cases, those hard [4921]censures of such as offer violence to their own persons, or in some desperate fit to others, which sometimes they do, by stabbing, slashing, &c. are to be mitigated, as in such as are mad, beside themselves for the time, or found to have been long melancholy, and that in extremity, they know not what they do, deprived of reason, judgement, all, as a ship that is void of a Pilot, must needs [4922]impuge upon the next rock or sands, and suffer shipwrack.	Let me add only this: in some cases those harsh judgments against people who do violence to themselves, or in some desperate fit to others—as they sometimes do by stabbing, slashing and so forth—should be softened. This applies to those who are mad, out of their minds for the time being, or found to have long suffered from melancholy, and who in its extremity do not know what they are doing, deprived of reason, judgment, everything: just as a ship without a pilot must strike the nearest rock or sandbank and be wrecked.[4923]

[4921] Burton. Printed page 454, b: “As to be buried out of Christian burial with a stake. Idem Plato 9. de legibus, vult separatim sepeliri, qui sibi ipsis mortem consciscunt, &c. lose their goods, &c.” “Such as being buried outside Christian burial with a stake. The same Plato, Laws, book 9, requires those who take their own lives to be buried separately, etc.; to lose their property, etc.”

[4923] Editor. “Beside themselves” means temporarily out of their minds. The printed “impuge” is retained on the left; the ship image and marginal impingit establish the intended sense “strike.” “Censures” here includes punitive judgments, illustrated by burial and property penalties in the margin. These are historical claims, not a statement of present law. Burton argues that loss of reason should mitigate judgment.

[4924]P. Forestus hath a story of two melancholy brethren, that made away themselves, and for so foul a fact, were accordingly censured, to be infamously buried, as in such cases they use: to terrifie others, as it did the Milesian Virgins of old, but upon farther examination of their misery and madness, the censure was [4925]revoked, and they were solemnly interred, as Saul was by David 2 Sam. 2. 4. and Seneca well adviseth, Irascere interfectōri, sed miserere interfecti; be justly offended with him as he was a murderer, but pitty him now as a dead man.	Pieter van Foreest tells a story of two melancholy brothers who killed themselves and for so terrible a deed were accordingly sentenced to a dishonourable burial, as is customary in such cases, to frighten others, as it did the maidens of Miletus long ago. But after further investigation of their suffering and madness, the judgment was revoked and they were solemnly buried, as Saul was by David, 2 Samuel 2:4. And Seneca gives good advice: “Be angry with the killer, but pity the one killed.” Be justly offended with him as a murderer, but pity him now as a dead man.[4926]

[4925] Burton. Printed page 454, e: “Seneca tract. 1. l. 8. c. 4. Lex, Homicida insepultus abjiciatur, contradicitur; Eo quod afferre sibi manus coactus sit assiduis malis; summam infælicitatem suam in hoc removit, quod existimabat licere misero mori.” “Seneca, treatise 1, book 8, chapter 4. The law: ‘Let a murderer be cast out unburied.’ It is opposed on the grounds that he was driven by continual misfortunes to lay hands upon himself; in this he removed his extreme unhappiness, because he thought a wretched man was permitted to die.” The printed locator is retained.

[4926] Editor. Forestus is Pieter van Foreest. “Fact” means deed; “infamously” dishonourably; “solemnly” with proper ceremony. In 2 Samuel 2:4–5, David learns that the men of Jabesh-gilead buried Saul and blesses them; he did not himself perform the burial. Burton’s wording is retained. The burial rule and appeal to pity come from Seneca the Elder, Controversies 8.4, a rhetorical debate about denying burial to a man who killed himself. Its opposing speeches are not a simple declaration of Roman law. Foreest’s brothers, the Milesian story and the other Senecan marginal case remain uncollated.

Thus of their goods and bodies, we can dispose; but what shall become of their Souls, God alone can tell; his mercy may come inter pontem & fontem, inter gladium & jugulum, betwixt the bridge and the brook, the knife and the throat. Quod cuiquam contigit, cuivis potest: Who knows how he may be tempted? It is his case, it may be thine: [4927]Quæ sua sors hodie est, cras fore vestra potest. We ought not to be so rash and rigorous in our censures, as some are; charity will judge and hope the best; God be merciful unto us all.	In this way we can dispose of their property and bodies; but what will become of their souls, God alone can tell. His mercy may come "between bridge and stream, between sword and throat"—between the bridge and the brook, the knife and the throat. "What has happened to anyone can happen to anyone": who knows how he may be tempted? It is his case; it may be yours. "The fate that is his today may be yours tomorrow." We ought not to be as rash and severe in our judgments as some are. Charity will judge and hope for the best. God be merciful to us all.[4928]

[4928] Editor. "Goods" means property. The bridge and blade images leave open the possibility of last-moment divine mercy. The two Latin maxims express shared vulnerability; the precise Buchanan elegy and the source of Quod cuiquam contigit, cuivis potest remain unverified. The final FINIS closes the First Partition, not the book. The next leaf begins the synopsis of the Second Partition, on treatment.

Can saints and their relics help with this affliction? Question 2. Is it lawful to appeal to them for help in this case? Sections: 2.1.2; 2.1.3.

[4929] Editor. The four-page branching synopsis is reset as an indented outline, preserving its categories. Printed references remain in the original column; modern references follow the body headings. "Member" remains Burton's subdivision between section and subsection. Zodiac signs and the crescent are cross-reference marks here: the modern column names their destinations. The inverted balance-like mark after passions is represented by ♎. These leaves are unnumbered (PDF323–326, sequence223–226); running heads, catchwords and signatures are excluded.

[4930] Editor. Jove is Jupiter. Burton reuses a classical opening formula in a Christian context, meaning that one must begin with God. "Immediately" and "mediately" distinguish direct divine action from action through natural instruments. "Bounty" includes generosity in recompensing the physician.

Wine and other drinks that are not too strong, etc. Sections: 2.2.1.1.

It is either: General to all forms: Alterative treatment: Simple substances that alter melancholy, with a digression on foreign simples. Subsection 2.[4932] Sections: 2.4.1.1; 2.4.1.2.

[4932] Editor. “Simples” are single medicinal substances, contrasted with compound preparations. “Alterative” treatment aims to change the harmful qualities or condition of the humours; purging expels them. “Exotick” means foreign. The listed uses belong to Burton’s account of humoral medicine.

Subsection 3. Herbs. For the heart: borage, bugloss, scorzonera, etc. For the head: balm, hops, water lily, etc. Liver: eupatory, mugwort, etc. Stomach: wormwood, centaury, pennyroyal. Spleen: ceterach, ash, tamarisk. To purify the blood: endive, chicory, etc. Against wind: oregano, fennel, aniseed, etc. 4. Precious stones, such as emeralds, chelidonies, etc.; minerals, such as gold, etc.[4933] Sections: 2.4.1.3; 2.4.1.4. or Compounds altering melancholy, with a digression of Compounds. 1. Subs. Inwardly taken liquid fluide: Wines; as of Hellebor, Buglosse, Tameriske, &c. Syrupes of borage, buglosse, hops, Epithyme, endive, succory, &c. or consisting: Conserves of violets, maidenhair, borage, buglosse, roses, &c. Confections; Treacle, Mithridate, Eclegmes or Linctures.	Or compound medicines that alter melancholy, with a digression on compounds. Subsection 5.[4934] Taken internally: Liquid: Fluid: wines of hellebore, bugloss, tamarisk, etc. Syrups of borage, bugloss, hops, epithyme, endive, chicory, etc. Or thick: conserves of violets, maidenhair, borage, bugloss, roses, etc. Confections: theriac, mithridate, and medicines taken by licking, or linctuses. Sections: 2.4.1.5.

[4933] Editor. Older drug names are retained where a precise modern identification would overstate the evidence. Ceterach is a spleenwort; eupatory and epithyme are historical medicinal names whose exact species depend on context. “Smaragdes” means emeralds; chelidonies are the legendary swallow-stones. The botanical and mineral lists require fuller identification in the final glossary.

[4934] Editor. The compound-medicine heading prints “1. Subs.” The corresponding body heading is 2.4.1.5, so the modern synopsis gives Subsection 5; the original preserves 1. “Consisting” means having a thicker consistency. Conserves and confections are prepared medicines, often sweetened. Treacle here means theriac, a compound antidote, not syrup; mithridate is another compound antidote. Eclegmes and linctures are medicines taken by licking.

Or treatment particular to the three distinct forms: see Section 5, Members 1–3. Sections: 2.4.1.5; 2.4.2; 2.5.1; 2.5.2; 2.5.3.

[4936] Editor. Cerotes are wax-based plasters; cataplasms poultices; frontals applications to the forehead; fomentations warm moist applications. “Epithymes” here means external medicinal applications, distinct from the herb epithyme above. Sacks and bags hold medicinal ingredients. Printed alablastritum is retained as a preparation name; populeum denotes poplar ointment.

Not swallowed, as gargarisms, masticatories, &c. or Nostrils; sneezing powders, odoraments, perfumes, &c. or Inferior pars, as Clysters strong and weak, and suppositories of Castilian sope, hony boiled, &c.	Or Subsection 3. Compound medicines that purge melancholy.[4937] Through the upper parts: The mouth: Swallowed: Liquid, such as potions, juleps, syrups, wines of hellebore, bugloss, etc. Solid, such as Armenian stone and lapis lazuli preparations, Indian pills, fumitory pills, etc. Electuaries: diasena, the confection of Hamech, Hierologladium, etc. Or not swallowed, such as gargles, substances to chew, etc. Or the nostrils: sneezing powders, scents, perfumes, etc. Or through the lower parts: strong and weak enemas, and suppositories of Castile soap, boiled honey, etc. Sections: 2.4.2.3.

[4937] Editor. Juleps are sweet medicinal drinks; electuaries are medicines mixed into a soft mass; masticatories are chewed to stimulate secretions; clysters are enemas. The source prints “Inferior pars” and “Hierologladium”; the former is rendered “lower parts,” while the latter remains an unresolved preparation name rather than being silently replaced by Hierologadium. The heading compounds includes stones because it concerns their prepared forms.

Exercise of body and mind, neither too strenuous nor too slight; avoidance of the mind's passions and disturbances. 2. Bloodletting, if necessary or if the blood is corrupt, from the arm, forehead, etc., or with cupping glasses. Sections: 2.5.1.1; 2.5.1.2.

[4938] Editor. Phlebotomy means bloodletting; "horsleeches" here means leeches used for that purpose. Dropax is a pitch plaster; synapismus a mustard application. An "issue" is an artificially made opening kept discharging. "Boaring" means boring or perforation; the outline supplies no complete procedure. These historical operations are not modern treatment recommendations.

These are used if gentler medicines have no effect; with Arnoldus, bugloss wine, senna, cassia, myrobalans, drinkable gold, or first Hamech's confection, Indian pills, hiera, and pills of Armenian stone and lapis lazuli.[4939] Sections: 2.5.1.3.

[4939] Editor. This compressed list does not unambiguously distribute its remedies among the named physicians. Its sequence is preserved; "or before" is rendered "or first," without imposing a detailed regimen. Helleborismus means hellebore treatment; aqua mirabilis "wonderful water"; aurum potabile "drinkable gold"; Hiera is a traditional compound drug name. Montanus is Giovanni Battista da Monte; Matthiolus Pietro Andrea Mattioli; Quercetanus Joseph Du Chesne. Exact recipes and the reading Pulvis Hali remain for collation.

Remedies for accompanying symptoms, such as: To induce sleep, these are: Scents of roses and violets. Rinsing the head with decoctions of water lily, lettuce, mallows, etc. Lotions, ointments and bags applied over the heart. Warm oil compresses for the belly. Baths of fresh water in which mallows, violets, roses, water lilies, borage flowers, rams' heads, etc., have been boiled.[4941] Sections: 2.5.1.6.

[4940] Editor. "Averters" divert the supposed seat or flow of the disorder; "cordials" strengthen the heart, "resolvers" disperse, and "hinderers" check it. Haemorrhoidal bleeding was treated as an evacuation in this system. "Without scarification" is retained in its printed position despite the compressed syntax. Bezoar is a stone-like animal concretion; the compound names are retained without reconstructing their formulas.

[4941] Editor. "Accidents" means accompanying symptoms. "Sweet water" is fresh water. "Ramsheads" is transcribed and translated literally; its unusual inclusion in a bath should not be silently converted into a plant name without confirming Burton's later discussion and cited source.

Against terrifying dreams: avoid late suppers, peas, cabbage, venison and foods that are hard to digest; use balm, hart's-tongue, etc. Against redness and blushing: internal and external remedies. Sections: 2.5.1.6.

[4942] Editor. Requies Nicholai means "Nicholas's Rest"; Philonium Romanum "Roman Philonium"; Laudanum Paracelsi "Paracelsus's laudanum." They are names of compound medicines. The later Culpeper dispensatory lists a Requies preparation. These names do not establish identity with modern laudanum or a single surviving recipe. The Latin opii is rendered opium and Verbasco mullein.

The cure of hypochondriacal, or windy, melancholy. Subsection 1. Bloodletting if necessary. Diet, preparatory medicines, treatments that draw the disorder away, heart-strengthening medicines and purgatives, as above, but less forceful. Using boiled pennyroyal, wormwood and centaury, which alone has cured many. Stimulating urination with aniseed, daucus, asarum, etc., and stools, if necessary, with enemas and suppositories. Attending to the spleen, stomach, liver and regions beneath the ribs. Using theriac occasionally in winter. Sometimes vomiting after meals, if the disorder is long established.[4943] Sections: 2.5.3.1.

[4943] Editor. Hypochondriacal melancholy here is an abdominal or “windy” form associated with the organs beneath the ribs, not the modern diagnosis of illness anxiety. The phrase “which alone hath cured many” is left as a claim within Burton’s synopsis. Daucus and asarum remain historical drug names without an asserted exact species.

Or compounds, such as: Dianisum, diagalanga, diaciminum, dicalaminthes; the electuary of bay berries, Benedicta laxativa, etc.; wind-dispelling powder, and the powder described in the Florentine Antidotary, aromaticum, rosatum, mithridate. Or used externally: cupping glasses applied below the ribs without incisions; oils of camomile, rue and aniseed, their decoctions, etc.[4944] Sections: 2.5.3.2.

[4944] Editor. Enula is elecampane; “china” is china root, not china ware; “condite” means preserved; “pils” here peel. Cary is rendered caraway and grana paradisi grains of paradise. Latin labels identify a bay-berry electuary and wind-dispelling powder. Benedicta laxativa, aromaticum and rosatum remain preparation names. Printed dicalaminthes is retained. Abbreviations with a bar over the final letter in the preceding three compound names are expanded; precise formula identities await collation.

Source page 216 Inveterate Melancholy, howsoever it may seeme to be a continuate, inexorable disease, hard to be cured, accompanying them to their graves most part, as [4946]Montanus observes, yet many times it may be helped, even that which is most violent, or at least, according to the same [4947]Author, it may be mitigated and much eased. Nil desperandum. It may be hard to cure, but not impossible for him that is most grievously affected, if he be but willing to be helped.	Long-established melancholy may seem a persistent, unrelenting disease, difficult to cure, accompanying most sufferers to the grave, as Montanus observes. Yet it can often be helped, even in its most violent form; or at least, according to the same author, it can be moderated and greatly eased. “We must not despair.” A cure may be difficult, but it is not impossible for even the worst sufferer, if he is willing to accept help.
Upon this good hope I will proceed, using the same method in the Cure, which I have formerly used in the rehearsing of the causes, first General, then Particular; and those according to their severall species. Of these cures some be Lawfull, some again Unlawfull, which though frequent, familiar, and often used, yet justly censured, and to be controverted.	With this good hope I shall proceed, using the same method for the cure that I used earlier in recounting the causes: first general treatments, then particular ones, arranged according to the different forms of the disease. Some of these cures are lawful, others unlawful. Although the latter are widespread, familiar and often used, they are rightly condemned and must be examined.

[4945] Editor. The opening treatment page is actually printed 216 (PDF327, sequence227); the following pages are printed 220 and 221. These numbers are retained without assuming a universal offset. The three occurrences governed by “THE FIRST” in the source heading are expanded as Section 1, Member 1 and Subsection 1. This subsection ends immediately before Member 2 on printed222/PDF330.

As first, whether by these diabolicall means, which are commonly practised by the devil and his Ministers, Sorcerers, Witches, Magicians, &c. by Spells, Cabalisticall words, Charmes, Characters, Images, Amulets, Ligatures, Philters, Incantations, &c. this disease & the like may be cured? and if they may, whether it be lawfull to make use of them, those magneticall cures, or for our good to seek after such means in any case?	First, can this disease and similar ones be cured by the diabolical means commonly practised by the Devil and his agents—sorcerers, witches, magicians, etc.—through spells, cabalistic words, charms, inscribed signs, images, amulets, magical bindings, love potions, incantations, etc.? If they can, is it lawful to use these means, including magnetic cures, or to seek them for our benefit in any circumstances?[4948]
Source page 216–220; PDF327–328 The first, whether they can do any such cures, is questioned amongst many Writers, some affirming, some denying. Valesius cont. med. lib. 5. cap. 6. Malleus Maleficor. Heurnius, l. 3. pract. med. cap. 28. Cælius lib. 16. c. 16. Delrio Tom. 3. Wierus lib. 2. de præstig. dæm. Libanius, Lavater de spect. part. 2. cap. 7. Holbrenner the Lutheran in Pistorium, Polydor Virg. l. 1. de prodig. Tandlerus, Lemnius, (Hippocrates, and Avicenna amongst the rest) deny that spirits or devils have any power over us, and referre all with Pomponatius of Padua to naturall causes and humours.	The first question—whether they can perform such cures—is disputed by many writers, some affirming and others denying it. Valesius, Medical Controversies, book 5, chapter 6; the Hammer of Witches; Heurnius, Practical Medicine, book 3, chapter 28; Caelius, book 16, chapter 16; Delrio, volume 3; Wierus, On the Deceptions of Demons, book 2; Libanius; Lavater, On Spectres, part 2, chapter 7; Holbrenner the Lutheran, Against Pistorius; Polydore Vergil, On Prodigies, book 1; Tandlerus; Lemnius—and Hippocrates and Avicenna among the rest—deny that spirits or devils have any power over us. With Pomponazzi of Padua, they attribute everything to natural causes and humours.[4949]

[4949] Editor. The sweeping list of deniers is retained as Burton prints it. It must not be treated as a verified summary of every writer named: Delrio, for example, also appears later among authorities allowing that such effects occur. Libanius and Holbrenner remain the source's names pending identification; no silent change to Libavius or another writer has been made. Abbreviated titles are translated only where their sense is reasonably clear.

They can make fire it shall not burn, fetch back theeves or stolen goods, shew their absent faces in a glasse, make serpents ly still, stanch bloud, salve gouts, epilepsies, biting of mad dogs, tooth-ach, melancholy, & omnia mundi mala, make men immortall, young again as the [4950]Spanish Marques is said to have done by one of his slaves, and some, which juglers in [4951]China maintain stil (as Tragaultius writes) that they can do by their extraordinary skill in physick, and some of our moderne Chymists by their strange limbecks, by their spells, Philosophers stones and charms.	They can make fire incapable of burning, bring back thieves or stolen goods, show the faces of absent people in a mirror, make serpents lie still, stop bleeding, cure gout, epilepsy, mad-dog bites, toothache, melancholy, "and every evil in the world." They can make men immortal or young again, as a Spanish marquis is said to have become through one of his slaves. Some of these feats, tricksters in China still maintain—as Trigault writes—that they can accomplish through their extraordinary medical skill; and some of our modern alchemists claim the same for their extraordinary stills, spells, philosophers' stones and charms.[4952]

[4953]Many doubt, saith Nicholas Taurellus, whether the devil can cure such diseases he hath not made, and some flatly deny it, howsoever common experience confirms to our astonishment, that Magicians can worke such feats, and that the devil without impediment can penetrate through all the parts of our bodies, and cure such maladies by means to us unknown.	Many people doubt, says Nicolaus Taurellus, whether the Devil can cure diseases that he has not caused, and some flatly deny it. Yet common experience confirms, to our astonishment, that magicians can perform such feats, and that the Devil can penetrate every part of our bodies without hindrance and cure such diseases by means unknown to us.
Daneus in his tract de Sortiariis subscribes to this of Taurellus; Erastus de lamiis, maintaineth as much, and so do most divines, that out of their excellent knowledge and long experience they can commit [4954]agentes cum patientibus, colligere semina rerum, eaque materiæ applicare, as Austin infers de Civ. Dei & de Trinit. lib. 3. cap. 7. & 8. they can worke stupend and admirable conclusions; we see the effects only, but not the causes of them.	Daneau, in his treatise On Witches, agrees with Taurellus; Erastus, in On Witches, maintains the same, as do most theologians: through their exceptional knowledge and long experience, they can bring together "active agents and the things they act upon, collect the seeds of things, and apply them to matter," as Augustine concludes in The City of God and On the Trinity, book 3, chapters 7 and 8. They can produce astounding and wonderful results. We see only the effects, not their causes.[4955]

[4955] Editor. Compare Augustine, On the Trinity 3.7.12–3.8.13. The Latin explains that evil angels act only within divine permission and are not creators; hidden "seeds" lie within the elements and develop when suitable conditions occur. Burton's active-agents formula and compressed sentence are not a continuous quotation of these sections. His unspecified City of God reference and the immediate intermediary remain unlocated.

Nothing so familiar as to hear of such cures. Sorcerers are too common; cunning men, wizards, and white-witches, as they call them, in every village, which if they be sought unto, will help almost all infirmities of body and minde, Servitores in Latine, and they have commonly St Catherines wheel printed in the roof of their mouth, or in some other part about them, resistunt incantatorum præstigiis, ([4956]Boissardus writes) morbos à sagis motos propulsant, &c. that to doubt of it any longer, [4957]or not to beleeve, were to run into that other Sceptical extreme of incredulity, saith Taurellus.	Nothing is more familiar than reports of such cures. Sorcerers are all too common: cunning men, wizards and "white witches," as they call them, in every village. If consulted, they will help with almost every infirmity of body and mind. They are called servitores—"servants"—in Latin, and commonly have St Catherine's wheel imprinted on the roof of the mouth or elsewhere on the body. "They resist the deceptions of enchanters," Boissard writes, "and drive away illnesses caused by witches," etc. To doubt this any longer, or refuse to believe it, would be to fall into the opposite sceptical extreme of disbelief, says Taurellus.[4958]
Leo Suavius in his Comment upon Paracelsus seemes to make it an art, which ought to be approved: Pistorius and others stifly maintaine the use of charms, words, characters, &c. Ars vera est, sed pauci artifices reperiuntur; The art is true, but there be but a few that have skill in it.	Leo Suavius, in his commentary on Paracelsus, seems to present it as an art that deserves approval. Pistorius and others stoutly defend the use of charms, words, inscribed signs, etc. "The art is real, but few practitioners are to be found": the art is true, but few people possess its skill.

[4956] Burton. Printed page 220, third star: "Cap. 11. de Servat." Chapter 11, on Servat. The abbreviated heading is retained; its precise expansion awaits collation.

[4957] Burton. Printed page 220, e: "Hæc alii rident, sed vereor ne dum nolumus esse creduli, vitium non effugiamus incredulitatis." "Others laugh at these things; but I fear that, in our unwillingness to be credulous, we may fail to escape the fault of disbelief."

[4958] Editor. Cunning people and "white witches" are presented as practitioners of beneficial magic. The alleged bodily wheel-mark is a reported credential, not a verified physical sign. The Latin servitores means servants; Boissard's marginal abbreviation de Servat. is preserved separately. Burton moves between reporting claims and voicing assent, before raising the question of lawfulness.

Source page 220–221; PDF328–329 Marcellus Donatus lib. 2. de hist. mir. cap. 1. proves out of [4959]Josephus eight bookes of antiquities, that Solomon so cured all the diseases of the minde by spells, charms, and drove away devils, and that Eleazar did as much before Vespasian. Langius in his med. epist. holds Jupiter Menecrates, that did so many stupend cures in his time, to have used this art, and that he was no other then a Magician. Many famous cures are daily done in this kinde, the devil is an expert Physician, as Godelman calls him, lib. 1. cap. 18. and God permits oftentimes these Witches and Magicians to produce such effects, as Lavater cap. 3. lib. 8. part. 3. cap. 1. Polid. Virg. lib. 1. de prodigiis, Delrio and others admit.	Marcellus Donatus, Medical Wonders, book 2, chapter 1, argues from Josephus's eighth book of Antiquities that Solomon cured all diseases of the mind by spells and charms, and drove away devils; and that Eleazar did the same before Vespasian. Lange, in his Medical Letters, believes that Menecrates, called Jupiter, who performed so many astonishing cures in his time, used this art and was nothing more than a magician. Many celebrated cures of this kind take place daily. The Devil is an expert physician, as Godelmann calls him, book 1, chapter 18; and God often permits these witches and magicians to produce such effects, as Lavater, chapter 3, book 8, part 3, chapter 1; Polydore Vergil, On Prodigies, book 1; Delrio and others admit.[4960]
Source page 221 Such cures may be done, and as Paracels. Tom. 4. de morb. ament. stifly maintains, [4961]they cannot otherwise be cured but by spels, seales, and spirituall physick. [4962]Arnoldus lib. de sigillis, sets down the making of them, so doth Rulandus and many others.	Such cures can be performed; and, as Paracelsus firmly maintains in volume 4, On Diseases of the Insane, these diseases can be cured only by spells, seals and spiritual medicine. Arnoldus, in his book On Seals, explains how to make them, as do Ruland and many others.

Hoc posito, they can effect such cures, the maine question is whether it be lawfull in a desperate case, to crave their help, or aske a Wisards advice. 'Tis a common practice of some men to go first to a Witch, and then to a Physician, if one cannot the other shall, Flectere si nequeant superos Acheronta movebunt.	"Assuming this"—that they can effect such cures—the main question is whether, in a desperate case, it is lawful to ask for their help or consult a wizard. Some people commonly go first to a witch and then to a physician: if one cannot help, the other shall. "If they cannot bend the gods above, they will stir up Acheron."[4963]
[4964]It matters not, saith Paracelsus, whether it be God or the Devil, Angels or unclean spirits cure him, so that he be eased. If a man fall into a ditch, as he prosecutes it, what matters it whether a friend or an enemy help him out? and if I be troubled with such a malady, what care I whether the devil himselfe, or any of his ministers by Gods permission redeem me?	It does not matter, says Paracelsus, whether God or the Devil, angels or unclean spirits cure the patient, provided he gains relief. If a man falls into a ditch, he continues, what does it matter whether a friend or an enemy helps him out? And if I suffer from such a disease, why should I care whether the Devil himself or one of his agents delivers me, with God's permission?
He calls a [4965]Magician Gods Minister and his Vicar, applying that of vos estis dii prophanely to them, for which he is lashed by T. Erastus part. 1. fol. 45. And elsewhere he encourageth his patients to have a good faith, [4966]a strong imagination, and they shall finde the effects; let Divines say to the contrary what they will.	He calls a magician God's minister and representative, profanely applying to magicians the words "you are gods"; for this Thomas Erastus lashes him in part 1, folio 45. Elsewhere he encourages his patients to have firm faith and a strong imagination, and they will see the effects, whatever theologians may say against it.[4967]

[4963] Editor. Burton adapts Virgil, Aeneid 7.312. Juno's "if I cannot" and "I shall stir" become "if they cannot" and "they will stir." Acheron, an underworld river, stands for the powers below. The adapted plural is retained in the fresh translation.

[4964] Burton. Printed page 221, i: "Lib. 1. de occult. Philos. nihil refert an Deus an diabolus, angeli an immundi spiritus ægro opem ferant, modo morbus curetur." Book 1, On Occult Philosophy: "It makes no difference whether God or the Devil, angels or unclean spirits help the sick person, provided the disease is cured."

[4966] Burton. Printed page 221, l: "Utere forti imaginatione & experieris effectum, dicant in adversum quicquid volunt Theologi." "Use a strong imagination and you will experience the effect, whatever theologians may wish to say against it."

[4967] Editor. "You are gods" echoes Psalm 82:6, quoted in John 10:34. Burton calls its application to magicians profane. "Vicar" means representative or deputy. Faith and imagination are presented here as claims of Paracelsian medicine; the cited Paracelsus and Erastus passages still require exact collation.

He proves and contends that many diseases cannot otherwise be cured. Incantatione orti incantatione curari debent; if they be caused by incantation, [4968]they must be cured by incantation. Constantinus lib. 4. approves of such remedies: Bartolus the Lawyer, Peter Ærodius rerum Judic. lib. 3. tit. 7. Salicetus Godefridus, with others of that sect, allow of them; modò sint ad sanitatem, quæ à magis fiunt, secùs non, so they be for the parties good, or not at all.	He argues and seeks to prove that many diseases cannot be cured in any other way. "Those arising from incantation must be cured by incantation": if caused by incantation, they must be cured by incantation. Constantinus, book 4, approves such remedies. Bartolus the lawyer, Pierre Ayrault, Judicial Matters, book 3, title 7, Salicetus Godefridus and others of their school permit them, "provided what magicians do serves health; otherwise not": only if it benefits the patient, and not otherwise.[4969]
But these men are confuted by Remigius, Bodinus, dæm. lib. 3. cap. 2. Godelmannus lib. 1. cap. 8. Wierus, Delrio lib. 6. quæst. 2. Tom. 3. mag. inquis. Erastus de Lamiis; all our Divines, Schoolmen, and such as write cases of conscience are against it, the Scripture it self absolutely forbids it as a mortall sinne, Levit. cap. 18. 19. 20. Deut. 18. &c. Rom. 8. 19. Evill is not to be done, that good may come of it.	But these men are refuted by Remigius; Bodin, Demon-Mania, book 3, chapter 2; Godelmann, book 1, chapter 8; Wierus; Delrio, Investigations into Magic, book 6, question 2, volume 3; and Erastus, On Witches. All our theologians, scholastic writers and writers on cases of conscience oppose it. Scripture itself absolutely forbids it as a mortal sin: Leviticus, chapters 18, 19 and 20; Deuteronomy 18, etc.; Romans 8:19. Evil must not be done so that good may come of it.[4970]

[4969] Editor. Burton gives Latin followed by English glosses; both are translated here, retaining the repetitions. Salicetus Godefridus is printed without punctuation to establish whether one or two authorities are intended, and is therefore not silently divided. "Sect" here means a school of opinion. The individual medical and legal authorities remain to be checked.

[4970] Editor. The source prints Rom. 8.19, retained in both columns; the maxim about doing evil so that good may follow corresponds instead to Romans 3:8. "Schoolmen" means scholastic theologians; "cases of conscience" are questions of moral duty. Burton's prohibition and claim of unanimity belong to his theological argument, not to a statement of current law.

Much [4971]better it were for such patients that are so troubled, to endure a little misery in this life, then to hazard their souls health for ever, and as Delrio counselleth, [4972]much better dye, then be so cured.	It would be much better for patients afflicted in this way to endure a little misery in this life than to risk their souls' eternal salvation; and, as Delrio advises, far better to die than to be cured in this manner.
Some take upon them to expell Devils by naturall remedies, and magicall exorcismes, which they seem to approve out of the practice of the primitive Church, as that above cited of Josephus, Eleazar, Ireneus, Tertullian, Austin. Eusebius makes mention of such, and Magick it self hath been publickly professed in some Universities, as of old in Salamanca in Spain, and Cracovia in Poland: but condemned Anno 1318. by the Chancellor and University of Paris.	Some undertake to expel devils through natural remedies and magical exorcisms, which they apparently justify from the practice of the early Church, such as the case of Eleazar cited above from Josephus, and the testimony of Irenaeus, Tertullian and Augustine. Eusebius mentions such practices, and magic itself has been publicly taught in some universities, formerly at Salamanca in Spain and Kraków in Poland; but it was condemned in 1318 by the chancellor and University of Paris.[4973]

[4972] Burton. Printed page 221, o: "Mori præstat quam superstitiosè sanari, Disquis. mag. l. 2. c. 2. sect. 1. quæst. 1. Tom. 3." "It is better to die than to be cured superstitiously." Investigations into Magic, book 2, chapter 2, section 1, question 1, volume 3. The printed locator is retained.

[4973] Editor. Josephus's Eleazar predates the Christian Church. The preceding marginal Qui talibus credunt has a close witness in Gratian, Decretum, Causa 26, question 7, canon 16, attributed there to Augustine. Burton shortens it and omits its final provision for reconciliation through penance. This locates its canonical transmission, not a verified authentic work entitled On Superstitious Observances. Peter Martyr and Delrio still need collation. The university claims and Paris date 1318 remain unverified; "professed" means taught publicly.

Our Pontificiall writers retain many of these adjurations, and forms of [4974]exorcisms still in the Church; besides those in Baptisme used, they exorcise meats, and such as are possessed, as they hold, in Christs name. Read Hierom. Mengus cap. 3. Pet. Tyreus, part. 3. cap. 8. what exorcismes they prescribe, besides those ordinary means of [4975]fire, suffumigations, lights, cutting the aire with swords, cap. 57. hearbs, Odours: Of which Tostatus treats, 2. Reg. cap. 16. quæst. 43. you shall finde many vain and frivolous superstitious formes of exorcismes among them, not to be tolerated, or endured.	Our papal writers still retain many of these adjurations and forms of exorcism in the Church. Besides those used in baptism, they exorcise food and the possessed, in Christ's name, as they maintain. Read what exorcisms Girolamo Menghi, chapter 3, and Peter Thyraeus, part 3, chapter 8, prescribe, besides the usual means of fire, fumigation, lights, cutting the air with swords—chapter 57—herbs and scents. Tostatus discusses these in his commentary on Second Kings, chapter 16, question 43. Among them you will find many empty, frivolous and superstitious forms of exorcism that should neither be tolerated nor endured.[4976]

[4976] Editor. "Pontificiall" means papal or Roman Catholic: the language is Burton's polemic. Adjurations are solemn commands or appeals used in exorcism; "meats" means food; suffumigations burning substances to produce fumes. Tostatus is Alonso Tostado. The Vulgate title Second Kings corresponds to Second Samuel in modern English numbering. The exact Menghi, Thyraeus, Tostado and Lombard references remain for collation.

Being so clearly evinced, as it is, all unlawfull cures are to be refused, it remaines to treat of such as are to be admitted, and those are commonly such which God hath appointed, [4977]by vertue of stones, hearbs, plants, meats, &c. and the like, which are prepared and applied to our use, by art and industry of physicians, who are the dispensers of such treasures for our good, and to be [4978]honoured for necessities sake, Gods intermediate ministers, to whom in our infirmities we are to seek for help.	Since it has been so clearly demonstrated that all unlawful cures must be refused, it remains to discuss those that may be accepted. These are generally the remedies God has appointed through the powers of stones, herbs, plants, foods and similar things, which physicians prepare and apply for our use through their skill and diligence. They distribute these treasures for our benefit and deserve to be honoured because we need them: they are God's intermediary ministers, to whom we should turn for help in our illnesses.[4979]
Yet not so that we rely too much, or wholy upon them: A Jove principium,[4980] we must first begin with prayer, and then use physick; not one without the other, but both together.	Yet we must not rely too much, or entirely, on them. “Begin with Jove”: we must begin with prayer and then use medicine—not one without the other, but both together.[4981]

[4977] Burton. Printed page 222, r: “The Lord hath created medicines of the earth, and he that is wise will not abhor them, Ecclus. 38.4.” Ecclesiasticus 38:4: the Lord has made medicines from the earth; a wise person will not despise them.

[4978] Burton. Printed page 222, s: “My son, fail not in thy sickness, but pray unto the Lord, and he will make thee whole, Ecclus. 38.9.” Ecclesiasticus 38:9: my son, do not neglect your duty in sickness; pray to the Lord, and he will heal you.

[4979] Editor. Physick means medicine or medical treatment. Burton presents physicians as instruments of providence, following Ecclesiasticus (Sirach) 38. All body and marginalia through the end of Member 3 are retained; the two separate unmarked quotations on 222 receive separate Burton notes. The therapeutic claims belong to this historical text.

[4981] Editor. A Jove principium, literally “a beginning from Jove,” is used here for beginning with God. The unmarked Horace quotation is anchored here by subject. Odes 3.6.6 begins hinc, “from here,” referring to reverence for the gods; Burton prints Huc, “to here.”

To pray alone, and reject ordinary meanes, is to do like him in Æsop, that when his cart was stalled, lay on his back, and cried aloud, Help Hercules, but that was to little purpose, except as his friend advised him, rotis tute ipse annitaris, he whipt his horses withall, and put his shoulder to the wheel. God workes by meanes, as Christ cured the blind man with clay and spitle:	To pray alone and reject ordinary means is to behave like the man in Aesop who, when his cart was stuck, lay on his back and cried aloud, "Help, Hercules!" That was of little use unless, as his friend advised him, "you yourself put your strength to the wheels": he must also whip his horses and put his shoulder to the wheel. God works through means, as Christ cured the blind man with clay and spit.[4982]
Orandum est ut sit mens sana in corpore sano.	"We should pray for a sound mind in a sound body."[4983]
As we must pray for health of body & minde, so we must use our utmost endeavors to preserve & continue it. Some kind of devils are not cast out but by fasting & prayer, & both necessarily required, not one without the other. For all the physick we can use, art, excellent industry, is to no purpose without calling upon God, Nil juvat immensos Cratero promittere montes: It is in vain to seek for help, run, ride, except God blesse us.	As we must pray for health of body and mind, so we must do everything we can to preserve and maintain it. Some kinds of devils can be cast out only by fasting and prayer, and both are necessary, not one without the other. All the medicine we can use, all our skill and outstanding diligence, are useless without calling upon God: "It does no good to promise Craterus enormous mountains of wealth." It is useless to seek help, to run or ride in search of it, unless God blesses us.[4984]
——non Siculi dapes [4985]Dulcem elaborabunt saporem, Non animum cytheræve cantus.	"Sicilian feasts will yield no sweetness, nor will birdsong or the lyre's music [bring back sleep]."[4986]

[4983] Editor. Juvenal, Satire 10.356. "Sound" retains the breadth of sana, bodily health and mental well-being.

[4984] Editor. The fasting-and-prayer saying occurs in the traditional text of Matthew 17:21 and Mark 9:29. Burton adapts Persius, Satire 3.65, asking the use of promising the physician Craterus "great mountains"—an extravagant payment after preventive care has been neglected.

[4985] Burton. Printed page 222, u: "Musick and fine fare can do no good." Music and fine food can do no good.

[4986] Editor. Horace, Odes 3.1.18–21. This printing has Siculi, animum and cytheræve where the received text gives Siculae, avium and citharaeque. The translation follows the identifiable quotation, supplying its omitted conclusion in brackets. In Horace, luxury and music cannot comfort someone with a sword hanging over his head.

[4988] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.2.47–48. Burton changes the second line, whose received wording says that property has not driven fever from its owner’s sick body. The translation follows Burton’s Latin.

[4989] Burton. Printed page 222, y: “Sint Cræsi & Crassi licet, non hos Pactolus aureas undas agens eripiet unquam è miseriis.” “Though they may be Croesuses and Crassuses, the Pactolus rolling its golden waters will never rescue them from their miseries.” Croesus and Crassus exemplify wealth; the gold-bearing river continues that image. No author is supplied.

[4990] Editor. Burton’s English couplet is retained separately from the fresh translation of the Latin. The source of his marginal Croesus–Crassus sentence has not been established.

We must use prayer and Physick both together: and so no doubt but our prayers will be available, & our Physick take effect. 'Tis that Hezekiah practised. 2. King. 20. Luke the Evangelist, and which we are enjoyned, Coloss. 4. not the patient only, but the Physician himself. Hippocrates an heathen, required this in a good practitioner, and so did Galen. lib. de Plat. & Hipp. dog. lib. 9. cap. 15. and in that tract of his, an mores sequantur temp. cor. ca. 11. 'tis that which he doth inculcate. [4991]and many others.[4992]	We must use prayer and medicine together. Then, without doubt, our prayers will be effective and our medicine take effect. This was Hezekiah's practice, in 2 Kings 20, and Luke the Evangelist's; it is also what we are commanded in Colossians 4. This applies to the physician as well as the patient.[4993] Hippocrates, though a pagan, required it in a good practitioner, as did Galen in On the Doctrines of Plato and Hippocrates, book 9, chapter 15, and in his treatise Whether Character Follows the Temperament of the Body, chapter 11. He repeatedly urges it, as do many others.[4994]

[4991] Burton. Printed page 222, z: "Scientia de Deo debet in medico infixa esse, Messue Arabs. Sanat omnes languores Deus." "Knowledge of God must be firmly implanted in the physician." Mesue the Arab. "God heals all infirmities."

[4992] Burton. Printed page 222, unmarked marginal quotation: "For you shall pray to your Lord, that he would prosper that which is given for ease, and then use Physick for the prolonging of life. Ecclus. 38.4." Pray to the Lord to make the remedy effective in relieving suffering, and then use medicine to prolong life. The printed 38.4 is retained; compare Ecclesiasticus 38:14.

[4993] Editor. In 2 Kings 20:1–7 Hezekiah prays and a fig poultice is applied. Colossians 4:2 urges prayer; 4:14 calls Luke the beloved physician. Burton joins these references into an argument; the chapter does not explicitly command physicians to combine prayer and treatment.

[4994] Editor. The precise Galen and Hippocrates passages remain to be collated. The unmarked English marginal quotation resembles Ecclesiasticus 38:14, though the source prints 38.4. The attribution of works circulating under Mesue's name also remains unresolved here.

Source page 222–223 Hyperius in his first book de sacr. script. lect. speaking of that happiness and good success, which all Physicians desire & hope for in their cures, [4995]tells them, that it is not to be expected, except with a true faith they call upon God, and teach their patients to do the like. The Councel of Lateran, Canone 22. decreed they should do so; the Fathers of the Church have still advised as much:	Hyperius, in the first book of On the Reading of Holy Scripture, speaks of the good fortune and success that all physicians desire and hope for in their cures. He tells them that they cannot expect it unless they call upon God with true faith and teach their patients to do the same. Canon 22 of the Lateran Council decreed that they should do so; the Church Fathers have always given the same advice.[4996]
Source page 223 Whatsoever thou takest in hand (saith [4997]Gregory) let God be of thy counsel, consult with him; That healeth those that are broken in heart Psal. 147.3, and bindeth up their sores. Otherwise as the Prophet Jeremie, cap. 46.11. denounced to Ægypt, In vain shalt thou use many medicines, for thou shalt have no health.	“Whatever you undertake,” says Gregory, “let God be your adviser; consult him”—the one “who heals the brokenhearted and binds up their wounds” (Psalm 147:3). Otherwise, as the prophet Jeremiah declared against Egypt, “You will use many medicines in vain, for you will not be healed” (46:11).

[4996] Editor. Fourth Lateran Council (1215), canon 22, directs physicians to urge the sick first to summon a physician of the soul—a priest—before bodily treatment. Burton compresses this into his argument for prayer. Hyperius’s precise passage is uncollated.

[4997] Burton. Printed page 223, b: “Lemnius è Gregor. exhor. ad vitam opt. instit. cap. 48. It is the same counsel which [4998]Cominæus that politick historiographer gives to all christian princes, upon occasion of that unhappy overthrow of Charles Duke of burgundy, by meanes of which he was extremely melancholy, and sick to death: insomuch that neither Physick, nor perswasion could do him any good, perceiving his preposterous error belike, adviseth all great men in such cases, [4999]to pray first to God with all submission and penitency, to confess their sins, and then to use physick.	This is the same advice that Commines, that historian skilled in affairs of state, gives to all Christian princes when describing the disastrous defeat of Charles, Duke of Burgundy. It left Charles profoundly melancholy and sick to the point of death, so that neither medicine nor persuasion could help him. Apparently recognizing Charles's mistake in reversing the proper order, Commines advises all great men in such circumstances to pray first to God with complete humility and repentance, confess their sins, and then use medicine.[5000]
The very same fault it was, which the Prophet reprehends in Asa king of Juda, that he relyed more on Physick then on God, and by all means would have him to amend it. And 'tis a fit caution to be observed of all other sorts of men. The Prophet David was so observant of this precept, that in his greatest misery and vexation of mind, he put this rule first in practice.	This was the very fault for which the prophet rebuked Asa, King of Judah: he relied more on medicine than on God, and the prophet was determined that he should correct it. It is a warning that people of every other rank should also heed.[5001] The prophet David observed this precept so carefully that, in his greatest misery and mental distress, he made it his first rule of action.

[4998] Burton. Printed page 223, c: "Commentar. lib. 7. ob infelicem pugnam contristatus, in ægritudinem incidit, ita ut à medicis curari non posset." Memoirs, book 7. "Distressed by the unsuccessful battle, he fell ill, so that physicians could not cure him."

[4999] Burton. Printed page 223, d: "In his animi malis princeps imprimis ad Deum precetur, & peccatis veniam exoret, inde ad medicinam, &c." "In these afflictions of mind a prince should first pray to God and beg forgiveness for his sins; then turn to medicine, etc."

[5000] Editor. Cominæus is Philippe de Commines; politick means skilled in statecraft. His Memoirs 5.5, compared in Scoble's 1855 English edition, describes Charles's illness after Granson and withdrawal after Morat. It recommends turning to God, confession, conversation with friends and activity. Burton compresses the account. His Latin-edition book 7 reference and precise Latin wording remain uncollated. "Apparently" preserves belike.

[5001] Editor. Compare 2 Chronicles 16:7–12. Hanani rebukes Asa for relying on the king of Syria; the later account of Asa's foot disease says he sought physicians rather than the Lord. Burton runs the rebuke and medical episode together; the parallel text preserves that account.

Psal. 77.3. When I am in heaviness, I will think on God. Psal. 86.4. Comfort the soul of thy servant, for unto thee I lift up my soul: and vers. 7. In the day of trouble will I call upon thee, for thou hearest me. Psal. 54.1. Save me O God, by thy name, &c. Psal. 82. Psal. 20. And 'tis the common practice of all good men, Ps. 107.13. when their heart was humbled with heaviness, they cried to the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them from their distress.	"When I am weighed down with sorrow, I will think of God" (Psalm 77:3). "Comfort your servant's soul, for I lift up my soul to you" (Psalm 86:4); and in verse 7, "In the day of trouble I will call upon you, for you hear me." "Save me, O God, by your name," etc. (Psalm 54:1). See also Psalms 82 and 20. This is the common practice of all good people: when their hearts were brought low with sorrow, "they cried to the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them from their distress" (Psalm 107:13).[5002]
And they have found good success in so doing, as David confesseth Ps. 30.12. Thou hast turned my mourning into joy, thou hast loosed my sackcloth, and girded me with gladness. Therefore he adviseth all others to do the like, Psal. 31.24. All ye that trust in the Lord, be strong, and he shall establish your heart.	They have succeeded by doing so, as David acknowledges: "You have turned my mourning into joy; you have removed my sackcloth and clothed me in gladness" (Psalm 30:12). He therefore advises everyone else to do the same: "All of you who trust in the Lord, be strong, and he will strengthen your heart" (Psalm 31:24).
It is reported by [5003]Suidas, speaking of Hezekiah, that there was a great book of old, of King Salomons writing, which contained medicines for all manner of diseases, and lay open still as they came into the Temple: but Hezekiah king of Jerusalem, caused it to be taken away, because it made the people secure, to neglect their duty in calling and relying upon God, out of a confidence on those remedies.	Suidas reports, when speaking of Hezekiah, that there was once a great book written by King Solomon, containing remedies for every kind of disease. It was always lying open as people entered the Temple. But Hezekiah, King of Jerusalem, had it removed because their confidence in these remedies made the people complacent and led them to neglect their duty to call upon God and rely on him.[5004]

[5002] Editor. The quotations often follow the Prayer Book or Coverdale Psalter. Its Psalm 77:3 begins "When I am in heaviness"; its 30:12 is the mourning-to-joy verse numbered 30:11 in the King James Bible. Burton's wording and locators are retained. Sackcloth is clothing of mourning or penitence.

[5003] Burton. Printed page 223, e: "Greg. Tholoss. To. 2. l. 28. c. 7. Syntax. In vestibulo templi Solomon. liber remediorum cujusque morbi fuit, quem revulsit Ezechias, quod populus neglecto Deo nec invocato, sanitatem inde peteret." Gregorius Tholosanus, Syntaxis, volume 2, book 28, chapter 7. "In the vestibule of Solomon's temple there was a book of remedies for every disease; Hezekiah removed it because the people sought health from it, neglecting God and failing to invoke him."

[5004] Editor. This is a report of a book attributed to Solomon, not an identification of a surviving Solomonic medical manuscript. Burton names Suidas in the body and Tholosanus in the margin; their relationship remains uncollated. Secure means complacently confident.

[5005]Minutius that worthy Consull of Rome in an oration he made to his souldiers, was so much offended with them, and taxed their ignorance, that in their misery they called more on him then upon God. A generall fault it is all over the world, and Minutius his speech concerns us all, we rely more on physick, and seek oftner to Physicians, then to God himself.	Minucius, that worthy consul of Rome, was so offended with his soldiers that, in a speech, he rebuked their ignorance: in their distress they called upon him more than upon God.[5006] This is a common fault throughout the world, and Minucius's speech concerns us all. We rely more on medicine and turn to physicians more often than to God himself.
As much faulty are they that prescribe, as they that ask, respecting wholy their gain, and trusting more to their ordinary receipts and medicines many times, then to him that made them. I would wish all patients in this behalf, in the midst of their melancholy, to remember that of Siracides, Ecc. 1.12. and 12. The fear of the Lord is glory and gladness, and rejoycing. The fear of the Lord maketh a merry heart, and giveth gladness, and joy, and long life.	Those who prescribe are as much at fault as those who seek their help: they think entirely of their profit and often trust their customary prescriptions and medicines more than the one who made them. In this respect, I would urge all patients, in the midst of their melancholy, to remember the words of the son of Sirach, Ecclesiasticus 1:11–12: “The fear of the Lord is glory, gladness and rejoicing. The fear of the Lord makes the heart cheerful and gives gladness, joy and long life.”[5007]
And all such as prescribe Physick, to begin in nomine Dei, as [5008]Messue did, to imitate Lælius a Fonte Eugubinus, that in all his consultations, still concludes with a prayer for the good success of his business; and to remember that of Crato one of their predecessors, fuge avaritiam, & sine oratione & invocatione Dei nihil facias, avoid covetousness, and do nothing without invocation upon God.	I would urge everyone who prescribes medicine to begin “in the name of God,” as Mesue did; to imitate Laelius a Fonte of Gubbio, who always ends his consultations with a prayer for the success of his work; and to remember the words of Crato, one of their predecessors: “Shun greed, and do nothing without prayer and invocation of God”—avoid covetousness, and do nothing without calling upon God.

[5005] Burton. Printed page 223, f: “Livius l. 23. Strepunt aures clamoribus plorantium sociorum, sæpius nos quam deorum invocantium opem.” Livy, book 23. “Our ears ring with the cries of our weeping allies, who more often call on us than on the gods for help.” The printed Latin is irregular; the sense is clear from Livy 22.14.8.

[5006] Editor. Livy 22.14.8, not the printed book 23. Minucius attacks Fabius’s military delay: suffering allies cry for Roman aid. Livy does not make this a rebuke to soldiers for neglecting prayer. Burton’s adaptation, including “consul” and singular “God,” is preserved and distinguished here from Livy.

[5007] Editor. Siracides is the son of Sirach; Ecc. means Ecclesiasticus here. The source prints 1.12.and 12.; the quotations correspond to 1:11–12, repaired on the right. Receipts are prescriptions or recipes.

That we must pray to God, no man doubts: but whether we should pray to Saints in such cases, or whether they can do us any good, it may be lawfully controverted. Whether their images, shrines, Reliques, consecrated things, holy water, medals, benedictions, those divine amulets, holy exorcismes, and the signe of the crosse be availeable in this disease.	No one doubts that we must pray to God. But it may legitimately be debated whether we should pray to saints in such cases, or whether they can help us at all: whether their images, shrines, relics, consecrated objects, holy water, medals, blessings, those divine amulets, holy exorcisms and the sign of the cross are effective against this disease.
The papists one the on side stifly maintaine, how many melancholy, mad, dæmoniacall persons are daily cured at St. Anthonies Church in Padua, at St. Vitus in Germany, by our Lady of Lauretta in Italy, our Lady of Sichem in the Low Countries: [5010]Quæ & cæcis lumen, ægris salutem, mortuis vitam, claudis gressum reddit, omnes morbos corporis, animi, curat, & in ipsos dæmones imperium exercet; she cures halt, lame, blinde, all diseases of body and minde, and commands the devil himself, saith Lipsius.	The papists, on one side, firmly maintain that many melancholy, mad and demon-possessed people are cured every day at St Anthony's church in Padua, at St Vitus's in Germany, by Our Lady of Loreto in Italy and Our Lady of Sichem in the Low Countries. “She restores sight to the blind, health to the sick, life to the dead and the power to walk to the lame; she cures every disease of body and mind and commands the demons themselves.” She cures the crippled, the lame and the blind, every disease of body and mind, and commands the devil himself, says Lipsius.[5011]

[5009] Editor. This member is a Protestant polemic against invoking saints. Papists, Romish and the accusations of deception belong to Burton’s voice. The reported miracles and charges of fraud are not independently established by this edition.

[5011] Editor. Lauretta/Loretta is Loreto. Burton juxtaposes Marian cults at Sichem and Halle; the precise Lipsius passages remain uncollated. The Latin promises resurrection as well as healing; Burton’s English gloss is shorter, and both are retained. Printed one the on side is repaired on the right.

25000 in a day come thither, [5012]quis nisi numen in illum locum sic induxit? who brought them? in auribus, in oculis omnium gesta, nova novitia; New news lately done, our eyes and ears are full of her cures, and who can relate them all?	Twenty-five thousand come there in a day: "Who but a divine power led them in this way to that place?" Who brought them? "Deeds in everyone's ears, before everyone's eyes, fresh and recent": new news of recent events—our eyes and ears are full of her cures, and who can tell them all?
They have a proper Saint almost for every peculiar infirmity, for poyson, gouts, agues, Petronella: St Romanus for such as are possessed: Valentinæ for the falling sickness; St Vitus for mad men, &c. And as of old [5013]Pliny reckons up Gods for all diseases, (Febri fanum dicatum est) Lilius Giraldus repeats many of her ceremonies:	They have a particular saint for almost every distinct affliction: Petronella for poisoning, gout and agues; St Romanus for the possessed; Valentine for the falling sickness; St Vitus for mad people, and so on.[5014] In the same way, Pliny lists ancient gods for every disease—"a temple was dedicated to Fever"—and Lilio Giraldi recounts many of her ceremonies.
all affections of the mind were heretofore accounted gods, Love, & Sorrow, Vertue, Honor, Liberty, Contumely, Impudency, had their Temples, Tempests, Seasons, Crepitus Ventris, dea Vucuna, dea Cloacina,[5015] there was a goddess of idleness, a goddess of the draught, or jakes, Premâ, Premunda, Priapus, bawdy gods, and gods for all offices.[5016]	All the mind's affections were once considered gods. Love and Sorrow, Virtue, Honour, Liberty, Insult and Shamelessness had their temples; so did Storms, Seasons and the Breaking of Wind. There were the goddess Vacuna and the goddess Cloacina—a goddess of idleness and a goddess of the privy or latrine—Prema, Premunda and Priapus: obscene gods, and gods for every function.[5017]

[5012] Burton. Printed page 224, i: "Cap. 26." Chapter 26.

[5015] Burton. Printed page 224, l: "Selden prolog. cap. 3. de diis Syris. Rosinus." Selden, On the Syrian Gods, prologue, chapter 3; Rosinus.

[5016] Burton. Printed page 224, m: "See Lilii Giraldi syntagma de diis, &c." See Lilio Giraldi's treatise on the gods, etc.

[5017] Editor. Crepitus Ventris means breaking wind; draught and jakes mean a privy. Vucuna is rendered Vacuna. Augustine, City of God 6.9, names Prema, Pertunda and Priapus in a polemical account of marriage rites. This is a parallel, not proof of Burton's intermediary or authority to replace his Premunda. The exact Giraldi, Selden and Rosinus passages, Vacuna's function and the rest of the catalogue remain uncollated. Marginal l and m stay with their associated catalogue.

Varro reckons up 30000 gods; Lucian makes Podagra the gout a goddess, and assignes her priests and ministers: and melancholy comes not behind; for as Austin mentioneth lib. 4. de Civit. Dei, cap. 9. there was of old Angerona dea, and she had her Chappell and Feasts, to whom (saith [5018]Macrobius) they did offer sacrifice yearly, that she might be pacified as well as the rest.	Varro counts thirty thousand gods. Lucian makes Podagra, gout, a goddess and gives her priests and ministers. Melancholy is not left behind: as Augustine mentions in The City of God, book 4, chapter 9, there was once the goddess Angerona. She had her chapel and festivals, and, Macrobius says, they sacrificed to her every year so that she might be appeased along with the rest.[5019]
'Tis no new thing, you see this of Papists; and in my judgment, that old doting Lipsius, might have fitter dedicated his [5020]pen after all his labours, to this our goddess of Melancholy, then to his Virgo Halensis, and been her Chaplain, it would have becomed him better:	You see, there is nothing new in this practice of the papists. In my judgement, after all his labours, that doting old Lipsius might more fittingly have dedicated his pen to this goddess of ours, Melancholy, than to his Virgin of Halle, and become her chaplain: it would have suited him better.[5021]
But he, poor man, thought no harme in that which he did, and will not be persuaded but that he doth well, he hath so many patrons, and honorable precedents in the like kinde, that justifie as much, as largely, and more then he there saith of his Lady and Mistress:	But the poor man saw no harm in what he did and cannot be persuaded that he is doing anything but good. He has so many supporters and distinguished precedents of the same kind, who vouch at equal or greater length for as much as he says there of his Lady and Mistress, and more besides.

[5019] Editor. Macrobius, Saturnalia 1.10.7–8, connects Angerona's festival with dispelling distress and anxiety, which Burton assimilates to melancholy. Augustine's City of God 4.9 discusses Jupiter, but the consulted text does not name Angerona; the locator remains unresolved. Varro's total and Lucian's Podagra also require collation.

[5020] Burton. Printed page 224, o: "Hanc divæ pennam consecravi, Lipsius." "I have consecrated this pen to the divine lady." Lipsius.

[5021] Editor. Virgo Halensis means the Virgin of Halle. Burton jokes that the goddess of melancholy would have been a more suitable patron for Lipsius's dedication of his pen. "Our goddess" continues the personification of melancholy.

Source page 224–225 Barradius the Jesuite, boldly gives it out, that Christs countenance, and the virgin Maries, would cure melancholy, if one had looked steadfastly on them. P. Morales the Spaniard in his book de pulch. Jes. & Mar. confirms the same out of Carthusianus, and I know not whom, that it was a common proverb in those daies, for such as were troubled in minde to say, Eamus ad videndum filium Mariæ, let us see the son of Mary, as they do now, post to St. Anthonies in Padua, or to St. Hillaries at Poictiers in France.	Barradius the Jesuit boldly declares that the faces of Christ and the Virgin Mary would have cured melancholy if someone had gazed steadily upon them. The Spaniard P. Morales, in his book On the Beauty of Jesus and Mary, confirms this on the authority of Carthusianus and I know not whom else: in those days, people troubled in mind commonly said, “Let us go to see the son of Mary”—let us see the son of Mary—just as they now hurry to St Anthony's in Padua or St Hilary's at Poitiers in France.

[5022] Editor. The authorities remain in Burton’s order with his locators. Fanteus and several abbreviated references have not been fully resolved. Translated titles convey their subjects without claiming a particular edition has been identified.

It is an ordinary thing in those parts, to send all their mad men to S. Hillaries cradle. They say the like of S. Tubery in [5024]another place.	In a small chamber of that church, St Hilary's bed can still be seen. They bring all the mad people in the district to it and, after some prayers and other ceremonies, lay them down there to sleep, and so they recover. In those parts it is customary to send all their mad people to St Hilary's cradle. They say the same of St Tubery elsewhere.[5025]
Giraldus Cambrensis Itin. Camb. c. 1. tells strange stories of S. Ciricus staffe, that would cure this, & all other diseases. Others say as much (as [5026]Hospinian observes) of the three kings of Colen: their names written in parchment, and hung about a patients neck, with the signe of the crosse, will produce like effects.	Gerald of Wales, in The Journey through Wales, chapter 1, tells astonishing stories of St Ciricus's staff, which could cure this and every other disease. Others, as Hospinian observes, say as much of the three kings of Cologne: their names, written on parchment and hung around a patient's neck with the sign of the cross, will produce similar effects.[5027]

Read Lipomannus, or that golden legend of Jacobus de Voragine, you shall have infinite stories, or of these new relations of our [5028]Jesuits in Iapona and China, of Mat. Riccius, Acosta, Loiola, Xaverius life &c. Iasper Belga a Jesuit, cured a mad woman by hanging S. Johns Gospel about her necke, and many such: Holy-water did as much in Iapona, &c. Nothing so familiar in their works, as such examples.	Read Lippomano or the Golden Legend of Jacobus de Voragine, and you will find countless stories; or read these new accounts by our Jesuits in Japan and China, concerning Matteo Ricci, Acosta, Loyola, the life of Xavier, and so on. Jasper the Belgian, a Jesuit, cured a mad woman by hanging St John's Gospel around her neck, and many similar cases are reported. Holy water achieved as much in Japan, and so forth. Nothing is more common in their writings than examples like these.
But we on the other side, seeke to God alone. We say with David, Ps. 46.1. God is our hope and strength, and helpe in trouble, ready to be found. For their catalogue of examples, we make no other answer, but that they are false fictions, or diabolicall illusions, counterfeit miracles.	But we, on the other side, turn to God alone. We say with David, “God is our hope and strength, a readily available help in trouble” (Psalm 46:1). To their catalogue of examples we give only this answer: they are false inventions or diabolical illusions—counterfeit miracles.
We cannot deny but that it is an ordinary thing on S. Anthonies day in Padua, to bring divers mad men and dæmonicall persons to be cured: yet we make a doubt whether such parties be so affected indeed, but prepared by their priests, by certain oyntments and drams, to cosen the commonalty, as [5029]Heldeheim well saith; the like is commonly practised in Bohemia as Mathiolus gives us to understand in his preface to his comment upon Dioscorides.	We cannot deny that it is customary on St Anthony's day in Padua to bring various mad and demon-possessed people to be cured. Yet we doubt whether they really suffer in this way, or have been prepared by their priests with certain ointments and potions to deceive the common people, as Heldeheim rightly says. Mattioli tells us, in the preface to his commentary on Dioscorides, that the same thing is commonly practised in Bohemia.[5030]

[5028] Burton. Printed page 225, r: “Em. Acosta com. rerum in Oriente gest. à Societat. Jesu, Anno 1568. Epist. Names and dates follow the printed reference; the underlying reports remain to be collated.

[5030] Editor. Cosen means deceive; drams are medicinal doses or draughts. Burton presents allegations from polemical authorities rather than demonstrated case histories. The Heldeheim and Mattioli passages remain uncollated.

But we need not run so far for examples in this kinde, we have a just volume published at home to this purpose. [5031]A declaration of Egregious popish impostures, to with-draw the hearts of religious men under pretence of casting out of devils, practised by Father Edmunds, alias Weston a Jesuite, and divers Romish priests his wicked associates, with the severall parties names, confessions, examinations, &c. which were pretended to be possessed. But these ordinary tricks only to get opinion and mony, mere impostures.	But we need not go so far for examples of this kind: a substantial volume has been published here at home on the subject. A Declaration of Egregious Popish Impostures describes the attempt to win over religious people under the pretence of casting out devils, practised by Father Edmunds, otherwise Weston, a Jesuit, and various Roman priests, his wicked associates. It gives the names, confessions, examinations and so forth of the people supposedly possessed. But these are commonplace tricks, used only to gain credit and money: mere frauds.[5032]
Æsculapius of old, that counterfeit God, did as many famous cures; his temple (as [5033]Strabo relates) was daily full of patients, and as many severall tables, inscriptions, pendants, donaries, &c. to be seen in his church, as at this day at our Lady of Loretta's in Italy. It was a custome long since,	In ancient times that counterfeit god Aesculapius performed just as many celebrated cures. His temple, Strabo relates, was full of patients every day, and there were as many tablets, inscriptions, hanging objects and votive gifts to be seen in his shrine as there are today at Our Lady of Loreto's in Italy. It was an ancient custom:
——suspendisse potenti Vestimenta maris deo. (Hor. Od. 1. lib. 5. Od.)	"To hang up one's clothes for the mighty god of the sea." (Horace, Odes 1.5.)[5034]

[5031] Burton. Printed page 225, second asterisk: "Printed at London 4 to by I. Roberts. 1605." Printed in London, in quarto, by I. Roberts, 1605.

[5032] Editor. Samuel Harsnett's Declaration first appeared in 1603. Burton prints 1605, retained pending issue-level collation. His wording summarizes rather than exactly quotes its title. Quarto is a book format made by folding a sheet into four leaves. Just volume means a substantial volume; opinion means credit or reputation.

[5033] Burton. Printed page 225, t: "Greg. lib. 8. Cujus fanum ægrotantium multitudine refertum, undiquaque, & tabellis pendentibus, in quibus sanati languores erant inscripti." "Whose temple was filled everywhere with a multitude of sick people and with hanging tablets recording the illnesses that had been cured." The printed abbreviation Greg. is retained; the body identifies Strabo, whose Geography book 8 describes the shrine.

[5034] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.5.14–16; the transposed printed locator is corrected on the right. Clothes offered after escape from shipwreck become an image for escape from a love affair. Tables are tablets; donaries are votive offerings. The Strabo reference remains for passage-level collation.

Source page 225–226 To do the like, in former times they were seduced and deluded as they are now. 'Tis the same devil still, called heretofore Apollo, Mars, Neptune, Venus, Æsculapius, &c. as [5035]Lactantius lib. 2. de orig. erroris, c. 17. observes. The same Iupiter, and those bad angels are now worshipped, and adored by the name of S. Sebastian, Barbara, &c. Christopher and George are come in their places. Our Lady succeeds Venus (as they use her in many offices) the rest are otherwise supplied, as [5036]Lavater writes, and so they are deluded.	People were seduced and deceived into doing the same things in former times as they are now. It is still the same devil, once called Apollo, Mars, Neptune, Venus, Aesculapius and so forth, as Lactantius observes in On the Origin of Error, book 2, chapter 17. That same Jupiter and those evil angels are now worshipped and adored under the names of St Sebastian, Barbara and others. Christopher and George have taken their places. Our Lady succeeds Venus, in the many functions they assign to her; the other places are filled in other ways, as Lavator writes, and so the people are deceived.[5037]
Source page 226 [5038]And God often winkes at these impostures, because they forsake his word, and betake themselves to the devil, as they do that seek after Holy water, crosses, &c. Wierus lib. 4. cap. 3. What can these men plead for themselves more then the heathen gods, the same cures done by both, the same spirit that seduceth: but reade more of the Pagan gods effects in Austin de Civitate Dei l. 10. cap. 6. and of Æsculapius especially in Cicogna l. 3. cap. 8.	"And God often overlooks these frauds, because people forsake his word and turn to the devil, as those who seek holy water, crosses and so on are doing" (Weyer, book 4, chapter 3). What more can these men plead for themselves than the pagan gods could? The same cures are performed by both; the same spirit deceives. But read more about the effects produced by pagan gods in Augustine's City of God, book 10, chapter 6, and particularly about Aesculapius in Cicogna, book 3, chapter 8.[5039]

[5035] Burton. Printed page 225, u: "Mali angeli sumpserunt olim nomen Jovis, Junonis, Apollinis, &c. quos Gentiles deos credebant, nunc S. Sebastiani, Barbaræ, &c. nomen habent, & aliorum." "Evil angels once assumed the names of Jupiter, Juno, Apollo, etc., whom the pagans believed to be gods; now they have the names of St Sebastian, Barbara and others."

[5036] Burton. Printed page 226, x: "Part. 2. ca. 9. de spect. Veneri substituunt Virginem Mariam." On Apparitions, part 2, chapter 9. "They substitute the Virgin Mary for Venus."

[5037] Editor. On the Origin of Error is book 2 of Lactantius's Divine Institutes. Burton moves from an ancient account of pagan gods to a Protestant claim about Christian saints. Lactantius is not himself commenting on these later cults; the roles of intermediary and application need collation.

[5038] Burton. Printed page 226, y: "Ad hæc ludibria Deus connivet frequenter, ubi relicto verbo Dei, ad Satanam curritur, quales hi sunt, qui aquam lustralem, crucem, &c. lubricæ fidei hominibus offerunt." "God often overlooks these deceptions when, abandoning God's word, people run to Satan: such are those who offer holy water, a cross, etc., to people whose faith is unstable."

[5039] Editor. Winkes at means overlooks or tolerates. Augustine's City of God 10.6 concerns true sacrifice; Burton's locator for pagan "effects" remains unresolved, along with the precise Weyer and Cicogna references.

Or put case they could help, why should we rather seek to them, then to Christ himself, since that he so kindly invites us unto him, Come unto me all ye that are heavy laden, and I will ease you, Mat. 11. and we know that there is one God, one Mediator betwixt God and man Jesus Christ, (1 Tim. 2.5.) who gave himself a ransome for all men.	Or suppose that they could help: why should we turn to them rather than to Christ himself, when he so kindly invites us to him? “Come to me, all of you who are heavily burdened, and I will give you relief” (Matthew 11). We know that there is one God and one mediator between God and humanity, Jesus Christ (1 Timothy 2:5), who gave himself as a ransom for everyone.
We know that we have an [5040]Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ. (1 Ioh. 2.1.) that there is no other name under heaven, by which we can be saved, but by his; who is alwaies ready to hear us, and sits at the right hand of God, and from whom we can have no repulse, [5041]solus vult, solus potest, curat universos tanquam singulos, & [5042]unumquemque nostrum ut solum, we are all as one to him, he cares for us all as one, and why should we then seek to any other but to him?	We know that we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ (1 John 2:1), and that there is no other name under heaven by which we can be saved but his. He is always ready to hear us, sits at God's right hand and will never turn us away.[5043] “He alone is willing, he alone is able; he cares for all as though for each,” and “for each one of us as though for that one alone.” We are all as one to him; he cares for us all as one. Why, then, should we turn to anyone but him?[5044]

[5040] Burton. Printed page 226, z: “Charior est ipsis homo quam sibi, Paul.” “A human being is dearer to them than to himself.” The attribution Paul. is retained; this adapts Juvenal, Satire 10.350, where “them” means the gods.

[5043] Editor. The invitation is Matthew 11:28; the ransom follows at 1 Timothy 2:6. “No other name” is Acts 4:12. The marginal sentence attributed to Paul. instead adapts Juvenal 10.350, changing illis to ipsis; its original referent is the gods.

[5044] Editor. The closing phrase recalls Augustine, Confessions 3.11.19: God cares for each as for that person alone and for all as individuals. Burton reorders and compresses the wording. The preceding Bernard attribution remains untraced. Latin translations and Burton’s English restatement are retained separately.

MEMB. 4. SUBSECT. 1. Physician, Patient, Physick.	MEMBER 4. SUBSECTION 1. Physician, patient, medicine.
Of those diverse gifts which our Apostle Paul saith, God hath bestowed on man, this of Physick is not the least, but most necessary, and especially conducing to the good of mankind.	Of the various gifts that our apostle Paul says God has bestowed on human beings, medicine is far from the least: it is most necessary and particularly beneficial to humanity.[5045]
Next therefore to God in all our extremities (for of the most high cometh healing, Ecclus 38.2.) we must seek to, and rely upon the Physician, [5046]who is Manus Dei, saith Hierophilus, and to whom he hath given knowledge, that he might be glorified in his wondrous works. With such doth he heale men, and taketh away their paines, Ecclus 38.6,7. when thou hast need of him, let him not go from thee. The houre may come that their enterprises may have good successe, ver.13.	After God, therefore, in all our desperate circumstances—for "healing comes from the Most High," Ecclesiasticus 38:2—we must turn to and rely on the physician, who is "the hand of God," says Hierophilus. God has given him knowledge so that God may be glorified in his wonderful works. "With such things he heals people and takes away their pain," Ecclesiasticus 38:6–7. When you need the physician, do not let him leave you. "The time may come when their efforts succeed," verse 13.[5047]

[5045] Editor. Paul lists gifts of healing in 1 Corinthians 12:9. Burton applies the scriptural gift to the art of medicine. "Physick" here covers medicine and medical treatment, not modern physics.

[5046] Burton. Printed page 226, c: "Ecclus 38. In the sight of great men he shall be in admiration." Ecclesiasticus 38:3: "He will be admired in the presence of great men."

[5047] Editor. The scriptural sequence draws on Ecclesiasticus (Sirach) 38:2, 6–7, 12–13; margin c quotes 38:3. "Manus Dei" means "the hand of God." Compare Scribonius Largus, Compositions, preface 1: Herophilus is said to have called medicines the hands of the gods. Burton instead applies the singular phrase to the physician. His spelling Hierophilus is retained; the immediate source of his formulation remains unidentified.

It is not therefore to be doubted, that if we seek a Physician as we ought, we may be eased of our infirmities, such a one I meane as is sufficient, and worthily so called; for there be many Mountebanks, Quacksalvers, Empericks, in every street almost, and in every village, that take upon them this name, make this noble and profitable Art to be evil spoken of and contemned, by reason of these base and illiterate Artificers: but such a Physician I speak of, as is approved, learned, skilfull, honest, &c. of whose duty Wecker, Antid. cap.2. & Syntax. med. Crato. Iulius Alexandrinus medic. Heurnius prax. med. lib.3. cap.1. &c. treat at large.	There can therefore be no doubt that, if we seek a physician as we should, we may find relief from our illnesses. I mean one who is competent and deserves the name. There are mountebanks, quacks and untrained practitioners in almost every street and every village who assume this title. These base and uneducated tradesmen cause this noble and useful art to be slandered and despised. But I am speaking of a physician who is reputable, learned, skilful and honest, whose duties are discussed at length by Wecker in his Antidotary, chapter 2, and Medical Compendium; Crato; Julius Alexandrinus in his medical work; Heurnius in Medical Practice, book 3, chapter 1; and others.[5048]
For this particular disease, him that shall take upon him to cure it, [5049]Paracelsus will have to be a Magician, a Chimist, a Philosopher, an Astrologer; Thurnesserus, Severinus the Dane, and some other of his followers, require as much: many of them cannot be cured but by Magick.	For this particular disease, Paracelsus insists that anyone who undertakes to cure it must be a magician, a chemist, a philosopher and an astrologer. Thurnesserus, Severinus the Dane and some others among his followers demand as much: many of these patients, they say, can be cured only by magic.[5050]

[5048] Editor. "Mountebank" and "quacksalver" are disparaging names for sellers of dubious remedies. "Empericks" here means practitioners relying on experience without the learned training Burton demands; it is not a judgement on modern empirical science. The shortened medical references remain to be collated.

[5049] Burton. Printed page 226, d: "Tom.4. Tract.3. de morbis amentium, horum multi non nisi à Magis curandi & Astrologis, quoniam origo ejus à cœlis petenda est." Volume 4, treatise 3, On the Diseases of the Mentally Disturbed: "Many of these patients can be cured only by magicians and astrologers, since the origin of the disease must be sought in the heavens."

[5050] Editor. The list presents Paracelsian medicine as combining chemical preparation, natural philosophy and occult knowledge. "Chimist" belongs to the historical overlap of chemistry and alchemy. The names and the claims are Burton's; this passage does not independently establish the efficacy of the treatments.

[5051]Paracelsus is so stiffe for those Chimicall medicines, that in his cures he will admit almost of no other Physick, deriding in the mean time Hippocrates, Galen, and all their followers: but Magick, and all such remedies I have already censured, & shall speak of Chimistry elsewhere.[5052]	Paracelsus is so adamant in favour of chemical medicines that he admits almost no other treatment into his cures, while ridiculing Hippocrates, Galen and all their followers. But I have already condemned magic and all such remedies, and will discuss chemistry elsewhere.
Source page 226–227 Astrology is required by many famous Physicians, by Ficinus, Crato, Fernelius, [5053]doubted of, and exploded by others: I will not take upon me to decide the controversy my self, Johannes Hossurtus, Thomas Boderius, and Maginus in the preface to his Mathematicall physick, shall determine for me. Many Physicians explode Astrology in physick (saith he) there is no use of it, unam artem ac quasi temerariam insectantur, ac gloriam sibi ab ejus imperitia aucupari; but I will reprove Physicians by Physicians, that defend and profess it, Hippocrates, Galen, Avicen, &c. that count them butchers without it, homicidas medicos Astrologiæ ignaros, &c.	Many famous physicians—Ficino, Crato and Fernel—consider astrology necessary; others doubt it and reject it. I will not presume to decide the controversy myself: Johannes Hossurtus, Thomas Boderius, and Magini in the preface to his Mathematical Medicine, shall decide for me. “Many physicians,” he says, “reject astrology in medicine, saying that it is of no use: they attack this one art as reckless, as it were, and seek glory for themselves from their ignorance of it. But I will refute physicians through physicians who defend and practise it—Hippocrates, Galen, Avicenna and others, who consider them butchers without it: ‘physicians ignorant of astrology are killers,’ and so on.”[5054]

[5052] Burton. Printed page 226, f: “Sect.5.” “Section 5.” Printed beside the transition to astrology; attached here to the preceding promise to discuss chemistry. The later discussion is in Second Partition, Section 5, Member 1, Subsection 3, “Preparatory medicines and purgatives,” especially the chemical preparations at printed pp. 387–388. The more precise locator 2.5.1.3 is editorial. Related passage: 2.5.1.3 (printed section confirmed; fuller locator editorial).

[5053] Burton. Printed page 227, g: “Langius. I. Cæsar Claudinus consult.” Langius; Giovanni Cesare Claudini, consultations. No consultation number is supplied.

[5054] Editor. “Explode” means reject or dismiss. The syntax of the Latin is irregular, particularly unam and the infinitive aucupari; the rendering follows its apparent argument without emending the left column. The works attributed to Hossurtus, Boderius and Magini, and the appeal to the ancient physicians, await collation.

Source page 227 Paracelsus goes farther, and will have his Physician [5055]predestinated to this mans cure, this malady; and time of cure, the scheme of each geniture inspected, gathering of hearbs, of administring, Astrologically observed; in which Thurnesserus, and some Iatromathematicall professors, are too superstitious in my judgement. [5056]Hellebor will help, but not alway, not given by every Physician, &c. but these men are too peremptory and self-conceited as I think.	Paracelsus goes further: he insists that his physician must be predestined to cure this particular person and this particular illness; that each birth chart must be examined; and that the time of treatment, the gathering of herbs and their administration must be governed by astrology. In this, Thurnesserus and some practitioners of astrological medicine are too superstitious, in my judgement. “Hellebore will help, but not always, and not when given by just any physician,” and so on. But I think these men are too dogmatic and too pleased with their own opinions.[5057]
But what do I do, interposing in that which is beyond my reach? A blind man cannot judge of colours, nor I peradventure of these things. Only thus much I would require, Honesty in every Physician, that he be not over-careless or covetous, Harpy-like to make a prey of his patient; Carnificis namque est (as [5058]Wecker notes) inter ipsos cruciatus ingens precium exposcere, as an hungry Chirurgion often produce and wier-draw his cure, so long as there is any hope of pay,	But what am I doing, intervening in something beyond my grasp? A blind man cannot judge colours, and perhaps I cannot judge these matters. I would require only this much: honesty in every physician. He must not be excessively careless or greedy, making his patient his prey like a harpy; “for it is an executioner's business,” as Wecker observes, “to demand an enormous price in the midst of the very torments.” He must not, like a hungry surgeon, keep prolonging and dragging out his treatment as long as there is any hope of payment.[5059]

[5057] Editor. A “scheme of each geniture” is a chart of the heavens at a birth. “Iatromathematical” combines medicine with astrology. The statement about hellebore belongs to the reported claim that a particular healer must be matched to a particular patient; Burton immediately distances himself from this certainty.

[5058] Burton. Printed page 227, *: “Antid. gen. lib.3. cap.2.” General Antidotary, book 3, chapter 2. Burton attributes the accompanying maxim to Wecker.

[5059] Editor. Harpies supply an image of rapacious predation. “Produce and wier-draw” means prolong and draw out; Burton compares an avaricious practitioner to a torturer extracting payment while pain continues.

Non missura cutem, nisi plena cruoris hirudo.	"A leech that will not let go of the skin until it is full of blood."[5060]
Many of them to get a fee, will give Physick to every one that comes, when there is no cause, and they do so irritare silentem morbum, as [5061]Heurnius complaines, stir up a silent disease, as it often falleth out, which by good counsel, good advice alone, might have been happily composed, or by rectification of those six non-naturall things otherwise cured.	Many of them, to get a fee, will give medicine to everyone who comes, even when there is no reason for it. In this way they "rouse a dormant disease," as Heurnius complains: they stir up a silent illness, as often happens, which good counsel and advice alone might have successfully settled, or which could otherwise have been cured by regulating the six non-natural things.[5062]
This is Naturæ bellum inferre, to oppugne nature, & to make a strong body weak. Arnoldus in his 8 & 11 Aphorismes gives cautions against, and expressly forbiddeth it. [5063]A wise Physician will not give Physick, but upon necessity, and first try medicinall diet, before he proceed to medicinall cure.	This is "to wage war on nature": to attack nature and make a strong body weak. Arnoldus, in his eighth and eleventh aphorisms, warns against it and expressly forbids it. A wise physician will give medicine only when necessary, and will first try a therapeutic diet before proceeding to treatment with medicines.

[5060] Editor. Horace, Ars Poetica 476. In Horace, the blood-filled leech describes a relentless reciter of poetry holding his listener captive; Burton transfers it to the physician who keeps charging.

[5061] Burton. Printed page 227, k: "Quod sæpe evenit lib.3. cap.1. cum non sit necessitas. Frustra fatigant remediis ægros, qui victus ratione curari possunt, Heurnius." "Which often happens, book 3, chapter 1, when there is no necessity. They needlessly exhaust with remedies patients who can be cured by a regimen of living." Heurnius.

[5062] Editor. The six "non-natural" things are air; food and drink; exercise and rest; sleep and waking; evacuation and retention; and the passions. In this medical framework they are factors to regulate, not things contrary to nature. Burton contrasts their management with unnecessary drugs.

[5064]In another place he laughs those men to scorne, that think longis syrupis expugnare dæmones & animi phantasmata, they can purge phantasticall imaginations, & the divel by physick.	Elsewhere he mocks those who think they can "overcome demons and the mind's phantoms with long courses of syrups": that they can purge away fantastic imaginings and the devil with medicine.[5065]
Another caution is, that they proceed upon good grounds, if so be there be need of Physick, and not mistake the disease; they are often deceived by the [5066]similitude of Symptomes, saith Heurnius, and I could give instance in many Consultations, wherein they have prescribed opposite physick.	Another caution is that, if medicine is needed, they should proceed on sound grounds and not mistake the disease. "They are often deceived by the similarity of symptoms," says Heurnius, and I could cite many consultations in which they have prescribed unsuitable medicine.
Sometimes they go too perfunctorily to work, in not prescribing a just course of Physick: To stir up the humor, and not to purge it, doth often more harme then good. Montanus consil. 30. inveighs against such perturbations, that purge to the halfes, tire nature, and molest the body to no purpose.[5067] 'Tis a crabbed humor to purge, and as Laurentius calls this disease, the reproach of Physicians; Bessardus, flagellum medicorum, their lash; and for that cause, more carefully to be respected.	Sometimes they work too casually and fail to prescribe a proper course of treatment. To stir up the humour without purging it often does more harm than good. Montanus, in consultation 30, attacks such disturbances: they purge only halfway, exhaust nature and trouble the body to no purpose. It is a stubborn humour to purge. As Laurentius calls this disease, it is "the reproach of physicians"; Bessardus calls it "the scourge of physicians"—their lash. For that reason, it needs more careful attention.[5068]

[5064] Burton. Printed page 227, m: "Brev. l.c.18." Abbreviated Breviarium reference as printed; its exact book and chapter interpretation remains unresolved.

[5065] Editor. Burton objects to treating every mental or spiritual affliction by purging. Compare Arnau de Vilanova, Medicationis parabole II.8 and II.11, printed with their commentary in Giralt's edition, pages 82–83: medicinal foods precede drugs, which should not be used hastily without necessity. These match the two marginal sentences, with verbal differences. The printed 41 and the Breviarium reference remain unresolved; Burton's edition has not been identified.

[5068] Editor. The "humour" is the bodily substance implicated in humoral accounts of melancholy. "Perturbations" here are disturbances caused by inadequate treatment. Bessardus's phrase means "scourge of physicians"; the double rendering preserves Burton's own following gloss.

Though the patient be averse, saith Laurentius, desire help, and refuse it again, though he neglect his own health, it behoves a good Physician, not to leave him helpless. But most part they offend in that other extreme, they prescribe too much physick, and tire out their bodies with continuall potions, to no purpose.	Even if the patient is unwilling, says Laurentius—asking for help and then refusing it again—and even if he neglects his own health, a good physician ought not to abandon him without help. But most physicians err in the opposite direction: they prescribe too much medicine and exhaust their patients' bodies with continual potions, to no purpose.
Source page 227–228 Ætius tetrabib. 2.2. ser. cap.90. will have them by all means therefore [5069]to give some respite to nature, to leave off now and then; & Lælius a Fonte Eugubinus in his consultations, found it (as he there witnesseth) often verified by experience, [5070]that after a deal of Physick to no purpose, left to themselves, they have recovered. 'Tis that which Nic. Piso, Donatus Altomarus, still inculcate, dare requiem Naturæ, to give nature rest.	Aetius, in the second discourse of the second Tetrabiblos, chapter 90, therefore insists that they give nature some respite and stop treatment from time to time. Laelius a Fonte of Gubbio, in his consultations, found it repeatedly confirmed by experience, as he testifies there, that patients who had taken a great deal of medicine to no purpose recovered when left to themselves. This is what Nicolas Piso and Donatus Altomarus constantly urge: "give nature rest"—allow nature to rest.

When these precedent cautions are accurately kept, and that we have now got a skilfull, an honest Physician to our minde, if his patient will not be conformable, and content to be ruled by him, all his endevours will come to no good end. Many things are necessarily to be observed and continued on the patients behalf; First that he be not too niggardly miserable of his purse, or think it too much he bestows upon himself, and to save charges endanger his health.	Once these precautions have been carefully observed, and we have found a skilful, honest physician to our liking, all his efforts will come to nothing if his patient will not cooperate and accept his guidance. The patient must observe and maintain several necessary practices. First, he must not be too miserly with his money, think that he spends too much on himself, or endanger his health to save expense.
The Abderites, when they sent for Hippocrates, promised him what reward he would, [5071]all the gold they had, if all the city were gold he should have it. Naaman the Syrian, when he went into Israel to Elisha to be cured of his leprosy, took with him ten talents of silver, six thousand peeces of gold, and ten change of rayments, (2 Kings 5.5.)	When the people of Abdera sent for Hippocrates, they promised him whatever reward he wanted: all the gold they had; if the entire city were gold, he should have it. When Naaman the Syrian went to Elisha in Israel to be cured of his leprosy, he took ten talents of silver, six thousand pieces of gold and ten changes of clothing (2 Kings 5:5).[5072]
Another thing is, that out of bashfulnes he do not conceal his grief if ought trouble his minde, let him freely disclose it,	Another requirement is that he should not conceal his trouble out of embarrassment. If anything troubles his mind, let him disclose it freely:
Stultorum incurata pudor malus ulcera celat.	"False shame hides the untreated sores of fools."[5073]

[5071] Burton. Printed page 228, unmarked citation followed by r: "Abderitani ep. Hippoc. Quicquid auri apud nos est, libenter persolvemus, etiamsi tota urbs nostra aurum esset." The people of Abdera, letter to Hippocrates: "Whatever gold we have, we will gladly pay—even if our entire city were gold." The citation and its following quotation are retained together.

[5072] Editor. The Abderite appeal belongs to the letters transmitted under Hippocrates's name, the literary setting of the Democritus story used throughout Burton's preliminaries. It is cited here as Burton's source, not authenticated correspondence. The valuables match 2 Kings 5:5; "talent" is a weight, not a coin denomination.

[5073] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.16.24. The surrounding passage warns against concealing an internal fever merely because others declare one healthy; Burton makes the maxim a reason to disclose distress.

by that means he procures to himself much mischief, and runs into a greater inconvenience: He must be willing to be cured, and earnestly desire it. Pars sanitatis velle sanari fuit. (Seneca) 'Tis a part of his cure to wish his own health; and not to defer it too long.	By concealing them he does himself great harm and falls into worse trouble. He must be willing to be cured and earnestly desire it. "The wish to recover is part of recovery" (Seneca). To wish for his own health is part of his cure; and he must not put it off too long.[5074]
[5075]Qui blandiendo dulce nutrivit malum, Sero recusat ferre quod subiit jugum. Et	"Whoever has indulged and nourished a sweet evil too late refuses to bear the yoke he has taken on." And[5076]
[5077]Helleborum frustra cum jam cutis ægra tumebit, Poscentes videas; venienti occurrite morbo.	"You may see people asking for hellebore in vain when their diseased skin is already swelling: meet the illness as it comes."[5078]
He that by cherishing a mischief doth provoke, Too late at last refuseth to cast off his yoke. When the skin swels, to seek it to appease With Hellebor, is vain; meet your disease.	He who encourages an evil by indulging it, Too late at last refuses to cast off his yoke. When the skin swells, trying to soothe it With hellebore is useless; confront your disease.[5079]
by this means many times, or through their ignorance in not taking notice of their grievance and danger of it, contempt, supine negligence, extenuation, wretchedness and peevishness; they undo themselves.	In this way they often ruin themselves; or they do so through ignorance, by failing to recognize their illness and its danger, through contempt, careless neglect, playing down the trouble, miserliness and obstinacy.

[5075] Burton. Printed page 228, s: "Seneca." Seneca; the verse is Phaedra 134–135.

[5076] Editor. Seneca, Phaedra 134–135. The Nurse warns that someone who indulges passion resists its domination too late. The "sweet evil" is attractive precisely while it is doing harm.

[5077] Burton. Printed page 228, t: "Per. 3. Sat." Persius, Satire 3; lines 63–64.

[5078] Editor. Persius, Satire 3.63–64. Hellebore appears as a purgative sought too late. Burton prints poscentes, where the comparison text reads poscentis; the sense is unchanged. His own English verse follows separately.

[5079] Editor. Burton's four English lines gloss the two preceding Latin quotations. The printed "refuseth to cast off his yoke" does not match Seneca's "refuses to bear the yoke." The modern version retains this difficulty in Burton's English instead of silently replacing it with the Latin's meaning.

The Citizens, I know not of what City, now, when rumor was brought their enemies were coming, could not abide to hear it: and when the plague begins in many places and they certainly know it, they command silence and hush it up; but after they see their foes now marching to their gates, and ready to surprize them, they begin to fortifie & resist when 'tis too late; when the sickness breaks out and can be no longer concealed, then they lament their supine negligence: 'tis no otherwise with these men.	The citizens—I cannot now remember of which city—could not bear to hear the news when word came that their enemies were approaching. In the same way, when plague begins in many places and the authorities know it for certain, they order silence and hush it up. But when they see their enemies marching to the gates, ready to catch them unprepared, they begin to fortify and resist when it is too late. When the disease breaks out and can no longer be concealed, then they lament their careless neglect. It is just the same with these patients.[5080]
Source page 228–229 And often out of a prejudice, a loathing & distaste of Physick, they had rather dy, or do worse, then take any of it. Barbarous immanity ([5081]Melancthon termes it) and folly to be deplored, so to contemn the precepts of health, good remedies, & voluntarily to pull death, and many maladies upon their own heads.	Often, out of prejudice, loathing and dislike of medicine, they would rather die or fare worse than take any of it. Melanchthon calls it "barbarous brutality and deplorable folly" to despise the rules of health and good remedies in this way, and voluntarily bring death and many diseases upon their own heads.

[5080] Editor. Burton himself cannot name the city. No identification is supplied here. He interweaves the story of a city ignoring military danger with the suppression of reports of plague.

[5081] Burton. Printed page 228, u: "De anima. Barbara tamen immanitate, & deploranda inscitia contemnunt præcepta sanitatis, mortem & morbos ultro accersunt." On the Soul: "Yet with barbarous brutality and deplorable ignorance they despise the rules of health, and voluntarily summon death and diseases." Burton attributes the passage to Melanchthon.

Source page 229 Though many again are in that other extreme too profuse, suspicious, and jealous of their health, too apt to take physick on every small occasion, to aggravate every slender passion, imperfection, impediment: if their finger do but ake, run, ride, send for a physician, as many Gentlewoman do, that are sick, without a cause, even when they will themselves, upon every toy or small discontent, and when he comes, they make it worse then it is, by amplifying that which is not.	Many others go to the opposite extreme: they spend too freely, are suspicious and anxiously protective of their health, too ready to take medicine on every slight occasion and to magnify every minor ailment, defect or difficulty. If a finger so much as aches, they run, ride or send for a physician—as many gentlewomen do, who are ill without cause, whenever they please, over every trifle or slight dissatisfaction. When he arrives, they make it worse than it is by exaggerating what is not there.[5082]
[5083]Hier. Cappivaccius sets it down as a common fault of all melancholy persons, to say their symptomes are greater then they are, to help themselves. And which [5084]Mercurialis notes, consil. 53. to be more troublesome to their Physicians, then other ordinary patients, that they may have change of physick.	Hieronymus Cappivaccius records it as a common fault of all melancholy people that, to obtain help, they say their symptoms are worse than they are. Mercurialis likewise observes, in consultation 53, that they are more troublesome to their physicians than ordinary patients, so that they may get a change of medicine.

[5082] Editor. The claims that patients exaggerate symptoms and that gentlewomen can be ill at will are Burton's polemical generalizations. They are preserved as part of his historical account, not adopted as editorial explanations of illness.

A third thing to be required in a Patient, is confidence, to be of good chear, and have sure hope that his Physician can help him. [5085]Damascen the Arabian, requires likewise in the Physician himself, that he be confident he can cure him, otherwise his physick will not be effectuall, and promise withall that he will certainly help him, make him beleeve so at least.	A third requirement in a patient is confidence: he should be cheerful and firmly hope that his physician can help him. Damascen the Arabian likewise requires the physician himself to be confident that he can cure the patient; otherwise his medicine will not work. He should also promise that he will certainly help him—or at least make him believe so.[5086]
[5087]Galeottus gives this reason, because the forme of health is contained in the Physicians minde, and as Galen holds, [5088]confidence and hope do more good then physick; he cures most in whom most are confident. Axiochus sick almost to death, at the very sight of Socrates recovered his former health. Paracelsus assignes it for an only cause, why Hippocrates was so fortunate in his cures, not for any extraordinary skill he had; [5089]but because the common people had a most strong conceipt of his worth.	Galeottus gives this reason: the form of health is contained in the physician's mind. And, as Galen maintains, confidence and hope do more good than medicine: the physician who inspires most confidence cures most. Axiochus, almost sick to death, recovered his former health at the mere sight of Socrates.[5090] Paracelsus gives this as the sole reason why Hippocrates was so successful in his cures: it was not because he had any extraordinary skill, but because ordinary people had an exceptionally high opinion of his ability.[5091]

[5085] Burton. Printed page 229, z: “Oportet infirmo imprimere salutem, utcunque promittere, etsi ipse desperet. Nullum medicamentum efficax, nisi medicus etiam fuerit fortis imaginationis.” “One must impress the prospect of recovery on the sick person and promise it by any means, even if one despairs oneself. No medicine is effective unless the physician also has a powerful imagination.”

[5086] Editor. Burton reports a medical ethic in which confidence can include reassuring a patient even when the physician privately despairs. “Damascen” and “Janus Damascen” are retained as his names for the authority cited; the particular aphorism collection and its attribution await collation.

[5088] Burton. Printed page 229, b: “Spes & confidentia, plus valent quam medicina.” “Hope and confidence are more powerful than medicine.”

[5089] Burton. Printed page 229, c: “Felicior in medicina ob fidem Ethnicorum.” “More successful in medicine because of the pagans’ faith.”

[5090] Editor. Compare Axiochus 364c–365a, transmitted in the Platonic corpus: Clinias predicts that seeing Socrates will help his father rally, and Socrates finds the man already physically improved but still distressed. Burton compresses this into a recovery at the sight of Socrates. The dialogue is conventionally classed as Pseudo-Plato.

[5091] Editor. The “form of health” means its conception or pattern in the physician’s mind. Burton groups this claim with hope, reputation and imagination; it should not be read as a demonstrated account of how treatment works. The Galeottus, Galen and Paracelsus attributions are not independently collated here.

To this of confidence we may adde perseverance, obedience and constancie, not to change his Physician, or dislike him upon every toy; for he that so doth (saith [5092]Ianus Damascen) or consults with many, falls into many errours; or he that useth many medicines. It was a chief caveat of Seneca to his friend Lucilius, that he should not alter his Physician, or prescribed physick: [5093]Nothing hinders health more; a wound can never be cured that hath severall plasters.	To confidence we may add perseverance, obedience and constancy: the patient should not change his physician or take a dislike to him over every trifle. For anyone who does so, says Janus Damascen, or who consults many physicians, falls into many errors; so does anyone who uses many medicines. One of Seneca's chief warnings to his friend Lucilius was that he should not change his physician or prescribed medicine: nothing hinders health more; a wound can never heal when one plaster after another is applied to it.[5094]
Crato consil. 186. taxeth all melancholy persons of this fault: [5095]'Tis proper to them, if things fall not out to their minde, and that they have not present ease, to seek another, and another: (as they do commonly that have sore eyes) twenty one after another, and they still promise all to cure them, try a thousand remedies; and by this means they increase their malady, make it most dangerous and difficult to be cured. They try many (saith [5096]Montanus) and profit by none:	Crato, in consultation 186, accuses all melancholy people of this fault. It is characteristic of them, if things do not go as they wish and they get no immediate relief, to seek another physician and then another—as people with sore eyes commonly do—twenty in succession. All keep promising a cure; the patients try a thousand remedies, and in this way worsen their disease, making it extremely dangerous and difficult to cure. They try many, says Montanus, and benefit from none.[5097]

[5093] Burton. Printed page 229, e: "Nihil ita sanitatem impedit, ac remediorum crebra mutatio, nec venit vulnus ad cicatricem in quo diversa medicamenta tentantur." "Nothing hinders health so much as frequent changes of remedies, nor does a wound heal over when different medicines are tried upon it."

[5095] Burton. Printed page 229, f; continues across the foot of the page: "Melancholicorum proprium, quum ex eorum arbitrio non fit subita mutatio in melius, alterare medicos qui quidvis, &c." "It is characteristic of melancholy patients, when a sudden improvement does not occur as they wish, to change physicians, who [promise] anything," etc. The elliptical conclusion is retained; the supplied verb follows Burton's body text.

[5096] Burton. Printed page 229, g: "Consil.31. Dum ad varia se conferunt, nullo prosunt." Consultation 31: "While they turn to various remedies, they benefit from none." The source's nullo is retained.

and for this cause consil. 24. he injoyns his patient before he take him in hand, [5098]perseverance and sufferance, for in such a small time no great matter can be effected, and upon that condition he will administer physick, otherwise all his endeavour and counsell would be to small purpose. And in his 31. counsell for a notable Matron, he tells her [5099]if she will be cured, she must be of a most abiding patience, faithfull obedience, and singular perseverance; if she remit, or despair, she can expect or hope for no good success.	For this reason, in consultation 24, before taking on his patient, he requires perseverance and endurance: no great result can be achieved in so short a time. He will administer medicine on that condition; otherwise all his effort and advice would be of little use. In his thirty-first consultation, for a distinguished married woman, he tells her that if she wishes to be cured, she must show the most lasting patience, faithful obedience and exceptional perseverance. If she slackens or despairs, she can expect or hope for no good result.
Consil. 230. for an Italian Abbot, he makes it one of the greatest reasons, why this disease is so incurable, [5100]because the parties are so restless, and impatient, and will therefore have him that intends to be eased, [5101]to take physick, not for a moneth, a year, but to apply himself to their prescriptions all the dayes of his life.	In consultation 230, for an Italian abbot, he makes the patients' restlessness and impatience one of the chief reasons why this disease is so incurable. He therefore insists that anyone who hopes for relief should take medicine, not merely for a month or a year, but follow the physicians' prescriptions throughout his life.
Source page 229–230 Last of all, it is required that the patient be not too bold to practice upon himself, without an approved physicians consent, or to try conclusions, if he read a receipt in a book; for so, many grosly mistake, and do themselves more harme then good. That which is conducing to one man, in one case, the same time is opposite to another.	Last of all, the patient must not be too bold in treating himself without a reputable physician's consent, or in making experiments because he has read a recipe in a book. In this way many make serious mistakes and do themselves more harm than good. What benefits one person in one case may at the same time harm another.

[5100] Burton. Printed page 229, k: “Ægritudine amittunt patientiam, & inde morbi incurabiles.” “They lose patience through illness, and consequently the diseases are incurable.”

[5101] Burton. Printed page 229, l: “Non ad mensem aut annum, sed oportet toto vitæ curriculo curationi operam dare.” “One must attend to treatment not for a month or a year, but throughout the entire course of life.”

Source page 230 [5102]An Asse and a Mule were laden over a brook, the one with salt, the other with wool: the Mules packe was wet by chance, the salt melted, his burden the lighter, and he thereby much eased: He told the Asse, who thinking to speed as well, wet his packe likewise at the next water, but it was much the heavier, he quite tired. So one thing may be good and bad to severall parties, upon divers occasions.	An ass and a mule were carrying loads across a brook, one of salt and the other of wool. The mule's pack happened to get wet; the salt dissolved, making his load lighter and giving him great relief. He told the ass, who, expecting the same good fortune, also wet his pack at the next stream. But it became much heavier, and he was completely exhausted. In this way the same thing may help one person and harm another, under different circumstances.
Many things (saith [5103]Penottus) are written in our books, which seem to the Reader to be excellent remedies, but they that make use of them, are often deceived, and take for Physick poyson. I remember in Valeriola's observations, a story of one John Baptist a Neopolitan, that finding by chance a pamphlet in Italian, written in praise of Hellebor, would needs adventure on himself, and tooke one dram for one scruple, and had not he been sent for, the poor fellow had poysoned himself.	"Many things," says Penottus, "are written in our books that seem excellent remedies to the reader, but those who use them are often deceived and take poison for medicine." I remember a story in Valeriola's observations about a Neapolitan named John Baptist. He happened to find an Italian pamphlet praising hellebore and insisted on trying it on himself, taking one dram instead of one scruple. Had Valeriola not been sent for, the poor fellow would have poisoned himself.[5104]

[5104] Editor. The account is reported from Valeriola without an independently verified case locator. "Dram" and "scruple" are distinct apothecaries' weights; Burton makes their confusion the cause of the overdose. His pronoun "he" in "had not he been sent for" is clarified as Valeriola on the right.

From whence he concludes out of Damascenus 2. & 3. Aphoris. [5105]that without exquisite knowledge, to work out of books is most dangerous: how unsavorie a thing it is to beleeve Writers, and take upon trust, as this patient perceived by his own perill. I could recite such another example of mine own knowledge, of a friend of mine, that finding a receipt in Brassivola, would needs take Hellebor in substance, and try it on his own person; but had not some of his familiars come to visit him by chance, he had by his indiscretion hazarded himself: many such I have observed.	From this he concludes, citing the second and third aphorisms of Damascenus, that it is extremely dangerous to practise from books without exact knowledge. How unwise it is to believe writers and take their statements on trust, as this patient learned at his own peril. I could tell another such story from my own knowledge: a friend of mine found a recipe in Brassivola and insisted on taking hellebore itself and trying it on his own person. Had some of his close friends not happened to visit him, his indiscretion would have put him in danger. I have observed many such cases.[5106]
These are those ordinary cautions, which I should think fit to be noted, and he that shall keep them, as [5107]Montanus saith, shall surely be much eased, if not throughly cured.	These are the usual precautions that I think deserve attention. Anyone who observes them, as Montanus says, will certainly gain considerable relief, if not a complete cure.

[5105] Burton. Printed page 230, n: “Operari ex libris, absque cognitione & solerti ingenio, periculosum est. Unde monemur, quam insipidum scriptis authoribus credere, quod hic suo didicit periculo.” “To practise from books without knowledge and a discerning mind is dangerous. Hence we are warned how foolish it is to trust authors’ writings, as this man learned at his own peril.”

[5106] Editor. “In substance” means the hellebore itself, rather than a preparation of it. “Familiars” means close friends or associates. Burton shifts from a printed case history to an incident he says he personally knew; the friend remains unnamed.

SUBSECT. 3. Concerning Physick.	SUBSECTION 3. Concerning medicine.
Physick it self in the last place is to be considered; for the Lord hath created medicines of the earth; and he that is wise will not abhorre them, Ecclus 38.4. ver.8. of such doth the Apothecary make a confection, &c.	Finally, medicine itself must be considered; "for the Lord has created medicines from the earth, and a wise person will not reject them," Ecclesiasticus 38:4. Verse 8: "From such things the apothecary makes a compound," and so on.[5108]
Of these medicines there be divers & infinite kindes, Plants, Metals, Animals, &c. and those of severall natures, some good for one, hurtfull to another: some noxious in themselves, corrected by art, very wholesome and good, simples, mixt, &c. and therefore left to be managed by discreet and skilfull Physicians, and thence applied to mans use. To this purpose they have invented method, and severall rules of art, to put these remedies in order, for their particular ends.	These medicines come in countless different kinds—plants, metals, animals and so on—and have different properties. Some benefit one person and harm another; some, harmful in themselves, become very wholesome and beneficial when properly prepared. There are simple remedies, compounds and so forth. They are therefore left to the management of prudent and skilful physicians, who apply them to human use. For this purpose physicians have devised methods and various professional rules, to arrange these remedies according to their particular uses.[5109]

[5108] Editor. Ecclesiasticus, also called Sirach, 38:4 and 38:8. Confection here means a compound medicinal preparation, not a sweet.

[5109] Editor. Simples are remedies consisting of a single medicinal substance; mixt means compounds. Correcting a substance refers to preparing it or combining it with others to alter its supposed effects.

Physick (as Hippocrates defines it) is naught else but [5110]addition and subtraction; and as it is required in all other diseases, so in this of melancholy it ought to be most accurate, it being (as [5111]Mercurialis acknowledgeth) so common an affection in these our times, & therefore fit to be understood.	Medicine, as Hippocrates defines it, is nothing but addition and subtraction. Necessary in every other disease, it must be practised with the greatest precision in melancholy, which, as Mercurialis acknowledges, is so common an illness in our times that its treatment particularly deserves to be understood.[5112]
Severall prescripts and methods I find in severall men, some take upon them to cure all maladies with one Medicine, severally applyed, as that Panacea, Aurum potabile, so much controverted in these dayes, Herba solis, &c.	I find different prescriptions and methods in different writers. Some undertake to cure every illness with one medicine, applied in different ways: for example, that panacea, "drinkable gold," so much disputed nowadays, the "herb of the sun," and so on.[5113]

[5111] Burton. Printed page 230, margin q: "In pract. med. hæc affectio nostris temporibus frequentissima, ergo maxime pertinet ad nos hujus curationem intelligere." In Medical Practice: "This illness is extremely common in our times; therefore it especially concerns us to understand its treatment."

[5112] Editor. Addition and subtraction describes supplying what the body lacks and removing what it has in excess. Compare the Hippocratic On Breaths 1, in the Greek and Littré's French translation: remedies oppose the causes of suffering, and medicine removes excess and supplies deficiency. The cited Fuchsius intermediary and Burton's precise Latin wording remain uncollated.

[5113] Editor. A panacea is a universal remedy. Aurum potabile means drinkable gold, an alchemical medicine; Herba solis literally means herb of the sun. The precise preparation or plant intended here remains unresolved.

Source page 230–231 Parecelsus reduceth all diseases to foure principall heads, to whom Severinus, Ravelascus, Leo Suavius, and others adhere and imitate: those are Leprosy, Gout, Dropsie, Falling-sickness. To which they reduce the rest; as to Leprosie, Ulcers, Itches, Furfures, Scabs, &c. To Gout, Stone, Cholick, Tooth-ach, Head-ach, &c. To Dropsie, Agues, Jaundies, Cachexia, &c. To the Falling-sicknesse, belong Palsy, Vertigo, Cramps, Convulsions, Incubus, Apoplexie, &c.	Paracelsus reduces all diseases to four principal classes, and Severinus, Ravelascus, Leo Suavius and others follow and imitate him. These classes are leprosy, gout, dropsy and epilepsy. They place the remaining diseases under these headings: under leprosy, ulcers, itching disorders, scaly eruptions, scabs and so on; under gout, the stone, colic, toothache, headache and so on; under dropsy, fevers, jaundice, bodily wasting and so on; under epilepsy, paralysis, vertigo, cramps, convulsions, nightmare, apoplexy and so on.[5114]
Source page 231 [5115]If any of these four principall be cured (saith Ravelascus) all the inferior are cured, and the same remedies commonly serve: but this is too generall, and by some contradicted: for this peculiar disease of Melancholy, of which I am now to speak, I find severall cures, severall methods and prescripts.	“If any of these four principal diseases is cured,” says Ravelascus, “all the subordinate diseases are cured, and the same remedies generally serve.” But this is too sweeping, and some dispute it. For the particular disease of melancholy, which I am now going to discuss, I find different treatments, methods and prescriptions.
They that intend the practick cure of Melancholy, saith Duretus in his notes to Hollerius, set down nine peculiar scopes or ends; Savonarola prescribes seven especiall Canons. Ælianus Montaltus cap.26. Faventinus in his Empericks. Hercules de Saxoniâ, &c. have their severall injunctions and rules, all tending to one end.	Those who undertake the practical treatment of melancholy, says Duretus in his notes on Hollerius, set out nine particular objectives or ends; Savonarola prescribes seven special rules. Aelianus Montalto in chapter 26, Faventinus in his Empirical Remedies, Hercules de Saxonia and others have their different instructions and rules, all directed towards one end.[5116]

[5116] Editor. Scopes are aims; canons are rules. Savonarola is the medical writer cited here. The numerical schemes and abbreviated book references have not been independently collated.

The ordinary is threefold, which I meane to follow. Διαιτητικὴ, Pharmaceutica, and Chirurgica, Diet or Living, Apothecary, Chirurgery, which Wecker, Crato, Guianerius, &c. and most prescribe; of which I will insist, and speak in their order.	The usual method, which I intend to follow, has three parts: regulation of daily life, treatment with drugs, and surgery—that is, diet or manner of living, pharmacy, and surgery. This is the method prescribed by Wecker, Crato, Guianerius and most others. I will dwell on these and discuss them in order.[5117]

[5117] Editor. The Greek and two Latin terms name regimen, drug treatment and surgery. Burton immediately gives English equivalents; the modern column preserves that repetition. Diet or living extends beyond food alone.

SECT. 2. MEMB. 1. SUBSECT. 1. Dyet rectified in substance.	SECTION 2. MEMBER 1. SUBSECTION 1. Diet corrected in the choice of food.
Diet Διαιτητικὴ, Victus or Living, according to Fuchsius and [5118]others, comprehend those six non-naturall things, which I have before specified, are especiall causes, and being rectified, a sole or chief part of the cure. Iohannes Arculanus cap.16. in 9. Rhasis, accounts the rectifying of these six, [5119]a sufficient cure.	Diet—the regulation of daily life, or manner of living—according to Fuchsius and others, includes the six non-natural things I have already specified. These are major causes of illness; corrected, they form the whole or the chief part of the cure. Johannes Arculanus, in chapter 16 of his commentary on the ninth book of Rhazes, considers the regulation of these six things a sufficient cure.[5120]
Guianerius Tract.15. cap.9. calls them, propriam & primam curam, the principall cure: so doth Montanus, Crato, Mercurialis, Altomarus, &c. first to be tried, Lemnius instit. cap.22. names them the hinges of our health, [5121]no hope of recovery without them.	Guianerius, treatise 15, chapter 9, calls them "the proper and primary treatment"—the principal cure. So do Montanus, Crato, Mercurialis, Altomarus and others: this is what should be tried first. Lemnius, in his Institutes, chapter 22, calls them the hinges on which our health turns: there is no hope of recovery without them.

[5118] Burton. Printed page 231, margin s: "Institut. cap.8. sect.1. Victus nomine non tam cibus & potus, sed aër, exercitatio, somnus, vigilia, & reliquæ res sex non-naturales continentur." Institutes, chapter 8, section 1: "The term regimen includes not merely food and drink, but air, exercise, sleep, waking, and the remaining members of the six non-natural things."

[5120] Editor. The six non-natural things are air; food and drink; exercise and rest; sleep and waking; evacuation and retention; and the passions. Non-natural distinguishes factors affecting the body from its inherent constitution; it does not mean unnatural.

[5121] Burton. Printed page 231, margin u: "Et in his potissima sanitas consistit." "And health depends chiefly on these."

Reinerus Solenander in his seventh consultation for a Spanish young Gentlewoman, that was so melancholy she abhorred all company, and would not sit at table with her familiar friends, prescribes this physick above the rest, [5122]no good to be done without it. [5123]Areteus. lib.1. cap.7. an old Physician, is of opinion, that this is enough of it self, if the party be not too farre gone in sicknesse.	Reinerus Solenander, in his seventh consultation, concerning a young Spanish gentlewoman who was so melancholy that she detested all company and would not sit at table with her close friends, prescribes this treatment above all others: nothing can be achieved without it. Aretaeus, an ancient physician, considers in book 1, chapter 7, that this alone is enough if the patient's illness has not advanced too far.
[5124]Crato in a consultation of his for a noble patient, tells him plainly, that if his Highness will keep but a good diet, he will warrant him his former health. [5125]Montanus Consil.27. for a Nobleman of France, admonisheth his Lordship to be most circumspect in his diet, or else all his other Physick will be to small purpose.	Crato, in a consultation for a noble patient, tells him plainly that, if His Highness will only follow a good regimen, he can guarantee the restoration of his former health. Montanus, in consultation 27, concerning a French nobleman, urges His Lordship to be extremely careful about his regimen, or all his other medicine will achieve little.

[5123] Burton. Printed page 231, margin y: “Si recens malum sit ad pristinum habitum recuperandum, alia medela non est opus.” “If the illness is recent, no other treatment is needed to recover the former state of health.”

[5124] Burton. Printed page 231, margin z: “Consil.99. lib.2. si celsitudo tua, rectam victus rationem, &c.” Consultation 99, book 2: “If Your Highness [follows] a proper regimen,” and so on. The printed Latin is abbreviated.

[5125] Burton. Printed page 231, margin a, continuing below the body: “Moneo Domine, ut sis prudens ad victum, sine quo cætera remedia frustra adhibentur.” “I advise you, my lord, to be prudent in your regimen; without this, other remedies are applied in vain.”

The same injunction I finde verbatim in I. Cæsar Claudinus, Respon.34. Scoltzii consil.183. Trallianus cap.16. lib.1. Lælius à fonte Ægubinus often brags, that he hath done more cures in this kinde by rectification of Diet, then all other physick besides.[5126]	I find the same instruction word for word in Julius Caesar Claudinus, response 34; Scholtz's consultations, number 183; and Trallianus, book 1, chapter 16. Laelius a Fonte of Gubbio often boasts that he has achieved more cures of this kind by correcting the patient's regimen than through all other medicine combined.[5127]
So that in a word I may say to most melancholy men, as the Fox said to the Wesell, that could not get out of the garner, Macra cavum repetes, quem macra subisti, the six non-naturall things caused it, and they must cure it.	So, in a word, I may say to most melancholy people what the fox said to the weasel that could not get out of the granary: "You must return lean through the hole you entered lean." The six non-natural things caused the illness, and they must cure it.[5128]
Source page 231–232 Which howsoever I treat of, as proper to the Meridian of Melancholy, yet neverthelesse, that which is here said with him in [5129]Tully though writ especially for the good of his friends at Tarentum and Sicily, yet it will generally serve [5130]most other diseases, and help them likewise, if it be observed.	Although I discuss these matters as particularly suited to the climate of melancholy, what is said here—like the writings of the man mentioned in Cicero, composed especially for the benefit of his friends at Tarentum and in Sicily—will nevertheless generally serve for most other diseases too, and help them likewise, if it is followed.[5131]

[5127] Editor. These medical opinions and promised cures are reported by Burton. Their individual source passages and case histories remain unverified; the edition preserves their certainty without adopting it.

[5128] Editor. Horace, Epistles 1.7.29–33. In Horace a lean fox enters a grain store, grows fat and cannot escape; a weasel advises it. Burton reverses the animals' roles and shortens the verse. Both differences are retained. Garner means granary.

[5129] Burton. Printed page 232, first asterisk: "1. de finibus. Tarentinis & Siculis." On Ends, book 1: "For the people of Tarentum and Sicily."

[5130] Burton. Printed page 232, margin c: "Modo non multum elongatur." "Provided it has not advanced too far."

[5131] Editor. Meridian is a geographical metaphor for a particular sphere or climate. Cicero, On Ends 1.3.7, reports Lucilius saying that he writes for Tarentum, Consentia and Sicily. Burton omits Consentia and adapts the remark to explain his own wider usefulness.

Source page 232 Of these six non-naturall things, the first is Diet, properly so called, which consists in meat and drink, in which we must consider Substance, Quantity, Quality, and that opposite to the precedent.	Of these six non-natural things, the first is diet in the strict sense: food and drink. Here we must consider the kind, quantity and quality, choosing the opposite of what was described earlier.
In Substance, such meats are generally commended, which are [5132]moist, easie of digestion, and not apt to engender winde, not fryed, nor rosted, but sod (saith Valescus, Altomarus, Piso, &c.) hot and moist, and of good nourishment; Crato Consil.21. lib.2. admits rost meat, [5133]if the burned and scorched superficies, the brown we call it, be pared off. Salvianus lib.2. cap.1. cries out on cold and dry meats;	As to kind, the foods generally recommended are moist, easily digested, and unlikely to generate wind; not fried or roasted, but boiled, say Valescus, Altomarus, Piso and others—hot and moist, and nourishing. Crato, consultation 21, book 2, allows roast meat if the burnt or scorched surface, what we call the browned part, is cut away. Salvianus, book 2, chapter 1, vehemently condemns cold and dry foods.[5134]
[5135]young flesh and tender is approved, as of Kid, Rabbets, Chickens, Veale, Mutton, Capons, Hens, Partridge, Pheasant, Quailes, and all mountain birds, which are so familiar in some parts of Africa, and in Italy, and as [5136]Dublinius reports, the common food of Boores and Clownes in Palestina.	Young, tender meat is approved: kid, rabbit, chicken, veal, mutton, capon, hen, partridge, pheasant, quail, and all the mountain birds that are so common in parts of Africa and Italy and, as Dublinius reports, are the ordinary food of peasants and country people in Palestine.[5137]

[5133] Burton. Printed page 232, margin e: “Si interna tantum pulpa devoretur, non superficies torrida ab igne.” “If only the inner flesh is eaten, not the surface scorched by the fire.”

[5134] Editor. Meat here can mean food generally; sod means boiled. Hot, cold, moist and dry are qualities in humoral medicine, not simply cooking temperatures. The preceding account is Burton’s discussion of foods as causes of melancholy.

[5136] Burton. Printed page 232, second asterisk: “Hædoper. peregr. Hierosol.” Abbreviated citation to Hædoper., a Jerusalem pilgrimage account. The locator is retained without resolving the discrepancy with Dublinius in the body.

[5137] Editor. A capon is a castrated male chicken. Clown means a rustic or country person. The discrepancy between Dublinius in the body and Hædoper. in the margin remains unresolved.

Galen takes exception at Mutton, but without question he means that rammy mutton which is in Turkie, and Asia minor, which have those great fleshie tailes, of 48. pound weight, as Vertomannus witnesseth, navig. lib.2. cap.5.	Galen objects to mutton, but undoubtedly he means the strong-flavoured mutton found in Turkey and Asia Minor, from sheep with those enormous fleshy tails weighing forty-eight pounds, as Varthema testifies in his travels, book 2, chapter 5.[5138]
The lean of fat meat is best, and all manner of brothes, and pottage, with borage, lettuce, and such wholesome hearbs are excellent good, specially of a Cock boyled; all spoonmeat. Arabians commend brains, but [5139]Laurentius c.8. excepts against them, and so do many others;	The lean portion of fat meat is best. All kinds of broths and soups with borage, lettuce and other wholesome herbs are excellent, especially broth made from a boiled rooster: all foods eaten with a spoon. Arab physicians recommend brains, but Laurentius, chapter 8, objects to them, as do many others.
[5140]Egges are justified as a nutritive wholesome meat, Butter and Oyle may passe, but with some limitation; so [5141]Crato confines it, and to some men sparingly at set times, or in sauce, and so sugar & hony are approved.	Eggs are approved as a nourishing, wholesome food. Butter and oil may be allowed, but with some restrictions: Crato limits them in this way, and for some people permits them only sparingly, at fixed times or in sauces. Sugar and honey are approved on the same terms.[5142]

[5138] Editor. Rammy means strong or rank in the manner of a ram. The forty-eight-pound tail and the interpretation of Galen are Burton's claims, retained without converting the historical weight to a modern measurement.

[5140] Burton. Printed page 232, margin h: "Not fryed or buttered, but potched." That is, not fried or buttered, but poached.

[5141] Burton. Printed page 232, third asterisk: "Consil.16. Non improbatur butyrum & oleum, si tamen plus quam par sit, non profundatur. Sacchari & mellis usus, utiliter ad ciborum condimenta comprobatur." Consultation 16: "Butter and oil are not disapproved of, provided no more than is proper is poured in. Sugar and honey are approved as useful seasonings for food."

[5142] Editor. The margin specifies poached eggs. Burton distinguishes the food from its preparation throughout this passage; the approval of butter, oil, sugar and honey is expressly qualified.

[5143]All sharp and sower sauces must be avoided, and spices, or at least seldome used: & so saffron sometimes in broth may be tolerated; but these things may be more freely used, as the temperature of the party is hot or cold, or as he shall finde inconvenience by them.	All sharp and sour sauces must be avoided, along with spices, or at least used rarely; thus saffron may sometimes be allowed in broth. But these things may be used more freely according to whether the person's constitution is hot or cold, and whether he finds that they disagree with him.[5144]
The thinnest, whitest, smallest wine is best, not thick, not strong; and so of bear, the midling is fittest. Bread of good wheat, pure, well purged from the bran is preferred: Laurentius cap.8. would have it kneaded with rain water, if it may be gotten.	The lightest, palest, weakest wine is best, neither thick nor strong; likewise, beer of moderate strength is most suitable. Bread made from good, pure wheat, with the bran thoroughly removed, is preferred. Laurentius, chapter 8, would have it kneaded with rainwater if that can be obtained.[5145]
[5146]Pure, thin, light water by all means use, of good smell and taste, like to the ayr in sight, such as is soon hot, soon cold, and which Hippocrates so much approves, if at least it may be had. Rain water is purest, so that it fall not down in great drops, and be used forthwith, for it quickly putrefies.	By all means use pure, thin, light water, with a good smell and taste, clear as air, quick to heat and quick to cool—the kind Hippocrates so strongly approves—if it can be obtained. Rainwater is purest, provided it does not fall in large drops and is used immediately, for it quickly goes bad.[5147]

[5144] Editor. Temperature means the balance of qualities in a person’s constitution. The awkward closing phrase is understood as requiring use to be adjusted according to whether these foods cause discomfort.

[5145] Editor. Small wine is weak wine; bear is beer. These preferences, including highly refined bread and rainwater, belong to Burton’s historical regimen.

[5146] Burton. Printed page 232, unmarked marginal heading: “Water.” The marginal heading introduces the discussion of drinking water.

[5147] Editor. Compare Hippocrates, Airs, Waters, Places 7–8, in Adams’s translation: section 7 describes favourable springs and water suited to different constitutions; section 8 praises rainwater but says it spoils readily and recommends boiling and straining. This does not verify Burton’s complete list of tests or his intermediary. These historical tests of clarity, taste and settling are not established guarantees of safe drinking water.

Next to it fountain water that riseth in the East, and runneth Eastward, from a quick running spring, from flinty, chalky, gravelly grounds: and the longer a river runneth, it is commonly the purest, though many springs do yeeld the best water at their fountains.	Next comes spring water that rises in the east and flows eastward, from a swiftly running spring in flinty, chalky or gravelly ground. The farther a river runs, the purer it generally becomes, although many springs yield their best water at the source.
The waters in hotter Countries, as in Turkie, Persia, India, within the Tropicks, are frequently purer then ours in the North, more subtile, thin, and lighter, as our Merchants observe by four ounces in a pound, pleasanter to drink, as good as our Bear, and some of them as Choaspis in Persia, preferred by the Persian kings, before wine it self.	The waters in hotter countries—Turkey, Persia, India, and within the tropics—are often purer than ours in the north: finer, thinner and lighter, by four ounces in a pound, as our merchants observe; more pleasant to drink, as good as our beer. Some of them, such as the Choaspes in Persia, are preferred by the Persian kings even to wine.[5148]
[5149]Clitorio quicunque, sitim de fonte levarit Vina fugit gaudetque, meris abstemius undis.	"Whoever has quenched his thirst from Clitor's spring shuns wine and, abstaining from it, delights in water alone."[5150]
Source page 232–233 Many rivers I deny not are muddy still, white, thick, like those in China, Nilus in Ægypt, Tibris at Rome, but after they be settled two or three dayes, defecate and clear, very commodious, usefull and good.	I do not deny that many rivers are always muddy, whitish and thick, like those in China, the Nile in Egypt, and the Tiber at Rome. But after their water has been left to settle for two or three days, it is free of sediment and clear, very serviceable, useful and good.

[5148] Editor. The report of a four-ounce difference in a pound is retained as Burton's claim, without endorsing its accuracy or supplying an unstated measurement procedure. Choaspis is the Choaspes.

[5149] Burton. Printed page 232, fourth asterisk: "Ovid. Met. lib.15." Ovid, Metamorphoses, book 15.

[5150] Editor. Ovid, Metamorphoses 15.322–323, among the wonders of waters related by Pythagoras. Clitor is in Arcadia. The verse describes a spring reputed to make drinkers reject wine, not a demonstrated property of water.

Source page 233 Many make use of deep wels, as of old in the holy Land, lakes, cisterns, when they cannot be better provided; To fetch it in Carts or Gundilo's as in Venice, or Camels backs, as at Cairo in Egypt, [5151]Radzivilius observed 8000. Camels daily there, employed about that business; Some keep it in Trunks, as in the East Indies, made four square with descending steps, and it is not amiss:	Many people use deep wells, as they did of old in the Holy Land, or lakes and cisterns, when no better supply is available. They fetch water in carts, or in gondolas as in Venice, or on camels' backs as at Cairo in Egypt, where Radziwiłł observed eight thousand camels employed daily in this work. Some keep it in reservoirs, as in the East Indies, built square with steps leading down, and this is not a bad practice.[5152]
For I would not have any one so nice as that Græcian Calis, sister to Nicephorus Emperour of Constantinople, and [5153]married to Dominicus Silvius Duke of Venice, that out of incredible wantonness, communi aquâ uti nolebat, would use no Vulgar water; but she died tantâ (saith mine authour) fœtidissimi puris copiâ, of so fulsome a disease, that no water could wash her clean.	For I would not have anyone as fastidious as that Greek woman Calis, sister of Nicephorus, emperor of Constantinople, and wife of Domenico Selvo, doge of Venice. From incredible self-indulgence, “she refused to use common water”—she would use no ordinary water. But she died “with such an abundance of extremely foul pus,” as my author says: of so disgusting a disease that no water could wash her clean.[5154]
[5155]Plato would not have a traveller lodge in a city, that is not governed by laws, or hath not a quick stream running by it; illud enim animum, hoc corrumpit valetudinem, one corrupts the body, the other the minde.	Plato would not have a traveller stay in a city that is not governed by laws, or has no swift stream flowing past it; “for the former corrupts the mind, the latter the health”—one corrupts the body, the other the mind.[5156]

[5152] Editor. Defecate means cleared of sediment. Trunks here are water-storage tanks or reservoirs, described as square and stepped. Burton’s Cairo camel count remains unverified.

[5153] Burton. Printed page 233, dagger: “The Dukes of Venice were then permitted to marry.” Burton’s English marginal comment, retained as printed.

[5154] Editor. The names, kinship and moralizing death story are retained as Burton reports them; their historical identification and immediate source remain unresolved. Duke of Venice is rendered doge. Both Latin phrases are translated separately from Burton’s own English glosses.

[5155] Burton. Printed page 233, second asterisk: “De Legibus.” On Laws. Burton’s attribution to Plato is retained; the precise passage has not been established.

[5156] Editor. The margin cites Plato’s Laws, but the precise source of this maxim has not been established. The Latin distinguishes damage to the mind from damage to health; Burton’s English restates the contrast in reverse order.

But this is more then needs, too much curiosity is naught, in time of necessity any water is allowed: Howsoever pure water is best, and which (as Pindarus holds) is better then gold; an especiall ornament it is, and very commodious to a city (according to [5157]Vegetius) when fresh springs are included within the walls, as at Corinth, in the midst of the town almost, there was arx altissima scatens fontibus, a goodly Mount full of fresh-water springs: if nature afford them not, they must be had by art.	But this is more than necessary. Excessive fastidiousness is wrong; in an emergency, any water is allowed. Still, pure water is best and, as Pindar maintains, better than gold. It is a special ornament and a great advantage to a city, according to Vegetius, when fresh springs are enclosed within its walls. At Corinth, almost in the middle of the town, there was "a lofty citadel abounding in springs"—a splendid hill full of freshwater springs. If nature does not supply them, human ingenuity must.[5158]
It is a wonder to read of those [5159]stupend Aqueducts, and infinite cost hath been bestowed in Rome of old, Constantinople, Carthage, Alexandria, and such populous cities, to conveigh good and wholesome waters: read [5160]Frontinus, Lipsius de admir. [5161]Plinius lib.3. cap.11. Strabo in his Geogr.	It is astonishing to read of those stupendous aqueducts and the enormous sums spent in ancient Rome, Constantinople, Carthage, Alexandria and other populous cities to convey good and wholesome water. Read Frontinus, Lipsius on the wonders of Rome, Pliny, book 3, chapter 11, and Strabo's Geography.

[5157] Burton. Printed page 233, third asterisk: "Lib.4. ca.10. Magna urbis utilitas cum perennes fontes muris includuntur, quod si natura non præstat, effodiendi, &c." Book 4, chapter 10: "It is a great advantage to a city when perennial springs are enclosed within its walls; if nature does not provide them, they must be dug," and so on.

[5158] Editor. Pindar, Olympian 1.1–2, opens by praising water as best and gold as pre-eminent among possessions. Burton compresses this into water being better than gold. Art here means human skill. Arx is a citadel; Burton's subsequent gloss describes its hill. Vegetius, Epitome of Military Science 4.10, directly supports the benefit of springs within city walls and the need to dig wells when they are absent; its context is provision for a siege.

That Aqueduct of Claudius was most eminent, fetched upon arches 15. miles, every Arch 109 foot high: they had 14. such other Aqueducts, besides lakes and cisterns, 700. as I take it; [5162]every house had private pipes and channels to serve them for their use.	The aqueduct of Claudius was especially remarkable: carried on arches for fifteen miles, each arch 109 feet high. They had fourteen other such aqueducts, besides reservoirs and cisterns—seven hundred, I believe. Every house had its own pipes and channels to supply its needs.[5163]
Peter Gillius in his accurate description of Constantinople, speaks of an old cistern which he went down to see, 336. foot long, 180. foot broad, built of marble, covered over with Arch-work, and sustained by 336. pillars, twelve foote asunder, and in 11. rowes, to contain sweet water.	Peter Gillius, in his detailed description of Constantinople, speaks of an old cistern that he went down to inspect: 336 feet long and 180 feet wide, built of marble, roofed with vaulting supported by 336 pillars, twelve feet apart and arranged in eleven rows, to hold fresh water.[5164]
Infinite cost in chanels and cisterns, from Nilus to Alexandria, hath been formerly bestowed, to the admiration of these times; [5165]their cisterns so curiously cemented and composed, that a beholder would take them to be all of one stone: when the foundation is laid, and cistern made, their house is half built.	Enormous sums were formerly spent on channels and cisterns from the Nile to Alexandria, to the wonder of our own age. Their cisterns are so skilfully cemented and constructed that an observer would take them to be made from a single stone: once the foundations have been laid and the cistern made, the house is half built.

[5162] Burton. Printed page 233, margin o: “Quæque domus Romæ fistulas habebat & canales, &c.” “Every house at Rome had pipes and channels,” and so on.

[5163] Editor. Compare Pliny, Natural History 36.121–123: Agrippa’s 700 basins are distinguished from 500 fountains and 130 distribution reservoirs; the next section describes the Claudian supply, including the Curtian spring. Pliny mentions supply to private houses but does not establish Burton’s claim about every house. The fifteen miles, 109-foot arches and fourteen other aqueducts remain unverified. Body and marginal Pliny locators are preserved; Frontinus, Lipsius and Strabo require fuller collation.

[5164] Editor. This description points to the Basilica Cistern in Constantinople, now Istanbul. Burton’s eleven rows are retained; the Istanbul municipal museum account describes 336 columns in twelve rows of twenty-eight. The dimensions and spacing attributed to Gillius still require collation.

[5165] Burton. Printed page 233, margin p: “Lib.2. ca.20. Jod. à Meggen. cap.15. pereg. Hier. Bellonius.” Book 2, chapter 20; Jodocus a Meggen, Jerusalem pilgrimage, chapter 15; Bellonius. The first bare locator is retained without assigning it more precisely.

That Segovian Aqueduct in Spain, is much wondred at in these dayes, [5166]upon three rows of pillars, one above another, conveying sweet water to every house: but each City almost is full of such Aqueducts.	The aqueduct at Segovia in Spain is greatly admired nowadays: three tiers of pillars, one above another, conveying fresh water to every house. But almost every city is full of such aqueducts.[5167]
Amongst the rest [5168]he is eternally to be commended, that brought that new stream to the North side of London at his own charge: and Mr Otho Nicholson, founder of our water-works and elegant Conduit in Oxford. So much have all times attributed to this Element, to be conveniently provided of it:	Among the rest, everlasting praise is due to the man who brought that new stream to the north side of London at his own expense, and to Mr Otho Nicholson, founder of our waterworks and elegant conduit in Oxford. Such importance has every age attached to having a convenient supply of this element.[5169]
Although Galen hath taken exceptions at such waters, which run through leaden pipes, ob cerussam quæ in iis generatur, for that unctuous ceruse, which causeth dysenteries and fluxes; [5170]yet as Alsarius Crucius of Genua well answers, it is opposite to common experience. If that were true, most of our Italian cities, Montpelier in France, with infinite others, would finde this inconvenience, but there is no such matter.	Although Galen has objected to water that runs through lead pipes, "because of the white lead formed in them"—that greasy white lead which causes dysentery and diarrhoea—Alsarius Crucius of Genoa rightly replies that this contradicts common experience. If it were true, most of our Italian cities, Montpellier in France and countless others would suffer this harm; but there is no such thing.[5171]

[5167] Editor. Burton's three tiers are retained. UNESCO's description of the Segovia aqueduct gives two tiers of arches. The margin itself makes the less absolute claim that water reaches almost every house.

[5168] Burton. Printed page 233, margin r: "Sir Hugh Middleton Baronet." Sir Hugh Myddelton, baronet; Burton's spelling is retained in the quotation.

[5169] Editor. The London stream is the New River, associated with Sir Hugh Myddelton and completed in 1613. Burton's claim that he bore the expense himself is retained but not independently established here. Historic England dates Oxford's Carfax Conduit to 1617, built by John Clarke for Otho Nicholson.

[5170] Burton. Printed page 233, fourth asterisk: "De quæsitis med. cent. fol.354." A century of medical questions, folio 354; Burton's abbreviated locator.

[5171] Editor. Ceruse is white lead. Burton here endorses a denial of harm from lead pipes; that denial is medically incorrect. Lead is toxic and lead plumbing can contaminate drinking water (World Health Organization, Lead poisoning). Fluxes here means diarrhoeal disorders.

Source page 234 Amongst fishes, those are most allowed of, that live in gravelly or sandy waters, Pikes, Pearch, Trout, Gudgeon, Smelts, Flounders, &c. Hyppolitus Salvianus takes exception at Carp; but I dare boldly say with [5172]Dubravius, it is an excellent meat, if it come not from [5173]muddy pooles, that it retain not an unsavory tast. Erinacius Marinus is much commended by Oribasius, Ætius, and most of our late writers.	Among fish, those living in waters with gravelly or sandy beds are most approved: pike, perch, trout, gudgeon, smelt, flounder and so on. Hippolytus Salvianus objects to carp, but I will confidently say with Dubravius that it is an excellent food, provided it does not come from muddy pools and retain an unpleasant taste. The sea urchin is highly recommended by Oribasius, Aetius and most of our recent writers.[5174]
[5175]Crato consil.21. lib.2. censures all manner of fruits, as subject to putrefaction, yet tolerable at sometimes, after meales, at second course, they keep down vapors, and have their use. Sweet fruits are best, as sweet Cherries, Plums, sweet Apples, Peare-maines, and Pippins, which Laurentius extols, as having a peculiar property against this disease, and Plater magnifies, omnibus modis appropriata conveniunt, but they must be corrected for their windiness,	Crato, consultation 21, book 2, condemns every kind of fruit as liable to decay, yet allows it sometimes after meals, as a second course: it keeps vapours down and has its uses. Sweet fruits are best, such as sweet cherries, plums, sweet apples, pearmains and pippins. Laurentius praises these as having a particular virtue against this disease, and Plater extols them: “they are suitable in every way as specific remedies.” But they must be prepared to counteract their tendency to cause wind.[5176]

[5174] Editor. Erinacius marinus, literally sea hedgehog, means sea urchin. The fish recommendations and claimed sources are historical; the margin’s abbreviated locators remain as printed.

[5175] Burton. Printed page 234, margin u: “Etsi omnes putredini sunt obnoxii, ubi secundis mensis, incepto jam priore, devorentur, commodi succi prosunt, qui dulcedine sunt præditi. Ut dulcia cerasa, poma, &c.” “Although all are liable to decay, when eaten at the second course, the first having already begun, those endowed with sweetness are beneficial and yield good nourishment: sweet cherries, apples, and so on.” The compressed wording is retained; see the Editor note on fruit.

[5176] Editor. Pearmains and pippins are apples; raisins of the sun are sun-dried raisins; musk-millions are muskmelons; pistick nuts are pistachios. Corrected means prepared to counteract supposed harmful effects. Margin u is compressed: incepto jam priore has been rendered “the first having already begun,” without supplying an unprinted account of digestion.

ripe Grapes are good, and Raysins of the sun, Musk-millions well corrected, and sparingly used. Figs are allowed, and Almonds blanched. Trallianus discommends Figs, [5177]Salvianus Olives and Capers, which [5178]others especially like of, and so of pistick nuts.	Ripe grapes and sun-dried raisins are good, as are muskmelons when properly prepared and used sparingly. Figs are allowed, and blanched almonds. Trallianus disapproves of figs; Salvianus disapproves of olives and capers, which others particularly favour, and the same disagreement applies to pistachio nuts.
Montanus and Mercurialis out of AvenZoar, admit Peaches, [5179]Peares, and Apples baked after meales, only corrected with sugar, and Aniseed, or Fennell seed, and so they may be profitably taken, because they strengthen the stomach, and keep down vapors.	Montanus and Mercurialis, following Avenzoar, allow peaches, pears and apples, baked and eaten after meals, provided they are prepared with sugar and aniseed or fennel seed. They may then be taken with benefit because they strengthen the stomach and keep vapours down.
The like may be said of preserved Cherries, Plums, marmalit of plums, quinces, &c. but not to drink after them, [5180]Pomegranates, Lemons, Oranges are tolerated, if they be not too sharp.	The same may be said of preserved cherries and plums, and preserves made from plums, quinces and so on; but one must not drink after eating them. Pomegranates, lemons and oranges are allowed if they are not too sour.

[5179] Burton. Printed page 234, margin z, continuing below the body: “Pyra quæ grato sunt sapore, cocta mala, poma tosta, & saccharo, vel anisi semine, conspersa, utiliter statim à prandio vel à cœna sumi possunt, eo quod ventriculum roborent & vapores caput petentes reprimant. Mont.” “Pears with a pleasant flavour, cooked apples, and roasted fruits sprinkled with sugar or aniseed may usefully be taken immediately after dinner or supper, because they strengthen the stomach and suppress vapours rising towards the head.” Montanus.

[5180] Burton. Printed page 234, bottom margin a: “Punica mala aurantia commode permittuntur modo non sint austera & acida.” “Pomegranates and oranges may properly be allowed, provided they are not harsh and sour.” The Latin does not separately name the lemons in Burton’s body text.

[5181]Crato will admit of no herbs, but Borage, Bugloss, Endive, Fennell, Aniseed, Bawme, Callenius and Arnoldus tolerate Lettuce, Spinage, Beets, &c. The same Crato will allow no roots at all to be eaten. Some approve of Potatoes, Parsnips, but all corrected for winde. No raw sallets; but as Laurentius prescribes, in broths; and so Crato commends many of them: or to use Borage, Hops, Bawme, steeped in their ordinary drink.	Crato allows no herbs or greens except borage, bugloss, endive, fennel, aniseed and balm. Callenius and Arnoldus permit lettuce, spinach, beets and so on. Crato likewise allows no roots at all to be eaten. Some approve of potatoes and parsnips, but all must be prepared to counteract wind. No raw salads: the greens should be cooked in broths, as Laurentius prescribes, and Crato recommends many of them in this form. Alternatively, borage, hops and balm may be steeped in the patient's usual drink.[5182]
[5183]AvenZoar magnifies the juyce of a Pomegranate, if it be sweet, and especially Rose-water, which he would have to be used in every dish, which they put in practice in those hot Countries, about Damascus, where (if we may believe the relations of Vertomannus) many hogsheads of Rose-water are to be sold in the market at once, it is in so great request with them.	Avenzoar praises pomegranate juice, if it is sweet, and especially rosewater, which he would have used in every dish. This is the practice in the hot countries around Damascus, where, if we may believe Varthema's accounts, many hogsheads of rosewater are offered for sale in the market at once, so great is the demand for it.[5184]

[5182] Editor. Sallets are salads; bawme is balm. Olera includes edible greens, hence herbs or greens in the modern version. Potatoes is retained without assigning a botanical species. The disagreement among the cited writers is preserved.

SUBSECT. 2. Dyet rectified in quantity.	SUBSECTION 2. Diet corrected in quantity.
Man alone, saith [5185]Cardan, eates and drinks without appetite, and useth all his pleasure without necessity, animæ vitio, and thence come many inconveniences unto him. For there is no meat whatsoever, though otherwise wholesome and good, but if unseasonably taken, or immoderately used, more then the stomack can well beare, it will ingender cruditie, and do much harme.	Human beings alone, says Cardan, eat and drink without appetite and indulge in every pleasure without need, "through a fault of the soul"; and many troubles come to them from this. For no food, however wholesome and good in itself, can be eaten at an unsuitable time or in excessive amounts, beyond what the stomach can comfortably bear, without producing indigestion and doing great harm.[5186]
Source page 234–235 Therefore [5187]Crato adviseth his patient to eat but twice a day, and that at his set meales, by no means to eat without an appetite, or upon a full stomack, and to put seven houres difference betwixt dinner and supper. Which rule if we did observe in our Colledges, it would be much better for our healths: But custome that tyrant so prevailes, that contrary to all good order and rules of Physick, we scarce admit of five.	Crato therefore advises his patient to eat only twice a day, at fixed mealtimes; never to eat without an appetite or on a full stomach; and to leave seven hours between dinner and supper. If we observed this rule in our colleges, it would be much better for our health. But that tyrant custom is so powerful that, contrary to all good order and the rules of medicine, we scarcely allow five.[5188]

[5185] Burton. Printed page 234, margin e: "Li.2. de com. Solus homo edit bibitque, &c." Book 2, abbreviated title de com.: "Human beings alone eat and drink," and so on.

[5186] Editor. Cardan is Girolamo Cardano. Crudity denotes imperfect digestion and the supposedly undigested matter it produces. The regimen in this subsection belongs to historical humoral medicine.

[5187] Burton. Printed page 234, margin f: "Consil.21.18. si plus ingeratur quam par est, & ventriculus tolerare posset, nocet, & cruditates generat, &c." Consultations 21, 18: "If more is taken in than is proper and the stomach can bear, it does harm and produces undigested matter," and so on. The numerical locator is retained as printed.

[5188] Editor. Dinner is the midday meal, supper the evening meal. Burton's reference to our colleges brings the learned rule into his own collegiate setting.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Source page 235 If after seven houres tarrying he shall have no stomack, let him defer his meal, or eat very little at his ordinary time of repast. This very counsell was given by Prosper Calenus to Cardinall Cæsius, labouring of this disease; and [5189]Platerus prescribes it to a patient of his, to be most severely kept. Guianerius admits of three meals a day, but Montanus consil.23. pro Ab. Italo, ties him precisely to two. And as he must not eat overmuch, so he may not absolutely fast; for as Celsus contends lib.1. Iacchinus 15. in 9. Rhasis, [5190]repletion and inanition may both do harm in two contrary extreams.	If he has no appetite after waiting seven hours, he should postpone his meal, or eat very little at his usual mealtime. Prosper Calenus gave this very advice to Cardinal Caesius when he was suffering from this disease, and Plater prescribes it for a patient of his, to be observed with the utmost strictness. Guianerius allows three meals a day, but Montanus, consultation 23, for an Italian abbot, limits him strictly to two. And just as he must not eat too much, so he must not fast altogether: for, as Celsus argues in book 1, and Iacchinus, 15 on book 9 of Rhazes, overfilling and emptying the body can both do harm at their opposite extremes.[5191]

[5189] Burton. Printed page 235, margin g: “Observat. lib.1. Assuescat bis in die cibos sumere, certa semper horâ.” Observations, book 1: “Let him grow accustomed to taking food twice a day, always at a fixed hour.”

[5191] Editor. To have no stomach here means to have no appetite. Repletion and inanition are excessive fullness and depletion. The compressed medical references are retained; they have not all been verified.

Moreover, that which he doth eat, must be well [5192]chewed, and not hastily gobled, for that causeth crudity and winde; and by all means to eat no more than he can well digest. Some think (saith [5193]Trincavelius lib.11. cap.29. de curand. part. hum.) the more they eat the more they nourish themselves: eat and live, as the proverb is, not knowing that onely repaires man which is well concocted, not that which is devoured.	Moreover, whatever he eats must be chewed well, not hastily gobbled down, for that causes indigestion and wind; and he must take care to eat no more than he can properly digest. Some people think, says Trincavelius, book 11, chapter 29, On Treating the Parts of the Human Body, that the more they eat, the more they nourish themselves—"eat and live," as the proverb says. They do not know that only what is properly digested restores a person, not whatever is swallowed.[5194]
Melancholy men most part have good [5195]appetites, but ill digestion, and for that cause they must be sure to rise with an appetite: and that which Socrates and Disarius the Physicians in [5196]Macrobius so much require, S. Hierome injoynes Rusticus, to eat and drink no more than will [5197]satisfie hunger and thirst.	Melancholy people generally have good appetites but poor digestion, and for that reason they must make sure to leave the table still hungry. What Socrates and Disarius, the physicians in Macrobius, so strongly recommend, Saint Jerome also enjoins on Rusticus: to eat and drink no more than will satisfy hunger and thirst.[5198]

[5192] Burton. Printed page 235, margin i: "Siquidem qui semimansum velociter ingerunt cibum, ventriculo laborem inferunt, & flatus maximos provocant, Crato." "For those who swallow half-chewed food quickly impose work on the stomach and provoke a great deal of wind." Crato.

[5193] Burton. Printed page 235, first asterisk: "Quidam maximè comedere nituntur, putantes eâ ratione se vires refecturos; ignorantes, non ea quæ ingerunt posse vires reficere, sed quæ probè concoquunt." "Some strive to eat as much as possible, thinking that they will restore their strength in this way, unaware that it is not what they swallow that can restore strength, but what they digest properly."

[5194] Editor. Concocted means digested. The printed lib.11. is retained; the exact Trincavelius title and locator require further collation.

[5196] Burton. Printed page 235, margin l: "Saturnal. lib.7. cap.4." Saturnalia, book 7, chapter 4.

[5197] Burton. Printed page 235, margin m: "Modicus & temperatus cibus & carni & animæ utilis est." "Moderate and temperate food benefits both flesh and soul."

[5198] Editor. Macrobius, Saturnalia 7.4.32: Disarius cites Socrates on avoiding foods and drinks that stimulate appetite beyond hunger or thirst. Socrates is the philosopher, not another physician. Compare Jerome, Letter 125.7 to Rusticus, in Fremantle's translation, for the marginal sentence praising moderate food as beneficial to body and soul. Jerome also warns against excessive fasting. Burton's body sentence is a compressed application, not a verified verbatim quotation of that passage.

[5199]Lessius the Jesuite holds 12. 13. or 14. ounces, or in our Northern countries 16. at most, (for all students, weaklings, and such as lead an idle sedentary life) of meat, bread, &c. a fit proportion for a whole day, and as much or little more of drink. Nothing pesters the body and minde sooner than to be still fed, to eat and ingurgitate beyond all measure, as many do.	Lessius the Jesuit considers twelve, thirteen or fourteen ounces of food, bread and so on—or at most sixteen in our northern countries—a suitable allowance for a whole day for all students, people in poor health, and those who lead an inactive, sedentary life; with the same amount, or a little more, to drink. Nothing burdens body and mind sooner than continual feeding: eating and gulping down food beyond all measure, as many do.[5200]
[5201]By overmuch eating and continuall feasts they stifle nature, and choke up themselves; which, had they lived coursly, or like galliey-slaves been tyed to an oare, might have haply prolonged many fair years.	By overeating and continual feasting they smother nature and choke themselves up; whereas, if they had lived on coarse fare, or been tied to an oar like galley slaves, they might perhaps have prolonged their lives by many good years.
A great inconvenience comes by variety of dishes, which causeth the precedent distemperature, [5202]than which (saith Avicenna) nothing is worse; to feed on diversity of meats, or overmuch, Sertorius-like in lucem cænare, and as commonly they do in Muscovie and Island, to prolong their meals all day long, or all night.	A great deal of harm comes from a variety of dishes, which causes the disorder just described. Nothing, says Avicenna, is worse than eating many different foods, or eating too much; dining like Sertorius “until daylight,” and prolonging meals all day or all night, as people commonly do in Muscovy and Iceland.[5203]

[5199] Burton. Printed page 235, margin n: “Hygiasticon reg.14.16. unciæ per diem sufficiant, computato pane, carne ovis, vel aliis obsoniis, & totidem vel paulò plures unciæ potus.” Hygiasticon, rule 14: “Let sixteen ounces a day suffice, counting bread, meat, eggs or other foods, and the same number, or a few more ounces, of drink.” Punctuation is sparse in the printed list; ovis is read as eggs.

[5200] Editor. Leonard Lessius’s Hygiasticon advocates a measured diet. The ounces are historical weight measures; no modern conversion or nutritional prescription is implied. Food and drink allowances, and the contrast with galley slavery, are presented as the cited writers’ claims.

[5201] Burton. Printed page 235, margin o, continuing below the body: “Idem reg.27. Plures in domibus suis brevi tempore pascentes extinguuntur, qui si triremibus vincti fuissent, aut gregario pane pasti, sani & incolumes in longam ætatem vitam prorogassent.” The same author, rule 27: “Many die in a short time, feeding in their own homes, who, had they been chained to galleys or fed on common bread, would have prolonged their lives in sound health to a great age.”

[5203] Editor. Island means Iceland; Muscovy refers to Russia. The example of Sertorius is retained, but its immediate source has not been established.

Our Northern countries offend especially in this, and we in this Iland ([5204]ampliter viventes in prandiis & cœnis, as Polydore notes) are most liberall feeders, but to our own hurt. [5205]Persicos odi puer apparatus: Excess of meat breedeth sickness, and gluttony causeth cholerick diseases: by surfeiting many perish, but he that dieteth himself prolongeth his life, Ecclus.37.29,30.	Our northern countries are especially guilty of this, and we on this island—"living lavishly at dinner and supper," as Polydore observes—are the most generous eaters, but to our own harm. "I hate Persian extravagance, boy." Excessive eating breeds sickness, and gluttony causes bilious diseases; many die from overeating, but someone who restrains his diet prolongs his life: Ecclesiasticus 37:29–30.[5206]
We account it a great glory for a man to have his table daily furnished with variety of meats: but hear the Physician, he puls thee by the ear as thou sittest, and telleth thee, [5207]that nothing can be more noxious to thy health, than such variety & plenty.	We count it a great distinction for a man to have his table furnished every day with a variety of foods. But listen to the physician: he pulls you by the ear as you sit there and tells you that nothing can be more harmful to your health than such variety and abundance.
Temperance is a bridle of gold, and he that can use it aright, [5208]ego non summis viris comparo, sed simillimum Deo judico, is liker a God than a man: For as it will transform a beast a man again, so will it make a man a God.	Temperance is a golden bridle, and whoever can use it rightly—"I do not compare him with the greatest men, but judge him most like a god"—is more like a god than a man. For just as it will transform a beast into a man again, so it will make a man a god.[5209]

[5206] Editor. Horace, Odes 1.38.1, rejects luxurious Persian preparations for a feast; the marginal book number 5 is incorrect. Burton's following biblical paraphrase corresponds to Ecclesiasticus (Sirach) 37:30–31 in the King James text, rather than his printed 29–30. Cholerick means bilious here.

[5208] Burton. Printed page 235, bottom asterisk: "Tul. orat. pro M. Marcel." Cicero, speech For Marcus Marcellus.

[5209] Editor. Cicero, Pro Marcello 8, praises Caesar's self-command and clemency towards a defeated opponent. Burton adapts the judgement to temperance in eating; the Latin has been freshly translated before his own gloss.

Source page 235–236 To preserve thine honour, health, and to avoid therefore all those inflations, torments, obstructions, crudities, and diseases that come by a full diet, the best way is to [5210]feed sparingly of one or two dishes at most, to have ventrem bene moratum, as Seneca calls it, to [5211]chose one of many, and to feed on that alone, as Crato adviseth his Patient.	To preserve your honour and health, therefore, and avoid all the swellings, pains, obstructions, indigestion and diseases that come from a heavy diet, the best course is to eat sparingly from one or two dishes at most; to have "a well-behaved stomach," as Seneca calls it; to choose one dish from many and eat that alone, as Crato advises his patient.[5212]
Source page 236 The same counsell [5213]Prosper Calenus gives to Cardinall Cæsius, to use a moderate and simple diet: and though his table be jovially furnished by reason of his state & guests, yet for his own part to single out some one savoury dish and feed on it.	Prosper Calenus gives Cardinal Caesius the same advice: to follow a moderate, simple diet; and although his rank and guests require his table to be generously furnished, he himself should select one appetizing dish and eat that.

[5212] Editor. Inflations are swellings or bloating. Compare Seneca, Moral Letters 123.3: a well-behaved stomach, able to endure poor treatment, is a large part of freedom. Seneca's arrival at an unprepared household leads to reflection on hunger, plain bread and independence from luxury (123.1–4). Burton adapts the phrase to a dietary rule; Seneca's context is ethical rather than a medical prescription.

[5213] Burton. Printed page 236, margin u: "L. de atra bile. Simplex sit cibus, & non varius: quod licet dignitati tuæ ob convivas difficile videatur, &c." On Black Bile: "Let the food be simple, not varied; although this may seem difficult for Your Eminence because of your guests," and so on.

The same is inculcated by [5214]Crato consil.9. l.2. to a noble personage affected with this grievance, he would have his highnes to dine or sup alone, without all his honorable attendance & courtly company, with a private friend or so, [5215]a dish or two, a cup of Rhenish wine &c.	Crato, consultation 9, book 2, presses the same advice on a nobleman suffering from this complaint. He would have His Highness dine or sup alone, without all his distinguished attendants and courtly company, with perhaps a personal friend, a dish or two, and a cup of Rhenish wine.[5216]
Montanus consil.24. for a noble Matron injoyns her one dish, & by no means to drink betwixt meals. The like consil.229. or not to eat till he be an hungry, which rule Berengarius did most strictly observe, as Hilbertus Cenomecensis Episc. writes in his life.	Montanus, consultation 24, for a noble lady, prescribes one dish and forbids drinking between meals. He gives similar advice in consultation 229, or says not to eat until one is hungry: a rule Berengarius observed most strictly, as Hildebert, bishop of Le Mans, writes in his life.[5217]
—cui non fuit unquam Ante sitim potus, nec cibus ante famem,	"He never drank before he was thirsty, nor ate before he was hungry,"

[5214] Burton. Printed page 236, margin x: "Celsitudo tua prandeat sola, absque apparatu aulico, contentus sit illustrissimus princeps duobus tantum ferculis, vinoque Rhenano solum in mensa utatur." "Let Your Highness dine alone, without courtly display; let the most illustrious prince be content with only two dishes, and use only Rhenish wine at table."

[5215] Burton. Printed page 236, margin y: "Semper intra satietatem à mensa recedat, uno ferculo contentus." "Let him always leave the table short of fullness, content with one dish."

[5216] Editor. Rhenish wine is wine from the Rhine region. Burton's body text and marginal recommendations vary between one and two dishes; the variations are preserved.

[5217] Editor. Berengarius is Berengar of Tours; Hilbertus is Hildebert of Le Mans. The quoted couplet appears in the poem on Berengar transmitted among Hildebert's Carmina miscellanea. The digitized text was located, but its scan and immediate source have not yet been fully collated.

and which all temperate men do constantly keep. It is a frequent solemnity still used with us, when friends meet to go to the ale-house or tavern, they are not sociable otherwise: and if they visit one anothers houses, they must both eat and drink. I reprehend it not moderately used, but to some men nothing can be more offensive; they had better, I speak it with Saint [5218]Ambrose, pour so much water in their shooes.	and all temperate people constantly observe it. We still commonly follow this ceremony: when friends meet, they go to an alehouse or tavern; otherwise they are not being sociable. And if they visit one another's houses, they must both eat and drink. I do not condemn this when practised in moderation, but for some people nothing could be more harmful: they would do better, as I say with Saint Ambrose, to pour that much water into their shoes.[5219]
It much availes likewise to keep good order in our diet, [5220]to eat liquid things first, broaths, fish, and such meats as are sooner corrupted in the stomack; harder meats of digestion must come last. Crato would have the supper less than dinner, which Cardan contradict. lib.1. Tract.5. contradict.18. disallowes, and that by the authority of Galen 7. art. curat. cap.6. and for four reasons he will have the supper biggest:	It also helps greatly to keep our food in the proper order: to eat liquid foods first, broths, fish and foods that spoil sooner in the stomach; foods harder to digest must come last. Crato would have supper smaller than dinner. Cardan, Contradictions, book 1, treatise 5, contradiction 18, rejects this on the authority of Galen, book 7 of the Art of Healing, chapter 6, and gives four reasons for making supper the larger meal.[5221]

[5218] Burton. Printed page 236, dagger: “Lib. de Hel. & Jejunio. Multò melius in terram vina fudisses.” On Elijah and Fasting: “You would have done much better to pour the wine onto the ground.”

[5219] Editor. Burton’s water in the shoes differs from the marginal Latin, which speaks of pouring wine on the ground. Both versions are retained; the underlying Ambrose passage has not been fully collated.

[5220] Burton. Printed page 236, margin z: “Crato. Multum refert non ignorare qui cibi priores, &c. liquida præcedant carnium jura, pisces, fructus, &c. Cœna brevior sit prandio.” Crato: “It matters greatly to know which foods should come first,” and so on. “Let liquid foods precede: meat broths, fish, fruit,” and so on. “Let supper be smaller than dinner.” The list’s compressed syntax is retained.

[5221] Editor. The proposed order of foods rests on historical theories of digestion and putrefaction. Burton then records disagreement over the relative size of meals instead of presenting a unanimous medical rule.

I have read many treatises to this purpose, I know not how it may concern some few sick men, but for my part generally for all, I should subscribe to that custome of the Romans, to make a sparing dinner, and a liberall supper; all their preparation and invitation was still at supper, no mention of dinner. Many reasons I could give, but when all is said pro and con, [5222]Cardans rule is best, to keep that we are accustomed unto, though it be naught, and to follow our disposition and appetite in some things is not amiss; to eat sometimes of a dish which is hurtfull, if we have an extraordinary liking to it.	I have read many treatises on this subject. I do not know how it may apply to a few particular patients, but for my own part, as a general rule for everyone, I would support the Roman custom of a light dinner and a generous supper. Their preparations and invitations were always for supper; dinner went unmentioned. I could give many reasons, but when everything has been said for and against, Cardan's rule is best: to keep to what we are accustomed to, even if it is bad. Nor is it wrong in some things to follow our inclination and appetite, and occasionally eat a harmful dish if we have an exceptional liking for it.
Alexander Severus loved Hares and Apples above all other meats, as [5223]Lampridius relates in his life: one Pope Pork, another Peacock, &c. what harme came of it? I conclude, our own experience is the best Physician; that diet which is most propitious to one, is often pernicious to another, such is the variety of palats, humours, and temperatures, let every man observe, and be a law unto himself.	Alexander Severus loved hares and apples above all other foods, as Lampridius relates in his life; one pope loved pork, another peacock, and so on. What harm came of it? I conclude that our own experience is the best physician. The diet most beneficial to one person is often harmful to another, so different are our tastes, humours and constitutions. Let everyone observe himself and be a law to himself.[5224]
Tiberius in [5225]Tacitus did laugh at all such, that after 30. years of age would ask counsell of others concerning matters of diet, I say the same.	Tiberius, in Tacitus, laughed at everyone who, after the age of thirty, would ask other people's advice about diet. I say the same.[5226]

[5222] Burton. Printed page 236, margin a: “Tract.6. contradict.1. lib.1.” Treatise 6, contradiction 1, book 1.

[5223] Burton. Printed page 236, margin b: “Super omnia quotidianum leporem habuit, & pomis indulsit.” “Above all, he had a hare every day, and indulged in fruit.”

[5224] Editor. Historia Augusta, Alexander Severus 37.7 and 37.10, mentions a daily hare and a fondness for fruit. Latin pomis is broader than Burton’s apples. Temperatures means bodily constitutions, not thermometer readings. The unnamed popes are unresolved.

[5225] Burton. Printed page 236, asterisk: “Annal.6. Ridere solebat eos, qui post 30. ætatis annum, ad cognoscenda corpori suo noxia vel utilia, alicujus consilii indigerent.” Annals, book 6: “He used to laugh at those who, after their thirtieth year, needed someone else’s advice to recognize what was harmful or beneficial to their own body.”

[5226] Editor. Tacitus, Annals 6.46, concerns knowing what benefits or harms one’s own body, more broadly than Burton’s diet. The passage also says that the ailing Tiberius did not abandon his indulgences; Burton uses the remark as practical advice.

Source page 236–237 These few rules of diet he that keeps, shall surely finde great ease and speedy remedy by it. It is a wonder to relate that prodigious temperance of some Hermites, Anachorites, and fathers of the Church; he that shall but read their lives, written by Hierome, Athanasius, &c. how abstemious Heathens have bin in this kind, those Curii and Fabritii, those old Philosophers, as Pliny records lib.11. Xenephon lib.1. de vit. Socrat. Emperours and Kings, as Nicephorus relates, Eccles. hist. lib.18. cap.8. of Mauritius, Lodovicus Pius, &c. and that admirable example of Lodovicus Cornarus, a Patrician of Venice, cannot but admire them.[5227]	Anyone who keeps these few rules of diet will surely find great relief and a speedy remedy. It is astonishing to recount the extraordinary temperance of some hermits, anchorites and Fathers of the Church. Anyone who reads their lives, written by Jerome, Athanasius and others; how abstemious pagans have been in this respect —the Curii and Fabricii, those ancient philosophers, as Pliny records in book 11, and Xenophon in book 1 of his life of Socrates; emperors and kings, as Nicephorus relates in his Ecclesiastical History, book 18, chapter 8, concerning Maurice, Louis the Pious and others; and the admirable example of Luigi Cornaro, a Venetian patrician—cannot help admiring them.[5228]
Source page 237 This have they done voluntarily, and in health; what shall these private men do that are visited with sickness, and necessarily [5229]injoyned to recover, and continue their health? It is a hard thing to observe a strict diet, & qui medicè vivit, miserè vivit, as the saying is, quale hoc ipsum erit vivere, his si privatus fueris? as good be buried, as so much debarred of his appetite; excessit medicina malum, the physick is more troublesome then the disease, so he complained in the Poet, so thou thinkest:	They did this voluntarily, while in good health. What, then, should ordinary people do when illness visits them and they are obliged to recover and preserve their health? It is hard to follow a strict diet, and “he who lives by medical rules lives miserably,” as the saying goes. “What sort of life will it be, if you are deprived of these things?” One might as well be buried as have one's appetite so restricted. “The remedy has exceeded the disease”—the treatment is more troublesome than the illness: so he complained in the poet, and so you think.[5230]

[5228] Editor. Anchorites are religious recluses. The Curii and Fabricii evoke Roman examples of frugality. Cornarus is Luigi Cornaro; the margin points to an edition associated with Lessius in 1614. Burton’s sequence of pagan, Christian and princely examples is retained; several locators remain unresolved.

[5229] Burton. Printed page 237, margin c: “Ægyptii olim omnes morbos curabant vomitu & jejunio. Bohemus lib.1. cap.5.” “The Egyptians formerly treated all diseases by vomiting and fasting.” Boemus, book 1, chapter 5.

[5230] Editor. The sayings voice the imagined patient’s resistance to restriction. The Latin quotations are translated independently, followed by Burton’s English expansions. Compare Lucan, Civil War 2.142, excessit medicina modum, “the remedy exceeded measure,” on Sulla’s violence. Burton’s malum differs; a direct borrowing is probable, not certain. The source of quale hoc ipsum remains unresolved.

yet he that loves himself, will easily endure this little misery, to avoid a greater inconvenience; è malis minimum, better do this then do worse. And as [5231]Tully holds, better be a temperate old man, then a lascivious youth. 'Tis the onely sweet thing, (which he adviseth) so to moderate ourselves, that we may have senectutem in juventute, & in juventute senectutem, Be youthfull in our old age, staid in our youth, discreet and temperate in both.	Yet anyone who loves himself will readily endure this little misery to avoid a greater trouble: "the least of evils"; better do this than fare worse. And, as Cicero maintains, better be a temperate old man than a dissolute youth. The one sweet course, as he advises, is to govern ourselves so that we may have "old age in youth, and in youth old age": be youthful in our old age, steady in our youth, prudent and temperate in both.[5232]

[5231] Burton. Printed page 237, second dagger: "Cat. Major: Melior conditio senis viventis ex præscripto artis medicæ, quam adolescentis luxuriosi." Cato the Elder: "The condition of an old man living according to medical prescriptions is better than that of a dissolute young man."

[5232] Editor. The 1651 Latin repeats "old age in youth" in both halves. Its repetition is preserved, followed by Burton's contrasting English explanation. Cicero, On Old Age 11.38, commends an element of age in youth and of youth in age; the separate marginal maxim has not been located verbatim.

MEMB. 2. Retention and Evacuation rectified.	MEMBER 2. Retention and evacuation corrected.
I Have declared in the causes, what harm costiveness hath done in procuring this disease: if it be so noxious, the opposite must needs be good, or mean at least, as indeed it is, and to this cure necessarily required; maximè conducit, saith Montaltus cap.27. it very much availes.	In discussing the causes, I have shown the harm constipation has done in bringing on this disease. If it is so harmful, its opposite must surely be good, or at least the middle course must be, as indeed it is, and is necessary for this cure. “It is most beneficial,” says Montalto, chapter 27: it helps very greatly.[5233]
[5234]Altomarus cap.7. commends walking in a morning, into some fair green pleasant fields, but by all means first, by art or nature he will have these ordinary excrements evacuated. Piso calls it Beneficium ventris, the benefit, help or pleasure of the belly, for it doth much ease it. Laurentius cap.8. Crato consil.21. l.2. prescribes it once a day at least: where nature is defective, art must supply, by those lenitive electuaries, suppositories, condite prunes, turpentine, clisters, as shall be shewed.	Altomarus, chapter 7, recommends a morning walk into pleasant, green fields, but insists that these ordinary bodily wastes first be evacuated, naturally or through medical help. Piso calls it “the benefit of the belly”: the belly's benefit, help or pleasure, for it gives it great relief. Laurentius, chapter 8, and Crato, consultation 21, book 2, prescribe this at least once a day. Where nature fails, treatment must supply the lack, through laxative electuaries, suppositories, preserved prunes, turpentine and enemas, as will be shown.[5235]

[5233] Editor. Retention and evacuation are one pair among the six non-natural things regulated by regimen. Mean is the middle course: Burton qualifies the apparent recommendation of constipation’s opposite.

[5234] Burton. Printed page 237, margin d: “Debet per amœna exerceri, & loca viridia, excretis prius arte vel natura alvi excrementis.” “He should exercise in pleasant, green places, after the bowels’ waste has first been discharged, by treatment or naturally.”

[5235] Editor. Electuaries are medicinal compounds commonly mixed with a sweet vehicle; lenitive means gently laxative. Condite prunes are preserved prunes, and clisters are enemas. Turpentine is retained as a historical drug recommendation, not a direction for present treatment.

Prosper Calenus lib. de atra bile, commends Clisters, in Hypocondriacall melancholy, still to be used as occasion serves, [5236]Peter Cnemander in a consultation of his pro hypocondriaco, will have his patient continually loose, and to that end sets down there many forms of Potions and Clisters.	Prosper Calenus, in his book On Black Bile, recommends enemas for hypochondriacal melancholy, to be used whenever the occasion requires. Peter Cnemander, in a consultation for a hypochondriacal patient, would have the patient's bowels kept continually loose, and gives many recipes for potions and enemas to that end.[5237]
Mercurialis, consil.88. If this benefit come not of its own accord, [5238]prescribes Clisters in the first place: so doth Montanus consil.24. consil.31. &229. he commends turpentine to that purpose: the same he ingeminates, consil.230. for an Italian Abbot.	Mercurialis, consultation 88, prescribes enemas first if this benefit does not come of its own accord; so does Montanus in consultations 24, 31 and 229. He recommends turpentine for this purpose, and repeats the advice in consultation 230, for an Italian abbot.
'Tis very good to wash his hands and face often, to shift his clothes, to have fair linnen about him, to be decently & comely attired, for sordes vitiant, nastiness defiles, & dejects any man that is so voluntarily, or compelled by want, it dulleth the spirits.	It is very good to wash the hands and face often, change one's clothes, wear clean linen, and be neatly and becomingly dressed; for "filth corrupts"—dirt defiles and depresses anyone who lives in it, whether by choice or through poverty; it dulls the spirits.[5239]

[5237] Editor. Hypochondriacal melancholy is the historical form associated with the upper abdominal organs, not simply present-day anxiety about health. Loose refers to the state of the bowels.

[5238] Burton. Printed page 237, margin f: "Si non sponte, clisteribus purgetur." "If not of its own accord, let it be cleared by enemas."

[5239] Editor. Shift means change; fair linen means clean linen. Spirits retains the period's overlapping senses of bodily vital powers and mental animation.

Baths are either artificiall or naturall, both have their special uses in this malady, and as [5240]Alexander supposeth lib.1. cap.16. yeeld as speedy a remedy, as any other Physick whatsoever. Ætius would have them daily used, assidua balnea, Tetra.2. sect.2. c.9. Galen crakes how many severall cures he hath performed in this kinde by use of bathes alone, and Rufus pills, moistning them which are otherwise dry.	Baths are either artificially prepared or natural. Both have their particular uses in this illness and, as Alexander supposes in book 1, chapter 16, provide as speedy a remedy as any other treatment whatever. Aetius would have them used daily: "frequent baths," Tetrabiblos 2, section 2, chapter 9. Galen boasts of the many cures of this kind he has achieved through baths alone, and Rufus's pills, moistening people who are otherwise dry.[5241]
Source page 237–238 Rhasis makes it a principall cure, Tota cura sit in humectando, to bathe and afterwards anoint with oyle. Iason Pratensis, Laurentius cap.8. and Montanus set down their peculiar Forms of artificiall bathes.	Rhazes makes it a principal treatment: "Let the whole treatment consist in moistening"—to bathe and then anoint with oil. Jason Pratensis, Laurentius in chapter 8, and Montanus give their particular recipes for artificially prepared baths.
Source page 238 Crato consil.17. lib.2. commends Mallowes, Camomile, Violets, Borage to be boyled in it, and sometimes faire water alone, and in his following counsell, Balneum aquæ dulcis solum sæpissimè profuisse compertum habemus. So doth Fuchsius lib.1. cap.33. Frisimelica 2. consil.42. in Trincavelius. Some beside hearbs, prescribe a rammes head and other things to be boyled.	Crato, consultation 17, book 2, recommends boiling mallows, camomile, violets and borage in the bathwater, and sometimes using clean water alone. In the following consultation he says, "We have found that a bath of fresh water alone has very often been beneficial." So do Fuchsius, book 1, chapter 33, and Frisimelica, book 2, consultation 42, in Trincavelius. Besides herbs, some prescribe boiling a ram's head and other things.

[5240] Burton. Printed page 237, margin g: "Balneorum usus dulcium, si quid aliud, ipsis opitulatur. Credo hæc dici cum aliqua jactantia, inquit Montanus consil.26." "The use of fresh-water baths helps them, if anything does." "I believe these things are said with some boasting," says Montanus, consultation 26.

[5241] Editor. Artificial baths are prepared with added ingredients; natural baths are spring baths. Crakes means boasts. The marginal reservation attributed to Montanus tempers the claim. Rufus's pills are named without a recipe here.

[5242]Fernelius consil.44. will have them used 10. or 12. dayes together; to which he must enter fasting, and so continue in a temperate heat, and after that frictions all over the body. Lælius Ægubinus consil.142. and Christoph. Ærerus in a consultation of his, hold once or twice a week sufficient to bathe, the [5243]water to be warme, not hot, for fear of sweating.	Fernelius, consultation 44, would have baths used for ten or twelve consecutive days. The patient must enter on an empty stomach and remain in a moderate warmth, followed by rubbing all over the body. Laelius Eugubinus, consultation 142, and Christophorus Aererus, in a consultation of his, consider bathing once or twice a week sufficient. The water should be warm, not hot, to avoid sweating.[5244]
Felix Plater, observ. lib.1. for a Melancholy Lawyer, [5245]will have lotions of the head still joyned to these bathes, with a lee wherein capitall hearbs have been boyled. [5246]Laurentius speaks of bathes of milk, which I finde approved by many others. And still after bath, the body to be anointed with oyl of bitter Almonds, of violets, new or fresh butter, [5247]Capons grease, especially the back bone, and then lotions of the head, embrocations, &c.	Felix Plater, Observations, book 1, prescribing for a melancholy lawyer, would always combine these baths with washing the head in lye in which herbs for the head have been boiled. Laurentius speaks of milk baths, which I find approved by many others. After every bath the body is to be anointed with oil of bitter almonds, violet oil, fresh butter or capon fat, especially along the backbone; then come head washes, applications of liquid remedies, and so on.[5248]

[5242] Burton. Printed page 238, margin i: “In quibus jejunus diu sedeat eo tempore, ne sudorem excitent aut manifestum teporem, sed quadam refrigeratione humectent.” “Let him sit in them for a long time on an empty stomach at that time, so that they do not provoke sweating or perceptible warmth, but moisten by a certain cooling.”

[5243] Burton. Printed page 238, margin k: “Aqua non sit calida, sed tepida, ne sudor sequatur.” “Let the water be not hot but lukewarm, so that sweating does not follow.”

[5244] Editor. Frictions are rubbings. The margin’s cooling emphasis and the body’s moderate warmth are both retained; they have not been harmonized into a single treatment rule.

[5245] Burton. Printed page 238, margin l: “Lotiones capitis ex lixivio, in quo herbas capitales coxerint.” “Washings of the head with lye in which herbs for the head have been boiled.”

[5246] Burton. Printed page 238, margin m: “Cap.8. de mel.” Chapter 8, on melancholy.

[5247] Burton. Printed page 238, margin n: “Aut axungia pulli, Piso.” “Or chicken fat.” Piso.

[5248] Editor. Lee is lye, an alkaline washing liquid; capital herbs are herbs thought to benefit the head. Embrocations are applications of liquid remedies. These are historical bathing preparations.

These kinde of baths have been in former times much frequented, and diversly varied, and are still in generall use in those Eastern countries. The Romanes had their publick baths very sumptuous and stupend, as those of Antoninus and Dioclesian. Plin.36. saith there were an infinite number of them in Rome and mightily frequented; some bathed seven times a day, as Commodus the Emperour is reported to have done: usually twice a day, and they were after anointed with most costly oyntments:	Baths of this kind were much frequented in former times, in many different forms, and are still generally used in those eastern countries. The Romans had very sumptuous and stupendous public baths, such as those of Antoninus and Diocletian. Pliny, book 36, says that Rome had an immense number of them and that they were heavily frequented. Some people bathed seven times a day, as the emperor Commodus is reported to have done; usually they bathed twice a day, and afterwards were anointed with very costly ointments.[5249] rich women bathed themselves in milke, some in the milke of 500. she asses at once: we have many ruines of such bathes found in this Iland, amongst those parietines and rubbish of old Romane townes. Lipsius de mag. Urb. Rom. l.3. c.8. Rosinus, Scot of Antwerp, & other Antiquaries, tell strange stories of their Baths.	Rich women bathed in milk, some in the milk of five hundred she-asses at once. Many ruins of such baths have been found on this island among the ruined walls and rubble of old Roman towns. Lipsius, On the Greatness of the City of Rome, book 3, chapter 8; Rosinus; Schott of Antwerp; and other antiquaries tell remarkable stories of their baths.
Gillius l.4. cap.ult. Topogr. Constant. reckons up 155. publicke [5250]Baths in Constantinople, of faire buildings, they are still [5251]frequented in that Citie by the Turkes of all sorts, men and women, and all over Greece and those hot countries: to absterge belike that fulsomeness of sweat, to which they are there subject.	Gillius, book 4, final chapter of his Topography of Constantinople, counts 155 public baths in Constantinople, handsomely built. Turks of every kind, men and women, still frequent them in that city and throughout Greece and those hot countries, presumably to wash away the offensive sweat to which they are subject there.[5252]

[5249] Editor. Antoninus and Dioclesian refer to the imperial Roman baths associated with those names. Burton combines monumental history with reports of luxurious habits; the bathing frequencies and figures are retained as reports, not independently verified facts.

[5250] Burton. Printed page 238, margin o: “Thermæ. Nympheæ.” “Thermal baths. Nymphaea.” Nymphaea are fountain structures; Burton places both terms beside baths.

[5251] Burton. Printed page 238, margin p: “Sandes lib.1. saith, that women go twice a week to the baths at least.” Sandys, book 1, says that women go to the baths at least twice a week.

[5252] Editor. Absterge means wash away; fulsomeness means offensiveness or foulness. The figure 155 and the marginal pairing of baths and nymphaea require further comparison with Gillius.

[5253]Busbequius in his epistles, is very copious in describing the manner of them, how their women go covered, a maid following with a box of oyntment to rub them. The richer sort have private baths in their houses, the poorer goe to the common, and are generally so curious in this behalf, that they will not eate nor drink untill they have bathed, before and after meals some, [5254]and will not make water (but they will wash their hands) or go to stool.	Busbecq, in his letters, describes their customs at great length: how the women go covered, followed by a maid carrying a box of ointment to rub them with. The richer people have private baths in their houses; the poorer go to the public ones. They are generally so particular about this that they will neither eat nor drink until they have bathed—some before and after meals—and will not urinate or empty their bowels without washing their hands.[5255]
Leo Afer l.3. makes mention of 100. severall baths at Fez in Africke, most sumptuous, and such as have great revenues belonging to them. Buxtorf. cap.14. Synagog. Jud. speakes of many ceremonies amongst the Jews in this kind; they are very superstitious in their bathes, especially women.	Leo Africanus, book 3, mentions a hundred separate baths at Fez in Africa, very sumptuous and endowed with large revenues. Buxtorf, chapter 14 of The Jewish Synagogue, speaks of many Jewish ceremonies of this kind. They are very superstitious in their bathing, especially the women.[5256]

[5253] Burton. Printed page 238, margin q: “Epist.3.” Letter 3.

[5254] Burton. Printed page 238, margin r: “Nec alvum excernunt, quin aquam secum portent quâ partes obscænas lavent. Busbequius ep.3. Leg. Turciæ.” “Nor do they empty their bowels without carrying water with which to wash their private parts.” Busbecq, letter 3 of the Turkish embassy.

[5255] Editor. Curious means scrupulous or particular. The body mentions washing hands, whereas Busbecq’s marginal Latin specifies washing the private parts after defecation. This difference is preserved.

[5256] Editor. Superstitious is Burton’s judgement, drawing on a Christian account of Jewish observance, not a neutral description of Jewish bathing practices. His claim about women and the bath totals for Fez have not been independently verified.

Naturall Bathes are praised by some, discommended by others; but it is in a divers respect.[5257] Marcus de Oddis in Hipp. affect. consulted about [5258]Baths, condemns them for the heat of the liver, because they dry too fast; and yet by and by in another counsell for the same disease, he approves them because they cleanse by reason of the sulphur, and would have their water to be drunk.	Natural baths are praised by some and condemned by others, but on different grounds. Marcus de Oddis, in his work on Hippocratic affections, consulted about baths, condemns them because of the liver's heat, since they dry the body too quickly. Yet shortly afterwards, in another consultation for the same disease, he approves of them because the sulphur makes them cleansing, and recommends drinking their water.[5259]
Source page 238–239 Areteus, c.7. commends Allome Baths above the rest; and [5260]Mercurialis consil.88. those of Luca in that Hypocondriacall passion. He would have his patient tarry there 15. dayes together, and drink the water of them, and to be bucketed, or have the water powred on his head. John Baptista Silvaticus cont.64. commends all the Baths in Italy, and drinking of their water, whether they be Iron, Allome, Sulphur; so doth [5261]Hercules de Saxonia. But in that they cause sweat, and dry so much, he confines himself to Hypocondriacall melancholy alone, excepting that of the head, and the other.	Aretaeus, chapter 7, recommends alum baths above the rest; Mercurialis, consultation 88, recommends those of Lucca for hypochondriacal illness. He would have his patient stay there for fifteen days, drink the water and be bucketed—that is, have the water poured over his head. Giovanni Battista Silvatico, controversy 64, recommends all the baths in Italy and the drinking of their water, whether they contain iron, alum or sulphur; so does Hercules de Saxonia. But because they cause sweating and dry the body so much, he confines their use to hypochondriacal melancholy, excluding melancholy of the head and the other kind.[5262]

[5257] Burton. Printed page 238, margin s: “Hildesheim spicel.2. de mel. Hypocon. si non adesset jecoris caliditas, Thermas laudarem, & si non nimia humoris exsiccatio esset metuenda.” Hildesheim, Gleaning 2, on hypochondriacal melancholy: “I would recommend thermal baths if there were no heat of the liver, and if excessive drying of moisture were not to be feared.” The marginal note is placed with the opening judgement on natural baths; no clear s callout is visible in the body.

[5259] Editor. The praise and criticism turn on competing humoral effects: cleansing, heating and drying. The Hildesheim note is distinct from the following folio reference to Marcus de Oddis.

[5260] Burton. Printed page 239, margin u: “Thermas Lucenses adeat, ibique aquas ejus per 15. dies potet, & calidarum aquarum stillicidiis tum caput tum ventriculum de more subjiciat.” “Let him visit the baths of Lucca, drink their waters for fifteen days, and, in the customary manner, expose both his head and his stomach to streams of hot water.”

[5261] Burton. Printed page 239, margin x: “In panth.” In Pantheum; abbreviated title.

[5262] Editor. The other kind is melancholy distributed through the whole body, as distinguished from that located in the head or upper abdomen. The Lucca margin includes water applied to the stomach as well as the head; the body mentions only the head.

Source page 239 Trincavelius consil.14. lib.1. prefers those [5263]Porrectan baths before the rest, because of the mixture of brasse, iron, allome, and consil.35. l.3. for a melancholy Lawyer, and consil.36. in that hypocondrical passion, the [5264]Baths of Aquaria, and 36. consil. the drinking of them.	Trincavelius, consultation 14, book 1, prefers the baths of Porretta to the others because of their mixture of brass, iron and alum. In consultation 35, book 3, for a melancholy lawyer, and consultation 36, for hypochondriacal illness, he prefers the baths of Aquaria; and in consultation 36, the drinking of their water.[5265]
Frisimelica consulted among the rest in Trincavelius. consil.42. lib.2. preferres the waters of [5266]Apona before all artificiall baths whatsoever in this disease, and would have one nine years affected with Hypocondriall passions, flie to them, as to an [5267]holy anchor. Of the same minde is Trincavelius himself there, and yet both put a hot liver in the same party for a cause, and send him to the water of S. Helen, which are much hotter.	Frisimelica, consulted along with others in Trincavelius, consultation 42, book 2, prefers the waters of Abano to all artificially prepared baths whatever for this disease. He would have someone afflicted for nine years with hypochondriacal complaints flee to them as to a sacred anchor. Trincavelius himself agrees in that passage; yet both identify a hot liver as a cause in this same patient, and send him to the waters of Saint Helen, which are much hotter.[5268]

[5265] Editor. Porrectan refers to Porretta. Brasse is retained as brass; its precise mineralogical sense and the identity of Aquaria remain unresolved. The repeated consultation 36 is in the source.

[5266] Burton. Printed page 239, margin a: “Ad aquas Aponenses velut ad sacram anchoram confugiat.” “Let him take refuge in the waters of Abano as at a sacred anchor.”

[5267] Burton. Printed page 239, margin b: “Ioh. Baubinus li.3. ca.14. hist. admir. Fontis Bollensis in ducatu Wittemberg laudat aquas Bollenses ad melancholicos morbos, mærorem, fascinationem, aliaque animi pathemata.” Johann Baubinus, book 3, chapter 14 of the history of the remarkable spring of Boll in the duchy of Württemberg, praises its waters for melancholy illnesses, sorrow, bewitchment and other afflictions of the mind. Baubinus is the printed spelling.

[5268] Editor. Apona is Abano. The sacred anchor is an image of final refuge. The adjacent note adds another spring, Boll; Baubinus appears to stand for Johann Bauhin. Burton points out a tension between the physicians’ diagnosis and their chosen hotter waters.

Montanus consil.230. magnifies the [5269]Chalderinian Baths, and consil.237. &239. he exhorteth to the same, but with this caution, [5270]that the liver be outwardly anointed with some coolers that it be not overheated. But these baths must be warily frequented by melancholy persons, or if used, to such as are very cold of themselves, for as Gabelius concludes of all Dutch Baths, and especially of those of Baden, they are good for all cold diseases, [5271]naught for cholerick, hot and dry, and all infirmities proceeding of choler, inflammations of the spleen and liver.	Montanus, consultation 230, praises the baths of Caldiero, and in consultations 237 and 239 urges their use, with this caution: the region of the liver should be rubbed externally with cooling preparations so that it does not become overheated. But melancholy people must visit these baths cautiously; or, if the baths are used, they should be reserved for those who are themselves very cold. For, as Gabelius concludes concerning all German baths, especially those at Baden, they are good for all cold diseases, but bad for bilious, hot and dry conditions, and for all illnesses arising from choler, including inflammation of the spleen and liver.[5272]
Our English Baths as they are hot must needs incur the same censure: But D. Turner of old and D. Iones have written at large of them. Of cold Baths I finde little or no mention in any Physician, some speak against them: [5273]Cardan alone out of Agathinus commends bathing in fresh rivers, and cold waters, and adviseth all such as mean to live long to use it, for it agrees with all ages and complexions, and is most profitable for hot temperatures.	Our English baths, being hot, must come under the same criticism; but Dr Turner in earlier times, and Dr Jones, have written extensively about them. I find little or no mention of cold baths in any physician, and some speak against them. Cardan alone, drawing on Agathinus, recommends bathing in fresh rivers and cold waters, and advises everyone who intends to live long to do so, because it suits all ages and constitutions and is especially beneficial for hot temperaments.[5274]

[5272] Editor. Chalderinian refers to Caldiero. Dutch here means German. Cold, hot, dry and choleric describe humoral qualities. The exact Gabelius reference and which Baden is intended remain unresolved.

[5273] Burton. Printed page 239, asterisk: “Lib. de aqua. Qui breve hoc vitæ curriculum cupiunt sani transigere, frigidis aquis sæpe lavare debeant, nulli ætati cum sit incongrua, calidis imprimis utilis.” On Water: “Those who wish to pass this brief course of life in health should bathe often in cold water, since it is unsuitable for no age and especially useful for those of hot constitution.”

[5274] Editor. The advice about cold water is retained as a historical claim; the asserted suitability for every age and constitution is not a modern clinical conclusion. The Turner, Jones and Agathinus references require further collation.

As for sweating, urine, bloud-letting by hæmrods, or otherwise, I shall elsewhere more opportunely speak of them.	As for sweating, urination, bleeding through haemorrhoids or otherwise, I shall speak of them elsewhere at a more suitable point.[5275]
Immoderate Venus in excess, as it is a cause, or in defect; so moderately used to some parties an only help, a present remedy. Peter Forestus calls it, aptissimum remedium, a most apposite remedy, [5276]remitting anger, and reason, that was otherwise bound.	Just as sexual activity in excess, or its absence, can be a cause, so, when practised moderately, it can be the one thing that helps some people, an immediate remedy. Pieter van Foreest calls it "a most suitable remedy"—a most apposite remedy —relieving anger and freeing reason that was otherwise held captive.[5277]
Avicenna Fen.3.20. Oribasius med. collect. lib.6. cap.37. contend out of Ruffus and others, [5278]that many mad-men, melancholy and labouring of the falling sickness, have been cured by this alone. Montaltus cap.27. de melan. will have it drive away sorrow, and all illusions of the brain, to purge the heart and brain from ill smoakes and vapours that offend them, [5279]and if it be omitted, as Valescus supposeth, it makes the minde sad, the body dull and heavy.	Avicenna, fen 3, 20, and Oribasius, Medical Collections, book 6, chapter 37, maintain on the authority of Rufus and others that many people who were mad, melancholy or suffering from epilepsy have been cured by this alone. Montalto, chapter 27, On Melancholy, says that it drives away sorrow and all delusions of the brain, and clears the heart and brain of harmful fumes and vapours that trouble them. If it is omitted, as Valescus supposes, it makes the mind sad and the body sluggish and heavy.[5280]

[5275] Editor. Hæmrods are haemorrhoids; Burton treats bleeding from them within the historical category of evacuation. This block stops at the end of the bathing discussion; the member continues with sexual activity.

[5276] Burton. Printed page 239, margin f: "Solvit Venus rationis vim impeditam, ingentes iras remittit, &c." "Sexual activity frees the obstructed power of reason and alleviates great anger," and so on.

[5277] Editor. Venus is a metonym for sexual activity. Present means immediate; only help means the sole effective help in particular cases. The awkward body phrase "remitting anger, and reason" is interpreted by the margin, which says that reason is released and anger relieved. Burton's preceding chapter treated retention and evacuation within humoral regimen.

[5278] Burton. Printed page 239, bottom margin g: "Multi comitiales, melancholici, insani, hujus usu solo sanati." "Many epileptic, melancholy and mad people have been cured by this practice alone."

[5279] Burton. Printed page 239, bottom margin h: "Si omittatur coitus, contristat & plurimum gravat corpus & animum." "If intercourse is omitted, it saddens and greatly burdens body and mind."

[5280] Editor. Falling sickness means epilepsy. Seed, vapours and the clearing of the heart and brain belong to the historical physiology being reported here. These claims are retained as the opinions of Burton and his cited authorities, not converted into present-day medical advice. The abbreviated Avicenna reference has not been securely resolved.

Many other inconveniences are reckoned up by Mercatus, and by Rodericus à Castro, in their tracts de melancholia virginum & monialium; ob seminis retentionem sæviunt sæpè moniales & virgines, but as Platerus addes, si nubant sanantur, they rave single, and pine away, much discontent, but marriage mends all.	Many other troubles are listed by Mercatus and Rodrigo de Castro in their treatments of melancholy in unmarried women and nuns: "because of the retention of seed, nuns and unmarried women often become frenzied"; but, as Plater adds, "if they marry, they are cured." They rave while single and waste away in great discontent, but marriage puts everything right.[5281]
Source page 239–240 Marcellus Donatus lib.2. med. hist. cap.1. tells a storie to confirm this out of Alexander Benedictus, of a maid that was mad, ob menses inhibitos, cum in officinam meritoriam incidisset, à quindecem viris eadem nocte compressa, mensium largo profluvio, quod pluribus annis ante constiterat, non sine magno pudore mane menti restituta discessit.	Marcellus Donatus, book 2 of his Medical History, chapter 1, tells a story from Alessandro Benedetti to confirm this: a young woman who was mad "because her menstrual flow had stopped, having found her way into a brothel, was had by fifteen men in the same night; after a copious menstrual discharge, which had been held back for several years, she left in the morning restored to her senses, though deeply ashamed."[5282]
Source page 240 But this must be warily understood, for as Arnoldus objects, lib.1. breviar.18. cap. Quid coitus ad melancholicum succum? What affinity have these two? [5283]except it be manifest that superabundance of seed, or fulness of blood be a cause, or that love, or an extraordinary desire of Venus have gone before, or that as Lod. Mercatus excepts, they be very flatuous, and have been otherwise accustomed unto it.	But this must be understood cautiously; for, as Arnoldus objects in book 1 of the Breviary, chapter 18, "What has intercourse to do with the melancholic humour?" What connection have these two? Unless it is clear that an excess of seed or fullness of blood is a cause, or that love or an extraordinary sexual desire preceded the illness; or unless, as Luis Mercado allows, they suffer greatly from wind and have otherwise been accustomed to intercourse.[5284]

[5281] Editor. The argument assumes that retained reproductive seed can make women ill and that marriage supplies a cure. The two Latin statements and Burton's following English gloss remain distinct. This gendered explanation belongs to the medical and social assumptions of the passage.

[5282] Editor. Compressa here means subjected to intercourse; the report does not establish the woman's consent. Burton presents the story as medical evidence and transmits its language of shame. Neither the alleged cure nor the chain from Donatus to Benedetti has been independently verified.

[5283] Burton. Printed page 240, margin i: "Nisi certo constet nimium semen aut sanguinem causam esse, aut amor præcesserit, aut, &c." "Unless it is definitely established that excess seed or blood is the cause, or love has preceded it, or," and so on.

[5284] Editor. Succus means a bodily juice or humour, not a modern biochemical substance. Flatuous means troubled by wind. Burton himself now qualifies the general claims of benefit; the conditional structure is preserved.

Montaltus cap.27. will not allow of moderate Venus to such as have the Gout, Palsie, Epilepsie, Melancholy, except they be very lusty, and full of bloud. [5285]Lodovicus Antonius lib. med. miscel. in his chapter of Venus, forbids it utterly to all Wrestlers, Ditchers, labouring men, &c.	Montalto, chapter 27, will not allow even moderate sexual activity to those with gout, paralysis, epilepsy or melancholy, unless they are very vigorous and full of blood. Lodovicus Antonius, in his book of medical miscellanies, in the chapter on sexual activity, forbids it altogether to wrestlers, ditch-diggers, manual labourers and the like.[5286]
[5287]Ficinus and [5288]Marsilius Cognatus put Venus one of the five mortall enemies of a student: It consumes the spirits, and weakeneth the brain. Halyabbas the Arabian.5. Theor. cap.36. and Iason Pratensis make it the fountain of most diseases, [5289]but most pernicious to them who are cold and dry; a melancholy man must not meddle with it, but in some cases.	Ficino and Marsilius Cognatus count sexual activity among the five deadly enemies of a student: it consumes the spirits and weakens the brain. Haly Abbas the Arabian, Theory, 5, chapter 36, and Jason Pratensis make it the source of most diseases, but especially harmful to people who are cold and dry. A melancholy person must not engage in it except in certain cases.[5290]

[5285] Burton. Printed page 240, margin k: “Athletis, Arthriticis, podagricis nocet, nec opportuna prodest, nisi fortibus & qui multo sanguine abundant. Idem Scaliger exerc.269. Turcis ideo luctatoribus prohibitum.” “It harms athletes, people with arthritis and sufferers from gout; nor does it help even when timely, except the strong and those who abound in blood. Scaliger says the same, exercise 269. For this reason it is forbidden to Turkish wrestlers.”

[5286] Editor. Lusty means vigorous or robust here. The marginal note is broader than the body text, including arthritic and gouty patients as well as athletes. Burton names Lodovicus Antonius without enough information here to establish the author’s identity securely.

[5288] Burton. Printed page 240, margin m: “Lib.1. ca.7. exhaurit enim spiritus animumque debilitat.” Book 1, chapter 7: “For it drains the spirits and weakens the mind.”

[5289] Burton. Printed page 240, margin n: “Frigidis & siccis corporibus inimicissima.” “Most hostile to cold and dry bodies.”

[5290] Editor. Spirits are the subtle agents of bodily and mental activity in historical physiology. Marsilius Cognatus is separate from Marsilio Ficino. Cold and dry are the traditional qualities of melancholy; the categories explain the medical reasoning without validating it.

Plutarch in his book de san. tuend. accounts of it as one of the three principall signs and preservers of health, temperance in this kinde; [5291]To rise with an appetite, to be ready to work, and abstain from venery, tria saluberrima, are three most healthfull things.	Plutarch, in his book On Preserving Health, counts moderation in this respect among the three chief signs and safeguards of health: to leave the table with an appetite, to be ready for work, and to abstain from sex are "three most healthful things"—three things most conducive to health.[5292]
We see their opposites how pernicious they are to mankinde, as to all other creatures they bring death, and many ferall diseases: Immodicis brevis est ætas & rara senectus. Aristotle gives instance in Sparrows, which are parùm vivaces ob salacitatem, [5293]short lived because of their salacity, which is very frequent, as Scopius in Priapiis will better inform you.	We see how harmful their opposites are to humankind: as with all other creatures, they bring death and many deadly diseases. "The immoderate have a short life and seldom reach old age." Aristotle gives sparrows as an example: they are "short-lived because of their lust"—short-lived because of their very frequent sexual activity, as Scopius in his work on the Priapeia will explain more fully.[5294]

[5291] Burton. Printed page 240, margin o: "Vesci intra satietatem, impigrum esse ad laborem, vitale semen conservare." "To eat short of fullness, to be diligent in work, to preserve the vital seed."

[5292] Editor. Compare Plutarch, Advice about Keeping Well 16, Moralia 129F–130A. The Greek maxim concerns eating short of satiety, labour short of exhaustion and preservation of seed. Burton's "ready to work" and the marginal "diligent in work" shift the emphasis of its middle clause; neither is silently corrected.

[5293] Burton. Printed page 240, margin p: "Nequitia est quæ te non sinit esse senem." "It is your wantonness that does not let you grow old."

[5294] Editor. Ferall means deadly; salacity means sexual appetite. The maxim is Martial 6.29.7, from an elegy for Glaucias, Melior's young freedman, praising his beauty and character; Burton turns it into a warning against excess. Aristotle, On Longevity and Shortness of Life 5, connects sexual expenditure with shorter life and contrasts male and female sparrows. This is historical physiology. Scopius is conventionally identified as Caspar Schoppe; his Priapeia commentary remains uncollated.

The extremes being both bad, [5295]the medium is to be kept, which cannot easily be determined. Some are better able to sustain, such as are hot and moist, phlegmatick, as Hippocrates insinuateth, some strong and lustie, well fed like [5296]Hercules, [5297]Proculus the Emperour, lusty Laurence, [5298]prostibulum fæminæ Messalina the Empress, that by Philters, and such kinde of lascivious meats, use all means to [5299]inable themselves:	Since both extremes are bad, the middle course should be kept, though it cannot easily be determined. Some can sustain more: people who are hot and moist, phlegmatic, as Hippocrates suggests; some who are strong, vigorous and well fed, like Hercules, the emperor Proculus, lusty Laurence, or the empress Messalina, "a brothel of a woman," who use every means to increase their capacity, with love potions and stimulating foods of that kind.[5300]

[5295] Burton. Printed page 240, first asterisk, continuing below the body: "Vide Montanum, Pet. Godefridum, Amorum lib.2. cap.6. curiosum de his, nam & numerum definit è Talmudistis, unicuique, sciatis assignari suum tempus, &c." "See Montanus; Peter Godefridus, On Loves, book 2, chapter 6, inquisitive on these matters, for he even fixes the number from the Talmudists; know that each is assigned his own time," and so on. The compressed, irregular syntax is retained; the cited discussion has not been collated.

[5296] Burton. Printed page 240, bottom margin q: "Thespiadas genuit." "He begot the Thespiads." This refers to Hercules and the offspring of the daughters of Thespius.

[5297] Burton. Printed page 240, bottom margin r: "Vide Lampridium vit. ejus 4." "See Lampridius, his Life, 4." Burton's attribution and locator are retained; the Life of Proculus is included under Vopiscus in the Historia Augusta. Compare Firmus, Saturninus, Proculus and Bonosus 12.6–8 for his sexual boast; Burton's locator 4 is not silently replaced.

[5298] Burton. Printed page 240, bottom margin s: "Et lassata viris, &c." "And wearied by men," and so on. Juvenal, Satire 6.130.

[5299] Burton. Printed page 240, bottom margin t: "Vid. Mizald. cent.8.11. Lemnium lib.2. cap.16. Catullum ad Ipsithilam, &c. Ovid. Eleg. lib.3. &6. &c. quot itinera una nocte confecissent, tot coronas ludicro deo puta Triphallo, Marsiæ, Hermæ, Priapo donarent, Cingemus tibi mentulam coronis, &c." "See Mizaldus, century 8, 11; Lemnius, book 2, chapter 16; Catullus to Ipsithila, and so on; Ovid, Elegies, book 3 and 6, and so forth. As many journeys as they completed in one night, so many garlands they would give to the sportive god—Triphallus, Marsyas, Hermes or Priapus. We shall encircle your penis with garlands," and so on. "Journeys" is a sexual metaphor. The compressed Ovid locator is retained as printed; its exact reference remains unresolved.

[5300] Editor. Phlegmatic conventionally means cold and moist, although Burton places it after "hot and moist." Lusty Laurence is a proverbial sexual figure. Messalina invokes Juvenal 6.130; the Catullus reference points to poem 32, addressed to Ipsitilla. The garland verse is Priapea 50.7: its speaker promises to crown Priapus's penis if a woman grants his desire. That poem does not itself establish Burton's preceding claim of one garland for each sexual "journey." The remaining erotic authorities and possible intermediary remain uncollated.

and brag of it in the end, confodi multas enim, occidi vero paucas per ventrem vidisti, as that Spanish [5301]Celestina merrily said: others impotent, of a cold and dry constitution cannot sustain those gymnicks without great hurt done to their own bodies, of which number (though they be very prone to it) are melancholy men for the most part.	And in the end they boast of it: "For you have seen many women pierced through the belly, but few killed," as that Spanish Celestina jokingly said. Others, lacking the strength and having a cold and dry constitution, cannot endure those exercises without doing their bodies great harm. Melancholy people belong for the most part to this latter group, though they may be very strongly inclined to it.[5302]

[5302] Editor. The belly joke uses penetration as a sexual double meaning. Celestina is the procuress in the work associated with Fernando de Rojas; Burton cites Caspar Barth's Latin version in his margin. The translation follows the Latin printed here, without supplying a dramatic scene or speaker beyond Burton's attribution. Gymnicks means bodily exercises, here sexual exertions.

MEMB. 3. Ayr rectified. With a digression of the Ayr.	MEMBER 3. Air corrected. With a digression on air.
Source page 240–241 As a long-winged Hawk when he is first whistled off the fist, mounts aloft, and for his pleasure fetcheth many a circuit in the Ayr, still soaring higher and higher, till he be come to his full pitch, and in the end when the game is sprung, comes down amain, and stoopes upon a sudden: so will I, having now come at last into these ample fields of Ayre, wherein I may freely expatiate and exercise my self for my recreation, a while rove, wander round about the world, mount aloft to those æthereall orbs and celestiall spheres, and so descend to my former elements again.	As a long-winged hawk, first whistled off the fist, mounts aloft and for its pleasure makes many circuits in the air, soaring higher and higher until it reaches its full height, and then, when the game is flushed, comes down at speed and suddenly dives: so will I. Having at last reached these spacious fields of air, where I may range freely and exercise myself for recreation, I will roam for a while, wander around the world, rise to those ethereal orbs and celestial spheres, and then descend to my former elements again.[5303]
Source page 241 In which progress, I will first see whether that relation of the Frier of [5304]Oxford be true, concerning those Northern parts under the Pole (if I meet obitèr with the wandring Iew, Elias Artifex, or Lucians Icaromenippus, they shall be my guides) whether there be such 4. Euripes, and a great rock of Loadstones, which may cause the needle in the Compass still to bend that way,	On this journey I will first see whether the Oxford friar's account of those northern regions beneath the Pole is true. If I happen to meet the Wandering Jew, Elias the Adept or Lucian's Icaromenippus along the way, they shall be my guides. I will see whether there really are four such tidal channels and a great rock of lodestone that might make the compass needle continually turn in that direction;[5305]

[5303] Editor. Pitch is the height from which a trained hawk waits to attack; stoop is its downward strike. Burton makes the digression a recreation for himself, comparing its free movement and eventual return to the hawk's flight. "Former elements" recalls both the medical subject and the elemental language of air.

[5305] Editor. Euripes are narrow channels with strong tidal currents, named after the Euripus. The proposed guides combine legendary wandering, alchemical expectation and satire. Elias Artifex is rendered Elias the Adept. Lucian's Icaromenippus recounts a fantastic ascent through the heavens; its presence signals the playful character of this projected journey.

and what should be the true cause of the variation of the compass, [5306]is it a magneticall rock, or the Pole-star, as Cardan will; or some other star in the bear, as Marsilius Ficinus; or a magneticall meridian, as Maurolicus; Vel situs in venâ terræ, as Agricola; or the nearness of the next Continent, as Cabeus will; or some other cause, as Scaliger, Cortesius, Conimbricenses, Peregrinus, contend;	and what the true cause of the compass's variation may be. Is it a magnetic rock, or the Pole Star, as Cardan thinks; some other star in the Bear, as Marsilio Ficino proposes; a magnetic meridian, as Maurolycus says; "or its position in a vein of the earth," as Agricola suggests; the nearness of the adjoining continent, as Cabeus thinks; or some other cause, as Scaliger, Cortesius, the Coimbra commentators and Peregrinus argue?[5307]
why at the Azores it looks directly North, otherwise not? In the Mediterranean or Levant (as some observe) it varies 7. grad. by and by 12. and then 22. In the Baltick Seas, near Raseburg in Finland, the needle runs round, if any ships come that way, though [5308]Martin Ridley write otherwise, that the needle near the Pole will hardly be forced from his direction.	Why does it point directly north at the Azores, but not elsewhere? In the Mediterranean, or Levant, some observers find that it varies by seven degrees, then twelve, then twenty-two. In the Baltic Sea near Raseburg in Finland, the needle spins round if ships come that way, although Martin Ridley writes otherwise: that near the Pole the needle can hardly be forced away from its direction.[5309]

[5306] Burton. Printed page 241, margin x: "Mons Sloto. Some call it the highest hill in the world, next Teneriffe in the Canaries Lat.81." Mount Sloto. Some call it the highest mountain in the world, next to Tenerife in the Canaries. Latitude 81. The printed note gives no hemisphere; the latitude belongs to the polar mountain, not Tenerife.

[5307] Editor. Variation means the angular difference between the compass direction and geographical north. The theories are alternatives Burton is gathering, not a single explanation he endorses. The Latin about a vein of the earth is compressed; its wording is retained rather than expanded into a reconstructed magnetic theory. Conimbricenses means the Coimbra commentators.

[5308] Burton. Printed page 241, margin a: "Cap.26. in his Treatise of magneticke bodies." Chapter 26 of his Treatise of Magnetic Bodies.

[5309] Editor. The source prints Martin Ridley; the Treatise of Magnetic Bodies is by Mark Ridley. The original form remains in both columns here, with the correction supplied in this note. Raseburg is retained rather than assigning an exact modern site without collation.

'Tis fit to be enquired whether certain rules may be made of it, as 11. grad. Lond. variat. alibi 36. &c. and that which is more prodigious, the variation varies in the same place, now taken accurately, 'tis so much after a few years quite altered from that it was: till we have better intelligence, let our D. Gilbert, and Nicholas [5310]Cabeus the Iesuite, that have both written great volumes of this subject, satisfie these Inquisitors.	It deserves investigation whether definite rules can be established for it—for example, "the variation at London is eleven degrees, elsewhere thirty-six," and so forth. More extraordinary still, the variation itself changes in the same place: accurately measured now, it will be quite different a few years later. Until we have better information, let our Dr Gilbert and the Jesuit Niccolò Cabeo, who have both written substantial volumes on the subject, satisfy these investigators.[5311]
Whether the sea be open and navigable by the Pole artick, and which is the likeliest way, that of Bartison the Hollander, under the Pole it self, which for some reasons I hold best; or by fretum Davys, or Nova Zembla.	Whether the sea is open and navigable near the Arctic Pole, and which route is most promising: that of Bartison the Dutchman, directly beneath the Pole itself, which for certain reasons I think best; or by Davis Strait, or Novaya Zemlya.[5312]

[5310] Burton. Printed page 241, margin b: "Lege lib.1. cap.23. &24. de magnetica philosophia, & lib.3. cap.4." "Read book 1, chapters 23 and 24, of Magnetic Philosophy, and book 3, chapter 4."

[5311] Editor. Burton distinguishes differences between places from changes over time at one place. The figures eleven and thirty-six are retained as historical reports, not current magnetic measurements. D. abbreviates Doctor.

[5312] Editor. The identity of "Bartison" and the exact proposed polar route remain unresolved. Davis Strait and Novaya Zemlya are geographical routes offered as alternatives. Burton's preference for a passage beneath the Pole is preserved as his own judgement.

Whether [5313]Hudsons discovery be true of a new found Ocean, any likelihood of Buttons bay in 50. degrees, Hubberds hope in 60. that of ut ultra near Sir Thomas Roes welcome in North-west Fox, being that the sea ebbs and flows constantly there 15. foot in 12. hours, as our [5314]new Cards inform us that California is not a Cape, but an Iland, and the West-windes make the Nepe tides equall to the Spring, or that there be any probability to pass by the straights of Anian to China, by the Promontory of Tabin.	Whether Hudson's report of a newly discovered ocean is true; whether there is any prospect of a passage by Button's Bay at fifty degrees, Hubberd's Hope at sixty, or the place marked “still farther” near Sir Thomas Roe's Welcome in North-west Fox, since the sea there regularly rises and falls fifteen feet in twelve hours. Our new charts tell us that California is an island, not a cape, and that west winds make the neap tides equal to the spring tides. Or whether there is any chance of passing through the Strait of Anian to China, by the promontory of Tabin.[5315]
If there be, I shall soon perceive whether [5316]Marcus Polus the Venetians narration be true or false, of that great City of Quinsay and Cambalu; whether there be any such places, or that as [5317]Matth. Riccius the Iesuite hath written, China and Cataia be all one, the great Cham of Tartary and the King of China be the same: Xuntain and Quinsay, and the City of Cambalu be that new Paquin, or such a wall 400. leagues long to part China from Tartary:	If there is, I shall soon find out whether Marco Polo the Venetian's account of the great city of Quinsay and of Cambalu is true or false; whether such places exist, or whether, as the Jesuit Matteo Ricci has written, China and Cathay are one and the same, and the Great Khan of Tartary and the king of China are the same ruler; whether Xuntain and Quinsay, and the city of Cambalu, are that new Peking; or whether there is such a wall, four hundred leagues long, separating China from Tartary.[5318]

[5313] Burton. Printed page 241, margin c: “1612.” 1612. The marginal date is retained without silently replacing it.

[5315] Editor. Cards means maps or charts. North-west Fox is Luke Foxe’s account; the place-label ut ultra means “still farther.” Briggs’s North Part of America, reproduced from Purchas’s 1625 publication in the David Rumsey collection, shows California as an island. Burton transmits that cartographic error. His figure of fifteen feet and marginal date 1612 are retained; the several voyages and tidal observations still require separate collation.

[5316] Burton. Printed page 241, margin e: “Lib.2. ca.64. de nob. civitat. Quinsay, & cap.10. de Cambalu.” Book 2, chapter 64, on the noble city of Quinsay, and chapter 10, on Cambalu.

[5317] Burton. Printed page 241, margin f: “Lib.4. exped. ad Sinas, ca.3. & lib.5. c.18.” Expedition to China, book 4, chapter 3, and book 5, chapter 18.

[5318] Editor. This sentence runs together several historical names and proposed equivalences. Cambalu and Paquin refer to the Beijing area, whereas Quinsay is Hangzhou; the entire printed sequence must not be read as a correct identification of all these cities with one another. The awkward coordination after “the same” is retained. Burton’s references to Polo and the Ricci narrative require edition-specific comparison.

whether [5319]Presbyter Iohn be in Asia or Africk; M. Polus Venetus puts him in Asia, [5320]the most received opinion is, that he is Emperour of the Abissines, which of old was Æthiopia, now Nubia, under the Æquator in Africk.	Whether Prester John is in Asia or Africa: Marco Polo the Venetian places him in Asia; the most widely accepted opinion is that he is emperor of the Abyssinians, in what was formerly Ethiopia, now Nubia, beneath the equator in Africa.[5321]
Source page 241–242 Whether [5322]Guinea be an Iland or part of the Continent, or that hungry Spaniards discovery of [5323]Terra Australis Incognita, or Magellanica, be as true as that of Mercurius Britannius, or his of Vtopia, or his of Lucinia. And yet in likelihood it may be so, for without all question it being extended from the Tropick of Capricorn to the circle Antarctick, and lying as it doth in the temperate Zone, cannot chuse but yeeld in time some flourishing kingdomes to succeeding ages, as America did unto the Spaniards.	Whether Guinea is an island or part of the continent; or whether that hungry Spaniard's discovery of the Unknown Southern Land, or Magellanica, is as true as the discovery in Mercurius Britannius, or the one in Utopia, or the one in Lucinia. Yet it may very probably be so: for, extending as it does from the Tropic of Capricorn to the Antarctic Circle and lying in the temperate zone, it must surely reveal flourishing kingdoms to future generations in time, as America did to the Spaniards.[5324]

[5319] Burton. Printed page 241, margin g: “M. Polus in Asia Presb. Joh. meminit lib.2. cap.30.” “Marco Polo mentions Prester John in Asia,” book 2, chapter 30.

[5321] Editor. Prester John is the legendary Christian ruler variously located in Asia and Africa. In Polo’s Travels, Book I, chapter 46 in the Yule–Cordier edition, he is Unc Can, the ruler to whom the Tartars formerly paid tribute. This supports the Asian setting of Polo’s narrative, not its historical truth. Burton’s locator, book 2, chapter 30, remains unreconciled. His sequence Abyssinia, Ethiopia, Nubia and the equator conflates distinct geographical descriptions; Alvares’s account remains uncollated.

[5322] Burton. Printed page 241, margin i: “Lat.10.Gr. Aust.” “Latitude ten degrees south.” This latitude helps identify Burton’s Guinea as New Guinea.

[5323] Burton. Printed page 241, margin k: “Ferdinando de Quir. Anno 1612.” Ferdinando de Quir., in the year 1612. Burton’s form of the name and date are retained.

[5324] Editor. The southern latitude in the margin indicates New Guinea. Terra Australis Incognita is the conjectured Unknown Southern Land, not a securely surveyed continent in this account. Burton’s language alternates scepticism, comparison with imaginary lands and expectation of future discovery. The Quirós reference, the form “Ferdinando,” and the exact identities of Mercurius Britannius and Lucinia remain to be collated; their titles are retained.

Source page 242 Shouten and Le Meir have done well in the discovery of the Streights of Magellan, in finding a more convenient passage to Mare pacificum: me thinks some of our modern Argonautes should prosecute the rest.	Schouten and Le Maire have done well in exploring the region of the Strait of Magellan, finding a more convenient passage to the Pacific Ocean. I think some of our modern Argonauts should pursue the rest.[5325]
As I go by Madagascar, I would see that great Bird [5326]Rucke, that can carry a man and horse or an Elephant, with that Arabian Phœnix described by [5327]Adricomius; see the Pellicanes of Ægypt, those Scythian Gryphes in Asia:	As I pass Madagascar, I would see that great bird, the roc, which can carry a man and horse, or an elephant; and that Arabian phoenix described by Adricomius. I would see Egypt's pelicans and those Scythian griffins in Asia.[5328]
And afterwards in Africk examine the fountains of Nilus, whether Herodotus, [5329]Seneca, Plin. lib.5. cap.9. Strabo. lib.5. give a true cause of his annuall flowing, [5330]Pagaphetta discourse rightly of it, or of Niger and Senega; examine Cardan, [5331]Scaligers reasons, and the rest.	And afterwards, in Africa, I would examine the sources of the Nile: whether Herodotus, Seneca, Pliny in book 5, chapter 9, and Strabo in book 5 give the true cause of its annual flooding; whether Pigafetta gives a correct account of it, or of the Niger and Senegal. I would examine Cardan's explanations, Scaliger's and the rest.[5332]

[5325] Editor. The reference is to Schouten and Le Maire's route around Cape Horn, south of the Strait of Magellan. The modernization makes the geographical relation explicit while preserving Burton's phrasing on the left. Argonauts are voyagers compared with the companions of Jason.

[5326] Burton. Printed page 242, margin l: "Alarum pennæ continent in longitudine 12. passus, elephantem in sublime tollere potest. Polus l.3. c.40." "The wing feathers measure twelve paces in length; it can lift an elephant aloft." Polo, book 3, chapter 40.

[5327] Burton. Printed page 242, margin m: "Lib.2. Descript. terræ sanctæ." Description of the Holy Land, book 2.

[5328] Editor. Roc, phoenix and griffins are marvellous or legendary birds; Burton places them alongside pelicans in his projected inspection. Polo's Madagascar narrative includes the enormous bird and its capacity to carry an elephant. This is a report within that travel tradition, not verification of the creature.

[5329] Burton. Printed page 242, margin o: "Natur. quæst. lib.4. cap.2." Natural Questions, book 4, chapter 2.

[5331] Burton. Printed page 242, margin q: "Exercit.47." Exercise 47.

[5332] Editor. Herodotus, Histories 2.19–27, surveys explanations of the Nile flood. Seneca, Natural Questions IVa.2.17–25, rejects both melting Ethiopian snow and the Etesian-wind explanations he reports. These are competing ancient theories, not a shared conclusion. Burton's Strabo book 5 is retained, although the main account of Egypt is in book 17. Pliny's exact chapter numbering, Pigafetta's Congo narrative and the remaining natural-philosophical authorities still require comparison.

Original text 1651	Modern English
Is it from those Etesian winds, or melting of snow in the Mountains under the Æquator (for Iordan yearly overflows when the snow melts in Mount Libanus) or from those great dropping perpetuall showres, which are so frequent to the inhabitants within the Tropicks, when the Sun is verticall, and cause such vast inundations in Senega, Maragnan, Orenoque, and the rest of those great rivers in Zona Torrida, which have all commonly the same passions at set times: and by good husbandry and policy, hereafter no doubt may come to be as populous, as well tilled, as fruitfull as Ægypt it self, or Cauchinthina?	Does it come from those Etesian winds, or from snow melting in mountains beneath the equator —for the Jordan overflows each year when the snow melts on Mount Lebanon—or from those heavy, continual downpours so common within the tropics when the sun is directly overhead? These cause vast floods in the Senegal, Marañón, Orinoco and the other great rivers of the torrid zone, which generally undergo the same changes at fixed seasons. With good agriculture and government, their regions may undoubtedly become as populous, as well cultivated and as fruitful as Egypt itself, or Cochinchina.[5333]
I would observe all those motions of the sea, and from what cause they proceed, from the Moon (as the Vulgar hold) or earths motion, which Galileus in the fourth dialogue of his Systeme of the world, so eagerly proves, and firmly demonstrates; or winds, as [5334]some will.	I would observe all those movements of the sea and what causes them: the moon, as people commonly believe; or the earth's motion, which Galileo so earnestly proves and firmly demonstrates in the fourth dialogue of his System of the World; or winds, as some maintain.[5335]

[5333] Editor. Etesian winds are seasonal winds. Vertical means overhead; passions means periodic changes or conditions undergone by the rivers. Husbandry and policy mean cultivation and government. The final comparison concerns the regions watered by the rivers, made explicit in the modern text; Cauchinthina is rendered Cochinchina.

[5334] Burton. Printed page 242, margin r: “See M. Carpenters Geography, lib.2. cap.6. & Bern. Telesius lib. de mari.” See Mr Carpenter’s Geography, book 2, chapter 6, and Bernardino Telesio’s book On the Sea.

[5335] Editor. Galileo argues for a relation between the earth’s motion and tides in the fourth day of the Dialogue Concerning the Two Chief World Systems. Burton’s approving “proves” and “demonstrates” are retained as his assessment. The comparison was made with the fourth dialogue in Thomas Salusbury’s 1661 English translation, not with Burton’s own copy or the original Italian edition; Galileo’s tidal explanation is not the modern account.

Why in that quiet Ocean of Zur, in mari pacifico, it is scarce perceived, in our British Seas most violent, in the Mediterranean and Red Sea so vehement, irregular and diverse. Why the current in that Atlantick Ocean should still be in some places from, in some again towards the North, and why they come sooner than go?	Why is this motion scarcely perceptible in that quiet Ocean of Zur, "in the Pacific Sea," most violent in our British seas, and so strong, irregular and varied in the Mediterranean and Red Sea? Why should the current in the Atlantic Ocean continually flow away from the north in some places and towards it in others? And why is the journey one way quicker than the return?[5336]
and so from Malabar to Madagascar in their Indian Ocean, the Merchants come in three weeks, as [5337]Scaliger discusseth, they return scarce in three moneths, with the same or like windes: The continuall current is from East to West.	So, too, in the Indian Ocean, merchants travel from Malabar to Madagascar in three weeks, as Scaliger discusses, but scarcely return in three months, with the same or similar winds. The continual current flows from east to west.
Whether Mount Athos, Pelion, Olympus, Ossa, Caucasus, Atlas, be so high as Pliny, Solinus, Mela relate, above Clouds, Meteors, Ubi nec auræ nec venti spirant, (in so much that they that ascend dy suddenly very often, the aire is so subtile) 1250. paces high, according to that measure of Dicæarchus, or 78. miles perpendicularly high, as Iacobus Mazzonius, sec.3. &4. expounding that place of Aristotle about Mount Caucasus;	Whether Mount Athos, Pelion, Olympus, Ossa, Caucasus and Atlas are as high as Pliny, Solinus and Mela report, above clouds and atmospheric phenomena, "where neither breezes nor winds blow"—so high that climbers very often die suddenly because the air is so thin. Are they 1,250 paces high, according to Dicaearchus's measurement; or seventy-eight miles vertically, as Jacopo Mazzoni says in sections 3 and 4, explaining Aristotle's passage about Mount Caucasus;[5338]

[5336] Editor. Zur represents Sur, Spanish for south: the South Sea, or Pacific. Burton's generalizations about tides and currents are preserved as questions and reports, even where his descriptions conflict with one another or with modern observations. "Come sooner than go" concerns unequal journey times.

[5337] Burton. Printed page 242, margin s: "Exercit.52. de maris motu causæ investigandæ: prima reciprocationis, secunda varietatis, tertia celeritatis quarta cessationis, quinta privationis, sexta contrarietatis. Patritius saith 52. miles in heighth." Exercise 52: "The causes of the sea's motion must be investigated: first, of its ebb and flow; second, of its variation; third, of its speed; fourth, of its cessation; fifth, of its absence; sixth, of its contrariety." "Patrizi says fifty-two miles in height." This last sentence appears beneath the same marginal note but pertains to the following discussion of mountain heights.

[5338] Editor. Meteors here means phenomena of the air broadly, not just shooting stars. Subtile means thin or rarefied. The extraordinary reported mountain heights are kept as printed, with Burton's competing authorities visible; they have not been converted into modern elevations.

and as [5339]Blancanus the Iesuite contends out of Clavius & Nonius demonstrations de Crepusculis: or rather 32. stadiums, as the most received opinion is; or 4. miles, which the height of no mountain doth perpendicularly exceed, & is equal to the greatest depths of the Sea, which is, as Scaliger holds 1580. paces. Exer.38. others 100. paces.	and as the Jesuit Blancanus argues from the demonstrations concerning twilight by Clavius and Nonius? Or rather thirty-two stadia, as the most widely accepted opinion has it; or four miles, a vertical height that no mountain exceeds, and which equals the sea's greatest depths—1,580 paces, according to Scaliger, exercise 38, though others say a hundred paces.[5340]
I would see those inner parts of America, whether there be any such great City of Manoa, or Eldorado in that golden Empire, where the high ways are as much beaten (one reports) as between Madril & Valadolid in Spain; or any such Amazones as he relates, or giganticall Patagons in Chica; with that miraculous mountain [5341]Ybouyapab in the Northern Brasile, cujus jugum sternitur in amænissimam planitiem, &c. or that of Pariacacca so high elevated in Peru.	I would see the interior of America: whether there is such a great city as Manoa, or El Dorado, in that golden empire, where the highways, one writer reports, are as well travelled as those between Madrid and Valladolid in Spain; or such Amazons as he describes, or gigantic Patagonians in Chica; and that marvellous mountain Ybouyapab in northern Brazil, "whose ridge spreads out into a most delightful plain," and so forth; or Pariacaca, rising so high in Peru.[5342]

[5340] Editor. Stadiums are stadia, an ancient measure whose value varies by context. The text's figures of four miles, 1,580 paces and one hundred paces are not equivalent; this numerical inconsistency is retained. The marginal fifty-two-mile claim is distinct from the body's figures. Blancanus is Giuseppe Biancani, and Nonius is Pedro Nunes.

[5341] Burton. Printed page 242, margin u: "Laet. lib.17. cap.18. descrip. occid. Ind." De Laet, Description of the West Indies, book 17, chapter 18.

[5342] Editor. Burton's catalogue combines rumours of cities and peoples with named mountains. The anonymous "one" who compares roads has not been identified here. Ybouyapab, Chica and the particular De Laet passage remain to be checked against their cited sources; no precise modern identification is silently substituted.

Source page 242–243 [5343]The pike of Teneriff how high it is? 70. miles, or 50. as Patricius holds, or 9. as Snellius demonstrates in his Eratosthenes: see that strange [5344]Cirknickzersey lake in Carniola, whose waters gush so fast out of the ground, that they will overtake a swift horseman, and by and by with as incredible celerity are supped up: which Lazius and Warnerus make an argument of the Argonautes sayling underground.	How high is the peak of Tenerife: seventy miles, or fifty, as Patrizi holds, or nine, as Snellius demonstrates in his Eratosthenes? I would see that strange Lake Cirknickzersey in Carniola, whose waters gush from the ground so fast that they can overtake a swift horseman, and shortly afterwards are swallowed up with equally incredible speed. Lazius and Warnerus take this as evidence that the Argonauts sailed underground.[5345]
Source page 243 And that vast den or hole called [5346]Esmellen in Muscovia quæ visitur horrendo hiatu, &c. which if any thing casually fall in, makes such a roaring noise, that no thunder, or ordnance, or warlike engin can make the like; such another is Gilbers Cave in Lapland, with many the like.	And that vast cavern or pit called Esmellen in Muscovy, “which is seen gaping fearfully,” and so forth: if anything happens to fall into it, it makes such a roaring noise that no thunder, artillery or engine of war can equal it. Another such place is Gilber's Cave in Lapland, and there are many like them.[5347]
I would examine the Caspian Sea, and see where and how it exonerates it self, after it hath taken in Volga, Iaxares, Oxus, and those great rivers; at the mouth of Oby, or where?	I would examine the Caspian Sea and see where and how it discharges its water after receiving the Volga, Jaxartes, Oxus and those great rivers: at the mouth of the Ob, or where?[5348]

[5343] Burton. Printed page 242, margin x: “Luge alii vocant.” “Others call it Luge.” The form of the name is retained.

[5344] Burton. Printed page 242, asterisk: “Geor. wernerus, Aquæ tanta celeritate erumpunt & absorbentur, ut expedito equiti aditum intercludant.” Georg Wernher: “The waters burst out and are swallowed up so rapidly that they cut off the passage of a lightly equipped horseman.”

[5345] Editor. Cirknickzersey is the intermittent Lake Cerknica in Carniola. “Supped up” means sucked or swallowed away. The reported speed of its waters and the Argonaut inference remain the claims of Burton’s cited writers. The competing heights of Tenerife are likewise retained, without silently selecting or repairing a number.

[5346] Burton. Printed page 243, margin y: “Boissardus de Magis cap. de Pilapiis.” Boissard, On Magicians, chapter on the Pilapii. The last name is retained as printed; exact identification remains unresolved.

[5347] Editor. Ordnance means artillery, and warlike engine a military machine. The sites Esmellen and Gilber’s Cave, and the marginal chapter-name Pilapiis, remain unresolved. The general meaning of the Latin description is clear, but the place-names need source collation.

[5348] Editor. Burton asks after a supposed outlet from the Caspian and includes the Jaxartes and Oxus among its inflowing rivers. Those are the Syr Darya and Amu Darya; this geographical scheme should not be mistaken for their present drainage. The question and its proposed connection to the Ob are retained as historical conjecture.

What vent the Mexican lake hath, the Titicacan in Peru, or that circular pool in the vale of Terapeia, of which Acosta l.3. c.16. hot in a cold country, the Spring of which boils up in the middle twenty foot square, and hath no vent but exhalation: and that of Mare mortuum in Palestina, of Thrasumene, at Peruzium in Italy;	What outlet has the Mexican lake, or Lake Titicaca in Peru, or that circular pool in the valley of Terapeia mentioned by Acosta, book 3, chapter 16? It is hot in a cold country; its spring boils up in the middle over an area twenty feet square, and it has no outlet except evaporation. And what of the Dead Sea in Palestine, or Lake Trasimene by Perugia in Italy;[5349]
the Mediterranean it self. For from the Ocean, at the Straights of Gibralter, there is a perpetuall current into the Levant, and so likewise by the Thracian Bosphorus out of the Euxine or black Sea, besides all those great rivers of Nilus, Padus, Rhodanus, &c. how is this water consumed, by the Sun, or otherwise?	or the Mediterranean itself? For a perpetual current flows into the Levant from the ocean through the Strait of Gibraltar, and likewise through the Thracian Bosporus from the Euxine, or Black Sea, besides all those great rivers—the Nile, Po, Rhône and the rest. How is all this water used up: by the sun, or otherwise?
I would find out with Trajan the fountains of Danubius, of Ganges, Oxus, see those Ægyptian Pyramids, Trajans bridge, Grotta de Sybilla, Lucullus Fish-ponds, the Temple of Nidrose, &c.	I would discover, with Trajan, the sources of the Danube, Ganges and Oxus; see the Egyptian pyramids, Trajan's bridge, the Sibyl's grotto, Lucullus's fishponds, the church of Nidaros, and so forth.[5350]

[5349] Editor. Vent means an outlet; exhalation here is evaporation. The Mexican lake is not more precisely identified in the text. The Acosta passage and the place-name Terapeia have not yet been collated; the dimensions and description remain Burton's.

[5350] Editor. Danubius is the Danube; the Oxus is the Amu Darya. Temple can mean a church: Nidrose is Nidaros, now Trondheim. The wording "with Trajan" is retained without claiming that Trajan reached all three river sources. The precise grotto and monument references still require collation.

And, if I could, observe what becomes of Swallowes, Storks, Cranes, Cuckowes, Nightingales, Redstars, and many other kinde of singing birds, water-fowls, Hawks, &c. some of them are onely seen in Summer, some in Winter; some are observed in the [5351]snow, and at no other times, each have their seasons. In winter not a bird is in Muscovie to be found, but at the spring in an instant the woods and hedges are full of them, saith [5352]Herbastein: how comes it to pass?	And, if I could, I would observe what becomes of swallows, storks, cranes, cuckoos, nightingales, redstarts and many other kinds of songbirds, waterfowl, hawks and so on. Some are seen only in summer, some in winter; some appear in the snow and at no other time: each has its season. In winter not a bird can be found in Muscovy, but in spring the woods and hedges are suddenly full of them, says Herberstein. How does this happen?[5353]
Do they sleep in winter, like Gesners Alpine mice; or do they lye hid (as [5354]Olaus affirmes) in the bottome of lakes and rivers, spiritum continentes? often so found by Fishermen in Poland and Scandia, two together, mouth to mouth, wing to wing; and when the spring comes they revive again, or if they be brought into a stove, or to the fire side.	Do they sleep in winter like Gesner's Alpine mice? Or do they lie hidden, as Olaus asserts, at the bottom of lakes and rivers, "holding their breath"? Fishermen in Poland and Scandinavia often find them so, two together, mouth to mouth and wing to wing; and when spring comes they revive, or do so if brought into a heated room or beside the fire.[5355]

[5351] Burton. Printed page 243, margin z: "In campis Lovicen. solum visuntur in nive, & ubinam vere, æstate, autumno se occultant. Hermes Polit. l.1. Jul. Bellius." "In the fields of Lovicen. they are seen only in the snow; and where do they hide themselves in spring, summer and autumn?" Hermes Politicus, book 1, Julius Bellius. The place-name is abbreviated in the source.

[5352] Burton. Printed page 243, margin p: "Statim ineunte vere sylvæ strepunt eorum cantilenis. Muscovit. comment." "As soon as spring begins, the woods resound with their songs." Commentary on Muscovy.

[5353] Editor. Redstars is rendered redstarts. Muscovy is the historical Russian realm. Burton cites Herberstein for the sweeping seasonal contrast, which is retained as a reported observation rather than a complete description of the region's birdlife.

[5354] Burton. Printed page 243, margin q: "Immergunt se fluminibus, lacubusque per hyemem totam, &c." "They immerse themselves in rivers and lakes throughout the winter," and so on.

[5355] Editor. The passage records the old belief that swallows pass the winter underwater. A stove here is a heated room, not necessarily the heating appliance itself. Burton presents this alongside other explanations before withholding a firm judgement. The alleged fishermen's observations have not been verified.

Or do they follow the Sun, as Peter Martyr legat. Babylonica l.2. manifestly evicts, out of his own knowledge: for when he was Embassadour in Ægypt, he saw Swallowes, Spanish Kites, and many such other [5356]European birds, in December and Ianuary very familiarly flying, and in great abundance, about Alexandria, ubi floridæ tunc arbores ac viridaria.	Or do they follow the sun, as Peter Martyr clearly establishes from his own experience in book 2 of his Babylonian Embassy? When he was ambassador in Egypt, he saw swallows, Spanish kites and many other European birds flying quite freely and in great numbers around Alexandria in December and January, "where the trees and gardens were then in bloom."[5357]
Or lye they hid in caves, rocks, and hollow trees, as most think, in deep Tin-mines or Sea-cliffes, as [5358]Mr Carew gives out? I conclude of them all, for my part, as [5359]Munster doth of Cranes and storks: whence they come, whither they goe, incompertum adhuc, as yet we know not. We see them here, some in summer, some in winter: Their comming and going is sure in the night: in the plaines of Asia (saith he) the storkes meet on such a set day, he that comes last is torn in peeces, and so they get them gon.	Or do they hide in caves, rocks and hollow trees, as most people think; in deep tin mines or sea cliffs, as Mr Carew reports? For my part I conclude about them all as Münster does about cranes and storks: where they come from and where they go is "still undiscovered"—as yet we do not know. We see them here, some in summer and some in winter. They certainly come and go at night. In the plains of Asia, he says, storks gather on an appointed day; the last to arrive is torn to pieces, and then they depart.[5360]

[5356] Burton. Printed page 243, margin t: "Cæterasque volucres Pontum hyeme adveniente è nostris regionibus Europeis transvolantes." "And other birds flying across the Black Sea from our European regions as winter approaches."

[5357] Editor. Evicts means demonstrates or establishes, not expels. Peter Martyr's Babylonian Embassy concerns a mission to Egypt; "Babylonian" does not require the location to be the ancient Mesopotamian city. Burton appeals to personal observation reported by his source, while the exact passage remains uncollated.

[5359] Burton. Printed page 243, margin r: "Porro ciconiæ quonam è loco veniant, quò se conferant, incompertum adhuc, agmen venientium, descendentium, [ut gruum venisse cernimus,] nocturnis opinor temporibus. In patentibus Asiæ campis certo die congregant se, eam quæ novissimè advenit lacerant, inde avolant. Cosmog. l.4. c.126." "Moreover, from what place storks come and where they go is still unknown; their flock arrives and descends [as we see cranes arriving], I think, at night. In the open plains of Asia they gather on a fixed day, tear apart the one that arrives last, and then fly away." Cosmography, book 4, chapter 126. The bracketed wording is present in Burton's margin. The elliptical clause about the flock is supplied with "arrives and descends" in translation. Nocturnis opinor temporibus means "at night, I think"; collation with Münster's own text remains pending.

[5360] Editor. Burton's Latin admission of uncertainty and his English gloss are both retained. The marginal Münster passage cautiously says "at night, I think," whereas Burton says that coming and going certainly occurs at night. The story of the last stork being killed is likewise reported, not verified. The source's bracketed comparison with cranes remains in the marginal note.

Zoophites were fit to be considered in such an expedition, and amongst the rest, that of [5361]Herbastein his Tartar lambe, [5362]Hector Boethius goosebearing tree in the Orchades, to which Cardan lib. 7. cap. 36. de rerum varietat. subscribes:	Such an expedition would be a good occasion to examine many strange places: isthmuses, tidal channels, peninsulas, creeks, harbours, headlands, straits, lakes, hot springs, rocks, mountains, places and fields where cities have been ruined or swallowed up and battles fought; living creatures, sea monsters, the remora, and so on; minerals, plants, and zoophytes. Among the rest would be Herberstein's Tartar lamb and Hector Boece's goose-bearing tree in the Orkneys, which Cardan also accepts in book 7, chapter 36 of On the Variety of Things.[5363]

[5362] Burton. Printed page 243, n: "Hist. Scot. l. 1." History of Scotland, book 1; the citation accompanies Hector Boethius (Boece).

[5363] Editor. Isthmus: narrow land bridge; Euripus: a narrow channel with strong currents; Chersonesus: peninsula. Zoophytes were organisms thought to stand between plant and animal. The Tartar lamb and goose-bearing tree belong to plant-animal legends. Herbastein is Sigismund von Herberstein; Hector Boethius is Hector Boece. Burton gathers reports to investigate rather than certifying them.

There is Varthema's wonderful palm; the insect in Hispaniola that shines like a torch at night, so brightly that one can see to write; the spherical stones in Cuba, which nature has made in that shape; and those shaped like birds, beasts, fish, crowns, swords, saws, pots, and so on, commonly found in the metal mines of Saxony around Mansfeld, and in Poland near Nokow and Pallukie, as Münster and others report.[5367]

[5364] Burton. Printed page 244, o: "Vertomannus l. 5. c. 16. mentioneth a tree that bears fruits to eat, wood to burn, bark to make ropes, wine and water to drink, oyl and sugar, and leaves as tiles to cover houses, flowers for clothes, &c." Modern English: Varthema, book 5, chapter 16, mentions a tree that supplies fruit to eat, wood to burn, bark for ropes, wine and water to drink, oil and sugar, leaves as roof tiles, flowers for clothing, and so on.

[5365] Burton. Printed page 244, asterisk: "Animal insectum Cusino, ut quis legere vel scribere possit sine alterius ope luminis." Translation: The insect called Cusino, by whose light one can read or write without the help of any other light.

[5366] Burton. Printed page 244, dagger: "Cosmog. lib. 1. cap. 435. & lib. 3. cap. 1. habent ollas à natura formatas è terra extractas, similes illis à figulis factis, coronas, pisces, aves, & omnes animantium species." Translation: Cosmography, book 1, chapter 435, and book 3, chapter 1. They have pots shaped by nature and dug from the earth, like those made by potters; crowns, fish, birds, and every kind of living creature.

[5367] Editor. Hispaniola is the Caribbean island now shared by Haiti and the Dominican Republic. Burton's "fly" means an insect generally. The margin prints Cusino; no species identification is imposed. The extraordinary shapes in stone and the locality names are retained as reported. The palm note's "flowers for clothes" is likewise preserved pending comparison with Varthema.

Many rare creatures and novelties each part of the world affords: amongst the rest, I would know for a certain whether there be any such men, as Leo Suavius in his comment on Paracelsus de sanit. tuend. and [5368]Gaguinus records in his description of Muscovie, that in Lucomoria, a Province in Russia, lye fast asleep as dead all winter, from the 27. of November, like frogges and swallowes, benummed with cold, but about the 24. of April in the Spring they revive again, and goe about their business.	Every part of the world offers many rare creatures and strange things. Among these, I would like to know for certain whether there really are people of the kind Leo Suavius describes in his commentary on Paracelsus's On Preserving Health, and Gaguinus in his description of Muscovy: people in Lucomoria, a province of Russia, who lie sound asleep as though dead all winter, from 27 November, like frogs and swallows numbed by cold, but revive around 24 April in the spring and go about their business.[5369]
I would examine that demonstration of Alexander Picolomineus, whether the earths superficies be bigger than the seas; or that of Archimedes be true, the superficies of all water is even? Search the depth, and see that variety of Sea-monsters and fishes, Mare-maids, Sea-men, Horses, &c. which it affords.	I would examine Alessandro Piccolomini's demonstration to see whether the earth's land surface is larger than the sea's; or whether Archimedes' proposition is true, that the surface of all water is level. I would sound its depths and see the variety of sea monsters and fish, mermaids, mermen, sea horses, and so on, that it contains.[5370]

[5368] Burton. Printed page 244, asterisk: "Ut solent hirundines & ranæ præ frigoris magnitudine mori, & postea redeunte vere 24. Aprilis reviviscere." Translation: As swallows and frogs are accustomed to die from the great cold, and afterwards, when spring returns, to come to life again on 24 April.

[5369] Editor. Leo Suavius is a name used by Jacques Gohory. Gaguinus probably refers here to Alexander Guagnini, a writer on eastern Europe; the specific passage remains uncollated. Human winter sleep and swallow hibernation are reports being questioned, not established observations. The dates in body and margin have been retained.

[5370] Editor. "Superficies" means surface. Archimedes, On Floating Bodies I.2, describes the surface of still water as part of a sphere sharing the earth's centre; Burton's "even" should not be taken to mean a globally flat surface. Piccolomini's particular demonstration remains to be collated.

Or whether that be true which Iordanus Brunus scoffes at, that if God did not detain it, the Sea would overflow the earth by reason of his higher site, and which Josephus Blancanus the Jesuite in his interpretation on those mathematicall places of Aristotle, foolishly fears, and in a just tract proves by many circumstances, that in time the Sea will waste away the land, and all the globe of the earth shall be covered with waters; Risum teneatis amici? what the sea takes away in one place it addes in another.	Or I would test the claim that Giordano Bruno scoffs at: that unless God restrained it, the sea would overflow the earth because it stands higher. Giuseppe Biancani the Jesuit foolishly fears this in his interpretation of Aristotle's mathematical passages, and argues at length, with much supporting evidence, that in time the sea will wear away the land and water will cover the whole globe. "Could you keep from laughing, my friends?"[5371] What the sea takes away in one place, it adds in another.
Me thinks he might rather suspect the Sea should in time be filled by land, trees grow up, carcasses, &c. that all-devouring fire, omnia devorans & consumens, will sooner cover and dry up the vast Ocean with sand and ashes.	I think he might more reasonably suspect that in time the sea will be filled with earth, growing trees, carcasses, and so on; that all-devouring fire, "devouring and consuming everything," will sooner cover and dry up the vast ocean with sand and ashes.
I would examine the true seat of that terrestriall [5372]Paradise, and where Ophir was whence Solomon did fetch his gold; from Peruana, which some suppose, or that Aurea Chersonesus, as Dominicus Niger, Arias Montanus, Goropius, and others will.	I would investigate the true location of the earthly Paradise, and the whereabouts of Ophir, from which Solomon brought his gold: whether it was in Peru, as some suppose, or on the Golden Peninsula, as Domenico Negri, Arias Montanus, Goropius, and others maintain.[5373]

[5371] Editor. Horace, Art of Poetry 5. Burton uses the question to ridicule Biancani's prediction. "Just tract" here means a full or substantial treatise, not an impartial one. The accounts of Bruno and Biancani remain Burton's summaries pending direct collation.

[5372] Burton. Printed page 244, dagger: "Vid. Pererium in Gen. cor. à Lapide, & alios." Translation: See Pererius on Genesis, Cornelius a Lapide, and others.

[5373] Editor. The terrestrial Paradise is Eden. Ophir is the biblical source of Solomon's gold (1 Kings 9:28); its location was debated. Aurea Chersonesus means the Golden Peninsula. The rival identifications are kept as hypotheses, not settled geographical facts.

I would censure all Plinies, Solinus, Strabo's, Sr John Mandevils, Olaus Magnus, Marcus Polus lyes, correct those errors in navigation, reforme Cosmographicall Chartes, and rectifie longitudes, if it were possible; not by the Compass, as some dream, with Mark Ridley in his treatise of magneticall bodies, cap. 43. for as Cabeus magnet. philos. lib. 3. cap. 4. fully resolves, there is no hope thence, yet I would observe some better meanes to find them out.	I would scrutinize all the lies of Pliny, Solinus, Strabo, Sir John Mandeville, Olaus Magnus, and Marco Polo; correct those errors in navigation; revise maps of the world; and correct longitudes, if possible. I would not do it by the compass, as some imagine along with Mark Ridley in chapter 43 of his Treatise of Magnetic Bodies, for, as Cabeus decisively concludes in book 3, chapter 4 of his Magnetic Philosophy, there is no hope from that quarter. Still, I would look for better means of determining them.[5374]
I would have a convenient place to goe down with Orpheus, Ulysses, Hercules, [5375]Lucians Menippus, at St. Patricks Purgatory, at Trophonius den, Hecla in Island, Ætna in Sicily, to descend and see what is done in the bowels of the earth; do stones and metalls grow there still? how come firre trees to be [5376]digged out from tops of hills, as in our mosses, & marishes all over Europe?	I would find a suitable place to go down with Orpheus, Ulysses, Hercules, or Lucian's Menippus—at St Patrick's Purgatory, Trophonius's cave, Hekla in Iceland, or Etna in Sicily—and descend to see what happens in the bowels of the earth. Do stones and metals still grow there? How is it that fir trees are dug out of hilltops, as they are from our peat bogs and marshes all over Europe?[5377]

[5374] Editor. "Censure" means critically examine or judge; Burton's following "lyes" is deliberately severe. Longitude is east–west position. Burton rejects the proposed use of magnetic direction to determine it. The Ridley–Cabeus disagreement is preserved without suggesting that either account has been fully checked here.

[5376] Burton. Printed page 244, dagger: "Fracastorius lib. de simp. Georgius Merula lib. de mem. Julius Bellius, &c." Fracastorius, book on simples; Georgius Merula, book de mem.; Julius Bellius, and others. The abbreviated titles are retained where their expansion is not secure.

[5377] Editor. Orpheus, Ulysses, and Hercules are classical visitors to the underworld. Lucian's Menippus is a satirical traveller there. St Patrick's Purgatory and Trophonius's cave belong to traditions of otherworldly descent, while Hekla and Etna are volcanoes. "Mosses" means peat bogs. The question whether minerals grow reflects an older account of their formation.

How do people come to dig up fish bones, shells, beams, ironwork many fathoms underground, and anchors in mountains far from any sea? In 1460, at Bern in Switzerland, a ship was dug out of a mountain where metal ore was being mined, fifty fathoms deep; inside it were forty-eight human corpses, along with other merchandise.[5379]
Source page 245 That such things are ordinarily found in tops of hils, Aristotle insinuates in his meteors, [5380]Pomponius Mela in his first book, c. de Numidia, and familiarly in the Alpes saith [5381]Blancanus the Jesuite, the like is to be seen: Came this from Earth-quakes, or from Noahs floud, as Christians suppose, or is there a vicissitude of Sea & land, as Anaximenes held of old, the mountaines of Thessaly would become Seas, and Seas again Mountaines?	Aristotle suggests in his Meteorology that such things are commonly found on hilltops, as does Pomponius Mela in the chapter on Numidia in his first book; and Biancani the Jesuit says similar things are frequently seen in the Alps. Did this result from earthquakes, or from Noah's Flood, as Christians suppose? Or do sea and land change places, as Anaximenes held long ago, so that the mountains of Thessaly would become seas, and seas become mountains again?[5382]

[5378] Burton. Printed page 244, asterisk, bottom: "Simlerus, Ortelius, Brachiis centum sub terra reperta est, in qua quadraginta octo cadavera inerant, Anchoræ, &c." Translation: Simler, Ortelius: it was found a hundred braccia below ground, and in it were forty-eight corpses, anchors, and so on.

[5379] Editor. The English gives fifty fathoms; the Latin margin gives one hundred brachia, here retained as braccia, an arm-based measure. These are distinct wordings of the reported depth, not silently harmonized. The buried ship, bodies, and anchors have not been independently verified.

[5380] Burton. Printed page 245, dagger: "Pisces & conchæ in montibus reperiuntur." Translation: Fish and shells are found in mountains.

[5381] Burton. Printed page 245, asterisk: "Lib. de locis Mathemat. Aristot." Book on Aristotle's mathematical passages.

[5382] Editor. "Vicissitude" means alternation or exchange. Mela I.27 reports fish bones, shells, worn stones and embedded anchors far inland in barren plains, qualifying the report's credibility; he does not place this list on mountain tops. Aristotle, Meteorology I.14, discusses long-term alternation of land and sea and supplies broader context, not a match for Burton's entire catalogue. Anaximenes and Biancani remain uncollated.

The whole world belike should be new moulded, when it seemed good to those all-commanding Powers, & turned inside out, as we do hay-cocks in Harvest, top to bottom, or bottom to top: or as we turn apples to the fire, move the world upon his Center; that which is under the Poles now, should be translated to the Æquinoctiall, & that which is under the torrid Zone to the Circle Artique & Antarctique another while, and so be reciprocally warmed by the Sun:	Presumably the whole world would be remoulded whenever those all-commanding Powers thought fit, and turned inside out as we turn haycocks at harvest, top to bottom or bottom to top. Or, as we turn apples towards the fire, they might move the world about its centre: what now lies beneath the poles would be shifted to the equator, and what lies beneath the torrid zone would at another time be moved to the Arctic and Antarctic Circles, so that each in turn would be warmed by the sun.
or if the worlds be infinite, and every fixed star a Sun, with his compassing Planets (as Brunus and Campanella conclude) cast three or four Worlds into one; or else of one old world make three or four new, as it shall seem to them best.	Or, if there are infinitely many worlds and every fixed star is a sun with planets circling it, as Bruno and Campanella conclude, they might cast three or four worlds into one, or make three or four new ones out of a single old world, as seems best to them.[5383]
To proceed, if the earth be 21500. miles in [5384]compass, its Diameter is 7000. from us to our Antipodes, and what shall be comprehended in all that space? What is the Center of the earth? is it pure element only, as Aristotle decrees, inhabited (as [5385]Paracelsus thinks) with creatures, whose Chaos is the earth: or with Fairies, as the woods and waters (according to him) are with Nymphes, or as the Aire with Spirits?	To continue: if the earth is 21,500 miles in circumference, its diameter is 7,000 miles from us to our antipodes; and what is contained in all that space? What is at the earth's centre? Is it nothing but the pure element earth, as Aristotle rules? Is it inhabited, as Paracelsus thinks, by creatures whose native realm is earth, or by fairies, as the woods and waters, according to him, are inhabited by nymphs, or the air by spirits?[5386]

[5383] Editor. The remaking of worlds continues Burton's playful hypothetical narrative. His attribution of the combined proposition about infinite worlds, stars, and planets to both Bruno and Campanella has not been separately verified.

[5384] Burton. Printed page 245, s: "Or plain, as Patricius holds, which Austin, Lactantius, and some others, held of old as round as a trencher." Modern English: Or flat, as Patricius holds, and as Augustine, Lactantius, and some others held in ancient times: round like a plate.

[5385] Burton. Printed page 245, t: "Li. de Zilphia & Pigmeis, they penetrate the earth as we do the aire." Book on sylphs and pygmies: they pass through the earth as we do through the air. The printed title has Zilphia.

[5386] Editor. Antipodes are the opposite part of the globe or its inhabitants. The figures are Burton's approximate, unreconciled measures. "Chaos" in the Paracelsian account means the elemental medium in which a creature lives. "Plain" in the margin means flat; the alleged plate-shaped earth anticipates the later passage discussed in Editor note on Augustine.

Dionisiodorus, a Mathematician in [5387]Pliny, that sent a letter ad superos after he was dead, from the Center of the earth, to signifie what distance the same center was from the superficies of the same, viz. 42000. stadiums, might have done well to have satisfied all these doubts.	Dionysodorus, the mathematician mentioned in Pliny who, after his death, sent a letter from the centre of the earth "to those above" to report its distance from the surface—namely 42,000 stadia—might usefully have settled all these doubts.[5388]
Or is it the place of hell, as Virgil in his Æneides, Plato, Lucian, Dantes, and others poetically describe it, and as many of our Divines think? In good earnest, Anthony Rusca, one of the society of that Ambrosian Colledge in Millan, in his great volume de Inferno lib. 1. cap. 47. is stiffe in this tenent, 'tis a corporeall fire tow, cap. 5. l. 2. as he there disputes.	Or is it the place of hell, as Virgil in his Aeneid, Plato, Lucian, Dante, and others describe it in their imaginative writings, and as many of our theologians think? In all seriousness, Antonio Rusca, a member of the Ambrosian College in Milan, firmly maintains this position in book 1, chapter 47 of his great volume On Hell. The fire is physical too, as he argues there in book 2, chapter 5.[5389]
Whatsoever Philosophers write (saith [5390]Surius) there be certain mouthes of hell, and places appointed for the punishment of mens souls, as at Hecla in Island, where the ghosts of dead men are familiarly seen, and sometimes talk with the living: God would have such visible places, that mortall men might be certainly informed, that there be such punishments after death, and learn hence to fear God.	"Whatever philosophers may write," says Surius, "there are certain mouths of hell and places appointed for the punishment of human souls, as at Hekla in Iceland, where the ghosts of the dead are often seen and sometimes speak with the living. God wished there to be such visible places so that mortals could know for certain that such punishments exist after death, and learn from this to fear God."[5391]

[5387] Burton. Printed page 245, u: "Lib. 2. c. 112." Book 2, chapter 112 of Pliny's Natural History.

[5388] Editor. Pliny, Natural History II.248 (chapter 112), tells this story as an example of Greek folly; Burton's proposal that the letter might settle scientific questions is a joke. A stadion was an ancient measure of length; no single modern conversion is imposed.

[5389] Editor. "Divines" means theologians; "corporeall" means bodily or physical. The source prints "fire tow," understood as "fire too" in the modern column. "Poetically" covers imaginative representations, including prose narratives and myths. Rusca's detailed claims and chapter references are retained pending direct collation.

[5390] Burton. Printed page 245, x: "Commentar. ad annum 1537. Quicquid dicunt Philosophi, quædam sunt Tartari ostia, & loca puniendis animis destinata, ut Hecla mons, &c. ubi mortuorum spiritus visuntur, &c. voluit Deus extare talia loca, ut discant mortales." Translation: Commentary under the year 1537. Whatever philosophers say, there are certain mouths of Tartarus and places appointed for the punishment of souls, such as Mount Hekla, and so on, where the spirits of the dead are seen, and so on. God wished such places to exist so that mortals might learn.

[5391] Editor. Laurentius Surius's report is quoted as testimony within a dispute. Burton's English adds details beyond the shortened Latin margin, including conversation with the living and learning to fear God. Both versions are retained.

Krantzius dan. hist. lib. 2. cap. 24. subscribes to this opinion of Surius, so doth Colerus cap. 12. lib. de immortal. animæ (out of the authority belike of St. Gregory, Durand, and the rest of the Schoolmen, who derive as much from Ætna in Sicily, Lypara, Hyera, and those sulphureous Vulcanian Islands) making Terra del Fuego, and those frequent Vulcans in America, of which Acosta lib. 3. cap. 24. that fearfull mount Heckleberg in Norway, an especiall argument to prove it,	Krantz, in book 2, chapter 24 of his History of Denmark, subscribes to Surius's opinion, as does Colerus in chapter 12 of his book On the Immortality of the Soul. Presumably they rely on St Gregory, Durandus, and the other Schoolmen, who draw the same conclusion from Etna in Sicily, Lipari, Hiera, and those sulphurous volcanic islands. They make Tierra del Fuego, the many volcanoes of America described by Acosta in book 3, chapter 24, and that dreadful mountain Heckleberg in Norway a special argument for their case:[5392]
[5393]where lamentable screeches and howlings are continually heard, which strike a terrour to the Auditors; fiery chariots are commonly seen to bring in the souls of men in the likenesse of crows, and divels ordinarily goe in and out.	"There pitiful shrieks and howls are continually heard, striking terror into the hearers; fiery chariots are often seen bringing in human souls in the shape of crows, and devils regularly go in and out."
Source page 245–246 Such another proof is that place neer the Pyramides in Egypt, by Cairo, as well to confirme this as the resurrection, mentioned by [5394]Kornmannus mirac. mort. lib. 1. cap. 38. Camerarius oper. suc. cap. 37. Bredenbachius peregr. ter. sanct. and some others, where once a yeere dead bodies arise about March, and walk, and after a while hide themselves again: thousands of people come yearly to see them.	Another such proof, offered to confirm both this belief and the resurrection, is the place near the pyramids in Egypt, close to Cairo, mentioned by Kornmann in book 1, chapter 38 of The Wonders of the Dead, by Camerarius in chapter 37 of his Spare-time Works, by Breydenbach in his Pilgrimage to the Holy Land, and by others. There, once a year around March, dead bodies rise and walk, then after a while hide themselves again; thousands of people come every year to see them.[5395]

[5392] Editor. The Schoolmen are medieval scholastic theologians. "Vulcans" means volcanoes; Vulcan was the Roman fire god. Lipari and Hiera belong to the volcanic island group north of Sicily. "Heckleberg in Norway" is Burton's stated location and is not silently changed to Hekla in Iceland.

[5393] Burton. Printed page 245, y: "Ubi miserabiles ejulantium voces audiuntur, qui auditoribus horrorem incutiunt haud vulgarem, &c." Translation: Where the pitiable cries of people wailing are heard, striking extraordinary horror into their hearers, and so on.

[5394] Burton. Printed page 245, z: "Ex sepulchris apparent mense Martio, & rursus sub terram se abscondunt, &c." Translation: They appear from their graves in the month of March, and hide themselves underground again, and so on.

[5395] Editor. The passage reports a resurrection marvel rather than an authenticated event. "Oper. suc." abbreviates a title concerning spare-time or leisure works. The Kornmann, Camerarius, and Breydenbach references require further collation.

Source page 246 But these and such like testimonies others reject, as fables, illusions of spirits, and they will have no such locall known place, more than Styx or Phlegeton, Pluto's Court, or that poeticall Infernus, where Homers soul was seen hanging on a tree, &c. to which they ferried over in Charons boat, or went down at Hermione in Greece, compendiaria ad inferos via, which is the shortest cut, quia nullum à mortuis naulum eo loci exposcunt, (saith [5396]Gerbelius) and besides there were no fees to be paid.	But others reject these and similar testimonies as fables or deceptions by spirits. They will allow no such known, physically situated place, any more than the Styx or Phlegethon, Pluto's court, or that poets' underworld where Homer's soul was seen hanging from a tree, and so on. People crossed to it in Charon's boat, or went down at Hermione in Greece, "by a short route to the dead"—which is the shortest way—"because at that place they demand no ferry fare from the dead," as Gerbelius says; and besides, there were no fees to pay.[5397]
Well then, is it Hell, or Purgatory, as Bellarmine; or Limbus patrum, as Gallucius will, & as Rusca will (for they have made maps of it) [5398]or Ignatius parler?	Well then, is it hell, or purgatory, as Bellarmine would have it; or the limbo of the fathers, as Gallucius and Rusca maintain—for they have made maps of it—or Ignatius's parlour?[5399]

[5397] Editor. Styx and Phlegethon are rivers of the classical underworld; Charon ferries the dead across. In the modern column both Latin phrases are freshly translated and Burton's following English explanations are retained. The hanging Homer and Gerbelius's exact passage remain to be identified securely.

Virgil, sometimes Bishop of Saltburg (as Aventinus Anno. 745. relates) by Bonifacius Bishop of Mentz was therefore called in question, because he held Antipodes (which they made a doubt whether Christ died for) and so by that means took away the seat of Hell, or so contracted it, that it could bear no proportion to Heaven, and contradicted that opinion of Austin, Basil, Lactantius, that held the earth round as a trencher (whom Acosta & common experience more largely confute) but not as a ball;	Virgil, formerly bishop of Salzburg, was called to account by Boniface, bishop of Mainz, as Aventinus relates under the year 745, because he maintained that there were people at the antipodes—people for whom, they doubted, Christ had died. By doing so, he removed the site of hell, or narrowed it so much that it could bear no proportion to heaven. He also contradicted the view of Augustine, Basil, and Lactantius that the earth was round like a plate, but not like a ball—a view that Acosta and ordinary experience refute more fully.[5400]
and Ierusalem where Christ died the middle of it; or Delos, as the fabulous Greeks fained: because when Iupiter let two Eagles loose, to flye from the worlds ends East & West, they met at Delos.	They put Jerusalem, where Christ died, at its centre; or Delos, as the fable-loving Greeks imagined, because when Jupiter released two eagles to fly from the eastern and western ends of the world, they met at Delos.[5401]
But that scruple of Bonifacius is now quite taken away by our later Divines: Franciscus Ribera in cap. 14. Apocalyps. will have Hell a materiall & locall fire in the center of the earth, 200. Italian miles in diameter, as he defines it out of those words, Exivit sanguis de terrâ——per stadia mille sexcenta, &c.	But our more recent theologians have entirely removed Boniface's difficulty. Francisco Ribera, commenting on chapter 14 of Revelation, makes hell a physical fire located at the centre of the earth, two hundred Italian miles in diameter: he determines this from the words, "Blood came out of the earth—for one thousand six hundred stadia," and so on.[5402]

[5400] Editor. This Virgil is the bishop of Salzburg. Burton compresses distinct disputes. Augustine, City of God XVI.9, separates spherical shape from inhabited antipodes. Basil, Hexaemeron IX.1, lists rival theories of the earth's shape and says Moses does not settle them. Lactantius, Divine Institutes III.24, ridicules antipodes and the spherical model underlying them. These passages do not establish Burton's shared plate-shaped-earth doctrine. Aventinus's account, Boniface's objections and Burton's date 745 remain uncollated.

[5401] Editor. The source reads Delos twice. The familiar story of the two eagles concerns Delphi: compare Strabo, Geography IX.3.6. The original and modern columns retain Burton's Delos, with the discrepancy recorded here.

[5402] Editor. Revelation 14:20 supplies the distance of 1,600 stadia, but the blood comes from the winepress in the biblical passage. Burton prints de terrâ, "from the earth," which is translated as printed. Ribera's deduction of a diameter and the Italian-mile figure are reported, not endorsed.

But Lessius lib. 13. de moribus divinis cap. 24. will have this locall hell far less, one Dutch mile in Diameter, all filled with fire and brimstone: because, as he there demonstrates, that space Cubically multiplied, will make a Sphere able to hold eight hundred thousand millions of damned bodies (allowing each body six foot square) which will abundantly suffice; Cum certum sit, inquit, factâ subductione, non futuros centies mille milliones damnandorum.	But Lessius, in book 13, chapter 24 of On the Divine Attributes, makes this physically situated hell far smaller: one Dutch mile in diameter, filled with fire and brimstone. For, as he demonstrates there, that distance cubed will produce a sphere capable of holding eight hundred thousand million damned bodies, allowing each body six feet square; and that will be more than enough. "For it is certain," he says, "when the calculation is made, that there will not be a hundred thousand million people to be damned."[5403]
But if it be no materiall fire (as Sco. Thomas, Bonaventure, Soncinas, Voscius, and others argue it may be) there or elsewhere, as Keckerman disputes System. Theol. for sure somewhere it is, certum est alicubi, etsi definitus circulus non assignetur.	But if it is not a material fire—as Scotus, Thomas, Bonaventure, Soncinas, Voscius, and others argue may be the case—whether there or elsewhere, as Keckermann discusses in his System of Theology, then surely it is somewhere: "It certainly exists somewhere, even though no definite region is assigned to it."[5404]

[5403] Editor. "Subduction" is calculation, not geological subsidence. Centies mille milliones means one hundred thousand million (100 billion); Burton's preceding eight hundred thousand millions is 800 billion. The Dutch mile is a historical regional measure. His "six foot square" and argument about a sphere are retained without silently repairing the dimensional reasoning. The Lessius passage itself remains to be collated.

[5404] Editor. The source prints "Sco. Thomas" without a separating comma; the modern version provisionally reads Scotus and Thomas as separate names. Burton's compressed claim about immaterial fire is retained, but the individual theologians' positions have not been verified. "Circulus" is rendered region rather than imposing a geometric circle on the argument.

I will end the controversie in [5405]Austins words. Better doubt of things concealed, than to contend about uncertainties, where Abrahams bosome is, and hell fire: [5406]Vix à mansuetis, à contentiosis nunquam invenitur; scarce the meek, the contentious shall never finde.	I will end the controversy in Augustine's words: "Better to remain in doubt about hidden things than to argue over uncertainties: where Abraham's bosom is, and hellfire." "It is scarcely found by the gentle, and never by the contentious"; scarcely will the meek find it, and those who quarrel never will.[5407]
If it be solid earth, 'tis the fountain of metals, waters, which by his innate temper turns Aire into water, which springs up in severall chinks, to moisten the earths superficies, and that in a tenfold proportion (as Aristotle holds) or else these [5408]fountains come directly from the sea, by secret passages, and so made fresh again, by running through the bowels of the earth: and are either thick, thin, hot, cold, as the matter or minerals are by which they pass;	If it is solid earth, it is the source of metals and waters: by its inherent constitution it turns air into water, which springs up through various fissures to moisten the earth's surface, and does so in a tenfold proportion, as Aristotle holds. Or else these springs come directly from the sea through secret passages and become fresh again by running through the bowels of the earth. They are thick or thin, hot or cold, according to the matter or minerals they pass through.[5409]

[5405] Burton. Printed page 246, c: "Melius dubitare de occultis, quam litigare de incertis, ubi flamma inferni, &c." Translation: Better to remain in doubt about hidden things than to quarrel over uncertainties—where the flame of hell is, and so on.

[5406] Burton. Printed page 246, d: "See Dr. Raynolds prælect. 55. in Apoc." See Dr Rainolds's fifty-fifth lecture on Revelation.

[5407] Editor. Abraham's bosom evokes Luke 16:22–23. Peter Lombard, Sentences IV, distinction 50, chapter 4, quotes Augustine on Lazarus and the rich man: both Burton's maxim about hidden and uncertain things and his following contrast between meek and contentious seekers occur together there. The question concerns how to understand the bodily images of the afterlife. This establishes a textual parallel, not Lombard as Burton's immediate source; Rainolds's lecture 55 and Augustine's original wording still require direct collation.

[5408] Burton. Printed page 246, e: "As they come from the Sea, so they return to the Sea again by secret passages, as in all likelihood the Caspian Sea vents it self into the Euxine or Ocean." Modern English: As they come from the sea, so they return to it through hidden passages, just as, in all likelihood, the Caspian Sea empties itself into the Black Sea or the ocean.

[5409] Editor. "Temper" is inherent constitution or mixture of qualities. The competing accounts explain springs through transformation of air, underground seawater, or rainfall. "Tenfold proportion" is left as Burton states it because the precise comparison is not supplied. His marginal conjecture about the Caspian's outlet is preserved as a conjecture.

Source page 246–247 or as Peter Martyr Ocean. Decad. lib. 9. and some others hold, from [5410]abundance of rain that fals, or from that ambient heat and cold, which alters that inward heat, and so per consequens the generation of waters. Or else it may be full of winde, or a sulphureous innate fire, as our Meteorologists enform us, which sometimes breaking out, causeth those horrible Earth-quakes, which are so frequent in these dayes in Japan, China, and oftentimes swallow up whole Cities.	Or, as Peter Martyr holds in book 9 of his Decades of the Ocean, along with others, the waters may come from abundant rainfall; or from the surrounding heat and cold, which alter the heat within and consequently the production of water. Or the earth may be full of wind, or of an inherent sulphurous fire, as our writers on natural phenomena tell us. This sometimes breaks out and causes those dreadful earthquakes that are so frequent these days in Japan and China and often swallow whole cities.[5411]
Source page 247 Let Lucians Menippus consult with or aske of Tiresias, if you will not beleeve Philosophers, he shall clear all your doubts when he makes a second voiage.	Let Lucian's Menippus consult or question Tiresias, if you will not believe the philosophers: he will clear up all your doubts when he makes a second voyage.[5412]

[5410] Burton. Printed page 246, f: "Seneca quæst. lib. cap. 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12. de causis aquarum perpetuis." Translation: Seneca, Natural Questions, book [number not supplied], chapters 3–12, on the enduring causes of waters.

[5411] Editor. "Meteorologists" here are writers on natural and atmospheric phenomena in a broader early modern sense. The proposed causes of earthquakes belong to that account of nature. Peter Martyr's book number lacks a specified decade, and the Seneca margin omits its book number; these are not silently completed.

[5412] Editor. In Lucian's Menippus, or A Necromantic Experiment, Menippus does consult the dead seer Tiresias, who counsels an ordinary life and rejection of excessive speculation. Burton imagines sending him back to solve the questions that the philosophers leave open.

In the mean time let us consider of that which is sub dio, and finde out a true cause, if it be possible, of such accidents, Meteors, alterations, as happen above ground. Whence proceed that variety of manners, and a distinct character (as it were) to severall nations? Some are wise, subtill, witty; others dull, sad and heavy; some big, some little, as Tully de Fato, Plato in Timæo, Vegetius and Bodine proves at large, method. cap. 5. some soft, and some hardy, barbarous, civill, black, dun, white, is it from the aire, from the soyle, influence of stars, or some other secret cause?	Meanwhile, let us consider what lies "under the open sky" and discover, if possible, the true cause of the events, atmospheric phenomena, and changes that occur above ground. What produces that variety of customs and gives different nations a distinct character, so to speak? Some are wise, subtle, quick-witted; others dull, gloomy, and slow. Some are large, some small, as Cicero in On Fate, Plato in the Timaeus, Vegetius, and Bodin in chapter 5 of his Method explain at length. Some are soft, others hardy; barbarous or civilized; black, brown, or white. Does this come from the air, the soil, the influence of the stars, or some other hidden cause?[5413]
Why doth Africa breed so many venemous beasts, Ireland none? Athens Owles, Creet none? [5414]Why hath Daulis and Thebes no Swallowes (so Pausanias informeth us) as well as the rest of Greece, [5415]Ithaca no Hares, Pontus Asses, Scythia Swine? whence come this variety of complexions, colours, plants, birds, beasts, [5416]metals, peculiar almost to every place?	Why does Africa produce so many venomous animals, and Ireland none? Why does Athens have owls, and Crete none? Why do Daulis and Thebes have no swallows, as Pausanias tells us, although the rest of Greece does? Why has Ithaca no hares, Pontus no asses, Scythia no swine? Where does this variety of constitutions, colours, plants, birds, beasts, and metals come from, almost every place having its own?[5417]

[5413] Editor. Burton now moves from the earth's interior to conditions at its surface. His labels for peoples and his proposed links between bodily constitution, character, and climate express historical classifications and prejudices. They are preserved as his language and questions, not presented as present-day findings.

[5414] Burton. Printed page 247, asterisk: "In iis nec pullos hirundines excludunt, nec, &c." Translation: In those places swallows do not hatch their young, nor, and so on. The note ends in an abbreviated, unfinished clause.

[5415] Burton. Printed page 247, dagger: "Th. Ravennas lib. de vit. hom. prærog. ca. ult." Thomas of Ravenna, book on the prerogatives of human life, final chapter; the abbreviated citation is retained pending identification and collation.

[5416] Burton. Printed page 247, x: "At Quito in Peru. Plus auri quam terræ foditur in aurifodinis." Translation: At Quito in Peru, more gold than earth is dug from the gold mines.

[5417] Editor. "Complexions" includes bodily constitutions, not only skin colours. Pausanias, Description of Greece X.4.8–9, reports that swallows do not breed at Daulis and links this to the myth of Tereus and Philomela. The Thebes claim and the other animals' reported absences have not been verified; Burton's compressed omissions are expanded as "no asses" and "no swine."

Why so many thousand strange birds and beasts proper to America alone, as Acosta demands lib. 4. cap. 36. were they created in the six dayes, or ever in Noahs Arke? if there, why are they not dispersed and found in other countries? It is a thing (saith he) hath long held me in suspence; no Greek, Latine, Hebrew ever heard of them before, and yet as differing from our European animals, as an egg and a chestnut: and which is more, kine, horses, sheep, &c. till the Spaniards brought them were never heard of in those parts?	Why are so many thousands of strange birds and beasts found only in America, as Acosta asks in book 4, chapter 36? Were they created in the six days, or ever present in Noah's Ark? If they were there, why have they not spread and been found in other countries? "It is a question," he says, "that has long left me uncertain. No Greek, Latin, or Hebrew writer had ever heard of them before, and yet they differ from our European animals as much as an egg from a chestnut." What is more, cattle, horses, sheep, and so on were unheard of in those regions until the Spaniards brought them.[5418]
How comes it to pass, that in the same site, in one Latitude, to such as are Periæci, there should be such difference of soyle, complexion, colour, metall, aire, &c. The Spaniards are white, and so are Italians, when as the Inhabitants about [5419]Caput bonæ spei are Blackmores, and yet both alike distant from the Æquator:	How does it happen that places in the same geographical position and latitude, inhabited by the people called perioeci, differ so much in soil, constitution, colour, metals, climate, and so on? Spaniards are white, and so are Italians, whereas the inhabitants around the Cape of Good Hope are Black people, and yet both are equally far from the equator.[5420]

[5418] Editor. Acosta, Natural and Moral History of the Indies IV.36, asks how animals peculiar to America fit the Creation and Noah's Ark. Burton's passage is a compressed retelling; its entire wording should not be treated as an exact quotation from Acosta. "Kine" means cattle; "an egg and a chestnut" is a comparison of unlike things.

[5419] Burton. Printed page 247, y: "Ad Caput bonæ spei incolæ sunt nigerrimi: Si sol causa, cur non Hispani & Itali æq. nigri, in eadem latitudine, æque distantes ab Æquatore, hi ad Austrum, illi ad Boream? qui sub Presbytero Johan. habitant subfusci sunt, in Zeilan & Malabar nigri, æque distantes ab Æquatore, eodemque cœli parallelo: sed hoc magis mirari quis possit, in tota America nusquam nigros inveniri, præter paucos in loco Quareno illis dicto: quæ hujus coloris causa efficiens, cœlive an terræ qualitas, an soli proprietas, aut ipsorum hominum innata ratio, aut omnia? Ortelius in Africa Theat." Translation: At the Cape of Good Hope the inhabitants are very black. If the sun is the cause, why are Spaniards and Italians not equally black, at the same latitude and equally distant from the equator, the former to the south and the latter to the north? Those who live under Prester John are brownish; those in Ceylon and Malabar are black, though equally distant from the equator and on the same parallel of the heavens. But one might wonder still more that nowhere in all America are Black people found, apart from a few in a place they call Quareno. What is the efficient cause of this colour: a quality of the sky or the earth, a property of the soil, an inborn constitution of the people themselves, or all of these? Ortelius, Africa, in the Theatre of the World.

[5420] Editor. Perioeci are people living on the same latitude around the earth. Burton's examples also compare places on opposite sides of the equator; the argument and geographical inconsistencies are retained. Caput bonæ spei is the Cape of Good Hope. His Blackmores and Negros are rendered "Black people" here. Ortelius's extensive marginal question is translated separately, including its claim about America.

nay, they that dwell in the same parallel line with these Negros, as about the Straights of Magellan, are white coloured, and yet some in Presbyter Johns country in Æthiopia are dun: they in Zeilan and Malabar parallel with them again black: Manamotapa in Africk, and St. Thomas Isle are extreme hot, both under the line, cole black their Inhabitants, whereas in Peru they are quite opposite in colour, very temperate, or rather cold, and yet both alike elevated.	Indeed, those who live on the same parallel as these Black people, around the Strait of Magellan, have white complexions; yet some in Prester John's country in Ethiopia are brown, while the people of Ceylon and Malabar, on a parallel with them, are black again. Monomotapa in Africa and the island of São Tomé are extremely hot, both on the equator, with coal-black inhabitants; whereas in Peru the people are quite the opposite in colour, the climate very temperate or rather cold, and yet the latitude is the same.[5421]
Mosco in 53. degrees of latitude is extreme cold, as those Northern countries usually are, having one perpetuall hard frost all winter long: and in 52. deg. lat. sometimes hard frost and snow all summer, as in Buttons Bay, &c. or by fits; and yet [5422]England neere the same Latitude, and Ireland, very moist, warme, and more temperate in Winter than Spain, Italy, or France.	Moscow, at fifty-three degrees latitude, is extremely cold, as those northern countries generally are, with one continuous hard frost throughout the winter. At fifty-two degrees latitude there is sometimes hard frost and snow all summer, as in Button's Bay and elsewhere, or at intervals. Yet England, at nearly the same latitude, and Ireland are very moist, warm, and milder in winter than Spain, Italy, or France.[5423]

[5421] Editor. Zeilan is Ceylon, now Sri Lanka; Malabar is on India's southwestern coast. Prester John is the legendary Christian ruler associated here with Ethiopia. Monomotapa and São Tomé are retained as Burton pairs them; the claim that both lie on the equator is not corrected inside the text. "Elevated" here concerns latitude or the elevation of the pole, rather than altitude above sea level.

[5422] Burton. Printed page 247, z: "Regio quocunque anni tempore temperatissima. Ortel. Multas Galliæ & Italiæ Regiones, molli tepore, & benigna quadam temperie prorsus antecellit, Jovi." Translation: A region most temperate at every season of the year. Ortelius. In gentle warmth and a certain kindly mildness it altogether surpasses many regions of France and Italy. Giovio.

[5423] Editor. Burton's latitude figures, seasonal claims, and comparisons are preserved as reported, not recalculated. Button's Bay belongs to the northern North American travel geography he is discussing. The two warm-climate endorsements in the margin are likewise retained without reconciling them with the body's comparisons.

Is it the sea that causeth this difference, and the Aire that comes from it: Why then is [5424]Ister so cold neere the Euxine, Pontus, Bithinia, and all Thrace; frigidas regiones Magnus calls them, and yet their latitude is but 42. which should be hot: [5425]Quevira, or Nova Albion in America, bordering on the sea, was so cold in [5426]July, that our Englishmen could hardly endure it.	Is the sea responsible for this difference, and the air that comes from it? Why then is the Danube so cold near the Black Sea, along with Pontus, Bithynia, and all Thrace? Magnus calls them "cold regions," yet their latitude is only forty-two degrees, which ought to be hot. Quivira, or New Albion in America, bordering the sea, was so cold in July that our Englishmen could scarcely bear it.[5427]
Source page 247–248 At Noremberga in 45. lat. all the sea is frozen Ice, and yet in a more Southern latitude than ours. New England, and the Iland of Cambrioll Colchos, which that noble Gentleman Mr Vaughan, or Orpheus Iunior, describes in his Golden Fleece, is in the same latitude with little Britaine in France, and yet their winter begins not till January, their Spring till May; which search he accounts worthy of an Astrologer:	At Norumbega, in latitude forty-five degrees, the whole sea is frozen, though it lies farther south than we do. New England and the island of Cambriol Colchos, which that noble gentleman Mr Vaughan, or Orpheus Junior, describes in his Golden Fleece, lie at the same latitude as Brittany in France; yet their winter does not begin until January, and their spring until May. He considers the investigation worthy of an astrologer.[5428]
Source page 248 is this from the Easterly winds, or melting of ice and snow dissolved within the circle Artick; or that the aire being thick, is longer before it be warm by the Sun beams, and once heated like an oven will keep it self from cold?	Does this come from easterly winds, or from melting ice and snow within the Arctic Circle? Or is it because the air is dense and takes longer to be warmed by the sun's rays, but once heated, like an oven, keeps out the cold?

[5425] Burton. Printed page 247, b: "Quevira lat. 40." Quivira, latitude 40 degrees.

[5426] Burton. Printed page 247, c: "In Sir Fra. Drakes voiage" In Sir Francis Drake's voyage.

[5427] Editor. Ister is the Danube; Euxine is the Black Sea. The margin gives the Danube's latitude as 45 degrees, while the body's broader comparison uses 42; Quivira is separately assigned 40. Burton associates Quivira with New Albion and cites Drake's voyage for the cold. These identifications and figures remain to be collated.

[5428] Editor. Noremberga is Norumbega in the North American geographical tradition, not Nuremberg. Cambriol Colchos refers to William Vaughan's Newfoundland enterprise; The Golden Fleece appeared under his name Orpheus Junior. The Dictionary of Canadian Biography cautions against assuming its title proves he visited Newfoundland. Burton's dates for winter and spring are retained, and "astrologer" is not silently narrowed to a modern profession.

Our Climes breed lice, [5429]Hungary and Ireland malè audiunt in this kinde; come to the Azores, by a secret vertue of that aire they are instantly consumed, and all our European vermine almost, saith Ortelius. Egypt is watred with Nilus not far from the sea, and yet there it seldome or never rains: Rhodes, an Iland of the same nature, yeelds not a cloud, and yet our Ilands ever dropping and inclining to rain.	Our climates breed lice; Hungary and Ireland have a bad reputation in this respect. Go to the Azores, and by some hidden power of the air they are instantly destroyed, along with almost all our European vermin, according to Ortelius.[5430] Egypt is watered by the Nile not far from the sea, yet there it seldom or never rains. Rhodes, an island of the same nature, produces not a cloud, yet our islands are always dripping and tending towards rain.
The Atlantick Ocean is still subject to storms, but in Del Zur, or Mari pacifico, seldome or never any. Is it from Topick stars, apertio portarum, in the Dodecotemories or constellations, the Moons mansions, such aspects of Planets, such winds, or dissolving ayre, or thick ayre, which causeth this and the like differences of heat and cold?	The Atlantic Ocean is continually subject to storms, but in the South Sea, or Pacific Ocean, there are seldom or never any. Do these and similar differences of heat and cold come from stars governing particular places, an "opening of the gates" in the divisions of the zodiac or constellations, the mansions of the moon, particular aspects of the planets, particular winds, or air that is dissolving or dense?[5431]

[5430] Editor. "Secret vertue" means an unexplained natural power. The charge against Hungary and Ireland and the claim that Azorean air destroys vermin are reports Burton repeats, not findings verified here. Lansius's precise oration and Ortelius's passage remain uncollated.

[5431] Editor. "Topick" means local, here stars associated with places. Dodecotemories are twelvefold zodiacal divisions; lunar mansions divide the moon's path. "Opening of the gates" is an astrological weather term. "Aspects" are angular relationships of celestial bodies. The sequence offers competing explanations, not settled causes. "Del Zur" names the South Sea, the Pacific.

Bodin relates of a Portugal Embassadour, that coming from [5432]Lisbon to [5433]Dantzick in Spruce, found greater heat there than at any time at home. Don Garcia de Sylva, Legat to Philip 3. King of Spain, residing at Spahan in Persia 1619. in his letter to the Marques of Bedmar, makes mention of greater cold in Spahan, whose lat. is 31. gr. than ever he felt in Spain, or any part of Europe.	Bodin tells of a Portuguese ambassador who, on coming from Lisbon to Danzig in Prussia, found greater heat there than he had ever experienced at home. Don García de Silva, envoy of Philip III, King of Spain, was staying at Isfahan in Persia in 1619. In his letter to the Marquis of Bedmar, he mentions greater cold at Isfahan, whose latitude is 31 degrees, than he had ever felt in Spain or any part of Europe.[5434]
The torrid Zone was by our predecessors held to be inhabitable, but by our moderne travelers found to be most temperate, bedewed with frequent rains, and moistning showers, the Brise and cooling blasts in some parts, as [5435]Acosta describes, most pleasant and fertile. Arica in Chili is by report one of the sweetest places that ever the Sun shined on, Olympus terræ, an heaven on earth: how incomparably do some extoll Mexico in Nova Hispania, Peru, Brasile? &c. in some again hard, dry, sandy, barren, a very Desert, and still in the same latitude.	Our predecessors thought the torrid zone uninhabitable, but modern travellers have found it exceptionally temperate, refreshed by frequent rains and moistening showers, with the trade wind and cooling breezes in some parts; as Acosta describes it, most pleasant and fertile.[5436] Arica in Chile is reportedly one of the sweetest places the sun ever shone on, an "Olympus on earth," a heaven on earth. How extravagantly some praise Mexico in New Spain, Peru, Brazil, and so on! Yet elsewhere the land is hard, dry, sandy, barren—a veritable desert—and still at the same latitude.

[5434] Editor. "Spruce" means Prussia; Danzig is Gdańsk. The envoy is García de Silva y Figueroa. The latitude figures, date, and comparative temperatures remain Burton's reported details. "Altitude" in the following geographical discussion can mean latitude rather than elevation above sea level.

[5435] Burton. Printed page 248, asterisk: "De nat. novi orbis lib. 1. cap. 9. Suavissimus omnium locus, &c." Translation: On the Nature of the New World, book 1, chapter 9. The most delightful place of all, and so on.

[5436] Editor. Here "inhabitable" has the negative sense uninhabitable. The torrid zone is the region between the tropics. "Brise" is a prevailing tropical wind, rendered trade wind. Acosta challenges the supposed uninhabitability of the tropics in Natural and Moral History II; the exact Latin citation in Burton's margin remains to be collated.

Many times we finde great [5437]diversity of aire in the same country, by reason of the site to seas, hills, or dales, want of water, nature of soil, and the like: as in Spain Arragon is aspera & sicca, harsh and evill inhabited: Estremadura is dry, sandy, barren most part, extreme hot by reason of his plains, Andaluzia another Paradise, Valence a most pleasant aire, and continually green; so is it about [5438]Granado, on the one side fertile plains, on the other, continuall snow to be seen all Summer long on the hill tops.	We often find great differences of climate within the same country, owing to its position in relation to seas, hills, or valleys, lack of water, the nature of the soil, and so on. In Spain, for example, Aragon is "rugged and dry," harsh and poorly inhabited. Extremadura is dry, sandy, and mostly barren, extremely hot because of its plains; Andalusia is another Paradise; Valencia has a most pleasant climate and is continually green. So it is around Granada: fertile plains on one side, while on the other snow can be seen continually on the hilltops all summer long.[5439]
That their houses in the Alpes are three quarters of the yeer covered with snow, who knows not? That Tenariffa is so cold at the top, extreme hot at the bottome: Mons Atlas in Africk, Libanus in Palestina, with many such, tantos inter ardores fidos nivibus, [5440]Tacitus calls them, and Radzivilius epist. 2. fol. 27. yeelds it to be far hotter there than in any part of Italy: 'tis true: but they be highly elevated, near the middle Region, and therefore cold, ob paucam solarium radiorum refractionem, as Serrarius answers, com. in 3. cap. Josua quæst. 5. Abulensis quæst. 37.	Who does not know that their houses in the Alps are covered with snow for three quarters of the year? Or that Tenerife is so cold at the top and extremely hot at the bottom? Mount Atlas in Africa, Lebanon in Palestine, and many others are, as Tacitus calls them, "faithful to snow amid such great heats"; and Radziwiłł, in letter 2, folio 27, allows that it is far hotter there than in any part of Italy.[5441] True: but they rise high, near the middle region of the air, and are therefore cold, "because of the scant refraction of the sun's rays," as Serarius answers in his commentary on Joshua 3, question 5; Abulensis, question 37.[5442]

[5437] Burton. Printed page 248, f: "The same variety of weather Lod. Guicciardine observes betwixt Liege and Ajax not far distant, descript. Belg." Modern English: Lodovico Guicciardini observes the same difference in weather between Liège and Ajax, not far apart, in his Description of the Low Countries.

[5438] Burton. Printed page 248, g: "Magin. Quadus." Magini; Quad. No precise works or locations are supplied.

[5439] Editor. Burton shifts from broad latitude comparisons to local terrain and exposure. "Evill inhabited" is rendered poorly inhabited without deciding whether it describes the settlement or its inhabitants. The margin prints "Ajax"; its intended locality is unresolved and is retained rather than silently changed.

[5440] Burton. Printed page 248, asterisk: "Hist. lib. 5." Histories, book 5; the citation accompanies Tacitus.

[5441] Editor. Tacitus, Histories V.6, applies the image of fidelity to snow specifically to Lebanon. Burton adapts it into a plural description. "Libanus" is Lebanon; the location names and Radziwiłł's comparative claim are preserved without treating them as a measured climatic survey.

[5442] Editor. The "middle region" belongs to the older division of the air into regions, with a cold middle layer. Burton prints refraction, which is retained; it is not silently replaced by reflection or by a modern account of temperature and altitude. The Serarius and Abulensis passages remain uncollated.

Source page 248–249 In the heat of summer, in the Kings Palace in Escuriall the aire is most temperate, by reason of a cold blast which comes from the snowie mountains of Sierra de Cadarma hard by, when as in Toledo it is very hot; so in all other countries. The causes of these alterations are commonly by reason of their neereness (I say) to the middle Region: but this diversity of aire, in places equally site elevated and distant from the Pole, can hardly be satisfied with that diversity of Plants, Birds, Beasts, which is so familiar with us: with Indians, every where, the Sun is equally distant, the same verticall stars, the same irradiations of Planets, Aspects alike, the same neerness of seas, the same superficies, the same soyl, or not much different.	In the heat of summer, the air at the king's palace of the Escorial is exceptionally temperate because of a cold blast from the nearby snowy mountains of the Sierra de Cadarma, while at Toledo it is very hot. The same is true in all other countries. The causes of these variations commonly lie, I say, in their nearness to the middle region. Yet the differences of climate between places equally situated, elevated, and distant from the pole are hard to account for, together with the differences in plants, birds, and animals so familiar to us. Among the peoples of the Indies, everywhere the sun is equally distant, the same stars stand overhead, the planets cast the same rays and have similar aspects; the nearness of the seas, the surface of the land, and the soil are the same, or not very different.[5443]
Source page 249 Under the Equator it self, amongst the Sierra's, Andes, Lanes, as Herrera, Laet, and [5444]Acosta contend, there is tam mirabilis & inopinata varietas, such variety of weather, ut merito exerceat ingenia, that no Philosophy can yet finde out the true cause of it.	Beneath the equator itself, among the Sierras, Andes, and Lanes, as Herrera, de Laet, and Acosta maintain, there is "such wonderful and unexpected variety," such variety of weather, "as well deserves to exercise our minds": no philosophy can yet discover its true cause.[5445]

[5443] Editor. Sierra de Cadarma is the source's name for the range near the Escorial, normally identified as the Guadarrama. The sentence beginning "but this diversity" is compressed and awkward; the translation reads the climatic and biological diversity as combined difficulties for explanation. No missing causal theory is supplied.

[5444] Burton. Printed page 249, asterisk: "Lib. 11. ca. 7." Book 11, chapter 7, as printed; the reference accompanies Acosta and requires correction or collation.

[5445] Editor. "Lanes" is retained as printed, probably referring to plains or llanos. Both Latin phrases and Burton's intervening English gloss are represented. The margin reads "Lib. 11. ca. 7."; no book 11 occurs in Acosta's seven-book Natural and Moral History. Book II.7 discusses tropical rainfall, but the exact intended locator is not silently substituted.

When I consider how temperate it is in one place, saith [5446]Acosta, within the Tropick of Capricorn, as about La-plate, and yet hard by at Potosi, in that same altitude, mountainous alike, extreme cold; extreme hot in Brasile, &c. Hic ego, saith Acosta, philosophiam Aristotelis meteorologicam vehementer irrisi, cùm, &c. when the Sun comes neerest to them, they have great tempests, storms, thunder and lightning, great store of rain, snow: and the foulest weather: when the Sun is verticall, their rivers over-flow, the morning fair and hot, noon day cold and moist: all which is opposite to us. How comes it to pass?	"When I consider," says Acosta, "how temperate it is in one place within the Tropic of Capricorn, as around La Plata, and yet how extremely cold nearby Potosí is, at the same latitude and equally mountainous; and how extremely hot Brazil is," and so on. "Here," Acosta says, "I heartily laughed at Aristotle's meteorological philosophy, when," and so on.[5447] When the sun comes nearest to them, they have great tempests, storms, thunder and lightning, abundant rain and snow, and the foulest weather. When the sun is directly overhead, their rivers overflow; the morning is fine and hot, midday cold and wet—all the opposite of our experience. How does this happen?
Scaliger poetices l. 3. c. 16. discourseth thus of this subject. How comes, or wherefore is this temeraria syderum dispositio, this rash placing of Stars, or as Epicurus will, fortuita, or accidentall? Why are some big, some little, why are they so confusedly, unequally site in the heavens, and set so much out of order?	Scaliger discusses the subject in this way in book 3, chapter 16 of his Poetics. How does this "haphazard arrangement of the stars" come about, this rash placing of stars—or, as Epicurus would have it, "fortuitous," or accidental? Why are some large and others small? Why are they placed so confusedly and unevenly in the heavens, so much out of order?
In all other things Nature is equall, proportionable, and constant; there be justæ dimensiones, & prudens partium dispositio, as in the fabrick of man, his eyes, ears, nose, face, members are correspondent, cur non idem cælo opere omnium pulcherrimo? Why are the heavens so irregular, neque paribus molibus, neque paribus intervallis, whence is this difference?	In everything else Nature is even, proportionate, and consistent: there are "proper dimensions and a wise arrangement of parts," as in the structure of a human being, whose eyes, ears, nose, face, and limbs correspond. "Why is it not the same with heaven, the most beautiful work of all?" Why are the heavens so irregular, "with neither equal masses nor equal intervals"? Where does this difference come from?

[5446] Burton. Printed page 249, dagger: "Lib. 2. cap. 9. Cur Potosa & Plata, urbes in tam tenui intervallo, utraque montosa, &c." Translation: Book 2, chapter 9. Why Potosí and La Plata, cities so short a distance apart, both mountainous, and so on. The abbreviated question is left incomplete.

[5447] Editor. "La-plate" belongs to the Peruvian discussion. Acosta II.9 places his laughter at Aristotle during an equatorial sea crossing and contrasts cold Potosí with hot Brazil. It does not supply Burton's exact La Plata comparison. The Latin excerpt and margin remain uncollated; "when, etc." is unfinished in Burton.

Diversos (he concludes) efficere locorum Genios, to make diversity of countries, soils, maners, customs, characters and constitutions among us, ut quantum vicinia ad charitatem addat, sydera distrahant ad perniciem, and so by this means fluvio vel monte distincti sunt dissimiles, the same places almost shall be distinguished in manners. But this reason is weak and most unsufficient.	"To produce different spirits of places," he concludes: to create among us differences of countries, soils, manners, customs, characters, and constitutions, "so that whatever nearness contributes to affection, the stars may pull apart towards destruction." Thus, by these means, "people separated by a river or mountain are unlike": places almost identical will differ in their manners. But this explanation is weak and wholly inadequate.[5448]
The fixed stars are removed since Ptolomies time 26. gr. from the first of Aries, and if the earth be immovable, as their site varies, so should countries vary, and divers alterations would follow. But this we perceive not; as in Tullies time with us in Britain, cælum visu fædum, & in quo facilè generantur nubes, &c. 'tis so still.	Since Ptolemy's time, the fixed stars have shifted twenty-six degrees from the beginning of Aries. If the earth is immovable, countries should change as the stars' positions change, and various alterations should follow. Yet we see no such thing. As in Cicero's time, so still in our Britain: "the sky is foul to look at, and clouds form readily in it," and so on.[5449]

[5448] Editor. Scaliger's Latin and Burton's accompanying English paraphrases are separately represented. "Genii" can suggest presiding spirits or distinctive local characters; the literal spirits are retained because Bodin's angels follow. Burton expressly rejects the explanation. The precise passage in Poetics III.16 remains uncollated.

[5449] Editor. The twenty-six degrees concern the fixed stars' changing relation to the equinoctial beginning of the zodiac; the figure is Burton's. "Tully" is Cicero, but this quotation remains unlocated in him. Tacitus, Agricola 12, describes Britain's sky as disfigured by frequent rain and mist. That is a close parallel in subject and wording, not an exact match for Burton's sentence or proof of its immediate source; the attribution is retained.

Wherefore Bodine Theat. nat. lib. 2. and some others, will have all these alterations and effects immediately to proceed from those Genii, Spirits, Angels, which rule and domineer in severall places; they cause storms, thunder, lightnings, earthquakes, ruins, tempests, great winds, floods, &c. the Philosophers of Coimbra, will refer this diversity to the influence of that Empirean Heaven: for some say the Exentricity of the Sun is come neerer to the earth than in Ptolomies time, the vertue therefore of all the vegetals is decayed, [5450]men grow less, &c.	Therefore Bodin, in book 2 of his Theatre of Nature, and some others maintain that all these changes and effects proceed directly from the genii, spirits, or angels that rule and hold sway in different places. They cause storms, thunder, lightning, earthquakes, destruction, tempests, great winds, floods, and so on. The philosophers of Coimbra attribute this diversity to the influence of the Empyrean heaven. Some say that the sun's eccentric path has come nearer to the earth than in Ptolemy's time, and that consequently the power of all plants has declined, people grow smaller, and so on.[5451]
Source page 249–250 There are that observe new motions of the Heavens, new Stars, palantia sydera, Comets, Clouds, call them what you will, like those Medecean, Burbonian, Austrian planets lately detected, which do not decay, but come and go, rise higher and lower, hide and shew themselves amongst the fixed Stars, amongst the Planets, above & beneath the Moon, set times, now neerer, now farther off, together, asunder; as he that plaies upon a Sagbut by pulling it up and down alters his tones and tunes, do they their stations and places, though to us undiscerned; and from those motions proceed (as they conceive) divers alterations. Clavius conjectures otherwise, but they be but conjectures.	Some observe new motions of the heavens, new stars, "wandering stars," comets, clouds—call them what you will—like those recently discovered Medicean, Bourbon, and Austrian planets. These do not perish, but come and go, rise higher and lower, hide and show themselves among the fixed stars and the planets, above and below the moon, at set times; now nearer, now farther away, together, apart. Just as a player on a sackbut changes his notes and tunes by pulling it up and down, so they change their positions and places, though we do not perceive it. From these movements, they believe, various changes proceed. Clavius conjectures otherwise, but they are only conjectures.[5452]

[5450] Burton. Printed page 249, h: "Terra malos homines nunc educat atque pusillos." Translation: The earth now breeds men both wicked and puny.

[5451] Editor. The Coimbra philosophers are the Jesuit commentators associated with that university. The Empyrean is the highest heaven in the cosmology invoked here. "Eccentricity" concerns the off-centre solar scheme, not simply the modern numerical eccentricity of an ellipse. The marginal line is Juvenal, Satire XV.70: moral and physical degeneration are coupled in a satirical verse.

[5452] Editor. "Sagbut" is a sackbut, an early trombone. The instrument's slide supplies Burton's image for changing celestial positions. "Medicean" names Galileo's four Jovian satellites; the Bourbon and Austrian labels invoke competing patronal names in early telescopic astronomy. Their exact referents in Burton's compressed grouping remain unresolved; the passage does not describe one modern class of object.

Source page 250 About Damascus in Cœli-Syria is a [5453]Paradise, by reason of the plenty of waters, in promptu causa est, & the Desarts of Arabia barren, because of rockes, rolling seas of sands, and dry mountaines, quod inaquosa (saith Adricomius) montes habens asperos, saxosos, præcipites, horroris & mortis speciem præ se ferentes, unhabitable therefore of men, birds, beasts, void of all greene trees, plants & fruits, a vast rocky horrid wilderness, which by no art can be manured, 'tis evident. Bohemia is cold, for that it lyes all along to the North.	The country around Damascus in Coele-Syria is a Paradise because of the abundance of water: "the cause is plain." The deserts of Arabia are barren because of rocks, rolling seas of sand, and dry mountains: "because the land is waterless," says Adricomius, "with mountains rugged, rocky, precipitous, presenting an image of horror and death." It is therefore uninhabitable by people, birds, and beasts, without green trees, plants, or fruits: a vast, rocky, dreadful wilderness that no skill can cultivate. This is evident. Bohemia is cold because it lies far to the north.[5454]
But why should it be so hot in Egypt, or there never rain? Why should those [5455]Etesian & North-Eastern winds blow continually and constantly so long together, in some places, at set times, one way still, in the dog-dayes only: here perpetual drought, there dropping showers; here foggy mists, there a pleasant Aire; here [5456]terrible thunder and lightning at such set seasons, here frozen seas all the yeare, there open in the same latitude, to the rest no such thing, nay quite opposite is to be found?	But why should Egypt be so hot, or never have rain? Why should those Etesian and north-easterly winds blow continually and steadily for so long in some places, at set times, always in one direction, only during the dog days? Why perpetual drought here and falling showers there; foggy mists here and pleasant air there; terrible thunder and lightning at particular seasons here; seas frozen all year here and open at the same latitude there, while elsewhere nothing like this occurs—indeed, quite the opposite?[5457]

[5453] Burton. Printed page 250, i: "Nav. l. 1. c. 5." Nav., book 1, chapter 5; the abbreviated author or title remains unresolved.

[5454] Editor. Coele-Syria is a historical regional name. "Manured" means cultivated or improved, not merely fertilized. "Adricomius" is Christian van Adrichem. The claims of absolute barrenness and uninhabitability are Burton's generalizations. The margin's "Nav." is retained without a conjectural expansion.

[5455] Burton. Printed page 250, k: "Strabo." Strabo; no book or chapter is supplied.

[5456] Burton. Printed page 250, l: "As under the Æquator in many parts, showres here at such a time, windes at such a time, the Brise they call it." Modern English: As in many places beneath the equator, showers here at one time, winds at another: they call it the Brise.

[5457] Editor. Etesian winds are the annually recurring summer winds associated especially with the eastern Mediterranean. The dog days are the summer season traditionally associated with the Dog Star, Sirius. The dry, wet, frozen, and open-sea comparisons remain questions within Burton's argument.

Sometimes, (as in [5458]Peru) on the one side of the mountaines it is hot, on the other cold, here snow, there winde, with infinite such. Fromundus in his Meteors will excuse or salve all this by the Suns motion, but when there is such diversity to such as Periæci, or very neare site, how can that position hold?	Sometimes, as in Peru, it is hot on one side of the mountains and cold on the other; here snow, there wind, with countless similar differences. Fromondus, in his Meteors, would account for or explain all this by the sun's motion. But when there are such differences between people on the same latitude, or in very nearby places, how can that position hold?[5459]
Who can give a reason of this diversity of Meteors, that it should rain [5460]Stones, Frogs, Mice, &c. Rats, which they call Lemmer in Norway, and are manifestly observed (as [5461]Munster writes) by the Inhabitants, to descend and fall with some fæculent showres, and like so many Locusts, consume all that is green.	Who can explain this variety of atmospheric phenomena: that it should rain stones, frogs, mice, and so on? The rats they call lemmings in Norway are clearly observed by the inhabitants, as Münster writes, to descend and fall in certain filthy showers, and, like so many locusts, devour everything green.[5462]

[5458] Burton. Printed page 250, m: "Ferd. Cortesius lib. Novus orbis inscript." Ferdinand Cortesius, in the book entitled New World; the precise identification remains to be checked.

[5459] Editor. "Salve" means solve or explain a difficulty. Perioeci are inhabitants on the same latitude around the globe. Fromundus is Libert Froidmont, or Fromondus. Burton presses the problem of local differences against an explanation relying on the sun's general motion.

[5460] Burton. Printed page 250, n: "Lapidatum est. Livie." Translation: It rained stones. Livy.

[5461] Burton. Printed page 250, asterisk: "Cosmog. li. 4. ca. 22. Hæ tempestatibus decidunt è nubibus fæculentis, depascunturque more locustorum omnia virentia." Translation: Cosmography, book 4, chapter 22. These fall during storms from filthy clouds and, like locusts, devour everything green.

[5462] Editor. "Meteors" includes many atmospheric phenomena, not only luminous streaks in the sky. Lemmer denotes lemmings. Their alleged descent from clouds is a historical report, not an accepted account of their origin. "Lapidatum est" is a formula for a shower of stones; Burton gives no passage in Livy.

Leo Afer speaks as much of Locusts, about Fez in Barbary there be infinite swarmes in their fields upon a sudden: so at Arles in France 1553. the like happened by the same mischief, all their grass & fruits were devoured, magna incolarum admiratione & consternatione (as Valleriola obser. med. lib. 1. obser. 1. relates) cælum subitò obumbrabant, &c. he concludes, [5463]it could not be from naturall causes, they cannot imagine whence they come, but from heaven.	Leo Africanus says much the same of locusts: around Fez in Barbary, countless swarms suddenly appear in their fields. The same calamity occurred at Arles in France in 1553: all their grass and crops were devoured, "to the great amazement and consternation of the inhabitants," as Valleriola relates in book 1, observation 1 of his Medical Observations. "They suddenly darkened the sky," and so on. He concludes that this could not come from natural causes; they cannot imagine where the creatures come from except heaven.[5464]
Are these and such creatures, corn, wood, stones, worms, wooll, blood, &c. lifted up into the middle Region by the Sun beams, as [5465]Baracellus the Physitian disputes, and thence let fall with showres, or there ingendred? [5466]Cornelius Gemma is of that opinion, they are there conceived by celestiall influences: others suppose they are immediately from God, or prodigies raised by art and illusions of spirits, which are Princes of the ayre; to whom Bodin lib. 2. Theat. Nat. subscribes.	Are these and similar creatures, grain, wood, stones, worms, wool, blood, and so on, lifted into the middle region by the sun's rays, as the physician Baricellus discusses, and then dropped with showers; or are they generated there? Cornelius Gemma holds that view: they are conceived there through celestial influences. Others suppose that they come directly from God, or are prodigies produced by the craft and illusions of spirits, the princes of the air. Bodin subscribes to this view in book 2 of his Theatre of Nature.[5467]

[5463] Burton. Printed page 250, dagger: "Hort. Genial. An à terra sursum rapiuntur à solo iterumque cum pluviis præcipitantur? &c." Translation: The Pleasant Garden. Are they snatched upwards from the earth, from the ground, and hurled down again with the rains? And so on. The margin's reference and question occur beside the conclusion about natural causes.

[5464] Editor. Leo Afer is Leo Africanus; Barbary is the historical North African regional name. "Fruits" here covers agricultural produce. The 1553 Arles account and Valleriola locator have not been independently collated. Burton's marginal question and the next note's rejection of natural causes appear in an awkward order; both are preserved at their printed anchors.

[5465] Burton. Printed page 250, asterisk: "Tam ominosus proventus in naturales causas referri vix potest." Translation: So ominous an occurrence can scarcely be attributed to natural causes. This marginal sentence stands beside Baracellus in the body.

[5467] Editor. The body prints Baracellus, rendered Baricellus in modern English; the reference concerns the physician associated with Hortus genialis. "Princes of the air" draws on the language of spiritual powers. Neither the prodigies nor the proposed occult causes are endorsed by the translation.

In fine, of Meteors in generall, Aristotles reasons are exploded by Bernardinus Telesius, by Paracelsus his Principles confuted, and other causes assigned, Sal, Sulphur, Mercury, in which his Disciples are so expert, that they can alter Elements, and separate at their pleasure, make perpetuall motions, not as Cardan, Tasneir, Peregrinus, by some magneticall vertue, but by mixture of elements;	In short, on atmospheric phenomena generally, Aristotle's explanations are rejected by Bernardino Telesio; his principles are refuted by Paracelsus, and other causes assigned—salt, sulphur, and mercury. Paracelsus's disciples are so expert in these that they can alter elements and separate them at will, produce perpetual motions, not through some magnetic power, as Cardan, Taisnier, and Peregrinus propose, but by mixing elements;
imitate thunder, like Salmoneus, snow, hail, the seas ebbing and flowing, give life to creatures (as they say) without generation, and what not? P. Nonius Saluciensis, and Kepler take upon them to demonstrate, that no Meteors, Clouds, Fogges, [5468]Vapors, arise higher than 50. or 80. miles, and all the rest to be pure aire or Element of fire:	imitate thunder, like Salmoneus, snow, hail, and the ebb and flow of the sea; give life to creatures, so they say, without reproduction—and what else besides?[5469] Pedro Nunes of Alcácer do Sal and Kepler undertake to demonstrate that no atmospheric phenomena, clouds, fogs, or vapours rise higher than fifty or eighty miles, and that all the rest is pure air or the element of fire.
which [5470]Cardan, [5471]Tycho, and [5472]John Pena manifestly confute by refractions, and many other arguments, there is no such element of fire at all. If, as Ticho proves, the Moon be distant from us 50. and 60. Semidiameters of the earth: and as Peter Nonius will have it, the aire be so angust,	Cardan, Tycho, and Jean Pena plainly refute this by refraction and many other arguments: there is no such element of fire at all.[5473] If, as Tycho proves, the moon is fifty or sixty earth radii away from us, and if, as Pedro Nunes maintains, the air occupies so narrow a space,

[5469] Editor. Salt, sulphur, and mercury are Paracelsian explanatory principles, not simply three ingredients in modern chemistry. "Without generation" means without ordinary reproduction. Salmoneus is the mythical imitator of Zeus's thunder; Virgil, Aeneid VI.585–594, describes his imitation and punishment. Burton marks the alchemists' claims with "as they say."

[5473] Editor. "Semidiameters" means radii; "angust" means narrow or confined. The reported fifty or eighty miles, the margin's 288 and 48 miles, and the moon's fifty or sixty earth radii are preserved without conversion or reconciliation. An "element of fire" here is a supposed cosmic region, not an ordinary flame. Nonius Saluciensis and Peter Nonius refer to Pedro Nunes.

Source page 250–251 what proportion is there betwixt the other three Elements and it? to what use serves it? is it full of spirits which inhabit it, as the Paracelsians and Platonists hold, the higher the more noble, [5474]full of birds, or a meer vacuum to no purpose?	what proportion is there between it and the other three elements? What purpose does it serve? Is it full of spirits dwelling there, as the Paracelsians and Platonists hold—the higher, the nobler? Is it full of birds, or a mere vacuum serving no purpose?[5475]
Source page 251 It is much controverted betwixt Tycho Brahe and Christopher Rotman the Lantsgrave of Hassia's Mathematician, in their Astronomicall Epistles, whether it be the same Diaphanum, cleerness, matter of aire and heavens, or two distinct Essences?	Tycho Brahe and Christoph Rothmann, mathematician to the Landgrave of Hesse, debate at length in their Astronomical Letters whether the air and the heavens have the same "transparent medium," the same transparency and matter, or are two distinct substances.[5476]
Christopher Rotman, John Pena, Iordanus Brunus, with many other late Mathematicians, contend it is the same, and one matter throughout, saying that the higher still the purer it is, and more subtile, as they finde by experience in the top of some hills in [5477]America; if a man ascend, he faints instantly for want of thicker ayre to refrigerate the heart.	Christoph Rothmann, Jean Pena, Giordano Bruno, and many other recent mathematicians maintain that it is the same: one substance throughout, becoming ever purer and finer the higher it rises. They say this is found by experience on the tops of certain mountains in America: if someone climbs up, he immediately faints for lack of denser air to cool the heart.

[5474] Burton. Printed page 251, s: "Manucodiatæ, Birds that live continually in the Ayre, and are never seen on ground but dead: See Ulysses Alderovand. Ornithol. Scal. exerc. cap. 229." Modern English: Birds of paradise, birds that live continually in the air and are never seen on the ground except when dead. See Ulisse Aldrovandi's Ornithology and Scaliger's Exercises, chapter 229.

[5475] Editor. The Manucodiatæ are birds of paradise. The marginal claim that they live perpetually in the air belongs to their early European legend. It is preserved as a cited belief, not a description of their actual life. The successive "it" questions leave the referent of the intervening celestial space somewhat loose.

[5476] Editor. Diaphanum means a transparent medium; Burton adds his own English gloss, "cleerness." Rothmann served Wilhelm IV, Landgrave of Hesse-Kassel. This dispute concerns whether celestial matter and air differ in substance, not simply whether both can be seen through. The individual letters and cited page numbers await full collation.

Acosta l. 3. c. 9. calls this mountain Periacaca in Peru, it makes men cast and vomit, he saith, that climb it, as some other of those Andes do in the desarts of Chila for 500. miles together, and for extremity of cold to lose their fingers and toes.	Acosta, in book 3, chapter 9, calls this mountain Pariacaca, in Peru. It makes those who climb it retch and vomit, he says, as do other mountains of the Andes in the deserts of Chile for five hundred miles together; and through the extreme cold they lose their fingers and toes.[5478]
Tycho will have two distinct matters of Heaven and Ayre; but to say truth, with some small qualification, they have one & the self same opinion about the Essence and matter of Heavens; that it is not hard and impenetrable, as Peripateticks hold, transparent, of a quinta essentia, [5479]but that it is penetrable and soft as the ayre it self is, and that the Planets move in it, as Birds in the ayre, Fishes in the sea.	Tycho maintains that heaven and air are made of two distinct substances. But in truth, with some small qualification, they share one and the same opinion about the substance and matter of the heavens: that it is not hard and impenetrable, as the Aristotelians hold—a transparent "fifth essence"—but penetrable and soft as air itself, and that the planets move in it as birds do in the air and fish in the sea.[5480]
This they prove by motion of Comets, and otherwise (though Claremontius in his Antitycho stiffly oppose) which are not generated, as Aristotle teacheth, in the aeriall Region, of an hot and dry exhalation, and so consumed: but as Anaxagoras and Democritus held of old, of a celestiall matter:	They prove this by the motion of comets and in other ways, though Chiaramonti firmly opposes it in his Anti-Tycho. Comets are not generated, as Aristotle teaches, in the region of air from a hot, dry exhalation and then consumed, but consist of celestial matter, as Anaxagoras and Democritus held long ago.[5481]

[5478] Editor. Acosta III.9 recounts his sickness at Pariacaca, explaining it through air too thin for breathing. His cordillera extends more than five hundred leagues; Burton prints five hundred miles. Acosta then treats fatal cold and lost extremities on the route to Chile as a separate phenomenon, drawing on travellers' reports. Burton compresses these accounts. His preceding cooling-of-the-heart explanation is retained as historical physiology, not substituted for Acosta's account.

[5479] Burton. Printed page 251, t: "Epist. lib. 1. p. 83. Ex quibus constat nec diversa aëris & ætheris diaphana esse, nec refractiones aliunde quàm à crasso aëre causari—Non dura aut impervia, sed liquida, subtilis, motuique Planetarum facilè cedens." Translation: Letters, book 1, page 83. From these things it is clear that the transparent media of air and aether are not different, and that refractions are caused by nothing other than dense air—not hard or impervious, but fluid, fine, and yielding readily to the movement of the planets.

[5480] Editor. Peripatetics are Aristotelians. Quinta essentia is the fifth substance, or aether, distinguished from earth, water, air, and fire. Burton's syntax is compressed: transparency and fifth essence belong to the rejected Aristotelian account. The margin combines a statement about identical transparent media with one about penetrability; it is not silently harmonized with Tycho's distinction between substances.

[5481] Editor. Scipione Chiaramonti's Anti-Tycho opposes Tycho's treatment of comets. Aristotle, Meteorology I.7, offers an account involving an ignited exhalation. In I.6 Aristotle reports Anaxagoras and Democritus as explaining comets by a conjunction of planets; Burton compresses that account into "celestial matter." The later astronomers require separate collation.

and as [5482]Tycho, [5483]Eliseus, Rœlin, Thaddeus, Hagecius, Pena, Rotman, Fracastorius, demonstrate by their progress, parallaxes, refractions, motions of the Planets, which enterfeire and cut one anothers orbs, now higher, and then lower, as ♂ amongst the rest, which sometimes, as [5484]Kepler confirms by his own, and Ticho's accurate observations, comes nearer the earth than the ☉, and is again eftsoons aloft in Jupiters orbe;	Tycho, Eliseus, Roeslin, Thaddeus, Hagecius, Pena, Rothmann, and Fracastoro demonstrate this from their courses, parallaxes, and refractions, and from the motions of the planets, which intersect and cut across one another's spheres, now higher and then lower. Mars, among the rest, sometimes comes nearer to the earth than the sun, as Kepler confirms from his own and Tycho's accurate observations, and at another time is again high in Jupiter's sphere.[5485]
And [5486]other sufficient reasons, far above the Moon: exploding in the mean time that element of fire, those fictitious first watry movers, those Heavens I mean above the Firmament, which Del-rio, Lodovicus Imola, Patricius, and many of the Fathers affirm; those monstrous Orbes of Eccentricks, and Eccentre Epicycles deferentes.	There are other sufficient reasons for placing them far above the moon. Meanwhile, this rejects that element of fire, those imaginary first watery movers—I mean the heavens above the firmament affirmed by Del Río, Lodovicus Imola, Patrizi, and many of the Church Fathers—and those monstrous spheres of eccentrics, and eccentric circles carrying epicycles.[5487]

[5482] Burton. Printed page 251, u: "In Progymn. lib. 2. exemplis quinque." In the Progymnasmata, book 2, with five examples.

[5483] Burton. Printed page 251, x: "In Theoriâ novâ Met. cœlestium 1578." In the New Theory of Celestial Meteors, 1578; the note is attached to Eliseus.

[5484] Burton. Printed page 251, asterisk: "Epit. Astron. lib. 4." Epitome of Astronomy, book 4; the citation accompanies Kepler.

[5485] Editor. The signs ♂ and ☉ mean Mars and the sun. "Eftsoons" means again or at another time. Parallax is the apparent shift in position caused by a change of viewing position; refraction bends light. The printed list separates "Eliseus, Rœlin" and "Thaddeus, Hagecius," although these appear to be the paired names Helisaeus Roeslin and Thaddaeus Hagecius. Its punctuation is retained rather than silently collapsing the entries.

[5486] Burton. Printed page 251, y: "Multa sanè hinc consequuntur absurda, & si nihil aliud, tot Cometæ in æthere animadversi, qui nullius orbis ductum comitantur, idipsum sufficienter refellunt. Tycho astr. epist. pag. 107." Translation: Many absurdities certainly follow from this; and, if nothing else did, so many comets observed in the aether, which follow the course of no sphere, sufficiently refute that very claim. Tycho, Astronomical Letters, page 107.

[5487] Editor. The firmament is the region of the fixed stars in the layered cosmology under discussion. "First watry movers" combines claims about outer motive heavens with a watery heaven. Deferents carry the centres of epicycles; eccentric circles are off-centre. Burton's difficult "Eccentre Epicycles deferentes" is rendered as eccentric circles carrying epicycles, without pretending to settle the system of every named author.

Which howsoever Ptolomy, Alhasen, Vitellio, Purbachius, Maginus, Clavius, and many of their associates stiffly maintain to be reall orbes, excentrick, concentrick, circles equant, &c. are absurd and ridiculous. For who is so mad to think, that there should be so many circles, like subordinate wheels in a clock, all impenetrable and hard, as they fain, adde & subtract at their pleasure.	However firmly Ptolemy, Alhazen, Witelo, Peurbach, Magini, Clavius, and many of their associates maintain that these are real spheres—eccentric, concentric, equant circles, and so on—they are absurd and ridiculous. Who is so mad as to think there are so many circles, like interconnected wheels in a clock, all hard and impenetrable, as these men imagine, adding and subtracting at will?[5488]
[5489]Maginus makes eleven Heavens, subdivided into their orbes and circles, and all too little to serve those particular apparances: Fracastorius 72. Homocentricks; Tycho Brahe, Nicholas Ramerus, Heliseus, Rœlin, have peculiar hypotheses of their own inventions; and they be but inventions, as most of them acknowledge, as we admit of Æquators, Tropicks, Colures, Circles, Artique and Antartique, for doctrines sake (though Ramius think them all unnecessary) they will have them supposed only for method and order.	Magini makes eleven heavens, subdivided into their spheres and circles, and all are too few to account for those particular appearances. Fracastoro makes seventy-two concentric spheres. Tycho Brahe, Nicolaus Reimers, Heliseus, and Roeslin have peculiar hypotheses of their own invention; and they are only inventions, as most of them acknowledge. Just as we admit equators, tropics, colures, and Arctic and Antarctic Circles for the sake of teaching—though Ramius thinks them all unnecessary—they would have these supposed only for method and order.[5490]

[5488] Editor. Ptolemaic geometrical devices could be used for calculation or interpreted as physical structures. Burton attacks the latter here. His sweeping attribution of solid spheres to the whole list of writers has not been verified individually. Equants concern the point relative to which angular motion is uniform; Burton's "circles equant" remains visible in the translation.

[5490] Editor. Homocentrics are spheres sharing a centre; colures are great circles used in celestial coordinate schemes. The eleven and seventy-two are Burton's reported counts. "Ramerus" is rendered Reimers; "Ramius" is left as printed pending identification. The repeated splitting of Heliseus and Roeslin is retained. Burton distinguishes models useful for teaching and calculation from claims about physical machinery.

Source page 251–252 Tycho hath fained I know not how many subdivisions of Epicycles in Epicycles, &c. to calculate and express the Moons motion: But when all is done, as a supposition, and no otherwise; not (as he holds) hard, impenetrable, subtile, transparent, &c. or making musick, as Pythagoras maintained of old, and Robert Constantine of late, but still quiet, liquid, open, &c.	Tycho has devised I know not how many subdivisions of epicycles within epicycles, and so on, to calculate and represent the moon's motion. Yet, when all is said and done, they are a supposition and nothing more: not, as he maintains, hard, impenetrable, subtle, transparent, and so on, or making music, as Pythagoras maintained long ago and Robert Constantin more recently, but always quiet, fluid, open, and so on.[5491]

[5491] Editor. The syntax "not (as he holds)" is read as Tycho's denial that the hypothetical structures are hard physical bodies, not as an endorsement of solid spheres. The music is the traditional harmony of the spheres. "Subtile" is retained as subtle in this awkward list, while "liquid" means fluid or yielding. Robert Constantin's precise statement remains uncollated.

Source page 252 If the Heavens then be penetrable, as these men deliver, and no lets, it were not amiss in this aereall progress, to make wings, and fly up, which that Turk in Busbequius, made his fellow-Citizens in Constantinople beleeve he would perform: & some new-fangled wits, me thinks, should some time or other finde out: or if that may not be, yet with a Galilies glass, or Icaromenippus wings in Lucian, command the Spheres and Heavens, and see what is done amongst them.	If, then, the heavens are penetrable, as these men say, and offer no obstacles, it would be no bad thing, on this aerial journey, to make wings and fly up, as that Turk in Busbecq made his fellow citizens in Constantinople believe he would do. Some ingenious lover of novelties, I think, ought sooner or later to discover how. If that cannot be done, then with a telescope like Galileo's, or the wings of Icaromenippus in Lucian, we might at least survey the spheres and heavens, and see what happens among them.[5492]
Whether there be generation and corruption, as some think, by reason of æthereall Comets, that in Cassiopea 1572. that in Cygno 1600. that in Sagittarius 1604. and many like, which by no means Iul. Cæsar la Galla, that Italian Philosopher, in his physicall disputation with Galileus de phænomenis in orbe Lunæ, cap. 9. will admit: or that they were created ab initio, and shew themselves at set times: and as [5493]Helisæus Ræslin contends, have Poles, Axeltrees, Circles of their own, and regular motions.	Whether things come into being and pass away in the heavens, as some think on the evidence of celestial comets—the one in Cassiopeia in 1572, that in Cygnus in 1600, that in Sagittarius in 1604, and many others. The Italian philosopher Giulio Cesare La Galla will by no means admit this in chapter 9 of his physical disputation with Galileo, On Phenomena in the Lunar Orb. Or were they created from the beginning and do they show themselves at set times, with poles, axes, circles of their own, and regular motions, as Helisaeus Roeslin contends?[5494]

[5492] Editor. "Lets" means impediments; "command" here means gain a view over. Burton couples Galileo's telescope with Lucian's satirical ascent in Icaromenippus, where Menippus equips himself with an eagle's wing and a vulture's wing. Busbequius is Ogier Ghiselin de Busbecq; the Constantinople anecdote remains uncollated.

[5494] Editor. "Generation and corruption" means coming into being and passing away, an issue for the supposed changelessness of the heavens. Burton groups new stars with comets; the 1572 and 1604 events are now classed as supernovae. His dates, constellation labels and La Galla locator are retained, not silently corrected. "Axeltrees" means axes.

For non pereunt, sed minuuntur & disparent, [5495]Blancanus holds, they come & go by fits, casting their tailes still from the Sun: some of them, as a burning glass projects the Sun beams from it; though not alwaies neither: for sometimes a Comet casts his taile from Venus, as Ticho observes. And as [5496]Helisæus Ræslin of some others, from the Moon, with little Stars about them, ad stuporem Astronomorum; cum multis aliis in cælo miraculis, all which argue, with those Medicean, Austrian, & Burbonian Stars, that the Heaven of the Planets is indistinct, pure, & open, in which the Planets move certis legibus ac metis.	For "they do not perish, but diminish and disappear," Blancanus holds. They come and go at intervals, casting their tails away from the sun —some of them as a burning glass projects the sun's beams. Yet not always: sometimes a comet casts its tail away from Venus, as Tycho observes; and, as Helisaeus Roeslin says of some others, away from the moon, with little stars around them, "to the astonishment of astronomers, together with many other wonders in heaven." All these, along with those Medicean, Austrian, and Bourbon stars, indicate that the heaven of the planets is undivided, pure, and open, and that the planets move in it "under fixed laws and within fixed bounds."[5497]
Examine likewise, An cælum sit coloratum? Whether the Stars be of that bigness, distance, as Astronomers relate, so many in [5498]number, 1026. or 1725. as I. Bayerus; or as some Rabbins 29000. Myriades; or as Galilee discovers by his glasses, infinite, & that via lactea, a confused light of small Stars, like so many nailes in a door: or all in a row, like those 12000. Isles of the Maldives, in the Indian Ocean? whether the least visible Star in the eighth Sphere be 18. times bigger than the earth; and as Ticho calculates, 14000. semidiameters distant from it?	Examine likewise: "Is heaven coloured?" Are the stars as large and as distant as astronomers report? Are there as many as they say—1,026, or 1,725 according to Johann Bayer; or, as some rabbis say, 29,000 myriads; or an infinite number, as Galileo discovers through his telescopes? Is the Milky Way a mingled light of small stars, like so many nails in a door, or all in a row like those 12,000 islands of the Maldives in the Indian Ocean? Is the smallest visible star in the eighth sphere eighteen times larger than the earth and, as Tycho calculates, 14,000 earth radii away from it?[5499]

[5497] Editor. A burning glass focuses sunlight. The proposed tail directions and the inference of an undivided planetary heaven belong to the historical debate. The Medicean stars are Jupiter's four major satellites; the Austrian and Bourbon labels require separate identification and collation.

[5498] Burton. Printed page 252, d: "An sit crux & nubecula in cælis ad Polum Antarcticum, quod ex Corsalio refert Patritius." Whether there is a cross and a little cloud in the heavens near the Antarctic pole, as Patrizi reports from Corsali.

[5499] Editor. A myriad is ten thousand; 29,000 myriads is 290 million. The eighth sphere is the region of the fixed stars. "Bigger" does not specify diameter, volume or another measure. The star counts, island count and distances are preserved as reported, without reconciling them with other figures later in this block. Corsali is Andrea Corsali; the exact passage in Patrizi remains uncollated.

Whether they be thicker parts of the Orbes, as Aristotle delivers: or so many habitable Worlds, as Democritus? whether they have light of their own, or from the Sun, or give light round, as Patritius discourseth? An æquè distent à centro mundi? Whether light be of their essence, & that light be a substance or an accident? whether they be hot by themselves, or by accident cause heat? whether there be such a precession of the Æquinoxes, as Copernicus holds, or that the eighth Sphere move?	Are they denser parts of the spheres, as Aristotle teaches, or so many habitable worlds, as Democritus holds? Do they have light of their own or receive it from the sun, or cast light all around, as Patrizi discusses? "Are they equally distant from the centre of the world?" Does light belong to their essence, and is that light a substance or an accidental property? Are they hot in themselves, or do they produce heat incidentally? Is there such a precession of the equinoxes as Copernicus holds, or does the eighth sphere move?[5500]
An benè philosophentur, R. Bacon, & I. Dee, Aphorism. de multiplicatione specierum? Whether there be any such Images ascending with each degree of the Zodiack in the East, as Aliacensis feignes? An aqua super cælum? as Patritius & the Schoolmen will, a Crystalline [5501]watry heaven, which is [5502]certainly to be understood of that in the middle Region: for otherwise, if at Noahs floud the water came from thence, it must be above an hundred yeeres falling down to us, as some calculate.	"Do Roger Bacon and John Dee reason soundly in their aphorisms on the propagation of forms?" Do such images rise in the east with each degree of the zodiac as Aliacensis imagines? "Is there water above heaven?" Is there a crystalline, watery heaven, as Patrizi and the scholastics maintain? This must certainly mean the water in the middle region of the air; otherwise, if the water of Noah's flood came from there, it must have taken more than a hundred years to fall down to us, as some calculate.[5503]

[5500] Editor. An "accident" is a property that does not constitute a thing's substance. The questions distinguish intrinsic heat from heat produced by some other action. Precession is the slow change in the equinoctial reference points; Burton juxtaposes rival explanations of apparent stellar motion.

[5502] Burton. Printed page 252, f: "See this discussed in Sir Walter Raleighs history, in Zanch. ad Casman." Burton's English reference; its compressed final locator remains unresolved.

[5503] Editor. Species here are propagated forms or likenesses, not biological species. Aliacensis is Pierre d'Ailly. The "middle region" is the cold middle layer of the older account of the atmosphere. The exact Bacon, Dee, d'Ailly, Patrizi, Raleigh, Zanchi and Casmann references remain to be collated.

Source page 252–253 Besides, An terra sit animata? which some so confidently believe, with Orpheus, Hermes, Averroes, from which all other souls of men, beasts, divels, plants, fishes, &c. are derived, and into which again, after some revolutions, as Plato in his Timæus, Plotinus in his Enneades more largely discusse, they return. (See Chalcidius and Benius, Plato's Commentators) as all philosophicall matter in materiam primam. Keplerus, Patritius, and some other Neotericks have in part revived this opinion. And that every Star in heaven hath a soul, angel, or intelligence to animate or move it, &c.	Besides, "Does the earth have a soul?" Some believe this so confidently, with Orpheus, Hermes, and Averroes: from it all other souls—of people, beasts, devils, plants, fishes, and so on—are derived, and into it they return after certain cycles, as Plato in his Timaeus and Plotinus in his Enneads discuss at greater length. See Chalcidius and Beni, commentators on Plato. So too all matter in natural philosophy returns "into prime matter." Kepler, Patrizi, and some other modern thinkers have partly revived this opinion, and the belief that every star in heaven has a soul, angel, or intelligence to give it life or motion, and so on.[5504]
Source page 253 [5505]Or to omit all smaller controversies, as matters of less moment, and examine that main paradox, of the Earths motion, now so much in question: Aristarchus Samius, Pythagoras maintained it of old, Democritus, and many of their Schollers, Didacus Astunica, Anthony Foscarinus, a Carmelite, and some other Commentators will have Iob to insinuate as much, cap. 9. ver. 4. Qui commovet terram de loco suo, &c. and that this one place of Scripture makes more for the Earths motion, than all the other prove against it; whom Pineda confutes, most contradict.	Or let us pass over all the smaller controversies as matters of less importance and examine the great paradox of the earth's motion, now so much disputed. Aristarchus of Samos and Pythagoras maintained it long ago, as did Democritus and many of their followers. Diego de Zúñiga, Anthony Foscarini, a Carmelite, and some other commentators hold that Job intimates as much in chapter 9, verse 4: "He who moves the earth from its place," and so on. They maintain that this single passage of Scripture supports the earth's motion more strongly than all the others oppose it. Pineda refutes them; most contradict them.[5506]

[5504] Editor. Neoterics are recent or modern thinkers. Prime matter is matter considered without determinate form in an Aristotelian account. An "intelligence" here is an immaterial mover. Burton assembles different traditions of animation and return; the translation does not harmonize them or attribute an identical doctrine to every author named.

[5505] Burton. Printed page 252, g: "Vid. Fromundum de Meteoris lib. 5. artic. 5. & Lansbergium." See Fromondus, On Meteors, book 5, article 5, and Lansbergen. The printed anchor is not clear; attached here to the transition into the earth's motion.

[5506] Editor. The quoted words occur in Job 9:6, not the printed 9:4. Didacus Astunica is Diego de Zúñiga. The Carmelite usually known as Paolo Antonio Foscarini is called Anthony here. Burton's historical grouping and the force claimed for the biblical passage are preserved; these claims require separate assessment.

Howsoever, it is revived since by Copernicus, not as a truth, but a supposition, as he confesseth himself in the Preface to Pope Nicholas, but now maintained in good earnest by [5507]Calcagninus, Telesius, Kepler, Rotman, Gilbert, Digges, Galileus, Campanella, and especially by [5508]Lansbergius, naturæ, rationi, & veritati consentaneum, by Origanus, and some [5509]others of his followers.[5510]	However that may be, Copernicus later revived it as a supposition rather than a truth, as he himself confesses in his preface to Pope Nicholas. But it is now seriously maintained by Calcagnini, Telesio, Kepler, Rothmann, Gilbert, Digges, Galileo, Campanella, and especially Lansbergen, as “agreeable to nature, reason, and truth”; also by Origanus and some other followers of his.[5511]

[5510] Burton. Printed page 253, third *: “See M. Carpenters Geogr. cap. 4. lib. 1. Campanella & Origanus præf. Ephemer. where Scripture places are answered.” See Carpenter’s Geography I.4, Campanella, and Origanus’s preface to the Ephemerides, where passages of Scripture are answered. No distinct matching body asterisk is visible; retained beside the group of authorities.

[5511] Editor. Copernicus’s own dedication is addressed to Paul III, not Nicholas. The separate, unsigned Ad lectorem says hypotheses need not be true or even probable if they support calculation; it was written by Andreas Osiander. Burton merges the two prefatory texts and assigns Osiander’s position to Copernicus. Copernicus’s dedication instead argues for the coherence of the planetary arrangement. Both printed errors remain visible in the body. The following list groups writers with different views of terrestrial motion; it does not establish their adherence to one system.

For if the Earth be the Center of the World, stand still, and the Heavens move, as the most received opinion is, which they call inordinatam cœli dispositionem, though stiffly maintained by Tycho, Ptolomæus, and their adherents, quis ille furor? &c. what fury is that, saith [5512]Dr Gilbert, satis animosè, as Cabeus notes, that shall drive the Heavens about with such incomprehensible celerity in 24. houres, when as every point of the Firmament, and in the Æquator, must needs move (so [5513]Clavius calculates) 176660. in one 246th part of an houre:	For if the earth is the centre of the world and stands still while the heavens move—the most generally accepted opinion, which they call "a disorderly arrangement of heaven," though Tycho, Ptolemy, and their followers stubbornly maintain it—"what madness is this?" What fury, says Dr Gilbert, "rather boldly," as Cabeo observes, is to drive the heavens around with such incomprehensible speed in twenty-four hours? Every point of the firmament at the equator must necessarily move 176,660 in one two-hundred-and-forty-sixth of an hour, as Clavius calculates.[5514]
and an arrow out of a bow must goe seven times about the earth, whilest a man can say an Ave Maria, if it keep the same space, or compass the earth 1884. times in an houre, which is supra humanam cogitationem, beyond humane conceit: Ocyor & jaculo, & ventos, æquante sagitta. A man could not ride so much ground, going 40. miles a day, in 2904. yeeres, as the Firmament goes in 24. houres; or so much in 203. yeeres, as the said Firmament in one minute; quod incredibile videtur:	An arrow shot from a bow would have to go seven times around the earth while a man could say a Hail Mary, if it covered the same distance, or circle the earth 1,884 times in an hour. This is "beyond human thought," beyond human conception: "swifter than a javelin and than an arrow matching the winds." A man riding forty miles a day could not cover as much ground in 2,904 years as the firmament travels in twenty-four hours, or as much in 203 years as that same firmament travels in one minute—"which seems incredible."[5515]

[5513] Burton. Printed page 253, i: "Comment. in 2. cap. sphær. Io. de Sacr. Bosc." Commentary on chapter 2 of Johannes de Sacrobosco's Sphere.

[5514] Editor. No unit follows 176660 in the 1651 body. The modern text deliberately supplies none; the Clavius calculation and the unusual denominator 246 await collation. "Firmament" means the region of the fixed stars. Gilbert's challenge asks why the immense heavens should rotate daily instead of the earth.

[5515] Editor. Conceit means conception or thought. The verse is Virgil, Aeneid X.248: Aeneas's ship speeds over the water after the nymph Cymodocea pushes it. Ventos is the regular accusative object of aequante: the arrow equals the winds in speed. The earlier description of that word as irregular is withdrawn. Burton's punctuation is retained. His arrow comparison and distance figures are not arithmetically reconciled; the Clavius calculation remains uncollated.

And the [5516]Pole star, which to our thinking scarce moveth out of his place, goeth a bigger circuit than the Sun, whose Diameter is much larger than the Diameter of the Heaven of the Sun, and 20000. Semidiameters of the earth from us, with the rest of the fixed stars, as Tycho proves.	And the Pole Star, which to our thinking scarcely moves out of its place, travels in a greater circuit than the sun: the diameter of that circuit is much larger than the diameter of the sun's heaven. Together with the other fixed stars, it is 20,000 earth radii away from us, as Tycho proves.[5517]
To avoid therefore the impossibilities, they ascribe a triple motion to the earth, the Sun immoveable in the Center of the whole world, the earth Center of the Moon, alone, above ♀ and ☿, beneath ♄, ♃, ♂, (or as [5518]Origanus and others will, one single motion to the earth, still placed in the Center of the world, which is more probable) a single motion to the Firmament, which moves in 30. or 26. thousand yeeres; and so of the Planets, Saturne in 30. yeeres absolves his sole and proper motion, Iupiter in 12. Mars in 3. &c. and so solve all apparances better than any way whatsoever:	To avoid these impossibilities, therefore, they assign a threefold motion to the earth, with the sun immovable at the centre of the whole world and the earth the centre of the moon alone, above Venus and Mercury and below Saturn, Jupiter, and Mars. Or, as Origanus and others maintain, they give the earth a single motion while it remains at the centre of the world, which is more probable. They give the firmament a single motion, completed in thirty or twenty-six thousand years; and similarly with the planets: Saturn completes its sole and proper motion in thirty years, Jupiter in twelve, Mars in three, and so on. Thus they explain all the appearances better than in any other way.[5519]

[5516] Burton. Printed page 253, k: "Dist. 3. gr. 1. à Polo." Distance: 3 degrees, 1 [minute], from the pole. The final unit is implicit in the abbreviated printing.

[5517] Editor. The relative "whose" is taken to describe the circuit just mentioned, rather than the sun's physical diameter. A semidiameter is a radius. The 20,000 earth radii here differs from the earlier 14,000; both source readings are retained. The Pole Star's small angular circuit can represent a great distance when projected onto a very remote stellar sphere.

[5518] Burton. Printed page 253, fourth *: "Præf. Ephem." Preface to the Ephemerides.

[5519] Editor. The three Copernican motions comprise daily rotation, annual revolution and the motion then assigned to preserve the earth's axial direction. A rotating earth remaining central is a different model. Burton explicitly calls that alternative more probable. The printed Mars period is three years; it is retained although the actual period is about 1.88 years. Above and below mean farther from and nearer to the centre in the system described.

Calculate all motions, be they in longum or latum, direct, stationary, retrograde, ascent or descent, without Epicycles, intricate Eccentricks, &c. rectius commodiusque per unicum motum terræ, saith Lansbergius, much more certain than by those Alphonsine, or any such tables, which are grounded from those other suppositions.	They calculate all motions—whether in longitude or latitude, direct, stationary, retrograde, ascending or descending—without epicycles, intricate eccentric circles, and so on, "more correctly and conveniently through a single motion of the earth," says Lansbergen; much more reliably than by those Alfonsine or similar tables founded on the other suppositions.[5520]
Source page 253–254 And 'tis true they say, according to optick principles, the visible apparances of the Planets do so indeed answer to their magnitudes & orbs, & come neerest to Mathematicall observations, & precedent calculations, there is no repugnancy to physicall axiomes, because no penetration of orbes: but then between the sphere of Saturne and the Firmament, there is such an incredible and vast [5521]space or distance (7000000. semidiameters of the earth, as Tycho calculates) void of stars:	And it is true, they say, that according to the principles of optics the visible appearances of the planets do indeed correspond to their sizes and orbits in this way, agreeing most closely with mathematical observations and earlier calculations. There is no conflict with physical axioms, because no spheres penetrate one another. But then between Saturn's sphere and the firmament lies an incredible, vast space or distance—7,000,000 earth radii, as Tycho calculates—empty of stars.[5522]

[5520] Editor. Retrograde means apparently moving backwards among the stars; stationary means momentarily ceasing that apparent motion. Epicycles are circles whose centres move on other circles; eccentrics are off-centre circles. The Alfonsine tables are astronomical tables associated with Alfonso X of Castile. Burton's claims about eliminating these devices are attributed to the argument he reports.

[5521] Burton. Printed page 254, l: "Which may be full of Planets, perhaps, to us unseen, as those about Iupiter, &c." Burton's English qualification.

[5522] Editor. Penetration of orbs means the supposed physical spheres passing through one another. The vast interval is part of the historical objection to a moving earth and the absence of an observed stellar parallax. The figure is seven million earth radii in the source. Burton's own margin immediately qualifies the assertion that the interval is empty.

Source page 254 And besides, they do so inhance the bigness of the stars, enlarge their circuit, to salve those ordinary objections of Parallaxes & Retrogradations of the fixed stars, that alteration of the Poles, elevation in severall places or latitude of Cities here on earth (for, say they, if a mans eye were in the Firmament, he should not at all discern that great annuall motion of the earth, but it would still appear punctum indivisibile, & seem to be fixed in one place, of the same bigness) that it is quite opposite to reason, to naturall philosophy, & all out as absurd as disproportiall (so some will) as prodigious, as that of the Suns swift motion of Heavens.	Besides, they so increase the size of the stars and enlarge their circuit to answer the usual objections about parallaxes and retrograde motions of the fixed stars, changes of the poles, differences in elevation from place to place, or the latitude of cities here on earth—for, they say, if a man's eye were in the firmament, he would not discern the earth's great annual motion at all: it would still appear "an indivisible point," seemingly fixed in one place and of the same size—that the result is wholly contrary to reason and natural philosophy; every bit as absurd, as disproportionate, and, some say, as monstrous as that swift motion of the sun and heavens.[5523]
But hoc posito, to grant this their tenent of the earths motion: If the earth move, it is a Planet, & shines to them in the Moon, & to the other Planetary inhabitants, as the Moon and they do to us upon the earth: but shine she doth, as Galilie, [5524]Kepler, & others prove,	But "assuming this," let us grant their doctrine of the earth's motion. If the earth moves, it is a planet and shines for those on the moon and for the other planetary inhabitants, just as the moon and they shine for us on earth. And shine it does, as Galileo, Kepler, and others prove.[5525]

[5523] Editor. Parallax is a change of apparent position arising from a change of viewpoint. Burton compresses several different objections into a single sentence; their scope is retained. The awkward final "Suns swift motion of Heavens" is rendered as the swift motion of the sun and heavens, the objection discussed above. The precise wording and reasoning of Tycho and the other interlocutors remain to be collated.

[5524] Burton. Printed page 254, m: "Luna circumterrestris Planeta quum sit, consentaneum est esse in Lunâ viventes creaturas, & singulis Planetarum globis sui serviunt circulatores, ex qua consideratione, de eorum incolis summâ probabilitate concludimus, quod & Tychoni Braheo, è solâ consideratione vastitatis eorum visum fuit. Kepl. dissert. cum nun. syd. f. 29." Since the moon is a planet circling the earth, it is reasonable that there should be living creatures on the moon; and each planetary globe is served by its own orbiting bodies. From this consideration we conclude with the greatest probability that they have inhabitants; Tycho Brahe thought so too, merely from considering their vastness. Kepler, Discussion with the Starry Messenger, folio 29.

[5525] Editor. The shine of the earth does not by itself establish inhabitants on other worlds. Burton moves from the analogy between luminous bodies to a speculative conclusion. His long Kepler margin combines separate arguments rather than reproducing one continuous passage: comparison with Dissertatio confirms the moon, orbiting bodies, inhabitants and Tycho themes, but not the margin as a verbatim quotation.

& then per consequens, the rest of the Planets are inhabited, as well as the Moon, which he grants in his dissertation with Galilies Nuncius Sidereus, [5526]that there be Ioviall and Saturn Inhabitants, &c. & those severall Planets have their severall Moons about them, as the earth hath hers, as Galileus hath already evinced by his glasses:	Then, consequently, the rest of the planets are inhabited, as well as the moon. Kepler grants in his discussion with Galileo's Starry Messenger "that there are inhabitants of Jupiter and Saturn," and so on; and those several planets have their several moons around them, as the earth has hers, as Galileo has already demonstrated with his telescopes.[5527]
[5528]four about Iupiter, two about Saturne (though Sitius the Florentine, Fortunius Licetus, and Iul. Cæsar le Galla cavill at it) yet Kepler, the Emperours Mathematician, confirmes out of his experience, that he saw as much by the same help, & more about Mars, Venus; & the rest they hope to find out, peradventure even amongst the fixed stars, which Brunus and Brutius have already averred.	Four around Jupiter, two around Saturn—though Sitius the Florentine, Fortunio Liceti, and Giulio Cesare La Galla find fault with it. Yet Kepler, the emperor's mathematician, confirms from his own experience that he saw as much with the same aid, and more around Mars and Venus. They hope to discover the rest, perhaps even among the fixed stars, as Bruno and Brutius have already asserted.[5529]

[5526] Burton. Printed page 254, n: "Temperare non possum quin ex inventis tuis hoc moneam, veri non absimile, non tam in Lunâ, sed etiam in Iove, & reliquis Planetis incolas esse. Kepl. fo. 26. Si non sint accolæ in Iovis globo, qui notent admirandam hanc varietatem oculis, cui bono quatuor illi Planetæ Iovem circumcursitant?" I cannot refrain from pointing out, on the basis of your discoveries, that it is not unlike the truth that there are inhabitants not so much on the moon as on Jupiter and the other planets. Kepler, folio 26. If there are no dwellers on Jupiter's globe to observe this marvellous variety with their eyes, for whose benefit do those four planets circle Jupiter?

[5527] Editor. In the Dissertatio, Kepler entertains inhabitants of the moon and Jupiter; non tantum means "not only," whereas Burton's non tam means "not so much." The later question about the use of Jupiter's four companions argues from their supposed purpose, not from observed inhabitants. Burton combines excerpts and extends the statement to Saturn and other planets. His wording is preserved. The comparison uses the Latin text edited by Favaro; Burton's folio references and immediate edition remain unverified.

[5528] Burton. Printed page 254, * at four: "Some of those above Iupiter I have seen my self by the help of a glass 8 foot long." Burton's own report of telescopic observation.

[5529] Editor. Galileo observed Jupiter's four large moons. The two apparent companions of Saturn were unresolved parts of its rings, not two detected moons. In the opening of his Dissertatio, Kepler speculates about companions of Mars and Venus before receiving Galileo's book and later hopes to discover them; he does not there report observing them. Burton's claim of observation is preserved but not corroborated by that passage. Brutius is left unidentified. The margin is notable for Burton's first-person claim to have seen Jovian satellites through an eight-foot telescope.

Then (I say) the earth and they be Planets alike, inhabited alike, moved about the Sun, the common Center of the World alike, and it may be those two green children which [5530]Nubrigensis speakes of in his time, that fell from Heaven, came from thence; and that famous stone that fell from heaven in Aristotles time, olymp. 84. anno tertio, ad Capuæ Fluenta, recorded by Laertius and others, or Ancile or buckler in Numa's time recorded by Festus.	Then, I say, the earth and they are alike planets, alike inhabited, and alike moved around the sun, the common centre of the world. Perhaps those two green children who, according to William of Newburgh, fell from heaven in his time came from there; and so did that famous stone which fell from heaven in Aristotle's time, in the third year of the eighty-fourth Olympiad, beside the streams of Capua, as recorded by Laertius and others; or the ancile, the shield in Numa's time recorded by Festus.[5531]
We may likewise inferre with Campanella and Brunus, that which Pythagoras, Aristarchus Samius, Heraclitus, Epicurus, Melissus, Democritus, Leucippus maintained in their ages, there be [5532]infinite Worlds, and infinite earths or systemes, in infinito æthere, which [5533]Eusebius collects out of their tenents, because infinite stars, and planets like unto this of ours, which some stick not still to maintain and publikely defend, sperabundus expecto innumerabilium mundorum in æternitate perambulationem, &c. (Nic. Hill. Londinensis philos. Epicur.)	We may likewise infer with Campanella and Bruno what Pythagoras, Aristarchus of Samos, Heraclitus, Epicurus, Melissus, Democritus, and Leucippus maintained in their respective ages: there are infinite worlds, infinite earths or systems "in infinite aether." Eusebius gathers this from their doctrines, because there are infinite stars and planets like this one of ours. Some still do not hesitate to maintain and publicly defend it: "Full of hope, I look forward to wandering through innumerable worlds in eternity," and so on. Nicholas Hill of London, Epicurean Philosophy.[5534]

[5530] Burton. Printed page 254, †: "Rerum Angl. l. 1. c. 27. de viridibus pueris." History of English Affairs, book 1, chapter 27, on the green children.

[5531] Editor. Nubrigensis is William of Newburgh. History I.27, in Hamilton's Latin edition (1856), I, pp. 73–75, says the children emerged from pits at Woolpit. They report coming from the land of Saint Martin and cannot explain how they arrived. This supplies no fall from heaven; Burton's celestial speculation remains his own. Diogenes Laertius II.10–12 connects the Aegospotami stone with Anaxagoras, unlike Burton's Aristotle, Capua and Olympiad details. The ancile is Numa's legendary sacred shield; the Festus passage remains uncollated.

[5533] Burton. Printed page 254, * at Eusebius: "Libro Cont. philos. cap. 29." Book against the philosophers, chapter 29. The abbreviated work title remains unresolved.

[5534] Editor. Brunus is Giordano Bruno. Burton's list compresses ancient positions on worlds that differ substantially and should not be accepted as a uniform doctrine. His abbreviated title for Eusebius is not securely resolved. Nicholas Hill's wording and source title await direct collation; the Latin is translated afresh here.

For if the Firmament be of such an incomparable bigness, as these Copernicall Giants will have it, infinitum, aut infinito proximum, so vast and full of innumerable stars, as being infinite in extent, one above another, some higher, some lower, some neerer, some farther off, and so far asunder, and those so huge and great:	For if the firmament is of such incomparable size as these Copernican giants would have it, "infinite, or approaching infinity," so vast and full of innumerable stars, infinite in extent, one above another, some higher, some lower, some nearer, some farther off, so widely separated, and themselves so enormous—[5535]
insomuch, that if the whole sphere of Saturn, and all that is included in it, totum aggregatum (as Fromundus of Lovain in his tract de immobilitate terræ argues) evehatur inter stellas, videri à nobis non poterat, tam immanis est distantia inter tellurem & fixas, sed instar puncti, &c. If our world be small in respect, why may we not suppose a plurality of worlds, those infinite stars visible in the Firmament to be so many Suns, with particular fixt Centers; to have likewise their subordinate planets, as the Sun hath his dancing still round him?	So much so that, if the whole sphere of Saturn and everything contained within it, "the entire aggregate," as Fromondus of Louvain argues in his treatise On the Immobility of the Earth, "were carried up among the stars, we could not see it except as a point, so immense is the distance between the earth and the fixed stars," and so on. If our world is small by comparison, why may we not suppose a plurality of worlds? Why may those infinite stars visible in the firmament not be so many suns, each with its own fixed centre and its subordinate planets, just as the sun has his, always dancing around him?[5536]

[5535] Editor. "Copernican giants" is Burton's expansive, playful label. An indefinitely great universe and a strictly infinite one are not the same claim; the quoted Latin itself preserves the alternative. The sentence continues into the following aligned unit.

[5536] Editor. Totum aggregatum means the whole collected system. Burton's Latin has an awkward shift from the conditional evehatur to poterat and a delayed sed instar puncti; the translation gives its evident sense, invisibility except as a point. Fromondus's precise text has not been independently collated.

Source page 254–255 which Cardinall Cusanus, Walkarinus, Brunus, and some others have held, and some still maintain, Animæ Aristotelismo innutritæ, & minutis speculationibus assuetæ, secus forsan, &c. Though they seem close to us, they are infinitely distant, and so per consequens, there are infinite habitable worlds: what hinders? Why should not an infinite cause (as God is) produce infinite effects? as Nic. Hill Democrit. philos. disputes:	Cardinal Cusanus, Walkarinus, Bruno, and some others have held this, and some still maintain it: "Minds nourished on Aristotelianism and accustomed to minute speculations may perhaps think otherwise," and so on. Though they seem close to us, they are infinitely distant, and consequently there are infinite habitable worlds. What prevents it? Why should an infinite cause, such as God, not produce infinite effects, as Nicholas Hill argues in his Democritean Philosophy?[5537]
Source page 255 Kepler (I confess) will by no means admit of Brunus infinite worlds, or that the fixed stars should be so many Suns, with their compassing planets, yet the said [5538]Kepler betwixt iest and earnest in his perspectives, Lunar Geography, [5539]& somnio suo, dissertat. cum nunc. syder. seems in part to agree with this, and partly to contradict; For the Planets, he yeelds them to be inhabited, he doubts of the Stars:	Kepler, I confess, will by no means admit Bruno's infinite worlds, or that the fixed stars are so many suns with planets circling them. Yet that same Kepler, half in jest and half in earnest in his works on optics, his Lunar Geography, his Dream, and his Discussion with the Starry Messenger, seems partly to agree with this and partly to contradict it. He grants that the planets are inhabited; he is doubtful about the stars.[5540]

[5537] Editor. Cusanus is Nicholas of Cusa. Walkarinus is retained without a firm identification. The untranslated predicate in the fragment about Aristotelian minds is supplied minimally as "think." Burton refers to Nicholas Hill's philosophy first as Epicurean and then as Democritean; neither description is silently replaced.

[5538] Burton. Printed page 255, p: "Kepler fol. 2. dissert. Quid impedit quin credamus ex his initiis, plures alios mundos detegendos, vel (ut Democrito placuit) infinitos?" Kepler, Discussion, folio 2. What prevents us from believing that, from these beginnings, many other worlds will be discovered—or, as Democritus held, infinitely many?

[5539] Burton. Printed page 255, first *: "Lege somnium Kepleri edit. 1635." Read Kepler's Dream, published in 1635. Burton's date is retained.

[5540] Editor. Perspectives are works on optics; Somnium means Dream. The margin dates publication to 1635; the Library of Congress copy is dated 1634. Burton's date is retained, with his particular copy still unidentified. Kepler's Dissertatio distinguishes his speculations about planetary inhabitants from the infinity of worlds attributed to Bruno; Burton's "half in jest and half in earnest" matters to the tone.

and so doth Tycho in his Astronomicall Epistles, out of a consideration of their vastity and greatness, break out into some such like speeches, that he will never beleeve those great and huge bodies were made to no other use than this that we perceive, to illuminate the earth, a point insensible, in respect of the whole.	Tycho too, in his Astronomical Letters, is led by reflection on their vastness and magnitude to break into similar remarks. He will never believe that those enormous bodies were made for no other use than the one we perceive: to illuminate the earth, an imperceptible point in comparison with the whole.[5541]
